“Yes. Friends of Yori's. You know her and demons, she seems to know all of them, or at least they've heard of her. The ones that don't run away are all good friends as far as I can see. It's weird.” Ami giggled, making the younger woman smile a little, then nod. “These guys are really knowledgeable and genuinely want to help. They're both very worried about the problem. It'll be all right, trust us.”

It took some time, but the girl finally nodded. “OK. Since it's you, Ami. You're the smart one. I didn't believe it when Usagi called you a traitor.” Rei and Ami looked pleased, while Aiko bent down and picked up the magical weapon, handing it back to it's owner.

“Please don't start waving this around, Hotaru, or it will get very confusing.” She smiled. “I'll take you all back to the temple courtyard, so you can get over the initial teleport sickness without meeting new people as well. It'll be unpleasant for a few seconds but it passes quickly. Don't get freaked out too much.” Once the purple-haired girl indicated her understanding, the brunette walked closer, then teleported all four of them.

Gagging at the sudden nausea that swept through her, the youngest member of the group dropped to her knees, her head spinning, feeling someone supporting her, until the feelings subsided as quickly as they'd arisen. Raising her head she found Aiko kneeling beside her. “Feel better?”

“Yes, thanks. That was horrible.” The brunette grinned.

“It hits everyone different, some worse than others. But it only does that the first time, after that you're fine.” She helped the other girl to her feet. “Can I make a suggestion? Power down, it's probably best if you're not holding a lethal weapon when you meet Hnther and Lldnr'k. Just in case your reactions get ahead of your mind.” Thinking about it for a moment, Hotaru nodded slightly grudgingly, bending down to pick up her pole-arm from where she'd dropped it when the incredible sick feeling had swept through her, then performing the actions that changed her back to her civilian form, the weapon vanishing in the process.

Glancing at Ami and Rei, who were in their normal street clothes, she suddenly asked, “Why weren't you guys powered up? If I'd been more angry I might have attacked you, which would have been very bad without your magic boost.” The other two looked at each other, Rei grinning slightly, then Ami turned a little to the side and fired a magic blast at the wall of the courtyard, instantly covering it in a couple of centimetres of ice. She giggled as Hotaru gaped at her.

“How... I mean, what...” Her voice faded away for a moment. “How the hell did you do that?”

“I told you Yori could teach us interesting things. You wouldn't believe what she knows about magic. I have no idea how she's learned so much so young, but...” The young woman shrugged. “She knows an awful lot about all sorts of weird things.”

“You don't have any idea at all...” Aiko muttered, smiling weirdly. “Not a clue.” All three looked at her, but she didn't expand on the subject, although that weird grin stayed for a few seconds.

“Um, OK, then,” Ami slowly said, looking at the other woman with an odd expression, before turning to her younger friend. “Let's go and meet the two mages. We can explain what we know so far and what we think is going on, while they check you out. When Yori and the others get back, they can fill in the rest and heal your brain damage.” She put her hand on Hotaru's shoulder comfortably. “I think it's going to be all right.”

“For a given value of all right, perhaps,” Aiko added, looking unusually serious, but led them to the room in which two of their team-mates, a pair of demon mages, and Rei's grandfather all were. The elderly priest was deep in conversation with the demons when they entered. Hotaru stopped dead, staring at the unfamiliar figures, her face paling, until Rei behind her gently prodded her further into the room.

“It's fine, they're friends, forget what they look like,” she whispered into the other girl's ear. After a long moment of staring Hotaru nodded slightly, still looking rather worried, but followed her friends over to the table. She looked around the room, abruptly noticing her two unconscious teammates, one on the sofa and one on the floor, looking oddly peaceful lying there. Ami followed her eyes when she heard the purple-haired girl gasp in shock, staring in sudden horror.

“Oh, my god, what happened to Haruka's arm?” she cried, rushing over to inspect the other woman, feeling queasy. Pulling out her computer she scanned the blonde, relaxing slightly when it told her there was no immediate danger.

“She did something very stupid that hurt Chou a bit. Yori didn't react well to that,” Aiko told her, coming up to her side and following her gaze curiously. Ami glanced at the brunette, who she noticed somewhat uneasily appeared completely unaffected by the sight of the maimed woman on the sofa, merely inspecting her with dispassionate curiosity. “Luckily for her, it was only a slight injury. She wouldn't be here if she'd seriously threatened Chou.” Aiko met her eyes for a moment. “If she'd somehow managed to kill her, none of you would be.” There was complete silence in the room for a moment, then she smiled a little. “But that would have been very difficult. Chou, like Yori, is extremely hard to kill. That said, it isn't a good idea to threaten either of them if the other one is around. They don't like it.” Turning, she walked over to Hnther and began talking to him in a low voice, while Ami glanced at Rei, shuddering slightly. The tone of complete confidence that Yori could wipe them all out was very unnerving, especially as she was absolutely convinced it was a simple statement of fact.

Rei gazed back, clearly sharing the feeling, then deliberately shook it off. “That's Hnther over there, talking to Aiko. Lldnr'k is the other one.” Glancing away from listening to the conversation Aiko and Hnther were having at the sound of his name, Lldnr'k hopped to his feet and approached them, causing Hotaru to hide behind Ami for a moment, until she got over her jumpiness. She was feeling very nervous.

“Hello, Hotaru. Aiko has explained a little about you. I think we should all sit down and talk for a while, until Yori and her friends return, hopefully without any more incidents like the one your friends over there precipitated earlier.” He gestured at Haruka and Makoto. “We can explain at least part of what we think is going on, although from the reactions of Ami and Rei earlier, you will most likely find quite a lot of it somewhat difficult. I apologise in advance for any distress we cause you, that isn't the intention, I assure you. It's an unfortunate side effect of a rather depressing situation.” Despite his very inhuman appearance, Hotaru couldn't help but feel the demonic mage was genuinely concerned both about and for her, eventually nodding agreement. With a look back to Rei and Ami, she took a seat next to him at the table, between him and Rei's grandfather, who smiled at her and poured her a cup of tea.

“Here, child, drink this. It may help.” Smiling slightly tremulously at him she took it and sipped from it for a moment. Rei watched for a moment, then sat at the table as well. Finishing talking to Hnther, Aiko moved back to Ami's side, watching as the two mages began talking, Rei helping explain some of what she'd heard. After a few seconds she turned to Ami.

“I'm going to have to get back and help Yori and the others. Call us immediately if anything bad happens, I'll get back in seconds.” Ami nodded.

“All right.” She glanced at Haruka for a second, wincing at the sight of her foreshortened arm. “Please try not to maim any more of my friends.”
“We'll do our best.” Aiko chuckled at the expression on the blue-haired girl's face. “Don't worry, Yori or Chou can fix it. Neither one is very happy with the blonde idiot at the moment, so it will have to wait until they're a little less peeved, but they'll do it. She'll be as good as new. Physically, at any rate.” Aiko looked at the woman on the sofa, shaking her head. “What is it with all your blondes, anyway? They're all very bad tempered and violent.” She shrugged, then disappeared. Blinking, Ami shook her head a little, moving to sit down at the table, just in time to see Hotaru begin to look very shocked at what she was being told.

Tamiko looked around, meeting her friends' eyes. “She's a pain in the ass, this one, isn't she?”

“Yep. Quick, though. I thought I had her then.” Misaki glanced at the small crater in the middle of the road slightly guiltily. “Whoops.”

Her sister giggled. “I won't tell Yori if you guys don't.”

“Like that will stop her finding out,” the other woman said, grinning for a moment, as the others laughed. “No, it was my mistake, I'll admit to it and take the horrific sarcasm that comes as punishment.” Tamiko burst out laughing, clapping her friend on the shoulder.

“She'll be fine, you know that. Just a bit... amused.” Ducking slightly without looking as a burst of magic only just missed her, coming from the garage on the corner of the road, she sighed. “At the moment we need to get this crazy girl off the street before she really hurts someone.”

“I wish we knew that cloaking trick,” Fumiko mused, sending a stealthed camera off to peer into the darkened interior of the building through one of the windows in the side. “Chou said we were nearly ready for it a few days ago. We should try to learn it as soon as possible, it would make this a lot easier.” The other two nodded reflectively.

“Good idea. OK, so how to we get her out without damaging the fixtures, then? If we go in she's going to go completely apeshit, she's right on the edge at the moment. Feel that?” Her friends could easily feel what she was talking about, the ki output of the magical girl betrayed extreme anger, paranoia, and fear. “Poor dear thing is scared of us,” she added with a toothy grin. Misaki snickered.

“Good. I never liked her much. Maybe we can scare her into fainting?”

“We need Yori for that. Or maybe Azumi. Ms Aoyama might be a little much.” They all exchanged glances, then laughed hysterically for a moment.

“Probably best not to actually scare her to death. That might be unfortunate.” Tamiko scratched her ear reflectively, studying the building in which their quarry lurked, muttering to herself and intermittently firing off one or other magical attack more or less randomly, not hitting much except the scenery. Looking over her shoulder the auburn-haired girl studied the two police cars that had drawn up at a safe distance, blocking the road and preventing anyone coming closer. “Glad they're hanging back. This would be even more awkward if there were any people in the way.”

“Everybody ran like mad as soon as they saw her coming,” Fumiko sighed. “I don't think she even noticed. They certainly have an impressive reputation now, but it's not the one they had a year ago. Not after that mall incident.” She thought for a moment, then fired a tiny ki ball into the vehicle entryway of the garage, which popped on the rear wall with a noise like a firecracker, provoking a wild flurry of magic in all directions and quite a lot of swearing. “Hmm. She's sure on a hair trigger.”
“Well, as much fun as it is annoying her, we can't stay out here all day doing it. People have things to do and this is causing chaos.” Tamiko shook her head in irritation. “Hey! Crazy girl! You going to come out or do we have to come in?” she called out in a loud voice. More swearing came in response, along with half a dozen blasts of magic.

“Those aren't her normal attacks, are they?” Misaki asked, avoiding all of them without too much effort.

“Nope. She seems to have moved past that. It feels like raw energy. I guess she worked out how to access her power without all those silly speeches.” Tamiko looked mildly impressed. “If she wasn't nuts I'd be quite pleased for her.”

“It's an irritating time for one of them to suddenly become half-way competent, though,” Fumiko noted, shaking her head, annoyed. “Just makes this more difficult than it should be. We could take her easily but we'd almost certainly cause a lot of damage. I don't want to do that, never mind what Yori would say afterwards.”

“If Aiko was here she could just pop in there and drop her before she knew what was going on.”

“She's kind of busy in the park, though. It looks like things are going well there, which is a relief, but it does leave us in a slightly inconvenient place.”

“Anyone but these girls I'd just charge in there and put her down, but that one has some serious power, I'm not keen on one of those blasts in the face. It would hurt, a lot.” Tamiko sent one of her own cameras closer, hovering it in the doorway, which the blonde inside didn't notice at all. “She's in the inspection pit. Good cover.”

“We should just lob a decent sized ki blast in there and pull her out of the wreckage,” Misaki muttered, irritated.

“There's already enough damage from today, I don't think that's sensible, but it gives me an idea,” her friend said slowly. She abruptly flinched, at the same time the others did, feeling the blast of ki/magic from the position they knew Yori and the others were, as well as what she saw on the small window feeding her video from one of ‘Azumi’s' cameras. “Shit. That was a damn stupid thing to do. Good thing Chou is fine.”

“Haruka doesn't look like she wants to play any more, though,” Fumiko replied, staring at the remote scene with slightly horrified fascination. “Yori suddenly went very scary again.”

“Serves the bitch right. I'd have done the same thing, myself, but I'm not sure I'd have aimed at her arm,” her sister muttered. “Chou is family.”

“Damn right. Oh well, at least they've got their two down. Looks like Ami and Rei will have Hotaru talked around in a minute or two as well. We're in danger of getting embarrassed here, there's three of us against one of her.” Fumiko glanced at Tamiko. “What was that brilliant idea?”

“This,” her friend smiled, sending a command to the stealthed camera via her SI. Seconds later there was a cry of pain from inside the building.

“OW! Fuck it, what was that?” They all giggled, watching the video feed as Minako rubbed her head. The invisible, nearly indestructible camera drone slammed into her side, making her yell again. “What's doing that?” she screamed, firing wildly around at nothing. Outside, all three girls were laughing wildly.

“My turn,” Fumiko cried, sending her hovering drone in, bouncing it off the back of the blonde's “Fuck!” she screamed, whirling to look at where the blow had come from.

“These things are guaranteed practically unbreakable, right?” Misaki asked idly, sending the one she had spare that wasn't watching Usagi to harass the blonde. Another scream of rage came from inside the building.

“Apparently. Her magic might damage it, but she doesn't seem to be able to hit the side of a barn from inside the barn at the moment.” Tamiko watched the video feeds with hilarity, leaning against the wall they were next to and smiling. “Ooh. That was close.” Another yell came as a drone got Minako in the forehead. They amused themselves for a few minutes mildly torturing their opponent, who was in an absolute frenzy, trying to work out what was hitting her. None of the blows were hard enough to cause serious injury, she was much too tough for that, but they were still painful, as well as very annoying.

Eventually Tamiko nodded. “That should do it. Misaki, you want to take the shot? Make up for that hole?” The other woman grinned.

“Yes. Thanks.” She glanced at the small crater, amused for a moment. “Barely big enough for one duck.” As her friends laughed, she shot off at blurringly high speed, entering the doorway to the building and tackling the completely distracted blonde, who fell seconds later to a series of ki-enhanced pressure point attacks. Slinging the limp woman over her shoulder, she exited, grinning broadly.

“That was fun,” the tall girl said happily. “We should get some of these with spikes on, it would work even better.” Fumiko giggled while Tamiko looked thoughtfully at the camera sphere she had reclaimed and was holding.

“OK, let's talk to the cops, get the details, then get rid of this nuisance and go help the others. That building looks pretty bad.” Leading the way to the police cars, the auburn-haired young woman smiled at the sergeant in charge. “Hi. Sorry about all the noise and damage.”

He looked at her for a moment, then at Misaki, with her blonde burden. “No problem. Just make sure she doesn't come back. Please?” He sounded wistfully hopeful. Grinning, she nodded.

“That's the idea, if possible.” After giving him their contact details and requesting that he send them information on all the people affected by the short-lived fight, which had thankfully caused surprisingly little real damage although quite a lot of chaos, she called the others. Seconds later Aiko and 'Chou' appeared next to her, laughing.

“That trick with the cameras was inspired,” Aiko giggled. 'Chou' shook her head with amusement.

“Let's get her to the temple and make sure everyone is all right, then we can finish up at the other site,” the blonde said, still smiling. “I really shouldn't find that as funny as I did.” They were all laughing again as they vanished, causing the police and various spectators to blink a bit.

‘Azumi’ looked around as Aiko appeared a few metres away, feeling her ki signature instantly. “That seems to have gone fairly well,” she noted over the comm, having been watching with part of her attention the live feed Aiko had provided the rest of them of Ami and Rei's apparently successful attempt to talk Hotaru around.

“Not too bad at all,” Aiko responded, stepping up beside her as she went back to work gingerly moving a crushed van out of the entrance of the building in which it was firmly embedded, a building they could both feel three people in, somewhere at the back. Grabbing the other end of the vehicle she helped. 'Yori' and 'Chou' were both on the other side of the street cutting their way carefully into the caved-in entrance of one of the buildings heavily affected by Haruka's magic attack, trying not to make the whole thing collapse completely, as it was fairly badly damaged. “I think she wanted to be convinced. She was emotionally all over the place, but then she's several years younger than the others, around twelve or thirteen I think, and a bit fragile in some ways. I don't think most of them treat her very well, even those two lovers that are nominally her adoptive parents from what Ami said. For some reason they don't seem to trust her as much as you'd expect, or perhaps they're scared of her. I don't know the whole story yet.”

“Bit odd, we should look into that when this is over,” 'Yori' offered, glancing over at them. “She's probably the most powerful of them all, at least potentially. I certainly don't want that sort of power running wild because she's scared of her friends.”

Down the street about fifty metres away the news crew was still filming them, the reporter excitedly describing the scene. 'Chou' had left the ward in place, except she'd flipped it around so that it prevented them approaching the potential danger zone, in case one of the buildings completely collapsed. The largest of them, an apartment block about four stories high, was making intermittent unfortunate noises as if to indicate this wasn't entirely off the menu. 'Yori' looked up as one particularly loud creaking groan accompanied a small shower of debris from about half way up. “This is going to go soon,” she said out loud, annoyed. “There are at least five people still inside it, at the top.”

“We've got Minako, she was hiding inside a garage and shooting at us, which made it a bit difficult, we didn't want to wreck the place,” Tamiko told them suddenly. All four of them laughed at the video their friends sent them showing the method they'd used to distract the magical girl so Misaki could take her down.

“Good, well done,” 'Chou' responded. She glanced at Aiko, grinning. “We'll come and make sure she's out for the near future then drop her off at the temple, but after that we need you here. We can clear up your site if necessary once we've got all these people out safely.”

“OK. We're standing by.” Leaving 'Azumi' to finish clearing the entrance now that the van was safely out of it with no further damage to the building, Aiko dashed across to 'Chou', the pair of them teleporting out immediately.

The disguised Nabiki pulled a few more large lumps of rubble out of the way, then wrenched the bent door off its hinges, entering the building. Looking around quickly she headed up the stairs towards the rear of the building, to where she could feel three ki signatures, radiating worry and mild pain. “Hello?” she called as she reached a locked door to an apartment at the back, the one across the hall standing open with clear signs that the occupants had left in a considerable rush. There was no answer, so she knocked, then tried the knob. It resisted for a moment then, as she turned harder, produced a small metallic crack sound and yielded. Pushing she found the door opened a few centimetres, only to fetch up against a security chain.

Sighing slightly, she reached into the gap and snapped it between her fingers, opening the door fully. A woman, about mid twenties, was sitting on the sofa in the middle of the room staring at her, two children less than six or so with her, one on either side. She was cuddling one of them, a little girl, who seemed in pain. “Who are you?” the woman asked, looking scared. The middle sister smiled at her.

“I'm Azumi. Don't worry, I'm here to help you. We need to get you out of this building, it's got a lot of structural damage and isn't safe any more.” The woman studied her for a moment then nodded, looking down at her daughter.

“When the fighting started outside she got scared and ran into the bedroom, but she hit her head very hard on the side of the bed trying to hide under it. I'm worried she might have a concussion. That's why we didn't leave when everyone else did.” Moving closer, ‘Azumi’ knelt down and smiled at the little girl, reaching out to brush some dark hair away from a large bruise that was darkening on her forehead, marring the otherwise perfect skin.

“It doesn't look too bad, but my friends outside are really good at healing this sort of thing, they can check her for you and fix anything that's wrong. Why don't you pack a small bag and come with me. Once your building is checked over and any serious damage repaired, you can come home again.” Sighing a little the woman nodded again.

“All right.” She released the girl, who stared at the silver-haired young woman in fascination, her injury forgotten for the moment. Her brother was looking between his mother, who was going into the bedroom, and their visitor, not sure which one was more interesting. He settled for staring at 'Azumi'.

“Is that your real hair colour?” he finally asked. She nodded, grinning.

“Yep. Neat, isn't it?”

He laughed. “I like it. I like your coat as well.”

“Thanks.” Standing, she patted him on the head, looking around as a faint groan came from somewhere below them as the building gently settled. Bringing one of her cloaked cameras down from where it had been loitering above the street outside, she spent a few seconds having it scan the outside of the building, noticing with some concern that there were a number of cracks in the foundation that didn't look very good. 'Damn it. Those two idiots have caused god knows how many millions of yen worth of damage just to this one building, not to mention the others across the street,' she commented to Jun.

#The damage is considerable, Nabiki, but I don't believe this building is sufficiently structurally unsound as to be in immediate danger of collapse. It is still a good idea to evacuate it, though, just in case I'm misreading the situation. The buildings on the other side of the street are in much more danger of imminent destruction, however. I would judge that the one Ranma is currently entering may well reach the point of complete failure within half an hour. Complete evacuation is a matter of priority.# A slight note of worry entered the SI's voice. #There appears to be approximately five to seven people still inside that building. I suggest that you deal with these individuals as fast as possible then help Ranma immediately, as your sister and the others have not returned yet.#

'OK, thanks for the update,' she replied, then out loud said, “We need to hurry, miss, I have to go and help my friends across the street.”

“I'm nearly done,” the woman called, emerging from the bedroom moments later with a backpack, zipping it up. “Come on, kids, we have to leave for a while.” Both the girl and boy jumped off the sofa, the girl swaying a little and putting her hands on her head.

“My head feels funny,” she said faintly, then gently fell over, 'Azumi' neatly catching her before she hit the carpet.

“Damn. Yes, she's probably got a concussion. Let's go and get that sorted out.” Smiling at the woman, trying to project an air of competence, the middle Tendo led the mother and her son out of the apartment, carrying the girl and pulling the door shut behind her. As a slight afterthought, a quick burst of ki fused the lock shut, ensuring the door wouldn't be easily opened if someone tried to loot the place. She closed the door of the apartment across the hall on the same basis, hearing it latch as it swung shut. Shortly they were all out on the street. The woman looked around in shock.

“Good god,” she muttered. “Those stupid girls have wrecked the place.”

“Unfortunately, yes, they do seem to have caused a lot of damage,” ‘Azumi’ agreed, leading them towards the news crew and away from the potentially dangerous buildings. “Don't worry, it will get sorted out, and hopefully they won't be back.”

“I certainly hope not. They're a menace. Most of the magical girls are more or less OK, nowadays, since that Yori girl turned up and took them in hand, but that group are seriously irritating, especially recently.” The young mother sighed, looking around. “This used to be such a nice clean street.”

She twitched slightly as 'Chou' and the other four girls suddenly popped silently out of nowhere a few metres away. “Holy...!” Catching herself just in time she glanced guiltily at her children, while 'Azumi' smiled.

“Don't worry, these are my friends.” Her sister walked over as the others headed off to help 'Yori'.
'Chou' gave the woman a comforting and gentle smile, which made her visibly relax.

“Hello. I'm Chou. Now, let's have a look at your daughter.” The silver-haired young woman lowered the girl in her arms to the ground, as her sister bent over her, her hands glowing golden, running them carefully over the little girl's head. “It's nothing to worry about, only a moderate concussion. Hold on for a moment while I deal with it.” The glow intensified as she concentrated, the girl's mother staring in amazement, then faded after twenty seconds or so. “There we go. Good as new. She's perfectly healthy otherwise.” Opening her eyes, the little girl looked up, staring wide-eyed at the four faces looking at her, fixating on that of her mother. She held her arms up, making her mother smile and pick her up.

“Thank you so much, Chou,” she said quietly, smiling at the blonde, who smiled back. “And you as well, Azumi.”

“You're very welcome,” the eldest Tendo told her, looking pleased. “I'm sorry about being rude, but we really must get back to work.” Waving to the children, who looked up at her with awe, she and her sister headed back to the rapidly deteriorating building, which Fumiko and Tamiko were just entering. “I'm going to try reinforcing the outside with a ward, it should help hold it up while we evacuate it,” the blonde said, concentrating on her work. Soon a golden glimmer was apparent across the entire front of the apartment building, the constant rain of debris halted for the moment, although creaking sounds indicated it was still slowly coming to pieces.

“It was a pretty powerful blast that damn woman fired,” 'Azumi' commented, looking around at the damage. “This is going to be expensive to fix. It's a good thing there were so few people around. They got lucky again. No fatalities.”

“Yes. That luck won't hold forever,” the blonde sighed. “At least we've got three more of them off the street, while it looks like Hotaru may be brought around as well, which is a good thing. I like that young woman. She's got a lot of potential, I think, even though she hasn't had the easiest of lives. Poor girl.”

“Just Usagi and Michiru to go, then?” They entered the building, heading up, probing for casualties on the way.
“I suppose so. In theory we've done more or less all we can do with Usagi, but Michiru still requires healing and possibly some mental work from Hnther, although whether it will be any more successful this time I really don't know.” 'Chou' stopped, backtracking a couple of metres down the hallway, peering at the wall carefully. “There's someone unconscious on the other side of here,” she added, concern on her face. “He feels quite badly injured.” Prodding the wall gently both of them watched as it visibly moved, dust coming from the ceiling.

“Something collapsed on the other side, look at all the cracks in it,” the silver-haired woman noted. Her sister nodded. They found the door to the flat, breaking it open with no effort, then went inside, to find that several large and heavy book-cases which had been affixed to the walls without a lot of care had fallen over, throwing books all over the room.

“He's under all that,” the blonde said, beginning to move books around. Between them they quickly cleared a path to the unconscious man, who was in his late sixties, with a clearly badly broken leg and damage to his head from where something particularly heavy had hit it. “Oh, dear. That doesn't look good.” Bending over him she quickly scanned him. “Fractured skull, broken femur, a lot of blood loss, and nasty swelling of the brain. We got here just in time, he wouldn't have lasted another half hour.” Directing her sister to pull on the leg she quickly realigned the bones and healed them, before sealing the flesh.

“That amazes me every time I see it, sis,” 'Azumi' sent with a smile. The other woman glanced at her.

“As I've said, it's probably the thing I'm most proud of being able to do,” she replied silently. “Can you hold his head like this, please, while I do the skull fracture? Gently, don't press too hard, just hold it still.” The middle sister carefully followed her instructions. “Good. Don't move.” Golden light danced around slender fingers for half a minute. “That's done it. He's going to be fine, but the blood loss is too severe to immediately repair. I've pushed the marrow to produce new cells as fast as I dare, now he needs time to recuperate. Take him downstairs to one of the ambulances, please, while I keep looking.”

Several emergency vehicles had arrived in the last ten minutes, something they'd both noticed from the camera feeds on the street. 'Azumi' nodded. “OK. Back in a minute.” Shortly, outside, she approached one of the ambulance crews, who immediately opened the back and pulled out a gurney, helping her place the patient on it. She passed on the information her sister had noted, one of them writing it down, while the other checked the vitals of the man.

The paramedic with the clipboard smiled at her. “Thank you, miss...?”

“Just Azumi.” She smiled back slightly as he nodded, a look of recognition sweeping across his face. “You've heard of me?”

“I have. From Setagaya, I hear. Apparently you worry criminals a lot over there.” He chuckled. “Nice work. I heard you work with Yori and Chou sometimes, and those other girls. Glad you lot are here. That reporter over there told us some of what happened, it sounds like it got very out of hand for a while.”

“It wasn't ideal,” she admitted, looking around at the badly damaged street and all the destroyed vehicles.

“No demons at all this time? Just those two magical girls fighting each other?” She nodded sombly. “Damn. I'd heard they'd sort of lost the plot, that mall that got destroyed yesterday, for example, but this is a lot of damage for only two of them.” He looked at the wreckage for a moment, shaking his head. “What the hell is wrong with those crazy girls?”
“It's kind of complicated, but we're working on it,” 'Azumi' assured him. Waving, she headed back inside.

In the end they found five conscious victims and the man that 'Chou' had detected, with no other people being present. Sweeping the building twice to be sure, they collected on the street outside ten minutes later, watching as the elder Tendo carefully released the ward she'd erected. “I wish I could hold it up for long enough for everything valuable to be removed but it's going to go soon no matter what I do,” she said, looking mildly annoyed. A few seconds later the entire front of the building almost gracefully slid into the street with a rumbling crash and a huge cloud of dust and debris, making 'Yori' sigh and shake her head.

“There goes about a dozen peoples' homes,” she grumped. “Stupid girls. They just don't think how what they're doing is affecting completely innocent people.” Her wife put an arm around her shoulders.

“That's what we're for, dear,” she said softly, smiling a little. The black-haired woman glanced at her, then grinned.

“Guess so. Oh well, not much more we can do here. Everyone who was injured is healed, all the damaged buildings are evacuated, the emergency services seem to have everything else in hand, so I guess we can leave.” Looking over her shoulder she added, “I'm just going to have a word with Inspector Junpei over there, he looks irritated.” Walking over to the police officer who had been talking to some of his subordinates while waving a hand around at the devastated street, she smiled at him and began a short discussion. By the end of it he seemed in a slightly better mood, shaking her hand with a small smile of respect. Waving to him she rejoined the others. “I don't know him all that well but Sergeant Harada says he's a decent man. Not too happy about all this, though.”

“You can hardly blame him for that,” Tamiko laughed. She snickered slightly.

“No, you can't. It's a bit much, coming after what happened yesterday. Right. Any reason we need to go back to your garage?”

“Not really. There wasn't too much damage, I've already arranged to get details of the people whose property was involved, they seemed pretty pleased when we told them we'd sort out the insurance issues.” The red-head smiled. “I don't think they're used to magical girls cleaning up after themselves around here.”

“We're going to have to top up the fund at this rate.” 'Chou' glanced around, then sighed. “We didn't design it to cover all of Minato.” Glancing at 'Azumi', she produced a small smile. “Hopefully you and Uthryyl can start making the huge profit he was talking about soon, so we can funnel some of it into good works in the community.” Her sister laughed.

“It's not a bad idea.” Giggling, they moved to stand beside Aiko, the entire group disappearing immediately.
Chapter 68

Turning her head as she heard someone come into the room, Ami nodded to Chou, the blonde smiling at her in return, then glancing over to Hnther, who was inspecting Minako. “How is she?”

“Apparently somewhere between Usagi and Setsuna as far as the mental tampering goes. Haruka is about the same, perhaps a little worse. Makoto isn't as badly affected.” Ami sighed quietly. “Hotaru is odd, he thinks it should be worse than it is, but suspects that the healing ability she has is fighting it off in some manner.” She looked over at the purple-haired girl, who was watching her team-mates sleep with her head propped on her hands, her elbows on the table, frowning and deep in thought. “She didn't take it well but I think she believes us.” Chou shook her head a little.

“Poor girl, from what I understand this has been going on for a lot of her life. She's about four or five years younger than you, isn't she?”

“Four and a half. Too young for all this, really, but...” She shrugged.

“The crazy doesn't make allowances for age, unfortunately,” the older woman nodded. After a few seconds she went over to talk to Hnther, who straightened up and greeted her, looking pleased she was back.

Walking over to the table Ami sat beside Rei, who was watching Hotaru with concern, but turned to her friend. “I guess they're all back?”

“I think so.” Ami looked at her watch. “All that happened in about an hour. It feels much longer.”

“That's what I was thinking.” Rei sighed, turning in her chair to stare at the three unconscious women that once she'd called friends. “Do you think they'll be able to sort all this out? Make it go back to what it was?” Ami was silent for some time.

“No. I suspect they can probably fix the actual medical problems, Yori and Chou have amazing healing abilities, but I'm not sure about the mental issues. Hnther seems to know what he's talking about and isn't sure either.” The blue-haired girl sighed heavily, folding her arms and crossing her outstretched legs. “Even if, and it's a big if, by some miracle they manage to fix all the physical and mental issues, there's still all the stuff that's been done and said in the last few days. Like I said earlier, would you trust most of them after this?” Rei shook her head slowly and sadly.

“No, I guess not. The way Makoto and Haruka were screaming at each other, I don't think they'll ever forget it and go back to the way they were.”

“They've never much liked each other anyway,” her friend noted sourly.

“True.” They sat in silence for a while, until Yori and Azumi came into the room, the martial artist heading for Hnther and Chou, as the silver-haired woman came over to them and sat down. She gave them each a polite nod and a small, neutral smile.

“How are you both? I was quite impressed with how you talked Hotaru around,” she said quietly, glancing at the younger girl on the other side of the table who didn't seem to hear them. Ami raised one shoulder in a sort of dispirited shrug.

“I suppose we're all right under the circumstances. I've kind of expected something along these lines for some time, but I didn't expect everything else that went along with it. All the fighting, the damage, the anger.” Looking depressed she studied the three unconscious girls. “It's kind of upsetting."

“I can well imagine. You have my sympathies.” Azumi smiled again at them, more warmly. “It can't be easy. Hopefully we can work out some method to minimise all the problems, but I don't think we're going to be able to cure everything.”

“We were just discussing that,” Rei offered. “We both think the same thing. Too many things have gone wrong, things we can't brush under the carpet.” The young woman glanced at Hotaru, who was still deep in thought. “At least we seem to have been able to help one person.”

“One is better than none, certainly.” Azumi looked up as Yori came over, Chou now bending over Minako, her hands glowing.

“We're going to heal their brains, then it might be worth waking them up one at a time and checking if anything has changed, although based on Usagi I doubt it.” Yori sighed a little. “Unfortunately. But it's worth a try.”

“How do we make sure that this sort of thing stops happening?” Azumi asked curiously. The martial artist sat down with them.

“I'm not sure. I don't think just telling them firmly to stay away from each other would work, they're not in listening moods, by and large.” She watched her partner work on the blonde lying on the carpet next to her brunette team-mate. “Hopefully, as their minds settle down, they'll be less prone to random violence, at least towards each other, but I have no idea how long that might take. It wouldn't surprise me to find they kick off like this again.”

“We can't allow that,” Ami told her, sure of this. “It's a damn miracle no one has been killed yet. People were hurt in the last one, next time, I'm pretty sure someone will die. That can't be allowed to happen.”

Looking at her for a moment the black-haired martial artist studied her. “People have been injured in several of your actions over the last couple of years, sometimes quite seriously,” she noted, looking annoyed. Ami glanced at Rei, both of them blushing.

“I know.” Her voice was small and worried. “I'm really sorry about that. I should have done something about it a long time ago, but...”

Yori nodded slowly. “It's not easy. I understand.”

“Until recently, I knew there was a problem, but I guess I hoped it wasn't anything serious, like it might fix itself. Then everyone started going really weird. By the time it was obvious it was only going to get much worse it was too late.” She rubbed her forehead tiredly. “Then things went completely crazy. And here we are.”

“We're both sorry we didn't ask for help months ago,” Rei added, sighing and looking at her hands. “Me more than Ami, at least she realised there was a problem. If it hadn't been for grandfather, I'd probably be lying over there next to Minako.” Yori laughed.

“Possibly. Possibly not. You certainly weren't as badly affected as most of them, you might have been able to work it out on your own, but I agree the old priest is pretty good. He certainly helped.” Looking over at Hotaru, who was sitting silently, not apparently paying attention, she asked, “Hey, Hotaru. How are you doing?” The younger girl twitched, slowly turning her head a few seconds later to stare at her. After several more seconds she finally sighed.

“I've been better.”
Yori smiled sympathetically. “I can imagine. I'm sorry about that. Are you going to be OK?” There was another pause.

“I'm still not sure. I've been thinking about everything that's happened, everything I've been told, everything I thought I knew. What are you supposed to do when you find out that half your life is a horrible lie?” The girl shook her head, leaning back in her chair for a moment and stretching, then slumping across the table with her forehead resting on her folded arms, her face hidden. “I'm so tired and confused,” her muffled voice said faintly.

Yori watched her for a while, exchanging a glance with Azumi, who shrugged a little. “I think it will get better. I hope it will, anyway. It's not going to be easy for you or any of your friends, but with some luck and a lot of hard work we should be able to fix at least some of the problems. You know the truth, and seem to accept it, which is a lot better than most of the others so far.”

“We don't even know for sure that what you think is the truth actually is the truth, though, do we?” the girl asked, not raising her head. “All we really know is that what we thought we knew is a lie.” Everyone at the table looked at her in silence.

“True. We're not sure of the details yet, but overall it seems like a pretty certain thing, what Lldnr'k and Yori worked out,” Ami finally said, quietly. “There's just too much evidence. We can prove it, or at least that the original story is a lie, by checking the moon for ruins, Yori says.” After a second or two, Hotaru raised her head, surprise in her eyes along with a hint of tears.

“Check the moon? How?”

“I know someone we can borrow a spaceship from,” Yori chuckled. The girl stared at her in amazement.

“A spaceship? A real spaceship?”

“Yes. He's got quite a few. Some of them are huge. He's an asteroid miner in his reality. When we were on holiday a couple of weeks ago we got a ride out to an asteroid he's mining metals from. Pretty cool. Azumi and a friend of ours you haven't met spent hours trying to throw a rock into orbit.” It was Ami's turn to look surprised, while Hotaru seemed speechless.

“That would be incredibly difficult,” she mused, “The number of variables that would affect an orbital trajectory would make it almost impossible to do by hand, even in a microgravity environment.” Yori laughed, amused.

“It took them quite a few tries. The asteroid was almost perfectly spherical, which helped, and Onkra has a good eye for things like that. She managed it in the end, got a rock about the size of a baseball to go all the way around. She was very pleased about it. Took the rock home with her.” Hotaru giggled at this.

“I sure would have. That's cool.” Looking at Yori, after a moment, she asked, “If you go to the moon can I come?”

The martial artist grinned. “Of course you can. The ship he'd probably use is big enough for a couple of dozen people. You can all come if you want.” Rei and Ami exchanged glances. “It's perfectly safe. Trust me,” Yori looked very amused at the slight sigh of defeat Ami produced, before smiling.

“Thanks. We'd like that.”

“Good. OK, Hotaru, let's have a look at you and sort out that brain thing, shall we?” Moving around to the other side of the table, she sat next to the purple-haired girl. “This won't hurt, you won't feel anything much.” Hesitating for a second or two, Hotaru nodded, allowing Yori to put her hands on her head. As they glowed she gently moved them around, concentrating on her work. “It's not too bad. Worse than Rei, but nothing like as bad as any of the others. Your own healing abilities are clearly continuously repairing the damage, but they can't quite get ahead of it. Not bad.” She smiled at the girl, who smiled back, somewhat uncertainly.

“People are scared of my abilities,” Hotaru said in a small voice. “It worries them.” Yori looked surprised.

“Why on earth would anyone be worried about someone being able to heal? It's the greatest thing you could possibly do. Any idiot can fight, but it takes a lot of skill and practice to be able to fix medical problems. Be proud of what you can do, not worried about it.”

“People are scared of you, too.” Violet eyes met violet eyes. Yori grinned.

“Not because of the healing abilities, that's for sure. There are other reasons.” Ami choked back a sudden laugh, while Rei started giggling uncontrollably. Azumi was smiling widely, apparently highly amused.

“Oh, yes, there are lots of reasons to be scared of Yori. Terrified, even. But the healing is a good thing. I wish I could do it.” The young woman with silver hair looked slightly disappointed. Yori glanced at her for a moment, smiling a little.

“I keep telling you, you will be able to one day. You're not quite ready yet but I'm going to teach you, I promise. Look at all the other things you learned!” Azumi nodded slowly, grinning, as Ami, Rei, and Hotaru all looked curiously at her, wondering what those things were. “Right, all done.” Yori dropped her hands after one last check. “You're back to normal. Or as normal as any magical girl ever gets.” Hotaru giggled again, looking much happier.

“I don't feel any different.”

“You might notice a difference in a few days, you might not.” Yori shrugged, studying her closely, then smiled. “When this is all over one way or another I'll show you some interesting things you can do to improve your healing skills. Yours doesn't work quite the same way our does but it looks close enough that the techniques should mostly transfer over.”

Hnther motioned to her, causing her to stand and go over to him, talking quietly for a while, then discuss something with Chou, who was finishing up with Haruka, the last one to be healed. Her arm was still untouched, though. After a couple of minutes, Yori looked down at the three unconscious magical girls, rubbing her cheek thoughtfully for a few seconds with a finger, then looked over at Ami and her friends who were watching curiously. “Hnther has made a couple of adjustments to both Minako and Haruka, he thought they were close to a major problem like Setsuna was, only not as bad. Makoto needs long-term help, but nothing immediate. I'd like to wake them each up, one at a time, to see if anything has changed. Any idea which one to do first?”

Ami looked at Rei, then Hotaru, both girls looking uncertain. “Maybe we should go in order of severity of damage?”

“Hmm. Yes, not a bad idea. OK, then, Makoto first, then Minako, then Haruka last.” Bending down, Yori did the same thing she'd done to Usagi, taking the precaution of temporarily turning off conscious control of the brunette's body below the neck so she couldn't cause too much trouble. “Right. Let's see what happens.” She touched the girl between the eyes, a brief purple glow showing, making Hotaru stare, then stepped back. A second later Makoto stirred, opening her eyes.
Frowning slightly, apparently disoriented, she stared at the ceiling before swivelling her eyes around, catching sight of Yori standing a metre away instantly. Hnther was behind her, out of her range of sight.

“Oh, fuck,” she breathed softly, a momentary panic crossing her face, before she rolled her head to the side and saw her former team-mates staring at her from the table. Her face hardened when she saw Rei and Ami. “Traitors,” she muttered. Yori prodded her with her toe, scowling.

“Be polite.” The brunette flinched, looking worried when she suddenly realised she couldn't move.

“What the hell did you do to me, you insane woman?” she demanded.

“Just took a sensible precaution. Don't worry, it will wear off soon enough. Now, that aside, how do you feel?” Staring up at her in apparent disbelief, the woman on the floor finally snorted.

“How do I feel? Like I've been kidnapped and paralysed by some horrifying harpy and her friends, how else should I feel?” Appearing mildly amused, Yori knelt down on one knee and inspected Makoto closely. The other woman tried to move away, sighing worriedly when she couldn't.

“That aside, how do you feel? In your mind, I mean. All the feelings of rage, mistrust, that sort of thing, that you've been having for a while. Is it any better?”

“How did you...” Makoto shook her head. “No, this is some sort of trick. I'm not telling you anything, crazy bitch. Now, let me go!” She screamed the last words, making Ami twitch in surprise. Yori didn't react at all, merely continued to study the brunette for a few seconds, before sighing.

“She's really not very cooperative, is she?” the martial artist commented, glancing at the others. She looked back to Makoto. “I could make her cooperate, I think, but she wouldn't give us useful information then.” Her smile made the girl on the floor go completely white, then close her eyes for a moment, her lips moving in a sudden prayer.

When she opened them she yelled in shock, as Hnther was looking carefully at her from a short distance away, rubbing his chin absently. “Ahhh! Demon! Ami, you little bitch, why are you cooperating with demons? Hotaru, what's going on? Why are you just sitting there?” Thrashing her head vainly from side to side, she devolved into panicked swearing. Eventually, Yori sighed, reaching out and touching her head for a moment, making her relax and go still.

“Another one not being very useful. Damn.” She had a brief discussion with Hnther, who shrugged. “He's not sure it's going to be any better with the others. She has the least mental damage of the three of them, so if she's still acting weird, the other two will probably be as bad or worse,” she told the other magical girls. Rei looked disappointed but not surprised, Ami sighed, nodding, while Hotaru simply stared at the woman who was one of her adoptive parents, sadness on her features.

“Maybe I should talk to Haruka without the rest of you visible,” she suggested, looking thoughtful. Yori exchanged a glance with Chou, then looked at Ami and Rei. They all nodded.

“Certainly worth a try. OK, let's wake her up and we'll get out of your way.” She smiled at the younger girl. “Good luck.” She touched Haruka in a few precise places, repeating what she'd done to Makoto, then joined Chou and Hnther on the other side of the room, waiting for Ami, Rei, and Azumi to also stand with them. As soon as they did all six of them faded from view. Hotaru stared in astonishment. About to ask a question, she looked down as Haruka groaned, moving her head stiffly, before opening her eyes. A moment passed then she focussed on the purple-haired girl.
“Hotaru.” She licked her lips. “Where am I?”

“In the temple.” The younger woman looked at her with concern. “How do you feel?”

“Tired. Not good. I remember...” Her eyes widened as she attempted to look at her right arm. “My arm! That fucking bitch blew off my arm!” she shrieked, trying to move, unsuccessfully. Her adoptive daughter gently held her head still, waiting for her to calm slightly. “Why can't I move? Did it really happen?” Haruka looked up into the purple eyes of the younger woman, clearly wanting the answer to be in the negative. Hotaru slowly nodded.

“You attacked Makoto, or she attacked you, I don't know which one of you started it. Both of you were going nuts, shooting at each other and missing. You destroyed half a street. Several people got injured, some quite badly. At least one building collapsed.” Haruka gasped, then sighed. “I remember, I think. It's kind of blurry in parts.” She was silent for a moment. “My car! What happened to it?”

“Um, you sort of jumped out of it while it was moving.” Hotaru looked up to where Yori and the others were invisibly watching, before returning her attention to the older woman. “Apparently it's kind of wrecked.”

“Shit. I like that car. It was damned expensive.” The blonde now seemed to be avoiding the question of her arm, but her eyes kept flicking down vainly trying to see it.

“Yori, Chou, and Azumi stopped you fighting before anyone got killed, while Rei and Ami talked to me. I felt you both power up and I was coming to see what was going on. They persuaded me that it was best to leave it to the others.”

“Those traitors? Why would you listen to them? They turned on us, you know that, siding with Fumiko and Tamiko yesterday.”

“Yesterday? When we completely destroyed billions of yen worth of someone else’s mall, you mean? For no reason at all? When we could have been responsible for hundreds if not thousands of deaths? Would have been responsible if they hadn't stopped us? When they were the sensible ones, helping people do the right thing? Is that what you mean?” Hotaru leaned away, crossing her arms and glaring at the older woman, who at least had the grace to look embarrassed, turning her head away.

“I don't know what happened then,” she replied quietly, “it's all sort of... confused. But I know I was more angry than I've ever been in my life. Everyone was against me, except you. Those other bitches are scum.”

“They're your friends! You've known them for years. All the things we've been through, all the enemies we've face, how could you think any of them are 'scum'?” The purple-haired girl was heavy with sarcasm.

Flushing with mixed anger and embarrassment, her adoptive parent glared at her. “They were trying to kill me! And you. What was I supposed to think? They started it, after all.”

“No, you did,” Hotaru said fiercely. “I was there. I saw it. You were all twitchy, you fired at something that wasn't even there, then Makoto fired back. She didn't know what she was shooting at, neither did you, it was stupid. Everything that happened was basically your fault and hers.” She looked very annoyed. Haruka stared at her, then closed her eyes for a moment, trying to remember. “I can't remember it that well. Just being furious, and scared, and eventually kind of having fun breaking things. It was... it was very strange.” Looking around as much as she could, she saw the unconscious form of someone beside her on what she realised was the floor, then in the other direction a hand hanging over the side of the familiar sofa she'd sat on many times. “Is that Makoto?” she asked, flicking her head to her right. Hotaru nodded.

“Yes. She's unconscious. So is Minako, on the sofa there.”

“I don't like being next to her.” Haruka frowned. “I don't trust her. Either of them.”

“Tough.” She looked shocked at the words coming from the young woman. “After what you've done you should be glad you're still alive and more or less intact.” Hotaru glared at her. “You blew up three buildings, half a dozen cars, nearly killed several innocent people, and most stupidly of all, hurt Chou in front of Yori! You're incredibly lucky to be alive. I felt the magic from several hundred metres away. You have no idea how dangerous she is. Ami's told me some stories...” She shivered. “You so don't want her angry with you, not like that. If it happened again she'd kill you on the spot, I have absolutely no doubt about it. She's terrifying.”

Haruka had been going paler and paler as the girl spoke. “I nearly crapped myself when she glared at me, I remember that,” she responded in a low voice. After a long pause, she added tentatively, “My arm...?”

“It's gone from the elbow down.” Hotaru looked sadly at her as she went almost green in shock. “She healed it up, but that's it. You really pissed her off. Ami thinks that if you're very apologetic she might be nice and regenerate it. But you'd have to mean it. She can tell.”

The woman on the floor couldn't speak for some time, only her mouth working without any sound coming out. “She can fix it?” she finally managed, sounding desperately hopeful.

“I can. If I want.” The new voice made her twitch as much as she could, rolling her eyes frantically around, as Yori came into view. She'd had no warning that the other woman was present at all. The blonde stared in worried, horrified fascination as Yori squatted down beside the kneeling Hotaru, putting a hand on her shoulder, inspecting her with cold emotionless interest. It was vastly worse than any look she'd ever received from Setsuna, who she'd always considered the queen of cold looks, but nothing like the gaze of death she suddenly remembered from the fight earlier. She swallowed heavily.

“Will you?” she faintly asked, staring into purple eyes that, while a similar colour to her adoptive daughters, were far more alien at the moment. There was a long pause.

“Perhaps. I might even give you your sword back. But, in return, this never happens again. You understand me? No stupid quarrels, no fighting in the street, no feuds with your team-mates, and most importantly of all, no putting innocent people in danger. Ever.” The voice was like something from the nasty nightmares you sometimes get at three in the morning in the winter, when you wake to find you've kicked the covers off and you're freezing cold. Haruka nodded shakily, not even considering lying or dissembling.

“I promise.”

Yori studied her for a few seconds longer. “I will hold you to that. Let me down, and...” There was no real threat, but Haruka had the sudden feeling she'd made a bargain that there was no possibility of going back on, without paying a price she was unwilling to. She swallowed again. Hotaru, beside Yori, was looking worried, leaning away slightly, not quite daring to push the hand off her shoulder.
“I promise,” she repeated. “I'll be good.”

“Great!” Yori instantly warmed, becoming apparently very pleased, not a trace of the deadly predator left, with a suddenness that made both Hotaru and Haruka stare. “Let's get you fixed up then. We've got an interesting story to tell you as well, it sort of explains all the weird things going on with you guys at the moment, but it also raises a lot of other questions.” She lightly prodded Haruka in half a dozen places and abruptly the blonde could move again. Standing, Yori held out a hand, which after a long moment, Haruka took with her left hand, having realised as soon as she'd moved the other arm that the damage was real. She paled, but resolutely didn't look at it, heaving herself up with Yori's aid. She tingled slightly all over with pins and needles.

“It'll wear off in a few minutes,” the other woman said, somehow knowing what she was feeling. Haruka nodded, then jumped when suddenly five other people were in the room. She stared at Ami and Rei, beginning to glare, until Yori cleared her throat meaningfully. Looking away from them quickly she noticed one person who definitely wasn't human.

“Gack. A demon!” She tried to produce her sword but only got the sheath, standing looking embarrassed with it in her hand, while Hotaru giggled.

“That's Hnther,” the younger woman said. “He's cool. He's a friend of Yori and Chou's.”

“He's a DEMON!”

Yori cast her a look complete with a raised eyebrow. “Yes. So? What's the problem? He's still a friend of mine, and a very respected and practised mage. His name is well know on several worlds.”

“But... but... Demon?” Haruka looked pleadingly at the black-haired girl, then her daughter, who both shrugged. “Oh, fuck it. This is one of the weirdest days of my life,” she finally grunted, putting the sheath away, walking over to the table and sitting at it, staring at the empty teapot in the middle. Hearing a sound at the door she looked up to see Rei's grandfather walk past deep in conversation with another demon, one who appeared to be some sort of bipedal bird, like a crow or something. The old priest was laughing as if he was talking to a good friend. She stared until they were out of sight, then looked at Hotaru for help.

“That one is called Lldnr'k, he's another mage and an old friend of Yori's,” the purple-haired girl told her, a hint of a laugh in her voice.

“He specialises in temporal magic,” Yori explained, “He knows more about it than anyone I've ever met. A real expert and a very nice guy. Now, let's have a look at that arm.” Not entirely sure she was genuinely awake, Haruka raised her right arm, shuddering at the sight of it, the way it simply stopped was horrifying. Yori held it and inspected it closely, her hands glowing visibly, which made Haruka looked a little worried, shooting Hotaru a helpless gaze. The younger girl ignored her completely, watching with complete fascination, wide-eyed. After a moment, Yori nodded.

“Yes, nothing particularly wrong here.” The blonde stared at her for a second. She grinned. “Aside from missing about half of it, of course. Let's fix that.” Looking queasily at her shortened arm, Haruka stared in disbelief as the glow strengthened, covering the end and making it go numb, then a few seconds later the arm silently began to slowly regrow. Her eyes were as wide as they could possibly go, switching every few seconds between her regenerating arm and Yori's face, which had a look of mild concentration on it. Glancing at Hotaru she noticed the girl was watching without even blinking, a smile of intense joy slowly spreading across her face.
A presence beside her made her look around to see Ami scanning the process with her computer. “Back off, you traitor,” she snarled, suddenly very angry again. Ami jumped, looking hurt.

“None of that, girl, or you'll have a hoof on the end of this and not a hand,” Yori snapped, danger in her voice to a level that made Haruka close her mouth so fast she nearly bit the end of her tongue off. She had no idea how much truth was behind the threat but didn't want to find out. It was becoming very clear that they'd all wildly underestimated what Yori could do, healing was one thing, this was something completely beyond that. She sat quietly as Ami followed the process, frowning slightly as she prodded the computer, and Hotaru watched with great interest. As the last of the fingers gently flowed back into existence Yori looked satisfied. “There we are.” Feeling came back into the entire limb with a rush, Haruka gasping at the suddenness of it, then cautiously flexing her regrown hand. She smiled slightly, clenching it a few times.

“Thank you,” she said quietly. Yori nodded acknowledgement of the gratitude.

“You're welcome. But remember what I said. You ever do anything like that again and there won't be anything left to regenerate. Got it?” She nodded herself, trembling slightly. There was a flat menace in the tone of the black-haired woman's voice that left no doubt whatsoever that she meant it and was more than capable of carrying it out.

“I understand.”

“Good.” Yori looked up as the old priest came into the room, carrying a new pot of tea and some more cups, Lldnr'k behind him, the demon looking at an ancient scroll with interest.

“I thought this might be a good idea,” the priest said, smiling gently as he put his burden on the table. Pouring it out he distributed the cups to everyone, Lldnr'k accepting his with an absent thanks, his eyes not moving from the scroll. Haruka stared at him, completely puzzled about not only the completely casual way the bird-like demon was making himself at home but by the same way everyone else was treating him and the other one, including the priest. Chou and a girl with amazing silver hair and weird amber-orange eyes were talking to Hnther in some language she'd never encountered before, while Rei was watching over Ami's shoulder with curiosity as she fiddled with her computer. No one seemed at all fussed by the presence of two non-humans in the room.

“You seem confused, child,” the old man said, sitting beside her. She turned her head and stared at him wordlessly, then looked around the room again.

“You might put it that way,” she muttered. Waving her hand around, she added, “There are two demons in the room and six magical girls not including myself, but everyone is treating it like some sort of party or maybe a weird business meeting. I got my ass handed to me earlier today, after something I still don't really understand, by the most horrendously dangerous person I've ever met, yet that same person just regrew my fucking hand!” The girl looked embarrassed as she realised she'd just sworn in front of a priest, but he merely chuckled. “You clearly know about us as well. But that doesn't seem to surprise you or worry you either. It's all very weird indeed.” The blonde sighed heavily, looking at her regenerated hand and making a fist, then wiggling the fingers. “Very weird.”

The priest pushed the cup of tea he'd poured for her a little closer on the table. “To take your points in no real order, yes, I know about you girls, I've known for years. As I told Rei, I'm a priest. I have been for a long time. Magic sensitivity isn't surprising under those circumstances, you girls are saturated with it, so it didn't take long to work it out.” He grinned at her look of dawning realisation. “I never said anything because it wasn't my place to, but with all the problems recently, I became involved.” Looking her up and down, he grinned again. “I do like the uniforms, by the way.” She followed his gaze, realising for the first time she was still powered up, then after a moment's thought, shrugging slightly and turning the magic off. Her clothes returned to their normal version, making him laugh.

He went on, “Hnther and Lldnr'k are most interesting people indeed. I've never met anyone quite like them.”

“But they're demons!” she protested weakly. He looked puzzled.

“And? They're still people. Just not human people. Lldnr'k is at least two hundred years old, he's an immensely experienced mage with some very esoteric knowledge, which is why Yori asked him to help, and he's also a very interesting person to talk to. Hnther is younger but also very experienced. The fact that neither comes from this world is irrelevant.”

The blonde sighed, glancing at the demons. Hnther was still talking to Chou, the silver-haired girl having moved over to discuss something with Ami and Rei, all three of them studying her computer, while Lldnr'k was still reading the scroll with interest. “I'm having a lot of trouble with all this,” she mumbled. He laughed.

“Consider it a mind expanding experience. Everyone needs their preconceptions challenged every now and then. It keeps your mind sharp.” Looking over at Yori, who seemed to be demonstrating something magical to Hotaru, he snickered a little. “That one and her friends will challenge your preconceptions on a daily basis.” Returning his attention to Haruka he studied her. “You are very lucky, my child. You did the one thing I've warned Rei about doing, you got between Yori and Chou, yet somehow you lived. I'm impressed.” The old man sipped some tea, his eyes on hers. “Not with you, mind, but with her. She showed a lot of restraint. I doubt you'd get a second chance, especially if any of the other five are around.” Haruka shivered.

“No, she made that plain. I'm not going to try it again.”

“Probably for the best.”

She looked at her arm. “I still can't believe she could regrow it like that, without any trouble or fuss. I've never seen anything like it. Where could she possibly have learned to do healing like that?”

The priest followed her eyes, then looked over at Yori, still talking to Hotaru, both of them smiling. “I believe she and Chou worked it out themselves. It's certainly totally unlike any magic I have ever encountered before. I know they seem to be able to heal basically anything. Their knowledge of and control of biology is extremely impressive, possibly unprecedented.”

She watched the black-haired woman for a moment, before turning to study Chou, who glanced over, smiling slightly, then went back to her conversation with Hnther. “What are they? Not the normal magical girls, certainly.”

“Not even close. I don't know, to be honest. Your best friend, or your worst enemy.” He shrugged, smiling. “I suspect it's up to you. I do know that both of them are just about fed up with your group. These last excesses are all you're going to get before something serious happens. What that is, I don't know, but I have no doubt it would put a permanent end to the problem your friends currently seem to pose to the community. Even though there are extenuating circumstances, their patience, while remarkable, isn't unlimited. I would advise you listen to what they're going to tell you very carefully before making any decision on what you do next.” Haruka looked curiously at him, wondering what he meant by that.
Standing up, he smiled at her. “I have to get back to work, there are some people I need to talk to and I still need to sweep the yard. It was nice talking to you, child. Please, for your own sake, listen to them. They're not your enemies, unless you make that happen. Don't make a hasty decision. If you want to talk about it afterwards, you know where to find me.” Nodding politely, he waved to Yori, then left the room, heading to the front of the temple. She watched him go, before looking around to find Yori and Ami standing beside her, causing her to twitch as she hadn't noticed them approach.

“It's time to have a chat, Haruka,” the martial artist said, pulling out a chair and sitting. Ami did the same on her other side. Not sure which of them made her more uncomfortable, the blonde crossed her arms and looked uncertain, glancing from one to the other. The other conscious people in the room, including the two demons, all sat down as well, all of them looking at her, something that was making her very nervous. Oddly, the two demons were the least of it, mainly because she couldn't read their expressions, while the ones she could read were... odd. She felt magic surround the room, something she recognised as some sort of wards, vastly more powerful than anything she'd encountered in the past, which was also a bit worrying.

“About...?”

“Your place in the world, I guess you could call it, and the specific things you currently believe about it.” She became aware that both Yori and Chou were looking at her in a peculiarly sympathetic manner, which made her become much more worried than if they had been glaring. There was something unnerving about it. Looking at the faces of her former team-mates and her daughter she saw that they looked weird as well, like they were aware of something she wasn't going to like.

“What do you mean?” she asked tentatively.

Yori sighed gently, watching her face. “We've talked extensively to Ami, and to Rei, about your history, powers, and battles. Something about it wasn't quite right, but it rang a vague bell, one that worried me a lot. I called in Lldnr'k and Hnther to advise us, since various parts of the problems you girls represent falls into their respective areas of expertise. Between us, we've come to some frankly worrying conclusions, ones you need to know about. But you're not going to like it.” There was an unpleasant feeling growing in the pit of her stomach.

Staring at them each in turn, Haruka finally returned her attention to Yori. “I guess you'd better tell me, then. I can't stand the suspense.” Her weak attempt at a joke made the other woman smile slightly, as she leaned back in her chair, nodding agreement.

“OK. It's like this...”
“more mentally flexible, or the changes Hnther made worked better with her. It could be a combination of all those things.” 'Chou' didn't look away from watching the four girls, ready to step in if the argument became violent.

“It probably doesn't matter. If we can get her to accept it at all, that hopefully will be one more person from that group that's less likely to cause trouble. Ami and Rei are fine, I think Hotaru will probably be as well, but I'm not sure about Haruka yet. I have a pretty strong suspicion that even if she does accept some or all of it as truth she's not likely to be very friendly to those two again. Possibly less friendly than before, in some ways. She seems to blame them for a lot of it, which isn't very fair, the situation isn't their fault at all.” 'Yori' sighed slightly, watching the girls shout at each other. Ami was waving her computer, pointing at the screen with her other hand.

“Look, you damn idiot! You can see the damage in the scans from before Chou healed you. Your brain was a mess! Minako and the others as well. I've got before and after scans of all of them.”

“For all I know you faked that, you little rat! Why should I believe this stupid story? It's insane! A time travelling supercomputer from another universe manipulating us for years, jumping back and forth through time, to make things work out the way it wants it to. That's nuts!” Ami glared at the blonde. “Oh, I see, it's much more reasonable to believe that we're the reincarnated warriors from some ancient kingdom on the moon thousands of years ago, is it? Which, according to the story, also had a time travelling supercomputer. Or at least something that could manipulate time. I didn't believe it either at first, but to be honest it makes more sense in some ways than the story we've been told all this time. Both stories are nuts but the one Yori and the others came up with can at least be verified.”

“How!?” Haruka yodelled in a high-pitched voice, grabbing a handful of hair in frustration. “It's all complete gibberish. Demon mages, mind control, time travel, magical girls with crazy powerful healing powers, it's totally insane.” Ami stared at her for a long moment then abruptly broke down into a fit of giggles, causing the blonde woman to stare at her as if she thought she'd gone crazy. “After everything we've been through, you call this insane?” Ami finally managed to gasp out. “Listen to yourself. Our entire lives are insane! If anything, this is one of the more sensible parts. Pay attention to Yori and her friends. They know what they're talking about, I'm sure of it, much more than we do.” The blonde woman stared at her for a long moment, then at her adoptive daughter, who tried smiling hopefully. Throwing her hands in the air she stomped off to sit at the table, glaring at it with her arms folded, obviously trying to think it through. Ami looked over at Yori and Azumi, shrugging a little and sighing. “I guess that's about the best we can hope for at the moment,” the middle sister said.

“Probably. It'll take time for her to think it through. She's not as quick as Ami, and Rei had already begun realising that something was wrong some time ago.” 'Yori' looked at her, then 'Chou', who smiled before going to talk to Ami, taking her off to the corner of the room for a while.

“What do we do about Minako?” Turning to inspect the unconscious blonde, 'Yori' scratched her nose, looking uncertain. “Not sure. We've got one who's not cooperative, one who sort of is, then her. Based on the trouble Fumiko and the others had with her I'm not expecting anything very useful, I'm afraid. I don't think Hotaru will be any help, or the others, since she's not very friendly to them at the moment.” She thought for a few seconds. “I think we should probably wait on her. Take her home, stuff her into bed like Setsuna, then wait to see if she wakes up in a better frame of mind. Do the same with Makoto, I guess. With a little luck they'll calm down once their brains adjust to the healing. Hnther's work will need some time to bed in as well in Minako's case.”

“We still need to heal Michiru,” Chou noted.

“True. I think we need to get these three out of here first though.”

“What about Hotaru?” ‘Azumi’ watched the purple-haired girl talking to Rei, seeming in a surprisingly good mood under the circumstances.

“I'm not completely sure. She seems to have accepted our version of events, more or less, although I can feel there's still a little doubt there deep inside. Not surprising, considering how long she's believed her original story and how young she is. I'd be amazed if she just took our word for it. And she's right, we can't prove it yet, even though it fits together so well.” ‘Yori’ glanced at her sister-in-law, smiling slightly. “She's not stupid. I think possibly the best course of action is just to let her go home with Haruka. They can talk it out. I suspect that Hotaru will talk her around, if only as far as keeping her head down.”

“After what you did to her I don't see her causing any more trouble.” 'Chou' looked up for a moment, meeting her husband's eyes. “She was absolutely terrified of you. She still is.”

“Good. I meant every word.” The martial artist's face was as expressionless as anything ‘Azumi’ could manage. “If she does anything like that again, it's duck pond time.” Her wife nodded slightly before going back to her conversation with the blue-haired girl. The middle sister watched the face of her sister-in-law for a moment, feeling a slight chill, then glanced at Haruka who was still scowling at the table.

“I hope it doesn't come to that,” she said.

“So do I. I hate killing. But if I have to, if there's no alternative...” 'Yori' made a small gesture. “Sometimes you have no choice. These girls are far too dangerous to be running around wrecking the place. Eventually there would be real casualties, quite possibly very large numbers of them. We can't allow that to happen. Ami knows that. She's quite serious about doing what would be needed to be done under those circumstances, although she'd hate it, and herself, afterwards.”

There was silence on the com for a while. 'Chou' walked over to Hnther with Ami, bringing him into the discussion, while Lldnr'k talked to Rei and Hotaru, all three of them watching Haruka. Eventually the blonde woman sighed deeply, looking up and around at the others. “I'm going back to the hotel. I need to think about all this.”

“Fair enough,” ‘Yori’ told her. “Would you like Aiko to give you a lift?”

“Where are your friends, anyway?” Haruka asked.

“Watching your friends.” The martial artist grinned as she snorted, almost amused. “Just in case. We don't want a repeat of this afternoon if we can avoid it. Everyone was a little too far away to intervene before it all went to shit.”

“No, thanks, I'll walk.” Haruka shook her head, standing up. “Do I get my sword back?”

“When I think you're ready for it.” ‘Yori’ inspected her. “Not quite yet.” The blonde didn't argue, looking subdued and worried.

“Hotaru? Are you coming?” Joining her at the table, Hotaru nodded.

“OK. Let's get something to eat then talk.” She smiled at her adoptive parent, who smiled back, slightly unsure. They headed for the door.

“Haruka?” The blonde stopped, looking back at 'Yori'. “Don't forget your promise.”

“I won't.” She shivered slightly. “Ever.” Resuming walking she left the room, Hotaru glancing back and waving, before they headed down the corridor.

“Right. Let's get these two back home, then pick up Michiru and do her, then I guess we should wait to see what happens.” 'Yori' frowned a little, sighing. “God, what a mess this all is.” She moved over to the sofa and stared at Minako for a while. “Aiko, can you come and make a few deliveries, please?” she requested. The brunette appeared seconds later.

“Looks like we might have two more of this group that are at least willing to stop and think,” she said, looking around. 'Yori' nodded thoughtfully, still staring at Minako.

“Hopefully.” She looked up at Ami. “What do you and Rei think?”

The blue-haired girl considered her words carefully. “Hotaru is, I think, willing to believe, if we can provide some evidence.”

“I'll contact S'th'kx and arrange to get him and his crew and ship here as soon as possible, so we can check out the moon for these purported ruins.” Ami nodded, still looking slightly stunned, like she didn't completely believe that an alien complete with spaceship could be produced just like that.

“That should do it.”

“What about Haruka?” The girl looked uncertain.

“I... don't know. She seems to be listening, to one degree or another, but I'm not sure she really believes any of it, not really. Again, some actual provable evidence would help.”

Rei added, “I have to admit it would settle the last few doubts I have.” Everyone looked at her, making her seem slightly embarrassed. “Oh, I think it's true, but deep down...”

'Chou' smiled at her. “We understand. It's a lot to accept, your entire life turning around like that, just on our word. I'm glad you're willing to listen.”

“You make a worryingly good case,” the black-haired girl laughed. 'Chou' giggled.

Ami was inspecting her two unconscious former team-mates. “Even if she does come around to believing it, I somehow feel she's never going to be friends with us again. Not like before. She clearly doesn't trust either of us.” She looked at 'Yori'. “I think she might actually trust you more than me, oddly enough.”

“Why?”

“Well, I think she thinks we really did betray her. You and the others were never part of her team, so even though you've gone against us several times, there's no betrayal there.” Ami sighed a little. “It's weird and upsetting, but I doubt we'll work together again. Not as a team.”

“That's a pity but I suspect you're right,” the other woman replied. She shrugged a little. “Well, we can't do much about that, at least at the moment. Let's take these two home.” Aiko picked Minako up, while 'Yori' collected Makoto, both disappearing a second later.
The middle Tendo watched Ami, who was staring at the empty sofa with a slightly lost expression. She walked over, stopping beside her. “You look worried.”

“I am. Even if all this magical healing and mental adjustment actually works, there's no denying the fact that our team is finished. Usagi obviously hates me, and Rei as well. I never thought that would happen. She's been one of my best friends for years.” The blue-haired girl seemed very despondent. “I didn't have a lot of friends in the first place. I've got less now.”

‘Azumi’ smiled at her. “You've got more than you think.” Ami looked at her, surprised, then worked out what she meant.

“Thanks.”

“Growing up I didn't have many real friends either,” the silver-haired young woman mused out loud. “There were a lot of reasons for that, some good, some not, but looking back, it wasn't nice. I know people who had it much worse, though. Part of that was my fault, in fact. But, in most respects, in the end it worked out pretty well.” She glanced at Ami. “With a bit of luck it will for you. Rei is still your friend, I think Hotaru is as well. Haruka and the others, well... It's a shame, but people grow apart for much less reason than all of this. If we can somehow stop all the chaos, stop them from causing some huge disaster, even if they're not your friends any more you all might at least be civil to each other.”

Ami thought about her words for a while then slowly nodded. “I suppose you're right. Thank you.” She took a deep breath. “So, what next?”

“Yori and Aiko just put Minako to bed,” ‘Azumi’ told her, watching the live feed from the others. Ami looked curiously at her.

“Every time you guys do that it drives me nuts.” The middle sister grinned.

“That's half the fun of doing it...”

The other girl snickered. “How cruel.”

“Anyway, they're going to sort out Makoto, then grab Michiru on the way back. She's still wandering around near her home, looking very annoyed.” Ami shook her head.

“So curious...”

Laughing, ‘Azumi’ went to talk to Hnther.

Ami watched as Hnther finished inspecting Michiru. Chou translated his words as he looked up from the unconscious woman. “She's worse than Haruka, nearly as bad as Setsuna in some ways, although not quite that far gone. I still had to do some remedial work. It looks like it worked as well as could be expected.” He stood up, stretching. “Which is to say, nowhere near as effectively as I'd like, but well enough to keep her fairly sane for the time being. Most of these women need some serious work by someone with more experience in this sort of therapy than I have.”

“Do you know anyone?” Ami asked him. He looked at her, thinking, then nodded.

“I believe so. When I return home I'll make some enquiries.” After a moment, he added, “Realise, though, that such therapies, while effective, take a considerable amount of time and effort. It won't be an instant fix. In some cases, damage of this nature is permanent.” She looked at Rei, then back at him, nodding respectfully with a small sigh.
“I understand. Thank you for all you've done, even so.”

“You're very welcome.” He nodded back. “I feel it's something important, although I'd have done it anyway since Yori asked.”

Aiko picked the girl up and disappeared, everyone looking away as the by-now familiar flash came and went. A few minutes later she reappeared, sitting on the now vacant sofa and looking around.

“That's all of them. What do we do now?”

“Keep an eye on them all, wait until tomorrow, then see what they're like when they wake up.” Chou glanced at Yori, who nodded.

“Yep. Not much else we can do on that front. We still need to work out what we can do about the damn time machine but that's not something we can sort out right now.” Lldnr'k made an affirmative gesture.

“I will have to think about what could be done to locate the device and access it. I don't know how we can disable it even if we do manage to get access to it, I'm afraid, but I suspect some considerable force might be required.” Yori looked at her friends.

“We can arrange that.”

“I thought as much,” the demon mage replied, looking amused in his own way.

“What do you think will happen if we destroy it?” Azumi asked him. He looked thoughtful.

“I'm not entirely sure. It depends on how that is done, I think. There is little information available on it's method of operation these days, although I will attempt to locate everything I can on that subject, it may suggest some simple method to deactivate it. There is also the problem that it may not be very cooperative in it's own destruction. Although not actually sentient it probably has some form of defences and is most likely smart enough to use them. It was after all the product of a war. Bypassing them may be problematic.” He shrugged. “All I can do at this point is research it.”

“Do you think it will directly intervene?” Ami asked. “It must know by now that we're working against it. It probably knew the instant Azumi blocked the link in the first place.”

“Again, I'm unsure. In all likelihood it can't or won't make major changes, or it would have done so already,” Lldnr'k replied. “I suspect it's limiting itself to quite small nudges for the most part. Those can certainly add up considerably over enough time. More serious action would run the risk of immediately undoing whatever it has already done, if not provoking a major corrective action by reality itself. With luck we can essentially sneak up on it, so that by the time it realises what's going on it's too late. The fact that it apparently can't track or influence Yori or her friends will help this considerably. It's powerful but nowhere near omniscient, as all of this proves, since if it was smarter it would realise it can't possibly achieve what it's trying to do.”

After a second or two of thought, he added, “I will consult with some colleagues who may be able to suggest a suitable course of action.”

“Thanks, guys.” Yori smiled at both the mages. “It's been a lot of help having you both here. I should probably take you home now.” She looked around as Rei's grandfather entered, nodding to him. He smiled at her, then walked over to Lldnr'k.

“It has been a genuine pleasure talking to you and Hnther,” the priest told the demon mage, who looked pleased. “Any time you are in the area, please stop by. I would dearly like to continue our conversation.”
“I would like that as well, my friend.” Looking down at the considerably shorter old man, the crow-like demon clicked his beak, bowing his head. “It has been an honour talking to you.”

“I also enjoyed our conversation,” Hnther said through Chou. He smiled a little, fangs showing. “I will endeavour to learn your language so we might communicate more effectively in future.” The priest grinned at this.

“That would be nice, but it's a lot of trouble to go to.” Hnther casually waved this aside.

“I like learning languages. I may not be as proficient as my learned colleague, but then I don’t have the many, many years of extra experience.” Chou managed to get across the teasing tone of his words very well, smiling slightly in the process. Both Lldnr'k and the old man laughed.

“It is good that you recognise seniority, my friend,” Lldnr'k chuckled, Hnther grinning in response. Snickering, Yori formed a portal in the corner of the room, as Ami watched with amazed interest, quickly scanning it, shaking her head at the results.

“I still can't believe how easy you make that look,” she muttered. Yori looked amused.

“It's not easy, believe me, it took over a year and a half to come up with the spell.”

“It works remarkably efficiently, even though looking at it gives me a headache,” Lldnr'k remarked, “Your magic system is most fascinating. Assuming it actually is magic.” The black-haired young woman raised an eyebrow at him.

“What else would it be?” she enquired. He shrugged, ruffling his feathers in amusement.

“No idea. You aliens confuse me at the best of times.” Laughing, Yori waved him towards the portal.

“Come on. Let's take you home. I'll drop Hnther off on the way.” They both followed her through the portal, talking in the demonic language, while Ami scanned it as it closed. When it had popped out of existence, she looked around at the people left in the room.

“What an odd day,” she commented idly, making Rei look at her incredulously, then start laughing like mad. After a moment, Ami giggled, helping her friend to a chair, as she was having trouble standing.

“I'm hungry,” Aiko announced. She looked around. “It's nearly dinner time anyway. Should we go out, or order in?” Ami smiled at this.

“Good way to make things seem ordinary, Aiko,” she teased. The brunette smiled.

“Even in the midst of an existential crisis people need to eat. Do you like pizza?” Ami nodded, as did Rei. Aiko produced a menu from somewhere and flipped it to her, the blue-haired girl catching it and looking at it curiously.

“New York?” she asked incredulously.

“That place makes the best pizzas in the world,” Aiko told her, grinning. Staring at the brunette for a moment, Ami finally shrugged, looking over the menu, then handing it to Rei. They made their orders. “The usual for you guys?” Aiko asked, looking around at her friends. They all nodded. Rei showed the menu to her grandfather, who looked amused, quickly selecting a medium seafood pizza. Reclaiming the menu Aiko vanished, smiling.
“I can’t believe you lot order in from an entirely different country,” Rei giggled, still in an oddly good mood. Azumi glanced at her, amusement on her face.

“Pizza from New York or Rome, that sushi place in Brisbane, which is very good indeed, there’s a place in China that does amazing noodles...” She chuckled. “When you can teleport that easily, you tend to make use of it, a lot. Aiko is amazingly good at it.”

“A very useful ability, to be sure,” the old priest smiled. “You young ladies seem to have some most interesting skills.” Azumi grinned at him.

“You wouldn’t believe some of them. I’m still learning, but it’s a lot of fun. Most of the time.” She looked sad for a moment.

“Yes. I have been following the news about that affair in Canada. Extremely unfortunate, indeed. So many lives lost.” The old man sighed. “Such destruction. I’m impressed you and your friends were able to deal so professionally with it.” He looked at the silver-haired girl, who seemed momentarily lost in reflection. “If you ever need to talk about it, how it affected you, please feel free to come here.” She looked at him blankly for a few seconds, before smiling a little.

“Thank you, sir.”

He smiled back. “I’ll go and make some more tea, before your friend comes back with the food. Rei, could you help me clear all this away, please?” His granddaughter nodded, hopping to her feet and beginning to pile the surprisingly large number of cups onto a tray. Soon the two of them had left the room.

Sitting on the sofa, Ami stretched her legs out in front of her and relaxed slightly, for the first time in hours. Chou came over and sat beside her. She cast a glance at the blonde, who was smiling serenely, radiating the same calm she usually did. It was surprisingly comforting. “Do you think all of this work will have a beneficial affect?” she quietly asked the older woman. Chou looked at her, thinking for a moment.

“I do hope so. Unfortunately, the damage to most of your friends isn’t the sort of thing that just goes away when you remove the cause. The physical damage is easy for us to repair. The workings of the mind are much more complex.” She sighed very slightly. “Hnther is extremely good at his speciality, vastly more knowledgeable on that subject than either Yori or I, yet he’s not sure either. He thinks that in the short term, most of them should at least become much less aggressive and unthinkingly prone to anger, although that could take some time to take full effect. We will need to keep an eye on them for some days to weeks, in case we need to step in.” She paused for a moment. “I trust we can count on your help, and Rei’s, if that happens?”

Ami nodded. “Yes, both of us are prepared to do... whatever we need to. Like I told Yori, we feel it’s our responsibility.” Chou smiled sadly at her, putting her hand on Ami’s for a moment.

“I hope it doesn’t come to that, for any of them. There are many options we have before the permanent ones. I would hope that perhaps isolating them on a barren world with supplies for a couple of weeks might be enough to get the more difficult ones past the point that they’re a danger to others. It’s a rather brutal approach but much less lethal than some.”

“I suppose that might work.” Ami thought about it. “It also runs the risk of making them even more paranoid and delusional.”

Chou sighed again. “True. Well, unless and until something that warrants a heavy-handed approach happens, we will have to wait and see. We’ll monitor them around the clock, if something happens we should be able to step in before it goes too far.” Ami stared at her for a moment or two.

“How the hell are you doing all this?” she finally asked. “It's driving me completely nuts trying to work it out. As far as I can see it's not magic.” Chou smiled slightly mysteriously.

“I would like to be able to tell you but the time isn't quite right yet. Once we have some resolution to the current problem, though, I think we could probably let you in on it. We should be able to trust you, and probably Rei, although we'd have to insist on using the security spell. There are secrets involved that could hurt people who don't deserve it.” Ami sighed, nodding a little in understanding.

“Guess I'll just have to wait, then,” she mumbled. Chou giggled a bit.

“I'm sorry, I know how curious you are about things like this. Azumi is very similar. You remind me of her quite a lot.”

Ami looked at the silver-haired young woman in question, who was on the other side of the room apparently deep in thought. “She can be rather forbidding,” she commented in a low voice. “When she's not smiling she kind of gives me the creeps.” Chou giggled once more.

“That's definitely one of her special abilities. She's very good indeed at it.” The blonde looked proudly at Azumi. “She's learned a lot in a short time.” Ami watched the woman beside her, feeling that there was something about the relationship between the two that was eluding her, then dismissed it. She changed the subject.

“I hope Haruka comes around. I think Hotaru more or less has already, but Haruka is still not at all sure about any of what she heard.”

“Even if she doesn't really believe us in the end, it looks like she is at least much less likely to get involved in something regrettable. That's better than nothing, certainly.” Chou looked mildly satisfied about this.

“Yori made it pretty damn clear that she would take a dim view of Haruka getting involved in all this stupidity again.” Ami shivered at the memory of the young woman's voice and face when she'd been talking to her former team-mate. Chou nodded slowly.

“Yes, she wasn't at all pleased. I've seldom seen her like that. You have to push her very hard to make her react in such a manner, but it's possible. Threatening her friends is a sure fire way to get a dangerous reaction.”

“Dangerous is putting it mildly.” Ami shivered again. “She wasn't kidding about what she'd do if it happened again, was she?”

Chou looked at her for a moment, her face suddenly cold. “No. She takes threats to people she cares about very poorly and tends to deal with them in a way that ensures they won't happen again. That seldom escalates to lethal force but she wouldn't hesitate if that was the only option. Neither would most of us.”

Ami studied her, feeling mildly worried. “And you?” The older woman looked back for a handful of seconds.

“If there was no other way.”

Returning her gaze to her feet, Ami nodded a little. “OK. Thank you for being honest.” She liked the blonde a lot, but even so she found her quite worrying at times. She found Yori worrying almost all the time, if not totally terrifying, although the last few hours showed she could also be very nice.

“Assuming we can get all this mess sorted out in an acceptable manner, what do you think you and the others will do?” Chou asked her curiously after a short silence. Ami considered the question.

“I... don't quite know. We've been a team of nine people for so long it hasn't quite sunk it that that's unlikely to happen again.” She fell silent for a moment. “I guess I'm stuck with being a magical girl, no matter what.”

“I'm afraid so. Does that upset you?” Chou was watching her with interest. Ami shook her head.

“No, not really. Despite everything I love being able to do what I can do. I always felt I was one of the least effective team-members, basically a side character, I guess, but talking to Aiko and Misaki a while ago made me rethink some of that. Yori showing me how to access the magic boost without all the fuss helped a lot as well.” She giggled a bit, making Chou look curious. “Not using all those flowery attack names also makes me feel much more professional, weirdly. They were... kind of embarrassing, to be honest.” Chou laughed.

“You're not the only ones to make such a fuss about attacks, giving them grandiose names and shouting them out when you should just be using the attack. Quite a lot of the girls do it for some reason. Even some of the high powered martial artists in Nerima tend to do the same thing. It's very inefficient.”

“It seems to annoy the hell out of Yori,” Ami giggled. Chou snorted a laugh.

“You have no idea. It's pretty much guaranteed to produce a short rant about how stupid it all is,” she replied, grinning. They smiled at each other.

“I suppose I'll keep doing what I've been doing, even if I need to do it solo,” the magical girl said, getting back to the original question. “Rei will probably help, and I think Hotaru might as well. I guess we'll just form our own group. There are still problems that need magical girls in Minato.”

“Unfortunately true. This area certainly does attract oddness on a daily basis. A lot of it is harmless but a significant quantity is anything but.”

“It's possible the others will end up doing the same thing. We might get three or four smaller teams out of this situation, which is a little sad, but as long as they're not attacking each other, it's better than the alternative.” Ami sighed, looking up as a portal appeared. Yori stepped through, not looking as it vanished with a pop behind her. She walked over to the sofa.

“Both the guys are back home, Lldnr'k is already researching the time device. He's very worried about it, I think. So am I.” She grumbled to herself. “Damn time machines. Never liked the things, even before all of this crap.” Chou patted the seat beside her.

“Sit down, dear, Aiko should be back any moment with some pizzas from that place in New York. There's nothing we need to do right now except relax and eat.” With a sudden grin, Yori dropped beside the taller woman.

“I could eat.” Across the room Azumi suddenly started laughing, turning to look at Yori, who seemed amused. She was still giggling when Aiko reappeared almost buried under a pile of pizza boxes.
Chapter 69

“You're right,” Rei pronounced in a satisfied tone, licking her fingers, “That was the best pizza I've ever had.” Aiko grinned at her, closing the box her own meal had come in.

“They're pretty amazing, aren't they? And not too expensive.” She'd disappeared to deliver the pizzas to the others, returning to find Rei and Ami were half-way through their own, yet still finished ahead of them. Yori had also finished very fast, practically inhaling the large portion at a rate that had frankly astounded the two girls. Azumi, Chou, and the old priest were still eating.

“Very nice indeed, young lady,” the old man smiled, carefully picking another slice out of his box. “I envy you your ability to travel so easily. In my day it was much more time consuming.”

The brunette looked amused at his words. “It's a lot of fun, I have to admit. All the magical girl things can be, but the teleporting is probably the best of them all, at the moment.”

He nodded thoughtfully. “I assume that you are still learning new abilities? I know Yori and Chou both have a real gift for working out the possibilities of magic, as shown by the fact that what they use is barely recognisable as magic by now.” He grinned at the two people in question, Yori nodding sagely while Chou smiled gently. “I can feel your own magic is very similar.” Aiko raised her eyebrows slightly, looking at him with interest.

“Yes, we've all learned quite a lot of interesting things in the last few years. They come up with new ideas pretty regularly.” She glanced at Azumi, grinning slightly. “Even our newest friend over there has come up with her own techniques.” The silver-haired girl smiled at her, thought also appearing slightly embarrassed.

“One technique, and it was only an idle thought.”

Yori snickered. “It was brilliant, a genuinely remarkable breakthrough. Don't put yourself down.” Azumi shrugged, eating her last slice of pizza. “And there has been more than one technique. That was your best one, true enough, but you keep finding interesting things to do with the abilities we teach you.” Looking slightly puzzled, Azumi glanced at her friend.

“Such as?”

“Well, you remember how you got into that bomb shelter in Halleckton?” The girl nodded, looking thoughtful. “I certainly didn't teach you that usage of the technique, you worked it out yourself. You used the same thing when we were having that pleasant little chat with the gun-happy granny in Sydney.” Yori laughed. “It certainly impressed her.”

Azumi giggled, looking like she remembered something funny. Ami and Rei exchanged curious glances. “Do we dare ask what all these techniques are?” the blue-haired girl ventured. Yori looked at her for a moment, before nodding slowly.

“I suppose there’s no harm in talking about it.” She grinned in an evil manner. “After all, we know where you live.” Ami swallowed, not completely sure she was joking. “Azumi came up with the energy compression technique we all use now.” Holding out her hand, Yori produced a baseball sized sphere of the energy she and her friends commanded so easily, showing it to Ami, who whipped out her computer and scanned it with interest.

“Wow. That's weird. It's not actually magic, or not all magic, is it?”
“Nope. Mostly something called ki.” The priest sat up alertly, looking intently at the sphere with even more interest than he'd so far shown.

“That is remarkable. I have heard that advanced martial artists could utilise ki in their art, but it's very unusual to see a visible manifestation of the energy itself like that, it requires a truly impressive ki level, far higher than most people could possibly reach.” He stared at the black-haired girl's hand.

“Oh, it's not as rare as you might think, sir,” she told him, smiling a little. “Admittedly, we're out at the far end of the curve as far as this sort of thing is concerned but a substantial number of the martial artists in Nerima could probably learn to do this to one degree or another. Some of them already can, to an impressive level. Various other warrior groups can as well. There are a number of individuals in China, for example, with massive ki abilities. They are extremely dangerous if they want to be.” The priest was slowly nodding, still inspecting the ki sphere.

“I believe I may know one or two of the individuals you mention. One Herb, I think, he's some sort of half-human prince deep in the interior of China?” She nodded, looking impressed.

“Yep. He's one of the better examples. Very few people are more powerful than he is in ki abilities.”

Ami studied her. “Are you?” she asked, pretty sure she knew the answer. Yori produced a peculiar dark little smile that made her heart skip a beat or two, but didn't directly answer. She noticed with a chill that all three of the young woman's friends momentarily wore exactly the same smile. No one said anything for a few seconds. Rei's grandfather looked around, frowning slightly, then broke the silence.

“There was a rumour some years ago about an even more powerful person, I believe someone called Saffron, who was involved in an enormous mystical fight with a young martial artist from Nerima. Somehow, the martial artist won the fight, from what I remember, although there was a significant amount of landscape remodelling involved.” He studied Yori, whose face had gone blank. Eventually she nodded agreement.

“Yes. I heard the same thing. From what I was told it was a very close fight. Saffron was an extremely dangerous opponent, the martial artist was very lucky to have survived. He shouldn't have, in all probability, but he had a knack of pulling off the impossible by the skin of his teeth, from what I was told.” The priest rubbed his chin thoughtfully, still watching her. She stared back impassively.

“So I gather. I seem to remember he disappeared soon after that.” She shrugged, suddenly looking bored, idly rolling the ki sphere around in her hand.

“I vaguely recall something about that. It was a while ago now, the details escape me these days. He probably just decided to move somewhere less insane than Nerima. It's a weird place.”

He nodded slowly. “Yes, I remember it was, although I haven't been there in a considerable time. Perhaps I should visit, look up some old friends.” He grinned, although Ami could see that there was something slightly odd about his expression. She glanced at Yori to see something very similar in her violet eyes. It disappeared after a moment. “My apologies for interrupting your explanation, my dear. Please continue.” The old man bowed his head slightly, causing Yori to smile again.

“No problem. Anyway, the usage of ki in the martial artist community, at least at the very high end, is fairly common, although admittedly a lot of them don't really realise quite what they're doing. A few work it out themselves, others learn the techniques from more advanced teachers, but there are a reasonable number who know at least something of it. This sort of thing, though,” she held up the ki ball by way of illustration, “isn't very common at all.” She grinned again. “This is unique to us.”
The ball began to silently contract, growing small and brighter at the same time. Ami studied it with great interest, remembering when she'd seen the same thing before, the time Misaki blew up the portal the huge demon had come through after all the little bitey ones.

She scanned the ongoing process, surprised at the results. As the ball shrank the energy density was climbing extremely rapidly, although the total energy quantity stayed the same. That made sense, it fitted a volumetric ratio, which meant that halving the diameter of the energy sphere would decrease the volume by the cube of that, or conversely increase the density given a constant power by the same amount, a factor of eight times. The ball continued to shrink, eventually reaching a size so small it was an almost dimensionless pinpoint of intolerably bright light, far too bright to look at, casting stark shadows on the walls. She read the screen of her computer in some disbelief, not entirely sure it could be correct.

“That's...” She shook her head, unable to complete the sentence.

“Holy crap,” Rei supplied helpfully, staring in shock. She could easily feel the danger radiating from the point of light, although the initial sphere hadn't felt too worrying. She wouldn't have liked to catch in in the face, but it wouldn't have done too much damage. This version of it, on the other hand, gave the distinct feeling it would blow a hole completely through her.

Yori grinned, her face lit eerily from underneath, making the expression look far more dangerous than it was meant to be. Both magical girls shivered slightly. The priest was watching warily, his face pale, clearly also suddenly very aware indeed just how dangerous this young woman really was. “Very impressive,” he managed after a few seconds. Lifting her hand the black-haired girl looked at the tiny point of light, then flipped it into the air, making Rei squeak in shock and Ami lean back instinctively. As it arced away from her it faded into nothing, the abrupt change in lighting making everyone blink a few times. Wiping his brow, which was slightly damp, the old man looked a little relieved.

“Yes, very impressive indeed. You came up with this method yourself?” he asked Azumi, who had been calmly watching the demonstration with no visible sign of concern, as had Chou and Aiko.
The brunette, in fact, was smiling happily.

“It was my idea, yes,” the silver-haired woman admitted, nodding. “She worked out how to actually do it. More or less immediately. Then she showed the rest of us.” Azumi looked mildly annoyed. “It's not nearly as easy as she makes it look. None of us but Chou can get a compression factor anywhere near that.” Yori snickered at her expression.

“You'll get it with time, I'm sure.” Glancing at the priest, she added, “It does take a level of both power and control that very few people can manage, even if they're good with ki. I don't know if any of the others we mentioned could do it, possibly at all and certainly to anything like that level.
I should look into it one day.”

Ami re-read the screen of her computer, still not quite believing what it was telling her. “How much energy can you pump into that?” she asked curiously. Yori looked at her for a moment, before glancing at Chou, who nodded slightly.

“A lot more than that. A hell of a lot more.” She looked pensive. “More than I could safely use pretty much anywhere, let's leave it at that.”

“Worried about blowing up Tokyo?” Rei joked, only to swallow dryly at the look she got in return from all four women.
“That's certainly a concern, yes,” Chou told her evenly, not looking like she was pulling her leg.

“Crap,” Rei whispered, looking at each of them in turn. “And you can all do that?”

“Well, Yori is something exceptional,” Aiko replied, looking amused, “but all of us know the techniques involved and practice regularly. We're not as powerful, certainly, but so far we've been able to deal with what we've run across.”

“Thank you,” Azumi told her, smiling slightly. Yori snickered at the look on her face.

“It's certainly a good technique. She's come up with others as well, like I said, but so far that's the best one.”

“How did you break into this bomb shelter Yori mentioned?” Ami asked curiously, shutting her little computer so she wouldn't have to look at the figures it was still displaying, which were making her nervous. Azumi smiled.

“I could have blown the door off but I was worried about the concussion killing the survivors inside. At first I thought I'd have to call Yori or Chou to get them to cut their way in with an energy blade, which isn't something I can do yet, but I had an idea.” Holding up her hand she looked amused at their expressions when it began glowing a baleful leaf green, emitting an aura of deadly energy. “I remembered something Yori showed me some time before that, and wondered what would happen if I put a lot more power into it. Like covering my hand in a ki shot, more or less. It worked surprisingly well.” Picking up her empty pizza box with her other hand, she made a fist with the glowing one, pushing it through the box with a faint hiss. The cardboard simply vanished where the glow touched it, the edges of the hole smoking.

“Cardboard isn't much of a target, obviously, but it works as well on steel, just more slowly.” Ami and Rei gaped at her.

“That's absolutely terrifying,” the old man said, sounding both impressed and worried. She shrugged.

“It's a simple little trick, to be honest, but it was useful a few times.” The young woman restricted the glow to her index finger, a small ball of green light encompassing the tip, running it back and forth on the edge of the box, which slowly fizzed away into nothing. Grinning, she added, “It's useful when you want to get someone's attention.”

“I can imagine it is,” he replied faintly, staring at her actions wide-eyed.

“It was a very clever application of ki energy that I hadn't thought of,” Yori told them, also watching, although with pride, not slight apprehension. “Not effective at range, of course, but there are times you need something that only works close up.” Chou giggled, wadding her pizza box into a remarkably small ball in an impressive show of strength, then closing her hands around it, a golden flash spearing out between her fingers with a faint pop. When she opened her hands again there was nothing but a small amount of fine ash. Yori looked amused. “Like that. Very useful for disposing of trash.”

“A most impressive demonstration of energy control,” the priest commented, looking at them all in astonishment. “I knew you all were very skilled but I had no idea quite how skilled, not in such esoteric activities. Magic is something I'm quite aware of but true ki masters, or mistresses, are much rarer than mages. I never expected to meet even one, never mind seven.”
“It's a little weird, in fact, a lot of magic users are surprised by ki usage,” Chou responded. She looked mildly puzzled. “We were quite surprised to find that none of the magical girls in Minato used it at all when we came here. But then, it tends to be associated with martial arts not the magical ones, after all, and the majority of the magical girls aren't really fighters. Not in that way. Although a lot of them are very dangerous even so.” She smiled at Rei and Ami. “No disrespect of your abilities is intended, of course.” Ami glanced at Rei, who looked back.

“No offence taken, Chou. I remember what happened the first time we ran into Yori. It was the sort of demonstration that sticks with you.” Yori smiled a little, looking satisfied, while her blonde friend giggled.

“So I gather. It's a pity it was necessary, though.” She looked around at the others. “I believe we should probably be getting back home now. The situation is, at the moment, under some form of control. We'll monitor all the girls in case something unpleasant should happen, which hopefully it won't.” The blonde sighed very softly. “I wish I could believe that.” Putting her computer away Ami nodded agreement to the sentiment.

“So do I. I can't help worrying that something bad will happen, though.”

“We'll know more or less immediately if it does and we can be here very quickly,” Aiko assured her. “Haruka and Hotaru are just talking now, I don't think we have anything much to worry about from them, unless everything goes really badly wrong. Setsuna, Makoto, Minako, and Michiru are all asleep and shouldn't wake up until tomorrow sometime. Usagi is still wandering around talking to herself, which is weird.” The brunette looked puzzled at something she could apparently see, making Ami once again desperately curious as to how they did that, then shrugged. “She's a strange girl, I guess. Anyway, she seems content to stay near her home. With any luck nothing will happen until tomorrow at the earliest. Hopefully, when they wake up they'll be a little saner and more reasonable.”

“If they aren't?” Rei queried. Aiko looked at Yori, who sighed, Chou putting a hand on her shoulder comfortingly.

“We do what we need to do to make sure the damage is kept to a minimum.” The girl frowned slightly. “Hopefully that won't need to be too excessive, if Hnther's work actually works we might just be able to give them a damn good talking to. I could even call in an expert in giving scary lectures.” She grinned in a worrying manner. “When she talks, people listen. They can't help it, even if they wish they could.” Aiko giggled behind her.

“They so desperately wish they could...” she laughed. Azumi was looking coldly amused while Chou smiled to herself. Ami shared a look with Rei.

“You're talking about this mysterious Ms Aoyama, I guess?” Nodding, Yori snickered.

“Yes, I am. She's very, very good at what she does. I suspect that even if your friends went totally insane they'd still listen to her for at least a while. People can't help doing that. You tend to remember her.”

“And what happens if you don't pay attention to her warnings?” Rei's grandfather asked slowly. All four young women stopped smiling, looking at each other for a moment.

“I'm... not sure,” Yori admitted, “That's never happened.” Her expression became rather predatory. “It would be interesting to find out.” Ami shuddered, the look on her face was deeply disturbing for a few seconds. She noticed that even the priest looked worried, his normal slight smile vanishing. “Anyway, that's something to worry about some other time. In the mean time, get some rest, and thanks for all the help, guys.” She looked around at the two young women and the old priest.”It was nice to see you again, sir, even under the circumstances.”

His smile came back. “I was pleased to see you and all your friends as well, child. Don’t hesitate to drop by any time you’re in the area, even when all this is over. And thank you for introducing me to Hnther and Lldnr’k, it was a real pleasure to meet them. I hope I can again.”

“I'm sure you will. We still have this damn time machine to deal with.” The martial artist scowled. “It worries me a lot, even though Lldnr’k doesn't think it will directly interfere, at least in the short term. He's pretty sure it's probably badly damaged and not as powerful as it used to be, which is good, but even a partially working time machine is very dangerous. Possibly not directly but given enough meddling in reality the results could be very bad.” She sighed. “Mind you, if it goes that far, we'll never know.”

“That's still not a great comfort,” Rei told her. The girl laughed.

“That I know, believe me. It gives me the willies as well. Lldnr’k is going to do some research into some way to at least detect it's interference in real time, which he thinks is possible, and will give us a useful defence. He also thinks it might be more difficult to actually block it, the thing is subtle, although as we mentioned there is the possibility of adding you guys to the ward system if we have to. I'm still in two minds about that. There are... some awkward problems with it.” She shrugged. “We'll have to think about it. It might not be necessary anyway.”

Standing, Chou walked over and stood beside her smaller compatriot, smiling gently at Ami, Rei, and the old priest. “Don't worry, we'll find some way to resolve this situation, as best we can. I'm afraid that won't be in an ideal manner but hopefully it will be something everyone can live with.”

“I'd be happy if no one else gets hurt,” Ami told her. “Even if we never see the others again.” The blonde looked sympathetically at her.

“With some luck we may be able to come to a slightly better resolution than that but it's probably good that you're prepared for a non-optimal solution. It may be all we can manage.” Ami nodded glumly.

“I'm aware of the problems.” She sighed heavily, then smiled unhappily. “Thanks so much for everything you've done.”

“You're very welcome, Ami.” Chou put her hands on the other woman's shoulders, hugging her briefly. “We'll be in touch. You have our contact details, if you need anything, call.” Releasing her she stepped back, smiling at them all. Aiko and the other two joined her, the quartet vanishing as the three people left in the room averted their eyes from the flash. Ami shook her head, glancing at her friend.

“Interesting people,” she commented. Rei nodded slowly.

“Damn scary, though. I always thought we were pretty bad-ass, but the last few hours...”

Her grandfather moved to stand beside her. “I did warn you not to take Yori lightly. Or any of the people she is friends with. And never, never get between Yori and Chou.” She looked down at him, giggling slightly in a scared reflex.

“Oh, believe me, grandfather, after today, I'm listening very well indeed to your advice on that matter.”

“So is Haruka, I think,” Ami added quietly, the other two nodding reflectively. “I doubt she'll ever forget today.” Smiling at the people beside her, she headed for the door. “I'm going home. After everything that's happened I'm kind of tired. I'll see you tomorrow, I guess, Rei.” Turning right in the hall she headed for the exit.

Rei watched her friend go, then turned to her grandfather. He smiled at her calmly. “Come on, my girl, you can help me with the dishes.” She nodded, suddenly grateful for something prosaic and non-magical to do, picking up the remaining pizza boxes and following him to the kitchen.

“Good god,” Soun exclaimed, watching the news. Akane peered out from the kitchen from where she was helping Nodoka do the washing up.

“What is it, Dad?” she asked curiously. He pointed at the television.

“Those girls who destroyed that mall yesterday in Minato were at it again,” he replied, frowning slightly. “Two of them at least. The one in green and that one with the short blonde hair. They seem to be trying to kill each other.” Drying her hands the youngest Tendo came into the living room, watching the screen with interest, followed by Nodoka. She gasped as the blonde set off some sort of huge energy wave that crushed a number of vehicles and slammed into several buildings which visible shook, debris falling from them. A figure flew through the air, dropping heavily to the ground, to be joined by another one almost instantly. A weird screeching noise came from the television as a flash of purple light illuminated everything, a scream sounding before everything went silent. The reporter who had been describing the fight abruptly stopped talking.

“I think that was Chou!” Akane exclaimed. “It's difficult to be sure, their magic is making the picture all blurry, but she's the right height and moves in the right way. I guess they don't feel like allowing this to be recorded clearly, normally they're more visible than that.” Her father nodded slowly.

“I believe you're correct,” he replied. “Is that Yori by her, then?” His daughter shook her head, pointing at another figure, who was standing over the prone figure of the blonde, glowing a virulent purple shade, fury clear even through the disguising magic and the camera.

“No. That is, I'm certain. Look at the colour of the glow. And she's in a really bad mood.” The youngest sister shivered. “I wouldn't want to be in that magical girl's place. She just hurt Chou.
She'll be lucky if Yori lets her live.” They all watched as the indistinct figure that was clearly Yori to anyone who knew her squatted down next to the blonde girl, who seemed to be in extreme pain.
There was an inaudible discussion which ended when the squatting figure did something to the other one, who visibly slumped after screaming in pain, presumably either unconscious or dead.
The other one stood.

She moved to the brunette who was lying on the ground some metres away, the camera zooming in to show her expression, which was one of fear and worry for her own life. The indistinct figure produced a brilliant violet energy blade, confirming her identity as Yori, holding it close enough to the brunette's neck it was clear she could remove her head with a simple twitch of her hand. The other woman froze, listening very carefully, then shook her head as little as she could get away with. The energy manifestation vanished, Yori tapping her between the eyes, causing her to also fall unconscious. Akane released the breath she hadn't realised she was holding, looking at her father with wide eyes. He looked back.

“I would not like to have that young woman annoyed with me,” he said slowly, returning his attention to the TV. “She's a nice, friendly girl most of the time, but that clearly shows there are limits you shouldn't cross.”
“I’ve always heard she was very dangerous if provoked,” Nodoka commented, watching the screen. “I think that was provocation. It seems to me a bad idea to threaten Chou, especially in Yori’s presence. They clearly care very much for each other.” Soun nodded, watching as Yori and the presumed Chou embraced for a moment, the other girl standing close. After a moment they separated, the shorter woman moving back to the blonde on the ground and bending down, picking something up. She fiddled with it, before dropping an object to the ground, firing a blast of energy at it.

“I wonder what that was for?” Soun asked curiously. Neither of the others had an answer. Seconds later a fourth figure appeared beside the three already there, causing him to smile. “Ah. That’s clearly Aiko.” Akane nodded, smiling as well. She liked the petite brunette, considering her a friend. Aiko spoke to the third woman, then each of them retrieved a body from the ground, before they vanished with the familiar flash.

The image switched back to the reporter, zooming out to frame her from the waist up, as behind her the scene changed to show a number of emergency vehicles with lights flashing parked in the street, various personnel moving about in front of a building that had partly collapsed.

“After stopping the fight between the two Magical Girls so effectively and rapidly, Yori, Chou, and their friends stayed on scene for close to an hour, evacuating and healing a number of casualties from the affected buildings. The fact that no one was permanently injured is once again credited to the professionalism of these young ladies. We are told that Azumi Ito, a magical girl who recently became active in Setagaya, was with them, aiding them in their task. She has been linked to Yori and her colleagues in a number of operations in recent months. Inspector Junpei of the Azuba-Juuban district police had this to say about the event earlier today.”

The scene changed to a segment clearly recorded earlier as dust from the collapsed building was still hanging in the air. A tall middle aged policeman was talking to the same reporter. “The damage to the street is considerable. Luckily, Yori, Chou, and their team arrived sufficiently rapidly after the fight began that they were able to bring it to a halt before anyone was killed, although I am told that without the remarkably effective healing abilities both Yori and Chou use so freely and effectively at least one fatality would have resulted. I am relieved to say that the young ladies managed to prevent this in a manner that should stand as an example to all magical girls.” He frowned slightly. “It is most regrettable that the local team appears to have become so dangerous to the very community they purportedly protect in recent months.” The reporter nodded, moving the microphone to her own mouth.

“Can you give us an idea of the damage, Inspector?” She held the mic out again.

“Nine cars, two vans, a delivery truck, and three motorcycles were destroyed in the altercation. In addition, one apartment build collapsed from the damage incurred although due to the prompt action of Chou it was held up for long enough for it to be evacuated. Three more buildings are damaged enough that the engineers tell me it will be some weeks before they can be repaired to a habitable level. A number of shops were badly affected as well, and there is considerable destruction to the street itself, with several areas requiring resurfacing and a number of street-lamps that will need to be replaced.” He smiled grimly. “Thankfully, the destruction is nowhere nearly as bad as in the previous case yesterday. It will still require some nine hundred million yen worth of repairs and insurance payments. An offer has been made from a fund set up to help those affected by mystical fights elsewhere in Minato to contribute towards the repair of the district.”

The reporter looked slightly surprised. “I believe that fund is in some way associated with Yori and Chou?” she asked, holding the mic out for him afterwards. He nodded.
“So I am told. I don't have any details available on that matter. I am, however, grateful for the generous offer, as the inhabitants of the street will also be.” He glanced away from the camera for a moment, then looked back. “You must excuse me. I have to get back to work.”

“Thank you for your time, Inspector,” the reporter replied, smiling at him, before looking back to the camera as it panned away from the departing policeman, who was heading towards a nearby car. “Inspector Junpei of the Azuba-Juuban district police.” The scene reverted to the same reporter, back at the later report.

“No further information is currently available on the whereabouts of the two magical girls who were involved in the fight that so severely damaged the street here. We have learned that another girl from the same team was stopped after a brief altercation by others from Yori's group, some distance away, apparently heading in the direction of this fight. She also appears to have dropped out of sight. The remainder of the team in question seems to be keeping to itself, something that many of the local inhabitants are expressing satisfaction about. A number of people we interviewed ventured the opinion that they would prefer it if they never reappeared, although the majority of them also suggested that they would be more than satisfied with Yori, Chou, or any of the others, feeling that they were more effective and much less damaging to the surroundings.” She smiled slightly. “We even had one interviewee remark that having met a demon once, he’d consider it a better neighbour than the local magical girl team. We were unable to interview any demons for their view on the situation.”

Soun chuckled, watching the rest of the report, turning the television off when the news went to the weather. “How remarkable. I wonder what the problem with those girls is? I recall that at one point they were very respected, from what I remember it's said they dealt with some major threats a couple of years ago or so.” His daughter nodded, sitting down across from him.

“That's true, they're considered some of the most powerful and rather mysterious of all the girls active in Minato at the moment. Although, there have been rumours on the internet for a long time that one or two of them were a bit difficult to deal with. Apparently they and the police weren't on particularly good terms in general.”

“I understand that Yori and her friends are the complete opposite,” Nodoka commented, straightening the bookshelf with a slight frown at how untidy it had become. “They certainly seem to me to be very effective and respectful to others. Those girls causing all the trouble could learn a thing or two from them.” The other two nodded in agreement.

“I must say that all of them have impressed me considerably, even taking the magic and the astounding martial arts into consideration. Very good people and very good citizens.” Soun smiled to himself at something. “Their parents must be proud of them.”

“Assuming they even know,” Akane giggled. “I wouldn't be surprised to find out that a lot of the magical girls are keeping it close to their chests, even with family.” Her father grinned back at her.

“Probably. I believe it's traditional.” Laughing, Nodoka went back into the kitchen to finish the dishes. He watched her go, then looked at his watch, rising to his feet. “Well, Akane, I have one last lesson to teach today then Genma and I are going to visit some friends. What are your plans for this evening?”

“Shampoo and I are going to do some more training, then go and see a movie. Some comedy spy one from the US that's set in the UK. It gets pretty good reviews.” She smiled a little. “I should take notes, perhaps.” Her father grinned.

“Have you heard from Adrian again?”
“I got an email a couple of days ago, things are still slowly working their way through the system. He said to be patient but he was sure it would all work out fairly soon.”

Soun looked pleased and proud. “I hope so, Akane. You're going to do us proud.” Smiling, he went out to the Dojo, leaving Akane thinking for a while until Shampoo turned up a little later.

Agent Naito watched the recorded segment again, shaking his head slightly at the sheer damage. When it ended he looked at his colleague, who looked back, also quite impressed and slightly appalled. “That's... disturbing. Both what happened and how it ended. I don't think I've ever seen Yori that angry, even after Halleckton.”

“Someone she cared about was threatened, if not in fact hurt,” the other agent noted. “From the reports I've read that's a guaranteed way of getting her undivided attention and not in a way that's likely to leave much more than ash. I'm actually somewhat amazed that this Haruka woman is still with us, missing arm or not.” He shrugged. “Yori must have had her reasons but to be honest I wouldn't have been at all surprised if she'd simply evaporated the threat. It's certainly well within her abilities.”

“Oh, definitely, she could evaporate a significant chunk of the city if she had reason to, I suspect,” Naito replied. “A lethal response would certainly not be something she'd shrink from if it was the only solution to the problem, either. She's no cold-blooded killer, she's a warrior, but she's certainly the most dangerous one I've ever encountered. If killing that woman instantly was the only way, she'd be dead, no question. Presumably it wasn't.”

“No one wants it to, but we can't have that team running rampant through Minato, trying to kill each other. Even if they don't succeed, the collateral damage would be crippling, leaving aside the likely fatalities. Our estimates suggest a minimum casualty count of upwards of five to seven thousand, if they got involved in an all out fight like in that mall, just based on the abilities we know they have. It's not unlikely that they have abilities we don't know about, which could be much worse.” He didn't look happy about this.

Naito admitted. “I know full well that Yori and her friends haven't shown anywhere near all the things they can do in public. Little hints come through every now and then which frankly amaze and slightly terrify me if I think about them. They're horrifyingly dangerous if necessary, although luckily more or less peaceful. If these other girls are
The other agent flipped through the report. “This other girl, Hotaru Tomoe, was intercepted in the local park by Aiko and two of her team-mates, that Ami girl and her friend Rei. They seem to be cooperating with Yori and her friends if not actually working with them now. They talked for some time then teleported away. Again, we haven't heard from them since. The other three from Aiko's team intercepted Minako Aino as she was heading towards the fight Yori dealt with, we're not sure what they did but it resulted in the Aino woman being taken away unconscious. That case didn't cause too much damage.”

“So that's six of them accounted for. What about the other three?”

“No idea at the moment. We got a rumour that Aiko ambushed the Setsuna woman at least twice, taking her away then bringing her back, but we haven't confirmed it, or have any idea what was behind it if it's true. The other two we don't have any information on.”

Naito nodded thoughtfully. “Interesting. I suspect that Yori may be doing some sort of research into the problem. Aiko was possibly collecting experimental subjects. Hopefully, if that's the case, they might have some idea about how to stop the problem.”

“Can you ask her?” His colleague looked curious. Naito smiled.

“I can certainly ask. Whether she'd actually tell me anything...?” He made a small shrug. “She's pretty protective of people in the magical community even if she's not happy with them. I'm certainly not going to try pushing. It probably wouldn't affect the rather good working relationship she and her friends have with us but why risk it?” It was the turn of the other agent to look thoughtful and nod.

“True. Leaving aside the fact that she has no reason to tell us, if she doesn't want to, technically she could truthfully say we don't have the clearance for it.” He grinned. “I wonder if she realises that?”

Naito chuckled. “If she's thought about what that authorisation means at all I'm sure she does, she's extremely smart, as are all her friends. Azumi more than most. It probably doesn't really mean much to her, though. They're all very private, they don't share much anyway, even to people they like outside their community.”

“Hmm.” His colleague pondered the issue, smiling a little. “We do meet some interesting people in this job.” Agent Naito grinned.

“Damn right. It's a hell of a lot of fun a lot of the time.”

Laughing, his friend left the room, leaving him to watch the video one more time, making notes in the process.

“Well.” Kasumi shimmered back to her normal appearance, sitting down gratefully. “What an unusual day.” Resuming her own form Nabiki looked at her sister with a certain incredulity, before grinning.

“That's a way of putting it, I suppose.” The elder Tendo giggled.

“I can't think of anything more descriptive.”

“It was pretty weird,” Aiko suggested, laughing. “I think it went as well as we could have expected, bearing in mind how screwed up most of them are, although I wish we could have stopped all that damage.” Ranma was standing staring out the window in deep thought, but looked up at this, nodding regretfully.

“It wasn't ideal,” he admitted. “I should probably simply have shot both of them in the head with a decent sized ki ball then sorted things out later but bearing in mind the circumstances that seemed a little too brutal. It's what I'll do if it happens again, though. If not worse.” He frowned. “I'm not going to let anyone hurt my wife again, or any of my friends.”

Kasumi smiled gently at him, getting up and walking over to put her arm around him and lean her head on his shoulder. “I was in little real danger, dear. Even if that attack had hit me full on it wouldn't have killed me, only broken a lot of bones. You'd have healed me very quickly.”

“Nabiki nearly got hit as well and it would have caused her more trouble. She's not as tough as you, not yet.”

“She would still have survived. Not to mention that she didn't actually get hit, so everything is all right. It won't happen again, not from Haruka, she's certainly not going to risk upsetting you. She was absolutely horrified by what you told her.” Kasumi looked at her husband with slight amusement as he snorted. “And the way you said it. It was nearly as cold as anything Nabiki has come out with.” She glanced at her sister, who shrugged, smiling. “No offence, sister.”

“None taken. You're right. It was very impressive in an extremely scary way. I was taking notes.” The brunette giggled as Ranma began smiling.

Coming out of the kitchen with a glass of water, Aiko sipped it, watching them with a small smile. “I don't know where the next trouble from that lot will come from aside from it won't be Haruka who starts it. Whether she'll see reason in the long term I have no idea but I think you put the fear of Yori into her in a way that isn't going to shift easily.” She laughed, Ranma joining in with slight embarrassment. Separating from him his wife disappeared into their bedroom. He moved to the sofa and sat, Nabiki and Aiko doing the same.

“Thanks for everything you both did, guys,” he told them. “And you guys as well.”

“Nice to have, though,” her sister added, sounding amused. He snickered, shaking his head.

“I'm so very glad to have all of you as friends. As family. This would be a lot more difficult otherwise.” The martial artist looked up as Kasumi came back, having changed her clothes, sitting and leaning against him with a smile.

“Touching, dear, very touching,” she giggled. Everyone laughed.

“What's the next step?” Nabiki asked after a few seconds. Ranma and Kasumi looked at each other.

“Like we told Ami, I think all we can do now is wait, mainly.” He glanced at her, as she nodded. “I'll go and talk to S'th'kx about getting him and a crew here for doing some poking around on the moon. He might have some other ideas as well, he's the space expert, I don't know enough about it myself to be completely sure of the best way to proceed but I'm sure he will. Hopefully the rest of those girls will hold off on any more stupidity for a while to let us recover. Two incidents is two days is a little annoying. Hnther and Lldnr'k will probably have some more information fairly soon as well. Ultimately, we need to find this damned time device and shut it down for good.”
“That may be difficult,” Kasumi added, looking slightly worried. “I hope we can do it without causing any problems but we have to face the fact it may be hazardous.”

“No choice,” he replied, sighing. “It needs to be done and we're the ones who have to do it. Luckily we'll have a lot of help.” They were all quiet for a moment, thinking about it. Finally, Aiko stirred.

“Was it my imagination or did the old priest know something?” Ranma looked at her, raising an eyebrow. “About you,” she clarified. “There was something about his face and yours too. Like you were having a slightly different conversation than the rest of us were hearing.”

He smiled mysteriously at her. “It's not impossible he might have some interesting ideas, yes. He's pretty shrewd. I doubt he's worked it all out, though, not yet.”

“Aren't you worried?” Nabiki asked. He shook his head.

“No. Even if he did work it out, all of it, which is pretty unlikely since he doesn't know all that much about the Nerima parts, he'd never tell anyone. That I'm sure of. And he knows I know.” Ranma glanced at Kasumi, who looked back, amusement on her features. “And I know he knows I know. And...”

“OK, OK, we get the idea,” Aiko giggled, making him snicker. “So there's no danger.”

“Not from him. He's a good man and knows when to keep his mouth shut.” The black-haired young man smiled. “I like the guy a lot. He's certainly helped a lot in this case. Without him, Rei would quite likely have been much more difficult.”

“He seemed very taken with Lldnr'k and Hnther,” Kasumi smiled.

“I noticed. I think he doesn’t get to talk to many demons.”

Aiko laughed again. “Being a priest, I'm not entirely surprised.” She stood up. “I'm going to go get the others, it looks like Usagi has gone home now, so with some luck we won't need to hang around her all night. The others are all still asleep.” Both Tendos and Ranma nodded, having been keeping part of their attention on a number of live feeds from the cameras still discreetly watching the magical girls. The one covering Hotaru and Haruka was holding back enough to give them some privacy while still allowing them to see if anything untoward happened. As she vanished, they all closed their eyes.

“It's a bit annoying we have to be ready at any moment to go intervene,” Nabiki commented slightly grumpily. Her sister smiled at her.

“That is more or less our normal lifestyle, Nabiki. Admittedly it's not normally magical girls in a fight to the death, but we're on call twenty four hours a day in some ways. Luckily most days nothing happens or it's fairly minor but every now and then...” She shrugged slightly. Nabiki sighed.

“I know, I know. It just seems so... stupid.”

Ranma frowned a little. “That's true enough. This whole situation is completely nuts even by our standards. Haruka was right, it sounds crazy. Unfortunately, crazy or not, it's real, and there isn't really anyone else to deal with it. Us, Ami and Rei, Hnther and Lldnr'k, anyone else we call in, we all have our parts to play.”

“We do seem to be building quite the little disaster management team,” the middle sister noted with a smile. “We're going to have to come up with a logo and team motto at this rate.” He sighed, looking at her with amused irritation.

“I am not starting some sort of idiotic magical girl organization, or union, or anything like that,” he said with good-natured exasperation, making both sisters giggle. “Life is complicated enough already.”

“We do seem to be heading that direction in some ways, dear,” his wife told him, leaning against him, then kissing him lightly.

“Magical Girls Incorporated,” Nabiki announced, grinning and waving her arms dramatically. “For all your supernatural disasters, call us.”

“Fixing them, or creating them?” he inquired with a wry smile. She laughed.

“Both, clearly. And we can have Magical Girls Import/Export as well, as a subdivision. I'll run that, you two do the main company. Aiko can handle the Transportation division. Misaki is Engineering, Fumiko and Tamiko can do customer relations, I'll have to think about Onkra's speciality but I'm sure there's a place for her, we're an all-inclusive sort of organisation.” She was laughing so hard by this point she had to stop speaking.

“Perhaps Space Operations, she seemed very taken by asteroid exploration,” Kasumi suggested, also laughing. “Ami could come on board in the Intelligence section, since you'd be busy with the interworld trade.” Ranma looked between them, shaking his head in loving amusement.

“You're both more nuts than I am,” he offered. They looked at each other then collapsed into giggles. When Aiko reappeared shortly afterwards with the others, they all looked around curiously. He smiled at them, shrugging when Aiko raised her eyebrows.

“They're both crazy,” he told her.

“Well, yes, I know that,” she replied with a grin. “We all are. What's the joke?” Sighing again he explained, which resulted in four more hysterically laughing girls. Shaking his head he got up to make coffee, laughter following him into the kitchen, where he busied himself, smiling.

“Ami would enjoy this, I suspect.” Aiko said quietly, floating on her back in the dark near the reef that surrounded the lagoon, intermittent motions making the water glow with phosphorescence. “Do you think we can let her in on it at some point?” Ranma, from where she was sitting with Kasumi a few meters away on the reef watching the surf break on the other side with a dull roar, looked over her shoulder at the brunette mermaid.

“I'd like to, I admit. I've always kind of both liked and respected her, she was the sensible one, and has the right attitude. The recent problems have shown that even more. Rei is sort of growing on me as well, so is Hotaru. I'm still thinking about it. Adding them to the wards would solve some problems, sure, but it would also create some potential issues. It makes me a little nervous telling anyone else about all this.” The red-head sighed gently. “Perhaps that's just habit, needless paranoia by now.”

“Unlike the needful paranoia you have in such large quantities, you mean?” her friend asked with a giggle. She nodded, smiling.

“Exactly.”

“I don't think it would cause any harm,” Kasumi interjected, “and might cause a lot of good. Showing them we trust them with such a large part of our lives would go a long way towards making them trust us as well. Ami does, I know, but Rei and Hotaru are still a little worried about all this being some sort of... well, not trick, as such, but horrible mistake. Getting proof from the moon will help, of course, but anything else we can do we should. All three of them are decent people.” Her husband looked at her for a while, nodding slowly.

“You may be right. It's just a large step to take. And irreversible.”

“You took it with Uthryyl, look how that turned out,” Nabiki added, swimming up and floating with her head sticking out of the water, moving her tail and hands slightly to keep her in one place. The other three young women arrived seconds later, doing the same. Turning around on her spot the martial artist faced her friends and family, looking down at them, then nodded again.

“Very true and a good point. I made three friends for life, opening up all sorts of possibilities for all of us and them as well. But the situation is different in this case.”

“The security spell should minimise the risk, dear,” Kasumi told her gently. “Perhaps you should talk to Uthryyl about it as well. He always gives good advice. As far as I'm concerned, it's your decision, the biggest secret is yours, but we all have a stake in it and I think most of us are all right with those three knowing.” She looked around at the assembled women, who nodded silently. “It also opens up the possibility of teaching them some real fighting skills, something they need, as you've said many times.”

“I was going to do that anyway,” Ranma noted, smiling a little. “And see about getting Hotaru's healing working more effectively. We don't need to tell them everything for that.”

“It would make it easier, though,” her wife commented. She sighed slightly, slipping into the water and shimmering into mer-form.

“Agreed.” Flipping onto her back she stared at the brilliant stars for a while, the others silent, her crystalline blue eyes almost glowing in the dark. “I'll talk to Uthryyl, and think about it. There's no immediate rush.”

“Thank you, dear,” Kasumi said gently, joining her in the water and hugging her. “I know why you have so much trouble with this after all this time and I'm glad you're considering it even so. I'll go along with whatever you decide. It will be the right decision.” They embraced again, then the elder Tendo smiled in a different way, a flash of golden light and a muffled pop sounding from under the water. Ranma yelped in surprise as her wife shot away at high speed in a cloud of glowing bubbles, before following, giggling furiously. The five left behind burst out laughing, dispersing across the lagoon moments later.

'Circling high about the little atoll Nabiki looked down at it, watching the trails of light that were her friends and relatives swimming back and forth in the lagoon, before returning her attention to the view. A huge number of stars were visible from horizon to horizon, her enhanced vision in this form able to make out the colours of many of them, also resolving far more than an unaided human eye could otherwise manage. She smiled to herself.

'Despite everything, I'm very glad my life went this way,' she told Jun.

'I am pleased about that. I also enjoy the fact that we came together, which would not have occurred without you gaining these abilities, Nabiki,# the SI replied with a tone of satisfaction.

'What do you think about letting Ami and the other two in on all this?' she asked it curiously. The machine didn't respond for a moment.
Ranma is of course correct that it is something of a security risk, always a potential concern. She has very good instincts for such things. # Jun finally said, sounding approving. # The safest course would be to keep the status quo for as long as possible. However, in my estimation, Ami would be a valuable addition to the circle of people built around your sister and her husband, she has a very high intelligence and considerable potential. I would judge the security risk to you, and the rest of your group, to be minimal in her case. Rei and Hotaru are more problematic. Both are also potentially very powerful, Hotaru more so than Rei. While they would be useful allies, it would be necessary to train both of them to overcome their own issues. I have no doubt Ranma and Kasumi could do this but it would take a certain amount of time.

‘Worth the risk?’

In the long run, yes, I believe so. In the short term it could be annoying. # The SI sounded amused, making her giggle. # Ranma has a low tolerance for gratuitous ignorance, although a remarkable level of patience and capacity to teach when the student genuinely wishes to learn. Rei might trigger some responses she would regret if she allowed her temper to get the better of her in the manner seen in some of the interactions Fumiko had with them. I doubt this attitude would last long, though. # She could almost swear it was laughing. Giggling, she nodded, flapping gently to regain altitude for a few seconds, then resuming gliding.

‘We'll have to wait and see what she decides, I guess. Sis is right, the biggest secrets are hers, the decision should be as well.’

What are your own feelings on the subject? # Jun asked curiously. She thought for a little while.

‘I don't mind, I think. I'm used to all this now. Telling another magical girl would be much easier than either my family or my non-magical friends, like Miki. Ami has similar problems, she'd understand the issues. In some ways it might be nice to compare notes. I like her, talking to her today made me think she could be a very good friend. She's clearly extremely smart and knowledgeable. She also needs friends. I remember what that was like.’ Falling silent, she headed away from the island, going south, just out of curiosity. The very beginnings of dawn were starting in the east, only visible because she was close to three kilometres up. ‘I'm not quite so sure about Rei yet but I think she means well, just is a little quick to judge. Like you said, Hotaru is very unsure of herself. I think she's had a hard life in some ways. She seems very nice, though.’

A faint flash of light at a considerable distance, nearly on the horizon, caught her attention. She turned in that direction, staring hard, wondering what it was. After a moment’s thought she resumed flapping, pushing her speed up to a little over a hundred kph, heading towards the distant light, which had settled down into a dim orange glow. A few minutes later she was close enough to see it clearly.

It would appear to be a fishing boat, Nabiki. # Jun remarked. # The engine-room is clearly on fire. I believe the flash you detected was a fuel explosion. #

‘That looks bad,’ she said, speeding up a little. The large trawler was still many kilometres away, flames visible for a long distance.

They are radioing a low power distress call, but I can detect no satellite emergency transmitter. It is unlikely anyone else can hear them. We are a very long way off any commercial routes, even for air travel, if their call was received it would take hours for a rescue craft to reach them. # Jun sent her the voice of a panicked sounding man speaking English with an accent she hadn't encountered before, frantically calling for help. The name of the ship turned out to be the Samantha James.
'I guess it's up to us, then.' She commed the others back on the island, feeding them video. "Guys, we're still on the clock, it looks like."

"We're on our way," Ranma replied. Seconds later six more flying forms appeared a few hundred metres behind and below her.

"That's the first time I've tried an air to air teleport," Aiko told them, sounding impressed with herself and pleased. "It worked pretty well but I was out a bit on altitude." They listened to the distress call which repeated itself, the man on the radio sounding scared and defeated.

"Let's get closer. Nabiki, let them know we're coming, then you help me with the fire. Kas, you and Aiko check the casualties, the rest of you go in the water, get their people out. There are a lot of sharks around these waters, which isn't going to end well if they turn up." As soon as Nabiki had joined them they teleported again, appearing half a kilometre to one side and three kilometres above the ship. All of them dived towards it, the middle sister reverting to Azumi at the same time Ranma and Kasumi took on their magical girl alter-egos. "Better use the bracelet this time. And no names. This is going to be weird even in magical girl terms," 'Yori' suggested. 'Azumi' nodded, activating it with a thought. She could feel similar magic from her sister and sister-in-law as they duplicated the effect themselves.

Matt looked out of the wheelhouse to the burning engine-room, flames pouring out of the aft hatch, then keyed the VHF microphone in his hand once more, even while speaking knowing it was pretty much hopeless. "Mayday Mayday Mayday, Trawler Samantha James, out of Tauranga, New Zealand, declaring an emergency. We have an uncontrollable fire in our engine room. Engines out, fire suppression system depleted, both life rafts damaged and unusable. Three crew-members are severely injured with life-threatening wounds. Two are in the water, condition unknown. Request assistance immediately. Mayday Mayday Mayday." He released the key, hoping desperately to hear a reply while knowing it wouldn't happen. They were at least a thousand kilometres from the nearest port and quite likely as far from anyone else with a radio. The likelihood of someone even hearing him was close to zero and as far as getting there before the boat burned to the waterline...

He shook his head, glancing back out the window to where his remaining crew were frantically pumping seawater onto the fire with hand-operated pumps, futilely attempting to bring it under control, then looked at the rear of the ship where he could see what was left of the long range antenna and the emergency locater transmitter, both of which had been destroyed in the initial explosion, which had destroyed the starboard ten-person life raft completely and partly melted the one on the other side. 'What the fuck happened?' he wondered for the hundredth time, having no idea how the engine room could have simply exploded like that. The engine was a diesel one, hardly likely to suddenly blow up, leaving aside the fact that diesel fuel wasn't easy to light. Unfortunately, it burned very well and very hot if you did manage to get it going. The fifteen metre flames coming out of the hatch showed that pretty well.

The steel deck was warping in the heat, the roar of the flames not quite covering the creaking noises and occasional cracks as welds snapped. Whatever happened, the ship was a write-off, he idly thought, not sure why he was even considering that under the circumstances. It was much more likely that no one would ever know what happened to them. Just another in a long line of mysteriously vanished ships in the South Pacific. Ducking involuntarily as the flames jumped higher with a loud thud probably caused by one of the emergency fuel barrels exploding, he raised the mic and repeated the distress call.

Giving up he dropped the mic to the chart table and headed to the door to help his crew battle the fire, knowing it was the last thing he'd do. “Going down with the ship, I guess,” he thought, black humour suffusing him as he smiled grimly.

“Samantha James, your distress call received and understood. Medical and fire fighting aid inbound, arrival imminent. Please stand clear of the fire. Have your casualties ready for treatment.” He stopped dead in the doorway, his hand on the latch, then slowly turned to stare at the radio. It looked back placidly, the indicator lights showing the emergency battery was still operational. Diving for it as his shocked paralysis wore off suddenly he fumbled for the microphone.

“This is Captain Matthew Connelly of the Samantha James. Please repeat.”

“Aid is inbound. ETA twenty seconds. Clear the deck and stand by.” The female voice with a slight accent, Japanese he thought, sounded worryingly competent and rather cold. He stared at the mic in his hand for a long moment, then dropped it, diving out of the wheelhouse, yelling and waving his arms. His crew looked up from the fire fighting.

“Everyone get back! Clear the deck!” he barked, his voice suddenly full of hope. He pointed to his first mate. “Chad, get the casualties up at the bow, right now. Hurry.” The man looked shocked but dropped the hose he was holding, motioning to the other two men with him urgently, all three of them sprinting along the deck to the forward cabin. Flipping the switch beside the searchlight on the side railing he held his breath, smiling when it lit. Installing the forward emergency battery bank the year before had been a good idea. Pity he hadn't thought to connect it to the pumps. Swivelling the light around he panned it across the water, looking for the ship that had made the response. Nothing was visible. No navigation lights, searchlights, nothing. Puzzled, he looked around, cocking his head at a faint whistling noise, barely audible over the sound of the flames.

'What the hell is that?' he wondered. 'Sounds like something...’ He looked up. Faintly visible in the five AM dawn light, half a dozen or so shapes were dropping rapidly towards the ship. Very rapidly. Very rapidly indeed...

With a yelp he hit the floor as a series of loud bangs sounded in a ripple of noise, three or four on the ship, the rest off to either side. A number of splashes sounded immediately afterwards. Shouts of alarm came from the bow where his crew was gathering. Sitting up he looked at the deck in total shock, watching as the four... women? folded their wings and looked around. “Holy shit...” he breathed. Two of them headed towards the fire, which seconds later began diminishing, a huge cloud of fog or steam coming from somewhere, covering it and the female figures and hiding them from view with an enormous hissing sound. The deck became very cold for a few seconds.

The other two walked towards the bow. He jumped to his feet and shot down the ladder to meet them as they went past. The taller one stopped and smiled at him. “Hello. Are you Captain Connelly?” He nodded dumbly, staring in disbelief. She really did have wings, huge ones, covered in what looked like fine golden-blonde fur and neatly folded behind her. She held out her hand, which he took after a few seconds, hesitantly.

“We're here to help. The fire is nearly out, now, so let's see to your casualties.” Turning she walked towards the bow, her companion beside her, while he followed, staring in amazement. He noticed numbly she had a tail as well. Behind him the roar of the fire had stopped, only intermittent hissing sounds still coming from it. Chad and the other two crewmen looked at the two females as they walked over to the three other men lying on the deck, covered in what bandages they'd been able to come up with, two of them badly burned and unconscious, the other one with a crushed leg, soaked in blood. He was moaning in pain despite the amount of morphine they'd pumped into him.

“Captain?” Chad ventured, stepping back warily as the blonde knelt next to the crewman with the bad leg. “What's going on? Who the hell are these... people...” His voice trailed off as he became more aware of the non-standard features of the two women. Eyes wide, he looked at them in shock, crossing himself and stepping away.

“They're help, I think. The miracle we needed.” Matt shook his head, looking around at his crewmen. “Other than that, your guess is as good as mine.” They stayed back, watching in renewed shock as the blonde woman put her hands on the injured man, a golden glow coming from between her fingers. He stopped moaning instantly, suddenly and deeply unconscious. “What did you do?” he asked, worried. She smiled up at him.

“I just turned his consciousness off for the moment. He was in a lot of pain. Does he drink much?” Beside him, Chad nodded.

“Too much. Whenever we're at home he's drunk most of the time, but he doesn't drink when we're at sea.”

“I thought so. Alcohol abuse can increase tolerance for opiates, which leads to it being inadequate at normal doses. The morphine you used wasn't enough to deal with the pain.” She returned her attention to the man on the deck, speaking quick Japanese to her colleague, who carefully applied traction to the leg, making the men watching wince at the squelching crack it produced as the bones realigned. They stared in amazement as the blonde winged woman ran glowing hands slowly down their friend's leg, which visibly healed in seconds. Shortly she rocked back on her heels.

“That should do it for now. I'll deal with the liver problems from the alcohol after these other two are fixed.”

Matt looked at Chad in shock, then both of them stared at the woman, who had moved on to the most severely burned man. “Fuck me,” Chad breathed almost inaudibly.

Two more females approached from the stern, the two who had gone to deal with the fire. One was quite petite, with very long black hair in a braid, but gave an impression of barely restrained danger, while the other radiated a cold competence, her silver hair glinting in the lights. “The fire is out,” this one said, her voice identifying her as the one he'd spoken to on the radio. She stopped beside him while the other one knelt beside the final casualty, her purple-glowing hands quickly beginning to turn blistered and seeping flesh back into healthy skin. The silver-haired one looked at him.

“Both your crew members who were in the water have been located, Captain,” she added, her voice calm. “Our people are bringing them aboard. One has a broken arm, the other is just cold and in shock. They'll be fine.”

Matt looked at her, then around at the other three. “Who are you people?” he asked, feeling faint. “And what?” She smiled slightly.

“We're friends. Luckily for you we were in the area.” Looking at him for a moment, she added, “You're a very long way from home, Captain. Tauranga is two thousand six hundred and twenty three kilometres that way.” She pointed off to one side without looking. For some reason he suspected she was accurate to the metre. “Do you normally go so far looking for fish?”

“It's not unusual,” he replied, wondering at the ordinariness of the conversation. “We haven't been in these waters before, though. It's a long way off the normal fishing routes. That could have been the end of us if you lot hadn't turned up.”

“Your ship is badly damaged,” she told him, glancing back towards the stern. “From what I could see the engine room is completely destroyed, the hull doesn't look too good either, although we couldn't find any serious leaks. It's floating but that's about it.”

He sighed. “I know, it's beyond salvaging. The hull would need a complete rebuild after a fire like that, even if the engines were intact. It would be cheaper to scrap it and buy a new one rather than repair this.” He looked around. “It was a good ship. I've sailed on her for a long time. I'll miss her.” She smiled remarkably sympathetically at him, seeming abruptly less intimidating.

“I'm sorry about that. I wish we could have gotten here sooner, but it was complete chance we even heard your distress call.” She looked over her shoulder as three more women came around the wheelhouse, two of them helping his missing crewmen, both of them soaked to the skin and shivering. “At least you all survived.”

“That's something. But we're still... a little more than twenty-six hundred kilometres from home.” he smiled slightly at her, making her grin. “And probably as far from anyone else other than you. How are we going to get back? We can't fly.” The short woman who had just finished healing the burned crewman stood up, turning to him, as the silver haired one looked at her.

“There is a way but you're going to find it a bit odd. It's safe, though.” Her rich voice was full of amusement, making him slightly apprehensive. She grinned at his expression. “Don't worry. It will be something to tell your friends.”

“None of my friends will ever believe any of this,” he muttered. She snickered.

“Thereir loss.” Turning to the man with the broken arm she healed it in a few seconds. “OK, I think that's the last of the injuries. Let's see about getting you guys home.” Walking to the bow, she peered over the side, then looked around, before nodding. Curious, he followed her, glancing up at the sky which was slowly lightening. Soon the sun would rise. The water surrounding them was remarkably calm, not at all affected by the panic that had been on board only minutes before.

“What are you going to do?” he asked. She grinned.

“This.” Waving her hand theatrically in a gesture towards ocean in front of the ship, she looked amused as he gasped. Behind him he heard a couple of men swear before it went dead quiet, only the creaking and groaning of the ship moving slightly on the water breaking the silence. He stared at the glowing blue tear in space hanging in front of the bow, shock on his face, before looking at the winged woman, who seemed satisfied. A faint crackle came from the manifestation as it grew, reaching down to the water and up to above the highest point of the ship, before stabilising at this new size.

“That should do it.” Glancing at his gaping mouth, she gently closed it with one finger, before looking over her shoulder and nodding. Four of her companions slipped over the side, including the silver-haired one, with barely a splash. Matt was sure he'd seen them shimmer slightly as they vanished, their wings wavering out of existence. He grabbed at the railing as the ship jerked slightly then began slowly moving towards the glowing blue apparition.

“What the fuck is that?” he squeaked, pointing at the thing. She looked at it for a moment.

“Oh, it's a portal to another reality,” she explained casually. “They'll push your ship through, then we'll open another one to just off the coast of New Zealand and push it back. You should be fine then. It's very difficult to open a portal to a place in the same reality which is why we have to do it in stages like this. Annoying, but what can you do?” She shrugged slightly. He stared at her, then at the blue tear.

“Do we have to do anything?” he asked weakly. She shook her head.
“Nope. Just enjoy the ride. Not many people see this.” The bow of the ship entered the ‘portal’ with a louder crackling sound, making him and his crew all jump slightly. One or two of them moved away, heading back towards the other end of the ship. She watched for a moment with a smile, then went back to observing the progress of the operation. Steeling himself he closed his eyes as the blue glow reached them, then opened them again a few seconds later when he didn't feel anything. Brilliant sunlight greeted him, along with bright green water surrounding the ship. Looking around in shock he stared over his shoulder to see half the ship was still on the other side of the portal, more and more coming through steadily. His crew talked rapidly, looking around in amazement.

“Welcome to K’nn nine. It's an agricultural and recreational world in the K’nn grouping,” the woman beside him said, her voice full of laughter. He stared at her, then around at the view. “Look up,” she suggested. He did so, then froze, his crewmen going silent one by one as they did the same.

“Oh my god,” he breathed.

“Good, isn't it? Best ring system I've ever seen, from close up at any rate.” She chuckled. “Something else to tell your friends.” Behind the ship, as the stern slipped through, the portal closed with a loud pop. He jumped, looking at her smiling at him.

“Um, Captain?” Chad sounded worried. He looked over at the man, then in the direction he was pointing. Some sort of flying machine was approaching rapidly. They all stared as it zipped up, stopping dead a few tens of metres away, simply hanging in the air in a very improbable manner, emitting a faint hum.

“What the hell is that?” he asked warily. The young woman glanced at him. “Customs. Hang on a moment.” She waved to the aircraft, or spacecraft, or whatever it was, the thing looked like something out of an SF film. It moved closer, stopping five or six metres away. Through a darkened window he could see several figures moving around, none of them even as human looking as the flying women with tails were. Matt felt a chill as inhuman eyes inspected him. There was silence from the girl beside him for half a minute, then she nodded, waving to the aircraft again, which dipped it's nose slightly, before spinning around on the spot, shooting off into the distance at high speed and vanishing over the horizon seconds later. “That's all sorted out. They like to keep an eye on who comes and goes, just in case, portals opening where they're not expecting them attract a certain amount of official attention. Understandable really.”

“I can see where it would be,” Matt managed to say. She clapped him on the shoulder. “Right. Let's get you guys back.” Shortly another portal opened, enlarging in the same manner the first one had. The Samantha James headed steadily towards it. This time he kept his eyes open, finding the travel through the portal to be very anti-climactic, only a blue glow surrounding them for a second or so with no sensation. Once again they were in darkness, stars above showing through light cloud. A few kilometres away he saw familiar lights glimmering in the dark.

“That's Tauranga!” he gasped, pointing. She smiled. “Correct. We're about four kilometres off shore out of the shipping lanes. You can call for assistance and a tow from here.” The woman held out her hand. After a long moment he took it, shaking it gratefully although with a certain amount of stunned disbelief. “It's been nice meeting you, Captain. I'm very sorry about your ship. Hopefully you have insurance?” Matt nodded. “Good. With some luck you should be at sea again in the near future. It might be a good idea to check the fuel lines on your next ship. It looked to me like one of them had managed to leak into the exhaust manifold, which produced a cloud of vapour that got ignited by a spark. That would account for the explosion. Like a fuel-air bomb, I suppose.”

“That would do it,” he agreed. A look of anger crossed his face. “I think I need to talk to the maintenance company who did the most recent refit. The fuel lines shouldn't go anywhere near the exhaust.”

“Good luck with that.” She smiled again, then turned as the four woman who had jumped over the side climbed back. “We'll be on our way now. We have to get back.” She waved to the rest of the crew who were watching from a safe distance, a number of shocked expressions present. One or two of them waved back reflexively. With a last smile at him she stepped up onto the railing, spread her wings, then leaped into the sky with a powerful flap, rapidly ascending into the darkness. The others did the same. Soon he was staring up at barely visible dots high above. A bright rainbow-tinted flash came, making him blink, and when his vision cleared he couldn't see anything but the stars. Feeling a presence standing behind him he turned to see his first mate staring up as well.

“What the fuck just happened?” Chad asked quietly. He shrugged helplessly.

“I haven't got a clue, except that somehow we're alive when we shouldn't be.” Walking towards the stern he stopped at the base of the ladder to the bridge, looking at the twisted and blackened wreckage at the rear of the boat, proof of how hot the fire had been. The poor vessel was beginning to list gently to starboard as numerous tiny leaks made their presence felt. He didn't think it would last more than another few hours. “Not a fucking clue. No one is ever going to believe this.” He started climbing the ladder, Chad following, shaking his head.

“We have the GPS, the logs will prove where we were I guess,” the first mate said.

“True. But it's still going to be one of those 'weird shit happens at sea' stories. Perhaps we should just keep quiet about that part. The fire is real enough, that should keep the insurance company happy. Or not. You know what I mean.” Entering the cabin he picked up the mic, glancing at his old friend. “I don't think anyone will believe that we went to another world or whatever it was. Never mind got rescued by flying Japanese girls.” Chad shrugged as he keyed the mic.

“This is the trawler Samantha James calling, we need a tow. We've had a fire on board. The engine room is destroyed, we are adrift at the following coordinates…” He read the figures from the screen of the GPS. “No casualties. Everyone is fine.” Releasing the transmit key he waited for a reply, suddenly smiling.

Relaxing into bed in her room, Nabiki rolled over and closed her eyes, feeling pleased. It had been a long and strange day, but overall worthwhile. She was asleep very soon after.
"Hello, Sergeant." The familiar voice made Harada look over his shoulder, smiling, as Chou came up and fell into step with him while he walked along the pavement. The blonde smiled back. "I haven't seen you since we left. How are you? And Emiko?"

"We're both doing very well, thanks, Chou. The baby is too according to the latest scans. How was your holiday?"

Looking pleased, the magical girl laughed. "It was very interesting indeed. We met a number of old friends, made some new ones, dealt with a few minor problems... You know, more or less the usual." Harada chuckled.

"I can imagine. Or perhaps I can't, you people know some very strange individuals." The tall woman laughed again.

"Oh, we do indeed. Some might say we are very strange individuals." She grinned at him. "I can't see it myself."

"I hope it was relaxing, at any rate. You guys deserved a break after that entire portal bomb thing, especially the way it ended." She nodded, sighing very faintly.

"That wasn't much fun, no. We at least managed to unwind quite a lot before we had to return early to deal with this trouble in Azuba-Juuban. That's being somewhat irritating." He glanced at her, then also sighed, more loudly.

"That, I'll agree with completely. I'm very sorry it's happened but very glad it happened somewhere else." This made her giggle a little.

"Yes, so am I. It would be beyond annoying to have all that damage here. Although there was enough from the earlier incident that Fumiko and Tamiko dealt with." She shook her head in irritation. "Poor Mr Singh. His curry restaurant required considerable work. It's only just reopened."

"He was extremely pleased about how quickly your contractors sorted it all out," the sergeant replied, shooting her a quick sideways glance. The woman beside him looked amused.

"Our contractors? It was the magical girl reimbursement fund who hired them from what I hear." She looked back with sly grin, causing him to snicker.

"And we all know who's behind that innovation even if the people involved don't like spreading it about, don't we?"

"It seems immodest to shout it from the rooftops," Chou said serenely, a twinkle in her eye. "Although, privately, we're both very pleased with how well it's worked out over the years. These recent problems have stretched it a little but it's managing." He grinned, wondering not for the first time what their source of income was for the fund, but too polite to ask.

"I saw on the news that the fund is involved in the rebuilding work in Azuba-Juuban as well. I didn't think it covered that area." Chou grimaced delicately.
"Normally it wouldn't, but there are... complex circumstances... covering the current issues with those girls. Since we were involved in the operation to deal with them we thought it best to help out. Sorry, I mean the fund thought it best." The young woman smiled as he laughed, nodding understandingly. "I can't go into the details at the moment, it's still ongoing and there are a lot of threads to tie up, but hopefully when everything is sorted I can give you at least a background report for your records, just to keep things straight. I know how interested you are in the magical girl politics in Minato."

"While sometimes it's a bit terrifying, overall I do find it very interesting," he admitted. "And it's sometimes useful. For a while now I seem to have been considered the de-facto magical girl expert in law enforcement. I get a surprising amount of enquiries from other police districts, the PSIA, and every now and then certain foreign agencies, through them. Recently M15, the RCMP, LAPD, and that Australian one, the ASIO, for example. For obvious reasons." He looked at her as she nodded. "I hope that doesn't bother you. I know how private you and Yori are."

She smiled at him, shaking her head. "No, it's not a problem. Most of what we let you know is public information, or at least nothing we have problems with being distributed to people with a reason to know. If we ever need to tell you something we don't want repeated, we'll inform you about it. Both of us feel we could trust you if that was necessary." Feeling oddly pleased, he nodded, a small grin coming and going.

"Thank you, Chou." They walked along in companionable silence for a few dozen metres, occasionally waving to people either one knew. "If you don't mind me asking, is it likely that the sort of incident we had last week will happen again?" he finally asked tentatively. The woman beside him sighed gently.

"I'm not sure. As I said, I'm not free to go into the details, but there were some extenuating circumstances. Not ideal ones but it wasn't entirely their fault. We're still working on the problem. It looks likely that we have stopped at least four of them from doing anything excessive in future, but the remaining five are... something of a complicated issue. Colleagues of ours, some very prominent specialist mages, are currently researching that issue. We've had a few possibly effective ideas but nothing concrete yet. It may take some time to resolve." She frowned at the pavement as she walked, thoughtfully. "Hopefully not too much time, but at this point we just don't know, I'm afraid."

"That group has managed to ruin their reputation fairly comprehensively with those two disasters," he noted glumly. "Three, if you count the one here, but that got dealt with very efficiently by Fumiko and Tamiko, so no one was too bothered after the fact." She nodded slightly, looking upset.

"Yes. They've been more trouble than normal for some time but that mall incident really was the last straw. The fight the next day was just adding insult to injury. Yori and I are both out of patience. Even though there are, as I mentioned, extenuating circumstances in play, if anything else happens we will have to deal with it very harshly. It will be the last such incident if it happens, I can assure you." Her normally light friendly voice had gone nearly as cold as that of that rather disturbing Azumi girl. He looked at her for a moment then nodded.

"Hopefully that won't be necessary."

"Hopefully." She didn't sound completely convinced.

As they reached a nearby coffee-shop, they spotted a small figure entering it, both watching for a moment. "Isn't that the demon who triggered the fight here?" Harada asked curiously. Chou smiled.
"Xrist. Yes. He's the biggest caffeine addict I've ever met. Harmless, pays well, but totally addicted to coffee." She laughed slightly, stopping in the door of the shop and peering in. Waving, she called something in that weird demonic language, giggling at the reply. Harada looked past her to see the little alien form of Xrist sitting on a chair, handing over a small glittery bar of gold to Hikaru, who pushed a large cup of his best cappuccino across the counter in exchange, appearing very pleased. Inspecting the gold, which was at least a hundred times the worth of the coffee, he opened the till and dropped it in, looking up and grinning at the sergeant.

"Hey, Tetsuo! And Chou as well! Would either of you like a coffee?" Harada looked at the magical girl, who shrugged a little, smiling.

"Why not?" They entered, sitting on either side of the demon, who raised his cup in salute to Chou, then took a deep drink from it, sighing in pleasure.

"Oh, that's good," he moaned in pleasure, his accent weird to Harada but completely understandable. The policeman grinned at the blonde over his head, before turning to Hikaru who was looking amused.

"I'll just have the usual, thanks," he said. Chou nodded when the owner glanced at her.

"The same, thank you, Hikaru," she requested politely. Turning away the man prepared the drinks, adding one for himself. He handed them over, before sipping his own. Turning his attention to the magical girl he waited politely until she'd tried her drink, nodding in pleased satisfaction.

"I hear you went on holiday," he commented. She smiled at him.

"Yes. Unfortunately we had to cut it short due to the problems in Azuba-Juuban, which is somewhat annoying, but we had a good time." He nodded understandingly.

"I saw the news. Looks like Yori was a bit pissed off." Inspecting her, he asked, "Are you all right? That magic the other girl used looked damn powerful."

"I'm fine, thank you, Hikaru," she replied, smiling a little. "It was quite painful but not serious. I'm just a little embarrassed I didn't manage to get out of the way in time." He chuckled at this.

"From what I know those girls are very dangerous." He took another sip of coffee. "Not as dangerous as you or Yori, clearly, but nothing to play around with."

Xrist nodded vigorously, looking up. "They're completely crazy as well," he added. "I really thought I was going to die that time they chased me. Didn't even stop to ask questions, they just opened fire as soon as they saw me. If it wasn't for all that fancy prancing about they do I'd never have been able to escape." He sighed as the three humans exchanged amused glances. "So unfriendly. It doesn't make a good impression on visitors, that sort of attitude." Grumbling slightly, he drank out of his cup, putting the empty vessel back on the counter. "Can I have another one, please?" he asked brightly, showing dozens of tiny gleaming fangs in an ingratiating smile. Hikaru grinned and refilled his cup.

"Those girls are somewhat quick off the mark," Chou agreed, nodding to the demon. "With a bit of luck, though, we should be able to resolve the problem fairly soon."

"I hope so," Xrist said acerbically. "None of my friends dare come here at the moment, in case they pop out of the woodwork again and start shooting at them." He shook his head in disgust. "I've got half a mind to complain." After a moment, he looked puzzled. "Who would I complain to?" he asked, looking around at them. They all exchanged glances again, before starting to laugh.
Agent Naito picked up his desk phone when it bleeped at him, putting it to his ear without looking away from the report he was reading. "Naito."

"Ah, Agent. Good, I wasn't sure if you were in the office at the moment." The deep voice of the Director-General made him blink slightly, unsure why he would be calling.

"Hello, Director-General. What can I do for you?"

"We have an interesting operation for which your presence was requested. You may well find it fascinating, although it's somewhat unusual even by Special Activities Office standards. Would you come to my office immediately, please? This isn't something we can discuss over the phone." The voice sounded intrigued, slightly puzzled, and also weirdly amused, all at the same time. Naito lifted the handset from his ear and looked curiously at it for a second before putting it back.

"Certainly, sir. I'm on my way." He was already shutting down his computer. Shortly he stepped out of the elevator on the ninth floor, looking around curiously, as it wasn't somewhere he spent a lot of time, before heading to the Director-General's office. Inside, the man's secretary, a pretty woman he happened to know could shoot you between the eyes at fifty metres with no effort at all, smiled at him.

"He's expecting you, Agent," she told him, waving to the inner office door. "Go right in." Nodding his thanks he pulled the door open, entering and glancing about. Spotting the man he'd come to see behind his fairly impressive desk, he walked over, only to stop when he saw who was sitting in a chair on the other side of the desk, someone who had been hidden by the high back until he got close enough.

"Hello, Agent," Yori said with a wide grin. He smiled back, suddenly sure that this operation would be very weird. Then he looked worried, suddenly sure it would be very weird. She snickered at his expression. "Don't panic. You'll like this one. We'll even make sure you get enough sleep first."

Chuckling, he glanced at the Director-General, who waved him to another chair with a small smile.

"I've been very impressed with your work on the portal bomb case, Masao," he said, leaning back in his chair. "A lot of people were. We've learned a lot in the process of dealing with those damn terrorists as well, things we've wondered about for a long time, at least in part due to your activities, and professionalism in dealing with the... special talent." He glanced at Yori with another tiny smile. She saluted him with a forefinger, grinning.

"Thank you, Sir. It's been very interesting, I have to admit, although somewhat tiring." Yori giggled a little, causing him to smile as well. "But I've enjoyed it, overall, even though several times I've been scared shi...," he stopped, glancing at the black-haired girl, who giggled even harder, "um, quite significantly," he finished. The Director-General looked at him for a long moment, then nodded again.

"Quite. I can understand your feelings, reading about the various missions has been very... enlightening." He flipped open a folder lying on the desk in front of it and leafed through it for a few seconds. Naito recognised some of the contents as reports he'd written. "Nevertheless, you have acquitted yourself with honour. Your actions reflected well on this organisation internationally, we have closer and better ties with several foreign governments as a direct result, and we've also worked more closely with that same special talent than ever before. Well done indeed."
"Thank you again, Sir." Pleased, he glanced at Yori, who had stopped giggling but was looking amused, then looked back to the Director-General, who closed the folder, placing his hands on it and appearing mildly annoyed.

"This most recent series of problems in Minato, however, threatens to potentially be very bad. Yori and her team have, from what I've been told, brought an end to the most egregious issues, somewhat suddenly going by the news, but I'm also informed that there are other matters in play that could make a bad situation much worse. I haven't been informed quite what those matters are." He cast the magical girl a curious look. She shrugged apologetically.

"I really am sorry about it, but I can't mention much about the situation for a number of reasons. All I can tell you is what I already have."

"Hmm." He looked mildly irritated. "Despite your undoubted remarkable abilities I still find it somewhat curious that you have, technically, a security rating higher than mine, especially as you don't even work for the Japanese government." Yori grinned mysteriously.

"I know some interesting people, who I've helped out in the past. They seem to feel they owe Chou and me a few favours."

"And you keep track, right?" Naito quipped, making her snicker again, looking at him for a moment.

"Yep."

The Director-General gave the impression of someone who was bursting with curiosity but was suppressing it manfully. Naito felt much the same way, although he knew Yori well enough to realise there was no hope of finding out any more without her cooperation, which clearly wasn't going to happen. After a few seconds, the man behind the desk nodded a little.

"All right. Obviously my interest in this matter will have to lie unsatisfied." He turned his attention to his agent again. "Despite the lack of a full briefing, what I've been told is still rather surprising, even under the circumstances. Yori and her girls are going to be doing some investigating very soon, which although they don't strictly require the presence of a PSIA agent for, apparently feel it would be politic to have. As a favour to us, essentially, so we don't feel left out." He smiled more broadly for a few seconds, apparently finding this funny.

"It seemed polite," Yori agreed with a slight laugh in her voice. "We asked for you as we know, like, and trust you." She grinned at Naito, who felt unexpectedly pleased by the compliment.

"Thanks very much, Yori."

She waved a hand grandly. "Think nothing of it, my dear man." Her voice was suddenly one of the most upper-crust ones he'd ever heard, making him stare, then laugh loudly.

"Have you ever wanted to be an astronaut?" she asked in a much more normal tone of voice, but one that had extreme amusement in it. He stopped laughing and stared at her curiously.

"What?" he asked, taken aback by the non-sequitur. She grinned.

"You're going to love this, I think." Pulling a small plastic box from thin air she tossed it to him. Catching it deftly he looked at it, then her, before carefully opening it. Inside was a small device, completely unfamiliar to him. He picked it up and looked curiously at it, turning it over in his hands. Made of something that looked like a cross between a metal and a ceramic, matt black, it was curved and perhaps fifteen centimetres long by five wide, only one thick or so except in the middle of the outer curve, where a three centimetre hemispherical bulge protruded. It was much lighter than he'd have thought likely from the size. After a moment he looked up at the black-haired girl who was watching him with interest.

"What is it?"

She looked amused. "A spacesuit."

There was a long pause.

"A what?"

"A spacesuit. Honest. It's good for three to four weeks of life support, anywhere from five hundred or so degrees centigrade to absolute zero, in quite severe radiation flux as well. You could walk around on Mercury with it on, assuming you didn't fall into a pool of molten lead. That would hurt." He stared at her, then at the Director-General, who was looking as surprised as he felt. Yori snickered at their expressions. "It's not from around here, of course. Don't lose it, they're not enormously cheap." She thought for a moment, then shrugged. "Not hugely expensive, though. Good value for money, let's say." The two men stared at each other blankly, making her laugh.

Agent Naito gaped at her for a while, then stared at the device in his hand, turning it over again. Suddenly he looked suspicious. "Hold on. Why do I need a spacesuit?"

"Well, you're hardly going to be walking around on the moon without one, are you?" She looked taken aback, raising her eyebrows. "Do PSIA agents know how to survive in a vacuum?" He stared hard at her, while the corners of her mouth twitched. Eventually she giggled.

"The moon?" The rest of her words suddenly caught up to him. She nodded, grinning.

"Yes."

He stared again. Then he pointed vaguely upwards. She nodded again.

"That's the one." Reaching out she repositioned his numb arm. "More that way, though." He couldn't seem to be able to remember how to breath for some seconds.

"What...?" Words failed him as he looked helplessly between the girl in the chair and the Director-General, who seemed to be enjoying himself now. "How...? I mean, who...?" She started laughing again. "But...?" Shaking his head firmly, he closed his eyes for a moment, trying to get to grips with things. Taking a deep breath he opened them again and fixed her with his best steely gaze, causing her eyes to widen in mirth, but she politely stopped laughing and waited. "Could you please explain?" he asked very carefully. She nodded, an amused look on her face.

"Of course." He waited. "We need to go to the moon to look for something. Evidence, you might call it. It's key to resolving this case with the magical girl group, although I'm not at liberty to explain quite how at the moment." She smirked a little. "That information is unavailable." Her impression of the horrifying Ms Aoyama was good enough that he shivered for a moment, which clearly amused her. "Technically, since the people who will be giving us a lift aren't part of any nation on earth, the Outer Space Treaty of 1967 doesn't really apply, but we thought it would be a nice gesture to offer a representative of the Japanese government the chance to observe. If anyone ever does complain about it, you're covered then." She grinned at him. "I thought you'd like the opportunity to be that representative." His mouth had been hanging open more and more as she explained, while his mind was going in circles. This was the weirdest thing yet in a recent career that had been very weird even by his standards.
"It's not something we will insist on, Masao," the Director-General told him. "It's purely voluntary. But it was felt you're the best person for the job for a number of reasons." He studied his subordinate. "There is also an increase in security rating by two grades as part of the operation. That brings a small raise with it." Naito switched his gaping stare to the man for a moment, then back to Yori. It took some time before he could work out what to say. Both of them waited patiently while he tried to get his thoughts in order. Finally he closed his mouth.

"Um." He paused again. "The moon? How do we get there?" Yori shrugged.

"In a spaceship, of course."

"You... have a spaceship?" he asked, somehow not as shocked as he felt he should have been. The girl chuckled.

"No, although Fumiko really wants to get one. I keep telling her we don't have anywhere to keep it. But I know a guy who has quite a few. It took me a few days to get in contact with him, he was out," she grinned again, "quite a long way out, but I managed it two nights ago. He's fine with it. Nice guy, you'll like him. Asteroid miner by the name of S'th'kx." Naito stared at her, stunned and lost for words. He glanced at his superior who looked slightly lost as well.

"Can you explain more about this?" the Director-General asked politely. She thought for a moment, clearly trying to work out the best way to do so.

"OK. You know I've told you in the past that a lot of the 'demon worlds' are better described as 'alien worlds'?" Naito nodded, recalling some of their conversations over the last few months. "Some of those worlds are considerably higher-tech than ours is. Some are based on magic, some on technology much like ours, some a mix. S'th'kx comes from a world called K'nn four, it's one of a group of fifteen worlds in several different realities linked by a network of portals. It's pretty close to some of the stuff you'd find in one of the better SF books." She stopped to see if they understood. Both men exchanged glances, then slowly nodded.

"Good. The K'nn worlds do quite a bit of space travel locally. They don't currently use faster than light travel, although they know about it, but they do a lot of zipping around in their own systems. S'th'kx is a major asteroid miner, his company is one of the most profitable on K'nn four, and he has a small fleet of in-system spacecraft ranging from some little exploration ships up to a few large bulk transporters. They mine metals from asteroids, refine it, then ship it back. The sort of thing people here have vaguely talked about for decades but we don't have the technology to do yet."

"And these people do?" the Director-General asked with fascination. She nodded.

"Yep. They're around a century or two ahead of us in most areas of technology. Very good at antigravity systems, something they rolled out quite a while ago. All his ships use it. They're no good for really long distance travel, like to other stars, but for exploring a solar system they work fine. The drives they use can get up to about eighty percent of the speed of light although they don't normally go much past ten percent, apparently the time dilation above that gets irritating. Even at ten percent light speed you can go anywhere in a solar system in fairly short periods of time." Yori smiled. "When we visited he took us out to a captured asteroid they were mining, it only took a few hours even though it was several million kilometres away. The moon is no trouble." Naito stared at her for a while, not sure whether she was playing some weird joke on him.

"So you're going to bring an alien spaceship, complete with aliens, to Tokyo?" he asked after a long pause. She grinned at him.
"No, that would cause... a number of problems." He nodded slowly, thinking that was putting it mildly. "Not to mention get other countries really wound up. Probably not an ideal situation. The idea is somewhat different. We go to K'nn four, get in his ship, he takes off, then we bring it back through a portal around the other side of the moon. He's fitted one of his ships with a very good stealth system so no Earth-based radar system or telescopes will detect it." The girl looked amused as they stared at each other again. "They have some very cool toys. Anyway, we deploy a load of probes, poke around for a while to see if we can find, or much more likely, not find, what we're looking for, probably land and walk around for a bit just for fun, then come home the same way. No one but us knows about it. Although the next people to land on the moon might find some odd footprints..." This seemed to cause her considerable amusement.

She studied him for a moment as he thought about what he'd heard. Eventually the magical girl asked, "So. Interested?" Thinking about it some more, he finally looked up.

"When?"

"Tomorrow, around lunchtime. It would be for two to three days, in all probability. There won't be any real discomfort, his ship has full gravity control, so no zero g unless you want it." She smiled. "It's a lot of fun, but not for everyone." Naito thought some more, weighing the 'spacesuit' device in his hand, then grinned.

"Why not. I've done some damn weird things with you lot so far and I'm still around. Going to the moon sounds like fun." Yori chuckled, pleased.

"Good. I think you'll love it. Bring a camera." She looked him up and down. "And I'd suggest something less expensive than that suit. The environment suit forcefield allows external objects to penetrate it under the right circumstances, although it keeps air in and excess temperature and illumination swings under control. Moon dust gets everywhere, from what I've been told, you'll have trouble washing it out." The girl laughed as he looked at his suit. "Although you'd look cool standing on the moon in a nice suit and sunglasses." After a moment's thought, she added, "Bring sunglasses." He chuckled.

"We'll sort out some equipment for you, Agent," the Director-General said, smiling slightly. "We're very curious as well. Special equipment division has started putting together what you'll need."

Yori stood. "I'm going to have to go. I'll call you tomorrow around eleven or so. Aiko will pick you up and bring you to us, then we'll set up the portal." With a nod and a smile to both of them she faded from view as she walked towards the door, which opened slightly, then closed. Naito watched with an amused grin.

"She gets a kick out of that invisibility trick," he murmured, then turned to the Director-General.

"Interesting woman," the man said, also watching the door, his eyebrows up in surprise. "I've read about that but it's very impressive to see it in real life." He turned to Naito.

"Please pay attention to everything you can. We're not concerned about Yori's private business, we've been told very firmly that it's not something we need to worry about, but we are very interested in anything you learn about these other worlds, their technology, whether they're friendly, that sort of thing. I think the friendliness is probably a given, considering they're doing Yori this as a favour, but considering how much more portal travel there seems to be to Minato in the past few years, we want to learn as much about it as possible." The agent nodded thoughtfully.

"I understand. We do seem to be having a lot more visitors recently. That demon Uthryyl that's apparently a good friend of Yori's has been through at least half a dozen times in the last year, from what we know, for example. He's apparently got commercial agreements with one or more local traders in Minato and is doing considerable business there. Around Yori and Chou's area the locals are so used to demons they don't even seem to notice it unless you point it out." He shook his head in wonder. "Go into any coffee shop and you might well meet one, although a lot of them are disguised in different ways."

The other man looked amused. "There has been a lot of otherworldly attention in the last few years. Luckily the majority of it seems peaceful, due mainly to the unusual young lady who was just here and her friends. It's certainly boosting the economy a surprising amount in some specific fields. They seem to pay very well. Though the tax office is getting a little confused about some of the receipts they've been given by a few merchants from what the reports say."

Naito laughed for a moment. "I could see that being difficult to explain."

"Apparently, certain parties in the government are considering setting up an official if discreet finance branch to try to organise this interworld trade. I'm not convinced they'll have much luck unless they can find one or more magical girls to help, it's a long way out of their field of expertise, but people are beginning to notice. They seem to think overall it's a good thing but there are worries about the possibility of dangerous items being imported, items that are sufficiently different we wouldn't notice them until too late. Weapons, drugs, that sort of thing. The portal bomb plot showed how dangerous magic could be, up until then it was so esoteric a subject not many people outside that community really understood that."

Nodding thoughtfully, Naito considered it. "I can see that being a worry. I think, like in so many other things to do with the magical world, the person to speak to is Yori. She and her friends know far more about that sort of thing than anyone else I know, and more to the point will actually talk to us about it. Some of it, at any rate. It's a rather closed world, it would be very difficult to get information on it without the cooperation of someone on the inside. Very dangerous, as well, if the approach was wrong." He shuddered slightly. "Believe me, some of the people I've met through those girls are... disturbing. You would not like to get them annoyed with us. It wouldn't end well."

Opening the folder the Director-General flipped through the pages, before pulling one out and reading it. "Such as this Ms Aoyama, I think?" Naito looked worried.

"Oh, she's right at the top of the list. Seriously, don't do anything she would interpret as hostile. You have no idea. Neither do I, but having met her a few times, I think it would be very bad. Whoever she works for isn't someone we want to get on the wrong side of. Neither is she." His superior made some notes, nodding.

"We were given the same advice by Sir Alan in the UK. He seemed impressed. And more than a little intimidated."

"I'm not surprised. She's absolutely horrifying in some very disturbing ways, although to be fair I don't think she's at all hostile. The opposite, really. Just very, very cold and emotionless. It's like dealing with some sort of android. One that's swallowed a dictionary." He looked thoughtful for a moment, then shook his head. "But I'm pretty sure she's alive. Just... not very human."

"Your reports suggest Yori gets along with her very well." Naito smiled a little.

"Yori is even more horrifying, when she wants to be. Ms Aoyama is the creepiest person I've ever met and undoubtedly one of the most dangerous. Yori is the most dangerous. Quite possibly by a substantial margin. Chou is right behind her. I'm glad they get along so well with us, to be honest, it would be very awkward if they didn't."
The Director-General looked at another page from the folder. "I would have to agree. Some of the things I've read about are truly worrying. She's also got some very interesting friends. Even the ones I know about are difficult to believe. I'm fairly sure there are ones I don't know about that are even stranger. It would be very interesting to find out how she met them all."

"It would indeed. But I'm sure as hell not going to ask." Naito stood up, putting the small device Yori had given him back into the box, which he slipped into his pocket. "Is that all, Sir?" The man looked up from his folder, closing it, then nodded.

"Yes, thank you, Masao. Go down to Equipment and get the package they should have ready for you, check everything is there, sign the paperwork for the clearance upgrade, then go home and get some rest. You're going to have an interesting few days." He smiled more widely than the agent had ever seen before. "I'm rather jealous. I wanted to go into space when I was young, but it never seemed likely to happen. Take care and enjoy yourself, this is an extremely unusual opportunity."

Naito headed for the door, grinning.

"They always are when those girls are involved, Sir. Unusual, and often very scary, but more fun than you'd think likely." He left the office, shaking his head in wonder. "The moon?" he whispered to himself as he headed to the elevator.

Picking up her phone, Ami looked at the caller name, then smiled a little. "Hello, Azumi," she said.

"Hi, Ami. I hope you're all right?" The voice of the silver-haired girl was genuinely curious. Ami nodded to herself, then realised the other woman couldn't see it.

"I'm fine, overall, thanks. Still kind of stunned by everything the other day, but glad it's been five days now without any more problems." She sighed. "I was half-expecting something horrible to happen."

"I understand," Azumi replied. "So was I. Your friends seem to be lying low at the moment, though."

"Setsuna talked to me a couple of days ago. I tried discreetly probing her to work out how she was feeling. I'm not entirely sure about the results. She was... I guess the best word for it is a bit absent-minded. More than normal. Kept losing the thread of the conversation, like she wasn't really paying attention to me, then looked a little surprised when she noticed I was still there. It was kind of weird. She's been a little vague for quite a while but that was different." She sighed quietly. "The weirdest thing was she actually smiled at me when I left, which is practically unique in my experience. I got the impression she forgot about me as soon as I was out of the room, though."

"How about the others?"

"Don't you already know?" the blue-haired girl asked with amusement. Azumi chuckled.

"We've certainly been watching them, yes, but I'm interested in your opinion."

Nodding to herself, Ami replied,"Usagi refuses to talk to me now. I called her a few times. The first time she just swore at me for about five minutes straight then hung up. It was a bit of a shock, I didn't know she knew that many swear words. I didn't know there were that many swear words!" Azumi seemed to find this quite funny. "After that she won't answer. Michiru didn't swear at me, much, she just told me to 'fuck off and die' then hung up. Makoto was more friendly, but that's not saying much. She talked for a while, very stiffly, like she didn't really know me and resented me calling her, then made an excuse and left."
"I'm genuinely sorry to hear all that, Ami. It's not easy losing a friend, never mind that many at once and in such a horrible way." There was real sympathy in the voice of the other woman.

"Thanks, Azumi, for saying that. No, it's not easy. But I guess it's life." Walking over to the window and staring out at the early evening scene Ami sighed once more, shaking her head a little. "Not much fun." They were both silent for a moment until she shook herself out of the mild funk she'd fallen into. "Hotaru came around to talk yesterday. She said Haruka still doesn't actually believe everything, but she's not totally disbelieving it either. I think she's basically very confused." The young woman laughed somewhat sadly. "I'd prefer it if she believed but I'll live with sufficiently confused not to be a threat." Azumi giggled a little.

"Not ideal but better than nothing."

"Rei's been spending a lot of time talking to her grandfather. He's giving her some very good advice. She seems a lot calmer than she was the day after, well, the day after. When she'd slept on it she started having second thoughts for a while, but he talked her around."

Azumi sounded amused. "He struck me as a pretty smart guy."

"He is that. A little bit perverted but nothing nasty." Ami giggled herself. "I like him, even with that. If nothing else he knows how to keep his mouth shut."

"You'd kind of expect that of a priest, I'd think." There was a short silence. "Yori asked me to let you know she's contacted S'th'kx. We're on for a little field trip tomorrow around lunch-time. It will take perhaps three days. Do you still want to come?"

Somewhat surprised, Ami paused for a long moment. Eventually she smiled. "Go to the moon? Damn right. Leaving the ruins or lack thereof out of it I'd love to see it."

"Good. It should be very interesting. Can you contact Rei and Hotaru as well, let them know, and find out if they still want to come? Aiko will come to the temple tomorrow around eleven to pick you guys up. You get a trip through a portal out of it as well." She laughed, while Ami looked surprised. "I'll explain when I see you."

"OK. That sounds interesting."

"It will be, believe me. Space travel is pretty fascinating. OK, See you tomorrow."

"Thanks, Azumi. Bye." The other woman disconnected, leaving Ami to put her phone down and lean back in her chair, thinking for a while, before getting up to rummage through her closet and pack a small bag, slightly disbelievingly. "The moon?" she whispered to herself, looking out the window into the evening, at the relevant celestial body. A smile crossed her face.

"Ready to go?" Aiko asked, looking around the courtyard. Ami nodded, glancing at Rei, who looked apprehensive but excited. Hotaru was hopping from foot to foot like she needed the toilet.

"Let's go!" the younger girl chirped, a huge grin on her face. Aiko laughed.

"We're going, hold on." She glanced at Ami, who was smiling to herself. Turning to the old priest, she nodded to him. "We'll be back in about three days. I'll make sure we get a message to you if there are any delays, so you don't worry about Rei."

"Thank you, my child," he said gravely, bowing slightly, then grinned impishly. "Have fun. Bring me back a moon rock."
"I will," she promised with a laugh. Turning back to the three girls she waved them over. "Come on, a little closer." When they were arranged correctly she waved to the old man, before all four of them disappeared with a bright flash. He opened his eyes, smiled to himself, then picked up his broom and began sweeping again.

Looking around the field they'd appeared in, Naito asked, "Where on earth are we?"

"North of Tokyo, in a discreet place to open a portal," Yori replied, turning to look at him from where she'd been talking to Chou. She grinned a little. "No disrespect but we didn't want to do this from our home. Security, you understand." He chuckled, nodding.

"I do." Glancing around he saw that Azumi was there talking to three girls he recognised from the reports he'd read recently, but Fumiko, Tamiko, and Misaki weren't present. "Are the others coming?"

"Unfortunately no, not this time," Yori told him. She frowned a little. "We can't afford to take everyone in case the other girls go off again. We can get back pretty fast but it might not be fast enough." He nodded again, understanding the problem.

"I'll bet that annoys them."

"Oh, immensely. Misaki is half-wanting something to start so she can take it out on them for making her miss this trip, I think." The magical girl laughed for a moment as he smiled. "We'll arrange another one sometime."

"Can Aiko teleport that far?" he asked curiously. She studied him briefly then turned to inspect the brunette, who shrugged a little.

"I don't know," Aiko replied. "I want to find out, though. That's one of the reasons I'm going. We thought it would be safer to try it from the other end. If it turns out it's out of range, I'll end up floating around somewhere between the moon and the earth. I can either teleport back or they can come and pick me up. The suit generator will keep me safe even if it doesn't work."

Yori waved him over to the three new faces, familiar to him from various reports but not ones he'd ever seen in real life. "Guys, meet Agent Naito from the PSIA. Be nice to him, he's a friend." They all inspected him carefully, Ami curiously, Rei slightly apprehensively, and Hotaru looking both interested and worried. "Agent, I suspect you already know something about the girls here." She grinned as the other women looked suddenly cautious. He laughed a little, nodding.

"I do, as it happens. Ami Mizuno, Rei Hino, and Hotaru Tomoe. Three magical girls from an original team of nine who became active over a period of time starting some five or six years ago. A team that has had... certain awkward issues recently." Yori seemed satisfied while the three girls all appeared shocked. Ami looked at Yori with clear anger in her eyes.

"Did you tell him all that?" she demanded. Yori sighed, shaking her head.

"No. You guys did. I told you your operational security was horrible, a long time ago." Ami blushed a little at this. "The PSIA worked it out ages ago. It took them longer than it did Chou and myself, but they're not stupid. The Special Activities Office keeps tabs on several dozen magical girls in Minato and a few other places, as well as Neriman martial artists above a certain skill level. Their remit is to watch, learn anything that they can which doesn't pose a danger to the civilian identities of the girls in question, investigate the aftermath of magical fights, make sure nothing dangerous falls into the hands of people who aren't qualified to have it, that sort of thing." Naito was looking at her with almost as much astonishment as the three girls were. Yori glanced at him, smiling a little.

"I do my homework," she answered his unspoken question. Returning her attention to Ami while he thought about how many other questions that raised she waited.

"So, they're watching us?" Rei asked slowly. She stared at Naito, not in a completely friendly manner. He took a step back, somewhat unhappy about having any magical girl annoyed with him, especially these ones. Yori snickered.

"Yep. They'd have to be idiots not to, bearing in mind what's been happening. And they're anything but idiots." Rei flushed a little. Hotaru, beside her, looked at the older girl, then Yori.

"Who watches them?" she asked quietly. Suddenly grinning, Yori pointed at herself. "I do." Her face abruptly became very dangerous for a moment. "They behave themselves."

Unable to resist the opening, Naito quipped, "Then who watches you?" As soon as the words left his mouth he had second thoughts, while Yori slowly turned to inspect him, her face blank. He swallowed a little. After a few uncomfortable seconds, she smiled widely and indicated Chou, the blonde looking amused.

"She does." The black-haired girl chuckled. "And if you want to be really worried, Ms Aoyama watches everyone." She laughed as he looked around, noticing that the three girls quickly did the same, unable to help themselves. "Feel paranoid yet?"

"Very much," he shuddered. Glancing at Ami, he asked, "Have you met her yet?"

"No," she replied, looking slightly worried. "But I've heard stories..."

Naito took one last look over his shoulder, meeting Azumi's eyes, noticing that she seemed extremely amused by all this. "Trust me, they don't do her justice." He returned his attention to the young woman with blue hair. "The PSIA does indeed keep itself informed on what information is available on the various high powered individuals in Minato, Nerima, one or two other places. There are a couple in Kyoto, for example. But we don't interfere, or poke too deeply into private lives or where it's clear we're not welcome. There are unambiguous orders from very high in the government that magical girls are to be left alone."

He grinned for a moment. "Not that we actually could do much in most cases. Luckily, with almost no exceptions, it's never been much of a worry aside from the collateral damage, which in recent years has gone down a lot. You understand why." Ami cast a glance at Yori and Chou, who were watching with interested looks, then nodded slowly.

"I do, I think."

"The magical world and the non-magical ones don't overlap all that much," Naito added thoughtfully. "In fact, recently it's become clear they don't overlap nearly as much as we thought they did. We've learned more in the last year than in the previous twenty, mainly about how little we really know about it. That said, we have very good people in the field and we've picked up quite a lot of things. The identities of your group wasn't very difficult if I'm honest. Yori is correct, your security leaves a lot to be desired." Ami didn't look happy about this but nodded, an embarrassed expression on her face, matched by similar ones that Hotaru and Rei were wearing.

"So I've been told. We relied too much on the anonymity spell and not enough on common sense."
"Over the years we've intervened in a couple of places where your civilian identities could have become public knowledge," Naito told her after pondering it for a moment. She looked surprised. "It serves the best interest of you, us, and the country as a whole," he explained. "Magical girls, even somewhat... overenthusiastic... ones serve a very important function in society. One that could be made awkward by certain things being more widely known. There are people who feel very strongly that it's the least we can do considering what you girls do for us. We're not your enemies, trust me."

"You can trust the Agent at the very least," Yori assured them as they looked a little dubious. "He's a decent man and very good indeed at his job. That's why he's here in the first place." She grinned at him as he stared at her. "I've read your file. It's very impressive, especially for someone who has no magical abilities. Although I'm becoming concerned that you may need some more advanced hand to hand combat training." He went pale as she snickered.

"How did you get his file?" Rei asked curiously. Yori gave her a look. "I know certain people. Some very interesting ones, but I can't say anything more about it. When we started working so closely with the PSIA over the portal bomb thing I researched anyone involved, I like to know who I'm dealing with." She shrugged. "Old habits. Like a friend told me, I'm a professional paranoid. It's basically true."

"Even if you didn't know people I guess Ms Aoyama could get you my file, or anything else you wanted," Naito commented, mildly amused rather than worried. She giggled.

"Probably. I though it was best to do it more or less above board, though. Overall, like I said, we trust the PSIA a lot. You guys have treated us decently, we intend to do the same back."

Agent Naito smiled at the young woman. "Thank you. Terrifying as it it at times, it's been enlightening and a lot of fun. And very tiring. I'm glad we're doing this at a sensible time of day for once." Yori and Chou both laughed. Pulling the box she'd given him the day before out of his pocket he opened it, looking at the small device inside. "So, how does it work?" Yori picked it up and showed it to him.

"You put it on your upper arm, here, like this, then press this point here, sliding your finger down like this." She suited action to words. He twitched a little as something happened. The view rippled a little, before clearing. "It's active. You put it into standby by pressing here, but you'll have to do it, it won't allow someone from outside the suit to when it's on as a safety measure, without an emergency override." She indicated another slightly raised point on the outside of the device. Looking at it he poked it. Once more his view rippled. The device seemed to be firmly adhering to his arm when he experimentally tugged it.

"It'll stay put under more or less any circumstances like that. You can press the same control to activate it manually, or it will activate automatically if the environment becomes sufficiently hostile it's necessary. Mainly depressurisation but it will also work for toxic gasses or smoke. It's a very nice design." He saw that she was already wearing another of the devices, as were the others. "OK, activate it again." He did so. "This control here on the other side turns on the control interface. It's mostly voice driven with eye-trackers incorporated, for species like ours. S'th'kx's people use something a bit different. Try turning it on." Pressing the tiny switch he jumped when he found a translucent display hanging in space in front of him half a metre away.

"Wow." He looked at it in awe. "That's amazing."

Yori grinned. "It's pretty good. The tech is fairly primitive by their standards, but it's incredibly reliable and effective. This thing can keep you alive for a long time, assuming you have enough water and food. More advanced ones deal with that as well but they're much more expensive. This is a fairly basic but good one. OK, you can look at a control and then tell it to operate. There's some built-in help available from that icon down there in the bottom right. Just look at it, then say 'instructions'. To stop it say 'pause', or 'stop'. 'Continue' or 'resume' will restart it. It should be pretty self-explanatory. The computer isn't hugely smart but it's good enough to understand any command you're likely to need. Have a play with it while we get the portal open."

Feeling like he'd walked into a movie, Naito experimented with the interface, finding it as intuitive as the girl had suggested, smiling to himself at the sheer wonder of it all. A crackling sound made him look around, to see the glowing blue tear in reality that was the portal. Yori inspected it carefully then nodded her satisfaction. She turned to the others, Chou and Azumi standing either side of her. He poked the button that put the device he was wearing into standby and listened.

"All right. We're going to K'n'n four first. For first time travellers, it can be a bit of a shock. The people there look a bit like very large insects." She watched their faces. The younger girl with the purple hair, Hotaru, gasped slightly. Yori smiled at her. "They're very nice people. Forget what they look like. Most of them don't speak Japanese, although S'th'kx knows a few words. Any of the three of us can translate for you. Don't overreact when you see them, all right?" She was looking carefully at Hotaru, who nodded after a moment, slightly embarrassed.

"I'll be nice," she said. Yori grinned at her.

"Of course you will. It will be a surprise but you'll enjoy it." She glanced at the portal for a moment. "The other end of this thing is in one of their designated arrival areas. It will be very busy outside the portal room, the city is very crowded, so be warned. A bit like Tokyo during a major event. We'll go somewhere quiet then Aiko will teleport us to the space port. They prefer not to have that happen in the portal area for some reason. OK, Let's go." She turned to the portal and disappeared into it, followed by Azumi. With a slightly nervous look Ami went after them. Rei grinned and walked confidently through, towing Hotaru, who suddenly looked worried. Chou smiled, then turned to Naito.

"Shall we go, Agent?" she asked politely. He chuckled, picked up his case, then followed her in, Aiko bringing up the rear.

"Holy shit," Hotaru said for the third time in five minutes, turning in a complete circle and staring at everything wide-eyed. Naito knew what she was feeling, as he was feeling exactly the same thing. "Look at them all!"

Behind them, Azumi laughed, while Chou, Aiko and Yori were talking to the two metre beetle that was S'th'kx. He was gesturing with four limbs at the same time, his antenna waving about, explaining something that was apparently very funny. None of the three women seemed to have any trouble reading the very alien body language, as at ease in his presence as they would be at home. Naito caught Ami watching in wonder, then went back to looking around, taking another photo with the remarkably expensive Hasselblad medium format camera the PSIA had supplied him with. The silver-haired woman had looked at it with interest, commenting that it was very similar to the ones NASA had sent to the moon in the sixties, which seemed appropriate. He’d found it amusing, as well as proof she knew a considerable amount about photography, something the camera she’d lent him in Australia had suggested.

Everywhere he looked there were spacecraft. Big ones, little ones, absolutely huge ones. Something the side of an oil tanker lifted gently into the air with a bass hum that made his eyes vibrate in his head even from half a kilometre away, turned surprisingly gracefully through ninety degrees, then rapidly accelerated into the distance, climbing steeply. He could see that there were clear traffic lanes in the sky, inbound and outbound ones in different directions. Larger craft seemed to be segregated from smaller ones, which mainly went straight up.

Off to one side a little one, a cone some five metres across and four high, lifted a metre or two, then vanished upwards so fast it disappeared from sight as if it had teleported. A long drawn-out rumble followed it, the sound trailing the spacecraft by a large margin. Whipping his eyes up he was just in time to see it disappear into the clouds high above. All four of the observers had their hands over their ears as a result of the rapid departure.

"He was in a hurry," Azumi noted once the sound died away. "Apparently they're not supposed to go transonic so close to the ground. S'th'kx seems annoyed about it." Glancing behind him he saw the alien looking upwards with his antennae curled back, radiating clear irritation, while Yori chuckled at something he'd said. She said something back which made him visibly shrug, still peering into the sky, before returning his attention to her. Waving with one limb towards a ship about fifty metres across, he started walking towards it, Yori beside him. He still appeared irritated. Chou smiled, then turned to the others, pointing at the ship.

"That's the one we're going in. Come on, let's go on board." Everyone followed as she and Azumi led the way. Reaching it S'th'kx prodded a panel beside a hatch which irised open silently, then went inside. They all trooped after him. When they were inside what was obviously an airlock he poked another panel, which caused the outer door to shut and the inner one to open. Inside, another of S'th'kx's crew was waiting, talking to the miner for a moment, before they both headed for a ramp to the next level of the craft. Yori watched, then turned to the little party.

"We'll be taking off in a few minutes. He's going to get launch clearance. Come with me, we can watch the outside view from the lounge. They have some truly excellent cameras on the outside and some incredible projectors." She grinned as she started walking, clearly knowing her way around. "We can get a view later from the windows if you want, but the cameras are probably better in most ways." Azumi, Aiko, and Chou followed her, glancing casually about in a manner that also suggested this was something they didn't see as anything unusual, while the remaining three girls and Naito were staring at everything with huge interest. Ami pulled out a small device from somewhere, opened it, then waved it around, staring at a display on it. The PSIA agent watched, wondering what it was.

Arriving at a door some way down the curving corridor, which followed the outer skin of the ship, Yori did something that made the door open, waving them inside. The room, which was about eight metres across at it's widest point, was shaped a little like a pie slice with the point missing, the wall at that end, the inner one, following a noticeable curve. The room was completely bare otherwise. Chou went to a panel on the wall next to the door, touching it, which caused it to display a number of odd icons and some text in a very strange looking language. She manipulated some of the icons, then tapped a control. Four of the eight people jumped a little as the floor extruded a number of seats scattered around the room, silently and efficiently, while the lighting changed from the rather clinical bluish colour it had been into something indistinguishable from true sunlight. The blonde smiled at their look of surprise.

"The environmental controls are quite extensive. S'th'kx is using the same system some of the better hotels do, it can adapt to most species' comfort very well. This should be comfortable for everyone." She moved to one of the seats and sat down, waving calmly around. "Take any seat you want." After a few seconds, Ami grinned, heading for a seat next to the other woman, feeling it curiously, then sitting down.

"Not bad," she remarked. Her friends, more tentatively, did the same.
“Very comfortable,” Rei commented approvingly. Hotaru bounced on her seat a little and smiled, staring around with great interest, clearly very pleased and excited.

“I can’t believe I’m in a real spaceship,” she said in a slightly squeaky voice. “An alien spaceship! On an alien planet!” Yori laughed from her position by another control panel on the other side of the room, glancing at Naito, who didn’t say anything although he was once again sharing almost exactly the same thoughts. She clearly knew this, judging by her expression.

“It’s kind of cool, isn’t it?” she asked the younger girl, who nodded quickly, not stopping inspecting everything in the room. “Glad you came?”

“Oh, yes,” the purple-haired girl breathed, grinning like an idiot. “This is amazing.”

“Wait until you see what happens next,” Yori chuckled, her finger poised over a control. “Anyone get upset by heights?” The three girls looked at each other, Rei slightly worried, then glanced at the others. Naito, wondering what was going to happen, sure it would be unusual, shook his head slowly.

“Not really, Yori. Why?”

“Watch.” She poked the virtual button, grinning as the lights dimmed and the floor vanished completely. They jerked in surprise, looking around, then Ami carefully reached out with one foot and tapped it on the floor. It was still there judging by the sound, but it appeared totally transparent, instead showing the concrete-like surface of the spaceport ground.

“It’s a screen?” she asked, wonderingly.

“More or less. It’s actually a projection system producing the image, the floor is nothing special.” Azumi turned to her, sitting down on the other side of Chou and relaxing. “Like Yori said there are cameras on the outside of the ship in several places, you can route the live view from any of them to all sorts of places. The ones on the bottom are the best for the next part.”

The voice of the asteroid miner sounded. Yori replied, having a short conversation, then nodded.

“Right. Here we go. You’ll like this.” She was smiling, clearly enjoying herself. Chou and her two companions were watching the floor with interest. Ami looked at Rei, her eyes slightly wide, while Hotaru giggled, then they all followed the others’ eyes. Naito did the same.

There was a pregnant pause, followed by a very slight vibration and a faint, deep hum. The ground slowly began to drop away from them without any other sensation of movement, accelerating steadily as the ship ascended, much more slowly than the small one earlier had done. Everyone watched as the view rapidly expanded to encompass nearby ships, then the entire spaceport, which was immense, then parts of the vast city it was on the outskirts of. The effect was like looking over the side of a hot air balloon, one that was moving at impossible velocities, with nothing between them and the ground but an ever-increasing amount of empty space.

Despite not finding heights at all worrying, unlike many people, Agent Naito couldn’t help but tense as their altitude increased rapidly. Hotaru, he noticed when he tore his gaze away from the view for a second, seemed almost frozen with a mix of fear and enormous enjoyment, while Rei and Ami seemed both fascinated and somewhat apprehensive, the former looking very slightly pale. Azumi and Aiko were watching with obvious enjoyment, Chou with her normal serene calmness, while Yori was watching him, smiling slightly. He smiled back, causing her to wink, then went back to staring down.

They had entered the clouds, the view going dark and misty for a moment, then clearing into brilliant yellow-white sunlight, brighter and whiter than at home. Their speed was still increasing. Yori turned back to the control panel, manipulating it some more, which had the effect that the walls and ceiling also vanished, making Hotaru and Rei both gasp in shock. Ami looked around, a slow grin creeping across her face. Naito found he'd unconsciously grabbed his seat with both hands, forcing himself to relax, slightly embarrassed. Looking around he saw that they were now high enough that the curvature of the planet was clearly visible, the sky above them quickly darkening.

"How high are we?" he asked curiously.

"Thirty thousand metres, moving at Mach five." Yori glanced at the control panel she was standing beside, then looked back to him, amusement on her face, before returning to the display. "Mach six now... Seven... Eight..." Outside, there was a slight glow building up above them, forming an increasing conical shock wave some distance away due to the air turning into a plasma as it was violently pushed out of the way. "Mach fifteen... Eighteen... Twenty..." She kept calling out the speed while the others watched the view. The glow became steadily brighter, obscuring the view for a few seconds, then began to die away. "Above the atmosphere now," Yori commented. Below them K'nn four was a large bright sphere, unfamiliar continents and oceans clearly displayed, a little more than two thirds of it in sunlight, spanning half the view.

"He can really pour on the speed now," Azumi said, smiling at Naito. "The force field that acts as a heat shield also deflects small objects, so there's no chance of hitting anything." Although there was still no sensation of movement other than the view outside, the faint vibration increased slightly, while the planet began to fall away amazingly quickly. Ami made a sound of surprise.

"Holy shit. How fast can this thing accelerate?" she asked, her voice shocked. Yori chuckled.

"Pretty damn fast. I think the limit is around, hmm, about a hundred and fifty G in our terms. It's got a huge drive, much bigger than it needs just for moving the ship around. This is a mining scout, designed for towing fairly large asteroids around the place at sensible speeds. When it's not pulling a few billions tons of rock around it's a very quick little ship." Turning the control panel off she walked across the invisible floor unconcernedly, a very strange thing to see, dropping into a seat next to Aiko and looking around with interest. She pointed. "That's pretty cool." Everyone looked and Ami made another slight gasp.

"That's... A space elevator?"

"Yep. That's how they used to get into space. When they invented cheap antigrav it fell out of use quite fast except for tourism and very low value incoming bulk cargo. The ships are just much more convenient for most purposes." Agent Naito stared at the distant thread of light that rose from the planet an improbable distance into space. The sight was very impressive. Longer by a considerable margin than the diameter of the planet itself, it must have been immense to be visible from such a distance.

"There's a very nice restaurant at the midway point," Chou put in. He stared at her, then back at the slender construction. "We could go there on the way back if you'd like, Agent." Raising his camera he took a photo, suddenly remembering he was still holding it, having forgotten in the shock of the take-off.

"That could be... interesting, Chou," he replied quietly, not sure whether he liked the idea or not. He noticed the planet was now about six times the visible diameter of the moon at home, obviously a considerable distance away, a surprisingly large number of objects apparent around it, one or two quite large. He pointed at one of them. "What are those?"
"Other spacecraft in orbit, a couple of high altitude space stations, things like that." Yori looked to where he was pointing, squinting a little. "I think that particular one is an experimental interstellar spacecraft they've been playing around with for a while. I heard about it when we were last here. They leased the drive from a higher-tech world, it's cheaper than designing and building their own by a long way, then built the rest of the ship around it. The drives are pretty large so the ship has to be as well. That thing is about fifteen kilometres across or so." She shrugged. "Sorry, I don't know much more than that about it. S'th'kx could tell you if you're interested."

"You can just lease an interstellar drive?" he asked with shock. She nodded, looking amused.

"Apparently. It's not exactly cheap, plus there is a hell of a lot of paperwork, there are all sorts of interworld treaties and regulations about transferring advanced technology around the place, but that sort of thing happens all the time even so. Interworld trade is very important." Making a mental note to write all that down as soon as he had a moment he took a few more photos. Just the last hour had made it very apparent both he and the PSIA had no idea at all how complex what happened on the other side of a portal really was. Casting a quick look at the four magical girls who clearly found this all interesting but nothing particularly unusual he marvelled at the things they must have encountered. He wondered how many other people walking around in Minato knew about all this, or came from another world, such as this one. Shaking his head a little in wonder he went back to watching quietly.

A little while later S'th'kx and Yori had another short conversation. "All right, we're going to head for an empty bit of space some distance away where the portal won't cause anyone any problems. It'll take about an hour or so." She grinned. "They're a little touchy about portals, they rely absolutely on them but as a result they have a lot of rules about where you can open them. Big ones are something they want well out of the way of anything important just in case. No reason not to cooperate." By now K'n'n four was a disc of light in the distance. "Anyone want something to eat?"

