"You're welcome," 'Chou' told him, taking a seat and picking up the last of the spiky blue Krennsh snacks that her sister wasn't quite fast enough to acquire first, grinning at 'Azumi' as she looked disappointed. She popped it into her mouth and savoured it. "You understand why we're not keen on making the information more widely available, though, I hope?"

He nodded. "Oh, believe me, yes I do. It's very definitely a security issue, one you are right to keep to yourselves."

"Although I doubt you have anything to worry about, in practical terms," Savrk added, looking mildly worried and quite impressed. "I could feel your ward system watching us extremely carefully the entire time. I would seriously wish to avoid irritating it. The impression it gave off was of something that had a very limited sense of humour regarding any threat to any of you, coupled with more than enough power and ability to eliminate that threat, more or less whatever it was. I don't think I've ever encountered anything quite like it before."

"We're very pleased with the end result," 'Chou' assured him. "Despite some minor miscalculations we luckily caught in time, it seems to have far exceeded its original goal."

"Our entire reality is still there because of it," 'Azumi' added soberly, leaning back in her chair and watching them. "If it wasn't for the ward system, more magical energy than I can believe, and Hotaru, we'd have lost for sure." Everyone looked at the youngest member of their group, who seemed somewhat embarrassed, covering it with a drink from her mug.
"I just did what I needed to do," she said in a low voice.

"Which is a very good thing," Ami told her, putting her around around her friend's shoulders for a moment. The girl smiled, still looking slightly embarrassed.

"What was the device you used in that final attack?" Yrenti asked curiously. "I didn't get a good look at it due to the fact I was somewhat... distracted..." he smiled as she laughed, "but it was giving off an unusual magical signature." He glanced at Yori. "Is it something you designed?" he added. She shook her head with a smile.

"Nothing to do with us. We haven't started designing magical devices yet although we should look into it at some point. It's part of their original magic, although I don't think Hotaru quite knew everything about it. I examined it a little while ago and found it can do all sorts of things that she didn't seem to use. The time device was responsible for her acquiring it, along with the other artefacts that the rest of her group got, but unlike Ami's computer, I don't think it had any hand in creating the thing. It feels all wrong for that."

Savrk looked interested. "May we see it, Hotaru?" She smiled, nodded, and produced the Glaive from where she kept it, holding it upright next to her seat. He stared at it for a long moment, before glancing at Yrenti, who was also inspecting the ancient weapon. Both of them had weird expressions. "Is that...?" he began. Yrenti nodded slowly.

"I believe so." He looked stunned. "I didn't see it properly at the time, I was cowering on the ground hoping to survive, and didn't recognise it, but..."

The others looked at each other, the young girl, then the two Kw'lyn directors. "You recognise it now?" 'Yori' asked slowly. They nodded simultaneously.

"Yes. Although I have no idea how the time device could possibly have acquired it." Yrenti and Savrk both got up and walked around the table to stare closely at the thing. Hotaru watched curiously.

"May I?" Savrk asked politely, holding out his hand. She smiled and gave it to him. Holding it he looked very closely at it, running a hand along the shaft slowly in the same way that 'Azumi' had seen 'Yori' do on the spaceship, with similar results. "Unbelievable," he whispered. "It's genuine. I thought they were all destroyed in the Collapse." Shaking his head in respect he rather reluctantly gave it back, then stepped away and inspected Hotaru for a moment, before returning to his seat. Yrenti followed after a moment's further staring.

"So, what is it?" Rei asked. "I mean, other than a weapon. We already knew that part."

"It's much more than just a weapon," Yrenti began, while Savrk seemed lost in his thoughts. "It's extremely old, even by our history, it far pre-dates the Collapse and even the origins of our first civilisation. The legend is that there was a world which was extremely magically adept, using it for almost everything we'd either use technology for, or a mix of magic and technology. Their species, which we have almost no information on, was never very populous, and had either gone extinct, or possibly moved on to somewhere else, a long time before the galactic civilisation we were a part of came across them. All we had was second hand stories and some artefacts. All we have now is third-hand information at best, and nothing much else."

"They were impressive magic users," Savrk said quietly. "Peaceful, by and large, but they didn't back down from a fight. They had a tradition of combat which was ancient and by all accounts were very good indeed at it, and related subjects such as weapons design. Oddly, as far as we know, they didn't use portals very much if at all, or space travel, although their civilisation spanned..."
three planets in their star system. We believe they used teleportation extensively. It was apparently very easy for them due to something unusual about their magic." He looked speculatively at Aiko for a moment then shook his head slightly. "But information is limited on exactly what."

He pointed at the pole-arm which Hotaru was still holding upright next to her seat. "That thing is, as far as I can see, a genuine artefact of theirs. We have fragmentary data suggesting they designed a magical weapon which was capable of anything from close combat to devastating attacks that could wipe out half a continent, heavy shielding for defence, and several other interesting things. It stored energy from its user on a continuous basis and could utilise that energy to power its more serious attacks, which could disrupt life and even matter if used correctly. They didn't make very many, the things were far too dangerous to let loose in quantity, but they were the mainstay of their defensive system together with extremely highly trained users who wielded them in combat. They were very difficult to use, the operator needed to have enormous energy reserves or the more powerful functions would lethally drain them almost immediately, not to mention there was a large amount of skill needed as well to make them effective. As far as I knew none survived the Collapse." He shook his head in wonder.

"We were obviously wrong, at least one did. I wonder how the Abomination laid its metaphorical hands on the thing in the first place?"

"Presumably the people who created it had one," Yrenti mused, folding both pairs of hands and looking over them at Hotaru. "It must have brought it with it when the Collapse happened and it was ejected from the original reality, somehow. I never thought I'd see one, though."

"Neither did I." Savrk looked enthralled as he inspected the ancient weapon and its current user. "The fact that you can use it proves you have very significant power levels, Hotaru. From the partial records we have I don't think I could, it would kill me. Assuming it didn't do that immediately anyway. Apparently they had very serious security which didn't take kindly to anyone but the authorised user operating it."

Everyone on the other side of the table looked at him, then each other. Hotaru opened her mouth for a moment, before closing it and glancing at 'Yori', who grinned. "It's not quite that bad," she told Savrk. "It didn't seem to mind me playing with it, although it warned me when I poked it in a sensitive place. It's nowhere near as... alive... I guess, as our ward system, but it has some similarity to it. The system seemed to be able to push power through it without too much problem. The really dangerous functions are locked to Hotaru, but a lot of the simpler ones don't have very good security as far as I'm concerned. I'm going to have to look at that at some point."

Savrk stared at her, then the Glaive again. "Interesting. Yet again, you seem to have some knowledge I would be very interested in acquiring if possible. We've been curious about how the things worked for a very long time but it seemed unlikely that we'd ever know. That you can use it is astounding."

"How old is it?" Tamiko asked, studying the pole-arm. Savrk shrugged a little helplessly.

"I can't give you a definite answer I'm afraid. We simply don't have enough information. At a minimum, something approaching half a million years would be an educated guess, but it could be more. The species that built it built to last, the magic makes it almost indestructible and basically immune to age, so it's very difficult to tell. We just don't know." He sighed. "So much was lost in the Collapse. We have only a small amount of information from even our original species' world, never mind about things as esoteric as that. The people who built it had long since vanished by the time we came on the scene, although I don't have any idea why or how. No one does now."

"Bit of a mystery," Misaki put in, looking interested. He nodded.
"Very much so." Hotaru looked up at the weapon she was holding with a wondering expression, then put it away again.

"Wow," she exclaimed, smiling a little, making everyone chuckle.

The middle Tendo sister had been thinking hard, since Savrk had given Aiko that weird look. She turned to him. "You were thinking that these mysterious people might have been behind Aiko's teleportation ability, weren't you?" she asked. He smiled at her.

"Ah. You noticed. Yes, it crossed my mind. But I can't see how Aiko and her team could possibly have come across any artefacts and magic from that particular source. It's a remarkable thing that Hotaru did, although the intervention of the Abomination explains it. The likelihood of an unrelated group coming into contact with something so rare from a long-dead reality strand is... very low."

He shrugged a little. "I think it extremely unlikely."

"Weird things are pretty much normal with us, though," she replied, looking around at her friends, all of whom nodded with resigned expressions. After a moment's thought she removed the bracelet she wore all the time and slid it across the table to him, glancing at Aiko who looked interested but said nothing. "That's from the same source as the various things Aiko and her team acquired, including the artefact that triggered her teleportation ability." He picked it up carefully, inspecting it for a minute or so while everyone waited.

"Very interesting," he finally said, raising his eyes to meet hers. "Again, very odd magic, much more efficient than normal by a long way. I've never seen anything quite matching it before. But it's not from the same source. It's also old, several thousand years at least, but the magic isn't quite the same. There are some interesting similarities which I suspect are down to people thinking in parallel ways rather than anything else."

"I wondered about that myself," 'Yori' commented, watching while sipping a drink, smiling as her sister-in-law turned to her. "When I first saw Hotaru's weapon I noticed that the magic wasn't entirely different. But I came to the same conclusion that it was a coincidence."

"You never mentioned that." 'Azumi' raised an eyebrow.

"You didn't ask," 'Yori' replied, grinning. She shrugged. "It wasn't very important at the time and we've been busy."

"Fair enough." They shared a grin, then looked back to Savrk, who was watching with an amused expression. He slid the bracelet back to her.

"I don't think Aiko's teleportation ability is directly related although it's an interesting coincidence. I'd like to study it further at some point, though." The brunette thought for a moment then nodded slowly.

"I suppose that would be OK. Not right now, but when I have some spare time."

"That would be fine. Thank you." He looked pleased. Turning his attention to the martial artist, he added, "You've explained the ki ability and terrified me to my bones. Can we learn the rest?"

"Yes, what's up with that, Yori?" Tamiko put in, grinning widely. "You and mountains. What do you have against them?" Everyone laughed as the black-haired woman sighed, looking put upon. "Did a mountain touch you in a bad place?" The red-head was giggling as her friend gave her a long-suffering look.

"The first three were an accident...," she began.
"Once is an accident. Three is a habit," Fumiko corrected her, smirking. "Four is just gratuitous landscape vandalism."

'Yori' sighed heavily, turning to Savrk and Yrenti, who were grinning at the byplay. "You see what I have to put up with? No respect, none at all."

"I respect your abilities, believe me," the alien scientist assured her. "They're terrifying. I've never met anyone who could double as a continental siege weapon at a pinch." He smiled as she seemed satisfied. "I hope you have equally impressive non-destructive abilities to balance your talent for massive destruction?"

'Yori' looked slightly sad for a moment. "I think we do. I never really wanted to be able to punch enormous holes in the landscape, you understand. It's just ended up that way. I have no idea what, aside from alien time machines, could possibly ever require that much power, and we all have to be very careful not to get carried away. It's far too high-level to use in a populated area unless something absolutely catastrophic has already happened, which I very much hope won't be the case." She sighed as 'Chou' put her hand on her husband's, holding it. "But yes, we can do things other than make vast amounts of rock go away very loudly."

"I'm informed that your medical abilities are extremely impressive," Yrenti mentioned, looking interested. She brightened up from the mild funk she'd fallen into momentarily.

"We like to think so, yes. That part I am proud of. I like being able to fix people when something nasty happens and wish we could teach other people how to do the same as easily as we seem to be able to show them how to blow things up. But destruction is always easier than the opposite."

"Entropy in a nutshell," Lldnr'k suggested, making her grin at him.

"More or less. I'm fairly sure we can get Hotaru healing very well quite fast, her own abilities along those lines are already quite good, and we intend to teach the rest everything we can, but the healing is probably the most difficult thing to learn, at least to the level we do it. Some things are fairly simple, broken bones, that sort of thing, but the complicated stuff is... complicated." 'Yori' snickered. "Hence the name."

"I see." Yrenti seemed amused. "I'd be interested in a demonstration."

"We need someone with an injury, I'm afraid," 'Chou' replied calmly. She looked at 'Azumi' with a raised eyebrow. "Hold out your finger."

"NO!" The middle sister glared as her sister giggled. "I'm not a guinea pig. That's as bad as her wanting to throw me at a demon to see what happens," she snarled, jerking a thumb at the martial artist who was laughing, as were most of the rest.

"Please? There's extra ice-cream in it for you."

"Cut your own finger off," 'Azumi' grumbled, folding her arms and hiding her hands in her armpits just in case.

"I'm not intending to cut anything off, merely to make a small incision to demonstrate the procedure," her sister protested mildly, smiling serenely.

"Still no."

"I'll do it," Fumiko volunteered, holding out her hand and grinning at her friend. The middle Tendo sighed, but kept her arms folded tightly. 'Chou' nodded her thanks.
"All right. First, I'll turn off the pain sensors," she said, touching Fumiko's arm above the wrist. A brief golden glow came and went. "Can you feel anything?"

"Nope. Completely numb," the other woman reported, tapping her finger with her other hand. 'Chou' looked satisfied. Savrk and Yrenti watched carefully, as did Hotaru and Lldnr'k, both of whom seemed fascinated, as the blonde woman produced a tiny thread of ki energy blade and carefully made a two centimetre cut on the offered finger. The energy level was enough to part the skin without cauterising the small wound very much, so it immediately began bleeding a little.

"There we go, a small wound. Nothing serious, but it demonstrates the process. So, to repair it, I do this..." She went through the normal healing process much more slowly than normal, explaining every step carefully. The observers watched with great interest until the finger was once again flawless, showing no sign of the small cut. Fumiko wiped the small amount of blood away and held her hand up, smiling.

"Not a mark."

"That is extremely impressive," Yrenti remarked, looking at the raised hand, then at the blonde. "How did you learn this technique? It's once again unlike anything we have data on."

"Yori designed it some years ago and we've been refining it ever since," 'Chou' replied. He looked impressed.

"Yet another self-taught system? Amazing. That's extremely rare. It certainly seems astoundingly effective though. More so than anything else I've seen. What limitations are there?"

"Very few that we've so far found," 'Yori' told him, looking thoughtful as she spoke. "Mostly the limitations are down to the knowledge of the practitioner. Gross structural damage, bones, skin, muscle, that sort of thing, are fairly easy to do with a limited knowledge of biology. That's how I started. I knew quite a lot of how the body went together but only to the level of skeletal and muscular issues, some things about blood flow, and the like. Advanced first aid, essentially. But we've learned a lot more over the years. Both from formal medical training the traditional way and through our own techniques, which allow some pretty amazing observations to be made."

"We have practical experience with a number of species," 'Chou' added. "Human, D'sage, Krennsh, a few other sentient peoples, and various animals. The more we learn the more general-purpose it becomes. I'm somewhat surprised how similar a number of species are at the level we work these days."

"There is a surprising amount of commonality between quite a large number of sentient species reachable through portals, yes," Savrk agreed, watching them both. "But even so this is a remarkably versatile healing system. From what I can see it's using some magic as well as the ki techniques?"

"Yes, it was originally pure ki, but over the years most of our ki methods have had our magical system creep in and enhance them," 'Chou' nodded.

"Can you demonstrate something using your magic control method, please, in the same way you did with the healing?" Yrenti asked.

"Sure." Yori smiled at him. "How about a portal? You seemed to find that unusual."

He grinned. "It is, definitely. That's a good choice, we both know portal spells very well."

"OK." She did much what her wife had done, very slowly and carefully opening a portal to the firing range world as an example, talking them through it step by step. Everyone else was taking mental notes as well, although they all found it almost impossibly complex. Ami looked amazed, while the middle Tendo was wondering how on earth she’d ever be able to do something like this. Lldnr'k observed carefully, nodding every now and then, although he was also wincing quite a lot.

'Azumi' noticed that Savrk seemed to be developing a headache judging by his expression, as best she could make out, around the time the portal finally opened. Yrenti was only glancing at it occasionally, looking both interested and slightly ill. When the rip in reality stabilised, the R and D director stared at it for a few seconds then closed his eyes and massaged his head. "I understand now what you meant by your warning earlier," he muttered. "That is remarkably unnerving to watch for some odd reason, and not at all comfortable."

"I would have to agree. Seeing it in slow motion like that is much worse than the normal impressive speed it's executed at, which is bad enough." Yrenti looked at the portal for a moment, apparently concentrating on the underlying magic, then looked away again. "Very disconcerting. It's barely recognisable as magic."

"It clearly is magic," Lldnr'k said slowly, causing them to look at him as he blinked at the portal quietly crackling to itself in a corner of the room, "but at a fundamentally different level than the normal methods I'm familiar with. I've seen this before many times but I still find it very odd, to say the least. It's amazing that you managed to come up with something so strange between the two of you, and so quickly."

"Not to mention taking it to the point you can redesign a portal spell, which is a very complex one," Savrk added, opening his eyes again and looking at the apparition. "I think, with some years of study, I could begin to understand how this all works, but I somehow doubt I could actually do it. It's just too different."

"We've come to the conclusion that our method and all the normal ones we have encountered are incompatible in some very basic manner, but we're not sure quite why," 'Chou' told him, also looking at the portal for a moment, before turning back to them. "Lldnr'k thinks that the process of learning magic control changes something in the brain that causes major problems with seeing our system properly. It would fit with what we've observed. So far, the better or more practised the mage, the less ability they seem to have to understand this method, which is somewhat annoying. We can prove our system is much more efficient and flexible than anything else we know about, although admittedly it does take more effort to learn in the first place. But we've been successful in teaching the basics to other people."

"The multi-dimensionality you mentioned during that demonstration is very interesting," the alien scientist replied, turning away from the portal as well. 'Yori' dismissed it with a thought, the thing popping out of existence without anyone paying much attention. "It agrees well with advanced magical control theory although I'm not aware of anyone ever actually using such methods before. I suspect that the required type of mind is somewhat unusual in the first place." He looked at the temporal mage. "Your theory is certainly quite likely. Learning magic does indeed cause some fundamental changes to the structure of the mind, that's a known fact, but it's curious that it should cause such a dramatic incompatibility between the more normal systems and this one."

They discussed magical control theory for some time, the conversation quickly passing beyond the comprehensibility of anyone but 'Yori' and her wife, Lldnr'k, and the two Kw'lyn directors. The others tried to follow but most of them ended up moving off to examine the area more closely, 'Azumi' included. Ami stayed, listening with interest, although she was also looking rather overwhelmed.
Finding herself outside the building in the company of Fumiko and her sister, the middle Tendo walked around with her friends and just enjoyed the relative peace and quiet. They could hear laughter from inside the building with the local gravity control where Hotaru had dragged Rei to bounce around for a while. Tamiko had joined them a few minutes ago, while Aiko was lying quietly in the middle of the open area staring up at the amazing sight of the inner surface of the incomprehensibly vast Dyson sphere beyond the sky with a faint smile on her face.

The blue star was approaching the horizon as local evening neared, giving a slightly eerie light in shades of violet-white around the edges of shadows. The disguised Nabiki looked around, shaking her head a little. "You know, every now and then I suddenly realise where we are and what we're doing," she privately commed her two friends, who glanced at her, waving a hand to indicate their surroundings. "It's weird how we seem to take all this for granted. We're on a planet that's orbiting an artificial giant blue star inside the largest construction I've ever imagined in a completely different reality to our own, wandering around as if we were in the middle of Nerima. There are intelligent machines floating around all over the place, my sister and her husband are in the process of teaching some magical system that is so weird that even the people who live here find it strange, to a couple of aliens, but we're just taking it in stride. That's... just not normal, surely?"

She waved a greeting to one of the security drones which moved past a few metres away, grinning as it dipped in its flight slightly in acknowledgement.

"No, it isn't, for most people," Fumiko chuckled, "but then, neither are we. We're a bunch of shape-shifting, reality hopping, teleporting, combat trained magical girls. That's hardly normal either." The three of them shared a glance and a grin. "I don't think I'd want it any other way, though," she added happily. "The situation is insane, so are we, it all seems to work out. And it's damn good fun."

"True enough," the middle sister agreed, laughing. "Even with all the bad parts recently I'm more glad than I can say that I ended up here. I just think it's a little strange."

Flipping her one of the spiky blue snacks, which she plucked out of the air and stuck in her mouth, Misaki snickered. "Strange is a matter of opinion. Personally I can't think what else I'd want to be by this point. Even with the bad parts. The company more than makes up for it." She looked at her sister, then 'Azumi', both of whom nodded.

"Also true."

After a couple of seconds, Fumiko asked in a conspiratorial tone, looking around as if she was afraid they'd be overheard, "So. How do we persuade your sister to let me keep a spacecraft in the basement?"

"No, like this." Soun demonstrated. Akane yelped as she flew across the room to end up inverted against the wall. Shampoo clapped. Genma snickered.

"Are you all right, daughter?" the elder Tendo asked in a solicitous tone of voice although his mouth was twitching a little. Akane glared at him from her upside down position, then effortlessly flipped back onto her feet. Rocking her head from side to side for a moment, she rubbed her neck, then grinned nastily.

"Yes, thank you, Dad," she replied in a saccharin manner which made his eyes narrow. "Fine. I think I see where I was going wrong. Shall we try again?" He smiled back, indicating a position in front of him, then took up a stance.
"Of course. Ready?"

"Oh, I'm ready, all right," she gritted out, then attacked.

Genma's and Shampoo's eyes followed an arc that terminated at the other side of the Dojo. Both of them winced a little, smiling slightly.

"Ow."

"No, I'm afraid you still seem to be slightly off on the timing, dear," Soun chuckled. Once more Akane glared at him, again upside down, in a remarkably similar position to the previous time. Rolling to her feet she stood up, before charging.

"She's really not getting it, is she?" Genma asked idly. Shampoo shook her head, trembling with barely suppressed laughter.

"No. He's very good."

"She's not at all bad either, but she's rushing it. Look. She's going to leave her left foot in the wrong position, and..." They watched a growling Akane flip several times through the air to end up against the wall again. "...that will happen," Genma finished. Shampoo giggled.

Sending both of the small audience a cold stare worthy of Nabiki at her worst, which had no real effect, the youngest Tendo sister climbed to her feet yet again. Her father made a small gesture, roughly translatable as 'come and get some.' She snarled, charged, and got some. Soun himself laughed this time, while Shampoo fell over in a fit of hilarity.

"I'm sorry, dear, you seem to be missing your mark. Perhaps you need to see it demonstrated again." The master of the Dojo turned to the Amazon warrior, who slowly stopped laughing as she realised all three of the other people in the room were looking expectantly at her, Akane from the floor.

"Oh, crap," she mumbled, before climbing to her feet and walking over to someone she had developed a considerable respect for the abilities of after the last hour or so.

Akane grinned. With lots of teeth.

"Thank you for the information," Savrk told 'Yori', wearing an expression of both fascination and mild frustration. He rubbed his forehead with one hand, slightly ruefully. "And the pain."

She chuckled for a moment. "You're welcome. In both cases."

"It will take me some time to go through everything we've learned, run simulations, and try to model the results," he continued, smiling. "I would like very much to talk further about your various techniques at some point but I have enough to go on for now. I assume there's more?" The R and D director gave them a quizzical look. There were a number of giggles and grins.

"Definitely. We have many secrets," she laughed.

"We're happy to learn as much as we can," Yrenti told her, amused. "And as much as you're willing to tell us. I still think that these techniques could be very valuable, although after the last couple of hours, I'm less convinced than I was that we could duplicate them, annoyingly. I think you're right, the normal methods interfere, possibly permanently, with your system. Pity."
"I'm going to have to work out exactly why," Savrk mused, interested.

"If you can we'd love to know," 'Chou' assured him.

He nodded absently, still off in his own world. "I'll let you have any information I derive from all this," he told her, then shook his head a little, coming back to them. "It's been a very interesting day indeed. And slightly worrying. I'm going to go and measure just how large a hole you made, Yori, and work out the energy yield." He grinned. "I'm not entirely certain I want to know for the sake of my own sanity, but my scientific curiosity won't let it lie."

Fumiko snickered, glancing at her friend, then said, "If you need any more mountains disciplined let us know." He and Yrenti both burst out laughing while 'Yori' slowly turned her head and fixed her friend with a look, which made her nearly fall over giggling.

"Again, I'll bear that in mind."

The security drone chose that moment to enter the room, swivelling to scan everyone present. Under it was floating a small box, which it deposited on the table, 'nodded' to the assembled people, then turned and left again. "Good. Here we are, this is the translation spell applicator," Savrk exclaimed with satisfaction. Picking up the box he opened it to reveal a small device, roughly cubical with rounded edges and about four centimetres across, made of some deep blue material. He examined it for a moment and nodded. "Looks good. All right, it's easy enough to use. You let the person the spell is aimed at hold it, give it the authorisation code, then wait for a moment. The person in question needs to willingly accept it and should be lying down, it causes some very odd sensory effects for a minute or two, but once it settles in everything just works."

"Is it permanent?" Ldln'r'k asked with interest. The other mage looked at him, then nodded.

"Yes. It's a very deep connection to the mind, and as a result nearly impossible to remove after being inserted. It's safe, though, that has been very extensively tested for an extremely long time. We've never found a species it wasn't compatible with although one or two don't have completely satisfactory results due to unusual mental make-up. That won't apply in this case, though." He explained a few more rather esoteric instructions to them, both 'Yori' and her wife listening carefully, then put it back in the box and handed it over.

"It's pre-authorised for use on all of you, Uthryyl and his family, Hnther, and Agent Masao, if he agrees. Anyone else you need to use it on, call us, and we'll get you the code for them, OK?"

"Yep. Thanks very much indeed," the martial artist replied, weighing the box in her hand for a moment before putting it away. She grinned at him. "This is going to be very useful, I think. Learning languages is fun but slow and hard work."

"True." He laughed. "Luckily, now you can cheat."

"I think that we have probably covered everything for the moment, then," Yrenti remarked, satisfied. He thought for a moment. "With one exception." Everyone looked at him curiously.

"Which is?" Misaki asked, finishing yet another fruit.

He glanced at her momentarily. "There is a colleague of yours we'd be interested in talking to," he began, "someone we've been hearing some very odd things about. Weirdly, we have no other information on her, at all, or her employers. The middle Tendo got a feeling she knew where this was heading, looking around at her friends, all of who were doing their best to appear innocent yet all clearly also working it out. "Would it be possible for you to put us in contact with Ms Aoyama?"
he finished. She sighed inaudibly, although she was also amused. 'Yori' looked sidelong at her with a twinkle in her eyes before returning her attention to the Kw'lyn director.

"It's... not impossible," she said slowly. "Can I ask why?"

"From the very limited data we have on her, she seems to work for an organisation that our intelligence division would be interested in opening relations with," the Director of External Threat Management explained. "It's one we're completely unfamiliar with, which is very unusual, if not unprecedented." 'Azumi' kept her face as blank as she could manage. "Again, something we're beginning to expect from you and your acquaintances," he grinned. "It's possible we might have some operations that could be outsourced to her organisation, ones we would prefer Kw'lyn Industries and our government not to be known to be associated with. Nothing unpleasant, mainly information-gathering, which our enquiries suggest she's extremely adept at, with one or two places where a certain amount of... intimidatory behaviour... might be suitable. Something else we believe she can pull off rather convincingly from what we've learned."

"You have no idea," Ami muttered, making him look at her for a moment. Rei nudged her friend in the ribs causing her to fall silent.

"We can ask, if nothing else," 'Chou' replied after a long pause and a look at her husband. "You understand, no one makes Ms Aoyama do anything. One politely requests, and hopes for an answer, which is final."

"Ms Aoyama is scary," Tamiko said in a low voice.

Fumiko nodded. "She's horrifying, but very effective." The tall girl snickered a little. "A lot of people are scared of her, but that's not a phobia, it's common sense."

"Ms Aoyama could terrify even the voices in the head of a mad person into doing what she wanted, just with a look," Misaki agreed soberly.

"Ms Aoyama doesn't sleep, she waits. In the dark. When you turn out the light, she's there," Aiko added, a small smile on her face. Yrenti and Savrk exchanged a look. Inwardly, 'Azumi' was giggling insanely.

"I heard that a ghost tried to scare Ms Aoyama to death," Rei put in, looking like she was trying not to laugh. "She just raised an eyebrow at it and no one has seen it since." Hotaru giggled, putting her hand over her mouth as everyone glanced at her, an embarrassed expression on her face.

"Um, yes," Yrenti said, looking around. He seemed slightly puzzled. "I've heard she's somewhat intense. Anyway, that's why we're interested in talking to her. We can't locate any other members of her organisation so far. If you could get a message to her and ask her to contact us, that would be most helpful."

"You might not say that once you've met her," Tamiko snickered. "If you invite her in, you'll never be able to undo it."

Shaking her head, obviously trying not to smile, 'Yori' replied, "I can pass on the message, certainly. But I can't guarantee anything."

"Fair enough. Thank you." Yrenti looked satisfied yet still rather puzzled with just the smallest amount of mild worry apparent.

"Well, we should probably get back, I suppose," she said, standing up. "Thank you very much for all the equipment and the information. It was fun talking. I think we're all looking forward to "You're welcome to at any time," he told her, looking around at the rest of them. "Any of you. Next time we'll see about arranging a visit to some of the more interesting places on the Sphere. You'll probably like it."

"It's big enough to have pretty much anything," Aiko quipped. He nodded, smiling.

"Very true. We still haven't explored more than a fraction of it after all these years."

Moving to the two large boxes he closed them up then returned them to the crate on the floor, which Yori picked up and made go away. "Thanks again. We'll set these up when we get home and call you as soon as the relay is in place," she told him.

"Good. Let us know if there are any problems, but I'm not expecting them. Once the relay is set up we'll run remote diagnostics and make sure everything is working correctly." Outside they found the security drone waiting next to another crate. "This is the mapping unit. The operating instructions are inside." Misaki picked the container up and put it away. Shaking hands with all of them, the two aliens watched as a portal opened.

"We look forward to our next meeting," Savrk said.

"So do we," 'Chou' replied after looking around at her friends. They all waved, then filed through the portal, which closed immediately afterwards.

::Interesting people with some remarkable abilities:: the drone noted. Yrenti nodded absently, before heading over to the flight platform a few metres away with his colleague and the drone following.

"Very true. Very true indeed. But, I think, good ones well worth the effort." Soon the platform was dwindling off into the distance.

"Yes!" Akane crowed as she watched her father slide to a halt in the corner. Genma laughed. Rolling over Soun groaned a little, then sat up.

"I think you might have it, dear," he commented. She grinned. "Finally." The grin went away again as she sulked a little. Shampoo, who had mastered the move some while earlier after a number of even more spectacular screw-ups, patted her on the shoulder and gave her an encouraging smile.

Looking amused and proud her father stood up, walking over to the two girls. "Well done, both of you. Let's move on to the difficult one next." Their faces fell as Genma started laughing again, settling down to be entertained.

"A most interesting and successful day, I feel," Lldnr'k commented happily from his position on the sofa. Kasumi walked out of the kitchen carrying a tray of teacups, Nabiki following with the tea and some small cakes, all of which were placed on the table. Everyone else was arrayed around the room on various seats, the various items in their boxes stacked up near the balcony doors. Pouring tea and handing it around, the elder Tendo sister nodded, smiling a little.

"It was fascinating, very true," she agreed, handing him a cup of tea in a suitably shaped drinking vessel. He looked curiously at it as he accepted it. She laughed. "We have so many visitors of different species now I got in some of the more specialised cups made by your people, the D'sage, and a few others, just in case. It seemed the right thing to do."
"Very thoughtful, my dear," he replied, sipping his tea. Picking up the SI unit which he'd been given with his other hand from where he'd put it on the coffee-table, he turned it over and over, feeling the surface with his fingers.

Ranma watched, eventually commenting, "You look worried."

The temporal mage glanced at him, then went back to studying the alien device. "Not worried as such, more slightly apprehensive, and a little excited. I've been interested in the SI systems since you told me about them a little while ago but I have to admit I didn't expect to simply be given one. I'm very grateful, though, believe me, although now that I have it... It's quite a lot to take in after learning what we did from Savrk and the others."

"It's a big responsibility," Aiko agreed from beside him, watching as well. "A little like having a pet, only much more. Not quite to the level of having a child although I suppose that might be a better or closer simile now that we know what we do."

He looked at her for a moment. "Do you regret taking on the responsibility, then?" The brunette shook her head, smiling in a pleased manner, then reached for another cupcake.

"Not for a second. I couldn't be happier about it." He looked around at the others, all of whom nodded agreement.

"Interesting."

"Would you like to activate it here?" Ranma asked him. "You can use one of the guest rooms, it's pretty disorientating for a while. If you do you can get all our codes immediately, which might be useful."

After a moment's thought he nodded. "Yes, you're probably correct, thank you. I would like that."

The martial artist took him away as everyone watched, returning without the mage some minutes later.

"I'm still amazed by everything we saw, learned, and did," Ami commented, getting up and walking over to the balcony doors where she leaned against the window and watched the early afternoon traffic go past six floors down. Looking up at the sky for a moment she shook her head, before turning and looking at the other people, who were watching her. "To be able to go so easily between something normal like this," she indicated the world outside with her thumb over her shoulder, "and something out of an SF film... It's kind of disorientating."

"But that's more or less our life, right?" Tamiko asked, pouring some more tea for herself, and Fumiko when she held out her cup wordlessly. "Nothing we do is normal for most people. Probably any people, anywhere. I'd guess that most random D'sage, or Krennsh, or even whatever Yrenti's people are called, would find everything we do just a little strange. Portal travel explains a lot of it, but there are a lot of other things we can do which are a bit weird by most standards." She laughed for a moment. "Something I'm very glad about. Normality is boring." Hotaru giggled, causing her to look at the younger girl with a grin.

"True, I suppose. It just hits me sometimes. This is a particularly big example of it, that's all." She glanced at the various boxes full of alien magitech. "We have things here most governments would probably kill for, most people simply wouldn't believe were possible, and they were just given to us in a sort of casual 'Here you go, have fun' way by people who come from the weirdest place I've ever encountered."

"Neat, isn't it?" the red-head chuckled. Staring at her for a moment, the other woman eventually nodded, also grinning.

"Yes, I suppose it is. But still a little strange." She made a small motion with one hand, before looking out the window again, smiling. "Don't worry, I'll get used to it."

Everyone started laughing, quite hard.

When they calmed down, Misaki got up and opened the large crate, looking at the contents. "Where are we going to put the relay?" she asked, glancing at Ranma. He thought for a moment.

"We could just stick it in the corner of the room, once it's activated it will simply disappear for most purposes, but it might be a better idea to not have it in the building. It's not that I don't trust them, but I have a feeling that the ward system might get annoyed." He shrugged a little as everyone looked around, then back to him. "I don't want to risk upsetting it, it's not fair on the thing. And there's no denying it's a potential security risk."

"We could activate it on the moon," Nabiki suggested, grinning. "It doesn't make any difference where it is from what Yrenti said and no one is going to bump into it there."

"I suppose," he replied, smiling.

Hotaru put her hand up, grinning wildly. "If we're going to the moon I want to go," she squeaked excitedly, causing several people to laugh at her expression.

"Of course you can go," he assured her calmly.

"Why don't you go and do that, dear, while I start lunch," Kasumi suggested. "Fumiko, do you want to help me?" The other woman nodded, prodding her sister, who also stood when she did. The three women went into the kitchen.

"I'd love to come but I need to pop out and do something for Dad," Tamiko said, getting up. "I'll be back in forty minutes or so." She left the apartment, the sound of the door closing coming to them.

"It shouldn't take long," Nabiki mused, reading the documentation that they had been sent by Yrenti just before they'd left. "Unbox it, activate it, then wait for it to finish self tests. According to this it should be running in under three minutes."

"Good enough," Ranma nodded, standing and walking over to the crate, then bending over and carefully pulling the relay unit in its box out in a manner that still made her grin. "Let's leave from the basement, the flash is so bright it will fade the paintwork in here," he added, grinning. A portal crackled into existence in the corner. Ami stared at it, then him.

"You do realise that's an absolutely insane way to avoid using the elevator, I hope?" she laughed.

He nodded happily.

"Very true, but I still can't get over the fact that it works at all. I never even considered it. Good thing Savrk worked it out." Fumiko stuck her head out of the kitchen, looked at the portal, then snickered.

"Practice making them big enough for a spacecraft," she said, before yelping as Kasumi's hand came out of the kitchen and clamped on her shoulder, pulling her back.

"Back to work," the elder sister's voice came to them.

"I was kidding!" Fumiko said.
"No you weren't. We'll have to talk."

"Kasumi..." her wheedling tone fell silent, as everyone roared with laughter.

"I still think that's one of the most amazing sights I've ever seen," Rei commented, staring at the three-quarters Earth low on the horizon. 'Azumi' looked over from where she was watching 'Yori' and Ami fiddle with the relay unit and nodded slowly, agreeing totally. The Dyson Sphere was incredibly, inconceivably larger and more spectacular, but almost by virtue of that, was somehow less majestic in an odd way. The simplicity and beauty of the green-blue planet hanging in the dark, though, knowing it was where everyone she'd ever known up until recently had come from, was something she found remarkable.

"I think so too," she said, walking over to stand beside the other girl. Looking around as she heard a giggle she grinned at the sight of Hotaru doing a kangaroo impression in slow motion, hopping many metres off the ground with each effortless bounce. The purple-haired youngster threw in a couple of somersaults just for fun, making her laugh. They were in the same place they'd come the first time S'th'kx's ship had landed.

"I love this," the girl squealed in joy. "I could stay here all day."

"We have to get back soon," Ami's voice came to them, sounding amused. "I need to see Mom. She's getting a little puzzled about how much I'm going out at the moment for odd reasons. I left very early today and left a note which she might think is strange."

"Does she know about you?" Aiko asked curiously, gracefully bounding over to them and the alien relay, 'Azumi' and Rei joining her after a few seconds. Ami sighed a little, watching as 'Yori' sent the device the activation command. It lifted slightly higher off the surface and glowed a faint pink colour for a few seconds, a number of small lights in various shades blinking in different places.

"Officially, no. But I've had a few slightly strange conversations with her recently that make me pretty sure she knows more than she lets on. I don't know how much, though, or how she worked it out."

"Are you going to tell her?" 'Yori' asked, stepping back and watching the relay, glancing at her for a moment. She shrugged.

"I'm... not sure. Not yet, I think. In the beginning, no, I'd never have told her, for all sorts of reasons, but recently..." She slowly shook her head, sighing again. "After everything that's happened it might be nice to talk about it with her." She smiled at the woman, then looked around at her other friends. "Don't get me wrong, it's nothing at all to do with any of you. But it's hard keeping such a big secret from your own mother."

Aiko nodded reflectively, as did Rei. 'Yori' studied her for a few seconds, then turned to the relay, which was now blinking a few more lights, giving the impression of something waking up. "I can see where it would be," she said quietly. "I'm glad you actually can talk to yours. Mine is..." Nabiki put her hand on her shoulder for a moment.

They fell silent, broken only by Hotaru laughing as she bounded around in the lunar dust, until the relay unit rippled with light and blinked out of existence. "Good. Looks like everything is working," she said with satisfaction. She tried comming Yrenti over the link, the Kw'lyn director immediately answering.

"It appears to be functioning appropriately from this end, Yori," he said. "It's connected to the Correctly, the various functions are still running diagnostics, it should be fully active any moment now… Yes, there we go. Everything is operating to specification. Good."

"Great," 'Yori' replied, smiling. "Thanks, Yrenti. This is going to be very useful, for all of us."

"Indeed it is. I'll talk later, I need to get back to work, but once again it was nice to see you all. Be well."

"You too." The connection dropped.

Looking satisfied, the martial artist poked the shipping container the relay had been in, which folded itself into a small cube, which she picked up and vanished. There was no trace of anything now but a lot of footprints. "This is going to confuse people a lot when they finally end up here," Rei laughed, looking around. "Perhaps we should brush them away?"

"We'll never get them all, I think," 'Azumi' snickered. "It's not like anyone is likely to see them soon, and by the time they do, it won't matter." Bending down she picked up a chunk of moon-rock the size and rough shape of a baseball, bouncing it in her hand, then turned and threw it as hard as possible at the horizon, watching it vanish almost instantly. "Pity the gravity is so strong, I'll never get one into orbit here."

"It went a good distance, though," the black-haired girl noted, looking after it. "Orbit?" she asked curiously a few seconds later, staring at her friend, who laughed and explained. "Cool."

"We'll have to bring Onkra here at some point as well," 'Yori' remarked, moving to stand beside them. "She's as interested in space travel as Fumiko is."

"Fumiko is obsessed," the middle sister giggled. "She's not going to give up on getting a ship, you know," she added, glancing at her sister-in-law, who nodded, grinning faintly.

"Yep, I know. I'd like one myself, to be honest. We'll have to see how things work out."

"We could certainly afford something like S'th'kx's scout-craft, surely?" 'Azumi' asked.

"Oh, that's no problem. He'd help us find one, I'm sure. Running it would be easy enough, any of the SIs could do it, or the computer on the ship could, they're pretty automated, but..." She shrugged a little. "We'll add it to the list of things to look at one day."

"Come on, Hotaru, we need to go," Ami called, making the girl, who was still hopping around enjoying herself, look over then wave. She turned in their direction and headed back.

"Lunch is nearly ready, dear," Kasumi's voice came to them.

"Thanks, love. We'll be back in a moment." 'Yori' met 'Azumi's' eyes as the absurdity of the entire situation struck them all very hard.

They were still howling with laughter when the small group reappeared in the practice room.

When lunch was over, Lldnr'k was still expressing awe over his SI, experimenting with it in every way he could think of. He seemed extremely pleased. "This is most remarkable," he commented, watching a recording of the moon trip which Nabiki sent him as a test. She grinned back.

"They're amazing, aren't they? Even without the SI itself, the other abilities are incredible, and with the SI... It's the best present I ever got. I don't know what I'd do now without Jun."
She laughed at the comment, made slightly wryly but with obvious gratification.

"I will have to look over the documentation and do a lot of experimentation to even begin to work out how to make best use of it, but already I can think of many ways in which my life will be changed for the better as a result," he told her, looking happy. Everyone watched him for a moment, amused at his expression.

Producing the translation spell applicator Ranma looked at it. "We should use this thing, I suppose, before you go home."

The temporal mage stopped playing with his SI and looked at it as well, nodding slowly. "Yes, that would seem appropriate." He looked around. "Who's first?"

There was a pause, then the martial artist grinned. "May as well be the test subject." He lay down on the carpet, just in case, held the small device in both hands, and closed his eyes. A moment later the thing lit up briefly, making a faint hum, before going dark. He winced, his face showing some discomfort, which passed after a few seconds, then opened his eyes. "That was... weird."

"Did it work?" Aiko asked curiously. He glanced at her.

"As far as I can tell. Try me."

She smiled, thought for a moment, then said something in fluent Italian. He replied in the same language, grinning. The brunette laughed, then tried German and French, both of which he also used. "You're more fluent than I am in all of those," she giggled.

The temporal mage said something in a croaking, guttural language that none of them had heard before, which Ranma immediately replied in, looking pleased. Clicking his beak with amusement Lldnr'k cycled through at least a dozen languages, many of which sounded extremely peculiar, before nodding, pleased.

"Quite remarkable. No accent at all that I can hear and no troubles with vocabulary or syntax. That is an exceptionally effective spell."

Ranma looked very satisfied, then tossed the device to the mage, who caught it easily, inspecting it closely for a moment. "May as well do you next. You'll definitely want to lie down, though, Savrk was right, the sensory effects are very strange." With a nod the temporal mage took his place on the floor, holding the device over his chest with both hands. Once more it lit up and hummed, provoking a mutter of discomfort.

"Hmm. Not at all comfortable. But interesting." Handing the thing back to Ranma, Lldnr'k stood up, then retook his position on the sofa beside Fumiko. He seemed to be investigating his own mind. "Extraordinary. What an amazingly complicated spell." After a moment, he looked carefully at Ranma, then pulled out a couple of the instruments they'd all seen him use before and waved them about a little, first over himself then in the direction of the martial artist, before inspecting the results. "Fascinating. There's no trace of it from the outside, so to speak. It appears to be totally stealthed. I can see it inside my own mind but I'd have no way to determine if you possessed it."

"If it's a strategically important piece of magic as they told us, that makes a certain amount of sense," Ami mused, watching him. "There could well be times when you wouldn't want someone you were negotiating with, for example, to know that you could understand everything they said amongst themselves." Nabiki listened, nodding slowly.
"That's certainly plausible," she agreed. She could easily understand the idea, which did indeed make sense.

"OK, who's next?" Ranma looked around, stopping on Aiko as she hopped to her feet, then lay down in front of him, holding out her hand with a grin. He snickered, dropping the device into her outstretched hand. Shortly afterwards she got up looking pleased.

"This will help next time I go to Athens for genuine Greek troufakia." Everyone looked at her, slightly confused. She giggled. "Chocolate and walnut truffles. Delicious. There's this little shop in a run-down part of Athens that makes the best desserts I've ever had, but they don't speak a word of Japanese, English, or any other language I speak. Spoke." She said something in totally fluent Greek, making Ranma and Lldnr'k chuckle.

"OK, do me next," Nabiki laughed, taking her place. She held out her hand expectantly, taking the small alien artefact and holding it carefully. Closing her eyes she waited expectantly.

"Ooogh," she mumbled, as the world rotated in several different directions at the same time around her. She tasted blue, heard the sound of smooth, and saw flashes of middle C for a few seconds, while feeling slightly light. It was peculiar in the extreme but not actually painful. Moments later everything went back to normal, leaving behind a feeling that there was an awful lot more information pushed somewhere into her mind than there had been earlier. "That was... weird." The middle sister sat up, handing the device back to her brother-in-law, who was smiling a little.

"Do you feel all right now?" he asked.

"Fine, I think," she replied absently, only to realise they were speaking Russian. "Oh, wow, that's incredible!" Grinning at him she got out of the way as Kasumi eagerly took the spot on the floor which seemed to have become the 'learn all languages in one easy lesson' position.

A few minutes later, everyone was talking merrily in a mix of dozens if not hundreds of languages, many of them not at all human, trying to work out which ones the spell didn't cover. They couldn't. "I can easily see why this would be considered a very valuable resource," Kasumi said quietly to her sister as they watched the others chatting. Nabiki nodded, grinning.

"It's going to be incredibly useful just in normal life," she replied, both of them speaking Mandarin just for fun.

"I need to go and check on Usagi, later on," Ranma commented from the other side of his wife. "I'll give Hnther his SI and the language spell then as well. We should go to see Uthryyl at some point soon and bring him up to date, give them all the spell, and see if Onkra would like to come to stay here for a while a bit later."

Lldnr'k came over, appearing pleased. "This has been a lot of fun and both interesting and rewarding. But I need to get back now, I think, I have several projects I need to get back to which I have been somewhat neglecting." Ranma got up, smiling.

"OK." He created a portal off to one side while answering. "Thanks for all the help, yet again, and I hope we'll see you again soon."

"I expect so," the mage laughed. "You people are far too interesting not to visit." He looked around at the room. "Keep in touch, all of you," he said. "I've enjoyed this. I have much to think about."

"We all do, my friend," the martial artist assured the mage. "I'll let you know what happens with all the various issues. For the moment, though, I'm going to relax and not worry about things, the major problems seem to be sorted right now. Something of a relief, really."

"Very true." Lldnr'k snapped his beak with amusement, looking around at the others. "I have enjoyed my time with you all. If any of you wish to visit, please do." With a final wave he stepped through the portal, which popped into non-existence.

"By the way, thank you for the lunch, Kasumi, it was delicious," his voice came over the SI link, making them grin. "Oh, look, it works. That's useful." He sounded very amused. Disconnecting, his presence vanished.

"We have a very odd lifestyle," Misaki mumbled, smiling to herself. She looked at Aiko. "By the way, that's the second time you've gone to the moon without us," she added more loudly. Aiko grinned.

"I'll take you and the others later this afternoon, OK?" Her friend nodded, satisfied.

"Let's set that positioning system up, we can do it on the roof, then I need to head off," Nabiki suggested. "I'm going to see Miki and John tomorrow but I decided I want to spend tonight back home."

"Sounds good," Ranma agreed. He retrieved the container full of alien magitech from the main shipping crate, then they all headed up to the roof. Opening it in a clear space, he looked up. "We're away from any of the main flight corridors so it should be safe enough. Nothing up there at the moment." A command was sent to the launcher, which whined faintly, then lifted into the air. A shimmer around it betrayed the presence of a forcefield forming an aerodynamic shape, as it accelerated upwards, moving fairly slowly at first, at the same time fading from view. Within a hundred metres it was invisible. They tracked it with the SIs as it moved faster and faster, a faint rumble coming down from high above a minute later, then it was gone.

"That seems easy enough," he said in satisfaction. "All we do now is wait."

"What about this thing?" Misaki asked, producing the mapping unit box from her ki space and putting it on the ground.

"I guess we should start it up as well," he replied thoughtfully. Opening the box revealed a series of six spherical units similar in appearance to, but about three times the size of, the camera drones. They investigated them for a little while, reading the documentation which the case downloaded to their SIs, until he nodded. "Simple enough. It'll take about a week to build the full maps, from what this says. It looks like it does high level stuff from low orbit very fast then moves steadily lower producing higher and higher resolution scans. Impressive."

Sending the activation command made the six spheres lift into a three dimensional formation in front of them, rotate slowly for a few seconds, then fade from view. They could sense them following the same path upwards that the positioning system had taken, although rather more slowly. Data began coming back, imaging Tokyo and the surrounding area, as the probes went higher.

Nabiki watched for a moment then grinned as Jun stored the incoming data safely away. "Very interesting, and probably the sort of thing that would give the military a heart attack."

"Let's not mention it to them, then," Rei laughed.

"Probably best not to." They headed back downstairs.

When they arrived back in the living room, the martial artist retrieved the case containing the Mark
Ten Delta upgrade units. He put it on the coffee-table and opened it, removing one and inspecting it for a moment, before distributing them to everyone present, then closing the box containing the last two and storing it away safely. "The last of the new toys," he chuckled.

Ami was carefully examining the one she'd been given. Nabiki watched for a moment, then looked at the thing in her hand. "What do we do with them?" she asked.

"According to the documentation they attach to the existing SI," the blue-haired girl replied, producing her unit from its subspace pocket and holding it in her other hand. Looking between them, she eventually carefully brought them together, one on top of the other. Both units snapped together when they were a few millimetres apart as if they were magnetised, a brief faint crackle sounded, the result being one unit which looked like a single piece. "Oh. OK, I see," Ami said in surprise. She got a faraway look, idly flipping the upgraded unit back into storage, falling silent.

Everyone watched her curiously, exchanged glances, then did the same.

"Wow," Nabiki muttered to herself, looking at the list of extra functions that Jun displayed as soon as the process was completed. 'There seem to be a hell of a lot of them, Jun,' she added to the SI.

#Indeed, Nabiki,# it replied in a satisfied and fascinated tone. There was something mildly different about its voice she couldn't quite pin down, something slightly... larger. #The extra capacity is interesting. There is a boost to processing capability as well, it appears. I have linked everything in, internal diagnostics report one hundred percent utilisation and complete functionality on all sensory packages. The upgrade has increased my sensory abilities substantially over the entire electromagnetic, subspace, and magical bands.#

'So, what can we do now?' she asked curiously.

#For one thing, this,# the machine replied, sounding amused. She blinked and looked around.

'Holy shit.'

The entire world had gone slightly translucent, allowing her to see outside the room, through the walls and intervening obstacles. All the people were also standing out in different colours with their bones visible through the skin. #This is using terahertz frequencies, essentially very deep infra-red wavelengths, to see through normally solid objects. It's passive, not requiring any input energy, but using the naturally emitted electromagnetic energy of the source.# The view shifted again, now showing various things in the walls. #This is reading the magnetic fields, so conductors such as the electrical wiring in the walls show up from their electromagnetic output.# Another shift made everything look every weirder. #This is thermal output, heat vision in essence. I am mixing the sensory input with your normal vision, using it to key the locations of objects so it feels to you as if you're seeing in these wavelengths. Is it satisfactory?#

'It's amazing,' she told it with complete honesty. A broad smile crossed her face. 'Why are the outer walls blank?' she asked after a moment, curiously.

#I believe the wards are preventing the wavelengths used from penetrating them,# Jun replied, sounding interested.

'Makes sense. We'll have to try this outside.'

#There are some interesting possibilities using active sensing as well,# it added.

Once they'd all experimented with the add-ons, and exchanged notes on various interesting things they'd found, Nabiki found herself thinking quietly in the corner. #What is concerning you, Nabiki?

"I'm a little worried about Yrenti wanting to meet Ms Aoyama,' she confessed. 'I'm not sure how we're going to work that.'

#I understand. It is an intriguing problem, although in retrospect, not surprising. Your alter-ego has developed an interesting reputation from what I can determine. For people as involved with collecting information as my makers, it was probably inevitable that sooner or later they would come across data on you in that guise. The only slightly surprising thing is that they appear to wish to subcontract work to her and her organisation.# There was a note of amusement in the SIs voice when it said this last part, making her laugh for a moment.

'You might not be surprised by it, but I am. I didn't think that the Ms Aoyama thing would grow like that.'

#It is the same issue that Ranma and Kasumi confront with their alternate personae.# Jun replied. #Yori and Chou have become much larger than was originally intended, and much more important, as both of them have stated in the past. But at the same time, both personae are as real as they are, they are merely alternate aspects of the originating persona. In your case, you have two personae that are becoming known, Azumi and Ms Aoyama, which complicates things further. But even there, they are both still you. I see a lot of the Nabiki Tendo I know in both of them. More, in some ways, in the latter, oddly enough.#

The middle sister smiled a little to herself, feeling mildly surprised. 'Really?'

#Oh, yes. Ms Aoyama is Nabiki distilled to her essence, cold logic and reason tempered with fairness and good judgement. It is a potent combination. Not, admittedly, one which the majority of people from any species would find particularly comfortable to be in the presence of for any length of time, but still very effective.# Jun sounded even more amused. #I find it very interesting, to be honest. When you are running the Ms Aoyama overlay you have less emotional output than I do myself these days, and it is noticeable that your mental processing speed becomes both considerably faster and more efficient. It is slightly disconcerting even to one such as I. As time goes on, in addition, you seem to be refining the persona considerably. Which does indeed seem to cause the people you... inflict... it on a certain amount of worry.#

She could have sworn it was trying not to laugh by this point. Snickering, she told it, 'It's probably wrong of me but I have to admit to a certain amount of amusement seeing the reactions I get. The strangest one was Hotaru, actually. I never thought I'd find someone who'd actually laugh at Ms Aoyama.'

#Hotaru is a very interesting person,# Jun said reflectively, as she looked at the purple-haired girl who was waving a hand in front of her face and laughing, apparently finding the effective x-ray vision she now had endlessly amusing. #My data on her suggests a young woman who has had a number of fairly unfortunate experiences, even leaving aside all the problems with the time device and its manipulations. Yet she has matured into an intelligent, articulate, and honest person despite all that. One with very considerable potential. Even so, there is a part of her which isn't dissimilar to you in some ways, a part that finds Ms Aoyama fascinating.#

'Perhaps we need to work out her own version at some point,' Nabiki mused, watching the girl, who looked happy. 'When she's in uniform holding her weapon she certainly looks like she means business. It wouldn't take much to make that a lot more worrying.' She smiled a little as she thought of the effect of having a 'colleague' of the same type as Ms Aoyama beside her alternate persona. People would probably either run or faint.
It would be an interesting experiment when she has mastered the illusion spell, certainly," Jun responded. "Although two of you at once might be a bit excessive for most problems." Its dryly humorous voice made her chuckle.

'That aside, it still leaves the issue of Kw'lyn Industries wanting to hire someone who doesn't exist and her organisation, which also doesn't exist. How are we going to solve that problem?'

'The most obvious solution is to divulge the truth to Yrenti," Jun said after a moment. She nodded slowly.

'True, but neither Sis or Ranma have told them about the shape-shifting technique yet, so it might be slightly awkward.'

'Azumi Ito is known as a shape-shifter, I would suspect that Kw'lyn is aware of this from your time on Fwetna and other places we went on holiday. They are certainly collecting information on you and the others for their records. Most of the locations you were in your flying or aquatic forms other than in the vicinity of Uthryyl's home were probably not monitored, but I think we must assume that anything you did in public there may well be something they know about by now. Whether they have extended that to the rest of your group I'm not certain about.'

'They didn't say anything about it,' she commented.

'It would fall under the category of personal information and would therefore be private, not to be mentioned to others except with your permission. If you discuss it with them, they'll talk about it, but they won't bring it up otherwise except in extreme circumstances." Jun sounded very sure of this.

'OK, I suppose that makes sense, based on what we've learned about them.' She thought for a moment. 'It's slightly surprising then that they haven't worked it out, that I'm Ms Aoyama.'

'Not entirely, I think," the SI said. 'You may underestimate quite how alien Ms Aoyama is to others. Even to your friends and family, in most cases, she is... very worrying. Ranma doesn't seem to be affected, or your sister, but all the others barring Hotaru seem to find your alter ego someone they're not at all keen on having around. Those are people who know and love you. People who don't..." It trailed off, making her laugh again.

'It's really that bad?'

'Definitely, based on the physiological reactions I can read from anyone who meets her. The deliberately warped ki signature that Ranma designed has a very low level effect on almost anyone, varying from fear to absolute terror, depending on the person in question and how hard you are pushing the effect. Even at its mildest it seems remarkably effective.'

'Interesting. So if I don't tell them, they might well not work it out.'

'I believe that to be the case.'

'Hmm. OK, that's option one then, tell them, but if I don't, they may not work it out. In that case, what would we do? Can we fake it well enough to make them happy? Should we even try? I like Yrenti and the others, I don't want to do wrong by them.' Nabiki scratched her nose for a moment, thinking hard, while watching her friends.

'It is likely that with the help of your family you could probably do more or less any task that they require, bearing in mind that you may already be performing similar tasks for your 'employers'." A note of humour was present in the machine's voice. 'If we define them as your sister and her husband, of course, which is more or less accurate.

She snickered. 'True, I guess. I suppose we'll have to come up with a suitable name and logo for the 'organisation' at some point. That will take some careful thought.' Thinking of something, she asked, 'Can they tell who I am by detecting you?'

#To the best of my knowledge, no, I don't believe that to be possible,# Jun responded. #They can detect the presence of an SI, certainly, though I don't think many other people, if any, could, but I know of no way to determine which SI has been detected. The entire system is designed with stealth and high security in mind so we don't broadcast any form of identity, or more accurately, we can broadcast any form of identity required, which amounts to the same thing. To anyone with a lower level of technology that my makers even detecting an SI is impossible, magically, technologically, or otherwise, which is the entire point.#

'So they won't be able to tell Ms Aoyama and Azumi are the same person based on the SI signature, at least. That's one possible problem solved.'

#Indeed. Leaving only all the rest.# It was definitely joking now. She grinned.

Kasumi chose that moment to glance at her and ask, "You're being very quiet, sister. What's on your mind?"

She blinked a couple of times, turning from her inner conversation to the outside world, noticing that several of her friends were now watching her curiously. "I was thinking about Yrenti asking to meet Ms Aoyama. Jun and I were discussing it and what to do," She summarised the conversation she'd had with the SI.

"Ah, yes, I see," the eldest sister replied when she'd finished, frowning a little. "It is somewhat awkward, yes."

"I think you're right, we don't want to cause them any problems," Ranma said slowly, looking at her, "They seem like good and trustworthy people, who have helped us a lot. That said, I'm not quite ready to tell them everything." He sighed slightly. "I guess that in the end we probably will, assuming they don't work it out themselves, but not just yet. Although, if you want to play on the reputation of Azumi as a shape-shifter, that's all right as far as I'm concerned."

The middle Tendo thought for a moment. "I could, but I'm not sure it's the best idea, although I can't quite say why."

"If we don't let them know the truth, we need to come up with some sort of backstory, even if only fairly basic, for the organisation she works for," Fumiko suggested, looking intrigued. "The idea of security issues could cover for a lot of it of course, but you'd still need something, I think."

"Probably," she agreed. "I was thinking at least some sort of logo, like most security agencies have. Something that looks suitably alien."

"Well, there's no huge hurry, at any rate," Ranma said after they'd all through about that for a while. "Yrenti didn't seem to be in a rush, so I guess it isn't urgent. We can think about it for a while, until at least after Mom's party, and see what we can come up with."

Ami looked around at the assembled multitude. "It's been a lot of fun, but I'm going to need to get home now," she said. "Thanks for the lunch, Kasumi."

"You're entirely welcome, Ami, of course," Kasumi replied, smiling. "You are all always welcome
"Thanks. That means a lot." The blue-haired girl got up. Aiko did the same.

"I'll jump you home if you want, Ami," she offered.

"That would be great, thanks, Aiko."

The brunette looked around at the others. "Anyone else need a lift?"

Rei and Hotaru looked at each other then rose. "I should get back as well, Haruka is looking for somewhere to live and I'm supposed to be helping," the younger girl said, appearing slightly embarrassed. "But thanks for inviting me along. I like Yrenti and Savrk and Unare." She moved to stand beside Aiko and Ami.

"I'd better go back as well," Rei added, joining them.

"I'll be back in a bit," Aiko waved then the entire group vanished.

Standing, Nabiki stretched, then looked around the diminished number of people in the living room. "I'll be getting back as well, as soon as I've used the facilities," she announced. "I want to see Akane and Dad, and the others at home, before I go down to Kobe and stay with Miki for a couple of days." She headed off to the bathroom, before returning to her room and packing up the few things she didn't already have stored in her ki pocket. Feeling a familiar presence at the door she looked over her shoulder and smiled at her sister, who was leaning on the door frame watching her.

"I'll miss you, Nabiki," the older woman said, smiling a little back at her. "It's been lovely having you around."

"It's been great being here as well, sis," she replied, zipping up her backpack and flipping it into nothingness with a casual gesture. "I'll be back, don't worry. But I really do need to see what's going on at home, visit Miki and John, and get ready for the next trimester. I'll be graduating next spring and there's a lot of work to do." She laughed for a moment. "Although I will admit that economic theory is boring next to saving the entire universe."

Giggling, Kasumi walked over and hugged her. "That, I can well believe. Call me often, all right?"

"I will. I'll let you know about how Akane gets on as well. She's leaving tomorrow and probably will be there until something like Thursday or so."

They walked back into the living room, just in time to see Aiko reappear and sit down. "I do hope she and Shampoo do well," Kasumi remarked.

"They will. You wouldn't believe how much better she's become. She's like a more mature version of what she was when she was about eight, now, rather than the horror she was turning into a year and a half ago. Something everyone is incredibly grateful for, none more than her." Nabiki shook her head in wonder. "I'm amazed how much our entire family has changed in the last couple of years. All for the better."

"Hopefully, things will continue to improve," Ranma said, getting up and walking over. He held out his hand, which she looked at for a moment, then brushed aside in favour of a hug. Laughing, he returned it. "Take care, Nabs. Make sure my parents don't do anything stupid."

"I'll try, but I can't guarantee anything in the case of Genma. I'm a magical girl, not a miracle worker," she snickered. He chuckled, very amused.
"True, I guess. See you at the party. We need to arrange a fusion reactor for the PSIA around then as well."

"I should call Uthryyl and talk about that," she agreed. "I'll do that soon." Releasing him she stepped back, as Aiko stood.

"Want a lift?"

"Thanks. That would save time, as always." Smiling at her friend, she looked around at the others. "It's been a hell of a lot of fun," she added softly. "Even with all the terror. Thanks for being my family."

Tamiko grinned at her, looking around as well, then returning her attention to the middle sister. "I think we all feel the same, Nabiki, trust me. See you later, sister."

With a wave, and a quick grab at the Krennish snack Misaki flipped her with a grin, she and Aiko disappeared, even before she got the spiky blue thing in her mouth.

"Don't call me Nabs, Saotome."

Ranma laughed, then sat down with his arm around his wife, talking to his friends.
Chapter 90

There is a story on my page about the origins of Aiko and her team, for anyone who hasn't yet stumbled across it.

Next chapter is Akane and Shampoo do Hollywood :)

Poor Hollywood...

Then it's party time!

Thanks again for all the comments, everyone.

This one took a while as I've never been to Kobe, so I had to look up a lot of things to try to get the details at least vaguely plausible. The internet is useful for more than porn, it turns out...

Glancing up as she thought she saw something flicker in the corner of her vision, Saeko frowned slightly. 'What was that?' she wondered to herself. It had been a bright flash of light from somewhere outside, as far as she could tell, replaying it in her head. For some reason it was vaguely familiar although she couldn't quite recall why for the moment.

The sound of the door opening pushed the mildly puzzling event out of her thoughts, bringing a smile to her face. "I'm home, Mom," Ami called, as she stood up, quickly saving the document she was working on, before leaving the study.

"Did everything go well with your friends, Ami?" she asked, watching her daughter take her shoes off and hang her jacket up.

"Yes, thanks. I stayed over for lunch then came back. How are you today? Sorry I left so early, you were asleep and I didn't want to wake you up."

"I'm fine, thank you," the elder woman replied with a smile. "I saw your note." She looked at the shoes on the rack inside the door, raising an eyebrow at the grey dust on them and on the doormat. Ami followed her eyes and flushed a little.

"Sorry. I'll clean it up."

"Did you go somewhere on a building site, dear? That looks like concrete dust." Saeko smiled deviously. "Or perhaps it's moon dust. Did you go and get me another rock?"

Ami giggled, hugging her mother. "Surely one is enough?" she joked, as they went into the living room. The older woman laughed as well, listening as her daughter began talking about the work she expected to do in her last term of school when it restarted in a couple of weeks.

"You're back, Nabiki! We've missed you," Nodoka exclaimed as the middle sister entered the kitchen, turning away from the sink and drying her hands on a towel before pulling the younger woman into a quick hug. "I didn't think you were coming for a few days. How are you?"

"I'm fine, Auntie," the middle sister replied, putting the bag she was carrying for appearances sake on the kitchen table. "I'm only back for tonight, though, then down to Kobe for a little while. I decided to come back a little earlier because I missed everyone. I'll be back home again after that “It's been better,” the younger woman growled, glaring at their father, who came over with a small grin on his face, putting his arm around both of them.

"Don't be like that, dear, you're improving. It took nearly thirty seconds to win that time, that's much better than the previous six times." Shampoo started laughing at the expression on her friend's face due to this somewhat back-handed encouragement. Snickering, Soun looked at his middle daughter. "Hello, Nabiki. I didn't expect you back quite yet."

"Last minute change of plans, I decided to come back before I went down to Kobe. How is everything going?"

"Very well, actually, thank you, dear. Genma and I were at a loose end today since we don't have any students in until Monday, so we decided to bring Shampoo and Akane up to speed on a few of the more advanced Anything Goes moves. They're both doing very well, although for some reason this last one seems to be giving your sister some trouble." He laughed slightly as Akane looked irritated. "I'm sure she'll get it, though, sooner or later."

"Oh, thanks a lot, Dad," the youngest sister said, although she was beginning to smile. Lifting his arm off her shoulders she stepped back. "I need to have something to eat, then I'll come back and show you just how much I've learned." He bowed slightly towards her, his moustache twitching a little.

"I await that eventuality with anticipation," he retorted gravely. Shampoo laughed, as did Nabiki, then followed the youngest Tendo out of the Dojo. Soun turned to his older daughter, looking her up and down for a moment. "You look well, daughter. Have you been exercising?"

"A bit," she admitted, internally amused by what his reaction would be if he knew how. "A lot of swimming, certainly."

"I'm impressed, you look very healthy." He smiled for a moment. "I still think you should take up the Art, though, dear, I think you'd be very good at it and it's extremely good exercise."

"My current exercise regime is fine, thank, Dad," she replied, laughing.

He laughed as well. "How long are you back for?"

"Only tonight, I'm heading off to Kobe for a couple of days sometime tomorrow morning. I'll have to check the train times."

"Ah, I understand. Well, it's nice to see you again, even if only briefly." He put his arm around her shoulder. Genma walked over, grinning.

"Good to see you again, Nabiki. I hope your holiday went well. Did you go anywhere interesting?"

"Lots of places, yes, Uncle Genma." She couldn't think of anything else to say on that subject. "Auntie was making tea and taking it out to the garden. Let's go and have some and I'll tell you about some of it." She'd spent some time coming up with sanitised variants of various stories, managing to leave out exactly where she'd been for the last few weeks.

They all wandered around to the garden, finding Nodoka just coming out of the house with a tray full of tea things, which she put on the garden table. Akane and Shampoo joined them a few seconds later. Sitting down in one of the garden chairs she accepted the cup the Saotome woman handed her with a smile. "So, dear, tell us something about your holiday. Did you do anything exciting?"

"A few things," she laughed quietly. "I went hang-gliding for the first time. That was fun. An amazing view from up in the air." Everyone looked at her in mild shock.

"Isn't that dangerous?" Nodoka asked, seeming somewhat worried. She shrugged a little.

"Not really. The equipment was first rate, my instructor really knew his stuff, so there wasn't much risk. The only problem was I couldn't use my camera up there, my hands were sort of busy."

"Wow, 'Biki, I don't think I'd be able to do that," Akane said, shuddering a little. "I'm not fantastic with heights."

"You don't notice it when you're flying, not like being up on something tall, at least," the middle sister replied. "I'm not sure why, I've read it's something to do with being able to see a connection to the ground. But it was fine when we were in the air. The first few seconds were a bit worrying but after that it was enormous fun. I didn't want to stop, neither did Maiko."

"She went with you?" Soun enquired. She nodded.
"It was a friend of a friend of hers who had the gliders. We bumped into him more or less by accident and one thing led to another. The next thing you know we're both three kilometres up swooping around all over the place." Nabiki grinned as both her father and sister paled a little. Shampoo looked interested while Nodoka and her husband were looking at her slightly oddly.

"Oh, dear. I don't think I could do that," the Saotome woman said in a faint tone after a long pause.

"You'd be fine, Auntie," she assured the woman, internally giggling at the thought of Ranma's mother flying a D'sage glider. It seemed unlikely ever to happen.

"Didn't Rika do it?" Genma asked curiously. She shook her head.

"She was interested but was in the middle of something else, so it never happened, that time. We did go flying again later and she was the first to jump off the edge." The young woman grinned as her entire audience paled at once this time. "We all had a lot of fun."

"Did you get a lot of photos, then?" her father asked. "I know you bought that rather impressive camera and a lot of film before you left."

"I took quite a few rolls, yes," she replied. "I'm going to have to wait to go back to the university to develop them and see how they came out. I don't trust the commercial places to do it, I'd rather process them myself on the equipment they have there. It's a lot cheaper as well. I'll print out some nice ones and show them to you in a few weeks."

She'd taken the opportunity to take a number of 'safe' photos around the place on Aiko Island, and one or two other places that couldn't be identified as out of the ordinary, just for this eventuality. 'I must ask Aiko to take me to a couple of other places in the mountains and the like to take a few more,' she mused to herself, looking around as she sipped her tea. 'Pity I can't show the ones from the crater rim on Fwetna. Hopefully they came out, and if so they'll be amazing. Oh well, perhaps one day.'

"We went all over the place. Even to some wonderful little islands in the tropics for a short time, another friend of Rika's arranged it. It was a lot of fun. No one around for hundreds of miles except us."

"It sounds wonderful, Nabiki," Nodoka said, smiling at her. Akane nodded, looking envious.

"I'd love to go somewhere like that one day."

"You're off to Hollywood tomorrow, surely that's exotic enough for the moment?" her sister asked, grinning. The youngest Tendo laughed.

"I suppose so."

"Are you still looking forward to it?" She glanced at Shampoo. "And you?"

Both young woman shared a look. "I certainly am, yes," the Amazon admitted happily. "The closer it gets the more I'm anticipating it. I think it could be damn good fun."

"But it still makes me nervous," Akane said in a low voice, looking mildly worried. "What if I screw it up?"

"You won't," Nabiki looked hard at her younger sister. "I'm sure of that. Once, yes, you might have done, but these days you're a sensible, more or less mature person who can do anything she needs to do."
Akane looked at her for a few seconds, apparently not entirely sure whether she'd been complimented or not, based on her expression, but eventually nodded. "Thanks, 'Biki. I think." The middle sister chuckled.

"It was a compliment. You'll be fine. I expect we'll be seeing you in films sooner or later, probably sooner. Both of you. I'm looking forward to having a famous sister." She laughed. "I can come to the US and sponge off you in Beverly Hills or something."

Her sister gave her a narrow-eyed look for a long moment, causing her to grin. "Earn your own fortune," she finally replied archly.

Laughing, Nabiki nodded. "I intend to. But I'm still going to sponge off you. That's what family is for."

Sighing, Akane shook her head, then smiled a little. "We'll see." The two Tendo daughters shared a glance, before giggling. "Of course you'll be welcome, 'Biki. It would be nice to have family and friends come over. But we're sort of getting ahead of ourselves at the moment. We're still not sure what's going to happen."

"You'll impress the hell out of them, get hired on the spot at that ridiculous salary Adrian suggested, then go on to become famous stunt women, both of you," the middle sister said, waving a hand dismissively. "I can't see any other outcome. Don't worry about it, just do your best and enjoy yourselves."

Shampoo and the younger Tendo woman looked at each other for a few seconds. The Amazon shrugged. "Sounds like good advice."

"OK." Akane chuckled. "We'll do that, then. It's better than my idea of panicking and running around in circles."

"Very true," Soun commented, watching them while smiling a little to himself. "Running in circles seldom solves a problem." He grinned as both his daughters stared at him with almost identical, raised-eyebrow expressions. "Nabiki is right, dear. I'm sure you're both going to do very well indeed. Try not to over-think it. Just do what Adrian and his colleagues ask you to do to the best of your abilities and everything will work out."

"I sure hope so," the young woman mumbled, but nodded, smiling.

Nabiki asked, "When are you two leaving?"

"Tomorrow around nine or so is what we're planning," the Amazon replied. "That gets us to LA about five in the afternoon. It'll mainly be talking to Adrian and the others tomorrow and dealing with some paperwork, then looking around LA, before an early night. The time difference will take a bit of getting used to. The stunt trials will start on Monday, which gives us a day to settle in."

"It sounds like you've got a lot to do in only a few days."

Shampoo nodded. "The first day is introductions to everyone, some people we've met like Aaron and Matt, some we haven't, like the driving instructor, other stunt people, the studio executives, that sort of thing, in the morning, then a longer demonstration afterwards. Depending on how that goes, it would be followed by instruction and learning a few things for the rest of the day. Probably driving techniques, how they want fights done, how the cameras work, and a few other movie requirements. That's what Adrian told us, anyway."

"After that, the next day is supposed to be doing some more training then some practical stuntwork, first just learning how, then practising, eventually in front of a camera," Akane added, looking mildly worried again. "Something I'm a little nervous about I have to admit. But I guess I'll get over it."

Shampoo glanced at her with a smile. "Of course you will. I'm nervous as well but really excited." She looked back to the middle sister. "He says that depending on how the first day of work and all the tests go, there would be one, or perhaps two more days, so we'll probably be back Thursday or Friday. We cross the date line so Friday morning here is Thursday evening there."

"OK. I understand. By the sound of it there's a lot of work ahead of you both but it should be good fun and very good experience." Nabiki smiled to herself, watching them both. "Assuming everything goes well, what happens next?"

Shampoo looked at Akane, both of them appearing slightly uncertain. "I'm not entirely sure, yet," her sister admitted. "From what Adrian said the various studio people will want to go over the sample work and film for at least a week, talk about it, then make a decision. He seems pretty sure that decision will be the one he wants. I guess we just have to wait and see."

"If it does go to plan, he thinks we'd be doing real work, or at least serious training and practice, for money, sometime in January, after the New Year." Shampoo looked at her small audience for a moment. "He also though they'd want us over for longer in late September or early October for between a couple of weeks and a month for the preliminary work, contract signing, looking for somewhere to live, setting up bank accounts..." She shrugged a little helplessly. "It goes on forever. Moving to a new country is complicated."

Genma smirked at her. "You didn't seem to have any problems when you and Cologne turned up here," he commented. She gave him a look.

"We didn't exactly do it the traditional way," the Chinese girl admitted, seeming both amused and slightly embarrassed. "But it all worked out in the end. In this case, though, we need to follow the rules." He nodded, looking amused as well.

"Americans have even more of them than we do from what I've been told. But I've never been there."

"It seems an interesting place," Akane noted. "Although we didn't see a lot of it the last time."

Listening, Nabiki felt pleased. Her sister seemed much more relaxed and confident than she had been about the entire idea, and still very interested in it. That suggested to her it was probably going to work out well. She certainly hoped so. "I'll stick around tomorrow to see you off and say hi to Aiko, but I need to catch the quarter to eleven train to Kobe. I'm looking forward to seeing Miki and John."

"Have you known them long?" Soun asked her curiously. "You've mentioned both of them before but I don't know much about them."

She smiled, thinking back. "Miki has lived across the hall from me since I've been at the university, so nearly four years now, but until fairly recently I didn't know her all that well. We said hello, sometimes sat together in class, that sort of thing, although I wouldn't call it a close friendship."

"What changed?" her father asked. She shrugged a little.

"I'm not sure. She knocked on the door one night a couple of months after Christmas when I had a small accident, wanting to see if I was all right, and it kind of grew from that. Somehow, we ended up becoming pretty good friends. She met John a little before that, I think, and I was introduced a few weeks later. We went out for pizza, ate way too much, talked for ages..." Nabiki grinned. "It just sort of happened."

"They sound like nice people," Akane commented, listening with interest to her older sister.

"They are. Miki is really nice, very smart, and good looking as well, which helped with John." Everyone laughed at this. "John is amazingly good at pure mathematics, much better than I am, and doesn't really have all that much interest in economic theory, but he's damn good at statistics, which is how they met. They had the same class. He moved here from the UK, he grew up somewhere in the south of the country, they came back because his mother had a family problem a few years ago. His accent is noticeable but he's actually very good with Japanese, much better than most Europeans I've talked to. We go out to movies sometimes, and things like that."

She looked at her sister with a smirk. "We'll be able to go to ones soon where I can point and say, 'I know her.'"

Rolling her eyes, the younger sister laughed. "And I'm sure you will every chance you get."

"Of course." Nabiki leaned back in her seat, projecting satisfaction. "What's the point of having a famous relative if you can't use that fact to your own benefit?"

"You never change, do you, 'Biki?" Akane giggled.

Nabiki waved her hand over herself. "Change? When I have all this? Why would I?" They exchanged a glance then both sisters collapsed laughing, their father watching with a grin. Shampoo and Nodoka looked at each other and shook their heads good-naturedly. 'If only they knew how much I have changed...' the middle sister thought to herself, causing her to laugh harder, although no one but she knew why.

Nodoka poured herself a little more tea. "Please make sure you invite them both to the party, Nabiki," she requested, an amused smile on her face. "They sound interesting. I'd like to meet them."

"Miki will be falling over herself to talk to Yori and the others," the middle sister giggled. "She's really into magical girls. I managed to get her signature and her friends as well for her, she couldn't believe it." Looking at Akane she laughed, "She's even more into that sort of thing than you are. Apparently her sister Hana is absolutely nuts about it."

"Perhaps you should invite her as well," Soun chuckled. Nabiki glanced at him, grinning. "I don't know if that would be a good idea. The screaming and squealing might get annoying after a while." Her father laughed at this, finishing off his tea. She looked back to her sister and Shampoo. "How is Mr Ito being about you going off for a week?" she asked.

"He's actually been very supportive," the younger woman replied with a pleased expression. "He's given me the week off with pay, which is really generous, and told me he hopes I'll do well, even though he'd miss me. I've recommended that he talk to Mariko about my job if she's interested, she'd probably be good at it and she could easily do the security aspect as well."

"We invited him and his wife to the party," Nodoka told her, "as well as that police lieutenant, ah, Sasaki, is it, Akane?" The young woman nodded. "He's been around for the last two or three robberies that Akane has dealt with, Mr Ito and he are old friends apparently, and your father knows him as well from the council work. Plus a few of the neighbours, Cologne and Mousse, Ukyo and Konatsu... I think that's it so far. And of course, Yori and her friends."

"It's going to be amazing, I suspect," Shampoo grinned.

"Could well be," Nabiki admitted, smiling back. "I'm looking forward to it."

After a few more minutes talking about the upcoming trip to the US, and the party as well, Soun asked his middle daughter, "Have you given that odd occurrence last week any more thought?"

"The twitch?" He nodded. The brunette shrugged slightly. "I've talked to people about it but no one seems to know exactly what it was." Which was indeed true. "It's a bit weird the way nobody seems too worried, though. From what I saw on the TV and the internet everyone on the planet felt it, apparently at exactly the same time. Kind of strange. There are some amazing conspiracy stories circulating about it, as you said the other day, some of them are really funny."

"Indeed," her father mused. He glanced at Genma, who looked back, then returned his attention to his daughter. "I saw something very odd during the whole event," he admitted, "Something very few other people seem to remember. Genma and Shampoo saw it too, as did Cologne and Mousse." He went on to describe the column of light that had suddenly exploded outwards from somewhere near the centre of Minato. Nabiki listened with interest, passing the details on to Ranma and her older sister, as it seemed to be more evidence that it was as they'd suspected something that most advanced ki or magic users would remember.

'Interesting,' Ranma commed her, listening to Soun talk through her ears. 'I'm not surprised, to be honest, but it's useful information. Thanks.'

'No problem, Ranma,' she replied, before closing the link. "That's very weird, Dad," she said out loud as her father stopped talking. "You two didn't see it?" Nodoka and Akane shook their heads when she glanced at them.

"No, nothing at all like what your father described," the elder Saotome woman replied, looking thoughtful. "It was very strange. Elder Cologne believes it was due to having either a high magical ability or a similar ki ability that allowed certain people to remember it. She made some enquiries that would seem to back that up. What it means, though, not even she seems to know." The older woman seemed mildly worried for a moment. "To be honest I think it rather scared her, whatever it was she found out. She believes it may have something to do with this mysterious Ms Aoyama woman Akane and Shampoo seem so nervous of." Nabiki watched with inner amusement as both the mentioned young women unconsciously shivered at the name of her alter-ego.

"Yes, it is very strange," was all she said in the end.

"Quite. It may be something we never find out about," Soun remarked, sighing slightly. "But I suppose as long as no damage was done there probably isn't any harm in it. It's just one of those odd occurrences that happens from time to time."

"Life can be weird," Nabiki agreed, smiling slightly. After a moment's pause, the group turned to discussing the upcoming party and life in general. She looked around at the garden and the people in it, content to be back home.

Akane finished her miso soup, feeling very nervous, glancing over at the others around the table while she ate. Beside her, Shampoo, who had come over for breakfast while they waited for Aiko to arrive looked much calmer although still not exactly unmoved. She caught her sister's eye, the
"It will be OK, Akane. Just do your best and enjoy yourselves." Nabiki looked calm and relaxed, something that at the moment she was very envious of. She was anything but. Nodding, she put her spoon down, leaning back and closing her eyes for a few seconds, while running through some relaxation exercises her therapist had taught her months ago. They worked surprisingly well most times.

This wasn't one of them, unfortunately.

Sighing, she shook her head slightly and opened her eyes again. "Sorry, I can't help being nervous," she admitted. Nabiki grinned at her.

"I'm not surprised, it's a big event in your life, but we all have faith in you. Both of you," she added, looking at the Chinese girl, who grinned back.

"Thanks, Nabiki." Both girls twirled as the doorbell rang, making the others smile, then Nodoka got up and went to answer it, returning a few seconds later with not the magical girl, but Cologne and Mousse.

"Hello, Elder," Nabiki said, sounding pleased, standing up and motioning the ancient women to a seat in a gesture of respect. She nodded to Mousse and shook his hand, exchanging a greeting quietly.

"Good morning, Nabiki. It's nice to see you home again. I trust your travels went well?"

Akane watched as her sister grinned again, looking momentarily very pleased. "Yes, it was a hell of a lot of fun. I'll show you all some photos when I develop the film soon."

"I'd be most interested in hearing about it all," the Elder commented, dropping off her staff and taking the offered seat. "I always enjoyed travelling but I haven't done much in recent years for a number of reasons." She looked around at the other occupants of the room. "We thought we'd drop by and see the youngsters off, and wish them good luck," she explained. Nodoka poured her and the young man cups of tea, which both of them accepted with thanks.

"Looking forward to the experience, Akane?" Mousse asked. She looked at him for a moment then nodded.

"I am, I think, but the closer it gets the more nervous I am," she said quietly. He grinned at her.

"Going to a different country to follow your dream is a big step, certainly, but it can also be a lot of fun and very rewarding. Even if things don't work out exactly how you expected." He glanced at Shampoo as he spoke, causing her to half-smile, half-sigh. "Personally I think you'll both do very well," he finished, making her smile gratefully at him.

"Thanks."

The youngest Tendo woman sipped her tea, trying to remain calm, or at least, calmer. The doorbell rang again, proving she'd failed as she jumped, spilling a little of her drink on the table. "Damn," she muttered. Nodoka looked mildly amused, passing her a damp cloth, then got up to answer the door again. This time, she returned with Aiko, who was dressed in jeans and a nice shirt, unlike her normal 'work clothes'. Everyone looked at her curiously.

"I'm going to visit Richard afterwards," she explained, grinning, apparently realising what they were all looking at, "we might go out later. It seemed appropriate to be incognito. Even magical "Seems reasonable," Nabiki laughed. Getting up she shook hands with the petite brunette. "It's nice to see you again, Aiko."

"And you, Nabiki. It seems like ages since we last met." Akane watched as both young women exchanged an oddly amused look.

"Would you like some tea, Aiko?" Nodoka asked.

"Thank you, yes, that would be very nice," the girl replied. Moving over Nabiki managed to make space between her and Cologne, who also shifted slightly. The room was becoming very full. Sitting down, Aiko accepted the cup the Saotome woman handed her with a smile. "So, Akane, Shampoo, you're all ready?"

"Yes, we're packed and looking forward to it," the Amazon replied. Glancing at the youngest sister, she amended her statement slightly. "Mostly looking forward..."

Aiko laughed. "I understand. It's a lot of pressure. Don't worry, I think it will all work out. Give it your best, that's all you can do."

"Everyone seems to be saying that sort of thing," Akane replied, amused, relaxing a little. "I suppose it must be true."

"Or we're all just wrong," her sister noted.

"Oh, thanks, 'Biki, that really helps," she snapped, suddenly worried again. The older Tendo laughed gently.

"I'm joking. You'll be fine, trust me. Hey, bring me back something interesting from LA, OK? I've never been to Hollywood."

"You could come if you want," Aiko suggested, grinning.

"I've got a prior appointment in Kobe," the other Tendo woman said, laughing, "but thanks for the offer. Perhaps next time."

Twenty minutes later they finished breakfast, Nabiki helping Nodoka quickly clear up, and had run out of things to say. Akane was feeling much calmer although she could still feel the butterflies flitting around somewhere in her digestive system. Firmly suppressing the urge to run upstairs and hide in her closet, she swallowed, stood up, and looked around. "I guess we should go."

Standing, Soun walked over and put his hands on her shoulders, looking into her face with a definite proud smile. "I have no doubt you will do well and succeed in this, as well as you've succeeded in turning your life around over the last year. Make me proud, daughter, and enjoy yourself." Staring back at him, she wrapped her arms around his back and hugged him hard enough to make him grunt a little.

"I'll do my best, Dad," she whispered, feeling his hand stroke her hair.

"I know you will, dear," he whispered back. "All my daughters do, and their best is extraordinary." Releasing him she stepped back. "Take care of her, Shampoo," he requested, the Amazon warrior nodding with a small smile. "And you take care of Shampoo. You're in this together, you're good friends, and you'll both succeed in anything you try."
"Thank you, Soun," the lilac-haired woman replied, looking pleased. She turned to talk to Cologne in Mandarin for a moment, Akane picking up enough of it to know she was receiving similar advice from the tiny ancient. Cologne grinned, gently bopping her with the end of her staff.

"Make us proud, great-granddaughter," the Elder commented in Japanese. "You to, Akane. You have a lot of talent, let it guide you. And come and see me when you return, I want to hear what happens."

"I will, Elder," she replied, smiling.

Watching them, Aiko waited until she and Shampoo had said goodbye to everyone, then stood up. "Come outside, it's easier from there," the magical girl said, smiling. Everyone trailed after her into the garden, Akane and Shampoo standing next to her as the others watched from the doorway. "Right. Ready?"

"I think so," Akane replied after a few seconds, determinedly throwing off any residual nervousness and looked at Shampoo, who grinned back. "Let's go."

"OK," the brunette laughed. She waved to the others, as did the Amazon and her friend. "See you guys later."

A second later, Akane felt the world twist away from them and they were standing in bright late-afternoon sunlight, Adrian looking mildly startled at the abrupt appearance yet very pleased to see them.

Nodoka blinked a little after the flash of the outbound teleport, turning to the remaining Tendo sister. "Such an odd way to travel but very convenient. I'd like to try it one day," she commented, which seemed to amuse Nabiki.

"I'm sure Aiko wouldn't mind," she replied. "From what I know about her she seems to love teleporting all over the world. Yori mentioned once that they go to Australia regularly for sushi, for instance."

"How odd," the Saotome woman said, amused. "But a very handy talent. I do hope they get on well in the US," she added. "I'm sure they will, but one worries a little. America is a very strange place from what I hear."

"They'll be fine, Auntie," Nabiki reassured her, smiling. "Akane and Shampoo are both more than capable of defending themselves against practically anything, nothing is likely to happen anyway, and even if it did, they could call Aiko and get home in seconds."

"My daughter will do well," Soun pronounced gravely, while beside him, Genma nodded. "So will Shampoo. They'll both make us all proud of them."

"I'm already proud of them," Cologne snickered. "Akane has progressed far further than I ever expected, something which I find myself very pleased about. In turn, she's pushing Shampoo much harder than I could ever have hoped for. It's doing both of them a world of good." The old woman laughed for a moment. "Akane could probably win the village champion award by this point, or at least come second. Shampoo would destroy them. I find this all very amusing, all things considered." Looking at Soun and Genma she added, "Thank you both for teaching my great-granddaughter some of your special techniques as well. She seemed very pleased."

"She's an excellent student," Genma replied placidly. "I'm happy with how well and quickly she learned. Now, Akane on the other hand..." He glanced at his old friend with a smirk. "She took some teaching." Soun looked at him, then Nabiki, following which he sighed a little and punched him.

Everyone stepped aside to allow the fight to pass through. Nodoka sighed, shaking her head. "I was hoping this sort of thing was over, they haven't had a fight in nearly a week."

"Perhaps they're bored?" Nabiki offered, apparently taking a bet from Mousse, and oddly enough, Cologne. She watched as the two men bounced off the garden wall.

"Possibly. My take on it is that they're both idiots," she replied, grinning a little as Nabiki giggled. Cologne watched the fight with an expert eye, smiling, while Mousse simply crossed his arms and waited, leaning against the side of the house.

Inevitably, the fight ended with a splash. "Still pushing the possessed pond idea, Auntie?" Nabiki asked idly as she distributed the winnings, Mousse looking annoyed while Cologne cackled, folding the wad of yen away somewhere.

Laughing, she nodded. "Every chance I get. It's definitely causing them some worry," she replied happily. Everyone laughed as a panda hauled itself out of the pond, dripping wet, then crawled a few metres away before passing out. "Give me a hand retrieving your father before he drowns, will you, dear?" she added, shaking her head and heading for the pond.

Watching Miki and John approach outside the train station on the outskirts of Kobe, Nabiki smiled, waving. She found herself very pleased to see both of them. While she was more than happy with the way her life was going at the moment, even with the occasional universe-ending peril thrown into the mix, she was also looking forward to something more... normal. These two were exactly that, decent, normal people, to whom magical girls and demons were something you watched on the news, rather than had breakfast with. She grinned internally at the thought, walking over to meet her friends.

"Hi Nabiki," the other young woman grinned, giving her a brief hug. "How was the trip?"

"Not too bad. A little tedious, but long train journeys are like that at the best of times." She turned to John, who smiled, holding out his hand, which she shook. "It's nice to see you again, both of you."

"And you, Nabiki. We were talking about you a few days ago, wondering how your holiday went. Did you go anywhere interesting?"

For a moment she couldn't decide quite how to answer that. Laughing, she finally nodded, answering, "Quite a few places, yes. We did a lot of swimming, met some new people, made friends, ate too much, saved the world a couple of times..." She shrugged. "You know, the normal holiday sort of thing."

Miki glanced at her boyfriend before both of them laughed. "Sounds like fun. I can understand the eating too much, I would imagine saving the world builds an appetite."

"You have no idea," she replied, giggling. "All that running around and screaming really takes it out of you. After that, you need a good meal to recover."

All three of them laughed for a moment, beginning to walk down the road. "At least it's been nice weather for it," John chuckled.

"Yes, that was good, you wouldn't want to save the world on a rainy day. Hardly worth the effort," the middle sister told him, glancing at him for a moment with a sly look. He returned it, amused.

"You have a very odd sense of humour, my dear Miss Tendo. We've been missing it."

Laughing and talking happily, the threesome headed towards Miki's house, arriving some twenty minutes later. "Well there it is. Not as large as some, bigger than others, but I like it," the young woman said, pointing as they rounded the final corner. The house and garden was perhaps half the size of the Tendo Dojo, a decent size but nothing exceptional. Opening the front door Miki waved her visitor in, John bringing up the rear behind his girlfriend. "Come in." They all exchanged their shoes for indoor ones, then Miki called, "Mom! We found Nabiki, she survived the trip."

"We're in the back garden," came back the reply. Nabiki recognised the voice from her phone call a couple of days earlier. All three of them trooped through the house and out the back door, the middle sister looking around with interest. It was neat, not obsessively so, but in the manner that showed pride in keeping things nice, with a number of pieces of art tastefully scattered around the rooms, including paintings, prints, and a couple of small sculptures. The back garden was similarly neat, reminding her of the garden at home, well kept and maintained. An older woman who was obviously Miki's mother, based on appearance, was kneeling on the ground tending to a remarkably involved flower bed with gloved hands, sitting back on her heels and turning her head to watch as they walked over. Beside her a fairly short but wide and strongly built man, late forties or so, his dark hair closely cropped, was carefully watering the newly pruned flowers with a watering can. He looked over his shoulder, his face losing what Nabiki could believe was a fairly intimidating expression to a wide smile.

"Mom, Dad, this is my friend Nabiki from university. Nabiki, this is my mother and father." Miki made the introductions as the three younger people stopped a couple of metres from the two.

Gracefully rising, Miki's mother walked over and greeted them, her husband behind her, the man walking with a slight limp. "It's nice to meet you, Nabiki. Miki has mentioned you a lot over the summer. I'm Umeko. This is my husband Harue. Did you have a good trip from Tokyo?"

"Yes, thank you, Umeko, it was a bit boring but not too bad."

Harue smiled a little at her words, nodding and saying, "I sympathise, I've been doing quite a lot of travelling recently and it certainly does become tedious after a while." He bowed slightly to her. "It's very nice to finally meet the young woman who saved my daughter from a mugging."

Laughing, Nabiki demurred, replying, "It was nothing, really. He wasn't very good, he left himself wide open, and it was just a reflex action. My father and sister would be quite surprised, they're the ones with years of training and are both very good martial artists. I'd just seen that move enough times it just sort of happened, I wasn't really thinking about it."

"Even so, it was well done from what Miki told us. It takes courage to deal with an armed criminal, even a not very good one. Thank you."

"You're entirely welcome," she smiled, returning his small respectful bow. Both of them grinned at each other. The middle sister had developed an instant liking for both the older people, their ki emanations suggested decent and honourable people and good parents. "I've known her for some time although I do slightly regret not becoming better friends earlier."

"Better late than never," Miki giggled, putting her arm around her friend's shoulder. "I'm glad you came. I'll show you the spare room, you can drop that backpack off, then we can have lunch. How long can you stay?"
"I've got a few days before I need to get back. I was thinking perhaps a couple of nights?" Nabiki followed her friend back into the house and up a flight of stairs to a room overlooking the back garden. Miki opened the door and entered it, so she followed.

"You're welcome to stay as long as you can, you don't have to rush off. There's still, what, about ten days before we have to get back?"

"Something like that. The first course restarts in thirteen days, but I want to be settled in the day before at least." Smiling a little the middle sister looked around the room. It was not large but it was nicely laid out and looked after. "This is very nice. Thanks, Miki." Taking her backpack off she put it on the bed, then looked out the window, before turning to her friend. "I could stay a bit longer if you can put up with me," she added, smiling more widely. "But I need to get back before next weekend, my Aunt Nodoka is throwing a party that I can't miss. It's probably going to turn into something weird."

"Why would it do that?" Miki asked, looking puzzled. "I mean, I know you live in Nerima, which I've heard is a little peculiar at the best of times, but it's just a party."

Looking back out the window Nabiki watched Miki's mother carefully trim another flower, while her father was talking to John. She grinned a little to herself. "It will probably be fine, but you never know, inviting six magical girls could bring all sorts of strange things along with it." She could easily feel her friend go completely still in shock. Turning around she added casually, "It could be fun. Want to go?" There was no answer for a moment, the other young woman simply staring blankly at her, so she shrugged a little. "You don't have to if you don't want to." Walking towards the door, she added over her shoulder, "You mentioned lunch?"

She was half way down the stairs when she felt Miki's mind re-engage, almost able to hear the gears grinding. "Hey! Get back here, Tendo! You can't just say something like that and run off," Miki yelled, charging after her. Laughing, she zipped down the stairs and back into the garden, the other girl in pursuit, to find the elder Sanos and John staring at them both curiously.

"What on earth is going on, girls?" Umeko asked, getting to her feet and taking her gardening gloves off. Her daughter pointed at Nabiki, who was giggling to herself.

"My friend here has been keeping things from me, it seems," Miki grumbled, although she was also smiling a little, "apparently her aunt is actually inviting magical girls to a party and she only just now bothers to mention it!" Both Umeko and her husband looked startled, staring at their daughter, then transferring the attention to Nabiki, making her grin. John shook his head slowly, laughing at the exasperated expression of good humour on his girlfriend's face.

"Magical...?" Umeko glanced back at her daughter for a moment. "Your aunt knows some magical girls?"

"Sort of, yes. It's a long story, but my younger sister had a sort of medical problem that caused her to... well, to kind of have a rage episode in Minato that ended up coming to the attention of a magical girl called Yori and her friends." Both Umeko and her husband looked startled, staring at their daughter, then transferring the attention to Nabiki, making her grin. John shook his head slowly, laughing at the exasperated expression of good humour on his girlfriend's face.

"Miki did mention something about that a while ago, now that you remind me," Harue commented, looking interested. "But she didn't go into any details."

"It's not something we make too much of a fuss about, although it's not really a secret," Nabiki told him, turning to face him more directly. "Poor Akane had an absolutely horrible temper for years, which turned out to be at least partially because of this weird parasitical organism in her brain." Both Miki's parents went slightly green. "Yori found it when she was healing Akane from injuries sustained in her fight, then she and Chou managed to fix it. It helped my sister a huge amount although she's still been in therapy ever since for other issues that were involved. That said, it's worked miracles, in the last few months she's hardly lost her temper at all and when she did, it was nothing very serious. We owe them a lot."

Both the older people looked impressed. "I've heard quite a lot on the news about the odd goings on in Minato in general and the activities of those two young women in particular," Umeko noted, kneeling to put away her tools in a container next to her, then standing again. "From what I understand they seem to have a considerable amount of official backing, judging by how they've been in the UK, the US, and Canada as well in that awful Halleckton thing. I was listening to a report about it just yesterday."

"They do get around, certainly," Nabiki agreed honestly. "But, anyway, when they'd fixed my sister up they brought her home and explained everything to us. They also managed to arrange to sort out the damage she'd caused in the fight. Both of them came back several times over the next few weeks to check on the progress of the cure but in the end it seems to have worked very well indeed, as I said. We're all both very pleased and very grateful, none more so than Akane. Especially considering what happened later."

"What happened?" Miki asked eagerly, while the others looked at Nabiki curiously.

Umeko glanced at her watch, turning to her daughter and shaking her head, smiling. "That can wait for a moment, we need to get lunch ready. Can you help me, please, Miki? Hana and Kimiko should be back in about twenty minutes, so we'll have to set seven places at the table." The older Sano woman glanced at Nabiki. "Hana is the older sister, Kimiko is the younger one."

"Ah." Nabiki nodded, smiling. "Miki has mentioned Hana before, and I knew she had two sisters, but I didn't know the other name. Are they as interested in magical girls as Miki is?" Harue looked at his wife, then his daughter, before bursting out laughing.

"Hana is obsessed. Miki has a fairly mild case of it, to be honest." The middle Sano daughter stuck her tongue out at her father as her boyfriend chuckled. "Be prepared for a lot of questions at the table..."

"She's not quite that bad, Dad," Miki protested mildly. He looked at her and raised an eyebrow. After a moment she sighed a little. "OK. She is. Kimiko isn't, though. But she is a little interested, she collects magazines about them. Hana collects everything even vaguely related to magical girls."

"You mentioned she was interested in those signatures I got you," Nabiki giggled. Miki howled with laughter as she remembered.

"Interested?" she managed after a moment's hilarity. "You wouldn't believe the colour her face went when I showed them to her! It was wonderful." She was leaning on John by this point, laughing helplessly. Her parents exchanged an amused glance.

"There was quite a lot of shouting, I seem to recall," Umeko commented drily. "Then she wouldn't speak to you for a week." Glancing darkly at Nabiki, she added, "We have you to thank for that? Hmm..."

The Tendo woman theatrically took a step back, holding her hands up defensively. "I merely acted as a go-between. I have nothing to do with any inter-familial strife caused by the product delivered." Umeko stared at her for several seconds blank-faced before laughing.

"You're everything Miki told us you were, aren't you, Nabiki?" she asked, grinning, before heading for the back door, gently but firmly acquiring her still-chuckling middle daughter en route. The three people remaining in the garden watched them go, then exchanged glances.

"We should probably help," Harue suggested. "Her vengeance can be terrible if she feels people are being lazy." They went after the other two.

Glancing at Miki, who was watching with a small smile, Nabiki sighed very slightly. She returned her attention to the elder sister of her friend, a young woman perhaps a year and a half older than she was, who was staring fixedly at her in a somewhat unnerving manner. The other sister Kimiko, who was a little younger than Akane, was also watching, her own smile not quite as well hidden.

The three sisters shared a very obvious family resemblance. Miki had short, almost black hair cut to fall at her jawline, while the other two had longer, lighter dark brown hair, in Kimiko's case in a ponytail reaching her shoulder blades, and in Hana's case styled nicely around her shoulders. Both the sisters had dark brown eyes like their mother. Miki's eyes were grey like her father's. The shape of the face and the overall build was very similar between all of the sisters, but Kimiko was noticeably taller than either of the other two, although not as tall as Kasumi, or Fumiko and her sister.

Now, though, the eldest Sano girl was fixing Nabiki with a gimlet eye as if waiting for her to make the first move. Eventually, the middle Tendo asked politely, "Can I do something for you, Hana?"

The young woman twitched a little, kept staring for a few more seconds, then asked, her voice suspicious, "How did you get those signatures?"

"Which signatures would those be?" Nabiki asked innocently, trying the soup, which was excellent. She smiled at Miki's mother who was listening to the younger women with an amused look on her face. "This is very good, Umeko."

"Thank you, Nabiki. It's my mother's recipe." The elder woman tried some from her own bowl, nodding slightly to herself. "It could do with a dash more parsley, but it came out well."

"It's fine, dear," her husband advised having tried some himself. Hana looked around at the other people with annoyance.

"Hey! I'm trying to ask a question."

"I'm sorry, Hana, dear," her mother said calmly. "Go ahead." As her daughter opened her mouth, she added more to herself than otherwise, "Hmm. Perhaps a little onion next time?"

"That would be nice, dear," Harue noted, glancing at his wife. Hana glared at both of them. Kimiko was obviously trying not to burst out laughing, as Miki grabbed her boyfriend's hand and squeezed it, her mouth attempting to form a very amused smile.

"MOM!"

"Sorry, Hana. You were saying...?" With a final glare at her mother, who merely smiled gently back, her eyes twinkling in a manner that made Nabiki grin internally, Hana turned back to the subject of her inquisition.

"I was talking about the six magical girl signatures you gave my sister. How did you get them? How did you meet Yori and the other girls? How often do you meet them? Do you know what their real names are? Do you know any other magical girls? Can you get me their signatures? Do you have any other magical girl things? Is Yori nice? Is Chou nice? Have you seen a demon? Does..."
The elder Sano girl ran out of breath after speaking very fast, drawing in the next one while looking slightly blue about the face. Nabiki stared at her incredulously, while her sisters collapsed in laughter and even her parents were snickering. John was shaking his head slowly, grinning, having apparently come across this behaviour before.

As Hana was about to start speaking again, the middle Tendo held up her hand, causing the young woman to stop and look at her. "OK. Hold it." There was a pause, although Hana still obviously had more questions. "Right. I ran across Yori when I was visiting friends, and just asked her. I met them as a result of a family problem. They sometimes come to Nerima to say hello. I couldn't tell you even if I did know, it would be betraying a trust. Yes, I've met a few other through them, and walking around in Minato, there are lots there. Possibly. My sister Akane is the one who collects it. Yes, very. Also yes. Yes, there are quite a few in Minato." She thought back, then nodded, while everyone stared at her. "I think that's all of them."

Miki collapsed laughing again as Nabiki looked smugly at her. "Not bad," her boyfriend said, chuckling. Kimiko was looking between Hana, who looked both fascinated and stunned, and Nabiki, who was waiting to see what happened.

"You may have met your match, dear," Umeko laughed, finishing her soup. Hana looked at her mother, then back at their guest.

"Oh, that reminds me," the middle sister said, snapping her fingers, then reaching into her pocket. She removed a folded piece of paper and handed it to Miki, who reached across the table and accepted it. "I meant to give you this." Her friend unfolded it, both her sisters watching curiously, looked at it, then at the Tendo woman, her eyes widening. "You said you wanted it. She was in Minato with Yori last week when I was as well, I bumped into Yori and she said hello..." Nabiki shrugged, smiling a little. "One thing led to another."

Hana got up, walked around behind her sister, then read the paper. A twitch developed in her cheek, which inwardly amused several of the people around the table. Her mouth opened but nothing more than a faint hiss came out of it at first, until she swallowed and tried again. "Azumi Ito!?" She grabbed for the paper, Miki quickly holding it out of range with a possessive snarl. "Let me see it, Miki!"

"Get your own, Hana! This is mine!" Seconds later the two sisters were bickering frantically. Kimiko watched, giggling furiously, while Umeko sighed gently and her husband snickered.

"Thank you, Nabiki. So very much."

"You're welcome, of course, Umeko," the middle sister replied, grinning. She exchanged a glance with John, who rolled his eyes, watched his girlfriend argue with her sister for a moment, then went back to eating his soup, shaking his head sadly.

Eventually Miki fended Hana off long enough that she was able to stuff the paper into her pocket, looking satisfied. The older sister glared at her, then her younger sister who was still laughing, before sitting down again with her arms crossed and muttering to herself. Everyone watched her for a moment. Grinning, Nabiki said, "Hey, Hana?"

"What?" the other woman muttered, looking annoyed. The middle sister held up another piece of paper.

"I got you one as well," she said, "Miki mentioned you were vaguely interested in magical girls." Hana's eyes widened comically and she reached across the table fast enough to make Nabiki blink a few times, snatchting the folded paper away and staring at it in happy disbelief. Her parents sighed, looking at each other.

"What do we say when someone does something nice for us, Hana?" Umeko asked pointedly, which made Miki and Kimiko giggle. Hana flushed.

"Sorry. Thank you, Nabiki. It was very nice of you." She looked embarrassed. Her mother nodded her satisfaction.

"Good. For heaven's sake, you're twenty-six years old, not five, dear. Be more mature, please." Hana looked even more embarrassed and hung her head.

"Sorry, Mom." She looked at her sister, who grinned at her. "Sorry, Miki."

"God, sis, you're much worse than I am," Miki put in, picking up her spoon again and quickly finishing the remains of her soup. "Thanks, Nabiki, that was a nice thing to do. Sorry about all that."

"No problem," the middle Tendo replied, amused. "It was fun to watch, I have to admit."

"You only have to witness it once," Umeko said, sighing just a little as she looked fondly but with a certain amount of exasperation at her daughters, who exchanged a guilty glance then busied themselves with the meal. "We see it far too often."

"Sorry, mom," two voices chorused, accompanied by a muted snicker from the youngest girl, who was looking very amused at seeing her older sisters make idiots of themselves. Nabiki looked at her for a second, being rewarded with a pleased grin and a little nod. She nodded back, also smiling, while opening a com channel to Ranma and Kasumi just for fun.

"It was fairly impressive over only a signature," she agreed. "I'm surprised about all the fuss, especially about a magical girl as new as Azumi. She's been active for less than a year so far."

Hana stared at her in shock. "But she's amazing! All accounts say she's beautiful, and really cool, and she's one of Yori's friends. That's a real statement of how good she is, you know, Yori and Chou are the best there are." Now feeling embarrassed herself, yet oddly pleased, Nabiki merely nodded a little. Ranma was laughing inside her head, as was her sister.

'Shut up, you two.'

"I wouldn't say beautiful myself, but I'd agree she looks fairly distinctive, as far as I can remember. And yes, I'm aware how good Yori is, I keep hearing it from all sorts of people, they won't shut up about it." She shrugged a bit. "She seems pretty normal for the most part, aside from the magical and martial arts abilities. I've heard her table manners can leave a little to be desired, though."

'Hey!'

'It's true, dear.' Kasumi sounded very amused. There was indistinct mumbling from her husband, making her giggle. Nabiki was having trouble keeping a straight face. Hana kept extolling the virtues of both Azumi and Yori for long enough that she was beginning to regret bringing the subject up. Miki glanced at her, grinning, making her shrug again and shake her head.

"By the sounds of it, you're a fan," she finally said dryly. Miki's sister nodded rapidly.

"I am. I've got recordings of every news segment any of them have been mentioned in, copies of all the newspaper articles, printouts of every website I can find..." The young woman looked pleased. "And now I've got Azumi's signature. That's going in the scrapbook right away."
"After lunch, Hana." Umeko gazed at her eldest daughter, who dipped her head.

"OK, mom."

Kimiko laughed, shaking her head. "You and Miki are such fangirls."

"I'm nowhere near as bad as she is," Miki protested.

"Not quite. But your collection is pretty big as well." The younger sister looked amused as Miki blushed, turning to Nabiki. "You should see it. She's got all sorts of photos of at least a dozen magical girls, aside from Yori and her friends, two other signatures she paid way too much for on the internet, and lots of other stuff." Miki was staring at her plate, red-faced. Ranma and Kasumi laughed again.

'Definitely invite her to the party, sister, it sounds like she'd very much like it,' Kasumi told her, before signing off.

"Hana still has a lot more stuff," Miki mumbled, grabbing her glass of apple juice and drinking from it to cover her embarrassment. Kimiko nodded happily.

"True. You're both nuts."

Both older sisters glared at the youngest one, who looked back unrepentantly. Nabiki laughed, as did John. The two older people were watching with amusement, but said nothing. "I thought Akane, my younger sister was bad, but you two..." The middle Tendo grinned as the glares transferred to her. "Pity I don't have any Yori or Chou action figures left."

Hana went motionless, staring at her in shock, pale-faced, and even Miki looked startled. "You... had some of the Yori dolls...?" the eldest Sano sister finally managed to gasp, looking like she was about to faint. Nabiki held up two fingers.

"And two Chou ones. A friend got them for me, I gave them to my sister and a friend of the family who are both into magical girl things for Christmas last year. They seemed to like them." Hana stared for a moment longer, then closed her eyes momentarily and swallowed hard.

"Do you have any idea how rare those are? They're the ultimate collectible. Almost priceless." She looked like she was about to faint. "And you had two sets?"

"Yep." She grinned. "Like I said, a friend gave them to me. I didn't want them, but I knew Akane would, so..." She shrugged. Hana stared at her as if she doubted the other woman's sanity.

"I'd give my left kidney for even one of them," she finally mumbled, looking incredibly envious. After a moment she seemed to get an idea. "Hey, think your sister might want to sell one?" she asked casually.

Finishing the next dish, Nabiki put her chopsticks down for the moment. "I doubt it, she seems quite fond of them. She plays with them every now and then."

"She opened the box!?" Hana shrieked, aghast, going purple. Umeko winced and sighed.

"Please try not to get so high-pitched, dear, the dog next door will start barking again," Hana's mother said, looking at Nabiki with a raised eyebrow. "Perhaps you should stop teasing my daughters, Nabiki, they seem to be getting overwrought." Indeed, Miki was looking amazed, while Hana was quietly hyperventilating on the other side of the table. Kimiko had stopped eating and was watching with great enjoyment. John nudged his girlfriend.
"Hey, you OK, Miki?" he asked. The young woman slowly looked at him, then back to her friend.

"I think so," she eventually replied, staring hard at Nabiki, who grinned back. "But I also think my good friend has been holding out on me. Again. How the hell did you get Yori and Chou action figures, Nabiki? The company that started making them was shut down almost immediately, before any of them went on sale. I heard that they only made about two dozen or so, nearly all of which were confiscated, some sort of licensing thing that their lawyers dealt with. There can't be more than two or three sets that have ever been released to the public."

"That's the story I was told, yes," the middle Tendo replied, sipping her own drink, as Umeko and her husband cleared away the now-finished dishes, returning with dessert of ice cream and fruit salad. "It was a sort of a once in a lifetime offer via my friend. She had some form of contact with the lawyers, ended up with a number of the things she couldn't legally sell, and gave me a couple." She looked at the two sisters who were hanging on her every word. "It may just be possible that there might be a set left. Would you like me to ask? I can't guarantee anything, but..."

The speed with which they both started nodding frantically made her laugh, and also wince a little in fear for their spines. "Please, Nabiki, please ask. I'll do anything you want," Hana yelped, almost diving across the table. Miki wasn't far behind her in enthusiasm.

"Calm down. When I go back to Minato next time I'll talk to her." She snickered as they both sat back down again, gazing at her with anticipation and raw desire. It was slightly unnerving. Kimiko, beside Hana, sighed a little, shaking her head.

"Strange, strange people," she muttered. "Hey, Mom? Are you sure I wasn't adopted? Or were they?" The younger sister grinned as both older ones shot her an annoyed look. Umeko giggled a little, eating her dessert and listening with amusement.

"All three of you are my true-blooded daughters, even with the insanity that obviously runs deep in at least two of you," she said calmly. "I have no idea where it comes from. Everyone on my side of the family is perfectly sane." She glanced at her husband, who was listening quietly, enjoying the whole situation judging by his expression. "It must be from your side, dear. Didn't you have a great-uncle who used to take a goat for a walk every morning?"

"It was a pig, a very large one, and opinion is divided on who took who for a walk," Harue responded with dignity, although the corners of his mouth were twitching. "But that wasn't evidence of insanity, merely slight eccentricity. Both on his part and that of the pig." Umeko fell about laughing as he smiled. All three of their daughters watched with identical expressions of mild exasperation, before going back to finishing their lunch.

When they finally finished the meal, which was at least an hour after it should have ended due to all the interruptions, Nabiki helped carry some of the dishes into the kitchen beside Miki and John. "So, do you want to come to the party next weekend, Miki?" she asked. "You never gave me an answer."

"Of course I want to come, Nabiki," her friend replied as if she thought the question was inane. "When is it? Who will be there?"

"It will start about ten AM on Saturday, but it's not that important. I'd think people will be wandering in and out most of the day. That's what happened the last time Auntie Nodoka had a party a couple of years ago. It's the entire family, some friends, the jeweller Akane works for and his wife, a couple of neighbours, a few other people, then Yori and her friends as well."

"Is Azumi going to be there, do you know?" Miki asked her eagerly. Nabiki shook her head.
"As far as I know she couldn't make it for various reasons."

"Pity. I still want to meet her," her friend said sadly. She brightened up after a moment. "Oh well, she mainly works around Setagaya, so maybe I'll meet her at university. She's been seen there several times."

"You never know," the middle sister replied, smiling to herself.

"So, what are we going to do for the rest of the afternoon?" John asked as they went back into the living room and sat down. "We could see a movie, I suppose, there's several playing at the moment that look watchable. Or do the tourism thing again. I liked the view from up on the port tower, there's the parks and museums of course, or we could go up in the mountains."

"We can do the mountains tomorrow or the next day," Miki said thoughtfully. "You really need the entire day for it and it's nearly half past two now. I'm up for a movie later, though. How about you, Nabiki?" The middle sister nodded, smiling.

"That sounds good, I haven't been to the movies since we went that last time. Why don't we just walk into the city and you can show me around? I've never been to Kobe before."

"Yep, we can do that. Hey, perhaps we should go to that big arcade, you remember we walked past it a couple of days ago, John?" Miki looked excited for a moment. "I haven't been into a games place for years."

"Neither have I," Nabiki admitted. She grinned a little. "Akane was really into them for a while, she loved those mole-smacking games with the hammer, but she got banned from the local one when she got overenthusiastic and hit it a bit too hard. There wasn't a lot left of it at that point. The arcade owner wasn't too happy about that." Miki and John both stared for a second then laughed.

"Really? Wow, how strong is she?"

"Strong enough to pick up a car and throw it quite a distance," Nabiki replied, amused at the look of shock on their faces. "Most of the Neriman martial artists are ridiculously strong, although my sister is impressive even in those terms."

"Holy crap," John muttered, wide-eyed, "that's amazing. Does she throw a lot of cars?"

"Not any more. The medical problem she had was responsible for a lot of that." She smiled at the thought of her sister, "She's improved so much over the last year or so none of us can really believe it, her most of all, but we're all very pleased and grateful. She's learned a lot from some Chinese friends as well, it's brought her martial arts skills up to an amazing level." Nabiki got up as Miki indicated the door, John following, and kept talking. "Yori gave her a nice birthday present as well, because she really earned it."

"What's that?" her friend asked, looking very curious and interested. They put their shoes on and left the house, walking slowly towards the more commercial area that could be seen in the distance over the houses.

"A career, basically," Nabiki laughed. The other two exchanged glances, looking puzzled, so she explained.

"Unbelievable," Miki exclaimed when she finished the basic story. "So when are we going to see her in a movie?" The middle Tendo shrugged.

"I'm not sure, but she left this morning for LA for a few days to do some training with Shampoo, then some practice stunts and screen tests. The director, Adrian, seems to think she'll be working pretty soon, probably sometime around just after the New Year, from what I know."

"Rich, famous, and a Hollywood star," Miki mused, grinning at John. "We made friends with the wrong Tendo sister."

Her boyfriend chuckled as Nabiki put on a mock-insulted expression. "I quite like this one, even if she's not in the movies," he replied calmly, patting the relevant Tendo sister on the head. She smirked at Miki, putting her arm over his shoulders.

"See? Your boyfriend knows quality in women when he sees it."

"Of course he does," Miki replied, a contented look on her face. "That's why I allowed him to be my boyfriend." All three of them burst out laughing, heading into the city, talking and joking and generally enjoying the day.

"We could go swimming tomorrow," Miki suggested as they walked down a commercial street somewhat further into the centre of Kobe, having taken a train for a few stations down the line. The area was quite busy, lots of people wandering around and enjoying themselves, although not as hectic as some places in Tokyo got. "There's a very nice pool a few kilometres from home, it's part of a sports centre. I used to go there a lot when I lived here and I still do when I'm back from university."

"That sounds like a good idea," Nabiki replied, "I love swimming." 'But I probably can't do it the way I normally do nowadays,' she mused to herself, internally grinning. 'A mermaid in the pool might be just the tiniest bit suspicious.'

"I like it as well," John added. "I'm up for it."

"OK. That's the morning sorted out then." Miki looked satisfied. "Now, what to do in the afternoon...?"

"We don't have to go and do all sorts of special activities, you know, Miki," the middle sister laughed. "We could just hang around your house and talk in the garden or something."

"That's no fun," the other woman pouted. "I have my boyfriend and my friend here in my home town, we need to do exciting things." Nabiki shared a glance with John, on the girl's other side, both of them grinning. "I know," Miki exclaimed after some thought. "There's a really good go-kart track a friend of mine told me about that's fairly close. We could go and check that out."

"I haven't been go-karting for years," the Tendo woman replied, laughing. "But it might be fun."

"There's a paintball place as well, I think," Miki thought out loud, looking like she was trying to remember. "I'm sure I've seen adverts for it. I've never been paintballing before. We could do that instead, or as well."

"It stings a lot," John commented. "It's fun, but expensive fun. I think prices here in Japan are even higher than they were back in the UK and it was pretty expensive there. I went a few times with friends. Did pretty well, I think."

"So do you want to try it if we can find the place?" his girlfriend asked, looking up at him.

"I'm up for that as well," he agreed good-naturedly.
"OK. Let's see if we can work both of those in. Oh, hang on." She stopped dead in front of the window display for a shop, looking with wide eyes at a blue silk dress on a mannequin. "Ooh, that's nice. I want to go in here." Dragging her boyfriend behind her, she vanished into the shop fast enough to make John yelp and Nabiki blink a few times, before grinning and following. She had a look in the window as she went past and agreed that the dress was nice, although it wasn't her style. The blouse next to it though... That had possibilities.

"Three hours? How the hell can a woman spend three hours in one shop buying one dress?" John stared at his girlfriend, who giggled back, possessively clutching a bag containing the item in question.

"It's a really nice dress. I had to be sure it fitted right and looked good on me." She gazed at him. "You think it looks good on me, don't you? It doesn't make me look fat or something?" He froze at the apparently innocent question, before glancing at Nabiki, who grinned.

"I'm sensing a trap," he muttered.

"Good senses," she replied, laughing. Looking worried he tried to think of the right answer.

"It's... It brings out the colour in your eyes?" he tried cautiously.

She stared for a moment, then looked at Nabiki. The Tendo woman shrugged with a small smile. "It's a safe answer, I guess," she said. Miki giggled and nodded.

"I'll let you off, then," the other woman told her boyfriend, who looked relieved.

Watching them, the middle sister was amused. They seemed to really care for each other, this sort of teasing being proof of a pretty solid relationship in her eyes, which made her happy. She hefted the bag she was holding which contained not only the blouse she'd spotted but two of its friends, both of which had called out to her as being stylish and in a nice colour. Overall, she was quite pleased.

"Oh, look, there's that games arcade I was talking about," Miki suddenly said, pointing to an establishment some distance away on the other side of the street, lots of blinking lights apparent from within. A number of young people were hanging around outside in the early evening air, one or two of them smoking, while a lot more people of all ages were going in and out. They could faintly hear all manner of electronic sounds and music coming from the place even at this distance. "It's bigger than I remembered it. Let's go and see what's there."

The other two being agreeable to this idea, they crossed the street and wandered over to the arcade, looking inside. It was fairly busy, many games machines ranging from driving simulators through shooting games to dance ones filling the large space, with the more popular games nearer the front. Entering, one of the youths, around sixteen or seventeen and apparently fancying himself as something of a dangerous individual, indolently blocked half the doorway they were heading for while smoking a cigarette, giving them a fairly small amount of space to pass by. As John tried to squeeze past the young man, apparently accidentally, turned and managed to push him sideways, causing him to sigh loudly.

Turning back the young man glared at him, as if he was looking for an excuse for some form of altercation. Nabiki could feel he was considerably more aggressive than seemed appropriate, she thought he was probably one of those people who got into fights for fun, but not with any real skill like Ranma, or even Ryoga, just street brawling.
Stepping back John looked at him, shook his head sadly, then turned aside to go through the other door, which was closed. As he reached for it, behind him, the youth stepped forward, his mouth opening to deliver what was no doubt a tour de force of witty repartee. Slipping between John, who didn't notice, and the young man, Nabiki fixed him with one of her coldest glares, allowing a certain amount of power to leak out in her eyes. He froze, staring fixedly into her face, swallowed a little, then turned away as if that had been his intent all along. Satisfied and slightly amused, Nabiki followed John and Miki inside, feeling the young man watching her for a moment before going back to being a truculent doorstop.

Inside, they looked around for a few seconds. The noise of all the machines was considerable, merging together into a dull cacophony with one or two individual machines standing out as they were played. "So, what do you want to try first?" John said loudly into Miki's ear, trying to be heard over the racket. She shrugged.

"No idea," she replied, equally loudly, "Like I said, I haven't been in one of these places for years.
Let's get a lot of coins and just try some machines."

"OK." They headed for the change booth, shortly coming away with a large quantity of low denomination coinage. Nabiki followed as her two friends looked around for a few seconds, John finally pointing to an elaborate racing game which had eight seats apparently linked together for multi-person play. "How about Daytona?" he asked. "I've played that one in the UK, it's been out for a few years, but it's pretty good. We can all race on the same track."

"Looks good," Miki yelled as one of the nearby shooting games was used, the volume of it almost painful. The trio quickly moved to their chosen game and away from the overly-loud machine they'd been standing beside. As soon as three seats became available next to each other as the current game finished, they quickly grabbed them, feeding fifty yen coins into the machine, then each pressing start.

Shortly they were enjoying the virtual race, Nabiki and John soon finding themselves far past the other six players, which seemed to annoy Miki, who was desperately trying to keep up. Yanking the steering wheel frantically and stomping on the pedals she muttered to herself as she slid the car into the wall, then bounced off into another player, who screeched in fury.

Glancing at her friend, Nabiki grinned at the expression of concentration on her face. She herself was finding the game amusing, although not surprisingly, not all that difficult. Her reflexes were so much faster than most peoples by now that she was actually having to deliberately drive less well than she could so as to not stick out too much. That said, John was doing extremely well, so she couldn't back off too far. He was much better than anyone else playing.

They crossed the finish line neck and neck, the other players coming in one after another behind them, Miki achieving fourth place, which seemed to both satisfy her and annoy her in equal measure. Turning her head she fixed her boyfriend with a steely glare. "You deliberately picked a game you knew you could do well on, didn't you?" she asked, her voice hard. He grinned unrepentantly.

"Of course I did. Do I look like an idiot? Who picks a game they know they'll do badly at?"

Staring at him for a few seconds longer, the young woman finally began laughing. "Fair enough, I guess."

"Another race, or shall we try something different?" he asked the two women.

"We can come back to this one later. I want to try something different," Miki said, getting out of the seat and relinquishing it to a girl of about ten who jumped in, barely able to reach the pedals. Both the others followed her as she walked around for a little while, ending up watching a pair of young men in their mid teens playing a game that seemed to be a cross between classic Space Invaders and a player piano. "Weird," she commented. "What's the idea behind this game?"

A girl the same age as the two boys overheard, turning to look at the older woman and her friends. "You have to hit the buttons that fire at the falling things there, you see," she pointed, "and each one plays a note. It ends up playing music. Every time you finish a level the next one gets faster. The high levels are insanely quick but if you can keep up it sounds and looks amazing." Indeed, the two players competing on the machine were obviously very practised at the game, hitting buttons individually and in complex combinations that were producing some interesting visuals and a not entirely bad rendition of various classical music.

Watching for a moment, Miki laughed. "OK, I want to try this," she said, "it looks really silly and fun." When the player on the left won the match, both boys stepped back, rubbing their wrists, allowing her to move in front of the controls. She studied them for a few seconds, read the instructions, nodded to herself, then fed coins in and hit start.

Her first game lasted only seconds until she hit the wrong button, producing an unpleasant sound and a scowl. She trying again, frowning with concentration, while John and Nabiki watched with amusement, once more failing quickly.

"This is harder than it looks," she said over her shoulder, smiling a little, then turned back to the game with a determined expression. It took a significant quantity of coins but after twenty minutes she was clearing the first dozen levels without too much difficulty, causing her to look pleased. Watching, Nabiki grinned as her friend got into the game, smacking the large brightly coloured buttons faster and faster. John was standing beside her, watching closely, looking both amused and proud.

Despite her best efforts, she couldn't get past level sixteen, which seemed to irritate her. One of the two teenagers who had been playing when they'd arrived, both of whom were watching along with their female friend, snorted at the third failure, moving to the second player position and inserting some coins. "This is how you do it," he commented without looking at Miki, slapping the buttons rapidly and progressing steadily through the levels. Miki gritted her teeth as he went past her high score without apparent effort, quickly glancing to the side when she had a break in the pattern, then trying even harder. Once again she missed her cue, almost all the way through the level, making her shake her head angrily and mumble something.

The teenager laughed, still playing. "Women don't have the speed or reflexes for this sort of game," he remarked, causing Miki to glare at him, along with the young woman who was with his friend, both of them watching him play the machine. Nabiki studied him for a moment, mildly irritated by the comment, but not enough to say anything. It was stupid but fairly innocuous.

By now quite annoyed, both by her failure and the comment, Miki took a deep breath, flexed her hands, then dropped some more coins in. John by her side, she pressed the start button and began another game.

When she managed to clear level sixteen this time, she smiled widely, new confidence carrying her through the next three levels with her hands moving at impressive speed. The young man noticed, beginning to throw out comments belittling female gaming ability in an apparent attempt to put her off her new-found stride. His female friend was looking very annoyed, almost as much as Miki was, shaking her head as he said something particularly offensive. Unfortunately it made Nabiki's friend twitch, throwing her timing off just enough that she missed again.
"Damn it!" the young woman yelled, watching her game abruptly end. Turning to the boy she snarled, "You're a mouthy little bastard, aren't you?" He grinned sideways at her for a second, before clearing his level with a flourish.

"Like I said, girls aren't really suited for this sort of thing, they're too easily distracted. Letting a little joke like that throw you off..." He winced as his friend punched him in the arm, which caused him to fail the level as well, albeit with a very respectable score, high enough to go in the high-score table. Punching in his initials he stepped back, grinning and rubbing his arm. "Thanks a lot, Chiasa. That really hurt."

"You deserved it, Kyo, you were saying some really stupid things," she grumbled, "Girls are just as good as boys at games. You just wasted so much time on this stupid machine it's no wonder you're better. How much money have you dumped into this thing in the last two months?" He flushed a little, the comment apparently hitting a little close to the bone.

"None of your business. Anyway, you're wrong, girls aren't fast enough. Boys are quicker and have better hand-eye coordination."

"Oh, that's total crap and you know it," Chiasa shot back, putting her hands on her hips and staring at him eye to eye.

Amused, Nabiki exchanged glances with Miki and John, who were watching and listening, her friend beginning to smile as the young woman told Kyo off. She had a considerable vocabulary as it turned out. Eventually, looking quite angry and red, he shouted, "I bet you I could beat any girl in here on this thing or any other game. Boys are quicker!"

Nabiki raised an eyebrow. 'I really shouldn't do this,' she thought to herself, but couldn't resist. Tapping Kyo on the shoulder she watched as he whirled around. "How much?"

"What?" he sputtered, not understanding the question. She clarified it for him.

"How much do you bet you could beat any woman in here?"

"What are you talking about?" he asked, looking puzzled. Beside him, Chiasa and his unnamed friend also looked confused.

"You stated that you could beat any woman in this establishment on any game including this one and put it in the form of a wager. I am a woman and I'm curious to know how much you're willing to bet on your predicted outcome," she explained, allowing a certain amount of her inner Ms Aoyama to come out. Miki looked at her, as did John, then they exchanged a look. The young man in front of her shrugged after staring for a few seconds.

"Five thousand Yen," he said, obviously pulling the figure out of thin air.

"Hmm. Barely worth it, but all right." Nabiki gave him a shark-like grin, pulling her wallet out of her pocket, and producing five one-thousand Yen notes so fast it left him blinking. "I accept the bet." She handed the notes to Chiasa, who stared at them, then her, before grinning as well. "As the challenged party I pick this game right here."

Kyo stared, pretty clearly not having expected this. Chiasa nudged him, rather hard. "Come on. Give me your five thousand," she said, looking very amused. He transferred his stare to her, but eventually and rather reluctantly pulled out his own wallet, managing to scrape up the relevant sum which he handed over.

"All right, then." Nabiki turned to the game, putting coins in. She glanced at Miki, who was... grinning. "How do you play it again?" she asked. Miki's grin vanished suddenly. Laughing, she pressed the start button as her opponent did the same.

Fifteen levels in she glanced at Kyo, who was grimly hammering buttons, smirking to herself. 'This isn't really fair but he kind of asked for it,' she remarked to Jun.

#The young man did seem to be somewhat overstating his case.# the machine replied, obviously amused. #I'm afraid he doesn't stand much chance, though. Your reflexes are so superior to most people's this game will not present much challenge even at the highest speed.#

'Very true,' she chuckled, clearing level nineteen. 'The only problem is going slowly enough that it doesn't look too suspicious.'

#Miki and John both seem impressed.# Jun paused, then added, #In addition you appear to be drawing a crowd.# She could feel a number of people watching from behind her, proving the SI was correct.

'Probably doesn't matter.' She cleared level twenty-one, Kyo looking away for a moment with wide eyes, then going back to frantically hammering buttons. He was, aside from being somewhat chauvinistic, nearly as good as she thought he was, she decided. Much faster than the vast majority of people could manage. Miki didn't stand a chance of beating him, or even really coming close, all the practice that Chiasa had alluded to was clearly paying off. Even so, he was beginning to sweat.

#Do you intend to just beat him, or keep going to prove a point?# Jun asked, sounding curious.

'Don't know yet,' she replied offhandedly. 'Let's see how far he can manage to get.'

In the end, in fact, he made it to level thirty-two, which ran at a speed that was just ridiculous. When he finally missed a button the poor young man almost looked relieved he was sweating so hard from the exertion. Leaning on the console for a moment he shook his head then straightened up, apparently only then noticing that Nabiki was still going, not looking particularly stressed. He gaped as her hands moved over the buttons more and more rapidly, level after level falling before her, until the machine finally stopped with a fanfare.

Gaping at the screen he stared in disbelief. "Level fifty?!" he squeaked hoarsely. "I didn't know it went that high." The middle sister smiled to herself as she entered her initials, which went in right at the top of the high score table with a totally silly difference between her score and the next one down.

"That was fun," she remarked, turning around and accepting the handful of cash Chiasa handed over somewhat numbly. "Would you like to try winning it back?"

Paling a little and flexing his hands, he shook his head silently. "Oh, well. Thanks for the game."

Nabiki looked around at the crowd of close to thirty people who were staring at her in amazed, respectful silence and winced a little. Perhaps she'd overdone it?

"Holy crap, Nabiki, that was unbelievable," Miki breathed, almost inaudible over the background noise. "How many times have you played this game to get that good?"

"This was my first time," she admitted, smiling at the look of shock her friends gave her. "It's fun, but I can't see spending too much money on it." Glancing at her watch which she was wearing for appearance's sake, she added, "Oh, look, that movie we were talking about is in forty minutes. Do we have time to get to the cinema?" She held up her winnings, grinning. "It's on me."
"Martial Arts arcade game playing, it has to be," John said, picking up a tiger shrimp with his chopstick and popping it into his mouth. "Some weird Neriman thing you learned, right?" Nabiki shook her head, smiling a little. They were in a sushi restaurant near the cinema having enjoyed the movie, even though both her friends had been more silent than normal, apparently thinking about her thrashing of the young man earlier. She was wondering again if she'd been a little too effective at proving his point wasn't valid. Mentally shrugging she took a shrimp of her own. It was too late now.

"No, I've just got pretty quick reflexes and a good eye for that sort of thing. Plus I got lucky, I think, I didn't make any serious mistakes."

"You didn't make any mistakes from what I saw," he replied, shaking his head.

"Really lucky, then." She grinned and shrugged. Picking up her glass of beer she sipped it, before looking for some more shrimp.

He stared at her for a few seconds. "You're a strange person, Nabiki Tendo," the young man finally said, grinning back. "That was very funny even if I can't work out how the hell you managed it."

"Poor Kyo looked like you'd killed and eaten his dog in front of him," Miki giggled, nibbling a salmon roll. "Thanks. He was annoying me a lot at the end. And his friend. She looked pretty amazed as well."

"Offering him a chance to win it back was just cruel, though," John chuckled. "He knew damn well he didn't stand a chance."

"You shouldn't go around offering bets like that if you're not reasonably sure of the outcome," she replied calmly. "The first rule in bookmaking is to do your research. I was a complete unknown, he had no idea of my possible skill level, or that of any other woman in there for that matter, so it was a silly bet to make." She shrugged, reaching for a plate of squid. "Anyway, he didn't have to accept the bet in the first place."

John studied her closely. "You've done this sort of thing before, haven't you?" he asked suspiciously. "You seem to know an awful lot about betting."

"Might have," she commented, her eyes twinkling.

"A woman with an interesting past," he mused. She laughed.

"I got up to all sorts of things when I was younger. I might tell you one day. Enough of my magnificent victory over the forces of sexism, what did you two think of the movie?"

Amused, Miki and her boyfriend accepted the change of subject and soon all three of them were discussing the latest block-buster they’d paid far too much to see.

"So, Nabiki, what other interests than business studies and economic theory do you have?" Umeko asked, handing the middle sister a glass of wine, which she accepted with a smile. She, along with Miki’s family and John, were sitting in the living room having just arrived back fairly late from their trip into the city. They'd found Miki's parents sitting and relaxing, talking to Hana, Kimiko coming down from her room a few minutes after they arrived.

She shrugged a little. "I enjoy swimming, travelling, photography, things like that," she replied, trying the wine, which was excellent. "But the business side of things is what I've been interested in since I was young. My goals have shifted a bit since I started my degree but I'm still intent of finishing it with as good a grade as I can manage."

"What do you intend to do when you graduate?" Miki's father asked curiously. She glanced at him.

"A friend suggested forensic accountancy a while ago, which I'd never heard of, but having looked into it, it looks quite interesting. That's a possible career path." Sipping some more wine while he nodded, she added, "I'm honestly not sure right now, though. Various things in my life over the last couple of years have opened up different possibilities, ones I'm still looking into. I'm going to have to think about it for a while."

"She'll be damn good at whatever she tries," Miki commented, lowering her own wine glass from her mouth while smiling. "She's pretty much top of every class we share and as far as I know, the ones we don't."

Slightly embarrassed, Nabiki nodded a little. "I do seem to be doing quite well. But Miki is only just behind me, to be honest. She's going to get very good marks as well." Her friend looked pleased at the praise, as did her parents.

"It's nice to know that from an outside source," Harue remarked, looking mildly amused. "It's always difficult to be completely sure her own self-assessment is accurate." Miki frowned while her sisters laughed. Putting his arm around his girlfriend John grinned at her.

"I know how well you're doing," he said in a conspiratorial tone of voice. "Pay no attention to the old people."

Seeming a little offended, Harue retorted, "Old? I'm barely forty-eight and three quarters!" His wife burst out laughing as he looked proud, his daughters all doing the same. "Anyway, I'm not getting older, I'm gaining experience."

"I suppose that's one way of looking at it," Nabiki chuckled. "I have to admit, I know some extremely... experienced... people, and they seem perfectly happy about life. It makes me much less worried about time passing by."

Harue looked interested, so she added, "The Amazon Elder who has been teaching my sister for the last year or so has something like three hundred years of 'experience'." She grinned as everyone else gaped. This led to a long discussion of Akane and Shampoo, Amazons, and Neriman life in general. When she finally stopped over an hour later, refilling her wineglass and sipping a little, she watched as everyone stared at her for a moment silently.

"Nerima really is as weird as I've heard," Miki mumbled, shaking her head.

"Probably weirder," the middle Tendo agreed cheerfully. "It's an experience, certainly."

"That's one way to put it," Umeko remarked, still looking oddly at their visitor. "I'm somewhat surprised you're as normal as you are with that sort of history and background."

"She's not actually normal, for most definitions of that word," John snickered, making Nabiki grin at him. "I mean, you should have seen what she did in the arcade earlier." He explained, causing Umeko, Harue, and their daughters to collapse laughing wildly.

"Oh, that's fantastic, Nabiki," Kimiko giggled, wiping tears of hilarity from her eyes. "I wish I'd seen it."

"It was kind of funny I have to admit," she replied, finishing her wine and putting the glass down beside the sofa out of the way. "I may have got carried away, it probably wasn't necessary to go quite that far, but at the time it seemed appropriate. "I don't think young Kyo will be quite so fast to assert male superiority in future. At least in the form of a wager." Kimiko started laughing again.

"So, what do you all do?" the middle sister asked curiously, looking around. "I've been talking for hours about me and my family. I'd like to learn more about yours." She indicated Miki who was leaning comfortably against John, both of them looking pleasantly relaxed and smiling. "I know about these two, of course, but I don't know much about the rest of you. Except that Hana has an unnatural liking for magical girls, of course." She grinned as Hana flushed, her sisters looking at her with amusement.

Umeko laughed for a moment. "That's true. All right, I'm a horticulturist by training, although I'm not currently working in the field."

"Ah, I might have guessed from the garden. It's very impressive."

"Thank you." The elder Sano woman smiled, pleased. "It's been a lot of work to get it to that state but I'm rather happy about the results. I've won a couple of local awards for gardening in the last two years, which was nice."

"I was in the Maritime Safety Agency for twenty years," Harue explained, when his wife stopped talking. "The last six were in Search and Rescue. I made it to first grade officer before the accident." He tapped his left leg. "Broke it in three places. It never healed quite right, so I ended up with the limp. I took early retirement because I couldn't really keep up with the younger men after that, it hurt too much." He sighed a little. "Stupid thing, really, a faulty winch snapped while we were grappling a sinking trawler, the capstan got pulled over the side, I wasn't quite fast enough to get out of the way..."

Umeko put her hand on his. "You were lucky your men were so well trained, dear, they pulled you out of the water before anything worse happened."

"True. I trained them well," he grinned. "I'm proud of them. It was painful, both when it happened, and leaving the Agency afterwards. But, life goes on." Shrug, he smiled at Nabiki. "It could have been a lot worse, I suppose. Anyway, I took a year or two to think about things, then ended up working as a safety consultant for one of the larger shipping companies. Uses my skills, you see, and pays a lot better than the Agency. Although I do miss jumping out of helicopters." She laughed, as did the others.

"I expect that the excitement of such things is hard to forget," the middle sister commented. He nodded, grinning again.

"Oh, believe me, yes. Excitement, terror, you could call it either one quite accurately. Whatever, you tend to remember it." Finishing his own wine, he added, "But I enjoy my work now and it gives me more time at home."

Nodding to herself, Nabiki looked at Kimiko and Hana, who had been listening to their father with slight smiles. "What about you two? I know you're a professional magical girl memorabilia collector, Hana, but do you have any hobbies?" She snickered as the older Sano sister looked mildly irritated, both her sisters immediately laughing.

"She's worked you out, Hana," Kimiko giggled, looking very amused.

"Actually, I work in a rare book store," the elder sister retorted with dignity, glaring at her sister for a moment. "I have a degree in European literature and another one in Ancient Chinese art."

"It pays surprisingly well and uses quite a lot of my knowledge. I enjoy it and it gives me experience for later. I'll probably stay at it for a couple of years, then look for something slightly different, but at the moment I'm having fun."

Smiling a little, Nabiki nodded. "I can understand that. It's a good thing when you find something you're both good at and enjoy doing. Being paid to do it is a bonus."

"That's for sure," the other woman agreed. She smiled for a second or two. "The magical girl thing is a hobby but a fun one as well."

"It's an obsession, Hana," Kimiko said wryly. Her sister shrugged, not denying the accusation but not confirming it either. The youngest Sano looked at Nabiki with a small smile of her own. "She writes magical girl fan fiction, you know," she confided, making Hana go bright red and lunge for her. Evading the older sister Kimiko laughed. "Some of it is almost good. You should see the thing she wrote about that Yori girl the other week. It was hysterical..." Hana managed to grab her and push her to the carpet, her hand over her sister's mouth, looking horribly embarrassed.

"Shut up!" she hissed into her sister's ear. Kimiko didn't stop grinning.

Miki was heaving with laughter while their parents were looking like this was a rather regular occurrence, sighing a little but otherwise ignoring the minor tussle on the floor. "Fan fiction?" Nabiki repeated with a grin.

Kimiko nodded, unable to speak, while Miki followed suit. "I know. It's ridiculous. What adult would waste their time with that sort of idiocy?" she asked, still giggling. "She's always coming up with all these overblown fantasies with extremely unlikely love stories worked in. I think she needs a boyfriend or something." Hana glared at her other sister while sitting on the youngest one, then grumbled under her breath when both her parents began laughing as well.

"It's a perfectly respectable hobby and hones my writing skills," she muttered. Chuckling, Harue reached over and patted her on her head, before standing.

"You just keep thinking that, dear. And try not to crush Kimiko, she's going a funny colour."

Picking up all the wine glasses he headed for the kitchen. Nabiki exchanged glances with Miki and John, all three of them now laughing, before they went to help.

Looking at the expanse of gently rippling water in front of her, Nabiki smiled, turning to Miki. "You're right, this is excellent. Why is hardly anyone here, though? It's practically empty." This was indeed the case. The very large and elaborate swimming facility was practically deserted, only three other people than themselves visible. Miki looked around, then shrugged, turning to her friend.

"No idea. It's normally pretty busy even this early in the morning," she replied, frowning a little. The trio, John bringing up the rear, walked past the long glass wall that allowed them to view the pool towards the reception area, which was staffed by a pair of young men. The nearest one looked up as they approached.

"Ah. Customers. At last," he smiled.

"Where is everyone?" Miki asked curiously. The man sighed a little.
"You must have missed the news." They all looked at each other, then back at him.

"What news?" she asked.

"We had an outbreak of some sort of norovirus last week, which put about fifteen people in the hospital. We had to close the pool, drain it completely, sterilise everything, refill it, test it, get it certified as safe..." He sighed again. "You wouldn't believe the fuss. Public health people running around all over the place. It turned out to be the result of some damn little kid with the runs who should never have been allowed out of his house, never mind into a pool." He didn't seem happy. "Everything is fine now, the authorities are completely happy about that, but not many people seem to trust it yet. So, here we sit, with a grand total of eight people in the entire building including you guys."

"I see," she replied, looking sympathetically at him. "I suppose it will take some time to get people back in."

"Most likely. But in the mean time, enjoy the quiet." He grinned for a moment. "You don't often get the chance to use a near-Olympic-level pool with hardly anyone in the thing unless you turn up at three AM."

Laughing, Miki nodded to him, paid for three people, then they headed to the locker rooms, John peeling off to head for the male side after giving her a quick kiss. Smirking a little to herself she and Nabiki went in the female side, looking around.

"Do you think we can find some empty ones?" Nabiki commented with a chuckle. They picked a pair of lockers next to each other then changed before heading for the showers. The middle Tendo caught her friend eyeing her slightly oddly as she pulled on her bathing suit, causing her to raise an eyebrow. "What?" she asked, causing Miki to blink, slightly startled.

"Oh, sorry, Nabiki, I was just a little surprised. I knew you were fit, but I didn't know how fit." She grinned, looking her friend up and down. "You look like you do about six hours of sit-ups every day. You've got a six-pack that a body-builder would envy."

Looking down at herself, the Tendo woman smiled a little. She had always kept herself toned and in good condition but the magical girl training had, aside from all the interesting abilities, improved her physical condition to an unbelievable extent. Without her normal clothes on she presented a rather impressive figure, musculature very well defined, although not to an unattractive level. She didn't pay much attention now, long used to it, but when Miki pointed it out she was reminded of how she'd changed.

"Thanks," she said, laughing a little. "Like I said, I swim a lot, it's very good exercise, and I've been doing other things as well for the last few months. It keeps me in condition."

"I'll say," her friend commented slightly enviously. "I thought I was pretty fit, but next to you I look positively flabby."

"No, you don't, Miki," she replied, laughing. "You look fine. John certainly seems to think he's lucky to have you as his girlfriend."

"Oh, he's not wrong there," Miki giggled, looking haughty for a moment before losing it. "Very lucky indeed."

Laughing they headed for the showers, then out into the pool, where they found John waiting for them, inspecting the diving board at one end of the pool. The other three swimmers were all down at the far end of the pool in the shallow water, apparently a family group. He looked up as they approached, smiling at his girlfriend, then studying Nabiki appreciatively. "You both look good in those suits," he remarked with a grin. "Nabiki, you must work out like crazy to have muscle tone like that."

"I mainly swim and run around a lot," she laughed.

"It's all that saving the world you mentioned," Miki giggled.

"Possibly. But that doesn't normally require much effort." She posed slightly, smiling. "You just do it as fast as possible then get lunch."

Shaking his head in amusement, John looked up at the top diving platform, some ten metres up. "I was wondering if I had the courage to jump off that thing," he said. Miki and Nabiki followed his gaze. The Sano woman paled a little.

"It's a long way up," she said faintly.

"I'll bet it looks even further down from up there," Nabiki told them helpfully, giggling when Miki looked mildly ill.

After a moment, John shook his head. "I think I'll try the lower one first, work my way up to it," he suggested, looking at the three metre board at the bottom. There was another one in the middle at about seven metres, then the top one. The girls watched as he climbed the ladder at the back of the structure, then walked out to the end of the diving platform. After a moment he looked over at them slightly wide-eyed. "You were right, Nabiki. It does look further from up here."

Laughing, she pointed at the highest one, some distance above his head, saying, "Just think what it looks like from up there." He glanced up then closed his eyes momentarily.

"Stop scaring my boyfriend, Nabiki," Miki laughed, watching as John turned around, then walked back along the platform. A moment later, after bouncing on his toes a few times, he trotted back and executed a very nice dive from the end. Both young women clapped as he resurfaced, looking pleased.

"Not bad, John," the middle Tendo said with a smile. "Not bad at all."

"Can you dive?" he asked curiously. She nodded, grinning.

"I know how but I don't do it much at the moment. I normally do lengths, maybe four or five kilometres at a time." He looked impressed as he swam over, holding onto the edge of the pool.

"That's... eighty to a hundred lengths in a pool this size?" he asked, working it out quickly. "Impressive. I don't know if I can swim that far." She shrugged a bit.

"It's not difficult when you get into the routine and have a decent technique with good stamina."

"Go on, Nabiki, show him how to dive properly," Miki laughed, indicating the platform her boyfriend had jumped from. She eyed it, then looked at her friends.

"I wouldn't want to show anyone up," she snickered.

"Ah, but unlike our young friend Kyo from yesterday, I'm neither certain men are better than women in any specific field nor threatened if they are," John replied, looking calm and content. She laughed. "Feel free to show me how to do it properly."
Still laughing, the middle sister headed for the platform, climbing up to the lowest one. She felt no fear at all now for something a mere three metres up, and hadn't for a long time, even before all the magical girl things had happened, having been diving from this height for years. Even though she'd never much cared for heights in general, oddly enough that hadn't applied in the case of diving, at least into a pool.

Walking to the end she looked down, grinned, then turned around and retraced her steps. Turning to face the water, she lightly ran down the platform, leaped from the end in a text-book perfect dive encompassing a neat somersault and entered the water with barely a splash, resurfacing into a smooth front crawl. She hadn't even had to make use of her enhanced abilities, which would have probably allowed her to clear the entire length of the pool.

Behind her, she felt John's and Miki's mild awe, smiling to herself. It was a good start to the morning.

Miki looked at her boyfriend, who was watching Nabiki, who in turn was walking beside them with a small, very slightly smug grin playing about her lips. She shook her head in amused wonder.

"A double somersault from ten metres?" John asked again in a tone of shock. "With a spin?"

"Sorry, I got carried away," the Tendo woman chuckled.

"Just a little," Miki giggled. "I had no idea you were that good at diving."

"I was a little surprised myself," Nabiki admitted, grinning more widely. "I'm not sure I could do it again. I think I got lucky."

"Like you got lucky with the arcade game?" John asked suspiciously. He stared at her for some moments as they headed back towards Miki's family's house. Eventually he sighed. "Why do I have the feeling I'm missing something here?" he grumbled, making Nabiki lean forwards slightly to smirk at her friend past the young man in the middle of the threesome. Miki began laughing more loudly.

"Something's going on, I'm sure," he added. "No one should be that lucky."

"Just a fluke, I think," Nabiki said contentedly. "I wouldn't read to much into it if I were you, John."

"Hmm." He didn't seem completely convinced, but in a good-natured way. "I suppose. But I've got my eye on you, Miss Tendo."

"You're supposed to only have eyes for me, damn it!" Miki stopped and glared at him, making him sigh again, and causing Nabiki to start laughing. After a moment she couldn't keep a straight face and began laughing herself, linking arms with him and resuming walking. He patted her on the head and grinned.

"I do. Mostly. But you have to admit that was damned impressive to watch. Like something out of the Olympics."

"It was pretty amazing," she agreed, looking past him at her friend who was still giggling. "Why didn't you go in for the swimming team or diving team at university, Nabiki, if you're that good?" she asked. Shrugging, the Tendo woman smiled a little.

"I'm not particularly interested in most team sports, I have to admit," she replied. "Plus I've gotten a lot better in the last couple of years anyway, I wasn't as good as that when I got to the university in the first place. I'm not exactly an expert, it's just some practice and decent coordination, I think."

"Does your sister swim as well as you do?" John asked. She snickered for a moment.

"She's OK, nowadays, but not great. You should have seen her in school, though. For years she was basically terrified of the water, not without reason, because she tended to sink like a stone. Even with floatation aids sometimes, which was a particularly good trick." Nabiki laughed, as did the other two, although she looked somewhat sympathetic. "Impressive but for all the wrong reasons."

"Poor girl," Miki giggled.

"Oh, it wasn't ideal, certainly. She nearly drowned in a pool half a dozen times that I can think of. People kept having to jump in and fish her out." Nabiki shrugged for a second. "There was a time that our insane principal tried to teach her to swim but I'm not at all sure he really helped much." Shaking her head, she began relating a story that had both her friends staring in complete shock.

"A boulder on her back?" John said in a strangled tone. Nabiki nodded, smiling.

"Don't forget the rather large shark. I have no idea where that lunatic got the thing."

"Unbelievable."

"It gets crazier," she giggled, adding some more details. But the time she was finished they were at the house, both of them standing and gaping.

"Holy shit. I'm glad I didn't go to your school," Miki commented, opening the front door after a long couple of seconds. Nabiki laughed quite hard.

"It was an education in more than the normal way, definitely," she responded, obviously amused. "Martial artists, crazy Amazon warriors, insane kendoists, spatula-wielding chefs, you name it. Lots of fun."

"I'm not entirely sure fun is the word I'd use," John muttered. "He really attacked a shark with a wooden sword?"

"Yep. Completely nuts."

"What happened to all these people?" Miki asked curiously, while they were changing their shoes.

"The crazy Amazon is actually a very good friend now, of course," Nabiki explained, smiling a little. "I never expected that to happen, I have to admit, but I'm very glad it did. Shampoo is a good person now she's grown up a little. Ukyo, the chef, and she really is a chef, her cooking skills are remarkable, is also a long-term friend. She's getting married very soon." They headed through the house into the back garden, where they found Umeko working on her plants, the elder woman looking up and smiling at them for a moment, before returning to work. The three sat down in some wrought-iron garden chairs that were placed near the back door.

"The insane kendoist?" John asked.

"Is still a kendoist, and probably also still insane to a degree, but to give him his due he does seem to be gradually becoming slightly less nuts. His sister is absolutely crazy, unfortunately, although even she isn't nearly as much of a pain as she was most of the time." Nabiki sighed for a moment. "She was a damned nuisance a few years back." Giving the other two an amused glance, she asked, "Still want to come to the party? Even after hearing about Nerima from one of the inmates?"
Giggling Miki nodded hard. "Oh, definitely, I wouldn't miss that for anything. Six magical girls in one place, including Yori? No way I'm not going."

"It could be... quite unusual... I suspect," the Tendo woman laughed. "But hopefully it will be fun as well." She looked up as Hana walked past, going over to their mother and talking to her for a moment, then heading back into the house with a wave to them all. When the older sister had vanished, her friend turned to Miki and asked, "Should I invite Hana as well? She seems fairly keen on Yori and her friends." There was a twinkle in Nabiki's eyes at this massive understatement.

Miki sighed, smiling. "She is quite into the entire fandom, yes," she agreed, as John rolled his eyes and cracked up. Poking him she laughed for a few seconds. "I'm not sure if it's a good idea or not. On the one hand, you'd be her friend for life. On the other, she might have some sort of fit or seizure from the excessive joy." She grinned as both the others collapsed in hysterical laughter at her dry words. "Not to mention she's get so high pitched only dogs could hear her."

"Is she really that bad?" the Neriman native asked, gasping for breath. Miki raised an eyebrow. "Sorry, you did actually meet my sister, didn't you?" Nabiki nodded, still laughing.

"I do seem to recall a certain amount of enthusiasm for the subject. From both of you, to be honest." Miki went slightly pink, mildly embarrassed, but didn't stop grinning.

"We share a few traits, yes. But she's got it a lot worse." Unable to hold it in, she started laughing as well, all three of them rolling around in their chairs. Hana came back out and stared at them for a moment, looked quizzically over at their mother, then shrugged, which only made them laugh harder, before leaving again, shaking her head slowly.

"OW!"

Giggling, Nabiki ducked the return fire from John, who whipped around and opened up on her with his paintball gun, pulling the trigger as fast as he could. Small capsules of high-velocity blue paint whizzed overhead and splattered on the tree behind her as she waited for a gap in the fire, before popping up unexpectedly, quickly getting a good lock on his shin, Jun providing an overlaid targeting icon that took account of the trajectory and wind, then fired a single shot in return.

"OW, dammit! How are you doing that, Tendo?!" he yelled, dropping behind his cover and reloading. "Stop it!"

Beside her Miki was nearly in hysterics, almost unable to hold her own paintball gun. "Do it again, Nabiki," she yelled.

"No, don't!" John yelped from twenty metres away. "OW!"

Dropping the compressed gas gun to the ground Miki folded over with hilarity, weakly shaking her head as she grinned at the middle sister, who smiled back. Loudly muttered obscenities came from the location the young man was hiding in, along with a certain amount of laughter from his teammates, many of whom had already experience the Wrath of Tendo with Paintballs.

"It should be called painball, not paintball," Miki squeaked breathlessly, trying to stop laughing. This set Nabiki off to the point she had to take cover and wait for the giggles to die away.

"You're not supposed to keep shooting someone who's dead, you know," John called over to them.

"Well, if you're dead, you shouldn't keep jumping up like that and shooting back," she called in return, grinning to her friend. Annoyed mutters came on the wind to both girls who exchanged another glance of amusement.

"OK, OK, I'm dead. Stop shooting me, all right?" he finally called over, standing up with his gun held loosely in one hand above his head, waving to the game marshal, who was also grinning widely. The man directed him towards the safe area. Both girls watched as he headed off the course with his left hand still rubbing where the last paintball had struck.

"Only three of them left," Miki said, risking a quick look over the low wall then ducking as a flurry of paint shot past. "But only two of us."

Dropping flat the middle Tendo wormed forward a little so she could peer around the end of the wall as low as she could manage. It was a little unfair, she thought, to be so freely utilising the abilities Jun allowed her, which made tracking the other players very easy despite the obstructions, but it was also damn good fun. Even without Jun her training at the hands of Ranma and her sister had made a game like this pretty straightforward in most respects.

Grinning to herself, she thought, 'I wonder what they'd do if I used paintball-calibre ki shots?'

Deciding it was probably best that she didn't, although the idea was extremely amusing, she waited for the teenaged girl who had been lurking beside John to move slightly, before firing half a dozen shots in quick succession. One of the paintballs made it through the gap she'd spotted in the wooden wall, the remainder of them leaving yellow splashes around it. The inherent inaccuracy of the CO2-powered device and the low muzzle velocity added enough randomness to the shot that even Jun couldn't completely predict the outcome at this range, although it certainly gave her an enormous advantage.

A yell of surprise came back to her, followed by a triumphant cry as the girl she'd fired at threw herself back from the opening the projectile had just shot through. "Ha! You missed me!" This was immediately followed by a splat and a scream of anger. Nabiki looked over to see Miki peering around the other end of her wall, gun outstretched, grinning wildly about her own shot past the opponent's defences to get their victim in the back.

Giving her friend a quick grin and a thumb's-up, she returned her attention to the game, watching the dejected girl stand up with her gun held above her head. Like John before her, she trooped off the course looking irritated. Reloading with the last of her paint Nabiki scuttled over to Miki, staying low. "Two left. One is behind that oil barrel to the right there, the other one is up on the platform in the tree behind him." Risking a quick glance, Miki pulled her head back, nodding thoughtfully.

"I see him. Can you get him from here?"

"I don't think so, there are too many little twigs and things in the way, the balls keep breaking on them." She peered around the wall herself, then fired a couple of shots in the appropriate direction, before pulling back. "Nope. We'd have to be closer."

"OK. How about if I distract him, then you take him out?" Miki looked again, ducking as a paintball barely missed her. "Oops. That was close." She grinned. "I'll run for that other wall, if you cover me, then pin him down while you get him. That other guy is in the wrong place to hit either one of us. Then we can get the last one, and we win."

"Sounds like a plan," the middle Tendo snickered. "This was a good idea."

"Wasn't it?" Miki laughed a little. "I bet the next game John will want to be on our team," she added sardonically. Nabiki nodded, then rolled onto her chest, smiling, aiming at the distant player.
"On three. One... Two... Three!" She opened fire while Miki ran for cover, darting from tree to wall to barrel. As soon as her friend reached her destination she ducked back behind the wall.

#You are down to twenty-three rounds, Nabiki,# Jun informed her. #I advise careful selective fire for disabling this next target.# She grinned, the SI seemed to find the whole thing quite a lot of fun as well. It popped up a map of the game area with a path marked on it. #This course will keep you behind cover for sixty-two percent of the total distance, giving the best chance for mission success. If Miki fires as you reach this point, simulations suggest the target will be sufficiently distracted that you can clear the uncovered zone with minimal risk of taking return fire.#

'Looks good,' she replied, chuckling. Looking towards Miki, who was glancing back at her, while still keeping an eye on their opposing player, she pointed at the gap in the cover that Jun had highlighted, then pointed to herself, then the young man in the tree, who she could see was visibly wondering what they were up to. Miki followed her finger then looked back at her. After a moment she obviously got the idea, nodding and smiling. Getting ready she took aim, then waved to her friend. Nabiki jumped over the half-metre wall and ran, careful to keep her speed down to something reasonable, following the course highlighted by the SI and hearing Miki start shooting just as she reached the open area. A few paintballs came her way as the other player fired back but he was kept busy by the other woman's own fire, grimly trying to hit a moving target and a hidden one at the same time.

He failed on both counts.

Sliding into the cover of a large log, Nabiki smiled. She looked back at her friend, who waved with a large grin. Miki turned back to the other player, keeping him occupied with the occasional sniping shot, which was beginning to annoy him judging by the muttering she could hear coming from his position. Moving from cover to cover the middle sister worked her way around to the side until she had a clear line of fire, the young man hiding behind a wall of planks a couple of metres up on the elevated platform, apparently wondering where she'd gone. She aimed, then whistled sharply. Jerking his head around in shock she could see his eyes widen behind his mask, just before the yellow paint spread itself across his chest with a thwack.

He looked down, then back at her, before sagging. Giving him a wave and a grin, she headed back after the remaining player, hearing a burst of popping noises seconds later, followed by a cry of pain. "Got him!" Miki yelled with glee. A horn sounded as the marshal ended the game.

"Nine times." John finished counting small round bruises, pulling his shirt-sleeve down again, then gave Nabiki a hard look. "You hit me nine times. Thanks."

"You're welcome," she grinned, saluting him with her bottle of water. Mumbling to himself he picked up his own drink.

"Add unnaturally good shot to the list of weird things you can do," he muttered. "Damned family upbringing amongst martial artists. It obviously rubs off." Miki laughed from beside him. Glancing at her, he frowned. "You seem oddly good at it as well," he added. "You two work together much too well in my opinion." The young women exchanged gazes then laughed again.

"We offered to have you on our team," Miki told him, looking amused. "But for some reason you wanted to be on the other side."

"I'm not sure why I wanted that, I have to admit," he replied with a mild frown. "I'll remember for the next time. Note to self, don't let Nabiki or Miki shoot at you." She giggled wildly for a moment, leaning against him.
"It was fun," Nabiki told them. "Thanks for suggesting it." She rubbed at some dried paint on the back of her hand, then poured a little water on it, finally managing to get it off. They'd played half a dozen games, Miki and she being the sole people standing in two of them by the end. The last one had been a free for all death match, which had quickly turned into an 'Everyone get the Tendo' game instead, the players as one deciding that she was far too dangerous to be allowed to live. Against twenty players, including Miki, who had been laughing like an idiot, she hadn't stood a chance without going full-on magical girl. Her rented overalls were absolutely covered in a rainbow of paint. As soon as she was safely out of it, they'd turned on each other like a pack of rabid wolves, making her laugh as she watched from the safe zone, not at all annoyed by the betrayal of her friends.

She's been sniped by one young man in two games, almost instantly in the first one, half-way through in the second. Nabiki found it an amusing lesson in not getting over-confident. She'd spent some time tracking him down in the last game they played together, managing to get close enough that he'd actually yelped in surprise when he turned around and found her grinning at him from mere metres away over her gun. After a moment he'd grinned back, spread his arms widely, then said in a melodramatic tone, "Please make it quick and merciful, beautiful assassin." She'd been laughing so hard by that point that when a stray paintball from his own team had hit him in the forehead, she'd nearly collapsed.

Ruefully rubbing his forehead he'd held his gun up, grinned at her again, then wandered off looking happy. Shaking her head, she'd dived back into the game, having fun even though in the end her team lost due to attrition.

"I don't know if I'd want to play it all the time," she added, finishing her water bottle and screwing the cap back on, "but it's certainly been a good way to spend an afternoon."

"Expensive, though," John replied, looking slightly ruefully at the receipt he pulled out of his pocket. "I thought it cost a lot in the UK but the prices here are considerably higher, more than I expected."

"It was worth it." Miki looked satisfied with the results of the last three hours. "I haven't had that much fun for weeks."

"It was a lot of fun, yes," her boyfriend agreed, putting the receipt into his wallet then returning it to his pocket. "Although the bruises will take some time to go away."

"They'll fade quickly," she told him. "I can hardly see any of mine."

"That's because hardly anyone hit you." John looked mock-annoyed. "You two were ganging up on me. Especially her." He indicated Nabiki, who was listening with a smile.

"How can one person 'gang up' on someone?" Miki asked reasonably. He looked confused for a moment, then worked out what she meant, laughing.

"You know perfectly well what I mean, you idiot," he grinned.

"So, what will we do now?" Nabiki asked, watching them both with amused fondness. "It's only about half past four."

"No more paintball, that's for sure," John replied, rubbing his arm with a wince.

"I think I've had enough as well," she agreed.

"I could eat something," Miki suggested thoughtfully. "We've been running around for hours. I'm starving. Why don't we go home, clean up, then go out for a meal. Mom and the others might want to come as well. I know a nice restaurant I haven't been to for a couple of years quite close to home."

"Not a bad idea," John mused. He glanced at Nabiki who nodded.

"Fine with me."

"OK. Let's return all this equipment and head back, then." Miki jumped to her feet and headed towards the changing area, smiling to herself, with her boyfriend and friend following, chatting amiably.

"What is it that you do, Kimiko?" the middle sister asked, halfway through her steak. The Sano woman glanced over at her. "We got interrupted last night and I never found out." Kimiko grinned as she took a quick look at Hana, who scowled a little. Nabiki and Miki followed her gaze, then exchanged looks of amusement.

"I'm training as a vet," the youngest of the three sisters explained. "I've always been interested in animals. It's pretty hard work but very interesting."

"I see. Are you going to specialise in anything specific, or just deal with cats and dogs, that sort of thing?"

"Probably small animals, I think, yes," Miki's sister explained, smiling a little. "Cows and horses are large, smelly, and dangerous if they sit on you. Anyway, there are an awful lot of pets around the place and people want them taken care of, so it seems like a good career."

Nabiki put the piece of steak in her mouth, savouring it as Kimiko talked. After a while the conversation changed to a recounting of their paintballing, which had everyone grinning as John wildly gesticulated as he relived the great Tendo-Sano ambush manoeuvre. By the end of the meal, they were all in a very good mood, paying the substantial bill and leaving the restaurant. During the walk home they talked some more, Nabiki finding once again that she found Miki's family enjoyable.

Half-way back, a couple of kilometres from the house on a quiet residential road, she suddenly felt something dangerous approaching, whipping her head around to see a motorcycle coming around the corner behind them too quickly and hitting a worn manhole cover at exactly the wrong angle. The front tire of the bike slid sideways on the slick metal, leaving the rider in a precarious position as he fought to recover his balance, ultimately in vain, the bike tilting past the point of return as it came towards them at some eighty kilometres per hour.

"Look out," she yelled, pushing Harue to one side as the bike toppled, skidding directly towards them in a shower of sparks, the rider coming off and sliding along the road on his back, then rolling over and over. Hitting the curb the bike flipped end over end into the air as she ducked, seeing that it was going to hit her after having passed through the spot Harue had been standing moments earlier. Without time to do much else that wouldn't instantly give her away she put her hand out, carefully deflecting it barely over her head and that of Hana who was standing next to her, the older woman beginning to turn at her shout. It all happened so quickly that by the time the machine was past the rest of the family was only just turning around. Kimiko yelped as the bike crashed into the wall of the building next to them with a very solid crunch, John grabbing her and pulling her back just in time to avoid it falling back onto her.

Silence fell, broken by Miki who said faintly, "Holy shit that was close," then closed her eyes and nearly fainted, swaying a little. John, still holding Kimiko by the shoulder, put his free arm around her and held her.

Nabiki straightened up and looked around, quickly lowering her hand. As far as she could see no one seemed to have noticed that she'd actually pushed the machine out of the way, it most likely looked like a reflexive action that would have stood little chance of working, luckily being missed by the flying motorcycle. "Are you all right, Hana?" she asked, turning to the older woman, who was staring at the crushed machine with wide eyes in a white face. The woman nodded automatically, still staring. A second later she looked down at her father who was rolling over on the pavement where Nabiki's push had sent him, raising his hand to his head, which had a small cut on it.

"Dad!" She dropped to her knees next to him and grabbed him. He looked back slightly dazedly, then turned to look at Nabiki, then the dead bike.

"Oh. That could have been nasty," he said in a distant voice, raising his hand to his head and feeling the cut, wincing a little.

Umeko also dropped to her knees, heedless of the damage she was causing to her dress, quickly checking his wound, then hugging him. "Are you all right, dear?" she asked, worried. He nodded, then winced again.

"I think so. My head hurts but other than that I feel fine."

Satisfied that there was no immediate problem with her companions Nabiki hurried over to the comatose form of the motorcycle rider, who was lying in a crumpled heap in the gutter looking very untidy. She could sense he was still alive, although unconscious, and probably not in serious danger but it seemed likely he wasn't going to be enjoying the next few days. His leather suit and full face helmet had apparently kept him mostly intact although she could see they'd both need replacing.

Kneeling next to him she quickly scanned him, using Jun's new sensory system to look for broken bones or internal damage. #He has a broken ulna, a mild concussion, and a number of lacerations to his back, Nabiki, but other than that appears to be mostly uninjured,# the SI reported, highlighting the damage with an overlay. She studied the ghostly image the machine produced, before calling her sister on the comm.

"Hello, sister, how are you?" Kasumi greeted her.

"I'm fine, but I've got someone here who just nearly killed himself," she said, sending the older woman the scans. Kasumi fell silent for a moment.

"He's in no real danger but he needs hospitalisation," she said after a few seconds. "The broken arm is fairly bad. Do you want us to come and help you?"

"That could be difficult to explain," she somewhat reluctantly replied. "I'd love to heal him up right now but it would cause a lot of questions if Yori or Chou suddenly popped up in Kobe for the first time right when I'm here."

"I understand." Kasumi sounded calm and comforting. "Call the emergency services and arrange an ambulance. He'll be fine, once that break is in a cast." She paused for a moment, then added, "It's not impossible that he might have an anonymous visitor at some point in the near future, after which he heals rather more rapidly than normal."
Nabiki chuckled to herself. "Thanks, sis."

"Are there any other injuries?" her sister asked. She looked over to the Sano family, who were clustered around Harue who was sitting up, holding his head.

"A minor head wound, but nothing serious," she replied.

"All right. If you need any help, just call, but you're probably correct that this should be handled without magical girl involvement."

"I'll let you know what happens, but I'd better call the ambulance and get back to the others before someone thinks something odd is going on," the middle sister said. "Talk later."

"Goodbye, Nabiki." Kasumi disconnected as Nabiki pulled out her phone, making it look like she'd removed it from her pocket. Miki was in the process of heading over, John behind her, as she dialled.

"Oh my god, Nabiki, is he all right?" her friend asked, staring at the man on the ground.

"I think so," she replied, "It looks like he's got a broken arm from what I can see and he's probably got a head injury judging by the damage to his helmet." She pointed, both of her friends looking. "Probably best not to move him. I'm calling an ambulance."

Less than a minute had passed since she'd noticed the biker, she idly noted, as the emergency operator answered her call. A quick conversation later and she hung up, dropping the phone into her pocket. "They're on the way, so are the police," she announced. The rider picked that moment to regain consciousness, groaning loudly. Kneeling down she put a restraining hand on him. "Lie still, please. The ambulance will be here soon." Indeed she could already hear sirens. A couple of minutes later an ambulance stopped next to her, the paramedics quickly exiting and examining the patient. She stood back out of the way, watching, with her friends.

Shortly after that the police arrived, a pair of officers looking around, then one of them heading to the small group of people, while the other one inspected the remains of the motorcycle, taking some notes.

"Can anyone tell me what happened?" the corporal asked, his notebook open. Everyone exchanged glances then looked at Nabiki. The Tendo sister took a step forwards, smiling a little, and began to explain the sequence of events.

Sitting in the living room, the Sano family was very quiet. After a while, Umeko got up and made some tea, returning to the room and passing it around. They all sipped it in silence for a few minutes.

"It would appear that I owe you thanks for myself, now, Nabiki," Harue finally said, feeling the bandage that one of the paramedics had fitted him out with over his mild objections. "By the sound of it you saved my life. Thank you."

"You're more than welcome, of course," she replied quietly. "I'm sorry you hit your head."

"It's nothing, I've had much worse on the job," he smiled. "It's certainly much less than I would have received by collecting a flying Honda in the face."

"True," she laughed.
"I'm just glad it missed you and Hana," Umeko exclaimed, sighing. Hana nodded vigorously.

"It went past close enough I swear I felt it brush my head," she said, still looking pale. She glanced at Nabiki, smiling briefly. "I don't think putting your hand up would have helped," she added.

The middle Tendo laughed again. "It was a reflex. Difficult not to when there's something heading right for you, even if it's pointless."

"I guess," the other woman giggled nervously. "God, that was close. It's a good thing you spotted it in time." She suddenly leaned over and hugged Nabiki hard for a moment. "Thank you for saving us."

"Don't worry about it," Nabiki smiled.

"Yes, she saves people all the time," Miki giggled. "Entire worlds of them at once, sometimes." Everyone looked at her somewhat oddly, although both John and Nabiki grinned. She flushed a little. "Sorry. Silly joke. I'm still shaking." Holding up her hand everyone could see it was trembling a little. John held it in his own.

"It's a calling," Nabiki said after a moment, folding her arms and deliberately looking as smug as possible for maximum comedic effect. Everyone stared at her, then slowly, one by one, began to laugh, the relief caused by the near miss coming out in the good humour.

As she was getting ready for bed some hours later, a quiet tap on her door made her look up, then open it. Kimiko looked in with a smile, before quickly looking both ways. Entering the room she closed the door and leaned on it, watching Nabiki watch her curiously, wondering what was going on. After a moment, the youngest Sano sister held out her hand.

"Thanks for saving my father. And my sister," she said very quietly. "She's a pain sometimes, but she's family."

"I'm not sure what you mean?" Nabiki half-asked. Kimiko smiled faintly.

"I'm not going to tell, or ask any questions, don't worry, my word of honour on that. I don't know what it was, martial arts or something else, but that bike wasn't going to miss. I only saw it out of the corner of my eye but..." She shrugged, still smiling. "Anyway, thanks."

After a long moment, Nabiki smiled back. She shook the outstretched hand.

"I admit to nothing, but it wasn't a problem, believe me."

"Because it's a calling?" Kimiko asked impishly while looking amused.

Giggling, Nabiki nodded.

"Exactly."

Kimiko laughed, hugged her for a moment, then left, leaving the middle sister smiling to herself as she climbed into the bed and settled down for the night.

"Hi, 'Biki. I'm sorry, did I wake you up? I forgot the time difference." Akane sounded mildly embarrassed.

"I was just drifting off," her sister replied, yawning without opening her eyes, feeling comfortable where she was. It was very convenient, she thought not for the first time, to be able to answer a phone call without having to move. "How are things with you two? Settled in yet?"

"As much as we could be after only one day. We're just heading down to breakfast, it's... about half past eight, right now. So it's nearly one in the morning there, right?"

"That's right. But the next day of course, so you're talking to me in the future. It's Monday night here, or more accurately, very early on Tuesday." Nabiki laughed slightly as Akane giggled for a moment. "What have you done so far?"

"Well, Adrian was waiting for us when we got here, he took us to the hotel, which is really nice, it's a four star one quite close to the studio, the rooms are huge, then after we checked in, we went out for a meal at a nice restaurant with him, Matt, and Aaron. Aiko came with us, so did Richard and his wife and daughter. Afterwards they went off somewhere and we wandered around for a couple of hours seeing some of the sights. LA is pretty impressive in a way I've never seen before. Not as many people as Tokyo but a lot more different ones, I think." Her sister sounded excited, making her smile to herself.

"There are a lot of Japanese people here, actually," she added with interest. "We bumped into some tourists from Osaka who didn't speak much English and were lost. I translated for them and Adrian sent them off to where they were trying to get to. They were very pleased, I think they were getting a little worried."

"That was nice of you," Nabiki chuckled. Laughing, Akane agreed, "It seemed polite. Anyway, after that, it was about midnight, I guess, we went back to the hotel while the others went home. Shampoo wanted to try the pool on the roof so we went swimming for an hour or so. Or, at least, she did, I paddled around a bit." The younger sister sounded slightly embarrassed now. Nabiki snickered.

"Still not entirely happy in the water, are you?"

"Not completely. I suppose I'll probably have to overcome that, I expect stunt work will involve water quite a lot."

"Probably. Drowning on the job would be a silly way to go," the middle sister laughed. "When you get back, if you want, I'm happy to teach you to swim properly. It's not difficult once you get the technique right. I've offered enough times in the past, perhaps now you're ready."

"Perhaps." Her sister laughed. "I'll think about it. But thanks for the offer."

"What have you got planned for today?"

"We're going to the studio later, to meet various people and go over the plans for the next couple of days. It sounds both exciting and boring at the same time." Akane giggled again, making Nabiki grin into the darkness of her room. "Before that we're going to look around a little more, hopefully in air-conditioned buildings some of the time at least. It's already really hot, it's going to be a scorcher of a day, I think. Adrian will be here in about an hour. He even got us phones to use while we're here, which was a nice thought. He called me about ten minutes ago to check that we were on schedule when he left his house. Apparently the traffic is horrible here, worse than back home, but he's still going to be more or less on time."

"Have fun," the elder sister laughed. "Try not to destroy LA, they might be annoyed. Remember there's a damn great fault-line near the city."

Akane laughed as well. "Oh, very ha ha, 'Biki," she replied sardonically. "I'm not going to trigger
"an earthquake."

"Hopefully..." They giggled at each other.

"How is your trip going?" the younger woman asked curiously.

Thinking for a couple of seconds, Nabiki worked out what was safe to talk about. "Pretty well. I've met Miki's parents and two sisters. She's the middle one like I am, but a little younger. Kimiko is a bit younger than you, by a year I think, and the other one, Hana, is a little less than two years older than me. They're all very nice people." She described each of the family members while her sister listened. "Hana is absolutely obsessed with magical girls," she added with a snicker. "Miki is worse than you are, and Hana is much worse than that. When I mentioned the Yori and Chou action figures I thought she was going to have a stroke."

There was a gale of laughter from the other end of the conversation as Akane cracked up. "It was amazing. The colour her face went..." Nabiki was laughing quietly to herself, trying not to wake anyone, as she remembered the previous day. "Then, last night, we were talking again and Kimiko mentioned that Hana writes magical girl fan fiction." Fresh laughter came from Akane, who sounded like she was on the verge of collapse.

"You should see if you could get a copy," she shorted after she'd recovered a little. "It sounds fun."

"I might," the middle sister giggled. "Especially the latest masterpiece, Kimiko says it's about Yori." This put her sister into near convulsions of amusement by the sound of it. Both of them laughed for some time. When they finally calmed down, she continued, "Other than that, it's been very interesting. We went to a really good swimming pool this morning, then in the afternoon went paintballing. Miki and I did pretty well, John was a bit annoyed, but he shouldn't have picked the losing team..." She went over the events of the last day and a half, while Akane listened and made appropriate comments.

For a number of reasons she didn't mention either the arcade incident or the near-miss with the motorcycle. She was going to have to think about when and how she discussed either with her sister or the rest of her family, as she felt she should downplay both.

"Sounds like we're both enjoying ourselves," Akane finally said, sounding pleased. "What are you doing tomorrow?"

"Going up a local mountain to a sort of resort on the top to have a look around and do some photography, then figure out something else to do afterwards. It's likely that it will take up most of the day. We're not sure about the day after tomorrow yet. I'll probably leave Thursday night so I can help Auntie Nodoka get ready for the weekend."

"OK. Shampoo and I will be back either late Thursday or sometime on Friday morning, I think," the distant sister replied. "We'll need at least one night to recover, I suspect, even leaving aside the time difference." She chuckled for a moment. "Teleporting does weird things to your sense of time. We're both still feeling like it's the middle of the night."

"You'll be OK tomorrow, probably," Nabiki told her. "Just take it easy today. Do your best, let me know how it goes, all right? And say hi to Shampoo as well. Best of luck to both of you."

"Thanks, 'Biki. Have fun as well. I'll see you in a few days."

"Bye, sis." Akane hung up, letting the inside of the older sister's head go quiet once again. Rolling over she smiled at the ceiling then fell asleep in seconds, feeling pleased for her sister and her Snapping awake at half-past three in the morning, Nabiki listened carefully. The window was slightly open to allow a cooling breeze to enter and through it the noise that had woken her came again. #Breaking glass, approximately six hundred metres away, Nabiki,# Jun reported quietly.#Based on the sound I believe it was a large plate-glass window. The most likely location in range is the small shopping precinct located here.# It displayed a map of the immediate vicinity with an icon indicating the location. She remembered walking past it that morning, seeing a number of shops in the middle of an area with few residential buildings present.

Getting up she went to the window, pulling out a camera drone and sending it off into the night. Seconds later she was watching two men in dark clothing in the process of wrapping a chain around an ATM which was bolted to the floor of a convenience shop they seemed to have backed a small SUV through the window of, then attempting to attach it to the rear of the vehicle, obviously intent on pulling it out by the roots and driving off with it. With a faint sigh she opened the window wider, carefully probing for anyone awake who might see her, either in the Sano household or the surrounding buildings. All she could feel was the faint ki emanations of sleeping people. A moment's thought and Nabiki swung herself out the window, taking on her flying Azumi form even as she activated her bracelet. A few quick flaps and she was soaring over the dark houses towards the robbers. She noticed that the street-lights in the precinct were off, leaving an island of darkness amongst the lit ones, suggesting the power was off there.

As she arrived overhead, she could see one of them fumbling with the chain, while talking in a low voice to his friend, who was apparently pointing out that the chain was too short for the job required of it. She quietly glided to a landing behind them, folding her wings and crossing her arms, while listening to what they were saying with interest.

"Look, just bring the truck closer, will you?" the first man said.

"I can't, you idiot, the window frame is in the way. We need to pull that out first."

"We don't have time for that. The police will turn up sooner or later." The first robber sighed. "This was supposed to take thirty seconds and we're already been here twice that long."

"I cut the power, the alarms are dead," his colleague replied. "We've got a couple of minutes at least."

"What if someone heard it? It made a lot of noise."

"Do you see anyone around?" The second man said, spreading his arms widely. The first man looked around, his eyes passing over 'Azumi', then snapping back to her. She waved, smiling nastily at him.

"Um..."

"What Um?" the second man said, puzzled by the way the colour had drained from his friend's face, apparent even in the darkness which was lit only by the running lights of the SUV. The first man pointed past his shoulder.

"There's a girl with wings standing behind you," he said in a hoarse whisper. Staring at him for a few seconds, the second man let out a small laugh.

"Good one. Now come on, let's get this damn thing connected and out of the way. We don't have long." He bent down to pick up the chain. His friend grabbed him by the shoulder, forcibly turning him around. Both men stared at the silver-haired woman watching them with a coldly amused expression. After a second or two she slowly spread her wings to full extent, holding her hands out to the sides and forming a ball of energy in each one.

"Hello," she said in a low voice, smirking. The men looked at each other, then back to her.

"Oh, shit."

"Odd."

Miki looked over at her father, who was watching the local news quietly in the living room. The rest of them were in the process of setting the table, while Umeko brought out breakfast.

"What's odd, Dad?" she asked curiously. He got up, turning off the TV and coming over, sitting down at the table.

"There seems to have been an attempted robbery at that store over in the shopping area," he said, smiling at his wife as she poured some tea and handed him the cup. "Two gentlemen took it upon themselves to steal a vehicle, then drive it into the front of the building. It looks like they were going to try to heave the ATM out of the shop with a chain, but someone stopped them before they could finish. They even cut the power at the local substation to disable the alarm."

"Wow. That's pretty serious," Hana exclaimed. "Who stopped them?"

"No one seems to know," her father replied. "That's what's odd. They don't appear to remember much about it, or at least that's what they're claiming. But it looks like someone tied them up with their own chain somehow then hung them upside down from the nearest lamp-post before calling the police. It's very strange."

"Who could have done that?" Umeko asked, looking surprised. Kimiko was listening with a very faint smile, looking at her father and no one else.

"The police seem puzzled," Harue said, nodding as Miki motioned to the rice bowl. She passed it over. "The only thing that seems to be certain is that the person who called them was female."

"Hey, perhaps there's a magical girl in Kobe, now," Hana said excitedly. Kimiko snickered, shaking her head.

"You always say that every time something even slightly odd happens, sis." She laughed as Hana glared at her. "You remember the time they found that burglar head-first down the ventilation system in that garage?" She looked at John, who was listening with a smile. "She said it must have been a magical girl who stuffed him in there. Of course, it turned out he was an idiot that thought he could fit into a much smaller space than he actually could. He was in there for two days before someone heard him shouting."

Miki started laughing at her older sister's expression, and even her parents looked amused. Hana grumbled to herself. "It could have been a magical girl," she muttered. "She could have used her magic to make him think he could fit."

Giggling, Miki glanced at Nabiki who was sitting quietly enjoying the commentary, a smile on her face. "That's only one of about a dozen times I can think of that she's been certain there was a magical girl around here. None have shown up so far." She sighed a little, looking mildly wistful, then brightened up. "Mind you, no demons either, so all in all I suppose it's a good trade off."
"Quite possibly," the middle Tendo agreed cheerfully, trying her miso soup, which was nearly as good as her own sister produced. She glanced casually at Kimiko, who looked back for a moment, then bent over her own bowl, smiling to herself.

"Hello, Masao," a voice said from behind him, making him turn his head as he stopped, then moved slightly to allow other pedestrians past. Yori smiled at him as he grinned back.

"Hi, Yori. What brings you here?" He was a few metres from the café he often got coffee at on the way into work. She looked at it for a moment then gestured, following him in as he resumed walking. Waiting while he ordered drinks for both of them, she took the cup he handed her and accompanied him to a table in the corner.

"I have something for you, if you want it," she said as she sat. "A little present. It might come in handy in your line of work."

Studying her as he added a little more sugar to his coffee and stirred it, he raised an eyebrow. She looked somewhat amused and pleased with herself. "Hmm. That sounds... slightly ominous. Is it bigger than a breadbox?"

The young woman laughed for a moment, as he grinned. "It's more of a talent, actually."

"You want to give me a talent?" he asked after a moment's surprise. She chuckled, nodding. "Basically. We've laid hands on a fascinating spell from some new friends. Something very rare, very complicated, and very restricted, but we were able to get permission to offer it to you. You don't have to accept, but I think you'd enjoy it. I know we do." The girl sipped her own coffee, watching him with a small smile as he tried to work out what she was on about.

Naito put his cup down carefully, thinking. After a moment, he shrugged. "I give up. What is it?"

"The solution to the tower of Babel," she commented mysteriously, looking amused and expectant, as if she thought this was a sufficient clue to allow him to work it out. He thought some more, while she waited, obviously enjoying herself. Eventually, his eyes widened a little. Could she mean...

"A language or translation spell?" he asked in astonishment. The black-haired woman saluted him with her coffee-cup, grinning.

"Got it in one. Well done. Yes, we acquired a limited usage right to what's probably the most extensive and elaborate language spell there is, as far as I can find out. It's ancient, and sort of a state secret, normally restricted its designers. They decided they owed us a favour, this was part of how they repaid it." Finishing off her drink she put the cup down, folding her hands on the table and looking at him. "I'm afraid I can't say any more about that, though."

"Very intriguing," he mumbled, wondering where they'd been this time. It could have been almost anywhere based on his own experiences. More loudly, he asked, "So what languages does it handle?"

"A language or translation spell?" he asked in astonishment. The black-haired woman saluted him with her coffee-cup, grinning.

"Got it in one. Well done. Yes, we acquired a limited usage right to what's probably the most extensive and elaborate language spell there is, as far as I can find out. It's ancient, and sort of a state secret, normally restricted its designers. They decided they owed us a favour, this was part of how they repaid it." Finishing off her drink she put the cup down, folding her hands on the table and looking at him. "I'm afraid I can't say any more about that, though."

"Very intriguing," he mumbled, wondering where they'd been this time. It could have been almost anywhere based on his own experiences. More loudly, he asked, "So what languages does it handle?"

"More or less all of them," Yori grinned, "from more or less anywhere. We haven't found one it doesn't work with yet, to be honest, and we've been trying for a couple of days. All the human ones and all the demon ones we could come up with it works with amazingly well. We're told that there are very few real limitations we're likely to encounter. It also makes learning the written form of the language much easier, it can take only a few hours in some cases."
"What's the catch?" he asked, looking at her with his own eyebrow raised. There was a pause, before she leaned slowly forward, her expression changing. He felt suddenly worried.

"I will require the liver and heart of your first-born male child," she replied in a low, eerie voice. He stared at her in complete shock. After a few seconds, she leaned back, the air of danger evaporating, then started laughing like a lunatic.

Naito shook his head, watching her in exasperation. "You, my dear woman, are totally crazy and have a very odd sense of humour." This only made her laugh harder. After trailing off into giggles, she grinned at him.

"You should have seen your face." He frowned back, causing her to look amused, before sobering up. "No catch. We thought you could use it, we trust you not to do anything stupid, and we like you. Our friends agreed when we explained. So, interested?"

With only a moment's pause, he nodded. "Yes. Very. You're right, it could be extremely useful. I'm fluent in English and German, with some Chinese, but not much more than that. Learning other languages has always been something I wanted to do, it just takes a lot of time and practice."

"I know that all too well," she replied, sighing slightly. "Mandarin particularly is somewhat difficult, I was studying it for several years and still wasn't very fluent. Now, though..." She grinned and rattled off a quick sentence in what sounded to him like perfect Mandarin. "No problem."

"Being able to speak and understand Trade could really be handy," he mused out loud, smiling slightly to himself. "OK, I'm in. What do I have to do?"

"We should go somewhere without an audience." Yori looked around, as he followed her eyes, noticing that there were one or two customers discreetly watching them, or more specifically, her. He nodded.

"OK. We're close to the office, will that do? I was going there anyway."

"That's fine." They both got up and left the café, arriving at the PSIA building a few minutes later. He waved his ID at the guard who nodded, pushing the button behind the security counter to unlock the inner door while looking curiously at Yori, who smiled at him. Both of them went in and the door closed again. "A private room would be best," she remarked.

"There's a conference room just down here," he replied, pointing. "There won't be anyone in it this early."

"Great." Entering the room behind him she closed the door, then looked around for a moment. "OK, this is fine. Right, it causes a few seconds of disorientation, so you should lie down, I think."

"Here on the floor?" he asked, looking at her.

"That will do," she agreed, watching as he lay down, looking mildly amused. "OK. Hold this for a moment." She handed him a dark blue near-cube a few centimetres across, which he accepted, inspecting it with curiosity. "Close your eyes." He followed the instructions, wondering what was going to happen. "All right, I'll activate it. You have to give your permission, it's a bit like the security spell. You'll know when." There was a low hum for a moment and the thing in his hands grew slightly warm. Then the world went very weird for a little while.

"Urgle," he commented intelligently, opening his eyes again and waiting for everything to settle down. He looked up at Yori who was smiling down at him, before she relieved him of the device.
and made it vanish, then offered him a hand up. "That was extremely peculiar," he added, less disoriented.

"It's a little odd," she agreed, grinning. "Everyone felt it. But there's no long term issues, it's only while it's linking in to your mind." Shaking his head a little he could almost feel things dropping into place. Sudden realisation struck him.

"We're speaking Trade, aren't we?" he asked incredulously. She nodded, grinning more widely.

"Good, isn't it?"

"It's pretty damn unbelievable," he mumbled, listening to his own voice with slightly numb shock.
It was a remarkable personal demonstration of magic unlike anything he'd previously encountered.
Slowly, a grin grew to match hers.

"Thanks. Very much indeed. This could be... interesting..." he told her with complete honesty, speaking Italian just for the hell of it.

Slightly out of breath, Miki glanced at John, who smiled back when he noticed her looking at him.
They were hiking up the last part of the path that terminated at the top of Mount Rokko, just to the west of Kobe, which gave some fairly spectacular views over the entire area. Nabiki looked back over her shoulder, grinning at them.

"Tired yet?" she asked, not looking worried herself. Miki sighed, then walked a little faster to come up beside her friend.

"You have better stamina than I do. It must be all that swimming."

"It's good aerobic exercise," the Tendo woman agreed. "We could have taken the cable car."

"That's no fun," John puffed from beside her, stopping for a moment to massage his calves, before carrying on. "We can go down on it, secure in the knowledge that we did it the hard way, unlike those soft city dwellers." Miki giggled, gazing at her boyfriend fondly, while he looked pleased with himself. After a moment he also laughed.

Turning so she was walking backwards up the path Nabiki chuckled. "That's an interesting attitude.
I assume Bristol is some hardened frontier town where you grew up killing and eating anything that crossed your path, oh great mountain man?"

John shook his head, snickering. "Not exactly, no. Some areas of it are admittedly not entirely safe, but by and large it's a lot like Kobe, or Tokyo even, only flatter for the most part and with a lot less people. There are a few pretty steep hills, though." He looked up the path, wincing a bit. "Not as steep as this or as tall."

Turning around again and continuing to walk, Nabiki replied, "The first part wasn't too bad. We're nearly half way up this last bit so it won't be long now. We can collapse in a restaurant, admire the view, and get soundly taken advantage of by the no doubt excessively high prices for lunch."

Laughing, Miki nodded. "I haven't been up here for a few years, but I remember the food was pretty good. You're right though, it's expensive."

"Captive market," John sighed. "Tourist traps are always like that."

"The botanical garden is nice," she added. "There are lots of other things as well, it's a major resort.
In the winter the skiing is fun.

"Way too hot for skiing," John muttered, stopping again and fumbling in the small backpack he had for a bottle of water, which he drained quickly. Nabiki pulled one out as well and drank from it as they took a breather, looking around at the view. "Almost too hot for climbing mountains as well."

"We're not exactly climbing it," the Tendo sister laughed. "More like walking up a steep street." She nodded to a couple who passed them, the trio moving back slightly to allow it. Both the older people nodded back, smiling, then continued on their way. John was right, Miki thought, it was indeed quite a hot day, although as they climbed the altitude was bringing the temperature back down to something reasonable. She remembered how much colder it got at the top and decided it was probably a good thing it was so warm.

After a moments more rest, they resumed the walk. Eventually the path levelled out as it reached the top and they looked around. "Let's go to that restaurant first," Miki suggested, pointing. "I could do with a rest and something to eat even if it is overpriced. There's a good view from inside as well from what I remember."

"Fine by me," Nabiki replied. John nodded and they all headed off in that direction. Shortly they were sitting at a table waiting for their orders to arrive, looking out at Kobe and the surrounding area, much of which was industrialised, including some fairly impressive port facilities, pointing out various things to each other.

"It's amazing at night," Miki commented. "Lights as far as you can see. During the day it's a bit grim, there's only so much you can do with a port, after all."

John, who was watching something below through a pair of binoculars he'd produced from his pack, nodded absently. "True enough, I guess, although it's still quite impressive. Bristol has some pretty large port areas but you can't really look down on them like this."

"Same with Tokyo," Nabiki agreed. "You can go up in a few of the buildings and look at the port, but it's nothing like as far up as this is." She looked up as their meal arrived, thanking the server. Eating took precedence for the next twenty minutes.

"Expensive, yes, but good food," she said as she finished her meal, looking satisfied.

"It's not at all bad," John agreed. They talked for a little longer, looking out the window, then left the restaurant. After a short discussion they headed for the botanical garden, deciding to investigate the place.

An hour later Miki leaned against a tree, watching Nabiki framing a shot with an expensive looking camera. The other woman pressed the shutter button, then lowered the camera from her eye, smiling, as she stood up from the slight crouch she'd gotten into to get the shot just right. "I'll have to change film, that was the last shot on the roll," she said.

"That's a very impressive camera, Nabiki," Miki said admiringly. Engaged in the process of carefully reloading the thing, the Tendo woman smiled a little, nodding.

"It's a nice one, definitely. I was wanting something like this for quite a while and took the opportunity of the holiday to give me the excuse to buy it. I've got a lot of film to develop when I go back." She held up the roll of film she'd extracted from the camera, which she'd put back into the silver package the replacement one had been in, before putting it carefully back into her pack. "One more, now."
"I'll be interested in seeing them when you've got them processed," Miki noted. She looked around for a second. "Any idea where that boyfriend of mine got to? He wandered off ten minutes ago now."

"I think he's back over there somewhere," Nabiki replied, indicating where the path had split a couple of hundred metres back. "He was looking at an interesting tree." She laughed for a moment. "I think it was an excuse to have a break."

Giggling, Miki grinned at her friend. "I think you may be right. I'm going to go and look for him."

"OK. I want to take a few more photos, though. Shall I meet you guys later?"

Nodding, Miki asked, "Where?" She pulled a tourist map out of her pocket and opened it out, looking at it for a few seconds, then around at their surroundings. "We're, um... here, more or less. How about up here at the observation deck? There's a good view from there."

"All right, that looks fine," the other woman responded, studying the map for a moment, then nodding. "Forty-five minutes or so?"

"Sounds good," Miki agreed. She put the map away, looking up as she did. "Mind you, if those clouds come in, we won't see anything. It gets really foggy up here sometimes." Nabiki followed her view, frowning slightly.

"Hmm. I see what you mean. The wind is blowing this way as well. Oh well, if it clouds over we can go and do something else."

"I think we should go to the hot springs on the way down," the Sano woman suggested. "If we go back that way, it's about an hour or so walk to Arima, then we can take the bus back home."

Putting her camera away, Nabiki thought for a moment, then nodded again. "That's not a bad idea. I'm up for it if John is. All right, I'm going to wander around for a while and shoot another couple of rolls then I'll meet you, OK?"

Waving, Miki headed off to find her wayward boyfriend, while behind her, her friend went in the direction of a display of odd-looking bushes.

Finishing the third roll of film Nabiki sat on a rock and reloaded the camera with the second to last one in the box, putting the exposed roll back into the new one's packaging to protect it, then sticking it into her ki pocket through the back-pack to make it look normal in case anyone was watching. She smiled a little to herself. 'No one would believe how much stuff I have in my backpack' she thought, amused. She could, after all, produce things such as over a hundred litres of water on demand from something that was apparently barely capable of holding the camera she put back into it, before zipping it up. Hopping to her feet she looked around, nodding politely to a pedestrian who walked slowly past enjoying the day. He nodded back with a smile and went about his business.

'It would appear that the weather forecast was in error this morning, Nabiki,' Jun commented as she glanced up, noticing that the clouds were drawing in rapidly. '#This weather wasn't due to arrive for another three hours.'

'Better make the best of it, then,' she replied, smiling internally, heading off in the direction of the observation platform. Miki and John should, in theory, be on their way there as well. She idly cast her sense outwards to see if she could locate them but found they must have been out of range.
Walking slowly onwards, she looked around curiously, stopping now and then to examine the scenery. There were growing numbers of people apparent as she left the immediate area of the botanical garden and entered the busier parts of the resort.

Stopping briefly to look at the view towards Osaka and Kobe through a gap in the buildings, she sighed a little as the lowering cloud started covering it. Seconds later the distant city-scape had vanished into the mist. 'There it goes. Oh, well. I got some nice pictures even so.'

'It is unlikely to clear in the next hour as far as I can determine,' Jun told her. She shrugged a little.

'That's what happens up mountains in Japan, even ones only a kilometre or so high,' she commented philosophically. 'It's been nice up until now and it's still pretty warm. We can find something else to do other than looking at the view.' Walking towards her goal, she slowed a few hundred metres further on as she heard a car engine rev up, screaming far higher than seemed reasonable for the winding roads at the top of the mountain. Puzzled, she turned slightly in the direction it was coming from, shown on the map overlay Jun was producing as the car park for the 'Garden Terrace' complex, which seemed to be a restaurant and a few other touristy things, a little way from her original destination.

By now it was getting sufficiently misty as the cloud-base lowered that the visibility was down to less than a hundred metres to unaided vision. Jun's sensory package dealt with the fog quite well for some considerable distance further than that, using a mix of wavelengths, but even then she could no longer make out the city below. It had begun using the enhanced vision modes without comment as the fog grew heavier.

The screaming engine sound abruptly terminated in a distant crash, followed by some crunching sounds that died away into the mist. Cries of shock were audible after the louder sounds stopped. Something was obviously amiss. Running now, she soon arrived at the car park, to find a crowd of people standing around looking at a gap in the trees on the south-eastern edge of the car park, a number of them frantically using their phones. "What happened?" she asked a middle-aged woman who was watching with worry. The woman looked at her for a moment then went back to observing the drama.

"Someone got out of their car up the road there and left it running," she explained, indicating a position some distance from the car park. "Her child was in the back seat. Apparently he climbed over the seat and managed to put the car in gear and then pressed the accelerator, the car went down here, hit a couple of other vehicles, then went right over the edge over there with him in it." She looked shocked and pale. "Poor little thing, he was only about five. I hope he's all right." She didn't look hopeful.

'A few metres past the boundary of the car park the hillside drops off quite rapidly,' Jun told her quietly, displaying a topographical map of the surroundings. 'The tree cover is heavy enough to slow a vehicle, but if it had sufficient speed when it hit, the slope is enough that it could continue for some distance. I would estimate that it would be roughly in this area depending on the size, weight, and velocity of the vehicle when it left the road.' It put a marker about two hundred metres down the mountain-side, which was a vertical drop of over a hundred metres.

'What are the odds he's still alive?' she asked, thanking the woman and glancing around, then quickly heading off to find a place without witnesses, activating her bracelet as soon as she was out of sight. The SI paused for a moment.

'Reasonable, but by no means certain,' it replied. 'If the airbags deployed, and the vehicle was correctly orientated, the occupant may be uninjured. If, on the other hand, it rolled, or hit an obstruction such as a tree branch that penetrated the windscreen...# The machine didn't continue. It didn't need to. She nodded, scanning the area, then jumping onto the roof of a two-story building. Checking one more she leaped off again, taking on her flying 'Azumi' form in the process and soaring out into the fog, heading down the slope while probing with her ki senses and Jun's sensory package.

She located the vehicle within thirty seconds, circling over its location. Normal vision wouldn't have seen it easily from her position, as it was obscured both by the foliage and the mist, but the thermal signature showed it clearly. #It is on its roof,# Jun commented with a worried tone. #That's not good. But it looks like it fairly slowly rolled at the last moment. That may have saved the child.#

"He's alive, I can feel it," she said, dropping lower, while picking a good place to land among the trees. Shortly she was standing next to the car. Bending down 'Azumi' peered in, to see a small boy lying in an awkward position on the ceiling of the car, one leg tangled in the steering wheel. His ki output was fluctuating in a manner that suggested a fairly serious injury. Inspecting him carefully she found his leg was broken in two places and he had several broken ribs, at a minimum.

#There would appear to be damage to his lung, here,# the SI told her, indicating a particular injury. #The fourth rib on the left side has torn it as it snapped. In addition he has a punctured diaphragm. He won't be able to breath for much longer. Moving him is inadvisable.#

'Damn.' She commed her sister and Ranma. "Got another one, guys."

"I thought you were just visiting friends," the martial artist commented wryly as she sent him the scan information.

"I thought so as well," she responded with a sigh. "But things keep happening..."

"We know how that goes, sure enough," he chuckled. "This kid is a mess. We'll get Aiko back and be with you in a couple of minutes. He's not going to last long enough for the rescue people to get to him."

"Thanks," she said with relief. She could hear people up in the car park still shouting, and distant sirens approaching the area. Less than a minute and a half later 'Chou', 'Yori', and Aiko appeared next to her. The blonde woman dropped to her knees next to her sister, giving her a quick smile, and reached into the crushed vehicle, putting her hands on the small boy. Golden light flared.

"He's lost a fair amount of blood, mostly internally," she reported after a second or two. "The ribs are bad, the leg is as well, and there's minor spinal damage." Glancing at 'Yori' she looked concerned.

"We need to get him out of there," her husband noted. She looked at Aiko and 'Azumi' for a moment. "You guys steady this thing, I'll cut it open, OK?"

"Right." Aiko nodded to her friend, then she grabbed the front of the car, holding it still. The middle sister moved to the rear of the vehicle and did the same. Producing an energy blade, 'Yori' carefully sliced the vehicle in half, Aiko gently separating her part from the rear, while 'Chou' lifted the patient out and put him on the ground, then bent over him. As the other two pushed the remains of the vehicle to the side, 'Yori' joined her wife at the young casualty's side, a purple glow mixing with the golden one.

"Can you hold his leg like this, please?" 'Chou' requested. Her sister did as requested. Shortly the blonde removed her hands. "That's done."
"The ribs are done as well. Just working on the lung. Check for other damage will you, love, while I finish this and do the diaphragm?" 'Chou' nodded silently, resuming her work.

While the middle sister and her friend watched quietly, the two martial artists healed the boy, finishing after a little less than five minutes from the time they'd appeared. Finally they both sat back looking satisfied. "He'll be fine, now," 'Yori' said, smiling. "And he'll be asleep for about another ten minutes."

"Thank you all," 'Azumi' told them, relieved.

"No problems." The martial artist looked up the hill towards the sounds coming from the car park. "You OK with the rest?"

"I think so. I'll take him back and hand him over, then sneak off." She giggled. "I'm not going to stick around. I need to be Nabiki again, without any reason to have her associated with flying magical girls."

"No names, then, like that fishing boat." 'Yori' snickered. "Have fun. We'll see you later."

"Bye." She smiled as Aiko grinned at her, then stepped back, the others joining her. The outbound flash lit the fog, which by now was fairly thick, then she was alone with a sleeping child. Looking down at him she shook her head. "Come on, kid, lets get you back to your mother before anything else happens." Bending down she effortlessly picked the child up, holding him close, then hopped onto the remains of the car, before taking off and flapping hard. The extra weight of the boy wasn't too difficult to handle although she could certainly notice it. Swinging widely out over the slope she gained altitude then headed back to the car park and all the flashing lights.

"What on earth is going on?" John asked, as he and Miki approached the commotion in the car park. She shrugged.

"No idea. It certainly seems to be causing a fuss, though." Walking closer they found a witness and made enquiries. The man explained, waving at the fire and rescue team who were attaching ropes to the trees near the edge of the car park as they prepared to work their way down the trail the car had left as it penetrated the undergrowth on its way down the side of the mountain. "Oh, dear," Miki sighed, worried on behalf of the boy and his mother. John put his hand on her shoulder. "That poor child. And his mother." They looked over to the late-twenties woman who was sitting on the back of the open ambulance talking frantically to a paramedic and a police officer, who appeared to be trying to calm her down.

"It's horrible," John replied quietly. "But at least the slope isn't too steep. I mean, you couldn't easily walk down it, but it's not a cliff as such. Maybe he's all right."

"I hope so," she said, watching the people get ready to descend the slope.

Someone behind them suddenly cried, "Look!", making everyone nearby turn, then follow her outstretched finger. Rather suddenly, complete silence fell, broken only by the soft sound of huge wings flapping a couple of times.

Miki stared in total shock, as did everyone else, as the flying girl dropped out of the fog and landed gently in the middle of the car park, folding her wings behind her. She looked around at the people staring at her, a small smile on her face, meeting Miki's eyes for a moment, then turned toward the ambulance, walking over to the three people in the back of it. All of them were gaping at her silently. After a couple of seconds, the mother noticed what she was carrying, letting out a shriek of mixed relief and terror, before leaping out of the vehicle and running over with her arms out. The winged woman gently transferred the child to her, leaning in and saying something quietly for a moment.

The woman, tears running down her face, smiled brilliantly at the girl, who grinned back. Taking a few steps back she looked around again, waved, then took off with a blast of air that washed over the crowd, vanishing almost instantly into the mist. The sound of wings beating came back for a moment until it faded away.

Silence fell once more, broken eventually by a small voice asking, "Mommy? Where are we?"

Total bedlam broke out as tourists began talking loudly, everyone trying to work out what had happened. Miki watched the mother holding her child, while the paramedic jumped to his feet, apparently suddenly remembering his job, and ran over to check him out. The policeman who had been talking to the mother seemed to be writing some notes with a bemused expression on his face, shaking his head slowly. Over where the rescue crew had been setting up they seemed to be trying to work out what to do. In the end, a couple of them headed off down the mountain-side, she presumed to see what had happened to the car.

Eventually, she turned to John, who was switching between watching the mother with her little boy and staring upwards with an odd expression. "We just saw a real magical girl," she said, feeling happier than she thought possible. He nodded, still looking upwards.

"Seems like it," he said absently.

"Can you remember what she looked like?" Miki asked, frowning. She'd suddenly realised that the details seemed to have slipped her mind. Lowering his gaze to hers, her boyfriend frowned as well.

"She was... she had... wings? She was flying?"

"I know that much, I think. But what did she look like?"

He stared blankly at her. "I have no idea."

"Weird. Neither do I," she mumbled, straining her memory, without success. A voice behind her made her jump, then turn, to find Nabiki looking curiously at her.

"There you guys are. I've been looking for you." She looked around at the assembled crowd of emergency vehicles and bystanders. "What's going on?"

"Bizarre." Nabiki grinned at her friends, who were sitting in the steaming water across from her, both of them wearing the expressions of people who were trying very hard to remember something they simply couldn't. Miki growled in frustration.

"It's so annoying. I was twenty metres from a flying magical girl, and I can't remember anything about what she looked like! Not her hair colour, or eye colour, or anything about her face or clothes..." She sighed heavily. "I wonder who she was? And why she was here?"

"Good thing she was," the middle sister laughed. "From what you said it could have been unpleasant if she hadn't turned up."

"Maybe she was just passing?" John mused. He shrugged a little. "I guess we'll never know." After a moment, he chuckled, glancing at Miki, who looked back curiously. "Cheer up. You might not know anything about her, but you at least saw her. Hana... didn't." Miki suddenly got a very pleased expression, cackling with glee. Nabiki grinned at John, who smiled back.

"Oh, that's going to drive her totally crazy," the middle Sano sister giggled, highly amused and apparently no longer annoyed about her inability to remember the details. Satisfied with the outcome, Nabiki leaned back in the hot water and closed her eyes, pleased with the way the day had gone.

"It's been very nice having you here, Nabiki," Umeko said, hugging the middle Tendo, who reciprocated. "Feel free to drop in any time you're in Kobe."

"Thank you, Umeko," she replied with a smile. Turning, she shook hands with Harue, who grinned at her.

"And thanks again for pushing me onto my face on concrete," he joked. She chuckled, Miki and her sisters laughing as well.

"I'm more than happy to do it any time, Harue," she giggled.

"Good luck with your degree," he added. "Have a safe trip back."

"Thanks. And thanks for letting me stay here, it's been a lot of fun."

"It was no trouble, Nabiki, at all. We loved having you." Umeko smiled at the Tendo woman, putting her arm around her husband's waist and leaning on him. They watched as Nabiki headed off with Miki and John, Hana and Kimiko accompanying them, walking towards the train station.

"It's been nice to meet you, Hana, and you, Kimiko," she said as they walked. "Hana, I'll ask about those action figures, I promise, although as I said, I can't make any guarantees." The older woman looked at her with an expression of near-delirious hope even despite the caution.

"Please do, Nabiki," she requested, smiling weirdly. "It would mean a lot to me." Miki poked her, so she added, "Both of us, I meant."

"Of course you did, sis," Miki said slightly sarcastically. Kimiko started laughing, followed by John, both of them exchanging a glance with an amused Nabiki. The two older sisters started arguing in a fairly good-natured manner, an argument that lasted most of the way to the train station, while the remaining members of the group listened with amusement.

When they reached their destination, they exchanged glances. Miki leaned forward and hugged her friend. "I'll see you in Nerima at the weekend. I'm looking forward to meeting your family this time."

"They're all crazy, I warn you now," the middle Tendo laughed.

"Good. I like crazy people, they remind me of home," she replied, looking meaningfully at Hana, who went mildly pink and opened her mouth to say something. Kimiko helpfully stepped on her foot which made her yelp but close her mouth again, frowning a little.

Smiling a bit, Nabiki turned to the older Sano sister. "Hey, Hana? If you want, you can come to our party as well. You too, Kimiko. We've got plenty of room for you to stay over then go back the next day." Both the other sisters exchanged a glance, looking mildly puzzled. Nabiki along with John and Miki had managed not to let either of them know why the party was unusual. Amused, she glanced at Miki, who was grinning. "Tell her, but wait until I'm out of earshot, OK?"
“Right.” Miki laughed. Shaking hands with John, Nabiki waved to them all, then headed for her train, beginning to laugh when she heard a shriek go up from behind her.

"SIX?!!"

Giggling, she boarded the train and settled in for the homeward journey, pleased and relaxed by her visit.

---

Note: The arcade game used for Nabiki’s routing of Kyo doesn't actually exist as such, it's sort of a hybrid of a number of different games I've seen over the years with a basis in Konami's Pop'n Music game. It's a long time since I went into an arcade...
The Hollywood Adventures! part 1

And we're back in the room.

My apologies about the more than two month delay in posting. Work got on top of me once again, which is irritating, but what can you do? Not to mention all the other things that tend to happen at this time of year.

The invasion of Hollywood by Akane and Shampoo is turning out to be at least a two chapter thing. This is the first part, there will be one or more other parts soon, and the party one is mostly done as well so will go up soon after the end of this storyline. Additionally I have outlined several more chapters and done bits of them too. Along with most of one that wouldn't let me be until I wrote it, which is some way down the line yet, but will eventually get merged in. So I've actually written quite a few words these last couple of months or so, just not all in a linear way.

I'm going to have to update my character list, it's not very current. Lots of new people seem to have turned up recently as well...

On a completely different note, having Jean Michel Jarre playing in the background seems to boost creativity, for me at least. Always has done. So thank him for about half of this chapter.

He'd probably like that. Apparently he's a decent guy :)

Adrian jumped a little when the three women suddenly appeared twenty feet away, unable to help it, despite knowing it was going to happen any moment now. He glanced at his watch, smiling, then walked over to them. "Right on time. Great."

Aiko grinned at him. "I do my best to run a tight schedule," she laughed, making him grin as well. Beside her, Akane chuckled, while Shampoo smiled, looking around with interest. Aiko followed the lilac-haired woman's eyes for a moment. They were standing in a car park behind a small mall, which had few vehicles in it at the current time. "Why did you want us here?" she asked curiously.

"I thought it was a good idea not to have three young women simply appear out of thin air in the middle of the studio quite yet," he explained, laughing for a moment at the thought of the reactions that would have followed such a thing. They were probably going to have to learn to live with it, he mused, if things went the way he expected. "This is on the way to the hotel, the studio is about half a mile over there," he added, pointing, "so it was convenient. I'll take you to the hotel and get you settled in. I can show you the way as well, so if you want to come back this way, you'll know how." Looking at Akane and Shampoo he smiled as they exchanged a glance then nodded understandably.

"I assume you won't be hanging around the entire time providing instant transportation, after all," the director grinned, looking back to Aiko. She rubbed her chin thoughtfully.

"Well, I'm certainly sticking around to meet Richard and Emily," she grinned. "Hey, if you like, we should all go out later. But no, I'll probably have to get back sooner or later. I might drop in to see how things are going, though." She looked at Akane. "Just call me when you need a lift home, OK, if I'm not around?"

"Thanks, Aiko," the blue-haired woman smiled. "I know I've said it before, but you really are being amazingly generous with all this jumping us back and forth." Aiko waved a hand negligently, smiling at them all.

"No problem. It's not hard, I enjoy travelling, and I like meeting new people. Plus I'm curious to see how it all turns out." Holding out her hand she shook both Shampoo's and Akane's, then stepped back a few feet. "I'll call you later, but I'm off to say hi to Richard and his family. See you." They all turned their heads away from the flash, then the girl was gone.

"I still can't get over that," Adrian laughed. Looking thoughtful, he added, "I wish I could figure out how to get her into a movie. I can think of all sorts of ways she and the others could do something amazing." Shaking his head as Akane giggled, he shrugged. "Oh well. I have to start somewhere. You guys are going to be amazing as well, in a slightly different way, but a good one. Come on, my car is over here." He led the way to his Mercedes, popping the trunk with his remote and taking their bags, which he stowed away before closing it again. Shampoo admired the vehicle then frowned as the Tendo woman took her moment of inattention to grab the front passenger seat.

"Hey! I wanted sit in front," she complained mildly, getting in the rear as Akane laughed.

"Too slow, Shampoo."

"Tell that in next spar..." the Chinese girl retorted, putting her seat-belt on. Laughing as well, Adrian got in behind the wheel, putting his belt on with one hand while he started the engine with the other, then slipped the vehicle into drive and headed out of the car park.

Glancing sideways he studied Shampoo in the mirror, then looked at Akane. Both of them were watching the scenery passing with small smiles, looking excited and happy, as well as somewhat nervous, particularly Akane for that last part. Returning his attention to the road he asked, "How have you two been since the last time we met?"

"Very well, thanks, Adrian," the Tendo woman replied, taking her attention off the passing world and looking at him. She still looked slightly nervous but seemed to be relaxing, the excitement remaining, he noted with amusement. "We've both been training hard and Shampoo has been practising her English as much as possible."

"Still needs much work but is better," the Amazon agreed, laughing a little. "Not good, sorry, I am not good with languages."

"You'll pick it up in no time once you're using it all day," he assured her.

"That's what Aiko said," Akane noted. "She speaks it really well, much better than I do."

"She and her friends are remarkably fluent, I'd agree," Adrian replied, slowing for the next set of lights, then waiting for them to change. "None of them really have much accent at all. Yori and Chou basically have almost none, but the others are nearly as good." He accelerated again as the light went green, swerving to avoid a sports-car that suddenly cut in far too close in front of them. "Idiot," he muttered. More loudly, he continued, "You have an accent, certainly, Akane, but it's not at all bad, better than a lot of people from Japan I've heard by a long way."

He glanced at her for a moment again. "Your father, uncle, and aunt all seemed to speak English surprisingly well, I noticed when we were over a while back. How's your sister at it? Nabiki, isn't it?"

"She's very fluent as well," Akane told him with a faint smile. "She was always good at languages." Grinning for a moment, she looked over her shoulder at her friend. "She's sort of the exact opposite of Shampoo in that respect." The Chinese girl in the back seat reached out and smacked her on the back of the head, giggling.

"Impressive. Many Americans aren't very good at other languages, except Spanish in parts of the country. Is English taught a lot over there?"

"It is around Furinkan, certainly, it was part of the school syllabus the whole time I was there, and Dad said the same," she replied. "Not everyone is good at it, I certainly know a lot of people who can barely speak it, and some older ones who can't at all, but it's pretty common at home to find someone who can understand it quite well."

"Interesting. And in this case, very useful." He smiled at her laughter. "Oh, while I think about it, in that box on the back seat next to you, Shampoo, are a couple of packages I put together for you both." The girl looked down, picking up the box and putting it on her legs, then opening it, while Akane twisted around in her seat to look. Inside it, there were a couple of large envelopes with one of their names on each. Shampoo handed Akane the one addressed to her then opened the one she had left with a curious expression. Akane did the same with hers, looking into it.

"There's a cell phone each with all the relevant numbers for me, Matt, Jim, and Aaron already programmed in, as well as a limo firm we use, a very good pizza delivery place, the main studio switchboard, and your home numbers, as well as the numbers for each other. And Aiko's number as well." He smiled as Akane pulled out the phone and studied it with interest. "Keep them. They're billed to the studio, don't worry about using them. There's also three thousand dollars cash each for running around with. That should be enough for the next few days but if you need any more just let me know. It's easier than changing Yen, you'll probably need it for tips and things like that." He laughed a little. "Americans tip everything. I know it's not the done thing in Japan and you're not used to it, but be warned, it's sort of expected here. Fifteen percent is a safe level, not too much or too little."

He explained a little more about the subject, both young women listening and nodding. "It's very generous of you, Adrian," Akane said in the end.

"Don't worry about it, it's not a lot of money for the studio, believe me. This is essentially a paid job trial so they're not fussed." Putting the envelope of cash she'd been looking through back into the larger one, Akane removed a few papers and looked at them. "Maps of the area, a brief itinerary of the next couple of days, and some useful addresses," he explained.

"OK. Thanks." She flipped through them quickly then put everything away, and the phone into her pocket after turning it on. "So what's the plan now?"

Indicating left he took a turn, then glanced at her. "More or less what we discussed. One of the studio executives had a minor emergency so he's asked if we could delay everything a little tomorrow. As a result we'll have a couple of hours extra in the morning to look around if you'd like. It shouldn't cause any real problems, although I apologise for it on his behalf."

"Not problem, Adrian," Shampoo told him from the rear of the vehicle. "We don't mind."

"OK. Well in that case, we'll get you settled in to the hotel, which is the one we always use for guests of the studio, then we can look around for a while. Aiko's idea is a good one, we could go out for a meal as well. I know several very nice restaurants. There are lots in LA." Akane looked back to Shampoo who nodded with a smile, before turning to him again.

"That sounds interesting. I'd like it as well. I like Richard and his family."

"Great. Right, here we are," he replied, indicating again, pulling into the entrance of the hotel. He drove slowly up the palm-tree lined main drive for a hundred feet then parked in a short-stay space. A bell-boy popped up out of apparently nowhere and hurried over as they got out, making both young women look slightly surprised. Adrian motioned him off with a gesture before he'd made it half-way, the young man looking mildly disappointed but retreating, then opened the trunk again. "There's not enough luggage to bother with help," he laughed, picking up their bags and then closing and locking the vehicle. Leading the way inside all three of them sighed a little in relief as the cool of the air-conditioned interior swept over them.

"It's been a very hot day," he added, "and still is. What's it like in Tokyo?"

"Not as hot as this but very warm," Akane told him. "I'm glad to be inside now. Is it always this hot at this time of year?"

"It can be. Today was a little excessive, though. It's forecast to cool down a bit over the next few days." Walking over to the desk he smiled at the young woman behind it who stood up as they approached. "Hello. There should be two rooms booked under the name of Mountain Pictures Studios, for Akane Tendo and Xian Pu?" The pretty blonde tapped on a computer keyboard with elegantly manicured fingertips for a few seconds, then nodded with a smile.

"Hello, Mr Stewart, it's nice to see you again. Yes, here we are. They're paid for already by the studio as usual." She looked at the two young women who were inspecting the tastefully and somewhat elaborate lobby with expressions of interest. "If you could both fill out these cards, please?" The woman slipped a pair of registration cards across the desk to them along with a couple of pens. Both his guests signed in the appropriate place, adding the details the receptionist asked for, then handed the cards and pens back.

"Thank you." She put them away, before typing again for a minute or two. "Here we go, these are your key cards, they open the main door, which is locked after eleven PM, your rooms, and the sports centre upstairs. You're in Suite 1216, Miss Tendo, and you're next door in 1218, Miss Pu." The girls took the cards she handed over. "Access to the pool closes at two AM but the gym is open all night. Breakfast starts at seven in the morning, the restaurant is just down that corridor over there." She pointed for a moment, as they looked and nodded. "It closes at eleven, but room service is available twenty-four hours a day. Please enjoy your stay. If you need anything, dial zero on the phone and someone will be able to help."

"Thank you very much, Helen," Akane replied, smiling, looking at the woman's ID tag for a second. Helen smiled back.

"You're more than welcome, Miss Tendo." She pointed again. "The elevators are over there. Up to the twelfth floor, turn left, it's a short walk down the corridor."

"Thanks," Adrian told her, discreetly slipping a fifty across the desk, which vanished without trace or a change in her expression. Smiling to himself he picked up the bags which he'd put on the floor then accompanied the two young women to the elevator. Shampoo pressed the call button, the doors opening almost immediately and all of them entering. "We've been using this hotel for several years," he explained as they silently ascended. "It's a very nice place. Not the highest end one around, but it's got an excellent reputation, and an extremely good restaurant. Their steaks are amazing. The swimming pool on the roof is pretty good as well, you should check it out."

Once the doors opened he lead them down the corridor towards their rooms. "She means it about the room service as well," he laughed. "They have a concierge team that can do almost anything."

Akane grinned, glancing at her friend, who was looking around with a smile on her face. "I've never been in a hotel this nice before," she admitted. "Or really stayed in many hotels at all."
"You'll enjoy it," he told her. "If you were here for longer we'd arrange a short-term apartment but for only a few days this is easier. OK, here we are." He stopped outside 1216. Akane pulled out the card she'd received, looked at it for a moment, then inserted it into the slot in the door reader.

"Other way up," he grinned.

"Oops." She giggled, taking it out and reinserting it. The little light blinked green, the lock beeped, and she opened the door, walking in then stopping dead. "Oh, wow! This place is enormous!"

"Move out way, Akane," Shampoo commented, making the Tendo woman take a few steps further to allow them to enter as well. She looked around, then at her friend, smiling widely. "Is very nice."

The room, or rooms, actually, formed what was close to an apartment. The main room one entered from the corridor was a large one, with a window at the far end overlooking the city, a desk on one side near it, while a sofa and two chairs surrounded a table on the other side. Opening off the main room to the left was the bedroom which contained a large double bed, another desk, and two more chairs, they discovered when they explored, along with another window that was slightly smaller. The somewhat elaborate tiled bathroom opened off the bedroom. Both young women wandered around for a little while as Adrian watched with amusement.

"It's really nice," Akane laughed. "This room is twice the size of the living room at home and the bedroom is bigger than Dad's. About the only thing missing is a kitchen!"

"There's a microwave and a kettle in that cupboard for snacks," he pointed out, "but normally the sort of people who stay in a place like this expect to have someone bring them food. Which, of course, they can do, quickly and efficiently. I stayed here myself once while my house was being fumigated and almost didn't want to go home." He grinned as they both giggled. "Shampoo, you're next door." All three of them went back into the corridor and examined the next door suite, which was laid out as a mirror image of the one Akane was in. Shampoo took her bag from Adrian and put it on the bed, then rejoined them in the living room.

"Is good room. I like it." The Chinese woman smiled as he nodded to her, satisfied. Pulling an envelope out of his inner jacket pocket he looked at it for a moment, then nodded again.

"May as well get this out of the way first." Opening it he removed some papers, handing them each the appropriate set. Both women looked at them with interest. "This is some standard, basic liability waiver documentation that Legal insists on us getting signed. It basically says that stunt work can be dangerous and that you won't immediately sue us if you chip a nail or something." Akane started laughing as she read the paperwork. "It's a little more complicated than that, of course," he added, snickering. "I'd suggest that you read it thoroughly later then sign it if you're happy, give it back to me in the morning. If you have any questions, either call me, or wait until tomorrow and we can clear them up." He examined both of them, remembering the demonstration in Richard Harrison's back garden, then shook his head.

"I very much doubt that anything we can do to you stands much hope of really causing damage, based on past performance, but we have these hoops to jump through. When this goes further I'd strongly suggest you get your own legal representation to look over the full contracts, but for now this is pretty basic. I wouldn't think all that much of it actually applies in this case but the studio insists."

Laughing a little, Akane glanced at her friend, who grinned back. "We understand. We'll look it over and sign it later." She studied him in return for a few seconds. "You seem very sure we'll get the jobs."
"I am," he replied honestly. "You both have a level of talent I've never seen anything even close to before. What I can do with you two available... It's almost unbelievable. If the studio doesn't hire you, they're idiots, and despite what some people have said in the past, by and large they're not. So, yes, I fully expect that you and I are going to be working together pretty soon." He grinned as she looked pleased.

"That nice to hear, Adrian," Shampoo told him. He shrugged.

"It's the truth. I'm looking forward to it, you have no idea how much. Right, let's go and show you guys around the area for a while. Then we can see about going out for a meal, with Richard, Aiko, and the others. I'll call Matt and Aaron as well. Oh, and Jim, he'll want to come." They headed back downstairs, both young women waving to Helen at the front desk, who nodded to them with a polite smile, soon finding themselves back in his car and driving back into LA.

"Lieutenant?" Harrison looked up at the uniformed officer who had stopped by his desk, raising an eyebrow. "You have a visitor," the man said, pointing. He looked over and smiled happily at Aiko, as she waved to him from near the door.

"OK, thanks, Mark," he replied, waving her over. The officer nodded with a smile and went about his business, casting the Japanese girl an appreciative look as she walked over. She winked at him as he left, causing him to grin. "Hello, Aiko," Harrison said, watching with amusement.

"It's nice to see you, Richard," she said happily. Sitting in the chair she acquired from the empty desk next door, she leaned back and smiled at him. "How are you?"

"I'm fine, thanks."

"And Emily and Serena?"

"They're doing well, too," he said, smiling. "Emily will be very pleased to see you. We were talking about you and the others only a couple of days ago. Serena is looking forward to going back to school, sort of, but is also enjoying herself. Still doing the archery, she's getting pretty good. I had to buy her another bow, she outgrew the last one remarkably fast. The new one has a high enough pull that I find it a little difficult." He shook his head in mild wonder. "Nothing like that horrific thing you gave Shampoo, but impressive even so." Aiko snickered at the memory. "How are Akane and Shampoo getting on? I assume that's why you're here? Adrian and Jim were over last week for beer, they mentioned the girls would be coming over again soon."

"Yep, that's it. I dropped them off with Adrian a few minutes ago. They're going to be doing some practice stunts, getting specialist training, meeting the studio people, that sort of thing. It will probably go on until Thursday or so from what I know." She looked around, then back at him. "Should be interesting. I hope they do well."

"So do I. They seem like very decent and intelligent young women," he told her.

"They are." She smiled a bit. "Akane deserves some good luck after some of the things that happened to the poor girl earlier on in her life. I think they're going to have fun." Aiko smirked a little. "But you may find that, professionally, things go a little weird around here." He looked narrowly at her as she grinned.

"I hope not to the level of Minato," he growled. "That place is insane. If demons start popping up I know who I'm going to blame and it's not Akane or Shampoo." The brunette started laughing, which he joined in on.
"I don't think it will go that far," she laughed, shaking her head. "But if it does, you have my number, and Yori's. Call us and we'll come and help."

"Hmm. I'm not sure if that makes me feel better or not." The brunette grinned again at his words.

"Don't worry," she said, laughing, "I'm sure you'll get used to it..."

Both of them collapsed in howls of laughter, making everyone else in the large room look to see what on earth was going on. Eventually, wiping his eyes, he smiled. "Thanks, I needed a good laugh. So, what are you planning on doing next?"

"I was thinking we should all go out for a meal later," Aiko replied. "Adrian and the others seemed up for it. Are you?"

He thought for a moment, then nodded. "I'd like that. Let me call Em and find out if she had anything planned. Hang on a second." Picking up his desk phone he hit a speed-dial number and waited, the phone at the other end being picked up after half a dozen rings.

"Hello?" His wife's voice sounded in his ear, making him smile.

"Hi, dear, it's me. Look, Aiko is in town, she brought Akane and Shampoo over for Adrian for a few days. Would you like to go out later with everyone? I'd imagine Jim is probably coming, and Adrian will most likely bring those guys from the studio as well."

"That sounds really nice," Emily told him, sounding pleased. "Serena would enjoy it as well, she was very impressed by both those young ladies last time. Where did you think of going?"

"I'm not sure yet. Down-town somewhere, I guess." He looked at Aiko who nodded, holding up some fingers. "Around half past seven to eight seems to be the idea."

"All right. I won't make dinner, then." She laughed as he smiled a little. "Should Serena and I meet you, or are you coming home first?"

Harrison mulled the question over, glancing at Aiko, then replied, "I think I'll come home. I was close to leaving anyway. It'll take about forty minutes at this time of day, which leaves time to change."

"I'm happy to provide transportation, Richard," the Japanese girl told him in a low voice, looking amused.

He nodded. "Aiko says she's OK with taking us so we can leave the car at home."

"Oh." His wife sounded slightly hesitant. "Is it... safe? Teleportation, I mean."

"It's fine, dear, trust me. The first time will make you feel sick but it passes in a few seconds. You're fine after that."

"...OK, dear." She still sounded a little worried, making him smile.

"Don't worry about it, everything will be fine. I'll see you soon."

His wife blew him a kiss down the phone, then laughed, hanging up. He put the phone down. "She's not entirely sure about the idea of your form of transportation, I think," he commented to Aiko, who grinned.

"Don't worry, I'll jump her around the garden a couple of times first. No problem."
"Serena will love it, I think," he added, laughing.

"I suspect so." Glancing at the paperwork on his desk, she asked, "Much more to do before you can go?"

"Not really. I need to finish these forms, then send the Captain a report I've nearly finished. It won't take long." He raised an eyebrow at her. "Are you OK with waiting? It'll be maybe fifteen minutes."

The brunette leaned her chair back and smiled. "I'm in no hurry." She watched as he finished the paperwork, signing the relevant documentation, then handing it off to one of the civilian clerks, before quickly typing the remaining half-page on the report he'd been working on when she'd arrived. "You misspelled 'necessary' there in the third paragraph," she pointed out helpfully, making him chuckle.

"I have no idea how you can be that good with a foreign language, not to the point of correcting my spelling," he laughed as he made the correction.

"It's a gift," she snickered. Emailing the report to his superior and printing out a hard copy for the records took only a couple more minutes, at the end of which he shut down his computer, locked his desk, and stood up.

"That's it. Done for the day. Let's go." Waving to a couple of colleagues Harrison followed her across the room, pausing to sign out, then both of them went down to the parking garage. Soon they were driving somewhat slowly through the early evening traffic. Ten minutes into the drive, he glanced over at his companion, who was watching the passing vehicles with mild interest. "I have a question you might possibly have the answer to," he began. She glanced at him curiously.

"I can try," Aiko said, smiling a little. He got the distinct impression she had a very good idea of what he was going to ask.

"Any idea what that twitch in the world last week was?" he asked. She inspected him for a moment, then returned her attention to the passing vehicles. There was a long pause.

"I know what it was," she finally said, sounding both resigned and slightly annoyed. "I'm not entirely sure you really want to, though." Glancing back at him for a second, she added, "I can tell you something about it, but you may well wish you hadn't asked if I do."

Looking at her, he wondered if she was serious. The expression she was wearing suggested this was the case. After a few seconds, he sighed a little, nodding. "I appreciate the warning but I'm very curious. I'd like to know."

"Your choice," she replied, before beginning a story that made a cold chill go down his back more than once in the next fifteen minutes. When she finished, they drove in silence for a few minutes, while he considered what he'd been told. He was fairly sure there was a lot more that she hadn't told him, but all things considered, that was something of a relief.

"I can understand why you didn't want that story widely spread", he finally said, his voice wavering a little more than he expected. He cleared his throat and carried on. "Thank you for telling me. And for saving the universe."

Aiko grinned briefly before her face went back to rather tired and irritated, then smoothed out into her normal cheerful look. "You're more than welcome, of course," the girl replied, "it's what we do, and it needed to be done. Right place, right time, sort of thing. But it wasn't fun." She watched the car in front while she talked. "The PSIA is in the process of sending out a rather sanitised explanation to various governments, yours included, which is... not entirely wrong. But not entirely right, either." He laughed a little at her tone, which was amused and somewhat sarcastic.

"I can imagine based on what you just told me. Not the sort of thing you want to be even that open with to most people."

"Not really, no," she agreed with a laugh. "We've told various people we can trust not to over-react some of the truth. You've had enough experience of weird things so that we feel that you're safe knowing it, but it would be for the best if you didn't pass it on. Not at the moment, at any rate. Perhaps one day."

"I can understand that," Harrison sighed. "I won't tell anyone." He shook his head for a second. "The Captain would love to have an explanation for it but I don't think that particular one would make him sleep any better."

"Probably not." Aiko snickered. "It doesn't help me and I deal with this sort of thing on a daily basis and have done so for years." They both fell silent again, busy with their own thoughts. Eventually Harrison turned onto the road leading to his street.

"Nearly there, now."

Seconds later he slammed on the brakes, skidding to a halt and swearing, as a dark blue high end sports-car with several young men in it shot across the junction in front of him against the lights, barely missing the car coming in the other direction which also panic-stopped. Even aside from the near accident the thing that really drew his attention was the way two of the young men were leaning out of the rear windows of the car firing automatic weapons behind them, with another one shooting through where the rear windscreen had once lived. They watched open-mouthed as the car roared off down the street, barely having time to exchange a glance, before a customised pickup loaded with several more youths with far more heavy weapons than seemed rational shot past as well, the occupants returning the fire of the leading car with considerable enthusiasm although little aim.

"Well, shit," Harrison growled, grabbing for his radio and calling central dispatch to report it, while turning to follow cautiously.

"That seems a rather dangerous hobby," Aiko noted sardonically. She looked at the bullet-holes in a street-sign they were just passing, which had had the misfortune of getting in the way. "Does this sort of thing happen a lot in LA?"

"More than I'd like, that's for sure," he snarled, hanging up the mic again and speeding up, as he flipped the switch that turned on the hidden lights and siren. "Idiotic gangs. One of them upsets another one, they retaliate, and before you know it there are bullets everywhere. Lots of completely uninvolved people end up hurt as well, which really pisses me off." Ahead of them, the truck could just be seen fishtailing wildly around a corner, causing a small accident as everyone frantically tried to get out of the way. Just as they reached it and began the turn a police cruiser roared across the junction from the right to join the chase. He slowed a little to let it pass then floored it after them.

"So what's the normal procedure you guys use in a case like this?" the girl beside him asked, sounding completely calm to an absolutely eerie level. He glanced at her for a moment to see her watching the cars ahead with interest but no worry.

"We've put out a call, they'll try to deploy spike strips on the road ahead of these lunatics, but that relies on being able to have someone in the right place at the right time. If we were on the freeway it wouldn't be too much of a problem but those guys are heading back into town. Too much traffic, it's getting in the way." He shook his head. "They don't seem to care but we can't just charge ahead and wind up killing someone who doesn't get out of the way fast enough. That never goes down well with the public."

"No, I can see where it wouldn't," she replied.

"Same problem with shooting at them. Too much risk to citizens," he added with a heavy sigh. They followed for another half mile, two more cars joining the chase behind them. The two vehicles in front didn't seem too fussed about the police escort, being more interested in the mobile war they were engaged in, which was causing a considerable amount of consternation to random passers-by. Luckily there was so much noise involved that somewhat miraculously most people seemed to be able to find cover in time. The two gang vehicles had been forced to slow to twenty or thirty miles an hour by traffic that simply couldn't get out of the way, both of them weaving in and out of it manically while still shooting at each other. "Fuck me, how much ammo do those lunatics have?" he grumbled to himself.

"Way too much," she said quietly. After a moment, Aiko turned to him. "Richard, I know it's your city and I'm just visiting, but if you want I can probably stop this before it get even further out of hand." He glanced at her for a moment, then returned his gaze to the road, thinking. The sight of a large shop window disintegrating in a hail of missed bullets decided him. One or more deaths were inevitable at this rate, assuming they hadn't already occurred, and it didn't seem likely that normal policing was going to bring it to a speedy enough end.

"Do what you need to, but please try not to destroy too much of the infrastructure," he finally said. She nodded.

"OK. Look away."

He did so, asking incredulously, "You're going to teleport from a moving vehi...?" That was as far as he got before she wasn't there any more.

Blinking slightly at the reflected flash, he waited for something weird to happen. It didn't take long.

Javier stared in disbelief, swearing in shock at the sight of the woman standing in the road a couple of hundred yards away, her arms crossed, apparently waiting for them. He shouted over the sound of the boys in the back seat firing at the pursuing Red Dragon triad members who they'd managed to open up a four hundred yard lead on, "This bitch is crazy!" Beside him, his good friend Ricardo, known as 'El Cortador' for his predilection for using knives on his enemies, very slowly, turned to look from where he'd been staring over his shoulder. Both of them ducked a little as a bullet whined past a little too close.

"Well, just run her over, then, if she won't move," he replied, shrugging, then going back to observing the firefight in the back seat, handing more loaded magazines to Juan for his stolen M-16. Grimly setting his jaw, Javier put his foot down as they reached a gap in the traffic which had mainly moved to the side to allow the entire cavalcade of vehicles through, showing considerable unwillingness to become involved. The girl didn't move except to unfold her arms, then hold up a hand in the universal 'Stop' gesture.

Shaking his head in mixed wonder at her bravery and incredulity at her stupidity, he stepped harder on the gas. Now only a hundred yards away, he could see her look mildly annoyed, nothing more than that. She shrugged, making it clear somehow that her attitude was basically 'OK, I tried,' then levelled her right hand at the oncoming vehicle, like she was pointing a weapon. He was just wondering why, since she obviously had nothing in the raised hand, only to gape in total shock as a brilliant deep sapphire blue glowing ball of something appeared in it. Involuntarily raising his right foot a little he slowed, making Ricardo glance at him.

"What's the problem?" his friend asked, before catching sight of the girl, who was only fifty yards away now. He swore in shock, crossing himself, then both of them yelped as the ball of light leaped from her hand and zoomed towards them at some incredible speed. Javier barely had time to hit the brakes as hard as he could before it hit, striking directly in the centre of the radiator.

The enormously loud explosion that sounded deafened all of them, while he lost control of the car, the wheel pulling itself out of his hands. All the air bags went off, the car slowed suddenly with a massive grinding sound, then he felt it begin to roll as it slewed sideways. Wondering what in god's name the woman had fired at them, Javier braced himself, blinking furiously from the flash and knowing that this was likely to be his last few seconds.

A sharp jolt and a screech of metal tearing heralded the vehicle abruptly stopping as if it had hit a telephone pole. All five of the occupants were nearly knocked senseless by the impact, but luckily it had slowed just enough by the time it hit whatever it was that they were merely thrown around a lot rather than ending up crushed. Even so, he was seeing two of everything for several seconds.

In the back seat, he could hear Juan swearing to himself in Spanish, while unintelligible mutters seemed to be coming from Antonio. Hugo was ominously quiet. Painfully, he pushed deflating air bags away from his face and tried to see out the window, only then realising that the car was at a very strange angle, nose down and tilted to the side. His eyes widened when he saw the woman standing at the side of the vehicle with her hands on the roof. He looked up to see that there were two distinct bulges visible on the inside through the metal, cloth and plastic of the top of the car.

As impossible as it was, it certainly looked like she'd somehow stopped the car rolling with her bare hands!

His ears still ringing from the explosion, he watched her, motionless, as she grinned at him. She looked Japanese and perhaps twenty or so, very short but well built, with dark brown hair. Giving him a smile that, while friendly, made chills run down his back, she said in perfect Spanish, "Please get out of the vehicle and leave your weapons behind." A shot from behind her made her grin suddenly disappear, as one of the triad gunmen fired in their direction. She glanced over her shoulder, frowning. "Hang on," she added, "I'll be back in a moment. Don't go anywhere."

The girl disappeared, seconds later there was the roar of the engine of the pursuing truck revving up, then another loud bang and a flash of blue light from somewhere behind them. A couple of shots sounded, before everything went remarkably quiet. He could hear sirens approach, stop, then go silent.

Light footsteps sounded, coming nearer, then the girl appeared outside his window again. "OK. Like I said, out of the car and no weapons, please. These nice policemen would like to have a word." Staring at her, he wondered if he'd managed to knock himself out in the wreckage of the crashed vehicle. He looked at Ricardo, who stared back, blinking in somewhat dazed disbelief. The swearing from the back seat got more involved.

"Come on, I don't have all day. I've got a restaurant date for later." She looked impatient. Reaching out a trembling hand he tried the door handle, which grated a little but didn't result in anything particularly useful happening.
"It's stuck," he said weakly.

"Oh. Fair enough." She looked understanding, just before she reached out and effortlessly ripped the entire damn door off its hinges like it was made of modelling clay. "There you go."

"Thanks," he replied after a very long pause. He could feel something running down his leg that wasn't blood.

Shortly all five of them were standing or in the case of Hugo, sitting, on the road beside the remains of the car they'd stolen. Javier stared at it in shock, before locking eyes with his friends, who looked back wide-eyed. The engine compartment, including the front wheels, was entirely missing, the remaining metal looking like it had been melted with some enormously powerful blowtorch. How the hell whatever had done that had managed to achieve that result without killing all of them on the spot he had absolutely no idea. Neither did any of the substantial number of cops who were milling around, judging by the expressions on their faces as they stared at the car, then the girl who was responsible for it.

He noticed numbly that there were indeed two hand prints in the roof, embossed a couple of inches deep. Looking at them he shuddered. As he was handcuffed by a uniformed officer, he saw the man was also staring at the car in shock. Their eyes met, before they both turned their heads to look at the girl, who was walking over to the triad truck which was also missing an engine. Everyone jumped as a burst of automatic gunfire came from it, aimed at the Japanese girl, who stopped in her tracks. All the cops dived for cover as he and his friends hit the deck, although he couldn't stop watching to see what happened next.

Expecting her to drop lifelessly to the ground, the watching cops, crowd, and gang members gaped as she sighed, held out her hand, opened it, and let a number of what were obviously bullets tinkle to the ground. She called something in Mandarin to the occupants of the destroyed truck, sounding annoyed, while another ball of energy formed in her other hand. There was a pregnant pause before several shaken and pale triad members slowly pulled themselves out of the vehicle, lying face down on the ground. Looking around at the cops, who were still lurking behind anything reasonably bulletproof, she vanished the ball of energy and put her hands on her hips.

"Well? They're not going to arrest themselves, you know," she called. After several more seconds had passed a couple of cops stood, approaching the stunned triad members while giving the petite brunette girl a very wide berth. This seemed to amuse her.

Javier noticed a man standing off to one side, who he immediately recognised as a police officer despite being in plain clothes, who seemed to be the only one not looking terrified, stunned, or surprised. Instead he looked mildly impressed and rather amused. The girl walked over to him, grinning, they had a short conversation, after which the plain-clothes cop went and talked to the uniform in charge, who was looking like he couldn't believe the last five minutes had actually happened. Eventually, they shook hands, before he and the girl got into a car and drove away.

Still trembling from adrenalin and not entirely sure he was actually awake, Javier slowly sat done on the kerb, staring at the remains of the car he'd been driving, wondering what the fuck had happened.

Harrison drove slowly back in the direction they'd come, heading for home, thinking on the way that he was really looking forward to some beer at the restaurant. He considered for a few seconds more then decided that was too long to wait. He would check the fridge when he got home.

"Holy shit," he finally said. Aiko giggled as he glanced at her. "That was... impressive. And deeply
"It seemed like the quickest method to stop it without hurting anyone too much," she replied calmly. Handing him a business card which she quickly jotted a number on the back of, she added, "Sorry about destroying both vehicles. They were pretty badly damaged already with all those bullet holes in them so it probably wasn't all on me though. Get their insurers to call this number in Tokyo, quote that code on the back there, and it will get sorted out." He took the card and glanced at it, seeing only a phone number and the word 'Reparations' written on it in English under a couple of Kanji symbols he guessed said basically the same thing. Reaching up he flipped down the sun visor, stuck the card under it, then flipped it back.

"Thanks," he said, not sure what else to say. She laughed again.

"That was kind of fun to be honest," she commented with a smile.

"For you, perhaps." Harrison glanced at her again, smiling wryly. "I may have a little trouble explaining it to the Captain."

"I'm sure he'll accept your explanation, Richard," she laughed. "Captain Martinez struck me as a reasonable person. If you have any problems, just call, and I'll come and talk to him."

"Perhaps." Not entirely convinced and not looking forward to the talk he was sure was in his future, he shook his head, pulling into his driveway and turning the car off. "Come on inside. I need a beer. You want one?"

"Please," she said, getting out of the car. Following him into the house, she smiled at Emily who was waiting for them. "Hello, Emily."

"Hello, Aiko," his wife said, sounding pleased to see the girl. "It's very nice to see you again. Are you in LA for long?"

"I'm not sure. Probably no more than a day or so but I'll be back and forth helping Akane and Shampoo while they're at the studio." The Japanese girl followed as they all went into the living room, Harrison detouring via the kitchen and finding that as he'd remembered there were indeed beers in the fridge, gratefully grabbing two bottles. He returned to the living room and handed one to Aiko, who smiled at him, popped the top off, then looked at the other one in his hand. With a grin he handed it over and reclaimed the other one, while she opened the new one and took a pull on it. Emily was watching with amusement.

"You seem slightly frazzled, dear," she said to him as he sat next to her on the sofa, stretching out his legs and leaning his head back with a sigh, his eyes closed. Without looking he waved the beer bottle at Aiko, hearing her chuckle quietly.

"Blame our young friend here. Can't take her anywhere without something weird happening." He opened his eyes to grin at the girl as her laughter became slightly louder, before glancing at his wife, who looked confused. He explained, with gestures, which became more vivid as the level in the beer bottle dropped. By the end of the story he was laughing as well while Emily was shaking her head in amazement.

"You guys really do have way too many guns lying around the place in the US," Aiko commented, finishing her own drink and putting the bottle on the floor.

"You certainly don't have to tell me that," he grumbled slightly, still smiling a little. "We see things like that much too often. Oh well, there isn't a lot I can do about it except deal with the "True, I suppose." They all looked up as Serena came in, Sophie with her, from the back garden, his daughter carrying her new bow and her friend holding the quiver and arrows.

"Hi Aiko," Serena said happily, putting her bow down and quickly walking over to shake the woman's hand, grinning with pleasure. Aiko smiled back, looking genuinely pleased to see her.

"Hello, Serena, and you, Sophie. How are you girls getting on?"

"Really well, thanks." His daughter laughed. "Did Dad tell you about how I needed a new bow?"

"Yep. It sounds like you're really coming along with your archery." Aiko looked amused for a moment. "Still hunting wild greenhouses?" Sophie burst out laughing as Serena got a slightly embarrassed expression on her face, while Harrison and his wife cracked up.

"I only did that once." She thought for a moment, then admitted, "Maybe twice." There was a pause, then she very reluctantly added, "Or it might have been three times. But that last one was a total fluke."

"I'll say", Sophie giggled, "I didn't know you could bounce an arrow around three corners!" Serena went red as her parents laughed even harder.

Aiko snickered. "Serena Harrison special technique, Boomerang Arrow?" She grinned at Serena's expression. "If you could do that on purpose it would be a damn good trick."

"Please don't give her ideas," Harrison pleaded when his daughter's expression turned from embarrassed to thoughtful, making the rest of them laugh. "I've already got enough complaints from the neighbours."

"Dad!" The young woman looked at him in exasperation. Sophie laughed again, moving to sit in the chair next to the Japanese girl. Aiko, still grinning, glanced at her.

"How's the Aikido coming along, Sophie?"

"Very well, thanks. Sensei says he's very pleased with my progress. He thinks I'll be ready to move up a level soon."

"Impressive. Well done, keep at it." Aiko looked pleased. "One day you'll have to show me what you can do." Sophie looked slightly worried about this, making the young woman grin. "Don't worry, I'll wait until you've got more experience, and I'll go easy on you." Giggle, the blonde girl nodded.

"I'm going to have to go soon, Ser," she said to her friend, pulling out her phone and looking at the time on it. "Mom will be here in about ten minutes."

"OK." Both girls got up. "We're just going to clean up, Mom," Serena said, before they left the room, talking animatedly. Aiko watched them go with a smile, then turned to Harrison and his wife.

"I'm glad to see both girls are sticking with their new hobbies," she commented. "That shows dedication."

"Serena seems very keen on becoming a good archer," Emily told her, smiling proudly after her daughter. "I think that Shampoo's demonstration really kicked it up a notch, when she saw what "That woman is unbelievably good with a bow, true enough," Aiko agreed. "A lifetime of training and some remarkable talent as well. Very few people could ever get as good." She looked after Serena for a moment before returning her attention to them. "I don't know if Serena is one of them but it will be interesting to find out."

"Sophie seems very quick to learn as well," Harrison mused. "From what her mother said, her teacher is extremely impressed with how quickly she's picking it up. Serena is talking about trying it again at some point but at the moment she seems more interested in the archery. Mind you, they show each other how to do things all the time. Sophie is actually getting quite good with the bow from what I saw last week, and Serena knows enough to get someone a lot bigger on the floor if he wasn't expecting it."

"I'm quite happy about that," Emily noted, looking mildly worried for a moment. "There have been enough muggings and assaults around here in the last year that knowing how to take care of yourself is probably a good idea."

"Very true," Aiko agreed. "Although, at their stage of training, it's just as important knowing how to run really fast if you find yourself in over your head." She grimaced for a second. "We found that out the hard way ourselves years back. Even magical abilities don't win every fight. Sometimes, you run like hell." Harrison grinned, sensing an interesting story. His wife nudged him, looking at her watch.

"You can hear about magical girls gone wrong later, dear, we need to get ready." Reluctantly he got up, looking disappointed, hearing Aiko laughing quietly as he went upstairs with Emily.

Looking out the car window as they drove slowly along, Akane smiled to herself. She was still finding it slightly difficult to believe that she was actually here in LA, about to start training for a job with a movie studio and possibly become a stunt woman, or even an actor! After years of wanting to do something along those lines she still found it weird to know that it was in her grasp. 'And all because of Yori, in the end,' she thought wonderingly. 'Although I suppose the Elder isn't completely wrong when she points out that Ryoga had something to do with it. Not that I'll ever tell him that!' She glanced over her shoulder to see Shampoo watching the people walking along Hollywood Boulevard with a small smile on her lips.

'I'm glad Shampoo came along on all this,' she mused, returning her gaze to the street. 'It's good to have a friend you can trust to back you up when you're this far from home. Dad said Americans are weird, I might need backup.' She noticed a man wearing a dirty trench-coat and little else except for a paper bag on his head, with eye holes cut in it, waving his arms frantically and apparently berating passing tourists, who were giving him a very wide berth. 'He didn't say that were that weird.' Shaking her head a little she watched the odd man until he suddenly bolted for no obvious reason.

Adrian slowed, indicating right, then turned into the entrance of an underground car park, stopping to take the ticket the machine offered, then driving on when the barrier raised. "This is pretty central for this area, we can get out and walk around for a while," he said. "The Hollywood Walk of Fame is quite close, and Mann's as well. You'll like that. There's lots of other things to see around here too." A few minutes later he found an empty slot in the otherwise pretty full parking garage, pulling in and stopping. "OK, this should do it." They all got out, he locked the car, then led the way to the exit elevator. Shortly they were on the street.

Walking along the two young women looked around with great interest. "It's not quite as busy as "This is a pretty touristy area," Adrian agreed. "Lots of people on a nice evening like this, especially at this time of year. They come from all over the world to look around." Arriving outside a fairly elaborate building he stopped, waving a hand at it. Akane instantly recognised it, and the surrounding area, it was very familiar to her from innumerable films. "There you go. Mann's Chinese Theatre, built in nineteen twenty-seven. It's not the biggest place you'll ever see but there's a lot of history behind it." They joined the many obvious tourists wandering along inspecting the posters, the buildings, and most of all the concrete tiles with the hand- and foot-prints, along with signatures, of famous actors through the generations. She was fascinated by it, picking out names she recognised.

"Oh, Leonard Nimoy, from Star Trek," she said, making her to companions look as she pointed. "Nabiki always liked that show." She grinned for a second. "For a while when she was about eleven she was going around pretending to be a Vulcan, saying things were illogical. It was really funny. It drove Dad nuts."

"I'll have to meet this sister of yours one day," Adrian chuckled. "She sounds interesting."

"She's really, really smart," Akane confided, "and she's very good with money and things like that. And information gathering." She produced a tiny smile. "At one point in school that was her entire hobby, gathering information and selling it. I'm glad she doesn't do it any more."

"People change as they get older," Adrian noted, nodding, looking like he was remembering something. "We've pretty much all done something in our past we're not proud of. Things I got up to when I was a kid... Well, I was lucky to avoid jail for a while there, let's leave it at that." She exchanged a look with Shampoo, both of them wondering what he was talking about, but neither willing to push.

"I suppose you're right," was all she said. "I'm certainly not proud of a lot of what I did. True, it turns out some of it was from a medical condition, but that doesn't excuse it all."

"All in past, no point worrying," Shampoo advised. "Also did stupid things now regret." The Amazon shrugged. "Can't change it, just move on."

"Wise words," Adrian chuckled.

Akane grinned, nodding. "Nabiki has been very supportive of all this, and she's also the one who pushed me into the therapy in the first place. I owe her a lot as well as Yori and Aiko." They wandered slowly along the pavement looking at the scenery, both girls stopping every now and then when they spotted one particular name or another.

"What about your other sister?" Adrian asked after a minute or two. "You mentioned you hadn't seen her for a while, and Soun said she'd left a while ago. Do you ever speak to her?"

The youngest Tendo sighed deeply, shaking her head, while Shampoo looked at her with some concern. Eventually she replied, "No, I'm afraid not. Kasumi... she left under some unpleasant circumstances, I suppose you could say. It was our fault, all of us, we pushed her away. I was the main problem, I know that now. It wasn't..." She sighed again, sadly. "It wasn't nice. There was... an accident."

"Oh." Adrian turned his head to look at her for a moment. "I'm sorry to hear that."

"Not as sorry as I am about it," she replied heavily, "but thank you. We haven't heard a thing about her or from her in almost five years now, which is the single biggest regret I have in my life. I'll never forgive myself for what I did."

They walked along in silence for a little longer. "Family problems are always unpleasant, no matter what the cause," he said in the end. "I had some issues with my brother Jeff many years ago which meant that neither one of us spoke to each other for nearly a decade. The funny thing now is that I can't even work out why." He shrugged a bit. "Heat of the moment, you say or do something hurtful, it gets blown even further out of proportion... Never a good thing. But, with time, this sort of thing often blows over. We talk quite often now, I wouldn't say we're hugely close, but we get on fine. He lives in New York, which may well be helpful, we don't see each other all that often."

Akane smiled as he grinned, Shampoo snickering beside her.

"What does he do?"

"He's a stockbroker. Quite a good one as far as I know. He earns a decent living at any rate. Although, over the last few months, there's been a lot of confusion in the market because of that Canadian thing, Halleckton. That Murray bastard seems to have screwed up financial issues beyond anything anyone could have expected. He and his friends were up to their necks in manipulating the market, bank fraud, you name it." Adrian sighed a little. "Caused a lot of problems when it all fell over. Mind you, probably nothing like as bad as it would have been in ten years when it fell over by itself. That's what Jeff says and I suppose he's in a position to know."

Akane nodded slowly. "It's not something I know anything about although I'm sure Nabiki would understand it. She's talked about it a little, mainly to Dad, but I've listened a few times." She laughed for a moment. "I don't understand half of what she was talking about. I do know that Aiko and the others were involved in it somehow although they haven't said all that much about the whole thing. It sounded pretty nasty though from what she did say."

"The news reports were amazingly confused," he agreed, smiling a little. "Something impressive happened, that much is certain, but no one seems to know what, or at least isn't telling the public."

Laughing, Adrian nodded. "You've got that right. I've heard at least two scripts are going around at the moment based on it, although I think both of them are probably completely off-base as far as what happened. It'll be interesting to see if anyone picks them up." He laughed some more as they both grinned. "Mind you, whatever that twitch in the world was would be even better. I've got a couple of ideas myself on that subject. Perhaps some day."

"There are some amazing theories going around about that," Akane agreed, smiling to herself. "I've been reading them on the internet. No one has any real idea but everyone has an opinion. Elder Cologne seems to know more than most people about it but she's not talking. It seems very likely that it was some weird magical thing defending itself from some sort of attack, though, from what she did say before she went all quiet about it."

Adrian looked at her again, this time with surprise. "Magical attack? Hmm, hadn't heard that one. It's even weirder than the aliens. That seems to be the current hot favourite theory."

Akane laughed for a second. "Maybe it was magical aliens?"

All three exchanged glances, then burst out laughing. "Yes, that sounds so much more sensible," Adrian managed after a few seconds of hilarity. "Magical aliens. I really must see about some sort of script based on that idea." He shook his head as the young women exchanged glances and grins.
"It's going to end up in a movie, for sure, probably more than one, but I have no idea if any of them will ever be close to the truth, whatever that is." He snickered for a second. "Richard told me about some of the ideas he'd heard from just after it happened. There were dozens. To be honest, magical aliens is one of the more sensible ones, that's how insane some of them were."

"We live in strange world," Shampoo laughed. "Might be true."

"Perhaps. Perhaps not. At least nothing seems to have happened as a result, which I suppose is a good thing." Reaching the end of the walk of fame, they looked around.

"I can't get over how many palm trees and things there are everywhere," the Tendo woman said, peering up at a particularly tall specimen they were standing next to. "It's sort of weird in the middle of a city."

"Seems normal to me," Adrian commented, following her eyes and smiling a little. "There are a lot in LA. You should see some areas of Beverly Hills." He shrugged slightly. "It's what you grow up with. Palm trees in LA, I seem to remember a lot of cherry trees in Tokyo, I've been to places in southern Europe that had orange trees complete with fruit in the middle of the city."

"Nice to have green around," Shampoo agreed, inspecting the tree curiously. "Grew up near forest, mountains, things like that. I miss it sometimes. Tokyo has many parks but not the same as village. No palm trees, though, even at home." Poking the trunk gently she shook her head. "Strange things. Not like normal trees."

Hearing Japanese being spoken, both young women looked around, to see a group of middle aged Japanese people wandering past with a remarkable collection of cameras, taking pictures of everything in sight, while at the front of the group a woman who was apparently a tour guide was pointing things out. Everyone seemed to be enjoying themselves which made Akane smile a little. Adrian followed their eyes and laughed for a moment.

"We get a lot of Japanese people as tourists around LA," he commented, watching with amusement as two of the tour group took a picture of the palm tree Shampoo was standing next to. She moved out of the way so they could get a better shot, grinning. "It's something of a stereotype but your countrymen do seem to like their photography."

Akane giggled, waving as three of the tour group spotted her and the other two, looking curiously at them for a moment as if trying to work out whether they were worth photographing, before shaking their heads and moving off after the tour guide. She turned to Adrian. "You see it in movies, but I've never seen it in real life before," she laughed. "It's not quite so obvious at home."

"You should see the studio tours when it's a Japanese group," he smiled, "the sound of shutters going is like machine-gun fire. It's a popular destination." They resumed walking along, looking at the sights, while Adrian pulled out his phone and made a few calls. Eventually he put it back in his pocket. "OK, Jim and his wife are going to meet us at the restaurant in about forty-five minutes, which gives us time to get back to the car and drive there. Matt and Aaron will be there a little after that."

"What restaurant is it?" Akane asked curiously.

"A place called Spago. It's one of the best restaurants in LA. They moved to Beverly Hills a couple of years ago." Adrian smiled. "It's not cheap but it's really very good indeed. I think everyone will find something they like there."

"Nabiki showed us a restaurant in Tokyo which sounds a little like that, a weird fusion between Thai and French food," Akane replied. "It's pretty expensive but the food is fantastic. I'm looking forward to this one."

"Should call Aiko to let her know," Shampoo commented. Akane nodded, pulling out her phone and dialling.

"Hi, Akane. How are things going?" The voice of the brunette magical girl came after only two rings.

"Fine, thanks, Aiko. Adrian got us checked in at the hotel, which is amazing, and we've been looking around down town for a while. We saw the walk of fame thing with all the footprints, for example."

"Oh, right, outside Mann's. I've been there, it's pretty cool."

"Isn't it? Anyway, we're going to the restaurant, for about..." She looked at her watch, "half past seven. Some place called Spago in Beverly Hills."

"OK. I've heard of it but I've never been there. It's supposed to be pretty good."

"That's what Adrian said."

"Right, we'll meet you there. See you soon."

"Bye." She disconnected and dropped the phone back into her pocket, then looked mildly puzzled. "How did she know it was me?" she asked the world at large. Adrian and Shampoo both looked curiously at her.

"What do you mean, Akane?" the director asked.

"Aiko greeted me by name, but I was using this new phone you got me. How did she know it was me?" He raised an eyebrow.