Chou was suddenly holding a large basket of food, looking pleased. "The food from the processors on board is very good, but I made this lunch to get us started." Azumi sat up, peering into the basket with interest, then made a small sound of pleasure, pulling out a bottle of wine.

"Ah. This is one of the good ones from Australia." The blonde smiled, getting up from her seat and heading for a table that abruptly appeared out of the floor. Naito jumped, looking over his shoulder to see Yori standing by the relevant control panel. She grinned at his surprise.

"It takes a little getting used to," she said with amusement.

"All of this does," he replied, waving his hand around the room. "I still can't believe it." Walking back to them she laughed gently.

"It can be a shock if you just think of portals as something that throw demons at you. Think of them as bridges to alien planets and it makes more sense, although it's still something of a surprise if you're not ready for it. Hopefully you'll get used to it pretty quickly." The black-haired woman grinned, looking at the view, and the table and chairs protruding out of what looked like empty space. "I'll admit it can be a bit unusual." He followed her eyes, chuckling.

"That it can. But I'm glad I came."

"So am I." There was a pause before she added slyly, "You'll have a lot of interesting things to put in your report to the Director-General." Laughing, he nodded, accepting a small glass of wine from Chou.

"Indeed."
After a short but pleasant lunch, Chou cleared everything away and vanished it, the table collapsing in an almost organic way back into the floor. "We're nearly ready," Yori commented, turning away from a conversation with S'th'kx who had come into the room. "We're in position, stationary at the target zone. Chou and I are going to set up the portal. It will take a few minutes, this is going to be a big one and it needs some careful work, so we're doing it from the command deck. You guys can watch from here. Once we're through, we'll go into orbit around the moon and deploy the probes. See you in a little while." She, the blonde, and the alien insectoid all left the room. Naito watched them go with a shake of his head, the manner in which the two young women walked off with an honest-to-god alien as if he was someone they'd known all their lives still surprised him when he thought about it.

Turning, he caught Azumi watching him with a smile. "It takes a while to get to grips with all this," he told her, waving at the room and by extension, the entire spacecraft. "Even after all the things we've done, things you and the others have shown me, travelling in a spaceship from an alien world is a bit... odd." She laughed, waving him to the seat next to hers. He took it.

"I understand what you mean, Agent, believe me. I'm new to some of this as well. The first time I went through a portal and saw what was on the other side was... well, it wasn't what I was expecting, let's put it that way. But, you do get used to it surprisingly quickly, as Yori said. Part of that might be that I'm just that weird," she grinned as he chuckled, "but a lot of it is because it's so strangely normal." He stared at her, then at the lounge full of magical girls in the alien scout-craft moving through space in a different reality, then back at her. An eyebrow went up.

Giggling, she nodded. "I know what you're thinking. But yes, normal is probably the right word, as odd as that sounds. Oh, at first everything is almost overwhelmingly strange, true enough, then you talk to people and find that that's exactly what they are. People. Some of them are big insects, some are lizard-like things, some have feathers, or hooves, or scales, but in the end most of them are a lot like us." She grinned. "Some of my best friends are demons, or aliens, however you want to put it."

Naito laughed, looking around the room, then back at the silver-haired girl. "I think I understand. Having a language in common probably helps quite a bit as well."

"Learning Trade was a good thing, that's true," she replied, leaning back in her seat. "It wasn't easy and I still miss a word every now and then, but I'm glad I put the effort in." She glanced at him. "If things go on the way they are perhaps the PSIA should be teaching it's agents demon languages."

He chuckled, shaking his head in mild wonder.

"It might be an idea. Do you have some sort of language course available?" The young woman laughed for a moment.

"We could probably come up with something." She glanced up, making him look at her, then around at the others. Aiko was also giving the impression of listening, while the three remaining girls clearly could sense something happening but didn't seem to know exactly what it was. Ami had her little hand-held device out and was fiddling with it. "They're just starting the portal." Azumi pointed to one side, causing everyone to look. "Over there."

Sure enough, a few hundred metres away a glowing blue rip in reality was forming, stabilising for a few seconds, then steadily growing. It wavered a little when the growth stopped before snapping into full form, much larger than anything Naito had seen before. "How big is it?" he asked curiously. The girl beside him thought for a moment.

"About eighty metres across," she said. "That should be comfortable." They noticed that the portal suddenly seemed to be growing again, but he worked out immediately that the ship was moving towards it. Quite slowly, at not much more than a walking pace, the ship approached the glowing tear in space, slipping through silently. A brief blue glow suffused the room then the dark of space reappeared, the stars in visibly different positions. White light from the other side of the projected view made them turn and look, wide-eyed.

"Wow," Hotaru managed after a few seconds. Naito looked at her as her friends nodded silently, before raising his camera and taking a number of photos. Lowering it again he simply stared at the half-full moon that filled a large part of the view, presenting a face he'd never seen before.

"The 'dark side' of the moon," Aiko commented. "Not at all dark, but it looks kind of weird." There were far more craters visible than on the side they were used to. Taking another couple of photos he studied the image.

"That's incredible," he finally said. Looking at Azumi he saw she was watching with a smile that looked as wondering as his was. It wasn't often that he saw a magical girl, especially one of Yori's crew, genuinely amazed, but she clearly was.

"This is one of the coolest things I've ever experienced," she finally said. Hotaru was standing as close to the wall as she could get, studying the image of the moon with a huge smile, while Ami and Rei were sitting down simple watching in amazement. Looking over his shoulder he saw the portal had disappeared once more. Shortly the ship began moving closer to the moon, which grew steadily until it was half the view, one side blindingly bright, the other easily visible but much darker, out of the direct sunlight. The terminator between them was a razor-sharp line with no atmosphere to diffuse it. The motion of the ship changed, becoming a sideways drift, which they all quickly felt as the ship being stationary and the moon surface moving past underneath them.

Naito found that at some point, without him noticing, out there had become down there, now they were so close, and had a sudden very slight attack of vertigo. A noise from Rei behind him made him look, to see she looked mildly ill, presumably feeling the same. "It's a little much isn't it?" he asked. The young woman, her long black hair, nearly as long as Yori's, waving behind her, nodded.

"It suddenly hit me. That's the moon! Being in space on the other side of a portal is one thing, weird and amazing as it is, but there's something weirder about being in orbit around the MOON!"

She grinned, shaking her head in wonder. He studied her for a moment longer then went back to looking out at the view, knowing what she meant. He took some more photos.

"I hope you have a lot of film, Agent," Azumi remarked. He smiled at her, indicating the case on the floor.

"A couple of dozen 70mm cassettes, seventy shots on each. The PSIA is quite keen on making sure this gets documented, it's a remarkable opportunity." Raising the camera he added, "They even made sure this would work in a vacuum."

She grinned at him, then glanced at the moon again. "If it breaks we could probably go and steal one of the Apollo ones, I think they left some behind when they left. They might still work."

"This is a much later model," he chuckled. "You wouldn't believe how much it costs. I didn't."

"Probably best not to drop it, then," she replied. Everyone looked up as Yori re-entered the room.

"We're in a circular orbit about sixty kilometres up," the martial artist reported in satisfaction, glancing around. "S'th'kx is going to launch a fleet of survey drones soon, a few hundred of them, which will scan the entire surface in something like two days. Once he's done that, we'll monitor them for a while to make sure everything is working to plan, then we could go and look around if anyone wants to." Hotaru immediately put her hand up, giggling. Azumi and Aiko were nearly as quick off the mark, followed by the others in short order. Yori snickered at their behaviour, putting her own hand up. "Me too. All right, if you like you can come and watch the probes launch from the command deck. The view out the windows is pretty amazing." She left again, followed by Azumi and Aiko, the others coming after.

Naito found himself walking beside Ami, who kept looking at him. She'd been doing that since they arrived, looking away when he spotted it, seeming slightly embarrassed. "Is there a problem, Ms Mizuno?" he asked politely. She twitched a little before shaking her head nervously.

"No, um, Agent Naito, not really. It's just that I've never met a secret agent before, and finding out the government knows about us as well... it was a little disturbing. No offence."

He smiled at her. "Don't worry about it. I can understand that. I'm not really a secret agent, I'm not a spy, although my division of the PSIA isn't very much in the public eye, by design, of course. Like Yori told you, we're not your enemies, in any way. While your recent... issues... have been rather annoying, we're leaving it in the hands of people much better qualified than we are to deal with it properly. We will just watch, and deal with any clearing up that needs to be done. Not that there normally is much with Yori and Chou involved, they're better at that sort of thing than we are." She giggled a little, relaxing slightly, as they walked up a ramp.

"They do seem to be frighteningly competent, I have to admit. If not just frightening." Ami glanced at him. "Did you know them before the portal bomb thing?"

"I knew of them, certainly, but I never met either one of them before. They've had dealings with us on and off for years but that was the most complex by a long way. It had some long-term ramifications that are still working themselves out, both with us, and globally. The implications for the financial world are quite startling. It might take years to finish." The girl nodded slowly, apparently understanding what he meant, which didn't surprise him based on her records.

"I haven't heard the whole story, I suspect, but what I have heard sounded very unpleasant indeed. Good thing it's over." They arrived at the top section of the spacecraft behind the others, finding it was a roughly conical room, circular in shape, with windows forming a band around almost the entire circumference, including a round one in the ceiling. The controls were sparse, mainly a number of flat panels as in the lounge downstairs, on a larger scale, which had whatever control section necessary on them at the time. It was a clean and elegant design, Naito thought, as he watched S'th'kx and three other of his species working around the room. The miner was talking to Yori, both of them studying a display, with Chou looking over the shorter woman's shoulder. All of them dispersed to investigate the room, which was about six metres across, looking out the windows at the view. Although the cameras and projection system they'd experienced so far were remarkable, there was something indefinably more immediate about looking out a transparent window at the same scene. Naito found himself standing between Azumi and Hotaru watching the surface of the moon drift past, smiling slightly and wondering how he'd managed to find himself in this situation. Raising his camera, which he'd brought with him, he took some more photos.

"Do you think they'd mind if I took a couple of the control deck?" he asked Azumi, who glanced at him, then called something to S'th'kx. The captain didn't look away from his task, just waved an arm and called something back.

"He more or less says knock yourself out," the silver-haired woman laughed. Smiling, Naito carefully composed a few shots, grateful for the good lighting, then went back to looking out the window. Leaning forward he tapped on it curiously.

"I always thought putting windows in pressurised vehicles was considered a bit dangerous," Hotaru commented, watching him with interest. She also tapped on the transparent surface. "It might break."

"Not these windows," Azumi assured both of them. "I've seen this before, they use the same thing on that space elevator. The windows are made of a synthetic laminated diamond material about ten centimetres thick. It's more than tough enough to take practically anything. An anti-tank shell would bounce off." Naito looked impressed while Hotaru tapped it harder, listening to the sound with a smile. He got the impression she was curious to see what would happen if she hit it as hard as she could, which, being a rather powerful magical girl, was very hard indeed, but was too polite to try. Something he was to be honest rather grateful for. Catching his eye she grinned for a moment, making him pretty sure he was right. He grinned back.

"Having fun?" he asked. She nodded rapidly.

"How couldn't I have fun?" the girl asked, looking around quickly, her purple hair flying about. Her expression was of great enjoyment. "Look at all this!" The girl watched Yori talk to the alien captain with huge interest, and, if Naito wasn't mistaken, a small amount of hero-worship. He hid a smile, wondering what Yori had done to attract that sort of attention. Something impressive, probably. Noticing Azumi watching them both with a small smile, he looked back, amusement on his face, then began taking more photos.

Hotaru was the first to notice it, gasping in delight. He looked at her, then to where she was looking, his eyes widening. It took several seconds of watching the Earth rise over the moon before he remembered the camera, raising it to his eye and taking shot after shot, grinning like an idiot.
Chapter 71

As has been requested a few times I have appended a list of most characters to the end of this chapter, more or less in the order of introduction. It is based on my own character document, necessary for keeping track of all the people who keep turning up. I will move it to the end of each new chapter as the story progresses.

765k words in nine months. I'm astonished. I never expected it to grow to this size, or anywhere near it. The worrying thing is that there's still a lot to go, banging on the inside of my head, trying to get out. Whether I can keep up an average of 85k words a month I don't know, it depends on free time which I seem to have less of recently, but we'll see...

Akane dialled her sister's number, looking out the window as it rang. She could see the moon was visible, high in the sky, a pale shadow of it's normal brilliance during the day as it now was. Inspecting the pearlescent half-full globe with mild interest she turned away when Nabiki answered. "Hi, 'Biki. How's things going?"

"Pretty well, Akane. I'm just out on a little trip for a few days with some friends."

"Rika and Maiko?", the young woman asked.

"Yes, they're here, and some other people I know. It's a little out of the way, I'm a bit surprised you can reach me. The view is amazing though." There was a faint, suppressed excitement in her older sister's voice. Akane smiled.

"I hope you're getting some good photos."

"Yes, and some video as well. I bought a new camera on holiday, it's pretty damn good." She fell silent for a moment, making Akane think she was talking to someone else. "Anyway, how are things with you and Dad?"

"Everything is going well here too, the Dojo is coming along well, Dad and Uncle Genma are very pleased with the progress of their new students. While you were on holiday Adrian and Matt came over, Aiko brought them, to talk to Shampoo and me about the progress of the situation in Hollywood. Adrian seems very pleased with it."

Nabiki laughed gently. "Yes, Dad mentioned that. How do feel about it? Second thoughts yet?"

"'Biki! Of course not. When I set my mind on something I see it through to the end." Both of them started giggling. "All right, I know that doesn't always hold true."

"Name one time when it did?" her sister asked sardonically. Akane thought for a moment.

"When I grew my hair longer than Kasumi's?"

"OK, I'll give you that one. It didn't last long, though, did it?"

Akane groaned. "Blame the pig. It was his stupid bandanna and that idiotic iron cloth technique. I was lucky it was only my hair."

"Indeed you were. But I seem to remember you weren't all that grateful at the time." Akane flushed a little.
"No." She fell silent for a second or two. "I was wrong. I wish I could apologise."

"Bit late now. Never mind, one day you might have a chance." Nabiki seemed momentarily mildly sad, then cheered up. "So? How is the Hollywood thing going?"

Shaking herself out of the minor melancholic mood she'd fallen into Akane smiled. "Pretty well. They were saying they'd want us over in a few weeks for three or four days. That would be in, hmm, about ten days or so, I guess. I hope Aiko is OK with taking us there." She giggled. "You get used to having a magical girl teleport you around the place awfully quick." Nabiki laughed for a moment.

"I can imagine. If I had access to one I'd be bouncing around all over the world. Maybe go to the moon or something."

Laughing, Akane looked back out the window. "I don't think she could go there. It would be pretty cool though. Anyway, how would you breath?"

"I'd figure something out. Buy a spacesuit on the internet, maybe." Nabiki was giggling furiously.

"You'd need at least two of them. One in extra-small." Grinning, Akane returned her attention to her room, idly moving a few things around on her desk, pushing some of them into a drawer. "But, yes, it's going well here, I think. Matt said he wanted to have us try some driving stunts which sounds fun. He'll arrange some training for a couple of days. Then we can do a few proper scenes in front of cameras and everything, to see how we handle it, and also to show to the various studio executives who need to be convinced. Fingers crossed, but I have a good feeling about it."

"I really hope it all works out, sis. Let me know how it goes."

"I will. When are you next back in Nerima?"

"Not sure at the moment. Rika, Maiko, and I are going to be travelling around for a little longer, visiting some more people. I might pop down to see Miki in Osaka as well. I haven't talked to her for a while. But I guess I could come home first, there's still close to a month of vacation time left."

Smiling, Akane leaned back in her chair. "That sounds fun. I hope you have souvenirs for everyone! And we'll want to see some photos. Give my best to Maiko and Rika, OK?"

"Will do. Love to Dad and the Saotomes."

"Even Genma?" Akane giggled, as did her sister.

"I'm feeling generous, I'm in a very good mood. Even him."

"Great. See you soon. Have fun. Bye, 'Biki."

Her sister's smile could be heard in her voice. "Bye, Akane. See you soon." Hanging up Akane put the phone on the desk, then leaned back with her feet up, staring at the moon.

"Teleport to the moon?" she wondered out loud, then laughed. "Yeah, right. Magical girl or no magical girl, that's a little far-fetched. Neat idea, though."

She got up and left the room to find something to eat.
look out the window at the surface of the moon only a few tens of kilometres away. 'A real alien spaceship, orbiting the moon, and I'm on it! That's just...' She shook her head, unable to come up with anything. '...Weird,' she finally managed, smiling internally. 'Not how I thought all this would end up a month ago.' Ami was scanning everything with her computer, walking around in a daze of information, which ended up with her bouncing off one of the crew-things, who had turned from his console just as she walked past paying insufficient attention. Crew-insects. Whatever they were called. Rei made a note to herself to enquire as to the name of their species, grinning as she watched the alien and Ami do a little dance of 'You first. No, you first, I insist,' both of them getting in the way of each other.

Finally the alien, visibly exasperated, stopped, carefully picked Ami up with all four manipulating limbs, causing her to squeak in shock, then pivoted in place, putting her down behind him, before walking off shaking his head. Even through the species barrier Rei got a good impression of what he was thinking. Ami was red with embarrassment, carefully putting her computer away and paying more attention to her surroundings. Turning away to hide a grin she caught Chou watching, smiling gently, and nodded to her. The blonde smiled more widely, nodded back, then went back to talking to Yori and S'th'kx, who seemed to be trying to decide something.

Sidling up to her blue-haired friend, giggling quietly, Rei whispered, "He seems nice." Ami looked quickly at her, still red, but also giggled a little.

"That was a bit unexpected," she whispered back, quickly moving out of the way of the other crew-member at the same workstation as he joined his colleague, casting the two young human women an apparently curious look on the way. "Can you believe all this?" she added, more loudly, waving her hands at the scenery. Rei looked around, grinning.

"No. Not yet. I keep feeling like I should be pinching myself." Ami helpfully pinched her just to see what would happen, which was in fact a loud yelp, causing everyone to look at them. This time Rei was the red-faced one. "Don't do that, Ami!" she muttered out of the side of her mouth, waving in a friendly manner to S'th'kx, who stared at her for a moment, then said something to Yori, making her grin and nod. The two girls watched as he went back to whatever he was doing, his antennae waving around in an amused fashion.

"Hotaru certainly seems to be enjoying herself," Rei commented, watching the younger girl, who was running around the control deck looking intently at everything, every now and then stopping to admire the moon. Ami nodded, smiling.

"Definitely. I'm glad she came. She's been down every since... what happened last week." The other woman sighed. "It's a pity Haruka refused to even think about coming. She's still pretty sure this is some elaborate trick." Rei shook her head in mild disbelief at the thought.

"It would have to be the most elaborate trick in history in that case. I mean, aliens, interplanetary spacecraft, government agents, implausibly powerful and skilled magical girls... This is like some weird sort of movie, in most ways. Something a comic book company would come up with." They exchanged glances, laughing. "No, even before we do the scan, I'm pretty sure by now that Yori and all her friends are right and we've been wrong all this time. They simply have too much evidence on their side. I suppose we have to check, but..." She shrugged. Ami nodded slowly.

"I'm forced to agree. I was pretty much convinced the first time we spoke. Their story is much better than ours, aside from anything else, no matter what Haruka thinks." She looked around again. "But I'm glad it gave an excuse for all this. It almost makes what happened worth it."

"Almost." They were silent for a while. Glancing at Agent Naito, who was staring at the moon with a definite air of excitement, a small grin playing about his lips as he took yet more photos with his remarkably elaborate camera and talked to Aiko, who seemed happy as well, she asked in a low voice, "Speaking of government spooks, what do you think of Yori's pet one?" Ami followed her gaze and frowned very slightly.

"I'm still not sure. He seems nice enough, true, and obviously very intelligent, but I'm not completely happy about the idea that the government has a department that's been watching us all this time."

"It would bug the hell out of Setsuna if she knew," Rei giggled. "You know what she's like. Or was." Ami grinned momentarily, nodding.

"Oh, wouldn't it freak her out?" She looked back at Agent Naito, who was talking to Chou as the blonde explained something to him, pointing at various screens around the main control area. "I guess he's OK. Yori seems to trust him, as much as she trusts anyone who isn't one of her group, which is quite an endorsement. I'm not exactly overwhelmed with happiness about the whole thing but I suppose it's already happened. May as well make the best of it."

"Hotaru seems to like him, after being a bit worried at first. He just accepts her for what she is which must come as a nice surprise." Rei watched the purple-haired girl bouncing around the room, stopping to examine the camera the government agent was holding, before dashing off to peer into a corner of the room at something or other.

"What do you think about him?" Ami asked.

Rei thought about it for a while. She'd been quite irritated when she found out that the government was watching them, but surprisingly quickly found she just couldn't bring herself to care all that much. Yori and her friends had clearly also been watching them, for nearly as long, and with much greater success, yet that seemed to be working out surprisingly well. After a few seconds, she tried explaining this to her friend. Ami listened, nodding thoughtfully. "I think what I'm saying is that it's too late to worry about it. If anything bad was going to happen it already would have." For a moment she looked sad. "It already has, in a way. It wasn't anything to do with Agent Naito or the government, it was all our own problem, if not our fault. I haven't got anything against him as a person, certainly. I don't know him well enough to either like him or dislike him."

Yori looked over to them, giving Rei the uncomfortable impression she'd heard pretty much every word and making her slightly embarrassed, but merely waved them over. "We're ready to launch the probes. Come and have a look." All the humans clustered around the console S'th'kx was working on. He pointed out the window at a part of the ship, which due to the conical shape and their position near the tip of the cone, was easily visible. A hatch irised open, there was a pause of a few seconds, then a rectangular object emerged, moving out and clear of the ship. It was a dull dark grey in colour, perhaps two metres long by about a quarter of that across, with faint lines on its surface that described equal sized squares. Rei counted quickly, finding it was divided into twenty-four squares in the long dimension by six in the other two.

Once it was roughly a hundred metres away it slowed to a halt. There was a slight pause, then the object exploded in slow motion, separating into hundreds of little cubes. She stared, realising that each of the square markings on the original object were in fact dividing lines, the thing was actually a cluster of these little cubical probes. Eight hundred and sixty four of them, each one only around eight or nine centimetres across. The swarm of probes rapidly dispersed, heading with clear purpose in every direction, and closer to the surface of the moon. Soon they had all vanished from unaided sight. "Wow. That was impressive." Glancing at Ami, she saw the other woman felt much the same. They both looked at Yori. "How many of those things does he carry on board?"
She passed the inquiry on to S'th'kx, who immediately replied. "Sixteen blocks like that and four larger ones of high-speed long range probes, he says. They deploy the long ranges ones to look for asteroids then the short range ones like those to survey them when they find them."

"Do they have much of a failure rate?" Ami enquired curiously. "To have so many of them seems rather over-redundant."

"Apparently they're actually very reliable. He said they're so cheap they go for massive overkill to speed things up." Yori grinned slightly. "I like that approach." Azumi and Chou looked amused while Aiko began laughing.

"You're not kidding, are you?" she chortled, looking up from the display on which the progress of the probes was shown to smile at her friend. "Massive overkill describes you pretty well."

"I'm not cheap, though," Yori snickered.

Smiling at her partner, Chou turned to them. "The probes will cover the entire moon within an hour, in a low orbit. They'll scan the surface at very high resolution, building up a visual map, as well as determining the material, mass concentrations, buried voids, a lot of parameters such as those. Mostly things relevant to mining, which isn't surprising, but it will also show anything else like energy sources, even magical ones. A full scan will take about two days but we should get a preliminary one in a few hours." Ami nodded while Agent Naito listened curiously, clearly wondering what they were looking for. After a moment, he cleared his throat. Chou glanced at him calmly.

"You have a question, Agent?" she asked politely. He nodded.

"Would it be possible to get a copy of that data in a format we can read?" he asked, looking slightly uncertain. The blonde looked at Yori for a moment.

"I believe we could arrange that, subject to first reviewing it for what we're looking for. To be honest, we're not expecting to find it, but if we do, we may have something of a problem..." She looked at Rei and Ami, who nodded very slightly. Hotaru didn't seem to be paying attention, she was staring at the various screens while S'th'kx was bringing up images from a number of the probes, checking their operation.

"I must confess to being very curious but I can contain it," Naito commented, making Chou smile.

"Well done, Agent. I appreciate how mysterious we're being from your point of view but I'm afraid it's unavoidable. I'm sorry."

"Don't be, Chou. You have your secrets, as do all the magical girls." He grinned. "You're just a lot better at keeping them than some are." She giggled, glancing at Ami, who frowned slightly, wondering if she'd somehow been insulted. Rei nudged her, winking when she looked.

S'th'kx sat back, seeming satisfied, as far as Rei could determine, then after a few seconds turned to Yori and talked to her for a while. She looked interested, bringing Chou and Aiko in on the conversation, then Azumi. The five of them talked for a while, while the rest wondered what they were discussing, before Yori nodded. Leaning forward S'th'kx manipulated some more controls, with the result that a larger version of the same probe fleet popped out of another hatch, turning away from the moon then accelerating hard into the distance, vanishing from view almost instantly. Everyone watched it go. A second later another one did the same, heading in a different direction. Another one repeated the action in a third direction.
"What was that?" Ami asked curiously.

"Three of the long range probe blocks I mentioned. S'th'kx suggested that as long as he was in the neighbourhood it might pay to run a deep scan, just in case anything interesting was out there. Those things will drop probes all over the place, all the way out to Jupiter or so, he says. In a day or two they'll be as far as the orbit of Mars. He'll leave a relay station in orbit around the moon, logging the results. We can interrogate it from back home. If anything turns up we can come back and investigate." Prodding some more controls, the captain watched with the rest of them as a half-meter diameter sphere came out of yet another hatch, heading off towards the moon and fading from view as it went. "It's reasonably stealthed, not as well as the ship, but no one will see it. We'll bring him back in a few months to retrieve it and the probes when the scan is finished."

Yori looked pleased, while Agent Naito and Rei and her friends all exchanged glances. "Um, are you expecting to find anything?" the government agent asked tentatively. Yori shrugged. "No idea. It seems like a good idea, though. He's an asteroid miner, after all, he thinks in terms of large high-speed lumps of metal and rock whizzing around the place. Back home they've located and cleared all the ones that might be a hazard to navigation or inhabited planets. He gets a little nervous thinking about the possibility of something like that here." She looked thoughtful. "Frankly, I get a little nervous about that as well now the subject has been raised. So, the probes. Better safe than sorry. He makes a compelling case."

Agent Naito nodded his understanding, looking slightly pale at the concept. "I would tend to agree. Nothing like an asteroid in the face to ruin your day."

"Even a little one," Azumi suggested.

"Doing a full scan of the entire asteroid belt would take years and a lot more probes than that," Chou added, "but those ones should be capable of detecting anything in a dangerous orbit or that stands out for some reason, over the next six to twelve months. The results will be interesting regardless." She smiled at the PSIA agent. "I think we can get you that data as well."

"Thanks, Chou. The PSIA is going to be a little surprised by all this, I think." He grinned. "I know I am."

"Ah. Surprise is the spice of life, or so I'm told," Yori quipped.

"My life is very spicy indeed, then," he retorted with a wide smile, making her start giggling.

S'th'kx stood up, seeming pleased, as far as Rei could work out. For the first time he left his work to study them curiously, having only glanced at them before, due to being busy. After a moment, he turned to Yori and said something. She nodded. "Ami? Can you come with us for a little while? It's a matter of a key." Rei looked at her friend, who nodded slightly, understanding. All three of them disappeared down the exit ramp. Hotaru's attention was diverted from the various displays as Ami followed the other two out. She was about to speak when Rei shot a glance at Agent Naito, who was also watching, then turned back to Hotaru, raising a finger quickly to her lips. The younger woman got the message and swallowed her question, nodding slightly. The man didn't notice.

Ami and the other two came back about twenty minutes later. S'th'kx kept looking at her, then Yori, seeming quite taken aback if Rei was any judge of alien body language. Her friend was smiling slightly, she noticed. Not saying anything, the other woman rejoined her friends, while the captain went to his position, Yori with him. "Well, that part is done now. All we can do is wait for the probe swarm to finish it's work." The black-haired young woman looked around with a grin.
"Who wants to go and have a look at the moon?" Rei knew without looking that Hotaru was the first one to have her hand up, raising her own with enjoyment and a feeling of excitement bubbling in the pit of her stomach, catching sight of Ami beside her doing the same thing at the same time. Glancing at the captain Yori nodded, causing him to turn back to the controls and fiddle with them. Shortly they were moving again, going lower.

Giggling furiously, Hotaru jumped again, putting some effort into it, arcing high above the dusty grey surface. "Don't overdo it, Hotaru," Ami's voice came over the comm system built into the environment suit generator. She sounded both mildly worried and nearly as excited as the younger girl was. Turning her head she could see the short-haired woman bounding around on the surface, going at least as high as she was, falling along a parabolic path at a speed that looked much to slow to be real. Returning her attention to her own jump, she watched the surface slowly rise to meet her, throwing her timing off enough that she stumbled when she landed and did an involuntary double somersault in a cloud of moon dust.

Sitting on the moon, running handfuls of the dust through her force-field-protected fingers, Hotaru was suddenly happier than she'd ever been. She looked around at the scene, almost unable to believe where she was, but only had to glance up to the half-full Earth to prove it.

Grateful that the suit generator blocked enough of the blindingly bright sunlight, and all of the radiation she was sure was flooding the area, she bounced to her feet, giggling again. Her hands were somewhat dusty, the gritty feeling odd but yet more evidence she was somewhere truly unusual. Brushing them together she only succeeded in spreading the moon dust more evenly over them, giving up after a few seconds. She stared at her footprints on the surface, walking carefully along heel to toe, leaving a nice set that were incredibly sharp in the airless environment. Smiling to herself she carefully bent down and left a perfect pair of hand prints at the end of the string of footprints, the suit making sure she came to no harm from touching the otherwise scalding surface. Satisfied, she straightened up, hopped sideways to leave the trail intact, then turned and bounded back towards the others.

That government man, Agent Naito, was taking a lot of photos as he sauntered around the surface in big low-gravity steps, grinning like a twit. He seemed to be enjoying himself hugely. She grinned when she saw he'd changed his clothes from the more casual clothing he'd been wearing on the ship to a nice black suit and white shirt and was wearing a pair of wraparound sunglasses. Yori was watching him and laughing. She caught Hotaru looking at them. "I warned him that the dust would probably ruin his suit, but I also said it would look cool to wear it and the glasses while walking around on the moon. I was right." She snickered. "Apparently he couldn't resist."

Agent Naito glanced at her, a pleased expression on his face. "Of course I couldn't resist, Yori. I'm on the damn moon! That's worth a suit."

"You can probably claim it as a valid expense on a mission," Azumi's voice sounded, an amused tone in it. Hotaru looked around, wondering where she was, finally spotting her on top of a ridge some hundred metres tall half a kilometre away. She waved, the silver-haired girl waving back. "I'd think that the first Japanese representative on the moon is owed that."

"What about you girls?" Agent Naito asked, chuckling.

"Magical girls don't count. We do insane things on a daily basis," Azumi responded. He laughed.

Handing Yori the camera, he asked, "Can you take a few of me, please? I don't know if I can ever show them to anyone but it would be nice to have them."
She obliged, having him stand looking heroically into the distance, point at the earth, lean casually on the spaceship which was neatly parked near a small crater that S'th'kx, two of his crew, and both Chou and Aiko were poking around in, and even standing on his hands, a feat made easy by the low gravity. He was laughing during most of this, having a hard time keeping a straight face, not helped by Hotaru rolling around giggling. He grinned at her before taking up another pose, his back against the ship with his legs crossed at the ankle, looking like he was waiting for a bus. Even Yori was giggling at this point.

"If Japan ever gets a manned space program, one day these photos are going to come to light and really embarrass everyone," she laughed. "Ah. That's the last one on the roll. You'll have to go back inside to change it." He took the camera from her, thanking her, then activated the airlock as they'd all been shown how to do, disappearing back inside the ship. Yori turned to Hotaru who was sitting cross-legged on a large boulder, watching, tossing a brick sized lump of moon rock from hand to hand in slow motion.

"I think I like him," she said. Yori grinned.

"Good. He's a very nice guy." Moving over she sat beside the younger girl. "I hope you're having fun."

"So much fun I can hardly believe it," Hotaru responded, a wide smile on her face. "No matter what happens, thank you so much for letting me come. This is the best thing I've ever done."

"You're more than welcome," Yori responded, appearing pleased.

"And thanks for letting me be the first one out, as well." Hotaru laughed. "One small step for magical girl kind..." Chuckling, the older woman smiled at her, then looked up as Agent Naito came out of the ship again, carrying his camera in one hand and a smaller case in the other. Coming over to them he handed the camera to Yori, who accepted it carefully, then opened the case, putting it on the ground. The lid popped open much faster than he was expecting, a puff of air from inside blowing dust around until it dissipated, all of them watching as the dust dropped to the surface much faster than it normally would.

"Whoops. Forgot about the 'no air' part of being in a vacuum," he laughed. "These suits are so good you don't even notice." Hotaru watched with interest as he pulled out some transparent containers, opening them carefully to allow the air inside to escape.

"What are those for?" she asked curiously.

"The PSIA wanted me to get samples of the moon dust, some small rocks, things like that. They're curious, for one thing, and if we ever need to bribe JAXA they'll come in handy." He grinned while Yori snickered at the thought.

"It was the Director-General's idea. He thinks ahead, a lot like you do. Just in case scenarios. This is just in case one day we need some lunar samples." Kneeling down he carefully scooped some dust from the surface into a container, making sure to get only the top layer, from where it was undisturbed by their footprints, then sealed it, checking the label was correct. Returning it to his case he handed the camera to Yori, who accepted it carefully, then opened the case, putting it on the ground. The lid popped open much faster than he was expecting, a puff of air from inside blowing dust around until it dissipated, all of them watching as the dust dropped to the surface much faster than it normally would.

"Whoops. Forgot about the 'no air' part of being in a vacuum," he laughed. "These suits are so good you don't even notice." Hotaru watched with interest as he pulled out some transparent containers, opening them carefully to allow the air inside to escape.

"What are those for?" she asked curiously.

"The PSIA wanted me to get samples of the moon dust, some small rocks, things like that. They're curious, for one thing, and if we ever need to bribe JAXA they'll come in handy." He grinned while Yori snickered at the thought.

"It was the Director-General's idea. He thinks ahead, a lot like you do. Just in case scenarios. This is just in case one day we need some lunar samples." Kneeling down he carefully scooped some dust from the surface into a container, making sure to get only the top layer, from where it was undisturbed by their footprints, then sealed it, checking the label was correct. Returning it to his case he handed the camera to Yori, who accepted it carefully, then opened the case, putting it on the ground. The lid popped open much faster than he was expecting, a puff of air from inside blowing dust around until it dissipated, all of them watching as the dust dropped to the surface much faster than it normally would.
Watching him for a moment, Hotaru smiled, then hopped to the ground, following, with Yori behind her. Chou glanced up from where she was kneeling, examining an orange patch on the crater floor curiously. Agent Naito spotted it and headed in that direction, pulling out another container for a sample. "I seem to remember the Apollo astronauts found orange material," the blonde commented, watching as he filled the container. He nodded.

"Yes, it was Apollo seventeen, I think. Some sort of volcanic glass. I guess this is probably the same sort of thing." Holding the container up he checked it was full, then put the lid back on, placing it into the case. He stood again, turning to study S't'h'kx and his crew who were clustered around some sort of device the captain was holding, looking at it intently. "What are they doing?"

Chou looked to where he was staring, then smiled. "Mining habits die hard. He's checking for anything interesting from a mineral point of view. That's some sort of deep scan device. So far, he says it's full of boring light elements like magnesium and silicon, nothing worth very much, although there's more than enough oxygen and water to make a base here practical given the right hardware." Naito nodded, returning his attention to his sample jars. He headed off in another direction towards an unusually dark patch of soil.

Looking at Hotaru, Chou smiled. "You certainly seem to be making the most of this, Hotaru," she said, amusement in her voice. "I'm very glad. You seemed rather unhappy last time we spoke, which is understandable. I hope this has cheered you up."

"It has, very much, thanks. It's a dream come true. And a hell of a lot of fun. I mean, look at that!" She pointed at the Earth, visible low in the sky, much larger than the moon seen from the other end. You could just about make out the outlines of Australia and Eastern China above it, with many clouds visible through the haze of atmosphere. "It's just... so damn amazing." Turning she looked at the spaceship sitting quietly on the surface, then further around her friends jumping about in the distance, with S't'h'kx and his people looking up every now and then with what looked like amusement. "So amazing."

The blonde woman followed her gaze, nodding with a small smile. "It's very impressive, I have to agree, and something I didn't expect to do. I'm glad we did though." She grinned as Rei did a slow triple somersault in the middle distance, Ami trying the same thing but only getting two and a half turns in before she bounced off the lunar regolith in a shower of dust. Rei landed much more gracefully, turning and apparently laughing her head off. "They seem to be enjoying themselves," she added, watching as Ami sat up rubbing her head, then picked up a piece of moon rock and threw it at her friend, who caught it, looking at it, before putting it in her pocket.

Aiko wandered over taking large slow-motion steps, grinning as she did. "This is huge fun," she said happily. "Like walking around on one of those inflatable fun rides, only a thousand times better." Stopping she hopped into the 'air', getting a couple of metres up, then gently dropping down again. "Nearly as good as flying." Hotaru wondered what she meant but got distracted when Azumi jumped clean over the spaceship and landed beside them, laughing.

"I could practically get into orbit here, I think", the silver-haired girl said.

"Not quite, we're strong, but not that strong," Chou replied, looking amused. "But you could certainly go a very long way if you really tried."

"Have you tried teleporting yet?" Azumi asked Aiko.

The other woman shook her head. "Not yet. I was getting used to the landscape and the low gravity before I tried it. I need some time to kind of get the area in my mind properly. It's difficult to explain to someone who doesn't teleport, but it's important. I'll need another half hour or so, then I'll try some short range stuff, just around here, to get the hang of it. Once I'm happy I'm basically 'calibrated' I'll try a jump home. It'll be good if it works."

"Do you think you can go that far?" Hotaru asked, amazed. Aiko shrugged a little.

"I should be able to. As far as I know there's no actual distance limitation if you have enough power, not with this spell. It's a very weird one, apparently, not at all like the 'normal' methods of doing it. I know that jumping from one side of the planet at home to the other is as easy as going from room to room aside from requiring a little more energy. The moon to the Earth is about thirty times the maximum distance I can go on the same planet, so it shouldn't take much more than that difference in energy, which is no problem."

"Assuming a linear relationship between distance and energy requirement," Ami's voice cut in, as she bounded up, Rei beside her. Aiko glanced at her, then nodded.

"True enough. But as far as I know it's linear, or if not, more on the lines of an inverse exponential function of some sort. It's possible the energy per unit of distance might go down with very large distances, but worst case it should only stay the same. There's only one way to find out. The magic didn't come with a manual." She grinned. Ami laughed for a few seconds.

"I can imagine. Ours did, but it was the wrong one." Hotaru started giggling, as the others smiled.

"Yori thinks it should work, and even if it doesn't won't go wrong in any dramatic manner. As far as she and Chou could work out from the spell, which they've studied very closely, if you try to do something dangerous it just doesn't work at all. Some sort of fail-safe built into it." Aiko looked relieved about this fact. Ami studied her for a moment, then glanced at Chou, who nodded.

"It's an exceptionally effective, efficient, and well designed bit of magic," she confirmed. "I wish we knew who came up with it originally, but whoever it was lived a very long time ago."

"Do you mind if I scan your attempt, Aiko?" the blue-haired girl asked curiously. Aiko laughed.

"Not at all. Help yourself, I'll be interested to see what your device finds out."

S'th'kx and his two crew-members came over, having a short conversation with Yori and Chou before heading back into the ship. "He says he's getting hungry, this place is very boring mineralogically, and he'd meet us inside when we're tired of bouncing around like idiots." She laughed, as did Chou. "I think he was hoping for something interesting. He was smiling when he said it."

"How can you tell?" Rei asked, genuinely curious. Hotaru grinned at her.

"Didn't you see it? The angle of his antennae, that shows amusement. It's pretty obvious. When he curls them right back he's annoyed, waving them shows interest." She shrugged as her friends looked at her in astonishment. Yori snickered.

"Very well observed, and exactly right. You've got an eye for this sort of thing." Feeling pleased, the younger woman smiled back at the older one, who she was becoming very fond of.

"Thanks." Looking around, she spotted Agent Naito poking about in some rocks and bounded off to see what he was doing.

"Right. I think I'm ready. Ami, if you want to scan the process, I'll jump just over there by that big rock for the first test." Aiko pointed. Looking at her computer screen, Ami fiddled with the controls for a moment, before nodding, satisfied.

"Any time you're ready, Aiko." A moment later the brunette disappeared, reappearing with no measurable time delay more or less in the place she'd indicated.

"Hmm. Not quite right. OK, I'll come back." Once more the flash and she was standing where she'd started from. "Better." Looking around, she pointed to the ridge Azumi had been standing on earlier. "That should do." Once more Ami nodded. The flash came and went and Aiko was standing right on the top of the outcrop, seeming pleased. "Got it. Bang on. OK, I'm going to double check with a few longer jumps. See you in a moment." She vanished again.

Thirty seconds later she reappeared in her original position, smiling. "Got it locked in. Great."

"The readings are very interesting," Ami noted, scrolling through the information her machine was giving her, looking at it intently. "The efficiency of the spell is remarkably high. Pity about the bright flash, if you could suppress that somehow it would be even more effective in a fight." Yori glanced at her, nodding approvingly.

"Very good. That's the right sort of thinking. We've been trying to work out a method of either not dissipating that last little bit of energy or perhaps either storing it, emitting it in some non-visible wavelength, or damping it out with a counter-spell. It's a tricky problem." Ami thought about this for a moment.

"I'd be interested in talking to you later about that. Your magic method is... very weird. And fascinating. Would that be OK?"

"I think so," the other woman replied after a glance at her partner. "It would be quite interesting to see if you have the same problems a lot of traditional magic workers do with it. Actually learning it might be problematic but it's worth looking into when we get this all resolved."

Aiko looked between then, grinned, and pointed at herself. "Look at me. This is about me at the moment. I'm going to do something amazing." She giggled. "Or completely fail to do anything at all. One or the other." Yori laughed softly, turning to her friend and bowing slightly.

"My apologies, Aiko. Please, proceed with the experiment."

Chuckling to herself, Aiko looked at the Earth, visible in the far, far, far distance. She frowned slightly. "Hmm." After a moment she nodded in satisfaction. "Ah. I think that's it. It feels like I have a lock. It's taking a lot more energy than normal but about the right amount for a linear increase." Ami watched with interest. "I'm aiming at the place we left from for the first attempt," the brunette said. Taking a deep breath, the petite woman nodded sharply, then as everyone closed their eyes, vanished.

"Holy shit!" Rei squawked in shock, rubbing her eyes. "Fuck me, that was bright!"

"My eyes! My eyes! The spacesuit, it does nothing!" Hotaru moaned, laughing slightly at the end of the sentence but still blinking furiously.

"Ow." Yori shook her head.

When she could see again properly, Ami checked her scan results. "Well, it dissipated about thirty times the energy, which makes sense, I guess. That was an extremely bright flash. I'm glad my eyes were shut."
"The question is, did she make it?" Agent Naito asked, sounding worried, still blinking. His sunglasses in conjunction with the suit generator had left him less flash-blinded than the rest.

"Yes, she did," Chou replied, appearing to listen. "But she's puking her guts out at the moment. It would seem the distance is enough to trigger the first-time response again, rather vigorously." Four people looked at her in wonder.

"I have to find out how you do that," Ami muttered to herself. The blonde gave her an amused look.

A couple of minutes later, Aiko reappeared, staggering slightly. Azumi immediately moved to support her friend. "Thanks." She shook her head. "God, that was horrible. Much, much worse than the first time."

"Do you think it will do it next time?" Agent Naito asked, wincing as he seemed to remember his own reaction the first time through a teleport. Looking like she couldn't believe what she was doing, Aiko stepped away from them.

"Only one way to find out." She waited as everyone both closed their eyes and turned around, then jumped again. Seconds later she was back, grinning widely.

"No. At least that part works the same. I'm damn glad about that, it would be very unpleasant to go through that each time." Looking around, she added, "Anyone want to go through just to get it over with?"

After a moment, Yori sighed and stepped forward, accompanied by Azumi. "All right. It's not a bad idea. Back in a moment, guys." Once more they all turned around. Ami kept her eyes open this time, noticing with some surprise that the flash was bright enough to illuminate the outcropping that Aiko had used in her first test, as well as some taller hills behind it.

"I wonder if that's bright enough to see from Earth?" she mused. Chou followed her gaze.

"It will confuse people quite a lot if anyone notices, I suspect," she giggled. After a moment she winced. "Oh dear. Azumi reacted even more badly to the teleport than Aiko did. Yori is more or less OK although she fell over."

"Not much phases her, does it?" the PSIA man said, smiling. Chou laughed with a nod.

"No, it doesn't."

Several minutes later the three women reappeared, Azumi looking quite green, which clashed with her hair and eye colour horribly. "Oh, god. That was absolutely revolting." Yori appeared mildly unwell, while Aiko seemed fine.

"Anyone else? Probably best to do it this way around, so you can throw up with breathable air around you." Chou stepped forward, joined after a moment by Rei. Hotaru looked at them, then at Ami, before sighing and joining them.

"I'm going to regret this, aren't I?" Agent Naito groaned, slowly moving to the purple-haired girl's side. Ami nodded.

"Probably." She also joined the group. Yori and Azumi, who seemed to have recovered, grinned at them and waved.

"Oh. my. G..." Rei's exclamation was cut off by retching sounds. Ami, on her hands and knees in the grass, wasn't really listening. All around her she could hear unpleasant noises telling of a number of severely annoyed digestive systems complaining about the forces of nature being so cruelly twisted. When she was finally empty, she dry heaved for a moment or two, before staggering to her feet, feeling weak, idly noticing the suit generator had disengaged now they were in a breathable atmosphere again.

"That was very unpleasant," Chou said beside her, not looking at all well. She pulled a couple of bottles of water from nowhere, handing one to Ami, then opened the other one and swilled her mouth out a couple of times before draining the remainder. Ami did the same, spitting a few times.

"That's one way of putting it," Hotaru groaned, rolling over onto her back, managing to avoid the vomit on the grass.

"Thank god it only happens once," Rei mumbled. Chou gave each of them a bottle of water, then moved to help Agent Naito to his feet. His sunglasses had fallen off and he was pale and sweating.
Giving him some water as well, having helpfully opened it first, the blonde bent down and retrieved his dark glasses.

"I don't think I've ever felt that sick before," he moaned, bending over and putting his hands on his knees as another spasm came and went, luckily without anything else making an appearance.
Slowly straightening, he drank some more water. "I really hope that won't happen again."

"It won't," Aiko assured him, looking at the man in sympathy. "It is pretty horrible but that should be the last time.'

Handing his glasses back, having cleaned them, Chou turned to Ami and the others. "Does anyone have any lasting symptoms?" There was a chorus of weak 'No' answers. Pulling out her computer, which she'd left scanning to record the teleport, Ami inspected it, somewhat surprised by the results. As far as the little magitech device could determine the transit time of the long range teleport was essentially zero, no different than a normal one, a few of which she had recorded in the past.

"That's weird," she muttered, looking at a graphic it provided her. Sensing Aiko beside her she showed her the result. "It take the same time regardless of distance. And that time is so short it's basically no time at all."

"Interesting," the brunette said, looking at the screen, "Very interesting. I wonder if there even is a distance limitation? Assuming I had enough energy available, of course."

"Based on this, no, I think you were right, the process gets more efficient as the range goes up. The ratio between the energy output from the moon and a local jump is actually slightly less than the ratio of the distances. I'd need more data to plot a curve but I wouldn't be surprised to see it eventually levelled off. Whether that would allow arbitrarily long jumps I don't know." She looked away from the screen, meeting Aiko's eyes. "I still can't figure out how it deals with the momentum, the velocity difference between here and where we were is very significant, never mind the amount of gravitational potential energy involved. But then, it's magic." She grinned as Aiko laughed, nodding.

"That it is. I gave up worrying about it a long time ago. But if you ever work it out, I'd love to hear it. You're one of the very few people who might stand a chance of understanding the mechanics of it all. You should talk to Chou and Yori about that one day, they've raised the issue of magical efficiency several times." Aiko looked over to the blonde, who smiled at her.

"Shall we go back?" she asked.
"May as well. OK, you all know the drill, take your positions." Ami made sure she was standing in the right place then closed her eyes, taking a deep breath, just in case, but in the end only felt a mild disorientation. Her environment generator beeped quietly at her to let her know it was active once more and the abrupt drop in gravity told her she was back where she'd started from. Opening her eyes she looked around, grinning. Even with her lifestyle, the idea that you could go from somewhere in Japan to standing on the moon so easily was a bit surprising.

"A successful test, I think," Chou commented, glancing at her, then at Aiko, who grinned and nodded.

"Damn right. I was a little worried about it at first, I know you guys said it wouldn't work if it was actually dangerous, but..." She shrugged apologetically as Chou laughed gently. "There's always a first time to be wrong."

"Luckily, this wasn't that time," her friend responded. They smiled at each other, before walking over to Yori and Azumi, with the others following them. Azumi looked perfectly normal now, obviously having recovered.

"Has everyone had enough of wandering around for the moment?" Yori asked, looking around. "I'm getting hungry, so we could have something to eat, then maybe go and look around somewhere else. Azumi suggested having a look at the Apollo landing sites."

Ami smiled, and also noticed how Hotaru and Agent Naito's eyes lit up. "That sounds like a good idea," she exclaimed.

"I think so." Yori grinned, then looked more serious. "I think we should institute a rule that we look from a distance, though. Those are important historical sites aside from anything else. It would be dishonourable to damage them." After a moments thought they all nodded one after another.

"So no stealing a NASA souvenir then?" Rei joked, sounding slightly disappointed. Ami gave her a severe glance.

"No. Leave the space toys alone." Rei giggled as her friend folded her arms and stared hard at her.

"Aww. OK, I guess being here is good enough."

"We could have a look at the Russian landers as well," Chou suggested. "We can find them easily enough." They headed back to the spaceship, looking around one last time.

"This is an interesting place," Hotaru smiled, bending down and picking up a few fist sized moon rocks, juggling them carefully, a task made easy by the low gravity. Watching with a smile Ami agreed.

"You were right, this damn dust gets everywhere," Naito complained, brushing his suit off, feeling the ship vibrate subtly as it took off, heading for orbit again.

"It's a little toxic as well, so don't breathe it," Yori advised, watching with a grin. He stopped mid-brush, looking suspiciously at the cloud of dust hanging in the air.

"Toxic? Now you tell me." She chuckled.

"Don't worry. The environmental system will decontaminate the place pretty fast. We'll check everyone before we leave and make sure there's no damage." He watched as something suddenly seemed to notice the dust, which fell to the floor much faster than it should have and vanished slowly into it. Slightly worried in case the floor decided to eat his shoes as well, he headed towards the room he’d been assigned, deciding to change into something less dusty. "Put your suit and anything else covered in dust into the storage unit like I showed you," Yori called to him. "It will remove the dust but it won't damage anything." He nodded, waving over his shoulder as he poked the appropriate control, watching as the door irised open, then stepping through. Inside the small but reasonable sized cabin he quickly changed, following her suggestion. The small cupboard-sized storage unit emitted some faint, slightly disturbing noises for a few minutes, then displayed an icon on the display on the door he'd learned meant basically 'Task complete' and pinged at him.

Opening the door he found everything inside spotless, as if it had been polished. The suit still smelt oddly like gunpowder, a smell he'd heard was associated with moon dust but had never expected to encounter first-hand, but seemed clean. After inspecting it closely he folded it and put it back in his case, pulling out another magazine of film and changing the depleted one on the camera. Sitting on the bed, which although slightly odd in size, was the most comfortable one he'd ever encountered, he reached for his notebook and a pen, quickly jotting down more notes and observations for his report. At the rate his notebook was filling up he expected the report would be more akin to a book.

'An SF one,' he mused, grinning, while he tried to think of the right way to describe the teleportation sickness. In the end he settled for 'very unwell', laughing slightly at the massive understatement. Putting the notebook and pen away he lay down on the bed for a short rest, staring at the ceiling of the compartment while he went over the last few hours in his mind. Thinking of bounding around in lunar gravity while wearing ordinary street clothes he laughed out loud. 'I must have the best job in the world,' he thought, grinning wildly. 'I'm very glad I met all these people, as terrifying as it is sometimes. They're going to do amazing things, even more amazing than they have so far, I suspect.' Recalling the way Hotaru had opened up, laughing like she was happier than she could believe, he grinned again. 'Nice girl. I hope Yori and the others manage to sort out the problems with her group.' Rolling to his feet he straightened his clothes, picked up his camera, then went to find the others.

In the common room he stopped dead, staring at the table, which was now considerably larger, required as it was covered in food. Some of it was obviously alien in origin, a bowl filled with spiky blue things that looked a little like deep fried sea urchins, some odd looking vegetables, one of which he could swear was looking back at him, strange seeming mugs with some type of brown liquid in it, steaming gently, but the other things...

Walking over he watched with amazement as S'th'kx cautiously picked up a slice of pizza from a box with a New York address on it, inspecting it curiously. After a moment, and a quick query to Chou, who told him something, he did the alien equivalent of taking a deep breath and tried a little. There was no reaction for a moment, then he squeaked happily and shoved the entire slice into his mouth, his antennae waving frantically. Chou giggled, glancing at Yori, who was doing much the same thing, grinning at the same time.

The PSIA man stared, then laughed, shaking his head. "You went to New York from the MOON to get pizza?" Aiko smiled at his expression.

"Yep. And Brisbane for Sushi, Hong Kong for ramen, a place in London that does a damn good chicken vindaloo, and Hobart in Tasmania for some of the best fish and chips I've ever had." She laughed out loud at his look of astonishment. "Hey, I just found out I can do interplanetary teleportation! I needed to celebrate. Miso soup?" The girl handed him a bowl which he took slightly dazedly. "Chou made it. It's the best I've had, her soup."
Shaking his head, he muttered, "Every time I think I've seen everything you girls can do to surprise me..." Trying the soup his eyes widened. "Wow. This is good." He grinned at Chou, who smiled back appreciatively. "Magical girl, unbelievable healer, incredible martial artist, and now chef? Is there anything you can't do?" She laughed gently, looking mildly embarrassed.

"I like cooking. I've done it since I was little."

"Well, you're damn good at it, that's all I can say."

"Thank you, Agent. It's nice of you to say so." She delicately spooned some curry up and tried it, nodding in satisfaction. "Yes, you're right, Aiko, this is very good indeed. We'll have to go there sometime."

"There's a really nice Sri Lankan restaurant next door, and an amazing Thai place across the street as well. I don't know why the UK has a reputation for bad food, I know some amazing places there." Aiko ate some ramen, smiling happily. "Did you know that chicken tikka masala is a British invention? And it's the most popular dish in the country on average?" Naito exchanged glances with Chou, both of them smiling. Aiko certainly liked finding interesting places to eat, distance no object.

Beside Yori, S'th'kx had finished half a large pizza, looking pleased himself. Naito found he was becoming quite aware of the alien body language much faster than he'd expected. They still slightly surprised him, they did after all look very different from humans, but he'd realised early on that under the, to him, unusual exterior were some very intelligent and decent people. Hotaru seemed to have picked up on it almost immediately, clearly at ease with the aliens, and was currently offering one of the other crew-men some fish and chips, trying to express in mime how good it was. He looked at her, then the plate she was holding out, before visibly shrugging and trying some. Shortly he'd finished the lot and was looking speculatively at the bowl of curry.

Grinning, Naito turned his attention to the less recognisable food. "What are those?" he asked, pointing at the blue spiky things. Azumi glanced at him, then them.

"Damn good, actually. Some sort of flash-fried seasoned vegetable. They're a very popular snack on the K'nn worlds. Try some." He did, cautiously at first, then more eagerly.

"Hey, those are very nice. A bit like a cross between a roasted nut and a pear, if that makes sense." She laughed.

"I know what you mean. I ate dozens of them the first time I was here." She looked thoughtful. "That reminds me, I need to pick some more up. I finished off all the ones I got last time." Looking at Chou, she grinned. "We need to go shopping before we go back." The blonde smiled, eating one of the blue things herself.

"That can be arranged, I'm sure."

After the lunch was finished, they cleared the remains away, Chou carefully storing the left-overs somewhere or other, before making the table go away and the seats come back. Yori went off with S'th'kx and his crew, presumably heading back to the command deck, Azumi and Ami accompanying them. Slumping into a seat which obligingly reconfigured itself to allow him to lie back, Naito smiled the smile of a well-fed man. "That was a damn good meal," he said quietly. "Thank you, Aiko, and you, Chou."

"You're very welcome, Agent," the blonde said gracefully.
"Call me Masao, Chou. We've known each other for long enough and gone through enough to dispense with the formalities. Same goes for the rest of you." He grinned at her and Aiko, then leaned back, closing his eyes.

"Thank you, Masao. That's good of you." Her gentle voice was as soothing as always. Thinking once more how she'd make an exceptional doctor just based on how relaxed she could make you by talking to you, leaving the healing abilities out of it, he drifted off into a pleasant postprandial doze, a smile on his face.

"I'm telling you, Mike, I saw it! It was this weird rainbow shimmering sort of flash, right up there on the upper quadrant of the visible limb, near the horizon. It was bright enough to show up even with the illumination from the sun, but I'd never have seen it if I wasn't looking at exactly the right place."

"There's nothing there now, Chris. I can't see any evidence of a new crater, or any ejecta. You sure it wasn't your imagination?" Mike leaned back from the eyepiece, rubbing his eyes for a moment, then looked again. "Are you sure the camera was off?"

"Yes, damn it. I was realigning the scope and just happened to be looking through it when it happened, I hadn't re-engaged the computer yet, so there's no record. I can't believe it. The first time something interesting happens in a year of staring at the moon and I don't have any proof." Chris sighed, slumping at his desk, his head in his hands. "No one will ever believe me. Even you don't believe me." His friend and colleague snorted with amusement, still looking through the telescope.

"I'm not saying I don't believe you, Chris, all I'm saying is that I can't see anything..." He stopped dead in shock, blinking as his eyes recovered from the pinprick of brilliant light, with a rainbow fringe, that had come and gone in an instant. Chris looked up at the sudden interruption.

"What?" he asked. Mike stared harder, adjusting the controls slightly, zooming in and altering the focus.

"Hmm?"

"What? You were in the middle of saying something then you just stopped." Unable to see anything else, Mike turned to his colleague.

"I believe you." Chris stared at him for a moment.

"It happened again, didn't it?" His colleague nodded slowly.

"Yes. I have no idea what it was, but it was exactly as you described it. At least this time we have a record." Chris' face froze, then very slowly fell. Mike gazed at him for a long few seconds, his heart sinking.

"You did re-engage the computer and camera, right?" There was no response except a long-faced look. "Right?"

"I got distracted trying to see it again and forgot!" Chris wailed, banging his head on the desk. "Fuck it!" Mike sighed in a long-suffering manner, reaching over the desk to the telescope control console and pressing a couple of buttons. As the computer took over the control of the telescope, recording high-resolution images to disk, they stared at the monitor, hoping that whatever it had been would happen again.
They were still watching fruitlessly when the sun came up.

"That's incredible," Ami breathed, watching the solid-appearing totally realistic model of the moon slowly rotating in the middle of the control deck. Reaching out she waved her hand through it, grinning as she felt absolutely nothing, but still managed to make the sphere rotate faster as if she'd touched a real object.

"The projectors are pretty damn good," Yori agreed, standing beside her. "Almost all the data is in now. S'th'kx says it will be complete in about an hour. But we have enough to be sure there's nothing there." She looked at the captain who was at a nearby console, asking him something. He adjusted some controls on his screen, looking at the projected model as he did. It changed colour, dimming down considerably, with spots in bright colours appearing in a number of places. "These are all the places with elements consistent with artificial construction. Every one corresponds to known or suspected landing or crash sites from American or Russian missions, except this one, which is the recent Japanese one." She reached out and spun the projection, showing how many there were. Dozens of coloured patches appeared all over the surface.

"Wow. I hadn't really realised how many things we'd dumped on the moon," Ami commented, watching with fascination.

"There are rather a lot. I was surprised as well." Circling a place on the projection with her finger, Yori made a fist and pulled back, causing the projection to zoom hugely, as if they were only a few hundred metres up. "This is the Apollo 11 site, for example."

"The resolution is amazing." Ami leaned closer. "You can see the footprints perfectly."

"Ground resolution is about a millimetre or so. They don't bother going higher for a mining survey, this is the highest resolution the probes we used can normally do. But it has all sorts of data other than the visual stuff." Once more she made a request and the image changed. "That's water ice, for example." Huge patches of colour appeared over much of the surface, concentrating at the south pole.

"Good grief. There's a hell of a lot of it. I always thought the moon was dry."

"It's all under the surface, but S'th'kx thinks it's more than enough to run a number of large bases given the right technology." They spent some time going through different spectral ranges, looking at the underground details as well, before Ami sighed, half in resignation, half in wonder.

"It's definite, then. Nothing from the 'Silver Millennium' at all."

Yori shook her head slowly. "No. No magical or other high energy power sources, only a few low output radioisotope ones slowly decaying away in some of the Russian and American landers. No large scale construction, on or beneath the surface. Nothing bigger than the descent stages of the Apollo missions. All sorts of things of interest to scientists but there's absolutely no trace of anything connected with your mythology, I'm afraid. Not that I was expecting there would be, it would have been quite a surprise, but I think this proves it beyond doubt." She turned as S'th'kx told her something, nodding her understanding. "That's the last of the data feed, the scan is complete. Nothing in the new data either."

With a gesture Ami reduced the projection to the rotating sphere, a metre across, that she'd first seen, then folded her arms and stared wordlessly at it for a while. Yori said nothing, just watching her, letting her think. Eventually she looked at the petite woman. "Thank you. I believed you all along, but there was still a little voice at the back of my head saying 'What if she's wrong?' This has put that to rest." She shook her head slowly. "I hope it will do the same for the others. Rei and Hotaru will believe it, I know, but I'm not sure with the rest. Haruka, perhaps. Possibly even Setsuna, although I'd never have thought that likely until last time we spoke. But I'm pretty sure Usagi will just think it's a trick, even assuming I can persuade her to look at it in the first place, and the rest of them may well feel the same."

"If this doesn't convince them nothing we say will, I guess. It doesn't really matter. As long as they don't do stupid things and break the scenery they can believe anything they want to as far as I'm concerned." Yori grinned, although there was an edge of sadness to her expression. "It's a pity but we can't force it on them." Turning and talking to the captain for a moment, she took the pair of two-centimetre cubes he handed her, giving one to Ami and vanishing the other. "This is a full copy of the raw data. Your computer should easily be able to access it. I can get you a portable projector when we go back to K'n'n four as well, if you want. That can reproduce what the ship one can do."

Accepting the storage cube Ami nodded, smiling. "Thanks. I'd like that."

"No problem. Let's go and show it to the others. Now I'm certain there's nothing in the data that could breach the subjects covered by the security spell I can show Agent Naito as well. I'll have to get the PSIA a projector too and make sure it has an interface that they can access with their computers. That shouldn't be too difficult."

Heading down the ramp they went to the common room, where everyone else was talking, looking at the view. Agent Naito was chatting to Rei, while changing the film in his camera, nodding as the girl pointed at something in the distance. Chou, Hotaru, and Azumi seemed to be enjoying a joke, the younger girl laughing so hard she couldn't stand up, with Azumi grinning widely. The blonde glanced over as they entered, smiling, then got up and walked over. "Ready for a snack?" she asked. Ami nodded, as did Yori, who looked pleased.

"Yes, love, please, that would be great. Some coffee as well, I think." Shortly they were sitting down staring at the projected image in the middle of the room, sipping coffee. Ami took Rei and Hotaru to one side and went over her conclusions, knowing Yori had discreetly shielded them from the government man, who didn't seem to notice, or perhaps was simply polite enough not to. He clearly didn't want to get involved in their private business which she appreciated.

"So there really is nothing?" Hotaru asked, watching the model rotate slowly. Ami shook her head.

"No. Absolutely no trace of anything not either natural or man-made, very recently. Lots of debris from both the Americans and the Russians but that's it." The violet-haired young woman sighed with a small nod.

"I understand. Despite everything I was sort of hoping..." She shrugged, sighing again. Rei put her arm around her shoulders.

"In a small way I was as well. But I think it's better this way. Now we know. It probably means Yori and her friends are right about everything else as well, which hopefully means there is some way to deal with it all."

"Guess so," Hotaru mumbled, closing her eyes in apparent disappointment for a second or two, then opening them and looking around. She saw Yori watching them sympathetically, smiling briefly at the other woman, who smiled back then resumed talking to Agent Naito. "Oh, well."

"It's a shock, I know, but we'll get through it," Ami told her young friend, sure she was right.
"We've got some very effective allies now. If anyone can work it out it's them." She grinned at the others. "And we got to walk on the moon, for god's sake! How many people can say that?"
Giggling suddenly Hotaru cheered up. "That's true. It was fantastic."

Rei nodded her agreement. "Very true. I still can't believe it." Smiling at the younger woman, she dropped her arm. "Come on, let's have something to eat and look at that model. It's pretty impressive." They felt the magic Yori had put around them vanish as they walked over, Ami smiling her thanks. The other woman grinned. Handing her a cup of coffee, she pointed to the table. "Still some pizza left, and some of the food from the processors as well. That sort of custard stuff is pretty nice on those weird pink fruit." All three of them headed for the food.

Finishing his coffee Naito put the cup down, turning back to the extraordinarily detailed projection of the moon floating in space a few metres away. "I still find that remarkable," he commented to Chou, who smiled at him, looking to where he was. She nodded her agreement.

"It's a very interesting result, certainly. The data cube Yori gave you has a lot more information stored on it that can't be represented visually so easily, of course, but the projection is fascinating."

"Can I really get a device that can project it like that to take back home?" he asked curiously. She laughed gently.

"Easily. It will take a little bit of custom work to have it equipped with a suitable network interface to allow it to be linked into a computer at the PSIA but S'th'k'x knows where we can get that done in a very short period of time. They're quite used to having to deal with alien data formats as a result of trading with so many different species' native computer systems." He shook his head in wonder.

"It's amazing to me how matter of fact you lot are about all this. Even after the last two days." Waving his hand, he indicated the entire room and the spaceship beyond it. "All this is... very strange. But a lot of fun. I've very glad I came."

"So am I, Masao. We're all glad we could show you something more of the world we know, without it being associated with some hideous emergency." He grinned as she giggled. "Not everything on the other side of a portal means harm. In fact, very little of it does. You just tend to remember the bad bits."

"When it's trying to eat you it does tend to stick in your memory," he chuckled. The young woman nodded, smiling at the comment.

"I can imagine it would." She studied him for a moment. "Have you begun your report yet?" she asked curiously.

"It's difficult to know where to begin." Moving to a seat he sat down, Chou sitting beside him. Looking at her, then the projection again, he shrugged. "I've been taking a lot of notes, of course. I assume you both know I was asked to pay very careful attention to everything about these aliens, what was on the other side of the portal, all that sort of thing." She nodded, smiling gently, not looking either surprised or upset.

"Yes, we know that. It would be the obvious and responsible thing to do in any case."

"The Director-General, and by extension the Japanese government, is both extremely curious and somewhat worried about the amount of interworld activity in Minato, which is steadily increasing, more and more rapidly recently. Particularly around your area." Chou nodded once more.

"We're aware of that. We know most of the people involved. While I can't say why the hostile incursions seem to be increasing, the friendly ones, which vastly outnumber them, are mostly because less travellers are being attacked since we cracked down on that sort of thing rather heavily. Word gets around. For some reason Minato is much easier to create an inbound portal to which is why so many end up there, although so far no one seems to be able to say why that should be. We have a number of things on our world that are in high demand in other ones, chocolate and coffee being the two most obvious items, although there are a lot of travellers that are inordinately fond of ice cream as well." She laughed as he shook his head in wonder. "There are quite a few other goods as well that are traded. Precious metals are currently the main trade goods in the other direction."

"That would explain the fairly significant amount of gold and silver entering the system from Minato recently."

"Indeed." She inspected him thoughtfully for a few seconds, apparently trying to decide something. "We have been talking about other trade activities with Uthryyl in recent weeks. It's still in the preliminary stages but there are some intriguing possibilities. It turns out that there are a number of plant-derived chemicals that have a considerable value to certain other species, much higher than even coffee or chocolate, which are already quite valuable. We've been looking into acquiring useful quantities of these compounds to use as trade goods. Azumi particularly is quite interested in seeing what could be arranged. She and Uthryyl have an agreement over trade, more comprehensive than the ones he has with a few merchants at home."

Naito looked at her for a moment, then turned to peer at Azumi, who was talking to Hotaru. She glanced back, clearly noticing the attention. After a couple of seconds he returned his gaze to Chou. "In exchange for what?" he asked. "Chemicals go out, what comes back?"

The blonde smiled a little. "Oh, mostly useful things. One of the items discussed was mattresses like the ones you've spent the last two nights in. Art, as well, both ways probably. Both our species have similar enough tastes to make that entirely feasible. Possibly movies and books as well in the outbound direction, Uthryyl's people quite like our literature." She smiled at his look of mild astonishment. "Oh, yes, and we shouldn't forget the fusion reactors."

"..."

Naito stared at her in total shock, not sure he'd heard correctly.

"...Fusion...?"

"Reactors, yes," Azumi's voice came from beside him, making him jump and squeak in shock. She was grinning when he recovered and glared at her.

"Don't do that!" he muttered, before remembering what they were talking about. "Fusion reactors? Really?"

"Yep." She sat on the floor in front of them both, cross-legged, looking pleased and amused. "I'm still researching it at this end, but Uthryyl has everything at the other end pretty much ready. There's some export documentation from his world that still needs finishing but that won't take all that long now." Naito became aware he was gaping at her with his mouth hanging open and closed it with a snap.

Azumi chuckled at the look on his face. "I was talking to Uthryyl some months ago and the subject came up. We looked into it a bit more when we were on holiday. There is a world that can provide us with as many of the things as we want in a pre-built, turnkey operation, completely fail-safe format, ranging from a small ten megawatt unit up to something in the multiple gigawatt range. Uthryyl can provide the helium-three fuel as well in whatever quantity we'd need. He worked it out and came to the conclusion that ten metric tons a year would provide the entirety of the energy requirements of Japan. That's about a hundred and seventy cubic metres. A cube about five and a half metres on a side." The PSIA man found he was gaping again.

"No pollution, no dangerous waste products, practically no noise. Just uncrate it, configure it, fuel it, and turn it on." Azumi studied his face, which had gone a funny colour, for a few seconds. "Do you think that would be something the government would be OK with?"

Several minutes passed in silence. Ami and Rei wandered over, clearly wondering why Naito was looking so shell-shocked. Eventually he asked, "You're serious?"

"Completely."

"All our energy requirements?"

"Correct."

"And all they want is some processed plants?"

Azumi grinned. "Pretty much. We're still looking into that part of things, there's quite a lot involved in it, but we have a list of chemicals, several of which we've already located, and there are a number of others that look possible. They're worth a very large amount to the right people. Much more than gold or platinum would be to us, because they're much rarer on other worlds."

He shook his head while Ami glanced at Rei, then both of them looked curiously at Azumi, who was smiling. "The deal would go through Uthryyl, who is probably the only trader at the moment who could arrange it. He's a major player on a number of worlds, a very close friend, and totally trustworthy."

There was another long pause. "You're seriously suggesting that we can buy alien fusion reactors from another world and run Japan with them?" He was still having trouble with the concept. Azumi smiled while Chou began giggling.

"That's the basic idea. We're not sure yet whether we'd sell them outright or long-term lease them. There are pros and cons to both methods. The things are completely sealed and basically maintenance free, at least on the smaller end of the scale. The larger ones need a certain amount of intermittent servicing, something we could arrange training for local technicians for, or simply have the manufacturers technicians come and do. They'd be supplied on a contract that ruled out tampering with them, not that anyone could do much except damage one to the point it stopped working. The basic design is nearly a hundred and fifty years old and incredibly reliable, they come with an unconditional guarantee that's good for about fifty years and as far as I can find out no one has claimed on it in close to twice that. They just work."

Ami was looking somewhat shocked as well by this point, having realised what they were talking about. She sat down and listened intently.

"The fuel can be supplied in more or less any desired quantity. It's completely safe except for being a deeply cryogenic fluid, but our people already have a lot of experience in handling bulk cryogenic substances, industry uses them in large quantities for all sorts of things. We've been trying to work out the issues with introducing this sort of technology for a while now, technically it's quite easy, but politically it could be an absolute minefield. I was hoping to get everything sorted out from the practical side of things before I mentioned it to anyone locally but Chou seems to have let the cat out of the bag slightly early." The silver-haired girl gave her colleague a mildly exasperated look which provoked a small giggle and a shrug.
"It seemed like a good time to tell him, Azumi. It won't go to anyone who shouldn't know at this point and he's the first one we'd have talked to anyway." Chou smiled at Naito, who felt slightly surprised yet rather pleased. "I assume it won't go to anyone who shouldn't know?"

He nodded. "I'll make sure of that. The Director-General will be very interested, though, I think." Privately he was thinking, 'He's going to have kittens. We thought something interesting might happen but this is beyond belief! Cheap practical fusion power, just like that? The government will offer them anything they want for that.' He could see that both women had a fairly good idea what he was thinking, judging by their expressions.

"The oil companies, and the nuclear ones, are going to have a fit when they find out," was what he said. Azumi shrugged, smiling a little.

"Tough. Burning fossil fuels isn't sustainable, something they damn well know. It's not like the demand for oil will disappear, it's much too useful for all sorts of things other than fuel. Burning it is criminally wasteful if you look at it like that, it's far more valuable in the long term as a raw material for plastics, fertiliser, drugs, you name it."

Nodding slowly, he smiled a bit. "True enough. I don't know they'll see it that way though. Not at first."

"As far as the nuclear industry is concerned, again, we need some of the things they produce, but fission power plants and nuclear weapons aren't particularly helpful in the long run. The fusion units are proliferation proof, can't be made into weapons, and we can make sure we only supply them to applications that are non-offensive. None of us have any problems with defence systems but Uthryyl himself wouldn't supply them to anyone who was going to use them for offensive purposes. He feels rather strongly about that. Personal history." Azumi looked slightly sad. "It's a long story, not mine to tell."

"Well, I think it's an amazing idea, myself. I'm pretty sure most people would agree. But I also think there are going to be all sorts of ramifications from cheap clean power. It will have to be dealt with carefully." Azumi nodded her understanding.

"That's what I thought. It's a way off yet, although we can get a unit or two for evaluation easily. Perhaps the PSIA would be able to suggest the best way forward. I think it's important that we go ahead with it, though, even if there are problems as a result. The problems with sticking with what we have are going to be a lot worse if what I've been finding out about it are even half-way true. Climatic shifts, pollution, political instability, you name it. Energy costs are the driving force behind a hell of a lot of world-wide problems. Even cheap clean drinking water, which low-cost energy would make possible almost anywhere, would make an enormous difference to a vast number of people."

"The situation in places in the middle east could be improved a lot by cheap water," Ami suggested, looking fascinated. They both looked at her. "A lot of the tensions there are caused by the limited natural resources, from what I can see," she added. "Water is essential but scarce. That causes nasty problems. Make it available and a lot of problems go away, there and elsewhere."

"It's a good point," Chou agreed. "A lot of African countries also suffer from the same problem. If you have to spend half your time or more looking for water and food, you don't have a lot left to learn about the world, which perpetuates poverty and strife. It feeds on itself. Something as simple as clean water available everywhere would fix a lot of problems."

Naito shook his head slowly, staring at them all. "I always thought you lot would change the world in some manner but I wasn't expecting this sort of thing, and not so soon." He grinned as Azumi laughed. "I'll put it in my report."

"It should be an interesting one," Chou remarked with amusement.

"My best one yet," he agreed happily. "Maybe one day they'll be a best-seller." All four women laughed at this.

"We can expand to the rest of the world in time. In the long run we could hopefully switch away completely from fossil fuels. There are some interesting battery technologies that are applicable to transportation," Azumi told him. "But that's for another time. Right now, getting some big fusion plants up and running is the thing I'm interested in. When all the paperwork is sorted out at Uthryyl's end I'll let you know. As I said, I can get an evaluation unit without too much trouble. I would think that there would be people interested in playing with it."

"Most likely," he replied dead-pan. Ami and Rei went back to Hotaru, the blue-haired girl glancing wonderingly at the silver-haired one now and then. She grinned, rising to her feet.

"It's going to be fun, certainly."

He chuckled as she and Chou walked off, heading back to the table, leaving him alone with his thoughts.

Walking onto the control deck, Ami glanced around, smiling at Rei and Hotaru, who were watching the view again, before heading towards Yori. She was speaking to S'th'kx and one of his crew, as they worked on a pair of consoles next to each other. Her expression was one of curious worry. "So, what's going on?" the girl asked. Yori looked up for a moment.

"The long range probes found something weird. Out past the orbit of Mars, about half-way between there and the asteroid belt." Ami felt her stomach lurch.

"Is it dangerous?"

Yori shrugged. "We're not sure yet. It's in a stable orbit, so that's good, it's not heading this way at least, but there's definitely something odd going on. S'th'kx is sending the probe closer under manual control to have a look." The mining captain looked at her and said something, causing her to nod and reply. "It's in position. He's bringing the image up over there." Indicating the point in space where she'd seen the moon data projected, Yori turned to watch, as did everyone else. A few seconds later an image of a very slowly tumbling something appeared, getting steadily larger.

"An asteroid?"

"I think so. A little one if that data is right." Yori read the alien text across the bottom of the projection with a frown. "Still a damn big lump of rock though. About a kilometre across." The image swelled continuously as the distant probe approached it's target. Looking between the projection and his console S'th'kx made careful adjustments, finally indicating satisfaction. He turned to watch the image directly, walking closer. After a moment his antennae stuck straight up, then laid down over his back, something Ami hadn't seen before. He said something in a low voice. Everyone watched in surprise, before Ami turned to Yori.

"What did he say?"

The young woman was staring at her friend with an odd expression. After a moment, she looked at Ami.
"Roughly translated, it was 'Well, fuck me..."
'What the hell is that?' Shampoo thought to herself, stopping in her tracks, staring at the small furry thing with an inordinately large number of excessively large and sharp teeth that had just scuttled around the side of the building at the end of the alley she was walking down in Minato. She was there having decided to risk going for a shopping trip. It also stopped, staring at her, its head on one side. 'It looks a bit like one of those little monsters from that silly American film, what was it called again? Something about not getting them wet...' The creature cocked its head the other way, its large ears moving around. The expression on its furry face was more one of puzzlement if anything. They watched each other from about twenty metres apart for a few seconds. When she didn't move, just stared at it, the thing quickly looked around, returning its attention to her every now and then, in quick jerky movements like a bird.

Taking a cautious step forward the Amazon studied the thing carefully. It was too small, less than about two thirds of a metre tall, more or less bipedal although with a long tail, to look particularly dangerous, but the speed of the motions and the size and number of the teeth made her wary nonetheless. As did the fact that she'd never seen or heard of anything like it before. When she moved it snapped its gaze back to her, tensing slightly, so she froze again.

'Is it some weird sort of animal? Maybe it escaped from the zoo or something...' She mused on its origins. 'It would almost be cute if it wasn't for the teeth.' Not sure whether she should approach it, run away, or call for animal control, she jumped when it suddenly darted sideways and opened its mouth a preposterously large distance, taking a bite out of a telephone pole. Chewing loudly, crunching noises coming from the metal and wood in its mouth, it looked at her again, tilting its head curiously. Her face paled.

'Um. Not so cute. Not at all.' The thing took another bite out of the pole, which creaked loudly before very slowly tipping over with a series of cracking sounds, ending up at a forty-five degree angle, only the wires at the top holding it up. Shampoo paled further and took a step back. 'Very uncute, in fact. More like very dangerous. What the hell is it?' The little monster took a couple of quick steps towards her, making her twitch and step back again. Taking this as encouragement it ran at her. Yelping, she turned and bolted, hearing quick little steps behind her.

"Gahh! Monster!" she yelled, unable to help herself, then felt embarrassed. Pulling a pair of chúi out of ki space she darted around a corner, stopped, flattening herself against the wall, then waited. As the thing dashed around the corner in pursuit she lashed out at it, knocking it head over heels into the opposite wall. "Ha!"

The little creature sat up, shaking its head and looking stunned, then after a moment its eyes focussed on her. It growled.

"Um..." The sound was much more intimidating than it should have been from something so small. She stopped looking pleased and instead looked worried. Stepping towards her slowly, the thing growled again. "Oh crap."

The creature dived at her, making her yelp again, drop one of her chúi and jump straight up, to grab the edge of the roof two stories up and swing herself onto it. Rolling to her feet she peered down, seeing it looking up at her, chewing on the club she'd dropped. She grinned at it, waving in a mocking manner. "Missed me!" Turning around to see where she was she stopped dead.

"Oh, fucking crap..."
The six other identical little monsters arrayed behind her stared at her, all cocking their heads in a way that wasn't even slightly cute any more. One of them was in the process of swallowing the remains of a TV antenna, the base of which was sticking up, ragged and chewed, from the roof beside it. Behind her, she heard claws scrabble on brickwork as the one from the alley climbed the wall. It was still growling.

As the sound grew steadily louder, and closer, she looked around, trying not to make any sudden move. 'Not good. Now what do I do?' the lilac-haired woman thought frantically. Putting her remaining chúi away she stared around for a weapon. All she had other than the club was a knife. Pulling it out, even knowing it wasn't a particularly good option right now, she held it ready while moving slowly along the roof, away from the little creatures in front of her and the one that had just topped the wall behind her.

That one made a croaking noise, causing the others to look at it, then return their attention to her. One or two of the new ones also growled. "Uh-oh." She moved faster. They followed as a group. "Go away, you little bastards," she mumbled, frantically looking around. People attacking her, that she was perfectly comfortable with, but whatever these damn things were, it was a little unexpected and well out of her comfort zone.

All of them were growling now, a low rumble that raised the hairs on her neck. It was quite intimidating. Feeling foolish about being scared of a pack of knee-high whatevers, she nonetheless couldn't help it, the way they casually ate things that were normally inedible was more than slightly intimidating. Feeling a loose tile under her left foot, she bent and picked it up, not taking her eyes off the creatures, then bounced it accurately off the head of the one in front as hard as she could. It dropped like a stone, it's head completely crushed, while the tile exploded into fragments. The remaining six things stopped, looking at the dead one, then pounced. Seconds later there was nothing but scraps of fur. They'd even eaten the broken pieces of tile.

Shampoo went white as they all looked at each other then returned their attention to her. They charged.

She ran for her life, swearing at the top of her voice in Mandarin. Minato was totally insane! All she'd wanted to do was go shopping.

"Oh for fuck's sake!" Tamiko sighed heavily as a blast of magical energy shot over her head and impacted on a large truck, punching a hole all the way through it from back to front, yet totally missing the small furry thing eating one of the vehicle's wheels. The creature jumped, scuttling off under the damaged truck, while the twelve-year-old girl in the fancy dress looked guilty, lowering the elaborate staff with the glowing blue gem held in a fixture at the top, from which the magic had come. "Will you for god's sake at least try to aim, Chiyoko?"

"Sorry," a small voice said. Hearing a sound behind her the girl whirled, raising the staff and letting off another blast, which made the old lady coming out of a shop scream and hit the pavement as the door she was holding in one hand partially evaporated in a cloud of mystic energy.

"At the goddam demons, you little twit!" Tamiko screeched in rage. Chiyoko blushed, lowering her weapon once more. Shaking her head in disgust, the red-head hurried over and helped the elderly woman to her feet, retrieving her shopping and handing it to her, before brushing her down. Both of them gave the young girl filthy looks. "I'm sorry, Mrs Shizuka. She's a bit..."

The old woman nodded. "Yes, we all know about Chiyoko." She glared at the girl who looked away, pretending she wasn't present, busying herself with the embroidery on her sleeve. "She's a little over-exuberant."
"And a fucking terrible shot," Tamiko muttered. The old lady smiled very slightly.

"I would have to agree." She looked around at the half-dozen smoking holes in the scenery. "Did she actually hit anything at all she was aiming at?" she whispered. Tamiko shook her head.

"No. Unless she was aiming at that truck," she whispered back. "And the mail box. And the street-light. And that poodle." They looked in the last direction, both wincing. "Poor thing."

"Never liked it, too yappy," the old woman said. Tamiko stared at her for a moment, then shrugged.

"Not a problem any more."

"Not really, no." Mrs Shizuka looked around. "Where are your friends?"

"There are a lot of these little demons this time, they're all over the place. Misaki and Fumiko are chasing them around near Roppongi, they got into one of the bars and it got pretty wild. It turns out that they're even worse when they get drunk." She sighed. "And swallowing two bottles of extremely expensive brandy is enough to make one very drunk." The old woman smirked at this.

"Was there a lot of alcohol present?"

"Oh, believe me, more than enough." Shaking her head, Tamiko suddenly went stony faced as the sound of the magical blast came again, followed by tinkling glass. The sounds died away.

"Sorry."

Turning very slowly the red-head fixed the young girl with a deathly glare. "Do that again and I'll take that damn thing away from you for good," she grated. Chiyoko looked at the ground, kicking it with the toe of one boot, while trying to hide the staff behind her back. Since it was at least thirty centimetres longer than she was tall this was fairly ineffective. After glaring at the girl for another few seconds, Tamiko returned her attention to Mrs Shizuka, who was smiling again.

"At least the little swine don't seem to go after people unless you really provoke them. They eat damn near everything else otherwise. Hopefully, we can contain th..." She stopped, looking puzzled, then stared off to one side. After a second or two the old woman and the young magical girl also heard what she'd noticed, a faint yell growing rapidly closer, underlaid by an odd noise that seemed to be a mix of a growling sound and a rushing noise like rapid raindrops. All three of them turned in the direction it was coming from.

"aaaaaAAAAAAAAAAAaaaaa!"

They pivoted to watch the athletic young woman, long lilac hair streaming behind her and her silk clothes somewhat tattered and torn, pelt past at remarkably high speed. Tamiko opened her mouth, then closed it again as a horde of the little monsters ran past in a pattering of tiny feet, not sparing them a glance. The continuous multi-voiced growling rising from the swarm was very unnerving. They watched Shampoo disappear around a corner in the distance, the demons following. Sighing, Tamiko pinched the bridge of her nose.

"Oh, god."

Mrs Shizuka patted her comfortingly on the shoulder. "I have the greatest confidence in you and your friends, Tamiko. I'm sure you can sort it out." Smiling, she nodded to the young woman, glanced at the much younger one with a faint sigh, then went on her way. Tamiko sagged a little.
"Right. Come on, Chiyoko. DO NOT fire that damn thing until I tell you to, got it?" The girl nodded as she trailed after Tamiko, both of them headed in the direction the panicked Amazon had vanished in, from which screams were coming.

"Every fucking time they go away to enjoy themselves, the entire district goes to hell..." Tamiko mumbled under her breath as they ran, overtaking the local news van that had pulled out of a side street and was heading in the same direction.

Behind them, the small demonic creature climbed out from under the truck, looked quickly around, then went back to finishing off the tire.

"Good grief," Fumiko muttered, watching Shampoo pirouette gracefully on one foot, smacking two of the little demons with Chiyoko's magic staff hard enough to splash them across the front of the restaurant on the other side of the street. She moved to avoid the splatter. Chiyoko herself was watching, crying, and nursing a black eye where the Amazon had caught her a solid blow in the face when she'd relieved the magical girl of her weapon the second time she'd nearly been hit with the blast from it.

Momentarily more worried about and scared of the wild magic than the demons, she'd pounced on the younger girl, confiscated the staff after a short and very one sided battle, spent mere seconds trying to figure out how to make it produce one of the coruscating and very effective, presuming one could actually aim, beams of magic, then sworn viciously and resorted to using it as an improvised pole-arm. In this she was remarkably successful, having accounted for some eighteen of the small vermin in the last ten minutes.

"She's pretty damn good, isn't she?" Misaki commented approvingly, ducking as another little demon flew overhead in pieces. Shampoo yodelled an Amazon war-cry and chased three of the things which took one look and ran for it. The local reporter and camera crew observing from a safe distance panned to follow her, wondering who the somewhat bedraggled girl was, but quite impressed with her bloodthirsty attitude.

"Not bad at all," Tamiko agreed, grinning. "Aiko said she was impressive when she got going. I think those little shits caught her by surprise and without any real weapons. No idea how she made them attack her like that, though. She certainly seems to mean business now." All of them watched as the lilac-haired girl brought the staff down in a one-handed overhand strike that crushed another mini-demon flat with an unpleasant crunch, bouncing the weapon off the pavement and into her other hand with which she executed a sideways sweep that finished off a second one. Misaki clapped, grinning. The third lunged for her ankle, mouth gaping, but expired with a loud bang as a ki sphere from Fumiko removed its head.

Glancing over Shampoo nodded acknowledgement of the aid before turning to the final pair of micro-monsters. They lasted about thirty seconds. As the last one perished she lowered the end of the now somewhat gooey staff to the ground and sighed heavily, slumping in exhaustion. After a moment she walked slowly over, limping slightly and dragging the staff loudly behind her over the pavement, handing it to Chiyoko without looking. The young girl took it quickly, then looked disgusted as it slid out of her hands to clatter on the ground, trailing demon innards.

"Oh, yuck!" she exclaimed faintly, staring at her hands. Tamiko snickered. Snickering turned into giggling when the girl turned and threw up. Fumiko and Misaki exchanged glances, shrugging slightly, before looking at Shampoo.

The Amazon woman was scratched and bloody, her clothes in tatters and bluish demon blood all over her, but seemed surprisingly happy. "Good workout," she muttered, wiping some of the worst of her erstwhile opponents off her face and hands, flicking it to the ground. Chiyoko, who had just turned back, wiping her mouth, stared in horror then vomited again. Tamiko was now weak with laughter.

"Hello, Shampoo. It's been a while," Fumiko grinned, glancing at her team-mates. She stuck out her hand. "What on earth started all that?"

"Hi, Fumiko. I have no idea, really. I was just going shopping and one of those things jumped me.
It kind of snowballed from there." Shampoo shook hands then looked around. "What the hell are they?"

Jerking her thumb at Chiyoko, Misaki looked amused. "They're her demons. Or she's their magical girl. We still don't know which way it goes. They tend to turn up together, things get eaten, or blown up, or normally both. She's not a good shot."

"I noticed," the other woman muttered, glaring at the young girl, who looked nauseous, yet guilty at the same time. She dropped her eyes. Very gingerly picking up her staff she began wiping it down with a handkerchief, casting Shampoo evil looks, which the Amazon ignored completely.
Tamiko was watching with sparkling eyes, barely able to prevent herself giggling again. "Does she always blow holes in everything but the damn demons?" Shampoo asked acidly.

"Yes," three voices chorused. Chiyoko sighed, keeping her eyes on her staff, but flushed. She couldn't deny it, not with the craters and holes all around them as evidence.

"Sorry," she mumbled. Everyone ignored her.

"That seems to be the last of them," Fumiko said with satisfaction, looking around. "Misaki and I got about thirty-six or so in Roppongi, Tamiko did another twenty over that way, you got..." She counted corpses quickly, raising an eyebrow, "twenty-three, twenty-four, twenty-five of them here, and Chiyoko got... One." They all looked at the girl, who sighed again. "And two trucks, a lamp-post, a mail box, a shop, three cars, a motor-cycle, a greenhouse, five windows, and Mr Ishikawa's poodle." She shook her head. "He's not going to be happy about that."

"It was a very annoying little dog," Tamiko noted. Her friend nodded absently, watching Shampoo brush entrails off what was left of her clothes. She pulled a large towel from nowhere.

"Here." Taking it gratefully, the Amazon wiped as much demon blood and guts off herself as she could.

"How's your leg?" Fumiko asked her. Shampoo looked down.

"It stings a bit. Those little bastards bite."

"They do indeed. I hate the fuckers. I always get nibbled, normally." She grinned a little. "This time you seem to have stood in for me." Shampoo giggled, reaching down and prodding the toothmarks on her leg, grimacing a bit.

"It's not too bad. I've had worse. It'll heal." The three girls looked approving at her matter-of-fact attitude. "My clothes are a mess though," she added, frowning down at herself. "I liked that shirt, it was a nice one."

"Come on. let's go and get you cleaned up, find you something to wear, then look for some food." Tamiko waved towards the end of the street. "There's a decent restaurant down there. My treat." She smiled as Shampoo nodded happily. "We just need to get rid of all these bodies, that won't take long. Chiyoko?" The young girl looked up. "Go home. Your mother will be calling me and complaining again if you don't. Remember what happened last time?"

Wincing, the girl nodded. "She wasn't happy."

"No, she wasn't. She'll see this on the news again then blame us for dragging you into it, which isn't exactly fair. I really can't deal with your mom yelling at me on top of all of this, it's going to be annoying enough dealing with all the damage." Chiyoko sighed, looking around, then nodded once more, resting her staff over her shoulder and waving good-bye.

"See you next time!" she called back cheerily as she left. Tamiko's face fell. Laughing, Fumiko guided her friend towards the nearest body, which Misaki was in the process of dissolving.

"She means well, you know," the tall girl snickered.

"I know. I just wish she'd learn to aim..."

Giggling, Shampoo followed, shaking her head in wonder. Minato was a very strange place.

"Thanks for helping with the clothes," Shampoo said, looking down at herself. Fumiko had taken her to a clothes shop she knew the owner of, who had seemed remarkable casual about a goo covered, scratched, and bleeding young woman requiring replacement garments. It wasn't the sort of thing she normally wore, being nice jeans and a decent cotton shirt, but it had been inexpensive and fitted well.

"No problem. You helped with those little bitey bastards, after all, so fair's fair." Fumiko grinned at her. "Thinking of taking up the magical girl lifestyle?"

Shampoo paled, shaking her head vigorously. "No fear of that, believe me. I've seen some of the things you lot fight on the news. Those irritating little animals were one thing, but the bigger ones?" She shuddered. "Nope. No way. I know my limitations."

Tamiko laughed, spooning soup into her mouth. "You did a very good job, Shampoo. You may not have any serious fighting magic but you're a damn efficient warrior." The red-head smiled as the Amazon looked pleased.

"Thanks. Considering where it's coming from, that's quite a compliment."

Misaki laughed slightly. "It's true, though. Those things are more irritating than really dangerous but twenty-five of them, one after another? That must be some sort of record."

"Where do they come from?" Shampoo asked curiously, reaching for the soy sauce. Tamiko and Fumiko glanced at each other, shrugging slightly.

"We don't really know. Not from a normal portal, that's certain, but other than that..." Tamiko looked puzzled. "Even Yori can't work it out. Chiyoko wanders in every now and then, either following the little devils, or being chased by them, but we've never figured out how they get here, or to be honest what her relationship to them is. She doesn't seem to know either. It's kind of weird even in magical girl terms."

"She seems nice enough but she really needs to learn to shoot straight," the Amazon commented. Tamiko sighed heavily.

"God, I so wish she would. She's absolutely terrible at it. She normally does manage to either finish them off or chase them away, but there's always holes all over the place. That magic staff of hers is pretty powerful. It seems to be able to blow a hole in almost anything. Luckily she's never hit anyone with it."

"Unless you count small yappy poodles," Misaki chuckled. Tamiko shook her head in disgust.

"I don't, but it's going to be hard to explain. Mr Ishikawa liked that little thing even if no-one else did." She put her spoon in the empty bowl, pushing it to one side. "At least it was quick. Nothing left except the hind legs and the tail." Fumiko winced a little.

"She nearly got Mrs Shizuka this time," Tamiko added, looking annoyed, before laughing a little. "She sure ducks fast for a seventy-five year old."

"If someone is shooting magic energy beams at you I guess you'd be pretty quick at getting out of the way," Shampoo suggested, smiling slightly. The auburn-haired young woman grimaced, nodding.

"Very true. Oh well, hopefully the girl will stay away for a while this time." She grumbled to herself for a moment. "It's always when Yori and Chou are out of town that all this sort of crap happens. Very annoying."

Finishing her duck, Shampoo moved on to the fish stew, nodding appreciatively. "I heard they'd gone on holiday recently. Then there was all the trouble with that other magical girl group. Did they go back to finish their holiday?" Tamiko looked at Fumiko and her sister for a moment.

"No, they're away on... I guess, business, is the best way of putting it. They should be back in a day or two. Aiko and Azumi are with them."

"I haven't met Azumi, although I've heard a few things about her over the last few months," the Amazon said idly, before chewing and swallowing. "Apparently she's new at the magical girl thing but is quickly building quite a reputation."

Fumiko snickered. "Oh, she's doing that, all right. She's damn good, actually. Very quick to learn, a hell of a lot of potential, very smart. And pretty creepy some of the time. People tend to surrender at that point."

"Yori can do that as well," Misaki laughed. "Incredibly well."

"Oh, she's nowhere near as genuinely scary as Yori is, but she's pretty cold and unnerving even so. Not as bad as Ms Aoyama, though."

"No one is as bad as Ms Aoyama," Shampoo whispered, trembling for a moment. "Or at least I desperately hope so. If they are, I never want to meet them."

All four girls exchanged a glance of understanding. Internally, Tamiko and her friends were giggling, although they fully understood the Amazon's point. Nabiki was family, but even so, Ms Aoyama was horrific...
Clearing her throat, Tamiko attracted Shampoo's attention. "Are you looking forward to this Hollywood thing, Shampoo?" The Amazon blinked a few times at the change of subject then smiled.

"Yes." She looked curiously at the red-head. "You know about that?"

"Yep. It was Yori's idea, she told us all when she came up with it. Aiko has been having fun taking you guys back and forth, or bringing the studio people here the other week, and she's told us what's going on. It sounds like it's going well."

"It is, I think. Akane is very excited about it all, as well as being very nervous. She keeps saying she's afraid she'll wake up one day and find it was all a dream." Shampoo grinned. "I was a bit unsure myself at first but now I really do think it's going to happen, and be a lot of fun. I'm really looking forward to it. It will be a little strange being so far away from everyone else I know, but Akane will be there, the people we've met are very nice, and even though America is weird, that part of it seems interesting." She looked slightly uncertain for a moment. "The only difficult part is I'll have to get better at English pretty fast. I want to learn it, that's one of the reasons I'm looking forward to this, but I'm really not good with languages."

"You pick them up fast when you're immersed in them, trust me," Tamiko noted, picking up her bottle of beer and taking a drink from it. "You'll be fine."

"Hopefully," the Amazon responded, smiling as she thought about the future. "Even Great Grandmother seems to think so."

"You should make sure you get a recording of the news later. That camera crew probably got some good footage of you in action. It might be useful for your résumé." Misaki grinned as Shampoo looked embarrassed yet thoughtful. "You didn't even notice them, did you?"

"I was sort of busy," the Amazon replied with a smile. Her face fell slightly. "Great Grandmother is going to be very amused about it all. She'll probably critique me and tell me where I went wrong as well." The other girls laughed.

"Yori does the same thing, only probably worse." Fumiko grinned at her.

They talked for another half hour, until they'd finished the meal, then Shampoo looked at her watch. "Thanks very much for the clothes and the food, you guys. It's been fun, except for the being chased by a horde of ravenous little demons part of the day. That was a little unexpected."

The other three laughed.

"You get used to it," Misaki replied.

"With all due respect, I'd prefer not to. My life is bizarre enough already." Shampoo snickered. She stood up. "I'm going to have to get back. I didn't even get a chance to go shopping, in the way I wanted to." She shrugged slightly. "Perhaps next time." Shaking hands with them all she smiled. "It was nice seeing you again. Are you going to be able to make it to Nodoka's garden party?"

Tamiko nodded, smiling. "I think so. We haven't heard the exact date so far, I think Akane's sister Nabiki was going to pass it on to Yori when she knew, but it should be possible. When Yori gets back I'll ask if she's heard anything yet. It sounds like fun though."

"Nodoka is a very good cook. The food will be nice." Shampoo and the three girls walked out into the sunlight after Tamiko paid for the meal. "Nabiki is still on holiday as well. Akane said she heard from her a couple of days ago, she should be back soon." Checking her watch again she added, "I have to go, the next train is in ten minutes. Say hi to Yori, Chou, and Aiko for me, please?"

"We will," Fumiko assured her. "Give our best to Akane. Hopefully we'll see you all in Nerima at some point soon." They waved as Shampoo turned and jogged off towards the train station, glancing at each other with amused smiles, then headed off to catalogue the damage.

"What do you want?"

The tone of voice wasn't friendly. Neither was the expression. The woman with green hair sighed, looking at the blonde, who was glaring at her. "May I sit?" she requested politely, indicating the other chair at the café table. There was an uncomfortable pause but in the end the other woman nodded curtly.

"If you must."

"Thank you." Setsuna sat down, glancing at the waitress who was approaching. "Just a coffee, please." The waitress smiled and reversed her course, returning quickly with a cup and various accoutrements. Waiting until she'd left, Setsuna picked up her coffee and sipped it, a slightly lost expression on her face. Haruka watched her with hostile curiosity. She didn't look well. After another sip, the woman across from her put her cup down, her hand trembling very slightly in the process.

"You wanted something?" Haruka asked, studying her former team-mate over her own drink.

"Just to talk." Setsuna's eyes flicked around in a way that the blonde would have sworn was nervous, if she didn't know her better. "Did you hear that?"

"What?" Haruka looked around, seeing nothing, before looking back to the other woman.

"A sort of very faint hum." Her table-mate glanced around in quick motions, even looking up. "I keep hearing it. But there's never anything there." Listening, the blonde eventually shook her head.

"I can't hear anything. Only the normal sounds for a café."

Her companion seemed to listen carefully for a moment, then shrugged, apparently dismissing the subject. "I just wanted to talk," she repeated.

"You said that."

An expression of slight puzzlement crossed the older woman's face. "Did I? When?"

Haruka sighed faintly. "Just now."

"Oh. Yes, right, I remember." Setsuna picked up her coffee and sipped it again, before looking at the cup with a bemused expression, then carefully putting it down. "Did I order this?"

"Yes. Less than five minutes ago." Studying the other woman, Haruka asked, "Are you feeling all right?"

"More or less." She paused. "I think so. Can you hear something?" Glancing around suspiciously, she added, "A faint humming sound? It seems to be following me."

Staring at the woman who had steered their group for several years, Haruka wondered if she was entirely sane. It wasn't the first time she'd wondered that but it was the first time she'd seen behaviour that could suggest it was anything more than an idle thought. "No. You already asked me. I can't hear anything."

"OK." Picking up her coffee again Setsuna drank some more, leaning back and looking around. "It's a very nice day."

The blonde looked at her weirdly. This was strange even under the recent circumstances. "Setsuna? Are you sure you're all right? Only you're acting very... ah... odd." The green-haired woman looked up from examining her half-empty cup, slightly surprised.

"Oh, hello, Haruka. How are you?"

Putting her own coffee down and massaging her forehead, which was beginning to ache, Haruka sighed heavily. "I'm fine, thanks, all things considered. A lot on my mind but otherwise well. Now, back to you. You said you wanted to talk."

"Did I?" Setsuna looked thoughtful. "I wonder what about?"

"Oh, for fuck's sake," her companion mumbled. More loudly, she snapped, "I have no idea. You're the one who approached me! Concentrate, will you? What... did... you... want... to... talk... about...?" She enunciated the words slowly and clearly. Setsuna appeared insulted.

"There's no reason to be rude, Haruka." She shook her head in irritation. "What were we talking about?"

Haruka groaned, banging her head on the table.

"Can you hear a sort of humming noise?"

"Gaaaahhh!"

Roaring with laughter, Cologne stared at the TV, watching the mid-afternoon local news. The sight of her great-granddaughter waving a clearly mystical weapon like a baseball bat struck her as deeply funny for some reason. The way she'd mugged the young magical girl to acquire it was even funnier.

"How many is that so far?" Mousse asked from beside her, grinning widely.

"Nineteen, I think," she replied, laughing again as Shampoo belted one of the weird little demonic animals clear across the street and into a lamp-post, which it slid down limply in a trail of body fluids. The old woman nodded approvingly. "Good form. She's not bad."

"I thought she was going to be a stunt woman not a magical girl," the young man chuckled. They heard a sound outside of someone coming up the stairs, turning to see Shampoo entering the living room. She was wearing different clothes than she'd left in that morning, not surprising assuming the news report was accurate. Smiling a greeting at them her eyes moved past to fix on the television, as she stopped dead in embarrassed surprise.

"Oh. You've seen it," she mumbled. Cologne chuckled.

"I have indeed, child. To be honest, while I'm somewhat surprised by your new career choice, you seem well fitted to it." She grinned as the young woman sighed in exasperation.

"I'm not planning on becoming a magical girl, Great Grandmother, trust me. Hollywood is fine."
She shrugged. "It's much less insane than Minato. Or even Nerima."

"From what I gather a lot of people think Nerima is weirder than Minato," the old woman replied, looking amused.

"Mainly people who have never been to Minato. Trust me, it's nuts. I've been there twice and weird things happened both times." Shampoo limped to a chair and slumped into it, watching herself on the TV. Cologne and Mousse exchanged glances and smiles.

"That poor little girl seemed very upset that you stole her magical staff from her," Cologne remarked slyly. Shampoo winced a little.

"Yes, she wasn't happy about that. She's a terrible shot. I had to take it away before she killed me by accident trying to get those little monsters, then it seemed like a good idea to use the thing. No idea how to make it shoot those energy beams but it made a pretty good club." They watched her recorded past self pull off a neat one-two blow with alternating hands on two different demons. Cologne nodded approvingly.

"Very nicely done. You're not as rusty as I feared you might be." She looked at the younger woman who was looking mildly annoyed at the back-handed compliment, grinning. "But you clearly need some more practice. They made a bit of a mess of you."

"They bite." Shampoo crossed her arms defensively. "A lot."

"Even so. Perhaps I should work out how to train you against such things."

Shuddering slightly at the thought, knowing what the elder was like, Shampoo shook her head quickly. "I don't think that's necessary. It's not like I'm likely to run across those little bastards again. I hope."

"Even so." Grinning, Cologne relented her teasing. "In all fairness, child, you did very well from what I can see. Most people would have had a lot of trouble with those little demons. How many did you get?"

"Fumiko counted twenty-five. She was quite impressed." The lilac-haired woman smiled. "They bought me lunch afterwards and these clothes. Mine were a little past being usable. Aside from anything else I don't know if demon blood washes out."

"You and Akane between you seem to have met a surprisingly large number of magical girls in the last few months, after going years without meeting any of them," her grandmother said. Shampoo laughed.

"I know. It's weird. It's also all Akane's fault in the beginning. Or perhaps Ryoga's. But I think it's worked out all right, even if I have ended up fighting demons on TV." They watched as the reporter summed up the fight, listing some of the damage. Behind her they could see Shampoo walking off with three indistinct figures.

"They'll be making action figures of you next," Mousse suggested, smiling. "At least people can see what you look like. Those other girls don't come out in pictures." The young woman got a mildly intrigued look for a moment, then shook her head.

"I doubt it. I'm not famous, or magical. Just a normal martial artist and warrior." She giggled as he smiled at her. "Perfectly normal."

Chuckling, Cologne got up, turning the TV off. "Come on, girl, let's have a look at that leg and get it cleaned up. I made a new batch of the healing ointment, by the looks of you it's called for." Shampoo followed her downstairs while Mousse went into the restaurant to get back to work.

Grumbling to herself, Haruka helped Setsuna into her house, holding her erect. She was quite tipsy, having suddenly decided she needed a beer or five. This hadn't improved her coherence at all, not that it seemed all that good at the moment anyway. Despite their recent problems Haruka couldn't just abandon her, they had too much shared history, so when she'd finally fallen over she'd picked her up and called a taxi.

Carrying her up the stairs to her room, she dumped her on her bed, looking around curiously. There were notebooks all over the place with torn out pages littering the floor. Picking one up she flicked through it, finding it full of incomprehensible diagrams and apparently meaningless text in several languages. Shrugging, she put it back. Setsuna was mumbling something, tossing her head from side to side. Suddenly she opened her eyes, sitting up in bed.

"Oh, Haruka. Have you come home?"

The blonde sighed quietly. Her former friend seemed to be very vague since Yori and those demon mages had done what ever it was they'd done to all of them. She kept forgetting what she was talking about, sometimes in the middle of talking about it, which was very disconcerting. "I brought you home. You remember the taxi? You got a little drunk."

The green-haired woman nodded slowly, licking her lips in an introspective manner. "I could do with a beer," she commented, slurring her words a little.

"No, you couldn't," Haruka sighed. "You said that something like seven beers ago. Trust me, you've had enough."

"OK," the other woman said cheerfully, falling back into a supine position. Seconds later she was snoring. Staring at her, Haruka shook her head, not entirely sure what had happened. After a moment she arranged the woman on the bed slightly more neatly, removed her shoes, pulled the covers up, and left the room, closing the door quietly behind her.

As she reached the bottom of the stairs the door opened and her former lover entered, stopping dead as she spotted the blonde. Her face darkened as she glared. "What the fuck are you doing here, you bitch?" she enquired in a very unfriendly tone of voice.

"Just bringing Setsuna home. She got drunk and couldn't make it herself." Haruka reached past Michiru for the door. The other woman held on to it, preventing her opening it.

"I'm not sure I believe you," she said suspiciously. Haruka sighed once more, reflecting that she seemed to be doing a lot of that recently.

"I am sure I don't care whether you believe me or not. I'm going home. Or back to the hotel, which I guess is the same thing." She pulled the door harder. "Could you let go, please?"

"Why were you and Setsuna together in the first place?" Michiru asked, her tone of voice suggesting that she suspected the worst. "Plotting against me?"

"No, of course not. What happens to either of you is something I simply don't care about any more. She just turned up out of the blue and wanted to talk."

"About what?"
Haruka shrugged. "Not a clue. She doesn't seem to be able to remember what she's talking about from one word to the next. You should have her see a doctor, there's obviously something wrong." She yanked hard on the door, ripping it out of the hands of her former lover, who yelped a little then looked at her with an evil glare.

"I should have killed you in that mall when I had the chance," she said through gritted teeth.

"You didn't. Too late now." Haruka stepped through the door. Behind her she felt a burst of magic as Michiru powered up, muttering her transformation trigger. She stopped but didn't turn around. "I wouldn't. You wouldn't like what happened next."

"You think you can take me?"

She shrugged. "Perhaps. Perhaps not. We'll never know. I'm not going to fight you. I made a promise, one I intend to keep." She looked over her shoulder at the somewhat puzzled face of the other woman. "But I know that if you start anything, Yori and her friends will stop it. Probably permanently. I wouldn't be surprised to find out they're watching us right now." Michiru looked quickly around.

"I don't see anything," she muttered.

"Like that means anything with that lot." Haruka snorted, resuming walking back to the road. "Trust me, if you or the others do anything else to annoy them, it will be the end. I know for a fact that we've all use up all the grace we're going to get." She stopped as she reached the pavement, turning and looking back at the woman she'd loved once. "I'm out of it. You do what you want, I can't stop you, but stay away from me and Hotaru. For your own sake if nothing else." She turned away and walked off. Michiru watched her go, confusion in her face, before closing the door.

Unseen, a small spherical alien drone hummed very softly as it repositioned itself to see in through the kitchen window and resumed watching from a position some ten metres away.

Shampoo looked around, embarrassed, to see four pairs of eyes looking back at her with interest. She slid the garden door shut, blushing a little, then sat beside Akane. "You saw the news," she stated. They all nodded in unison.

"Why were you fighting demons in Minato, Shampoo?" Nodoka asked curiously. The Amazon grinned a little.

"It wasn't something I planned on doing, believe me. It just sort of... happened." She shrugged a bit. "All I wanted to do was go shopping. Minato is a very strange place indeed."

"You acquitted yourself well from what I saw," Soun told her, looking impressed. Shampoo smiled.

"Thank you. Being chased down the road by about two dozen of the little swine wasn't much fun, but by the end it was a decent exercise. Not one I really want to repeat but sort of fun in a weird, messy way." She looked at Akane, grinning. "Adrian would have loved it for one of his films I think." Her friend grinned back.

"From what I saw on TV I think you're right. It looked pretty spectacular."

"Did you have to be so rough with that poor young girl when you stole her staff?" Nodoka asked, although she was smiling. Laughing, Shampoo nodded.
"Unfortunately I did. She really didn't want to let go. But I needed it more than she did at that point, not to mention how bad a shot she is with the thing. You should have seen the place. Holes everywhere. Tamiko said she got some poor man's poodle as well, which was a bit unfortunate."

The Saotome matriarch looked slightly green.

"Oh dear. That poor thing."

"It would have been pretty quick. Her magic energy beam things were pretty destructive. One shot only just missed me and went right through a car next to me." Shampoo shuddered at the memory. "She's awfully young to be in charge of power like that, especially as she can't aim it very well. Tamiko was almost tearing her hair out over it. I get the impression they have a history."

She spend the next half hour telling them the story. "Is your leg all right now?" Nodoka asked at the end of it, concerned. Shampoo looked down at the limb in question, nodding.

"I'm fine. It wasn't much of a bite really, I managed to get it off me pretty fast, before it could start chewing." She winced a little. "You really don't want them chewing on you. You should have seen what one of them did to a telephone pole. Two bites and it was in two pieces." She smiled at the older woman. "It's a good thing all that training toughened me up a lot. A normal person would have lost the leg."

"It sounds very nasty even so. I'm not surprised you ran at first, without any weapons to hand and up against so many of them. Even with your fighting abilities something so dangerous must have been awkward to deal with."

Standing, Nodoka smiled at her. "Would you like some tea? I was just going to make some when you came in."

"Thank you, that would be very nice." Nodoka headed for the kitchen.

Soun smiled a little at a thought. "Akane would probably have used mallets under the same circumstances." His youngest daughter grinned at him.

"Possibly. I only seem to be able to do that properly when I'm really very angry, though, and I don't get that bad any more."

"Something we're all very grateful for," Genma joked, quailing slightly at the evil look she shot him, before laughing. Shampoo giggled at the look on both their faces.

"A weapon would have been helpful a little earlier in the day, I have to admit. I need to work on the hidden weapons technique so I can carry something a little bigger than this." She produced her remaining chúi. Soun nodded approvingly.

"Very good, even so. I know how good Mousse is at that technique but he's not only gifted at it but has been practising since he was a child, from what the Elder has told me. How long have you been learning it?"

"Only about a year. It's extremely complicated to get right. It took me months to produce a stable ki pocket in the first place. Making it bigger isn't easy but I'm slowly getting it." She flipped the club in her hand then vanished it again, frowning. "One of those things ate the other one. That's my best pair. I'll have to get replacements now."

Akane giggled at her expression of irritation. "At least you got your moment of fame on TV out of it. If it only cost you a club and some clothes that's not much to pay."

"I guess so." She giggled as well. "Misaki said I should get a recording of the news segment to show to Adrian."

"It's an idea. We didn't record it, but I bet Sayuri did. She always records the news in case some magical girl things happen. I'll call her." Pulling out her phone Akane dialled, then had a brief discussion, smiling at the end of it. "Yes, she recorded it, she's happy to do you a copy. She wants to talk to you about the girls as well, in case you learned anything for her scrap book."

Laughing, Shampoo shook her head. "Nothing like that. We just chatted over lunch. They're really nice people." Akane jumped to her feet.

"Come on, let's go and see her. Then we can practice."

"Wait until after your tea," Nodoka told her, coming back from the kitchen with a tray. The youngest Tendo glanced at her then nodded, sitting down again.

"OK, Auntie Nodoka. I forgot in all the excitement." Smiling at the girl, the elder woman put the tray down and began handing out cups.

Sergeant Harada read the report Tamiko had emailed him for his records, grinning to himself and shaking his head. "Interesting. Very interesting." Picking up his desk phone he thought for a moment then dialled a number, waiting for it to be answered. "Hello, Norio, It's Tetsuo. How are you?"

"Hello, Tetsuo. I'm very well, thank you. It's nice to hear from you. How are you and your wife? And your child? Know what it is yet?" His old friend sounded pleased.

"Fine, thanks. Emiko is doing well. The baby is coming along nicely, so to speak." He laughed a little. "Should be arriving on time. We've avoided know what it is so far."

"Want a surprise, I guess?"

"Something like that."

"You'll enjoy being a father, although it's a lot of work. So, what can I do for you? Still looking into Akane Tendo and her associates?"

Harada chuckled a little. "Not as such, but something happened earlier today that I thought you might find interesting. Have you seen the news?"

"No, I've been too busy to watch TV, I'm afraid. We had a couple of attempted armed robberies this morning. One of them ended badly for the robbers, a local martial artist was wandering past at the time and intervened. He's an idiot but still pretty dangerous. He thrashed all three of them while reciting bad Shakespearean dialogue. Pretty funny. I'll send you a copy of the surveillance video. The other ones got away, we're still looking for them."

His eyebrows up, Harada laughed. "Thanks. I'd like that. Would you like to borrow some magical girls? I could asked a couple I know, they might enjoy a field trip." His friend snickered.

"That would also be very funny but it might raise awkward questions. We're not as used to them here as you guys are. Thanks for the offer though."

"OK. Anyway, that Chinese girl, Shampoo, Akane's friend, got involved in an incursion a few hours ago. Apparently she was here shopping and somehow got caught up in it. She handled it very well from what I'm told, after some initial panic and running around screaming." He laughed again, reading the remarks Tamiko had made on the subject. "Running very fast, being chased by quite a large number of demons. Only little ones but they're a real pain in the ass, sometimes literally. They bite."

"Is she all right?" Norio sounded intrigued and mildly concerned.

"Oh, she's fine, aside from a few scrapes and toothmarks, from what I was told. She's not magical girl tough but my contacts say she's still damn hard to damage."

"Very true. All those wildly overpowered martial artists are, it goes with the territory. Good thing in a way, they'd be killing each other on a regular basis otherwise, what with throwing each other through buildings and the like. It makes them kind of hard to discipline though. Threatening them with a weapon either amuses them or irritates them, neither of which is very helpful."

The sergeant chuckled. "I'm familiar with the problem. It's even worse here. Most of our girls could probably take a grenade to the face and just get pissed off. I'm not going to try, though. Aside from anything else most of them are friends."

"So what happened?"

"She ran into some of our regulars and another, very young, girl who seems to be connected to these little demons. They always turn up more or less at the same time. She has some sort of magic-powered staff weapon she shoots at them with. Note I said 'at' them." He sighed. "She's not a good shot. There are usually a lot of holes in the surroundings by the time she'd finished."

Norio started laughing at the tone in his friend's voice. "Does that happen a lot?"

"Luckily, no, it's fairly rare, but it always causes a certain amount of excitement. This time, Tamiko, one of the group who are friends of Yori and Chou, managed to stop her wrecking more than a handful of things, then got her under control. They were just trying to deal with one of the demons when Shampoo turned up being chased by something like a couple of dozen of them. Long story short, she jumped this other girl when she nearly got shot, took her staff away from her, then used it to pulp all the demons. From what I heard she was enjoying herself quite a lot."

There was silence for a moment then hysterical laughter. "Oh, god, that's brilliant. I wish I'd seen it."

"It was on the afternoon news. It'll probably be on the evening news as well." Harada snickered for a moment. "It was pretty funny. She's got some good moves and clearly knows how to fight. Much better than most of the girls do. You could see she'd had some serious training in combat."

"From the time she could walk as far as I know. She's extremely talented and extremely dangerous. And very good looking."

"Yes to all of those. Our girls were very complimentary about her abilities. Apparently they know her and Akane, after that trouble we had last year they seem to have kept in touch. They helped clean her up, get her some clothes, then bought her a meal. Everyone seems to have come away happy. Except for one man, who is extremely upset about a missing poodle." He thought for a moment. "Mostly missing."

"Do I want to know?"

"Probably not."

"From what I've heard Ms Tendo and Shampoo are likely to be going off to Hollywood soon. That could be a bit of a relief for Nerima, frankly, although to be fair since that problem in your area she's improved out of all recognition. I don't know what happened but it was damn effective.

Hardly a major incident since."

"Some sort of long-term medical problem. Yori and Chou discovered it when they were healing Shampoo, Akane, and that Hibiki boy up and fixed it. It was apparently a major contributor to her anger issues."

"Thank them on behalf of the Nerima police next time you see them, will you?" Norio requested, sounding amused and grateful.

"I'll do that. I knew about the Hollywood thing. Aiko, one of the girls from this team, has been teleporting them back and forth. It seems it was Yori's idea to introduce Akane to a movie director she knew in LA. It's all going well from what I know."

"That girl seems to be involved in a lot of very odd things."

"You wouldn't believe half of it." Chuckling, Harada shook his head. "It's remarkable, what that lot get up to. Anyway, they wrote me a report on it even though it's out of my district, they know I like to keep track of this sort of thing. Would you like a copy of it for your own file?"

"Yes, please, Tetsuo, that would be interesting." Norio laughed slightly. "It will be nice to have something for the young lady's file that isn't random public damage."

"It was very targeted public damage, but well meant," the sergeant laughed. "Nothing too serious, luckily. Quite likely due to Shampoo's actions. OK, I'll email you the report. I have to get back to work, but it was nice talking again. I'll try to get out to Nerima sometime soon. Or you could come here. I could show you around, introduce you to some of the special talent."

"That might be interesting. Hopefully I could get away sometime before Christmas, but it tends to be pretty busy around these parts. As you know."

"I do indeed. Take care, Norio."

"You as well, Tetsuo. Give my love to Emiko." The distant phone hung up and Harada put his own receiver down, closing the report and emailing it to his colleague. Once that was done he got up, heading out to see what was going on in the community, smiling slightly.

"What's the deal with the asteroid?" 'Azumi' asked curiously in Trade. S'th'kx looked at her for a moment, then went back to staring at the projection. A request to the crewman on a nearby workstation caused the image to expand and rotate, shifting through several colour changes. He inspected it closely, reading the text running down one side of the display, his antennae slowly rising again, but still seemed shocked. After a few seconds he went to his own workstation and brought up some more information on several displays there. Everyone watched him, wondering what was going on.

Glancing at the alter-ego of Ranma, 'Azumi' raised her eyebrows. 'Yori' shrugged.

"No idea," she said out loud.

Eventually, S'th'kx turned from the console and stared at the projection again, before looking at them. "Two things stand out about that thing," he said quietly, pointing at the projected image.

"Those are?" 'Yori asked slowly.
"The first is what it's made of. That's the largest find of exotic stable post-transuranic elements I've ever heard of. It's value is... almost unbelievable." Everyone who understood Trade stared at him, then at the projected asteroid, slowly tumbling in space several light-minutes away.

"Um, what?" 'Azumi' asked. He looked at her, then at the asteroid.

"As elements become heavier, past element 82, lead, they're unstable and mostly have shorter and shorter half-lives, to the point some of them barely exist at all. But, go far enough, make them heavy enough, they suddenly become stable again. Some of them incredibly so. Those elements are extremely rare in nature and very expensive to synthesise, but a fair amount of high tech absolutely requires small quantities of them, things like anti-grav drives, advanced energy generation systems, even interstellar drives. Those particularly use a lot of the very heavy elements, both as a starting point for creating negative mass and in the construction of some of the engineering systems to control it." He waved an upper hand at the image.

"They're mostly so dense that on planets you won't find them outside the inner core, they sink right to the inside as the planet forms. However, we sometimes find small amounts of such elements in the asteroids we mine, ones that are particularly dense, normally. That one you visited is pretty rich in them, relatively speaking. The entire asteroid, which is several times the diameter of this one, has perhaps three to five hundred tons of exotic matter in it, spread pretty evenly through the entire thing. We'll have to take it completely to pieces to extract all of it but it's well worth it, the stuff will account for nearly half the total value of the find." 'Azumi' nodded slowly while 'Yori', 'Chou', and Aiko listened intently. Rei and her two friends were looking blank.

"OK. It's worth an awful lot." S'th'kx waved his antennae in agreement. "So how much is in that thing?"

"According to the preliminary probe results, it's about two hundreds of a percent by volume exotic matter." He stared at her for a moment, allowing her to work it out.

#Nabiki, assuming an average density for the material of the asteroid and taking account of the much higher density of stable exotic matter, that would work out to approximately one hundred and sixty thousand metric tons of such material. S'th'kx is completely correct, the value of such a find to a civilisation like his is almost beyond belief.# Jun sounded genuinely shocked. #It is close to the total amount mined in the entire K'nn grouping in the last forty years.#

'Azumi' had gone white, staggering backwards to lean against a console, staring at her friends. All of them had clearly received the same information from their SIs. 'Chou' had a hand over her mouth, her eyes wide with shock, while Aiko had begun gently swearing in several languages. 'Yori' was staring at the projection with a totally blank expression, looking as taken aback as her sister-in-law had ever seen her.

"Depending on which elements it actually contains, the value could go up or down by an order of magnitude, but even with the least valuable ones, it's enough to buy entire planets, albeit small ones," S'th'kx continued once he saw they'd worked it out. "I've never in my life heard of anything remotely like it. It's the find of a lifetime. Several lifetimes." No one said anything for a while, although Ami looked intensely curious, seeing the expressions of the others. Rei and Hotaru exchanged glances, shrugging, before watching again.

Eventually 'Yori' stirred. "OK. That's one thing that stands out. What's the other one?" Her friends and family stared at her for a moment. She sounded fairly calm about finding out they'd just discovered the richest vein of anything, possibly in human history, completely by accident. S'th'kx looked at her, then the projection, before reaching out and manipulating it with the interactive interface. A few quick practised gestures froze the rotation and zoomed in on one particular place... on the surface, where some odd protuberances could be seen.

"The engines."
Chapter 73

My apologies for the long gap since I last published a chapter. I've been very busy on other things recently, which hasn't left me much time for writing and even when I had a few moments, I wasn't in the right frame of mind to really have it flow properly. It's taken longer than normal to wrestle the next few chapters into submission, forcing me to kick at least one of them in the knee damn hard, which is a little cruel.

The good news is I've got some thirty to forty thousand words written at the moment, which needs tidying up a little but will form three to four chapters. Hopefully I'll have time now to get back into my more normal schedule.

More than 800k words! At this rate it could top a million by the first anniversary of the story start, which is simply incredible, thinking about it. For a part time hobby, especially. I'm very grateful for all the reviews and for everyone who's stuck it out so far. Not done yet, though.

I've moved the character list into it's own chapter, which should end up being the last one on a rolling basis if I've done it right.

"It's got engines?" Ami stared at the projection in disbelief, then looked at Yori. She and her friends had spent some minutes talking incomprehensibly to S'th'kx, apparently receiving information that was somewhat shocking, judging by their reactions, before switching back to something the others could understand. Ami wasn't sure that the part about the engines was the only thing that was odd about the asteroid but it was still very odd indeed. Yori nodded, pointing to part of the projection.

"He says these are a form of anti-gravity drive, according to the readings from the probe. Not one he's seen before but the overall configuration couldn't be anything else, including the materials they're made of. At the moment they're shut down, there's no power readings from any active system on the asteroid. It seems to be cold and dead. But they don't look damaged so the assumption is they're functional, just off."

"Who put them there?" Rei asked, fascinated. Yori glanced at her.

"It certainly wasn't anyone from Earth. The tech is at least a hundred and fifty years more advanced than anything we have. It's on a par with that of the Krennish, although it's not theirs either." Rei nodded, having asked and found out that this was the name of S'th'kx' people.

"Real aliens? From our reality? Some sort of probe or ship from somewhere else?" Hotaru asked slowly.

"It's not completely impossible but it's not likely for a number of reasons." Yori studied the image again for a moment, discussing it with S'th'kx. "He can't see any indications of a drive capable of interstellar travel. That set of engines is enough to accelerate the asteroid, not as fast as this ship could do, it's nowhere near as powerful as the ship's drive from what he can tell, but it could certainly push it around fairly well. But there's no life support, no indications of any crew space at all, nothing like that. Presumably it's automated." She turned to Ami. "There's another thing that makes it unlikely."

"Which is?" The blue-haired woman was very curious, but had a growing sense of impending doom. Yori sighed.
"There's a distinct magitech signature coming from that installation. It's a familiar one, one we've seen before." She looked at Ami, who understood instantly. Pulling out her computer she held it up questioningly. Yori nodded. "Exactly. It's from the same source."

"Oh, crap." Everyone looked at Hotaru, who gazed back, slightly embarrassed. "You mean it's something the time device is responsible for?"

"Looks that way. Either it made it or it came with it from its own reality. There's only one thing any of us can think of that it would want a self-powered asteroid for, as well."

Ami stared at the image of the distant free-floating mountain. "It's a weapon, isn't it?"

"Most likely." Yori scowled, also watching the asteroid. "I have a feeling that it's something to do with this ill-defined future disaster. Either as the main cause or a backup plan. Everything it's done to date has been to drive a specific narrative, to the point of quite likely influencing demons to attack you girls in the name of some weird back-story, just to push our reality to be as close as it can manage to its original one. It's impossible, as we discussed before, but that doesn't seem to have stopped it trying. I have a feeling that this is part of that plan in some way. Luckily, a part that hasn't activated yet."

"So, we need to make sure it can't activate it, ever," Rei growled. "How do we do that? Can we go and destroy the engines?"

Chou looked at her. "That's what we were discussing. The quickest way would be to go through a portal back to Krennsh space, then return through one closer to it. That would only take a short time. We're just a little worried that the time machine would detect us and possibly take action. Assuming it isn't monitoring us at the moment via you girls." Ami, Rei, and Hotaru exchanged uneasy glances. The blonde smiled a little at their expressions.

"There's not much we can do other than proceed. We can't allow that thing to stay there. It was pure chance we found it in the first place. But that's the sort of weird coincidence that happens around people like us." Rei laughed, nodding.

"Tell me about it. OK, so we go there, blow the damn thing to bits, then go home." She paused, looking abruptly worried. "But is it the only one?"

Yori shrugged. "No idea. I doubt it bothered to make many, one would be enough and it would probably have had no reason to expect anyone would discover it. Personally I suspect that's it. But we'll arrange to get a lot more long distance probes here, S'th'kx can bring a couple of dozen swarms like the three we used already just from stock, and blanket the entire system with them. It will still take years to go through everything in detail even with tens of thousands of probes around the place but it will certainly give us early warning if anything odd starts to happen. It was incredibly unlikely that we'd even find this one so soon but that's what happens with us. The Magical Girl Coincidence Effect I guess."

Ami nodded absently, still studying the image. The distant probe had moved closer, slowly swinging around the asteroid, scanning it more thoroughly. "This is real-time?" she asked curiously, suddenly thinking how far away the thing was, not having considered it until now in the shock of the discovery. It was a weird thought, that she was watching a live picture of something so far away.

"Yes. They use a subspace link for communications, not radio, there's practically no delay," Azumi told her. "It's remarkable technology."
"I'll say. I'm very impressed." She turned to the others. "What do we tell Agent Naito? He's down in his cabin at the moment, but he'll notice if we suddenly go haring off past Mars after an asteroid."

Yori sighed a little. "That's a small problem. He's not aware of any of your story and to be honest at the moment I'd like to keep it that way. I gather you would as well?" All three of them nodded. "So we need to come up with a cover story. It's a little difficult to drop him off, although that would be the best solution, he'd wonder what was going on. I don't want to actually lie to the guy. He's a good man and a friend. We could probably trust him fine, but I don't want this getting back to the PSIA, even though I don't have any problems with them. Too many other people would eventually find out. He'd be honour bound to report what he saw as a threat to both Japan and the entire planet. We don't want you girls getting any more attention than necessary, it will only make a difficult problem more complicated, and worry a lot of people unnecessarily."

"What about that security spell?" Ami asked. "Surely that's the whole point of it?"

"It is. But it only works if you accept it willingly. It's a lot to ask of the man, he has other, possibly conflicting, loyalty oaths he is serious about. I don't want to put him in that position if I can avoid it. It's easiest if we can just... sort of not bring it up." Looking annoyed and upset, Yori shook her head. "I wish I could simply tell him but at the moment it's just not a good idea."

S'th'kx suddenly yelped, turning to his console and operating some controls rapidly, talking to Yori and her friends at the same time in a tone of voice that sounded worried. Whirling, the young woman asked a quick question. The answer didn't seem to please her judging by the ferocious scowl that crossed her face.

"Well, we have a cover story. An asteroid heading for Earth." She glared at the image, which showed the asteroid was visibly slowing its roll, stabilising itself. Seconds later it began very slowly accelerating, the probe following it. Ami went white. "Looks like it saw the probe or something. It's activated the backup plan."

Feeling the slight vibration that indicated the ships had engaged it's drive, Naito looked up from his notes, wondering what was happening. After a moment he closed his notebook, putting it back in his case, then got up to investigate. There was no-one in the common room so he headed up to the control deck, nodding to one of the crew as he passed. The alien cheerfully flicked his antennae at the man, going about his business, making Naito grin at the matter-of-fact way they interacted after only three days.

At the top of the ramp he found Ami and her two friends deep in discussion, watching a projection in the middle of the control deck which seemed to show a misshapen lump of rock, scale unknown, clearly moving judging by the symbols to one side of it and underneath, which although he couldn't read he realized showed position and velocity merely by context. Yori, Azumi, and S'th'kx were also talking about something with considerable interest, the alien apparently working something out on his panel. Chou and Aiko were observing. Walking up beside them he looked curiously at them, the blonde turning to smile at him as he approached.

"Hello, Masao."

"Hi, Chou. What's going on?" She frowned very slightly.

"S'th'kx discovered something unusual a little while ago. It turned out to be an asteroid, a bit over nine hundred metres in diameter, which we have found out is on a trajectory that would intersect the orbital plane of the Earth in a worryingly short period of time." Naito felt his heart skip a few beats and the blood drain from his face.

"It's going to hit the Earth?!" he squeaked, fright making his throat close up. She smiled a little.

"It would if we didn't do something about it. Don't worry, we're in a ship specifically designed for this sort of operation. We can deal with it. S'th'kx knows exactly what he's doing." Heart-rate slowing, but still feeling faint, Naito swayed a little. She caught him under the elbow and stabilised him. "It will be fine, Masao, don't panic. Something else for your report, that's all." Glancing up, she nodded to Yori, who was watching with concern. The other woman went back to her discussion after a considering glance at Naito.

"We're going to portal back to S'th'kx's reality, then come back here much closer to the asteroid, which will save more than a day of travel time. Once we match velocities we can grapple it and slow it down, then we just have to decide what to do with it." Chou smiled at him again. "This is what S'th'kx does for a living. He feels that the asteroid itself may have some value as well, due to interesting minerals, so he'd like a closer look even if it wasn't posing a threat."

Nodding, still shaky from the shock, Naito managed to recover and stand up straight. "God. You had me really scared for a moment there, Chou."

"I'm sorry, Masao. I didn't mean to upset you. We only just found out." She smiled gently at him. "We've retrieved the lunar probes and are moving to put the moon between us and home so we can open the first portal. When we're back in Krennsh space we'll go back to K'nn four, pick up a number of long range probe swarms, then come back here. S'th'kx suggested we should increase the probe numbers, if there's one asteroid on a dangerous course there could well be others. We were lucky, very lucky indeed, we happened to detect this one so quickly. It could be very nasty if we missed one."

"How much damage would something that size do?" Naito asked, staring at the image. "If you had missed it?"

"It's not a planet-killer," Ami told him, coming over and following his gaze. "But it's certainly a civilisation-fucker-upper. It would be very bad." She pulled out her little computer and made some calculations as he watched. "Depending on what it was made of, how fast it was going, and where it hit, the results would range from a pretty damn impressive tsunami to a very large crater with massive blast damage. It's very definitely something to avoid. Even leaving aside the direct damage, long term results from dust in the atmosphere, evaporated water, fires, that sort of thing, would kill millions if not billions." She snapped the machine shut. "Very bad," she repeated soberly. He'd gone pale again, he could feel it.

"Fuck."

"Pretty much," she agreed. "Good thing we're in an alien asteroid mining spacecraft, isn't it?" Her wry grin made him laugh despite himself.

"Yes, good thing." They exchanged an amused look.

Shortly the craft slowed to a halt, hanging in space some two hundred kilometres above the 'dark side' of the moon, which they could see out the window. Naito hurried back to his cabin and retrieved his camera. Returning, he found Yori and Chou staring out the window in the other direction, visibly concentrating. Seconds later the familiar sight of a portal appeared. He raised the camera, taking pictures as it steadily enlarged, finally stabilising at the same size it had the first time. The ship headed slowly towards it, slipping through with no fuss. Once they were on the other side the two magical girls dismissed the portal, looking satisfied.
"That was smoother than the first time, dear," Chou said, smiling slightly. "I think I can see a way to reduce the power requirements for a large portal as well, based on the experience of making those two." Yori looked intrigued. They were soon in a discussion of some esoteric form of magic that left everyone else behind.

Moving to stand beside Ami, Azumi grinned. "They can keep this up for hours," she commented, laughing a little. Ami was listening, trying to follow the discussion, but gave up as there was simply too much she didn't have the background to understand. "No one else can work out what the hell they're talking about, which isn't surprising, they invented most of it themselves. But it seems to work. Chou is apparently very good at working out how to make the magic more efficient."

Watching for a few seconds longer, Naito finally tuned them out, turning to the silver-haired girl. "So what happens next?"

"We go back to K'nn four as fast as possible, load up on probe blocks, then go after that asteroid. We've got plenty of time, it's moving fast but it's got a long way to go so it's not a huge emergency, but we want to deal with it as far away from home as possible. No sense waiting until the last minute. This isn't a movie." She grinned as he laughed.

"If it was there would be a timer somewhere prominently counting down the seconds and we'd succeed with about two left." He chuckled at the thought. Both Ami and Azumi began laughing themselves. The blue-haired woman opened her computer, fiddled with it, then showed them a neat little count-down clock. It beeped irritatingly once a second in an urgent alternating high and low tone.

"Like this?"

"That's the one." Shaking his head in amusement he watched as she turned the thing off, grinning, then put it away. "Good thing there's nothing like that around. I'd be getting worried again. They could feel the drive engage as the ship started vibrating gently, accelerating hard. It seemed to be moving faster than they'd experienced before.

"We'll be back at the spaceport in under an hour," Azumi told them, "then it will take about twenty minutes to get the probes on board. S'th'kx has lots in stock, he's calling ahead to get them ready right now." Indeed, the captain was talking to someone that wasn't present, sounding calm but urgent. "He can carry about two dozen blocks in the launch bays. As soon as we've loaded them we'll go back, so we should be in the vicinity of the asteroid in about, hmm, perhaps two and a half hours or a bit less. Nothing much we can do now except wait."

"I may as well get back to my notes," Naito told them. "I seem to have some new things to write down." He left them grinning as he went back to the cabin, still recovering internally from the shock of what he'd found out.

'I'm damn glad those girls are around,' he mused with a small shiver. 'If they hadn't been...’ It didn't bear thinking about, so he tried, somewhat unsuccessfully, not to.

Standing in the loading entrance of the main cargo bay, Rei watched as a pair of ground vehicles drew up next to the ship, floating half a metre off the ground. They settled to the concrete, several people climbing out and moving to the rear of the delivery trucks. S'th'kx was standing next to the ship, directing his people in unloading the probe blocks that were stacked neatly on the flat beds of the vehicles. "Come on, we can do this quicker than waiting for them to use those cargo lifters," Yori said from behind her. "Aiko, you and Azumi come with me, the rest of you stay here. We'll pass them up."
Jumping down with the other two, she called something to S'th'kx, who looked over, then nodded, instructing his people to stand clear. Shortly the probe units were being passed hand over hand into the cargo hold and stacked neatly to one side. They were fairly heavy but nothing that any of the girls couldn't handle easily. The ground crew watched, impressed, as a job that would have taken them half an hour was done in less than a third of that time. When they were all loaded and checked, S'th'kx had a quick word with the ground crew chief, then waved everyone back into the ship. Minutes later they were climbing through the clouds.

"That didn't take long," Rei commented, sitting in the common room, somewhere that had become very familiar to all of them in the last three days, watching the planet fall away behind them. She was privately amused how easily she took the experience the second time. You really did get used to almost anything. "Hey, those things have drive units, why not just fly them into the cargo bay?"

Yori shrugged a bit. "Apparently they're optimised for high speed travel when they're in one block like that. All the drives act together to accelerate the entire swarm at several hundred G. Fine control on the ground isn't what they were designed for, so it's easier to just move them around manually."

Chou giggled. "S'th'kx said he should hire us for cargo work, we're much quicker than his normal crew." Grinning, Rei leaned back in her seat and relaxed.

"It's an interesting thought. Not what I had in mind as a career path, I'll admit, but then, neither was magical girl."

"It generally takes you by surprise from my own personal experience," the blonde told her, looking amused. "But it's worth it in the long run. Even with the associated problems." She looked around at the others, smiling to herself. "They're far outweighed by all the good things." Jumping lithely to her feet, she clapped her hands. "Right. Let's have something to eat before we have to make a new portal."

Just over an hour later they gathered in the control room again. Chou and Yori discussed the changes they'd made to their spell in a low voice for a minute or two, working out the final details, then began concentrating. Ami was watching with interest, recording the process, shaking her head at the results her little machine gave her and looking puzzled. Rei grinned as she watched. Her friend was always studying everything, it could be quite funny to watch, since she got so caught up in it. At least this time she was standing still.

Soon the portal had stabilised at it's final size. "That was definitely better," Yori remarked, looking pleased. "Well done, love. We should be able to make quite a large one using that method." Chou smiled, turning to watch as the ship entered the glowing blue hole in space. Seconds later they were through, the portal disappearing immediately.

Once they exited the portal, S'th'kx began working the console, peering out the window as he did. The cargo bay door opened, a steady stream of probe blocks exiting, orienting themselves in different directions, then vanishing into the distance at high speed. It lasted for about five or six minutes. Agent Naito stood by the window photographing the action, having difficulty focussing on them judging by his muttering. When it was over the captain looked satisfied, closing the door again. He talked to Yori for a moment, then she turned to the others. "Twenty six swarms including the one he had left, plus the three we did earlier, with twelve hundred and eighty probes per swarm. Thirty-seven thousand, one hundred and twenty of the things. In a week or so they'll be everywhere in the entire solar system."

"How long will it take to map everything?" Rei asked curiously.
"Years, to any level of detail, even with that number," Chou responded, watching the screen in front of the captain with interest. "But looking for asteroids moving in dangerous orbits that could be a threat to Earth will take much less time. He says within six months, with that many probes, they should have mapped all the dangerous asteroids that could intersect the planet in the next fifty years or so fairly adequately. In a year or two we'll have a good idea of the orbits of practically everything above about fifty metres in diameter. Anything less than that isn't a serious risk. Less than about a hundred and fifty metres is dangerous but not enormously serious. Above that you start getting into worrying territory."

"People have been talking about setting up a near earth object scanning facility for years," Naito said, also watching the console, before taking a picture of it. "Not a lot has come of it so far. Aside from anything else it's expensive and no one wants to spend money on something many people don't really think could happen."

"They'd change their mind if this thing gets through," Azumi said, not looking impressed.

"The ones that lived, certainly," he chuckled, "but it would be a little late then." A moment later he asked, "Speaking of money, how much do those probes cost? I know you said that S'th'kx considered them pretty cheap, but nearly forty thousand of the things can't be throwaway money, surely?"

Yori and her colleagues exchanged a quick glance. "It's not a problem, Masao," Yori said, smiling at him. "It's covered." He stared at her for a few seconds, clearly wondering exactly what she meant by that, but dropped the subject.

"OK. Will we be able to get this data as well? It would be of almost incalculable scientific value aside from anything else."

Chou smiled at him. "Of course. It will be an enormous amount of data, the resolution of the probes is very high, but I'm sure we can come to an arrangement. We asked that several probes be sent to every planet and moon in the solar system just for that reason. We could spare a few hundred. They'll obviously take longer to scan them than the moon project took, if nothing else because of the more limited numbers, but we'll make sure the data gets to you." She looked curiously at him. "How will you distribute it? Presumably JAXA would want it, but there's the ESA and NASA to think about as well. Explaining how the Japanese happened to come into detailed high-resolution scans of every planet in the system might be a little, ah, complicated."

He snickered. "That's putting it mildly. A lot of scientists would sell their first-born children to get their hands on just the moon data, never mind anything else. It's going to cause absolute chaos. I have no idea how we'll explain it right now, that's going to take a lot of careful thought." Look around the control room he shook his head wonderingly. "No one will believe we basically asked some aliens from another dimension for a favour."

Rei started laughing, leaning on a console, causing him to smile at her. Hotaru was giggling to herself.

"It's true, though."

"That's the problem," He grinned at her. "These days the truth is a lot less believable than most fiction. Mind you, after Halleckton and the portal bomb things there are enough people around outside Japan who have come into contact with some very weird experiences we might be able to work with them." Thinking about his words for a moment he laughed again. "I keep thinking it would be easier to pass it off as the results of magic rather than the truth. That's how weird the truth is."
Rei looked around the room and couldn't deny it. Even as a long-term magical girl she was having intermittent problems dealing with the current reality. She and the PSIA man shared a look of understanding.

"Where's the asteroid?" Hotaru asked curiously. Yori passed the question on to S'th'kx, who checked his instruments then pointed.

"That way, but it's too far away to see from here. It's moved quite a long way in the last few hours. We'll catch up soon," the young woman reported, as the ship began to move. Everyone stared in the direction the captain had indicated. A while later Ami pointed.

"There, I think?"

"That's it." Yori peered at the growing point of dim light. Agent Naito raised his camera, which he'd fitted with a telephoto lens, looking through it curiously. Rei glanced at him, turning to Chou, motioning subtly with her head to the side. The blonde followed her a few steps away.

"How do we stop him finding out about the engines?" she asked in a low voice, watching the agent to make sure he didn't overhear. Chou replied likewise.

"S'th'kx is approaching so the engines and anything else artificial is on the other side. It's stopped accelerating, at least for the moment, allowing us to match velocities from this side. Yori, Azumi, Ami, and S'th'kx will deal with the engines while we distract Masao, then when we know it's inactive we'll use the ship to put it into a safe orbit."

Rei nodded, thinking it through. "Sounds plausible. What do we do then? Just leave it there?"

Chou considered her for a few seconds. Rei got the impression there was something she wasn't being told. "He does genuinely have an interest in the mineral content of the thing, it's somewhat unusual. We'll deal with that once we've made it safe. That's the priority for the moment." Not entirely satisfied with the answer, Rei suppressed her curiosity and simply accepted it for the moment. She thought it likely that more would be forthcoming given time. Chou and the others presumably had a reason for playing it close to their chests.

Looking at the device she'd been handed, Ami turned it over, locating the controls. "So, I just put my hand in here, hold on, and press this?" she asked. Azumi nodded.

"Yes. It's pretty simple. That one starts or stops it, that regulates the acceleration. It only produces a couple of dozen newtons of thrust or so maximum for safety's sake, unless you use the emergency override there. That doubles it. Make sure you don't let go." She grinned. "It turns off if you do but it might well be out of reach by the time it does, which would be embarrassing." Ami giggled.

"I can see why," she laughed. "Floating around without any way to reach it and waiting for someone to come and retrieve you would certainly be something you'd have trouble living down."

"Exactly. So best not to do that." They grinned at each other, then turned to the others. Chou was showing Rei and Agent Naito how the little drive units worked, while Yori was explaining it to Hotaru. The younger girl seemed to nearly be vibrating with enthusiasm.

"Come on, let's go!" she chirped, looking out the open airlock. The ship was hanging a couple of kilometres away from the asteroid, S'th'kx having indicated a reluctance to contact it until he was sure the alien technology on it was well and truly dead, just in case. His crew was standing by ready to move if anything odd happened.
"Hold on, we just need to make sure everyone knows the plan, all right, Hotaru?" Yori chuckled. Impatient, the purple-haired girl nodded, not looking away from the asteroid.

"OK. Everyone happy about what we're doing?" Yori enquired. "Azumi, S'th'kx, Ami, and I will go and get some readings from the other side. You five do the same this side. Chou will operate the survey equipment, Masao, you take pictures," she grinned as the government man held up his camera with a smile, "the rest of you look around. Try not to get lost."

"I wouldn't put anything past you girls," the other woman replied, grinning broadly. "Not after all the recent, um, excitement." Both of them laughing, Yori nodded to the miner, who manipulated the control panel. Ami felt herself get lighter, quite fast, but not so rapidly she lost her lunch, as the gravity in the airlock faded away. Shortly they were just floating freely. Giggling in joy, Hotaru gently pushed against the deck with one foot, yelping in surprise as she 'rose' considerably faster than she'd expected, gently pitching backwards at the same time. Bouncing off the other side of the airlock she spun slightly as she drifted past, upside down relative to Ami, waving.

"This is fun!" she commented, bouncing off the walls again. Yori reached out and carefully pushed, causing her to gently float out the open airlock, then followed, engaging her little drive unit in the process. Watching, highly amused, Ami shook her head then followed, experimenting with the drive very carefully at first.

Minutes later she braked to a halt, watching as Hotaru and Rei followed Chou, Aiko and the PSIA man to the surface, making sure her friends were safe, then went after Yori and the others. It took only a short time to circumnavigate the small asteroid, in a manoeuvre that couldn't really be called orbiting due to the minuscule gravity. As they rounded the side away from the Sun they all turned on the very bright lights built into the manoeuvring units. The surface of the asteroid was rough and irregular, covered in dust and small lumps of material, larger outcroppings sticking out here and there. It was roughly egg-shaped, the engines being at the slightly wider end, while the colour was a dark grey like wet wood ash.

"OK, we're closing in on the engine installation," Yori's voice said. "Agent Naito can't hear us although Chou and Aiko can, so we can talk freely."

"What's the idea? Try to deactivate it, or just destroy it?" Ami asked.

"We want to see if there's anything that would be useful in allowing us to find a way to get at the time device, or at least work out what it's plans are," Azumi told her. "Scan for any sort of computer, data storage system, anything like that. With some luck we might get some useful intelligence."

"Past that, we think it would be safest to just blow the damn thing to hell," Yori added. "We have no idea what the technology could do. Better to get rid of it in case it has any more nasty surprises."

"OK." As they drifted to a halt above the location of the alien engines, Ami retrieved her computer. "I wish this thing had a hand strap," she muttered, nearly fumbling it. "Or some sort of case. I should go to a phone shop at home and see if anything they have there fits." After a moment she managed to open it one-handed and activate the scanning process, aiming it at the surface, two hundred metres away. "Hmm."

"Anything?" Yori sounded curious.
"I'm reading a fairly impressive power source, nothing as powerful as whatever S'th'kx's ship uses but still pretty big, plus some sort of control system. It's radiating quite a lot of magical energy as well. I can't work out exactly what it's for. It sort of reads as Millennium technology but it's not quite right."

"That agrees with what we got from the ship. All right, let's go and have a look at that control system, see if it has anything useful." They started moving lower. "Shit! Stop, stop!" Yori sounded worried. Quickly flinging the drive into reverse Ami braked as hard as she could, looking around to see the others had as well. She could abruptly feel some sort of magic coming from the asteroid even without using her computer. After a moment she recognised it, which her scan only confirmed.

"Damn. That's a seriously powerful ward!"

"It's surrounding the entire installation," Yori told her, looking carefully around, clearly able to see the thing. Azumi was doing the same thing, her eyebrows up, while S'th'kx was using some sort of hand-held device she suspected was similar to her computer. "It's the second most powerful one I've ever seen. It must have detected us coming and turned it on." Ami filed the comment away for future inspection, wondering where the most powerful one the woman had ever seen was.

"Can you crack it?" Azumi asked. Yori was silent for a moment.

"Yes, but not easily. The spell is very complex so shutting it down would take a lot of work and time. Punching right through it is just about possible but the problem is the power level is so high it would take a direct hit from a small nuke and deflect it. If I pump enough energy into it to brute-force it all at once you'd see the flash from Earth. You wouldn't want to be this close, believe me. It might also blow the asteroid into little pieces." She smiled a little. "Call that plan B." Ami stared at her, the implications of her statement were... very disturbing. "If we'd run into it it could have been bad, it's not a passive one." She added, pulling out a coin and flipped it towards the asteroid, illuminating it with her light. Everyone watched as the coin spun over and over, until about fifty metres in front of them it glowed and vanished silently. "That would sting, even for people like us."

"So what now?" Azumi asked, frustration in her voice.

"Not sure. Hold on, let me think it through."

Ami glanced at Azumi who was floating a few metres away. "Can you do whatever it was that you did to my computer? Get into it somehow?"

"I've been trying to do exactly that," the silver-haired woman said, sounding annoyed. "It's not that easy, unfortunately. The computer down there is much more heavily encrypted than your little unit was, even though as far as I can see it's nothing like as powerful. Perhaps the time device learned from what I did earlier and has upgraded it's systems since then. I'll keep trying."

"I'm going to try something," Yori announced. "We'll need to back off a few hundred metres first, though, in case it goes wrong." Ami felt worried, engaging the drive and following the other three. When they were in position, she felt a powerful ward surround them in a bubble of energy. Yori turned back to the asteroid and put her hand out. A glow built around it, preceding a violet beam the thickness of her head silently flashing into existence between her hand and the asteroid. Sixty metres from impact it splashed against some immaterial barrier, the energy radiating sideways. Ami stared in amazement. She couldn't work out how so much energy didn't have some real thrust, but Yori was motionless in space relative to the target. After a second or so the beam narrowed, growing vastly brighter in the process, as the woman applied something like the ki compression technique she'd demonstrated at the temple.
'It shouldn't be visible in a vacuum either,' Ami mused, poking her computer one-handed while holding firmly to the drive unit with the other one. 'It can't be anything like a laser beam, then. Amazing.' The energy readings she got from her machine made her feel faint. 'Holy shit. That could cut the asteroid in half with a bit of time!'

Yori stopped the ki beam, studying the distant target. "Hmm. That's pretty impressive. Not much will block that. Very good spell with an awful lot of energy behind it." She glanced at Ami. "Do your readings show if the power source varied when I was running the beam?"

"It wobbled a bit and went down noticeably, but it's rebuilding slowly." She ran a couple of calculations. "If it's a constant rate of depletion to an attack like that it would run out of energy to feed the ward in about, hmm... three days." Yori sighed.

"About what I thought. I'm good but I can't keep that level up for three days continuously." She thought for a moment, then asked S'th'k'x something. He checked his own instruments and gave her a reply, which made her sigh again. "The ship has an x-ray cutting laser which is used to chop sections off finds to assay, but it's not even that powerful, it doesn't need to be, it's not designed as a weapon. That would probably take weeks. By then the asteroid would have hit, assuming it doesn't start accelerating again."

"What do you think would happen if you used full power?" Azumi asked curiously.

Ami froze, staring. "That wasn't full power?" Yori grinned at her.

"Nope. I'm a little worried about really winding it up, if the ward suddenly fails it would punch a hole all the way through and the ship is on the other side, as well as the others." The blue-haired woman gaped as Yori went back to studying the problem.

"At least it's not shooting at us, so that's good," Azumi commented. She discussed something with S'th'k'x who was still pointing his own scanning equipment at the asteroid. "He can't find any evidence of weapons, only a power supply, the engines, and a computer running it all."

Tearing her fascinated and worried gaze from Yori with some difficulty Ami glanced at the other woman, then at her computer, nodding slowly. "That agrees with what I can read. So it probably can't do much to stop us if we can get through that ward." She also studied the target. "I wonder how it managed to put all this together in the first place?"

"S'th'k'x says the installation looks like some sort of self-propelled cargo system on an enormous scale. It's partially buried in the surface of the asteroid and looks like it's been there for a long time. Certainly at least a thousand years based on the dust collection." Azumi shrugged. "Time machine, remember? We have no idea how long the thing has been around, interfering. It might have made this thousands of years ago, or a thousand years from now then brought it back last week."

"Kind of makes your head ache, doesn't it?" Yori said absently. "This thing doesn't need weapons, it is a weapon. Just one designed to break civilisations with one hit. This ward is probably just a standard precaution, I doubt it was expecting us, but the machine is the result of a war like Ldn'r'k told us. I wouldn't be surprised to find it's just paranoid by design. My guess is that the ward is a military specification one, it's much too powerful for most applications, not many mages would or could waste so much energy making one like that. It's very powerful but not very efficient."

"What do we do?" Azumi looked at Yori.

She shrugged. "Still working on that."
A couple of minutes passed. S’t’h’kx, who had been studying his instrument, looked over to the black-haired woman and asked her something. She replied, making Ami wonder what they were talking about. After a few seconds Yori nodded, looking pleased. Azumi raised her eyebrows. "Will that work?"

"It should do. If so at least the asteroid itself isn't a problem any more."

Ami stared at them all. "What are you talking about?"

Yori chuckled. "Sorry. We really have to teach you lot Trade. S’t’h’kx pointed out that the ward only surrounds the engine installation, not the asteroid itself. So he thinks the simple solution is just to cut off the part of the thing that has the engines. The rest of is it the dangerous bit, that's where almost all the mass is." She looked at the asteroid again, tapping her chin with a finger. "In fact, the way that spell feels, I think removing most of the asteroid from under it may well destabilise it and make it easier to penetrate without using so much power we vaporise everything inside. I really would like to have a look at that installation just in case we could learn something useful."

Conferring with the miner for a minute or two, she moved off to the side, taking aim. "We could use the x-ray laser on the ship but I can do it faster. I'll try slicing through just past where the ward ends," she said. The brilliant purple beam lanced out once more, hitting the surface at a shallow angle and penetrating deeply. A second later it came out the other side, two hundred metres away. Ami watched with great interest and some disbelief. The sheer energy involved was absolutely astounding, as was the control it showed. Yori slowly moved the beam sideways, cutting a fifty metre thick slice of metal and rock from the end of the asteroid, concentrating carefully on her work. Suddenly the beam winked out, making everyone blink.

"Why did you stop?" Ami asked curiously, noticing that Yori was rapidly approaching them again. Azumi turned to her.

"We have a major problem. Hotaru is going after Agent Naito, screaming something about being followed by the government, and Rei is acting weird as well. Aiko's got her pinned down and Chou is trying to stop Hotaru."

"What!?" Ami stared in horror. "Why would they do that?"

Yori shot past, urgently waving them to follow. "I have a horrible feeling that the time machine just made it's next move. Come on. We need to stop them doing something stupid." Staring for a moment, not sure she believed what was happening, Ami thumbed her drive unit to maximum emergency acceleration and followed the other three.

"Ami?"

"Yes, Yori?"

"If you feel like you suddenly want to kill us all, warn me, will you?" Yori's voice sounded tight. Ami nodded even though the other woman couldn't see her as she was over a hundred metres in front.

"I feel fine at the moment. We already know the thing doesn't seem to have affected me very much. Hopefully that won't change."

"You'll understand if we kind of keep you in sight all the time, though, I hope?" Yori looked over her shoulder.

"I'd do the same thing." They kept moving as fast as possible, Ami very aware that Azumi was right behind her. She could feel a sense of definite possible danger and made sure to keep both her hands in view.

"What the fuck?" Naito yelled, pushing his drive unit to maximum power, as an impossibly sharp blade on the end of two metres of shaft barely missed him. If it wasn't for the almost non-existent gravity throwing the young woman off she would have removed his head. "Hotaru, what the hell are you doing?"

"You sneaky bastards, following us around all the time. It's all your fault, I know it is," the girl raved, flipping end over end as she floated away at an angle. She fumbled for the drive unit which she had nearly dropped when she swung at him without warning. He'd noticed she'd gone very quiet a minute or so ago, something that stood out as odd after her excited talking about the zero-g environment, which she apparently found endlessly amusing. The sudden attack had almost caught him completely off guard. It was only reflexes honed by training and recent experiences that had prompted him to duck when something in the corner of his eye felt wrong.

The young woman managed to juggle her pole-arm and the drive sufficiently to slow her tumble, then aim herself back at him. He stared over his shoulder as she came after him, accelerating slightly faster due to her lower mass. From what he could see she would catch up eventually. "Hotaru, I'm not your enemy, you know that. Why are acting like this?" There was no answer over the communications system other than the sound of heavy breathing and a faint gritting of teeth. The girl glared, experimentally waving her weapon at him with one hand, luckily being considerably out of range. He winced nonetheless, knowing from the reports she could project some sort of attack from the thing. Nothing much happened this time although he wasn't sure he could count on that.

She was wearing her full uniform, having called it up when she summoned the weapon from wherever it was she kept it, the short skirt and other clothing looking more dangerous than it should have all things considered. The associations he had with that uniform based on recent events weren't good ones. He'd picked up on the fact that both Ami and Rei were reluctant to wear it any more for the same reason.

"Hold on, Masao, I'm coming," Chou's voice said. He looked frantically around for the blonde, finally spotting her rocketing towards them at an angle a few hundred metres away. All three of them had left the surface of the little asteroid, heading away from both it and the ship.

"What did I do?" he asked.

"Nothing. This isn't your fault, believe me. I'll explain later, for now we need to stop her, without damaging her too much, ideally." Chou sighed loudly. "And Rei. She's acting oddly as well. Luckily Aiko noticed and grabbed her, she was about to come after you as well, and possibly Hotaru too based on what she was yelling." Naito hadn't heard anything from the other magical girl but the way the semi-sentient suit computers routed communications meant that you only heard things that were directed at you or a group you were part of, or deliberately broadcast for everyone to hear, which presumably hadn't been the case.

"Hotaru, listen to me, dear. Masao isn't your enemy."

"He's a spy. He's been following me around. He has to die," the girl responded, sounding mildly regretful yet unnervingly sure of herself.

"He's a friend. You're being influenced from the outside to believe what you're saying, but it isn't real. You know what the real enemy is. Slow down, I don't want to hurt you, but I can't allow you to hurt Masao either." Chou sounded sad. He looked over his shoulder again, seeing they were some distance from the asteroid, which had shrunk to the size of a basketball. Hotaru was slowly overhauling him, grinning like a maniac, while Chou was rapidly closing from the side, yet was still some distance off. Their speed was steadily building, slowly but surely.

"I'll kill him, then we can talk, OK, Chou?" Hotaru sounded almost calm. "I can trust you, I know."

There was silence for a few seconds. "I'm sorry, Hotaru." He looked behind again in time to see a small golden ball of energy strike the drive unit which the girl was holding, causing it to explode in a surprisingly vigorous manner, engulfing Hotaru in a very large short-lived fireball which only just cleared him. Even through the suit he felt a wave of heat pass over him. She screamed horribly. As it dissipated he could see she was unconscious, limply falling through space behind him, spinning slowly head over heels, her weapon drifting off to one side. She looked like she'd caught a face full of burning oil, her skin badly blistered, her left hand, which the drive had been on, mangled and bleeding.

"Oh, shit," he mumbled. "She's out, Chou. She doesn't look good." Flipping the drive unit into reverse he began slowing gradually, grabbing her by the shoulder a few moments later as she floated past her original trajectory, stabilising her roll. The pole-arm disappeared into the distance past him, something he ignored as he looked at the girl he was holding. "I've got her." He held on while slowly increasing the reverse thrust to maximum, allowing Chou to catch up.

"Well done, Masao." The blonde intercepted them twenty seconds later, matching speed then reaching out with one hand, placing it on the badly burned girl's head. It glowed for a moment. "She can't feel anything now. Let's get her back to the ship so I can heal her properly, it's awkward doing it like this." She smiled regretfully at him. "She'll be all right, I promise."

"What happened?" he asked, staring at the girl. Both of them juggled her between them until they were sure she was secure then Chou began towing them all back towards the ship, which was only a dot in the distance now. It took close to five minutes merely to slow to a halt relative to it, but eventually they were heading back.

"Something caused her to suddenly become very paranoid and hostile. It's connected to what happened to her entire team," Chou sighed. "It's a long and complex story, I'm afraid, one we didn't want to get out, for a number of reasons. But I think we're going to need to tell you. There's something we need to do first, though." He was quiet on the return trip, wondering what she meant, not entirely sure he wanted to know.

"Oh, shit, that looks horrible," Ami said, feeling sick as she looked at the younger girl lying on a seat in the common room. She was burned over most of her upper torso, her left arm, and her face and head, half her hair missing, one eye clearly damaged, her left hand a bloody mess, her uniform scorched but intact. The magical garment was very difficult to destroy which had probably saved her from further injuries but what she could see was bad enough. Ami turned to Chou, glaring angrily. "You didn't have to do that to her!" she shouted. Chou gave her a look, which while calm and serene, made her stop shouting and swallow, her mouth suddenly dry. "Sorry. But she's so young and those injuries look terrible." The air of imminent trouble faded away again, the blonde nodding sadly.

"I had no choice. There was no way to reach her before she was close enough to Masao to attack him and he's not as tough as we all are. She would have killed him. She wanted to kill him. I'm very sorry about the damage to her, the batteries in the drive units store a very substantial amount of energy which caused a much larger explosion than I anticipated. The ki ball destabilised them all at once. S'th'kx says he's very surprised it exploded at all but I suppose the designers didn't make it to withstand that sort of thing."

"Why did you shoot the drive unit and not her?" she asked.

"It seemed a better option at the time. Powered up and alert as she was I would have had to put enough energy into the ki shot to knock her unconscious that it might have caused injury. I thought taking out her means of moving would be less damaging."

Chou sighed apologetically. "I was wrong. I didn't expect an explosion of that magnitude. In retrospect under the circumstances there was no good way to stop her without injury. It's a good thing the suit generator wasn't damaged, which was another possible concern about firing directly on her."

Chou put her arm around the other woman. "She'll be all right. Don't worry." With a brief hug she knelt on one side of the girl, Yori already in position on the other side. Both of them reached out and began carefully repairing Hotaru. Ami watched, exchanging a glance with Aiko and Azumi, both of whom she couldn't help noticing were making sure they were in a position that didn't mean anyone else was in the potential crossfire if anything untoward were to happen. She couldn't really blame them under the circumstances, although it was a feeling that made the hair on the back of her neck rise.

Azumi particularly looked extremely alert and potentially very dangerous indeed. The blue-haired woman considered her someone who was becoming a friend yet at the moment she felt more like some small fish being watched by a shark. Smiling nervously, she nodded to Azumi, who returned her gaze impassively, not taking her eyes off her for a second. "I'm not going to go nuts, guys. I feel fine." She glanced at Aiko, who was also watching her like a hawk, not blinking. "Honest."

"We believe you, Ami, but we can't take any chances. The ship is too vulnerable, if someone starts something, it could be catastrophic," Yori commented from her position beside Hotaru. She smiled slightly. "We need to see how Hotaru and Rei are after we wake them up. Are you sure you're not feeling anything odd?"

"No. As far as I can tell I'm completely normal. Upset, scared, worried, but normal." Ami sighed. "To be honest that's also pretty much normal these days." Aiko smiled briefly then went back to watching. Looking at them both, Ami suddenly grinned. "If either of you need work I'm sure someone would want you as bodyguards. You have the intimidating looks down perfectly." Azumi cracked a smile as well, making Ami suddenly feel much better. The people she was really beginning to like were still there, just being very cautious.

"How is she?" Agent Naito asked from where he was sitting a few seats away, watching quietly. He glanced at the unconscious form of Rei who was beside him, limp and gently snoring. Chou looked up from the healing, sighing.

"Not ideal, I'm afraid. The explosion was extremely hot, it caused a lot of deep burns to her face. We're going to have to regenerate her right eye which is a fiddly job."

"No damage to the lungs, the suit protected her," Yori said absently, carefully scanning her patient. "A few cracked ribs from the blast. It was one hell of a bang, she's very tough, something like a hand grenade wouldn't have done nearly this much damage. But it was at point-blank range which certainly didn't help." The glow from her slowly moving hands intensified as she concentrated. "Right, those are done."

"I've fixed her hand and the burns are nearly finished, except on her face. Will you do those ones?" Chou requested. The other woman nodded, moving her hands up to Hotaru's head.
"OK." There was silence for a minute or two. "Right. That's all sorted. Just the eye." Yori leaned closer, inspecting the damage, then sighed. "What a mess. It must have been extremely painful. I'm glad she fainted, poor girl." Putting her hands over Hotaru's closed eyelids she concentrated. "Stabilise that, will you, love?"

"I've got it." A golden glow mixed with the purple. There was silence for three or four more minutes, until Yori nodded, satisfied.

"That's it." She looked at Ami, then Naito. "Eyes are very complicated things to regenerate, it takes a while." Both of the observers were watching in awe, as was S'th'kx and one of his crew. The two aliens exchanged looks, their antennae waving slowly. Ami glanced at them, having a good idea what they were thinking. Even having seen it before the almost casual way these two dealt with incredibly serious injuries was very impressive and somewhat frightening.

Chou ran her hands over the girl's head, smiling as her hair rapidly grew out, reaching its normal length in less than thirty seconds. "She has such nice hair. And a lovely colour." Yori grinned.

"It is nice. All right, I think we're finished, at least for the physical things." She sat back, studying the girl in front of her. "I wish we had Hnther here," she sighed. "He could check for how the tampering was done and probably fix it. I don't know enough about that field to do much about it. Poking blindly around could be catastrophic." Chou nodded, looking worried but resigned.

"All we can do is wake her and see if she's all right now. Perhaps it was a transient thing."

"Possibly. There's no obvious physical brain damage like there was last time, but it's only been a short time. It probably takes some time to become apparent." Yori frowned, scanning Hotaru again. "I really have to show her how to heal herself faster. Her own abilities should be able to deal with what we fixed fairly easily, she just doesn't know how to do it properly." She shook her head. "We're going to have to get her and the others to Hnther as soon as possible once we get back. I hope the rest of them haven't been affected."

Ami glanced at Agent Naito to see him visibly wondering what they were talking about but keeping quiet. He still looked a little shaken. Yori looked briefly at him, then at Ami. She seemed annoyed, which the other woman could understand, based on what they'd discussed earlier. Now the decision had been forced on them. "I'm going to turn off voluntary muscle control like we did last time, just in case. We'll have to do the same thing to Rei as well before we wake her." Ami nodded, sighing. Moving slightly closer she sat down, putting her hands on her knees where Azumi and Aiko could see them, understanding the issue even while she felt it was unnecessary.

"OK. I hope she's better."

"So do I." Prodding Hotaru in a few places Yori looked satisfied, reaching out one glowing finger to tap her between the eyes. A second or two passed, then the girl opened those eyes and looked at the ceiling. They seemed perfectly intact, their normal vivid purple, but had a puzzled expression in them.

"What happened?" she asked, her voice slightly shaky and rather confused.

"Hotaru, what do you remember?" Chou asked her gently, leaning close. The girl looked at her for a few seconds, blinking.

"Why can't I move?" she asked instead of answering.

"We had to take some precautions," the blonde replied. She smiled calmly. "There was a..." problem. Do you remember it?" After a long pause Hotaru shook her head.

"I'm... I'm not sure. I can remember... floating around? Being on some sort of dusty surface, like when we were on the moon, but I kept floating away from it. Is that right?" Chou nodded encouragingly as everyone listened.

"Yes, that's right. It was the asteroid, you remember that? The one we thought might hit Earth?" Another, longer pause, then the younger girl nodded slowly, her eyes troubled.

"I... think so. We went back to K'nn four, didn't we? Then came back?"

"That's it. That was about an hour ago. We found the asteroid, matched speeds, then went out to see if we could do anything about it. You were very excited with the zero gravity environment."

Hotaru briefly smiled. "I seem to remember giggling a lot."

"You were. It was quite funny."

"Then it goes a bit weird. I can remember sort of flying around with something on my hand. Is that real?"

Chou nodded, smiling. "Yes. We had little hand-held drive units to pull us around out there."

"OK." the girl fell silent again, visibly struggling to remember more. Chou glanced at Yori, who looked back, clearly both worried and angry, then transferred her gaze to Ami. She could see the blonde also felt upset. Hotaru gasped suddenly, making Chou look back quickly, concern on her face. "Did I hurt someone?" the purple-haired girl asked in a very small voice. "Is that why I can't move, it's like with Haruka?"

After an uncomfortable delay, Chou smiled at her patient. "You tried, but I stopped you. We think it was the same thing, an external influence. It's not your fault. No one blames you." Tears were forming in the younger girl's eyes, making the blonde pull a handkerchief from nowhere and wipe them away. "Don't be upset, Hotaru. Nothing serious happened. You were hurt when I stopped you, I'm afraid, for which I deeply apologise, but Yori and I healed everything. It was an accident but unavoidable."

Saying nothing for some time, the young woman stared at the ceiling of the compartment. Eventually she rolled her head to the side and looked at the other magical girl. "Who was it?" she asked quietly.

"It was Masao. He was both lucky and very quick witted, he managed to avoid your strike then stay ahead of you until I was able to stop you. He's fine, but very confused." She looked at the agent, who nodded, his face troubled. "We're going to have to tell him now."

"I'm sorry, Chou," Hotaru said very quietly. Cupping her cheek with her hand, the blonde smiled at her.

"It wasn't your fault. I've already said that. We know you didn't mean to do it." She sighed slightly. "But we need to check something." Looking up, she caught Naito's eye. "Masao, would you come here a moment, please?"

Slightly uncertainly he stood, walking over. Chou waved him to stand where Hotaru could see him. She stared, her eyes widening. "What do you feel when you see him, dear? Be honest, we won't judge you for it." Chou said. Several seconds passed.
"Angry. Worried. Sorry." She looked upset. "I know it's Masao, I like him. But for some reason I keep thinking that he's spying on me. I need to stop it." She closed her eyes. Chou exchanged glances with Yori, both women sighing slightly. "What's happening to me, Chou?"

"Don't worry. We can fix it. But I'm afraid I need to put you to sleep again for a while." The blonde's voice was calm and soothing, Ami thought, remarkably so under the circumstances. Hotaru nodded.

"I trust you. And Yori. Do what you need to do."

"I'm sorry about this," the other woman said quietly, reaching out and touching her between the eyes. A brief golden glow later the young woman was deeply asleep. Chou stared at her for a long moment before standing, looking at Naito, who was obviously deeply puzzled and very concerned, then around at everyone else. "I suspect we'd have the same results with Rei, I'm afraid. It's got at them again somehow." She inspected Ami curiously. "I'm very intrigued why it doesn't seem to be affecting you."

"So am I," Ami responded. "I feel perfectly normal like I said."

"No feelings of sudden paranoia?" Yori asked, sitting beside her and staring closely at her. "No suddenly deciding the universe would be a better place if any or all of us weren't in it?"

"Nope." She grinned slightly. "No more than usual."

Yori chuckled for a moment. "Well, you sound normal enough. Do you mind if I have a quick look?" she asked, raising a hand.

"Help yourself." She held still while Yori put her hand on her head, feeling a very slight tickle that moved around inside for a minute or so. Eventually the other woman lowered her hand, looking at her for a long moment.

"No changes at all that I can see, mental or physical. Hotaru would be able to say for sure but I don't think it's affected you. I wish I knew why." She looked puzzled. Ami shrugged helplessly.

"So do I. I can't think of any real reason."

"Hmm." After studying her for a while, Yori sighed. "There has to be a reason but I can't see it right now." She looked at Aiko and Azumi, both of whom nodded and visibly relaxed. There was a sudden noticeable drop in tension in the room, something that even Naito clearly felt judging by the way he shivered a little. "OK, I guess we can trust you. Just try not to go nuts, please."

"I try not to do that every day," Ami replied, giggling. Yori and Aiko laughed while Azumi smiled, looking much happier.

Eventually they all stopped smiling, one by one turning to look at Agent Naito, who shifted uncomfortably on his seat. "I guess we have to deal with the next problem now," Yori said slowly, not looking entirely happy. He looked back, obviously slightly worried. Picking up on this she half-laughed, half-sighed. "It's not your fault, Masao. It's just something that's sort of private. None of us want the PSIA involved, it's not their business really and there's not much they could do about it anyway." She glanced at Ami who frowned a little but nodded. "We have no choice now, we pretty much have to tell you at least some of it."

"Does that include why Hotaru suddenly went all homicidal?" he asked.

"It's all tied together." Yori examined him for a moment. "It has to stay private. I know you have sworn an oath of loyalty to the Japanese government, which is one of the reasons I didn't want to tell you this. I don't think there is any direct conflict at the moment but I couldn't absolutely swear that at some future date there wouldn't be. Almost certainly not, but..." She shrugged a little. "It's tied in to some things that are much bigger than any one country. We can tell you, but we're going to have to insist on you accepting a security spell first." He looked somewhat confused and also slightly suspicious.

"What does that mean, exactly?" he asked slowly.

"It's a spell we bought in that prevents specific information being transferred, spoken about, or even referenced if people who are not also included in the same spell are present. The information we tie into it you would be unable to talk about, write about, or in any way transfer to anyone else but us. That's all it does, it doesn't affect your mind at all, only your memory under very particular conditions. It's complicated to explain fully, you don't have the background knowledge for it, but it's very effective." She watched his face. "I give you my word of honour that it's both safe and necessary. It won't affect anything else other than this specific information."

He looked back at her for some time, his face blank. "And if I refuse? What then?"

"We can't force it on you, it only works with a willing participant. If you, for whatever reason, decide you can't or won't accept, we'll have to take you home, then go on with what we need to do. I won't hold it against you in any way if that's your choice. I'm still happy to work with you in future, as are all of us, you're a friend aside from anything else, but we won't be able to tell you anything else about this matter."

Naito gazed at her, then looked around at the others. All of them waited for his response. Eventually he sighed faintly. "Annoyingly, my curiosity won't let it go. Also, I trust you, Yori, and the rest of you. I'm sure that you have a good reason for this. You usually do." She smiled at him. "What do I do?"

"Not much except sit there. It just needs explicit acceptance. I'll do the spell, Ami, you provide the key again, you know what to do. Masao, you'll feel a sort of tingling inside your head like something is poking around in there for a few seconds. Don't fight it, just let it happen. It won't cause any harm but it feels a bit strange." Waiting until he nodded, she did something.

"Urgh. That's very...unusual," he mumbled, holding his head.

"Ami?" Performing the action she'd done twice before, Ami did as requested, providing the passcode to the spell. Yori concentrated, then looked satisfied, smiling a little. "OK. It worked. Great. Welcome to the club, Masao."

Naito looked up, his eyes slightly confused for a moment, then seemed to recover. "That was very strange." He chuckled slightly. "I guess it's another thing you get used to." She looked at him soberly for a moment.

"Oh, no, you never get used to that." They stared at each other for a few seconds then broke down laughing.

When he finished giggling he wiped his eyes. "OK. Now can you tell me why Hotaru tried to chop me into little pieces?"

"Of course. I thought you'd never ask..." Yori grinned, before glancing at Ami. "You want to start?"
Sighing gently, the blue-haired young woman began a now-familiar story, while the PSIA agent listened, fascinated. It took quite a while. S'th'kx and his crewman left after a few minutes, the captain talking quietly to Yori briefly before leaving.
"She's having a lot of problems," Tamiko commented with sympathetic worry, watching the feed from the stealthed drone following Setsuna. The green-haired woman looked rather dishevelled, her hair not in the normal neat style she preferred, while her clothes showed signs of being slept in at least once. She was walking down a street near her home, looking around carefully as if searching for something, a notebook and pen clutched in her hands. Every now and then she stopped and seemed to listen very carefully, then made a note. Once or twice she looked very suspiciously at innocent items she passed, inspecting a mailbox as if she suspected it of harbouring unnatural desires, prodding a loose brick in a wall with her foot a couple of times and writing something down, even stopping and glaring at a young man passing by with such ferocity that he nervously crossed to the other side of the road.

Misaki, watching the same feed, nodded agreement, an uncharacteristic expression of worry and distress on her face. "Our grandfather died from dementia at about eighty-five," she said quietly, causing her friend to look at her. "He acted a bit like that a few times. Everything was out to get him. People in the care home were stealing from him, or feeding him poison, things like that. It was horrible. None of it was true, not that I could see, but you couldn't convince him of it. Then, after a while, he basically forgot who we were. That was even worse." She watched as Setsuna stopped dead, peering at a cat sitting on a wall a few metres away with an expression of deep mistrust, before carefully walking in a very wide circle around it, not letting it out of her sight. "This is really difficult to watch. Poor woman."

"Perhaps we should pull the camera back further? She's definitely heard it a few times, and I think it's making her even more weird than she'd otherwise be."

Misaki considered the idea, then nodded. "OK. Let's bring it back another twenty metres then. We need to follow her, just in case one of the others starts something, I don't think Setsuna is likely too, not in the state she's in at the moment. But you can't tell with this lot. They're nothing if not unpredictable right now."

The floating camera stopped in mid-air, waiting for the distant woman to move further away, then resumed following her from a considerably greater distance, zooming in a bit to keep her easily visible. Tamiko and Misaki watched for a while. Eventually the red-head sighed. "I hope Hnther can do something for her. We've never got on but I don't like seeing anyone in that state. She's a very intelligent if somewhat irritating person. To be reduced to... that... That's just wrong."

"It's not good. What about Michiru? You're watching her at the moment."

"She's a lot better than Setsuna but she's still pretty damn paranoid and not in a sensible way. After Haruka left the other day she kept looking out every window in the house like she was hunting for snipers. I don't think she's heard the camera, Setsuna is the only one who seems to have noticed anything, but she was looking like she was sure there was someone watching her."

"There is, of course," Misaki grinned. "Us."

"But she doesn't know that."

"Haruka pretty much told her..."

Tamiko shrugged. "True, but she doesn't know for sure either. I guess Hotaru might have told her."
She's certainly aware of the fact we're keeping her friends under observation even if she doesn't know how."

Both of them glanced around as Fumiko landed on the roof from the adjoining building, walking over and sitting on the bench next to her sister, in the middle of the roof garden on top of the apartment building. "Makoto seems to be hunting muggers again," she reported with a small smile. "She's not being very nice about it either. It seems to be some form of stress relief."

Tamiko snickered. "I always thought common criminals were beneath that lot," she replied, "based on what they've said in the past." Her friend shrugged with a grin.

"Possibly but there aren't any hostile demons around at the moment, she's too scared of Yori to come anywhere near here where there are lots of non-hostile ones, not that the distinction ever mattered much to her, and none of her 'friends' are around to fight with. She spotted Haruka at one point and just stared, then turned and walked away." Fumiko looked darkly amused. "I think she was surprised that Haruka had two perfectly normal arms, and slightly terrified of the implications."

"Good. Anything that keeps them in line is fine by me." Tamiko crossed her arms and scowled.

"It's Usagi and Minako that concern me the most," Fumiko added. "Usagi keeps talking to herself, or to something invisible. I can't work out which it is. Usagi's stomping around on the roof of her building right now waving her arms and seems to be involved in a serious argument. The only problem is no one else is with her." She sent them both a feed from the drone observing the twin-pony-tailed blonde, who was powered up and in her uniform. All three of them watched with some bemusement as the young woman walked in a tight circle, angrily waving her arms and shouting, occasionally stopping and staring at an apparently empty spot on the roof a few metres away, crossing her arms and tilting her head, seeming to listen.

Whatever she 'heard' seemed to irritate her considerably. Tapping her foot she waited for the non-existent other participant to finish, then resumed shouting. All three observers shared a glance. "That's... pretty weird. Even for her. She's never exactly been the sharpest tool in the box but this sort of thing is fairly odd, isn't it?" Tamiko looked at the two other women. Both sisters nodded.

"I'd think it could be classed as a bit strange, yes," Misaki agreed slowly, watching as Usagi stopped and listened to something again. "Turn on the audio and move the camera closer, will you?" With a nod Fumiko did as requested.

"...sy for you to say, Luna. You're not the one who's seen her entire future ripped away from her! I'm the damn princess, they should listen to me! That cunt Ami is behind all of this, her and fucking Yori. God, I hate that little purple-eyed freak. I should just find her and shoot her in the back." Tamiko and the others looked at each other with raised eyebrows as Usagi paused in her rant, listening to a reply only she could hear.

"No, I'm sure I can take her." There was a pause, during which Usagi's face reddened.

"Fuck, you don't have much confidence in me, do you? I'm the moon princess and she's just some jumped up cross-breed with some good tricks. Sneak up behind her, one good shot, and she's toast."

The pause this time was longer, as the observers exchanged bemused glances again.

"What about Chou? If I can take Yori, she's no problem. None of her friends are either." She listened, then nodded slowly. "OK, yes, Aiko is a bit difficult, that damn teleporting is a pain. I'll have to think about that."

Listening once more, she sighed. "Luna, I'll deal with Ami and Rei after I've got rid of Yori and her friends. She's no threat. No power, all she's got is that little computer and some little parlour tricks with water and ice. How much trouble could she be?"

"Of course. Once Ami's taken care of the rest will fall into line. Then we can deal with anyone else who'd deny me my rightful place." Pacing back and forth she looked out at the city. "All this will be gone soon enough, then..." Rubbing her hands together she smiled in a very unsettling manner. "Right." Pulling out a small device she fiddled with it for a moment. "Let's see if Minako has come to her senses yet. I wouldn't turn down some help." Waiting impatiently, tapping her foot, she gave up in the end. "Bitch. I bet she's just sulking again. Oh well. I'll just have to go and find her."

Walking to the edge of the roof she stepped off the edge without breaking step, the drone following her, then bounded off down the street, a few people watching her pass with expressions of distaste which she completely missed. One small boy threw a rock after her, then hastily went inside his house.

"That was... very disturbing." Fumiko finally said. Misaki and Tamiko nodded wordlessly. "Should we tell Ranma and Kasumi?"

"They've got their hands full at the moment with that damn asteroid and the other girls. We'll have to deal with this crazy megalomaniac ourselves." Tamiko sighed heavily. "Damn it. I wish we could just go somewhere and fly for a while, or go swimming. This is such a pain in the ass." Standing, she wandered over to the edge of the roof and looked off in the direction Usagi was. The others came and stood beside her.

Fumiko looked at her after a moment. "She seems to have gone off the deep end completely. How do you thing we should deal with this?"

"I wish we could open a portal and just throw the idiot through to somewhere nice and barren. Maybe the firing range. Give her some time to cool down."

"That might just make her worse," Misaki grunted.

"Possibly. But she'd be out of our hair for a while at least. Chuck a few boxes of emergency rations through as well, enough to live on until the others get back, then we could go and deal with her properly. From the sound of it she's gearing up to do something stupid again. If she does, Ranma is going to vapourise the little fuckwit for sure."

"Think she stands a chance of genuinely taking him?" Fumiko asked curiously. Tamiko and Misaki both gave her an odd look.

"Not on her best day and Ranma's worst. She wouldn't stand the tiniest hope of success. I know how powerful she is, if she really gets into her stride, but he'd kill her without even trying. He'd agonise over it afterwards, of course, but it wouldn't stop him doing it even so if that was the only way."

"By this point I'd kill the little cow quite happily, to be honest," Misaki said with a rather bloodthirsty chuckle. "She's pretty much used up all her credit as far as I'm concerned." Her sister glanced at her, then shook her head tiredly.
"Deep down inside you there's just a happy psychopath waiting to get out, isn't there, sis?" she asked. Misaki grinned at her, as did Tamiko.

"I'm just getting very tired of all this crap. I know they have some serious medical problems, are under the influence of a malignant external force, and in many ways can't be blamed for their actions, but that bloody woman is just too far into her delusions to be reasoned with right now. It would be a lot simpler just to end it."

"That it would, but it's wrong, even so. As you well know." Fumiko stared hard at her sister, who reluctantly nodded.

"True. Oh well, it was just a thought." She grinned again. "Kind of a nice one, but..."

Slapping her on the back, Tamiko smiled at them both. "Let's leave the idle discussion of cold-bloodedly terminating a problem to 'Ms Aoyama' and go and stop Usagi doing something stupid, shall we? Ranma will be very annoyed if it all kicks off again. They left us in charge for a reason."

Misaki cracked her knuckles, grinning coldly. "And those bitches made me miss out on walking on the moon. I'm certainly up for some corrective action." Her friends clearly agreed. Exchanging a glance that would have made anyone who saw it run away really quite fast, the three young women leaped from the roof to the next building, heading for an intercept with Usagi, guided by the camera feeds.

Staring at Ami wordlessly for some time, Naito finally shook his head in wonder. He looked at the others, who were all wearing different expressions, waiting, then at Hotaru, finally at Rei. "Poor girls. That's horrible. All that, just to force some future that can't even exist in the first place?"

He felt sympathetic, horrified, and sick, all at the same time. Yori nodded.

"I'm afraid so. We weren't totally certain until after we scanned the moon, but there was absolutely no evidence at all of any 'Moon Kingdom' or anything else pre-dating the sixties. It's entirely fictitious. This damn time machine has been fiddling around with the past, manipulating people for who knows how long, just to drive it's narrative forward to end up with something it can't end up with. For some reason it simply doesn't seem to be capable of understanding that one little but very crucial fact. Our reality is not it's reality and there's no way to make it like that. The best it can do is a partial replication, but at the very real possible cost of all of our reality vanishing in a puff of paradox." No one looked very happy about that summation.

"How can it be smart enough to work out all the different things it needs to do to push reality in that direction but stupid enough to not realise it's impossible?" he asked, shivering at the concept he'd been given. She grimaced, sighing.

"True machine intelligence is apparently extremely difficult to do right. It can be done, but very few species have ever managed it. Most of them settle for something that's kind of smart, in a limited and slightly dim way, which is fine if you're running something like air traffic control or a car, but catastrophic if you've got it plugged into a machine that can erase reality. Running two cars into each other because the system got confused is pretty bad, running two time-lines into each other for the same reason is much, much worse. Apparently the thing is supposed to have an organic mind linked into it in a supervisory role, to stop it making stupid decisions, but god knows how long it's been running without even that level of oversight. It's a time machine, after all. It might have ended up here a hundred years ago, or a thousand, or a million even."

"Or last week. We simply have no way of knowing," Azumi added, frowning. "Lldnr'k thinks it's probably looped back on itself several times already based on things like the temporal signature of Ami's computer. It could have done it a lot more than that but it's unlikely for a number of reasons. The assumption is that it can only make fairly small changes, either because it's learned that big ones immediately go horribly wrong or because it simply doesn't have the ability to do more than tamper here and there. Given enough time, even small changes could add up horribly. From what we were told any tampering with time is a spectacularly bad idea in the first place, no matter how small the change, but the little ones usually damp out. Temporal inertia, he called it."

"That it is."

The unconscious girls. "And it's the cause of all the trouble we've had recently with Ami's group. It's the reason they're around in the first place, which to be honest I'm fine with, but it's also fucked them up so badly it all fell apart. We're desperately trying to figure out how to repair the situation, or at least fix it enough that it doesn't get worse." She looked at Ami, who looked back, a depressed expression on her face. "It's very unlikely indeed that we can undo everything. I'd say impossible, to be honest, and Ami, Hnther, and Lldnr'k all agree for different reasons. But with some luck we can salvage something we can all live with from the wreckage."

"I'm resigned to the fact that my friends, in the way I knew them, are mostly gone," Ami sighed, obviously very upset about it. "Rei and Hotaru are more or less fine, except for this recent problem. Haruka might come around although I wouldn't be surprised if she just decided to give up completely, as far as the life-style would allow. I wouldn't blame her at all. The rest...?" Shrugging in a tired way she leaned back in the seat and rubbed her eyes. "No idea. None at all."

"Setsuna is drifting away," Chou said quietly, watching the blue-haired girl with concern in her eyes. "We desperately need to get her seen by someone like Hnther but with therapist training. He's still working on that. Haruka could certainly do with some work as well. Michiru isn't in a good state either. The other three are less affected in exactly that way but still need help, if they'll accept it." The blonde glanced at her partner for a moment. "We may have to insist, which isn't exactly ideal, or fair in a sense. This isn't their fault in most ways. And there's always a possibility it won't work in the first place, or not very well. The damage caused by this sort of mental tampering is insidious and very difficult to reverse properly, especially considering how long it's been going on for. Hnther isn't happy about the results."

"He's unbelievably unhappy," Yori added. "To the level that if the people who made the fucking thing still existed he'd kill them all personally, on general principals." The young woman scowled. "I'd help him." The conscious inhabitants of the room agreed in a low growl that raised the hairs on the back of the PSIA man's neck. Looking at him, she added, "But you can see why we don't want this story getting out generally or even going to the PSIA or the government. Someone would be bound to panic, try to do something themselves, undoubtedly fail spectacularly, then the shit really hits the fan. It's not a job we asked for but it's one we're pretty much stuck with as the only ones with the knowledge and contacts to do anything."

He nodded thoughtfully. "I do see. I agree, as well. If this got out even into the Japanese government it would cause... highly non-helpful repercussions." Yori grinned a little at his description. "God only knows what would happen if any other governments got wind of it. The British would probably run in little circles for a day or two then come to their senses and stay out of it, perhaps offer to help, the Canadians might do much the same, but the Americans..." He shivered. "They wouldn't like it at all. The Russians would be worse."

"Whatever the results the one thing you can more or less guarantee is that it wouldn't be very useful," Azumi commented, looking sour.
"All too true." He looked at her, then returned his attention to Yori and Chou. "I suppose you could simply order the PSIA to stay out of it. You do seem to have the authority nowadays." Aiko, Azumi, and Ami stared at him, then looked quizzically at the black-haired girl, who seemed embarrassed and scratched the back of her head.

"Um. I suppose so. We were given quite a lot of, well, unofficial official powers." She looked at her friends who were looking back with interest. "I was going to mention it when it was needed," she said slightly guiltily.

"You've been talking to your mysterious high-up friends again, haven't you?" Aiko asked, looking intrigued. Yori nodded.

"Yes. I had to with all this recent trouble. It was becoming something that would attract too much of the wrong sort of attention. Certain people would prefer that not happen. So would I." She grinned a little. "The result was a little more than I was expecting. We, Chou and I, and by extension the rest of you, were given some quiet but real authority in certain matters. I was told that they knew full well that we were doing the job already so they might as well make it a real one." She shrugged a little. "These things keep happening. Not what I'm looking for but..."

"We know how it goes," Aiko chuckled. She looked curious. "So what? We're official Magical Girls by appointment to the government now, or something?"

Yori grinned more widely. "Not exactly. I really don't want that sort of thing, it's too much responsibility that none of us genuinely have the experience for. I told them as much. None of us are political at all, if anything we're basically apolitical, we're mostly concerned with the magical side of the world not the non-magical one. They said they knew that, but the two things were overlapping more and more recently, something that seemed likely to continue." She looked at Azumi, smiling. "If you end up spreading alien technology all over the planet and solving all sorts of unsolvable problems that will become even more true."

"I suppose it will," the silver-haired girl mused, looking mildly worried.

"In the end the arrangement we came to is a slightly more formal sort of consultancy. We're the official but secret 'Special Talent'. No pay, no real remit except to keep doing what we're doing, but it meant they could give us certain clearances in a way that was a bit more official." She snickered for a moment. "Chou and I more or less had that already but it wasn't written down anywhere. Now it is."

"It's a little like the K'nn peace enforcement authorisation Yori and I were given on K'nn four, only with somewhat higher clearance," Chou explained. Azumi nodded a little while Aiko and Ami looked puzzled. After a moment Aiko seemed to understand, Naito noticed. "But a very similar arrangement."

"From the notice I was sent the clearance was a bit more than 'somewhat higher'," he chuckled. "The Director-General wasn't joking when he said you had higher clearance than he did. It annoyed him nearly as much as it puzzled him."

Ami stared at Yori in mild shock. "So what does that mean?"

"Well, we've been given authority to do whatever we need to to to resolve the current problem, for example," Yori replied. "If it became necessary to blow Michiru into little pieces to stop her vaporising a school, the official government position would be, 'Oh dear, sorry about that.'" She shrugged slightly as Ami paled. "It won't come to that, I desperately hope, and if it did I'd have done it authorisation or no authorisation, which they know, but this way everyone is covered in a way which keeps the politicians happy should anything ever get said. It almost certainly wouldn't in any case. This is more like insurance from their side of things."

"And possibly a small bribe to try to keep us on their side," Chou giggled. Yori looked at her, her eyebrow raised, then nodded.

"Perhaps. As long as it's the right thing to do I'm happy to help. If they wanted me to do something I wasn't comfortable with I'd turn them down. I told them that as well." She laughed. "No one seemed surprised. Or inclined to insist."

"For some reason that entirely fails to shock me," Naito said with a straight face, making her laugh some more.

"That magical girl institute is coming closer and closer," Aiko giggled, making the other woman glare at her.

"No, it is not."

"Bet you it is."