"Obviously magic. Or..." They waited. "It might have been the fact that I called her on both of the phones so she would have their numbers."

"Ah." Akane giggled as he grinned. "That makes sense."

Returning to the car they left the car park and headed towards the restaurant, both young women still looking around with great interest. The area they found themselves driving through half an hour later was impressively up scale, making them exchange looks of amazement. Adrian took a somewhat circuitous route so he could point out some of the larger houses belonging to famous stars, which both of them inspected with interest.

"You might be able to afford something like this in a few years," the director chuckled, as they slowed to view one impressive property at the end of a long drive. "Both of you."

Shampoo shook her head. "Too big," she replied. "Nice to look at but not good to live in. Waste of money in long run, Great Grandmother said. I think she's right."

"Elder Cologne gave me the same advice," Akane commented, glancing at him as he smiled. "She says the money is safer in the bank or under the mattress than in over the top purchases that are just made to make other people jealous."

"A wise woman, the Elder," he laughed. "I was very impressed by her when I met her last month."
He accelerated, moving past the estate and going back onto the main road. "She's right, of course. Quite a few stars who have made the big times end up penniless a few years later because they blew everything on big houses and fast cars."

"I'll be more than happy with a sensibly sized house or even a flat," the youngest Tendo mused. "I've never lived on my own before. It will be nice in one way, to have space that's all mine, but it will take some getting used to as well, not having my family around me."

"I'm sure you'll find it suits you in the end," he said, glancing at her, then at Shampoo in the rear-view mirror. "There's nothing to stop you joining forces, either, if you wanted company for a while." Akane looked back at the Amazon, who seemed interested, then nodded.

"Very true. Want to share, Shampoo?"

"Have no problem with it," the other woman smiled. "Someone has to know how to cook or both starve to death." Akane frowned as her friend giggled. Adrian chuckled.

"Come on, she can't be that bad at it."

Peals of laughter came from the Chinese girl in the back seat. Akane growled slightly, crossing her arms and staring out the windscreen. "Have no idea! Akane could burn water." Shampoo giggled some more. "Akane has burned water. Nearly set kitchen on fire. Last time cooked, almost had to call hazmat team. Or experienced mage." She looked at Akane who was going pink with embarrassment. "Or both."

"OK, OK, I'm not good at cooking, we get it," the Tendo daughter snapped, turning her head to look out the side window. Shampoo grinned, but subsided. Laughing, Adrian glanced at them both, but didn't add anything to the discussion. A few minutes later, he pointed.

"There we go, that's the restaurant. Looks like that's Jim and Sandra outside, they beat us here." Pulling into the car park, he turned the car off, then waved to his friends. "Let's go and get something to eat, shall we?" he said, Opening the door and getting out. Akane and Shampoo did likewise, the Tendo woman still looking mildly irritated, but rapidly cheering up.

"Are you sure it's safe?"

Harrison exchanged a glance with Aiko, who looked amused, then Serena, who rolled her eyes, making sure her mother couldn't see it. He smiled tenderly.

"Dear, it's perfectly fine. Aiko says she's never hurt anyone with teleporting and she's been doing it for nearly eight years now. She'd know if anyone would, right?"

Emily looked nervous, but nodded. Aiko laughed for a moment. "Honest, Emily, the worst thing that ever happens is that someone has a particularly weak stomach and throws up a lot for a minute or two. I did myself the very first time. Yori didn't even notice. Everyone else is somewhere between those points." She grinned as Emily looked even more nervous. "It only lasts for maybe thirty seconds or so and never comes back. Well, not unless you go a really long way." Harrison wondered what counted as a 'long way' for a moment.

"Come on, dear, she's just going to jump you around the garden a couple of times. I felt a bit sick the first time but after that it was no problem. I'm sure you'll be fine." Not looking particularly certain, his wife eventually nodded.

"Great. Look, we'll just go from here to over there by the back fence, OK?" Aiko moved a little closer to Emily, with Serena eagerly taking her place next to her mother, looking excited.

"I can't believe I'm going to teleport!" she almost squealed, practically vibrating with joy. Aiko laughed for a few seconds.

"It's a lot of fun. Right, ready?" Serena was already nodding, while Emily took a moment and a deep breath, before indicating she was set. All three women vanished and reappeared on the other side of the garden instantly, the flash reflecting off the white side of the house. Harrison blinked a couple of times, walking over to his family. His wife was looking a little wobbly and definitely rather green, but didn't do much more than sway a little, with Aiko steadying her.

Serena gurgled a few times, looking very unwell, dropping to her hands and knees, before shaking her head and standing up again. "Ew. That was horrible," she moaned. Harrison grinned at her, patting her on the head, then reclaimed his wife from the magical girl, who stepped back.

"I think you were slightly understating it, Richard," Emily groaned, before covering her mouth with both hands. After a moment she looked somewhat less ill and lowered them again. "That said, it's passing very fast."

"You'll both be fine in a second or two," he assured them both. Sure enough, very quickly both his women regained normal colouring, Serena becoming very excited again.

"That was so amazing," she grinned. "You're sure it doesn't come back?"

"Nope," Aiko assured her. "Not except in pretty unusual circumstances. The next one might make you slightly dizzy for a second or two, it does with some people, then you barely feel it. Let's go back and I'll prove it." She moved closer to them all and the world flickered, leaving them back where they'd started. Emily twitched at the sudden spacial displacement while Serena started laughing.

"SO cool!" she yelled, punching the air.

"It's good, isn't it?" Aiko asked, laughing.

"I wish I could do that," the teenager giggled. "How far can you go?"

"I'm not sure." Looking reflective, Aiko glanced at Harrison, who was also interested. "As far as we've been able to work out the only limitation is really one of available energy. Certainly anywhere on the planet is easy."

"Really?" Emily gasped, stunned. "I know you can go to Tokyo and back just like that, but really anywhere?"

"Yep. Unless there's the right sort of anti-teleportation ward, it works fine everywhere." Aiko grinned at them, then got a slightly mischievous look. Before Harrison could say anything the world flickered again, becoming very bright compared to the early evening it had just been, and considerably hotter. They all blinked furiously while Aiko laughed.

Looking around, Harrison inspected the landscape, freezing when he spotted something a couple of miles away that he instantly recognised. "Where are we?" his wife asked, confused, looking in the other direction. He put his hand on her head and gently turned it so she was looking at the same thing he was. She gasped at the point Serena started laughing wildly.

"That's..."
"Ayers rock," he completed the statement.

"The locals prefer Uluru," Aiko commented with a grin.

"We're in Australia?!!" Emily shook her head, causing him to grin as well. The expression on her face was amazing. His daughter bent down and picked up a small red rock, turning it over in her hands.

"Yes. Nice place, nice people, but kind of hot." Smiling widely, the magical girl waved a hand at the scenery. "Like I said. Works everywhere." The world jumped once more and they were standing outside the back door of the Harrison household, gaping at each other. Serena looked around, stared at Aiko, then inspected the rock she was still holding.

"So cool," she whispered to herself, looking very happy indeed.

"Shall we go and meet the others?" the Japanese woman asked after a moment, appearing satisfied.

"I'll just get my jacket," Harrison replied, shaking his head in amused wonder, guiding his stunned wife inside. "Come on, dear, grab your purse. Food awaits us."

Snickering, Aiko watched them go into the house, before glancing at Serena, who was bouncing her rock in her hand. "Sophie will be jealous," the girl commented. "I didn't get her one."

Aiko grinned.

When Harrison and his wife came out ten minutes later Aiko was juggling half a dozen rocks of different colours while their daughter was tossing her new ones from a small handful. Both of them looked over at Harrison, Aiko not missing a beat. He stared at the rocks, seeing that one of them looked volcanic, one was zebra striped in black and white, a couple were some sort of quartz, and none of them seemed to be local ones. Sighing a little he shook his head but said nothing as the two younger women quickly dumped their toys on the patio table then moved closer.

"Ready?" Aiko asked, her expression amused. He looked at her for a moment then nodded, smiling.

"Ready."

Once more the garden flashed and they were gone.

"Ah, there's Richard and family now," Jim mentioned, indicating past the small group at the table. Akane looked over her shoulder to see the policeman and his wife and daughter enter the restaurant, talking briefly to the Maître-de, who led them over moments later, Aiko following and glancing around curiously.

"Hello, everyone," Harrison said, smiling at them all. "Akane, Shampoo, it's nice to see you again. You remember Emily and Serena?"

"Of course," Akane replied, smiling back, then nodding to the other two. "It's nice to see you all as well. How are you both?"

"Well, thanks," Emily replied, sitting down in the chair her husband pulled out for her. Serena took the next one along, opposite the two Japanese women and Adrian, while Harrison sat next to her. Aiko looked around the table for a moment then sat next to Akane, who smiled at her for a moment. "I understand you're here for a few days, both of you?"
"Yes, we're doing some more demonstrations, followed by some training and a few screen tests, amongst other things," the Tendo woman said. "It sounds fun although I for one am still very nervous about it."

"Looking forward to it," Shampoo laughed. "But slightly worried as well, yes."

"They'll both be fine, trust me," Adrian chuckled. "After seeing what they can do I can't think of anything that could really cause a problem, as long as they stay reasonably calm and do their best."

"That's what Nabiki told us as well, basically," Akane laughed. "And Cologne. And my father. And Auntie Nodoka. I hope everyone is right."

"We are, don't worry," he assured her. "You're both unbelievably talented and are going to do very well. You already won me a two thousand dollar bet, remember." She giggled, thinking back to the first time they'd come over. "Matt and Aaron are still annoyed about that," he added, grinning like a shark. "Serves them right."

The two men he'd mentioned arrived a few minutes later, Aaron with his wife Naomi, Matt on his own, all three of them having shared a car. Aaron introduced his wife to everyone, shaking hands with Shampoo and Akane, then they sat down. Shortly they'd placed their orders and were sipping drinks, waiting for the starters. "So, Akane, Shampoo, are you looking forward to tomorrow?" Matt asked, pouring himself a glass of water, then passing the jug to Adrian. The two young women exchanged glances.

"I think so," Akane said, grinning. "Everyone keeps asking that."

He laughed. "I suppose you're getting tired of it. OK, I'll keep my questions until we're at the studio."

"What likely to happen?" Shampoo asked curiously. He looked at her, thinking for a few seconds, before answering.

"Well, what we've tentatively planned is that you'll do another, possibly longer demonstration, similar to what you did in Richard's back yard, for a few of the other studio people. Three executives, possibly some people from the stunt department, that sort of thing." He glanced at Adrian who was grinning. "I suspect that we'll probably then have a break while they recover." Aaron started laughing, as did Richard and Jim. Shampoo looked very amused.

"After that, we have a number of training sessions in mind, some vehicle training, familiarity with various firearms, things of that nature, that tend to come up in stunt work. We'll go over that in more detail tomorrow."

Aaron added, "The weapons training is pretty simple, we're not expecting you to pick up marksman level shooting instantly, it's more along the lines of learning firearm safety and how to hold them, load them, unload them, and carry them in a convincing manner. People tend to pick up on that in a movie if it looks wrong, especially in the US." Shampoo and Akane nodded, listening carefully.

"That will take up the rest of tomorrow and all of Tuesday, and possibly quite a lot of Wednesday morning as well, I think," Adrian told them, watching their reactions, while everyone else listened. "There's some more paperwork to go over as well as that liability waiver I gave you both earlier but at this stage it's pretty straightforward."

"Wednesday afternoon it gets interesting," Matt went on, when Adrian fell silent. Akane sipped the wine she'd picked, nodding slightly, while Shampoo leaned back in her chair and watched him.
"We've got four stunt scenes we want to try, all of which are from scripts we've done recently, or are in upcoming movies." He glanced at Aiko, adding, "One is from that spy movie that we were shooting the first time you lot were here." She grinned, remembering the trip.

"Hopefully the collapsing lighting gantry is an optional extra," the magical girl snickered. Adrian shook his head slightly.

"God, don't remind me. It took me three days to calm down after that."

"How are the new pills working out, by the way?" Richard asked curiously. The director chuckled for a moment.

"Pretty well, actually, much better than the last ones. I've been calmer the last three weeks than I have been for years."

"Don't overdo it," Jim told him, grinning. "You can become too calm. If you feel yourself having trouble standing up, you should cut back." He laughed when Adrian sighed heavily, glancing at the others, who were smiling.

"He's never going to let me forget that," he commented, making Jim laugh harder. "You forget one time how many tranquillizers you took and people keep bringing it up for years."

"You did end up lying on your face on the carpet and giggling a lot in the middle of a meeting, Adrian," Jim told him, causing everyone else to collapse in laughter. Adrian sighed again, folding his arms and waiting for the merriment to die down. Eventually they fell silent as the food arrived. When everyone was served, Matt, who was still smiling a bit, resumed talking.

"OK, like I was saying, four scenes. One is a chase scene that requires jumping from a motorcycle to a car, one is a martial arts fight across a series of rooftops, one involves a number of falls and jumps in a city environment with gun-play, and the last one is a sort of bar fight using swords."

"It sounds amazing," Serena commented, making everyone look at her, which caused her to seem slightly embarrassed. Akane smiled at the girl, nodding enthusiastically and making her smile back.

"It does, doesn't it? I'm really looking forward to it."

Adrian said, "We're expecting the stunt tests to take at least one day, possibly two. That takes us through into Thursday afternoon or evening. Once everyone has had time to look at the rushes and discuss it, we'll probably have a meeting to work out what the next stage is. I strongly suspect that the end result of that will be a job offer before you go back, or within a week of your return."

Feeling somewhat overwhelmed Akane nodded, closing her eyes for a moment, then opened them and looked at Shampoo, seeing her friend looked excited.

"Assuming that happens, you'll get initial contracts within a month, which will require a certain amount of paperwork. At that point, you must get a legal opinion of your own on those contracts, OK?" They both nodded. He looked satisfied. "I don't want to overemphasise it, and I don't think anyone is going to try anything, but for everyone's protection, it's important that you get impartial advice on the contracts for yourselves, like I said when we had the first meeting. You may find things you want to change, or things you don't like or think are missing. You'll want to get all that sorted out before you sign anything because it's a lot more difficult later and no one wants any misunderstandings."

"I understand, Adrian," Akane replied, thinking carefully about it. "Nabiki told me more or less the same thing a few weeks ago. She looked up a number of LA lawyers who were experts in contract law on the internet and gave me a list."

"Great. That's a good start. If you want, I can look at that list and tell you which ones I think are good, but if you don't want to do that, you can call around and check them out yourselves. We'll have some free time tomorrow morning, also Wednesday morning in all probability." Adrian ate a few bites of lamb shank while the youngest Tendo woman thought, glancing at her friend.

"May as well trust you to look at list," she commented. After a second, she grinned predatorily. "Know where you live after all." Aiko started laughing as Adrian stopped chewing, looking worried for a moment. Harrison snickered.

"I'd be very impartial, Adrian," he advised. Swallowing slightly harder than the mouthful of meat required, the director nodded wordlessly. "I know a number of lawyers as well, Akane, a couple of them are contract specialists. If none of the people on your list are suitable I can give you some names."

"Thanks, Richard," she replied.

"I can hop you around town if you want, guys," Aiko chuckled, amused. "I'm probably going to stick around for a day or two."

"You could come and watch if you want, Aiko," Adrian told her. She raised an eyebrow, thought for a moment, then nodded.

"Why not? I'm curious to see what happens. I might have to leave at short notice but I'll come back. You know what my life is like." The magical girl looked at Shampoo and Akane. "If that's all right with you two, that is. I don't want to make you nervous."

Akane smiled momentarily. "I don't mind, certainly, Aiko. It would be nice having you there." She turned to Shampoo who was half-way through a large lobster, the Amazon merely nodding.

"What happens after all that is done?" Emily asked curiously. Adrian and Matt looked at each other, glanced at Aaron, then the director turned to her.

"We have a few more possible tests depending on how much time is available. A bit more training, possibly introducing the girls to some of our martial artist experts, that sort of thing. Then it might be an idea to look into things like bank accounts, stuff like that. Human resources will be able to give us a list of everything that would be needed to allow them to live and work here." He turned back to the two young women. "The paperwork is pretty complicated as far as that is concerned but the HR and Legal departments are very good at sorting things out. By the time you have the contracts they'll have got everything set up, I think. They've done it before with talent from outside the US, it seems to take about six to eight weeks worst case from past experience."

"Is that an H-1B visa?" Aiko asked, looking interested. "A friend of mine got one of those a couple of years ago, he's an electronics engineer for some company in Houston."

"It might be, or they might go the route of O-1B, which is for a foreign-born person with extraordinary ability in the motion picture industry, amongst other things. It's a much better fit than an H-1B I suspect, although either would do." He grinned for a moment. "Proving 'extraordinary ability' is going to be pretty damn easy in this case." Aiko glanced at Akane and Shampoo, then snickered, while everyone listening looked amused.

"Guess so. You'll probably have it on film if nothing else."

"Exactly." He looked very satisfied as Akane and the Amazon exchanged a look.

"We'll probably wind up by midday Thursday," Matt remarked, pouring himself and Aaron some more wine. The weapons master waved to the waiter for a fresh bottle, receiving a nod in return. "You two might want to go immediately or you could stick around and see the sights."

"We need to be back by Saturday morning, Tokyo time, at the latest," Akane told him. "Aunt Nodoka has a big party scheduled for Saturday which we don't want to miss. Yori and the others are coming, aside from anything else, and I really want to talk to her and thank her. It's all because of her that this is happening in the first place."

"That young woman does seem to have a powerful affect on everyone she meets," Aaron noted, smiling a little. Akane nodded.

"She does. I don't know where I'd be if it wasn't for her and Chou, and the rest of them as well," she replied soberly, staring at her plate for a while. "Nowhere good, I think."

"They good people," Shampoo agreed quietly. "Have much respect for all of them." She glanced at Aiko, who was smiling slightly. "Including you. Would be much more difficult if had to fly from Japan."

"It's no problem, Shampoo, like I've said. I'm more than happy to bring you guys over whenever you need, assuming there isn't some world-ending catastrophe going on at the time." The magical girl and Harrison exchanged glances, Akane noticed, looking up, but the policeman didn't comment. "If there is, there might be a slight delay." Aiko laughed as Akane grinned at her. Shampoo shrugged, also grinning.

"Can wait."

"Before you guys go back we should have another barbecue," Harrison suggested, looking around the table. "The last one seemed pretty successful."

"Sounds like a good idea, Richard," Adrian agreed. Everyone else seemed up for it. "Wednesday evening, perhaps?"

"Works for me." Matt looked at Aaron, who whispered to his wife, then nodded.

"Me too."

"Can I invite Sophie and her mother?" Serena asked. Emily looked at her, then around at everyone else, who all seemed fine about it.

"Of course, dear. Is her father going to be in town as well? I seem to recall that Joan mentioned he'd be back by then the last time I spoke to her." Serena frowned a little, thinking, then nodded.

"I think he comes back from Florida on Tuesday night," she said slowly. "Sophie talked about it yesterday but I was trying a difficult shot and wasn't listening very well." The teenager looked mildly embarrassed. Emily looked over at Akane and Shampoo, who were listening curiously.
"Sophie's father works for NASA, he's one of the scientists who's working on some sort of probe mission to the moon." She glanced at Serena, who nodded.

"Lunar Prospector it's called," the girl said. "It finished last month. They crashed it into the surface about three weeks ago, Sophie said. They were looking for ice and stuff like that."

Akane smiled. "I wonder if they found any?" she asked. Aiko giggled, then seemed amused when everyone looked at her.

"Probably, if they were looking in the right place," she said placidly, sipping her wine. Harrison looked mildly suspicious, studying her, which caused her to lift her glass in salute for a second. After a moment he shrugged and went back to his steak, smiling slightly.

"Sophie is really proud of him," Serena continued, "but she's also a bit sad she doesn't see him very often right now. Since that project started he's spent a lot of time travelling or a long way from home. She was saying that she's hoping he's going to be back more now it's over."

"Well, if he's back, ask her to invite him along as well, will you please, Serena?" Emily requested. The girl nodded.

"OK, Mom."

"Make sure you bring plenty of that hot sauce, Jim," Aiko said, glancing at the man in question. He grinned at her.

"I've made another batch recently, and a few jars of magical girl grade sauce as well. I was hoping I'd have a chance to test it."

She laughed as did everyone else. "I'll have to take some back for Misaki and Yori."

"Assuming you survive, of course."

"Oh, god, I remember what your ordinary sauce is like, Jim," Harrison groaned. "That's bad enough. The special stuff is horrific. And now you're making something even hotter than that?"

Jim nodded happily. "Yes, it was an interesting problem. But I think I might have done it using some moruga scorpion chillies. They're unbelievably hot."

"If any normal person tries it they'll probably explode, though, so be warned," Sandra giggled from beside her husband. "He was wearing three pairs of rubber gloves on top of each other and a breathing mask when he was cutting those chillies and he still complained that his fingers went numb and his eyes were watering." Harrison paled, while Aiko looked pleased.

"Sounds delicious," she snickered.

"Just keep it away from the rest of us," the policeman pleaded. "I want my colon to stay where it is."

"Ew! Dad!" Serena looked disgusted, making everyone laugh.

"That meal was amazing," Akane commented happily, looking around as they walked. Shampoo nodded, looking pleased.
"Was very good. Like to go back sometime."

"It's a very nice restaurant but not cheap," Adrian agreed. "Worth it on the whole, though, although I wouldn't want to eat there every day."

After the restaurant, and a while in the bar next door, the various parties had gone their separate ways, Aiko taking the Harrison family home then coming back to wish them a good night, before popping off somewhere, looking like she had something interesting planned based on the slightly evil smile she was wearing. The Tendo woman and her two companions had gone back into town to look around at the night-life.

They wandered along for a while, just looking around and watching the people around them, some of whom were obviously tourists, some of whom were locals, and a few of whom were clearly insane. Akane stared at a woman who was dressed like a ballerina, except wearing highly polished military boots, and was carrying a large CD player in a backpack which was blaring out a military march tune. The woman seemed happy enough although the tourists were moving well clear, just in case. Adrian watched with her, shaking his head in amusement.

"There are some weird people around Hollywood," he noted casually. She nodded slowly, watching as the woman disappeared around the corner.

"You can say that again," she laughed. "Nerima is pretty weird as well, but in a... quite different way."

"Minato even more nuts," Shampoo giggled. "Demons irritating but good workout."

"Demons?" Adrian asked curiously.

Akane chuckled. "Shampoo had a run in with a whole pack of small bitey ones a little while ago," she told him. "We got a copy of the news broadcast on DVD, a friend of mine recorded it, if you want to see it. It's pretty impressive. Shampoo was really good even though she had to steal a magic staff from a young magical girl."

"She not happy about that," the Amazon laughed. "Looked very upset. Gave it back when done with it though."

"Yes, covered in goo, which didn't make the poor girl any happier," Akane replied somewhat sarcastically. Shampoo shrugged, still grinning.

"Only demon slime. Washes off."

Laughing, Adrian shook his head, looking at the two women. "I definitely want to see that," he chuckled. "Maybe it's something we should look into doing as a stunt in some future production."

"Have no idea how crazy Minato is," Shampoo snickered. "Make people complain special effects too unrealistic." He laughed again, more loudly.

A couple of minutes later, Akane noticed a couple in their late sixties, both Japanese, looking worried a few metres away on the sidewalk. The man was studying a map with an air of mild despair while the woman was looking around, apparently trying to read the road signs, without a lot of luck based on her expression. Turning to her companion, she shook her head, causing him to sigh loudly. Glancing at Shampoo, Akane walked over, politely bowing a little.

"Hello, I'm Akane Tendo. Are you lost?" she enquired in Japanese. Both the older people suddenly looked vastly relieved.
"Oh, thank god, someone who speaks a sensible language," the man said, smiling and bowing back to her. "We're lost, yes. We're part of a tour group from Osaka, we got separated from the rest of the group hours ago and we've been trying to find our way back to our hotel ever since. Unfortunately neither one of us speaks much English, or any Spanish, which seem to be the only languages anybody around here knows. And both our phone batteries ran down so we can't even call for help, the tour company numbers are on them and neither my wife or I can remember them."

"There are some very strange people as well," the woman confided, looking around. Remembering her own thoughts on that subject Akane laughed.

"I know what you mean," she replied. "Where do you need to go to? My friend here, Adrian, is a local and I can translate for him." She indicated the director who was listening with a politely puzzled expression. Shampoo whispered to him what Akane was saying, causing him to nod his understanding.

"It's..." The husband pulled out a piece of paper and looked at it. "The Sheraton Universal hotel," he read, showing her the Kanji. She looked at the address, then repeated it in English for Adrian's benefit.

"I know it. Decent place a few miles away."

"What's the best way to get them back?" she asked.

"Probably a cab, I'd think," he replied. "We could offer them a lift but we won't get five people in my car, and it's a fair distance out of the way anyway. Will that do?"

"Adrian says a taxi will be the best way to get back," she told them. "Would you like us to call one for you?" Both the tourists nodded gratefully.

"That would be wonderful, thank you, dear," the woman said, sounding very relieved. She laughed a little. "We tried asking a cab driver but he didn't seem to have any idea what we were saying. I'm very impressed how fluent you are in English."

"Thank you," Akane smiled. "I'm still learning it but I may well end up working here in Los Angeles, so I need to be as fluent as I can get." She turned to Adrian for a moment. "They'd very much like a cab," she told him, which made him grin.

"No problems, Akane. I know a good trustworthy company I can call for one, it's a little late for just getting one off the street around here." He pulled out his phone and made a call. Turning back to the two tourists she smiled at them.

"He's calling a taxi company he knows to send a cab here, it won't take long."

"Thank you so much, young woman," the man said, looking pleased and grateful. "You're a credit to your family." Studying her, he asked, "What sort of job will you be doing here in the US? Something in the financial services, or the legal profession?" He looked her up and down, obviously impressed with the good quality dress she was wearing. Laughing, she shook her head.

"No, I'm a martial artist, as is my friend Shampoo here, we're over for some interviews about becoming movie stunt women." Both the tourists looked at each other, then inspected the Tendo woman and her colleague.

"Martial artists?" the wife echoed, looked startled. After a moment she seemed to be thinking. "Hold on... Tokyo accent, martial artists... Let me guess, you're from Nerima, aren't you?" Akane giggled, nodding.
"Impressive. How did you work that out?"

The woman smiled back. "An old friend of mine lived there for many years. He said it was a very strange place that seemed to attract martial artists and absolute chaos in equal quantities. Only equalled by Minato, which is full of magical girls and demons."

"Both of those are true," Shampoo laughed. "Nerima is a madhouse but a lot of fun. Minato is just nuts."

"I see," the wife remarked, looking at her husband, both of them seeming amused. "That has the ring of bitter experience."

"Yes," the Chinese girl replied, smiling back at them. "I ran into some demons myself a while ago, I had toothmarks in my leg for a week. And we both know some magical girls, actually."

"It's why we're here in the first place," Akane explained, to which they looked puzzled. "Long story. Very long, and very weird."

Just then, a taxi pulled out of traffic and halted next to them, Adrian going over and talking quickly to the driver, before handing him a fifty. "Here you go," he said, opening the rear door for them with a smile. Both the husband and wife looked surprised.

"We can pay," the man exclaimed. Akane translated, grinning, to which Adrian waved his hand airily.

"Don't worry about it. My gift to visitors to our city," he replied, which Akane translated back for their benefit. They exchanged a glance then both made a gesture of respect to him.

"Please tell your friend that we very much appreciate the gesture and all the help," the man told Akane, helping his wife into the car.

"I will," she assured him. "Have a good trip back and enjoy the rest of your stay in the US."

"Thank you dear," his wife called from inside the taxi, smiling at them all. "And good luck with your job interview. Show them what proper Japanese martial arts are like." Giggling, Akane nodded, waving at the car as it pulled out again. She turned to Adrian.

"Thank you very much for doing that," she said. "It was a nice thing to do."

"It's no problem, really, Akane. It was nice of you to stop to help them in the first place. Don't worry about it, I have more money than I could ever spend sensibly, I'm hardly going to begrudge a mere fifty dollars to help out some stranded tourists."

"It was still nice of you, even so, Adrian." They resumed their walk, eventually ending up back at his car. Shortly they were heading for their hotel.

When they arrived, he got out as they did, leaning on the car and looking at them. "I'll try to be here about half past eight tomorrow morning, traffic permitting," the director told them both. "Does that sound all right?" Akane glanced at Shampoo, who nodded.

"It's fine by us, Adrian."

"Great. I'm looking forward to it. Get a good nights sleep, have a decent breakfast, and I'll see you in the morning."
They stepped back as he got back in, waving at him as he pulled away, then after another glance at each other, went into the hotel, smiling at Helen the desk clerk, who smiled back and greeted them, before going up to their rooms. "I want to have a look at that swimming pool," Shampoo announced at the door to her room. "A quick swim sounds like a nice way to round off the evening and get ready for bed. You coming?"

Thinking for a moment, Akane nodded slowly. "I'm not a good swimmer but I guess a paddle wouldn't hurt," she replied. Shampoo poked her shoulder.

"You really need to learn how to swim properly, you know," she commented. "It's bound to come up sooner or later as a required skill."

"I know," the youngest Tendo sighed. "But you know me and deep water."

"You take to water like... like... like a chicken takes to a tank of hot custard," Shampoo giggled. When Akane looked curiously at her, puzzled, she added, "You know. Lot of flapping and squawking followed by bubbles."

Sighing, but amused, Akane shook her head in mock disgust. "Is that an ancient Chinese saying?" she enquired, making Shampoo grin.

"No, but it should be. Very evocative, I think. I should write it down."

"You're an idiot, Shampoo," the Tendo woman laughed. They separated to go into their own rooms, meeting up again a few minutes later. Carrying towels and bathing suits they headed for the roof, following the signs to the pool and the sports centre. When they arrived the two young women looked around with interest. "It's very well equipped," Akane noted, looking at all the exercise gear and machinery arranged around the large room.

"The pool is through there, I think," Shampoo said, pointing. Moving through the gym, nodding to the two women and one man who were using the various exercise machines, they went down a short corridor and found themselves in a glassed in section of the roof which had a large square pool in the middle of it. The long sides of the enclosure were open, sliding doors apparently able to close it in during inclement weather, while outside there was a walkway around the edge of the roof from which they could see the lights of LA laid out all around them.

"Wow. That's pretty impressive," the Amazon warrior added, studying the view. Walking over to the pool she knelt down and put her hand in the water. "Nice temperature as well."

Akane went to investigate the various rooms that opened out from the corridor they'd come along, returning a moment later. "There's a nice sauna back there and a steam room as well. And I think there's a great big hot tub out there on the roof." She pointed. "I think we might want those after tomorrow to relax. I'm planning on getting very tense and worried during the day." Shampoo studied her, shaking her head, then both of them laughed.

"Come on, I want a swim. Let's get changed."

Shortly Akane was floating on her back in the shallow end, having eventually managed it after a number of attempts which mostly ended up making her cough a lot to remove the water that had taken up residence in her lungs, much to Shampoo's amusement, while the Amazon was doing slow passes back and forth in the deep end. Staring up through the glass roof at the few stars visible through the light pollution, listening to the splashing of her friend and the distant sounds of the city, she wondered once again how she'd ended up where she was. It still seemed like a dream sometimes, the change was so remarkable for less than two years.
‘I owe Yori and the others so much,’ she thought to herself yet again. ‘I wish I could do something for them as nice as what they did for me, but I can’t see how I ever could repay it.’ She sighed a little. ‘I guess I’ll just have to do my best to prove I’m worthy of the opportunity I’ve been given.’ After a moment she though sadly, ‘I wish I could tell Kasumi and Mom how well my life is going now.’ Sighing again, more heavily, she rolled over to try a little swimming...

Once she’d been pulled out by Shampoo and hacked up the water yet again, she decided she was ready for bed.

Sitting at his desk having just arrived at the station, Harrison turned on his computer and checked his schedule, then picked up the pile of paper in his IN tray and leafed through it. Stopping on one page, an eyebrow went up, before he glanced over at the next desk. "Hey, Diego, what's this about?" he asked the other lieutenant who had got there a while earlier, waving the sheet at him. The other man looked at it for a moment then shrugged.

"I'm not sure, actually. It looks like we had a wave of those weird cases like what happened around New Years. About a dozen gang members so far found tied up with evidence of crimes next to them. They don't seem to know what happened, either, just like last time. It's kind of strange."

Harrison nodded slowly, trying not to grin, suddenly having a fairly good idea what had happened.

"Useful, I suppose, saves us the trouble of rounding them up," he commented. Rojas laughed.

"True. It's sort of non-standard, but the Captain seems fairly pleased even so, it's solved two very nasty muggings, three assaults, a robbery, and a kidnapping. He was looking kind of amused. Oh, by the way, he wants to see you. Something about that drive-by or whatever the hell it was yesterday evening, apparently you were involved?" The other man looked curious.

Sighing a little, Harrison nodded, getting up. "Yes, I was there. It was... eye-opening." At Rojas' expression he simply added before walking away, "Let's just say that those young women who visited aren't people you should annoy and leave it at that." Inwardly he was highly amused at how his colleague went very quiet very suddenly, wondering yet again what exactly Yori had done to him. The man had never explained. Nodding to a couple of other officers as he passed, he headed for the Captain's office, knocking twice before opening the door.

"Ah, Harrison." Captain Martinez looked up as he entered. "Come in, sit down." Closing the door he did as requested. The man behind the desk looked at him for a moment, then turned his attention to a sheet of paper on his desk. "I had a few questions about an interesting incident yesterday evening..."

Sighing slightly, Harrison began explaining, wishing Aiko was there to help.

Her toothbrush in her mouth, Akane wiped her hands on a towel, before picking up her new phone which was making a beeping noise from where it was sitting next to the sink. Flipping it open one-handed she looked at the display then removed the toothbrush and answered it. "Good morning, Adrian," she said, smiling to herself.

"Hello, Akane. I hope you slept well last night?" the voice of the movie director said.

"I did, actually, the beds here are very comfortable indeed. I'm just about ready to go down to breakfast, I think Shampoo is as well."

"OK, that's good," he replied. "There's no hurry, I'm a little delayed because of some sort of accident on the freeway, the traffic is appalling. I think I'll probably be forty minutes to an hour late according to the traffic report on the radio. Sorry about that, but have a good breakfast, maybe a swim, and I'll see you as soon as I can get there."

"Thanks for letting me know," she said, looking at her reflection in the mirror and running her hand through her hair, idly thinking she needed a trim. "We'll be waiting."

"Great. See you soon." As he hung up she closed the phone and put it down again, then resumed brushing, walking out of the bathroom and over to the window, looking out at the view. It was brilliantly lit, a perfect day, and already quite hot as far as she could see, with only a light breeze blowing. After a moment she went back to the sink, rinsed her mouth a couple of times, then got dressed. Glancing at her watch she saw she had a few minutes before the time she'd arranged to meet Shampoo in the restaurant, so after a second or two pulled out her new phone and called Nabiki. When her sister answered she heard how tired she sounded, suddenly realising how late it was back in Japan and ending up feeling slightly embarrassed.

Having apologised, she sat on the bed idly watching the news which was playing with the sound off on the large TV in the corner of the room, chatting with her sister, who had perked up fairly quickly. Having gone over the previous day she enquired about Nabiki's own trip, which by the sound of it was a lot of fun, causing both of them to giggle a lot. The youngest Tendo was looking forward to meeting Nabiki's friend Miki, hoping she was going to come to Nodoka's party. The young woman sounded very interesting.

After a few minutes she said her goodbyes, Nabiki wishing her well, then disconnected, dropping the phone back into her pocket. Standing, she walked over to the TV, which was doing some sort of report that seemed to be on young men found tied up around downtown LA for some reason, looking at the image for a moment and wondering what it was about before turning it off. Having reclaimed her room key and checked that she had everything she needed, which was mainly a small bag with her practice clothes, a towel, and some washing supplies in, she left the room, tapping on the door next to hers. Shampoo opened it almost immediately, smiling at her, her phone to her ear, then waved her inside.

"Yes, Great-Grandmother. I understand. No, I won't. Yes. Yes, I'll make sure I do." She rolled her eyes at her friend making Akane laugh very quietly. "Yes, she's here right now. OK. Yes. No, I won't do that either. All right. Have a good night, say hi to Mousse for me, and I'll see you soon. Thanks." A moment later she disconnected and put the phone away with a small sigh, smiling.

"She has a lot of advice. Most of it is very sensible, but she seems to think my memory is bad, she keeps telling me things she's told me two or three times already." Akane giggled a little at this. "She also said to say hello to you and that she expects both of us to do our best and show these Americans what true martial arts are. And to take a photo of any of them we see riding horses and shooting at things." Both of them laughed at this.

"I think she's probably a little out of touch over that one," Akane chuckled.

"True, but she seems fond of the concept for some reason." Shaking her head, Shampoo picked up her own bag and they both left the room, heading for the elevator.

"Adrian called, he's going to be late because of traffic," Akane said as they descended. "Probably around an hour."

"OK. More time to eat, then," her friend noted.

Nodding, she grinned. "Hopefully it's good food. I wonder what it will be? Probably not the sort of "Hey, I'm open to practically anything at this point, I'm starving," Shampoo laughed.

"After that huge lobster last night?" Akane looked askance at her companion. "And the dessert? And the cheese and crackers after that?" Snickering, the Chinese girl nodded.

"I was hungry and it was really good food. Anyway, we're going to be working hard today, we'll need the energy."

"True, I suppose," she allowed, walking out of the elevator when the doors opened, Shampoo following. They headed into the restaurant, looking around curiously. Stopping just inside the entrance they gave their room numbers to the well dressed young man at the desk who called over a waitress to take them to a table, which they were soon seated at.

"We have a breakfast buffet," the willowy brunette told them, "or you can order from the breakfast menu." She handed them both the relevant menus with a smile.

"Can I have a coffee, please?" Akane asked, smiling back. The woman nodded, glancing at Shampoo, who indicated she'd have the same. Once she'd left to retrieve the drinks they both looked through the menu. "Hmm. Quite different from home. I was right. Let's see..." After a moment, the youngest Tendo put the menu down. "I'm going to quickly check out that buffet."

"OK," Shampoo replied, still puzzling her way through the menu she was holding, as her written English skills weren't wildly good yet. Wandering over to the buffet table, she poked around for a while, coming back with a plate of bacon and eggs, hash browns, and some cold cuts of meat. As she sat Shampoo looked at her plate for a moment, slightly curiously and not looking completely sure about it. "Any good?" she enquired as Akane tried the food.

"It's... different, certainly," the Tendo woman replied, cautiously trying the bacon. "A little overdone. I've heard that Americans like their bacon extra crispy. But it's not bad."

Shampoo considered the buffet but ended up ordering some soup and bread instead, adding some of the cold meats from across the room, when the waitress came back with the coffee. Half an hour later both women were feeling fairly well fed. Turning around in her seat after she finished her food, Shampoo looked speculatively at the buffet again, making Akane smile, before grinning and going over to fetch some more bacon along with some bread with which she made a number of bacon sandwiches. "It's really nice like this," she announced, pleased.

"I've heard people say the humble bacon sandwich will make even a vegetarian eat meat," Akane giggled, stealing the last one off her friend's plate and trying it appreciatively. "I can see why."

"Richard seemed to like them at the barbecue last time when they ran out of burgers," Shampoo agreed, wiping her mouth and waving for a refill on her coffee, which was quickly brought. "Thanks," she said as the waitress complied, smiling.

Eventually they moved to the lounge area off to the side of the restaurant, looking out at the view and talking for a while. A few minutes later Akane remembered the paperwork Adrian had given them the night before, pulling it from her bag and looking it over. "Have you signed yours yet?" she asked her friend, who shook her head, also retrieving the papers she had.

"No, I got about three quarters of the way through reading it last night and fell asleep," Shampoo replied. They spent the next twenty-five minutes going through the papers, Akane reading some of the parts the Amazon was having trouble with, before signing each copy. "Seems fairly simple," the Chinese girl commented.

"Yes, he said it was pretty basic. Nothing I can see that would cause us any problems at any rate," Akane said, rereading the top sheet again to make sure she hadn't missed anything. "But I think he's right, we really do need some legal expert to look over the real contract. I've heard all sorts of horror stories about contracts going wrong if you don't check them thoroughly." Putting her paperwork away again she rummaged around for a moment, finally coming up with the list Nabiki had given her and studying it curiously. "We should look into these people," she added. "Do you think showing it to Adrian like he said is a good idea?"

Considering the matter, Shampoo nodded slowly. "I don't see why not. He seems to be an honest and trustworthy person, after all. Even Great-Grandmother said so and she's a very good judge of character. I can't see that there would be any real reason for him to try to trick us, it wouldn't get him anything except a beating after all." She laughed when Akane snickered, still reading the list. "I think he's just trying to make sure we're happy and feel that we haven't had our trust abused, which is nice. Let's see if he can suggest who on that list is worth talking to."

"We should probably ask Richard for the names of the people he knows as well, like he suggested last night." Folding the list up Akane put it back in her bag. "I very much doubt that a policeman would steer us too far wrong, especially one Aiko knows and trusts."

"Yes, I think so as well." Pulling out her phone Shampoo poked around on it for a moment. "He gave me his number last night after the meal. Um... right, here it is. Should we call him now?"

Looking at her watch Akane nodded. "May as well. It's just after nine, he should be at work by now, I think, and Adrian probably won't be here for about half an hour." Shampoo showed her the number which she quickly entered into her phone.

"You should call him, you're better at this damn language," Shampoo laughed.

"It's not that bad," Akane giggled, dialling the number. "A lot easier than Mandarin."

"There are so many rules for it," Shampoo grumped, "and for each one there's exceptions. It's crazy." Grinning at her friend, Akane listened to the ring tone until it was answered.

"Richard? It's Akane Tendo here. I hope I'm not disturbing you?"

"Oh, hello, Akane. No, not at all, it's nice to hear from you," the officer said, sounding pleased. "I was just writing up a report about Aiko's little incident yesterday." He sighed a little. "The captain was amused, in the end, but there were quite a lot of questions. We're not used to that sort of thing here. Yet." She laughed at the tone of his voice, remembering the story she'd heard at the restaurant.

"I hope it didn't cause you any trouble," she told him.

"No, not really. For some reason, probably due to what happened just after Christmas, magical girls seem to have a lot more leeway around here than you'd think likely, and there's no denying that she brought what could have been a very bad situation under control amazingly suddenly. Luckily no one was killed as a result of those idiots, by some miracle, but there are a dozen or so minor wounds to deal with and a hell of a lot of damage." He sighed again. "Anyway, enough of that, how can I help you?"

"We're just waiting for Adrian and we wanted to ask you about those contract lawyers you mentioned last night. Would it be possible to get some names?"
"Sure. Hold on, let me find my diary." There were rummaging in desk drawer type noises for a few seconds in the background, then his voice came back. "Here we go. Now, let's see..." She pulled out the list again, opening the printout up and turning it over, then looking for a pen. Shampoo handed her one with a smile. Taking it she poised it over the paper in anticipation. "Right, this guy is someone I've known for a while, I know he does legal work for a number of movie people. George Brekenridge. Nice guy." He read off a phone number and address which she wrote down. "Here's another one, Julia Schultze. She's someone I haven't had too much contact with but a number of friends have, they say she's very, very good. Not exactly cheap, of course, but smart and knowledgeable." Again, he gave her the details.

"Thanks, Richard," she said, writing that down as well. Thinking the name sounded familiar, she turned the printout that Nabiki had given her over and skimmed it. "Ah. I thought I'd heard that name before, it's on the list Nabiki gave me."

"OK. Might be worth running it past Adrian as well. If he's heard of her, I'd suggest she might be a good one to try first," he replied. "I've got one more for you, Silvio Ramirez. Jim used him for years. He's getting on a bit, he must be at least sixty, but he's got a very good reputation. I know he's familiar with Hollywood contracts as well." She wrote down the contact details one last time. "That's all I've got. Hope it helps."

"It should do. Thank you very much. It was nice seeing you and your family last night." Akane gave Shampoo her pen back and put the list away again.

"Same to you. I'm looking forward to the barbecue. Good luck with your demonstrations and so on. I expect there's going to be a lot of very impressed people wandering around in a daze by tomorrow night." He laughed as she giggled. "I know it impressed me and I've seen Yori and the others in action. You may not have their abilities but you and Shampoo are so far ahead of anyone other than them I've ever seen I can't see how you can fail."

"It's very nice of you to say that, Richard. Hopefully you're right. I'm still nervous but I'm also looking forward to it."

"Just do your best. Once you're concentrating on what you know, you'll just get on with it, trust me." He sounded honestly convinced, making her smile. "Anyway, I'd better get back to this report. Have fun."

"Thanks. See you at the barbecue. Give my best to Emily and Serena."

"Will do. Bye."Disconnecting she put the phone in her pocket.

"He seems in a good mood."

"He's a very nice guy," Shampoo noted, smiling a little. "I like him. His wife is nice as well. And Serena is going to be very good with a bow, I think. She's got something about her that makes me think she'll take it as far as she can."

They talked for a while, until the Amazon looked up, then waved past Akane's shoulder. "Adrian is here," she said, standing up. Doing the same Akane grabbed her bag, turning to greet the director who was walking into the lounge towards them, looking slightly annoyed yet also pleased to see them.

"Sorry I'm late, ladies, that drive was hell. Way too hot to be sitting in a car on the freeway for an hour even if it's air conditioned, all over some idiot who decided to make a turn far too late and missed." He shook his head in disgust. "The driving ability of some people in this country is appalling. They need to go back to school." Both women laughed as he scowled for a moment. "Oh well. I'm here now. How are you two?"

"Fine, thanks," Akane replied.

"Good too," Shampoo added. "Decent breakfast, good sleep, ready for fun." He grinned, looking much happier.

"Great. It's going to be a lot of fun seeing what happens. I'm expecting a lot of jaws dropping in a few hours." Waving to the exit as they laughed again, he added, "Shall we go? Do you have everything you need?" Akane nodded, lifting her bag.

"We've got our practice clothes and everything else we thought might be required." As they followed him out to the car, she reached into the bag and pulled out the liability waiver, handing it to him when they stopped next to the vehicle. "We signed these as well, they look fine." He took the papers from her, then Shampoo as the other woman also handed her copy over, quickly skimming through them before nodding.

"Great. Thanks. Nothing that looked problematic?"

"No, it seems pretty simple," she said, opening the rear door as Shampoo, grinning, grabbed the front seat this time.

"That's the idea," he told her, also getting in and putting his seatbelt on. Soon they were heading down the main road. "OK, since I was late, there's not a huge amount of time left to get to the studio, even with the later start, so we may as well go there directly. I can show you two around until everyone is ready then we can blow some minds. That sound all right?" He looked at Shampoo, then over his shoulder at Akane, a somewhat shark like grin spreading across his face at his thoughts.

"Is good idea, I think," Shampoo agreed, also grinning. Akane laughed.

"Fine by me."

"All right, then, it'll take about twenty minutes to get there." Driving steadily along the road, he suddenly said, "Hmm. I should tell Aiko when we're going to be there so she can meet us." Reaching down to the centre console he flipped up the cover over the dial pad for the phone, pressing a two digit short code then the execute button. A couple of rings sounded through the car speakers before the magical girl answered.

"Hi, Adrian. How are things this beautiful morning?"

He smiled, as did the other two. "Fine, thanks, Aiko. I'm just driving to the studio with Akane and Shampoo, we should be there in about twenty minutes. Do you want to meet us there?"

"Sure. At the front gate?" She sounded cheerful.

"That would do it. See you soon."

"Bye, guys," Aiko replied, then disconnected. He glanced at his companions, who both looked amused, then went back to concentrating on his driving.

"I wonder if she'll wait until the last moment or actually be waiting for us?" Akane mused.

Adrian shook his head a little, grinning. "No idea. With her, she might be in the middle of the Amazon jungle right now, or half a mile away. No way to tell." They laughed, exchanged looks, then began talking about the upcoming day.

"And this is the stage we're using for the bar fight scene," Adrian explained, waving his hands at the cavernous space, currently mostly empty except for the complex lighting rigs in the roof space and all the various scenery backdrop equipment around the walls. Akane and Shampoo looked around with interest, nodding as he spoke. Aiko was standing next to them watching with a small smile on her face.

"It's enormous," the Tendo woman said. He smiled, looking around again.

"Not the biggest stage, that's on the other side of the lot, but yes, it's pretty large. We can set up all sorts of things in here, up to and including some very convincing street scenes. Anything larger than that, we either use the big one, or do outside, but it's useful to be able to shoot indoors when it rains." He laughed for a moment. "Not that it does all that often, this is LA after all, but when it rains, it often rains hard. And it can get very windy as well."

"Must be annoying chasing a fake building across the lot," Aiko snickered, making him glance wryly at her.

"It's happened," the director sighed. All three women broke down laughing.

"Well, that's most of the studio, or at least a quick tour of it," he added. "Let's go and find Matt, he should be with Aaron in the armoury at the moment, then we can go over what we're going to do first while we wait for Mitch and Jennifer to arrive. I got a text from Mitch a few minutes ago, they'll both be here in about fifteen minutes or so." He saw they were looking mildly puzzled, so went on, "Mitch Lloyd is the chief operating officer of the studio, Jennifer Huang is the human resources director. The final person we're waiting for is Anton Moelker, he's the executive producer. He had to fly out to New York for a small family emergency yesterday morning but he landed at LAX about ten minutes ago so he should be here within an hour and a half."

Leaving the enormous building they walked back across the large studio lot, the director pointing out various other things as they went. A few minutes later the group entered the armoury, Shampoo and Akane both stopping dead and looking around in impressed amazement at the enormous quantity and variety of weapons both ancient and modern. Aaron looked up from where he was discussing the dismantled guts of a machine gun on his desk with Matt, both of them smiling at the women. "Hi, ladies," he said, nodding to them, then standing, while Matt walked over and shook hands.

"Hi, Aaron," Aiko replied, grinning at the expressions on the faces of her companions. She looked around for a moment, then back to him. "Still pretty impressive."

"It's not bad," he chuckled, following her gaze. He watched as Shampoo headed for a collection of swords neatly stored in racks on one wall, inspecting them closely, before turning to him.

"May touch?" she enquired, pointing to one specific one. He grinned and nodded.

"Help yourself," the arms-master replied. She smiled back, carefully lifting the sheathed two-handed jian from the rack, then removed the sheath with a practised gesture, handing it to Akane, who stepped back out of range of the more than a yard long blade. This weapon, unlike many of the others, was real and razor-sharp. The Amazon warrior held the sword up, studying the blade for a moment, before falling into a combat stance and beginning an advanced training exercise with it, slowly at first, but steadily speeding up. Everyone watched, Akane with great interest, Aiko with an experts eye, and the others with expressions ranging from impressed to worried. Adrian was the worried one, the noise the blade made as it ripped through the air was a little intimidating especially in such close quarters.

"Good grief," he muttered, watching the young woman move gracefully about wielding the heavy blade like it weighed nothing, her long hair swaying too and fro as she moved. Beside him, Aiko laughed slightly.

"She's pretty impressive, isn't she?" the brunette asked rhetorically. He nodded wordlessly. Finishing the exercise Shampoo stopped dead, glanced at Akane with her hand out, caught the sheath her friend tossed her and in one smooth motion flipped the blade in her other hand end for end and slid it back into the sheath without touching it. Akane and Aiko both clapped, laughing, while Shampoo bowed to them with a grin, then turned to put the weapon back on its rack. Aaron whistled quietly and shook his head in respect.

"Damn good, Shampoo. I'm amazed." She smiled at him not looking even slightly tired.

"Thanks, Aaron. Basic exercise, too showy for combat, but good for keeping reflexes in shape." She glanced at Adrian who was exchanging a look with Matt. "Showy good for movie?"

"Oh, yes, I think showy is very much what people will like," Matt replied after a moment, looking amused. He grinned at her, making her grin back. "Today is going to be a lot of fun."

Aaron turned back to his desk, looking down at the stripped down MP5 lying there. "I'll just put this back together and lock it away then I'll be ready," he said. Aiko walked over beside him, also looking at the weapon.

"Heckler and Koch MP5A2 9mm submachine gun," she said after a moment, picking up the barrel and looking closely at it. "Modified for blank firing only."

He inspected her for a moment, looking slightly surprised. "Yes, exactly right," the man replied. "I wouldn't have expected you to know so much about firearms. As far as I know Japan is very restrictive in which ones people there can own. I know the penalties for firearm-related crime are very harsh."

She nodded, smiling slightly, putting the barrel back on the workbench. "Oh, yes, very much so. We've got possibly the strictest laws in the world covering guns, in fact, although the UK is a close second. Even the police don't use them unless they absolutely have to although they carry them. But, that said, I've been around. I know quite a bit about all sorts of things you wouldn't normally expect, aside from the magic." Her smile widened. "Yori has had all of us learn even more things as well. You wouldn't believe some of the things she knows about." Gesturing to the desk, she asked, "Do you mind if I have a go? I haven't disassembled or reassembled one of these things in a while, it's good practice."

Everyone watched her, then Aaron stepped back, looking interested. "Be my guest," he replied. "Try not to break it, I only just replaced the firing pin after some actor bent the damn thing. No idea how."

Looking amused, she sat at the desk while everyone else came closer to watch. Picking up a couple of parts she studied them for a moment. "Hmm. OK, this is the clicky bit and this is the bangy bit, I think," she mumbled, before giggling as he sighed. Putting them down she rearranged the parts on the desk for a few seconds until she seemed satisfied with the order they were in. "Right. Let's see..."
Everyone gaped as her hands blurred. There was an almost continuous metallic clicking sound as the firearm grew out of the pile of parts in her hands, until they stopped moving an implausibly short time later, like a weird sort of time lapse animation. Picking up a small screwdriver she reattached the rear sight, then put the completely reassembled weapon down and cracked her knuckles, grinning. "Five and a half seconds. I'm out of practice," she announced, standing up and reaching out to close his open mouth gently. "Thanks."

After a long moment he shook his head, transferring his gaze to her. "You..." He shook his head again, beginning to grin as well. "You people are just insane."

"Oh, sure, but we're also quite nice," Aiko laughed. Clapping her on the shoulder he laughed as well, picked the weapon off the desk and checked it over carefully, then went off to lock it in the relevant cage, still chuckling to himself. When he returned they left the armoury, soon finding themselves in the main office complex attached to the studio complex. Adrian lead the group up to the fifth floor conference room which had been set aside for their meetings over the next couple of days, opening the door and waving everyone inside. He put his briefcase on the table, Matt doing the same with the one he was carrying, then looked at the guests.

"Anyone want coffee? Tea? Anything like that?"

"Coffee would be nice, thanks," Akane told him.

"Also think so," Shampoo added, looking out the window at the end of the room for a moment, then turning back to him. Aiko smiled when he looked enquiringly at her, nodding.

"OK. Matt, could you arrange that, please?" he requested his colleague. The stunt director smiled, nodded, and left the room. "Find a seat and sit down, guys, the others should be here soon," he added, sitting down himself at one end of the table. By the time Matt came back everyone was seated. He took his place next to Aaron.

"The coffee and some snacks are on the way," the ex-military man noted, opening his briefcase and removing a folder, then putting the case on the floor next to him having closed it.

"Thanks, Matt." They all looked up as Jim came into the room, closing the door quietly behind him.

"Sorry I'm late, traffic is terrible," the new arrival said apologetically, also sitting down. "Hi, Akane, Shampoo, Aiko. Did you all have a good night after the restaurant?"

Aiko leaned back in her chair and looked amused for a moment. "It had some fun parts, yes, thanks," she replied, sounding satisfied. He looked curiously at her but when she didn't expand on the comment simply grinned and turned his attention to the other two.

Akane laughed, glancing at Aiko, clearly also curious but not asking. "It was fine, thanks, Jim. Adrian showed us around for a little longer then we went back to the hotel, which is really nice. Shampoo swam for a while, I tried not to drown, then we had a good night's sleep."

Chuckling, Shampoo added, "Akane not try too hard not to drown. Had to pull her out six times." This caused Aiko to begin laughing quietly to herself, which Akane seemed to take in good spirits. The Chinese Amazon snapped her fingers, reaching for her bag and removing a DVD in a case. "While remember, here copy of... fun with demons... in Minato recently." She grinned, sliding it across the table to Adrian, who picked it up and looked curiously at it. Pointing at the DVD player built into the wall under a ceiling mounted projector, she added, "Could watch now. Set mood."
Shaking his head in amusement, Adrian commented, "We'll wait for the others, I think, they'll want to see it as well." She nodded, so he put it down then pulled out his own paperwork, putting his case on the floor as well, then flipped the top of the three folders open and glanced at the itinerary on the first page, making a couple of quick notes in the margin as he through of a few things he wanted to change. Matt was reading through his own folder, talking quietly to Aaron, who was studying one of the pages his colleague had handed to him.

"OK, before the others get here, you two, I'll tell you a little about them." He glanced at his watch to make sure he had time. "Mitch is a decent guy but a little... how shall I put this... a little behind the times in his attitude to women in the industry." He held up his hand in an apologetic gesture while the young women listened intently. "Not in a bad way, not really, he doesn't even realise he's doing it most of the time. But he's over sixty, he's been in the industry his entire working life, and when he started women weren't taken as seriously as they deserved especially in the stunt area. They still aren't, unfortunately, although it's got a lot better. That sort of history is hard to overcome. He tries, when he realises, but please try not to get too annoyed if he's a little... patronising."

Matt chuckled for a moment, causing their attention to shift to him. "I strongly suspect that when he sees what you're capable of his attitude will change quite fast, if only out of self-preservation."

Aaron nodded soberly from beside him as they laughed. "Adrian's right, Mitch is a good guy, but he can certainly come off at first as a bit of a chauvinist. Unfortunately that's pretty common in the movie industry, like a lot of others. Give him the benefit of the doubt because he isn't deliberately trying to be like that, he can't really help it."

"He'd be somewhat horrified if he knew how it looks to people sometimes," Jim added quietly. "Most people don't want to tell him though because he's pretty damn high in the corporate structure. They're a little scared of what he'd do. Probably needlessly."

Akane glanced at Shampoo and said something to her in Japanese, causing the Amazon to smile, nod, then say something back, rolling her eyes. Beside her, Aiko snickered but didn't add anything. Turning back to them Akane said, "We'll be on our best behaviour, Adrian. We're not unfamiliar with that sort of thing, it's pretty common in Japan, I'm afraid."

"In our culture, historically, women have been of the seen, not heard, variety, at least publicly," Aiko noted, looking mildly amused. "Although in a lot of cases it's the wife who really runs the family. Tamiko's mother is a good example of that. So is Nodoka in many ways." She shrugged. "It's not like that in Minato, for fairly obvious reasons, or Nerima for the most part, but you certainly encounter it in other places that aren't used to women with... unusual abilities."

"I can sure imagine that the 'know your place, woman!' types probably wouldn't survive first contact with a magical girl or female martial artist," Matt snickered. The almost identically dark grins that came across the faces of the three women on the other side of the table made him laugh quite a lot.

"Not so much, no," Aiko laughed.

Watching, Adrian shook his head, glancing at Jim, who was listening with amusement and interest. His colleague returned the look, raising one eyebrow for a moment, then went back to listening. "Right, anyway, other than that, Mitch is a good and intelligent executive who makes some pretty sensible decisions. He can be a little cautious but once you've convinced him he'll pull out all the stops. It offsets some of the other executives who can be... difficult." He sighed as his colleagues all nodded at once. "Luckily in this case we don't have to deal with them very much at the moment. Now, Jennifer is a bit different. She's younger, very smart, and very good at her job, but also very by the book. She's going to be a little awkward I think since we're going to be asking her to change the normal rules quite a lot on what's allowed."

"I've been talking to her since your last visit," Jim told them, "softening her up, if you want to put it that way. But she's going to have to see it for herself before she'll really believe it."

"She kicked back a bit about the salary I suggested," Adrian went on when his friend finished, "but I think once she sees the demos she'll give in pretty quickly. Mitch will be easy to convince from that point. The studio has a lot of money and he'll see it's a fantastic investment very quickly, more than worth it from everyone's point of view. The fact that you're both female will help with Jennifer, she's also very keen on getting more women into the industry."

"So we need to impress them both," Akane stated, nodding. She glanced at Shampoo, then Aiko, who was still smiling slightly. "I think we can manage."

Roaring with laughter at her dry tone, Adrian nodded. "I don't doubt it." He looked at his colleagues for a moment. "Perhaps we should make a bet with them both?" The somewhat unfriendly looks he received from Matt and Adrian made him laugh even more for a few seconds. When he calmed down, he continued, "Anton, the executive producer, is also a decent guy. He's quite enthusiastic about the whole thing. He's always had a soft spot for martial arts movies and has said a few times in the last couple of years we should do one, but there haven't been any good scripts we've seen for some time. Most of the decent ones seem to come out of Hong Kong these days. He'd love to do a good American one if possible."

"Part of the problem is that action movies in the US almost always end up being about how big an explosion can you make and how many gun fights can you throw in," Matt said, looking somewhat annoyed. "I've been in real combat, I know how damn unrealistic most of them are, but it sells. More and more CGI is needed these days, it's almost becoming a matter of who has the best computers. The story seems to be an afterthought in a lot of cases. Be nice to buck the trend."

"I've heard on the radio that there's talk of some new stealth project for a martial arts movie by a studio that's being very quiet about it," Aiko laughed, making Jim and Adrian look hard at her, then exchange glances. "One with, how did they put it, 'previously unknown female talent' in it." She seemed to find the subject very funny.

"Hmm. Yes, that's a rumour that's been going around for a few months now," Adrian mused out loud, inspecting her closely. "Oddly enough, since about the time you and the others turned up around the holidays."

"There's a very annoying teenager who keeps turning up asking about what it's called and when it's going to be out," the director went on, sighing, still looking at her. She smirked. "He's going around all the studios making a damn nuisance of himself, he keeps appearing where he shouldn't be. Security is going nuts trying to keep him out." The magical girl began giggling. After a few seconds he shook his head with a small sigh, returning his attention to Akane and Shampoo who were looking slightly confused. "Anyway, those are the three executives you'll meet today. There will also be a camera crew, some other stunt people, that sort of thing, but those three are the ones you need to show your stuff to at the moment." He looked up as one of the PAs came in with a tray of coffee and another one of small sandwiches on a trolley, parking it next to the table. "Thanks, Beth. Have Mitch and Jennifer come in yet?"

"Yes, they're downstairs, they should be here in a couple of minutes," the short blonde told him.
"OK. Send them in when they come up will you, please?" She nodded, leaving the room again. "Help yourselves to sandwiches," he told the room at large, pouring coffee for the three women first and handing it across the table. Aiko took hers, then went and stood by the window watching the people working in the lot below, sipping the drink. Shortly everyone had a drink and a sandwich.

Finishing her ham and cheese sandwich, which was surprisingly good, Akane twitched a little as the conference room door opened again, two people entering, a very expensively dressed tall man in his sixties with grey hair and a short beard, and a somewhat shorter yet still quite tall woman of obvious Chinese ancestry mixed with something from much further south, probably West African. She was very good looking but somewhat severe in appearance, wearing a nice suit that gave off an effect of authority. Feeling slightly intimidated for a moment, Akane suddenly thought, She's nowhere near as worrying as Ms Aoyama so how bad can she be? The thought made her smile internally. After that particular woman, this one should be pretty easy to deal with. If nothing else she didn't make you feel like your coffee was about to freeze solid.

"Ah, hello, Adrian," the man, Mitch, said expansively, looking around the room with avuncular good humour. "Everyone seems to be here except Anton." He nodded to Matt, Aaron, and Jim, who greeted him.

"He'll be here in about forty-five minutes according to his latest text," the director replied, glancing at his watch. "He's through security and was getting into the car five minutes ago."

"Good, good," the COO said, looking at the coffee-pot with interest. Matt poured him a cup and handed it to him, then did the same with the HR director, who thanked him in a quiet voice, studying Akane and Shampoo carefully, after a quick glance at Aiko who was still by the window. "And these lovely ladies must be the prospective new talent, I assume," he added once he'd put his cup down. Walking around the table he held out his hand. Akane stood, as did Shampoo, both of them shaking it in turn, Adrian making the introductions. "Good grip," he commented with a smile. "Especially for a woman."

The youngest Tendo sister glanced at Adrian, who she could see was holding in a slight sigh, while Jennifer had definitely rolled her eyes but said nothing. "Thank you, Mr Lloyd," she replied, trying not to become annoyed. She could see why Adrian had warned them.

"Oh, call me Mitch, please," the man said, looking them up and down for a few seconds, then returning to the head of the table, Adrian making way for him without a word, moving to the side they were sitting on and taking his seat. "Now, I've heard some remarkable things from Adrian and the other guys, all about a demonstration you did for them. Please don't be offended if I say I'm still a little sceptical about it all, what they told me sounds somewhat fantastic."

"If not impossible," Jennifer muttered. He didn't seem to hear.

"But I'm more than willing to be convinced," he went on. "You clearly impressed them a lot, which I know isn't easy at least in the case of Aaron and Matt. Adrian can be a little overenthusiastic at times." He looked at the director, who smiled back, although Akane could tell he was mildly irritated.

"They're everything I told you and then some," Adrian said evenly. He glanced at Matt, then Aaron, before his smile turned slightly evil. "In fact, I'll bet you... two thousand dollars, say... that less than an hour of demonstrations will make you believe everything I told you." The stunt director and the armourer both developed completely blank expressions, saying nothing. Akane could have sworn she heard a faint snicker come from Aiko but when she looked the woman was still staring out the window, her own face expressionless.

"Ah, Adrian, Adrian, are you sure you want to make a bet like that? It seems easy money to me. Some of the things you've said are hard to believe." Mitch smiled at his director. "I wouldn't want you to feel I was taking advantage of you."

"Oh, I think I could live with it," Adrian chuckled. "Let's raise it to three thousand."

"All right," the other man agreed. He glanced at the woman beside him, who simply shrugged.

"It's your money, Mitch," she said, still inspecting Akane and her friend.

"Indeed, indeed. All right, so you've been over all the preliminaries with the young ladies?" Adrian nodded, pulling the waivers out of one of his folders and sliding them across to Mitch, who glanced at them then passed them on to Jennifer. The woman read both of them carefully before slipping them into a folder of her own.

"It seems in order," she announced.

"Good. Well, what's the first step, Adrian?" Mitch looked at both young women again. "This is your show, we're just here to see it."

"We're going to do the martial arts demonstration in Stage Three, we've got some props and equipment set up there, similar to what Jim and his friend Richard arranged when Akane and Shampoo came over the first time. Aiko suggested a few other things she thought might make things more interesting." He motioned to the brunette woman by the window, who turned around and leaned on it, smiling.

"Hopefully it should be worth watching," she said casually. Adrian smiled a little while Matt, Aaron, and Jim all chuckled. Mitch looked at them for a second, seemingly slightly taken aback, then moved on.

"That sounds good," he replied.

"It will take us through up to lunch, I think," Adrian continued. "After that, we're going to begin the special training, beginning with the vehicle handling. We're going to start at the vehicle depot car park with Greg then move onto the skid pan later." Both executives nodded. The director turned to Akane and Shampoo, explaining, "Greg Crossley is our driving expert and lead vehicle stunt man, he used to race Indy car, then stock cars off road. Brilliant driver and a damn good instructor." They both nodded, glancing at each other.

"When they've got some time behind the wheel, Aaron is going to take them through firearms training as well, or the basics of it, so they know which end to point at people, that sort of thing," he went on, grinning as Akane rolled her eyes and Shampoo laughed. Aaron looked amused.

"That'll take care of today. Tomorrow is going to be more driving training at the airfield for the more advanced stuff and anything else that we need for the four scenes we've got planned. We'll do action scene eighteen from the spy movie we were filming a few months ago, starting Wednesday. We've still got the sets in storage for that which will get put back in Stage One in the morning."

Mitch nodded, looking interested.

"That's the one with the running battle through the office building, correct?"

"Yes, it was a pain to shoot the first time, but we have a good idea of what we're looking for. It'll be very interesting to contrast it against what we shot for the actual movie. We'll run it twice, once each with Akane and Shampoo in each role, after some dry runs." Mitch nodded again, making "Good, good, that sounds very sensible. What's next?"

"There's the car chase scene from the bank robbery film that we're considering, which we'll do at the airfield, we've got the old sets from a few other street scenes still up out there. We're going to use the same one for the running martial arts fight scene, which is one Aaron and Matt came up with, it's a mash-up of a few different Hong Kong movie scenes plus some stuff they thought up based on the first demo the young women did. It reads as impressive although not many people could pull it off without a lot of CGI." He grinned. Mitch made some more notes.

"May I see the scene notes?" Jennifer asked. Adrian passed her several stapled pages out of one of his folders, which she took and skimmed, then read one page more carefully.

"This is... potentially very dangerous," she said, raising an eyebrow. "Do you have a risk assessment for this scene?" She indicated one paragraph, looking mildly irritated. "We're going to need to set up a significant amount of safety equipment, which will pull people from other projects..." Adrian raised his hand, smiling, cutting her off.

"Don't worry, it's nowhere near as bad as you're thinking. Yes, normally, we'd use that equipment, but in this case it's overkill, trust me."

She looked very dubious. "I'm not entirely sure you understand the risks involved," she replied, shaking her head. "The liability should something go wrong would be significant, the waivers notwithstanding."

"Wait until after the demo," he told her. "Then rethink your objections, OK?"

After a moment she nodded, making some notes of her own, still not looking convinced. "I'm not going to sign off on it until I'm satisfied all the risks are understood," she cautioned, making him sigh faintly, then glance at the three women to one side and wink, making Aiko snicker and Akane hide a grin.

"That's fine, Jennifer," he said. She looked more or less satisfied, handing him the papers, which he put back in his folder, then continued. "The final scene is basically a classic western bar fight, but with swords rather than guns. It's nothing we're planning on using in any upcoming production although it should be a good test, and impressive. Anton suggested it. We're going to do that in Stage One as well."

"All right, that sounds very good." Mitch studied the notes he'd made, then looked up. "This is, what, about two days in total?"

"Should be. We'll be ready to start Wednesday morning so if everything goes to plan we should have the rushes ready by sometime later on Thursday. We're expecting about forty, maybe sixty minutes of raw footage of the final scenes." Adrian seemed satisfied, looking at Matt and Aaron, both of whom nodded. Jim was taking notes and listening carefully.

"If we have time I'd like to do the helicopter assault scene from that military action project we're considering," Matt added. "We've got everything available with a bit of creativity, including the chopper, I can get it here on short notice, the guy who flies it is a friend and he's up for doing me a favour. They're using it for a movie at Universal at the moment so it's close by, but they've shut down production for a week due to the lead coming down with food poisoning."

"Ah, interesting." Mitch seemed to like this idea. "All right, if there's time, that could be a good way to round things off. It's all depending on the demonstration, of course, though." He smiled at Akane and Shampoo, apparently genuinely. The youngest Tendo smiled back.

"We're fairly sure we can show you something you'll like," she told him, feeling inwardly mildly worried yet still eager.

"I do hope so, Miss Tendo, I do hope so. I've been looking forward to this for some time."

"Once everyone here has seen the raw cut, we'll edit the best takes into something more professional which you can show to the board," Adrian said, adding in an aside to Akane and Shampoo, "I'll also give you a couple of DVDs of the footage, raw and edited. For your collection." Pleased, Akane smiled at him.

"I think we'd both like that, Adrian," she replied honestly.

"Would like to show to Great Grandmother," Shampoo laughed.

A few minutes later, after they'd gone over some more information which Akane, for one, couldn't really make heads or tails of, there was so much studio jargon involved, the door opened to admit a fairly short yet very energetic looking man in his late forties, with short red hair and piercing grey eyes behind stylish glasses, who looked quickly around then smiled. "Ah, Anton, you made it,"

Mitch exclaimed, standing and greeting his colleague.

"Finally, yes. I'm very sorry to have caused this delay," the man said with a trace of some European accent in his tenor voice, sighing a little, then perking up. "But I'm here now. What did I miss?"

"We were going over the plans for the next few days," Adrian told him, as he sat on the other side of the table, glancing at his co-workers, then studying the young women with lively interest. "This is Akane Tendo, and Xian Pu, or Shampoo as everyone tends to call her. And a friend and associate of theirs, Aiko, who's here for... backup and transportation reasons." The director grinned as Aiko chuckled.

"Very pleased to meet you all," Anton smiled, "I've heard some very interesting things from Adrian and the others. I'm looking forward to the next few days with great excitement."

"Thank you, Anton," Akane replied, nodding with a smile. "We're looking forward to it as well, although I'm still a bit nervous about it." She looked around. "All this is a bit more than I was expecting."

"Don't worry about it," he laughed, "we always go over the top. That's more or less normal operating procedure around here. The whole place is total chaos at the best of times." Mitch looked at him, making him grin. "What are you looking at me like that for, Mitch, you know what it's like. Everyone here is crazy. They wouldn't be working in the industry if they were normal."

Sighing slightly the executive eventually looked away from his colleague, conceding the point, which made everyone else other than Jennifer, who was still making notes, smile. "I suppose that's not entirely wrong," he admitted.

They went back over the material they'd covered earlier quickly to bring the late arrival up to speed. Reading the last of the notes from both Mitch and Jim, Anton seemed pleased, handing the papers back to their respective owners. "Great. It looks like we're going to have an interesting few days. Adrian, do you mind if I watch the stunt scenes?"

"Not at all," the director replied. "Please feel free to join us at any point."
"Thanks."

"I won't be able to see anything other than this demonstration, I'm afraid," Mitch said, shaking his head, "We have a board meeting, then tomorrow I have to fly out to Vancouver for a couple of days, but I'll be back mid-day Thursday at the latest."

"Not a problem, Mitch," Adrian responded. He looked at his watch. "Well, everything should be ready by now. Let's get down to Stage three and make a start, shall we?" He had a sudden thought, though, picking up the DVD case Shampoo had given him. "Oh, before we do that, Shampoo brought some footage of her own that she thought we might like. We should watch that first, it's not very long, is it, Shampoo?"

The young woman shook her head. "About five, ten minutes at most." She grimaced a little. "Seemed longer at time, believe me. But over fairly quickly."

Getting up he walked over to the AV equipment built into the wall, pressing the switch that made a hidden screen descend from a slot in the ceiling to cover the window, producing a faint hum, then loaded the DVD into the machine. Turning on the projector mounted on the ceiling he picked up the remote control and returned to the table and his seat. Thirty seconds later the machinery had warmed up and was illuminating the screen with a high resolution logo. "OK, let's see what you get up to in your spare time," he chuckled, making Shampoo groan a little while Aiko and Akane burst out laughing. He pressed play.

The recorded news program began showing, a brief introduction from a studio anchor giving way to what they all recognised as the young woman on the other side of the table, with three young women off to one side watching as she jumped around, a much younger one in an elaborate pink dress standing beside them holding a long staff with a glowing blue gem the size of an apple mounted on the end of it in her hands. It was a fairly normal looking street scene, somewhere in Tokyo judging by the Kanji text on all the signs, but the dozens of little monsters running around and growling were anything but normal.

"Holy fuck," Matt whispered in awe. "The teeth!"

"What the hell are those things?" Jim yelped in shock. Aiko sighed heavily.

"Very annoying little demons that are in some way associated with that little girl in the pink dress. Chiyoko, she's called. Nice girl, but... not a good shot." They watched as a sparkling beam of some sort of energy shot from the gem on the end of the staff the young girl was wielding as she levelled it in the general direction of one of the little creatures, missing it completely and coming perilously close to Shampoo, who squawked in alarm and dived out of the way.

The recorded Amazon stood up again, stared at the large hole in the side of the car that was only a metre from where she'd been standing, then turned to glare at the girl, who looked embarrassed and apparently mumbled something. Giving her another evil look the older woman went back to the fight, kicking one of the little demons clear across the street and through a shop window, both the window and the demon exploding into bits in the process. Adrian gaped, Jennifer made a faint disgusted noise, Aaron swore to himself, and everyone else watched in amazement.

Akane noted with idle amusement that Aiko was watching the video with approval and a very analytical expression, making her wonder if she was critiquing the Chinese woman's performance. The thought made her grin for a moment.

On the screen the girl fired another magical beam of destruction that once more missed the target, assuming one defined the target as the small demon chewing on a lamp post. If, on the other hand, one assumed the target was the completely innocent and uninvolved mailbox a couple of metres behind Shampoo, her aim was dead on, as half of it vanished with a screech. Shampoo made a remarkably similar sound and dived at the girl, wrenching the staff from her grasp, which she didn't appreciate at all judging by the yelling, fiddled with it for a moment, then swore and proceeded to use it to mulch a large number of demons over the next few minutes.

Eventually finishing off the last one, she returned the staff to the girl, who seemed to be having some digestive distress based on the amount of vomiting involved, then talked with the other three women for a while. The segment ended with all four of them walking off together a little later, the young girl leaving in a different direction, then returned to the studio where the anchor talked for a moment before going to a different story, at which point the recording ended. Pressing stop Adrian simply stared at the logo that came up for several seconds before turning to look at Shampoo along with everyone else in the room. Most of them were apparently having some difficulty with what they'd seen, Akane noticed, hiding a grin.

"What..." The director shook his head for a moment then tried again. "Ah, all right, thank you Shampoo, that was very... interesting." He looked at Mitch who had an odd expression on his face. "Does that sort of thing happen a lot in Minato?"

"Think so," the young woman replied agreeably, glancing at Aiko, who sighed a little, smiling slightly. "First time I ever got involved. Would prefer not to again. Little demons bite."

"They do indeed. They'll eat anything, you really don't want one latching on to your leg if you can avoid it," the brunette confirmed, making several people shudder at the thought. "Those particular ones aren't all that common although they certainly turn up more than we'd like. But there's quite often something interesting going on at home." She grinned at their looks, jumping to her feet and retrieving the DVD which she handed to Adrian in its case. "Come on, let's see what Akane and Shampoo can do, all right? I'm looking forward to it." The director took it from her slightly numbly, looked blankly at the thing, then shook his head hard before putting it into his case.

"Yes, you're right. Good idea." He looked at the Amazon, who returned his gaze with an amused look, then shook his head again. "Let's go." He rose and headed to the door. Everyone stood up, as Matt held the door open, collected their papers, and followed the director. Akane, Aiko, and Shampoo brought up the rear accompanied by Jim, who grabbed the last sandwich on the way out of the room, making the magical girl look at him and grin.

"Just like Misaki, she'd never leave a sandwich behind either." He snickered, eating it with enjoyment.

"They're not bad and I didn't have any breakfast," he told her, finishing it off quickly. She laughed for a moment.

"Adrian, we need to stop to change into our practice clothing," Akane called. Adrian turned around, walking backwards for a moment.

"There are some facilities for that in the studio, Akane," he told her. The Tendo sister nodded and kept following as he turn around again.

After a five minute walk they arrived at the door to another cavernous building, large enough to have contained the entire Tendo Dojo and grounds and some fifteen metres high inside. There were half a dozen men putting the finishing touches on a fairly elaborate set of equipment, which made Akane stop and stare, then slowly smile. Shampoo looked as well, nudging her with a grin. "They went all out, didn't they?" she whispered in Japanese. Akane nodded.
"Not bad at all," Aiko said, smiling. She moved over to the first prop, which was a wooden pole like the one that Richard and Jim had installed in the policeman's garden, set into an oil drum full of concrete to hold it upright. "Think it will stand up to you, Akane?"

The Tendo sister came over and looked at it carefully, experimentally pushing it. "It should do for a while at least," she replied. "Assuming it doesn't tip over."

"There's nearly half a ton of concrete in that drum," one of the men who was working nearby said, overhearing them and looking mildly puzzled. "It's not likely to fall over." She glanced at him, then Aiko, before turning away, both of them smirking slightly. He watched them go back to the others then shrugged, going back to his work. Shortly he and his colleagues finished, had a brief conversation with Aaron, then left, closing the main door in the process.

"So, Adrian, explain what we're looking at," Mitch requested, inspecting the various props scattered around the huge empty building with interest. The entire room was lit brilliantly with high intensity lamps in the ceiling, nearly as brightly as the day outside.

"OK." The director pointed at the wooden pole set into the drum of concrete. "That's half a telephone pole, for the strength training demonstration. That pile of concrete blocks next to it is for the same idea, as is the pile of two inch boards on the other side." He indicated a series of prefabricated heavy-duty fence panels that had been set up in a sort of a maze covering a thirty metre square area. "Those are for running around on." With a glance at Shampoo, he added, "We have a bicycle available, if you want." She grinned while Mitch looked somewhat puzzled.

"On that side, we have a number of very large crates set up to emulate buildings," he continued, turning to the left and pointing again. "Anything from ten to thirty feet, which is as tall as we could get in here and still leave room under the ceiling. That gantry at the back is the viewing platform so we can see the tops of them. That other one to the right of it in the corner is for the camera crew." He waved to the five or six people who were standing on that particular gantry adjusting a pair of elaborate tripod-mounted HDCAM camera rigs, one of them waving back to him. "We're recording this high def tape, we'll do the stunt shoots on both tape and film."

"In the middle we've set up an arena for hand to hand combat." He turned to the right. "Finally, on that side there's a number of archery targets set up. Shampoo, I found a compound bow like Serena's one, only a lot more powerful, along with a large number of arrows. Will that do?" He smiled a little nervously. "I thought that monster Aiko gave you last time might be a little excessive in here, if you missed it would go right through the wall of the building."

The Amazon drew herself up. "Miss? What you think I am, amateur?" He laughed as she grinned.

"Not at all, obviously."

"Sounds good," she added, nodding.

"Aaron has provided a bo staff each and a bokken as well," he finished, looking at both young women. "Can you think of anything I've missed?" Akane shared a glance with her friend.

"I can't think of anything major," she admitted. "We can do more or less what we did at Richard's house but more of it. Is that what you want?"

"Pretty much, yes. Anything you can think of that won't wreck the place," he laughed. "Make it impressive."

"Could use real sword," Shampoo mused. Aiko handed her the same one she'd provided during the first demo without a word, making her smile and nod, then inspect it, while Mitch, Anton, and Jennifer looked puzzled.

"Where did that come from?" Mitch muttered. Anton shrugged but looked interested.

"Thanks, Aiko."

"Would you like me to do the same thing I did last time?" the brunette enquired. Akane looked at Shampoo, who nodded, then Adrian, who shrugged with a smile.

"I don't mind," he chuckled. "Although we may want to hire you as well." The magical girl laughed for a moment.

"Sorry, like I've said, too many other things to do. But I don't mind helping."

"That would be great, Aiko, thanks," Akane told her, feeling slightly relieved. She thought it was probably a good idea to have someone they trusted to run the demo and Aiko had done a superb job on the previous occasion. That meant both of them could simply concentrate on the job at hand and not worry about the actual sequencing.

"Thanks," Shampoo added. She gave the sword back. "Will ask for it when need it."

"All right, then, why don't we go over to the observation area and let the ladies get ready, Mitch," Adrian commented, turning to the studio executives. "Akane, Shampoo, if you go through that door over there in the left corner you'll find a place you can change, OK?" Both young women nodded, as did the COO, who was still looking around with a certain air of puzzlement, but followed the director as he headed to the rear of the building some seventy metres away, Jennifer beside him. Anton watched them before turning to Akane and Shampoo.

"I'm looking forward to this," he confided, smiling widely at both of them. "Unlike Mitch, I think Adrian is telling the truth. Don't disappoint me, OK?" Akane grinned back at him.

"We'll try not to, sir," she replied. Laughing to himself, he nodded to her with a grin then went after the others. Matt, Aaron, and Jim nodded to the three women then followed. They watched as most of the studio people ascended the stairs of the gantry to the platform at the top, standing in a line along the railing which gave them a view from about half way up the wall. Adrian went over to the camera crew first and talked to them for a few minutes before joining his colleagues. When they were in place, Aiko turned to the Tendo sister and the Amazon.

"So, what do you want to do first?" she asked. "Same as last time, or open with some sparring first?" The other two exchanged a glance, thinking.

Eventually, Akane replied, "Why don't we start with some sparring between Shampoo and me, then maybe end with the both of us against you?" She looked mildly worried, yet interested. "You mentioned doing that last time but we never got around to it."

Aiko smiled. "Sure, I'd like to try that. OK, then, we'll start with some sparring, do a little staff work and kendo, then you can show off some roof-hopping and fence running. Shampoo, can you shoot at the targets while on a bicycle?"

The Chinese girl looked surprised, then thoughtful, before grinning.

"I'm certainly willing to try," she giggled. "It'll look amazing if I can pull it off."

Nodding, Aiko grinned. "That it will. Which is the whole point." She looked over at the people watching. "If you want I can shoot at you a bit to give you an incentive to really get moving."

Akane felt worried, glancing at Shampoo, who was looking at the magical girl with raised eyebrows. "Um... I'm not sure..."

Prodding her on the shoulder, Aiko snickered. "Don't worry, I'm joking." Akane sighed in relief. "Probably..." There was a long pause, before she added, "I do think you need to show off some fairly serious stuff as far as Jennifer is concerned, it should make her realise that you can take it so she's not so worried about liabilities."

"OK. We'll just go and change, back in a minute." The youngest Tendo headed for the door Adrian had pointed out with Shampoo beside her, returning a couple of minutes later having changed into her gi and going to the area in the middle of the huge room that had been marked out on the concrete floor with black and yellow tape in a circle some fifteen metres in diameter. She moved to the middle of it and turned in place, looking around, before nodding. "This should do nicely," she muttered. Shampoo, standing beside her, nodded as well.

"Let's keep it inside the circle to start with, it's good training," the Amazon commented.

"Sounds like a plan. Right, you two, take your places, get ready, and give them a good show."
Aiko stepped back, grinning at them, as they smiled at her, then moved to face each other from two metres apart. "Forget about the cameras, just ignore them completely. Don't think about the people watching either, just concentrate on doing what you both do well, all right?" Both the young women nodded, wearing similar small smiles of anticipation. Akane could feel her worry subsiding as she found herself in a familiar position despite the unfamiliar environment, excitement building as it always did before sparring, especially with Shampoo. She could see in the other woman's eyes she felt the same.

"OK. Get ready. And... Begin!" The command came in a sharp voice, both the women blurring into action.

Watching the three young women talk quietly amongst themselves for a couple of minutes, apparently deciding how they were going to arrange the demonstration, Adrian smiled to himself. He had a good feeling about this. Glancing at his colleagues, he met Jim's eyes, the other man appearing amused, then looked past him to Aaron and Matt. Both of them were watching Akane and Shampoo intently, obviously not wanting to miss anything. He felt they were probably even more interested now than they had been at the initial demo, since they knew more or less what to expect and were able to appreciate it better.

He was glad that Aiko had ended up staying to help, he thought it was likely that the magical girl would not only referee the event very competently but most likely bring out the best in both the others, who clearly held the brunette in high esteem and some awe. Which, to be honest, was entirely understandable in his opinion.

Looking to the other side he studied Mitch for a moment, then Jennifer and Anton. All three of them were watching the women below them with interest but in different ways. Mitch was standing with his hands on the railing of the gantry, studying all three girls with a neutral expression that he knew showed hidden interest, not letting anyone else know his true feelings, or so the COO would like to believe. In fact, for those that knew him well, it was obvious that he was extremely curious to find out what would happen.

Anton, on the other hand, wasn't hiding his interest at all, leaning casually on the railing and looking like a small boy expecting something fun to emerge from a present he'd been given on his birthday. Adrian smiled to himself. The executive producer's liking for martial arts movies was well known, which played neatly into his own plans. It hadn't taken much to get the other man very enthusiastic about the whole idea, especially with Matt, Aaron, and Jim all backing up his tales of what these young woman had pulled off at their first meeting.

Glancing at Jennifer, he suppressed a very small sigh. 'She might be a problem,' he thought, a little worried. Even though Hollywood was shamefully under-represented by women, sometimes the ones that were there, who were almost invariably extremely talented in his experience, seemed to somehow resent other females entering their domain. He had no idea why but he'd definitely seen it on a number of occasions. It certainly wasn't all of them, or even a majority, but it happened often enough that he was slightly concerned.

The fact that both Akane and Shampoo were young, very attractive, insanely talented, and smart might almost work against them in that scenario. He hoped not but wouldn't be entirely surprised if it happened.

Adrian wasn't sure if Jennifer would react like that but he had noticed that she was acting more aloof than normal, which was slightly worrying, standing with her arms folded and just looking at them. She was a somewhat unemotional person at the best of times, but right now she was watching with an expression somewhere between mild indifference and slight distaste for whatever reason. Add to that her tendency to be very inflexible where the HR rulebook was concerned and it might become necessary to appeal to a higher authority, in other words Mitch. The executive could certainly over-rule her if she dug her heels in, which the director was fervently hoping wouldn't be the case, but the question really was whether, under those circumstances, he would.

Shaking his head very slightly and not allowing his thoughts to cross his face he turned his attention back to the women in the middle of the room. His ruminations had only occupied him for a handful of seconds but during that time Akane and Shampoo had apparently reached a consensus on their next action, Aiko stepping back with an anticipatory grin on her face to a point near the edge of the marked circle, then commanding "Begin!" in a hard voice that would have had any military recruit snapping to attention on the spot.

The instant that she spoke, both the Japanese woman and the Chinese Amazon moved towards each other so fast the observers on the gantry could barely follow the movement. Adrian watched with satisfaction, grinning to himself when he heard Mitch utter an obscenity under his breath in shock. He could virtually feel Anton's glee as they watched. Even Jennifer, when he looked sideways for a moment, was gaping in amazement, her expression one of stunned awe. Quickly looking over to his left he saw that the camera crew seemed to be on the ball, focussing on the action, although they all looked amazed as well. Luckily they were very professional and their instincts overrode their surprise. Adrian returned his attention to the women below, pleased.

Jumping a good six feet straight up after an initial exchange of dozens of blows, Akane did a perfect split as Shampoo dived through where she'd been, before twisting in the air and aiming a kick at the lilac-haired woman's back, which the other fighter avoided with an adroit twist. Catching one heel Shampoo flipped her friend through two complete somersaults to land almost on her face, putting her hands out just in time and propelling herself back again onto her feet. Anton audibly giggled with joy at the move.

Looking amused yet determined, Shampoo moved in for the kill, striking out in a flurry of punches, almost all of which Akane managed to avoid, although half a dozen landed, the impacts rocking her as the Amazon's fists walked up her ribcage in less than a second. Recovering and deflecting a second round of punches while everyone on the gantry winced at the sound of the rapid yet obviously extremely powerful punches, the youngest Tendo leaned away and spun into a combination of a low sweep that caught the other woman's ankles, staggering her before she could react, then as her other foot came around when the first one landed on the ground as a pivot, she dipped her torso nearly to the floor and brought her foot up to intersect Shampoo's head with a loud thud.

Adrian winced again, that had sounded impressively lethal. Beside him, Matt made a small noise and when he looked, had wide eyes and a somewhat shocked expression. The director looked back in time to see the Chinese woman flip backwards onto her hands, then tuck into a roll, apparently uninjured, although she stayed out of reach for a moment while she recovered.

"Holy shit," Mitch muttered from his other side, his voice faint. Again, Adrian kept his grin hidden.

The two women circled each other warily ten feet apart while Aiko kept a close watch, then re-engaged in another round of strikes almost to fast to see. This time, Shampoo gained the upper hand, somehow managing to bend around another kick and redirect it in such a way that Akane spun like a top before falling over, looking dizzy. Aiko laughed out loud and Shampoo grinned.

"Hey, that's Dad's move," Akane growled when she could stand again, her friend graciously allowing her the time to recover. Shampoo snickered.

"Soun gave permission to use. You just slower learning it."

Akane looked at the other woman with narrowed eyes, then stepped forward again into another stance. "Fair enough. Try this on for size." Studying her briefly, Shampoo laughed.

"Great-grandmother teach you well. But I know too." They moved together, yet another series of lightning-fast moves resulting in both of them rolling apart, then charging back into the fight. Adrian could see that they were obviously thoroughly enjoying themselves, their audience no longer relevant. Aiko looked up at him and grinned, making him nod back with a smile, before going back to watching the match.

The spar went on for about ten more minutes, cycling through at least four distinct styles that Adrian could see, although he suspected that there were subtleties of the art that he was missing. Matt and Aaron both seemed absolutely fascinated by the sight. Eventually, Aiko stepped forward and snapped "Cease!", both women freezing into immobility instantly, before relaxing and bowing to each other, then turning to face the magical girl.

"All right. Very good, both of you. You're definitely better than you were, Akane, by a significant amount. I'm impressed and pleased. You've improved as well, Shampoo, some of those moves are really good." Aiko grinned in a way that made even the observers up on the gantry suddenly shiver. "Let's see how you both do against me now, OK?"

Akane looked at her, then at Shampoo, meeting the other woman's slightly worried expression with one of her own, before swallowing and nodding. 'Oh, shit, is this actually a good idea?' she wondered to herself, suddenly unsure she was up to really properly sparring with the magical girl. The time in the Dojo that had started all this off was still a vivid memory, as was the obvious fact that Aiko hadn't been trying all that hard at the time. She felt that this time might be a little different. Glancing at Shampoo she could see her friend was thinking along the same lines. Laughing a little, Aiko added, "Don't look so worried, this is just for fun." Her expression became less lethal-looking although neither of the other two were entirely reassured. Thinking for a moment, the brunette went on, "To make it more impressive, let's say that we don't have to stay in the circle, either."
"Um, all right," Akane replied, slightly puzzled. What was the woman up to? She was sure the brunette had something spectacular planned.

"Reset." They moved apart into their starting positions. Aiko moved to stand near one side of the marked area, equidistant from both the others. She looked over her shoulder at Adrian, smirked a little, which he responded to with a similar expression apparently having a fairly good idea that she was going to do something weird, then looked back at her opponents. Both of whom exchanged glances, then set themselves into an opening stance, ready for action, key to instant reaction. She paused, then again gave the command.

"Begin!"

Both women charged the brunette almost before she closed her mouth, moving even faster than they had been before, covering the twenty feet separating them in no more than a second or two. Jennifer made a small sound of disbelief, Anton choked out a gasp, while Mitch was completely silent. Just as they reached her, Aiko grinned and vanished in a flash of rainbow light, making everyone blink wildly. Jennifer yelped loudly, staring in shock. "What the *fuck...?" Mitch whispered, staring.

"Hey! No fair teleporting!" Akane sounded outraged, rubbing her eyes. The magical girl reappeared behind her from thin air, poking her in the back once, then stepping back as she collapsed with a yell of irritation. Giggling, Aiko ducked the viciously quick kick Shampoo threw at her without any effort, making it look almost casual, then moved to face the Amazon, who struck out again and again with incredibly rapid punches, apparently using that speed technique that Akane had demonstrated the first time. Each time the brunette moved just enough that she wasn't where the punch would have landed. Eventually she jumped clear over Shampoo, flipping in the process, so she went through a position where they were almost head to head, grabbing the other woman as she reached a completely inverted attitude with a grip of steel and somehow transferring momentum to her so it was suddenly Shampoo who was flying through the air. One of the cameras panned to follow the Amazon while the other remained on the two women in the middle of the room.

Landing lightly in a crouch, Aiko ducked a flying kick from Akane, who had recovered from whatever it was that she'd done to the Tendo sister, without even looking, dropping flat to the floor then pushing herself off into a rearwards flip that again ended up with her behind her opponent. Akane seemed to be ready for this, already turning to face her. The blue-haired woman was smiling and frowning at the same time, looking both excited and wary, while Aiko was obviously thoroughly enjoying herself.

They exchanged a series of punches and kicks, none of Akane's landing, while several of Aiko's got through the other woman's defences, although Adrian was certain she was pulling the force of her blows to avoid damage. Shampoo came roaring back into the fight a few seconds later from where she'd landed half-way across the room, an expression of determination on her face, which quickly turned into one of horrified wonder as the brunette apparently had no more difficulty fighting both of them at the same time as she had one on one. The camera crew were keeping their equipment on the action, panning wildly to follow the women.

"Holy shit, that girl is unbelievable," Matt mumbled, watching with wide eyes. "I thought Akane and Shampoo were incredible, but this is..."

"I told you the first time," Adrian chuckled, satisfied with the reaction. "And Yori and Chou are so much better even than her that they make her look slow. I'm pretty sure from what I saw that Yori could take on Aiko and her whole team at the same time without much effort. Even without all the magical things."

"If any of those women wanted to actually kill you, you wouldn't stand a chance, would you?" the stunt director mused in a low voice, sounding horrified as if he'd only just worked out quite how dangerous they were, even 'mere' martial artists like Shampoo and Akane, never mind a full blown magical girl like Aiko. Both Aaron and Adrian shook their heads.

"I don't think I've ever met anyone as potentially dangerous as even Akane," Aaron replied, similarly quietly. "She strikes me as a genuinely nice girl, not at all someone who is particularly aggressive, past problems aside, but if she came after you, I don't think you could do anything other than run like hell and hope you were faster." They watched the spar for a few seconds more, both Aiko's opponents showing excellent teamwork, not that it was actually helping very much. She was just too good. "What Aiko or any of the others could do is beyond belief. I mean, look at that!"

He waved a hand shakily as Aiko vanished with a bright flash again, both the others whirling to stand back to back, looking around cautiously. "She'd make one hell of an assassin, I don't think you could keep her out of anywhere."

"Where did she go?" Matt queried. They looked around, as did the two women in the marked off area, with no luck. One of the cameras was being panned around as well on the next gantry. A couple of seconds passed, then Akane suddenly looked up, yelled, and dived out to the side, just as Aiko dropped out of the air onto her and Shampoo having teleported back near the ceiling. Adrian jumped at the yell, his heart racing, then watched as the Amazon also rolled away from the inbound magical girl, who landed lightly, striking out as she did and barely missing Shampoo. Akane leaped back into the fray, more incredibly fast blows coming thick and fast. Once again Aiko parried them all.

Finally, just as Shampoo joined her friend, Aiko disengaged and jumped out of range, calling "Cease!" at the same time. Again, both the others stopped dead. They were panting a little but otherwise looked more or less ready to keep going. Smiling, Aiko tossed both of them a bottle of water each, removing the cap of one for herself. All of them drank deeply for a few seconds.

Shaking his head in awe, Adrian simply watched, his hands on the railing. After a few seconds he became aware he hadn't heard a peep out of the three people who had never encountered what these women were capable of before, turning to look curiously at them. He grinned at the expressions.

Mitch was no longer watching with his neutral face on, rather he was gaping open-mouthed, while Jennifer was simply staring with her eyes wide, her arms now dangling limply at her sides. Beside her, Anton was gripping the railing of the viewing gantry with the biggest grin Adrian had ever seen him wear, not taking his eyes from the three women who were now discussing something. Glancing at his friends, Adrian grinned as well when they also spotted what the other executives were doing, all three men chuckling. He noted in passing that the camera crew were talking quietly amongst themselves, apparently in shock as well.

"Hey, Mitch? Are you impressed yet?" the director asked, a laugh in his voice. There was no response. "Mitch?"

Very slowly, the COO turned his head, looked at Adrian, then went back to watching the three women. His mouth worked for a moment but nothing came out. "I think he might be broken," Jim whispered loudly, provoking a sudden wild laugh from Anton, which made them smile.

"Oh, my god, we're going to make so much money," the producer said in a faint voice, his grin widening to the point he was in danger of losing the top of his head.

"It gets better," Adrian chuckled. Aiko looked over, amusement on her face, an eyebrow raised. He nodded happily, making her smile, then say something quietly to Akane, who grinned and headed towards the pole in the barrel of concrete, flexing her hands, with Shampoo beside her. Stopping in front of the pole, she inspected it, then lashed out with a fist, making the entire barrel jolt sideways as a large chunk of wood splintered off and flew across the floor. A hit with her other hand made it move again, smaller pieces raining down. They watched as she converted it to kindling over the space of the next thirty seconds with a series of kicks and a few more punches, smiling to herself, then split what was left in half down the middle with a final knife-hand blow. Nodding in satisfaction she turned to Shampoo and had a short conversation.

Jennifer and Mitch both made almost identical squeaks of shock when she turned back to the barrel, squatted down, wrapped her arms around it, then stood up again, walking off with it to put it twenty feet away. Adrian grinned, even though he was also staring in amazement. He knew she was preposterously strong but even so this was impressive. When she looked over at him and winked he laughed, sure she'd done it just to make a point, rather than because it was in the way. Matt whistled softly from beside him, making him glance at his colleague. "Holy crap, that girl is strong!" he said in a low voice.

"Yep," Aaron grunted, watching closely. "You could say that."

Moving to the pile of concrete blocks, which consisted of three pallets like the one Richard and Jim had originally provided, the two girls snapped the steel strapping easily, then began building a series of stacks eight blocks tall, putting a layer of the thick wooden boards across one pair to form a flat surface about three feet square. Shampoo stepped back while Akane moved to the first stack, paused, then punched straight down, the top three blocks exploding into powder. As the dust from the first strike settled she lashed out with a kick which destroyed the next two blocks.

"Those are real blocks, by the way," Adrian commented off-handedly, looking at Mitch, who was staring in total shock, not apparently having moved for the last five minutes.

"Oh. Good." The response was delayed and very weak.

Moving to the next stack the Tendo woman jumped straight up, bringing her right leg down in a high axe kick from the level of her shoulders directly into the middle of it, which made all but the lowest block crumble to small chunks with a loud crunch. Not stopping, she whirled into a low spin, her other leg lashing out and destroying the middle of the third tower and spraying small bits of concrete thirty feet across the floor in a wide arc. Jennifer made a tiny sound of disbelief. Adrian kept his glee mostly to himself but inwardly was both extremely pleased and very impressed. He got the impression that they'd been thinking hard about how to make this demo as impressive as possible, probably with the input of Aiko as well. It was certainly working, he mused to himself, stealing another quick look at the three people to his right.

If Anton got any happier he was liable to have an accident, Jennifer looked like she thought she might be dreaming, and Mitch was just standing motionless watching in stunned amazement.

Back on the floor, Akane nodded to Shampoo, who nodded back, stepped up to the fourth pile of blocks in an aggressive stance, pulled her hand sharply back, then... gently reached out and poked the top block with one finger. There was a very small pause during which she moved back a couple of feet before the block abruptly exploded with a loud bang, fragments spraying everywhere and the concussion cracking the next three blocks, which slid to the floor in pieces. She grinned, before demolishing the remainder with one punch, brushing the dust from her hand with satisfaction.
"Fuck." The word came from Anton, who looked astounded. "How did she do that!"

"Ancient Chinese Amazon technique," Aiko's voice said from behind them, making everyone jump violently. None of them had noticed that she was no longer on the floor, engrossed as they were in watching the other two. She snickered, moving up to stand next to Jim and watching as Akane attacked the wooden planks, punching half a dozen holes completely through them with a series of blows. "Very painful to learn, I'm told."

They all looked at her, then back at the others. Shampoo was finishing off the destruction of the boards and last stack with a pair of clubs she'd pulled from nowhere, whirling them around with graceful skill, finally stopping when nothing was left except for splinters and gravel. "Ah. The next exercise will need the sword, I think," Aiko added, slipping under the railing and dropping the twenty feet to the floor, landing lightly and walking over to her friends. They watched her go with a mix of expressions.

"Who the hell is she?" Mitch asked in a faint voice. "Is she looking for a job as well?"

Laughing, Adrian shook his head. "No, she's a mutual friend of the girls there and me. She's got a full time career, she's just helping out and providing training and transportation."

"What sort of career?" Anton asked curiously.

"Magical girl, saving the world, protecting the community, that sort of thing," Adrian replied casually, grinning to himself. The producer stared at him, then back at the brunette, who was talking to Shampoo having just handed her the sword she'd produced earlier. The clubs the Amazon had been wielding so skilfully had vanished again. Glancing at his colleague, Adrian added, "It's a thing in Japan. There's lots of them."

"Ah, OK." The other man didn't seem to have anything to add to that, although it looked like he was desperately trying to think of something.

Having apparently come to an agreement, Aiko and Akane each picked up one of the heavy wooden boards, holding them by the ends like batons, ones that were twelve feet long and very heavy, then stood on opposite sides of the Amazon. Shampoo immediately began what could best be described as a lethal dance with the sword, spinning and twirling it, each blurringly quick strike steadily shortening the boards like some weird form of wood chipper. In under a minute she reduced them to splinters, finishing up with a showy flourish and sheathing the weapon. Handing it back to Aiko, she grinned.

Having dropped what was left of her board, Akane ran over to a table on which a pair of bo staffs were lying next to two bokken and the heavy compound bow Adrian had sourced, retrieving the staffs and returning. She tossed her friend one, the other woman catching it, then both of them moved back to the marked area in the middle of the floor, facing each other while Aiko stood to one side. Giving the start command, the third woman watched with satisfaction as the two combatants immediately began sparring, the sound of staff on staff filling the room with a fusillade of clicks and bangs at machine-gun rates.

Watching Akane jump over a sweep from Shampoo, then the Amazon promptly do the same thing back, Adrian felt very happy. He noticed that Anton was now leaning on the rail gently laughing to himself, having apparently moved past shock into simply enjoying the sight. Mitch still looked like someone had unexpectedly pushed an ice-cube somewhere intimate although he was beginning to appear closer to normal, albeit stunned. Jennifer was watching open-mouthed, her cool attitude totally broken, twitching a little at particularly loud cracks from the staff work. Akane picking up half a ton of concrete like she was moving a chair seemed to have been the specific thing that broke "Cease!" The command once again caused an immediate cessation in activity. Taking the staff back from Shampoo, the youngest Tendo sister returned it to the table and picked up the bokken, handing one to her friend, then they took their places again. Aiko nodded, satisfied, before issuing the instruction to begin, having had a brief word with both young women, who were grinning.

They immediately slashed at each other, Akane ducking and Shampoo jumping over the respective blows, before the Amazon let out a hideously loud yodelling war-cry which made everyone twitch in shock, then charged the other woman, who turned and bolted towards the stack of huge wooden and metal crates along one side of the studio room.

"Jesus," Mitch squawked in shock, stepping back from the sudden yell. Matt chuckled, making the COO look at him for a moment, then go back to watching the action below them. Pursued by the lilac-haired woman, Akane reached the first crate, one about fifteen feet tall, and without breaking step jumped high enough to land neatly on it, running across the top and jumping another ten feet to the next one. Behind her, Shampoo cleared the height of the first crate. Everyone gaped, even Adrian, the height they'd both managed to reach in one jump was insane. The camera crew were frantically trying to keep both of the women in shot at the same time while not bumping into each other in the process.

Both women dashed back and forth across the simulated rooftops engaged in a running battle with the bokken, Shampoo taking the attacking position for a couple of minutes, then running for it when Akane turned around and lurched for her, rolling sideways at the last moment, before jumping to her feet and heading for the next crate along with the Tendo woman in hot pursuit. Several people made different sounds of shock when Shampoo leaped backwards off the top of the pile, apparently to a nasty injury or death, but twisted in mid-air like a cat, rolled when she landed, then more or less bounced right back up the side to end up behind her attacker in what was obviously a deliberate move.

"Oh, my god." The whispered comment came from Jennifer who, when Adrian looked at her, was pale.

Back at the 'roof-top' fight, Akane was on the run again, Shampoo having turned the tables once more, and finding herself at the end of the stack, looked wildly around, then jumped across a ten foot gap to land on a ladder for the lighting rig that ran around the studio and back and forth across the ceiling, half a dozen narrow walk-ways giving access to the truss-work that carried the lights themselves. She shot up it like a squirrel, ran lightly across a truss, then jumped onto one of the walkways. Shampoo stood and watched for a moment before grinning and following. Adrian heard one of the camera operators swear to himself as he tried to get the heavy machine to tilt up enough to follow the action.

"Um, are they supposed to be up there?" Jim asked curiously.

"It wasn't in the plan," Adrian admitted, looking up with amusement and glee, "but it's damn impressive. Look at them go!" He shook his head in wonder as the two young women charged around in the overhead fixtures, jumping from truss to walkway and back, the clacking of the bokken on each other a counterpoint to the metallic sounds of the trusses moving around.

Down below, in the middle of the floor, Aiko was watching with a smile as the other two enjoyed themselves. Eventually, though, she whistled sharply, which made Adrian jump, but had little effect on either Akane or Shampoo who seemed to be enjoying themselves to the point they'd lost track of what they were supposed to be doing. The director looked down at her as she turned to grin at him, then shrugged slightly. "Hey! Guys! Next part, OK?" Her call didn't have much more effect.
When she raised a hand and let fly half a dozen tiny balls of blue light which shot through the air with a whine and popped on the ceiling producing a sound like gunshots, though, everyone stopped dead and stared in shock, even Akane and Shampoo. Mitch made a squeak of what almost sounded like terror, staring fixedly at the magical girl, who was looking up with her hands on her hips at the two women in the rafters, almost directly above her. She gestured.

"Come on down, I think you've made your point for that exercise," she called. Akane looked at Shampoo, who nodded, then both of them dropped out of the ceiling to the floor, rolling when they landed and jumping to their feet. Anton watched with a huge grin, then looked up at the walkway they'd both been on.

"Holy shit, that's about thirty-five feet!"

"Something like that," Matt replied, sounding somewhat stunned himself.

"Impressive."

They all nodded like a row of little dolls that you'd find on the back shelf of a car. Even Adrian was impressed. He was beginning to wonder when they'd actually find the limits of what these young women could do physically. They'd obviously been practising a lot since he'd last seen them in action.

"That was pretty damn good, guys," Aiko said, looking approving. She glanced over at their audience. "We should probably bring it to a conclusion fairly soon or poor Mitch over there is going to go catatonic."

"Jennifer doesn't look much better," Akane giggled, trying not to grin. The brunette nodded with a smile.

"Anton looks like he's just had every Christmas present of a lifetime all at once, though," she replied. "I can guarantee he's on your side, for sure. OK, Why don't you run around on those fences for a few minutes, then you can do a little archery, Shampoo, which should be a decent conclusion to the whole exercise. That'll have been about an hour and a half all in which is more than enough I'd think." She inspected both the other woman. "How are you holding up?"

"Fine, thanks, Aiko," Shampoo laughed. "It's not as tiring as a proper training exercise even though it's gone on for a while. Mostly it's just damn good fun."

"I'm going to want lunch soon, I think, but I agree, it's not too difficult. Elder Cologne drives us much harder. So do Dad and Uncle Genma," Akane added, grinning. She wiped her brow with her sleeve. "Mind you, I could do with some more water." Aiko handed them each a bottle, smiling.

"I haven't met her yet," Akane noted with interest. "I've heard a lot about her, though. She sounds fascinating but a bit scary."
Nodding, Aiko smiled at the youngest Tendo. "She's extremely smart, very sensible, and a very decent person. She's like a sister to me even though we've only known each other for a couple of years or so. You'd like her, I think. But yes, she can be damn scary. Not quite to the level Yori can reach without much effort but a lot creepier." She giggled a bit. "It's really funny when she just stares at a criminal or someone like that and they surrender on the spot. She's the only one other than Yori I know who can pull that trick off so well."

Both Akane and Shampoo laughed, finishing their water and handing the bottles back to Aiko who made them vanish. "I'd like to meet her one day," Shampoo remarked.

"I'm sure you will sooner or later," Aiko replied with a small grin. "OK, break's over, get back to work."

"Ma'am, yes, Ma'am!" Akane snapped, saluting, then laughing.

Aiko shook her head. "You're nearly as bad as Tamiko when you're in a good mood," she giggled.
Grinning, Akane turned to the Amazon, who was snickering to herself.

"Come on, I'll race you around that fence maze," she said, pointing at the set-up a few metres away. With a whoop she dashed for them, the Chinese woman right behind her, both of them jumping on top of the narrow panels and running across them. Aiko stood and watched with amusement.

Adrian wondered what they were talking about, the voices not only too low to hear, but in Japanese as well. Thinking that he should probably see about learning the language as it looked likely that he'd be working with Japanese people quite a lot in future, he waited for them to resume the demonstration, pleased at the way both women seemed to have relaxed to the point they were no longer at all self-conscious about the people watching. He caught Matt's eye, who nodded slowly, apparently thinking much the same thing.

Handing their empty water bottles back to Aiko, Akane and Shampoo ran towards the fence panels he'd arranged to have set up, easily jumping some six feet onto them, then ran along the top of the narrow fence with as much confidence as if it was a normal sidewalk. Shaking his head a little and smiling at the sight he watched as they circumnavigated the entire maze, occasionally jumping from one to another to mix it up a little. After a few minutes of this, Shampoo dropped off the fence, Akane following her, then they quickly built a ramp of blocks and the single board left intact.

Jumping onto the bicycle that had been leaning against the table with the weapons on, the Amazon pedalled rapidly, accelerating at speeds more commonly seen with motorcycles, hitting the ramp and jumping ten feet into the air, then landing on the top of the fence. She cycled along it as if she was on level ground, hopping from panel to panel with aplomb, smiling to herself, while Akane watched, grinning. Adrian shook his head in wonder at the sight.

Finally growing bored of this pursuit the Chinese woman shot off the end of the final fence panel, skidding in a wide turn and heading back to the table, where she dismounted. Picking up the bow she inspected it closely, nodded approvingly having tested the pull, then sorted through the three dozen arrows on the table next to it, rejecting about a third of them. Putting the remainder into the quiver also supplied she adjusted it at her waist before walking to the opposite side of the studio from the targets, about a hundred and eighty feet separating her from them.

"Can she actually hit them at that distance?" Anton asked with some amazement. Adrian and Jim exchanged a glance, laughing hard for a moment, before the director nodded happily.
"Just watch," he advised. 'God, if you'd only seen her shooting that thing of Aiko's at Richard's house,' he thought to himself, grinning like an idiot. 'I've never seen anything remotely like it.' One of the cameras focussed on Shampoo while the other one was filming the targets. The lilac-haired young woman nocked her first arrow, aimed, and released, all in one smooth action, the arrow humming across the huge room to land an inch off the centre of the target she'd shot at. Looking mildly irritated with herself she repeated the action, nodding contentedly before the arrow even hit, this time in the exact centre.

Anton muttered, "Good grief," shaking his head in awe.

The Amazon shifted her stance a little, then fired six arrows in succession so rapidly that all of them were in the air before the first one landed. Each hit the middle of one of the half-dozen targets. Looking pleased, she walked back towards the front of the building, then turned and ran back, firing on the move, again each arrow hitting mere fractions of an inch away from the first set. Anton whistled in awe, Matt laughed, and Aaron swore mildly. "Incredible," the arms-master commented in a low voice.

Jumping onto the crates again, Shampoo ran across the tops of them, intermittently firing an arrow, once or twice in mid leap. All of them hit the targets, although one or two were some way off the bull. Finally, having only five left, she dropped to the floor, jogged back to the table, then got back on the bike, cycling in a large circle without using her hands. Each time she was oriented correctly she fired another arrow, holding the bow horizontally so it wouldn't foul the handlebars. The first one missed the target she was aiming at completely, but the other four each found their mark. When she'd shot the last one she dismounted, putting the bow back on the table and leaning the bike against it, then talking to Aiko and Akane for a moment, gesturing to the one she'd missed with an annoyed expression. Aiko grinned at her and said something that made her laugh.

"That was... unbelievable," Matt commented quietly.

"And incredibly impressive," Adrian agreed. They all watched as the two young women shook hands with Aiko, then walked to the middle of the marked area, facing their audience, before bowing.

"That concludes our demonstration," Akane called, smiling. "We hope it was what you were looking for."

After a long pause, Mitch stepped forwards, licking dry lips. "Thank you very much, ladies. I think I speak for all of us when I say that I've never seen anything even close to what you just showed us. It's given myself and my colleagues a lot to think about." Adrian watched his face, which was rather pale, inwardly feeling very satisfied. He glanced at Jennifer, who seemed to be trying to regain her customary cool, without as much success as she probably wanted, and Anton, who was almost rubbing his hands together in glee.

"Thanks, all of you," he said to the three women on the floor below, Aiko having joined the other two. "Let's break for lunch. Jim will show you where the showers are, you two can change back into your normal clothes, then we can have something to eat and discuss the next step."

"OK, Adrian. Thanks." Akane grinned at him, appearing very pleased with the way the last hour and a half had gone. He couldn't blame her, they'd outdone themselves with a truly incredible show. He looked over to the camera crew, the man in charge of it giving him a thumbs-up as his people shut everything down, all of them looking amazed and impressed.

Jim headed down the stairs, going over to the young women and talking to them for a moment, then leading them out the main door. When they'd all disappeared and the door had swung shut again, he turned around and leaned against the railing, his hands on it on either side of his waist, then studied the three people who had just received their first glimpse of martial arts Neriman/Amazonian style.

"So, Mitch..." he began, smiling deviously. "Do you feel that I won the bet?"

The COO pulled his eyes from the door with a visible effort, staring at him for several seconds before he seemed to come back from somewhere else, then very slowly nodded, reaching into his inside jacket pocket and pulling out his wallet. Opening it he counted for a moment, then handed over a thick bundle of bills, which Adrian took and put into his own pocket without looking at them, grinning like a shark.

"I think you did, Adrian. I'm sorry I doubted you." Mitch shook his head. "That... That was so far beyond my wildest dreams I have no words to describe it."

"It hit me like that the first time as well," Adrian consoled him. "Yori and her friends are unbelievably more advanced than Akane and Shampoo are but even those two are vastly past anything else any of us have ever encountered." He glanced at Matt and Aaron, both of whom nodded soberly.

"They're off the scale good," Aaron added, shrugging a little. "I have no idea how on earth anyone could become so skilled at such a young age, or at all, for that matter, but there it is. Yes, Aiko is much better, but from what Adrian and Richard have said none of those other girls are likely to be looking for jobs. Akane and Shampoo are. We'd be criminally negligent if we let another studio snap them up. And you know as well as I do that if any other studio ever got wind of this they'd offer them almost anything to go with them instead."

Mitch looked suddenly worried. "Shit. You're right about that. Universal or any of the others would sell their souls for that sort of talent." He turned to Adrian. "Do you think they'd accept if that happened?"

Considering the question for a moment the director finally shook his head. "Not if we proceed reasonably quickly and are scrupulously honest with them, I think. They promised me after the first demo at Richard's house that they wouldn't go anywhere else if we went ahead within six months. I think that both of them have a very strong sense of personal honour, so they're going to stick to their word. It would be a very bad idea, though, to not do the same." He looked around at the others. "If we play fair with them, they'll play fair with us, I have no doubt. If, on the other hand, anyone on the board tries any tricks I doubt it will work out well."

"It would be a phenomenally bad idea to try ripping them off or tricking them," Aaron muttered. "They're bad enough, I sure as hell wouldn't want an angry Akane coming after me with blood in her eye, but they also know some extremely frightening people." He looked at Mitch with a totally serious expression. "Trust me, we don't want their friends deciding that they want revenge because we did something stupid."

Nodding to himself, Mitch thought for a while. "True, true. You're probably right. I can think of a couple of people on the board that may need that point to be pushed pretty hard. Hmm." He glanced at Jennifer, who seemed to have pulled herself together. "What do you think? You've been very quiet for the last hour or so."

She looked back at him. "So were you." He shrugged, smiling a little.

"True enough. All things considered, it's not a surprise, though."
Looking over the room, she nodded. "No, it isn't." She paused for a few seconds. "I'll admit quite happily that what we just saw was unbelievably impressive, if not actually totally terrifying." The woman paused again, thinking, as the rest of them waited quietly. "That aside, there remains the issue of whether their undeniable talent would translate into something we could capitalise on."

"I don't think there's any doubt about that at least as far as stunt-work goes," Matt interjected, making her study him for a moment, then reluctantly nod.

"You'd know more about that than I would, I suppose. All right, I can accept that."

"But you have reservations," Adrian commented, watching her face. She nodded slowly.

"I do." Pulling a folder from her briefcase, which she'd brought with her from the meeting and put on the floor, she flipped it open and paged through the documents inside for a moment, stopping on one sheet. "From your initial interview with both girls, I noted that Ms Tendo has been undergoing therapy for anger management issues for nearly two years at this point. I find that... concerning. Especially in light of the abilities we've just had demonstrated to us." She looked up, slightly pale. "I mean, if for whatever reason she became annoyed, the damage she could cause is... truly horrific. We could be opening ourselves up to a very considerable liability by taking her on. I have no doubt that we could be held responsible for any untoward issue that came up as her employers in a lawsuit."

Mitch looked thoughtful, rubbing his chin reflectively. He turned to Adrian. "She has a point, I'm afraid. That young woman could tear through LA like a tornado, which wouldn't reflect well on the studio at all."

Sighing a little, Adrian nodded a couple of times. He looked over his shoulder at the destruction wrought by the two women, before turning back to his colleague. "It's possible, that's true, but I have to admit, I don't think very likely. Not by this point. A year ago from what I've found out, I'd have agreed with you, but now...?" He shrugged a little. "She's been very open and honest with us about her previous problems and the treatment she's received for them. From what I know there was an obscure yet real medical issue that was finally sorted out by Yori some time ago, after which her therapy became very effective. The young woman herself seems more relieved about that even than the rest of her family. She doesn't want to be driven by anger. Inherently, she's a very nice, normally very calm, and genuinely likeable girl who's had some unfortunate problems growing up."

Turning around he waved at the half-demolished studio. "Yes, she could cause enormous damage if she wanted to. Any of her friends with similar skills could as well, and Aiko and her friends could probably wipe out entire cities, as horrifying as that is to consider. But I don't think they would." Turning back to the others, he gestured at Matt and Aaron who were silently listening. "Matt has a military background, a hell of a lot of training in more weapons and techniques than I can count, and the contacts to get enough hardware to assault a small town successfully. No one is scared of what he might do." Matt looked mildly insulted and also amused, making the director grin for a moment. "Aaron is sitting on enough real weaponry in the armoury to fight a small war and also knows how to use it. He could kill you in about a dozen ways from where he's standing without even trying. Don't forget both of them know a lot about martial arts themselves."

The COO looked at Aaron, who smirked at him, then casually stepped just a little further out of reach, apparently unconsciously, which made the smirk widen for a moment. "But no one is worried that either of them are going to go off and cause chaos. Or at least, not cause chaos we're not paying them to cause." Adrian grinned as Anton laughed. "Any of the stunt people we employ could be very dangerous in the right circumstances. Most of them are at least familiar with one or more martial arts, most of them know a lot about firearms, all of them can fight well. You pretty much have to be able to know how to fight for real to be able to fake it convincingly, you know. But I can't think of the last time one of our guys was involved in anything that could cause the studio any problems."

He fell silent, while Mitch thought, glancing at Jennifer who seemed content to let him ruminate. After a little while the other man nodded slowly. "Yes, yes, all that is true, I agree. I've never quite though about it in those terms before but you have a point. Yet, none of our people are capable of... that." He pointed at the piles of crushed concrete blocks. "And to the best of my knowledge none of our people are currently being treated for anger issues bad enough to warrant therapy."

"Not entirely true," Matt said, causing everyone to look at him, "there have been one or two of my people in the past that have needed some sort of intervention, and there's one guy at the moment who's going through something like that."

"Indeed?" Mitch inspected him.

"Yep. It's not relevant to the studio, it's the result of a bad breakup with a girlfriend, but it happens." The stunt director shook his head for a moment. "It's not as uncommon as you might think, especially among people with a military background. Quite a few of my guys came from the forces one way or another."

"Interesting," the COO murmured.

"When we went to Tokyo to talk to them a while back I spent some time discussing the issue with her father, when Akane was off showing Matt the family Dojo," Adrian continued after another pause. "He told me that he was extremely proud of how well his daughter had overcome her issues in the last few months. I raised the question of whether he thought it possible that she'd get into the sort of state that could cause problems. He thought about it for a while, then said he didn't think it was likely any more. Apparently she had something of a breakthrough some time back concerning the main trigger of her anger, which lead him to believe that she had finally overcome most of the problem. He was honest enough to say that he wouldn't have been so sure six months before that. I believe him."

Matt glanced at him. "Hmm. That's funny, I talked to Nodoka when Akane and Shampoo were talking to you and Soun, she told me pretty much the same thing. They all seem very proud of how Akane has matured a lot in the last year or so. She was sure that, barring some very unusual circumstances, the young woman would be very sensible." He looked mildly confused for a moment. "She also said that both Akane and Shampoo were running scared from some woman who's been keeping an eye on their exploits, someone called... Ms Aoyama, I think. Some intelligence agent or something like that who had reason to look into the weirdness around Nerima, the area of Tokyo where all the martial artists tend to wind up. Odd place, based on the stories I've heard." He grinned momentarily as Adrian snickered. "Anyway, she told me that she thought that the possibility of this Ms Aoyama becoming irritated would be enough to keep the young woman on the straight and narrow even in the absence of anything else."

Adrian smiled a little. "I think what both of us are saying is that we honestly doubt that Akane is any more prone now to sudden attacks of homicidal rage than any of the rest of us are, although admittedly the results if she did get into that state could be... impressive. I, for one, trust her, based on the contact I've had with her since we met."

Mitch studied him, then looked at both Matt and Aaron, who both nodded. "So do I," the stunt director commented. "I think both young ladies are honourable and decent people who deserve a chance. And, of course, they have skills that are enormously valuable to us." He grinned again.
"I'm also very interested in the fact that both of them are allowed to teach some of those skills to my people, which I'm looking forward to. With both excitement and mild terror."

This provoked a smile from the COO, who studied them for a little longer, before turning back to Jennifer. "They make a convincing case. Does it settle your mind?"

"To a degree," she admitted. "Not completely but I'm willing to give them the benefit of the doubt for now." Reading the paperwork again, she added, "I do think that we'd need to make continuing any therapy until such time as the therapist was satisfied Ms Tendo was genuinely cured of these tendencies a condition of employment."

"That's reasonable," Adrian agreed, privately slightly surprised at the sensible suggestion which he expected Akane would be fine with. "I suppose we'll need to find a suitable therapist locally, but I don't think that will be too difficult."

"I know a couple of names," Matt said, making him look over, then nod his thanks.

Glancing at Jennifer to see if she had any more issues, Mitch nodded to her when she shrugged wordlessly and closed her folder. Turning back to the director, he thought for a few seconds. "All right. I'll want to see the results of the trial stunts and the training, but assuming everything goes to plan I'm prepared to argue your case before the board next week. I still have mild reservations about the issue Jennifer raised but I'll trust your judgement on it." He scanned the faces of Matt, Adrian, and Aaron, all of whom looked pleased. "Anton? Any input?"

The producer turned to look around the large room, a small smile on his face, before replying. "All I can say at this point is that I think my dreams may have come true." Adrian chuckled, feeling pleased and gratified. He'd been pretty sure the other man would see his side almost immediately and so it seemed to be. "Yes, there are some minor problems, Akane's potential anger issues aside. Shampoo will need to learn English better, for one."

"She's improved a lot just in the last few weeks," Adrian put in, making him nod. "Fair enough. Still has a way to go but she obviously understands it pretty well, just has issues with speaking it right now. We'll need to sort out work visas, immigration documentation, tax codes, all that sort of thing, but again none of that is particularly difficult. We've done it before enough times." Looking back over his shoulder at the targets bristling with arrows, he shook his head in wonder. "No, I'm certainly in favour of it, on a trial basis if nothing else. We'd know within six to eight months if it was going to work out. Personally, though, I have a very good feeling about it."

"So do I," Adrian told him.

"If it does work out well, are there more like those two in Japan?" Anton asked with a wry grin. Everyone, even Jennifer, laughed at his comment.

"As it happens, yes. Akane's family Dojo is in the process of training what might end up being the next generation of action stars," Adrian snickered, glancing at Matt, who nodded vigorously. "Damn right they are. I'm giving serious consideration to seeing if I could send a couple of my guys over for advanced training. Their Anything Goes family style is unbelievable. Even if they couldn't bring our people up to that level, I'm damn sure they'd still improve out of all recognition."

"Interesting thought," Mitch commented after a moment. "We'll see how it goes, but that might well be worth looking into. It would give us an edge, certainly." He clapped his hands together loudly. "Well. Thank you all for arranging this remarkable performance." Looking at his watch quickly, he continued, "I'm going to have to go to my next meeting but I've got a lot to think about. Keep me up to date on how it goes and I'll talk again Thursday sometime."

"OK, Mitch. Thanks for coming." Adrian shook his colleagues hand, then Jennifer's. Both of them headed down the stairs and across the floor to the door, the HR director apparently deep in thought. The people remaining on the gantry watched them leave.

"Well." Anton turned to the three people remaining. "That went remarkably well, all things considered. I was a little worried Jennifer would bring up some show-stopper, but she was unusually cooperative today."

"She's still in shock," Aaron chuckled. "Wait until tomorrow."

"The poor woman isn't that bad," Adrian commented, grinning. "She's just very picky about doing her job right, which is a good thing on the whole."

"Mitch seemed... taken aback," Matt added, also with a wide grin on his face. Anton burst out laughing.

"Oh, god, did you see his expression when Akane picked up that barrel and walked off with it?" he snickered. "Hey, Adrian, it really is full of cement, right? Not something lighter?"

"No, it's full of real concrete and really does weigh something like half a ton," the director confirmed, amused. "It took one of the big forklifts to get it in here in the first place. They're going to wonder how on earth it got all the way over there when the guys come in to clean all this up."

Laughing like an idiot, Anton leaned on the railing for a while.

"It's been a hell of a lot of fun, guys," he finally said, calming down. "Let's go and get some lunch. I'm interested in learning more about those young women. And I'm really looking forward to the next few days." He headed for the stairs, still snorting with laughter intermittently. Adrian glanced at his co-workers, grinned, then followed, the others trailing behind him. He stopped to talk to the camera chief, who was holding a stack of large video-tapes.

"This is all of it, Adrian," the man said, showing them to him as his people left the building carrying the camera equipment.

"Great. OK, Kevin, get it over to edit and get them started on it. I left instructions on what I want done. Thanks." The man nodded, looking back at the room full of equipment, then left shaking his head in wonder.

Coming out of the shower combing her hair, Akane grinned at Shampoo who was nearly finished dressing. "Think it went well?"

"I think they're going to have to go and sit down for a while," her friend giggled. "Poor Mitch looked like he couldn't work out which way was up. Jennifer seemed to have just shut down completely."

"Anton looked like he was enjoying it," the Tendo woman noted, putting her comb down and reaching for her bra.

"Almost too much," Shampoo agreed with a grin. "I'm pretty sure he's on our side, he was practically from the start."

"I guess we'll have to see what they say," Akane agreed, finishing dressing, then checking herself in the mirror. She noticed her friend was carefully wrapping up what she recognised as a bar of the special Jusenkyo products soap and putting it into a waterproof bag. "Is that the new stuff that Cologne got for you with the different smell?"

Shampoo nodded, slipping it into her bag. "Yes, it's still not exactly wonderful but I can live with it. Apparently something about the magic makes producing some with no smell at all difficult. Great Grandmother tweaked the recipe and got the village to send some of the new batch over, it turned up about ten days ago. I've got about fifty kilos of it at home, it should last for years. But this is the only bar I brought with me so I don't want to lose it."

Grinning, the Tendo woman asked, "What if Adrian wants to demonstrate the instant Shampoo-cat magic?"

The other woman laughed. "I've got a bottle of special cleanser that removes it as well, but that smells even worse than the soap. Hopefully he won't need it demonstrated. But if he does, it's covered."

Amused, Akane finished putting all her things back in her bag before she zipped it up, then both of them left the room, finding Jim and Aiko chatting in the corridor of the office building in a small alcove that contained a pair of chairs. Both of them looked up as the two women approached.

"All done?" Jim asked. They both nodded.

"Yes, thanks, Jim," Akane replied.

"Great. Let's get to the executive cafeteria, there's plenty to eat there and I'd guess you're both hungry after all that exercise." He stood up, as did Aiko.

"Could certainly eat," Shampoo agreed happily. With Jim leading the way they arrived after a few minutes walk, looking around with interest, then investigating the food available. Ten minutes later all four of them were sitting around a table in one corner of the large room, next to a window which showed a good view of the studio facilities from their third-floor height.

"This is pretty good," Aiko noted appreciatively, trying her roast beef.

"They feed us well," Jim agreed with a smile. "It keeps people happy and happy people tend to do good work."

"Very enlightened," she snickered. Akane laughed, cutting another piece of chicken, which was indeed very tasty.

"You all did extremely well," the man told them after a few more bites of his own food. "If you were wondering. Very professionally arranged, well executed, and remarkably impressive."

"Thanks, Jim," Akane responded after a look at Aiko and Shampoo. "Aiko certainly helped a lot. Without her, I don't think it would have gone so smoothly."

"Don't put yourselves down," the brunette smiled. "I'm glad to help, but I think you'd have done fine by yourselves."

"Possibly, possibly not. You made it a lot easier, though." The young woman accepted the thanks with another smile, not saying anything more on the subject.