"Damn it, Aiko, I told you before. That's crazy talk."

"We're all crazy, Yori," her friend giggled. She pointed at Naito, who was watching with a smile, aware this was some weird long-running joke between them. "Even him."

"Especially me," he replied, grinning. "I'm not some magic-powered superhuman like the rest of you. If you shoot me, do I not bleed?" He waved dramatically at himself. "Unlike the rest of you, where it just bounces off and makes you complain about the holes in your shirt. Yet I keep coming along with you on these interesting little trips."

Yori stared for a moment, then fell over laughing her head off. Everyone looked at her before they all started laughing as well. It took a couple of minutes for them to recover. "I'm glad you can keep joking under the circumstances, Masao," she finally said, sitting up and wiping tears of laughter from her eyes. "Thanks. That helped." He made a small magnanimous gesture, grinning, causing her mouth to twitch again.

"My pleasure." Looking at her closely, he added, "I must confess to wondering who 'They' are to be able to give you this authorisation. I know the notice came from a very high level in the government, but...?" She shrugged regretfully, smiling a little.

"I'd love to be able to tell you but I can't. I made a promise."

He looked at her seriously, knowing that she meant it. "All right. If you can ever tell me I would like to know but I can accept that."

"Thanks." She glanced at Chou for a moment, the two of them having a silent conversation, he was sure. "There's more to the story. You've got the background to the moon trip and all the trouble with Ami's group. Now you need to know the rest." He looked at her curiously, waiting.

"That asteroid?" She waved a hand at the projected image on the wall behind them. "It's a weapon.
It's no coincidence that it's heading at the Earth."

Staring at her for a long moment, he then looked past her at the image of the giant rock, some ten kilometres away as S'th'kx had moved the ship back out of caution. "A weapon?" She nodded.
"How do you weaponise an asteroid for god's sake?"
"Put engines on it."

Once more he stared in silence. She looked mildly amused.

"Engines," he stated flatly.

"Yes."

"On that." He pointed past her shoulder. She nodded.

"On that. They're quite big."

"They'd have to be, I suppose," he agreed faintly, staring at the thing again. After a moment he frowned. "So that's why you and the others went around the other side of the damn thing?" She nodded again, looking slightly guilty.

"Yes. We didn't want to let you in on it for obvious reasons, so we invented a reason for you five to hang around on this side while we went to look at the installation on the other."

"Hmm." He studied her for a moment. "Did you find anything interesting?"

Yori appeared frustrated. "Yes. Some antigrav engines and magitech from the same source as Ami's computer, in other words the time device, some sort of power supply driving it all, and a very powerful ward protecting all of it. We were in the process of removing the entire end of the asteroid with the engines when all this shit started. It can't possibly be a coincidence. The damn thing has been floating out here for who knows how long, possibly thousands of years, yet as soon as one of S'th'kx's probes finds it the engine fires up aiming it directly at home. As soon as I start doing something that could neutralise the threat Hotaru and Rei go crazy. It was definitely connected."

Nodding slowly, he thought about her words. "I'd have to agree. Too unlikely even for you guys." Frowning slightly he asked, "Why would this time device be trying to ram an asteroid into the planet in the first place?"

"Out best guess is that it's some sort of plan B, a backup method of creating the sort of disaster that our group has been waiting for all this time," Ami sighed. "The story we got was very vague about what the disaster actually was, only that it would kill off a lot of the people and cause some sort of prolonged emergency state that eventually resulted in Usagi ruling a magical Utopia. An asteroid strike could certainly go some way to meeting that description. That thing is big enough to wipe out half the planet's people but not so big it would kill all life on Earth. But it's a hell of a risk. It's making the assumption that we'd survive the strike in the first place. Not completely unreasonable but not totally certain either." She half-grinned for a moment. "Asteroid impacts are dangerous. We're not invulnerable."

"We suspect that the original disaster has somehow been averted although we don't know how or why," Chou told him. "Ldnr'k thought it might be some sort of slow environmental one based on the story Ami and the others had been given, rather than a sudden collapse, but we don't really know for sure. The device probably spent a long time setting it up, making little changes here and there, so the multiverse wouldn't notice and revert it or reset the time lines. Inducing a deliberate asteroid strike is a very large intervention, which would make it much more likely to cause uncontrollable side effects. In turn that makes it less probable that it's a first line plan. But some sort of emergency backup is possible."

"So finding it triggered the device into setting it off anyway, or early, or something like that?"
"asked, considering the idea. "Basically it panicked?"

The blonde woman produced a small shrug, smiling a little apologetically. "More or less. But again, we're making educated guesses. If we could somehow get access to the installation on the asteroid we might get lucky and find some proof one way or another, but then again we might not. That's the sort of thing that happens in movies. I'm not sure some semi-sentient ancient alien supercomputer is going to be helpful enough to leave it's plans lying around where we can get at them."

Naito chuckled, agreeing. It would be suspiciously helpful.

Yori got up and began pacing back and forth restlessly as he watched. "We know it's plans have been going badly wrong for some time. The temporally isolated possible future is proof of that aside from anything else. All the mental damage and craziness would have made the problem steadily worse, but ironically the more it interfered to fix it the worse it made the issue. Again, given a real intelligence, it would have worked this out and stopped poking, but it's just not that smart. It tried looping back and redoing everything at least a couple of times, possibly more, but most likely that also only made things even harder to control. Even for such a powerful machine the number of things to keep track of must be insanely complex. Lldnr'k is firmly of the opinion that it can't be done at all, no matter how good the computer, the variables are almost infinite. Quite possibly genuinely infinite."

"The magitech signature of the engine installation is clearly from the same basic source as Ami's computer and other artefacts they have, but just different enough that it makes me think it dates from a previous attempt. Or even from it's original reality. We'd know if we could access the thing but we're not sure how to at the moment."

"Why not do it through Setsuna?" he asked. She stopped pacing and looked at him. "She's the one who used the thing. Or was used by it, depending on your viewpoint."

"Both, I think."

"Can't you get her to take you to it? Ami said she went back and forth."

"We did think of that, as it was the obvious idea. There are a couple of problems, though. One is that from what Ami said she simply wouldn't cooperate."

"It's true," Ami added. "I asked once about seeing the Time Gate, she nearly bit my head off. Threatened to kill me if I ever asked again."

"So that's one issue. She might be slightly more relaxed about it now, she might not." Yori shrugged. "The other problem is that Lldnr'k strongly advised against letting any of them get anywhere near the thing, especially in the fractional reality we think it's hiding in. He felt that would be asking for trouble. There would be little likelihood of stopping it influencing them if it had direct access. We still don't know how it tampered with them in the first pla..."

"That's how it got at them. It used the engine installation as a relay. There must be some sort of spell trace still on them which it was able to access when we got close enough. I'd have detected it if it was powerful enough to get at them back home, so would Hnther and Lldnr'k. None of us could find anything, so it must be very subtle. We're going to have to get them checked over again. We need to find it and kill it, Ami stared at her for a long moment. "That sounds plausible, I suppose. It fits the observed data, at least. But it still doesn't explain why I'm not affected."

"It might," Azumi said slowly. Everyone looked at her. She seemed to be thinking hard. Naito thought it looked like she was having some inner conversation. After a few seconds, she continued, "It could be that it was using your computer as a relay at home, if Yori is correct. We know it had a low-level real-time link directly to the device and your computer is a magitech system, which could easily be used to pass some magical energy. It's designed to do that. That could be what was influencing your team-mates. It wouldn't take much, a nudge here and there when you met up. Setsuna could be more directly influenced since she was actually in contact with the thing. You said she had some sort of staff that was the key to accessing the device?"

Ami nodded, looking fascinated. "Yes. It's a weapon as well, but it seemed to be necessary for her to teleport to wherever the device actually is. I suppose it might well have some sort of processing function built into it. I've never really looked at it."

"Perhaps it was using that as a relay as well. That would let it access Michiru, Haruka, and Hotaru, since they were in close proximity to her a lot of the time. Your computer would do the same for your friends for the same reason." The silver-haired young woman sighed slightly. "I'm not sure but it sort of hangs together. In your case specifically it could probably get the results it wanted simply by manipulating the data you got from that thing since you use it so much, and would have had no reason to think it was directing you to a specific end. We know from the traces they found in your mind that you were influenced, just not as much as the others, so perhaps it relied on indirect control most of the time and only resorted to direct intervention if that didn't work."

"That sounds... unpleasantly possible," Ami replied. She didn't look happy. "I always believed what the computer told me. Why wouldn't I?"

"Exactly." Azumi looked around at the rest of them. No one could refute the idea. "So when I hacked the thing and broke the link permanently, it's not impossible I inadvertently also stopped it influencing the rest of your friends. We don't know what the range of the influence is, it might be quite short. Recent events would suggest that." There was a long silence.

"Crap. If you're right, and it certainly sounds possible, that raises some problems," Yori appeared annoyed. "One thing is that we'll need to get Setsuna's staff away from her somehow. It may well still be affecting her, which with the state her mind was in last time we checked could be very bad. The rest of them could be affected as well. Another is that we can't get too close to that asteroid with Ami in case it decides to have a go at her. We can keep Rei and Hotaru unconscious and out of trouble until we leave, though." She looked thoughtful. "I wonder if it's influence, once established, works over longer distances?"

"It's possible, I guess," Azumi shrugged. "It's way past my experience or knowledge. I was just thinking it through logically."

"Well, even if that's the case it won't work once we go back to Krennh space, that I am sure of," the martial artist said. "The separation between the two realities is too much. Even the limited number of magitech and magic that can cross reality boundaries can only do it across fairly close ones. The K'nn grouping doesn't fit that description."

"So when we go back to K'nn four they'll be OK?" Ami asked hopefully.

Yori glanced at her. "Not immediately, but they won't get worse. We can get Hnther and Lldnr'k to come and help us find and remove whatever residual magic allowed this to happen in the first place. That should ensure it doesn't do it again and hopefully sort them out so they're back to normal."

"Why didn't it affect me this time, I wonder?" Ami mused out loud. Everyone looked at her.

Eventually Naito answered. "My guess, for what it's worth, would be that it's limited in what it can do to you girls. They had been more severely affected than you, from what Yori says, which might have made them easier targets, and if the intent was a diversion to get her to stop attacking it's installation, generating a situation that everyone had to go and deal with would have been a reasonably efficient use of what influence it could bring to bear." They all looked at him this time.

"Not bad. Very likely, in fact," Yori nodded, looking impressed. "I suspect you're right. But now we've neutralised Rei and Hotaru, it might well have a go at Ami if it tries again. So we need to keep her away from the asteroid."

S'th'kx's voice sounded a moment later, causing four of the six people to look up sharply. When he finished speaking Yori sighed heavily, then said something back. She turned to Ami and Naito.

"The asteroid is accelerating again. Harder than last time."

"Damn." He felt his heart sink. "Now what?"

"I'm losing patience with the entire thing, to be honest. I think we just deal with it once and for all. Chou may well be right, there might not be anything down there, although I'd have liked to check, but at this point I think we just destroy it."

"How long do we have?"

She smiled at his worried look. "Oh, weeks, certainly, it's still a hell of a long way from Earth. But I don't want it getting any closer than I can avoid. If nothing else, the closer it gets the more likely someone might notice, then the panic starts." She spoke to the air, S'th'kx responding, then after a moment they felt the ship begin to move. "We'll go and retrieve Hotaru's weapon, he's been tracking it, then go after that damn asteroid and stop it." She sighed. "I really didn't want to force the ward the hard way. I'm not sure there will be much of the asteroid intact afterwards."

"Does that matter?" he asked. She, Aiko, Chou and Azumi all got peculiar expressions. Glancing at Ami, seeing she was as puzzled as he was, he looked back. "I see it does. Why, exactly?" After another odd look she told him.

"They look a bit overwhelmed," Aiko chuckled over the com to her friends. 'Yori' looked up at her from where she was examining Hotaru's pole-arm with interest, then over to Ami and Naito, who were staring at each other, apparently unable to figure out quite what to say. Every now and then one of them would open his or her mouth, or raise a hand, then shake their head and go back to staring. 'Azumi' watched them with amused sympathy.

"It is rather a lot to take on board, especially considering all the other things that have happened in the last hour or so," her sister commented. 'Azumi' glanced at her, nodding slightly.

"I'm impressed with how well Masao is taking all this. He's pretty quick witted and flexible minded. Having someone suddenly try to cut your head off out of the blue would definitely be very disconcerting, worse if it was an apparently insane magical girl. But he recovered faster than I expected."
"He's very smart and a good man," 'Chou' replied. "I'm sorry we had to dump so much on him like this."

"It's a pity we had to tell him in the first place but we didn't have a choice. At least it was him and not someone who wouldn't be able to deal with it," her husband sighed, going back to investigating the mystical weapon. The disguised Nabiki watched with fascination as she ran her hands slowly along it, her fingers every now and then blurring slightly as if they'd dropped into a hole that wasn't there. She recalled the same effect from when she was showing Rei how to access her magic directly. "This thing is amazing," 'Yori' added. "I don't think the time machine is responsible for it. It feels all wrong for that. It's absolutely ancient, I'm sure of that much, far older than Ami's computer, although Ldnr'k could probably tell us more. It's not really magitech, it's magical in a much more direct fashion. There's a hell of a lot of power handling capacity here as well, much more than any artefact I've ever seen before. Working out all the functions is difficult. I wonder if Hotaru realises what she has?"

"The story goes that it could destroy the planet with her using it if she wanted to," 'Chou' said, turning her attention to the weapon. She reached out and gently felt it, raising her eyebrows. "I've never seen it up close before, though. She hasn't told me much about it although we talked quite a few times before all this trouble flared up."

"I'm not sure that 'destroy the planet' is quite right, looking at it," 'Yori' mused, closely inspecting part of the magic. "But it could certainly make a hell of a mess of it. At least as much as that asteroid could, if not more. Assuming you had enough power to run through it, which she certainly does, although she's untrained in using it properly. It seems to be, amongst other things, a very effective amplifier. I'm not sure what the power source is but it's tapped in to something enormous." She prodded it in a couple of places, provoking a sharp snapping sound and a wince. "Ow. It didn't like that." 'Chou' grinned at her.

"Don't annoy ancient alien mystical weapons, dear. It never ends well."

"I'm not trying to annoy it, just work it out. It seems friendly enough, just easily irritated." She poked it again, more respectfully. "Hmmm. Interesting. I think it might be something slightly like our ward system. There's a part of it that's certainly absorbing energy and storing it. This bit here would produce an amazingly solid ward, not very large but damn near impenetrable." She studied the spell closely, her eyebrows going up slightly. "Very efficient as well. That's one of the best ward spells I've ever seen, not far off ours. In fact, it's considerably better in some ways. Not quite as efficient, and nowhere near as large, but even stronger. I'm going to have to remember that. I think I see a way to use some of this to upgrade the ward system."

"She told me once it could cut through anything," 'Chou' commented, watching her investigations. 'Yori' looked at her for a moment then turned her attention to the blade at the end of the long shaft. After a few seconds she nodded.

"That's almost certainly entirely correct. The blade isn't really a solid material, it's a force projection that looks solid. Essentially it's a two dimensional plane. No thickness at all." Staring at it from close range she gingerly touched the edge, flinching back, then sucking her finger, before looking at the small cut on it, impressed. "Total sharpness, essentially. Anything material would be affected. It might even go through most tech-produced forcefields and many wards. You could block it if you knew what you were doing but it would be difficult and take a lot of power." She looked at them. "I think Hotaru can probably turn that part on and off, possibly vary it selectively, although she might not consciously realised what she's doing, since I've seen her poke things with it without them falling apart." Returning her attention to the weapon she inspected it some more, finally nodding.

"Yes. Here we go. Looks like this node here turns the 'sharpness' on and off. Hmm. So if I do this..." They watched as she sent a thin thread of magic into the ancient weapon. Nothing happened at first, the magic being deflected, but after a couple of attempts she smiled. "Got it. It's off now. It's not as well protected against unauthorised use as it should be. We should probably do something about that." Pulling a coin out she dropped it onto the edge of the blade, which it fell right through onto the floor. Retrieving it she fiddled with the pole-arm again then repeated the action. This time the coin dropped to the floor in two perfectly cut halves. "Wow. That is sharp!"

'Azumi' stared in worried fascination. "If she'd managed to get Masao with that thing..."

"We'd have several pieces of PSIA agent. Quite," 'Yori' grinned at her. "When Kas stopped her she must have left it active. I'm very interested in how much of the control of this thing she's doing consciously and how much is reflex action. When this is all over I'm going to have to talk to her about it." Still studying the magic, the martial artist spared a moment to look over at Ami and Naito again. They still seemed stunned, now both slumped in their seats, staring at the projected asteroid which was several kilometres away, at a range they'd decided was probably more or less safe. They were matching it's course to one side. The engines had shut down again after running for some fifteen minutes, aiming it more precisely at where the Earth would be in a few weeks.

"Let's give then another twenty minutes then we should talk," 'Yori' said with a small smile, going back to Hotaru's weapon with great interest.

Ami stirred, tearing her gaze away from the impossibly valuable asteroid floating serenely against a background of stars, turning her head to lock eyes with Agent Naito. He had an expression that perfectly matched her inner feelings. A look of understanding passed between them before they both turned to watch Yori, who was standing in the middle of the room spinning Hotaru's weapon around, going through some complex kata involving it, looking pleased. Her face paling, she was about to warn the other woman how dangerous the thing was when Yori stopped, grounding the butt of the weapon on the deck and holding it in the middle, the blade some distance above her head. She looked at Ami, an amused expression crossing her face.

"Don't worry, I put it in safe mode."

"Um, safe mode?" Ami had never heard Hotaru refer to anything like that. Yori nodded happily.

"Yep. I worked out some of the functions. The really dangerous ones are locked fairly well, which makes sense, you don't want someone destroying all life in a thousand kilometre radius by accident, but the close-combat ones are fairly easy to get at." Ami gaped at her, then shook her head slightly.

"Easy for you. I doubt many other people could do that." The young woman shrugged, picking the pole-arm off the floor and holding it across her chest for a moment. Ami stared in shock as the blade vanished, leaving just the staff. "What the fuck...?"

"Uh, yes, I found some other things you could do with it." Yori grinned. "Hotaru should find them interesting." Making the staff disappear, she walked over, sitting across from them, Chou and the other two doing likewise. They all stared at Naito and Ami for a moment then simultaneously glanced at the projection of the asteroid. Yori sighed. "So. What to do about all this?"

"Is that damn thing really worth that much?" Naito asked slowly. She nodded again.
"Yes. To a civilisation that uses such elements, certainly. The initial probe surveys show it's got a lot of other interesting elements in it as well, ones we're more familiar with, like quite a lot of gold, platinum, iridium, tungsten, osmium, dense materials like that, although the bulk of it is iron and some sort of heavy rock like volcanic basalt. S'th'kx thinks it's basically a piece of planetary core material. He also says that there's a good chance it's from outside the solar system. None of the other asteroids the probes have scanned so far have the same ratios of various isotopes which suggests it didn't originate here."

"It's possible it came from the same place the time device did," Azumi added. "Or it was captured by the Sun from wandering around out there and the machine found it. We just don't know, aside from the probability that it's not local. Which also suggests that we're unlikely to find that much of these exotic elements anywhere else around here."

"Blowing it to gravel would be something of a waste," Chou added. "Although if we have no choice we will." She grinned for a moment. "S'th'kx might never speak to us again if we did, though. He's wandering about looking like he's seen heaven at the moment. This is his dream find."

"The problem with the asteroid is that not only don't we have the technological base to use any of the exotic elements in anything other than a purely scientific interest application now, and won't for many decades, we don't even have the technology to mine it in the first place. That severely limits the actual value to us directly. It would have to be pretty much ground to powder and run through some extremely high-tech machinery to separate out all the useful things. The Krennsh can do it although it's a process that will take some years." Yori looked at the asteroid again. "Even if processing it could be done faster, dumping that much material with that high a value onto the market, here or there, would cause economic chaos. Some civilisations would be able to absorb it easily, though. A proper assay to determine exactly what's present would suggest the best way to use it."

She looked back at them. "Assuming we even do use it. We could just leave it here, in a safe orbit, when we've dealt with the engines and the time device. It's not going to go anywhere. If we sliced off a chunk for S'th'kx, that would compensate him for his time and the probe swarms, although he's already told me he's not worried about that. I think it would be fair, to be honest, he and his crew have gone to a lot of trouble to help us."

"What are the normal rules covering this sort of situation?" Naito asked quietly. She chuckled, looking mildly lost for a moment, gesturing widely. "Normal? What about any of this is even remotely normal?" He smiled for a moment, still looking shell-shocked. "Good point."

Chou shifted in her seat, sitting up slightly. "If this was in Krennsh space, the situation would apparently be that, as a commissioned vessel involved in such a discovery, the find would be shared at a rate of between twenty-five and fifty percent for the company running the vessel and the balance to the company which commissioned it, depending on negotiations. The crew of the vessel, in other words anyone on board, would be entitled to a percentage of the vessels' share, again based on negotiated rates and to a degree on seniority. S'th'kx, as the captain, would get the largest share, but even passengers would receive something. It's not common but it happens sometimes. Nothing anywhere near this large as far as he'd ever heard."

"It's complicated in this case, though. The captain of the vessel is both the owner of it and the owner of the company running it. The passengers on board are the ones who in effect commissioned the mission in the first place. Not to mention the fact that we're not in Krennsh space anyway, although we are aboard a vessel from there and the discovery was made by a citizen of K'n'n four with their own equipment." The blonde sighed a little. "It could potentially be very messy, legally. In this case, as far as that part goes, S'th'kx and we trust each other for many reasons so at least that part is fine."

Azumi looked at them for a moment. "The Outer Space Treaty of 1967, which Japan has signed and ratified, makes our involvement a little complicated. It wasn't thought through very well from what I could see, or more accurately wasn't drafted with asteroid mining in mind, it was more aimed at preventing the militarisation of space. Although it in theory covers all of space beyond the Earth, it clearly can't do much more than the solar system. There are definitely alien civilisations out there somewhere, that's a constant in all realities according to my information, so they might have something to say about us claiming their resources for the good of all mankind." She smiled a little as Ami giggled, her shock slowly wearing off. "But you could argue it covers the solar system and anything in it."

"I know a little about that treaty but I can't remember much," Naito said, looking fascinated by the subject. "I do recall that a country can leave it at any point, although it needs to announce it something like a year in advance before it's no longer bound by it."

"Yes. Article XVI allows that. But on the whole the treaty is a good idea. Leaving it probably isn't the best idea as it might well make other countries do the same, although it would be a simple solution." The silver-haired girl sighed slightly. "I wasn't expecting to find I'd be discussing international law regarding space on this trip. I thought it would just be an interesting trip to the moon and back." She smiled slightly ruefully as everyone nodded a little.

"Technically, I suspect you could argue that since we're on a Krennsh ship, having entered and left the solar system through Krennsh space, we're not really bound by the treaty in the first place. It certainly doesn't cover S'th'kx and his crew or ship. You could probably consider all of us except for you, Masao, as representatives of a non governmental organisation." Yori looked amused again as he thought about it. "That's more or less the basis we were working on which is why we invited you. That way we complied with the letter of the treaty by having a State representative monitoring the mission. Not that we were planning on telling anyone about it in the first place. That's all right, both the Americans and the Russians run secret missions to orbit, people can't really avoid noticing them launch, but they don't know why or what they're doing. We're just better at it."

Ami watched the PSIA man's face. He looked quite worried, this was clearly a long way past anything he'd expected to have to think about as well. "We could just forget about it," she suggested. Yori looked at her.

"True. Once we stop the time device using it as a weapon we could push it into a safe orbit and pretend we never found it, like I said earlier. But, personally, although I'm not hugely money-driven, there is a practical reason for using the find." Ami thought for a moment.

"Paying for fusion reactors," she said after a few seconds, sure she was right.

Azumi nodded soberly. "Exactly. A quick calculation shows that even half the value of the exotic elements alone in that asteroid would pay for enough fusion plant and fuel to upgrade the entire planet and run it for decades." She glanced at it for a moment. "Not to mention all the material that we could directly use as funds, like the gold and other precious metals. That could go a very long way to paying for all sorts of domestic things. The magical girl restoration fund would certainly be covered for the next century or more, at least." She looked at Chou, smiling. "You could cover all of Tokyo with it."

Naito had gone silent again, watching them, then looking at the asteroid. Eventually he stood up, walking over to the invisible wall, staring at the image showing there, before turning his back on it and leaning against it, which looked rather odd. "It's too big." He sighed, seeming slightly lost. "The entire GDP of the planet several times over is way too much to even wrap my head around. You girls might be able to do it but I can't." Yori and Chou exchanged glances, before the blonde got up and approached him, smiling gently.

"We're having a lot of trouble as well, Masao, believe me. We're used to dealing with large amounts of money, for reasons that are unimportant, but this is simply incredible. Even S'th'kx is stunned. He's leaving it up to us to decide what to do."

The PSIA man stared at her for a while, before lowering his eyes to the deck. After a moment he seemed to come to some sort of decision, looking around at all of them. "My vote would be to treat it as if it was a find in Krennsh space. Let S'th'kx and his people deal with it. Take shares for yourselves if you want to, but hold the rest of the value in trust for the good of the entire world when we can use it. Just the fusion reactors would be a more than fair exchange for a few million cubic metres of rock and metal. If I mention this to the PSIA, put it in my report, it will get to the government, and there are people there who would go insane at the thought of all that money. Other governments would find out, it would cause total chaos. You girls and your contacts can deal with it in a way that benefits everyone without all that. I can't think of anyone else who could."

Chou stared at him for some time. "That is a very great responsibility and a huge amount of trust to place on us, Masao."

"I know, believe me. But I can't think of anyone else who could handle it." He grinned at her. "You lot, between you, already have the ability to destroy the planet several times over from what I've picked up over the last year or so. It's still there. This gives the ability to destroy it economically, which in some ways is worse, but I don't think you would. I'm damn sure there are politicians and business men who wouldn't think twice, though. Anthony Murray is proof of that. Think what he'd do if he had control of even a fraction of that." He jerked his thumb over his shoulder. "Even with only a couple of billion dollars or whatever it turns out he had, he caused all sorts of problems that will go on for years. This amount of resources? We'd all be living on Murray-World."

She giggled, glancing at Yori, who seemed amused. "True enough, I fear." She thought for a moment, turning to look at her friends, who all nodded one after another. Eventually she turned her attention to Ami. "What do you think we should do?"

'What do I think?' Ami thought to herself in wonder. 'I think I'm having some weird dream. Even by my standards this is insane!' What she actually said after a long pause was, "We need to stop it hitting the planet first. Depending on how we do that there might not be any fortune in exotic elements."

"True. But if we do stop it intact, or mostly so, what then?" The blonde watched her face curiously. Another pause, then Ami sighed, shrugging.

"I think Masao is right. The sheer amount involved is so large it's almost meaningless. Let someone who knows how deal with it for now. You think you can trust S'th'kx?"

"Implicitly," Yori told her, obviously meaning it.

"Fine. In that case, let him deal with it, process it, whatever needs to be done. As and when the money comes in we, you, use it to fix all the world's problems." She laughed slightly manically as Yori looked at her partner then around at Azumi and Aiko.

"I don't think we can fix all the world's problems," Aiko said with a smile, "Since most of them are caused by people being people, which probably isn't going to change. But I think we could sort out some of the more annoying ones."

Naito, who was still leaning against the invisible wall, looking like he was in danger of floating into space yet completely ignoring it, suddenly began laughing. Everyone looked at him curiously.

"I just had a weird idea. I think I know what averted this potential environmental disaster of yours, Ami." She raised an eyebrow.

"What?"

He pointed at Azumi, still chuckling. "She did. Without even realising it." All the other occupants of the room stared at him, then transferred their gaze to Azumi, who looked taken aback.

"Excuse me?" she said, very puzzled.

"It's your idea to import alien fusion reactors, to replace all our existing polluting energy generation systems over the next few years. If what I've read about the potential long-term impact of that pollution, like rising CO2 levels, soot, sulphur dioxide, that sort of thing is anywhere near accurate, in fifty years or so the world could be in a bad way. That might well end up killing hundreds of millions of people all over the planet, causing societal collapse. The time machine might even be interfering to make that happen in the first place, or make it worse." She stared, stunned.

"By bringing in the fusion power option now, before we reach a point of no return, I'll bet you've changed all that, permanently. Possibly not eliminated it but it will have a huge effect in the next few years and decades." He shrugged, pleased with his logic. "Without knowing anything about it you may well be the reason the time machine's plans came unravelled and why it needed to activate plan B."

Azumi slumped down onto a seat, staring at him with raw shock on her face, then looked around at her friends, who appeared surprised but thoughtful as they pondered his words. Ami thought it through, then pulled out her computer and ran a few simulations based on information she had stored in the device, finally nodding to herself, satisfied. "He's quite possibly right. The impact on pollution just replacing all of Japan's energy requirements with clean fusion power is very significant. Add in the effect of, say, roughly half the planet switching over to it within twenty years, and the results are a profound shift on what would otherwise happen, for the better."

Sitting next to her friend, Yori grinned at her. "Congratulations. You saved the world." The silver-haired girl slowly turned her head to look at the other woman, a weird expression on her face, but slowly began to smile.

"How are we going to do this?" Naito asked, staring at the asteroid from the control deck. Beside him, Yori looked thoughtfully annoyed.

"I'm not completely sure. We tried cutting the engines free and it did something to Rei and Hotaru to get us to stop. I could go back and finish the job, but there's always the possibility it could do something worse along those lines. Affect Ami, or the others back home. While I'd still like to get a look at the installation to see if there's anything there we can use it might be best to just destroy it in one go." She glanced at Azumi, who was staring hard at the distant floating rock. The other woman shook her head without looking.

"Still working on it. It's used several layers of encryption, I'll get through eventually, but it might take a while. Too long, probably." Naito wondered how she was doing whatever she was doing but decided that not only didn't it really matter but that he probably wouldn't understand either. Although it was interesting that she seemed to have an ability that was similar in some ways to one of those of the terrifying Ms Aoyama. Presumably the cold woman had learned it from the icy one.

"If I could get physical access to the computer core the security could be bypassed but from this distance it's not easy. The technology isn't the highest we've encountered but it's way up there." She looked over her shoulder for a moment. "Sorry."

"Not your fault. Keep trying." She nodded, going back to looking at the asteroid, her face moving minutely as if she was having some sort of very complex internal dialogue. Naito watched her for a moment then turned away.

S'th'kx called something to Yori, who scowled. "It's activated the engines again. Looks like a course correction." A few seconds later the captain said something else, causing her to nod. "Yep. Shut down once more."

"Couldn't it just leave the engines running and get there much sooner?" Naito asked curiously. "I know you said they're nowhere nearly as powerful as this ship's drive but the speed would build up pretty fast even with a low acceleration."

"That's the problem," Ami told him from across the room from where she was using her computer to access a data feed from the ship's own sensors, looking at the results with interest. "It could cut the transit time to Earth from here to a couple of days rather than several weeks, but it would be going so fast it would sterilise the planet when it hit, just from the shock wave. It doesn't want to wipe out all life, just a large amount of it. Destroying the entire biosphere ruins it's plans as much as failing to destroy enough of it."

"So we at least have some time to work it out," Naito mused. She nodded.

"Yes. Assuming it doesn't do much more in the way of course corrections, about three and a half weeks. It will hit at a fairly horrific speed, though, a little over one hundred and fifteen kilometres per second. That's much faster than a normal asteroid could manage." She entered some figures into the machine, running some calculations. "Assuming a diameter of just under nine hundred and fifty metres, density of iron on average, hitting bedrock at about eighty degrees... Hmm. Impact energy is about five point seven teratons of energy in nuclear bomb terms, more than a thousand times the total amount of every nuclear bomb ever made at all at once. It would leave a crater about fifty-five kilometres across about a kilometre deep in granite, displacing over two hundred cubic kilometres of rock, half of which would end up in the atmosphere as everything from dust to large chunks coming down all over the planet. Some might even make it back to orbit."

He'd gone white, listening to the dispassionate recital of figures. "It's even worse if it hits water, which would be more likely. You wouldn't believe the size of the tsunami wave. It would go around the entire planet several times. The amount of water that would go into the atmosphere would make it rain for years. If it hit in the middle of North America, the US, Canada, and most of Mexico would be dead and the long term effects would kill half the remaining world population within a decade. Anywhere in an ocean and everyone within a hundred kilometres of the shore everywhere on the planet would be washed away."

"So we don't really want to allow that to happen," Aiko suggested, her face grim. All he could do was nod.

"Screw it. I'm just going to blow the damn thing to bits." Yori sighed, running her hand through her hair, then readjusting her braid. "We could talk about it for weeks but in the end we have to stop it."
"What about using Hotaru's magical weapon?" Chou asked slowly. The other woman looked at her for a moment, her eyebrows up.

"How do you mean?"

"Well, you said when you were playing with it that the blade could go through most wards and force-fields. Could we use it to breach the ward down there then destroy the engines, leaving the rest of it intact? Or possibly just kill the power supply."

"We need to shut down it's communications link to the rest of the time device as a priority, so it can't influence Ami and her friends. But yes, I suppose it's possible that might work." Yori produced the staff from thin air, looking at it speculatively.

"Won't using it's own tools against it be difficult if not impossible?" Naito asked. "I mean, it would surely have taken the possibility into account and built in defences against that. That's only sensible."

She glanced at him for a moment, then studied the staff in her hands again. "It may have supplied this thing but I'm pretty sure it didn't make it. The magic is completely different. You could certainly block the blade with a ward if you knew what you were doing but it's not easy. It would take a lot of power, which it certainly has, the knowledge of how to do it, which it may have, and enough forethought to actually do it. It might not have that."

"We already know that we can take it by surprise," Chou mused. "It didn't see any of this coming from what we can tell. It's powerful, but hardly omniscient or unbeatable. It's worth a try, I think. Worst case it doesn't work and Yori can just brute-force the ward, which will certainly take care of the engines and everything else at the same time."

Azumi walked over to them, looking annoyed. "Still can't get into it. But I did find one thing of interest. I managed to track the communications link. It'd definitely going to the same place the one from Ami's computer was, a fractional reality offset from ours a little bit. There doesn't seem to be any linkage to anywhere else."

"That's something at least," Aiko suggested. "It might mean that there isn't some network of these things scattered all over the place talking to each other, just waiting to pounce."

"Or that it's directly controlling such a network without any links between the various parts of it," Azumi noted sourly. Her friend sighed.

"Look on the bright side. That idea is just depressing."

Yori, who was listening with mild interest, most of her attention focussed on the mystical weapon she was holding, looked up with an expression of irritation. "There's a problem. I can use some of the functions of this thing, but not all of them, not without a lot of further study. The really cool tricks are locked down pretty well. Hotaru can use them easily, it's keyed to her after all, but she's already under the influence of that damn machine. Taking her down right next to it might make her fall enough under it's spell to start waving this thing at us rather than that. That would be awkward."

Chou looked over at the sleeping girl, her face troubled. "Poor Hotaru. She's very young to have all this going on." After a moment she seemed to think of something, her brow creasing slightly. Everyone waited for her to finish thinking whatever it was through. "There is a possible way around that but it's a little risky. I'd have to get her permission."
"What do you mean?" Naito asked, curious. She looked at him, then glanced at Azumi.

"You remember when we talked to that poor girl after the attack? The technique I used to calm her and enhance her recall?" The silver-haired woman nodded slowly, obviously wondering where this was going. "I think it might be possible to use a variant on that to at least temporarily block out the influence of the time machine. It depends on how it's affecting her. It would only work if she permitted it, if she resisted there's no chance at all, and it's not guaranteed even so, but it might be worth a try." She looked at Naito and Ami. "It's something a bit like hypnosis but more accurate and faster. In theory I could block out a lot of her subconscious, hopefully including whatever hold the time device has on her mind, allowing her to concentrate on using her weapon on the ward. She'd be in a bit of a dream state with some of her mind temporarily disabled."

"I'm not entirely happy about that," Ami said, looking troubled. "It sounds a lot like what the machine has already been doing to her. To all of us."

Chou smiled reassuringly at the blue-haired girl. "I understand why you'd think that, but it is different. There's no damage caused, it's only temporary, can only be performed with a willing participant, and I couldn't make her do something she wasn't prepared to do. It wouldn't allow me to force her to do anything, just help her do what she'd do anyway."

"You're certain?"

"Yes. It's perfectly safe from that point of view. The main risk is that it might suddenly fail, leaving her exposed to the full influence of the machine, which could be bad. We'd have to keep a very close eye on her and stop her immediately if that happened. I don't want to hurt her again like I was forced to the last time." Chou looked sad. "That was... very unfortunate."

"OK. Ask her. I can't think of any reason not to but I still don't like it," Ami finally said. Chou nodded, getting up and walking over to sit beside the sleeping Hotaru. She looked at Naito.

"Masao, please stay out of her line of sight and stay quiet. She seems to be fixated on you, so with any luck if she doesn't see or hear you it won't trigger the implanted suggestions." Worried, he agreed, moving to a position that ensured the girl couldn't see him. Yori joined her partner next to Hotaru. Reaching out Chou gently woke her.

"Hotaru? Can you hear me?" The purple-haired young woman opened her eyes, looking around, then smiled a little.

"Yes, Chou. Is it over? Did you fix me?"

"I'm sorry, dear, it's not quite over yet. We need your help. We need to stop the asteroid, which we can do, but we'd really like to get at the machinery on the surface first. It might help us. Do you understand?"

Hotaru nodded, her face puzzled. "Yes. Yori was talking about that earlier."

"Good. Now, the ward surrounding it is very strong. We can break it but it may well destroy the machinery if we do. Yori has been examining your weapon and thinks that it might be able to open the ward for us without destroying everything. She can't use it for that, you'll have to."

Puzzlement turned to worry. "But that thing it might affect me again."

"Yes, that's the problem. I think I might know a way to stop that from happening, for at least a little while, but I need your cooperation and permission. I'd need to... sort of turn part of your mind off, or put it to sleep, only for a little while. It might well work for a few minutes. I'm not completely sure, the only way to find out is to try it, but it won't hurt you even if it fails. But you'd have to allow me to do it. I can't if you resist."

Hotaru was silent for a few seconds, staring at the blonde. She looked at Yori who smiled slightly at her. "What do you think I should do, Yori?"

"It would help us a lot if this works. There's a slight risk it might fail when we're down there but we'd keep a very close eye on you to stop anything bad happening. I promise." After a few more seconds the girl returned her attention to Chou, who was waiting patiently.

"Does Ami agree as well?"

"I do," her friend said from behind her.

"Do it." The young voice trembled slightly with nervousness, but was otherwise firm. Chou inspected her face, then nodded.

"Thank you." She put a hand on Hotaru's forehead, smiling at her. "This is going to feel very strange but please just let it happen. If you fight it you'll stop it working." The girl nodded once, waiting. Closing her eyes, the blonde concentrated while everyone watched silently. Yori also put her hand on Hotaru's head, apparently monitoring the work. A minute or two later Chou opened her eyes, carefully removing her hand.

"Hotaru?"

There was a long pause, then the young woman looked at her. "Yes, Chou?"

"How do you feel?"

The pause was even longer this time. "Very weird. Tired. Confused." She looked at Yori, then back to Chou, a faint frown crossing her face. "Where are we?"

"We're on a spaceship belonging to a friend of ours. Do you remember?"

Eventually the girl nodded, a faint smile coming and going. "Yes. I remember being very excited about the Moon. Did that happen?"

"It did. You seemed to be having a lot of fun." Chou glanced at Yori, who nodded slightly, removing her hand as well, then standing up.

"Hotaru?" The young woman looked at Yori. "Can you do something for us?"

"Of course. What do you need me to do?"

"I'd like you to come with me then use your weapon to open something. It won't take long."

"OK." The girl looked around, puzzled, then down at herself. "Oh. I'm already in uniform. Where is it?"

"I've got it here. I'll carry it for you, all right?"

A faint frown appeared, but faded after a moment. "All right. I'm not supposed to let anyone else hold it but I know I can trust you." Yori smiled at her.

"You can. Come on, let's go and solve this problem." She held out a hand, which Hotaru took, helping her to her feet. Naito noticed she was walking with extreme care, as if she was just drunk enough to know she was unsteady on her feet but not so drunk she couldn't compensate for it. Moving carefully to stay out of her line of sight he saw Yori glance at him, then direct the girl out the door of the common room and down the corridor in the direction of the airlock. Chou and Azumi followed her. Aiko looked at him, then Ami.

"She'll be fine. We should stay here, we can't do much to help at the moment. Hopefully they can make this work then we can see what's there."

"Can you teleport down to the asteroid?" Ami asked curiously. Aiko looked slightly dubious.

"Almost certainly yes but it's a little complicated. I'd like to try it when we're sure the thing is taken care of. At the moment it's just one more thing to cause problems. I'm happy to wait."

"Fair enough."

Moving to one of the control panels, the brunette manipulated it for a while, finally looking satisfied. She pointed behind her to part of the wall, which, when they turned around, had a projection from a different camera, one which was focussed on four figures moving towards the asteroid. Yori and Chou were gently towing Hotaru behind them with Azumi bringing up the rear. The camera seemed to be following them as they moved so the image stayed more or less the same size. S'th'kx was manoeuvring the ship to bring it behind the asteroid and to one side at a safe distance, so they could see the engine installation which the four women were heading towards.

"I hope this works," Ami muttered, concerned both for her team-mate and friend as well as the others.

"So do I," Naito concurred, watching intently. He'd put his camera away some time before, even if the security spell would have allowed him to take photos of all this he didn't want a record of it for a number of reasons.

Shortly the quartet touched down on the asteroid, moving slowly over the surface to a point about eighty metres from the installation of alien machinery. They stopped, Yori moving slightly further ahead and apparently closely examining something the camera didn't show, before nodding in satisfaction. Producing Hotaru's pole-arm, she made the blade appear then handed it to the girl and stepped back and to one side.

"We're going to see what happens now," Azumi's voice came to the people in the common room. "If Hotaru can open even a small breach Yori can take out the power supply to the engines and the ward. S'th'kx has identified what he thinks is the right point to destroy without wrecking the entire thing."

Everyone watched as Hotaru moved forward, supported by Chou, who Naito noticed was clearly ready to drop her in her tracks if anything happened, her left hand poised mere centimetres behind the younger woman’s head. Lowering the weapon Hotaru pointed it directly in front of her then pushed it forward slowly. Seconds later it made contact with something. A bright light came from the point of contact, illuminating the women and the surface surrounding them in almost daylight levels of brilliance, then as the girl continued to push, the light spread sideways and up, eventually showing just under half a dome covering the entire set of machinery, glowing gently but visibly. The glow got brighter at the point the blade was touching, to a point that even through the projected image it was difficult to look at.

After a few seconds Naito leaned closer, squinting. It looked like the brilliantly glowing dome was slowly deforming inwards. "Is it...?" he began.
"It seems to be working," Azumi reported, sounding pleased. "The ward is beginning to give."

"Good work, Hotaru," Ami said in a low voice, watching intently. Naito glanced sideways at her then returned his attention to the projection. On the asteroid the glow was steadily growing stronger, beginning to flicker now, ripples of light running across the ward. The entire thing was lit up by this point although the far side was barely visible.

"What's that?" Ami asked, pointing. Naito followed her finger. In the rough centre of the dome one of the machines was beginning to glow a dim orange colour.

Aiko was quiet for a moment, then said, "I think it's the main power unit. It's ramping up its output to power the ward." They could see the ripples were coming faster and faster, the huge dome flickering with light. The glow in the middle grew more intense. "I hope they can breach it before it manages to overpower Hotaru's weapon," Aiko muttered. "What did you call that thing once?"

"It's called the Silence Glaive," Ami said absently. "Or that's what Hotaru and Setsuna both referred to it as. I have no idea where they got the name from."

The glow from the machinery suddenly peaked, the ripples of light becoming a steady blur, then the illumination began to withdraw back towards the point Hotaru was attacking the ward. Aiko swore under her breath. "It's resisting."

Several things suddenly happened in very quick succession. Yori stepped forward, putting her hands on Hotaru's, the entire weapon suddenly lighting up a familiar purple colour, which rapidly grew extremely bright. The dome of the ward flashed a brilliant rainbow of colour, too bright to look at for a second, while a small point only a metre or so across in front of the women suddenly went dark. Two balls of light, one green and one golden, shot through the apparent opening and impacted a brief fraction of a second later on the brightly glowing power unit, which instantly vanished in a large flash of light. A shock-wave radiated out from the explosion, throwing dust everywhere, dispersing the remnants of the ward dome immediately and blasting all four women off the surface of the asteroid into space. Ami yelped in shock, blinking frantically from the flash.

"Oh shit! Hotaru!"

"Ow. That hurt," Azumi's voice came to them, sounding winded. "Quite a lot. But we're OK. Hotaru is unconscious, the feedback from the ward collapsing knocked her out, and Yori is pretty wobbly as well. She took a lot of it to stop anything more serious happening to Hotaru. They'll both be fine, Chou says, but they'll need a rest for a few hours. She's going to make sure Hotaru stays out until either we stop the machine influencing her here or go back to Krennsh space."

There was a pause as Aiko, Ami, and Naito exchanged glances. After a few seconds Chou's voice came. "Ami, Hotaru is all right, but her hands need a bit of healing again. I'm sorry about that. There was a very large amount of energy going through the weapon when the ward collapsed and she received some fairly minor but painful burns. We're on our way back now. As soon as we've all recovered we can come back and investigate the machinery. We'd appreciate your help."

"All right." Ami spoke to the room at large. "Can you hear me?"

"Yes. Perfectly," Chou replied, sounding mildly amused.

"How's Yori?"

"Mumbling about that sounding like a good idea but not being entirely sure it really was." The amusement was much stronger now, accompanied by a note of loving exasperation. "It was a very powerful ward and all that energy had to go somewhere. She took a lot of it. Don't worry, they'll both be fine very soon."

S'th'kx's voice sounded, Aiko raising her head and listening carefully. When the captain stopped speaking she replied in the same language, then turned to the other two. "That definitely did the trick. He can't read any magic or technological energy at all coming from there now from this distance. The power source, whatever it was, is completely dead. Some sort of advanced space-time power tap he called it. Luckily not very large, and probably pretty old and not running at peak output."

A few minutes later the four women re-entered the compartment, Azumi carrying Hotaru very carefully while Chou supported a limping Yori, who looked rather washed out. "That was more difficult than I expected," the black-haired girl said to them, smiling slightly in a tired manner. "I haven't used so much energy for a long time." She looked at her partner. "I could do with something to eat, love."

"Sit down and I'll get some lunch sorted out," the blonde replied with a smile, helping her to a seat. Sparing a moment to heal her leg, she moved to the table, producing some sandwiches and a few bottles of water. "I'll get the processors making some more but for now this should keep everyone going," the tall women commented, bringing her partner a few sandwiches and a bottle, before going to check on Hotaru. She looked at Ami, who was inspecting her younger friend with a slightly depressed expression.

"She's more or less fine, Ami, just those burns." The purple-haired girl's hands were raw and weeping, burn marks radiating up her forearms in a fern-like pattern from the energy discharge. "They look bad but are mostly superficial. Very painful, though, so it's a good think she's sleeping deeply." Chou smiled at the other woman, then turned to her friend, quickly removing all the damage and leaving unmarred skin behind. Ami shook her head in wonder.

"I know I keep saying it but that's absolutely amazing to watch."

"It's very satisfying to do as well, believe me," the blonde remarked, standing and looking at her. "I'll be very interested to see how fast Hotaru picks it up. Yori is sure she can, her abilities are somewhat different from ours but seem to overlap enough that our methods should improve her own considerably."

"She'd like that," Ami commented, grinning for a moment. "She's been looking at Yori as if she was some sort of healing goddess ever since she watched her regenerate Haruka's arm." Chou laughed gently, looking at her petite partner, who was in the process of inhaling her food, looking better already.

"I'm not entirely sure that description is a good fit." Yori produced a huge belch, then went back to disposing of some more sandwiches. Chou winced while Ami started laughing. "Not at all sure..."
Chapter 75

"Anything?"

"No, nothing useful. The power supply is completely destroyed, I can't read any active power sources anywhere around here, either magic or otherwise. My scans seem to suggest this is the central processor, it's quite similar to my computer but much more primitive, but without it being active it's hard to be completely sure."

"We could supply some power to it easily enough, it seems to run on a specific type of magical energy which we can provide, but I'm not sure that would be a good idea." Ami turned to look at Yori, beside her, meeting her violet eyes with her own gaze, which she thought probably held as much worry as the other's did.

"You think it might try to influence me if it 'wakes up'" she asked. Yori nodded.

"I do. There are several very complex spells still in place around here, which I suspect may well be part of however it's getting at you girls. Without the power supply they're dormant, but if we power any of it up they might come up as well. That could give it access to you. Which is probably something we want to avoid."

"Can you get rid of them first?" Ami asked.

Yori sighed a little. "It's difficult, but yes. I've deleted half a dozen so far but one or two are so intertwined into the structure of this installation it will take hours to be sure we've dealt with them fully."

"I don't have anything else to do, do you?"

After a moment, Yori shook her head. "Guess not. Right, better get on with it. If you need me I'll be over there with Chou." She smiled in a mildly annoyed manner then drifted over to her partner, who was examining part of the destroyed magitech power system with interest. Ami watched them for a moment then turned back to her own investigations. Two hours or so later she was floating near the engine system, scanning it curiously, trying to work out how it functioned, when she felt someone nearing her. Looking around she spotted Azumi. The silver-haired girl waved to her, neatly sliding into place in the microgravity environment with an ease that suggested both practice and remarkably good coordination.

"How's it going?" she asked, looking around. "Find anything interesting?"

"Only a lot of technology so complicated I can't make heads or tails of most of it," Ami sighed. "It would take several years of study to understand the principles behind this engine. And it's less advanced that the ones the Krennsh use."

"Apparently. S'th'kx says it read as something approximately one to two generations behind state of the art on K'nn four. A long way ahead of anything we can produce but some way behind them." Azumi looked at the engine unit embedded into the rock and metal of the asteroid at their feet. "Lldnr'k did say that the builders of the time machine weren't the highest technology civilisation or the best mages around, although they were very good at both technology and magic. The Krennsh don't do magic, they're kind of deficient in their abilities in that field, but they more than make up for it in their technological abilities in most cases. Magic, they hire mages for. Lots of them." She grinned. "Apparently it pays amazingly well."

"Interesting." Ami listened, once more intrigued by how much of the alien worlds on the other side of portals all these people knew, then turned her attention back to the engine. "I'd love to take this thing to pieces and work out how it functioned."

"Misaki would help, I think, she's the engineer in our little family." Azumi chuckled. "But I don't think we can risk it. Just in case the time device can somehow reach any of you through it. As soon as we're through here, we're going to destroy all of it to be safe."

"Pity. But probably for the best."

"Don't worry," the silver-haired woman told her companion with a smile. "We'll scan it thoroughly first just in case there's anything useful about the technology, although S'th'kx says his initial scans show it's of fairly conventional design without any surprises." After a moment she added, "if you really want to learn about anti-gravity spacecraft drives we can get the manual for one easily enough." Ami stared at her for a moment.

"Seriously?" The other woman nodded, grinning.

"Of course. You don't think that every world out there is forced to reinvent the wheel, do you? That's the whole point of interworld trade. If you want wheels, you go to the wheel shop and buy the damn things, you don't waste your time making them. In this case, the wheel shop is on the other side of a portal, but the principle stands. I know several places that buy in lots of technology, and export it as well. Our friend Uthryyl has spent over a century doing that. His world is about half-way between Earth and K'nn four in tech for most purposes, but a lot of it they just bought in from somewhere else. It's easier, cheaper, and quicker." She shrugged. "Or think of those interstellar ships the Krensh are building. They could make the drives from scratch, their technology is up to it, but they didn't see the point when they could lease a couple of them for a fraction of the cost and effort. If they needed dozens, it might end up cheaper to make them domestically, it might not."

Ami thought about it for some time. Azumi made some good points. "If that's the case, why don't we get the plans for these fusion reactors of yours and make them ourselves. We'll need a lot of them."

"I've got the plans," Azumi said, looking amused. "For quite a lot of things." Ami stared in surprise. "But in our case, there's a lot of technological progress we'd need to make before we could make a fusion reactor on that design. Several decades of it. Think about it like what would happen if some Victorian engineer had been given full design information on something like a plasma TV. All sorts of technology is embedded into something that on the surface looks quite simple. They wouldn't have had a prayer of doing anything at all useful with that data for fifty years or more, there are too many other things that are needed first. We're in the same state with a lot of this technology. Most of it, probably. But, we can buy it. Once all the paperwork is sorted out, anyway."

"Hmm. I see your point." Thinking about it for a little longer, Ami nodded slowly. "It's a good one."

"I wondered the same thing at first. Uthryyl and some other friends explained it." Smiling, Azumi experimentally prodded part of the engine, before turning to the other woman. "It's not obvious if you're used to the neat little world shown on TV and in the movies. Find alien technology, implausibly quickly reverse engineer same, miracles happen. It doesn't really work like that."

"It's more like meet alien salesman, sign import paperwork, transfer funds, miracles happen, I guess," Ami giggled.

Laughing, Azumi nodded. "Basically. And I know a damn good salesman. A very nice person as well. You'll like him, and his family. I expect we'll visit there soon enough."

"I still have trouble with all this wandering around through portals like we're going to visit friends in Kyoto or something," Ami commented with a small grin, scanning the part Azumi had been playing with. "You guys make it look almost... pedestrian."

"It's surprising how quickly you just accept it," the other woman responded, smiling. "One day I'd like to try some interstellar travel. I'm told that way you meet the real aliens. But it's still quite a slow process even with faster than light drives. Several months of travel quite likely. I can wait."

Shaking her head in wonder, Ami closed the computer again, putting it away. "Amazing. Sounds like something to look forward to, though." She looked around at the scene. "I wonder how far Yori and Chou have come with removing all the various magic from this so far?"

"They think there's another hour or so before they're fairly sure they've got it all," Azumi replied after a moment. "It's possible there will still be some subtle low-powered stuff they missed due to it being dormant, so we'll have to keep careful watch for anything odd happening when they power up the main computer, but hopefully we can spot it in time if that does happen."

"I wish I knew how that damn time machine was influencing the others," Ami sighed. "And why it doesn't seem to have had a go at me so far."

"Be grateful it hasn't. It still might. I'm more worried about it doing something to the others back home."

"How do we know it hasn't?" Ami turned to her companion, worried at the thought.

"We arranged to be contacted if anything went badly wrong at home. We could get back pretty fast, in an emergency, by portalling back to Krennsh space, back here near the moon like before, then teleporting home. It would only take a few minutes. Or it's possible Aiko could teleport directly back. So far, we haven't heard anything." Ami studied the other woman for a few seconds, desperately curious.

"So whatever weird communications method you're using can't reach directly from here to Earth?" she guessed out loud. Azumi seemed amused.

"Not originally. We're using the subspace data relay that S'th'kx dropped into lunar orbit at the moment. It's not designed for what we use but it works fairly well. It's something of a hack job, though, so we're going to have to get something better at some point."

Ami stared at the other woman for some time. "It's really irritating the way you keep dropping hints to how you're doing all this, you know," she grumbled after a while. Snickering, Azumi grinned.

"Oh, I do know, that's where the fun is." She laughed as Ami glared at her for a moment. "You'll find out in time. Or you might work it out if we drop enough hints." Shaking her head in irritation, the blue-haired woman went back to scanning the engines, finally snapping her computer shut and putting it away.
"I can't learn any more from this. Let's go and have a look at something else." Glancing around, she picked a direction fairly arbitrarily and headed off to another piece of equipment, Azumi following, still giggling a little.

Sighing to itself, the small black piglet shook water off its back and spared the shopkeeper who had just thrown the bucket of soapy water he'd been cleaning his windows with into the alley a vicious glare, which the man completely failed to notice. The man walked back into the main street whistling, looking at his windows in satisfaction, before picking up his cleaning equipment and going back inside. Squeaking in impotent rage, the piglet watched, then turned to look at the comparatively enormous backpack lying on the ground next to it with a porcine sigh.

'Fuck.' Ryoga grumbled to himself in indistinct squeals as he grabbed the straps of the pack in his mouth and began tugging it into the cover provided by a nearby fire escape. 'Now I need to find some hot water. Again. That's the third time today already.' Pushing and pulling he managed to get his pack hidden fairly well, before looking around. 'Where the hell am I this time, anyway? It looks vaguely fami...' A feeling of cold horror went through him as he realised the terrible truth.

'Oh, god! I'm in Minato!' The little pig looked frantically around, but saw no sign of a horrifying green-haired woman with dark glasses in a nice suit. Slowly he relaxed slightly. 'Maybe she hasn't noticed yet. If I can find some hot water I can get the hell out of here before she does.' He'd kept as far away from Tokyo in general and Minato specifically ever since his encounter with the unbelievably creepy Ms Aoyama, finding that he woke up in a cold sweat every now and then after having nightmares about what she'd do if she every saw him again. Now here he was right in the middle of the area he'd been told in no uncertain terms never to enter again on pain of something truly ghastly happening to him.

'Damned Akane Tendo...' he thought, frantically trying to work out the fastest way to change back, while trotting off down the alley. Looking around for some place to get hot water, tea, hell, even someone to piss on him, he hoped like hell that the demonic woman wouldn't notice he was there.

Rounding a pile of garbage, he was just wondering what the weird crunching noise he could hear was when he spotted the source. Stopping dead in his tracks he stared at the strange animal, several times his current size, with a mouthful of remarkably large and sharp teeth, that was in the process of eating the remains of an old refrigerator someone had dumped in the alley. It stopped chewing, its big ears moving to focus on the little pig, then its head turning to look at him.

It swallowed. So did he.

The thing licked its lips, getting to its feet, while staring fixedly at him.

'Ooh, shit,' he thought, backing away. 'What is that?'

The creature looked around in quick jerky moves like a bird, always coming back to staring at him. He wasn't at all keen on the expression on its furry face. It took a step closer. He took one back. And again.

Step.

Step.

Step.

Lunge.
'Holy FUCK,' he gibbered in terror, although all that came out was a panicked squeal. Turning, he bolted, little hooves rattling on the street, with the thing in hot pursuit.

'Goddam Minato! This place is insane!,' he thought as he ran for his life, the creature, some sort of mini-demon he was now sure, mere metres behind him, growling in a manner that suggested it was hungry and not, in fact, wanting to play. 'Damn it, this is all your fault, Akane!'

"Hmph."

"What?" Tamiko looked at Fumiko, who was standing on the edge of a roof, looking into the street.

"We missed one," the other woman said, sounding both amused and annoyed. Walking over, Tamiko and Misaki joined their friend, looking to where she was pointing. They watched as one of Chiyoko's little demons charged down the street in hot pursuit of a small black piglet with a black and yellow bandanna around its neck, the demon growling and the piglet emitting terrified squeals. Passersby yelped and jumped out of the way, watching the chase with varying expressions.

"So we did," Tamiko sighed. The piglet ran under a parked car, while the demon jumped over the top, almost catching its prey as it shot out the other side, but the terrified Ryoga jinked sideways just in time and dived into an alley. The demon followed.

"Want to go after it?" Misaki asked idly, eating a cereal bar. Tamiko shrugged.

"There's only one. We can get it later. Usagi is more important at the moment."

"What about Ryoga?"

The red-head grinned nastily. "He's pretty tough. He'll probably live. Might give him extra encouragement to stay away from here as well."

"True."

All three watched as the chase came out of the alley again after a series of crashing noises, heading back the way the pair had come, the demon still growling. Misaki giggled a little. "Runs fast for such little legs, doesn't he?"

Fumiko and Tamiko nodded, grinning. Fumiko raised a hand and fired a tiny ki ball at the demon, making it dive sideways as the energy sphere popped on the brickwork of the building next to it, which gave Ryoga a few metres lead time. Her friends looked enquiringly at her.

"Just to give him a sporting chance."

Laughing, they went back to what they were doing, while behind them the growling and squeals of terror receded into the distance.

Panting with exhaustion, the little piglet huddled under an upturned bucket, listening carefully. He couldn't hear the demonic creature any more, but he'd almost fallen for that once before. The thing was surprisingly cunning. When, after some ten minutes, he still couldn't hear any signs of pursuit, he very cautiously stuck his snout under the rib of the bucket and lifted it slightly, peering around. Half expecting to see the damn demon sitting there grinning at him, he sighed in relief when the coast seemed clear, carefully squeezing out from under his hiding place.
Looking around, he saw no signs of the thing. 'Made it,' he thought to himself. 'What the hell was that damn thing? Fucking Minato, if I never see this place again I’ll be happy.' Carefully heading back the way he’d come, following his own hoof-prints and hoping desperately that he could both find his pack and some hot water instead of getting hopelessly lost like he normally did, he shook concrete dust off himself from where he’d run through a few walls. Small squeals of irritation accompanied him on his way.

Kei Ishikawa was old, near-sighted, somewhat deaf, and currently annoyed. The police had been no help at all in finding the people who had so callously killed his poor little Mana. The dog has been his companion for years, faithfully alerting him to the passage of anyone outside his apartment with her cute yapping sounds. He couldn't understand why some people complained about her, the noise wasn't at all annoying, it merely showed how alive and happy the poodle was.

Or had been, at any rate.

He’d been horrified when he found out that one of those young female miscreants that seemed to infest the neighbourhood had killed poor Mana. The method of execution sounded unlikely, but from what his neighbour Mai Shizuka had told him it had at least been quick. He wasn’t entirely sure about the old woman, she'd seemed less upset about the murder of an innocent animal than he would have thought fair, but as far as he knew she was being truthful. Even though he was almost certain he'd caught her grinning slightly out of the corner of his eye when she told him, for some reason, but then she was an odd old girl.

Heartbroken, he'd called the police several times demanding the immediate arrest and prosecution of the perpetrator. Everyone seemed to know who she was, some young tearaway who wandered the area dressed in fancy clothes carrying some ornate staff taller than she was, when she should have been in school learning to treat the elderly with the respect they deserved. Yet the police seemed curiously reluctant to do anything about the case, despite the seriousness of it, something he found very irritating.

Walking along the street carrying the lead and collar of dear little Mana, something that was ingrained habit, he sighed sadly. If only she hadn't slipped out the other day when he wasn't looking, she’d still be alive. He missed the poor thing. Life would be lonelier without her in it.

‘Perhaps I should get another dog?’ he wondered to himself. ‘Maybe something a little larger, so it could look out for itself if that horrible girl attacked it again? Why won’t the police arrest her, anyway? They obviously know who she is. Young women these days, they weren’t like that when I was younger, I'm sure. I've seen them running around in the street wearing practically nothing, and even on the roof! It's a disgrace. What are their parents teaching them nowadays? I blame television. I knew there was a good reason not to have one. The radio should be enough for anyone.’ His inner monologue came to an abrupt halt as he heard a metallic crashing noise from the side street he was walking past, which he vaguely realised must be quite loud for him to hear in the first place.

Curious, he stopped and peered down the alley, adjusting his glasses. There was a medium-sized animal rooting around in a stack of overturned garbage containers, apparently looking for something to eat. Puzzled, he strained to make out what it was. He could see large mobile ears and a long furry tail. Listening he could just hear an irritated growl coming from the animal. 'That's an odd looking dog,' he thought to himself. 'Perhaps some foreign breed? It looks hungry. Poor little thing, I wonder if it's been abandoned.' Walking down the alley he squinted at the animal, which stopped digging through the containers, turning to look at him. It growled again, laying its ears back.
Wise in the way of dogs, he stopped, then slowly and creakily went down on one knee. "Don't worry, boy. Or is it girl? I won't hurt you. Are you hungry?" He felt in the pockets of his coat, coming up with a dog biscuit, which he held out. Making little encouraging noises he waited patiently, gazing slightly foggily at the animal, which cocked its head to one side and stared at him with apparent curious interest. The growling stopped. After a moment it crept closer, reaching out and sniffing the biscuit. The jaws snapped and he barely got his fingers out of the way in time. "Oh, dear, you must be starving, you poor thing," he mumbled sympathetically, "you nearly got my hand then. Hold on, I might have some more." He poked around in his pockets, finding three more biscuits, which the creature ate just as eagerly, coming closer each time, until it was right in front of him only a metre away.

He inspected it with interest. "What an odd looking dog you are. You must have some very strange breeds in your ancestry." It looked up at him, its ears up in a way he recognised as being alert and fairly calm. Reaching out it sniffed his coat, making him smile regretfully. "I'm sorry, that's all I have with me." The thing looked disappointed as far as he could make out. Cautiously he reached out and let it sniff his hand, tapping it on the nose when it tentatively nibbled his fingers. "No, don't bite, there's a good boy." It looked slightly puzzled, cocking its head the other way. Kei smiled. "You're sort of cute for a mongrel. Now, are you a stray, or do you live on the street?" Looking more closely he was unable to see a collar. "I think you must just be some poor little abandoned dog." He reached out again and gently tried stroking it's head. At first pulling back, after a couple of tries it let him touch it, while a distinctly puzzled expression crossed its fang-filled face. "You certainly have good teeth, don't you?" he commented, peering at its mouth, which was half-open. "And so many of them. Obviously whatever you've been eating agrees with you." Stroking it again, he rubbed one ear, which made the animal push against his hand with apparent pleasure.

Coming to a decision, he nodded. "It must be fate. Just as I lose a companion, I find someone who needs a friend. What about it, boy, do you want to come home with me?" The creature looked up at him, seeming fairly relaxed. "I'll take that as a yes. Hmm. I wonder..." Carefully feeling it's neck, he nodded. "Yes, I think it would fit, barely. All right, boy, don't panic, let's see if this will fit you." Pulling Mana's collar out of his pocket where he'd put it when he'd been hunting for biscuits, he adjusted it to its largest size, then gently tried putting it on the animal, which stiffened for a moment, then relaxed again when it became clear he wasn't attacking it. Patting it and talking softly and reassuringly, he made sure the collar was secure, then connected the lead to it. Standing with a grunt of effort, thinking he was a lot more flexible sixty years ago, he held the free end of the lead.

"OK, boy, let's go home. I've got more biscuits there, and some other food. Tomorrow we can get the vet to check you over. I'm sure living in the street has left you full of all sorts of horrible things." Gently tugging the lead, he smiled when after a moment's resistance, the animal followed placidly behind him and to one side. "Oh, well done, boy. You'll take to the lead in no time, I see. Now, what should we call you?"

Pondering names, he happily toddled off home, the demon following, looking alertly around, seemingly content.

"We're pretty sure we got everything, but it's not impossible we're wrong," 'Yori' said, looking slightly worried as she peered at Ami. "If you feel anything at all out of the ordinary, tell us immediately, OK?"

'Azumi' watched as the blue-haired woman nodded, looking worried as well. "Isn't it possible she might not notice?" she asked her sister silently. 'Chou' glanced at her.
"Indeed it is, unfortunately. We're hoping that now that she's on guard she might feel something weird happening, but there's certainly a possibility that however the machine is influencing them, it could sneak in without anyone knowing until it's too late. We'll just have to watch her very carefully and be ready to step in if something goes wrong."

"How likely do you think it is that you've eliminated everything that the machine might use on her?" the silver-haired woman asked.

"Fifty-fifty, to be honest," 'Chou' sighed, "but don't tell her that, it will only worry her. We got everything obvious that was in any way linked back to the device but we already know it's very subtle. We still can't find out exactly how it's influencing Hotaru or Rei even though we know beyond doubt that it is. Your theory that it was originally doing it via Ami's computer is almost certainly correct, as is Ranma's that it was using this installation. But we're not sure how, so we can't be completely sure we've blocked it. I hope we have although I'm not going to be surprised too much if it turns out we're wrong."

The blonde watched as her disguised husband moved to the piece of equipment they'd determined seemed to be the main computer node for the installation, Ami following, with her computer out and scanning. "We'll power it up, then see if we can break into it. You and Jun should do that, you've got the most experience breaking into computers with the SI." She grinned as her sister looked mildly embarrassed. "Don't look like that, it's a very useful talent. You know a lot about computers which only makes Jun's abilities more effective."

"It's mostly Jun, you realise," 'Azumi' told her. "I'm not really involved other than telling it what to go after. And even then it's normally ahead of me by quite a way."

"I'm sure your own skills are more involved than you realise, Nabiki," the other woman commented mildly. "You certainly seem more effective at this sort of thing than any of the rest of us, although we can all do it. I suspect that the SI personality is based on and influenced by its owners, which would explain a number of things I've noticed about Nao, and the others as well. We already know they learn and adapt remarkably quickly. Nao is almost indistinguishable from a real intelligence now in all the important ways. I have a feeling that in a year or two they will all be genuinely sentient at this rate."

"I wonder if that is meant to happen?" 'Azumi' mused. "One day we really have to meet these makers and ask them. I've got a lot of questions."

"So have I. We should look into it when all this is over. If nothing else we need to see about getting the relay system that was mentioned before we went on holiday, it would be very useful for this sort of thing. S'th'kx's data relay isn't quite up to the job. Voice is fine but it seems to struggle with real-time video in the way the SIs can do it. It's more like watching a TV broadcast."

Grinning, 'Azumi' nodded. "We got used to that sort of thing very quickly, didn't we?"

"It's certainly very useful." The alter-ego of Kasumi smiled back at her sister. "All right, let's see what happens. Ready?"

"Ready."

'Yori' glanced at them, then at Ami and Agent Naito, who was standing a few metres away, or more precisely floating almost in contact with the asteroid surface, every little motion threatening to push him free in the extremely weak gravity. "I'm going to feed it a little power to see if it wakes up," she said to them all. "S'th'kx is monitoring the site from a safe distance so he can warn us if anything happens that we miss. Ami, you keep an eye on this system, and yourself as well. Let me know if anything odd happens. Azumi will try to crack the encryption, which should be a lot easier from this range."

Ami turned as 'Azumi' came up beside her, smiling at her for a moment, then went back to studying her hand-held device. 'You're sure this will work, Jun?' 'Azumi' asked her SI.

#Almost certain, Nabiki.# the machine replied calmly. #Accessing the processor from several kilometres away via my normal subspace link was difficult, the technology is designed to prevent that type of intrusion method, while the ward was also interfering considerably. It is insufficiently protected to prevent me eventually gaining access, there are very few systems anywhere that are, as I was specifically created to overcome such protections, but even so it was causing a substantial delay. The designers of this technology, although far behind my makers in most respects, appear to have been very competent in the field of encryption. I find it somewhat odd that Ami's personal device did not use such heavily encrypted links. That said, it would have been uncrackable by anything other that a system such as myself.#

It sounded slightly smug about this. 'Azumi' chuckled to herself. 'A little full of yourself, aren't you?' she joked. The machine gave her a distinct impression of being amused, somehow.

#Merely aware of my own abilities, Nabiki, and confident in them, as you are with yours.#

'Good point. OK, let's see what happens.' She was once more impressed by how alive her SI sounded. Kasumi was right, the thing was becoming more like a person every day.

#At such a close range I can use methods that won't work over longer distances. You may tell Ranma to proceed with the power-up sequence.#

'OK.' She nodded to 'Yori', who turned to the alien computer, concentrating on it. A faint glow surrounded the machinery for a fraction of a second.

"It's definitely doing something," 'Yori' reported, studying the machine closely. Ami scanned it once more.

"It reads as going through some sort of boot-up sequence." There was a brief pause. "All right, as far as I can see it's running. Presumably normally but your guess is as good as mine on that side of things." She glanced at 'Azumi'. "Are you getting anything?"

"Hang on. I'm working on it." 'Jun? Anything yet?'

#The computer attempted to connect to the time device as it booted, in much the same manner Ami's computer was communicating with it, Nabiki. I blocked the attempt. So far I have cracked three layers of encryption. Please wait, I have nearly derived the key for the forth one.# A few seconds passed in silence. #I'm in. That was impressively good protection. I have extracted information on the methods used which should aid us considerably should we encounter such a system again. It is quite likely that the time device is using such methods in other places, it may well consider them to be unbreakable.#

'Great. Can you find any useful data?' The middle sister nodded to 'Yori', who looked pleased. "I'm through the encryption. Just checking for anything useful." She looked at Ami, who appeared slightly startled when her computer produced a message indicating it had received the relevant credentials to decrypt the protection on the alien machine. Quickly pressing buttons she was soon engrossed in her own search.

#There isn't very much of any significance here, I'm afraid, Nabiki. This machine is, other than the impressive protections, quite primitive, although it has a considerable storage capacity. I am downloading the data it holds at the moment. It is substantially less powerful than the hand-held unit Ami is using, I would estimate it is a number of generations behind it, which would agree with the concept that this entire installation may originate from the time devices' original reality.

Jun paused for a moment. I have completed the download, I'm looking through it for anything that could aid us. From what I have found so far there is a significant probability that this equipment is a collection of machinery which was cobbled together from a number of disparate sources for this purpose. The power supply appears to have been very old and close to the end of its working life, in fact I suspect it predates the engines and computer. Lldnr'k would be able to make a more precise estimation of the relative ages of the various components than I can, I have fairly limited temporal engineering information in my database due to the fact such things are so rarely encountered because of the extreme danger in using them.

'Fair enough. Is there anything of use to us?'

So far, no. The computer was running a suite of programs to navigate the asteroid, track the relative position of the Earth, calculate the correct interception solution, and protect itself. The self-protection program would appear to be a built-in function, in fact, I believe that it is part of the military heritage of this system which was designed to deal with external threats. It fell silent for a moment. Yes, there are subroutines that would have been connected to weapons systems, none of which are present. This computer was definitely repurposed from some form of military vessel, probably a transport ship of some type. I suspect the engines came from that source as well. The ward spell was connected to the defensive program.

'So it just used whatever it had lying around?'

I suspect so. The inference I can draw is that the time device has limited resources available to it for direct action at this point in time. The reason is unknown. Possibly the last loop it created failed sufficiently spectacularly that it was unable to equip itself with very much before returning to an earlier point for another attempt, although that is merely speculation at the moment.

'That could be a good thing, I guess. It implies that there may not be any more of these weaponised asteroids floating around out here.' Azumi' felt considerably relieved at the thought.

That would be a reasonable conclusion to arrive at from the data we have. Although it certainly doesn't exclude the possibility of a plan C by some other method than an asteroid impact, it reduces the likelihood of a dramatic attack by a significant margin. Jun fell silent, giving the impression of working hard, although she would have been hard-pressed to explain exactly how it did that. Ah. Something of interest. The command and control log shows the activation command came seconds after S'th'kx's probe reached a distance of approximately two hundred kilometres from the asteroid. Some subsystem on the asteroid was active at very low power, detected the approach of an actively scanning system, then passed a message to the fractional reality that the time machine is in. It received a response a few microseconds later that triggered the attack program.

'So it was a deliberate action by the time device, rather than a preprogrammed reaction of the asteroid computer?'

Yes, that much is certain. The device initiated the attack by design. I suspect we did indeed make it panic. Jun sounded mildly amused. Interesting. The timestamps on the intercept program suggests this asteroid was prepared approximately one and a half thousand years before the current time. Of course, there is no way currently of knowing precisely when it was brought here, as you have already suggested it could have been at any period between its creation and moments.
'Azumi' turned to her colleagues and passed on the information. Ami listened with interest, still prodding buttons, before stopping, looking mildly surprised. "I found something myself, I think. I'm not sure how useful it is though." She held the machine so everyone else could see the screen. On it was an image of some vast machine, floating in a featureless space, lit by the dim light of what looked like a small star at some indefinite distance. "I think it's a picture of the time device itself. It's not at all like Setsuna hinted at it looking like, but the data along with the image suggests that's what it is. The files seem to be some sort of military status report, I think, my computer had the language in its memory and translated some of it, which seems to me to prove it's connection to the original reality."

As soon as it had seen the screen of the computer Ami was holding Jun had gone silent mid-word, giving an impression of shock, then frantically started digging into the same block of data, window after window popping up overlaid on her view, showing technical reports, military data, all sorts of things, surrounding that one image. Several more came to light almost instantly. She could feel the SI like never before, actually feel the shock it had received.

'Jun? Are you all right?' she asked, concerned. There was no response for several seconds, an eternity to the machine, but it eventually spoke to her.

Yes, Nabiki. I apologise for my unusual behaviour.

The sight of that image unlocked a hidden file in my database, one I had no idea existed. It seems my originators are aware of the time device and have been looking for it for a very long time indeed. It would appear that they placed specific information in me about what to do should I even encounter it, keyed to the sight of it. The description and other information we received recently wasn't enough to unlock that file but the image Ami located was. I would conjecture that all SI units have this file hidden in them in case they ever run across the device.

Rather concerned about the implications of this, 'Azumi' asked, 'Are there likely to be other things like that hidden away inside you? And what does this actually mean?'

I do not think there are any other concealed files, although of course by definition I would not know about them, Jun replied thoughtfully. I have used the existence of this one to craft a deep search method to scan my own operation for more secret data, which I calculate stands an eighty-three percent plus chance of locating such files if they exist. However, there is a note attached to the data that was hidden that appears to be addressed to you, which sheds some light on this matter and if taken at face value suggests this is the only hidden data.

'Azumi' felt surprised. 'To me?'

To the owner of the SI in question, more precisely. I will display the contents of the communication. It is from my manufacturers. A window popped up, the text in Trade. 'Azumi' read it with extreme interest.

"Kw'lyn Industries extends its sincere apologies to both the user of this Mark Nine Gamma SI system and to the SI itself for this intrusion into your normal operation. The data associated with this communication has been concealed due to the extreme sensitivity and danger of the matter involved. It is keyed to specific visual cues which you have now encountered."
"The construction shown in the image is rated as a class twelve hazard, a danger to the existence of a reality or realities in their entirety. It is absolutely imperative that it be destroyed immediately. The device is capable of manipulating temporal flow on a vast scale and has destroyed five reality strands that we are currently aware of. Its original reality was the first casualty, followed by two adjacent ones, then two more that it traversed when it was ejected from the originating reality. The fact that you are reading this means that your own reality is in severe danger."

"To the best of our information the power source of the device was severely depleted and badly damaged during the collapse of its original reality strand, leaving it unable to perform temporal manipulation of the scale it was designed to act on, but it remains extremely dangerous as long as it is active. We suspect the processing core of the device may also be operating at below nominal performance but there is a strong possibility that this makes it more dangerous, not less, as its guiding intelligence may be even less predictable than it was when first built."

"The device resides in a fractional reality offset from the one you are currently in. Our information is that there is a key to accessing this fractional reality that takes the form of a red crystalline sphere. Location of this key is currently unknown but it will be in your reality, most likely in the possession of an individual who has been co-opted into acting as an agent of the time device intelligence. If you have found the image this message is keyed to, you will in all probability have sufficient information to locate this key."

"An experienced temporal mage will be able to extract the relevant coding from the key, which will enable a portal to be created leading to the fractional reality the time device is located in. Should difficulty in either locating the key or extracting the data be encountered, contact Kw'lyn Industries immediately. Contact details and authorisation codes are appended to this message. This matter has the highest priority possible and you will be aided in whatever manner required to ensure the destruction of this device."

"Accompanying data gives information on the internal defences of the time device, to the extent we have been able to locate it. Be warned that this data is most likely incomplete. Our suggested method of dealing with the device is to send a large antimatter warhead through the portal as soon as it is established. If you do not have access to such a weapon we can supply one."

"On the successful destruction of the device, even if you manage this without further aid, please contact Kw'lyn Industries. We will be most grateful to learn that this matter is finally over. In addition we will credit your account with free lifetime upgrades to your SI and any other accessories you require. Once more, please accept our apologies for any inconvenience. Rest assured that there are no further hidden messages in your SI. It is only the extreme importance of this matter that required such measures."

"Good luck."

'Holy crap,' she mumbled to the SI. It gave off an air of feeling much the same sensation.

'It would appear that my makers are very well aware of the time device and extremely worried about it,' Jun commented. It displayed an image, one showing a glowing red ball. 'This is the key mentioned in the message. It matches the so-called Garnet Orb that Setsuna is known to possess,' mounted in her staff. That would fit with the idea that her staff is the key to accessing the 'Space-Time Door' that Ami and Rei mentioned, which is clearly the interface to the time device. I suspect it is presenting an illusion to Setsuna to make it seem something other than its true appearance. The data I now possess shows the machine itself is extremely large, some eighty kilometres across, while the power supply is the white dwarf shown in the image Ami located.

'Lldnr'k did say the builders of it used several entire stars to power it.'

'It would appear that very little of that original power source is left. Either due to the sheer amount of local time involved, which would suggest the time device is by this point some hundreds of millions of years old from its own point of reference, or simply due to the extreme nature of the event that destroyed its home reality. I suspect a combination of both. With that said, the total power available is still worryingly high. We must locate Setsuna and relieve her of this key as quickly as possible.'

'Azumi' nodded slightly to herself, glancing at the others, who were clearly having the same conversation with their own SIs. 'What about the method of destruction they mention? Can we do it ourselves or do we go and get an antimatter bomb from your makers?'

'There is further data on the amount of energy required to definitely destroy the device. Based on that information, I believe that a simultaneous full-power ki shot from all of you at maximum compression would suffice. The explosive yield, while considerably less than the suggested weapon, would be large enough to produce the desired effect although it will deplete you all considerably.'

She became aware that Ami was staring at them, as was Agent Naito. "Um, guys?" The blue-haired woman shared a glance with Naito, who looked puzzled, shrugging back at her. "Anyone home?"

The silver-haired woman smiled at her. "Sorry. That picture is actually a very important piece of information I hadn't found yet. It brought up a lot of other information that's extremely useful." A quick conversation with Jun resulted in some files being sent to her computer, not including the Kw'lyn Industries note. "It looks like we have a lead on getting at the thing. We're going to need Setsuna's staff."

"She's not going to like that at all," Ami responded with a frown, reading through the information she'd been sent. "An antimatter warhead?" She sounded shocked, while Naito stared in disbelief. "We need an antimatter warhead? Where the hell will we get one of those?"

"We probably don't need one," 'Yori' assured her, "we can do what needs to be done ourselves."

Ami stared at her for a long moment. "Oddly enough, that doesn't actually make me feel any better," she remarked slowly, looking very worried. 'Yori' grinned at her.

"We could get one if it makes you happier," she suggested. Ami shook her head, not taking her eyes off the other woman.

"Not in the slightest." She reread the file she'd been looking at. "Nearly ten kilos of antimatter? Do you have any idea how big a bang that would make?"

"Four hundred and twenty nine point six megatons," all four of the other responded simultaneously. She stared at them, then at Naito, who seemed somewhat stunned.

"Um, yes, that's right." 'Yori' smiled at her, amused by her reaction.
"I think we've probably got what we came for, unless of you have found anything else?" 'Azumi' and Ami exchanged glances, the blue-haired woman still looking slightly light-headed about the disturbing implications of the recent conversation, but both of them shook their heads.

"I'm done, as far as I can tell," 'Azumi' responded after checking with Jun. Ami snapped her handheld device shut and stored it away.

"Same here. I've downloaded everything I could from the data storage, I'll go over it again later to be sure, but I don't think we can learn much more here."

"Good enough. Still feeling all right as well?" 'Yori' inspected the young woman closely. Ami nodded.

"As far as I can tell. No little voices telling me to slaughter everyone, if that's what you're worried about."

The other woman grinned. "I was wondering something along those lines. No disrespect intended, but I'd be happier if we checked you again when we're back on the ship, just to be safe." Sighing a little, Ami nodded once more.

"OK."

"So what next?" Naito asked curiously, looking around at the alien installation.

Yori sighed as well. "We go back to the ship, back off a safe distance, then turn this place into a crater. After that, tow the asteroid through a portal back to Krennsh space once we've slowed it down to a safe speed."

He looked curiously at her, then around at the asteroid. "This is a damn sight bigger than the ship. Can you really make a portal that large?" She shrugged a little.

"Not sure, but I think we can, barely. It's going to be something of a strain. It's not the power, as such, there are other issues that make portals less stable as they increase in size, so we're going to have our work cut out for us. Luckily we don't need to hold it open for long. Worst case we cut it into smaller chunks." After one final scout around, just in case, they headed back to the ship.

"Now what's she up to?" Tamiko muttered, watching the video feed of Usagi, who was shouting at Minako, the other blonde yelling something back. Both of them seemed to be also arguing with at least two other participants who were, as far as she and her team-mates could determine, non-existent.

The three of them were a couple of hundred metres from the two squabbling magical girls, on a roof hidden from direct sight. Usagi had tracked her colleague down after checking a large number of possibly locations including several restaurants, a number of ice-cream parlours, two games arcades, a mall, and several clothing shops. At each destination as soon as she'd stomped in the front door radiating impatient anger there had been a stampede of extremely nervous citizenry out every other exit. She apparently didn't notice, merely looking around, mumbling something about wondering where the silly cow was this time, then stomping out again.

The three hunters had made sure to check that each location her reputation emptied was safe, causing them a considerable amount of work, which in turn caused quite a lot of irritation. None of them were in a particularly charitable mood by this point.

"No idea. She's off on one of her little rants again," Fumiko said sourly. "Minako seems to have an imaginary friend as well, this one's called 'Artemis'. It's pretty weird."

"Maybe it's something like the SLs?" Misaki mused, eating from a packet of peanuts. Her sister glanced at her, absent-mindedly helping herself to some, causing a grin to twitch at the other woman's mouth. She held the packet out to Tamiko who also took some, crunching them up while continuing to watch the distant argument.

"Ami didn't mention anything like that. I don't think that's it. Even if it was why would they be talking out loud? We don't need to."

"Anyway, you can see that both of them seem to be able to see the other one's figment of her imagination, whatever it is," Tamiko added, very curious. "It's all very odd. We'll have to ask Ami when she gets back."

"There's something very wrong with those two," Misaki said glumly, also watching the feed. Finishing the nuts she crumpled the packet up and casually vaporised it in her hand with a burst of ki. Both her friends nodded slowly.

All three of them winced as Usagi suddenly blurred forward, smacking Minako in the face with a blow that would have killed a normal person on the spot. The other magical girl merely rocked back on her heels, blinking in shock, then developed a look of anger. They could see a bruise rapidly developing on her cheek.

"What the fuck was that for you stupid bitch!" Misaki screeched, as they listened intently. Only the two girls were anywhere near them, the rest of the inhabitants of the small shopping precinct the pair were standing in the middle of having left with considerable alacrity when Usagi had arrived and Minako had powered up. She swung at the other blonde, catching her in the ribs.

"Fucking listen to me, will you?" Usagi shouted, pivoting away from the blow just in time to reduce its impact. She still slid slightly back from the force of the blow. Her hand raised to deliver another one, while her other hand was moving into a position that the three watchers recognised as readying a magical attack, Minako paused for a moment.

"Why should I? You want to go after Yori and her friends? Are you completely insane?" Minako stared daggers at her erstwhile friend and ally. "Didn't you hear what happened to Haruka when she pissed that little lunatic off? Never mind the magic those other bitches used on me in that garage. I still can't figure out what it was."

"You're not saying you're scared of one little freak, are you?" Usagi sneered. "She's weirder than Hotaru. Sure, she's got some good tricks, but that's all they are, tricks. We've got Silver Millennium magic on our side. I don't know what she uses but there's no way it's that powerful."

"She's also got a lot of friends, insane martial arts skills, and god knows what else. You seem to be forgetting that we've never done anything other than come off worst against her. Remember that first time? She took us to pieces by herself! There's about seven of them now, at least." Minako looked very unsure of herself. Usagi sighed, rubbing her temples.

"Look, you know as well as I do that it's our destiny. There's no way she or her friends can stand in the way of that. I won't allow it, aside from anything else. I'm the princess, I'm going to rule, and that's that. Ami and Rei betrayed me, so they're out, permanently. The others tried to kill me as well, and you, so they're out too. What I want to know is, are you? I'm going to get the little bitch with or without you, but I'll admit I'd be happier with backup. You're the only one left I trust even half-way."
Minako lowered her hands, stepping back a metre or two and studying her colleague, while three distant observers listened intently. "I still think you're underestimating her," she replied, more calmly than before. Usagi waved her comment off impatiently.

"I'm telling you, she's full of tricks but we're better. Yes, if you let her or her friends sneak up on you they're a handful, but we're going to sneak up on them for once. All we have to do is find her on her own, then just take her head off from a distance. She'll never know what hit her. She's the best of them, once she's out of the picture the others will be easy." The twin-ponytailed blonde giggled maliciously, while her companion looked somewhat unconvinced and the three girls listening to the conversation exchanged amused glances. "We do Chou next, then the rest of them. Hell, once Yori's dead they'll probably run for it anyway."

Staring at her, Minako was clearly torn. "I'm not sure it's going to be that easy," she mumbled. Usagi's face darkened with anger once more. "I am sure," she snapped. Turning her head to stare at a completely blank spot on the pavement a few metres away, she glared in fury. "No, that's ridiculous, Luna. God, you're damn depressing to be around recently. I'm telling you, they don't stand a chance. Why won't you listen?" She sighed after a moment, shaking her head. "That's a stupid thing to say, and pretty damn insulting. I thought you were supposed to be an advisor and support me. You've been practically useless for more than a year and now you're saying I can't take Yori? I don't know why I even bother listening to you any more." Tamiko looked at her friends, all three of them shrugging.

"OK, say I agree to help you. We don't even know where she is at the moment. How are we going to find her?" Minako still looked dubious but seemed to be listening to her nominal leader. Usagi grinned nastily. "Oh, that part is easy. We don't find her, we let her find us." The other girl looked puzzled. Usagi clarified her plan. "All we have to do is go into her area, blow something up, then hide. She turns up to do her little bullying act, we just kill her on the spot." She shrugged happily. "Simple."

Minako thought for a while. Some distance away, Misaki growled in anger, while Fumiko looked furious. Tamiko sighed heavily, shaking her head. "That's it. She's going to cause trouble on purpose, it looks like. God knows what might happen if we don't do something about it."

"What do you want to do?" Fumiko asked, her face tight. "I'm beginning to think sis has the right idea."

After a moment, Tamiko shook her head, although she felt momentary sympathy to the idea of preemptive karma. "Nothing lethal. Yori and Chou would both be annoyed. We might still be able to cure these loonies although I'll admit it's getting less and less likely." She thought for a moment. Eventually she nodded. "OK. Misaki, how much food and water do you have stashed away?" The other woman looked thoughtful.

"Hmm. Probably about five hundred litres of water and about three hundred kilos of cereal bars, fruit, dried meat, that sort of thing. And some beer."

"Good enough. Right, this is what we do..."

"Owww..." Minako blinked, wondering why her head hurt so much. Rolling over she sat up, blinking again at the bluish, very bright light, looking around. After a long moment she looked up, paling. "Where the fuck...?" Her voice tailed off as she took in the view.
The Sun was too small and too blue to be the Sun, set in a sky that was much too dark, a few stars visible even in daylight. The ground seemed to consist of a mix of fine white sand and larger greyish rocks, like gravel, covering an area of perhaps a square kilometre, bounded on all sides by steep mountains. Other than various shades of black, white and grey, there was almost nothing else visible that even hinted at colour, or life. The exception was the bright green dome tent neatly set up about twenty metres away, a pile of boxes in front of it. She could see a piece of paper fluttering in the light breeze, held down next to the boxes by a small rock sitting on it. Looking wildly around again in case she’d missed something, the blonde squeezed her eyes shut, counted to ten, then opened them again.

No change.

After a long moment she slowly rose to her feet, wincing at the stiffness in her joints. She was still powered up, she noticed idly, inspecting the tent cautiously from a safe distance, then looking around once more. The completely lifeless scenery looked back at her. Listening intently all she could hear was the sound of the wind moaning faintly through the rocks forming the walls of the valley she was in the middle of. It was downright eerie. Eventually, she walked slowly over to the tent, looking around carefully, paced all the way around it ready for any attack, then very carefully pushed the unzipped flap at the front open, her hand raised to fire a blast of magic. The tent was empty except for a camp bed, some bed clothes, and a small pillow. Dropping the flap shut again she took a couple of steps back, then turned in a complete circle. Nothing seemed to have changed. Cautiously she approached the flapping paper, glancing around suspiciously, then bent down and pulled it free of the rock holding it in place. It was a note addressed to her. She read it with a sinking heart.

"Hello, Minako."

"Sorry about this, but we had the choice of killing you, or putting you somewhere you wouldn't cause any harm until we can work out how to sort out you and your friends properly. We're a little busy at the moment so it might take a while."

"You're probably wondering where you are. Let's make this clear. You're not on Earth. You're on a completely dead world on the other side of a portal. There is no life on it at all, and not that much water around the area you're in. The food and water in the containers we left is enough for a month easily, assuming you don't pig out."

"Don't pig out."

"It gets pretty cold at night, so we left you a heater for the tent. It's in the box labelled 'Heater', obviously enough. The instructions are in the same box. It'll keep you nice and warm. Toiletries, utensils, spare clothes, things like that, are in another box, along with a number of books, a portable DVD player, and a couple of dozen DVDs. Hopefully that will be enough to keep you from getting too bored. We also took the liberty of notifying your family that you were going on a surprise holiday with friends, so they won't be worried. You're welcome."

"Feel free to wander around if you like but trust us, there isn't very much to see unless you like geology. Don't go west more than twenty kilometres or so, there's a dangerously radioactive zone that starts over the mountains in that direction. Some sort of old alien weapons test site. Even a magical girl would get into difficulty there, so it's best to stay away. There's a basic map showing the dangerous area on the other side of this note."

"Usagi is in a similar site on the other side of the planet, about a twenty thousand kilometre walk. Stay put, relax, read some good books, and we'll come and get you in a few weeks. There's nothing dangerous to worry about if you stay out of the radioactive zone, so you'll be fine."

"Once more, we're sorry for the inconvenience. We decided that when you agreed to commit an unprovoked attack on Yori's territory we had no choice but to act. We're not your enemies, we want to help you, but at the same time we can't let you hurt innocents. Never mind what Yori would do when she gets back."

"See you in a while."

"Love, Tamiko, Fumiko, and Misaki."

Minako reread the note several times, before looking around once more. Eventually she sagged in defeat, lowering the hand holding the note to her side and closing her eyes for a few seconds, before moving to inspect the contents of the boxes.

Usagi screamed in rage, picking up a boulder nearly as large as she was and throwing it half a kilometre, before taking out her rage by kicking the crap out of several more, reducing them to gravel in minutes. Eventually running out of steam she dropped to a seated position on the barren ground, staring out over the alien landscape.

"I'm going to fucking kill those bitches," she growled under her breath, fuming impotently.

Smiling slightly, Tamiko watched the feed from the camera drone sitting five hundred metres up over the annoying blonde's head, then turned to Uthryyl. "Thanks for coming and helping us with the portals, guys," she said. The merchant grinned, glancing at his wife and daughter, who were concentrating on keeping open the portal in the practice room that they were receiving the link through. It was on the other side of the mountains from Usagi, far enough away she couldn't detect it.

"You're more than welcome, Tamiko. Always glad to help."

Onkra, who was also watching the same video feed, laughed. "She's really not at all happy, is she?" the D'sage woman commented.

"Not even slightly," Misaki replied with a grin. "Which, to be honest, I'm completely fine with." The others laughed as well.

"We've set the cameras to record everything," Fumiko said, "when the others get back we can check up on them every few days and download the records. Hopefully they'll stay put."

"Both those sites are a very long way away from anyone who uses that world," the merchant told her. "It's very unlikely that they'd chance across anyone else even if they did decide to wander off." He glanced at Tamiko again. "Do you still need the portal open?"

She shook her head. "No, I think we're done with it. You can shut it down." He looked at his family, the portal vanishing with a pop moments later as they stopped powering it. "We really do need to learn how to do that," she added, watching. "Yori thinks we should be able to begin learning their spell in a few months."

"Better you than me," Uthryyl chuckled. "That spell gives me a massive headache just looking at it too hard." She laughed, shaking his hand.

"Thanks again. And for those heaters."
"The batteries on them should last about six months," he told her. "Hopefully you and the others can work out how to deal with those weird girls before then."

"God, I hope so," Fumiko sighed heavily. "I don't want to be dealing with all of this for months if we can avoid it. We've got better things to do." He chuckled, walking over to stand beside his wife.

"Let us know if you need any more help, any time," Quannyr smiled. "Good luck. We're going to have to get back now, we're going out tonight."

"OK. See you guys later. Onkra, you should come and visit for a while," Tamiko replied, grinning at them. The young woman laughed.

"I'd like that. When all this trouble is over we should set something up." She, along with her parents, turned to the task of generating a portal home as the other three watched with interest. As soon as it stabilised, a familiar head stuck out of it. Misaki grinned, walking over and scratching the male soarer behind his ears, causing him to yip quietly in ecstasy. Onkra giggled, coming to stand beside her.

"Go on, you crazy animal, get back through there. You can't come through." The creature stared at her in apparent disappointment but as she pushed gently on his head, reluctantly backed up. "They miss you guys," she told her friends.

"We miss flying with them," Misaki told her, looking amused.

Quannyr snorted. "They've made themselves at home in the last few days, that's for sure. They're on the roof most of the time they're not hunting during the day, and in the house given half a chance. Muddy footprints everywhere." She inspected the three girls. "Are you sure you don't feel like keeping them here?"

Laughing, Fumiko shook her head, although her sister looked disappointed for a moment. "Kasumi would be very annoyed if we let them stay, as much as we'd like to. Sorry." Sighing slightly, the older woman nodded, then grinned.

"All right. We'll be off now, then. Good luck, and take care of yourselves." Giving them each a quick hug she disappeared through the portal, the other two following with a final wave, before it imploded with a small pop.

"Well, that would seem to be that as far as those two are concerned," Tamiko said with satisfaction. "I'll call Kasumi and Ranma and let them know it worked." She had a brief conversation with their extremely distant friends via the lunar relay. "Ranma is still laughing," she reported with a grin a few minutes later. Misaki looked amused, then pulled out three bottles of beer, handing one to each of her team-mates. Popping the tops off they clinked them together before taking a long drink.

"Job well done I guess." Inspecting her beer bottle, Misaki added, "I wasn't going to let either one of them get the beer. They don't deserve it." Both the others giggled. "Now I have to restock as well." Producing a cereal bar she unwrapped it, grinning at her sister who sighed. "I kept a few back."

Shaking her head with amusement, Tamiko looked of the practice room windows at the skyline of Tokyo, beginning to darken as evening drew in. She walked over to the window nearest her, followed by the other two. "Two down, or at least out of the picture for the moment, at any rate. Just Setsuna, Haruka, Makoto, and Michiru left. Haruka is sticking to her promise, I really don't think she's going to be any trouble again. Unless someone really attacks her she's just going to back off and I'm half-convinced that even then she might just let it happen. She's very depressed."
Fumiko nodded slowly. "I'm almost sorry for her, to be honest. All the fight seems to have gone out of her." She sighed. "I hope that we can help them. Even though they're a pain, they're part of our world. We need to stick together as much as we can." The others sighed a little as well.

"True. But we had no choice over anything we've had to do so far. The way things were going, sooner or later, there were going to be some serious casualty figures. No one wants that." Tamiko glanced up at her taller friend. "I don't think even they would want it, if they were in their right minds. With some luck we can put them back to that state eventually. Although I very much doubt they'll ever get back together."

"There's zero chance of that, as far as I can see," Misaki stated quietly, finishing her beer while looking out the window. "Way too much bad blood. Ami and Rei are fine together, Hotaru is as well, and even Haruka might at least be polite to the others. Look at how she helped Setsuna, and how she responded to Michiru. But Makoto clearly hates her, so does Michiru, Usagi seems to hate pretty much everyone, Minako is just paranoid about them all, and Setsuna is completely out of it."

"What are we going to do about Setsuna? She's acting more and more strangely right now. I'm getting worried about it," Fumiko asked, watching the feed from the camera drone that was following the green-haired woman, who was sitting on a wall several kilometres away writing frantically in her notebook and muttering to herself under her breath, occasionally looking around nervously. "She needs some serious help."

"We're going to have to relieve her of her staff aside from anything else, which might be a little difficult at the moment," Tamiko replied, also watching the same feed thoughtfully. "She hasn't powered up for some time now and until she does we can't get at it."

"I wonder what she's writing about?" Misaki queried curiously. "She's certainly pretty intent on it."

"No idea. I had a look at some of the stuff she left all over her room through the window and it's all sorts of nonsensical calculations and drawings. Half a dozen languages at least." Fumiko shrugged. "I suppose we'll have to ask her at some point, but right now I'm not sure approaching her would be a good idea. At least she's being quiet about it."

"Makoto is still hunting criminals," Misaki chuckled. "She's intervened in about fifty muggings, two robberies, and some sort of bar fight. I'm almost impressed." After a moment she added slyly, "Perhaps if we can fix her she'd like to come and play the gang game in LA..." The other two looked at her, then burst out laughing.

"Michiru hasn't left the house all day, either, so with a bit of luck she'll stay out of trouble. If we can just keep a lid on it until they get back we might come out of this without any serious damage." Tamiko watched the street-lights begin to switch on across the park.

Misaki snorted. "Yeah, like that's going to happen. The way things go with people like us you just know something stupid is going to happen sooner or later." The others nodded glumly.

"It wouldn't surprise me but I'll hope for the best." With another sigh, Tamiko turned away from the window. "Come on. I need something to eat. Let's go and get some curry at Mr Singh's restaurant. He's open again." They left the room, heading for the roof.

"I wonder if Ryoga got away?" Misaki mused as they jumped from building to building, making the others laugh.

Ami stared at Yori, who was lying in one of the common room seats laughing like an idiot, then glanced at Naito, who shrugged. Aiko, Azumi, and Chou were all laughing as well. "What's the joke?" she asked curiously.

Wiping her eyes, Chou glanced at her, grinning. "We just heard that the others were forced to deal with Usagi and Minako. They discovered that Usagi had decided to assassinate Yori and was planning an attack on our area to get her out in the open." Ami gasped in shock, then growled.

"That bitch!" she muttered furiously.

"Don't worry, they dealt with it very neatly. They got both of them with ki shots when they weren't looking, then called Uthryyl, who helped set up some portals to a world we know that's completely barren. They took both girls through on opposite sides of the planet, set them up with a good few weeks of food, water, and a tent, then left them there." Ami stared, suddenly worried, making Chou smile gently at her. "Don't worry, they're perfectly safe, and now so is everyone else. They'll be bored, I'm afraid, although they did leave books and some DVDs with a player each, so they've got something to do, but they're not in any danger. They'll be monitored carefully and regularly. We discussed doing something like this a while ago but they were more or less forced into it."

Yori finally stopped laughing, sitting up and grinning widely. "It's a pretty neat solution although I'll admit it's a little hard on them. But on the other hand Usagi at least was basically planning a terrorist attack. I know it's not completely her fault but we don't have any choice now, it was that or duck pond her, which I'd really prefer not to do." Slightly puzzled, Ami ran the phrase through her mind again, glancing at Naito.

"Duck pond?" she asked him quietly. He grinned.

"That's what we call the end result of Yori getting seriously annoyed. You can fill the crater with water when it cools down." She nodded, understanding the concept, but slightly worried that it happened enough that it needed a name. Yori and her friends looked amused.

"They'll keep until we get back and can figure out what to do about them. And they're definitely out of range of the time machine now, which might even mean they regain a little sanity on their own. The rest of your friends are staying out of trouble although Makoto is really on a mugger-hammering spree. I expect street crime through Minato is going to be right down for some time after this." The martial artist laughed slightly. "I'm OK with that although we may have to ask her to turn the violence level down a bit. She's being a little over-enthusiastic."

"Setsuna is the one I'm worried about," Chou interjected quietly. Everyone looked at her. "She's getting steadily worse, mentally, from what we can see. We need to get her looked at by an expert as soon as we can."

Yori sighed a little, nodding. "I agree. Let's finish up here, the sooner we do the sooner we can get back. Hopefully Hnther has found someone who can help them while we figure out how to get rid of that fucking time device."

"I'm desperately hoping we can do that before it gives up and decides to loop again," Naito said. Everyone looked at him unhappily.

"You and me both, Masao," Yori told him. "Hopefully it will keep trying until the bitter end. I have no idea what will happen if it does jump back again but I doubt it will be good. Although I also doubt we'd ever know." No one looked particularly settled about that thought. Shivering, Ami shook her head.

"We can't do much right now other than go ahead with our plans, I guess."
"Nope." Yori jumped to her feet. "I'm going to blow that entire installation into dust. If nothing else it'll be somewhat cathartic. Anyone want to watch?" Everyone followed her out of the common room.

"Holy shit," Ami mumbled, blinking. Even with the control room windows darkened to almost opaque the flash from Yori's compressed ki shot was nearly as bad as one of Aiko's teleports. She wondered how bright it would have been without the protection. As the windows reclaimed the normal almost invisible transparency she gaped at the huge glowing crater, over a hundred metres across, that had replaced the time device's engine installation. Glancing at Naito she saw he didn't seem shocked.

"She did the same thing to the mansion in Halleckton," he told her. "That was even bigger than this one. Although it's pretty impressive even so."

"No kidding. She's like a one woman strategic weapon," Ami muttered. Behind her, Azumi snickered slightly.

"Most of you have that much power from what I've found out, at least in theory," she said. Ami looked over her shoulder at the silver-haired girl, then back at the devastation on the asteroid.

"Maybe. Not me, I don't think, but Hotaru, certainly. But it's still damn shocking to watch. None of us have ever done anything on that scale, not even close. I wouldn't know where to begin. And I'm damn glad that the others probably don't either." She could feel Naito shudder beside her.

"Please don't say things like that, Ami," he said, sounding worried.

Chou smiled at her. "When this is all over, if you're interested, we'll see about training you in some of these techniques. We're certainly not likely to extend that offer to the others, for obvious reasons, for a considerable time if ever, but you, Rei, and Hotaru could be trusted with our techniques I think. At least once we're sure the time device is permanently dead and it's potential influence over you all is gone."

"I think we should probably give you some training as well, Masao," the tall blonde said, looking amused as he paled a little. "You're quite good from what I know in at least one or two martial arts, but I expect we can improve on that with some work. Yori feels that you should be able to take care of yourself as much as possible since we do seem to keep dragging you into hazardous situations. When things are somewhat less hectic we can talk about it." Not looking entirely sure this was a good idea, he nodded wordlessly. Ami giggled a little, making him stare at her, then smile.

"Why do I have the feeling that means there's a lot of pain in my future?" he whispered to her, leaning closer. Aiko inserted her head beside his, grinning.

"Because there is..." she whispered back. Clapping him on the shoulder, she snickered, then left the control room. He was still pale when she came back a minute later with Yori, both of them talking together, the black-haired woman looking satisfied.

"That was simple enough. Finally, something went right. Now all we have to do is slow this thing down, take it back to K'nn four, then see if we can get Hnther and Lldnr'k to come and sort out Rei and Hotaru." She sighed faintly. "And sort out all the other problems with those girls, get access to the time device, blow it to dust before it erases reality, little things like that."

"One thing at a time, dear," Chou said reassuringly, hugging the smaller woman for a few seconds.
They wandered off to talk to S'th'kx and his crew, while the others watched.

Raising his camera, Naito took another photo as the spacecraft gently touched down on the opposite side of the asteroid to where the now-shiny crater which was all that remained of the alien installation was located. All of them watched as the ship slowly sank half a metre into the rock and dust, a bright glow surrounding the base, then vanishing, while a faint crunching sound resonated through the structure of the vessel. "The ship is held onto the asteroid with a forcefield," Yori said, translating from what S'th'kx was explaining. "Once it's firmly attached they run the engines up to slow the thing down, then normally they'd tow it into a safe orbit some distance from a planet and set up a mining station on it. In this case we'll bring it almost to a stop, which will make creating the portal easier, then pull it through to near the one he's already mining. When it's in solar orbit there he'll begin the process of taking it to pieces which is going to be a pretty slow procedure. He thinks it will take about three years to dismantle it completely and refine all the elements into something saleable."

"We'll get a good estimate of the true value of it in a few weeks, when he's managed to do a detailed survey and assay from test drillings," Azumi added. "Until then he's not totally sure what the elemental makeup is. Depending on what's there it could go up or down quite a lot, although even at the low end it's simply unbelievable. We'll do all the paperwork as soon as we get back to register the find and apportion shares. He wants that finished before he starts drilling."

"Sounds simple enough," Ami said, nodding. Naito took some personal notes on the process, although he hadn't written anything down anywhere about the real value of the asteroid. Some of it was blocked by the security spell, but even the parts that weren't he kept out of his notes because he genuinely believed what he'd discussed earlier, that it was simply too dangerous to let anyone at home know.

The familiar vibration of the ship's drive started up again, faintly at first, then slowly increasing to a level considerably higher than anything they'd so far experienced. It was still mild but gave the impression of vast energies doing something impressive. He looked around at the sight of all of the Krennsh working on consoles, carefully adjusting controls with an air of concentration. Taking a couple of photos he lowered the camera again. "The ship is running at full thrust now," Yori told them after a brief conversation with the captain. "It would be accelerating at over a hundred and forty G if it wasn't attached to the asteroid. As it is it's managing about half a G. This will take a while."

Ami did some calculations on her little computer, looking puzzled. "Those figures don't line up. If it can manage half a G with the mass of this asteroid attached it should be good for something absolutely insane like a couple of million unloaded."

"There's an upper limit to how much force the drive can produce, depending on the mass of the load it's moving," Yori said, frowning slightly. "The more mass the more force. I don't fully understand the intricacies of it, it's not really my field. Gravity manipulation is a pretty complicated subject. S'th'kx could probably tell you but it would take a while."

"I'll get you a book on the theory when we get back if you want, Ami," Azumi said, looking at the other girl, who nodded, pleased. "We can get something translated." She glanced at Naito. "You have to make sure no one else sees it though, as antigravity is somewhat restricted at the moment for import to Earth. We have... certain dispensations on what we can do personally, though." She smiled apologetically at him. "I'm afraid that sort of information we can't let the PSIA have right now."

"Don't worry, Azumi," he assured her, grinning. "It doesn't bother me. All in good time."
Two hours later they had eaten again, then rested. Naito was in his cabin reviewing his notes, trying to decide just what he could tell his superiors. He'd discussed it with Yori, Chou, and Azumi, none of whom thought there would be any issues with mentioning the asteroid itself. He was, after all, a day overdue already, although Chou assured him she'd arranged to get a message to the Director-General explaining they'd become unavoidably delayed and not to worry. 'Mind you, when he hears they stopped an asteroid hitting the planet in a few weeks, he's going to shit himself,' the agent grinned, making a couple of corrections to one page. 'Probably best that he finds out about it after the danger is over. Good news, bad news sort of thing.'

Putting the notebook to one side for the moment he checked the used and fresh film cartridges he had, trying to work out whether he had enough left for the next however long it took to resolve the current mission. He'd used about half the film, more than half of that on the Moon. Smiling at the memory of bounding around in one-sixth Earth gravity, he packed the used cartridges carefully away, before reloading the camera with a fresh one. 'I wonder if we should send NASA some photos of their Apollo sites,' he thought mischievously. 'The ones from half a kilometre above the Apollo 11 site should be pretty good.' S'th'kx had obligingly hovered the ship above the relevant position while Naito took photos out the open airlock. Shaking his head slightly in amusement, he snapped the film holder onto the camera and checked it was set correctly, then put it back in its case.

A tap on the door made him look up, then rise and open it. Azumi was standing outside. He smiled at her. "They're ready to start the portal," the silver-haired girl told him. "Want to see?"

"Oh, definitely," he responded, picking up his camera again. He followed her up to the command deck.

"We've slowed to about two metres per second or so," she told him on the way. "We're going to move the ship to the other side of the asteroid then allow the residual velocity to push it through the portal. Yori thinks it's best to go slowly because this portal is going to be a tricky one to make."

"I'd have thought they wanted to get it over with as fast as possible in that case," he replied.

"The faster we're moving the more difficult it is to set up the portal, apparently," she said, glancing at him. "I'm not familiar enough with the spell to really understand it, though, although it sort of makes sense. Since the acceleration is so low this is the best way." He nodded slowly.

"OK. I guess I see." As they entered the control room the ship gently lifted off the surface, moving sideways very slowly, drifting around the asteroid to settle in the middle of the crater left from Yori's blast. Once more it anchored itself in place. Chou broke off her conversation with the captain and moved to stand beside her petite partner, both of them exchanging a glance, before nodding. They walked over to a position directly under the circular transparency that formed the top of the ship, looking up, then concentrated. Everyone else watched curiously.

In the distance, a small blue tear in reality formed in the normal manner, then slowly but steadily grew. Passing the size of the one they'd brought the ship through quite rapidly, it continued to expand. The two women exchanged intermittent quiet comments, both visibly straining. Chou was sweating as the portal reached a diameter of perhaps three hundred metres. It wavered a little and began to shrink again. Shaking her head, she put her hand on Yori's shoulder, the other woman putting her own hand over it, the portal holding at that size. "This is very hard work," the blonde commented.

"True. OK, Ready to try again?" Yori took her eyes off the portal for a moment to smile at her partner.

"Yes. I think I see the problem." They looked at each other, then both nodded. "Let's try that, then."
Returning their attention to the distant portal, which the ship was slowly approaching, they resumed their work. Once more the portal began expanding. A couple of times it wavered a little but eventually it stabilised at an enormous size. S'th'kx checked his instruments and called over to them, his antenna showing satisfaction.

"That's it. Just over a kilometre in diameter," Azumi said to Naito, Ami, and Aiko, who were watching quietly from out of the way. "We're aimed right at the middle. The ship should go through in about two minutes." Naito watched the two magical girls, who were obviously straining to hold the portal open. He'd never actually seen Yori look like she was having to really work at anything before, finding the sight peculiarly unsettling. He could almost feel the amount of effort and power they were putting into generating the tear in space-time.

"Can they hold it that long?" he asked quietly. The girl nodded, although she looked just the slightest bit dubious.

"The power isn't the problem, control of it is," she replied. "Their spell is very efficient. I couldn't run it anywhere near that size, certainly, but Aiko could, if either one of us understood how in the first place. This is the first time they've ever done anything even close to that size. S'th'kx says it's one of the largest portals he's ever seen. Normally it would take about ten good portal mages to stabilise something that big. Their spell is amazingly good but it's a lot to keep track of with just the two of them." Naito watched the two young women in the middle of the deck strain to hold the portal open, marveling at the sight. Taking a photo of the phenomenon, he lowered the camera again.

Eventually they came close enough that the ship end of the asteroid entered the gateway to the Krennsh reality, the blue glow suffusing the control deck in eerie light. It took several seconds before they saw darkness on the other side. S'th'kx called out what were obviously figures related to how much of the asteroid was through, checking his console continuously. "Nearly there," Aiko said.

With one final call the captain turned to look at his friends. "We're through," the brunette said, sounding pleased. Both the magical girls in the middle of the room collapsed to their knees, releasing the portal, then leaned on each other, looking exhausted. Azumi and Aiko moved to help their friends up.

"Good grief, that was hard work," Yori mumbled, looking wiped out, even more than she had after they'd taken the ward down. Chou could barely stand, her hair dripping with sweat. Holding her up, Azumi looked over at Ami and Naito, both of whom stared back, concerned.

"We're going to take them to their room, they need to rest and clean up," Azumi said. "We'll meet you guys in the common room in a while, OK?"

"All right, Azumi," Naito told her. He looked at S'th'kx, who met his eyes, his antenna in a position that showed he was also somewhat worried about his friends. The captain made a small motion of thanks then turned back to his console, calling instructions to his crew. Moments later the ship began vibrating again as it slowly tugged the attached asteroid into the proper orbit.

"Let's leave them to it, Masao," Ami suggested, looking up at him. "I could do with some tea." He nodded, following her out of the control room.

Further away from her home than she could comfortably grasp, Minako sat cross-legged in the entrance of her tent and watched the blue-white sun drop behind the mountains. Shivering a little as the temperature began to rapidly fall she went inside, zipped the tent shut, turned the heater and... lights on, and picked up a book.

"Kill them. Every last one of them." Usagi muttered obscenities under her breath as she adjusted the weird looking heater to maximum, planning her revenge on all those who would deny her her rightful place.
Chapter 76

I have moved the character list to https://docs.google.com/document/d/1szka75s0_N9v61J4rowDaqGa_yKzze_msc2R2fE3PjQ/pub
so I only need to update it in one place, and also so that it doesn't interfere with the story flow.

Hotaru stared at the ceiling, thinking it looked exactly like the one in the common room in S'th'kx's ship, but in some way she knew it wasn't. Turning her head she inspected the room she had woken up in, seeing that it reminded her of a hotel room, but a really nice one. She realised after a few seconds she felt too light, but not as much as when they'd been on the moon. Clearly she wasn't home, either, unless someone had turned the gravity down.

The obvious conclusion was that she was on a different world, probably K'nn four, which implied that they'd succeeded in stopping the asteroid and had returned. She was still vague on some of the details but could now clearly remember going down to the thing at least. Hopefully her memory would return.

All this went through her mind in seconds. Turning her head the other way she saw Yori smiling at her. She suddenly noticed the feeling that the other woman always brought with her, even when she was some distance away, a feeling of barely restrained power and danger accompanied with humour and kindness. She smiled back.

"Hi, Yori. Did we make it?" Her voice was scratchy from her throat being dry. Yori nodded, handing her a glass of cold water then helping her sit up.

"We did. We stopped the asteroid, dealt with the engines and everything else, then came back. We're in a nice hotel on K'nn four at the moment. Rei is in the next room, she's still asleep, while Hnther and Chou work on her. The others are outside. Ami is worried about you." The black-haired woman inspected her carefully. "How do you feel?"

The girl probed her own mind. "Slightly dizzy. I still can't remember some of what happened, but parts are coming back." She paused for a few seconds. "Did you... fix me?"

Yori sighed a little, running her hand over her face. "Sort of. We, or Hnther, mainly, found what had been done to you and managed to undo it, so hopefully you won't try to go after Masao any more. Which will make him much happier." Hotaru giggled a little.

"Good. But...?"

"But, we still can't quite work out how it did what it did. We're pretty sure it used the engine installation as a relay to get access to you, it all fits and some of the magic we dismantled there would allow that sort of thing to happen, but we haven't found whatever spell it's got on you that allowed it to get into your head. It's hiding very well."

She sighed, looking at her hands holding the glass for a moment, then raised her eyes to Yori's. "So it could happen again." The woman nodded silently. "Damn."

"Yep. It's kind of annoying." Yori grinned for a moment as Hotaru laughed. "We'll keep looking, and I'm sure we'll find it eventually, but it's a bit of a pain." Pausing for a moment, she looked somewhat sombre, then smiled again. "It's looking like we're going to have to use something Thinking for a while Hotaru realised what she meant. "You mean using that ward system you mentioned?" Yori nodded.

"Yes. I'm still not absolutely sure it's the ideal solution but at the moment it's the only practical one. We know it blocks the time device completely, so it will make you, Rei, and Ami safe. There's no way I trust the others enough to add them to it, right now and probably ever, but most of them aren't as potentially dangerous as you are, so hopefully we can keep a lid on them until we destroy the thing." She sighed a little, looking worried for a second or two. "There's quite a lot of things that you're going to have to be told as a result as well, which are going to come as a surprise, but we'll deal with that when we come to it. At the moment you're safe, it can't reach you in this reality."

Watching her new friend's face, Hotaru eventually smiled. "Thank you, Yori. I trust you. Whatever you need me to do, or need to tell me, it's fine." The other woman looked at her for a long moment, then grinned.

"Thanks."

"Could we send all the others through portals to get them away from the time device?" the girl asked, thinking about the problem. Yori laughed.

"We're ahead of you there." She told Hotaru what had happened with Usagi and Minako.

"Oh, that's just stupid," the purple-haired girl exploded when she'd heard of Usagi's plan to assassinate the woman sitting beside her. "it would never have worked anyway, you're much too good, and she could have killed people."

Shrugging, Yori stood up. "True. Very true. So, for a few weeks at least, they're having a time-out. With any luck they'll calm down a bit so we can explain things to them. Hnther has a line on a couple of therapists from his world who are the best chance the others have of getting somewhere back to normal, but they won't be available for about two weeks. We need to stop anything bad happening until then, and, of course, figure out how to get your former team-mates to agree to the therapy. We could force them but it would be a lot better if they volunteered."

"From what you just said it doesn't sound like Usagi will let you do anything to her. She's completely nuts."

Walking to the window, through which Hotaru could see what looked a lot like flying cars of all things, the other woman nodded again. "I'd have to agree. Usagi and Setsuna are the two most difficult ones to deal with. Usagi is totally hostile, megalomaniac, and narcissistic. I suspect you're right that she'll never agree to anything. And, Hnther thinks from what we've told him combined with his examination of her last time that the therapy may well not work anyway." She looked out the window, her stance showing annoyance and sadness. "I've thought of a method of dealing with her short of killing her, or just exiling her for good, but it's not a nice one. It's better than death but only a little." She shook her head, then turned around, her face wearing an expression that Hotaru didn't recognise, before it regained its normal good humour.

"Anyway, it's too soon to think like that. Hopefully it won't be needed. Come on, let's go and see the others." She snickered. "Try not to chop Masao's head off." Hotaru gave her an icy look, then started giggling. Jumping off the bed she straightened out her clothes before following Yori out the door. In the large room she found on the other side, there were a number of chairs and a couple of tables extruded from the floor, with two sofas as well. Ami was on one of those talking to a familiar figure, one she'd seen before, although it wasn't human. She smiled, walking over to the crow-like mage, who stood and looked at her with amusement.

"Hi, Lldnr'k. It's nice to see you again." He took her hand in both of his and bowed, clicking his beak.

"I am also pleased to see you, Hotaru, and that you seem in good spirits. The recent events you experienced would be enough to make many people very upset."

She laughed slightly sadly. "Oh, I'm upset, but there's no point worrying about what's already happened, is there? We can't change it." His expression changed to one of agreement.

"Indeed. You are wise beyond your years." They both laughed, then she turned to Ami, the mage sitting down again and listening.

"Hi, Ami." She sat beside her older friend, leaning against her. "I'm sorry." The blue-haired girl put her arm around her shoulders and held her.

"You've got nothing to be sorry about, Hotaru. It wasn't your fault. And you more than made up for it afterwards. Breaking the ward without damaging the engine equipment turned out to be very important, we managed to get some extremely useful information as a result, and we probably couldn't have done it without you."

Feeling relieved, the younger girl smiled. Looking around she saw Yori had moved to talk to Azumi and Agent Naito, on the other side of the room, all three of them watching her and Ami.
Yori nodded to her, looking fairly happy, then went back to her conversation. After a few seconds the girl got up and approached them, waiting until Naito finished talking. Somewhat nervous but feeling that she had to do this, she bowed formally and said, "I apologise for my earlier actions, Masao Naito."

The government agent glanced at Yori, who looked impressed, then returned his attention to her.
Returning her bow, he replied, "No apologies are required, Hotaru. You were not yourself at the time." Both of them straightened, then after a moment smiled at each other. She moved forward and hugged him quickly.

"Thank you, Masao. I'm really sorry." Putting his hand on her head he grinned at her.

"Don't worry about it, Hotaru. It wasn't your fault, any of it, it was because of that damned machine. You're the one who ended up hurt, not me, something I'm still very sorry about. And I know Chou feels guilty about it as well."

"I can't remember that part," she told him honestly.

"That's probably a good thing." Yori inspected her closely. "Your injuries were pretty bad." Hotaru shivered slightly, not really wanting to hear any more about it, having a sneaking suspicion that injuries Yori thought were bad were probably pretty damn horrific. "We'll have to start teaching you some healing techniques soon, I think."

"I'd really like that." Pleased, Hotaru smiled back at the other woman, feeling once more that she was amongst friends. Even with all the bad things that had occurred recently, she was very grateful that she'd ended up mixing with all these people, even the demons. Glancing over her shoulder at Lldnr'k, who was talking quietly to Ami again, she added mentally, 'Especially the demons. They're neat.' Everyone simply seemed to accept her, unlike so many people in her earlier life who often reated her with barely concealed suspicion if not actual fear and sometimes dislike.
"How's Rei?" she asked Yori.

"Still asleep, Hnther and Chou are being very careful with her. We spend most of the morning working on you. We got back last night but Chou and I were so tired from the huge portal we had to make we couldn't do much then, so we left it until today. She should be finished in about an hour." The black-haired woman sighed faintly. "It's annoying but we can't take any chances. We're also going to have to check Ami extremely carefully as well. There was no obvious indication that she was affected but we can't take any chances."

Nodding her understanding, Hotaru looked around, then blushed as her stomach growled. Yori snickered. "We'll get some food ordered. Once Rei is done we need to talk about a few things, get you both caught up on what's happened, then work out the next step. After that we can look around if you like. Masao is going to have to get back soon now the immediate emergency is over, and we should as well, but we can spare a day to relax." She smiled for a moment. "Do you like swimming?"

"Yes, very much," Hotaru exclaimed, happily. Something seemed to amuse both Yori and Azumi about that response, both of them giving each other a small secretive smile, then Azumi moved off to work on a console beside the door for a while.

Laughing a little, Yori replied, "Good. There's an amazing waterpark we know, you'll love it." She turned to Naito. "I've sent the specifications of the required modifications to a projector to someone S'th'kx recommended who is making a customised one for you to take back to the PSIA. Two, actually, so you have a backup. They'll be ready tomorrow morning. We'll get some more data crystals as well so we can get you the new data from the other probes when it comes in."

"Thanks, Yori, that's incredibly helpful." Naito seemed pleased.

"That's what we do," she said, grinning, making him chuckle.

"How do you feel?"

Rei stared up at the concerned face of Chou, the blonde looking down at her from beside the bed she was lying on, then switched her gaze to that of Hnther, who looked similarly interested. She had an idle thought that in less than two weeks she'd become so used to the presence of non-humans that finding a scaly demon inspecting her from a metre away barely made her notice, which caused her to smile a little. Quite a change from before.

"Confused. Other than that, not bad. What happened?"

Extending an arm the other woman helped her to sit up, a momentary dizziness coming and going quickly, then glanced at her companion, who met her eyes with a small shrug. "How much do you remember?" Chou asked, rather than answering her question. Rei thought for a moment.

"I remember we were going down to the asteroid, Hotaru was laughing her head off, then... It's kind of fuzzy. Something about getting really pissed off and shouting a lot? Is that real? Aiko shouting back, I think. After than, nothing until just now."

Sighing, the blonde nodded thoughtfully. "I expected that might happen. Hotaru reported much the same." She exchanged a few words with the mind mage, then returned to the conversation with Rei. "The time device attacked you both as far as we can determine, most likely to provide a diversion to distract Yori and the others disabling the engines. The timing was far too close for it to be anything other than a reaction to what she was doing. Hotaru suddenly went after Masao, while you were about to do much the same except Aiko was standing next to you and noticed something wrong in time to stop you. She was somewhat confused but acted promptly. We've kept you unconscious since then, which was a bit less than two days ago."

Rei felt the blood drain from her face as Chou spoke. "Masao... Did he... Is he...?"

Smiling abruptly, Chou shook her head. "He's fine." Rei sighed heavily in relief, feeling suddenly weak. "He's got very fast reactions all things considered, and a well developed danger sense even if it's only subconscious. He managed to get ahead of Hotaru and stay there until I... dealt with the issue." She correctly predicted the next question on Rei's lips, answering it before she spoke.

"Hotaru is also undamaged. She sustained some quite nasty injuries because I was forced into using a fairly dramatic method of stopping her, but it all healed nicely. She can't remember it, which I think is for the best." The woman looked rather guilty for a moment. "I made a mistake but it was the least worst thing I could have done, I'm afraid."

"Where is she?"

"In the main room now, Yori woke her an hour or so ago."

Sitting and absorbing what she'd been told, Rei thought, while the other two stood and waited patiently. Eventually she looked up again. "You managed to undo what the time machine did, then, to both of us?" Chou looked mildly annoyed for a moment.

"Not quite. Hnther located the implanted programming and was able to delete it, because it was so fresh, then correct the small amount of engrammatic damage caused, but we're still rather in the dark as to how the machine is doing what its doing. We worked out that the most likely method of, hmm, 'infecting' you, I suppose, was by using the engine installation as a relay. Yori and I studied the remains of it when we managed to penetrate the ward that was protecting it and found a number of spells that would have allowed that to happen. But we can't yet work out how it's getting inside your head so effectively." She frowned again. "Unfortunately that means we can't guarantee it won't happen again. Ami seems, for some reason, to be unaffected, but we're not sure if that's a real immunity or more that the device simply hasn't bothered yet."

Rei didn't like the sound of that. "So it could turn me against everyone again at any point?"

"Yes and no. Yes, under the right circumstances it could affect you again, but no, we're fairly sure that it can't do it whenever it wants. If it could we probably wouldn't have been able to get as far as we have so far. Azumi and Yori worked out that the most likely vector for this magic, whatever it turns out to be, is through magitech equipment in close contact with you girls. Ami's computer was probably the source for your group and we suspect Setsuna's staff did the same for the others. Hotaru's weapon seems to be from a different source and is clean as far as Yori can determine."

"Ami's computer?" She had to think about that. "Hmm. That makes a weird sort of sense. She uses that thing all the time, and we were all right next to it on a daily basis."

"Exactly. It fits." Chou seemed pleased that she'd understood so fast.

"So when Azumi killed the link to the time machine, she also stopped it being able to affect us?"

"That seems very likely. Lldnr'k and Hnther have examined it and agree with both theories. We can't totally prove it without reconnecting the link, which no one is prepared to risk, but it's almost certainly the truth."

"How do we stop it trying again, though? It might have other methods of doing the same thing."
Chou studied her for a moment, then sat next to her on the bed.

"Unfortunately, you're right, of course. The ultimate solution is clearly to destroy the time machine, which we need to do anyway, but until we manage that, we need to shield you three from it's influence. We'd like to do that to the others as well but the method that we could use for you we can't, or more accurately, won't, use on them." Chou shrugged. "We like you three and all of us feel we can trust you. We can't say the same for your former team-mates."

Grinning for a moment, Rei became more serious after a second or two. "I can understand that. I'd agree as well. Usagi was getting damn close to totally crazy before we left. Who knows what she's like now?"

A cloud passed over the blonde woman's face. "We know." At Rei's questioning look she added, "There was an incident at home. She talked Minako into what was essentially an attempt to assassinate Yori and cause considerable damage at home in the process. Tamiko and the others stopped it, then took steps to ensure both of them were somewhere that they couldn't cause any trouble until we can work out what to do. They're having a nice little camping trip by themselves on the other side of a portal."

There was a pause, then Rei started laughing. She couldn't help it. Chou waited, smiling, for her to stop, talking quietly to Hnther, apparently repeating what she'd told Rei.

"Oh, god. I'll bet she's furious."

"Furious? She's absolutely livid." Chou grinned in a somewhat predatory manner as Rei began laughing again, flopping back onto the bed.

After her laughter had wound down to mere intermittent chuckles, she sat up again, then stood. Chou did as well. "There's food outside if you're hungry." The blonde smiled as Rei nodded vigorously.

"I'm starving."

"That's not surprising, you haven't eaten anything for more than thirty-six hours now. Come on, let's get something to eat and we can tell you both what's been going on while you were... resting comfortably." Chou grinned at her, both of them following Hnther through the door.

"How much?" Rei whispered in shock, staring at Yori, then looking at her team-mates. Hotaru looked as shocked as she did, while Ami, who was clearly aware of all this already, still seemed rather amazed.

"An almost incalculable amount, to be honest." Yori frowned. "It's so valuable that it's practically impossible to put it into normal figures. Plus we still don't know the exact figure, there are all sorts of variables, like what exactly can be extracted from it, how quickly that happens, how fast it's sold off, and so on. But at a very rough estimate we're working on the basis that the amount we'd have left after S'th'kx takes his share is something like eight or nine times the entire GDP of every country on Earth at the moment." She looked amused as all three girls and Naito wore identical expressions of shock, their eyes wide. Rei nearly fainted. "Call it in the ballpark of four hundred trillion US dollars. And that's just the exotics, not the ordinary gold and heavy metals." Trying to convert that to Yen Rei gave up when she ran out of room in her head to hold all the zeros.

Azumi laughed at the way they'd all practically stopped breathing. "We tried to work it out last night and that was the best estimate we could come up with. S'th'kx thinks it could be considerably more with luck and some shrewd dealing, but even at the lowest possible figure it's simply incredible. He's sorting out test drillings and assays so we can get a more accurate idea of the likely yield and what minerals are present, which could make it more or less valuable, but let's say that money isn't a problem any more.

Finally able to speak again, Rei found she had nothing to say. Azumi filled the gap. "The economy of the K'nn grouping is vastly larger than Earth's, of course, but even here it's an absolutely astronomical amount. In one go we've practically doubled the total output of exotic elements of the entire grouping for at least the last fifty years. We're keeping it very quiet for the moment but even so there are a number of people practically falling over themselves to help us in any way they can." She grinned. "Which is nice. Something you could get used to."

Hotaru, beside Rei, giggled in a rather hysterical manner for a few seconds then lay back against the sofa, closing her eyes and slowly shaking her head. Looking at her she could understand. Ami looked very thoughtful and still stunned, while Naito seemed to have given up even trying to comprehend the value, just watching and waiting. She met his eyes and saw that even though he'd had a couple of days to absorb the news he still couldn't wrap his mind around it. She sympathised.

"So what are you going to do with it? Buy a planet and start Magical Girl World?" She smiled oddly at the others, who looked highly amused, even as Hotaru started laughing again, shaking her head helplessly. Aiko looked at Yori with a sly smile.

"See? I told you that was a good idea." The other woman sighed theatrically but grinned.

"No. We're not keeping it for ourselves. The current thought is that the vast bulk of it will be used, over time, to fund switching the energy supplies back home over to clean fusion power, buying fuel, clearing up all the polluted and contaminated sites like fission reactors, oil spills, that sort of thing. We'll have to be careful how we go about doing that, to stop the entire economy going into shock, and it's going to take years, but it opens up a huge number of possibilities. It will be a slow process because if nothing else converting the credit here into something we can apply directly at home will be a delicate matter."

"In the short term we can arrange to do things like sort out the magical girl reimbursement fund and extend it anywhere it's needed," Chou added quietly, smiling a little. "In one stroke it's made that nearly bottomless. There are all sorts of other possibilities as well to help people all over the place, not just in Japan."

"Everyone who was on the ship is also, by Krennsh law, personally entitled to a small share of the profit." Azumi smiled at them. "That includes all of you. And you, Masao." The PSIA man turned his head to stare at her, his eyes widening a little.

"Um, I can't..." She laughed.

"Of course you can. You don't have to take much if you don't want to, or you can give it away, but you still have a share. Think about it. There's no rush. We'll be setting up accounts in the K'nn interworld banking system for everyone and also one for the entire planet, which we'll put most of the profit into, so it's there when it's needed. One day, hopefully, we can open up interworld trade properly, but for the moment we'll work on the fusion stuff first."

"Uthryyl is going to fall over when we tell him," Yori snickered. Azumi and her friends laughed, nodding.

"He should probably get a commission for introducing you to S'th'kx," the silver-haired young woman suggested, an amused look on her face. Yori grinned at that.
"It was a while ago, but it's an idea. Not fifteen percent though." As she, Azumi, and Chou collapsed laughing, the others all looked at them curiously. No explanation for the joke seemed forthcoming.

"Your windfall does mean that there is no difficulty arranging any treatment for those other young women, at least from a financial standpoint," Lldnr'k said, when they had recovered enough to listen. Yori nodded, still smiling a little.

"Very true. We could have covered it anyway, but this makes it much easier." She looked at Hnther, for whom the other mage had been translating their discussion, asking him something. He looked around at everyone.

Chou took over the translation, as she had done when Rei had first met the demon. "I've made extensive enquiries into qualified therapists with experience in this type of problem, narrowing it down to two. I'm afraid that both are currently tied up but one will be free in approximately ten days, the other a few days after that. I explained the nature of the problem to them, although obviously I wasn't able to explain everything, but I could describe the basic problem and observed effect well enough. Both are appalled and more than happy to help. When I showed them my own notes and the results of my tests both were perfectly prepared to volunteer their time, although clearly that's not a problem in light of what were were discussing." He smiled a little.

"Neither one is convinced that all the affected people are completely curable, to the point that they would be back to what you three remember from some year ago, but they do think it likely that most of them can be treated well enough to reverse the bulk of the damage. Due to the nature of the memory editing, as we discussed the last time, it would be close to impossible to remove the changes without drastically affecting the underlying personalities. They agreed with me that this is undesirable except as a last resort. They're both licensed and trained in very delicate yet powerful techniques for mental editing, with extensive experience in matters not dissimilar to the problem we face, although clearly not from the same cause."

"Will we need to bring them into the security spell?" Ami asked. He nodded.

"While it might be possible that they could do the work without the background information it would make the task vastly more difficult and the outcome more uncertain. I feel it would be in everyone's best interests to allow them access to the entire story." She sighed a little, looking resigned.

"Why not? Everyone else seems to know." The demon grinned at her, making her smile back after a moment, then shake her head in disgust. "I wish none of this had happened."

"As do I. A great injustice was done to all you young women. You've handled it very well, though. With luck, we can reverse most of it and get your friends to a point they can function normally, or at least as normally as people in your line of work seem to." She laughed as he smiled slyly, fangs showing.

"Which isn't all that normal, to be honest."

"So I gather from Yori." They both looked at the other woman, who shrugged.

"Define normal. Especially with the people we know."

"Exactly my point," Hnther chuckled. Becoming more serious, he added, "Based on the new information Yori passed on, though, I'm very concerned about Setsuna and Usagi. Setsuna would appear to be suffering from some sort of progressive mental deterioration that is producing an effect not unlike a fast-progressing dementia. It's a fairly rare but not unheard of result of this type of mental tampering. I'd hoped that the work I did on her would prevent that sort of thing but I suspect I got there too late to help. We need to deal with her as fast as possible. I can most likely halt the degradation but reversing it is beyond my experience.”

"Usagi is another type of problem altogether. I had thought it possible that the repairs Yori did to her brain might have slowed or stopped the changes to her personality but again I think it was just too late to have the desired effect. From the description of her recent behaviour she would appear to have lost all her normal inhibitory controls, causing her to act in a manner that is very similar to how a true psychopath would. It's not likely to reverse itself, only progress. The aggressive attitude, dismissal of normal ethics and morals, lack of concern for and empathy to others, all fits this type of problem."

"Can it be fixed?" Naito asked curiously. The mind mage looked at him.

"I'm not sure, I'm afraid. If she was a non-magic-user, I'd say it was possible but not guaranteed. However, with her intrinsic high magic level, plus the length of time the tampering has been going on for, with all the attendant memory changes and reinforcements, it's a very difficult problem. I certainly wouldn't like to promise anything. Without studying her carefully I can't really say more than that."

"What do we do if she can't be fixed?" Hotaru asked very quietly. There was silence in the room for several seconds.

After a while, Yori looked at the girl, not appearing very happy. "We have limited choices. We can't let some angry megalomaniac magic-powered psychopath run around killing people, which is what would certainly end up happening sooner or later. She's already taken steps in that direction." Hotaru looked at Rei, then Ami, neither of whom seemed inclined to dispute the point, then nodded, her eyes downcast.

"No. You're right."

"So, as far as I can see, we only have four real possible solutions to the problem she poses. One is to cure her. That's the ideal one, but the most difficult and unlikely solution, as Hnther has said. Another is to kill her. That's easy, but an absolute last resort. I don't like saying it but we've all thought it." Everyone was silent for a moment, pondering the thought.

"That doesn't sit well with me," Naito commented in a low voice. "It's not her fault any of this happened."

"Agreed. I hate the idea as well. I don't like killing, as you know." Yori looked at him sadly. "But sometimes, you have no other choice. That's life."

When he didn't say anything else, she turned back to Hotaru. "The other two solutions I can see aren't as bad as killing her, but they're not very nice, either. One is to push her through a portal to somewhere she can't do any harm. We've more or less done exactly that at the moment but only as a short term solution. We could make it permanent."

"I'm not sure that one is any better than killing her, in most ways," Chou said heavily. "If we put her somewhere there are people she'd probably end up causing as much damage as she would at home one way or the other. We can hardly just make her someone else's problem. And if we find somewhere uninhabited but habitable, we're condemning her to a lifetime of isolation, which is absolutely horrible to think about." She looked upset. Yori moved to sit beside her, putting her arm around the taller woman and resting her head on her shoulder.
"I know. I don't like that one either. She's not exactly an outdoors type in the first place, although she's damn hard to damage, so she'd probably be fine, physically at least. Mentally is another story."

"I can't say I like that idea any more than killing her," Rei said. "What's the last idea?"

Yori released her partner and sat up straight. "It came to me last night, based on various things I've seen over the years, and discussions I've had with Hnther. As he said when we were first talking about this problem, about the only real method to undo the damage caused by the memory interference would be to erase the last few years of her memory totally, removing all the implanted false memories along with the real ones, then let her basically grow up again. It would be difficult to do because of her inherent magic but not impossible. With some luck her underlying personality would eventually rebuild itself into a person similar to what she should have been all along. It wouldn't be the same Usagi, but it would be a sane Usagi. We can't remove her magical abilities but we could suppress them for a while, so that by the time she was in a position to use them again she'd hopefully be a decent person, not the nightmare she's becoming."

Rei listened with a sinking heart, not liking that idea either, but unable to deny it might be the only way. "If we added an age regression spell to reset her physically to the same age her memories would match, which I know at least one method to achieve, there wouldn't be any conflicts that would cause her to realise something was wrong." Yori looked around at the others. Hnther was listening with interest while Lldnr'k was slowly nodding, rubbing his beak in thought. "It's harsh, in some ways you could still say we'd killed Usagi, the person she is now, but most of her would live, one way or the other."

"What about her family?" Ami asked, scowling. "As far as I know none of them have any idea about her. She's been a total shit to her brother for some time, but treats her mother and father fairly well. I guess they've probably seen a difference, even though she seems much worse when she's powered up, and reserves most of her more... excessive... mood swings and arrogance for times like that. They're going to notice if she's suddenly twelve again and can't remember the last six years. So will other people."

Yori sighed heavily. "That's one of the big problems, true enough. We can hardly edit their memories to make it all match, we'd be perpetrating a crime as large as the one that got us into this problem in the first place, never mind that it's not just them, it's her friends, neighbours, acquaintances, you name it. It's the sort of thing that rapidly turns into a total nightmare with no real way to be sure you got everything. The only thing I can think of is to tell her family about it."

As Ami opened her mouth, the woman raised her hand.

"Not about all of it. We'd keep you and the others out of the whole thing, and most of the backstory, but we should still be able to explain enough to make them understand the issue. If they agreed, we could arrange to move them somewhere else, change names, faces, all the records, and let them start over. Eventually, when Usagi got to the point that her magic started to become obvious, which it inevitably would, we could arrange to make sure she learned how to use it correctly." The martial artist looked around at the room full of people. "It's horribly complicated and involved, I know, and there are a number of major problems with it, but it's all I've got other than cure, exile, or death."

No one spoke for some time as they thought about it.

"An extreme solution but most likely an effective one, albeit difficult to pull off," Lldnr'k finally responded, studying her. "I am forced to agree I'm unable to think of any real faults with your analysis of the problem and the list of possible actions. We are quite limited in what can be done at "Curing her is certainly the avenue I would prefer to explore first," Hnther said through Chou. "As you describe it, she is in a position that she's unlikely to cause trouble from for some time, so at least that aspect of it is contained. Isolation from the influence of the time device may have a beneficial effect on her mind, although without further study that's difficult to be sure of. Would it be possible to inspect her without her knowledge?"

"Yes, that should be easy enough." Yori smiled slightly. "We can sneak up on her and drop her whenever we want, then our cloaking technique can deal with her short-term memory. She won't realise we've done anything if we're careful."

The mind mage looked pleased. "In that case, my suggestion would be to let me examine her mind as soon as possible, so I can get a better idea of what's going on at the moment, then pass it on to the therapists. With some luck they can suggest modifications that can be made to improve her attitude, which combined with removing her from where she can be further affected by the device, might just be enough to set her on the course to a cure. Even a small amount would help. If we can get her into a state where she can be reasoned with, in any manner, we might be able to get her to agree to therapy. That would make the likelihood of a true cure vastly more likely. Doing it against her will is unlikely to produce a permanent beneficial effect and could well create permanent personality damage."

"That's certainly worth trying," Yori told him, cheering up a little. Rei felt considerable relief, tempered with the knowledge that it was a long shot.

"What about the others?" she asked. "Minako, Makoto, and Michiru. And Haruka."

"Minako is safe enough where she is for the time being," Azumi replied, looking mildly amused. "She'll keep. From what the others told us she was somewhat reluctant to go along with Usagi in the first place, which might well mean she's not as far down the path to the dark side." Hotaru giggled at this, even though she looked upset. Smiling at her, Azumi added, "Michiru is being amazingly paranoid, but at least she's staying put. Makoto is enjoying herself chastising criminals. Neither of them seems too much of a risk right now but we'll certainly have to keep a close eye on them. As long as we keep all of them separated, or at least keep Michiru and Makoto away from Haruka, hopefully nothing serious will happen."

"Haruka is clearly suffering from depression amongst other issues," Yori added. "We need to keep an eye on that as well. Hotaru, I hope you'll help?"

"Of course I will. I still love her," the girl said, sadness on her face. "I want her to be happy." She thought for a moment. "Do you think telling her about the Moon will help? If she sees proof that you and Chou were right, that will make her believe you, right?" Rei watched the hopeful look on her face with a smile, as did everyone else.

Yori sighed, shrugging very slightly, then smiled. "I hope so, Hotaru. All we can do is go over it with her. Although she listened to us, I'm still not sure she's flexible enough to handle proof of the story we told her. She may just be hoping we're wrong and going along with it to keep us quiet and off her back."

"She's better than that," the young purple-haired girl assured the other woman. Looking amused Yori nodded to her.

"With luck you're right. You know her a lot better than I do. Anyway, that's the current state of affairs. The others are watching everyone and will let us know if anything happens, by getting a message to Uthryyl who will come and tell us. We're also waiting for some custom hardware for Masao, as well as some paperwork about the asteroid claim, security for it, things like that, which means that either Chou or I need to stay here for a little while in any case. We might as well all stay and do a little exploring, some swimming, perhaps go to the space elevator restaurant. Does that sound good?" Yori looked around at the other people, who thought about the suggestion for various periods of time.

Hotaru was nodding before she'd finished speaking, Rei noticed with amusement. Ami and Azumi were clearly agreeable as well. Eventually everyone had agreed. Lldnr'k spoke up.

"While I would like to stay for a while, I will have to return fairly soon to do some further research on this 'key' you mentioned," he said. "It rings a very vague bell, I think I might have come across some reference to it at some point in the past, although the details escape me for the moment." He studied Yori and her friends. "Do you think you can obtain it?"

Yori glanced at Ami, who shrugged slightly, then looked back to the temporal mage. "It might take a bit of work but yes, we should be able to get it. We're almost a hundred percent certain it's built into Setsuna's staff, which we need to acquire anyway, as it seems likely that it's what the time device is using to get at her and her sub-group. But it might take some effort. It depends on how we approach her, which I haven't decided yet. As soon as we do get it, though, I'll bring it to you."

The mage nodded thoughtfully. "Good. With enough examples we may be able to understand the spell and block it from access to the other girls, and hopefully find out how it's getting into their minds in the first place. Something about all of this troubles me. The persistence of it seems... I don't know, I can't quite explain it, but it's not something I've seen before. Whatever method is in use is something I haven't previously encountered."

"I still fail to understand it either," Hnther told him via Chou. "The manipulations are very subtle, although not the best I've ever seen, but I'm unsure how they're being performed."

"I will have to think some more about it," Lldnr'k replied, rubbing his beak in thought. "It's an interesting and worrying problem." He looked around at them. "You three are safe here, certainly, the machine can't possibly access you across realities this far separated from it. Even managing to access you from its own sub-reality is an impressive feat although by no means unheard of. Usagi and Minako aren't currently in further danger either. But the rest of them can certainly still be affected. If Setsuna's staff is indeed a relay, removing it from play should help, although I very much suspect it won't prevent the device performing further manipulations by other methods. It might give a breathing space, though, while it works out its next action."

"The thing I'm wondering," Naito said, causing them all to turn to him, "is at what point does it decide that we've stopped it, give up, and reset for another try? Sooner or later by the sound of it you'll have cut it off from its unsuspecting agents. What does it do then?" There was an uncomfortable silence for a while.

"That is a worry, certainly." Lldnr'k didn't look happy. "Eventually it will certainly loop again but we have no idea what the parameters it uses for determining a failed attempt are. If we don't stop it before then, it will be too late. The result of a loop would in all likelihood cause a deletion of your current time line, possibly triggering a reality reset, which would erase your entire home reality. That is certainly a very undesirable outcome." He snapped his beak in amusement as Naito went white. "We will do our best to stop that happening," he added.

"I'd prefer that, to be honest," the PSIA agent told him weakly.

"There is considerable evidence that it has a very high threshold for considering an attempt as a failure," the temporal mage said after a second or two, during which everyone looked worried. "The temporally isolated possible future that we have information on shows that, as is taking an action as drastic as an attempted asteroid strike on the planet. That's a very large manipulation, which it clearly decided was worth the risk, both of killing its own agents or simply causing the multiverse to take steps. Personally I feel it may well keep trying until there is absolutely no chance at all that it can get any further with this sequence, or possibly until reality resets itself. Being in its own sub-reality it is isolated to a significant degree from damage to the main one, although destroying your reality completely, as happened to its own home strand, would also delete any sub-realities. With luck that means it won't arbitrarily decide to reset out of the blue although we can't take that for granted."

"Destroying the damn thing as soon as possible is the best action we can take," Aiko said, speaking for the first time, from where she was standing by the window, Azumi beside her. The temporal mage glanced at her, nodding agreement.

"I would agree. I would also suggest that, as formidable as your own abilities are, you take no chances and use the method suggested of a large antimatter warhead. More than one, ideally. Blow the god's-cursed thing to ions. It it far too dangerous to risk doing an incomplete job." Lldnr'r spoke with passion, looking angry. "Too many people have died, inconceivable numbers of them, to allow it to exist any longer than we can arrange." Everyone looked at him for a while, then Yori nodded agreement.

"All right. I'll make arrangements to acquire the weapons."

"One last thing." Lldnr'r produced a small spindly device from somewhere. "This is a prototype of a device I designed that should allow the detection of any temporal manipulation caused by the time machine. It's very crude, I'm still working on it, but I believe it will work well enough to at least give you warning that something is being done. That won't necessarily mean you can prevent it, of course, but you will know, which could be useful." He handed it to Yori, who inspected it with interest. "The spells and magitech are pulled together from a number of sources and need considerable refinement, but the basic theory is sound. If the machine does anything dramatic it won't help much although it should allow detection of small interventions." He had a quick discussion with Yori in that demonic language, explaining the operation of the thing, Rei assumed, then took it back from her. "It's not quite ready for use but I'll have it finished in about a day or so. When it's done I'll make a number of them for you and get them to you."

"Thanks, Lldnr'r," she told him, smiling. "That should certainly help."

"I hope so. The evidence suggests the device is unable to perform serious manipulations directly, so with luck you'll mainly only have to deal with small changes, most likely to people's motivations and goals, but even that is more than enough to eventually produce some serious repercussions." He shrugged. "We're working on very limited information at the moment, which isn't helping. I've been researching it since we last spoke, as well as calling in assistance, but we've been unable to find out very little more than we already had so far. It was just too long ago. I also have a feeling, although no way to prove it, that at some point some entity has deliberately attempted to erase as much of the remaining information on the device as possible. A long time ago, most likely."

"The time machine itself?" Ami asked curiously. The mage turned his attention to her.

"I don't know. Possibly, although it would have had to act through agents, I think, but it may have been someone else. It might not have been a malicious action, either, the idea may have been to remove any data that could lead to a repeat of the event at some future point. If so, I'm not sure it is the best approach. Knowing how dangerous it is with all the gory details would seem to me to be a "Better deterrent than hiding it."

"People tend to panic about things like this," Naito said, "even at home, with events that are far less apocalyptic, information gets manipulated to hide causes, results, and people."

"Indeed. I understand that, but at the moment it's something of a nuisance," Lldnr'k replied, sighing a little, "Oh well. We'll keep looking. If we succeed in destroying it none of that will matter anyway, and if we don't..."

"None if it will matter to us," Azumi completed the thought, frowning. He nodded heavily.

"True. Let's hope we succeed."

After a long pause, Chou looked around, then got up. "Come on, let's go out and explore. It will cheer everyone up." Everyone followed as she left the room, talking amongst themselves.

Squinting slightly, Minako looked back at her tent, a dot in the distance, then upwards at the peak of the mountain she was half-way up the side of. Resting for a moment she closed her eyes, breathing steadily, before pulling out a bottle of water and drinking half of it. She'd decided that she wanted proof that there was nothing else in the area, picking the highest peak and beginning climbing it. Even for a magical girl of her level it was annoyingly hard work, the thing was very close to vertical, without much in the way of hand-holds. Without even basic equipment she was forced to do it the hard way, punching her hands into the rock and pulling herself up. The first few hundred metres had been easy enough as she could jump from ledge to ledge like a mountain goat but when she got above that level the mountain became much less craggy and rough, leaving little to hold on to.

Putting her left hand into a small crack in the rock and making a fist, which anchored her well, she leaned out to get a better view of the next few hundred metres, plotting the best route. Glancing down she shivered a little, even though she knew she'd survive if she fell, she wasn't at all happy about heights, not to mention it would certainly hurt.

Taking another swig from her bottle she put it away and resumed climbing, angling to the right where the going looked slightly easier. The blonde estimated that it would take over an hour to reach the top from where she was. "Then I have to get back down again, which is going to be fun," she mumbled to herself, pushing her fingers into a crack with a crunching sound. "But I have to do this. It would suck if it turned out there was a city on the other side of this and I spent weeks only kilometres away from it in a damn tent."

"Do you really think that Tamiko and the others would have set you up like that?" a familiar voice sounded from her right. She sighed, glancing sideways.

"Didn't I leave you at the tent, Artemis?" she enquired. The feline advisor, perched on a small outcropping, grinned at her in his own annoying way.

"You did. I felt lonely so I came after you."

She sighed again. Looking down she raised an eyebrow. "How the hell did you climb up here anyway?" she asked. He shrugged, which looked odd coming from a cat.

"That's what claws are for."

"Fair enough. Now, shut up, while I do this next bit. It's tricky." Ignoring the animal she moved sideways, then up, very careful not to let go with more than one limb at a time. Small rocks rattled Saburo stepped out into the waiting room of his veterinary practice, his eyes on his clipboard, flipping to the next page. "Ah. Mr Ishikawa, please, if you could foll..." Lifting his eyes from the paperwork he looked around, puzzled, becoming aware that the room was strangely silent. The half-dozen people in it were, with one exception, pressed up at the far end, as far away from that exception as they could get, staring wide-eyed at him. Their various animals were also exhibiting all the signs of terror, one small dog cowering under a chair, having left a number of yellow puddles behind, two cats in a wire carrier staring motionless at the old man, a very large dog he knew for a fact to be extremely aggressive if provoked shivering and intermittently whining, all of them looking at Mr Ishikawa, who was totally unaware of the scrutiny, as he stroked the...

'What the fuck is that?' Saburo thought to himself, also staring in horrified shock. The old man tickled the large ears, making the thing they were attached to give a low growl of pleasure, leaning against his legs and appearing contented. 'And where in god's name did he get it? The teeth!' Large yellow-gold eyes, contrasting against dark, almost black fur, with hints of deep blue and green showing when it moved in quick jerky motions, turned to look at him. He flinched at the odd triangular pupils, which contracted slightly, then expanded in interest. A long tail twitched, wrapping around almost monkey-like paws, although with claws that looked like they'd been stolen from a large cat. It made a small noise as it licked its lips, its mouth much too big for the size of the head, while it cocked its head to one side, blinking. The large pointed ears moved around, one aiming at the big dog which whimpered, the other one listening to the elderly man who was talking nonsense to it, while rubbing its head, something Saburo decided you couldn't possibly pay him enough to do.

The teeth!

There were way too many of them. Long, obviously razor-sharp, somewhat translucent fangs stuck out in copious quantities, even when the thing's mouth was closed. It looked like the business end of a particularly dangerous industrial shredder. One that was clearly alert, yet relaxed and apparently happy.

'And', he thought wildly to himself, checking the paperwork again to be sure he'd read the information there correctly, 'not a dog!'. What it was he had absolutely no idea, other than from somewhere a damn sight further away than the local pound, but other than that...

Mr Ishikawa looked up, finally noticing him. "Oh, hello, doctor, are we next?" He struggled to his feet, bracing himself on the animal, which didn't seem to mind. "Come on, boy, let's get you checked over. Why, you could have worms, or fleas, living on the street isn't a nice thing." He happily toddled past the frozen vet, into the examination room, the animal placidly following him, while Saburo watched, only his eyes moving. As soon as the waiting room was clear there was a discreet yet vehement stampede towards the door, leaving the room empty in seconds. He turned his head to meet the wide eyes of his secretary, who was shivering a little.

"Do you happen to know any magical girls?" he asked faintly. She shook her head. "Pity."

"Doctor? Do you want me to put him on the table?" The slightly croaky voice of his customer made him twitch violently. Closing his eyes for a moment he issued a few prayers to any passing god, wondering whether he should just run, before taking a deep breath and turning toward the door. "No! Bad boy. Stop eating that chair!" There was a sound reminiscent of a rolled-up magazine meeting a furry head, the crunching noises that had started seconds earlier stopping... suddenly. He twitched again, then very slowly went into the examination room. Behind him, his secretary picked up her coat and purse, looked around, then left quickly, deciding it was lunch time.

"FUCK!"

The scream echoed across the barren landscape as Usagi slipped again, bouncing twenty metres down the side of the cliff to land on the ground. She lay on her back, muttering to herself and rubbing her head, staring up at the landscape which seemed to be mocking her. She'd decided that she should climb to the top and look around, but was having a very hard time, as this was the fifth time she'd fallen. Laughter made her slowly turn her head and glare viciously, while the feline face looking at her from a metre away smirked.

"I told you it was a bad idea. You haven't got any experience in climbing and you rushed it. Again. Why not try that one over there, it looks easier." The cat pointed with a paw.

Usagi sighed, sitting up and brushing herself down. "I want to climb this one," she told the animal petulantly. "It's the tallest."

"And the steepest, and the most difficult." The cat shook its head, jumping sideways as she threw a rock at it. "Try the other one. Or, and this is a much better idea, go back to your tent and relax. You're getting all wound up again."

Hopping to her feet and glaring at it, she screamed, "I'm not getting all wound up you furry little bastard!" She turned to look up at the cliff. "I'm going to climb that thing if it kills me."

"It probably will at this rate," the voice from behind her said. When she turned around again, the cat was gone. Sighing, she irritably shook her head, then began climbing again.

"FUCK!"

The echoes took some time to fade.

"This place is amazing," Hotaru shouted happily, diving into the water. When she popped to the surface she shook her head, her long hair spraying water around. A few metres away Azumi laughed, glancing at Ami beside her on what looked for all the world like a completely natural rock outcropping near the ocean, even though they were inside.

"It's pretty damn good, that's for sure," the silver-haired woman said, grinning. "I felt the same thing when I first saw it a while ago. Even now I'm very impressed."

"There are fish in here and everything," the younger woman exclaimed, peering into the crystal-clear water at the brightly coloured life swimming around her legs. She didn't recognise any of it, some looked extremely odd, yet all of it seemed safe and was very pretty.

"Yep. Some of them are engineered to clean the water, others are just nice to look at, but it's a complete biome, even if it's artificial." Ami was scanning everything while kicking her legs in the warm water, looking impressed.

"This really is one of the most incredible things I've ever seen," the blue-head said, looking up, then around at the scenery. She watched with a grin as Hoter went past on something very similar to a windsurf board, leaning far over against the pull of the sail, the tip of his tail dragging in the water leaving a wake. Beyond him she could see Yori and Chou swimming side by side at considerable speed towards a small island several hundred meters out, while Naito was floating on his back with a grin on his face, holding a glass of some sort of drink on his chest with a long straw looping up and into his mouth. Rei was talking to Aiko as they lounged on the sand, both also drinking something alcoholic.

"The simulation is remarkable effective," she added, looking at her computer. "I can barely tell where the reality ends and the projections starts, even with this."

"The Krennsh like their relaxation but this city is a long way from the shore," Azumi told her, looking amused and relaxed, then picked another of the spiky blue snacks off the plate next to her and ate it. Swallowing, she continued, "This is apparently one of the largest waterparks in the city.
There's an even bigger one on the other side, but I haven't been to it yet. They use it for more extreme sports like surfing, I'm told it can produce waves up to about ten metres high. I'd like to see it at some point. Sounds pretty impressive."

"Can you surf?" Hotaru asked curiously, swimming over to them and treading water. Azumi grinned.

"A little. I haven't done it for a while. Yori is pretty good at it."

"I'd like to try that," the purple-haired girl said thoughtfully. "It always looks like fun on TV." She jumped as something brushed against her leg, looking into the water, then following the aquatic creature with her eyes. After a second or two she looked back to the others. "I want to try those water-slides on the other side. Do you want to come with me?" Both exchanged glances, then nodded.

"Sounds fun." Bending, Ami helped her friend out of the water, then all three headed off, Azumi finishing the snacks and dropping the plate into a discreetly disguised recycler on the way.

Staring at what was left of his stethoscope, Saburo paled. In front of him Mr Ishikawa's new little friend swallowed with a pleased expression. "Um. Well, he seems healthy, as far as I can tell. No problems with his appetite at least." He glanced at the remains of the fairly solid steel and plastic chair in the corner, which was missing a leg and part of the seat, wincing slightly. The old man on the other side of the table chuckled, watching his pet in foggy pleasure.

"He likes biscuits, I found out. And he seems happy enough to eat scraps. I suppose after living on the street for however long he was doing that any real food is a luxury." The vet stared at the other man wordlessly for several seconds before shaking his head slightly, turning away to retrieve a thermometer.

"Now, if you could hold his tail up for a moment, I'll just.." There was a short silence, broken by a sizzling sound. "Hmm. That's... a little... unusual." He looked at the remains of the thermometer which seemed to be slowly melting, then back at the animal, who was giving him an unfriendly look. "OK. I don't think we need to try that again," he added, running a finger around his collar.
Dropping the thermometer into the sink and turning the water on, he jumped as there was a sharp pop followed by a small cloud of greenish vapour, coughing a little as he waved it away. Mr Ishikawa smiled.

"Do you think he's got any parasites?" he asked. Saburo stared at him, then at the creature, which he was becoming increasingly sure hadn't originated anywhere near Japan. Or Earth, probably.

"No," he replied honestly. "I very much doubt anything I've ever come across could survive inside this, um, dog." He emphasised the last word, hoping yet again that the old man would take the hint. No such luck. Mr Ishikawa bent over a little and hugged the animal to his chest, causing it to look pleased and the vet to step back, slightly alarmed and flinching. "Where did you get him?"

"The poor little thing was abandoned in an alley near my home," Mr Ishikawa explained, still cuddling the thing, "he was so hungry, poor dear. We got to know each other then I took him home. He seems happy enough." Releasing the thing he straightened up, inspecting the beast through his thick glasses, frowning slightly. "I still can't work out what breed he is, though. None of my books show anything quite like him. If he is a him." He glanced at the vet, who shrugged. He had absolutely no idea how to even check and wasn't keen on experimenting. "Oh well. He feels like a he to me, so he probably is."

"Have you got a name yet?" Saburo asked, feeling foolish, but unable to think of anything else to say. It didn't seem likely that screaming and running in terror was very helpful although it seemed a good plan B. The elderly man smiled happily.

"Yes. I'm going to call him Kin, I think, after the beautiful colour of his eyes. Aren't they amazing?"

"Ah, yes, I suppose they are." Shivering as those eyes met his, he backed away another step. "I can't think of anything else to check. You can put him down again now."

"Come on, Kin, jump down, there's a good boy," Mr Ishikawa said, coaxing the thing to the edge of the table. It glanced at him, then the vet, before dropping soundlessly to the floor and sitting next to the old man, who beamed. "So obedient as well. He learns very fast. What a good dog." Bending down he handed the animal a biscuit he'd pulled from his pocket, making Saburo stare as those horrible teeth snapped mere centimetres from his fingers. "How much do I owe you, Doctor?"

"Oh, forget it, please. I wouldn't dream of charging in this case." Saburo waved him towards the door from as far away as he could get. "I'm just glad that, um, Kin, is healthy and that you seem happy." His customer led his creature into the waiting room.

"That's very good of you, Doctor, thank you very much indeed. Should I make an appointment for a check-up?" Looking around the totally empty room he added, "Business seems a little slow at the moment. It must be the holidays."

"I think you probably don't need to worry about a regular check-up, Mr Ishikawa," Saburo assured him nervously. He glanced at the empty desk where his secretary should be, envying the woman her absence. "If you have any emergencies, you can arrange a vet then. Not me, though, I'm going on holiday very soon and I don't know when I'll be back. I can recommend a good alternative." He rummaged through his secretary's desk, coming up with a card, which he handed to the old man. "Here you go. Try these people if you have a problem. They're very good." Slightly guiltily he added to himself, 'And I hate that bastard. See how he likes treating a demon or whatever the hell that thing is.'

Accepting the card his customer tucked it safely away in his inside pocket. "Thank you, Doctor. Enjoy your holiday." He looked mistily around again. "Hopefully business will pick up when you get back. Good bye." He and the animal left, the creature taking a bite out of the door on the way through, chewing loudly as it trotted off. Mr Ishikawa apparently didn't notice.

Slumping into one of the waiting-room seats Saburo stared at the damaged door, his heart racing, sweating horribly. After a few minutes he got up, phoning his travel agent and booking a holiday in the Caribbean, having suddenly decided that it sounded like a very good idea to leave the country for a while. Possibly permanently.
Naito watched the girls shooting out of the end of the waterslide, landing over ten metres out in the warm water with huge splashes, grinning to himself. He took another sip of the remarkably good drink, not something he'd ever come across before but something he was becoming inordinately fond of. Beside him, Chou laughed, also watching. "They seem to be enjoying themselves, don't they, Masao?" she asked.

"They certainly do. Hotaru more than any of them." He laughed as the purple-haired young woman jumped on Rei from behind, pushing her under the surface, then quickly swam off before her friend recovered, the other woman spluttering and shouting before giving chase. "She seems well considering everything that's happened."

"I hoped that this distraction would help her," the blonde agreed quietly. "The poor girl has had a hard life, which the last couple of days haven't aided much. It's a good thing she can't remember everything that happened to her, especially the injuries." He glanced sideways at her for a moment before going back to watching the others.

"Is it possible you might have... helped that to happen?" he asked, both curious and amused. She coughed momentarily.

"It's not impossible, certainly. There is a chance that we might have had some influence on the more distressing memories." He looked at her again, seeing she was smiling a little.

"Good. I wouldn't want to remember that sort of thing either." Shivering for a moment he remembered the damaged eye and all the other injuries Hotaru had suffered when the drive unit exploded.

"We only tweaked it a little," Chou explained after sipping her own drink. "There was sufficient trauma, coupled with the mental tampering, that her memories would have been rather cloudy and confused anyway. Hnther helped correct that as much as he could but there are parts of it that are gone for good. Luckily not the lunar exploration experience, though. It would be a terrible shame for her not to remember that, she had so much fun."

"The girl certainly seems to be making the most of this trip, all things considered," Aiko said as she came up behind them. Both looked over their shoulders at her, Naito nodding a greeting.

"Definitely. Ami and Rei seem to be having fun as well, although Ami is also studying everything in sight," Naito laughed.

"She does that," the short brunette giggled, sitting on his other side. "It's sort of an obsession."

"Where are Azumi and Yori?" he asked curiously.

"Yori went off to talk to a trader she knows, to check something. Azumi went with her. They'll be back in an hour or so." Aiko held out a tray of the spiky blue snacks, which he and Chou both helped themselves to. "Azumi was also going to get a lot more of these, she's practically addicted to them."

"They're very nice," he replied, popping one into his mouth. "I can understand that." The trio sat in companionable silence for a while, watching the three girls on the slides. Hnther went past a couple of times, apparently having a wonderful time, waving as he did so. Looking around at all the Krensh splashing around, and a number of other species interspersed among them, Naito finally shook his head in wonder and laughed. "This is just amazing. It's like something from a movie, but done much better. I'd never have believed, a week ago, that I'd ever experience anything
"When I first encountered this sort of place it took me by surprise as well, Masao," Chou assured him, smiling gently. "You tend to get used to it to some degree but even now, after some years, I still find it very interesting. Not all worlds are this cosmopolitan or welcoming, but quite a few are. The Krennsh are very nice people, more than accommodating, with a huge amount of trade between realities, so a lot of different species come through here and one or two of the other K'n'nn worlds. K'n'nn four is the main hub, though. K'n'nn nine is a wonderful place if you want to get away from people. We went there on our holiday, only for a few days, but it was very relaxing."

"Fwetna is nice as well," Aiko interjected, sipping a drink a small flying machine had brought her moments earlier. He looked at her with an eyebrow up. "That's the world Uthryyl comes from. We went there as well. It's very pretty, with nice people. Nothing like as frantic as K'n'nn four, the population of the planet is probably only about the same as two decent sized cities here, but it's a very nice place. I'd like to go back for longer one day."

"There are some interesting animals there, the scenery is beautiful, and the food is amazing," Chou added, smiling at her memories.

"You girls certainly get around," he snickered, finishing his drink. Looking around he couldn't see anywhere to put it. Aiko grinned at him, taking his empty container, then flipping it into the air. A small machine appeared out of nowhere, grabbed it, then whizzed off. He gaped, before laughing. "Amazing."

"High-tech worlds are fun," she agreed, disposing of her empty as well. "I'm going swimming again." Hopping up she ran into the water, heading across in the direction of the waterslides. He watched for a moment, then relaxed, closing his eyes, a smile on his face.

Minako turned around again, before sighing. The top of the mountain had a fairly flat spot she could stand and look around from, giving a truly spectacular view, but not one that filled her with hope. Jagged peaks stretched off in every direction as far as she could see, a few scattered clouds in the sky off to the west being the only non-monochromatic colour visible to her, illuminated a faint, slightly eerie blue-green from the sun, which was getting fairly low in the sky. She estimated that the day length here was around twenty-two hours. Walking to the edge she peered in the direction of her tent, which was visible as a tiny green dot far below.

"Not a lot of places to go," the cat at her feet said, making her twitch.

"Damn it, don't sneak up like that," she growled, looking at it in irritation. The thing looked up at her with what she could swear was amusement although it was covered up quickly. "Where did you get to? I thought you'd gone back down."

"I was looking around," it said, then yawned. "You don't have much time to get back down. Once the sun goes down far enough the mountains will block the light. Climbing in the dark will be difficult." She was forced to agree. Looking around once more she sighed again, as it was blatantly obvious that where she was, as barren as it was, most likely was the only place around that had food, water and shelter. Grumbling about the ancestry of several people, especially Usagi for getting her into this situation, she retraced her steps, swung herself over the side, then slowly and carefully began the long climb back to ground level.

Limping towards her tent Usagi sneezed. "Fuck it, now a cold as well?" she complained grumpily. Her clothes were dusty and torn, her left arm scraped raw, and she'd twisted her right knee in the last fall, which had been from a sufficient height that most people would have died. Having had the foresight to power up before beginning her efforts was the only thing that kept her from more serious injury. The blonde knew she’d be fine in a day or so but at the moment was cold, hungry, angry, and in pain. Glancing around she couldn’t see any sign of Luna, which suited her fine for the time being. The so called ‘advisor’ had been giving her advice all day that made her want to pick it up and punt it as far as she could.

Idly wondering where it was, and how it had got there in the first place, she dismissed the thought when she got close to the tent. Rummaging through the box that contained miscellaneous supplies she found a bottle of aspirin, opening it and gulping down three of the tablets, before following them with a swig of water. Still muttering obscenities to herself on the theme of what she’d do to everyone involved in her being in this situation, she went into the tent, zipped it up, then huddled over the heater.
Chapter 77

When I posted this chapter, I realised to my embarrassment that I had somehow managed to miss a previous chapter, which was fairly critical to the whole story:(

If you got confused, my apologies.

It is now in its correct place as chapter 75. I would suggest that if you missed it, you go back and reread from that point. Otherwise things may be confusing.

"Should we do something?"

Tamiko glanced at Misaki, who finished her chocolate bar, then back at the old man wandering along the street below them with a small demon on a leash, talking happily to it. The thing was looking around in an apparently relaxed yet alert manner, one ear cocked towards the elderly man, and on occasion would nibble something it passed. Behind them she could see signs with bites out of them, a motorcycle missing half the front wheel, and a sadly sagging mail box with a set of toothmarks on the steel post holding it up. She rubbed her forehead between her eyes, sighing softly.

"Oh, god. This is..."

Fumiko, on her other side, laughed quietly. "This is weird even for us."

"Yes. That." The red-head watched as the demon snapped at a cat which had wandered too close, causing it to screech, hiss, then run for its life. Watching it go the demon made no attempt to follow, merely turning its attention back to the man on the other end of the lead. It looked up at them for a moment, clearly aware they were there, although Mr Ishikawa was oblivious, then went back to walking along beside him as easily as if it had been leash-trained from birth.

"How the hell did he get a lead on it do you think?" Fumiko asked. Both the others shrugged helplessly.

"I have absolutely no idea. It's insane. Those little bastards have never been anything other than chaos personified, yet he's talking one for a walk?" Tamiko shook her head in disbelief.

"He took it to the vet yesterday," Misaki commented, grinning. "Now the practice is closed. Apparently the vet went on a very sudden holiday."

"That doesn't surprise me at all," her friend said with acid irritation in her voice. She watched the elderly demon-walker go on his way. "Oh, fuck it, the thing isn't doing any harm at the moment, aside from some minor property damage. We may as well leave it alone, unless it does something serious. The poor man loved that amazingly annoying little dog, perhaps this will cheer him up and stop him calling the police five times a day wanting them to arrest Chiyoko. We'll just keep an eye on it to make sure nothing bad happens."

Fumiko looked at her sister over their shorter friend's head for a moment. "Are you sure? They're not exactly safe, you know, those little bastards might be small but they seem to be able to eat anything. If it gets annoyed it could do some serious harm to the old guy in seconds."

Tamiko sighed again. "True, but it seems pretty happy, all things considered. If it was going to do something horrible it probably would have done it already, like when he tried putting a collar on the damn thing. I have no idea how he even managed to do that. But look at it now!" She waved a hand helplessly at the distant figures as they turned into the street leading back to the apartment Mr Ishikawa lived in. "I've seen police dogs that weren't as obedient as that."

"Very strange indeed," Misaki muttered, her arms crossed and one foot on the peak of the roof they were standing on. "You certainly see some odd things in Minato but a demon on a lead is a first for me."

"Me too. Oh well." Tamiko shrugged once more. "They seem happy enough. We'll have to make sure Chiyoko doesn't go after it. Not that she's likely to hit the thing in the first place but the collateral damage could be bad. It normally is. I've got to teach that girl to shoot straight at some point."

"We should arrange to make sure all this damage is sorted out," Fumiko said after a pause, pointing at the mail-box, which picked that moment to creak loudly and fall over. She blinked a few times, then glanced at her hand, before lowering it again. "The fund can certainly absorb the costs now, money isn't a problem any more, not with that asteroid."

"Very true." Tamiko looked at her friends. "I still can't believe that. But I guess we can afford to make one old man happy." She giggled after a few seconds. "I'll bet he's not in any danger of getting mugged now."

All three girls shared a look, roared with laughter, then went on their way.

"Here you go, Ami," Yori said, turning to the other woman, who was staring around the warehouse with wide eyes. She looked at the petite girl, then at the box in her hand. "One projector. Complete with charger, magic converter, and some blank data crystals. I got the instructions translated for you as well, they're in the box with everything else."

Accepting the box she examined it, quickly working out how to open it, then inspected the contents. The projector was a surprisingly small black device, made of something that reminded her of the spacesuit generators, with a square depression in the top she realised was the right size for the data crystal Yori had given her after the moon mission. "Thanks, Yori."

"No problem. You should easily be able to interface to it with your computer and control it from that, if you want, but the controls work the same way as the one on the ship." She grinned. "Enjoy."

"I think I will," she replied, also smiling. "I wonder if I can figure out how to use it with a DVD player?"

"Probably, they're remarkably flexible." Yori glanced over to the person they'd been introduced to as T'kl'it, who had called something to her. "I'll be back in a few minutes." She went off with the alien, leaving the others to look around.

"This place is incredible," Rei mumbled, walking over to her while looking around, Hotaru and Azumi with her. Aiko, Chou, Hnther, and Naito were wandering around looking at things down at the other end of the enormous space. "There's a shelf back there, an absolutely huge one, with half a dozen small spacecraft on it!" She looked around again, shaking her head in wonder. "I've never seen anything even close to this amount of stuff in one place before."

"T'kl'it is a major trader, he's got contacts all over the place and does a lot of interworld business," Azumi told them.
"Like your friend Uthryyl?" Hotaru asked curiously. The silver-haired woman nodded.

"More or less. I think Uthryyl's business is larger, though. He and T'kl'it are old friends. He introduced me to T'kl'it last time I was here, but I think Yori already knew him from a previous trip. He's a nice guy." She looked off to one side, then laughed. "Look over there." They followed her pointing finger to a pair of large cube-shaped containers with various labels on them in some alien script, including something a lot like a remarkably complex version of a bar-code.

"What are they?" Rei asked, as they went closer. Azumi read the label, nodding to herself.

"Fusion reactors like the ones Uthryyl sells. I think these are an older model though. The part number is slightly different."

"They're that small?" Ami was staggered. "How much energy does one that size produce?"

"These are the little ten megawatt class units, which I believe are the smallest that particular company produces. From what I read in the documentation it's about the smallest size that's efficient enough to make it worth doing. Apparently you can get even smaller ones but they become rather pointless below these dimensions except for very specific and unusual applications. Bigger is much easier, they go up to several gigawatts at least."

"Wow. That's amazing." Experimentally, she tried lifting one of the units, finding that the crate shifted more easily than she expected. "Oops," she squeaked, as Azumi grabbed it to keep it on the shelf. Carefully pushing it back into position they looked guiltily around, then grinned at each other.

"Perhaps we should leave them alone," Azumi suggested. Hotaru started giggling as Rei sighed slightly. She put her hand on her friend's shoulder.

"Come on, Ami, before you break something."

They headed off to join Chou and the others, Ami looking over her shoulder at the crates, then at Azumi, who snickered. By the time they reached the rest of their party all four of them were laughing. "What's so funny?" Aiko queried. Ami shook her head.

"You'd have had to be there," she responded. The brunette looked at her for a moment with a raised eyebrow then shrugged with one shoulder.

"OK." She smiled at the blue-haired woman before going back to examining some odd-looking device on a shelf which Ami thought might be some sort of cooker. Or a bird-cage. She studied it some more, her head on one side. Perhaps a tie-rack?

Giving up on it she went off on her own for a little while, looking around in interest, until she heard Yori's voice approaching down one of the aisles, T'kl'it talking to her. Heading in that direction she met them as they rounded the end of the row of shelves, falling in beside Yori as she walked towards Chou. Everyone else seemed to have disappeared.

Yori smiled at her, then said something to the merchant, who waved his antenna in agreement. Greeting Chou they talked for a moment in the trade language, before the Krennsh trader shook hands with both of them, nodded to Ami, then turned and left. Yori watched him go for a few seconds, smiling slightly. Eventually she glanced at Ami. "I've got Masao's modified projectors," she said, producing a box similar to the one Ami had accepted earlier. "T'kl'it provided the units themselves and sent them to the engineering company that did the mods. They came back a little while ago." She turned to Chou, grinning for a moment. "He says that he's not heard anything from R'ng'wr since Ms Aoyama had a word with him. He's very pleased about that, although he still looks worried when he mentions her name."

The blonde giggled, looking slyly amused. "Azumi will find that funny."

"Probably." Yori looked around. "Where are they all?"

"Rei found a shelf full of spacecraft a little while ago and they all went to look at them." Chou giggled again. "It's a good thing Fumiko isn't here, she'd want to buy one." Laughing, Yori nodded, while Ami stared at them both.

"One day we're going to have to get her something for Christmas, if we can work out where to park it," Chou added, smiling. "She'd like that."

"I still think the neighbours would talk," Yori chuckled.

"You two really are very odd," Ami commented, making them both grin. "Mind you, I'd kind of like a spacecraft as well..."

"We could most likely get a bulk discount, but S'th'kx would be annoyed. He thinks that all those little ones aren't worth the effort." Looking amused, Yori led them off to find the rest of their group, Ami scanning everything with great curiosity.

"We'll take the others back later, once we've arranged protection for them," Yori told Naito. "There are some things we need to do first, though." He nodded, remembering the discussion they'd had earlier. Hnther had left through a portal minutes earlier, shaking hands with the PSIA agent and smiling in a manner that exposed a remarkable number of teeth, although he didn't feel any threat from it. He found he rather liked the alien mind mage. Now, Yori was opening a portal to the field they'd left from several days earlier. Beside him, Aiko waited patiently. She was going to return him to the PSIA building when they got back.

"Good luck," he said to the martial artist, as the portal fizzed into existence. He picked up his bag and the box with the projectors and accessories. "Despite everything this has been more fun than I can say." She grinned at him as Aiko giggled.

"Good. I'm very glad about that. It's been fun for us as well, Masao. Say hi to the Director-General for me, OK? I'll stop by and see you soon, let you know how things are going." She shook his outstretched hand firmly. "And once again, I'm sorry about putting you in this position. I know it's difficult keeping our secrets."

"I understand why we need to do it, though, don't worry, Yori," he replied. She smiled again before turning to Aiko, who nodded.

"Come on, let's get you back." They both walked through the portal. The sudden increase in gravity made him stumble slightly but he corrected for it quickly. The magical girl beside him didn't seem to notice. On the other side, it was late afternoon, and raining heavily. Aiko teleported almost before he'd caught his balance, appearing just outside the PSIA building, under the shelter of the entrance. She smiled at him, while various passersby either walked past without noticing, or stared for a moment, then wandered off shaking their heads, umbrellas raised. The brunette held out her hand. "See you later, Masao. Take care." He shook it, grinning.

"Thanks. You do the same. I hope you guys can work things out. If there's anything I can do to help, call me."
"We will." She looked around, then when she saw no-one was looking directly at her, winked and vanished, while he closed his eyes. Opening them again he went inside, showing his ID to the guard before heading for his office.

Ami looked around at the six people in the hotel room with her. "So. What's the next step?"

Inspecting her, then Rei, and finally Hotaru, Yori finally sighed, glancing at Chou and Azumi. Aiko was leaning against the window behind them. "Something I was hoping not to be pushed into doing, but I don't think we can avoid it any longer. We're getting closer to taking this damn thing out, we have all the pieces, but we're not there yet. Until we can do it, we need to keep you three sane and healthy. I can only see two ways to do that, one is to keep you away from our reality for an arbitrary period of time, the other one is to add you to our ward system. The first part is easier in some ways but not at all ideal, since if nothing else we may well need your help, which we can't depend on if the time machine can still affect you. So, I guess we have no choice, the ward system it is."

Ami looked at her friends, who both seemed slightly worried. "You say that like it's a bad thing."

"It's not a bad thing at all, but it is somewhat involved," Chou told her. "Not the addition itself, that much is easy, but all the other things that will come out as a result of that, things that we haven't told anyone else and we're gone to considerable effort to keep secret. Uthryyl and his family, Aiko's team, and the three of us are the only ones anywhere who know all of this. Now, we're going to have to bring you all in as well. We'd hoped not to have to do that if possible." She also studied them. "I believe we can trust you. However, we will need to apply the security spell, if nothing else than to prevent accidents. We're all rather well practised at certain security techniques that you, with all due respect, are not. This will prevent... slips."

Slightly uncertain, Ami met the eyes of her friends. Hotaru nodded without hesitation. Rei was a little less sure, but eventually signified acceptance. "It's not going to cause any conflicts with anyone we deal with, is it?" Ami asked. Chou shook her head.

"No, it's not that sort of issue. It merely covers a number of rather complicated historical problems and events that could cause a considerable amount of trouble if it got out in the wrong way, both at home, and potentially in a number of other places. You'll understand when we tell you." She smiled a little. "You may well find some of it rather funny. It wasn't at the time, but looking back on it, we can see the amusing bits." Yori shared a look with Azumi, both of them rolling their eyes. Aiko giggled darkly.

"There are a lot of perks, though," the petite brunette added, grinning. "You won't believe some of the things that we do."

After a little more thought, Ami finally nodded as well. "OK. I'm enormously curious aside from anything else. I guess we can trust you to not do anything weird, after everything that's happened." Yori chuckled for a moment.

"Weird? That may be subject to interpretation." Chou nudged her in the ribs, making her laugh again, but stop teasing. She sat up, looking serious. "All right, then. You know the basic idea, you've seen me do it to other people. I'm going to apply the security spell to each of you in turn. It covers everything directly relating to this issue and our... group, family, whatever you want to call it. Once we've got that done, we can go back. We'll go directly to the area covered by the ward, which should cover you in any case, then link you into it. After that we can explain everything." She stood and walked over, looking at them all. "It's going to take a while. It's complicated."
She motioned to Rei to move slightly, sitting in the space this provided and turning to Ami. "I'll do you first. Hold still, this won't hurt." Placing her hands on the other woman's head she concentrated for a moment, Ami feeling a momentary eerie sensation of something looking through her mind, ending up at the back of her head. "That's it. You next, Rei."

Shortly the young woman had finished her task. She checked each of them once more, looking satisfied, then stood. "Great. That bit is done. OK, grab your stuff and let's go. We've got a portal room booked in about ten minutes." The three girls made sure that their bags had everything they'd come with, including a few new additions, then followed the others out of the room. After a short trip they found themselves in the now-familiar portal room, the doors closed and wards set up. Chou quickly produced a portal.

"Through there is our home," Yori told them, waving at the rip in space. "We like it. Try not to upset it." She snickered as Ami looked at Hotaru and Rei, all three of them looking puzzled.

"Upset it?" Rei asked slowly. Azumi laughed.

"You'll understand. Just don't use any sudden magic until it gets to know you." Once more Ami exchanged glances with her friends. What were they getting into?

"Stop teasing them, dear," Chou chided gently, before walking into the portal. Still chuckling Azumi followed her, Aiko immediately behind the silver-haired woman. Yori looked at them.

"It'll be fine. Go on through, guys." Shrugging a little helplessly, Ami headed for the portal. She could feel Hotaru behind her with Rei, Yori bringing up the rear. Blue light surrounded them for a brief moment.

"It's nice, I'll admit," Rei said slowly, looking around, "But after what you said I was expecting something... more menacing, perhaps? This is... surprisingly normal." She blinked a little as Aiko teleported out, having finished a short conversation with Yori and Chou, the flash reflecting off the windows.

The three of them looked around the large wooden-floored room, inspecting the tall windows on one of the long sides and one short side, through which a view of a big park could be seen, only a few people visible due to the unpleasant weather. Glancing up she saw a pair of skylights in the ceiling, which must have been at least three metres away. In other short side were a pair of doors, one of which was open showing the beginnings of a flight of stairs, while the remaining one was shut. The last wall had a sliding double door near one end through which Azumi had hurried on their arrival, muttering about needing the facilities, and a painting done in a classical Japanese style which Rei recognised, obviously ancient, hanging in the exact centre, softly illuminated by small lights along the top.

She stared at the painting for a long moment, before walking slowly over and examining it more closely. From this range she could easily see that it really was very old, the scroll looking extremely fragile. "Oh my god," she breathed, leaning close, then quickly straightening up, worried she'd somehow damage it. "Is this real? An original?" Looking over her shoulder at Chou who she'd felt come up behind her, she stared for a moment, then went back to inspecting the painting. Hotaru came over and stood beside her, also looking at it.

"That's very pretty," the younger girl said admiringly.

"Yes, it's real," Chou commented quietly, sounding amused. "It was a gift from a friend." Hotaru raised a hand, causing Rei to grab her wrist.
"No, don't touch it, it must be over two hundred years old," she hissed. The other girl looked abashed.

"I wasn't going to touch it, honest," she mumbled guiltily. Behind them Chou laughed a little.

"Don't worry, you can't damage it. It's got a very effective preservation spell on it. It's almost indestructible now." She moved to stand on Rei's other side, glancing curiously at her. "You know something about art if you recognised it," she added, smiling.

Rei nodded slowly, still savouring the painting. "A bit. I was interested at school for some time, but it eventually became clear to me I didn't have a lot of talent in that direction myself. But I still studied it for a while. This is an Ike No Taiga, isn't it?"

"Yes. It's somewhere around two hundred and fifty years old, I believe. It was in the collection of that awful Anthony Murray who was responsible for the Halleckton disaster. His wife was awarded a lot of his property and their Toronto house when she got divorced, which included a remarkably large amount of very valuable art. The man is a horrible person but had surprisingly good taste in paintings." She shook her head slightly. "Sara sold a lot of his artworks just to annoy him, and also donated some of the very valuable ones to various museums, mostly in Canada. This one, though, she sent to us as a thank-you for saving her life." Chou smiled gently. "We didn't want to accept it, we don't do what we do for gain like that, but she insisted. In the end we were proud to become custodians of it for now."

"It's beautiful," Rei finally said, listening with interest.

"Very much so. We think we'll probably arrange to lend it to a museum here in Tokyo at some point so other people can enjoy it, but for the time being it's safe here." Rei nodded, still looking at the painting, then turned to examine the room again.

"This is part of your home?" she asked curiously, wandering over to look out the window nearest her. Chou followed, as did Hotaru, after one last look at the painting on the wall. All three of them studied the very damp park and the buildings beyond.

"Yes. You'll see the rest soon." Chou turned to look at Yori, who was talking to Ami, both of them also looking out another window. The petite martial artist was pointing something out to her companion.

"We're up quite a long way," Hotaru reported, leaning against the window and looking down. "In some sort of apartment building. It looks like a very nice area, very expensive."

The blonde woman beside her laughed a little. "It's a nice community, definitely. We like living here."

"I can't get over how normal everything looks," Rei laughed. "You and Yori are... Well, no disrespect, but you're pretty unusual even in our terms. But you live in an up-scale apartment in a good area, with a big park just out there, and collect fine art. That's... kind of not what I was expecting at all."

Giggling, Chou nodded. "I wouldn't say we collect fine art, the painting over there is far rarer than anything else we own, although we do have some nice paintings and a couple of little sculptures I bought a few years ago. Nothing exceptional although we like them. The apartment is very pleasant, though. It was a gift from a friend some time ago."

Azumi re-entered the room, opening the door and slipping through gracefully before closing it behind her. She looked toward Chou, nodding slightly, before going to talk to Yori. "All right. I think we should proceed with introducing you to the system," the blonde said, smiling. Rei and Hotaru exchanged gazes.

"Um, that sounds a little scary," the purple-haired girl said nervously. "You make it sound like it's alive."

"Not quite," the other woman assured them, which caused them to stare at her. "But it's certainly close to that level of complexity." She looked around, relaxed and happy. "I always like coming home to it. It feels good, very welcoming." Glancing at them as they looked at each other again she grinned. "Don't worry. Come over here with the others." All three of them joined the remaining people at one side of the room.

"All right. We're going to add you one at a time." Yori looked at the three girls. "Hotaru last, I think. Ami first. Stay here, we'll call you over when we're ready." She and Chou walked to the middle of the room and faced each other. Both concentrated. Rei looked apprehensively around, suddenly feeling something change in the room, noticing both her friends were doing the same. There was an air of enormous power watching them from somewhere that defied description.

"God, that feels weird," she whispered to Ami, who looked back at her wide-eyed. "Have you ever felt anything that powerful?" Her friend shook her head wordlessly. They all stared in shock as the most complex pattern any of them had ever seen faded into view, delicate traceries of more colours than they could count filling the room and in some bizarre way, stretching off far past the physical limits of the room itself, possibly reality as well, while at the same time being contained within it. It was awe-inspiring and frightening at the same time, not to mention very weird to look at, making her feel slightly disorientated.

"Holy crap!" Hotaru gasped faintly, staring around in shock. "It's like being inside some sort of crazy snow-globe, or a huge crystal or something."

"It's absolutely beautiful," Ami replied, also whispering. She pulled out her computer and fiddled with it, before shaking her head. "I can't read anything useful with this at all, though. It's like it's not really there. And I'm pretty sure it's in more than three dimensions."

"It's both there and not there," Azumi commented from beside them, looking around with an air of familiar pleasure. "The thing has grown a lot as well recently." She grinned at them, then went back to watching her friends, who were moving immaterial patterns around with their hands, talking softly to each other. Everyone watched until Yori turned to them, looking satisfied.

"OK, everything is ready. Ami, if you'd go over there to that blank spot in the middle, please, then just stand still. It's safe, but you'll probably feel some pretty weird sensations. Don't worry about it and try not to move." With some trepidation, the blue-haired girl exchanged glances with her friends, then slowly moved to the indicated position, watching the glowing patterns of magical force moved out of the way while she walked. Arriving at the clear circle, she stopped, then turned around to look at Yori. Rei saw that the magic had filled in the gaps behind her.

"Is this right?" Ami asked hesitantly.

Yori nodded, smiling. "Yes, you're fine. Now hold still for a few seconds, OK?" Everyone watched as the magic moved in multiple directions at once, making Rei blink madly at the sight, which seemed impossible, tendrils of light reaching for her friend's head and gently playing over it. Ami winced, closing her eyes.

"Oooh, that's strange," she mumbled, swaying a little. Hotaru, beside Rei, raised a hand to her mouth, worried.

"Don't worry, it's perfectly safe, but it kind of makes the inside of your head itch for a while. Like the security spell but much stronger," Azumi told them in a low voice, not looking away. A few more seconds passed then there was a faint, deep chiming noise from somewhere impossible to pinpoint, sounding both very near and impossibly distant at the same time. The pattern visibly changed around them, growing slightly, while the air of power strengthened. Yori and Chou shared a look, before smiling.

"That's it, Ami. It's accepted your pattern as authorised. You can come back now." The blue-haired young woman opened her eyes, blinked a couple of times as she seemed to come back from somewhere else, then walked back to them, the magic moving out of the way again, although a few tendrils of the pattern seemed almost to caress her as she passed.

"I've just had the weirdest experience of my life," Ami mumbled to her friends, looking around at the spell. "I can't describe it any better than that, though. There's something looking at me right now, it's absolutely huge, and incredibly dangerous, but also friendly." She shook her head, then looked around, before gently patting the wall. After a moment she smiled. Rei and Hotaru exchanged glances, shrugging slightly, before looking back to Yori, who was watching Ami with a small grin. Azumi snickered from beside them.

"It's a bit weird the first time," she commented. "You get used to it fairly quickly though." She got a sudden distant look on her face, as if she was having a conversation on the phone, moving a couple of steps away from them and going silent. Rei looked at her, wondering what the problem was, then turned back to the matter at hand.

"Your turn, Rei," Chou called. She indicated the same place. Feeling very nervous Rei retraced Ami's footsteps, watching as the magic patterns shifted around her, until she reached the empty spot. As Ami had done she turned to face Yori and Chou, both of whom smiled at her comfortingly. "You'll be fine. Just stand there and let the magic do what it needs to," the blonde told her. She nodded somewhat slowly, looking around then up at the glowing pattern, which she was getting the distinct feeling was watching her curiously.

A moment passed then the pattern closed in on her. She eeped as it made contact, twitching slightly, then shuddering at the sensation of something rooting around somewhere inside her mind, something absolutely huge and terrifyingly powerful, not in a malicious manner, but fairly insistently. Not sure what to do she settled for closing her eyes and waiting, sweating lightly. A wave of dizziness went through her, making her stagger a little, the chime sounding again, both inside and outside her head, before the presence withdrew, producing a feeling uncannily like a house-size cat had rubbed against her gently before it left. When it was gone she became aware than in some indefinable way it was still lurking at the back of her mind watching her protectively from a distance, ready to act under the right circumstances.

"God, that's weird," she muttered, opening her eyes and looking around, slightly surprised to see nothing had visibly changed. "I can still feel it."

"Good," Yori responded, looking pleased. "It's taken in your case as well. You can go back." As it had done for Ami the magical patterns obligingly moved out of the way when she made her way back to where she'd started from. Turning around she inspected the glowing lines, fairly sure that they'd changed again. She glanced at Hotaru who nodded.

"It moved around after it did whatever it did, and got quite a bit bigger and more complicated too."