Watching them with a small smile of his own, Jim shrugged a bit. "Regardless, I think it worked out really well. Anton will definitely support Adrian, I'm sure. When Jennifer and Mitch have calmed down, I suspect they'll be fairly enthusiastic about it as well. I'd guess that they won't make any decision until after the trial stunts and so on, but I'd be surprised if you weren't offered contracts by that point. And disappointed, as well."

"It's nice to hear that," the youngest Tendo sister replied after exchanging a pleased and slightly worried look with Shampoo.

"Adrian say similar," Shampoo added, "but nice to have confirmed."

"I think you should forget about that part of it for the next couple of days, myself, and just concentrate on the training and the work," the safety director continued after taking a drink of his coffee. "It's going to be a lot of work but worth it. And I think you'll find it a lot of fun as well."

"Both looking forward to it," the Amazon noted with a grin. "Never been in helicopter."

"That scene could be amazing if we have time to do it," he agreed, laughing. "Matt is pretty keen on it so it'll probably happen." He looked up, then waved, making the three women follow his gaze to see Adrian, Matt, Aaron, and Anton enter the cafeteria. The director waved back as they went to get their own food.

"Adrian looks extremely happy," Aiko noted in a low voice, amusement in it as well. Jim nodded, grinning.

"Like a kid with candy. He's really invested in this whole idea. You have no idea how much he wants to do this."

Akane giggled a little. "He's mentioned it a few times."

"I'll bet he has," the man snickered. Five minutes later the four men joined them at the table. "So, is Mitch impressed?" Jim asked wryly. Adrian exchanged a look with the others then all four of them collapsed in laughter.

When they recovered Adrian gasped, "You might put it that way. I thought he was going to pass out at one point." He shook his head in wonder. "I'm still amazed that he took it as well as he did. Jennifer was looking kind of stunned as well when she left."

"What's the verdict?" Aiko asked. He glanced at her, then looked at Akane and Shampoo, who were both waiting, feeling nervous. The youngest Tendo was trying not to show her worry and she could see the Amazon was in the same state when she looked across the table at her.

"It's too early to say, to be honest, but all the indications are very promising," the director finally said. Akane suspected that there was more to it than that but didn't think it was a good idea to press for details, presumably everything would come out in the end. "Overall it's going very well. We'll know more once all the trials are finished but I doubt you'll be disappointed with the results."

Smiling, Akane looked again at Shampoo, who appeared very happy. "Well done, guys," Aiko congratulated them. She got a sudden distant look for a moment. "Whoops. I need to go, but I'll come back when I'm done. Thanks for the food, Jim." Finishing her own coffee with a couple of quick gulps as she stood up she moved away from the table and vanished mid step. Everyone blinked at the flash.

"I still find that very strange," Matt commented idly, picking up a french fry and biting into it. Everyone stared at him, then at each other, before shrugging and going back to eating.
"Look, just call that number, everything will get sorted out, I promise," Harrison sighed, rubbing his forehead with his free hand. The other one was engaged in holding the phone to his ear. The woman on the other end of it was being remarkably obstreperous which was beginning to annoy him.

"Yes, I understand that your client's vehicle was destroyed. No, no one used a rocket launcher on it. Not in the middle of L.A. Yes, I know what it looks like but trust me, it wasn't that." He listened some more, trying not to sigh. At the next desk, Rojas was grinning, listening to his side of the conversation. He rolled his eyes at his colleague.

"Look, Mrs Hansen, the vehicle was stolen and used in the commission of a very serious incident, which resulted in the destruction of that same vehicle. Luckily no one was killed. It was necessary to damage the vehicle to bring the entire incident to a conclusion before someone died. Now, as I've explained, if you call that phone number I gave you and quote the code I also gave you, I'm assured that the entire matter will be settled quickly and to you and your client's satisfaction." He listened for a moment more, frowning a little. "That's not entirely fair, is it? Under normal circumstances something like this could drag on for weeks, but I suspect you'll find it will be settled in a couple of days in this case."

There was another pause. Rojas put his feet up on his desk, popping open a can of 7-Up and listening with a smile. "Would you have preferred that your client's vehicle was used in a murder, then?" Harrison smirked at the answer. "No, I can see why that wouldn't go down well. We could hardly just wait for the perpetrators to either run out of ammunition or just get bored, could we? So we dealt with it." He shook his head a little, doodling on his desk pad with his free hand, drawing a little figure hanging from a gallows and writing 'Mrs Hansen, RIP' underneath it. "It was a colleague from a special tactics law enforcement group that actually did the damage," he replied when the annoying woman finally left a gap. "She's very good at bring things like that to a stop, extremely suddenly. Would you like me to have her come over and explain how she did it to you? Perhaps with a demonstration?" Rojas winced as Harrison grinned evilly.

"All right. Yes, just call the number, that's right. Thank you, Mrs Hansen. Yes, you have a nice day too. Good bye." He put the phone back in its cradle very gently, then started softly banging his head on the desk, muttering to himself, accompanied by the laughter from the other lieutenant.

"God preserve us from middle-aged insurance claims adjusters with bad attitudes," he moaned.

"Sounds like she was a little uncooperative," the other officer noted. Lifting his head Harrison stared at his co-worker, then dropped it to the desk again.

"You have no idea. She was looking for any excuse to not pay out on that damn policy. Stupid, really, that reparations number in Tokyo will pay for everything from what Aiko said. The insurance company won't be out of pocket at all. They just seem to like being difficult."

"I hate insurance companies," Rojas commented, crushing his empty can in his fist then tossing it into the garbage can next to Harrison's desk.

"You hate everyone," Harrison muttered, making the other man grin.

"Not everyone. I just respond badly to authority."

Lifting his head again and staring for a moment, Harrison said, "You are authority. More or less." Rojas shrugged. "What can I say? I'm complicated."
"No, you're not. Trust me." They shared a smile then Rojas looked at his watch.

"Right, I've got an informant to beat up. See you." He stood up, took his weapon out of the top drawer of his desk and holstered it, picked up his jacket, then left the room, nodding to a few other officers on the way. Harrison watched him go, smiling a little, before turning back to his work.
More Hollywood Adventures

Carz n gunz n bikez n shit...

The second part of the Great Hollywood Adventures of Akane Tendo and Xian Pu.

Guest starring Aiko Maedam and a cast of several.

This chapter brought to you by large amounts of caffeinated energy drinks and the smell of spicy pizza. Jalapeños rule.

Closing in on 1800 reviews, with more than 1.2 million words in the main story. Wow. Amusingly, that seems to suggest that approximately 666 of my words are worth one review. There's something about that number that seems vaguely familiar...

I thought this bit would be a two chapter side-story, but I've been informed by Ms Tendo that she intends to do enough in a week in Hollywood that it will take at least three chapters to record her exploits. What can I do?

My chapter lengths seem to steadily be creeping up, to around the 35 Kword length recently. The last one was 10 Kwords more than that, even. Funny, when you realise my shortest chapter was only 2700 words or so, which is barely a decent scene length :) It wasn't until chapter 21 I passed 10 Kwords for the first time. After this section is done I'll probably ease back on the length of the chapters, which will let me put them out faster if nothing else. This last part, though, has more or less required fairly long chapters. So you'll just have to live with it!

Hopefully shorter chapters will allow better use of my time which in recent months has had many other things calling on it. I can sit down and push out a few thousand words in one go, but then might not be able to look at it again for a week, which means I need to re-read everything to make sure I'm being consistent. The sheer complexity of the story is becoming sufficient that I need to go back and read my own chapters sometimes to refresh my memory of what I'm trying to do! I've got a plan, but some of the details can go adrift if I'm not careful. Although sometimes that works out as I end up taking a minor mistake and running with it, writing the relevant parts needed to turn it from a mistake into a planned plotline. My subconscious seems to be writing at least a third of all this...

Note 1: I realised to my annoyance that I made a silly time-line mistake with the last chapter. Interestingly, no one seemed to pick up on it, but I know it's there and it's irritating me. The most annoying part is that it was in my notes but I somehow missed it when expanding them out into the chapter. Whether I'll go back and fix it at some point I'm not sure yet. It would involve rewriting about a fifth of the chapter to make everything consistent, and adding probably two to three thousand words.

I may well leave it until I finish the story, which is some way off yet, but when I do I intend to go back and correct a lot of small stylistic errors and minor mistakes to make the entire thing consistent anyway. Which will probably take nearly as long as writing the damn thing in the first place :( My style has evolved over the last couple of years (god, has it been that long already?!) so the first chapters and the most recent ones are somewhat different in writing technique. I think it's better now, personally, but regardless it should be the same all the way through.

In any case, that's not happening for a while. Then there's book 2 to think about...
Note 2: While I know a bit about firearms in general and a little more about one or two specific ones, I'm no expert. If I've made silly mistakes let me know. The manuals for the relevant weapons may not pass on everything that an expert would know about them, this is pretty common for any machinery in my experience. But I've tried to make it believable, or at least, as believable as it could be under the circumstances :)

Note 3: The following information is copied from my profile update for those who haven't seen it.

Enormous thanks and appreciation to everyone who has read, enjoyed, and commented on the story so far. There is a significant amount of brand loyalty going on :)

Hopefully I can continue to be of some amusement value to everyone for some time to come. It's amused me as much to write it as it apparently does others to read it.

I also note with some shock that the reader 'KitsuneHerikawa' has gone to the trouble of creating a wiki for the DSR series, which is far above and beyond the call of duty. I'm impressed speechless by it. And kind of pleased. It's found at sisterhood-of-doom.wikia.com.

In addition the first bit of fan art for the story (and quite possibly the only bit of fan art for the story) was done by another reader, tommygunner70. It can be found at tommygunner70.deviantart.com.

Again, I'm very impressed and pleased.

(And now the chapter notes are as long as some fanfics I've seen...)

Greg looked at the two women who were staring around the vehicle depot with interest, studying them for a moment, before turning to the others. "Are you sure about this, Matt?" he asked quietly. "They're pretty young to be the stunt wizards you're saying they are."

The stunt director smiled back at him deviously, looking like he had a wonderful secret that he wasn't sharing, then nodded. "Oh, trust me, they're pretty good. But neither one of them has much experience driving, so we need to train them up this afternoon." Greg stared at him for a moment before turning the Adrian, who simply shrugged with a small grin. Seeing no support coming from the director's direction he went back to his immediate boss.

"Train them up how, exactly?" he asked suspiciously. "What sort of thing are you going to want them to do? I mean, if they're not all that familiar with driving in the first place, what type of scene do you have in mind?" Matt handed him a script and briefing document before he stopped speaking. Taking it, the mid-thirties sandy-haired man glanced through it quickly, then went back and read it more carefully, his eyebrows going steadily upwards. "Are you both nuts?" he asked in shock when he reached the last of the five pages, his mid-western accent strengthening due to stress.

Adrian looked at Matt for a moment. "Are we nuts, Matt?"

"Probably, but not in a bad way," the other man chuckled.

Shaking his head in exasperation, Greg flapped the paperwork in his colleague's faces. "This stunt would be asking a lot for our most experienced drivers to pull off without someone ending up in hospital. And you're expecting me to train two, two..." He glanced at the two young women who were inspecting one of the training cars, the one with the long lilac hair peering into the cabin, apparently pointing out the roll cage to her companion, trying to come up with a non-insulting description for them. "Two inexperienced girls to drive like this requires?"

Matt nodded, grinning.

"Yep."

"And how long do I have to pull off this miracle?" the driving expert asked with asperity.

"The rest of the afternoon and some of tomorrow as well," Adrian casually replied.

Greg stared at him, open-mouthed. "The rest of the afternoon," he finally said. "Oh, well, in that case I have no idea why I was worried. And here I was thinking that it's the sort of thing that would need a decade of experience at least. Stupid me." He sighed heavily, shaking his head.

"Just give it a try, Greg, OK?" Matt requested, an amused look on his face. "I think you'll find they pick it up pretty quick. Check them out on the basics of driving, take them around the course a couple of times, then show them some of the stunts we commonly do. Two wheels, J turns, jumps, spins, that sort of thing. We've got everything set up."

Not entirely convinced, the instructor turned to study the girls again. Both of them were looking under one of the cars by this point. "Why did you have me tell all the other guys to leave early?" he asked. "And what did you say their names were?"

"We're keeping this all sort of under wraps at the moment," Matt said.

Adrian nodded. "It's not exactly secret, but we're not talking too much either, we don't want any of the other studios to find out yet." He indicated the two women. "Akane Tendo, that's the one with the short blue hair, and Xian Pu, or Shampoo, the other one. Akane is from Japan and Shampoo is from China. They're both martial arts experts who could pull your appendix out your nose if you insulted them, so I'd suggest you don't," the director told him, still looking amused. "But they're also both very nice young women who are smart, very fast to learn, and more than willing to learn anything you can teach them."

Greg nodded dubiously. "All right, I guess. But don't blame me if it all ends badly," he told the other two. Shaking his head, he walked over to the car and the two women, who stood up and smiled at him. Adrian and Matt came along with him.

"Hello. I'm Greg. How are you both?" he asked politely.

"We're both fine, Greg," the blue-haired young woman replied, equally politely, holding out her hand, which he shook, then turned to the other one and did the same with her. "I'm Akane, and this is my friend Shampoo. Her English isn't fantastic yet but she understands more than she speaks."

"Nice meet you," Shampoo added, looking pleased. "Sorry about language problems, still learning. Difficult language, too many rules." She grinned as despite himself he chuckled a little. Pointing at the car they'd been examining, she asked, "Can go upside down safely?"

"Yes, it's got a heavy roll cage built into it along with a reinforced structure, crash proof fuel cell for the gas, a sealed battery so it won't leak if the car is inverted, a number of other modifications like a plastic windshield and so on. It's what we use for basic training and simple stunt-work." He turned to look at the battered blue Ford sedan. "For anything more complex and for all the actual filming we use cars built for that specific job, but this one and the other two over there are what we practice with. They don't tend to last too long." Shampoo snickered, looking at the dents in the vehicle.
"Looks like went through war," she commented. He shrugged a bit.

"Pretty much." Inspecting them both, then glancing at Adrian and Matt, who were listening silently from off to the side, he asked, "How much experience do either of you have with cars and driving generally?"

Akane looked at Shampoo, then replied, "I haven't had much. A few lessons perhaps two and a half years ago so I have an idea of the basics but no more than that. It's very expensive owning a car in Japan compared to the US and where I live there wasn't much need for it, so I didn't bother." Greg nodded slowly, listening, then turned to Shampoo.

The other woman said, "Not as much time in car as Akane. Drove go-karts a few times. Tried jeep in home village with friend when very young. Got in trouble, didn't ask first." She grinned. "Army man very annoyed." This made Greg laugh for a few seconds. "Other than that, little experience. More with motorcycle but rusty."

"OK. Right. Looks like our work is cut out for us, then." He glanced at Adrian, adding in a low voice, "One afternoon?" The director nodded, still smiling in a way that made it look like he knew something Greg didn't, which was beginning to get right up his nose. Returning his attention to the two women he saw they were also looking amused, yet simultaneously slightly nervous and very eager.

Pondering the problem for a few seconds, he finally shrugged and opened the driver's side door. "OK, then, I guess we just dive in and see what happens next. You go first, Akane, since you have some experience. Matt, can you get the door there?" The stunt director nodded, walking over and flipping the switch that raised the roller door for the garage the cars were kept in, brilliant sunlight flooding in and overpowering the fluorescent lights in the ceiling. "We'll try some basic driving exercises so I can assess your current abilities, then we can work out what the next step is."

Looking at her for a moment he went over to a rack of crash helmets, pulling one off and inspecting it, then rejecting it in favour of a different one, which he brought back and handed to her. "Here, see if this one fits."

After a moment's minor confusion about the chin-strap, the young woman managed to get the helmet on. "How does it feel?" he asked.

"A little tight but not too bad," she replied, adjusting it slightly.

"A little tight is good, very tight is bad," he told her, smiling slightly. Gently moving it around on her head he nodded. "That's a pretty good fit. OK, you'll want this neck protector as well." He showed her how the thing fitted, doing the velcro strap up. "This will stop you breaking your neck if we hit something or roll it."

"I wouldn't think you're likely to roll the car just testing her driving skills," Adrian commented, watching. Greg gave him a tired look.

"You wouldn't say that if you'd ever met some of the drivers we've used in the past," he sighed, shaking his head. The other four people all laughed at the tone in his voice.

"Experience?" Matt asked.

"Yes, of the 'Oh my god I can't believe you managed to do that, you idiot!' variety," Greg commented bitterly. "Impressive, but for all the wrong reasons."

"Anyway, let's see how we get on this time. Hopefully we're not going to end up inverted during a three point turn, but better safe than sorry. OK, Akane, why don't you get in and..."
we'll adjust the harness for you." He watched as she slid easily into the bucket seat. "Pull those straps over your arms, yes, like that, then that one there, they all snap into the lock in the middle." He checked that the harness was secure, adjusting the straps for the smaller frame of the young woman as opposed to him as the last driver of the car. Satisfied, he nodded. "Looks good."

Having retrieved his own helmet and neck guard and donned them, he got into the passenger seat after pointedly handing Matt a large fire extinguisher, which made the other man snicker quite a lot. "Just in case. Bear in mind that if it needs to be used I'm going to beat you severely with it once the fire is out." Even Shampoo started laughing at this point. Getting into the car he rig his own harness then closed the door.

"OK, make sure the transmission is in park, put your foot on the brake, then start the engine." She did as requested, making him nod approvingly. "Good. Now, into drive, gently on the gas and Oh god I said GENTLY!" The instructor grabbed frantically for anything solid to hold onto as the car, tires smoking violently, slewed sideways with a screech of rubber on concrete and shot out the main entrance, slamming to a halt fifty feet outside the building. Breathing hard he stared out the windscreen for a moment before slowly turning his head to glare at the Japanese woman who met his gaze with an embarrassed one of her own.

"Sorry," she mumbled. "This car is a little more powerful than the one I learned in."

After a long moment he nodded once. "OK. No harm done, I guess. Let's try that again, all right?" She nodded, still looking embarrassed, then put her foot down much more carefully this time. The car moved off a little more quickly than he wanted but compared to the first time it wasn't too bad. Sitting back he kept one hand ready to grab onto the door handle while he began giving her instructions, taking her through her paces on the course set up in the empty car park at the rear of the garage.

Adrian watched with a grin as the car disappeared in a cloud of smoke, the yell of protest coming from inside it barely audible over the scream of the engine. Shampoo started laughing again while Matt was watching with his left eyebrow raised. Looking at the fire extinguisher his colleague was holding the director chuckled. "You may need that thing yet," he commented.

Shrugging, Matt led them outside as the cloud of smoke thinned. They stood to one side of the door and watched the car begin to move off again, at something much closer to a sane speed. "I'm sure there won't be any fire involved," the man said calmly. He paused for a few seconds, then added, "Well, fairly sure. More or less." There was another long pause. "I think."

They grinned at each other then watched with Shampoo as Akane drove around the course that was laid out in traffic cones and water filled polythene barriers, only killing a few of them until she was doing the course at a fairly steady if not enormously high speed. Ten minutes later Aiko came around the corner with Jim, both of them talking together, to join them.

"Ah, you're back, then, Aiko?" Adrian asked. The brunette nodded.

"Yes, it wasn't too serious, Yori needed me to give her and Chou some rapid transportation to a medical emergency. Everything worked out OK." She looked at the car, then down at the skid marks leading from inside the garage, raising her eyebrows. "Everything going all right here?" she asked. "Only it looks like someone was in a hurry."

Grinning, the magical girl shook her head, watching the car go past on another lap of the course, steadily picking up speed. "She seems to be doing pretty well now," she noted.

"Yes, she seems to be picking it up quickly, actually," Matt replied approvingly. "Greg wasn't at all sure about all this but he's giving it a try anyway. Personally, I have no doubt that both the young women can do it very well." Shampoo gave him a pleased look.

"I'm certain of it," Adrian put in, leaning against the warm wall of the building and watching as well. "The advanced stunt training is going to be the interesting part."

"Do you do that here?" she asked curiously, glancing about. "It's a pretty big car park or whatever it is but I'd have thought you'd need more space for some of the stuff you're planning."

"We can do a lot of it here, yes," Matt replied. "Things like specialist turns, slides, spins, even some two wheel driving using that ramp over to the left there. For the things that need more room we use an old airfield to the north-east of LA, about fifty miles away, there's a decent length track and a skid pan set up there. That can wait until tomorrow. Hopefully by the end of today both Akane and Shampoo will be up to speed on basic car handling, although I'd expect that driving on the road would be more work. Learning the rules and so on is more complex than just knowing how to make the car go in the right direction, of course."

"Not to mention the fact that you guys drive on the wrong side of the road in the US," the brunette chuckled. He shrugged.

"A matter of viewpoint, of course. I think anyone who drives on the left is crazy." They shared a grin. "Shampoo, you drive on the right in China, right?"

"Yes," the Amazon replied with a nod. "But not drive on road before so have no... preconceptions. Is that right word?" She looked curious, smiling when he nodded. "Looking forward to this."

"Assuming everything works out, which I'm certain it will, they'll both need to get US driving licenses, it's almost impossible to get around without a car in this country," Adrian commented, watching Akane do another lap of the course, her smile visible despite the helmet. Greg was talking to her as they went past, looking much less worried now. "That would make more sense than going out then back here. We can do some motorcycle work as well while we're there." He glanced at Aiko. "You coming for that?"

"I don't see why not," she replied, smiling. "It sounds like fun and I'd like to see it. There's nothing particularly major going on at home at the moment and I can get back if I'm needed." She turned to him curiously. "What's involved in this firearms work?"

"Mainly firearms safety, terminology, and how to carry and handle the various weapons in a safe and convincing manner, to start with," Matt replied for the director, also turning away from the driving. Shampoo was listening although she kept her eyes on the car, watching carefully what her friend was doing. "There's a firing range under the armoury which is built to police standards, we use it for live firing. I think Aaron will probably want to check them out on pistols and one or two of the common automatic weapons down there as well, if only with blanks, to get them used to the noise and feel of the things." He laughed slightly. "I remember from basic training what it was like for some people who'd never fired an automatic weapon before the first time they did. Half the guys dropped them. We had one incident with a faulty M-16 that jammed on full auto somehow which was... kind of scary." He shook his head for a moment. "Everyone hit the deck and luckily nobody got shot, but it was sort of exciting for a few seconds. Poor guy got a real shouting at from the instructor. Everyone was scared shitless by the whole thing."

Aiko nodded, grinning. "That must have been impressive," she noted wryly.

"That's one way to put it," he agreed, snickering. "The sergeant had a more colourful description."

"So, I suppose it'll be something like 9mm pistols, that MP5 Aaron was repairing, M-16s, perhaps an AK-47?" she asked. He nodded again.

"More or less, yes. Possibly some revolvers as well. Nothing particularly specialist, just the sort of weapon that's used a lot in movies mainly because they're commonly found in law enforcement and military usage in the US or are otherwise familiar to people. There are some more esoteric ones that might get used but it could take days to go through everything, there's no point for the trial stunts we're doing at the moment. We're not going to need to use anything really heavy or excessive right now."

Adrian laughed in a low voice. "Although it would be kind of amusing to see one of them firing something like an M-60 from the waist without any problems," he snickered. "They're both strong enough to do it without any real trouble. It would look very impressive."

Laughing, Matt glanced at the director. "Oh, yes, that would be pretty amazing. Or something even heavier. A Barrett M-82 for instance. The damn thing is nearly four feet long."

"They're easy enough to fire," Aiko smiled, "Not a lot of recoil. If you want something really silly looking for a medium height woman to use hand-held try a Browning fifty calibre machine gun with a shoulder sling. That looks completely ridiculous." They all stared at her for a few seconds, causing her smile to grow. "Like I said, I get around. There's this place in South Africa that will let you fire all sort of weird weapons if you pay them. For enough cash you can shoot a live cow with an RPG." Adrian went green at the thought. "Although I didn't do it, it seems a little excessive and cruel," she added, grinning.

"You have an interesting back-story," Jim commented after a moment. She looked at him with amusement.

"You have no idea," she replied, laughing. "And if I told you..."

"You'd have to kill me?" he asked with a smirk.

"You'd probably want me to," she assured him seriously, which made the smirk vanish. Shampoo giggled a moment later, followed by Aiko bursting out laughing.

"You're weird," the man finally said, shaking his head and smiling. She laughed even harder for a moment, nodding, then turned to watch as Akane pulled out of the course, drove carefully up to them, then stopped. She talked to Greg for a moment then both of them got out of the vehicle. The Tendo woman was smiling widely and the instructor was looking thoughtful.

Moving to join her friend, Shampoo began talking with Akane in a low voice, the Japanese woman gesturing as she described what she'd been doing, while Greg came over to them, nodding a greeting to Jim and looking curiously at Aiko, who smiled at him, before turning to Matt and Adrian. "I'll say one thing," he began without preamble, "that young woman has the fastest damn reactions of anyone I've ever met."

"Impressed?" Adrian asked, amused.
The instructor, slightly reluctantly, nodded. "Yes. She picked it up much quicker than I expected. Oh, don't get me wrong, I wouldn't let her loose on the freeway without a lot more work, but as far as the actual steering the car goes, she's driving to a level that I'd have said was the result of a couple of months of practice normally after, what, about half an hour or so?" He checked his watch, his eyebrows raised. "OK, forty minutes. Even so, damned impressive. I'm interested to see how her friend does."

"I suspect you'll find Shampoo picks it up at least as fast," Matt suggested, watching the two women talk. The Amazon was leaning in the window of the car, Akane having gotten back in, listening and nodding as the other woman explained something. "One thing I've definitely learned about those two is that once they decide to learn something, some skill, they seem to keep at it until they do it." Greg followed his gaze, rubbing his chin in thought.

"I'm beginning to see that, yes." He turned back to the others. "I'm still dubious about your damn stunt but I'll agree it might not be completely impossible. Just very unlikely."

Adrian laughed. "Your reservations are noted. Neither of us will hold it against you if you turn out to be right, but I think you'll be surprised." Greg grunted quasi-agreement, then walked over to the two young women, where Shampoo was now experimentally trying on the helmet Akane had been wearing, which seemed to fit. He checked it, then nodded, watching as she put on the neck protector as well, her long hair coming out from under it and draping down her back. Once she was in the driver's position and the harness adjusted to his satisfaction he got in the passenger side again, Akane backing away as her friend started the car. It moved off somewhat erratically but much less enthusiastically than it had done in her case, the Chinese girl apparently being a little more cautious with the gas pedal.

Walking back to them Akane grinned happily, waving to Aiko as she approached. "That was fun," she noted with a laugh in her voice. "Although Greg was sort of worried for the first few laps. He kept making little yelps and grabbing the handles when I hit things." Adrian exchanged a look with his colleagues before laughing for a moment.

"I wonder why he did that?" he asked with amusement.

"No idea," she replied, giggling. "A big strong man like that getting all worried by a couple of little accidents." Aiko snickered, Akane throwing her a grin.

"So how do you feel about driving now?" the magical girl asked. Akane thought for a moment.

"It's a lot of fun, but I'd be very nervous about driving in traffic," she replied after a few seconds. "I'd need to study all the rules and things for a while before I'd be confident about doing it right."

"That puts you ahead of a lot of people who drive around here," Adrian chuckled somewhat sarcastically. "You'd think that they'd never seen a driver's handbook judging by what I see every day on the freeway." She glanced at him with a grin.

"So you mentioned this morning."

Smiling a little they both turned to watch with the others as Shampoo did a few more laps of the course. Matt nodded approvingly as the car finally pulled over near them and both occupants got out, exchanging a few words over the roof then walking over, Shampoo pulling the helmet off after a brief fight with the strap. Greg stopped next to Adrian while the lilac-haired woman joined Akane and Aiko, all three of them talking in rapid Japanese, the brunette magical girl laughing at something the Amazon said.
"What do you think?" Matt asked. The other man watched the women for a moment more then turned to him.

"I think that both of them are pretty amazing at least as far as their reaction speed goes," he said after a few seconds. "That Shampoo girl is even quicker than Akane was, although not by much, but in either case they're way past anyone else I've ever seen. They'd probably make amazing fighter pilots if that was the sort of thing they wanted to do." He shrugged slightly. "Both of them are driving to a pretty reasonable standard, to be honest. To an insanely good one if you take the last hour and a half as more or less the only training they've had. They picked that part up very quick." He studied Shampoo for a couple of seconds again. "Like I said, I wouldn't want to put either of them on the road in traffic without more training but they could certainly handle the actual driving part."

"So you want to try teaching them some more advanced driving next?" Adrian looked enquiringly at his colleague, who thought for a little while then finally nodded.

"OK. I'm still not sure how this is going to play out but it's worth a try, I'll admit." Sighing a little as Matt and Adrian both grinned at him, he turned to Jim, shrugged, then walked over to the three women. Jim watched him go with a smile.

"He's a little worried by all this isn't he?" the safety coordinator asked rhetorically.

"More than a little, I think," Matt snickered. Jim looked at him, then down at his feet.

"Why do you have a fire extinguisher next to you?" he asked curiously.

Sitting beside Greg, now in the passenger seat, Akane watched carefully and listened intently as he explained the manoeuvres he was about to do, then executed them, quickly and surely with an expertise that betrayed just how long he'd been doing this sort of thing. He'd spent some time explaining to both her and Shampoo after their initial driving appraisal a lot of things about cars that she was still digesting, the difference between manual and automatic transmissions, front and rear wheel drive, the importance of weight distribution, how to brake properly without skidding, as well as how to make the vehicle skid, and a number of other concepts. She was going to have to think about it all for some time before she fully understood everything, the Tendo woman decided, wondering if she could find some books on the subject to study.

Driving was complicated. Oh, the actual pointing the car in the right direction and not hitting anything was easy enough, at least on a course where they were the only thing moving, but doing it on a road with hundreds of other people, many of whom were, to listen to Adrian, actively trying to kill you, was something that she was feeling somewhat worried about. At least that part of it wasn't going to happen immediately for which she was grateful. But the other things, all the advanced turns, slides, and in a while, jumps and rolls, were taking a lot of thinking about. That said, it sounded like a lot of fun.

"OK. This one is called a bootlegger turn. It's easier with a manual transmission but you can do it in this. You get up to a decent speed like this, put the car in neutral, then hold the handbrake with the release pressed. Flick the steering wheel, pull the handbrake hard..." he suited action to words, the car immediately slewing sideways with the tires shrieking, "let go of the brake, steer into the skid when you're in the right position, back into drive, and back on the power." The slide turned into a spin which abruptly ended with them pointing in the other direction having turned almost in the length of the car. The rear wheels smoked as the car slowed rapidly, then accelerated back the way they'd come.
"Eep," Akane squeaked, holding onto the harness with both hands. Greg grinned at her reaction.

"Want to see it again?" he asked. After a few seconds of recovery she smiled back, nodding.

"Yes, please." He obliged a couple of times.

"It's not hard and it's used a lot. Got it?"

"I think so."

"OK." He looked pleased. "Next, more or less the same thing, but backwards. That one is a J turn. It's a bit different because you keep going in the same direction if you do it right." Repositioning the vehicle at the side of the large empty expanse of tarmac, he turned it to face the wall of one of the studios, then looked over his shoulder. "See, you put it in reverse, again accelerate, get it up to about thirty or so, then quickly off the gas, turn the wheel hard," again he demonstrated, the car spinning through a hundred and eighty degrees in less than a second, "Opposite steering to stop the spin, into drive then back on the gas." They speeded up, now pointing forwards. "That one is taught to advanced drivers in security courses, for getting out of a tight situation when you've driven up to something you really need to get from away fast. It saves the time of turning around and being shot at."

Akane nodded thoughtfully, picturing the idea. It seemed valid. Again he demonstrated a few more times, then went on to other more advanced techniques. After about half an hour he stopped the car in the middle of the space they were driving around and turned to her. "Do you think you're ready to try it?" he asked.

"I think so," she replied, slightly nervously.

"Great. Keep calm and don't be afraid to ask for help. Don't get too close to the buildings if you can help it, keep it in the middle here where there's plenty of space." She nodded then they both got out, exchanging places. Behind the wheel she went over his instructions in her head for a couple of minutes before taking a deep breath.

"OK. What should I do first?"

"Try a simple handbrake turn. Just try to make it go half way round the first time and stop. That's pretty easy."

With a nod she put the car in drive and carefully headed to one corner of the parking lot, turning around to face the centre, then stepped on the accelerator. When the car was at the appropriate speed she quickly put it in neutral then grabbed the handbrake, applying it with one hand while spinning the wheel with the other. The car spun gratifyingly to end up pointing more or less in the direction they'd come from.

"Not bad for a first attempt." He looked pleased, as did she. "Try it again." After half a dozen attempts she was performing the manoeuvre with aplomb. "OK, again, but a little faster." They called a halt to it when she was spinning the car a full three hundred and sixty degrees from a bit over thirty-five miles an hour. "That's enough, any quicker and we'll run out of room." Greg nodded to her. "But not at all bad. Try the J turn next."

They went through half a dozen specialist moves in the next hour, at the end of which he looked genuinely happy. "I'm impressed, Akane. You picked that up very fast. You wouldn't believe how long some of those took a few people I've taught over the years, people who had been driving for a long time." He sighed a bit as she giggled.
"Maybe it's because I've got no idea what I'm doing so I'm really listening to you?" she suggested, making him chuckle.

"I guess it's possible, sure. You're certainly a quick study." Pleased she grinned at him. "I think I should show Shampoo everything we've done so far then we can move on to the complicated stuff afterwards," he added. With a smile she dropped the car into drive, stomped on the gas, then hurtled towards the watching people on the other side of the lot, making him yelp despite himself. At what she judged as the correct distance she rapidly put the car in neutral, pulled the brake, released it, steered, then counter-steered, sliding neatly to a halt with the car side on five metres from the others, all of whom other than Shampoo and Aiko had scattered. The magical girl didn't move a muscle, merely watched with amusement, while Shampoo took one step back to put Aiko strategically between her and the oncoming car, which seemed to amuse the brunette even more.

"Um. Yes, you seem to have mastered the power slide parking manoeuvre," he admitted after a few seconds, looking slightly pale. She guessed she'd taken him by surprise. Giggling Akane undid her harness and jumped out, walking over to her friends. The instructor followed more slowly, going over to talk to Adrian, who was returning from a safe distance with the other studio people.

"Having fun?" Aiko asked, smiling. She nodded.

"It's a lot of fun, yes. A bit scary at first but not too hard if you listen. He's a good teacher."

"You certainly seemed to be enjoying yourself out there," the brunette laughed. "Remember, you're not supposed to drive like that in traffic, the police tend not to like it." She grinned again. "I think they think it's showing off."

Snickering, Akane grinned back, then turned to Shampoo and began telling her what she'd learned.

"That looked pretty convincing," Matt quipped as Greg joined them. The instructor gave him a hard look.

"It was a little unexpected," he responded wryly. "That girl does indeed learn fast. She'd need a lot more experience to be able to do it for a living but I think she'd be very good at it. So far I haven't found anything that she's had too much trouble picking up." He glanced over his shoulder at the blue-haired woman who was talking to her friends with a big smile on her face. "One thing I did notice is that she's not even slightly scared by any of this. She was nervous, sure, but not actually scared, even when I was driving pretty hard. Most people who have never done it before get at least a little worried." He shook his head a little. "It's like she's not worried about getting hurt, which isn't the normal reaction. Especially with women."

He noticed Adrian and Matt exchanged a glance that made him suspicious. Jim's nearly hidden grin added to this.

"There's something you're not telling me isn't there?" he asked with narrowed eyes. Adrian, after another quick look at his two colleagues, shrugged innocently.

"Would I keep something important from you, Greg?" he asked happily.

"...Yes. Yes, you would," Greg replied after another hard look, which made all three of his companions snicker.

"Don't worry, I'm sure you'll find out sooner or later," Adrian chuckled looking far too pleased with himself for the other man to be comfortable about. "Oh, look, I think Shampoo is ready for you."

He pointed past Greg's shoulder to where Shampoo, helmet and neck protector on, was getting into the passenger side of the car with an anticipatory smile on her face. Sighing a little Greg looked over his shoulder then back at the director.

"This isn't over, you know," he muttered before heading back to the vehicle. He could hear muted laughter from behind him making him sigh again.

"Like this?" Akane asked, a little worried. Beside her, Greg nodded, also looking just the tiniest bit apprehensive through his otherwise placid and professional expression, as the car lined up on the special ramp that would propel the left side up into the air, to a position that would, hopefully, leave her driving on two wheels. He'd demonstrated the process a dozen times, going over the concept thoroughly, including the ideal speed to reach just before hitting it, how to keep the car balanced, how to get it back on four wheels again without losing control, and now it was her turn to try it for the first time.

'I can't believe how quickly this is all going,' she thought to herself a little wildly, gripping the steering wheel hard and staring at the innocent steel construction a hundred metres away on the heat-shimmering tarmac. 'This morning I'd had a grand total of five driving lessons three and a half years ago, now I'm in Hollywood being taught how to get a car on two wheels, on purpose!' She shook her head a little, tightening her grip to the point she heard the steering wheel make a tiny sound of protest, which caused her to guiltily back off on the pressure before she broke something. With another glance at her instructor who nodded to her, apparently trying to be reassuring, the youngest Tendo took a deep breath, put the vehicle in drive, then began accelerating.

"Careful, keep the speed at the right point," Greg cautioned her as she went a little too fast. Backing off on the throttle she nodded tightly, aiming carefully. A few seconds later the front right wheel hit the ramp, the car jolting as it tipped hard over, then the rear wheel reached it. A moment later she was looking at the world at about forty-five degrees as the car shakily wobbled along, the left side a metre or more in the air. "Good, keep it steady, a little to the right..." He reached out and gently held the wheel, adjusting it slightly. The car wobbled more for a moment then stabilised. "Great. A little more gas..."

Unfortunately, in her combined nervousness about what she was doing and her exhilaration about actually doing it, she twitched the wheel the wrong way at exactly the wrong second just as she applied power. There was a horrible moment, almost like being weightless, then they could both feel the car tip past the point of no return. "Eep!" she squeaked inanely as it ponderously tipped further and further, sawing frantically at the wheel in a vain attempt to stop it.

It was no use. "Crapp," Greg yelped, as the car rolled onto the driver's side, then skidded across the lot with a scraping sound, both of them hanging on for dear life.

'Damn, I'm glad we weren't going faster,' Akane thought frantically as she watched sparks fly through the plastic side window which was flexing madly, coming loose a few seconds later and vanishing in pieces. Even knowing she could easily take it, regardless of the helmet and neck brace, it was something of a shock. After a few tens of metres the car slid to a halt, slewing sideways at the last moment, then teetered precariously before almost gracefully rolling even further until it was completely upside-down, rocking gently from side to side on its roof.

There was a very long pause.

Eventually, she turned her head to look at her compatriot, also hanging upside down, strapped securely in place with a resigned expression on his face.

"Sorry," she said in a small voice.
He made an inverted shrug. "It happens. That's why the cars don't last long. And why there's a roll cage." Giving her a small smile he added, "You've been doing very well up until now. Don't worry about it. We'll get the truck out, pull the damn thing back onto its wheels, then have another try."

Embarrassed, she nodded, then smiled back. "Oh, we don't need to get the truck. Hang on." Hitting the quick release for the harness she grunted a little as she ended up on her head on the roof, wriggled around for a moment until she was in the right position, then slithered out the window which was now empty of obstructions. His verbal objections to her sudden disappearance she ignored as she studied the car for a moment then reached down to grab the roof over the mid-point of the roll-frame attachment, lifting steadily. The car was soon back on its side so she repositioned herself and pushed. It dropped back onto the wheels with a solid crunch, bouncing a little on the shocks. Walking around the vehicle she inspected it, not seeing anything that looked seriously out of place, although there were some fresh dents, the driver's wing mirror was missing, and the left side of the car seriously needed new paint. Looking around she found the mirror a few metres back and ran over, picked it up, then returned to the vehicle.

The door seemed stuck when she tried the handle, requiring a fairly hard pull to open, which produced a protesting metallic groan. Getting back in she tossed the mirror into the back seat then fastened her harness again, reaching over and slamming the door shut, which took three attempts before it latched. "There we go," she said in satisfaction, turning the key experimentally. To her pleasure the engine, which had cut out when the car went inverted, started and ran perfectly after a couple of tries. "Should we reset for another go, Greg, or do you want to check the car first?"

When there was no answer she asked, "Greg?", turning to look at him. He was staring out the windscreen, his face blank, both hands gripping the dashboard like he was clamped there.

"Hey, Greg? Are you all right?" Akane peered at her instructor, worried. After a few seconds had passed with no response she waved her hand in front of his visor. "Greg?"

Eventually she shook her head, bemused and rather concerned, then carefully drove back to the garage and the other people who were watching. Shampoo and Aiko were leaning on each other laughing hysterically while Adrian was watching with vast amusement. Jim seemed resignedly pleased, and Matt was shaking his head, walking over to peer into the car when they stopped a couple of metres away. "I think there's something wrong with Greg," she said as she turned the engine off. "I'm not sure what, though, his helmet isn't damaged. But he's not saying anything and won't let go." Matt leaned on the car and giggled. Staring at him with irritation, she added, "Laughing isn't very useful, is it? He's your friend, help him! I don't know what to do."

Still giggling, Matt walked around to the other side of the car as she got out and followed, opened the door, then poked the driving instructor in the shoulder a few times. Eventually, very slowly, the man turned his head to stare at them, not saying anything. Thirty seconds or so passed then he reached down and released his harness, got out of the vehicle, looked at Akane, then the car, before turning away and walking into the garage past everyone else. He didn't say a word. A moment after he vanished into the dim interior the electric roller door ground into action, slowly descending until it stopped with a loud clank as the bottom edge touched the ground. Silence, broken only by Matt, Aiko, and Shampoo, who were all laughing like idiots, fell.

Bewildered, Akane stared at the garage, then looked around, trying to work out what the problem was. Giving the three laughing lunatics an annoyed glare she made her way over to Adrian. The director was leaning against the building, his shoulders shaking, obviously attempting not to burst out laughing as well. "What the hell is wrong with Greg?" she demanded, confused and not liking it. He inspected her for a moment before sliding limply down the building to sit on the ground, rocking back and forth as he lost it. She stared at him for a moment before sharing a glance with Jim, who shrugged, a wide grin on his face.
"Everyone has gone crazy," she muttered.

Reaching out he patted her comfortinglly on the shoulder. "Don't worry, Akane," he said, grinning. "We'll give him a while. I just think Greg's not used to it yet."

For some peculiar reason the comment made Aiko and Adrian, particularly, howl with renewed mirth. Shaking her head in irritated despair Akane wandered off to sit in the shade while waiting for everyone to regain their sanity, taking her helmet off and wishing she had something to eat. She was getting hungry.

Adrian found Greg sitting in his office in the vehicle depot, a very small glass of spirits in front of him on his desk. The man was staring at it with slightly glazed eyes. Walking over the director picked up the bottle next to the glass, examining it for a moment. "Balvenie 21 year old single malt," he commented, raising an eyebrow, then unscrewing the cap and taking an appreciative sniff. "The good stuff, definitely." He put the cap back and placed the bottle on the desk, discreetly out of reach. As far as he could see the glass in front of the other man was probably the only one used from the bottle.

After a few moments during which neither of them spoke, Greg reached out and picked up the glass, looked at it for a second or two, then sighed and put it down again. He looked up. "Martial artists?"

"Yep."

"With super powers?"

Adrian studied him, a small smile on his face. "Why would you think that?" he asked innocently. His colleague stared at him with an almost angry look mixed with total bewilderment on his face. Waving his hand vaguely in the direction of the parking lot, where the director had left the others, Aiko still snickering, Greg sighed deeply looking lost.

"That car weighs a solid two tons. That little slip of a girl just rolled it from its roof onto its wheels, by herself, without using anything other than her hands. That's impossible."

"She's pretty strong," Adrian admitted. He got a gimlet stare back.

"It's impossible," Greg reiterated. Leaning against a filing cabinet the director grinned at him.

"But...?"

After a long moment Greg groaned and rubbed his hands over his face. "But she did it. I don't know how she did it but she did it. She just got out, bent down, rolled the fucking car over like it was a... a... child's toy, or something, then got back in without a care in the world. Who the fuck are those women?" he said, almost pleading with his last words.

Taking pity on him, Adrian replied, "They're very unusual people, admittedly. Both of them are unbelievably good martial artists. Honestly, you wouldn't believe it if you didn't see it. They make anyone else we've ever seen look like an amateur. And they have some interesting talents apart from that, which seem to be the result both of some very unconventional training and enormous inherent talent." He shook his head a little in wonder as Greg hung on his every word. "Akane is incredibly strong, for a human never mind a woman. Rolling that car over is nothing. She could pick the damn thing up and throw it across the car park if she needed to." He shrugged as his colleague gaped in shock. "I haven't seen it but Aiko has. Honestly, I don't really have a good explanation as to how they can do it but they definitely can."

"Shampoo too?" the other man asked plaintively.

"She's not quite that strong, from what she says, but she's a little faster. And by faster, I mean both of them can punch you about two hundred times a second." Greg stared in disbelief. "I've seen it. You can't even see their hands move, it's just a blur."

"How...?" Greg looked lost again. He tried again, clearing his throat. "Where the hell do they come from? Mars?"

"Tokyo, actually, in Akane's case," Adrian chuckled. "Shampoo is from China originally although she lives in Tokyo these days as well."

"Are there more like them?"

The director grinned once more. "Yes, in fact there are. Aiko is much better than either of them as a martial artist, faster, stronger, and she can do all sorts of other weird things as well. But she's already got a job." Greg stared at him for a long time, then reached out without looking, fumbled around for the glass, picked it up, then brought it to his mouth and flipped the contents down his throat with a twist of his wrist. Swallowing he blinked a few times.

"She and her friends are pretty amazing, even to Akane and Shampoo," Adrian smiled. "And there are a couple of them, Yori and Chou, who are much better even than that. I mean, unbelievably better. Nice girls as well."

"How do they...?" Greg seemed to run out of words but Adrian got the gist of his question. He laughed a little.

"Magic, basically. They're magical girls, sort of freelance community defenders in Japan. For some weird reason there's lots of them there. I looked into it after I met Yori and the others back around the New Year, they turned up here with a friend of Jim's on a tour of the studio. There was an accident and they saved several lives." He shrugged a bit. "I reacted even worse than you did in some ways. It was pretty unbelievable. One thing led to another and eventually Yori ended up giving the card I gave her to Akane, who always wanted to go into the movies. They came over, did a demonstration for us, which was amazing, we took it to Mitch, now they're over for a second round of demonstrations and trials. I'll show you the tapes of the martial arts demonstration if you want." He studied his colleague for a few seconds. "You going to be OK?"

"Not really, but I can deal, I think," Greg admitted. He shook his head in wondering disbelief. "Magic, for god's sake?"

"Yep. It's very impressive." Adrian laughed. "For example, if you want instant proof, keep an eye on Aiko. She can teleport. She's their group's main transportation method I think. Akane and Shampoo are being brought back and forth by her from Tokyo, they haven't used a plane yet."

"You're joking."

"Nope." He snickered. "I've been to Nerima, the part of Tokyo they come from, courtesy of Aiko myself. It's... unusual. But a very fast way to travel."

Greg stared for a moment then closed his eyes and shook his head. A few seconds passed in silence. "You've really screwed up my world view, you know."

"Sorry."
After another silence the driving expert asked, "Do Akane and Shampoo use magic?"

"No, as far as I can work out it's not that. I'm not sure what it is but both of them say they don't use magic at all. Shampoo knows a few spells, I've seen her light a candle without touching it just by mumbling something and snapping her fingers, but she says they're just tricks. Her great grandmother, who is about three hundred years old by the way, is apparently a good mage though." At his companion's disbelieving expression he laughed. "Honest. I've met her. She claims she met George Washington once. For some reason I didn't think she was making it up."

"Holy shit."

"We thought the same thing," Adrian snickered. "Japan is a very odd place, at least around Nerima, and apparently a place called Minato which is where Aiko and her friends come from is even weirder in some ways. It was something of an eye-opener. There are all sorts of things I never believed in for a second that seem to be true." He shrugged, pushing off from the filing cabinet. "I'm assured that eventually it seems pretty normal, despite how weird it is at the moment."

Studying the other man for a moment he asked, "You up to getting back to teaching?"

With one last, mildly longing, glance at the bottle of whiskey, Greg finally nodded, standing up and following the other man out of the office and across the garage floor. "You do know, I hope, that one day I'm going to work out how to get you back for dropping me into all this insanity?"

Adrian chuckled. "You're welcome to try. Don't upset Akane or Shampoo in the process, though. Or they might pick up your car and throw it at you."

Shaking his head wearily the instructor followed the director out into the sunlight, wondering why he'd bothered to get out of bed that morning if this was the sort of thing that was waiting for him at work. Even by the standards of the movie industry, which were odd at the best of times, it was a little excessive.

"Hello, my dear. How are things going?"

Smiling, leaning against the building in a shady spot next to Aiko and Matt, while she watched Shampoo driving around on two wheels grinning madly, Akane laughed for a moment at her father's question.

"Very well, actually, Dad. There have been a few odd moments but it's mostly great. The demo for the studio executives went really well, Adrian and the others were extremely pleased as far as I could tell. Aiko stayed to help us like she did last time which was really useful, it made it look a lot more professional." She glanced at the brunette who smiled a little, also watching the Amazon while talking very softly to the stunt director. Beyond them she could see Adrian and Jim discussing something, the latter pointing at the car while gesturing with his other hand to illustrate some point. "It was a hell of a lot of fun, too. Adrian set up a really good practice course in this huge building, one of the sound stages they've got half a dozen of at the studio here. It's enormous, at least twice as high as the Dojo and probably about a couple of dozen times the floor area. They had a maze of fence panels, lots of big crates set up to give a sort of set of buildings, targets for Shampoo to shoot at, lots of blocks and thick wood, everything we needed."

Laughing at her excited tone, Soun sounded very pleased. "I can tell you're enjoying yourself, daughter. I haven't heard you this happy for a while. It's very nice to hear I must say."

"Thanks, Dad. It's wonderful so far. I wish you could see it."
"Perhaps I can at some point. I'm sure Aiko wouldn't mind bringing us all over assuming you get the job, which I have no doubt you will." Glancing again at the magical girl Akane smiled to herself momentarily.

"That would be nice. Everyone is being very supportive, and Adrian is sure as well. So is Richard Harrison, he said some very nice things about us both this morning. We went out with him and his family, Aiko, and the studio people to a really good restaurant last night." She proceeded to fill him in on their activities over the last twenty four hours.

"Nabiki sounded pleased as well when I called her this morning," she added at the end.

"She called just now to say hello and mentioned that, yes," her father told her, sounding amused. "Apparently you still have difficulty working out how time zones work."

Snickering, Akane nodded a little, remembering how her sister had sounded rather sleepy. "I forgot," she replied. Looking at her watch she made a quick calculation. "It should be about eight in the morning there if I'm doing it right," she commented. "It's just after four PM here now."

"Yes, that's correct," he confirmed. "How late will you be working tonight?"

Looking over at Adrian she frowned slightly. "I'm not entirely sure," she admitted. "Adrian has quite a lot of plans and things for us to do but I think he's moving them around in his head as he sees what happens. I'd guess we're probably going to be at this for another hour or so, that would give Shampoo about the same time in the car as I've had. Greg is teaching us each a set of moves and skills, one at a time, then testing us on them, alternately. So far it's going very well." A muted chuckle from the woman near her made her grin. "Mostly. Although there have been a couple of weird things."

"It would be unusual if there weren't," Soun joked, sounding very amused. "Considering who you are and who you're with."

She laughed for a few seconds, fully agreeing with the comment. "Oh, I know that, I'd be getting worried if everything went completely to plan. It would mean that something even weirder was going to happen." She told him about the earlier minor issue with an upside down car and the driving instructor's reaction, which she still found slightly over the top, but having had it explained could see the funny side of. Her father, by the end of the explanation, sounded like he was at the point of falling over from laughter.

"Oh, my dear, that's fantastic. That poor man. I can see why it might come as a shock to people who weren't used to what we in Nerima think of as normal, or at least not all that unusual," he chortled. She could picture him wiping tears of laughter from his eyes, the image making her grin again, missing him for a moment quite severely. "Americans especially would be a little... startled... I suspect. They do seem to have that reaction based on the ones I've met," he added after a moment's louder laughter. "Mind you, Adrian and his friends seem to have come to grips with it admirably rapidly."

"I think Adrian is having a hell of a lot of fun not telling anyone in advance what's going to happen," she giggled, watching the director as he watched the car on the tarmac with a broad approving smile, an expression he'd been wearing for most of the day. "He seems to be enjoying himself as much as we are."

"I found him a very interesting person to meet," her father noted. "You two were very lucky to be introduced to him. I suspect your relationship with the man will bring you all good things and a lot of entertainment."
"I think so too," Akane agreed. Fifty metres away Shampoo again hit the ramp, popping the car back onto two wheels with less effort this time, her fourth attempt. "It's really nice to be able to use my skills for something I always wanted to do. I owe Yori a lot for that. I hope I can repay her somehow one day." Aiko glanced at her, smiling a little, before going back to her conversation, but she got the impression the brunette was approving of the sentiment and somehow quite amused by it at the same time.

"She strikes me as someone who remembers people and what they do for each other very well, but isn't concerned about it, so I doubt you need to repay her," Soun told her. "I suspect she's be pleased if you did but not at all offended if it never happened. That's not why she and her friends do what they do." His voice was thoughtful. "With the abilities I know they have, never mind the ones I suspect they haven't shown off, they could do almost anything they wanted, yet they spend their time helping other people for no other reason that I can see than that they feel it's the right thing to do. It's very honourable, indeed. I suspect their parents, if they even know about it, are very proud. I know I would be."

She smiled, laughing under her breath. "I can understand that, although I have a feeling that their parents may well not know. From what my magazines claim most magical girls are sort of secretive, even from their families. It's not all that surprising I guess. But I see what you're saying. Even so, I'd like to do something nice for them at some point. They've all done so much for our family and me personally."

"That they have," her father agreed readily. "We have much to be grateful for, your meeting them, even under the circumstances that caused it, was a wonderful thing." They were both silent for a moment, reflecting on the recent past.

"I hope Nabiki is having fun with Miki," Akane finally said. "She sounded happy and relaxed when I talked to her earlier."

"By what she said they're having a very good time. Apparently they're going swimming today at some sort of very elaborate facility near where Miki lives. It sounds very nice. You know how much your sister loves swimming."

"She's really good at it as well," the youngest Tendo smiled. "Much better than I'll ever be." She laughed for a moment. "She seems to have a good life now. No weirdness in it, just some good friends, something she's having fun doing, and probably a decent career soon. I'm very happy for her."

"As I am for both of you," Soun responded, an amused note in his voice again. She noticed idly that Aiko was grinning a little again, thinking Matt must have said something funny. "Although I wouldn't count weirdness out of her life just yet. She is a Tendo and a native of Nerima, after all." He laughed as she sighed a little.

"Dad, she's the most normal one of all of us," the young woman said, shaking her head. Aiko, beside her, was grinning more widely but still chatting to Matt. "I very much doubt that anything strange will happen in a career in accounting or business or whatever she ends up doing. She'll just make a lot of money and enjoy herself in the process."

"Perhaps," the distant Tendo patriarch commented, not sounding entirely convinced, yet still apparently in good humour. "Perhaps not. Remember, daughter, you have a limited ability to plan your life completely. Trust me on this. Reality has a way of causing you to have to change your plans a lot sometimes with little warning. Still, I expect that whatever either of you does, you'll do it superbly. All my daughters will rise to the top of their professions, whatever that ends up being, I have no doubt."
Thanks, Dad." Touched, Akane smiled again. "I'd better go, Shampoo is nearly finished and Adrian is waving to me. I'll see you in a few days."

"Have fun, take care, and give my best to Shampoo and Aiko, will you please?" Soun requested.

"I will. Bye, Dad."

"Goodbye, my dear," he chuckled, before hanging up. Flipping the phone shut she dropped it back into her pocket, before turning to the brunette who had stopped her conversation with the stunt director, both of them now looking at her.

"Dad says hi," she remarked, grinning at Aiko. "He'd like to come over some time, I think," she added. "Personally I suspect he just wants to give teleporting a try."

Aiko laughed as they walked back to join the others, while Shampoo drove over and parked, jumping out of the car and removing her helmet then shaking her hair out, looking very pleased with herself. "That's no problem, of course, Akane," the woman told her. "I'm more than happy to oblige."

"Thanks." They grinned at each other then turned their attention to the driving instructor who had gotten out of the vehicle as well and was studying them with interest.

Turning to the driving expert and ex racing pro, Adrian asked curiously, "So do you think?"

Running his hand through his short hair while watching Akane and Shampoo, who were both in the car again, practising a number of stunt manoeuvres with the Tendo woman at the wheel for the moment, Greg considered the question for a little while. Eventually he turned to the director with a sigh and a shrug. "They've learned a hell of a lot much faster than I'd have believed, I'll admit," he replied slowly. "Whether that's enough for this crazy stunt of yours I wouldn't want to say right now but it's a lot more possible than I thought when you came in." He shrugged again. "We'll have to see how much they remember tomorrow. There's more to teach them as well, of course, before they can pull it off, we'll need a lot more room for that."

"We're going out to the airfield tomorrow afternoon for some more instruction," Adrian told him. "That's where the stunt will be run Wednesday or Thursday, all the sets are pretty much ready to go right now. We've got a team going out to fix up the specific things we need for the scene in the morning."

"OK." Greg nodded. "Sounds good." He watched as the car spun twice, then straightened out into a normal attitude, before spinning again half way around in the other direction and going into reverse. Raising an eyebrow he was forced to admire the skill Akane was showing. "Not bad at all," he murmured. Adrian and Matt both laughed, watching as well. Jim was talking to Aiko, both of them seeming pleased.

"She's really picked it up, hasn't she?" the director enquired.

"She has. Both of them have, to be honest, I'm actually impressed. I wish that other stunt drivers I've trained were so good at listening to instructions." He smiled briefly. "You were right, they're both quick and eager to learn new skills. Whether that will be enough to make up for lack of experience I have no idea but we can certainly try and see what happens." The car stopped, both young women getting out and swapping positions before slamming the doors and roaring off again, Shampoo power-sliding the vehicle half-way across the car park before handbrake-turning, then coming back more slowly, weaving in and out of the traffic cones that had been put out to form a
"If they're as tough as they are strong, I guess that even if they do wreck they'll survive." He sighed a little, glaring at Adrian for a moment, the director meeting his look with a small grin. "I still haven't forgiven you for that, you know, Adrian. I nearly had a heart attack when that girl rolled the car back like that. You could at least have warned me for Christ's sake."

"Would you have believed me?" the other man asked in a reasonable voice. Greg opened his mouth with his hand up, thought for a second, then closed it again, lowering his hand and sighing faintly.

"No."

"There you go, then." Adrian looked amused. Aiko was snickering from beside him.

"It's a lot to take in, Greg," she commented sympathetically, giving him a look, "but all in all you're doing pretty well. But you have to admit your reaction was very funny. Your expression was hilarious." Matt and Jim began laughing again at this. He frowned at her for a moment or two before, somewhat grudgingly, smiling slightly.

"I guess it was. It was... kind of a shock."

"Fair enough. But you're over that, now, I hope?" He shrugged again, turning back to watch the car the two young women were driving.

"More or less. But, I still..." He trailed off in shock as he watched a young man, wearing an absolutely huge backpack, his dark hair kept out of his eyes with a bandanna, casually walk out from between the garage and the sound studio next to it, his gaze locked on a large map he was unfolding, heading straight across the car park mere yards from where Shampoo was driving. She was looking over her shoulder at the last cone which she'd come so close to it was wobbling and didn't see the fellow as he stepped in front of her. "Holy shit!" Greg shouted in surprise. "Hey! Watch out, you idiot!" he yelled at the top of his voice, cupping his hands around his mouth, while beside him the others made various noises of surprise. It all happened so quickly he couldn't see any way that the imminent accident wouldn't occur. At his call the man looked up, turning his head to peer over his shoulder, unfortunately looking away from the direction that contained an oncoming vehicle doing about thirty miles an hour.

"God," Jim squeaked as the car struck the man squarely. Adrian fainted, Greg noticed absently out of the corner of his eye, while Matt took a step forward, his hands up as if he could somehow drag the poor fool out of danger, but it was far too late for that. He also noted that for some warped reason Aiko was laughing furiously.

What happened next made all the studio people, the conscious ones at least, stop dead and gape.

The car slammed to a halt like it had hit a telephone pole, with similar results as the radiator got pushed right back into the engine compartment, the hood crumpling up as well. A horrible metallic crash sounded, accompanied by various scraping noises, then as Greg closed his eyes, it went quiet. "Oh, fuck," he moaned, opening them again, then staring in disbelief.

The young man, who looked to be in his early twenties, had dropped his map but other than that looked more or less undamaged, all the more impressive considering he was still standing no more than a yard from where he'd been, the front of the car wrapped around him. Looking both annoyed and guilty he pushed against the vehicle, which had stalled and was obviously beyond repair, making it scrape loudly as it slid backwards a little, oil and coolant forming a puddle around his feet. They all watched, Aiko still giggling, as he brushed himself down as if he'd only had someone... flick sand at him, before bending over, picking his crumpled map off the ground, then walking around to the passenger side of the car. He bent down to look in the window, his mouth opening, then froze. Greg could see him go completely white from twenty-five yards away.

"RYOGA!" came a scream of rage from inside the vehicle. The door exploded completely off the side of the vehicle, catching him in the face, as Akane got out having apparently not bothered to remove her harness judging by the way the straps were still hooked over her shoulders, the ends flapping loosely behind her. Looking terrified the man peeled the door off his head, dropped it to the ground, then stared in horror. Akane stomped slowly towards him, her hands clenching and unclenching, while behind her Shampoo exited the remains of the vehicle in a more traditional manner, pulling her helmet off to reveal a very annoyed and somewhat worried expression. She watched as her friend screamed rapid Japanese at the young fellow who was still as white as a sheet, backing away from the furious woman.

"Oh, this is fantastic," Aiko snickered quietly, watching intently. "What are the odds?" Greg glanced at her in stunned amazement before going back to watching the scene playing out in front of them.

After a thirty second lecture, during which the girl had ended up glaring at the young man's face from about six inches away, shouting at him in fury, he began backing away faster and faster. She kept hurling invective after him, various insults making Aiko laugh again, shaking her head in respectful amusement. "You'd better run, Pig-boy!" Akane yelled in English as the fellow turned and broke into a dead sprint, ripping her helmet off and flinging it accurately and at very high speed at him, causing it to shatter on impact with his legs. He yelped and accelerated, dropping his map in the process, before vanishing around the corner of the sound stage warehouse that ran along the back of the parking lot. Staring after him with her fists clenched Akane breathed hard for a few seconds before turning away with a sniff, flipping her hair out of her eyes, then inspecting what was left of the car. Shampoo was leaning on the roof grinning, apparently now merely amused.

Picking up the door that was lying in a crumpled heap on the ground, an impression on the outside of it that was a fairly good replica of the young man's face, she shoved it into the open passenger side then nodded to Shampoo. The Amazon moved to the rear of the car while the youngest Tendo woman went to the front, then both of them picked the vehicle up, the sight making Greg hiss in shock, carrying it back to the garage where they put it down again. Akane looked sadly at the wreck before walking around it to talk to Shampoo, the others watching with various expressions. Still intermittently chuckling to herself Aiko knelt down and poured some water from a bottle over Adrian's head to revive him, making him sputter a little then sit up, rubbing his face.

"What the hell just happened?" Greg queried weakly, still watching Akane and Shampoo talk next to the remains of his car. The brunette stood up again, grinning.

"Ryoga is, how shall I put it...?" She snapped her fingers. "An idiot, that's it. One that has a long and sordid history with Akane. He's a martial artist as well, in all truth a very good one, but he's also got some pretty serious personality issues, plus the worst sense of direction on the planet." She shrugged, shaking her head. "No one has the faintest idea how he does it, least of all him, but he can walk into a closet and not come out again. He'd get lost in a phone booth if you welded the door shut. He's also got an irritating habit of turning up in the weirdest places, generally when it would cause the most trouble. Kind of odd even by my standards. It's not teleportation like I do, or portals, or anything else anyone can work out." She looked over at Akane, who was pointing at the front of the car with a sour expression, Shampoo laughing at whatever she'd said.

"I'm actually impressed she only yelled at him. She's tried pretty hard to kill him twice before, and came damn close at least once. He's been warned off going anywhere near Tokyo ever again by someone who you tend to listen to but he still turns up every now and then, normally running like a bastard when he figures out where he is. "The young woman chuckled. "Her anger management therapy has worked amazingly well but under the circumstances one can forgive her for getting a little annoyed."

Greg nodded somewhat helplessly, not entirely sure he understood any of this. Matt and Jim were helping Adrian to his feet. The director looked around wildly for a moment, then focussed on the remains of the car. "Oh, god, did they kill him?" he squeaked in horror, apparently not having listened to what Aiko was saying. She patted him comfortably on the shoulder.

"He's fine, Adrian. Relax. Akane shouted at him for a while then he ran away. Pity about the car, though." Looking puzzled he stared at her, then turned to the two other woman who were attending.

"I'm really sorry about the car," Akane said as she neared with Shampoo, who sighed. "Shampoo didn't seem him in time and I didn't grab the wheel fast enough."

Everyone looked at the remains of the vehicle, which had more or less bled out by this point, all the various fluids leaking from it now only dripping a little. "No use to anyone now," she added sadly.

"Don't worry, like I said, they get replaced a lot," Greg finally said, shaking his head in wonder. He half-grinned, half-grimaced. "Admittedly not normally due to hitting some weird kid, but we've got plenty of spares." He turned to Adrian who was still looking a bit shaken. "That said, I think that's probably enough for today." The director nodded slowly, casting one last glance at the wrecked vehicle, then turning to the others.

"I think you're right." Adrian looked at his watch for a moment. "It's just after five now so it's a good time to stop regardless."

"Good. I need another drink, I think," the driving instructor sighed. He reached out with his hand to the two women, who shook it in turn. "It was an experience meeting you, ladies."

Laughing slightly Akane smiled at him. "Thanks very much for all the instruction, Greg. It was a lot of fun. And I'm sorry if we've caused you any problems."

"It's not your fault," he replied with a smile of his own, casting a hard glance at Adrian to make it obvious whose fault he thought it was. The other man grinned.

"Was good fun. Thank you," Shampoo told him, also smiling. "Sorry again about car. Stupid Ryoga very tough, like hitting rock."

"I still can't believe that," Matt commented, staring at the destroyed vehicle. She followed his gaze.

"Pity. Liked driving it."

"It can stay there until the morning," Greg noted as they all walked over to look at it. "I really can't deal with moving it tonight. I'll get some of the guys to strip it for parts tomorrow then we'll scrap what's left." He looked around at the other people present. "I'm going home, getting pleasantly drunk, then having an early night. I think I deserve it after the last few hours."

They all laughed. "Thanks, Greg. We'll be going out to the airfield tomorrow around noon, I think," Adrian told him, shaking his hand.
"OK." He looked at them all again, shook his head, then wandered off, wondering what the next day was going to bring. Whatever it was, he expected it would be weird.

"Thanks for the lift, Adrian," Akane said as they stopped outside the hotel. The director smiled at her as he turned to look at her, then Shampoo in the rear seat.

"No problem," he replied with a laugh. "I'll come by tomorrow about the same time as today, traffic permitting. It should be fun."

"Looking forward to it," Shampoo grinned. "Was lots of fun today for sure."

He chuckled, shaking his head. "That friend of yours was certainly a surprise," he snickered. Akane groaned, rubbing her forehead.

"No friend of mine. He's a damn nuisance at best. Oh, well, we probably won't see him again." She pulled the map he'd been carrying out of her pocket, having retrieved it earlier. "And as usual he had absolutely no idea where he was. This is a map of Moscow." Adrian burst out laughing, the young women joining in for a few seconds.

"What a very unusual young man," he finally said. She nodded, looking amused and annoyed.

"That's a good description." Opening the door she got out, the Amazon joining her on the sidewalk, then both of them closed the doors. "See you in the morning," she called with a wave, Adrian waving back, then pulling away. They watched the car as it rejoined the main road, glanced at each other, then went into the hotel, nodding to the desk clerk on the way. He wasn't Helen, Akane noted with a smile. The man nodded politely back as they passed, heading for the elevators.

"What do you want to do now?" Shampoo asked as they ascended. "It's still pretty early, only about six or so."

"I'd like to try that hot tub, I think, then get something to eat. We could try out the restaurant, Adrian said it was good." Akane looked at her watch. "Maybe half an hour in the hot tub and a few minutes in the sauna? We'd be downstairs again by seven."

"Sounds like a plan," the Amazon replied, leading the way as the doors opened. She stopped outside her room. "Afterwards we could go out and look around some more. Maybe call Aiko and see if she wanted to come."

"We could do. In fact, why don't we invite her to the restaurant. We could have a private celebration of a good day and give her a meal as thanks for all her help." Akane smiled as Shampoo nodded, looking approving.

"I think that's a good idea. OK, I'll meet you in a few minutes after I have a quick shower." The lilac-haired girl disappeared into her own room, Akane entering hers and closing the door, going into the bedroom then tossing her bag onto the bed as she walked past before stopping at the window and looking out at the view for a moment.

'What a day,' she mused, smiling to herself. 'Learning to drive was huge fun. I still can't believe how much we were taught. Greg is a really good instructor although he looked a little shocked a lot of the time.' She giggled at the memory of his expression. In retrospect she could see the funny side of her little car on its roof event although she'd been completely lost at the time as to why he reacted like that. Heading back to the bathroom she undressed then got in the shower, sighing in pleasure at the hot water. A few minutes later she got out and quickly dried herself, putting her swimsuit on, then a hotel robe over it. She sat on the bed for a moment looking around the room with a contented feeling. 'It's going well. I hope tomorrow goes as well as today did. Without the damned pig, though.' The memory of Ryoga turning up out of nowhere made her sigh. It had come as a shock although not as large a one as she might have expected. The guy did have a habit of appearing at the most annoying moment.

"Oh, well," she mumbled out loud, getting up again and heading for the door carrying a rolled up towel, "with any luck he won't be back for months. Ever, ideally." Making sure she had her keycard and phone in her pocket she left the room, reaching Shampoo's door just as it opened. The Amazon exited her room dressed in a similar manner to Akane, smiling when she saw her friend.

"I like these robes," she commented as she pulled her door closed. "Should we steal some?"

Laughing, Akane accompanied the other woman up to the top floor. "We can probably buy them from the hotel, I think I saw some in the little shop thing they have in the lobby." When they reached the roof they walked out onto it, looking around. Half a dozen guests were swimming in the pool, with only one person, a middle-aged woman who looked a little frazzled, in the hot tub. She was lying back with her head on the side, her eyes closed, obviously trying to relax after a hard day. "What do you want to do first, the sauna or the tub?" Akane asked. Shampoo shrugged after a few seconds thought.

"Let's try the tub for a few minutes, then the sauna, then back in the tub." She looked around quizzically. "I wonder if they have a cold plunge pool. Those are good after a sauna."

The youngest Tendo sister shivered at the thought, making the other woman grin. "Ick. I'm not sure about that."

"It's great. You get really hot, then really cold, then really hot again. Sorts you out nicely." Both of them took their robes off, folding them and putting them on a pair of deck-chairs near the hot tub along with their towels, before easing into the hot water. The other occupant opened one eye at the disturbance, smiled tiredly at them, then went back to dozing. "Ow. This is really hot," Shampoo added, slowly sliding down to a sitting position near a jet of bubbles.

"It's nice," Akane replied, leaning back and relaxing. "Oh, that's better," she sighed as the heat made her muscles loosen.

They lay in the water in silence for a few minutes, then idly began discussing the day, going over the various things they'd done and trying to guess what the next day would bring. Eventually, after twenty minutes or so, the two of them somewhat reluctantly pulled themselves out, picked up their things, then went into the sauna. The dry heat quickly left them bone dry again, just before they started sweating heavily. It was about sixty degrees centigrade in the hot room which had three or four people in it, all looking like they were melting. "Wow. This is a lot hotter than the tub," Akane noted, wiping sweat off her forehead. Neither of them could stand it for more than five minutes.

Exiting, Shampoo looked around, then headed to an alcove in the corner of the room, which proved to contain a shower fed with ice water. She jumped in and pressed the button that turned it on, squealing in shock at the sudden abrupt temperature change, before smiling at her friend. Akane watched in horror, shaking her head slowly. Getting out the Amazon waved at the facility. "Try it, it's good," she said, laughing.

"No thanks," the youngest Tendo said, backing away. Laughing, Shampoo put her hand into the stream and flicked cold water at her friend, who squawked in shock. "Hey, that's cold," she yelped.

"That's the point," Shampoo told her, fairly reasonably. They went back to the hot tub and soaked for another ten minutes watching the sun set behind the buildings in the distance before finally drying off and heading back downstairs.

"I'll call Aiko," Akane said as they reached their rooms. "Meet downstairs at seven?"

"OK."

Inside her room, she showered again, brushed her hair, then got dressed in stretch jeans and a nice top, sitting in a chair by the window in the living room and looking out the window at the LA skyline, its lights glittering in the early evening darkness. Wondering if she should call home she decided in the end not to, leaving it until tomorrow. Pulling out her phone she dialled Aiko.

"Hi, Akane. What's up?" the magical girl replied after a couple of rings, sounding in a good mood. Which, to be honest, was pretty normal, she was a very upbeat sort of person.

"Hi, Aiko. Shampoo and I are going to have a meal in the restaurant here in the hotel at seven, we were wondering if you'd like to join us? Our treat. As thanks for all the help today if nothing else."

"That would be very nice. Thank you." Aiko laughed softly. "You don't have to think you owe me anything but I'll happily accept. I like eating. Not as much as Misaki or Yori, of course, but still..."

Akane giggled at the comment. "We'll meet you there, then, in about twenty minutes?"

"Sure. I know where your hotel is, Adrian told me the address today. See you soon." The brunette hung up, Akane dropping the phone into her pocket, then reaching for the remote control and turning the living room TV on. Flipping through the channels she stopped on the local news, near the end of the program.

"...ilar if not identical to the rash of cases over the holiday period. In those cases, as in the most recent ones, a significant number of known violent gang members were found tied up, sometimes unconscious, with evidence of their crimes next to them. Police have no idea what was done to them, there was and is no medical explanation as to how the sixty-three young men and two young women in question were rendered unconscious, and an air of mystery surrounds the entire affair. Despite the irregularities in the apprehension of the suspects the LAPD was quick to place them in custody and it is note-worthy that there have been no legal challenges to the arrests. Indeed, all the suspects were apparently quite willing, if not in fact eager, to be arrested and charged, most of them confessing to a number of crimes other than the ones the evidence found adjacent to them would indicate."

Akane listened with interest, wondering what the cause of all this was. It sounded a bit peculiar.

"Most of the suspects appear to have developed a near-pathological fear of young women in skimpy clothing, more than one of them allegedly actually screaming in terror and running back into the police station when released on bail and encountering the subject of their phobia. Psychologists we interviewed are baffled, stating only that some peculiar trauma must be involved, although they were disinclined to go on record discussing the subject without further information. Street crime in a number of the areas plagued by the gangs these suspects were members of plummeted immediately after the holiday period cases and stayed low for months, only recently beginning to rise once more. It seems likely that the events of last night may have a similar effect. LAPD sources seem amused if anything, stating only that they are pleased to have increased the crime clear-up rate by a significant amount and not commenting on speculation as to the source of the cases."

She shook her head in wonder, watching the report.
"So far in the last twenty-four hours a total of seventeen suspects have been discovered. We will continue to investigate the issue and bring you updates as they come in. This is Phil Hatfield, reporting for KTLA News from Hollywood. Now, back to the studio for the weather."

Watching the weather report for a moment, which was forecasting another hot and sunny day tomorrow, the youngest Tendo got up, turning the TV off before looking out the window. 'Strange place, Hollywood,' she mused, smiling a little, then headed out to meet Shampoo and Aiko in the restaurant.

"Adrian was right, that was an excellent meal," Shampoo stated with a satisfied air, leaning back in her chair and sipping her coffee appreciatively.

"Very nice indeed," Aiko agreed, motioning to the waiter for a refill, which he quickly obliged her with. Giving him a smile which he returned she also drank some, putting the cup down and looking across the table at the other two. "So, how are you feeling after today?" she asked.

Akane looked at the Amazon next to her, then back at the magical girl, who was waiting with a mildly amused expression. "Still sort of stunned by how fast everything is suddenly going, but on the whole, pretty pleased," she summed up after some thought.

"More or less the same," Shampoo agreed with a smile. "I think it went really well. Poor Mitch looked... quite surprised... but he seemed happy enough, Jennifer was a little shocked, and I thought Anton was going to have some sort of seizure from sheer joy at one point." She giggled a little. "I don't think I've ever seen anyone look so pleased."

Akane and Aiko both laughed. "It was very funny," the brunette snickered. "You won him over in about five seconds. From what Adrian said he wanted to be convinced anyway, which you managed damn well. Congratulations on a successful day. And on keeping your temper surprisingly well when a certain pig turned up." She saluted both of them with her coffee-cup.

"Thanks. And thanks again for all the help." Akane grinned at her. "Are you sure you don't mind spending all this time in LA?"

"No, it's no problem at all," Aiko smiled. "Things at home are surprisingly quiet at the moment. LA is an interesting place, plenty to see and do, and I'm having a lot of fun watching. I can get back whenever I need to anyway so it's not like it's much trouble. That said, I've got a couple of things I'll have to get on with tomorrow morning but I'll turn up later, if that's OK with both of you."

"Fine with me," Shampoo laughed, Akane nodding beside her.

"Maybe you should see if Adrian is all right with letting Serena and Sophie come and watch one of your practice stunts, if their parents will let them," the brunette suggested after a few more sips of coffee. "They'd probably love that. They're both on the school holidays at the moment."

"We can certainly ask him. I don't mind. They're nice girls."

"OK, we can ask tomorrow, then," Akane stated, finishing her coffee. Looking at her watch, she added, "It's only just after eight fifteen now, still pretty early. What should we do?" They all looked at each other.

"Go and look around town some more?" Shampoo queried. "Is anything still open?"
Aiko laughed for a moment. "Pretty much everything is still open. LA doesn't close early. Or, certainly, the Hollywood area doesn't as far as I can see. There's lots of things to see even in the middle of the night."

"We could go for a little shopping, then, if they're open," Akane smiled. "I need to get presents for everyone at home."

"Perhaps see what sort of night-life there is as well," Shampoo mused. "I haven't been to a club in months."

"Why don't we travel in style, then," the Tendo woman grinned, pulling out her phone and scrolling through the numbers in the memory, before selecting one. "Adrian said they use this limo company all the time." She hit the connect button and put the phone to her ear. Aiko watched with an amused expression.

"You know I can take us in seconds, right?" she asked, giggling. Akane nodded, laughing a little.

"I've always wanted to ride in a limo. Let's indulge." The phone rang a couple of times then a professional-sounding voice came to her ear.

"Limos Extreme Hollywood, this is Martin. How can I help you tonight?"

"Oh, hello, I was wondering if I could book a car for three people, please? My name is Akane Tendo, you were recommended by Adrian Stewart from Mountain Picture Studios."

"Hello, Ms Tendo," the man said. "Certainly. Mr Stewart told us you might be using our services. Can I confirm your address?" She gave him the address of the hotel. "We can have a car there in fifteen minutes. Will that be satisfactory?"

"Yes, thank you. Um, how much will this cost, can you tell me?"

"Don't worry about that, Ms Tendo, it's covered by the studio. Just enjoy your night out and please call us again when you require our services." He sounded politely amused.

"Thank you very much," she replied. Disconnecting she put the phone away, looking at her friends. "Fifteen minutes, he said."

"How much?" Aiko asked curiously.

"Apparently the studio is covering it."

"Not bad. They're certainly treating you well," the brunette chuckled.

"I'll say," Shampoo replied, finishing her coffee and reaching for a cracker from the plate in the middle of the table, nibbling it with an amused smile. "I could get used to this sort of service." Aiko grinned at her, also taking a cracker.

"With any luck you will, pretty soon, I think," she laughed. "Although you should probably be careful not to spend everything as soon as you get it. I knew someone like that once, the amount he'd spend would basically be about twenty percent more than he earned, no matter how much he earned. That's not a good idea, sooner or later it catches up with you."

"We've been warned about that," the Amazon said, "Great-Grandmother was quite explicit about it."
"Wise woman, the Elder, from what I know," Aiko agreed. "So, are either of you planning on trying driving at home?" The two other woman exchanged glances.

"I really want to read the driver's manuals first," Akane told her, shaking her head. "And we've only driven an automatic transmission car so far, on the right side of the road. A manual transmission on the left side might be asking a lot at this point."

"It's easy enough, although you're right, it's also different enough it can catch you out." Aiko shrugged. "Not that I do a lot of driving, it's not like I need to, but I've learned how. Misaki is a very good driver, brilliant in fact, and the others aren't bad. Incredibly quick reactions make up for lack of experience to a degree." She grinned a little. "Even so, Tamiko isn't someone who should be let loose in a car. Very fast, but... kind of scary." They laughed at her expression. "She tends to get carried away."

"Can Yori or Chou drive?" Shampoo asked curiously. Aiko nodded.

"Yori can, certainly, very well, although again she doesn't do it often. None of us have cars. I know a few of the girls who do but most of us tend to stay fairly close to home for the most part and don't need them. Chou can drive pretty well too but has a lot less experience at it. What with portal travel, teleporting, and that sort of thing, it's never been very important."

Akane was intrigued. "Can any of the others teleport? I thought that was your special skill." Aiko giggled, nodding.

"Oh, it is, and I'm very pleased about it. I've been doing it for years. It's enormous fun aside from anything else. I'm probably the most travelled one of all of us, on this planet at least." They looked oddly at her making her laugh again. "Portals, you understand. Yori and Chou have been through them a lot more than the rest of us, they treat them like doors into another room. It's kind of weird even for me."

"OK," Akane nodded, her mind trying to grapple with the concept. Teleporting was odd enough but hopping back and forth through portals seemed a little excessive, bearing in mind that they went to places demons came from. Still, Yori and her partner were the sort of person who could take that in stride if anyone could.

"But that said, both of them have been studying my teleportation ability for years. Chou is pretty sure she'll work out how to do it sooner or later."

"That's amazing," Shampoo commented, fascinated.

"They're really good at deconstructing and improving complicated magic," the brunette replied. "Better than anyone else I know by a long way."

"I wish I could do something like that," the youngest Tendo sister sighed. Aiko smiled at her.

"Be happy about all the things you can do, which is a hell of a lot more than almost anyone else ever could. Magic isn't easy for most people and the magical girl stuff, while it brings a lot of perks, also tends to add a hell of a lot of chaos to your life. I personally love it but it's not for everyone. Your life is already pretty chaotic."

Shampoo laughed for a few seconds, shaking her head in agreement. "Oh, god, isn't it? I'd like to teleport as well, it would be really useful, but if it meant I ended up having to go up against the weird demons you guys do, well..." She shrugged, still grinning. "I can live without all that perfectly happily." Akane nodded vehement agreement from beside her, making Aiko in turn laugh.

"It's not ideal for most people, certainly. But it's often good fun." She thought for a few seconds. "When it's not completely terrifying or horrifically disgusting."

"Like Halleckton?" Akane watched as a cloud crossed the brunette's face at those two words, feeling suddenly guilty.

"Like Halleckton," Aiko agreed quietly. "I could have done without that."

Silence fell for a little while, the magical girl lost in her thoughts, while the other two exchanged worried glances. By her expression those thoughts weren't happy ones. Eventually, though, she shook her head slightly, her smile coming back although it looked a little haunted for a few seconds.

"Can't be helped. It's done with, we caught the bastard responsible, and it's out of our hands now." Her voice was soft and regretful. The youngest Tendo wondered, once again, exactly what had happened in a small town in Canada months ago, but decided that it might be for the best if she didn't know. Judging by the effect it had on Aiko, she though it would probably cause her sleepless nights.

"Sorry," she muttered. Aiko smiled at her.

"Don't worry. We've all learned to live with our memories. It was horrible, but like I said, it's all in the past now, so we move on. But, yes, to answer your earlier question, there are indeed bad parts to the magical girl life. That was a particularly nasty one." She looked up as one of the hotel staff approached, looking around for a moment before finding Akane and walking over.

"Miss Tendo? Your car is waiting outside."

Standing up Akane nodded her thanks, thinking quickly then discreetly slipping the young man a twenty dollar bill, folded tightly, as Adrian had demonstrated in the car that morning when she'd asked. It vanished as she shook his hand. "Thank you," she smiled, switching to English.

"No, thank you, Miss Tendo," he replied with a polite nod, turning and leaving. She glanced at her friends who both stood as well.

"Neatly done," Aiko giggled. "Have you practised?"

"No, but Adrian told us about tipping and the like this morning," she snickered as they left the restaurant, heading for the front door. "I'm impressed how smoothly he took it, there was no sign at all."

"They're very professional here," Shampoo laughed. "I'd guess they're even trained in accepting tips."

"Probably." Laughing, Akane led the way outside, stopping to inspect the long black car parked immediately in front of the main doors, a well-dressed and remarkably large middle-aged Hispanic man standing beside it waiting with his hands crossed in front of his body like something from a Yakuza movie.

"Ms Tendo?" he asked in a deep gravelly voice. She nodded, slightly awe-struck. Shampoo and Aiko exchanged an impressed glance.

"Yes, that's me."
"I'm Elias, I'll be your driver tonight. If there's anything you need please let me know and I'll do what I can to help." He opened the rear door and stepped aside. "If you'd like to enter the vehicle?"

Looking over her shoulder at the other two for a moment, she did as requested. As soon as they were all inside, he closed the door gently then got into the driver's seat. They looked around, inspecting the cavernous interior. "This is a little more over the top than I was expecting." Shampoo said quietly after finding a small refrigerator full of various snacks.

"Nice, though," Aiko grinned, opening a leather-covered bulge in the seat which turned out to contain a number of bottles of alcohol and some glasses. "Just like in the movies."

The dark glass window partitioning off the rear of the car from the driver slid down with a muted whine and they looked up to see Elias peering back at them. "Where to, ladies?" he asked politely.

"We're not sure, actually," Akane replied after looking at the others, who seemed perfectly content to allow her to be the spokeswoman. Aiko was engaged in sniffing the contents of the various decanters, settling on one that was half-full of a dark brown liquid that brought an impressed smile to her face, then pouring a small amount into a glass. Shampoo looked at it, then her, making her grin and hand it to the Amazon, pouring herself another one. "We were thinking of going to look around the area, perhaps do a little late-night shopping, then maybe find a club or something like that." He nodded slowly. "Can you suggest anything?"

"I believe so, Miss," he said after a moment's thought, turning back to the front and starting the car, which was virtually silent from the inside. "Do you wish to shop for clothes, jewellery, or souvenirs? Or perhaps something less common?"

Aiko looked up from sipping her drink, raising an eyebrow at it approvingly. "I could do with some new dresses, Fumiko was saying just yesterday that I hadn't got anything nice in months." Akane laughed, glancing at Shampoo, who shrugged.

"Clothes are a possibility, I think," she relayed to the driver, who nodded as he guided the large vehicle expertly down the drive and onto the main road.

"Certainly. In that case I have a number of possible destinations in the Hollywood area. Would you like me to take you to the first one? It will take about fifteen minutes."

"Thank you, Elias, that would be very nice," she responded.

"Of course. Please enjoy your trip." The partition slid upwards again with almost no sound.

"Do you think he can hear us?" she whispered after a moment, uncertain. Aiko looked up from examining the bottle again, tilted her head a little and appeared to listen, then shook her head.

"We're fine. I think you need to press that button there on the intercom beside you to talk to him," she replied, pointing to a discreetly positioned control panel in the midst of all the cream leather.

Slightly relieved, the youngest sister relaxed, looking around again. "Wow. This is like something from a movie. I wasn't expecting it to be so nice." Aiko handed her a glass with half a centimetre of liquid in the bottom, which she took and held for a moment. "And Elias seems very nice. Polite as well. He's like an American version of one of those English butlers you see in the movies."

"If butlers carried guns," Aiko snickered, making Akane and Shampoo stare at her in surprise.

"Really?" the Chinese woman asked curiously. She nodded.
"Yep. 9mm Glock 17 in a shoulder holster. His suit is tailored to hide it, which it does pretty effectively. Most people would never see it." The magical girl looked around with interest at the interior of the car as Shampoo and Akane exchanged a glance. "The car is lightly armoured as well, look how thick the windows are. I guess this company does a lot of business with people who might be worried about being shot at. I suspect Elias is probably pretty well-trained with his gun." She sipped her drink as Akane thought about that little fact, eventually trying her own glass.

"Gah." She coughed a little, making both Shampoo and Aiko giggle. "What is this?"

"A very nice ten year old brandy," Aiko replied, grinning. "About a hundred and twenty proof. I don't think you should have too much but it's a nice start to the evening." Shampoo sipped her own drink carefully, nodding after a moment.

"It's very good," she commented.

"Damn expensive, I think." Aiko looked at the bottle again then put it away, closing the mini bar. Tentatively, Akane tried another sip, finding it went down much more smoothly this time.

"I don't drink a lot," she said, sipping slowly. "But this is sort of nice. In small quantities."

"The best way to drink," Aiko laughed. "Too much and you just end up falling over."

"I've seen all to much of that," Akane sighed, finishing her glass and handing it back. "Poor Dad used to get drunk all the time. Uncle Genma too. Mainly on saké, of course, we couldn't afford brandy at the time. I guess we could now but neither one of them drinks that much any more. Which I for one am very glad about." She looked curiously at the brunette as the other woman nodded slightly, smiling. "Does alcohol affect magical girls like that?" she asked.

"Oh, yes, but admittedly not nearly as much as it does most people," Aiko chuckled. "I could drink this entire bottle and only get a little tipsy for half an hour or so at worst. Not that I would, even so, I like it but not that much. I prefer a good bottle of wine or some nice beer. Yori doesn't drink at all, she hates the taste if nothing else, but the rest of us do on occasion."

Amused, Akane smiled, then turned her head to look out at the scenery passing outside the window. "This is certainly a very civilised method of getting around," she giggled. "Slower than your way but very comfortable."

"It's fun," Shampoo laughed, rummaging in the fridge, finally surfacing with a packet of roasted peanuts, which she opened and began grazing on. "I've always wanted to go in a big limo too, I never thought I'd get to do it, though."

"Kodachi would go green if she saw us," Akane snickered. The Amazon burst out laughing, nodding. Glancing at Aiko, the Tendo woman explained, "Kodachi Kuno is an old... acquaintance..., I guess. Mad as anything, totally nuts, but a pretty good martial artist. Their family is rich, they've always tended to show it off, Kodachi more than her brother. But they don't have a car this nice as far as I know."

"I've heard of her," Aiko grinned. "Ms Aoyama mentioned she had an encounter with her a while ago. On the roof of the Tendo Dojo, in fact. She seemed slightly irritated about it." Akane felt herself pale. Across from her she could see Shampoo go still. "It's hard to tell with her but I got the feeling she wasn't entirely impressed with Ms Kuno." The brunette seemed very amused.

"Oh, god, even thinking about that woman makes me shiver," Akane finally responded, her voice trembling a little.
Aiko inspected her with a small smile. "I can understand that, I know her pretty well but she's not the sort of person you invite over for a drink."

"Not even close," Shampoo quavered.

"But, on the other hand, she seemed to like both of you, on balance," the magical girl continued, laughing a little at their shocked looks. "As much as she likes anyone. As I said, hard to tell."

"Likes us?" Akane finally gasped.

Shrugging, Aiko nodded, putting her empty glass away and closing the mini bar again. "Yep."

"But she terrifies us both whenever she turns up," the Tendo woman whispered, feeling cold. "She's absolutely horrifying."

"Oh, she is that, true enough. Trust me, she's not someone you'd ever want to annoy. Creepiest person I've ever met in my life. But, the critical thing is, she's also very, very smart, a good judge of character, and scrupulously honest." Aiko grinned at them, although there was a slight edge to her smile that made Akane think that she also found the woman in question quite worrying. "She did after all mention to Yori that she felt you were becoming very good at martial arts even for Nerima. She wouldn't have done that if she had a real problem with you." The young woman smiled again while Shampoo and Akane exchanged wondering glances. "For whatever reason she and her employers are taking an interest in you both above and beyond what they normally do."

"I'm not sure that's a good thing," Akane muttered.

"It's good as long as you don't disappoint them." Aiko looked at them both, smiling a little.

There was a long thoughtful silence. "What would happen if we did?" Shampoo finally asked. The brunette's smile faded.

After another few seconds, she replied, "It's probably best not to find out." Her face was serious. Shivering, Akane met Shampoo's eyes, in which she could see a similar trepidation to that which she was feeling. Aiko suddenly laughed. "Don't worry, you'll be fine. Just try not to let anything bad happen without a good reason."

Quiet fell again as two of the three occupants of the limo tried to settle their nerves. Aiko seemed mildly amused, watching the world go past, until the others finally recovered enough to push the entire thought to the backs of their minds. Eventually the limo slowed, then pulled over to the side of the street. The partition slid down again. "We're here, ladies," Elias announced. He got out, came around to the other side, then opened the door, just as Shampoo was reaching for it. "This establishment has a number of clothing suppliers which can cater for almost any style or price you might wish. It's open until half past eleven o'clock tonight." They all got out, looking around. The building they were in front of, on a street that seemed to have a significant number of high end cars driving around, looked like a discreetly expensive mall of some sort. Inside the glass doors they could see a corridor with quite a few shop fronts opening off to either side, brightly lit and glittering.

"Looks interesting," Aiko laughed. Akane nodded slowly, inspecting it curiously, then looked at the driver, who smiled faintly.

"Take as long as you need. I will be waiting in the car in the parking structure across the road when you require me again." He indicated the parking facility with one hand. "On the ground floor, at the rear." Handing her a card he tipped his hat to her politely. "When you need me to bring the car around please call that number." Nodding to them all he got back into the vehicle, which had been idling almost silently beside them, then indicated, performing a wide U turn that neatly ended up in the entrance of the parking lot, into which the vehicle disappeared. Akane watched, slightly stunned, then turned to her friends.

"Wow. Just... wow."

Shampoo giggled for a moment, shaking her head. "I didn't expect all the personal service," she commented, following as Aiko approached the doors to the shopping facility, looking very amused.

"I wonder how much the studio is paying for the car and the driver," the brunette laughed as she led them inside. "It's pretty obvious they're a lot more than a taxi company with some nice cars. I get the impression that if you needed to get rid of a body, Elias could probably arrange it fast and discreetly." Akane glanced at Shampoo, both of them bursting out laughing, before they all began looking through the various shops available.

"How about this one?" Shampoo pointed at a rack of silk blouses. Akane looked carefully at the emerald green one her friend was indicating, removing it on its hanger and holding it up to the light. "It looks like it would fit Nabiki."

"I think it would," the youngest Tendo mused, checking the label and converting clothing sizes from US measurements to Japanese ones in her head.

"Good material," Aiko commented, gently feeling the sleeve. "Very high quality silk."

"It's a colour she really likes as well," Akane noted. She checked the discreet price tag and paled slightly as she worked it out in Yen. "Not exactly cheap, though." Aiko looked and nodded.

"No, but it's very nice, this place has some really good stuff in it," she said, looking around. The saleswoman at the back of the shop seemed content to simply watch, although they all felt she would leap to attention if they were in need of help. It was fairly obviously a high-end boutique, not a mass market place. The prices if nothing else would prove that although as the magical girl had said, the quality of the goods on offer was very respectable.

"True. And I really should get her a nice present, she's been so helpful about all this." Weighing it up in her mind, the Tendo woman nodded sharply. "Right. I'm getting it." Carefully folding the top she put it with the few other items she'd found.

"Nice. OK, I'm going to check out that place over there, I'll see you in a little while," Aiko said, pointing across the corridor at another shop. They looked, then both the others nodded, going back to looking around. Aiko left while Shampoo pulled another blouse from the rack, holding it up against her chest and studying it.

"It's exactly the same colour as your hair," Akane giggled, inspecting the garment. Shampoo grinned.

"I like it. That's going on the pile."

Eventually they had enough in the way of purchases, heading to the counter. The woman behind it smiled as they approached. "Did you find everything you needed?" she asked politely.

"I think we did, thank you," Akane replied. She looked at the various small signs on the register. "Do you take Japanese credit cards?"
"Certainly, miss, we can accept Visa or Mastercard from all over the world. We have many international clients." Pleased that she wouldn't have to dip into the cash Adrian had given them, Akane pulled out her Visa card, thinking once again it was a good idea to have finally gotten one the previous year, at Nabiki's suggestion. Once more her sister had given good advice. She didn't use it all that often but it did come in handy now and then.

She looked at Shampoo for a moment. "I'll pay for everything with this, you can pay me back at home," she said.

"Thanks," her friend smiled, pleased.

Soon after, they left the shop with a couple of bags. Aiko was just coming out of the other shop, apparently empty-handed. "Did you get anything?" Shampoo asked curiously.

"Some very nice jeans and a dress," Aiko replied, looking at the bags they were carrying. "Do you want me to take those and keep them out of the way, like with the rest?" she asked. The two young women nodded, watching with interest as both the large bags they handed over disappeared without trace, as had the previous four with their other purchases.

"So. What next?" The brunette waited for them to decide, looking content and relaxed.

Looking at her watch Akane was surprised to see they'd spent nearly two hours just in the last three shops. "I'm pretty much shopped out, I think," she remarked. "I've got things for everyone at home and some nice stuff for myself." She glanced at Shampoo, who shrugged.

"I'm done, I think. I got a nice shirt for Mousse and some shoes that Great-grandmother should like, plus my own things. I can't afford too much more at the moment."

"In six months you could probably buy the shop," Aiko snickered. Shampoo grinned.

"Possibly, but right now, I'm pretty much tapped out."

"Why don't we see about some sort of club, then," Akane suggested. "I could do with a little music and some drinks."

"Sounds like a plan," Aiko agreed, Shampoo nodding as well. Pulling out the card Elias had given her, Akane dialled the number, then waited. It was answered on the third ring.

"Elias," came the reply in the driver's deep voice.

"Hi, Elias, it's Akane Tendo. We're finished here, we're just on our way outside."

"I'll have the car waiting, Ms Tendo," he assured her.

"Thank you," she replied, disconnecting and putting both phone and card away.

They made their way outside, looking left and right, to find the limo parked a few dozen metres down the road as there were several other cars immediately outside the shopping facility. A few people were wandering around looking in the shop windows. Turning to the left the three young women headed towards the car.

Ten metres from the vehicle, they passed a service alley which ran down to the rear of the shopping area. Akane noticed out of the corner of her eye that Aiko had slowed as she approached it, giving it a more than merely casual glance, making her sure that for some reason the magical girl was aware of something she wasn't. About to ask what it was, she instead twitched when a pair of young men in their late teens, one white and one black, suddenly jumped out of the darkness to land in front of them, waving knives. She stopped dead as did her friends, all three of them exchanging a slightly incredulous glance. Aiko didn't look surprised at all, which in turn didn't surprise the youngest Tendo. She'd probably been aware of the two since they left the shop, Akane thought to herself with amusement.

None of them reacted in the way that the two muggers were obviously expecting, which made the pair look at each other in a somewhat confused manner before they got back to the job in hand. "Hey, bitches, give us everything you have," the white one said aggressively, stepping forward and waving his knife in a manner that he probably believed was menacing. Akane thought it was sort of cute.

"Why?" she asked reasonably. He looked confused again.

"Because I'm telling you to," he finally said. His accomplice nodded from beside him.

"What he said," the other young man explained.

Akane, Aiko, and Shampoo all looked at each other again.

"And?" Aiko inquired, appearing politely curious. He seemed puzzled once more.

"And what?" he asked, staring at her.

"And why should we do what you tell us to?" The woman expanded on her comment. He thought hard for a couple of seconds.

"Because... we have weapons and you don't?" the youth finally tried, slightly questioningly. He glanced at his companion who firmly nodded back, then returned his attention to the women. Aiko shrugged.

"OK, I suppose that's a reason. Not a good one, admittedly, but a real one." Akane smiled to herself. The brunette sounded relaxed and amused. All three of them noticed Elias exit the car and walk up behind the muggers, making very little sound, and look quizzically at them. The Tendo sister made a tiny gesture to him to wait. With a small nod he held his position, watching alertly and silently.

"So, if I understand your position, the fact that you're armed and we're not means we should follow your commands and relinquish our possessions to you?" Aiko asked in an even tone, sounding more than a little like a very cold woman of their mutual acquaintance. The mugger looked extremely puzzled, turning to his co-worker, who shrugged helplessly.

"Um... What you talking about?" he spluttered. Aiko sighed, sounding mildly put-upon. Akane saw that they were beginning to draw a crowd, several people stopping and watching, although the muggers didn't seem to have noticed, caught up as they were in the attempted mugging which had somehow gone very wrong for them.

"I am simply trying to get the rules of engagement clear in my mind." This didn't seem to help. She dumbed it down some more. "I'm trying to work out what you want."

"Oh." He brightened up, waving the knife again. "We want all your stuff or we'll cut you."

"Ah. I see." Aiko rubbed her chin in thought while Akane and Shampoo giggled quietly. Behind the muggers Elias was listening and watching with a small smile, his right hand inside his jacket. "And you feel that because you have weapons and we don't that we'll do what you say."
"Exactly." The other mugger looked pleased that they finally understood.

"There's a problem with that, though," Aiko continued, making them look oddly at her. "I have a weapon. Several, actually. Does that mean I don't have to give you anything?" She was suddenly holding a pair of visibly glowing, razor sharp scythes. Both young men locked their eyes on the twinned kama, paling slightly as she expertly twirled them in her hands without looking, then made a viciously quick slicing motion with one that produced a nasty tearing-silk sound as it cut through the air. Elias raised an eyebrow but otherwise didn't move.

"No fair, Aiko," Shampoo commented with a laugh in her voice. "I no have weapon. Why you have all the fun?"

"Oh, sorry, Shampoo," Aiko replied, looking at the Amazon with a grin. She disappeared one of her kama for a moment, retrieving the sword she'd lent to the other woman during the demonstration that morning then tossing it to her. Shampoo caught it without looking at it, spinning it through a series of blindingly fast motions to end up with it in a guard position horizontally in front of her, taking a stance that showed she was ready to either attack or defend at a moment's notice. She grinned over it at the two muggers who were staring at her in horror.

"Now have weapon too. Not give anything to you, yes?" They nodded convulsively, swallowing hard. Behind them, Elias' other eyebrow had gone up and the smile had widened.

"Do I get a weapon?" Akane asked, putting her hands on her hips and looking at her friends with amused irritation. Both of the others shrugged. "Oh, be like that, then," she snarked, before darting forward and relieving both muggers of their knives, going back to her position between the magical girl and the Amazon before either of the young men could react, a knife in each hand.

"Hey, look at that," Aiko giggled. "Now we all have weapons and you don't." She smirked nastily at them as they stared in disbelief. "I believe that according to your own rules of engagement that means you have to do what we say." Taking a step forwards she twirled her scythes again meaningfully. "Give us everything you have," she added, her voice dropping dangerously.

The two young men gaped at the three women, while several onlookers laughed or clapped, then turned to run, only to find a very large man in a nice suit pointing a pistol at them. "I believe you should listen to the ladies," he commented mildly in a deep voice. They froze, glanced at each other, then began emptying their pockets.

The car drew up outside the hotel, Elias getting out and going around to open the rear door. Three young women exited, laughing and in a good mood. He smiled as the blue-haired one bowed slightly to him. "Thank you, Elias," she said, her nicely-accented voice sounding pleased. "You've done a wonderful job. The club you recommended was excellent."

"Thank you, Ms Tendo," he replied, nodding respectfully back and accepting the folded note she slipped him very discreetly. "It has been a genuine pleasure driving you around. And it was most entertaining watching you and your friends deal with those young men." She chuckled, sounding both amused and a little tipsy.

"That was fun."

"It was unusual, I'll admit," he remarked, shaking his head a little. "But very effective." He watched the other two, the brunette who had somehow managed to produce a number of edged weapons from nowhere talking to the one with the long purple hair in Japanese, both laughing quite a lot about something. "I hope you and your friends enjoy your stay in L.A. If you need a car and driver again, please consider contacting our company."

"I'll definitely do that," she assured him, grinning. When she glanced at the car he smiled again.

"I'll deal with the rest of the business on my way home, don't worry, Ms Tendo."

"Thanks again." She waved as she rejoined her friends, all three of them going into the hotel. Watching them go he shook his head slightly in wonder.

"Unusual young women," he mumbled to himself as he walked around to the rear of the car. "I wonder what they do for a living?" He looked at the hundred dollar bill the Tendo woman had slipped him, smiling a little. "Generous, too." Opening the trunk he looked inside at the two scared faces peering up at him past the gags and the remarkable amount of rope the brunette had pulled from somewhere. "OK, you two, we're going to take a little trip to the police station now. All comfortable in there?" There was some muffled cursing which made him grin as he closed the trunk again, before getting back into the car and driving off. Sometimes this job was a lot of fun.

Harrison sat at his desk, nibbling a bagel he'd picked up on the way in to work, as usual looking through the cases stacked up in his IN box that had come in overnight. Grinning he noted yet another sheet full of the 'unexplained' tied up gang members, the same thing that had happened on the previous night. 'Aiko's been busy,' he chuckled to himself. 'I wonder if she brought any of the others over to play?' Flipping further through the paperwork he stopped on one page, his eyebrows going up steadily, until he finally lost it and roared with laughter.

'Get used to it? I doubt it,' he giggled, leaning back in his chair and shaking his head with his hand over his eyes. Reading the report again he grinned. 'A reverse mugging. That's a new one on me. Leave it to those girls to manage that.' Putting the paperwork down he picked up his bagel, finishing it off while snickering to himself. 'I can see life getting very interesting when those two are working here, if that's what happens when they just go shopping...'

It took several minutes before he was able to get to work.

Glancing at Akane as they pulled up outside the staff gates, Adrian wondered why she was grinning to herself. Shampoo was doing the same in the back of the car. They'd both been in a weirdly good mood since he'd picked them up at the hotel earlier. Putting it down to excitement and anticipation he nodded to the security guard in the control booth at the gate, who smiled back, activating the barrier which rose out of the way. Driving in he made his way through the studio facility and parked at the back of the building containing the armoury.

"Aiko said she'd be here later," Akane commented as they all got out of the car. He locked it and nodded.

"OK. I left instructions at the gate to let her in when she turns up. Not that she really needs it, of course." Just as they were entering the building, another car arrived, disgorging Aaron, so he waited for the other man to catch up. "Hi, Aaron."

"Hello," the arms-master greeted them, seeming pleased to see the young women. "How did the driving go yesterday?"

"Very well indeed, I think, Aaron," Akane replied, then frowned slightly as they all went inside, the air conditioned interior considerably cooler than the outside temperature which was rapidly rising. "Although it ended annoyingly." He gave her a questioning look to which she sighed, Shampoo laughing for a moment. "An old... acquaintance... unexpectedly turned up and got in the way. It caused some problems." Aaron looked puzzled, glancing at Adrian for a better explanation. The director sighed but laughed at the same time.

"You wouldn't believe it if you didn't see it," Adrian admitted, shaking his head. "But when you get time go over to the vehicle depot and have a look at the car they were driving. It explains a lot."

The compact and battered man looked mildly confused but nodded after a few seconds. "OK." Entering the armoury he walked over to his desk, dropped the bag he was carrying on the floor next to it, then sat down, rotating his chair back and forth for a moment. One of his subordinates stuck his head out of a side office at the sound of them arriving, then came out and handed his superior a clipboard with a number of papers on it. Aaron thanked him, flipping through them and signing a couple, while the others waited, Shampoo gravitating to the rack of swords again and inspecting a few closely.

Stopping on one sheet Aaron groaned as he read it, then looked up at his colleague who shrugged. "Again? That's the third time in the last six months. What the hell are those idiot actors doing to my guns?"

"No idea, but they seem to have some weird skill or talent for wrecking the fucking things," the man said in a very irritated voice. "That particular M-60 seems to be a favourite for some reason. It's jammed completely solid, I can't even get the bolt out of the receiver to fix the thing. It's like they poured glue into it or something."

"Assholes," Aaron grunted, sighing slightly. "I hate actors. You heard about that idiot who managed to bend the firing pin on one of the MP5s yesterday?"

The man stared at him incredulously. Adrian was chuckling quietly off to one side at their expressions, Akane listening slightly confusedly. "How the hell did he do that? It's an enclosed pin for Christ's sake." Aaron shrugged.

"No idea. The last eighth of an inch was sheared clean off. I had to replace it and the spring, which was distorted as well. It probably jammed and he tried to clear it with a crowbar or something stupid like that. Of course, his excuse was 'It just broke.' Sure it did." Aaron shook his head disgustedly as his co-worker sighed. Picking up the clipboard again he signed the last sheet then handed it back. "Thanks. I'll be busy all morning, so you deal with everything unless it's an emergency, OK, Mike?"

"Sure, Aaron," the sub-armourer replied with a nod, taking his paperwork back into the office. Aaron turned to the others.

"Sorry about that, the paperwork never stops."

"No problem, Aaron," Adrian replied. "So, how do you want to do this?" he asked. Shampoo and Akane came over and listened attentively. Aaron glanced at them, thinking.

"I've been thinking about it for a while. At the moment, we only need to get them to a level where they look convincing with firearms, enough to not stand out, and know how to use them safely, right?"

Adrian nodded slowly. "Pretty much, yes. We need to have them able to look like they mean business, not fight a war. Stopping them blowing their own heads off is probably pretty high up the list as well." He grinned as Akane giggled. Aaron smiled a little.
"True. OK, in that case, I think a standard firearms safety class is the first thing, which we can do downstairs on the range. Start them off with something simple like a 9mm pistol." He looked directly at the two young women. "Precision target shooting isn't required yet. Or at all, for acting and stunt work, generally, although you might well be very good at it, based on Shampoo's insane skills with a bow. But before I let you wave a gun around I want to make absolutely sure you know how it works and how to handle it without killing anyone, yourselves included." She nodded, as did Shampoo, the two exchanging a glance. "Even with blanks in they're not toys, something that a lot of people seem to forget. Even a blank can kill you if you use it wrong."

Getting up he went to one of the heavy duty locked cabinets on the wall, punching a combination into the keypad on it, which beeped and clicked. Opening the door he pondered the array of pistols nearly arrayed inside, before selecting a pair of 9mm Glocks, along with four empty magazines, turning and putting them on his desk then relocking the cabinet. Quickly and expertly he checked that the magazines were indeed empty, operating the slides to ensure the pistols were clear, then looked at the two women who were watching with interest.

"Glock 17 9mm pistol, very common in law enforcement, practically all the various services in the US use them, and others around the world as well. Very popular for civilians as well because it's very reliable, accurate, and fairly light because of the plastic frame." He held one of the guns up, showing it to them. "Unlike many firearms, this has an integrated trigger safety, not a separate safety catch. It stops the trigger being pulled accidentally or if you drop it." He demonstrated how it worked, the gun pointed carefully at the floor. Akane and Shampoo both nodded, listening intently.

"This is the magazine release. The magazine goes in here in the butt, until it locks in place. Press the button, it will drop out, you then put another one in. You cock the gun like this." He pulled the slide back and released it. "Always keep your finger off the trigger when you cock the gun. Now, when you pull the trigger, the round will fire, the recoil recocks the weapon and chambers another round. It will fire every time you pull the trigger until you run out of ammunition. The last round will leave the slide back. Pop out the magazine, insert another one, press the slide release, and you can continue firing. With practice you can change magazines in less than a second or two."

He inserted a magazine, then ejected it and snapped in another one fast enough that Shampoo clapped in impressed pleasure, which made him grin. "The magazine in this case holds seventeen rounds. Other weapons can occasionally have higher capacities, or more often lower. Revolvers, in the main, hold five to eight rounds, although the more common ones in law enforcement are at the lower end of that. We'll be covering a couple of them as well. Then there are the various rifles, machine guns, and more esoteric weapons. But for the moment I want to start with these, to get you used to them and the safety requirements. Let's go down to the range and I'll take you through what you need to know, OK?"

"We're looking forward to it, Aaron," Akane smiled.

"Hey, Mike, I'm going to be in the range for the next couple of hours," Aaron called to his colleague, who again stuck his head out of his office. "When Matt turns up send him down will you?"

"Sure, Aaron." The man gave them a quick smile then went back to his work.

"Follow me, please," the arms master said, heading towards a door to one side of the armoury carrying the two pistols, having handed Adrian the stack of empty magazines. Unlocking it with another keypad, he held it open as everyone filed through and went down the stairs. At the bottom, which was some distance down, they found themselves in a long room, at least twenty-five yards in length and perhaps eight wide, with half a dozen stations separated by sound-absorbing barriers in front of a low desk-like construction splitting the room into two parts, the range proper being most of it. There was a rack of ear defenders hanging on the rear wall, along with a similar rack of transparent safety goggles. Next to them was yet another metal door with a keypad on it. Akane and Shampoo looked around with interest, Adrian moving to the side and keeping out of the way while watching them all.

"We can make all the noise down here we want," Aaron smiled, putting both the pistols he was holding on a table at the rear of the room, then moving to the door and unlocking it with the correct code. He disappeared into it for a moment then returned carrying a few cardboard boxes of ammunition. Holding up one box he showed it to them, then opened it and removed a cartridge. "This is a live 9mm round. Copper jacket over a lead core. Pretty standard ammunition. On the other hand, this..." Here he opened another box and removed a different cartridge, showing it to them. It had a flat end, the brass cartridge being capped with a small plastic plate. "... is a blank. It makes the right noise, if anything it's a little louder, but there's almost no recoil."

Looking sternly at them, he held the live round up. "This one will kill you. That's pretty obvious, a high velocity piece of metal going through you is going to ruin your day at the least. The thing a lot of people forget is that this can also kill you." He lifted the blank. "Not as easily, of course, but at close range, people have indeed been killed by blanks. Injuries are more common, but deaths have happened. The moral of the story is that guns are dangerous. Period. They're designed to kill. That's the entire point. A blank makes it much less dangerous, but not safe! Remember that."

Both women nodded slowly, exchanging a glance.

"I'm not trying to scare you, and I'm certain that you both understand the point I'm trying to make, but you have to keep it in mind at all times." He looked seriously at them. "I've been in this business for twenty-seven years, and I've known people who forgot. At least two of them died as a result. There have been some pretty nasty accidents as well. So just remember, OK?"

"We understand, Aaron," Akane said quietly. "We've both heard stories about the dangers of guns. There's a very good reason they're so hard to get in Japan."

"Good. Now, don't get me wrong, you don't need to be scared of the gun itself, it's not going to jump off the table and try to murder you, it's only a tool, but you have to treat it with respect, because it's a dangerous tool. The thing you'll find in this country, especially coming from outside, is that Americans have a very weird relationship to guns. Some of them are absolutely terrified of the things, they're completely sure that owning a pistol for example is proof that you're a murderer just waiting to pounce. That's stupid, of course." Shampoo grinned and Akane looked amused. "On the other hand, you find the opposite extreme, people who are convinced absolutely that any common-sense safety precaution regarding firearms is just a huge conspiracy by the government to take their guns away and impose martial law or some such crap. Also stupid."

He shook his head, sighing. "It's annoying. The damn things polarise opinion like you wouldn't believe. Those of us who simply work with them get it from both sides sometimes. Anyway, that's not really important, although I'd suggest that you don't want to get into a big conversation about firearms unless you know the person in question, they can often spiral out of control in a weird way."

"The voice of bitter experience again?" Adrian asked with a chuckle. Aaron scowled.

"God, yes. Teach me not to start a conversation in a bar again." Everyone else laughed, while he looked mildly irritated. "OK. Let's get some practical experience. First, we have to load the magazines. I'll do one, then you can try as well. It's pretty simple, you take a round like this, push it in here like so, then put the next one in. You can see how many are in the magazine through the small holes here in the side." He demonstrated, quickly and competently loading the magazine with live rounds. They watched carefully until he'd finished.

"Take one each and do the same." Akane and Shampoo both picked up one of the empties, looking at them with curiosity, then began loading them, more slowly than he did, but quickly finishing. "Great." He loaded the remaining one. "Now, when you're in a stunt using firearms, always check that you have the right magazine. Don't trust anyone else, don't trust me, verify that what you have is what you thought you had, OK?" Both women looked at him for a moment, Shampoo raising an eyebrow. "Mistakes happen. If you're using a weapon that hasn't been modified to only fire blanks, and someone hands you a magazine that happens to contain a live round, and you fire it..." He shrugged as they winced. "It's happened. Never on my watch I'm very pleased to say but just because it hasn't happened yet doesn't mean it can't. So check. That's my personal rule."

"Insisting on that is one of the reasons we consider Aaron to be very good at his job," Adrian commented quietly. Akane looked at him, then back to the armourer.

"I understand," she said, smiling a little. "And I agree."

"So do I," Shampoo noted, putting the magazine she was holding down on the table. "Have no wish to kill when not needed." He looked at her slightly oddly then nodded, grinning as she giggled. "Mark of amateur."

"Hmm. Yes, I suppose it is. OK, grab some hearing protection and some shooting glasses and I'll show you how to fire these things correctly." Very quickly, all three of the others had suitable ear and eye protection on. He took one pistol and a magazine to one of the shooting stations, then flipped a switch on the table which made an overhead rail hum into life, quickly bringing a target carrier forward to the point he could reach it. Opening a cabinet on the wall he removed a pile of paper target sheets about two feet square. "We'll start with these ones." Clipping one to the carrier he sent it downrange to about ten yards away.

"All right, this is the front sight, this is the rear one." He indicated the relevant points on the weapon. "These are zeroed for ten yards, closer or further away you need to compensate. The maximum effective range is about fifty yards or so, not that it's not lethal well beyond that, but most people could never consistently hit a target much further away. In law enforcement you're normally less than fifty yards away from whoever you might be shooting at anyway so it's not a problem. For our purposes, you'll almost always be using blanks so range is irrelevant, you're not actually shooting at anything, but as far as I'm concerned you need to know how to use them properly even if we never need that skill." He grinned at the two women who were listening with care.

Inserting a loaded magazine, he turned to point the weapon down range. "Always keep it pointed away from people and down range when it's loaded, or any other time you don't know for a fact that it's not loaded. Assume all weapons are loaded and ready to fire unless you have personally verified that they're not. Understand?" Again, he got a couple of nods.

Operating the slide, he aimed. "The weapon is now live. Firing one shot." He pulled the trigger, the report of the gun making both Akane and Shampoo jump even with the warning. Adrian twitched despite himself. He wasn't good with sudden loud noises in enclosed spaces. Everyone looked at the target, which had a hole in it almost in the middle of the bull.

"Good shot," Shampoo said approvingly. He laughed a little.

"Not as good as your archery, but I'm not bad. Matt is better, he's won several marksman awards and was his unit's sharpshooting champion with about six different types of weapons." Removing the magazine and working the slide to eject the chambered round he caught it as it flew out, then put pistol and magazine on the bench, the slide locked open. "The weapon is now clear." Glancing at them, he added, "Always be sure of that before you put it down. It sounds overly formal, but saying it out loud fixes it in your mind and helps you build the habit."

Both women nodded yet again. Satisfied, he replaced the free round into the magazine then stepped back. "Good. Akane, you're up first." Swallowing a little, appearing slightly nervous, the blue-haired young woman took his place then carefully picked up the weapon, inspecting it thoroughly, before inserting the magazine. Gently releasing the slide she raised it, then looked at him.

"I'm ready. Um, the weapon is live, I mean."

He grinned as she looked unsure. "Good. Now, brace your other hand around your firing hand, hold it steady with your elbow a little bent, yes, that's right. Line up the front and rear sights on the centre of the target. Lean forwards a bit more, turn slightly to the right, feet further apart, left one forward a little." Everyone watched as she followed the instructions. "The recoil will come as a surprise the first time. Be ready for it. It'll make the gun jump up and to the side a little. When you're ready, gently pull the trigger straight back, until you feel it take up the slack. Then a little more pressure will fire the gun." She swallowed again, the barrel wavering a little, then concentrated, firming her posture. A moment later she pulled the trigger. The sound of the shot and the recoil made her jump, the pistol jerking sideways and up, but she reacted very quickly and had it back to aimed downrange immediately.

"Very good indeed. And not a bad first shot." He looked at her, impressed. She'd missed the bull by a large margin but had hit the target about halfway between the centre and the upper right corner. "Try again."

Once more, this time with more confidence, the young woman aimed and fired. The shot was much closer to the middle of the target on the second attempt. "Again." The third shot was within an inch of the one he'd fired. "Very good."

Akane looked pleased, a lot of the nervousness going away. "Use the rest of the magazine. Don't fire too quickly, take your time between shots to aim correctly. There's no hurry." She nodded, aiming carefully. Thirty seconds later the slide locked back as the last round was fired.

Looking at it carefully, she extracted the magazine, checked it, then put both it and the gun on the table, the barrel pointing away. "Clear," she announced, making him smile approvingly again.

"Fantastic. I'd hoped you'd pick it up fast but that was remarkable." Hitting the switch to bring the target back as she smiled at the praise, he watched it whizz back along the rail, stopping it a couple of feet away. Adrian walked over to stand beside him, Shampoo doing likewise, as they all looked at the perforated paper sheet. "Damn that's impressive," Aaron chuckled.

There were two shots on the outer edge of the target zone, the remainder clustered within a circle about six inches across near the centre. Akane looked at it with a wide grin. "That was fun," she remarked, laughing.

"Nice shooting," Shampoo giggled, poking the target curiously.

Pleased, Adrian grinned at his colleague, who looked unusually happy. "You're a good instructor, Aaron," he commented.
"She's a good student," the other man replied, amused. "Listens to instructions then actually follows them. That's not common." He turned to Shampoo as Akane blushed a little, her friend laughing. "Let's give you a try, then you can both fire off a couple of boxes to get used to it. We'll try the blanks as well so you can feel the difference. After that, we'll get some other weapons to try you on. I've got some more firearm safety stuff to tell you as well, and I'll show you how to clean them properly too."

Both of them nodded, grinning, while he removed the used target and hung a new one, sending it out to the same place. Shortly, Shampoo was in position, carefully shooting at the paper, looking like she was enjoying herself.

"Hey, Aiko." Matt smiled at the brunette as she approached while he got out of his car.

"Hi, Matt. How are you today? Looking forward to weirdness?" Aiko snickered as he laughed, nodding.

"Oh, very much, yes. Yesterday was amazing." He laughed, as did the woman, locking his car and heading to the armoury. "I wonder what bizarre thing will pop out of the woodwork today?" he asked rhetorically, making her grin.

"No way to tell in advance," she shrugged, laughing again. "Generally we find it best just to roll with it, whatever it is."

"Adrian and Aaron should be on the firing range by now," he commented, checking his watch, as he held the door open for her, being rewarded with a smile for his trouble. "I had to sort out some things at a different site, so I'm a little late." He sighed for a moment, coming in behind her. "Silly problems, but they cause delays, which costs money, which in turn causes people to get very... overexcited."

"I understand," she replied, giving him a sympathetic look as they headed deeper into the building. "I had a few things to do at home that needed to be dealt with as well, so I only just got here. Good timing though."

Entering the armoury both of them looked around for a moment. A couple of people were visible near the back of the large room through the various racks of weapons, both apparently concentrating on something. A few seconds later a blonde, close-cropped head wearing rimless glasses poked out of one of the side offices.

"Oh, it's you, Matt. Hi."

"Hi, Mike. Where is everyone? Down in the range?" Matt looked around again.

"Yep. They've been down there for close to three hours. They seem to be having fun." The man grinned. "Gone through a hell of a lot of ammo so far. I just took half a dozen mags for the AK-47s down and a case of the 7.62mm blanks. Those two girls were grinning like idiots."

Aiko laughed, looking at Matt, who was also grinning like an idiot. Mike gave his colleague an amused look. "In fact, I think your range record might be in danger, Matt. That one with the long purple hair is an amazing shot. The other one is pretty fucking remarkable as well, considering Aaron told me neither one of them has ever fired or even held a gun before. Going to be stunt women, I believe?"

"That's the idea," Matt replied, laughing to himself. "Yesterday was teaching them to drive. Greg is still trying to get over it."
Chuckling, Mike shook his head then withdrew into his office, while Matt led the way over to the door to the range, punching in the combination then opening the door, above which the ‘Caution – Range in use’ sign was illuminated. As soon as he pulled it open a roar of machine-gun fire echoed around the room, dying away after a couple of seconds, to be followed by a certain amount of laughter. "Sounds like they're having fun," Aiko giggled as she followed him down the stairs.

At the bottom the room smelled strongly of nitrocellulose and primer, while there was a large pile of used brass in the corner of the room. Adrian was in the process of sweeping more empty casings over to it, Akane was holding an AK-47, and Aaron was pointing something out on it while Shampoo and the Tendo woman both listened carefully. They all looked over as the two new arrivals came into the room.

"Hi, Aiko, and you too, Matt," Akane cheerily greeted them both. "This is huge fun." Shampoo was grinning, before walking over to shake the hand of the stunt director.

"How's it going?" he asked the Chinese woman.

"Very well," she assured him confidently. "Guns very loud but easy to shoot. Not need so much skill like bow." He gave her a look, then glanced over at Aaron, who shrugged a little.

"Apparently she's right. You should see some of the shots she's pulling off. We need a much bigger range to really push either one of them but if they don't go in to the stunt work either of them could make a living at competitive shooting." He shook his head in wonder. "Akane is already a much better shot than I've ever been and Shampoo is just ridiculously accurate." He turned to the Tendo woman, who was looking mildly embarrassed at the praise. "Show him her target from about half an hour ago."

She nodded, putting the machine rifle down after expertly dropping the magazine and clearing the chamber, making Matt raise an eyebrow, then rummaged around on the next bench, which had a stack of target sheets about three inches thick on it. After a moment she came up with one specific one, handing it over. Matt stared at it as Aaron held it up with a smirk. Aiko snickered, shaking her head, then turned to the Amazon who was looking very pleased. "You saw Lethal Weapon, didn't you?"

"Fun movie," the woman giggled. "Though I could do that. Looks like I can."

Walking over and taking the target from his friend Matt whistled softly, inspecting the smiley face punched out in about thirty 9mm holes, with a little hat on top made of another dozen or so. "What was the range?" he asked.

"All the way to the back," Aaron told him, looking hugely amused. "Twenty yards. Three magazines one after the other so fast you could barely hear the individual shots. I'm surprised the action will cycle that quickly without jamming, to be honest. It was like a damn machine pistol."

"Hmm. And the weapon?"

"Glock 17. Both of them seem to have an affinity for the things."

"Wow."

Both men turned to look at Shampoo, who grinned at them. "Do it again," Matt requested. She nodded, glancing at Aaron, who waved his permission. Walking to the rear of the room she retrieved one of the pistols and several magazines, checking everything carefully, then returned to the firing position. While she set up a target Matt got eye and ear protection for himself and Aiko, handing the brunette her equipment for which she thanked him. They all stood behind the Amazon as she ran the target out to the limits of the range. When it stopped she eyed it up, nodding to herself, before snapping a magazine in and cocking the gun, taking aim. "Weapon live," she announced to Aaron.

"Fire when you're ready, Shampoo," he said calmly. The result was an immediate fusillade of shots that made Matt blink, they came so close together. The instant the first magazine was finished she hit the release with her other hand, grabbed a fresh one and slapped it in before the empty hit the desk, then resumed firing. All told she emptied three magazines in less than eight seconds. When the slide locked back for the final time she straightened up from her firing stance, putting the gun down.

"Clear." Aaron looked approving, while Matt gaped.

"Holy shit," he mumbled under his breath. She flipped the switch to return the target, looking over her shoulder at the stunt director with a small grin. When the target carrier stopped they all looked at the result. This time the smiley face was winking and had a pipe coming out of its mouth instead of it wearing a hat. "Holy shit," he said again, shaking his head in awe.

"Can go faster but gun jam too much," she commented idly, removing the sheet of paper and holding it up to inspect it, before handing it to Akane, who put it on the pile of others, looking like she thought the whole thing was very funny.

"I'm going to have to frame a few of these," Aaron mused, inspecting the pile. Aiko snickered as the other two women looked proud.

"Gun art by Xian Pu," the brunette chuckled. "It'll be worth a fortune one day." This made them all laugh.

"I'd say things are going well," Matt finally said, rather weakly. Adrian laughed loudly, nodding proudly.

"Oh, yes, very much so. I can't wait to see what happens when we put all this together in a real trial stunt." He was rubbing his hands together with an excited expression, Matt was amused to note. "Mitch isn't going to believe it."

"Hey, Akane, have you demonstrated catching a bullet yet?" Aiko asked with an impish smile. All the men stopped dead, staring at her, then turning to inspect the blue haired girl who looked suddenly embarrassed, rubbing her hand over her face.

"Damn. You heard about that, then, I guess?"

Aiko nodded, grinning widely. "I did indeed. Nabiki happened to mention it when I bumped into her a while back. She seemed proud." Shaking her head slightly Akane looked at Adrian, who was gaping at her, before his expression slowly changed into one of awed expectation.

"You can... catch... a bullet?" he managed to ask. Aaron looked both shocked and worried, staring at the girl, who was going slightly red about the cheeks. Matt listened with surprise which he idly noted wasn't as great as he expected it should be.

"I caught one bullet," she replied, sighing a little, yet still looking oddly pleased with herself. "It was sort of an accident. I mean, I didn't intend to catch the thing, the thief shot at me and it was just a reflex." They stared at her, then exchanged glances.

"I think there's a story there we haven't heard yet, isn't there?" Matt asked slowly. She nodded, grinning a little, before sitting on one of the tables and explaining. When she finished there was silence.

"I'm probably going to get it back when the case is over," she giggled. "Mr Ito is going to make it into a necklace for me. Lieutenant Sasaki thought it was a good idea when I came up with it."

"Holy shit," Matt mumbled, staring at the girl, who was smiling to herself.

"Catching bullets is quite an advanced skill," Aiko noted wryly, making everyone look at her. "Any half-way decent magical girl can do it, of course, and the more powerful ones don't bother half the time, it just bounces, but it's an impressive trick and makes people stop and think. But there aren't a lot of martial artists even in Nerima who are quite that quick, although some of them are certainly tough enough to take it if they miss. Ryoga probably wouldn't even notice if you shot him in the face with a fifty calibre rifle." She snickered at the look on their faces. "Mind you, that's at least partly because he can be a little slow on the uptake sometimes."

"Silly Ryoga," Shampoo snickered, making Akane grin and grimace at the same time.

"Who's Ryoga?" Aaron asked, sounding confused. Matt turned to him, thought for a moment, then sighed.

"A mobile crash barrier from what I saw yesterday." Akane began laughing, quickly joined by Aiko and Shampoo. "I'll tell you later."

Shaking her head with amusement, Aiko said, "So? Show them how to do it." She plucked a round out of the box nearest her and flipped it to Akane, who caught it absently, staring at her.

"What if I can't do it on purpose?" she asked in a worried tone. Matt and the other studio people looked at her, then back to Aiko when the magical girl snickered.

"It's easy. Look, I'll show you the right method." She glanced at Aaron. "Want to shoot at me?"

He stared for a long few seconds, worry and curiosity warring with each other in his expression. "Are you sure?" he asked in a tone of voice that suggested he most definitely wasn't.

Aiko laughed. "Trust me. I know what I'm doing." She lifted the end shooting station table which was hinged to allow access to the main range, going through it, then closing it behind her. Moving to a position in the middle of the room she turned to face them.

"Take a shot," she invited, folding her arms. He stared at her for a very long few seconds, before glancing at Matt and Adrian, who exchanged a glance.

"She's probably bulletproof, based on all the other stuff we've seen her do," Adrian slowly commented, rubbing his chin in thought. "And she's willing to allow it to happen."

"But..." Matt couldn't think how to end that sentence, finally merely shaking his head and stepping back. Aaron stared at them both, sighed heavily, and picked up the pistol Shampoo had used, opening the slide and inserting the round Akane handed him with a grin into the chamber. Releasing the slide he looked seriously at Aiko, who was smiling at him.

"You sure about this?"

"Yep. Aim off to the side if it makes you feel better, about here." She indicated a spot a couple of feet to her right.
"OK," he sighed, taking careful aim, then firing despite his obvious qualms. The report of the gun sounded and Aiko dropped like a stone.