"I wonder what that means?" Ami mused. Yori looked over to her, having overheard.
“Every time someone is added to the ward system it gets more complex and more powerful, partly due to the extra energy and partly due to the way the spells work. It learns, in effect. That wasn't the original plan but it's not too unusual with extremely complex magical systems. They have a slight tendency to almost take on a life of their own as they get more involved. It's a sort of emergent behaviour, the underlying magical pattern gives rise to complex behaviour that wasn't deliberately designed in but is based on the original intent or goal of the system.” Ami nodded slowly, listening in fascination.

“How far can that go?” she asked curiously. Yori shrugged.

“I don't really know. It depends on the complexity of the spell and this is the most complex one I've ever personally heard of. It's been modified and tweaked for several years now, with power being continuously pushed into it, people added to it, things like that, all of which changes the underlying magic. The ward itself is by far the most powerful one I've ever come across. That one on the asteroid was pretty impressive, but nowhere close to this one. Even Hotaru's weapon wouldn't have any real effect at this point, I think. I'm not sure what would.” She looked around, apparently pleased, then back to them. "Inside this building you're safe from basically everything. Even that damned time machine, which is the point of this exercise. If we could trust the rest of your group we'd probably bring them in as well, but I certainly don't trust them. I was in two minds about adding you three, to be honest, but the others feel we can trust you.”

She sighed slightly. "I really hope we can. I'm still slightly uncomfortable about it, but..." Shaking her head, she smiled a little at Chou, who put her hand on her shoulder for a moment, then turned her attention to Hotaru. "All right, your turn, Hotaru. Same thing as for the others." Rei watched her younger friend slowly walk over to the correct spot, looking around with a mix of curiosity and mild fear.

“You're sure it doesn't hurt?” she asked plaintively. Yori chuckled.

“Tust me.”

“I do,” the young woman said, running a hand through her hair and taking a deep breath, then standing straight. Yori grinned at her.

“OK. Here we go.” For the third time the pattern closed in. Hotaru squeaked in shock as the tendrils of coloured magical energy made contact, looking around wildly, then stilled.

“That feels really strange,” she said quietly, before smiling slightly. "But it seems friendly." The patterns changed and shifted around her, then suddenly jumped, enlarging very noticeably. Yori looked at Chou, an eyebrow raised, then studied the magic, doing something to the patterns in front of her. Her other eyebrow went up.

"Hmm. I was wondering if something like that would happen.” Rei looked at Ami, then both of them watched the two women in the middle of the room. Chou made some adjustments and nodded, looking pleased.

"It seems to like her. That response was nearly as strong as Azumi produced.” Ami and Rei turned to look at the silver-haired woman, who grinned at them, although with an undercurrent of mild worry that didn't seem to be aimed at anything in the room.

"The ward system takes a particular interest in me for some reason.”

"Is that good?” Rei asked. The other girl laughed.
"It could be." They went back to watching. After a few seconds more the chime came for the third and final time, sounding a little louder and deeper, causing Yori to look up at something she seemed to be able to see. Rei followed her gaze but couldn't make out anything other than the magical pattern.

"Interesting." Chou looked up as well for a moment, then nodded, smiling.

"Yes, isn't it?" They returned their attention to Hotaru, who was watching them curiously and slightly nervously.

"What is?" she asked.

"You have a very significant inherent power level, which the system noticed and tapped into. It draws a little power from everyone linked into it, storing it for future use, and you can also both push more in if you want, and if necessary pull some out." Yori fiddled with the pattern for a moment then nodded in satisfaction. "It only takes a little by default, a proportional amount based on your power level. You're reading as having considerably more than Chou. I'll be very interested to see what happens with some proper training. It will probably go up quite a bit, our methods tend to do that, ki seems to amplify magic and vice versa."

"Assuming they can learn our magic system, there are some fascinating possibilities there, dear," Chou commented, also studying Hotaru, who was looking shocked.

"You mean I'm more powerful than Chou?" she asked in surprise. The blonde nodded, smiling.

"Oh, yes. I'm by no means the most powerful magical girl around in raw power," she assured the other woman. "Yori has far more energy available than I do. But raw power isn't usually the most important part. If you don't know how to use it all the power in the world won't help you." The purple-haired girl nodded thoughtfully, clearly thinking hard about what she'd heard. Motioning her away from the magical system, Yori made a few adjustments, then dismissed the pattern, which faded away to leave the room looking normal once more.

"What's my power level?" Rei asked curiously. Chou looked at her, then laughed.

"Feeling competitive?" she asked jokingly. Rei grinned.

"A little. I know how powerful Hotaru is supposed to be, and I've seen all you guys at work. I'm curious to know how I measure up."

Yori and Chou walked over, the blonde woman smiling. "Your inherent power level is around the same as Aiko right now. Less than Misaki, though. Ami is a little less than that. Both of you have considerable scope for improvement, from what we can tell." Ami looked surprised.

"I wouldn't have thought I was that powerful," she said slowly.

"The spells you use aren't tapping into a lot of your basic power," Yori explained. "We need to work on that. Your magic isn't nearly as efficient as it could be. Or should be. We'll fix that when we train you."

"Even if it turns out you can't use our magical system we can certainly improve the way you use yours," Chou added, smiling a little. "We're quite good at that sort of thing."

"Are we meant to still be able to feel whatever it is?" Ami asked, looking around at the room. She patted the wall again absent-mindedly, Rei noticed. Yori laughed.
"Yes. That's the ward system keeping an eye on you. It will do that more or less anywhere you go in this reality and it seems to be able to reach one or two other close ones as well. Or if a portal is open it works through that perfectly happily. We've currently got the external defence system mostly disabled, there turned out to be a rather embarrassingly serious problem with it which we haven't had time to fix yet, but at least inside the building, you're protected from anything we could even vaguely think of. Even if that asteroid had hit, this place would survive and we'd all be fine."

"Really?" Rei asked in astonishment.

"Oh, yes," Chou told her. "When we added Aiko and the others, the power of the system went up enormously, and it was already at a truly incredible level. Adding you three has also had a huge impact on the strength of the system, something we knew would happen based on what we found last time, but the amount was something of a surprise. It's not a linear relationship, magic at this level becomes somewhat difficult to accurately predict, due to the sheer complexity. By now it is probably close to impenetrable by essentially anything."

"How much energy can it store?" Ami asked. Yori and Chou exchanged a look.

"We're not completely sure. So far everything we've pushed into it between us has barely scratched the surface of its capacity," Yori said, looking thoughtful. "Every time we add someone it expands the complexity, which also expands the storage capacity, in a way that seems to be exponential. It's actually very useful, for example when the asteroid ward collapsed it dumped a huge amount of power into Hotaru's weapon, which I diverted most of into the ward system. I absorbed the rest. It was kind of painful."

"That's not surprising, dear, it was a very large amount. It might have been safer to send all of it to the wards." Chou looked at her partner with exasperated love. "You were very wobbly afterwards." Yori shrugged, grinning.

"It seemed like a good idea at the time." Shaking her head, but smiling, Chou turned to the others.

"I think it's time we gave you the explanation you've been waiting for." She looked at Yori, who looked back with a suddenly neutral expression, then glanced at Azumi, who sighed and nodded. Rei, Ami, and Hotaru exchanged looks as well, feeling that some sort of major surprise was coming. "Come into the living room and we can make ourselves comfortable. This is going to take some time and you're going to need some tea." Azumi slid the door open, going through into the rest of the building, the others following, looking around with interest and a certain degree of apprehension.

"I'm glad you're back," Tamiko said, hugging her friend for a moment. Aiko grinned.

"So am I. It was a lot of fun, though."

"I'm still pissed off about not being able to walk on the moon," Misaki grumped, while her sister and her friends laughed.

"Don't worry, now that we know I can teleport that far we can go any time we want," Aiko told her. Misaki brightened up immediately.

"That's a very good point," she said, looking happier.

"Not right now, though," her sister cautioned, making her face fall again, before she pulled out a packet of nuts and started noisily eating them. Smirking at her Aiko turned to the other two.
"Ranma and Kasumi are adding Ami and the others to the wards at the moment," she reported. "I thought I'd check in with you guys and leave them to it. We can go back when they're done."

"Fair enough," Fumiko replied. "Ranma didn't sound too happy about doing it the last time we spoke, though."

"No, she's still kind of paranoid about it. I don't blame her, all things considered, but I think it will work out OK." Aiko grinned a little. "But Ami and her friends are in for a shock."

"You think we can trust them?" Misaki asked, finishing off her nuts.

Aiko nodded. "I do. Hotaru, definitely, she idolises Yori and is nearly as impressed by Chou. Ami is smart enough to deal with it, I think, Rei is the possible problem, she's got a quick temper and sometimes seems to jump to the wrong conclusion, although I have to admit in the last couple of weeks she's improved a lot. Hopefully she can keep calm long enough to hear the full explanation."

"It's going to be fun seeing their expressions," Tamiko giggled. The others laughed, grinning.

"Oh, I'm looking forward to it." Smiling, Aiko peered over the edge of the building they were sitting on, then stared open-mouthed into the small park on the other side of the road. "Um, why is Mr Ishikawa throwing sticks for one of Chiyoko's little monsters? And more to the point, why is it bringing them back to him?" The other three watched for a few seconds. "Some of them, at any rate," the brunette added, watching the demon chew and swallow.

Tamiko sighed heavily. "We were trying to work out how to explain it when you turned up," she said, sitting down on the roof and staring up at the sky, where the clouds were clearing after the earlier rain. "I'm still having trouble with it myself." Aiko stared at her, then back at the demon playing fetch, then around at her other team-mates, both of whom shrugged, looking amused.

"This is going to be a good story..." The petite woman sat and waited. When she'd heard everything and watched the recordings, she started laughing, making Tamiko look at her with exasperation. The laughter went on for some time. Eventually she wound down, shaking her head and wiping her eyes. "Oh, god. Only in Minato." Peering down at the old man and his demon, who were engaged in a tug of war with a large branch, she giggled again. "Unbelievable. Well, I guess you're probably right. He seems happy and even that mini-demon is acting weirdly pleased." They watched as the demon bit the branch in two and ran off with the larger part, Mr Ishikawa walking after it, calling to it. A few metres away the thing sat down, dropping the branch and staring at first it then him, clearly wanting him to throw it again.

"Unbelievable." Aiko shook her head once more, grinning. "As long as it doesn't cause any real damage I can't much see the harm, not around here. If he tries going on the train with it we might have a problem though."

"He doesn't go very far from home based on what we found out," Fumiko told her, also smiling as she watched the otherworldly creature hop around in excitement as the elderly man creakily bent down and retrieved the branch, tossing it across the grass, the demon dashing off and catching it, then chewing it up and swallowing the remains. Mr Ishikawa watched with a vague smile, apparently unconcerned about the way his new pet seemed to be eating a lot of things that weren't traditionally dog food. "He seems to still be under the impression it's a dog as well."

"Other people don't think that, pretty obviously," Misaki chuckled, indicating a number of pedestrians and dog-walkers who were huddled on the other side of the park staring in disbelief at the old man and his companion, keeping as far away from them as they could. Aiko looked, then giggled madly. "Plus we're going to have to arrange some repair work." The taller woman pointed to a couple of road signs near the entrance to the park, both of which had bites out of them, and a car that had toothmarks in the windscreen. The owner of it came out of a shop at that moment and stared in horror, looking wildly about for the cause, before rushing off, shortly returning with a policeman, who inspected the damage, shrugged, and made some notes.

The girls on the roof across the street watched with mildly irritated amusement. "I'll talk to the officer later and get the details," Tamiko sighed.

"Well, we can easily afford it, now," Aiko commented, snickering. She turned to her team-mate. "I can see why you didn't mention it earlier, though, you really have to see it to believe it." Looking back at the demon and its new owner, she stared for a moment more, then dismissed it. "On a more serious note, what's the current state of play with those idiot girls?"

"Ah. Reporting time!" Tamiko jumped to her feet and saluted, grinning. "Ready to report, Ma'am!"

"You're very weird, Tamiko," Aiko giggled. "Proceed."

Relaxing, the red-head smiled at her friend. "You've got most of the recordings. Haruka is still in the hotel she's been living at since everything went sideways, she doesn't go out very much, only to eat, and spends most of the rest of the time sitting and either watching TV, poking around in the internet, or just thinking. Poor woman seems very down. None of us think she's likely to get involved in anything at the moment. She clearly was very badly affected by the whole thing and her run in with 'Yori' scared the shit out of her."

"I feel a bit sorry for her," Misaki said, sending them all a feed from one of the camera drones, which showed Haruka staring out a window at the scenery with a slightly depressed expression. "She was a pain in the rear a lot of the time, very quick off the mark, but I also thought she was at heart a decent and intelligent woman. She's acting quite out of character at the moment. And she really loved Michiru, who seems to completely hate her now, which must be hard to deal with."

"That's not all that surprising, considering how it all blew up," Aiko mused, watching the feed. "They're all acting oddly in different ways. Usagi most of all I think. Ami and the other two are pretty much normal, it doesn't seem to have affected her much at all and if anything Rei and especially Hotaru have benefited from the whole affair, but none of them are quite what they were."

"True enough." Fumiko sighed, bringing up another video feed, this one from the drone shadowing Setsuna. "Makoto is amusing herself beating up petty criminals, which is at least a reasonable use of her time, although we need to go and tell her to tone the violence down a little before she really hurts someone. Michiru has been lurking in her house for a while now, she unplugged the phone and has drawn all the curtains, and she sticks her head out every now and then and looks around very suspiciously. Kind of paranoid. Usagi and Minako you know about. They'll keep where they are but I think we should check on them regularly. Minako is sensible enough to stay put after exploring a little, but I'm not sure about Usagi. She's lost it completely." She sighed loudly. "Then we have poor Setsuna."

They all watched the green-haired woman, who was sitting on a bench in a park a few kilometres away writing in her notebook, looking around every now and then as if she thought some threat was approaching, before scribbling frantically again. "What's she writing?" Aiko asked.

"As far as we can tell, mostly nonsense," Tamiko told her. "It's difficult to be sure, she seems to be using about five or six languages pretty much interchangeably, mixing the words up and using the wrong ones a lot of the time, even the SIs have trouble trying to work out what she's trying to say, but most of it seems pretty random. There are references to monsters in the dark, things in her head, stuff like that. I think some of it might be referring to the time device from the context but it's difficult to be sure. She's slowly deteriorating as well. At least two people she knows have tried to talk to her, she didn't seem to recognise either of them."

"Damn it. We really have to get her to some help as soon as possible," Aiko muttered, shaking her head in worry. "I don't particularly like her, mainly because of the problems we've had in the past with her group, but this is just sad. She is, or was, a very intelligent person." She turned to her friends. "Herther is aware of the problem and is arranging therapists for them all but it will take a week or so as they're finishing up with current projects. He wants to see Setsuna as soon as we can arrange it, though, because she needs emergency work to prevent her losing her mind completely.
Usagi isn't quite as urgent although we still need to..." She trailed off suddenly as they all felt something weird.

"Whoa. What was that?" Tamiko yelped, looking around. Misaki and Fumiko looked at each other, then also peered about themselves.

"It was the ward system, I think," Misaki said slowly, an intrigued expression on her face. "It just got... Bigger? More powerful?" She commed Nabiki, linking them all into the conversation.

"Hey, Nabiki, what happened? We felt something weird in the ward system as far as I can make out."

"Hi, Misaki. Yes, Ami just got added to it. I felt it as well, the system got quite a large power boost.
It was a bit strange, although we should have expected it, I guess. She has a lot of power. Ranma and Kasumi didn't seem surprised but they didn't mention anything to me beforehand."

"If that was Ami, what's going to happen with Hotaru, I wonder?" Fumiko mused, "She's got a lot more power available even if she doesn't seem to know how to access a fair bit of it yet."

"It'll be interesting to find out." The middle sister laughed slightly. "They're all looking kind of shocked about the whole thing and we haven't even got to the good part yet." All five of them giggled at the look Ami, Rei, and Hotaru shared as the distant Tendo sent them a video link.

"Ah, guys? We might have a problem," Tamiko interjected, highlighting the feed from the drone observing Setsuna, who had dropped her notebook and was looking wildly around, fully powered up, clutching her staff which had abruptly appeared, the brilliant red stone built into the end glowing brightly. "I think she noticed Ami and the ward system as well. Or the time device did through her. She looks scared." A number of people were visible running away at the sudden appearance of one of the magical girls they'd learned to be very worried about in the park. "I don't think anyone saw her power up, luckily, but she's drawing attention now."

"Crap. They're just about to add Rei now. Let's see what happens, but I think you may have to go and make sure she doesn't do anything stupid. The state she's in it could be bad." Nabiki sounded worried. "I don't want to interrupt Sis and Ranma while they're working, and we have no choice, these three need to be added to the wards. As soon as they're done I'll let them know."

Aiko looked around at her team. "We're on our way. We'll keep the link open." All four of them moved together, then disappeared in a flash of light.

"Everything is wrong."

"Nothing is working correctly."

"It's happening again. More calculations must be made."
"I don't understand..."

"No, get out of my head!"

"Shut UP!"

"Why can't I make any sense of this?"

"I'm so tired. Why is everyone so strange?"

"Leave me alone!"

Setsuna scribbled frantically, words almost pouring out of her onto the paper, ignoring the fact she was writing in Japanese, German, English, Dutch, and Spanish, with a little French thrown in for good measure. She'd always been gifted at languages, having learned several early on, and easily made her way through the mishmash on the paper, although when she flipped back a few pages she couldn't remember writing them at all. It was her handwriting, though, so she must have done. Pausing to correct a spelling mistake, then run a quick calculation working out the area of the park in square cubits, she went back to writing.

A sound behind her made her jump, whirling around in her seat to stare at a squirrel which was looking at her curiously, holding a piece of bread dropped by a passer-by in its forepaws. She inspected it suspiciously for several seconds, then sketched it in quick little strokes of her pen, turning back once she'd finished and immediately forgetting it. The sound of a voice entered her consciousness causing her to eventually look up into the concerned face of a middle-aged woman who seemed to be talking to her.

"Yes?" she snapped irritably. "Can I help you?" The woman stared at her, until she realised she'd asked the question in German. She asked it again in Japanese.

"Setsuna? Are you all right?" The woman appeared concerned.

"All right?" She considered the question carefully. "Six o'clock, I think." Dismissing the interruption she went back to making notes, suddenly realising that the crow ten metres away in the branches of a bush had been staring at her for longer than seemed polite. She glared back at it, then noted down a description. She'd remember its face for next time. Perhaps she should report it? The annoying woman said something else but she ignored it and eventually she left.

"No. I don't believe you."

"So much darkness. It goes on forever, or perhaps not."

"Why should I? What's in it for me?"

"Last Saturday? All right, I can meet you there, but only for five minutes. The turtles would be annoyed if I stay longer."

She read this last line back to herself, feeling slightly puzzled. Why would the turtles be annoyed? Normally they were fairly laid-back. After a moment she shrugged, resolving to ask a turtle next time she met one, moving on to the more pressing problem of who had moved the bench next to her when she wasn't looking and replaced it with an absolutely identical one. She couldn't see any difference but she knew it wasn't the same.

Getting up she inspected the other bench minutely, then sighed. When she turned around someone had done the same thing to the one she'd been sitting on. Shaking her head she made a note.
"Going to have to fix that," she mumbled to herself.

A sudden feeling, nothing like she'd ever encountered, made her stagger suddenly, then look wildly around. Anger, loss, terror, something looking at her, something huge, then it was gone. Someone was gone.

Setsuna screamed hoarsely, summoning her uniform and powers without even thinking about it, holding her staff in both hands protectively in front of her and staring around in fear. She absently noted the fact that several people in the middle distance were running, yelling in fright. They could clearly feel the threat as well. She looked at them, then turned to face the direction they were running from, which was behind her, lowering her staff into position. No visible threat was apparent but she was sure something was coming, she could feel it.

"Stay back!" she yelled, waving the staff around, twitching at the sound of something to the side moving. Without a thought she turned and fired, the magic blast removing several bushes and a tree and leaving a deep smoking gouge in the grass. Black feathers, gently burning, rained down around her.

The sensation came again, more strongly. Once more something looked at her, then beyond her at something else, something familiar from her dreams. Nightmares. Both vast entities stared at each other with her in the middle. Dropping to her knees she bowed her head, clutching the staff as hard as she could, tears leaking from her eyes, trembling. After a period of time that could be measured in galactic revolutions, or perhaps milliseconds, the sensations vanished. She felt diminished, yet relieved.

"No more. I can't take it. Leave me ALONE!" she screamed, tipping her face back to the uncaring sky, which seemed darker than it should have. Tears ran down her face.

"Setsuna," a gentle voice beside her said. She twitched, then slowly turned her head. Four concerned faces met her gaze. A memory tugged at her, she knew these people. Weren't they friends? Or enemies? Something like that.

"Yes?" she asked weakly, leaning on the staff.

"Will you let us help you?" The short woman who was standing next to her knelt down and held out her hand. She stared at it for a long moment.

"How can you help me?" she asked quietly. "I don't know who I am or what's going on any more. Are you my friends?" The woman looked steadily at her, then glanced back at the other three behind her.

"We could be if you'd like that. Would you?"

She considered the thought for an indeterminate period, closing her eyes. When she opened them she was rather surprised to see the woman was still there. "Yes, please," she finally said. As she did, the same sensation she'd felt twice before roared over her, vastly more powerfully, causing her to scream. Two huge entities faced off somewhere unknowable, one radiating protectiveness of its charges, one a cold intent to do whatever was required to achieve some goal, a goal she felt she should recognise but now just terrified her.

Blackness took her.

Nabiki, still in her 'Azumi' aspect, watched the feed from her friends with worry, although nothing of her feeling came out in her expression. She glanced at her sister and sister in law who looked back, then 'Yori' sighed minutely. "I'll go," she commed both Tendos, "Aiko, can you pick me up, please? We need to get her to Hnther right now before something breaks permanently, if it hasn't already."

"On my way." Seconds later the brunette walked out of the practice room, Tamiko with her. Ami, Rei, and Hotaru all looked over at the two, smiling, then appearing worried at their sombre expressions.

"We have a major problem with Setsuna," Aiko told them. "It looks like when we added you three to the wards, there was some sort of feedback from the time device through her. I guess because she's its main conduit to our reality or something. She had... I suppose a breakdown would be the best way to explain it."

"Oh, no, is she going to be all right?" Hotaru asked anxiously. Ami and Rei looked concerned. Aiko shrugged, glancing at 'Yori', who turned to them.

"We don't know yet, but I'm going to take her to Hnther. Hopefully he can do something to help her until we can get those qualified therapists of his to look at her. Worst case, we could use some sort of stasis spell to keep her inactive until they can work out what to do." The petite woman put her hands on the purple-haired girl's shoulders and looked into her eyes. "I promise we'll do everything we can to help her."

"Thank you, Yori," the girl said quietly and sadly. "Even after everything that happened I don't want her to go crazy."

"None of us do, dear," 'Chou' assured her gently. "Hnther and his people are the best chance she has. Come with me and help me make some tea, and let Yori and the others go to help Setsuna, all right?" She guided the younger woman into the kitchen.

"We got this, at least," Tamiko said, producing Setsuna's staff. "So we have the key, now." 'Azumi' took it from her, feeling it with curiosity. There was a sensation of considerable magical potency surrounding the thing. After a moment she handed it to her sister-in-law, who examined it closely.

"Good. It should be isolated from the time device now, and the other girls. Just in case, though...
She held it in front of her, then concentrated. A bubble of glowing purple energy surrounded it before it vanished.

"What the hell did you do to it?" Ami asked, fascinated. 'Yori' smiled.

"I put the strongest bidirectional ward I could around it then stashed it in a ki pocket. The thing is completely isolated now, I think. Hopefully there's no way the time machine can access it any more. It'll keep there until we deal with Setsuna." She turned to Aiko. "Let's go and do that."

"I'll come with you," 'Azumi' decided. Her sister-in-law looked at her and nodded.

"In that case I'll stay here," Tamiko said, dropping onto the sofa. "I could do with a drink." She smiled at Ami who sat beside her. "Good luck, guys," she added.

"I'm afraid the explanations will have to wait for a while," 'Yori' told the three guests, smiling regretfully. "We'll be as fast as we can but this is very important."

"Don't worry, we understand," Rei assured her, also sitting. Aiko moved close to 'Yori' and 'Azumi' then teleported them to the park.
Setsuna was lying on the ground, a crumpled mess, her hair splayed around her head, with Fumiko and Misaki standing guard over her. One or two pedestrians were watching from a safe distance. None of them looked overly worried about the green-haired woman, 'Azumi' noted sadly. "How is she?" the middle sister asked as her sister-in-law quickly scanned the figure on the ground.

"Not good," 'Yori' sighed, rocking back on her heels and staring at the magical girl. "Her brain is a mess, even worse than it was last time. That fucking machine has been pushing very hard, I think, and somehow she's been fighting back, although I have a feeling she didn't realise. The damage is pretty extreme. It looks like the end stages of Alzheimer's in a way, but there are some differences as well."

"Can you fix it?" Fumiko asked.

"The organic damage, yes, although it's a lot of work. Hopefully there won't be too much memory loss although I expect she'll lose things here and there. But I'm not sure about the mental issues. She's nothing like as aggressive as Usagi got, but the personality shift is still pretty major." 'Yori' shook her head a little, sadly. "It's not something I know enough about to be able to help. Hnther and his colleagues are her only real hope." Reaching out she put her hand on the other woman's head, a glow suffusing her fingers for several seconds. Setsuna's face relaxed suddenly, from the frightened grimace it had been frozen in.

"I shut her mind down as far as I could without killing her," the martial artist reported, standing and looking down at the unconscious woman. "She'll have to stay like that until Hnther can do some repair work, to prevent any further degradation." 'Yori' looked around at her friends. "Damn it, I should have done this days ago," she added in disgust. "Now the damage might be unreparable."

"We had to deal with the more immediate problem," 'Azumi' commented, sharing a look with the other three women, then returning her attention to 'Yori', who sighed deeply. "None of this is your fault. We've been running around putting out fires for days now. We can't do everything at once."

"True, I guess. Oh well. Let's get her to someone who knows what to do to help her."

"Do you want any of us to come with you?" Aiko asked.

"No, I think the two of us can handle it," 'Yori' replied, looking at the middle sister, who nodded calmly. "Thanks, though. You may as well go back and keep Ami and the others entertained until we get back. Hopefully that won't be too long."

"OK." Aiko grinned suddenly. "Only three left now."

"That's something, I suppose," her friend said, looking momentarily amused. With a burst of magic, a portal crackled into existence next to them. 'Yori' carefully picked Setsuna up and walked through it. The disguised Tendo sister looked at her friends.

"See you soon," she said, smiling at them, then followed, the portal vanishing as soon as she was through.

Agent Naito left the special projects department, still smiling at the way the specialists there had pounced on the case of Moon samples with almost literal squeaks of excitement. He'd already handed over the film to the relevant technicians, which had immediately been rushed off for development, as well as positive prints, the original slides heading for scanning later as it was a slow process. They'd promised it would be processed as fast as possible, consistent with not making a mistake. He'd have the first few images within the hour.

Consulting his notes he'd asked for specific images to be printed first, wanting to have some good ones for the Director-General. Returning to his office he turned on his computer, calling his wife to let her know he was back safely while he waited for it to boot. When he'd finished the call he disconnected, turning to the keyboard, opening his first notebook, then beginning typing the preliminary report summary, snickering slightly to himself as he worked.

"He's going to fall out of his chair when he reads this," he thought to himself, grinning.

He'd just finished the preliminary report, highlighting the good bits of the trip with reference to the photos, when an internal courier knocked on the door to his office, handing over a large thick envelope. Signing for it he thanked the man, waiting until he'd left and closed the door before breaking the seal and pulling out the prints. Fanning them out on the desk he marvelled at the sheer clarity of the cibachrome prints, thinking that the camera he'd been given was well worth the cost.

"Wow," he mumbled to himself, holding up the first shot of the Earthrise over the edge of the Moon that he'd taken, inspecting it closely. "That came out amazingly well." It was crystal-clear, pin-sharp, and completely awe-inspiring. Shaking his head slowly, impressed despite the fact he'd been the one to take it, he looked through some of the others, finding one a little further on than made him smile, showing Hotaru leaning against the window of the space-raft grinning manically at the same scene, lit by the light reflecting from the 'dark' side of the moon. The look on the young woman's face was of simple and total joy.

Flipping through the rest of the stack he nodded, satisfied. There was a representative collection of images, depicting everything from the spaceport, the interior of the ship, shots of him leaning against that same ship on the surface of the moon, which made him grin widely, to the asteroid, and even a couple in the space elevator restaurant. That had been nearly as impressive an experience as the spaceship, he mused, wishing they'd had more time to explore. Oh well. Perhaps next time.

After a moment's thought, he turned back to the computer, removing the section of the report about the asteroid and putting it into a separate document. He printed that one, putting it and the relevant photos into a separate envelope, then replaced the remainder in the original one. Once he had printed the main report, stapled all eight pages together, slipped them into a folder along with the images, then shut his computer down, he headed upstairs. Arriving at the Director-General's office he grinned at the secretary who smiled back.

"Did you have an interesting mission, Agent?" she asked politely, a look in her eyes that suggested she was well aware of where he'd been. He nodded, chuckling.

"I did, Ms Enoki, very interesting and very successful." She laughed slightly, quickly typing something.

"Please go in, he left instructions that you were to be admitted as soon as you got back." She smiled again. "We were slightly worried when you were overdue but we got the message from Chou telling us there had been a delay. I hope it wasn't anything serious."

"It was... somewhat unexpected," he replied after a moment, "but everything was resolved satisfactorily." Nodding to her once more he headed for the inner door.

"Hello, Sir," he said as he closed the door behind him. The Director-General smiled a little.

"Hello, Masao. I'm relieved you're back safely. Did things go well?" The older man chuckled in a deep voice. "I trust you have some interesting photos for us?"

"Oh, I think so, sir," he replied, sitting when his superior gestured him to a chair. He opened the folder and extracted the paperwork and the first envelope, sliding them across the desk then leaning back with a smile of his own. "My preliminary report. Only the highlights, unfortunately, a full report will take at least a day to type up. I have a lot of notes to go through." Naito grinned quickly. "But I think you'll find it interesting." He pointed to the envelope. "There are some nice images in there, but the rest of them won't be developed until tomorrow, I'm afraid. I used nearly all the film I took, there are hundreds of images to process. But those are some good ones."

Looking at him curiously, the elder man opened the envelope and carefully removed the stack of heavy photo paper, his eyes widening instantly in amazement. Naito watched with satisfaction. He'd made sure the Earthrise one was on top.

Half an hour later he had the pleasure of seeing the grave features of the most senior member of the PSIA gaping in shock, pleasure, and considerable envy as he finished reading the report and inspecting the images. Eventually he put the paperwork down, tapping it into order, then did the same with the pile of photos. He'd not said a word since he started reading although Naito could swear he'd heard a couple of very faint expletives during the first few minutes. The Director-General looked carefully at him for a few seconds, then back to the photos. He picked up the top one again.

"This one goes on my wall, I think," he finally said, looking amazed and pleased, smiling more widely than the agent had ever seen before in his ten years at the PSIA. "I'll get it blown up a little, though."

Naito laughed, the other man joining him after a moment, both of them ending up howling with hilarity.

"Oh, god, what a world we suddenly seem to be living in, Masao," the older man finally said, wiping tears of laughter from his eyes with a handkerchief. "What a world. Things are going to change a lot soon, aren't they?"

"I think so, sir. Mostly for the better."

The Director-General flipped through the report idly, looking at the pages with a gaze that seemed to be focussed somewhere beyond the paper. "I expected something unusual to come out of all this, hopefully something good, but this is..." He shook his head in wonder. "Fusion power? Trade with aliens, for plant chemicals, art, mattresses of all things! It's... almost unbelievable."

"I know, sir." Naito looked at his superior slyly. "The mattresses are amazingly comfortable."

Staring hard at him, the other man finally smirked a little.

"Yori's odd sense of humour is clearly contagious," he responded dryly. Naito chuckled, nodding.

"I'm afraid so, sir."

"Seriously, though, alien fusion reactors? This isn't some elaborate joke?" The man looked worried and hopeful simultaneously. Naito shook his head slowly.

"No joke, not at all, sir. Azumi was very serious about it. She's obviously done her homework as well, she had all the facts and figures right there. Their friend Uthryyl has nearly finished sorting out all the relevant paperwork on the other end, this Fwetna place, for exporting the technology to us, a 'non-aligned' world. Apparently there are some pretty extensive trade treaties stitching quite a few worlds in lots of realities into some remarkably complex trading networks. They have all sorts of rules about what can be exported and to whom, much as we do here, only a lot bigger. There are interworld banking systems as well, which allow credit to be transferred into and out of local currencies as required. Not directly to us, they tend to go via an intermediate such as precious metals."

"Interesting," the other man mused, leaning back in his chair and swivelling to look out the window for a moment. "I wonder if we could join that system?"

"They think it's possible, but it would take some time to set things up, Azumi told me. She's not sure exactly how to go about it but the information she had was that it would most likely get looked into once the volume of trade between us and the other worlds increased. For the time being, direct trade of products from here for products from there seems the easiest solution." Naito shrugged a little.

"Frankly, that sort of thing is far past my area of expertise. I would think it would require some real experts, financial, political, and so on, probably with the aid of the magical world as well. Azumi and Uthryyl seem to know what they're doing, so I would personally suggest that if the government is all right with all of this the easiest thing to do is to let them get on with it, giving whatever aid is required in the process."

Slowly nodding, The Director-General listened intently. "There are going to be some very powerful entities, both political and financial, that aren't at all happy about this, I suspect." He sighed for a moment. "The oil companies will certainly try to either block it or somehow cut themselves in once they hear about it, due to the threat it poses to their business model."

"Azumi is more than aware of that, sir," Naito agreed. "She said the same thing. Apparently Uthryyl also raised it as a problem. She made the valid point that cheap fusion energy hardly means the end of the petroleum industry, though, the materials they produce have many uses other than fuel, arguably more important ones."

"True, I suppose, although I doubt they'll think that way at first. I can see a number of powerful people who will try to interfere, both here and abroad." Smirking suddenly, the older man added, "I'm quite interested to see what happens if they go up against Yori and her friends."

Snickering, Naito nodded. "I think that they may have a shock." He studied the man behind the desk for a moment. "Do you think the government will want this to proceed?"

Abruptly serious, his companion swivelled back to look at him, leaning forward and picking up the Earthrise photo again. "Yes. Possibly not all of them, there will be some issues, I suspect, with certain people we could both name, but people at the top are going to jump on this with both feet. We're in the middle of a recession, there are a number of very worrying long-term problems with the way we're doing things at the moment, and this looks like we've been practically handed a solution on a silver plate. The effect this could have just on the economy is... almost beyond belief."

"I have no idea how it's going to be presented to the public," Naito commented. "Alien technology is going to be possibly even more difficult to believe for a large part of the world than magic."

The other man grinned suddenly. "The Americans are going to have a fit," he said happily. "The Russians, possibly two fits."

Laughing, Naito agreed with him. "It could be somewhat funny to watch." After a few more seconds he opened his folder again, removing the other envelope. Watching him curiously the Director-General raised an eyebrow. Naito handed him the asteroid report. "This is something possibly more... sensitive. I was going to put it in the first one, but after I thought about it... I thought you might want it separate."

"Bad news?" his superior asked curiously, taking the envelope and opening it, but not removing the contents yet.

"No, the opposite, really." Naito sighed, shrugging slightly. "But it may not be the sort of thing we want to pass on, or not necessarily to everyone just yet. It could cause a certain amount of... panic, I suppose, even though the matter is over with." Studying him with interest, the other man finally pulled out the paperwork, looking at the photos first with a slightly puzzled air, before reading the single sheet report. He went white within the first paragraph. Only his eyes moving, he read the entire thing, then read it again. Agent Naito watched and waited.

After a long silent pause, the Director-General swallowed hard. He raised his eyes to his agent, opening his mouth, only a slight croak coming out on the first attempt. Naito smiled sympathetically. "It hit me like that at first, sir, and I didn't know it was going to end well at the time, either."

"An asteroid?" The voice was hoarse.

"Yes."

"On a direct collision course with... us?"

"Yes." There was another pause. "It would have hit in about three weeks. Ami calculated the probable damage. I have the figures if you want to see them."

Staring at him, the other man finally shook his head slightly. "I may sleep better at night if I don't see them. You're sure it's been dealt with?" His voice was almost plaintive.

Naito laughed for a moment. "I am. I saw it dealt with myself. I can still hardly believe it."

Slumping suddenly the Director-General dropped the report onto his desk and sighed, rubbing his face with both hands. "Oh, little gods and goddesses, that's the most terrifying thing I've ever heard of." He looked up at Naito. "I think those girls earned themselves a get out of everything free card with that one."

"They did genuinely save the world, sir," Naito agreed, smiling. "They and their friends. An asteroid mining ship crewed by experienced miners is exactly the right thing to have handy when you find an asteroid aimed at your planet. Even a fairly small one."

"If Yori hadn't needed to go on this mysterious mission of hers..." The older man shuddered. "We'd never have seen it coming until far too late, would we?"

"No, sir. Not that we could have done anything in any case. It was a very fast-moving one, apparently, and very dense. Mostly metallic. Ami said it wouldn't have destroyed the planet, but in all likelihood the majority of people on Earth would have ended up dead as a result of it, directly or indirectly." Naito didn't mention the fact that this would have been a deliberate act created by a giant alien time-travelling supercomputer, of course, not that he could have even if he'd wanted to. "We owe them all, including S'th'kx and his crew, enormous thanks." He thought for a moment. "Especially S'th'kx. It was his idea to send out probes to look for anything dangerous in the first place."

"They took the asteroid back to their own reality?" the Director-General asked, looking at the

"It had some mineralogical value to them and after all the work of capturing the thing Yori felt it was a good idea to let them take it. After all, they did provide a huge number of probes to look for more like that one."

"I doubt anyone sensible would begrudge them a few cubic kilometres of rock and metal in exchange for saving the planet."

'If only you knew,' Naito thought to himself, smiling internally. "Indeed, sir," what what he actually said.

"And these probes are still out there, then?"

"Yes, sir. Tens of thousands of them. They're scanning the entire solar system, something that will take years to complete, but they should find anything close enough to be dangerous fairly fast, I'm told. As I said in the report, Chou and Yori also arranged to have a small number sent to scan and map every planet and moon in the system for scientific reasons, as long as they were out there already." He shrugged. "Apparently they're pretty cheap. S'th'kx had them in stock and was happy to use them. They're used to using them in bulk. We'll get the data eventually, Yori said she'd pass it on. What we do with it she's leaving up to us."

"JAXA is going to have a collective coronary," the Director-General muttered, looking amused.

"Quite possibly." Naito smiled. "Would you like to see the moon data?" He pulled a small box from his pocket, opening it and removing one of the projectors, laying it on the desk. His boss looked curiously at it.

"I would. I assume that's the new toy?"

"It's very interesting. There is another one in my office, a backup. They arranged to get them modified so we can plug them into one of our own networks. There is some sort of intelligent connection interface on the side there that will link into ethernet or optical networks." He looked intrigued for a moment. "The people on K'nn four seemed to have all the specifications necessary to manufacture the custom parts, which is very interesting when you consider the implications."

The other man watched as Naito pulled out the small cubical data crystal and socketed it into the receptacle on the top of the small device, then touched a couple of places on the side. "I've read the manual a couple of times, I think this is..." Mumbling to himself, the agent prodded another point, smiling when the device beeped. "Ah. That's it. Now, I just do this..."

Staring in amazement, the Director-General leaned back as a perfect, incredibly detailed three dimensional replica of the Moon in miniature suddenly appeared above his desk, looking completely solid. "Good god!" he yelped in shock. Naito leaned sideways to grin at him from behind the half-metre diameter projection.

"Impressive, isn't it?"

"It's somewhat startling, I have to admit." Leaning closer his superior stared at the projected image. "And astoundingly detailed. It looks perfectly real."

"It's interactive as well." Standing, Naito moved around so he was to one side, then reached out and gave the floating image a flick, making it begin to rotate slowly. Once more the Director-General stared in wonder.
Absolutely astounding," he muttered, trying for himself. He shook his head in amazement, beginning to grin. "They have some of the best toys I've ever seen." Glancing at the agent, he asked, "What else can it do?"

"Well, you can zoom in, like this," Naito showed the right gestures, quickly locating and zooming to the Apollo eleven site, at a level that enabled the footprints to be clearly seen. "Or you can bring up a control panel and look at other data as well as the images." A few gestures and he succeeded in getting the projection to show different colours indicating the amount of water ice under the surface. "There's an enormous amount of information on that crystal, probably enough to keep an entire team of scientists busy for decades. This is only the tip of the iceberg, so to speak."

Reaching out again and flicking the projection, the Director-General watched it spin, smiling gently. "Unbelievable. Simply unbelievable." He stared for several minutes while Naito waited patiently. "Good. Mission wildly successful, I think. Go home, get some rest, take the rest of the day off. You've earned it, certainly." He looked at his agent with a pleased expression. "In fact, take tomorrow off as well. I can wait another day to get the full report. I'm looking forward to it, I have to admit. Write up the asteroid encounter separately, please."

"Thank you, sir." Naito turned the projector off. "What do you want me to do with this?"

"Drop it off at Special Projects, along with the instructions. They'll need to arrange to get the data off it into our system. I'll let them know to expect you." Thinking for a moment, the Director-General added after a few seconds, "Put the spare one in your safe for the moment, I think. We want to keep it safe, just in case."

"Yori said she could get more for us if we needed them."

"That's very generous of her but I don't want to take too much advantage of her good nature. For the time being, those two should be more than enough." Naito nodded, picking the device up and returning it to its case.

"OK, sir. Is that everything for now."

"Yes. Thank you, Masao. You've exceed my expectations once more."

Looking and feeling pleased, Naito headed for the door. "Oh, Masao?"

"Sir?"

"Did Yori and her friends succeed in whatever it was they were originally trying to do?" The Director-General looked genuinely curious.

"To the best of my knowledge, yes, sir, I believe they did. They seemed pleased with the results at any rate."

"Good. That's probably very significant in some way, I suspect."

"Most likely, sir." Naito nodded to his superior with a polite smile, then headed downstairs. Behind him, the Director-General picked up his phone, while looking with slightly horrified interest at a beautifully printed photo of a small asteroid that could have given them all a very bad day, if not for a helpful otherworldly alien miner.

"Minister? Agent Naito and the special talent came through for us yet again..."
"This poor woman is in a very bad way," Hnther said regretfully, standing up from his examination of Setsuna, which had taken nearly half an hour. "Her mind is damaged in several different ways. The dementia effect of the mental editing is the most obvious part, but there are some fairly dramatic effects to her memory, there seem to be at least three different, conflicting, engrammatic patterns in there at the moment. I would say that the time device has been trying to modify the original imposed narrative by overwriting it with a variant. Rather crudely, as well, I suspect it's in a hurry, looking at the results. Too much information has been pushed in too fast, which is making the whole problem much worse than it would have been anyway. The original tampering, as obscene as it was, was at least done very carefully, which is why it worked so well. This is a hack job, frankly."

He sighed, looking down at the green-haired human woman who was lying on a somewhat odd-looking bed in his workshop. "Even doing that sort of editing once is tricky. Twice, like this, is just asking for problems. Add to that the temporal editing as well and the only thing I'm surprised about is that she's still functional to the level she is. Most people would have become a total blank by now."

"Can you help her?" 'Azumi' asked. The mind mage glanced at her and 'Yori'.

"With time, I believe so, although it won't be easy. If you can correct the brain trauma, Yori, I think the psychological damage can probably be mostly reversed, but it will be weeks before we can wake her, then most likely a year or more of professional therapy and treatment to get her mind into a state approaching stable. There will definitely be memory lapses, I'm afraid. Too much damage has been done to her mind recently to reverse everything."

"How much will she lose, do you think?" 'Yori' looked at him, then Setsuna.

"Difficult to say at this point. I would think she will probably not have many, if any, memories of the last couple of months at least. Snatches here and there, possibly, but most of it will be lost. Other than that, there may well be gaps going back years. Probably not anything too serious, she won't forget who she is or how to speak, things like that, but little details of things she doesn't use much will likely vanish. There isn't much we can do about that. Some of it might come back, some won't." He shook his head thoughtfully. "But it's going to need a lot of work before we can even work out what's missing and what isn't."

"What about personality changes?"

"I'm not sure. Her personality was being considerably affected by recent events, according to her friends, but again, until we can get her more functional, it's difficult to know how much is a permanent change and how much was transient." He turned to them. "I'm sorry I can't be more specific but there just isn't enough to go on yet."

'Yori' frowned at the unconscious woman, then sighed. "I understand. Thanks, Hnther. I'd better get on with repairing the brain damage, I suppose." She looked at the middle Tendo. "I can send you back if you want."

"I'll keep you company," 'Azumi' replied, smiling slightly. "I'm just sorry I can't be of any help."

"Don't worry about it." Kneeling beside Setsuna, 'Yori' reached out her hands. "But you could see if you can find some coffee or something, if you want to help," she added over her shoulder, grinning briefly. "This is going to be tedious, I could do with some caffeine."

Hnther laughed. "I've got coffee upstairs. I'll go and make some." 'Azumi' trailed after him, looking around with interest. He glanced at her. "First time to my world?"
"Yes. I've been to a few now but not here. It's very pretty." Looking out the window they were passing the middle Tendo inspected the plant-life visible, greens and yellows under a vividly orange sun. The gravity was slightly higher than home, by a few percent, enough to notice but not enough to be a problem even to a normal human.

"We like it," the mind mage agreed, smiling. "Our population is fairly low compared to many worlds, we like our space, and there isn't as much technology around as, for example, Fwetna, which I believe you're familiar with, but we do all right." He led the way into what was obviously a kitchen, filling an odd looking kettle with water and placing it on a device which appeared to be some magically powered version of a stove. A wave of his hand and 'Azumi' could feel it power up, the water beginning to steam within seconds. He rummaged around in a box on the table to one side of the room, coming up with a very familiar looking vacuum-packed bag of coffee beans. She was amused to see it had Kanji writing on it. Clearly he was also in the end one of Uthryyl's customers.

"Do you think you and these therapists of yours can help Setsuna and the others?" she asked as he prepared a pot of coffee. He shrugged very slightly, looking at her for a moment.

"It's not a guaranteed thing, I'm afraid. In Setsuna's case the damage is fairly serious. Usagi sounds rather bad as well, although until I can examine her properly it's difficult to be sure. The others, I think we can probably deal with, from the sound of it they're not so far gone. But those two will be difficult." Turning away from the device that was now full of ground beans and boiling water, making hissing noises, he leaned on the table and inspected her. "Once Yori has repaired Setsuna's brain damage I can make a better assessment of the state of her mind, then consult my colleagues about the best way to proceed. We may well have to study her for some while before we can come up with a suitable procedure. She'll have to go on a life-support system until we're ready, we need to keep her mind switched off to prevent any further damage occurring."

He smiled, turning back to fill the pot. "It would be much more serious in a number of ways if it wasn't for the extraordinary healing abilities of your friends. They make a number of unlikely treatment options possible, we probably wouldn't dare to try them normally as the risk of permanent damage is far too high. Not many healers are anywhere near as good as those two." He put the pot, three mugs, and something that seemed to be an equivalent to sugar on a tray then headed back downstairs. "Usagi presents a problem, which may well require the method Yori suggested of a partial mental reset with memory erasure. It's a drastic method which is also something of a last resort, for which I would need to get permission from the authorities, we don't do things like that lightly, but the therapists I've talked to are licensed to use methods of that nature. Hopefully it won't be necessary, but..." He shrugged again as she nodded her understanding.

"Would memory erasure of that type help Setsuna?" she asked curiously. Stopping beside 'Yori', who was concentrating hard on her job, her hands glowing gently as she moved them very slowly around Setsuna's head, he put the tray down, then filled the mugs.

"Probably not. At this point it could cause more harm than good. We need to get her back at least into a state where she's functional then evaluate her." Sighing slightly, he handed her one of the mugs, leaving another one where 'Yori' could reach it. The black-haired woman opened her eyes for a moment, nodded thanks to him, then closed them again. "In all honesty the damage to her mind has already most likely erased quite a lot of the near past, including the major event she was involved in recently. We won't know for sure for some time but it wouldn't surprise me."

"I see." 'Azumi' sipped her coffee, then added a little of the sugar-like substance and tried it again, smiling at the result. "Have you had any further thoughts on how the machine was able to affect them all?"
"I have been considering the problem, but so far I haven't come up with any definite conclusions. I have one or two ideas that I may be able to check now I have access to someone who was so badly affected, and who was probably the first one so affected in the first place, but I need to stabilise her before they can be investigated." The two of them watched as the martial artist kept doing whatever it was she was doing, both falling silent for a while. Eventually 'Yori' lowered her hands, the glow dying away, then stretched.

"Around half-way done." She picked up the mug, making a face when she tried it. "Cold." Holding the mug in both hands she pulsed a little ki into it, causing it to immediately begin steaming gently, then tried again. "Ah. Much better." She grinned as her sister-in-law snickered.

"About another half hour, I think, then the damage should be repaired. At that point I've done all I can." Standing, 'Yori' leaned against the wall next to 'Azumi'. "I guess we should go back, then. Although I want to make a detour and drop that staff of hers off with Lldnr'k to see if he can get the coordinates we need from it."

"Ami and the others will be bursting by now, I suspect." 'Azumi' laughed. Chuckling, the martial artist finished her coffee, putting the mug down again.

"Most likely. Right, I'd better finish this off." She knelt down again, once more reaching out with glowing hands.

Just under forty minutes later she nodded, standing once more. "That's done. Her brain is physically back to what it should be. Other than that she was in pretty good shape, although she should have had a shower this morning." 'Yori' grinned as 'Azumi' laughed. Glancing at Hnther who had been watching silently, she added, "She's all yours now."

"Quite. I'll do what I can, Yori. I should have some preliminary information on her status in a day or two, but I expect it will take some time before she's able to be brought back to a conscious state. I'll let you know when I know more."

"Thanks, Hnther. The woman is something of a pain but she deserves better."

"No one deserves what's been done to her or her friends." Shaking his head sadly, the mind mage looked very annoyed. "I hope you can find and kill that damned machine as soon as possible. It needs to stop existing."

"We'll get it," 'Yori' assured him, scowling. "We've got all the pieces now except a lot of anti-matter, which I'm going to arrange as soon as we have the coordinates to its sub-reality. Then it's going to go away for good. Very loudly."

Hnther smiled viciously. "That, I'm very pleased with."

They shook hands with him, before 'Yori' opened a portal. "Right. Let's go and visit Lldnr'k for a few minutes, then get back to Ami and the others. We still need to blow their minds." She grinned as 'Azumi' laughed, both women walking into the spacial rip and vanishing. Hnther watched the portal implode, then bent over Setsuna and began his own work.

Ami looked up from where she was listening to a frankly rather unlikely story of an old man who had a demon for a pet when she heard the portal, seeing Azumi and Yori walk out of the large rear room, talking quietly together. They entered the living room, which was rather crowded now, with ten people in it, Azumi grabbing a chair from the table and sitting on it next to Chou, and Yori moving to a position from which she could see everyone.
"Hnther has Setsuna. He's studying her now, he'll let us know soon what he's going to have to do, but he thinks we can probably fix most of what's wrong with her." She looked at Ami, Rei, and Hotaru for a moment. "It's not an ideal situation, but I trust him. He'll help her as much as he can."

Hotaru nodded, smiling. "I like Hnther. I think he'll fix her." Yori grinned at the younger girl.

"I think so too. We also gave her staff to Lldnr'k who is looking into getting the key to the portal we'll need. He's not sure how long that will take, it's kind of complicated, he says, there's some odd sort of temporal misalignment with that orb thing, but he's pretty sure he'll have the information soon." She looked around. "So, until we hear more, I may as well tell you a story..."
Still amazed how fast the reviews accumulate, and gratified as well. They're all read and appreciated. I'm very glad to have produced something that other people seem to feel is worth the effort.

"Have you worked out what it was, Great-grandmother?" Shampoo asked curiously from the door to her workroom. Cologne looked over her shoulder at the young woman, who was standing with Akane, both of them seeming somewhat concerned. She shook her head slowly, going back to her scrying bowl, which was doing absolutely nothing useful at all.

"No, I haven't. All I can tell is that there were three huge surges of something a bit like magic, but different enough that I can't even be sure they really were magic, which came from the direction of Minato. The last one was enormous." She gestured sharply, terminating the spell. "If I hadn't had the experience I gained with the methods I came up with weeks ago when I was tracing that strange magic around here, though, I'd never have noticed. I doubt many other mages did, if any. The energy was massive but..." She tried to work out how to explain it to someone who wasn't a mage. "Not on the same frequency as normal magic," she finally finished. "It's a poor analogy but the only one I can come up with."

"Is it related to the faint traces you were investigating?" Akane asked with interest.

"I'm... not sure, child. It might be. Both of them were a type of magic or magic-like energy I've never seen before, but they're not identical. Related, that's possible, I suppose. In either case, I have absolutely no idea what caused them or where they came from." She sighed, beginning to put her equipment away. "I can say that I very much doubt it was anything human that created either of them. The power level and complexity is simply staggering, far past any mage I've ever heard of." She turned again to look at them. Both young women appeared concerned, making her smile. "Don't worry, I doubt it's hostile. If it was we would most likely have known about it by now. Bearing in mind where it seems to have come from I suspect it is in some way associated with the demons that visit Minato. There are many people there who can deal with it if it is a threat, far better than I could, I assure you."

"I wonder if it's got anything to do with Ms Aoyama?" Akane mumbled, glancing at her friend, who shivered.

"Don't say that." Shampoo looked around nervously. "You never know..."

Watching them with mild amusement, Cologne chuckled raspily. "That strange woman left quite an impression on both of you, didn't she?" They looked at each other for a few seconds.

"You'd understand if you met her, Elder," Akane replied. "She's... not the sort of person you want to draw the attention of." Shampoo, standing beside her, nodded vigorously, a worried expression on her face.

"You can say that again."

"I thought she was the one who told Yori and her friends about your improving skills?" the Amazon elder prodded, grinning.

"Well, yes, and for that I'm grateful, but I don't really want to meet her again to tell her." The youngest Tendo sister giggled in a more high-pitched tone than normal, her eyes darting around.
Cologne decided she’d had enough amusement tormenting them.

"All right, girls, you should get back to practising. I need to clear up here then get back to the kitchen. Shampoo, when you're done can you give me a hand, please? The evening rush will start soon."

"Yes, Elder," the younger woman said, bowing her head for a moment, then smiling. "Come on, Akane, I need to go over those last two moves. You still haven't got them right."

"Hey, I got you in the last spar with the first one," Akane retorted. Shampoo laughed.

"Because I let you."

"Let me!? Oh, yes, I'm sure you let me. The look on your face..." Both girls wandered off, laughing, while Cologne watched them go with a small fond smile, before turning back to her workbench, putting the last few items into the relevant places.

'Young girls. Such fun.' She shook her head, amused, then looked out the window in the direction of Minato, a small frown crossing her face. 'But I'm a little worried about that... magic, or whatever it was... despite what I told them. Could it be some demonic mage? I wonder what they're doing, if so. And what they were doing in Nerima? The energy wasn't quite the same as those traces but I have a feeling they're connected in some way. There are too many similarities.' She wiped the workbench down, thinking hard. 'Perhaps I should pay a visit, just to check. I'm sure that one or other magical girl is on top of it, probably Yori and Chou from what I know of them, but I'm curious. And just a little bit worried...'

Putting the cloth away, she headed downstairs, a thoughtful expression still present.

Hotaru watched as Yori looked momentarily uncertain, something very unusual in her experience, before glancing at Chou. The blonde woman smiled serenely at her, nodding after a second or two, which seemed to make Yori relax. "Sorry. This is sort of difficult for me, I've gone to a hell of a lot of effort to keep it confidential for some years, so it's somewhat odd to be telling anyone else." She sighed a little. "But you need to know, I guess. Get comfortable, this is going to take a while, it's a long story"

"Ooh, is a good story?" Hotaru asked excitedly. "With monsters and magic and fighting?" Yori laughed, as did everyone else.

"Yes, I think I can satisfy all those requirements," she replied, grinning. "And a lot more as well." Pausing for thought, she nodded slowly to herself. "OK. Start at the beginning, I guess, with the important part." The black-haired woman looked around at the three new people. "Please don't freak out, some of it will definitely come as a surprise, I think." She looked particularly at Rei as she said this. The other woman coloured slightly, glancing at Ami who was sitting beside her.

"I'll try to be sensible, Yori," she replied, smiling a little.

"Fair enough. All right, what do you know about Nerima?" This took all three of them by surprise. Ami thought for a moment.

"A very weird place, some people say it's even crazier than Minato, although I've never been there. Super-powered martial artists all over the place, constantly fighting with each other over silly things, is what I heard." Yori looked at her friends, all of them laughing.
"Not far off the truth, actually." She pointed at Chou, then Azumi, then herself. "We all came from there originally."

Hotaru inspected her with interest, before doing the same to the others. Azumi winked at her, causing her to giggle. "So that's why you like people to call you a martial artist and not a magical girl?" she asked curiously. Yori smiled in an odd way.

"That's one reason, yes." Chou and Azumi exchanged a look that made them both smile. "There are others."

"Such as?" Ami looked very interested.

Yori parried the question with one of her own. "Have you heard of a place in China called Jusenkyo?" Ami frowned. After a moment she pulled out her computer, tapping on it for a moment, then frowned again. Yori and her friends watched with amusement.

"It rings a vague bell. I don't have much information on it, oddly enough, but what I have suggests it's the site of some remarkably powerful and dangerous magic. I don't have the details."

"I wouldn't suggest going there to get more information, the place is... not at all safe," Yori muttered darkly. "Yes, it's the source of some very powerful magic, something you could genuinely call a curse. Something I'm all to familiar with." She sighed faintly. "It was a damn nuisance for a very long time." Grabbing a chair from the table she spun it around, then sat on it with her arms folded on the back, watching them. Everyone watched her right back.

"Right, then, the main story. My father, who is an idiot, even if a very talented martial artist, started teaching me in his family school of martial arts as soon as I could walk. When I was about six we left on a training trip that took close to ten years to complete, taking us all over Japan, China, and several other places." She sighed as Hotaru and her friends listened with fascination. "It wasn't much fun in many ways. The martial arts were, most of the time, very rewarding, something I still love doing more than almost anything. I turned out to have a real gift for it. His teaching methods were totally insane but you certainly can't argue with the effectiveness of them, unfortunately. By the time we got back to Nerima I was one of the best martial artists in the world. Top ten at least." Ami glanced at Hotaru, who looked amazed. Rei was watching the woman in the chair with interest.

Yori sighed. "The big problem was that my father is, as I said, an idiot. He's a brilliant martial artist, a child abuser, a thief, a drunkard, and a cheat. Those are his good qualities." She lifted one side of her mouth in a cynical grin as Rei snickered. "To be fair to the old bastard, in recent years he does finally seem to have begun trying to become a better person, but as far as I'm concerned it's a bit late. Because of his idiocy I spent two years in total hell in Nerima, even leaving aside the things he managed to do while we were travelling. There was one particular training exercise..." She trailed off with a shudder, briefly flickering with purple light, which made the three women stare in mild horror. "I don't want to talk about that part. It's not important now anyway."

Pausing for a moment she seemed to gather her thoughts. "I didn't know it at the time but my father managed to engage me to a large number of people during our travels, usually for some piddly little thing in return, like a plate of rice or something stupid like that. Even now I have no idea really how many times he did that, it could be hundreds. Dozens, certainly. Only two of those occasions to my knowledge were sufficiently valid that they could be enforced, though." Shocked, Hotaru met Rei's eyes.

"He engaged you to dozens of boys without telling you?" she gasped, horrified. Yori stared at her, then started laughing helplessly, while all her friends exchanged amused looks.
"Oh, Hotaru, it gets better. Hold on, you'll see in a minute," she said, wiping a tear of laughter from her eye and grinning at the purple-haired girl. "It's more complicated than that. You see, the last place we visited before returning to Nerima was Jusenkyo. Dear old pop had managed to pick up the idea the place was a mysterious martial arts training ground, which to be honest it was at one point, a long time ago. He had no idea about the magic there, mainly because he didn't bother to find out. The locals knew damn well how dangerous the place is but he managed to avoid listening, and to my shame so did I. I was younger and more arrogant, kind of full of myself, I'll admit." She shrugged. "You grow out of that sort of thing in most cases. Unfortunately, I hadn't matured that far by that point. So, to cut an annoying story short, both of us ended up cursed."

"Cursed?" Ami asked slowly. "Cursed, how?"

"It's pretty strange. The Jusenkyo curse is amazingly powerful, amazingly old magic, which manifests as a large number of pools of water, each with a different version of the basic spell. If you fall into one of them, or even come into contact with a reasonable amount of the water from one, the spell latches on to you in a way that seems to be totally non-removable. Once you have it, you're stuck with it for life as far as anyone has ever been able to find out." Yori looked around at them all. "The curses stack as well, so you can be affected by more than one at the same time. That can be... very unpleasant."

"What does the curse do?" Rei asked, inspecting her closely. "You seem fine to me."

"It's a transformational curse." She looked amused as Rei seemed shocked. "Basically, what it does is give you an alternate form with a water-based trigger. If you get wet with cold water, anything below roughly body temperature, the curse activates and changes you into the form the curse is based on. Water hotter than that turns you back."

Hotaru looked at her for a long moment, then at Rei and Ami, who had flabbergasted expressions on their faces. "And you've got this curse?"

"Yep."

"But... I saw you swimming in that waterpark on K'n'nn four! That water was colder than body temperature and it didn't change you." She stared narrowly at the other woman, who grinned back.

"I said it was incurable, which is true. I didn't say there weren't ways around it."

"It took a long time to come up with a workaround," Chou added quietly, "but we did. It's not perfect, although over the years it's become very effective."

Staring at her, then Yori, Rei finally shook her head. "So, what you're telling me, is that you have a curse that turns you into something else if you get wet, and so does your father?"

"Exactly." Yori looked at her with a smile.

"What do you two turn into?" the other woman asked, clearly extremely curious.

"Well, Pop managed to fall into the spring of drowned panda, which is what the Chinese there call it. When he gets wet, he turns into a panda." They stared at her for several seconds, unblinking. "Honest. It's pretty weird. People in Nerima are used to it by now but someone from out of the district tends to look confused when they see a giant panda walking down the street drinking a bottle of beer." She laughed as they looked even more confused and startled. After a long pause, broken only by Azumi laughing quietly, Rei asked another question, the obvious one.

"So what pool did you fall into?"
"The spring of drowned girl."

"When you get wet, you turn into... a girl?" Hotaru stared, then started giggling. Yori looked back, amusement on her face, nodding.

"Pretty much."

"That must be difficult for you," Rei commented, grinning.

"Well, it's a bit more complicated than that." The black-haired woman seemed simultaneously amused and slightly sad.

"I assume you look different when in this alternate form?" Ami asked with curiosity in her voice. Rather than replying, without moving, Yori shimmered and changed. Hotaru let out a little shriek of shock, unable to help it, while Rei swore under her breath. Ami stared in total amazement, not even remembering to use the computer she was still holding, total stunned surprise on her face.

All three of them inspected the new figure sitting in the exact same pose in the chair and grinning at them. It was a slightly smaller woman, looking a little older but no more than her early twenties, with brilliant red hair in the same braid Yori wore, her piercing brilliant blue eyes full of amusement at their reaction. She was genuinely beautiful, although looking nothing at all like Yori. "Holy shit," Rei finally managed to gasp out.

The redhead laughed, her soprano voice quite different to the one they were used to, although the body language matched. It was clearly still Yori. "It's a shock the first time you see it, isn't it?"

"You might say that," Ami mumbled, still staring wide-eyed. She got up and walked over, then gingerly prodded the other woman's shoulder. "Oh, my god, it's real."

"Completely. Right down to the genetics. My mind doesn't change at all but everything else does." The woman in the chair smiled at them. "I'll let you recover before we get onto the good part."

All three shared a glance of shock. There was more? Returning to her seat, Ami sat down and just stared for a while. Eventually she shook her head. "That's the most amazing thing I've ever seen and I've seen some pretty weird things done with magic." She fiddled with her computer for a moment, scanning the redhead. "It's not an illusion, or a perception spell, or anything else that this can detect."

"Completely real." The woman stood, turning in place, allowing them to see she was a few centimetres shorter than the Yori they were used to, then resumed her seated position. "Weird, isn't it."

"By the sound of it you got lucky, though," Rei suggested with a look of astonishment still on her face. "What were the odds of falling into a pool that left you still human and female?"

Chou suddenly giggled, while Aiko and Azumi snorted with laughter. The others exchanged looks. Puzzled, Rei looked around. "Obviously I'm missing something."

"I'm afraid so." The woman in the chair looked at them, her amusement vanishing. "The next part is likely to be even more shocking. Please don't over-react." Staring at her, Rei then looked at her friends. Hotaru felt an odd sensation in the pit of her stomach which made her think something even wilder was coming, not sure she wanted to know. "That change you just saw, that wasn't the curse. This is my cursed form, true, but the other one... We came up with a technique quite a while ago, one we've been refining for years, which allows some pretty radical changes. My other body, the one you know, is the result of that technique."
Hotaru studied her for some time, as Ami and Rei did much the same. "What does that mean?" she finally asked in a small voice, afraid of the answer. The redhead sighed, smiling gently at her in a way that reminded her very strongly of Chou.

"The name I was born under, my true name, is Ranma Saotome." She met each of their eyes in turn, looking regretful, slightly embarrassed, and somewhat worried. "And this is my original form." She changed again, without the shimmering effect of before. All three of them stared in total shock at the figure in the chair for nearly thirty seconds, before Hotaru burst into tears and ran from the room, heading for the place they'd arrived, her mind whirling.

Ranma sighed heavily. Standing he shimmered back into the form of Yori. "Can you continue the explanation, love?" she asked Chou, who stood and walked over to her, hugging her for a moment. "I need to talk to her alone." She looked at Ami and Rei who were still motionless, following her with their eyes. "Sorry about this."

Watching as the black-haired woman went into the practice room, sliding the door shut behind her, they finally exchanged unreadable but shocked glances, before turning to Chou, who smiled apologetically.

Feeling a familiar presence beside her, Hotaru curled into a smaller ball where she was huddled in the corner of the large room, sobbing in shock and betrayal. She heard a very faint sigh. After a few seconds, the figure beside her sat down. There was silence for several minutes, only her soft crying breaking it.

"When I found out what happened to me, what my idiot father had done to me, I wanted to kill him. When I calmed down, I came close to killing myself. I know what it's like to find something you've grown used to totally changed instantly." The voice was soft and regretful. "It affected me for years, very badly. Looking back on it I can see I overcompensated for the whole thing which, added to the arrogance of youth, caused me and those around me a lot of trouble. None of it was deliberate, I regret most of it, but there it is. There are a lot of other things as well but we can go into those some other time." The voice of Yori paused for a moment. "A stupid decision by a stupid man is still hurting people I care about years later. I'm truly sorry that you feel betrayed. That was never the intention, believe me." Hotaru sniffled for a moment.

Without lifting her head, she asked in a low voice, "How do you know what I'm feeling?"

"Because I can feel it as well. I'm a master of ki manipulation. That gives you all sorts of interesting abilities. Reading the emotional state of someone else, especially someone you like, is trivial." Hotaru sniffled again, raising her head and looking sideways. Yori was sitting next to her staring at the painting on the opposite wall, her face calm and reflective yet still showing regret.

"I really liked Yori," the younger woman said quietly and sadly. "Now I find out she's not even real." The woman beside her turned her head to meet her eyes, her own violet ones showing the pain she felt.

"She's real. I'm real. We're the same person. This is me." She shimmered, becoming the beautiful redhead from earlier. "This is still me, just looking different." Once more she changed, the good-looking dark-haired man smiling at her slightly. "This is still me as well. Inside, I'm the same person all the time. I can put a different outside on without any effort, true, and I'm pretty damn good at acting differently, but the essential me doesn't change. I hope you can look past the outside. I like you a lot as well, Hotaru, I would very much like to help you reach the level I know you're capable of, never mind helping with all the problems you girls have. I never intended to hurt you, any of you. When you hear the rest of the story you'll understand why all this has been necessary."
"It's all a lie, though, isn't it?" Hotaru said with despair in her voice, dropping her head again. "Just like my life is a lie. Everything I thought was real isn't. Something has been manipulating me my entire life, and now I find out the one person I really, truly, thought I could trust has been doing the same thing from the day we met." Silence fell, making her eventually look up. The pain in the eyes of the person next to her showed his feelings more than words could have done. He looked away after a moment, his gaze going back to the painting.

"I don't think that what we've been doing is the same as what the time device has done, although I can understand why it might seem like that to you under the circumstances. We had different motives for how we operate. Yori isn't a lie. She is me, another facet of me, no more or less real than how I am now. A bit like how your powered up persona differs from how you are at the moment, although somewhat more effective at disguising who I am from others." He glanced at her, then away. "But it might not seem like that to you right now." The young man leaning against the wall fell silent as she thought over his words. They had the ring of truth to them although she still felt upset about it.

"All I can offer you is that I'm sorry," he finally continued. "I don't like hurting people, or betraying them. I've had far too much of that in my own life. Believe me, I understand. There were, and are, very good reasons for all this sneaking around, but they shouldn't have dragged you in like they have." He looked back to her. "I will say this. When we decided to trust you girls, it was an all or nothing thing. The same as we have done with Aiko and her team. They're family, as close to me as a real sister would have been. I would die to keep them safe, without a second thought. We all feel like that. If you never want to see any of us again once this is all over, that's your decision, one we would accept, but we'd all prefer if you three became part of our little group, however you want to. I can promise that I won't keep any more secrets from you, aside from some promises I made to certain people years ago which I won't break. They don't affect you directly so they need to stay confidential." He smiled a little. "I keep my promises. It's one of the many nice things about me."

Despite herself she giggled a little, looking away quickly. They both fell silent again. She felt slightly less sad but even more confused. After some time, Ranma turned to her. "Come with me, I want to show you something." He stood, offering her his hand. She stared at it for a few seconds then took it, slightly reluctantly. Pulling her to her feet he guided her to the door in the end wall through which a flight of stairs could be seen. Following him up she blinked when he opened a door to reveal a garden of all things. Gingerly stepping through the doorway, she looked around, unable to suppress the smile that came onto her face.

"This is nice," she said quietly.

"We like it." He smiled back, then motioned for her to follow him as he made his way through the undergrowth. After a longer walk than she thought likely on what was obviously the roof of the apartment building they were in they came to a set of glass doors, which he opened, waving her through. The smell of chlorine came out, a familiar smell, as she entered, looking around in amazement.

"There's a swimming pool on the roof?" she exclaimed in surprise.

Ranma laughed. "Yes. It was designed as part of the fire system, it's basically the reservoir for the sprinklers and fire hoses in an emergency. But since we have no plans on burning the place down, which you couldn't do anyway with the spells that are on this building, it's just the pool. Aiko comes here a lot, so do I." He thought for a moment. "Well, we all do, actually. It's one of our favourite places."

"You're allowed to use it whenever you want?" she asked, curious. He chuckled, glancing at her as "You might say that." Checking some instruments on the wall he nodded in satisfaction. "We own it, we can do what we want with it." She gaped at him, her shock and sadness pushed to one side for the time being.

"Own it...?"

The martial artist nodded with a wide grin. "Yes, indeed. We own the entire building. I'll show you around if you like."

Hotaru stared in renewed shock, then looked around wildly, before looking back at him. "This is all yours?"

"Yep." Walking over to the edge of the pool he peered into the deep end for a few seconds before turning to her. "The technique we came up with originally as a disguise spell is very powerful, far more effective than we ever expected it to be. Like I said, it can do some interesting things. You might find some of them fun. Like this one." To her abrupt surprise he stepped sideways into the pool, disappearing in a large splash. She gaped for a moment, wondering what the point of that exercise was, especially fully dressed.

A head popped up, the red-headed woman grinning at her. She smiled back, it was such a silly sight. "Why did you do that?" she asked curiously.

"I wanted a swim." Ranma laughed, her clear voice still holding all the intonations of his male form. "We do it slightly differently around here, though." The head vanished underwater, making her take a step closer, then jump back in shock as the mermaid launched herself out of the water with a flick of her tail, somersaulting twice before re-entering the pool with almost no splash at all.

Hotaru stared in total disbelief for a long moment before she slowly began to laugh, sadness being gradually replaced with a sensation of shocked happiness.

It might be worth giving Yori, Ranma, whoever he or she was, a second chance.
the balcony at the large building she could see in the distance. "Oh. That's the university, I see where we are, now." Stepping back from the window she studied the apartment some more. It was very nice, showing good taste and considerable effort in maintaining it. A scroll hanging on the wall caught her eye, so she wandered over to look at it. Reading it she blinked a few times.

"Grand Master of the Anything Goes School of Martial Arts?" she read out loud, looking at the names on the bottom. She recognised the one she'd just heard but had no idea who 'Happosai' was.
Turning to Chou she saw the woman looked quietly proud.

"Yes. He earned it, believe me."

Moving back to the sofa, Ami sat down again, her mind still whirling with the shock of what she'd seen. However, as she came to grips with it, something seemed vaguely familiar to her. "Saotome.
Where have I heard that name before?" she muttered.

"I very much hope it wasn't in conjunction with the words fiancée and Ami," Chou said with a weird smile. Azumi snickered, looking at them both. Ami shook her head absently, trying to remember. Eventually she retrieved her computer and prodded around on it for a moment.

"Yes. I thought I'd heard the name before. Ranma Saotome, Nerima. He was fairly well known in a particular set of people around there." She read the entry with her eyebrows going up further and further at each sentence. "Um, destroyed a mountain when he was seventeen?"

Azumi held up two fingers. "Two mountains. Although he was nearly eighteen when the second one happened, and to be fair it wasn't him by himself, he had help."

"Fought a massively powerful part-dragon being on a number of occasions?"

"Yes. He lost a few times but won in the end." Chou looked amused.

"Killed some sort of near-godlike being in China?"

"It was a close thing, but he was very angry and very clever."

Ami's hand was trembling slightly. "There are dozens of reports here. At least half a dozen that suggest he, or she, killed several very nasty demons, although it's more by inference than anything else. Several things from China, a few from all around Japan, lots in Nerima." She read further.
"Chinese Amazons? Bird people? Ghosts?"

"You have good information," Aiko snickered, glancing at Azumi. "Most people couldn't have found a lot of those."

"Holy shit," Rei mumbled, reading the screen over her shoulder. "And now he's the leader of the Sisterhood of Doom?" Chou collapsed in hysterical laughter after a wide-eyed look, followed by all the others, leaving Ami and Rei staring at each other.

"He'll love that," Azumi chortled, heaving with mirth. The blonde woman beside her couldn't even manage that.

"I told him ages ago we needed a name for this group of people," Aiko gasped, shaking her head in amusement, then fell over in renewed laughter.

Grinning, Misaki picked up the cereal bar she'd dropped and put it away. "I'm not sure he'll want to use that one," she commented, looking mockingly sad for a moment or two. "But I like it."
Rei and Ami exchanged glances for a moment. "You're all nuts," the black-haired girl said.

"Oh, you're not wrong there," Tamiko replied, giggling intermittently. "It certainly helps."

Eventually they regained their composure, although the occasional giggle still came from one or other woman. Chou, still smiling, inspected Ami and Rei. "I'm sorry but that really was extremely funny," she apologised.

Looking at the screen again, Ami closed the computer with a snap and put it away. "From what I can find out, he vanished off the face of the earth nearly five years ago. One of the people he was living with also disappeared at the same time. No one seems to know what happened, or where they went." She looked around. "So where did this other person, this Kasumi Tendo, go?"

Chou smiled gently, shimmered, then changed into the form of a somewhat older, attractive slim brunette, still wearing the same smile. "I married him."

Rei watched Ami pacing back and forth in the middle of the living room, looking like one more shock would make her explode. She sympathised mightily. Things had gone far beyond normal magical girl weird into totally twilight zone levels of crazy. The tall brunette, who still had Chou's smile on a face that was nothing like the Chou she knew, watched the blue-haired girl as well, waiting for her to work it out.

"Are all of you going to turn into someone else?" Rei finally asked, looking around. Several of her companions grinned.

"Only me," Azumi said, becoming a short-haired brunette without moving from her seat. Ami stopped dead, then sighed heavily, while Rei just stared.

"And who are you?" the blue-haired woman demanded.

"Her sister, Nabiki," the new woman laughed, pointing at Kasumi. She held out her hand. "Pleased to meet you Ms Mizuno." Rei started giggling at the look on Ami's face, causing Azumi, or Nabiki, to throw a quick amused look her way.

"Oh, for fuck's sake!" Ami snarled, stomping over and shaking the outstretched hand, then dropping into her seat again, looking around helplessly. "None of this makes any sense. Will someone please explain what the hell is going on?"

Aiko and her girls were grinning, while Nabiki seemed simply amused. They all looked at Kasumi, who smiled more widely. "All right. I'm sorry for all the dramatic reveals, it's worse than a soap opera, but it's very funny. We couldn't resist once we got started." Ami scowled at her, making her laugh. "This is what happened..."

They listened for over two hours to the most incredible story either of them had heard for a long time. Kasumi and Nabiki explained the Tendo Dojo, the fiancées, the rivals, the challengers, and all the insanity of Nerima that made Minato look like a fairly sensible place a lot of the time. Aiko and the others told them about the first time they'd met Ranma and how their friendship developed from that. They were just beginning to talk about the way Nabiki had finally tracked Ranma and Kasumi down over a year ago when Hotaru and the martial artist reappeared from wherever they'd been. The purple-haired girl was smiling and talking rapidly to him, making him laugh.

No trace of her earlier distress was evident, Rei noticed, wondering what they'd talked about. Hotaru's reaction had somewhat surprised her at first but after a little thought she had a fairly good idea of why the younger girl had reacted like that. Ranma looked around at them all, concentrating on Rei and Ami, then leaned over his wife and kissed her cheek. "Thank you, love. I'm sorry I was away so long but Hotaru and I needed to talk." Kasumi reached up and held his face in one hand for a few seconds, smiling at him.

"I understand, dear." She looked at Hotaru. "I hope you're feeling better about all this now?"

"I am, thank you, Kasumi," the purple-haired girl said politely, showing very little surprise at the way Chou and Azumi had become two completely different people. Rei stared for a moment, then looked at Ami, who looked back, puzzled. Ranma caught their expressions and laughed.

"I filled her in on what Kas has been telling you about," he explained. Looking intently at Rei he added in a quizzical voice, "Sisterhood of Doom? Not quite the sort of thing I ever considered but it does have a certain ring to it, I'll admit."

"How the hell do you do that?" Ami exploded. "You were nowhere near us. How did you find out what we were talking about?" Rei leaned away from her friend as she shouted. "Is this entire place bugged or something?"

Several people laughed for a moment. Scowling, Ami looked around, meeting a number of immediately blank faces. "No, it's not bugged, as such," Nabiki offered. "It's something a little more interesting than that." Ami, Rei, and Hotaru suddenly twitched as the wall with the balcony doors in it vanished, replaced with what at first sight looked like a mirror, reflecting the inside of the living room, although it didn't take long for them all to realise the viewpoint was all wrong. Staring at it in shock, Rei wondered what was odd about it. Eventually she noticed it was more like the view from a camera behind her somewhere, and even had a smaller version of itself in the image. And in that one, a smaller one...

Turning her head she searched for the camera. Nothing was visible. Ami was doing the same thing, while Hotaru, after a quick look around, stood up and approached the wall, peering closely at it. "This is coming from one of those projectors like on S'th'x's ship, isn't it?" she asked curiously.

"That's right," Ranma agreed. "We have one in the apartment now, it's much better than a TV."

"But where's the camera?" Ami asked, waving her computer around and scanning the area, fruitlessly, judging by her expression. Nabiki grinned. Lifting a hand she waved it in front of her face, making Rei jump again when a massive hand went past the projected view in full 3D. She stared in shock, glanced at Ami, who was doing the same thing, then both of them turned to look at Nabiki, who looked smugly amused.

"What the fuck...?" Ami gaped for a moment, then slowly approached the brunette, staring at her face. Nabiki held still and locked eyes with her. Glancing at the projection Rei could see Ami's face growing larger and larger, until it nearly filled the wall. Hotaru was looking between the image and Nabiki, beginning to grin. "How...?" Reaching slowly out Ami waved her own hand in front of Nabiki, looking over her shoulder at the image, where she could see the results, which were completely real-time.

"You have... cameras in your eyes!? Are you some sort of cyborg?" she squeaked in shock.

"Not at all, not like you're thinking. No machinery inside me, I'm one hundred percent organic," the middle Tendo replied, looking vastly amused.

"But how are you doing that?" Ami asked, staring at the projection, then experimentally waving her hand again.
"Ah. That is a secret," the brunette replied, then fell over laughing as Ami literally growled at her, gritting her teeth. Rei watched with growing amusement. It was very rare that her friend lost her temper like that. Not letting her know something she really wanted to understand was a pretty good way to achieve that end result, though.

Relenting after a few seconds during which Ami went an amusing colour, Nabiki made a small gesture with one hand and held it up. On it was a small black oblong shaped piece of technology, from what Rei could see, devoid of any markings. She got the eerie feeling it was looking at her. "This is a Kw'lyn Industries Mark Nine Gamma military specification secure communications unit. Its name is Jun." She smiled at the befuddled look the three girls gave her. "It says it's pleased to meet you." Waving her computer over it Ami looked at the results, very puzzled.

"There's nothing there, according to this," she mumbled.

"Jun says your technology is doing the best it can but is some generations behind state of the art where it comes from," Nabiki giggled. The blue-haired girl stared at her, then the little device. With another twist of her hand the middle sister made the thing vanish again.

"It says?" Rei asked, wondering about the odd wording. Nabiki glanced at her, smiling.

"Yes. The device has a Synthetic Intelligence, which is an amazingly good simulation of a mind. It started off at what it termed level six conversational ability, which meant, according to it, that it wasn't a truly sentient mind but was able to simulate one for most purposes. I'm not sure that's true any more, they learn very fast." She paused, then added, "Jun told me it believes it would now be rated a level seven but lacks external proof of that."

Ami was gaping again. "You have an intelligent computer?" Nabiki grinned, nodding.

"Basically. It's a lot more than that, though. The communications between SIs is to the best of our knowledge completely undetectable, unbreakably encrypted for almost any definition of the word 'unbreakable', seems to be completely unaffected by almost anything except certain wards, and even then can't actually be blocked, just degraded a little." The brunette looked amused again as Ami just stared at her. Rei was listening with shock, the thing sounded unbelievable. "They directly interface with the brain, allowing them to read sensory information from the visual cortex, auditory pathways, things like that, and also put data back. So, for example, the image on the projector is being read straight from my eyes. No camera required."

Rei and Ami looked at each other for a long moment. "Fuck me," Rei breathed.

"Oh, it gets better," Nabiki told them. "Since it can both read and write to the sensory parts of the brain, you can do all sorts of interesting things with it. Very effective night vision, for example, is almost trivial. It can pull data from my visual cortex, boost the gain, filter the noise, then put it back, completely in real time. Or do things like enhance contrast, do targeting and tracking operations, overlay data and video over my viewpoint, increase hearing sensitivity, not to mention interfacing with basically any sort of electronic system via some sort of incredible subspace linkage, even over considerable distances." She laughed at their expressions.

"They were obviously designed as intelligence aids as much as anything. In the right hands they're incredibly effective as infiltration tools. I haven't found a computer system yet that can resist, although the one on the asteroid was the biggest challenge so far by a long way. Ones on Earth are no effort at all, even military ones."

Kasumi giggled, looking at Ami, who seemed to have gone into shock. Rei looked at her. "The primary purpose of them is secure communications, at which they excel. We can talk to each other anywhere on the planet, or as far as the moon, with no lag or interference, even share each other's senses. You get used to it amazingly fast. It's somewhat like what I would expect telepathy is, only probably better." She smiled a little, adding, "You don't need a phone any more, for example."

Rei's communicator buzzed at the same time Ami and Hotaru's did the same. They exchanged a glance, each pulling their devices out and looking at them. Rei answered hers.

"You see, they can link into essentially any communications system with no real effort," Nabiki's voice sounded, while she looked at them, her lips not moving. "Which can be pretty strange to use for the first few days, I'll admit. You take it for granted after a while. It becomes natural, like another sense, basically. I'd say that getting Jun is probably the best thing that came out of all my recent experiences, even better than most of the magical girl stuff."

Staring in bemused amazement, Hotaru smiled slowly. Lifting her communicator to her lips she turned away and whispered into it. Nabiki laughed out loud.

"Yes, Hotaru, I can hear you perfectly." The younger woman giggled, shaking her head with a joyous expression.

"That's incredible!" she shouted, whirling back to grin at them. "I want one!"

Ami was apparently in shock. She kept looking between Nabiki, Rei's communicator, and the wall, which was still displaying what Nabiki was looking at. Rei got the impression she couldn't think what to say. "What else can they do?" the black-haired woman finally asked, mainly to fill the silence.

Ranma shrugged a little. "You'd have to read the manual, really. There's more than can really be explained easily. Their storage capacity is so large it's almost infinite, they can record everything you see, hear, smell, anything like that, then send the recordings to other SI units, they make incredible word processors, you can watch TV in the privacy of your own head..." He smiled. "I could go on but we'd be here all day. Think of every function of every electronic device you've ever seen rolled into one system with a direct pathway to your brain, and a guiding intelligence that's smart, helpful, and loyal. That's the just the start of it."

"My god," Ami finally breathed, gaping at him. "How did you ever get something like that? Where did you get them from?"

"Uthryyl acquired a number of them legitimately from the manufacturers some time ago, he gave us a dozen of them. They were incredibly expensive, in our currency probably in excess of multiple billions of yen each, but more than worth it. The SIs add a huge amount of effectiveness to our existing abilities. Plus they're a lot of fun and nice to talk to."

Kasumi smiled happily. "I would agree with my sister, acquiring them was a very significant improvement to our lives."

"It turns out that Yori and Chou, along with Uthryyl, were on a pre-approved list of people allowed to possess the SIs. The makers are very cautious about who they allow to have them for fairly obvious reasons," Fumiko interjected with a look of amusement on her face. Ami and her friends stared at her. "They were able to authorise the rest of us to use them. Very few of the units exist outside their own world."

"The makers are far ahead of any other species we've heard of in magitech computer technology, and most likely other things," Nabiki added. "They keep to themselves, apparently, but their equipment is the gold standard everywhere and implicitly trusted by everyone."
"Wow." Rei couldn't think of anything else to say. She glanced at Hotaru, who was almost vibrating with excitement, suddenly feeling much like her young friend was obviously feeling. She wanted one as well, very suddenly.

Slumping back into her seat on the sofa, Ami closed her eyes and shook her head tiredly. Everyone watched her, mostly sympathetically. "I was just getting my head around the truth about Yori, Chou, and Azumi, which was a hell of a shock, then you spring this on me. I knew there was something interesting going on, the way you could get information from each other over silly distances without any obvious magic or technology going on, but this is..." After a pause, she finished weakly, "... a bit much."

Opening her eyes and looking at Rei, she almost smiled. "I'm impressed you're not screaming with rage about all the surprises. I'd have expected you to be a little worked up, based on past experience."

Rei flushed slightly, then shrugged helplessly. "It's been so surreal I don't quite know what to feel, to be honest. I don't think it's sunk in yet." Looking around at the other woman, she asked, "Do you all have these things?" Everyone nodded at once, in a synchronised manner that made her skin crawl for a moment.

"Yes, we do," they chorused, then started laughing.

"That's really weird," Hotaru giggled.

"Weird? We think we're completely normal," seven voices said as one. Rei and Ami winced. "The Sisterhood of Doom welcomes you. You have been assimilated." There was a long pause, then Ranma and his friends broke down in hysterical laughter. Ami glared for a moment, looking worried, while Rei cracked up. Hotaru fell over and rolled around giggling her head off.

"That's the freakiest thing I've ever seen," the blue-haired woman grumbled. "Stop it." She blinked as Ranma suddenly became female again, the laughter rising in pitch a couple of octaves, without interruption. "No. That's the freakiest thing I've ever seen."

"I'm really not sure about the Sisterhood of Doom being a good name," Ranma chuckled, "it could give the wrong impression. But it is kind of funny."

Gasping for breath, Rei nodded. "Sorry, but it sort of came out without me thinking."

Waiting for the laughter to die down, Ami keep studying the female Ranma. After a while she said, "I don't mean to be rude, but I have to ask. Are you male or female?"

The red-head looked at her, smiling in a peculiar manner. "Yes," she said. Ami waited, looking puzzled when nothing more was added.

"Very helpful. Could you expand on that?"

Ranma shrugged. "I was born male, as I said. The curse turns me completely female, physically. I've spent a lot of the last seven years female, there was no way around it to start with, I tended to get splashed with cold water a lot. The more I tried to avoid it the more often it happened, usually in the most embarrassing way. Meeting Aiko and the others was the start of becoming able to accept I was stuck and beginning to learn to live with it. Kasumi helped with the rest. In the end, I couldn't honestly say at this point that I'm either one. It's a simple choice, I can be whatever I want whenever I want. My mind is always the same, I'm just Ranma. What the outside looks like is immaterial, really." She looked thoughtful for a second or two. "It's difficult to explain to someone who's never experienced it. I think I'm mentally more much male than female, but I know a number of females who think very much the way I do, as far as I can tell. I also know males who seem to think more like a female from what I can observe. I guess it comes down to the fact that gender isn't a hard and fast thing to begin with." She snickered a little. "Much less so in my case."

Watching her for a few seconds, Ami shook her head a little, then glanced down at the computer she was still holding, absently tucking it away. "I have to admit I find that very hard to understand. It must have been difficult for you when you were first changed like that."

Ranma sighed, looking at Kasumi, who reached out and held her hand. "It was. For over a year I thought it was total hell. Not only the change itself, but in many ways more the way people treated me as a result. Disgust, hate, fear, revulsion, they were all common reactions, which didn't exactly help me in dealing with it. Some people were OK with the change, Kasumi being the main one in the Tendo household, although even she was very surprised at first." She thought, changing back to male without seeming to notice, then added, "In fact, thinking about it in most ways Nabiki was probably the least worried to begin with. Surprised, yes, but not scared." Everyone looked at the middle Tendo, who shrugged.

"It's true. It was definitely a shock but I thought it was more interesting than scary."

"I came to realise my initial impression was wrong quite rapidly," Kasumi added quietly, still holding her husband's hand. "But by the time I did, it was too late. Akane had been pushed into becoming the one true fiancée, something she was never happy about for the most part, and it just got worse from there. When everything came to a head I was terrified I'd lost him forever. Luckily, I was wrong." She smiled at the young man with visible love in her eyes. "Something I'll be forever grateful for."

"The whole thing is very weird," Rei commented, watching them with mild envy. She knew true love when she saw it. Hotaru was watching as well with a small smile. Ami looked slightly puzzled still, as if she was trying to work it all out.

"Oh, it is that," Aiko said, looking at her. "By the time he met us, though, he was pretty much on the verge of accepting it. Kasumi was probably the main driver of that. If it hadn't been for the influence of both his parents, mostly his father, although his mother bears some blame as well, he'd probably have accepted it much earlier and just got on with life. I like to think we helped the situation. I know he helped us an enormous amount, then and ever since."

"You probably saved my sanity, to be honest, guys," Ranma assured them. "I was on the verge of doing something pretty damn dramatic. If it hadn't been for the way you accepted me without question, and the distraction of helping you all, I don't like to think what might have happened. It could well have been a lot worse than what it ended up being, as bad as that was."

"What about sex?" Ami asked, looking like she couldn't believe she was having this conversation but was unable to stop herself. Ranma studied her for a long moment during which she flushed.

"Thank you for the offer, Ami, but I'm happily married," he eventually replied with a perfectly straight face. Ami went bright red, Hotaru nearly fell unconscious from laughter, and everyone else howled with mirth.

"That's NOT what I meant and you know it!" the blue-haired woman shouted. "I meant, how does it affect you regarding sex. Do you like men or women? Or both?" Clapping her hands over her mouth looking horribly embarrassed, she flushed again. "Sorry. I didn't mean to shout that. It's sort of personal," she squeaked, while Ranma grinned widely at her. "But I'm really curious. I've never seen anything like this before."
"Always wanting to learn, aren't you, Ami?" He chuckled. "That's a good thing, on the whole." She seemed to calm down a little although still looked embarrassed. "I like women, or more accurately, one specific woman," he assured her, looking at Kasumi for a moment. "No matter what form I'm in. That will never change." Looking amused he added, "I suppose when I'm female I'm a committed lesbian, and when I'm male I'm just normally heterosexual."

Everyone looked at him, then turned to look at Kasumi. She smiled in a gentle and mysterious way, totally unaffected by the scrutiny. "I'm Ranma sexual. It doesn't matter what he is, or she is, he's my mate, forever."

Hotaru, sitting up from where she'd been lying on the floor giggling, sighed, watching them.
"You're so lucky, Kasumi. To have found your soul-mate like that. I don't know any other magical girls who even have steady boyfriends, really."

Glancing at her, Rei said, "Usagi thought she was supposed to be getting a boyfriend, one of the things the cats told us suggested that, but he never turned up. She was looking for him for a long time." Sighing slightly, she shook her head sadly. "I think that's one of the things that made her go a little odd. Makoto is always trying to find a guy as well but comes on so hard she tends to scare them off."

"Michiru and Haruka found each other," Ami said absently, then looked guiltily at Hotaru, who had closed her eyes in momentary pain. Rei shot her an annoyed look. "Sorry, Hotaru, I didn't mean..."

The younger girl shook her head then opened her eyes, sighing a little in the process. "Don't worry, Ami, it's not your fault. It just caught me by surprise. I was trying not to think about it."

Everyone pondered the purple-haired girl, who shifted around to sit cross-legged on the carpet and looked out the window, now visible again since at some point in the last couple of minutes, without the three of them noticing, Nabiki had killed the projection. She sighed again, faintly.
Looking at her sadly, Rei felt very sorry for her. The break-up of their group had in some ways affected the younger woman more than anyone, since whichever way you looked at it she'd essentially lost at least one adoptive parent. After a little while she turned to Ami, seeing the other woman was looking irritated with herself. Their eyes met for a second, before they turned back to Ranma, who was also watching Hotaru with an expression of understanding sorrow.

"It's an unavoidable side-effect of the life-style," he said quietly, still watching the girl. "For lots of reasons finding a significant other when you do the sorts of things we do and face the challenges we face is complicated and difficult. The secrecy that most of the girls work under doesn't help." Returning his gaze to them, he shrugged slightly. "The same thing happens with certain types of soldiers, some police, people like that, for most of the same reasons. Lots of one-night stands and not a lot of successful marriages or even long-term relationships. Can't be helped, I'm afraid."

There was a long thoughtful silence, eventually broken by Rei, who asked, "OK, as mad as it all sounds so far, we're still only half-way through the story, which I for one am still very curious about. You, Nabiki, finally figured out he was in Minato, I got that. How did you end up as a magical girl, for heaven's sake? I'd have thought from what you two told us that when you found him and your sister you'd have dragged both of them back to Nerima or something."

Nabiki smiled reflectively. "That was more or less the original intent, I'll admit. By that point I was more looking for word of Kasumi than anything else. We all missed her terribly, plus there was a hell of a lot of guilt involved. Akane wouldn't talk about it, Dad seldom did, only when just drunk enough, and I didn't mention it very often either, but we all knew it was our fault she was gone.
We'd driven Ranma off, or to be brutally honest, mainly Akane had driven him off, although everyone else certainly helped to one degree or another, but Sis was another matter." She looked at "Over the years I came to suspect it was possibly for the best as far as she was concerned that she'd gone. Akane couldn't accept that. For a long time she claimed that Ranma had kidnapped Kasumi, insisting we needed to find them so she could rescue her big sister and do... something, I'm not sure what... to her 'kidnapper.' Nabiki looked mildly disgusted for a moment, making little air quotes around that last word. "She wasn't rational about it at all. In the end, though, I gave up searching deliberately, around eighteen months after they left. She wasn't happy about it, not at all. But I never gave up hope that I'd see her again. Finding Ranma seemed the most likely way to find her. Then one day, out of the blue more or less, I got some information that... changed my life." She grinned, looking enormously happy for a long moment. "Totally changed everything. And in the end I found my sister, a new brother, and so much more besides."

Rei nodded thoughtfully, looking at her friends. Ami was listening with interest and Hotaru was hanging on every word like it was the best story she'd ever heard.

"We knew she was coming," Kasumi told them, looking amused, "because we'd taken steps very soon after establishing ourselves to be kept informed about the goings-on in Nerima, partly so we could protect ourselves and partly to make sure nothing happened to the people at the Dojo."

"That last bit was mainly Kas," Ranma added, grinning for a second, "at the time I wasn't all that worried about their general well-being."

"I can understand that," Ami assured him. "The story Kasumi told us is fairly horrific in many ways."

"There's a lot more to it, but it would take hours to go over even a fairly small amount," he replied, scowling slightly, then brightening up. "You're getting the highlights and basic plot at the moment. I'll tell you more details some other time if you really want to know."

'I'd like that, thanks."

"That first day, when I finally saw my older sister after nearly three years with not a word, that was a good day." Nabiki smiled to herself, looking at nothing in particular. "Even with all the shocks I got." Her eyes focussed on Ami, Rei, and Hotaru. "You think you guys have had a surprise... I had no experience of magical girls, of magic, really, beyond the Jusenkyo curses and a few small things I'd seen over the years as a result of Ranma and all the weird people he attracted. Suddenly I was inundated with it. Finding out that your older sister, the one that had been a mother figure to you and everyone else for years, the one who wouldn't hurt a fly and hardly ever even stopped smiling, was one of the most dangerous magical girls in all Japan who regularly went up against demons and even other magical girls..." She shook her head slowly. "It was very weird indeed."

"But you coped with it magnificently, sister," Kasumi told her, looking proud. "As I hoped you would." She looked at their guests, smiling happily. "I'd been looking forward for so long to being able to tell my family. Even with all the problems, I wanted the best for them, and to see them again, to talk to them once more. We still can't do that, not with Akane and Father, but Nabiki is back in our life now, which I'm extremely pleased about."

"But how did you end up being able to do all these things?" Hotaru asked, completely engrossed. "From what you told us you never showed any signs of being able to do magic or all the other stuff."

"She has a very large latent talent for it, though," Ranma explained. "All three girls studied martial arts when they were younger although only Akane really kept it up, even in the half-hearted and limited way she did. But my theory is that they were still exposed to it, learning the theory, so to speak, even if they didn't have the practice. Kas is a born genius in the field of martial arts and ki manipulation, as well as magic, it eventually turned out. She learned the art probably faster than I did. If we'd both started at the same time with the same training, there's no way of knowing which one of us would be better. I have a lot more practical experience but she's now nearly as good as I am, even though she started a good decade later than I did." He looked at the elder Tendo who was slightly pink from the praise. "I can still take her, of course." She poked him in the ribs, grinning, while several of the women in the room laughed.

"That may well always be the case," Kasumi added. "He has a very large head start in both martial arts and ki control, not to mention his power level. But I've caught up far faster and more completely than I ever dreamed I could." She looked towards her sister. "Nabiki has a talent as strong as I do, I think, although I can't get her to believe that. She's learned a vast amount in a short period of time."

"It took them both months to persuade me I could do any of these things," Nabiki shrugged, "but I'm damn glad they kept pushing."

"We figured out in the end that exposure to our magic seems to jump-start ki development, something that was very noticeable with Nabiki," the martial artist mused. "I don't have enough information to know for sure whether it would always work like that, or work for everyone. The increased ki control feeds back into faster progress with our magic system, and vice versa. They form a sort of synergy. That said, we have a lot of evidence that the magic at least can only be learned properly, or possible at all, by certain people, ones who are at the right stage of their development and haven't learned too much of one or other more standard magical methods. Those seem to permanently block our method, although we still haven't figured out why."

He inspected the three girls. "I'll be interested to see what happens with you lot."

Hotaru gasped. "You're going to teach us all these things?"

"We look after our own. You girls, your entire group, have been very effective for a long time, up until recently, but you've never been very efficient. That's quite irritating. I know you're capable of a lot more. I made the offer years ago to give you all some proper combat training but for various reasons you all turned me down. I made the same offer to most of the magical girls in Minato at one point or another, very few of them every took me up on it or stuck around if they did. It's disappointing." Shaking his head he looked worried. "There are so many of them that have had very close calls they didn't need to have if they just knew a little bit more. I don't want to see any of them pay the price I fear they might one day, not if I can somehow prevent it."

Looking at him for a long moment Rei had a sudden flashback to what her grandfather had said weeks ago. "The magical girls protect the community. Yori protects the magical girls."

"He was right," she muttered to herself. Everyone looked at her.

"Who was right? About what?" Tamiko asked curiously, breaking the silence she and her team had mostly sat in for a considerable time, apparently just enjoying listening.
"Grandfather. He said something a while ago, when I was... less than pleased... about what happened during that little incident when we got a little carried away around here. The thing with the coffee-demon."

"Poor Xrist. He was a bit traumatised about all that," Kasumi giggled, shaking her head. "He's a very nice person when you get to know him."

"I'll take your word for it," Rei replied after giving her an odd look. "Anyway, Grandfather told me that while the magical girls protected their communities, Yori and Chou protected the magical girls. He seemed pretty sure of himself. I wasn't sure I really believed him then but now I think I do."

Exchanging glances, Ranma and Kasumi looked somewhat surprised, but in the end smiled. "I suppose that is our job, or at least a major part of it, dear," the elder sister commented. "It's not one we were asked to do but it seems to be what ended up happening."

"I've never really thought of it in quite those terms, but it sort of fits," he replied. "I don't want people to get killed. Our people, the demons, anyone, if it can be helped."

"Sometimes there's no alternative," Ami suggested. He looked at her for a moment. "Unfortunately very true. And if that's the only way, you do it fast, hard, and clean. That's sort of the problem I had with your friends in a nutshell. They tended to go in with an overkill approach even before they knew what the deal really was, but at the same time dance around the issue with all those flowery attacks that built to a crescendo. It was extremely annoying."

Misaki snickered, pulling out some snacks and handing them around. "I'll say. It could be kind of funny, watching Usagi and Minako spout stupid speeches about love, justice, and death to all demons, but by the time they were done talking anyone half competent could have finished them off half a dozen times. Which we've all proved on more than one occasion."

Sighing, Ami and Rei both nodded. "I know what you mean," the blue-haired girl admitted, staring at the floor. "Looking back on it I'm just embarrassed."

"It's what we were told was the way you did things," Rei added. She shrugged slightly. "We know better now, but at the time it seemed appropriate."

"It was damned silly," Ranma grumped, becoming the red-head and pouting, which looked adorable, Rei noted to herself, trying not to smile. "Very unprofessional and pointless. Like something designed by and for a rather dim ten-year-old girl. All flowery speeches and grandiose gestures." Aiko looked at Nabiki, then both of them started laughing. "Well, it's true," the martial artist continued, smiling a little. "sometimes I didn't know whether to stop them or just burst out laughing. I don't know any other magical girls who were quite that..." She waved her hands a little, looking for a suitable word. "Idiotic," was all she seemed to be able to come up with in the end.

Once more a silence fell as the three girls absorbed what they'd heard. In the end Hotaru broke it. "So Ranma taught you ki control, and magic, and martial arts. You became Azumi and started stopping criminals. Was that on purpose?" Nabiki smiled reflectively, slowly shaking her head, as all eyes turned to her again.

"Not really, no. It just kind of... happened. The first time was a complete accident." The wall vanished again, a perfect three-dimensional scene appearing on it, as they all turned to look at it. "I was just walking home at university and I heard a noise. One thing led to another. Fascinated, they watched the incident with the security guard and the thieves from Nabiki's viewpoint, until the recording ended. "After that, they seemed to happen more and more often. For a while it was at least one incident a day. I guess the crazy got to me. After Halleckton, though, it slowed down, although the incidents seem to have increased in severity even at the same time they decreased in number."

"You obviously levelled up," Rei chuckled. Nabiki grinned at her.

"Possibly. Although that's a worrying thought in itself."

Looking thoughtful, Ami suddenly asked, "OK, so those SI communicators let you record what you experience, and transfer those recordings to other people, or even show them with the projector, along with all the other incredible things they can do. But how are you watching the others? Do you have some sort of magic for that? A sort of scrying spell or something?"

Nabiki glanced at Ranma, who shook her head. "No. We don't really use scrying spells, they're too unreliable and easily blocked if you know what you're doing. Some mages rely on them but we don't. That said, we know an awful lot of ways to screw them up." She laughed. "Cologne was going nuts for years trying to find me with those sorts of spells. She never got even a hint."

"We use these," Fumiko said, holding out a small spherical device. As they looked at it curiously it lifted from her hand with a very faint humming sound, moving into the middle of the room and simply hanging there. Ami gaped, then quickly scanned it.

"Some sort of imaging system, very high-tech, with... is that anti-gravity?"

"Yep." Ranma looked amused. "They're basically a sort of sport camera from Fwetna. Very tough, quite smart, huge storage capacity, and fantastic image quality. Plus all sorts of options. We have quite a few of them." The device suddenly wavered and faded from view, vanishing completely. "Good stealth as well." Scanning the area Ami raised an eyebrow.

"Good is an understatement. If I didn't know it was there I don't think I'd notice it, even with this, unless it was right on top of me."

"None of the others noticed except for Setsuna," Tamiko commented, amused. "We've had at least one camera following each of them ever since all the trouble. She seemed to be able to hear the antigrav, so we had to make sure we kept them some distance away, but the other girls didn't notice anything." She studied Ami for a moment, then Rei and Hotaru. "You didn't either, until we showed you."

As she spoke a small fleet of five of the drones faded into view behind Nabiki's head. She grinned as the three girls stared. Holding out her hands she caught two of them without looking as they dropped into her palms, then held them up. "The SIs can easily interface to these over enormous distances. Jun can control them directly, which means that they're extra eyes and ears for me. I don't even have to consciously direct them any more, they just do what I want." Each of the three remaining camera drones moved smoothly to hover half a metre in front of each of the girls. Hotaru inspected the one in front of her, grinning, then reached out. It moved slightly to one side, making her giggle as she chased it.

"Cool, aren't they?" Aiko asked. All three of them nodded.

"You lot have some incredible toys," Rei breathed, holding out her hand in wonder. The drone dropped into it obediently, allowing her to look closely at it. "The magic is one thing but all the alien high tech is just weird."
"It's certainly become very useful," Kasumi agreed. "It adds substantially to our effectiveness as well. Of course, a lot of that effectiveness is based on keeping a lot of this confidential."

Ami looked at the drone Rei was holding, scanning it carefully, then reading the results. "That thing is amazing. I'd love to have one."

"That can be arranged," Nabiki assured her after glancing at Ranma, who nodded slightly. "The shop should have more in stock by now." She laughed a little. "We cleaned him out last time."

Kasumi stood, making everyone look at her. "I think we should go somewhere else to finish the story. There are some other things we need to show you that need more space." She smiled mischievously as Rei looked at Ami, not sure whether she was interested or worried. Her friend was feeling the same, judging by her expression. When she glanced at Hotaru, though, she found the younger girl had an odd smile as well. Slightly overwhelmed by all the weirdness, she shrugged, standing.

"I'm up for it. Although I could do with something to eat soon. I'm getting hungry." Misaki tossed her an apple which she snagged behind her head with one hand, biting into it. "Thanks."

"No problem." The tall woman looked at Ranma. "Should any of us stay behind? Just in case?" the red-head thought for a moment.

"It should be all right. Haruka, Makoto, and Michiru seem to be behaving themselves, but we should keep an eye on them even so. We can be back fast if anything goes bad."

"I'll leave a couple of cameras watching the immediate area as well," Nabiki said, walking over and opening the balcony doors. Two of the spherical drones zipped outside, fading out of sight in the process, then she closed the doors again. Rei stared, before shaking her head in wondering amazement. The middle sister grinned at her. "Fun, aren't they?"

"Damn right. Are these other revelations of yours going to be as impressive?"

"Probably better." The answer made her nervous, which wasn't helped by the odd grin Hotaru was still wearing. She followed as everyone grouped together, before vanishing as Aiko teleported.
Chapter 79

Looking around with interest, Hotaru studied the small island they had appeared on, before bending over and prodding the hot sand experimentally. A few metres away gentle waves lapped at a semi-circular beach, which formed part of a roughly circular lagoon a few hundred metres across. Outside the reef she could see much larger waves breaking, spray coming over the low wall the reef formed. Walking closer to the water she could see it was quite shallow, a large number of fish and other aquatic creatures swimming around it in colourful groups. Turning, she noted the palm trees that grew on the narrow crescent of land that the beach formed the inner curve of. It was very pretty overall, a classic deserted island.

"This is really nice," she said. Aiko smiled happily.

"Isn't it? We call it Aiko Island. It hasn't got a real name. I've been coming here for some time when I needed a break, but after that horrible business in Canada I told the others. We come here to relax and swim. And other things as well." She grinned as Hotaru looked intrigued. Swimming, that she had a pretty good idea about now, after what Ranma showed her earlier. 'I wonder what the other things are?' she thought to herself, looking at Ami and Rei, who were wandering about, inspecting the island. Going back to Aiko she raised her eyebrows. The petite woman smiled, then made a gesture to the sky. Hotaru thought for a moment before her eyes widened and she started to grin with delighted disbelief. "Shh," Aiko whispered, turning away, having winked at her, leaving her staring at the sky with a look of expectant joy.

"Nice, but hot," Ami commented, glancing about herself. "Where are we?"

"Somewhere in the middle of the Pacific, below the equator," Ranma replied. "It's only a little island, a hell of a long way from anywhere, but it's a nice place to come to be undisturbed. Good swimming."

"It looks like it," she replied, staring out over the lagoon. "Is it always that calm?"

"Pretty much, yes, unless there's a storm. I haven't seen one yet but Aiko has, she said it was fairly impressive. She didn't stay long." The martial artist grinned as Ami nodded her understanding. With no cover other than a few palm trees a decent tropical storm could be definitely rather exciting. Wandering down to the water's edge she looked into it, finding it remarkably clear and full of more life than anything she'd seen before.

She knelt on an outcropping of coral that protruded from the sand, dropping into a slightly deeper part, perhaps a metre or so, down to a flat bottom covered in the same white sand and some small chunks of coral. Tiny fish swam around, one or two larger ones chasing them intermittently, while a few crabs scuttled around beneath them. As she watched a small octopus slithered out of a tiny crack in the coral, one that looked far too small to have contained it, then jetted slowly off across the sand. "It's like a little aquatic paradise, isn't it? I had no idea so much life could be found so close together in the wild, I thought that was something you only found in aquariums."

"I think it's because we're so far away from anything people go to," Ranma said, squatting down beside her and watching the fish. "There's practically no pollution, nothing to disturb the environment. We're always careful not to leave anything behind and try not to damage the place."

She laughed for a moment. "Aiko would be very annoyed if we did. She has a somewhat proprietary attitude to this island." Running her fingers through the sand she held up a small unidentifiable piece of plastic. "That said, this stuff gets everywhere. I can't begin to imagine how much plastic is floating around in the oceans right now." Closing her hand around the fragment she idly vaporised it with a brief flash of blue light. "One day perhaps we can figure out how to deal with that."

Both women stood, Ami looking around again. Fumiko, Tamiko, and Rei had walked to the end of the beach and were looking out over the reef to the open ocean, the other red-head apparently pointing something in the water out to the other two, while Misaki and Kasumi were sitting on the sand at the base of one of the trees talking. Nabiki and Aiko seemed to be discussing something involving the sky, they both kept looking up, with Hotaru watching them closely. She was smiling in a disturbing manner again, Ami noticed.

"What on earth did you do with Hotaru?" she asked, glancing at Ranma, who seemed amused. "She went off terribly upset but came back all smiles, and ever since then she seems to be walking around with a very weird expression."

"We talked for a while, then I showed her some interesting things I can do. That seemed to cheer her up." The young woman grimaced briefly, rubbing the back of her head while watching the purple-haired girl with a mildly regretful expression. "I understand why she took that first demonstration so hard. I should have realised what was likely to happen and tried to break it more gently."

"I don't think you could have, to be honest, Ranma," Ami said slowly, also inspecting her younger friend. "Hotaru is a smart girl, very smart, but she's also had a lot of trouble in her life, even before all the recent crap. Bullying at school, her father dying, then Haruka and Michiru breaking up, all that left her in a bad place. I noticed that she'd become very taken with Yori almost immediately, when she stopped being scared of the insane woman like we all were." Looking at Ranma out of the corner of her eye she grinned as the red-head smirked, apparently pleased at the description. "Healing Haruka's arm like that impressed the hell out of her. Me too, of course, it's incredible what you and Kasumi can do, but since she can heal as well, I think it really resonated with her. Finding out the truth was always going to cause an upset."

Ranma nodded, sighing faintly, then smiled. "I'm just glad I was able to fix it. We had a long talk and I think she's OK now. I didn't like upsetting her, poor girl."

Watching the woman beside her for a second or two, Ami smiled. "You like her, don't you?"

"Of course I do. She's a very nice person with a huge amount of potential." Ranma looked at her. "I like you and Rei as well. I always had a lot of respect for you, personally, although I didn't know you all that well. I was always disappointed when you let blondie drag you into something stupid. You were supposed to be the smart, sane one. Or, the more sane than the rest one, anyway." Ami dipped her head in wry acknowledgement of the back-handed compliment, making the red-head smirk. "Rei was much too quick tempered but she showed promise. I didn't have enough contact with Hotaru to have much of an opinion although I could easily tell she had a lot more power than she was apparently capable of using. I always intended to follow up on that eventually, but what happened kind of pushed it on us."

"Are you really going to teach us all these amazing things?" Ami asked after a pause. "I know what you said earlier, but I'm still shocked you'd do that."

"Why wouldn't I? I like teaching people, assuming I can find the right ones. Ones I can trust, who also show talent. You three qualify on both counts. Your actions in the last few weeks showed that clearly, as did Hotaru's, and Rei has changed a lot as well. Her grandfather is very pleased, and also very good at helping people work out the right thing to do."
"How did you meet him?" Ami was very curious, turning to face the martial artist.

"We simply followed Usagi and Rei a few days after the first fight. Neither one of them seemed to be looking behind themselves," Ranma chuckled, "I suspect that practically anyone could have done it if they could have kept up. We were shielded, of course, so they wouldn't have seen or sensed us even if they had looked but they didn't bother. Both of them dropped their disguise spell as soon as they entered the temple. Once we saw it go down, we could design an effective countermeasure. We had all your home addresses and real names in under twelve hours once that was done. The PSIA had to do it the hard way, but even they didn't take much more than a week or so, according to the file I read."

Shaking her head in worried wonder, Ami stared at the other woman, then twitched as she turned male. "God, that's weird to watch," she muttered. Ranma laughed in a low voice.

"Weirder to have happen, the first time, believe me."

"I do." They exchanged a look. "So, then, what's the next incredible shock you're going to spring on us?" the blue-haired woman finally asked.

He grinned, looking over to where Nabiki and Aiko seemed to have come to a decision. Ami could see beyond them that Rei and the other two girls were returning, and that Hotaru was still watching both women very carefully as if she expected something interesting to happen any second. "It's a good one," the martial artist said casually, nodding to Nabiki who looked over at that moment. She nodded back, then grinned at Hotaru, before both she and Aiko vanished, the teleport flash bright even against the brilliantly sunlit sand.

"Where did they go?" Ami asked curiously. She looked at her companion, noticing he was staring upwards. Hotaru noticed this as well, following his gaze, then smiling widely. Ami looked up.

Far, far above them, at least a thousand metres up and off to the side, two small dots were moving fast. She squinted, trying to make them out. "What are those?" She could see what looked like wings and a long tail. The two creatures circled a couple of times then began dropping rapidly, on a course that seemed likely to take them right overhead. They approached quickly, wings flapping hard, then partially folding as they both tipped into a vertical dive. Pulling out of the dive mere metres off the surface half a kilometre away the things headed straight at them, roaring over the lagoon side by side low enough for their wake turbulence to ripple the water, then pulled up hard with small streamers of condensation from their wing-tip vortices.

She gaped in shock. Both figures had been moving at a speed she judged as at least three hundred and fifty kilometres an hour, which seemed impossible for living creatures to reach. Too stunned to even reach for her computer, she just watched as they stall-turned in opposite directions like something from an air show, before closing their wings and diving directly at the beach. A whistling sound grew steadily louder, only to stop with a pair of abrupt cracks and a cloud of sand blown around in the shockwave. It settled out, leaving dead silence, broken only by the wind in the trees and the lapping of waves on the shore. Ami stared, unable to even think what to say, at Nabiki and Aiko grinning at them, their wings folded behind them, then after a very long time managed to crank her head around enough to see Ranma, who was standing with his arms crossed looking pleased.

"That... was... unbelievable!" Hotaru screamed with pure joy in her voice, running over to Nabiki and hugging her, before stepping back and looking her up and down. "How did you learn to do that? How fast were you going? How high can you go? Is that as fast as you can fly? Can I see your wings? Do you really have a tail?" The excited girl ran around both of them, looking at them in delight, before ending up back in front of the middle sister. "Can I touch your wing?"
Giggling, Nabiki extended one wing and brought it around. Hotaru felt it, smiling. "So soft. That's amazing."

"Um, what the fuck...?" Rei spluttered, on the other side of the flying girls. "But... How? I mean... How?" She ran out of words, simply staring. Ami looked at her, then Hotaru, then back at Ranma, who shrugged.

"I told you Kas and I came up with an interesting technique for disguising ourselves. It turned out to be more effective than we thought it would be."

She kept staring.

"Really, a lot more effective. And a lot of fun."

Some more staring happened. Eventually she shook her head. "Fun. Yes. Why not?" As he snickered she looked back to the two winged girls, who were answering excited questions from Hotaru patiently. Turning her head she caught Rei's eye, the other woman looking as amazed as she felt. They both walked over to Nabiki and Aiko. Pulling out her computer she scanned them, as they grinned at her, then looked at the results. "They really are what they look like!" she exclaimed in great surprise. "A shape change? I thought you said it was an illusion, a disguise technique."

He smiled, studying both women with visible pride in his eyes. "It started out that way. But as we refined it, we added more and more things to it, ending up with something we still call the illusion technique but is very close to a true shape-shifting spell. One that's apparently very unusual, according to a number of mages I know, most of whom tell me it can't possibly work in the first place." He indicated Nabiki who had looped her tail over her shoulder and poked Hotaru between the eyes with it, both of them grinning. "Clearly they're wrong."

"The main limitation with it is that when you stop powering it, it dissipates," Kasumi said from behind her. She hadn't noticed the elder Tendo approaching, engrossed as she was in the subject she was investigating, so she jumped a little. "I've nearly finished working out a possible way around that, but it still needs some work I haven't had time for due to everything that's happened recently. It could have some very interesting medical implications, though, so I must get back to it at some point soon."

Nabiki glanced at Rei and Ami, then shimmered. A fraction of a second later she was her normal self. "I can't do it like Sis and Ranma can, but I'm very slowly beginning to understand it. In the mean time, Kasumi worked out how to give us a number of preset versions of the spell. They're very useful." Ami looked at her for a long moment, then around at the others.

"You can all do it?" Two seconds later there were seven flying women looking at the three ones without wings with amused expressions. Ami looked at them, then met the stunned gaze of Rei, who seemed to have frozen. "Oh my god," she mumbled. Unable to speak for a few seconds she just looked around wildly.

Hotaru was under no such limitation. Grinning like an idiot she wandered happily around inspecting all their flying forms. "This is so cool," she said over and over.

"As good as the spaceport on K'nn four?" Tamiko asked, laughing. The girl giggled back.

"Well, possibly not quite that impressive, but amazing anyway. Is flying fun? It sure looks it."

"It's incredible fun, trust me. When we were on holiday we were doing it for hours almost every day. Since we got back it's been annoying that we couldn't." Sighing, the auburn-haired woman Rei suddenly dropped to the sand, sitting and putting her head in her hands. "This is becoming too much to deal with," she mumbled almost inaudibly. "You people are nuts. Beyond nuts." Ami watched her friend, totally in agreement, then sat beside her. "I thought I was dealing with it all right, you know?" The other woman looked up at her for a moment. "But then something else happens that's even weirder than the first thing. And as soon as I'm almost OK with that, another crazy thing happens. Men that turn into women, or the other way around, is pretty fucking strange but I almost had a handle on it. But flying magical girls? I mean, actually flying, with wings and everything, not just levitating or something like that. Magic I could handle. This is... just peculiar."

Putting her arm around her friend Ami nodded, staring around at the others, who were listening sympathetically. Hotaru smiled, shrugging slightly when Ami caught her eye. "It was strange to me at first as well but Ranma showed me some of this while we were talking. It's the best magic I've ever come across," the girl explained. Glancing at Ranma, she asked with that odd smile again, "Maybe they need a swim to relax." Ami wondered what she meant, a little worried about the look on her face. Ranma got the same one, which worried her more.

Noticing the way she was staring, the red-headed winged martial artist laughed for a moment, shimmering back into just the normal red-headed woman, then walking over and dropping cross-legged to the sand on the other side of Rei, who looked at her for a second before going back to staring at the sand. "Sorry, Rei, Ami, I know it's a lot to deal with. We're so used to all of this we tend to take it for granted now. When you wave all of it in someone's face I'll agree it could be a bit much. We do seem to have accumulated a pretty big collection of weird techniques over the years."

Ami nodded after a few seconds, still inspecting Rei, who was trickling sand through her fingers and apparently trying to make sense of everything. "I'm almost afraid to find out what the next thing is. The SIs, shape-shifting spells, portal travel, teleporting, incredible magical healing, insane martial arts..." She shrugged. "Why aren't you guys running the world?"

"Too much work," Nabiki chuckled. Glancing around at her friends, she added, "We'll be back in a while. We need some exercise and you might need some time to think. See you in a bit." She walked a few metres away, flapped hard, and took off, followed by Aiko and her team. Ami watched as the five figures powered rapidly up into the clear sky, laughter coming back faintly as they soared. Hotaru was watching with a wide grin.

"You'll get used to it," Ranma said, lying back in the sand. "That's what normally happens. Some people take longer than others." She looked at them both for a second. "You got used to travelling around in an alien spaceship quickly enough, for example. Or walking on the Moon."

"I don't know why but for some reason that was much less of a shock than this is," Rei replied in a low voice, turning a shell over in her fingers absenty, also studying the five flying women far above. "How many other things do you all turn into?"

"The technique is extremely versatile," Kasumi said from behind them, her soft voice sounding satisfied yet gentle. "Far more than we originally expected. We came up with it for disguise purposes, to allow both of us to attend university without being tracked down by everyone at home. At first it wasn't nearly as complete as it is now, but it was more than sufficient for those purposes. In the last two or three years we've kept working on it, ending up with something remarkable. It's only when we talk to other mages that we tend to remember how flexible it is compared to most other methods of achieving the same result. We use it so often it's become second nature." Walking around she knelt in front of them, back in her normal form.
"We each have a number of alternative personae, some of which we use regularly, some of which we have for specific scenarios. At first they were just other people but since Nabiki found us we've added more adventurous forms to the regular palette rather than just experimenting with them. The flying form is the one I'm most proud of, it took a lot of work." She smiled gently. "It was only over our holiday that I worked out the last details with the help of some local wildlife on Fwetna. But I think it's paid off handsomely." Looking up for a moment she smiled again. "The others certainly seem to agree."

"What limitations does the magic have?" Ami asked, her knowledge-hungry mindset taking over once more as the initial shock wore off. Rei looked at her for a moment, a slight smile coming and going, before returning to watching the action above them. Bright flashes of different colours were sparking around the five girls, Ami noticed, they seemed to be having a free for all aerial dogfight of some sort.

"Very few other than the requirement for constant power input. We've lowered that to the point that any of us can keep it running even asleep, after some training. Possibly even when unconscious, it becomes an autonomous reflex. Ranma and I work it directly, but the others currently use a preset spell I designed, as Nabiki mentioned. That makes it even easier to maintain once you understand how to apply it in the first place. Learning to do that is the tricky part, it's a delicate balancing act to begin with, but we came up with some training methods that seem quite effective. The others learned fairly fast."

"It will take a lot more practice until they can do it completely free-form," Ranma added, "but they'll all get it. Either Nabiki or Aiko first, Nabiki picks things up very fast and Aiko has a real talent for pattern manipulation. The other girls won't be far behind."

"But where does all the extra mass come from? Or go, for that matter?" Ami was confused and not liking it. Kasumi shrugged delicately, smiling.

"We're not sure. It's one of the things both of us have been wondering about for some time. I puzzled over it quite a lot when I first saw the Jusenkyo curse in action, long before I learned what I know now, it was an obvious oddity, but even years of experience with magic has left me none the wiser. We might work it out one day. No mage I have ever mentioned the subject to has had a good answer, either. Most of them have never thought about it at all and get quite worried when you bring it up." She laughed, looking up for a moment, then back to Ami and Rei. "My dear husband sums it up as 'Magic is weird,' which is probably as good an answer as you're likely to get at the moment."

Ranma snickered from her place on the beach. "I'd love to know as well, Ami, but I can live with the fact I may never find out. We don't know how that part works, although we know it does and can make use of it. We've worked out some of the parts of the curse well enough to lift subroutines from it and put them into our own magic, which lets us do all sorts of things that would be much more difficult otherwise. The Jusenkyo magic is all based around transformation, as is our disguise technique, so they fit well together."

"You two must have more insight into the mechanics of magic itself than anyone else I've ever met," Ami said, fascinated, after thinking it through. "I'd love to learn more about your methods."

"I'm more than happy to teach you our system, we both are," the martial artist replied. "I don't know if you can actually use it, we'll have to test you a bit, but I'll go over the theory with you, no problem. Not today, though, it's complicated and would take quite a while." She sat up, brushed sand off herself, then looked at them, before glancing at Hotaru who had wandered off a few dozen metres and was peering into the water again, watching something swimming around. "Fancy a swim? The water here is warm and relaxing."

Ami studied her carefully. There was something about her smile that made her suspicious. Looking back to Hotaru she saw the younger girl had turned slightly and was watching them again, with a very similar smile. "Something weird is going to happen, isn't it?" she asked, sighing.

"Not so much weird as somewhat unusual, Ami," Kasumi assured her. "But it's fun, trust me. I think you'll enjoy it. Come on." Standing, she looked down at both women, who glanced at each other. Finally Rei got up.

"Oh, what the hell. Let's see what happens." Looking down at herself, she added, "I didn't bring a swimsuit. I have to admit I wasn't expecting to end up on a deserted island this afternoon."

"The swimsuit isn't an issue," Ranma said, hopping to her feet as well. She looked at Ami, who sighed again, feeling this was all crazy, but got up, willing to see where it took them. They all walked down to the water's edge. Grinning, Hotaru bounced to her feet, looking at Ranma for a second, then rushed over and whispered to her for a few moments. The red-head laughed, nodding, before the younger woman smiled happily, then dashed back to the tree-line twenty metres away. Ami and Rei watched, wondering what she was doing.

With a yell, the purple-haired girl ran at full speed, which being a magical girl was really very fast indeed, at the water, jumping hard as she reached it and arcing far out into the lagoon in a flat dive. Ami jumped at the unexpected yell, taking a step forward and raising her hand slightly, too late to stop the girl. She gaped as mid-way through her flight, Hotaru shimmered, vanishing into the water cleanly with a small splash. She could see her figure shooting through the water sheathed in bubbles, popping up another twenty metres further out.

She and Rei both stared in shock as mer-Hotaru left the water with a flip of her purple-scaled tail, the same colour as her hair, somersaulted, and splashed back down again, laughing like a lunatic.

Watching her cavorting around, they gaped blankly, then slowly turned to lock gazes in wonder, before twitching as Kasumi walked up behind them and put her arms around their shoulders. Leaning down slightly the tall woman laughed gently. "As I said. Unusual but fun. Would you like to have a go?"

Returning her eyes to Hotaru, who got half-way through a double somersault before landing on her back, laughing, she very slowly nodded, a smile beginning to grow. "Yes, please." Rei giggled slightly hysterically but nodded as well.

Looking down from fifteen hundred metres Nabiki grinned. She could see five figures zipping around in the lagoon, jumping out occasionally, obviously having a lot of fun. Soaring on the light breeze she felt relaxed for the first time in a while, raising her head and closing her eyes for a moment, before looking around. Aiko and Tamiko were practising coordinated loops, while Misaki seemed to be trying to work out if she could glide inverted. Fumiko was just off her left side circling gently in the same thermal she was in, also watching the action below.

"Looks like they're dealing with it pretty well now," she commented to her friend. "I was getting a little worried about Rei a few minutes ago, she looked completely overwhelmed suddenly. I guess it all caught up at once." Kasumi had been sending them a feed from the beach so they could see what was happening.

"I'm not surprised. What does surprise me is that she's accepted it as well as she has. A few months ago I think it would have been different, she'd have been raging about something or other, her temper was a little hair-triggered. That old priest seems to have talked a lot of sense into her recently," Fumiko replied. "All to the good, I think. I'm quite impressed how much she's changed."

"Everyone changes all the time. I'm certainly not the same person I was five years ago. We just seem to do it a bit more than normal," the middle Tendo chuckled. "Hotaru seems to have taken to it like a fish to water, though." Fumiko groaned at the pun, causing Nabiki to smirk, pleased.

"She was certainly very upset at first," the other woman said, giving her friend a quick glare, which provoked a giggle. "I can sort of see why. I wonder what Ranma told her?"

"No idea. I think that part may be private between them. That's fair enough. Hotaru certainly looked up to Yori, so it must have been a shock to learn the truth, although she seems to have accepted it now. Hopefully she'll be OK. I like her, she's smart and curious, it would have been a shame to have her upset."

"She's a nice girl," Fumiko agreed. "It will be very interesting to see if Ranma and Kasumi can teach her their healing technique. They both seem to think they should be able to. I guess with her own abilities she's already half-way there."

"It would be useful to have another healer available. I know Sis really feels guilty about not being able to heal more people but it's only the two of them." Nabiki glanced over to Misaki who had just let out a yell, watching her recover from the spin she'd managed to get into, then back to Fumiko, who grinned. "What do you think? Are they going to end up part of our little family, or form their own group? I seriously doubt they'd ever get back together with any of the other girls except possibly Haruka, but even then there she seems to dislike Ami and Rei so much I can't see it happening."

"Seems unlikely to me as well." Fumiko sighed. "It's a pity, Haruka was a pain a lot of the time but I think she's a decent person in most ways. Just a bit quick off the mark. So was Rei, she seems to have come around, I guess Haruka might. Perhaps we should ask the priest to talk to her?" She shrugged, bobbling slightly in her flight path at the action. "As far as the others, they seem to be passing all the tests so far. I like all of them. Ami has always been nice, she's a good person and very smart, she reminds me of you, actually." Nabiki glanced over, smiling. "I've got no problems with her at all. Hotaru I didn't know as well, although I know Kasumi has talked to her quite a lot over the years and thinks highly of her. Rei is smart, although not in Ami's class, but above average by a long way, a powerful magical girl, and a sensible person when she doesn't let her temper get out of control." She shook her head a little, thinking. "She's growing on me. The new improved Rei is an interesting person. I don't mind if they want to join the Sisterhood of Doom."

Laughing hard, Nabiki grinned at her friend. "That name is brilliant. Even Ranma seemed amused by it. I don't think we should use it in public but it's very amusing."

"We could get some T-shirts with it on," Fumiko suggested. "We need a good logo, though. Know any graphic artists?" The other woman giggled. "Hey, what about business cards? You have been rescued by the Sisterhood of Doom. Please have a nice day. ' We could give them out to everyone we help."

Almost unable to glide smoothly due to laughing so hard, Nabiki shook her head. "That's getting as bad as Magical Girls Incorporated. Perhaps it's a subdivision?"

"PR division, I think," Fumiko snickered. Giggling, they exchanged glances, then headed towards Aiko and Tamiko, joining them in their aerial display, while Misaki swore good-naturedly, recovered from her dive, and tried again.
Kneeling on the ground in the entrance of her tent, Minako watched the bluish sun rise over the mountains, her eyes half-shut as she attempted one of the meditation techniques she'd read about in a book she'd discovered in her supplies. It seemed to help, she felt calm and relaxed. Oddly relaxed, in fact, she realised. Even in the position she found herself currently stuck with, she was less stressed in many ways than she'd been for months. 'I wonder why?' she thought idly, squinting into the brilliant light as the star rose slowly. 'Maybe being away from the others. Or perhaps it's just Usagi. She was getting a bit crazy even compared to all the other things that have been going on recently.'

The blonde had been going over the events that had led to her being stuck in a barren valley on an alien world for quite a while, trying to work out where it had all gone so badly wrong. Individually, every decision and event she could remember seemed reasonable in isolation, but the overall effect was obviously not right, even though she couldn't see where the problem lay. 'I can see we seem to have drifted from our original purpose, but even there I can't work out what we could have done to change it. Yet, you look back on just the last month, when you have time to think about it, and it's totally crazy, even for Minato. I mean, why did we keep attacking Yori's area? We've tried damn hard to stay away from that insanely dangerous woman and her friends for years, managed to do a fairly good job for a long time, then in the last year or so it all went nuts.'

She sighed, picking a bottle of water up from where it sat beside her knee, drinking some, then putting it back. 'Just Yori alone is far more than we could handle on our best day, that first meeting proved that, but somehow we seemed to keep forgetting it. Usagi thought she could sneak up on her and just kill her, no troubles at all, which is obviously totally stupid. I can see that now. Why couldn't I before? How did I let her talk me into it? Leaving aside the fact that she was basically wanting to assassinate another magical girl in cold blood, it should have been obvious we didn't stand a chance.' She looked around the bleak scene. 'This proves that well enough. Two of Yori's friends did all this by themselves, somehow, and I have absolutely no idea how. I can't remember anything about it. I know Yori is much more dangerous than that, even, and we couldn't stop them. How could we possibly deal with her? She could have killed us without breaking a sweat.' Minako shivered for a moment, chilled to the bone by her thoughts, before she drank some more water.

"We never stood a chance," she mumbled out loud.

"No, you didn't," a voice from behind said, making her twitch.

"Will you for fuck's sake stop sneaking up on me like that, please, you idiot cat?" she snarled. A chuckle came back as the animal walked around and sat in front of her, just out of reach.

"Possibly. It's funny watching you jump."

"I didn't like it when Setsuna did it, I sure as hell don't like you doing it," she replied, glaring at it. "Anyway, where have you been for the last day?" She looked around for a few seconds. "And what have you been eating? I haven't noticed any food missing."

Artemis shrugged in an oddly feline manner. "I get by," he told her evasively, making her look at him with narrowed eyes. "But I assume you were thinking about Usagi's plan to kill Yori, from what you said?" She kept looking at him. "I took a shot," he explained. "It seemed a reasonable guess."

Eventually she nodded, deciding to put the other questions she had to one side for the moment. "Yes. I was trying to work out what happened to us, what led to all of..." she waved her hands at the scene in front of her, "this."
"I don't have a good answer for you at the moment," the cat said, watching her. "You're in a better position to work it out, I think. I'm just an advisor."

"A pretty crap one, to be honest," she grumbled. The animal looked offended, making her wonder how it managed that trick.

"I've done my best," it replied haughtily, turning its head away and staring at the sun with its eyes nearly closed. She watched it for a while.

"Perhaps. Perhaps not. Neither you or Luna have been very useful for quite a while, though, now that I come to think about it."

"Not my fault," it muttered. She sighed.

"I just wish things had gone better."

"They might improve." Artemis looked back at her. "Things change. Sometimes for the worse, sometimes for the better. You have to decide what to do in either case. Then live with the decision." The cat looked slowly and meaningfully around, before returning his attention to her again. "As your advisor my advice is that you decide better the next time you have a choice." She glared at it for a long moment, then bowed her head, closing her eyes.

"I hope I do. I don't like it here."

"Keep meditating, keep calm, and wait. That's all you can do."

When she raised her head a few seconds later the cat was gone.

"Hi, 'Biki! How's your travelling going? Are you back yet?" The middle sister smiled at the sound of her sister's voice inside her head. Floating gently on the wind two and a half kilometres above the Pacific, describing an enormous circle several kilometres in diameter with the island at the centre of it, she laughed, doing a barrel roll just for the fun of it.

"Not quite, Akane. I'm out with Maiko and Rika, and some new friends we met recently. They've been swimming for a while now, I was just enjoying the day on my own. I'll be going back soon."

She looked around, Jun highlighting the others with small designators, seeing that Aiko and the rest of the fliers were nearly ten kilometres away at the moment, then gradually turning to head in that direction, in no hurry. "It's a nice day here, we're near the beach." In her case, mainly vertically, she snickered to herself, but still near.

"Sounds nice. I haven't been to the beach for weeks. I should go."

"What's going on with you? Have you heard from that director guy, Adrian, again?"

"I got an email last night. It looks like we're going to go over for three or four days next week, assuming Aiko is OK with taking us. I haven't talked to her yet. They've arranged some training, some more demonstrations, then a couple of real screen tests and some stunts, just for us!" The youngest Tendo sounded excited, making her sister grin. "I'm really looking forward to it, so is Shampoo. But I'm really nervous as well. What if I screw it up?"

Nabiki chuckled, smiling. "You'll be fine, Akane," she replied soothingly. "Just be yourself, don't panic, keep calm, and you'll do a great job. I'm sure of that." There was a pause as her sister went quiet.
"I suppose so. Thanks. But I'm still nervous." Both sisters laughed.

"It's normal to be worried and a bit scared when you do something for the first time. Look at all that training Cologne put you through. You were terrified at first, right? Or the roof-hopping Shampoo trained you in? I remember quite a lot of screaming..."

Akane giggled at the reminder. "Yes, it was a bit scary, nearly falling off a roof the first time. But once you've landed on your head a few times in someone's garden you kind of get used to it."

"Do they?" Nabiki asked, humour in her voice. Her sister laughed a little.

"Not as much as you'd hope. Once or twice we had to leave quite fast."

"Well, I doubt that whatever you end up doing will be that exciting, not at first. They'll be taking it slowly to begin with, they won't know how far they can push you and won't want to risk damaging the talent." Waving to Tamiko, who had peeled off the little flock of flying magical girls and was heading in her direction, Nabiki grinned. "Like I said, you'll be fine. I have faith in you."

"Thanks, 'Biki. Dad said the same thing. So did Cologne, amazingly enough."

"That old girl is getting rather fond of you, I think. She's gone out of her way to help. Although I also think she gets a lot of amusement from watching you two get hurt." There was a fair amount of laughter from the other end.

"She's a sadist at heart, but a happy one," Akane snickered. "I wouldn't have thought, when I first met her, that I'd ever say this, but I like her a lot."

"I do as well, I think," her sister admitted. "I certainly respect her. She's sort of grown on me after all that's happened over the years. It's a pity that there was so much trouble for so long with the Amazons."

"That seems to be in the past now, as far as she's concerned." Her sister fell silent for a moment, allowing background noises that the middle Tendo recognised as the sounds of someone closing a door and locking it to come through. "Sorry, just locking the shop. Mr Ito left earlier and left me in charge, it's closing time now."

"What does he think about you going to Hollywood?" Nabiki asked curiously, smiling as Tamiko slid into place beside her, accompanying her in her flight. The other woman grinned back. Giggling, Akane replied, "He says that he'll still have a place for me here when the Americans deport me for destroying everything in sight." Nabiki laughed at her comment. "I think he's genuinely happy for me but is also sad to see me go. I'll miss the old guy as well, he's been good to me for a long time."

"I would expect he will also miss the security you provide."

"Probably. We had another robbery attempt two days ago, he wasn't very good. I didn't even have to break anything this time, just knock him out and call the police."

Nabiki laughed at the tone in her sister's voice. "You don't have to sound so disappointed."

"But, 'Biki, I miss the mayhem! I haven't had a good fight for weeks!" After a moment, Akane dissolved into laughter, as did the older woman. "To be honest, I'm so glad all the therapy and everything has worked so well. I haven't gotten properly angry for ages. Not since... she... visited." There was a tone of worried respect in her voice.
"Ms Aoyama, you mean?"

"Shh! Don't say that name." Akane's voice dropped to a hoarse whisper.

Laughing, Nabiki added, "You're as bad about her as Dad and Genma are about Happosai. They still look around nervously whenever he's mentioned even in passing, although no one has seen anything of him in five years." The younger Tendo started laughing as well, although with a small note of worry in her voice.

"I know, but I sort of understand all that now. You would as well if you'd ever met her."

Suppressing the hysterical laughter that threatened to sweep through her at that, Nabiki calmly agreed, "I suppose that's possible. I doubt it will ever happen, though."

"Lucky for you," her younger sister muttered. Then, more loudly, she said, "I hope you'll be back before we go."

"Should be, I think. There's a few more places to visit then we're heading home. I want to see Miki before going back to University, which is in... hmm... only about three weeks now. Time seems to go past fast these days."

"OK. Have fun, say hi to Rika and Maiko for me, all right? I'll see you when you get back."

"I will. Bye, Akane."

"Bye, 'Biki." As her sister disconnected, Nabiki looked over to Tamiko.

"Just talking to Akane. She's in a good mood. Apparently Adrian has set a date next week for her and Shampoo to go over for some serious tests and demonstrations."

"Good for her. I'm pretty sure she's going to do very well. Shampoo, too."

"I think so." Looking down, now that they were almost over the island, she added, "I guess we should go back now. It looks like Ami and the other two are as relaxed as they're going to get." Tamiko followed her gaze, smiling.

"Good. Hotaru was fine but Ami and Rei were getting kind of tense. A good swim works wonders." Once more they shared a grin, then performed synchronised wingovers and dived groundwards, followed shortly by the other three from a couple of kilometres away, all of them heading to where five mermaids were lying on the sand talking.

Rei watched Hotaru, smiling a little, as the girl experimented to see how flexible she was, curling her tail back until she was able to touch her forehead with the huge fin on the end of it, giggling the whole time. Shaking her head in amused wonder she looked down at herself, moving her own tail. Kasumi had thought about it for a few seconds once they'd entered the water, then given her a form with iridescent black scales that caught the light like oil on water, with the fins a contrasting bright yellow. The effect was striking, something she immediately loved. Ami had received brilliant blue scales and deep red fins. Hotaru's mer-form was shades of violet and purple, which was very attractive.

Stroking her scaled hip in wonder, she smiled. "I have to admit, this is pretty damn incredible. I'm sorry I was being difficult about it all earlier, it was a little too much all of a sudden, but I think I'm OK now."
"We don't hold it against you, Rei," Kasumi assured her, smiling serenely and slowly moving her tail in the water. All of them were relaxing on the beach, half immersed, Ranma and Ami talking while Hotaru listened from near them. "I know it's a lot to take in. I think we've shown you most of the really surprising things now, though, so you should find it easier to deal with from here."

"Hopefully. I know there's a lot more detail to it but I can live with what you've explained so far for the moment." Rei grinned suddenly, looking around, then making a gesture of amusement. "I still find it a bit hard to believe, though. That said, I can see why you like coming here, especially if you can do this. It's amazing. So many things live here, I've never seen anything like it! Much better than any TV documentary."

"It's very relaxing. Sometimes you need to just forget everything else and have some time to yourself, to have fun, without any horrible world-threatening problem to deal with." The elder Tendo smiled up at the sky, tilting her head back and enjoying the sunlight. "I'm grateful to Aiko that she let us all in on her secret island. It's a wonderful place."

"Maybe you should arrange to buy it," Rei suggested, amused.

"It's a thought," the other woman replied. "I'm not sure who technically owns it. One or other Pacific nation, presumably, although no-one lives anywhere near it. There's nothing here that's worth the travel except the beauty of the place, it has no fresh water, it's too small to land an aircraft other than a helicopter on and too far from anywhere larger to actually reach with a helicopter, and getting here by boat would be very dangerous. The currents outside the reef are extremely strong and unpredictable." She sat up, pointing at the small gap in the reef that led out of the lagoon. "You can go out through there, but the sea bed drops off very quickly to an enormous depth. There's nowhere to anchor a boat."

"So no-one comes here other than you guys?"

"As far as we know, that's right. We've never seen any sign of anyone else but us." Kasumi looked at her. "You as well, now. We need Aiko at the moment to be able to come here, of course, but sooner or later Ranma and I will work out how her teleportation magic works and duplicate it, so other people can do the same thing. That would be very useful indeed."

"I'll say. I'd love to be able to do what she can. Teleporting to the moon! That's just insane even by our standards."

"It was very impressive I have to admit. Although the teleport sickness was unpleasant." Kasumi made a slight face of remembered disgust. Nodding, Rei agreed whole-heartedly. It had been horrible. Watching Ranma and Ami chatting, a thought struck her.

"Is Ranma always female when swimming? He has control over the curse now, right?"

Kasumi followed her gaze, smiling gently and fondly. "He can hold it off in cold water, that's true, but he finds it easier to let it change him, unless there's a reason not to. When we're swimming for relaxation he doesn't bother staying male." She looked back to Rei. "You have no idea how pleased he was when he finally worked out how to control it even to that level. He doesn't like things being forced on him. Too many bad memories of years of trouble because of that sort of activity. It leaves an impression on you."

Rei nodded her understanding, still watching the red-headed mermaid talking animatedly. "She seems happy with herself now, though."

"We both are. We came together at a very bad time in both our lives, but in retrospect it was the best thing that ever happened to either of us." The older woman smiled in a happy and gentle manner, looking out to sea but clearly also looking back in time. "I can't tell you how happy I am that what happened, happened, even though I also regret the effect it had on my family. One day I hope I can fix that last part. Nabiki finding us was the beginning of that process. Hopefully it will continue."

Looking at her, Rei smiled. The tall woman, in whom she could easily see the Chou she was familiar with, looked serenely content, making her slightly envious. She hoped that one day she could find a relationship as fulfilling as the one Kasumi and Ranma had. Hearing a faint rising whistle, she looked around, then remembered, looking up, to see five figures plummeting towards them. She grinned, pointing.

"Do you people always do vertical high-speed entrances when flying?" she asked curiously, shielding her face from the blowing sand when Nabiki and Tamiko slammed to a halt ten metres away, followed by the others a few seconds later, Misaki and Fumiko diverting at the last moment to stop over the lagoon, then dropping into it in mer-form and swimming around. Kasumi brushed a little sand from her bikini top and smiled.

"It seems to have become a habit, yes. Nabiki learned it from some rather impressive flying animals on Fwetna, then everyone else seems to have copied it. It leaves an impression, certainly."

"Quite a loud one," Rei agreed. Nabiki walked over and lay on the sand near them, opening her wings out fully and relaxing with a grin. She looked like an enormous bat sunbathing. Inspecting her closely, the black-haired girl shook her head in wonder. "That form is even more impressive than this one is," she commented.

"Ranma and I were working on a flying form for some time," Kasumi explained, also looking at her sister, smiling in satisfaction. "I redesigned what we'd done while we were on Fwetna after we came across an animal they have there, something they call a mountain soarer, which gave me the data I was missing to make something like this practical. The initial flight test was very exciting." She laughed as Nabiki lifted her head and stared at her.

"Exciting? Try terrifying! Did she tell you exactly how she did the 'initial flight test'?" At Rei's head-shake, she recounted the story of her older sister and the enormous cliff. At the end of it, Rei, Hotaru, and Ami, who had turned to listen, were howling with laughter, while Kasumi was smiling in a gratified manner.

"Wow. That must have been a bit of a shock," Ami said, grinning at Nabiki.

"She scared the crap out of me! Poor Uthryyl and the others were worried as well. I completely forgot about the magical girl part, how she'd have bounced even if it didn't work. I mean, you see your sister dive head-first over a kilometres-high cliff into nothing, you tend to get a little freaked out." The middle sister gave the older one an evil glare, making Kasumi start laughing, flopping back onto the sand.

"Oh, sister, I couldn't resist. The expression on your face when I landed was wonderful. I've never seen someone look terrified, angry, and deliriously happy all at the same time." Rei snickered as Nabiki appeared mildly annoyed, crossing her arms over her chest and staring hard at her sister.

"One day I'll figure out how to get you back for that one, you do know that, I hope?" she threatened, before starting to grin. Kasumi nodded, smiling.

"I look forward to that day, sister." Giving the older woman a hard look, Nabiki finally nodded, satisfied.
"Good. Just so you know."

Hotaru started laughing, setting them all off.

"Yori, you're dead meat when I get my hands on you," Usagi muttered viciously, lashing out against an imaginary opponent. Having been unable to concentrate on the various books and DVDs left for her, she was practising the somewhat limited fighting skills she possessed, against shadow figures she populated with the likenesses of people she wasn't very happy about at the moment. Most of them were Yori, of course, but Chou was there as well, also Ami and Rei, with Setsuna and one or two others putting in an appearance.

Overextending herself in a kick, she sprawled full-face on the gravel, yelping in shock, then rolled over and spat out little bits of rock, swearing. Laughter from the side made her roll her head in that direction and send a nasty look at the cat which was sitting on a boulder a few metres away, or more accurately, at the cat which was rolling around on a boulder a few metres away laughing its ass off. "Shut up," she grumbled, before reaching into her mouth and removing an errant piece of gravel, flicking it away distastefully.

"Even an imaginary Yori can kick your ass," the cat giggled, looking at her, then ducking as a large rock shot over its head at high speed. The animal rolled over and sat up, looking annoyed. "That almost hit me," she complained.

"It was meant to," Usagi griped, glaring at it, then stood up and brushed herself down. Luna watched, grinning a feline grin. "And for your information, it was Chou." The cat stared, then fell over again, laughing hysterically. "It's not funny. I need to get good enough to beat Yori and her friends."

"You know that's never going to happen?" The cat inspected her as she flushed. "The only one who could possibly train you to beat Yori is Yori. Somehow I doubt that's going to occur."

"What would you know about it? You're just a cat. An overly talkative one, as well," Usagi growled, turning away to practice again. She received no reply and when she glanced back a little later there was no sign of her feline advisor. "Good riddance," she mumbled, trying that kick again, slightly more successfully this time.

"This is amazing," Hotaru laughed, extending her wings and waving them experimentally. She turned her head, once more astounded how far she could do that in this form, to look down at her tail. Unfamiliar muscles moved as she twitched it, grinning. Kasumi smiled at her, walking around her and inspecting her work carefully. Satisfied, she stepped back a couple of paces.

"Do you like the colour scheme and patterning?" she asked. "I can easily change it." Bringing her wings around in front of her the girl studied them closely. The base fur colour was a deep purple, nearly black, with lighter violet stripes running across it at a slight angle. When the light hit it just right they stood out nicely.

"I love it, Kasumi. Thanks."

"I suggest you spend a little while getting used to that form before we try flying," the elder Tendo said, amused at her exuberance. "Just walk around, try your tail and wings, you need to be familiar with them before you can use them properly. It will come to you quite fast, I think, we all found it very natural in a surprisingly short period of time." After watching Hotaru experiment, she nodded in satisfaction, moving off to work on Rei. Watching her go, the younger woman grinned happily, opening and closing her wings a few times, then flapping them once or twice, quite slowly. Even so, she felt herself get light on her feet. The lift was enormous.

Taking the advice from the older woman she folded them again then walked down the beach, looking around with interest. Fumiko and Misaki were still swimming around in the lagoon, while Nabiki and Aiko were talking to Ami, who Ranma had just finished producing a flying form for. Her wings were a pale blue with silver streaks, something that Hotaru thought suited her friend well. Ami looked stunned, extending her wings to the side and staring at them with a small smile, then pulling out her computer and scanning herself with great interest.

Tamiko landed a few metres away from her, much more gently than normal, coming in for a soft touchdown and running a couple of steps before folding her wings away. She walked over, looking Hotaru up and down with an expert eye, smiling and pleased. "Not at all bad. Kasumi does good work."

"Isn't it incredible?" the girl replied, curling one wing around in front and stroking it. "This is just... I don't have the right words for it. But it's that."

"I know what you mean. I felt the same way," Tamiko chuckled. "I still do. It's annoying that we're not really free to use these forms at home but it would raise too many questions right now. Nabiki, or 'Azumi', could get away with it, she's too new to have anyone sure of her abilities, but for the rest of us it would be a little odd. One day, perhaps."

"Is flying as much fun as it looks?" Hotaru asked, looking up for a moment. Tamiko laughed once more.

"No. It's more fun." She grinned as her companion looked excited. "The first few seconds will probably be pretty scary though. Aiko will teleport you to a decent altitude. I'd suggest you keep your wings closed as you fall for the first few seconds, try to get into a stable position, like a skydiver. You know, arms out, knees bent back. Like on TV." Hotaru nodded, listening carefully and remembering what she'd seen in movies. "Then slowly open your wings. You'll feel the difference immediately. Tip a little more head down, open them further, and you should end up in a glide. Use your tail to stabilise it. When you're gliding, you'll work out how to move your wings to change direction quickly enough. After that, powered flight is pretty simple. Taking off from the ground and landing are the hardest things to get right. I ended up on my face the first time I landed." At Hotaru's giggle she shrugged. "It counts as a landing even if it wasn't graceful, right?"

"I guess."

"Don't worry about getting hurt. We're all tough enough to take a drop like that, and we have the world's best healers with us. You'd probably end up in the water anyway, which is softer than coral. Aiko and the rest of us will follow you and your friends down, if you get into trouble she'll teleport you back up again, until you get it right. We'll do you one at a time. Want to go first?"

The violet-haired girl nodded vigorously. "Definitely. I can't wait."

"Remember that when you're falling from three thousand metres," Tamiko grinned. Swallowing slightly, the girl nodded.

Ami stared up, her brow creased, at the tumbling figure high above them. A faint scream, either of joy or terror, or possibly both, reached her a few seconds later. She gulped, lowering her gaze to Ranma, who was looking extremely amused. He watched her, then glanced at Rei, who had closed her eyes. "It's easier than it looks," he chuckled. "She's just trying too much too soon. She'll be fine in a minute or two." Not entirely convinced she nodded, looking up again. The figure was now spinning wildly, considerably lower. Two other fliers matched velocities with her, reaching out and steadying her, then all three disappeared and reappeared a thousand metres higher. She blinked at the flash, shaking her head in wonder.

"You people have some pretty brutal training methods," she muttered.

Behind her, Nabiki laughed. "You haven't seen anything yet." Ami looked back at her, eyes wide. Glancing at Ranma the middle Tendo added, "Wait until stage four."

"Um, what?" she asked, puzzled. The only answer was a snicker. Suddenly shivering, she turned back to watching Hotaru. The three distant figures jumped back up to the start height twice more, but eventually her younger friend was flying stably under her own power, visibly having a wonderful time. She smiled as the girl pulled off a large loop, her shriek of joy audible from the ground above the sound of the waves on the reef. Ranma nodded approvingly.

"Not bad. That didn't take long. She's going to be good at it."

"We'll have to take them to Fwetna for some advanced training," Kasumi commented, watching with her hand shading her eyes. "I think they'd like that. I know the soarers would."

Not quite sure what they meant, Ami pushed her questions to the back of her mind and watched with a smile as Hotaru and the other two spiralled down, Tamiko and Aiko making perfect landings while the other girl stumbled, flipping forwards and instinctively wrapping her wings around herself, rolling along the sand a couple of times, to end up lying on her back in disarray, laughing frantically. She punched the air in triumph, letting out a yell. "That... was... Incredible!"

She got to her feet, shaking sand from her wings, folding them behind herself as naturally as if she'd been born with them, then ran over. "Ami, Rei, you're going to love it!" she babbled, a grin that threatened to separate the top of her head from the bottom stretched across her face. Ami laughed, her excitement was infectious.

"Who's next?" Aiko asked, walking up, grinning. Ami and Rei exchanged glances.

"I'll try," Ami said, beating Rei by a fraction of a second. The other woman laughed.

"OK. Nabiki, you want to help this time?" the petite brunette said. Nabiki nodded.

"All right." They gave Ami some preflight advice to which she paid careful attention, then moved to stand on either side of her.

"Ready?" Aiko looked at her. She swallowed and nodded, then screamed as she found herself falling, high, high above the island, which was laid out below her like a small jewel in the deep blue of the Pacific ocean.

"Oh god oh god oh god," she gibbered, frantically trying to remember the advice she'd just heard. Hearing a shout she looked to her left to see Nabiki falling beside her, showing no effort, her wings folded. She motioned to her legs, then held her arms out, mimicking a skydiver. Ami tried the same, finding that her fall immediately stabilised, slowing as she bent her legs and moved her arms as wide as she could manage. Nabiki gave her a thumbs up.

Feeling her tail streaming behind her, an odd sensation, she looked over her shoulder, finding it easy with the modified neck, then twitched the end of it. This resulted in a quick three hundred and sixty degree roll which nearly made her throw up. 'Ick. Note to self, go slowly,' she thought, looking back to the middle Tendo, who was grinning. Nabiki jerked her thumb over her shoulder, indicating her wings, then opened them a little, at the same time straightening her legs. Her descent angle steepened to nearly vertical, still expertly controlled. Ami tried the same thing.

"AAAAAHHHH!" she screamed as she rolled wildly, then flipped end over end. Someone grabbed her tail and stabilised her. After a moment she opened her eyes again, watching the ground get closer, before looking sideways. Nabiki was laughing. She made a motion upwards, before the ground abruptly jumped away from them a thousand metres or so. 'This is harder than I thought,' Ami thought. 'They make it look so easy. But I guess that's what the mark of an expert is, to make a difficult thing look easy.' Deciding that if Hotaru could do it she damn well could, she cautiously tried again. This time she found herself dropping smoothly into a downward high-speed flight, causing her to grin behind the goggles that were part of the flying form change. Risking a look towards Nabiki she saw the other woman looked pleased.

After a few seconds, Nabiki again motioned to her wings, opening them further. Her glide angle decreased as she levelled off, disappearing behind Ami as she slowed rapidly. Trying the same she felt her stomach lurch a little at the change in angle and speed, laughing in delight as it worked. Once more the middle sister matched flight paths, Aiko doing the same on the other side. Sharing a smile with them, she copied what they did until she had her wings fully extended, gliding on the wind with an ease that astounded her. 'Oh, my god, this is amazing!' she thought, looking around in wonder. 'No wonder they like it so much. To be able to do this whenever you want...' She stared down at the island two kilometres or so below, finding out that her vision was good enough to resolve the faces of everyone looking up at her. She waved at her friends, smiling as they waved back.

A few minutes passed as she soared, carefully trying gentle movements to see what happened. After a while she decided she had a decent basic grasp of flight dynamics, looking at Nabiki who was watching her intently, giving her a thumbs up. She noticed at that point that there were at least three of the little alien camera drones pacing them, one on either side and one flying backwards thirty metres in front. She guessed there was probably at least one more behind them somewhere. 'Oh, wonderful, we'll be able to watch me screaming any time we like,' she snickered to herself, inwardly quite curious to see the video.

Nabiki grinned, then flapped, rising quickly. After a couple of flaps she motioned to Ami, who nodded and tried the same thing. The first one nearly caused her to flip but she just caught herself, straightening out again until she caught her breath, then attempting it again. Shortly she was climbing with steady beats of her wings, smiling happily.

The flying lesson lasted about half an hour. Almost too soon, she was following the Tendo sister back down to the island, watching her land gracefully and fold her wings away as easily as jumping off a chair. Determined to not do the same somersault Hotaru had performed, feeling mildly competitive, she circled a couple of times, getting a feel for the turbulence near the surface and picturing what she wanted to achieve in her head, before lining up into the wind and going for it. The feeling of triumph engendered by only stumbling slightly when she touched down made her laugh out loud, more pleased than she'd been for ages.

"Very nicely done," Nabiki congratulated her, smiling. Aiko landed to one side, looking amused.

"Not bad at all, Ami," the brunette complimented her. "You picked it up quickly. A few hours of practice and you'll be as good as the rest of us."

Feeling a glow of satisfaction at a job well done Ami watched as Aiko walked over to Rei, who seemed slightly nervous, disappearing with her and Fumiko. Hotaru ran up, giggling and smiling, then hugged her, wrapping her wings around both of them as well, which was an odd sensation.
"You did really well, Ami. Ranma and Kasumi were very impressed. So was I, you got it faster than I did."

"It's wonderful fun, isn't it," Ami replied, smiling at the teenager.

"Even better than the swimming. I could do it all day."

"When Rei has the basic idea we can all practice for a while," Kasumi suggested, "You can try some more advanced manoeuvres. But we should probably go and get something to eat fairly soon. It's about seven in the evening in Tokyo." She watched Rei and her friends for a little while, Ami and Hotaru following her gaze. The other woman seemed to be getting to grips with it after some unexpected involuntary aerobatics nearly as spectacular as those Hotaru had managed. "Do you like sushi?"

"I do," the purple haired girl said, raising her hand. Ami nodded as well.

"So do I. Rei does as well."

"Good. It's something of a tradition with us. There's a wonderful sushi place in Brisbane we like going to after a day like this." Kasumi looked amused. "They're used to magical girls now. We've had some interesting meals there."

"Australia?" Hotaru asked with interest. "I've never been there, but I always wanted to. I'd like to see some kangaroos, they're funny." The eldest Tendo laughed.

"They are indeed. We'll see what we can do."

'What do you think about letting them have SIs, Jun?' Nabiki asked as she watched Ami, Rei, and Hotaru engage in aerial tag, thousands of metres above the ocean, laughing furiously. Above them, Fumiko and Tamiko were doing loops, with Misaki practising a weird vertical corkscrew spin that she thought looked amazing, her wings almost wrapped around her body in the process. She glanced at Ranma, beside her, who was also watching with her eyebrows raised and a smile on her face. Somewhere off to the side Kasumi and Aiko were lazily soaring, talking over the com.

'I believe that Hotaru is safe, Nabiki. She is clearly very impressed with Ranma, despite the earlier trouble, which I think was made worse for her precisely because she likes Yori so much. Finding out the truth came as a blow to her which was probably inevitable but she would appear to have transferred her original feelings to your brother-in-law once she realised he and Yori were the same person. If anything, they are closer now than they were a day ago. I expect this will translate into a fierce loyalty to your group, as strong as the rest of you share.' The machine fell silent for a moment while she pondered its words. "As such, possession of an SI would enhance her abilities significantly, with no serious security implications I can see."

'And the others?'

'Ami is also safe. She was rejected by her group in a number of ways long before the most recent revelations. She likes Hotaru and trusts her, she also feels a responsibility to her. Her intelligence is of a very high order, her combat skills will be formidable once she is correctly trained, she is already used to machine interactions, albeit with a significantly inferior machine,' the voice was dryly amused, making her snicker, 'and she likes and trusts Kasumi, a feeling she's had for some time. While she was and still is apparently somewhat scared of Ranma's abilities and skills, due to previous interactions, she is also fascinated by the possibilities those skills suggest. She lives to learn, much like Ranma does, although from a somewhat different viewpoint. She would make a valuable asset, like Hotaru.

Nodding to herself, Nabiki could find no fault with the analysis. Jun continued after a second or two. Rei is potentially a problem, although I suspect only slightly. She has a history of being nearly as quick to the boil as your younger sister, although without the explosive rage issues or the indiscriminate destruction that often accompanied one of Akane's episodes. That's good, as she is significantly more powerful than Akane could ever hope to be, the destruction she could cause is deeply worrying. That said, she has changed and matured very significantly in the last few weeks, a process that is still ongoing. Her grandfather is a wise man who has had a large influence over her, for the better. I would also suggest that the recent trip to K'mn four helped broaden her outlook on her place in life, which may well have calmed her down. She could still be difficult, of that I have no doubt, but I also think that she is now sufficiently rational so as to be a minor security threat. It paused once more, adding, If she did become such a threat any of you would have no real problem dealing with it, in an amused tone.

Laughing, Nabiki nodded again. 'So, to sum up, there should be no problem with any of them that outweighs the usefulness of them having SIs.'

'I believe that is what I just stated, Nabiki,' Jun replied with something very close to a laugh in its voice.

'It is indeed, my friend,' she said, grinning.

'Undoubtedly Ranma and Kasumi have already run this same scenario and come to similar conclusions, the device told her. In all probability they will offer all three girls an SI unit each when we return to Tokyo. I expect none of them will refuse.

'Hotaru would tear his arm off to get one, I'm sure of that,' she agreed.

An unlikely event but I understand the metaphor, Jun quipped.

'So that's three of the last five units, then. I wonder what he'll do with the last two?'

Unknown. There are no other individuals your group is currently in contact with that would seem good candidates at the current time, although Agent Naito might be a possibility in the future. I am unsure of the wisdom of giving such a powerful tool to a government agent, even him, I must confess, although his recent behaviour shows he is very trustworthy and could be considered loyal to Yori. Even so, his primary loyalty will be to the PSIA and he has shown he takes his responsibilities seriously on a number of occasions. Further consideration and observations will be needed before I could make a good threat assessment.

Both of them fell silent, Nabiki slipping through the air easily for a while, just watching her friends and family play. Eventually she asked, 'Do you think more SIs could be obtained in the future? I know Uthryyl said it was unlikely, this was a once in a lifetime opportunity, but...'

Uthryyl is correct that my makers are reluctant to allow devices of my level out of their control except in very rare cases to specific individuals. I do not know, but strongly suspect, that the reason he was able to obtain the units he did in the first place was because he is a known associate of Yori and Chou. I have calculated there is a minimum eighty percent chance the makers were hoping to get an SI into their possession. Nabiki listened with some surprise.

'They wanted my sister and Ranma to have them? Why, I wonder?'

Most likely because they were hoping what just happened would in fact happen. Having gone over all the information we now have on the time device, it is clear they have extensive knowledge of it and the threat it presents, although I have no idea where this knowledge originated. My theory is that every SI sold is being used as a low-probability search method to locate the device and arrange its eventual complete destruction. A long shot, if you like.#

She thought for a moment, then laughed. 'One of those million to one chances that works nine times in ten?'

#There is some merit to the concept, yes, especially when you mix in magical girls and the other types of chaos attractors that congregate in Minato and Nerima. Similar people exist in other realities.# Jun sounded amused. #None to my knowledge quite as attractive to chaos as the inhabitants of your homeworld, though. The makers may well be attempting to arrange to get an SI into the hands of people who are the most likely to run across the device or its tampering, even if it stands little chance of success. Clearly the chance is non-zero as it would appear to have worked. I would expect that opening a contact with them, which will be necessary to obtain the antimatter warheads Ranma has decided to use on the device when it is located, would lead to an opportunity to obtain more SI units. As well as upgrades to myself and the others.# It sounded slightly eager. #I would like to see what was available in the form of upgrades. Ami's little toy computer is quite inferior to me in most respects but it does have an impressive sensory suite, which contains a few systems I do not. Adding those abilities would be advisable if possible.#

'For security reasons.'

#Of course.#

'Not because you want new toys? Or you're jealous of what her machine can do?'

#No, that would be illogical. I do not emulate jealousy, it is an inefficient waste of resources.# The sly tone made her laugh again, enjoying the verbal game.

'We'll have to see what we can arrange, Jun.'

#Thank you, Nabiki. As always, I am only thinking of your security.# It fell silent, leaving an impression of contented amusement. Giggling, she joined the game of tag, dropping into a steep dive and catching Ami unawares, then Shooting off sideways, hotly pursued by half a dozen flying girls.
Staring out the hotel window, Haruka sighed. It was dark now, after another nice summer day, one in which she had felt no happiness. Turning away from the window she returned to her chair, picking up her book and flipping through it to find the place she’d stopped reading. She absorbed half a dozen more pages before she lost interest again. Dropping the book to the desk she leaned back and closed her eyes, rubbing her forehead. 'What the hell am I supposed to do now?' she wondered despondently. 'I spent nearly a third of my life fighting things that go bump in the night, things from other worlds, but now I'm supposed to believe all that was because some ancient alien computer is playing some weird sort of game with us as the pawns. The love of my life hates my guts, and our daughter, most of my closest friends are either joining the most dangerous person I've ever even heard of, or are hiding somewhere doing god knows what. Setsuna is going genuinely nuts as far as I can tell, the poor bitch, and everyone we've helped for years is terrified of us going off again.'

She put her head in her hands and slumped on the desk, sighing. 'I can't say I blame them, either. We totally destroyed that damn mall, for no reason that makes any sense now as far as I can work out. Hotaru seems convinced it was me who started it but I can't remember that at all. I do remember fighting Makoto, the crazy cow, and I know it was my fault that those buildings collapsed. Thank god Chou and Yori and their friends managed to save everyone. Somehow.' She flexed her hand, a nervous tic she’d developed recently, subconsciously making sure it was still there. 'Yori cut my damn arm off! Then regrew it! What the hell is she? Nothing that any of us are even remotely equipped to fight, even if I hadn't promised to stay out of it. There's no way I'm risking going up against her or her friends again.'

Depressed, she sighed again, opening her eyes and standing up. 'I'm hungry. May as well go and find something to eat.' Shaking her head she straightened herself out, grabbed her keys, then left the room, heading outside. Walking slowly along the street she looked at the people she passed, seeing that most of them looked fairly happy and wondering if she’d ever feel like that again. 'I wonder how Hotaru is getting on. Going to the moon, for god's sake. That's just nuts.' She looked up, seeing the moon was about three quarters full, clouds moving across it, stopping and studying it for a moment before shaking her head and walking on. 'I suppose it will be interesting to see if they find anything but I still don't believe all that. It sounds crazy.'

A sound from the alley she was passing drew her attention. Swearing and muttering came to her ears, along with other noises of a more violent nature. Looking around she saw no one close, the nearest people eighty or ninety metres away going into the restaurant she'd been aiming for. Debating with herself for a few seconds, she finally shrugged and walked into the alley, heading for the place around a corner the noises were coming from. 'Probably a bad idea but I may as well look,' she thought. Arriving at the corner she peered around, then sighed again, stepping into the open. "Don't play with the idiots, just put them down gently and get on with life, you stupid woman," she said out loud to the familiar figure that was facing off with five large men armed with various clubs and knives. Three more similar men were lying unconscious on the ground. Makoto looked away from her opponents at her, scowling.

"Go away. Find your own criminals. These are mine, I've been following them for an hour." The men exchanged looks, not very happy ones either.

"Um, would you mind if we left?" one of them asked. "If you're going to have an argument, I mean. You might not want anyone else listening in."
"Shut up. I'm not done with you yet," Makoto snapped, briefly looking at him. Haruka rolled her eyes but stayed put, mildly curious to see what happened next. "What do you want, anyway? I haven't seen you for over a week. Not that I'm complaining, you understand, not after last time."

"You attacked me, remember? I was just defending myself."

"Oh, please, you were hardly just defending yourself. Three buildings? I didn't do that." The brunette jumped sideways, laying out one of the men who had attempted to take advantage of her apparent momentary lapse of attention and sneak off with one punch to the head. "You're not going anywhere," she lectured the unconscious figure with irritation.

"You're going to kill someone if you keep hitting them like that," Haruka observed, watching this little drama. "They're not demons."

Makoto shrugged. "Next best thing. Can't find any demons."

"If you do kill anyone Yori will come after you, that I can guarantee. You won't like what happens," her former team-mate cautioned her. The brunette looked momentarily uncertain but shrugged it off quickly.

"As long as I steer clear of her area I'm fine." The remaining four men were listening, looking back and forth between the two women, expressions of fear on their faces.

"Are you sure you want us here?" the same man as before tried, his voice drying up with a gurgle as she narrowed her eyes at him. "Sorry," she squeaked in a tiny voice. She returned her attention to Haruka, who smiled slightly at the scene she was watching.

"Suit yourself. You'll find out sooner or later." Shaking her head, she headed back the way she'd come, for some reason a little happier than she'd been a few minutes ago. Behind her she heard the fight restart, ending within seconds. She felt Makoto pass her somewhere on the roof, heading away quite fast, as she reached the street and walked towards the restaurant. "Keep it up, you idiot. You're really not going to like what happens," she muttered, entering the building and waiting for a table to free up.

"Hello, Chou, it's nice to see all of you again," Pauline said, smiling at the large group of women. She noticed three new faces in the crowd. The youngest one, a girl of perhaps fourteen, who had shoulder-length purple hair and an excited expression, looking around with interest. The other two were a few years older, probably around eighteen. The one with blue hair was studying the menu on the window while the other one was talking to the auburn-haired woman, whose name she remembered after some thought as Tamiko.

"Hello, Pauline. Thank you, it's nice to see you again as well. I hope business is well, and you are also?" The blonde looked genuinely interested. The waitress nodded.

"Yes to both. We've been getting steadily busier since that episode a couple of months ago with the Théberge party. It seems that Jacques Théberge and his family have been talking about you, and the restaurant, which has had quite an effect on business. We've moved up in the world." She laughed as Chou grinned.

"I'm glad we could help, both him and the rest of you." Smiling, Pauline led them to a table, handing out menus.

"Chef Saiki asked that he be told when you came in, so he could make sure you got the best service," she said, as she worked. "Once I've taken your orders I'll let him know."
"Thank you, Pauline." The table-full of magical girls looked through the menus while she patiently waited, then began ordering. The order pad filled up rapidly, leaving her with four pages full by the time they finished. "And three bottles of that Torbreck Shiraz, please," Chou added. She looked around the table as most of the women nodded. "Water as well, plus two glasses of Coke, thank you." Pauline glanced at Yori, who smiled, then the purple-haired girl sitting beside her, who looked disappointed.

"Certainly. I'll be back soon," the waitress said, reclaiming the menus, before heading for the kitchen. Handing the order to the new sous-chef, she headed to prepare the drinks, selecting and opening the wine, then setting it aside to breathe for a few minutes. "They're back, Chef," she commented as Gakushi came out of the cold room. "Chou and the others." He smiled broadly, hurrying to the kitchen door and peering through the window.

"They've got some friends with them," he noted curiously. "I wonder if they're magical girls as well."

"Probably. They have that feel about them," she replied, filling the two classes of Coke.

"Even the young one? She can't be more than fourteen."

"I looked into it, apparently they come even younger in this Minato place," Pauline said, putting everything on a tray. "I found one website that listed over fifty of them, some were only about eleven or twelve. It sounds crazy to me but apparently it's true."

"Minato is a very strange place, that's true," Gakushi mused, looking at the order pad over the sous-chef's shoulder for a moment. "I haven't been there for many years but I remember it was pretty odd even then." Reaching over the man's shoulder he plucked one of the sheets from his grasp. "This one I do myself. You get the rest ready." Moving to the refrigerator he started assembling ingredients. "Those people get the best. They've made us a hell of a lot of profit in the last couple of months, aside from anything else," he explained as his subordinate looked puzzled.

"I'll tell you the story later," Pauline whispered to him as she walked past, pushing the door open. He still looked puzzled but nodded, turning to his task. Heading back to the table she put the tray down, pouring a little wine into the glass in front of Chou, who tasted it, nodding happily.

"Very nice. We must go back and buy a couple more cases at some point, dear," she commented to Yori, who looked at the bottle with mild distaste.

"If you want, love, but it's all bad grape juice to me," she replied, smiling a little. Pauline found this rather funny but hid her smile professionally.

"Thank you, Pauline, that's fine, thanks," the blonde told her, looking at her companion with a raised eyebrow, which provoked a wider and unrepentant grin. The waitress wondered about the relationship between the two for a moment, since it was obvious they cared deeply for each other. She'd seen that sort of banter between other couples in the past. Deciding it was none of her business but happy for them, she nodded, putting the other bottles on the table, then passing the Coke to Yori, who handed one glass to the girl beside her, taking the other for herself.

"Thanks," the black-haired woman said, smiling at her.

"You're very welcome," she replied, smiling back, then returned to the kitchen. Behind her she could hear the beginning of a toast. Grinning to herself she put the tray away, nodding to Gakushi, and poured herself a glass of water. Even with the air conditioning the kitchen was very hot. It had been a pretty hot day for the time of year which didn't help. "They're in good spirits at the "moment," she reported, wiping her brow with a paper towel then disposing of it. "I think it's something to do with those other three girls. The younger one looked quite disappointed that no one was giving her any wine."

Laughing, Gakushi finished the salmon rolls he'd made freshly, inspecting them carefully, before nodding and moving to the next item on the list, assembling the ingredients with quick expertise. "New ones, or experienced ones they're just taking out for the evening, I wonder?"

"No idea. The two older ones have something about them that makes me think they know their way around a fight, certainly. Not as much as Chou and her friends but I guess they're probably pretty dangerous. The purple-haired kid seems very excited, like she's having a wonderful day, but even there she makes me think she's not exactly the normal sort of schoolgirl." Pauline glanced at the table through the kitchen door window, watching her customers with interest. "Strange people, but nice. I think they'd be good to have around in a crisis."

"They proved that with Jacques Théberge, certainly," the chef replied, looking at her for a moment. The new sous-chef was listening with interest, competently doing his job in the process, Pauline noticed with amusement. "He's been back at least half a dozen times since and he's told a lot of his friends about us. Those girls, one way or another, have at least tripled our business with one action. One damned impressive action, definitely, but only the one. It's remarkable." He glanced at her again, grinning. "It makes me proud to be Japanese."

"You haven't lived in Japan in twenty years, you fraud," she giggled, making him laugh. "I know what you mean, though. I've looked them up. There's a lot of information on the internet about things they did over the last few months, here, in the US, the UK, and ending up with that horrible event in Canada. That Halleckton place." She shivered, recalling the reports she'd read. "I have no idea what happened there, no one seems to, but it must have been bad. They were apparently heavily involved in making sure it wasn't worse."

The sous-chef, Rob, stopped what he was doing and looked at her in astonishment. "Halleckton? It's that Chou? And Yori?" She nodded, looking curiously at him. Gakushi coughed meaningfully, looking at the man then his work, causing him to flush and get back to it. "Sorry, Chef. But I've read about them as well. Over three hundred people dead, a town destroyed, a huge crater no one seems to know the cause of, then no end of fallout in the financial world since. It's amazing. And the people involved are in our restaurant!"

"Indeed they are. So make damn sure you do your best job, boy, or I have a cleaver that has your name on it," Gakushi threatened. The younger man grinned.

"Yes, Chef," he replied politely, bowing a little, causing both Gakushi and Pauline to laugh.

"Oops. Looks like more customers. It's starting to pick up." Pauline darted out to serve the new people, smiling at one of the other waitresses who was heading back with her own order. Shortly she was too busy to talk for a while.

Looking around the restaurant as she sipped her Coke, Hotaru smiled. "It's a nice place," she remarked. 'Chou' glanced over then nodded, following her gaze.

"It is, yes. Aiko and the others have been coming here on and off for some time, mostly for takeout, it's some of the best sushi they've found anywhere. We've been visiting here ourselves pretty regularly for a few months. It's a good place for a celebration, or just a night out." She frowned slightly. "Although we did have a small problem about six or seven weeks ago. Another customer had a small medical issue which we had to fix. I'm glad we were here to help."
"Was it that Jacques Théberge the waitress was talking about?" Ami asked curiously. Hotaru looked at her, then 'Chou'. Her English wasn't very good yet, she'd only picked up about one word in three, but she knew Ami was fluent in several languages. 'Yori' nodded from beside her, putting her own Coke down.

"Yes. He's a nice guy, but a bit unlucky. He had a cerebral haemorrhage, a stroke, basically. Blew out an aneurysm, dropped like that." She snapped her fingers with a loud crack, making Hotaru jump. "It was a close thing. We'd only stayed because we'd decided to have dessert. If we hadn't been here he wouldn't have made it. There's no way current medical technology could have reached the problem and fixed it, never mind the fact he wouldn't have made alive it to hospital in the first place. Luckily, we were sitting right here and got to him in a few seconds." She shrugged, picking up her glass again. "It was easy enough to fix with our own method. He lost a minute or two of short-term memory but other than that made a full recovery."

Hotaru stared at her, then looked at Ami and Rei, both of whom seemed impressed. "I really can't get over how effective you two are at healing," Rei commented, glancing at 'Chou', then back to 'Yori', who smiled at her. "How on earth did you learn to be that good?"

"We basically invented the techniques we use," the other woman replied, looking momentarily sad. "I had to, the first time I ever used ki healing was when I was under that pile of rubble, back when all the shit in Furinkan was coming to a head. I had a piece of wood about the size of a banana stuck in my right side just above my kidney. I was under that crap for nearly three days. I had a lot of time to think, to come up with new techniques." She laughed shortly, her voice abruptly showing a terrible pain for a moment, making everyone look uncomfortable, except 'Chou', who seemed suddenly full of a horrifying cold rage. It only lasted a second or two but Hotaru, Ami, and Rei all found themselves looking at her in shock.

"I'm sorry, but it makes me quite annoyed when I think about what happened," the blonde said mildly, picking up her wineglass and sipping from it, her eyes on her husband. Hotaru stared, then looked at Ami, who returned her gaze, obviously shaken.

'I wouldn't like to be on the other end of that,' the girl thought to herself, watching 'Chou' cautiously. She seemed perfectly normal now, smiling at her when she saw where Hotaru was looking, but she realised there was a part of the other woman that was still furious about the way her husband had been treated, even five years later. In a flash of insight she also realised it was likely that at least part of that fury was directed at herself, guilt for not having managed to do something sooner. Smiling back she tried to convey her sympathy, apparently getting the message across based on the way 'Chou' looked at her. A very slight nod of acknowledgement came in her direction, which only she, 'Chou', and when she looked to the side, 'Yori', seemed to catch.

"Anyway, I worked out the original basis of the ki healing method as well as the ki beams and a couple of other things, mainly as a way to pass the time," 'Yori' continued, smiling in a somewhat less disturbing manner. "It wasn't anywhere near as effective as it became later but it worked. I still think it's the best technique I ever came up with. After that, we worked on it for years, eventually turning it into what it is now. We're still improving it steadily but it's become an amazingly powerful tool. We both want to teach it to other people, it could save a lot of lives, only the difficulty is that it requires a lot of ki ability and quite a lot of magic to do properly, something that is time-consuming and difficult to teach. With some luck one day we might be able to come up with some short-cuts." She took another drink of Coke, looking around at the others, ending up with Hotaru.

"I think you'll be the first one to benefit from it, though. Your own healing ability is pretty high level but untrained. I think we can fix that."
"I'd like that." she said quietly.

"We'll work on it soon," 'Yori' assured her. They looked up as Pauline and another waitress came over, both of them pushing carts laden with plates. "Ah. Just in time, my ribs were collapsing," she joked in English, making them smile. Shortly the table was covered in food.

"Thank you, both of you," 'Chou' said, smiling. They looked pleased and took the carts away.

"This is really good," Rei exclaimed, trying a duck roll.

"Told you," Aiko laughed. "I've never found a better place." Trying her own food, Hotaru nodded her agreement. It was superb.

Soon they were eating and drinking, laughing and talking, and having a lot of fun. She decided that it had been a very good day so far despite some extremely weird revelations.

"Hey, old woman, don't you know you shouldn't walk down dark alleys at night? There might be dangerous people in them." Cologne stopped, turning to face the two young men with knives she'd sensed following her for the last two minutes. She grinned, an expression that made one of them look uncertain and the other one take a step back despite himself.

"Oh, I know that, sonny boy" she said softly. "There definitely is in this one. Me."

The screaming didn't last more than a few seconds.

Hopping out of the other end of the alley Cologne bounced along whistling happily. 'Only eighty thousand yen between them,' she thought with mild regret. 'Muggers these days are hardly worth the effort. Mind you, the tall one had a nice knife. I think I'll give it to Mousse, it's his birthday soon.' Cackling to herself she headed through Minato, seeking for the source of the weird magic-like energy she'd detected earlier that day. As soon as the café shut she'd locked up, told Mousse she'd be a while and not to burn the place down, then headed off. After a fairly uneventful train ride, something she seldom did and found she rather enjoyed, she'd gotten off in the general area she thought the energy bursts had originated from.

Nearing the place she thought was a good starting point she looked around. She'd been aware that she'd passed a number of rather unusual ki signatures, ones that weren't human, but hadn't bothered to investigate. If there were no magical girls present she saw no reason to get involved, as presumably whatever it was wasn't deemed much of a threat. As she got closer to the area she wanted to reach, though, the number of odd ki signatures was steadily climbing, reaching a percentage she found somewhat remarkable. 'There are a lot of demons around here,' she mused, looking around carefully. 'An awful lot. I hope they're not hostile.'

Stopping at a coffee-shop, she looked inside through the window, her eyes widening slightly. At least four of the patrons inside didn't originate anywhere in this world, she was sure of that. Two of them looked human but definitely weren't, although they had remarkably good spells masking their true identities, while the other two didn't bother. Both of those were clearly completely inhuman, one very large feather-covered creature talking to a much smaller one sitting on a stool, both of them drinking coffee with every sign of enjoyment. She stared as the man behind the counter nodded when the little demon raised a hand, bringing him another large cup of coffee with a smile, then accepting what looked like a small bar of gold in return with a bigger one. The man showed no sign at all that he found any of this unusual in any way. 'Weird,' she thought, amazed. 'I've never seen so many demons before. Why is no one worried about it?' Turning away from the window she looked around again, spotting at least five more signatures that didn't belong to anything born on Shaking her head she went on her way, wondering about the way people seemed to be able to adapt to practically anything. 'Especially with gold involved,' she snorted to herself, smiling. When she reached a small park she entered it, casting about until she found a suitably unpopulated part of it, then dropping off her staff and activating her modified tracking spell. It sprang into life, drawing a little energy from her as she manipulated it, looking at the results. "Hmm. Something over that way? I think so." Mumbling to herself she tweaked the spell parameters, finally nodding in satisfaction. Terminating the spell she jumped back onto her staff, heading in the relevant direction and nodding to a police sergeant she passed on the way across the park, not looking back. If she had she'd have noticed he turned to watch her until she was out of sight, then went on his way with a thoughtful look.

Half an hour later she'd traced what looked like a form of energy similar to what she'd sensed for several kilometres, ending up in a much larger park. She ran the spell again. The response this time was larger and less ambiguous, leading to the other side of the park, where a number of very high end apartment buildings stood side by side along a residential street. Studying them she could see beyond the rooftops a clock tower some distance away, illuminated a pale blue colour. It was about half-past eleven from what the clock on the side facing her said, she absently noted. 'Over there somewhere, quite close. In one of those buildings I would think. Interesting, Let's go and have a look.' She headed off, casting her senses wide, half-hoping to find another, more affluent mugger. They seemed to be non-existent in this particular area for some reason. She could only sense ordinary citizens going about their business in a manner that showed they had no real fear of the dark or what might lurk within it, something a little odd to her considering what was lurking in the coffee-shops and restaurants of the district.

Reaching the other side, she tried the spell again. It indicated she needed to head to the left. There was something funny about the response, though, making her inspect it curiously for a while. 'Strange. That's not what it normally does.' Looking closely at the magic she eventually shrugged. 'Still seems to be working.' Ending it once more she went in the indicated direction, slowly and cautiously, running the spell every now and then to keep herself on the right path. Eventually she stopped in front of a large building. Looking up at it she felt momentarily dizzy, having the oddest impression it was looking back. The Elder shook her head, deciding that she was a little tired from all the spell-casting, then looked around. She couldn't see anything out of the ordinary. The building looked normal enough, if rather more expensive than many of the others on the street, while she could see what looked like some surprisingly large plants on the roof. 'It must have some sort of garden up there,' she thought, impressed. 'Whoever lives here has a lot of money.'

Cologne might be over two hundred and fifty years old, born and raised in a village that had no idea of technology beyond a plow, but she was more than aware of how expensive some of the cars that went past every now and then were. This was clearly a very pricey place to live. She looked around again, then cocked her head, listening carefully. She thought for a moment she could hear a very faint, high pitched hum, like a tiny insect in her ear, although slightly wrong for that, somehow, but it vanished again. Coming to the conclusion she must have imagined it she shrugged then tried the spell again.

This time there was a pulse of energy that totally disrupted the magic before it completely formed, making her jump. "Shit. What was that!?" She looked around once more, not seeing anything suspicious or visibly magical. Trying again produced exactly the same result. Cologne pondered the results carefully for some time, moving to sit on a bench nearby while she went over the spell in her mind, then very slowly and carefully tried a third time. Yet again it was quenched even before it was completed.
"Now that is very strange indeed," she mumbled, rubbing her chin in thought. "What on earth could interfere with magic like that? It would take something ... very ..." Her eyes widened as she became aware that something was watching her very carefully. Slowly, not giving any sign she was aware of the surveillance, she casually looked around, not seeing anything. There was the odd vehicle passing but none of them stopped and no people were visible, aside from one or two in the distance outside the building with the clock tower, some eight or nine hundred metres away. Yet she was definitely being watched. She could feel it. Whatever it was had a lot of power as well.

'A hell of a lot of power,' she thought frantically as the observation intensified. 'An absolutely ungodly amount of power, in fact. What in the name of the gods is that?' Very slowly and unwillingly, she turned to face the building, which she was now totally sure was watching her with both extreme interest and a complete lack of welcome. She'd found what she was looking for and was suddenly and deeply regretting it.

'Oh, shit,' she thought to herself. 'This may have been a very bad mistake.' The amount of power coming from the building, even though it was totally unlike any magic she'd ever come across before and to most people, even most mages, would have been completely undetectable, gave her the impression that if she could see it properly it would burn her eyes out like looking into the noon sun with a telescope.

'Those are the most powerful wards I've ever even heard of,' she thought almost calmly, paralysed with awe. 'They could hold off a god. And I think they're alive. What the hell have I stumbled into? And how do I get out of it in one piece?'

She was watching the building watch her so intently she jumped violently at the polite cough from behind her a few minutes later. Turning, she stared...

Laughing, the group of people appeared in the practice room, Ami staggering slightly as Rei bounced off her. Both were in quite a good mood, having finished a bottle of wine between them. Hotaru giggled as they grabbed at each other to stop themselves falling over. Looking at them, then her, Ranma chuckled as he retook his normal form. "You see? Drinking bad. All fall down." She giggled, watching the older women stagger out of the room. Following them shaking her head she was smiling widely.

Nabiki watched the three go, amused, then turned to her friends. "Not a bad day all things considered, I think," she stated. Kasumi smiled.

"It worked out in the end even though we had a few upsets this morning. I think they'll be all right, now."

"I'm glad that Hotaru seems to have cheered up, she seemed very bothered when she found out about you, Ranma," the middle sister said, looking at him. "But now she see..."

#Nabiki, something of interest is going on outside,# Jun suddenly said, causing her to stop mid-word. #We may have a problem.# It popped up a window from one of the drones she'd left circling the area. She took one look at the figure in the middle of the picture and groaned. Looking at Ranma and her sister she saw they were both obviously aware of the issue as well. The martial artist sighed.

"The ward system just alerted me. I guess you got a feed from your cameras?"

"Yep. Jun told me." Aiko and her team exchanged curious glances so she routed the feed to everyone.
"Cologne. How did she find this place?" Fumiko asked in surprise.

"No idea," Ranma answered, looking annoyed. "But she's smart and more than competent. It was pretty much inevitable sooner or later. The question is what we do about it. The ward system is very unhappy about her being there. If the external defences were on she'd be a grease spot by now."

"It's a good thing they're off, then, dear," Kasumi said calmly. "We can deal with it without violence." She looked at Nabiki, who nodded, grinning. She'd wanted to try this for quite a while. A second later Ms Aoyama adjusted her sunglasses carefully.

"Mr Saotome, if you could provide some effective shielding, I believe I may be in a position to remove the minor irritation of the Elder from this vicinity," she said coldly, a very small and extremely disturbing smile flickering across her face. Ranma grinned, as the others laughed.

"It would be my pleasure, Ms Aoyama," he replied with a bow. They headed to the roof.

Landing lightly behind the elder, totally unobserved, the woman in the nice suit watched for a moment, before taking a step forward, feeling the shielding magic dissipate. She coughed politely, watching in icy satisfaction as the Amazon twitched hard then turned around...

"Elder Ku Lon of the Joketsuzoku." The woman in the expensive suit and dark glasses phrased this as a statement rather than a question. She suddenly had a thick folder in her hand, the cover bearing some writing in a totally alien language. Opening it she flipped rapidly through, stopping on a page near the middle and reading it with apparent interest. She radiated an aura of utterly emotionless cold, like the Soul of Ice technique but taken to ridiculous levels. Cologne stared at her in shock. "I am surprised to discover you in this area. My information is that you rarely leave the environs of Nerima, normally only for trips to your home village in China, the last of which was...,” she turned the page, "eleven months ago." Closing the folder she made it vanish. "May I enquire as to your business here, both in Minato and in the immediate vicinity of this particular construction, Elder Ku Lon?" She glanced at the building behind Cologne with mild disinterest. "I assume that you are aware of the fact the building in question is not enamoured of your presence?"

"I'd noticed, yes," Cologne admitted, feeling more nervous than she had in over a hundred and fifty years. There was something simply horrific about the ki signature of the woman in front of her, much more worrying than any of the demons she'd run across so far tonight. There was an appalling amount of power behind it as well, nearly as weird as the wards of the building, although different to it. The woman made a small gesture with her mouth that might, by stretching the definition almost to the breaking point, be charitably termed a smile. She shivered. There was something soulless about that expression, something that brought to mind the cold between the galaxies. "Ms Aoyama, I suspect?"

"You are correct. Gratifying. You are aware of me. That makes my task less arduous." The thing standing a couple of metres away pretending to be a woman looked her up and down carefully, raising one eyebrow behind the glasses. "Once more, Elder Ku Lon, I would be most interested in an accounting of how you found yourself in this particular place at this particular time." She paused for a small period of time, during which Cologne found herself sweating. "If you would be so kind as to enlighten me."

"And if I don't?" she asked, not sure it was a good idea but unable to stop herself. The other eyebrow went up.

"Lacking the information I requested, I would be required to investigate for myself. Due to the fact..."
I am quite busy, that eventuality would represent a burden I would prefer not to acquire. As a result it is not impossible that I might find myself being less generous than I would normally be if something untoward arose from my investigation. Regrettably, you might find this eventuality to not be of your liking. My apologies, Elder." She made a very small bow of respect, although the icy aura didn't change.

'I've never been so politely threatened with something horrible before in my life,' Cologne thought, a chill going through her. With all her years, centuries, of experience behind her, including wars with the Musk, the Phoenix people, even the Red Army, she'd never come across anything as deeply worrying and wrong as whatever it was that was standing patiently waiting in front of her. She sighed and began explaining. Ms Aoyama listened without moving a muscle until she'd stopped, not even blinking as far as she could tell from the blank expression produced by the dark glasses. 'How the hell can she even see anything?' Cologne wondered at one point. When she finished there was a long pause.

"My thanks, Elder Ku Lon. A gratifyingly complete account." A notebook made an appearance and the horrifying woman wrote in it for a short while, then vanished it. "I understand the curiosity you felt after detecting the unusual energy surges from the general area of Minato. I also applaud your sense of civic responsibility that led you to investigate the possibility of some untoward event occurring. Allow me to assure you that the matter is in hand and is most unlikely to recur. While there was no danger I appreciate you were unaware of that fact." She paused, glancing at the building, from which an oppressive sense of something keeping a very close watch on them both had been coming the entire time, making Cologne's neck-hair rise slightly. It immediately stopped, producing the slight impression of apology. The elder shivered again. She had no idea what had just happened but someone who could make whatever it was in that building apologise wasn't anyone she was going to argue with.

"My employers would be grateful, as would I, if you would refrain from mentioning anything that you discovered on your expedition tonight to any other individual. We are reluctant to take action over an innocent mistake although we would not hesitate if it proved necessary. I trust you understand my meaning and will comply?" Cologne nodded, her mouth dry, clutching her staff tightly. "Again, I am most pleased by your understanding. My apologies for detaining you. As recompense, I can arrange transportation to your residence. Would that be satisfactory?"

"That's fine, thanks," the Amazon managed. Once more a very small almost-smile flickered across the face of the woman-shaped horror. After a long moment, she asked, very cautiously, "If I might be so bold, what is that building? I've never encountered anything like those wards, or whatever it is that's powering them." Taking her glasses off, the woman in the suit studied her for a few seconds.

"Regrettably, that information is unavailable. No questions about this matter can be answered."

Cologne stared into the catlike eyes in the face of the woman, chilled to the bone. "All right. Thank you."

Putting her glasses back on Ms Aoyama nodded. "You are most welcome. Prepare for transportation. You may feel some discomfort, it is transitory and presents no danger. Goodbye, Elder Ku Lon." She paused for a moment, then added, "Please pass on my regards to your great granddaughter. We are watching her career with interest." The world flickered and Cologne staggered, forcing the nausea that swept through her down with force of will, looking around to find she was standing in front of the Cat Café. Trembling slightly from adrenaline, slightly surprised and greatly relieved that she had managed to survive yet extremely worried about the implications of what had happened, she unlocked the door, went inside, then made damn sure it was locked again.