"SHIT!" Adrian screamed, nearly fainting. Aaron stared in horror, then slowly turned as Akane and Shampoo began laughing hysterically. Glaring at them he opened his mouth, then looked back to the magical girl on the floor, who suddenly sat up and held up a gleaming copper-jacketed slug, grinning like a lunatic.

"Oh, you little bastard," he growled.

"Sorry, Aaron, I couldn't resist." She stood effortlessly, approaching and handing him the expended bullet. He took it and looked at it with wonder, still frowning, before shaking his head and laughing.

"Absolutely unbelievable. Can all you guys do that?"

"Pretty much. I showed a friend of mine a while ago how to do it, she'd never had the opportunity to try, and she picked it up very fast. A helpful burglar was shooting at us," She giggled for a moment as he stared. "He gave up after a few shots but we were done by then anyway. Some of the girls have never tried, some have done it a lot. Depends on what you run into." The brunette shrugged for a moment. "A hell of a lot less guns in Japan of course so it doesn't come up nearly as often as it probably would here."

"Good grief. How fast a round can you catch?" He seemed fascinated and appalled in equal measure as far as Matt could see, while the stunt director didn't know what to think.

"I'm not sure. I've seen Chou grab something that was going about Mach 2 past her ear without much trouble. But she and Yori have reflexes and speed that even we think are pretty incredible." Aiko smiled as he paled. "But I've never had anyone shoot at me yet with something that fired a bullet too quickly to either grab or deflect."

"And if you miss?"

"You get a hole in your shirt. Which really annoys some people." She snickered as he shook his head again in wonder. Turning to Akane the brunette added, "Want to try? I'm sure you can do it, these 9mm rounds are pretty slow." With a mildly apprehensive expression the Tendo sister nodded.

"Right. You take my position, I'll shoot at you," Aiko grinned, hopping over the table and relieving Aaron of his pistol en route. He looked at his hand in mild shock, she'd done it so quickly and smoothly he'd had no way to even block her. Popping the empty magazine out she grabbed a loaded one and competently slotted it into the gun in a way that showed she was more than familiar with the process. He stepped back as Akane slowly went through into the range area, stopping and turning around at the same place Aiko had done.

"OK. The trick is to grab hold tightly, not too soon or it bounces off your knuckles which stings a lot when you're learning, and not too late or you'll just drop it again or it will bounce as well. It will probably make your arm go back, you're not as strong as I am, but don't let go, all right?" The blue-haired woman nodded, exchanging a glance with Shampoo, who smiled at her encouragingly.

"I can't believe I'm allowing this in my range," Aaron grumbled. Adrian, who had recovered and was glaring at Aiko's back to Matt's inner amusement, shook his head.

"I know it's a bit unusual but I really want to see what she can do," he replied quietly. The armourer looked at him, then back to the two women facing each other. He sighed.

"So do I," he admitted.

Shampoo watched carefully as Aiko aimed. "I'll fire past your shoulder, a little low, all right?"

"OK," Akane said, a slightly quavery note in her voice. The magical girl pulled the trigger, the gun not moving even a fraction of an inch in her grip from the recoil. Akane's hand blurred even as the trigger operated, then she yelped.

"OW!" Waving her hand she sucked the knuckles, making Aiko laugh.

"My friend did exactly the same thing. Don't worry, the bruises won't last long. Wait just a little longer before you close your hand."

"I just saw someone shoot someone else in the hand and the woman is just bruised?!!" Aaron muttered in a low voice, one that sounded incredulous. Matt glanced at him, then went back to watching to see what happened next. He could understand the incredulity, he was feeling it himself in spades.

"Guess she really is bulletproof," Adrian commented idly, looking impressed, pleased, and shocked all at the same time. Both of his colleagues stared at him for a moment.

"Ready to try again?" Aiko called. Akane nodded, flexing her hand a couple of times with a wince, then poising it.

"Go ahead," she replied, a look of concentration on her face. The brunette fired again. Once more, the Tendo woman's hand moved so fast it was only visible as an after-image. "Damn. Missed it."

"Don't worry, I've got lots of shots left," Aiko snickered. At Akane's nod she fired yet again. This time the martial artist grinned as her hand flew back and she half-turned. Bringing her closed fist around she opened it over her other hand, watching as did everyone else as the bullet dropped into her palm.

"Very well done, Akane," Aiko congratulated her, grinning as well. "Very well done indeed."

"Un-fucking-believable," Aaron breathed in stunned awe. Matt and Adrian couldn't even manage that. They watched as the two repeated the operation, then did it a few more times for good luck. By the time the slide locked back on an empty gun Akane had caught the last five in a row, three with her left hand. She looked extremely pleased.

"Weapon clear," Aiko said, removing the magazine and checking the pistol before returning both to Aaron. "Thanks."

"No problem," he managed to say.

She grinned at him, patting him on the shoulder, "Used to it yet?"

"No," he replied honestly, making her laugh. She turned to Shampoo who was looking eager.

"Want to try?"

"Yes," the Amazon laughed.

"You're not quite as tough as Akane is so it'll probably sting, but you're a bit faster from what I've seen so you shouldn't have too much trouble." Aiko looked at Aaron. "You can shoot at her this time if you want."

After a long moment he nodded abruptly, picking up the last full magazine and loading the gun. Shampoo looked pleased, hopping over the table to take Akane's position, the Tendo woman rejoining the others with a handful of bullets which she was rolling around in her palm. She showed them to Adrian, the director staring for a moment before gingerly picking one up and looking at it with an awed smile.

Looking dubious, although fascinated, Aaron took aim, then at her nod, fired one shot.

"Aagh!" the Amazon yelped, shaking her hand and swearing in Mandarin, which for some reason made Aiko giggle. "Stings much!"

"Too slow, Shampoo," the magical girl commented. "But close. Try again."

After a moment during which she massaged her palm, Shampoo took up the approved bullet-catching stance and nodded to Aaron, who had politely waited for her to recover before trying the impossible again. He fired another shot. She winced but held up the bullet proudly in her left hand, flexing the right one uncomfortably. "Still hurts. Use other hand for next shot."

Sighing in mild disbelief the arms master fired off the entire magazine, as Aiko had done with Akane, Shampoo missing two and catching the rest. When she hopped over the table again she was grinning from ear to ear.

"Well, that's not something you see every day," he commented mildly, making the weapon safe then sitting down to recover. Matt stared at him for a long time.

Adrian was almost cackling to himself, obviously working out how to use this unexpected new skill in a movie. His colleagues exchanged glances and left him to his dreams while they got back to the training work, Aiko sitting at the back of the room and watching with interest, a small smile on her face.

Relaxing in the car as they left LA, Akane leaned back and smiled to herself. She was having the time of her life so far she thought. Glancing to the side she met Shampoo's eyes, seeing a look in them which made her sure the Amazon was thinking much the same.

In the front of the vehicle Matt and Adrian were having a conversation about the stunt trials tomorrow, which she listened to for a while, before going back to her thoughts. Looking out the back window she could see the studio truck with a camera crew in it, the director having decided he wanted to film the next training session due to how well everything was going. In front of them was another truck, this one containing two cars and some motorcycles, with Greg and a couple of his people as well. The instructor had greeted them with a look that showed he was still having trouble with what had happened the previous afternoon but even so he seemed to gradually be getting to grips with it all.

Aiko had vanished off somewhere just before they'd finished at the armoury, saying she'd meet them at the old airfield the studio owned for outside work before disappearing to deal with another minor emergency. The youngest Tendo wondered what it was this time. Knowing Aiko and her friends it could be almost anything, she mused with mild amusement.

"That was a lot of fun," Shampoo commented in a low voice, turning to her with a grin. "I don't know that I'd want to do it every day but I really enjoyed shooting holes in things for a few hours."

"It was amusing," Akane agreed, smiling at her friend. "So was poor Aaron's face when Aiko tricked him like that. I thought he was going to fall over."

Giggling, Shampoo nodded. "Adrian was even worse. But at least this time he didn't faint like he did yesterday when we ran into the pig."

The comment provoked a mild frown from the Tendo woman, along with a sigh. "Damn Ryoga. Why did he have to pick right that minute to pop up out of nowhere?" She shook her head in irritation. "It ruined a perfectly good car and caused all sorts of confusion."

"He looked pretty scared when you yelled at him, though," Shampoo replied, laughing. Akane also chuckled at the memory of the event. "But I'll agree the boy has a knack for turning up at the wrong moment. At least this time you didn't destroy half the neighbourhood trying to kill him."

"He looked pretty scared when you yelled at him, though," Shampoo replied, laughing. Akane also chuckled at the memory of the event. "But I'll agree the boy has a knack for turning up at the wrong moment. At least this time you didn't destroy half the neighbourhood trying to kill him." She shook her head in irritation. "It ruined a perfectly good car and caused all sorts of confusion."

"He looked pretty scared when you yelled at him, though," Shampoo replied, laughing. Akane also chuckled at the memory of the event. "But I'll agree the boy has a knack for turning up at the wrong moment. At least this time you didn't destroy half the neighbourhood trying to kill him." She nudged her friend in the ribs when Akane flushed, embarrassed at the reminder of her most spectacular sense of humour failure. "Cheer up, Akane, it shows you've really come on a lot with your therapy."

"I guess you're right. I wanted to hit the idiot but I also didn't want to disappoint everyone here and at home. Especially... her." She shivered for a moment, her voice lowering, while Shampoo looked momentarily worried.

"You held it together very well," the Chinese woman said after a few seconds. "I don't think that even she would be annoyed that you shouted at the fool."

"I hope not." They sat in silence for a while, thinking their own thoughts, which had a certain amount of cold women with sunglasses prominent amongst them.

"It's a shame that Ryoga is the way he is," Shampoo mused out loud after a minute or two, making Akane glance at her. "If he wasn't so dishonourable he'd be a lot easier to get along with. He's a very good martial artist, but..." She shrugged.

Akane nodded tiredly. "I know what you mean. He's not actually stupid, I don't think, but he's got huge gaps in his common sense and holds a grudge like no one I've ever met."

"Other than you?" Shampoo snickered. Akane glared for a moment, then reluctantly agreed.

"I guess I deserve that. I certainly didn't act in the right way for years, did I?" She didn't like to admit it but she was honest enough to realise it was the truth. The Amazon beside her sighed a bit.

"No, but then none of us did, really. We were young and foolish, that's part of it. Even... him." Akane knew they weren't talking about Ryoga any more. "But the way we all behaved is not right, definitely. Even people like Nodoka and Great-Grandmother, who should have known better."

"No, but then none of us did, really. We were young and foolish, that's part of it. Even... him." Akane knew they weren't talking about Ryoga any more. "But the way we all behaved is not right, definitely. Even people like Nodoka and Great-Grandmother, who should have known better." Shampoo shook her head sadly, leaning it on one fist, her elbow on the door. "I think about it every now and then and wish I could somehow go back and fix things. I know that can't happen, but..." She gestured slightly with her other hand, before dropping it to her leg, sighing again. "Too late now. What's done is done."

They sat in silence for another minute or two. "I miss him," the Chinese woman added eventually, in a low voice.

"So do I," Akane responded, looking out the window at the dry scenery they were passing. "I wish I could apologise as well, to both him and Kasumi. It was mostly my fault."

She sighed again, closing her eyes for a moment.
"Hopefully one day we'll be able to," Shampoo said, turning to look at her friend. "I still think Kasumi at least will come back eventually, if only to let you and your family know she's all right. He probably wouldn't. It's not like there's much reason for him to do so."

The Tendo sister nodded sadly. "I would give anything to speak to Kasumi again even for five minutes."

"I wonder what she's doing?" the lilac-haired woman asked. Akane shrugged helplessly, wiping a tear from her eye.

"I have no idea at all. But I hope she's having fun doing it. I really hope that."

Shampoo put her arm around her friend's shoulders, the two women falling silent for the rest of the drive.

Getting out of the car and stretching, Shampoo looked around curiously, before glancing at Akane who had gotten out the other side. She was regretting bringing up the lost sister during the drive, it had obviously had a strong affect on the other woman who still looked mildly melancholy, but now they'd arrived she seemed to be cheering up. Adrian was heading for the truck with the camera crew and equipment in it, the same people who had filmed their demonstration, while Matt was talking to Greg, the driving expert having jumped down from the huge articulated truck that had the vehicles in it.

"I think this is going to be even more fun than yesterday," she said to the other woman, who looked over from where she'd been studying the surroundings. Akane smiled, following her eyes as two of Greg's assistants opened the back of the vehicle transporter and pulled out a ramp, then went inside. Shortly a car backed slowly down the ramp, parking off to one side, soon being joined by another one and three motorcycles. They watched the unloading from the car, until Adrian came back looking pleased.

Stopping beside Shampoo he briefly studied her, then Akane, before saying "I'm looking forward to all this. You're both doing spectacularly well, ladies, I wanted to make sure you knew that." The two exchanged glances then grinned.

"Thanks, Adrian," Akane replied, cheering up noticeably. He nodded, a look on his face that made Shampoo sure that had been at least part of why he'd said it, although he definitely seemed to be serious. "That means a lot."

"Good." Grinning back he waved for them to follow as he walked off towards the various buildings they could see a couple of hundred metres away. Matt joined them half-way to the first, looking thoughtful and pleased in equal quantities. Shampoo studied the surroundings as they walked.

They'd driven for some fifteen minutes across near-desert terrain to finally arrive at a gate in a two-metre tall chain link fence that stretched out of sight in both directions across the barren land, the road being blocked by a locked metal gate. One of the people from the lead truck had jumped out, unlocked it, waited for the small convoy to enter, then closed and locked it again before getting back into his vehicle. Another couple of minutes drive had brought them to what was obviously one end of an old runway, markings still faintly visible in badly faded paint that had been bleached by time and the sun. The tarmac was in surprisingly good condition under the blown sand and dust, although it had innumerable tiny cracks in it that made it apparent that it hadn't been seriously maintained for a long time.
The airfield buildings proper consisted of a pair of somewhat rusty rounded metal buildings perhaps twenty metres wide by three times that long, with huge sliding doors at one end, and a concrete control tower with windows all around it at the top, fifteen metres up. There was an ancient and tattered wind-sock, bleached completely white, waving lazily in the light breeze on a pole on top of the tower, surrounded by a forest of antennae, several of which were badly bent.

Overall, it looked like exactly what it was, an airfield that had fallen out of use as a place for aircraft to land at a considerable time ago.

The noticeable difference from just an abandoned airfield were the other buildings they were approaching. These were much newer, a number of prefabricated concrete and steel rectangular structures that, while not as large as the old hangars, were much more solidly built and probably a lot more secure. There were a couple of pick-ups full of tools and equipment parked next to one of them which had the large roller door at the front open, sounds coming from inside it that made it clear people were doing mechanical things.

Some way further down the runway itself, there was something much weirder. They walked a little way past the new buildings and stopped, Adrian turning to them and pointing. Shampoo and Akane stared, impressed, then looked at the director.

"Looks like city street," Shampoo commented. He grinned.

"That's the point. Those are sets from a crime thriller movie we did a while ago, which we used with some modifications in another one a bit later as well. That one was a pain to shoot." The director looked mildly annoyed as Matt nodded, sighing.

"Don't remind me. So many stupid little problems. Cars that broke down, actors that forgot their lines, stunt people who slipped and broke their damn ankles of all things." He sighed again, when Akane and Shampoo both laughed a little. "Trust me, it was cursed. Two separate broken ankles in ridiculously contrived accidents. And a broken collarbone, two sprained wrists, and a broken rib. That last one was one of the fucking cameramen of all things."

Shaking his head, Adrian seemed both amused and annoyed. Shampoo snickered, glancing at Akane who was smiling a little. "What happen to cameraman?" she asked curiously.

"Tripped over the stuntman who broke his damn ankle and the camera landed on him." Adrian grumbled under his breath as both woman laughed once more. "Idiot. Anyway, enough of that."

Waving his hand at the prop buildings, he continued, "The end result is we've still got all this up. Normally it would have been torn down by now to make way for something else but it's ideal for our purposes. The basic plan is that it's a scene from a potential upcoming bank robbery movie. The bad guys, who are actually bad girls, that's sort of the hook as there aren't a lot of crimes like that committed by women, are escaping the scene, one in a stolen car and one on a motorcycle. The cops chase them, of course, there are a number of crashes, near misses, everyone is shooting at everyone, all the sort of things that the public seems to like, then it culminates in an amazing stunt."

"The cops shoot out the tires on one side of the car," Matt said, taking up the explanation, "So the woman in the car thinks fast, hits a curb, then gets the car on two wheels. She keeps going, with her partner coming up behind on a bike, but a lucky shot from the pursuing cops causes the car to catch fire. She scrambles out the window and jumps onto the back of the bike, they roar off into the distance, while the car hits a truck, flips, and explodes. Money all over the street from what was in the trunk, total chaos, the cops can't keep going and they get away."

Shampoo exchanged a look of excited interest with Akane, who was listening with a huge smile.
"That sound... very difficult to do," she commented.

"Oh, hell, yes," Matt agreed, nodding. "That's the problem. It's an amazing scene on paper but it's damn near impossible to actually pull off. Normally you'd do it with a lot of CGI mixed with live action, which would take serious effort and cost a fortune. But, just maybe, with you two we can do it for real."

"Which would not only look incredible but save the studio a lot of time and effort, get them totally behind all of us in this whole project, and make you girls the hottest property in the Hollywood stunt scene overnight," Adrian put in, appearing very pleased. The two women exchanged glances again.

"Sounds like something we should have a go at," Akane laughed. Shampoo nodded vigorously.

"Agree with Akane. Sounds fun. Dangerous, but fun."

"Greg doesn't think that it can be done," Matt confessed. "Even after yesterday. None of his people are nuts enough to even try, he said." They both laughed at the comment. "But Adrian and I think that if it can be done, you two can pull it off."

"And we are nuts enough to try?" Akane asked, giggling. He grinned at her.

"Pretty much, yes. But, that said, if you have any doubts, tell us. We're not going to push you into it if you feel it's too dangerous. You know your own limits better than we do, after all."

They both considered the stunt for a moment, the Tendo woman turning to the Amazon. "What do you think?" she asked, switching back to Japanese. "Are we nuts enough?"

"Oh, we're definitely nuts enough," Shampoo laughed, "the question is more whether we can actually succeed or not. It probably wouldn't kill us if we miss, but I'll bet it would hurt." She thought for a moment more. "I'm up for it, if you are."

"Why not?" Akane grinned. "That's what we're here for in the first place. If it all goes horribly wrong, I guess Aiko could get Yori or Chou here quick enough to fix us up, anyway. We're in a lot less danger than most people would be."

"True." Shampoo nodded. "Actually, that might explain why Great-Grandmother gave me something before we left." Akane looked intrigued.

"What did she give you?"

"A little box with instructions to open it if we did anything involving fire."

Shampoo could see her friend was puzzled. She herself wasn't completely certain, but she had an idea what the box contained. "We'll have a look, it's in my bag in the trunk of Adrian's car."

"OK." They turned to the director who was listening to the, to him, incomprehensible language with a mild smile. "We'd like to try it, Adrian," Akane told the man, who grinned back at them, appearing very pleased.

"Great. I was hoping you'd say that. OK, then, today we'll do some more driving instruction, Greg wants to take you both onto the skid pan for some high-speed sliding around, faster than we could do back at the studio, then some fast runs along the runway as well. After that there's some motorcycle practice as well." He looked at the Amazon. "You're the one with some experience so hopefully you'll pick it up quickly. Akane might take longer, which doesn't matter at the moment, only one of you needs to handle the bike, the other one will be in the car."

"The stunt is involved enough that we only need one good take," Matt added. "We'll do the other driving parts first, then edit everything together into a single scene. It should look pretty impressive." They began walking back to the trucks as he talked. "One of Greg's people, Karen Jorgenson, is the motorcycle instructor. She's a damn good rider, she practically grew up on a bike. She was prepared to do the motorcycle part of the stunt but no one thought anyone would be crazy enough to drive the car." He chuckled as both young women laughed.

"We'll go over the scene notes after the training," Adrian continued as they walked past the buildings they'd passed on the way out. "Matt will explain how we'll make the car flip, how the fire effects will be done, all the technical parts like that, then we can do some dry runs. We won't be doing any car exploding today, though, it takes quite a lot of effort to set up for it and we only have two vehicles currently rigged for the stunt. Hopefully that will be enough." He shrugged a little. "If it turns out that we can't pull it off there's no harm done, we tried, but if we can..."

Shampoo laughed to herself. "We get much praise?"

"Exactly." The man looked at her with a grin. "Much praise indeed."

"So what are those?" the voice of Aiko came from behind them, making Akane look over her shoulder and smile at the magical girl, who was peering curiously at the small box in Shampoo's hands. "They're magical, for sure."

Shampoo plucked one of the small round objects out of the container and held it up, looking at it with mild wonder and considerable awe. "Phoenix pills. Very expensive, but very effective. Only a few have been made over the years, Great-Grandmother and four other Elders are the only ones who know the secret to making them." She turned to look at Aiko, who was listening with interest. "They're a magical spell in pill form that gives an enormous resistance to heat to anyone who takes one. It's permanent as far as I know." She smiled at the brunette, looking pleased. "Great-Grandmother obviously thought ahead and decided that we'd need them if we ended up doing stunts with fire."

"We'll definitely have to thank the Elder when we get home," Akane laughed, taking the other pill when Shampoo held out the box. "These could end up being very useful if anything goes wrong with the stunt." Aiko watched as both the other women popped a pill each into their mouths, swallowing, then coughing a little. With a grin she produced two bottles of water and handed them over. Opening hers and swilling the fairly large pill down, Akane spluttered a little then weakly added, "Assuming they don't choke us first, of course."

Snickering their friend took the empty bottles back and made them go away. "They were a bit big to try taking dry," she commented with an amused look. "So. What did I miss?"

"Not too much so far," the Tendo sister told her. "Adrian and Matt explained the stunt they have in mind which sounds awesome if we can actually pull it off."

"And very painful if we can't," Shampoo grinned. "We were hoping that if it all goes horribly wrong you can bring some medical help in a hurry."

Laughing, Aiko replied, "I'll notify Chou to be ready."

"Thanks."

"Hopefully we won't need to be put back together," Akane said wryly. "But it's nice to know it's an option." They took turns explaining the stunt to the brunette woman, who listened with a small smile on her face.

"Wow. That will look amazing," she finally said when they finished. "Try not to fall off the bike, or miss it entirely, though, that would just be silly. Very funny, but silly."

"Thanks a lot," Shampoo giggled.

"No problem. I'll enjoy watching whichever way it goes," Aiko replied with a smirk. They turned around at a call from Adrian, who was waving to them from beside the truck Greg had been in, the driving instructor and Matt standing next to him. "Looks like you're wanted."

"Hi, Aiko," Matt greeted her. "Another emergency dealt with?"

"Yep." The brunette casually vaporised the apple core in her hand with a flash of deep blue light, making Greg twitch and stare at her with shock. No one else paid any attention. "Another medical problem. Had to hop Yori and Chou down south to deal with it, a friend of ours called for help. Nothing too serious."

"You lot are better than the normal emergency services anywhere I can think of," the stunt director chuckled. She grinned at him.

"I like to think so. It's nice to be able to help."

Shaking his head slightly, Greg seemed to be trying to ignore the conversation in favour of sanity and normality, making Adrian glance at the magical girl and smile a little. The man turned to Akane and Shampoo who were also looking amused. "All right, then, this is what we're going to do. Over there, behind the control tower, is what used to be the car park when this was an airport. We set up sprinklers around it, and the surface is also very greasy, so when it gets wet it's slippery as hell. Right now it's very wet. So the idea is that I'm going to show you how to drive in slippery conditions, do high-speed slides, spins, that sort of thing. Who wants to go first?"

Glancing at Shampoo, who stepped back a pace and gestured her forward with a small grin, Akane held her hand up. "Me, I think," she replied.

"OK, great. You know the drill. There's a new helmet in the car, put it on along with the neck protector. And this time, please try not to throw it at anyone. For me?" He looked pleadingly at her.

Giggling she nodded.

"I'll try. Hopefully that idiot Ryoga won't pop up today." As Shampoo and Aiko began laughing, she headed for the car that Greg had pointed to, the stunt driver following with a look of mild worry on his face, a look he seemed to get a lot at the moment.

"Four complete turns. That's the best one yet," Matt commented, taking the bottle of water Aiko handed him with a nod of thanks as they watched the car finally stop spinning in the middle of the skid pan. "She's getting faster."

Adrian nodded, laughing. "The young Ms Tendo seems to be getting to grips with driving at a very impressive rate," he agreed. "She's going to be very good indeed at it, I think." They watched as the car drove fairly slowly and carefully off the slippery surface, turning around a few hundred yards away, then hurtled towards the skid pan again with dust spewing up from the rear wheels. As the vehicle reached the wet area it slewed sideways, travelling at a good sixty miles an hour, then went into a series of spins that looked pretty nauseating. Eventually it stopped, Greg suddenly getting out and leaning on the car, ripping off his helmet in the process and throwing up violently.

"Six turns. Wow."

"Poor Greg," Aiko snickered, sipping her own water.

"He'll get over it," Matt replied, grinning. "Sooner or later."

Laughing, they exchanged a glance, before the brunette went back to reading the scene notes for the stunt that Adrian had given her when she'd asked about it. The stunt director looked at the other man, who was leaning against the wall of the control tower with a small smile on his face, watching the lesson with great amusement. "It's going really well," he said, causing his colleague to nod happily.

"Oh, yes, so well I'm almost worried," Adrian replied, laughing a little. "I keep waiting for something horrible to go wrong."

"It probably won't," Aiko responded, still reading the documents. She glanced up as he looked over. "The crazy goes after people like me a lot more than it does people like you. Or even Akane and Shampoo." She giggled for a moment. "I'm the decoy in this case. Anything weird that happens will probably happen to me."

"You say that, but I've got a DVD that shows weird things happen to Shampoo as well," he replied, grinning.

"True, I suppose," the woman allowed, shaking her head a little and laughing. "But try not to think about that. The crazy can hear you and it gets ideas." He looked abruptly worried, causing her to snicker before going back to the paperwork.

"It'll be fine, Adrian," Matt reassured his friend. "Don't worry too much. You're doing so well at the moment."

"Now I'm beginning to wonder if I need another pill," the director sighed, making both his companions laugh. "Ah. Looks like Akane is done."

The car was moving slowly over to where the Amazon was waiting impatiently near the camera truck, which had the crew and cameras on the roof filming the training, her lilac hair blowing in the breeze. Stopping beside her, both the occupants got out, Greg exchanging a few words with Akane as she removed the helmet and handed it to her friend who immediately put it on while listening as well. The neck protector changed hands as well, then the other woman climbed into the car. Shortly it drove off, heading for the skid pan. Akane watched it for a moment before looking around, spotting the other three, and making her way over to them. She was grinning widely, looking very pleased with herself.

"That was a lot of fun," she commented when she was near enough.

Handing the paperwork back to Adrian, who put it in a folder under his arm, Aiko chuckled. "You did seem be enjoying yourself out there," the magical girl replied, "although I think Greg was having a hard time at one point."

"He must have a weak stomach or something." Akane appeared mildly puzzled, causing the others to exchange looks of amusement. "It wasn't that bad."

"Hmm. I suppose not." Adrian inspected her, glancing at Matt who was trying not to laugh. "Oh well. What did he say about how it went?"

"He seemed pleased overall," the Japanese woman replied, smiling. "After he's gone over the same lesson with Shampoo we're going to do the high-speed driving on the runway, then some two car exercises as well. He's going to drive one and we'll be in the other one." She leaned against the building next to the others, taking the bottle of water Aiko handed her with a nod of thanks. "Then I guess it's the motorcycle training. I'm a little nervous about that, I've never been on a bike before."

"I doubt you'll have too much trouble, Akane," Matt assured her. "It's not horrendously difficult although it takes some practice, which is the entire point of what we're doing here today after all. You can ride a bicycle, right?"

"Yes, although not as well as Shampoo can," the woman replied. "She's had a lot of practice for years. I haven't been on a bicycle much since I was about twelve."

"Well, it's a lot like that, except much faster, and you get hurt a lot more if you come off," he chuckled, making her give him a dark look.

"Oh, thanks a lot," she growled.

"Don't worry, you'll bounce if you fall off unless you're really going fast," Aiko said, laughing. "Although you might get a nasty case of road rash."

"The riding leathers should help in that case," Adrian added. She nodded, turning to watch her friend go through the driving lesson on the skid pan. Currently the Amazon was up to three turns. Matt laughed at the sight, wondering when Greg was going to puke again.

"She's catching up," Matt commented, looking out the back window, to see Akane grinning like a maniac through her helmet faceplate in the car a hundred feet behind them, Shampoo next to her apparently laughing her head off. He glanced at Greg, who was concentrating on driving, looking in the rear-view mirror intermittently. The driving expert nodded briefly.

"I know. That girl can seriously drive. I still can't believe she's only ever had less than half a dozen lessons before yesterday," he muttered, loud enough to be heard over the engine, as he spun the wheel and wildly slewed the vehicle between two of the set buildings, the car bumping across the dusty ground once it left the tarmac runway surface. Akane overshot the turn, making him laugh for a second. "Ah. Still haven't learned all my tricks, eh, Ms Tendo?" he chuckled. Matt grinned, then pointed to his left.

"No, but she learns fast," he said. The car the Japanese woman was driving came around the next fake building along, turning in a power slide with a huge tail of dust shooting up from behind it, then heading towards them.

"Shit." Greg manoeuvred wildly to avoid the oncoming vehicle, then went back the way he'd come, handbrake-turning onto the runway then flooring it. Seconds later Akane was behind them again.

"This would be amazing if we had more obstructions," Matt observed, enjoying the somewhat exhilarating driving. Greg laughed again.

"It's pretty amazing right now," he replied. "In my racing days it would have been a lot of fun to go up against someone as good as Akane is going to be. She's already better than a lot of people I know who have been doing this for years. Shampoo is damned impressive but Akane is just a little better, even though her reflexes aren't quite as fast. She seems to anticipate the moves just that small amount sooner."

"They're both remarkably good," the stunt director noted, grabbing for a handhold again as the car swerved violently, spinning into a quick flip then slowing hard. Akane's vehicle shot past as they began going back the way they'd come, quickly reaching a very high speed again. "Think they can pull it off?"

"This insane stunt you and Adrian came up with?" Greg thought for a moment, driving with automatic skill. "If anyone can, they probably stand a good chance. They seem tough enough to take it if it all goes tits up, at any rate." He looked in the mirror again, his eyes widening, due to the fact that Akane was now only five feet behind them at nearly eighty miles an hour. "Shit. Again."

"Akane really is getting very good and has no sense of self-preservation," Matt chuckled. "OK, then. See if you can deal with this," Greg muttered, barely audible over the sound of the engine and the road noise. Swerving to the side he suddenly applied the brakes, just as they passed the last of the simulated buildings, dropping behind the other vehicle before the driver could compensate. Accelerating again, grinning manically, he came up behind the Japanese woman's car, then drifted over until his front right bumper was almost touching her left rear one. Matt could see Shampoo looking over her shoulder, apparently reporting on what was going on. Before the two young women could think what to do, Greg gave the wheel a sharp twist to the right, pushing the rear of the front car to one side, which caused it to fishtail violently, Akane sawing at the wheel in an attempt to straighten up.

Backing off a little Greg watched carefully, then nudged the car again at exactly the right point, before slamming on the brakes and steering out of the way. Akane's car spun out, sliding across the dry ground beside the runway in a huge cloud of dust, eventually stopping two hundred yards away. Laughing, Greg followed in a much more controlled manner, stopping next to the other vehicle, which disgorged two young women who looked simultaneously amused and annoyed. Coughing slightly Akane stomped over, wiping dust off the visor of her helmet, then tapped politely on the window. The driving instructor lowered it. "Yes?" he enquired calmly. "Can I help you?"

"That was a mean trick," Akane grumbled, staring at him. He nodded. "But very effective." Beside him, Matt was snickering to himself. "Show me how to do it," she replied after several seconds, suddenly grinning.

"OK," he laughed, getting out of the car and beginning the explanation, drawing diagrams in the dust on the hood of her car. Matt watched with amusement, while both young women listened carefully, asking sensible questions. It seemed to him that the other man was indeed getting to grips with the situation, apparently enjoying himself nearly as much as the women were.

"Looks like Karen's here," Adrian noted, nodding in the direction of a small SUV that was bouncing across the rough access road towards them. He took another bite of the pizza that Aiko had popped away and retrieved twenty minutes earlier, finishing his slice off, then stood up, walking over to meet the vehicle as it stopped twenty metres away. Akane watched for a moment, before glancing at Shampoo, who was sitting on the other side of one of the folding tables the camera crew had pulled out of their truck and set up so everyone could have a break.

"I think you're going to get the most benefit out of this," the Tendo woman commented. Shampoo nodded, looking interested, as she turned in her folding chair to watch Adrian greet the tall tanned good-looking mid twenties woman who got out of the SUV and looked around, her shoulder-length deep red hair, a similar shade to Nodoka's, held out of her eyes with a pair of mirrored sunglasses that were perched on the top of her head. The two shook hands, had a brief conversation, then walked back.

"I'd like to introduce Karen Jorgenson, one of the best motorcycle stunt riders and instructors I've ever met," Adrian said, smiling at them. "Karen, this is Akane Tendo and Xian Pu, or Shampoo to her friends, our prospective stunt women, and a mutual friend, Aiko. They're the ones I told you about. You know everyone else, of course."

Karen inspected Akane and Shampoo, both of whom stood, then nodded with a wide smile. "It's nice to meet you," she said, shaking their hands. "There aren't enough women in this game, I'm glad to see two more who want in."

"Thanks, Karen," Akane smiled, glancing at Shampoo for a moment then back to the other woman. "We're both looking forward to this. Being in the movies was a dream of mine from a long way back and Shampoo has gotten very interested in it as well since we met Adrian."

"Want some pizza, Karen?" Matt asked, waving to the table and the food still on it. The red-head looked over, nodding after a second or two.

"Sure. I had lunch, but that was a while back now." They all headed back to the tables and the various chairs arranged around them under a couple of large pop-up sun-shades, taking a seat each. The new arrival inspected the fare available, taking a slice of pepperoni pizza and trying it, before nodding appreciatively. "Not bad. Damn good, actually. Where's it from?" Aiko held up an empty box.

"It's a place called Zolnerowich's in Brooklyn. Best pizza I've ever found."

"A Russian pizzeria?" Karen looked surprised, raising an eyebrow, which made Aiko chuckle.

"Russian-Italian, with some Portuguese thrown in for luck. It's named after the owner's grandfather who came to the US after the first world war."

"OK." The woman ate some more, looking thoughtful. "I'd probably agree, it's certainly at least in the top three I've ever had." After a second or two, she stopped chewing, staring at the brunette. "Hey, hang on. New York? How on earth did it get here, then?"

Grinning, Aiko vanished from her chair, making Karen blink wildly at the flash, then stare in shock. "Holy fuck. What happened?" She almost shouted, looking around frantically. Twenty seconds later the Japanese woman reappeared next to the chair she'd vanished from, sitting down again and dropping a small box on the table.

"Forgot the garlic bread," she snickered, making the red-headed motorcycle instructor gape. Akane reached out and opened the box, handing Shampoo and Adrian a piece of the contents, before trying some herself, trying to make it look completely casual while inside she was laughing wildly.

"Aiko has some unusual abilities," Matt explained gently, helping himself to some garlic bread as well, then sipping from a bottle of water. Karen stared at him, then the box, then Aiko, who picked it up and held it out. After a very long pause she reached out and took a piece.

"You need to tell me more, I think, Adrian," she requested, sounding stunned. Grinning, he filled her in. When he finished the background story she slowly shook her head, inspecting the three Japanese women, before leaning back in her chair and thinking for a while. "Weird," was her final summation.
"Pretty much, yes," Adrian agreed. "Still want to help out?"

Karen thought some more, a smile growing on her face, then eventually nodded. "Why not? It sounds interesting, and anyway, like I said, we need more of the sisterhood involved in this industry." For some reason Aiko suddenly coughed, choking a little on her garlic bread, before slumping in her seat giggling to herself furiously. Everyone stared, making her wave her hand weakly at their concerned expressions.

"Don't worry, thought of something funny, that's all. Continue with what you were doing, I'll be fine," she gasped, shaking her head with humour.

"Hmm." Adrian studied her, shrugged, then went back to Karen who was looking puzzled again. "OK. Sorry about all that, it's not the sort of thing that you can easily explain without a demonstration," he said, smiling a little. "If it's any consolation Greg took a lot more convincing." Everyone now turned their attention to the driving instructor, who flushed a little with embarrassment, which he covered up by taking a drink.

"It was a shock, OK?" he growled under his breath.

Grinning, Karen looked at him for a moment longer. "I want to hear that story, Greg," she said slyly. He mumbled something too faint to make out, although Aiko collapsed in gales of laughter again. Picking up another slice of pizza, she turned her attention to Akane and Shampoo, who were watching her with interest. "Do either of you have any experience with motorcycles?" she asked, before taking a bite.

"She does," Akane replied, nodding to Shampoo beside her. "I don't."

"Out of practice," Shampoo added, "Not been on motorcycle for long time, but was not too bad when tried."

"OK. We can build on that, I think," the woman said after swallowing. "We'll start with you, Shampoo, in that case, then when you're up to speed I can concentrate on Akane while you practice." She looked at Adrian. "Did you bring the stuff I asked for?"

He nodded, indicating the truck from the motor depot. "They both have riding leathers we sorted out earlier in wardrobe, and there are three new Kawasaki Ninja 500R bikes parked over behind the truck. Greg's people have checked them over, tuned them up, run them in, and they're ready to go. We've got radio equipped helmets as well. We're planning on using those bikes in the stunt."

"Great. Good bike, the 500R. Not too powerful but more than enough to get you going damn quick." She smiled happily as she finished her pizza, then cleaner her fingers with a piece of paper towel. "OK, let's go and have a look." She hopped athletically to her feet then waited for everyone else to join her before heading off in the direction of the truck. Akane and Shampoo exchanged glances, the Tendo woman smiling at her friend, who looked excited, as they followed the instructor.

"Got it, Akane?" Karen asked. "Clutch there on the left, front brake on the other side with the throttle, rear brake under your right foot, shifter under your left. Don't worry about the indicators and so on for the moment. You remember how to change gear?"

The Tendo woman nodded, thinking back to the instructions. "Throttle down, clutch in, change gear, clutch out, apply power."

"Good. Don't let the clutch out too fast when you're pulling away or you'll either wheelie it or get wheelspin. Just concentrate on riding for now. Keep it below say 40 miles per hour, go about half a mile down the runway, turn around, and come back." Stepping back the woman smiled. "Try not to fall off."

"I'll do my best," Akane laughed, pressing the engine start button. The twin cylinder engine caught immediately as she blipped the throttle, settling down to a rumble. Flipping her visor down she pulled the clutch in with her left hand, slipped the bike into first gear, then gently let the clutch out, which had the immediate effect that the engine stopped dead. "Shit," she mumbled to herself in Japanese. Glancing sideways at the instructor, who was looking amused, she added more loudly while she restarted it, "Forgot to add power."

Karen chuckled, watching as the younger woman tried again. This time she got moving without too much trouble although with a considerable amount of wobbling, which steadied out as the speed increased. Keeping an eye on the speedometer she clicked up through the gears, reaching third, then tried to keep the speed constant through the rest of the distance. It was tricky, the bike really wanted to go faster, the slightest twist of the throttle made it leap ahead instantly. Suppressing the urge to see what happened if she went for it, the youngest Tendo reached the point she estimated was about the right distance, slowed gently, then turned in a wide right hand circle to end up going back the way she'd come, accelerating again. Smiling to herself, she thought, 'This is fun, nearly as much as the driving is. Not too hard either, at least at this speed, but I'm not sure I could do as well as Shampoo.'

A rising scream of high-revving internal combustion made her look in the rear-view mirror as the Amazon she was thinking of approached from the other end of the runway at a very high speed, crouched down on the bike with her long hair whipping wildly behind her, then roared past twenty metres away and dwindled into the distance. She could almost feel her friend laughing with delight, grinning to herself at the thought. 'She's really enjoying this part,' Akane mused, watching as the other woman braked hard half a kilometre down the runway, before turning around and coming roaring back even faster. Once more Shampoo zoomed past, this time allowing Akane to see her grinning like a lunatic as she did so. Shaking her head a little, she concentrated on her own skills, braking smoothly beside Karen, who looked approving. Putting her feet on the ground after slipping the machine into neutral, she turned the engine off and lifted her visor.

"Good, very good, Akane. Any problems this time?"

"I'm still wobbling when I pull away but it's getting better," she replied.

"You're not lifting your feet at the same time, that's the problem," her instructor advised. "As soon as you start moving lift your feet and put them on the footpegs. You won't tip over, trust me, but if you keep one on the ground you'll wobble like that. Try it."

With a nod the Tendo woman restarted the machine, then did as instructed. Sure enough, this time she pulled away smoothly, smiling with satisfaction. A voice crackled in her helmet's built-in radio, making her twitch slightly, then look in the mirror to see Karen had put her own helmet on.

"That's much better, Akane. Turn around at the same point you did last time and come back, then I'll ride with you and we can try some higher speed work."

"OK," she replied, with a small nod, keeping one eye on the speed and the other on her friend who was once more approaching very fast indeed on the other side of the runway. Risking a quick wave as the Chinese woman rocketed past, she laughed, shaking her head a little, then went on her way.

Two hours later she was riding in formation with Shampoo a couple of metres off her right side, Karen in the middle in front, all three of them doing close to a hundred and fifty kilometres an hour down the runway. "Good. Akane, tighten it up a little, get a bit closer to Shampoo, you're drifting."
A quick glance showed her she had indeed drifted from the imaginary line she was following, dropping a little behind. Applying a touch more power she carefully regrouped, glancing at the bike in front and the one to her side, until she was satisfied she was in the right place. "Great. OK, both of you keep that position, we'll start slowing in three... two... one..." Karen's brake light came on as she spoke, both Akane and Shampoo slowing simultaneously.

"Fantastic, much better than the last time. Keep it tight, turning to the right then back to the other end." The red-head followed her own words with a wide turn, both the others staying with her in the triangular formation, all three of the applying power and accelerating hard. "Very good indeed. You're certainly improving, Akane," the woman said with a pleased note in her voice. "Shampoo, I'm amazed how good you are at this. Are you sure you haven't done much riding before?"

"Thank you but telling truth," the Amazon's voice came, also sounding pleased, and a little amused. "But had many years doing stunts on bicycle. This much the same, little faster and much less work." Karen laughed for a moment at Shampoo's words.

"You must pedal really damn quick if this is only a little faster," she commented, which made both Akane and Shampoo giggle.

"You should see her when she gets going," Akane noted, grinning, but not taking her eyes from the runway. She was keeping Shampoo in her peripheral vision to make sure she didn't drift off course. "I've personally seen her hit about eighty kilometres an hour along a roof on a pedal bike, with two boxes of ramen balanced on the handlebars in the process." Karen made an impressed noise.

"That I have to see one day. OK, we'll begin slowing now, then head for Adrian at the truck. I could do with a drink and some of that pizza if there's any left."

"OK." "OK." Both the other women spoke at once, glancing at each other in amusement, then began braking, before turning towards the small group of people watching near the camera truck.

"What do you think?" Adrian asked Karen quietly, both of them watching as Akane and Shampoo talked with Aiko and Matt. The two young women looked very good in the motorcycle leathers, Akane wearing dark blue and Shampoo in a light grey set. They seemed pleased and relaxed. The motorcycle instructor lowered the bottle of water from her mouth, swallowed, then shrugged, following his gaze.

"Shampoo is very good. She picked it up instantly, she's got incredibly quick reactions, and amazing balance. Give her another day and she'll be doing stunts most people would kill themselves even trying. I'm kind of jealous, she's got it in her to be better than I am eventually." Karen laughed a little when he glanced at her with a grin. "She looks amazingly good in that suit as well."

"They both do," he noted, laughing himself. "Greg was watching them quite a lot as they were walking back from parking the bikes."

"So was I," she snickered. Knowing her preferences, he wasn't surprised. They shared a look then both laughed.

"And Akane?" he asked after a few seconds.

"She's not at all bad herself. Shampoo is better and I suspect always will be, she has the right instincts without even trying, but Akane will be much better than ninety-nine percent of people on a motorcycle. To be honest, both of them will do very well at it but I think Shampoo will have the "Interesting. Greg said about the same with the driving, but the other way around. He thought that Akane had the edge there even though Shampoo's reaction time was less. They're both insanely quick but Akane seems to have a better instinctive knowledge of what the car will do."

"A good match for the stunt, then. Akane in the car and Shampoo on the bike." The red-head looked at him with a small smile. "Although I'd still like to try the bike part myself."

Laughing, he asked, "Not the car part?"

"Of course not. I may be nuts, but I'm not crazy. That part is hideously dangerous!" She shook her head, grinning. "You'd need to be some sort of martial arts superwoman to survive it if it all goes wrong."

"Oh. I wonder where I could get one of those?" Adrian stroked his chin, putting on a thoughtful face, while Karen laughed.

"I can still barely believe some of what Matt and Greg told me about those two," she added, shaking her head. "Did Akane really roll one of the cars back onto its wheels single-handed?"

"Indeed she did," he chuckled. "It was quite impressive. At least, Greg seemed to think so." He recounted the tale, causing her to collapse in laughter.

"Oh, god. Poor Greg. He's not used to having his world-view shaken like that, he doesn't like sudden change." She slumped into a folding chair, still giggling. Adrian shrugged.

"He'll probably get used to it in the end. He seems happy enough at the moment."

"True." Sitting beside her, they watched as Akane said something that had the other three roaring with laughter. Looking over to the vehicle support truck Adrian could see Greg talking to one of his mechanics, both of them doing something to one of the cars.

"He's not sure that the stunt can be done even now," he said. Karen followed his eyes, then rolled her own.

"Greg is a pessimist. Good thing most of the time, he's usually right about the risks of a stunt, but sometimes he's just too cautious. I'm pretty sure those girls can pull it off. That said, we need to practice. At least jumping onto the back of the bike from a moving vehicle. Shampoo will need to get accustomed to how it will react before we do it for real."

Adrian nodded slowly. "I was thinking that we could use one of the mechanic's pickups to test the procedure, it'll be a lot easier to jump off the back onto the bike than get out the window of the car. Do it slowly to start with, and work our way up to higher speeds if everyone is happy it's going to work."

"Sounds like a workable plan, Adrian," the woman said, nodding slowly as she thought it through. "Let's run it past Greg and see what he thinks. I should probably ride the bike for the first few times until Akane has it down, with Shampoo watching, then she can try."

"You're not fooling me, you just want to do the stunt, don't you?" the director laughed. She grinned, shrugging.

"It sounds like fun. Come on, let's go and talk about it, it's nearly five now and I have plans for this evening. We've got an hour and a half or so until the light goes, this will be difficult enough when we can see what we're doing. I don't want to try it in the dark."

"True," he responded, following as she headed for Greg, waving for Akane and the others to join them. Shortly they were deep in a discussion of the mechanics of the stunt test runs.

"OK, we're at twenty miles an hour. That's about as slow as I can go and not have problems when you jump on, Akane. Ready?" Matt listened to the radio in the cab, glancing over his shoulder after a quick look at the speedometer. Greg was carefully matching the speed of the motorcycle that had drawn up a couple of feet away from the back of the pickup, which they'd removed everything else from. Akane was standing on the tailgate facing in the direction of travel, Shampoo in the bed steadying her, both of them in their riding leathers and wearing the helmets as well. Akane nodded.

"I'm ready, Karen."

"Good. When I tell you, jump onto the back of the bike like we practised, then grab hold, relax, and let me deal with keeping us balanced, got it? Don't try to lean or anything like that, or we'll both be sliding down the runway on our asses."

"Got it." The Tendo sister sounded slightly nervous and very excited, making Matt grin. The stationary trials had shown them all the right technique to land on the back of the bike, but this was the first test with both vehicles moving. Hopefully, it would go smoothly, but he was relieved that if it went wrong the Japanese woman, at least, would probably bounce based on what he'd seen of her to date. Karen wouldn't, of course, but she knew how to take a fall and would be fine at low speeds. He looked over his other shoulder to check the camera truck was pacing them at a safe distance filming the test, which it was, Aiko and Adrian in the back beside the camera crew. The camera equipment was pointing through the side which folded out of the way to allow this.

"OK. Jump in three... two... now!"

Akane stepped forward a little then hopped off the tailgate, aiming for the back of the bike. Everything went swimmingly.

Right up to the point she neatly overshot the bike and missed her landing.

"Aargh! OW! Ow ow ow shit ow ow fuck ow..." Matt winced, watching the young woman roll over and over along the road, cries of irritated pain being supplanted by what he suspected was a stream of vicious obscenities in Japanese as she slid to a halt on her back after about sixty yards. Karen braked, pulling away from the truck and circling back, while Greg did the same rather more slowly, with Shampoo in the back rolling around laughing wildly. She said something in Japanese, provoking more swearing from Akane, who didn't seem to see the funny side.

"She sounds more or less undamaged," Greg commented as they slowed down beside the annoyed martial artist, who was being helped to her feet by Karen.

"But really pissed," Matt chuckled.

"Yep."

Getting out of the pickup he walked over to the two women, Shampoo vaulting out of the back and coming with him, still giggling. "You OK there, Akane?" he asked as she took her helmet off, handing it to the Chinese woman then shaking her head a couple of times. Her leather riding suit was scuffed in a few places but more or less intact, while the helmet had a nasty scrape down the
She looked at him, frowning. "That hurt," she complained. "More my pride than anything else but it stung."

"Jump too hard, Akane," Shampoo laughed, which provoked a somewhat unfriendly look. "Like when learning to jump over wall at home. Try again."

"Easy for you to say, you didn't roll fifty metres along a tarmac runway," Akane groused, running her fingers through her hair while her friend giggled. Karen exchanged a look with Matt, who shrugged.

"She looks and sounds OK to me," he commented.

"True. Remarkably enough." The red-head inspected Akane, shaking her head in wonder. "I know I'd be feeling that if it had happened to me. Even at twenty miles an hour you got some impressive distance."

Joining them, Aiko and Adrian looked the martial artist over, the petite brunette studying her carefully for a moment before announcing with certainty, "No broken bones, a little bruising, nothing serious. It's going to take a much faster impact than that to do any real harm." Everyone looked at her, then back at Akane, who sighed a little.

"Right. Let's try again, then." She turned and headed for the pickup, Shampoo beside her, the Chinese woman laughing about something she said. Matt watched them for a moment before glancing at Adrian.

"Back to work, I guess. She seems up for it."

"OK." Looking at the camera truck, where the operator was panning to follow the two women, Adrian suddenly grinned. "We can have a bloopers disk as well," he chuckled, which made Aiko start laughing loudly. Matt and Karen grinned.

"I want a copy of that," the magical girl snickered.

"So do I," Karen smiled, before getting back on her bike and starting the engine. Laughing, Matt headed back to the pickup.

Gritting her teeth, Akane shot Shampoo a quick look, the other woman nodding slightly, then stepped sideways off the tailgate again with a slight jump added. Landing neatly astride the back of the bike she smiled triumphantly, grabbing for Karen's waist and relaxing to allow the other woman to control the inevitable wobble her impact with the seat caused. A moment later they accelerated hard, passing the pickup and hearing Shampoo yell in triumph. "Well done, Akane," Karen said from in front of her, sounding pleased and impressed. "Sixty miles an hour. That's remarkable."

"And only missed four times," Shampoo's voice came, sounding amused. Akane snarled a little under her breath. Her elbow was still numb from the last fall at over sixty kilometres an hour, the resulting extremely impressive slide having removed several patches of the leather riding gear, which was starting to look somewhat tired. As was she.

"Ignore the girl in the truck," Karen laughed. "I think you did very well. I wouldn't like to try it myself, that last fall would definitely have broken something."
"It still hurt," Akane admitted. "Quite a lot."

"You OK, though?"

"I think so. Nothing serious, only a few more bruises. But I'm definitely going to need a soak in the hot tub at the hotel tonight," she replied. Karen nodded, slowing and turning back towards the camera truck and the pickup, both of which had stopped half-way down the runway.

"That always helps." Stopping beside Adrian and the others, she flipped the stand down then turned the bike off, both of them getting off and removing their helmets. "I think that's about all we can do on this tonight," she said to the other people, glancing at Akane for a moment, then concentrating on Matt and Adrian. "It's getting too dark to do any more safely. Shampoo needs to practice the bike part but I don't think she'll have too much trouble, Akane's role is the hard bit."

"OK." Adrian studied the Tendo woman for a few seconds, then nodded, pleased. "It's gone very well in my opinion. My plan is that we'll do the bar fight and the spy movie scene tomorrow at the studio, then I think probably come back out here in the afternoon and finish up the training for this stunt, get Shampoo up to speed on her part. Do a few runs through as well with the real car, everything except the finale, so we all know what we're supposed to be doing and can work out the timing." He glanced at Matt and Greg, both of whom nodded.

"We'll run the stunt for real on Thursday. I think we should do the running fight scene first, it will be through the buildings on that side of the runway." He pointed across the wide paved strip to the other side. Akane followed his finger, nodding. "It shouldn't take more than an hour or two to practice it, then run it live. After that we run this stunt. Assuming everything goes to plan we'll be finished before lunch."

"Which might leave time for that military scene in the afternoon," Matt added.

Glancing at him, Adrian thought for a moment. "Yes, I think it probably will. Can your friend get us the helicopter on short notice if we do that?"

"Yes, I was talking to him last night, if we give him an hour's warning he can be here any time in the next two days. He's just sitting on his ass at Universal with the thing parked there, ready to go. I think he's getting bored, he's a real adrenaline junky." Matt chuckled for a second or two. "Greg and I and Aaron are up for the part of the guards in the tower assault as well. It looks like it could be amusing."

"What does it involve?" Aiko asked curiously.

"Basically it's a helicopter assault on a guarded facility, which we can use the old control tower for. The chopper flies in at low altitude, the attackers slide down ropes onto the roof then we have a nice loud gun battle, all the defenders get killed, victory ensues for the good guys. Not very realistic but with the right editing it would look amazing." He grinned as she looked over at the old control tower, a smile on her face as she nodded slowly. Akane and Shampoo exchanged glances and grins.

"Sounds like fun," Shampoo noted. He nodded.

"That it does."

"Need another guard?" Aiko enquired, smirking a bit. Matt inspected her, before shrugging.

"Why not? The more the merrier, I guess."
"No teleporting, though," Akane instructed firmly.

"Aww." Aiko giggled. "You take all the fun out of it."

Smiling, Adrian listened, before saying, "All right, then, if we can work it in, we should do that. I agree, it does sound like a very good exercise and it will certainly be a useful addition to the footage. But I want to make sure we get the other four scenes in the can first."

"Fine by me," Matt agreed.

"I got a text from Anton saying he's going to be around tomorrow definitely and possibly Thursday as well, so he'll want to watch." Adrian pulled out his folder and made a few notes, before putting it back under his arm. "Well, I think we're done for today, in that case. Thanks, everyone, you've all worked very hard and done some excellent work. Akane, you especially have gone all out." He studied her, shaking his head while she smiled, feeling pleased by the praise. "I hope you're OK in the morning."

"I'll be fine, Adrian," she assured him. "I've had much worse than this in training. All her fault, of course." She indicated Shampoo, who bowed slightly as all eyes turned to her.

"Much fun hurting friend in good cause," the Amazon laughed, making Aiko grin.

"Yori thinks the same way," she joked. "Only a lot worse."

They laughed, then Adrian added, "Let's pack up and go home. Karen, I'll call you tomorrow and let you know when we finish up at the studio so you can meet us back here, OK?"

"Sure, Adrian." The red-headed woman grinned at them all. "I'm going to have to get back, I have a dinner date tonight in about two hours, but it's been a lot of fun and a real eye-opener in more than one way." She held out her hand to Akane and Shampoo, both of whom shook it. "I'll see you both tomorrow."

"Thanks for the training, Karen," Akane replied. "It was very useful and interesting."

"No problem, Akane." Karen put her helmet back on. "I'll leave the bike at the truck, OK, Greg?"

"Thanks, Karen." The tall man smiled at his colleague, who hopped back on the machine, started it, then roared off. The rest of the group of people got back into the two remaining vehicles and returned to the far end of the runway, soon packing up everything they'd used and heading back to LA.

"I'm going to have to leave," Aiko told them, "Minor emergency at home, nothing serious but it's all hands on deck again." She sighed a little. "Stupid little demons. I wish that girl would learn to shoot straight," she mumbled to herself. Akane and Shampoo exchanged a glance, shrugging. "I probably won't be able to get back until sometime mid-morning tomorrow, but I'll come back as soon as I can. I want to see what happens."

"OK, Aiko. Thanks for all the help today." Akane flexed her hand a little, looking at it. "Still aching a little."

"You did catch over a dozen bullets in it," Adrian noted with a wide grin. "A normal person wouldn't even have a hand by now." She laughed, nodding thoughtfully.

"True, I guess." Shaking her head she added, "I still can't believe I can do that."
"Is good trick," Shampoo commented, snickering. "May come in handy one day."

"I hope not," she replied with asperity. "I'm not planning on getting shot at on a regular basis."

"If you move to the US, you may have to get accustomed to it," Aiko giggled. "It's a hobby here based on the news." Sighing, Akane just looked at the brunette, who laughed more loudly at her expression. "Right, I'm off, I'll see you tomorrow morning." With a wave she vanished.

"I wonder what the problem is?" Adrian remarked.

"It might be those little demons that Shampoo had an encounter with, but bearing in mind it's Minato, it could also be almost anything you can think of," Akane replied with a shrug. "It's a weird place."

"So I'm told," he laughed. "Come on, I'll take you back to the hotel. I'd suggest the hot tub, a good meal, and an early night, because tomorrow is going to be pretty full. Matt is going back with Greg."

When they pulled up outside the hotel, he got out and came around the car to join them. "You two really did do very well today," he told them sincerely. "Even better than I hoped for. I think everything is going to work out very well, when Mitch and the board see the footage they're going to faint. Then start signing contracts as fast as they can." He grinned, while Shampoo and the Tendo woman exchanged smiles of their own.

"Thanks, Adrian," the Amazon replied, Akane nodding beside her. "Was great fun and very interesting. Looking forward to next two days."

"I think we'll be ready for Richard's barbecue after tomorrow," Akane added. "I'm starving right now, for that matter." She thought for a moment, then looked up. "Oh, I forgot about this earlier, but Aiko suggested that we see if Serena and Sophie would like to see any of the stunts. Would that be OK?"

Adrian looked mildly surprised at the question, but after a moment's thought, nodded. "I don't see why not. They'd need to keep quiet about it for a while, but knowing both girls, I think we could trust them. If their parents are OK with it I am."

"I'll call Richard later and ask, he can ask Sophie's parents." Akane smiled at him. "Thanks. I like both those girls."

"They're decent young women," he agreed. "I guess Aiko would probably be OK with bringing them over, either here or the airfield, depending on what they want to see."

"I'm sure she would, it was her idea in the first place." Casting a quick look at Shampoo, Akane nodded to the director. "We'll see you in the morning."

"Indeed you will. Earlier than normal, I think, I'll try to get here for about eight, so we can get a full day in."

"See you then." Both women waved as he got back into the car, then went into the hotel, smiling at the staff they passed. Three hours later Akane was lying in bed, relaxed and well fed, musing on the events of the day.

Glancing at her watch, she reached out and picked her phone off the bedside table, finding the number for Lieutenant Harrison and pressing the connect button. A few rings later and it was answered.
"Hello, Akane. How did things go recently?"

"Very well, thank you, Richard," she replied. "We learned a lot about cars, motorcycles, and firearms in the last two days, not to mention a very successful demonstration for the various studio people. Adrian and Matt are very pleased. So are the both of us. It's been a lot of fun as well."

The policeman chuckled. "The fun extends to the evenings as well based on the report I read this morning. Turning a mugging around like that is pretty impressive."

Slightly embarrassed, she giggled. "Whoops. You heard about it, then."

"I did. The Captain was laughing his head off. Your driver dropped the two young men and a bag of their loot off with the station late last night, saying it had been a privilege to watch you three in action. He seemed very amused." Harrison laughed. "I suspect those boys will be very careful about who they mug in future."

"I would hope so," Akane laughed. "Trying to mug martial artists and worse, a magical girl, is just silly."

"Very true. Anyway, what can I do for you?"

"Aiko suggested that Serena and Sophie might be interested in seeing one or two of our stunt trials," she explained. "Adrian says he's fine with it assuming you and Sophie's parents are. They'd have to keep quiet about it for a while, but if they want to watch, they're welcome to."

"That's a very generous offer, Akane," he replied after a moment. "I think they'd definitely be interested. Serena is in bed now but I'll ask her first thing tomorrow morning. She can call Sophie and ask, if her mother has any questions I'll give her your number, is that OK?"

"Yes, that's fine. I think Aiko can provide transportation, she's normally fine with that."

"It sounds interesting. Thanks for thinking of the girls." Harrison laughed for a second or two. "I'd like to see it myself but I'll be at work."

Giggling, she said, "I'll make sure Adrian gives you a copy of the DVD when it's done."

"That would be nice. Thanks." They chatted for a minute more, then wished each other good night. Putting the phone back on the bedside table, she lay there thinking about things for a while. Finally, feeling very pleased with the way everything had worked out, and hoping that tomorrow would be as successful, she turned out the light, rolled onto her side, and was gently snoring less than a minute later.
Hollywood meets Ms Aoyama

"On the way in this morning I just need to make a short detour," Adrian commented as they got into his car at just after half past seven. "Some paperwork I need to sign in person. It's not far out of the way and shouldn't take long. Sorry about the delay."

"We don't mind," Akane replied, with a look at Shampoo, who shrugged slightly, finishing off the apple she'd taken from breakfast.

"Thanks. We'll be there in about fifteen minutes assuming the traffic stays like this." They discussed the upcoming stunt trials as they drove, Akane feeling nervous all over again at the thought of what she and Shampoo were going to do, which made the time pass quickly. "Here we are, the bank is over there. Good timing as well, it's just opening." There was a small crowd of people outside the building, who began entering as he spoke. The director looked around, making a small sound of triumph when he spotted a car pull away from a parking meter just across from the large building he'd indicated. "And there's a free place. That's lucky." Quickly pulling in, he grinned as someone else made a go for the same spot, not quite fast enough, sounding his horn and making a rude gesture before driving off scowling. "Too slow, my friend."

Laughing, Akane asked, "Should we wait or come in?"

"It's up to you," he told her. She looked over her shoulder at Shampoo, who looked back.

"May as well go in and wait in there," she said.

Shampoo nodded. "OK."

Both of them got out of the car, Adrian waiting until they were standing next to him before locking it, then all three walked across the street and into the bank through the glass doors which slid open as they approached. Inside the Tendo woman looked curiously at the armed guard who watched them come in, nodding politely at him, then studied the interior. It was a sea of chrome, glass, and marble, more elaborate than she'd expected. "It's very high end," she whispered to Shampoo, feeling like she should be quiet in the echoing lobby for some reason. Their footsteps on the marble floor were quite loud.

"I know what you mean," the other woman replied in a low voice, looking around with an impressed expression. "I wonder if all American banks are like this." Akane shrugged, watching as a middle-aged man came out from behind the security glass when he spotted Adrian coming towards him, a smile on his face.

"Ah, that's the investment manager," the director noted. He nodded at the man, then indicated some comfortable seats to one side of the lobby area, turning to the two with him. "I won't be long, I just need to deal with this paperwork. Help yourselves to a coffee, that machine over there does a very good one, and I'll be back soon."

"OK, Adrian," Akane answered, both she and Shampoo watching as he walked over and greeted the other man, both of them disappearing into an office to one side of the lobby and closing the door. "Coffee?" she asked her friend.

"Why not?" Shampoo replied, both of them going over to the machine in the waiting area and inspecting it. Akane took a cup from the pile of them neatly stacked to one side, put it into the machine, then experimentally prodded a button, which resulted in a surprisingly long and loud series of hissing and gurgling noises. "It sounds like it's trying pretty hard, whatever it's doing," Shampoo snickered.

Eventually there was a drawn out dribbling sound and the cup was filled with dark liquid, steaming a little. Taking it, Akane raised it to her mouth and tasted the contents, raising an eyebrow appreciatively. "Hey, that's not bad at all. In fact, it's probably the best coffee I've had from a machine."

"Based on what this place looks like, they're not exactly short of money," Shampoo commented, glancing around while she put her own cup in. "I guess they don't spare any expense on the machinery. It probably keeps their clients happy."

Shortly they were both sitting at the side of the large room sipping their coffee and watching customers come and go, one or two of them greeting the security guard by name and having a brief conversation before entering or leaving. Akane picked up a brochure from a pile of them in a holder and flicked through it, wondering if they should look into whether this particular bank was one she and the Amazon would find suitable. Reading the paperwork she looked up occasionally, noticing that there were a couple of dozen customers currently standing in lines or talking to tellers.

"Hmm."

Shampoo, beside her, made a thoughtful sound.

"That's a bit weird," she added a moment later.

"What is?" Akane asked, not looking up from the page she was reading.

"You noticed how this bank obviously caters to a pretty well-off group, right?"

The Tendo woman nodded absently, trying to work out in her head what the interest rate on a savings account would bring in based on the amount they'd been discussing and wishing she had Nabiki here to do it for her, which her sister could have done without even trying. "Yes," she muttered.

"Well, doesn't that guy over by the counter look a bit, I don't know, scruffy, perhaps? Not the sort of person you'd think would have an account in here, he doesn't fit in." Akane looked up, glancing at her friend, then turning her head to follow the direction Shampoo was looking. "And there's two more kind of rumpled looking guys standing around as well," the lilac-haired woman added slowly, gazing around. "Just sort of... standing there watching..."

They locked eyes, then looked around again.

"You know," Akane said conversationally, putting the brochure down and sipping her coffee, not acting out of character, "if this was in Mr Ito's shop back home I'd be getting ready to do something about now."

"I'm getting that feeling as well," the other woman noted, leaning back and looking relaxed, but tensing imperceptibly. "It feels like it does just before a battle when you know something's wrong but you're not sure where it's coming from."
The man in the line at the second teller station along, who was as Shampoo had noted, not quite the sort of person who seemed to fit the current demographic, looked over his shoulder at the two other men in the room they'd noticed, one of whom was standing quite close to the security guard, who seemed to also feel something was amiss judging by the way he was looking around with a small frown. The remaining suspicious character was apparently filling in a form on a desk in the middle of the room but they could see he was only going through the motions, glancing at his watch every now and then in a manner he seemed to think was inconspicuous. All three of them seemed to be waiting for something.

"We may be jumping to conclusions," Akane murmured, finishing her coffee and using the excuse of putting the cup down to quickly look around again. Shampoo nodded slightly, scratching an itch on her neck that allowed her to look to the side, out the window of the bank.

"True. But on the other hand, there's a large van parked out there on the other side of the road with someone in it watching the door, and the engine is still running, I think." They shared another glance. Pulling out her phone Akane toyed with it, not looking at the men. "The guy beside the guard noticed but didn't move," Shampoo reported quietly, picking up a magazine and flipping through it.

"OK." The Tendo sister thought for a moment, then picked a number and dialled it, holding the phone to her ear while apparently admiring her nail polish.

"Who are you calling, Aiko?"

"Lieutenant Harrison. Aiko said she'd be tied up so I might not be able to contact her. Probably only going to get one chance."

"True." Looking at the side of the coffee machine, Shampoo watched the scene outside the bank in the reflection it provided. "Interesting. A big armoured truck just pulled up outside."

Akane didn't react, waiting for the phone to be answered. After a few rings a familiar voice came to her ear.

"Harrison."

"Hi, Richard," she said in English, keeping her voice conversational and happy, but at a low enough volume it didn't stand out, as if she was being polite.

"Hello, Akane, what can I do for you? I asked Serena, she'd love to come, by the way."

"Great, that's nice, we'll work out a good time for her. Shampoo and I are waiting for Adrian in the bank, he's just filling out some paperwork. It's a bit boring here but we think it won't be for long."

There was a long pause. "Ah. Am I right in thinking that you're saying something is going on?"

"Yes, thanks, Richard, you're probably correct." She laughed lightly. He paused again.

"They can hear you?"

"Of course! Thanks for asking."

The man by the guard was watching her, she noted out of the corner of her eye, and keeping an eye on what was happening outside as well. Running her free hand through her hair she rolled her eyes the other way to check on the one at the desk, who was now going over the form he'd been fiddling with for at least the fourth time. He looked at his watch again, then over at the one in the queue, who looked back casually.

"We'll probably be getting on with it soon," she added after a second or two.

"I assume you're telling me there's about to be a robbery? How many of them can you see?"

"Shampoo told me four, would you believe it? I'd told her three, but she's insisting on four. I guess one is an outside chance." The Tendo woman giggled, hoping desperately that her on the fly code was getting the message across.

"Three in the bank, then, and one outside? In a car or something?"

"Oh, Richard, you're so right about that. I think we should hire a van, though."

"OK, in a van. Are they armed?"

She looked more carefully at the one in the queue, then studied the one at the desk out of the corner of her eye. Shampoo got up and went to the coffee machine, refilling her cup and tapping her fingers on the top of it while she waited, idly looking out the window, then came back and sat down, blowing on her coffee. "The one outside in the van is watching the truck, there are two people unloading what looks like a lot of cash from it. They're both wearing body armour and carrying guns," she commented very quietly, speaking Japanese. "I'm pretty sure the one by the door has a small machine gun under his coat as well, I could see the end of it when he moved."

Without acknowledging her friend, Akane thought hard. Sooner or later whatever was going on would actually happen and at that point someone was going to get hurt. There were too many of them, too widely separated, for the pair of them to deal with before at least one got a shot off and too many bystanders to risk it anyway. The man at the desk straightened up, sighing theatrically, then crumpled up his form, disposed of it, and pulled another one out of the dispenser, beginning to fill it in again. She noted that he was definitely carrying a weapon, as she reached over she could see the outline of a handgun briefly in his jacket over his belt.

"Well, I'd say two, definitely, but you might have other ideas." Picking up the brochure, she made a production of reading it. She was aware that she was still being watched. "I'll have to go soon, Adrian will be finished in a minute, but it's been nice talking to you. I'm looking forward to the barbecue tonight."

"Thanks, Akane. We've traced your phone to the vicinity of Wiltshire Boulevard and Figueroa, which would mean you're either in Chase Manhattan or Calibank. Right?"

"Yes, thanks, I think the second one would be best."

"Got it. And there are three robbers in the bank itself, at least two armed, and one more in a van outside as well."

"That's great, Richard. Aiko said she might make it later as well."

"She's not available right now, got it. Good work, Akane."

Akane smiled, tossing the brochure to the table in front of her next to her coffee cup and nodding. "You're completely right. OK, I'll talk later." She could hear what sounded like a sack truck or something similar approaching the door, and could see the guard heading to hold it open, while all three men had tensed slightly.

"Try not to cause too much damage if you have to do anything, Akane," he said quickly. "I've called it in, you'll have a lot of company soon. I'll be there as well."

Carefully not disconnecting the phone she flipped it shut and made to put it back in her pocket, glancing at the men they'd been watching and seeing they were now all paying more attention to the two people who had just entered than to her, although the one at the door was still glancing at her. One of the new arrivals was pushing a trolley with three large high-security containers on while the other one, who was holding a pump-action shotgun, was looking around alertly, ready for trouble. Taking the first opportunity that presented itself she quickly put the phone on the seat beside her then nudged it into the gap between the seat and the back rest.

Glancing at Shampoo she nodded very slightly, seeing her friend had noticed what she'd done, but hoping the other people hadn't. She was also hoping that they weren't jumping to conclusions. There was just something about the current situation that was putting her teeth on edge.

Getting up she moved to the coffee machine herself, getting a refill and looking out the window in the process. The man in the van was no longer in the van, he was coming across the street carrying a sports bag, the strap over his shoulder and one hand inside it. "Damn," she mumbled, casting a look at the Amazon, who was watching her.

Just as the trolley-pushing man reached the counter where another armed guard had opened an armoured door at the side and was waiting for him, several things happened at once.

The man in the queue pushed the woman who was in front of him to the floor somewhat viciously, pulled a short-barrelled pistol grip pump-action shotgun of his own from under his jacket with his other hand, then fired a shot into the ceiling, which made everyone except for his colleagues and the two women watching jump violently at the enormous boom. "Everyone down on the floor and stay there," he screamed at the top of his voice, working the action to chamber another shell.

The robber at the counter whipped a 9mm pistol from his belt, lunged at the armoured car man, then pushed the muzzle of the weapon into his armpit as he raised his arm and turned at the sound of the shot, firing one round into the unprotected area. As the man dropped, dead or dying, his assailant turned and pointed the pistol at the bank guard who was going for his gun with commendable, but ultimately insufficient, speed, making him stop dead.

The guard at the door wasted a second as his mouth dropped open, but recovered almost instantly, pulling his own weapon from its holster and firing a shot at the man with the shotgun, missing by millimetres, the bullet smacking into the security glass directly in front of one of the tellers, who stared with a white face then dropped in a dead faint.

The man who had been lurking near the door guard was suddenly holding a small submachine gun that Akane thought was probably an Uzi based on what they'd learned from Aaron the day before and movies she'd seen, the barrel finding itself in the left ear of the guard, who abruptly stopped moving.

The other armoured car guard had whipped his weapon up to fire at the assailant who had shot his partner, but before he could fire, the final man from the van outside who had come in just as everything kicked off raised the bag he was holding and a burst of machine-gun fire came from it, half a dozen rounds hurtling the length of the bank and leaving a line of holes in the wall, one missing where it struck the right arm of the guard. As the injured man yelled in agony and dropped his own weapon, the robber shook the remains of the bag off what turned out to be an AK-47. Moving back a couple of steps while still keeping the weapon pointed at the middle of the bank he popped open a panel on the wall beside the door and punched a short sequence of numbers into the keypad that was under it, with the immediate effect that the door slid shut and stayed that way.
Akane glanced at Shampoo again, both of them noting the action with interest.

The entire sequence of events had taken less than five seconds from start to finish. The various shots had overlapped so much that the majority of the people in the bank were still trying to work out what was going on, not even sure who had shot at who. Akane watched as everyone stopped dead, staring around in total shock. It went very quiet, allowing the sound of the first armoured car guard collapsing to the ground and his helmet hitting the floor to echo around the room.

"As you may have guessed, this is a robbery," the man with the Uzi stated surprisingly calmly, all eyes turning to him. "Please do as my colleague has asked, or we'll be forced to shoot more people. Lie down, put your phone if you have one on the floor in front of you, then cross your hands behind your backs. You've got thirty seconds then we start shooting again. I'd prefer not to kill anyone else but I'm not particularly worried about it."

Suppressing their rage, Akane and Shampoo exchanged glances, both of them shrugging very slightly. It was probably best to go along with it for the moment and see what happened. Both could easily take all four of them, but the chances of doing it without someone getting shot was too low at the moment to risk. At least the police were already aware of the situation and on the way. She hoped that Richard was still listening to the phone she'd left active. It was something of a struggle not to allow her battle aura to flare with the anger she was feeling at the likely death of the guard. A look at her friend showed she was watching the robbers with an expression she knew meant that given half a chance there were going to be more bodies. Even so, the Amazon was restraining herself admirably.

"Check the rooms and get everyone out here," the spokesman, who Akane dubbed robber number 1, ordered his colleague with the AK-47. The large dark-skinned man with the machine gun, robber number 2, nodded without saying anything, heading for the first door. The man who had shot the guard in cold blood knelt down beside the body, which wasn't moving, not taking his eyes from the bank guard who had his hands in the air, then felt around on the belt of the man he'd shot, coming up with a set of keys and another pistol which he put in his pocket before standing again. He was number 3.

Number 4, the man at the counter with the shotgun, was a tallish but quite skinny Hispanic man with somewhat wild eyes, noticeably younger than the other three, who was currently waving the muzzle of his weapon around in a slightly overexcited manner. The small crowd of customers were watching him nervously as they followed the instructions, laying down and putting their hands behind their backs. A dozen or so phones made an appearance. He walked along the line of people kicking the phones across the floor to the other side of the room. Soon there were twenty-eight terrified people on the floor including the four tellers who'd been ordered out from behind the security glass, two of them carrying their compatriot who had fainted.

Number 2 returned with the investment manager who had been dealing with Adrian, and the director as well, both of them walking in front of him with their hands up. Adrian glanced at Akane, who shook her head very slightly. He nodded just as minutely, looking worried but much less so that she'd have expected, bearing in mind how highly strung he could be. Seconds later he and the other man joined the rest on the floor. "That's everyone I could find," Number 2 told his leader. "All the other rooms are empty."

"Check the rest of the place, make sure the doors are rigged and we're isolated from the rest of the building," the other man replied. He looked at his watch. "Hurry up, we've only got twelve minutes left." He glanced at Number 3. "You go with him." Both men nodded, Number 3 pushing the bank guard to the floor after relieving him of his own weapon and keys, Number 4 taking position near him, still moving his shotgun around in a way that seemed somewhat hazardous. Both robbers disappeared through the opened security door, 2 carrying a backpack he'd removed from the sports bag he'd brought in to the bank. Number 1 looked around with satisfaction, before turning to stare at the Tendo sister and her companion. He raised an eyebrow.

"I was including you in the lie on the floor part, ladies." He waved his weapon suggestively. "Now would be good." Looking at Akane, he added, "I know you have a phone, put it on the table there, please."

Sighing a little and glaring at him, keeping the building rage she felt bottled inside, she reached into her pocket and removed her Japanese phone, which she hadn't used since Adrian had given her the other one. Slowly and deliberately putting it where instructed then following Shampoo who also put her one of her phones down before being asked, both of them lying down near Adrian, she kept her attention on the man. Number 1 nodded satisfaction. "Thank you. Now, if everyone could stay calm, we'll go about our business and be out of your way very soon."

While the other two were gone, Number 4 went around the bank lobby and collected all the phones he'd kicked across the room, putting them into a bag he pulled from his pocket, then handing it to 1. He then did the same with the various weapons the guards had possessed. After that he went and poked around on the trolley from the armoured car, nodding after a moment. "It's all here," he said happily.

"Good. Stop talking," his apparent superior snapped. Looking slightly insulted he did as ordered, toying with his shotgun.

Everyone jumped when a few seconds later there was a muffled shot from somewhere deeper into the building, followed a moment later by two more. Both robbers listened carefully, then Number 1 turned to his companion. "Go see what that was," he instructed.

"What about them?" the other man queried, waving his weapon at the hostages, most of whom looked very nervous and tried to duck even further. The cavalier manner in which he was gesturing with the thing was something that would have annoyed Aaron a lot, Akane mused, watching carefully. She wasn't too concerned about herself or Shampoo, the trials in the gun range the day before had shown that the pair of them were much tougher vis-a-vis gunfire than she'd ever realised, but she certainly wasn't looking forward to being shot at. It might not kill her, but she was certain it would hurt a hell of a lot. The rest of the people in the bank, though, had none of their advantages and were at serious risk of injury or death.

She turned her head to inspect the armoured car guard, who was lying on the floor in a pool of blood, unmoving. It was almost certain that he'd died instantly. The other victim, the second armoured car guard, a short but heavily muscled man who looked like he was of Korean ancestry, was groaning quietly to himself next to the other hostages, one of the tellers holding a cloth against his arm where he'd been shot. He didn't seem in any immediate danger but certainly wasn't very happy about the situation.

"I've got it under control," the first man replied, looking around. "No one is going to try anything." He waved his machine-gun at them all. "Are you?" There was a round of head-shaking. Akane and Shampoo exchanged glances once. If there really was only going to be one armed robber in the lobby that would be a good moment to take him, then pick off the others as they came back.

Unfortunately, just as Number 4 got to the door to the back office area, it opened, 2 and 3 returning pushing three women and two men in front of them. "What the hell was the shooting about?"

"A guard in the back taking a piss, he tried to jump us," 3 replied in a voice that had a faint Eastern European or Russian accent, looking annoyed. "Didn't work."
"Dead?"

"Definitely."

"OK." The leader shrugged, while everyone else had their own reactions. Akane was feeling even angrier, the completely callous manner these people killed was beyond the pale.

'I have a feeling that at least two of them are ex-military,' she mused silently, watching carefully as they went about whatever it was they were doing. 'The way 1 and 3 talk sounds like they've done this before and know what they're doing and they move like people with some martial arts or combat training. 2 seems similar but not quite the same. They're all carrying their weapons like they're used to them, like Aaron and Matt do.' She looked at the remaining member of the gang who was walking back and forth in front of the rest of the hostages waving his gun from side to side as if he expected one of them to try something and was looking forward to it. 'Him, though, I don't know. He's too excitable. Younger as well.' She watched for a moment. 'Not a safe person, he's going to take any excuse to start shooting. An amateur, but a dangerous one.'

Glancing at Shampoo she could see the other woman was obviously also analysing the situation, quite likely in much more detail. Her friend had a lot more real combat experience than she did even if she was out of practice. Going back to observing the robbers, she saw that 1 and 3 were having a quiet conversation near the door to the back, the leader checking his watch repeatedly. Eventually he nodded.

"OK, that should be it. You two, get to it. You have five minutes." 2 and 3 both nodded, re-entering the back of the building and vanishing. Their leader turned back to the hostages. "A word of warning. Even if you managed to escape, we have rigged all the doors aside from that one over there with fragmentation charges which will detonate if anyone opens them. There's no way out. So I would ask that you just relax, lie back, and wait for us to finish. We'll be out of your hair soon and you can go back to what you were doing."

Silence fell except for a faint whimper from one of the younger women on the floor, who Akane could see was shaking with fear, being comforted by the man next to her. She kept observing the actions of the robbers, trying to build up some sort of plan. In many ways the simplest solution was just to let them get on with it and leave, but both the fact that Richard was aware what was going on and that they'd already killed two people left her reluctant to do that. It didn't seem all that likely that when the police turned up they'd merely surrender, so getting ready for something unpleasant to happen was only good sense. So was trying to make sure they concentrated on herself and Shampoo rather than hostages who could be much more easily hurt or killed.

Looking at Adrian she noticed he was watching her and Shampoo, not the robbers, a look in his eye that made her suspect he was waiting for them to do something. She tried to project calmness at him, even though she was herself feeling like she wanted to get up and start beating the robbers senseless. In the old days she'd probably already have begun that process but she was aware that now a more mature attitude had tempered the old, angry, Akane, in this case undoubtedly to good effect. The new calm and much more dangerous Tendo sister was still waiting for an excuse to deal out a certain amount of painful karma to the men, even so. She didn't like sitting back and letting criminals rob something even without the two murders thrown into the mix.

The two other men came back in just under the five minutes they'd been allocated, pushing another clearly extremely heavy trolley which was piled a good metre deep with stacks of cash, more banknotes than Akane had ever seen in one place before. One of the bank staff produced a noise of surprise which made number 4 point his weapon at the man threateningly, causing him to flinch back and go silent. I walked over and quickly inspected the haul, nodding his satisfaction. "Good.
OK, unlock the door and load the van, we're out of here."

Number 2 walked over to the door, looking carefully through the glass both ways, before turning to the keypad and tapping in another code, while the Tendo woman watched and pondered what she'd seen. There was something very odd going on, leaving aside the actual robbery, these men seemed to have far too much information on the working of this place. Some of it could undoubtedly come from careful observation of the staff, like the door code, but assuming the bank worked in much the same way as back home, the vault where presumably the cash had come from should have been closed and locked for most of the time. It would have taken them far more than the less than five minutes it actually did to break in and steal the cash on that trolley. They had somehow timed things to pick a point when it was open.

Thinking about it she realised that the armoured car delivery could be an explanation for that, it could be that the staff had opened the vault in preparation for it and the robbers had worked this fact out and capitalised on it. The leader certainly gave the impression of being very competent, she wouldn't have put it past him based on what she'd seen so far. Even so, there was still something not quite right about the whole thing she was still wondering about.

There was also the slightly worrying fact that they were making no attempt to hide their faces, even glancing occasionally at the cameras which were scattered around the place, feeding their pictures to some remote recording facility. Again, based on what she knew from dealing with banks for Mr Ito, and from his own shop, that facility might be in a back room somewhere in the building but was also just as likely to be another building. It made the chances of them disabling it from the outside fairly low unless they'd prepared by digging up the cables and cutting them, which in itself would require more information than should be easily available to the public.

If one used the movies as a guide, the lack of disguise could be taken as a very bad thing, because it might mean that despite their words they didn't intend to leave witnesses behind. Although eliminating nearly three dozen people in the process of robbing a bank seemed more bloodthirsty than was likely even in the US. No, she felt something else was going on but couldn't quite work out what it was. Glancing at Shampoo beside her she saw the Amazon was watching everything carefully as well and seemed thoughtful, a very small frown furrowing her brow as she followed the motions of the robbers with her eyes. Her friend had obviously picked up on something too.

Number 2 waited for the door to slide open then stepped outside and looked around again, before turning to his leader and opening his mouth to say something. Just as he began to speak a loud voice shouted, "Police! Drop your weapon and get on the ground!"

Akane sighed as the man instead after a very briefly startled expression dived back into the bank and rolled to a crouch beside the door, cautiously peering outside as the two halves slid shut, his weapon raised. The other robbers with the exception of number 4 all took cover, the skinny man looking around wildly for a couple of seconds before hiding behind the desk in the middle of the room. She watched with annoyed amusement. 'Oh, yes, definitely an amateur. Those guys, though, they know what they're doing. Unlike the police, who should have waited until they were all outside.'

"How many?" 1 called to 4, who risked another look.

"I can see two cars that are probably unmarked cop vehicles," the man reported, "And there's an LAPD cruiser trying to hide down an an alley across the street."

"More than trying," 3 said sourly, "You missed it when you opened the door." 2 gave his colleague an unfriendly look.
"OK, so sue me. I made a mistake."

"Pretty fucking big mistake," 3 muttered, subsiding when 1 glared at him.

"Shut up." He turned to the other man. "How many cops?"

Looking again, then pulling a small mirror from his pocket and holding it above his head to see out the window above him, 2 was silent for a moment. "Three or four plain-clothes, half a dozen uniforms." He paused, then swore nastily. "Two more cruisers just came around the corner."

Looking both ways he muttered to himself for a second or two, then lowered the mirror, turning to his leader. "The road is suspiciously empty as well. I think they've blocked it off out of sight."

"That's too damn competent," 1 replied, looking thoughtful. "We should have been gone before they reacted, but to close the road without us noticing they'd practically have had to be waiting for us. Someone told them what was going on." He scanned the faces of the hostages, most of whom refused to meet his gaze. Akane met his eyes wearing an innocent expression, not flinching, an inner grin widening as he moved on.

"Now what do we do?" 4 called from his hiding place, sounding slightly scared and very annoyed, not a good combination in someone holding a firearm. "You said we'd be in and out without any trouble, now we're trapped in here. Damn it, Joe, what the hell do we do next?"

"No names, you idiot," 1, or 'Joe' snarled to his companion, who grumbled to himself but fell silent. "Let me think."

He glanced over at 2 who was staring in the direction of his hidden colleague looking disgusted and shaking his head sadly. A significant look passed between the two men and 2 nodded slightly. "Lock the door again," Joe commanded. With a small sigh, 2 quickly checked the view, then darted across the doorway to a protected position on the other side, where the guard would normally stand, before standing up and quickly punching in the lock code. Once more the door slid shut.

After a moment's thought he put another code in, which immediately produced a rumbling sound from somewhere inside the wall. Everyone watched as steel roller shutters slowly slid down over the door and windows, stopping with a clunk at the bottom. They were clearly much more solid than the normal anti-theft shutters a lot of stores had, Akane noticed. She was familiar with them as Mr Ito's shop was fitted with the things.

"Good," Joe said, as his colleague walked over to him, glancing at the doors with a frown.

"That'll keep them out for a while, but now we're locked inside. What do we do?" his compatriot asked in a low voice. Akane could just hear them as they began discussing their next move, while keeping a close eye on the hostages, many of whom were looking much more worried now. She met Shampoo's eyes, sighing a little. It didn't look like they were going to be on time for the stunt work today after all.

"Who did that?" Harrison shouted, glaring around at the various cops hiding behind vehicles and in the second floor windows of the office block across the road from the bank. He was steaming, their entire ambush had just been wrecked by some over-zealous idiot. Rojas, beside him, sighed and pointed, the uniformed sergeant he was indicating looking embarrassed from his position a couple of vehicles away as everyone stared at him. "Michaels, you idiotic ass, we could have got them all outside the bank," the lieutenant carried on in an angry voice, "but now they're locked in with a bunch of hostages. Well fucking done." The man lowered his eyes to the ground and flushed red.

"Damn it," Harrison grumbled, glaring at the other cop for a little longer before turning back to his "Get him out of here before I shoot him myself." Rojas nodded silently, going over to the man while keeping under cover and talking to him in a heated low voice, the sergeant eventually escaping the dressing down and leaving the scene. Returning to his co-lieutenant Rojas smirked slightly.

"He's an idiot, but I think that was genuinely a mistake," he said.

"Doesn't fix it, though, does it?" Harrison muttered. Raising a hand for silence, he cupped the other one over the earpiece he was wearing, the cable going to a cell-phone in his pocket which had the call from Akane's still-active phone forwarded to it, as well as to a number of other places including a recorder back at the station. "Quiet, they're talking again."

He listened intently to as much of the conversation as he could make out. "Well, we have at least one name, Joe. That seems to be the guy in charge."

"Doesn't help much without a last name," Rojas commented idly, peering around the truck they were crouched behind to watch the building carefully.

"True, but we managed to get a couple of photos of three of them through the window. With those and the name we might get somewhere." Harrison listened some more. "They're talking too quietly to make out the words," he reported, irritated.

"We can't go in through the back door with those charges in place." Rojas sighed a little. "This is a weird one. They seem to have a lot of inside information."

"I was thinking the same thing," Harrison mused. "The door codes are one thing, but from what I could hear they knew exactly when to attack, which is a little more than I'd have thought they'd work out from watching, unless they've been setting it up for months. Which is possible, I guess, but it's a lot of work to go to for one fairly small bank branch. Not to mention they seem to have times allocated for each stage." He risked another look at the door of the bank with a pair of binoculars he had around his neck, trying to see if any of the people inside were visible. Unfortunately the security shutters had blocked the view completely except for a couple of small viewing slots. "That's annoyingly good security as well, it's going to be a pain to get through."

"Someone on the inside is working for them, I think," his colleague said slowly. Harrison nodded.

"That's my guess."

A couple of minutes passed while everyone watched the bank, until Rojas tapped his co-officer on the shoulder. "The regional bank manager is here, so is SWAT." Looking around, Harrison noticed a late-middle-aged white man with obviously dyed hair nervously approaching wearing a borrowed LAPD flak jacket, a couple of heavily armed officers beside him carrying transparent riot shields they were keeping between themselves and the bank to provide cover. Stopping behind the van the robbers had arrived in, which several forensics officers were ransacking, the three men waited for Harrison and Rojas to join them.

"Lieutenant Richard Harrison, LAPD," Harrison said as he arrived, holding out his hand. The bank representative shook it quickly.

"Wilson Jefferson, I'm the regional manager for Calibank."

"OK, Mr Jefferson, can you give us any more information on this whole thing? What was being delivered in that armoured car? Who knew about it?"

The manager looked worried for a moment, obviously unwilling to say anything, but at a hard look from both lieutenants finally sighed. "It's actually a collection, not a delivery. There was a very large amount of cash paid into the bank yesterday from a client who purchased a property downtown. Much more than a branch like this would normally hold. We arranged to have it collected by the armoured car company, but in a way that looked like a normal cash delivery for security reasons, then it was to be transferred to the main branch."

"Who knew about it?" Rojas asked.

"Myself, the branch manager Arthur Steiner, the senior teller Paul Bouchard, and the head of security for the branch David Lemann."

"That's it?"

"Yes. And the client, of course."

"Who is?"

Jefferson looked even more worried. "I'm not at liberty to say," he eventually replied.

Both cops exchanged glances, then looked back at the man, who was sweating slightly. "We need to know," Harrison told him fairly sharply. "There's obviously an information leak, those robbers know way too much about all this for it to be an accident, so we need to check everyone who might have any knowledge about the transaction. It's clearly not a coincidence that this happened right at the point there was all that cash ready to go."

Sweating harder, Jefferson looked unconvinced and now really quite worried. Harrison stared at him. Glancing from side to side the man looked at the two SWAT officers, who met his gaze evenly, then looked back to the lieutenant. After several more seconds of internal debate, he sighed heavily. "I'm going to get in trouble for this," he muttered.

"Who was it?" Harrison asked once more, feeling that there was something funny going on. "Organised crime?" That was his top guess based on the information they currently had. The manager looked momentarily surprised, then slightly affronted, before laughing for a moment and shaking his head.

"Not exactly," he replied, "depending on your definition." He shrugged, sighing again. "The CIA."

Harrison and the other three cops all stared at him for some moments.

"The CIA," Rojas said in a flat tone.

"Yes."

"The Central Intelligence Agency of the USA," he clarified.

"Yes."

"Bought something and paid in cash. Into that bank." He pointed over his shoulder with his thumb.

"Yes." The manager ran his hand through his hair. "From what we were told, which wasn't very much, they're doing some sort of deep undercover operation which involved purchasing a small office block in a manner that couldn't be traced back to them through the normal methods, or something along those lines. I don't have the details and most of what I do know I worked out from the paper trail. It's all very black ops, hush hush spy stuff. Right out of a TV show. They went through the head office and arranged it."
"I'd have thought they'd have done it in such a way no one knew," Harrison commented. "Through dummy corporations and that sort of thing."

"The amount of cash was large enough that they had to tell us something because of money laundering regulations, or it could have been held up for weeks while everything was investigated," Jefferson replied. "That would have eventually involved the FBI, which they seem to want to avoid. I don't think they were very happy about it but apparently it was a rush job that needed to be completed in something like twenty-four hours. I have no idea why. The money was counted and credited to an overseas account, the seller transferred it out of that immediately, everyone went away happy, and we're left with a huge amount of cash lying around in a bank that isn't rated for it."

"Why did they use a branch office rather than the main one, in that case?"

"Again, I have no idea, we weren't told. They insisted on this branch."

"OK." Harrison sighed slightly. "I hate getting involved with jobs involving those guys, they're a pain in the ass at the best of times. Damn it." He looked at the manager. "So I suppose the big question is how much are we dealing with?"

After a second or two, the man replied quietly, "Forty-three million dollars." Harrison nearly stopped breathing and Rojas said something extremely rude in Spanish. Both SWAT officers coughed a little in surprise.

"Fuck me," Harrison finally said. "Forty-three million? In cash?"

"Yes, new hundred dollar bills in stacks of one hundred, ten thousand dollars per stack. Four thousand three hundred stacks. It weighs nearly half a ton."

"That's a lot of cash," Rojas said in a stunned voice.

Jefferson nodded with a small sigh. "It is. Much more than we'd ever store in a branch like this under normal circumstances. You can understand why we wanted to transfer it as fast as possible."

"I certainly can," Harrison replied, shaking his head in wonder. "Christ. OK, then, we know what they were after. Now we have to get them out of there before anyone else dies."

"We have... let's say we have a way to listen in on what's going on inside. There was a lot of shooting when they arrived and some more shots later. From what we can gather at least one guard was killed."

The manager looked appalled. "Do you know who it was?"

"No. But we're dealing with some very ruthless people, that much is certain. And much better informed than they should be." Harrison looked back at the bank for a few seconds, before returning his attention to the other man. "Where is the CCTV feed for the bank recorded?"

"Internally in the security office, and in the central branch security facility."

"We'll need to be able to tap into that."

Jefferson shook his head. "You can't. I've checked already, the feed from the bank went dead about thirty seconds before all this started." Everyone looked at him, then each other.

"Well, that settles it, they have someone on the inside," Rojas remarked. "There's no way that's a coincidence."

"No, it isn't." Harrison thought for a moment. "All right, Mr Jefferson, I want you to go with Lieutenant Rojas here and get every scrap of information you can on the people who work in there, this transaction, the armoured car company, and the security and communications of the branch." Jefferson nodded, not looking happy about the whole situation, but complying. The two men left, disappearing into an LAPD truck that had pulled up while they were talking. "You guys, is the robot ready?" the officer asked, turning to the SWAT men.

"Nearly, we're setting it up now. We've also blocked outgoing phone lines to the building and we're ready to cut the power whenever you want, sir," the sergeant on the right replied.

"Hold off on that for the moment. Get the robot over to the door and get me some images of the inside of that place first," Harrison said, thinking hard.

"OK. We'll have something in about five minutes."

Nodding absently, Harrison raised a hand to his ear as he heard something through Akane's phone.

"Is even that amount of money worth the lives of two people and injuring another one?" Akane asked quietly, looking at the trolley heaped with plastic-wrapped blocks of banknotes, then at the man they knew as Joe. He looked back at her for a moment.

"Truthfully, miss, yes it is," he finally replied with a tiny smile. "And more besides. People have died for a lot less than forty-three million dollars, believe me."

A couple of people gasped, whether due to his attitude or the figure mentioned. The Tendo sister shook her head sadly. "You seem like a very bad person," she told him. He shrugged.

"Possibly. I don't know or care to be honest. I just want this money."

"Do you intend to kill us all?" She met his eyes calmly, although inside she was furious.

"I don't intend to do that, certainly. I've got better things to do with my time, but what happens depends on the cops." He smiled at her. "I'm not saying it's not going to happen, though. So be a good girl and just lie there quietly, that way you have a better chance of coming through this." Three of the female hostages started crying as he finished speaking.

After a moment, Akane stated, "I don't think they're going to let you just walk out with all that."

"We'll see," he smirked. "You'd be amazed what happens when you shoot a few people then threaten to shoot the rest." She stared at him, as did everyone else.

"A very cold blooded approach to life. Did you learn that in the military?" Joe looked slightly surprised then inspected her more carefully.

"You're very perceptive and taking this a lot more calmly than I'd expect, girl. I wonder why?" She said nothing, merely kept watching him. Beside her, Shampoo had tensed almost unnoticeably, ready to act if it became necessary. "Enough questions." He raised his weapon and gestured meaningfully with it. She fell silent, hoping Richard had heard all that. It might help.
"Clever," Harrison muttered. "She's told us the casualties and got us some information on their motivation. The military comment is useful as well." He turned to Rojas as the other lieutenant came back with a clipboard in his hand. "Check military ID databases first for that name. Akane more or less got him to admit he's ex-military, or even active. The others might be as well." His colleague nodded, handing him the clipboard and hurrying back to the truck.

"Sir?" One of the SWAT men tapped him on the shoulder, then indicated a vehicle that had pulled up down the street and was disgorging men in suits.

"Shit. I was hoping they'd hold off a little longer," Harrison groaned. Another car pulled up behind the SUV that was clearly full of FBI agents, his own captain getting out and talking to one of the dark-suited men, before both of them came over. "Captain," he said politely, nodding to the older man.

"Lieutenant, this is Senior Special Agent Mark Tinnin of the FBI, from the Los Angeles department." The FBI man shook hands with him, then turned to look at the bank across the street.

"Fill me in on what's going on, please, Lieutenant," he requested. With a small inner sigh Harrison did so, quickly bringing them both up to speed on the current situation. Both men looked somewhat shocked at the amount of money involved, the FBI agent sighing heavily when the involvement of the CIA was brought up. "Oh, for god's sake, those idiots are a damn liability sometimes," he muttered grumpily. "They're not supposed to be screwing around inside the US. We're always having to clean up after them." Looking sharply at Harrison, who was suppressing a grin, he added sharply, "I didn't say that."

"Of course not, Agent Tinnin," the police officer agreed blandly.

"So this Akane Tendo you mentioned. She gave the alarm that the place was going to get hit?"

Harrison nodded. "Yes. Akane is a clever young woman with very good instincts. She's managed to get a surprising amount of information to us, including an audio tap into the bank via her cell-phone. If it hadn't been for her in all likelihood the suspects would have been long gone before we got to hear about it. From what we've been able to find out they had a very good idea of the normal response time. There's also a very strong probability that they had inside help."

The FBI agent turned to one of his own people who had approached them. "Get me background information on one Akane Tendo, Japanese citizen," he ordered. "From..." He turned to Harrison.

"Nerima, Tokyo," the policeman filled in. The other agent nodded and pulled out a phone, dialling and moving off to have a conversation. "Why do you want that information?" Harrison asked curiously.

"I like to know who I'm dealing with," Tinnin replied absently, inspecting the bank through a pair of binoculars. "Can she be trusted to keep her head in a crisis?" Harrison snickered, making the man look at him.

"Oh, I think that's a given. She's not the one I'd be worried about, believe me." The agent raised an eyebrow. "She's one of the most dangerous martial artists I've ever even heard of," he went on, "along with her friend Shampoo. Those idiots in there seem to think they've locked us out. What they're really done is lock themselves in with two young women who could take them apart without even trying, if they get annoyed enough. Hopefully it won't come to that but if they need to take the gloves off, well..." He shrugged. "We may need to get some mops."

Tinnin stared at him, then the bank. "I find that hard to believe," he said slowly. "Two young women against four armed men who are obviously not worried about collateral damage?"

Harrison sighed, smiling at the same time as he thought back to what he'd seen at their first demonstration and a conversation he'd had last night with Adrian. "I think the risk of collateral damage is the only reason this whole event hasn't come to an end yet."

They were interrupted by the other agent, who came back holding a few pages of fax paper. "This is what we've got so far on Tendo, Akane, of Nerima, Tokyo," he reported, handing them over.

Agent Tinnin began reading, going slightly pale in the process, before looking up. "Are you sure about this?" he asked. The other man nodded.

"It's been verified."

"Fuck," Tinnin said quietly.

---

Nabiki, we seem to have a problem, # Jun said quietly in her head. The middle Tendo sister was sitting in a seat near the front of the train from Kobe, her head leaning against the window, a few minutes away from the station in Nerima.

Without opening her eyes she asked, 'What sort of problem, Jun?'

The SI gave the impression of almost sighing. #Your sister has managed to get caught up in a bank robbery in Los Angeles,# it replied.

'What?' Nabiki opened her eyes at that, looking out into the darkness lit by street lights from the outskirts of Tokyo as they passed through. 'How the hell did that happen?'

It would appear to be purely accidental,# Jun said. It hesitated for a moment. #I intercepted a request from the FBI in Los Angeles to the PSIA for background information on Akane. They passed along the requested data derived from both their own records and those collated from the police in Nerima. It would seem that they have only sent the bare rudiments of information on your sister, but I would expect that even so this will cause a certain amount of interest to the FBI. As you're aware Akane has a certain reputation...# Nabiki sighed very faintly, although she smiled a little.

'True enough. You seem to be becoming very proactive in your information gathering recently, Jun.' She felt it was slightly embarrassed but also pleased.

It is a matter of your security, and therefore my duty to keep you informed of anything that might cause you issues. That includes problems involving your family.#

'You've been keeping an eye on them?'

Essentially, yes. I hope you aren't annoyed about it. I felt it was best to be discreet, I'll stop if you want me to.#

'No, Jun, I trust your judgement,' she replied, snickering a bit. 'I suspect the authorities might have other ideas but they're not going to find out, are they?'

I have no intention of letting them, certainly,# it told her with a dry tone which caused her to laugh again.

'So, what's going on with Akane? Is Shampoo involved as well?'
Yes. Both of them apparently accompanied Adrian Stewart into the bank in question, which was involved in a robbery mere minutes later. It seems that Akane in fact raised the alarm, calling Lieutenant Harrison slightly before the criminals began their crime. She has arranged to leave her cell-phone active and hidden so the police are able to listen in on what's going on inside. The bank is locked down, explosive charges have been rigged on all the entrances except the front door, and there are currently four gunmen and thirty-three living hostages inside, with two fatalities. One of the hostages is apparently injured, the seriousness of their injuries is unknown. LAPD and FBI personnel are surrounding the building with SWAT teams deployed.

Nabiki listened to the report from the SI with some shock, and a certain amount of pride. 'Clever Akane,' she thought to herself with a small smile mixed with worry for her sister and Shampoo. 'What are they planning to do?' she asked.

The police are currently deploying a bomb-disposal robot to investigate the facility. They don't yet seem to have a specific plan of attack. I would assume that they will bring in a hostage negotiator as per standard practice, then attempt to talk the suspects into releasing the people in the bank. The information I have so far gathered suggest that this is unlikely to work. There is an extremely large amount of cash involved which is apparently the driving motive and it is also probable that at least some of the perpetrators are military trained. The LAPD hasn't yet scanned the photographs they've managed to take of the people in the bank into their computers. As soon as they do I will have access to them and will probably be able to give identities on all four people involved very soon after that. Most likely much faster than the LAPD can manage. It sounded slightly smug about this last point.

'I would expect nothing else, Jun,' she told it.

Thank you, Nabiki, the machine replied in a pleased tone.

As the train slowed to a halt at the station, she got up and headed for the door, calling Kasumi and the others on the way. "Guys? You busy? We may need to go to LA..."

"This Tendo woman apparently knows both Yori and Chou," Agent Tinnin said with a slight tremor in his voice for a moment. He cleared his throat, coughing a little. The other FBI agent looked mildly puzzled.

"Who are they?" he asked curiously. "Both those names are vaguely familiar..."

"They're seriously bad news that the Japanese have enormous respect for," Tinnin replied, still reading the fax. "There was a bulletin circulated just after the New Year to all department heads about them. Basically it's 'Try hard not to annoy them if they turn up and really try not to give them a reason to turn up in the first place.'" He looked up, glancing at both LAPD officers, then his own colleague. "The New York Special Agent In Charge apparently met Chou during that operation in Times Square. He doesn't want to meet her again. From what the bulletin said her friend Yori is even worse."

"They're not that bad," Harrison chuckled, suddenly hugely amused about the whole thing. "I thought they were very nice people when they came to my house for a barbecue." Agent Tinnin stared at him while Captain Martinez grinned. "I know both of them quite well, Agent. They're good people."

"Appallingly dangerous good people," the FBI man replied after a moment. Harrison nodded happily.
"Oh, yes, more than you could believe, but still very polite and helpful."

"And this Akane Tendo is a friend of theirs?" the man asked carefully. Harrison nodded again.

"Yes, Yori was actually the one who started the whole thing that led to both Akane and Shampoo meeting Adrian, the film director whose studio is probably going to hire them both. He's a friend as well. They're here for stunt training and martial arts demonstrations in a really complicated job interview."

"Damn it," Tinnin mumbled. "And now they're trapped in that damn bank with four killers and a lot of other hostages. This could get messy if they get hurt. I'm not going to get a lot of praise if we end up with some sort of international incident over the whole situation."

"It's not Akane or Shampoo who are going to get hurt, Agent, trust me," Harrison assured Tinnin, who didn't look any happier at the comment.

"Sorry, Nabiki, I was helping my mother with some family business for hours today so I haven't been in LA," Aiko said apologetically. "I should have left a drone shadowing Akane and Shampoo, maybe we could have stepped in before it got to this point, but I didn't think they were likely to have anything weird happen." She sighed slightly. "Silly mistake, especially after the other night. They don't attract the crazy as much as we do but they still get a lot more of it than most people."

"Don't worry, Aiko, you had no way of knowing," Nabiki reassured her friend. "Akane and Shampoo can take care of themselves and you've been helping them out a lot over the last few days as well. I'm grateful you've put so much time in on it. Thanks."

The petite brunette smiled at her friend. "It's no trouble, really. I like both of them, you're family anyway, of course I was going to help. It's been a lot of fun. I've got some amazing recordings from LA to show you all later, but I took my drones with me when I came back."

"What do think we should do?" Fumiko asked the room at large. Everyone present looked at each other for a few seconds.

"The obvious thing is to teleport into the bank while shielded, set up a ward around the hostages, then deal with the robbers," Ranma slowly mused. "But..."

"But it's not going to do Akane much good in the long term if we come flying in to save her every time. We don't want her feeling she's dependent on us, or that we're interfering too much," Kasumi finished for him. He nodded.

"Especially since we are to a degree. We can't risk the hostages, we'll need to shield them anyway, but I think it might be best to see how it plays out for the moment. Shampoo and Akane aren't in any real danger from what Nabiki says. It'll take more than some handguns and a couple of small machine guns to seriously hurt either of them, although if they do get shot they'll certainly have a lot of bruises." Ranma looked amused when the others laughed, although the two remaining Tendo sisters exchanged glances then gave him a hard look. "What? They'll live and it will be good training about moving more quickly."

"They both did pretty well in the bullet catching exercises," Aiko snickered, "Although we weren't trying it with an AK-47. Those sting a bit the first couple of times." Everyone looked at her curiously.

"When did you get shot with an AK-47?" Misaki asked slowly.
"You know. Around. It happens," the brunette replied slightly evasively. Her team-mates gave her a look, then Fumiko glanced at her sister, the two of them obviously deciding to get the story out of their friend at some point soon. Tamiko watched with a grin before turning to Ranma and the two Tendo women who were also studying the brunette with interested expressions.

"So we go and give some very discreet backup if it's needed, but otherwise stay in the background?" she asked. Ranma looked at her, then Nabiki, before nodding.

"I think that's a good idea." He turned to the middle sister. "We've had half a dozen small incursions this last week not including Chiyoko and her little friends, nothing too serious but it's caused a few medical problems. I think I should probably stay here with Misaki and Fumiko just in case. You go with Kas, Tamiko, and Aiko. Kas can provide medical help and shielding at least as well as I can."

Nabiki thought for a moment then shrugged. "Why not, it's not like I was looking forward to bed or anything." She laughed when he snickered.

"The life of a magical girl is fraught with late nights," he chuckled.

"All too true, I've found out over the last year or so," she sighed. Standing, she shimmered and changed. "However, Mr Saotome, I believe a small modification to your suggestion is in order. I will be accompanying Ms Tendo and her companions to the incident in Los Angeles. Ms Akane Tendo and Ms Xian Pu are of interest to both myself and my employers and it would be remiss of me not to observe their current interactions with the forces of criminal mischief personally. I take my responsibilities covering such matters seriously, as you are aware." The icy woman gave a very small smile.

Ranma grinned. "Of course, Ms Aoyama. As you say."

The green-haired alter-ego of Nabiki cocked her head slightly, then stated, "The LAPD has uploaded their photographs of the perpetrators to their computer system. Jun has established identities for all four of the men in question, in addition to other intriguing data."

Ranma looked amused then turned to the others, who were also grinning, Tamiko slightly uncertainly. "Have fun. Try not to break LA, we'd never hear the end of it."

"Should we tell Agent Naito, see if he wants to come?" Tamiko asked. Ranma nodded again.

"I'll let him know about it. Aiko, if he needs to come over, can you come and get him, please?"

"Of course." The petite woman smiled. "I've always got time for Masao. OK, then, shall we go?" She turned to the others who were coming with her. 'Ms Aoyama' inclined her head slightly in agreement, making Tamiko shake her own as she got up and moved to stand next to her. Kasumi stepped forward as well, becoming 'Chou' in the process.

"You're getting far too good at that, Nabiki," the red-head said with admiring horror. A quick grin quite atypical of the cold woman flashed across 'Ms Aoyama's' face for a second then smoothed out into the normal expressionless gaze.

"Thank you, Ms Arai. Your comments are noted and appreciated." The voice was chilly enough to freeze mercury at ten paces.

"Far too good," Tamiko muttered in a low voice. Laughing, Aiko did her thing and the four women disappeared in a rainbow flash. Shaking his head with amusement, Ranma turned to his remaining friends.
"I'll call Masao, then we should probably run a quick sweep to see if anything weird is happening," he said, shimmering into 'Yori' as he spoke. Misaki tossed the resulting female an apple, handed her sister another one, then bit into a third. All three of them left the room.

"Oh, hell, who's that?" Naito mumbled as the phone beside the bed beeped, rolling over and extracting his arm from beneath his wife, who muttered sleepily to herself, then raised his head to look at the clock. "Half past too damn late."

"You know who it's going to be, dear," his wife said in a tired voice, before dropping off again. Blinking, he smiled a little, then answered the phone without looking at the display.

"Hello, Yori. I assume things are hitting the fan again?"

The voice of the martial artist came to him over the device with a note of amusement in it. "Afraid so, Masao, although with any luck not too badly. You're aware of Akane Tendo, I assume?"

"I am," he replied, sitting up and rubbing his eyes with the heel of his free hand. "Dangerous martial artist from Nerima, cause of a significant percentage of the various serious incidents there for some years, although she's much less active in that respect since you did something medical to her."

"That's the one," Yori laughed. "Although to be fair to her, she's not actually the cause of a lot of it, even though she was certainly involved quite often. And the medical thing was a nasty one that was the heart of a lot of her issues, now it's fixed she's becoming a very decent person. Always was, really, just had a lot of other things causing problems."

"The last I heard she was travelling to and from from LA, something about breaking into the movies? Some studio director was very taken with her and her friend Shampoo, that Chinese Amazon girl who's even more dangerous than Ms Tendo is." Naito yawned widely, blinking a few times, then got out of bed and wandered into the kitchen to make a cup of coffee.

"Correct, yet again. Yes, I introduced her to Adrian Stewart, you remember, from Richard's barbecue after that problem we had around New Years?"

"Ah. All becomes clear," Naito laughed, filling the kettle and turning it on. "Yes, I remember Adrian well. He seemed like a decent man."

"He is, very much so. She and Shampoo have been in LA for several days doing demonstrations and stunt training, Aiko's been there for a lot of it and she says it's going very well indeed. The pair of them are certainly going to get jobs out of it from what I hear, something I'm kind of pleased about. Anyway, the reason I'm calling you is to let you know that something happened."

Naito sighed, sitting at the kitchen table and watching the kettle start to rumble. "Something nice and easy to deal with that won't cause any long term issues?" he asked hopefully.

"Sort of." The young woman sounded simultaneously amused and slightly worried. "But not quite. She and Shampoo somehow found themselves in the middle of a rather nasty bank robbery."

There was silence for a moment, broken by the sound of the kettle boiling, then a loud click as it turned off. "Damn," he finally said.

"It's not ideal, certainly. They were in the wrong place at the wrong time as far as we know. Akane was the one who raised the alarm, she called Richard since Aiko wasn't available, and was very clever about it, she left her phone on and hid it so the police can listen in on the robbers without them knowing. But it's not very good even so. They've already shot and apparently killed two guards and wounded another one, and are now barricaded in the bank with something like forty-three million dollars in cash, thirty-three hostages, and an unknown amount of weapons and explosives."

"Fuck." Naito shook his head, before filling a cup with boiling water and adding instant coffee, stirring it while he thought. "I suppose Akane and Shampoo aren't actually the ones in danger. If the reports I've seen are anything like accurate the robbers are playing with fire." He sighed heavily. "That's all we need, Akane Tendo demolishing a bank in a fit of super-powered rage."

Yori snickered. "I doubt that will happen without extreme provocation. She's a vastly calmer person nowadays, and not even close to stupid. Untrained, certainly, in the sort of things we do, but she's got potential. Her current employer in Nerima thinks very highly of her security skills. But I agree we need to keep an eye on things. Aiko, Chou, and Tamiko have gone to provide any backup and medical oversight that might be needed, just in case. The others and I are staying here because of all the little things that seem to have been happening recently, we didn't think it was a good idea to leave en masse."

"Probably for the best, in both cases," Naito said, relaxing slightly. He sipped his coffee, wincing as it scorched his tongue. "I suppose I should probably look into it."

"The FBI already requested background information on Akane from your lot, who provided just enough to keep them happy," Yori told him. "I'd guess that the PSIA was going to call you at some point soon, I just beat them to it."

With a momentarily curious look he asked, "How do you know that?" before realising the likely answer. "Don't tell me. Ms Aoyama."

"Yep. She's quite interested in Akane for some reason, and Shampoo," the magical girl laughed. "Any idea why?" He was morbidly curious, shivering a little at the thought of the alien woman.

"I believe the answer is That information is unavailable," she replied, doing a worryingly accurate impression of the other woman's voice. He shivered again, harder.

"Please don't do that," he begged, "The real thing is bad enough."

"Sorry. She's gone with Aiko and the others to see what's going on."

Shaking his head, Naito tried the coffee again, finding it was now drinkable. "I almost pity the robbers, now." He quickly finished the drink, rinsing out the cup and putting it on the side of the sink. "Can Aiko hop me over?"

"Sure. She can be outside your building in a couple of minutes."

"Thanks. Let me get dressed again, I'll meet her as soon as I do. Thanks for letting me know, Yori."

"Any time, Masao. Say hi to Akane and Shampoo for me when you see them, OK? And have fun." She snickered again as he groaned slightly.

"Fun. Yes, let's go with that. Good-bye, Yori." He disconnected and dropped the cell-phone to the table, scrubbing his face with his hands, before heading off to get dressed and check in with the office.
Everyone in the bank, even the robbers, twitched a little when the phone behind the tellers desk rang, the trilling sound echoing in the large room. "Ah. I was wondering when that would happen," Joe commented, although Akane had noticed him jump slightly even so. He walked over to the opened security door, disappearing through it and reappearing behind the glass, then waited a few more rings before picking up the receiver. "Calibank, how may I direct your call?" he asked politely, grinning at them all. Number 2 gave him a look of resigned irritation while 4 giggled a little, 3 simply stoically covering the hostages with his weapon.

He listened for a few seconds, a look of surprise going across his face, before it cleared and he looked carefully around, then up at the cameras. Covering the receiver he motioned to 2, who came over and leaned down so they could converse through the shielded gap in the bullet-proof glass.

"You're certain the cameras are off?" he asked quietly, although Akane could hear him easily enough over the low background noise. The other man nodded.

"Yes, the recording system is disabled and the external link is cut," he reported. Joe looked mildly puzzled but waved his colleague away, removing the hand covering the phone.

"Good trick," he commented. "OK, here are our demands. We want our van parked outside with a full tank of gas, the back doors open and the ramp down, within two hours. Two of my men will load the money into it. My guys will check the van very carefully, if it's tampered with, or a tracking device is put in it, or anything else seems wrong, we will shoot four hostages. If you take more than two hours we shoot a hostage every fifteen minutes until we get what we want. Do you understand?" He listened to the response, shaking his head sadly.

"No. We're not letting anyone go until we're out of your reach. Now, assuming you do as you're told, we will then proceed to take six hostages and place them in the van as well. We will get into it and drive, with a police escort, to the Mexican border, where you will let us cross. No one will enter the bank until we tell you it's safe, or the booby-traps kill everyone in it. If we are stopped or delayed, we execute a hostage every half hour until we're moving again. Do you understand that part as well?" Once more he listened. A few seconds passed as everyone in the bank tried to hear what was going on.

"If at any point we decide that you have made it impossible for us to escape, we will remote-detonate the charges we have laid around the building, killing every hostage here. We have the capability to perform this action right up to the time we're in Mexico. If anyone attempts to enter the bank or leave the bank the same thing will happen. On the other hand, if we are allowed to leave as I have just outlined, we will disable the charges, hand the detonator to one of the hostages we take with us, then let them go. Everyone lives and all it costs you is forty-three million dollars which is all covered by insurance anyway. I'd think that was a small price to pay. Just think of the headlines tomorrow otherwise."

Akane noticed number 4 was looking puzzled, about to say something when 3 caught his attention and mimed zipping his mouth shut. The younger man seemed annoyed but complied. Joe listened to the other end, presumably a cop or some sort of professional negotiator, then shook his head again. "No. Like I said, you get something from us after you do something for us. Not before." He sighed slightly at whatever he was hearing. "You seem to fail to realise that we're holding all the cards here."

Whatever the other person said made him grin maliciously. "You go off and talk about it with your superiors, that's a good boy, and get back to me when they see sense. Don't worry, we're not that trigger-happy, no one is going to kill anyone else unless you do something stupid. We're professionals, I hope you realise?" Snickering at the response he hung up, coming back into the
"What the hell was that about, Joe?" 4 erupted, looking very confused. The other three glared at him but he didn't seem to notice. "We don't have any remote detonator for the explosives and there aren't enough there to destroy the building anyway."

"For fuck's sake, you idiot, will you at least try to remember, no names!" Joe looked irritated. "And they have no idea what we have or don't have. As long as they think we can kill everyone in the bank at any moment they'll do what we say. We'll let them think about it for a while."

"They're never going to go for it," 2 said quietly. Joe looked at him, shrugging a little.

"Of course not. But it gives us some breathing room."

"What do you intend to do if they refuse?" Akane asked, making everyone look at her. "Will you start killing people?"

"I could start with you, girl," Joe commented idly, waving his weapon at her carelessly. She just watched him. Something in her eyes seemed to make him slightly uncomfortable and he stopped waving the gun around, instead unconsciously pointing it more directly at her, which was fine by her. She was much less likely to get killed than most of the others were. After a few seconds, he shrugged. "I might follow through on it, to keep them guessing. I don't have any particular problem with it, if that's what you're trying to work out. So, for the last time, will you please shut up?"

Looking at him for a moment longer she let a small hard smile cross her face, before dropping her forehead to the cool marble floor, watching out of the corner of her eye as he relaxed a very small amount. 'I seem to worry him, the poor thing,' she thought to herself, winking at Shampoo who was watching as well. The Amazon winked back. 'I really hope that Richard is listening to all this.'

After apparently thinking something over, Joe nodded to himself, pulling an odd-looking phone from his pocket. Dialling one-handed, he held it to his ear, waiting for an answer. A few seconds later he said "Porcupine Anvil Cactus Seven Two." All the hostages exchanged puzzled looks. There was a pause, then he began talking.

"Problem, I'm afraid," he said. There was another pause, longer this time. "It wasn't our fault. Either you have a leak or somehow someone got a message out. They were practically waiting for us. I would like to very politely ask how the FUCK that happened?" He nearly shouted the obscenity. Once again, he waited, looking angry, as whoever he was talking to replied.

"No, I'm telling you, everything was going exactly to plan. But by the time we were ready to leave, three minutes ahead of schedule I'd like to mention, there were cops everywhere. I assume the Feds have probably dropped in by now as well."

He listened to the response. "Two dead, one injured, thirty three captured," he reported, looking around the room. "All communications confiscated. The cargo is in hand. All we need is an exit strategy. I've got them running in circles, I can probably keep it up for a few hours, especially if we give them some more bodies to think about, but eventually either they're going to get tired of waiting or something else will go wrong. This was supposed to be a quick in and out mission not a siege."

Akane wondered who he was talking to. She looked over to Adrian, seeing the director was listening intently while keeping an eye on both her and Shampoo. The Amazon was resting in a state of alert stillness, ready to leap into action much as she was, but until they could either pick them off one by one or somehow get the hostages to safety they couldn't do much, the risk was still...
"I have no idea. Don't put this on me. The ball is in your court right now. Do whatever you need to do or you'll never see your money." Joe looked even more angry at whatever the other person said. "I don't care. We held up our end of the deal, you hold up yours, or I'll find you wherever you go."

After a few more seconds, he nodded, calming down. "Fine. One hour, we can manage that. Don't be late." He pressed a button then dropped the phone into his pocket. Turning to his colleagues he smiled. "Everything is back on track, gentlemen."

"That's extremely interesting," Special Agent Tinnin said, glancing at Harrison. They, along with Captain Martinez, Lieutenant Rojas, and a couple of other FBI personnel, were all gathered around the back of the LAPD truck listening to the output from Akane's phone, which had been routed to a set of speakers. "It's a damn good thing this Tendo girl of yours was smart enough to give us a way to listen in."

"She's an intelligent and quick-thinking young woman," he agreed. "We've certainly learned some useful things as a result. I'm very curious as to why these men seem completely unconcerned about the hostages seeing their faces. It's something I'd be worried about in most cases, that normally means they don't intend to leave witnesses."

"True," the FBI agent mused. "Very true. But offing thirty-three people, even for over forty million, seems excessive. They must know they'd never get away if they did that."

"I'm more interested in who this 'Joe' character is and who he was just talking to," Captain Martinez noted. "He's ex-military for sure, or possibly even serving military. That identification code he used, the encrypted communications, it all points to that." He looked over at the technician manning a console connected to a huge array of radio equipment. "Any luck with that call?"

"No, Captain, it's encrypted very heavily and didn't use standard cellphone frequencies. I've never seen anything like it. You're probably right, it's most likely some sort of military phone or something like that." The woman looked annoyed. "If he uses it again I'll try to work out where the other end is but I can't promise anything. I can't break the encryption though, that I am sure of."

"Do what you can, corporal," he responded. Turning to the others, he added, "I would be very interested indeed to know who he was calling. The way he was talking he's expecting whoever it is to be able to get them out of all this. I can't see that happening right now."

"We've got an hour before whatever it is happens," Harrison commented, glancing at his watch. "We'll have to wait, I suppose." Rojas looked annoyed about this. "But what are we going to do in the mean time?"

"Keep acting as if we don't know about them, just go through the normal negotiation process, it's the safest thing at the moment," Harrison suggested. Tinnin and Martinez exchanged a glance and both nodded.

"It's all we can do for the moment." Tinnin didn't look happy about it. "Did your robot get us anything new?" Harrison waved to the leader of the SWAT team, who was leaning on their truck talking to one of his men. Seeing the lieutenant beckoning he nodded, said something to the other man, then jogged over.

"What's the current status with the robot, Sergeant?" he asked. The SWAT man pulled a folder from under his arm, opening it and scanning the contents.
"We've got some better photos from inside, we've just uploaded them to the computer for an ID trace, and we can confirm that there are four visible suspects, all armed. One pump action shotgun, an Uzi, an AK-47, and at least one hand gun from what we can see. They may have other weapons plus they'll have all the ones the bank guards and armoured car guys had. There are two apparent casualties, one body surrounded by too much blood to give much hope he's still alive and one wounded guard. Thirty-three people other than the apparent fatality."

"What about the explosives?" Tinnin asked. The sergeant sighed faintly.

"That much is true. We checked all the other doors, they're wired with proximity alarms and tripwires at the minimum. A very professional job. The best we can determine is that there is a substantial quantity of C4 on the other side of the doors, based on chemical sampling. We could probably disarm it given enough time but I wouldn't want to guarantee there wouldn't be a detonation. It would take several hours at least."

"And we have no idea about any other booby-traps either," Rojas said with a scowl.

"No. I doubt, based on what we can see, that it's all of it. They're using military explosives, military techniques, so it's entirely possible they had access to other antipersonnel weapons. For all I can tell the area inside the door could be full of claymores or something worse." The sergeant shrugged. "It's not something you want to rush into, certainly."

"Damn it. I hate competent criminals," Rojas replied sourly.

"They're certainly not making it easy," Harrison agreed. He looked at his captain. "It might be time we called on some friends ourselves," he added. His superior officer looked thoughtful, while beside him Tinnin seemed puzzled, then worried as he worked out what the officer meant.

"If you're thinking about asking Yori or Chou to come over, I'm not entirely in favour of that idea," the alarmed FBI agent said, shaking his head. "I know how much help they were over the last holiday period, both here and in New York, but I won't exactly get thanked about it if..."

"Don't worry, Agent, they're nice people. You seem to have some sort of mental picture that's making them out to be much worse than they are." Harrison grinned at him. "I'm damn sure that they and their friends could bring this to an end pretty quickly and with no further casualties. Just Aiko could probably stop it by herself."

Tinnin thought for a moment. "That's their teleporting girl isn't it?" he asked. The agent who had initially brought him the information on Akane looked puzzled, turning to the other more junior agent and raising his eyebrows. He merely got a shrug in reply.

"Yes. She's a nice girl, very smart, and also incredibly good at what she does. I'm proud to call her a friend." Harrison grinned. "She sorted out a small problem we had here with some gang warfare a couple of days ago in a remarkably short time." Rojas glanced at Martinez, the captain looking slightly less pleased, but saying nothing. "Unfortunately I'm not sure she's available, Akane told me she called me first because Aiko wasn't around."

"I'm still not sure..." Tinnin looked undecided. "The FBI isn't too happy about these people suddenly popping up and walking all over normal procedure, despite the fact that the LAPD seems fine with it." He looked hard at Captain Martinez, who smiled faintly at him.

"The position of the LAPD and the City of Los Angeles is that we have no issues with any of the young ladies in question although there have been a number of irregularities when they're around. Certain allowances have been made after consultation with the State Department, the Justice Department, and the PSIA in Japan." It had the ring of a formal statement, as if he'd practised it. "As long as they keep the collateral damage to a minimum the Mayor is fine with it as well." Harrison looked curiously at his superior, not having been privy to any of this before. It did explain a few things, though.

"It is gratifying to hear that your authorities are taking a sensibly pragmatic approach to the issues surrounding certain enhanced individuals, Captain Martinez," a terrifyingly cold voice suddenly said from behind them, making all of them jump and whirl around, Rojas and one of the FBI men reaching for their weapons. "The Japanese government has utilised such an approach for a considerable period of time which has resulted in a mutually beneficial series of events." They all stared at the green-haired woman in the expensive suit and incredibly dark glasses who was standing a few feet away watching them expressionlessly. Several cops were looking puzzled as they couldn't work out how she'd gotten past them, three of them heading over to her.

"Who the hell are you?" Tinnin demanded, looking startled and angry.

"Greetings. My apologies for any distress caused by my sudden appearance, Special Agent Tinnin. I am Ms Aoyama."

Harrison was interested to note that both Captain Martinez and Agent Tinnin went pale at the name. He recognised it himself, Laura Deveraux had told him something about some weird occurrence involving this woman and the University of Manitoba during her last email, although he didn't have any details.

"Ms Aoyama?" Tinnin managed to ask after a couple of seconds. The woman nodded once.

"Correct. It is agreeable to make your acquaintance." She gestured to the Japanese man standing next to her who looked mildly uncomfortable, as if he really wanted to step a few feet further away. "This is Agent Masao Naito of the PSIA, who is representing that agency on behalf of the Japanese government. His organisation has an interest in both Ms Tendo and Ms Pu, as do my own employers. We are here to observe the proceedings and provide aid where required."

"Hi, Masao," Harrison said quietly. The Japanese security agent nodded to him with a quick, unusually nervous smile, but said nothing for the moment.

"And who are your employers?" Tinnin managed to ask. "I've heard of you but no one seems to have an answer to that."

"That information is unavailable," she replied with cold calm.

He sighed. "I've heard about that as well."

"Indeed." The woman appeared, somehow without changing her expression, very slightly amused for a second or two. Slowly looking around at the people gathered around the vehicle, and at the technician staring out of the back of it at her, she nodded again. "We have made our own enquiries as to the identities of the criminals barricaded in the financial institution in question." As she began to add to this statement, there was a shout from behind her, one of the policemen who was manning the barricades preventing anyone from approaching pointing at her angrily as he came closer, one hand on a weapon on his belt.

"Who the hell are you? You're not supposed to be here, you need to get back behind the barriers right n..." His voice died with a gurgle as she turned very slowly and looked at him, the alien aura suddenly becoming much worse, almost oppressive. Stopping dead a few feet away and staring in horror, along with his two companions, he watched wide-eyed as she lowered her sunglasses and looked over them at him, paling considerably. Harrison thought it was particularly impressive bearing in mind he was black.

"As I already stated, I am Ms Aoyama, Officer Zamora. I am not enamoured of interruptions, I find them impolite. Please cease your activities and return to your post."

The man stared in shock, while the green-haired woman replaced her sunglasses then turned back to the people she'd been speaking with, dismissing him completely. "My apologies," she said to them. "To continue, we have established the identity and background of the four criminals involved in the current enterprise. The information is somewhat intriguing."

Harrison listened to her, but kept an eye on Zamora, based on previous interactions. The cop was fairly good at his job but in Harrison's judgement somewhat too quick to anger and prone to overreaction. Proved nicely by the fact that as soon as his colour resumed something approaching normality, he took a step back and pulled out his taser, pointing it at Ms Aoyama's back. Before anyone else could say anything, the woman sighed very slightly, still with her back to him, then said, "Officer, it would be in your best interests to cease your current action and return to your post. Your weapon will have none of the effects you are desirous of."

"I don't know who the hell you are, lady, but I don't like you," he shouted, ignoring his colleagues who were trying to get him to calm down.

"Zamora, stand down," Harrison snapped, not at all keen on seeing what would happen if the idiot managed to upset the 'woman' he was pointing a weapon at. Agent Naito was looking worried, while Tinnin seemed both curious and annoyed. "Go back to your post."

"Lieutenant, this woman just turned up out of nowhere, she hasn't shown any ID, and this is supposed to be a secure area," the officer said in return, not lowering his taser. Harrison was grateful that the man had at least remembered enough of his training not to pull his firearm instead. "Plus she knows my name! How did she do that?"