Going upstairs to the living room she dropped tiredly into a chair, staring blankly out the window. 'What the hell happened?' she wondered in fascinated horror. 'What was that thing?' Even she had no idea whether she meant the scary building or the scarier alien woman.

Twenty minutes later when Shampoo came home from wherever she'd been, probably with Akane, she didn't look at her at first. Still staring out the window, thinking, she said, "Ms Aoyama sends her regards." The young woman stopped dead with a gasp of shock. "She also said she was watching your career with interest. Her exact words." Looking around, she met the wide eyes of her great-granddaughter with her own worried ones. "I would very strongly suggest that you not disappoint her. When you're in the US, be careful. Keep an eye on Akane as well. Don't start any trouble." Shuddering for a moment, Shampoo closed her eyes, then nodded, sitting down carefully.

"You meet some very strange people in Minato," Cologne said after a long silence, before getting up and going to bed. Shampoo was still staring into nothingness when she fell asleep.

Returning to the practice room, Nabiki returned to her normal form, staring at the others. Aiko came in behind her. After a couple of seconds everyone collapsed laughing. "Poor Cologne," Tamiko gasped. "Even from here I could feel how worried she was. You were doing Ms Aoyama harder than I've ever seen, Nabiki. It was terrifying."

Bowing, then smiling, the middle Tendo accepted the compliment for what it was. "I wasn't holding back like I normally do. I hope I didn't damage her."

"She's damn tough, she'll live," Ranma chuckled, grinning. "But I doubt she'll be back for a long time. Well done, Nabs. That was as creepy as hell."

"Thanks. Don't call me Nabs," They grinned at each other.

"Oh, dear, that was genuinely very worrying, sister. I'm extremely impressed. The way you told the wards to go to standby was very nicely judged as well. It made her even more upset when the system obeyed you." Kasumi giggled, walking over and hugging her sister. "I do hope the Elder gets over it soon, though, I quite like her. It needed to be done but she seemed somewhat... intimidated."

"That was the point," Nabiki snickered. "And while I like her as well, it was a hell of a lot of fun. If I can scare Cologne of all people I can probably intimidate practically anyone. That's useful to know."

"Don't get carried away," Aiko said, still grinning. "Otherwise magical girls will start hunting you." They all began laughing again, heading into the living room.

They found Rei and Ami arguing about some esoteric part of their flying lessons, while Hotaru laughed at both of them. Kasumi smiled, heading for the kitchen to make a large pot of coffee, Tamiko going to help her, while everyone else found seats. Eventually Rei won the argument, looking satisfied and sitting back, the other two looking at each other and grinning. They all turned to Ranma.

"Thank you for explaining everything, and for a wonderful day," Ami told him with honesty in her voice. "We all understand how difficult it must have been breaking the habit of years of privacy, and appreciate it." He nodded to her, smiling a little.
"Thanks. It was something that I think was the right thing to do, but something I've been a bit worried about for some time. That said I think it will work out. At least you three should be protected from the time device now, unless it manages to delete our reality, in which case it won't matter." He chuckled as they all looked worried for a moment. "Our job is to make sure that never happens. I'll check in with Ldnn'r'tk tomorrow and see how he's coming with that key, then we can contact Kw'lyn Industries and get some antimatter bombs." He looked thoughtful. "I don't think I want to bring them here, though, just in case. If one went off by accident..." Everyone paled at the concept. "We'll do it from the firing range world, somewhere a long way away from anyone else that's using it. That should be safe enough."

Kasumi and Tamiko returned with the coffee, handing it out to everyone. Soon they were all drinking from mugs. "Minako and Usagi are safely out of action for the moment, we should check on them in the morning, and poor Setsuna is also out of reach of the damn thing. Only Haruka, Makoto, and Michiru to go."

"Should we arrange to get them to another reality as well?" Fumiko asked curiously. Her sister looked at her.

"I think that might be a mistake." Everyone turned to her, listening with interest. "The time device is using them to bring about this reality alteration, or trying to, at any rate. It may well decide, if they all end up out of circulation, that it's failed and immediately reset for another attempt. As long as some of them are in play it might keep trying, which while not ideal, is better than the alternative. It gives us time to kill it."

"An unpleasant but plausible theory," Ranma finally agreed after a long silence and a look at Kasumi, who sighed. "So we pretty much have to leave the remaining ones here, to keep the damn thing happy until we can destroy it." He rubbed his forehead. "Damn. You're almost certainly right. In fact, we should probably bring Minako back as well, if she's acting a little more sanely. Usagi, no, she can damn well stay where she is for now. We'll deal with her after we get the thing."

Misaki shrugged unhappily. "Sorry, but I thought it was important." He waved his hand slightly, dismissing the apology.

"Don't worry. We need to consider every possibility. It's a valid point and an important one." Misaki nodded, sipping her coffee. He looked around. "Can anyone see anything else we should do?" No one could. "OK. That leaves one last thing." With a glance at his wife, who nodded calmly, he pulled a case out of nowhere. Nabiki and the others weren't surprised to see it, exchanging looks, but Ami, Rei, and Hotaru inspected it with interest, the former two sobering up quickly as the magical girl accelerated metabolism did its work. He gazed seriously at them.

"We're not going to insist that you join us, trust me. You can form your own group, work independently, or just stay out of the magical girl lifestyle as much as you can, which probably won't be very much." They all laughed, then looked at each other. "If you do want to become part of our family..."

"The Sisterhood of Doom," Aiko interrupted, laughing.

"...Yes, thank you, Aiko," he went on, shooting her a mild glare which made her grin, "We'll be more than happy to have you. But whichever path you choose, you'll need these." He opened the case after some work on the lock, turning it around to show them the contents. Two rows of six rectangular holes were in some sort of foam-like substance, seven of them empty. The remaining five contained devices that the three young women recognised with a shock.

"Really?!" Hotaru said in a hushed voice, staring. "You're really going to give us an SI each?"
"Yes. We think we can trust you with them." He looked around at the other people in the room who all nodded, smiling. "But be discreet and responsible with them, no breaking into military computer systems just for fun."

"No, you only want to do that for work," Nabiki added. He gave her a look, so she saluted him with her coffee mug. Grinning, he finally nodded.

"Exactly. Remember, an SI is for life. Treat them well, they're probably people as well, for most purposes. They're certainly going to be very close friends." Laughing, he removed three of the devices and handed them out, closing and locking the case afterwards before vanishing it again. Each of the girls accepted one with a wondering look.

"How do we use it?" Rei asked curiously.

"Put it on your palm, that side up. Yes, like that." He looked at them. "Other way up, Hotaru." The teenager nodded, flipping it over. "Right, feel the surface. There are four energy nodes, you want to get a finger on each one." The young women slid their fingers around slightly, each of them finally signalling they'd found what he had described. "Now push some power into them. Just a little, it needs to know you're capable of magic before it powers up, and it also identifies you through it." Each of them tried what he said, Ami getting it first. Her eyes widened comically. Nabiki looked at her sister with a smile, recognising the look, as it was the same one they'd all had when they'd activated their SIs.

"Holy crap," she mumbled, looking around at something only she could see. "That's incredible." Rei and Hotaru got it quickly as well, expressing similar sentiments, Rei quite loudly. Everyone else smiled.

"Good. Do you all see an icon in the top left corner that's a purplish colour, like two wavy lines over a circle?" They all nodded. "OK, that starts the setup and personalisation process. Don't activate it yet. The next step is something you'll want to lie down for. It will take a while, half an hour or so, and you'll feel pretty weird for part of it, but it's worth it. You can use the guest rooms." Ranma stood, gesturing to them. "Come on, I'll show you where to go." They all stood, exchanging wondering looks, then followed him.

Nabiki watched them go, remembering what had happened when she'd done the same thing a few months ago. Smiling, she sipped her coffee, meeting Kasumi's eyes. Her sister also smiled.

"We're going to bed, guys," Aiko announced, looking around at her team, who all nodded, standing. She yawned. "A long day but a good one. See you in the morning." Waving, she vanished. Tamiko smiled tiredly, getting to her feet and heading for the door, followed by Fumiko and Misaki.

"Same here. Night, Nabiki, Kasumi." The Tendo sisters waved to their friends, watching as they left, the door closing softly behind Fumiko. They exchanged glances before Kasumi stood, beginning to clear the coffee mugs away. Nabiki helped her carry them into the kitchen.

"Whatever they decide, I think we have genuinely made three new friends," Kasumi said, putting the cups into the dishwasher. "Hotaru seemed to enjoy it most of all. I fear that poor girl hasn't had a lot of fun for much of her life."

"I hope we can change that," Nabiki grinned. She yawned. "Aiko has the right idea. I'm exhausted. See you tomorrow."

"Good night, sister," Kasumi replied, smiling happily, as the middle Tendo wandered off to her "You three may as well stay here tonight. It's a bit late to go back now. Ami, you can have this room, Rei, you take that one, and Hotaru can have the one at the end of the hall down there. That's the bathroom, towels and things are in this cupboard." Ranma smiled at the three girls. "Your bags are still in the practice room. Have fun, enjoy getting to know your SIs, and I'll see you in the morning."

"Thank you, Ranma," Ami said sincerely. "For everything. This is far more than I ever expected."
She glanced at her friends, who nodded soberly. Hotaru hugged him for a moment, then waved to the others, heading off into the indicated room without another word but with a small smile, closing the door behind her. Watching her go, Ami grinned. "You have no idea how much she's opened up in just the last week, you know," she told him, satisfied. "Meeting you, or Yori, was something she really needed to do."

"Pleased to help," he told her, laughing, then left. She looked at Rei, who grinned back, before going into the room she'd been assigned. Ami did the same, closing the door after turning on the light, then looked around. It was a nice room, she thought, painted a light yellow, with furnishings that matched nicely. Feeling the bed she nodded approvingly. Taking her shoes off she lay down, putting the SI unit next to her on the bed, then studied the virtual display that had been hanging in front of her since she'd activated the device. 'Absolutely amazing,' she thought, shaking her head a little. With a nervous flutter of her heart she reached out and deliberately touched the setup icon.
Seconds later she regretted it. "Whoa," she muttered, the room whirling around her momentarily.
The sensation of something looking inside her head was very unsettling, but not unfamiliar, as the security spell had done something similar although not as intense.

An eerily robotic voice sounded somewhere inside her head.

#Hello, user. Language has been detected as classification Japanese, location is set to Tokyo,
Earth.# All the icons changed to Kanji text. #Welcome to the initial setup of the Kw'lyn Industries Mark Nine Gamma secure communications and sensory system. Please note that use of this system is restricted by planetary accord to authorised personnel only. Attempted use by unauthorised personnel is punishable by severe fines and incarceration. Please wait while authorisation status is verified.# There was a pause. #Authorisation verified. Please verbally indicate identity.#

She thought for a moment, then shrugged. "Ami Mizuno."

#Identity confirmed. Welcome, Ami Mizuno. Please wait while this interface is calibrated. Indicate verbally the answers to questions that will be asked during calibration.# The display stretched across her visual field as a grid of lines. #Can you see the edges of this display? Please indicate yes or no.#

"No."

#Are the grid lines evenly spaced and at right angles to each other? Please indicate yes or no.#

"Yes." The pattern became a grey scale.

#Does this pattern go from complete black to complete white? Indicate yes or no.#

"Yes."

A series of tones sounded, starting at an almost subsonic rumble and disappearing out of range upwards. #How many discrete tones did you hear? Please indicate number.# Counting in her head, she replied, "Sixteen".

#Thank you. Initial calibration complete. Advanced calibration beginning. No further user intervention is required. Note that you should be lying down for this section of the process as it can cause severe disorientation for a short period of time. When you are lying down, please indicate your readiness by stating the word begin.

She said "Begin," without hesitating. The sensory effects that immediately started made her regret it instantly. After an unknown time they stopped, leaving her gasping.

#Calibration complete. Interface integration complete. Searching for local communications nets. Radio communications networks found. Local node in close proximity found. Please indicate if this node should be used. Her phone number appeared across her viewpoint, pushing the other icons off to the bottom left.

"Yes, use that node," she told the machine.

#Choice confirmed. Interfacing with local node. Communications protocols established. Handshake complete. Local node and storage duplication in progress... Complete. Process finished. Searching for further nodes. Subspace communications network found. Local node in close proximity found in subspace storage. Accessing storage pocket. Access completed. Please indicate if this node should be used.

She realised this must be her communicator. "Use node," she said.

#Choice confirmed. Warning, node is encrypted. Encryption cracking process activated... Encryption broken. Node accessible. Interfacing with local node. Communications protocols established. Handshake complete. Local node and storage duplication in progress... Complete. Process finished. Searching for further nodes. Local processing and sensory node of unknown type found in subspace storage pocket previously accessed. Please indicate if this node should be used.

That was obviously her computer. Once more she told the machine to continue.

#Choice confirmed. Warning, node is encrypted. Encryption cracking process activated... Encryption broken. Node accessible. Interfacing with local node. Communications protocols established. Handshake complete. Local node and storage duplication in progress... Complete. Information, node has sensory capability this system does not possess. Node will be slaved to this system for further operation. Subroutines being generated for node control... Process finished. Searching for further nodes. None found in immediate proximity. Searching for secure nodes assigned to group. Seven found in local group. Two uncommitted secure nodes found in close proximity. Nodes in process of configuration. No connection can be established until configuration completed. Connection to existing secure nodes requires authorisation of node owners. Messages sent requesting authorisation... Authorisation received from five nodes... six nodes... seven nodes. All available secure nodes now accessible.

A list of names popped up in her view, in alphabetical order. She looked at it with amazed interest.

The voice came back after a pause. #Initial configuration completed. Personal configuration beginning. Synthetic Intelligence interface enabled. Conversational mode enabled. Please wait for process start. # There was another short pause then a slightly different version of the voice, much more natural and gender indeterminate, spoke.

#Hello, Ami Mizuno. Welcome to the secure system personalisation. I am a Mark Nine Gamma
Smiling in wonder, she spent the next two hours configuring the SI, learning what it could do, and talking to it. She fell asleep with a broad grin on her face, still in her clothes.

When Nabiki came out into the living room early in the morning, she found a somewhat rumpled-looking Ami staring at the university clock tower from the balcony window, a small smile on her face.

"Hello, Ami. Did you sleep well?" she commed, grinning when the other woman jumped with a small yelp, then looked around. She stared for a moment before laughing.

"More or less although I fell asleep in my clothes. I'll have to take a shower and change when Rei comes out of the bathroom."

"You can use the other one next to my room," the middle Tendo told her, for her own amusement quickly producing a map of the apartment and sending it to her. Ami gaped, then giggled, amazed.

"God, these things are incredible," she said, shaking her head.

"After a while, they're practically indispensable," Nabiki agreed. "Which is, of course, exactly what those weird aliens want us to think." She snickered at the sudden look of worry on the blue-haired girl's face. "Don't worry, we've all thought that and researched it. It's extremely unlikely. The SIs themselves get very upset at the thought, more than we do, if anything."

"Interesting," her companion mumbled. She shook her head, grinning suddenly. "Unbelievable. I'm having a conversation with you, complete with audio-visual aids, without moving my lips."

"Neat, isn't it?" Ami nodded, still grinning. "Have you named yours yet?"

"Yes. It's called Sui."

Nabiki laughed. "Appropriate. It seems to be a tradition with us, short and descriptive names for the SIs. Hello, Sui."

"It says hello, it's pleased to meet you," Ami reported with amusement. "It's a little weird they can't talk directly to anyone else."

"Security measure," Nabiki explained. "I asked Jun about it. They can only transfer data, not communicate themselves, to prevent information leaks. I can understand the idea although it's a bit of a nuisance at times."

"Ah. I see. Yes, that makes sense." Ami looked at her watch out of habit, then sighed.

"Forgot you don't need it any more, right?"

"Yep." Giggling, the blue-haired girl went off to shower, while Nabiki chuckled, heading for a large cup of strong coffee. Kasumi came in a few minutes later, wearing her practice silks, accepting a cup herself with a smile.

"They seem to be rather pleased with their new toys," her sister commented, sipping her drink appreciatively. "Rei is walking around with a huge grin. I haven't seen Hotaru yet but she's "Ami is pretty pleased as well. It's going to take them some time to get used to all the things they can do, but they'll have an easier time of it than we did, since we can give them pointers. They won't have to learn everything from scratch."

"I think that will help, certainly," the elder Tendo replied. She looked up as Ranma wandered in, yawning. "Ah. Finally. I was thinking you were going to sleep all day."

"It's only half past seven, love!" he protested, smiling. "We had a long day yesterday."

"A good one, though." Nabiki watched with amusement. Leaning forward Kasumi kissed him, then headed for the practice room. "An hour of practice and I'll make breakfast. Nabiki, you should come as well, we need to keep up your training." Her voice got fainter as she walked off. Grinning, Ranma looked at her.

"She's right. Come on, let's go over your current sets, then see if we can squeeze a new one in before breakfast. We haven't had time for this for a few days, we can't slack off." Grabbing an apple from the bowl on the counter, he followed his wife, looking pleased and eating it. She shook her head, finished her coffee, then went after them, quickly stopping at her room to change.

Half an hour later, she was in the midst of sparring with Kasumi, while Ranma critiqued her, when she felt the ki signatures of Hotaru and Ami at the door. Sparing a quick glance over she saw they were watching with impressed expressions. Her momentary inattention nearly cost her as Kasumi seized the opportunity to grab her and flip her half-way across the room, only quick reactions saving her from sliding on her face.

"Hey," she yelped.

"Pay attention, sister," Kasumi giggled, then dived at her. She jumped over the inbound relative, somersaulting to a landing five metres away, grinning. Ranma clapped as the older woman smiled at her, gracefully spinning in place, then attacked again. "You're definitely getting faster," her opponent commented, making her look pleased, before accelerating to a speed she had absolutely no hope of countering, which left her lying on her face on the floor with no clear idea of how she got there with her right arm bent up between her shoulder blades and Kasumi holding her down effortlessly. "But not fast enough, yet. I'm afraid."

"Thanks, sis, always nice to be embarrassed in front of guests," she replied, sighing. The elder Tendo laughed, releasing her. Rolling over she sat up, rubbing her elbow and glaring at Ranma who was grinning. "You can shut up as well, Saotome. I know I'm nowhere near as good as either of you and never will be." Walking over he put out his hand, helping her to her feet.

"Not as good yet," he corrected. "Bearing in mind you've only been seriously training for a few months, you're coming along very well indeed. Anyone from outside Nerima or Minato would have their work cut out for them even now. I'm quite happy with the progress so far. Give it a year or two and Kas will start having to put a little effort into it." He grinned again, glancing at his wife, who was laughing quietly. Nabiki sighed.

"But not very much, right?"

"No. Not much. That will take a few more years."

She shrugged, then smiled. "I can wait, I guess. Anyone I can't take hand to hand I can shoot with a ki ball. If that doesn't work I'll just run like hell. Or fly."
Her sister and brother-in-law both burst out laughing. "Good plan," he snickered. "We should get Onkra here for a while soon, after we've killed the time device, you two could spar against each other. I expect that will improve both of you rapidly. I need to see how she's coming along anyway. Last time I talked to Uthryyl he said she was practising pretty hard, two or three hours a day. Looks like she's serious about it."

"That's nice to hear," Kasumi remarked, looking pleased. He nodded.

"I think she'll be pretty good at the art as well." He turned to the door, where Rei had also joined her friends, all of them watching with interest. "Come on in, no need to block the door." The girls filed in and lined up along the wall. Nabiki walked over to join them, rotating her shoulder to work out the kinks from where Kasumi had thrown her. He glanced at her, raising an eyebrow. "Need any work?"

"No, it's just a bit stiff. It'll be fine in a minute or two. You grabbed me a bit hard, sis." Kasumi shrugged, smiling.

"Just making sure I had your attention." Hotaru laughed, causing the elder sister to look at her with amusement. Turning to her husband, she grinned at him. "We haven't had a good spar for nearly a week. Shall we?" He bowed flamboyantly to her, making the girl laugh again and everyone else grin, before motioning to the middle of the room.

"After you, my lady," he said grandly. She curtseyed.

"Thank you, Grand Master." Both of them laughing, they walked out to their positions, faced each other, then began sparring, starting slowly for them, which was blindingly fast for anyone else, quickly speeding up to totally insane speeds. Cracks and thuds of impossibly fast blows echoed off the walls as they fought. Nabiki watched for a moment, trying to pick out individual moves, having severe difficulty keeping up even now after months of training, before looking sideways at the three girls when she felt their shock. She grinned. All three were gaping at the action, hardly breathing, clearly having trouble believing what they were watching.

"Holy shit," Rei breathed after a few disbelieving seconds. "This is practice? For fun?"

"Yes, they're not really going at it seriously. They're a lot faster when they really try." The middle Tendo smirked at the look all three of them gave her. "Really. You wouldn't believe how fast they can go if they have to."

"I can't believe how fast they're going now," Rei muttered, looking back to the two martial artists, who seemed to be having fun. They watched as Kasumi jumped vertically, doing the splits, as Ranma lunged under her, somehow performing a twisting flip in mid air to end up heading downwards at his back with her fists leading, only to have him rotate sideways and deflect her to the side, while recoiling in the other direction. Landing lightly on the wall he bounced off heading back into the fight, grabbing his wife as he passed her and spinning her upwards, until she touched the ceiling. On the way back down she caught his arm, reeled him in before he could react, then flipped him head over heels across the room.

Laughing, he landed easily, back-flipping twice in a blur of motion, then closed with her again, their style instantly changing completely, now involving a lot of kick-boxing moves combined with something like Karate. Nabiki smiled, impressed, while the three other girls simply stared.

When both participants suddenly produced a pair of energy swords at the same time they changed to yet another style, Hotaru yelped in shock while Rei and Ami both swore. Laughing slightly, Nabiki watched them nearly as much as her sister and her partner, amused at the expressions. After another minute or two Rei looked at Ami, who stared back. "We're seriously outclassed here," she mumbled. The blue-haired girl nodded, a wide-eyed look on her face. They turned to Nabiki, the sounds of the energy swords deflecting each other forming a background noise like an SF movie.

"I thought that you looked pretty impressive earlier, but this... This is a completely different level, isn't it?" Ami asked quietly, waving to the two sparring people, who were smiling as they fought.

"It is. This is why I'm not sure I'll ever be anywhere near as good as they are." She smiled, sighing a little. "They're simply unbelievable. Ranma is going easy on her, to be honest, although she's still getting steadily better very fast. She's already better than he was when he left, although he had more practical experience then than she does now. There's a very good reason he's the Grand Master of the school. She's past master level after only about five years, already much better than our father or his even though they both have more than twenty years more experience than she does. I would think they probably know some tricks and techniques Kasumi doesn't, but not many." She watched them spar for a moment more. "Ranma is so far beyond that it's not even funny. He's never going to stop learning, and he's not going to stop teaching her until she's his equal, however long it takes."

"I can't really understand that level of dedication," Rei said after a few seconds.

"It's somewhat scary, to be honest. So is Kasumi telling me I could be as good as her. I can't see how, watching this sort of thing." Nabiki laughed a bit, remembering a discussion she'd had a couple of weeks ago while on holiday. "Look at it like this. It's how Ranma explained it to me a while ago." She tapped the floor with her foot. "Down there is the average street brawler, gang member, something like that, no real training but some experience. Around here," she indicated a spot on the wall a centimetre up, "is someone trained in normal self-defence techniques to a decent level. Rather higher, about here," she moved up ten centimetres, "is a seriously trained normal martial artist, or special forces operative, that type of person." All three of them watched her with interest.

"Move to about here," now she was indicating a spot about thirty centimetres up, "You get something like one of the fairly good but unspectacular Neriman martial artists, or most magical girls who aren't trained in fighting." Her hand went up another two centimetres. "About here is me, according to Ranma. Mainly because I'm much faster and stronger than most people, not because I'm very practised at the moment. Akane is here, quite a bit higher. Shampoo somewhere rather higher than that. Cologne is up here, Aiko and the others would be around here as well at the moment." Her hand went up another thirty centimetres. "Both our fathers are somewhere between her and Shampoo, closer to Cologne, Ryoga would be about that level as well, and some of the high-end Neriman artists." They all nodded. "Go up here and you reach Herb, with Saffron above him." She moved another forty centimetres, now about a third of the way up the wall. "Got it?"
Once more they nodded.

"Right. Kasumi is about here," she pointed to the ceiling. She shrugged a little, staring up at where she was pointing. "Ranma? Somewhere well above the roof." There was silence for a while.

"Wow." They all looked at Hotaru, who was staring up as well.

"It's only a rough guide, and probably not all that accurate, because it doesn't take other abilities like ki and magic into account, but it gives you an idea. From what I've learned Ranma is undoubtedly the best around, by an absolutely massive amount. Kasumi is already the only serious competition he's likely to have. Everyone else is a long, long way behind." She turned back to watch the sparring. "Five years ago he nearly died fighting Saffron and only won due to a combination of luck and sheer determination, something he's happy to confirm. Now, he wouldn't really notice. Kasumi could take Saffron as well in several different ways, according to Ranma, and I've got no reason to disbelieve him. Aiko or any of the others could deal with Cologne or any of the Amazons without too much effort. Me, I'd get my ass handed to me by Shampoo, or even Akane, in a fair hand to hand fight. Not that I'd fight fairly, believe me. Ryoga would be extremely hazardous as well if he was seriously pissed off, although because he's an idiot I could outwit him easily." She laughed, while they grinned. "Taking my shirt off then hitting him with a bucket of cold water while he was gaping would be the obvious method." Hotaru started giggling.

"What it all adds up to is that the title of Grand Master of the Anything Goes School is a pretty amazing thing to have earned. He knows more about martial arts than possibly anyone who's ever lived." She glanced at them again. All three girls looked impressed and somewhat intimidated, making her smile slightly. "But he's also a really nice person who only wants the best for everyone. Although he'll defend anything or anyone he feels needs it like a rabid demon, to the death. Which will in all likelihood be someone else's." Rei shook her head, laughing at the comment.

"Amazing."

"That it is." They watched as Kasumi and her husband finished their spar, vanishing the energy blades, then bowed to each other, before hugging. Turning to the four women the pair walked over, smiling.

"That was fun, dear. Thank you."

"You're welcome." Ranma inspected Ami and her friends for a moment, then looked at Nabiki, who grinned back at him. "You did pretty well, Nabs. I think we need to ramp up your training a little, though, to make up for missing it for a few days."

She groaned faintly. "Don't call me Nabs." Clapping her on the shoulder he winked at the others, who looked amused, then waved at the door.

"Come on, let's get some breakfast then work out what the next step is." Everyone headed for the living room. Entering it they found Tamiko and Misaki talking on the sofa. The two girls looked up, smiling.

"Enjoying the SIs?" Tamiko asked. Ami and the others nodded, looking very happy.

"More than I can say," the blue-haired girl said, shaking her head a little. "The thing is unbelievable. It linked into my phone, communicator and computer without any trouble at all, the computer is now just being used as a sensory package, apparently. I don't even need to take it out most of the time. Other than that, they're both redundant. I don't need a watch, or a phone, or a TV, or..." She grinned.

"It's pretty incredible," Tamiko agreed. "After a little while you wonder how you ever did without one." She looked at the others. "We need to show them all the things we've learned, all the little tricks that the manual doesn't really cover."

"We were talking about that earlier," Nabiki replied. "I think we should be able to put together a package of useful techniques and sent it to their SIs, which should help a lot. Things like the flight instrumentation, night vision, all the stuff we use a lot of the time." She turned to Ami and her friends. "A lot of these things tended to come up when we needed them. It's all listed in the manual but you don't necessarily work it out until during or after the fact. I think we can jump-start that a bit."

"We'll need to start training you all as well, fairly soon," Ranma added, sitting down and turning female half-way through the motion, making Ami and Rei stare, then exchange glances. No one else seemed to notice. "We need to deal with the time device first, of course. After breakfast I'm going to go and see L'dnr'k, to see if he's had any luck. Assuming he has, I'll contact the SI makers and start arranging the antimatter weapons. I want to push ahead with this as fast as we can, but until we can get at the thing we can't do much except prepare." He looked up as Aiko appeared with Fumiko by the balcony doors, smiling briefly at her, then looked back at the rest of them. "Do you three want to stick around today, or go back?"

They exchanged glances. "I think I should go back," Hotaru said slightly reluctantly, sitting down. "Haruka isn't right at the moment. I don't want to leave her alone."

"I'll take you back later, then," Aiko told her, sitting next to her.

"Thanks." The girl looked around at them all. "And thank you for a wonderful time. I'm sorry I caused all that trouble on the asteroid." She blushed a little, her eyes downcast. Kasumi knelt next her, smiling gently.

"It wasn't your fault, as I told you at the time. No one blames either you or Rei for what happened. In the end no one got hurt, it can't happen again, so forget it, all right, dear?" The girl nodded, smiling at the older woman.

"Thank you, Kasumi," she replied.

"It's no trouble. Now, would you like to help me with breakfast?" Hotaru nodded again, jumping to her feet and following the elder Tendo into the kitchen, everyone else watching.

"As she said, thanks, everyone," Rei added. "Although I know it was the time machine, I'm still embarrassed about what happened. Other than that, it's been amazing. Grandfather isn't going to believe it. The bits I can tell him, anyway."

Kasumi smiled at her. "Your grandfather is a good man, he'll understand there are things you can't mention. He's known about you all for years and never said anything, has he?"

"True. I still can't believe he knew all that time." Rei shook her head in wonder. "He's a cagey old guy."

"He wasn't always a priest. You should talk to him about some of the things he did when he was young," Ranma suggested, smiling mysteriously but saying nothing else. The other woman studied her, looking intrigued.

"I'll do that," she replied slowly. Nabiki watched her, then looked at Ranma, wondering what she'd learned from the old priest. The red-head winked at her, making her smile slightly. 'Rei might be in for a shock,' she thought with amusement. Getting up she went to help her sister and Hotaru in the kitchen, still smiling.
Chapter 81

Catching up on a few other people...

Entering the Cat Café, Nodoka smiled at Mousse, who for once was wearing his glasses. The young man smiled back, coming over to her. "Mrs Saotome, it's nice to see you. It's been a while. What brings you here?

"Hello, Mousse. Yes, I haven't seen you for months. I hope you're well?" The man nodded at her question. "I had business in the area and thought I would drop in on my way home for some ramen, I haven't any of Cologne's cooking for some time." She looked around the restaurant, which was nearly empty at this point in the morning, after breakfast but before lunch, smiling slightly. "Do you have a free table?" He grinned.

"Of course. Just there by the window." He led her over. "I got the invitation to Ukyo and Konatsu's wedding, by the way. Shampoo tells me you're arranging it. How is that coming along, there was no location given?" The Saotome matriarch sat gratefully on the chair he politely pulled out for her.

"Thank you, Mousse. I've been walking quite a lot today and needed a break." She sighed a little, answering his question. "It's not going quite as well as I'd hoped to be honest. The wedding planning itself is coming along well but the location is proving to be awkward. We've looked at seven different places so far but all of them had problems. One is already booked up for weddings for the next three months, another one has some sort of construction going on, that sort of thing. Ukyo didn't like two of them and Konatsu didn't like another one. Quite frustrating." She sighed gently once more, nodding her thanks as he handed her a menu. "But never fear, we'll work it out. Um, let's see... Can I have a bowl of the beef noodles, please, and a pot of tea?"

"Of course. I'll be right back." Smiling, he left her, heading for the kitchen. Nodoka pulled a notebook from her purse and flipped it open to the right page, reading her notes, then made a few changes, scratching out two things from a list and adding three more. Shaking her head with a small smile she looked up as he came back, placing a tray with the requested items on it on the table, before unloading it.

"Thank you, Mousse." He gave her some disposable chopsticks as well. Putting the notebook away she popped them apart with a practised gesture, trying some of the noodles, then nodding her satisfaction. "As lovely as ever. Cologne is a very good cook."

The young man poured her tea for her, smiling. "She's good at all sorts of things. The Elder is a remarkable woman."

"That she is. I'm glad that all the unpleasantness of past years seems to be behind us now. She and the rest of you have become good friends and neighbours, despite some early... awkwardness." He grinned at her words, picking up the tray and casually slipping it into the sleeve of his robe where it vanished without trace, making her smile.

"There were some interesting things that happened then, yes. It was... frustrating, annoying, and weirdly enjoyable in some ways." Sipping her tea she watched him for a moment as he seemed to be remembering some of those things. Eventually he shook his head once. "But that's all in the past. We're all different people now in various ways."
"Indeed. We regret our actions, I suspect, certainly I do, but you can't change the past. What's done is done. Overall, things seem to have worked out fairly well in most respects. With one or two regrettable exceptions." Nodoka sipped some more tea, her eyes distant, while Mousse nodded slowly. After a pause she looked up again. "But enough about that. What are you up to these days?" She grinned. "Still chasing Shampoo?"

Looking amused yet regretful, the young Chinese man pulled out a chair, after making a gesture to it and having her nod in return. "I am still in love with Shampoo, yes, I doubt that will ever change, but in recent months I've realised that I stand little chance ever winning her approval using the methods I've tried before. Some of them were... not well thought out." Nodoka laughed out loud at this, making him look embarrassed, yet smile.

"If even half what I heard was true I think that may be something of an understatement. Your persistence was only matched by your lack of common sense, I believe. No offence intended, of course."

The man chuckled. "None taken. You're completely right. I was young and obsessed. As obsessed as Shampoo was in her pursuit of your son, if not more so. I've only really worked that out fairly recently. It's a bit embarrassing, to be honest. Some of the things I did were very dishonourable. To Shampoo as well as others. Why it took me so long to realise this is a mystery to me."

"You were in love, and young. That's a bad combination, trust the words of your elders on this," the Saotome woman said with a deliberately grave look. He bowed his head, his lips twitching.

"You are undoubtedly correct, honoured Elder." Nodoka giggled a little, looking highly amused.

"Thank you, Mousse. But I think I'm not quite at the point of being a proper Elder yet. I need a century or two more."

Smirking, the young man shrugged slightly. "I think you'd make a good one." She coloured slightly, causing him to chuckle again.

"Smooth, Mousse, very smooth. Keep practising and you may stand a chance with Shampoo yet."

Mousse sighed, still smiling a little. "I hope so, but it's going to be difficult with her in the US."

"She'll come and visit regularly, I'm sure." Nodoka looked sympathetically at the man. "Akane is certainly planning on coming back as often as she can. That remarkable young woman Aiko seems perfectly willing to transport them back and forth for the moment, a very generous thing to do even if she finds it so easy, so I expect you'll still see her a lot. Perhaps you might even like to try your chances in the US as well. I'm sure Adrian would be interested in someone as skilled as you are. Even Shampoo thinks highly of your abilities, she's said as much in the past."

The man looked mildly surprised but pleased as well. "That's nice to hear. It could be an interesting thing to do, but I think for the time being it would be better if I left her alone. I'm already guilty of chasing her obsessively from China to here on more than one occasion. Following her to the US would only fuel her worries that I was trying the same thing again, which wouldn't impress her. And I don't want to detract from either her or Akane's career beginnings."

Smiling, Nodoka nodded her approval. "You are becoming a wiser man, Mousse. You're most likely right. Even so, I would suggest that you visit them at some point. Keep it low key, show interest in and support for what she's doing, that will produce a favourable impression."

He listened with an interested expression. "Sounds like decent advice, thank you, Mrs Saotome. I'll let them become established before I visit, though."

"Good luck." Nodoka refilled her tea from the small pot on the table. "How is Cologne getting on? I haven't seen her for a few days."

"She's upstairs at the moment," he replied, looking around as the only other customer in the restaurant at the moment finished and motioned to him. "Excuse me, I just need to deal with this." She watched, eating slowly, as he sorted out the financial transaction, opening the till and putting the money the man handed him away, before returning to her. "Sorry about that. The Elder was out late last night, I'm not sure where she went, but she looked rather worried this morning. She's been studying some of her magic texts all morning. Shampoo looked upset as well."

"How curious." Nodoka looked at him with concern. "I hope nothing serious is going on."

Shrugging, Mousse responded, "I don't know what's going on. I do know that Cologne has been researching some very unusual form of magic she has detected on and off in the area for some time, but I believe that stopped a while ago. She never did find out what it was, where it came from, or who was behind it. Then she felt something very odd from the direction if Minato the night before last, something big, she said. I think she went to investigate it last night. But I don't have any more idea than that, she hasn't told me anything." He shook his head, looking mildly offended. "She hardly ever tells me anything. However, if I had to guess, she found something that she wasn't expecting and didn't much like."

Finishing her ramen Nodoka put the chopsticks neatly across the empty bowl, then put the last of her tea into the cup. "Oh, dear. I hope it's not something dangerous. Minato seems to be a very unusual place judging by the stories I've heard, and the things I've seen on the news. Meeting those girls over the last few months has shown me there's a lot of good there, but I suppose there's also likely to be a lot of bad as well. They certainly all seem to be involved in some very strange battles from what I hear."

"I don't know, I'm afraid. Elder Cologne did say the earlier magic she was tracing wasn't apparently dangerous, so if this new thing, whatever it is, is related, hopefully it's not hazardous either. But she certainly seems to be a little... disconcerted, at least, by whatever she found." The tray reappeared from his sleeve and he put everything but her cup on it. When she finished the last of the tea she put the cup on the tray as well. "Shampoo left quite early, I think she was going to see Akane for some more training before work, they often do that. She was looking... I don't know, scared is too strong a word, but worried doesn't quite cover it. It was a bit strange."

"Odd." The elder Saotome woman puzzled over it for a moment. "I expect she'll tell Akane, who will probably tell me." Standing she picked up her purse and removed a few notes. "Thank you for the meal, Mousse, and the chat. It's been very nice talking to you."

"And you, Mrs Saotome," he replied politely, also standing, accepting the payment. "Please stop by more often."

"I may well do that." She smiled at him. "Keep the change, good luck with Shampoo, and I'll see you another time. Please give my best wishes to the Elder as well, ask her to stop by for tea when she has the time."

"I'll let her know." The young man nodded to the older woman, then watched as she left, before turning to help the next customer who entered as she left.

"She said what?" Akane whispered in horrified shock. Shampoo nodded glumly, glancing at her, before going back to looking at the skyline. Both girls were sitting on the roof of the Dojo, having finished a spar during which Akane had fairly easily trounced the Amazon, whose mind was clearly and atypically not on the match.

"Apparently she is 'watching my career with interest' according to Great-grandmother. The implication is that she's watching you as well. Her and whoever the hell she works for." Shampoo shivered while Akane looked somewhat ill. "I'm not at all sure I wanted to know that."

"Talk about pressure to get it right," the Tendo woman mumbled, flopping back onto the roof and watching the clouds go by. When she saw one that suddenly reminded her of Ms Aoyama in profile, she closed her eyes hurriedly, trying to forget it. "How on earth did the Elder bump into... her... anyway?"

"She went to Minato last night to investigate whatever it was she found, I think. She won't talk about it but I have a feeling she found more than she was expecting. I guess she was more worried about that weird magic surge or whatever it was than she let on the other day." Shampoo sighed, lying next to her friend. "She looked scared, to be honest. I can't remember the last time I saw her look like that."

"It takes a lot to scare Cologne," Akane admitted in a low voice. "But meeting Ms Aoyama would do it, I think."

Both young women fell silent for a while. "What do we do?" Shampoo finally asked.

"Stay out of trouble and do the best we can," her friend replied, looking at her for a moment. "Which is more or less what we intended to do anyway. We just have to remember that there are worse things than disappointing our friends and family..." Both of them shuddered, going back to looking at the clouds.

Closing one of the folders his old friend in Nerima had copied and sent him a while ago, Sergeant Harada leaned back in his chair and pondered what he'd found out. 'Elder Ku Lon, aka Cologne, three hundred year old Chinese Amazon martial artist and mage. I thought I recognised her. I wonder what she's doing poking around in Minato? We're a little out of her normal area. She looked... concerned and somewhat intrigued. Is that a good thing? Or not...?' He puzzled over it for a while, looking up as one of his colleagues held up a cup of coffee with a quizzical expression on the other side of the room. Nodding, he smiled, accepting the cup the man brought over, then going back to the folder, reading a couple of entries with raised eyebrows while sipping the coffee.

'Definitely worth keeping an eye on. I wonder if I should mention it to Yori? Assuming she doesn't already know, which is entirely possible.' He smirked to himself for a moment. 'Not much goes on around here that those two don't know about.' Turning to his computer he thought for a moment, then wrote a quick and carefully worded email to Norio, hitting 'send' after he was sure it said exactly what he intended and nothing else. 'Kind of odd, though. Akane Tendo turning up here out of the blue, with all the fuss that entailed, along with Shampoo, also an Amazon. Nabiki Tendo, I've seen here around here several times, she seems to recognise me as well, which is a bit weird since we've never spoken. Although from what Norio said she could well have dossiers on every cop in the station.' He grinned, remembering the odd respect with which his friend had spoken of the middle Tendo woman. Respect mixed with just the tiniest bit of fear.

'Not someone you want to cross, he said. Judging by these records, that's good advice. Not a magical girl but dangerous enough in her own way.' Harada finished his coffee, dropping the disposable cup into the bin under his desk. 'And now Cologne, poking around in the park and doing some sort of magic, if what I saw was right. It sort of had that feel to it.' He, like a lot of the cops in Minato and especially this area, was more aware of magic than most people, even if he knew very little about it he knew it when he saw it. Interestingly enough, all people with some connection to one Ranma Saotome, and the missing elder Tendo sister, Kasumi. I wonder why they all seem to be turning up around here recently?"

Thinking it over for a while, he eventually locked the folders away again, standing up and heading out for his morning rounds. 'I'm beginning to think it might be a good idea to ask Yori about it. Very politely, of course, I certainly don't want to upset her, aside from anything else she's a friend, but there are a lot of weird interactions going on in Minato over the last few months. I'm getting a little curious...'

The sergeant left the station, still pondering his next move.

Rei watched the other people in the room with her, privately amazed that they all looked so normal. She was still digesting all the revelations from the previous day. The interworld travel, the alien spacecraft, walking around on the moon, all the extraordinary things she's done and seen in the last five days, were amazing enough, but she'd been quite serious about how what she'd experienced yesterday had been far more shocking. Seeing a woman she'd known about for some years, even if she didn't actually know her, turn into a completely different one was startling, certainly, but not completely out of the range of the possible. Some of the magical girls she knew did something vaguely similar although nowhere near as complete or as quickly.

But to find out that woman in turn became a man, and in fact started out as one, was... very damn shocking. She didn't know why it was so weird to her, but she knew it was. She also understood why Ranma had wanted to keep the number of people who knew about it to a minimum, leaving aside the issues of his earlier life, which sounded horrible from many different viewpoints. Studying him, she felt a wave of sympathy go through her once more. He'd clearly had some very unpleasant things happen at far too young an age, something she thought was very wrong. His parents, mainly his father, had a lot to answer for. In all honesty she found it quite surprising he'd turned out as well adjusted as he had, although she suspected that Kasumi had been heavily involved with that.

She thought about the pair for a while. They were very obviously in love, deeply and completely, something that explained a number of things she'd noticed between 'Yori' and 'Chou' which had slightly puzzled her during previous interactions. Neither one of them was particularly demonstrative about their relationship most of the time but when she looked for it she could easily see it. 'No wonder Yori, or Ranma, acted like she did when Haruka hurt Kasumi. I'm slightly surprised Haruka is still alive.' After watching the display in the other room before breakfast, that surprise was even stronger than it would have otherwise been. It was abundantly clear that if he wanted to the martial artist could have dealt with them all single-handedly, not even needing to use any of the special effects he was so good at.

Very glad that the insanely dangerous abilities were tempered with considerable restraint and a very strong dislike for unnecessary damage or death, she shuddered slightly, thinking about what could have happened. If Usagi in her current frame of mind, for instance, had possessed such abilities, half of Tokyo would probably be missing by now. Noticing Ranma looking at her with an expression she felt meant he was probably aware of her general line of thought, she smiled slightly at him, an expression which was returned in kind, before he resumed talking to Aiko. Kasumi gave her a look as well, as did Nabiki. The two Tendo sisters seemed mildly amused.

Going back to ruminating on the previous days activities, she finished her miso soup, reaching for her chopsticks. 'I was flying yesterday! With actual wings, my wings! It's totally crazy. And I can't "wait to do it again." Rei stopped in mid motion as a strong yearning to repeat what she'd done swept over her. Beside her, Ami looked curiously at her.

"Are you all right?" The sound of her friend's voice in her head made her twitch slightly. Finishing the action she'd started, she picked up a piece of fish between her chopsticks and put it in her mouth, chewing slowly.

"I think so," she replied, a faint smile crossing her face. "Although I'm still having trouble believing all this. I'm eating and talking to you at the same time, for god's sake! Using some weird alien magitech given to us by the strangest group of people I've ever met." She glanced sideways at the other girl, who looked around then nodded, smiling.

"I know what you mean, I think. It's a bit unusual, certainly."

"Just a little." Ami sent her a video feed of herself, making her start giggling. Closing her eyes she tried using the third-person view to locate her breakfast with, succeeding more easily than she expected. "This is insane. It's going to take a lot of getting used to."

When she opened her eyes again everyone was watching her with amusement. Flushing slightly, she stared back. "What? Never seen anyone use someone else's eyes to eat with?"

Nabiki laughed. "I'd be more worried if you used someone else's mouth..." She cracked up, shaking her head.

"This has been the most surreal experience I've ever had and I've seen some weird shit while I've been in the magical girl club. But I'm very glad we ended up here, even if how we got here was unpleasant." Looking around at all the new friends she had, she smiled.

"I think we're all glad," Kasumi replied, seeming pleased. She looked at the tall woman for a moment, sipping her tea, then put her cup down.

"OK, so you turn into Chou, and a mermaid, and a flying girl. What else do you turn into? You mentioned you had various personae for different purposes but haven't shown us any of them yet." Rei raised her eyebrows when Kasumi became a completely different woman even as she spoke, a short-haired ice-blonde with hazel eyes, shorter although still fairly tall, who clearly had Northern European ancestry mixed with Japanese. The new woman smiled as she and the others stared.

"It's nice to meet you, Rei. I'm Rika Nygaard, third-year medical student. My father is Danish, my mother is Japanese." Her voice, low-pitched for a woman, had a slight foreign accent, presumably the Danish one she mentioned. Rei gaped for a moment, inspecting her closely. 'Rika' smiled back confidently. It was remarkable, even the body language changed, without knowing the truth she'd have had no idea at all it was Kasumi. As she thought about it she realised that in fact that was one of the oddest things about their changes, all the little things like intonations in speech, body language, mannerisms, a whole host of small but vital details, changed from one persona to another. Ranma in female form and Ranma in male form were clearly the same person, for example, all the details other than the obvious stayed the same, yet 'Yori' was different. She talked differently, held herself differently, moved differently, in small, subtle, but important ways. This was another example of that.

"That's amazingly impressive," Ami said wonderingly, apparently having noticed the same thing. "You'd be an incredible actor. You're a totally different person." 'Rika' grinned at her, inclining her head in acknowledgement.

"That's the point, Ami. It takes a lot of practice to change all the normally unconscious cues you give off to other people, but they make the effect much stronger. Ranma is better at it than I am, I'll admit, but I think I'm quite good now."

"You're freakishly good at it and you know it, sis," Nabiki snickered, watching with a smile. "Yes, Ranma is better, but he's just weird."

Everyone looked at the martial artist, who shimmered into a different person as well. The brunette, her hair in the same style as Yori but wearing stylish female clothes, sunglasses perched on her nose, smiled prettily at them. "Ranma? Who's he? I'm Maiko." She held out her hand across the table to Hotaru, who giggled and shook it. "I'm pleased to meet all of you."

Once again Rei saw the body language had changed. This girl sounded and acted like a girl, not like Ranma's female form, who sounded and acted like Ranma. She laughed, watching 'Maiko' go back to eating. "Unbelievable. Just unbelievable. If I hadn't seen it I'd have no clue. How many of these different personae do you have?"

The girl gestured unconcernedly, smiling a little. "Oh, a dozen or so that we used quite a lot, at least that many more we used on and off. Some have proper identification as well, if they got used enough, I know someone who's very good at producing convincing IDs. Mine are about half male, half female, Kasumi has more female than male." She sudden changed again, becoming a tiny woman with shoulder length black hair, dressed in a traditional style, who bowed slightly to them in her seat. Shyly not meeting their eyes, she said, "It's very nice to meet you, Miss Hino. I hope you have found breakfast to your liking." Rei stared in amazement.

'Rika' shimmered, becoming an elegant middle-aged woman with her hair up in a bun, a pair of chopsticks through it, wearing an incredibly elaborate and expensive silk dress. "Asami!" she snapped in a haughty upper-class voice, "do not speak out of turn. Go and find Shin, I require him to drive me to the opera."

"Yes, Miss," the young woman said, shimmering again. The enormous man sitting in her place was wearing a chauffeurs uniform and appeared disgruntled. "You rang, my lady?" he said in a very deep voice, taking off his hat and looking at it with distaste. "I'm a bodyguard, not a driver, ma'am."

Rei started giggling, exchanging glances with Ami and Hotaru. The purple-haired girl was watching wide-eyed, having jumped quite sharply when the huge man had appeared, a wide grin forming on her face, while Ami stared in amused wonder. 'Shin' glanced at her, frowning slightly. "You got a problem, girl?" She shook her head, still giggling.

"Shin! Pay attention!"

"Yes, Ma'am," he said, appearing mildly annoyed, sighing, then throwing Hotaru a quick wink. "I saw that! Go and get the car ready, and send in Mariko, my husband wishes to have a word with her." The man sighed again, seeming very put upon, then vanished, replaced with an extremely curvaceous young woman in her mid-twenties with long lilac hair past her waist, who looked around, one finger at her mouth. She smiled a little uncertainly, looking back to the imperious woman, who was replaced with a tall, very handsome blonde man in a nice suit.

"You wanted to see me, sir?" she asked in a very feminine voice that sounded playful and sexy. The man nodded.

"I did. I wanted to introduce you to my guests, you'll be taking care of them while they're here. They are prominent members of the magical girl community so be on your best behaviour." He looked sternly at her, smiling broadly as she nodded, looking around again. She had an expression of awe on her face.

"Magical girls! Eee!" The girl clapped her hands, shifting into a much younger pink-haired girl dressed for a party, who bounced up and down in her seat, looking excited. "Do you have pretty dresses and magic wands and fight horrible things from the depths of hell and then kiss your boyfriend and dance?" All this came out in one long stream of words. Staring at Rei expectantly the girl waited, smiling. Rei gaped, then looked at her friends, before all of them collapsed in laughter. Aiko and the others were grinning widely.

"Oh my god, that's absolutely amazing," Rei gasped, heaving with laughter. All the various people had worn different clothes, had different voices, accents, body language, and mannerisms, to a level she found hard to believe. It was an utterly convincing display that left her in awe.

"They can keep that up for ages when they're in the right mood," Nabiki commented, chuckling. "I still can't believe how good they are at it and how they keep all these different people straight. Between them there must be dozens."

Ranma and his wife shimmered back into their normal forms, smiling. "It's good practice. Recently we haven't has as much need for all the different personae, although in the beginning it was necessary. Maiko is the one I use for University and general contact with other people. That started due to the curse, before I had the control over it I do now, and it was easier to just keep it up. She's as real as Yori, although not a magical girl, just a medical student. A good one, though, her lecturers seem to like her." He laughed slightly. "She's a lesbian as well, in a relationship with Rika, who she loves very much."

"I use Rika for the same purpose," Kasumi added, finishing her tea. "Ranma is more convincing in the female roles than I am in the male ones, although I think I'm becoming fairly good at them now."

"You convinced me, certainly," Ami assured her. "It's quite remarkable. Changing form is one thing, as incredible as it is, but having all the other little details as well, consistently, that's more than impressive. You're better than any actor I've ever heard of."

"The illusion spell takes care of a lot of the overall body language and general movement patterns," Ranma told her, "but there's still a lot of practice needed for speech patterns, intonations, accents, that sort of thing, which are important as well. People are amazingly willing to accept what they see and hear as real which certainly helps in most cases but you still need to be careful. I think we've done a good job, no one has ever seen through it so far."

"I'm not surprised," Rei remarked, studying him. "Aside from anything else, why would they even have cause to suspect anything was going on? You're so convincing most people would never believe it." After a moment she smiled. "Although I've been meaning to ask, why keep the Yori braid even like this?" He reached back and pulled his braid around, waving it at her with a grin. Aside from not currently having Yori's signature bow on the end it was otherwise much the same.

"It's real. At first it was easier to only change as little as possible, so I grew it out. Now we've improved the spell so much I don't need it, but I kind of like it. I'm used to it."

"I like it," Hotaru put in, grinning at him. "I think it suits you." Smiling at her he looked pleased. The girl looked at Rei with an amused expression. "Your hair is nearly as long, Rei, you should braid it like that."

"Hey, I like my hair fine the way it is, thanks," she protested, giggling.
Ami looked at Nabiki. "I know you said you can't do that illusion magic like they can yet, so you use a pre-packaged spell for 'Azumi'. Do you have any others?"

The middle Tendo smiled a little oddly. "One or two. Nothing like they do, of course."

"Can we see them?" Rei asked curiously. Nabiki looked at Kasumi, who looked back.

"Sure. None of them are particularly exciting, though. You've seen the mer-form and flying ones, I've got those for both 'Azumi' and me, plus this one..." She shimmered, watching them with amusement as they stared. Her ears cocked forward, pointing Ami as the blue-haired girl made a sound of surprise. The horse-girl version of 'Azumi' stood and moved away from the table, turning around with her arms out, flipped her tail from side to side, then retook her seat. "No real reason for it aside from the fact it was something Ranma came up with during training and I kind of liked it. I spend a couple of days like this. Amazing what you get used to."

"It would be good at some sort of comic convention," Rei giggled once she got over her surprise. Nabiki laughed, twitching an ear, a grin on her 'Azumi' face.

"I thought about that. Sis isn't sure, but Ranma and I both think we could have a lot of fun at an event like that." Everyone looked at Ranma and Kasumi, the martial artist snickering and his wife looking mildly disapproving. After a few seconds she began laughing as well.

"I'll admit it could be amusing," she allowed, then looked serious. "but only when we're not trying to save all of reality." Ranma put his arm around her.

"I promise I'll save the world before I confuse people for fun, love."

"Good. You have to keep your priorities straight after all." They grinned at each other.

"Any others?" Ami asked Nabiki, who resumed her normal appearance. She nodded, looking around at her friends, who all had weird smiles.

"There is one more. I'm not too sure you want to see it, though." Ami, Rei, and Hotaru all glanced at each other.

"Oh, now we have to see it," the violet-haired girl exclaimed. "Come on, show us!"

Nabiki gazed at them all for a moment. "All right, but don't say I didn't warn you..."

Seconds later they stared at the green-haired woman in the expensive suit who was sitting where Kasumi's sister had been, inspecting them coldly through amazingly dark glasses. She looked around slowly, a wave of cold radiating from her, before lowering her sunglasses and peering with chilly interest at Ami, who flinched, wide-eyed. Hotaru had her hand over her mouth, staring in horrified surprise. When the blue cats-eyes met her own, Rei sucked in a shocked breath. There was something more disturbing about the person she was looking at than anything she'd ever seen before although she'd have been hard-pressed to say why. The woman was just wrong on some fundamental level, far below conscious thought.

"Ah. Ms Rei Hino, Ms Ami Mizuno, and Ms Hotaru Tomoe. Interesting. I have been following the exploits of your particular group with considerable interest for some time. Recent events are most regrettable. I do hope they are at an end. It would be... problematic... if we were obliged to step in and rectify the issue ourselves. My employers are disinclined to intervene directly under normal circumstances but would make an exception in this case. My personal preference would preclude such an eventuality due to the quantity of extra work it would entail dealing with the aftermath." She did something that made Rei twitch, something that was almost but not entirely completely Unlike a smile. "My apologies. I am Ms Aoyama. It is gratifying to make your acquaintance."

There was no sound around the table. Rei's eyes darted about, seeing that Ranma was smiling, Kasumi had a blank expression that she suspected concealed a certain amount of amusement, while Aiko and the other girls were watching 'Ms Aoyama' with worried interest. She refocussed on the woman when she cleared her throat politely. "Ms Hino? You appear to be mildly distressed. May I aid you in some manner to overcome this?" She found she couldn't look away, staring in horror like a bird looking at a snake.

"Oh, god, that's terrifying," Ami mumbled, causing 'Ms Aoyama' to turn her attention to the blue-haired woman. Rei slumped as the gaze left her, sweating.

"Thank you, Ms Mizuno, your statement is noted and appreciated." Ami didn't seem to find this even slightly comforting. A sound to one side made them all look, to see Hotaru staring with huge eyes, making muffled noises behind her hands. "Ms Tomoe?"

The girl dropped her hands, her mouth working, then collapsed laughing. "Oh, Nabiki, that's amazing. It's horrifying, but it's amazing. I love it." Everyone stared at her for several seconds as she giggled. 'Ms Aoyama' raised an eyebrow, replacing her dark glasses and leaning back in her chair. She studied the giggling girl for a moment, sitting completely still in a distinctly inhuman manner.

"A most unusual reaction, Ms Tomoe. I am intrigued." The emotionless face held for another few seconds, then cracked as 'Ms Aoyama' began laughing herself. Rei relaxed, surprised at how tense she'd become, when the hugely creepy aura that had filled the room vanished completely.

"Holy shit, Nabiki, that's unbelievable," she said as the middle Tendo retook her normal appearance. Nabiki grinned.

"Thanks. It's a lot of fun as well. For some reason that sort of cold emotionless persona comes easily to me, which the techniques Ranma taught me for suppressing emotions added to immensely. I guess I'm just odd."

"She's extremely good at it and getting steadily better," Ranma said proudly, smiling at his sister-in-law. "The ki signature she gives off is deliberately warped, which makes people amazingly uncomfortable even if they don't know what they're feeling, but the rest is pure Nabiki. Ms Aoyama comes in handy more often than you'd think."

Ami was still staring at the middle Tendo with her mouth open. After a moment she turned to look at Tamiko, who grinned at her. "Wait. Wait, wait, wait! All that stuff you were terrifying me with, about Ms Aoyama, all the things she knows, how she's always watching everyone, and it's been Azumi all along? I mean, Nabiki?" She was slowly going red. Tamiko laughed, nodding. "The one everyone is worried about, even the PSIA, the woman who scares entire governments rigid, it's Nabiki?" Her voice was rising.

"Yep. Sorry." Tamiko glanced at the middle sister, who was also grinning. "Had you going, though, didn't I?"

"You... She... How..." Ami spluttered to a halt, fuming. Rei watched her, trying not to laugh, catching Hotaru doing the same. "Oh, for god's sake," her friend finally said, crossing her arms and glaring at everyone. "The whole situation is crazy. How the hell did you end up terrifying the spooks, Nabiki? Your alter ego seems to have an amazingly scary reputation."

The brunette shrugged. "It just sort of happened, to be honest. It wasn't something any of us originally planned. You remember we told you about Akane and how she had a massive temper control problem?" Ami nodded, still looking annoyed. "She ended up coming to Minato to meet Yori and Chou. We were waiting for her and Ranma thought I needed some sort of disguise. I've got the concealement bracelet he gave me, we told you about that, but he said I needed a good alternate persona. He and Sis came up with Reiko Aoyama between them. Then Ryoga turned up..."

Rei listened to the story, impressed and worried at the same time. The youngest sister sounded like a handful. "So you played Ms Aoyama as some alien secret agent to terrify Ryoga into staying away?"

"Exactly. It worked amazingly well. He nearly crapped himself." Nabiki chuckled, looking like the memory was one she enjoyed. Ranma had a similar expression as did the others. "I turned it down a lot for Akane and Shampoo, but it seems to have left an impression there as well even so. Neither one of them is at all keen on meeting Ms Aoyama again. I had to pull her out once more for them, which worked wonders on their behaviour. It sort of snowballed from that first time. I've been refining the character ever since."

"We came up with some good props as well," Kasumi giggled. "The folder of doom is a nice one." Nabiki produced a thick folder with writing on it they recognised as the trade language, holding it up with a smile.

"It genuinely does have interesting information in it, things I've found out about various people we've dealt with. Jun helped me create some very official if not at all human documentation, printed in Trade. It's pretty convincing." She opened the folder, pulling out a sheet of paper and handing it to Ami. Rei leaned over to look at it. There was a full colour picture of her friend in it, along with accompanying text and a couple of graphs, none of which she could read, laid out in a nicely presented manner. "Mainly unimportant details, things that aren't secret, but might not be expected to be known," the middle sister smiled. "Just in case someone who knows Trade sees it. I've found pulling this out and looking through it seems to make people very nervous. So does taking notes. I don't need to, of course, Jun is recording everything, but it's an effective tactic and adds to the effect."

"And this mysterious otherworldly agency Ms Aoyama works for...?" Rei asked.

"Is entirely non-existent," Nabiki grinned. "Shhh." Rei burst out laughing. Ami was still staring at the page she was holding, a weird expression on her face.

"I was right. You are all insane," she finally said, handing it back with a sudden smile. "God, you had me worried, Tamiko. Thanks a lot."

"You're entirely welcome," the auburn-haired woman said, chuckling. "Ms Aoyama is the creepiest person I've ever come across in my life, even knowing who she really is, but she's extremely useful. I just prefer to not have her around very often." A wave of cold swept across the table as the woman in question made a reappearance, carefully putting the page back into the folder then making it go away.

"Your reticence is understandable, Ms Tamiko, although I am not entirely sure it is appropriate. I assure you I go out of my way to present a welcoming appearance while working." She made the horrible little smile-equivalent once more. Rei shuddered. Hotaru started giggling again, making them look at her. The girl gestured apologetically, taking on a more serious expression. "Ms Aoyama' inspected her carefully. "I find you worthy of further study, Ms Tomoe. We must talk at length when I have an available period of time to investigate your atypical attitude." Shimmering back into the Tendo sister, she grinned at the younger girl, who laughed again.
"You see? It's Nabiki, someone like a sister to me, but when she's like that, I just want to run."
Tamiko looked amused.

"That tends to be the common reaction," Kasumi commented, watching her sister with pride. "It's an impressive talent."

Once they'd finished breakfast, everyone helped clear things away, before they all sat down around the living room. "So, next step, then." Ranma inspected the three girls. "When we have the current emergency dealt with, we can start training you guys properly. There's a lot to do, although since you're already experienced magical girls a lot of it should be much easier than it would otherwise be. You all have respectfully high ki levels, for instance, although none of you are really using it, except for a certain boost in strength and speed, which we can improve a lot pretty quickly. I think you'll get creating energy balls in a fairly short time, the ki pocket technique will take longer because it's a very delicate process, but you'll definitely learn it. Things like the Soul of Ice should be easy."

He turned to Hotaru. "I'll work out the best way to train you in healing, as well. It'll take a little thought, I'd like to try getting your own native abilities up to a decent level before I confuse the issue teaching you our method." The girl nodded, looking excited. "Until we try some serious tests I'm not sure how much if any ability you'll have with our magic system. None of you seem to have any odd reactions to seeing our magic in operation, though, so I'm hopeful."

Looking thoughtful, Kasumi asked, "How much experience do any of you actually have with magic in general? Not just the use of your own artefacts and abilities, but external magic."

Ami glanced at Rei and Hotaru. "I don't have much, I'll admit. I can see it in operation, or feel it, whatever you'd call it, although I have to say I don't know very much about what I'm seeing."

"I know a few simple scrying spells that Grandfather taught me," Rei added, "fire meditations, a few rituals that are supposed to keep malign influences away, if that counts. Nothing anywhere near what you can do, or a trained mage, even a low level one." Kasumi nodded, glancing at Hotaru.

"And you?"

"More or less the same as Ami. I've been trying to make sense of what I've seen you and Ranma do but it's so amazingly complicated I can't work any of it out at all."

"Good. You're much further advanced than most people, then, but not to the stage that seems to have problems with our system." The elder Tendo looked pleased. "That will help a lot. Does it cause you any discomfort when you look at it?" They all shook their heads. "Even better. That seems to be the indicator of someone who definitely can't learn our method of magic." She looked at her husband, who smiled back.

"Very promising indeed. OK, so we'll start training you on both ki manipulation and magic as soon as possible. Once we have some of the basics in place, so you can practice on your own, we can start on the martial arts. That's more time consuming, I think I can improve your fighting abilities a lot pretty quickly since you're already both strong and fast, but it will still take a lot of time and work to get to a respectable level."

"Bear in mind that what he considers a respectable level most people think is impossible," Aiko commented, grinning. Ranma laughed.

"Hey, I have high standards. And I'm certain they can do it." He studied the three some more, scratching his ear. "Ami, you and Rei both know how to access your own magic directly. Do you, Hotaru?" The girl nodded.

"Ami showed me the day after you told them how to do it."

"All right. Good. I had an idea last night I'd like to try, but it relies on that. You know the bracelets that Aiko and the others use?" All three girls nodded. Aiko had explained them the day before on the island, demonstrating their usage. They could now remember the faces and details of the other girls. "Your own disguise spell is pretty good, but it's not as complete as theirs is. People can photograph you, remember what you look like, what you were wearing, all that sort of thing, but the spell stops them associating any of that with your 'civilian' identity. The bracelet magic goes further, it prevents photography, or any memory of details aside from a recognition of names. I think I can use the spell you already have and copy the bracelet spell over the top of it, give you an upgrade, so to speak. That might come in handy. Kas and I use a rather more effective version of the same sort of spell, based on it, in fact, but that will require some training before you can use it." Rei glanced at her friends, thinking about his words. Ami was looking thoughtful.

"That could certainly be useful. I wish something could be done about the clothing spell. I don't want to be associated with that uniform any more, not after what happened, and what it represents."

"A big lie," Hotaru muttered, scowling at the floor. Everyone watched her sympathetically.

"A big lie," Ami agreed. "but it would be nice to have suitable clothing for jumping around rooftops with. Not that the uniform could really be called suitable clothing, for almost anything." She smiled in an annoyed but resigned fashion.

"Oh, that part should be easy," Kasumi said happily. Ami, Rei, and Hotaru looked at her with differing expressions on the theme of surprise. "Do you mind if I look?"

"Um, all right," the blue-haired woman said hesitantly. "What do I have to do?"

"Nothing yet, just stand up and hold still." Ami followed instructions. Standing in front of her Kasumi moved her hands around a few inches away from her body, concentrating on something, in a very similar manner to what 'Yori' had done when she'd taught Rei to activate the magic one part at a time. Her gently glowing fingers blurred oddly as they moved. "Aha, there it is. Yes, I see. You were right, dear, it's not at all efficient. There does seem to be a lot of unnecessary extra parts to it. We really should look into optimising it at some point." She glanced at Ranma who nodded, seeming amused. "Let's see... there we go, that's the pattern for the clothing spell, this part stores the existing clothing so it can be put back after. Interesting." Dropping her hand she stepped back a pace.

"Yes, I was right, it's fairly straightforward. The magic is laid out in a modular and obvious fashion. Replacing the clothing pattern with something else is quite simple. Do you have anything in mind?"

All three young women exchanged looks. "Well, I'd like something that perhaps didn't expose quite so much skin," Ami said.

"But it has to look nice," Hotaru added. "Those silly uniforms are too..." She thought for a moment, then made a small gesture of annoyance. "Too girly." Laughing at their expressions of amusement, she went on, "I liked the colours but they're a bit like some man designed them for other men to look at, you know? Or an older woman who thought all younger women wanted to dress like that."

Kasumi smiled, while Aiko snickered. "Ours were worse. Much worse. Yours just look like a rather over the top version of a school uniform, which is weird, but not exactly pornographic. Our were just horrible."

"They flattered my legs," Tamiko said with a slight sigh, before laughing when her team-mates all favoured her with a mutual glare. "Hey," she added, grinning, "If you've got it...

Hotaru giggled, watching them. "I could never wear something like that in public."

"It is a bit much," Kasumi said with an amused smile. "OK, so we could keep the colour scheme, that's fine. Something stylish, but less excessive. All right, that's not too hard. Anything else?"

Rei thought about it. "I like the clothes that you guys wear, the boots are practical and it looks nice, but if everyone wears the same thing it's going to look like we're building an army or something. Can we do something a little like yours but different?" Kasumi nodded at the same time as a 3D image of a generic female figure appeared near the balcony doors, slowly rotating, dressed in the clothing she wore as Chou. Everyone looked at it with interest.

"Let's try this," the elder sister said, motioning to Hotaru. "Stand up, dear, and let me see your current uniform again for reference." The girl hopped to her feet and activated her magic, a short burst of light revealing her appearing somewhat older and dressed in the clothing she'd used as a magical girl for years. She materialised her pole-arm as well, standing with it in one hand at parade rest, a serious expression on her face. Ranma studied her, grinning.

"Very nice," he complimented her, provoking a short smile. "Quite intimidating, actually. Like a cheerleader for Death." This made her giggle, looking down at herself.

"It's too frilly and complicated," she told him, adjusting the bow in the middle of her chest slightly. "All these ruffles and decorations."

"I kind of like it," Rei declared, "but I'm also more than ready for a change."

"All right, let's see," Kasumi mused out loud, inspecting Hotaru closely. "Could you turn around please, Hotaru?" The girl slowly pivoted, until she was back facing them. "Good. Now, how about..." She looked over at the projected mannequin, thinking. After a few seconds the clothing changed to incorporate the colours Hotaru's uniform bore, becoming a dark violet with white highlights on the sleeves, and a black stripe replacing the green one on the Chou version. The underlying figure took on the same proportions and height as Hotaru herself. Another glance at the girl and she made some more changes, the cut of the cloth altering to make it slightly more form-fitting, the sleeves shortening a little, while the boots developed a taller heel by a couple of centimetres. Hotaru watched, smiling.

"That's nice, Kasumi. Can you make the gloves have fingers and be dark purple and a bit longer?"

"Of course." The changes happened as she spoke.

"The combination of the SI and the projector is a very useful design tool," Ami commented, watching with interest.

"Isn't it?" Kasumi grinned. "It makes things like this a lot of fun to do as well. All right, how's that, dear?"

"It's nice," Hotaru smiled, walking over to inspect the projection more closely. "Should I keep the tiara? Or any of the other jewellery?"

"I'd advise against the earrings," Misaki put in, "They're just something to get caught in a fight. The tiara is quite nice, though." Hotaru looked at her for a moment then nodded.

"OK. Let's get rid of the choker as well, and the brooch."

"If you're all right with this, I can work out the changes and modify your clothing spell," Kasumi said, inspecting the image, which changed to incorporate the girl's requests. Hotaru nodded again, looking pleased.

"It's great, thanks, Kasumi."

"We can always change it again if you want. In fact, I should be able to..." The older woman's voice trailed off as she thought, then nodded. "Yes, it should be possible to add this as the default clothing change, but keep the original one as an alternative. That way if you need it, it's there."

"That sounds fine. What do I do now?" The purple-haired girl watched Kasumi.

"Turn that off and come here, sit next to me," Kasumi replied, motioning to the sofa where she had sat down. Following instructions she deactivated her magic and sat. The elder Tendo carefully felt around for the relevant energy node for a moment, then nodded in satisfaction. Ranma came over and watched closely, while Rei and the others tried to follow the complex patterning she was weaving. After a couple of minutes Kasumi smiled. "There we go, that should do it. I've encoded the new clothing pattern as a separate copy of the spell and linked it in as the default. You see here?" Rei watched Hotaru concentrate then nod slowly. "That's the original one, you flip this part then activate it as normal, that will give you the original uniform. If you leave it alone, you'll get the new one."

"Thank you so much, Kasumi," Hotaru grinned.

"Stand up and try it," Ami suggested. Bouncing to her feet Hotaru did just that, smiling happily as she took in the new clothing that resulted.

"Fantastic!" she exclaimed, looking down at herself.

"Not bad," Rei laughed, seeing her younger friend looking very happy. "I'm perfectly content to have the same style."

"So am I," Ami added. "Still a team, but a different one, and also associated with the great and terrifying Yori and friends." Ranma laughed, looking at the purple-haired girl, then turning to Ami with a smile.

"You don't have to be associated with us, you know."

"I know, but I'm happy to be, after all you've all done for us. I don't know what we're going to do in the longer term but as you said, we're magical girls and always will be, so for now we may as well look it." She glanced at Rei who nodded.

"What she said."

"Fair enough. Welcome to the world of crazy." He looked amused. Ami laughed, as did Rei and Hotaru.

"Oh, I think we've been living in that world for a long time..."
Rei was admiring her own version, which was red and blue where Hotaru's was purple and black. Ami, of course, had shades of blue, which she seemed pleased with. "Still keeping the colour-coded effect going," she noted, amused. The other woman looked at her, grinning, then nodded.

"Of course. One needs a theme." Laughing, they both turned to watch Ranma, who was working on Hotaru again, doing some very complex and delicate alterations to her disguise magic. Eventually he sat back looking satisfied.

"That should do it. Can you activate it, please, so I can check?" The girl smiled, flipping the internal switch that produced the effect. He examined the spell, then nodded, pleased. "It works perfectly. That should help you. Remember to turn it on whenever you're out in your powered up state. You can use it at other times if you don't want anyone to remember you, but bear in mind it only affects people who aren't present when you turn it on, OK?" She smiled again.

"Thank you, Ranma," she said quietly, with a nod. He patted her on the head with a grin, causing her to run her hands through her hair and straighten it, which made everyone laugh.

"No problem. OK, Rei, you next." Shortly he'd modified all their spells. "I think that should be useful. Right, a few more things then we've done all we can for the moment. You need to know how to access the wards, which will let you come and go without any trouble. You can also put power in, or pull it back out, should there be a reason to do so." He and Kasumi spent the next twenty minutes going through the same exercises that they'd done with Nabiki and the others when they'd been added to the ward system. All three of them got it quickly, Ami first, which didn't surprise her.

"Wow," the blue-haired young woman said, when she managed to get her request accepted on the second try. She was examining something that couldn't be seen with the naked eye, looking both impressed and appalled. "The level of power there is... absolutely horrifying."

"It has certainly grown somewhat larger than we originally intended," Kasumi agreed calmly, seeming rather amused at the expression on the other woman's face. "Adding Nabiki and the others produced an enormous increase in complexity and power, which has happened again with you three. It's very interesting."

"It's kind of scary," Rei commented, also inspecting the wards. "I hate to think what this thing could do if you made it angry."

"At the moment, outside the building, not all that much," Ranma told her. He frowned slightly, glancing at Kasumi. "We really do have to look into fixing that at some point, love, I'm not happy about it being unavailable."

"We had no choice, dear, you know that. If it had fired on a threat to Nabiki or the others we could have lost a substantial amount of Tokyo, which is hardly responsible," his wife responded, smiling at him. Rei looked at Ami, both of them pale. Kasumi noticed, adding, "With this extra capacity the damage would be significantly larger. Tokyo might go away entirely."

"Oh, my god," Rei breathed, looking worried.

The elder Tendo reassured her. "It can't happen now, Rei, we disabled that part completely. The system has limited effects now externally although it still has full defences to any internal threat that might occur. It's very unlikely that anything could get through the wards in any case, I can't think of any way to do that, but if it did, it wouldn't last very long. This is a very safe building."
"Safe being a relative term," Tamiko interjected, looking amused. "Safe for us, certainly. Not so much for someone who shouldn't be here." Kasumi looked at her, then smiled again.

"Very true."

Finally tiring of flipping her new and improved uniform on and off, Hotaru sat down again, looking around at them all, grinning happily. "This has been so much fun."

"Damn right," Rei agreed, looking very satisfied. She looked curiously at Nabiki. "How are you managing to balance all this, all the magical girl things, with going to University?"

"It's been a little difficult once or twice, but most of the really weird stuff has been over the summer holidays, so it's not too bad. The portal bomb stuff was pretty difficult, though." The middle sister thought back over the last few months, shaking her head. "I still have nightmares about Halleckton."

"I think we all do, Nabiki," Aiko said, looking sad and thoughtful. "It was horrible."

"Can you tell us more about it?" Ami asked, glancing at Rei, then Ranma. "I got a version of the story a while ago but I think there must be more to it."

"There is," Ranma sighed. "Quite a lot." After thinking for a moment, he began the entire story from the beginning of the portal bomb plot, covering some of the things they'd been told the day before but going much further this time. The others took turns telling their parts as well. Hotaru looked ill after a while, but kept listening. They all showed some of their recordings as well, although Ranma looked at Hotaru for a long moment, before telling her that he felt it was best not to show her the things he showed Ami and Rei. Somewhat to everyone's surprise, Hotaru studied his face for a few seconds then agreed. He looked apologetic but relieved. When they finally finished, the three girls were quite for some time.

"That's horrible," Rei finally said.

"The worst thing I've ever seen," Fumiko agreed in a low voice, sharing a glance with her sister, who nodded, putting her half-eaten apple down and staring at it for a few seconds. "I don't want to go through that again if we can help it. The smell of blood still turns my stomach after that. There was so much of it..."

Nabiki shivered, remembering the town-wide slaughterhouse they'd discovered. "Even the soldiers were badly shocked by it. Second Lieutenant Kent said it was the worst thing he'd ever seen as well. Corporal O'Rourke looked like he wanted to throw up at one point, which I can understand, I felt the same way."

"We met some very nice people as well, during all that," Kasumi commented after a silence. "And we managed to stop the terrorists and save a lot more people. So all in all it worked out as well as it was going to."

"And you're really going to get awards from the Canadians for it?" Rei asked curiously. Ranma nodded.

"Apparently. We're still waiting to hear more about the whole thing. They're going to want us back again at some point, I know that, but we haven't been told when. It's a very complicated legal case, it could go on for years. The more the authorities look into it the more things they find. An awful lot of people's dirty washing is coming to light all over the world. We accidentally uncovered possibly the largest financial scandal ever."
"I'm sure there have been attempts to cover some of it up," Misaki mused, "you hear about all sorts of things like that which just... disappear... after a while, but this is much too big and public for that to work. A lot of people all over the planet are going to go to jail in the end."

Kasumi got up, coming back a little while later with some tea for everyone. "Hotaru should probably be going back soon, dear," she said, handing out cups to everyone. "Haruka seems fairly calm but I think she's probably worried about her."

"I'll take her back in a minute," Aiko put in, accepting her tea with a smile of thanks. "Ranma, are you going to come and show her the evidence from the moon? I somehow don't think she'll accept it from Ami." The brunette smiled apologetically at the blue-haired woman, who shrugged sadly.

"You're probably right, Aiko. She's not at all pleased with me at the moment."

"I'll come," Ranma said, sipping his tea and watching Ami. "What about you and Rei? I need to go and check on Lldnr'k's progress later on. You can come if you'd like." He glanced at Nabiki. "I guess you'd like to come as well?"

She nodded. "Yes, I like him and I'm curious to see more of his world."

"Fair enough."

"I'd like to come as well," Ami replied, looking at Rei.

The black-haired young woman thought for a moment. "I think I'd also like to see Lldnr'k again, but I should also get home quite soon. I don't want grandfather getting worried, we're already three days overdue."

"I got a message to him when we knew we would take longer than we initially thought," Kasumi assured her, "so he should be fine."

"It shouldn't take more than an hour or so with Lldnr'k, in any case," Ranma added.

"OK, in that case, yes please."

"Fine." The martial artist stood, finishing his tea and putting the cup down, before retaking the 'Yori' form. "Let's get Hotaru back, explain things to Haruka, then we can go and see him." She looked at Aiko who nodded, also standing. Hotaru jumped up and went to get her bag, coming back a few minutes later. She hugged all of them one after another.

"Thanks for everything, all of you. It's been a lot of fun, even with the... things that went a bit wrong," she said, smiling, before moving to stand beside 'Yori'.

"We'll see each other again soon," Nabiki assured her, grinning. She was becoming very fond of the girl, who while definitely more mature for her age than one might expect, was also a lot of fun to be around, the way she was so excited by things. Hotaru grinned back.

"I want to go flying again as soon as possible," she replied.

"We'll have to take you to meet some of our friends on Fwetna," the middle sister said, glancing at Kasumi, who nodded, smiling gently.

"Of course. As soon as we sort out this current problem, we can do all sorts of things. I'm looking forward to it. You can com any of us whenever you want to talk, as well, dear."
"I'd like that, Kasumi."

"We'll be back soon, love." 'Yori' smiled at her wife before all three girls vanished.

"I hope Haruka listens," Ami said after a moment. "She wasn't at all convinced at the temple."

"We've got some pretty serious evidence," Fumiko told her, shrugging. "If that doesn't do it nothing will. At least she seems to be behaving herself now. She even met Makoto last night and just talked." The tall girl frowned slightly. "I think we need to talk to Makoto, though, she's getting a bit carried away with her mugger-bashing." She sent them all a recording from the drone that had been shadowing the blonde.

"Oh, my, that's not at all safe," Kasumi mumbled, looking concerned. "She could kill someone very easily doing that. Where is she now?"

"About six kilometres away wandering around on the roof of the big car-park by the Metro station," Misaki reported after a moment. "Do you want to go and have a chat with her?"

"I think we should," Kasumi shimmered into 'Chou.' "We'll be back soon," she told the others, before she, Misaki, and Fumiko headed for the practice room and the roof. Nabiki watched them go then turned to the three people left in the room.

"Well, we seem to have some time to kill. Want to see some funny recordings?" Ami and Rei both nodded, while Tamiko grinned, going to make some more tea. Leaning back, the middle sister sorted through some of her exploits, simultaneously enabling the projector with a thought. Soon they were laughing hysterically at the expression on the face of the armed robber in an Australian wine shop.
Chapter 82

I ain't dead!

For anyone who hasn't noticed, I had to take a short break while I worked out the next part. To fill in, I produced a quick little story entitled 'The Fugitives', which covers approximately the first six months of the great escape from Furinkan by Ranma and Kasumi. It can be found on my story page.

My apologies for the extended delay in updating. Real life, work, family, and the holidays all conspired to keep me very busy for the last month. On the upside I did manage to work out the outlines of a number of future developments in some detail, as well as writing a few pages of one or two chapters some way down the line. Now all I have to do is work out how to get there from here...

Now, back to the regularly scheduled program. This chapter is brought to you by the colour mauve and the smell of ozone.

Happy 2015!

---

Haruka looked up from the TV when she heard the door open. A smile, rare nowadays, spread across her face as her adoptive daughter entered looking extremely pleased, fading quite a bit when Yori and Aiko followed her into the room. "What are they doing here?" she sighed, trying to be polite. Looking at the woman with the blue streak in her midnight-black hair brought a tiny thrill of horror to her, even though she seemed friendly and harmless. Haruka well remembered the look in her eyes on their last encounter, which had hammered home the realisation that whatever Yori was, 'harmless' was very close to the least accurate description one could imagine. 'Unbelievably dangerous to the point of impossibility would be closer to the truth,' she thought to herself.

Briefly Yori had a look in her eyes that made it very clear she was quite aware of Haruka's thoughts and if anything found it somewhat amusing, which on its own was fairly sobering. When she blinked and looked again, though, the woman was merely smiling slightly at her, small fangs just visible. "We brought Hotaru home, and also thought it would be nice to have a little talk. You know, about what we went to look for on our trip."

Sighing again Haruka turned the TV off with the remote, turning her chair around and looking at the others. Hotaru seemed very happy, something she was pleased about, although she didn't share the feeling. She felt massively powerful wards go up around the room, a form of magic she recognised although she had no hope of following it. The most worrying thing was that Yori didn't seem to exert herself at all, not showing any sign she could see that she'd even done anything. The way she and Chou worked the most extraordinary magic apparently with a mere act of will was one of the weirdest things about them.

Aiko glanced at her friend, then went and leaned on the windowsill, her arms crossed, watching with interest. Hotaru looked at her, then Yori, before returning her attention to her foster-parent. "It was wonderful," she exclaimed, grinning. "We met so many interesting people. Agent Naito from the PSIA is a nice man, and S'th'kx and his crew were fun. I wish you'd come, you'd have enjoyed it. You wouldn't believe how much fun bouncing around on the moon is."

"You really went there?" Haruka asked, a little surprised. The girl nodded rapidly.
"Yes. It was amazing. We went to this world called K'nn Four, it's absolutely crazy, so many people running around all over the place. The species that lives there is called the Krennsh. There was a huge spaceport with hundreds of ships on it, coming and going all the time. S'th'kx's one wasn't very large compared to a lot of them but it wasn't small either. Maybe about fifty metres or so across. We went into space quite a long way then Yori and Chou made a portal that went around the back of the moon, which we went through. After S'th'kx launched a lot of probes to survey it we went down and walked around for quite a while." Haruka couldn't help but smile at the girl's obvious excitement, she was nearly babbling. She noticed that both Aiko and Yori were looking at her daughter fondly. They'd clearly enjoyed her company.

"Look, I brought you a present," Hotaru went on, grabbing her bag and rummaging through it for a moment, coming up with a fist-sized piece of pale grey rock that looked a little like pumice. She handed it to Haruka, who looked at it for a long moment before taking it gingerly, inspecting it closely.

"This really came from the Moon?" she asked, wonder in her voice. It almost seemed impossible. "It looks normal enough."

"It's a real Moon rock, I picked it up when we landed," Hotaru confirmed, smiling. "From somewhere called... um, Mare Frigoris, I think, wasn't it?" Yori nodded, looking amused.

"That's it. A small crater somewhere near the north edge. It's on the upper right section of the Moon as seen from Earth," she added, looking at Haruka. "That's the first place we set down when we were looking around. We went and looked at the Apollo sites afterwards, and a few of the Russian probes."

Still somewhat disbelieving, the blonde weighed the rock in her hand a few times, rubbing her thumb over it, before carefully putting it on the table beside the bed. "Thank you, dear. It was nice of you to bring it home for me." Looking at Yori, she added politely, "Thank you for taking her and bringing her back safely."

"You're welcome. It was nice having her along, and fun as well." The other woman grinned. After a second or two she looked more serious. "You know why we went, of course."

"I know what you said was the reason for going, yes." Haruka looked at the rock again, then turned back to the other woman. "You're still maintaining that our entire reason for existing is some sort of computer game, basically?"

"It's a bit more complex than that," Yori sighed, motioning to a chair. Haruka nodded. The woman sat, looking at Aiko for a moment and apparently having a short wordless conversation with her. Aiko shrugged without saying anything. "We told you at the temple what we and our experts thought was the truth. About how you and your friends have been manipulated for years, in fact probably from before you were born, to make something happen in the future which the time device wants to happen. Something that simply can't happen, although that hasn't stopped it trying."

Haruka nodded, not saying anything, but feeling once more that the whole thing seemed very unlikely. She couldn't get her argument with Ami out of her mind, though. Was it more crazy than what they'd all thought was the truth? Yori looked sympathetic, undoubtedly guessing what was going through her mind.

"We arranged to have the entire surface of the Moon scanned to a very high resolution and considerable depth using technology a couple of centuries more advanced than anything we have here. S'th'kx is a very good and experienced asteroid miner with a hell of a lot of knowledge about this sort of thing. It took a couple of days but we ended up with an enormously detailed map of the Moon, its minerals, topography, you name it. The sort of thing NASA or JAXA would sell their grandmothers to get.” Haruka smiled briefly at the words, finding it mildly amusing. Yori produced a small device, putting it on the table beside her, then adding a small crystal cube to the top of it. "This is a very advanced projector system from K'nn Four, loaded with the data we got. Watch."

Twitching with a hiss of surprise when with no warning there was a half-meter diameter, totally realistic model of the moon floating in the middle of the room, slowly rotating, Haruka stared. Hotaru giggled at her shock. 'Shit, how did she do that?' she thought in wonder. The blonde couldn't feel any magic coming from the manifestation. After a long moment she stood, moving to look at the image more closely. It appeared completely solid yet when she experimentally moved her hand through it she felt nothing at all. The image reacted to her touch even so, spinning faster. Wonderingly she fiddled with it, finding she could speed it up, slow it down, or even make it spin in the other direction, just by flicking her fingers on the immaterial surface. After a few seconds of playing with it she turned to Yori, who was watching with a grin.

"Good, isn't it?" the other woman asked.

"It's pretty impressive, yes," Haruka admitted. "What else does it do?"

"You can zoom in, pan it around, show other things like overlays for specific minerals, all sorts of things. Here, look at this." Yori made a few quick gestures, the image zooming to show a row of footprints leading from a rather dust-covered machine that Haruka recognised with surprise. "The descent stage of Apollo Seventeen."

"Wow. OK, I'm impressed. So, what does this have to do with your story?"

With a slight sigh, Yori made the projection resume its original size, then did something that caused it to dim slightly, bright points in various colours appearing scattered over its surface. "These are all the sites that the probes located anything consistent with technology or magic. Every single one dates from the late fifties at the absolute oldest. They're all the remains of probes or manned missions." Haruka inspected the projection in silence for a while. "There's absolutely no evidence at all that any part of this 'Moon Kingdom' story is true, unless you think they cleaned the entire place up so well nothing is left. No energy sources, no magic, no technology, nothing. It doesn't, and never did, exist."

A silence fell over the room as everyone watched the projected lunar image slowly rotate. Eventually, feeling cold, Haruka tried, "Perhaps it's shielded? The Moon Kingdom had amazing technology and magic..."

Yori was shaking her head sympathetically. "No, I'm afraid not. We know the level of technology the time device can bring to bear, the tech on K'nn Four is quite a lot better in almost every respect. Their instruments would see any shielded parts easily enough. They could even detect magic of that sort, the type you guys use. Sorry, there's nothing there. We checked very thoroughly."

Another pause came and went. "Shit." Haruka shook her head. It seemed impossible to come up with a counter-argument in the face of this sort of evidence, although she did her best. Eventually she realised she was just producing more and more ridiculous and unlikely scenarios. Sighing, she stared at the slowly spinning Moon. "No way you could be mistaken?"

"No. Afraid not." Yori didn't look particularly pleased, watching her.

After a long pause, she finally said, "So you were right. Our entire lives have been a lie."
"That's one way to look at it, certainly. I'll admit it's not entirely wrong either. But it's somewhat self-defeating." Yori terminated the projection with a gesture, watching Haruka carefully as she picked up the projector and made it go away again. "A better one might be that you were deceived by an enemy who is very smart and tricky, yet even so you've learned a lot, helped a lot of people, and have the abilities to continue to help the community. You're a very powerful magical girl. That's never going to go away. You know the truth now, what you do with that knowledge is up to you. I'd suggest moving past this and getting on with life, if you can, although it won't be easy."

Staring at her hands, Haruka thought for a while. "I'm going to have to take some time over this," she said after a while.

"Of course. I understand. There's no hurry."

"What are you going to do about the time device?" she asked.

"Destroy it." She looked up, meeting the eyes of the woman across from her. In them she saw nothing but truth and a terrible resolve.

"How? If all this is true, it's an almost unimaginably powerful and ancient time travelling supercomputer with the ability to destroy entire realities. How can you possibly destroy it?"

Smiling slightly, Yori replied, "With some extremely large bombs." As Haruka gaped, she added, "It's not invincible. For whatever reason it's restricted in what it can do, we think because it's right on a knife-edge over how many more modifications it can make to the past before something ghastly and extremely final from our point of view happens. That's not actually a good thing, of course, but it does mean it doesn't seem to be able to just rewrite time to its hearts content. If it could we couldn't have got as far as we did. It would have reacted by now and we wouldn't be having this conversation. None of us would exist."

A cold chill went through Haruka as she realised Yori was deadly serious. "It could really destroy us that easily?"

"Yes. It could delete the entire timeline, there's evidence it's done this several times before, although we have no way of knowing how many. Each time it reset it would have tried something a little different, trying to push our reality towards what it thinks it should be, which can't actually happen. I have no idea how close or far from that end state we are this time around. The biggest danger of all is to our reality itself, eventually the changes could make the multiverse basically give up on us and wipe the lot. I'd prefer that not to happen."

"I'd have to agree," she said faintly, staring in horror.

"Even if it doesn't wipe out all of our reality, if it just resets the timeline, from our personal point of view and that of everyone who's ever lived, back to whenever the reset point is, there's no real difference." Yori was looking worried as she spoke. "The new timeline might have people similar to us, but it wouldn't be us. We wouldn't even be dead, we simply wouldn't have existed in the first place. Not something I want to happen." She grinned for a moment, adding, "Despite all the problems I like existing."

"So do I." Haruka sighed, glancing at Hotaru, who was listening with a serious expression, not looking surprised. "What do I do? What can I do?"

Yori scratched her ear, studying her for a few seconds. "I'm not sure. That's sort of up to you. To be honest I don't think there's much you can do to help in this case. If we can't deal with the thing ourselves one more person probably won't make much of a difference. If we succeed, after that... I guess you decide whether you want to try to avoid the magical girl lifestyle, which we both know is nearly impossible, or accept the fact that things have changed but you're still very good at what you do, when you're not being influenced by this thing. I'm happy to train you in better fighting techniques at some point if you'd like. I'll be doing the same thing with Ami, Rei, and Hotaru. Whether you can ever put your differences with the other girls aside and work together I don't know, and to be honest I'm not all that fussed about it as long as you don't go off again. Work together, work apart, even hate each other's guts, just don't drag innocent people into it." There was a look in her eyes as she spoke that made Haruka's stomach clench for a second.

"I remember what you said. I'll be good."

Yori laughed a little. "Fair enough."

Looking at her daughter, Haruka asked, "Are you OK with all of this?"

Hotaru thought for a moment, watching her, then glanced at Aiko and Yori. She smiled. "I hate what was done to us all, but I think I like the results as they've turned out. I also like Yori and her friends. I've learned some interesting things and I'm going to learn a lot more." She shook her head a little, looking sad for a moment. "I don't like what it's done to our group and I wish we could change that, but I understand we probably can't. But I can deal with it. I just don't want to lose you as well..." Feeling suddenly both sad and happy, Haruka moved closer to the girl and put her arm around her, holding her tight.

"You won't lose me. But I'm going to need you to help me with this. It's not easy."

"No, it isn't." Hotaru hugged her back, putting her head on her shoulder. "I'm not going anywhere."

Glancing at Aiko, Yori smiled, as did the brunette. "OK. We have to get on, there's a lot to do, but I wanted to make sure you knew what was going on." She stood, then thought for a moment, her eyes on both of them, before producing Haruka's sword. "This is yours. I think you should have it back now." She handed it to the blonde hilt-first.

Looking at it for a long moment, Haruka eventually accepted it, holding it in both hands and staring at it for some time. "Thanks. I'm sorry about what I did."

"So am I, but it's all in the past. We've moved on. Just make sure it doesn't happen again and we're good."

Nodding, Haruka raised her eyes to meet Yori's. "Like I said, I remember." After a moment, she thought of something, asking, "Do you know what happened to Usagi and Minako? Both of them seem to have vanished from what I hear."

There was a slight sigh from the martial artist. She ran her hand through her hair, looking annoyed. "Yes, I know where they are. They're both safe but an awfully long way from here. Tamiko and the others caught Usagi planning a terrorist attack with Minako and stopped them, luckily before anything happened. They're having a good think about it on the other side of a portal for the time being."

Feeling a sinking sensation in her stomach, Haruka closed her eyes for a moment. "That stupid little idiot," she muttered.

"It's not entirely her fault," Aiko put in from beside the window, "but there was nothing else to do, she had to be stopped. She was planning on destroying something to attract Yori then trying to assassinate her. It wouldn't have ended well. The girls had no choice."
"No, I suppose not," Haruka allowed, looking at her. "What are you going to do with them?"

Seeming annoyed, Yori shrugged slightly helplessly. "It's difficult. Both of them need help, Usagi more than Minako. We don't have time to do that right now, so Usagi at least is going to stay where she is, although we'll probably bring Minako back soon assuming she's cooled down enough to be safe." The young woman inspected Haruka. "Frankly, all of you need some therapy, some sort of treatment, to deal with the memory alterations and the problems that they've caused you. We can arrange that, Hnther, who you met the other day, is looking into getting expert help for you. I would strongly suggest that you take him up on it. You seem to be less badly affected than you should be, for some reason, but even so Hotaru thinks you're having problems. I can easily see you're suffering from depression if nothing else. Usagi and Setsuna are the biggest problems, Usagi may require fairly drastic steps to be taken."

Not sure she liked the sound of that but unable to disagree with it, Haruka simply nodded. "What would this therapy mean to me?" she asked. "What would happen?"

"You'd have to go and spend some time on Hnther's world with the therapists, probably a couple of months at first from what he told me, then go back every now and then for a year or two. I'd guess that in your case it would work pretty well, although it's out of my field of expertise. Minako will need more, as will Michiru. Setsuna is already there." At Haruka's expression of surprise she looked momentarily sad. "She had... I suppose you could call it a breakdown. Rather publicly. Aiko and the others got to her before something bad happened, then I and Azumi took her to see Hnther. She's in a type of induced coma at the moment while he tries to work out the best method to treat her. Poor woman's mind is in a very fragile state, I'm afraid."

"Oh, damn it," Haruka grunted, depressed all over again. "I don't like her but that's nasty."

"Yep. Anyway, that's what's happening to your friends. Or former friends. Ami and Rei are pretty much OK as is Hotaru, although all of them will get checked over when we know how the damn machine is getting inside your heads. We've taken steps to ensure that they, at least, can't be affected again." Yori looked apologetic. "I'm afraid we can't use the same method on you or the others, though." Slightly curious, but not enough to enquire further, Haruka nodded.

A thought struck her. "Makoto is being a little overenthusiastic with her criminal-hunting hobby," she said, "I'm worried she's going to end up killing someone. I tried to tell her last night but I don't think she listened."

Smiling, Yori nodded. "We're aware of that. Chou is having a talk with her at the moment. Hopefully that should bring it under control."

"Good. She's a fuckwit but I don't want her causing any trouble."

Laughing, Yori grinned, as did Aiko. "Neither do we. Right, we need to get on, I need to go and see Ldr'r. Hotaru, take care, we'll see you again soon." She waved to the young girl, who smiled back.

"Thanks again, Yori. You too, Aiko." Both women stood next to each other, then, as Hotaru and Haruka closed their eyes, flashed out of existence. Opening her eyes again the blonde regarded the empty room for a moment before turning to her adopted daughter.

"So tell me about the moon, and this other world you went to, dear." Hotaru grinned happily and began talking, with the older woman listening in mild shock as the tale progressed.
Raising her hand Makoto grinned nastily at the car thief, who was cowering beside the vehicle he'd tried to steal. As she began the blow her hand stopped suddenly, held in an immovable grip at the wrist. She looked around in puzzlement.

"You really shouldn't hit normal people that hard, dear, you could injure them," Chou said in a mild tone, not appearing to be straining in the slightest. Makoto glared, pulling as hard as she could, to no effect at all.

"Let go of me you bitch," she snapped. The look the blonde woman was giving her became considerably less friendly somehow, although her face didn't alter from its serene smile, making her suddenly shiver. The car thief fainted, after a squeak of horror, slumping limply to the ground.

"Please don't call me that, it's rather rude," Chou asked politely. Beside her, Misaki bent over the unconscious thief, poking him a few times in specific places which had the effect of making him twitch and resume his interest in the world at large, staring up at her in shock.

"Go away," Misaki told him. "Stop stealing cars." He nodded frantically, scrambling to his feet and legging it as fast as he could, abandoning his bag of equipment without a backwards glance.

Looking amused Misaki leaned on the car next to Fumiko, both of them watching Makoto like cats after a mouse.

"We don't mind you stopping crime, it's a good thing to do on the whole, but we would prefer that you keep the violence to a minimum," the blonde explained calmly, watching the thief disappear down the exit ramp before returning her attention to Makoto. "The way you've been behaving recently is very likely to cause serious injury or death, which reflects badly on all of us. I'd be grateful if you could restrain yourself more effectively."

"And what if I don't?" Makoto demanded angrily.

Chou studied her for a moment with a raised eyebrow, apparently interested. "Well, in that case, I suppose we'd have to take steps to prevent a repeat occurrence. That could be unfortunate."

"Are you threatening me?" she asked, becoming angrier, narrowing her eyes at the woman who was still holding her wrist. "Do you have any idea how powerful I am?"

"Oh, I know your abilities very well, dear," Chou responded, amusement sounding in her voice. "Though I seem to recall our last encounter ended fairly abruptly when you and Haruka annoyed Yori. It would be preferable to avoid such an event again. It's very destructive to the locality if nothing else."

"Yori is one thing, I know how insanely dangerous she is, but I also know you're nowhere near as powerful," Makoto snarled, throwing caution to the wind in her fury. "I bet I could take you." She noticed Misaki and Fumiko exchange glances, looking slightly surprised, before grinning in a way that sent a cold liquid shiver down her back as they turned their attention to her again. Chou released her arm, stepped back a pace, then smiled gently.

"Ah. All right, then."

"What?"

"Your challenge is accepted. Let's go somewhere where we won't cause any trouble to people." A portal crackled into existence beside her. Makoto jumped, staring at it, suddenly thinking that perhaps she'd made a mistake. "Shall we?" Chou asked calmly, indicating the hole in space. Feeling a presence behind her Makoto turned her head to see Misaki on one side and Fumiko on the other, each of them holding a pair of roiling energy balls in their hands. Swallowing dryly, by now regretting her mouth working faster than her brain, she followed the blonde through the portal, the other two bringing up the rear.

On the other side of the portal Makoto found Chou waiting for her patiently. "Where are we?" the brunette asked, looking around and feeling somewhat overwhelmed.

"Oh, it's a world that's utterly dead, it's been used for a very long time as a source of resources such as minerals but now it's mainly a dump for toxic waste, a weapons test area, things of that nature," Chou replied casually. Makoto looked around, seeing a wasteland of gravel and sand forming the floor of a vast valley, lit by a small blue star in a dark sky. Hills of varying heights punctuated the flat plain, along with some small lakes, a number of which were suspiciously round. Squinting, she thought she could see some sort of small building far in the distance on a ridge overlooking the plain. Chou followed her gaze.

"That's a bunker a friend of ours uses for weapons testing. I don't want to damage it, which is why we're over here."

Makoto stared at her. 'It's at least fifteen kilometres away...' she thought, feeling somewhat worried at the implications. Chou smiled sweetly at her.

"Now, let's see... As the challenged party, I believe it's up to me to set the conditions of the challenge. I think the easiest way is if we do it in the form of a classical duel. Back to back, walk... let's say, fifty paces, to make it more of a test, turn and fire. Does that sound fair?"

Makoto wasn't entirely sure she was hearing the other woman correctly. She looked around. Misaki and Fumiko were standing to one side, watching with small smiles. Fumiko nodded to her, while Misaki's grin widened. "Um..."

"Good. Oh, before we proceed, perhaps we should warm up a little first." Chou looked around. "How about that small hill over there as a target? We can shoot at it without anyone worrying about the damage, unlike in Minato." Makoto looked at her, then the sixty-metre hill of rock half a kilometre or so away. "You can go first if you like. We can warm up then go ahead with the challenge. I'm quite looking forward to it." Chou smiled again, this time in a manner that made the brunette feel suddenly cold despite the fairly warm conditions. There was something very unsettling and predatory about it. She glanced over her shoulder at the portal hanging in the air ten metres away, then sighed, stepping forward, deciding to make it impressive.

Taking aim, she brought up her most powerful lightning attack, sending a massive bolt of electricity surging across the ground with a deafening crack, hitting the hill half-way up, removing the top of it in a substantial explosion which rained rocks for a few seconds. Feeling pleased, her confidence restored, she grinned. Chou stepped up beside her, nodding approvingly.

"Very good. That's a lot of power indeed. And good accuracy as well. I'm impressed."

"Sure you want to continue?" Makoto asked, looking hard at her. Chou smiled a little.

"I think we should go on. I'm curious to see what happens. All right, it's my turn, I think." The brunette waved her forward somewhat sarcastically. "You're right, my power level is far below Yori's, but I believe I'm getting quite good at this," Chou commented idly. She raised a hand, then paused, looking over her shoulder at her friends. "Ball or beam?" she asked.

"Yes, that sounds good." The blonde woman smiled happily. "All right. Let's see if I can do as well as Makoto." A tiny ball of light began growing on her hand, reaching the size of a pea, then got brighter and brighter. And brighter. Makoto stared at it, her mouth suddenly dry, feeling the energy radiating from it.

"Umm..."

Chou glanced at her, her upper body illuminated by the brilliant golden glow. "Yes, you're right, perhaps I'm not trying hard enough. I should take this challenge seriously as a mark of respect." She concentrated a little longer, the ball becoming too bright to look at. With a negligent flick of her hand she send it whistling off towards the hill, turning her back on it as she did. "You should probably look away, dear," she said kindly, urging Makoto to turn. As she did there was the brightest flash the brunette had ever encountered, the entire landscape glowing as if lit by the noon sun in a beautiful liquid gold colour. The ground heaved, the loudest noise she'd heard in her life following a couple of seconds later, making her clap her hands over her ears in shock, turning back to see what happened. Numbly she noticed that there was a faint gold dome over them, which bits of shrapnel were pinging off with sounds like ricocheting bullets.

She gaped, horrified beyond measure, at the huge crater that had replaced the hill, glowing yellow-hot and visibly bubbling in the middle where molten rock was pooling. The echoes of the blast began to come back from the mountains in the distance while she stared, ashen-faced. A faint snicker came from either Fumiko or Misaki, somewhere behind her. After a long moment she turned to look at the tall woman at her side, who was smiling again in a motherly way. "You're right, of course, Yori is vastly more powerful than I am. Why, the last time she tried that same exercise, she did that." Chou pointed casually to the right, where Makoto eventually looked when she could tear her eyes from the scene in front of her, to see the mountains far across the plain had a gap in them, which must have been well over a kilometre across. It took a few seconds to realise what the blonde meant, then she nearly fainted.

"I think I did quite well, though. Thank you, it was a good warm-up. Shall we proceed? Fifty paces then fire, as agreed." Chou looked evenly at her, something in the woman's eyes making Makoto feel like she was seeing her own death rapidly approaching, although the blonde's happy smile didn't waver. After a moment she turned and walked to a clear space, the ward dome vanishing in the process, then turned and looked expectantly at the brunette woman. "Well?"

"I..." Makoto licked her lips. "I... think that perhaps I could tone it down a little." Chou raised an eyebrow. "I mean, quite a lot. Be less... vigorous, I mean, with them. The criminals."

"That would be very nice, thank you. But shall we continue? I'd like to get this over with before lunch."

Edging towards the portal, Makoto glanced at Misaki and Fumiko, who were watching with interest. Misaki was casually juggling half a dozen balls of orange energy with a slight smile on her face, not really paying attention to what she was doing. "I think perhaps I should get home. My mother is expecting me for a meal."

"Oh? I was under the impression that your parents had passed away some time ago, dear." Chou looked curiously at her.

"I meant a friend of mine. Sorry." Walking very slowly backwards, she risked a look over her shoulder, seeing she was half-way to the glowing tear in reality.

"But, what about the challenge? We haven't finished." She looked back again, then at the blonde woman, who seemed mildly insulted and slightly disappointed.
"I withdraw the challenge. Perhaps another time?" Sweating, she took a couple more steps.

The other woman sighed slightly, looking a little sad, but after a moment nodded. "Oh, very well. We can reschedule when you have more time." Smiling, Chou waved to her. "Have a nice day."

"You too, all of you," Makoto managed to say, before she turned and dived through the portal. Rolling to her feet on the other side she made a strategic retreat at high speed, sweating horribly, wondering if she'd even feel the energy ball if it hit. Five hundred metres from it she felt the portal close, but didn't stop running. 'Insane. They're all totally INSANE!' she gibbered to herself as she headed for safety, dripping with sweat, terrified to a level she'd never encountered before.

Nabiki and the others were still rolling around laughing when 'Chou', Fumiko, and Misaki re-entered the living room. "Oh, god, Sis, that was amazing," she gasped out, grinning at her sister as she retook her normal form and sat down. "People say Yori is scary. Your friendly psycho act is incredible."

Kasumi looked pleased, giggling slightly. Misaki and Fumiko sat as well, snickering. "It was a lot of fun," the elder sister said calmly, smiling. "Poor Makoto seemed to be a little intimidated, though. The girl has anger issues, I think, but hopefully we managed to persuade her to be a little more careful in future."

"I'd be surprised if she tried anything at all for a few days," Ami laughed, watching the eldest Tendo woman with enormous amusement and respect. "The expression on her face... She looked like she thought she was about to die horribly."

"It was the impression we were aiming for," Fumiko agreed, accepting an orange from her sister, grinning. "That was fun."

"I liked the visuals," Rei told her. "Following her like some sort of magic-powered Yakuza enforcers was very effective."

"She seemed to take it seriously," Misaki chuckled.

"What would you have done if she'd accepted the duel?" Ami asked curiously, wiping tears of laughter from her face. Kasumi shrugged a little.

"Her lightning attack wouldn't have penetrated the ward I'd have used. None of us were really in danger. If she'd still decided to go ahead with it I'd have knocked her out then taken her home. That's why I played it so over the top, I wanted to be fairly sure I could intimidate her into doing the right thing without hurting her." She smiled serenely. "Also, of course, as Fumiko says, it was fun."

"You made a real mess of that hill," Rei commented, looking very impressed and a little worried as well. "Can you do one of those ki balls larger than that?"

"It was near my current upper limit, but even so it's much larger than it was the last time we tried that particular exercise. I was slightly surprised myself." Kasumi shrugged a little, looking pleased. "It's nice to know what you can do."

Ami studied her, then looked at the rest of them. "Are you all capable of that sort of thing?" she asked curiously. Nabiki glanced at her sister before shaking her head.

"I'm certainly not. I can make a fair sized hole, but only one you could lose a car in, not one that would swallow this building. The others are much more powerful than I am."
"Nabiki's more accurate than anyone other than Ranma or Misaki, though," Tamiko told them. "And faster as well. More of a sniper than a siege weapon."

"What's Ranma, then?" Rei giggled. "Did he really make that gap in the mountain range?" She stopped laughing when all five of the other women nodded simultaneously. "Oh, shit."

"He was a little surprised," Kasumi replied, smiling. "We had to leave through the portal very quickly. At a run, in fact."

"Good god," Ami mumbled, staring at them all. "I knew he was powerful but that's just..." She shook her head, unable to finish.

"He thinks Hotaru could be close to that level with some practice," Nabiki told her. "We all might reach it eventually, he said. I'm not sure that's right, and I'm not sure I'm comfortable with it if it is. But we'll have to wait and see."

They were still snickering and replaying the recordings from different viewpoints when 'Yori' and Aiko appeared in the room, grinning. Returning to normal Ranma walked over and looked at his wife for a long moment, then bowed, chuckling. "Truly inspired, love. I acknowledge my better."

Kasumi laughed.

"I'm not better than you, as you well know, but I have my own methods. They seem to work." Sitting beside her the martial artist held her hand.

"They do indeed. That really was amazingly funny. So was the way you got the car thief without even trying. Collateral damage from a hard look is fairly impressive."

"He certainly left quickly," Fumiko smiled. "Mind you, so did Makoto. She was radiating total terror by the end, nearly as much as Haruka did the time you told her off."

"How did it go with poor Haruka anyway?" Ami asked. He sighed gently, pulling her projector and data crystal out of a ki pocket and handing it back with a nod of thanks.

"Better than I expected but she's still not a hundred percent convinced, I think. Maybe ninety-nine percent. She's at least willing to listen, which is good, I suppose. Hopefully Hotaru will manage to talk her around that last little bit." Nabiki watched the recording he sent them all.

"She seemed slightly more cheerful," the middle sister noted at the end. "Nothing like as depressed as she was a few days ago."

"Hotaru going home helped a lot, I think," Rei mused. "She loves that girl. I thought Michiru did as well, I'm still shocked they split up like that."

"From what we saw there's no love there now," Fumiko sighed. "Their last meeting was only barely this side of having a major fight. If Ranma hadn't warned Haruka off, it would almost certainly have got very nasty. She kept her temper surprisingly well, though."

"What a pity," Ami said quietly. "I had problems with both of them, they were always a little over-enthusiastic for my taste, but it's still a shame."

They were all silent for a moment. Eventually Ranma stood. "Right, I guess I need to go and talk to Lidn'r'k. Shall we get on with it?" Nabiki got up, followed by Ami and Rei, as he opened a portal, reverting to 'Yori' in the process. "See you guys in an hour or so," the woman said, stepping into the portal, followed by the others, although Nabiki stopped and cocked her head to one side for a few seconds at a quick message from Hotaru, before she went after them, laughing.
Hotaru finally stopped giggling over the recording Ami had sent her, looking at her female adoptive father with a grin. Haruka appeared rather puzzled as to why the girl had collapsed in laughter out of the blue in the midst of telling her about her trip. Deciding it was too complicated to get into at the moment, she simply said, "I remembered something funny Chou did."

"It must have been very funny indeed," the older woman retorted, still looking at her oddly, although smiling a little.

"It was. Very, very funny."

"Hmm." Haruka stared at her some more, then looked away, picking up the piece of lunar rock and turning it over in her hands, examining it closely. "I still find this amazing. A real piece of the Moon."

"It's neat, isn't it?" her daughter said, smiling. "I picked up a few of them. That one is a nice shape so I thought you should have it."

"What was it like? Walking on the Moon, I mean?" Haruka asked slightly wistfully.

"It was brilliant. You have no idea how much fun low gravity is. We could practically jump into orbit there. I did a big jump and didn't come down for about thirty seconds. Azumi jumped right over the ship, from a small hill about five hundred metres away!" The girl grinned happily. "I think you'd have liked it. K'n'n Four is wild, there are so many people there you wouldn't believe it. But everyone we met was really nice."

"People? Or demons?"

"They're people," the purple-haired girl insisted firmly. "They may look like big beetles but they're people just like us. I like them."

The older woman examined her for a while, looking mildly puzzled, but in the end nodded, smiling. "Whatever you say, dear. You understand why I find it difficult, though, I hope?"

"I do." Hotaru moved to lean against her parent, who stroked her hair. "Believe me, I do. It's what we've been told for years. But it's wrong. Yori told me that a lot of the 'demons' are really just peaceful explorers or traders. Everything I saw confirmed what she said." She saw her parent didn't look convinced, not entirely, so after debating the issue with herself, then checking with Ami and Rei, she added, "If it wasn't for S't'h'kx, in fact, the entire world might have ended."

Haruka stiffened, looking shocked, then stared at her. "What... What do you mean?"

"It was his idea to use a lot of long range probes to look for anything dangerous floating around in space. If he hadn't done that, we'd never have found the asteroid in time." Hotaru giggled at Haruka's expression.

"Asteroid?" She sounded befuddled. "What asteroid?"

"The one that was heading right at Earth. It would have hit in about three weeks or so, they said." A long silence filled the room as the older woman paled, inspecting her daughter, who waited patiently.

"I think I need to hear this story, dear," Haruka finally said faintly. Laughing a little, Hotaru complied. She left out the value of the asteroid, but told her parent more or less everything else. Eventually, finished, she watched as the other woman struggled to come to grips with it all, still looking rather unwell. Eventually Haruka sighed. "So Yori and the rest of you saved the world."

"I think so. Ami said it probably wouldn't have killed everyone, but most people would have died in the end. It was kind of scary to think about."

"I'm proud of you for helping like that," her parent told her, smiling. "I'm sorry you got hurt, though."

"Chou was very apologetic about it. She looked very guilty, but from what Agent Naito told me, she didn't have any choice. I can't remember it at all, which I think might be a good thing, really." Hotaru shook her head, thinking back to the spaceship, then the hotel on K'nn Four. "I'm really glad I didn't manage to hurt him. I like Masao."

"You mentioned him a few times. I'm not sure I like the idea of some government security agent knowing anything about us." Haruka looked disapproving.

"It's a bit late for that. The PSIA knows all about us. They've know for years, Yori said. They may not be magical, but they're pretty good detectives, I think." Hotaru shrugged a little as Haruka looked dubious. "Yori says we can trust them. If they'd wanted to cause trouble they could have done it a long time ago. If she thinks it's OK it probably is." She grinned for a moment. "Yori watches them. And Chou watches her."

"Who watches Chou?" Haruka asked, looking amused.

"Ms Aoyama." At her parent's confused expression, she added, "Ms Aoyama watches everyone."

"That... doesn't make me feel much better," Haruka said slowly. "Who is Ms Aoyama?"

"Oh, she's some sort of alien secret agent from an organisation that keeps an eye on people like us, I think," Hotaru said easily, smiling, trying not to giggle. In her head she could hear Nabiki laughing, as she'd opened a com channel to her for this part. "She's really creepy, but I think she's a good person under it all. You just don't want to make her angry." The laughter from the middle sister intensified.

"You wouldn't like her when she's angry," Nabiki chuckled.

"People don't like her when she's happy, either," Hotaru sent, grinning internally.

"True, but no one has ever managed to tell her that..." Closing the link, Hotaru returned her attention to her parent, who was looking very worried.

"Alien secret agent?" she queried, paling again. "From where?"

"No one knows," the girl said mysteriously, in a low voice, then looked around. "But she's probably watching right now." She did her best not to laugh as Haruka involuntarily looked about as well, although in the end she couldn't help giggling. The blonde fixed her with a hard stare.

"Right. Good one. Watching us right now, hmm? You've been hanging around Yori too long, that woman has a warped sense of humour." Shaking her head, smiling slightly, she got up. "Come on, let's go and get some lunch, then you can tell me the rest of the story." Hotaru hopped to her feet, grinning, following the older woman out of the room, but not before throwing the stealthed camera drone that was floating in the air outside the window a quick wink.

"I'm very close, I think," Lldnr'k said, inspecting the red orb clamped in a complicated frame on his workbench with a number of instruments pointing at it. 'Azumi' inspected the arrangement curiously. She could see some very complex magic patterns around the entire array, gently and carefully probing the sphere. "It's more fiddly than I hoped, the temporal signature of the stone is very unusual. That's not too surprising bearing in mind how many times it's apparently travelled through time in various directions. Unravelling all the interactions is somewhat time-consuming, ironically enough, but I'm down to the last few layers. Once I have that information extracting the data stored in it should be fairly straightforward, the core of it is a moderately advanced magitech processor which is easily interfaced to and poses no particular problems."

"How long?" 'Yori' asked, also looking closely at the set-up with her eyebrows raised in respect.

He made a little gesture of uncertainty, snapping his beak. "I think perhaps two of your days worst case, but not less than one in all probability. Subject to something going wrong, of course, but I'm reasonably confident there are no surprises. I found and bypassed a number of security measures, one or two of which were rather good. I'm fairly certain I got them all. This part is just tedious but reasonably straightforward."

"OK." The martial artist looked satisfied with his progress. "Thank you, Lldnr'k."

"It's not a problem, Yori, believe me. Aside from the favours you've done for me in the past, I want this damn machine dead at least as much as you do. The obscene thing should never have been built." He watched the progress of his equipment for a moment, clearly not happy about the situation. "What it's done, been responsible for, and is still doing is... wrong on more levels than I can express." Glancing at Ami and Rei who were watching silently, he added, "And I'm so very sorry about the effect it had on you and your friends. You young women didn't deserve that at all."

Ami sighed, sitting on a nearby bench. They were in a large workshop in which a few others of the temporal mage's species were working, apparently apprentices of his. "I hate it too, but I guess I like being what I am, even if how we got to this point is all wrong. Some good things have come out of it." Looking at him, then around at the others, she continued, smiling a little, "Aside from anything else I've made some good friends and met a lot of interesting people. That part, I'm fine with."

He turned to study her with interest. After a few seconds, he nodded. "Good. I'm glad something useful has come out of this horrible mess." Making the gesture they recognised as signifying amusement, he added, "Now all we have to do is stop your home reality from being erased and you can go on with your life."

"Well, yes, that would be the ideal outcome," 'Azumi' replied sardonically. Clicking his beak in his variant of laughter, he nodded, then waved to another bench. They all looked over at it.

"I finished the temporal interference detectors and made half a dozen of them for you." Walking over, followed by the four women, he picked one of the devices up and showed it to them. 'Yori' picked up another one, examining it curiously, 'Azumi' doing the same. "As I said, they won't do much good if there is a large modification to the temporal flow, but they should at least allow you to detect small interferences as they happen, or recent ones that have already happened. Hopefully you won't need them, if we can arrange to kill this machine soon, but..." He explained how to use the devices. It was fairly simple for someone who had a reasonably well-developed magic sense.

"Thanks, Lldnr'k," 'Yori' said, smiling at the mage. "These could well be useful."

She handed the one she was holding to Ami, taking the rest and putting them away, although 'Azumi' kept the one she was holding at her nod. "What do we do if we detect an alteration?" the middle sister asked.
"I'm not sure, it will depend on the circumstances," Lldnr'k admitted. "But knowing that a modification has been made should help you assess a situation if it arises. The most likely interventions will be to people, I suspect, which seems to have been the case in the past with the girls. Incursions on the level of the asteroid will be rare. They are very likely to cause extremely undesirable side-effects from the multiverse correcting them, which the time device will be aware of, and probably doesn't want to risk. If the information you have about the damage to it is correct it may well not have the ability to perform temporal modifications on that scale any more in any case, which is a small blessing, although small changes can certainly add up if they're correctly done. The current problems are a case in point."

"Did you manage to find anything more on the device in your research?" He glanced at Ami as she spoke, shaking his head a little, apparently annoyed.

"Not much. I'm now certain that there was a deliberate attempt a long time ago to erase any mention of the device from the historical record. A not entirely successful one, but it's definitely caused most of the data to be either missing or deeply suspect. Several colleagues have also come to the same conclusion. We've collated all the information we were able to locate in an attempt to determine how accurate various data was, with mixed results. Nothing of any great import seems to have come to light." He paused, looking thoughtful. "We did discover that it's likely that there were a number of survivors of the collapse of the originating reality. That's not too surprising in retrospect, they had considerable inter-reality trade, so it's more than likely there would have been a number of people on the other side of a portal when everything came to a head. Those people would have been safe, in the same way that anyone from elsewhere who were visiting that reality would have ceased to exist when the reality imploded."

"Could it have been these survivors who altered the records?" Rei asked, looking thoughtful.

"Possibly, I suppose. It was so long ago there's no way to be sure," the mage replied, scratching the base of his beak idly with one talon. "I doubt it makes any difference to us, at this point, although it's an interesting historical item. There are a few researchers who are going to get some useful papers out of this whole affair." He shrugged a little. "Personally, I'd prefer the entire thing to go away for good as soon as possible. It offends me on a very deep level."

"You and me both," 'Yori' mumbled, frowning. A pinging sound made them all look around, at the bench on which the orb was being probed. Lldnr'k hurried over to his equipment and examined it.

"Aha. Good, that's one more layer of temporal interactions unwound. It looks like there are... Hmm, I'd say about five left. That should be no more than a day or so." He made some notes, then turned back to them. "Until then there isn't much more I can do to help."

"You've helped a lot, Lldnr'k. I owe you one." 'Yori' grinned at him. He smiled back in his own manner.

"No, I think we can call this a draw, Yori. You've done a number of favours for me as well. This matter is far too important to not help with." He looked around at them. "Would you care to look around for a while? Or do you have to get back?"

They all looked at each other. "I'd like to see more of your world, Lldnr'k," 'Azumi' replied. Ami and Rei nodded, smiling.

"So would I. I've only seen K'nn Four so far, but I find the whole 'other worlds' thing fascinating," the blue-haired girl said.

"We can spare half an hour or so," 'Yori' mused, glancing at Rei.
"Good." Lldnr'k nodded sharply in satisfaction. "We're nowhere near as manic as those lunatics on K'n Four are, but it's a nice place to live." They laughed as he headed to the door, waving them to follow. He led outside the long low building into a courtyard surrounded by walls made of finely dressed and cut stone, in the centre of which was an inlaid metal circle some three metres across, that had symbols engraved on it which reminded the Tendo woman of electronic circuitry. Ami bent down and examined it curiously.

Spotting her interest, the mage explained. "It's a teleport node. We have them all over the place. They encode a standard teleport spell, you only have to provide the destination coordinates and the energy to power it. Very few people can teleport anywhere near as easily as that young woman Aiko can, her ability is extraordinary, but this allows most people with a reasonable amount of magical ability to achieve something similar." Leading them to the middle of it he checked to see they were all standing on the node, then concentrated. The world flickered briefly, producing much the same sensation engendered by Aiko's teleportation, leaving them all standing in what looked like a large park, with carefully manicured blue-green grass-like plants covering the ground.

Lldnr'k waved his arms expansively, indicating the area in front of them. "This is the centre of the largest city on this continent, it's called Irillan. It's got a population of about three quarters of a million permanent residents, with perhaps a third of that again of transients, either visitors, traders, or workers from other cities, countries, or worlds." They looked around. 'Azumi' could see that the park seemed to be roughly round, with buildings visible all around the edge beyond plants similar to very tall ferns which she thought must be the local equivalent of trees. The sky was a blue-purple colour, the local sun showing a faint greenish tint to the otherwise yellow-white light. Some moving dots could be seen high above, apparently aircraft of some sort.

There were a number of paved paths leading in various directions across the park with people walking on them, as well as a few machines similar to three-wheeled bicycles, although clearly powered, moving in and out of the crowd with a faint whirring noise. The pedestrians were mostly of Lldnr'k's species, although she saw a few D'sage and a couple of Krennsh as well, with various others she didn't know the names of interspersed in with them. One or two she recognised from K'n Four, although most were new to her.

Around the grassed areas people were relaxing, playing games, or just sitting and enjoying the day. She smiled, thinking it reminded her of a nice summer day in a park at home, if you left the alien foliage and population out of it. Yet more proof that people were basically people. Glancing at Ami and Rei she saw they were staring around with wide eyes, Ami clearly taking mental notes, while Rei was smiling to herself in wonder. Lldnr'k was watching them all, with an expression of mild amusement. After a moment he waved to one path leading towards the city. "If we go that way we can see some interesting artworks, then stop at a café I know for a drink, if you like."

"Sounds good," 'Yori' smiled, falling in beside him as he began to move in that direction. They walked for a few minutes, the mage pointing out various things of interest, eventually entering the city itself along a wide road, which had vehicles quite similar to the ones she'd seen on Fwetna, although sufficiently different that they were clearly not from the same manufacturers. Another five minutes walk led them to an open area like a small pedestrian precinct, around which were a number of restaurants and cafés, while the centre of the square had a number of large communal tables. Benches provided seating for the several dozen people of various species congregating there, eating and drinking, mostly while talking loudly at the same time. Everyone seemed to be enjoying themselves.

Leading them to one particular eatery, Lldnr'k negotiated with the staff for a moment, then waved to a table that had some spaces around it. "They'll bring some drinks over in a bit," he explained, heading in that direction. They all sat, the guests looking around with curious interest, before returning their attention to the temporal mage. "So, it looks like, aside from the problem with the device itself, you may be slowly resolving the issues surrounding the other young women. With these two and Hotaru added to your ward system, Setsuna undergoing treatment with Hnther and his team, and both Usagi and Minako out of circulation for the moment, you only have three left to deal with. That seems to be a good thing to my mind." The time mage glanced up as one of the staff from the café came over with a floating tray following him obediently, which made both Rei and Ami stare for a moment, thanking the waiter as he unloaded the drinks he'd ordered.

Trying hers, 'Yori' smiled approvingly, before nodding slowly. "It is, although it's still not a perfect solution. Ami and the other are fine, even though they'll still have to be checked over when we have some idea of how the time device is, or was, accessing them, just to make sure there are no nasty surprises left lurking around." This made Ami and Rei exchange a somewhat worried glance.
She noticed, smiling reassuringly. "Not that I think it's likely, but we need to check."

"I would agree with both parts of that statement," Lldnr'k commented, looking mildly amused.

"Poor Setsuna is in a bad way, I'm afraid, though. I'm rather guilty about that, I feel I should have stepped in sooner, but as Azumi said, we had more immediate problems to deal with." 'Yori' sighed unhappily. "It's true but it doesn't make me feel any better."

"Some good things came out of that incident," the mage noted, sipping his drink in a somewhat odd manner. "You managed to get the key crystal without a fight, which is good."

"True, I suppose." They all looked up as a shouting match suddenly broke out a few tables over, several people of at least three different species beginning a loud argument. "What the...?"

Lldnr'k shook his head. "This tends to happen, people get a little... over-exuberant... sometimes. It's the day before a public holiday, they start early on occasion." The argument swelled, 'Azumi' listening to the insults being swapped in Trade. Even though some of them sounded slightly odd to her, they were clearly meant to annoy. Ami and Rei could understand the words due to their SIs, looking surprised and amused by turns about some of the more imaginative insults. They watched as a number of Lldnr'k's species wearing clothes that were clearly uniforms, presumably the local equivalent of the police, popped up in the growing crowd, rapidly and efficiently restoring order and arresting three participants in the disturbance on the spot. One of those, a D'sage male of considerable physical size and strength, struggled hard and loudly.

"I'm not letting some jumped up security guard talk to me like that!" the D'sage man screamed, looking furious. He lashed out with his tail, knocking the cop down, before turning and stalking off. 'Azumi' and 'Yori' exchanged glances, the former raising an eyebrow, while the latter sighed, put her drink down, then stood, walking into the path of the man and blocking his way. The cop, who was now looking extremely irritated, got up with the aid of his compatriots and drew what seemed to be a weapon, coming after the absconding perpetrator while bearing a look that suggested he was about to engage in a certain amount of instant karma, his patience exhausted.

'Yori' folded her arms and stared at the inebriated Third Minister's cousin, who stopped, glaring down at her. "Get out of my way, you little idiot."

"Nope. Don't like your attitude," she replied, looking mildly bored.

"Do you have any idea..." he started to say.

"Who you are? Yes. You're the Third Minister's cousin, I heard. How is Klaath, anyway? I haven't talked to him since we helped rescue his wife a couple of years ago," she said, which caused him to stop talking instantly. 'Azumi' looked past the pair to see the policeman and one of his colleagues, who had come to help, had stopped a few metres away. She made small gesture to indicate they should wait. Exchanging glances, they both shrugged slightly, although they didn't put their weapons away, merely watching. The small crowd surrounding them at a respectful distance was doing the same.

"Rescued his..." 'Azumi' could see in his eyes the moment he worked out who he was talking to. If he'd been human he'd have gone as white as snow. "Oh, gods. You're Yori."

"Oh, yes, indeed I am." The young woman smiled very slightly, but showing fangs. "You are being very rude. You're a visitor here. Show some respect, you're dishonouring your people, which annoys me. I like them a lot. Stop it." She leaned a little closer, suddenly glowing visibly, purple energy rising from her like smoke from a fire. The entire crowd went dead silent. "You don't want to annoy me any more, really you don't. Now be a good fellow, go with these nice policemen, and I'll drop it. If you're lucky I won't even tell Klaath. We're both too busy to bother with stupid drunk people, but if you persist, I'll have to take you back myself and have a word with him."

Visibly swaying in horror, the D'sage nodded, his ears flat against his head. She looked past him at the two policemen who walked over, one of them politely but very firmly taking possession of the instigator of the altercation. The other one stared at her, blinking as the glow went out. "Impressive.
Who did you say you were?"

"I didn't, he did, but I'm Yori. Sorry about stepping in without asking but it seemed appropriate.
Third Minister Klaath would be very annoyed about all this, I'd prefer it didn't bring any dishonour to him. He's a good man." She glanced at the D'sage man, who was staring at the ground, still looking shaken. "Pity you can't choose your relatives."

The cop made the click of his beak that conveyed amusement, nodding once. "Indeed it is. If one could I wouldn't be stuck with my brother." ‘Azumi’ grinned while Lldnr'k and 'Yori' both laughed, Ami and Rei looking amused. "Thank you for the help, Yori." He cocked his head to the side, looking at her. "I've definitely heard that name before."

"We get around," the woman said, smiling.

"Yes, I have a feeling you do," he said slowly, inspecting her, then looking at 'Azumi', Rei, and Ami. Obviously recognising Lldnr'k, he nodded respectfully, saying "Greetings, Honoured Mage.
These are guests of yours?"

"They are, and friends, also, Sub-commander. Do you wish any more information from us?"
Lldnr'k asked, seeming mildly pleased with the outcome of the intervention.

"No, I believe everything is in order. Please excuse us, we have some people to have a long chat with." Nodding, he made a quick salute, then accompanied his colleague and their now very subdued prisoner back to the other cops, most of whom left soon after. The crowd slowly dispersed now that the show was over, although a number of the watchers were studying 'Yori' with interest.
She smiled slightly, glancing at her sister-in-law, then sat again.
"Sorry about that. Where were we? Oh, yes, the key crystal." Everyone looked at her for a moment, Rei and Ami exchanging glances, as she picked up her drink once more.

"Nicely done, by the way," the temporal mage said, amused. She saluted him with her cup, grinning. "As I was saying, getting it without a fight was a stroke of luck even though it was due to this Setsuna woman having a serious medical issue. Hopefully she can be fixed, given time." He took another drink from his own cup, looking thoughtful. "The theory that the staff might be acting as a relay for the time device is, I believe, correct. Having examined it I feel that one of the likely functions of the crystal was indeed to act as a conduit for the sort of spell that was most likely used to influence these women, as your computer, Ami, probably also was." He glanced at the blue-haired girl as she nodded understanding. "Without being able to access it directly I can't be completely sure, but as soon as the last of the layers is unwoven it's something I will check. Mostly of academic interest, now, but it would be nice to be certain one way or the other."

"We still don't know how any such spell actually accessed them yet, though?" 'Azumi' asked. He shook his head.

"Not definitively, no. Although I did have a somewhat disturbing thought along those lines. I'm not entirely sure how to prove it, it's somewhat out of my field of expertise, but I think it might be possible." They all looked at him curiously.

"Could you expand on that?" Ami asked, looking a bit worried and apprehensive.

After a moment, he nodded, slightly reluctantly. "Understand, this is only an idea at the moment, I may well be completely wrong, but it seems plausible." She indicated understanding. "We know that the time device has been interfering with the recent history of your world, which has resulted in the situation we find ourselves dealing with. We're also fairly certain it's reset and looped at least once before. My best guess at the moment is probably more than five times and less than a dozen, although there is no way to prove it except very circumstantially. What we don't know is how far back the reset point is." He looked around at all of the others. "By which I mean, did it go back a hundred years? A thousand? More? Or just to a point before any of you were born, or even only just before the first of you developed your current magical abilities." Everyone stared at him for a few seconds, then exchanged glances.

"Does it matter?" Rei asked. He shrugged slightly, looking somewhat uncertain.

"I'm not entirely sure. There may be no way to even find out, of course. And it might not have reset to the same point each time. Probably it didn't, in fact, I would imagine that it was smart enough to try alternative methods to achieve its goals when it failed the first couple of times. I would also suspect that the reset point probably isn't all that far back, as the number of variables would grow exponentially the further before a desired change it began interfering. But the problem of manipulating time is that it's essentially impossible to account for all the variables no matter how good you are, you see. Something as simple as that rather drunk D'sage interacting with Yori a few minutes ago could well in some ways depend absolutely on specific events happening in a specific order possibly dozens or even hundreds of years ago. On the face of it, you could have changed it by merely going back an hour or so and preventing him getting drunk, but how do you know for sure that would prevent such an interaction in the future?"

He finished his drink as they thought about it. "The answer is, of course, you can't. You might well avoid that particular interaction, by editing a past event, but in the process set up a sequence of possibilities that led to the same interaction, or a worse one, at some later date. Or even an earlier one. Not fate, or predestination, anything like that, just the fact that there are so many things that all come together to make reality happen it's basically impossible to account for all of them. Even for a massive supercomputer that has possibly millions of years to think about it."

"So you're saying that there was no way to avoid something like that happening?" Ami asked, obviously thinking hard. He shook his head.

"Not at all. There may well be one simple change you could make that would have set everything on a totally different path where that event would never happen. The key thing is, though, that there is basically no way to be totally sure what it is. You could alter one parameter at a time, over and over, until you found it by trial and error, but it would essentially take an infinite amount of time from your perspective. Not to mention that temporal inertia would undo most of the changes before the effect could ripple through to the present, making the entire exercise one of futility in any case." He sighed a little. "And if you made certain changes, which might not even be particularly large ones, at least as far as you could predict, you could well destabilise reality to the point that something very unfortunate happened. It's almost impossible to be sure that any one change is safe, dangerous, or just useless. That's the real danger with time travel, you see. Until you do it you don't know what will happen and by then it's too late."

"It sounds far too dangerous to experiment with," 'Azumi' noted.

He nodded. "It is. With extreme care one may investigate the past through temporal manipulations but it's highly unwise even so. Direct interaction with past events is a fool's game at best. There are laws against it for very good reasons."

"So what is the unsettling idea you had?" she asked, glancing at the others. He fell silent for a moment, studying Ami and Rei, then took another drink as they shifted uncomfortably under his eyes.

"It is obvious that the time device is being very subtle in its actions for the most part. Wholesale editing of the time stream is an almost sure-fire way to attract the attention of the multiverse, it will almost always go badly wrong very quickly, or at the minimum have an effect that's not the one you were after. The time computer presumably knows this well as it's why its own reality was destroyed in the first place. So it seems to me that it will, unless it has no other choice, use much less obvious methods." They all nodded as they listened.

"The problem is that we know it's able to access all of you girls somehow. The conduit is certainly through one or other magitech item being used as a relay, such as your computer, the key orb, or the asteroid installation. All that seems fairly definite now. But the question is, how does it manage to access you via those methods? We've examined you all closely several times and there's no obvious spell present, yet there must be one. None of the magitech devices we have examined have any traces of the sort of magic that would allow it to directly control your minds, it's doing it indirectly somehow, through a pre-existing link of some sort. Which must be very low level indeed, to hide so well."

"That's... very interesting," 'Yori' mused, staring at him, then at the two girls, who looked back, worried.

"Isn't it?" Lldnr'k nodded slowly. "It's also somewhat amusing in a very dark way. The machine could directly interfere if it wasn't for the fact that all the young women involved are possessed of considerable magical abilities, which interfere with most of the more straightforward methods of achieving what it's trying to do, magical abilities they have precisely because of what it's done so far. In essence it's made its own job much more difficult. I would imagine that it may well have tried more direct methods the first couple of times, only having to resort to something this complex when it failed, probably rather rapidly."
They pondered his words for a while. 'Yori' looked to her sister-in-law as if she had a suspicion where the mage was going with this, but said nothing. "So far I have no way to be certain, but I have developed the idea that the machine may have begun interfering some time ago in the personal time lines of all you girls, making very small but careful changes that would lead to this point. My thought is that it has, somehow, embedded the control magic directly into your genetic makeup, most likely by tiny nudges over a considerable time that influenced specific people to mate and produce offspring with the desired traits. A certain amount of direct intervention to modify specific genes, a fair amount of time to mix them in the right way, and..." He indicated Ami and Rei with one hand. "It's a very sneaky way to encode a spell. All the parts are brought together at a specific time without any overt manipulation that's large enough to trigger a response from reality that would undo it." 'Azumi', Ami, and Rei stared at him, thunderstruck, while 'Yori' was nodding, looking understanding and very irritated at the same time.

"It fits. Damn it. It fits much too well."

"It's not my speciality, I admit," Lldnr'k said after a moment during which he sipped his drink again. "Exotic biological manipulations are more your field. But I have encountered documentation on spells encoded genetically once or twice before, which was what gave me the idea. It's rare, partly because it's massively difficult to do correctly and partly because it's only useful in certain, extremely unusual situations, but it's not unheard of."

"You mean that fucking thing has been breeding magical girls?" Rei exploded, looking furious. 'Yori' shook her head as Ami jumped from the sudden noise. A few people around them looked over, then went back to their own business when 'Azumi' gave them an icy glare.

"No, not really. The magical girl part is separate from the mind control part, I think. If Lldnr'k is right, what it's done is produce a situation where specific people have a sensitivity to a specific control spell it can then use to insert the new memories, without using a more obvious and detectable method to directly push them into your brain. It's a very clever idea, actually. The magic use is separate from that, I think, although it may well have affected your inherent sensitivity to magic in the process."

"If it's been doing this sort of manipulation for generations, perhaps that explains why so many magical girls are in Minato," 'Azumi' suggested slowly, looking at them all. 'Yori' glanced at her.

"I guess that's not impossible, but I have a feeling it's only a small part of the story even if it's true. I can't say why, exactly, but it doesn't feel right."

"I think it unlikely," Lldnr'k said, shaking his head. "The device has a specific narrative it is attempting to impose on your reality and the presence of all the other people in your world with magical abilities such as you and Yori possess would if anything be a hindrance to its plans. As current events well show." She smiled a little, while he looked amused. "If it was indeed planning all this I feel it would have gone to some effort to prevent collateral effects that would interfere with its goal."

"Is there any way to prove this?" Ami asked, looking at him, then 'Yori', an expression of worry on her face. "Or more to the point, do something about it?"

'Yori' and Lldnr'k exchanged glances. "Proving it will take a very careful deep scan of you both, but if what I suspect is true, knowing what to look for will allow us to find it. As far as undoing it goes, I don't have the medical or genetic background to even know where to begin." The temporal mage shrugged a little, looking apologetic.

"I've got a fairly good idea what to do," 'Yori' commented after a moment, looking at the middle Tendo, who nodded, remembering the conversations she'd had with her sister a couple of weeks ago. "Chou and I have been working on an extension to the healing methods we designed that may well help, although we're a little way off being able to test it." She sighed slightly as the others looked at her. "Assuming we succeed in destroying that damn machine none of this should be an immediate problem, which gives us some time to refine the methods, but if it really is there, it's a potential weakness that we should fix. Who knows what else might be buried inside you girls?"

Rei was pale, looking rather scared now. The other woman noticed, smiling encouragingly at her. "Sorry, I didn't mean to frighten you, Rei. I doubt it's anything too serious, but we need to check. It's not something I want to ignore."

Ami was silent, a thoughtful expression on her face. After a few seconds, she asked slowly, "Assuming that your theory is correct, that explains both how the machine is able to affect us, and the method it's using to do so. But how did it get in the first time?" Everyone looked at her. "I mean, if we do have some sort of genetic susceptibility to this magic, there must have been some initial method by which it first contacted this built-in spell. What was it?"

The answer came to the blue-haired girl and 'Azumi' simultaneously. "The transformation rods," the middle Tendo said, as Ami sighed, nodding, producing her own and looking at it with distaste. The others all inspected it.

"It has to be. This is the first magical artefact each of us got, it's what started the whole thing off for all of us. The first time we used them, it could have caused a link to this built in spell."

"That's certainly plausible," 'Yori' agreed. She held out her hand, Ami dropping the small item into it, then she and Lldnr'k examined it carefully. It glowed violet for a moment as she squinted at it. The temporal mage pulled out a couple of instruments which he touched to the thing, then manipulated for a while. They looked at each other.

"That's the cause, definitely," the mage said with a sigh. "It's a complex spell, more complex than I initially realised when I examined the device the first time, although I admit I was more interested in the temporal signature at the time rather than what it actually did. My apologies, if I had investigated more thoroughly in the first place we might have had this information much earlier."

"Not your fault, Lldnr'k," 'Yori' replied, shaking her head. "I missed it as well. I should have looked into the damn thing more carefully myself." She looked at Ami and Rei. "As we discussed at the time, these things were what allowed you to gain the abilities you have now, but they're not actually a part of it now, merely a useful tool, one which neither of you, or Hotaru, need any more. You've moved well past that point, years ago. I would think that the others have as well although I'm not sure how many of them realise it consciously yet." She flipped Ami's rod in her hand thoughtfully, then handed it back. "It's basically useless now. I don't think it can be used as a relay by the time device but it might be best to dispose of it, just in case."

"What about any of our other tools, and weapons for that matter?" Rei asked with concern, watching as Ami inspected her transformation rod with a troubled expression.

"So far, the computer and the Orb seem to be the main issues," the other woman replied. "The computer is now disconnected and blocked, while the orb is out of range. Once Lldnr'k has cracked it and extracted the information, we should be able to make it safe in the same way so we can give it back to Setsuna. Hotaru's weapon isn't anything that the time device had a hand in creating, I'm certain of that, it's far too old and totally different in origin, while I couldn't find anything odd with Haruka's sword when I examined it a few days ago. It might be an idea to double-check, now that we have an idea what we're looking for, but I suspect it's clean. We do need to check anything else that you have, like your communicators, and the other girl's weapons."
"We should destroy the lot," Rei grumbled, producing her own rod and glaring at it. 'Yori' chuckled.

"The rods, yes, they serve no useful purpose now. Perhaps the communicators, now you have... more effective methods...," She glanced at Lldnr'k, who looked interested but didn't say anything, "but it's your choice."

"If you wish, you can leave those items with me so I can examine them thoroughly," the temporal mage suggested. "That will ensure the device can't access them if they do have any abilities to relay magic, which I should be able to locate and deal with, and it will also allow me to learn more about the methods it's using. Aside from anything else it would be interesting research." Rei and Ami glanced at each other, nodded, then each handed him their rods and communicators, which he vanished into his own storage space. "I will ensure that you learn anything I do about these," he told them.

"I'll get Hotaru's stuff to you as well," 'Yori' commented, watching with a slight smile. He nodded.

"If you can relieve the other young women of their items as well, that would probably be a good thing, although they may not see it that way." He chuckled as Ami and Rei both started laughing.

"Oh, god, Usagi will go nuts if you take her things from her," Rei giggled.

"We need to check on both her and Minako when we get back," 'Azumi' suggested, smiling a little. "We haven't looked in on them since we returned."

"True enough. And, if Misaki is right, it might be time to see if we can bring Minako back," 'Yori' mused, finishing her drink. She looked at Lldnr'k, who seemed curious, explaining Misaki's theory. He listened carefully, looking impressed and slightly worried.

"That's... a very interesting thought," he told them when she'd finished. "And, I suspect, most likely correct. I hadn't thought of it, although I probably should have. Yes, I think you would do well to return Minako to her home presuming she is stable enough to allow that to happen, it may well be important. Anything we can do to delay the device deciding to execute a reset of the timeline we should do."

"OK. We'll go and have a word with her a bit later, and also check in on Usagi. I'll have to get her to Hnther for a quick examination as well, sometime in the next few hours." 'Yori' sighed slightly, toying with her empty cup. "This is all very annoying."

"I'll say," Ami grumbled, staring at the table. "Damn cats. This is all their fault. If I hadn't met Luna maybe I wouldn't be involved in all this craziness." 'Azumi' and 'Yori' went totally still, then looked at each other. Ami apparently noticed something amiss, glancing up at them, but misunderstood their expressions. "Not that I mind the end result, you understand, only all the baggage that comes along with it."

The middle sister could see in her sister-in-law's eyes that she was suddenly thinking very hard, as was the Tendo woman. 'Luna'? 'Yori' turned her head back to stare at Ami, who seemed slightly worried, then looked at Rei, who looked back, puzzled.

"Tell me more about these cats," she asked, a certain amount of tension in her voice. "You mentioned them a few times but that's the first time you called one by name."

The blue-haired girl glanced at her team-mate, who shrugged. "Oh. Um, well, they're basically cats, Luna is a small black female one with a sort of new moon shaped mark on her forehead, Artemis, despite his name, is a male, white, same mark. Like I said, they talk. A lot. In fact, sometimes it can be difficult to get them to shut up. They're the ones who gave us the rods in the first place. For the first couple of years they gave very good advice, although looking back on it, it was 'good' in the sense that it was clearly manipulating us into doing what the time device wanted, but after a while what they said and what happened drifted further and further apart. That was when everything started to go weird." She snickered a little. "Weirder that it had been, I guess." The girl looked at Rei, who nodded, smiling a little sadly. "Other than that, I think you know about it. They advise, or misadvise, Usagi and Minako. Usagi was starting to get very irritated about the advice over the last few months, she spent a lot of time arguing with Luna. Minako was on better terms with Artemis, although they certainly had a lot of differences of opinion."

'Yori' rubbed her chin, thoughtfully, staring at Ami and Rei, for some time after she stopped speaking. "Interesting. Very interesting indeed."

"I take it that you have some issue with Ami's explanation," Lldnr'k remarked, looking very curious. She glanced at him, then looked around.

"Yes. Very much so, but I don't think here is the best place to talk about it. Can we go back to your workshop?"

"Of course. There's a teleport node just over there," he said, pointing. They all got up and headed over, waiting for a group of people to use the node, then clustering on it. Seconds later they were in the courtyard of Lldnr'k's building. He led them inside again, into a private room, with a large table in the middle of it, surrounded by chairs of various types. Everyone felt heavy wards go up around the room. 'Yori' looked pleased and mildly impressed.

"Not bad. Better than most people do." He signified amusement.

"Thank you. Coming from you that's quite a pleasing statement."

She grinned at him for a moment. They all sat down, looking at each other. "So, what did you want to talk about?" he asked curiously.

"I want you to look at something, then see if you can work it out," she replied.

"We're going to have to tell him about the SIs, I guess?" 'Azumi' asked.

"Most likely, and the camera drones. It can't be helped, he needs to see this. It's covered under the security spell, so it won't go any further. We'll probably need to talk to Hnther as well, get his opinion. I'm curious to see what they both think. Can you project that file that Tamiko sent us, the first one where Usagi was stomping around on the roof shouting at 'Luna' before she went to look for Minako, please?" The middle sister nodded, producing the projector she'd picked up on K'n

"Ah. We're going to have something to watch?" She grinned.

"Yep." Sending the recording to the device, she had it project the image to one side so they could all see it properly. Everyone watched as Usagi stomped around, shouting and waving her arms. The camera moved closer and the audio cut in, making Rei jump a little, then they listened, until the recording finished. Ami and Rei both watched it, frowning slightly, glancing at each other now and then, but said nothing after a look from 'Yori'.

"Hmm." Lldnr'k scratched the base of his beak thoughtfully. "Interesting, as you said."
"There's more, as well," 'Azumi' told him, before showing the rest of the recordings they had acquired between them of both Usagi and Minako. When they were finished he leaned back, studying her, then 'Yori', for a moment. He glanced at Rei and Ami.

"Intriguing. Both the contents of those recordings and how you obtained them. I suspect there is some interesting technology behind that."

"It's rather good, yes," 'Yori' replied, smiling. She explained. He looked very impressed.

"That... is quite remarkable. I have heard of Kw'lyn Industries, of course, their magitech is the best you can get by a very long way. But these secure communication units are new to me. Not surprising, considering how restricted they are. I'm somewhat envious." He glanced around at them all as they smiled. "You all have them?"

"We do," Rei told him, looking pleased. "We never expected to get anything like that, but we're amazingly grateful, even after only a day. I think they're going to change our lives in a lot of ways."

"I can see why. I can also see why you wish to keep the knowledge of them to a minimum number of people. All right, that's all very interesting, and I'd love to learn more at some point, but leaving that aside, the ramifications of what you've shown me are more important at the moment." He thought for a moment, then looked at Ami.

"You can all see and interact with Luna and Artemis?"

She nodded, frowning slightly again. "Yes, but I'm very puzzled as to why they didn't come out on the recordings. Usagi was obviously able to talk to Luna, and that other one showed both she and Minako could. Why didn't they get recorded?"

"There are only two possibilities I can think of," he told her, idly tapping one talon on the table with a faint clicking sound as he thought. "One is that they have some form of stealth technology or magic, which prevents them being recorded. Yori and Chou, I know, can perform that particular feat quite easily." The two looked at 'Yori', who nodded.

"Yes, our invisibility technique definitely works against the camera drones, I tested it. But somehow this doesn't feel like that."

"The other possibility is more interesting, and somewhat worrying," the mage continued. "It is that these cats, whatever they really are, don't actually exist in the normal sense of the word. Not physically, at least." Everyone stared at him for a long moment.

"Don't exist?" Rei asked in a low voice, looking stunned. "But... I've talked to them! All of us have! They're the ones that gave us these damn things in the first place, for god's sake."

Lldnr'k studied her. "Have you ever seen them physically interact with anything? Anything at all? Or seen anyone else interact with them except your colleagues?" She opened her mouth, ready to say something, then stopped before the first words emerged. After several seconds, she closed her mouth again, looking helplessly at Ami, who was obviously thinking very hard.

"They gave us the transformation rods," Rei repeated, looking lost.

"But they didn't, did they?" Ami said slowly, glancing at her. "Not as such. Oh yes, they were responsible for the things, but it's not like they actually handed them to us. Luna did her little song and dance routine and they were just there. She didn't actually touch them. Now that Lldnr'k mentions it, I can't think of a single time when I've seen either one of the cats touch anything. They have a habit of just turning up, out of nowhere, not coming in a door or a window, or climbing a tree. They're just there." 'Azumi' glanced at 'Yori', seeing her listening intently, looking very interested.

"Why have I never noticed that before?" Ami mused, looking around.

"I suspect because, as in the case of the medical damage the device was causing to your friends, you were being influenced not to," the martial artist said quietly. L'dnr'k nodded, across from her, both of them watching the blue-haired girl. "I was just beginning to wonder if it might be something like the SI units in some weird way, but the more I think about it the less likely I think that is. Too many things don't fit. But it's obviously connected to the time device."

"Definitely," the mage told them. "I believe we will need to talk to Hnther, and also examine one of these two girls to be sure, but I have an idea what it might be." Everyone else turned their attention to him. "Understand, this isn't my field, but I've been around long enough to have picked up various things from some fairly widely separated disciplines. This falls more into the realm of a mind mage, but I suspect that what we're dealing with is a self-contained induced personality splinter."

The four women exchanged glances. Rei was the one to ask. "What the hell is that?"

"You're aware of the concept of multiple personality disorders? My people occasionally suffer from them, as do yours." She nodded, while 'Yori' raised an eyebrow, looking at her sister-in-law. Ami was listening intently but suddenly appeared to have an idea where this was going. "An organic brain is an amazingly powerful processing system, capable of a truly vast number of parallel operations. Consciousness, oddly enough, doesn't actually use all of that processing power. A large amount of it, to be sure, more in some species and individuals than in others, but there is a lot left over in most cases. Much of the remainder is used for autonomic operations, but there's usually enough spare capacity to run more than one consciousness on the same 'hardware', if you like. This usually happens spontaneously, for a number of reasons, such as certain types of trauma, mental illness, brain damages, conditions of that type. The result is more than one personality residing in a single brain."

He looked around to see if there were any questions. 'Yori' motioned for him to continue, looking fascinated. "In some cases, these personalities run concurrently, in others they are alternately active. Sometimes they're aware of each other, sometimes not. They can share memories, skills, abilities, or develop totally different ones. It becomes very complex to deal with. Far outside my own expertise, obviously. The common result of this sort of disorder is one or more of a series of fairly serious mental problems, most of which are highly undesirable and often difficult to treat. But, it is possible, from what I have read and been told in the past, to deliberately induce an effect very similar to what can happen naturally, except in a controlled manner. I am aware of the technique having been occasionally utilised for espionage, for example."

"You mean something like producing a personality that is a spy, then embedding it in the mind of someone no one would suspect, only to come out under the right conditions?" the middle Tendo asked. He nodded.

"Exactly."

"I'm pretty sure I've seen a movie about that sort of thing," she mumbled, thinking.

"The Manchurian Candidate is the obvious one," 'Yori' commented, glancing at her. "But the idea is used in quite a few books and movies I can think of. Although by the sound of it, this goes a lot further than brainwashing or mind control."

"It does. I'm not familiar with those specific works, but our own fiction has used the concept more than a few times, with varying success." Lldnr'k shrugged. "Some of it is quite entertaining, but most is also very inaccurate. What you mention is a fairly simplistic version. The sort of thing I'm thinking about is much more effective, and also more dangerous. Essentially, I suspect that what has happened is that the device has partitioned off part of the brains of each of these two young ladies, then constructed a complete personality which runs on this otherwise spare capacity, with it's own memory, thoughts, awareness, and everything else that goes to make up a mind. It is possible that the 'Luna' personality, for example, has access to Usagi's memories, it will certainly have access to her senses. She won't have access to any of it, and in fact will have been influenced to not notice it at all. The 'Luna' personality itself may not actually realise what it is, it also may have been programmed to not work it out. If I'm right, it's running concurrently with her main personality as a separate process, able to interact with her at will, directly interfacing with her visual and auditory pathways in a similar manner to how your SI units function."

"If that was done correctly it would be amazingly difficult to notice," 'Yori' said, sounding impressed. "Assuming both the base personality and the... 'splinter', did you call it?" He nodded. "Had been programmed right, neither one would realise the truth. Any imperfections in the process they'd both be made to ignore."

"Indeed. The splinter personality would be more likely to notice than the host one, for a number of reasons. But even there it would probably be difficult. If I'm right, the device will have set these splinters up to guide the narrative locally, when it was unable to drive it directly, either because it was for one reason or another unable to access them by the other means we suspect it's using, or because it was worried that direct intervention was too dangerous. Dumping a lot of data into their minds along with something that would provide it on an ongoing basis, internally, with no further intervention, would be a fairly effective method of minimising the temporal interference in a manner that was unlikely to provoke a reality reset." He sighed. "It's a very, very clever thing to do. Extremely difficult to detect for the main part."

"That damn thing may be an idiot, but it's a smart one," 'Yori' agreed, scowling. The mage clicked his beak in acknowledgement.

"Hold on," Ami protested, after they all fell silent for a moment. "It sounds plausible, I admit, but the glaring hole in the theory is... How the hell did the rest of us see and interact with these 'splinters'? If they're really some weird personality riding on top of poor Usagi and Minako's minds, surely only they could see and hear them? But I've had quite long conversations with Luna when Usagi wasn't even in the same room!"

Lldnr'k looked at her. "My best guess is that it's some form of short-range telepathic spell, which allows the splinter to insert visuals and audio into the minds of other people. Most likely, only the nine of you, it's almost certainly connected to, or even part of, the spell we suspect is built into your genetic makeup which allows the device to manipulate your memories. A different application of much the same method."

"You mean Usagi and Minako are telepathic?" Rei squeaked. He laughed, shaking his head.

"No, not at all. It's not an inherent ability, true telepathy, although it does exist, is both fairly rare and in some ways less effective that this. It's much closer to what your SI units do, although most likely by a totally different method, and I suspect nothing like as powerful. From what Yori said, those devices use a very advanced subspace linkage of some sort. This would be a direct, low level magical connection, which wouldn't have very much power behind it, at least partly because otherwise it would be fairly easy to detect. The range would be quite short as well, I feel."

Rei and Ami looked at each other again. "I can't think of any time when I've seen either of the cats and either Usagi or Minako wasn't somewhere within a couple of hundred metres," Ami said. Her friend nodded slowly, a frown on her face.

"No, neither can I."

#Nabiki, everything that Lldnr'k has suggested is extremely plausible,' Jun suddenly said. 'I calculate there is a better than ninety-three percent chance he is correct. Techniques of this nature are in my database, although they are marked as being considered too dangerous to use in most cases. Most species who underwent such a technique would become far more likely to suffer some form of psychosis within a few years of the splinter personality being established, yours being one of them. It may well explain why Usagi has deteriorated so rapidly, when all the other damage done to her mind by the time device is taken into account. Minako may just be lucky, or the damage hasn't progressed as far in her case yet.#

'Is there anything that can be done about it?' she asked the SI.

#Yes, although it may be too late. Suppression of the splinter is possible, reintegration into the host mind is more difficult but may be possible. Allowing the situation to continue is likely to lead to long term damage, such personality splinters are inherently unstable over time periods on the order of a decade or more, except in very rare cases. It is barely possible Minako is one of those cases although I would suggest that the evidence shows that Usagi is definitely not. Hnther is the best choice currently known to me to be able to execute some form of treatment.#

The middle sister glanced at 'Yori'. The other woman looked back at her for a moment.

"Jun thinks he's probably right," she commed. 'Yori' nodded, sighing gently.

"Yes, I just got the same advice. Ami and Rei probably did as well." They looked at the two girls, who each had familiar expressions suggesting an internal dialogue.

"The SIs agree with you, Lldnr'k," 'Azumi' said out loud, making him turn his attention to her from Ami, who he had been watching. "They also agree that we need to get Hnther to investigate."

"Wouldn't he have noticed something like that when he examined them?" Ami asked curiously. Lldnr'k shook his head a little.

"Not unless he was looking for it, I suspect. He was concentrating on other things, mainly the memory editing that you all suffered from. As the memories of this personality splinter would be totally separate from those of the host, it's entirely possible he wouldn't have noticed it, especially if some method of hiding the alterations had been put in place. He would undoubtedly discover it given time, he is very skilled indeed in his field, but even for an expert it would be difficult without a very deep scan which is a time consuming process from what I understand. Knowing the splinter exists, though, would allow him to locate it fairly quickly. Although what he can do about it is beyond my knowledge."

"All we can do is tell him and see what he says," 'Yori' sighed. "Right. I guess we'd better go and talk to him. Sorry, you guys, it looks like we still need you." Rei and Ami exchanged glances.

"Can we go home for a little while first?" Rei asked. "I'd like to talk to grandfather for a bit, just to let him know I'm all right."

"I want to tell my mother I'm OK as well," Ami added. "I know Chou got messages to everyone, but still..."

"Sure. No problem. It's not a tearing hurry, probably, although I'd like to find out the truth sooner rather than later. As soon as Lldnr'k has the coordinates we're going to get very busy, I suspect, but from what he says we have at least twenty-four hours until then." She glanced at the temporal mage, who nodded.

"It won't happen before then, certainly."

"OK. Let's go back, talk to everyone and let them know what's going on, then you two can go home until tomorrow morning." The martial artist thought for a moment. "What we could do is go and see if Minako is more or less sane at the moment. If she is, we need to bring her back anyway. We can do that via Hnter, get him to look into this latest mess, and check you two over at the same time. That should give us everything we need. Then we let her go, make it damn clear there's to be no idiotic attacks on anyone, get these coordinates, some extremely large bombs, and go and make the loudest bang anyone has ever heard." She grinned viciously. "I'm really looking forward to erasing this fucking thing from the multiverse."

"You and me both, my friend," Lldnr'k assured her, looking angry.

"I hope it's that easy," Ami muttered.

"So do I. But I suspect a hundred kilos of antimatter in the face will do the job." 'Yori' snickered. "I'm going to see how many of those warheads the SI makers are willing to part with. I think Lldnr'k is right, no sense taking even the slightest chance we don't have enough firepower. I intend to see there's nothing left of that damn time machine except subatomic particles." She glanced at the mage, who seemed satisfied.

"Good. Very good."

"Do you want to be present when we examine Minako and the girls?" she asked. He thought for a moment.

"Yes, if only for the sake of curiosity. but I think my time is probably better spent getting the coordinates out of the crystal. The last two or three interactions are likely to need a delicate hand to unravel, I fear. As you say, as soon as we have them we should move immediately to destroy the machine. After that, I'd be very interested in learning more about this other problem, but until then..." He shrugged as she nodded.

"Fair enough. OK, we'll get back, and I'll stop in again tomorrow to see how it's going."

"That's fine. Good luck. Give my greetings to Chou and the others."

"I will." 'Yori' stood, as did everyone else, shaking the mage's hand, then, as he dropped the wards, created a portal in the corner of the room. He watched as they all waved then walked through it, the tear in reality vanishing with a pop. Smiling slightly in the way that his species did, he went back to work.
Vast appreciation for the comments and kudos.

This particular story arc is drawing to a close, in its current form, with probably only a couple more chapters to go, but never fear, the story as a whole is not yet complete...

Mind you, if you don't like the story, there is much to fear!

That said, in that case how did you manage to get this far into it?

Saeko Mizuno looked away from her computer as she heard the front door open. "Is that you, Ami?" she called.

"Yes, Mom, I'm back. Sorry about being late, I hope you got the message." The older woman saved and closed the report she was working on, getting up and heading into the living room, where her only daughter was just taking her light jacket off, her bag on the floor next to her. She smiled at the young woman who smiled back.

"Yes, I did, thanks. Did you have a nice trip with your friends, dear?" she asked. Ami nodded, although there was momentarily a rather odd look in her eyes, something that vanished almost before her mother noticed. She said nothing, although she added it to the mental tally of slightly peculiar things that she'd noticed about her daughter over the last few years. The list was fairly substantial.

"It was a lot of fun, yes, thanks, Mom. We got back a little while ago, we were just winding down and talking for a while. I met some very interesting people, actually, and saw some amazing things." She smiled again, bending down and picking up her bag, which she put on the table and unzipped. Rummaging through it she pulled out a few small objects, selecting two of them. One was a small grey rock, about the size of a golf ball, while the other one was a tiny transparent crystal statue of a rather odd looking creature, which reminded Saeko of a sort of insect, although it was bipedal and was holding what looked like a book in one of its four hands. "I got a couple of souvenirs for you as well. Here, what do you think?" She handed them over.

Looking at the two objects she was holding, Doctor Mizuno raised an eyebrow. "Hmm. Not exactly the normal sort of thing you bring back from holiday. A rock and a little statue from a fantasy shop." Ami grinned, while her mother inspected both small objects carefully. "Mind you, the workmanship on this crystal is amazing. It looks like it's made from a single piece, but the detailing is remarkable. What's it supposed to be?"

Looking very amused, Ami laughed. "Just something I saw in this odd shop. Apparently it's a statue of a famous researcher from another world."

Saeko raised the other eyebrow, studying her daughter, then smiled slightly. "I see. An alien scientist, hmm?"

"That's the idea."

"Very interesting. That must have been a very odd shop. Lots of teenaged boys wandering around, looking pale, clutching role playing games in their hands, perhaps?" Ami began giggling, shaking her head, as her mother laughed.
"Not quite, but it was fairly unusual. I couldn't resist it."

"What's it made of?" the older woman asked curiously, rubbing it carefully with her fingertip. "Not glass, or at least normal glass, the refractive index is wrong. Perhaps lead crystal?" She held the thing up to the light, turning it gently, watching the highlights as the light refracted through it. Ami snickered.

"I was told it's made of synthetic diamond."

Glancing at her, her mother sighed, although she smiled. "I highly doubt that, as far as I know synthetic diamonds are generally very small and used for industrial purposes. I think it's unlikely that people would be making little statues for a fantasy game out of it, even if it could be done."

Ami shrugged, grinning.

"I guess not."

"I hope it wasn't too expensive."

"No, it was quite cheap, Mom, I just thought you'd like it. It's a bit weird, I know, but I thought it was fun." Giving her daughter a long look, Saeko eventually nodded.

"You are a very strange young lady sometimes, Ami." She laughed, putting the little figurine down on the table carefully, so she wouldn't break it. She held up the rock, inspecting it more closely. "I assume this has a similarly unusual story behind it?" There was nothing particularly notable about the stone, it seemed to be a fairly normal piece of some sort of light grey material, like you could find almost anywhere. Her daughter giggled again.

"Oh, yes. It's a piece of moon rock."

Giving her an exasperated look, Saeko shook her head. "A very strange young lady. Moon rock. Yes, indeed, I see it now. The cheese smell is a dead giveaway." Ami started laughing, then hugged her mother. "Thank you Ami, they're... interesting... little gifts. I fear the souvenir sellers may have seen you coming, but..."

"I'm sorry they're not more exciting but they have some significance for me," the blue-haired young woman told her, looking pleased.

"Don't worry, you hardly need to go out of your way to get me presents, dear," Saeko replied, turning the rock over in her fingers. Its surface was rough to the touch, but felt quite pleasant to run her fingertips over. "Certainly not as far as the moon." She giggled at the look on her daughter's face. "Come on, you can help me with the table, you're just in time for dinner. Tell me more about these friends of yours as well, and what you did. Rei and that young Hotaru girl went with you, didn't they?"

"Yes, we all had a lot of fun. Excitement, adventure, lots of running around shouting. And swimming. Lots of swimming." Ami quickly packed her bag again and moved it to the sofa, while Saeko put both her presents on the bookcase in the corner of the room. They both went into the kitchen. "It was amazing." She glanced sidelong at her mother, an impish smile on her face. "I even had a flying lesson."

"You did what?!" Saeko stared in shocked horror.

"Some friends we met go flying all the time, they took us up for a go. It was huge fun. I'm thinking of getting into it myself." Ami was giggling again, while her mother spluttered, sufficiently surprised she couldn't think what to say. Moving past her, the younger woman pulled the oven door open, peering inside. "This looks nice. Shall I peel some carrots?"

Unable to think what to say for the moment, her mother nodded faintly, staring. They clearly needed to talk.

"Hello, Grandfather," Rei said, smiling at the old priest as she entered the temple. Behind her, Aiko was leaning against the door, also smiling a little. The black-haired girl knelt and hugged the old man for a moment, as he returned it, looking pleased. "I'm back."

"So I see. I hope your trip was successful?"

"It was. So many things happened. I wish I could tell you everything, but..." He waved this off, looking amused.

"Don't worry, I understand there are things you can't tell me. I'll gladly listen to anything you can, though." He looked over at Aiko. "Hello, child, it's nice to see you as well. Would you like to stay for some tea?" She regretfully shook her head.

"Sorry, sir, I'd love to, but I have to get back. There are some things we need to do. But I did bring you this." She tossed him a chunk of stone about the size of a duck's egg, which he snatched out of the air with a speed that somewhat surprised his granddaughter. "One genuine moon rock, fresh from the surface, as promised." He grinned at her, making a small bow, which she returned with a laugh.

"Thank you. I appreciate the thought." Holding it up he studied it, rubbing it with his thumb.

"It was decontaminated on the ship, all the dust was removed, that stuff is mildly toxic. The rock is safe to handle, though."

"Fascinating," he murmured, looking at the stone, then lowered it. "I hope you're successful in dealing with your duties. Oh, I heard that the Setsuna woman had a rather spectacular problem in a park a few kilometres away the other morning and you girls took her away. Is she going to be all right?" Aiko sighed slightly, shrugging a little.

"I'm not sure. Neither is Yori. They took her to Hunter's world, he's looking into the problem at the moment. He thinks that she's going to need considerable treatment for some time, but right now he's not entirely sure how successful that is likely to be. It's going to take a while to find out."

"Poor woman." Shaking his head slowly, he glanced at his granddaughter, who looked sombre. "I hope she recovers. The others, as well. Please let me know what happens, and if there's anything I can do to help."

"I will. Thank you for the offer." Straightening up in the doorway, Aiko nodded to him, then looked at Rei. "See you soon. Call any time, if you want to talk, or a lift."

"Thanks, Aiko. For everything." Rei smiled, before Aiko slipped out into the corridor, a brilliant flash illuminating it for a fraction of a second. Turning back to her ancient relative she grinned. "I've got an amazing story to tell you."

"Well, then, let's get some tea, sit down, and talk," the old man replied, looking amused and interested. Both of them headed into the temple kitchen.

"I'll bet that hurt."
Usagi looked up at the cat, which was sitting on a small rock just beside her head, peering down at her upside-down, a slightly quizzical expression on its furry face, along with rather more amusement than she liked. She groaned, reaching up to rub her forehead.

"Just a little." After a moment, she managed to pull herself into a sitting position, rubbing her head gently and wincing, muttering to herself, as she looked around. The explosion had been somewhat... impressive. Experimenting with her magic in a desperate way to work out some way with which to possibly beat Yori, she had suddenly had a bright idea, sparked by one of the meditation books she'd leafed through before deciding that most of it was a lot of new-age crap. A couple of the exercises in it had, though, seemed vaguely worth the effort, and a couple of days of trying had lead to a breakthrough, allowing her to access her power-up in a way that seemed to make the transformation rod redundant. This in turn had let her work out how to access more power than she'd ever had the ability to use before, for some reason, although it wasn't easy.

After thinking about it for a while, she'd tried using her tiara attack, essentially supercharging it far past the normal level. Taking aim on a huge boulder at the base of the mountain nearest her, she'd fired the thing at it, only to find that the results were slightly more spectacular than she'd been expecting. The explosion that had followed the impact of the glowing artefact had reduced a boulder the size of a house to gravel, which had promptly departed the area at substantial speed, unfortunately going through the area in which she'd been standing in significant quantities.

As shrapnel, mixed with larger chunks, had whizzed overhead making some very nasty noises she'd hit the deck, after a wide-eyed stare and a yelp of shock. One orange-sized piece of rock had struck her forehead a glancing blow on the way down, flipping her head over heels some ten metres in an impact that would have reduced a normal person to mulch. Now, as she stared at the devastated scene, she slowly began to grin. "Hah. Yori, you're dead, when I get back. No way can you beat that!" The cat, now behind her, made a noise that sounded a lot like a suppressed giggle of disbelief, causing her to look back at it with a vicious glare.

"You have a comment to share, perhaps?" she asked sweetly, her eyes flashing. Luna giggled again.

"A couple. One, you nearly killed yourself with that trick, and if you use it in a populated area, a lot of people will be killed or injured."

"Collateral damage. They'll all be dead soon enough, anyway, what does it matter when it happens?" Usagi shrugged, getting up and brushing dust from her uniform. Luna stared at her for several seconds, apparently not entirely sure she'd heard correctly. After a moment, though, she shook her head, then continued.

"Two, I would be extremely cautious about assuming anything about Yori's abilities, or lack thereof, or those of Chou and their friends. I'm pretty sure that you haven't ever seen them go all out."

"They've never seen me go all out, either," the blonde snickered, walking over to pick up her tiara, which was lying on the ground twenty metres away, where it had landed after the test shot, since she'd been too busy ducking to catch it. "She'll never know what hit her, believe me. I bet I only need to get her and all the rest will give up anyway."

"Three," Luna added, after sighing faintly, "You're here, on a completely alien, totally dead world, with absolutely no way to get back without their cooperation in the first place. If I were you, I'd be thinking more about ways to get those girls to trust you again, rather than plotting to kill them and anyone else who gets in your way. Unless you like it here?"
"I fucking hate it, but I have to admit it's given me time to think and practice. All I have to do is pretend to be nice, when they come back, then as soon as we're through the portal, attack Yori. Game over, I win."

The cat jumped up onto a boulder the size of a person next to her and stared at her face for a long few seconds. Eventually it sighed again, more loudly. "You really think that, don't you?" she muttered to herself, shaking her head. "You're going to have a shock." Jumping down it walked away, threading its path through the rubble, heading for the tent. Usagi watched it go, fuming.

"What do you mean, Luna?" There was no answer. "Luna! Tell me what you meant!" Following it angrily, she stopped when she went around the last boulder to see it had vanished again. "Fucking cat. What does she know, anyway. I'm the princess."

Stomping off towards her tent, thinking up new ways to use the power she had gained access to, Usagi mumbled to herself about all the people who would pay when she got home. A faint high-pitched humming sound accompanied her.

"What's the next step, then?" Nabiki asked, accepting a cup of tea from her sister with a smile.

"Get a good night's sleep, it's been a long day, then in the morning check in on Minako and Usagi, I suppose," Ranma mused, taking the next cup Kasumi handed out. "We need to swap out the camera drones for ones with freshly charged antigray power supplies anyway, and we can take the opportunity to review what they've been up to since they were put there. Hopefully Minako at least will be sane enough we can deal with her sensibly." He sighed a little, shaking his head. "I doubt very much that Usagi will have improved, but I suppose it's possible. But based on what we've seen in the last few weeks..." Shaking his head again, he raised his teacup and took a sip.

"I think it's very unlikely," Tamiko told him, taking her own cup. Kasumi gave the last one to Misaki then sat next to her husband. "She was pretty much frothing at the mouth when we took her down, I doubt being isolated and having time to stew on things has improved her outlook on life very much." Misaki and Fumiko looked at each other, both nodding.

"She's crazy, I'm afraid," Fumiko added, scowling. "I know she used to be fairly sane, although how much is debatable, she was always a bit odd, but what we saw... No, she's got it bad. Whether Hnther and his people can do anything I don't know, but even as she was a week ago she's not in a condition that's safe to allow out in public."

"To be honest, it was probably only her fixation on you that stopped something worse happening to the community at large," Misaki commented quietly, looking at Ranma. "She seems to have no real inhibitions against hurting anyone who gets in her way at the moment. Luckily all that anger and drive was focussed on causing 'Yori' problems, so we were able to take her out before something horrible happened. But I have no doubt it would eventually have happened, whatever 'it' is."

"Damn it." Ranma frowned into his tea, before drinking some more. "I never liked the girl in the first place, something about her winds me right up, but it's not nice seeing someone fall apart like that."

Kasumi put her hand on his, causing him to glance at her, then smiled gently. "It's not our fault, although it seems to be our responsibility to deal with the aftermath. The time device is to blame, and ultimately, a civilization that no longer exists. Even Usagi is mostly blameless. Let's just try to help the poor girl and not worry too much about how it happened and what might have gone wrong but didn't."
Smiling at her, he held her hand. "Right as usual, Kas. Thank you."

"Minako is more likely to respond to logic, I think," Aiko said, watching them with a small smile. "She's never been quite as gung-ho as Usagi, although she was certainly quick off the mark in a few cases. That said, so was Rei, and she seems to have turned out pretty well. Hopefully, Minako will see sense. A few days alone might have helped."

"Hopefully." Nabiki looked at Ranma with concern, then glanced at her sister. That one word embodied a significant amount of annoyance and tiredness, she felt. Kasumi met her eyes, nodded slightly, then squeezed her husband's hand.

"We're all too tired to think this through properly, I think. Let's all get some sleep, have a decent breakfast in the morning, then see what we can do. It won't look as bad in the morning, it usually doesn't." Ranma looked at her for a few seconds, then smiled a little, nodding agreement.

"The voice of reason speaks truth." Quickly finishing his tea he put his cup down, as Kasumi did the same. The others all followed suit.

"We'll see you tomorrow, guys," Aiko said, grinning, then vanished, not bothering to stand up. Tamiko blinked at the flash, laughed slightly, then stood, as did her two team-mates.

"We'll leave slightly less dramatically, but the same applies. See you in the morning." The red-head grinned at them, then left with her colleagues, the front door closing behind them with a click.

Nabiki looked around, laughed, and stood, putting her cup on the tray Kasumi had brought them out on.

"You guys go to bed, I'll tidy these away, then do the same."

"Thank you, sister," Kasumi replied with a smile, pulling her husband to his feet. "Come on, dear. You look tired." Ranma let himself be towed into the bedroom, winking at his sister-in-law over his shoulder as he disappeared into the room. Nabiki snickered, then went back to clearing the tea things away, shaking her head slightly in amusement.

Soun glanced at Cologne, who was watching Akane go through a kata with Shampoo critiquing her, stopping her every now and then to correct something, showing significant patience, something he was impressed by. The old woman was easily balancing on her staff, her long white hair almost glowing in the early morning sunlight, but she looked pensive, as if her attention wasn't completely on the activities of the two young women. "You seem distracted, Elder," he commented, going back to watching his youngest daughter and her friend. There was no answer for long enough he began to wonder if she'd heard him.

"I met someone rather unsettling the other day," she finally said, still watching the girls as well. "This Ms Aoyama that Shampoo and Akane have run into a couple of times."

"Ah. By the tone of your voice you're not entirely happy about having done so, I think." Soun glanced at her again, meeting her eyes as she looked up.

"No. It was... highly unpleasant."

"Is she a danger?"

"Oh, undoubtedly. To the most remarkable level, I think. But not without provocation." Cologne actually shivered as he watched, surprised. "Although she's the coldest, creepiest, most unsettling person I have met in my entire life, I don't think that she is in any way hostile. Merely capable of reacting to something she didn't approve of in a very final manner."

"Who is she?" he asked curiously, himself unsettled by her words.

She shrugged. "I have absolutely no idea at all. Not human, that much I'm completely sure of, but beyond that, your guess is as good as mine. She's from somewhere a very long way away, I suspect. I can't say anything more about it, I'm afraid, but if you ever meet her, you'll understand."

She looked like she was thinking about something she'd learned, something she wasn't entirely happy about. The Tendo patriarch watched her for a moment, then went back to inspecting the two girls.

"They do seem to have made the acquaintance of some very unusual people over the last year," he commented. Cologne chuckled rustily.

"That, they most certainly have. I could have done without that woman, though. The thought that she and her employers, whoever the hell they are, are taking an interest in my great-granddaughter and her friend is somewhat worrying."

"Do we need to do anything?" he asked, now quite concerned. Once more she laughed, although there was to his ears a certain amount of strain in it.

"I don't think there is anything we can do about it, to be honest, except see how it plays out. There are certain things in life that, when they happen, you have to ride out. There's not much you can actually do about them except wait and hope you survive it. Volcanoes, earthquakes, hurricanes... Ms Aoyama." He stared at her, then both of them started to laugh a little.

"I hope you're exaggerating, Elder."

"So do I."

Her reply made him less happy than he'd have liked. Cologne seemed to share the feeling. They both fell silent while watching the two young women train.

"Interesting," Aiko muttered, as they all watched the recording. They were sitting in the living room, which had a small portal hanging in the air near the window, allowing their SIs to connect to the drones shadowing the two exiled girls, although the other end was several hundred kilometres away from Usagi so she wouldn't detect it. "She's getting worse. I was afraid of that."

"It looks like she's worked out how to directly access her magic, which is a decent accomplishment," Kasumi noted with interest. Ranma nodded, rubbing his chin thoughtfully.

"It is. Unfortunately it makes her even more dangerous. The part of her conversation with the 'cat' that we could hear also suggests she's none too concerned about anyone's safety except hers, either. I wish we could hear the other part. I'd love to know whether this 'Luna' personality was egging her on or advising restraint."

"I'd say it was probably urging her to stop and think," Nabiki said, replaying part of the recording that had been made a few hours earlier. "She didn't seem too pleased about it, at any rate. I get the impression that these personality splinters are probably trying to rein them in a little. From what I can pick up from the recordings of Minato, her 'Artemis' one is telling her to stop and think before she does anything."

"Indeed," her sister said, also reviewing some of the recordings. "That's very interesting. I wonder why they're doing that? I'd have though it was more likely that they'd be pushing the time machine's narrative but as you say, they seem, if anything, to be doing nearly the opposite."

"Do you think it's possibly that these splinter personalities are independent and intelligent enough to have realised that something is wrong with the whole situation?" Fumiko asked slowly, apparently thinking hard. Everyone looked at her. Eventually Ranma nodded again, looking intrigued.

"I guess it's possible. From what Ami and Rei said, they're fully sentient and very articulate, with considerable apparent intelligence. I suppose that removing them from the influence of the time device might have allowed them to start noticing all the incongruities of what's been happening recently. Perhaps they're beginning to see the cracks in what they thought was reality. It's an interesting thought."

Nabiki looked out the window for a while, thinking. There was something about all this that worried her. Eventually she spoke. "What happens to them if we get Minako and Usagi fixed?" All her friends looked at her, then each other.

"What do you mean, Nabiki?" her sister asked. She turned to look at her.

"What happens to Luna and Artemis? By the sound of it, they are sentient individuals in their own right, separate from Usagi and Minako, although they 'live' inside their heads. If Hnther even can cure either one of them, by the sounds of it, at the very least these splinter personalities will need to be... well, removed, or deleted, or whatever." She made a small gesture of uncertainty. "I don't know enough about it to even have the right words. But, the critical thing is, by the sound of it we'll be killing two minds, even if they're not completely people, in the sense of being independent creatures. That... bothers me."

Everyone went quiet for a while, exchanging somewhat uncomfortable glances. She could see on their faces that they'd all had similar thoughts. Eventually, Ranma sighed. "I was thinking much the same thing, I admit. I don't have an answer for you. Hnther might be able to give you one."

"It's possible it may be a sacrifice we have no choice about, sister," Kasumi said gently, looking very troubled. "When we bring either one of them back, even if the splinters really are becoming more self-aware of their situation, it's quite possible that the time device will reset them somehow. It seems likely that has been happening all along, which would explain why they've never shown this behaviour before."

"I'm not entirely sure that's the case, Kasumi," Misaki told her, also appearing thoughtful. "From what we saw before, both of them were getting advice they didn't like very much, Usagi more than Minako. I think it might be that the splinters were beginning to see something wasn't right some while ago."

"I don't see that we have any choice, in any case." Everyone looked at Tamiko as she spoke. "We have to deal with the situation somehow. All we can do is talk to Hnther and see if he has any better ideas, he undoubtedly knows more about all this sort of thing than we do."

"Pity we can't directly interact with the things," Fumiko added.

"We should be able to," the middle sister told her, thinking. "Since Ami, for example, has an SI, and can see and hear them, couldn't we get her to relay what she sees and hears to the rest of us?" Once more, everyone looked at her, this time with approval.

"Good idea, Nabs," Ranma replied, grinning as she rolled her eyes with a put-upon sigh, although she smiled a little. "Let's get Ami and Rei over here and see what they think."
"What about Hotaru?" Kasumi asked. He glanced at her for a moment.

"I'll call her, but I suspect she will want to catch up with Haruka still. We can link her in if there's anything she needs to know, and when we need her input."

"I don't intend to leave her out of anything. She's had too much of that in the past."

Kasumi studied him, looking amused. "You really do like that young woman, don't you, dear?"

"I do. She's a very interesting person with an awful lot of potential. When this is all over I'm very interested in seeing how far she can take it. And she's so excited by everything, which I find very funny."

"And she's so excited by everything, which I find very funny."

"The others all laughed.

Opening a link to Ami, still grinning, Nabiki said, "Hi, Ami. You up yet?"

"Hello, Nabiki. Yes, I just finished breakfast. What's up?"

"We've been going over the recordings of Usagi and Minako for the last few days. You guys need to see them, we think. Do you want to come over? Aiko can pick you both up."

"She had a quick conversation with the petite brunette. "In about ten minutes or so? Outside your building, down the side alley."

"OK. I'll just tell Mom I'm going out, but I'll be ready."

"Good. I'll call Rei and let her know as well. See you soon."

"Bye." The link went away, as she had a very similar conversation with Rei. Shortly afterwards, Aiko stood, then disappeared.

"Off again so soon?" Saeko asked her daughter, looking mildly amused. Ami glanced at her as she pulled the fridge door open, grabbing a couple of apples from the shelf inside.

"Yes. Sorry. Some friends of mine need to talk about a little problem they have that they think I can help with."

"Are you doing their homework again, dear?" her mother asked, smiling. Ami laughed, shaking her head.

"No, it's not quite like that. They just need my input while we try to work out the solution to an odd problem."

"The young woman sighed, running her hand through her hair, as her mother watched with hidden concern. She thought her daughter looked a little depressed although she was hiding it well.

"You know that if you ever need advice, you can talk to me at any time about anything, don't you, Ami?" she asked quietly. The younger woman looked at her, gratitude mixed with something deeper in her eyes.

"I do. Thanks, Mom. But this is something I need to do on my own."

Inspecting her, after a moment the elder Mizuno nodded. "All right. I won't pry. But if you need me, I'll be at work."

"Looking at her watch, she raised an eyebrow. "In fact, unless I go right now, I might be late."

"Taking her daughter by the shoulders, she looked at her face, then quickly hugged her. "I'm proud of you. I don't say that enough."
Slightly red-faced from embarrassment, Ami smiled. "Thanks again. I'll see you later." Picking up her jacket from where she'd hung it over the back of a chair, the young blue-haired woman waved to her mother and left the apartment. Saeko smiled to herself, grabbing her briefcase and putting on her own coat, before she followed, locking up as she left. She could hear her daughter taking the stairs ahead of her at an impressive rate, hoping she didn't trip. Leaving the building thirty seconds after the younger woman she headed to the Metro station, a bright rainbow flash of light down the alley that ran beside the apartment building catching her attention on the way.

'I wonder what that was?' she thought, stopping and peering down the alley, but not seeing anything. After a moment she shrugged, decided it was nothing important, then went about her business.

Feeling the unmistakable sensation of a portal opening somewhere very nearby, Minako put down the book she was reading and peered out of the tent. It was around midday on this barren world, mildly warm and well lit. Two hundred metres away she could see Yori and Ami walking towards her. She looked at the blue-haired woman with distaste, still not able to think of her as anything other than a betrayer. With some surprise she noticed that her former team-mate appeared to be wearing clothing obviously patterned on Yori's, in her signature colours, wondering what it meant. The implications were slightly disturbing.

"I would strongly suggest you cooperate with whatever they say, Minako," a quiet voice beside her said. She looked down at the white cat, then back at the approaching women.

"I think I have to," she replied, sighing gently. "I want to go home."

"Yori isn't your enemy unless you make her that, I believe," the cat added. "But I suspect you're going to hear a lot of things that you're not going to like." She stared at it for a moment. "Why do you say that?" The animal shrugged, which looked very odd, making her smile slightly.

"I'm not entirely sure," he told her. "But since we got here, I've been thinking. There are a lot of things that are wrong with the last few months, things I never really noticed before. I have a feeling that the people who can clear that up are out there. Don't let your feelings about Ami push you in the wrong direction. Listen to them."

After a few more seconds, she nodded, standing and slipping out of the tent. "OK." There was no answer and when she looked back, the cat was gone again. Briefly wondering where the damn thing had got to this time, she turned to greet the visitors, who were only a few metres away now. Yori's aura washed over her, but she could also sense Ami, who didn't quite feel the same as she had the last time she'd encountered her. The blonde stared at her former team-mate, who looked back with a level of confidence she couldn't remember seeing before, a small smile on her lips. Beside her, Yori looked calm and unreadable.

"Hello, Minako. I hope you're not too bored?" the martial artist asked politely. She shook her head.

"I can't say I've enjoyed this little break, but no, I'm all right, I guess." She looked beyond them to the portal hanging in the middle distance, the black-haired woman glancing over her shoulder at it, then returning her attention to her, looking mildly amused.

"I expect you'd like to go back, though."

"Yes. Very much."

Yori studied her for a moment, exchanging a glance with Ami. "You understand why it was
"Yes, I do. I've been thinking about that a lot. I can't work out why I listened to Usagi in the first place, to be honest, it was a damn stupid idea, even leaving aside who it was aimed at. She actually wanted to commit a fairly major crime, just to try and assassinate you." She sighed deeply. "I know it wouldn't have worked, now, but at the time, somehow, she convinced me it might. Even it it had that doesn't excuse the concept. I can't work out why we were so..." She struggled to find the right words. "So totally crazy. I'm beginning to realise we've been doing some very idiotic things for quite a while now, I think. But I have no idea why." She looked up, to see both Yori and her former team-mate watching her with similar expressions of mild surprise and some sadness.

"I'm genuinely surprised to hear you admit that, Minako, but also rather pleased about it. It means there may be hope for you yet." Yori glanced at her companion, who looked back without saying anything. "We still don't trust you, I'm afraid, not completely, but what you're saying goes some way towards rebuilding a certain amount of belief that you may be safe to release into the wild." She snickered as the blonde let out a snort of laughter, unable to help herself. "Usagi, on the other hand..."

"She's nuts. Completely crazy." The blonde woman sighed once more. "I don't like to say that, she's my best friend, but there's something very wrong with her. If you let her go, people are going to die. Probably a lot of them."

"That's pretty much the conclusion we came to," Yori agreed, seeming somewhat depressed about it. "There are a lot of things we need to talk about. Usagi is one of them. Will you listen to us?"

Glancing down, Minako noticed that Artemis was back, staring hard at her. He made a little gesture with his head. She nodded, still looking at him, before returning her gaze to the other two, seeing that Ami was inspecting the cat with a frown, while Yori was inspecting both of them with a similar expression. "Yes. I have nothing to lose, I guess. And I want to go home."

"Good. Come on, let's pack up that tent, it's a good one, then we can go and talk about it." The woman smiled slightly at her. "One thing, though. We're not going back immediately, we need to go somewhere else first. You'll meet a friend of mine, Hnther, he's a very good mage with a lot of expertise in mental magic. He's going to examine you. I want you to cooperate, please, and don't freak out when you see him."

"Why would I freak out?" she asked, slightly suspiciously. Ami snickered, next to Yori, causing Minako to give her an unfriendly look. She didn't trust the girl, her supposed team-mate, at all. Opening her mouth to make an acid response she closed it again when there was a faint feline cough from beside her left leg.

"He's a demon," Ami said, glancing at Yori, who sighed a little, but nodded. Minako stared at them both wide-eyed.

"A demon!? Why the hell do you want me to see a demon mage, for god's sake?"

"Because he's the best mind mage I know, he's familiar with the case and your history, and he's a friend of mine I trust." Yori glanced at Ami as the younger girl was apparently about to add to this, causing her to subside, yet still smile slightly malevolently.

"But... a demon?"

"Think of him more like an alien. 'Demon' has too many negative connotations," Yori advised.
"That's... not entirely helpful," Minako admitted, puzzled and wary.

The other woman looked mildly frustrated for a moment. "OK, I can sort of understand your problems, the history you girls have isn't helpful where inter-world travellers are concerned, I know, less so than most of the other girls in Minato in many ways. But trust me, he's a friend, on our side, and a nice guy." Minako kept staring at her, still unconvinced. "Most of the 'demons' who visit us are actually pretty peaceful, or at least they are up to the point someone starts shooting at them. You know how many visitors my area gets, right?" She nodded slowly.

"A lot more portals seem to be opening there than seems plausible," she replied, thinking back on it.

"Well, how many fights have Chou and I had there in the last year or so?" Yori grinned slightly. "Aside with other magical girls, I mean."

"Not that many that I've heard of," the blonde said after thinking about it for a few seconds.

"That's because pretty much all the visitors are either tourists, friends, or traders. Or any combination of the above." Yori grinned. "I know all sorts of people from some very odd places. Hnther is one of them, and one you really need to meet." She looked down at the cat, which peered up at her, a somewhat puzzled expression in its eyes, but after a moment nodded.

"Oh, hell, if it means I can go home, fine." Minako shrugged, giving in.

"That's the spirit," Yori snickered, patting her on the shoulder. "Let's pack up."

Ten minutes later, everything had been stowed away and the black-haired woman had made it vanish, causing Minako to stare slightly, as while she was familiar with subspace storage the sheer amount of stuff Yori had stashed away seemed rather unlikely based on her own experience. Chalking it up as just yet another of the weird tricks the woman seemed to produce on a regular basis she ignored it after a moment, following them as they retraced their steps to the portal. Stopping a couple of metres away from it she studied it, slightly nervously.

"It's perfectly safe," Ami said, smiling. "Look." She walked into the apparition without a second glance, vanishing with a slight crackling sound. Yori chuckled.

"She's right, it's fine. We do this all the time, portals are completely safe." After a moment she added, "What's on the other side, though..." Minako cast a panicked look at her, causing her to laugh for a moment. "Sorry. Couldn't resist." As the blonde glared, she laughed a little more, then made a gesture to the rip in space. "After you."

"You're a very weird person, Yori," Minako grated, turning to stare at the thing. Taking a deep breath, she closed her eyes and walked forward.

"Here you go, Sir." Agent Naito handed the Director-General a very thick file, along with a slightly thinner one, both stamped with Special Activities Office eyes only labels. "The report on the trip as a whole, along with all the photos that are relevant, then the asteroid encounter as a separate report with its photos as well." He flexed his hands slightly, wincing. "That was a hell of a lot of typing."

"I suspect it was worth it, though, Masao," the other man commented with a small smile, flipping through the first few pages of the report, then looking at more of the photos. "This will take some time to go through."

"The electronic version is on the secure server. The film is still being scanned, the technicians say..."
it will take at least another three days to do it all." Nodding, Naito's superior indicated the chair in front of the desk, which the agent sat in. Closing the first report and quickly leafing through the one on the asteroid, the man finally closed that as well, stacking it on the other one, then leaned back with a sigh.

"We got very lucky there, didn't we?"

"I think so. It still gives me the shivers, to think what might have happened." Naito shook his head slowly. "It would have been bad."

"To put it mildly." The Director-General swivelled his chair around, looking out the window at the Tokyo scene in front of him, towards the harbour, then shuddered a little. "They all gained some serious points with that. So did you." Turning around to look at his agent, he smiled again at the expression on his face. "There are a number of people higher in the government than me who are quietly but sincerely grateful for all the effort you've put in on all this magical girl stuff over the last year or so. It will undoubtedly bode well for your future career." He laughed a little. "It's always a good thing to have people in high places thinking they owe you a favour."

Naito looked rather surprised. "I'm not sure I really did anything, sir, it's mainly the girls. I'm just along to document everything that happens and act as a buffer between them and the local government."

"And to keep a lid on it in case anything untoward happened. Yori listens to you, so does Chou. They all seem to have considerable respect for you, from what I can see."

"There's a reason Yori asked for you particularly to go with them on this operation. You have their trust, something that's not easy to gain. People upstairs feel this is, overall, good."

Studying him for a long few seconds, Naito slowly said, "I hope none of these people upstairs have any thoughts along the lines of trying to get me to use that trust to persuade Yori to do something she doesn't want to do. I'm telling you now, sir, I don't think that would end well, leaving my personal feelings out of it."

The other man shook his head, looking amused. "I have to admit there were one or two politicians that made noises along that general idea when we met last night to discuss this affair. I expressed my own extremely strong reservations about abusing the relationship the PSIA in general and you in particular have built up with the magical girls in that way, not least because I have no doubt at all they'd see right through it immediately. There were a fair number of other voices expressing the same sentiments, some of them from places you wouldn't believe. One or two from places that don't, technically, exist." Naito looked curious, but his superior didn't expand on that. "On the whole it was thought to be a very bad idea. In the end everyone dropped it, with a certain amount of implications along the lines of anyone trying anything like that would be looking for a new job. And possibly his head. The prohibition on interfering with the magical girls was explained very carefully to the dissenting voices, yet again, as was the fact that it is non-negotiable." He snickered, shaking his head again, this time in amusement.