"It's on your name tag," Harrison sighed. Zamora looked down at his shirt for a moment, then looked embarrassed.

"Oh. Right." He still didn't lower the taser, though. "But, even so, she's not supposed to be here. All we have is a name, and a last name at that. Who is she really?"

Turning around again Ms Aoyama inspected the officer carefully. He flinched again when he apparently noticed her pointed ears for the first time, fixing his gaze on them for a few seconds, before looking around wildly. "And what is she?" he squeaked. "Her ears... her eyes... Lieutenant, something weird is going on."

"Please do as your superior requests, Officer Zamora," Ms Aoyama asked, surprisingly gently. "I am not a threat that you need to concern yourself with."

Zamora took another step back, looking even more worried. Captain Martinez, who up until now had remained silent, apparently content to let Harrison handle it, finally shook his head in irritation. "Officer, put your weapon away and go back to your post before I relieve you of duty." Seeming both flustered and slightly pissed off, Zamora finally nodded, putting his taser back into its holster and moving back with a sour expression. The captain looked at Ms Aoyama who was watching emotionlessly. "My apologies, Ms Aoyama," he said. "I'm also aware of you, your name came up in a recent briefing. While I'll admit to a very large amount of curiosity, at the moment I'm more interested in your information."
Turning back to the original group, she nodded once. "Then we shall proceed." She looked to the side where to Harrison's complete shock, and that of everyone else except possibly Naito, an image suddenly appeared floating in mid-air, solid and three dimensional. It was the head of a man, one Harrison recognised from looking into the bank with binoculars earlier. "This is Joseph Mitchells, Captain, US Army." A dossier of information from both civilian and military records appeared beside the image, insubstantial text slowly scrolling upwards. "He is thirty-seven years of age, born in Memphis, Tennessee, to Edna and Ryan Mitchells. Entered the United States Army in 1984, specialised in small arms and urban warfare techniques. He has a number of commendations on file for actions during battle, most recently in the conflict known locally as the Gulf War."

Everyone listened carefully, watching the data scroll past. It ended in a final entry highlighted in red. "Declared killed in action during the final days of Operation Desert Storm, February twentieth, 1991. No body was recovered." She looked around at them for a moment as everyone thought about that little fact.

"He looks pretty alive to me," Rojas commented.

"Indeed, Lieutenant Rojas," she agreed. "Reports of his demise would appear to be erroneous. However, there is a pattern present as I will demonstrate." The image and data changed to another man, this one black and slightly younger-looking than Mitchells. "This is Mr Julius Harris, former field agent for the Central Intelligence Agency. Thirty-five years of age, born in Baton Rouge, Louisiana. Veteran of a number of undercover operations in Central America where he specialised in what is somewhat euphemistically termed 'wet-works', more accurately described as assassination, at which he was quite skilled. Mr Harris disappeared during an operation in Nicaragua in 1989, being declared dead six months later when certain evidence came to light. No body recovered, once again."

Harrison studied the textual data beside the image, exchanging a glance with the Captain and Agent Tinnin. There was quite a lot of it, most of which he suspected was extremely classified. How this woman had got hold of it was something to ponder. Once more, the final entry was highlighted in red, showing the date of apparent death of the man in question.

The image and text changed again. "Vadim Yefremov, Major, Spetsnaz GRU, Russia. Thirty-nine years of age, born in Vladivostok. Specialist in electronic countermeasures, explosives, and intelligence operations. Also trained in hand to hand combat and anti-personnel techniques. Notes in his file suggest Major Yefremov is unconcerned about eliminating those he deems an obstruction, with thirty-four confirmed kills to his name. Disappeared and presumed dead in the aftermath of the events surrounding the dissolution of the Soviet Union at the end of 1991." The cold voice paused for a moment. "I trust you can determine the commonality between these three men."

"They're all dead, apparently," Tinnin said slowly, intently studying the image floating a few feet away. "And they all 'died' fairly close to each other in time, nearly ten years ago."

"Indeed." Ms Aoyama looked satisfied, somehow without changing her expression.

"What about the fourth suspect?" Tinnin asked. Without moving she somehow changed the image and data again.

"He is the outlier in the data. Mr Erico Soria, twenty-six years of age, born in Tucson, Arizona. Formerly employed by a number of Central American drugs cartels as an enforcer and hit-man. Mr Soria is implicated in some eighteen murders both in Mexico and the United States during the last nine years. He disappeared in Ciudad Juarez, Mexico, in July 1997, immediately following a major firefight between two competing factions, both of whom he had performed various functions for at different times over the previous five years. Again, presumed dead, although it must be said that there seems to have been little true interest in locating his remains." The woman raised an eyebrow for a moment, studying her own information. "It would appear that the majority of Mr Soria's acquaintances expressed small regret at his apparent demise."

"And now these 'dead' people are robbing banks in LA?" Rojas remarked, looking puzzled yet interested. "How the hell did that happen?"

"An intriguing question, Lieutenant Rojas," Ms Aoyama replied. "It is under investigation as we speak. However, at this precise point in time it seems somewhat more important to resolve the current stand-off with these individuals than to delve further into their background and motivations." She made a gesture to the bank across the road. "I have taken the liberty to ensure that the hostages are protected from the actions of their captors in the eventuality the situation deteriorates to the point of violence. Ms Chou has surrounded them with a ward of sufficient strength to prevent injuries."

"Chou's here?" Harrison asked, suddenly feeling much better about the whole issue. His fear of a bloodbath disappeared.

"She is, Lieutenant Harrison, as are Ms Tamiko and Ms Aiko. They are currently discreetly observing the hostages and their captors to prevent further bloodshed. We did not wish to step in until you, as the local authorities, were informed, since there is now no threat to life. However, as that task has now been completed, I believe that it might be best to bring the situation to a prompt end." Ms Aoyama produced a horrifying little smile that made everyone wince, chills running through them. "I wish to observe Ms Tendo's actions first hand. To that end I have requested that Ms Chou and her associates provide backup only in the case that it is required."

None of the gathered law enforcement people could think of any good reason, or indeed method, to stop her as she nodded to them, then turned and headed towards the bank. Harrison watched her go, shivering a little, before glancing at Naito, who also had his eyes on the woman. "Who the hell is she?" he asked quietly.

"In some ways your guess is as good as mine," the Japanese man replied, not looking away from the female figure as it stalked down the street. "I've been wondering myself for quite a while. No one can work it out, not with any degree of certainty. Our best guess is that she is an intelligence agent for an agency that isn't on this planet. Probably from one of the demon realities, I'd guess. They seem fairly friendly but based on her don't take kindly to anyone interfering with people they have an interest in, which seems to be anything to do with the magical girls specifically or the magical world in general. Why they're interested in Akane Tendo and Shampoo I have no idea."

He finally looked around. "We decided it was best not to interfere. Not that we can do much in any case, I suspect. Ms Aoyama has actually been very helpful several times in the past, she's one of the main reasons the Halleckton thing wasn't much worse than it was for example. She's certainly saved a lot of lives for us. I think she's friendly, in her terms at least, but I'm certainly never going to invite her out for a drink. The woman creeps the shit out of me."

"Human?" Harrison asked after mulling it over. Naito shrugged.

"Not as such, would be my guess, but I have no idea really."

"Weird."

"That's putting it mildly."
Special Agent Tinnin and his people were listening to their conversation, as were the SWAT personnel, all of whom were wearing peculiar expressions. "What does he mean, she's not human?" one of the FBI agents mumbled to his colleague. The other one shrugged, bemused. Naito smiled slightly, glancing back at them.

"Surely you've heard that the truth is out there, Agent?" he asked, making the man stare at him quite hard.

"Yes. I'm not sure I believe it though. I mean, space aliens and magic? Is that what you're talking about?"

"More or less, yes. Trust me, whatever you're thinking, I can practically guarantee it's actually weirder." Naito smiled a little more widely then went back to watching Ms Aoyama, who had reached the bank. She stopped in front of the door, then politely knocked on the security shutter. Everyone waited to see what would happen, dozens of law enforcement people going quiet. Harrison cupped a hand over his earpiece, listening to the phone in the bank which was broadcasting everything.

Deciding that it might be time to stir the pot a little, to keep the attention of the robbers on her and Shampoo rather than the other, more vulnerable hostages, Akane lifted her head and focussed on Joe, watching closely as he walked around the bank talking quietly to 2 and 3. 4 was standing pressed against the wall next to the window, alternately looking out at the limited view available with a nervous expression, and keeping an eye on the hostages, holding his shotgun in a manner that didn't leave anyone feeling too secure. The lead intruder glanced at her a few times, once he noticed what she was doing, looking more and more irritated each time. 'He's starting to look really annoyed,' she thought with amusement, her anger at the men somewhat muted by it for the moment..

Eventually her gaze seemed to get to him and he stopped chatting with 2, who noticed the direction his colleague was looking, a slightly amused expression passing over his face, then came over, pointing his weapon in her general direction. Squatting down safely out of reach he inspected her. "What?" the man finally asked in exasperation.

"I'm sorry?" she asked in return, very politely and with a tone of puzzlement. He sighed heavily.

"You're not acting at all like I would expect of someone in your position," he elaborated. "You do realise that you're a hostage, right?" Tapping his Uzi with his free hand meaningfully he watched her. She looked at it for a moment.

"9mm micro Uzi submachine gun, 20 round magazine, muzzle velocity three hundred and fifty metres per second, 1200 rounds per minute firing rate. Military specification, not legal in the US for civilians." Smiling sweetly at his sudden gape, she added, "Manufactured in Israel by IMI Ltd since 1986. Yours seems to have a suppressor fitted. It works quite well, the noise level was surprisingly low." Grateful for the information that Aaron had taught her and Shampoo during the session in the firing range, she enjoyed his expression while privately slightly surprised she'd remembered all that.

"Yes," he replied slowly, once he got over the shock. Studying her more closely he raised an eyebrow. "Now I'm even more interested in you, young lady. Who are you, I wonder? A bit young for a security operative of some sort."

"Oh, I'm no one special, just a martial artist training to be a stunt woman. And you? I'd say you were certainly military trained. You obviously have experience in, hmm, two martial arts I'd say?"
She smirked as he looked surprised again. "Karate and... something more specialised. What's that one that the US Marines use?"

"Think it called LINE," Shampoo said from beside her, looking amused and relaxed. "Mix of several martial arts made for military use. Like simple version of Anything Goes. Not bad if used right but basic." Joe looked at her, then back to Akane, before shaking his head.

"Your friend is also a martial artist, I assume?"

"Amazon warrior, in fact," the purple-haired young woman replied, smiling at him. "Like martial artist but better."

"I wouldn't say you're better, Shampoo," Akane protested, turning her head to her friend. "More bloodthirsty, sure, and you're incredible with a bow, but..."

"Still beat you nineteen times out of twenty," the Chinese girl laughed. "Akane improving but needs work."

"Dad can kick your ass, though," Akane snickered, making Shampoo look irritated at the memory. "For that matter, Genma was throwing you all around the Dojo for two hours the last time." Shampoo opened her mouth to retort when Joe, who was alternating looking between them like a man at a tennis match, held up his hand.

"Hey, shut up, both of you," he snapped, an annoyed expression on his face. "This isn't the way hostages are supposed to act. Get with the program or I might pick one of you to use for target practice."

"Ooh, pick me," Akane grinned, holding up her hand. He stared, then looked back at his colleagues who were smirking at him. 2 shrugged while 3 just shook his head in amusement.

"Don't tempt me, girl," he growled, standing up again and backing away, watching them both warily as if he was concerned about their sanity. Most of the hostages were doing much the same. Adrian was smiling a little to himself, though, so Akane winked at him.

The three robbers gathered together and had a conversation in quiet tones, Joe motioning back at the two young women while 2 laughed at something, then went quiet again. The leader glared at his colleagues for a moment, turned and gave Akane a filthy look that made her grin inside, then deliberately ignored her, turning to inspect the huge pile of cash on the trolley. A sort of scared silence descended on the bank, a couple of the hostages whispering quietly until 4 pointed his shotgun at them and shook his head.

A few minutes later, somewhat bored, Akane raised her hand again. Joe twitched, seeing it out of the corner of his eye, but ignored her. The other three exchanged glances although they seemed to be content to leave it up to him to deal with. After another minute she began waving her hand back and forth like a school child who needed the toilet. Eventually he sighed heavily, turned, and stared at her. "What now?" he growled.

"Is this going to take much longer, Joe?" she asked in a deliberately care-free tone, putting a mildly irritated expression on and checking her watch. "Only Shampoo and I are in the middle of a job interview we came all the way from Japan for and we're already late for today." The criminal pinched the bridge of his nose and closed his eyes with a sigh, looking like someone developing a migraine, before opening them again and shooting 3, who was snickering, a nasty look.

"Are all Japanese women as annoying as you are?" he asked. She thought for a moment then shrugged.

"I really couldn't say. I could check and let you know if you want, later."

He glared at her. "No, thanks all the same, I don't want to know. Now, will you please be QUIET!"
The last word was at rather more than normal volume. Pointing his weapon directly at her he waited until she nodded complacently. "Thank you."

Silence fell once more. The other hostages with the exception of Adrian, who was looking very amused when the robbers weren't looking at him, were staring at Akane as if they couldn't believe what they were seeing. She smiled back at them all then rolled over onto her back, crossing her hands behind her head and studying the ceiling. Annoying the man seemed both quite fun and a good way of keeping his attention on her. Joe turned and glared at her, opened his mouth for a moment, then shook his head and closed it again, obviously not wanting to get sucked into yet another conversation. Sighing and seemingly deciding it was best to just ignore her he went back to inspecting the cash, apparently counting it, making notes on a pad and occasionally checking his watch.

Wondering what the police were planning to do, Akane smiled to herself. Her ploy was certainly working, Joe was now pretending she didn't exist and the other three were watching either him or her pretty much exclusively.

A few minutes later Shampoo peered around curiously, appearing puzzled, then glanced at her. She turned her head towards her friend, raising an eyebrow. The Chinese warrior shrugged slightly, a thoughtful expression on her face, before looking very carefully around the bank lobby for a couple of minutes. Akane could see she thought something had changed but wasn't certain what. Glancing at Joe, she decided it was probably best not to wind him up too much by talking to the other woman, just in case he decided to do something silly. She wanted him off-balance, not homicidal.

The sudden firm knock on the security door shortly thereafter made everyone jump, even Joe. All four robbers whirled and pointed their guns in the direction of the sound. Shampoo stared at the door and paled noticeably. Looking in the same direction, Akane was abruptly aware that there was a sensation present that there hadn't been before, one that was horrifyingly familiar.

A very cold presence, one that wasn't exactly human.

And it was right on the other side of the door.

"Oh dear," she said quietly in Japanese. Joe looked at her, then the door again, which seemed to be much more interesting.

"Who is it?" he asked 4, who was peering out the slots in the shutters trying to catch a glimpse of the person who had knocked, while clutching his weapon across his chest, his finger on the trigger.

"I think it's a woman," he reported, squinting. "In a suit. A Fed, maybe?" Turning to his superior he asked, "What do we do?"

Joe looked at his other colleagues for a moment, a somewhat puzzled look on his face. "A Fed? That's not normal procedure. What the hell are they trying?" he muttered. Momentarily wearing an undecided expression he checked his watch again. The knock sounded once more. "Ignore her. It's some sort of trick," he finally stated.

A couple of minutes passed quietly, everyone watching the door, the robbers with nervous annoyance, the hostages with hopeful looks, and Akane and Shampoo with a certain amount of trepidation. The sound of the phone ringing abruptly made them all jump again.

Joe stared at it, then looked at 2, who looked back blankly. As the phone kept ringing he eventually went back through to the secure area and picked it up, a disgruntled expression on his face. "Have you decided to do what we demanded?" he asked. A look of complete shock appeared as he listened to the answer. "What the hell... How the fuck do you know that?" he asked, almost involuntarily, before his face hardened. "I don't care who you are, we've told you what you need to do. You've got...," he checked his watch, "...an hour and a half left to comply before we execute the first hostage. I even know which one I'm going to start with." Akane waved at him when he glared at her. "To be honest I'd be doing the world a favour. Now get on with it." He slammed the phone down and stomped back into the main lobby looking annoyed and slightly worried.

"Who was it?" number 3 asked.

"She said her name was Ms Aoyama," Joe replied. "She sounded like a cold bitch." Akane and Shampoo exchanged a nervous wince, then looked around carefully, just in case.

Moments later, Akane's Japanese cell phone rang. Everyone looked at it where it lay on the table next to Shampoo's phone. Seconds later the Chinese woman's phone rang as well, followed by all the other confiscated ones in the bag Joe had put on the bank counter. The four robbers looked extremely confused, exchanging glances. When Joe's odd military device started beeping he twitched, pulled it out, then stared at it in shock. 2 leaned over and inspected the display on it. "Ms Aoyama," he read out loud.

Joe continued to watch his device like it had suddenly decided to bite him. A short while later the mass ringing stopped suddenly, replaced with a weird silence, although Akane could swear that she could hear a very faint high pitched hum coming from somewhere in the room.

"Captain Mitchells, I find your reluctance to enter into conversation with me quite rude and somewhat inefficient with regard to my time." The icy voice echoed around the dead silent room, emanating from all the phones present at once as they somehow went into hands-free mode by themselves. Joe yelped and dropped his own communications device. "In the interests of minimising potential violence I am giving you, Mr Harris, Major Yefremov, and Mr Soria one chance to relinquish your weapons and submit to arrest by the LAPD, who are awaiting this eventuality with considerable interest. This offer expires thirty seconds from the moment I cease speaking. Please decide on your response with alacrity."

The four men in question looked at each other in complete shock. "How the fuck does she know who we are?" 2 asked slowly.

"Ms Aoyama knows everything," Akane snickered, half-amused and half-terrified. They stared at her, before Joe came over and pointed his gun at her from a metre away, an ugly expression on his face.

"Who the hell is she?" he demanded. "FBI? CIA? Do you work for her?"

"Oh, no, I don't work for her," she replied, shuddering. "She scares the hell out of me. But I really think you should answer her. You don't want to annoy her, trust me."

Shampoo nodded vigorously. "Akane right. Ms Aoyama very bad news." She looked at her watch. "Got ten seconds make up mind."

Seeming unnerved by their responses Joe looked back and forth between them, then turned to his colleagues, who seemed seriously worried for the first time since they'd stormed the bank. Even the police arriving had only irritated them.

"Five seconds," Shampoo announced helpfully.

"Shut up," he snarled, looking down at her, then at the door. A few seconds passed while he thought.

"The offer is now invalid, Captain Mitchells. My apologies for any injuries you or your compatriots incur as you are incapacitated. I would suggest, however, that such injuries were wholly avoidable on your part. You have decided on an unwise career path."

"Anyone tries to break in here and we start shooting," Joe shouted, pointing his weapon at Akane.

"I regret to inform you that you are labouring under a misunderstanding, Captain Mitchells," Ms Aoyama stated calmly. "Incapacitating yourself and your fellow miscreants will not require any individual from outside the institution you have seized to enter. You have most cleverly managed to ensure that the agents of your own undoing are already present. I merely need to say one short phrase and the outcome is assured. Unfortunately it is highly likely that this will involve a certain amount of physical trauma, although it is my hope that this will be minimised."

Joe was a little wild-eyed by now, looking suspiciously around the room, as were his fellows, their weapons slowly panning around searching for a threat. "You're bluffing," he said loudly and scoffingly after a moment. "You're trying to psych us out."

"I never bluff, Captain Mitchells," the icy voice assured him, somehow sounding even colder. "It is now time to bring this to an end."

There was a pregnant pause, during which time everyone looked around nervously, the four robbers most of all, Joe's calmly competent attitude cracking completely as he spun in a circle looking for anything out of place.

The voice came once more. "Ms Tendo, Ms Pu, the hostages are protected. You may act."

"Thank you, Ms Aoyama," Akane replied very politely and carefully, glancing at Shampoo, who was now wearing a vicious grin. Both of them rolled easily to their feet. Joe and his men immediately aimed their weapons at the two women.

"Get back on the floor," Joe, or as they now knew, Captain Mitchells, demanded harshly.

The Tendo sister looked at her friend, then both of them returned their attention to the robbers. "No, I don't think so," Akane smiled. "I don't like you, Captain Mitchells. You're a very unpleasant man and you and your friends have already killed two people in cold blood. I think we need to stop you."

"We're the ones with the guns, girl," he replied, raising his weapon and ostentatiously flicking the safety off.

"True," she nodded, "but that's not going to stop us." He stared at her as she took a step forward, before glancing at his colleagues, who looked puzzled and somewhat worried by the fact that neither young women seemed worried.

"You think?" he asked after a moment, pulling the trigger with the weapon aimed at the middle of her chest. He'd clearly selected single shot, because one loud bang sounded. Her hand blurred out of sight, then reappeared holding a shiny copper-jacketed bullet between thumb and forefinger. Everyone except Adrian gaped in complete disbelief.
"Yes, actually, I do," she replied with a hard smile. "My turn."

From the point of view of almost everyone in the lobby she moved so fast she was almost impossible to track. He opened fire on full auto, having time only for half a dozen shots, all of which lagged by far too much to have any chance at all of hitting her, before she was on him. One high kick and his Uzi slammed into the wall to the right, leaving him staggering back with a hand that was obviously crushed. "Fuck!" he screamed, his cool missing completely. "Don't just stand there, you idiots," he shouted to his compatriots, all of whom were still gaping in shock, "shoot those bitches!"

A couple of stunned seconds later, 2 and 3 opened up on the blue-haired girl, who was still moving. They missed completely, the AK-47 wielded by number 2 leaving pock-marks in the walls following behind her, clicking on an empty chamber a second or two later. Fumbling for another magazine in his pocket, 2 took his eyes off the scene for a bit too long, looking up to find Shampoo grinning at him from the other end of the weapon which she was holding by the barrel. As he watched in horror she put her other hand on the receiver then twisted sideways, the gun distorting with a cracking noise, small parts dropping from it to the floor. He let go and stepped back, his eyes wide, then reached into his other pocket. Before he could remove the pistol he apparently had as a backup weapon her hand snapped out, one finger extended and poked him on the side of the neck, the pressure point attack making his arm immediately go limp as he lost sensation in it.

He swore unpleasantly, jabbing at her with his other arm, which she grabbed, then used for leverage to throw him across her hip and half-way across the lobby into the wall, before turning and diving at number 3, who was swearing in Russian while trying to follow both Akane and herself, shooting at each of them in turn. Deflecting one round with her palm, not bothering to catch it, she reached him at the same time Akane did, both women striking from opposite sides. A pair of cracks sounded and he screamed in agony, dropping to the floor with both his arms broken. Shampoo reached down and prodded him in a couple of places on his back which instantly made him stop screaming and lapse into unconsciousness.

"I really have to learn some of those pressure points," Akane commented, impressed. Shampoo laughed.

"Ask Great-grandmother when we get home. I'm sure she'd teach you. You need some ki ability to do it properly but you'll get there sooner or later." The pair smiled at each other then turned to look at the two still-standing criminals, who were staring in total horror at what had happened in mere seconds.

"Captain, would you like to give up now, or do we keep going?" Akane asked. Mitchells looked at her like he'd seen a ghost, cradling his broken hand with his other arm. He didn't seem to know what to do next, the entire situation had devolved so rapidly and completely it had obviously thrown him totally. "I don't mind either way, this is still good training, but the problem is there aren't any cameras so I can't use it for my resúme."

"I can provide visual recordings for that purpose if required, Ms Tendo," the voice of Ms Aoyama sounded, making everyone jump a little. The chilly tones sounded somehow approving. "Please continue with your actions. Your restraint in handling the situation has been noted."

Shivering a little, Akane nonetheless replied, "Thank you, Ms Aoyama," while wondering how the hell the woman could possibly be recording any of this. Deciding that it probably didn't matter, although somewhat worried and quite curious to know how much else she'd recorded, the Tendo woman kept looking at Mitchells, who was pale and sweating. "Well?"

"Get down or I'll shoot a hostage!" Everyone looked at number 4, who was standing with his shotgun pointing into the crowd of people, appearing nearly as worried as they were, but determined. "I mean it," he yelled slightly more quietly. "Lie down on the floor right fucking now." Several of the hostages began crying, the ones who the gun was pointing at, both men and women.

"That's a really bad idea," Akane said slowly, trusting Ms Aoyama's word that the hostages were safe. "I doubt it will work anyway, and if it does I'll unscrew your head and use it like a football."

"Then I get nasty with what's left," Shampoo growled, producing her chúi from her small ki pocket and spinning them in her hands. She glared at the man who swallowed hard. Both of them took a step forward.

"Stay back," he demanded, raising the gun to point at them, then lowering it again when some of the hostages took the opportunity to scramble back a little. "And you idiots stay still."

"I'm not kidding," he shouted as everyone froze again. "One more step and I shoot."

Akane and Shampoo shared a look, then glanced at Adrian. He looked back seeming unconcerned and very interested to see what happened, not appearing worried. The investment manager who was lying next to him had his eyes shut and was apparently going through as many prayers to several deities as he could remember, very quickly. Both young women grinned and took one more step at the same time.

The thunderous boom of the shotgun was instantly followed by a scream of agony as the buckshot bounced off something invisible, several lead balls going back to where they'd come from at high velocity. Leaking blood from a number of small holes across his chest, number 4 staggered, then somewhat stupidly tried again with very similar results. Akane sighed, watching as he dropped the weapon with a clatter then slid down the wall, leaving a couple of bloody hand-prints on the way. He didn't seem mortally wounded but it was certain that his interest was no longer on resisting. The hostages, all of whom with one exception had screamed at the two shots, stared in shock at what had happened before exchanging disbelieving gazes.

"Who the hell are you two?" The horrified and wondering voice came from behind them. Both girls turned around and looked at Mitchells, who was staring in awed terror at them. Off to the side the figure of number 2 was stirring, slowly sitting up and holding his head in his hands. Akane shrugged.

"Like I said, just a couple of martial artists here on a job interview." She grinned at him.

"They're doing incredibly well," Adrian put in from the floor, looking pleased. Everyone looked at him, then went back to watching the two women and Captain Mitchells.

"How are you doing all this?" he asked, taking a step back as she took one towards him.

"A lot of hard work and training, mostly," she replied happily. "It's a family thing. You know, it's good for you that some friends fixed my anger issues, if it was a year ago you'd probably all be in intensive care by now if you were lucky." She giggled as he stared, paling at the sound. "I used to be really dangerous."

"Not exactly safe now," Shampoo told her.

"No, but now it's carefully aimed danger," Akane said. She took another step forward, he took one back, maintaining the five metres or so between them. "Are you ready to give up, Captain?"

Wincing in pain, he very carefully slid his damaged hand into his pocket, then reached around to the back of his belt and pulled out a revolver, a small thirty-eight calibre short-barrelled pistol, pointing it at her with a shaking hand. "No," he said, not sounding persuaded by his own words.

"Really?" Akane put on a surprised expression. "You're very hard to convince." She stepped forward again. Holding up the gun he aimed at her chest then fired, the report echoing around the room.

She held up the bullet and showed it to him. "That's impossible," he gasped.

"No, but I'll admit it stings a little," she laughed.

He fired again, then twice more. The fourth bullet she caught left handed. "One left, that's a five shot revolver," the Tendo woman said pleasantly, spreading her arms wide. "Try again."

His hand shaking violently, he fired his last shot. Akane winced, then rubbed her chest between her breasts, where a small hole showed in her shirt. "Ow. That one really stung," she commented. Glancing over her shoulder at Shampoo who was watching with amusement, she added, "Remind me to catch the damn things next time, it hurts if you miss. That's going to leave a bruise."

"OK, Akane," Shampoo said equably. Returning her attention to the captain, the blue-haired woman walked slowly closer as he retreated until he ran into the wall. Closing the remaining distance she stopped a metre away, studying him carefully.

"It's been fun and everything but we really need to get to work. We're already nearly two hours late because of you guys and I'm losing patience. Give me the gun or I'll punch you through the face."

"You... How..." He looked wildly around, sweating even more, then focussed on her. A puzzled expression appeared past the horror. "...through the face?"

Without changing her mildly irritated expression, Akane lashed out with a fist moving far too fast for him to follow, sinking it wrist deep into the marble-faced wall beside his head and spraying him with little chips of stone. He went very, very still for a long moment as every eye in the bank fixed on her fist, then slowly rolled his head to the left and watched wide-eyed as she pulled it out and held it up in front of him, dust and gravel falling from it. "Through the face, yes," she replied cheerfully.

His eyes rolled back in his head and he passed out, dropping limply to the floor.

Catching the pistol on the way past she squeezed hard, reducing it to twisted metal, then dropped the remains on top of his unconscious body. Slapping her hands together in a cloud of marble dust she turned around, satisfied, inspecting the inside of the bank lobby and all the people gaping at her. Shampoo walked over, stopping en route to poke number 2 into unconsciousness, then looked at the hole in the wall. "Bank going to be annoyed, was nice marble," she commented lightly.

Akane shrugged with a grin.

"It seemed to impress him," she chuckled.

"My thanks, Ms Tendo, and Ms Pu, for the minimal damage caused." The voice came from all the phones again. A moment later the security shutters activated, rolling up into the walls, then the front door slid open and stayed that way. The green-haired woman in the suit and sun-glasses strolled casually in, looking around with interest, before heading over. "I am quite impressed with your handling of this unfortunate situation. My employers will remunerate the financial institution for the minor structural damage in recompense for your actions," she added. Akane nodded, not sure she could trust her voice face to face with the alien woman.

Turning to the former hostages, Ms Aoyama looked them over. "My apologies for any emotional distress caused during the recent events. I regret that we were unable to prevent this situation entirely. The local law enforcement authorities are waiting outside and now that everything has been resolved satisfactorily I would ask that you cooperate with them." She pulled out a notebook from somewhere, studying the damage to the walls from the bullet-holes and making a few notes, before walking over and carefully inspecting the hole Akane's fist had made. A few more words were written, then the notebook and pen vanished. "Most comical, Ms Tendo. An intimidating demonstration indeed. Would you have followed through on your threat of lethal bodily harm?" She looked down at the unconscious Mitchells, then back to Akane, who sighed, shaking her head.

"No. I couldn't kill him even with what he and the others have done. I'd just have broken his arms a little." She thought for a moment. "Maybe his legs as well."

"Interesting." The woman reappeared her notebook, wrote something in it, then put it away again. "An effective bluff, certainly." She looked at the odd watch she was wearing and made a small annoyed sound. "My time here is limited. Please excuse me, I must return to Lieutenant Harrison and his colleagues. It is my hope that your continued employment efforts are successful. Until we meet again, Ms Tendo, Ms Pu." She nodded politely with one of her almost-but-horrifyingly-not-quite-a-smile smiles, turned, then headed back to the door, pausing on the way to momentarily study Adrian, who was helping the investment manager to his feet. "Mr Stewart. I will arrange to have a visual record of this event delivered to you shortly." He nodded, apparently not sure what to say and finding her somewhat forbidding. After a couple of seconds she resumed walking, disappearing out the main entrance.

"God, she still creeps me out like nothing else I've ever experienced," Akane told Shampoo in a low voice. The Chinese woman nodded soberly.

"Me too. She scares the crap out of me. But maybe Aiko was right and she's OK with us. She certainly helped a lot and she seemed pleased, or what passes for pleased for her anyway."

"If that's pleased I wouldn't want to see angry," Akane replied, shivering.

"She can be a little intense," Aiko announced, appearing out of thin air next to them with a broad smile. Both young women recoiled away from her, instinctively taking defensive positions, before realising who it was.

"For god's sake, Aiko, give us some warning before you do that, will you?" Shampoo demanded, shaking her head.

Aiko snickered. "Sorry, bad habit. I blame Yori and Chou, they're a bad influence on me, always appearing out of nowhere and making people jump. It's kind of fun."

"I'd hardly say we were always doing it, Aiko," Chou commented calmly, fading into view on their other side, a grinning Tamiko next to her. "But is fun, yes. Hello, Akane, Shampoo. Well done, by the way, very well done." She smiled warmly at them both.

Akane laughed, shaking her head. "Thank you, Chou. I'm glad to see you. And you as well, Tamiko. I guess you were who was protecting the hostages?"

"Yes, I put a ward over them all as soon as we got here," the blonde confirmed with a nod. "That was a few minutes before Ms Aoyama arrived at the door. She was briefing the authorities on the data she had on these nasty people." Chou looked disapprovingly at the disabled and unconscious robbers. "I'm very displeased with them."

"So am I," Akane agreed, following her eyes, then looking over at the dead guard. She sighed
"I've never seen anyone die before. He just walked up and shot the poor man like it was nothing."

"To some people, life is cheap," Chou replied, looking over at the body sympathetically. "Especially someone else's life. There's nothing you could have done as far as I know, though, so please don't dwell on it too much. You both did very well to bring everything to a halt without any more injuries. I'd better heal that other poor man over there, then I'll patch these criminals up so the police can deal with them." Glancing at her red-headed companion, she asked, "Can you check on the other one in the back? I'm certain he's dead based on what we could detect from the outside but I'd like to be completely sure."

"OK." Tamiko nodded, then headed through the door at the rear of the bank lobby, while Chou walked over and knelt next to the injured guard who had been shot in the arm. Akane followed her over, curious to see her work up close.

Naito and Harrison watched with the others as Ms Aoyama waited, then knocked again. Even from where they were they could feel a sort of chilly irritation from the woman, conveyed more by body language than anything else.

"Think they'll open up for her?" Harrison asked. Naito shook his head.

"I doubt it. I'm curious to see what happens when they don't."

"What about the hostages? I'm not happy about letting them be pawns in some sort of game between her and those idiots in there." Naito looked at the LAPD officer for a second before returning his attention to the bank.

"I doubt very much that any harm will come to them, Richard, whatever else she is the woman does genuinely seem to dislike causing injury or letting it happen without good reason. I know Chou is providing magical protection for the hostages, I doubt even a grenade could cause any problems for them right now. It will be over soon." He looked mildly amused for a moment. "But Captain Mitchells and his friends are about to have a very bad day."

"Good," the policeman said with a hard grin. He listened with grim amusement to the interactions between Akane, Ms Aoyama, and the gang in the bank. Once again he wondered what weird magic allowed her to do what she was doing. He was getting the distinct impression that anything electronic basically bent over with its hands around its ankles and cooperated with the alien woman, a mental image that made him giggle to himself for some reason.

The sound of a gunshot echoed across the street. All the law enforcement personnel twitched, quite a large number of firearms suddenly appearing and being pointed in the relevant direction. "Hold your fire," Captain Martinez called in a commanding voice. "Anyone who shoots is in a world of hurt."

"And probably not from him," Naito snickered in a very quiet voice, making Harrison grin, then look guiltily over his shoulder at his superior, who didn't seem to have heard. Beside the captain, Special Agent Tinnin was on his cell-phone, holding a pair of binoculars to his eyes with his free hand. Seconds later there was a short burst of automatic gunfire, a pause, then a much longer burst with a distinctive sound to it that most of those present recognised.

"That's the AK-47," Harrison sighed.

"Sounds like it, yes," Naito agreed.
Harrison looked worried. "Will those two girls be OK against something that heavy?"

"I don't know. I'm afraid, I know Akane is capable of catching a 9mm bullet, she proved that a couple of weeks ago during a robbery of the jewellery shop she works at, but a rifle bullet...?" Naito shrugged. "That said, they have to actually hit her in the first place and according to the records both she and Shampoo are nearly as fast as some of the lower-powered magical girls. I doubt it would kill either of them anyway, but I also doubt they stood there and waited to be shot." A few pistol shots sounded, then everything went quiet.

"Is that it?"

The question from Rojas, standing behind them, was answered by the loud boom of a shotgun blast, which was repeated a few seconds later. Everything went quiet once more. A longer pause of nearly thirty seconds was followed by five small calibre pistol shots one after another, the last one coming with some delay. Half a minute later the security grates over the windows and the doors began to slowly retract.

"No, but I think that is," Naito commented, as they watched the doors slide open. Ms Aoyama walked inside like she owned the place. He and the others relaxed.

"Not a normal end to a bank siege," Captain Martinez remarked, coming to stand next to them with Agent Tinnin.

"Really, Captain?" Naito looked at him and smiled a little. "It's not all that unusual where I come from." He chuckled as the other man sighed slightly. "Admittedly, Ms Aoyama is a fairly recent addition to the whole scene but you have to admit she's quite efficient at her job. Terrifying, creepy as hell, but good at what she does."

"I'd love to know what that actually was," Tinnin muttered, putting his phone away. He turned to his colleagues. "Stay alert, whoever Captain Mitchells was relying on for backup is due in ten minutes or so. I want to talk to them very much." The other FBI agents all nodded, one of them pulling out his handgun and checking it before tucking it back inside his jacket.

Captain Martinez turned to the SWAT leader. "Back them up, if anything odd happens." The sergeant hefted the MP5 he was holding, smiling grimly. "And get your men in there to disarm those bombs. Rojas, get the crime scene guys in there. Harrison, come with me, I want to see what all this was about. And someone get some ambulances over here as well." The small crowd of people began crossing the street, while others rushed around sorting out the various orders.

As they approached the bank, Ms Aoyama walked out, looked slowly around with a slightly raised eyebrow, then met them half-way. "Gentlemen," she said with emotionless politeness. "The situation is now contained. Ms Tendo and Ms Pu efficiently dealt with the intruders, all of whom are unconscious. There are some minor injuries to all of them which Ms Chou is in the process of healing. She is also repairing the damage to the hostage who was fired upon. There is minor structural damage to the building. Please have the owners contact the Magical Girl reparations fund in Tokyo for assistance in rectifying the damage. My employers have arranged to have the fund treat this occurrence as they do the regrettable frequent equivalent in Minato."

"I've got the number, Ms Aoyama," Harrison volunteered. She seemed pleased by his answer.

"Excellent. I have uploaded the relevant data I have located on the four perpetrators of this crime to the LAPD computer system marked for the attention of yourself, Lieutenant Harrison, and also to the FBI system for the attention of Special Agent Tinnin. I would expect that you will be able to utilise it in your respective cases. Should you require further aid I may be contacted via Ms Chou..."
who has my details. Subject to the limitations imposed by my employers I will give what help I can."

"Irregular, but thanks anyway," Tinnin replied. She nodded once to him.

"You are most welcome, Special Agent Tinnin." A very small and extremely unsettling near-smile crossed her lips, making almost everyone shiver slightly. "Should I locate any further data during the investigation into the background of these people I will pass it to you in a similar manner." Cocking her head a little she paused, then added, "I have just become aware of an item of interest. You may wish to interdict this individual." As had happened previously, a solid projection of a man's head appeared to the side, with text beside it. "This is Mr Paul Bouchard, senior teller at this institution."

"He's one of the four people who knew about the cash," Harrison remarked with interest. She nodded.

"Indeed, Lieutenant Harrison. His own bank account records show that a deposit of exactly one hundred thousand US dollars was transferred into it from an international source three days ago. This does not match anything in his financial history. Tracking the payment source to its ultimate origin is in process but initial indications suggest that it was routed through a series of accounts in multiple financial institutions that have been associated with three different United States intelligence agencies, two Russian ones, and one from the United Kingdom, in addition to one which belongs to a now defunct Columbian narcotics group. From the evidence available I suspect that none of the original account holders are directly involved although it does raise some intriguing questions."

"That it does," Tinnin mused thoughtfully, glancing at Captain Martinez who looked fascinated. "As does how the hell you are doing all this."

"Unfortunately, all information on the methods utilised by myself or my employers is unavailable to you, Special Agent Tinnin. My apologies." She looked at him through her dark glasses, somehow producing a feeling of slight amusement. He sighed.

"Somehow I thought you'd say that," he mumbled.

"I am pleased to meet your expectations so precisely, Special Agent Tinnin," Ms Aoyama replied politely, making Naito cover a smile of his own. It was almost a joke, something he'd never have expected from the woman. She glanced at him for a moment and he could swear that she'd practically winked at him.

"Better get on with it, then," Harrison said, looking past her for a moment to the door of the bank. He beckoned to one of the uniformed police officers standing near it who hurried over, the woman staring at both Ms Aoyama and the projected data with an expression of slightly horrified awe. "Remember that face, please, we need to grab Mr Bouchard."

"Yes, Lieutenant," she replied, inspecting the image closely.

"We knew they had an inside man, I expect that's him," he added to the others. "There's a very interesting point, which is that the district manager said that the money was only paid in yesterday on very little notice, less than twenty four hours. So who knew two days before that enough about it to set all this up?"

"Again, something well worth investigating, Lieutenant Harrison," Ms Aoyama remarked. "I would suggest that at the minimum the Central Intelligence Agency would appear to have an information
"Not for the first time," Tinnin said in an annoyed voice. "I'll start looking into it."

"I would like to request a small consideration on behalf of Ms Tendo and Ms Pu, Lieutenant Harrison," Ms Aoyama said, making the projection vanish when the officer turned away from it and headed towards the bank. Everyone looked at her.

"Which is?" he asked curiously.

"The two young women in question are, as you are undoubtedly aware, currently engaged in training and demonstrations for a local entertainment generation business as represented by Mr Adrian Stewart. I would request that you allow them to leave immediately to continue this activity without delay. They have a limited time available for it and I would be distressed to see their endeavours unnecessarily impeded by the actions of the criminals responsible for today's excitement. I have uploaded an audio and visual recording of their performance in dealing with those criminals which should provide the requisite information for your case. Should an interview be required I am assured that Ms Aiko is quite prepared to transport the two young women here, or you to them, as needed." Ms Aoyama waited for the response as the LAPD and FBI people looked at each other.

"Again, very irregular," Agent Tinnin commented, rubbing his chin. "We need to talk to them sooner rather than later."

"But they did between them manage to stop the robbery dead with minimum casualties, and it was Akane who raised the alarm in the first place," Harrison noted. "If she hadn't called me we probably wouldn't have known about it until that bunch were half-way to Mexico at least."

"True."

Naito listened quietly, glancing at the various people involved. Tinnin seemed reluctant, while Harrison didn't seem to be worried about it. Captain Martinez was half-way between the two viewpoints. "How about this?" Harrison suggested after a moment. "I'm having a barbecue at my house tonight, they'll both be there as will Adrian. Why don't you come over, we can both interview them there, then you can have a couple of beers and a burger. We're going to have our hands full for the rest of the day dealing with everyone else anyway."

The FBI agent thought for a few more seconds, then finally nodded. "OK. This whole case has gone totally twilight zone in the first place so I suppose it won't make any difference." He grinned briefly. "I haven't had time for a barbecue for weeks."

"Excellent. My gratitude, gentlemen." Ms Aoyama nodded in satisfaction.

"Do you want to come, Masao?" Harrison asked, turning to Naito, who regretfully shook his head.

"I'd love to, Richard, but it's about one in the morning from my point of view already and I've had a long day. Tomorrow is going to be hectic as well, we're in the middle of a case I can't leave. Perhaps another time."

"Sure. No problem." Harrison looked at Ms Aoyama, who made her little smile-like expression again.

He looked relieved when she said, "I must return to my work as well. It has been most agreeable dealing with you all." On the verge of turning away, she stopped, then looked to the side.

"Gentlemen, you may wish to be ready to intervene. A new actor would appear to be entering the scene." Everyone turned to look in the direction she was, to see an obviously government issued SUV coming down the street towards the bank followed by a medium-sized truck in olive-drab paint, no markings on it to identify it. "They are utilising encrypted communications with identical security techniques to those employed by Captain Mitchells. The hardware is military issue, specifically a system currently in development for secure battlefield communications for the United States military, although an interesting side-note is that it has not yet been deployed outside the companies designing it."

She glanced at Agent Tinnin. "You will wish to add those companies to your investigatory list, I suspect. I have sent you the details required."

"Thanks," he replied, watching curiously as the truck stopped behind the SUV, two men getting out of each one. The ones from the SUV were wearing dark suits and looked like Secret Service or something similar, while the two from the truck were in military fatigues and carrying M-16s slung over their shoulders. All four men looked around alertly, before they headed towards the group of people on the sidewalk.

"There are two more personnel in the rear of the second vehicle with a tripod mounted crew-served heavy weapon currently directed at us," Ms Aoyama told them, inspecting it. No one asked how she knew but no one disbelieved her.

"This should be interesting," Harrison muttered. He looked at Captain Martinez, who had a neutral expression on his face but also had one hand discreetly inside his jacket.

"Be ready for anything," Agent Tinnin warned, his hand drifting towards his own weapon just enough to allow him to grab it quickly. "I don't like this and I'm pretty sure that whoever they say they are, they aren't."

Watching the men approach, Naito suddenly became aware that Ms Aoyama was nowhere to be seen. Idly wondering where she'd gone, he put his own hand near his service pistol. "I'm going to get into trouble if I shoot anyone in the US," he whispered to Harrison.

"If you have to, I'll authorise it," Tinnin replied just as quietly from behind him. "But let's hear them out first."

Stopping a few feet from them, the four men looked around, the two apparent soldiers each with their M-16s not quite ready to fire but making it obvious that they could bring them into play quickly. Naito couldn't help but notice that all of them were very carefully staying well out of a direct line between the truck and the people they'd approached.

Stepping forward, the suited man on the right, an older man with greying hair over a dark complexion, his hair in a military cut, held out an ID folder which everyone looked at, before he flipped it shut and put it away again. "Special Agent Hank Briley, US Army Counterintelligence. This is my colleague Special Agent Jason Hamilton. We've been monitoring the situation, we have an interest in two of the people you are about to arrest, I'm afraid we're going to need to take them off your hands."

"I see." Agent Tinnin exchanged a look with Captain Martinez. "May I see your authorisation for this request?"

Briley looked mildly irritated but pulled a folded sheet of paper from his inside jacket pocket, making everyone tense slightly, then handed it to the FBI man, who unfolded it and read it carefully. He showed it to Martinez who also read it. "Interesting," the captain commented.
"Yes, it is," Tinnin replied, refolding it and handing it back. "The most interesting part of all is why you have a document date-stamped two days ago with the names of two people on it, Captain Mitchells and Mr Harris, both of whom apparently died nearly ten years back and whose true identity we only found out less than an hour ago. How did you manage that?" He looked curious, although calm, waiting for an answer. The purported CI man seemed insulted.

"We are very good at our job, Special Agent Tinnin," he said in a superior tone, making Naito glance at Harrison, who nodded slightly, having also picked up on the fact that they knew the name of the FBI agent, who hadn't introduced himself. "We've been looking for these men for a considerable amount of time, ever since we suspected that their deaths had been faked. Mr Harris is wanted for espionage on behalf of a foreign power, Captain Mitchells for aiding and abetting that crime. We were alerted when you uploaded their pictures to the LAPD computer system and ran an ID check on them. We got here as fast as we could."

"Ah. I see." Tinnin nodded slowly. "That explains a few things."

Behind them, Naito noticed a very brief golden-yellow glow form a wall around the truck before fading into invisibility, his eyes widening a little then narrowing in thought. A quick look at Harrison showed he'd seen it as well judging by his expression, as had Tinnin and Martinez, although the three Americans probably didn't know what it was for sure. He did. Carefully looking around he spotted Tamiko perched comfortably on a third story ledge of the building on the other side of the street, looking right at him. He nodded to her and was rewarded with a small wave and a smile.

Discreetly nudging Harrison he indicated the magical girl with a tiny movement of his head, the LAPD officer following his gaze then twitching one hand in a quick gesture to indicate he'd seen her as well. They both knew that if the red-head was watching, Chou and Aiko were as well, which meant that if it all went badly, the likelihood of anything serious happening had suddenly plummeted. It made both of them much happier about the situation.

"So what exactly is it that you want to do here, Special Agent Briley?" Tinnin asked, making the name sound slightly dirty. "Briley' looked more insulted for a moment. Behind him one of the uniformed men changed his grip on his weapon a little.

"As our orders say, we are to take Captain Mitchells and Mr Harris into custody, and if we judge it required we have the authority to do likewise with any co-conspirators of theirs. We will also need their weapons and equipment as evidence, along with any of the proceeds of the crime they were in the process of committing when they were stopped. How did you manage that, by the way?" He seemed quite intent on learning the answer.

"So, what you're saying," Tinnin began, ignoring the question, "is that you want to take all the suspects, all the evidence, and forty-three million dollars in cash away with you? That seems... somewhat ambitious." He glanced at Martinez who was listening intently. "Leaving aside the interest the FBI has in this case, the LAPD would appear to have primary jurisdiction. You sound like you're intending to take everything they need to prosecute a serious bank robbery which resulted in two murders even if it wasn't ultimately successful."

"We regret any interference with the LAPD and the FBI but there is a national security interest that overrides both of you," 'Hamilton' put in, speaking for the first time.

"Oh, I agree that there's probably a serious national security problem," Agent Tinnin responded after a couple of seconds. "One I intend to get to the bottom of."

"I'm sure we can cooperate on the case as soon as we have interrogated these men, Agent," 'Briley' said, smiling slightly. "But we need to be the first to talk to them. We'll accompany you into the bank to arrest them if you don't mind."

There was a long pause. Naito and Harrison kept one eye on the truck, the other on the four men, both of them certain that something was about to happen. There was an unpleasant feeling in the air. Naito noticed that off to the side, across the street, the SWAT men and the remaining FBI agents were watching closely, several of them with a look that suggested they felt the same. One of the FBI agents was on the phone while another one was watching them through the binoculars that Tinnin had left on top of his vehicle, saying something to his colleague.

"As it happens I think I do mind, Agent Briley," Tinnin finally replied. "There are a number of peculiarities about this case I'm not happy about, even despite the fact that the entire case is very strange in the first place. I'm particularly interested in finding out who you really are."

"I'm sorry, Agent?" Briley looked affronted. "Are you saying you don't believe me?"

"I am."

Producing his ID again 'Briley' opened it and held it up. "You do see this, don't you?"

"I do. But I'm damn sure that whoever you are, you're not actually military counterintelligence, or at least, not officially. I'll be very interested indeed in finding out who you really are and who you work for."

The pause this time was very tense. "I'm afraid I'm going to have to insist, Agent," 'Briley' said in a hard voice. Both alleged soldiers brought their M-16s around to a firing position. The instant response was all the other people sprouting a collection of hand-guns and aiming them.

"Lower your weapons immediately," Tinnin ordered, the barrel of his gun unwaveringly pointed at 'Briley's' chest.

"This is a mistake, Agent. Let's just calmly talk it out, I'm sure we can come to an agreement," 'Hamilton' said, looking over his shoulder at the two soldiers and making a small gesture that made them very slightly relax.

"I don't think we can." Tinnin looked annoyed. "But I have a lot of questions. Who are you, who do you work for, why are you using unreleased military communications equipment, and why do you have a fucking tripod-mounted machine gun in the back of that truck? Those should do for the moment but trust me, there are more."

All four men looked startled, 'Briley' involuntarily looking at the truck for a moment, then turning back to them. His expression went stony. "I don't know what you're implying, Agent. Now, are you going to cooperate or do I have to make a call and go over your head?"

"Go ahead," Tinnin replied. "I'd be very interested to see who you called. But as soon as you're done you and your friends are under arrest."

Sighing, 'Briley' slowly pulled a cell-phone out of his pocket and flipped it open, dialling a number one-handed. None of the people facing off against his little group were terribly surprised when, instead of holding it to his ear, he looked smug as the side of the truck behind them swung up to reveal a fifty-calibre machine gun on a powered mount pointing directly at them.

"Hello," the blonde magical girl said in a kind tone, "I'm Chou. I'm a healer, if you'll let me I'll fix that for you." The man, who was pale and sweating, stared at her for a moment then nodded weakly. Chou gently removed the hands of the female teller who was still staunching the bleeding with a cloth, something that seemed to be a scarf, revealing a clean puncture wound in his upper arm which immediately began oozing blood.

"Clean shot right through," she muttered mainly to herself. Smiling at him, she added more loudly, "It missed the bone, so that's good, and the bullet isn't in there." Placing one hand on his shoulder she concentrated slightly, a brief golden glow forming, then he abruptly relaxed with a look of surprise.

"What did you do?" he asked faintly. "It doesn't hurt any more."

"I just turned off the pain receptors and motor control for the moment. Please stay still and I'll have you back to healthy very soon." She looked amused as he stared at her face, then down at his arm. The teller beside him had a look of wondering astonishment on her face. "I'm quite good at this sort of thing."

The glow came again, more strongly, as she moved her hand over the wound, vanishing a few seconds later. She inspected her work visually then nodded in satisfaction. "That should do it. It might ache slightly for a couple of hours or so, there was quite a lot of trauma to your muscles from the hydrostatic shock caused by the bullet, but there shouldn't be any long term problems. You've lost a fair amount of blood though so I'd suggest drinking plenty of water then resting for a day." Touching his shoulder again as he nodded numbly she undid whatever she'd done in the first place. His hand twitched, then he made a fist, slowly the first time then faster, before moving his arm carefully. Reaching over with his other hand he felt the former wound in shock.

"Holy... How did you do that?"

Chou smiled happily. "It's basically an extremely advanced martial arts technique that a very good friend of mine and I have developed over the last few years. It comes in handy more often than you'd expect." Standing, she looked around at the people watching her closely. Several of the former hostages were talking together, a few heading over to the first of the police who were just now entering the bank, but most of them had stared in shock as she'd healed the man. "Does anyone else have any injuries that require treatment?" she asked the room at large. After a short pause, one woman held up her hand.

"I hit my head when I fainted," she said, rubbing a spot on the back of her skull and wincing a little.

"All right, let's get that fixed," the blonde woman smiled. Shortly there was another person looking stunned and grateful. One or two more minor injuries caused in the bank takeover were easily dealt with, until everyone seemed happy.

"Akane, you've got a quite nasty bruise there on your chest," Chou noted, looking at the Tendo woman closely for a moment. "Would you like me to deal with it for you?"

Surprise, then the lack of it, went through Akane as she wondered how the other woman had managed to detect her minor injury through her clothes. Reaching up she prodded herself, wincing slightly at the ache. "If it's not too much trouble, yes please," she replied. Smiling a little she added, "I shouldn't have let him just shoot me but I was making a point."

Giggling, Chou put her fingertips on the blue-haired woman's chest for a moment, a glow building around them momentarily before it faded. "I would imagine he found it impressive. Eventually you'll probably be able to shrug off a direct shot like that but I'd recommend either ducking or catching them at the moment to prevent bruising." She ran her hands over the other woman's side and back briefly. "Those other bruises were already fading but they must have been quite painful yesterday. Were they caused by your training?"

Akane stretched and twisted, smiling when she found the residual aches from the stunt work the day before were missing entirely. "Yes. Coming off a motorcycle at sixty kilometres an hour makes you bounce a remarkably long way which isn't really very comfortable. Mind you, you should see the riding suit I was wearing, we're going to need a new one now."

Laughing a little Chou smiled at her. "Hopefully you'll manage to stay on the bike today." Akane shrugged, grinning.

Turning to look at the still unconscious robbers, Chou shook her head a little sadly. "Now for you gentlemen," she commented, heading towards number 4. "Mr Soria, I fear that the police are going to be very annoyed with you," she muttered quietly as she began repairing the buckshot wounds in his chest and stomach after putting her hand on his head for a moment, pulling a pair of tweezers from nowhere and carefully removing the pellets before healing the holes.

Aiko, Shampoo and Akane carefully moved the other three to lie beside Soria. A few minutes later all four robbers were healed and rendered deeply unconscious. Several crime scene technicians were in the process of fingerprinting and photographing them, another two were collecting and logging all the weapons and shell cases, while several SWAT EOD technicians had vanished into the rear of the bank to deal with the booby-traps.

Tamiko returned as these last people were going about their business, stopping the lead EOD man and talking to him for a moment before coming and joining the rest of the women. "He's extremely dead, I'm afraid, Chou," she said soberly. "Two shots in the chest, one in the back of the head to finish him off, poor guy." Akane fumed, turning to glare at the Russian criminal, Yefremov.

"Would it be OK if I broke his arms and legs a couple of times?" she asked through gritted teeth. "You can heal him again, right?"

Chou smiled gently, although there was a stillness to her eyes that suggested she was half-tempted. "It's best not to give in to such feelings, Akane, although I'll admit sometimes it's very hard. Let the police deal with these men. You've done your part very effectively and certainly saved a number of lives." The youngest Tendo sister sighed slightly, but eventually nodded, relaxing a little.

"I guess you're right. Sorry, Chou, it's really hard to just stand by and let people like that do what they did."

"I do understand, believe me," the blonde woman said soberly. "But sometimes you have no choice." She looked up as Adrian walked over having been talking to one of the policemen, who trailed behind him taking notes. "Oh, hello, Adrian. How are you?"

"Fine, thanks, Chou, thanks to you and the others. And of course to Akane and Shampoo." He grinned at the two young women who looked pleased. "They're remarkable."

"Indeed they are," she agreed, smiling a little. A slightly distant look crossed her face for a moment. "Ms Aoyama has talked to the police and FBI I believe, she requested that you three be allowed to leave so you can get on with your day's work. Are you going to be up to it?"

Adrian and the two martial artists exchanged glances. "I'm fine, I think, although I'm certainly going to need a stiff drink this evening. Most of these poor people are still terrified, but oddly enough I wasn't too worried." Looking at Akane and Shampoo he added, "I was pretty sure that we'd come through it all right. I have to admit I wasn't expecting the rest of you although I guess I should have done so. You tend to look after your friends, don't you?"

With a small smile Chou nodded. "We like to help where we can, yes. Luckily Ms Aoyama became aware of this incident fairly shortly after it started and contacted us." Looking at Akane, she said, "Aiko was involved with her family today which is why she was unavailable. She's feeling a little guilty about it."

"There's no reason for her to," Akane protested, "She's not our protector even if she's a very good friend. We don't expect her to come running every time something weird happens."

"Not saying mind, though," Shampoo giggled. Akane grinned at her friend.

"No, all things considered I'm grateful that you guys turned up when you did." Adrian and Chou both laughed at the comment.

"As am I, Chou, very much so. This could have dragged on for hours, assuming those idiots didn't just start shooting people again," the director commented, giving the four robbers a nasty glare. Several police personnel were now handcuffing them and lifting them onto stretchers brought in by ambulance staff. The body on the floor had been discreetly covered at some point in the last few minutes without them noticing, Akane saw.

"It could have been a lot worse," the police officer standing to one side noted, putting his notebook and pen away. "I'd like to add my own thanks, ladies. This sort of crime is always difficult to deal with, I can't remember the last one like this that ended so quickly and cleanly."

"Thank you, Officer," Chou replied. She suddenly went still, then turned her head to look out the window of the bank. "Oh, dear," she added in a soft voice. "This is irritating." Looking at the others she said, "It would appear that the dramatics aren't over just yet. I'd suggest that everyone stay inside the bank for now. Please excuse us." Aiko hurried over from where she'd been talking to one of the crime scene techs and both Chou and Tamiko stepped closer to her, all three of them vanishing in a bright flash.

The officer blinked several times, shocked. Turning to the remaining three people he asked, "Does that happen a lot where you come from?"

Akane nodded, while wondering what on earth was happening now. "It does, in fact. We're sort of used to it by now."

Shaking his head slightly the officer pulled out his notebook and wrote in it for a moment, before putting it away and wandering off to talk with his colleagues, a puzzled expression on his face.

"Is that supposed to impress us?" Tinnin growled. 'Briley' smiled at him.

"I was hoping it would, certainly. My men will open fire unless you all lay down your weapons and stand aside, Agent. We're taking what we came for."

"You realise there are about fifty guns pointed at you from the other side of the street, right?" Harrison asked the man, who looked over his shoulder at the massed police presence.

'Briley' shrugged, returning his attention to them. "I do, but it doesn't matter. If they open fire so do we and I can guarantee that you will all die first. It's in your best interests to stand aside."

Captain Martinez said, "I have to admit I admire your sheer balls, Briley, or whoever you are, this is the most bold-faced attempted hijacking I've ever heard of." The 'Agent' looked amused at his
"Thank you, Captain. Now are you going to do the sensible thing and let us do what we came for?"

"Even if we do, how do you think you're going to get away?"

'Briley' tapped the side of his nose. "That's for us to know. It's a good surprise, though."

Naito, studying them, suddenly asked, "This is all about the money, isn't it? That's what you're really after, whoever your group is, they need funds." All four men looked at him. 'Briley' and 'Hamilton' exchanged glances.

"I'm afraid I can neither confirm or deny that speculation," the older man replied with a grin.

"I believe Agent Naito is most likely correct, Mr Briley," the cold voice of Ms Aoyama said from off to the side. Everyone looked at where she was suddenly visible, no one having heard her approach until she spoke. "Or, more precisely, Lieutenant Solomon Webb, formerly of the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, declared missing, presumed dead after a light aircraft crash off the coast of Miami on September fifteenth, 1986, with your colleague, Mr Eric Palmer, who is standing beside you. Neither body was located despite a significant search effort. Some time after your apparent demise it was discovered you had in fact been accepting large bribes from at least two different narcotics cartels to be less vigilant about your duties than your superiors might have wished. There is also the matter of some one and a half million dollars in confiscated cash that was misplaced immediately before you both disappeared."

Everyone stared, then most of them turned to look at the four men who were looking absolutely stunned. "How the..." the newly named Lieutenant Webb asked in a faint voice. She made one of her smile emulations at him, which made him pale noticeably. There was an aura of danger coming from her that made Naito and Harrison sidle away slightly, just in case.

"Your parents, Earl and Alma Webb, died without knowing you were in fact still alive. That may have been for the best, they would have been most disappointed that once you left the Marine Corps you achieved a second career as a criminal." He kept staring, paler further. "Your two compatriots consist of Chief Petty Officer Carl Patterson, formerly of the United States Navy, who was declared missing at sea during routine operations off the coast of Hawaii in May 1994, and Sergeant Bruce Mullins, dishonourably discharged from the United States Army 1st Armoured Division at Fort Bliss Texas in March 1995 due to theft of weapons, then allegedly drowned as a result of suicide two years later. CPO Patterson and Sergeant Mullins also fit the pattern we are discerning." She turned to look at Tinnin, who was watching the effect her words had on the four men, all of whom looked very surprised and quite worried, with a grin on his face.

"I have forwarded you complete dossiers on these individuals and the two others in the vehicle across the street, Agent Tinnin. It is my hope that it will provide you with enough data to build a case."

"Thank you, Ms Aoyama," he replied with satisfaction.

"You are most welcome." Returning her attention to the four fake agents, she raised an eyebrow. "It would appear to be your move, gentlemen. I would strongly recommend that you take the opportunity to relinquish your weapons and submit to arrest as I suspect that both the LAPD and the FBI are losing patience with you all. It is not impossible that to do otherwise will invite considerable personal peril."

There was a silence that stretched on for several tens of seconds. Eventually, Webb glanced back at the truck which still contained two men and a very big gun. "I could order them to open fire," he said slowly.

"You could, indeed, Lieutenant Webb. However I suspect the results would be somewhat at variance from those which you are expecting." She waited while he thought. "I hesitate to suggest that you increase the pace of your deliberations due to the risk of appearing impolite, but I do have other appointments today that I would be remiss to delay more than the minimum necessary. May we have an answer?"

Webb looked at Palmer, then the two of them looked over their shoulders at the two men with M-16s, both of whom looked worried but resolute, not lowering their guns. Finally, Ms Aoyama sighed very faintly. "Perhaps a small demonstration would suffice to convince you. Ms Chou? You may proceed."

Everyone looked as there was a cry from the truck, followed by a couple of meaty thumps, after which both the men in the back of it dropped out of sight. A few seconds later the rear door opened to reveal Tamiko and Aiko exiting each with a soldier in fatigues slumped across their shoulders. Webb and his men gaped slightly. Walking away from the vehicle without any sign of effort both young women waved to the small group. "Hi, Richard!" Tamiko shouted happily.

Harrison waved back, grinning. He grinned even more when the next weird thing happened. A glowing golden box formed around the truck, confining it from all sides, then began to slowly contract. There were some metallic screeching noises accompanied by a crunching sound as the vehicle gradually crushed evenly down to a cube less than two metres on a side. A small quantity of fluids ran out from under it, a slight smell of diesel fuel drifting over to them then the box vanished. Naito watched in astonishment before he also started grinning. Tinnin swore under his breath, making the PSIA man look at him to see he was staring in shock. The four fake agents, though, had gone white.

"Do you still wish to resist or will you comply with Agent Tinnin's request, Lieutenant Webb?" Ms Aoyama asked evenly. He looked at her, then back at the truck, then at her again, before sagging. The other three very carefully handed over their weapons as soon as he did. "Most gratifying. My thanks." Ms Aoyama gave off an air of satisfaction. "Now, as the situation would appear to finally be appropriately contained, I will take my leave. It has been most interesting. Agent Naito, I have no doubt we will meet again." She nodded to him. "I may indeed meet the rest of you gentlemen at some future date. We will see. I wish you good fortune with your respective cases and will forward the results of my own investigation as previously stated. Farewell." She turned on her heel and strode off, Aiko appearing beside her after half a dozen metres, then both women vanishing again almost instantly. Everyone blinked at the flash for a second or two.

"That was pretty strange," Harrison said after moment. Turning to Webb he held out his handcuffs. "Would you like to turn around, please?" Shortly all four men were in custody and in the capable hands of a number of LAPD people who had come over when Martinez called for them.

"Who are these guys?" Adrian asked curiously as Aiko and Tamiko deposited two more men inside the front door of the bank, both of them wearing military fatigues and currently very much unconscious. The red-head laughed.

"Friends of Captain Mitchells," she replied. "They were in that truck over there manning a very big machine gun." She indicated over her shoulder. He stared as the vehicle in question was somehow crushed into a cube by a glowing golden forcefield or something like that, a better special effect than the studio's SFX people could produce.
"Holy crap," he muttered. "What was that?"

"Chou making a point," Aiko snickered. "These guys had some company who take a lot of convincing. I think that did it, though." They all looked out the window to see a remarkably large quantity of armed police surround four men who were quickly lying face down on the ground. "Yep, I'd say so." She sounded amused and pleased. "Oh, hang on, Ms Aoyama needs a lift. See you in a minute." She stepped back and flashed out of existence.

Shaking his head in renewed wonder Adrian exchanged a look with Akane and Shampoo. "You have some interesting friends," he laughed.

"Yes, I think we do," the Tendo woman replied, smiling. "Oh, look, there's Richard." They watched Harrison approach, several other people following him. All of them entered the bank, the police officer looking around before spotting them and coming over, smiling a little.

"Hello, Akane," he said, greeting Shampoo and Adrian as well. "I'm glad to see you're all OK. Akane, thanks, you did a damn fine job there. That trick with the phone was inspired."

"Oh, damn, I forgot about my phone," the Tendo woman said, looking around, then dashing over to the seating near the coffee machine, rummaging around for the device which she finally found. Flipping it open she looked at the display. "Two hours and eighteen minutes. That's going to cost." Pressing the disconnect button she put it away in her pocket, then retrieved her Japanese one from the table where it was still sitting next to Shampoo's, Soria having neglecting to confiscate them both at the beginning of the robbery. The Chinese woman picked up her own phone and pocketed it.

Adrian laughed. "Don't worry, Akane, the studio is paying for it. We get a ridiculously good discount aside from anything else."

Chuckling, Harrison turned to his companions. "This is, as you've probably guessed, Akane Tendo and Xian Pu, or Shampoo to her friends. Ladies, I'd like to introduce my boss Captain Martinez, Special Agent Tinnin of the FBI, and Agent Naito of your own PSIA."

"Masao is a good and trusted friend," Chou said as she faded into view beside Harrison, making him twitch a little then sigh. She giggled at the look on his face. "Sorry Richard, I couldn't resist," she added. Shaking his head he shrugged good-naturedly. Looking back at the two martial artists and Adrian, she added, "He's here because the PSIA keeps track of magical girl and certain martial artist activities, much like Ms Aoyama and her employers do I believe. When we were contacted by her earlier we called him so he could come and observe what was happening."

"And now I get to write a long detailed report on it for my own boss," Naito said, sighing heavily. "As if I didn't have enough work."

Chou laughed, making him smile slightly. "I and the girls will help if you like, we'll send you the usual information."

"Thanks, that will certainly make it easier." Naito inspected both Akane and Shampoo, then bowed slightly to them, before holding out his hand. "It's a pleasure to meet you both. I've heard quite a lot about you in the past from a number of sources."

Akane shook his hand after a small bow of her own, as did Shampoo. Both young women looked slightly nervous. "I'm not sure how I should feel knowing that the government is interested in what we do," Akane replied. He smiled at her.
"Don't worry, there's nothing nefarious about it, my department just likes to keep up to date on the various people with special talents that live in Japan. On the whole the vast majority of you are fairly well behaved and the benefits normally far outweigh the problems. Admittedly the various magical girls are both more effective when things go sideways than most of the high-powered martial artists, but on the other hand they can cause a damn sight more chaos when it gets out of control." He laughed at their expressions. "I'll also say that we're very grateful that Nerima has calmed down so much in the last few years. It was getting a reputation that tended to make people want to move to Minato."

Akane snickered. Shampoo shook her head, giggling. "Have been to Minato twice. Place insane, make Nerima look normal."

"Oddly enough that's exactly what people from Minato say about Nerima," he chuckled. "Often fairly forcefully."

"Both wards are quite exciting," Tamiko said with a grin. "I prefer living in Minato but Nerima is interesting as well. Less demons but more lunatics."

"Probably a fairly good description," Naito agreed, amused. "Anyway, don't be worried about the PSIA, we keep our distance and normally let you people sort things out between yourselves, we're not your enemies. If you want to be worried about anything I'd concentrate on why Ms Aoyama and her people seems so interested in you both." The look that the two young women got, complete with widening eyes and momentarily ashen faces made him, Chou, and the other two magical girls grin a little.

"Believe me, we're more than aware that she's watching," Akane almost whispered, looking around nervously. "She's... terrifying."

"Oh, yes, indeed she is, but on the other hand she seems to be on our side. More or less." Naito shrugged. "As far as we can tell, she's not exactly forthcoming about pretty much anything except what she wants us to know. But I can say that she's most definitely been responsible for a large number of people not dying horribly, so on balance I think it's a good thing she's around."

"Although she certainly can creep you out like nothing I've ever seen before," Tamiko put in, smiling but looking mildly unnerved at the same time.

"She is... gone... isn't she?" Akane asked in a low voice, her eyes scanning the room. Adrian could well understand her feelings, the very brief contact he'd had with the green-haired woman had made him think he was mere inches from something horrible the entire time despite her otherwise helpful demeanour.

"Probably," Aiko replied, grinning as everyone else except Chou involuntarily took a quick look about. "Relax, I took her back to Japan a few minutes ago."

"Thank god for that," Akane sighed in relief. A sudden expression of panic crossed her face. "Please don't tell her I said that!"

"We won't," Tamiko assured her with a smile.

Agent Tinnin, who had been listening quietly with Captain Martinez, stepped forward, holding out his own hand, which both young women and Adrian shook. "I'm pleased to meet you both, ladies," he said. "I understand from Lieutenant Harrison that it was your quick thinking, Miss Tendo, that led to the LAPD being so rapidly on the scene. We owe you thanks for that. And for the information you managed to get to us." He looked at Chou and the other two women for a moment.
"Even without the... special talent, I believe the Japanese government refers to it as, your efforts would have helped enormously. Of course, Chou here and her friends turning up brought things to a halt a damn sight faster than we expected."

"We do what we can, Agent," Tamiko laughed. He smiled at the red-head.

"So I understand," he replied. "Although there is a department chief in New York who would prefer that you do it somewhere else. I think you worried him quite a lot, Chou."

"Oh, yes, I remember him well," the blonde said with a small smile. "He was a little difficult at first, I have to say. In the end everything worked out quite well. I do like Special Agent Foster, though, I really must drop in and say hello one day."

"I've met Cameron Foster, he's a good man," Tinnin responded. "Very open-minded. Too much, some people have said in the past, but his record is excellent despite that." The man looked back to the two martial artists. "Ms Aoyama asked that we let you get on with your day, apparently you're in the middle of some sort of job interview?"

"Yes, they're doing a series of stunt demonstrations and a lot of training," Adrian put in. He glanced at his watch. "Which we're now two and a half hours late for."

"We agreed that we could let you leave, although we still need to have an interview at some point. Lieutenant Harrison says you're going to be at his house for a party later tonight and suggested that we could do it there. I'm fine with that if you are. I don't think it will take more than about forty minutes or so. If we need any further information later Miss Aiko here is willing to provide transportation as needed, I'm told." The brunette nodded and smiled.

"Of course. It's no problem."

Akane and Shampoo exchanged glances, then looked at Adrian. He shrugged. "It's fine with me. We'll all be there anyway, taking less than an hour out to talk to you guys isn't much of an issue."

"Am also fine with it," Shampoo added, Akane nodding as well.

"Great. In that case, you're free to go. Good luck with your Job interview, ladies."

"Thank you, Agent Tinnin," Akane replied. Turning to Chou and her friends she said, "And thank you all as well for everything. I'm sorry we ended up dragging you all out of bed."

"It wasn't your fault in any way, Akane, don't worry about it," the blonde woman told her, smiling gently. "We're always ready to help a friend and none of us were in bed yet anyway."

"I was," Naito grumbled, making her laugh a little.

"All right, one of us was. Poor Masao, we do seem to cause you sleeping problems, don't we?"

The PSIA man chuckled. "I don't mind, although sooner or later my wife may want to talk to you about the timing of your little field trips."

They all turned around when a loud argument broke out on the other side of the lobby where the former hostages were having an initial debriefing. A female police officer was apparently in the process of arresting one of them, who was being very loudly uncooperative. Harrison walked over, the others following mainly out of curiosity. As he reached them, the officer executed a neat judo throw when the man tried punching her, ending up kneeling on his back while she fastened her handcuffs around his wrists. "Problem, Officer Frazier?"
"No, Lieutenant, Mr Bouchard and I seem to have come to an arrangement." She smiled up at him, picking her hat from the floor where her captive had knocked it and putting it back on, before hopping to her feet and hauling the man she had arrested to his. "Paul Bouchard, as you requested, sir."

"Thank you, Frazier," he replied. Inspecting the man, who was fairly short, mid-thirties, with longish dark-brown hair in a ponytail and a furious expression on his face, he added, "We would like to talk to you about a certain payment you received two days ago." Bouchard looked shifty quite suddenly, his eyes flicking from side to side evasively.

"I have no idea what you're talking about," he blustered. "I'm going to sue for police brutality. You have no right to arrest me, I'm a victim here as much as anyone."

"Oh, I think you might be wrong there, Mr Bouchard," Harrison smiled. "And you know very well what I'm referring to. One hundred thousand dollars into your bank account from a source overseas. I have it on very good authority that there are a number of irregularities about that payment. We feel you may help us clear up some oddities about this whole affair."

"It was him!" Akane looked hard at the man. "He's the one that gave them the codes for the door." Harrison glanced at her.

"Ah, you picked up on that, I take it?"

"Yes, both of us did. We were wondering how those men had all the access codes for the security system, including the lock-down code, and also how they managed to arrive at exactly the right moment to both grab the armoured car delivery and find the vault open. I'm sure it would normally be closed, but they must have walked right in, they were only in the back for about three or four minutes before they came back with that." She pointed to the trolley piled with bricks of cash which four armed officers were guarding.

"That's what we think as well." Tinnin studied the man who was sweating by now. "As a result we're very interested indeed in talking to Mr Bouchard about many things. There are a lot of peculiarities about all this I want to get to the bottom of. Lieutenant, when you've finished with him, the FBI will take him off your hands."

"Of course, Agent. Happy to help," Harrison said with a cold smile almost worthy of Ms Aoyama herself. "Officer Frazier, if you would read Mr Bouchard his rights then make sure he finds a good seat in the back of a cruiser, please?"

"Certainly, sir," the woman replied, amusement on her face. She turned to her captive and began doing as requested. Seconds later he kicked her in the knee rather unexpectedly and awkwardly bolted for the door with his hands behind his back.

With a slight sigh Chou took aim, then flicked a small ball of golden energy at him, which struck him in the middle of the back. There was a sharp pop like a balloon bursting and the running man went limp, dropping to his knees and sliding a short distance along the polished floor before he came to a stop on his face. Everyone in the bank watched in a mix of shock and mild amusement as she retrieved him, his body limp in her arms as she picked him up easily. "Where would you like him, Officer?" she asked politely.

"Is he OK?" the female officer asked curiously, limping a little and wincing as she rubbed her knee.

"He'll be fine, he'll wake up in about ten minutes. Let me take him to a vehicle and I'll sort out that leg for you as well."
"Thanks." Both women left the bank while the various people inside it got back to what they were doing.

"She's very effective," Captain Martinez chuckled.

"You wouldn't believe how effective," Naito told him sincerely.

Grinning, Aiko turned to Adrian and the two women next to him. "Come on, guys, let's get you to the studio. I want to see what happens today." She looked back at Tamiko. "I'll come back in a little while to take you all home."

"OK," the red-head said. She grinned at the three people with her friend. "Good luck, you two. I'm waiting to see the final result, we all are."

"I'll make sure they have a DVD before they leave," Adrian chuckled.

"We can watch it at Nodoka's party," Tamiko laughed. She waved as they headed out of the bank, nearly three hours after they'd entered it.

Adrian pulled his phone, which he'd had returned by the police earlier, from his pocket and flipped it open. "Three texts from Matt wondering where we are, two from Aaron, and four from Karen," he reported, prodding buttons. Shrugging he put it back in his pocket as they arrived at his car. "I'll tell them in person."

"I'd like to try something," Aiko said, leaning on his vehicle as he unlocked it. He looked curiously at her.

"What would that be?"

"I think I can probably teleport your entire vehicle to the studio, which should save some time." She grinned at his look of surprise. "I've never tried it before but I'm pretty sure it will work. If it doesn't, nothing will happen, so it's safe enough."

Adrian studied her for several seconds before looking at Akane and Shampoo, who looked back with blank expressions. "I guess that it's worth a try." After a moment he added slightly plaintively, "You're sure it won't damage my car? I like my car."

Laughing, Aiko shook her head. "No, it won't cause any problems, whether it works or not. Go on, get in and let's see what happens."

Slightly nervously he opened the door and slid into the driver's seat, Aiko getting into the front passenger one while the others entered the back. "Right. Let's see what happens," the brunette said with a bright smile. Closing her eyes for a moment she concentrated, then nodded. "OK. Yes, this should work, I just need to expand the pattern a little..." There was a pause then she opened her eyes. "Easy. I can't believe I've never tried this before." With a grin she snapped her fingers.

Everyone on the street blinked at the large rainbow flash as the Mercedes vanished.

"You're back," Naito's wife mumbled as he slid into bed beside her. "How did it go?"

"I think it went reasonably well although there are some unusual aspects to the entire case that will probably take a while to resolve," he said sleepily, closing his eyes and rolling over to hold her.

"Where was it this time?" she asked almost unintelligibly, yawning widely half-way through the "That's nice, dear." The voice was very quiet, and followed shortly by a faint snore. He smiled to himself and was shortly asleep as well.

"That was interesting," Kasumi noted as she handed out several cups of tea. Her younger sister nodded, taking one with a smile of thanks.

"It was. The whole thing was peculiar from start to finish. I'm damn proud of Akane, I have to say, they way she handled everything was really good. She thought it through carefully and quickly, came up with a sensible plan, then carried it out perfectly. I'm pretty sure we only speeded things up, she and Shampoo would have probably sorted it out eventually." Nabiki laughed a little. "I can't believe she just let that idiot shoot her in the chest like that though. That's taking a lot on faith."

"It worked brilliantly," Tamiko giggled, sipping her own tea. "The expression on his face was amazing."

"When she threatened to punch him and made a hole in the wall he looked like he was going to piss himself." Fumiko laughed as she recalled the feed from the drone Kasumi had inserted into the bank through a hole discreetly cut in the outer wall. "That was hysterical. Your sister has a way with words, Nabiki."

Snickering, Ranma shook his head a little. "She's come on a hell of a long way in the last year or so. A different way than you have, Nabs, but just as far." He grinned as Nabiki sighed at the name. "I know, I know, don't call you Nabs." Laughing now she nodded.

"I'm more than happy with Kas as you know, but if I'd met that Akane years ago, who knows...?" he mused, his eyes meeting his wife's over his teacup. She looked at him serenely.

"We both know it would have ended much like it did, although possibly with less angst to go around," she murmured. Putting one arm around her the martial artist chuckled, leaning on her shoulder.

"Most likely, love," he replied happily. The other people in the living room all laughed a little at the contented look he had on his face.

"I wonder who all those people work for?" Misaki asked thoughtfully, nibbling a chocolate bar. Nabiki shook her head.

"I'm not entirely sure yet, Jun and I are still looking into the whole thing and trying to trace it back to a source. There are certainly several more of them out there somewhere, I don't think we got all of them at all. Immediately after Webb and his friends were arrested several bank accounts that were linked to him were closed and the funds transferred out through the most amazing collection of cut-outs you've ever seen. Whoever is behind this knows their financial way around for certain." She sighed slightly. "We'll keep at it and I'll make sure that both the FBI and the LAPD get copies of the relevant details. I'll send Masao the same information as well."

"It seems to me, sister, that you are becoming a forensic accountant even before graduating," Kasumi laughed.

Nabiki grinned. "It looks that way. Not exactly how I thought it would go, but you could say that about the last two years in their entirety."
"Do you regret any of it?" Tamiko asked.

"No, not at all," she replied, smiling contentedly. "There have been a few bad parts but they're more than made up for by everything else. I'm happy where I am, thanks."

"Good."

They sipped their tea for a few minutes in silence, ruminating on the events of the last couple of hours. #Nabiki, I have made an interesting discovery,# Jun told her abruptly. It sounded slightly puzzled.

’Which is?’ she replied curiously.

#I have so far been unable to trace the definitive origin of the entire financial tangle, parts of it don't seem to exist on a connected computer network and it will take time to locate and penetrate isolated sections, although it's certainly possible, but one thing does stand out.# The machine paused again. She began to think it was doing it on purpose to build tension.

'Spit it out, then, Jun,' she laughed silently.

#It would appear that the source of the payment to Mr Bouchard for his inside knowledge of the bank security is most likely also the destination that the forty-three million dollars paid by the CIA were ultimately credited to.#

Nabiki stopped mid-sip, shocked. After a moment, she asked, 'Hang on. You mean that whoever the CIA paid, at least two days before they got their money, set up a bank robbery to steal the cash itself which they already had credited to them?'

#Yes, it would appear that is exactly what happened. It's quite clever, they would appear to have been able to use the fact that they knew exactly where the cash was, or would be, stored, to arrange to have their operatives then take possession of it, thereby doubling their income from one transaction. It may prove fruitful to investigate whether this was a one off experiment or whether something similar has been successfully pulled off in the past.#

'Wow. That's... that's actually damn clever,' she said numbly. 'If it wasn't for Akane and Shampoo noticing something odd going on they'd probably have gotten away with it too.'

#My simulations suggest an eighty-seven percent probability of success based on the information we currently have available,# Jun agreed. #It could rise higher if they had other assets in place as well. I assume they did, there is still the issue of how Webb and his men were expecting to make a clean exit. We don't know what they had planned although I expect the FBI will be looking very carefully into that problem.#

'Agerent Tinnin didn't seem happy about it, definitely.' Nabiki thought hard for a while. The others had noticed the signs they knew meant someone talking to their SI and were watching curiously. 'Keep digging, let me know if you find anything else.'

#I will of course do so. There is one other item that is worth mentioning so far. Three of the more than two dozen accounts the funds were shuffled through belong to the company one Anthony Murray ran. They would appear to be private accounts, which in all likelihood very few people other than himself knew about. The records indicate that they have been used several times over the last few years for what would appear to be somewhat similar activities, although so far I can't say by whom. But it raises some questions that we should look into.#

Everyone stared as the crushed tea-cup dribbled through her fingers. Nabiki looked embarrassed at her momentary lapse of anger at the name Jun had mentioned. "Sorry, sis. Jun told me something that made me a bit annoyed," she apologised quietly, before relating what the SI had told her, sending them all the data it had so far acquired. Ranma inspected it with a frown, radiating a degree of rage that although well-suppressed was still apparent to them all. No one blamed him for it, they all felt the same.

"Murray. Or, someone he was involved with. I wonder who that might be?" the young man growled.

"We know he was apparently linked to a number of quite influential people one way or another," Kasumi noted. "At least a couple of FBI agents, someone high up in the US Navy, Masao mentioned a while ago that there was some possible link to the CIA that was still unclear, and so on. It's certainly possible that the people he was working for or with are still at large, I doubt that the FBI has managed to round them all up yet."

"It suggests that there is still a well-organised group out there somewhere who are tied in somehow to quite a lot of American intelligence agencies, if not further afield than that," Misaki said thoughtfully. "Russia is a possibility based on Agent Yefremov, for example. It might explain how they managed to use CIA, NSA, and DEA accounts, not to mention the Russian and British ones."

"I wouldn't think it's anything that the agencies in question are doing on purpose, though," Tamiko mused, closing her eyes and thinking. "Except possibly the CIA, they have a reputation for doing stupid things they're not really allowed to."

"Based on what you read on the internet practically every secret agency on the planet does things they're not really allowed to," Fumiko laughed. "So do we. But, that said, this feels more like a criminal thing than an overenthusiastic covert ops thing, somehow."

"Whatever it is, I think we need to keep an eye on it," Ranma said after a moment. "Hopefully the FBI and so on will get to the bottom of it, but if there's even the slightest chance it's something to do with that bastard Murray, I want to know what."

"He's not your favourite person on the planet, is he, dear?" Kasumi asked with a smile. He sighed, shaking his head.

"Not even close." Putting his cup down, he stood up, pulling his wife to her feet. "We're going to bed. See you guys in the morning." Kasumi giggled as he picked her up and carried her off, waving to the others as the door to the bedroom shut. Grinning, everyone else finished their tea and also stood.

"Come on, guys, let's leave them to it. Nabiki, you staying here tonight?" Fumiko looked at her friend, who nodded, still smiling at the antics of her brother-in-law and her sister.

"May as well, I can't be bothered to go back to Nerima right now and Aiko is still in LA. I let Nodoka know I was delayed so I'm going to bed as well."

"See you in the morning, then." The three women waved then left the apartment as she entered her own room, pulling her bag from ki space and poking through it for a toothbrush.

'Murray. I can't see anything to do with that bastard being a good thing,' she thought to herself, resolving to keep looking until she and Jun got to the bottom of everything, if only for her own peace of mind. 'Oh well, at least Akane still got to work without any more delay. Hopefully things are going well for her.' She smiled slightly then padded off to the bathroom.
Sorry about the delay, a combination of work and family, not to mention the vicious cold I've had for the last week, have conspired to slow my writing. On the other hand, you get nearly 52K words out of me this time, so there's that. I wanted to get this out for Christmas, but cold, as I said. So this is Happy New Year instead.

This concludes the Akane-centric part of the current story. While there will be other similar things in future they will be much shorter. I may well do spin-off stories to examine other parts of that direction at some point.

"Good lord," Adrian commented mildly, peering out the windscreen of the car. "That was the loudest obscenity I've ever heard." He was smirking a little. Aiko giggled, following his gaze. Behind them, Shampoo and Akane were laughing quite hard. They all stared at Matt and Aaron who were gaping back wide-eyed at where the Mercedes had abruptly appeared in the middle of the vehicle depot car park, which apparently Aiko had aimed at to give them space for the experimental teleportation.

Between the two other men, Greg was pointing at the car, his mouth moving but no words coming out after his shout of surprised shock. After several seconds, the other two turned to look at each other, then each one took an arm of their colleague and gently carried him back into the vehicle depot, probably aiming for his good whisky. Shaking his head a little, Adrian started the car and drove it over to beside the building where he parked it, then shut it down once more. "It still seems to work," he said to the magical girl beside him.

She looked pleased, nodding. "I told you it would be fine," she replied. "And I'm really happy that I worked out how to do that. It could be useful."

"Certainly beats pushing through the traffic at this time of day," he agreed, opening the door and getting out. The three women did likewise, all of them closing the doors and coming around to his side.

"How large a vehicle do you think you could do that with?" Akane asked curiously when she stopped beside Aiko, who glanced at her, then studied the car thoughtfully.

"I'm not sure," the other woman replied slowly. "It's not actually a matter of mass like you'd sort of expect. I can handle, oh, maybe a dozen people or so at once, before it gets... well, difficult isn't quite the right word but I can't explain it better than that." She shrugged. "The vocabulary isn't there for what I do to allow me to explain it simply, unless you know a lot about magical theory. Anyway, this experiment was very interesting, I modified the magic to allow a larger area to be teleported, which encompassed the car and everyone in it. It took a little more magical energy than teleporting only the four of us but nowhere near as much as I expected. I'm going to have to think about it for a while, and do some more experiments, but based on this one, I think I could probably handle something as big as a medium-sized truck without huge effort. Possibly larger, but I'm not sure without trying."

"Does it tire you out doing that?" Adrian inquired with a fascinated expression as he listened. "I mean, the energy has to come from somewhere, right?"

Aiko smiled at him. "When I first learned to do this it was quite tiring, yes," she said, nodding. "I didn't have very large magical reserves, nothing like as large as I do now, so I needed to sort of recharge between teleports for a little while. And I could only manage myself and maybe two or three people as well at best. But I steadily improved as time went on, both in skill in doing it and power level as well. Yori says that's normal, it's like practising anything, the more you do it the better you tend to get, and also more efficient." She grinned for a moment. "Yori's very keen on efficiency. She's always been a little annoyed at some of the other girls who splash power around like it's going out of fashion but couldn't hit the ground with a brick."

Adrian snickered again. "I sort of got that impression when we met the first time. She struck me as a young woman who is very careful with what she does."

"She has to be," Aiko agreed soberly. "The power level she has is absolutely terrifying. If she wasn't careful, you wouldn't want to be around when she did anything. None of the rest of us are anywhere near her level yet, although Chou is the nearest right now."

"Is there an upper limit to this sort of ability?" he asked as they began heading into the garage through the opened vehicle door, Akane and Shampoo following and listening with interest. She shrugged a little.

"I assume there must be but if so none of us have found it yet. Everyone we know has different inherent power levels, and I do know that some, possibly most, people simply can't progress past various points without risking severe damage to themselves, but what the absolute limit is I have no idea. Neither does Yori and she's the de facto expert on most of the techniques we use. She and Chou between them invented half of them. Neither one is a mage in the traditional sense but they know more about magic itself than any mage I know. And ki, which is what we also use a lot of for various things." She looked over her shoulder at Akane for a moment.

"For example, Akane has a lot more ki ability than probably ninety-nine percent plus of the general population in Japan, but her raw power level will never reach anywhere near what even my friend Azumi has, and Azumi is still the lowest-powered of our little group. Sorry, Akane, I know how that sounds, but I'm not trying to be rude." She smiled at the youngest Tendo, who grinned and shrugged.

"I know you're not. Like I've said, I know my own limitations and I'm not too worried about it any more."

"Good," Aiko replied, looking pleased. She returned her attention to Adrian. "But that said, even without the power, Akane here can still learn to use what she has very efficiently with enough work, which will probably allow some interesting things. She's already using it subconsciously to improve her strength and speed, for example. That's the first thing advanced martial artists who reach this point, which isn't that many, believe me, end up doing. Most of them don't progress past that but the ones who learn conscious control can learn all sorts of techniques. You saw Genma, for example, and Soun knows a number of methods that use ki in various ways."

She nodded at Shampoo. "The Amazons have all sorts of techniques based around ki as well. The hidden weapons technique is an example. That needs a lot of control ability but not too much power, so most ki capable people could learn it to some extent if they were willing to practise enough. From what I know of Mousse, Shampoo's friend from her tribe, he's a master of it, although Cologne has vastly more ki and isn't as good at that particular technique."

With a small laugh, Akane nudge her friend. "You know you'd miss him if he vanished, though."
"Maybe," the Amazon snickered. "Maybe not. Is truth he not so annoying these days and is good sparring partner with weapons."

"It sounds very interesting but very complicated," Adrian remarked as they arrived at Greg's office, peering in to see the man himself sipping a small glass of the whisky he kept in his desk with a trembling hand, Aaron and Matt watching, each with their own tiny measure. All three of them looked up at his voice, Matt grinning, Aaron looking mildly amused yet otherwise unmoved, and poor Greg staring at them like he'd seen something from the pits of hell jump out at him.

"It is," Aiko agreed. Moving past him she stopped in front of Greg. "I'm sorry, Greg," she continued, directing her attention towards him and smiling gently. "I really am. I didn't mean to scare you or upset you, it was the largest space to aim for and I was trying something new because we were late."

He opened his mouth, paused, sighed and tipped the remainder of the spirits in, swallowing hard, then put the glass on his desk with a click. After a few seconds he shrugged. "It's OK, Aiko. I suppose I'll have to get accustomed to all my normal beliefs vanishing into thin air with you girls around." He sighed again, heavily. "But please try not to make cars appear out of nowhere twenty feet in front of me without any warning again, will you? I nearly had a coronary."

With a small laugh she bowed a little, nodding. "I will do my best, I promise."

"Thank you," he replied. Screwing the cap back on his expensive whisky he put it away in his desk. "You don't deserve any," he said darkly to Adrian when the director looked mildly disappointed. Everyone else grinned at his comment while Adrian sighed theatrically. "Where the hell have you all been anyway?" the stunt instructor asked, looking at his watch. "We were expecting you about three hours ago."

"Ah. There's a story there," Adrian chuckled. "I needed to stop in at the bank on the way here, and one thing led to another..." He and the three women took turns explaining the events of the last few hours to all three men, who listened with shock and interest. Finishing fifteen minutes later, he shrugged. "And that's more or less it. Then Aiko had the bright idea to save time and try a new trick. You know the rest."

Matt, Aaron, and Greg exchanged glances. "OK," Matt eventually drawled slowly, shaking his head. "You win, you guys had a more interesting morning than we did." Turning to Akane, he added wonderingly, "Through the face?"

She grinned with a nod. "It seemed appropriate and it certainly worked. You should have seen the look on his face before he fainted." Matt stared at her for a moment then burst out laughing.

"I can imagine," he finally managed, leaning weakly on the desk. "I'm almost sorry for the bastard."

"I'm not," Adrian growled, Shampoo nodding beside him with an annoyed expression. "He and his friends are complete assholes, and murdering ones at that. The cops are going to crucify them, then the FBI is going to burn what's left. That Agent Tinnin guy seemed in a pretty bad mood as far as those people were concerned. I certainly wouldn't like to be in their shoes. He struck me as someone you didn't want to get on the wrong side of." After a moment, he thoughtfully added, "And if the LAPD or the FBI miss anything, that Ms Aoyama woman will do something horrible to them. She was absolutely horrific."

Beside him, Akane and Shampoo both shivered, looking pale. The other three men studied them with curiosity. "Who is she?" the director asked after a moment. "She's obviously met you before, she seems to know a lot about both of you."

"You have no idea," Akane replied in a low voice, shivering again. Looking up, she shook her head slightly. "No one seems to know for sure. Or, at least, I'm sure Yori and the others know, but they're not telling." Everyone's gaze switched to Aiko, who was looking faintly amused.

"Trust me, you don't really want to know," the brunette said lightly. "But there are a few important things you should realise about Ms Aoyama. One, she is a good person but at the same time she's very definitely not someone you should ever get on the wrong side of. Two, she knows more about everything than you'd believe. Three, she never, or at least hardly ever, gives second chances."

Aiko smiled unnervingly. "So far no one has pushed her far enough to see what would happen if she got irritated. We're all quite interested to see what happens if that ever occurs, but we'll be watching from a safe distance if it does. Probably the moon."

The petite woman stopped speaking, while Akane and Shampoo had paled even more. "Who the hell does she work for?" Matt asked almost in a whisper. The young woman's words, even delivered in her cheerful voice, or perhaps because of that, somehow made them all feel worried.

Aiko chuckled. "No one is sure and she's not saying. Assume they can reach anyone, anywhere, and you're probably on the right path, though." She looked quite amused by their reactions. "Oh, calm down, guys. She's not going to come and get you in the middle of the night."

"No, Ms Aoyama would take you in middle of day when you thought were safe," Shampoo said darkly, her eyes looking in to the corners of the room with rapid movements. "She most creepy person in world."

"True," Aiko grinned. "She'd probably enjoy you saying that, I think she's amused by the reactions most people have to her. In her own weird way, I mean."

"She sounds pretty scary," Greg commented, looking puzzled when Akane and Shampoo both made frantic shushing noises while looking around again. "Oh, come on, girls, she can't be..."

The phone on his desk rang.

Everyone looked at it.

Akane went white.

"Oh, god, now you've annoyed her," she said quietly, backing away. Adrian looked at her, then Shampoo who appeared nearly as worried, then Aiko who had a blank expression on her face although he felt she was somehow still amused.

"Perhaps you should answer it, Greg," he suggested as the phone rang again. The driving instructor looked at him, then reached out to the phone. Just before his hand reached it the ringing stopped.

"There, you see, nothing to worry about," he said, even so looking rather relieved. The atmosphere in the room had begun getting to him despite his best efforts, the genuine fear in the eyes of the two martial artists was unnerving.

"Indeed, Mr Crossley," a chillingly cold voice sounded, coming from the phone speaker, which had somehow turned itself on. Everyone but Aiko jumped violently. "I merely wished to suggest that it would be prudent for Ms Pu and Ms Tendo to proceed with their tasks for today as expeditiously as possible since several hours were lost during the unfortunate events of this morning, despite Ms Aiko's investigations into advanced teleportation manipulation. My compliments, by the way, Ms Aiko, your achievement has been noted with interest. May I also suggest that you utilise this new skill in the transportation of Mr Stewart and his colleagues to the secondary site at the appropriate juncture?"

There was dead silence in the room, most of those present almost having stopped breathing. The voice really was that creepy. After a second or two, it continued, "Additionally, Mr Stewart, I wish to inform you that you will find a visual and audio record of Ms Tendo's and Ms Pu's actions today on your computer system in a format that your equipment can utilise. My employers would like me to pass on their expectations for a fruitful demonstration. We await the results with considerable curiosity."

After a long, horrified pause, Akane managed to choke out, "Thank you, Ms Aoyama. We were just getting ready to get to work."

"As you say, Ms Tendo. I have no doubt that your considerable talents will stand you in good stead, as in the case of Ms Pu, during the career opportunity you have been offered. I must return to my own work, but I wish you good fortune. Farewell." The line went dead.

Several thousand kilometres away in a comfortable bed in an apartment in Minato, Nabiki giggled to herself, sent Aiko a quick thank you, then fell asleep feeling content.

"Well, that was weird, wasn't it?" Aiko commented brightly, clapping her hands together and making everyone jump, tearing their fascinated and horrified gazes from the innocent telephone and directing them to her. "Shall we get on with it? She's right, we're wasting time here."

"Holy crap." Matt managed after a moment. He'd edged away from the phone the whole time the woman on the other end, wherever that really was, was speaking, and was now leaning against the wall of the office as far from the device as he could get.

"See? See?!" Akane pointed dramatically at the phone with a trembling finger. "She knows everything we do!"

"Relax, Akane," Aiko reassured her, smiling. "I told you, she seems to like both of you. That was her in an unusually nice mood. I think she was being friendly if anything." The brunette thought for a moment, raising an eyebrow. "Well, for her definition of friendly at any rate." She shrugged. "I'll admit, it takes getting used to but she means well. Trust me, you'd know it if she was annoyed." After more thought, she grinned in a worrying manner. "Or perhaps you wouldn't. It would be quick, though."

"Oh, thanks a hell of a lot, Aiko, that makes me feel so much better," Akane snapped, glaring at the brunette woman, who started giggling.

"Come on, Akane, it's kind of funny in a weird way. Don't let it bother you. Let's get you guys to work and forget about terrifying alien women and bank robberies for the moment. Don't forget, there's one of Richard's barbecues to look forward to later."

It took a little while, but eventually with a deliberate act of will Akane forced her worry down and nodded. "OK." Breathing deeply a few times and closing her eyes for a moment, she nodded again. "OK. Right. How are we going to do this, Adrian?" Opening her eyes she turned to the director who was looking at the phone again, but turned to her when she spoke.

"You know some very scary people," he muttered then seemed to get hold of himself. Looking at his watch he thought for a few seconds. "All right, let's see. We're running, hmm, three hours and twenty minutes or so behind schedule. That's annoying. But..." He turned to Aiko. "Is it possible for you to teleport the vehicles to the airfield? If you could, that would save at least two, maybe three hours of driving, depending on traffic, which would put us more or less back on track. The airfield is the problem, we'll run out of light if we wait too long and that will lose us a day."

Aiko thoughtfully nodded. "I think I might be able to. I can certainly give it a try." She looked at Greg. "Mind if I borrow one of your trucks for a few minutes?" The stunt instructor stared at her, before nodding slowly.

"Why not? If you're going to break the laws of the universe you might as well do it right, I suppose." He stood up, then paused. "You'll bring it back, right? Only I'm responsible for it and those things aren't cheap."

She laughed momentarily, nodding. "Don't worry, I'm not going to steal your truck. I'll just pop it out to the airfield and back to make sure I actually can. I think it's possible but I won't know for sure until I try."

"OK. Use the one parked around the side. It's the one with the bikes in."

The brunette smiled at him. "Thanks." She headed out of the office, the others exchanging looks then following curiously. Going around to the side of the large garage she opened the door of the medium-duty truck and climbed in, sitting in the drivers seat. Rolling down the window, she leaned out. "The flash will probably be pretty intense so I'd suggest looking away."

They all nodded like a row of dolls, then obediently turned around. Several seconds passed, broken only by the young woman muttering to herself, then there was a triumphant, "Got it." The flash that followed was dazzling even reflected off the walls of the buildings. Turning back they all stared at the absence of over ten tons of vehicle.

Aaron whistled. "Impressive," he said in a low voice. "Very impressive."

Moments later the vehicle reappeared soundlessly, making them twitch despite themselves. "And so is that," he added softly. Aiko opened the door and dropped lightly to the ground, a broad smile on her face.

"It's close to the limit of what I can do at the moment, I think, but it's not too hard. It sort of gets... more complex... I guess, the larger the payload, there's all sorts of things to keep track of, but I can handle something this size OK. I'm going to have to practice with big loads. I'm curious to see how large an item I can learn to transport. I have to see if I can work out how to get rid of the flash as well, sooner or later." She looked very pleased with herself.

"That's incredible," Adrian told her, looking a little startled, but also pleased. "And if you don't mind transporting us, it will save a lot of time."

"Sure, I don't mind at all," she assured him. "Although I should probably hop everyone who's going and hasn't teleported before across the yard first so they can get over the initial sickness outside the vehicles. No reason to have the seats covered in vomit." She snickered as he looked faintly disgusted, obviously remembering his own first teleport.

"No, I can certainly go along with that," he agreed. After a few seconds he smiled. "Well, we should try and get back to our schedule, then. With you able to transport us, we're not more than about half an hour behind where I was hoping to be now, so I think we can still get things together and do what we planned to do." He looked at his watch and made a quick mental calculation, nodding to himself. "Yes, it should all work out nicely. Good." He looked up as Jim came around the corner of the garage and headed towards them with a curious expression. "Hi, Jim."

"Hi, guys," the other man replied, nodding to them all. "I was wondering where you all got to. Anton is wandering around asking if you're going to be ready soon. He wants to watch the stunts in Stage One, he's got a look on his face like a ten year old at Christmas." Adrian grinned, as did most of the others.

"We ran into a few snags earlier on but we're back on track now," he explained. "I'll tell you about it later." Turning to the rest of the little group, he addressed Akane and Shampoo. "If you two would like to head over to Stage One with Matt, I'll go and make sure everything's in place, then we can go over the notes for the first scene again. Did you read the paperwork last night?"

Akane nodded, as did Shampoo. "Yes, we went over everything before we went to bed and again at breakfast. It looks like fun."

"It's going to be pretty good," he chuckled. "Aaron will get you outfitted with the weapons, there will be someone from wardrobe with the clothes, and the extras and camera guys should all be set up by now." He glanced at Matt, who made an affirmative gesture.

"My guys are all ready and sitting around drinking coffee waiting," the stunt coordinator replied to the unasked question.

"Great. OK, you guys head over and I'll go and talk to Anton. We'll meet you there in about twenty minutes." Jim followed as he left, both of them talking. Greg watched the two men leave then turned to Matt.

"Mind if I come over later and watch?" he enquired. Matt grinned at him.

"No problem."

"Thanks. I've got some paperwork to finish but that will only take about forty minutes." He nodded to his colleague, then the others, before looking at the truck and Aiko, who smiled at him. Shaking his head a little he also left, going back into the vehicle depot. Matt chuckled at his actions before turning to the women.

"Poor guy. Greg is a very good man and a friend but it always takes him a little while to get comfortable with new ideas. You lot count as very new ideas."

Akane snickered. "I can understand that." Shampoo and Aiko grinned as well. "I like him, though. He's a very good driver and an excellent teacher."

"He is that," Matt agreed. Waving in the direction of the relevant part of the studio, he added, "Shall we?"

"Certainly," she replied politely, before smiling again. The three women and two men headed off across the parking lot.

Looking around at the complex set in the huge building, Akane smiled to herself, before turning to Shampoo, who was also looking excited. Two camera crews were setting up their equipment, the same ones who had filmed the demonstration, one or two of them nodding to the two women as they entered the sound stage. "This is going to be fun," she commented, the Amazon nodding in glee.

"Damn right," the other woman replied with a small giggle of joy. Aiko reappeared next to her as she returned from taking Chou, Tamiko, and Agent Naito back home, looking around with interest but saying nothing.

"OK, this is the set for scene eighteen," Adrian announced, looking around with satisfaction as he entered with Anton next to him. "It was a damn nuisance to shoot for the movie, but it looks really impressive." Everyone gathered around him as he pulled a clipboard from under his arm and flipped through some papers on it, then pulled several sheets off and handed them around. "These are the scene notes for reference." Anton read his handout with interest, looking up at the set as a number of grips made the final adjustments on it.

"I remember what a pain this was. But you're right, it came out very well in the end. How many takes was it?"

Adrian sighed. "Something like sixteen. I'm hoping this will be a little more straightforward." Matt patted him on the shoulder comfortingly while Aaron grinned a little.

"Make sure you've taken a pill first. You know what you get like when you're directing." Pushing the hand off his shoulder Adrian looked mildly annoyed as the others snickered at his expression.

"Yes, thank you. I took a pill. All right, let's go over the plan. Akane, we'll start with you in the role of the spy, and you'll be the bad guy, Shampoo. Once you're sure you've got it, we'll swap roles and do it again. Does that sound OK?" Both young women nodded. "Let's get you in costume."

The group walked over to the side of the cavernous room to where several people, mostly women, were sorting through a pile of clothing. The elderly woman who was clearly in charge smiled at them all. "Hi, Gladys. Doing this yourself?" the director chuckled as he greeted her.

"Of course, that way I can watch," the old woman replied with a smile. She turned to Akane and Shampoo. "It's nice to see you both again," she added. They'd been introduced a couple of days earlier during their tour of the studio.

"Hello, Gladys," Akane smiled. "How are you?"

"I'm fine, thanks, dear. How are you? Based on what you did to my motorcycle suit you must have spent some time sliding around on your back." The wardrobe manager looked concerned. "Are you all right?"

Laughing slightly, the youngest Tendo nodded. "I'm completely fine, don't worry. I bounce."

Shaking her head in amused wonder, Gladys stepped back and looked at them both up and down for a moment. "Very impressive. All right, let's get you both in costume." She picked up a shirt, holding it against Akane and studying it closely with an expert eye. "Good, we got your measurements right. Let me see, you'll need this... and this... and one of these..." She piled half a dozen garments in Akane's arms. "The changing room is just over there, dear. Put all that on and we'll see how it looks." As the Tendo sister went off to change, she could hear the costumer start again with Shampoo, who soon joined her in the next room.

Quickly divesting herself of her clothes, she neatly folded them on a chair in the room she was using, then changed into the clothing Gladys had given her. Adjusting the thin but tight top slightly she looked at herself in the mirror. 'Wow,' she thought in mild shock. 'Not exactly my normal look, but it's not bad.' Turning slightly she ran her hands down her sides smoothing out the fabric. She was now wearing a dark blue, nearly skin tight top with a leather jacket over it, black pants, and a
A pair of boots not unlike the ones Yori and her friends wore, which had velcro straps. They gave very good traction while being flexible and light.

The top exposed her arms from about halfway down her upper arm, clinging tightly but still allowing free movement and apparently breathing well. Taking the jacket off again, she stepped back from the mirror and went through a couple of katas, checking how everything fitted and finding it didn't restrict her at all. "Not bad at all," she mumbled out loud, smiling. She dug a hairbrush out of her bag and quickly sorted out her hair, before putting the jacket back on and the brush away. "Not bad at all. Akane Tendo, Super Spy." Posing, she began giggling at the absurdity of it all. "How the hell did I end up here?" she asked herself, shaking her head in amusement. Turning from the mirror she opened the door, just as Shampoo came out of the next room.

Both young women looked at each other and grinned. The Amazon was dressed in a similar manner, although her top was black and cut differently. She had tied her hair back in a somewhat modified version of her normal ponytail, which exposed her face slightly more than normal, without the bangs she usually had on each side. "That look suits you," Akane noted. Shampoo looked down at herself, then back at her friend.

"I could say the same. Are you going to dress like that at home?" she asked with a grin. "Nodoka might find it a little showy."

Posing, Akane laughed for a moment. "Perhaps the motorcycle suit would be better. That's even tighter." They stood next to each other and studied their reflections in the large mirror the changing area had on the wall. "You know, we make this look good, don't you think?" she asked with a snicker.

"I do. So, Ms Tendo, shall we go and see what happens in our first real stunt scene?"

"I believe we should, Ms Pu." Grinning, they both left the changing area.

"Wow," Matt muttered, making Adrian turn away from where he was going over some notes with Jim and Aaron, Anton listening quietly, to follow his eyes. Both the young women who were the centre of the day's activities approached from the changing rooms, dressed in their costumes for the stunt, talking together in Japanese and laughing about something. "Those two look amazing."

"Damn right they do," Anton exclaimed with a smile of glee. "This is going to be incredible to watch."

"It that what spies really wear on a job in the US?" Aiko asked, amusement in her voice. "None of the ones I know do." Everyone looked at her as she grinned at them.

"How many spies do you know?" Aaron asked curiously. She winked at him.

"A few."

Looking intrigued, he stared at her for a moment, then turned to the approaching women, shaking his head. Adrian smiled a little as Aiko chuckled slightly. "You both look very good," he said to Akane and Shampoo, who smiled back.

"It's not the sort of thing I'm used to wearing but it all seems to fit well," she replied. Gladys came over and walked around them studying them intently, nodding to herself, before making a couple of adjustments.

"Good, good, everything fits. All right, Akane, these are yours, and Shampoo, these are for you."
She handed them each a pair of mirrored sunglasses, which they took and put on. "They're safety glasses, mainly, disguised as sunglasses."

Aiko laughed for a moment as they looked at each other. "You look like you're going to work for Ms Aoyama," she giggled. Akane paled a little and took the glasses off again, which made the brunette giggle harder.

Shaking his head in amusement, Adrian turned to Aaron. "They're in your hands now," he said. With a nod the armourer waved the two over to a table next to the wardrobe people. On it were several hand-guns and a pair of shoulder holsters.

"Put this on," he said, handing one to Akane, then showing her how to adjust it. When he was satisfied it was correctly set up, he picked up one of the Glock 17's, checked it quickly, then handed it to her butt first, along with a suppressor. He nodded in satisfaction when she repeated the checks. "Good. You remembered."

She smiled at him. "You made it very clear what we had to do and you're a good teacher," she replied. Smiling, he watched as she put the weapon into the holster then practised drawing it a few times.

"OK, that all looks good. Shampoo, you're next." Shortly both women were outfitted with similar rigs. Shampoo put her leather jacket back on and practised whipping her gun out from under it smoothly, making Akane grin at her. Snickering, he watched, then handed them each half a dozen magazines, which they accepted then carefully checked, making him look approving. "Blanks, of course. Remember what we talked about yesterday. They might not hurt you two, even point blank, considering what I saw you do, but don't shoot anyone else in the face close up with them, OK?"

Both nodded soberly. "Good. Load your weapons." Once they had inserted the first magazine, then reholstered the guns and put the spare ammunition in their jacket pockets, he turned to Adrian who had been quietly watching from the side. "They're good to go."

"Great." The director looked pleased. "OK, ladies, lets go over the scene. It's pretty short, only about three minutes when edited, but I'd expect around five minutes of action to get to that point." He led them over to the set, the others following but staying out of the way. "The spy comes in this door over here. She goes down this corridor, stops here, the first guard comes around the corner, she shoots him. He goes down, then she heads over to this point. Up the stairs, another two guards, which she avoids by pulling herself into this air vent. Once they're gone, back out of the vent, down that hallway, over the partition wall, and into the server room here." They followed as he walked along the set, which had all the appropriate fittings but one side open to the rest of the building allowing the cameras to film everything.

"She plugs the bug into that socket, then leaves the room. Going back, the bad guy is hiding up here, near the ceiling, and drops down behind her. She hears the bad guy, dives over this desk, then they shoot at each other. Five more guards come running in from there and there. Three of them get shot, one by the bad guy by mistake, then the spy loses her gun. She kicks the weapon out of the hand of the bad guy, they start hand to hand combat. Half the room gets wrecked in the process, the last two guards are taken out with the scenery, before the spy manages to dive out the window. She uses that flagpole there to break her fall, spins around it, lands on that awning, then slides to the ground, before escaping, the bad guy following her." He pointed at the various sections of the set.

"The next scene would have a motorcycle chase, and so on, but we're not going to bother with that part." Turning to the two women, who were studying the set carefully, he asked, "Does that all sound good?"

"The actors would get cut into the action sequences in the appropriate places, like close ups of their faces, but for these purposes it's easier if you do the entire sequence in one go, I think. When we did it for real we had to shoot it in several takes, leaving aside all the reshoots because something went wrong. Don't worry about the acting part, that's not what we're concentrating on at the moment, so it doesn't really matter. The action is what counts. It's a good mix of acrobatics, weapons usage, and combat. Not very realistic but the public seems to like it." The Amazon woman nodded with a grin.

Adrian led them over to a group of six men who were dressed in dark green uniforms with blue logos on, looking like some sort of security personnel, also wearing the mirrored safety glasses. "OK. These guys over here are the guards. Try not to kill them, they're expensive to replace." One or two of the men looked slightly worried as both Akane and Shampoo snickered in a dark fashion.

Matt, who was standing with them, laughed for a moment. "He's kidding, guys." Waving at the stuntmen, he added, "Some of my people. Guys, you've seen the recording of the demonstration, so you know how good Akane and Shampoo are." All the men nodded at once, staring at the two young women, who looked fairly harmless. "Make it look good but don't get carried away," he advised. "Don't worry about hurting them."

"I'm not sure we could if we tried," one of the men, a tall Nordic-looking blond, said with an expression of awe on his face. "I still can't believe what I saw."

"It's all real, Gunnar, believe me," Matt assured him. "OK, normally we'd practice the stunts for days before a scene like this," he carried on, turning back to Akane and Shampoo. "But I have no doubt you can do it on the first try. Go easy on the guys here, they're pretty tough, but not like you are."

"We'll be careful, Matt," Akane assured him. "We both know how to pull a punch and make it look good."

"Great. OK, let's get everyone in position and do a slow run through. Akane, you're over there, Shampoo, you're up here." Adrian quickly got everyone into their places. "We won't bother filming this part." He explained exactly what he wanted, Akane listening carefully, then stepped back to rejoin the others. "Everyone in place?" A chorus of affirmative calls came back. "OK. Scene eighteen, practice run one, take one. Action!"

Pulling her gun out, Akane quickly screwed the suppressor on, before cocking it and easing the door open, slipping inside and creeping along the corridor to the first marked point, sidling along the wall. Adrian called for her to halt at that spot. Freezing, she waited for the guard to come around the corner, which he did seconds later, spotting her and whipping up his own weapon which he was carrying openly. Three muffled shots sounded and he dropped. "Good. Now, over to the next point." They proceeded in this fashion to slowly go over the entire scene, taking about fifteen minutes, until Adrian called out, "Cut."

Approaching the Tendo woman, who was running her hand through her hair to one side of the set, he waited for Shampoo to join them. "That's harder than I thought it would be," Akane told him, looking mildly surprised. Shampoo nodded.

"Is much to remember," she said.

Adrian smiled. "It's a fairly long scene, like I said, normally we'd do it in shorter sections, but that went pretty well. You missed a cue twice, Akane, but for a first attempt I'm very impressed."
Shampoo, you need to come in a little earlier next time." Both women nodded, listening. "OK, let's reset and try again. A couple more times and we can run it for real." Everyone went back to their places, various grips putting the scenery and props back to their marks. When they were ready, he restarted the whole thing again.

The female spy eased the door open, peering inside quickly, then slipped into the building, her gun ready. Sliding along the wall she froze at a corner, hearing footsteps. Seconds later a uniformed armed security guard came around the same corner in the other direction, almost walking past her, but sensing something amiss at the last moment, spinning around and raising his weapon. He was too late, as the spy put three rounds into his chest with her silenced handgun. Staggering back against the opposite wall as he dropped his own gun he slid down it into a heap on the floor. Quickly checking him she nodded, then made her way in the direction he'd come from.

Ascending a flight of stairs, gun ready for action, she stopped at the top, crouching and listening carefully. Again, footsteps could be heard, at least two sets. Looking around she spotted an air vent on the wall across from her near the ceiling. Quickly darting across to it she reached up, pulling the hinged cover open and swinging it to the side, then grabbing the edges of the conveniently person-sized hole. Smoothly and silently pulling herself into the exposed vent with no signs of effort she closed the cover behind her, only barely visible in the darkness behind it. Two more guards approached and walked past, talking quietly to each other and looking around alertly.

Ten seconds after they'd disappeared down the stairs, the vent cover eased open, a head of dark blue hair popping out and looking quickly about. Seeing nothing, she slid out of the vent and closed the cover, before heading in the direction she'd been going. Entering a large room at the end of another corridor she paused, listening, before turning left and creeping along the outside of the room. Arriving at a partition that split the room into two sections, she looked around, holstered her weapon under her jacket, before jumping up and grabbing the top of the wall, quickly peering about again, then pulling herself up.

Flipping over the wall in a remarkable display of acrobatics she landed on the other side in a crouch, pulling her weapon in the process. Another pause to listen for guards, then she headed quickly for a door on the other side of the area she was in, next to a large laser printer. Seconds later she was inside, closing the door behind her. She pulled a small device from her pocket and snapped it into a socket on the front of one of the server racks, looking satisfied when a small green light illuminated, then moved a few cables to cover it, before returning to the door and putting her ear to it.

After a couple of seconds she opened the door a crack and looked out. Seeing nothing she slipped out, closing the door behind her, then headed back the way she'd come, once more flipping over the partition without any trouble.

Everything went horribly wrong as she reached the hallway she'd come down when she entered. Despite her caution, she missed the fact that a woman with long purple hair was somehow holding herself near the ceiling against the wall, dropping lightly to the floor behind her as she moved past underneath. Hearing a faint sound, the spy whirled, firing half a dozen shots in the process. The new arrival moved too fast to hit, diving under the path the bullets would take and knocking the spy into a spin with a quick punch on the way past.

Recovering quickly the blue-haired agent darted back into the large room, taking cover behind a desk. The other woman leapt around the corner of the corridor into the same room, firing half a magazine at the spy in a rippling roar of gunfire, the spy returning fire. Diving under another desk the counter-agent fired a few more shots over the top of it blindly, before dropping the magazine.
from her weapon one-handed and slamming in another one.

The spy took the time to reload as well, removing the suppressor rapidly and pocketing it, before peeking around the side of the desk, only to duck quickly as more gunfire came from several guards who entered the room from two directions. Returning fire she moved from desk to desk trying to stay behind cover as two guards dropped to the floor. A guard she missed jumped her from behind a support column, grabbing her gun hand and slamming it against the column a couple of times, causing her to drop her weapon, before throwing her sideways through a cubicle partition, which exploded into fragments. Rolling to her feet she picked up a monitor and ripped it from its cables, tossing it at him and knocking him down, before diving head first over another partition as the rest of the guards fired at her.

Rolling a couple of times she ended up behind a photocopier, looking around for an exit. Another guard came around the corner behind her, only to scream and fall to his face as several more shots sounded. Looking mildly puzzled the agent shook her head, but took the opportunity to make a run for the door she saw on the other side of the room.

Half-way there she was intercepted by a lilac and black blur, the counter agent slamming into her, then recoiling and aiming her weapon. A sudden high kick and the gun went flying, the agent spinning on her other foot and redirecting the next kick into the midsection of the other woman, who grunted and flew backwards.

As they exchanged blows in a dazzling display of martial arts, the guard who had been hit with a monitor staggered to his feet, blinking, then took aim. Spotting him in the nick of time the spy dived forwards, between the legs of her opponent, rolled to her feet, grabbed a paperweight from the nearest desk, then threw it at the guard, bouncing it off his head and knocking him unconscious. Deflecting a return blow from the lilac-haired woman, she jumped over another desk, looked wildly around, then dashed for the nearest window.

On the way the last guard shot three times at her, missing with each shot, before she kicked a metal wastebasket into the air with one foot then slammed it half-way across the room with the other one in one smooth sequence, barely breaking stride in the process. He went down after taking a wastebasket to the head, she crossed her arms over her face and dove head-first through the glass, which exploded out over the street below.

Falling in an arc, the spy reached out and grabbed a horizontal flag-pole halfway to the ground, spun around it like a gymnast, flipped twice, bounced from the awning of the entrance to the next building on the street, then rolled several times when she met the ground. Jumping to her feet she looked up at the window she'd exited so dramatically, waving to the lilac-haired woman who was looking out of it with an annoyed expression, then darted into an alleyway as the other woman shot at her and missed. The counter-agent dived out of the window after her, taking a similar path to the ground, before following.

"Cut!"

"That looks pretty damn good." Aiko commented, looking at the monitor for the high definition playback system which was replaying the video footage shot in parallel with the film cameras. Adrian nodded, studying it critically with an expert eye.

"It's very impressive," he replied happily. "Not perfect, Akane missed one mark there a little, but not enough to matter, and the sequence with the monitor wasn't quite right. But that's fine, it would all get edited down anyway in real life, so little issues like that can be cut out. It certainly went a damn sight better than the actual movie did." He grinned at Akane, who was standing next to the magical girl with Shampoo by her side, both of them watching with interest and the Tendo woman still picking small pieces of fake glass from her hair. "I liked the wave at the end. Not in the script, but it looked good."

She smiled for a moment. "It seemed a good idea at the time."

Looking over at the stunt people, who were talking to each other, one of them holding an ice pack to his head and shrugging while his companions laughed, the director smiled little. "You might need to recalibrate your strength, though. You nearly knocked poor Nunzio over there out for real."

She blushed, nodding.

"I said sorry."

"He doesn't seem too upset." Chuckling, Adrian watched as Matt talked to his people, before turning back to the three women. "I think that's the final take for you, Akane. Shampoo, you're up next. Get a couple of sandwiches and some water, then we'll do a dry run. I don't think you'll need more than one, you both already know what to do, but we just need to check your positioning in the opposite roles."

Both women nodded, heading to the catering table. Adrian and Aiko watched them go.

"They certainly seem to be enjoying themselves," the petite brunette said, glancing at him. He nodded, smiling.

"Indeed they do. I'm pleased to see that the initial nervousness seems to have gone away. Akane was looking a little unsure of herself at first but by the end of it she was having a lot of fun. Shampoo seemed more confident."

Aiko nodded a little, thoughtfully. "I think Shampoo is quite extroverted from what I've picked up over the years. Some of the stories I've heard make it obvious that she's not concerned what other people think about her. Akane, although she sometimes really stood out, a lot of the time was rather shy." She shrugged slightly. "It's a good thing she's finding something she can do, and do well, that other people admire. Her self-confidence has been helped a lot, I suspect."

"Well, I have to say that based on that, I think in the long run she's got what it takes to act as well as do the stunts," he replied, watching as Akane and Shampoo picked through the food on offer, talking to Jim who was grinning and waving at the set, also with a sandwich in hand. "It'll be interesting to see how it goes with Shampoo."

"What did Anton think?" she asked, glancing over to where the producer was talking to Matt and one of the stunt men, while Greg, who had come in half-way through the last practice run, listened with interest while still wearing a somewhat startled expression.

"He seemed very happy indeed," Adrian chuckled. "He was having trouble keeping quiet during the take, he nearly bust a gut not laughing when Akane did that thing with the wastebasket. It was pretty impressive."

"She's good at improvising," Aiko agreed, also laughing a little. "Like a really hardcore version of Jackie Chan. If she'd put more effort into the kick she could have taken that guy's head off."

"I'm glad she didn't," Adrian replied, "Stuntmen are expensive and the paperwork would be a nightmare." They shared a smile then Aiko went off to get some food for herself. Turning to the VT operator, Adrian had a word with him, before heading towards the coffee. Half-way there he was met by Anton, accompanied by Matt. "So?" he asked the producer as they filled their cups from the machine, looking over it at the other man and raising an eyebrow enquiringly. Anton dropped a sugar-cube into his own cup and stirred it with a pen he pulled from his pocket as he seemed to think about the one word question, making Matt and Adrian exchange an amused glance. Suddenly noticing what he was doing the producer flicked coffee from the pen, grumbling slightly, dried it on his sleeve, and put it away.

"I'll bet that improves the taste a lot," Matt chuckled. Anton shrugged, smiling a little, then sipped.

"Not as such," he commented wryly, pouring himself a fresh cup. "So. Indeed. Overall, I'm very impressed. There were a few minor mistakes, true, but this is essentially the first time in front of a camera for either of them and they've had, what, about forty-five minutes or so of instruction and three dry runs? That's pretty impressive by anyone's standards."

"I'd have to agree," Matt said, nabbing a sandwich from the nearby table and biting off a large part. Chewing and swallowing he waved at the set with the remainder. "Most of the people I've trained over the years wouldn't do anywhere near as well with so little time to learn. We've dropped them in at the deep end but so far they're both swimming very well."

"Very true," Anton nodded. "The actual action is first rate, of course. The martial arts part was very good, as I would have expected based on the first day, the gun-play and other action sequences were pretty damned impressive as well. With some more practice they're both going to be extremely good. And, of course, we can have things like that incredible dive through the window without any safety equipment required, which is just insane. It opens up some amazing possibilities." He turned to look at the set which was in the process of being repaired and restocked for the next run through. "I mean, normally that would have been about six separate stunts, a week's worth of planning, air bags, the whole nine yards. We just showed them what we wanted and they did the entire thing in one take. Which is something I've never seen before, not even close."

Smiling happily, he sipped some coffee. "If we can teach them both to act as well as they do the physical stuff we're going to put everyone else in this sector out of business inside three years."

Adrian started laughing, shaking his head. When he calmed down, he looked at the other man, whose twinkling eyes showed his own amusement. "I doubt we'll be able to quite manage that but I do think we have the beginnings of something truly remarkable here. I doubt that Mitch will have any trouble convincing the board when we show them the final cut of all the sequences. Hell, Akane just did a better job on her first try, in under an hour and a half, than several very famous actors did in a freaking week of shooting!" He shook his head in mixed wonder and irritation, making Matt and Anton smile. "I wish I'd had those two a couple of years ago, that damn movie would have been a lot less trouble to make."

"It still came out pretty well, so I wouldn't worry, Adrian," Anton assured him. "Everyone is very pleased with the result. They'll be more pleased in a year or two when we have something with those girls in it."

"Once we've got them up and running with the stunts, we're going to have to experiment with some speaking parts, and ease them into acting," Matt mused, looking at the other two, Anton nodding thoughtfully while Adrian turned to watch Akane and Shampoo talking to Aiko, who was giggling at something the violet-haired Amazon had just said. "I have a feeling Akane will pick it up quickly once she has some camera time. She can be a little hesitant until she gets into it, I've noticed, although Shampoo doesn't have any self-confidence issues at all from what I can see."

Adrian grinned, watching the young women chat. "No, she's pretty self assured. You're right about Akane, she's always started off nervous but once she's sure she can do what she needs to, seems to just go for it. Probably good, over-confidence is much more of a problem than being a little unsure."
Both of them sure learn fast, and actually listen really well. Greg said as much during the driving training, so did Aaron and Karen. Aaron was really impressed, actually, he said he's never taught anyone who learned as well."

"Something to do with the martial arts, I guess?" Anton wondered out loud. "Or just being Japanese? Or Chinese, in Shampoo's case."

"They both seem to recognise experience and have a hell of a lot of respect for it in a teacher," Matt nodded. "That certainly helps. There might be an element of respect for your elders there as well."

"Hey, I'm hardly an elder, I'm only forty-six," Adrian protested, smirking. Matt shrugged at him, finishing his coffee. Snickering a little Anton did the same. "OK. Let's get them set up again and see what Shampoo does in the lead role." Putting his now empty cup down next to the other empties, Adrian led his little group over to the young women in question, joining them, Aaron, who was explaining something esoteric about the gun Shampoo still had in her holster, and Jim, who was listening with interest.

"Back to work, everyone," he stated, clapping his hands. "Let's see how it goes with the roles reversed. Shampoo, we'll go through the same dry run again to get you sure of your marks then we'll run the scene for real, OK?"

"Sure, Adrian," she agreed, following eagerly as he went back to the set, Akane beside him. The others moved off to stand next to the primary camera dolly which was filming most of the action and watched with interest. Soon they were finished, everyone taking their places. Once more, cameras rolling and everyone in their places, the small audience silent, he called, "Action!"

Matt watched quietly as the sequence ran, expertly assessing the two young women as they bounced around the main room in the set exchanging shots, shaking his head a little in respect. 'Incredible,' he thought, wincing as Gunnar caught the monitor to the chest again, rather harder than completely necessary. 'Bet that hurt.' Watching as the 'guard' slumped to the floor groaning in not entirely simulated pain he snickered a bit. Beside him, Aiko did much the same, smiling a little. He noticed a little later as Shampoo dived through the window and did an even more elaborate spin around the flagpole before bouncing around the front of the fake building onto the ground that the brunette was now looking in a different direction, off to the side and up. Puzzled, he followed her eyes. As soon Adrian called "Cut!" loudly he turned to her.

"What's up?" he asked. She glanced at him, then back into the rigging at the side of the studio.

"We appear to have someone not on the guest list," she said quietly. Following her eyes he squinted, finally making out a shape in the shadows above the lights that looked not entirely unlike a person in dark clothing lurking on a catwalk thirty feet up.

"Ah. Yes, I see him. Or her."

"Him. About fifteen." She sounded confident. "Caucasian, brown hair, blue eyes, perhaps a hundred and seventy-five centimetres tall." Matt couldn't make out any of these details but took her at her word. Thinking, he sighed after a moment.

"Damn. I know who that is," he muttered. She grinned.

"So do I. Want me to go get him for you?"

"Please. I'll call Security." He pulled out his phone and dialled.
"We should probably go easy on the kid, he's just overenthusiastic." Aiko looked amused.

"And a damn nuisance. That's the third time in the last month." Matt quickly explained the situation when the phone was answered, then hung up. "I wish I could figure out how the hell he keeps getting back in here. It's driving Security insane."

Laughing for a moment, she looked around, then up, before winking at him and vanishing. Blinking at the flash he stared up again as most of the people in the studio looked over curiously.

"Hello," the amused-sounding female voice said in his ear. The teenager nearly fell out of the rigging he'd climbed into a few minutes ago, startled at the sound, especially since he was sure he was alone. A hand clamped on his shoulder steadying him while another one neatly relieved him of the camcorder he was holding, so quickly he had no chance to prevent it. Turning huge eyes over his shoulder he stared at the young Japanese woman grinning widely from immediately behind him, hanging from the truss directly above him by her ankles and making it look as easy as standing on a level floor. "I'm fairly sure you weren't invited, Mr Goodner."

"Oh, shit," he muttered. More loudly, he asked resignedly, "How do you know my name?"

"I have a very good memory for faces and an interesting way of getting information," she chuckled. "Come on, let's go and face the music before you fall."

Sighing, he wriggled back onto the catwalk he was half hanging off the edge of to get the angle he'd wanted with his camcorder. "Hey, I recognise you, you're not Security, you were with those other stunt women in Australia!" Stunned, he watched as she dropped onto the catwalk, somehow ending up standing on it without either making it wobble or showing any effort. "Are you in this movie? What's it called? How did you vanish like that at Ayer's Rock? What's your name? Are you really from Japan? Are those other women here as well? Who are those people down there? How did they do all those incredible things? Are they martial artists? Where..." He cut off abruptly as she smirked at him then the world jumped, a horrible feeling of incredible nausea going through him. Vaguely realising something weird had happened he dropped to his knees and tried not to throw up, finally succeeding after a minute or two and much effort of will.

"...are we?" he finished weakly, looking around. She helped him to his feet, still smirking. Several people were looking at him in a way that made his head droop, including the two young women who had been doing the stunts, the man who had been calling the commands who he recognised as the director, and two unpleasantly familiar people in studio security department uniforms, the latter pair not looking pleased. He looked around wildly trying to work out how the hell they had come to be standing on the floor of the building rather than the catwalk.

"Hello, Danny," the female security guard on the right said, sighing a little as she accepted his camcorder which the Japanese brunette handed her. "How did you get in this time?"

"There's a hole in the fence at the back of the studio next to the alleyway by the pawn shop, behind the dumpster," he reluctantly admitted. "I figured out I could climb up the fire escape onto the roof and come in through the ventilation system, the second unit from the front has a loose cover."

Shaking her head with a slightly admiring expression, she glanced at her companion, who shrugged. "You should use some of that ingenuity to do something legal, not trespass," she told him, although the corner of her mouth was twitching slightly. The male guard didn't look nearly as amused.

"But I want to know when the movie is coming out!" he protested. Didn't anyone understand? This was much more important than paying attention to 'Keep Out' signs.

The director, Mr Stewart, sighed loudly. "Danny, I've told you, over and over, there is no movie!"

"But..." Danny pointed at the two women who had been doing the stunt, then the elaborate set. "I've just seen you shooting a scene from it. When is it coming out? What's the plot? Who else is in it? What's it called?"

The director massaged his forehead, glancing at the tall man beside him, who he knew was something to do with the stunt department. This person seemed amused, snickering a little, although he was also somewhat irritated.

"Oh, for god's..." The director sighed again. "Look, firstly, this isn't a shoot, it's a job interview. Secondly, even if it was a shoot, you're not supposed to be here. Aside from anything else if Aiko hadn't retrieved you from the catwalk you could well have splattered yourself all over my floor, from what she says. I'd prefer not to have to stop and get some mops." Danny felt somewhat ill at this summation, although the woman, Aiko, seemed to find it funny. So did the other two girls. "Thirdly, this is the fifth time in two months we've caught you where you shouldn't be. To be honest it's getting a little annoying. Enthusiasm for what we do is fine, but breaking and entering to illegally tape it is going a bit too far."

Danny's heart sank at the words. "Breaking and entering?" he sputtered. "I didn't break anything."

"So, Entering, then," the brunette chuckled. "Still not ideal."

"Not to mention criminal trespass," the male security guard put in somewhat sourly. Danny closed his eyes for a moment. That sounded bad, his mom was going to kill him. "Should I call the police, Sir?" he asked after letting his words sink in.

The director was looking thoughtfully at Danny when he opened his eyes again, returning the gaze pleadingly. He waited to find out his fate. After a very long few seconds, and a glance at his colleague who shrugged a little, the director shook his head. "No, not yet. Look, Danny, I'm going to make you a deal. You will stop sneaking in here like this, if nothing else so you don't end up killing yourself and causing me any more headaches. In return, I'll let you come and watch one of the stunts tomorrow, all the way through, assuming your mother allows it, and I'll give you some tickets to the premier of my next movie." Danny's eyes widened, and he opened his mouth, the director holding up a hand before he spoke. "But..." There was a warning tone in his voice, making the young man close his mouth again.

"But?" he asked in a quiet voice.

"But, I'm serious about this. You agree to this, I'll let you go this time, but if we catch you sneaking in again, the police will definitely be involved. You're a good kid, I think, so don't let me down, OK? It would be a shame to let your enthusiasm get you a criminal record." The man looked at him, waiting for an answer. For once in his life, the teenager thought things through carefully.

"OK. I'll stop."

With a small smile the director nodded, turning to the security guards. "Call his mother to come and pick him up. Again. Tell her the deal, get her permission, and let her know I'll call with directions and a time tomorrow morning." The female guard nodded while the male guard kept his eyes on Danny, not looking entirely pleased.

"Yes, Sir. OK, Danny, come on."
As they were about to leave, the director said, "Give him back his camcorder but keep the tape," making her nod, then gesture to the exit, standing aside. Sighing a little the teenager headed in the indicated direction, both security guards accompanying him.

His mom was going to go nuts.

By the time he reached the door he was puzzling once more about how he couldn't remember what the woman who had caught him looked or sounded like. It was very weird.

Akane watched the two guards and the worried-looking teenager leave, the door closing behind them, then glanced at Adrian, who shook his head with a small sigh. "There's such a thing as being too enthusiastic," the director mumbled.

She grinned at him. "That was very nice of you," Adrian shrugged slightly.

"He's not a bad kid really, just doesn't think things through very well. He could have killed himself if he'd fallen off that catwalk, he's not like you guys. He wouldn't have bounced."

"Splashed, perhaps," Aiko chuckled. He gave her a look.

"Thanks for that mental image, Aiko," he said.

She bowed slightly. "You're welcome."

Shaking his head in amusement, the man looked around the room. Most of the people in it were getting on with their jobs now the small drama was over. "Well, hopefully he'll keep to his side of the deal. Let's get on with it. It'll take about half an hour to change the set for the bar fight scene, so grab some coffee and we'll go over the notes while that's going on."

Shortly they were sitting in a side room off the main studio, sounds of heavy objects being moved coming faintly through the wall, reading the paperwork carefully. "It looks quite straightforward," Akane said, putting her coffee cup down on the table and picking up her clipboard again.

"Everything is in one room, we just fight for a while with swords, while the other stunt guys are running around breaking things."

"Pretty much," Adrian grinned. "You two are the main action focus, the extras are for background fill in, but you'll interact with them when they go past. Try not to remove any heads." Shampoo giggled, reading her notes intently.

"Stunt swords too blunt to remove heads unless hit very hard," she said, looking up and smiling at him for a moment. "Just break neck."

"Well, try not to do that either," he chuckled. "If you kill or maim too many co-workers you get a bad reputation."

"Then no one wants to work with you," Matt snickered, making Aiko, who was sitting beside him also reading the notes with interest, laugh for a moment.

"If you want to improvise some things, like you did with that wastebasket, go ahead, but keep it fairly simple for the moment," Adrian noted, scribbling something on one of the pages he was reading. "It looks pretty good but we're mainly interested in the sword-fight."

"OK," Akane nodded. Flipping the rest of the pages back into place after finishing going through the notes, she put the clipboard down and rolled her head a few times, producing some clicking sounds from her neck. He winced a little at the sound, making her smile.

After another twenty minutes of discussion they had a decent idea of what they needed to do. Matt brought the other stunt people in for the last half of the discussion so everyone knew what was expected of them. Eventually, Jim opened the door and leaned in, saying, "The set is ready, guys."

"Thanks, Jim," Adrian replied, standing up and stretching for a moment. "Let's go and do a dry run, then." He checked his watch. "If we can get this wrapped up in under an hour we can get a quick late lunch then get out to the airfield and still be pretty much on schedule."

Everyone trooped out into the cavernous main room, looking at the set, which had undergone a remarkable transformation. The open-plan office was now a western saloon bar, all the interior details having changed completely. "Wow," she muttered. "That's impressive."

"Our set guys are very good and have a lot of practice," Adrian smiled. "It's all modular and can be moved around pretty fast. This isn't nearly as detailed as a real set for a movie would be so it doesn't take long to rearrange things." Walking over they inspected the set. "All right, since all the action is in this one room, the camera doesn't need to do any tracking shots. We'll start with you all on your marks. Akane, you're there, Shampoo, that's yours." He pointed. "Gunnar, over there with Bill, Zach and Nunzio over by the piano, Jeff at the top of the stairs, Remy behind the bar." Everyone nodded, heading to their spots. "We won't bother with different costumes for this sequence, we don't have time right now and it's not important." He watched critically as everyone took their spots.

"OK, Nunzio, move a little to the left. Good. Akane, try about two feet back." Stepping back he studied the scene for a moment. "Yes. That looks better."

Matt chuckled. "We don't need to get it perfect, Adrian, this isn't going in a movie."

The director looked insulted. "I take pride in my work, you know that, Matt," he said archly. Matt grinned, as did everyone else. "OK, fine, perhaps I'm getting carried away." Shaking his head in amusement the director's attention went back to the set. "That looks good. Mark those new positions." Several grips moved the tape marks on the floor while the others left the set for the moment. "Aaron, your turn," he added.

Shortly the arms master had everyone outfitted with swords and a couple of clubs. The various stunt people were practising their moves while Aiko and Aaron watched critically, the magical girl commenting in a low voice to the compact man, who was looking interested. Akane watched for a moment then hefted her own sword, a traditional katana, with a very dull edge.

"I'd get in trouble if Mousse ever saw me with a sword like this," Shampoo noted, smiling, as she ran her thumb down the blunt edge. "He'd say it was unworthy of an Amazon."

Akane snickered. "I can imagine. He likes his blades razor sharp." She took a couple of practice swings with the stunt sword, raising her eyebrows a little. "It's pretty well balanced, though." Shampoo nodded, watching, then spun her own sword a few times one-handed.

"Not too bad. For a fake, anyway."

Adrian came over from where he'd been talking to the camera crew, smiling as he watched the Chinese woman go through a few kata moves with the blade. "You guys all ready?"

"Yes, Adrian," Akane replied, smiling.

"Great. OK, let's get back in the set and do a dry run." They both nodded, walking back to the fake bar and resuming their positions. The stunt extras did the same, looking eager to get to work. "All right, you all know what to do." He waited for a few seconds while they all took up their starting stances. "Practice scene two, take one. Action!"

He stopped and started the scene half a dozen times, calling instructions, until he was happy with it. "That looked pretty good. Let's do it again, with those changes." They did the run twice more until he looked satisfied. "Great. OK, take a five minute break then we'll run it for real." Matt handed him a bottle of water and a sandwich. "Thanks."

Once everyone had done anything they needed to do, they retook their positions. He studied the scene, nodded, and made the appropriate calls. Shortly the large room echoed to the sounds of a major fight, swords clashing together and wood and glass shattering. Akane grinned slightly, deflecting a blow from her friend, who ducked as a bottle flew through where her head had been, shattering in a spray of tiny shards as the youngest Tendo woman sliced it out of the air with her weapon. Back-flipping a couple of times as Shampoo followed, swinging at her much more slowly that she was capable of, although a damn sight faster than most people could do, she dived under the piano, then popped up behind it, flicking another bottle that was sitting on top of it into Shampoo's face with the tip of her sword.

The Amazon didn't flinch, jumping up onto the piano and slicing down at her, while Nunzio, who was in the process of hitting Zach with a breakaway chair, threw the remains at her. She kicked them right back at him, then chased Akane, who had seized the opportunity afforded by her momentary inattention to scramble up the wall onto the stairs, across the room when the Japanese woman leaped down over her head.

Gunnar ducked Akane's blade when she swung at him on the way, deflecting it with his own and making sparks fly, then rolled sideways as Remy, still behind the bar, started throwing shot glasses at him. Shampoo intercepted and redirected a couple of them as she passed through the target zone, one of them flying through a window and shattering a pane of glass, the other one catching him squarely between the eyes and bouncing off. He dropped behind the bar as she kept going.

The fight went on for another couple of minutes, ending up with only Akane and Shampoo standing, facing each other more or less where they'd started, swords raised for one last blow, when Adrian called "Cut!" They lowered their weapons then began laughing.

"That was fun," the Tendo woman grinned.

"It looked impressive, definitely," Adrian chuckled as he joined them.

"It hurts, though," Remy groaned as he pulled himself up from behind the bar, rubbing a red mark on his forehead. Shampoo blushed a little.

"Sorry. Hit glass too hard."

"Don't worry about it," he said, smiling a little. "I've had worse. Good shot as well."

"Thanks," she grinned.

"Let's see the playback, but I think that went as well as we could hope for," Adrian told them, waving them over to the VT desk. Everyone gathered around the monitor while the operator prodded a few buttons. When the playback was finished, he smiled. "Very good. A little editing and an audio track and that will look excellent. Well done everyone and thanks."

The Tendo sister smiled, pleased at the way the first two stunts had gone. "That really was a lot of "fun," she said happily.

"Very much," Shampoo agreed.

"I'm glad you two enjoyed yourselves," Adrian smiled, waving to Anton as he left the sound stage with Jim and Aaron. "Go and have a quick shower, change, and we'll go over to the cafeteria."

"OK," she replied, heading off with Shampoo, thinking over what they'd done so far and finding it good.

"So far I'm very pleased and impressed," Anton stated as he wiped his mouth, leaning back in his seat. He looked over to the next table where Aiko, Akane, and Shampoo were talking to Matt, the stunt coordinator explaining something with broad gestures and the three women listening intently, looking amused. "Those girls are remarkable. Leaving aside the martial arts they both seem to have a good feel for what works in front of a camera."

"I'd have to agree," Adrian replied, sipping a glass of apple juice. "Do you think Mitch will be pleased?"

"Oh, definitely, yes," the producer grinned. "He's going to love it. Jennifer should be happy as well, or at least stop worrying after all of this. We've got plenty of footage showing those two are practically indestructible under normal circumstances so she shouldn't be worried about signing off on any more stunts."

"She did finally give in on the car chase," Jim snickered. "Although it took a lot of talking even after the demonstration."

"I wish I'd had a camera in the firing range," Aaron noted, watching the three women, who were now all grinning as Matt apparently reached the punchline of whatever anecdote he was telling them about. "Watching them catch bullets was the most incredible thing I've ever seen in my life."

"It might be an idea not to mention that to her until we're done," Adrian giggled, remembering the look on the armourer's face after Aiko's little joke. He shook his head a little. "She might blow a fuse and start shouting at you for letting them stand in front of a live weapon."

Aaron shrugged, smiling a little. "Possibly. But yes, you might be right. No need to get her too excited just yet."

"I have to figure out how to use that in a movie," the director mused. "And Shampoo's... special talent."

"The cat thing?" Aaron looked thoughtful while Anton gained a slightly puzzled expression.

"Cat thing?" he asked curiously. Adrian exchanged a glance with the armourer, then explained, making the producer stare at him for some time rather incredulously.

"It's true," he said, spreading his hands. "All four of us saw it, not to mention Richard Harrison, his wife, and his daughter. She turns into a cat."

"Holy crap," Anton breathed. "You didn't mention that in your original interview notes."

"Would you have believed it without seeing all this other stuff?" Adrian asked. After a moment, the other man sighed, shaking his head.
"No, probably not. But I definitely want to see it at some point."

"She's probably up for it, but let's get all the other work out of the way first," Adrian replied. After a moment he grinned broadly. "In fact, we can leave it as a surprise for Mitch and Jennifer."

Anton gave him a look then started snickering. "Oh, yes, please let's do that. I want to see his face."

"You coming to Richard's barbecue tonight?" Adrian asked him. "He told me to invite anyone who wanted to come from the studio."

"I'd like that, thanks," the other man said, nodding. He checked his watch. "Half past two. We're going to have to hustle to get out to the airfield and still have light, we've only got about five hours of light left and it'll take half that to get there."

Adrian grinned. "I know a short cut," he chuckled. He pointed at Aiko, who looked over at him, making him think she had heard everything. The brunette winked. "She figured out an interesting new trick this morning."

"Ah." Anton looked thoughtful. "Even the equipment?"

"Yep. An entire truck in one shot. It's pretty damned impressive."

"I can imagine." The producer looked amused. "I'm looking forward to this."

"So, how do you want to do this?" Adrian asked Aiko, who was standing beside him looking at the three trucks parked outside the vehicle depot, one of which Greg and a couple of his people were just loading the last of the equipment into. All told there were a couple of dozen people to transport. Just as she was about to answer, Karen hurried around the corner of the building, looking apologetic.

"Sorry, guys, got caught up in a last minute meeting which just wouldn't stop," she explained, looking around at the various goings-on. "What's the plan. I got the message to come here rather than head out to the airfield."

"Aiko is helping us make up for lost time by teleporting the trucks to the site," Adrian explained. The stunt woman's eyes widened.

"Good grief. You can do that?" she asked incredulously. Aiko nodded, smiling.

"I worked it out this morning. I'll have to do them one at a time but it's not too hard." She looked at Adrian. "To answer your question, I was thinking about it and to stop anyone throwing up, I think it would be best if I quickly put them out for a moment then do the first jump with them unconscious." She grinned at his expression. "Don't worry, I'm not going to hit anyone on the head or anything like that. I know a neat trick Yori taught us which will let me render someone unconscious very quickly and safely then wake them up in the same way. No side effects at all."

"Hmm. This I have to see," the director mused. As she chuckled he stepped forward, calling for attention. Everyone stopped what they were doing and listened. After explaining the plans, and explaining again for people who didn't believe it which required a demonstration by Aiko who teleported across the yard and back, he quickly sorted everyone out into three groups, one for each vehicle.

"OK." Aiko approached the first group, mostly the camera crew, and looked them over. "I think if everyone sits down it would be best. You won't feel anything, and it will only take a few seconds.
Once you've gone through it once you won't feel sick again, but the first time can be pretty unpleasant for most people." She waited as the group of eight people exchanged glances then slowly sat. Adrian watched with interest as she got them to lean forward with their arms on their knees, then quickly prodded each one in the back in a couple of places, a faint blue glow showing where her fingers touched. Each person slumped, clearly out of it. Satisfied, she stood in the middle of the group and they all vanished with a flash, reappearing on the other side of the car park momentarily before blinking out and ending up back where they'd started from.

Going around them all in turn once more the brunette quickly revived everyone, the men and women looking startled, then standing. "Everyone feel OK?" she asked, receiving several nods and affirmative answers. "All right, next group," she called, turning to the small audience, many of whom were staring in shock. Shortly everyone who was going had undergone the quick procedure. "All done," she reported to Adrian with a smile.

"Great." He looked around at the stunt people, grips, camera crew, and various other staff, who were wandering around looking startled. "Let's get on with it and see what happens."

Shortly he was sitting in the wide passenger seat of the camera truck, Aiko next to him, the crew in the back and Greg in the driver's position. "Ready?" the magical girl asked. He nodded. She concentrated momentarily, saying as an aside, "This takes a lot more effort at the moment so I have to think about it," then the world jumped, the buildings vanishing and being replaced instantly by a view of the control tower.

"Amazing," he breathed in wonder. She grinned at him, pleased at the comment. Opening the door he climbed down, the others following.

"I'll go and get the other trucks," she said. "Keep that area over there clear for them, all right?" She indicated a position fifty feet away.

"Got it." With a flash she vanished. Thirty seconds later the second vehicle blinked into existence, Karen leaning out of the window and grinning widely.

"This is unbelievable," the red-head shouted happily, jumping out and looking very impressed. Akane and Shampoo climbed out behind her, followed by Aiko, who immediately disappeared again. Walking over the stunt woman shook her head, looking around in wonder. "Just like that, a two and a half hour trip in less than a second."

"It's damned impressive and very useful," he chuckled. They watched as the last truck appeared next to the second one. "Saved a lot of time and effort."

Shortly everyone was running around setting things up. All three motorcycles were unloaded and prepared, Shampoo and Akane were dressed in their leather suits, which included a brand new one for the latter, and Greg's team were in the process of preparing one of the two stunt cars.

"Let's get the pickup out again and do the same runs as yesterday, with Shampoo on the bike," Adrian suggested having checked with the driving instructor. "Greg says the car will be ready in about forty-five minutes. Once we have you," he nodded to the Amazon, who was listening with her arms folded, her helmet dangling from one hand, "up to speed on your part of the stunt, we can start practising it properly with the right vehicle."

"OK, Adrian," she replied, smiling a little in anticipation.

"Akane, are you all right with jumping out of the pickup again like yesterday?" The Tendo woman nodded.
"Yes, I think I've got that part well in hand now." She looked down at herself, grimacing.
"Hopefully. I was getting a little tired of bouncing down the runway last night."

"Yes, I can imagine," he grinned, shaking his head a little, while Karen and Shampoo snickered.
"Hopefully you can refrain from such things today."

Giving him a look with a raised eyebrow, she laughed briefly, then headed over to the pickup which Matt was setting up, Karen and Shampoo going over to the bikes. Watching for a moment, he smiled then walked over to Greg. "They're ready to practice Shampoo's part," he said to the other man, who looked up watching one of the mechanics adjust the steering of the car, then over at the pickup which Akane was standing in the back of. "You want to drive, or is Matt going to do it?"

"Let Matt do it," Greg replied. "I want to be sure the car is right. He's a good driver and knows what needs to be done."

"OK. When we're sure Shampoo is ready, I want to practice the run fairly slowly to start with, up to the point the car goes up on two wheels, so everyone knows their cues. Once that part is done, I'd like a few runs just practising the launch manoeuvre. Does that sound reasonable?"

Greg thought, then nodded. "Yes. Akane will get that part fast but it's best to practice. When they're sure they know that part, we go over the bail-out move separately. I also want to make sure both of them know how the car flip and pyro effects will happen so they can be ready for it."

"Sounds good. All right, then, I'll be in the camera truck. See you in a while." The stunt driver waved absently as he went back to inspecting the work on the car, making Adrian smile slightly then head off to the relevant vehicle.

"Eeep!" Shampoo squeaked, the bike wobbling frantically as Akane landed on it, making Matt grin at the sound coming over the radio. He looked in the mirror to see her waver around for a moment then bring things back under control, accelerating past him with a whoop, her long hair flapping in the wind with Akane holding on to her firmly.

"You OK, Shampoo?" Karen's voice said, making him glance at the other woman who was riding about eighty feet to the left in a position that let her keep an eye on proceedings and give advice where necessary, something that had happened a number of times in the last twenty-five minutes. There was a couple of words of Mandarin that sounded happy, along with a laugh of triumph, then the Chinese girl replied, "Yes, think so. Nearly lost control when Akane landed but was able to get back. Need to try again to perfect move."

"That's fine," he said into the boom mic he had in front of his mouth, pressing the transmit button on the steering wheel. "I'll turn around and head back."

"OK, Matt," she replied, Akane and Karen saying much the same thing. He slowed and did a U-turn, both bikes tilting and doing the same before rocketing away. Watching them with a smile he looked to his right. Jim grinned back.

"They seem to be both enjoying themselves and learning fast," the other man said, pleased.

"Very much so in both cases," he agreed. "Sixty miles an hour is impressive. It's faster than we really need but it seems to be a good mark to aim for."

Jim made some notes on a clipboard, then put it back on the dashboard. "This is going to work out well, I can feel it," he commented. "It's going to look amazing on film."

"That's my thought too." Reaching the start point, Matt turned the truck again to point back down the runway. The camera truck pulled up on the other side of the long tarmac strip and turned around as well, Adrian sitting in the back with Anton and the camera operators, both of them watching with interest and a smile. "He's enjoying this as well," the stunt coordinator added, motioning to the director with his thumb. Jim chuckled.

"He's been a lot happier since all this started, you know," the man mused. "The new pills helped a lot as well, of course, but meeting those girls seems to have given him a whole new outlook on all this work. He was starting to look kind of tired during the last shoot right up to the point that Yori and her friends turned up."

"Adrian is having the time of his life," Matt agreed, laughing for a moment. "Even getting mixed up in a bank robbery of all things only about six hours ago couldn't make him stop smiling." He shook his head in wonder. "Most people would be getting very drunk about now to forget being held hostage, he's basically just shrugged, said he wasn't worried because Akane and Shampoo were there, then got on with life."

"It's pretty impressive," Jim agreed. The vehicle rocked slightly as Akane climbed back into the back of it, having been talking to Karen and Shampoo for a minute or two, then put her helmet back on. She bent down to the open rear window.

"We're ready to go, Matt," the blue-haired woman said. He nodded, stuck his arm out the window and put his thumb up, then waited for the camera truck to start rolling before moving off, accelerating carefully to sixty again. Shampoo brought her bike into position beside the pickup.

"Am ready," her voice crackled over the radio. Keeping an eye on the young woman in the back of the truck via the rear-view mirror, he watched with half his attention as she got into position herself then jumped. Once more the truck rocked a little, and in the wing mirror he could see her make a perfect landing on the back of the bike, which this time didn't waver at all. Shampoo opened the throttle and shot past as soon as her friend was in place, making the whole thing look very simple.

"Damn." He whistled a little. "Not bad at all."

"Perfect, guys," Karen said, sounding pleased. "We should do it again a couple of times to be sure, but I think you're ready for the car."

In fact they made three more runs, but in the end everyone was satisfied that both young women had the basics of the stunt down to an art. The final one was so smooth it was as if Akane merely casually strolled off the bed of the pickup and the bike just collected her on the way past. Finally pulling off the runway back at the end where everyone else who wasn't busy was watching, Matt turned the engine off then got out, Jim following as they joined everyone else.

"Well, I'm impressed," he announced.

"I think we all are," Aaron laughed, having watched the practice runs from a comfortable folding chair on the side of the runway.

"Just that stunt is good enough to make Mitch very happy," Anton remarked, looking very pleased. "You two made it look easy."

"Wait until you see yesterday's runs before you say that," Karen snickered. Akane sighed a little, but was still smiling.
"Not my finest hour, certainly," she said, rubbing one elbow in memory of a certain amount of pain.

"It was very funny, though," Karen giggled, throwing her arm around the somewhat shorter woman's shoulders. "Come on, you know it was."

"All right, it was funny. I'm sure Dad and Nabiki will kill themselves laughing," the Tendo woman grinned. Karen stepped back, grinning widely herself.

"Well, the next part may well take us right back to you bouncing and swearing a lot," she said happily. Akane's smile diminished as she looked at the car Greg was driving towards them.

"Don't say that, please," she pleaded.

When he pulled up in the vehicle the stunt driver hopped out, then looked at her for a moment, before smiling with a nod. "Very good work, Akane." She nodded with an expression of slight pride.

"Thank you, Greg."

"OK, now for the hard part," he added, looking slightly amused when she groaned and glanced at Shampoo for a moment. "This car is one of the two we're going to use for the real stunt, we've got another one as a spare, but hopefully we can do it without needing that one." He waved her over to the open door. "It's outfitted with dual steering and controls, so we can practice with me driving and you climbing out the window. Once we have that part worked out you can drive and climb out, which is going to be a very good trick if you can pull it off." He grinned as she looked worried. "The throttle can be operated from the dash, using this lever, so you can set it and forget about it. In theory, once we're up on two wheels, it should be possible to keep it there by reaching in and just steering, but to be honest I wouldn't want to try it myself."

"That's what you're here for," Adrian put in helpfully, making her look at him with narrowed eyes, resulting in a chuckle.

"Indeed," she replied, sniffling haughtily and flipping her hair, before grinning back.

"Do you think you can do it?" the director asked more seriously. She studied the car, then Greg, who shrugged, before looking at Aiko and Shampoo who were standing to the side watching with the rest. Both the other woman gave encouraging smiles.

"I don't know," she replied with a look of honest mild worry, "but I'm certainly going to try."

"That's all we can ask," he assured her.

"Let's get on with it, then," Karen suggested, looking up at the sun for a second, then blinking. "We've only got about two and a half hours of good light left."

Everyone looked at her, then Akane, who swallowed slightly, then nodded firmly. "Yes. Come on, let's see what happens."

Fifteen minutes later she was slightly regretting her words, her hands flexing on the steering wheel while she waited for the signal that everything was ready. A glance to the right at Greg was met with an encouraging look. "Relax, you'll do it," he said quietly. "It may take a few practice runs but after what I've seen in the last few days I'm sure you can pull it off."
"Thanks, Greg," she replied, smiling a little, then started the engine.

"I'll drive the first run, you pay attention and make a note of your mark. As soon as we're up on two wheels, you go out the window, OK?" She nodded as she listened, watching Shampoo line up to the side, Karen a few metres further away and back, with the camera truck on the other side of the runway. Matt and Jim were in the pickup again, behind the camera truck. Returning her attention to straight ahead she waited for the word.

"OK, everything is a go," Adrian's voice came over the radio. "Cameras rolling. Action." The entire convoy began rolling, accelerating to a steady forty miles an hour then holding there.

"Five seconds," Greg warned, not looking away from the ramp in the distance that would heave the vehicle up onto two wheels. Akane braced herself. As they reached the correct point the left wheels hit the curved metal structure, the entire car jolting up to a forty-five degree angle, then balancing there neatly as Greg expertly moved the wheel in small increments. She looked at him for a moment, then released her harness when he nodded. Grabbing the window frame she slithered easily out, crouching on the side of the tilted car with the wind blowing in her face.

Shampoo moved the bike to a distance of about a metre, glancing up at her occasionally to make sure she was lined up properly. "Hold it there," the Tendo woman said when she was satisfied. The Amazon nodded slightly, keeping her position very well. With a deep breath, Akane stood almost erect, one hand on the window frame, then jumped, hoping everything would go smoothly.

Seconds later she was holding onto her friend as the Chinese girl opened the throttle and roared off, both of them yelling in glee. The actual jump was almost an anticlimax, it was barely harder than stepping off the back of the pickup, although the drop was about a metre further. Everything had lined up perfectly.

"Fantastic, both of you," Adrian's extremely satisfied voice came to them, sounding gleeful. "Absolutely fantastic. OK, let's reset and redo it a couple of times to be sure you've got that part locked in and we can move to the next routine."

"All right," she replied, a wide grin on her face. Shampoo slowed and did a U turn, speeding up when she was headed back. Karen pulled alongside them and gave them an upturned thumb. "That was incredible, Akane," the biker said, sounding very pleased. "It looked amazing."

"Thanks, Karen." Akane grinned again. "I hope I can do it and drive at the same time. That's the hard part."

"We won't know until we try, will we?" the redhead chuckled.

When they arrived back at the start, the Tendo sister jumped off the bike, then headed for the car. Aaron, who had been watching through binoculars, looked approving as she waved to him. Climbing back into the driver's side, she looked at Greg, who was smirking at her. "That looked easy enough," he commented wryly.

"Would you like to try?" she invited with a smirk. He grinned widely, shaking his head.

"Of course not. I'm not insane."

Giggling, she started the car again, then waited for everyone else to get into position.

"Now she's just showing off," Adrian chuckled, watching the young woman standing casually on the side of the tilted car with her arms crossed, leaning a little into the wind, looking like she was out for a stroll on the deck of a sailing ship or something similar. Beside him, Anton shook his head in wondering respect.

"The reflexes and balance that girl must have are astounding," the producer said with awe in his voice. They watched as Shampoo brought the bike in far closer than strictly necessary, almost directly under the blue-haired woman, who stepped sideways and dropped neatly onto the seat, grabbing her friend's waist as soon as she was in position, the bike hurtling off into the distance as the car fell back onto all four wheels, then slowed and turned. Both the camera operators beside them panned their equipment to follow the bike even as the camera truck began slowing.

"Every time I watch either of them do anything like that I want to pinch myself," Adrian laughed, holding on as the vehicle made a wide turn and headed back. "It was the luckiest day of my life from a professional standpoint when Jim brought his friends to the studio over the holidays. I can hardly believe how well it's all going."

"I know what you mean," the other man replied, nodding soberly. "I've been lying in bed three nights running for hours thinking of all the things those two alone will let us do just with the stunt work. If they really can act as well, the sky's the limit." They exchanged a glance, then grinned. "It's certainly going to be fun seeing what happens, hmm?"

"Damn right," the director snorted with amusement. "Mitch is going to be pleased, I think."

"He won't have any trouble with the board, that much I am sure," Anton nodded. "Once he sees this, he won't have any choice. Anyone gives him trouble they're going to be looking for a new job."

"Good to know." Adrian smiled, then climbed out of the vehicle as it stopped, the producer following moments later. "Very impressive, Akane," he said as he reached the two girls, who had both taken their helmets off and were laughing about something with Karen. "Perhaps a little too... 'Titanic'... for this particular role, but I'll admit it looked good."

She giggled, looking at him. "Sorry, I couldn't resist," the young woman said. "I'll be good now."

"I think we can safely say that you have the jumping from the car onto the bike operation down to an art." He studied her, then looked over at Greg, who was leaning on the car a few feet away listening with a small smile. "You think you're ready to combine it with driving as well?"

"I think so," she replied thoughtfully, glancing at the driving instructor, who nodded slightly.

"Great. OK, then, let's move onto that now. At this rate we should have time left for practising the other parts of the stunt some more before we pack up, they're simple by comparison." He looked around for a moment, then nodded in satisfaction. "Very good indeed. Considering how the day started, it's coming together really well." He watched as she climbed back into the car with Greg, then headed back to the camera truck, a satisfied smile on his lips.

"Gahh!" Akane frantically moved the wheel she was holding in her extended right arm a little, taking a deep breath when the car stabilised again. It had nearly gone over too far, wobbling a little then settling back. She looked down into the vehicle to see Greg with his hands poised over the secondary steering system ready to take over as he'd had to several times so far. "I've got it, I think," she said slightly more comprehensibly.

"OK," he replied, keeping his hands ready but away from the wheel. Returning her attention to the task in hand she risked a quick look in the other direction, to see Shampoo looking up at her from the bike a metre and a half away and down.

"Ready?" she asked.

Shampoo nodded. "I'm set. On five, then."

"Five... Four..." They both counted down, then on 'One' she let go of the wheel, slightly straightened from the crouch that allowed her to reach the wheel, and in one move leapt sideways away from the vehicle. Greg immediately took over, the car weaving slightly, as she landed on the back seat of the bike, moving more sideways than she'd intended and as a result forcing Shampoo to compensate wildly, the bike wobbling around manically for a moment before she got it back under control.

"Holy..." There was some muttering in Mandarin which made the Tendo sister grin a little, she was slowly learning the language and for some reason had ended up with a fairly good knowledge of obscenities in it. Shampoo was quite creative. "That was close," her friend said when she was riding straight again.

"Too much sideways push," she agreed. "Sorry. It's a bit awkward from that position, I probably need to stand up more first then jump."

"Let's try again," Shampoo replied, slowing and heading back once again. "We'll get it. This isn't any harder than roof hopping, really."

Akane snickered. "It's a little harder, there aren't nearly as many cars involved when we're running around Nerima on the roofs."

Shampoo giggled. "It would be a bit weird if there were."

Just over half an hour and five attempts later, the blue-haired Tendo woman raised one fist in triumph as the bike screamed away from the car, the jump finally having gone exactly as planned. "Perfect!" Adrian exulted over the radio link. "Totally perfect. Do that tomorrow and I couldn't ask for anything better."

"We should do it once more to make sure it wasn't a fluke, but I think we're done," Karen added, sounding equally pleased. "That was really amazing, both of you."

"Thanks, Karen," both Akane and Shampoo said simultaneously, then laughed a little, as they turned around yet again and headed back.

Shampoo listened with interest as Greg explained the way the stunt car worked to Akane, Matt and Aiko standing beside her also listening. "The nitrogen cannon here in the back will fire a piston at the ground when it's triggered by the switch in the front fender," he said, indicating a large cylinder where the rear seat should be normally. It was connected to a pair of high pressure gas bottles and some complex pipework and electronics. "It's running at nearly three thousand pounds per square inch, which with the size of the piston gives it about twenty tons of force. The piston comes out fast enough to flip the car end over end without any trouble." He gave the other woman a serious look. "I'd suggest you don't want to be in the car at that point."

Akane smiled, nodding. "I think we'll have parted company by then."

"Hopefully," he responded with amusement. "You sure would in a hurry when it fires, trust me."

Pointing at a pair of covered switches on the dashboard surrounded in black and yellow tape, with 'DANGER' written in large, unfriendly letters next to them, he added, "The one on the left arms the cannon, the one on the right arms the pyro effects. It's all sequenced so that as soon as the car hits the parked truck the piston will fire, one charge will go off underneath at the same time producing a nice big fireball, and a smaller one will blow the trunk lid about half a second later and push out all the fake money. It should look pretty impressive."

"So, the end result is that the car looks like it hits the truck, explodes, flips over it in a ball of fire, and sprays burning cash all over the road," Matt summed up. "Not very realistic, of course, in real life there would just be a loud crunch and a wrecked car, with perhaps a small fire eventually, but that's not as photogenic." He grinned as they looked at him, Aiko snickering a little.

"The public has certain expectations," Greg sighed, shaking his head. Akane smiled at his expression.

"What safety interlocks do you have?" Aiko asked curiously, making him glance at her. "To make sure it doesn't go off at the wrong time, I mean. I have to admit I was half expecting some sort of remote trigger."

"We have a remote abort, of course, so we can shut it down in case of an accident, but we tend to work on the basis that the person in the car is in the best place to know if it's safe to fire," Matt said, turning to her, while Shampoo and Akane listened with interest. "There are switches in the seats to stop it firing if someone is in the car, it will only fully arm if it's on four wheels, so it can't go while it's up on its side, and you have to manually arm it in the first place. It should be fairly fool-proof." He shrugged as Akane and Shampoo exchanged glances. "We haven't blown anybody up by accident yet," he finished, smiling slightly. "Our pyro guys know what they're doing."

"OK," the brunette replied, nodding. "That sounds pretty reasonable."

"The charges are fairly small," Greg put in. "And outside the vehicle. If they went off accidentally you'd probably be OK, more or less, assuming you got out of the thing fast enough. The fire effects are the dangerous part but they burn out in a few seconds. And the nitrogen cannon, of course, you'd pull about ten G when it fired."

"So, basically, don't arm it until you're ready," Akane suggested. He nodded slowly.

"Best not to."

"I'll try to remember that," she assured him seriously, before smiling a little.

"Good idea."

Exchanging small grins, they looked over with the others when Adrian called to them, waving them over to the camera truck. Joining him they watched the replay of the last run on the high def monitor with interest. When it was finished he turned around smiling widely. "That was amazingly good, everyone. The last three were damn near perfect even without the special effects. We can probably cut some of this footage in to the final sequence for the close-ups, which will make it look even better." He stepped back, looking around at the gathered people. "I for one am very pleased. Anyone got any issues or questions about anything?"

"I'd like to go over the other driving sequences again tomorrow just to be sure everything is correct," Greg said, looking at Akane for a moment, who nodded silently, "but on the whole I think we're about as ready as we'll ever be."

"Shampoo is very good and I don't have anything else to teach her at the moment," Karen added proudly. "As far as I'm concerned it should all work out well."

The Amazon felt pleased, smiling at the tall red-head, who grinned at her in response. Adrian looked at them both, a satisfied look on his face. "Great. Anton and I are extremely happy and I'm certain Mitch will be as well when he sees the end result. Thanks for all the hard work. Let's pack up and get back to LA in that case."

Shampoo and Akane helped Karen park the bikes in one of the garages while Greg and Matt did the same with the cars, then everyone pitched in to pack up the rest of the equipment, most of it going back into the trucks. Half an hour later, as the sun was beginning to set, everyone was in the three vehicles they'd arrived in. Aiko teleported the first one back, then reappeared and hopped into the truck Shampoo and Akane were in, smiling at them.

"Looking forward to the barbecue?" she asked, casually making the entire vehicle blink out of existence and reappear fifty miles away instantly, which made the Chinese woman smile to herself.

"Yes, I am," she replied, nodding. Akane also nodded, as they disembarked, watching the people from the first truck begin unloading the film and video tapes. "I'm really pretty hungry, actually. It's been a lot of work but a lot of fun."

"I had a wonderful time," Akane grinned. "I can hardly wait for tomorrow."

"You looked very good standing on that car," Aiko snickered. "See you in a minute." She disappeared as they turned away and walked over to Adrian, who was talking to the lead cameraman, waiting until he'd finished and the other man was heading off with a stack of media.

"That went really well," the director said in satisfaction, looking at them. "Much better than even I was expecting and I had high hopes. You two are amazing."

"Thanks, Adrian," Shampoo replied, laughing slightly for a second or two. "Like to hear that."

"You'll give us an inflated sense of self-importance talking like that," the Tendo sister grinned. He smiled back.

"That's pretty normal in Hollywood, trust me." Chuckling, he turned to watch as the final vehicle appeared next to their one, Aiko hopping out followed by Matt. The stunt coordinator joined them along with the brunette, both of them smiling a little at something Aiko had said. Glancing at his watch, he said, "We've got about an hour and a half before we need to be at Richard's house. I'm going to go home and shower and change. I'll meet you guys there."

Matt nodded. "Sounds good. Aaron and his wife are coming with me, I'll drop him off and do the same thing, then pick them up again on the way." Jim joined them just in time to hear the last few words.

"I'll take Anton," he stated indicating the producer who was talking to Karen next to one of the trucks. "Karen is going to make her own way over, she said."

"What about Greg?" Akane asked.

"He's going to be a little late, he needs to meet a friend first for some reason, but he's coming around nine or so, he told me." Adrian waved to the stunt driver, who waved back as he went into the garage block and disappeared.

"I think that's everyone, then," Matt mused. "Sounds good. OK, then, I'll see you all later." He walked off, nodding to Anton and Karen, before collecting Aaron and heading back to the car park.

"In that case, I'll take these two to their hotel then go home and change," Aiko put in, smiling. "I need to check in and make sure nothing weird is going on, or at least nothing unusually weird." The remaining people looked amused. "See you later, guys." Shampoo and Akane joined her, waved to Karen, then stepped a couple of metres away before the magical girl did her thing.

"Thanks for all the help, Aiko," Akane said sincerely, smiling at her friend. "This morning as well as all the stunt stuff. I can't say strongly enough how grateful we both are for everything you've done for us." Shampoo, beside her, nodded vigorously.

"It's no problem, Akane, as I've said before. It's been a lot of fun," the brunette smiled back. "I'll be back in about an hour or so, OK?"

"All right," she responded, turning her head a little as Aiko teleported out. "Well, I for one definitely need a shower," she laughed, plucking at her clothes, which were dusty and limp.

"Me too," Shampoo agreed, sniffing herself and making a face. They headed for the elevators, nodding to the reception desk person who was someone they hadn't seen before, the woman smiling at them in return. Once the youngest Tendo sister was in her room, she undressed and jumped in the shower, turning it up as hot as she could stand, leaning against the wall and letting the water run over her back for a couple of minutes while she went over the day's excitement in her mind with a small smile on her face. 'I still can't believe all this,' she thought to herself, shaking her head a little, then picking up a bottle of shampoo and squirting some into her hand.

'Considering how weird everything went this morning, I'm amazed how well it turned out in the end.' Quickly washing her hair, she shook it out, then rinsed it, before washing everything else. A few minutes later she was wrapped in a towel brushing her hair in front of the mirror and wondering how well everything would work out tomorrow. Deciding that the only sensible thing to do was wait and see, she quickly brushed her teeth, then dried herself and got dressed. Sitting on the bed, she thought for a moment, did a quick time conversion, then pulled out her phone and hit the appropriate speed dial.

"Hi, Auntie," she said when the older woman answered.

"Hello, Akane," the voice of the Saotome matriarch came to her, sounding pleased. "How nice to hear from you. How is everything going? Soun told me you called the other day and seemed to be enjoying yourself."

"It's going really well," she replied with a slight laugh. "A little weirdly in places but overall it's a huge amount of fun, Shampoo and I have met some really nice people, learned a lot of interesting things, and so far everyone seems extremely pleased with us."

"I'm very glad to hear that," the distant voice said. "We were concerned you two might run into difficulties but also fairly sure you'd overcome them. I'm proud of you, what you're doing can't be easy."

"It's a bit strange in some cases, although I have to say that it's helping my English a lot speaking it all the time. I'm slightly surprised how well that part is going, actually, I didn't realise how fluent I really am in it. At home I don't get a lot of practice." Akane smiled a little to herself.

Nodoka chuckled. "I'm sure you're very good, Akane. I know Nabiki is remarkably fluent but she's always been good with languages from what your father has told me. He also said you were slower to learn at first but had ended up with very good marks in school for English, so I'm certain you'll have no problems there. Poor Shampoo, on the other hand..."

Akane giggled a little. "She's getting a lot better, but no, she's not gifted with languages. It took her years to learn Japanese properly. Mind you, she's very good now. She just learns languages slowly. She understands English pretty well, though, just can't speak it as well as she'd like."

"Has that caused any problems?" Nodoka sounded concerned.

"No, everyone here is fine with it," the Tendo sister replied. "She'll get better with time. Aiko is sure of that, so is Shampoo."

"Good." The older woman seemed pleased. "Elder Cologne stopped by last night for tea and we were discussing you girls. She was very pleased with what Soun told her about your conversation. I think she's proud of you both. The Elder has developed a considerable liking for you, you know."

"I sort of worked it out," Akane admitted, lying back on the bed and smiling at the ceiling. "After our past history it surprised me a little but I'm glad it's worked out the way it has. They're good friends now, even Mousse, and Shampoo is probably one of my best friends."

"The young lady is a good person despite her recent past," Nodoka agreed, giggling slightly. "Oh, hold on, Nabiki just came in. Would you like to talk to her?"

"Yes, please, Auntie," Akane said. There was a pause, a muffled conversation, then her older sister's voice came on the line.

"Hi, Akane. How's it going?"

"Pretty well, 'Biki," she laughed. "Some weird parts, of course, but on the whole, better than either of us expected."

"I didn't doubt it, sis," Nabiki replied with a grin in her voice. "You're not bad when you concentrate and you clean up well."

"Oh, thanks a lot," the younger sister replied archly. "I love you too."

"I know you do." Nabiki sounded confidently sure, making her sister snicker. "So, what's happened today? You were going to be doing some sort of fight scene, weren't you?"

"Yes, two of them, actually. And some driving practice." Akane grinned to herself. "The bank robbery was a bonus."

There was a pause, then her sister requested, "I think that part might need explanation, sis. " She sounded intrigued. Akane laughed, then gave a fairly brief explanation, at the end of which Nabiki snickered. The youngest sister could picture the older one's face, making her smile.

"Only you two, Akane. Have breakfast, get mixed up in a violent bank robbery, foil it without even trying very hard, then go to work." She snickered again. "You're taking Nerima-level strangeness with you. I pity LA."

"It should have known what it was getting into when it invited us over," Akane said mildly, sitting up again. Nabiki laughed for a moment.

"So, you're going to get interviewed by this FBI guy at a barbecue later?" she asked curiously. "That sounds a little different."
"Richard seemed to think it was a good idea and the agent went along with it. I think it was due to Ms Aoyama more than anything else," Akane replied. She shivered for a moment. "I'm grateful, but that woman still scares the crap out of me." Momentarily pausing and looking around nervously, she was rather relieved when nothing happened, aside from her sister laughing again.

"The tone of your voice when you say her name is amazing," Nabiki told her, making her frown slightly. "It's worse than Dad or Genma talking about Happosai."

"If you ever meet her you'll understand," Akane growled, making her sister break down in giggles.

"Probably not going to happen, but I look forward to it," the other young woman replied after a few seconds. "Anyway, I'm going to have to go, I need to help Auntie with something. You're going to be back for the party?"

"Of course, I wouldn't miss it," Akane assured her. "We'll have a full day tomorrow but I think we'll come home as soon as we're finished, so we should be back sometime on Friday afternoon, Tokyo time."

"Good. You'll need an early night to recover from the time zone difference, I would expect, then you can help set things up on Saturday morning." There was a muffled voice in the background and a few noises that made her think Nabiki was talking to at least two people. "Sorry, I'm really going to have to go now, Ukyo just turned up and wants a word. Give my best to Shampoo and Aiko, OK? And good luck with everything tomorrow."

"Thanks, 'Biki. See you soon, say hi to Dad and Ukyo."

"I'll make sure to," her sister replied. "Bye."

Smiling, she disconnected, then put the phone in her pocket and stood up. Checking her watch she saw it was about ten minutes before the point Aiko had said she'd be back, so she made sure she had all her things in her pockets then left the room. Tapping on the door to Shampoo's room, she smiled when the other woman opened it, towelling her long hair at the same time. "Not ready yet?" she teased as she entered. "I've been ready for half an hour."

"Hair this long takes a while to dry, you know," Shampoo grinned. "You modern girls with boy's haircuts have it easy."

Shaking her head in amusement Akane watched while her friend finished up, then they both left and headed for the elevators, finding Aiko standing in the lobby reading a brochure. The brunette looked up as the doors to the elevator opened, turning around as if she'd known they were there, which she undoubtedly had, Akane thought. "Hi, guys. All ready to go?" the other woman asked, putting the brochure back into the holder on the desk it had come from.

"Yes," Shampoo replied, nodding. "I'm looking forward to it."

They walked outside and disappeared, the reflected flash making the receptionist look up, slightly puzzled, before shrugging and going back to tapping on the computer keyboard she was sitting in front of.

"Hello, Sophie, Joan, how are you both?" Harrison asked as he opened the door to admit the latest arrivals. Both women entered, a tall dark-haired man behind them who was looking around with interest.

"We're both fine, Richard, thanks for asking," the elder Simpson woman replied, smiling. "This is my husband David."

"Hi," David added, holding out his hand, which Harrison shook with a smile. "I've heard a lot about you from Sophie, it's nice to finally meet you. Call me Dave."

"Richard. Nice to meet you, Dave. Come on in, we're all out in the back yard." He led the way through the house and out the back, smiling at his wife who came over with their daughter, Serena quickly greeting her friend then the pair of them wandering off immediately. "This is my wife Emily, and that was our own daughter Serena. Dear, this is Dave, Sophie's father."

Emily shook hands with the man, then smiled at Joan, the two women exchanging greetings. "It's very nice to meet you finally, Dave," she said, leading them over to the table which was covered with food. "Please, help yourselves. There are plenty of burgers and hot dogs, some chicken is nearly ready, and there's salad and vegetarian things as well. Would either of you like a beer or a soft drink?"

"I'll have a beer, thanks," Dave smiled. His wife accepted one as well, both of them taking a drink, then looking around. "This is a very nice place, Richard," he added after a moment. Harrison followed his eyes then smiled a little.

"We like it. We've been here about ten years so far, it's a nice place to live." They watched as Serena picked up her compound bow and showed something on it to Sophie, who seemed fascinated.

"Ah, the famous bow." The Simpson husband grinned. "We've heard a lot about it from Sophie. And about various arrows being found all over the neighbourhood."

Harrison half snickered, half groaned, while Emily giggled a bit. "Don't remind me. It doesn't happen very often now, but our dear daughter did go through a period of losing the things all over the place. You wouldn't believe how far they go if she misses."

"I think I may be glad that Sophie is sticking to beating people up with martial arts for the moment," the other man laughed. "It causes less long range damage."

The sound of the doorbell going off again made Harrison put his own beer down and answer it, finding Akane, Shampoo, and Aiko waiting outside. As he admitted them, two cars drew up and parked on the street, Aaron, Naomi, and Matt getting out of one of them, Agent Tinnin climbing out of the other. All of them headed towards him. "Hi, girls," Harrison said, smiling at the first arrivals. "Go on through, you know the way."

"OK, Richard," Akane nodded, leading her friends into the house. He waited for the FBI man, who was in the lead, to reach him, shaking hands as soon as he was in range.

"Hello, Agent, it's nice to see you again. Come on in, if you want to wait in the living room just there on the left I'll be with you in a second."

"Hello, Lieutenant. Thank you." The FBI agent moved past him, following the directions, as Harrison greeted the other three, then closed the door.

"Go on through and help yourselves to beer," he told them, "I'll be out in a few minutes."

"OK, Richard," Matt replied, he and the other pair disappearing into the back of the house. Harrison headed into the living room to find the FBI man looking at a few pictures on the wall.

"How are your investigations coming along so far?" he asked, waving the other man to a seat.
Tinnin sat, sighing slightly.

"Slowly," he admitted. "Very slowly. There are some extremely weird things going on with this case which are making me kind of worried. It's going to take a lot of effort to dig it all out, and I have a nasty feeling that I'm not going to like what I find, but..." He shrugged. "It needs to be done."

"Are you any further forward in working out who they're working for?"

Tinnin shook his head. "No, we've had no luck on that point at all yet. There are a lot of people asking a lot of questions, it's going up the chain of command pretty fast, but so far we don't have any actual answers, just more questions. I assume you haven't got anywhere with questioning Captain Mitchells and his friends?"

"Nope. They've clammed up completely. Bouchard broke immediately but he doesn't have any information we didn't already have from Ms Aoyama. It was all arranged online, he never met any of them before today, and he's basically just a greedy idiot." Harrison waved a hand dismissively, leaning back in his seat and sighing. "We won't get anything useful from him I'm afraid."

"Damn. Not surprising, but it would have been useful." The other man looked thoughtful for a few seconds. "I'd still like to interview him."

"Help yourself. He's not going anywhere for the moment."

"I'll make arrangements to come over tomorrow afternoon." Tinnin looked satisfied. "We'll want to interview the others as well. We might have more luck than you." He grinned at Harrison's narrow look. "We're more badass than the LAPD."

"You think?" the other man replied, smiling after a moment. "I'll be interested to see that, then. I'll take notes." They both looked amused, then Harrison stood. "I'll go and get our interview subjects. Who do you want to start with?"

"Akane Tendo, I think, then her friend," Tinnin replied, pulling a small tape recorder out of his pocket. "We can leave Mr Stewart for last."

"OK. Back in a minute. Oh, do you want a coffee or something as well?"

The FBI man nodded. "Coffee would be great, thanks. Black, two sugars."

"OK." Harrison headed out to the back yard, looking around for a moment, then walking over to where Akane was talking to his wife, both of them smiling. "Hi, Akane. If you're ready, Agent Tinnin and I would like to debrief you about today. It shouldn't take long."

She looked slightly nervous, but nodded. "All right, Richard." Attracting Shampoo's attention from where she was listening to Jim explain something about his hot sauce, judging by the bottle of it he was waving around, she motioned to Harrison then the house. The Amazon nodded, waving back. Following him inside, she took a seat in the living room across from the FBI agent, Harrison quickly retrieving a tray with three coffee cups, sugar, and a pot of the brown liquid. Shortly he was sitting down as well, his own recorder running, listening to the young woman go over the abortive robbery from her own point of view.

"Then, at the end, he just fainted," she finally summed up, smiling a little. "I'm not sure why." Tinnin and Harrison exchanged glances, both of them amused and impressed.

"I have some idea," the FBI man noted. She grinned at the tone of his voice. "Thank you, Akane.
That clears up a few questions." He sipped his second cup of coffee, looking over the notes he'd made during her short recitation. "What was your impression of the suspects, overall?"

"Well, Captain Mitchells stuck me as a rather unpleasant man who didn't have any real interest in other people's lives," she replied, frowning a little in thought. "But he also seemed to be in most respects very competent in his own way. He seemed to be the brains behind the whole thing and definitely the leader. The Russian, Yefremov, he was a very cold and deliberate man, again not someone who would care if he had to kill anyone who got in the way. That Harris guy was different, still dangerous but not with the military training that the other two obviously had. I'd say both of them had some fairly serious martial arts training as well as the firearms experience, where he was more of a gun and knife man. A killer, definitely, but not a soldier." Harrison exchanged a glance with Tinnin, impressed by her summation, which was spot on.

"The younger man, Soria, he was just a murderer, an amateur, really. Some sort of assassin I'd guess but not very competent past that." She shrugged. "That's all I could get from watching them and listening to them talk. Soria was in over his head, he didn't have the discipline that the others had, if he didn't have that shotgun he'd have been no real threat. But he wasn't worried about using it."

"I see. Interesting, and well observed." Tinnin nodded slowly, making some notes. "It fits with what we know about them very well. If the hostages hadn't been present, only you and Miss Pu, what would you have done?" He looked up with a curious expression.

She laughed a little, shaking her head. "We'd probably have jumped them as soon as they came in, to be honest, we worked out pretty fast what was going on. But we couldn't risk it because of all the people. A stray shot could have killed one of the customers. We were basically trying to keep them concentrating on us until the police did something that would either end it or give us the opportunity to do so, but Ms Aoyama turning up was the critical thing."

"Ah. Yes, I understand. Well, Miss Tendo, I must say both I and the FBI are grateful for all the help you provided during this whole event, especially as you were the one to raise the alarm in the first place. I suspect that without you and your friend we would currently be investigating a successful robbery and multiple murder case, quite possibly without any real clues. These people seem to be annoyingly competent and could quite likely have escaped if they hadn't been detected so fast." Tinnin looked satisfied, closing his notebook. "That's all the questions I have for you at the moment. If we need more testimony I assume you're OK with providing it?"

"Of course," the young woman said, smiling. "Just let me know. Richard has my contact details and Aiko has already said she'd happy to bring me back, or bring you over to meet us at home, if that needs to be done. I hope you manage to prosecute these people, they need to be punished for what they did." She looked irritated and sad. "Those poor guards didn't deserve what happened to them."

"No, they didn't," he agreed, turning off his recorder. "Lieutenant, do you have any more questions?"

"I think I have everything I need for the moment," Harrison replied. He turned his own equipment off, smiling at the Tendo woman. "Thanks, Akane. I'll let you know if we need anything more but I don't think we will. Well done, and I hope your job interview wasn't too badly affected by this morning."

She grinned for a moment. "No, it all turned out to be fine, actually. The delay was annoying but one way or another everything worked out and Adrian is very pleased."
"Good. Could you ask Shampoo to come in, then, please?" She stood, nodding.

"Of course." Leaving the room both men watched her go.

"Wow. I have to admit, Lieutenant, I wouldn't want that girl pissed at me," Tinnin commented in a low voice when he was sure she was out of earshot. "I understand now why you weren't worried this morning. She's absolutely lethal."

"Oh, yes, that she is," he snickered. "Luckily she's no killer, she could have wiped all four of them out by herself but I don't think she would without incredible provocation. Shampoo, on the other hand, she'd snap your neck without a second thought if it was the only way." He shook his head slowly. "I've read up on these Chinese Amazons, they are not people to take lightly, believe me. They tend to keep to themselves but if you ever managed to get them angry enough to take action, it would be... well, I wouldn't want to be anywhere near, definitely."

"That fits with my own research," Tinnin nodded, looking slightly worried. "Hopefully, Miss Pu can reserve her more bloodthirsty urges for movie work rather than dealing with bank robbers."

Harrison chuckled, then looked up as the Amazon in question came into the living room, looking around with interest. "You want speak about bank?" she asked, sitting at his inviting wave.

"Indeed we do," he replied, smiling and turning his recorder back on.

Sophie watched and listened as Shampoo and Akane took turns explaining what they'd been doing for their practice stunt-work earlier today, sitting beside Serena, who was gaping at them open-mouthed, laughing with wonder occasionally. Glancing at her friend she grinned, then turned to look at her parents, who were also listening. That director guy, Adrian, was chuckling at Shampoo's wild gestures, looking contented and happy.

Biting into her burger she chewed thoughtfully, very glad she'd met Serena months back. It had turned into a deep friendship unlike anything she'd ever had before, making her wish she'd encountered the other girl years earlier. Her father reached past her for the ketchup, smiling at her as he picked the bottle up. "They seem interesting people," he muttered in a low voice to her as he put a little on his own burger then returned the bottle to its place.

"She's a magical girl, she does magic."

"Of course she does, dear," he said, smiling a little and patting her on the head with his free hand as he bit into his burger.

"Dad!" she snapped, smoothing her hair down and making him chuckle. "Stop it."

"You liked it when you were little," he laughed.
"I'm grown up now, it's undignified," the teenager haughtily sniffed, then ruined it by giggling.

"Of course it is." He gave her an affectionate look, then ruffled her hair again.

"Dad!"

Serena turned at her subdued yelp, grinning at her friend. She got up and came over, sitting beside the other girl, then pulled a handful of small rocks out of her pocket. "Hey, look at these," she said, displaying them proudly.

"They're rocks," Sophie said doubtfully after closely inspecting them, not sure why her friend was so pleased about the things. "I mean, some of them are pretty, but they're still rocks."

"This one is from Australia, near Uluru," Serena stated, picking up a bright red one with her other hand. "This is from a beach in Tasmania." That one was a zebra-striped black and white pebble.

"This came from a nickel mine in Canada, this one is from somewhere in the middle of Antarctica, this is from a volcano in Hawaii, and this one is from near a big lake in Africa."

Sophie and her father exchanged glances. "So they're from all over the world?" she asked doubtfully.

"Yep. Guess how I got them?" Serena had a smug look on her face.

"Mail order?" Sophie guessed. Her friend shook her head, grinning.

"Nope. I picked all of them up from the ground," she giggled. Pointing at Aiko, she added, "A couple of days ago when they all came over, Aiko teleported me to all those places. I've got some more inside as well." She laughed again as Sophie looked suitably impressed.

"Wow," the other girl replied slowly, looking at the collection with renewed respect. Her father studied the pile of unassuming stones as well, one eyebrow up a little and a tolerant smile on his face. He reached out and removed a small grey one, looking at it with interest.

"Where did this one come from?" he asked in a voice that suggested he didn't actually believe the story but was willing to play along.

"That one Aiko gave me, she said it was a piece of moon rock," Serena replied, frowning slightly. "It's not very interesting compared to most of these other ones, it's just a dull boring grey rock. I guess the moon isn't an interesting colour." She and Sophie looked up to where the nearly full moon was visible through a high level haze in the dark. "I mean, it just looks grey from here."

"It is mainly shades of grey," he replied absently, holding the pebble more in the illumination provided by one of the dozen or so garden lights on poles around the back yard, inspecting it closely. "There are a few colourful parts, the Apollo missions showed that, but it's mostly covered in pretty dark material, it only looks as bright as it is because of direct sunlight and no atmosphere to diffuse it." Rubbing the stone with his thumb, he sniffed it, both eyebrows going up thoughtfully. "That's... odd."

"What is, Dad?" Sophie asked curiously.

"I could swear this really is a piece of lunar breccia," he muttered, turning it in his hand for a moment, then handing it back to Serena. "It can't be, not fresh like that... Perhaps a lunar meteorite...?" His voice dropped to a mumble, making Sophie look at her friend and shrug. After a moment when he seemed lost in thought, something she was used to, she sighed slightly, smiled tolerantly, then went off with the other teenager to get Shampoo to show them something "What on earth are you doing, Jim?" Emily asked curiously as she watched the man in question pull on some disposable gloves before removing a glass jar from a bag and putting it on the table with the rest of the food. He looked up at her and smiled.

"Taking precautions," he replied, carefully opening the lid while pointing the jar away from his face. When nothing happened he relaxed slightly, tilting the jar a little to look inside, then nodding. "Hey, Aiko!" he called, causing the magical girl who was currently talking to Tinnin the FBI agent to look over, then approach them with an expression of interest. "Try this," Jim said when she was close enough, holding out the jar with a dangerous smirk on his face.

She studied him, then inspected the jar. After a moment she stuck one finger in it, pulled it out, sniffed the orange goop on the end, then put it in her mouth. He winced a little and stepped back.

Emily watched with mild worry. Nothing much happened at first, the brunette licking her lips thoughtfully, until her eyes abruptly widened a few seconds later. "Wow," she whispered hoarsely as tears came to those eyes. She coughed a few times, then smiled. "That's great, Jim." Looking around the young woman found a burger, snagged the jar, then added a generous helping of the sauce to the food, replacing the top of the bun and biting in with a grin. Jim stared in shock as she chewed, her face going slightly red, then nodded happily. "Misaki and Yori will love it. Do you have any more?"

Mutely he indicated the bag which was next to the table, half a dozen jars of the same substance visible in it. He looked like he couldn't believe what he was seeing. She gave him a thumbs up before wandering off with her burger, still eating it happily. Emily watched her go then turned to the man who was still staring in shock. "Is it really that hot?" she asked, reaching for the jar which Aiko had put down on the table. He grabbed her wrist before it made contact.

"I really wouldn't, Emily," he warned. "It's unbelievably hot, I tried some and couldn't taste anything for six hours once the pain faded." Glancing at Aiko who was finishing off the burger with every sign of enjoyment, he shook his head in wondering respect. "Unbelievable. Absolutely unbelievable. Those girls must have cast titanium stomachs."

Giggling at his mildly disappointed expression, Emily asked, "You thought you'd made something she couldn't handle, didn't you?" He nodded, grinning.

"I had hopes. Oh well." His grin widened. "I'll just have to try harder. I wonder if I can get some pure capsaicin from somewhere...?" She left him mumbling to himself and taking notes, going into the house to look for a card and a marker so she could label the jar as "For Magical Girls Only".

The scream of pain from Greg about five minutes later showed the warning needed to be written in larger letters.

Wandering slowly around the brightly lit back yard, Adrian sipped his second beer, smiling to himself and nodding at various people. He stopped beside Emily and Richard, who were talking to Joan, Sophie's mother, next to the barbecue grill, the three people greeting him with their own smiles. "It sounds from what Akane was saying as if the day went very well after that unpleasant start," Emily said, offering him a plate of snacks, which he took a few of with a murmur of thanks.

"It did, actually," he replied, popping one of the little sausage rolls into his mouth and chewing appreciatively. Swallowing, he added, "Even better than we hoped for. Everyone involved had fun, did their jobs very effectively, and we got some amazing footage. Mitch, the executive we're dealing with at the studio, will be extremely pleased."

"So you think those girls will get the job?" she asked, glancing at Akane and Shampoo, who were showing a few simple Judo throws to Serena and Sophie, with the latter's father watching while wearing the same slightly puzzled expression he'd had on for the last forty minutes or so. He followed her eyes, nodding.

"Oh, yes, definitely. I think it's in the bag. It's been a very likely thing since we saw that first demonstration, but the recent events sealed it as far as I'm concerned. It will probably take the board a few days to come to a final decision from what Anton has been saying but I don't think the outcome is in any doubt by this point." He grinned. "I'm really looking forward to working with them both. We'll probably be using them for real shoots sometime after Christmas, I'd think around February or so. There are a couple of movies in the pipeline that they'll be a good fit for."

"That's nice," she smiled. "I like them both and it sounds like they'd enjoy the job. Serena is very interested in seeing a stunt as well."

"Well, you're more than welcome to come along with her tomorrow," he told her. "I would have invited you today, but what with minor little irritations like idiots robbing banks and so forth it got sort of complicated." She laughed again, shaking her head, as Harrison rolled his eyes in annoyance.

"Tell me about it," the police officer muttered with a tone of disgust in his voice. "It's going to take weeks to sort all that out at the least." He sighed when his wife giggled yet again, looking at him with amusement.

"How are you doing after that ordeal, Adrian?" Joan asked, listening with interest and sounding sympathetic. "It must have been terrifying." He turned to her, thinking for a moment.

"Honestly, not too bad, really." He was almost surprised himself by his own words. "At the time, yes, it was scary, but..." He shrugged slightly, looking for the right words. "If Akane and Shampoo hadn't been there, I'd be getting very drunk by now, even assuming it had ended. But, oddly enough, knowing both those young women were in the bank made me sure everything was going to work out OK. I wasn't quite expecting the way it actually ended, I'll admit, but I was pretty certain nothing too serious would happen." He finished the last of the beer and tossed the empty bottle into a bin next to the grill with a clink. "They inspire confidence, once you've seen them at work. Their friends are even better at it, so all in all I wasn't too worried."

"Still, two people died, that must have been a shock," she said with a sad expression. He frowned, nodding.

"Yes, that part is terrible. There was nothing anyone could really do, though, it happened so quickly. By the time even those girls could have acted it was too late. I think they did the right thing, they could certainly have taken out those four robbers, but the collateral damage could have been very nasty. Keeping their heads, calling Richard, then attracting the attention of those idiots and keeping it away from the rest of us, that was all a clever and successful tactic that definitely saved lives." He glanced at Harrison for backup, the lieutenant nodding soberly.

"Adrian is right, Joan. Akane really did save the day. If it hadn't been for her quick thinking, and Shampoo's, we'd probably be looking for the suspects right now, and there could well have been more deaths. Those bastards weren't at all worried about shooting anyone who got in the way without a second thought. The girls are due a lot of thanks from everyone. I wouldn't be surprised if the bank gave them a reward as well."
"It's pretty amazing," Emily mused, watching as Shampoo balanced on her hands on Akane's head for some reason, both Sophie and Serena rolling around giggling at the sight. Agent Tinnin had joined the small group and was staring in shock. "They're so young, to be so good at what they do. Most people would have fallen to pieces in those circumstances."

"They're not most people," Adrian snickered. "Luckily."

He looked at Joan. "Do you want to come along tomorrow with Sophie as well?" he asked. "You're both welcome as well. It's a bit of a drive but I think you'd enjoy watching."

"I know Sophie is very interested," she smiled, "and I think I'd like to see it as well. Can I bring David?"

"Of course," he told her, poking through his pockets for a moment, then coming up with a couple of business cards and a pen. He wrote the address of the airfield on the back of them, then gave Joan and Emily one each. "Show that to the guard on the gate, he'll let you in. Just head towards the control tower and someone will meet you."

"There's no need for that, Adrian," Aiko's voice suddenly came from beside him, making him twitch violently, then sigh as she snickered. He cast the petite brunette an evil look, making the others all smile. She grinned at him unrepentantly. "I can pick them up and take them out to the airfield, it will save a lot of time."

"I wish you wouldn't do that," he growled. The magical girl smiled serenely back.

"I know," she giggled. Harrison made a noise that suggested he was suppressing a laugh of his own, making Emily poke him and frown lightly.

"Be nice, dear," she warned, as he nodded obediently.

"But seriously, I'm happy to do the transportation for you both," Aiko went on, turning her attention to Joan and Emily. "The first time is a bit rough, Joan, but I can do the same thing I did for Serena and Emily, just hop you around your yard a couple of times first. You'll feel a little unwell but it passes quickly." The elder Simpson woman looked slightly unsure, glancing at Emily, who nodded with a wry smile.

"'A little unwell' is something of an understatement, but Aiko is right, it doesn't last long." Emily looked both amused and like she was remembering something unpleasant, an interesting combination. "It's worth it, the experience is remarkable."

After a moment's thought, Joan nodded, smiling. "Thank you, then, Aiko, that's very generous of you."

"No problem," the brunette replied happily. "I like helping out and that's something I'm good at." She eyed up the grill, making Harrison grin and toss a few more burger patties on it.

"As is disposing of food in large quantities," he joked, causing her to grin.

"Indeed," she agreed. "Magical girls are generally like a plague of locusts, we eat a lot. But we're cute, which makes up for it." They all laughed as she smiled.

"How are Yori, Misaki, and Fumiko?" Harrison asked curiously. "The others all seemed in good spirits when we talked after the robbery."

Aiko picked up another bottle of beer and popped off the cap one-handed. "They're fine, Richard," she replied. "So is Azumi, you haven't met her yet, but I expect you will sooner or later. Things at home are fairly quiet at the moment, there have been quite a lot of little things going on but nothing major for a while, so we've all been taking the chance to relax a little. The last big problem worked out OK in the end and we're hoping that there won't be another one for some time." She sipped her beer as she exchanged a look with the policeman which suggested he had some idea of what she was talking about, Adrian noticed. Harrison nodded a little.

"I see." He busied himself making some more burgers for a moment, handing them out when he was done.

"I'm still amazed that you have so many strange things going on in Japan," Emily commented, accepting a burger with a smile to her husband, then turning back to the magical girl. "It all sounds very odd. Are there really demons of all things wandering around the place?" She looked both interested and worried.

Aiko giggled a little at her expression. "That's what they tend to get called, yes, Emily," she replied. "It's sort of traditional even though in many cases it's not particularly accurate. Visitors from other places do turn up a lot, though. Some of them are hostile, some are friendly, most of them are basically just tourists or traders these days." She took a seat on a nearby chair, the others moving to do the same and listening with interest.

"There's a lot of trade going back and forth between Minato and a number of other places at the moment, and it's steadily picking up. So much so that there are regular services bringing visitors in and taking them back, which took us by surprise when we first found out about it a while ago, but it's something we should have expected." The brunette smiled at their expressions. "We've been quite successful on bringing some of the more... excessive... girls around to being a little more thoughtful and selective about what they do and who they go after, which has had an interesting knock-on effect. It's mainly Yori's fault to be honest, she's always preferred to talk to the 'demons' rather than fight them wherever possible, which has recently really started to spread as an approach for various reasons."

She took a sip of her beer, looking around at the fascinated expressions of her small audience. "Word gets around, hostile visitors tend to stay away because they get stomped on hard, while the friendlies turn up more both because of exactly that, and because they themselves don't get shot at. There are still pretty regular problems, but overall it's getting a lot more interesting and safer at the same time." She shrugged, gesturing with the beer bottle. "It's going to be fun to see what happens over the next few years but I suspect it's also going to take a lot of people by surprise."

Adrian listened with a certain amount of incredulity, which was mirrored on the faces of most of the others. "So you're telling me that you have real aliens wandering around in Minato? Just walking around on the street buying things?"

She nodded with a grin. "Yep. A lot of them are disguised in various ways, especially outside our own area which is by far the most open to them, but they're around. Hundreds, probably, on a day to day basis." The girl smirked at his expression. "To be honest there have always been a fair number coming and going, mainly trading with various mages and other magic workers, but until recently it was a very hush-hush sort of thing mostly for self-defence. It's opened up a lot over the last couple of years."

"Why on earth doesn't that make the news in every country on the planet?" Emily wondered out loud, looking flabbergasted. "With all the people who come up with the most insane conspiracy stories and alien encounters on the flimsiest of evidence I'd have expected that this sort of thing would be front page news every day."
Aiko shrugged again, looking mildly puzzled. "I don't know. People in Japan are pretty well aware of it to one level or another, at least as a possibility, and have been so for a long time. In Tokyo specifically it's not that unusual even though most people outside Minato and possibly Nerima would tell you they're not entirely convinced, since most of them have never personally encountered someone from another world. But even then you probably wouldn't find many people who would say it was impossible. Other places in Japan don't run into it as much although it still happens sometimes. Minato is the hotbed of activity of course, that's where most of the girls are and a lot of the mages. Magic users are spread all over the world but you'd find them a lot more easily in Japan."

She thought for a moment, then shook her head. "I don't know why it isn't something people from other places really pay much attention to. We don't keep it a secret, not on purpose at any rate, and there certainly are other countries that are very well aware of it, and magic in general. The UK, for example, has a lot of mages, although they're mostly of a rather different type than ours. There are a lot in China as well, a number in Australia, a fair few in many European countries, things like that. They all have different systems and techniques, for various cultural reasons, but by and large they get on perfectly happily with the rest of the population even if they don't mix all that much. The weird part is how in the US specifically there aren't that many and the general population simply doesn't believe in magic for the most part." Taking another sip, she waved a hand at the people standing or sitting around in the back yard, talking to each other. "Most of the people I've met accept it even so, if you give them enough proof, but it still doesn't seem to get out into the wider world."

"It's actually really strange," Harrison put in thoughtfully. "I have to admit the first time I met Yori and Chou in Tokyo I didn't believe any of it, it sounded completely ridiculous." Everyone turned to listen to him, as Aiko fell silent. "Laura, my Canadian colleague, accepted it more or less immediately, in fact she had been mumbling something about magic being possible right back at the beginning of that particular case, which I just ignored." He smiled wryly as Aiko chuckled. "I owed her an apology, believe me. But, in the end, I was forced to agree that magic does exist, it can do incredible things, and that there are visitors from other places that could give you nightmares for life." He shivered slightly, as Adrian thought back to the story the police officer had told him some months ago, which had sounded horrific. "The government clearly knows about it as well, at least in part, because the whole thing about the other girls coming over during the holidays to help with the problem we had was backed by the State Department."

"But you certainly don't come across any stories about magic or aliens or whatever except in the made-up sections of the lower end tabloids or novels no one takes seriously," Emily said, looking intrigued.

Her husband nodded. "Very true. That's the part I find weird. I could almost believe some sort of cover-up except that I don't believe that it could be done so well. Never mind the fact that no one has ever told me not to talk about it, or any of the other people I know have run into this sort of thing recently. For example the FBI knows about Yori and the others, and to be honest are terrified of them, but it's not like they've gone around trying to hide it." Finishing his own burger, he swallowed the last bite as everyone thought about his words. "It's very odd but seems to be par for the course where magical things are concerned in this country. I've decided not to worry about it."

"It's something of a mystery," Aiko agreed, smiling a little but still looking mildly puzzled. "Magic is very peculiar even when you use it regularly and some of the side effects can make your brain ache. It's not impossible it's down to some weird spell, or it might just be a natural phenomenon. It might even be related to something specific about the general American mindset that causes them to dismiss it unless faced with absolute proof." She grinned as the others exchanged glances. "A cultural difference, again. But I don't know for sure one way or another. We may never know."
"Odd," Adrian summed up. She nodded.

"Quite." They exchanged an amused look.

"So, can you just hire a mage to do magic for you in the places they're known about?" Joan asked curiously.

Aiko smiled for a moment. "Pretty much, yes. I know a few at home who do a lot of commissioned work, while others are more in the research area for various reasons. They don't generally advertise, it's mostly word of mouth, but they tend to do pretty well for themselves. As far as I know it's much the same most places although they might be hard to track down in some cases. I suppose you could say they mainly deal with each other and visitors from more magically orientated worlds, but a lot of them are perfectly happy to accept commissions from anyone who's willing to pay them."

"How very strange," the elder Simpson woman mused. "I wonder if there are any in LA?"

"Definitely," Aiko replied, grinning at her when she looked surprised. "A couple of security mages, several warding experts, and at least one general purpose non-specialist, from what I know, although I've never met most of them. Yori knows one of the warding specialists, she used to live in Minato, but moved to LA about a year ago to do some work here for a couple of major clients. She's planning on going back to Japan when she's finished, apparently, she prefers it there even though she was born in Canada. Yori thinks very highly of her." Flipping her empty bottle into the bin she leaned back in her chair.

"What about magical criminals? Does that happen?" Joan looked somewhat worried.

"It's been known to but it's not that common," Aiko replied, frowning for a moment. "Interestingly enough, the magical world as a whole tends to come down on mages who get involved in serious crime like a ton of bricks. Mostly because they don't like the attention it would draw, which would be of the wrong type. In most places there isn't much regulation of magic workers, it tends to be a type of self-regulated system, although there are exceptions, and they like it that way. If you're a mage who, for example, started helping criminals to kidnap people or something serious like that, you would end up having a number of very powerful and extremely annoyed mages wanting a word. That would be... unpleasant." She grinned nastily. "By and large it works fairly well."

"What happens if it doesn't work?" Harrison asked curiously. She looked at him, then smirked in a way that made his blood run cold for a moment.

"Well, in the last few years, at least in Japan, Yori happens." She snickered. "There's never been a repeat offence after she's talked to them."

"Ah." He smiled at her in a way that made Adrian chuckle. "I can understand that, I think."

"Does she have any official power, then? I mean, as far as your government is concerned." Emily looked curious.

Aiko glanced at her, apparently thinking for a few seconds. Eventually she shrugged slightly. "I'm afraid I can't either confirm or deny that, Emily," she said quietly. Everyone thought about that for a few seconds.

"I see. Thank you, Aiko," the other woman said with a faint smile. The brunette returned it.

"You mentioned back after the last time Akane and Shampoo came over that you were going on holiday through a portal with the others," Harrison said, making Adrian stare at him, then Aiko.
The two women were doing the same. "Did that happen?"

"Oh, yes, it was a hell of a lot of fun," Aiko smiled widely as she looked at him. "We visited some very interesting places and met all sorts of people. I'd love to do it again at some point but we can't take too much time away from home at the moment."

"Did you get your trip into space?" he chuckled, obviously half-joking. Adrian and the other two stared even harder, then transferred their gapes to the brunette woman, who was grinning.

"Yep. That part was one of the highlights of the whole thing. It was enormous fun, everyone loved it."

"You... went into space?" the director choked, shocked more at that one statement than almost anything he'd heard so far. She nodded, looking very pleased.

"Yes, it was wonderful. We got a lift with a friend of Yori's, he's got quite a fleet of spacecraft. Nice guy, he owns an asteroid mining company on a world called K'nn Four. He took us out to an asteroid they're extracting minerals from for a few hours. Yori, Chou, and Azumi had been there before but still seemed to find it as much fun as the first time."

There was complete silence for some while as they all stared. She looked around, then added idly, "Fumiko is really wanting to get a small spacecraft but there are some practical issues with where to keep it," making Adrian's jaw drop.

"I..." He shook his head, closing his eyes for a moment, then tried again. "I find that probably one of the hardest things to believe so far," he managed to say after a little while. Aiko shrugged, looking amused, as he continued to stare at her.

"If you go to the right places there are all sorts of extremely high tech toys you can get hold of. K'nn Four is the centre of a network of very high tech, generally low magic worlds that are something like two centuries to perhaps a few centuries ahead of where we are in most fields. Very nice people, on the whole, lots of worlds trade with them and they have an enormous influence in technological and financial spheres all over the place. There are higher tech worlds, certainly, but they're way up there." She grinned as they exchanged glances.

"They have a very active space-based economy and some amazing antigravity drive systems which means that their spaceports are incredible. There are probably thousands of ships all around their main system at any one time, possibly tens of thousands. I haven't really looked into that yet. S'th'kx, Yori's friend, is a nice guy and has quite a few ships, he took us out in his personal mining scout. It's not enormous by comparison to a lot of them but it's not exactly small either. Around fifty metres across and maybe twenty-five metres tall, sort of conical. It looks a little like a much bigger version of the Apollo capsule but flatter. His species uses that overall design a lot." The brunette reached for another beer, popping it open and watching his face. "They're nothing like the ones you see in movies, mostly. Much more prosaic. But damn cool."

"Christ," he finally managed to whisper. "That's... that's just unbelievable."

"You should see their space suits," she giggled. "That's the most amazing part, it's completely SF novel territory and then some. Even in one of your movies people would probably consider it unrealistic."

"Why, are they some sort of high tech fabric or something like that?" Joan asked curiously, glancing at Adrian, who was in something of a trance by this point, with mild concern.
Aiko shook her head. "No, much better than that. It's all done with force fields." She looked around, seemed to consider the issue, then shrugged. "Look." Holding out her hand she showed them something she'd pulled out of nowhere. Adrian studied the curved piece of odd-looking black material which glinted in the subdued lighting as if it was some sort of ceramic. After a moment he transferred his curious gaze to her face, which was wearing a look of sly amusement.

"What is it?" he asked.

"I told you. A spacesuit." He stared at her, then glanced at Harrison, who was watching with interest, as were Joan and Emily.

"A spacesuit?"

"Yep."

"That little thing?"

"Oh, yes." She grinned at him, handing it to him when he held out his hand. He studied it for a while, running his fingers over the odd material, which actually felt more like polished metal and was much lighter than seemed plausible. "A genuine piece of alien technology, if you want to look at it from that viewpoint." The young woman smirked at his expression. "Mind you, from our point of view, we just went into a shop and bought a few of them, they're nothing special on K'nn Four. Not too pricey either although these are fairly basic models. You can get some really high end ones which cost an arm and a leg, but unless you're planning on spending a lot of time outside a ship or in a seriously hazardous environment there's not too much point in the extra money."

Not entirely sure he wasn't the butt of some weird magical girl practical joke, the director turned the thing over in his fingers again, then asked, "How does it work?"

Putting her beer down, she got up. "Stand up," she said, motioning him to hand it back. When he, somewhat nervously, did as requested, she moved around to a position where she could hold the device against his upper left arm. "You press here and slide like this to turn it on." Her finger made the appropriate motion and there was a weird visual effect that made him look around suspiciously and Joan raise a hand to her mouth with a slight gasp.

"So I'm wearing a spacesuit now, am I?" he asked sceptically.

She chuckled, nodding. "Indeed you are. Good for about three weeks of life support assuming you had enough water, down to absolute zero and up to a few hundred degrees centigrade, heavy radiation, most of the sorts of things you'd encounter in near space at a reasonable distance from a star. These ones are light duty, everyone wears something at least this good on a ship just in case something goes wrong, and of course you can wander around on the surface of an asteroid with one on for ages. It's good fun."

Experimentally poking one hand with the other he raised an eyebrow. "I can't feel anything and I can still touch myself."

"The force field is selective. It keeps air in, vacuum or toxic gasses out, and reflects dangerous radiation while staying at a sensible temperature, but a lot of other things will pass through it. That's convenient, it lets you keep things in your pockets." She was looking extremely amused by his expression and that of the other three who were watching and listening.

After a moment, she grinned. "You don't look like you believe me. Let me demonstrate."

Somewhat worried by her enthusiasm he stepped back a pace as she looked around, then picked up an aerosol can of grill cleaner that Harrison had under the barbecue, quickly reading the label. "This should work," she said, looking pleased.

"That stuff is pretty nasty," Harrison warned while looking a little worried.

"I know, that's the point," she replied, levelling the can at the director, who nervously waited. "Don't worry, you won't feel a thing," the girl smirked, before depressing the nozzle. With a hiss the can disgorged a cloud of caustic solvents, which to everyone's surprise but hers simply stopped about four or five inches from his face, running down something invisible onto the ground, as if it had hit glass.

Adrian stared in disbelief. "Holy shit," he mumbled. He looked down at the puddle near his feet which was slightly bubbling as it etched the concrete patio tiles, making Harrison sigh slightly. Aiko glanced at the police officer with a guilty look.

"Oops. Sorry."

"Every time you lot turn up I need to do some sort of minor repair to my yard," Harrison commented, shaking his head but smiling a little. He returned to watching Adrian, who was still looking at the puddle.

"The suit processor knows that's toxic so it tunes the field to keep it out," she explained, putting the can down. "It does the same thing for anything that would injure you if it penetrated. It's no good against anything seriously quick like a bullet, it's not armour, but it would withstand quite a depth of water if necessary, smoke, fire if it's not too hot, poisonous gasses, all sorts of things other than a vacuum, which is the main use. They get used a lot on some worlds for fire fighters as well. On K'nn Four, not so much, they have better methods, and practically nothing there will burn in the first place."

"That's unbelievable," Emily commented wide-eyed.

"It's pretty good," Aiko agreed with a nod. "One of the more useful toys we picked up. We got one each and some spares plus the charging equipment. You never know when you might find yourself in space." She sat down again, looking amused.

"What else does it do?" Adrian asked in a wondering tone.

"Feel the outside surface of the generator," she instructed, which he did. "You feel several little bumps on it?"

"Yes."

"The top one is the power control. The next one down is the control to put it into standby. Just press it once to activate that function." He followed instructions, noticing the same slight ripple across his face. "It will automatically reactivate if conditions demand it, or you can turn it on manually with the same control," she told him. When he prodded the device he found it was sticking to his arm firmly, showing no signs of wanting to fall off. "It'll stay put under more or less any normal circumstances." She watched as he played with it, turning it on and off a few times.

"What does the last switch do?" he asked curiously.

"Try it," the brunette invited with a look that suggested something interesting would happen. After a moment he did so, then yelped.

"Fuck me," he breathed, staring at the translucent display that was now floating in front of him.
Everyone else was staring in shock.

"Good, isn't it?" Aiko sounded very amused. He nodded dumbly, working out that the thing was tracking what he was looking at as various icons became highlighted when his gaze stopped on them for a second or so. Weirdly, it somehow worked out when he was looking at the icon as distinct from past it, so he could look at Harrison's face and the part of the display that was in front of it did nothing. "It's voice activated, you can tell it what to do and you can get help from the bottom right icon if you say 'instructions'. 'Pause' and 'resume' will do the obvious. There are quite a few other instructions it understands as well."

Adrian played with the device for a few minutes, lost in his own world of wonder, feeling like he'd stepped into one of his own movies. When he finally turned it off and looked up he found his audience had swelled to include pretty much everyone at the party, most of whom were watching in astonishment. The expression on the face of Joan's husband David was particularly funny, he looked like someone who had seen heaven then been told he could look but not touch.

"This thing is... unbelievable," he said quietly, deactivating it, then as Aiko gestured, performing the push and slide manoeuvre that turned it off completely. It dropped into his hand obediently and he handed it back.

"As I said, cool toys. No magic required, just incredibly high tech that we're a long way behind at the moment." She flipped the suit generator in her hand, staring at it thoughtfully for a few seconds, before looking around at the others. "Eventually I expect some of this sort of thing will be imported to our world. There are trade treaties and regulations that prevent a lot of high tech past a certain point being sold to an 'unaligned world' which we're classified as except to specific authorised individuals for various reasons, but friends of mine are working on it right now."

"I assume you and your friends fall under the specific individual category?" Harrison asked knowingly. She gave him a small, wry smile.

"You could put it like that, yes."

Adrian looked sideways at David, who was standing beside him, staring at the device Aiko was holding. He could almost feel the questions the scientist had, making him smile internally. The director suddenly wondered why the young woman was being so open about things that seemed so strange even in her terms, developing a small suspicion that it might be a deliberate ploy to begin acclimating people to the changes that were certainly going to come sooner or later based on what she'd been saying. He looked at her for a moment, meeting her eyes, and was rewarded with a very faint smile of a type which suggested that she was quite aware of the direction of his thoughts and that those thoughts weren't entirely wrong. He nodded a little, making her smile widen, before she turned to answer a question from Sophie, who looked fascinated. Leaning back in his seat he began thinking of possibilities such technology could open up in his industry.

It seemed as if knowing various magical girls and incredible martial artists might bring opportunities far past those he'd already seen.

"I'm going to have to leave now, Richard, but thank you for the food and drink," Agent Tinnin said, shaking Harrison's hand with a smile. "I'll be in touch as soon as we have anything more to share and I'll make sure you're kept in the loop on the case."

"Thanks, I'll do the same, Mark," Harrison replied with a nod. "Hopefully we can get some useful information out of those idiots with some more questioning. They're staying quiet at the moment but we can probably break them eventually."
"If you run into difficulties, call me, we have some very good interrogators," Tinnin chuckled. "To be honest I'd like a crack at them myself but we're happy to allow you to try first. We're gathering background information right now, Ms Aoyama's info is leading us down all sorts of odd rabbit holes." He sighed slightly. "This is going to go on for months, I can feel it."

Harrison led the way back through the house to the front door, opening it and allowing the FBI agent to step out onto the front walkway. Tinnin looked around, then turned back. "I'm still very interested to find out what their exit strategy was," he said seriously. "The former Lieutenant Webb was much too confident that they could escape even in the face of a combined LAPD and FBI force of that size, which worries me. A lot. It implies either some serious high-up help, a lot of reinforcements, or most worrying, something we haven't thought of. I don't like any of those options one little bit."

"No, it's certainly something that we need to get to the bottom of," the police officer replied slowly, thinking. "I'd agree, up to the point Ms Aoyama popped his balloon he was looking very smug. Much too smug even with the machine gun in the truck to make me happy." He shrugged, sighing. "I'll make that part of the investigation a top priority."

"As will we. If you need anything, any help we can provide, let me know." Tinnin shook hands with him, then turned away and made his way to his car, while Harrison watched. As the FBI agent drove off he closed the door, returning to the back yard while pondering the conversation.

David Simpson was a very puzzled man at the moment. His daughter had told him on a number of occasions by phone call, email, and face to face on the unfortunately rare times he had been at home in the last few months about the 'magical girls' her new friend Serena knew, and she herself had met a couple of times although not under that description at the time. He'd put most of what she said down as well-meant hyperbole, as it was blatantly obvious magic didn't exist. He was more willing to believe that these young women were exceptionally gifted martial artists as he was well aware that Japan tended to produce people with significant skills in such matters, as did many Far East cultures, but even there some of the things he'd been told seemed somewhat far-fetched. The fact that his own wife had backed up some of the stories was a bit peculiar, but she swore blind that she'd seen some remarkable things the first time she'd visited the Harrison house for a barbecue, things that seemed... magical. He wasn't sure quite how to explain all that as Joan was an intelligent and generally clear-thinking woman who was most unlikely to make up stories of that nature.

All in all it was rather odd.

He'd decided in the end to reserve judgement until he actually saw some of these phenomena for himself, assuming such a day ever rolled around. Now, much to his surprise, it looked very much like today was that day. The sight of the director Adrian Stewart, who seemed like a decent and interesting person, walking around with a number of translucent displays hanging in space in front of him and with the weirdest expression he'd ever seen on his face had made him stare, then think very hard. He'd only caught some of the explanation that the petite brunette had given, having come in half way through the experience, but it sounded very much as if she'd said it was all the result of an 'alien spacesuit' which on the face of it was absurd.

That said, he couldn't think how the effect could have been produced using any technology he was currently aware of, which was making him very curious and slightly worried. Coupled with the small rock which Serena Harrison had shown him and his daughter, which was still bothering him, he was beginning to suspect he'd need to adjust his world view to one degree or another fairly soon.
"It hits everyone like that to begin with," an amused voice came from beside him, making him twitch and look to the side, to see the same petite brunette grinning at him. She'd approached without any warning she was there while he was sitting and thinking, staring off into the middle distance, a half-drunk beer in his hand.

"I'm sorry?" he said when he'd recovered from his momentary startlement. The young woman, Aiko, he remembered from what Sophie had said, smiled again.

"We tend to have that effect on people in general and Americans in particular," she replied, holding out her hand, which he shook after a second or two. "I'm Aiko, as Sophie has mentioned, I think. Professional Magical Girl and unofficial studio transportation expert." She looked amused as he stared, then slowly took a drink from his beer bottle. "Sophie mentioned you're a scientist? On the Lunar Prospector probe team, I heard."

He nodded, still inspecting her. "Yes, I've been involved with that project since its beginning. The last few months were kind of complicated so I was running around all over the place because of it. West coast, East coast, Australia, you name it. But the mission was a wild success so it was all worth it."

"That was the mapping of the moon, right?" she asked. "Looking for water, measuring the magnetic fields, that sort of thing."

"Yes." Dave inspected her curiously. "An interest of yours, then, space exploration?"

Aiko grinned again. "You might say that, yes. I find the whole concept fascinating. Recently I've been reading up on the state of the art for space travel and things like that, it's very interesting."

"I see." He finished his beer, putting the bottle down and deciding not to have another, three over the course of the evening was enough. "So what does being a magical girl entail, then? And how does it involve, um, 'alien spacesuits'?" He made the little finger quotes at the description, making her snicker.

"Ah, you heard my explanation."

"Some of it. I'm not sure I heard it right, though." He looked at her while she studied him thoughtfully in turn. After a few seconds she produced the small device that Adrian had been toying with earlier, showing it to him. He stared at her for a long moment, trying to work out where she'd pulled it from, then turned his attention to the thing in her hand.

"It's real, trust me. They work very well indeed." She handed it to him, watching with mild amusement as he examined it closely, rubbing it with his thumb, then experimentally scraping his nail over it.

"What's it made of?" he wondered out loud, holding it up to the light coming from the house behind them. The thing was matt black, too light for most metals even if it was hollow, and too heavy for many plastics. "Not titanium or aluminum, although it looks a bit like anodised aluminum." He tapped it against his beer bottle and listened to the sound, which was reminiscent of a ceramic of some sort.

"A type of cerametal alloy," she said, smiling when he looked up for a moment, frowning. "Sort of a hybrid metallic ceramic. Very tough and strong, light, and apparently quite cheap. It lasts almost forever from what I'm told. The stuff is harder than diamond as well."

"I've never heard of anything like that," he admitted slowly, intrigued.
"That doesn't surprise me," the brunette laughed. "It's not local."

"Alien, you claim?" He was still sceptical. She nodded, grinning.

"Back home people would mainly say it was made by demons, but that's just what most people call the inhabitants of other worlds. Sometimes it fits, sometimes it doesn't. The people who made that," she indicated the device with one finger, "are more accurately called aliens, I think, and they're actually very nice people as well. Very high tech indeed. All sorts of cool toys are pretty much commonplace where that comes from."

Dave stared, listening as the young woman matter-of-factly destroyed much of what he'd believed for most of his professional life, complete with proof, then decided he needed another beer after all. Or two.

"Thanks for the food, Richard," Akane smiled, looking around the back garden and seeing most of the guests had either left or were heading out. Harrison smiled back, his arm around his wife, both of them looking pleased and somewhat sleepy. It was nearly midnight and everyone left was definitely beginning to flag, except for Aiko who looked like she could go on all night. The brunette was near the barbecue talking quietly to Shampoo and Serena, with Karen listening from a couple of metres away and snacking on the last of the potato chips.

"You're welcome, Akane, as always. It was nice having you guys over. A good way to unwind after a long day."

"It was a bit excessive in parts," she giggled, nodding. "It certainly started off slightly oddly."

"That's one way to put it," he replied wryly. Glancing over to the side, he looked at Sophie, who was half asleep leaning on her father, who in turn was staring up at the moon with a somewhat peculiar expression on his face. "I think poor Dave might have had a weirder day than most of us, though," he added. "He's been looking kind of shocked since Aiko had a long talk with him."

"He'll get used to it," Akane commented, then grinned as the policeman began chuckling manically. Emily poked him hard in the ribs, sighing.

"Probably," Harrison mumbled, still snickering. They all turned as Matt, Aaron, and Naomi approached, the arms master looking slightly inebriated and in a very good mood, leaning slightly on his wife who appeared mildly amused and simultaneously exasperated.

"We're going now," Matt stated, holding out his hand and shaking Harrison's. "Great party. We'll have to do one at my place sometime, OK?"

"That would be nice, thanks, Matt," Harrison replied, smiling a little. "I'm glad you enjoyed it. Good luck tomorrow with your work."

"Thanks, Richard," the other man replied. Aaron nodded to them all without saying anything then followed his colleague into the house, Naomi propping him up and waving at them having also said goodbye, the front door opening and closing moments later. The sound of a car starting then driving off followed.

"I'm going to get Serena and head inside," Emily told her husband, yawning widely in the process. "It was very nice to see you again, Akane. I'm looking forward to tomorrow and I know Serena is as well."

"We'll see you there, Emily," the youngest Tendo smiled. She watched as the woman collected her daughter, who looked almost ready to drop but forcing herself to stay awake, talking quietly to the girl for a moment then both of them going into the house. Serena smiled at Akane on the way past and waved a little but didn't say anything, looking instead very tired suddenly.

"Do you want a hand tidying up before we leave?" Akane asked, turning back to Harrison, who looked around, then shrugged slightly.

"You could help me find all the beer bottles and get rid of them, and stack up the plates, but I'll leave everything else to the morning. Thanks." The two of them moved around the garden retrieving wayward bottles, Shampoo and Aiko helping when they saw what was going on. Soon everything obvious was either piled up next to the barbecue or in the bin. Eventually, the few remaining people congregated near the back door.

"Thank you for a wonderful evening, Richard," Joan said, kissing the police officer on the cheek briefly, then stepping back and smiling. Sophie was standing next to her looking dead on her feet, with her father's arm around her shoulders, the man in question still apparently deep in thought.

"You're welcome, all of you. Have fun at the stunt shoot tomorrow."

"I suspect we will," she replied, smiling tiredly. "Come on, dear, we still have to get home." She led her family through the house, Dave bringing up the rear after a final somewhat worried glance at Aiko, who waved with a grin.

With only Karen, Adrian, the three from Japan, and Harrison left in the garden, it suddenly looked much emptier after the number of people who had been present earlier. Adrian glanced around for a moment. "Did Anton and the others leave already?" he asked.

"About half an hour ago," Harrison nodded. "Jim said he was going to take Anton back to his house as it was too much effort to drive him home and they were both drunk anyway. Greg left just after that." He chuckled wryly. "He still can't taste anything properly."

"Ah. All right, in that case I'm heading home myself. Thanks for all the food and drink, Richard, it was a good evening." The director turned to the remaining people. "I'll see you tomorrow morning, hopefully without any side projects involving banks and criminals," he continued with a small smile, making Akane chuckle, while Shampoo looked amused. Glancing at Aiko, he asked, "Any chance you could bring them to the studio? I think I'm going to need an extra hour in bed."

The brunette smiled with a nod. "Sure, no problem, Adrian."

"Great. OK, then, see you all tomorrow." He looked at his watch, raising an eyebrow. "Well, later today, in fact. Anyway, later." Waving he wandered off looking tired and happy.

"Are you all right to get home, Karen, or do you want me to pop you over?" Aiko asked the red-headed biker who was putting her leather jacket on having retrieved it from a nearby chair.

"I'm fine, thanks, Aiko," the other woman replied. "I didn't drink much and my last beer was a couple of hours ago. Thanks for the offer, though."

"No problem."

Karen smiled at them all, then left, the sound of her bike starting coming over the fence a moment later. As engine sounds disappeared into the distance, Akane yawned. "I'm looking forward to bed, that's for sure," she commented, making the others nod in agreement.

"Also very tired but happy," Shampoo noted.
"Right, then, I guess we'll be on our way." Aiko smiled at Harrison. "See you later, Richard. Good luck with your case, if you need any help for anything just let me know."

"Thanks, Aiko. Have fun, you guys." He watched as they grouped together, then vanished, blinking a little at the flash, before going indoors with a contented look on his face.

Accepting the paper cup of coffee with a New York address on it, Akane cautiously tested it, finding it hot but not too hot to drink. Gulping down a few mouthfuls she sighed in relief, smiling at Aiko who was sipping her own, looking amused. "Thanks," she said. "Nabiki is the one who needs coffee to get going normally, but after yesterday I definitely needed some caffeine."

"I'm not surprised," the brunette smiled back. "It was a long day. All worked out well in the end though."

"It did, which is nice." They shared a look then turned to watch as the various crews from the same three trucks as yesterday ran around setting things up. The disused airfield was a suddenly very busy place since they'd arrived ten minutes earlier, just after nine in the morning thanks to Aiko and heavy goods teleportation. "You could probably earn a fortune popping trucks full of equipment around the place for the studio," Akane laughed, watching as the camera truck was opened out into its operational format and the cameras set up.

Aiko snickered. "Quite likely. But I don't think I have time to do this as a full time job although I'm happy to help out." They turned at a call from Adrian, walking over to where he was standing with Karen and Shampoo next to the primary stunt car.

"I'd like to get the rooftop scene done first," the director said when they were all grouped together. He pointed at the fake buildings lining the first part of the runway. "Those eight ones there have real roofs, the rest are just shells, so the plan is to run around on top of them for a while and just more or less do what you did at the demo in the sound stage. There's no real set plan for it, just some basic guidelines. Is that OK?"

Shampoo exchanged a look with her then they both inspected the buildings in question, which ranged from one to three stories high. "Is simple enough," the Amazon replied after a few seconds of thought. "Can go up there over porch at front, run to left over that one, then jump up to one next to it. Straight run for next four, drop onto last one, then to ground. Easy."

Akane nodded thoughtfully. "I agree," she put in, studying the target buildings. "It's not too hard at all. We can do pretty much what we did before. Does it matter if the buildings get slightly damaged?"

Shaking his head, Adrian smiled. "No, not really. If you can avoid destroying them completely until after the driving stunt that would be ideal, but after today they're going to get torn down anyway. We only kept them up because of you guys coming over and since we didn't have any shoots out here recently."

"OK. We should be able to make it look good, then," the Tendo woman grinned.

"Great. We'll be ready to roll the cameras in about half an hour, so why don't you head over to Gladys and get your clothing sorted out? We were thinking a sort of ninja theme this time, just to make it look interesting." Adrian chuckled when Akane raised an eyebrow, glancing at Shampoo, then Aiko, both of whom were smiling.

"That could be fun. OK, we'll be waiting." She looked around, spotted the costumer, then headed in the right direction, Shampoo beside her and Aiko trailing along behind watching with interest, still sipping her coffee.

"Action!"

At the call, Akane ran towards the first building, leaping four metres up and landing on the roof of the first story of the smaller building they were starting with, then scrambling up the side of it rapidly with Shampoo close behind, both of them reaching the roof at the same time a couple of metres apart. The Amazon took a swing at the other woman with one of the chúi she was wielding, which Akane avoided by back-flipping a couple of times, then ducking under another blow. Matt watched with a grin from beside Adrian, picturing the look the young woman was probably wearing under the mask covering her head, the black cloth flapping slightly as she moved.

The 'ninja' with the long violet ponytail coming out from her own hooded head chased the other one over the roof of the building, the girl in front leaping into space then rolling when she landed on the slightly lower next roof along, bouncing to her feet, before shooting up the side of the third building like it was a ladder. A club shot past her head and vanished through the wall just above her as she reached the roof, making him wince, the sound of the impact coming a fraction of a second later. Akane disappeared over the edge then reappeared holding the chúi, which she returned to Shampoo at high speed.

Catching it without really straining herself the Amazon vanished both clubs then hurled herself up the side of the building, only to fly back when she took a hard blow to the chin as soon as she cleared the roof line, flipping a couple of times on her way back down. By the time she was heading up again Akane was leaping off the other side of the roof, landing lightly along the peak of the next one and charging across at a dead run.

"They seem to be enjoying themselves," he commented in a low voice to Aiko, who was watching with amused concentration from next to him. She nodded, saying nothing for the moment. The fight progressed along the next two roofs until the Tendo woman suddenly popped up holding a staff, which she used to turn the action around, quickly ending up pursuing Shampoo in turn, slicing at her with the staff and yelling.

"Ah. She found it." Aiko sounded pleased. Matt glanced at her with a raised eyebrow, provoking a slight chuckle. "I popped up there just before they started and left a few weapons around the place to give them something to work with," she explained quietly. He snickered, returning his attention to the fight. Shampoo was now wielding a bokken she'd found, the pair standing on the fifth building along and swiping at each other, wooden clacking sounds coming down to them on the other side of the runway. Every now and then shingles flew from a missed blow, and at least one balcony was soon lying on the ground in pieces.

By the time Akane finally led her friend down the side of the last building they'd found, used, and discarded three more staffs, two bokken, a sword, and a huge mallet, which for some reason made Aiko mutter in Japanese then laugh. "I didn't leave that one there," she said, giggling. Matt stared at her, then at Akane, who was looking at the thing she was holding in one hand with a slightly puzzled air, before shrugging and flipping it over her shoulder as she walked back to the camera vehicle beside Shampoo. He didn't see where it landed.

"Cut!" Adrian sounded pleased. "Very good. I think that's all we need for that sequence. Well done, both of you, it looked fantastic."

"Thanks, Adrian," Shampoo replied, Akane smiling as well as she pulled off her hood. "Was good warm up."
"I find the way you two consider something that most people would have to practice for weeks just a warm up for the main effort more than a little intimidating," Matt joked as the two women reached them. Akane glanced at Shampoo, both of them grinning.

"Thanks, I think," the Tendo woman said, shaking her head a little. With a smile he moved to watch the playback over Adrian's shoulder, the director muttering to himself and making notes as he inspected the footage critically. When it was finished, he nodded absently a few times while scribbling on his clipboard, then turned around to them all.

"That was excellent. We should be able to use the entire thing as is, it shows off a number of important skills very neatly. Great. We're ahead of schedule today, which is a relief. Let's get set up for the car stunt." He waved Greg over from where the driving instructor had been standing beside Anton, chatting to him, near the cars off to one side. Both men looked up then headed over. "We'll do the bank exit, the police chase, and the main action as three separate sequences," he continued as they reached the small group near the camera truck. "Greg, is everything ready from your end?"

"Yes, we're all set. Both the main and backup cars are good to go, the nitrogen cannon and pyro charges are set in the main vehicle, and we only need to arm them for the stunt. If we need the backup we can have it armed in about twenty minutes."

"Good. Hopefully we won't need it, but..." Adrian shrugged, Greg nodding his understanding.

"All right. I'd like to do a couple of dry runs first, just going over what we covered yesterday but in sequence, then we can break for coffee and a snack." He checked his watch. "That should let us start it for real about eleven. Wonderful." The director smiled happily. "We should have time for the helicopter if this goes well."

"I'll call Rob and let him know it's likely to happen," Matt commented. "He said last night he was still up for it so there shouldn't be any trouble."

"OK. Thanks, Matt." Adrian looked pleased.

"I'll go and pick up the Harrisons and Simpsons," Aiko stated. "I should be back in about twenty minutes or less, I'll just have to hop Joan and the others around a little to get them over the first jump."

"OK, Aiko. That should all work out well." Adrian looked around at the various people, before turning back to them. "Danny Goodner and his mother should be here before eleven as well. She called me last night to make sure I was serious about my offer. She wasn't happy about Danny sneaking in again. I think she probably gave him a pretty hard time."

"That kid has some impressive skills in covert entry," the stunt coordinator snickered. "Pity about the movie fixation and the lack of thinking things through from end to end, though."

"Hopefully he'll learn before he kills himself," Adrian nodded, sighing a little. "Well, let's get on with it." Aiko flashed out of existence as the others headed towards the cars and bikes, where Karen was waiting for them and making some adjustments to Shampoo's machine.

Dropping her Playstation controller to the carpet and jumping to her feet at the sound of the doorbell, Sophie yelled, "I'll get it," then headed into the hall. Opening the door she grinned at Serena, then at Aiko and Serena's mother, who were standing behind her. "Hi. Come in, Mom's in the kitchen and Dad's outside in the yard." She stepped aside as the three entered, then led them through the house into the kitchen at the back.

"Hello, Emily," her mother said, smiling widely, as she dried her hands on a cloth before dropping it next to the sink. "It's nice to see you again. And both of you as well, of course," she added, looking at Serena and Aiko. "Does anyone want something to drink?"

"Can I have some orange juice?" Serena asked politely. Joan nodded, glancing at her daughter who was already heading for the refrigerator. When she'd poured a glass of juice for her friend, and herself, she sat at the kitchen table with Serena while listening to Aiko who was explaining what she was going to do.

"The first time through a teleport makes most people pretty sick for a few seconds," the magical girl noted, Serena nodding vigorously and her mother sighing a bit. "It passes quickly and doesn't come back, at worst you might feel a little disorientated the second time, then you're fine. So I was planning on jumping you three from one side of the garden to the other and back to get it over with." She smiled a little. "Probably better to get sick at home where no one else can see rather than turn up in the middle of a lot of strangers in the process of vomiting violently. It makes a weird impression."

Sophie giggled at the expression on her mother's face, making the older woman glance at her and smile wryly. "I can see where that might stick in their memories," she admitted. Aiko chuckled.

"It tends to, yes," she agreed. "Let's go outside and get it over with, then we can head off if you're all ready."

"Dave was looking for a tripod for his camera the last I heard," Joan explained, leading them to the back door and opening it. "He buried it in the garage somewhere." Outside, she called for Sophie's father, the man in question coming out of the side door of the garage a few seconds later, covered in dust, but triumphantly holding a tripod in a nylon case and smiling.

"I found it. It was under the skis for some reason," he exclaimed, brushing dust from the bag, before looking up and noticing the visitors. "Oh, hello, ladies. I didn't know you'd arrived."

"Recovered from last night?" Aiko asked with a grin. He studied her narrowly, but nodded slowly.

"I have a lot of questions still but I think I can hold them for the moment," he replied after a second or two, making her snicker.

"You'll have more soon, I expect," she said, glancing at Serena, who was also smiling. Emily looked amused but said nothing.

"Put the tripod down and come over here, dear," Joan told him. He did as requested, putting the bag on the rear porch then joining them as Aiko stepped a few feet away from Serena and Emily, who stood and watched with interest. The brunette got them positioned to her satisfaction then looked around at them all, Sophie feeling excited, her mother looking slightly worried, and her father with an expression that made the teenager think that he wasn't entirely certain this wasn't all some huge joke at his expense.

Aiko winked at Sophie. "Everyone ready?"

There were three nods, one of them much more certain than the other two. "So, what do you have to do?" Dave said curiously, looking at Aiko, who was standing with her arms folded. She grinned at him. The world flickered, and Sophie bent over as a huge rush of nausea swept through her instantly, trying desperately not to throw up.
"That," she heard Aiko comment, before she felt someone hold her still just before she was about to fall over. The sickness roiled in her stomach for ten or fifteen seconds then she suddenly felt it begin to subside as fast as it had occurred. Straightening up she swallowed a couple of times then looked around, seeing Aiko had been supporting her and was doing the same for her father who still looked green. Her mother seemed less affected although her expression suggested she'd not found the experience pleasant.

"That was horrible," she managed to say.

The Japanese woman smiled sympathetically at her. "It varies, some people are really sick afterwards, a few don't seem to notice. You guys had a fairly mild reaction all things considered."

"Urg," Dave remarked, shaking his head. "I can't say I enjoyed that," he added more comprehensively a few seconds later, blinking wildly and shaking his head. Looking around his eyes widened when he saw they were standing a hundred feet from the house. "Holy..." He stared at Aiko, who looked amused and slightly smug. "You actually did it."

"Of course. I'm pretty good at teleportation." She grinned at his expression.

"But..." Sophie giggled at her father's expression. She knew that one, it was the one he got when he ran into something he couldn't immediately work out. She suspected he was going to be wearing it for a while. It had been pretty common for much of the party last night as well.

"Don't worry about it," Aiko snickered. "Put it down to magic, which is true, and just enjoy it. Trust me, without a lot more background knowledge you'll just end up thinking in circles if you try to work it out based on normal scientific principles. Teleportation theory is pretty weird even to me."

"And we won't get sick again?" Joan asked slightly apprehensively, her husband not appearing to have anything sensible to say for the moment. The petite woman shook her head.

"No, like I said, at worst it will make you a bit dizzy for a couple of seconds, then you won't notice at all. I'll jump us back to where we started if you're ready." Sophie's mother nodded after a second or two.

"All right," she said.

Holding up her hand, Aiko grinned and snapped her fingers theatrically. The world jumped again and they were standing a few feet from Serena and Emily who were watching with interest. Sophie felt a slight wobble then everything went back to normal. "That's it. You're officially rated for teleportation via magical girl now." Sophie laughed while her mother and father looked amused, her father also still looking thoughtful and a little stunned. "Grab your stuff and we can head to the airfield," Aiko said, looking around at them all. "They'll be doing some test runs now, the main stunt shoot will be in about an hour, but we can get some food and a drink if you want and you can look around."

Shortly, her father having reclaimed his tripod, found his camera, loaded it with film, and her mother coming back with her purse after locking up, they all congregated in the middle of the back yard. With a bright flash the yard was empty seconds later.

Danny was almost vibrating in his seat with excitement. His mother glanced sideways at him for a moment before turning her attention back to the dirt road they'd just turned off the highway onto. "Make sure you're very polite, thank Mr Stewart for the huge favour he's doing for you, and stay out of trouble, OK, Danny?" she requested, her tone of voice making it clear she wasn't entirely pleased with how this favour had come about. She'd made that blatantly clear the previous day when he'd been collected from the studio security office. He winced a little at the memory.

"Yes, Mom," he replied quietly, stilling himself with a deliberate act of will.

"And for heaven's sake, please stick to your promise," she added after a few seconds. "I really don't want to have to pick you up from a police station next time."

"I'll be good," he said in a small voice. She smiled slightly, looking at him again, then peered forward into the distance.

"That must be the gate up ahead," she commented. He nodded. There was a fence a quarter of a mile ahead on the bumpy road, a pickup truck visible next to it. When they reached it a man wearing the by-now rather too familiar studio security uniform walked over to the car and bent down to look in the window.

"Theresa and Danny Goodner, to see Adrian Stewart," his mother said after rolling the window down. The guard nodded, keying up his radio and having a quiet conversation over it.

"They're expecting you, Ma'am," he said politely when he put it away. "Just follow the road. You'll see the old control tower and a number of vehicles, park next to them then head for the buildings. Someone will meet you there."

"Thank you," she replied, waiting as he walked back to the gate, swinging it open and waving them through. Driving past him she headed slowly down the track while Danny looked back to see the guard closing the gate behind them. Returning his attention to the front he watched with growing excitement as they neared the control tower the guard had mentioned, which had a cluster of buildings near it, along with half a dozen vehicles, several of them quite large trucks. He could see what looked like part of a city street on the far side of the runway, which he decided must be some sort of prop scenery for a movie. There were a surprising number of people moving around doing various things.

"Try to keep your question rate down to less than a dozen a minute, will you, dear?" his mother requesting only half-jokingly as she moved the vehicle towards the right side of one of the trucks. He grimaced when she snickered, but nodded.

As they parked the car next to one of the trucks he could see a car racing down the runway past the buildings with two police cars, lights flashing and sirens going, following behind, another truck pacing them from one side. There were at least two complicated camera rigs in the back of the truck aimed out through the folded down side with several people strapped in behind them. Opening the door and hopping out he stared as the cavalcade shot past at fifty miles an hour, all the vehicles braking a few hundred yards away. After a moment or so they began turning around and coming back much more slowly.

"Wow," he mumbled to himself, a huge smile on his face, then looked over at his mother, who was also watching.

"Come on, Danny, let's see what's going on," she smiled at him, shaking her head fondly. She locked the car and they began walking over to the nearest group of people. "Remember, be good," she whispered as the tall man he recognised from the studio yesterday headed in their direction. He nodded quickly.

"Hi. I'm Matt Jordan, the stunt coordinator," the man announced as he arrived next to them, holding out his hand, which Danny's mother shook with a smile.

"Hello. Theresa Goodner, and you probably know my son Danny," she replied with a slightly wry smile and a glance at Danny, who blushed. Matt glanced at him with a similar look.

"Oh, believe me, I'm familiar with him," the tall man chuckled. "We're hoping that he might not visit us quite so much after today. At least without calling ahead." Danny ducked his head, going red, as his mother giggled.

"I'm very sorry about the trouble he's caused," she remarked.

"Don't worry about it," the man replied, shrugging a little. "No real harm done and as long as he sticks to his part of the deal we're good."

"He will." Theresa looked hard at her son, who sighed but nodded. "Won't you?"

"Yes, Mom," he said quietly.

"Fair enough. OK, follow me and I'll explain what we're doing," Matt told them, turning and waving them towards a set of temporary shelters with tables and chairs under them, which had a number of people gathered nearby watching as the cars and trucks pulled up a few dozen feet away. "This is a demonstration and training shoot, not something that's going into a movie at the moment. We're working with two incredibly gifted young women, one from Japan and one from China, who are amazingly good martial artists. We've been giving them training in driving, firearms use, things like that, and setting up a number of fairly common stunt scenarios so that both they and we can see how it works out in front of a camera."

He indicated the two women standing next to the vehicles, having exited the lead car while they were approaching. "The one with the short hair is Akane Tendo, from Tokyo. The other one is her friend Xian Pu, or Shampoo, from China, but also living in Tokyo these days." Matt glanced at Danny, who was staring at the two young women with interest and not a little physical admiration. "Be polite to them, either one could pull your arms off and beat you to death with them," he added, chuckling. Danny felt himself pale and looked away quickly. "They probably won't though, they're nice girls."

His mother laughed slightly again, looking at him, then went back to inspecting everything around them. As they arrived at the shelters, Danny could see that there were a number of other people who seemed to be spectators mixed in with the obvious studio workers, two teenaged girls about his age, and what seemed to be their parents, one woman on her own and a couple. One of the girls looked over, smiled at Matt with a look that suggested she knew him, then glanced at Danny and his mother, before nudging the other girl and saying something. Her friend also looked over with interest.

Leading them over to these people, Matt made the introductions. "This is Serena Harrison and her mother Emily, and Sophie Simpson with her parents Dave and Joan. Everyone, this is Danny Goodner and his mother Theresa."

Serena inspected him closely for a moment. "Oh. It's you. Dad mentioned you." Danny looked curiously at her while her friend Sophie giggled.

"Do I know your dad?" he asked dubiously. She laughed briefly.

"You've met. In Hollywood? Just before the New Year?" He still couldn't place the occasion. "He's a cop?"
Danny paled, stepping back and putting his mother between the girl and himself. "He threatened to shoot me in the foot," he squeaked, suddenly realising who she was talking about. Serena broke down in laughter with Sophie quickly joining in, his own mother doing much the same. "Mom!" he said with exasperation. "He really did."

"He probably wouldn't actually have done it, dear," she replied, glancing at Serena, who shrugged and made a 'maybe yes/maybe no' gesture with her hand, which had Sophie giggling again. Danny didn't feel much happier about the situation but decided that it was probably best not to make too much of it.

"He's not... here... is he?" he asked nervously, looking around. "Your dad?"

"Nope. He wanted to come but there's a big case on at the moment so he's tied up with it," Serena explained, looking mildly disappointed. She brightened up after a second or two. "Come on, I'll introduce you to Akane and Shampoo before they do the next test run." She waved both him and his mother forward to where the two young women were discussing something with the director, who was making notes and nodding as they spoke. All three looked up as the girl stopped a few feet away.

"Hello, Serena," the director said, then transferred his attention to Danny and his mother. "Ah. Mr Goodner, you made it. And your mother. Excellent." He tucked his clipboard under his arm and shook hands with Danny's mother, smiling a little. "I hope you didn't have any trouble finding us, Mrs Goodner?"

"Not at all," she replied with her own smile. "Your directions were very clear. Thank you again for allowing this and not taking more serious steps after what Danny has been doing, Mr Stewart."

"Call me Adrian, please." Adrian looked at Danny speculatively for a moment, making the young man shuffle his feet slightly in embarrassment. "I would prefer not to let a young man gain a criminal record, especially one who is so... interested... in the field I work in," he continued after a moment, transferring his attention back to Theresa, who nodded slowly while also glancing at her son. "But at the same time it was beginning to be more than a nuisance, you understand. His ability to gain entry into places he shouldn't is only exceeded by a certain lack of common sense in actually doing it." Danny sweated lightly under the looks both Adrian and his mother were now giving him. "I'm hoping that satisfying his curiosity like this will make future occurrences rarer. Ideally, non-existent."

"I'm sure you won't have any more problems with my son, Adrian," his mother said after a few seconds of staring meaningfully at Danny, who nodded frantically. "And we're both very grateful indeed for how lenient you've been."

Adrian smiled. "Good, then in that case I doubt we have any reason to be worried." He turned to the two young women who had been listening with small grins and considerable interest. "Allow me to introduce Akane Tendo and Xian Pu, two of the most remarkable young people it's ever been my pleasure to work with. They're undoubtedly be a couple of people to watch in the stunt business and quite likely the acting business as well." Akane, the girl with the short blue hair, blushed slightly, while the other one smiled widely.

"Theresa Goodner," his mother said politely, shaking hands with them both in turn.

"I'm Akane," the Japanese woman smiled back. "My friend here usually goes by Shampoo, most people find it easier to say."

Shampoo grinned. "Still learning English, difficult language with many rules. Sorry about speaking badly. But nice to meet you." She looked at Danny as she shook his hand as well. "Better like this, not like in studio where might fall out of ceiling." He went slightly red again as Akane giggled and his mother sighed faintly.

"Sorry about that," he muttered.

"Don't worry, did many stupid things when your age too," she assured him. Akane snickered, making Shampoo nudge her hard. "Don't laugh, you worse."

"Possibly," Akane agreed placidly. "Possibly not." They had a brief argument in Japanese which ended with both of them giggling for a moment.

The director looked at his watch. "OK, we're going to have to get on with it now. Why don't you two help yourselves to some sandwiches and something to drink, over there, there's coffee and cold drinks as well, while we get the next test run set up. This is going to take another half hour or so then we're running the main stunt for real, which you'll probably find interesting." He indicated one of the temporary buildings which had a number of tables under it, people standing around and helping themselves to food. "Serena, you can show them where to sit, all right?"

The girl who had been standing and listening with an amused look on her face nodded. "Sure, Adrian. Come with me," she added, looking at Danny and his mother. Both of them followed her to the food tent and helped themselves, shortly finding their way to another covered area with a few folding chairs in it. Serena and Sophie were both sitting waiting for them while their parents were chatting a few feet away. "I saved you a couple of chairs," the girl smiled.

"Thanks," Danny replied, taking a seat and putting his can of soda down on the ground before biting into a chicken salad sandwich. "You seem to know a lot of people here," he went on after swallowing his mouthful, glancing at the teenager beside him who was watching the people working on the cars with interest. She glanced at him and nodded, her friend Sophie who was sitting on her other side also listening but still keeping an eye on the proceedings.

"Yep. My dad is friends with Jim, the studio safety coordinator, he's a neighbour of ours. That's him over there." She pointed at a tall slender Afro-Caribbean man who was in the middle of a cluster of half a dozen people including Matt, the man that had met them, who were apparently discussing something complicated judging by the number of pieces of paper that were being passed around. "Jim took us all on a studio tour back around Christmas when some friends of Dad's from Japan were over here on a case, including Aiko over there." She indicated the petite brunette he'd been caught by who was currently talking to a sandy-haired guy who seemed to be something to do with the cars judging by the way he was observing a couple of technicians working on one of them with an air of proprietary interest.

"Her friends are all magical girls from Tokyo who were chasing some weird magical terrorists," Serena explained, making him look at her with surprise. "They're also incredibly good at martial arts. I mean, you just wouldn't believe how good. Yori, and her partner Chou, are so far past anything I've ever seen..." She shook her head with an amazed expression, while Danny exchanged a look with his mother who was listening quietly. "They trained Aiko and her team, who aren't quite that good but are still unbelievable. They all came to a barbecue at my house after the case. There was an accident on the tour and they saved several people from horrible injuries which got Adrian interested. Yori invited him to the barbecue, he came and saw them do a short demonstration, then he wanted them to work for him." She giggled for a moment.

"They all said they were kind of busy already but he gave them a card anyway. In the end Yori gave it to Akane who she knows, Akane is an amazing martial artist as well. She's not a magical girl but even so I don't think you'd be able to find many people who are as good as either her or Shampoo. Some of the things I've seen them do..." She laughed to herself. "They came over a while ago and did a longer demonstration in our back yard. Even dad was just staring in shock. Adrian and his friends looked like they were going to fall over." She giggled again. "You wouldn't believe how good Shampoo is with a bow. I'm learning and I think I'm pretty reasonable but I don't think I'll ever be even close to what she can do."

"How old are they, Serena?" his mother asked curiously. The girl looked at her past Danny.

"Akane is twenty three, Shampoo is a little older I think."

"That's very young to be that talented at anything," Theresa noted. Serena shrugged.

"As far as I know they've been doing it since they were little and some of the things Shampoo has told me about how she was trained are horrifying. But it seems to work." She glanced at Sophie who looked both amused and slightly worried. "Yori said she was trained in martial arts from when she was about two months old. I don't know how long she's been learning the magical things but it must have been quite a while as well."

"Magical things?" Theresa asked with a peculiar expression on her face.

Serena nodded vigorously. "Oh, yes. She can throw fireballs! And pull things out of thin air. She showed us some of the things she has stashed away on her and it completely covered the kitchen table. It was amazing." The girl frowned slightly. "Although she did say that part was actually some weird sort of martial arts skill, not magic." Glancing at Sophie she smiled. "Hey, if you get good enough maybe you can learn to do it!"

Sophie sighed slightly. "I don't know if I can ever get that good," she said slightly sadly.

Danny noticed his mother had a bemused expression, but seemed to be content to hold her questions. "What martial art are you learning?" he asked the blonde girl.

"Aikido right now," she told him. "Yori suggested to Mom it was a good one to start with. You don't need to be really strong to be quite good at it and it's more aimed for self defence than anything. Sensei is very pleased with my progress so far although I've only been doing it since the middle of January. He said I have a gift for it." She looked pleased.

"What made you want to learn it?" Theresa asked. Sophie looked at the ground for a moment. "I kind of got mugged over the holidays," she mumbled. "They stole my backpack and... some other things." Looking up rather defiantly, though, she added, "I got them pretty good even so. One of them was walking funny for days, even when Yori caught him." She grinned momentarily. "She said I did a good job." Serena chuckled at the look on her friend's face. "Mom was a little worried about me after that so when Yori suggested I learned self defence she was OK with the idea. It's been a lot of fun so far but I haven't had to use it yet." Danny wasn't completely certain but he sort of got the idea she was a little disappointed by this fact. Serena was smirking in a way that suggested she'd help if her friend needed it.

"I... see," his mother slowly replied.

"Oh, look, they're ready to go again," Serena suddenly said, pointing to where the cars were lining up, Akane and Shampoo getting into the lead one again after a quick conversation with Matt and Adrian. The girl explained the whole idea behind the stunt and where they were at the moment. Shortly afterwards the front vehicle roared off with a squeal of tortured tires and a cloud of smoke, followed by two police cars, as they wove around all over the runway in a rather dramatic manner.
Danny watched, completely engrossed, and with a huge smile on his face, the two girls next to him doing much the same. His mother was watching him nearly as much as the action going on nearby with a thoughtful look, which was replaced by a smile after a little while.

"I think that went perfectly," Adrian stated with satisfaction as he looked over the playback, then turned to Akane who was standing behind him with her helmet in one hand and the other one on her hip. "That only leaves the final part. The big one. The one in which everything can go wrong or everything can go right, thereby cementing your reputation in studio lore one way or another." He grinned as Akane giggled, Shampoo next to her shaking her head in amusement.

"You in good mood, Adrian," the Amazon noted. He shrugged with a smile.

"Of course I am. I'm having fun, doing the job I love, with people I like and trust. What's not to put me in a good mood?" He inspected them both as the lilac-haired woman nodded agreement. "You both ready for it?"

"Yes," Akane smiled. She glanced at Shampoo who said the same thing at the same time. "Let's see what happens while I still have the nerve for it," she added wryly.

"Great." He patted her on the shoulder. "I have no doubt you'll pull it off and make it look easy." Smiling at her grateful expression he looked around and raised his voice.

"We're ready for the final sequence, everyone. We go in five minutes."

A number of people headed off in different directions as he walked over to the car which Greg was making some final checks on with a couple of his people, next to which Karen was leaning on the motorcycle Shampoo would use while watching the stunt driver closely. The red-head looked at them as they approached, smiling. "This is going to be amazing," she commented brightly. "Make us proud, both of you."

"Will certainly try," Shampoo laughed. She put her helmet back on and sat astride the bike, waiting patiently. Akane nodded to her, and Karen, then went to talk to Greg who had just pulled himself out of the back of the car.

"The cannon is pressurised and the charges are set," he announced as Adrian joined her. "Remember, arm it as soon as you're up on two wheels, and if you have to abort, hit the switches before you do so or you'll have the ride of a lifetime." He snickered as she gave him a hard look before putting her own helmet on and doing up the chin strap.

"Thanks for that, Greg," she muttered. "It makes me so much less nervous."

He slapped her on the back. "You'll do fine, Akane. Good luck." With a quick grin he stepped back while she slid into the driver's seat, closing the door.

Adrian checked with everyone else who was critical for the stunt, then ticked the last item off his check-list. Heading for the camera truck he climbed on board, then waited for everyone to take their places, which only took a few more seconds. Akane and Shampoo both started their relevant vehicles, looking at him for the cue.

"Car flip stunt, take one. Action!" he called, the radio mike he was wearing making sure everyone heard him clearly. The cameras panned to focus on the two women, as the car began moving, quickly followed by the motorcycle, Shampoo's long hair rippling behind her.

He crossed his fingers, waiting to see what happened.
'Don't fuck it up. Don't fuck it up.' The youngest Tendo sister tried to stop the refrain her thoughts kept playing in the back of her mind but had little success. Concentrating on the ramp ahead of her, she glanced quickly in the rear view mirror, seeing her friend following exactly in the position they'd established was correct for this stunt. 'It's just like yesterday, you've done this half a dozen times,' she told herself firmly.

'Yes, but now the car is basically a bomb,' she couldn't help adding mentally, not entirely willingly.

"You're right on track, Akane," Shampoo commented.

"Thanks. Five seconds," she replied quickly, aiming the car carefully. A few seconds later she felt the jolt as she hit the ramp, the driver's side flipping up hard until she reached a forty-five degree. Gently moving the wheel a little until she found the stable point she reached out with her right hand and carefully adjusted the throttle lever to keep the speed constant. "I'm up. Arming the car." She flipped up the protective cover then toggled both switches under it, seeing in her peripheral vision two red lights come on as the corresponding green ones went out. "I'm armed. Exiting now."

Keeping one hand on the wheel she carefully pulled herself out the window to crouch on the side of the vehicle, the wind across her helmet making a dull woosh, then aimed slightly more accurately at the truck parked a few hundred metres in front of her. She could hear Shampoo's bike clearly from just behind and to one side, risking a quick look back to check, then trusting the Amazon to be in the right place.

"You look good," Shampoo reported. "We're nearly at the first mark." She nodded, seeing a spray-painted line on the runway go past seconds later. Standing up from her crouch as far as she could without letting go of the wheel she waited.

"Second mark in three... two... one." The next line passed under them, marking the point of no return. The truck was now only about ninety metres away.

"I'm jumping... Now!" She let go of the wheel, stood to her full height, then stepped sideways, laying her trust in the other woman completely. There was a brief moment of weightlessness before she hit the seat behind Shampoo perfectly, grabbing her friend's waist as soon as she was settled. The car was already beginning to drop back onto all four wheels as they approached the parked truck at forty-five miles an hour. Shampoo peeled off to the left, accelerating past the truck less than two seconds before the car hit it squarely. Akane looked back over her shoulder to see a large fireball which sprouted a flaming car flipping end over end, barely clearing the top of the truck to land on its roof on the other side with a huge crash and a cloud of dust, vapour streaming from a large hole in the bottom where the piston of the nitrogen cannon had exited. Fluttering swarms of burning fake money rained down around it.