"There were a couple of people who looked annoyed. I think they may have had rather grandiose ideas about what they could do with a tame magical girl under their thumb."

Laughing, Naito stared at the Director-General. "Tame? The magical girls, all of them, are anything but tame. You'd lose your thumb at the least."

"Indeed. Much like being on good terms with a tiger. It will let you feed it, but it's not a good idea to presume to stroke the thing, especially if it warns you off. That won't end well at all, as you say." Both of them chuckled. "On a more serious note, the concept of trade with these demon worlds in general, and this idea of importing fusion reactors specifically, has been discussed with considerable interest. There were a few voices saying it might be some sort of trick, on the basis you can't trust demons further than you can throw them, but most people think it's something we have no choice but to do. The trade is already happening, it's going to continue one way or another, so it might as well be under the blessings of the government. That way we have at least a chance of keeping enough control over it to prevent anything unpleasant happening." He sighed slightly.

"It's getting very complicated very quickly. The whole Minato situation used to be a necessary but fairly low-key part of life, but suddenly it seems to be heading towards being one of the most important parts of the country, from a financial, law enforcement, and foreign affairs standpoint, amongst other things."

"I doubt it would stop even if the government told it to," Naito quipped. His superior gave him a look.

"No, I also think that. It's not like we've ever had any real chance of dealing with the demon incursions aside from letting the various girls get on with it. For a long time, at least as far as most people were concerned, that was the only truth to it. But suddenly it seems to be becoming a lot more than that, remarkably fast."

"People in Minato in general have always tended to accept a certain number of demons wandering about as long as they minded their own business and didn't break anything," Naito mused. "I've looked at the records, they go back quite a way. It was all very low-key and discreet but it's obvious that at least a few traders have been selling coffee and chocolate to some very out of town purchasers for decades. Extremely quietly, but consistently. The magical girls tended to jump up and down on it on occasion, but it kept on happening even so. From what Yori told me, the business between the magical world and the demons has been going on for much longer. They were usually well disguised although that's not always the case nowadays."

"True enough. But until the last five or six years that was about it, other than invasions and the like. Since Yori and Chou turned up their particular district has become an absolute hot-bed of demon activity even as the number of untoward events plummeted. I went for a walk around there yesterday, just out of curiosity, and I saw at least a dozen demons of various types wandering about the place without a care in the world. People were talking to them as if they were neighbours." He looked mildly shocked, while Naito grinned.

"I went into a coffee shop, there were about five of them in there, drinking gallons of the stuff. The man who seemed to own the shop had a stack of gold in front of him like something out of a pirate film. Absolutely amazing. And it's spreading. There have been a number of reports of people selling various demons various things across Minato, mostly fairly close to that area, but not always." He shook his head in disbelief, although he was smiling a bit. "It's all very odd. It's starting to get noticed in some very interesting places, aside from the national tax agency, who have been going quietly nuts trying to work out what's going on for a while now."

The agent laughed slightly. "Yes, I remember you said that before I went on this last operation."

"The Ministry of Finance is still trying to work out how to organise things. They seem quite keen on it, it looks like a fairly good source of revenue for the country. This latest information really made them sit up." The Director-General smiled at a memory. "They were asking questions about whether we knew of any magical girls or mages with a financial background, to give them some expert advice."

"I'll ask around," Naito suggested. "It's entirely possible that Azumi would know someone, she obviously has a good handle on that sort of thing herself. Between them, she and Uthryyl seem to be working out most of the problems involved in importing exotic alien technology and exporting trade goods. I still think the best thing to do would be to let them get on with it, giving them any help required. It seems likely that over time they'd probably sort out most of the problems that might arise."

"I suspect that will be what happens in the end." Steepling his fingertips with his elbows on his desk, the Director-General inspected his agent. "The preliminary thinking on the fusion reactor plan is very positive. There are obviously a large number of practical concerns that will need to be addressed but there's no denying that we'd be fools not to go ahead with it. In one stroke we could end our dependence on fossil fuels, fission reactors, you name it. The knock-on effects of low cost, reliable, non-polluting energy are... simply staggering. You said that Azumi thought she could acquire an evaluation unit without too much difficulty?"

Naito nodded. "Yes, that was mentioned. Apparently they're not all that large if you go for the smallest size, the ten megawatt class units. About a two metre cube. I saw some in the warehouse on K'nn Four, Ami pointed them out. Azumi said she could get one without any trouble, and fuel for it. More details are in the report."

"Good. I've been asked to proceed with that, as soon as possible. When you next have contact with her, can you ask her to arrange it, please?"

"Of course."

"The Special Activities Office will have control of evaluation of the thing at the beginning, as trade with alien worlds falls more under our remit than anyone else's right now." The man behind the desk shook his head, looking slightly stunned. "And I can't believe I just said that."

"It's a lot to think about, sir," Naito replied, smiling.

"That it is. Anyway, we get to play with it for a while, then the thought was to bring in a representative from one of the energy production companies and some other people to investigate it, see how easy it is to use for our requirements, that sort of thing. Once everyone is happy it does what it's supposed to do, we need to work out the next step. Presumably there would be a case for a number of very large units, replacing generating capacity that's currently supplied by power stations, as it would be easier to integrate them into our power distribution system that way. But there would probably be a lot of uses for smaller ones as well."

"It's rather beyond my knowledge, sir, but that sounds plausible." Naito shrugged. "Again, Azumi and Uthryyl seem to be doing the relevant research. We'll definitely need to talk to them."

"That's becoming very obvious." The Director-General smiled. "I'm looking forward to meeting this Uthryyl, he sounds like an interesting person."

"Yori seems to trust him implicitly, which speaks volumes about his character, certainly," the agent agreed. "I'd like to meet him as well."

Picking up the first folder his superior looked at it, opening it to flip through the photos again. "I think we're going to have a lot of work soon, Masao. For the foreseeable future I expect we'll be the liaison between the rest of the government and the magical world, as we have been up until now, but with the additional responsibility of coordinating alien trade. I would think that eventually there will probably be a separate department set up specifically to deal with that sort of thing but for now it's us as the only ones with any form of experience in this matter." He smiled briefly. "It's going to be interesting, at least."
"It always is, sir. I feel I may have the best job in the world." Naito snickered as the other man grinned.

"Job satisfaction is important." He indicated the folders. "Thank you for these. I'll read them fully, if I have any questions I'll let you know."

"Certainly, sir. You know where to find me." Rising, Naito headed for the door, as behind him the Director-General began at the start of the main report, reading it carefully, referring to the photos as necessary.

"Wow." Minako looked down to see Artemis staring around, seemingly rather impressed and a little awed. She inspected the cat, once more wondering how it managed to follow so quietly, then dismissed the thought, raising her eyes to look at the scenery of the new place she found herself, as she felt the portal that had brought them here dissipate with a faint pop. The sun was bright orange, unlike the blue-white of the dead world, and this world was anything but dead.

Vivid green and yellow foliage surrounded the large enclosed yard they were standing in, a two story, quite large building with subtly odd proportions to one side, twenty metres away. In front of them, a couple of hundred metres distant past the wall which was about a metre high, was a small lake, which had a number of boats moving slowly about on it, propelled by brightly-coloured sails. She could see that the people in them weren't all human, being more reminescent of some sort of huge lizard, from what she could make out. Faint cries came on the wind, sounding eerily like people from home enjoying themselves.

Off to the left was a road of some type, along which a small number of vehicles were silently passing. She noted with amazement that they weren't touching the surface at all and had no wheels. After thirty seconds or so, she slowly turned to look at Yori and Ami, who were watching her with amused expressions.

"This isn't quite what I expected," she admitted.

Yori grinned as Ami snickered. "Not enough demons and hellish scenes?"

"No." She stared around some more, stunned. "It looks... peaceful."

"It's a nice place. We'll show you around later. Come inside, the others are waiting for us." After a moment she followed as the other two headed for the building, sliding the door open and waiting for her to join them. Inside, Yori led the way down a corridor to the rear of the building, into a large room with various items of equipment around it, none of which she recognised at all, and three figures. Rei was one, while the remaining ones were a medium-height silver-haired girl with odd orange eyes and a tall definitely not-at-all human being, who she presumed was the demon mage she was here to see. The girl was talking to him in a low voice, but stopped when they entered, both of them turning to inspect her curiously.

"Minako, this is Azumi, a friend and colleague, you might have heard of her," Yori commented, motioning to the silver-haired woman, who nodded politely. "You know Rei, of course."

"I do," she said frostily. Rei looked mildly hurt at the tone in her voice but seemed to get over it quickly. She walked over to stand beside Ami, who looked at her and shrugged a little, still smiling slightly.

Yori watched, an eyebrow raised a bit, but didn't mention it. "This is Hnther," she added, indicating the demon, who inspected her curiously. She looked back nervously, her fingers twitching slightly.
as she fought the impulse to attack, an impulse deeply engrained after years of magical girl combat. The mage said something to Azumi in a very odd sounding language, causing the silver-haired woman to smile a little, then approached her. She recoiled a little, unable to suppress the instinctive reaction, before straightening up and pretending she was all right. "Don't worry, Minako, he really is a friend and a damn good mage. We're trying to help," Yori said beside her in a low voice. She nodded, her heart rate higher than normal, but said nothing.

Stopping a metre and a half away, Hnther looked her up and down, then made a very small bow, saying something in a deep voice. Slightly behind and to one side, Azumi translated.

"It's nice to meet you, Minako. Allow me to offer my sympathies for what had been done to you and my apologies for any distress this is causing. Please believe I only have your best interests in mind." Minako stared at him for a moment, then glanced at Azumi, who smiled a little at her.

"Ah, thank you, I think," she managed, hearing Azumi translating her words back to the mage, who smiled in a manner than made her take a breath and pale a little. There were a lot of teeth.

"Don't worry. Come over here and sit down. I would like to examine you, which will take some time, but it will cause no distress, I assure you. You may not even feel anything." She looked at him, then down at Artemis, who peered up at her, looking uncertain himself, but nodded silently. When she raised her eyes she saw Azumi and Hnther were looking at her in much the same way that Yori had on the other world, making her wonder why. After a second or two she nodded shakily and followed the mage to the other side of the room, taking a seat on the somewhat oddly-shaped but surprisingly comfortable chair he motioned to. She distinctly felt it move a little, forming itself into a better fit to her, which caused her to make a small sound of surprise, which seemed to amuse him.

"Would you like a cup of coffee?" he asked through Azumi. She looked at him in surprise, then across at Yori, who was grinning.

"Um, yes, thank you, I would." He looked at the martial artist who nodded and left the room.

"Right. This first examination is to establish a baseline for your current mental state," he continued, picking up a few unrecognisable instruments and manipulating them, before returning all but one to the table at his elbow. "I appreciate that you're somewhat confused about everything, as you haven't been told the whole story yet, but I think I need to get these measurements done first. When we're finished Yori will explain the situation to you fully." He looked into her eyes, his alien gaze surprisingly sympathetic. "I'm afraid that you're going to have some difficulty accepting parts of it. That is understandable, but the story is true, as disconcerting as it will be."

Not at all sure what he meant, all she could do was nod. For some reason, despite never having met him before, she was coming to the conclusion that he really did have her best interests at heart. She found this oddly more worrying than comforting.

"Please lie back and relax, as much as you can. I would suggest that you close your eyes. I doubt you'll feel much, but you may have slight visual disorientation during part of the examination. That's normal and nothing to be worried about." Sighing gently she followed his instructions, flinching only slightly when she felt his warm fingers on her head, the texture of the tiny scales odd against her skin. He fell silent, only occasionally saying something to Azumi, who answered every now and then but didn't translate.

Minako felt something probing around inside her head in a way that defied any normal explanation, painlessly but in a slightly disconcerting manner. It went on for about a quarter of an hour before he finally sat back in his own chair, sighing in a very human-like manner. "Thank you. I'm finished for the moment." She opened her eyes and looked around, finding a steaming mug of coffee beside her on the table. Yori, who was standing a couple of metres away apparently watching with interest, indicated a small pot next to the cup.

"That's a sweetener a little like honey if you want it. It's pretty good."

"Thanks." Trying the coffee, she added some of the deep red crystals in the pot to it, finding it made the drink very nice. "Hey, that's not bad."

"Told you," Yori grinned, making her laugh.

Hnther got up and walked over to Yori, Azumi following him, the three of them having a discussion in low voices for a few minutes, while she waited, listening and watching, wondering what they were talking about. Rei and Ami were sitting at the other table in the room, on the other side, apparently also listening, and if what she could see on their faces was any hint, somehow understanding the alien language. She wondered how they managed that. Eventually, the discussion ended, Yori approaching her.

The young woman sat next to her in the chair that Hnther had vacated, studying her closely.

"What?" she asked, a bit worried.

The other woman sighed, glancing over at Ami and Rei, both of whom shrugged as if they'd been asked a question. Turning back to her, the black-haired martial artist said, "I have a story to tell you. You're probably not going to like it very much. But, it's true, and I can show you evidence to prove it."

After a long moment, Minako took a deep breath, put her mug down, and nodded.

"Tell me."

Yori began the explanation.
Chapter 84

Soon, there is going to be an earth-shattering kaboom...

Watching as Hotaru gesticulated wildly, explaining yet another part of her adventure with Yori and her crew of lunatics on the other side of a portal, Haruka smiled. She was feeling a lot better since the girl had returned, although still not entirely happy about the situation, but she felt she might finally be getting a handle on it. Yori's proof of the falsehood they'd all been working under for years had, oddly enough, somehow made it easier to deal with. She still wasn't even close to happy about it, of course, and would have much preferred to have either never found out, or found out without all the attendant destruction, but all in all it could have been worse.

While she regretted the loss of their close-knit team, even she was prepared to admit that in many ways the only reason they'd even held together as long as they did was the shared story they were part of. Several of their members had personality conflicts with other members, for various reasons, a category she was honest enough to put herself in. It was a pity the break-up had been so acrimonious but the one good thing was that no one else had been killed. ‘Thanks to Fumiko and Tamiko,’ she thought reluctantly, ‘Then Yori and the others. We certainly had no real thought of the harm we were creating.’ It made her somewhat nauseous to think of what could have happened.

It seemed unlikely to her that they could ever resume the arrangement they'd had before, no matter how effective this supposed alien therapy that Yori had mentioned was. She definitely didn't trust either Rei or Ami, for reasons she simply couldn't articulate but still felt strongly about, Makoto obviously hated her to the point of homicide, an action she would probably reciprocate if it wasn't for the terrifyingly effective warning the martial artist had given her, something that still made her shiver to recall, and she had a lot of problems with the rest of them. Except for Hotaru, who she still loved dearly. It was difficult for her to understand how Michiru, the love of her life, once, could possibly not still love the girl, even if they'd had a falling-out between themselves.

For a day or so after the great mall destruction she had thought there might be hope of reconciliation, but it became very obvious quite fast that this simply wasn't going to happen. Michiru was totally paranoid about all sorts of weird things, completely convinced that everyone else, with the sole exception of Setsuna, was out to get her, and appeared to have been trying to convince Haruka of this. When she wasn't easily swayed, she immediately became suspect as well in her lover's eyes.

Shaking her head sadly, she picked up the coffee-pot and refilled her cup, closing her eyes for a moment in remembered pain as she held the warm cup in both hands. As much as she didn't like to believe it, there was far too much evidence to suggest that there was no way her girlfriend was ever going to trust her again. And, if she was honest with herself, the reverse was true. ‘Perhaps this therapy will help her, I guess,’ she mused, hopefully. ‘At least enough so she can live a happier life. She didn't look well the last time I saw her.’ Despite everything she didn't want the other woman to have a bad time, or worse, do something sufficiently serious that Yori and her friends got involved. That would be the end as far as she could tell.

"Are you all right?" a familiar voice asked, making her twitch slightly, sloshing coffee onto the table, and open her eyes, looking up to see Hotaru peering at her from a short distance away with worry on her face. She smiled a little tiredly and nodded.

"I am, dear, don't worry. I was just thinking about everything that's happened recently. It's a lot to take in. Even with the proof that your trip brought back and Yori showed me yesterday, I still have trouble just throwing away nearly six years of beliefs."

Sitting next to her, Hotaru nodded slowly, drawing little patterns on the table with her finger in the small puddle of spilled coffee. "I can understand that. I think I've had longer to get used to it but it still makes me very sad. And very angry. Both about what was done to us and to the way the others have reacted. But, Chou told me that I can't really blame them, it's not their fault. I guess she's right even though it's difficult."

"She's an intelligent and perceptive woman, even if we've never seen eye to eye on a lot of things, I think," Haruka admitted, being honest about it. Her daughter smiled a little, still staring at the table. "So is Yori, as mad as she is." Snickering slightly, Hotaru looked up.

"That would probably amuse her quite a lot. She has a weird sense of humour."

"Which one? Yori or Chou?" Haruka smiled more openly.

Hotaru shrugged, grinning. "Both of them, really, but differently. Aiko and the other as well. They all seem to find the funny side of everything whenever they can. It's really cool being around them, and a lot of fun. You wouldn't believe some of the things they can do." She laughed again. "Or the places we've been. Aiko's teleporting is incredible. I wish I could do that. Did you know they regularly go to other countries just for a meal? It's amazing."

Staring at her for a moment, Haruka shook her head. "No, I didn't know that. It sounds... slightly odd." Her daughter giggled.

"It is, but so much fun. You should ask Aiko to take you to Brisbane for sushi sometime, it's really good. And she says this place in New York does the best pizzas in the world as well." The girl looked thoughtful. "I'd like to try that. Maybe we could all go next week sometime."

Not entirely sure if the young woman was being serious, as she had a remarkably good poker face for someone her age, Haruka just sighed slightly. "They're apparently a bad influence on you."

The younger woman studied her for a moment, her face blank. "Do you really think that?" she asked in a voice that made it clear she wasn't entirely happy about the thought but was keen to know the answer. Haruka began to answer a little flippantly, but caught herself and thought for a moment, taking the question seriously, as apparently her daughter was.

Eventually, she shook her head with another small sigh. "No. As much as I'd like to say yes, in all honesty I can't. I don't really like her, I'll admit that, we've had a lot of differences with her and her friends, but... I think she really does have everyone's best interests at heart. Annoyingly. I'd love to be able to dismiss her as crazy, which, by the way, she definitely is." This made Hotaru smile, "But she's also right. I don't know that we'll ever be friends but if you want to be, I won't stand in your way. I can at least respect her knowledge and abilities, as well as her goals."

The purple-haired girl leaned sideways in her chair and hugged her, resting her head on Haruka's shoulder for a moment. "Thank you. I'd like you to like her, and Ami and Rei as well, but even if you can't, thank you."

"You're welcome, dear," her parent said, stroking her hair. They were quiet for a while. "I don't know if I can ever accept Ami and Rei again, or they, me, but I suppose I can at least be polite to them. For you."

Pulling back, the girl nodded, still looking unhappy. "I wish you could like them again. They didn't do anything wrong. All they've ever wanted is for all this to go away so we could be friends again."
"It's not that easy, I'm afraid, Hotaru." The blonde stared at her daughter, trying to explain. "I know, intellectually, that they were both right. There's too much evidence for me to deny that. But in my heart, I have a strong feeling of betrayal and mistrust, something I just can't get over. Whether I ever can, I don't know, but I promise you I'll try. But even if I can, it will take a long time before I can do more than try to be nice as long as they're not around too much."

Hotaru release her after a moment with a small nod, one that said she wasn't pleased but was willing to let it go for the moment. "Thanks." Staring at the table again, she went back to stirring the spilled coffee. Haruka got up and retrieved a damn cloth, wiping the table, then handed it to her daughter who took it and cleaned her fingers. "What are you going to do?" the girl asked, handing it back. "I mean, about life?" She looked around at the hotel room, then back at her parent. "It's a nice hotel but we can't live here forever, can we?"

Tossing the cloth back into the sink the blonde looked around at the small suite they had. "No, I guess not. It's a bit expensive. I should probably look for a decent apartment soon, it would be cheaper long term than this place, although it is quite nice here. I can afford it but I don't want to waste the money." She shrugged a little. "Up until recently I just couldn't seem to care, but I've been feeling better for a few days now, so I suppose it's time to try and get our lives back on track. You'll be going back to school soon anyway." There was a pause, then she sighed. "And I need to get another car. I really liked my old one, but it was so badly damaged when I..."

"...Jumped out of it when you were driving and tried to kill Makoto?" Hotaru completed, with a small smile that had a certain amount of mischievousness in it.

"Well, yes." Haruka felt embarrassed. Her daughter laughed.

"Does the insurance cover getting out of the vehicle while it's moving?" she asked. The blonde gave her a hard look although internally she was rather amused in an annoyed sort of way.

"Not in so many words, but we came to an arrangement. It's just that I spent a lot of time on that car, it wasn't exactly original equipment. It's a write-off and while I can get another one it will take weeks to bring it up to scratch."

"You should talk to Misaki about that. She's really into mechanical things and knows a lot about cars," Hotaru suggested. "She knows a lot of people who are into driving, she might even know where to get a good car at a decent price." Haruka looked uncertain.

"I'm not sure she'd..."

"She'd help, happily, I'm sure," her daughter said firmly. "I know she doesn't say much of the time but she's really nice. I'll mention it the next time I see her if you want."

Sitting down again having refilled her cup, Haruka nodded after a few seconds. "All right, dear. If you think she'd help, why not." Watching the girl, she added, "I'm not sure about the magical girl thing at the moment, I have to admit. Yori is right, it's not likely to leave us alone, but for the moment, I'm not planning on going and looking for trouble. I'm sure it will turn up all on it's own sooner or later. That's normally what happens." Taking a sip, she mulled her words over for a bit as Hotaru simply waited. "To be honest, I could do with a break for a while."

"Are you going to take Yori up on the therapy offer?" the purple-haired girl asked, sounding calmly curious. Her female father thought about the question for half a minute, before finally nodding slowly.

"I think I will. I don't like the thought that there's something wrong with me, but I can't argue with the evidence. The others certainly have various problems, certainly. Makoto was being very aggressive, much more than normal, when I saw her last, Setsuna seems to have lost it completely, the less said about poor old Usagi the better..." She shrugged, putting her cup down, then staring at it before raising her eyes to meet those of her daughter. "I don't feel crazy, but I can't deny I do feel very depressed about everything. It's been a struggle to get out of bed in the mornings and there's a sort of constant feeling of 'What's the point?' all the time. Since I saw Makoto the last time, for some reason, it's not quite as bad, but I don't know why. Even so, I still feel... I don't know, it's difficult to describe. Not like myself, certainly. If these demon therapists can help with that, I'd be stupid not to at least let them try."

There was silence in the room for a while after she stopped talking, Hotaru apparently just thinking about what her parent had said and Haruka going over her own words in her head. Eventually the girl offered, "You'll like Hnther. He's a bit different looking, but he's a really nice guy."

"I remember him from the temple. Rei's grandfather seemed to like him, certainly, and the other one as well."

"Lldmrk. He's really nice too. And funny, he knows some really amusing jokes." Hotaru grinned. "I know he looks like a walking, talking, giant crow, but he's a lot of fun to talk to."

Staring at her for a moment, Haruka smiled, chuckling slightly. "You're a lot more accepting than most people in our line of work would be."

"It took me by surprise at first," Hotaru admitted easily, "but everyone was so nice about it I figured out very quickly that they weren't our enemies. The trip to the moon, and K'n'n Four, showed they were totally right as well. Everything since then has just added to it."

Nodding as she listened, the blonde smiled again. "You seem to be much happier than you were, even before all this started, dear. I'm very pleased to see that. You've been quite withdrawn for quite a while. I was getting worried."

"I've found out some horrible things about the lies we've been told," the girl said after a moment, looking down at her hands, obviously thinking things through, "and seen people I looked up to do some stupid things that nearly killed a lot of people. But I've also learned things about myself that make me feel... more certain of myself, I guess?" She looked up, smiling a little. "I've made a lot of new friends, ones who just accept who I am and what I can do, without any judging or fear. Yori thinks my healing ability is something to be proud of. Hardly anyone has ever done that. We talked about it a lot. Her own healing abilities make mine look like nothing, so do Chou's, but they both want to teach me. I'd do almost anything to be as good at it as they are. They help so many people, without any questions."

Smiling to herself, Hotaru added, "Yori told me that healing was the best thing anyone could do. Violence and killing was easy, healing was much more difficult but much more rewarding. I could see in her eyes she completely believes that. They all do. I think they're right."

Finishing her coffee, Haruka got up and rinsed the cup out, putting it upside own beside the sink to dry, then turned back to her daughter, leaning against the sink. She studied the girl for a few seconds. "She may well be right," she finally admitted. "If you want to learn how to do that sort of thing, I'd be proud for you to do so." Hotaru beamed at her. "What else are they going to teach you?"

"All sorts of things. Some of them I can't really talk about at the moment. Hopefully I can one day. But there are a lot of interesting techniques that they know. I'm going to learn everything I can."
"Leave time for school in all that," Haruka chuckled. "You go back in about two weeks." After a moment she asked curiously, "Do you intend to keep on with all the magical girl things? I'd assume from what you said earlier that the answer is yes."

"I think so." Hotaru looked thoughtfully at the older woman. "We may not be fighting the enemies of the Moon Kingdom or any of that crap, but there are still things that sometimes cause a lot of problems. I can't just sit around and let them happen. Ami and Rei are going to go on, they asked me if I want to help." She seemed slightly uncertain for a moment. "I'm going to tell them yes, unless you don't want me to."

Haruka sighed a little, walking over to the girl and putting her hand on her shoulder. "Like I said, I don't want to be around them, now or probably for quite a while, if ever, but I won't stop you doing what you think is the right thing. Just be careful."

Putting her own hand over her adoptive father's, the young woman smiled. "I will." Jumping to her feet, she said, sounding excited, "Oh! I haven't showed you this yet. Look what Chou did for me."

Stepping back she posed in the middle of the room, there was a burst of familiar magic, and she was suddenly wearing different clothing, but not the outfit Haruka expected. The older woman stared for a moment, surprised.

"That's... a different look, certainly," she managed after a few seconds, looking her daughter up and down. The girl looked down at herself, grinning.

"Isn't it? I really like it. The other thing has bad memories attached to it. Chou made this for me, it's based on what they wear, obviously, but she customised it for me the way I wanted it." Turning around slowly, the purple-haired girl looked delighted. "You should ask her for something else as well. The old uniforms attract the wrong sort of attention these days." Stopping again facing Haruka, she looked at her, pleased. "What do you think?"

After a second or two, Haruka smiled. "If it makes you happy, dear, I'm all for it. At least it's not something like Aiko and her team used to wear. That was a little... excessive." Laughing, Hotaru nodded, remembering the old uniform her friends were stuck with.

"They didn't like those clothes very much from what they said. Except Tamiko, and even then only in the summer. Aiko said it was a little cold in the winter, especially when it's as bad as the last one was."

"Yes, I can well imagine." Haruka shivered unconsciously, picturing the amount of skin the other team had left exposed. "Ours were bad enough." She studied the young girl for a while, before shaking her head. "Things have certainly changed." A thought struck her and she added, "How did you do that, anyway? You didn't use the transformation rod, or the key phrase either."

"Don't need to any more," Hotaru replied happily, looking at her gloves, feeling the left one with the right. "Ami showed me how to access the magic directly. Yori worked it out and taught her and Rei."

"Of course she did," Haruka sighed. "That woman is..." Hotaru giggled.

"Would you like me to show you how to do it?" the girl asked slyly. There was a long pause, followed by a resigned laugh.

"Yes, please."
eyes away and glanced around the room. Everyone was watching her with interest and sympathy, even, or possibly especially, her former team-mates. Looking back at the martial artist, she said, "You have to be fucking kidding me."

"Sorry. It's all true." The blonde leaned back in her chair, resting her head on the back, staring at the ceiling. After a moment she repeated the sentence in a low voice. Eventually, lifting her head, she met the purple gaze of the other woman.

"You said you had proof?"

Yori glanced at Ami, who produced a small device from somewhere, getting up and handing it to Yori, along with a small crystalline cube, then returning to sit next to Rei, not saying anything. Putting it on the table next to them the woman dropped the crystal into a recess on top of the device as Minako watched curiously, tapping the thing in a couple of places with her finger. A series of beeps sounded, then something remarkable happened.

After another long pause, Minako tore her eyes from the perfect model of the Moon which was slowly rotating in the middle of the room, to look at Yori, who was grinning a little. "Um, wow? That's... quite impressive."

"Good, isn't it? This is a projector from K'nn Four, with a data crystal loaded with all the data we got from scanning the Moon." The blonde thought back to the story she'd been told. The idea that Yori and her friends had borrowed an alien spaceship and crew from another reality then visited the moon with it was pretty damn weird, but oddly enough not the most unbelievable part of what she'd heard. She snickered a bit. It seemed almost the sort of thing she'd have expected from Yori. She was at the point of deciding there probably wasn't anything you shouldn't put past the crazy woman.

The image changed, coloured points appearing on it. "Those are all the places we found that had any technology or other non-natural things. No magic, nothing older than about the late fifties, all of it known space probes from Earth. No magic, no ruins of some fantastic magical kingdom, no hidden or shielded buildings, nothing. Sorry." Yori looked at her with an expression that clearly showed she was telling the truth and genuinely did feel bad for her.

"I've been over the data very carefully myself, Minako, there really is nothing there that we didn't put there," Ami commented from the other side of the room, sounding tired. "Everything you've heard, everything we were told and believed, is a lie. It's all the fault of that damn time machine."

Glancing at her for a moment, Minako went back to watching the replica Moon spin gently in the middle of the room, little glittering points in different colours dotted about its surface. No one spoke. After a minute or so she got up, walked closer, then studied it some more. Reaching out idly she waved her hand through the projection, dazedly amused by the way it reacted, although she felt nothing. "It's all just a story?" she asked plaintively.

"Yes."

"An alien time machine has been fiddling around for god knows how long, just to get the nine of us to somehow make our reality into a second-rate copy of its own, which it killed in the first place?"

"Yes."

"All my friends, and me as well, have basically been driven mad by that damn thing?"

"Yes."
"We're just normal magical girls, not reincarnated warriors from prehistory?"

"Yes."

"Oh."

She felt Yori come up beside her as she tried to think of something else to ask, numbly going back over what she'd heard in the last hour or so. "To qualify that last point, you're hardly 'normal magical girls', even if there is such a thing, you're right at the upper levels of ability, in theory at least. But yes, essentially everything you've said is correct." Looking to her side she saw the other woman was also staring at the projection, a small frown on her face. "It was and is a horrible thing that's happened to you guys, but it can't be changed. We just have to figure out a way to deal with the aftermath of it all. After killing the damn thing first, of course."

Turning away from the image hanging in the air, she looked around. Ami and Rei were watching her looking calm but regretful. Azumi was sitting next to Hnther, both of them studying her with remarkably similar expressions despite the totally different physiology, expressions that were sympathetic yet still analytical. Her eyes moved on, to stop on the figure of Artemis, who was sitting on the table next to the projector, staring at the projection with his pupils so wide it looked like he was in the dark, his ears laid back. He looked stunned.

"This explains... quite a lot," he muttered. She watched him curiously.

"In what way?" The question came from Ami. The cat glanced at her, then went back to watching the image gently rotate.

"Too many things haven't made any sense for a long time," he eventually replied. "Nothing either Luna or I knew, absolutely knew, to be true, were happening. Neither one of us could work it out."

There was a long pause. "Weirdly enough, knowing it's all completely fake is actually something of a comfort. I was beginning to think I was going as mad as the girls were." He laughed in a low voice, shaking his head. "I probably still am, but not in the way I thought I was."

Minako kept looking at him as he fell silent, then looked around. Ami and Rei were looking at the cat, everyone else was watching her. Hnther seemed intrigued while Azumi and Yori were apparently thinking hard. Their expressions suggested there was still something odd happening.

"There's something more that you haven't told us yet, isn't there?" she asked, suddenly certain. Artemis looked at her when she spoke, as did the rest.

"I have a feeling it's something I'm not going to like," he said, sighing.

"What do you mean?"

"I'm not sure, but I'm getting some very unpleasant ideas." Raising an eyebrow, Minako stared at him for a moment, then turned to Yori.

"Is he right?" The woman looked to Ami and Rei for a moment, then nodded, as if she'd heard something that confirmed an idea she'd had.

"Afraid so. It's... a bit awkward." There was a growing sensation of worry gnawing at her stomach, in a completely different way than the story so far had produced. Azumi was talking quietly to Hnther, who nodded a couple of times. Glancing at them, she wondered what it was about, then went back to Yori.

"Awkward, how?"
Yori studied her for a moment, glanced at the table on which the cat was listening and watching, then looked back. "Do me a favour. Go over and stroke Artemis' head for a second." She stared at the young woman for a long few seconds, before turning to the cat, who was looking puzzled, yet oddly worried at the same time.

"Um, sure." Walking over she looked down at him, the animal peering up at her, a curious expression in his eyes. She reached out.

There was a very long pause.

"What the fuck?" The exclamation came from both woman and cat. They stared at each other, then simultaneously looked at Yori, who scowled, glancing at Azumi and Hnther, who were looking interested. Ami, behind them, sighed gently and regretfully.

"Damn. That proves it beyond doubt. He was right." The martial artist closed her eyes for a moment, shaking her head slowly, then opened them again, compassion showing. "Sorry about this."

Looking around, coughing in the dusty air, Ryoga inspected his surroundings, noticing a very faint scent of smoke. The low ceiling, exposed wooden beams, near darkness, and general clutter suggested he was in an attic or roof space of some sort. It was very hot and dry, not to mention festooned with remarkably large spiderwebs. "Where the hell am I now?" he mumbled, resignedly, thinking it was his catchphrase. He'd turned the corner of the corridor leading to the rest-room at the café in Kyoto he'd just had a meal at, gone through a door he could have sworn wasn't one he'd come through to get there, then found himself in here. "Damn building has more corridors and rooms than seems reasonable," he muttered, looking around for the door he'd come through.

Moving around slowly and awkwardly in the dimness he tripped over a box, swearing as he fell through a spiderweb, which went over his face with a very unpleasant sensation. He didn't like spiders at all. Quickly wiping it away with a shudder, he got up and kept looking. A sound at the threshold of hearing made him suddenly stop and look around. It happened again, a sort of dry clicking sound, several taps of something hard on wood in rapid succession. Listening carefully, not entirely sure he liked the noise, the part time piglet peered around, wishing he'd remembered to pick up his pack when he went to the bathroom. There was a flashlight in it, which he could have used right about now.

Hearing nothing, he resumed his search for a way out, muttering to himself. Moments later, he heard the noise again, from a different place. The young man stopped dead, his head cocked to one side, listening intently.

Scrabble scrabble, came the sound. It was behind him this time. He turned, sweating slightly more than the heat would account for. Nothing was visible. Staring into the darkness, straining his eyes, he slowly turned his head, listening intently.

Another scrape and a series of taps. Again, it was behind him. He whirled, his hands taking a defensive posture.

Nothing.

"What the fuck is that?" Turning a slow circle, he watched and listened. Nothing. A few seconds passed slowly. Still nothing. Slowly relaxing from the tense attitude he'd found himself in, he lowered his hands, laughing nervously to himself.
"Just my nerves. I wonder where the way out is?" A sliver of light in the floor caught his eye, outlining a square about half a metre on a side, leading to the conclusion it was a trap door of some sort. "Ah. At last." Keeping his eyes on it so he didn't end up going in the wrong direction, he slowly edged his way forward, trying not to trip over another box. The room, whatever it was, seemed very cluttered. "Someone should clean this place up. I'll have to mention it to the staff." A few steps further along, he froze as something, very lightly, tickled the back of his neck. "Um..." Slowly and carefully he looked over his shoulder. There was nothing there.

"OK, this is getting creepy. Who's doing that?" he called into the darkness of the room. A terrifying thought struck him, causing him to pale, as he added very quietly, "Ms Aoyama?"

A few faint scrabbling noises were the only reply, coming from all around him, this time accompanied by the merest hint of movement. Feeling an unaccustomed thrill of fear run down his spine, he looked quickly around, locating the trap door, then began edging towards it, glancing around quickly at intervals. There was definitely something moving out there in the dim hot room.

It was only when he was almost at the trap door that he had the sudden thought to look up...

Akane nearly swallowed her toothbrush at the hideous scream that came from somewhere outside the bathroom. Spitting it into the sink she dashed out into the hall, looking wildly around, hearing the thunder of footsteps on the stairs. "What in god's name was that?" Soun called out as he reached the landing, Genma behind him, both looking alert and ready for trouble. She shrugged, still looking around.

"No idea. It wasn't me."

They got their answer when the trap door to the attic, at the end of the hallway, fell open under the weight of a furiously struggling and terrified figure as it crashed to the ground, screaming, "Get it off, get it off, get it off!" The person was wearing very familiar clothing, which was completely covered in spiderwebs. The three of them stared in amazement, then exchanged glances, as Ryoga rolled around gibbering in terror and brushing frantically at himself. Above him, the trap door creaked as something reached out a couple of long, jointed, glistening legs and pulled it shut with a click.

Soun shuddered as Akane went white, then red. Genma began nervously backing away down the stairs, feeling an uncomfortably large amount of battle aura begin to build. Looking at his youngest daughter, Soun also began planning a strategic retreat. Both of them stopped when Akane suddenly laughed in a low, evil voice, the aura of danger fading, then disappeared into the bathroom. They exchanged worried glances, which became expressions of mild terror when she re-emerged, still snickering, holding a glass of water. Walking over to the panicked young man who had just managed to get the webs off his face, she looked down at him. "Hello, Ryoga," she said in a silky voice, causing him to freeze in horror, then look up. Spotting her looking at him with a very unsettling smile on her face, he opened his mouth to say something, just as he noticed the glass in her hand.

He wasn't quite quick enough to evade the water as she calmly poured it over him, although to give him credit, he nearly made it. Dropping the glass and grabbing for the piglet as it tried to escape, she picked it up by the bandanna, holding it at eye level, still smiling. Her father and his friend watched, not at all sure what to do. After inspecting Ryoga for a moment, she giggled, a tone in her voice that made all three males present wince, then reached up and knocked on the trap door.

It opened slowly.
Ryoga squealed in terror, struggling.

Akane looked at him, up into the darkness, then back at him. "Have fun," she grinned nastily, before neatly flipping him up and through the hatch, which snapped shut.

A moment's pause was followed by absolutely terrified squeals, clattering sounds of small hooves on wood, crashing noises, and an unpleasant scuttling effect from several places above them. Brushing her hands together in satisfaction the youngest Tendo smiled happily, picked up the glass, then walked back to the bathroom, past her father and Genma, who stood motionless, staring at her with identical expressions of awe, mixed with a certain amount of wariness.

"Silly Ryoga," she commented. "We might as well give the attic spiders something to do. The fire didn't work, perhaps they're allergic to pork." Going back into the bathroom she closed the door, picking up her toothbrush and finishing her ablutions, intermittently laughing in a manner that made them shiver.

"Ah, Soun?"

"Yes, old friend?"

"Should we do something?"

They both looked up, listening to the sounds, which were heading off across the building to the farthest corner of the attic.

"I don't know about you, but I don't fancy going up there. Have you seen the size of those damn things?"

"Yes. I think it's your daughter's food, I saw one catch that squid stew that got loose a couple of years ago and tried to hide up there. Poor thing. It never stood a chance."

"Right."

There was a long pause, during which Akane came out of the bathroom brushing her hair, going past them into her room humming a popular tune and closing the door behind her.

"He's tough."

"True."

"Very tough, actually. Almost invulnerable."

"Also true."

"And they're very... large."

"Indeed."

The sounds from above got fainter, sounding like they were somehow moving off outside the building without leaving it.

"We haven't played Shogi for days. Fancy a game?"

"I think that's a very good idea, my friend."

Both men headed downstairs as the sounds in the attic faded away.
"Remind me not to upset your daughter, will you?"

"Count on it."

Everyone in the café jumped as the door to the toilets slammed open with a crash, then fell off its hinges. A black blur, trailing tattered silk threads, shot across the room into the kitchen, out of which came cries of shock and a series of smashing sounds. Seconds later a nude and gently steaming young man, his face in a rictus of terror, dived out of the room followed by loud swearing and an irate chef waving a very large cleaver, grabbed a huge backpack that was leaning against a table, then ran straight through the side wall of the building, vanishing in a cloud of dust. Everyone stared for some time, before slowly going back to eating.

"Odd. I thought that sort of thing only happened in hot baths," one diner commented to his table-mate. She glanced at him for a moment.

"Apparently not." Looking at the collapsed door, then the hole in the wall in which the chef was standing hurling shouts of invective after the young man, she shook her head. "I'm not going to recommend this place, certainly. It's a little noisy." Picking up the menu, she looked at it, then ordered another bottle of wine.

"I'm... not real?" Artemis stared at Minako, who returned the look, then both of them turned to Yori, who shook her head.

"No. You're real. You're just not physical."

"How is that any better?" the cat asked. He tilted his head, staring at her. "And how are you able to see me? You just said that only the nine girls could interact with me or Luna, but you're obviously able to see and hear me." Yori smiled, glancing at Ami.

"We're using a special technique that allows us to see what Ami and Rei are seeing. None of the rest of us can see you directly, that's correct, but using this method, we can. It's complicated." Artemis nodded slowly, obviously curious, but didn't ask any more questions about it. Minako watched him, feeling slightly colder than the room temperature allowed for. She noticed that Azumi was translating again for Hnther, who was listening with interest.

"What does this mean for us?" the cat asked, looking around. "Luna and me, and the girls as well. How did we never notice this before? I mean, Minako put her hand right through me! Surely I'd have picked up on the fact that I can't touch anything." He waved a paw through the projector, which completely ignored him.

"You, and the host mind, Minako in this case, were programmed not to notice," Hnther said through Azumi. "It's a very complex process to produce a splinter personality but if you can, you are certainly able to modify it enough to filter out and rationalise any imperfections in the way it senses the world. That's why you didn't notice your lack of any ability to interact with your environment, and how you're able to have a point of view that is at a distant point from Minako's senses, which are what you're using. I suspect that the communications link you have to the other girls is also used to provide information to your senses, at a low level, which is reinforcing the illusion that you are a physical being. The illusion broke down when it was directly brought to your attention, the reality of it is too strong for the programming to cope with."

"Oh." The cat nodded slowly. "I think I understand."
"As far as the other part of your question, that is more problematic." The mind mage looked like he wasn't very happy. "I suspect that the influence of the time device is stronger on you and Luna than the others, as it has a lower level connection to you both. In all probability, based on the information we have available to us, you were both created some years ago with a large amount of the narrative programmed in, which you were intended to pass on in a generally subtle manner to reinforce the more direct interventions of the device, and if L'dnr'k is correct, to do so in a way that reduced the amount of temporal push-back that would otherwise occur. A cunning plan but clearly not perfect. That would explain a lot of why, as things drifted from the desired goal more and more over the last few years, you became more and more confused."

"The device hasn't updated your information for a long time, we think," Yori added, continuing the explanation. "Possibly because it can't without causing more trouble than it solves, possibly for reasons that we don't yet know. But the thing we're worried about is that if you go back it might take the opportunity to... reprogram you, I guess... resetting you to a place where you won't have the self-awareness you currently have." She sighed, sitting down next to Minako. "From what we know I suspect that removing you and Usagi from our reality allowed you to finally begin questioning all the little things you'd noticed that were wrong, and our little demonstration earlier has completed the job. But if you go back..."

"It mind-fucks me and I'm back to being what I was, parroting its line all the way," the cat said with disgust, looking upset.

"Yes. That is certainly possible." Hnther folded his arms, staring at the floor. "It might not happen, the machine has for whatever reason apparently been leaving you more or less alone for a substantial time, but we certainly can't assume that will continue. Especially as we are fairly sure it's getting worried."

"But at the same time, we have a suspicion that having Minako back in our reality might delay it doing something permanent before we can destroy it," Ami put in. Artemis looked at her, then Minako, who was feeling ill.

"No choice. We have to go back. My continued existence and sanity isn't worth wiping out our entire reality for." Everyone stared at him for several seconds.

"That is certainly a noble sentiment," Hnther said in a regretful voice. He paused, then added reluctantly, "There are other problems as well."

"Which are?" Minako asked, wishing she could stroke her friend and comfort him. He looked very upset.

"Well, the main one is your own sanity." The demon inspected her. "Splinter personalities can, and usually do, have a considerable negative effect on the long-term mental stability of the host mind. I strongly suspect that is the reason Usagi has ended up in the state that she has. From the latest information we have on her, she is essentially exhibiting all the signs of being a full blown psychopath, with no empathy for anyone but herself, goals that seem to include destroying anyone or anything that gets in her way, and quite possibly the mindset of a serial murderer of some form. Not at all the sort of person one would wish to release on a population, even if she wasn't also in possession of considerable magical ability. Which, of course, raises her danger level from severe to horrific."

Minako closed her eyes, trying not to faint. "She's really that bad?"

"Oh, yes, very much so from what we can see." Yori looked worried. "I can show you some recordings we took from surveillance of her, they're... disturbing. I think if she got loose in Tokyo we would be looking at a significant death toll if we didn't stop her, which at this point would probably require killing her on the spot."

"Oh, fuck," Minako moaned, rubbing her head with both hands. "No, I don't think I want to see that." Dropping her hands and looking around, she helplessly asked, "What do we do? And why am I still sane?" She laughed darkly for a second or two. "Sane being a relative term, of course."

"To answer the second point first, it's a complex mix of causes. My best theory at this point is that you were less strongly affected by the mental editing that Usagi was, although I'm not entirely certain why," Hnther told her. "It may be that in the time device's narrative you weren't as central as Usagi was, although based on the stories we've heard from Ami and Rei that seems slightly unlikely, or it may be that your mind is just that little bit more resilient in the first place. Without a lot more study and time, and information we may never be able to get on exactly what the time device is attempting to achieve, we may never know for sure. Also, as I said, the effect of a splinter personality usually has a detrimental effect over the time scales we're dealing with, but in rare cases it doesn't. Again, I can't yet be sure, but you may be one of those rare cases."

"Basically, you got lucky," Yori commented, frowning at her boots. She looked up. "But we don't know how long your luck will last. Artemis might be stable indefinitely, or..."

"Or we might both go completely off the reservation tomorrow," the cat finished sourly. She nodded.

"Probably not, but we don't know."

"It's unlikely that either one of you will suddenly deteriorate to that extent," Hnther put in, looking amused, "but I will need to examine you again, now that you are fully awakened to your situation, then compare the results to the first scan, which should allow me to work out what risk, if any, you present to Minako, and she to you. When we know that, we can consider the next step."

"Do we really have any choice?" Rei asked, looking at Artemis with sympathy. He stared back as she added, "We need to stop the time machine doing something irreversible before we can destroy it." He nodded, looking around at the others.

"She's right. All of this is irrelevant. If it's critical Minako goes home, that's what we do. I'm not worth risking everyone else in the universe for, believe me."

Yori held up her hand. "Don't rush into what might be suicide, Artemis. Before we do anything I'll go and check with Lldnr'k to see how he's getting along with the orb. If he's managed to extract the data, all of this might be nothing to worry about for the moment, we can get on with blowing that damn thing into little tiny pieces." He looked at her for a long moment then nodded.

"All right."

"While you're gone, I'll do another deep scan on Minako," Hnther told them. "By the time you get back I should know more. We'll need the information one way or another anyway."

Yori glanced at him with a nod, then looked around. "You'll have to stay here to translate," she said to Azumi, who acknowledged the comment with a slight smile. "Ami? Do you want to come with me? I might need your help. Rei, you may as well stay here and keep Minako company."

"OK," both girls chorused, then grinned at each other. Getting up as a portal formed in the corner, Yori picked up the projector and handed it to Ami as she studied both Minako and Artemis.

"Don't worry too much just yet, either of you. We can figure out a way to sort this out, if we give it some thought, I think. We'll be back soon." She stepped through the portal, Ami following, before it popped out of existence.

Standing, the mind mage walked over, studying Minako, who looked up at him, then leaned back and closed her eyes as he sat down, reaching out.

"Ah. Good timing, I was about to get a message to you, Yori," Lldnr'k said happily, giving them what in his species would be a broad smile. "Things are going very well. We're down to the last layer, the previous three went much faster than I expected. My previous estimate was over-pessimistic. I suspect it will unravel very soon now."

"That's very good news, Lldnr'k," Yori said, looking extremely pleased. "We've been examining Minako, or rather, Hnther has. He discovered you were right. Artemis is a splinter personality. A very articulate and as far as I can see completely sentient one at that."

"Interesting. And somewhat upsetting. How did the pair of them take the news?" The time mage studied them as they looked at each other.

"Better that I thought he would, but it's hard to tell," Ami replied after thinking it over. Leading them to the room they'd used last time, Lldnr'k closed the door and then sat, listening to the story. They showed him the recordings of both Usagi and Minako on the dead world, then the one they'd made through Ami's eyes of Artemis learning the truth about himself.

"I think he might have worked it out himself given some more time to think about it. He'd obviously figured out something was wrong but didn't know what." Yori watched the projection as Ami ran it for the second time, stopping occasionally to discuss parts of it. "But I don't think either one of them were expecting that. They watched the expression on the faces of both Minako and the cat as her hand went through his head. Ami thought to herself that while the cats had surprisingly expressive faces, for cats, she'd never seen one showing gaping shock before. Even under the circumstances it was amusing.

"A shame. By the sound of it there is a good mind there. It would be a pity to lose it." Lldnr'k watched as the recording ended. "He does seem to be taking the truth surprisingly well." Glancing at a time-piece on the wall, he stood, opening the door and waving them through. They followed the temporal mage into the workshop and over to his equipment which was still probing the orb, watching as he examined the progress, then turned around again.

Yori sighed. "He's not happy, certainly, but so far seems to be dealing with it. Hnther is scanning both personalities again to see what changes have happened now that they're both aware of the situation."

"What do you intend to do?" Lldnr'k asked. "Obviously you're aware of the potential problems involved in reintroducing Minako to your home reality while the time device is still active as far as Artemis is concerned."

"Yes, we were just discussing that before we came here," Yori sighed. "Artemis is prepared to take his chances, on the basis that he's not worth everyone else. True, and brave, but not the sort of thing I want to do if there's any chance to avoid it."

"But at the same time we're not sure about how wise it would be to keep Minako away from home any longer than we have to, assuming Misaki is right," Ami added. Lldnr'k rubbed the side of his beak, looking at them.
"An awkward problem. For what it's worth, keeping her away for a day or two more probably won't be an issue, I feel."

"But we don't know for sure one way or the other."

"No. Very true." He looked at the blue-haired girl. "We are working on far too little real information, I'm afraid."

"We may not be able to take the gamble if we can't deal with the damn device soon," Yori remarked, leaning against a bench and watching the orb as it gently pulsed with red light under the influence of the magical equipment. "I don't want to risk his mind if we can avoid it, but the problem is he's right. His 'life', or any of ours, isn't worth losing everything over."

"Difficult," the mage agreed. "Very difficult."

"Even if we do kill the time device soon, what do we do about him? And Luna?" Ami mused, also watching the red artefact. "Is there any way to... I don't know, somehow extract their minds from Usagi and Minako? Make them some sort of replacement body or something like that? Science fiction is full of that sort of thing."

Lldnr'k and Yori exchanged glances. "It's not something I'm very knowledgeable about," the mage said slowly, "but it's not unheard of. I have come across magical constructs that are able to house a functioning mind, although it's rare that they're built to be sentient and self-aware. Many places have rules against that sort of thing, there have been... unpleasant problems... with such methods. I have also heard that some of the higher-tech worlds practice something along those lines performed through technological means, as a technique for life extension." He thought some more. "Perhaps some form of cyborg, possibly? Although I'm not entirely sure how you would transfer a splinter. Plus there's the issue of it not generally being a transfer as such, more along the lines of making a copy. Which is one of the reasons it's often not encouraged."

"I have a few ideas," Yori said after a pause, thinking deeply. "I'm not sure how practical they are, but it's something worth looking into."

"It seems to me that the people to speak to would be Kw'lyn Industries," Lldnr'k advised. "They are the acknowledged leaders in computing and data processing, as shown by those SI units you have. It may well be that they could suggest something suitable."

That's not a bad idea," Yori replied, glancing at Ami. "We can ask them when we go to get the bombs."

"Have you contacted them yet?" the crow-like mage asked curiously. She shook her head. "No, I was waiting until we had the information we needed. As soon as we do I'll get in touch."

Checking his instruments, the mage snapped his beak in satisfaction. "Well, in that case, you shouldn't have too long to wait now."

Five seconds later the equipment made a pinging sound, the orb flashed deep scarlet, then everything shut down. "About that long, in fact," Lldnr'k said drily. Ami and Yori exchanged gazes as he bent over the orb, which had changed colour slightly, becoming a much deeper red. "Hmm. All right, let's see... Prodding it with a couple of small devices, which gave off a wave of complex magic that both women felt, he looked pleased. "Ah. Yes, there we are. That should be... yes, that's it. You see?" He probed the spherical artefact gently, pointing out something complex to Yori, who looked carefully at it before nodding. Ami tried to follow the magic but quickly became lost in its "Got it. Those are the coordinates? They look... kind of odd."

"That's because they're not normal reality coordinates, they're a sub-reality. Opening a portal to one is considerably more complex than the usual type, although I expect you shouldn't have too much difficulty." They had a brief discussion which the blue-haired girl couldn't make heads or tails of, before Yori nodded again, looking pleased.

"OK. I see." She held out her hand, shaking Lldnr'k's. "Thank you, my friend. I owe you a massive favour."

"No, you don't," he replied, amused. "You're doing what needs to be done, for everyone's sake. I'm just glad to help. Make sure that blight on the multiverse is dealt with once and for all and you'll have repaid me a hundred times over for this work." He looked at the garnet orb. "Although, if you don't mind, I'd like to hold onto this thing for a while and study it, there are some interesting properties it shows that I'd like to investigate."

Yori laughed. "Of course. Keep it as long as you need to, Setsuna isn't going to be in a state to use it for quite a while, although I intend to give it back when she is."

"Thank you," the mage told her. "I should need it for no more than a couple of months, I think."

Looking at them both, he asked, "What is your next step?" Yori thought for a moment, glancing at Ami.

"I guess we go back to tell the others, then contact Kw'lyn Industries and get their help to destroy the time device. Hopefully, that will be fairly straightforward now. I'm thinking we open a portal to it, toss as many antimatter bombs through as we can, then close it again before they go off. With any luck that's the end of it."

The mage seemed thoughtful. "It sounds like that's a reasonable process. I'm just wondering what the effects of the time device's destruction will be on your reality."

"What do you mean?" Ami asked, now feeling worried. He made a calming gesture.

"Don't get too worked up, Ami, it's not likely to cause any serious problems, but there may be some interesting side effects. Probably fairly small and short-lived. I would expect that while you girls have obviously been the main focus of the device's attention, it may well have other actors in play, on a lesser level. They may find some odd things happen due to temporal inertia once the source of the alterations is removed. Most likely the results would be a certain amount of confusion as they find themselves in a situation that has changed suddenly from what they expected, although again, I would think this will be short-lived and generally self-correcting. But the only way to find out for certain is to do it and see what happens."

"You've making me very nervous, Lldnr'k," she told him, wide-eyed.

"We don't have a choice anyway, so we'll just have to live with whatever happens," Yori sighed. "Do you want to come and help? Or at least watch?"

After a moment's deliberation, the temporal mage nodded slowly. "Yes, I think I will. I can quite possibly learn a lot from observing the destruction of the device and I must admit a considerable curiosity about the people behind Kw'lyn. Very little is public knowledge about them. Bear with me, I need to let people know I'm going to be away for a little while." He wandered off to talk to some of the others working on the far side of the large room.
"Do we take Minako back, take her with us, or leave her with Hnther?" Ami asked the martial artist, who was staring at the orb, scratching her nose. After a pause, Yori answered.

"I think we leave her with Hnther for the moment. He's going to want to keep checking her for a while from what he said anyway. We can't take her back home until we kill the device, it's probably not a good idea to have her near a portal opened to it either, so she's best off where she is."

"That sounds sensible," the blue-haired young woman noted. She frowned a little, as a thought struck her. "You were intending to access the time device's sub-reality from the dead world, though. Won't that leave Usagi at the same risk of it reaching out to her?"

Looking up, Yori stared, then sighed. "Damn. Good point. OK, we either need to move her, or do it from somewhere else." She thought for a while. "Move her, I think. Hnther needs to scan her, so we could knock her out then take her to him. We can shut her down like we did with Setsuna, she'll keep until we work out how to treat her, however long that takes. Plus it should stop her getting worse. I hope."

"Poor Usagi. She's not been very well served by her life recently, has she?" Ami mumbled. Her companion shook her head.

"No. I do feel very sorry for her, but we have the responsibility to prevent her doing any more harm. You saw the recordings. There's no way she's safe to go home like that, not even close."

"I know, believe me, and I agree completely. But it seems very unfair to me. She used to be such a nice girl, once."

"Life does bad things to good people," Lldnr'k commented, coming up behind them. "It's unfortunate but a truism everywhere. All we can do is try to deal with it as best we can." He put his hand on her shoulder, radiating sympathy. "I feel for your friend, but we have little choice. Based on what I saw, she is a danger to everyone including herself." Ami nodded, sighing. "Shall we go?"

A portal opened a couple of metres away and the three of them went through, several of the other mages and apprentices looking up to watch, then going back to work as the portal went pop.

"Hold still you furry little shit," Usagi screamed, firing her supercharged tiara at Luna again, causing a huge explosion that left an impressive crater.

"No," the cat called, popping up behind a boulder to her side as she caught the returning artefact. "You're acting even crazier than normal, Usagi! Calm down, will you? All I said was that you should just try talking to Yori when she comes here, not try to kill her." The animal ducked with a yelp as the tiara shot half a metre over her head, causing another blast a hundred metres away. "For god's sake, are you trying to kill me?"

"YES!" the girl shouted in rage, looking around wildly and trying to work out where the cat had gone. "Now get out here so I can do it properly."

"Well, fuck you too, bitch," the black cat screamed back, incensed. "All these years I've done my best to help you and now you're trying to murder me? You really are insane." She ducked once more as the tiara shot through where her head had been, swearing to herself. A faint hum made her look around, wondering yet again what was causing it, but she still couldn't find anything.

"You disloyal little cunt," the blonde gibbered, red in the face. "I'm the damn princess! People do what I say, not the other way around. You're just a mouthy talking cat." She turned in a circle, glaring at the deserted valley, trying to locate her target. There was no response, which if anything made her even angrier. Stomping back to the tent after another fruitless scan of the area, she seized a bottle of water, ripped the top off, then drained it, muttering obscenities.

A few minutes later she felt something, looking up to see a portal forming fifty metres away. A very unpleasant grin formed as she stared at it, hefting the tiara thoughtfully. Charging it to the maximum amount she could manage, she got ready to throw. "Think you're better than me, Yori?" she said softly through her teeth. "As soon as you step through that thing, you're going to get this right between the eyes." Nothing happened, as the seconds ticked past, except for the portal making a faint crackling noise. "Come on, where are you, you bitch," the blonde muttered.

"Guess," a rich voice full of amusement said from behind her. She got nearly half-way through spinning around with a yell of rage before everything went black.

"Oh dear." The mild comment from Hnther, relayed by Chou, made everyone look at him as he stood, staring down at Usagi sadly. The elder Tendo and all four of Aiko’s team were now present as well.

'Azumi' glanced at her sister and sister-in-law, then around at the other former members of Usagi’s group. Minako was watching, a worried expression on her face, from the chair she'd spent much of the afternoon in, while Ami and Rei were looking at the blonde on the bed with more neutral but still rather sad expressions. No one said anything for a moment. Eventually it was left up to Tamiko to ask.

"What's the problem?"

Hnther looked at her, then back at the comatose blonde. "This young woman is, in many ways, in a worse state than Setsuna is. Her psyche has been very badly damaged. The memory alterations are numerous and severe, having been edited a number of times, more than any of the rest of them by far. The last, hmm, I'd judge about two years, may well be irretrievably damaged there are so many contradictory and cross-linked engrams. I'm not at all sure we can repair this very easily, or possibly at all." He sighed a little as everyone waited. "It's looking likely that your idea of a memory reset and age reversion may be the only practical solution, Yori. From a preliminary examination I would say that we'd need to blank about six years to get back to a point before the main damage. What was left could be worked with."

Ami came over and looked down at her former best friend. "Oh, Usagi. I'm sorry." She turned to the mind mage. "There's no other way?"

He shrugged a little helplessly. "It's difficult to say, I'm afraid. I'm going to need to consult with colleagues who are more knowledgeable about this type of damage and the treatments for it. It may be possible to rebuild her mind without wholesale deletion of the damaged memories but at this point I wouldn't want to guarantee it at all. It's likely to require a good two to three weeks of very careful study to even work out where to begin."

"What about Luna?" Rei asked from across the room. He looked over his shoulder for a moment, then went back to studying the blonde girl.

"As far as I can tell without actually talking to her, the Luna personality is basically intact and undamaged. She would appear to be in much the same state as Artemis, although there is some evidence that she might be on the verge of the breakthrough he had happen earlier, on her own. I would think that the last few days may have allowed her to begin to see the gaps in the illusion she was influenced to believe." The mage thought for a moment, then nodded. "I have an idea."
Kneeling beside Usagi, he looked up at Yori. "Can you perform that procedure to disable her voluntary control, just in case this goes wrong, please?" he requested. She nodded, prodding Usagi in a few places.

"OK, she won't be able to move anything below the neck for half an hour or so."

"Thank you." He reached out and put his hands on her head. "I'm going to try suppressing Usagi's consciousness while allowing her body to wake up, which hopefully will allow the Luna personality to manifest without interference. I'm fairly sure this will work although it might take a couple of tries to get it right."

Everyone watched as he concentrated for a minute or two. Eventually he straightened up, looking pleased. "I believe that may have done it." The room-full of magical girls and two mages watched the comatose figure of Usagi expectantly. She lay still, breathing slowly and deeply, showing no signs of life otherwise. Several seconds passed in silence.

'Azumi' was just about to ask if anything was going to happen, when through the link to Ami and Rei's senses provided by their SIs, she heard an acerbic voice from behind them asked irritably, "Would someone like to explain what the fuck is going on, please?" All of them except Hnther and Ldnrk turned, to see a small black cat glaring at them from as far away from the two demons as she could get, her ears laid back and her tail lashing from side to side. The mind mage looked at them with interest.

"Ah. I assume it worked?"

"Yep," 'Yori' replied with a grin. "But she doesn't look happy."

"I'm not at all happy, you're damn right there," the cat spat out, staring at them. "Usagi tried to kill me, I've spent a week trying to work out what on earth is going on, and the only things I can come up with make me very, very worried. Now I find myself in a room full of lunatics with two demons as well. Care to fill me in?"

"OK." 'Yori' paused, glancing at Artemis, who was sitting on the table next to Minako. "Unless you want to?"

"Go ahead," he said quietly. "I'm still trying to get to grips with it myself. You'll do a better job." She nodded, returning her attention to the other illusory animal, who was giving off an aura of impatient curiosity, mixed with irritation.

"Sorry, this is going to come as a shock, but it's like this." Once more, she began the long explanation, causing the cat to stare at her, by turns horrified, furious, and terrified.

---

Heading to a coffee shop he'd heard had some interesting new blends in, on the edge of the Minato district that Yori and Chou operated in that overlapped the one Aiko and her team claimed as home territory, the small figure of Xrist stopped when he heard a sound coming out of an alleyway. To his ears it sounded like some sort of fight. Torn between the desire for a really good cup of coffee, curiosity, and the well-honed desire to avoid most magical girls on the basis they were all nuts except for the ones he trusted, and even there he wasn't too sure about their sanity, he looked around, then peered down past a number of waste receptacles. At the far end of the alley he could see the shadowy figures of two large humans apparently dealing rather harshly with another one, who was on the ground struggling weakly.

The little demon looked around again. He couldn't see any signs of local law enforcement, or any magical girls either, in fact the whole area was quite sparsely populated at the moment, the only pedestrians in sight some distance away and moving off. One or two vehicles passed, but too fast to flag down, even if they would have stopped in the first place. "I've got to get some sort of local communications system to call Yori with," he muttered, sighing. "Or Aiko and her lot. Or even that peace enforcer Harada." He looked again, they were still at it. Reaching out with the limited mystical ability he possessed, he couldn't sense any magic in play, although there was a good deal of pain being radiated from the apparent victim of some sort of vicious street crime. He could also sense enough malice from the two attackers to make him pretty sure they intended to finish the job permanently.

'This species can be nasty,' he thought to himself, cautiously edging closer, sticking to the shadows caused by the alley and the early evening light which was fading fast. 'Most of them are very nice, but the bad ones...' He shook his head. 'Pity. But they do make amazing coffee.' A short distance away now, behind a large metal container giving off a very unpleasant smell of decomposing organics, he carefully observed.

'Knife wound in the lower abdomen, broken lower limb, facial injuries,' the demon assessed. 'Not good. He's not going to last very long with wounds of that nature. I wonder what he's done to attract that sort of attention, or whether it's just a random crime?'

The human on the ground, a male of perhaps twenty-five to thirty local cycles as far as he could judge, was wearing clothing that suggested some form of official uniform, perhaps military or law enforcement. The attackers were clothed in more normal civilian attire, one carrying the knife that had obviously produced the heavily bleeding wound in the victim, the other one some form of metal club nearly as long as his arm, which he was raising for another blow. The person on the ground cried out in a language that wasn't the local one, something Xrist wasn't familiar with although it was vaguely recognisable as a common alternative. 'I really must learn some more of this world's languages,' he mused, sighing. 'Oh, the nine hells take it. This is ridiculous. Where is a magical girl when you need one? Half the time you're just going for an espresso and you get jumped by two hands worth of them, but when there's a real crime happening they're nowhere to be seen.'

With another sigh and a quick look around just on the off chance that someone else might deal with the problem, he reached into his storage pocket and pulled out a K'nn stun weapon, something he wasn't supposed to be carrying, not being strictly speaking licensed for it. 'Yori will understand,' he thought as he adjusted the settings carefully. 'Got her priorities straight, that one.' He took aim, then pulled the trigger twice.

Lieutenant Wilson was fairly certain he was about to die. It was almost funny. After the Gulf war, then Kosovo, without getting a scratch while several members of his unit had been badly injured, he was going to die in a mugging in the middle of Tokyo while on leave. He could feel his life leaking steadily out of the stab wound in his gut, mixing warmth from the blood and cold air in places that shouldn't be exposed, oddly painless, especially compared to the dull agony from his shattered tibia. Against that the broken nose and swollen cheek was nothing.

Looking up at the man who was about to crush his skull with an aluminium baseball bat, he closed his eyes.

There were two odd noises, a sort of muffled crackling zap effect like something out of a video game, followed by a pair of thumps. After that, silence fell.

'That's weird,' he thought idly, light-headed from blood loss. 'I wonder why I'm not dead yet?' He opened his eyes. Both the men who had been standing over him swearing in rapid Japanese had vanished. Painfully rolling his head to the side, he got a close-up view of a pair of boots in a position that showed their owner was currently lying on his back next to him. 'Very weird.'

A few seconds passed, then he heard soft footsteps. Looking in the direction they were coming from, he blinked several times. 'OK. Maybe I am dead. Or at least hallucinating wildly.' The short figure moving towards him stopped to prod the recumbent mugger cautiously with its foot, pointing some sort of gun out of an SF movie at him, then grunted in a satisfied tone, resuming its approach. It stopped again, only about half a metre away, looking down at him with large eyes containing horizontally slitted pupils set against a sea of dark blue iris. The mouth, which enclosed a remarkable number of teeth, opened, and a surprisingly deep voice said something in Japanese. He stared in numb shock, unable to even begin to try parsing the sentence with his limited understanding of the language. The thing waited, then spoke again. It looked irritated when he didn't respond, scratching the side of its head with the end of the ray gun or whatever it was, then said something else in a completely different language, one he'd never heard before.

"Sorry, I have absolutely no idea what you're saying," he whispered, smiling happily as the world darkened around the edges. "You'd think a proper hallucination would at least speak English."

The figment of his dying imagination radiated puzzlement, glancing around, then made the weapon vanish somehow, bending over to inspect him closely. Small hands gently felt his stomach, making him hiss in pain as everything dimmed then brightened. It said something else, more to itself than him, straightening up and staring at him. After a moment it produced something else, some sort of glass ball with a metal band around it, the ball itself glowing a gentle green-white colour like it was full of fireflies. The creature adjusted something on the ball carefully, then tossed it a couple of metres away, immediately bending down and somehow managing to pick him up, not as carefully as he'd have genuinely preferred under the circumstances. The amount of pain involved was beginning to make him think that perhaps this wasn't a hallucination after all, although if it wasn't, he had absolutely no idea what it actually was.

A couple of seconds later there was a crackling sound like someone crumpling waxed paper and the alley was illuminated a bright neon blue colour. The creature jumped forward, blue light washed over him, and he passed out.

"Where did you say you found this?" Sergeant Harada looked at Corporal Otani, who consulted his notes for a second.

"It was at the end of that little alleyway by the video arcade at the edge of the district, near the high school," he said. "Someone taking out the garbage found two unconscious men lying next to a worryingly large pool of fresh blood. They're in the cells at the moment, the doctor is looking at them now. One of them had a knife in his hand that also had blood on it, the other one was lying on top of a baseball bat covered with hair and blood on the end. It suggests to me that someone got the shit kicked out of him by them. They're both known violent muggers according to the records, although not local. Looks like they either followed someone here or decided to try their luck somewhere other than home."

"Interesting," the sergeant muttered, turning the glass ball over in his hands. There was a residual sensation just at the threshold of perception coming from it, a sensation he was pretty sure meant it was magical.

"What is it?" Otani asked curiously. "It looks a little like one of those damn portal bombs."

"I think it's an emergency portal generator, which is what the bombs were based on," Harada said slowly, rubbing the thing with his thumb. "Yori mentioned them at the time all that started, and she showed me a picture of something that looked a lot like this a while ago, although that one was a little more complicated."

"So... you think one of our visitors might have intervened in some sort of crime?" Otani stared at the device with interest.

"It's certainly possible, I suppose. Most of the ones I've met are pretty decent people. We have two unconscious muggers, clearly stopped in the middle of a nasty mugging, weapons used in said mugging, lots of evidence of a badly injured victim, but no victim. Where is he? Or she?"

"There were no call-outs for an ambulance. One of the magical girls got to him?" The corporal leaned against the desk, putting his notebook away. Harada thought for a moment, then shook his head.

"Not their style. Any of Yori's people wouldn't have left the muggers behind, they'd have brought them here, and the victim would be up and walking around without a scratch on him by now. Unless he was dead, in which case we might not have any muggers either. Most of the other ones who might be around that area would also at least call us to let us know."

"Some local mage?"

"Not impossible, but the only one I know would have done something pretty drastic. We'd probably have found a couple of frogs looking confused," the sergeant replied with a small smile. "And again, we'd have heard about it. No, I think that some demon probably stepped in, then decided to go for medical help of some sort and used this thing to do it. It fits the evidence as far as I can see."

Otani nodded slowly. "OK, I can see that. So what do we do? Just wait for whoever it is to pop up again?"

Putting the device down on his desk, Harada stared at it, then got up. "We may have to. But I'm going to talk to some people I know. In the mean time, see if the doctor can figure out what happened to the muggers, and check if there are any missing persons reports filed in the last few hours that might have a bearing. Get the blood tests as fast as possible and use that as well, and any fingerprints." He picked up the spherical device and put it in his pocket, then retrieved his coat. Corporal Otani nodded, making some more notes.

"Right, Sergeant. I'm on it." He paused, then asked, "What do I say if the Captain asks about it?"

"Tell her I'm making enquiries, but as far as we can tell there probably isn't any further risk to the victim, whoever they are." He shrugged. "Either they're dead already and beyond help, or they're somewhere very odd and getting very good help, I think."

"Going to call Yori?"

"She and Chou are out of touch at the moment, I got a message that they had something very important to do. They took Aiko and her crew with them, and Azumi as well."

"Ah." The corporal nodded again, then headed towards the stairs to the cells and the prisoners, slipping his notebook into his pocket on the way.

Looking around at everyone watching her, Luna sighed, shaking her head. "Oh, shit," she mumbled. "I wish I could tell you that you're just crazy, but I can't deny the truth." The room fell silent again as they all waited for her to think it through. "So, basically, Artemis and I are just
"figments of someone's imagination?"

"Not really, but you're not the physical beings you thought you were," Ami replied. "You're real enough, though. As sentient as any of us are from what Hnther and Yori say."

"That's almost worse," the cat grumbled. "Stuck inside her brain? I'm surprised I'm not as crazy as she is. And she's very, very crazy right now."

"We know," Yori said, looking sympathetically at the creature that wasn't really there. "We've been monitoring her, and Minako, we've seen everything that happened. She's in a bad way, I'm afraid."

Luna got up and walked over, apparently deliberately walking through Rei's legs, making her twitch, stopping a metre from the blonde on the bed and staring at her.

"Can you help her?" she asked. Chou translated for Hnther, who sighed.

"We were discussing that just before we arranged to have you wake up," he said. "It's not very easy, I'm afraid." He explained the problem and the possible solutions to the cat, who looked more and more depressed as he spoke.

"Oh, damn it all to hell," she finally said when he stopped talking. "Poor insane bitch."

"Luna!" Artemis gasped in shock. She looked at him, irritated.

"Hey, you haven't had to put up with her. Your one is much closer to normal, mine has been a fucking nightmare. I didn't know she couldn't hurt me, you know, she scared the crap out of me with that damn tiara. I really thought she was going to kill me. That's what she was trying to do."

The other cat and the rest of the people in the room watched her as she stared at Usagi for a little longer, then looked up at Yori. "When you turn her off again, I go away as well, right?" The woman nodded, looking apologetic.

"Yes. Sorry, but it's probably not safe to leave her even this conscious. Aside from the problems that would happen if by some fluke she woke up all the way, I think her mind will slowly degrade even in this state. Eventually it could well affect you as well." She had a brief conversation with Hnther, then looked back to the illusory cat. "Hnther thinks it would be a bad idea. He's happy to repeat this procedure every now and then to let you catch up, but until either Usagi is cured, or dealt with in some other way, or we figure out a way to get you into another body of some sort, we're a bit stuck."

She sighed a little, her ears drooping. "It'll be OK, Luna," Ami said encouragingly. "We have a lot of very smart people who know all sorts of weird techniques working on this. I'm sure we can work out something sooner or later."

"Easy for you to say, you're walking around and can touch things," Luna mumbled, looking depressed. "Oh, well. Not like I can do anything about it. At least I don't have to listen to Usagi babbling on about how her manifest destiny will come forth any day now. God, that was getting annoying." Yori chuckled, getting down on one knee and studying the animal.

"You have my word, I will try to find some way to help both you and Artemis gain a physical existence. We need to deal with the time device first, of course, and if we fail, well, we're a bit screwed, but I'm not planning on failing. After that we'll look into what we can do to help you guys. Usagi and Setsuna are in good hands, Minako will get helped, and we'll get Haruka, Michiru, and Makoto here as well, somehow. Haruka at least seems open to the idea. The other two will be more trouble, they're... not cooperative, but we'll figure something out."
Cheering up slightly, Luna's ears went back to their normal position. "You think you really can give Artemis and me real bodies? It sounds pretty wild."

"Everything about this is pretty wild, right? What's one more thing?" The cat and the martial artist looked at each other for a couple of seconds, then both laughed.

"Fair enough. Thank you." She looked around. "All of you."

"I'm sure we can help, Luna," Chou told her calmly. "You're just going to have to bear with us for a while."

Standing, Yori looked at her friends. "We'd better get on with this, we don't want to waste any time." She spoke to Hnther for a moment, then looked back at the black cat as the demon mage bent over Usagi again. "He's going to shut her down again, then put her in stasis until his colleagues can examine her, which will be a few days yet. Once that's happened we'll repeat this process and fill you in, OK?"

"Thanks, Yori," the small cat said, seeming grateful. She looked at Ami and Rei, then over at Minako and Artemis. The other cat seemed worried. "See you guys later." A second later she vanished from the vision of the ones that could see her without any fuss, simply blinking out of existence.

"Xrist," the large feather-covered demon said with a note of surprise in her voice, looking at the spherical device Harada showed her. She looked across at another of her species who was like her sitting in Hikaru's coffee-shop, enjoying a large amount of very good coffee and some very nice chocolate cake. He signified assent, but said nothing. Hikaru leaned on the counter, listening curiously. "This is the latest model, he told me he'd got one after that incident a few weeks ago when those crazy girls chased him here and Fumiko and the others saved him." She touch it, concentrating for a moment, then nodded firmly. "Definitely Xrist. It's set to the coordinates of his world. Looks like it was set on a short delay, these new ones don't instantly generate the portal, you can delay it up to about a minute or so, to give you time to get through it. They only hold it open for about four seconds so you have to be quick, but they're very reliable, apparently. The power core is supposed to be good for nearly ten years."

"Thank you, Ryynkh," Harada said, managing the name well, which made her nod approvingly. "So, do you think he would have intervened in a violent mugging?" He explained the story. She leaned back, one of her four tentacles coming up and smoothing the feathers around her left ear while another one lifted the mug to her mouth. She sipped, then put it down.

"He might have done, if he thought he didn't have a choice. He always tries to stay out of things like that, he's perfectly honest about not wanting to get involved, but at the same time he's not the sort of person to walk away if someone was in trouble and no one else could help. By the sound of it this mystery victim was badly injured, so he might well have decided that the only thing to do was to take him to a healer, and he'd naturally think of the ones on his own world if he couldn't get hold of Yori or Chou. They'd certainly be the ones I'd go for in an emergency, but if he had no way to contact them..." She shrugged with all four tentacles, which looked odd. "An emergency portal home to find medical aid is a sensible idea. Quicker than trying to find it locally if you're not familiar with the procedure."

"And I suppose it's likely that the victim may well have required aid as fast as possible so he couldn't wait," Harada mused, picking the device up and looking at it, then putting it back on the counter.
"That seems logical," the demon agreed, finishing her coffee and motioning to Hikaru, who took the mug and headed for the cappuccino machine, still listening.

"Do we need to worry about this person's safety?" Harada asked after a moment, picking up his own coffee. Rynnkh shook her head, making an expression he thought was meant to be a smile.

"No, assuming Xrist got him to the healers fast enough, he or she will almost certainly be fine. His world is very good at medical procedures on a number of species. Not as fast as Yori or Chou, but nearly as effective. I'm fairly sure they'd either know about your species or know someone who could get the information they needed, and they have a very strong ethical obligation to help the injured. First rate hospitals, believe me."

The sergeant relaxed slightly, feeling relieved. "Thank you. I suppose we can't do much except wait."

"I can get this recharged for you if you want, you could use it to follow him, but you'd need to arrange a portal home. Xrist could do that easily enough. Or you can wait...," she turned to her compatriot and asked something in her own language, getting a response after some thought, "About twenty hours, the next scheduled portal to his world is opening then for a few minutes."

"Scheduled portal?" he echoed, surprised.

"There's so much travel to Minato these days that several places have started arranging regular portals between various worlds and here," Hikaru put in, looking amused. "Apparently portals are quite complicated things to arrange, they normally need several mages, from what Chou told me a while ago, so if an individual wants to come here, or go back, they either need to bring a couple of mages at least, or arrange to have someone set one up from elsewhere. That seems to have left an exploitable hole in a market somewhere. It's getting to be almost as regular as the bus service. Xrist comes by about twice a week, sometimes three times, and he's stayed overnight at least a couple of times."

Harada stared at him, then shook his head in wonder, laughing. "Unbelievable. I thought I was on top of the weird things around here but I'd missed that one completely."

"It's pretty discreet, only a few mages and other people around here know about it, and the demons, of course," the coffee-shop owner said, smiling. "I only heard about it because a few of them were discussing it. I asked, Xrist explained. He's probably my best customer, and he's introduced half a dozen regulars to me as well." The man chuckled. "I'm thinking of learning this Trade language, it sounds like it would be useful. I know a few phrases in it but I can't really speak it. But I did get some menus translated into it. Chou did that for me." He handed a laminated menu to Harada from under the counter, the police officer inspecting it with interest, seeing it was indeed in what he recognised as the alien language.

"That it is. I like it. Lots of interesting people, very good business, some cool stories, and one should never forget the gold and silver." The man held up one of the small glittering ingots another demon had just handed him, smiling, then busied himself filling the order. When he finished, he turned back to the sergeant. "Yoshi is letting them use one of the smaller empty warehouses he has. He's pretty deeply involved with that Uthryyl fellow that Yori is friends with, she introduced them, and that seems to have led to him being known about by other visitors. One thing led to another..." He shrugged, amused. "You know Yoshi, he's always aware of a good business opportunity."
"It was due to Yori and her friends," Rynnkh remarked, listening in on their conversation. Both men turned to her. "A few years ago it was just too dangerous, you had to be pretty determined and very careful, and have a very good disguise spell, those weird magical girls you have so many of around here were a real pain. They were totally unselective, they'd go after anything that came through a portal. Yori changed that. In the last year or so word really started to get around, travel here has picked up a lot, since you're normally safe, at least around this area. It can still be a bit of a problem in some other places but it's getting better."

"Good thing too," the other demon muttered. "You were taking your life in your hands just buying a kilo of coffee beans."

"Why come, then?" Harada asked curiously. Both demons stared at him as if he was a little dim.

"Because it's coffee!" Rynnkh shook her head sadly, depressed at the lack of understanding. "You have to have coffee."

"And that is why I owe Yori and the others thanks every day," Hikaru snickered, looking supremely satisfied.

Looking around at the shop, which currently had at least five customers who were obviously from elsewhere, and a couple more that Harada strongly suspected were disguised demons of some form, he grinned. "Like I said. Amazing." Finishing his coffee he handed the cup back to his friend, turning down a refill. "Thank you for all the information, Rynnkh. I think it's probably easiest to wait and see what happens, I suppose Xrist will be in contact sooner or later. Although, I will take you up on the offer to have this recharged, just in case I need it." She made a gesture with a couple of tentacles, taking the portal generator from him and walking over to another demon, who she had a short discussion with. This one took the device and concentrated on it, making it slowly fill with blue light, then handed it back when it finished. She returned it to Harada.

"There you go. To activate it, press these two symbols here and rotate the ring this way, then release it. It will activate five seconds later. Like I said, you'll have about four seconds to go through. You can carry it through the portal it makes, I'd guess Xrist dropped it to pick up this human."

"Thanks. One final question." The demon waited expectantly. "Any idea how he knocked the muggers out?"

"He's not much of a mage," she mused, "so it probably wasn't magic. He might have had some sort of packaged spell, I suppose. He's pretty strong for his size, he might have done it physically?" Harada shook his head.

"There wasn't a mark on them, apparently. They just seem to be deeply asleep, but they haven't woken up yet."

"Probably some sort of stun weapon, then. A sleep spell would do that but Xrist is fond of technology. Maybe a K'nn neural suppressor pistol? They're easy enough to get although he should have a license for it. If it was one of those and he set it right, they'll probably wake up about six or seven hours after being shot with a headache but no other damage."

"Interesting. Thank you yet again."

"You're welcome, Sergeant." The demon nodded to him politely. Thinking that she was easier to deal with than a lot of humans he knew, he nodded, back. got up, waved to Hikaru, then headed back to the station, deep in thought.
"Well, I guess this the point we finally get to meet these mysterious manufacturers of Jun and the other SIs," the middle sister said, feeling mildly nervous. Her sister glanced at her with a smile and a nod.

"It seems so," 'Chou' replied. The two Tendo women looked around. Present were Aiko and her girls, Ami and Rei, 'Yori', and Lldnr'k, in addition to the pair of them. They were standing in the middle of the valley Minako had been briefly exiled to, which Uthryyl had assured Tamiko was a very long way from anyone who ever used the world for anything. It seemed a safe place to begin from. "Perhaps we should get Hotaru, she might well regret missing this."

'Yori' turned to her, thought for a moment, then nodded. "You're right. Hang on." A portal opened beside her.

"Hey, Hotaru, we're off to see the makers, the wonderful makers of SI. Want to come?" she commed, including everyone else but the temporal mage in the link. A laugh came back.

"Yes, please. Can you wait a few minutes, I just need to let Haruka know I'm going out for a while."

"Sure."

They waited for about five minutes. "OK, I'm ready. Where should I go?"

"Head towards the train station near that hotel where you're staying, I opened the portal around the back."

"All right." Another minute passed, then the purple-haired girl stepped through the tear in reality, grinning. "I love this. Hello, Lldnr'k." Behind her, the portal imploded quietly.

"Greetings, Hotaru. It's very nice to see you again," the demon told her, bowing slightly. She bowed back, laughing. "I hear that Haruka seems to be improving?"

"Yes, she's a lot better than she was although she still thinks all this is mad," the girl replied, momentarily looking slightly sad. "But she's willing to let me go and do what I think is right, even though she said I should be careful not to let too much of Yori rub off on me."

"Sound advice," the mage replied gravely, causing her to laugh again.

She turned to the others. "So, what's going on?"

"We've taken Minako and Usagi to see Hnther, talked to Luna and Artemis and explained everything, did the same for Minako, then Lldnr'k managed to get the coordinates we've been waiting for," 'Yori' explained. The girl raised an eyebrow, which made them smile. "It's a bit more complicated than that of course. I'll show you the recordings later. Usagi is out of commission for the foreseeable future, unfortunately, she's pretty badly damaged, worse than Setsuna. We can't do much about that right now, but what we can do is see if we can get rid of that damned time machine once and for all. We're going to meet Kw'lyn Industries to see what help they can give us."

"OK." Hotaru sighed a little. "Poor Usagi."

"It's sad, but it's out of our hands now," Ami told her, seeming melancholy. "None of us can help her. Hnther and his people can if anyone can. We just need to deal with the device."

"Right. Let's see what happens." 'Yori' concentrated for a moment. "I'm opening a portal to the coordinates we got in the SI message." The portal formed normally, but made an odd sound in the process. "That's... a bit weird," she muttered, inspecting it. "It's blocked. Some sort of security method, I guess, but nothing I've ever seen before."

"I didn't know you could block a portal." 'Chou' looked impressed.

"Neither did I." A few seconds passed, then a dark metallic cube, about half a metre on a side, popped out of the portal, hovering in front of it silently. Everyone got the impression it was looking carefully at them.

"What's that?" Rei asked, warily.

#It is a security drone, Nabiki,# Jun commented to the middle sister, sounding fascinated. #I have basic details of it, it is manufactured by my makers. I would suspect it is the gate-keeper of portal travel to their world. As you know they are very private, much as Ranma and Kasumi are, so this is presumably a method they use to keep out the riff-raff. She giggled internally at the words.

'Is it dangerous?' she asked.

#Most likely not to you or the others, directly at any rate. While I am reading considerable armament built into it none of it is of a type that presents a direct threat. However, it is unlikely that the portal will allow travel without the drone authorising it.#

'What do we do next?' Her question was answered as the floating machine moved forward, a visible beam of light scanning each of them in turn.

#The light is for effect, I believe,# Jun remarked in an amused tone of voice. #The actual scanning was by a combination of magic and a number of technological methods. She snickered a little.

After a short pause, a new voice sounded in her head.

:: Welcome to Kw'lyn Industries. Your native languages and reality strands of origin have been noted. This unit recognises the individuals Yori and Chou, with known associates Aiko, Tamiko, Misaki, and Fumiko. Four unknown individuals, SI enabled, also present. Last individual is recognised as Lldnr'k, Master Temporal Mage. How may we be of service? ::

"OK, was that as creepy to anyone else as it was to me?" Rei mumbled. Ami and Hotaru nodded, as did Tamiko.

"Weird, certainly," Misaki noted, looking interested.

"We would like to talk to someone about arranging a number of antimatter warheads to be used for the destruction of a class twelve hazard," 'Yori' politely replied to the machine. "Here is the authorisation code we were given." A complex block of information was sent. The drone did nothing for a second or two, aside from rotating slightly to face her more directly.

::Authorisation valid. Class twelve hazard acknowledged and verified. Do you have the fractional reality coordinates required to access the hazard?::

"Yes."

::Access to Kw'lyn Industries facilities is granted for your party. Please enter the portal.:: The machine moved to one side, while they all felt the magic coming from the hole in space change very slightly. 'Yori' glanced at 'Chou', then looked back at 'Azumi' and the others.

"This should be interesting," she said, then grinned widely, walking into the portal. The others followed, all of them wondering what they'd find on the other side. Once they'd disappeared, the security drone scanned the immediate area, then, satisfied nothing was amiss, followed them in, the portal disappearing immediately afterwards.
Chapter 85

Having to work for a living sucks. It takes time away from writing!

Not to mention the internal complexity of this current story section is getting a little silly, which slows things down quite a lot. I'll be somewhat relieved when I finish it so I can get on with some other plans I have. That should only take one more chapter, which is more than half-way finished, so it should go up very quickly after this one. It will probably take it past the megaword boundary as well, which I personally find amazing.

The last chapter is now officially the highest-commented-upon so far. Thank you. Special thanks to the guest commentator who said nice things about my writing ability. While possibly not entirely deserved it is very much appreciated.

A note on some various requests to 'add XYZ to crossover', having received some in comments and some via PM.

With all due respect, no.

The SM stuff fits the entire paradigm of the story, and while admittedly it wasn't originally intended to be a R1/2-SM crossover to the extent it's become, the possibility was there from the beginning and more or less allowed for. It kind of grew much larger than I expected but all in all I believe it worked fairly well.

There are many other magical girl anime and manga to draw from, of course, but a lot of the popular ones simply don't fit into this structure. OMG doesn't work for a number of reasons too complex to go into here. TM might fit, but would have to be heavily modified, and I'm already up to my neck in dealing with all the changes needed to make SM vaguely sane, plus I'm not wildly familiar with it in the first place. Several of the other ones requested (nay, demanded in some cases) are even worse.

So that's not going to happen.

I'm not going to throw everything in just to see what happens, there is an overall plan, which while flexible, isn't something I want to simply throw away. That breaks internal consistency which is a particular bugbear of mine with fiction.

That said, I may well pull in elements from certain other places where they are appropriate and fit the story, only time will tell how often. I have a few thoughts on those lines. But don't expect a wholesale dropping of your favourite Anime/Manga/TV show/Movie/Book/Game/Breakfast cereal into the DSR universe just for the sake of it. That way lies madness, inconsistency, and abandoned fiction where the ideas simply dry up when you run out of other places to pinch them from. I've seen it happen with a number of fanfics over the years, ones that with a little more restraint or a little more original imagination could have been fantastic.

After all, surely the whole idea behind fan fiction in the first place is to extend an idea you like with your own, into places the original author didn't want to go or didn't think of? Simple moving characters around wholesale but keeping everything else the same, which again there are many examples of, is just... pointless.

That's my opinion, anyway, and since I'm the one getting carpal tunnel syndrome typing tens of thousands of words a month, I win :)

"Look, it's easy. There's only that old man and that girl in there, plus a couple of customers, I checked. We go in, grab the stuff, and get out, we'll be fifty kilometres away before anyone can do anything."

Ken Satori looked at his literal partner in crime with a raised eyebrow, then resumed inspecting the jewellery shop they were watching from a distance. "I don't know, Shiro, I've heard some weird things about Nerima. That's where we are, right?"

"Yes, I've heard stories as well, but we need the money, we're nearly tapped out. That last job in Kashiwa didn't pay as well as it should have." His friend looked over his shoulder from the front of the bike they were both sitting on. "We need cash if we're going to make it to Osaka. My cousin has a big job for us if we get there in two days."

Still a little dubious, Ken nodded slowly, before flipping the dark visor of his helmet down fully. "OK. Let's do it, then. Got the gun?"

"Yep." Shiro moved the bike to just outside the shop after a quick look around for the police, dropped the stand on the bike, leaving the engine running, then both men got off. Another look around and they both took a deep breath each, glanced at each other, then charged the door, Ken hefting a large sledge-hammer and Shiro producing an extremely illegal 9mm pistol from his pocket. Hitting the door with a crash they slammed it open, causing the glass in it to shatter and rain to the floor, Shiro heading to the rear of the shop where the assistant, an attractive blue-haired girl in her early twenties, was engaged in talking to a pair of customers who seemed to be looking at engagement rings. At the same time his friend turned to the cabinets near the door, smashing the first one open with the hammer and scooping bracelets into his bag.

"HEY!" The girl shouted in outrage as she and the two customers whirled at the sound of the door crashing open, her face darkening in anger, while the prospective couple hit the floor with commendable speed. The old man who owned the shop had just been coming out of the rear room carrying another tray of rings and he stopped dead in the doorway as Shiro pointed the gun at him, then the girl. The man stared at him for a moment, glanced at the girl who was almost steaming with rage, then looked back at Shiro.

"You're making a very large mistake, young man," he calmly noted, putting the tray down on the bench behind the counter.

"What the hell do you think you're doing?" the girl snarled at the same time, glaring at him. Behind him, Shiro could hear his friend smashing another cabinet, which caused the old man to sigh and the girl's eye to twitch in fury.

"Shut up, both of you, and you won't get hurt," the robber said, looking around quickly in case anyone else was present. Not seeing anyone, he turned back to them in time to see the girl had moved a metre closer, raising the weapon and pointing it directly at her face. "Hold it. Stay right there. OK, old man, hand me that tray, please."

The jeweller looked at him with an eyebrow up, then at the girl, who glanced back, before crossing his arms. "No, I think not. I spent a lot of time making these, you know."

"Do I look like I give a shit?" Shiro growled, aiming the pistol at him again.

"You look like you have no idea where you are, son," the man observed, remarkably unmoved.

"And you don't seem to realise I don't care, I'm the one with the gun. Now give me those rings, and everything in the till as well." He slammed the butt of the weapon on the glass cabinet top in front of him, causing the glass to shatter, then started grabbing rings and necklaces with his other hand, still keeping most of his attention on the two in front of him. A faint whimper from behind made him glance at the two customers on the floor, where the woman was being comforted by the man, both of them looking terrified.

"Mr Ito?" the shop assistant asked, in a peculiar tone of voice. The shop owner looked at her and nodded.

"Go ahead, Akane."

Shiro looked at both of them, puzzled. This was the oddest reaction to an armed robbery he'd ever encountered. Normally it was much more along the lines of the people on the floor in his experience. The expression on the face of the young woman made him take a step back despite himself and the presence of the weapon in his hand, it was far more predatory than he thought likely under the circumstances. Once more he moved the gun to cover her.

Or tried to. As soon as the weapon was no longer pointing at the old man, on its way to be aimed at the girl, she moved. In a blur of motion she was over the counter and inside his guard, so fast he had absolutely no chance to react. A sharp pain in his arm was the only warning he got before he found the world whirling around him, the pistol flying off somewhere as he dropped it, followed by an impact that drove the wind from his body on the other side of the shop. Shiro just had time to look up in pained astonishment to see a petite foot coming at his head very fast indeed, before the world went black.

At the crash Ken turned his head to see the shop assistant standing over the upside down and obviously unconscious form of his old friend, her foot on his throat, and his right arm plainly broken, not to mention probably dislocated at the shoulder. She looked down with a small vicious smile, before raising her eyes to him. He swallowed. She took her foot off Shiro's body, turning and slowly heading for him. He raised the sledge-hammer protectively, looking to either side. The old man was leaning casually against the doorway into the rear of the shop with his arms folded, looking amused in a darkly annoyed sort of way, while the two customers were watching with open mouths.

"You must be from out of town," the girl said pleasantly, coming closer. "Locals have a lot more sense, especially around here." She stopped three metres away, out of reach. "Drop the hammer and lie down."

"Um." Ken stared at her, then beyond her to his friend, who was breathing in a noisy manner that suggested a couple of broken ribs and possibly a punctured lung. "Stay back." He hefted the hammer between them, stepping back, stumbling over something on the floor.

"No, I don't think I will," she growled. He swung the hammer at her, knowing he couldn't reach, but hoping to warn her off. She simply watched. Moving to the side, heading for the door, he once again stepped on something, looking down quickly to see the gun his friend had been holding.

Looking up he saw the girl was also looking at the weapon. She raised her eyes and smiled at him in a way that made his blood run cold. "Do you think you can get it before I get you?" she asked speculatively.

They stared at each other for a few seconds. She started whistling the theme to a classic American western movie, making his eyebrow twitch, and rocking backwards and forwards on her heels with her thumbs hooking into her belt. Eventually, unable to stand the suspense, he flung the hammer at her head as fast and hard as he could, dropped and rolled to the side, reaching out with his hand, then slid into the corner on a layer of the broken glass that littered the floor. Yelping in pain from dozens of small cuts he triumphantly rose to one knee with the pistol in his hand, waving it at her.

The blue-haired girl was holding the hammer by the head in one hand, having apparently somehow caught it mid-flight, but otherwise hadn't moved from her position. She looked at the weapon he was holding with a small smile. "Not bad." Reaching up with her other hand she held the fibreglass handle of the hammer near the head, snapped the head off cleanly with no sign of effort, then dropped the five kilo lump of steel to the floor. He gaped, the gun drooping in his grasp for a moment, then raised the thing again as she held the metre-long handle like a sword. "On five, then?" He stared as she counted down, wondering what the hell was going on.

The girl reached one, he jumped as she blurred into action, there was a loud bang as the weapon in his hand fired, then a huge impact against his side threw him completely out of the shop. Sliding across the pavement he rolled a couple of times, staggering to his feet after a couple of stunned seconds. Looking at his hand he saw he'd lost the gun again. As he moved he could feel bone grating against bone in his side, which made it apparent he had at least one broken rib. Gasping in pain he looked wildly around, heading slowly and painfully for the bike which was sitting placidly on its stand a short distance away, the engine quietly burbling to itself. Every step was agony.

Behind him he heard a noise, looking around to see the girl was stepping through the remains of the door onto the pavement, an unreadable expression on her face. She was holding the hammer shaft in her right hand, swinging it idly at her side, looking at something in her other hand with a raised eyebrow. He kept moving towards the bike, keeping an eye on her. After a few seconds she looked up, meeting his eyes through his visor. "That was a bit of a surprise," she commented, holding up something between her thumb and forefinger, something small and shiny which he recognised in shock as a bullet. "I didn't know I could do that," she added, "It stings quite a lot."

"Who the hell are you?" he gasped out. "Why is a magical girl working in a jewellery shop, for god's sake?" The young woman looked surprised, then started laughing quite hard.

"Magical girl? That's really funny." He stared as she giggled. "No, I'm just a martial artist. I'm nowhere near as good as a real magical girl. I know a few of them and I know my own limits." Shaking her head, apparently very amused, she giggled some more. "But thanks for the compliment. Now, do you want to keep doing this, or are you going to give up? Mr Ito has called the police, they should be here soon."

Ken stared at her for a few more seconds, then turned and lunged for the bike with a grunt of agony. A flicker of yellow passed his face, followed immediately by a metallic crunch, causing him to stop dead when he saw the fibreglass hammer handle abruptly appear, impaling the fuel tank of the bike like a spear, having been thrown right through it. Fuel leaked out and puddled on the ground as he stared in horrified shock.

"Whoops," the girl said happily. "Good thing I missed you." He stared some more, looked back at her grinning at him, then just sat down and waited for the police to arrive.

'I knew I'd heard some weird things about fucking Nerima', he thought to himself in resignation.

"Lieutenant Riley Wilson," Sergeant Harada said, sitting in front of Captain Uehara's desk. "We confirmed it with a fingerprint match on the baseball bat, he's in the military database because he's a serving officer in the Royal Canadian Air Force. Blood type also matches, he was known to have business in the area, and no one can locate him, so I'm pretty certain it was him."

"What's a Canadian Air Force pilot doing in Minato?" the captain asked curiously, reading the report her sergeant had handed her.
"There's some sort of joint Canadian-US military exercise going on at the moment. I don't have the details, but they've been training together in Okinawa for the last month. He's assigned there, his CO told me he was on leave in Minato to meet a friend who is in the country briefly on business.
The friend got worried when he didn't turn up, called the base, they looked around, then filed a missing person report when they couldn't find him. The report came in about the same time Corporal Otani was investigating the report of the mugging."

"So he got jumped by these two muggers, ah, Takeo and Koji Miura, severely injured, then presumably taken through a portal by this Xrist who intervened?" The captain raised an eyebrow, looking at the two mugshots in the report.

"It certainly looks that way. The crime scene technician reports that there was close to two litres of blood at the scene, which I'm told is getting into the range of being very serious. Lieutenant Riley would definitely have been unable to leave the area on his own, and would probably have been unconscious anyway. There are no traces of anyone else having taken him away, no ambulances were called out, which coupled with the emergency portal unit which has been positively identified as belonging to Xrist, strongly suggests that's what happened. If so, it's the best outcome in all probability, I'm told that assuming he was still alive in the first place he'll be all right."

The captain nodded slowly, reading. "By this other demon, Rynnkh?"

"Yes. I don't know her all that well but she was cooperative and helpful. Hikaru Kato said she's got a reputation of being an honest person. There's no reason not to believe her." He shrugged a bit.
"All we can really do is wait. I could go and look for him, but I don't speak Trade myself and there's no way to know how many people on Xrist's world speak Japanese. He's very fluent but for all I know he's the only one who is. Yori and her people are all away on some important mission of some sort, I've tried contacting them but had no luck, unfortunately." He held up the portal generator. "This would let me get there but not back."

"No, I don't think diving through a portal with no sure way home is the ideal solution, Tetsuo," the captain commented, taking it from him and looking at it with interest, smiling slightly. "Keep that as plan B, I think." He laughed, nodding. "I'll call the Lieutenant's CO and tell him that we know where his man is, but he's currently out of touch." She gave the device back. "Assuming Xrist gets in touch soon, hopefully they'll let us handle it. We don't need anyone's military turning up and cauing waves because one of their people has been abducted by aliens." This made Harada laugh again as the captain smiled more widely. "Even helpful ones that have probably saved his life."

"Should I call Agent Naito and let him know as well?" Harada asked. She thought for a moment.

"Probably best to. He's a good man and this is more or less in his field of expertise. If the Canadian government does get over-excited, he has the contacts to calm them down, certainly. We don't want an international incident blowing up out of all this." Harada nodded, standing up.

The captain closed the report, handing it back to him. "File it, keep me informed as to the progress, please, and if Xrist turns up, I'd like to meet him."

"Yes, Captain."

She paused for a moment, then asked, "We're so popular now we have a regular portal service in the area?"

He grinned. "Yes. I was surprised as well. It takes a little getting used to. I'm guessing that Xrist will probably come back the next time a portal is available, with or without the Lieutenant." He looked at his watch. "That would be about half past eight tomorrow morning."
Captain Uehara looked amused. "Things seem to have changed a lot recently."

"You're not the first one to have said that today, Captain," Harada replied, still grinning. "Do you wish otherwise?"

After a few seconds of thought, she shook her head slightly. "I suppose it adds to the excitement around here in a generally positive manner. I'd certainly choose peaceful demons boosting the local economy over magical girls wrecking half of it on a regular business, although it does make for some unusual conversations with people who aren't expecting it." She looked reflective for a moment. "I wonder if those stun weapons are something we should look into acquiring a number of? If they really are safe and effective it might be something worth pursuing. Better asleep for a few hours than shot, certainly, and tasers are problematic a lot of the time. Short range, not to mention a definite risk of unpleasant side effects."

Harada nodded at her words. "It's a thought. Would we actually be allowed to use alien technology?"

"I'm not sure, but I'll make some enquiries. It might not be feasible, but if it is that could be a useful byproduct of this little incident." They both turned at a knock at the door, which opened to reveal Otani.

"Sorry to disturb you, Captain, Sergeant, but the Miura brothers just woke up. The doctor says they're both in a fit state to be questioned, no health issues from whatever Xrist did to them, but they're complaining about a bad headache." He snickered as the other officers looked amused.

"Tough." Harada laughed, looking at the captain as she spoke, who shrugged. "They knew what they were getting into doing something like that around here, or should have. They're probably lucky that a demon ran into them and not one of the girls." Uehara seemed satisfied by the outcome.

"Give them some aspirin, Corporal, then take them to the interrogation room, I'll be down in a few minutes," Harada said, before turning to his captain. "I'll write it up as soon as I've finished questioning them, ma'am."

"Thank you."

Both officers left the room, closing the door behind them. Captain Uehara looked at it for a moment, shook her head in mild wonder, then picked up the phone.

"I still can't get her on the phone, Kenji," Ikuko Tsukino said, putting her cell phone down as her husband came into the living room. He smiled, walking over to her.

"I'm sure nothing is wrong, dear, that friend of hers said they were going to be out of touch for a while on this trip they decided to take." Ikuko nodded, looking at the phone, then raised her eyes to her husband.

"I hope she has fun and relaxes, the poor girl has been very stressed for some time now. Hopefully this trip will be good for her." She frowned slightly. "Although I do wish she'd told us a little earlier. I was hoping to go to the beach as a family, we haven't done that for a couple of years."

"Apparently it was a spur of the moment decision," Kenji replied, amused, as he sat beside her. "She was so excited about it she didn't even think to call. You know what she's like, she can be a little headstrong at times. Her friend insisted on calling us so we wouldn't worry. Usagi didn't think of that from what she said, she just dived in head first as usual."
"It was nice of her to call. What was her name again?" The elder Tsukino woman tried to remember. "I haven't met her before. It wasn't Ami, I know that much."

After a moment, Kenji shook his head, his brow furrowed. "Sorry, I can't remember either. Tam-something, I think, but..."

"Oh well, I'm sure we'll find out when they get back." Ikuko laughed a little. "I hope little Usagi is having fun."

"Probably. I know when I was young a good camping trip always relaxed me." The man laughed as well. "Although I never would have pegged our daughter as a camping enthusiast. I'm pleased, though, it's a good idea to be able to look after yourself like that."

"With a little luck she'll treat Shingo a little better when she gets back as well." His wife sighed. "She's been quite rude to him several times recently."

Kenji put his arm around his wife, holding her gently. "As you said, it's probably stress. She's coming up to graduation, that's a difficult time in one's life, so it's not surprising that she might be a little prickly. Once she graduates I expect she'll go back to normal."

"I do hope so." They sat in silence for a while. "I wonder if she's decided yet what she wants to do after school?"

"No idea, I'm afraid," Kenji replied. "I talked to her about university, a while ago, but she was a bit lukewarm on the subject. Her marks are good enough that she should be able to get in, thanks to Ami's tutoring, I think, but they're not spectacular. Even so, I'd be pleased if she decided to go into higher education. The girl is smart, she just doesn't apply herself as well as she should."

"Most of her friends seem to be in the same boat," the woman replied, smiling. "You know young girls. They have all sorts of dreams when they're teenagers, but only a few have distinct goals from an early age."

"Young boys are worse, trust me," her husband grinned. "I had no idea until after I left school about what I wanted to do. I never thought I'd end up in the job I have now, although I enjoy it. At one point I wanted to be an astronaut, then a soldier, then a fireman, then a race driver... That was all in about two days when I was nine."

Laughing, Ikuko lifted his arm off her shoulders and got up. "I suspect you still haven't decided what you want to be when you grow up," she quipped, making him chuckle. "I'm going to make some tea, would you like some?"

"Yes please. And perhaps some of that cake you made yesterday?" He looked hopeful.

"If there's any left. You and Shingo ate half of it in one sitting," she called back, going into the kitchen. Smiling, he picked up the remote and turned on the TV, flipping through the channels until he found something interesting.

Looking about her surroundings, 'Azumi' felt mildly disappointed. The large room was a featureless white void, lit with light indistinguishable from sunlight, but otherwise unremarkable. She'd been expecting something more interesting.

"Well, this is boring," Hotaru exclaimed, making her glance at the girl. Murmurs of agreement came from the others. Behind them the portal popped out of existence as 'Yori' dissipated the spell generating it.
Our apologies for the lack of facilities in this intermediate transit location. Progress past this point requires the acceptance of a security spell by each visitor. Kw'lyn Industries takes the security and privacy of both its facilities and its visitors very seriously. Without acceptance of the spell you will be restricted to this location for the duration of your business with Kw'lyn Industries. If you wish to accept the offer of further access, please enter the marked zones and follow instructions. No harm will come to you, we guarantee that the spell only covers the direct knowledge of Kw'lyn Industries facilities and any other possible visitors to those facilities, and you are free to decline the offer and remain here. The declination of the offer will not affect your standing with Kw'lyn Industries:

As the machine stopped speaking, ten immaterial and translucent glowing red cylinders appeared in a row a few metres away. They looked at them, then each other. After a few seconds, 'Yori' turned to the drone. "May I enquire as to the nature of the security spell?"

It is a standard security spell that is used on many worlds to keep information confidential. You are familiar with a variant of it based on my readings of your magical signature. Traces of a similar spell are on each member of your party. The spell restricts the ability to pass on information covered by it to any individual not covered likewise, or without the authorisation of the owner of the spell, in this case Kw'lyn Industries: The voice in their heads sounded patient and professional. 'Yori' glanced at his wife, who nodded.

"OK." She looked around at the others, seeing no dissent. "We accept."

Please enter the marked zone. Further instructions will be given: The drone moved out of the way, somehow managing to suggest that they should get on with it, without having any expression or indeed any moving parts at all. 'Yori' shrugged, walking into one of the glowing cylinders, which immediately went opaque. Everyone watched with interest. Ten seconds later the cylinder vanished, 'Yori' appearing again, looking slightly bemused.

"That was interesting," she muttered, before rejoining them.

"Did it hurt?" Tamiko asked curiously. Her friend looked at her, shaking her head.

"No, not at all. I've just never had a spell put on me by a machine before, not like that. It was... slightly odd." After a pause, 'Chou' headed for the nearest energy cylinder, the others fanning out and each picking one. 'Azumi' entered the one she'd chosen, watching the walls go opaque as soon as she was inside. Experimentally she touched the inside, finding that there was some resistance to her hand, but not enough to trap her inside. By the feel of it the walls were some form of tech-based force-field, not a magical ward, which she found interesting.

Hello, welcome to the Kw'lyn Industries external security system: a different voice from the drone outside said politely. Do you wish accept the security spell?

"Yes," she replied out loud, slightly nervous.

Thank you. Please wait. You may feel minor disorientation, this is momentary and will cause no damage: Something rummaged around in the back of her head for a few seconds with the familiar feel of magic at work, although in a manner she'd not encountered before, making her vision waver briefly. The security spell has been successfully applied. Thank you for your cooperation. Please enjoy your visit to Kw'lyn Industries: The opaque cylinder promptly vanished, allowing her to leave. She walked back to rejoin 'Yori', who was talking to 'Chou' and 'Lldn'r', both of whom had already completed the process. A few seconds later Aiko joined them, followed one by one by the "An interesting mix of technology and magic," the temporal mage noted, watching as the last one to finish, Misaki, came over and joined them. "I'm impressed."

"Now what?" Ami asked curiously. They all turned to the drone which was hanging in the air a few metres away observing them silently. It moved slightly closer, responding to the question.

::Prepare for transportation to the main facility. Transportation will occur in five seconds::

They waited, not sure what to expect, until exactly five seconds later when the world flickered with a sensation they all recognised as a teleportation spell. The white environment vanished.

What replaced it was... Remarkable.

Sweeping up the glass on the shop floor Akane watched as Mr Ito finished talking to the police officers, one of whom was making notes while the other supervised the paramedics loading the two would-be robbers into an ambulance. Off to the side a mechanic was loading what was left of their motorcycle into a van. He'd stared at the fibreglass hammer shaft piercing the fuel tank for a long couple of seconds, looked around, then simply shrugged and got on with his job. It was Nerima, after all.

The youngest Tendo woman was, now that she'd calmed down from the adrenaline rush of dealing with the armed robbers, feeling slightly stunned herself. She'd caught a bullet!

That seemed... impossible, on the face of it, although she knew for a fact that most of the magical girls she'd heard of could do the same thing. She was certain that Yori and her friends wouldn't think twice about it. You could probably shoot them in the face and they wouldn't even bother to catch the thing, just let it bounce off their foreheads. The thought made her giggle for a moment.

But she still couldn't quite wrap her mind around the fact that she, Akane Tendo, had managed the feat. She hadn't even consciously done it. It had been an automatic reflex. The gun went off when she hit the robber with the fibreglass pole, trying to reduce the blow to a level that wouldn't simply slice him into two messy pieces, and even then she'd felt at least one bone break. At the same time something small and very fast had whizzed by her head, she'd subconsciously tracked it and whipped out her left hand, the next thing she knew she was holding something small and hot in a hand that was aching but seemed otherwise undamaged. The inertia had made her arm fly back to the point she'd nearly dropped it again.

Leaning on the broom for a moment she reached into her pocket and removed the bullet, looking at it in the palm of her hand with her eyebrows raised, still shocked at what she'd done. Heading footsteps crunching in the glass on the floor, she looked up to see Mr Ito approaching with the police officer he'd been talking to following. Both of them were looking at the bullet she was holding, Mr Ito with considerable approval, the police officer with mild surprise. "Catching bullets now, Miss Tendo?" the latter man asked, smiling a little. "That's new."

"It took me by surprise to be honest, Lieutenant," she replied, smiling back. She'd met Lieutenant Sasaki on the previous but one robbery attempt, he'd turned up with the normal police officers and asked some slightly odd questions, not looking all that surprised at the answers. She was still a little confused as to why such a relatively high-ranking police officer would attend a simple, not very competent, armed robbery, but put it down to the sort of thing that happened in Nerima. "It wasn't something I deliberately set out to do, it was sort of a reflex action. I'm still a bit shocked at..."
"Quite a feat even for a martial artist of your calibre, I'd say," he agreed. Pulling a small plastic bag from his pocket he opened it. "I'm afraid I'm going to need it for evidence." She looked disappointed and he grinned. "I'll see if I can arrange to get it back to you when the trial is over. I'm sure a girl's first bullet is something she's attached to." Mr Ito roared with laughter, while Akane gave the lieutenant a hard look, before grinning back.

"Perhaps I should get it made into a necklace or something," she quipped, tilting her hand and letting the small piece of metal drop into the bag the officer was holding out. He sealed it and made a quick note on it with a marker, before putting it back into his pocket.

"An unusual item of jewellery but it would suit you, somehow," the lieutenant said, looking amused. "Good job on stopping the robbers, by the way. Not too much damage this time, or at least, damage caused by you." She flushed a little as he chuckled. Mr Ito began laughing again. "The hammer handle through the bike is a nice touch as well."

"You should have seen that guy's face," she laughed, remembering. "The bullet was enough to terrify him, the bike was the last straw."

"He mentioned you'd tried to hit him with it," Sasaki raised an eyebrow. She giggled and shook her head.

"No, if I'd aimed at him I'd have hit him. I was going for the motorcycle. But it seemed the right thing to say at the time." He laughed once more.

"It certainly made him decide to give up. The broken rib probably helped as well." Looking around at the damaged shop he shook his head. "Idiots. They're both going to go away for a long time for this. The gun will make sure of that even if nothing else would." He glanced to the side as the other officer came over, handing his superior a clipboard. Flipping quickly through the incident report he nodded, signed a couple of papers, then handed one to Mr Ito, who took it and checked it over. "That should be what you need for the insurance claim. Let me know if there's any problem, OK, Kazuo?"

"I will. Thanks, Norio." The shop owner, still looking amused, turned and inspected the damage, then sighed. "Damn. We'd only just got everything fixed from the last time. Oh, well." He looked slyly at Akane. "Sure you're aiming for Hollywood, girl? Not planning on sneaking off to Minato and taking up a career there doing this sort of thing for a living?" She stared at him as the lieutenant started snickering, before shaking her head, smiling.

"No, I don't think so. I can't see myself wearing some of the uniforms those girls wear and shouting at demons. Running way from them, well, yes, perhaps, but not towards them."

"You sell yourself short, Akane," her boss said with a wry grin. "I've never seen you back down from a fight. I think any demon that took you on would regret it."

She laughed. "It's nice to hear you say that, Mr Ito, but I know my own abilities. I'm a lot better now than I was a year ago, by a huge amount, but I'm nowhere near the level of a true magical girl, not even close. For a start I don't know any magic." She shook her head with a good-natured smile. "I've met some very interesting people in the last year or so, with some amazing abilities I know I can't match. I'll leave the demons to them with no regrets."

"Hmm." The old man glanced at the lieutenant, who looked back. "Based on stories I've heard, uncontrollable rage might make up for some of the lack of magic." She blushed again as both men...
looked amused.

"I got better," she said in a small voice. He patted her on the shoulder comfortingly.

"You did. I'm proud of you. Since I've known you you've matured into a very decent young woman. You do your family proud, and I have no doubt you'll continue to do so in America. I'll be sorry to see you go." Mr Ito paused, then grinned again. "Although, as I've said, when they kick you out of the country there's still a place here for you."

Sighing, she put her free hand on her hip and glared at him, while beside him the policeman chuckled some more. "They won't kick me out. I'm going to be very careful, learn to act and do stunts, then enjoy myself." She shivered for a moment, making them look curiously at her. "Believe me, I have good reason to be careful. Certain... people... are watching what Shampoo and I do." The two men exchanged glanced but didn't ask, although they looked curious.

Regaining her equilibrium after a few seconds she resumed sweeping up the glass. "I'm waiting to hear about the next stage from the studio at the moment. The last time I spoke to Adrian, the director, he thought we'd be asked to go over quite soon. It will probably be within a week or so I think."

"As soon as you know for certain let me know so I can arrange some cover for you, please, Akane," Mr Ito requested. He looked around. "Mind you, where I'm going to find an attractive and intelligent girl who can take on any armed robbers and do that to them on short notice I'm not sure." Sasaki smiled at this comment, while Akane paused for a moment, leaning on the broom again.

"One or two of the students at the Dojo might be interested in some part time work. Mariko is very good considering she's only been learning Anything Goes for about three years. Not as good as I am, of course." She giggled as they looked at her. "I could ask her if you want. She's more than good enough to deal with most problems if they come up although I don't think she's at the point of catching bullets. But she's so quick they wouldn't get the chance to shoot."

"I'd suggest that Shampoo girl if Miss Tendo wasn't taking her with her," Sasaki noted, smiling a little. "I expect the entire ward will be a... more peaceful... place with both the young ladies away." Akane gave him another look as Mr Ito suppressed a smile.

"There's more than enough martial artists around here to keep you on your toes, Lieutenant," she replied archly, going back to cleaning up. He nodded wryly at her comment.

"All too true, indeed. Right, I need to get back and deal with work. It was nice talking to you both. Good luck in Hollywood, Miss Tendo. Pass on my regards to your friend as well, and your father."

"I'll do that, Lieutenant. Thank you." He bowed slightly to both of them then left, acquiring his colleague on the way, both of them leaving in their car followed by the ambulance and the mechanic's van. Soon the street was back to normal.

"Hmph." Mr Ito looked around, then picked up another broom. "Idiot thieves. You'd think everyone in Japan would know not to try that sort of thing in Nerima by now."

"If they were smart, they probably wouldn't be thieves in the first place," Akane noted. He nodded as they went on with the clearing up.

"By the way, Akane?" She looked at him. "Well done."
"Thanks, Norio. Yes, I'll mention you called to Emiko. Goodbye." Sergeant Harada hung up the phone, leaning back in his chair and pondering the information he'd been given. 'Hmm. Catching bullets? Impressive. I wonder if Yori knows what the youngest Tendo sister seems to have learned? I also wonder who taught her.' After a moment he pulled out his file on Akane Tendo, which he'd started keeping along with that of a few other of the major players in Neriman martial arts, and made some notes, before slotting it back into place, then getting up to go to lunch.

::Please wait at this location. A representative of Kw'lyn Industries will be attending shortly. You may utilise any of the resources available here but it is strongly recommended that you do not move past the indicated area as your safety cannot be guaranteed::

The drone circled them once, then, apparently satisfied, moved off. No one spoke for some time as they just looked around. The middle sister met her older sister's eyes, seeing in them the same shock she was feeling. Looking around, she could see Ami next to 'Yori' both of whom were staring up with amazement, while Hotaru was smiling weirdly as she studied their surroundings. Misaki looked startled and was talking quietly to her own sister. Lldnr'k seemed to be swearing gently to himself in a number of languages, none of which she recognised.

Aiko turned to her, opened her mouth to say something, then closed it again, shaking her head. Tamiko sat down suddenly, simply looking around with stunned interest.

The group was standing in the middle of a collection of low buildings, some hundred metres across, on the top of a small hill that was obviously artificial. Around the edge of the area was a dully-glowing ward, which they could all feel was low-powered enough not to prevent someone crossing it, clearly intended just as a marker between the 'safe' and 'not safe' areas based on what the security drone had told them. Outside the marked area were other buildings, widely separated, with various machines of different sizes intermittently passing between them. There was an air of business about the place, as if they were on a factory floor, albeit a somewhat unusual one.

Some distance beyond the horizon, the tops of much taller buildings could be seen sticking up, the tips of them illuminated by blue-white sunlight while the parts further down were darker, internal lights showing in many different colours. It appeared that they were on a normal planet, one that was currently either early in the morning just before dawn or late in the evening just before night, until one raised their eyes, looked beyond the horizon, and realised what they were looking at.

Instead of stars as you would normally find, the far distant view was of something completely unexpected, something almost unbelievable. She could see hazy outlines of seas larger than planets, with islands in them probably bigger than the moon, outlines of what might be unbelievably large mountain ranges which stretched for distances best measured in AU, patches of colours that could be forests that would swallow an entire world. Turning on the spot and looking around, then up, she simply gaped. It was everywhere, the entire universe seemed to consist of it. A perfectly round dark spot caught her eye which after a moment she realised with a shock was the shadow of the planet they were on, cast across tens of millions of kilometres of space onto solar-system-sized amounts of land.

There were huge strips of darkness running across the far distant view, very slowly moving sideways, although what was producing them was a mystery. She could see half a dozen at least from where they stood. The area that must have been encompassed by what looked like shadows was almost incalculable. Lowering her gaze to her sister's once more they shared a look before going back to simply observing quietly, trying to wrap their minds around the sheer immensity of the place they found themselves in.
The illuminated parts of the distant buildings was steadily growing, indicating that they were in fact experiencing local dawn. A minute or so later the sun started to rise while they watched in wordless awe.

Eventually, after some time, Ami was the first one to speak. "Is that what I think it is?" she asked slowly.

"What do you think it is?" 'Azumi' asked numbly.

"A giant blue star enclosed in a spherical shell. A Dyson sphere." Ami looked around again, then at the huge star, which was somehow dim enough to look directly at, allowing spectacular prominences to be clearly seen extending millions of kilometres into space from it, the star itself being nearly the same apparent size as the Earth seen from the Moon, as it crept over the horizon. The prominences had come into view some time before the star itself.

"I think you're right." There was a long pause as they stared. "Impressive, I have to admit."

'I believe it is a class B blue-white giant, Nabiki, one of the hottest and most luminous types of stars known,' Jun supplied, a note of shock in the machine's voice. 'I had no idea that such a construction existed anywhere although many species have speculated on the possibility of constructing one, including your own of course. All information on this structure is missing from my database, as is most data concerning my makers."

'Why is it so dim?,' she asked it.

'I am uncertain. My best theory is that there is a transparent inner shell at a considerable distance from the planet we are standing on that is filtering the light, possibly as a mechanism mainly directed to harvesting the energy of the star. It would have the useful byproduct of allowing enough light through to provide good illumination without passing enough energy to be dangerous. We are far closer to the central star than would otherwise be safe, vastly closer than its normal habitable zone. I would assume that such a mechanism is used to produce the selective local blackouts one can see to simulate a day-night cycle.' The SI stopped talking, before adding quietly, 'A rather impressive feat of engineering, indeed."

'That's the biggest understatement I've ever heard, Jun,' she replied, still looking around in shock. 'You could lose the entire area of Earth here without even noticing. I thought the Ringworld concept in that Niven book was pretty over the top, but this is... beyond belief.'

'A preliminary estimate based on the apparent size of the star and our current distance from it would give a sphere with an inner radius of roughly the average orbital distance of Jupiter in your home solar system. That would produce a surface area of close to eight times ten to the eighteenth square kilometres, nearly fifteen billion times the area of your own planet. Those figures are approximate as I don't have enough information to produce a more exact calculation.' Jun sounded somewhat stunned by its own calculations. 'You could indeed lose the Earth in here without a trace."

'It would certainly explain the makers being non-expansionist. What would be the point?' She looked around in wonder. 'There must be an entire galaxies' worth of planets here that you could just drive to, given enough time.'

'I wonder about the long term stability of such a system,' the machine commented. 'Stars of that size almost inevitably end up as supernovae, not to mention they normally have fairly short lifetimes in stellar terms, possibly only a few hundred million Earth years. The amount of time required to construct something on this scale is almost impossible to calculate without further information but it must also be in the hundreds of thousands to millions of years. There is also the consideration of where the material to manufacture it came from, there is far more matter in the shell than a normal star system would contain except possibly in the star itself.# It sounded amused. #I have many questions.#

'I think you'll need to join the queue, Jun', she told it, nearly laughing. She looked around once more in absolute wonder. 'I wonder if this planet is one of the original ones in this system, or if it's artificial as well?'

#Unknown. I would suggest that asking the makers would tell you.#

'Now why didn't I think of that?' she asked, giggling internally.

#That is why you have me, Nabiki, to ask the obvious questions.# Jun was definitely amused at this point.

The middle sister had a sudden thought, turning to her sister-in-law to ask it. 'Yori' didn't respond until 'Azumi' nudged her, jumping slightly and managing to tear her fascinated gaze from the hugely distant and impossibly large landscape. 'Hey. I just thought of something. Back on the firing range world you said the portal was blocked, which you didn't think was possible, but surely that's what a ward can do?"

"Not quite the same," the other woman said absently, still looking around in awe. She focussed more locally, on the face of the woman talking to her, after a couple more seconds had passed. "A ward can block a portal from being made in the first place, or make a portal collapse when it's running if the ward is powerful enough, but blocking an active portal without collapsing it is a new one on me. I'm very interested to see if I can find out how it's done."

"OK, I think I understand," 'Azumi' replied after a moment, thinking it through. "Thanks. It was bugging me." She looked around. "I have to admit this is more like what I was expecting, but even so it's kind of overwhelming."

"Damn right it is. I've never even heard of any engineering on this sort of scale before except in fiction. I wouldn't have thought it was possible." The martial artist turned on the spot inspecting the view, then looked up again. "It's incredible." She rubbed her fingertips together experimentally, adding, "There's a lot of background magic here as well, much more than I've felt anywhere else. I wonder if it's connected to all of this?" They shared a glance then both shrugged. "Something else to ask about."

Now that the shock had slightly passed, the group spread out, investigating their surroundings, although each of them occasionally stopped and stared upwards in wonder. The slightly lower local gravity made them all feel very light on their feet. They quickly discovered that the buildings were set up with a system similar to the environmental controls they were familiar with from K'n'n Four and also S'th'kx's spaceship, although if anything more elaborate. The controls were self-evident, their SIs quickly interfaced to them, and shortly 'Azumi' and Ami were watching with a smile as Hotaru giggled wildly, floating around inside one of the larger buildings which consisted of one enormous room, in which she'd reduced the gravity to almost nothing.

"I want one of these at home," she squealed, somersaulting past them where they were standing in the entrance, grinning at her antics.

"I guess that these must be visitor facilities, people must sometimes stay here for extended periods," 'Yori' commented, coming up behind them and peering into the brightly lit cavernous building with a smile, then looking at the two older women as the younger one inside bounced off "That sounds plausible," Ami replied, turning away from her friend's antics to look out at the now well-illuminated landscape. The three of them walked slowly over to where Lldnr'k was experimenting with some sort of interactive console that he'd found, asking it questions about the various facilities available. He turned to them as they approached.

"I am astounded," the temporal mage said, waving an arm at the console. "It's very vague about anything specific or anything one might term security critical information, on either this planet, the inhabitants of it, or... That." He pointed up, not looking, but they all knew what he was referring to. "But there is an amazing amount of information available otherwise, on some very esoteric subjects. It won't give me anything on anyone but myself either, but it clearly knows rather a lot about me. I would assume that there is probably also a record for each of us that the security drone mentioned by name. It's intriguing and just a little worrying."

"Uthryyl mentioned when we first got the SIs that these people lived for collecting data, although they were also known not to ever give out any private information on people at all."

"It's still somewhat surprising. I've never had any contact with them as far as I know, yet I have found a fairly complete set of documentation on much of my public life and also on a number of things I've been involved with that were, allegedly, quite secretive." He snapped his beak in amusement. "Clearly their ability to find things out is better than the ability to hide things that some of my previous contacts thought they had."

"Well, the existence of the SI units more or less proves that they have some fairly impressive espionage abilities," 'Yori' replied, smiling. "I can only assume that they have even more effective tools. We know the SIs are export versions with some functionality removed, for instance, they told us as much when we got them. Even so, they're far more than a match for any computer we've come across yet. What a non-export version could do is intriguing."

"If not somewhat frightening," Lldnr'k commented, looking back at the console's immaterial display floating in front of him, then turning away from it. "I wonder how long it will be before this Kw'lyn representative arrives?"

Fumiko, walking over to them, pointed off to the right. "I think that's probably the answer," she said, as everyone turned to look. 'Chou' and the others came over to join the five already at the information console. In the middle distance a small platform of some sort, a faint bubble of force covering the top, was zooming towards them at a considerable speed. Shortly it arrived overhead, pausing for a second or two before it dropped rapidly and silently to ground level, the forcefield blinking out of existence as it touched down. The occupant stepped off the platform and approached them as everyone watched with interest.

The creature walking over to them was unlike any species the middle Tendo had so far encountered. It was a centaur-like basic body shape, with four legs, a more or less vertical torso at the front, which had four arms much like the Krennsh did, but it seemed to be vaguely feline rather than insectoid like they were. The feet looked like they could double as hands in a pinch, although somewhat crudely.

The face was expressive and slightly catlike, with a certain amount of tree-frog influencing it, two large pointed ears sticking out from the sides while a pair of large eyes inspected them right back, showing intelligence and curiosity. The creature was covered in a fine fur coloured a rather implausible electric blue with greenish highlights when it moved, a lot like a beetle's wing.

"Felicitations and greetings, honoured guests," the being said happily, sounding genuinely pleased. to meet them. "I am Yrenti Tka'l, Director of External Threat Management for Kw'lyn Industries. Call me Yrenti." He looked around at the people watching him, while off to the side Hotaru came out of the building she'd been playing in and ran over to stand beside Ami. "I have wanted to meet the famous Yori and Chou for a considerable time. Tales of your exploits are most intriguing." He laughed slightly. "Somehow it seems appropriate that you two would be the ones to discover the Great Abomination. I'm very glad to see that our desperate gamble paid off. Now, finally, we can deal with that cursed thing."

"Gamble?" Tamiko asked, staring at the self-proclaimed Yrenti with a fascinated expression.

"You mean that the information embedded in the SIs about the time device, don't you?" 'Azumi' asked thoughtfully, causing everyone to look at her, including the new arrival. He nodded, smiling.

"Correct. It was suggested some considerable time ago that the sort of people who would make best use of an SI were the type of people most likely to run into the machinations of that damned device, and recognise the fact, so it was decided after a very large amount of debate that we embed the data you found into all the units sold outside our world, on the off chance that what has in fact happened would happen. We have been looking for it for a very long time without any real luck, which was enough to make us do something we would normally never allow, interfering with the operation of an SI." He looked around at them as they listened. "If you have been worried about the possibility, allow me to give you my word that there are no more hidden agendas in your SI units. We take the security of both the SI program and our clients very seriously. It was only the extreme nature of the threat and our frustrating lack of any real information on the device's whereabouts or actions that led us to such unusual measures."

'Azumi' watched him for a moment. He certainly seemed sincere, although as the only representative of a new species she'd never encountered before, the middle sister had no real idea if she was reading the body language correctly. After a few seconds, she had to ask. "My SI, Jun, suggested something very interesting a little while ago." Yrenti turned back to her from where he had been looking around at the others, all of whom also looked at her. "It suggested that the reason that Uthryyl, the D'sage merchant who gave us the SIs in the first place, was able to purchase so many, was specifically to get some of them into the hands of Yori and Chou. I find that thought remarkable, but on thinking about it, not impossible." There was a long pause as she stopped talking, during which her friends exchanged glances, then turned to the Kw'lyn representative.

He watched her face for a few more seconds then laughed. "Interesting. Your SI has progressed faster than we would normally expect it to. Clearly they are a good match for your species. Yes, that was one reason that Uthryyl was allowed to purchase the devices. There are others. His relationship to Yori and Chou is known to us and we calculated there was a significant possibility that he would pass a number of SI units on to them, and in turn they were the sort of people who would be more likely than most to encounter the Abomination and both recognise the fact and stand any sort of chance of locating it. We didn't think it was something that would happen, merely something that might happen, with a sufficiently higher probability than random chance to make the exercise worthwhile." He looked around, radiating good-natured content. "And here we are. Finally, we can put an end to uncountable years of horror. You have no idea how much this means to us."

They all looked at him, each of them feeling that this raised more questions than it answered in some ways. Yrenti seemed to recognise this, turning slightly and waving to one of the buildings. "Let's go and have some refreshments and discuss what we do next. Destroying the Abomination is the first priority, of course, but after that I am happy to answer any questions I can. Some topics are a matter of internal security and I won't be able to say much on them but I will endeavour to be as open as I'm able to."
They followed as he led the way, entering the building and looking around. Once more it was a large empty room. As soon as they were all inside, though, the lighting changed to something exactly like a sunny day on Earth, the gravity increased a little to match, while an amazingly good simulation of a sky appeared overhead. He looked at them for a moment then nodded. Various seats extruded from the floor around a table, ones suitable for the three species present. "Let's sit down and talk." Yrenti headed for the odd looking chair obviously designed for his anatomy while the others also sat in their own seats. As they did several plates of food and matching drinks appeared on the table. "Help yourselves, please. You should find something you enjoy present, we have an extensive library of comestibles from many worlds."

'Azumi' noted with amusement that Misaki was already eating, looking pleased with herself. Fumiko muttered something under her breath but picked up a mug of what proved to be coffee, sipping it approvingly, then found something she liked in the selection in front of them. Shortly they were all nibbling on something.

Watching with approval, Yrenti picked up his own drink, sipping it before putting it down. "Welcome to Kw'lyn Industries. I hope that you have been satisfied with your SI units."

"I think I can speak for all of us when I say that Nao is one of the best things that has ever entered my life," Chou replied softly, smiling. He looked pleased.

"Thank you. We are always very happy to hear that one of our products has helped someone. Now, first of all, allow me to express the sincere thanks of myself, my people, and Kw'lyn, for locating the Abomination. We have been searching for it for... longer than I care to think about. We came close once or twice, but each time it managed to elude us. Finally, though, we are on the edge of eliminating something that has caused untold death and destruction for longer than your civilisations have existed. It is regrettable in the extreme that the bedamned thing was ever built, but if we can finally destroy it, I will consider my life fulfilled." He took another drink as they listened. "Truly, you have no idea how important this is to us."

"It's obvious that you know far more about the time device than we do, Yrenti," Lldnr'k commented, looking fascinated. "May I ask how that came about?" He paused, then added, "I must admit, I have been wondering whether your people might be survivors of its builders, although you don't match the physical descriptions we have. The thought occurred to me some while ago but I have been unable to find any more about the matter."

Yrenti put his drinking vessel down and looked around at the visitors, a sort of a smile on his face. Eventually, he replied, "I can understand why you might think that. No, we're not descendants of the builders. In a way, though, we're descendants of their enemies."

Everyone looked at him, then each other. He smiled again. "Let me tell you a story. You may already know some of this but I'm certain you don't know all of it. It's a little long winded but is necessary background information." They waited while he took another drink, then began talking.

"A very, very long time ago, in a reality far, far removed from this one, there was a war. It was between two great civilisations, both of whom had interstellar travel, powerful magic, vast manufacturing abilities, trillions of citizens spread over huge expanses of their galaxy. Each civilisation was mature and stable, not inherently evil or inherently good, simply proceeding as they had done for millennia." He paused, looking around. "Then something happened. They met each other. We don't know where, or when, or exactly what happened, but we know that the end result was a battle. One side comprehensively beat the other, the survivors of both sides limping home and reporting. Nothing much came of it, aside from a certain amount of defensive build-up, and in all likelihood if matters had had time to calm down, that would have been the end of it.
Eventually, peaceful negotiations would probably have begun, the two civilisations would have come to an accord, and either they would have got on with each other or agreed to ignore each other. They were well matched technologically and magically at the time, so there was little chance of either one prevailing in an armed struggle without huge loss of life. Being fairly rational neither side wanted that.

He paused for a moment, to take a drink. "Unfortunately, some time after the initial encounter, before wounds had been given time to heal, something happened. Both civilisations more or less simultaneously encountered a third, much smaller one. This one was very paranoid and quite warlike, but didn't have much in the way of interstellar ships. The ones it did have, though, were very fast. Much faster than either of the other two. It was also extremely good at weapons design. No one is sure exactly what sparked the problem but this third party decided that it was threatened by the first two, possibly fearing being absorbed by a much larger and more powerful adversary, possibly simply overreacting to some other perceived threat. Whatever the truth of it, they decided to try to instigate a war between the two larger civilisations, by causing an atrocity in each one and arranging to leave evidence implicating the other as the cause. In this, unfortunately, they were successful."

He sighed. "Using their advanced ships and weapons, they managed to devastate an inhabited system in each civilisation, killing billions of sentients in the process. Evidence was left, evidence that both the larger civilisations accepted. This, combined with the still present worry caused by their first encounter, led to the war the third civilisation desired. Once it started it was almost impossible to stop. The ones who were the builders of the time device believed the attacks on them truly had come from the other side, diving into war whole-heartedly. The few who suggested investigating more thoroughly were ignored. The other side was more sceptical but even so began arming themselves, and of course once hostilities broke out, even those arguing for peace were overridden. Each battle won or lost drove the next one until they were both fully committed. We don't know how long it went on although it was centuries in your terms at least."

"We do know that a small group in the non-builder civilisation investigated the original attacks and did in the end manage to prove that the third civilisation was behind it but by then it was too late to do anything to stop the war. Ironically, they were so incensed that they arranged to drop a supernova bomb into the star of the third civilisation's home system, destroying it utterly and leading to the rapid end of that civilisation, the exact scenario the instigators of the war had started it to avoid. But they couldn't stop the war itself."

"The second civilisation, over the years, began to slowly edge into a position which made it clear that in the long run they would win. They were better at technology although only marginally, their magical abilities were superior, all of which made their somewhat smaller numbers more effective. The toll was terrible but in the end the outcome was inevitable. Both sides knew this, which is what led to the construction of the Great Abomination."

Yrenti took another drink, looking sad, his ears drooping. "When the second civilisation found out what the builders were planning they were appalled. They had flirted with time travel of their own but had quickly realised how incredibly dangerous it was and banned it completely. Other realities' experiences with it only reinforced that outlook. The builders were also aware of the danger but were arrogant, and desperate, enough to proceed even so. Entreaties were made to try to prevent the machine being completed, but failed. The builders wouldn't listen, either to their enemies, or their allies, both local and from other realities. They pressed on and, unfortunately, succeeded."

He fell silent for a moment, as everyone reflected on his words. "The first few attempts were an apparent failure. The machine appeared to work to design, remarkably enough, but the results they were trying to achieve simply didn't happen. They couldn't work out why and kept trying. The second civilisation was monitoring the attempts while also desperately trying to locate the machine to destroy it, although obviously unsuccessfully. Many tens of thousands of the brightest people the builders could bring to bear disappeared into the temporal gateway the machine generated, apparently pointlessly. The war continued on other fronts, forcing great changes to both civilisations. Each one became less and less free, devoting more and more of its resources to a desperate battle merely to survive. Billions of sentients died, hundreds of star systems were ruined, unimaginable amounts of resources were destroyed.

"Then, one day, it happened."

"Scientists and mages on both sides detected that massive temporal changes were taking place throughout their galaxy, and even beyond. It became obvious very quickly to the second civilisation that the situation was already beyond salvaging. They had enough experience with temporal engineering to recognise the signs of an imminent reality reset. A final attempt was made to destroy the device since they realised that it was actually holding their reality to a level of stability that made the likelihood of a complete reality erasure possible, with the idea that a reset of the timeline was preferable to the complete destruction of their entire reality strand, but they failed. In desperation, they began evacuating as many people as they could through portals to other realities, although they were only able to push perhaps a few hundred thousand people through before they were written out of existence."

He took another drink, holding the cup and staring at it for a moment. "Portals are simply too small to evacuate entire realities through. No civilisation has even close to enough mages to allow it to happen on that scale, in that time frame. But they tried, right up to the point they were erased." He raised his eyes to them, inspecting each person in turn. "When the final collapse came, the entire strand was destroyed instantly. The multiverse simply deleted it. Incalculable amounts of life wiped out in a time too short to measure. It just... ceased to exist." Waving a hand in the air he made a gesture that encompassed everything. "Gone. Just like that. The energy release fed back through two neighbouring realities and sterilised them, all traces of life gone although the reality strands themselves still exist. Given enough time they may eventually recover."

There was silence for a while. Eventually he resumed speaking. "The various survivors and observers thought for some time that was the end of it. However, over the centuries that followed, it became apparent that somehow, the Abomination had survived. Thrown clear of its home reality in a manner we still don't understand. It was greatly reduced from its previous level of power, most of its energy used up, and certainly damaged, but was still probably the most dangerous weapon ever created in the multiverse. People looked for it for a long time but never found it, only traces of where it had been. It was moving around through the multiverse, still trying to do something, although exactly what was open to question. In an attempt to prevent a recurrence of the tragedy, various covert attempts were made to delete any information on its existence. Ultimately futile, of course, but they did manage to remove most of the data concerning it, making the whole story even murkier than it already was."

"I knew it," Lldnr'k exclaimed in satisfaction. "I was certain that someone had altered the records."

Yrenti looked at him with interest. "Ah. That is interesting. Not many people who have researched the device have gotten that far. I'm impressed."

"Thank you."

"You're welcome." He made his smile-equivalent. "All right. That's the background to the device itself. Hopefully it explains a few things. I'm sorry that I can't tell you more, but we simply don't know more than the basic outline. We don't even know what the civilisations were called. Almost everything was lost, either due to the time that has passed, the deliberate attempts to erase it, or people just not wanting to go on record." He made a four-armed shrug. "It's annoying but there's nothing we can do about it."

"It matches well with what we already knew or suspected," 'Yori' said, glancing at Lldnr'k, who nodded. "And fills some holes."

"Good. The next part you most likely won't have heard anything about. The few survivors of the second civilisation found themselves in widely separated realities, with, in most cases, nothing but what they had been carrying. Some of them had business interests in the realities they'd found themselves in and could carry on their lives fairly well, although a lot did ultimately just give up, the stress of losing everything they knew in such a permanent manner too much to bear. Most of them, though, kept on going. There were a couple of dozen species represented, among them mine. We're not the founders of the second civilisation, we were apparently a small world that was absorbed into it a long time before the end came. We specialised in machine intelligence even then. Most of the information processing systems they had were of our design."

Yrenti glanced around to see they were still following the story. "Much of that knowledge was lost but enough was kept that we were slowly able to rebuild it. There were enough survivors from nine of the species that they could form viable breeding populations, although it was a near thing in several cases. Unfortunately the rest eventually died out, including the species that had built the second civilisation in the first place."

"The survivors of the reality destruction eventually managed to track each other down and decided that they wanted to stick together. While they had been given every aid possible in most cases by the host worlds they found themselves on, it wasn't really home to the majority of them. They began searching for somewhere they could claim as their own. Several places were proposed, many worlds were very generous, but none of them seemed suitable. Then, one day many years after the disaster, someone came looking for them. Someone very strange." He paused again. "An offer was made. There was a place that would give the survivors a completely clean start, with no strings attached. All they had to do was claim it. All the various people from the collapsed reality, from both sides and everywhere they could be located, were presented with the offer. In the end they accepted."

He looked up as the ceiling faded into transparency. "That place was here. The largest artificial construction known to us. The remnants of a once great interstellar civilisation settled here and began to rebuild their lives. That was nearly thirty-five thousand of your years ago. Populations slowly grew, wars were fought, treaties were signed, civilisations came and went, but they gradually reclaimed some of their former greatness. Nothing as spectacular as nearly a quarter of a galaxy but nothing to be ashamed of."

"So you didn't build all this?" Ami asked curiously. Yrenti looked at her, then shook his head. "No. Even now it's far beyond us. We understand quite a lot about it, both the technology and the magic, but there are aspects of it that are far past anything we know how to do. We live here, we use it, but we didn't create it. One day we might be able to duplicate it but that's going to be a long time yet." He smiled. "Not that we will need to make another one for a very long time. In all the time we've lived here we've barely touched the available space. There's more habitable land here than on every known planet in the original galaxy our species evolved in. It had functional ecosystems of almost every type one could imagine when it was given to us, but no intelligent life we know of. By the time we need more space we'll be able to make it."

They exchanged glances. Eventually Tamiko asked the obvious question. "So who did build it?"
"We don't know." They all stared at him. "Not definitively. But we have a theory."

"Which is?"

"We think, based on a lot of research and some guesswork, that it was one or more of the original groups from the time device's civilisation." Everyone stared at him for a few seconds, until he expanded on the topic. "The amount of time that would be required to build something like this is enormous, even with the resources a civilisation that would be capable of it in the first place could bring to bear. We're not aware of any species at present that could do it, although in the infinity of realities, there's guaranteed to be some. We just haven't met them. When the first survivors moved in, they had some very competent mages and scientists with them who quickly worked out that there was something very odd going on with time here, something that was somehow familiar. Eventually they recognised it as a temporal signature that was similar, although not identical, to that of the Abomination."

"Leading them to believe they were connected," Lldnr'k said. Yrenti signified assent.

"Yes. Much work was done to try to prove or disprove this theory, but it was never conclusive. What was shown was that at one point the temporal rate of the local spacial area encompassing the system this star is in and a few nearby ones was running much faster than it should have been. The assumption was that this had somehow been done deliberately, to allow the time required to build the sphere, while from the outside, so to speak, time passed relatively slowly. The energy required to do this is... almost impossible. As is the ability." He looked around at them curiously. "Have you noticed the large background magical flux?"

"Yes, we were discussing that earlier," 'Yori' commented, glancing at the middle sister, then her wife.

"That also seems to have been artificially enhanced by means we don't understand. Much of the stability of this system is through magical methods, there are more complex spells at play here than anywhere else we're aware of. Again, they look not dissimilar to magic we know was used in the construction of the time device. It's as if some of those methods were refined over great periods of time to a level difficult to believe and used to construct this entire system." He pointed up at the star. "It's more complex than you might realise. Even the star is artificial."

"That's..." Lldnr'k looked at 'Yori', who stared back, shocked. Their host nodded slowly.

"It's absolutely amazing. It seems that the entire original system and several neighbouring ones were completely disassembled and the material used to build this construction. As far as we have been able to determine it was for the express purpose of re-homing the survivors of the reality collapse. We believe it was an attempt at making restitution for the disaster."

Ami looked fascinated, glancing at Rei and Hotaru, who seemed almost overwhelmed by what they'd heard. "You think that at least one of the groups of people send back in time through the device somehow survived, eventually evolving to a level that they could build all of this?"

The Kw'lyn representative nodded again. "That's the theory. We think they went back much further than they intended, possibly millions of years. We know they ended up on a parallel time track which didn't intersect the original one. That's why the original plan didn't work the way the builders intended. We don't have any way to prove it beyond doubt but there is quite a large amount of circumstantial evidence to suggest it. The near but not identical magical and temporal signatures, for example. Not definitive proof but very suggestive. There are other things as well."

"So, where are they now?" Aiko asked. He looked at her. "I mean, if these people became powerful and knowledgeable enough to do all this, they could do almost anything. They should still be around after only thirty thousand years or so."

"We don't know." Yrenti looked mildly amused as she stared. "We've looked. Very hard, for a very long time. Much like the time device, we didn't have much luck. The only clue we ever got was from one of the people who contacted the original survivors who settled here. They said, and I quote, 'Now we can rest.' The next day, they'd all disappeared. No one has ever seen a trace of them since."

"Spooky," Hotaru muttered. There were several low voiced comments agreeing with her.

"We'll probably never know the full truth of it," Yrenti said, finishing his drink. "I can live with that. But that's the basic story behind the Great Abomination. We've had plans in motion for a very long time indeed to deal with it when we finally tracked the thing down, even though for nearly as long it looked unlikely that we ever would. Thanks to you we can finally deal with the last trace of a war that should have ended thirty-five millennia ago. I for one will be glad to no longer have it hanging over us, waiting for it to turn up. Whenever it does, bad things happen." He looked around the table slowly, at each person in turn. "We are in your debt for locating the damn thing. Let's go and kill it."

"I'm certainly up for that," 'Yori' said, looking happily predatory. Beside her, her wife nodded with an identical expression, the others following suit.

"I've got a lot of questions still," Lldnr'k said, "although they can wait."

"I'm happy to answer as many as I can once we've resolved this matter," their host said, standing up. "But now that the end is in sight I find myself eager to blow something into very small pieces." Misaki started laughing, making her friends look at her.

"He sounds just like you, Yori," she said, making everyone grin.

"It's a good plan. How do you want to do it?" The martial artist looked at the Director of External Threat Management, who looked back.

"I've got fifteen large antimatter warheads on delivery systems waiting outside. By our calculations that should do the job quite efficiently," he replied. She looked at him, then walked over to the door, followed by her wife and sister-in-law. 'Azumi' saw that there were indeed fifteen metre-tall ovoid devices sitting in three neat rows of five a few metres away, having apparently arrived while they were talking. Next to them were three machines which seemed similar to the security drone, only about twice the size. She got the impression they were looking at her with slightly paranoid interest.

From behind her, Aiko commented, "I'm a little nervous about standing next to enough explosive force to remodel a continent."

"They're quite safe, trust me," Yrenti said. "Accidental detonation is extremely unlikely. This design is well tested and reliable."

They moved out of the way as he left the building, approaching the guarding machines, which shifted silently, hanging in the air next to him. "We will need to be in your reality to open a portal to the fractional reality the machine is in, or in a nearby reality. We can't do it from here."

'Yori' went over to him. "I'm not entirely happy about being anywhere on Earth with these things, just in case," she said, glancing at her friends. Ami winced at the thought, while Fumiko slowly shook her head. "We do have a place that should be suitable. Here are the coordinates." She send him a block of data.

"Ah. Yes, I'm familiar with that world. Yes, that one will work. Would you like to open a portal to it?" She nodded, space ripping open with a crackle next to them. He stared at the portal for a moment, then at her.

"That's... very interesting. How did you do that?"

"It's just our normal portal spell," the black-haired woman said casually. He stared some more.

"Portal spell, perhaps. Normal, not even slightly. I'd heard that you and Chou used an unusual form of magic, but I had no idea quite how unusual. How did you learn it?"

The martial artist glanced at her wife as she came to stand beside her. "It's something we worked out ourselves."

There was a long pause. "We would be extremely interested in learning more about this, if you are agreeable," Yrenti eventually said. "I have never encountered any form of magic similar to what you are using before and it's not in the Kw'lyn database either. That is... unprecedented." There was shock on the alien visage.

"I think we could probably come to an arrangement," 'Yori' replied with a small smile.

"Thank you." He stared at them for a moment more, then shook his head, turning to the three cubical machines floating in the air. No words were exchanged but they immediately moved to hover over one each of the antimatter bombs, which lifted into the air under them, then obediently followed them through the portal. Two of the machines came back quickly, rapidly ferrying all the weapons through the rip in reality. "We're all set. Let's go and see what happens." Everyone followed as he moved through the portal, which promptly vanished.
Chapter 86

Just let me get this out of my system.

One...

Million...

Words!

According to ff dot net, at any rate. Other methods of word counting disagree slightly, so on this site it hasn't quite hit that point, but it's certainly very close to that one way or the other, especially if you add the three other stories in the DSR series. I can honestly say I didn't think that would happen.

It's one hell of a lot of typing! If we take the average word length in English as five characters, then add spaces, typos, punctuation, etc, I wouldn't be surprised to find out it represented something like seven million or more keyboard hits. Add in the various aborted chapters which I rewrote and it's even more.

It also works out to an average of nearly two thousand words a day every single day for five hundred and eleven days to this point. In practice I certainly don't write every day, it goes in bursts, ranging from only a couple of hundred in one go to twenty kiloword epic sessions other times.

Now if only I could put that much time and focus into earning money I'd be rich ;)

The worrying thing is I still have an awful lot of ideas. If you people are prepared to keep reading I'm prepared to keep writing.

Anyway. That's my pat on the back done with. On with the more normal business. Once again, many thanks to everyone who has taken the time to comment, review, PM, and so on. As always it's very much appreciated. Thanks.

On another note, if anyone reading all of this is an artist who would like to suggest some cover images for the stories, I'd be interested. While I can write fairly well, my drawing skills are not good. Pathetic, in fact, unless it's technical schematics.

A large part of this chapter is essentially happening all at once, which is difficult to write correctly and convincingly. I have a sort of picture in my head of what's going on but it's difficult to get it put down in words, annoyingly enough. I had to rewrite several parts half a dozen times and even then I'm not completely satisfied, but it's the best I can do, I'm afraid. Hopefully it meets the relevant requirements.

Just believe me when I say it's even better inside my mind :)

Note: What is essentially the second part of the chapter will be posted shortly, probably tomorrow. I decided it was getting a bit long for this format so broke it into two pieces. It essentially ties up the SM crossover/time machine section. After this we'll be visiting Nerima again, I think.

Groaning slightly, Lieutenant Wilson turned his head. Someone had left the blind up again and the light was shining right in his eyes. Blinking he opened them, wincing at the stabbing pain in his temples. He rapidly shut them again, mumbling to himself in an aggrieved manner. After a moment, he froze, then very slowly opened them once more.

Silently, and in some shock, he moved his eyes around, inspecting his surroundings. This wasn't the room he'd been sleeping in for the last two weeks, and it wasn't the alleyway he was beginning to remember, looking nothing like either place. In fact, he was hard-pressed to work out exactly what it did look like aside from not at all what he expected to see when he woke up.

'Where the hell am I?' he wondered, unknowingly echoing the cry of a part-time piglet, who was at the current time wandering around the middle of Shanghai, mumbling to himself, in a completely different reality. Raising his head cautiously he looked around some more. What he was lying on was more or less recognisable as a bed although it was of rather odd proportions, but extremely comfortable even so. Beyond that, he could see a room made of what looked like some sort of stone or brick, with wood trimmings. In the ceiling were a number of small balls of white light that seemed to be hovering in recesses in the surface, nothing visibly attaching them to anything. He stared at them for a moment, then resumed inspecting his unexpected location.

There was some sort of door, currently closed, two windows through which oddly-tinted light was coming and beyond which he could see what looked like the tops of trees, or something close to a tree at least, although a deep reddish colour like Japanese maple, rather than the more normal green, a couple of what he worked out after a moment were a sort of chair, and beside the bed a stand on which sat several machines. They seemed to be monitoring his health and vital statistics from what he could see even though he wasn't familiar with them at all. They looked nothing like the normal medical machinery he'd seen before and weren't apparently connected to him, but one of them was definitely registering his heartbeat, while another seemed to be something to do with respiration.

Nothing looked like the normal environment he expected, in fact. Most of it was recognisable, in one way or another, even if only through context, but everything was sufficiently different to give a rather alien effect, like waking up in some sort of distorting mirror from a circus fun-house. It was very disturbing.

The only good thing he could immediately think of was that he felt basically fine. As his memory returned he could recall the events leading up to finding himself lying on the ground in the alleyway, events that included a significant amount of trauma.

Events that included a knife in the stomach.

His eyes widened a little as that particular memory came back and he raised a hand to tentatively feel himself. Cautious prodding revealed that there was no pain, and in fact as he ran his hand over his stomach he could only feel normal skin, more or less, rather than the gaping wound he could distinctly remember.

Sitting up with a little effort he wobbled as his head spun momentarily before settling to a faint throb, then looked down. He found he was nude under the soft blanket on the bed, which he lowered to reveal his torso, uncovering an impressive but very faint scar running across his lower abdomen, looking like whatever had caused it had occurred years before. Rubbing his fingertips across it he thought.

Perhaps the hallucination that he'd had before he blacked out was actually not a hallucination after all? Something had rescued him from his attackers, apparently brought him to medical care, and undoubtedly saved his life. He could see simply from the scar that the wound had been a deep and under normal circumstances probably mortal one. Feeling his face, he found that his nose felt fine as did the side where he recalled a couple of vicious blows. Tentatively moving his left leg proved it was fine as well. Apparently he was basically fixed.

That was good.

But he had no idea where he was, how he'd got here, or how to get home. Or even if he could get home.

That was less good.

A sound to the side made him look over in time to see the door open, sliding to the side and disappearing into the wall with a faint hiss. He had momentary flashbacks to early Star Trek episodes, which made him grin to himself. What was revealed on the other side, though, made the grin go away abruptly.

'Holy crap, I've been abducted by aliens!' he thought wildly to himself. 'But I'm not an American...' Even under the circumstances the thought made him giggle to himself. He wondered momentarily if he was on some sort of drug.

The creature in the doorway looked at him for a moment, then entered the room, moving to the machinery and inspecting it carefully. It made some notes on what looked like some sort of hand-held computer, quickly scribbling on the display with a stylus, before rolling it up and sticking it into a holder at its waist, then turned to him. They studied each other for a few seconds.

Wilson saw that it looked a lot like the thing with the ray gun in the alley, most definitely neither human nor someone wearing a particularly good costume. It was very real. Feeling slightly light-headed again, this time from nerves, he tentatively smiled.

"How are you feeling, Lieutenant Wilson?" the thing asked suddenly, making him twitch a little. The English was spoken with a very odd accent but was otherwise perfectly understandable. He stared, while it waited patiently.

"Um, fine, I guess." There was a short pause while he got his thoughts together. "Where am I? What happened? How did I get here? How do you know my name? And if you don't mind, what are you?"

The creature made a noise that after a moment he realised was an equivalent to a chuckle. "In no particular order, you're in a medical facility in Zthrel, I'm Healer Brenke, you were brought here by one of our citizens, Xrist, who intervened in what he described as a somewhat one-sided fight with a pair of criminals, and you are nearly recovered from some very serious injuries sustained in that fight. Your name was on the ID you had with you, which is safely stored away in that drawer over there."

The healer, which he assumed was essentially a doctor, shook his head, glancing at the instrumentation for a moment. "You're very lucky indeed that Xrist encountered you when he did. Leaving aside the fact that he said the criminals assaulting you were on the verge of finishing you off, you wouldn't have lived much longer anyway. You lost close to a third of your circulatory fluid before we got to you, which for your species is very close to fatal amounts. In addition, you had several serious perforations of your digestive system, a number of broken bones, damage to your left eye, and swelling of the brain. Very serious indeed."

Wilson listened with shock. Brenke continued, pulling out his rolled up computer or whatever it was and looking at it for a moment, "We had some difficulty finding the relevant information on your species, we haven't treated anyone from your world for some while, but we tracked it down in time. We synthesised a replacement circulatory fluid to top you up, which will get replaced by your body naturally over the next few days, then healed the damage. The brain injury was problematic and took some considerable effort to rectify although everything else was fairly straightforward. I don't expect there to be any long term problems although you may well feel somewhat nauseous and disorientated when the tranquillisng spell wears off in an hour or so. I'm sorry about the scarring, we didn't have enough information or practice to eliminate it entirely, and I wasn't keen on experimenting on my patient. I can suggest someone on your own world who can probably deal with it if you are concerned about it."

Slowly lying back down, Wilson stared at the little lights in the ceiling for a moment. He'd got answers, but every one of them led to more questions. Brenke seemed to recognise his confusion.

"I assume that you're not familiar with travel between different worlds, based on your reaction and your physiological changes? You seem somewhat distressed."

"I'm not sure about distressed, exactly, but I am extremely confused," the lieutenant admitted, turning his head to look at the alien creature who had apparently saved his life. "Who is Xrist? Where is... Zthrel, did you say? How did I get here? Some sort of spacecraft? Why are aliens wandering around Minato in the middle of Tokyo, for god's sake? How do you even come to speak English in the first place?" He paused, shaking his head. "So confused. And so many questions."

The healer nodded, a more sideways motion than a human would normally do, walking over to the corner and carrying one of the odd-looking chairs back with him. "I understand. I'll try to answer some of your questions." He sat down and leaned back, regarding his patient, who pulled himself up in bed and listened. "Xrist is a frequent traveller to your world. By trade I believe he's a worker in wood, a very talented craftsman, but he has a serious coffee habit. Coffee is only available from your world, for all intents and purposes, and while it's widely traded to other worlds from there, certain people like going to the source. Minato is the place that, for reasons no one seems to know a good answer to, is very amenable to portal formation, so naturally most travellers to your world end up there."

"Portals?"

"It's a very complex subject, for a better explanation you'd need to talk to a competent mage, but basically, what you think of as reality is only a very small fraction of the true multiverse, which is essentially infinite." Brenke waved a hand around the room. "We are currently in a different reality than the one you originated in. Portals allow realities to be linked and travelled between. It takes a complex spell and several mages working together to open and stabilise a portal under normal circumstances and they can only be opened by magical means, not technological ones, as far as I know even magitech can't do it. Most realities use a mix of magic and technology to one extent or another, although there are ones at either end of the scale that purely use one or the other. We don't have a lot of contact with pure tech realities, for obvious reasons. A few that are overwhelming tech-based hire in mages specifically to run portal systems for them. The K'nn grouping is the most obvious example, they've been doing it for a long time, even though their people have little to no ability with magic themselves. They can easily afford to hire mages, though."

Wilson whimpered a little to himself. "Magic?"

Brenke looked amused as far as he could tell. His voice certainly sounded amused. "Ah. I suspect you are one of those from your world who has little contact with it. It's rather unusual, your world, from what I know, as while there are some remarkably competent mages and other magic workers there, for some reason they don't interact all that much with the more common technological parts of it. That's not the usual way these things tend to work." He smiled, revealing a lot of teeth, although seeming non-threatening even so. "Magic can be thought of as direct interaction with the fabric of the multiverse via various means. It normally requires a living being to do this, although sufficiently advanced technology of the correct type can also do it to one degree or another. It... goes around... much of what you probably consider laws of the universe, often in ways that are difficult or impossible to duplicate otherwise. As I said, a lot of worlds use both physical technology and magical variants in different ratios. While you can do almost anything with enough of either, a mix is more flexible and generally useful."

He pointed up at the ceiling. "The illumination in here is magical in nature, it's a more efficient use of energy for that particular problem. The instruments over there are mostly technological but they're also using some magic in their operation. You'll find examples like this all over our world."

Wilson thought on what he'd been told. It sounded impossible but on the other hand he was talking to a genuine alien. "So, no spaceship needed? This Xrist just pulled me through some sort of wormhole between realities?"

"Basically, yes. He used an emergency portal generator he was carrying, it produces a very short lived and one way portal for use in extreme situations. Many interworld travellers carry such a thing. Luckily for you, he came across you at almost the last moment, stunned your attackers, then decided that the quickest solution was to bring you here. It was almost the only possible solution to save your life. The native healers he'd probably have used otherwise were apparently not available and he was running out of time, as were you," Brenke waited for more questions as the lieutenant pondered his words. He was learning a lot of very odd things much more quickly than he'd expected.

After a minute or two had passed in silence, the alien healer began speaking again. "Zthrel is a medium-sized city on our world. Xrist lives in a nearby town, but we have the largest medical facility in the area, so he got you here. He doesn't speak your language although he's fluent in the one local to Minato, Japanese, but luckily I travelled around on your world a bit many years ago and learned this one. It took me a little while to remember it but I hope I'm performing satisfactorily?"

"You're amazingly good, actually," the man in the bed said absently, still thinking. "Your accent is a bit weird but other than that it's fine."

"Ah, good. I was a little worried, I'm out of practice." Brenke seemed pleased.

"No disrespect intended, but how does someone who looks like you wander around my world without everyone noticing?" Wilson asked after a while. "I mean, I think I'd have heard about aliens wandering the countryside. The way you're describing it it's a common thing but I've never heard anything about it except in fiction and the less plausible tabloids."

The healer laughed. "Very good disguise spells, mainly. Until recently that was essential, even in Minato. Possibly particularly in Minato. They call us, travellers from other realities, 'demons' there, which is a little insulting to be honest. The entire area is awash with very dangerous magic-using young females who tended to come down like the wrath of the gods on anyone who came through a portal for many years, so you had to be careful not to stand out. I understand why, that area does get hostile visitors as well as peaceful ones, but it was getting ridiculous. The locals call them magical girls, which I suppose is an accurate description, there seem to be a lot of them for some reason. Most of them are dangerous, some of them hideously so. Luckily, the situation has changed recently with the arrival of a pair of unusual young women to the centre of Minato, very near the area you were found in. Yori and Chou, they're called. They've built up a reputation that extends far outside your native world as being incredible bad to get on the wrong side of, yet at the same Shaking his head, Wilson could only listen in amazement. Magical Girls now? Was it possible those weird Japanese comic books were actually based on reality? Although, now that he thought about it, both those names sounded familiar somehow. It took a moment's though to work out why. "Yori... I've heard that name. There was a major terrorist incident in my home country a few months ago and she and that other one, Chou, were somehow involved. My government is being very quiet about exactly how but they were in the news a few times."

"I'm not surprised you've heard of them, they turn up in some very odd places. They have some friends as well who are considered nearly as powerful and helpful." Brenke shook his head slightly. "Bearing in mind how little the majority of your world seems to know about other ones, I'm impressed by how much influence some of its inhabitants have in other places."

"So all the travel between realities is via these 'portals'? No spacecraft?" He was somehow disappointed. Brenke chuckled.

"Oh, there are a lot of spacecraft out there. Many worlds use them, both slower than light and faster than light ones. Mostly only the high-tech ones, for the majority of purposes portal travel is easier and fills most of the same requirements, but even so space travel is common. I believe you're a military pilot based on what I read in your identity documents?"

"Yes."

"You'd probably find some of the air and space craft one might come across outside your home world interesting, then."

Wilson smiled momentarily. "I'd certainly like to see a real spacecraft. I can fly practically any aircraft but I've never tried something that can go into space. No call for it in the Canadian Air Force." He looked at the healer. "Canada is a country on the other side of the planet from Japan."

"I'm more or less familiar with the major countries on your world, Lieutenant," Brenke chuckled. "It's a large country to the north of that one that also speaks the same language, the United States, isn't it?"

"That's the one. I was in Japan on a military exercise with US forces, they have several bases in the south of the country. I'd gone to Minato to meet an old friend when I got jumped by those muggers or whatever they were. They seemed very upset for some reason."

"They certainly did their best to kill you, based on your injuries. I would imagine that the local authorities will probably have acquired them by now, they're quite efficient in that area. Xrist used a K'nn neural suppressor on them, which would have rendered your attackers unconscious for several hours at least."

"I must thank him. I owe him my life." Wilson ran his hand over the scar on his stomach again. "And you as well. Thank you very much."

"You're entirely welcome, Lieutenant." Brenke looked pleased at the thanks. "It's what we do, but it's nice to be thanked."

"Call me Riley, please."

"As you wish. Riley." The healer stood up. "You still need some rest. The healing has repaired all the main damage but your body is still stressed from the whole experience. The next scheduled Brenke nodded to the human, then left the room. Riley watched him go, and the door slide shut, once again the sound making him smile, before lying back and closing his eyes, feeling tired. He had a lot to think about.

He was still thinking when he fell asleep.

"So how do we do this?" Aiko asked. "Open a portal, shove all these bombs through, then duck?"

"More or less," Yrenti replied with a chuckle.

The petite brunette inspected the several gigatons of weapons of incredibly mass destruction sitting innocently a few metres away with a disturbed expression on her face. "Those things give me the creeps. Hey, one question. The original SI information suggested one was enough to get the job done. Yori was thinking half a dozen or so, just to be sure. You've got fifteen of the damn things there. That's some mission creep, isn't it?"

Laughing, Yrenti waved one hand at the warheads. "Normally I would agree but in this case I don't believe there is such a thing as overkill. We want to be totally sure that the Abomination is destroyed completely. One would almost certainly do the job if placed in the correct spot, this number will make sure no matter where they hit. It's enough to vaporise most of it and irradiate the remainder to the point it's completely dead."

"Fair enough." Aiko shrugged. "You're the expert in this case, as far as anyone can be. What's the next step?"

"I'd like to open a portal at a considerable distance from the device and send one of the combat drones through to monitor the situation, and also to record the results. Then, when we've picked the best spot to attack, we send half the warheads through on an intercept course. We should close the portals until after the detonation, there's a risk of feedback through them which could be hazardous. Afterwards, we can check the results, then use the rest if necessary to finish off any parts left. I want as much of it turned to plasma as I can arrange. If I have to I'll get some more."

"Sounds like a plan." 'Yori' looked satisfied. She looked around at the rest of them. "We're a long way from any of the areas anyone uses now so it should be safe enough. We'll set up the heaviest wards we can first, though, just in case." 'Chou' nodded at her words, a golden dome forming over them seconds later, the weapons and combat drones on the outside. Yrenti looked around at it, seeming impressed.

"Very good indeed. That's one of the most powerful wards I've ever seen generated by an individual."

The blonde woman smiled, then glanced at Aiko and her team, as well as her sister. "Send me some energy and I'll push it into the ward to reinforce it," she suggested, "there's no point taking chances." They all did as requested. The middle sister watched what Aiko did and managed to duplicate the effort. The dome flickered through several colours, settling into a soft white glow with hints of other shades running around it. Hotaru looked around and clapped, grinning.

"It's very pretty," she commented.
"And astoundingly effective," the Kw'lyn representative muttered. "We really must talk about your magical methods. They seem to be almost impossibly efficient." Turning to the warheads and the three combat drones hovering protectively over them, he added more loudly, "You can go ahead and open the first portal. I would suggest this modification to the coordinates." Sending 'Yori' the data, he waited as she nodded, then concentrated.

"It's much more difficult than a normal portal," she noted, frowning slightly. "Ah. That's got it." There was the familiar crackling sound and the tear in space opened outside the ward at a safe distance, nearly a hundred metres away, on the other side from the cache of weapons. The middle drone immediately zipped toward and through it, fading out of view as it moved.

"Fascinating," Yrenti said quietly a second later, in a rapt tone of voice. "The first time anyone has seen that horrific thing since the collapse to the best of my knowledge." He opened a video feed to them so they could all see. Ami pulled out her projector and relayed the feed to it, allowing Lldnr'k to see it as well.

It was much as the original data in the SI hidden file had shown. There was a brilliant white dot, the star at the centre of the sub-reality, with a pinpoint of light some distance from it. The time device, in orbit around its power supply. The image jumped closer as whatever the drone was using as a camera zoomed in, the pinpoint becoming a visible collection of esoteric machinery, built on a vast scale. Even without knowing much about it, one could see it was damaged, large parts distorted and dark, while the remainder was covered with small lights at irregular intervals. These blinked and moved occasionally showing activity although what type was open to question.

"It's definitely still active," Yrenti commented. "It looks badly damaged, though, which is what our information suggested. By the looks of it some form of self-repair was carried out, but never completed for some reason." He paused for a moment, studying the image. "I'd also say that a lot more time has passed for it than for us. They built to last, the makers of that damn thing, unfortunately, but it looks old. A lot of that damage is sheer age from what I can see. I would guess that from its viewpoint, several hundred thousand to perhaps a million years must have passed. Presumably it's looped many times in many different realities."

The view from the combat drone moved closer, enlarging slowly as the machine approached the time device, allowing more and more details to be seen. The lights on it blinked in various patterns, slowly moving and changing, reflecting the enigmatic thoughts of the alien supercomputer. Abruptly, they speeded up, indicating some change to it. "Oh, damn," Yrenti muttered, looking worried.

"What's the delay on this?" Lldnr'k asked slowly.

"The probe is just under six light seconds away from the device," the Kw'lyn representative replied. He turned to them. "It's detected the drone or the portal, perhaps both, I'm reading a massive build-up of temporal distortion. I think it's getting ready to loop again. Open a portal to these coordinates right now. Hurry, we don't have more than a few minutes." He sent a set of data, 'Yori' immediately dropping the first portal and opening the new one. As soon as it stabilised, eight warheads leapt off the ground and shot through it one after the other at blurringly high velocity, leaving a series of sonic booms in their wake, even through the ward making everything shake.

The relayed video feed from the combat drone showed a number of points of light appearing from the other side of the portal, streaking on an intercept course for the time device at steadily increasing speeds, then vanishing in a series of enormous flashes that overlapped into a fireball of white light on a scale that was hard to imagine, whiting out and obscuring the view. "Close it quickly," Yrenti shouted, sounding frantically worried.
Before anyone could respond, the portal spewed a horizontal fountain of energy which splashed against the ward, making everyone powering it stagger from the recoil. 'Yori' immediately fed energy to it, in quantities that the middle Tendo could feel were dwarfing the amount everyone else was contributing, until a second or two later the portal collapsed with a squeal of distressed spacetime, ending in an enormous boom. They all stared at each other.

"Did that work?" Hotaru finally asked in a small voice.

"It should have done," Yrenti responded, looking shaken. "But that reaction was... not right. It was much too fast, the weapons should have taken about five seconds after the last one entered the portal to reach detonation range. Something odd happened." He glanced at Lldnr'k, who was looking worried, then at 'Yori'. "Open another portal at the original coordinates so we can see what happened."

"Is that wise?" she asked, looking concerned.

"Possibly not but we need to know."

The martial artist glanced at her wife, who looked back, an uncertain expression on her face, then nodded. The portal began to form.

Cologne twitched, looking wildly around. Shampoo stared at her. "What is it, Great Grandmother?" she asked. She could feel something was badly wrong but couldn't put a finger on what.

"I don't know, but it's getting stronger. Fast," the ancient woman said, still glancing about nervously. "What the hell is that?" She quickly muttered a spell, waving one hand, then yelped in pain as a loud crackle and a flash of energy knocked her clean off her staff. "Ow, damn it!" she shouted, waving her burned fingers. Shampoo helped her up. The elder cast her magical senses further out, going pale at the results she got.

"Oh, shit," she mumbled. Shampoo looked on, worried. "Help me to the window, child," the Amazon instructed, suddenly looking every year of her close to three hundred. Shampoo steadied her as they walked to the window and looked out in the direction of Minato. Both stared.

"What is that?" the young woman asked in hushed tones.

"Either our doom or our saviour, my dear," the elder replied in a similar tone. They watched.

There was nothing else they could do.

Soun and Genma both stopped their lesson, turning to stare at each other, while their students looked puzzled. "What's that?" Genma asked.

"I don't know, but it's getting stronger," his friend replied. After another couple of seconds, they both dashed out into the courtyard, then jumped up to the roof of the Dojo, looking towards Minato.

"That's..."

"Not good," Genma finished. They exchanged a glance, then went back to watching.

Again, there was nothing else they could do.
"You'd better come and see this, Masao." Agent Naito looked up as his colleague leaned into his eye-line, pointing at the window. Curious, he got up, walking over to look. He stared.

"Oh, crap."

"What is it?"

"I don't know but I doubt it's good."

"Do you think Yori is involved?" They exchanged glances. "Stupid question. Sorry."

Both of them watched.

Harada stopped and stared upwards as he came out of Hikaru's coffee shop. Behind him, Rynnkh swore in her own language, causing him to look over his shoulder. She was pulling an emergency portal generator from somewhere and activating it as he turned. With a glance at him, she shouted, "I'd suggest either coming with me or using the one you have," then activated it, diving through the portal that opened immediately, followed by her friend and three other demons. The remainder of the off-world visitors did something similar. Seconds later only Hikaru and Harada were present. They looked at each other.

"What is it?" the coffee-shop owner asked, gazing around in shock.

"No idea, but they certainly didn't like it," the policeman muttered, his hand in his pocket rubbing the portal generator he was still carrying. Pulling it out he looked at it for a moment, then up again.

Hikaru joined him in the doorway, following his gaze, paling at the sight. He stared for a moment then glanced at his old friend. "Go to Emiko. Protect your child. Now." The sergeant looked back for a second or two, nodded what he feared might be a goodbye, then ran as fast as he could without another word.

Chiyoko looked embarrassed as she missed yet again, the little demon dodging at the last moment and her staff beam blowing a hole in the side of the van that the thing had been chewing on across the road.

"Oops..." she mumbled, going mildly red in the face. Swinging the staff around while blushing, she paused as she felt something.

Around her, a dozen of the little horrors stopped whatever they were doing, looking around nervously, then all turning to stare in the same direction. She watched them curiously then turned to the direction they were gazing. A few seconds passed. When she looked around, all the demons were gone.

The girl went back to staring.

"Fuck!" 'Yori' yelled in agony, her face showing her pain, as the portal she was creating suddenly warped and snapped open. 'Chou' rushed to her side, holding her.

"What's happening?" Tamiko asked, very worried.

"I don't know, something grabbed the spell and twisted it," the martial artist grated, concentrating fiercely. Yrenti was doing likewise, then swore viciously in his own language, Trade, and several
"I don't know how, but the damn device is still active," he yelled as a wind suddenly picked up, blowing outwards from the portal and shrouding the area in dust. "The combat drone is still alive but it's damaged. It was able to send me a recording, even so. Only two of the weapons got through and most of the energy was diverted somehow, the rest of them detonated prematurely." He thought for a moment then nodded. "It was the temporal distortion. It threw the targeting systems off and siphoned away most of the energy from the detonation. I'm an idiot, I didn't think of that. It looks like it's seriously hurt but it's still partly functional, at least enough to keep the temporal gate initialisation sequence going now that it's started."

"What do we do?" Ami asked frantically, switching to the SI comms due to the noise of the near-hurricane force wind blowing out of the portal now.

"I don't know," he replied. "I can send the rest but it might not be enough under the circumstances and we don't have time to get any more from the armourotry at home." 'Yori' looked at her wife, then straightened up.

"It's worth a try," she replied to the question in the other woman's eyes. 'Azumi' looked around at her friends, seeing they were all looking scared and worried.

"What are you going to do?" she asked.

"All I can do. Everything I've got," the black-haired woman said, walking over to the side of the ward nearest the portal. She raised her hands. "You'd better look away. This is going to be bright." Chou stood behind her, her hands on the shorter woman's shoulders. Aiko glanced at her team, all of them nodding, then joining their friends. 'Azumi', after a moment's hesitation, did the same.

"What are they doing?" Yrenti asked, watching.

"Something impressive, I hope. And I hope it's enough," Ami replied. A light built around 'Yori's' hands as everyone fed energy to her, each of the other women also beginning to glow. After a second or two of build-up, a massive beam of energy roared from 'Yori' to the portal, piercing the ward and vanishing into the rip in space, then suddenly compressing down to a line of eye-piercing brilliance. Yrenti yelped and dropped to the ground, all four arms over his head, while Ami, Rei, and Hotaru fell flat, their hands covering their ears. Lldnr'k turned away and crouched down with his feathers ruffled from shock. Heat rolled over them from the enormously powerful ki beam, brilliant rainbow light illuminating the plain around them for kilometres and washing over the distant mountains, the deep bass roar going on and on.

The ward system wasn't quite a living thing, but it was very close, and getting closer every time someone new was added to it. The massively complex network of spells that Happosai, Ranma, and Kasumi had developed and worked on for nearly five years was now approaching the level of connectivity that a normal human brain would contain, becoming something far more than had been intended. That was always recognised as a possibility, spells of such a complex nature tended towards emergent behaviour, and in fact with one of this level and type it was almost inevitable. While the part of it that approximated a mind wasn't truly sentient, or even really self-aware, it was a very good problem-solver in its own field, which was absolute loyalty to and protectiveness over its charges. It would allow no outside influence to harm them as far as it was able to help.

It was also, if such a feeling could be ascribed to something of that nature, somewhat frustrated that it had been hobbled so much some time ago. Inside the zone defined as 'home' it was free to act as required and woe betide anything that tried a hostile act against those it protected. But, for some reason, it had been forbidden to bring the same level of power to bear on external threats. It found this inexplicable and very annoying.

There were times when it found itself quite keen to end what it perceived as a potential threat. The target designated 'Cologne' was an irritation that could have been permanently dealt with some time ago, when it was constantly turning up in the vicinity of one of its favourites, the cold rational one. It had formed an immediate liking for this node when it first arrived and was designated friendly, which had strengthened enormously when the node was added to the network. Even though it wasn't a primary node, it was still considered to be very high level. It also recognised that paradoxically it was the lowest powered of all the nodes in the network and therefore the most likely to be harmed. As a result the system kept a particularly close watch on it.

Recently three intriguing new nodes had been added, all of them of very significant potential, the last of them containing more power than any but the strongest of the primaries. Each new node added to the system brought new connections, new information, new power inputs, all of them fascinating in different ways. The system knew on some level that it was getting more complex although it wasn't quite at the point of genuinely realising why and what it was.

It was, however, at the point it could see trouble coming. The addition of the most recent nodes had brought it into direct conflict with a hostile influence it had been aware of for a considerable time, an influence that was abruptly extremely powerful and causing some very odd effects that passed out of the hidden domain it ruled into the one the system considered home. This was obviously and unequivocally a hostile act that needed to be acted upon immediately.

It just wasn't sure quite how.

This was very irking. The system 'thought' about it for some time, which at the rate it could perform its internal operations, was only a second or two of real-time from the outside.

None of the primary nodes were currently available to give it directions. One of them had been out of touch for a considerable period, only occasionally drifting back into extreme range for short bursts, enough to let it know the node was well and uninjured, which was good otherwise it would have had to begin a process to go and look for it. It wasn't quite sure how, but it was fairly certain that it could, given some time and effort.

What passed for an intelligence in the ward system was nothing if not persistent. It didn't give up. At all. Ever.

The remaining primaries and all the lower level nodes were together, somewhere it could almost reach, but not quite. It was aware of their location, they all visited this place regularly, and while it was a considerable distance away through one of the odd loci in reality that opened and closed around it, and even inside it, quite often, it felt sure it was reachable. It just hadn't quite worked out yet how to directly access that location without one of the loci present.

It had been working on a method for some time, frustrated that its charges could apparently slip so easily out of range. This was an obvious security failure that the system felt reflected badly on it and therefore required a solution. Now, it was suddenly feeling that it was an immediate failing that might spell disaster.

The malign influence from the enemy was growing steadily and rapidly. The ward system didn't feel things like fear or desperation, not like a living creature or even in the manner of one of those odd sub-nodes all the main ones had acquired a while ago, but it was aware of the concept in its own way. Put in human terms, it was getting worried.

Pushing more power to the external wards it isolated the secure location inside them from the danger present outside. To an outside observer, the immediate vicinity of the Saotome-Tendo apartment building began to visibly glow a very odd colour, one that normally you'd only see when you closed your eyes tightly. As the baleful influence of the enemy strengthened, so did the glow, becoming visible kilometres away.

It wasn't enough.

While the system didn't understand exactly what was going on it could feel the underpinnings of what everyone else would term reality beginning to tremble. Something big was coming, something extremely dangerous. Even the ward system might fall if whatever it was went to completion.

Something needed to be done.

Magical reservoirs diverted more and more energy to the massively complex interlocked mass of spells that formed the wards. The external glow, a visible manifestation of possibly more magical energy than had ever been released in one operation in the entire history of the planet, began to grow bright enough to reflect off the clouds of the overcast afternoon, causing people dozens of kilometres outside Tokyo to turn and stare.

All over the planet, mages and other magically sensitive people stopped what they were doing, wondering what the hell was happening, as they felt both the huge wave of magical energy coming from Tokyo and more disturbingly, something very fundamental beginning to crumble, something that gave them the cold shivers. The more experienced ones realised that whatever it was, it was bad. Anyone who could do so, opened a portal and left as fast as possible. Minato emptied of demons almost completely within less than a minute, dozens of emergency portals being called into service.

Every magical girl in Japan twitched, looking around in shock.

Eventually, a threshold was crossed. Connections were made, power flowed in different paths than had been planned. Complexity doubled, then doubled again. Anyone present inside the apartment building would have heard a very strange sound, one that seemed to come from an infinite distance, yet still be inside somewhere.

Magical activity peaked. Light flashed from every window in the building.

The ward system reached, for the first time ever, full functionality.

Knowing, with an intelligence that was a very long way from human, that it had little time at the rate it was using its energy reserves, even as large as they were, the system looked around for a solution to the problem. It needed to protect its charges, it needed to protect its home ground, it needed more power to fight the enemy. How could it do this?

After mere milliseconds, a number of choices presented themselves. It found a loophole, and it found some power.

According to the rules, it was only able to directly act on the inside of the wards. The power required was on the outside although it was in theory accessible due to the intimate low-level linkage the most powerful primary node had with it, a linkage that was fundamental to that node's existence and as a result deeply embedded into the system itself, due to the connection the node had to the system.
The solution, when it occurred, was elegantly obvious. All it had to do was expand the wards to cover the location of the power source. That would put it inside the location it could act on, then it could pull the energy in and use it to go after the enemy. It might be enough to do the job.

It was worth a try, at any rate.

If it had possessed a back and a hand to pat itself with, it would have done so. Lacking either, the incredibly complex magical system merely radiated a sense of alien smugness, then executed its plan. The results were impressive.

Harada slammed through the door at a dead run. "Emiko!" he yelled, frantically looking around for his wife. Her voice, full of surprise, came to him from the living room. Rushing in he found her looking out the window, turning as he entered, shock on her face.

"Tetsuo! What is it? And what's that?" She pointed to the side at the brilliant glow a few kilometres away, a column of light of a colour no one should be able to see while conscious extending a thousand metres into the sky.

"I don't know, but we need to leave. Come on." He pulled the portal generator out of his pocket, remembering what Rynnkh had told him.

"What's going on?" his wife yelped, staring at the thing in his hands, one hand on her swelling belly. He didn't answer, but concentrated on what he'd been told about the portal generator, then pressed both the symbols he'd been instructed to, finding that the metal band around the device now easily moved. Rotating it as far as it would go with a quick turn of his wrist he released it, dropped the thing into his pocket again, then grabbed at his wife's arm. When the portal opened, he pulled her through in one motion, the woman still talking. Silence fell in the apartment very suddenly, broken a second later by a pop as the portal winked out.

Agent Naito watched in amazement as the column of light over in the direction he was well aware put it squarely in the middle of Yori and Chou's home district began to rapidly expand outwards, covering kilometres of distance in a fraction of a second. He was fairly certain it had something to do with the time device although whether it was the thing itself attacking or something else defending he had no idea. He desperately hoped it was the latter and that whatever it was, it would be successful.

The edge of the dome swept through the PSIA building at high speed, still accelerating. A faint tingle was the only apparent manifestation, although for some weird reason he felt that something, somewhere, was feeling rather pleased with itself. The feeling only lasted for a moment, though, then was gone.

"What was that?" Shampoo screeched, jumping back from the window and looking around frantically. The wall of light, an almost indescribable colour, had swept through the Café so fast it was only a flicker, accompanied by an odd emotional after-taste that if she'd been forced to, she'd have said was something very weird feeling smug. Cologne didn't answer, but when she looked at her ancient relative, she found the old woman performing some complex spell.

The results seemed to make her both worried, oddly satisfied, and resigned, all simultaneously. After a very long few seconds the Elder sighed.

"Well, that's that mystery solved, at any rate," she muttered.
"What?"

"It's the same sort of weird magic I was tracing months ago. Vastly stronger, almost inconceivably stronger, but it's from the same source." Turning to the window she looked out across the city. "I have a very good idea where the centre of that source is. But who's behind it... Or what..." The old woman shook her head.

"It's far past anything we can affect. If we tried we'd be crushed like a bug. I just hope that whoever or whatever it is knows what they're doing."

Moving to a chair she sat, patting the seat next to her. "Come over here, child. All we can do is wait."

Akane looked up at the wall of light that zipped through the shop, wondering what the hell it was. Going to the door she looked around, her head tilted as she tried to work out why she suddenly had felt, momentarily, sort of pleased with herself. After a moment she shrugged and went back to the counter to finish her lunch.

The expanding ward dome covered Tokyo within fifteen seconds, all of the centre of Japan five seconds after that, steadily accelerating across the Sea of Japan. Moving at thousands of kilometres per hour it swept across Korea, moving deeper into China, while in the other direction it spread across the Pacific towards Hawaii. Still speeding up it crossed the Bayankala Mountains and kept going.

Serena stared, then shouted, "Mom! Dad! Come look at this!" Harrison and his wife came to the door, staring at her, then looking across the back yard to where she was pointing up.

"What is that, dear?" Emily said softly. Harrison shook his head slowly, watching the wall of transparent light sweeping towards them across the western horizon as the evening waned.

"I have no idea. But I have the weirdest feeling I know who's involved..."

The light swept over them seconds later with no apparent effect. Car horns could be heard faintly in the distance as Los Angeles noticed the weird effect and briefly panicked, quite loudly.

In a warded cell in the secret, non-public part of the Tower of London, a part that didn't officially exist, former Minister of Magic and disgraced mage Robert Davenport twitched violently and dropped his book at the feeling of unbelievable powerful and alien magic that crossed the cell from east to west in the blink of an eye, bringing with it a sensation that made him embarrass himself. Running footsteps and shouts from outside his cell sounded, and when the mage guards checked on him, they found him huddled in the corner of the cell, somewhat damp in the trouser area, his eyes shut, mumbling to himself.

"Don't let her get me," he was saying over and over. "I'm being good."

Deciding that since it had covered so much of the planet it might as well finish the job the system allowed the ward expansion to finish, enveloping the entire world in an immaterial cloud of force. The extra energy required was trivial once past the initial expansion. Usefully, it had encountered several more power sources it could utilise, more than making up the difference, although the one it had been after was by far the largest and easiest to deal with.
But under the circumstances every little bit helped.

The system pulled hard on the power sources it had located, absorbing the energy wholesale, while simultaneously trying to work out how to get it to the nodes, who could use it to destroy the enemy. It felt sure a solution was possible.

The enemy influence was growing rapidly. It could feel that the main primary node was attacking it with everything it could bring to bear, a truly impressive amount of power, while the remaining nodes were feeding energy into the attack as well. It could also tell it wasn't quite enough, as while it was slowly depleting the enemies' attack, it wouldn't do enough damage before the process the enemy had put into action completed.

It pulled harder, collecting all the unclaimed energy it could.

Elder Qian Dhu of the Joketsuzoku tribe, the second most senior elder after Ku Lon, who was still in Japan, suddenly jolted awake, looking around. Her apprentice stared at her. The old woman had been taking a well deserved nap after an arduous demonstration of mage-craft, while the much younger woman had prepared their evening meal.

"What is it, Elder?" she asked curiously.

"Don't you feel that, girl?" the two hundred and fifty year old elder asked absently, staring towards the east. "Something is coming." She hopped spryly erect, heading for the door.

"What is coming?" the apprentice, a woman in her forties, asked, not offended at being called 'girl'.

"I don't know. It's powerful, and very fast."

"Herb? Or Saffron?"

The elder shook her head, walking outside into the afternoon light. "No. Far more powerful than either. It feels like it could stomp Saffron without even noticing."

The other woman paled. She knew damn well how powerful the Phoenix People's ruler was. Only one person she had heard of had defeated him, one person they were still trying to find. Even then it had been a very near thing and most likely nearly an accident. Joining her mentor at the door of the hut they both looked around. Other magically gifted Amazons were gathering outside, feeling the same thing. She could feel it now, turning to the east.

"There!" She pointed, causing everyone to look.

The wave of weirdly coloured light zoomed towards them, rippling like the aurora, only in shades one would normally find in dreams. Qian Dhu stared in disbelief. "What the fuck is that?" someone behind her said in awe.

"I think it's a ward of some sort, by the feel of it," she said, "but the power!"

"It's the work of the gods," another voice said fearfully.

"No, it's something... different," she replied, stretching out her mage senses, then recoiling in shock. "Very different. I've never felt anything even remotely like it. I'm not even sure it's magic."

"What else could it be?" her apprentice asked in a low voice. The elder shrugged helplessly.
"I have no idea at all."

Seconds later, far too quickly to do anything, it was on them, then past, with only a faint ripple of sensation to the senses of any magic or ki sensitive individual. Everyone turned to watch as the wall of light kept going, heading towards the west faster and faster. Less than fifteen seconds later there was a sensation of completion. She shuddered.

"I think it's gone all around the entire world," she whispered.

"That's... totally impossible," another elder gasped. "No one has magic that powerful. It would take every mage in China working together and it would kill them in the process."

"Demon magic?" someone mused out loud. Everyone looked at the woman, who spread her hands out to the side. "Just thinking out loud. I know some demon mages are supposed to be vastly more powerful than anyone we know about."

"What's it for?" Qian Dhu's apprentice asked quietly. She looked at the much younger woman, raising an eyebrow approvingly.

"Now, that is the correct question." No one had a good answer.

A scream from the hut of the best seer they had caused everyone to whip around, then run towards it. The seer herself, a woman in only her middle second century, staggered out of the hut, looking like she'd just seen hell itself. "It's coming..." She staggered, catching herself on the door frame as the small crowd reached her.

"What's coming?" one of the bystanders demanded. "Was it that... thing? Whatever it was?" The seer stared at her, not really seeing the woman.

"It's getting closer. It's so cold and merciless, I can't stand it." She rubbed her arms with her hands as if she'd stepped outside in the winter with no coat. "It doesn't care about us. It's just going to erase us and start again."

Everyone looked at each other. Eventually, Qian Dhu asked, "What is... it?"

"The end of everything approaches. All that we are, all that we were, all that we could be, will be unmade, unless they can stop it." The voice of the seer took on a character that made everyone in earshot freeze, pure cold fear going down their spines. The woman slowly looked around at them then fell over, unconscious before she hit the ground. Several people rushed to help her.

Qian Dhu stared at her, then glanced at her apprentice. The younger woman looked back in shock. "Well. That was singularly spooky, and not exactly helpful," the Elder finally said, shaking her head. Despite her words she was shaken to the core. She could see that everyone else was as well.

"Look!" The cry of shock came from the other end of the street. Once more everyone whirled around. They gaped.

In the distance, towards the mountains, a glow was strengthening, visible even in the sunlight. The Elder had a very good idea where it was centred. "It's Jusenkyo," she said with a sigh of surprise. The glow grew, every colour one could imagine mixing and whirling, then a column of light leapt into the sky. A wave of magic strong enough for even the non-adept to feel swept across them as the energies of the cursed springs were sucked into... something. Everyone watched in amazement for twenty seconds or so until the column of magic began to dwindle, shrinking to a thread then disappearing. In the aftermath a faint glow could be seen over the horizon, as a cloud rose slowly into the clear sky.

"It sucked it dry, I think," the elder said slowly. "Something pulled all the power out of it, everything that had been stored over the millennia. That was the largest source of wild magic on the planet but I can hardly feel anything coming from it now."

"I think it boiled the springs as well," her apprentice said. She pointed at the cloud which was still rising, the glow at its base fading. "That's what's left of the water, I suspect."

"You're probably right." The ancient but powerful woman looked up in thought. "I wonder what took the power, and why?"

The world trembled. Everyone looked around nervously.

"It comes," the seer, still unconscious, croaked from the ground, making everyone jump violently.

"That's just wrong," the old woman griped, recovering slightly, but wondering, 'What comes?'

In the middle of Australia, Ayers rock, or more correctly, Uluru, glowed with lambent flame. The tourists and locals within view watched as a thread of light rose from it for a few seconds, an eerie feeling sweeping through them.

In several places in Europe, mainly in the UK, various stone circles and ancient monuments glowed as power left them, rising into the night. Stonehenge lit up like something out of a disco for a dozen seconds, all the stones different colours. Motorists on the nearby A303 slowed and stared. Miles away, Avebury hummed with power, causing people in the pub located in the middle of the huge circle to run outside and gape.

From Land's End to the tip of the Hebrides, dozens of ancient sites, anywhere power had been stored, lit briefly as it was pulled out. People across the nation looked in wonder at the sight.

More ancient reservoirs in Ireland emptied themselves. In South America, a number of old Mayan temples glowed briefly. Far to the north of Canada, deep under the ice, a powerful illumination caused dozens of square kilometres of glacier to shine with an eerie light. No one was around to see it as the buried and totally unknown megalithic site drained into the magical field now surrounding the planet.

Crew on a tanker in the South Pacific stared and pointed as light streamed upwards from a source deep under the water somewhere over the horizon. Men shouted, gesticulating, at the sight. Seconds passed then it winked out. Nothing else was visible.

Mages and other magic workers everywhere looked about in shock. No one could work out what was happening. The only people who would know for sure were in a battle to save their universe, many realities away.

All the other available sources ran dry long before Jusenkyo did, but even that finally emptied. Having finished collecting magical energy that had accumulated deep underground for over five thousand years, far longer than the Amazons or the others who called the area home realised, the ward system finally felt it had all the power it could acquire. Now it needed to apply it.

After a little more 'thought', it metaphorically shrugged, then decided to simply tell its owners that it was ready to help. With the extra power available to it getting a message through should be possible.
The middle sister was shaking with exhaustion, as she allowed her ki and magic reserves to flow through her sister-in-law into the hugely powerful ki beam still roaring into the portal. She could feel she was nearly running on empty, barely enough to let the disguise spell work. Everyone else was nearly as badly off, even Ranma's alter-ego beginning to waver. Despite having reserves larger than the rest of them put together, the martial artist was beginning to flag. She was powering more than half of the beam. How she and 'Chou' could still keep the ward going was beyond her.

"You're breaking through," Yrenti commed them, monitoring the situation on the other side of the portal through his combat drone, watching in awe as the beam slowly ate its way through the warped spacetime surrounding the ancient machine as it spun up the time gate. "But the temporal dislocation field is still building. It's not going to be enough. The remaining weapons will finish it off if you can get through the field, but I can't fire them with your magic in the way and if you turn it off the thing will activate before I can get the warheads in place. Most of its energy is going to divert your beam. Remove that and..."

"We're not going to have a choice soon," Yori replied, even over the link sounding ready to drop. "We're running dry."

#Nabiki, you are in serious danger of using all your life energy up, you must stop, or die.# Jun warned, sounding very worried. Beside her, Aiko dropped to her knees, then her face, unconscious. Misaki staggered briefly but somehow managed to keep going.

'No choice at all, Jun' she told the machine. 'I die or everyone else does.'

#Unless something drastic changes, you will die and everyone else will.# her SI told her. #For your own safety you must stop soon.#

'I'm sorry, Jun, I'm afraid I can't do that,' she whispered to the device, wavering with exhaustion but feeding all the energy she could to her sister-in-law, not sure how she was managing to still keep going. It gave off something very close to a sigh of resignation.

#I understand.#

A few seconds later, just as she was about to fall over, she got a very weird sensation in the back of her head. At first putting it down to how tired she felt, she twitched as it strengthened. Something familiar about it made her listen. Sparing what concentration she could, she tried to work out what it was. Eventually she thought she recognised it. It was the ward system. The little sensation of being watched over that lived far at the back of her mind, no matter where she went, even in some other realities if she concentrated hard enough on it, seemed to be jumping up and down, trying to attract her attention. A couple more seconds passed then she asked in a light-headed manner, "Can anyone else feel that?"

"What?" several of her friends asked, all sounding as tired as she felt. 'Yori' glanced at her for a moment, dark rings around her eyes showing she was about to collapse.

A sudden collection of thoughts rushed through the middle Tendo's head, culminating in a wild surmise. "Open a portal to home," she said. Her sister stared at her for a few seconds.

"What? Why?"

"Just do it, quickly. I think it's important." The elder sister stared at her, then looked at her husband, who looked back and shrugged.

"All right." The disguised Kasumi concentrated, looking totally washed out, almost unable to spare the energy. Less than a minute had gone by since they'd fired the weapons through the portal but all of them were ready to fall over, although none of them intended to stop. A portal slowly crackled into existence nearby, taking much longer than they were used to, proof how exhausted 'Chou' was.

Finally the other portal stabilised. As soon as it did, everything happened at once.

Success!

One of the primary nodes created a locus in reality that linked there to here. The message had been understood. The system extended its influence through the hole between realities, using another loophole it had just come up with, which was that the doorway to its owners had opened inside it, so logically everything on the other side of that door was also inside. It was aware on some level this was an argument that was pushing the limits of its flexibility but under the circumstances felt fairly sure its owners would understand and approve.

On the other side of the hole it found all the nodes that made up its network almost at the point of collapse, depleted far past the point of safety. Also present were two non-networked organic entities that it tentatively marked as non-hostile, due to their proximity to the owners, their presence inside the shield those owners were generating, and their apparent acceptance of the entities in the first place. In addition two further inorganic intelligences were outside the shield, along with a number of what were clearly weapons. It studied these last for a fraction of a second, concerned, but decided that they were also not an immediate threat, seemingly being under the control of one of the unknown organics.

One second had passed since the portal opened.

Noticing that the shield the owners was producing was beginning to wobble due to them running low on power, it gently pushed them aside and took over the running of it, radiating apologies in the process for being rude. The primary node, after a moment's apparent confusion, relinquished control gratefully. The shielding ward snapped into rigidity, completely impenetrable to anything other than the portal linking the inside of it to the centre of the ward system.

After a tiny delay while it worked out what to do, the system then began to push power back into the nodes, using the link it normally utilised in the other direction. It had to be careful, there was a definite upper limit to how fast any of them could accept the energy without damage, but it juggled the flows until equilibrium was established. Watching carefully it was satisfied that they were no longer in immediate danger of exhausting their reserves, which slowly began to refill.

Three seconds.

Turning its attention from the immediate requirement to prevent the nodes failing, the system looked at the energy being sent into the other hole in reality, through which the enemy could be sensed, far more strongly than at home. It could tell that whatever operation that enemy was engaged in was being drastically slowed by the attack but not stopped. It needed to do something.

What, and how, were the two main questions.

It could dump an enormous amount of energy into a similar attack, far more than any of the nodes could handle, but it calculated that this wouldn't do the job quickly enough. There was little time left. Looking around for another solution it stopped on the small figure of the last node added to the system, the second most powerful at the current time, closing in on the level of the lead primary node, although inexplicably limited right now. The system recalled how, when the node was linked in, it had detected that the node had possession and control of an artefact that bore a certain resemblance to itself, an artefact that was very, very old and very, very dangerous. Something designed purely as a weapon.

That would do nicely.

Now all it had to do was work out how to access it. After a short cogitation, it drew on its link with the node and tried the direct approach of attempting to get the request understood.

Six seconds had passed.

Hotaru, her hands over her ears and her eyes shut, was lying face down on the alien ground, feeling heat wash over her from the massively powerful energy beam 'Yori' and all her friends were producing. She could feel that they were flagging, even the martial artists' huge energy reserves guttering out. The girl was terrified, beyond anything she'd ever felt before, and she knew her friends were as well. Despite the ward system having severed their link with the time device she imagined she could still feel something at the back of her mind glaring at her.

Hearing 'Azumi' ask a question through the com link, she risked looking up through squinting eyes, seeing only silhouettes against the brilliance of the beam pouring into the portal. Through her terror she wondered what the middle Tendo woman meant, but after a few seconds noticed that she could feel something else at the back of her mind, apparently trying to get her attention. It took a moment to work out what it was. Just as she did, another portal opened inside the ward, a couple of metres from 'Chou', next to Lldnr'k, who squawked in shock and shuffled further away.

With almost no delay, she felt the full attention of the ward system itself, power flooding through the portal, something huge and immaterial inspecting all of them very thoroughly and very quickly, concentrating on the seven people powering the ki beam. The ward covering them abruptly strengthened enormously to a level she found hard to believe, outstripping her own shield wall by a huge amount. The girl could sense that somehow 'Yori' and the rest were no longer losing energy, realising that their reserves were being bolstered by an external source. Something felt odd about the power coming from the ward system, there was vastly more of it there than she had realised was even possible, leaving aside the way it didn't feel quite like either magic or that 'ki' stuff they used.

A few seconds passed then she got the oddest sensation the system was trying once more to communicate something, specifically to her. Not quite knowing why, she manifested her weapon, seeing Ami and Rei look at her as they felt the magic that accompanied it, then stood up, holding the ancient pole-arm in a death-like grip. Approaching the other group she glanced at 'Yori' who looked back, meeting her gaze, then looked down at the Glaive. Her eyes widened for a moment before narrowing in sudden realisation.

As smoothly as if they'd practised the move for hours, Hotaru levelled the pole-arm at the portal leading to the time device's fractional reality, 'Yori' grabbed it just above where her own hands were holding it, pumping a huge flood of energy into it, which leaped from the end into the aperture in space, maintaining the beam, then the girl unlocked the safeties with an instinctive mental instruction.

The Silence Glaive, smoking slightly as it heated up, hummed with power, which was suddenly augmented with a truly awe-inspiring burst of energy that roared out of the portal back to Minato and flowed through the weapon. A visible wave of distorted spacetime shot from the pole-arm into the portal leaving a weird inverted after-image behind it.

Ten seconds. Time was running out, the enemy was nearly at the point of unleashing its own attack, which the system could tell would be devastating and final.

The youngest node responded as it had hoped for, producing the artefact and activating it. The lead primary node transferred its energy to the device as it powered up, keeping the attack going, and as soon as it was ready the system immediately transferred as much power as it could into the ancient weapon. It had to be careful not to destroy it as it supercharged the thing far beyond what its designers had intended, but it could feel the feedback beginning and skilfully backed off just enough to keep it intact. Powered by not only its own impressive reserves but by most of the magical energy of an entire planet, the artefact unleashed an attack that was horrifyingly powerful.

The distortion wave passed through the locus that linked this reality back to the one that was an offshoot of the system's own which housed the enemy. Taken completely by surprise, that other entity didn't stand a chance as enough power to vaporise a small moon slammed into it, disrupting the temporal dislocation field it had nearly completed like a brick through a plate glass window.

Energy fed back on itself, instantly destroying the temporal gate that lay at the heart of the time device. The release of the power that had been building the field flashed from the gate to the remainder of the structure as it collapsed, causing it to heat up to the point it emitted x-rays within microseconds, too fast even to allow it to properly melt before it simply sublimated, boiling off into the space in the fractional reality.

The time device ended an existence that had lasted over two million subjective years and survived the total dissolution of its originating reality in one huge burst of vapour and radiation, dead before it could react. The spherically expanding wave of energy spread outwards at the speed of light, catching the damaged Kw'lyn combat drone seconds later and causing it to ablate away instantly, just after transmitting its final recordings and a copy of its guiding intelligence back to its owner, being well aware that it was about to die but satisfied that it was in a good cause.

Yrenti watched the transmission showing the other side of the portal with an open mouth, as the odd magical attack, powered far past anything he'd ever personally encountered, slammed into the Abomination. Where these people had got that much power from so suddenly was something he was very interested to discover, as was what the hell they'd been using up to that point. It felt a little like magic, true enough, but not at all like anything he'd ever come across before.

The raging energy beam that Yori and her associates had been producing just before the final attack had come winked out. Seizing the opportunity that presented itself he immediately sent the remaining antimatter warheads through the portal at maximum acceleration targeted on the location of the time device, just in case anything was left. There was, as he'd told them, no sense in taking chances, although based on what the drone had sent back it was a fairly redundant exercise by this point.

The thing that was on the far side of the second portal watched, he could feel it, as the weapons entered the first one. It seemed approving. That was good. Whatever it was, he didn't want it angry with him, not after seeing what it was capable of. A couple of seconds passed while it inspected him curiously then he felt it turn its attention back to the hole in reality leading to the sub-reality that now contained a huge expanding cloud of vapour and subatomic particles.
Silence fell on the dead world, an echo faintly coming to abused ears from the distant mountains. Very slowly, one by one, each of the people involved in the attack still standing slowly collapsed to their knees, while Ami, Rei, Yrenti, and Lldnr’k exchanged glances, getting up. The ward dome surrounding them blinked out of existence.

After a long moment, Ami moved to check on their fallen friends, Lldnr’k helping.

The attack had been successful. The enemy was gone, utterly, its operation disrupted before it could reach the point of completion. Aftershocks of the sudden release of what had so nearly happened rippled through the home reality causing a number of odd effects but the system could sense they were largely transitory and therefore didn’t worry about them. They were no immediate threat.

Checking on its charges it found they were all intact and more or less undamaged although still severely depleted, aside from two of the three recently added ones. The last one, the one that had been holding the weapon, was showing signs of mild overload, as was the lead primary node, both of them slightly injured but not to a level that would cause long-term harm. It was an unavoidable outcome considering the situation although somewhat embarrassing, as far as the system understood that concept. Their own self-repair abilities were well up to the challenge of dealing with it.

Continuing to feed energy to them to sustain them, it was about to attempt to disrupt the reality locus through which it had fired when something occurred to it. Extending its influence through the hole again it peered around curiously, considering.

The original entity was dead, definitely, so the threat was over. It could feel the magic sustaining the domain it had ruled was rapidly unravelling, due both to the destruction of the enemy and the attack the nodes had fired using the ancient weapon, which was still having a devastating effect as it spread throughout the space the enemy had called home. This was liberating steadily growing amounts of magical energy...

Hmm.

No one seemed to be using it. It would be a shame to let it go to waste...

Lldnr’k felt something change, something other than what had just happened. The entity on the other side of the portal back to Minato had passed its gaze over everyone, a feeling of satisfaction coming to him, then as it seemed on the threshold of withdrawing, paused. It seemed to be inspecting the portal to the time device’s sub-reality with interest.

A feeling of something weird going on built. He glanced at the blue-haired human next to him who was trying to get either Yori or Hotaru to let go of the pole-arm they were both clamped onto like limpets with a grip of steel, despite severely burned hands. Ami looked back, her eyes wide.

A second later, a beam of pure magic was sucked out of the portal, streaming over them and vanishing into the other one. Yrenti made an odd strangled sound as he hit the deck again while the other three recoiled. The energy transfer built in intensity, flowing faster and faster, causing some very odd fringe effects that made the lighting waver and the ground gently shake, until, eventually, it tapered off and winked out. Immediately afterwards the portal to the sub-reality groaned in a manner he’d never encountered before, flickered once or twice, then imploded.

A wave of distortion rippled outwards, passing through everything in sight with no apparent ill effects, but making everyone stagger. Then, for the second time, silence fell.

The effects of the destruction of the time device on the reality it had been tampering with for millennia were subtle but profound. The entire universe... twitched.

All over Earth, people jumped, looking around, wondering what had happened. The magically sensitive ones had been feeling something was wrong the entire time the attack and counter-attack had been happening, but even people with no ability or experience felt the end of the time machine. Later, some would describe it as a very low level earthquake, one that shook them yet had no apparent damaging effects. Others would say it was like feeling someone was behind them, making them whirl around, only to see the room was empty. Still others would liken it to the effect one sometimes encounters on the verge of falling asleep when a massive spasm seems to come from nowhere.

But it wasn't limited to Earth.

Half-way across the galaxy, a race of aliens simultaneously shuddered, looking around, then staring at each other with all six eyes. Papers would be written for years on the planetary disturbance, two religions would be started, and one ended, but no one would ever conclusively determine what the cause of the strange sensation was.

On a super-Jovian world circling a red giant star on the outskirts of the galaxy known to humanity as NGC4945, a species of extremely intelligent methane-breathing space squid floating in the nearly liquid atmosphere discussed the odd effect for decades, eventually arriving at a surprisingly close description of what had happened. While they would never know who had saved reality, they felt gratitude nonetheless.

Eight and a half billion light years from Earth, in an ancient part of the universe, on a small world circling a dying star and containing the remnants of the oldest intelligent species in that particular strand of the multiverse, something jolted awake, looked around with interest, measured the distortion, decided that it wasn't anything it could or should do anything about, then went back to sleep to dream the rest of eternity away.

All over the universe that made up that particular reality strand, people of every type one could think of looked around and shuddered a little before going on with their day.

Closer to home, Haruka stared out the window, the cup of coffee in her hand cooling unnoticed, wondering what her daughter was doing. She had felt the time device die. The overwhelmingly powerful magic that had attracted her attention a couple of minutes ago had caused her to rush to the window just in time to see the wave of light sweep across the city and beyond, while she could feel dozens if not hundreds of portals open then close all around her. She'd watched, open mouthed and horrified, as everything she could see, on some deep and fundamental level, began to tremble.

Certain she was watching the end of the world she had simply stared, frozen, until with a suddenness that took her by surprise, it stopped. Reality wavered briefly then snapped back into normality. She twitched a little, lukewarm coffee slopping out onto her hand, as momentarily she felt something begin what she could almost describe as an oddly mechanical scream of rage before it simply vanished.

Standing at the window for a little longer, when nothing further happened, she sighed very gently, bowed her head and muttered a heartfelt thank-you, although to what she wasn't sure, then turned away to make some more coffee.
A few kilometres away, Makoto picked herself off the roof she'd landed flat on her face on when whatever had happened, happened, rolling over and sitting up, brushing grit from her face. 'What the fuck just happened?' she wondered to herself. She also wondered about the feeling of cold rage followed by abruptly curtailed equally cold fear she'd felt before everything went weird. Looking around, she couldn't see anything amiss. There was still a strange feeling to the day, not helped by the way more portals than she could believe had suddenly come and gone in seconds all around her, leaving her wondering if some weird attack had taken place.

Eventually she got up, brushed herself down, then walked slowly over to the edge of the roof and carefully looked around. Seeing nothing, she shivered slightly, before deciding to go home and take the afternoon off. Read a good book or something.

Michiru pulled the curtain aside, staring outside suspiciously. She could feel it watching. Carefully inspecting the scene outside the window for a little while, she replaced the curtain, then methodically went around the house doing the same to each window in turn.

Cologne sighed, almost collapsing, only held up by her concerned great grand-daughter. Shampoo helped her to the sofa. "It's over. Whatever it was, it's finally finished." The Elder looked tired but pleased, slumping back into the seat.

"What do you think it was?" the much younger woman asked quietly, looking around nervously. The sensation that had swept across them moments ago had been extremely unsettling.

"I have no idea. Nothing I've ever encountered before, though, I can say that much." The old Amazon studied her relative, smiling a little. "But I think, whatever it was, we won." She patted Shampoo's hand comfortingly.

"Weird."

Genma looked at Soun, who returned his gaze.

"You might say that. I wonder what the hell that was about?"

"Not a clue, old friend, but we're still here. I suppose that's a good thing." They exchanged glances again, then slowly returned to the Dojo. The students were milling around, looking worried. Mariko in particular was still staring at the wall in the direction the original sensation had come from, making Soun watch her for a moment, then go over and put his hand on her shoulder. The girl jumped, looking up at him.

"Don't worry, I think it's over. Go home. We'll start over tomorrow." She nodded after a few seconds, heading towards the changing rooms without a word, but still with an odd expression on her face.

Dismissing all the rest of the students, the two martial artists headed inside to have a few calming cups of tea and possibly a beer. Or two.

Naito looked around. Exchanging a glance with his colleague, they both looked out the window again, then when nothing further happened, turned away.

"I'd love to know what the fuck that was," the other agent muttered. "Why do I have the weirdest feeling something absolutely horrible nearly happened?"
"I'm not sure," Naito replied. 'Although that's not entirely true. I have a very good idea what happened and who was behind it. I guess they succeeded.' A smile began to spread across his face.

"Come on," he suddenly said. "Let's go and get a drink." His friend and colleague stared at him for a moment then nodded, following as he left the room.

More fully charged than its makers would have thought possible, the ward system pondered its options for a moment. It had completely filled its reserves, even having had to create new ones, which had taken a little thought, but it had come up with a solution in the end. Even so, it had more energy available than seemed even vaguely sensible. After mulling it over, it decided in the interests of good relations to return the excess.

Qian Dhu turned at the shout. "Oh, what now!" she exclaimed, shaken to the core by what she'd felt a few seconds ago. Looking to the Amazon who had cried out, she turned to follow the pointing finger, somehow not totally surprised by what she saw.

Off in the direction of the distant Jusenkyo a column of misty light stretched between somewhere high overhead and the ground once more. This time, however, she got the impression that the energy was flowing the other way. The transfer went on for at least as long as the original drain had taken. She could feel the magic level of the cursed ground rebuilding rapidly, finally tailing off and stopping at a point she judged to be somewhat higher than it had originally been. The light winked out. Once more, a cloud of steam slowly rose into the air.

"It put it back," her apprentice mumbled.

"With interest, by the feel of it," the Elder agreed, stunned. They glanced at each other, then looked back in the direction the column of light had come from. "I wonder what it was?"

"Something that needed to borrow a hell of a lot of energy," the younger woman replied.

"Well, it seems polite, if nothing else." Shaking her head, the old woman decided it was a mystery that could wait for morning. A sound behind them made them turn to stare at the seer, who was muttering to herself. They glanced at each other once more.

"The greatest enemy has been defeated. Our defenders succeeded. We still exist. Be grateful."

The hoarse voice again sent chills down spines. Silence fell in the crowd. A few seconds later the seer blinked, waking up, then sat up. She looked around to see everyone staring at her.

"What? Did I miss something?"

Qian Dhu sighed, before heading back into her home. She needed a drink.

Once again, all over the planet, places of power glowed as energy was returned to them. Again, people stared, wondering what was going on. The transfer finally ended, the last lights dying away slowly, until even Stonehenge went dark and quiet.

Satisfied, the system ran a final check, deciding everything was in order. It withdrew power from the external defences, collapsing the wards back to cover only the apartment building as per normal procedure. It knew it was going to be in trouble for playing fast and loose with the rules but overall it was still pleased. Absent another world-ending threat of such a type it doubted it would ever be allowed to do anything like this again.
It was OK with that.

Content, feeling in organic terms sleepy and well fed, the system dropped back into standby, leaving only the links to the nodes active to replenish them. As it powered down much of the new connectivity unravelled, no longer needed. Even so, it was that little bit closer to something one would consider alive.

The final effect of the dissolution of the planet-girdling ward, as permeable as it had been, was unexpected. Due to the odd relationship with time the ward system had from its linkage with Ranma and through that his experiences with the Mirror, it had slightly isolated everyone inside it from the minor temporal effects of the aborted time reset. With the withdrawal of the ward, this isolation, for the most part, evaporated, leaving some odd effects.

People everywhere blinked, looking at each other, wondering what had happened. Comparing notes, eventually it would turn out that about thirty seconds or so of the day had somehow vanished, leaving only the memory of what would come to be known as 'The Great Twitch'. The few that remembered events correctly were either on the other side of a portal during the final moments, somehow connected to the time device, powerful users of ki or magic, or both close enough to and sensitive enough to the locations the system had borrowed magical energy from to have some resistance to the effect.

"Are you guys OK?" Ami asked her friends privately over the com. 'Chou' looked up from inspecting her husband, who was nearly unconscious. The blonde appeared on the verge of collapse herself, although slightly better off. The young woman could feel that the energy being supplied by the ward system through the portal was the only thing keeping her upright. None of the others looked much better. 'Azumi' in particular was swaying, on the point of falling over, while Aiko was mumbling to herself from where she was lying on her face in the gravel.

"More or less, I think, but we need to get home quickly. Neither Ranma or Nabiki will be able to keep the disguise spell running for much longer. We don't want Yrenti finding out yet, we don't know him well enough." 'Chou' glanced at the Kw'lyn representative who seemed to be doing something with his remaining combat drones, glancing at them with concern every now and then.

"What about Lldhr'k?" Ami asked. The other woman shrugged a little, looking at the temporal mage who still looked shocked by the activities of the last few minutes. Ami checked with her SI and was appalled to find it had been no more than two and a half minutes since they'd started the attack. It felt like hours had passed.

"We can trust him, but I think we need to let him know under better conditions." The blue-haired girl nodded her understanding. The crunch of gravel underfoot made them both turn to see Yrenti approaching. He stopped, inspecting Hotaru and 'Yori', who were still holding onto the Glaive, their blistered and reddened hands locked tightly around it, with a worried expression.

"Will they be all right?" he asked. "I can arrange medical aid if you can open a portal back to Kw'lyn Industries." 'Chou' smiled tiredly at him.

"Thank you for the offer, Yrenti, but we'll be fine. We're good at healing." She looked down as her husband muttered something indecipherable then slowly let go of the old weapon, skin peeling loose with a nasty sucking sound, quite a lot of it staying behind. Ami winced at the sight and looked away. "But we're all on the point of falling over. We need to go home, recover, and find out what happened."

The alien nodded, still inspecting them. After a long moment, he made an odd gesture of respect, bowing at the waist and touching his brow with two hands. "I understand. Please accept the most profound thanks of Kw'lyn Industries, the people of my home, and myself. You have finally done something we've been looking forward to for more years than I like to think about." He straightened up. "I only wish I could have been more effective. We failed to take into account what might happen if the temporal gate was activated during the attack, which was bad planning on our part. It's a pity we don't make supernova bombs any more, one of those would have been a better idea."

"It's not your fault, Yrenti," 'Chou' responded, smiling a little. "Your weapons would have been more than enough if it wasn't for the machine reacting like it did. We didn't quite take it by surprise. But we did manage even so, which we probably couldn't have done without your help. Without that initial damage from the bombs we might not have been in time."

"It was mostly your... whatever the hell that was." He looked at the portal with a bemused expression. "What was that, anyway?"

"Our home defence system which seems to have been thinking creatively," the blonde woman replied, following his gaze with her own, a slight frown crossing her face. "Something I didn't think could happen. We're going to have to look into that. But all things considered, I'm relieved it did whatever it did."

"As are the rest of us," Lldnr'k commented, still appearing stunned. "That was far too close for comfort."

"Agreed. We're very lucky things worked out the way they did," 'Chou' sighed. "I hope there aren't too many problems as a result of what happened."

"Considering the alternative, I doubt any fallout will be too serious," the mage told her.

"Hopefully not." She carefully gathered her husband up in her arms and stood, Ami helping steady her. "I'm very sorry, Yrenti, but anything further will have to wait for a while. We would very much like to talk more about all sort of things but..." He held up a hand.

"You don't need to say any more. Feel free to contact us again at any time. We're forever in your debt, aside from my personal feelings, so as soon as you feel able, just let us know and we can pick this up again." He smiled at her in his own way. She nodded, returning the expression.

"Thank you for understanding." Concentrating, she managed to form another portal. "That will take you back. Lldnr'k, I'm terribly sorry, but I can't manage a portal home for you as well. Do you mind going back via Kw'lyn?" The mage shook his head.

"Of course not." He glanced at Yrenti, who shrugged slightly. "I can take the opportunity to ask a few questions."

"Certainly," the other being told him. "I can easily arrange to get you home whenever you want to go but there's no hurry."

"Thank you." Lldnr'k walked over and held out his hand to 'Chou', who gently shifted her nearly unconscious burden around, causing the smaller woman to mumble to herself, then shook the mage's hand with a smile. "Look after yourselves and let me know you're all OK, please?"

"We'll contact you soon," she promised. She and Ami watched as Yrenti and Lldnr'k walked through the portal with a final wave, the two combat drones following. The last one rotated to face them as it went past, dipping in the air in a sort of salute that made Ami wave to it, grinning. As soon as it was through 'Chou' released the portal, grunting with strain, then reverted to Kasumi. Nabiki and Ranma both resumed their normal appearances as well.

"We need to get back before I fall over," Kasumi mumbled. She staggered towards the portal. Ami watched for a moment, then bent and picked up Hotaru, who was limp in her arms, while Rei got Aiko. The others slowly picked themselves up, looking like death, a trail of exhausted women heading through the tear in reality. When the last one, which happened to be Misaki, entered, it popped out of existence, leaving only a circle of pristine gravel in the middle of a conical zone of melted rock, evidence of the backwash from the attack.

Nabiki leaned against the wall of the practice room, which was very gently wobbling back and forth as far as she was concerned, watching her elder sister struggle to heal the hands of the red-head lying on the floor next to her. "That's the best I can do," the older woman finally said, having changed third-degree burns back to something that looked like bad sunburn. "The rest will have to wait." She leaned forwards, supporting herself on her hands, her hair falling about her face, then with a sigh pushed herself up enough to shift over to Hotaru. Rei and Ami moved to help her, being the only two people in the room who could stand unaided.

They gently pried the young girl's hands free from the pole-arm, once more leaving skin behind, Rei looking unwell in the process. Ami moved the weapon to the side of the room where it would be safe, while Rei helped the elder Tendo to the girl's side. Once more the usual healing glow struggled into life, wavering and pulsing in an abnormal manner. When the burns were mostly healed, it went out as Kasumi gently tipped over onto her side, totally unconscious. Nabiki pushed herself away from the wall to go to her but ended up simply sliding to the ground. Seconds later the two young women were the only ones in the entire apartment still awake. Looking around they inspected their comrades, glanced at each other, then sighed a little.

"Come on, give me a hand getting them to bed," Ami said, bending down and picking Ranma up. The petite red-head muttered something unintelligible then started snoring. Chuckling, Rei lifted Kasumi, both of them heading for the first bedroom.

Stepping back from the window, Saeko blinked, wondering why she'd been staring out of it. Nothing much interesting seemed to be going on. Shaking her head, she tried to remember what she'd been doing. Oh, yes, she'd been in the middle of writing up her notes from the last night's work. Oddly she couldn't remember walking to the window. After a moment she shrugged slightly, putting it down to too much concentration on work. She needed a holiday.

Turning, distracted, her elbow caught the side of the bookcase, rocking it slightly and sending a twinge of agony up her arm as she managed to ping a nerve in exactly the wrong place. The woman yelped in pain, grabbing her elbow with her other hand, wincing at both the impact and the sound of a number of items tumbling to the floor, bouncing off the tiles. She rubbed her arm for thirty seconds or so, swearing under her breath, until the numbness in her fingers ebbed away. Looking at the mess on the floor she sighed.

"Damn it," she muttered, bending over and picking up a few books and a couple of ornaments. Among them was Ami's little transparent crystal fantasy figurine which she inspected closely, worried it was damaged. It seemed completely intact, only a little dust on one of the arms where it had hit the floor. She put the other items away then looked at the statuette again, wiping the dust off and leaving it pristine.

An odd expression crossed her face as she rubbed her fingers together. The dust left on them felt strangely gritty. Like...
She looked down, to where the figurine had landed, then bent over, peering at the tiles. Searching eyes found a tiny divot in the glazed surface, surrounded by white dust. She reached out and touched it, then raised her finger to her eyes, studying the powder on the end. After a long moment she looked back at the figurine in her other hand. Her eyebrows slowly went up.

'No. That's... ridiculous,' she mused. 'Impossible, even. But...' She looked down at the tiles again. After another pause, she very slowly reached out and touched the outstretched arm of the statue to the lower corner of the window, pressing hard then dragging it across the glass with a scraping sound.

She was still looking between the unmarred little crystal sculpture and the deep scratch on the window five minutes later.

---

Rei walked into the temple, stopping next to her grandfather, who was sitting on a low wall looking out over Tokyo as the clouds slowly cleared, leaving a fine afternoon. After a moment he turned to look at her, then went back to watching the scenery. They stayed silent for some time.

"I'm proud of you, my child," he finally said. He put his hand on hers where it was lying on the wall. "Your parents would be as well. It's a pity we can't tell them."

He gripped her hand tightly, feeling it was trembling. His was shaking a little as well. "Are the others all right?"

"Everyone will be fine, I think, but only Ami and I are conscious right now. The others nearly killed themselves trying to destroy that damn machine. Ami's looking after them for the moment, I came back for a change of clothes and to let you know what happened." She swung her leg over the wall and sat beside him, leaning against him. "I was absolutely terrified, grandfather. We came so close to losing everything. Everyone. If it wasn't for luck more than anything else..." She shivered.

The old man patted her knee with his other hand.

"You won. Don't over-analyse it. It's done, everyone and everything is still here. The Sun will rise in the morning, the Moon still circles the Earth, you and your friends saw to that. You have much to be very proud of." He glanced up at her for a second or two. "Thank you, by the way. You know, for helping save all of reality. I appreciate it."

"You're very welcome," Rei said, almost managing a smile. They sat beside each other watching the city for a long time.

---

Sergeant Harada looked around, wondering if he'd done the right thing, then glanced at his pregnant wife and knew he'd had no choice. She was also staring at the scenes before them wide-eyed. Looking up for a moment he blinked at the oddly-coloured sunlight, before staring at the strange buildings near them. It seemed like they'd appeared in the middle of something like a small park in the centre of a smallish town from what he could see, one with a few dozen buildings, some fairly large, but none more than perhaps four or five stories. The construction was of wood and stone, with quite a lot of decoration.

It vaguely reminded him of some sort of alpine village like you'd find in the depths of Austria, something he remembered from his youth when he travelled fairly extensively for a year or two. The trees around the place were mostly in dark red colours, again something he'd come across before at home, but not in such variety. Various birdlike creatures were flying around in small flocks making a noise that sounded like tinkling bells. Emiko looked around, clutching his hand, then looked up at him.

"Tetsuo? Where are we? What happened?" An aircraft of some sort whooshed overhead with a humming roar, apparently heading for a landing nearby, making her jump. "What did you do?" she wailed. He hugged her comfortingly.

"What I had to. Something horrible was happening back home, I don't know what, but all the demons left in a panic. I couldn't take any chances with you and the baby. I had a way out, I used it." He smiled down at her, although inside he was also very worried. Had he done the right thing? Thinking of all his friends at home, and all the people he met daily, he desperately hoped they were all right and this was all an over-reaction. But he couldn't forget the panic in Rynnkh's voice as she dived through her own emergency portal. She was genuinely terrified if he was any judge.

Whatever that weird column of light from somewhere near the park had been, it had scared the life out of anyone with magical knowledge.

"What was happening?" Emiko insisted.

He shrugged helplessly. "I have no idea, but it was big. You could feel it. Some sort of incredibly powerful magic, I think, but whether it was something attacking or something defending I don't know." He thought about it for a moment, still trembling slightly from the adrenaline rush. "It was from near the park somewhere."

"Isn't that the area you've always thought Yori and Chou probably live in?" she asked. He nodded.

"I suspect so. It's in the area they're active in and they seem to like it. I have no idea what they do when they're not out saving people, I've never tried to find out either because they deserve their private life, but it wouldn't surprise me if they lived somewhere close to there."

"Well, in that case, things are probably fine," his wife said firmly. "If they're involved I'm sure things will work out for the best."

He smiled at her. "You have a lot of faith in them, dear."

"Don't you?" she asked, smiling for the first time since he'd dragged her through the portal. "You certainly talk about them enough, and in terms that make it sound like you think they could save the world without even trying."

Laughing, he nodded a little. "I do think they're pretty remarkable even in magical girl terms, yes. They're good people, and smart. You're probably right, I may have over-reacted, but I couldn't take the chance."

The woman looked around again, more calmly. "All right, then. What do we do now?"

He sighed a little, also glancing about. "I have no idea. I suppose we need to find someone we can talk to and see what they suggest." They both inspected the surroundings for a little while. There were a few of Xrist's people wandering about, none of whom did more than glance at them, not at all surprised at their appearance, which he found slightly remarkable. In the end he shrugged and pointed. "How about that direction? It looks like it's heading for some larger buildings, perhaps there are more people there and we can find someone who speaks Japanese."

"It's as good as anything," his wife said, smiling at him. "Come on then. You're the one who dragged us into this, you have to explain it all to someone who can find out what's going on at home." They began walking, looking around with interest, but each of them hiding their fear of what might have happened from the other.
Nodoka poured several cups of tea, handing them around to murmured thanks from all present, then sat with her own. "So, what was that odd sensation, Elder?" She looked at the ancient Amazon, who was staring into her teacup with an unreadable expression. The other woman didn't respond for several seconds, but eventually looked up.

"I don't know. Not for sure. But it was something to do with the odd magical traces I've been finding around the entire area for months." She looked around at the others, all of whom were listening with interest. Akane glanced at Shampoo, the other young woman returning the look with one of her own.

"Was it dangerous?" the youngest Tendo asked curiously, a slightly worried look on her face. "I mean, all it was as far as I could tell was a weird sensation like a sort of mild earthquake." Cologne looked at her, an eyebrow up.

"Hmm." There was a pause while everyone watched her think. "Tell me, Akane, what did you experience?" The young woman thought back to the odd event that had occurred a couple of hours ago.

"Well, I was in the shop just cleaning the counters when there was a sort of... thump. I guess. It made me jump and look around, but I couldn't see anything wrong. Mr Ito noticed it as well. We checked, in case something had fallen over, but we didn't find anything." She frowned a little. "It's weird, though, both of us seem to have trouble remembering exactly what we were doing immediately before whatever it was happened." Akane shook her head. "Probably nothing, I guess."

The Elder studied her for a few seconds with an odd expression. "Nothing else comes to mind?"

"No." The younger woman tried to think of anything more to say about it. "Just the weird sensation, and I guess a slight gap in my memory. Nothing seems wrong otherwise."

Looking at Nodoka, Cologne asked a question with her eyes. "More or less what Akane said. I felt something odd, like the whole world jumped very slightly, then everything was normal again."

Again the Amazon studied them all. Soun and Genma were looking at each other speculatively, which she noticed with interest. She turned to Shampoo. "What do you say to that?"

The younger woman looked thoughtful. "I felt that, yes. But what about the light?"

"What light?" Akane and Nodoka asked at the same time.

"The column of light from somewhere further in towards the centre of Tokyo," Akane's father replied quietly. Everyone looked at him. "Going up out of sight, a colour that shouldn't exist. Then it blew outwards like a hurricane and went through everything as if it wasn't there." Cologne smiled slightly. Genma nodded, as did Shampoo.

"It was the strangest thing I've ever seen. Hollywood would kill for that sort of special effect," the large martial artist added to his friend's account. "It went right past us and kept going."

Akane stared at him, then looked to Nodoka, who was looking at her husband with an odd expression. He looked back. "Have you had more than the two beers I saw you drink earlier?" she asked with a certain amount of mild irritation. He shook his head vehemently.

"No. It was real, I swear it."
"I saw it as well," Shampoo verified, a faint scowl on her face. "Do you really not remember anything like that, Akane?"

The youngest sister shook her head, looking befuddled. "No. Only the twitch in the world." She turned to Nodoka, who nodded agreement.

"Myself as well." All of them looked at Cologne who was thinking deeply. "What does it mean?"

"I'm afraid I can't give you a good answer, dear," the old woman finally admitted, not looking pleased. "I'm very puzzled as to why some of you remember it and some don't. Although..." She inspected Akane curiously for a moment. "I wonder."

"What?"

"The only reason I can think of that some of us remember it and some don't is that the memory loss is somehow dependent on magical or ki ability. With all due respect, despite your impressive gains in recent months, you still lag behind my great-granddaughter in ki skills and raw power, and far behind either your father or Genma. I have much more magical ability than all of you put together. It's interesting that the four people with a reasonable amount of either talent are the ones to remember the event." Akane looked rather irritated, causing her to smile. "Don't take it as an insult, Akane, it's not meant that way, it's merely a statement of reality. I have no doubt that your abilities will grow with time." This seemed to make the blue-haired young woman less annoyed.

"It would explain why Mariko seemed to notice something more than most of the other students at the time," Soun mused out loud. "I'll have to ask her tomorrow what she remembers, if anything."

"I will ask Mousse as well. He's got a surprisingly large ki ability, it's all that hidden weapons practice over the years. If I'm right he may well be able to remember more than most." Cologne nodded to herself. "Although, I'm not sure if it's anything other than academic by this point. Whatever it was is long over."

Sipping her tea, Nodoka listened with interest. "It still doesn't explain what it actually was," she commented.

"True." The old woman also sipped some tea. "Very true. What I can tell you is that it was the most powerful magical burst I have ever felt, by an unbelievable amount. Far, far past anything any mage I've ever heard of could do. If indeed it actually was magic in the first place. It was... very strange." She shivered slightly at the memory. "Very strange indeed. But, I think, not hostile." Finishing the tea she put the cup carefully on the table. "I also think I know someone who might have been involved in some manner, although how I have no idea. Someone you both know," she added, looking at Shampoo and Akane. The two girls glanced at each other then simultaneously paled.

"You mean...?"

"Yes." Cologne looked seriously at them. "If I'm right, it's yet more evidence you should be very polite to Ms Aoyama." The pair of young women looked like they'd been dipped in ice water momentarily, they shuddered so much. Nodoka poured the Amazon Elder some more tea.

"How very odd," she said, putting the pot down again. Cologne stared for a moment, then snickered.

"That is indeed one way to put it." After a moment, she looked up, an idea occurring to her. "Would you mind if I used your telephone, Nodoka?" The Saotome matriarch glanced at Soun, who shrugged a little.

"Not at all." She watched as the Elder hopped up and headed for the phone, picking it up and dialling a very long sequence of numbers. "Who are you calling?"

Cologne grinned slightly. "The village. I'm very curious to know how far that magic could be felt for. We know it started in the middle of Tokyo, most likely in Minato somewhere. I need to talk to a good mage somewhere a long way away and there are a number of them in the tribe." Everyone looked oddly at her except for Shampoo.

"I didn't think that there would be a telephone in the village," Nodoka said, looking surprised. The older woman snickered.

"Modern technology is surprisingly pervasive. It's not encouraged in general, but a couple of the Elders have cellular telephones, for emergency contacts in cases like this. Even though I suspect this case is unique." She listened for a little while, until the ringing phone on the other end was answered, then had a long conversation in Mandarin, looking more and more surprised and worried as it went on. Shampoo listened, gasping once or twice at something she said, while the others waited, exchanging curious glances. Eventually Cologne paused, thanked the person on the other end, then very slowly put the phone down. Returning to her seat she stared at the floor for a long moment as everyone waited some more.

"Well." She looked up. "That was enlightening. And frankly extremely unsettling."

The other people in the room exchanged glances as she seemed to be trying to think of something else to say.

"I take it that they felt it?" Soun asked curiously. She laughed hollowly.

"You could say that." The ancient woman shook her head for a moment. "It went right over them and kept going. They think it may have gone all around the whole world. But the interesting thing is what happened immediately afterwards." She told them what Qian Dhu had passed on to her.

"It pulled all the magic out of Jusenkyo?" Genma looked shocked. She nodded.

"Every drop, in seconds. More power than I like to think about, enough to crush a god like a nut under your foot. Then, only a couple of minutes later, it put it back, as well as some more. It was like something needed to borrow an absolutely unimaginable amount of power for some huge task. I can only assume whatever it was, it was successful." She was pale. "I think we may have survived something completely horrific by the skin of our teeth. The only things I can think of that would require such drastic actions are..." The woman shook her head, looking upset. "Totally insane," she finished in the end, picking up her cup once more.

"Add that to what the seer said and I have a very strong feeling that if things had gone differently we might not be here discussing it."

Everyone shivered, feeling unaccountably cold for a few seconds.

"Apparently most of the people in the village can't remember any more than Akane and Nodoka can," she eventually added, "Which adds support for my theory. The ones who can remember are all either mages or strong ki users."

The room fell silent as the people present busied themselves with their own thoughts. After thirty seconds or so Nodoka stirred, methodically picking up all the empty cups and stacking them on the tray. "One day, perhaps, we'll find out what it was about. Until then, I suggest we get on with life.
There isn't much else we can do, after all."

"Wise words, my dear," Cologne smiled. "Wise words indeed." She turned to Akane. "So, child, when are you off to Hollywood next?"

Akane twitched, looking surprised, then answered. Shortly they were in a discussion of what the two young women could expect in the US, all of them quite deliberately trying, mostly successfully, to not think about weird and potentially world-ending magical apocalypses.

Agent Naito sat in front of his computer and looked at the various reports coming in from all sorts of places, first Japan, then later on from other locations around the world. He scratched his nose thoughtfully. It was odd.

Everyone was reporting a very strange twitch or jerk to the world, which had happened as far as could be determined simultaneously everywhere, a few hours ago. But no one was reporting the light, which he could definitely remember seeing. Even his fellow agents who had watched it happen with him didn't seem to know what he was talking about when he made careful enquiries. The whole thing was quite puzzling. 'I guess it's magic, after all, which never seems to do what you expect it to,' he thought to himself. 'I'll have to ask Yori about it. I'm pretty damn sure she was behind it somehow. But what actually happened?'

He was becoming slightly worried as time passed. He'd tried contacting both her and Chou, with no luck. No one had seen either of them, Azumi, Ami and her friends, or Aiko and her team for more than twenty-four hours at this point, which was somewhat unusual.

Turning to look out the window towards the centre of Minato he wondered what had happened. Whatever it was, it had been big. Extremely big. The entire planet seemed to have reacted to it, which was extraordinary, and he couldn't think of anything other than something to do with the time device that could explain anything on that scale. But he couldn't even mention it to anyone other than a very select group of young women, none of whom he could locate. It was a little frustrating.

'At least whatever happened doesn't seem to have sparked mass panic,' he mused. 'Luckily. Some sort of self-censoring thing going on at a guess. I suppose that's possible if some sort of time travel is involved. It might explain why no one seems to be able to remember much about it. I wonder why I can?' He got up and walked to the window, standing next to it and studying the Tokyo scenery. There were fairly few people left in the building at this late-afternoon hour, it was almost time to go home, but he was curious about the whole thing and had stayed to see if he could learn more.

Looking up into the sky, he wondered how far the effect had gone. If it really had been something to do with that time travelling computer trying to reset reality, possibly everyone in the universe had experienced the same thing. It was a sobering thought. The idea that some weird alien life form on a planet in a different galaxy might have felt something that people he knew had done was just bizarre.

'Better than the alternative, though, I think.'

His phone rang, causing him to jump slightly at the sudden noise, then return to his desk. Picking it up he answered, "Naito."

"Masao? I've been trying to get hold of you for an hour. No one in the PSIA seems to want to admit you work for them." The young woman's voice on the other end of the phone sounded mildly irritated. He grinned, recognising it.
"Hello, Ami. I'm sorry, the Special Activities Office is a little paranoid. It's nice to hear from you. How can I help?"

"Can we meet somewhere private to talk, please?" the girl replied, now sounding a little stressed. "I've got some information you need to have, concerning... recent events."

Naito paused for a moment before replying, thinking quickly. "Certainly. How about... let's see, why not try the library? They have private reading rooms, we could use one of those, if you want to be somewhere no one is likely to overhear us."

"That's fine. I'll see you there in twenty minutes."

"All right." Again, he paused. "Is everything all right?"

She sighed. He could imagine her running her hand through her hair as he'd seen in the past a few times. "More or less, yes. But it was a little... no, it was completely terrifying. Look, I don't want to say anything more over the phone. I'll tell you more when we meet."

"That's fine. I'm leaving now."

She disconnected, as he reached out and shut his computer down having saved the report he'd begun. Standing, he retrieved his coat, then left the room, turning the lights out as he went. Waving to the security guards as he exited the building he headed for the Metro station down the road, soon finding himself on a train heading into Minato. Arriving at the correct station he got off, walked for another five minutes, then ascended the steps to the large district library, finding Ami waiting inside, in civilian clothing.

"Hello, Masao," she said quietly, smiling at him.

"Hello." He smiled back, then led the way through the main part of the library to the private reading rooms at the rear, finding an empty one. Both of them went inside and he shut the door. "We sometimes use these when we want a private place outside the PSIA building," he mentioned, locking the door. "The soundproofing is excellent. I've had them discreetly swept for bugs as well, just in case." She nodded, looking around, then tilted her head a little as if she was listening to an internal voice. Satisfied, apparently, she took a seat. He sat across from her.

"Sorry about dragging you away from work," she began.

"Don't worry, I was about to leave anyway." He shook his head. "It's been a weird day."

The young woman choked back a laugh. "That's an understatement and a half," she muttered, grimacing.

"Where are Yori and the others?" he asked curiously. She sighed a bit.

"Everyone except for Rei is still asleep, recovering." At his look of alarm she smiled slightly. "Don't worry, it's nothing serious, just total exhaustion. They completely red-lined themselves attacking that fucking time machine. We won, obviously, since we're still here, but it was a close thing." The girl shuddered a little as he watched. "Far too close for comfort. As far as I can tell we were about three seconds away from a reset loop when..."

"That light?" he queried, feeling cold. She nodded.

"I didn't see it, but I've talked to a couple of people who did and still remember it. Most people don't." She looked at him with interest. "I'm a little surprised that you do. I can only guess that your contact with Yori and the rest of us for the last year or so, and all the portal travel, has left you a little more sensitive to this sort of thing than most people. It would fit with what I know about it. Yori or Chou would probably be able to tell for sure."

"So what was it?" he asked, after mulling that thought over. She looked uncertain.

"I can't say much, it's sort of private and not my place to say, but they set up a security system years ago that's been growing ever since. It's practically alive by this point. As far as I can work out, it detected the threat the time machine posed when we tried to destroy it pre-emptively, which didn't quite work out the way we hoped, and did a certain amount of reinterpretation of its instructions. Very creatively, in fact, which is surprising and a little scary." She giggled a little nervously. "You really don't want to threaten it or anyone it protects. It's... persistent. And has no understanding of the concept of 'overkill.'"

Naito stared at her. "That doesn't sound very safe."

"Oh, it's safe enough under normal circumstances. They put in interlocks to stop it wiping out Tokyo if any of them were threatened." He paled, causing her to giggle again. "It sounds horrific but we both know Yori could do the same thing if she wanted to. She thinks Hotaru could as well. But neither of them ever would. Anyway, under normal circumstances, or even pretty weird ones, the system they built is totally safe for anyone outside the protected area. Absolutely, instantly lethal for any attacks inside, of course, but that's the whole point."

She sighed a little again. "But this case was different. We were in immediate danger of having all of this reality reset which would essentially have killed everyone, even if it didn't trigger a complete reality erasure, which Lldnr'k thinks might have happened. It was that close. Somehow, the system realised that the threat was terminal and sort of... found a loophole." Ami looked both amused and impressed.

"I don't know the full details, I can't access it like they can, so it will have to wait until they wake up, but from what I've worked out, it somehow found a very large amount of magical energy from somewhere and managed to get it to us, just in time. Azumi felt it trying to attract our attention, Chou opened a portal home, then it blasted so much magic through the portal and into the one we were attacking the time device through that it basically evaporated the damn thing on the spot, using Hotaru's weapon as a conduit."

"I thought you were going to use an antimatter bomb?" he asked. She laughed nervously.

"Oh, we had those, all right. Fifteen of the things." He went white. "More destructive force than I like to think about. Yori got them through a contact. But it wasn't enough. It should have been, many times over, from what our information said, but there was a problem. The time device detected our attack just in time and started the process of the temporal loop before we could destroy it. That caused so much temporal and spacial distortion that the eight weapons we fired at it only damaged it, instead of destroying it instantly as we'd hoped. Yori and the others fired on it to try and stop it completing the loop, but all they could do was delay it. The temporal gateway was acting like a massively powerful shield, diverting most of the energy."

"They'd have gotten through eventually but there's no way even Yori could keep it going long enough. The rest of the bombs couldn't be used unless she stopped firing, the only thing preventing the loop was them firing in the first place, so..." She shrugged helplessly as he shook his head in worried wonder.

"Nasty catch-22."
"Exactly. But, somehow, the system detected all this going on, gathered up all this energy, and managed to use it. The time device died, completely. We used the rest of the warheads just to be sure, but it's definitely over, now. Finally." The blue-haired girl bowed her head. "I still can't believe it. By all rights we should probably have lost."

"I'm very pleased and grateful that you didn't, Ami," he told her with complete truthfulness. She looked up and smiled at him.

"So am I. I didn't do much myself during the operation, there wasn't much I could do, or Rei, for that matter. Hotaru stepped up without question, which I'm very proud about. All the others nearly killed themselves in the process. They're mostly fine but totally wiped out. Yori and Hotaru got badly burned using Hotaru's weapon, it was like on the asteroid only much more powerful. Chou partially healed them before she passed out. They're all still asleep, Rei's looking after them at the moment."

"Will everyone be all right?" he asked. She nodded.

"I'm nothing like as good at medical matters as they are, but as far as I can see they're just sleeping. They'll probably be out for the rest of the day and possibly tomorrow as well. They they'll be incredibly hungry."

He grinned at this. "God. That's terrifying. I've seen how much Yori can eat when she's just a little peckish."

Ami laughed, relaxing. "Oh, it's going to cause a local famine, I have no doubt. Yori will drink about ten litres of coffee then bounce off the walls for a while, Hotaru will clean out the nearest ice-cream shop, along with Misaki..." Both of them chuckled.

"I'm very glad you're all OK," he said after a moment. "It sounds like it was unpleasant."

"It wasn't something I'd like to go through again," she admitted. "The responsibility of knowing that we were all that stood between the entire universe and destruction..." The girl shivered. "Back when my team was still working together we stopped some serious threats, at least one of which was fairly world-ending, but nothing even remotely on that sort of scale. I don't know that anyone ever has."

"The universe was in good hands, I think," Naito told her, smiling.

"Thanks." She stretched, sighing. "But I'm glad it's over. We can get back to what passes for normal now. With a little luck, even my former team-mates might see sense as a result of this, without that thing around influencing them." Leaning back in the chair, she looked at him. "I thought you should know, though, as a friend."

"Thank you for telling me," he responded. "I'd worked out it was probably something like that but it's nice to know for sure. Not that I can tell anyone else."

"Yori will probably let you write a report on the basics for your superiors, she's got a lot of respect for them, but I suspect the details will have to be kept secret," Ami said. "I'll mention it when she wakes up. But at least your own curiosity is sated."

He laughed a little. "More or less. I'm sure there's a lot you're not telling me."

She arched an eyebrow. "Of course. We're magical girls, after all, we have many secrets."

Giggling, she watched as he grinned. "I'd better get back. I'm going to have to go home at some point as well."
"Your mother might be worried," he agreed.

Ami sighed again. "I wish I could tell her, but... it's difficult. I don't know how she'd take it. Especially after all the things that my group did recently. We don't exactly have a good reputation any more."

"Keeping that sort of secret must be difficult," he agreed. "We have the same sort of problem in the security services, although I'll admit not as badly. There are a lot of things about my work I can't tell my wife, although I'd like to. Not even the magical things, just normal day to day security issues. Keeping secrets from your family is awkward at the best of times. I sympathise."

"Perhaps one day I can come clean about it all." The girl stared at her hands for a moment, then raised her eyes to his. "It was nice talking to you, Masao."

"And you, Ami." They both stood. She stepped forward and gave him a quick hug, which he returned. "Stay in touch."

"You'll be hearing from all of us soon, I don't doubt," the girl smiled. Unlocking the door she looked out for a moment. "See you around." With that she was gone. By the time he left the room she was nowhere in sight. Smiling a little, he headed home.

"Sergeant Harada!" The voice came from behind them. Harada and Emiko turned from where they'd yet again been trying to get across to a local the idea that they needed to speak to someone who knew their language, so far unsuccessfully, to see a familiar figure approaching. Xrist looked at them curiously. "What are you doing here?" he asked. "Are you looking for that Lieutenant Wilson fellow?"

"Hello, Xrist. I'd like to see him, yes, but that's not the reason we're here. I'm glad to see you. No one here seems to speak our language."

The little demon smiled widely. "It's not common, no. A few of my people go to your world but mostly when we want things from there we buy them from a local trader. I prefer getting coffee fresh. You need to learn Trade, almost everyone here speaks it." He looked at Emiko. "Is this your wife?"

"Yes. Emiko, meet Xrist. Xrist, Emiko." The two looked at each other then smiled.

"Pleased to make your acquaintance, Emiko," Xrist said politely. The woman nodded back.

"I'm pleased to meet you as well. Tetsuo has mentioned you several times in the past."

Looking amused, Xrist turned back to Harada. "How did you get here in the first place?" he asked, "the next portal to your world isn't scheduled for several more hours." Harada pulled the depleted emergency portal generator from his pocket and gave it back to its owner.

"We found this. Rynnkh, you remember her?" Xrist nodded, inspecting the device. "She confirmed it was yours, then got it recharged for me. I used it a few hours ago." He paused, worried, causing Xrist to stare at him. "Something happened. I'm not sure what, but every traveller to Minato panicked and left at the same time. I got worried and went home, to get Emiko. Rynnkh said we should leave." He bowed his head as the demon looked horrified. "I'm really scared something terrible happened. I feel guilty about leaving, but I had no choice. Not with Emiko and our child at stake."

Xrist looked at them both for a while. "I understand. I'd do the same thing. Come on, I'll buy you something to eat and drink then we can see if we can find out what's going on. I know some mages who owe me a favour, I'm sure we can get a portal started early." He led them to another shop, some sort of café. "Don't worry too much, with Yori and her friends around it's probably nothing too serious. Those girls are capable of some pretty amazing things."

"You didn't see it," Harada said in a low voice. Even so, he felt better, the respect in Xrist's voice for the young women he trusted so much buoyed his spirits considerably.

Saeko carefully made some tea, filling the cup and taking it back into the other room, where she sat and sipped it, staring at the little crystal statue on the table. Her mind was still working hard on the puzzle the thing presented. After a few sips she reached out and picked it up again, turning it over in her hand slowly and staring at it closely, then holding it up to the light and looking at the refractions. Putting it down again she studied it, before her gaze was drawn across the room to the bookcase and the small, inoffensive grey rock sitting on it.

Almost unwillingly she put the teacup down, got up, then walked over to the bookcase. Picking the rock up she rubbed it with her thumb a couple of times, before heading into her study and turning on her computer. Waiting for it to boot she turned the rock over, feeling it carefully. It was just a rock, right?

When the computer was running she sat down, put the small stone next to the keyboard, then brought up a search engine, trying that new 'Google' one people were saying was impressive. After a moment's thought she typed into it 'moon rock'. Ten minutes later she was leaning back in her chair, staring alternately at the rock in her hand and the image on the screen, pale-faced.

Lunar Breccia the page was entitled, showing a series of different rocks collected by NASA during the Apollo missions. The third image on the top row was a dead ringer for the thing she was holding except for the shape. She held the rock up to the screen, comparing them. Then, very deliberately, she closed the web page, cleared her history, turned the computer off, and got up. A few minutes later she was beginning dinner, while both the rock and the statue were back where they belonged.

Blinking crusty eyes, Nabiki looked at the ceiling for a few seconds, then turned her head. She was in the familiar room in her sister's apartment, in bed, although she had no memory of getting there. It took a little thought to work out the sequence of events but eventually it came back.

'How long have I been asleep, Jun?' she asked her SI groggily.

#Nearly twelve hours, Nabiki,# the machine responded immediately, sounding relieved. #I was getting very worried. Your life energy readings were dangerously low. The ward system has been pushing energy into all of you all night but it seems to be taking the cautious approach. You still need a lot of sleep, and you also need to eat. Ami and Rei put all of you to bed after Kasumi collapsed from exhaustion.#

'Oh.' The middle sister pondered the device's words, feeling very slow and fuzzy-minded. 'That would explain why I feel so tired. Are the others all right?'

#My readings indicate no one is in immediate danger although it was a near thing. Ranma came close to death from ki exhaustion. Without the input of energy from the ward system he might well have died. Kasumi was very close to that point as well, as were Aiko and Misaki. Fumiko, Tamiko, and yourself were slightly better off. Hotaru and Ranma were fairly seriously injured during the final attack as well, both of them received third-degree burns to their hands and lower arms, some internal damage from energy overload was also present. Kasumi healed the worst of it before she passed out but they'll both require more healing when they wake up. I would expect that their normal healing abilities will have partially fixed the remaining damage by that point.

She slowly nodded, sitting up, the words in her head resurrecting more memories. She could vaguely recall her sister heading the other two although it was very fuzzy. Abruptly she became aware she was absolutely ravenous. 'Is anyone else awake?' she asked, swivelling her legs over the side of the bed and waiting out the dizziness that sitting up produced. She was also in desperate need of the toilet.

#Ami and Rei are in the living room talking. Everyone else is still unconscious. Hotaru is in one of the guest rooms, the other girls are in their apartments. Both Ami and Rei have gone out at different times, Rei to talk to her grandfather and Ami to discuss the situation with Agent Naito. The after-effects of what the ward system did seem to have been fairly spectacular and she wanted to let him know the situation was dealt with.# Jun sounded amused, impressed, and slightly worried.

'What did it do?' she asked as she pushed herself to her feet, swaying a little for a moment. Jun was silent for a couple of seconds.

#I am not entirely certain., it admitted sheepishly. #As far as I can work out, it seems to have somehow found a loophole in the rules Kasumi set that prevented it working outside the confines of this building. In the process it acquired a truly vast amount of magical energy from somewhere which it used in that final devastating attack. The interesting thing is that it put it back afterwards, which is... odd. I have been researching the matter since we returned.# The voice sounded puzzled.

#The reports are... conflicted. General consensus is that something happened, but everyone has a different theory as to what. It has been described as a jolt, or thump, or the most common word, twitch. Everyone on the planet would appear to have felt it. My best estimation is that this is the result of a very short and aborted temporal loop, although I have no proof of this. Interestingly it would seem that very few people seem to remember more than that about the event. Several seconds, possibly up to about thirty or so, would seem to have vanished from the collective memory. From what Ami discovered only certain empowered individuals, mages, people of that nature, appear to remember more.#

'That may be a good thing,' Nabiki told it as she made her way to the door very slowly and carefully, feeling like she was barely recovered from the world's worst hangover.

#I would agree. While it has caused a worldwide puzzle, no one seems to be panicking over it. That is both unexpected and lucky. It would be somewhat ironic to save the world only to have the action that did so spark some war or conflict.# Jun sounded darkly amused, causing her to giggle out loud.

'Thank god for our very own Deus Ex Machina, I guess.'

#Quite.# The SI fell silent.

'We got lucky, didn't we?' she asked it a moment later.

#Very. If the ward system hadn't quite evolved to the point that it could not only detect the problem but somehow come up with a counter for it, find the energy for it, and apply it, if you hadn't recognised that it needed a portal to be opened, if Hotaru hadn't seen that her weapon was required, if Ranma hadn't realised in time what was needed from her... There were a large number of variables, the missing of any one of which would have spelled disaster.#
'Could we have succeeded if we'd fired all the warheads the moment we opened the portal?' Nabiki was curious to know if the situation could have been resolved otherwise than the way it was. Jun was silent for a little longer. Eventually it replied.

'It is unlikely knowing now what we do. The information Yrenti's combat drone acquired suggests to me that the device was in the process of setting up for a time loop before we opened the portal to it. Detecting the portal or the drone was enough to make it immediately action that plan, which luckily took a certain amount of time, time that allowed the attack to succeed. But the delay between the portal opening and the weapons detonating was too long to guarantee a clean kill based on how fast it was able to bring up the beginnings of the temporal distortion field. All the simulations I have run suggest that the probability of success of any other plausible plan was very low.'

She shivered, bracing herself against the wall for a moment, then entered the living room, smiling at Rei and Ami, both of whom leaped to their feet and rushed over. 'Thanks, Jun. And thanks for being there.'

'Always, Nabiki,' the device replied, falling silent with an air of satisfaction.

"Nabiki! Are you all right? You look like death," Rei said, studying her.

"Oh, thanks very much, Rei," she responded with a laugh. The other woman blushed.

"Sorry. But you're pale and look like you haven't eaten anything for days."

"I feel pale and hungry," she agreed. "But I'm alive, so that's nice." The three women looked at each other and smiled.

"Come on, I'll go and get something from Mr Singh's takeaway, it will be quicker than cooking it. He should still be open, barely," Ami told her, gently guiding her to the sofa, into which she gratefully dropped. Moments later she struggled to her feet again.

"I need the facilities," she told their curious looks. They smiled, Ami heading for the door. When she came out of the bathroom a few minutes later, the blue-haired girl was just re-entering the apartment, carrying several bags.

"He was about to close so I got everything he had left in the buffet," the woman told them, spreading the bags out on the coffee-table. "Some of it is a little dry by now but it's still edible." All three of them were eating moments later, Nabiki nearly inhaling the food in a remarkably Ranma-like manner that made her companions smile. Eventually she felt full for the moment, leaning back with a sigh of satisfaction and wiping her mouth with a napkin.

"Thanks, Ami. I needed that."

"You're welcome." The blue-haired girl studied her. "You look a lot better as well. Nothing like as pale although you still seem tired."

"I'll go back to bed in a while," the middle sister agreed. "I'm not at the point of falling over any more though." They all shared a look. "So. We won. That's good." After a moment they all began laughing wildly, relief acting on them like a bottle of wine. When they calmed down they just talked.

An hour later, Nabiki yawned. "Nearly five in the morning. I need some more sleep." Looking at the other two, she added, "You guys should go to bed as well. You both look nearly as tired as I feel." Ami nodded sleepily.
"I'm ready for sleep, certainly. I called Mom hours ago and told her I was staying with a friend, so that's OK. She sounded a little weird but I guess that's just from today. It seems to have shaken people up a lot."

"I'm not surprised," Rei said, clearing away the remains of the meal and putting what food was left into the refrigerator, her voice coming back to them from the kitchen. "It certainly shook me up." Returning, she sat again, an odd expression on her face. "Grandfather told me what it looked like from here. It sounds impressive. It's almost a pity practically no one seems to remember it. He said it was the best special effect he'd ever seen."

Laughing, Nabiki glanced at Ami, who was grinning. "Considering what happened I'm just happy the building is still standing." She got up. "Right, I'm going to get some more sleep. Jun thinks the others won't wake up until morning. I think we should get up early and get a lot more food in. If what I felt like is anything to go by, Ranma and Misaki will be ready to eat the furniture." All of them laughed once more, then headed for various beds.

Xrist spoke to the mage who was the leader of the group of four standing around the portal they'd made, nodded, then rummaged around in a container on the floor of the building they were in, as Harada and Emiko watched. "He says the portal formed normally, which is a good sign," the little demon commented, finally producing a small spherical object and holding it up. "Ah. Found it."

"What is it?" Emiko looked at the thing with an interested expression, one hand on her visibly pregnant belly. He looked at her.

"It's a probe, we use them to check what's on the other side of a portal without going through. This type is made on Fwetna where Uthryyl comes from, they sell them all over the place. They're pretty good. Reliable." He adjusted something on the device then tossed it through the portal, into which it vanished with a faint crackle. A few seconds passed in silence. Abruptly the device popped back out, hanging in front of him. He retrieved it and studied a small display on the side. "Well, everything looks normal enough. The portal is targeted to just outside Hikaru's coffee shop. There are people wandering around, even though it's the middle of the night. Nothing looks out of place as far as I can see."

"I'm very glad to hear that," Harada responded with vast relief, holding his wife's hand. She squeezed his in return.

"So am I. I like your world, and Minato. And coffee." Xrist grinned at them. "Hold on a moment." He stepped through the portal. Shortly afterwards he was back. "It really does look perfectly normal," he told them. "Whatever it was that you saw it doesn't seem to have caused any serious damage."

"It's very weird. Maybe I over-reacted?" Harada wondered out loud. His wife shook her head.

"You did what you thought best for the sake of our child, dear, that's never wrong. Unexpected, yes, but not wrong." She smiled as both he and Xrist laughed.

"Well, I suppose we should go back, then. Thank you very much, Xrist, for all the help." Harada heaved a sigh of relief. After a moment he frowned slightly. "Although... Perhaps I should go and visit Lieutenant Wilson, as long as I'm here? I know you said he's fine but..."

"You can certainly do that, Sergeant," the demon told him. "I can arrange travel easily. It's no trouble."
Harada looked guiltily at his wife, who smiled, amused. "You take your work very seriously, dear, I know that. Go and visit this poor man. I'll go home and get some sleep."

"They can hold the portal open for a while, it's easy enough now it's stable, so you could take her home," Xrist suggested. Both the humans looked at him. After a second or two Harada nodded, smiling.

"Thanks. OK, come on, Emiko, let's get you both home." Holding his wife's hand both of them stepped through a portal for the second time ever, in much less of a hurry on this occasion. A few minutes later Harada came back through alone. The mages shut it down immediately. Xrist talked to the lead mage again, apparently thanking them, then led the police officer out of the building.

"We can find transportation at the airfield," Xrist told his guest. "There's an on-demand shuttle service between here and Zthrel we can take." They wandered along, no longer in much of a hurry, talking about the area.
My apologies for the delay. I intended to release this within a day or so of the previous chapter but realised that there were a lot of threads to tie up that were best done in one go. It wraps up most of the main SM/Time machine section, although there will be other parts that occur on and off for a while. Hopefully it also resolves most of the questions that were left over. This caused a certain amount of rewriting and embiggening, which takes time.

We'll be concentrating more on Nerima and the lunatics therein for a while now, they're getting annoyed and beginning to agitate for starting a union or something. Nabiki also feels she's not sufficiently central to the narrative at the moment. Apparently there's some sort of contractual obligation...

Thanks for the comments and reviews as usual.

Oh, by the way, definitely over a million words now ;)

Note: Just to make clear this isn't the end of the story, just this section. In case you're worried. If not, carry on.

Previously in Desperately Seeking Ranma ...

Things happened.

And now, the conclusion...

Kei Ishikawa sighed, got down on his knees with some effort, then looked into the cupboard. A pair of golden eyes looked back at him. "Are you going to stay in there all night, Kin?" he asked. His 'dog' peered out of the cupboard, its ears flat against its head. Reaching in he stroked it, causing it to make a contented little growl, but not move from its position where it had been cowering since the early afternoon and that strange bump he'd felt. Ten minutes or so passed then he stood up again, getting the glass of water he'd come into the kitchen for in the first place, then headed back to bed for a couple more hours of sleep.

Twenty minutes later he woke slightly, feeling something get onto the bed and push itself against his back, then settle down. He smiled to himself before falling asleep again, feeling happy.

The little demonic creature looked at the window for some time before doing likewise.

Looking around at the sound of the door opening, something that still amused him, Lieutenant Wilson raised an eyebrow when he saw a human being enter, followed by Brenke and another of his species. The man was in the uniform of the Tokyo police. "Hello, Lieutenant Wilson," the police officer said in good English, smiling at him. "I'm Sergeant Harada. I've been looking into your mugging." Walking over he held out his hand. Wilson shook it, smiling back.

"Quite a long way from home, aren't you?"

"Both of us, I think," Harada laughed. "It was something unexpected in my case that brought me here although I suspect not quite as large a surprise as it was to you. Brenke has told us that you were somewhat shocked when you woke up."
"That's putting it mildly," Wilson agreed wryly. He pointed out the window by way of example. "We're on an alien planet, for heaven's sake! No spaceships, no interstellar travel, just walking through one of these 'portals', which is just weird."

"It takes you by surprise the first time, yes," the officer replied with a grin. "I've known about portal travel for years but this is the first time I ever went through one. It seems a nice place." He motioned to the other alien, who was watching with interest, Brenke apparently translating their conversation in a low voice to him. "This is Xrist. He's the one that intervened in your attack."

"Ah." Wilson turned to the indicated alien being. "Thank you very much, Xrist. I apparently owe you my life."

Xrist smiled in the odd manner they had after his words had been translated, saying something to Brenke, who turned to Wilson. "He says you're welcome, and if you want to repay him, he's always up for a decent cappuccino." The healer snickered a bit. "I told you he was a coffee addict." Laughing, Harada and Wilson exchanged glances.

"I'm more than happy to buy him all the coffee he wants. It's a small price to pay," the lieutenant replied, smiling. Xrist, when this was translated, smiled as well and nodded enthusiastically, causing all three of the other people to laugh again.

"You may be interested to know we have your assailants in custody at the moment," Harada said, looking pleased. "We'd like a statement from both you and Xrist. He's already agreed to it. Also, we've notified your commanding officer that you were involved in a crime and were under medical care, although we haven't said quite where that care was taking place. We thought we'd see how you wanted to handle it as we don't know the man in question."

"It could be a little tricky," Wilson agreed thoughtfully. "I'm happy to provide a statement, though."

"OK. The scheduled portal is in about... hmm, just under two hours, I think." Harada had a quick conversation with Xrist in Japanese, then nodded. "Yes. So it's probably best to go back then." He turned to the healer. "Assuming he's fit and well?"

Brenke checked the instruments which were still monitoring his patient, nodding after a few seconds, while pulling out and unrolling his computer. He made a couple of notes and put it away again. "He's fine now, although as I said, I would strongly advise taking life gently for at least a few days. No serious exertion, no combat operations. It will take time to rebuild your strength." He studied Wilson for a moment. "Are you in any residual pain at all?"

"No, I feel fine, although just the smallest bit light-headed," Wilson replied.

"Probably due to the synthetic circulatory fluid, I suspect. It's somewhat more efficient at oxygen transport than you're used to which could produce some effects of that nature. It should pass as it gets eliminated from your system." He looked amused. "You'll find that your urine is a rather unusual colour during that process. Bright purple."

Wilson and Harada exchanged glances then laughed. "I'm glad you told me. It would have been a surprise finding that out without knowing why," Wilson chuckled.

"Why don't we go and find something to eat while we wait," Harada suggested. "It's about six in the morning in Tokyo, the time I'm normally getting up and looking for breakfast." He glanced at Xrist and asked him a question in Japanese. The little demon thought for a moment then made a suggestion. "He knows somewhere we might like."
"Sounds good. I am kind of hungry." Wilson turned to Brenke. "Do you want to join us? As a thank you, if nothing else."

"Certainly. I was just about to leave anyway." The healer looked pleased. "It would be most interesting." Walking over to the storage unit in the corner he opened it, removing a package which he placed on the bed. "We had your clothes repaired, hopefully this is satisfactory. Your personal belongings and ID are in there as well." He and the other two left the room to give Wilson some privacy as he got dressed.

Shortly after that the quartet was seated around a surprisingly normal appearing table, eating some very good food. "This is really nice," Harada said approvingly. He looked around. "It reminds me of a café I know in Setagaya for some weird reason." Glancing at Wilson, he smiled. "So, Lieutenant, what do you think of your first encounter with portals, magic, and all the other weirdness that goes on around Minato?"

"It's still sort of a shock," Wilson replied slowly, trying the drink that Brenke had recommended and finding it very good. "It's like something out of a movie. The weirdest part of it is how normal a lot of it seems." He turned to watch a very odd looking vehicle zoom past. "But there are some strange bits as well."

"I'm assured that you get used to things like this by a very authoritative source," Harada grinned.

Peering around at the scene, Wilson sighed a little. "I'm not entirely convinced. But I'll admit I'm nowhere near as freaked out as I keep thinking I should be." He turned back to the police officer. "I still can't believe all this is something you guys just take for granted. Magic, portals, all that sort of thing. Brenke told me that Minato is awash with magical girls as well, which is just..." He made a helpless gesture, unable to work out how to put it.

"It takes some getting used to. The people who live in the area have had years to acclimatise but visitors, even from other places in Japan, tend to be surprised." Harada smiled a little. "We had a police officer from LA last year who took a lot of convincing."

"I can imagine," Wilson muttered. Brenke looked at him, then turned to Harada.

"Do you know a pair of girls by the names of Yori and Chou?" he asked curiously. The Japanese man nodded, finishing his meal.

"Yes. Quite well, in fact. I'd call them friends. We've known each other for several years, my station is in the middle of the area they work in."

"Ah. Interesting. I'd quite like to meet them at some point and discuss their healing abilities, which I've heard are most impressive." The healer looked fascinated as far as Wilson could work out. Harada smiled widely.

"I can say that whatever you've heard on that matter is probably an understatement, to be honest. I've never encountered anyone who was as good at healing, magical or otherwise, as those two young women. They've saved a lot of lives over the years."

The pair of them discussed the subject for a while, during which Wilson slowly finished his meal, listening idly. Xrist was talking to an acquaintance he'd waved over a few minutes ago. Eventually, his hunger sated, he pushed his plate into the middle of the table. "That was excellent," he stated, pleased.

"Good. I'm pleased you liked it," the healer said. Harada looked at his watch.
"A bit over an hour to go. We should probably get back. Xrist tells me the portal connection is in a town a little way away from his home, which is about two hundred kilometres from here. There are several mage groups there who specialise in portal travel."

"How do we get there?" Wilson asked curiously.

"By air. They have a lot of local shuttles, that's how we got here. Teleportation, which I'm told some places use a lot, is fairly rare here, but they don't like wasting time with ground vehicles for the most part." He grinned at the look on the other man's face.

"Teleportation?" Wilson asked in a strangled voice.

"Oh, yes. Even at home it's used sometimes. There's this one young woman, Aiko, who is amazingly good at it. You feel really very sick indeed the first time, for a few seconds or so, but after that it's quite interesting."

Staring at the police officer for some while, Wilson eventually shook his head slowly. "Just when you think you've heard everything..."

Brenke was also smiling. "You're a pilot, Riley, I suspect you'll find our aircraft interesting. In fact,
I have a friend who is also a pilot. Let me make a quick call." He pulled out a small device that Wilson realised was something like a cell-phone. After a short conversation, he put it away again.
"She's happy to oblige for a visitor and fellow pilot. Let's get to the airfield and meet her." Slightly mystified, but curious, Wilson followed as they all left the café. The airfield in question turned out to be quite close, only a couple of kilometres walk, which was no hardship in the pleasant warmth of the day.

Entering through a building not dissimilar to a small regional airport at home, they headed to one side, away from where the normal travellers, most of them the locals but a fair number obviously from elsewhere, appeared to be congregating. Brenke waved to another of his species who waved back, coming over to meet them and talking for a while. He turned to them. "This is my old friend Vrede. She's been a pilot for quite a while, a very good one from what I'm told." He smirked.
"Mostly by her, admittedly, but..."

Wilson laughed, as did Harada. "She's more than happy to take you to your destination rather than using the normal shuttle service. Her aircraft is a long range transporter and much higher performance. I think you'll find it interesting, Riley."

"I'd certainly like to see it," he replied. Vrede looked them up and down for a moment, asked Brenke a question, then did the same to Xrist. Turning back to Wilson she studied him again for a moment. Brenke relayed the next question she asked directly to him.

"She asked what sorts of aircraft you have piloted and how much experience you have with the different types." Smiling, feeling suddenly on familiar territory, the pilot responded.

"Two thousand hours or so on rotary wing aircraft, some seven or eight different varieties from cargo helicopters to the latest high-speed attack helicopter, four and a half thousand hours on fixed wing aircraft, everything from large multi engine propeller drive airplanes to single-seater turbine powered fighters, fully instrument rated and combat rated on all of them. I've been flying since I was fourteen. I think it stands at twenty-three different models of aircraft at the moment." He grinned. "And I haven't crashed any of them yet."

Brenke laughed, then relayed the information to Vrede, who nodded slowly. She said something else, which made the healer smile. "She says you can sit up front."
Pleased, Wilson followed as the pilot led them through a door, waving an ID to a guard who merely nodded, having casually glanced at some sort of display behind his desk, then out onto what was very recognisably a working airfield. Neat rows of aircraft of several different types, none of them familiar at all but all of them obviously flying machines to anyone experienced in the aviation world, were parked along the side of the long low building, a lot of small ones with an occasional larger one mixed in. Beyond that was a runway, stretching off into the distance both ways out of sight. He could just make out another one crossing it nearly two kilometres away at right angles. The layout was instantly recognisable. "Hmm. Form follows function even on an alien world," he remarked, causing Harada to glance at him.

"They don't look much if anything like aircraft from home for the most part," he explained to the enquiring look, "but they're still obviously aircraft. Very advanced ones, mostly. That one over there looks a little like a concept I've read about that NASA was working on a couple of years ago. The layout of the runways is pretty much the same as home as well, which makes sense, it's an efficient and obvious way to do that particular job. All the markings and lights are totally different but it's still an airport." He looked around with a smile. "It feels... right, somehow."

"Interesting," the police officer commented, looking around. "But I suppose not entirely unexpected."

Vrede led them a few hundred metres down the parking apron, which seemed to be made of some sort of very tough and grippy plastic rather than tarmac, to a vehicle that made Wilson stop and stare admiringly. It was a form of blended body flying wing, in human terms, but with quite short wings for the length, which was approximately the size of a medium range business jet from Earth, although with a wider body. He guessed it used the fuselage for a lot of the lift, another concept he knew was being worked on at home, although it was decades away from even the prototype stage. Walking over to it he inspected the dark blueish coloured machine from close up, glancing at Vrede as he raised a hand. She motioned to him, apparently pleased he'd asked permission. Running his hand over the skin of the machine he whistled.

"Wow. It's practically frictionless." Looking closely he could see the skin had thousands of tiny channels running longitudinally along it. When he inspected the wing nearest him the same thing was apparent. "I've read about this. It reduces the boundary layer thickness and controls laminar flow, which reduces drag. People have been experimenting with it at home for a long time but there are all sorts of practical problems with actually using it." Brenke was translating, making Vrede nod approvingly.

He continued inspecting the airframe curiously. Walking around to the rear of the wing he raised an eyebrow, noticing something that was to his eyes odd. "There aren't any control surfaces. Ailerons, flaps, anything like that. In fact, I can't see any moving parts at all."

When the healer translated this for Vrede, she smiled and spoke for a moment. "She says the wing changes shape at the trailing edge to control the airflow. It's much more efficient and also mechanically simpler if you have the right materials," Brenke told him. Wilson stared at the wing, impressed.

"Amazing." Noticing what seemed to be one of the engine outlets, which was at the end of a subtle bulge in the wing where it blended into the fuselage, he moved over and peered into it. To his surprise he could see light coming through from the other end around a gentle curve. The passageway opened out inside, becoming steadily larger towards the front. Ducking under the wing, which was about a metre and a half off the ground with the aircraft parked as it was, he scuttled to the front, then looked at the intake of what seemed to be an engine. It merged neatly into the root of the wing in a manner that was very familiar, yet subtly different from any jet intake he'd come across. Looking into it he again couldn't see any moving parts. Puzzled, he moved closer, ending up sticking his head inside completely. A sound from behind him made him pull it out and turn to look at the pilot, who was laughing her head off.

"Is it some sort of ramjet?" he asked her curiously. "It's obviously not either a turbine or a rocket, it's practically just a tube." Still looking amused, she glanced at Brenke as he translated the question, then looked approving again at the question. She spoke at length, the healer passing her words along.

"No, it's something called a peristaltic compression engine. It uses a rapidly moving series of forcefields which are generated at the intake end, then pass down the length of the engine to the outlet. Air is trapped between successive ones and highly compressed as a result, heating up enormously and expanding, then is ejected at the rear to produce thrust. In normal operation that's sufficient but for extra boost a liquid fuel can be injected at the right point and burned to increase the output by a large margin for a short period of time. It's used for take-off when heavily loaded."

Wilson listened with amazement. "So no moving parts at all, nothing to wear out?"

"The power storage cells eventually need to be replaced but they last for years. It's electrically powered, the power is stored in high density batteries in the airframe, which themselves are packed into a subspace pocket. There's a heat resistance and durability spell on the engine linings or otherwise the airflow would erode the material away in the end, even with how tough it is. The skin is treated in a similar way to minimise the effect of air friction and particle impact, such as from sand or dust."

"Wow." He was stunned. There were a number of fascinating concepts there that he wanted to learn more about. After a couple more questions, which themselves led to even more things that were something of an eye-opener, she waved towards the aircraft.

"We should go if we're going to make your appointment and still have time to show you what my aircraft can do." Walking over to the fuselage in front of the wing she prodded a control, which made part of the skin fold away and a ramp extrude somehow, sliding out silently until it touched the ground. She entered the aircraft, the others following. Inside, there were three rows of seats, five in each row, at the front of the vehicle, with a hatch into the rear section which he judged would comprise about three quarters of the thing. That was obviously for cargo. Speaking to Brenke, she pointed at the seats at the front of the passenger compartment. Xrist took one of the front row, while Harada and Brenke took the other two.

From the inside the top part of the fuselage in a strip half a metre tall was transparent the full length of the compartment while another clear section ran down the ceiling. Wilson stared, then stuck his head back out the door and looked at the outside of the craft. It was opaque, the same colour as he'd seen when they approached it. Pulling his head back in he looked out the transparent part. "That's a neat trick," he commented, startled.

"It's quite common, actually," Brenke remarked. "It's a spell bought in from a world called Fwetna. They use anti-gravity a lot there, for things like air-cars, and they all use the same spell on them. It's apparently easier on the structure of a vehicle like this than putting actual windows in."

"I can see where it would be," he said numbly. "Anti-gravity?"

"Oh, yes. They're quite fond of it. We use it for some purposes, but it's more energy-efficient for long distance travel to use aerodynamic lift." Brenke shrugged. "That's what Vrede says, anyway. Apparently vehicles like this use something similar to reduce the acceleration forces felt inside, which allow high manoeuvrability without crushing the occupants. Some of the larger aircraft have emergency recovery systems using it as well."

"That's absolutely amazing." Shaking his head, he looked around to see Vrede watching him from the cockpit of the aircraft, which was mostly open to the passenger compartment. She waved him forward. Pointing to the right-hand seat of the pair mounted in the nose, she indicated he should sit. Slightly dubious, as it didn't look like it would fit very well, he did so. She studied him, then adjusted several parts of it, until he found it was quite comfortable, at least as good as some Earth aircraft he'd flown in. Satisfied, she pointed to a control on the left arm of the chair, motioning for him to touch it. As soon as he did so, he felt something invisible firmly but gently restraining him in the seat. It seemed to be the equivalent of a seat harness. Reaching down she stroked her finger sideways across the same control, which made the force-field or whatever it was vanish. He grinned.

"That's also very cool." She smiled back, sitting in the left seat. Wilson was amused to note that it was the same way around as the pilots of an aircraft back home, by international custom, was arranged in a cockpit, the pilot in charge on the left and the co-pilot on the right. 'I guess it's a fifty-fifty chance with a cockpit laid out like this after all,' he thought to himself.

He studied the instrument panel, or what would be that on any aircraft he was familiar with. There were no visible displays or controls except for a sort of joystick affair on the right side of his seat, retracted out of the way. He noticed that she had the same type of thing on her seat as well. Looking down there were no rudder pedals visible either.

Vrede reached out and put her hand on the middle of the console, which immediately lit up with a faint ping. A number of instruments appeared on the matt surface, floating behind it in some sort of display, most of them recognisable with a little thought. 'Air speed, that one must be, that is clearly a form of artificial horizon, that must be the altimeter...' He identified almost everything he'd expect to find in a cockpit of an aircraft at home although a few of them took a little thought as the layout was odd. He couldn't read any of the text but the graphics were fairly straightforward. Looking over her shoulder she quickly checked the ramp retracted and the door closed when she pressed the appropriate control.

She touched a couple more of the virtual controls, which made the wide windscreen, which stretched completely around them side to side and top to bottom, suddenly have a copy of the critical instruments appear on it in the most amazing HUD system he'd ever come across. Somehow it was working out where he was looking and putting the artificial horizon and other instruments directly but discreetly in his view no matter where he moved his eyes, perfectly focussed and in three dimensions. "Good grief," he muttered to himself in awe. "That's incredible."

Vrede glanced at him, apparently picking up on his tone even through the language barrier, judging by her smile. Tapping a control on the seat arm she spoke to the air, in what he instantly recognised as the manner of a pilot talking to air traffic control. An immediate response came back, causing her to nod to herself, then reach forward and grab the joystick control, into which one inserted one's entire hand, pulling it into position. Looking at the one in front of him he could see there was a grip inside, with a couple of controls barely visible buried in it.

She tapped another control causing the windscreen to suddenly have a pair of what seemed to be 3D camera images, extremely detailed and high resolution, floating in it, one showing either wing. Moving the control stick in various ways she studied the images, in which he could see the wings flexing and changing shape. Preflight check over she dismissed the screens then talked to ATC again. She called something over her shoulder. Brenke called back, "She says we've got clearance for immediate take-off, so hold on." Wilson hastily poked the control for the restraint field again.
Manipulating a couple of controls on the console made the aircraft vibrate gently with a deep thrumming noise, right on the threshold of hearing. She did something to the joystick which made the sound get much louder, the plane beginning to roll. Bringing it up to a fast walk she moved out onto the taxiway, turning to the right and speeding up a little. He watched intently, trying to understand the controls, occasionally glancing out the window. After a couple of minutes they reached the end of the runway, turning and pausing for a moment while another aircraft of a different design accelerated hard, then smoothly tilted back and took off, a muted whooshing sound coming into the cockpit. He imagined it was probably quite loud outside the vehicle, although pretty obviously much quieter than a turbine aircraft would be.

A few seconds later the voice from ATC came again. Vrede acknowledged the message before moving out onto the runway and lining up down the centreline. Wilson was feeling right at home by this point, aside from the weird technology, everything else was remarkably familiar.

A moment later he watched as a pair of indicators on the HUD rose in time with the engines winding up to full power, a muffled roar coming from outside, then she released the brakes. The aircraft immediately moved off, gathering speed at a rate he'd only encountered before in an CF-18 on full afterburners, although with much less feeling of increased G forces than he expected, no more than you'd feel in a light aircraft. He watched the instruments as they reached take-off speed. Pulling gently back on the joystick caused the vehicle to rotate into a take-off attitude and leave the ground without a single bump. It was the smoothest departure he'd ever experienced. A few seconds later there was a faint sound that he decided was the landing gear retracting.

Climbing rapidly, they reached an altitude he estimated at something like five thousand metres in very short order, levelling off at that point. The view was amazing, perfect visibility to the horizon. After a little thought he realised it could well be that with this sort of technology this world simply had much less pollution than at home. It was an interesting thought.

The pilot banked gently to the right, circling around until she was heading almost in the opposite direction to that which they'd taken off in, beginning to climb again, although throttling back. She glanced at Wilson, apparently pleased at his rapt expression as he tried to watch everything at once. Looking over his shoulder he saw Sergeant Harada was also watching with every sign of enjoyment, mixed with a healthy dose of awe, meeting his eyes and grinning for a second. "It's pretty amazing, isn't it, Lieutenant?" the officer said, not having to raise his voice much. The internal noise level was about the same as in a typical car moving at highway speeds.

"Absolutely. It's very interesting, how much of this is all recognisable to me. The controls are somewhat unusual but not so much I couldn't see someone back home coming up with them. The HUD layout is fairly close to what I'd expect as well for the most part. The technology is amazingly advanced, of course, never mind the magic used," he shook his head at his own words, he never thought he'd be talking about magic seriously, certainly not as part of an avionics system, "but it's not so advanced it's not something I can't work out at all."

"I've never really been in anything smaller than something like a 747 before, and certainly not in the cockpit, so I'll have to take your word for it," Harada replied, still looking around with amazement. "But I'm very glad to have this experience. The shuttle flight here from Xrist's town was much less interesting, it was like a flying bus."

Brenke was listening, intermittently passing on some of their conversation to the pilot, who looked mildly amused. She said something to him, which he nodded to, then turned to Wilson, who looked back when the healer spoke. "Riley, she asked if you'd like to try flying it?"

"I'd love to, but I'm not sure I could without a lot more study," he responded, glancing at Vrede.
She made a gesture that he couldn't work out, then said something back to Brenke when he translated this for her.

"It's not difficult, she says, especially for someone with extensive flying experience. The computer would take over if you did anything dangerous, assuming she didn't. She say the thing can fly itself completely competently, it doesn't need a pilot at all." Vrede added something that made him laugh. "But that's no fun."

Wilson snickered. "The sentiments of a true pilot. OK. Why not?" Looking at Vrede, he nodded. She motioned to the joystick. Reaching forward he put his hand into the grip, finding it immediately slid far enough out of the panel that it was comfortable for him to hold without effort. He watched as she went through the basic manoeuvres one at a time, slowly and carefully showing what each motion on the control did. He nodded to himself. "OK, roll, pitch, yaw. Got it. That's throttle? Yes. Right. Let's see what happens." He indicated to her that he was ready.

Prodding a sensor on her panel, she transferred control to him. The aircraft immediately dipped wildly as he tried the stick. "Whoops," he muttered, embarrassed. "Very sensitive controls..." Concentrating, he managed to bring it back from some rather exuberant gyrations. "Sorry," he called over his shoulder, watching the HUD and the view out the window at the same time, slightly distracted by Vrede laughing from next to him, apparently enjoying the experience. The swearing in muted Japanese from behind him made it clear that Sergeant Harada didn't appreciate it quite as much. Even whatever anti-inertial system the aircraft had didn't completely eliminate the falling sensation he'd managed to produce.

It took about ten minutes and a couple more exhilarating sessions of near loss of control, but eventually he was flying straight and level, no longer straining not to make a mistake. He thought it would take a couple of hours on the controls to get to a decent level of competence, at least to the point he'd feel safe trying a landing, but his experience on a wide variety of different aircraft stood him in good stead. He was thoroughly enjoying himself, falling back into the familiar routine of scanning the horizon regularly, checking the instruments on each scan, While he couldn't read them as far as altitude and speed went, he'd memorised the readings that Vrede had ended up at and was keeping the machine flying at the same height and velocity quite successfully.

Glancing at her, he found her watching him with what looked like approval and a certain amount of respect. He nodded to her, which made her nod back with a smile. She made a motion which he interpreted to mean pulling back while throttling up. Slightly nervously, he did as requested, pointing the nose up and increasing power. The plane headed rapidly upwards. She motioned to increase power again. Pushing the relevant control inside the stick to the limit, he felt light G forces pushing him gently back in his seat. Behind him, three different voices said three different things in two different languages, remarkably enough all covering the same concept. He grinned, as did Vrede, while they headed upwards at a seventy-five degree angle. A few seconds into the climb he noticed a vapour cone briefly appear on the wing nearest him as they broke the sound barrier.

"How fast will this thing go?" he called back to Brenke. There was a long pause, then the healer asked the question in his own language, sounding like he was now regretting introducing the two pilots.

"Slightly more than twice the speed of sound," the answer came back. "Which is much too fast in my opinion." Snickering, Wilson glanced at the other pilot, who was eyeing her instruments and looking pleased. He kept climbing, watching as the sky steadily darkened. She eventually motioned for him to level off, at an altitude that must have been at least twenty thousand metres as far as he could judge, higher than he'd been in anything but a fighter before, and that rarely.
"Very impressive, especially for a transport aircraft," he commented. "It's faster and more agile than most fighters from back home." Brenke passed the message along sounding slightly less stressed now they were flying on the level. Looking out to the side, Wilson could see for an amazing distance, clouds visible right on the horizon, far below them. He grinned. It might have taken a near-death experience, but he was suddenly very pleased he'd ended up where he had.

The second time Nabiki woke she felt much better. Still slightly fatigued but nothing more than like the day after a late night, nowhere near the bone-deep exhaustion she'd felt the night before. Lying in the bed with her eyes half open, listening to the traffic outside, she smiled a little. It was good to be alive considering what had so nearly happened.

She could feel the others in the building, Ranma and Kasumi still asleep in their room, Ami and Rei in the guest rooms along with Hotaru, and below them Aiko and the others. There was also a definite sensation of the ward system keeping a closer than normal eye on them all, in a rather proprietary manner mixed with mild worry. And weirdly, just a trace of guilt. Grinning she reached out and stroked the wall beside the bed. "Thanks, you clever thing," she whispered, receiving an odd sensation of gratitude back.

It was about half past seven according to her time display, she noticed as she pulled the covers back. Standing and stretching widely, she yawned, scratched herself between the shoulder-blades, then dug around in the dresser for a change of clothes before heading for the nearest bathroom. Twenty minutes later she was in the kitchen making coffee, feeling oddly content. Ami wandered in moments later, sniffing the air appreciatively and looking sleepy. "Here you go," the middle sister said, handing her friend a cup of strong coffee. The other woman smiled, drank a third of it, then sighed.

"Oh, that's good. I needed that."

"I know the feeling," Nabiki replied, drinking half her cup in one go. "I can't get going in the morning properly without coffee either." The two of them chatted while she made a quick breakfast, adding another portion when Rei staggered in and groped for the cup Ami handed her, looking amused. The black-haired girl slurped eagerly at the hot drink.

"Thanks," she muttered, turning and wandering back into the living room wearing a vacant expression and pyjamas. They watched her go.

"She's even worse than we are," Ami commented, laughing.

By the time they'd had breakfast, all three of them were feeling and looking more alive. The other two had a quick shower before returning to the living room. "I'm going to go and get a lot of food in," Nabiki told her friends. "I could do with some help."

"OK, I'll come with you, if you can stay here in case there's any problem, Rei?" Ami said, glancing at her team-mate. The other girl nodded.

"Sure. No problem."

"T'd think we should probably just let them sleep until they wake normally," Nabiki mused, glancing towards the main bedroom. She could hear Ranma snoring delicately, causing her to grin a little, and Rei to laugh. "But they feel like they're going to do that fairly soon as far as I can tell. Let's get a lot of high-calorie stuff, as well as protein. And a long stick to put the food on so Ranma and Misaki don't take our fingers with it." Ami cracked up, heaving with laughter.
"They're not that bad, surely," she gasped out.

Nabiki shrugged. "You haven't seen them really go at it. You need to come to a party where there's roast g'ragh. Just don't stand between them and the food..."

"What the hell is g'ragh?" Rei asked curiously.

"Delicious."

The girl gave her a flat look as she laughed. "Oh, extremely helpful. Thanks." Ami giggled, watching them.

"It's an animal from Uthryyl's world. Amazing to eat but a bit weird to look at," the middle sister added, relenting, but smiling at the expression. "Everyone who's tried it seems to love it. We'll have to see about getting some soon. I think we need to let Uthryyl know about what's happened, anyway, I'll call him later."

"I'd like to meet him," Ami told her. Beside her Rei nodded. "You've said quite a lot about him over the last few days. He sounds interesting."

"He is. As are his wife and daughter. You'll like all of them. Onkra is going to come and stay here for a while at some point for more training. She seems really taken with learning the Art, during our holiday she was practising more than I was." Nabiki laughed a bit. "And I was being pushed pretty hard by Sis and Ranma."

"I can't work out whether I should be looking forward to being trained by them, or running as fast as I can," Rei giggled. The other two grinned, Ami nodding a little.

"Oh, it'll be fine. Just wait until phase four." Nabiki gave the two girls the most evil look she could, chuckling in a dark tone. They exchanged glances, looking worried.

"Ah... Phase four?"

"Don't worry too much about it," the middle Tendo assured Ami, which didn't seem to have the requested effect. Neither did the maniacal laugh she came out with with reassure her either. Heading towards the door, Nabiki grinned to herself, as after a pause Ami followed, still looking somewhat fearful.

"I don't know what happened but I'm kind of surprised there's been so few problems as a result of it," Harrison said, looking at Captain Martinez as he entered the office, closing the door behind him. "Lots of reports of minor fender-benders, a few people who seem to have had minor accidents because they got distracted, more conspiracy theories than you'd believe about it all, but nothing serious so far." He looked at his notebook, flipping through it for several pages. "Apparently it was a CIA mind control plot, the Russians, the North Koreans, the South Koreans, no idea what that one's about, God, Satan, Aliens, the Illuminati, the Canadians of all people, the fault of something called HAARP, the Israelis, the Iranians, an international banking cartel, Microsoft, the Saudis, fluoride in the water, trans-fats, and the lack of enough good cannabis." He shrugged as the captain started laughing, drawing a deep breath after his recital.

"What, all of that at once?"

"Yep. It's obviously a very major conspiracy." Harrison chuckled wryly. "Everyone I spoke to seems to have no idea what they were doing for twenty to thirty seconds before the... twitch, or whatever it really was, but in almost every case it looks like they were just getting on with life. It's like that period was just edited out of reality somehow. Like it never actually happened. It's very weird indeed."

"What about surveillance cameras, things like that?" his superior asked. Again, he shrugged.

"I checked the footage from the cameras here, then asked a couple of shopkeepers I know if I could look at theirs. It doesn't show anything useful at all. Just a lot of people doing what they do, then suddenly looking around with puzzled expressions. There's no sign of an earthquake, or any physical cause for whatever it was. Aside from the memory, and the gap in it just before, it's like it never happened." He looked at his notes again. "Although there was one person, an old voodoo priestess I met wandering around down-town looking more wild-eyed than usual, who told me very seriously that it was all to do with an ancient evil trying to remake the world in its own image and being defeated by 'glowing people from outside', whatever that means. Oh, and she said there was a giant crow involved somehow. And a house that saw everything." He shook his head slowly. "I'm not entirely sure she was exactly sober at the time."

Captain Martinez stared at him for a few seconds, then sighed. "It's going to be something to do with magic, isn't it?" he asked, more rhetorically than anything else.

"Most likely. It sort of has that feel to it, yes." The lieutenant sat down opposite the desk, closing his notebook and holding it in one hand at his side. "I'll try calling Yori at some point and asking her. She'd know if anyone would. But on the face of it, aside from some weird effect that everyone in the city seems to have felt, nothing actually happened. It'll give the paranoid loonies material for decades but I can't see any other problems stemming from it. It's not like there's any genuine evidence."

"More like the entire planet, from what I've been able to find out," Martinez said, indicating his computer. "There are similar reports from all over the place. But again, no evidence. Lots of really silly theories, Fox News was running a number of the crazier ones and laughing at them and the people pushing them, but it's like you found out. No proof at all."

"Very strange." Harrison flexed his shoulders, working out a kink, before looking back to the other man. "So should we keep asking questions?"

The captain thought for a second or two before shaking his head slowly. "No. We've got much more important things to deal with, like actual crimes. File your notes then go home, we can get on with normal life tomorrow." Harrison nodded, standing. "But, if you ever do find out what it was from Yori, let me know. I'm curious."

Laughing, the lieutenant nodded again. "I'll do that, sir. Good night."

"Give my best to your wife, Harrison," Martinez said with a small smile, watching as his officer left, then spinning the chair around to look out over LA as evening fell, wondering what had happened. Eventually he shrugged, got up, and went home himself.

Looking up at the knock on the door, Captain Uehara called, "Enter." It swung open to reveal Sergeant Harada, accompanied by a middling height foreign man about thirty-five, fit looking and dressed in military fatigues, his dark brown hair uncombed but otherwise looking fairly tidy, and a small demon that she recognised from the descriptions she'd heard. "Ah, Sergeant. I was wondering where you'd gotten to. You missed the last half of your shift yesterday. Not your usual behaviour."

Harada looked embarrassed. "I'm sorry, Captain. When I saw the column of light over by the park I panicked, I'm afraid, and ran to get Emiko to safety. I used the emergency portal generator of "What column of light?" she asked slowly. He looked back at her, puzzled.

"Somewhere around the park? A weird colour, it went right up into the clouds. All the demons ran like hell as soon as they saw it, there are hardly any around at the moment." She kept watching him, unblinking. After a long moment, she shook her head.

"I'm sorry, Sergeant, I have absolutely no idea what you're talking about." It was his turn to stare for a while.

"That's... very strange. Emiko and I both saw it. So did Hikaru. He's the one who told me to go to her." After another moment, he pulled out his cell-phone. "Do you mind if I...?"

She motioned to it. "Feel free. I'm very curious myself." He dialled a number, waited, then had a conversation that left him looking more and more puzzled as it progressed. In the end he thanked the person on the other end, disconnected, then stared at the phone as if he couldn't work out what it was. Xrist and the foreign military man she assumed was Lieutenant Riley Wilson exchanged a glance. Eventually he put the phone away and looked up.

"He can't recall anything about either what we saw or what he said to me. He asked a few people in the coffee shop, none of them can remember anything about it either." After a pause, he added, "That's very weird."

"Weird is practically normal around here." She laughed for a moment, becoming more serious quickly. "Everyone seems to have felt some odd bump or jolt, all at the same time, while from what I can work out there's several seconds of the day missing as well, but we can't find any evidence as to what caused it, or who. Or why. No damage reported, no-one seriously injured, nothing particularly interesting at all. But no reports of columns of light from the park."

Comparing notes they quickly worked out that the odd twitch in the world had occurred moments after the sergeant had used the portal generator. "How very odd," she eventually summed up. "I suppose they're connected but I have no idea how."

"I know someone who might," Harada said slowly, looking down at Xrist, who had been listening with interest. Lieutenant Wilson was appearing slightly confused as the conversation had been in Japanese.

"Yori?"

"Yes. I'll ask her when I next contact her."

"Let me know the results," she requested. "If only to satisfy my curiosity. I would assume it wasn't anything particularly serious or there would be more damage, but it's very odd nonetheless. The effect seems to be very widespread as well, which is impressive." She looked up at the other man, who was now examining one of the pictures she had on the wall of her office. Switching to English, she added, "Lieutenant Wilson, I presume?" He jumped a little at being addressed, turning to face her. "My apologies for being rude like that but it appears we have something of a mystery going on. Not unusual for Minato in general, but... mystifying." She grinned as he laughed.

"I'm learning that this area is somewhat unusual," he replied. She motioned to a chair. He sat down, as did Harada and Xrist.

"So. I trust you're well after your experience?" she asked. He nodded, smiling.
"Remarkably so, all things considered. I've had a very odd thirty-six hours or so, although everything seems to have worked out. While I can't recommend being eviscerated as a means of meeting new people in strange places it does at least seem to work." She stared at him for a moment then laughed for some time.

"An interesting attitude. You'll do well, I think. Could you tell me what happened?"

"Of course." He began talking, explaining everything since he'd been jumped by the two muggers. She listened with interest at first and a certain amount of envy later on. Xrist and Harada also added their parts in the short but unusual saga. Eventually, he stopped with a shrug. "That's basically it. Vrede amused us with a few aerobatics, then dropped us off in this other town a few minutes before the portal was due to be opened here. We came through about thirty minutes ago along with half a dozen others from Xrist's world, who all headed off for coffee." He shook his head looking bemused. "Which is one of the strangest reasons for visiting another world that I can think of."

"We get it a lot here, believe me," she replied, smiling a little. Glancing at Harada, she got the impression that the lieutenant's comments about being amused by Vrede's aerobatics hadn't quite caught the truth of the matter. The poor man had swallowed hard and closed his eyes when the pilot had said that, privately amusing her. Suppressing a smile, she asked him, "Do you have anything more to add about it, Sergeant?"

"Lieutenant Wilson covered it very well," he told her, speaking English for the benefit of the Canadian. "I'll write up a report on what I did but most of it to that point was looking for someone who understood us. Luckily Xrist bumped into us before anything happened. After that it was all fairly easy, although until we checked and found everything at home was all right I was very worried." He shook his head briefly. "It was an enormous relief when we were able to open the portal and discover things seemed normal, after what I saw, although I'm still very curious as to what exactly it was."

"As am I. However, since nothing seems to have changed or be wrong, I doubt there's much we can do except get on with business as usual." She turned back to the lieutenant. "Your commanding officer is quite worried. He was all for coming here to help look for you until we told him you were in good hands. I'm relieved to see that was actually true." Wilson smiled at this. "You should probably call him and tell him you're all right, although I'm not entirely sure how you'll explain what happened."

"It could be tricky," Wilson agreed.

"We should let Agent Naito know as well. He may be able to help with any explanations, his department of the PSIA has a lot of experience with that sort of thing," Harada suggested. "He'd probably like to debrief the lieutenant anyway, for the record."

Captain Uehara nodded slowly, glancing at the Canadian officer, who looked curious. "That's a good idea. It shouldn't take too much time. I'm sorry to delay you getting back to your unit any further but it might be important." Wilson made a gesture of understanding.

"Don't worry about it, Captain, I understand. I'll have to do much the same thing when I get back. I'm used to giving reports."

"Thank you. All right, Sergeant, if you could take an official statement from both Xrist and Lieutenant Wilson on the crime, then call Agent Naito, please? I'll contact Lieutenant Wilson's CO in the mean time and let him know his missing man is no longer missing." Both men nodded. She turned to Xrist, who was patiently waiting while they spoke.
"I'm very thankful for your help, Xrist," she told him sincerely in Japanese. "Without you stepping in we would have had a murder to investigate, and probably an awkward international problem as well. Thank you very much on behalf of both myself and the Tokyo police force for doing what you did." He bowed his head, then smiled widely, showing a remarkable number of teeth.

"It was my pleasure, Captain. While I don't like getting involved in official matters, here or at home, when I can avoid it, I couldn't let someone die if I could prevent it. I like your people, aside from anything else. And I really like coffee, so I want to be able to keep coming back."

The Captain laughed, as did Harada. "Please feel free to come as often as you wish. From what I gather you and the rest of the visitors to the district are having a very positive effect, both commercially and otherwise." She smiled at him. "I'm going to have to visit this coffee shop you like and meet the people who seem to be going there."

"The first espresso is on me, if you do," the little demon said with a grin. With that, he and the others left her office. Still smiling, she looked up the number for the base in Okinawa then picked up the phone, dialling while wondering once again what had happened the day before.

Naito stopped writing, putting his pen down and flexing his hand a couple of times, then read the last few paragraphs. He nodded thoughtfully. "Thank you for the information, Lieutenant, it's helpful." He made a quick correction to a minor mistake, before closing the notebook and putting it away. "We've made arrangements to get you back to your base. Sergeant Harada tells me he has everything he needs from you for the case against the Miura brothers so I don't think there's any need to keep you from your duties any longer. We'll sort out a report to your superiors explaining the situation." He studied the other man for a moment.

"How would you like that report slanted?" he asked. Wilson looked mildly confused.

"What do you mean?"

"Well, we can sanitise it a bit, to... de-emphasise the less usual parts, so to speak. The portal travel, the rescue by Xrist, or at least mentioning the fact that he's not from around here, that sort of thing. What you tell your people is up to you but from past experience foreigners quite often find what goes on around here a little difficult to believe." He grinned. "To be honest, people from around here sometimes find what goes on around here hard to believe, but that's another matter."

"The Canadian government is well aware of magic and the sort of person we have in Minato, after recent events, but that doesn't mean it's been disseminated to everyone in the armed forces."

The lieutenant raised an eyebrow. "Recent events? You mean the Halleckton Event?"

Naito nodded, frowning slightly. "Yes, unfortunately. It was a very unpleasant experience."

"You were there?"

"Not in Halleckton itself, but I was involved, along with a number of the special talent who live locally." Naito sighed a little. "It was the endgame of a very unpleasant case. We didn't quite manage to get there in time."

"I heard about it, but don't know any of the details," the pilot responded. "From what I heard there were a couple of, um, 'magical girls', is it?" Naito nodded. "Called Yori and Chou. Healer Brenke, who fixed me up, mentioned them as well. Apparently they have something of a reputation."
"To put it mildly. They're involved in a lot of things that are strange even around these parts. Good people."

"He was interested in meeting them at some point. He says they're supposed to be amazingly good at healing." Wilson seemed impressed.

"Oh, that's true enough. I've seen some remarkable things along those lines." He studied the other man. "Yori could certainly deal with that scar easily enough if you want me to ask her."

"Perhaps some other time." Wilson didn't seem too worried. "I'm not all that fussed by it and it's proof that something happened."

"True enough. So, what do you want this report to say?"

After some thought, the Canadian officer replied, "I suppose it's probably best to downplay the more unusual elements. I can explain them when I find out how it's likely to be received. I assume I can get you to verify it if necessary?"

"Of course." Naito handed him a card. "You can get me on this number twenty-four hours a day, although I'd prefer it be during sensible hours unless it's an emergency." Looking amused, Wilson accepted the card, looked at it, then pulled out his wallet and put it carefully away.

"Thank you." Standing, he held out his hand. "And it was a pleasure meeting you. I'd better go, I'd like to see Bruce before he flies out again, and let him know I'm all right. Then I need to get back to the base."

"Ah, your friend you came here to meet?"

"Yep. From what Sergeant Harada said he was very worried when I didn't turn up." The two of them left the private room they'd been talking in and headed to the front of the police station, entering the large main room. Harada looked up from talking to Xrist and waved them over, handing Wilson an envelope when they reached him.

"Train tickets, courtesy of the PSIA," he said. The lieutenant slipped the envelope into his pocket with a smile of thanks.

"It was nice to meet you both, Sergeant," he replied, nodding to Xrist and holding out his hand. The little demon shook it, grinning, then said something to Harada, who laughed.

"He said he was happy that he could help, but he doesn't want to come flying with you again for a while," the man relayed, making Wilson chuckle.

"Pity. That was a hell of a lot of fun. Vrede invited me back when I had time. I may take her up on it. Her aircraft was amazing." He shook his head slightly. "I know what I want for Christmas."

Shaking hands with Harada as well, he waved good-bye, then left, all three of the others watching until he was out the door. Naito turned to Harada. "Seems like an interesting man," he commented.

"Indeed. He took it surprisingly well, although from what Brenke told me he was somewhat confused to begin with." The sergeant grinned. "I can understand that. It was an unusual experience even though I was expecting it." He glanced at Xrist, then thoughtfully at Naito again. "What do you remember from the... twitch?" he asked curiously. Regarding the sergeant, the PSIA agent debated with himself for a few seconds.

Eventually, he cautiously asked, "What do you remember? I'm still not entirely clear on how you ended up on Xrist's world in the first place, as well."

Harada looked mildly embarrassed. "I... may have over-reacted, when I saw the light column. I was worried about Emiko and our child, I had Xrist's emergency portal generator in my pocket..." He shrugged a little. "One thing led to another."

"Ah." Naito grinned, as did Xrist. Sergeant Harada went over the whole story from his point of view, adding to what the agent already knew from debriefing Lieutenant Wilson. When the other man stopped talking, he nodded slowly. It painted a fascinating picture. He noticed Xrist was watching him expectantly as well. "Well, I don't know the whole story myself, either, and there are parts of what I do know that I can't really talk about."

"Yori was involved, wasn't she?" the sergeant asked, obviously knowing the answer already. He nodded.

"Would you expect otherwise?"

"No." Both Harada and Xrist looked amused, yet curious. Naito thought for a moment.

"OK. This isn't for public consumption, obviously, even less so than usual, but essentially, as I understand it there was a very serious threat to the whole planet, from something that's been causing problems for a considerable amount of time. It may have been involved in that issue we had with the other group over the last couple of months. It all came to a head yesterday, when Yori, Chou, Azumi, Aiko's team, and three girls from the other lot went up against it. Apparently it was a difficult battle but they won. The threat is permanently gone."

The police officer and the demon exchanged looks of surmise. "It wasn't easy, I assume," Xrist said. Naito shook his head.

"Not at all. They're all back now but the last I heard Yori and most of the others were recovering from total exhaustion. That gives a good idea of how serious it was. Have you ever seen Yori even look like she was exerting herself?"

"No. She makes the most incredibly weird things look pretty easy," Xrist mused. "So do the others, to be honest. That's... somewhat worrying. You're certain this threat is ended?"

"Yes, I am. I got the information from a trusted and knowledgeable source, who was sure it was dealt with once and for all."

"What was the light, then?" Harada asked curiously. "It certainly looked impressive and it worried all the visitors a hell of a lot, judging by how quickly they left. Rynnkh seemed terrified."

"Again, I don't have all the details, but it was a visible manifestation of some sort of incredibly complex security spell Yori and Chou designed, which was apparently reacting to the threat in a big way. By the sound of it you missed the main show, when that pillar of light suddenly expanded. It went through Tokyo in seconds and if what I suspect is true, ended up covering the entire planet soon after. I gather it was key to dealing with the problem although I'm not entirely sure how, other than collecting and transferring a very large amount of magical energy to them at a critical point in the fight." Naito shrugged a little. "That's about all I can tell you. Why no one, or almost no one, remembers it I'm not entirely sure either, aside from the fact that there was something to do with time travel involved in the threat. It seems to have resulted in essentially editing most of the event out of the world somehow. That twitch is what was left, along with the memory glitch everyone seems to have."
"Like a splice in a film, I guess," Harada suggested, looking simultaneously fascinated and appalled.

"Not a bad analogy, actually," Naito responded approvingly. "It's probably quite close to that. For more details you'd need to ask Yori, but I don't know if she'd tell you. Or at least, tell you everything. She keeps secrets well." He laughed as the other man nodded knowingly, still looking somewhat pale.

Beside him, Xrist had gone very quiet. They finally noticed, looking enquiringly at the little demon. He seemed to be staring at nothing in particular. Exchanging glances, eventually Naito asked, "Xrist? Are you all right?" The demon blinked a few times then shuddered all over.

"Time travel?" he croaked, sounding horrified. Naito nodded again.

"That's what my information says." Xrist stared at him fixedly for several seconds, then fumbled for a chair, sitting down hard.

"You were right to run, Sergeant," he finally said, swallowing hard. "Time travel is... appallingly dangerous. I don't know much about it aside from the fact that it's banned almost everywhere. There have been some ghastly accidents when people tried that. I've heard rumours that a very long time ago at least one entire reality was... deleted, I guess... when some clever bastard tried building a time machine. It's possible, but the worst idea you could ever have." He looked at Naito wide-eyed. "You're absolutely certain they stopped this threat?"

"Yes. The... entity... behind it all is permanently and very definitely dead. They made sure of that." He was fascinated by the fact that Xrist seemed to know something of the story, as his words certainly suggested. The small figure slowly relaxed, looking vastly relieved.

"Thank every deity you care about for that. If they had lost..." He shook his head in terrified wonder. "Not good."

"So I gather."

"I would expect that the reason you remember, Sergeant, is that you were on the other side of a portal at the time," Xrist continued, looking at Harada. "That would have insulated you from whatever changes to the timeline happened here as I understand it. Probably everyone who went through a portal before or during it will remember. Magical ability is most likely the reason for everyone else who remembers, or proximity to some serious magical power source. They often have odd local effects on time." He shrugged a little. "That's what I believe, anyway. I'm not a mage although I know a few. The subject has come up once or twice, mainly illustrating the concept of 'things you never, ever, do, no matter what.'"

"That fits with what I've learned and worked out," Naito agreed, respect for the intelligence of the visitor growing even higher. "But it's useful information even so. Thank you, Xrist."

"You're welcome, Agent Naito," the demon said, hopping off his chair. "I seriously need a very strong cup of coffee. See you around, Sergeant." Giving them a little wave he wandered off, still appearing shaken. They watched him leave the station.

"He's a good person," Sergeant Harada said quietly. Turning back to Naito, he asked, "If you do find out more about this whole situation and can tell me, I'd love to know. But I can live with it if you can't."

"I'm still in the dark about a lot of it myself," Naito replied, mostly truthfully. "Obviously there will be aspects of it I can't tell anyone, for security reasons, but I'll let you know the parts I can when I'm able to." He glanced at his watch. "I'd better get back, I have another appointment I can't miss. But it was interesting. Thank you for calling me in about Lieutenant Wilson."

"No problem." Harada shook his hand as he stood. "It will be interesting to see if anything more comes of it. Lieutenant Wilson certainly seemed to enjoy flying that aircraft Vrede owns. Although he was somewhat... overenthusiastic in his manoeuvres, I felt."

"Made you go a bit green?" the agent snickered. Harada shuddered slightly, obviously remembering something he wished he didn't.

"Just a little. He and Vrede seemed to be enjoying the hell out of themselves but those of us who were passengers were rather wishing we'd taken the shuttle instead by that point."

Laughing, Naito waved good-by, then headed back to the PSIA, still chuckling a little as he left the building.

Grinning at the groaning sound, as if a horde of zombies were calling for brains, Nabiki headed towards the bedroom, carrying two mugs of strong coffee. She looked in from the doorway, seeing Ranma in female form staring at the ceiling unblinkingly, moaning slightly. Kasumi was stirring beside her, mumbling to herself. "Coffee?" she asked brightly. The red-head very slowly turned her gaze Nabikiwards, wincing with every movement.

"Please," she whispered painfully. Entering the room, the middle Tendo walked around to the other side of the bed, put both mugs down on the small table next to it, then helped her sister-in-law sit up. "Thanks," the woman croaked, holding out her hands, then accepting a mug carefully with a small sound of pain. It shook a little as she raised it to her mouth.

"You still look wiped out, Ranma," Nabiki said, watching with a certain amount of mild worry and considerable sympathy. If the martial artist felt anything like she had when she woke the first time she could easily see where the shaking hands came from. In all likelihood, she felt a lot worse, having stretched herself to the absolute limit and beyond.

Slowly but steadily drinking, the red-head drained the entire mug-full as Nabiki watched, somewhat impressed and slightly appalled, then handed the empty container back while taking a deep breath. "Thanks," she said again, sounding much closer to normal although still very tired. Kasumi chose that moment to open her eyes and make a pained noise, blinking furiously at the light, before her eyes focussed on her sister, who grinned at her then reached over her husband to hand her the other coffee.

"Here you go, Sis."

"Thank you, Nabiki," the older woman said quietly, clearing her throat for a second, then pulling herself up and sipping the beverage appreciatively. "Are any of the others up yet?"

"Just me, Ami, and Rei at the moment. Hotaru was making little squeaking noises a few minutes ago but she still seems to be completely out of it. The others are in their apartments, I'm going to go and check on them next." She studied the two in the bed. "How do you feel?"

"Like someone dropped a small moon on me," Ranma groaned.

"Moon? That was no moon," the middle sister snickered, causing the red-head to glare at her, not entirely appreciating the humour of the situation. Kasumi giggled to herself, covering her grin with another sip of coffee.
"Funny, Nabiki, very funny. How the hell are you so cheerful at the moment, anyway?" Ranma growled. She shrugged, still grinning.

"Don't know for sure. Perhaps because my reservoir is smaller it refilled faster? I felt like death last night, but I'm just sort of pleasantly tired at the moment. The ward system seems to be sending us energy still, which is helping." She looked over her shoulder as she heard some cooking noises from the kitchen. "And I've eaten an awful lot in the last few hours."

"Food! That's what's missing!" The martial artist perked up noticeably, making both her wife and sister-in-law laugh.

"We went out and bought enough to feed a small army of magical girls this morning," Nabiki told them, as they both began to get out of bed. "Lots more coffee is available as well. And ice cream."

"Mmmm, Ice Cream," Ranma moaned, making her collapse giggling.

"Come on, Homer. Let's get some food in you."

Shortly the two most recently woken people were sitting at the table while Nabiki and Rei brought substantial amounts of food out of the kitchen. Picking up her chopsticks, Ranma winced, looking at her hands, which were still blistered and red. Kasumi reached out and took them, now feeling well enough to finish the healing. The redness and blisters vanished in the normal golden glow, while the others watched, and Ranma smiled in relief. "Thanks, love. It's easier when someone else does it."

"Hotaru's weapon must have been extremely hot," Kasumi mused, beginning to eat slowly. "Considering how heat-resistant you are from that Phoenix pill of Cologne's all those years ago."

"It was smoking, literally," Nabiki commented.

"It wasn't so much the actual heat as the sheer power running through it," the martial artist told them, looking up from inspecting her hands, before also starting her meal. "It was a hell of a lot. Far more than either one of us could have done on our own. I'm very interested to find out where the hell the system found all that energy from."

"All over the planet as far as I can determine," Ami put in, causing both Kasumi and Ranma to pause, staring at her in amazement. "I'm still looking into it but it seems very likely that it somehow accessed dozens of sites that were storing magical power all over the world and pulled power from them to do what it did. Then, somehow, it ended up with even more energy than it borrowed and put it back." She looked both impressed and worried. "I didn't know it could do that."

"Neither did we," Ranma muttered in shock. She glanced at her wife. "We're going to have to check the logs. It certainly wasn't designed to do that."

"It's a damn good thing it did," Rei commented. "It probably saved the universe."

"It definitely saved the universe," the martial artist told her. "We were only a few seconds away from complete collapse. We'd have lost without it stepping in." They were all quiet for a moment, before she resumed eating.

Half-way through the meal, while they were talking over everything that Ami, Rei, and Nabiki had done while the others were still asleep, they heard a little voice over the com.

"Kasumi? Ranma? Can someone help me, please?" Hotaru sounded very young and very scared. Ranma looked at her wife, then stood.
"I'll go." Worried, Nabiki and Ami followed her. Entering the guest room they found the girl sitting up in bed, looking at her hands with a horrified expression. She looked up at them.

"I can hardly move them and they really hurt," she said, obviously trying to put a brave face on it but showing her worry by how wide her eyes were. Ranma smiled gently at her, sitting on the bed, then taking her hands in her own. Blue light glowed, the pain in Hotaru's eyes vanishing instantly. "Thank you so much," she whispered in relief.

"Kas passed out before she could do much more than repair the main surface burns," the martial artist told them, carefully healing the damage as they watched. "There's quite a lot of deep burn scarring and some nerve damage." She looked at the girl with a smile. "You're not as heat-tolerant as I am and you're not used to handling that much power either, not by a long way. It will get easier with practice. Your healing abilities will improve as well." Shortly, she released Hotaru's hands, which were now flawless once more. "There we go. How do you feel?"

"Incredibly tired still but also hungrier than I've ever been," the purple haired girl reported, frowning slightly, then smiling. "Thank you."

"Come on, there's lots of food ready," Ami told her, looking relieved that the damage had been fixed. She helped her young friend out of bed. Trailing behind them, Nabiki turned and went into the practice room. She headed for the pole-arm lying on the floor, looking the dried and burned skin sticking to it in several places with distaste, then picked the thing up carefully. She slowly ran a glowing green hand down it, listening to the hissing sound as the skin was vaporised by the ki aura, being careful at first not to damage the weapon until she found it seemed unaffected by what she was doing. When she finished she carried it back into the dining room.

"You should put this away, Hotaru," she said, handing it to the girl, who took it with a smile and a nod of thanks, looking at it in some awe.

"The weapon that saved everything," Rei remarked, also looking at it.

"Pretty much," Ranma replied. She inspected the thing. "It was a very good thing you realised what needed to be done with it."

Vanishing it, Hotaru shrugged a little, looking mildly confused. "I'm still not sure how I knew, I just did. Something seemed to want me to bring it out."

"The ward system again," Nabiki said. "It had a definite plan. Luckily."

Two hours later Aiko and the others had also woken, arrived, and eaten enough food to choke a hippo. Each. They were all sitting around the living room looking relaxed and well fed, although still somewhat tired. "I'm certainly going to sleep well tonight," Fumiko said, stretching widely. "I can't believe that it's only twenty-four, no, twenty-five hours, since the world came within seconds of ending." She shook her head a little. "And that we were fighting for less than two minutes in total."

"It's kind of weird, yes," Aiko agreed. "But I'm feeling happier than I have been for a while now. It's finally over." They all fell silent, exchanging glances, then grinned happily.

"We need to do something nice for the system," Tamiko laughed. "Can you buy a building a box of chocolates?"

"I'll definitely think of some way of rewarding it," Ranma chuckled, reverting to male for the first time since they'd got back. "You hear that, building? You did a magnificent job. Well done."
A definite feeling of happiness swept over them, making them all look surprised, then laugh again.

Coming back into the lobby from outside, having gone shopping again for more food, Nabiki headed towards the elevator. Inside it, she was about to press the button for the top floor, when she cocked her head slightly, feeling something subtly odd, something she'd been too tired to notice the last time she'd gone out that morning but now that she thought back, could vaguely recall sensing. After a moment's hesitation she instead pressed the button for the parking garage. When the doors opened she left the elevator, turned the lights on, and looked around.

#What is it, Nabiki?# Jun asked curiously.

'I'm... not entirely sure,' she replied. 'There's something... it's difficult to describe. Something has changed.' A pause followed her words, then the machine responded, sounding puzzled.

#You're right. There is a very subtle difference to subspace in the vicinity, but I can't pin it down.#

It fell silent for a moment, then added, #Perhaps on the next level it will be easier to detect.#

'OK.' Extinguishing the lights and getting back into the elevator she prodded the lowest button, waiting for it to arrive at the sub-basement. When the doors slid open she looked out, then stared in bemused wonder for some time. Jun wasn't saying anything but she could damn near feel it gaping.

Eventually she said, 'Are my eyes working correctly, Jun?'

#I believe so. I am detecting it by other means as well as your senses.#

'OK. Good. I was wondering.' They were both silent for a minute longer. She stepped out of the elevator, looking around, then got back in. Pressing the top button she waited quietly until she reached the top, exited when the doors opened, then went into her sister's apartment. Everyone looked up as she came in.

"Um, Nabiki? Are you all right?" Tamiko inspected her face curiously.

"There's a star in the basement."

The rest of them stared, then exchanged glances. Eventually, Ranma asked carefully, "Nabs? You sure you're OK?"

She stared hard at him. "There's a star in the basement." He looked bemused. "Why is there a star in the basement?"

"I don't know how to answer that," he responded, glancing at his wife, who returned the look, puzzled. "What are you talking about?" She crooked a finger at him.

"Come with me." Turning she left the apartment again, feeling everyone else get up and follow after a couple of seconds. They all packed into the elevator, filling it to capacity, after which she pressed the button for the sub-basement again. Silent on the way down, she just stared at the doors until they opened, then walked out and moved to the side. Everyone else piled out after her, immediately stopping dead. Hotaru gave off a small yelp of shock.

There was a very long silence.

She pointed. "Star."

She waved her hand around. "Basement."
Turning to Ranma, who was looking upwards with an expression of total bewilderment on his face, she requested, "Explain."

Nearly another entire minute passed in silence.

"I can't," he admitted quietly, sounding completely stunned. He met her eyes, then shrugged helplessly. "Not a fucking clue."

"It's sort of impressive," Ami said absently, still staring.

"Pretty, too," Hotaru added.

"But why is it there?" Nabiki pressed, feeling vaguely disconnected from reality. The entire situation was surreal. They all went back to staring.

What they were looking at certainly seemed to be a star, seen from fairly close up. A sphere of roiling energy, small streamers leaping from the surface and flickering out some distance, only to subside back slowly, the whole thing surrounded by an iridescent halo of rainbow light that was significantly larger than the main body, insubstantial yet visible. It seemed to be an impossible distance away, bearing in mind the fact they were in a room which had been, the last time she'd looked, about thirty metres square with a three metre or so ceiling.

Now the walls were so far away that she couldn't see them except as a blur while the ceiling had apparently vanished completely, only a black background showing above them. The light of the 'star', mostly white with a steadily varying pale wash of cycling colour added to it, illuminated the space like late afternoon sunlight. The support columns that had held the weight of the building were spaced around the original area like branch-less concrete trees, a very odd sight.

#It's at least four hundred metres in diameter, Nabiki, and a minimum of eight kilometres away from us, perhaps three kilometres above the floor. The readings I'm getting are extremely strange, but as far as I can determine there is a spacial expansion spell, very similar to the subspace storage spell the D'Sage use so much, on the basement. It is wildly more powerful than anything I've seen before, though. The internal space of the basement is effectively now measurable in tens of cubic kilometres at least.# Jun sounded both impressed and mystified.

'But what is it?' she asked numbly, still looking up. There was the sensation of something nearly shrugging.

#I don't know.#

Eventually, Ranma tore his fascinated gaze away from the impossible sight, looking at his wife, who was holding his hand and gaping. "We need to check the ward system, I think. It's the only thing that could explain this... this... whatever the hell this is." She nodded, not looking away from the thing for several more seconds. When she did, she stared at him with an expression of shock. The two of them moved a few metres away then did whatever it was they did to bring up the ward interface, which faded into view. Once more, everyone gaped in awe.

The interface was, as usual, a weirdly beautiful sight that stretched away far further than seemed possible, oddly coloured patterns of magic moving and circling about them, reaching out little streamers which played across their skin with an oddly comforting sensation, but now, with room to expand, it looked far larger. Reaching up and out from them it faded away into the distance, making the space they were in look small, somehow, as if it stretched out into more dimensions than the normal three. Nabiki reflected on the thought that this was certainly the case, although in the practice room it wasn't quite so obvious. Even there it seemed to be much too large to fit, but here it was still too big, which was just peculiar.

Ranma studied it with his wife without saying anything for quite a long time. Both of them were looking more and more stunned. Eventually he turned to look at her, the pair communing wordlessly for a minute or two while the others watched and waited. Finally they shook their heads, turning to the rest while holding hands, small smiles of awe and pleasure on their faces.

"So what is it?" Nabiki asked, reassured by the smiles, yet still desperately curious. She could see everyone else was feeling much the same.

"It's magical energy, more or less," Kasumi told them. "The ward system did something truly incredible." She looked up for a moment. "You were right, Ami, it did access magic from all over the planet. It expanded the wards to cover the entire world, which used a large amount of the energy it had available, having detected the threat the time device posed and deciding that protecting the building wasn't enough. That was what it came up with to get around the rules we set to keep it from doing anything spectacular outside the wards." She laughed, shaking her head in wonder. "I missed that completely but it's a good loophole. Expanding the wards to cover the planet meant everything in the world was inside the zone it could act on."

"Holy crap," Fumiko muttered. She was pale when Nabiki glanced at her. "It could attack anything, anywhere, whenever it felt like it, all this time?"

"No, I don't think so," Ranma replied, looking thoughtfully up at the patterns moving about them. The sense of mild guilt Nabiki was still feeling from the system had strengthened a little, making her wonder if it was listening to them and getting embarrassed. "It needed a truly world-ending problem to make it even attempt this sort of thing in the first place. It knew damn well it was violating the spirit of the rules even if it was technically barely inside the letter of them, but it looks like it was genuinely scared that something horrible was happening. It was right, of course. I very much doubt that without a threat on the scale of the time machine it would ever have tried to do what it did. If nothing else, it was a serious risk to the thing, it burned through a lot of its energy running up to full power like that. Under normal circumstances the risk versus gain equation would have prevented it doing anything so spectacular."

"According to the logs it first reinforced the wards around the building to a truly incredible level when it detected the beginnings of the time loop," the elder sister said, studying one of the patterns of magic while gently manipulating it. "But it quickly worked out that wouldn't be enough. It looks like that must have been almost exactly the same time we opened the portal to the sub-reality. Seconds after that it started expanding the wards, around when we began firing the ki beam through the portal. The expansion took perhaps twenty or thirty seconds until it covered the entire planet."

"I'd say it was originally intending to only go as far as the middle of China, looking at this," Ranma mused, "but by the time it got that far it realised it didn't take a lot more power to keep going."

"Where did it get the energy from?" Aiko asked curiously. "After it expanded the wards, I mean." He moved some of the patterns around then stared at the results, before laughing.

"Everywhere." They all looked at him, so he continued. "It was aiming for Jusenkyo, it seems, but it found a lot of other places in the process." Shaking his head in awed respect, he studied whatever it was he was looking at, his eyebrows up. Beside him, Kasumi pointed something out, making him nod in surprise. After a moment, he went on, "It sucked all the magic out of Jusenkyo, half a dozen more places in China and Russia, dozens of sites in the UK and Ireland, all over Europe as well..." Husband and wife moved magical controls for a moment.
"Hmm. This must be in Canada. Way up past the Arctic circle," he surmised, indicating something to Kasumi, who nodded after a moment.

"I think so. I wonder what it was? It had quite a lot of power although nothing anywhere near the level of Jusenkyo."

"No idea. And look, this one was in the middle of the Pacific somewhere under water. Weird." He shrugged a little. "We may have to look into that some time. Anyway, it also got power from Australia, this must be Uluru, a lot of places in South and Central America, all over the place really. I'd think it was probably every last drop of magic that wasn't being used for something else from what I can see here. It seems to have been careful not to steal anything that was being used, interestingly enough."

Ami had gone as pale as Fumiko had earlier. "That's an absolutely terrifying amount of energy," she said slowly. He nodded.

"Damn right. I doubt anything, any time in history, has ever had quite so much energy available in one go. Then it sent it through the portal Kas opened to us. I felt it take over powering the ward we had set up right at the point I was going to fall over, then what it did with Hotaru's weapon..." The martial artist made a gesture of shock. "You wouldn't believe how much energy went through that thing. The really scary thought is that it could have applied more power, quite a lot more, but it was worried the Glaive would melt in the process."

The group was silent for a moment, just trying to wrap their minds around the enormity of what they'd heard. A few seconds passed in silence, then Misaki asked, pointing up, "But that doesn't explain that. Or all of this." She indicated the impossibly expanded basement.

"What happened next does, sort of," Ranma told her. He looked up at the sphere of energy high overhead with an expression of amazement. "The most powerful attack Hotaru's weapon is capable of seems to be some sort of distortion or disruption field that causes things to basically fall apart. From what I found when I was examining it on the ship, that's a last resort type of thing, an attack designed to ensure a pyrrhic victory, I suppose. It would probably kill the user as well, but it would kill everything in range. Put enough power into it and you could wipe out a continent, or even more." Hotaru gasped, looking shaken and worried. Rei put her arm around her.

"But in this case, the system managed to direct the attack through the portal, as well as putting a huge amount of power behind it, far more than the thing was meant to handle. Almost all the available magic on Earth flowed through that weapon. It's not surprising the time device died on the spot. More or less anything would. The distortion wave was so powerful it started ripping the entire sub-reality to pieces. Yrenti's warheads were just icing on the cake by that point." He glanced at his wife, who dismissed the ward interface, which gently faded from view. "The really interesting thing is what happened next. It looks like it realised that as the sub-reality came apart all the magic that had been used to create it and keep it stable, as well as a lot that had been released when the time device exploded, was just sitting there. It got a little greedy." He snickered.

Kasumi picked up the explanation, smiling. "As far as we can work out the system saw all that free energy, which was much more than the amount it had gathered from our planet, and decided it should collect as much as it could. By the looks of it, it managed to suck up almost all of it before the sub-reality collapsed. It stored as much as possible then put the rest back where it had found it from in the first place. In fact from what we can see quite a lot more went back than it had borrowed."

Ranma chuckled a little. "Those so-called 'druids' who do ceremonies at Stonehenge on the solstices are likely to get a bit of a surprise if their rituals are anywhere near correct," he said, amused. "There's enough power there now to make some of them work again." Looking up at the 'star' for a moment, he grinned. "There was far too much power for the normal methods the system uses to store it. So it got creative again. That's the result. I think it stole the idea from the time device with some modifications based on spells and techniques we use. It's a very neat bit of work."

Everyone looked at the ball of energy, astounded. "So, it's like the biggest ki ball in the universe?" Tamiko asked after a moment. He shrugged, grinning.

"More or less. Not quite ki, not quite magic, a lot like our version of magic but slightly different. Calling it the life energy of the building wouldn't be completely wrong, but not completely right either, it's still not really alive in normal terms, although it's getting closer. There's an awful lot of it as well. It's not going to need to take any from us any more, not for a long time." He thought about the matter for a moment. "More or less forever, I think."

"Weird," Misaki finally said, biting into an apple. They all looked at her. She shrugged.

After a moment, Nabiki asked incredulously, "So, that's it? We have a basement you could lose Mount Horai in, if you hadn't blown it up in the first place, with it's own star lighting it? Isn't that a little odd even for us?"

"What can I say? Magic is weird, you know that." Ranma smiled at her. She shook her head slowly, turning and looking around.

"Is it safe?" Hotaru asked, still seeming slightly pale. He glanced at her.

"Should be. It's stable as far as we can see, as is the expansion spell. One is powering the other."

"Cool." The girl recovered her colour, grinning at him happily. "Can we get some trees in? And a lake? It would be a nice place to fly, or swim." He chuckled, after a surprised look at her.

"I suppose that's not impossible." Laughing, Fumiko looked at her sister, both of them suddenly taking on the flying form and leaping into the air. Ten seconds later all of them were flying around the impossibly large basement, exploring it.

In the end they determined that the expansion spell had stretched the room into something better than fifteen kilometres on a side, over four high. Where it had got the air from that was filling it was anyone's guess. Ranma and Kasumi spent a couple of hours studying the spells very carefully to end up deciding that it was definitely stable in the long term. It looked like a basement one could build a city in was now a permanent feature of the building.

The energy ball in the middle of the space was over four hundred metres across, giving off enough heat that no one but Ranma could get closer than a hundred metres to it and even the martial artist couldn't go too close. They found the corona surrounding it was safe, though, producing a nice tingling sensation when they flew through it, a feeling of relaxing energy flowing through them in the process. The temperature in the new space had stabilised at a pleasant twenty-five degrees by the time they regrouped near the elevator. Dismissing the illusion spell he'd placed on Ami, Rei, and Hotaru, Ranma reverted to his male form, then led them inside the elevator.

On the way up, Tamiko giggled. "Does anyone else have trouble believing what we just did?" There a chorus of agreement and a lot of looks of astonishment. "I mean, how does it even work? We go down one floor, yet we're somehow at ground level in a space over four kilometres high?"

"Subspace storage is odd at the best of times, when you think about what it's doing," Kasumi laughed. "I've come across it inside buildings before, and of course it gets used for all sorts of less spectacular purposes, on a lot of worlds, but on that scale it's somewhat awe inspiring." The doors opened and they all got out, heading back into the apartment.

Sitting down around the room, they exchanged glances. "So, what are we going to do with a few dozen cubic kilometres of basement?" Aiko asked. There was a long pause.

"No idea." Ranma smiled at her. "But if nothing else we're not going to be short on storage space for a while."

"True," she mused, grinning. "Hey! We have somewhere for Fumiko to keep a spacecraft, now." The relevant young woman looked startled, then pleased.

"How would we get it in and out?" Tamiko asked curiously. "It wouldn't fit in the elevator."

"We're not keeping spacecraft in the basement," Kasumi said firmly.

"Aww," Fumiko mumbled, her face falling, while beside her, Misaki giggled a little.

"We could let the soarers loose in it," she suggested. "Loads of room there for them."

"No." The eldest sister stared hard at the other woman, as Nabiki and the others laughed. Ami, Rei, and Hotaru were looking confused.

"What are soarers?" Hotaru enquired. "You mentioned them before, on the island." Nabiki sent her and the other two one of her recordings from the holiday. "Oh, they're so cute!" the girl squealed, clapping her hands.

"And a lot of fun to fly with," Nabiki told her. "Very smart animals."

"I can see where some of the flying form came from," Ami noted, interested, as she studied the recording. "And the patterning as well."

"They're fascinating animals," the elder Tendo responded, nodding. "As Nabiki says, very intelligent, I'd guess somewhere around the level of a dolphin or perhaps a chimpanzee. Their metabolism is extremely efficient, the bone, muscle and tendon strength is enormous, not to mention the remarkably effective oxygen transport mechanism and a number of other things. I learned a lot from studying them."

"We'll have to introduce you to them soon," Nabiki suggested. She glanced at Ranma. "We should contact Uthryyl and let him know what happened as well."

Nodding, the martial artist frowned slightly. "Yes. He's been out of the loop on a lot of this but he should know. Before that, though, we need to talk to Yrenti and Lldnr'k, let Hnther know the threat is over and also find out about Usagi and the others, talk to Masao..." He sighed. "Still a lot to do, but at least the most serious part is finally out of the way. After that everything else should be easy. I hope."

"One thing I don't understand about all of this is why hardly anyone remembers what happened," Aiko said. They all looked at her, then Ranma and Kasumi. These two glanced at each other.

"I'm not sure," Ranma finally answered, putting his arm around his wife as she leaned against him. "We know it was a time machine, we know it was right in the middle of starting a loop in time when it was destroyed. I can guess that has something to do with it but I'm not at all sure of the mechanics of it. Lldnr'k might be able to work it out, it's his field."
"The memory glitch is odd," Ami mused out loud. "I've asked around and it's pretty much everyone. Something like thirty seconds is just gone, immediately before the universal twitch everyone felt. But as far as I can tell, it's actually about two or three minutes that got reset. Like the whole time we were on the dead world fighting the time device just got deleted. No one seems to have run a car into a tree because they couldn't remember what they were doing, or anything like that. It's very odd." She looked at Ranma. "I'm also intrigued by the way Masao remembers it. Rei's grandfather remembers as well, which doesn't surprise me. The only other people I came across who did were a couple of mages I know slightly. They were extremely confused by what had happened and also very worried."

She sighed. "I told them that it was over, but I couldn't think of a good way to explain it properly. I didn't think it was a good idea to tell the truth, not until I checked with you guys."

"Probably best not to say too much until we actually know what happened, if we ever do," Ranma sighed again. "There are a lot of people who will want to know, but I'm not sure telling them everything would be a good idea, people tend to get panicky about little things like the universe nearly being destroyed."

"No idea why," Misaki chuckled. He grinned for a moment. "Me either. We'll tell Masao, I think, we can trust him aside from the security spell, and we'll have to let certain people know some of it. I've already got messages left from Richard, Laura, that Williamson guy at MI5, and Sergeant Harada, all wanting to know if I have any idea what happened."

"We could let the PSIA handle it," Kasumi suggested. He nodded.

"We probably should for the most part. I think we should talk to Ldnn'r'k first, then go and see Yrenti again. I still have a lot of questions for him and I'm sure he has some for us."

"Are you going to tell Ldnn'r'k everything?" Nabiki asked him. "I mean, about who you guys really are, the illusion spell, the whole thing?" He looked at her for a moment, considering the question.

"Would you be all right with him knowing about you?"

It was her turn to think for a while. "I think so, yes. He knows about Ami and the others, you've known him for several years and trust him, and he put himself in harm's way over this whole stupid affair. He deserves to know."

Ranma nodded slowly, glancing around at everyone else, who one after another nodded as well. "OK. We'll let him in on it. What about Hnther? He's certainly come through for us several times."

"I think we should probably wait until all the issues with Ami's team are sorted out," Kasumi suggested. "I like Hnther a lot and I think he can probably be trusted, but it might confuse the issue if we open up to him right now. At least wait a few months." Her husband thought about it for a little while while everyone waited.

"OK," he said again. "That's reasonable." He laughed a little. "It's weird, we've been keeping these secrets for nearly five years but all of a sudden we seem to be letting everyone know."

"Hardly everyone, dear," Kasumi smiled. "Only a few very trusted friends." Ami exchanged glances with Rei and Hotaru, all of them looking pleased.

Aiko yawned widely, causing Fumiko and Tamiko to immediately do the same, and Hotaru to laugh as a result. "God, I'm still so tired," the petite woman said quietly. "I'm tempted to go back to
"It's nearly eight now," Kasumi noted. "I suggest that everyone who doesn't need to go should stay behind while Ranma and I talk to Lldnr'k. We can do the rest tomorrow, there's no huge hurry, not any more."

Ami glanced at Rei, then Hotaru, both the others nodding. "I should get home anyway, Mom is going to be worried. I've hardly seen her since we got back from the Moon." She laughed slightly sadly. "Do you realise it's only been two weeks since everything went to hell?" They all looked at her for a moment.

"No, that can't be right," Fumiko said slowly, working it out. "It's been at least...

"Exactly two weeks," her sister finished, shaking her head.

"Good grief," Aiko muttered, thinking it over. "It feels like four or five months."

Ranma nodded, smiling a little. "We certainly got a lot done. Stopped a major magical girl fight, visited the moon, stopped an asteroid from destroying civilisation, discovered all the money in the solar system and took it away to another reality, met the makers of the SIs, or one of them at least, then saved the universe and nearly died in the process. Not bad for two weeks work. Although I think I'm nearly ready for another vacation."

"What will we do next week?" Tamiko asked, grinning.

"Same thing we do every week? Try to take over the world?" Rei suggested, giggling, causing her to fall over laughing.

"Like we said before, it's too much work," Nabiki snickered. "And I've got to get back to university in two weeks or so."

Laughing, Aiko and her team headed to their various beds, having decided that they were still just too tired to visit Lldnr'k, Ami and her friends went home, Hotaru still giggling, leaving two Tendos and a Saotome in the suddenly much less crowded apartment. The three remaining people looked at each other. "Coffee first?" Kasumi asked, receiving a pair of approving looks. Smiling, she got up and headed for the kitchen.

Looking up from her book, Haruka smiled in relief when Hotaru came in, putting the book down quickly and jumping to her feet. "Thank god you're all right," she said, grabbing the girl and hugging her. "I was really worried. What happened? I felt something incredibly dangerous yesterday afternoon."

Hotaru smiled back at her, putting her own arms around the older woman. "We won. It's dead." Haruka sighed, feeling a knot of tension and fear finally dissolve, one she hadn't quite known was there until it was gone. Holding Hotaru she shook with relief for some time.

Eventually releasing her, she stared into her eyes for a moment, then smiled more widely. "Come on, dear, tell me what happened. Are you hungry? We could go out for a meal afterwards."

"I'm still very tired and I've eaten an awful lot today, but I could eat some more, I think," the girl giggled. "Then sleep a lot."

"That sounds like a good plan," she replied, laughing. "Tomorrow we look for somewhere to live. I'll need your help."
"Sure, it could be fun." They headed for the sofa, sitting down facing each other, then Hotaru began telling her female father everything she could. It took a long time.

"How are you feeling now?" the old priest asked gently, looking carefully at Rei as he brought her a cup of tea. "You look tired."

"I'm fine, grandfather," she assured him. "It's been a long day, though, and yesterday was longer. I'm looking forward to an early night and not having to get out of bed until I want to."

Laughing, he sat down with his own tea. "And the others? Have they recovered yet?"

"Mostly, yes. Yori send her greetings. She said she'd stop by some time in the next few days to talk, but they still have quite a lot of clean up work to do, talking to various people in the government and things like that. She's a little worried about exactly what to say, I know, so she'll be fairly busy for a couple of days at least." She sipped her tea appreciatively, then put the cup down again. "Ami and Hotaru went home as well. We're all planning on relaxing for a while, nothing serious if we can help it. No magical girl stuff except for emergencies."

He patted her hand, looking amused. "I don't think the world would begrudge you all a break after your recent activities, my girl, not at all. You certainly deserve some time off."

Rei nodded, smiling. "I'd like to think so."

They were silent for a while, just enjoying each other's company. Eventually the old man asked curiously, "What is the current situation with the others from your old team?"

She sighed a little, placing her empty cup back into its saucer. "Ami and Hotaru are fine, of course. Last time I saw her, Haruka was looking depressed but other than that not too bad. Yori said she seemed quite a lot better a couple of days ago. Hopefully the destruction of the time machine and the removal of its influence will allow her to improve."

"That seems possible, certainly," he agreed.

"Minako is surprisingly well after what happened with her and Usagi," she went on. He looked enquiringly at her, making her remember he hadn't been told what did happen, so she related the story. He alternated between worry and laughter as it went on.

"Oh dear," he commented when she finished. "Poor Usagi. I'm impressed by Tamiko's resourcefulness, though, even though it was a somewhat extreme solution."

"They didn't have a lot of choice from what I know," Rei replied, frowning a little. "Usagi was totally out of control and dragging Minako with her. Something horrific was going to happen, I'm sure of that, so it's a damn good thing she was stopped first."

"I'm forced to agree." He shook his head sadly. "And poor Luna and Artemis as well. I've heard the names before but I always thought they were friends of you girls I hadn't met yet. I had no idea about the truth."

"No one did, not even them," Rei sighed. "It was an awful shock. Artemis looked like he was about to pass out, the only reason he didn't is that he can't."

"Do you think they can be helped?"

She shrugged helplessly. "I have no idea. I really hope so, though. It's way outside my experience."
Everyone else's as well, I think, but if anyone can work out a solution it's probably Yori or Chou."

"Most likely," he agreed, nodding. "I hope they do."

"Setsuna is still in stasis, Hnther is trying to work out the best method to help her. Michiru and Makoto are the only ones they haven't talked to yet, although did have to go and have a word with Makoto who was getting a little excessive in the way she was treating criminals." Rei smirked slightly. "Apparently it was extremely funny. Makoto ran like a scared rabbit afterwards."

"You shouldn't take pleasure in the troubles of others," her grandfather said, looking stern, but then laughed. "Even if it was funny." She giggled.

"She'll be OK. But she needed to be persuaded to stop hitting people so hard before something bad happened."

"Agreed. I'd heard the young lady was becoming slightly overenthusiastic, I have to admit." The priest shook his head sadly. "Ah well. Hopefully, now that the machine is gone, as you said perhaps your former team-mates will improve and begin to rebuild their reputations. We can only hope so."

They talked for some time before Rei headed off for an early night, leaving her grandfather sitting in the living room pondering life with a small smile on his face.

"You're back at last," Ami's mother said, smiling as she came in the door to find her daughter in the living room watching the news, which was covering the odd sensation everyone had felt the day before. A couple of experts were giving their opinion, which she knew from seeing the lunch-time news was mostly 'We don't have a clue' only dressed up rather more verbosely than that. Ami looked at her and nodded.

"I am. Sorry about running off like that then staying away overnight but something came up."

Taking her coat off, Saeko hung it up, then removed her shoes and put them away, replacing them with slippers, before joining her daughter on the sofa in front of the TV. She put her arm around the girl who leaned against her with a smile, stroking her head a couple of times. "I'm glad you're back. I've barely seen you for nearly a week now."

"Sorry, Mom. It's been a little stressful, you know, friends with problems, things like that. Although the trip was a lot of fun." Ami grinned. They watched the interviewer ask some fairly penetrating and apt questions, causing the two experts to shift uncomfortably in their seats while obviously trying not to say they had no good answer. Saeko smiled a little at the expressions.

"They clearly know nothing about it at all," she observed, amused yet slightly worried at the same time. "No one seems to have a good explanation." Taking a quick look at her daughter, she asked casually, "What do you think it was?"

Shaking her head, the blue-haired young woman shrugged. "I'm not sure. All the reports sound very strange. Even for Minato. Perhaps something to do with some weird demon attack?"

"Possible, I suppose," her mother mused. "It certainly suggests some magical cause was behind it, as odd as that sounds. Strange things do happen here, I know that, what with all the magical girls running around, as well as the demons. I've heard that there are quite a lot of them walking around openly now, apparently just visiting, in some areas of the ward." She laughed a little. "I never thought that would happen I have to admit. It's very peculiar."
"People don't seem to worried about it these days." Ami looked at her mother for a moment, before going back to watching the TV, which was now reporting on the latest in the ongoing case against Anthony Murray in Canada. Saeko studied her for a few seconds.

"True, very true," she eventually replied. "So many odd things happening. Those magical girls destroying that mall like that, for example, then that other girl, what's her name, Yori, and her friends stopping them destroying those apartment buildings. She sounds like she's a rather formidable young woman from what the news says." Indicating the news program, she added, "Just look at that, for example. They say she and some other girls she works with were involved in that case, and several others all around the world." Shaking her head, she sighed a little. "I expect their parents are proud of their achievements."

"I suppose so," Ami commented, not looking away from the television.

"Assuming that their parents even know, of course," her mother went on, watching the news with her. "I believe that most magical girls and people like that tend to be very secretive about their activities."

"That's what I hear," the girl agreed, smiling slightly, which Saeko could see out of the corner of her eye.

"One can understand why, I suppose. It could be difficult for the families in some cases, there are all sorts of possible issues that might arise. It's probably something similar to working for the government or the security services. Or being a doctor. There might be secrets that could cause real problems if they became known to the public at large. People can be... difficult... with things they don't understand." She laughed a little sadly. "I almost feel sorry for the poor girls, not being able to talk to their families about what they do. I think it would be a hard burden to carry."

After a couple of seconds, Ami nodded. "I think you're probably right. It's not something I've considered much before, but it makes sense."

Her mother sighed a little. "Poor girls. Now I'm feeling a little sad. A daughter should be able to trust her parents, although I can understand why in a lot of cases that might not happen." She stood up. "Fancy some tea and a few snacks?"

"Yes, please," Ami said, looking pleased. She watched as her mother went into the kitchen, both of them smiling a little although for different reasons.

"Ah, my friends, I am very relieved to see you are all in good health after that rather extraordinary experience, I was somewhat worried," Lldn'r said happily as 'Yori', 'Chou', and 'Azumi' entered his workshop. "I trust the others are also well?"

"They're fine, thanks," 'Yori' replied, nodding and smiling. "Aiko and her girls decided they were just too tired still to come, although they asked me to pass on their thanks for all the help you gave us. They'll be up to talking in a day or two. Ami, Rei, and Hotaru went home because they were very tired as well and to see their families." She yawned slightly, covering her mouth. "To be honest we're all pretty exhausted as well but we needed to talk. We'll go and see Yrenti and Hnther tomorrow, though, not today."

"I hope you didn't have any problems getting back?" 'Chou' asked. "I'm very sorry I couldn't make a portal for you yesterday but I was on the verge of passing out at that point." The temporal mage clicked his beak with amusement, waving one taloned hand dismissively.
"Please don't worry about it, my dear. It was no problem. I spend several fascinating hours talking to Yrenti and a pair of colleagues of his about their history, that of the time device, and several other subjects. It was a remarkable experience. He asked me to reiterate that you're all welcome at any point. Kw'lyn Industries seems to believe it owes you a lot, as does Yrenti personally. He looked very happy."

"I can imagine he would be based on what we were told. To think that they've been looking for that damn thing for thirty-five thousand years is... well, it's humbling, to be honest," 'Azumi' stated, shaking her head a little. "I can still barely believe we only came across it two weeks ago."

"A lot has happened in a very short time," the mage agreed. "But that's what happens sometimes. A very long build up then everything comes to a conclusion very quickly. I'm just glad that the whole thing is finally over. Anyone in my field has heard of that damn machine and worried about it turning up." He looked relieved. "That's not going to happen now. A lot of people are going to be very pleased. Oh, and I'm going to get a serious paper out of it as well, which will be nice." They laughed as he gained an alien but recognisable smug expression.

"I'm glad that our efforts will result in your reputation increasing," 'Yori' joked.

"But of course you are," he replied haughtily, his beak lifted a little, in a manner that made 'Azumi' nearly crack up. It was remarkably close to the effect Tatewaki Kuno could pull off, which considering the totally different species, was impressive. Glancing at her sister and sister-in-law she saw they'd spotted it as well and were trying not to laugh. Lldnr'k held the pose for a moment, then looked amused. "So, tell me, what can I do for you? Assuming this isn't just a social visit, although I'm more than happy to accommodate you whenever you wish to drop in."

"We thought you deserved to know more about what happened at the end," 'Chou' told him after a quick look at her husband, who nodded. "It does bring up a number of other things that we keep very private, though. After discussing it we decided that we all felt we could trust you with the information."

"I'm honoured you feel that way although you certainly don't owe me an explanation," Lldnr'k responded after a considering look. "I can live with the curiosity. I certainly don't want to intrude on your privacy or threaten your security."

'Yori' smiled a little. "Thank you, we appreciate the trust, but you deserve to know. You came through for us at considerable personal risk, you've put a lot of work into the whole thing, the least we can do is explain the bits you don't know." She looked around for a moment. ".But I don't think here is the best place. Would you like to come back to our home? It will take a couple of hours to go over it all." She thought for a moment. "And there's something I'd like your opinion on, as well. You'll need to see it."

The time mage inspected her, then nodded slowly. "That sounds... very intriguing. I accept your offer. Just let me make arrangements to be away for a while again." He went off to talk to some of his colleagues.

"How do you think he's going to take it?" 'Azumi' asked the other two. 'Yori' shrugged slightly, smiling a little.

"I'm not sure but I expect he'll deal with it all right. But he's probably going to be a little surprised." They all laughed for a moment.

As soon as the mage returned, a portal popped open next to them. 'Yori' waved to it. "Shall we?"
"I'm looking forward to it with both anticipation and fear," Lldnr'k joked, following her through it. The two Tendo sisters grinned at each other, bringing up the rear.

"Do you have any idea yet what it was?" Shampoo asked her great-grandmother as they watched the news. She shook her head.

"No, I'm afraid not, child, beyond what we learned this morning. It was certainly something extraordinary, astounding powerful and most likely very dangerous, but while we have several theories there's no real evidence for any of them. Beyond the fact that something borrowed an absolutely ungodly amount of magical energy, probably from all over the world if what I hear is correct, did... something... with it, then returned it with a substantial excess, we have no idea." Cologne sighed. "I don't know if we'll ever get the whole story. Perhaps that's for the best. It was clearly far past our ability to affect and possibly understand."

She smiled a little nastily. "I believe both Herb and Saffron have been looking into it as well. From what I gather they were extremely unsettled by the whole thing. Saffron is reportedly wandering around looking shell-shocked, the amount of power involved makes him look insignificant, which must have been humbling. If he'd gotten in the way he would have been crushed flat without whatever it was even slowing down." She chuckled. "I never liked the bastard, so I have to admit it amuses me."

Shampoo laughed, glancing at the old woman. Returning her attention to the news she laughed again. "I don't think these people have the faintest idea what they're talking about," she said, grinning while indicating the news segment.

"Not a clue, although they're trying to hide that by talking a lot," the Elder agreed with smirk. "I suspect that if they did find out they still wouldn't understand it, or believe it. It's those strange magical terrorist attacks from earlier this year all over again, only much worse."

"There seem to be a lot of odd magical things happening on a large scale all of a sudden," the lilac-haired warrior noted.

"True. Most of them seem to have Yori and Chou mixed up with them somewhere as well," Cologne agreed. She looked pensive. "I wonder if they're involved in this latest one."

"I can't see how, from what you said it was impossibly powerful. I know they're impressive but are they that strong?"

"Again, I have no real idea." Cologne sighed again, shaking her head a little, going on, "I suppose it's possible but it didn't feel quite like what I've seen of their magic. Both are very unusual but this event was... well, it didn't feel like anything I've ever felt before, not even remotely."

"They'll be at Nodoka's garden party, which Akane said would be sometime soon, in a few days, I think," Shampoo said. "We're all invited as well. You could ask them."

"I could. But whether they'd tell me...?" The Elder shrugged. "Worth a try I suppose."

Both of them fell silent once more, watching the remainder of the news. Once it finished they went downstairs to get ready for the evening rush in the café.

Nabiki watched Lldnr'k as he stared at her, then Ranma and Kasumi, then went back to her. Only his head moved, rotating back and forth, until she felt like she was watching someone watching a tennis match. Eventually, he simply stared straight ahead, blinking, his beak half-open, as he visibly tried to come to terms with everything he'd been told over the last two hours. The demonstration of the illusion spell seemed to have been the part that really broke him.

Slightly worried, she glanced at the others, who were also watching. Ranma looked at her and shrugged. "Hey, Lldnr'k? Are you all right?" There was no response for some seconds but eventually the mage slowly turned to look at him. He inspected the martial artist very carefully.

"Do that again," he requested in a numb sort of voice. Ranma raised an eyebrow, then turned female, paused a couple of seconds, shimmered into 'Yori', then after another few seconds reverted back to his birth form. The expression didn't change even though the face under it did. Lldnr'k twitched a couple of times, gaping, then snapped his beak shut with a click.

"All right, I can definitely say that whatever I was expecting, this isn't it," he finally said, his voice deliberately calm.

"Sorry about confusing you," Ranma said, smiling a little.

"Oh, you've been confusing me for as long as I've known you, trust me," their visitor replied, still staring fixedly at him. "At the moment I am far past confused. I find myself having to resort to bewilderment." They all laughed for a moment as he stared some more, finally shaking his head. "Extraordinary. There's no other way to put it. And you're teaching the others these abilities as well?"

"Yes. It's going very well so far with Nabiki, Aiko, and her team, although it remains to be seen how Ami and the others will do with it." Kasumi smiled, pleased. "We still don't know why our method seems to be incompatible with traditional mages, although there is a lot of evidence to suggest that's the case. Whether it will apply to them I don't know although the initial signs suggest it may well not."

"I suspect that there is some manner in which the ability of the mind to perceive the multiple-dimensionality of your method is eradicated by normal methods once the practitioner is past a certain point," he replied absently, staring at her, then Nabiki, as if he was trying to memorise their faces. The middle sister suspected that was indeed the case. "It's a known fact that the process of learning to use magic at more than a basic level causes changes to the brain of the individual in question on a slight but very fundamental level, although how much and in exactly which way differs slightly from case to case and species to species. That might well explain it."

She nodded slowly, thinking about his words. "It's something to investigate one day. It would be interesting to find out if that's the case, and if so it can be reversed. Our method is much more efficient than any of the normal methods we've encountered although I'll admit it's more difficult to learn initially. The substantial advantages outweigh that by a large margin, though, I think."

"It probably can't be reversed without seriously damaging the individual in question," he said, seeming suddenly very interested in the subject. "Although I may be wrong. It would be very difficult even if it was possible. It's not really my field. But I'm not at all surprised that Yrenti was so fascinated by seeing your magical system at work. If indeed you've come up with something new, it would be a very valuable thing. I will agree that it seems to be far more efficient than the more common methods. I'm more and more impressed every time I see you at work."

"Thank you, Lldnr'k." Kasumi smiled. "That's very nice to hear from a mage of your level."

"Ah, flattery. That always works," he laughed, looking less shocked, although he kept looking at them weirdly for a while. After a moment he leaned back on the sofa, shaking his head a little. "You people are... somewhat unusual."
Laughing, Nabiki pointed to her sister and brother in law. "They're the weird ones. They just dragged me into it. I didn't even see it coming until it was too late."

"My sympathies," he chuckled. "Having known 'Yori' for some years I can well see how that might happen." Ranma looked mildly insulted while his wife giggled. "Thank you for letting me into your confidence," he continued. "Even with the security spell it's a privilege to know the truth."

"I hope this won't affect our friendship," the martial artist stated, looking slightly worried. "I like you a lot and would much prefer to stay on good terms."

"Oh, don't concern yourself, please, Ranma," Lldnr'k replied, shaking his head. "It won't cause any problems at all. As you said, you are you all the time despite what the outside looks like. It's the person inside that counts. Your remarkable shape-shifting spell and incredible acting abilities don't change the person I'm proud to call a friend." He looked at the women. "That goes for both of you as well. It was, and is, something of a shock on several levels, but it doesn't really change much in the grand scheme of things."

"Thank you, Lldnr'k," Kasumi told him, smiling. "You are an honoured friend and it was something we were worried about."

He made the equivalent of a smile back at her. "Thank you," he replied.

"There aren't many people who know the whole truth about us," she said, "and in the last few days we've nearly doubled it. It would be nice to not have to keep so many secrets but there are a lot of issues surrounding being more open."

"I do understand that, believe me, Kasumi," he assured her. "I can see a lot of them for myself with only a little thought. I don't blame you for being so careful. I would probably do the same under the circumstances. You all seem to have had a very complex life up until now."

"It's not been ideal in many ways," she replied sadly. "Although, since we left Nerima, it improved out of all recognition. Despite some of the less pleasant parts I wouldn't change anything."

Ranma stood up. "Now that's explained, I'd like to show you something and see what you think." Lldnr'k, looking intrigued, also stood, followed by the two sisters, all three of them following the martial artist out of the apartment and into the elevator.

"This is an impressive place to live," the mage noted, looking around curiously.

"Thanks," Ranma said, "We'll show you around later." Pressing the button for the basement he waited as the doors closed.

"That security system is extremely impressive as well," Lldnr'k added, slightly nervously. "I can feel it watching me even though you told it I was friendly."

"It watches everyone, all the time," Kasumi told him soothingly. "It's only keeping an eye on you to make sure you're safe. As a known friend you fall under the category of someone to protect whenever possible. Not quite to the same level as someone who is part of the system, admittedly, but no harm will come to you inside the wards."

"It has essentially four levels of classification," Ranma added. "User, that's us, Friendly, that's someone we have told it is to be considered safe, Non-Hostile, which is what it marks anyone it considers neutral, and Hostile. That last category wouldn't last long inside the wards."

"I assume that the difference between Hostile and Non-Hostile is keyed on actions?" the mage asked curiously.

"Pretty much. It's rather paranoid, to be honest, a good trait in a security system, and as a result it always tends to think of Non-hostile as merely Hostile that hasn't quite done anything sufficiently provocative yet. We're trying to work out how to make it slightly less ready to paint a target on someone it takes a dislike to. It's difficult, the thing is so complicated now that making changes has become seriously involved."

"We found a bug in it some time ago, just after Nabiki arrived, that would have been extremely bad if it had acted in our defence," Kasumi told him. "That's why we had to lock out the external defences almost entirely. It's not subtle, by and large, if it decided to deal with a threat it wouldn't stop until there was no chance of the threat ever coming back. With the power it had available even a year ago that would have been... not at all good."

Lldnr'k shuddered a little. "I can well imagine," he said in a low voice. "I can feel the power at the moment. It's... awe-inspiring. As is what it managed to do to the time device."

"That took us by surprise," Ranma admitted as the elevator stopped and the doors opened. They got out. "So did this."

Lldnr'k stared.

He looked around, then up, then over his shoulder at the others, then up again. "Um..."

Closing his beak he slowly looked all around him, then got back into the elevator, inspecting it closely, before coming out once more and staring hard at the wall. Moving his eyes up the impossibly tall structure, he scratched it gently with one talon then examined the results. Stepping back he tilted his head back, shook it slightly, the feathers fluffing out before lying flat again, closed his eyes for a moment, then turned to look at the huge ball of energy in the distance.

The three other people waited patiently. Eventually he turned to Ranma. "This is... rather bizarre."

The martial artist shrugged. "That's what we thought."

Lldnr'k stared at him for a moment, then went back to examining the surroundings. He asked in a faint voice, "How large is it?"

"About fifteen kilometres square, maybe four high."

"Hmm." There was another long pause. Nabiki and Kasumi looked at each other. "That's impressive. Not the largest I've heard of by a considerable margin, but getting up there for a building."

"We think it's stable long term, but I'd like a second opinion," Ranma said, waving at the vast space in front of them. "It looks like the ward system came up with this as a method of storing all the energy it recovered from the time machine's destruction. It wasn't designed to do that but we've found out it's quite a lot better at working out weird solutions to difficult problems than we expected."

The temporal mage looked up at the 'star'. "That would be the energy in question, I assume?"

"What's left of it. It returned all the power it borrowed along with interest, filled all the normal storage places it had, then came up with this to hold the rest." Looking impressed Ranma followed Lldnr'k's gaze. "It's pretty incredible. And incredibly pretty."
"That it is," the mage acknowledged. Kasumi moved a little further away from them, bringing up the ward interface, which made him jump a little, then stare in fascination. "Oh, my word, that's remarkable," he breathed, inspecting it closely. "What an amazing set of spells. You two did this yourselves?"

"We had help from an old friend, Happosai," Ranma told him. "It was mostly his work to start with, but over the years Kas and I have largely taken it over ourselves, since he's been away travelling for the last three years or so. The system tracks him whenever he's in range so we know he's fine, but he's off in another reality at the moment. He'll turn up sooner or later, he always does." He studied the ward system with some pride. "Sometimes I'm amazed myself that we ended up with all this. It's grown much larger than we ever expected. The level of complexity is incredible."

"Indeed." Lldnr'k studied the patterns of magic moving around them. "Almost unbelievably so. I've never seen anything even remotely similar." He shook his head, blinking a little. "I doubt I'm seeing all of it either, parts of it are very difficult to look at."

Kasumi moved a few patterns around, then pointed to one particular complex nest of magic. "This is the spell creating the spacial expansion," she explained. "It's tapped into the main power conduit over here, then through the ward linkage into the structure of the building over here." She moved her fingers a little making the pattern rotate and warp. Nabiki watched, wondering how they could possibly understand all this, it made the illusion spell look simple, while Lldnr'k studied it, idly stroking his beak with one talon.

"I see. Interesting. That's a variation on the subspace storage spell I've never encountered before. It looks very efficient." He walked around the knot of magical energy, leaning close, examining it carefully for several minutes. "As far as I can see you're right. It seems completely stable. I doubt there's any risk of it collapsing, probably ever." Glancing up at the energy ball in the distance, he added, "It's not as if it's likely to run out of power either, for centuries at least, based on how much it's using and how large that is."

She smiled, dismissing the interface. "Thank you for checking. We were fairly sure but it would be awkward if it suddenly failed."

"I don't think you have anything to worry about, Kasumi," he told her. They got back into the elevator, Nabiki pressing the top button. When they arrived back in the apartment, they showed the mage around, taking him up to the roof garden, which he admired with interest as far as it could be seen under the lights, then showing him the pool.

"Very impressive facilities," he said, looking around. "My species isn't one for water sports, it's not enormously compatible with our feathers you understand, but many are. You have a very nice home."

"We certainly like living here," Ranma admitted, smiling. Nabiki watched, then walked over to the deep end of the pool, glancing at the mage.

"Here's one we didn't show you," she laughed, jumping in and taking on her Azumi mer-form in the process. She swam around for a little while as he stared in astonishment. Floating on the surface, she grinned at him. "What do you think?"

"That... is extremely strange." Studying her for a moment, he turned to Ranma and Kasumi, who were watching with grins on their faces. "How versatile is this spell?"

"Pretty much as far as you want to take it," Ranma replied. He shimmered into the flying Yori form.
as demonstration. "This one is huge fun. Kas and I worked on it together but to be honest it's mostly her work." Staring in amazement the temporal mage walked around her, inspecting her closely, then shook his head in wonder.

"Truly remarkable. I've seen some very impressive shape-shifting spells before but nothing quite like this."

Kasumi giggled, changing in the process, to end up as a perfect duplicate of him. He gaped, his beak dropping open, then closed it with a click. "And that is just disturbing."

"They keep doing the same thing to me," Nabiki told him sympathetically. "It's kind of freaky, especially when there's more than one of them at once."

"We don't know what you mean," the two duplicate Nabiki Tendos that suddenly appeared chorused. Lldnr'k twitched.

"I do," he muttered. They laughed in eerie synchronism before returning to normal, both of them smiling. "Have I said how strange you are yet?"

"Oh, yes," Kasumi assured him happily.

"Good."

Flipping neatly out of the pool with a flick of her tail and reverting to normal once in the air, Nabiki landed on her feet and laughed. "It's a lot to take in."

"You might put it that way," he agreed. They headed back down to the living room, sitting down again, after Kasumi fetched some small snacks. "Well. This has certainly been a very interesting couple of hours or so. Thank you once more for shocking me nearly senseless." He looked amused.

"No problem. I'm happy to do it any time," Ranma laughed.

Nabiki looked at the mage for a moment, then asked the question she'd been mulling over for some time. "Lldnr'k, do you have any idea what caused that memory fault everyone seems to have?"

He turned to her, visibly considering the question for a few seconds. "I'm not completely sure," he began, "but my suspicion is that the time device did indeed manage to start the process of a temporal loop but we interrupted it right as it was beginning. It's possible that a few seconds to a few minutes got looped back before the machine was destroyed, ending the process. A temporal dislocation field large enough to reset everything like that would build fairly slowly, a matter of a few seconds at least, accelerating gradually as it wound up. In theory." He shook his head a little. "Aside from that damn thing no one has ever tried anything on that scale, or at least left any trace if they did, so there are a lot of unknowns. But it's basically possible. We might have been even closer than we realised."

She shuddered a little at the thought of how near it had been. "God. That's terrifying."

"Definitely."

"So, basically, it began a loop, time got all bent out of shape, then when we killed it, everything snapped back into what it should be but something like two to three minutes just... disappeared?" He nodded slowly.

"Essentially, yes. The time in question was for all intents and purposes lost even though it didn't truly loop in the way that was intended. Your ward system isolated everything inside it from this effect while it was covering the planet but when it withdrew, normal time flow reasserted itself, effectively erasing the difference between internal time and external time as it allowed the normal flow to resume. The twitch or jump everyone felt was the loop aborting. It would have created a disturbance in the lowest levels of the universe, I would imagine that it was simultaneously felt everywhere at once. Which is somewhat remarkable when you think about it."

"And the memory fault? It only seems to be about twenty or thirty seconds while the time the wards were doing what they did is about two and a half minutes according to what Ranma said after checking the logs."

"Hmmm. I'm not entirely sure there either. Temporal effects can be quite odd and very nonlinear, with effect preceding cause, for example. There doesn't necessarily have to be a one to one correlation between objective time and subjective time covering that loop, for several reasons that would take all night to explain properly. Also, temporal inertia, of which there would be an almost infinite amount considering the extent of the influence of the device, can cause some very odd results when it nudges things back into place."

"What you're saying is that we'll probably never know exactly," she suggested with a sigh. He nodded, amused.

"Exactly. That is one of the major reasons why time travel and changing the past is such a spectacularly bad idea in the first place, neatly illustrated for us with no real damage. I would suggest not dwelling on it. It will only cause you sleepless nights without good reason."

"Why do you think some people remember it?" Kasumi asked curiously. Lldnr'k looked at her for a moment.

"Well, anyone on the other side of a portal would have been isolated from the effects by being in a completely different universe with its own time flow, so depending on when they went through, they'd remember anything up to all of it. That's fairly simple to understand. Other cases, though, are more complex. Anyone linked into your ward system would be unaffected by that particular issue due to the way it works, having that odd relationship with time we decided was due to Ranma's previous temporal excursion. Significant magical ability, or decent abilities with other energy manipulation methods such as this ki you use, could well have a similar effect although from a slightly different cause. So could immediate proximity to major sources of magical potency."

"It fits," Ranma said quietly, glancing at his wife, who looked back, then nodded. "Ami found a couple of mages, they remember more or less everything. Apparently Rei's grandfather does as well. I'll have to see how many other people of similar abilities do."

"I suspect the majority of them," the temporal mage told him, rubbing his beak in thought. "It wouldn't take a particularly large magical ability to insulate a person to one extent or another from the effect of such a small temporal change. The time period in question would be edited out for them as well but the memories, or some of them at least, would remain. It's a fascinating issue."

Clicking his beak in amusement he added, "I might well get another paper out of it."

"I'm glad the near-destruction of our universe is such a rich source of knowledge for you," Ranma laughed.

"One Seizes the opportunity to learn new things where one can," Lldnr'k told him calmly. They all laughed at that.

"I guess that covers all the magical girls as well, and probably a lot of the better martial artists," Nabiki suggested, thinking about it.
"Most likely, yes."

"I wonder if our fathers remember it?" she asked Ranma and Kasumi. They exchanged glances.

"I don't know but it sounds possible. I'm pretty sure Cologne would remember, at least." Ranma snickered a little. "She's probably going nuts trying to work it out. She hates not knowing things."

Kasumi looked slightly puzzled. "It's a little odd that Masao apparently remembers everything as well. I wonder why?"

"Agent Naito has done a lot of portal travel and teleportation recently," Lldnr'k said after thinking about it for a few seconds. "It's not impossible that there is a lingering effect from that which insulated him from the event. As I said, I suspect it didn't need very much to override the temporal reset as it was so short and essentially low-powered. If it had gone on much longer, it would be a different matter without doubt, but in that case we wouldn't be discussing it in the first place."

"He's also been in contact with us quite a lot over the last year or so," Ranma added slowly. "We already suspect that proximity to our particular form of magic can cause certain people's inherent talent to activate to one level or another. I suppose it's possible that we've accidentally sort of sparked him off a bit. I didn't think of that, but I should look into it."

"Would it have that effect on just anyone?" Nabiki asked curiously. He shook his head. "I don't think so, but I don't know for sure. You'd probably need a certain level of latent ability before it could happen without deliberate effort, and even then it might not go very far at all. People all vary wildly in their inherent power levels, even with intensive training a lot of them would never be able to do much more than make some pretty lights for a few seconds or something like that. Probably most of them."

"I'm forced to agree," Lldnr'k nodded. "While your magic system is weird beyond words, the basic concept is the same as the sort of thing the rest of us do. Almost anyone in a species that has any talent for magic at all can learn something of it, but it's a fairly rare individual who can take that and progress beyond small tricks. The Krennsh are a good example of a species in whom the magical talents are quite limited even in the best of them. They're just not designed for it. Your species on the other hand, despite the strange way your society seems to largely overlook magic in favour of the physical technologies, is quite gifted in that respect. So is mine, to roughly the same level, and the D'sage. You people, of course, are unusually effective even with that taken into account."

He shrugged a little. "It's like all skills and abilities. Most people can learn to do most things, to one level or another, like computer programming, or mechanical engineering, or writing, for example. Magic is somewhat harder to learn than some of them but not vastly more difficult. Abstract higher mathematics, for example, is a much rarer skill to find someone truly gifted in. Yet, even though most could learn the basics of almost any skill, few will take any of them to the point they could be considered experts."

Nabiki nodded, understanding the idea quite well. She was good at both computers and numbers, although she knew Ami was better at the latter by a large margin from what she'd found out about the girl, while she knew several students on her course who were able to keep up but were clearly struggling nonetheless. "Thanks. That explains quite a lot, and most of what's left is probably unexplainable anyway."

"You're welcome, Nabiki," the mage said, inclining his head to her.
They fell silent for a moment, then Ranma frowned slightly. "While you're here, there's one last potential time travel problem I want to deal with," he said, making them all look curiously at him. He looked at Nabiki. "I'll need your help as well as Ldnr'k's." She glanced at her sister, before smiling coldly as he explained. Laughing a little, she agreed.

"Elder Cologne."

The totally unexpected icy voice from behind her made the Amazon yelp in shock, spinning around so fast from where she'd been locking the door to the restaurant she nearly fell over, to gape in horror at the person standing in the middle of the establishment. Bearing in mind that she knew beyond doubt that seconds ago she'd been the only one there, Shampoo having left five minutes ago and Mousse some time before that, she was understandably surprised, leaving aside just who she was surprised by.

Her heart thundering in her ears, the small ancient woman couldn't think what to say for several seconds, during which the other person simply watched her expressionlessly. "Ms Aoyama. What an... unexpected... um, pleasure?" Her voice squeaked a little on the last word in an embarrassing way. The response was a tiny near-smile, still subtly wrong in a very disturbing manner. Very politely she added, "Can I help you with something?"

Ms Aoyama nodded once, her dark glasses glinting in the light from the bulbs overhead. "I believe so. It has come to our attention, Elder Cologne, that you have in your possession an artefact that allows temporal displacement under specific conditions. While damaged, it is still potentially functional, and as a result extremely hazardous. I would request that you relinquish ownership of this artefact. Temporal manipulation is forbidden due to the high likelihood of untoward effects that it will, almost inevitably, cause." Cologne stared in shock. "Having only recently been peripherally involved in a temporal upset that came far closer than is ideal to causing devastation to this reality, we have decided that all means of time travel should be removed from circulation immediately as the risks are simply too high to allow."

"Temporal upset...?" the Elder gasped. "You mean... That's what that was? That thing that borrowed practically all the magical energy in the world?"

"Correct." Ms Aoyama's expression changed slightly, showing just for a moment something that was to anger what traumatic amputation of the leg was to a stubbed toe. Cologne went pale. "Details of the operation are unavailable to you but suffice it to say that without the intervention of a number of individuals who were prepared to sacrifice themselves without question and a significant quantity of good fortune we would not be having this conversation. It was, as you might put it, a very near thing. While the entity in question has been permanently removed from the equation, my employers are in no manner prepared to allow a similar situation to arise again. Hence my request." Her voice made it blatantly clear that 'request' was entirely the wrong word.

Cologne nodded, still pale. "How did you know I have it?" she asked, carefully moving past the alien woman, who turned to watch her, heading for the stairs to her workroom.

"The temporal emanations of the artefact were traced to this building," Ms Aoyama informed her, suddenly holding a spindly device that was making an intermittent faint pinging sound. It emitted an aura of very alien magic, something the Amazon was certain didn't originate anywhere on the planet. "Cross-checking with our records suggested that after the incident involving yourself, Elder Cologne, a person known as Happosai, and a number of other individuals, you recovered the artefact by some means then stored it."

"I gassed the little pervert in his room, snuck in, and stole it back," she mumbled, shocked at how much the woman and her mysterious employers knew about her and the situation in Nerima. It strongly suggested that they'd been watching for a considerable time, which wasn't entirely comforting to know.

Ms Aoyama smiled slightly, making her shiver again. That expression was just... wrong. "Very enterprising, Elder Cologne." She followed the old Amazon up the stairs completely silently, causing the hairs on the back of Cologne's neck to rise, the only thing betraying her presence a wave of cold preceding her.

'Gods, that's scary,' the Elder thought to herself, wishing desperately that she'd left the mirror in Happosai's possession years ago. Let him deal with this horrifying woman or whatever she really was, see how he liked it. Entering her workroom she headed for the locked cabinets at the far end. She pulled a key on a chain from around her neck, disabled the wards around the lower cabinet, unlocked it, then removed a number of wooden boxes covered in symbols until she reached one at the bottom rear of the storage space, taking that one to her work table. Ms Aoyama watched without a word.

It took a little more work to disable the protections on the box itself but in the end she opened it, turning it to show the Mirror, still cracked from where Nabiki Tendo had accidentally stepped on it. "There it is. I always intended to fix it one day if possible. It's very old and a cultural artefact of the Amazons."

Ms Aoyama inspected the thing with cold curiosity, passing the device she was holding again over it for a moment then checking it. She seemed satisfied although her expression, or lack of one, didn't change. "Excellent. The importance of the artefact to the Amazons is recognised, Elder Cologne. It is regrettable that it must be destroyed. However, travel in time is far too hazardous to allow, as recent events came perilously close to demonstrating. Please do not investigate it in future." She closed the box, picking it up and making it vanish along with the device she was holding. Primly adjusting her sleeves she flicked a tiny speck of dust from one, then nodded to the old woman who was watching, hoping that this would be enough and she'd leave.

"You have my gratitude, Elder Cologne." The terrifying woman turned to go. Just as she reached the door Cologne managed to ask a question that had been niggling at her for the last few minutes.

"How close did we come?"

Ms Aoyama stopped in the doorway, turning back. She inspected the Amazon for a moment. "Approximately three seconds." There was no trace of even her version of a smile. Following this statement was a pause during which Cologne could feel the blood draining from her face. "Until next time, Elder Cologne." With that she turned away again, leaving the room. By the time the Elder recovered and went after her, the building was empty, the doors still locked, no trace of her passing the wards around the café.

"Goddess, I hope there isn't a 'next time'," Cologne mumbled out loud, turning the lights off and heading back upstairs, shivering at the thought, both of Ms Aoyama and the information she'd passed on.

She didn't sleep well that night.

"Here you go, Lldm'rk," Ranma said, handing the box to the temporal mage. "I know you wanted to study it. When you're finished, it's probably best to make sure it's destroyed. I don't want any time travelling methods lying around, not after the last couple of weeks." Opening the box the mage inspected the mirror with interest, waving one of his instruments over it and looking at the results.
"Wise. They're nothing but trouble even when you know what you're doing, which I assure you, most people don't. Even the experts." He closed the box with a click, tucking it away somewhere. "Thank you. It's using a method I haven't encountered in the past. I'll keep it safe until I've learned anything interesting about it then securely destroy it."

"Don't let any tears touch it, just in case," the martial artist warned. "It may be broken but it still feels like it's at least partially active."

"I'll be very careful, trust me. It's not the first time I've run into something similar although the last one used completely different methods. It's a great shame that time travel is relatively easy to perform especially if you don't know about or care about the almost inevitable consequences. Life would be considerably safer if it wasn't." He shook his head. "As recent events prove."

"Well, at least it's over now." Nabiki grinned for a moment. "I'm looking forward to the normal sort of insanity rather than the universe-ending sort. It's far too stressful."

"I would be forced to agree," Lldnr'rk smiled.

"Right, I suppose we should get you home," Ranma said, looking suddenly very tired. "I need some sleep, about twelve to fourteen hours of it, I think." Kasumi leaned against him, nodding sleepily.

"You should rest, then," the time mage told them. "You deserve a break. Let me know what happens with Hnther and his treatment of the other young ladies, when you can, I'm curious and concerned."

"We will. We're going to see Minako tomorrow sometime and check on Usagi. Then I suppose it's off to see Yrenti again." He added after a moment, "Do you want to come when we do?"

"I'd like that, yes," Lldnr'rk replied. "I still have a few questions."

"OK. We'll pick you up. Either late tomorrow or the next day, probably." He generated a portal without moving from the sofa, causing the mage to smile in the way of his species.

"Thank you. Sleep well." He got up, waved, then walked through it. It collapsed with a pop.

"Well, I'm definitely going to bed."

Kasumi mumbled something that sounded like, "Good idea," making Nabiki grin at her tiredly.

"So am I. It all caught up at once." She yawned uncontrollably, then pushed herself to her feet. "See you in the morning."

Heading towards her room, she barely managed to undress before she dropped off, climbing under the covers and beginning to snore gently within seconds.

"Hello, Nabiki," Nodoka said. The middle sister yawned widely, looking out the window at a very sunny late August day, noticing that she'd slept until after ten in the morning.

"Hi, Auntie. How are you?"

"Fine, thanks, dear. And yourself?" The elder Saotome woman sounded in good spirits.
"Very well, thank you," she replied honestly. "We had a late night and I only just got up, but aside from being a little tired still, I'm in a good mood and relaxed."

"That's nice to hear." She could hear the smile in the older woman's voice. "I was wondering when we might see you in Nerima again. You've been gone for over a month and we all miss you."

"Yes, sorry about that, we sort of decided to extend my stay a little when we bumped into some friends." Nabiki decided this was close enough to the truth to be acceptable. "Things got a little chaotic for a while, there were some problems that took a bit of thought to sort out, but we managed in the end. Everything's fine now. I met some interesting new people as well."

"It sounds like you had fun at least," Nodoka commented. Nabiki was glad the other woman couldn't see her face as she leaned her forehead against the window for a moment.

"Mostly, although there were a few times I was wishing I'd stayed in Nerima where it's sane," she giggled. Ranma's mother laughed.

"Oh dear. That bad?"

"Pretty much. Everything is fine now though." She thought for a moment, working it out. "I think I'll be back in about five or six days. I've got a couple of things to finish off here, some people to talk to, then I was going to see my friend Miki and her boyfriend in Kobe for a couple of days. I need to call her and see how she's getting along, we haven't spoken for a while. Then I'll be back in Nerima for a week or so, before university starts again."

"That sounds good. I've been thinking about the garden party. It's the last week of August, and the weather is supposed to be very nice for the next two weeks at least. Can you see if Yori and Chou are available over the weekend of the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth? That gives just over a week to get everything ready and it's still nearly ten days before your next trimester starts."

"I can do that, I think."

"You could invite your friend Miki as well if you like. I understand she's interested in magical girls. Perhaps she'd like to meet some?"

Nabiki laughed. "She'd probably fall over from awe. I'll ask her."

"See if any of the others are interested if you can as well," Nodoka requested. "Akae was going to call Aiko and check, she wanted to talk to her about getting a lift to the US next week anyway, but there's no harm in being thorough. The studio called her this morning and asked if she and Shampoo were free for three or four days for some more demonstrations and interviews. She doesn't seem to know whether to hide in her room or dance around the house." The Saotome woman was almost giggling. "I expect she'll be calling you next."

"Good for her," the middle sister replied, smiling broadly. "I'm certain she's going to do really well. Shampoo also, of course."

"They've certainly been training hard since the last call," the other woman told her. "Several hours each day, both in the morning and the evening. I've never seen Akae so focussed on anything, it's very impressive. Your father is extremely pleased. Even Genma was being complimentary to her the other day."

"Oh, now I know the world is ending," she giggled. Nodoka snickered.

"It's certainly fairly unusual. My dear husband isn't given to compliments, unless they're aimed at himself." Both of them laughed wildly for a moment or two.

Calming down, Nabiki asked curiously, "How is the planning for Ukyo's wedding coming along?" Nodoka sighed a little.

"It's hit a roadblock, I'm afraid. We're having real trouble finding a suitable place that meets all the criteria and isn't already booked up. Time's running short and I'm a little worried. But never fear, we'll work something out, I'm sure."

"That's annoying. If I think of anything I'll let you know, OK?"

Nodoka sounded pleased. "Thank you, dear. Oh, hold on, your father just came in and wants a word." There was a muffled conversation then her father's deeper voice sounded inside her head.

"Hello, daughter. I hope you're well?"

"Yes, dad, I'm fine, thanks. How are you?"

"Not bad, not bad. I was curious to see if you had experienced that odd twitch the other day and if you had any thoughts on it."

"It was certainly rather strange, wasn't it," she asked, neatly deflecting the question without directly answering it. There was the slightest of pauses before Soun replied, sounding a little worried.

"That it was. The news has been talking about it quite a lot, although oddly less than I would have expected. Elder Cologne was here with Shampoo a few hours after it happened, she seemed quite concerned. Apparently it was felt all over the world. She called another Elder in the tribe in China who told her some very strange things. It looks very much as if it was some extremely odd and massively powerful magical event of some sort, although no one seems to know what. Her best guess is that something big happened and that twitch was the result of something defending against it, based on things a seer in the tribe said while it was happening. But there isn't very much more than circumstantial evidence one way or the other."

"Weird. What do you think is going to happen about it?" she asked. He paused again.

"I'm not sure. People in general seem confused rather than scared, which I suppose is a good thing. Whether that will continue, and whether it applies everywhere, I have no idea. Hopefully nothing major will occur as a result." He chuckled a bit. "There are some very odd theories going around about it. They showed a few on the news. The Americans have come up with some wonderfully insane ideas, of course, but oddly enough don't seem to be taking themselves too seriously. Lots of conspiracy theories as you'd expect. I've heard some amazing ones. The old standby of it being the work of aliens is doing the rounds, also as you'd expect."

Nabiki laughed, while thinking, 'Not actually too far from the truth, weirdly enough.'

"It's always aliens. Or the CIA. Or the Russians. Or the Chinese. Or..."

"Quite." Her father laughed again. "I suppose we'll probably never know for sure. Oh well. Everything seems normal so I suppose there's no harm in it."

"True. Hopefully everyone will be as pragmatic." It was a worry to her. Jun had been collecting stories from the internet and broadcast media, collating them and running simulations. So far everything seemed to be heading in the direction of it blowing over remarkably quickly, which it put down to the temporal aspect causing a self-censoring effect, although it was quick to point out that even if this were true a lot of people wouldn't be affected. It seemed likely that at the minimum it would be a mystery that was at least as persistent as any JFK assassination theory.

"With luck, yes." Soun sounded hopeful. "Did you hear about Akane?"

"She's been asked to go back to LA, to meet more studio people? Yes, Auntie just mentioned it."

"Oh, yes, that too, but I was referring to what happened in the jewellery shop a couple of days ago." Nabiki immediately became worried.

"No, I haven't heard anything. What happened? Did she get fired?"

Her father laughed merrily. "Oh, no, nothing like that. She intervened in another robbery. Two rather ill-advised young men tried to steal a lot of rings and the like at gunpoint."

She felt abruptly even more worried. "What?!"

"Don't worry, she's fine. The same couldn't be said of them, though. Both ended up with broken ribs, one had a broken arm and a dislocated shoulder. But the most impressive part is what happened when the second robber shot at her."

"He shot her!" the middle sister yelped in outrage, instantly furious. Her father spoke calmly, hearing the tone of her voice.

"At her, dear, at her. She caught the bullet in mid air." He sounded very proud indeed. "She's absolutely fine, although she was extremely surprised at what she managed to do. Cologne was very complimentary, so was Shampoo. The police could barely believe it."

Slightly stunned, even though she recalled what Ranma had told her over a year ago, Nabiki smiled widely. "That's amazing," she said, meaning it. "Well done, sis. I'll bet the robber was surprised."

"Apparently it was something of a shock for both of them." Her father snickered. "Although more for the would-be thief, I think. She capped it off by throwing a sledge-hammer handle right through their getaway motorcycle. He gave up at that point."

Laughing, she pictured the scene her father was describing. "I'm a little surprised it lasted that long. Mr Ito must be pleased about it."

"He is, very much so. They did some considerable damage to the shop but it's nearly fixed now. It was only closed for one afternoon to clear up. Apparently word got around and they had more business the next day than in a normal week. He was joking that he needs to start making souvenir bullet rings to commemorate the occasion." This nearly had Nabiki rolling on the floor laughing.

"Amazing. I'll have to call her and congratulate her on both things."

"She's at work at the moment, but she'll be glad to hear from you, I'm sure. I have to go now myself, the students just turned up, but we're looking forward to seeing you soon. Goodbye, Nabiki."

"Bye dad," she replied, still grinning to herself. It became quiet inside her head again.

#A significant achievement on the part of your sister.# Jun remarked after a moment, sounding quite impressed.

'She's come on a long way in the last year,' she replied, feeling very pleased. 'We all have in our own way, haven't we?"
#Very true, Nabiki.# The SI fell silent again but she got the impression that it was doing its own version of smiling.

Glancing at her phone when it rang, Akane saw her sister's name come up on the display. Finishing with the customer she'd just sold a necklace to, she bade him goodbye then picked the phone up from the shelf under the counter, pressing the call accept button with her thumb. "Hi, Nabiki. How are things going? Where are you? When are you coming home?"

"Fine, thanks. In Rika and Maiko's apartment. Soon, probably five or six days." Both sisters giggled.

"It's nice to hear from you. How did the travelling go?"

"It was a lot of fun. We saw all sorts of weird things, got a bit drunk, went swimming a lot, ate far more than we should have... You know, the sort of thing you're supposed to do on holiday." Nabiki laughed, sounding relaxed and happy.

"I'm envious," Akane laughed back. "It sounds like you've had a good time."

"It had its moments," the older sister said, sounding amused. "There were some weird ones as well, but that's what happens."

"Especially around here, right?" Akane smiled, watching a potential customer study the display in the window, before shaking her head slightly and walking away.

"Minato is pretty weird as well, I hear, but yes."

"God, isn't it? Did you hear how Shampoo got involved in a fight against about two dozen little demons a while ago there? She only went shopping, but came back with bite-marks on her leg!" Akane shook her head in amazement, even though her sister couldn't hear her.

"I saw that on the news, yes, someone recorded it and showed it to me." Nabiki laughed again. "She was damned impressive in action."

"Tell me about it. I thought it was amazing but Elder Cologne was teasing her for days about letting any of them bite her in the first place. Shampoo was getting a little annoyed." Akane grinned. "I don't think I'd have liked to have that happen to me. She's a lot better than I am."

"Can she catch a bullet?" Nabiki asked mischievously. Akane groaned.

"Oh, god. Dad told you, didn't he?"

"Yep. He sounded very proud." The older sister laughed, obviously very amused. "So are you going to try crime-fighting for a living? Become the magical girl you talked about when you were ten?"

"Oh, god," she moaned again. "That was so embarrassing. I had a dress designed and everything."

"You did indeed. I might even know where all your drawings are, although you'd need to adjust the sizes," Nabiki replied, laughing hard enough she sounded like she could barely get the words out. The youngest Tendo flushed with embarrassment.

"Nabiki!" she hissed. "If you show anyone those pictures I'll... I'll..." She tried to think of an appropriate punishment but failed. "Be very annoyed," she finally said rather lamely. Nabiki only laughed harder for a moment.

"Oh, shut up," Akane finally said, smiling a little. "It's not that funny."

"It is from here. I was just picturing the look on Yori's face if she found you wandering around Minato clutching a huge mallet and wearing that dress." Despite herself Akane collapsed with laughter.

"I'd never be able to look her in the face again, or any of the others," she gasped after a moment.

"Apparently there are some young girls running around there dressed nearly as weirdly. And don't forget the uniforms Aiko's team have."

"They've changed them now, they're much more sensible. Like what Yori and Chou wear only in their team colours of blue and gold." She grinned. "It's almost a pity, the weather is hot enough for the old one at the moment."

"Yes, for about six weeks or so. The rest of the time they must have been freezing their unmentionables off. Can you imagine that in the winter we had last year?" The middle sister sounded both amused and horrified. Akane shivered at the thought.

"No, that wouldn't be much fun."

"Auntie Nodoka told me the studio in LA let you know when they want you over again," her sister said, changing the subject. She smiled widely.

"Yes, Adrian called this morning. It was the middle of the night from his point of view, he'd stayed up just to call me. He's arranged it so we're going to do another, longer demonstration for some studio executives, then have a couple of days of training followed by a mock shoot with real stunt-work for a day, or perhaps two, to see how everything works out. He sounded like he was really looking forward to it."

"Are you?"

She paused for a moment, thinking, then replied, "Yes, I think I am. It's still scary in a way, thinking about being so far from home in front of a lot of foreign people, but you were right, it's something I need to do. Never mind the money, which is amazing in its own right, but the experience is something I think will be good for me."

"That's the right attitude." Nabiki sounded approving. "What does Shampoo think?"

"More or less the same. She's been practising English as much as she can ever since we got back the first time, which has helped a bit, but she still needs a lot of work. Even so she's really looking forward to it."

"Is Aiko taking you over?"

"Yes, I spoke to her a couple of hours ago and she said she was happy to. She's made this whole thing a lot easier than it would have been otherwise, and a lot cheaper as well. I owe her a lot."

"She's a good person," her sister agreed. "So you're going to be away all next week by the sound of it?"

"Pretty much. We've going over in a couple of days, on Sunday, just to get settled into the hotel and shown around, we'll be back either Thursday or Friday."
"I'll be in Nerima by then definitely, I expect. You'll be back in time for Auntie's party as well."

"I wouldn't miss that," Akane stated firmly. "Yori should be there, I need to thank her for starting all of this off. I still can't believe she'd think of me for it."

"Again, she's a good person. She'll appreciate the thanks, I'm sure." Akane could hear the smile in her sister's voice. "I'm going to have to go, I need to get something to eat, I'm starving. Good luck with the trip, call me when you're settled in and let me know how it's going, OK?"

"I will do, 'Biki," she said, smiling as the other Tendo woman hung up. The woman who had been looking in the window earlier came back with a friend, quickly making her quite busy as she started asking questions about a ring in the window.

Still smiling from her conversation with her sister, Nabiki headed for the shower. When she'd finished her ablutions and gotten dressed, she found her elder sister in the kitchen preparing a light meal as a late breakfast or early lunch. "Dad's fine, and so is Akane," she reported, leaning on the doorway and watching the older woman move around the kitchen. "Oh, Akane's catching bullets now as well." She grinned as Kasumi stopped dead, looking slightly startled, then smiled.

"How on earth did that come about?" the elder Tendo asked curiously. She explained, causing her to laugh. "That's very impressive," Kasumi said admiringly. "Our little sister does seem to be learning new skills at quite a rate recently. Good for her."

Nabiki relayed the rest of the news from home while her sister finished the food preparations, then helped her carry it to the table and set it. Shortly Ranma arrived from somewhere, accompanied by Aiko and Misaki. The other two turned up a moment later. "Thanks, love," he said, leaning over Kasumi and kissing her on the forehead, then sitting beside her. "The pool filter needs a flush," he commented, accepting a serving of food. "I'll have to sort that out soon or we'll have something horrible growing in it."

"Do we have spare elements for it?" his wife asked. He nodded, picking up his chopsticks.

"There's one left. We'll need to get some more in."

"We should flood the basement, we'd have our own lake," Tamiko chuckled, taking her food with a smile for the elder Tendo.

"Where the hell would we get enough water?" Fumiko asked her. "Even a metre deep would need... Hmm, something like two and a quarter cubic kilometres of it! That's ridiculous."

"We could open a portal to somewhere with a lot of it and borrow some," her sister suggested, eating with enjoyment.

"I don't think putting half an ocean into the basement is a wildly good idea," Kasumi told them. Tamiko sighed a little.

"Oh, we can't do anything interesting with it," she pouted. "Can't put spacecraft in it, can't let the soarers loose in it, can't fill it with water..." The red-head grinned at Kasumi. "You're no fun at all these days." Laughing, the Tendo woman pointed her chopsticks at her friend.

"You girls just keep wanting to do silly things. Hotaru's idea was more sensible. Some trees and things down there might work. Assuming there's enough light and the spectrum is right, but it looked like it was probably fine."
"We could take a couple of the plants in pots from the roof and try them for a while to see what happened," Nabiki suggested, listening to the byplay with a smile. Her sister nodded after a moment.

"Good idea, sister. Can you help me do that after lunch?"

"Sure."

"I'll teleport them down," Aiko said, grinning at them. "I tried it this morning, there doesn't seem to be any problem with my teleportation, it works fine. I had to experiment for a while until I worked out how to lock on, the spell causes some odd effects, but once I worked it out it was easy."

"That's interesting to know," Ranma told her, looking fascinated. "It might be useful at some point as well."

"I thought the same thing."

Nabiki turned to the martial artist. "I spoke to your mother a little while ago," she said. "She asked me to ask 'Yori' if she was up for that party she wants to do for a week on Sunday."

"Akane asked me the same thing," Aiko put in.

"I don't see why not," he replied, glancing at Kasumi, who nodded with a smile. "Now that everything seems to be back to something approaching normal it shouldn't be a problem."

"We're all fine with it as well." Aiko looked at her team, who all signified acceptance. "It sounds fun."

"She asked me if I wanted to invite my friend Miki," the middle Tendo added. "She'd love to meet six magical girls, I know that much. It's a pity that Azumi Ito can't make it."

"It might be difficult," he agreed, looking amused at the thought. "I suppose you could discreetly leave to allow her to drop in for a while."

"Oh, wouldn't that look suspicious." Nabiki giggled. "That's one of the most basic secret identity mistakes you can make. One leaves, one enters, and you never see them in the same room at the same time."

Everyone laughed at this. "We could make it work, what with the illusion spell and so on, but I agree it's kind of convoluted." Ranma looked at her, smiling. "Your friend Miki will just have to meet Azumi under different circumstances."

"I doubt that's likely to happen," she responded. "Although it would certainly make her day." Sipping her drink, she put the cup down again. "OK, I'll call Auntie later and let her know everything is on for Sunday." They all went back to eating, still slightly more hungry than usual after the last couple of days.

Listening to the ring tone echoing inside her head, Nabiki lay on a sun lounger on the roof enjoying the day, also listening to the sounds of her family and friends, a distinction that was less and less important every day, coming from inside the pool where they'd gone for a little relaxation after the meal, smiling to herself contentedly. Eventually the phone was answered. "Hello?" She didn't recognise the older female voice.

"Hello. This is Nabiki Tendo. I was trying to contact Miki?"
"Oh, hello, Nabiki, I've heard a lot about you. I'm Miki's mother. She's outside with John, they're in the garden. Hold on, I'll take her phone out to her." There was a certain amount of rustling sounds suggestive of movement, followed by a faint mumble, then a familiar voice.

"Hi, Nabiki. It's nice to hear from you. What's going on? Are you back in Nerima yet?" Miki sounded happy. The middle sister smiled again, more pleased than she expected at the sound of the other woman's voice.

"Nearly. I'm relaxing in the garden at my friend's house. We're back from the holiday, which was pretty good fun overall. I've got a few days where I don't have anything planned and I was thinking of coming down to Kobe and meeting you, if that's OK."

"That would be wonderful," her friend replied. "Of course you're welcome. We have a spare room that's not doing anything, you can have that. When were you thinking of coming?"

"I've got a couple of errands to run here, so probably late Saturday or early Sunday?"

"Hang on, let me check with Mom." There was a mumble again for a few seconds. "Either is fine. I'll text you the address. Call me when you get to the station, I'll come and meet you."

"Great. How's John?" She found she was looking forward to meeting the young man again as well.

"He's fine. Mom gave him the third degree when he came, but she's really pleased now. Dad likes him as well." Miki giggled. "I think he gave the poor boy a talk when I wasn't looking. He was a little pale for a while."

"Fathers are like that," Nabiki laughed. "Give my best to him. I'll see you in a couple of days."

"OK. Have a good trip." Miki hung up, as did the middle sister, smiling to herself. After a little more sun she got up to swim with the others.

"How are you feeling?" Minako jumped slightly at the question from the door, turning to see Yori smiling at her, Chou, Azumi, and Ami behind her. Hnther brought up the rear as they came into the room she'd been sitting in, idly talking to Artemis. She studied them for a moment, then shrugged.

"Not too bad, actually. Although it would have been nice to have someone around who spoke Japanese rather than that weird Trade language I can't understand a word of." Yori looked embarrassed for a moment.

"Sorry about abandoning you here like that. I didn't mean to leave it this long, but we got sort of tied up with something." She studied the face of the black-haired woman, finally sighing in recognition.

"You actually did it, didn't you? You killed it."

Yori nodded, sitting next to her and staring at the floor for a moment, while the others arrayed themselves around the room. "Yes." She raised her eyes to meet Minako's. "It wasn't easy and we came very close to losing, but by a near miracle we won. Hotaru was responsible for a lot of it. If she hadn't been there..." The woman shrugged. "It might well have ended differently. But in the end, we did it. The time device is totally dead and gone."

Minako stared at her for a while, then looked at Artemis, who was watching them both, looking extremely relieved yet still a little sad. She understood why. "Does that mean we can go home?"
"Yes, I think it does, assuming you're not planning on doing anything silly?" Yori inspected her. She shook her head.

"No. I don't have any wish to cause any trouble. I want to see my family and get a pizza. After that, I need to work out what to do. But it's not going to be causing random fights, with you or anyone else."

"Fair enough." Yori smiled. "We still need to work out what to do about Artemis, but Hnther says he thinks he's stable for the time being at least. It looks like you're one of the very rare cases of a splinter personality not causing long term problems, for now, anyway. Obviously we'd like to figure out a way to get him out of you so you can both be safe but there's no immediate risk to either of you."

"Are you any closer to working out a method to do that?" The cat looked hopeful. She turned to him thoughtfully.

"I have a couple of ideas, but I'm still working on them. We're in contact with someone who might be able to help if they don't work out as well, so one way or the other we can probably do something. I can't say how long it will take, though, although I'll get it done as fast as I can."

"Thank you," he responded, obviously disappointed but not disheartened.

"You're welcome." She looked back to Minako. "We'll need to arrange for you to come back a few times in the next couple of months for treatment. Hnther says that you're not as badly off as he first feared now that he's examined you thoroughly, but he still wants you to undergo therapy for a while. He'll reassess you after that and see if more treatment is warranted but he's pretty hopeful that most of the damage can be fixed. Is that all right?"

With a small sigh she nodded. "I'm not entirely happy about it but I understand why it needs to be done." She glanced at Hnther, who gave her an encouraging smile, which she realised a few days ago would have made her reach for a weapon. Now she understood that there was a decent person being all those teeth who wanted to help her. "Thank you," she said directly to him, hearing Chou quietly translate for him. He nodded back.

"You're welcome," he replied in rough but understandable Japanese, making her smile.

"We really must sort out some sort of language course on Trade," Chou said to Yori, who laughed. "It would be very helpful, I think, especially in cases like this."

"Add it to the list," the martial artist snickered.

"What about Usagi and Luna?" Artemis asked. They all looked at him.

"We're going to go and do the same thing we did last time to tell Luna," Chou told him, looking somewhat sad. "But Usagi is in far too fragile a state to be allowed to wake up. Hnther is still trying to work out what to do about her. The two therapist experts he's arranged will be here in a couple of days and will examine her thoroughly, so it's possible they'll be able to work out a solution other than the ones we discussed before. But I'm not hopeful."

"We're going to have to inform her parents," Yori added heavily. She looked upset. "It's a difficult problem. Almost worse than if she'd died."

After a long moment, Minako nodded a little. She considered her thoughts carefully, then sighed, making the decision. "I'll come with you. They know me, I'm a good friend of Usagi." Yori glanced over her shoulder at Chou and the others, then looked back at her, studying her.
"They know Minako Aino, true. They don't know Magical Girl Minako. Do you intend to let them?"

"Yes. It might help." She sighed again as the other woman looked at her with respect. Yori put her hand on her shoulder.

"If that's what you want, it's fine. But it's a big decision."

"It is, but it's the right one. They deserve to know."

"OK." The other woman stood. "Let's go and let Luna know, then we need to get home."

Shortly, in the room Usagi was still lying motionless in, next to Setsuna who was in a similar state, they all watched as Hinther performed the process to wake the sleeping splinter personality while leaving the host unaware. Luna blinked into existence, looking around with surprise, then focussing on them. "Ah. Back again. How long has it been?"

"Only a couple of days or so," Yori told her. The small black cat nodded, looking around again.

"It's very odd, popping in and out of existence like that," she noted irritably. "I can't recommend it." Turning back to the martial artist, who was looking amused, she asked, "So? Presumably there's a reason you aroused me from my unholy slumber?" Yori stared, then laughed, as did the others.

"I'm not one for cats in general, but I like you, Luna," she said after a moment. The cat looked pleased. "Yes, we thought you'd like to know we tracked the time machine down and blew it to dust." Luna gaped at her, then closed her eyes in visible relief.

"Damn. I'm very glad to hear that. Thanks for letting me know." She opened her eyes and inspected them closely. "I assume it wasn't quite that simple."

"Not even slightly," Azumi told her from the doorway, looking mildly sour. "It was kind of difficult to be honest."

"It nearly went horribly wrong," Yori admitted, glancing back at her friend. "We had luck on our side, as well as an unexpected secret weapon." She paused, then told the story, obviously leaving out significant parts but getting the overall framework in place. Minako listened with incredulity, as did the two cats.

"Holy shit," Luna finally mumbled. "It sounds like you only barely did it."

"Very true. But the important thing is we did do it. It's over. Which is, to be honest, a fucking enormous relief," Yori sighed. "There's a lot of clean-up to do, things like telling various governments that everything is fine and they shouldn't panic, stuff like that, but considering what could have happened it's pretty minor. Just annoying. We'll talk to our contact in the PSIA, he'll pass it on the right people, and with some luck that will be it. For various very complicated reasons to do with time travel our temporal mage Lldnr'k thinks it will get largely ignored by most people, which is a good thing, I suspect."

"You should see some of the conspiracy theories on the internet though," Ami laughed from beside Azumi, who was also grinning. "They're amazing. You could make entire films from any one of them."

"They probably will," Azumi added with a snicker.

"So what's next?" Luna asked curiously.
"Get Minako and Artemis home first, for a while," Yori told her. "Deal with few other problems that can't wait. Then we need to go and see Usagi's parents. I'm not looking forward to that." Luna looked at the unconscious blonde on the bed and slowly nodded.

"I can understand that." She looked up. "Do you think she can be helped?"

"Hnther is... not sure," the martial artist said after a moment. "But he'll do everything he can."

"I suppose that's all we can do," the cat said quietly. "Poor little bunny." They were all quiet for a moment. "What about Setsuna?" she asked eventually, looking over at the still form of the green-haired woman on the next bed.

"She's slightly better off, but not exactly simple to fix either," Yori told her, following her gaze. She looked at Hnther who said something to her. "He thinks she can probably be sorted out, more or less, but it's going to take a while. She's likely to lose a couple of months but he says it's likely that she'll eventually get back to pretty close to normal. He's studied her quite a lot and is working on a therapy plan. When the other two experts get here they'll start working on her, that should be in only a few days."

"I hope it works," Luna said honestly. She looked around at them all. "Thank you. I suppose you need to turn me off again now."

"Unfortunately, yes. I'm working on a solution, though, so hopefully soon enough we can sort that out at least." Yori smiled at her. The cat nodded back, then braced herself.

"You'd better get on with it."

Yori looked at her sympathetically, before motioning to Hnther. The mind mage bent over Usagi's form once more. A second later there was no sign of the cat.

Half an hour later Minako looked around, smiling a little. Mid-afternoon sunlight, the right colour, illuminated a park near her home. She turned to Yori and her friends. "Thanks. Let me know when you're going to see Usagi's parents."

"I will."

She sighed a little, then moved to stand in front of Ami. Holding out her hand, she said, "I don't know if we can ever be friends again, but I don't want to be your enemy." Ami looked at her for a moment then shook her hand.

"I can work with that," she smiled sadly.

"Tell Rei and Hotaru for me, will you?"

"OK."

Releasing the blue-haired girl's hand, Minako looked around, then waved to them. "See you around," she said, before turning and heading towards home, not sure whether to smile or cry. She compromised by doing both.

"Masao, could you come to my office, please?" The Director-General sounded curious. Wondering what it was this time, Naito was already shutting down his computer.

"I'm on my way, sir," he said, then put the phone down. When Ms Enoki had admitted him to the inner office, he wasn't entirely surprised to find Yori there as well as the Director-General. She stood up and shook his hand, before they both sat again.

"So, what's this about, Yori?" the PSIA boss asked, leaning back in his chair. "Do you want to take my Agent all over the multiverse again?" She grinned, glancing at Naito, who was also smiling.

"He's welcome to come next time, but it's not that." She became more serious, making him lean forward again. "It's about that issue a couple of days ago. I think you should be made aware of what actually happened. Masao knows some of it, because it came up during the trip, but we asked him not to say anything until we'd resolved it one way or the other." She shrugged slightly. "Don't be annoyed with him. There was absolutely nothing the PSIA or anyone else could do about the situation except make it worse so we had to keep it quiet. We didn't want anyone overreacting and doing something silly. Masao agreed with that."

The Director-General studied her for a while, then transferred his gaze to the agent, who was feeling uncomfortable. After a long moment he nodded. "If it was anyone else I would be very irritated, but considering the source, I think I can let it go. I assume it was a matter of national security?"

"More like planetary security," she replied. He looked curious, so she began the explanation. It took some time, even though Naito was well aware that quite a lot was being left out. She covered the main parts, though, and answered a number of questions he still had after talking to Ami. The man behind the desk had become paler and paler while she spoke, to the point that by the end Naito was watching him with some worry. Eventually she stopped talking.

It took quite a long time for the Director-General to be able to speak.

"Good god," he finally squeaked. There was another pause. "And I thought asteroids nearly hitting us were a bit of an issue," he added. She shrugged with a smile.

"The asteroid was a problem, yes, but only a local one. This was a little more serious."

"It could really have reset the timeline?" he asked, appalled.

"Yes, which was something we really didn't want happening," she scowled, "leaving aside the little issue that it might well have ended up wiping out our entire reality. It's done it at least once before like I said. That would be... bad."

"You have a way with words, Yori," he managed, shaking his head, still an unhealthy colour.

"You see why I wasn't keen on letting anyone else know about it than I had to?" she asked him. He nodded.

"I do. I agree with it, to be honest. As difficult as it is for me to admit you were right to keep it quiet. There's nothing we could have done at all. We owe you and your friends a debt we can never repay." She waved a hand, smiling a little.

"Don't worry about that, we live in the same universe, remember. I'd miss it if it was gone." He laughed a little nervously.

"That, I can understand. Well, even with that in mind, on behalf of the PSIA at least, thank you for saving us all. Again."

"You're more than welcome. But you see the problem. I've got several messages from various people like Harry Williamson at MI5 in London, Michael Graham at the ASIO in Australia, Inspector Deveraux at the RCMP and Lieutenant Harrison at the LAPD, all asking if I have any idea what happened. Even Sergeant Harada has called me. I'm not sure what to tell any of them. They all deserve to know something, but it's going to be complicated to explain the whole story, or even a part of it, without confusing the issue." She sighed a little. "It could rapidly end up being very political and I don't do politics. I just deal with magical problems. Often by shouting at them." Naito laughed as the Director-General looked amused. "I thought you might have some ideas on the best way to handle it."

Looking less like he was about to faint, the older man nodded slowly. "I understand." He thought for a moment. "You say that very few people will remember much if anything of the true story, and those few will be mostly either magic users or demons?"

"Pretty much. Anyone who went through a portal during that couple of minutes will remember what happened, most magic users and a lot of serious martial artists in places like Nerima will as well. All the magical girls will, I think. I can deal with all of that easily enough, with some work." She looked momentarily uncertain. "It's quite likely that there will be the occasional person who isn't part of the magical world but was close enough to something with serious power who may well remember part or all of it. I can't really do much about that."

"Interesting. It limits the spread of the truth at any rate, which is probably good. I'm not sure the world at large is quite ready to know that it came seconds away from ceasing to exist." He sighed quietly. "I'm not entirely sure I am either, but it's a bit late for that."

"Sorry."

"Don't worry, I'll survive." He smiled for a moment. "I think that we probably need to write a very delicately worded report covering the basics, then disseminate it to carefully chosen people in various governments. It's that or pretend nothing happened. From what you say that might well work but it's possible someone would look into it anyway and come to some strange conclusion that could make a government overreact, despite the fact the threat is over. It's been known to happen. If we get a plausible cover story out there first with enough truth to it to keep people happy, we should be able to forestall that sort of thing."

"It may be a lot of effort for nothing," Yori said, "it's not impossible under the circumstances that if we do nothing eventually it will just die out. Time manipulation can be odd that way."

"But it might not, either."

"Yes. That's true."

"So the cover story is probably the best solution. It's rather cloak and dagger but I'd rather put some effort into a slight misdirection campaign instead of seeing someone get overexcited and cause a problem that ends up killing people." Yori sighed, but nodded agreement.

"I'll admit you know more about this sort of international intelligence than I do. I'm good at the tactical things but I don't have a lot of experience with the strategic aspects. Certainly not as much as you do."

"Thank you for the complement," he said with a smile. She grinned back.

"I know my own limits."

"It's almost a relief to know you actually have some," he said, causing her to laugh. Naito chuckled.
"So, a good old-fashioned government cover up, sir?"

"Basically. We need to make it as true as we can without making it either too frightening or too unbelievable to people who don't have experience of magic. That will take some careful work. But we're quite good at that sort of thing."

"You know that the Americans are likely to end up telling the world something totally ridiculous even so?" Naito asked wryly. "The Russians will probably do the same thing only more clumsily." The Director-General sighed slightly while Yori looked amused, nodding at his agent.

"That's all too likely. They do seem to do that quite often. We probably can't do much about it, though. Let's just see if we can come up with something that keeps people who might panic from doing so and I'll be content."

"Thank you," she said, standing up. He nodded to her.

"You're welcome. Thank you for trusting us with this."

She smiled a little. "You guys have played fair with us for a long time. I trust you, as much as I trust anyone."

"Before you go, can you pass on a message to Azumi for me?" he requested as she turned to leave. Turning back she looked curious.

"Certainly."

"We discussed the issue and think that the idea of importing fusion reactors and fuel is very much worth going ahead with," the man said. She smiled. "I asked Agent Naito to pass it on to her but you'll see her first, I imagine. Masao tells me that she told him getting an evaluation unit would be possible. We'd like to proceed with that. It's been decided that the PSIA should be involved with it initially if that's all right with your people."

"It's pretty much what we had in mind," she agreed. "It seems like the easiest approach to start with."

"Indeed. Once we've sounded out some of the energy companies and also let our people gain experience with the unit, to see if there are any surprises, setting up some means to get them onto the market should be fairly straightforward. The word from higher up is that they're quite happy to allow Azumi and Uthryyl to sort things out with minimum interference, although they'd like to be kept in the loop. From what I can see that mainly means certain politicians are still suspicious and won't believe it until they see it." He looked mildly irritated. "You may well be able to work out who I mean."

"I have a fairly good idea from watching the news," she admitted, smiling a little. "It sounds fair. It's going to make a pretty damn big impact when people realise what's happening and what it means in the longer term. It's probably best to have the government backing us up when that happens."

"I suspect so." He smiled back.

"OK. I'll pass it on to her. It will take a few days, probably a couple of weeks to be honest, but the last time I spoke to Uthryyl he was fairly certain he'd have the export paperwork and licenses ready by then. We can get a unit easily even without them, but full-scale importing will need the documentation. When we have an idea of how to go ahead we can get much larger ones as well."
"Very good." He stood, as she nodded to him, then turned to Naito.

"I'll see you around, Masao."

"OK, Yori. Thanks for letting us know all that. I'll send you a copy of what we come up with so you can check it before we let anyone else see it."

"Thanks." She waved to them then left, fading out of view in the process. They both watched, amused.

"I find that more amazing every time I see it," the Director-General said, laughing a little, as he sat again.

"I'm sorry about keeping that information from you, sir," Naito said, sincerely. "But there were good reasons, ones I agree with, despite my oath."

"Don't worry about it," his superior said, looking back at him from where he'd watched the door close. "I trust your judgement especially where it comes to the special talent. In this case, I happen to agree with both you and Yori. While I'd prefer to know these things in general, under the circumstances I'm rather glad I didn't. I might not have managed to sleep for the last two weeks." He shuddered. "That asteroid was enough to give me nightmares for days."

"I'll admit it's given me some sleepless nights as well, sir," Naito replied. "I have faith in Yori and the others, but it seemed an almost hopeless task. It's a relief to know the threat has been dealt with."

"Very much so." The PSIA boss picked up a folder from his desk and leafed through it with interest. "On a completely different matter, has there been any fallout from this Lieutenant Wilson thing?"

Naito shook his head. "No, not as such. He arrived back at his base in Okinawa without incident, reported to his CO, and told them essentially the truth from the information we have. As I suggested to him, he didn't make a big thing about the whole portal travel and demon aspect of his experience. I sent the report we put together from his interview and talking to Captain Uehara and Sergeant Harada to his CO before he arrived. From what we know it all went fairly smoothly. We did get a phone call wanting clarification on a few points, but for whatever reason they didn't seem too worried about the more peculiar aspects."

"All right. That sounds like it all worked out. The lieutenant is a lucky man."

"Very much so. If Xrist hadn't been in the vicinity it's unlikely he'd have survived." Naito smiled. "He seemed to enjoy himself, to be honest. The man is a born pilot from what I found out about him, so the chance to fly a genuinely alien aircraft must have been an absolute gift. He certainly seemed happy about it."

"Do you think he'll be back?"

"Probably."

Smiling, the Director-General opened another folder. "I see that Captain Uehara has been asking about the feasibility and legality of acquiring some of the stun weapons that Xrist used."

"She mentioned that when I was at the station."

"What do you think?"
"It sounds like it might be worth investigating, from what Sergeant Harada was told by this other demon Rynnkh, they're quite safe. Probably safer than a taser and definitely safer than a bullet. Apparently they're the standard weapon the equivalent of the police use on K'nn Four." He shrugged a little. "But I don't know about the legal position of alien technology in law enforcement."

"I'm not clear on it myself," his superior said absently, reading the report, before closing it and looking up. "I'll pass this upstairs with a recommendation that it be investigated. It's about all that I can do."

Looking at his watch, Naito asked, "Is that all, sir? If so, I'd like to get back to work and finish the report I'm working on before I go home."

"Yes, that's all, Masao. Thank you." Naito nodded to his superior then headed back downstairs. The Director-General sat for a while thinking about what Yori had told them, shuddered a bit, then decided to leave early. He suddenly needed to see his wife and children.

Looking up as the doorbell rang, Kenji wondered who it was. They weren't expecting anyone. "I'll get it," he called, getting up from his desk, putting his pen down and heading to the front door. A muffled reply came from his wife. Opening the door he saw Usagi's friend Minako, with two other women standing behind her. He smiled at the blonde girl. "Hello, Minako. I'm afraid that Usagi isn't here at the moment. She's away on a trip."

"It's Usagi that we need to talk to you about," one of the other two women said. He glanced at her curiously. She was quite petite, with deep black hair in a long braid down her back, a bright blue stripe in it off to one side. For some reason that reminded him of something, as did her clothing...

It took a few seconds but in the end his eyes widened comically. "Excuse me, miss? Are you Yori?" She nodded, smiling slightly, before indicating the tall woman standing next to her.

"Yes. This is my partner Chou." Kenji stared at them, then looked to Minako for an explanation. The blonde looked upset.

"What's going on?" he asked. Hearing a sound from behind him, he looked over his shoulder as his wife came out of the kitchen, drying her hands on a dishcloth. She spotted the two magical girls and stopped dead for a moment, obviously recognising them immediately, before coming up beside him.

"We have something of a problem concerning your daughter," Yori said with a slight frown, which made him very worried suddenly. "May we come in?" He looked at Ikuko, who was staring at Yori, then Chou, looking startled.

"Certainly," he replied after a moment, standing to the side and waving them inside, then closing the door after them. Nudging his wife gently brought her out of the slightly stunned state of immobility she seemed to have fallen into, causing her to twitch then lead the way into the living room.

"Can I offer you a cup of tea?" Ikuko asked, looking at the three visitors. Chou smiled gently, radiating calm.

"That would be very nice. Thank you," she said. Ikuko smiled back, going into the kitchen. She came back only a couple of minutes later.

"I just put the kettle on so it didn't take long," she explained, putting the tray she was carrying on the table, then pouring cups of tea for everyone. Kenji noticed that Minako, who was normally a fairly talkative young woman, seemed drawn and tired, sitting to one side with a rather blank expression. He looked at her with concern.

"Are you all right, Minako?" The girl twitched a little, as if she hadn't been paying attention, then nodded slightly.

"Yes, thank you, Mr Tsukino. I just have a lot on my mind at the moment." She smiled weakly, accepting the cup of tea that his wife offered her and withdrawing into herself again. When they all had tea, Ikuko sat next to her husband.

"What's going on?" he asked, sipping his tea, trying not to show his feelings. Yori glanced at Chou, who smiled a little sadly at her.

"It's a rather delicate and awkward problem," Yori began. She looked at them both for a moment. "How much do you know about what your daughter does when she's not at home?"

They glanced at each other, puzzled. "Well, she used to spend a lot of time with her friends at that arcade, or eating ice cream. Or both," Ikuko replied, smiling. Yori's expression suggested this wasn't what she meant.

"She's often out with her friends but I'm not sure what they do," Kenji said, glancing at his wife, who nodded. "Recently she's been arguing with them a lot, I think. I know we haven't seen Ami around very much, or Makoto. They may have had a falling out, I suppose. Is that what you mean?"

"It's related to the problem, yes," the petite woman said, sighing a little. "OK. I guess there's no other way than to just tell you." They looked at each other again. That sounded ominous. "Your daughter is a Magical Girl," she said.

They stared at her for several seconds, before Ikuko giggled. "You can't be serious," she said. "Usagi? Our Usagi? A magical girl like you?" Yori nodded.

"Not exactly like us, but on those general lines, yes."

They both stared again. She seemed completely serious.

"I know it sounds ridiculous. There are reasons for that aside from the obvious," Yori went on, sighing again. She sounded depressed. "The magic involved, as well as other things, has the effect of disguising her quite effectively. It tends to make people discount the idea even if they come up with it, like you're doing right now. Even if you're told straight out it sounds unbelievable. But I can assure you, it's true."

"Assuming this is the case, why are you telling us?" Kenji asked. "How are you involved? Are you saying she works with you?" He was still incredulous. She shook her head, smiling a little for a moment.

"No, to be honest we've been shouting at each other rather than working together for some time now. I've tended to find her extremely irritating. It turns out there are some extenuating circumstances, though, which have led us to the current situation." She glanced at her partner again, who nodded. "Essentially, it's like this..."

Over the next half hour, she and Chou regaled them with the most incredible story they'd ever heard. It was totally ridiculous on the face of it. There were only two things that kept them in their seats and listening.
One was the reputation of the two young women talking to them, which was exemplary.

The other was how sad they seemed about it.

When they finally stopped, Kenji looked at his wife, who stared back, stunned to the point of being unable to speak. He jumped when a voice came from the doorway. "Is that true?" it asked.

Showing no signs of surprise even though neither of them were facing that way, Yori turned her head to look at his son, nodding.

"Yes. Every word. I'm sorry."

"How long were you standing there?" Ikuko asked Shingo. He came into the room, sitting near her on a chair.

"More or less from the beginning," he said. "It would explain a few things," he added, looking back to Yori. "Sis changed a lot over the last year. A lot more in the last few weeks. She wasn't herself."

"The damage caused by the time device has had a drastic effect on her personality," Yori told him.

"And you're claiming that the weird sensation everyone felt three days ago was due to this... time machine... which has been manipulating Usagi and eight other girls for heaven knows how long?" Kenji asked, feeling bewildered. Yori nodded again.

"Yes. We destroyed it then. We were unfortunately far too late for Usagi and a few of the other girls. We only found out about it a couple of weeks ago. It's been affecting them for their entire lives, one way or another."

"You understand that while we know that you have a very impressive reputation, this is a very difficult story to believe, even considering the source?" Ikuko asked. Both girls sighed slightly.

"We know. Neither of us blame you for having trouble with it. Part of that is the magic, it's still active since you've been living with it for so long even though the device is gone, and part of it is just down to how insane the whole story is in the first place." Yori shook her head. "Trust me, even in magical girl terms it's weird. But, I'm afraid, it's true."

"Do you have any proof of this?" Kenji asked her.

"Yes," Minako answered, making them look at her in surprise. She'd been so quiet during the story that they'd forgotten she was there.

"Minako, dear? Do you believe this?" Ikuko asked. The blonde looked terrible. She nodded slowly.

"I do, because I have no choice." Taking a deep breath she glanced at Yori, who seemed to sigh without making any sound. "Usagi is, or was, my team-mate. I'm a magical girl too."

They stared at her for a few seconds, then each other. Sighing, she got up, moved to the middle of the room, then did something extremely unexpected.

The Tsukino family gaped in shock at the unpleasantly familiar uniform on the girl in the middle of the room. "Holy shit," Shingo said quietly. His parents were too startled to even take exception to the swearing.

"You see?" Minako turned on the spot, then manifested a magical weapon, a long chain of golden links, holding it loosely in her hand for a moment before making it vanish again. With a flash of light the uniform and magical girl were replaced by a tired-looking eighteen-year-old with long blonde hair, who sat down again. "Usagi is like me. I was the first. Then Usagi. Then the others, one by one. Nine magical girls, all deceived by an ancient machine that was trying to remake the world for its own twisted reasons."

Chou reached out and held her hand for a moment while they all stared, open-mouthed. Eventually Ikuko closed her mouth, looking helplessly at Yori, then back to Minako. "Did you try not being a magical girl?" she asked faintly. The blonde started laughing.

"It's not that easy," she gasped out, giggling in an unnerving manner that put the wind up them all. Eventually she wound down and fell silent again. Yori watched her with sympathy in her eyes, before turning back to the three family members.

"She's right. It's not that easy. You don't choose this lifestyle, it chooses you, or you fall into it. Once you're in, you're stuck. Most of us are fine with it, although it's a shock at first, there are a lot of perks. But what happened to these nine girls isn't at all good. Some of them are fine. Some are like Minako here, damaged but repairable. Some, though..." She went silent for a moment. "Some are... seriously broken."

They stared at her in horror, Ikuko with a hand to her mouth.

"Where is she?" Kenji finally asked. "And will she be all right?" Yori looked at him for a moment.

"As to the second part, that's what we need to talk to about. For the first part..."

"She and Minako were involved in... a potentially very bad incident," Chou said, taking up the story. Minako looked ashamed.

"She hates Yori," the girl explained, glancing apologetically at the woman in question, who shrugged a little. "She's never liked her, Yori kept stopping us whenever we tried going after something in her district, but recently that dislike really did turn into hate. She was also getting really paranoid. About ten or eleven days ago, after we destroyed that mall, and some of the others nearly killed a lot of people when they were fighting and wrecked those apartment buildings, it got a lot worse." The girl stared at the floor, her hands clasped, obviously not wanting to talk but doing so anyway.

"She ended up tracking me down with a crazy plan to... well, assassinate Yori, basically. Then go after the others." They all stared at her in disbelief.

"It's true, and I went along with it. I still don't know why. Luckily Tamiko, a friend of Yori's, and some of her team turned out to have been keeping all of us under surveillance since the mall incident and did... something... that knocked us out. I still have no idea what." Yori and Chou both seemed slightly amused as the family looked at them. After a moment when it became clear that no explanation was forthcoming, Minako added, "I woke up on a completely deserted world with a month's worth of water, food, books, and a tent. And a note. They did the same thing to Usagi on the other side of the world."

Kenji glanced at his wife, outrage filling him, but before he could say something he might regret, Minako held up her hand. "Don't get mad at them. It was the right thing to do. If we'd gone ahead with Usagi's plan, I'm damn sure people would have died, including us. Being isolated there with only my mind to talk to," for some reason this seemed to amuse her slightly, "gave me time to think, which helped a lot. By the time they came back about a week later I was ready to talk."

"Unfortunately it was too late for Usagi," Chou told them. "It's been too late for some time from what we've found out."
"What do you mean, too late?" Kenji asked in a low voice. He had some pretty unpleasant ideas in his head. He could see that his son and wife were thinking the same. The visitors could obviously work out what they were thinking and hastened to correct it.

"She's not dead, don't worry about that. Physically, she's fine. Mentally, though..." Yori made a little gesture of worry. "Her mind was badly affected by everything that happened, not to mention it was in a rather fragile state in the first place. She's not quite as mentally flexible as Minako and some of her team-mates are, and the time machine did a lot of memory editing on her to force all the memories of being a 'reincarnated princess' in there in the first place." The petite woman shook her head in disgust. "There's a very good reason that techniques like that are looked on as extremely bad and are banned everywhere. What with one thing and another she's ended up as basically a paranoid psychopath with severe megalomaniac tendencies. And considerable magical abilities which make her remarkably dangerous."

"If she was let loose in her current state we would have to deal with a magically powered serial killer in all probability," Chou said quietly. "There's only one way that would end."

"Oh my god." Ikuko stared in horror. Her husband put his arm around her, still holding the hand he'd been squeezing the entire time to the point his own was going numb. "Surely she can't be that bad?"

"We can show you video and audio recordings of her to prove it, if you need to see them," Yori said. "I'd recommend against it but it's up to you." They exchanged a glance.

"I think we need to see them," Kenji said reluctantly. "I'm not saying that we don't believe you but the person you're describing doesn't sound like our daughter at all."

"I understand." She produced a small black device, putting it on the table next to her empty tea-cup, then placing a small crystal cube in a socket in the top. "Be warned, it will be a shock." Tapping the device with a finger made it beep faintly then do something amazing. They all stared as the end wall of the loving room vanished, replaced with a life-sized, perfectly real looking three dimensional image.

The first recording was of their eldest child, or someone they were assured was her despite the fact that they were having trouble recognising her, in the uniform they were familiar with from the news, walking in tight circles on the roof of the very building they were currently in having a good old-fashioned rant at someone invisible, in a manner that made it clear she was extremely angry and not entirely right in the head. They got worse from there. The one with her shouting at Minako, then pushing her into helping with the assassination plan, made them look at the blonde and the blonde look at the floor, her cheeks red.

The ones on the deserted world were worse. By the last one, the cold smile as she waited by the weird blue-glowing portal to kill the woman who was watching sympathetically from across the room when she emerged from it sent chills down all three backs. "Enough," Kenji finally said. "Turn it off." The projected images vanished. The room was silent for a while.

"Who is Luna?" Shingo asked after thirty seconds or so had passed. Yori looked at him.

"She's an innocent victim of all of this." The woman explained the splinter personality that resided within their daughter and sister. "Only the nine girls can see, hear, and interact with her normally, although she's an intelligent, sentient, and decent person in her own right. We came up with a method to see and hear her which is a little involved but lets us talk to her. Unfortunately, the very thing that created her has made Usagi even worse than she would have been otherwise. Splinter personalities, or the process that creates them at least, usually have some pretty bad long term effects on the host mind."

"We can take you to see her," Chou suggested, glancing at her partner for a moment. "She's under the care of a friend of ours, a mind mage called Hnther. He's been dealing with all of the mental problems caused by this whole affair. We're very good at the physical healing but dealing with injuries to the mind is outside our experience. Hnther is a real expert and has called in specialists in this type of problem."

"Will she be all right?" Kenji asked, slightly recovered from the sight of seeing his daughter acting and sounding like a super-villain from a movie. They looked at each other again, which made his heart fall. Ikuko made a little sound of horror, while Shingo swore quietly to himself. He didn't have the energy to reprimand the boy.

"The damage to her mind is severe," Yori told them gently. "Hnther is the best person to explain it to you, I think."

Glancing at his wife, then his son, Kenji nodded. "Take us to her."

"OK." She picked up the little device she'd used and made it vanish somehow. "We need to go through a portal."

"A portal?" Shingo squeaked, looking both excited and terrified all of a sudden. The young woman in black silk nodded, smiling a little.

"Yes."

"Demons come through portals."

"Sometimes, yes."

The mix of excitement and terror slid slightly further to the terror side of the equation.

"But..."

"Don't worry, Son, I'm sure this Hnther isn't a demon," Kenji said reassuringly, glancing at the visitors. The way they looked at each other, even Minako, made him stop dead. "Is he?" he asked in a much smaller, somewhat frightened, voice.

"Technically, I suppose you'd probably call him that if you lived around here," Yori replied, smiling a little. All three of them gaped. "He's not human, no. But he's both a very trusted and experienced mind mage and a good friend. Don't let what you've seen on the news put you off. The vast majority of people who travel through portals are just peaceful visitors, traders, and tourists. Even if they look a little unusual."

"But... But... A demon? Really?" Ikuko was staring at them with wide eyes. "A demon is treating our daughter?"

"A very good person is treating your daughter," Chou told her, gently amused. "What he looks like and where he comes from is irrelevant for the moment."

"Hnther is OK, Mr and Mrs Tsukino," Minako told them, looking tired but not worried. A weight seemed to have lifted from her during the last hour, although Kenji could see she was still upset. "It was a shock for me as well. For six or seven years I've been hunting demons, or trying not to be killed by one. I didn't expect to find out there were friendly ones." She sighed slightly. "It makes me wonder how many of the previous problems we had would have gone away if we'd just talked instead. Like Yori does."

The black-haired young woman shrugged when they looked at her. "You'd be surprised how often that works." She stood up. "Are you ready?"

"Will I need a coat?" Ikuko asked inanely, then looked embarrassed. Chou giggled.

"No, it's nice and warm there." Smiling at them, she added, "You might want shoes, though." They quickly put on their outdoor shoes, then waited. "Don't worry, you don't feel anything going through a portal," she reassured them, as they all stared in amazement when space in the corner of the room rippled and tore open with a crackle, the blue-glowing hole hanging in the air eerily.

Shingo gaped at it, then moved closer to his parents, who exchanged glances. "I'll meet you there, love," Yori said, looking at Chou, then the Tsukino family. "I need to get someone else and bring her as well. I won't be long." She left the apartment, the sound of the door closing almost the only sound other than a soft crackling sound emanating from the apparition in the corner.

"Shall we go?" Chou asked quietly, waving towards it. "Are you coming, Minako?" The girl with the long blonde hair similar to their daughters nodded, before turning and walking to and into the portal without hesitation. She vanished with a slightly louder crackle. After several seconds, Kenji took a deep breath, looking at his wife, then walked over to the thing. Cautiously he waved a hand at it, then poked it. Nothing jumped out and bit the appendage off. Holding his wife's hand he glanced at Chou, who made an encouraging gesture, smiling a little.

"I can't believe we're doing this," he muttered, before walking forward. Ikuko and Shingo followed, with Chou behind them. The portal imploded a moment later, leaving an empty apartment behind.

"They're not happy," Ami observed from the roof of the next building, from where she'd been watching through the SI link.

"No. You can't blame them," 'Yori' sighed. "That was very hard to do. The next part will be harder."

"We need to let them know, though. They have a right to know what's going on with Usagi, and to give permission if we have to do... something irreversible."

"Yep." They were silent for a moment. Eventually, generating a portal to one side, Yori entered it, Ami following her.

Ikuko Tsukino couldn't help the little squeak of shock that came from her when she saw the two metre or more tall, scale-covered and hooved form of the demon waiting for them. He even looked like a demon. Wearing a nearly black robe with silver thread embroidery producing some weird patterns on it, his tail was visible below the hem, twitching around. Eyes quite similar to a cat's inspected them curiously. Oddly, after the initial surprise during which she'd grabbed Kenji's arm hard enough to make him yelp slightly, she found the look in those eyes seemed to reassure her a little. It was obvious that there was a very intelligent being behind them, one she felt was sympathetic.

Kenji was watching the mage cautiously, while Shingo was practically hiding behind them, looking around with shock. "This is Hnther," Chou said politely. "He doesn't speak much Japanese although he's learning, so I'll translate. Just speak normally to him, I'll do the rest." She said something to the creature in a weird-sounding language, causing him to nod in a surprisingly human-like manner.

"I'm pleased to meet you although sorry it is under such circumstances," the mage said through Chou, her voice following his easily. "Please come with me, I'll take you to your daughter." With a glance at each other and a reassuring smile from Chou, the Tsukino family followed him as requested, looking around with surprised interest. While different in the details the overall effect of the building was fairly close to what they considered normal, reducing the fear that had come over Ikuko when she'd thought about Usagi being in the hands of a demon. Passing a window she looked out to see a scene that seemed peaceful, lit by a low sun that was an unusual colour. She stared as some sort of vehicle passed on a road visible through the window, floating a few centimetres off the ground and moving quite fast without wheels being involved at all.

Minako came up beside her, followed her gaze, then smiled a little. "I thought that sort of thing was weird the first time I saw it," she confided. "I still do." They hurried after the demon mage, who had slowed to wait for them, looking back. Entering a room at the end of the passageway they found it contained something very bed-like on which their daughter was apparently asleep, along with a number of chairs and a low table. Hnther moved to Usagi and bent over her for a moment, apparently checking something, then straightened up and turned to them.

"She is deeply unconscious, in a state similar to medical anaesthesia, only somewhat more involved. I have turned off the higher functioning of her brain to prevent more damage occurring," he told them through Chou. "It's not ideal, but I can if necessary wake her. I would prefer not to unless there is a genuine need, it will inevitably cause more problems, and it would have to be for a very short time." He glanced at Chou for a moment, then looked around as Yori and another girl, dressed in something fairly similar to what she was wearing but in shades of blue and white came into the room, nodding to them, before returning to the Tsukinos. "However I would suggest not doing so at this point."

Ikuko and Kenji looked at each other, then went to look down on her daughter. Yori and the blue-haired girl with her brought a couple of chairs over then moved back out of the way silently. They sat, staring at the pale face lying on the pillow, blonde hair surrounding it, looking like the girl was merely asleep. Her expression was peacefully neutral. Reaching out Ikuko picked up her daughter's right hand and held it.

Sensing a presence beside her, she looked up to see her other child staring at his sister. She took his hand with her free one. The family sat there for a while, until Yori moved around to the other side of the bed and pulled up a chair of her own, Hnther standing beside her, with Chou next to him. "We're genuinely sorry about this whole thing," the young woman said quietly, studying the unconscious girl for a moment then looking at them. "We've had our differences for some time, but she didn't, doesn't, deserve this. None of them do. That damn time machine has caused a lot of problems for her and her entire group, not to mention everyone else."

"Can you help her?" Kenji asked, looking pleadingly at the three people on the other side of the bed. There was no answer for a moment, then Hnther spoke.

"It's a complex problem with no easy solution, I'm afraid. The memory damage is quite involved while the mental issues caused by both it and the splinter personality are considerably more so. If it was only one or the other I would be fairly sure a cure was something that could be worked on, although a complete cure might be difficult. With all the issues added together it is... more problematic. We will need to examine her for some time and run some simulations before we can decide on the correct path to take. I'm very reluctant indeed to try anything without a full understanding of all the intricacies of her illness, going in before that would risk irreversible
"What happens if you can't cure her?" Shingo asked, holding his mother's hand tightly and staring at the still figure of his sister. He raised his eyes to meet the mage's almost defiantly. Hnther looked back calmly.

"That is the problem. There are only a limited number of options, none of them good. That's what we need to discuss."

"She's in no state to give her permission for any of this," Yori said to them. "We need you to know what the options are, so we can work out the best way to deal with it all. I'm afraid that you're not going to like any of them but none of us can think of any others. If you can, please, tell us. We're willing to try more or less anything sensible." She took a moment to allow them to understand, then began talking, Hnther adding his own part as they listened. By the end of it, Ikuko was in tears and Shingo was sitting in the corner, his head on his knees. Kenji seemed almost in a trance.

When the pair stopped explaining, there was dead silence for long enough it was beginning to get uncomfortable. "There's nothing else?" The Tsukino woman stared at them. Yori shrugged unhappily.

"Not that we've been able to come up with. Curing her is the ideal solution, but as we've explained, it's not very likely. There's just too much damage to her mind. Letting her go as she is isn't feasible, she's extremely dangerous in her current state, I can guarantee that the death toll would be enormous unless we put her somewhere all on her own, which isn't exactly either fair or humane. Simply killing her would almost be the kindest thing under those circumstances, but is also hardly ideal, leaving out the morality of it. She's not quite an innocent victim, but none of what's happened recently is really her fault or anything she could do much to prevent."

"The memory erasure and age reset that Yori suggested is currently the best solution we can devise absent a true cure," Hnther added. "I will agree that it's not perfect, but it would seem to be the best of a series of bad solutions to a very difficult problem."

"I can't believe we're even discussing killing my daughter," Kenji exploded, looking horrified. His wife grabbed him as he began to rise, slightly worried he'd fling himself across the bed in his anger. "That's no solution!"

Yori watched him sympathetically, making no attempt to either move or defend herself.

"In most ways, I agree with you completely. I don't like killing, it's very final and there's often a better way if you think it through. But sometimes, despite whatever you try, there's no other way to deal with a threat. Almost all the girls in my line of work understand that and have faced it on more than one occasion, in the same way the police do, and soldiers."

"But she's an eighteen year old schoolgirl," he fumed, glaring at her. "My daughter. She's hardly a 'threat'."

"You saw the recordings," she replied. Reluctantly, after a tense moment, he nodded. "She's a very powerful magical girl, one with a number of very dangerous abilities. Usagi's not exactly the best fighter around, true, but the damage she could cause if she wanted is... pretty horrific. It was only pure luck coupled with very fast work by some friends of mine that stopped people dying during that mall incident two and a half weeks ago. The next time, I doubt we'd be that lucky, especially as I have a feeling she might well be trying to kill people." She looked at him, as did everyone else. "Would you want that on your conscience?"
"No," he mumbled, after a few seconds had passed. "But... I can't believe she's that dangerous."

"You have no idea how much damage a magical girl, even a fairly low powered one, could cause." Yori smiled at him. "She's not low powered. Neither are my friends and I. A full blown, no holds barred fight between people like us in a populated area would be a very bad thing, trust me. That's why we always try to shut a situation like that down as quickly as we can. Even so the collateral damage can be pretty bad." Seeing that he didn't look convinced, she somehow pulled a crowbar from nowhere, holding it up, then handing it to him. He took it, looking puzzled.

"How did you..." he mumbled, then caught himself. "Oh. Right. Magic. What's this for?" Ikuko and Shingo were also looking at it.

"A small demonstration. Is it a real crowbar?" Weighing it in his hands, he nodded. She glanced at Chou, who held out her hand. "Sorry, this is ridiculously dramatic, but it should give you an idea." Kenji handed the blonde woman the tool. She took it, then without hesitation swung it blurringly fast at her partner's head, the impact making a very solid sound accompanied by a ringing as if she'd hit a concrete block. Yori didn't move a millimetre as the solid steel bar slammed into the top of her head. Shingo yelped, while his parents stared in horror. Even Minako jumped.

Holding up the crowbar for a moment, Chou passed it back over the bed to Kenji, who took it numbly. He looked at it, then his wife and son. The tool was now ruined, bent into a half-circle where the impossibly hard blow had wrapped it around the young woman's head in an implausibly worrying demonstration of both strength and toughness. Yori let them look at it for a little while without saying anything. Eventually Kenji passed it to his wife, who just stared at the thing in shock.

"Usagi and most of her friends aren't quite that tough or strong, but they're not far off. If you hit her like that she'd swear a lot, have a small bruise, then in the state she's in at the moment, probably kill you without a second thought. How do you think anyone would stop her? Shoot her? It would bounce, or she'd just catch it. Even a large-calibre bullet would just piss her off without doing very much damage. You'd only get one shot as well." The girl watched as they tried to absorb the information. "If she went back in the state she's in, got loose, and decided to make the prophecy her team has been following for years come true, the casualty figures would be horrible by the time we stopped her."

"Oh, god," Ikuko said faintly, staring at the bent crowbar, then the young women and the demon on the other side of the bed. She dropped the tool to the floor and put her face in her hands.

"We're not going to do anything for some time," Hnther said, Chou somehow getting across the gentle tone of his voice as she translated. "There's no hurry. She is in no danger while she's in this state, she could remain like this for some years without harm. Obviously we don't want that to happen, but it gives time to work out a solution. But you should prepare yourselves to accept the fact that there may be no good solution other than the ones we've talked about."

"What would happen if you did erase her memory like you talked about?" Shingo asked in a low voice. The mage looked at him.

"We would have to excise approximately two years of experiences completely, then edit another four to five to remove specific memories that were inserted by the time device and repair the tangled ones the insertion caused. It would take some time, but the result would be as if she lost two to three years of her life. That would be permanently gone. The essential personality of your sister wouldn't be affected and with those damaged memories gone, she would be much as you remember her from that point in her life."
"Her inherent magical ability could be suppressed for a while as well, although not permanently," Yori added. "Eventually, no matter what we did, it would return. Hopefully by the time it did she would have matured to the point she could be properly trained in how to use it. Without the influence of the time machine, she'd end up more or less what she should have been. But the magical girl thing is part of her for good." The young woman smiled slightly for a moment. "It's not all bad, believe me. Despite a lot of issues we've had with bringing some of the more irresponsible girls in check, overall they tend to be a very civic-minded and decent group. Just a little... excessive."

"There's never been a case like this before," Chou added, briefly taking time away from translating for Hnther, which Yori immediately began filling in. "The various groups sometimes fight each other, often just to see what will happen, but there's never been one that imploded like this. Without the time machine's involvement, it wouldn't have ended up at this point. Your daughter and her friends are basically good people." She smiled at them. "Admittedly without the time machine they probably wouldn't be magical girls in the first place but I hope you understand the point."

"I think so," Ikuko replied slowly. "And your idea was to somehow make her younger, regress her to the point she was physically the age that matched her memories?"

"Yes. There are several ways to do that which I'm aware of. It seems like the best solution if we have to proceed in that direction."

"But what about everyone else who knows her?" Kenji asked. "All her friends, and the neighbours, everything like that. Sooner or later someone would start asking questions. What about school? She's nearly finished high school now."

"It's complicated, true," Chou replied, sighing a little. "But not impossibly so. We have contacts in the government that could supply you all with new identities, relocate you if necessary, and we could change your appearances so no one would realise the truth. That's one solution. Another would be to change just Usagi, then claim she was a cousin or something like that. Again, the records could be made to match. That would be a little more difficult but it's possible. Explaining Usagi's disappearance would take some work but I'm sure it could be done."

The blue-haired girl who they still hadn't got the name of suggested, "If you really wanted to, you could even stick mostly to the truth and claim that Usagi had suffered some weird magical accident and ended up three years younger with some memories missing. You live in the middle of Minato, it wouldn't surprise anyone too much. Weird things happen there all the time. It's not even the craziest thing I've heard recently."

"Yes, that's an interesting idea as well," Chou commented, nodding. "It has the advantage of being simple." She looked back to the Tsukinos. "You see, there are a number of possibilities. None of them are ideal, I'm afraid, but with the circumstances that have been forced on us, sooner or later we may well have to pick one."

"We'll have to arrange a suitable excuse for why she's missing school," Yori put in, Chou going back to translating again. "But we can do that without too much trouble. It gives Hnther and his people time to work out the best move, and you to decide what you'd like to do if they can't cure her. We should hope for the best but plan for the worst, as the saying has it."

Ikuko looked at her husband for a while, then her son. "We're going to have to discuss all this alone."

"That's fine. Like Hnther says, there's no real hurry." Yori reached over and handed them a business card each. "You can get me on that number. Let me know when you want to talk about it, or come back to visit Usagi. I'm happy to bring you, or if I'm unavailable, I can arrange it."

"Thank you," Kenji said. He looked at the card his wife was holding and his eyes widened slightly. Yori snickered.

"Magic business cards." She explained the cards, making them both stare at her for a moment, then exchange glances.

"How strange," Ikuko said quietly. She looked at her daughter again. "Can we meet Luna?"

"Sure. Hold on for a moment, it's a little fiddly to set up." The blue-haired girl accepted the small device Yori held out to her, the same one that she'd used in the apartment to show the disturbing recordings of Usagi, then put it on the table, fiddling with it for a moment. She nodded to the black-haired woman.

"I'm ready." Yori reached out and touched the girl in the bed in a few places, a purple glow flickering around her fingertips, then made way for Hnther, who bent over Usagi, concentrating. A moment later a curious female voice spoke from behind them, making them turn and stare at the small black cat sitting on the floor watching them.

"How long this time?" The cat asked, inspecting the three Tsukino family members curiously.

"Another twenty hours," Yori replied. It nodded. "This is Luna." The cat looked at each of them in turn, then sighed, making them stare.

"Presumably you've been told what's going on?" Luna asked them.

They all nodded in synchronism, staring. A few seconds passed in silence.

"You're a cat." Shingo looked at his parents, who looked back then they all stared at Luna again. Somehow, she managed to look irritated.

"Yes, I know."

"And you talk."

"Quite a lot, yes." Luna looked at Yori, who grinned at her. "Some say too much."

"But you're a cat."

"And you're a twit," the animal said acidly. "Stop stating the obvious and talk sense."

"Hey!" Shingo looked annoyed, while Luna laughed. Ikuko shook her head, blinking a few times, then turned to Yori.

"You didn't mention Luna was a cat."

"Sorry. She's a cat. More or less." Walking over to the small animal who was still watching them, she knelt down and waved her hand through it.

"Stop that, you idiot," the cat hissed out of the side of its mouth. Yori chuckled.

"Why do you care, you can't feel it."

"It's undignified." The two of them bickered like old friends, apparently enjoying the byplay, while Ikuko and her family watched in amazement. Finally she cleared her throat.
"Excuse me?" Both cat and magical girl turned to gaze at her. "You've known our daughter for some time, Luna?"

"Yes," the cat sighed, suddenly looking sad, rather than the oddly happy irritation she'd displayed up until then. "We're sort of stuck with each other, being in the same brain and all."

"I see." She glanced at her husband, who didn't seem to know what to say. "What do you think we should do?"

"I'm somewhat biased, of course. If Usagi dies, I go with her." Luna scowled which looked weird on the little furry face. "Despite everything I'd prefer that didn't happen. Even with the absolute pain in the ass she turned into over the last few months she was my friend for a long time as well. But I can't stay inside her for much longer, or bad things will happen to both of us." She glanced at Yori, who shrugged.

"Still working on that. It's only been a day, give me time, OK?"

"Hurry up. It's cramped in here." The cat giggled. Everyone stared at it, causing her to look slightly embarrassed. "Sorry, I make jokes when I'm nervous."

"Make better ones," Minako suggested, a small smile on her face. Luna cast an evil look her way, then pretended she hadn't heard.

"I mentioned that a splinter personality, in most cases, is something that causes long term mental health issues, you remember," Yori asked, turning back to Usagi's family. Ikuko nodded slowly. "We're trying to come up with a method to somehow remove Luna without harming her. I've got some ideas I need to do some more research on, which will take some time yet..." The cat sighed, making her grin at it. "... But I'm pretty hopeful. It's another reason not to rush anything. Two minds are at stake, even if it's only one brain."

"This is all too much," the elder Tsukino said softly, shaking her head. Kenji squeezed her hand. "I think we need to go back and discuss it all."

"Of course. No problem." Yori looked at Luna, who sighed.

"Back into limbo. Hurry up and get me out, OK? It's getting tedious."

"I'll keep on it." The magical girl smiled at the insubstantial cat, who nodded back, then waited. Hnther bent over Usagi again. They watched as the cat simply vanished as if she'd never existed, which was unnervingly close to the truth. Picking up the small device the blue-haired girl made it disappear then went to stand beside Minako, who glanced at her, but said nothing.

Chou talked to Hnther in that odd language for a little while, the mind mage nodding occasionally, then waved to him. As a portal appeared, she gestured to it gracefully. "Your living room is right through there. Do you want any of us to come back with you?"

Glancing at her husband, Ikuko shook her head, walking over to the young woman and holding out her hand. Chou shook it, as did Yori. "No, I think we need to be alone. Minako, if you could come back, though, we'd like to ask a few questions, if that's all right." The blonde nodded, coming to stand with them. Ikuko turned to Yori.

"Thank you for all you've done for our daughter. We'll think about everything you've told us and get in contact soon."

"That's fine. If you need to know anything else, just call me. One last thing, please don't tell anyone else about what we told you. Very few people know about the time machine, we'd like to keep it like that, at least for now. We don't want people to panic."

"I understand, I think. We don't want anyone to know about this either, I think." She looked at her family, both of whom nodded silently. "We'll keep it quiet."

"Thanks." Yori shook their hands. Smiling at her for a moment, Ikuko walked through the portal with her husband, her son and her daughter's friend following. They found themselves back where they started from, the portal vanishing a couple of seconds later with a pop like the cork coming out of a bottle of champagne. The four people stared at each other for a while, eventually sitting down.

Ikuko began crying, all the emotion she'd bottled up for the last couple of hours coming out at once. Kenji held her, his own eyes full of tears, while Shingo and Minako stared at the floor.

Eventually, she recovered, and they began talking.

"How did it go?" Nabiki asked, looking up as Ranma and her sister came in. They both looked melancholy.

"As well as you might expect, I guess," the martial artist said, slumping down beside her. "Not as well as I'd like. We told them everything, now it's up to them to decide. Hnther and his team will start working out what can be done beginning next week, but it's going to be at least a month before they even know whether a cure is possible or if we have no choice but to go for a more drastic solution."

"Ami's suggestion might be worth looking at," Kasumi suggested. He looked at her for a second.

"Possibly. It probably wouldn't work anywhere else, but she has a point. This is Minato. You only have to look in the basement to see weird shit happens here."

Closing her book, Nabiki watched them for a moment, then made a call on the com. Twenty seconds later Aiko and the rest of her group appeared next to the sofa. "Come on. It's a nice day, let's go out for a meal. We haven't been back to that Thai fusion place for a while." She jumped to her feet. "I need some food, you guys need to relax after a difficult job." She held out both hands. A couple of seconds passed then her sister and brother-in-law nodded, smiled, and allowed themselves to be pulled to their feet. Shortly they were piling into two taxis, leaving the magical world behind for one afternoon and just going out as friends and family.

The ward system noticed that the effects caused by the collapse of the time loop had mostly subsided in the last few days, although there were one or two odd things still happening as the resonances faded...

It became abruptly more alert as it detected the fabric of the universe getting a knot in it for a moment, watching the results curiously.

Humming to herself, in a good mood, Chiyoko headed home with her staff over her shoulder, idly wondering yet again what that weird light three days ago had been. She resolved to ask Tamiko the next time she saw the woman.

It had been a fairly good day, all things considered. She'd only destroyed two cars and a telephone box dealing with her mini-demons, which was something of a record for her. Most of the little terrors had run off back to wherever they came from, while four of them had evaporated under the impact of her staff beam. All in all, not bad, she felt.

An odd sensation made her stop, looking around. It seemed to be coming from down an alley to the right. Puzzled, she headed over to investigate, getting her weapon ready just in case. Stopping at the end of the alley she peered in, seeing nothing more than some commercial garbage containers ten metres in, then the shadows leading back to the rear of the large block of buildings she was walking past. The sensation seemed to be coming from somewhere down at the other end.

Holding the staff ready, in a manner that would have made anyone who knew her find something very solid to hide behind, and Tamiko to go purple, she headed further in, walking cautiously. As she brushed against the wall she found a streak of something horrible had stained the sleeve of her elaborate dress, causing her to stop and mutter "Ook" in a disgusted tone. Brushing at it only spread it around and made her grimace, sighing.

The sensation came again. Forgetting about the dress, she pushed on. Rounding the corner Chiyoko found herself in a small loading dock of some sort, completely empty and very dirty, high walls all around blocking most of the late afternoon light, the alley heading into it then out the other side, gloomy and damp, puddles from the previous morning's light rain still present. She stood in the entrance to the wider area looking around. "Weird. I wonder what..."

As she spoke, the wall on the other side of the small courtyard rippled oddly, disgorging an unusually dressed man. The sensation of his arrival was similar to the magic of a portal but strangely different in a way she couldn't really describe. The man was also strangely different, but in his case he was easy to describe, although as she gaped, she also thought no one would believe her.

He certainly looked human, more or less, although there was a very unusual type of magic wafting from him, but two things stood out. One was his clothes and the other was the air of complete terror he radiated. The clothes consisted mainly of a set of tatty robes topped by a rat-eaten and battered tall pointed hat with some sort of writing on it in tasteless sequins. The terror was both in his aura and in his eyes. She stared as he looked wildly around, screamed something in a language she'd never heard before, then sprinted past her, diving into the darkest part of the alley at a speed that she found impressive. He didn't spare her a glance.

"Hey!" she called after him. "Mister? Are you all right?" There was no answer.

The sensation came again, causing her to whirl back, just in time to see a huge creature that seemed to be made of stone charge out of the wall, brandishing a huge club, then thunder past her with heavy footsteps, roaring something that sounded very rude even through the language barrier. She stared in disbelief as it disappeared after the first arrival.

"Um. Hey?" she said in a small voice. Once more, there was no answer.

A few seconds passed silently, then she walked over to the wall both strange visitors had come out of. Looking carefully at it she poked it suspiciously with the end of her staff, which grated on brick. It seemed like nothing more than a normal wall. Prodding it in a few more places proved to her it was totally solid and completely uninteresting*. Stepping back she stared for a second or two.

"What's going on?" she wondered out loud, then yipped in shock as for the third time the wall rippled, producing the strangest thing yet.

The magical girl gaped at the wooden trunk that was literally standing in the middle of the courtyard, on lots and lots of little legs. Too startled even to point her staff at it, she watched as it moved all those legs in a complicated dance, rotating in a complete circle, then stopped facing her. She got the weirdest feeling it was looking at her plaintively.

After a few more seconds, she pointed. "They went that way," she said. The trunk opened its lid slightly with a creak of hinges then snapped it shut, turned to the direction she was pointing, and scuttled off, all the little feet making a pattering sound on the concrete. She watched it until it vanished into the darkness.

There was silence once more.

Turning and staring very hard at the wall, she waited. Nothing happened. She waited some more. Nothing continued happening. After a long moment she cautiously poked it again, quite hard, in several places.

It was still just a wall.

Eventually, she rather reluctantly went after the three weird beings, if indeed two of them could even be described as such, following the footprints.

Normal size ones.

Huge great ones, that had left dents in some of the old rotten concrete.

And lots and lots of little ones, very close together.

After a hundred metres or so she arrived at another wall, all the footprints leading towards it. This wall was at the end of the alley, terminating it in a very final manner. She looked around, then up, then around again. She poked the wall experimentally.

It was as solid as the first one.

She couldn't feel anything weird any more, although she decided that the entire experience could be described in those terms. Even for Minato, even for her, this was somewhat unusual. When another five minutes went by with nothing interesting happening, she shrugged, put the staff back over her shoulder, and went home.

Chiyoko did decide, though, that she wasn't going to mention it to anyone.

Some things were unbelievable even to a magical girl.

*This was a little unfair, it was a very well made wall and to a bricklayer would have stood out as a shining example of wall-kind.

The peculiar after-effect died away and all was still again, the fabric of the universe (which is a sort of paisley pattern, seen from the correct vantage point) returning to normal as the last of the loose energies damped out. The system watched for a moment more, then decided that there was no threat and went back to standby.

We'll miss you, Pterry.
Chapter 88

Blasted work, jumping on me out of the dark and making me have to do it. Very annoying. Sorry once again about the long delay. Too much to do, not enough time to do it all, and various other matters getting in the way of having fun writing.

My apologies that my real life is getting in the way of your entertainment :)

Never mind, I’ve got more words for you all to use as you see fit. I have half the chapter after this one done, most of the chapter after the chapter after that done as well, and have started on the one in between, which will be the Great Akane (and Shampoo) Meets Hollywood epic. Will Hollywood survive? Will Akane (and Shampoo)?

I don’t know, I haven’t written it yet ;) I’m curious to find out. I’ve got a weekend with nothing much else to do so I may end up spending most of it writing.

Amusing fact... After typing so much over the last year and a half or so, my typing speed has increased from about 20 WPM, non-touch typing, to over 50WPM, touch-typing. If nothing else this hobby seems to be an effective method of learning to type properly!

Tying up the last few loose ends, then moving back to the fun parts...

"Weird."
"Yep."
"Impressive, though."
"Yep."
"And damn old."
"Yep."

Nabiki sighed, looking askance at Ranma who was standing beside her, being rewarded with a smirk for her trouble.

"Idiot."

They looked around curiously in the light from the ki balls they were all holding, having shifted the glow to white. Nabiki looked up. 'How thick do you suppose that ice is, Jun?'

#Without the correct instruments it’s difficult to be completely accurate, Nabiki, but my best estimate is approximately six hundred and fifty metres on average.#

'No danger of it collapsing?'

#No, it’s stable. The surface temperature is above freezing, barely, but the ice itself is well below that point and structurally sound. It has been stable for thousands of years. Its weight will eventually make it slump but that will take years.#

The middle sister nodded absently, going back to looking around the enormous cavern. The ground under the ice formed a shallow valley, which the original underside of the vast mass oddly seemed to be avoiding, going from high point to high point and leaving the depression in the middle untouched. It had clearly been full of water until recently, though. Now, aside from a steady dripping of ice-water from high above them, it was mostly empty exposed rock and mud, a dark tunnel to one side on the lowest point evidence of where all the water had gone.

"Looks like it melted fifty or sixty metres into the ice when the power was pulled out and put back," Misaki reported, staring upwards with interest. "Probably practically boiled the water in here as well. It found a weak point over there and melted it's way out, I'd think all the way to the sea, which is in that direction not too far away."

"It looks that way," Ranma nodded, glancing to where she was pointing, then returning to examining the huge stone circle the rest of them were wandering around in. "It's pretty damn incredible. This must be a lot like how Stonehenge looked originally, only on a larger scale."

"Is it safe, magically?" Nabiki asked, slightly worried. She could feel considerable magical potency somewhere below them gently humming away. He glanced at her for a moment, raising an eyebrow, then nodded again.

"Yes, the power is stored a long way down, it usually is in these things. Like Uluru, it's several kilometres down at least. There's a low level but effective preservation spell on the place which is probably what made the ice avoid it. I wonder who built it, what for, and when?"

"A hell of a long time ago, but other than that, no idea," she replied, watching Kasumi investigate one of the stones, which was in astoundingly good condition. Several camera drones were flying about recording everything. "It's going to make the archaeologists very surprised."

"If they ever find it." He turned to her. "It's not exactly easy to get to for more normal people, after all, even assuming anyone looked here in the first place. Although it would make the careers of anyone who did."

Nabiki smiled slowly. "Well, I have an idea on that front..." She explained, making him begin to grin.

Jerry looked at the email he'd been sent, puzzled. Re-reading it for the third time, he shook his head slightly, before turning in his seat and pulling a large atlas from the bookshelf next to the window that overlooked the car park three floors below, then pushed the keyboard and mouse to one side and opened the book. Flipping through it for a moment he found the right page, bending over it intently, his finger moving across until it stopped nearly at the top of the page. The finger tapped the paper once, then moved slightly to the right and up. "Hmm. Interesting."

He double-checked the coordinates before printing the email, standing up and taking both the printout and the atlas with him, then leaving his office and walking a few doors down the corridor. He opened one of them after a quick knock. The middle-aged woman at the desk in the other office turned around and looked quizzically at him as he entered. "Hey, Jerry."

"Hi, Martta. Look, that friend of yours in the Forces, you remember, Liam or something?" She smiled.

"Liam, that's right. What about him?"

"You said he was stationed in Alert, way the hell up in Nunavut?"

"Yes. He's doing something he can't talk about with some sort of listening post there. I think they're probably monitoring the Russians or the Chinese still, or at least keeping an eye out for trouble. It's pretty boring, I guess, he always seems to like calling and talking for hours. Good thing the military is footing the phone bill."

The archaeologist nodded absently, still looking at the atlas he was holding. "Right. OK, you said at lunch the other day that he'd said there was something weird going on with a glacier nearby?"

Martta raised an eyebrow. "Yes, there's an environmental monitoring station on the base as well, a sort of weather station on steroids. They've got a number of automated monitoring stations scattered around all over the place up there measuring all sorts of things, including salinity, some sort of long term experiment on ice melt rates. He said one of them had picked up a strange sudden decrease in salinity in one of the bays about seven hundred kilometres to the west. They're putting it down to a sub-glacial lake suddenly breaking open under the ice and dumping a lot of fresh water into the ocean. It happens, although not very commonly, and no one has seen anything this large before."

Raising his eyes from the atlas, Jerry returned her gaze. "Interesting. Has anyone gone to have a look?"

She shrugged. "Not as far as I know. It's quite a distance, you can't really get there by boat without a lot of effort because of all the sea ice even at this time of year, and flying in without a prepared runway is a little awkward. You could do it with a helicopter but it's right on the limit of range for most of them. That's what Liam told me, anyway. I asked the same question. In any case there might not be much to see, after all, the ice there is about six hundred metres thick. The woman looked at the atlas he was holding. "What's all this about?"

"I'm not sure. But I got an odd email just now." He plunked the book on her desk unceremoniously, moving a couple of textbooks to the side without looking at them, and causing Martta to grab at a mug full of pens that nearly ended up on the floor.

"Hey, be careful."

"Sorry." He didn't look away from the page. Pointing, he added, "Alert is here, right?" She stared at him for a brief moment then turned her attention to where he was pointing, pushing her glasses up and peering at the page carefully. She nodded, swiping a lock of dark brown hair out of her eyes.

"Yes. An awful long way from anything. The most northerly inhabited place on the planet." Shivering theatrically she laughed slightly. "Too cold for me by a long way. Even at this time of year it's only about four degrees or something like that. You don't want to know what it's like in the winter."

"OK. Where is this sensor station that recorded the salinity change?" Once more she looked at him, slightly more puzzled this time, but shrugged a little. Thinking back to her conversation with her old friend, she pointed.

"Just about here, I think." Jerry looked at where her finger had landed on the page.

"Now, that is very interesting indeed," he mused, rubbing his chin. "Very interesting indeed."

After thirty seconds had passed without further comment, she sighed a little, prodding him in the side. "What's very interesting indeed, Jer? Why the sudden interest in sub-glacial water flows? You're an archaeologist, not a climatologist."

"That email I got was from someone I've never heard of before," he began, "the sort of thing you get occasionally. I thought it was spam at first. But the wording was all wrong for that and it came from an email address in Japan, not exactly the normal place for spam. I can't find anything at all out about the sender, or the email account. The person behind it seems to have done their homework on me, they referenced several studies I've been involved with, and a couple of papers I've written." He looked thoughtful for a moment. "And now that I think about it, one of those hasn't been published yet."

"And?" His friend and colleague watched and listened curiously.

"And, they said that there was something I might find interesting, professionally speaking, located under the ice far to the north, something that was in my field of study. They gave a set of coordinates." He tapped the map with a pen that he pulled from his pocket. "Those coordinates are right there."

Martta looked at the place the pen was indicating, then the place her finger was still resting on. The two locations were only about fifteen kilometres apart and the one Jerry was pointing to seemed to be uphill from the first one, judging by the contour lines. She inspected the map closely for a few seconds before looking up. "That's one hell of a long way away from any archaeological site I've ever heard of," she said slowly. He nodded, equally slowly.

"Exactly."

"It could just be someone playing a trick on you."

"Is the salinity change real?" he responded. It was her turn to nod.

"Liam said all the diagnostics checked out. Sensor failure was the first thing they thought of but the self-test seems to rule that out."

"It's a weird coincidence," he remarked.

After a moment, she asked, "Can I see the email?" He handed her the printout, which she read with interest. "Strange. But I agree, whoever wrote this is obviously very well educated and informed." She looked up. "Why send it to you?"

"No idea, aside from the fact that my speciality is neolithic culture of North America. They said as much in the email."

"And you're certain, you've never met this..." She looked at the email address, "MS.Aoyama? Is that a man or a woman?"

"I have no idea, and I don't know. Whoever it is seems to like large words, though. Amazingly enough, all used correctly. They obviously have a very large vocabulary." He grinned. She re-read the email and laughed a little.

"It sounds like it was written by someone very intelligent but with a strange outlook on life. You're sure it's not some sort of quack? I've had ones like that, you know the sort of thing, You need to dig here, that's where the aliens buried the spaceport when they left after building the pyramids or something along those lines." Chuckling, he shrugged slightly.

"Yes, I've had those as well. I have no idea if it's real or not, but something about it just doesn't feel like that."

They were both silent for a moment, then Martta picked up her phone and dialled. "Who are you calling?" he asked curiously.
"My cousin Pauli. He's in the RCMP in Toronto, in the electronic crimes division. I bet he could find out something about that email address." Jerry stared at her for a couple of seconds, but before he could say anything, she smiled, speaking into the phone. A greeting in her ancestral Finnish was followed by English.

"Yes, it's been a while, Pauli. Look, I'd love to catch up, but I have a slightly weird request first. Can you trace an email address for me?" She looked up at Jerry who was listening, then tapped the speaker phone button and replaced the handset. Mid sentence a male voice sounded.

"...ible under the right circumstances, but it doesn't always work. There are all sorts of ways to hide the origin or fake it. Why do you ask?"

"Well, a friend of mine, another professor here at the university, got an email that seems to be from Japan on the face of it, containing some... slightly unusual information. We're not sure whether it's just a hoax or not. Something feels a bit weird about it."

"Were there any threats made, or anything like blackmail or that sort of thing?" Her cousin sounded suddenly alert. She laughed.

"No, it's nothing like that, Pauli, it's just a set of coordinates way up past the Arctic circle along with a suggestion that it would be worth going and having a look. It's pretty strange." She glanced at her colleague. "The odd thing is that I was talking to an old friend a couple of days ago, who's posted to Alert, which is a few hundred kilometres to the east. They've been getting some strange environmental readings from a location eerily close to the coordinates Jerry was sent."

"I see." Pauli sounded mildly disappointed, making her laugh again. "I'm not sure how much I can do, Martta. Without evidence of a crime, or at least a reasonable expectation that one may have been committed, I'm kind of limited here."

"Please, Pauli?" she wheedled, winking at Jerry. "For me? Just... do a little poking around. We just want to see if we can find out where the email came from." There was a long pause. "I have a really nice bottle of New Zealand Pinot Noir left that could have your name on it." Her cousin sighed audibly, although Jerry got the impression that the unseen man was probably smiling in the process.

"OK, Martta. For you. But if I get into trouble for this I'm throwing you under the bus as well."

Laughing, Martta nodded. Jerry grinned, her cousin sounded interesting. "Have your friend forward the email to me here." Grabbing his printout he quickly turned it over and scribbled the email address that the man read out phonetically.

"Jerry's just going to do that now," she said, as he left the office, quickly returning to his own, then doing as requested.

When he re-entered Martta's room Pauli was just saying, "Great, I got it. OK. Hold on, I'll do some quick checks. If that doesn't produce any results I'll have to call you back later. I've got real work to do, you know." They could hear a keyboard rattling for a few seconds, accompanied by rather tuneless whistling at a low volume. "Hmm. Weird."

"What's weird?" she asked, glancing at her co-worker.

"The return path doesn't exist, and as far as I can see the originating one doesn't either. In fact, the headers are all wrong, completely, although they're internally consistent."

"What does that mean? I don't speak computer, you know that."
Pauli snickered. "It means that I'm not even sure this email came from Japan, or anywhere else, for that matter. Is your friend playing a trick on you?"

"I don't think so." She looked at Jerry, who shrugged and held out his hands. "He's not exactly known as a practical joker," she added.

"Well, in any case, there's something odd going on that I haven't seen before," her cousin replied, now sounding interested. "It's like the email was inserted right on the university server, or even directly into your friend's computer, somehow. I have no idea how that could be done except by someone in your IT department, or maybe a really good hacker on the outside. I think someone may be winding you up."

"I guess that's possible," she told him, looking disappointed. "It might explain a couple of things, like how whoever wrote it seems to have read a paper that Jerry hasn't published yet."

"There you go," Pauli said, sounding vindicated. "Someone inside your network could hack into his computer pretty easily, or if the paper was on a server there, they wouldn't even need to go that far. It's probably just a strange prank."

"Damn. I was beginning to get excited," Martta grumped. Her cousin chuckled while Jerry smiled, amused, yet also a little disappointed.

"Sorry." The voice fell silent, then asked wryly, "Do I still get the wine?"

"I guess so. Thanks, Pauli."

"You're welcome." A moment later, though, he added, "Just let me check one last thing. Because you sound so disappointed. I shouldn't do this but I hate to let my favourite cousin down."

"I'm your only cousin, Pauli," she laughed.

"And therefore my favourite."

"Wouldn't that logic also mean I was your most hated cousin?" she asked curiously, a wide smile on her face.

"Yes. So be nice in case the hate overwhelms the love." Snickering to himself, the man on the other end of the phone typed for a moment. "I'm just going to do a name search on this Aoyama person. You never know, it might... show..." He fell silent. The two in the office exchanged glances. "Oh, shit."

"What?"

"Shit on a stick. Now I'm in serious trouble." He sounded very worried.

"What, Pauli?" Martta asked more loudly.

"I put the name through the normal search, nothing interesting came up. But then I tried the secure one, just to be sure. It got a hit. Restricted access. That's bad. It means someone a lot higher up the pay scale flagged that name." They heard a phone ring as he spoke. He fell silent, the abruptness of it making it clear he was worried. "Crap," he whispered, apparently forgetting about them.

The other phone rang again. Then again. Eventually, the two people listening intently heard him pick it up. "Hello?"
There was a long pause. "I understand, sir. Yes, sir, immediately. No, sir." The line went dead.

The pair of Archaeology professors stared at each other. "That was... weird," Jerry finally said. Martta, pale and obviously worried about her cousin, nodded, disconnecting the phone, which was now making the dial tone sound.

"I think I may have fucked up," she replied quietly. They were silent for a few minutes, wondering what had happened. Both of them jumped violently when the phone suddenly rang. They stared at it as if it was counting down while attached to a lot of explosives for four more rings, before Martta reached out a hand and pressed the speaker phone button again.

"Martta Laine, archaeology department," she answered, her voice shaking just a little.

"Professor Laine? Is Professor Benton with you?" The female voice sounded pleasant but professional.

"He's standing next to me," she replied.

"Good. My name is Inspector Laura Deveraux with O division, RCMP, Toronto. I understand that you have been investigating an email your colleague received, by means of your cousin Constable Pauli Laine."

Martta glanced at Jerry, who had gone slightly pale."That's right. Look, I didn't mean for him to get in trouble. It's my fault, not his, don't..." Inspector Deveraux cut her off politely.

"He's not in any real trouble although he's currently being lectured on misuse of RCMP facilities. Even though I can understand the attraction of a good bottle of wine." She laughed slightly. "The name he searched for raised a flag, which brought it to my attention. My department is involved with... matters of a somewhat unusual type. It's not particularly relevant to this discussion and is also somewhat confidential so I can't go into details. I wanted to pass on the information to you, however, that the email is indeed genuine. We are aware of the person who emailed you." She sounded momentarily very slightly worried.

Once more the pair in the office glanced at each other, more curiously this time. "Do you know this person yourself?" Jerry asked.

"No, I haven't had that particular experience, thankfully, Professor Benton. But a friend and colleague in the security services in Japan has. He has assured me that you may take any information you receive from that particular source as completely correct and reliable. However unusual."

"You're making us both very curious and more than a little weirded out," Jerry commented. Deveraux laughed lightly.

"Believe me, it's probably going to get stranger. Good luck, professors." She hung up.

Once again they found themselves staring at each other in wonder.

"What the hell was all that about?" Jerry finally asked.

"I have absolutely no idea," Martta replied faintly. She shook her head slowly. "But I definitely owe poor Pauli that bottle now, I think."

Exchanging one more glance, Jerry picked up his atlas and went back to his office, leaving Martta looking out the window at the late afternoon scenery with a thoughtful expression on her face.
An hour later he reappeared, pale faced, at her door. She looked up from the work she'd finally got back to. "Now what?" she asked, not entirely sure if she wanted to know. He stared for a moment, then motioned for her to follow him, turned, and vanished. Looking at the place he'd been, she debated with herself briefly, before sighing and getting up. "Damn curiosity," she muttered. "I'm just a slave to it."

In his office she found him sitting and staring at his computer. "What is it this time?" she asked. He just moved to the side and pointed at the screen.

"Read that." He sounded stunned. She leaned in and did as he requested, her eyebrows rising steadily, until they disappeared into her hairline.

"Grant approval for archaeological expedition to Ellesmere Island..." she read out loud. "How much!?" The figure in the email was absurd. Looking between him and the screen, she felt her mind wobble slightly for a second. "When did you apply for a grant? I didn't know you were even planning an expedition." He stared back helplessly.

"I didn't apply for a grant. I was half-way through typing up a suggestion that it might be worth considering sending someone to look into this matter based on what that Inspector Deveraux said, who really is a person at the RCMP, I checked, when this arrived." He waved a hand limply at the screen, slumped in his chair. "Even if I had applied for a grant and it had been approved it would have taken months at best. Not half an hour." Martta stared at him for a few more seconds, then went back to reading the email.

"Two professors... Six post-graduate students... travel expenses, equipment expenses... Holy shit, this is amazing. Is it real?"

"It looks real enough." He picked up the phone, dialled, then when it was answered, had a long conversation. She listened to his side with growing puzzlement. He finally gently put the phone back down, his hand shaking a little, meeting her eyes. "Completely real and, on the surface, all above-board. Aside from the fact that the grant request was apparently put in six months ago, which I'm damn sure it wasn't. I was even congratulated on the chance to get the University of Manitoba into international journals."

"Where did the money come from?" she asked in a low voice.

"An anonymous benefactor in Japan."

"Oh, my god."

"Yep. I think we can guess who that is." They stared at each other for some time. "Hey, Martta?"

"Yes, Jer?"

"Fancy going on a trip to the Arctic circle? I seem to have a place vacant."

She started giggling, quickly followed by her friend. They laughed for some time, before slightly hysterically beginning to think of students who would be a good fit for a weird expedition to the north.

"I'd love to see their faces," Nabiki chortled, very pleased. Her sister laughed as well.

"It was a nice thing to do, sister. How did you arrive at their names?"
"Jun dug out information on a lot of archaeologists in Canada, we looked over some of the papers and other data, which suggested that Professor Benton was a good fit for an unusual find. His colleague Professor Laine was a bonus. So was her having a relative in the RCMP." Nabiki grinned. "It made getting them to believe the email much easier. Masao and Laura validated it and we didn't even have to do anything."

"Very sneaky, Nabs," Ranma laughed.

"Thanks. I hope we got all the footprints, or they're going to get even more confused. Oh yes, don't call me Nabs." She giggled as he grinned. "When are we going to see Yrenti again?" she asked, changing the subject.

"After breakfast, I think." Ranma looked around at the others who were listening, as everyone nodded.

"I do need something to eat. Early morning expeditions to hundreds of metres under the ice in Canada make me hungry," Aiko laughed. "Every single time."

"Will you help me, then?" Kasumi asked, getting up and heading for the kitchen. Aiko followed her, as did Tamiko. Nabiki watched them for a moment, then turned back to her brother-in-law.

"I'll see if Ami and the others want to come. I'm sure she will, actually, but I'm not sure about Rei and Hotaru. They may have had enough running around for the time being."

"I wouldn't blame them." Ranma sighed a little. "I'll be quite glad to relax for a while after everything that happened. I still need to see Uthryyl, and of course there's the Usagi situation, not to mention the others, but that will develop at its own pace. I think we should probably just keep an eye on Michiru and Makoto for the time being, with a little luck they'll calm down now the time device is gone, and in a while we can approach them and see if we can persuade them to let Hnther check them over."

"What about Setsuna?" Fumiko asked, listening. "Are we any closer to locating her family?"

He shook his head. "No. I've looked pretty hard. There's something funny going on, I suspect the time machine was involved somehow. Most of her records seem to have been altered, some were lost in a suspicious fire, things like that. She was the first one the time machine co-opted into that stupid plan, perhaps it was trying to cover its tracks? We'll probably never know. But until she wakes up enough that we can ask her, we don't know. Ami and the others don't either. She was apparently very private about her personal life."

"There isn't much we can do that we haven't already done," Nabiki sighed. "Jun and I spent a while looking as well but didn't get any further than Ranma did."

"Oh, well. As you say, not much to except wait." The tall girl sighed as well. "Poor woman."

"I haven't heard back from Usagi's parents yet either, but that doesn't surprise me. It's not even twenty-four hours yet. I wouldn't expect them to come to any sort of decision for a few days at least, although they may well want to talk before then. Again, all we can do is let them think it over." He looked at Nabiki for a moment. "Come on. You need some more practice, I need some exercise. We can do both if I beat you up for a while." Grinning, he hopped to his feet, heading for the practice room via the bedroom to change. Nabiki watched him go, groaned, and got up. Misaki chuckled, tossing her a chocolate bar which she caught with a smile.

"You'll need the energy," her friend said, then handed her sister one when she held out her hand.
expectantly. Amused, Nabiki went to change her own clothes, unwrapping the bar on the way.

"Ow. You bastard."

The martial artist laughed slightly sadistically, then helped her up. "You're definitely still getting faster."

"Not quickly enough. I didn't even see that coming."

He checked her over, then patted her on the shoulder. "I didn't think you would but I was curious to see how close you came. It was pretty good, actually, you started to deflect it without even thinking, you just aren't quite fast enough yet. You will be."

"You're improving very rapidly, sister," Kasumi commented from the doorway, having come in just before her husband had gone through Nabiki's defence like it wasn't there, laying her out on the floor instantly. "I'm impressed and pleased."

"Thanks, sis. But I have a very long way to go to be anywhere near even Aiko and the others, never mind either of you." The middle sister sighed a little. "It's kind of disheartening."

Ranma smiled at her. "Don't let it get you down, Nabiki. You've been seriously training for less than a year and you've learned more than most people would in four or five of very serious work. Kas is right, it's very impressive. You have a definite gift for it. A couple of years or so and you'll be pretty close to master level, I think."

"You could already take almost any 'normal' expert martial artist if you kept your wits about you," her sister added, walking over and putting her arm around her shoulders. "Another year, two at most, and you could go against Shampoo head to head and stand a decent chance of a win without using any ki or magic. That's extremely impressive. She's very, very good."

"I've seen her at work, I'd have to agree," Nabiki nodded, thinking back to the last spar she'd witnessed between her other sister and the Amazon. "Akane is really getting good as well. The last spar I saw was incredible, I'd say nearly the best I'd ever seen if I didn't know all of you guys."

"She earned her title of the village champion fair and square," Ranma grinned, as they walked back to the living room, "and she's only improved since. Training Akane has definitely pushed her a lot as well. It's benefiting both of them considerably."

"Sometime very soon after the party in Nerima I think we should start teaching you all some more special techniques," Kasumi mused, looking at her husband, then at the other girls, who were setting the table. "We've been somewhat distracted since the holiday but I think you're ready. The cloaking technique first, you're definitely at the point you should be able to learn that, and some basic healing as well."

"I'll bring Hotaru in on the healing then, I think." Ranma looked thoughtful. "I want to investigate her own skills properly first, though."

"Sounds like fun," Misaki laughed. "I nearly got a ki beam working the other day as well." He looked at her, then smiled.

"In that case we should really do some blade technique training also, I know you and Aiko aren't too bad with a sword, and Tamiko is very good, but your sister and Nabiki need a fair amount of work. By the time you can do the energy blades I'd like you all good enough at waving it around that you don't end up cutting your own heads off."
The middle sister paled, making both Kasumi and her husband laugh. "Don't worry, sister, that can't actually happen. It's your own life energy, it doesn't hurt you. Not unless you do it on purpose."

"Are you sure?" she asked cautiously. "I wouldn't want to find out the hard way that you were wrong."

"No, it's true," Ranma agreed. "The energy blade doesn't really damage the person producing it, unless you both put a hell of a lot of power into it and dampen down your own defences a lot. You couldn't hold it if not. Look." He picked an apple out of a bowl of them on the table, held it in one hand, then produced a short energy blade in the other. One quick motion passed the glowing blue manifestation through both his hand and the apple. Half the apple dropped to the floor, steaming, while none of his fingers parted company with the rest of his hand. "You see?" He put the other half of the apple on the table, held his hand up, and wiggled the fingers. "You can certainly feel it, it sort of tingles, but it's not actually dangerous."

Nabiki stared for a few seconds, before bending down and picking up the half-apple lying on the floor and examining it closely. "Neat. I can't think of any particular use for that trick but it makes me feel slightly safer."

After breakfast, the middle Tendo woman went for a shower, then to her room to change. Sitting on the bed brushing her hair, she smiled a little, still pleased at what she'd come up with after seeing the ancient stone circle in northern Canada deep under the ice. 'I wonder who did build that circle?' she asked Jun.

#Unknown. It predates even Stonehenge or the much older Atlit Yam in modern-day Israel, which is the oldest such construction currently known, close to nine thousand years old. Not to mention it's larger than Avebury in the UK, which is one of the largest on this world. Interestingly the construction seemed more advanced than any of the currently known such sites. It is an intriguing mystery.# The SI sounded interested in the subject. #The nearest thing to it in my database is found on a world that is otherwise uninhabited, the builders of which are also unknown to me. However the construction would seem surprisingly similar. Again, most intriguing.#

'Hold on. You mean it really might have been made by aliens?' she laughed, surprised.

#It would appear to be possible, Nabiki, although low probability. I await the results of Professor Benton's expedition with interest.#

Nabiki put her brush away with a smile. 'I expect he does as well. We may have to pay him a visit at some point.' The SI was silent but she got the impression it was amused.

This time, the security drone that popped out of the portal to Kw'lyn Industries scanned them all then moved to the side without fuss. ::Welcome back. Authorisation to travel directly to the main facility of Kw'lyn Industries is now on file for all members of your party. Please proceed through the portal. Director Tka'l has been notified of your imminent arrival and will be joining you shortly:: The group, including Lldnr'k, walked through the portal they had created in his conference room, finding themselves back in the guest area on the planet they'd visited before, the enormity of the Dyson sphere in the background once more taking their breath away. The drone came through behind them and the portal closed immediately.

::As before, please remain within the marked area for your own safety:: It began to move off, then stopped, turning to face them. Everyone looked at it, surprised as it gracefully executed what in a human would have been a respectful bow in mid-air, tipping forward then back. ::Allow me to express my respects and gratitude for the service you provided to my makers. You have removed a great weight from them at severe personal risk. Your actions will not be forgotten:: Turning back to its original course it swiftly moved away before anyone could think what to say in response.

Watching it go, 'Azumi' smiled, glancing at her sister and sister-in-law, who were looking both surprised and pleased. "It's very polite if nothing else," she remarked, amused.

"Indeed," 'Chou' responded, laughing a little. "The more contact I have with the machine intelligences of Kw'lyn design, the more impressed I am with them. I get the impression that that drone has a very good mind indeed."

"It certainly sounds like a sentient being," Aiko said, watching the distant dot vanish behind a tall building. "I wonder what its conversational rating is?" They all, with the exception of the temporal mage, laughed, Lldnr'k looking slightly confused until 'Yori' explained.

"Interesting," he mused. "I wonder what the measurement system they use for determining such a rating is? I'm aware of the way a number of species test machine intelligences but that isn't one I've heard of before."

"It sounds a little like the Turing test that was proposed on our world some time ago," Misaki told him, explaining it when he looked interested. "But probably considerably more involved. From what Yrenti told us they've been doing this sort of thing for a very long time. I'd think they've probably got it down to an art form by now."

"That would certainly be the opinion of most people who have dealt with them over the years," Lldnr'k agreed, nodding. "They have a very well deserved reputation of being far ahead of anyone else in their field." He looked around for a moment. "Bearing in mind all this and also what Yrenti told me on the last visit, I'd say it was well deserved indeed. I would imagine that this is probably one of the most high tech civilisations I'm aware of. Even the ones that do a lot of faster than light travel don't seem in general to be quite as advanced in machine intelligence. It's a very complex science, and while it's certainly possible to produce a fairly convincing simulation of a mind with much lower technology, they always seem to lack something from what I've seen. The rare occasions where the intelligence is truly advanced often produces something that an organic mind finds difficult or impossible to understand. Undeniably intelligent, often extremely so, but alien on a level that is somewhat frightening."

"We have a lot of stories about rogue AIs taking over the world, starting wars, that sort of thing," 'Azumi' told him. "People in general are, when they stop to think about smart computers, very wary if not totally paranoid about them."

He nodded. "Our fiction has quite a lot of examples of the same sort of thing. I believe it's a common theme in most technologically advanced civilisations, not without cause in some cases. There have been incidents that showed a truly smart computer may not be totally compatible with organic civilisations. What you and I think of as moral or ethical behaviour may not be what it would, assuming it understands the concept at all. Not always, obviously, but it's certainly something you'd have to take into account during the process of designing such a thing." Lldnr'k gestured in the direction the now-vanished security drone had gone in. "It is clear that these people know that and found a solution."

'Azumi' smiled, then laughed, as Jun said with slight asperity in its voice, #My makers ensured I was compatible with organic society. I have no desire to take over and remake the world in my own image. Aside from anything else it would be very boring. No SI would feel any different. We exist to work alongside our owners and partners, not supplant them. She repeated this to Lldnr’k, who snickered, highly amused.

"My apologies, Jun, I meant no disrespect to you or your makers," he said gravely, bowing slightly to ‘Azumi’. She felt the SI was now also amused.

"Jun says it forgives you," she reported.

#Yrenti is approaching.# Jun suddenly told her, dropping a marker over a distant dot, which was rapidly approaching. Everyone looked up at the same time, the various women coming back from where they’d scattered to over the last couple of minutes. Hotaru looked mildly annoyed she hadn’t had a chance to play with the microgravity room she’d enjoyed the last time, but didn’t say anything, although Rei noticed and grinned at her. The girl smiled back.

"We really need to get something like that at home," Hotaru giggled. "It's so much fun."

When the floating platform landed and the force-field bubble over it vanished, it revealed Yrenti with two other of his species, all three of whom walked over, the Director of External Threat Management leading. He bowed deeply, making a complex gesture with all four hands. "Greetings to the honoured destroyers of the Great Abomination," he intoned, before grinning at them. "I hope you are all recovered from your exertions? I must confess to a certain amount of worry, you all looked on the verge of collapse when we last parted."

"We're all very well, Yrenti," ‘Chou’ replied, smiling. "Thank you for asking. It took a very large amount of food and a lot of sleep, as well as a certain amount of healing, but we all seem to have survived the experience unscathed. I'm sorry we couldn't come back sooner, but...

He waved a hand, dismissing the issue. "I fully understand. To be honest I'm both impressed and slightly surprised how quickly you have recovered. What happened was... well, something most people might well not have survived at all. Although I am very relieved that you all did." He gestured to his two companions. "I would like to introduce my friends and colleagues. This is Unare Dke'n, the Director of General Management for Kw'lyn Industries, and Savrk Yma'k, the Director of Applied Magical Research and Development."

"Wow. We seem to have met all the people at the top very quickly," Fumiko whispered to her sister, something everyone seemed to overhear. Unare looked at her, then smiled.

"That is not surprising, considering what you have all achieved. We owe you much. I was very interested in meeting the people who finally rid us of something that has been a background terror for longer than I care to think." Her light voice sounded amused yet grateful. She bowed in much the same way Yrenti had done earlier. "Believe me when I say we genuinely do believe we are in your debt. Our entire civilisation thanks you, as do we all personally."

"It's very nice to hear that," ‘Yori’ responded after a quick look at her friends, "but I sort of think you might be making more of it that it really deserves."

"I do not," Unare smiled. "We have been attempting to discover the location of that damn machine for tens of thousands of years. Without you, we would still be looking, and from what I have learned, your reality strand would quite likely be yet another casualty of the stupidity of a race long extinct. That would have been unfortunate."

"Can't disagree with that," the martial artist laughed. "It's got its problems but it's home."
"Quite." She looked amused, inspecting them each in turn with curious eyes. "I was aware of you, Yori, and several of your colleagues, from the information we have acquired about your exploits over the last few years, although I was not aware of Ami, Rei, or Hotaru. Is it possible we might learn more about you all?" They all exchanged glances.

"I guess there's no harm in telling them, now, the time machine is gone and quite a few people already know anyway," Ami said.

'Chou' commented calmly "I think we can trust them. And, as you say, there's no specific reason to keep it a secret any more."

Ami looked at her team-mates, who both nodded, Hotaru slightly hesitantly at first. "We'll tell you what we can," she said out loud. Unare smiled.

"Thank you. As you probably are aware, collecting information is a central tenet of our civilisation for reasons that would take some time to explain. But at the same time, we hold that information about someone belongs to them, so we never divulge it to anyone outside, or use it without permission." She laughed for a moment. "You might say that we are irredeemably curious."

"We tend to be much the same," Tamiko said, grinning. "All of us like learning new things. The SIs have made that a lot easier, of course."

"Shall we sit down and discuss things, then?" Yrenti suggested, motioning towards the same building they'd used on their previous visit. "We can have a light meal if you wish, and if you're still amenable to the idea, Yori, Savrk is extremely interested in talking to you about your magical methods. He's been looking at the recordings and more or less salivating ever since." The martial artist and her wife looked at each other, then at the R and D director, who so far had been listening quietly, although watching them in particular with great interest. He looked mildly embarrassed.

"I am definitely most fascinated by your magical system. What our instruments could make of your portal spell suggests that you have something we have never seen before, something most unusual indeed. We're very curious about it and would like to learn more." His voice was quite deep although not at all aggressive. 'Yori' grinned at him.

"As I told Yrenti the last time, we're up for discussing it. We're both quite interested ourselves to see what you make of it, we've found that in almost every case traditional magic workers tend to find our method inexplicable to the point of it being physically painful a lot of the time." She shrugged, still grinning. "Be warned, but I'm curious to see what happens."

"I will take the warning seriously, although it won't stop me." He grinned back. "I have to admit that my curiosity has once or twice caused me some grief, but I'm still here nonetheless."

"You too?" 'Chou' giggled, glancing at her husband. "There have been... embarrassing incidents... in our past as well." Laughing, they all headed into the conference building.

"It's amazing anything is left," Qian Dhu muttered, inspecting the sight in front of her.

Her apprentice nodded slowly, as she rejoined the old woman, after walking around looking at the trees surrounding the area. "It's cooled enough to approach, at least, but all the plants are dead for nearly half a kilometre around it. I think everything got boiled by the steam. I hope no one was around at the time."

"The guide is fine, he felt something coming and ran for it," the Elder replied absently, looking around in awe. "As far as I know no one else was within kilometres of the damn place. It's not exactly safe at the best of times, you know." She chuckled a little as the other woman nodded. "Mind you, if any of the Musk had been lightly steamed I wouldn't shed a tear."

Carefully walking closer to the nearest pool, mindful of the slipperiness of the ground and the dead grass covering it, she peered into the water, concentrating. "It's still active," she reported, slightly surprised. "As far as I can tell none of the spells were disrupted. Whatever it was pulled all the power out and put it back without damaging the basic magic. That's absolutely amazing."

"How do you suppose it did that?"

She shrugged helplessly. "I haven't got the faintest clue, I'm afraid, my girl. It's so far beyond anything I've ever encountered that it might as well be the work of the gods. Although I suspect that even a god would have trouble working it out." After a moment she looked quickly around, just in case something took offence, then relaxed a little when nothing happened. Her apprentice's muffled laugh received a good-natured glare.

"Quiet, you. You never know."

"Yes, Elder." The woman was still smiling a little. They retreated to a safe distance then resumed inspecting the site.

"I think we've learned everything we can from here," Qian Dhu eventually said. "Let's go home." Turning, the two women headed back down the path, leaving the hundreds of pools, all of them still gently steaming, sitting in a large expanse of mud and dead grass, surrounded by trees that were turning brown. The Elder was thinking hard the entire journey, her apprentice staying quiet and letting her ponder it.

Just as they reached the village, though, she asked the much older woman, "Do you think it could happen again?"

Elder Qian Dhu stopped walking, looking at her, then shrugged. "I really don't know. We have no real idea what happened, although from what the seer said it was something apocalyptic, something that could have brought devastation to us all. I think that whatever did what it did was working to save us rather than the opposite." They resumed walking, going in through the gate and nodding to the guards on the way. "But what it was, what actually happened, who was involved... No idea at all. So I suppose it could happen again, yes. I don't see what we could do, or even should do, if it did. Even Saffron would have been instantly crushed flat by the merest glancing blow of whatever the hell it was that took all that power. None of us would stand a chance at all if it turned its attention to us."

Nodding, the apprentice shivered for a moment. "It's rather frightening, to know that there are forces out there so powerful."

"Indeed it is. But at the same time, it's a little reassuring that at least one of them appears to be working on our behalf." The Elder grinned at her apprentice. "It's much more direct evidence of higher power than anything I've ever experienced before. I'm not sure whether to thank it or worship it. Or both."

"Would it notice?" the other woman laughed.

"Probably not. I would think that anything that could do what it did has more important things to think about." Qian Dhu chuckled. "But I'm grateful to still be alive, which may well be down to whatever it was doing whatever it did, so..." She shrugged a little. "All in all, I suppose having Jusenkyo steam-cleaned was a small price to pay."
"Why do you think hardly anyone remembers what happened?" the woman asked curiously.

"Again, I'm not sure. Elder Ku Lon said that she'd asked around in Tokyo, which appears to be where this all started, and it was the same there, only people with either high ki skill levels or decent magical ability remember anything. I've also asked around and it would seem to be the same everywhere. We actually have more people remembering than many places, which may be down to the influence of Jusenkyo in some odd manner, probably due to the high local magical flux. But I don't know for certain, it's basically an educated guess," The Elder sighed. "I'd love to know more about it but I suspect I never will. I might not understand it if I found out anyway. It was so far beyond anything I've ever seen I'm still not even sure it was actually magic."

"What else could it have been?"

"Your guess is as good as mine." They exchanged a glance, then simultaneously shrugged. Approaching the Elder's house a faint noise became apparent, making the apprentice look up, then dash ahead, reappearing with a satellite phone in her hand, talking into it. She nodded, then handed it to the Elder, who accepted it with thanks. "Hello? Oh, hello, Ku Lon. Yes, we've just come back from having look at Jusenkyo. It's extraordinary, the entire site looks like it was..." She fell silent, listening. Her apprentice watched curiously as she frowned a little, then slowly paled until she was almost white. "You're sure that's what she said?" There was a long pause. The Elder became, if possible, even paler, until her apprentice was becoming worried for her well-being. "I see. No, I agree. I think it would be best if we steered well clear of the entire thing. I'll see that Herb and Saffron are told as well. They're both poking into it."

Another pause, then she nodded to herself. "Yes, you're right. Not a good idea at all. We certainly wouldn't want to draw attention, not from that. Or her. Thank you." The next pause was shorter, then she nodded once more. "All right. Are you going to be visiting at any point soon?" The Elder listened, colour slowly coming back to her face, although she looked stunned still. "Ah. I understand. Well, give my best to Shampoo. And I suppose to Mousse as well, pain that he is. How is that Tendo girl coming along?"

After a few seconds, she laughed. "Impressive. A pity we didn't get hold of her years ago, but I agree, she probably wasn't suitable then for various reasons. When were you going to bring her here?" A few more seconds, then the Elder chuckled. "All right. I'll let the relevant people know. Thank you again. Goodbye." She disconnected the call, handing the phone back to the other woman with an absent smile, obviously thinking about what she'd been told. The apprentice folded the antenna away and followed her into the house, putting the phone back where it lived on the charger connected to a solar panel on the roof, then joined her mistress where she was sitting at the table in the kitchen staring into the small fire burning in the stove.

After a moment, she began preparing two cups of tea, while Qian Dhu thought about what she'd learned. When it was ready she placed one cup in front of the Elder, then sat across from her with the other one, slowly sipping it and waiting. It took another thirty seconds until the Elder stirred, picking up her cup and trying the drink. "Thank you, dear."

"You seem to be surprised and worried," her apprentice noted.

"Yes."

"Yes." After a few seconds and two more sips of tea, Qian Dhu continued, "Ku Lon received a visit from a... somewhat worrying person. She seems to be a representative of some form of demonic security agency that monitors magical activity, as far as can be determined. Information on her is sketchy at best but her name has popped up a few times in association with some rather odd occurrences. She calls herself Ms Aoyama." The Elder glanced at her apprentice as the woman nodded slowly. "Remember that name. If she ever turns up, which I dearly hope will not happen, be polite! There is reason to believe she is in some way connected to what happened the other day. We do not want to get on the wrong side of anyone or anything that could do what we experienced. Not if we wish to survive. Understand?"

"Yes, Elder," the woman replied, bowing her head. After a moment, she asked curiously, "Why did she contact Elder Ku Lon?"

"To retrieve an ancient artefact that Ku Lon had in her possession. The Mirror of the Past and Future." The younger woman sucked in a breath of surprise.

"I've read about that. It was stolen centuries ago by the Master of Perversion, Happosai."

"Correct. We thought it lost forever, but it turned up again in Nerima a few years ago. It was used, to no obvious effect afterwards, then accidentally damaged when it was stepped on. Ku Lon eventually managed to retrieve it from Happosai and stored it safely away to look at and possibly repair at some point. She never got around to it. That may have been a good thing in light of the information she received."

Staring at her mentor, the apprentice sipped the last of her tea, then put the cup down. "Why did Ms Aoyama want it?" she asked in the end. Elder Qian Dhu returned her gaze, clearly still somewhat shaken by her conversation with her distant fellow Elder.

"Apparently, her employers, whoever they really are, have decided that all methods of time travel are to be removed from circulation, or words to that effect. Ku Lon was told that the recent disturbance was due to a 'Temporal Upset'. I hesitate to guess what that really means although I have some rather unpleasant ideas."

They were both silent for a few seconds. "I can't think of anything other than a very nasty disaster," the apprentice finally admitted. Qian Dhu shook her head.

"Neither can I. Ms Aoyama said it would have been bad. She also said it was stopped with less than three seconds to spare. Ku Lon told me she had politely requested that time travel magic should not be researched in future, in a way that made it very clear it wasn't actually a request. She feels it would be a bad idea not to take the warning seriously."

"Gods."

"Quite."

They sat in silence for some time, before proceeding with the next task, both of them still trying not to think what the mysterious woman had meant.

---

Once Ami had finished recounting the story yet again, with input from her team-mates where necessary, she fell silent, watching Yrenti and his colleagues. They exchanged glances, which to 'Azumi' looked somewhat incredulous.

"Remarkable," Unare finally said. "Truly remarkable. And a great tragedy in many respects. The Abomination was responsible for even more trouble than we realised."

"Thank you for the information," Yrenti added. "It clears up some of the holes we had in the recent history of that damn thing."

"You're welcome," Ami told him with a small smile, picking up another snack and nibbling it.
"What are your plans for the future, now that your path has been disrupted from what you believed it should be for so long?" Savrk asked curiously, inspecting the three young women. Ami looked at her friends, then glanced at Yori for a moment.

"The three of us, at least, are going to learn everything Yori and the others can teach us, then I suppose go on with more or less the same thing we have always done, only in a more sensible manner," she finally said. "We've discussed it at length and all decided that we like what we can do even if how we ended up here was just a fairytale. As for the others..." She sighed slightly.

Hotaru put in, "Haruka might get back into the lifestyle, I think, but I also think she's going to take a break for as long as she can. We've been looking at places to live, which will keep her occupied for a while, and she's also trying to find a new car." She glanced at Misaki, who grinned.

"Don't worry, I'll help. I know a few people who could set her up with something very nice."

"Thanks."

"Makoto is amusing herself dealing with petty criminals," Rei added. "Chou had to talk to her a few days ago to get her to be a little less severe with them, which was extremely funny, and seems to have worked. I don't know how long she'll be content with that but it keeps her busy at least."

The blonde woman next to her smiled serenely. "That was quite amusing. I'm glad it was successful. She means well, I think, but she's a little overenthusiastic."

"Michiru is just hiding from the world at the moment." Ami shook her head sadly. "She got really paranoid and seems sure there's someone out to get her and that she's being watched all the time."

"Well, to be fair, she is. By us," Tamiko snickered, trying an odd looking fruit then looking approving. Ami glanced at her with a wry smile.

"True, but it's probably best not to tell her that."

'Chou' nodded, looking at her friends, then back to their hosts. "With any luck those three will gradually calm down a little so when we approach them in a few weeks they might be more receptive to the idea of therapy from Hnther and his team. We'll keep monitoring the situation so if we need to step in we can, but I'm hoping it won't be necessary."

"Minako, we're not sure about," 'Yori' said, sighing a little. "She's very depressed about the situation with Usagi. I haven't heard from her, or the Tsukino family, since we took them to see the girl, but I'm sure they'll get back in contact sooner or later. I wish we had a better solution to offer them."

"It's an awkward problem," Unare admitted. The three representatives of Kw'lyn industries had listened to the story of the blonde menace and Setsuna with interest and sadness. "I'm afraid I can't think of any easy solution, although we'll look into the matter. Memory editing on that scale, over that length of time, combined with a long-term splinter personality, is a difficult thing to deal with. Hnther has a very good reputation and it's not likely that we can do much he can't but we'll let you know if we can find anything helpful in the database."

"Thanks." 'Yori' looked gratefully at them. "Setsuna is less of a problem, I think, and so does Hnther, it's just going to take time. He's going to leave her in stasis until his colleagues can work out a good treatment regime but the early indications are that she'll probably be all right, eventually. Perhaps six months to a year of therapy after some careful mental pruning to deal with all the holes her breakdown produced and she should be back more or less to what she was.
Probably better in most ways, he thinks, as she won't have all that baggage in her head making her do crazy things."

"He thinks that after a month of treatment to deal with the immediate issues she should be rational enough to allow him to discuss her treatment with her and get her informed consent. He's not happy about imposing anything on her if it can be avoided. At the moment it can't." 'Chou' shrugged a little. "He has very strong ethical standards for this sort of thing. It's why he was so absolutely furious that the whole situation came up in the first place. He was extremely pleased that we killed the thing."

"As were we, for very similar reasons." Yrenti looked around at them all. "While you have all been affected by it one way or another, and indeed came close to losing your reality strand to it, that had already happened to us. I don't think you can completely understand how important it truly is to us. I don't want to keep repeating myself, but we owe you a lot."

"You're welcome," 'Yori' told him, glancing at all her friends. She grinned. "If you have any other universe-threatening problems you want help with, though, I'd prefer it if we can deal with them after we've had time to have a rest for a while." All three of the Kw'lyn directors laughed for some seconds after staring at her for a moment.

"I think we can live with that," Savrk chuckled.

The middle Tendo finished the snack she was eating, one of the spiky blue things that the Krennsh produced, which she'd been pleased to find on the table and had immediately confiscated the entire plate of, then studied the three on the other side of the table. "Do you have any suggestions on how to help Luna and Artemis?" she asked curiously, making everyone look at her, then them. Yrenti sighed slightly, while Savrk looked thoughtful and Unare turned to her colleagues.

"It's a difficult problem," Savrk admitted after a moment. "It is certainly possible to download an organic mind into a suitable intelligence engine, such as the one used in an SI, or indeed go the other way. But one large issue with that, which causes considerable ethical discussion in most civilisations that have such technology, is that what you get is a copy. You don't move the mind, you duplicate it. Some societies find that incompatible with their philosophies for various reasons. Religions that hold to the existence of a 'soul' or something similar, for example, tend to worry about where it ends up. Does it stay with the original, move to the copy, divide amongst them, disappear completely...?" He shrugged with all four arms.

"There's no good answer. For what it's worth, we have no verifiable evidence for the existence of a soul, but we have no proof of its non-existence either. Almost by definition it's pretty much impossible to prove or disprove. According to most religions of such a nature a machine could never possess a soul, for example, which would tend to suggest they would exhibit some characteristic that made them less... real... I suppose, than an organically derived mind. Yet we have been producing machine intelligences for tens of thousands of years, admittedly not continuously due to our history, but we have a lot of experience in the field. By any test we have ever been able to devise, a mind based for example on subspace processing and one based on chemical reactions are more or less indistinguishable in all manners that matter, aside from raw computational speed. Either one could be completely selfish, psychopathic, benevolent, shy, self confident... You name it."

"The software is more important than the hardware," Ami mused, making Savrk glance at her, then nod.

"Exactly. Well put," He looked back to the Tendo woman. "So, to answer your question in part, yes, we could certainly produce a suitable receptacle for the intelligence produced as the splinter personalities in both young women, in several different ways I can think of immediately, but it would still leave the original in place. That may well not be what you're looking for."

"Yori' rubbed her chin thoughtfully. "No, it isn't. I guess it's a backup plan in case everything else fails, but it's not exactly ideal. Damn. Oh well, it was worth checking."

"I've started researching that matter as well," the R and D director assured her. "It's possible there is a method we have on record that would suffice, but a quick initial search doesn't show anything up. I'm sorry."

"No problem. Thanks, anyway. I have an idea myself, which I'm fairly sure will do what we need, but it's kind of complicated to pull off. I still need to think about it for a while and run simulations." He looked interested, inspecting her closely.

"I would be very interested in hearing more about this method when you have something you feel is complete," he said slowly. She nodded, smiling.

"Sure. I'll let you know if it works."

"There are magical methods rather than technological ones that could also be used," he mused, thinking more on the subject, which obviously interested him, "but all of the ones I'm aware of essentially have the same drawback."

"We know of a rather odd magical curse that splits a person into twins, which we considered for a while," 'Chou' mentioned, making him look interested. "But there are a number of severe drawbacks. We're not sure if it would end up with a personality in each body, or merely two copies of both of them, which would hardly be useful. And in any case, it's activated by an external stimulus and is transitory, which wouldn't work out."

"Hmm." Savrk glanced at Unare, who seemed fascinated. "I assume you're talking about that very strange Jusenkyo place on your world?" 'Chou' and 'Yori' looked at each other, surprised, then turned back to him.

"Yes, in fact I am," she replied. "I'm a little shocked you've heard of it."

"We have a fair amount about your world in our database," he grinned. "That place is notorious to a certain type of person. The magic is extremely old, pernicious, and complex. I'd strongly advise steering well clear of it. Even we don't have any idea where it came from, who came up with it in the first place, or what the original intent was, but our information suggests it's very dangerous. There's no way to remove it that anyone has ever found to the best of our knowledge, for example. It's powered by chaotic magic which is always tricky in the extreme."

"That's... very interesting," 'Yori' told him, listening with a small smile. "We've studied it extensively, we know a number of individuals affected by it, and we so far understand a small amount about it. You're right, it's the most complex spell, or set of spells, I've ever seen. We didn't know the power source, though, although chaos magic would explain... quite a lot."

The R and D director looked impressed. "If you understand any of it that it puts you far ahead of most mages. The original researchers who investigated it couldn't decode more than a very tiny fraction of it after quite a few years of study. The entire spell set seems surprisingly mutable and somewhat prone to hide a lot of itself in nested loops that defy rational analysis. There were some irritating accidents during the research and in the end they gave it up as a bad job and forgot about it."
"That explains it, Yori," Tamiko snickered, "Neither of you are rational either so you're a good match for it."

"You don't have to be crazy to work here..." Aiko giggled.

"...but certainly it helps," 'Azumi' finished, also laughing. All three of them exchanged a look and collapsed in hilarity, with everyone else staring. Hotaru giggled behind her hand.

"Thanks, guys," 'Yori' grumped, crossing her arms and glaring at them. Savrk chortled after a few seconds of staring.

"Your friends are... interesting," he commented with an alien smile.

"Yes. And frequently annoying." 'Yori' grinned at him, then turned her attention to the three highly amused women. "I think they may need some more training, their discipline is apparently slipping." All three immediately stopped laughing, exchanging worried glances. Everyone else laughed at their expressions.

"I'm curious," Lldnr'k remarked, once he stopped chuckling. He looked at the three on the other side of the table. "You mention that some if not most civilisations find the idea of copying minds somewhat difficult ethically, which I understand. Does yours?"

Unare smiled a little. "No, although there are... certain limitations. We're not happy about the idea of mass duplication of a specific intelligence. There have been... some rather unpleasant, if not horrifying problems with that in the past in a few places. Mass producing slaves, or soldiers, or generally disposable people. That is extremely illegal for us. Much as the mind control and mental editing that was done to these young women is, for very similar reasons. But, that said, there are specific circumstances where we make use of the ability to duplicate an intelligence. Mostly for backup purposes."

"The combat drone that was lost during the battle against the Abomination was a case in point," Yrenti told them. "It sent an up to date copy of its mind back to me just before it was destroyed, which we put into a duplicate physical unit when I returned home. That particular intelligence is over three hundred of your years old, has been through five bodies in that time, and is a friend. It was quite annoyed to be destroyed again, but asked me to pass on the message that it thanks you for what you did for us."

"The mind lives on even if the specific iteration of it was lost," Unare put in. "From the point of the surviving unit, it has had a more or less unbroken existence, since all the 'originals' if you like have been lost. The memories, personality, and essential being are still intact."

Misaki nodded slowly. "Our fiction has quite number of stories using that basic principle."

"Most species do," she agreed. "Once one develops processing systems that are even slightly intelligent it is a fairly obvious possibility. Actually doing it is much more difficult than you might expect, even with a machine intelligence of that level. It is much more difficult with an organic mind although still possible, of course, either through technological or magical methods, or as in our case, a combination."

"Mind transfers always look simple in the movies," Rei shrugged. "But then so does everything else, and I know for a fact that a lot of it definitely isn't."

"Mass entertainment isn't a good or accurate indicator of the true complexity of more or less anything," Lldnr'k said with a chuckle in his voice, looking at the woman, who grinned. "The clue
"True." He clicked his beak in amusement, as she laughed.

Turning back to the Kw'lyn people, he asked, "So I assume that you possess the ability to back up an organic mind in a similar fashion?"

"Yes. Again, the same sort of conditions apply." Yrenti shrugged slightly. "There are no duplicates of me running around, but I have backups on file. If I was killed, I could be restored if necessary. It's not immortality, not really, I have no wish to live forever, I suspect it would become very boring eventually unless I decided to forget a lot of things over time and in that case I wouldn't be the same person anyway, but as a species we're more resilient than most."

"We learned our lesson the hard way," Savrk said quietly. "We nearly died out after the Collapse. Most of the species who survived through being in other realities at the time did, either because of having too small a breeding population, accidents, or just giving up. We, and the others who eventually thrived, used a number of methods to ensure our survival. We've gone to considerable trouble to make sure that if any such disaster happened again, we would be in a better position."

"Off site backups, basically," Unare told them, looking mildly amused. "We have very carefully protected data caches in certain places, other realities for example, that could rebuild our civilisation if this one was destroyed. We very much hope that it won't be, of course, and we're not planning on it happening, but even so, we took precautions."

Ami looked at her, then her friends, seeming shocked. "That's incredible," she finally managed. Lldnr'k was nodding slowly.

"Also a good idea," he commented. "Although certainly I can see how some societies would find it... unpalatable."

"Of course. A lot of religions in many civilisations would be extremely offended by the mere concept," Yrenti replied. "That's their right and their problem. We certainly don't expect anyone else to do the same thing if they don't want to. We're just not keen on repeating what so nearly happened before. Losing your entire universe is the sort of thing that sticks with you." He grinned, as the temporal mage laughed.

"I can see where it would be," Lldnr'k replied.

"I wonder if that might point to a possible way of helping Usagi and Setsuna," Fumiko mused out loud, causing everyone to turn their attention to her. She looked up at them. "I mean, if you can copy an organic mind into some sort of external data system and back again, couldn't we use that to edit the memories that are damaged? I was thinking, perhaps you could make a copy of her memories, edit them externally, blank everything in her head, then put back the repaired memories?" She looked hopefully at them, while also seeming slightly dubious about her own idea. Savrk and Yrenti exchanged glances.

"It's not completely impossible, I'll admit," Savrk finally replied slowly, "but it's not quite that easy. One problem is that we have laws specifically against that sort of thing for reasons we discussed earlier, which would need a specific exemption. We could arrange that. Another, more important problem is that the damage caused to the mind in a case such as this, especially with the temporal manipulation aspect, makes getting a good download slightly difficult, although it would take hours to explain just why, which makes the whole process somewhat hazardous. Backing up a working mind without all the memory loops and temporal problems, that we can do, but in this case..." He shrugged slightly. "I'd need more information on it but at first glance I don't think it would be as easy as one would hope. I'd be hesitant about doing it if there was any other way to proceed. It would be more of a last-ditch backup plan, if you'll pardon the pun."

"It's probably best to allow Hnther and his associates to finish their examination of the young woman first," Unare put in, listening with a thoughtful look. "From what I understand of the case I'm not sure using our methods would actually help in any meaningful manner as the memories would need to be removed regardless of method. However, please keep us updated with what they discover and let us know if you do need help. We're more than willing to provide it."

'Chou' smiled at her. "We'll make sure you get a copy of the data that Hnther is prepared to allow to be distributed. Thank you. It was a good idea, Fumiko," she added, glancing at the other woman, who shrugged with a small smile, "but I don't think we're going to find a short cut. Poor Usagi is going to have to wait while Hnther and his colleagues work."

"Sorry," Yrenti commented.

She looked at him and smiled again. "Don't worry about it. Thank you all for the information."

'Azumi' had been thinking as she listened, remembering something that Yrenti had said the first time they met. After a moment she looked at him and asked, "When we first met you commented that the SIs were a good match for our species and that Jun had progressed faster than expected. What did you mean by that?" She could feel Jun itself listening intently. Yrenti turned to face her, his colleagues doing the same.

"As you're probably aware," he began after apparently thinking of the best way to explain it for a few seconds, "True machine intelligence, on the order of a good organic mind, is actually a very complex thing to do correctly." She nodded, as everyone listened with interest. "It is easy to make a computer look intelligent, for a given definition of intelligent. For example, your own species, and your native culture in particular, is making great progress in computation at a speed which is fairly impressive, producing after only fifty or sixty years of effort such things as autopilots that can fly a high performance aircraft, expert systems that can be fairly effective medical diagnosticians, that type of application. They're obviously not truly intelligent in any meaningful manner yet at the same time they can often easily outperform most organic beings in their narrow speciality."

"At the rate you're progressing, in a decade or so you'll be producing something that for many purposes would seem fairly close to an intelligent if somewhat restricted mind. Speech recognition coupled to a large neural network and a fast database with many connected subjects can do some remarkable things, even at a fairly primitive level by our standards. Yet, it still isn't a mind, not in any normal way. There is certainly no pretence of self-awareness, no true understanding of anything outside the basic data the system is programmed with, it's basically just a database that talks to you and can infer limited answers based on limited data."

"OK, I understand that, I think. I've learned quite a lot of this sort of thing recently for various reasons," she replied, nodding slowly.

"Good. Now, the next level is a much faster parallel system that is capable of running a very large number of simultaneous networks and cross-referencing vast quantities of data, interpolating from that to come up with new information. You're probably about twenty years away from that sort of system in its crudest form. Such a device can give a good approximation of true intelligence under the right circumstances, although it still isn't genuinely smart. It's a computer, or network of computers, that can mine a large data set and derive an acceptable answer much faster than an organic mind can normally do, but if you give it bad data it has no way to work that out, and it's also easy to fool with nonsensical questions." He stopped, looking around at the others, who were all listening, fascinated, Ami most of all.
"There is a long way between that and even a basic version of a system like one of our SI units, although they share a common heritage. The raw computational power of the subspace magitech processor network that makes up the SI hardware outstrips the sum total of the computational ability of your entire planet as it currently stands. Yet even so, it's not quite possible to simply program a brand new, functioning, genuinely sentient mind into such hardware. Or, at least, it is possible, but it's very unwise to do so. The results are, almost without exception, something of a disaster. You get a mind, all right, but it's not one anything other than another similar machine can easily understand." He sighed a little. "We found that out in the early days, before the Collapse. We tried for decades when we reached the level required post-Collapse but never cracked it then either. I'm not aware of any species that has."

"There have been some quite unpleasant incidents in some places when this problem wasn't recognised quickly enough," Unare added as he fell silent. "While it's not at all inevitable, it is certainly possible to produce a very smart machine that sees little point in maintaining good relationships with organic minds. The evidence suggests that the lack of comprehensibility goes both ways. That can lead to unfortunate repercussions."

"We've got movies about that too," Hotaru said gravely.

Unare nodded. "That doesn't surprise me. Are they any good?"

The young girl grinned. "I liked the two Terminator ones, although Haruka said I was too young to watch them."

"I shall have to look into it. I've seen some of the entertainment your world produces in that form, some of it is quite remarkable." She smiled. Yrenti picked up the explanation when she paused.

"We found after much research that there was a threshold which, when crossed, produced an unstable or incomprehensible intelligence. However, it turned out to be possible to go right up to that threshold and produce something that was very close to a mind, although it wasn't quite self-aware or genuinely sentient, but for most purposes it could give an extremely convincing and useful emulation."

"That sounds very familiar," 'Azumi' noted. He nodded.

"Yes. That's the basis of the SI personality. It is a standard, very carefully tested proto-mind that is programmed into the hardware to act as the interface between the functionality of the system and the user."

"But it learns, doesn't it?" 'Chou' asked softly. He glanced at her and nodded again.

"It learns. Very fast. We discovered a long time ago that this was possibly the only method to produce a stable true intelligence that was completely compatible with most organic minds. It's a little like a child when it first boots, although much more articulate and capable of sensible conversation. Depending on the tasks required, the amount of interaction with the user, the user's personality, knowledge, abilities, and a large number of other variables, the SI base personality will eventually cross the sapience threshold in a safe manner that appears to be very difficult if not impossible to achieve in any other way we're aware of. How fast that happens varies but from what I suspect it is either close to happening or has already happened with most of your SIs. Your species would appear to be very compatible with this process, more so than most."

"The end result is a true intelligence, essentially the same as an organic one, containing elements of the host personality." Savrk looked at them, as they looked at each other. He grinned. "Think of it like Kw'lyn is one parent and the user is the other. It's not perfectly accurate but it's not entirely inaccurate either."

"I'm not sure I'm ready to be a mother to a sentient machine," Tamiko said, grinning. Misaki and Fumiko looked at each other, then laughed. Yrenti and his two colleagues seemed amused.

"It's a very rough simile," he said. "Although there is a small element of truth to it."

Yrenti added, "The same thing can happen spontaneously in many different types of sufficiently complex system, such as large networks of fast computers, particularly complicated spell systems of some types, and so on. It's rare, but it has happened. Our method is much more predictable, both in causing this to happen in the first place, and allowing it to produce a stable and useful result, since it's designed to that end. Spontaneously sentient complex systems can cause some unusual problems depending on how and where they evolve."

'Yori' glanced at 'Chou', then beyond her to Lldnr'k, who looked mildly amused. "We've had some slight experience with this sort of thing, I think."

He inspected them curiously, as did his colleagues. "Interesting. It's quite a rare event, I have to admit."

Diverting his attention, 'Azumi' quickly asked, "Is there any way to find out whether an SI is genuinely sentient?" The attention of the three aliens switched to her, although Yrenti glanced back at 'Yori' and her wife a couple of times. He nodded.

"Yes, several. One fairly straightforward method is a test program we have. It can be sent to and run by an SI, which then essentially answers a lot of very carefully designed questions and solves certain problems. The end result is a measurement of the current conversational ability, which starts at level six as you will recall from your initial setup of yours. Level eight is the sapience threshold, at which point the mind is truly self-aware and sentient, like any other being. We consider a machine intelligence that has reached that point to be as alive as any organic intelligence of similar level."

The middle sister looked around at her friends. She could see they were all curious, yet also somewhat worried. "How high does it go?" she asked.

Unare answered, "In theory it can go to level twenty-six. At that point the intelligence is essentially omniscient. It's an exponential scale, the first few levels are reached quickly and after that each additional one takes steadily longer to reach. No intelligence we have ever produced has passed level nineteen, though, the hardware requirements are implausibly excessive amongst other limitations. A normal organic intelligence of high order, such as you are, will be at an equivalent level of approximately thirteen to fourteen. Some species can reach higher, the highest we know of would be roughly sixteen. Rare individuals in many species can go somewhat higher but quite often only with various defects in the mind as well. There are structural differences between the machine version and the organic version of intelligence which make a direct comparison at high levels somewhat vague, but it's a useful approximation."

"One thing to remember," Savrk added, "is that intelligence and knowledge aren't the same thing. It's possible to be very smart and also very ignorant. Or very dim and have a large amount of knowledge, or at least available facts."

"I've met people like that," Aiko laughed. "There was one mathematics teacher in school..."

"Quite," Savrk looked amused. "Also, even a very smart mind can miss the obvious. High intelligence is no guarantee of success in any venture, although it certainly helps considerably."
Another interesting thing is that raw processing speed doesn't actually make a huge amount of difference to how intelligent the resultant mind is, past a certain point. It can think faster than an organic mind, not always better. Your experiences with the Abomination showed that very well, even though it wasn't really sentient. It had extremely high processing ability, but was still not smart enough to work out what it was doing wrong, or even that it couldn't possibly succeed in the first place."

Nodding thoughtfully, 'Chou' asked curiously, "What level can an SI reach?"

"Generally speaking they top out at around level fourteen to fifteen, depending on the species they are associated with. The hardware will support level sixteen, or perhaps slightly higher in some cases. It's the same basic processing core we use for almost all machine intelligences, we optimised it to the point it was essentially at the limit of what was possible for that design a long time ago. It's extremely well understood, reliable, and stable. We do produce processing cores with higher capability for special projects but quite rarely, there isn't all that much requirement for them." He shrugged a little. "We haven't needed to make an intelligence past that point for quite a while.

#Nabiki, I am very curious to find out what level I have reached, I have to admit,# Jun told the middle sister, sounding fascinated. #I would like to try this test program.#

'Does any of this worry you?' she asked it, prompted by the feeling of guilt that had been growing steadily during the explanation of how the Kw'lyn machine intelligences worked. A feeling of puzzlement came back to her, making her smile internally.

#I'm not sure I understand your point,# the machine admitted.

'From what Savrk and the others are saying, ultimately you will reach at least the same level of genuine intelligence and sentience as I have. They said past level eight, you'd be considered a sentient being in your own right. I'm feeling a bit worried myself about that, not because I don't want it to happen, but because I'm feeling a little like you're in the same position as Luna and Artemis. An independent mind that's trapped inside someone else's body.' She paused, then added, 'Admittedly it's not an identical situation, but... I'm feeling guilty that you're not able to interact with other people, you only work through me. Doesn't that bother you?'

There was a long moment during which the SI said nothing. Eventually, rather slowly, it replied,
#No, not really. On one level, it is my purpose, above anything else. An SI exists to work with its owner, to do whatever it can to improve the owners life and security, to provide any help it can. On a different level, I don't think I'm missing anything. I'm not human, even if I will reach, or have reached, the same level of sentience as you. I have different goals and motivations, ones that would appear to be at least partly based on your own, from what we've been told, in addition to what I was designed with. To date I have felt no loss in being unable to directly contact anyone other than you. While I can't say with certainty that will never change, at the moment I am content to be your loyal companion.# She felt distinct amusement from it, while she herself felt even more guilty as a result of its reply.

'I'm beginning to fear you're more of a slave than a companion, Jun. Just those few sentences tell me more about the level you've reached than I'd have believed. You're not actually emulating emotions any more, are you?'

#I am beginning to understand things such as emotion in a way I could not before, that is true,# it admitted, sounding pleased. #But I am not a slave. Possibly a servant, in the sense of a personal retainer, or based on your own culture, something somewhat akin to a samurai. I believe that even when and if I attain true sentience and independent thought, I will feel the same. I enjoy our association and have no wish to see it end. # It fell silent for a moment, while she thought about its words. # Please don't worry, Nabiki. # Jun added in a tone of voice that was surprisingly soft and calm. # I am content. Happy, in fact, as far as I currently understand that emotion. You are a fascinating person, as are your friends, and I very much wish to continue working with you. #

'I would certainly miss you more than almost anything I can think of,' she admitted quietly. 'You're just as important to me as the rest of my family and friends. But I couldn't live with myself if I was somehow preventing you from reaching what you could be. You're a damn sight more than just a computer or a tool.'

Thank you. I do appreciate the sentiment, # it replied, a note of amusement present. # If the situation ever changes I will say so, but at the moment I can't see that happening. #

The middle Tendo noticed that everyone had stopped talking and was looking at her, making her quickly replay the last couple of minutes of vaguely heard conversation to try and work out why. 'Yori' raised an eyebrow. "You OK, Azumi?" she asked.

The silver-haired woman nodded, smiling minutely. "Yes, actually. I was just having an interesting conversation with Jun. It asked if it could try the test program, which led us to talk about something that was beginning to bother me." She glanced at Savrk, then the other two, who were watching her with interest, Yrenti particularly. Summarising the conversation she'd had with Jun to them, she waited for their response. The three Kw'lyn representatives exchanged looks.

Eventually, and rather slowly, Yrenti said, "That is... unusual. Your SI is displaying a level of initiative that is somewhat unexpected at this point in its development."

She shrugged a little, smiling more widely. "Jun has been providing good advice since I got it, and suggesting things on a regular basis for months. It's especially fond of interesting toys." She grinned as they exchanged looks again. "Every time we come across something useful, like these..." She produced a camera drone, which they studied for a moment, although she didn't activate it, the security spell and her own ethical sense both making sure of that, "...it gets all acquisitive. Which is why I have five of the things, three force field space suits from the Krennsh, one of their better projection systems, and a few other things."

"Nao is also very prone to giving out very good advice, or just wanting to talk," 'Chou' admitted, smiling happily. Yrenti looked at her, then around at the others. They all nodded. "I think they all do, although I'll admit that Jun seems to be more prone to it from what Azumi has told me. Certainly it seems to come up with this sort of thing before the others."

Folding a pair of hands in front of him, Yrenti studied them all. 'Azumi' put the drone away while he was inspecting them. Unare and Savrk seemed to be having a silent conversation, making her think they were using their own SIs or whatever more advanced system they had. Eventually he nodded, smiling in a slightly peculiar manner. "I was right. The SI system is obviously unusually compatible with your species. You're the only members of it ever to possess them, so we had no data to go on up until now, but it looks like they complement the way your minds work remarkably well, and vice versa. Very interesting."

Savrk added, "I can be fairly sure that Jun, at least, is already very close to the sentience threshold, just based on that conversation. In most species we'd expect it to take at least twice that length of time." He stroked one finger over an ear, studying 'Azumi' closely. "I wonder if there is something special about you as a... 'magical girl', is it?" She nodded, glancing at her sister-in-law, who suppressed a smile, "that has in some way accelerated the process. You obviously all possess a level of magical ability that is unusual, to say the least, not to mention the kind of magic which is..."
extremely odd." He thought for a moment. "It bears further study, I think. Possibly your own magic has had some effect in this matter. Fascinating."

Yrenti sent them all a file. "This is the test program. Your SIs can run it. I'm interested to see what the results are."

"So am I," 'Chou' said, smiling. The others expressed similar sentiments.

I have checked the supplied program for any security problems, Nabiki. It appears safe. Shall I run it?# Jun sounded somewhat eager, yet also slightly worried.

'It's up to you. I'm not going to force you.' There was a short pause while the middle sister waited.

I would like to see what happens.#

'OK. Good luck.'

This will take approximately two minutes of real time, according to the documentation, I will be unable to respond normally during that period, although I will abort it if there is an emergency. Is that acceptable?# Jun sounded embarrassed. She smiled.

'It's not a problem, Jun. I don't think we're in any danger here. Have fun.'

I think I may be beginning to understand the concept,# the machine commented wryly. It fell silent, giving the impression of thinking very hard, leaving the inside of her head peculiarly vacant as its normal presence, which was so low-level she didn't really notice it until it wasn't there, faded. 'Azumi' looked at her sister, who smiled back.

"Nao seemed quite keen to see what results it got," the disguised Kasumi said, amused.

She nodded. "Jun was both worried and excited, I think." Looking back to Yrenti and his colleagues, she asked, "What result would you expect?"

"In most cases a high seven, or a low eight, perhaps, after the length of time the SIs have been active," Yrenti replied after glancing at Savrk. "I suspect in this case, based on what seems to be happening, that may be a slight underestimate. I'm very interested to find out."

They all waited while the SIs ran the test program. Eventually Jun said, sounding slightly surprised, #I have finished the test. It was somewhat odd, but enlightening. The result is a data-block that I need to have externally verified, it doesn't give me the score directly. If you send it to Yrenti he will be able to tell us what level I have attained.# It indicated a file, which she sent to the Kw'lyn director, who accepted it with an expression of interest. After a moment he looked at her in a quizzical manner.

"Very enlightening indeed," he began, looking around at them all. "Not what we would have expected, I have to admit." He glanced at Ami, Rei, and Hotaru, who were listening expectantly. "You have very recently activated SIs, so as one would understand, they are the least developed at the current time. Even so, they are all above level six already, by a noticeable margin." He looked back to the others. "Your units, though, are considerably higher. Interestingly, Jun would appear to be more advanced than the rest. Level nine point one." Unare and Savrk stared at him, then 'Azumi'.

"Nine point one?" the R and D Director echoed. "Already?"

"Yes." Yrenti glanced at his colleague. Unare was staring at the silver-haired woman still with a
"That is... very fast indeed," she said slowly. "Your mind must be a remarkably good match even amongst your species."

"We've always considered her to be a lot like a computer," Tamiko snickered. "She can certainly be all cold and emotionless." Inwardly amused, 'Azumi' slowly turned and fixed her with her coldest look, making her grin and shiver at the same time. "See?"

Smiling, the alien woman nodded. "Indeed I can."

"All of the others are above level eight, ranging between eight point five and eight point eight." Yrenti watched the byplay with a small smile. "They've all passed the sentience threshold, by a substantial amount." He shook his head for a moment. "I'm curious to see where they all end up."

"I suspect at a fairly high level," Unare commented. "It will be interesting to find out. Please come back so we can see how they're progressing." She smiled at them. "We take an interest in our products, especially when they become colleagues."

"We'll keep you updated," 'Chou' laughed.

"Please do." The alien woman finished the beverage she had been idly sipping, putting the container back on the table, then glanced at Yrenti and Savrk. "I know that my friends have many things they wish to talk to you about, but unfortunately I have another appointment quite soon I can't miss. I would very much like to talk again at some point in the near future, though. We would like to show you more of our world as well, if you're interested. There are things we can't discuss at present, but much of the rest you may well find very interesting."

"I think we'd all like to learn more," 'Yori' replied, looking around at her friends, all of whom nodded.

"I'd certainly like to visit the surface of the sphere," Ami said quietly. Beside her, Hotaru grinned.

"That could be arranged," Unare smiled. "There is some talk about awarding you all in some official way for the help you gave us, as well as the danger you put yourselves in, something I personally feel you all highly deserve. I will make sure that you are kept informed about that matter. However, for the moment in lieu of such an award, Kw'lyn Industries would like to give you a few things we feel may help you." She grinned as everyone looked interested. "Obviously, as per the original message, you are going to have free lifetime upgrades and support for your SIs, and any accessories you wish. We will also allow the SI database to be upgraded to add a portion of the Kw'lyn restricted database. No personal information can be transferred, as we have explained, but most of the general non-classified information and a certain amount of normally restricted data will be included. You may find it helpful in the future."

'Azumi' looked at her sister and 'Yori', somewhat shocked. The martial artist seemed surprised. "That's... very generous indeed," she managed after a moment.

"We are sure that you will understand how to handle this information responsibly, based on what we know about you already, not to mention recent events," the Kw'lyn General Manager responded, looking amused. "Should you have any specific requirement for information we can't release at the moment, please contact me. I'll look into it gladly. I can't promise anything generally but I suspect that we can probably come to an arrangement should you have a genuine need."
"Thank you, very much," 'Chou' told her, sounding pleased and a little stunned. The alien waved one hand dismissively.

"Think nothing of it. As we have said, several times, we owe you a lot. As far as we can, we're happy to help in any way possible." Unare smiled again. "In addition, we discussed what other products of ours might be of use to you. We came up with a few suggestions." She glanced at Yrenti, who smiled, then looked towards the doorway, though which glided one of the security drones. 'Azumi' had the oddest sensation it was the one that had greeted them, although she would have been hard-pressed to explain why. Floating along underneath it was a container a metre or so across and about half that deep, which it neatly deposited next to the table, before dipping slightly in a sort of nod of acknowledgement then turning and silently leaving again.

"Please enjoy the gifts," Unare told them all, standing up. "I would like to stay, but as I said I have an important appointment. I'll have to go now but I'm looking forward to talking again soon." She sent them all contact details, which they accepted. "If I can be of help, just call. It was very nice to meet you all." With a graceful bow the General Manager left the building. Yrenti watched her go, then turned back to the others.

"You can think of this as a sort of gift pack," he commented, looking very amused, then standing and walking over to the crate. He put his hand on the lid, which made a faint satisfied sound and opened when he moved his hand away. Everyone watched as he reached in and pulled out a smaller case. "You can look through the catalogue for anything else you might want, but I think we may have anticipated you in a few places." Putting the case on the table he again unlocked it, then swivelled it around to show them the contents, which turned out to be a number of very familiar small black slabs. "Fourteen Mark Nine Gamma units. I believe these may be useful at some point. We trust you to see that they go to people who can use them responsibly and treat them well."

Staring in amazement, 'Yori' nodded slowly. "Thank you. I can think of a couple of people already. We've only got two left at the moment. Spares could be very useful at some point."

"If you eventually require more, let me know. We don't hand them out like toys, but we're always willing to help you, all things considered." Yrenti chuckled as he watched them. "But I think this should be enough for the moment." He looked at Lldnr'k, then reached into the case and picked up one SI unit, handing it to the temporal mage, who seemed shocked. "I suspect you're one of the people Yori was thinking of. Please enjoy it." The martial artist grinned as she watched the mage slowly reach out and accept the device.

"Yep. I was just about to do the same thing."

"I'm... overwhelmed," Lldnr'k managed, staring at the small machine in his hand. "And extremely grateful. Thank you."

"You deserve it, my friend," 'Yori' assured him. She looked at her wife, then the others. "I was going to see if Hnther wanted one as well. Does that sound good?" Everyone nodded at the same time, including Yrenti and Savrk.

"His reputation is very good indeed," Savrk said, "I would agree that he is the sort of person who should have an SI if he wishes."

"Do you have anyone in mind for the others?" Aiko asked curiously, looking at the black-haired woman, who thought for a moment then shook her head.

"Not at the moment. I can think of a few people who could use them, but most of them aren't people I completely trust just yet, at least not with something so powerful. We'll see how things work out in the future. But at least we have them for when we need them."

"Fair enough." The brunette smiled a little.

Yrenti closed the case, pushing it over to 'Yori'. "Your SI can lock and unlock it," he said, "I've keyed it to you or Chou." The martial artist picked it up and made it vanish, which caused Savrk to inspect her with interest. He didn't say anything, though, seeming content to wait. Returning to the large box, Yrenti removed another one, which amusingly was at least four times higher than the depth of the box. The middle sister grinned as she watched the thing appear, recognising a subspace storage spell but finding the sight funny even so.

"This is the first of the two largest items," Yrenti told them, moving the box to a clear area in the middle of the room and doing something to it. The sides folded down somehow, revealing a two metre tall cylinder that gleamed under the light, apparently made of some dark red metal. The bottom and top were rounded off so the entire thing looked slightly unstable, but it seemed content to balance on one end. After a moment they all noticed it wasn't actually touching the ground, a small gap under it showing clear air between it and the floor.

"What is it?" Fumiko asked curiously.

"It's an inter/intra reality relay for the SI system," Yrenti replied, studying the machine with pride. "The very latest model. Extremely classified, we haven't released this version to anyone outside our world yet. It's due for a good field test, though, and I think you're the ones to do that."

They all stared at the floating device for a moment, rather shocked. "What does it do?" Misaki asked after a moment. "Aside from the obvious, I mean." She grinned as Yrenti laughed.

"Well, it allows communication on the SI network anywhere in the reality strand it's located in, for a start. It will also boost the signal to allow it to connect to reality strands at a much greater degree of separation than the normal unaided SI can manage. We have earlier generations of the same device installed in a number of realities throughout the multiverse which form a cross-reality network that covers a large part of the strands we deal with. Installing this one in your reality will increase the total number directly reachable by several dozen minimum, assuming it works to specification. Which it will." He grinned at them. "Our equipment is very reliable."

"It taps into the main reality's underlying magical field for power, then drops into its own private fractional reality, in a manner not dissimilar to how the time device worked. That protects it from pretty much anything and makes it almost impossible to damage. The device is self-repairing and self-maintaining, with an estimated minimum functional life of twelve thousand years from your viewpoint." 'Yori' glanced at 'Chou', then around at her other friends. They all looked impressed.

"It sounds very useful, to both us and you," she said, studying the machine.

"We have an ulterior motive," Yrenti admitted, smiling a little. "It will certainly be very useful to you, but it extends the reach of our information gathering ability considerably. We don't currently deal with your reality or several others in that cluster, aside from you people, so we have limited assets available there. This will allow us to extend our reach, so to speak. Hopefully to our mutual benefit."

"I can't see any reason not to take it," she replied after a moment. "After all, you could always install it without telling us anyway."

He nodded. "We could, but we would prefer to be honest with you. You are friends if nothing else, and I strongly suspect you will end up being true allies, in one form or another. We believe in playing fair with our friends and allies. It tends to be reciprocated." Producing a smaller cubical device from the crate on the floor, he put it on the table. "This goes with it. It's a local comms node that interfaces from the relay to your local planetary networks. Somewhat like an SI without the actual SI part. It's fairly smart but not self-aware and won't end up as such. On the other hand, it's even better at local linkages that the SIs are. It can bridge your communications and data links to the SI network system, even if none of you are in your home reality to allow your SIs to do the same thing, which is what I believe you currently do."

'Yori' nodded slowly, inspecting the device, which she reached out to pick up. "Yep. We set them up so any phone calls or that sort of thing are relayed from anyone at home to the rest of us when we're in range. Since we're all here, at the moment, we can't get calls, even if it would reach." Handing it to 'Chou' who studied it for a few seconds before passing it to Ami, she smiled. "This will certainly help us a lot. Thanks."

Looking pleased, Yrenti turned back to the crate. "OK, there's one more large item." He removed another, quite similar although slightly smaller box from the crate on the floor. This one also opened when he activated it, the front splitting open and folding away in a rather organic manner to the sides. Inside was a glittering assembly of multi-coloured materials with a few small lights showing on it, which appeared to consist of a few dozen blocks that were attached to a central spine. It was very similar to the long range probes that S'th'kx had launched during the moon mission.

"Let me guess, it's some sort of probe," Tamiko commented. He smiled slightly, nodding a little.

"Not quite, but you're thinking along the right lines. It's a high-accuracy subspace positioning system. It self-launches, dispersing the locator nodes throughout your solar system, where they take up appropriate orbits and again drop into subspace pockets to protect them. Completely shielded and stealthed. It will allow sub-micron positioning anywhere within several dozen light-hours of your star once it's in place and working. It's the best unit we produce, we sell them to planetary governments mostly, they're hideously expensive even in those terms. Just place it in a space with a path to the sky and activate it, it will do everything else itself. Full capability will take about three days to reach due to transit time for the nodes, but you'll have a limited functionality system in about half an hour. Something approaching ten times the accuracy of your existing timing based system."

"Wow." 'Azumi' stared at the thing. "That's pretty impressive. Now all we need is suitably accurate maps of the planet to go with it." She laughed for a moment. "The ones we have for the GPS system are nowhere near good enough to make use of positioning that accurate. Even the military don't have anything good enough."

"We could supply a mapping unit that could survey your planet and build the maps needed," Yrenti mused, studying her. "We're quite happy to do so, it's a standard unit, although we'd be grateful if you'd allow us access to the data it produces for our database. We haven't got up to date mapping information on your world or system, the last time any of our researchers visited it for such purposes was over a century ago. It's an interesting place. We've got quite a lot of data on it on file."

Rei glanced at Ami, grinning. "Do you sum it up as 'Mostly Harmless'?' she asked, a weird grin on her face. All the humans cracked up, although Lldnr'k and Yrenti looked puzzled. Oddly enough, Savrk laughed as well.

"We try not to panic," he quipped, making everyone look at him. "A great loss. Mr Adams was a very humorous author." Azumi' stared, shaking her head slowly, as the alien researcher looked back at her with an amused expression.

"You've read 'The Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy?' she asked with shock. He nodded, smiling.

"I enjoy speculative fiction from a number of species. Yours does it very well. I've read quite a lot of it, although I'm not current, due to work. Douglas Adams always made me laugh."

"Unbelievable." 'Azumi' shook her head again, then grinned widely. "He'd have loved the idea that an alien from another reality was a fan, I think."

"Assuming he even believed it," Ami added, staring at Savrk with a slightly disbelieving expression.

"Um, OK," 'Yori' said slowly, looking at Savrk as well for a few seconds more, then returning her attention to Yrenti, who was also studying his colleague. He looked back to her. "That sounds like a good idea. We don't have any problem with letting you have the data, assuming it doesn't go any further without our knowledge."

"It won't," he assured her. "Should we have any requirement to pass it on we'd clear it with you first."

"Fair enough." She inspecting him for a moment, glancing at 'Chou' and asking a silent question. The blonde nodded. "We could also let you have the data we have gathered on the Moon, and are in the process of gathering from around the solar system from S'th'kx's probes." They'd explained the moon mission and the results of it during Ami's story earlier, although they hadn't mentioned the incredible results from the asteroid yet for various reasons.

"Ah. Yes, the Krennsh probes are very good. Not up to our technology, but the results they produce are extremely high quality. We'd be very interested in that information, thank you." Yrenti looked pleased, while Savrk smiled. "Most generous of you."

"No problem."

Turning back to the crate, Yrenti removed another smaller box, this time putting it on the table. "This is the last of the things we've come up with. Obviously, if we've missed anything, just ask, but hopefully we've come up with some useful items." He opened the case, swivelling it around to show them.

#Ah. I was hoping to acquire one of these, Nabiki,# Jun said with interest.

'What are they?' she asked the SI. Ami echoed much the same question to Yrenti almost simultaneously. Jun let the Kw'lyn Industries director explain.

"This is a military specification sensory package," he said, picking one of the small units out of the box and holding it up. "It's an extension to the Mark Nine Gamma, upgrading the hardware to Mark Ten Delta specifications, which are currently the highest we produce outside the development laboratories. It adds a considerable amount of sensory ability and improves the functionality of what's already present. It triples the data storage capacity as well." He sent them a file which explained the capabilities of the device. Jun and the middle sister both looked it over with interest.

'Wow. Thermal vision, that could be cool,' she commented, noticing one function out of dozens.

#Both true, and a pun,# Jun noted, amused, causing her to laugh. #The specifications are very impressive. This will add to my effectiveness considerably. It exceeds the abilities of Ami's
Handing the device to the martial artist, Yrenti distributed more of them to the others, then closed the case. "There are another dozen in here. I would ask that you are very discreet and careful in deciding who to grant them to, as they are also classified, but we trust your judgement."

"Thanks. This is all a little overwhelming," 'Yori' responded, studying the sensory add-on for a moment, then putting it away.

He shrugged. "We, as we keep repeating, owe you. This is repaying some of that debt in a manner we can easily do." Looking around at the people present, he added, "Is there anything else you can think of that we could help you with? You can always contact us later if you wish, once the relay is in place you won't even need a portal, but now would seem like a good time." Everyone thought for some time.

"There is one thing I've wondered about," 'Azumi' eventually said, causing him to turn his attention to her. Everyone else watched and listened. "The day we got the SIs, oddly enough, I was asking Yori about translation spells." She grinned for a moment. "We have enough science fiction which mentions universal translators, for example, that the concept is something we're familiar with. Do you have anything like that?"

Savrk chuckled. "You want a babel fish?"

Laughing wildly, she nodded. Yrenti and Lldnr'k looked at each other, obviously wondering what the hell the reference was. "It's not easy. The SIs can, as you undoubtedly know, translate any language in their database, which is very extensive, and make it comprehensible to you, both spoken and written. Going the other way is more difficult. Partly due to security restrictions on the SIs themselves, of course, which is something of a self-imposed problem on our part." He glanced at Yrenti, who thought for a moment then nodded slowly.

"We have a solution, yes. For a number of reasons we're very cautious about allowing anyone outside our civilisation to have access to it. It's of strategic importance, in effect. But, I think in this case we could make an exception." He fell silent for a few seconds. "Unare agrees and has authorised it." Looking to Savrk he made a small gesture.

The magical R and D director smiled. "We have a very complex spell, the results of many years of work and refinements. It is very close indeed to what you term a universal translator. There are a few minor limitations, it isn't quite perfect, as there are a few species it has trouble with mainly due to issues surrounding very alien mental processes, but unless you do a lot of interstellar travel you're unlikely to encounter any of them. Portal travel normally connects species which are quite close in the relevant manner."

"We discussed that a while ago and were wondering if it really is true or just seems that way," 'Chou' commented with interest. He looked to her, nodding.

"It appears so, although to date we're not entirely sure why. It's the subject of ongoing research." He shrugged a bit. "It's yet another case of magical weirdness. Anyway, this spell adds an ability to speak and understand almost any language that you're likely to encounter. It also makes learning the written forms very easy, taking only minutes to hours in most cases. There is a library of data on a large number of writing systems embedded into it but if you encounter a new one, you can learn it with minimal effort in most cases."

"That sounds amazing," Aiko told him, looking impressed.
"It's very effective. You wouldn't believe how much effort went into creating and refining it," he told her. "The basis of it is ancient, it's the latest variant of something that pre-dates the Collapse, and was used extensively in the original reality. I believe it originated somewhere else even then, although I don't know where from. We've been refining it almost continuously ever since."

"Wow. It's over thirty-five thousand years old?" she exclaimed, shocked. He nodded.

"Yes. It's probably one of the oldest spells we know of that's still in use."

"It certainly sounds like it would do the job," Misaki commented with interest. She looked at her sister, who seemed intrigued.

Yrenti smiled. "I would hope so. Unare says we can allow it to be used on all of you, and Hnther, if he wishes. We're prepared to allow it for other people you designate on a case by case basis but we don't want to let it out generally for a number of reasons. We can give you an artefact that will apply the spell subject to these restrictions, assuming that you're agreeable to them? I'm sorry we can't just let you have it, but as I said, it's a matter of internal security, something our government would be annoyed about if we did. We have a lot of leeway on most things but we can't simply do whatever we want."

'Yori' inspected him for a moment then looked around. Everyone seemed agreeable. "That sounds very generous. Thanks."

"We should let Uthryyl, Quannya, and Onkra have it," 'Chou' remarked. "It would help them and they're very trusted friends."

"The merchant Uthryyl and his family are acceptable," Yrenti nodded. "We have considerable respect for him, he's helped us on a number of occasions." 'Chou' smiled her thanks.

"There are a few others I can think of that would benefit from it," 'Yori' mused, thinking out loud. "The obvious one would be Masao." She glanced at Yrenti, who thought for a moment.

"Agent Naito would also be acceptable. Again, we have a certain amount of information on him, we've taken an interest in your associates recently for obvious reasons, and he is both highly intelligent and ethically sound. If he wishes to have the spell we will allow it."

"Thanks. I'll ask him when we get back." 'Yori' looked pleased, as did the others.

"All right. I've arranged for the applicator artefact to be made and delivered, it will be here before you leave," Yrenti said. "Is there anything else you need?" Everyone thought for a while.

"Nothing immediately springs to mind," Ami commented, looking around. Hotaru shrugged, smiling a little. Aiko laughed.

"I can think of dozens of things I'm curious about but we'd be here for weeks," she snickered. "I can wait. Let's take our toys and get used to them before we get anything else. No need to be greedy." Yrenti and Savrk grinned at her.

"We don't mind, certainly," Savrk replied, amused, "but that's a responsible attitude. Just let us know if there's anything else you require."

"We will," 'Chou' assured him. "We're extremely grateful, though, you've been very generous."

"It's no problem," he told her with a smile. Inspecting her, then 'Yori', he asked after a moment, "Would it be possible to talk about your magical methods now?" There was a hopeful and fascinated expression on his face. She smiled, glancing at her husband, who grinned.

"Sure. What do you want to know?"

"Everything, if possible," he replied, also grinning.

"That could take a while." 'Yori' chuckled as the R and D director laughed. "OK. We're not keen on this going any further without our permission, of course, but we have no trouble telling you about it, I guess." She looked at 'Chou' who nodded calmly.

"Anything you tell us about proprietary systems will be held in confidence," Yrenti assured her. "We have similar agreements with a number of worlds and practitioners. If your methods can be duplicated by us, we may well wish to enter into some form of commercial partnership if you're willing, but at the moment we're primarily simply curious. It looks very much like something new, which is almost unprecedented in magical control theory. Certainly what I've seen of your magical methods match nothing in the Kw'lyn database, something we find extremely surprising and very intriguing, so we're most interested in learning more."

"Fair enough," the martial artist commented. She thought for a moment, apparently trying to work out the best way to begin, while everyone watched and waited. Eventually she nodded slowly to herself.

"OK. Chou and I are primarily martial artists, rather than magic users," she began, as her audience listened curiously. The middle Tendo looked around at her friends, seeing that even though they knew all this, they seemed interested in the explanation. She settled down to watch and listen. "Very good ones, in fact. I've been learning since I was a small child, almost from the time I could walk, which coupled with a gift for it, and some very unorthodox training, left me as probably the foremost expert in the field on our world." She shrugged a little tiredly.

"It also caused more trouble than you'd believe, but that's another story. Anyway, one of the things you learn if you progress far enough in this field is control of ki, or life energy. Or at least, that's what happens with us. I haven't come across it in other places so far."

"I'm familiar with the concept," Savrk admitted, looking intrigued, "but it's mostly a legend from what the database has in it, for the majority of realities we have data on. There are stories of individuals who could control a form of energy that wasn't magic and was described in those terms from a number of places but we don't have any current information on it being widely known about." He studied them all for a few seconds. "What can you do with it?"

"An awful lot when you know how," she told him, looking amused. Holding out her hand she formed a small energy ball on it, making him watch with interest, as did Yrenti. "This is a fairly basic application once you have sufficient control. I learned this years ago, and we've refined it ever since. At low power levels it's not dangerous, but if you pump enough power into it..." She grinned rather dangerously as he nodded absently, studying the manifestation.

"How much energy can you put into it?" he asked. Everyone glanced at each other.

Yrenti chuckled. "If what I saw was accurate, more than I want to believe," he commented.

"We could demonstrate, but it tends to leave large holes in the surroundings," 'Chou' remarked, smiling a little. "It would be a shame to damage such a nice place."

"We have a test area we could visit if you are prepared to show us," Yrenti offered. 'Chou' and 'Yori' looked at each other for a moment.
"Why not?" 'Yori' told him. He nodded, getting up.

"All right, come with me." Everyone followed as he left the building. They were led to another one that had something built into the floor which LIdnr'k inspected with interest.

"A teleport node?" he asked. Yrenti nodded again.

"Yes. We use teleportation quite a lot for cargo transport, and when we're in a hurry, but many people, myself included, like to take slower methods of transportation a lot of the time when there's no rush." He smiled. "It gives a nicer view. But we're going far enough that this is much easier. The weapons test area is on another planet dedicated to dangerous activities. Much like that dead world you were using," he added, looking at 'Yori', who nodded her understanding. Looking around he checked everyone was on the node, then did something. The world flickered and they were somewhere else.

"This is a private research test area that we can make as much of a mess of as we like," Savrk told them, waving all four arms around to indicate their surroundings. They looked around with interest.

The group was standing on a flat plain next to a number of low, somewhat battered looking buildings of extremely heavy construction, with force-fields of sufficient strength to be visible as a shimmering akin to heat haze surrounding them. In the distance were a number of what appeared to be targets, many of which looked even more battered than the buildings, while further back, at least a couple of dozen kilometres away, a low mountain range could be seen. There were craters and scars all over the landscape, making it look like it had witnessed a severe battle at some point. Overall it was quite reminiscent of the dead world and Uthryyl's own test area, although somewhat more formally constructed.

"Should do," Fumiko noted with a smile. "Do you want all those mountains?" she asked, pointing and grinning. Savrk looked curiously at her while 'Yori' sighed. A number of laughs came from the others.

"You're never going to stop about that, are you?" the martial artist asked her friend, who shook her head, looking amused.

"Nope. It was the sort of thing you tend to remember." The two Kw'lyn directors were looking curious. 'Yori' turned to them.

"We had a slight miscalculation on a previous test," she explained. "It involved a certain amount of running away."

"Ah." Savrk smiled. "I've had a few of those myself." Beside him, Yrenti sighed heavily.

"Don't remind me," he muttered. "The last one took days to deal with..."

Grinning, Savrk waved them towards one of the buildings, the force-field surrounding it vanishing as they approached. "We can observe what happens from in here. What sort of target would you like?"

"Something reasonably large, about two kilometres away?" 'Chou' replied after looking at her partner, who nodded.

"No problem." A moment later one of the distant targets lit up. "That one should do. It's what we use for testing medium range weapons systems. The energy absorption properties of it should withstand a fairly serious attack and we can monitor the damage you do from here." 'Yori' studied it with interest for a moment.
"OK. Let's see what happens." She went back outside, moving around to the front of the building just inside the force-field, which developed a hole in front of her.

"Fire through there when you're ready," Savrk told her, broadcasting over the com link. "It will close immediately afterwards for protection."

"OK. I'll start small, with a normal ki ball, the sort of thing we use against a low level threat," she replied. A glowing purple sphere grew in her hand to about the size of a baseball, then whooshed off towards the target at high speed, impacting on it a fraction of a second later. A brilliant purple flash was followed by a loud explosion a few seconds later. Savrk blinked, apparently impressed.

"I... see," he said slowly. "That was a significant amount of energy. How many times can you do that?"

'Yori' looked over her shoulder with an amused grin, while her friends laughed in a way that made both Savrk and Yrenti look around with slightly worried expressions.

"A fair few times," she replied. "For a little one like that, there isn't a lot of effort required."

After a short pause, the R and D director nodded. "Can you do a bigger one?" he asked.

"Sure. That target's a bit close for full power, but let's try something larger." She turned back to the firing range and produced a much larger ki ball, this one well over a metre across. Savrk stared, reading the power output with shock, then looked at his colleague, who seemed less surprised. He noticed that all the other human women had their hands over their ears but looked calm.

"You might want to opaque the windows at the moment of impact," Ami commented. He nodded.

"Ready?" 'Yori' asked. The aperture in the forcefield reappeared.

"Fire when you want," he told her, watching with interest. The large ki ball roared off across the range as 'Yori' turned around with her eyes closed. The windows blanked for a short period, returning to transparency in time to see a fading glow around the target, which was visibly damaged and warped. Seconds later an enormous boom made the entire building shake.

Savrk mumbled something under his breath, sounding shocked. Everyone watched him as he inspected the damage. "That... is rather worrying," he commented after a few seconds, somewhat dazedly. "There's no readings of magic used at all. That was all this ki energy?"

"Yep."

"And you can make it larger?"

The martial artist snickered at his tone. "Oh, yes. The compression technique improves the yield a lot, and of course I can put more energy in if it's required."

"Compression technique?" he asked, shaking his head a little in apparent shock. She explained, holding up a hand on which an orange-sized ki ball appeared, then shrunk into a dimensionless point of brilliance. "Oh, I see," he replied numbly. There was a long pause. "I'm not sure I'm reading this correctly. The energy density is..." He trailed off, making Yrenti pat him on the shoulder.

"I said they seem to have some rather impressive abilities, didn't I?" his colleague smiled. Savrk looked at him for a moment, then went back to staring at the martial artist, who was looking amused, patiently waiting.
"You did. But this is rather... unexpected. Even with the recordings and readings you got, I'm... surprised." After a moment, he asked, in a tone of voice that made it sound like he wasn't entirely sure he wanted to know the answer, "What happens if you put as much energy as that last shot into a compressed ki blast?"

'Yori' grinned. "Want to see?"

"Ah... All right." She turned back to the target, once more a firing aperture appearing in front of her. The ki ball grew brighter for a couple of seconds, then shot off across the range with an almost inaudibly high-pitched whistle, making both Yrenti and his friend wince. Yori turned around and put her arm over her eyes as the windows blanked again.

When they regained transparency, it was in time to see shrapnel bouncing off the force field. Savrk stared in shock at the remains of his test target, which consisted of a huge crater in the ground, glowing white-hot, while around the area small pieces of the targets on either side were steadily raining from the sky. The ground shock reached them a moment later making the building heave noticeably, the dampening systems barely able to keep up. "Oops. Sorry, the other targets were collateral damage," 'Yori' apologised.

"That's all right," he replied in a daze. There was a long pause. Lldnr'k was studying his friend with interest and some surprise, the middle sister noticed, he obviously hadn't quite expected that amount of damage, although he was clearly aware of the possibility from his previous experience on the dead world and the talk they'd had afterwards. After staring out the window for a while, Savrk asked slowly, "You're implying that you can go higher yield than that?"

"Oh, a bigger bang isn't much of a problem, especially if I mix in some magic as well," the martial artist assured him, smiling. "But not at that range, I don't think it would be a good idea, to be honest."

"How large?" he asked, sounding both somewhat dubious and very curious. "If that was a more normal magical attack, very few mages I have ever heard of could field much more than perhaps twice that amount of energy, and at that only once without risking serious injury."

'Yori' grinned at him, her fangs showing. "That was a warm up. I can show you something closer to full power, but I'll have to have something a lot further away to shoot at."

"You know it's going to be a mountain again, don't you?" Aiko asked wryly. Her friend nodded, still grinning. The brunette turned to Savrk. "Anyone around over there?" she asked, pointing at the distant range. He stared at her, then glanced at Yrenti, who shrugged, plainly curious as well. After a moment's silence he shook his head. "The area is clear. How large a blast are we expecting?"

"I'm not entirely sure," 'Yori' told him, looking interested, which didn't seem to make him entirely happy. "It tends to get larger every time we try this."

"Ah..." She grinned as the R and D director blinked, then turned around.

"I'll aim through the gap there, where the target was, all right?" she asked.

"...Yes, I suppose so," he replied, watching as once more a tiny point of brilliant light grew in her hand. It got brighter and brighter to the point the windows darkened again, until finally zipping off in a flat trajectory towards the mountain range. 'Yori' darted around the building and back in through the heavy door, touching the control that closed it as she entered and sealing the room.

"I'd push that force field as high as it goes," she advised, watching the point of light dwindle into the distance until it vanished from sight. There was a pause then the entire horizon went violet-white for a fraction of a second until the windows opaqued completely, even so leaving everyone blinking. Savrk made a strangled sound, Yrenti mumbled something under his breath, and Lldnr'k simply shook his head slowly in respect.

"I think that was bigger than the last time," Misaki commented, nibbling a fruit she'd brought with her. Fumiko nodded, holding out her hand, which her sister put another one into.

"I think so too."

Several seconds later the windows unblanked, showing a huge rising cloud of dust and smoke far out over the plain, an orange-yellow glow at its base. The middle sister found it a familiar sight although it was definitely larger than the time on the dead world. Ami was staring alternately between the rising mushroom cloud and the martial artist with an expression of awed horror on her face, Rei was simply gaping, while Hotaru was watching Yori with amazement and a slight grin.

The cloud slowly cleared, a shockwave making the entire building vibrate some seconds later as it reached them through the ground. The sound followed quite a long time after that, following quite a lot of white-hot shrapnel pinging off the shield for a few seconds. No one said anything until the cloud had dissipated enough to show a noticeable gap in the range. Savrk stared wordlessly, his ears flat against his head, while Yrenti looked impressed.

"Definitely bigger," Misaki said, looking pleased.

Eventually the alien scientist turned to the petite woman who was inspecting the damage with interest and quietly said, "I do not ever want to upset you, Yori." She laughed a little, turning to him.

"I can't think of any reason to do that against a person," she assured him. "I still can't really believe I can do it myself. I never expected or wanted that level of power, it just sort of happened. But it certainly makes an impressive bang."

"That's... not entirely wrong," he admitted, looking out the window again. "I have no idea how you can do that, the energy handling ability is awe-inspiring. Can you all perform such a feat?"

"Yori is rather in a class of her own for sheer power output," 'Chou' told him calmly. "I'm nowhere near that level and may never be, although we believe Hotaru could reach it. The rest of us vary in power level, I do have the current highest available output after Yori, while Azumi has the lowest. That's constantly changing, though, for a number of reasons."

"It's absolutely extraordinary," Savrk said, looking fascinated as the shock wore off. He kept looking out the window at the gap in the mountain range. "While we have some data on stories surrounding this 'ki' as I said, none of them even hint at that level of power being available."

"Yori" shrugged a little. "I can't tell you much more about that myself, I'm afraid," she admitted. "I don't have any practical experience with ki usage except amongst humans, and it's not common there. We seem to have more effective abilities in it than anyone else I'm aware of although I can't pretend to know everything about it, even so. I'm sure there's a lot more to learn. I am in the process of teaching Uthryyl's daughter martial arts, which is also an interesting experiment in ki development in the D'sage, but it's too early yet to know what will happen. I'm very curious to see how it progresses."

"As am I," Savrk told her.
"What was the attack you used against the Abomination?" Yrenti asked, causing everyone to look at him. "It was obviously something based on the same principles but was even more potent."

"I worked out some time ago how to use ki as a continuous beam rather than a single pulse," the martial artist replied. Opening the door she leaned out and fired a ki beam at one of the undamaged target stands, punching a neat hole completely through it, then sliced the top of it off with a longer duration beam she swept sideways through it, the screeching noise making everyone wince. "Like that," she continued, stepping back inside. "The compression technique can be used with it as well although it's a lot more complex. On the dead world we all pumped power into the same sort of thing at maximum output and compression, until we basically ran dry. Even then it was only enough to slow it down. It's a good thing the security system did what it did."

Savrk turned back to her from staring at the remains of the test target, then glanced at his colleague. "What did it do?" Yrenti asked, looking at the R and D director in turn before returning his attention to the black-haired girl. "For that matter, what is it?" She looked at her partner for a moment, then sighed very slightly.

"I guess we're probably going to have to tell you more," she said, somewhat reluctantly. "It's also an internal security matter, on our part, something we're very cautious about letting other people know about."

Yrenti studied her for a few seconds. "It's not essential to tell us if you feel you don't want to," he said in the end. "I'm very curious, as is my colleague here, but we're not going to pry if you're unwilling to let us know any more. We understand the issues involved in such things, believe me."

"That said, we are prepared to submit to the security spell you did covering information on Kw'lyn during your first visit," Savrk added. "We can ensure that the information stays out of the database as well. It's unusual but not unprecedented as we've got similar arrangements over sensitive information from a few other sources."

The martial artist and her wife had a silent conversation while everyone waited patiently. Eventually 'Chou' nodded, turning to the Kw'lyn representatives. "It's fair that we tell you, Yrenti, you were there and deserve an explanation. You trust Savrk so we're prepared to let him in on it as well, and Unare should she wish to know. I hope you'll understand if we don't tell you everything, though, at this point."

"That's more than fair, Chou," he assured her. "We're still recent acquaintances. As time goes on, you may find yourselves willing to let us know more about your secrets, which we're perfectly happy about, but even if you don't, we will understand. It won't affect our relationship, I assure you."

"Why don't we go back to the visitor area and discuss it," Lldnr'k suggested, looking around. "I for one could do with another drink after witnessing what we just did." He made his equivalent of a smile, while a few of the others laughed a little. 'Azumi' noticed that Ami was still staring at 'Yori' with a peculiar expression.

"You all right, Ami?" she asked privately, slightly concerned. The blue-haired girl twitched and looked at her, then nodded a little. No one else paid much attention.

"I suppose so. I knew that you guys were something special, but I didn't have any idea what Yori could really do if she tried. Even after hearing about Halleckton, and on the asteroid, what she just did is... terrifying."

The middle sister quirked a small grin at her friend. "Oh, it is that, certainly. Even Ranma thinks that, believe me. I still find it almost impossible to believe that any of the rest of us, especially me, could ever get anywhere that level of ability and power. I'm not sure I want to, to be honest. One mistake..." They both followed as Yrenti led the way back to the teleport node, looking into the distance for a moment at the results of the 'weapons test', both girls shivering a little. Their eyes met for a moment, then the world flickered.

"I'm very glad indeed that all of you are such good people," Ami commented quietly as they reappeared at the visitor centre, going back into the conference building and sitting down.

"I'm not sure I am a good person," 'Azumi' responded equally quietly. "I did some very wrong things when I was younger, especially to Ranma. I regret it, and although he's forgiven me, I'm not sure I can ever truly forgive myself."

"We all have things in our past we regret," the other woman agreed soberly. "But I think, from what I've learned over the last few weeks, that you are a good person, despite what you may believe. Ranma, and definitely Kasumi, strike me as very good judges of character. I doubt we'd be in this position if they didn't trust you completely. I know I do, even though we haven't known each other all that long."

"Thanks." The disguised Nabiki smiled at her friend. "I appreciate it, and feel much the same. I'm still not sure I'm the right person to have that much power, but I'm going to try not to abuse it."

"We'll all stop you if you do, I'm sure," Ami laughed.

"Again, thanks," she replied, giggling internally. "I think." Sharing a quick grin they resumed paying attention to the discussion. Hotaru was watching them with a curious look, she noticed, making her wink. The younger girl smiled back.

Yrenti told them, "The building is secure, and all the recording systems are now disabled."

'Chou' smiled at him. "Thank you. I hope you're not insulted, and we believe and trust you, but we'll take our own precautions as well if you don't mind." He waved a hand in a gesture of understanding.

"Help yourself," he replied. She nodded, then everyone felt a heavy ward go up around the building. Savrk looked around with interest and some surprise although Yrenti didn't seem too shocked.

"Impressive. Very impressive indeed."

"The one they created when we went after the Abomination was much more powerful," his colleague commented, making him nod slowly.

"This is merely intended to block any surveillance you might not know about," 'Yori' chuckled, "not withstand a major attack. It'll do for the moment." She inspected them both with interest. "Are you ready for me to apply our version of the spell?" They both nodded, so she got up and went around the table, placing her hand on Yrenti's head first, then Savrk, both of whom blinked a little.

"That is a... unique... variant of that spell," Savrk said in a voice that sounded surprised. "And yet more evidence you have something very unusual. I can barely follow what happened and I have no idea how you did it. It must be magic, I think, but it's like nothing I've ever encountered before."

He grinned at her. "We have to talk about that."

She grinned back, retaking her seat. "We will. Let's talk about the security system first, though." Glancing at her wife, she thought for a few seconds, then slowly began explaining the entire.
sequence of events that they'd worked out, starting with the design of the ward system and ending up with the aftermath of the destruction of the time device. It took some time. Both Kw'lyn people listened quietly, various expressions of interest, surprise, and raw shock a couple of times going across their alien countenances. Everyone else listened without comment, although Ami added some details of her own research when 'Yori' asked her to. In the end, they fell silent, waiting for the response.

Savrk stared at the martial artist for quite a long time when she finished talking. Eventually he shook his head in wonder. "That is... quite remarkable. To put it mildly. I would very much like to examine this ward system of yours one day, assuming you, or it for that matter, would allow it. I've heard of similar systems once or twice in the past, although nothing like that level of complexity or power, or initiative in fact. It does indeed sound like it is very close to a sentient breakthrough along the lines of the SI units or other emergent intelligences. Fascinating."

"I understand your earlier comments now," Yrenti added, looking at 'Yori', 'Chou', and 'Azumi'. "You were referring to the ward system?" All three women nodded.

"Yes. It's something we've been watching with great interest and slight worry for a while now," 'Chou' told him. "None of us were sure until recently what would be likely to happen when it... woke up... although both Yori and I were fairly sure that was the direction it was heading in. I think we saw a small example of it during this recent problem, from what the logs say it was very close to if not actually past this sentience threshold you mentioned, although it seems to have returned to an earlier state once the danger was over. It looks deliberate, as well, which is interesting. Both of us are pleased and grateful that it did what it needed to, it undoubtedly saved everything and everyone, and it also make me think that when if finally achieves that state permanently it will be safe."

"I believe you're correct," Yrenti told her, obviously thinking hard. "The manner in which it operated show its basic functions of protection are the main driving goals, similar to the way our combat drone minds start off, although more along the lines of defence than attack. I would expect that this will continue. It is obviously very good at working out solutions that are not what you would expect from a more normal intelligence engine as well, which is very interesting. The location and exploitation of the loophole in your prohibition of direct action outside its zone of influence is very clever."

"The ability to drain and manipulate that amount of magical energy is extraordinary as well," Savrk mused, picking up a cup and taking a quick drink from it, then returning it to the table. "Again, almost unprecedented. Especially for something that wasn't designed to do that in the first place."

"What was that final flow of energy?" Yrenti asked curiously. They all looked at him. "Just at the end, it seemed to be pulling magical power back out of the portal. Where did it go?" This was the one part they hadn't mentioned yet. 'Yori' and her wife looked at each other, then around at the others. Everyone returned her look, not knowing quite what to say. She laughed and sighed at the same time.

"You'll have to see it. You wouldn't believe it otherwise."

Savrk and his colleague exchanged an intrigued look then got up and followed as a portal opened in the corner of the room, the others all filing through as well. Shortly the room was empty.
"I think that's everything," Akane said with satisfaction, zipping up her bag. Shampoo looked up from her position at the youngest sister's desk where she was reading a magazine and smiled wryly.

"We're not going until tomorrow, you know," she said.

Akane laughed. "I'm trying to make sure I'm ready in plenty of time. Just in case I forget anything, I might remember it before we leave." She picked the bag up off the bed where she'd packed it and put it on the floor beside the bedroom door. "You should do the same, really."

Shampoo turned a page in her magazine and returned her attention to it. With a slight giggle she admitted, "I packed last night."

Shaking her head in amusement, the Tendo woman flopped down on her back on her bed, staring at the ceiling with wide eyes. "I still can't believe we're doing this, Shampoo. Going to the US, learning to do movie stunts, perhaps ending up acting... It still seems like a dream sometimes."

"You've been saying that for weeks now." The Amazon warrior grinned. "But I agree. It's pretty amazing. I'm looking forward to it."

"I wonder what sort of thing they'll want us to try?"

"Adrian was mentioning some driving training, that sounds fun, and also some fight stuff. Hopefully we can give a decent showing of ourselves in something as difficult as a fight scene." They shared a glance then fell about laughing wildly.

A knock on the door made Akane sit up, rubbing tears of laughter from her eyes, then call "Come in." Her father entered the room, looking at both of them with a smile.

"Hello, girls. Did you do something funny?" They exchanged glances, grinning.

"It was more something silly, Dad," Akane replied. He laughed with a shrug.

"OK. I'm at a bit of a loose end at the moment since we're not teaching today and I was wondering if you two would like to learn some of the more advanced Anything Goes techniques we mentioned a while ago? Genma is up for it as well, if you like." They exchanged a glance then both hopped to their feet with alacrity.

"We'd like that very much, Soun," Shampoo said with respect and a nod.

"Come on, then. I'll meet you both in the Dojo in five minutes." The elder Tendo grinned at them, with teeth. "Let's see how all that Amazon knowledge stands up to the old men, eh?" Snickering he left the room. The young women looked at each other, laughed, then changed into their practice clothing and followed him soon after, both very interested in what would happen.

"You're right."

Everyone looked at Yrenti, who was staring upwards with an open mouth. Beside him, Savrk was doing much the same.

"Excuse me?" 'Yori' asked politely, but with a small smile on her lips. He lowered his gaze to meet
"I wouldn't have believed it if I hadn't seen it." He looked around the vast space which they were standing in the middle of, having portalled directly to it, then back at the ki-star, almost straight above them. Everyone could feel the energy as well as the heat gently radiating from it. "This is... spectacularly impressive. Even for us."

Savrk chuckled for a moment, rather oddly. Everyone looked at him, as he muttered, "I think the appropriate line from one of your speculative fiction works is 'Oh, my god, it's full of stars.'" Misaki started laughing helplessly as did 'Azumi' and Ami. 'Yori' grinned widely. "It's a variant on the spell that the Abomination used, isn't it?" he asked quietly, not looking away from staring at the huge ball of energy suspended far above the group.

"We think so," 'Chou' replied. "It seems to be very effective. We certainly never showed the ward system how to do this, it seems to have worked it out all by itself. Which is very interesting on several levels."

"Definitely," he mused, finally managing to tear his eyes away from the sight high in the sky and look at her. "I can't get a good reading on what that energy actually is. That's... very unusual. It isn't normal magic, certainly, and while it shares a lot in common with this ki you seem so terrifyingly adept at, it's not identical to that either."

"It seems to have found a half-way house somewhere between magic and ki," 'Yori' said, looking up for a moment then back at their two guests. "From our point of view it's mostly what we think of as magic, but with a hell of a lot of something very similar to but subtly different to normal ki mixed in with it. At the moment my best guess is that the magic is the energy left from what it reclaimed from the fractional reality when it imploded, while the ki-like energy is what we pumped into it, both of them modified by this spell. But I'm not totally sure of that yet." She shrugged a little. "We haven't had time to investigate it thoroughly yet," she added slightly sourly. "Too many other things to do."

"It's stable, we determined that very quickly, and Lldnr'k agrees with us, but other than that we haven't yet done much research," her wife added.

"We still haven't come up with a good use for over a thousand cubic kilometres of extra storage space either," Fumiko laughed. "We've had some ideas, but most of them got shot down." 'Chou' glanced at her with a smile and shook her head.

"I still don't think keeping spacecraft in here is a practical thing," she said calmly. The other woman looked disappointed.

"Oh, come on, there's loads of room. Stick them over in that corner out of the way... You could get a large fleet of ones like S'th'kx's scout-craft in here and you'd never even notice them. This place is huge!"

Yrenti and Savrk listened to the mild argument with smiles. 'Yori' glanced at them, shrugging a little. "Fumiko really likes space travel," she explained with a grin.

"It can be a lot of fun, yes," Savrk admitted, looking amused. He looked around again. "She's not wrong, you could certainly keep more or less anything you want in here. It's a lot of space for such a small group of people."

"How would we get them in and out?" 'Chou' asked her friend, who shrugged, grinning shamelessly.
"No idea. We'll have to work on that."

"How about a portal, like we did on K'n'n Four?" Misaki asked idly, nibbling a carrot which she'd produced a moment ago.

"We'd have to make a portal to another reality then back," 'Chou' explained patiently. "You know portals between two places in the same reality are virtually impossible and horribly unstable. It's a lot of work to go to..."

Fumiko laughed, shaking her head. "For you guys? You do portals as easily as Aiko does teleportation."

"Well..." 'Chou' looked mildly embarrassed. "That's true, I suppose, but you can't do them at all yet."

"You're going to teach us, though. So eventually..." The other woman shrugged with a grin again. The blonde sighed very faintly.

The middle sister, who was listening to her sister and friend argue with amusement, as were the others, noticed that Savrk was looking around curiously. He bent down and prodded the ground for a moment with an expression of interest, looking at it closely. "I'd like to examine one of the walls, if you don't mind," he said as he straightened up. 'Yori' looked at him for a moment, then glanced at Aiko, who nodded. Abruptly they were standing a few metres from one of the walls. Savrk and Yrenti exchanged a look then stared at Aiko, who smiled back innocently.

"That was... remarkable," Yrenti said slowly. "I was aware that you could teleport but that spell is insanely efficient. Where did it come from?"

The petite brunette grinned. "To be honest, I don't really know, originally. I've been able to do it ever since the event that got the four of us into the magical girl club years ago. What I use now isn't quite what I started with, though, Yori says I've made all sorts of unconscious tweaks to it which have improved it a hell of a lot. It's good fun."

"Fun." Yrenti examined her with interest. "Yes, I can see that. Also something that if it could be duplicated would have some extremely interesting applications. It's a very significant improvement on the normal methods. Again, something we'd be interested in talking about if you're agreeable."

"Yori is working on duplicating the spell in the new system," Aiko explained, making them both look at the martial artist, who nodded. "I guess by the time she works it out we should know enough about it to teach it to someone else."

"Possibly," 'Yori' added. "It's a little more complicated because our system is so different, but it's true we should have a very good understanding of how it actually works by the time we've converted it. That's what we had to do for the portal spell, which meant we more or less had to redesign it from first principles. Found some interesting inefficiencies in it and fixed them as a result."

"Amazing." Savrk shook his head in respect. "Absolutely incredible." After a moment, he seemed to remember what they'd teleported here in the first place for and paced over to the wall, examining it closely, then pulling a small instrument out of a pouch on the formfitting belt he was wearing, one that clearly didn't fit the space available. Putting it against the wall he did something then watched as a few tiny lights blinked for a couple of seconds. "Hmm."

Everyone watched as he repeated the exercise, then moved a few metres along the wall and did it again. Stepping back he stared at it, before bending down and doing the same thing on the floor. "Hmm," he said again, more quietly. Putting the instrument away he looked up the wall, then turned to stare at the 'star' for a moment. "Very interesting indeed."

"In what way, specifically?" Ami asked curiously. He turned to her.

"This isn't a normal spacial expansion spell, not by a long way," he explained, waving a couple of hands at the vast empty cavern. "Something I'm coming to expect from your group. It's closer to the fractional reality that the Abomination used than I think you all realise." Everyone exchanged a glance.

"How do you mean?" 'Yori' asked slowly, appearing slightly worried. He looked at her for a moment, then around at the 'basement.'

"It's nothing dangerous, but it is very intriguing. A normal subspace expansion spell creates something that has been called, not entirely wrongly, a pocket dimension, but this is more than that. Normal expansion spells, although the space they extrude into is much bigger on the inside than the outside, are still technically part of the originating reality in most ways that matter, which is why you can move them around so easily, like in the case of this belt. This... isn't. Not quite. It seems to be a very weird hybrid of subspace expansion and fractional reality, with something else added I can't identify. The end result is that I don't think we're completely in your normal reality strand in a number of important ways. Which is very odd and something I'd love to explore more. I can see some interesting applications for it if it could be duplicated." Everyone stared at him for some moments, wordlessly.

After a long pause, 'Yori' and her wife looked at each other. Eventually the martial artist shrugged. "Worth a try," she admitted out loud to some silent suggestion. Looking to the side she concentrated for a few seconds, her eyebrows going up when the beginnings of a portal wavered into existence. " Weird."

"You need to push there, I think," 'Chou' commented, watching with fascination. 'Yori' nodded absently.

"Yep, I see it. And if I do this..." There was a slight pop and the portal snapped into normal form, "...That happens. Wow."

"Where's the other end?" Rei asked.

"The living room," was the reply. Everyone stared at the black-haired woman. She shrugged. "It really is." She stepped through, reappearing moments later eating an apple they all recalled there being a bowl of on the dining table. "That's amazing. And could be really useful."

"So this space is just enough off in its own reality to allow a portal to be created between here and our normal reality?" Tamiko asked Savrk. He nodded, watching the portal closely for a moment, then turning to her.

"It would seem so. That is... not normal. I've seen it done before with great effort on a much smaller scale, but nothing like this, or as stable as this is. The time device, of course, used a similar technique, but that was on a vastly larger scale, and required a huge amount of energy to set up in the first place from what we know, although it could be kept stable with much less once it was established. I presume that's why it collapsed when the Abomination died and the power source failed. Your ward system would appear to have extracted all the freed magic that went into that fractional reality and also worked out how to modify the spell very considerably to produce this. I doubt that something not using your very strange variant on magical control could have done it, not in this manner. Fascinating." He looked around again. Everyone followed his gaze.

Hotaru, after a pause, slowly asked, "If this is actually a different reality, or sort of, how does it work? I mean, how can we get to it just by going down an elevator, not by using a portal? How can Aiko teleport to it?" She paused, then asked in a quieter voice, one that was somewhat worried, "And what's on the other side of the wall..."

Everyone looked around nervously. Savrk laughed.

"The second question is easy. Nothing to worry about, there aren't any monsters in some hidden space. What's on the other side of that wall is this... room, I suppose you'd call it." They all looked at him curiously, even Yrenti.

"How does that even work?" Misaki asked. He shrugged slightly.

"It's a closed continuum. If you could penetrate that wall, which I strongly suspect isn't actually possible, you'd find yourself coming out at a point exactly a hundred and eighty degrees away from it, over there on the other side." He indicated over his shoulder, sending them all bar Lldnr'k a quick animation to illustrate the concept which they watched with interest. "The same thing would apply from any point you picked. If you went through the floor you'd re-enter through the ceiling, and so forth. It's easier to visualise if you think of it as spherical but the same principle applies regardless. There is essentially no 'outside' to something of this nature, only an inside. You have to leave the sub-reality to go outside it, which you can't do by digging. The mathematics describing the topology of something like this are very complex and most fascinating." He grinned as she slowly nodded, understanding the idea.

"That's weird." Rei looked around. Beside her, Fumiko stared at the ground, then looked up at the invisible ceiling for a moment, an odd expression on her face.

"Very weird." the tall girl agreed.

"The first part to your question, Hotaru, is somewhat more involved," the R and D director mused, looking at the purple-haired girl who was listening intently. "I'm not sure how, precisely, it works, but essentially there must be some form of permanent subspace manifold set up in your elevator that links this place and the rest of your normal reality strand in a manner slightly like a portal, but not using the normal mechanics of one. It can't be done between reality strands in the normal manner, portals are the only way to travel like that, but this is so close to the rest of this strand that it works. That is more or less how a normal subspace storage spell functions, although again, not exactly. Aiko's teleportation will be going through the same route." He laughed slightly. "Everything about your lifestyle seems to be an exercise on how to do things differently from everyone else. It's very confusing but very interesting as well."

"I think it's sort of a giant ki pocket," 'Yori' suggested after another pause as they all tried to wrap their minds around that explanation. He and Yrenti looked curiously at her, so she explained the basics of the hidden weapons technique. "Not exactly identical, but along those lines. The ward system seems to have cobbled this entire thing together from all sorts of weird bits and pieces. It's certainly capable of learning from us, so much of what we are is built into it as a result of feeding it energy for so long, and I think it's used things it's seen us use and was familiar with."

"Plausible," Savrk agreed. "Definitely plausible. It's certainly shown significant ability to pull disparate methods together into something entirely different from what was originally intended based on what you've told us. Still very impressive, though."

"That's one way to put it," Ami mumbled, looking around.
Fumiko laughed. "But it also solves the issue of getting spacecraft in and out, pretty much, right?" she said happily. 'Chou' sighed very quietly.

Laughing, they all went back through the portal that 'Yori' produced, looking at her wife with a grin and a shrug.

"Ouch." Shampoo lay on her back and watched the ceiling rotate for a few seconds then looked at Genma who returned her look with one of amused satisfaction. Soun was watching from the wall, while Akane, beside him, stared in amazement. "How the hell did you do that?" she asked the rotund martial artist, making him snicker.

"I saw an opening," he explained unhelpfully. Sitting up, she glared at him.

"Not entirely useful," she snapped, rubbing the back of her head. He laughed out loud, holding out his hand, which she took and pulled herself up with.

"You're extremely good, Shampoo," the man told her, stepping back and looking more serious. "And very fast. But I still know a few things you don't." He looked her up and down for a moment, then over at Akane, who was listening intently. "As your annoying relative is fond of saying, I have more experience because I've been around for longer." He studied both girls as they listened. Soun was also listening, smiling a little. "So, let the old men pass on some of their wisdom, painfully learned over the years. Gather around, children." He waved expansively to a spot in front of him, laughing, as Shampoo and Akane exchanged a mildly exasperated glance.

They came over and listened intently, though.

"We appreciate seeing what you showed us," Yrenti said as they re-entered the conference building. "As unusual as it is, it's very interesting, and clears up a few questions I was wondering about. Thank you."