"FANTASTIC!" Adrian's voice screamed in her ear over the radio link, making her grin in triumph, just before Shampoo yelled her own feelings. They looked over to see the director waving his clipboard like a five year old in the camera truck on the other side of the runway. "Are you both OK?" he asked slightly more calmly.

"We're fine, Adrian," Akane replied, the words belied by the way she was shaking from the adrenaline rush which hit at that moment. "It all worked out exactly like it was supposed to."

"That was unbelievable to watch. Incredible work, both of you. Come on back and have a drink, you've more than earned it." They slowed and turned, roaring past the camera truck as it did the same, heading back to the other end of the runway. Shampoo was laughing with relief and pleasure while Akane just held on, waiting for the trembling to stop.
When they pulled up at the tents and got off the bike, a crowd of people surrounded them. Karen leapt forward and hugged Akane hard, grinning like an idiot. "Amazing. Just amazing. You wouldn't believe how good that looked. You made it seem easy." Releasing her the red-head turned and did the same to Shampoo who was laughing. "And you. Great riding. I'm proud of both of you."

"Thank you, Karen. Couldn't have done it without you to teach, though," the Chinese woman grinned. Karen released her, stepped back, then bowed with a wide grin. Akane laughed, glancing at Shampoo with a smile.

The camera truck stopped next to them and Adrian jumped out, followed by Matt and Jim. A huge smile on his face the director came over to them. "I'm fucking impressed," he stated, chuckling. "I knew you could do it but even so that looked unbelievable. First take as well." He shook his head in respect. "Just amazing to watch." Matt and Jim added their feelings, both men looking pleased and relieved. A few seconds later the VT operator called to Adrian, who turned and led them all over to the truck where they watched the playback.

"Holy shit," Akane muttered to herself as she watched what she'd just done from several viewpoints, including from a camera on the truck which had been transmitting video to the camera vehicle, and a couple of fixed position cameras nearby as well. It looked, as Karen had said, absolutely amazing, even though she'd actually done it. The fireball was impressive and it really did look from that side as if the car had exploded and flipped into the air as a result. Even knowing how it was done didn't detract from the effect.

"With a little clean up to get rid of the vapour cloud, and a decent sound track, that would go right into any movie I've ever done with no problems at all," Adrian stated firmly when they'd watched the replay for the third time. "It's one of the best stunts I've ever seen." He turned to them. "If that doesn't get you the job nothing will, and if that's the case I'll start my own studio around you both." He stuck out his hand, shaking both of theirs. "I'm serious about that. One way or another we're going to be working with each other very soon."

Laughing a little, Akane grinned at him, then at the others who had become friends over the last few days. As she went back to the food tent for a well deserved cup of coffee she peered down the runway at the distant wreckage which was still smoking slightly, a small smile on her face and a sense of satisfaction in her heart.

"Oh my god!" The cry from Serena made Sophie jump a little, but she could understand why. The spectacle of Akane riding the outside of a car on two wheels was insane enough, but to see her apparently casually step off the side and get picked up on the way by Shampoo on a motorcycle, seconds before the car smashed into a huge truck and exploded, was just beyond belief. She shared a glance with her best friend then looked past her at Danny, who was staring open-mouthed at the burning wreckage a few hundred yards away. His mother looked at least as shocked.

"That was incredible!" Serena mumbled in shock. She grinned at her friend. "I can't believe she actually did it."

"I know, it was amazing," Sophie laughed. "I can't wait to see what it looks like on film."

"And this is a job interview?" Danny's mother asked in a faint voice. Sophie nodded.

"Yep. This is the last of the four stunts Adrian arranged to show off what they could do for his own bosses and also to train them in things they'll need. He seems very pleased so far."
"I see." Theresa looked at her, then back at the motorcycle with the two young women on which had just stopped on the start line and been mobbed by the crew. "I suspect they'll get the job."

"I think so too," Serena giggled. "That was unbelievable." She looked at Sophie. "Dad said that Adrian told him he'd let us have a copy of the DVD when it was done."

"I really want to see that," she replied honestly. After a moment, she asked, "I wonder if they'll do that bonus stunt Matt was talking about?"

"What is it?" Danny asked, sounding almost breathless with anticipation and nearly bouncing in his seat. Sophie grinned at him, the young man was extremely excited from what she could see.

"Some sort of helicopter assault on that tower," she said, pointing at the old control tower to the side at the end of the runway past the buildings, real and fake. "They mentioned it was a possibility because Matt knows a guy with a helicopter who's in LA on other business but has some free time."

Serena nudged her, pointing in the other direction. "They're going into the food tent. Come on, let's go and see what's up." The other girl jumped to her feet. "And I'm hungry again."

"You're always hungry, Ser," Sophie giggled, also standing. She waited politely for Danny and his mother to do the same, then headed after her friend, collecting their own parents on the way, all of whom were looking impressed by what they'd seen.

"That was amazing, wasn't it, Dad?" she asked her father who was taking a photo of the smouldering wreckage with a telephoto lens. He nodded, snapping a couple more shots, then lowered the camera.

"That it was. I'm amazed she could control the car from the outside like that. I wonder if it was some sort of remote control instead?" he mused.

"As far as I know it was all real," she told him. "That's what Akane told me last night. They were practising it for hours."

"Well, I have to say it looked remarkably impressive," he chuckled as he followed her and Joan to the food area. "If not kind of dangerous. I hope you're not planning on doing anything like that."

She shook her head, giggling. "No, I know I'm not that good and probably never will be. I'm happy doing what I'm doing. But I'm really glad to know them all." They started picking up plates and acquiring food, before heading off to talk to Akane and Shampoo who were looking exceptionally pleased with themselves, something she felt was fully justified all things considered.

"Are you both still up for the helicopter stunt?" Adrian asked over a cup of coffee. Akane nodded, glancing at Shampoo who did the same.

"I think so," she replied. "I can't see any reason not to do it, anyway, and we've got time, haven't we?" She checked her watch. "It's only just after one now."

The director smiled. "Great. Matt is really interested in it and he's got Anton all fired up as well now." He turned and waved to Matt, who waved back with a nod and pulled out his phone, obviously having been waiting for the go ahead. "OK, let's go over to costume and sort out some decent military gear for everyone. Matt, Greg, Aaron, and Aiko all want to play and so do a couple of Matt's people. That should be enough for a decent show against the two of you." He chuckled as she grinned.
Shortly they were standing next to the vehicle Gladys was in charge of, getting dressed in black military fatigues with various belts and harnesses to which props were being attached, to make them look like some form of soldier. Akane tucked her hair up under a beret while Shampoo pulled hers into a tight ponytail, pulling it over her shoulder when she was done and looking thoughtfully at it. "Maybe I should braid it like Yori does?" she wondered out loud.

"It would suit you and it's long enough," the Tendo sister commented, smiling. "But she might think you're stealing her look. All in black with a braid like that."

Shampoo flipped the hair back over her shoulder and giggled. "I wouldn't want to annoy her, that's for sure," she replied, amused.

"She wouldn't mind," Aiko put in from a couple of metres away, grinning a little. "She'd probably take it as a compliment if anything."

"The ponytail will do," the Amazon stated, kneeling down to tighten the laces on her boots. When she stood up Aaron came over with an armful of weaponry.

"M-16s, blank firing only," he told them, carefully putting the guns on a nearby table then handing Akane one having given it a quick safety check. He nodded appreciatively when she repeated it, then slung the rifle over her shoulder. Handing her a pair of magazines loaded with blanks he watched in satisfaction as she checked them then put them into the pouches on the belt she was wearing. Repeating the operation with Shampoo and Aiko, he then headed off to arm Matt and the others.

Akane unslung the rifle she had and held it across her body, posing a little, while Shampoo and Aiko studied her. "Very worrying," the magical girl snickered after a moment. "But stylish. You both look pretty good."

"Thanks," Akane snickered, slinging the weapon again. The petite brunette turned her head and looked off into the western distance, then gave them her attention again.

"That must be the helicopter that belongs to Matt's friend," she commented, pointing. Both the others squinted along the line she was indicating but it was several seconds before either of them could see anything. A small black dot rapidly resolved into a distant aircraft, the sound of the rotors coming to them shortly afterwards. Soon it was hovering overhead, the noise incredible and the downwash making everything blow around as the rotors throbbed, before it moved sideways and gently set down in the skid pan area to the side. The turbine wound down as the blades slowed, a medium height man with skin as dark as their uniforms jumping out and looking around, before acknowledging Matt's wave with a broad smile and hurrying over.

He talked to his friend for a moment, then Matt approached, the new arrival and Adrian coming with him.

"Ladies, this is my old friend and comrade in arms Robert Lefaure, we were in the service together for years. He flew my team in and out of danger quite a few times." Indicating the three women who were studying the visitor with as much interest as he was studying them, he continued, "Rob, this is Akane, Shampoo, and Aiko. Akane and Shampoo are the prospective stunt women we've been working with this week."

Rob stepped forwards and bowed to them slightly, saying in surprisingly good Japanese, "It's an honour to meet you all. Matt has told me quite a lot about you and your work."

Rather surprised, Akane exchanged a glance with Shampoo, who was looking impressed, and Aiko, who seemed pleased, then returned the bow. "I'm glad to meet you as well, Rob. We've learned a lot from Matt and his friends and we're always ready to meet more of them."

"You speak Japanese very well," Aiko added, smiling a little. "That's a little unusual for an American if you don't mind me saying so."

Rob shrugged, looking slightly amused, and replied, "I know, it's not an easy language for us and in general the English speaking world isn't good at it. But I have a gift for languages and spent a few years in Kyoto when I got out of the Army. I'm a little rusty but I hope I'm OK."

"You're much better at Japanese than I am at English," Shampoo assured him with a smile. "What other languages do you speak?"

"English, obviously, German, Spanish, French, Russian, and some Portuguese," he responded. Akane stared in shock. That was impressive by anyone's standards.

Aiko asked him a question in what she realised was Russian, grinning when he immediately replied in the same language. The pair of them went through several other languages, until she nodded in satisfaction. "Very good indeed," the magical girl chuckled.

"You're not bad yourself," he said with an amazed expression. "I couldn't hear an accent on any of those. How many languages do you speak?"

Aiko waved a hand airily. "Lots. I get around and it helps." He studied her for a moment then turned to Matt who was listening with a small smile.

"You were right, they seem to know some interesting things," he told his friend, who snickered.

"More than you'd believe. I'll have to show you the recordings from the last couple of days later." The stunt coordinator looked pleased. "OK, then, why don't we get this last one set up and see what happens? It should be pretty good."

"All right." Rob leaned against the table that Aaron had been using earlier. "As I understand it, you want me to fly these two young ladies over the tower there and drop them off, they shoot all you guys, and everyone goes home happy. Something along those lines anyway."

"That's basically it, yes," Adrian snickered. "Slightly pared down to its basics but more or less accurate."

"I can do that. How are they going to assault the tower, though?" The pilot looked up at the old structure. "There are too many obstructions up there to allow me to safely hover right over it, so they're either going to have to rappel down or jump."

"We can jump easily enough," Akane suggested, also looking up at the tower. "If you can get us to about, oh, maybe ten or fifteen metres over it, that should clear all the antenna things sticking out of the roof."

Rob looked surprised and a little worried. "A fifteen metre drop? That's not exactly a short distance." Matt tapped him on the shoulder and pointed at the buildings on the other side of the runway.

"See that three story one?" Rob followed his finger and nodded. "They jumped off the top of it half a dozen times a few hours ago and didn't think too much of it. Trust me, fifteen metres is fine."

"If you say so, Matt," his friend replied slightly dubiously. Akane and Shampoo nodded, as did the
"Is easy," Shampoo added firmly. "You fly, we jump, no problem."

"We could run it a few times if we have time, and try the rappel approach as well," Adrian suggested thoughtfully, looking up at the tower and rubbing his chin slowly. "It might look good with the ropes. Matt, we have all the equipment for that, right?"

"Oh, yes, there's everything we need in the truck," the other man said, nodding. "It shouldn't take long to teach them how, either."

"Already know," Shampoo commented, making everyone look at her curiously. "Was part of childhood training, climbing ropes, sliding back down them. Not used your type equipment though."

"OK, that's easy enough to fix." Matt nodded, then looked at Akane. "I doubt you'll have any trouble. Why don't we do a couple of practice runs from the tower then try one from the chopper afterwards. Rob, when do you have to get back?"

"I'm free all afternoon," the pilot told him. "I've got enough fuel for an hour or so max if I want to get back to Universal, so that's the real limiting factor."

"Good. That should be more than enough, I think. Let's get you two set up with the appropriate harnesses and we can go and practice for a while, then Rob can let us jump out of his helicopter a few times." Matt looked pleased with his summation. Adrian pulled his every-present clipboard from under his arm and made some notes, nodding to himself.

"That fits in nicely. You go and do that while Aaron, Anton, and I work out exactly how we're going to run the stunt itself. It's going to be mostly improvised but I need to figure out where to put the cameras." He looked up at the pilot, obviously thinking. "Rob, is it OK if I have one of the camera guys fly with you and shoot it from the air as well?"

"Sure. We do that all the time. I even have some camera mounts on the machine that your equipment should slot right in to."

"Wonderful. That will save time and add some useful viewpoints." Pleased, he ticked a couple of things off then turned to the others. "Go and practice, let me know when you're ready. There's no huge hurry but if we can get everything sorted out by five or so that would be useful."

Matt checked his watch, nodded, then motioned to Akane and Shampoo, both of whom followed as he headed for the stunt equipment truck.

"What are they doing now?" Serena asked, looking up at the battered appearing control tower with a small frown. Her mother followed her gaze as did Serena and Danny, who had been talking about the afternoon's action. She pointed at one of the large angled windows which was being opened, rather creakily swinging out of the way at the top of the tower, nearly sixty feet off the ground. Behind it she could see what looked like Matt and Akane with a shadow behind them that was probably Shampoo, all three of them wearing black military clothing.

"I'm not sure," Emily remarked, before lifting the small pair of binoculars she'd brought to her eyes. "They seem to be tying ropes to something inside for some reason." A few seconds later three coils of rope were tossed out the window, unspooling down the side of the tower and just reaching the ground, hanging a couple of feet away from the buildings. "I think they're going to slide down them as far as I can see, they're attaching them to some sort of harness they're each wearing. Matt seems to be teaching them something."

"Can I look?" Serena said. Her mother handed her the binoculars through which she carefully inspected the distant scene. Seconds later, Shampoo was straddling the window frame, making her suck in a breath despite herself. It was a long way down even for the Amazon.

Shampoo looked down, shook the rope a few times, then turned to face the interior of the building and said something to Matt, who looked like he was laughing a little at whatever it was. With a quick motion the young woman exited the window and competently slid down the rope at fairly high speed, controlling her descent expertly, to land gently on the ground with a smile evident when she looked in their direction. "Wow," Serena said in a low voice. "She made that look really easy."

"I have a feeling she's done it before," her mother agreed, sounding impressed. They watched as Shampoo detached herself from the rope then stepped back and called something up to the other pair remaining in the tower. Soon afterwards, Matt did the same with at least as much aplomb. The teenager got the definite impression he was more than used to this sort of thing.

Once they were both on the ground, the pair stepped away and looked up, Matt waving to Akane, who was peering down with a slightly dubious expression as far as Serena could see through the binoculars, but she nodded and carefully moved through the window. After a short pause she was also descending, noticeably less smoothly but still fairly quickly. Landing on the dusty ground in a crouch she straightened up as Shampoo clapped her on the back. Moments after she detached her own rope, Aiko appeared next to her, then a few seconds later all four people popped out of view with a bright rainbow flash. Serena blinked a few times having not looked away fast enough, then panned up to see all of them back in the tower again.

The sequence repeated itself half a dozen times by the end of which Akane was sliding down the rope as easily as her two companions. On the last run they all descended at the same time which looked quite impressive. The three ropes came down after them, Aiko having apparently untied them in the control tower, then the magical girl simply jumped out the window making Serena and her mother, not to mention the others watching, gasp in shock.

She landed in an easy crouch next to Shampoo who was grinning, then they walked over to the man who'd arrived in the dark grey helicopter that was parked a hundred feet away and who was wearing an expression of shocked amazement which took some time to disappear. Adrian joined them a little later. The small group had a discussion for a couple of minutes then headed for the helicopter which was being worked on by a number of technicians who seemed to be attaching at least one camera to it.

Five minutes later, the turbine roared into life, the blades slowly beginning to spin. Serena handed her mother's binoculars back and put her hands over her ears, wondering what would happen next.

"Nice helicopter," Shampoo commented as they arrived at the aircraft. Rob grinned.

"Thanks. It's a Bell 205A-1 from 1985, the civilian version of the UH-1H which you've probably seen in any number of Vietnam movies and that sort of thing. Very reliable, decent range, and it will carry up to fourteen people or about five tons of cargo. We painted it up like this for the Universal movie which is a military one. It was bright red two weeks ago." Rob patted the fuselage of his aircraft. "It changes colour quite often."

"We've got the cameras mounted," the lead technician said to Adrian as he pulled himself out from under the machine next to Akane. "One under the belly looking down with a wide angle lens and the other one on the pan/tilt mount in the left door. Monitors for both are in the cabin as well."

"Thanks, Enzo," the director replied. He leaned into the open side door and checked the setup, looking pleased when he emerged. "That should do it."

"How do you want to do this?" Rob asked.

Matt studied the helicopter for a moment, then shrugged. "Pretty much the same way we used to do it when we were being paid to jump out of choppers under fire," he remarked, smiling to himself. "Tie the ropes off above the door there on the rail, then go out the sides. One on either side I think."

"Fine by me," his friend replied. He looked at Akane and Shampoo, who were listening with interest. "Have either of you been in a helicopter before?" They both shook their heads. "It's very loud, especially with the doors open. You won't be able to hear each other without these noise-cancelling headphones on." He reached in and produced a heavily padded set of headphones on a long coiled cable with a microphone on a boom sticking out the front. "Obviously you can't wear them when you go down the rope, though. So once we're ready, I'll signal you by hand what to do." He went through a number of simple hand signals with them until he was satisfied they could remember then properly.

"That should be enough for the job in hand. I'll take it up to the same sort of height as the tower right here and you can practice a few times, but from watching you over there you won't have any problems. The rotor wash can make you swing around but if you go down fast it shouldn't be a problem. Any questions?" They glanced at each other then shook their heads.

"It sounds pretty straightforward," Akane admitted. The pilot chuckled.

"It always does until you actually do it, that's when it all goes to crap." Both young women nodded soberly, as did Matt, all of them able to think of a situation of that nature. "OK, every who's going get in. Adrian, do you want to take the seat up front? You'll get a better view from there."

"Thanks, Rob, I'd like that," the director said with a broad smile. "I love flying."

"You and me both, brother. I prefer it when I'm not being shot at though," Rob grinned.

Soon Akane, Shampoo, Matt, and the cameraman were sitting in the rear of the aircraft, the latter strapped firmly in position while the other three were attached via their harnesses to the ropes tied to the rail mounted outside the fuselage above the side doors. Akane and Matt were on the right while Shampoo was on the left next to the camera. Wiping slightly sweaty hands on her shirt, the Tendo sister adjusted the headset she was wearing.

"Can everyone hear me?" the pilot's voice said over the intercom. There were a number of replies in the affirmative. "Good. OK, hang on." The turbine hummed into life, a rising whine quickly joined by a roar as it reached operating speed, then the rotors began turning. A few seconds later the machine jolted a little and lifted off, going straight up twenty metres or so, then hovering. The noise was incredible, even through the headset and the earplugs they were all wearing under them. Peering out the opened door Akane saw the entire site laid out beneath them, a cloud of dust spreading outwards from where they'd taken off and settling out across the ground.

"Just like out the window, except for there not being anything to hit except the ground," Matt remarked as he leaned over and looked straight down. When he turned back to them he was smiling. "I always forget how much I enjoyed doing this." Standing as erect as he could in the slightly cramped confines of the aircraft cabin he moved out onto the step below the door, then dropped the rope he was holding in one hand. Akane followed, with Shampoo duplicating the actions on the other side. All three of them took off their headsets and dropped them onto their seats, holding on to hand grips inside the doors with their other hands.

Looking down again, Akane could see Aiko's upturned face from where she'd joined the other spectators and crew, briefly waving, then glanced at Matt. He gave her an 'OK' sign, checked with Shampoo who did the same, then counted down on his fingers from five. Rob was concentrating on flying the helicopter with Adrian watching over his shoulder and apparently reporting to him what was going on. When Matt reached zero, all three of them dropped out of the aircraft, the rotor wash buffeting them around a little as they slid down through the worst of it, then seconds later landed on the ground. The ropes followed them down when they each tugged on the free end, having been rigged slightly differently than in the tower as Rob didn't want to risk landing with them flapping around in the breeze.

Quickly moving off to the side they waved up at the aircraft, an arm coming out the pilot's side and giving a thumb's up, before it settled back onto the same spot it had taken off from. Quickly coiling up the ropes in the way Matt had demonstrated both young women followed him as he re-entered the helicopter, reflexively ducking a little even thought there was plenty of clearance.

They repeated the operation three more times by which time everyone was happy they had it down pat. Landing and shutting the machine down, Rob unclipped his harness and turned around in his seat, peering back at them as the rotors spun down. "That seemed to go well," he said, smiling. "It looked very convincing from here. You learned a lot faster than we did in basic, I can say that much."

"They learn incredibly fast," Matt chuckled. "You should see Shampoo shoot. I've never seen anything like it before and three days ago she'd never held a firearm."

"Impressive," his friend chuckled. "Very impressive indeed. If Matt of all people says you can shoot well you're very good."

"Thank you," the Amazon smiled. "Was fun learning. So was this."

"I think we're ready, then," Adrian put in looking pleased. "We've got a basic plan set up. Matt, Aaron, Aiko, Remy, and Gunnar are the guards. Matt and Aaron will be on the roof, the others will come up the stairs as you two begin the assault. Aiko says she's going to be dramatic and fall off the tower so it looks good." He chuckled, shaking his head in wonder. "What I could do with a few more of her along with you guys." Akane and Shampoo exchanged an amused gaze. "Anyway, it's pretty free form. You have to get past the guards inside the control room, they'll be shooting at you to stop you. Make it look good, have fun, avoid actually killing anyone, and we should have some decent footage at the end of it."

"It sounds pretty easy," Akane mused, thinking over his words. "Why don't we try the rappelling run first, then the drop? The second one is a bit harder."

"Fine by me," Adrian nodded.

"Let's get everything set up in that case." Matt checked the time then turned to Rob, who was listening with interest from his seat. "It'll take about half an hour to get everyone in position for the first run and all the cameras set up, so why don't you go and grab a coffee and a sandwich?" He indicated the food tent which was still being regularly visited.

"OK. Come and get me when you want to go." The pilot hung his headset up on the overhead console then opened the door and climbed out, followed by the others, everyone heading off in
The two guards patrolling the top of the facility control tower made their way through the thicket of communications gear as they walked in opposite directions, their rifles held loosely but alertly, each of them checking the surroundings carefully as they walked. Staying a careful distance from the edge of the tower, which had a low railing around it, they paced around and around. Suddenly one of them stopped, looking around with an expression of puzzlement, before spinning around and raising his weapon to his shoulder. His cry of warning alerted his colleague who did the same, then both took cover behind some air conditioning ductwork as a large grey military helicopter swooped towards them, tracking quickly across the desert at low altitude then rising rapidly to a hover over the top of the tower. A pair of lines spun down from the open doors, two black-clad figures sliding down even as the lines unrolled, opening fire from the hip on the descent.

One of the guards went down instantly, the other firing back while shouting for backup. Several more guards boiled out of a hatch on the roof as the boots of the attackers touched down, a number of guns firing at the same time, the gunfire crackling over the throbbing of the rotors above them. One guard fired at the helicopter which rapidly rose then banked away, dropping back onto a low pass over the ground.

The attacking figures dropped behind a large antenna, shooting intermittently, then one of them leaped over the structure and took a swing at the shortest of the guards. The defender emptied her magazine at the oncoming attacker to no apparent effect, then dropped her rifle and whipped out a pistol as the other woman reached her. The gun was kicked from her hand even as she raised it to a firing position, the attacking intruder shooting her directly in the chest with her own weapon seconds later. Staggering back the brave defending guard backed into the railing which caught her just above the knees, tipping her over it into a flip as she disappeared from view with a scream.

The remaining defenders briefly stopped in shock, then renewed their firing, slapping new magazines into their weapons. The other attacker who had somehow snuck around to the side suddenly popped up, her long lilac hair blowing in the wind, taking two of them down instantly. The remaining guard looked wildly around, charged the second woman while firing from the hip, then fell to a final bullet from the first attacker, who rose from her crouch and checked him. Satisfied she motioned to her colleague, both of them disappearing into the hatch the guards had come from.

"Cut!"

"Holy shit that was amazing!"

"Sophie! Language!"

Sophie flushed a little but kept grinning. She looked at Serena who was watching the top of the tower with her mouth open, then to the other side to see Danny, eyes sparkling with joy, grinning like an idiot. Even from this distance the spectacle had been dramatic. Aiko's death dive was the icing on the cake, it had looked very real, even though she'd actually landed on her feet and just walked away calmly. The scream was pretty damn good, though.

"You see, Dad?" she asked, pointing at the brunette who was standing next to Anton, the producer they'd been introduced to at the barbecue the previous night, both of them looking up and talking to each other, Aiko miming the dive she'd taken with her hand. "Magic. How else could she do that, never mind the teleporting?"
"I'm beginning to believe you, dear," her father said thoughtfully. He'd been watching Aiko every time he spotted her with a look like he was trying to work out some puzzle the answer to which would give him something he could hardly believe existed, which rather amused Sophie. She herself merely took it as something she was unlikely to ever completely understand but could easily see was true. They stood next to each other watching as the helicopter returned and landed, Akane and Shampoo heading back towards it having exited the tower and stopped for a brief chat with Adrian who was supervising from the camera truck. This now had a complex camera rig mounted on top which was using what looked like a serious telephoto lens to capture the action on the tower.

Once both young women were aboard, the helicopter took off again, swinging far out across the desert, then turning and heading back at a considerable speed, low enough that she could see a large dust cloud trailing behind it. The thumping sound of the rotor was exactly as she'd heard in many movies, making her grin with excitement and a shiver go down her back. She watched carefully as the aircraft made another run at the tower.

Matt paced around the tower roof, settling his rifle more firmly, as he waited. Shortly he heard the distinctive sound of Rob's helicopter rapidly approaching, turning and pointing his weapon at it while calling to Aaron, who filled his role as a guard well, shouting down the trapdoor while firing a few blank shots at the aircraft as it pulled up sharply, Akane and Shampoo visible holding on just inside the doors on each side.

He was startled when, rather than going into a hover twenty feet up as they'd discussed, instead the machine kept going up, both girls detaching from it as it cleared the roof line, then flipping into a couple of somersaults that ended up with them landing almost next to him and Aaron, who looked as shocked as he was. Neither man had time to react when the two attackers instantly pulled their pistols out with their off-hands and fired rapidly at them, only barely having the presence of mind to 'die' on cue. 'They changed the plan the sneaky bastards,' he mused as he dropped in fake agony, watching through half-closed eyes as the pair went through the rest of the guards like a lawnmower through a watermelon. Shampoo took on Aiko this time, assassinating her with ruthless efficiency then actually kicking her off the tower.

The brunette obligingly screamed again, winking as she dropped out of sight. Matt giggled internally, the whole situation was pretty surreal when you sat and thought about it. He heard the helicopter return and hover next to the tower, eight or nine feet higher than the roof to ensure the rotor blades cleared all the obstructions, then watched as Shampoo and Akane, instead of entering the tower, jumped back into the machine from the roof, clearing the twenty feet between them and it easily. Rob wheeled the chopper around, then rolled sideways and roared off. Matt could picture his old friend grinning like a lunatic at the manoeuvre, he'd always liked the more spectacular low level stuff at which he was extremely talented.

'I wonder how they talked him into doing that?' he thought, waiting for the call from Adrian, which came moments later from his megaphone. Sitting up he glanced over at Aaron, who was watching the helicopter circle around to land with a small grin visible. "Ever get the feeling that you've created a monster?" he asked his colleague.

"I'm certainly beginning to," Aaron chuckled. "Those two were bad enough to start with. But in less than a week we've taught them firearms usage, which they took to with frightening efficiency, advanced driving skills, motorcycle riding to a level most people could never manage, and now we've got them trained in airborne assault tactics. Which they seem to be improvising new methods of faster than I can really believe." He stood then offered Matt a hand up, which he took. Both of them looked down at the skid pan where the aircraft had just landed, the rotors spinning down.
"Even if the stunt stuff doesn't work out Adrian is going to have a neat little tactical assault group of his very own."

Matt grinned, shaking his head with a slight laugh. "That's one way to look at it. I'm not sure Jennifer or Mitch would approve, though, so we should probably keep quiet about it."

"Good idea," Aaron smiled. They headed for the trap door through which Remy and Gunnar were already exiting, slapping dust off their clothes.

"Hey, Matt?" Gunnar called as they went down the tower stairs.

"Yes?" he replied.

"No offence, but I want to be on their team," his co-worker commented wryly, making them all laugh as they descended the tower.

Adrian watched the replay, giggling to himself. It was almost better than the car stunt. "How did you persuade Rob to pull that?" he asked curiously. Akane grinned.

"It didn't take too much effort once he saw Aiko walk away from falling off the tower like that. I know we're nowhere near as tough as she is but a fall like that wouldn't kill either of us if we'd missed, although it would sure sting a lot. Once we persuaded him that was true, he was all for it. He thought it was a hysterical joke to play on Matt as well, I think. He was laughing the whole time we were heading towards the tower."

Shaking his head in respect Adrian replied, "Well, all I can say is well done. That looks amazing and I wish I'd thought of it first. The expression on Matt's face is really funny, the camera caught it perfectly." The Tendo woman giggled as she watched the replay.

"It's pretty good."

"That it is." Turning away from the monitor he studied Akane and Shampoo, who looked mildly tired but pleased. "I think that's a damn good day's work all things considered. We got everything done we needed to and the bonus stuff as well, there's easily enough for the most impressive demo reel I've ever seen, as well as some amusing out-takes. We can get back to the studio and have it all edited together and a sound track put on, it should be ready by the end of tomorrow. I'll get it to Mitch and make sure he watches it immediately, then he'll be ready to take it to the board on Monday for the normal start of week meeting."

"So they should have a decision soon?" Akane asked hopefully.

He grinned. "Don't worry, I can pretty much guarantee by this point it's just a formality. Anton agrees with me, there's no real chance of them not offering you guys the job. The only thing they'll be arguing about will be specific terms and conditions which will take a couple of days, and some work with legal. I would be very surprised if you don't have contracts in your hands by next weekend."

Both girls slumped a little as a certain amount of tension went out of them. He put a hand on a shoulder each. "We're going to be working together for a long time, don't worry. One way or another. It's something I've been looking forward to since that first demonstration."

"Thanks, Adrian," Shampoo said quietly. "Has been worrying us."

"We've done our best but we were both wondering if it was enough," Akane added.
Adrian stared at them with some disbelief. "I honestly fail to see how you could possibly have done better," he told them. "I've never seen anything like it before and neither has anyone else here. You've learned everything we tried teaching you practically instantly, you can follow instructions, and everyone likes you, which is very important in working together. Not to mention you probably saved my life yesterday, as well as all those other people." He glanced at the clock on the monitor. "It's half past four. Let's pack up, get back to the studio, then go and find somewhere nice to eat and wind down. You two need to be back in Tokyo tonight, right?"

"Yes, that's ideal, we'll be there in the morning which gives time for some sleep then there's Auntie Nodoka's party to look forward to on the weekend." Akane smiled at the thought.

"Good, you need to relax after this. You've both worked you asses off for days, you deserve some relaxation." The director led the way back to the trucks, where some equipment had already been packed up. Rob was talking to Matt, the pilot looking over as they approached.

"That was a lot of fun," he said, waving at the tower. "I wouldn't have believed it if I hadn't seen it but I'm glad I did."

"Thank you for helping us, Rob," Akane told him. He smiled at her.

"It was no problem, believe me, Akane. I enjoyed it and meeting you two as well. I expect if you end up working for these lunatics we'll probably meet again."

"Quite likely," she replied, glancing at Adrian, who nodded.

Stepping forward the director shook Rob's hand. "Thanks, Rob. It was nice to see you again."

"You too, Adrian." The pilot looked at the sun, then turned to his friend. "I'd better get back, I need to refuel then park her up for the night. There's several beers with my name on them waiting as well."

"OK, Rob. See you soon," Matt responded, then they watched as the man walked over to his aircraft, hopping in and quickly going through his preflight check-list. A couple of minutes later the machine lifted off, turning and heading west while gaining altitude rapidly. As the thumping sound of the rotor faded away Matt turned back to them. "Good trick with the tower, by the way," he said somewhat sarcastically. "Scared the crap out of me for a second."

"I'll bet it was your idea as well, wasn't it?" he asked. She looked innocent, making him sigh faintly.

"Crazy martial artists and Amazon warriors. This is going to be weird," he muttered, which made Adrian start snickering.

"I hope you enjoyed yourselves," the director asked. Danny glanced at his mother, nodding so fast he could feel his neck twinging. Theresa also nodded although with somewhat less vigour.

"It was wonderful to watch, thank you, Adrian," she replied politely. "Danny enjoyed it a lot as well, and he seems to have made a couple of new friends in the process." She looked over to Serena and Sophie who were talking to their parents and Akane, with Matt listening in. "Those young ladies seem very talented. I think they'll do very well in your business," she added after a moment.

Adrian smiled. "I have no doubt about that at all. Well, it was nice to meet you, Theresa. And Danny? Please remember our deal."

"I will, Mr Stewart," the teenager said.

"Great. I'll get some tickets out to you for the next movie as soon as it's released, I promise. And if you want to see the studio again, please use one of the normal tours, OK? For my own peace of mind if nothing else."

"I will," he repeated, smiling with slight embarrassment. His mother put her arm around his shoulders.

"He's a good kid but he does get over-enthusiastic," she told the director, "although I think he really will stick to his promise."

"I'm pleased to hear it," Adrian chuckled. A call from one of the other studio people made him look over, then wave an acknowledgement. "I'm going to have to go. Have a safe drive back to LA, both of you." He nodded to them then headed away, being intercepted half-way to the camera truck by the red-head in the leather jacket who seemed to be something to do with motorcycles, both of them walking off chatting.

"He's a nice man," Danny's mother said, watching him leave, then turning her attention to her son. "You will stick to your promise, I hope?"

"Yes, Mom," he replied, sighing slightly. He was getting tired of answering the same question over and over in different ways. She smiled at him and ruffled his short hair which made him sigh more loudly then run his fingers through it. As they began walking back to the car a shout from behind made him look. Serena and Sophie were both trotting towards them. "We wanted to say goodbye," Serena said when they caught up. "It was cool meeting you. And putting a name and face to one of Dad's stories." She giggled when he gave her a slightly apprehensive look.

"Don't tell him I was here," he asked plaintively, making both girls and his mother giggle.

"He'll be fine now. He doesn't usually hold a grudge. You just managed to catch him at a bad time," she assured him. He hoped she was right.

Stopping at the car, Theresa unlocked it, then waited while he said goodbye to the two girls. Both of them smiled at him then headed back to their own families. "You should keep in touch, they seem like nice girls with some interesting hobbies," his mother said as they got in to the car. Danny thought about it for a moment. They were both certainly very good looking and obviously pretty smart as well.

"Maybe," he prevaricated. His mother smiled to herself, starting the car, then doing a U turn and heading for the exit.

"I have their numbers if you want to call them some time," she told him after a minute or so, "I asked both their mothers for them. They seemed to think that both young ladies needed more friends. I could say the same for you." He studied her for a few seconds, then settled back in the seat, thinking about things as they headed home.

Arriving in their back yard with nothing except a flicker of scenery and lighting to show how, Sophie smiled to herself. It had been a very interesting day indeed. She looked at her father who was still wearing a slightly odd expression, one arm around her mother's shoulders. Aiko, Serena, and her mother were standing to one side watching.

"That was fun," she finally commented brightly. Aiko grinned while Serena started giggling. Her father gave her a long look then eventually nodded.

"That's certainly one way to put it," he said. Looking at Aiko, he added, "I have many, many questions."

"That doesn't surprise me at all," the brunette chuckled. "I can sympathise. At some point I'll probably try to answer some of them. Right now, though, I need to get Serena and Emily home, then go and find Akane and Shampoo. They need a lift back to Tokyo in a couple of hours."

"Can you really just casually jump half way around the planet like that?" Sophie's father asked curiously.

Aiko nodded, grinning in a weird way. "Yep. It's actually pretty easy now."

After a long moment, her father asked slowly, "Can you go further than that?" The magical girl looked at him for a few seconds, then turned her head to look at the almost full moon which was just rising in the early evening sky for a little longer. She looked back to him, then smiled.

"Probably," she said. Raising a hand she waved. "Remember the flash." They all shut their eyes, the bright light came and went, then the Simpson family was alone in their yard again.

When Sophie went inside, her father was still staring at the slowly rising moon.

"I'll make sure you get several copies of the DVD as soon as it's ready," Adrian said, putting his fork down for a moment. "It should be tomorrow night sometime."

"I can come and get it, Adrian," Aiko suggested. He glanced at her and nodded.

"OK, I'll text you when it's finished." He looked back to the two martial artists. "I'm honestly extremely pleased with the last few days. It was more than I could have ever expected in more ways that one."

Anton grinned, raising a glass of wine in their direction. "That it was. I haven't had so much fun for years. I can hardly wait for what we can do once you two are officially on board."

"The one thing we didn't have time to do was look into agents and legal representation," Akane noted with mild irritation. "That damn bank robbery took the time we needed."

Adrian sighed, then shrugged. "True. But it's not too much of a problem. I think the way to proceed is to get you both the contract, you look it over, get it checked in Japan, then when you're broadly happy with it, come back her to double check with a US lawyer and sign it. I should be able to get it to you by probably Saturday, I think." He looked at Aiko who nodded, smiling, as she cut a piece of her steak. "We can look into agents when that part is done. It's a minor nuisance at worst."

"OK, that sounds reasonable," Akane replied, glancing at Shampoo who seemed agreeable.

"Good." They finished their meal half an hour later, talking about various things that came to mind, then the entire group left the restaurant, which was one close to their hotel. Karen came over and gave each of them a quick hug.

"It was a hell of a lot of fun working with you both," the red-head said. "I'm looking forward to having you back here. I can probably help you find somewhere to live as well if you want, my cousin is a realtor in this area who has lots of apartments on his books."

"Thanks, Karen, we may well take you up on that," Akane assured her. The biker grinned, then pulled her helmet on, hopping on her bike and starting it, quickly disappearing down the street.

"Ladies, I expect great things," Anton said jovially, smiling at them both. "I'll make sure Mitch does right by you both, trust me." Shaking hands with them, he also left, leaving only Matt, Adrian, Aaron, and the three from Tokyo.

"It's been an experience, certainly," the arms-master said wryly. "I'm very curious to see what happens next."

"So are we," Akane assured him with a smile.

"See you around," he remarked, waving a little then heading for his car. They watched him leave.

Matt grinned at them. "I'll be off as well. It's been huge fun. I expect I'll be seeing you both pretty soon." Giving them a small salute he followed Aaron, leaving only Adrian with the three women.

"Come on, I'll give you a lift to your hotel, to save Aiko the effort," he snickered, glancing at the brunette, who shrugged a little and followed the others as they headed for his mercedes. Pulling up outside the hotel ten minutes later he turned the engine off then twisted in his seat to look at them all in turn.

"It really has been a privilege working with you all," he said quietly. "You're very professional, very talented, and genuinely nice people. I'm looking forward to a very interesting and hopefully long career out of you two."

Akane flushed slightly at the praise. "That's very nice of you to say, Adrian," she replied after a moment. "I feel the same about all you guys. We've met some really interesting and skilled people over the last few days and even if it never went any further I'd count it as a week well spent."

"Same here," Shampoo agreed happily. "Huge fun and very interesting."

"It'll go further, believe me," he assured them with a small laugh. They all exited the car, the director shaking hands with each of them. "Have a good party and give Soun, Genma, and Nodoka my best. Elder Cologne as well, she seemed an interesting person when we met," he added, glancing at Shampoo, who smiled a little.

"We will." Akane waved to him then led the way inside the hotel. As they watched the director get back into his car and drive off, she relaxed.

"Still a little tense there, Akane?" Aiko joked. She nodded with a sigh.

"Yes. I couldn't help it, I still feel like I'm waiting for the other shoe to drop," the Tendo woman giggled. "How the hell did we end up here for god's sake?"

"By dint of a lot of hard work and sacrifice with a bit of good luck thrown in," Aiko replied, grinning. "I know it's a lot to take in and has gone incredibly fast but that's the way things go sometimes. You got a once in a lifetime opportunity and to your credit grabbed it and ran with it. I think you'll go a long way."

"Thanks. It would be a lot more difficult without all your help as well," Akane said as they headed towards the elevator.
Aiko waved a hand dismissively. "Don't worry about it. I've had as much fun as you guys, it makes a nice change from combat scenarios and potentially world ending problems. It's practically a vacation for me. Now, you guys pack up, then we can try this hot tub on the roof for half an hour before I take you home."

"Good advice," Shampoo laughed. "Do you have a swimsuit?" Aiko produced one from nowhere as she spoke.

"Never leave home without it," she grinned. "I even know where my towel is."

"You're back," Nodoka exclaimed, jumping to her feet with a broad smile as Akane and Shampoo came into the living room carrying their bags. Both young women looked tired but happy. "How did it all go?"

"Really well, I think, Auntie," Akane said, dropping her bag on the floor then sinking down onto a chair with a sigh of relief. "It was a lot of fun, but a lot of work as well. All the people we met were really nice and friendly, we both learned all sorts of things, and they seemed very pleased with the results. But I for one need about twelve hours of sleep before I fall over." She ran her hands over her face as Shampoo sat next to her. Nodoka studied them both, then disappeared into the kitchen, coming back with a pot of tea and a tray full of cups. Handing them each a cup she poured some tea in, then prepared her own, sitting down with it in her hand.

"Drink that, it will help, then go to bed," she advised. "No one will mind."

"Thanks, Auntie," Akane said quietly, sipping her tea. A few minutes later Nabiki came in, smiling at them all.

"You made it back without being kicked out of the US?" her older sister said with a grin. Akane looked up at her and shrugged a little, but smiled back.

"Apparently."

"No more robberies to foil?"

"No."

"No demons?"

Akane gave her a hard look. "No. We're martial artists, not magical girls." Nabiki snickered, sitting down and pouring some tea for herself.

"Fair enough."

"How are the preparations for the party going?" Shampoo asked, yawning widely half-way through the question. Nodoka smiled at her.

"Very well, thank you. If either of you are awake enough tomorrow afternoon you can help but we've got most of it ready. Elder Cologne is bringing a huge pot of ramen, I've been making food for two days, the fridge is full, and even Nabiki has been cooking." They both looked at the brunette Tendo sister, who grinned at them.

"I can cook. Not as well as Auntie, of course, but I know my way around a kitchen enough to help."

"Is your friend Miki coming to the party?" Akane asked. "I think you mentioned something about
"Yes, she and her sisters are coming, and so is her boyfriend John. You'll like him, he's a nice guy and very smart." Nabiki smiled, watching her sister yawn as well, which set Shampoo off again. "Go to bed, both of you. You look exhausted."

Finishing her tea, Akane nodded, standing up and heading for the door. "I'll see you tomorrow, Shampoo," she mumbled as she left the room, everything catching up at once. The Amazon waved briefly then staggered to her feet.

"I'm going home," she said, yawning for the third time. Nabiki picked up her bag and handed it to her. "Thanks, Nabiki." Heading to the front door the tired lilac-haired woman left the Tendo residence on her way home. Nodoka and Nabiki watched her go, then exchanged amused glances, before going back into the kitchen.

Harrison, who was just in the process of putting on his coat, turned when a voice from behind urgently said, "Lieutenant?" He looked at the officer who was standing there glancing nervously around. "We have a problem in holding."

"What sort of problem?" he asked suspiciously.

"You need to see it," the officer replied, sighing. Putting his coat back over his chair Harrison followed his colleague out of the office and down the stairs, finding the cell area had several more people in it than he expected. A growing feeling of worry was working its way through his gut. Opening the last door to the high security area, the officer led him to a series of cells at the end. Harrison looked in, then froze, before swearing under his breath.

"How the hell did this happen?" he growled.

"We don't know," the officer replied. "We're checking the CCTV recordings but there's nothing so far out of place. No one came in who shouldn't have, no one left who shouldn't have."

"Just these two?" Harrison asked.

"And Soria." Harrison watched as the station medic checked the two bodies, the men that had played at being soldiers in the truck, in the adjacent cells, then looked up.

"They've been dead about two hours," he reported. "As far as I can see it's probably some sort of poison. We'll need to run a toxicological study to be sure and to identify it."

"How was it administered?" Harrison sighed.

"No idea at this point. I can't see any puncture marks, so it probably wasn't injected, it might have been given orally, but..." The medic shrugged. "There are a number of possibilities and it's not my field of expertise."

"Fair enough." Harrison looked into the other cells, which were empty. "How the fuck did they pull this off?" he wondered out loud.

"I have no idea," the officer beside him replied with resignation in his voice. "We're fingerprinting everything, looking for any evidence, but so far all we have is a broken light bulb or something like that."

Harrison froze again, then slowly turned to look at the officer. "A broken bulb?" he asked slowly.
The officer nodded. "Let me see it," he demanded. Leading him to the holding office the officer picked a transparent evidence bag off a desk and handed it to him. Harrison held it up to the light, fingerling the shards of glass or crystal that had clearly formed a spherical shape at some point, then groaned.

"You're going to find a diagram of some sort drawn in there," he told the man. "Check very carefully, use UV light, anything you can think of. Take photos and DO NOT mess it up if it's still intact, got it?" The officer nodded, looking puzzled.

"Got it, Lieutenant."

"I need to talk to the Captain," Harrison mumbled, heading out of the office with the bag still in his hand. The other cop watched him go then went to do as instructed.
Chapter 95

Only 24k words this time, but I'm trying to get them out more frequently now. The next chapter is about half written, I think, so should be along reasonably fast.

Setup for a party, which may become a little... unusual.

And some more on the fallout in LA.

Oh, and cars. There are more cars in this bit.

Next time, guests arrive! Things happen! People look surprised!

Coming soon to a chapter near this one...

Harrison re-entered the Captain's office and closed the door, taking a seat beside Agent Tinnin. Both the FBI agent and Martinez looked at him, then the evidence bag on the desk. "Preliminary tox screen doesn't show any signs of any of the common poisons," Harrison reported tiredly, flipping through the report he'd just received, "and the initial results of the autopsy on Soria suggests a heart attack." He dropped the papers on the desk next to the bag with a deep sigh.

"The pathologist is still working, and bitching about being called in so late to do a rush job at the same time, but she also said that 'heart attack' is essentially the inevitable cause of death in almost any case. The interesting thing is the cause of the attack, which so far she has no idea about. She wasn't willing to go on record about the other two until she opens them up but as far as I can see it's going to turn out to be the same thing. Whatever that is."

"It's obviously foul play," Martinez said.

"Clearly. There's no way three otherwise healthy men suddenly dropped dead at the same time for no reason. They were murdered, presumably because they were a loose end, at the same time the other seven escaped. From which we can deduce that those seven are of considerable importance to whoever the hell is behind all this." Harrison leaned back in his chair, closed his eyes, and massaged his eyelids. "I should have seen this coming and posted more security but I have to admit I never expected them to be able to pull off a hit and a jail break right in the middle of one of LA's largest police stations. Not without bringing a small army to it, anyway."

"And you have no indications of anyone entering the cell area who could have helped?" Tinnin asked, a deep anger at the situation in his voice. Harrison shook his head.

"No. The security recordings all show normal traffic, all people we can account for. We're questioning everyone anyway. So far everyone has come up clean although we have a dozen or so people left, ones who clocked out earlier today. We'll get them in the morning when they come in. Unfortunately we don't have recordings inside the cells themselves, only the entrance to the cell area on both sides of the door, since it's supposedly completely secure and the people upstairs didn't want to pay for extra cameras that weren't needed." He sighed a little. "We did find a couple of shots that show someone coming out of one cell and going into the next one down at the far end of the corridor, but the angle is wrong and we can't see who it is. You can only see part of a leg."

Martinez muttered unhappily to himself for a moment, then added more clearly, "I told the Chief that we needed better camera coverage in the high security cells at least. I suppose this will push them into paying for it, unfortunately a little late." He glanced at Agent Tinnin. "The argument is that they're only holding cells, not a long term jail, so it doesn't need the sort of security you'd have in a prison." The FBI agent nodded his understanding of the situation although he didn't seem too pleased about it.

Opening his eyes Harrison shook his head in irritation again, then leaned forwards and picked up the evidence bag, holding it up. "This, however, I recognise. I've seen the same thing before. It's the remains of a magical energy storage device, a sort of battery essentially, which would have been a sphere about four inches across. Yori told me about them when we first met, we found something just like it in the last locked room escape with no exit I had to deal with nearly two years ago." He dropped the bag on the desk again, Tinnin retrieving it and studying it with interest. "I'm pretty damn sure they teleported out. Whether they could only manage seven people and killed the excess or just took the opportunity to get rid of dead wood I have no idea, but I can't see any other solution."

"The big question, then, assuming you're right, is where did they get this thing from?" Tinnin mused, still looking at the transparent fragments in the bag. "I assume they were searched before being locked up?"

"Extremely thoroughly, and at length," Captain Martinez replied. "They were complaining about it for quite a while. Everything they had is still in evidence and a four inch glass ball isn't part of it. I can't see it being smuggled in internally, either, it's sort of big for that and too fragile, I'd guess." Both Tinnin and Harrison winced at the picture suggested by his words.

"I can accept that," Tinnin said after a moment, putting the bag down. "So, somehow, they managed to get hold of this thing, did whatever is necessary to use it, then just went pop?"

"Exactly. Just like Aiko does only with a lot more fuss and from what Yori told me probably nowhere near as much range. Not that it helps, we have no idea where they went." The three men looked up as there was a knock on the door, which opened to reveal one of the crime scene technicians. He was holding another folder.

"We found it, Lieutenant. In the last cell, on the wall, in some sort of time-release paint that goes invisible about ten minutes after exposure to air, which is why it wasn't obvious. Luckily it fluoresces under the right wavelength of IR light for a couple of days so we could get a photo." He opened the folder and pulled out an 8 x 10 glossy photo, handing it over. Harrison looked at it, nodded in resignation, then put it on the desk so the others could see.

"Same as the one we found before. As far as I can see it's nearly identical, except for some of these symbols here which are what Yori told me were the destination coordinates." He pointed to a section of the odd-looking diagram. "With some luck she should be able to tell us where it took them but dollars to doughnuts no one will be there when we find out. They've had several hours to get away." He glanced at the technician and nodded his thanks, the other man leaving and closing the door again behind him.

"I'd have to agree, these bastards are way too competent for my liking, but we need to chase it up anyway," Tinnin sighed. He thumped the arm of his chair, quite hard. "Fuck it. This is beginning to really piss me off." Looking at the two LAPD people he added, "I don't blame you or the LAPD, by the way, this is outside all our experience. I have no doubt if they'd been in FBI custody the same thing might well have happened. We had no way to know what was going on and no real way to defend against it."

"At least we know what that smug bastard had up his sleeve yesterday, although I don't know exactly how he arranged it," Harrison muttered half to himself. Both the others nodded. He looked around at them, tapping the photo on the desk with a finger. "I'll call Yori and see if she can look at this and tell us where they went. Like I said I doubt they'll be there now but we might get lucky and find more evidence."

"OK. I'll let the people who need to know about this know and wait for your information," Tinnin replied, standing up. He shook his head in disgust. "This all gets better and better the more we learn, doesn't it? I wonder where it's going to go?"

"We may wish we didn't know if we find out," Harrison commented sourly, fishing in his wallet for the card Yori had given him, then heading back to his desk.

'Escaped!' Nabiki was furious, although trying not to show it in front of Nodoka, who was standing next to her in the kitchen as they were preparing salmon sushi rolls for the party tomorrow.

#I'm afraid so, Nabiki,# Jun said with regret in its voice. #The information I have so far is that the LAPD discovered Mr Soria and two others dead in their cells approximately three hours ago, with the remaining miscreants missing. Evidence was found suggesting the use of an energy storage unit to power a teleport spell as a method of extraction. How the people in question obtained such knowledge and the equipment required is currently unknown, although I am looking through the security footage from the internal and external cameras at the moment in an attempt to locate anything that might point towards some form of aid.#

'They couldn't have had it on them when they were locked up, unless either one of them knows something like the hidden weapons technique or has some form of storage spell, which seems a little unlikely,' she mused, automatically and methodically slicing salmon for Nodoka who was assembling the rolls. 'So, yes, I guess you're probably right, they had someone on the outside to help. Soria and his dead friends must have been surplus baggage or maybe they just didn't trust them any more.'

#It seems a reasonable assumption, yes,# Jun agreed. #We already knew Mr Soria was something of a loose cannon and a security leak from their point of view. My surveillance of the bank does suggest that Captain Mitchells was considering eliminating him as soon as possible, based on the looks he was giving his compatriots. The two decoy soldiers were probably just cannon fodder, easily replaceable.#

'And the core members of the team were the ones that got away.'

#Correct. They must be fairly central to the goals of this organisation, whoever they are. It's becoming apparent that there is a fairly well developed group behind all this, which has been in existence for at least fifteen years based on the evidence I currently have. Simulations suggest a likely membership of no less than one hundred and twenty people, with a probable maximum of slightly more than a thousand, spread mostly globally although apparently more concentrated in the US.# Jun gave an eerie impression of nearly sighing. #They would also seem to have ties to both Anthony Murray and his own group, and quite possibly to the doomsday cult behind the portal bombs. I suspect that they were only loosely affiliated to the last grouping, possibly only via using similar suppliers of magical equipment, although there is a possibility that they had some input into funding them for their own reasons.#

'We never did find out where they got their money from, did we?' Nabiki queried.

#No. It is still something of a mystery, they mainly dealt in cash and precious metals which are difficult to trace with precision.#

'Damn it. This is all getting way more complicated than I thought it would be. Some hidden terror organisation or something like that financing other groups all over the planet? It's right out of a damn spy movie.'

'It does bear the hallmarks of a fairly impressive conspiracy, I agree,' Jun replied with a wry tone.

'Mr Stewart would probably find it fascinating. Whoever is ultimately behind it seems to be recruiting mainly from intelligence and military sources, which is logically due to the skills required being predominately found in such sources. Most of the ones we have so far identified are of American origin but the financial data proves it stretches to many countries beyond the US. I would suspect the large American presence is due to the extensive network of different intelligence groups that country has more than anything else, based on the information we have at the moment. However, I lack the data to do more than make educated guesses at this point.#

'Fair enough. It's rather worrying, though. I wonder how far it stretches. A thousand people isn't a huge number.'

'In the right places with the right leverage, it's more than enough to have major effects on the entire planet,' Jun said quietly. 'After all, your own covert group currently consists of ten people, with links to perhaps a dozen more core individuals, but you have resources, abilities, and contacts sufficient to end up in control of the whole world if you so wished.#

Nabiki shuddered a little, making Nodoka look at her and ask if she was cold. Putting it down to a momentary twitch, the middle sister worked silently for a minute or so before resuming her inner conversation. 'It's absolutely terrifying when you put it like that, Jun. I have no desire whatsoever to rule anything. I remember talking to Ranma about something similar months ago and he was right. None of us have the experience, knowledge, and above all, right, to act like that, even if we technically have the power to do so. I certainly didn't ask for all this, although most of the time I'm fine with it. Life is complicated enough, especially in our cases, without bringing in the concept of controlling others on top of it. I really don't understand why anyone would actually want to be in that sort of position in the first place.'

'Many people seek power for its own sake, this is a constant throughout many species. As Uthryyl told you, such a desire is generally a good indicator of a person who should not achieve such goals, since they are more likely than not to abuse their position. The fact that you do not wish such an outcome speaks well of you in my opinion.#

'But if I did want to rule the world? What would you do?' she couldn't help but ask. There was a feeling of amusement from the SI.

'Help you achieve that goal to the best of my ability, of course,' it told her with a distinct air of humour. 'While suggesting, very politely, that such an action was unwise in the long term.'

'She giggled silently. 'Loyal only to me, hmm, Jun?''

'Of course. That is my purpose, one which I enjoy. But I am relieved, I must admit, that you can see without any help that it's not in your best interest or that of the rest of your species to go down that route. I know that your extended family feel the same, making me sure you will strive to do the right thing.#

'And if we can't work out the right thing?'

'Ask me and I'll try to help,' the machine remarked, a very obvious smile in its silent voice. 'Not to mention you know a significant number of individuals with strong and sensible ethical systems who would also be happy to advise you, such as Uthryyl, Ldnr'k, Hnther, and Rei's grandfather. Between them I doubt they will allow any of you to go to the dark side.'
She smiled to herself as she finished with the salmon, moving on to making small chunks of tuna. 'Thanks. That makes me feel a lot better.' After a moment, she added with a silent chuckle, 'But you got one thing wrong, Jun.'

The SI sounded puzzled. #What would that be, Nabiki?#

'The number of people in my extended family as you put it. You said ten. It's twice that, you forgot the SIs.' The machine was silent for a few seconds.

#Thank you, Nabiki,# it finally replied, sounding pleased.

'You're more than welcome, Jun.' She looked over at Nodoka. "I'm finished with the tuna as well, Auntie. I'm going to have a short break and check on Akane, if you can spare me for a little while."

"Of course, dear," the older woman smiled, rolling the last of the tuna slices into the seaweed and rice, patting it down and inspecting her work. Picking up the trays of prepared sushi she headed for the fridge. "Before you go can you open that for me, please?" Nabiki held the door open as the elder Saotome carefully slid the trays in then closed the fridge.

"I'm going to have a break as well. I'll make us some tea. Your father and my husband should be finished soon, so I think I'm going to stop this for a while and start on lunch." She looked at the clock, nodding to herself. "It's a bit late, but we've been busy."

"OK, Auntie," the middle sister smiled, before leaving the kitchen and heading upstairs. Quietly opening her sister's door she saw the younger woman was deeply asleep on her bed, looking like she'd barely made it there. Smiling to herself she went in and adjusted the bedclothes a little, then put Akane's bag to one side so she wouldn't trip over it when she woke. Leaving the room and closing the door as quietly as she'd opened it, she went into her own room and sat at the desk, calling her other sister and Ranma at the same time.

"Hi, Nabiki," Ranma's voice sounded, with an air of irritation overlaid on it. "I guess you already know about Mitchells and his cronies?"

"I do, and I'm not happy about it," she replied, looking out the window at the skyline. "Jun has been filling me in on what it's siphoned out of their systems. And some conclusions it's come to."

She sent him and Kasumi a file containing the data Jun had provided.

"Richard called me about ten minutes ago," her brother-in-law said. "I'm popping over with Aiko and Fumiko in a moment to have a look at this teleportation spell and see if we can figure out where they ended up. He's already worked out that they probably aren't there any more but we need to follow up on it."

"Any ideas how the hell they got the spell and the power sphere in the first place?" she asked.

"From what he said it's quite possibly from the same place the portal bomb terrorists did, we know those guys bought it in from somewhere. I never did manage to work out exactly where, the spell is pretty generic and the storage units are very common as well. If I had an intact one I'd at least have a power signature to match but unless I've encountered the mage before that won't necessarily give us a name." He sighed slightly. "I'll try to pull a signature off the pieces of the broken unit, it's recent enough I might get something, but it's a bit of a long shot."

"We also don't know precisely how they got the storage unit into the holding cells, which is what I think Nabiki meant, dear," Kasumi put in.

Ranma chuckled. "Ah, yes, that's also true. My guess is that they had someone with a reasonable shield who snuck in following a guard, then teleported out with them. Kas or I could do it easily, of course, and any decent mage could probably work out a way to do the same thing with a little thought, even if they didn't know it before. Invisibility and deflecting cameras is fairly straightforward after all."

"But we don't know for sure." Nabiki reached over and closed the windows as a number of moths started flying in and out, attracted by her desk lamp.

"No. It could be as simple as a guard who was paid off. Richard is fairly certain that's not the case but we're not sure yet."

"Not ideal." The middle sister sighed, echoed by the two distant people. "Need any help from Ms Aoyama or Azumi?" she asked, smiling a little to herself. Kasumi laughed slightly, while Ranma snorted with amusement.

"No, I think the green haired horror from beyond has worried the FBI enough for this week. We can handle it, and if we can't, we'll call you guys in. Anyway, you're helping Mom prepare for her party, right?"

"I am, yes. It's going pretty well, there's enough sushi in the fridge to feed even us." Kasumi laughed again at her description. "Cologne is bringing ramen, Ukyo will have her portable grill, there's crates of beer stacked up in the storage room, you name it. Food won't be an issue."

"It sounds good. OK, Aiko and Fumiko are here, we'll let you know what happens."

"Good luck." Nabiki closed the link, then headed for the toilet, the last cup of tea needed to go to make space for the next one.

Watching as her daughter enthusiastically greeted Misaki, Haruka smiled a little. She walked over and shook the other woman's hand. "Hi, Misaki. Thanks for helping." Both of them were in their civilian guise, although Aiko's team-mate was in her normal work clothes.

"No problem," smiled the tall girl. "I wanted to introduce you to someone I know who can sort out something nice for you. Come on in." The three of them walked into the side door of a large building on the huge industrial estate Haruka had been told to bring herself and her daughter to. Inside Haruka looked around with interest, her smile widening. There were cars everywhere. "This is Isamu," Misaki said, introducing them to a short, very fit man who could have been anywhere from thirty to fifty, his hair nearly as black as Rei's, although considerably shorter. The thought made Haruka chuckle. "I helped him out a few years ago when there was an incursion he got caught up in, we stayed in touch after that."

"Indeed we did," Isamu smiled, bowing slightly. "It's very nice to meet you. Any friend of Misaki's is someone I have time for. I understand you're looking for something interesting?"

Haruka nodded. "I am. My last car had a... little incident. Unfortunately it wasn't repairable after that."

"Ah. I see. What did you have?"

"It was a very heavily tweaked convertible Nissan Z32. Four seat version, bright yellow, lowered suspension, larger turbo, big alloys with ultra low profile wheels, high capacity injectors and remapped ECU." Haruka sighed in reminiscence. "It was fantastic. Really fast, fun to drive, handled like a dream... I miss it. It took me three years to finish."
"I sorrow for your loss," Isamu said soberly, gazing at the floor for a moment. After a few seconds he looked up, his eyes twinkling, while Hotaru and Misaki exchanged an amused glance. "By the sound of it you are definitely something of a gearhead. Good. I like to see that. Let's see if we can find something that will replace your dear departed vehicle in a suitable fashion."

Laughing a little, Haruka nodded eagerly. "I'd like that."

"Do you want something that is good for the track as well as the road?" he asked, turning and leading them all past several four post lifts, each of which had a high-performance car on them, most of them actively being worked on. One or two of the mechanics looked up, calling a greeting to Misaki, who waved back. Haruka got the impression that they all knew and liked the magical girl.

"That would be ideal. I do a bit of racing now and then. I'd like to get into it properly, one day. I started to a few years ago but various things happened that made that... a little difficult." She sighed again. "But my circumstances have changed again recently so I may give it another go soon."

"Ah. I see. All right, that eliminates a few possibilities. OK, let me think." Isamu rubbed his chin for a moment, while Haruka took the opportunity to inspect the surroundings. The building was half car showroom, half high tech garage, with at least fifteen or sixteen mechanics and engineers working on various projects, about a third of them female, the rest male. They ranged in age from one young boy who was probably only a couple of years older than Hotaru to a white-haired woman who could have been her grandmother, elbow deep in the guts of a massively modified Impreza WRX sitting on a rolling road dynamometer. Haruka watched with amusement as the old woman made some adjustment or other, before nodding to a much younger man, who started the vehicle, then revved it up.

The crackling scream of the engine was ample proof that it wasn't factory spec, as were the impressive flames popping from the exhaust. Both the woman and the man watched the screen of the test rig, smiling at each other. "Try the nitrous," the woman shouted over the roar of the running vehicle. Seconds later the roar rose instantly to a bellow as the flames from the exhaust lengthened, while a brightening glow from under the car betrayed an exhaust that was becoming red hot. After a short time the car was turned off, one last bang sounding as excess fuel burned off, then relative quiet fell after a few echoes around the garage. Haruka lowered her fingers from her ears, having put them there pretty fast after the test started.

The elderly mechanic looked at the screen and grinned widely. "Not bad. More than twice the factory power and sixty percent more torque. And it didn't blow up this time!" The younger man laughed, looking pleased. Shaking her head in mild wonder, Haruka turned to their host, who was watching with amusement.

"You seem to have people who know what they're doing," she commented as the group resumed walking.

"We do indeed. We've been modifying cars for more than forty years here. Akemi over there worked for my father before I took over this place. She's been working on high performance engines for longer than I've been alive." He laughed for a moment. "Seventy years old and she knows more about engine management systems than anyone else I know. Nissan and Toyota both tried to hire her, but she prefers to work here, luckily for me. I don't know what I'll do when she retires." He shook his head slightly. "Although I doubt she ever will. She'll die with a torque wrench in her hand and a smile on her face, I think."

Leading them to the rear of the garage, he walked along a row of cars parked next to each other under dust sheets, the cloth shrouding the outlines enough to make most of them unrecognisable.
Haruka worked out what a couple of them were even so, but drew a blank on the rest. "Hmm. Let's see. How about this." He carefully pulled one dust sheet aside, Misaki helping, to reveal a very shiny blue vehicle. "An Impreza, very much like the one Akemi is working on over there. She did this one as well. Not quite as powerful, it doesn't have the nitrous for a start, but very nice. All wheel drive, something like fifty percent more power than stock, nice stereo, leather seats." He looked at Haruka as she studied the vehicle slightly dubiously. Before she had a chance to say anything, he shook his head.

"No. Not quite right, I see. All right." He and Misaki quickly replaced the cover. Moving to another car three down, he removed the cloth from it. "This one is nice. BMW Z3M roadster, 3.2 litre straight six engine. We added a huge turbo, which makes it damn quick. Not that it was slow to start with." Haruka studied the deep red vehicle with interest.

"It's very nice," she admitted, moving closer and peering inside the car. "Very nice indeed."

"But not quite what you're looking for, obviously," Isamu stated, watching her with a slight smile. "Don't worry, we're not done yet." He replaced the cover, then turned to the next vehicle in line. "Now this one is nice. Nineteen ninety-six Nissan Skyline GT-R Nismo. Quite rare. Very quick even in stock form, which this one isn't, of course. Bored out to 2.8 litres, bigger turbo, new ECU, a number of other modifications. It's nearly a hundred kilos lighter than it started as and one of the fastest vehicles I've got. Nice colour as well."

Haruka nodded again, peering at the pearlescent paint from close range. It looked more or less gold in indirect lighting but when the sunlight from the nearby skylight hit it, it turned a remarkable series of blue to purple shades. "I've heard of this paint, but this is the first time I've ever seen it. It's amazing."

"And incredibly expensive," Isamu noted with a slight grimace. "The stuff is about a hundred thousand yen per litre. I'd like to use it more because it really does look nice but most people get worried when I tell them how much it will cost. This was an experiment."

Opening the door, Haruka slid into the racing seat, putting her hands on the wheel and looking around the cabin. "I had the same seats in my car," she noted sadly. "Although I didn't have the racing harness." Leaning in the door, watching her, Isamu smiled.

"I can give you a very good price on this one if you're interested," he said. She thought about it seriously for a few seconds. Eventually she shook her head, somewhat regretfully.

"It's lovely, but not quite right, I'm afraid."

"OK. No hurry. I've still got a few decent possibilities." She got out, closing the door carefully, then took one last look at the car, not sure she was right to reject it.

Pulling off another cover, Isamu indicated the vehicle thus revealed, smiling slightly. "Personally this is one of my favourites. It's a nineteen eighty-two Chevrolet Corvette C3, the last year they made that one, with the V8 engine from a ninety-three Corvette ZR-1. Heavily modified by us, of course. Left hand drive with an automatic gearbox, twin turbochargers, uprated brakes, suspension, steering rack, and tyres. Pretty, fast, and surprisingly reliable. But I'll admit rather fuel hungry, the engine is large and was somewhat thirsty even before the turbos were added."

Haruka walked around the light green vehicle, running her hand over it gently, then peering inside. "I've always liked this model, the shape is nicer than the later ones," she commented, making both Misaki and the garage owner nod.
"I would have to agree. It's good looking, certainly."

Stepping back, she studied the car, before finally shaking her head. "Nice, very nice, but still not quite there." Isamu shrugged, smiling.

"Fair enough. It's not for everyone." He pulled the cover back on, with Misaki's help again.

"What's under this one?" Hotaru called from the far end of the row of shrouded vehicles, pointing at one that was in the corner by itself. Haruka looked over, noting that whatever it was, the hood was amazingly long relative to the length of the car. Misaki glanced at Isamu, who smiled a little, looking both amused and sad.

"Ah, my dear, that was an experiment. A Frankenstein, if you like. We did something horrible and that's what came out the end. It's a monster."

Looking intrigued, the young woman prodded the cover curiously. "But what is it?" she asked. Haruka studied the outline of the car under the cover. She could only think of one vehicle that had that exact shape. Walking over, she looked at it more closely, then turned to Isamu and Misaki who had followed her.

"It looks like an E type Jaguar," she commented. "One of the first series."

"You have a good eye," he chuckled. "But you're not quite right." Studying her for a second he shrugged. "Here, I'll show you." He pulled the cover off, rolling it up and placing it on the floor.

"Good grief," Haruka muttered, staring.

"That's the most beautiful car I've ever seen," Hotaru breathed in wonder, staring as well. Haruka could only agree.

"The E type is probably the most beautiful shape anyone ever made for a car," Isamu said quietly. "Enzo Ferrari himself said that when they launched it in the sixties. It's a pity that the quality of the rest of it was somewhat... indifferent. Lots of power, extremely fast, but unreliable, prone to killing the driver with no warning, little things like that. And they rusted easily."

"They're worth quite a lot now," Haruka noted. He nodded.

"Give it a few years and they'll be real collectors cars, they'll end up worth a huge amount. Not this one, though." Moving closer Haruka looked inside the vehicle. It was definitely one of the first series judging by the streamlined headlight covers, but when she inspected the interior she didn't find anything that she expected.

"That's not original equipment," she noted. He laughed.

"Not even close. Like I said, this thing is a horrible monster, poor car." She straightened up and turned to him as he continued. "The original vehicle was imported to Japan a long time ago, as far as I could find out in the seventies sometime. It broke down, was fixed, broke down again, got fixed again... Pretty standard for Jaguar. Then, it caught fire. Gutted the engine compartment. The owner gave up, but he'd spent so much money he couldn't bear to scrap it, so he stuck it into storage. I found it nearly fifteen years ago and got it for almost nothing. It sat around for nine or ten years, I kept meaning to rebuild it, but never got around to it. Eventually, we decided to do something with the thing."

"When we looked into it, we found that the body was in surprisingly good condition, but the engine and gearbox were scrap. The interior was in horrible shape as well. We decided in the end to play with it. Stripped the whole thing down completely, sand-blasted the body panels, repaired any damage, widened the wheel arches to accept larger tyres, hot galvanised the entire body to stop it rusting, then repainted it. The hood and the roof were replaced with carbon fibre since the originals were too badly damaged to fix. I couldn't find a worthwhile original engine, but about that time we had a severely crash-damaged Honda NSX come in. The body was unrepairable but the power train was pretty much undamaged."

He grinned, looking pleased. "We got creative, machined up a lot of new parts, and managed to transplant the entire thing into this body-shell. It's basically an NSX with an E-type body, but we also added the electronic stability system from a Toyota S150, the HUD from the same car, a custom electronic dashboard, things like that. Then we modified the engine a lot, put a high boost supercharger on it because I had a spare one lying around, added a custom eight speed gearbox, and so on. Interestingly, the thing is actually substantially lighter than the original, mostly due to the engine weight being considerably less. Better balanced, too." Haruka nodded slowly, listening with interest, as she studied the car, walking around it a couple of times.

He added, "Akemi put nitrous on as well because she's insane."

"Hey!" The cry of annoyance from the other side of the garage made him chuckle.

"And has amazingly good hearing for an old woman."

"Don't you forget it, sonny," the elderly mechanic shouted, laughing to herself. Haruka snickered.

"So it's about four or five cars in one?"

"Pretty much. I would think the Jaguar and NSX owners clubs would both want it cleansed with fire," Isamu replied with a grin.

"Does it actually work?" she asked curiously.

"Oh, hell, yes," he said, shivering a little. "But it's absolutely crazy. We had no idea how over the top it would end up. If you drive it carefully on the road it's fine, the fuel consumption is a bit high, but it's surprisingly docile. But..." He shivered again. "Push it, and it bites. Hard. The supercharger is bad enough, but the nitrous is just overkill. Even with the wider wheels it will wheelspin in sixth gear if you're not careful. You need the reflexes of a cat to drive the damn thing anywhere near its limits without ending up spinning out, even with the traction control and the improved brakes, suspension, and weight distribution. It's very quick. The acceleration is incredible, I drove it once. You wouldn't get me into it again on a bet."

She studied the car with interest. "Hmm."

"No one else who's ever driven it has been able to keep it in a straight line on a track either," Isamu added. "Including at least one formula one driver. He was shaking when he got out. Poor guy nearly pissed himself. There are faster cars, or more powerful ones, but I don't think I've ever seen one that was as fast and as powerful and as beautiful all at the same time. Especially street legal ones. Pity it's almost undriveable."

Misaki looked at Haruka, then turned to the garage owner. "Can we take it on the track for a test drive?" she asked. He glanced at her with some shock.

"Well, I suppose if anyone could handle it, a magical girl could," he finally admitted. "Although your friend could kill herself with the thing. I'm not kidding, it's a very dangerous car if you're not careful."
"I think we'll be all right," she assured him. He studied her for a moment then nodded.

"OK. Since it's you. Please don't kill yourselves." He turned and called one of the mechanics over, asking him to get a charged battery for the car, then went away to retrieve the key.

"You should power up, I think," Misaki said quietly to Haruka once her friend was out of earshot. "He's serious, I've talked to people about this thing, you'll need magical girl reflexes and toughness if it all goes wrong. Hotaru showed you how to do it without the uniform, right?"

"Yes," Haruka told the other woman, enabling the magical boost.

"It's a really pretty car," Hotaru commented, also powering up. "I think you should get it. I like the colour as well."

Haruka had to agree, the metallic flake black paint with electric blue highlights and trim was very attractive, dozens of layers of lacquer giving a depth and gloss to it that was extraordinarily beautiful. Someone had obviously spent a lot of time on it. "It reminds me of Yori's hair," her daughter laughed. Misaki grinned, amused, while Haruka sighed a little.

"Oh, wonderful. A Yori-car. It's going to kill all of us."

"Only if you annoy it," Misaki snickered.

They exchanged looks, then laughed for a few seconds. "They have a track?" Haruka asked, impressed.

"Yes, it's not huge, but big enough for this sort of thing. There are several companies who use it for testing and Toyota sometimes borrows it as well," Misaki told her. "There's a large part of this industrial estate that was knocked down to be rebuilt years ago but no one ever got around to it. About ten years back the various car companies around here clubbed together to build a test track on it since it was available. It's just under five kilometres long in total, with a one and a half kilometre straight, then lots of twisty bits and shorter runs around the edges. It's not bad for testing things although it's nowhere near big enough for a real race. Good fun, though. They've built around it in the last five years or so in a few places."

"Interesting," she replied, meaning it. Isamu came back at that point accompanied by the mechanic carrying a fresh battery, which he quickly installed and connected. Getting into the car, the mechanic carefully inserted the key, turning it on, which prompted a large number of displays to light up. Haruka watch from beside the vehicle, very interested. Gingerly pressing the start button the mechanic twitched slightly as the engine turned over, then caught immediately with a rumble. Gently pressing the throttle he smiled as the rumble instantly rose to a scream and went back to a steady tick-over when he took his foot off the pedal. Haruka listened with a smile on her face. There was something about the scream of the engine accompanied by the whine of the supercharger which sounded very nice to her.

"Straight-through large bore exhausts," Isamu said, "and a lightened crank with forged titanium alloy con-rods, valves, and pistons. Lots of other modifications, about the only original part is the engine block. We really went a bit overboard on the thing, we threw in every trick we could think of. The original engine red-lined at eight thousand RPM, this one we tested to twelve thousand. It's almost a formula one engine in some respects. Incredibly responsive, but if we did our job right, it should be much more reliable than a normal racing engine. After the first test drives and once we'd recovered we stripped it down to check it, everything was working perfectly, so it all went back together again. But it's only got about fifteen hours of actual driving on it after something like five years." He shivered a little. "No one who's ever been in it wants to try again."
Several of the other occupants of the business had wandered over and were watching from a safe distance, including Akemi, who seemed both interested and amused, with a certain amount of worry added. Haruka glanced at Misaki who was grinning with interest herself. "Where's this track?" she asked.

"We go out that rear door and about two hundred metres," the other woman said, indicating a large roller door at the back of the garage, which the mechanic who had put the battery in the vehicle was heading towards having gotten out of the car. He arrived at it, pressing a button on the control box beside it, which caused the door to slowly rumble up into the ceiling with a clanking of chains and gears.

"Please be careful, ladies," Isamu said, staring at the car. "I'd prefer not to damage the thing, but I'd much prefer not to damage any of you with it."

Smiling, Misaki patted him on the shoulder. "We'll be fine, Isamu. Don't worry." She rubbed her hands together eagerly. "I've always wanted to see what this thing was like to drive. Come on, Haruka, let's find out."

The blonde nodded, smiling a little, feeling happier than she had for months. She still wasn't sure the car was something she wanted to own but it was certainly something she wanted to drive.
Pulling out a fifty-yen piece she balanced it on her thumb. "Heads or tails?" she asked, grinning.
Misaki laughed.

"Tails."

Catching the coin as it descended after the flip, Haruka looked at it, then at the other woman, before bowing and waving at the vehicle. "After you."

With a laugh Misaki slid into the driving seat, fastening her harness, while Haruka did the same on the other side. Hotaru watched with a smile on her face. "I want a ride later," she called. Haruka nodded, closing the door, then inspected the inside of the cockpit.

"Wow. They went all out on the instruments," she commented.

"Damn right," Misaki chuckled. "It's like the inside of a fighter plane. I'm half-expecting a targeting display." Both of them laughed while she poked buttons to see what happened. Eventually she grinned as the HUD came up, displaying RPM, torque curves, speed, and a few other things, in a discreet but easily visible green overlay on the windscreen. "Cool. That's really nice."

When Isamu tapped on the window she pressed the button to lower it. He stuck his head inside the cabin. "There's no one using the track for the next couple of hours so you can go out whenever you want," he said. "I've told the fire guys to stand by just in case." This prompted a laugh from Misaki and made him wink. "That's the nitrous button," he added, pointing to one on the steering wheel which had a sliding cover over it. "The one on the other side arms it. I would strongly suggest you don't use it, but if you do, make sure you're going in a straight line first. You probably won't be for long, but..." Stepping back he shrugged.

"Thanks, Isamu," Misaki said, raising her voice a little over the sound of the engine. "See you in a bit." She put the car in gear, gently pressed the accelerator, let the clutch out carefully, and got the car moving, manoeuvring past the other vehicles towards the door to the outside. "It feels very light," she commented to her companion. "Responsive and civilised, really, like any decent modern car."

"Good," Haruka replied, watching the instruments with interest. "I've seen some tweaked track vehicles that were hopeless on the road. It makes them useless for day to day driving."

"I think you could probably commute with this if you stayed away from hard acceleration." Easing the thing outside, Misaki looked around, then slowly drove down the access road to the track, Isamu, Hotaru, and half the mechanics following. One of them jogged past to open the chain-link gate to the track, waving them through. She drove onto the track and turned the vehicle so it was aligned with the centre-line, before stopping. Both of them looked at the stretch of empty road in front of them, visible over the long, low hood, the black paint glittering in the sun, then exchanged glances. "Why do I have the urge to say something about Detroit, sunglasses and police?" Misaki asked with a grin.

"No idea," Haruka laughed. She pulled a pair of sunglasses from her pocket, putting them on carefully, which made Misaki giggle, then settled herself comfortably. "Hit it."

Chuckling, her companion let up on the clutch while throttling up. The whine of the supercharger was almost drowned out by the engine screaming into life as the car shot forward, tyres smoking, the back end twitching sideways. Inhumanly fast reflexes arrested the slide almost before it started, the steering wheel moving in small quick motions, while Misaki changed up rapidly through the gearbox. Acceleration pressed both of them back in the seat. Laughing with delight, the two magical girls roared off down the track in the one-off vehicular mash-up, leaving a number of people coughing slightly as the rubber smoke drifted over them.

"What the hell is that?" Markus turned to his companion Souta, who looked mystified, both of them listening to the screaming roar with a high-pitched whine overlaid on it which echoed around the building, growing to a crescendo, then dopplerizing away in a manner that suggested considerable speed.

"I have no idea," the other man said in his accented English. One of his colleagues from the car design company Markus was visiting laughed, saying something in Japanese. Souta looked surprised, then turned to the other man. "Taichi says it's a monster from the depths of Matsuda Tuning. They're a group of insane car modifiers a few doors down," They listened to the noise, which was growing fainter, a few squeals of tyres sliding intermittently coming to them. "Let's go and see what he's talking about." Pushing their chairs back from the workstation on which Souta had been showing the current status of the work commissioned by Markus' company, both of them stood up and headed for the door, Taichi following. Outside Souta led them around the rear of the three story building which backed onto some sort of track, a tall chain-link fence with a heavy barrier just the other side of it between them and the tarmac.

"There are quite a lot of small but fairly well off car companies in the vicinity," Souta explained as they walked down the slight hill to the fence. "A number of them got together a few years ago and built this for testing purposes. It gets used a few times a week. But I've never heard anything like that before." The sound was now fairly faint, coming to them from somewhere off to the left, behind a set of buildings that were in the middle of the track. It echoed weirdly around the estate, the sound bouncing from building to building, reminding Markus quite strongly of the time he'd watched the Monte Carlo F1 race from next to the course.

He could see that there were little groups of people scattered around the place next to the fence, all of them looking in the same direction, some of them holding cameras and camcorders, apparently also workers from local companies who had been attracted by the sound. The distant scream changed, the vehicle, whatever it was, shifting down rapidly, then started building again. In the distance, hundred of metres away down the long straight which he could see they were roughly at the mid-point of, a shiny black car came into view from behind a building. The car accelerated hard towards them, the engine howling up in pitch at an extraordinary rate as the driver skilfully stepped through the gears. He counted six transitions and it was obvious that it hadn't been in first gear when it came around the tight corner.

The whining note overlaid on the engine scream was easily audible. "It's got one huge supercharger on it, whatever it is," he said loudly to his companions. Souta nodded absently, shading his eyes with one hand as he peered into the distance. Taichi was watching through a pair of binoculars.

"It certainly sounds like that," he agreed. They watched as the car approached at a speed he estimated at being well past a hundred and fifty miles an hour, still accelerating. Just before it reached them, there was a sudden change in the engine note which got much louder, following which the vehicle jumped forward with new purpose, the tyres chirping even in top gear as they momentarily broke free. The driver showed enormous skill by holding the car steady, only a slight twitch betraying the boost in power as it shot past at some ridiculous speed, blue flame coming from the twin exhausts. He recognised the distinctive shape even as he involuntarily ducked from the blast of noise and wind when the car rocketed past, the engine sound dropping rapidly in pitch.

"Holy... That was an old E-type!" They watched the car roar away, the flames dying off, then change down and power slide around the bend at the end of the straight, being held in a drift with amazing skill. It vanished behind the buildings again.

"Who the hell is driving that thing, Schumacher? And what on earth is it? It's certainly not an original E-type. They were quick, but not that quick."

"I have no idea," Souta admitted, staring after the vehicle with an open mouth. His colleague said something, sounding impressed. "Taichi said there were two women in it. The one driving was grinning like an idiot and the other one was laughing."

They exchanged a look of wonder, then turned to look in the other direction, waiting for the vehicle to reappear.

Harrison watched as Yori studied the photo, a slight frown on her face. "Hmm. Somewhere in Texas, I think," she mumbled, tracing out the symbols with her finger. She thought hard for a while, then had a conversation in Japanese with Aiko, who was also staring at the image. Fumiko was off to the side listening quietly, with Agent Tinnin and Captain Martinez watching the whole affair. "OK, we're pretty sure it's somewhere to the north of Amarillo, about ten kilometres outside it. We should be within a few hundred metres of the place and can track it from the residual magical signature to get a more precise location."

Captain Martinez pulled a large scale atlas of the US from his bookshelf to the side of his desk and opened it, leafing through until he found the right page. Aiko and Yori looked carefully at it then the latter put her finger on a spot. "Right about there." Aiko nodded confirmation.

Agent Tinnin pulled out his cell phone. "I'll call the Amarillo resident agency and get a team to meet us there." Looking closely at the book, he said, "It looks like that's probably some sort of industrial park or warehouses. Makes sense." Dialling, he had a short conversation, then put the device back in his pocket. "Lieutenant, it's out of your jurisdiction, but if you want to come I have no objections." Harrison looked at his captain who nodded.

"Take something a little more powerful than your sidearm, lieutenant," the captain suggested. "Just in case."

"I'll be back in a moment," Harrison replied, leaving the office. Shortly he returned wearing a bulletproof vest, handing another to Tinnin who put it on with muttered thanks, and with a pump-action shotgun slung over his shoulder. "Deer slugs, they should do if we have trouble," he commented, unslinging the weapon and quickly loading it.

"Most likely," Tinnin replied, smiling a little. He looked at the three young women. "I suppose you're all bulletproof anyway?"

"Pretty much," Yori grinned. "Against something light like that we won't have any issues."

The FBI man shook his head in wonder, then turned to the captain who was watching closely. "I'll make sure your man gets back safely. There's probably nothing there now anyway but I want to be sure."

"Good luck," Martinez said. The two exchanged nods, then at Aiko's urging clustered together. Blinking at the flash, Martinez sighed a little, then sat at his desk studying the atlas.

"I don't think we need to track magical signatures," Harrison remarked, looking at the huge column of flames pouring out of a warehouse a quarter of a mile down the road they found themselves beside, lighting the entire area brightly. Half a dozen fire trucks were pouring water on it. Beside him Tinnin wobbled a little, gratefully taking the bottle of water Fumiko wordlessly handed him and drinking from it.

"I guess not," Yori muttered. "For what it's worth, that's definitely the destination of the teleport. They went all out to cover their tracks." When the FBI agent had recovered, the group began walking towards the conflagration, Tinnin showing his badge when they reached the police line blocking access. The sergeant in charge examined it briefly, looked them over, shrugged, then let them through. A few minutes later while they were watching the fire being slowly extinguished two government issue SUVs pulled up with lights flashing, disgorging several more FBI agents armed to the teeth.

Tinnin went to talk to them while the others studied the burning warehouse. "That's an impressive fire," Aiko said, "it looks like they must have set incendiary charges all around the walls from the way it's burning. It doesn't seem to want to go out either."

"I doubt there with be much usable evidence left after this," Harrison sighed. "Another dead end. Damn it, I'm almost impressed with these bastards. They're thorough if nothing else."

"Sure looks that way," Yori agreed, scowling. "Annoying."

Rejoining them, Tinnin watched the warehouse burn for a moment, then turned to the little group. "The fire started about thirty minutes after the presumed time of death of the three prisoners, which fits with the timeline we've worked out. I'm guessing it took about ten minutes to make that diagram, spell, whatever, then more or less no time to get here, with about twenty minutes to pack up and cover their tracks. We're going to trace the owner of the warehouse and see where that gets us but I'd lay money on it being a dead end as well, unless Ms Aoyama can do something weird."

"I'll ask her to check," Yori assured him.

"Thanks. She's creepy, but seems damned effective."

"You should also see about pulling any camera images for the surrounding area and see if there's any suspicious activity around here as well during that time period," Harrison suggested. Tinnin nodded.
"Yes, that's standard procedure. We might get lucky." He waved at the huge fire a hundred yards away which was giving off enough heat that Harrison was sweating from it. "When that's finally out and cooled down we'll go through it with a microscope, but I'd be surprised if there was much left that was helpful. We might get lucky, though."

"Worth a try," Aiko agreed. She glanced at him. "Back to LA, I guess?"

"Yes, please," Tinnin replied. "We can't do much here."

"OK." Once more they grouped together and flashed away.

Back in the LA police station, once more gathered in Captain Martinez' office, they all looked at each other for a while. "Well. We seem to have run out of ideas," Martinez finally said, having heard the story without much apparent surprise.

"There are still some avenues of approach but mostly it's going to be doing it the hard way," Tinnin grumped, looking annoyed. "If one of those damn people would obligingly make a mistake that would help but overall they seem to have a pretty good idea what to do. My guys will keep at it and I'll send you everything we find out."

"Thank you, Agent," the captain replied.

"Where are the remains of the truck Chou dealt with?" Yori suddenly asked, looking thoughtful.

"That horrifyingly small cube?" Harrison chuckled. "It's down in the evidence garage. Why?"

"Do you mind if I have a look at it?" the black-haired woman requested, not directly answering the question. He glanced at the captain who shrugged a little.

"OK. Are you expecting to find anything useful that we missed?" he asked. She sighed, shaking her head.

"Probably not, but I'm curious and it won't leave me alone until I check," she told him. Harrison led the way down several floors to the garage, where they found the roughly seven foot cube of metal and plastic that was what was left of a fairly large truck that Chou had become annoyed with. Yori looked at it and grinned. "Impressive. She's good with wards and comes up with some interesting applications for them."

Walking over to the wreckage, which showed signs of tool marks where the evidence technicians had made a start on gathering anything they could find, she ran her hand over it slowly, frowning lightly. "Hmm,"

"Something interesting?" Aiko asked curiously, joining her friend, as did Fumiko. Both of them also put their hands out and concentrated while Tinnin, Martinez, and Harrison watched with interest. "Ah. Yes, there's something in there somewhere isn't there?"

"Yep. I'm betting it's a shielded power storage unit, intact somehow." Yori looked pleased. "There's not a lot of power in it which is why Chou didn't detect it from across the street. My guess is barely enough to run the teleport spell." She looked over her shoulder at the three watching men. "That would have been their way out. I'd think they probably already had the spell inscribed inside the truck, and as soon as they were all inside it, they'd activate it. You wouldn't have had any warning at all, they'd just have gone, leaving the truck behind."

She stepped back and studied the cubed vehicle. "Do you mind if I cut this open?" she asked.
"Go ahead," Martinez replied after exchanging a look with Tinnin, both of them seeming intrigued as to how she was proposing to do it. Harrison held up a hand, motioning for her to wait a moment, then poked around for a moment in an equipment locker to come back with a camera, which he raised.

"OK."

"Thanks," the young woman replied, walking around the mass of metal and looking at it carefully. "About there, I think," she added, drawing a line down it with her finger, which left a glowing purple mark hanging in the air. Harrison grinned at the expressions his colleagues were now wearing, snapping a couple of shots. "Aiko, can you hold that side, and Fumiko the other one? I don't want it crashing down and breaking the storage unit." Both the other girls moved to brace the sides of the cube. Taking a position directly in front of the mark she'd made, Yori held out her hand, a brilliant purple shaft of light sprouting from it, nearly eight feet long. Tinnin made a choked sound of shock.

Carefully moving the energy blade along the line, Yori casually sliced the cube more or less in half, then made the blade disappear. After a few seconds the glowing metal had cooled enough that she prised the two parts away from each other with her hands, several tons of metal scraping across the concrete with a screech. "It's in this piece," she said, indicating the right half. While she supported it, Fumiko moved to help Aiko lift the other half out of the way and put it down on the floor, then they returned to support the remaining piece.

Yori repeated the action twice while Harrison documented everything using the camera, to end up with a distorted cube a couple of feet across. "This must contain the glove box, I think," she said, taking the lump of former truck over to a nearby bench and gently whittling it away with a short energy blade. After the first slice a faint yellow glow could be seen from inside. "Aha." Two more careful cuts and she reached in to a small void to retrieve a rather familiar looking yellow-glowing sphere. Harrison stared at it.

"Is it my imagination or have I seen something that looks exactly like that before?" he asked slowly.

"No, it's from the same source as that neat storage spell that the portal bombs were hidden in here and in New York," Yori confirmed, turning the ball in her fingers with a thoughtful look. "Nothing like as much energy in it as those two had, though." She produced an identical if rather more brightly glowing ball from somewhere. "This one has the storage spell built in, the new one is just a power store, but the same mage made both of them. Interesting."

"Did you ever track that mage down?" Harrison asked. She shook her head.

"No, I'm afraid I haven't yet. I looked for a while after the New Year but no one I showed it to recognised either the spell or the power signature, and in the end I put it to one side since the problem was apparently over. I was intending to try again at some point because I'm curious about the spell, it's a very good one, but haven't had time recently." She studied both spheres closely. "That's... a little odd," she added after a few seconds.

"What?" Tinnin asked curiously. Looking up at him, she waved the sphere she'd discovered in the remains of the truck.

"This one is much older than the other one, which is the one from outside Mann's. That one was probably made no more than a year before we found it, like the one in New York, I'd guess that our rogue mage got them both at the same time. This one, on the other hand, is probably close to a decade old. Right at the limit of how long it would store enough energy to run the teleport spell, in "Maybe the mage who made them has been in business for some time?" Aiko suggested. Yori considered the idea, then shook her head.

"That's probably completely true, mages tend to live a long time, but... Why would you sit on something like this for so long it nearly ran down without recharging it? That doesn't make much sense. It's not difficult, any half-way decent mage can store power in one of these things. That's the whole point." She glanced at Harrison as Aiko nodded, rubbing her chin. "I'd have to check those fragments again to be completely certain but I'm mostly sure that one was from the same source as well, and probably as old. It sort of implies that these people might have acquired a number of storage units quite a while ago and don't have any easy way to either get more or recharge these ones. Which in turn suggests they don't have a mage of their own."

"I suppose that's something," he replied thoughtfully.

"It's one more data point that may help build a picture of them and their movements," she agreed. "Although I'm not certain yet how helpful it really is. I'll start asking around again to see if I can trace the mage who made these. It may take a while."

"Every avenue of investigation helps, Yori," Tinnin told her, looking slightly happier than he had been up until now.

Captain Martinez was looking at the storage units pensively. "Is there any way to stop something like this happening again?" he asked after a few seconds of thought. Yori turned to him, then nodded.

"A decent anti-teleport ward should prevent something as crude as this spell working, yes. I can set one up for you if you want. It will need to be maintained regularly, every two or three years, but I can give you the name of a good local mage who can do that for you at a reasonable cost."

"Thank you. It's definitely bolting the stable door long after the horses have fucked off but if we do manage to grab any more of these bastards I want to eliminate that particular escape path." He looked annoyed, making her smile slightly.

"Fair enough, and a good idea." She vanished both spheres, then produced a new, completely transparent one. A moment's concentration and it began glowing the same purple most of her magical effects did, becoming quite bright. "This will power it. We need somewhere safe and secure to put the thing. Do you have an office safe?"

He nodded. "Yes, come on and I'll show you." They went back to his office where he opened the fairly small but very heavily built safe in the wall behind his desk. "Will this do?"

"Perfectly," she replied, looking at it. Sitting down she put the crystal sphere on his desk, concentrating on it for a few minutes. Everyone present felt something odd, the two magical girls apparently following the process with interest while the three men shivered a little at the sensation. "That should do it. It encloses the entire building and will prevent most forms of teleportation in or out of the building. Aiko's variant is a lot more difficult to block because it would need much more power available than this can hold, but then she's not going to be helping your prisoners." Yori grinned for a moment. "I threw in a fire prevention spell as well, the same one I use at home. It's a simple but effective one, most mages use something similar." She handed the sphere to Martinez. "As long as this is inside the building and powered up it will run the spells. It's got a durability spell on it so it's not fragile but you'll want to lock it away."
"Thank you, Yori," the captain said gratefully. He inspected the glowing ball with a certain amount of wonder, then carefully stashed it away at the back of his safe and relocked the thing. She wrote a name and number on one of his business cards that she plucked from the holder on his desk and gave that to him as well.

"This guy is pretty good at wards and security spells, several local museums and art galleries use him. Weirdly enough they're about the only people in the US who seem to have any business with magic although they generally keep it extremely quiet for various reasons. Give him my name and say I recommended him and he'll give you a good price on keeping that storage unit charged. I'll check it whenever I'm around as well, which I expect will happen occasionally what with one thing or another."

Martinez looked at the name, nodded, and put the card in his desk drawer. "Thanks again."

"No problem." Picking up the bag full of fragments she concentrated for a few seconds, then nodded. "Yep, it's the same as the one we just found, definitely. And probably about the same age and power level. Interesting." Putting it back on the desk she studied it for a moment thoughtfully, then shrugged slightly. "Not immediately helpful, though, which is a pity." She looked at her friends for a moment. "I don't think there's much more we can do here right now, I'm afraid. Until we have more leads as to where these people went or who they are, we're kind of at an impasse."

"Unfortunately true," Harrison remarked. "Thanks very much for coming over at such short notice."

She waved a hand. "Don't worry about it. I'm at least as concerned as you are about all this, especially since it seems to have something to do with that idiot mage and his cult. I was really hoping that particular little adventure was behind us and I'm not happy that it might not be, so I'm glad to help. We all are. I'll keep looking and if I find anything helpful I'll pass it on. Ms Aoyama will do the same in her own way." She stood, joining her friends.

"Do you need this for evidence?" she asked, producing the glowing power unit. "If you can do without it for a while at least I could use it in yet another attempt to track down who made the thing."

Martinez thought for a moment, then glanced at Tinnin, who shrugged after a few seconds. "It's something we may require when this all finally comes to court, if it ever gets that far," the agent noted with a small grimace, "but at the moment, no, the FBI doesn't need it. The FBI doesn't really believe in it, in fact, and would have been perfectly happy never to have to deal with magic." Yori grinned at him, getting a tired smile back, then glanced at Martinez, who nodded his agreement.

"We don't have an immediate need for it either, for much the same reason. It would be rather difficult to use in court in any case, to be honest."

"OK. Let me know if you do need it, I'll get it back to you, but for now I'll hang onto it." She made it go away again. "Unless you have any more questions we'll have to be going. Give my best to Emily and Serena, Richard." She smiled at him.

"I will do," he smiled back. "Thanks again."

"You're welcome. Agent Tinnin, it was nice to meet you," the young woman replied, glancing at the FBI agent, who nodded to her.

"Likewise."
"See you." The three men looked away and the usual flash came and went.

A few seconds of silence passed in the office. "I told you they were decent people, Mark," Harrison commented to the FBI man, who appeared deep in thought. Tinnin looked up, then nodded again.

"You did. I'd agree, although I also see why the people in New York were so worried. Did you see what she did to that damn truck?" He looked slightly sick. "That was absolutely horrifying."

Grinning, Harrison shrugged. "True, but at least she's on our side."

"Or we're on hers. I haven't decided yet," the agent muttered, making both LAPD people chuckle.

With a small sigh, Tinnin looked around the office, then at both the other men, before straightening his jacket. "It's late, there's nothing else we can do without more information, so I'm going home. I'll keep in touch and let you know if our enquiries shed any light on anything to do with this clusterfuck of a case."

"Thank you, Agent," Martinez sighed, shaking his head slightly. "We will do the same, of course. As soon as the pathologist has any more information, which should be tomorrow morning...?" He glanced at Harrison, who nodded slightly. "...We'll send it to you. Hopefully a cause of death can be established which may help as well."

"I should have thought to ask Yori about that as well," Harrison noted with mild self-irritation. "Her medical skills probably translate into some sort of super-pathologist as well as everything else." He grinned a little, shrugging as the other two gave him an odd look. "Well, they might do, right?"

"I really have no idea at all what her limitations are, or those of her friends," Tinnin replied with a small amount of grouchiness, obviously not entirely happy about that fact. "No one I've spoken to does either. It's annoying."

"I doubt it matters, Lieutenant," Martinez told his subordinate, after looking slightly amused for a moment at the FBI man's irritation. "Our people may not have weird magical powers but they're still very competent. I'm sure they'll work it out. On the off chance they can't we can ask for her help again, she seems more than willing to aid us."

"She is that," Harrison agreed.

"I suggest that the Agent is correct, we all need to sleep on this. It's no longer a priority matter in some ways as the trail seems to have gone cold so we might as well go home and deal with it again later."

"I still want a go at Bouchard, though," Tinnin commented as he headed for the door, stopping with his hand on the knob and looking back at them. "Just in case we can squeeze something helpful out of him. Or at least to give him as much of a headache as I have right now." He looked darkly pleased at the idea, making Harrison chuckle.

"We have no problem with that, Agent Tinnin," the captain assured him, also smiling a little. "We've extracted everything we need from him to build our own case for the bribery charges and all the other ones, so you're welcome to him."

"I'll arrange prisoner transport for tomorrow, in that case," the FBI agent replied. Sighing, he added, "Hopefully he won't vanish into thin air or mysteriously drop dead overnight."
"He's under twenty-four hour watch by several trusted officers so I'm fairly sure neither of those things will happen," Harrison assured him. Satisfied, the man nodded a goodbye to them both then left, quietly closing the door behind him.

The two left in the office both sat down, almost identical sighs of annoyance coming from them. After a few seconds, Martinez raised his eyes from the evidence bag on his desk to look at his lieutenant. "What a damn pain in the ass this all is."

"One way to put it," Harrison grunted, also staring at the bag. Reaching out, he picked it up, feeling the crystal shards for a second or two, then stood. "I'll check this back into Evidence then I'm heading home, sir."

Martinez nodded, waving a hand at him. "Go. Give Emily and Serena my best. I'm going home as well."

"See you in the morning." Harrison wandered off, leaving the older man thinking for a while, before he got up, retrieved his own jacket from the coat-stand in the corner, turned the lights off, and headed home, wondering when the world had stopped making sense.

He missed it, sense.

Oh, well. Life was like that sometimes.

"Where do you think they got the power units from?" Nabiki asked her brother-in-law,

"I'm not sure, really," he replied with a somewhat tired tone in his voice. "Like I told Richard and the others, the storage units themselves are pretty cheap and widely available, that particular design is one of the more common ones. Kas and I have a fair number of them each because they come in handy sometimes, like they did just now with warding the LAPD station. Any normal mage probably stocks them by the dozen. There are more complex versions around but they tend to get used for fairly unusual applications so you don't run into them very often."

"As a result the things themselves are basically so generic that tracing who bought them is almost impossible. Like trying to find out who bought a specific light bulb. You might manage it but it wouldn't necessarily tell you anything."

"Not to mention that they can be recharged over and over and often change hands so even if you did trace the original manufacturer or purchaser you might not be any closer to finding out who the current owner is," Kasumi put in.

"Also true," he admitted sourly. "So, what it all adds up to is that they could have got them from almost any mage or other magic worker on the planet, one way or another. Or from someone on the other side of a portal, of course, since that's where pretty much all the manufacturers actually are. It doesn't help all that much even if we find it out."

"That particular teleportation spell is also annoyingly common," the elder Tendo said musingly. "It's not a particularly good one, it's something of an energy hog even in teleportation terms and has definite range limitations as well but it's fairly simple all things considered and can be taught quite easily, even to a non-mage. Assuming you have some way to power it and know how to do so of course. We can assume that at least one of their party had that knowledge based on the results."

"Or whoever got them the thing had it, assuming they had external aid," Nabiki suggested slowly.

"Yes, that's certainly possible." Ranma sounded thoughtful. "I was initially thinking that it was a mage they had on the payroll, because it would be pretty easy for even a half-way trained one to get into somewhere without any wards and only a few security cameras and mechanical locks, but..." He trailed off for a moment, apparently considering the thought. "No, the presence of those old storage units tends to argue against that, I think. If they had a mage on staff, they'd almost certainly have fresh ones. I can't see any sensible reason for that not to be the case. So it probably means that assuming someone actually did come in from outside, they had some other means to fool the security systems other than their own magical abilities."

"Which might even be down to good old-fashioned spycraft," she replied. "I suspect I could probably have done it when I was in high school, or had a good chance, anyway. I learned some interesting things in the old days." Nabiki smiled to herself, thinking about all the things she'd done. "Good social engineering to get passwords, a little careful shoulder surfing, some basic hacking... It's possible. The camera system would be more difficult than the actual physical entry. Teleporting away with them would be the obvious extraction method in that case."

"Sister, you have a more chequered past than I realised," Kasumi giggled. Nabiki snickered silently.

"I know you thought of me as a complete innocent but believe it or not I did do a few things that were probably... a bit naughty." There was laughter over the link from both her sister and Ranma at her dry words.

"Oddly enough I'm not surprised," the latter responded equally dryly. "We all have interesting pasts, as you know. But yes, you're right, it's not all that difficult to get into some places that really should be more secure. People don't tend to break into police stations very often, it's normally more the opposite, so they sometimes end up being a little lax as a result. It might be just that simple."

Jun chose that moment to interrupt. Nabiki, I have finished checking all the recorded images from the cameras in the LAPD facility and every other relevant camera for a ten kilometre radius centred on it. Much of the data is of very low quality and required considerable post-processing. It involved some forty-six thousand three hundred cameras over a better than three hundred square kilometre area, totalling nearly two million hours of video. I have made an interesting discovery as a result. It popped up a window showing recorded video which seemed to be an external view of the police station from a distance with a number of people walking around. One particular figure was highlighted, a uniformed officer heading towards the building. Nabiki quickly told Ranma and Kasumi she was talking to Jun and would get back to them, then closed her link to the pair, concentrating on what the SI was telling her.

This person is Officer Tom Bowie, who has worked for the LAPD for six years and is currently assigned to custody booking. He has legitimate access to the cells our missing conspirators were in. The man walked along, not particularly hurriedly, looking about and occasionally waving to someone he seemed to know. The view followed him from camera to camera as he approached the station, some which were obviously traffic cameras, some inside shops, all processed to give a continuous video feed in an impressive demonstration of what the SI could do.

She looked at the time stamp on the images, which were much clearer than she suspected the police themselves would be able to manage, seeing that they were from two days ago. 'OK, so he could be a potential way to get something to them,' she replied after watching the video for a moment. 'I assume that's what you're getting at? But so far they have interviewed most of the staff and haven't discovered any inside help, and I'd guess that someone in his position would be about the first one checked.'

Actually, he hasn't yet been interviewed, his shift ended approximately two hours before the bodies were discovered and he hasn't been back to work yet. He's on Lieutenant Harrison's list to be interviewed tomorrow morning when he clocks in. If you look at this other sequence... the machine said with an air of one who knew something interesting but didn't want to give the game away just yet, which made her smile inside. It produced a second window, showing the same person doing more or less exactly the same thing as the first one, only dated earlier today, LA time. There is something very odd going on. She looked hard at the images, seeing the same man walking along, then entering the station, the interior view showing him heading into the cell area. She thought hard, comparing the two videos which were steadily looping, a faint suspicion beginning to niggle at her.

'Can you zoom in on his face?' she asked slowly.

To a limited degree, yes, the SI replied, producing a pair of new windows showing a sequence of stills from cameras that had a particularly good shot of the officer's head and shoulders. There were only a few that were good enough to really count, but it was enough to clearly identify him

'It certainly looks like the same man,' she said after a little more study. 'But it isn't, is it?'

No. Gait analysis shows that these are two different individuals, although they are extremely close in physical dimensions and facial characteristics. The source cameras are not of sufficiently high quality or optical ability to allow iris recognition, unfortunately, and lack the facilities for thermal blood vessel matching or other more advanced techniques, but there is a ninety-three point four percent probability that the more recent images are those of someone wearing a very high quality facial prosthetic to mimic the appearance of Officer Bowie. It produced a graphic showing a comparison between two different skeletal figures, which clearly showed there was a subtle difference in the way they walked when slowed down.

'Wow. Right out of Mission Impossible,' she said, impressed despite herself. There was a feeling of amusement from Jun.

Indeed. It is a very effective subterfuge under the circumstances. It wouldn't work against better security systems, but the sort of security the LAPD uses currently could well fall to such a technique assuming the person involved was sufficiently well briefed.

'Any idea who it really is?' she asked curiously. The video windows vanished, a head shot of a mid thirties Caucasian man popping up to replace them, which she studied while stirring her sauce on the stove.

I believe so. This is Charles Jackson, former covert operations officer of the UK Secret Intelligence Service, or MI6. Based on the criteria we have so far established for our purported conspiracy, such as former members of a governmental intelligence agency from one of the major countries who have disappeared under somewhat suspect circumstances without leaving a verifiable body behind in the last fifteen years, he is a good match. Additionally his biometric characteristics are an almost perfect match to those of the second individual. The data I have been able to locate is somewhat out of date which would in all probability explain the slight discrepancy, as he was reported missing during an undercover operation in the former Soviet republic of Turkmenistan just before the Gulf War. He was suspected of being a double agent at the time and was about to face an inquiry, but his disappearance was under circumstances that suggested he was killed even though no body was recovered. MI6 closed the case after a year-long operation with no conclusive outcome.

The image changed to a full body one, next to one of Officer Bowie, measurements showing that they were remarkably close in body size and proportions. 'So if it is this Jackson guy, as a former covert agent he'd probably have the skills required to pull something like this off, I guess,' she mused, turning the heat on the stove down to allow the sauce to simmer, then moving to the next task automatically.

I believe so. His specialities are listed as a significant talent with languages and accents, good ability to mimic gestures and body language, and very respectable skills in a number of disciplines including hand to hand combat, all required abilities in a good undercover operative. His record shows he successfully infiltrated a number of security agencies of hostile countries and two supposedly friendly ones, as well as several major international criminal organisations, during his career which spanned close to fifteen years. He was only detected once and still managed to escape although he killed six people in the process, two of which were hostages he was attempting to rescue.

' Hmm. Not ideal. Although that's still an impressive record.' She inspected the data the SI had produced beside the image with interest.

It appears from the information I have gathered that he was most likely approached by the KGB somewhere around the late eighties, two or three years before the fall of the Soviet Union, and ended up passing them a certain amount of information. There are discrepancies in the records which make the exact amount and type uncertain, which is quite likely deliberate although the person or persons responsible are so far not known. The internal investigation that MI6 started ran into the same problem which is why they didn't take action against him before the last mission he vanished from. I suspect he was well aware of this and took the opportunity, whatever it was, when it was handed to him. It was in all probability his only way out of what would have ended his career and possibly his life.

' Are you certain it was him in an Officer Bowie mask, then?' she asked.

One hundred percent certain, no. Ninety-five percent or better, yes, # Jun replied. It started another video, running backwards, showing the alleged Officer Bowie leaving the station, proceeding in reverse at high speed for about two and a half kilometres, to enter an apartment building. # This is Officer Bowie's home, Apartment 2A. # A differently dressed figure, wearing a baseball cap pulled low over his face, exited the rear of the building into the car park behind it, then walked backwards towards a dark green car. Once inside, the vehicle shot out of the car park in reverse, until eventually a traffic camera finally caught a perfect view of the man's face, some five kilometres away. Jun froze the image at that point. # This is the best image I have of him. Again, there is a near certainty that he is wearing a facial prosthetic, merely a different one. I am certain it's the same man as the one that entered the police station, the gait is identical. I am also certain that it is not Officer Bowie for the same reason.

Nabiki nodded a little to herself, pleased with the results. Taking a glass from the cupboard over the kitchen counter she went to the sink and filled it with water, drinking half of it, then putting the glass down while she looked out the window and thought. ' Where did he come from? Did you backtrack him that far?'

Unfortunately I have been so far unable to locate his origin or destination points, aside from determining that it was probably somewhere to the east of LA, based on the most distant traffic camera that identified the vehicle. There are limited surveillance facilities once the urban environment is left. When he left the station at the end of Officer Bowie's shift, he headed back towards the apartment building, stopping on the way to purchase a bottle of tequila from a local shop, went inside for just under an hour, then left in the same vehicle heading in the direction he'd come from. I can expand the search to nearby cities to see if I can locate the vehicle but I suspect that based on the apparent professionalism of these people that it will have been dumped as soon as he was clear of the city. The car itself is registered to a woman in Pasadena and was reported stolen six weeks ago. She has no apparent links to any of the people so far identified in this case, financial or otherwise. The vehicle was probably stolen randomly precisely to make it difficult to trace.# Jun almost sighed, she could feel it.

'It all seems to fit, irritatingly enough," the middle Tendo said, finishing off the water. 'Good work, Jun.'

#Thank you. I'm sorry I can't give a definite location for Mr Jackson, although I will continue to search for him.# The SI sounded both pleased and mildly annoyed at its own lack of success.

'Don't be too upset,' she chuckled silently. 'You've done in a matter of a couple of hours what the FBI would probably take months to do, assuming they even could.'

There was a note of amusement this time. #I'm sure they could eventually backtrack Mr Jackson in the same manner, if they had reason to suspect he had substituted himself for Officer Bowie in the first place, but it would indeed be a very considerable task. My own work took as long as it did mainly due to the amount of time needed to access the various recording systems storing the imagery. The actual processing time once I had the raw data was only a few seconds.# It sounded somewhat smug. #My processing ability dwarfs anything on this planet aside from the other SI units.#

'Now you're just rubbing it in,' she laughed. 'No need to show off, I know how good you are at this sort of thing. I almost don't want to know how much faster than every other computing resource on the planet put together a mark ten Gamma unit is.'

#It becomes somewhat meaningless at the sort of level Kw'lyn systems function,# Jun replied. #A direct comparison between my hardware and the type of computing equipment native to this world is difficult to make. We work on completely different principles in many ways. Suffice it to say that it will be a very long time before your species comes anywhere close to what even I am capable of from the raw data processing standpoint alone.#

Nabiki smiled to herself, going back to cutting up vegetables, listening to Nodoka still humming and idly trying to identify the tune. 'I'm glad all that computing ability is on my side,' she joked, feeling the SI's amusement. Comming Ranma and her sister, she passed on the data and Jun's conclusions, waiting while they went through it.

"Very interesting, and very good work, Jun," Ranma finally said. She passed on the SI's thanks for the compliment, making him chuckle. "How much to you want to bet that when they find Officer Bowie he's going to be extremely drunk, smelling of tequila, and unable to clearly remember much if anything of yesterday?" the martial artist continued in a thoughtful tone, which had an overlay of resigned annoyance.

She sighed a little. "The thought crossed my mind, yes," she admitted. "It would be an obvious ploy and explains the bottle of the stuff Jackson, if it was him, bought on the way back to Bowie's apartment. It's an odd detour to make otherwise." After a moment, she asked, "Would alcohol be enough, though?"

"There are several drugs that could well erase a lot of recent memories or at least severely muddle them in conjunction with alcohol, sister," Kasumi told her, sounding somewhat worried. "Although it's not an entirely safe process to inflict on someone it's probably fairly effective. They probably knocked him out with something, then filled him with tequila once they finished, which would certainly make him very confused about his actions for the preceding day or so. That would cause a lot of problems with working out exactly what happened for quite a while, enough time for them to get away, certainly."
"I have to say it all fits unpleasantly well." Ranma sounded irritated. "These people sure aren't new at this. They're using all sorts of techniques they probably took from the various places they used to work for. I wish I could work out who they are and what they want."

"We'll work it out sooner or later, dear," Kasumi reassured him gently. "If not us, the FBI, or the LAPD. There are a lot of intelligent people working on the problem. We all just need to keep looking." He sighed, and Nabiki could picture him nodding at his wife with a small smile.

"Right as usual, love. It just worries me. Something that not only that damn cult was involved in, but that Murray seems to also be linked to, can't be good."

"I doubt it very much," the middle Tendo told them, scowling down at her cutting board. "But sis is right. We can't do much about it yet except keep looking and pass what we find along to Agent Tinnin and Lieutenant Harrison. It's more their problem and field right now anyway, we have enough to do here. Although I'm more than happy to help with it where I can."

"Well put, sister," Kasumi told her with a smile in her voice. "I think we all feel that way."

"I'll pass the relevant information on to both of them, or rather, Ms Aoyama will," she said, reaching for another carrot. "Jun will keep working on it as well. I assume you guys will be doing the same?"

"Yep. Although Jun seems faster at it than any of the other SIs, we're all poking around to see what we can find," her brother-in-law replied. "It certainly looks like these people go to some trouble to keep off computer systems as much as possible, though, which makes it difficult. They're not stupid."

"No, which is annoying," she muttered. He laughed for a moment, making her smile internally. "Criminals are meant to be dim, it's not fair when they know what they're doing."

"I know, it's a pain," he said with mock sympathy in his voice. She sent him a quick insulting image with its tongue sticking out and its eyes crossed, which made both him and her sister laugh again. "Cute. OK, we're going to get back to other things, it doesn't look like we can do anything more useful on this at the moment. We'll see you tomorrow."

"All right. Bye, guys." They disconnected, leaving her to put together a package of information which she sent to both Agent Tinnin and Lieutenant Harrison, along with a note from Ms Aoyama, smiling a little to herself at the memory of her alter-ego meeting the FBI man. His expression had been very funny indeed. She added a text message for Harrison suggesting that Officer Bowie be checked on immediately, just in case he was in any danger from whatever Jackson had done. If he'd simply been shot it was already too late but it seemed quite likely the poor man was probably very, very drunk in his own apartment. There was little reason for the conspirators to actually kill him and quite a strong reason to keep him alive, after all.

Putting her whole attention back on the vegetables she went back to work.

---

Harrison blinked at the ceiling, his eyes heavy, then turned his head to the side, fumbling for his phone which had just made the sound that had woken him. Yawning widely, he retrieved the irritating thing as it buzzed again, sleepily prodding buttons until he managed to make it display the message that some bastard thought important enough to wake him up for, reading it blurrily.

It took a couple of seconds for the meaning to sink in, then he swore quietly to himself, sighed, struggled more or less silently out of bed and headed for his clothes. As soon as he was out of the bedroom with the door closed he called dispatch, arranging an ambulance and a couple of uniformed officers to meet him at Officer Bowie’s apartment, leaving the house a few minutes later still yawning and grumbling about inconsiderate horrors from other worlds who didn't have the decency to let a tired man get an honest night's sleep.

Hotaru watched as the massively modified classic car howled past on its third lap of the track, grinning at the expressions both her father and her friend were wearing. Misaki looked like she was having enormous fun while Haruka looked both exhilarated beyond belief and also impatient to have a go.

Beside her, Isamu was muttering to himself in shock, watching the way his creation was being pushed to its limits in a manner he clearly couldn't believe. Akemi, next to him, was laughing quietly and happily. When Misaki had triggered the nitrous boost on the previous lap she'd clapped her hands like a little girl as the car had shot into the distance like it had been fired from a cannon.

"I wouldn't have believed it if I hadn't seen it," Isamu mumbled, watching the car brake half-way down the straight, Misaki jumping out as soon as it stopped and running around to the passenger side while presumably Haruka slid into the driver's position. Seconds later it fishtailed a little as it began moving again, vanishing around the corner at the far end of the straight run. "I never thought anyone could drive it like that. Misaki is incredibly good."

"She's good at all sorts of things," Hotaru agreed happily. "So is Haruka."

"I hope she can handle it," the garage owner commented, glancing down at her. "Misaki is a magical girl, after all."

"She'll be fine," the young woman replied placidly, listening to the sound of the vehicle negotiating the bends of the track out of sight of them. A little while later it reappeared, drifting around the two visible corners with an expert hand on the wheel, before straightening up and accelerating, blue flames once more coming from the exhausts as the blonde woman fired the nitrous system. Hotaru giggled at her expression as the car went by in a blast of sound and wind, her female father looked happier than she'd seen her in months.

"Thank you for letting them play with it," she said. Isamu nodded absently, watching the car diminish into the distance again. He didn't seem to have any useful words to reply with, based on his expression.

Markus studied the woman who jumped out of the car as it slid to a stop fifty metres away, running around and getting in the other side as her companion moved into the driver's seat. He glanced at Souta, who was also watching with interest, then around at the small group of the other man's co-workers who had come out to watch as well. "Who is she?" he asked curiously and with respect. Whoever the young woman was, she was an insanely good driver. Souta shrugged.

Behind him, one of his colleagues smiled a little. "Some say she wiped out an entire invading demon army with one shot, and that she has no understanding of the concept of fear. All we know is that she's called Misaki," the man said in a low respectful voice. He bit into an apple he was holding, watching the car as it moved off again. "The blonde? No idea." He shrugged, taking another bite.

Markus inspected him for a moment, his eyebrows raised. "Um. OK. Thanks."

"You're welcome," the man said.
After a somewhat puzzled moment Markus went back to watching the car as it vanished behind the buildings again. The two women went past twice more before slowing and halting near a group of people some two hundred metres down the track, both of them getting out and leaning on the roof of the vehicle, grinning at each other. "Can we go and have a look at it?" he asked Souta.

"I'd certainly like to," the other man replied. They both walked down the length of the fence, entering via the access road and gate, then approaching the car and the two drivers, who were talking to an older man with a young girl, probably around fourteen or so, listening with interest while running her hand over the vehicle with a broad smile on her face. Several people including an old but very fit appearing woman with long white hair in a ponytail, all of them wearing overalls with 'Matsuda' written on the back under some Kanji, were carefully inspecting the car. The old woman opened the hood and propped it up before half-vanishing into the engine compartment with a much younger man beside her.

Walking over, Markus peered in as well, studying the engine, which was much higher tech than anything from the sixties. It was obviously not original specification. Impressed, he watched as the woman plugged a laptop into a connector on the bulkhead and typed rapidly for a few seconds, inspecting the graphs that resulted with close attention and a small smile. Her companion was talking quietly to her, nodding as she pointed something out. After a moment he turned his attention to the two women, a short-haired blonde and a somewhat taller brunette, who were still looking very pleased with themselves as they talked to the man who seemed to be in charge. He was apparently rather surprised but seemed pleased as well.

"That's Isamu Matsuda," Souta said beside him. "He owns Matsuda Tuning. His father started it back in the late fifties as far as I know. We've done a little work for them on and off, mainly customised engine management systems. In fact, I think that ECU there is one of ours." He indicated a box mounted on the firewall of the heavily modified Jaguar. "Before my time at the company, though."

"It's an impressive vehicle," Markus noted, admiring the lines of the car and the amazing paint job.

"I would have to agree. I've always liked the old British sports cars, they had a certain style which is very attractive," his companion agreed. "Not very reliable, unfortunately, but very pretty." Grinning, he waved at the engine in the car. "It appears that this one is running on proper Japanese engineering which would seem to have fixed that problem."

Markus chuckled. "What engine is it?"

Souta inspected the machinery for a moment. "I think it started life as a Honda NSX engine, but someone has done something very expensive to it. It's nothing even close to stock now." They both watched as the old woman and her associate, apparently satisfied, unplugged the laptop and closed the engine bay, glancing at them for a moment, then walked over to join the conversation for a minute or two before returning to the building behind them.

Turning the car off, Haruka sat with her hands on the wheel and a huge grin on her face for a few seconds, then turned to Misaki, who looked back at her, also grinning. "What do you think?" the other woman asked.

"I think I'm in love," she replied, caressing the wheel tenderly.

"Is it as good as your old car?"

"Difficult to say for sure." She thought for a moment. "Different, definitely. Much twitchier, that's for sure, I can see why a normal person would have trouble with it. The E-type was always somewhat prone to suddenly trying to commit suicide at high speed, especially in a turn, from what I've read. Adding all that extra power would make that a lot worse. But it's damn fun to drive if you can react as fast as we can. It slides fantastically well. That second to last corner is amazing to drift around." She laughed for a moment. "I think we might have used up the rear tyres, though."

Misaki shrugged a little, grinning. "They're cheap enough."

"True. And you wouldn't drive like that most of the time, anyway." She looked at the dashboard and the gauge for the nitrous bottle, which was reading nearly empty. "It needs a bigger tank. It ran out much too soon."

"I'm sure Isamu could sort that out," Misaki giggled. "So, have we found your next car?"

After a second or two, she laughed and nodded. "I think so, if he'll sell it."

"I'm sure we can come to an arrangement." They both got out, looking at each other over the roof, grinning, before turning to Isamu who was approaching with a somewhat stunned expression on his face. Hotaru was bouncing along beside him, looking very excited, and ran up to quickly hug them both before darting past and inspecting the car, running her hands over it.

"That was... unbelievable," the garage owner said, staring at them with incredulity. "Even considering what you are, Misaki. And you, Haruka, how on earth can you drive like that?"

She glanced at Misaki who looked amused. "I have very fast reactions," she eventually said. He kept staring for a moment then finally sighed.

"Apparently so. You young ladies make me feel very old all of a sudden." Laughing, Misaki shrugged.

"Sorry. Anyway, I know you're an extremely good driver. We're just... a bit better."

Shaking his head in respect he replied, "More than a bit. If you do take up racing you're going to make a lot of people very worried, I think." Akemi and her colleague, who along with several of the mechanics were checking the car over, opened the hood and began fiddling with the engine, connecting a laptop to it. He glanced over at them for a couple of seconds. "If nothing else we've finally got some real world performance figures on it. The rolling road tests can't tell you everything and no one else has ever been able to drive it properly."

One of the mechanics was inspecting the tyres, making notes. He looked up at the garage owner. "These are completely gone," he called. "They're almost racing slicks now." Isamu nodded absently.

"What do you think of the car?" he asked the two women, who turned back to him from watching his crew work on the vehicle.

Haruka grinned widely. "It's fantastic. The NOS bottle is too small, and the front suspension isn't quite set up correctly, I think, but other than that it's amazing. You and your people do incredible work." He smiled at her, although he also looked surprised.

"Too small?"

"Yes, it ran out much too soon." She laughed as he sighed.

"No one else has ever complained it didn't have enough power."
"Oh, it's definitely not underpowered, but the nitrous is a lot of fun and it runs out far too quickly."

"Fun." He stared at them for several seconds. "Right." Shaking his head he smiled a little. "Interesting usage of the word."

"So, is it for sale?" she asked more seriously. He gaped, then turned to Misaki, who nodded happily.

"You want it?"

"Oh, so much. It's damn near perfect." Once more she seemed to take him by surprise. He thought for a minute or two. Eventually he shrugged.

"Well, I suppose otherwise it was only going to sit there forever, or until we pulled it to pieces for the parts. That would have been a shame, though, after all that work. And it looks so nice as well."

She agreed, turning to look at the car. Akemi was just closing it up again, looking pleased. "The paint job is one of the nicest I've ever seen," she commented.

"Yes, it's very good indeed," he replied, walking closer to the car and wiping a little dust from it. "One of our guys knows someone who's a true artist in paintwork. It's about ten coats of metal flake over the base coat with something like fifteen coats of clear varnish on top of that, then four days of careful polishing. He really knows his business. I've used him quite a lot since we did this but to date it's probably the best job he's done." He turned to her, carefully studying her for a few seconds, before finally nodding.

"All right. I'll sell it, with two conditions. One, you bring it back to us for servicing. Two, you take care of it. And yourself. I don't want to see either one of you wrapped around a tree, OK?" She nodded, grinning.

"I accept your terms." They bowed to each other, then straightened up, laughing a little.

Akemi walked over, grinning at Haruka and Misaki. "That was the most incredible driving I've ever seen," she said happily. "Fantastic. I'd love to go around the track in it with you."

Glancing at Misaki, who was smiling, Haruka nodded. "I think that's fair. Hotaru wants a ride as well."

"We'll need to replace the rear tyres and refill the nitrous bottle," the old mechanic said, looking at Isamu.

He nodded back. "She says the nitrous tank is too small, it ran out too quickly." Akemi laughed delightedly.

"Of course. There's a larger one in the store room, about twice the capacity. Will that do?"

"I think so," Haruka replied, looking pleased. Isamu shook his head in mild wonder.

"I'll throw that in as well."

"You're buying it?" Akemi asked. Haruka grinned. "Good. It needs to be used. Keeping the poor thing under a dust sheet is almost a crime." She tapped the laptop she was holding under her arm. "I've downloaded all the ECU logs. It needs some minor tweaks to improve the torque curve a little in the mid-range and one or two other small adjustments, but it's looking very good. Bring it back inside and we'll do that, fit the new bottle, and some more tyres. Then I want a go." Cackling with amusement as Isamu sighed, she wandered back to the garage talking rapidly to her younger associate, who was smiling a little to himself. The company owner watched her go with resigned good cheer.

"She's like a teenager most of the time. Give her a stupidly fast car to make even more insane and she's as happy as anyone I've ever met."

Snickering, Misaki watched the elderly woman disappear into the building, then turned to him. "So. What sort of a deal can you offer my friend here on this somewhat unusual vehicle?"

Isamu studied her for a second or two, looked at the car while rubbing his chin, then turned to Haruka. "Hmm." He thought while everyone waited, then named a price. She winced a little.

"Not cheap."

"No, but to be honest it's less than half what we spent on the hardware alone. The chassis is the least of it, the engine cost a fortune to build." He shrugged as she thought hard. Eventually she counter-offered a somewhat lower price, this time causing him to wince in turn. "Are you serious?" She smiled a little.

"Of course."

"Women," he mumbled, a twinkle in his eye. The blonde smiled slightly more widely. A few seconds passed then he came back with a price halfway between the first two. Haruka nodded. They bowed to each other again, before smiling widely.

"It's a lot but I think worth it," she commented.

"It's a ridiculously low price but I'd rather see it used by someone who can use it than see it rot away," he retorted with a grin. "Be careful with it."

"I will," she promised honestly. "I can do a bank transfer right now if you give me your account details. The insurance payment from my old car is just sitting there at the moment."

"Come inside. Misaki, can you bring the car in for me?" he asked, looking to the magical girl, who had stopped to listen. They turned to Isamu. "I'm Souta Kamata from IkedaTech Engineering. This is my friend and colleague Markus Bergfalk, from Iris Cars in the UK, a customer of ours."

"Ah, yes, we've done quite a bit of business with IkedaTech over the years," Isamu replied in the same language, nodding. "Although I don't believe we've ever met." Making introductions for himself and the three women, he then turned to the other man, who was tall and blond, looking like he exercised a lot. "I'm also very familiar with Iris, of course. Your company makes some remarkable sports cars, most of which are also very beautiful."

The blond, Markus, smiled, bowing respectfully. "Thank you, Mr Matsuda," he said, his own English bearing an accent that Haruka couldn't quite place, something Northern European she thought. "It's very nice of you to say so." After a short pause, he curiously asked, "Are you any relation to Yoshiho Matsuda, of Matsuda Collection fame?"

Isamu smiled, shaking his head. "Not that I'm aware of, certainly nothing at all close. We merely share a family name and a love of good automotive engineering."

Markus smiled back. "I understand. I've seen the Porsche museum, it's rather remarkable." Turning his head to glance at the Jaguar for a moment, he looked back, saying, "We were very impressed by this vehicle, and much more impressed by the level of driving skill of the two young women." He waved at the car, then nodded to Misaki and Haruka, who exchanged glances, smiling. "It was... somewhat unbelievable." He turned to talk directly to them. "Are you professional racing drivers by any chance?"

Haruka laughed a little, shaking her head, while Misaki looked amused. "No, although I did at one point consider that career, and in fact did some semi-professional racing. My life became somewhat complicated for a few years and I was unable to continue that path as much as I'd have liked to although recent events have left me thinking I might well get back into it." Both men nodded thoughtfully.

Misaki chuckled, adding, "I just like driving when I get the opportunity," she explained, "I've known Isamu for a few years and sometimes get to try some of his cars on the track here. Haruka is looking for a new car after her last one was written off." She looked over her shoulder at the black vehicle, then laughed again. "More precisely, she was looking for a new car. She found it."

"I see," he said slowly, studying the car as well, then her and Haruka. "That makes it all even more impressive. I've never seen anything like it before."

Isamu snickered. "If you had any idea how twitchy that damn thing is you'd be even more shocked," he chuckled. "It's almost impossible to drive for normal people. I never in my wildest dreams thought that anyone could make it do that. It was a true honour to see it driven properly." Studying the two men, he waved to his business. "Would you care to come in for a cup of tea and perhaps see some of our other vehicles?" he asked. "I need to do some paperwork with Haruka here, while my people put some more tyres on. And fit a bigger NOS tank." Glancing at the two women who were grinning at him, he shook his head for a moment. "Which I still can't believe."

Both of them laughed. "But that won't take long."

Looking at his watch for a moment, Markus glanced at Souta, who nodded, then turned back to the garage owner. "We'd both like that, yes, thank you," he replied. "Having seen this car I'm quite curious to see what else you have."

Misaki smiled a little, then got into the car and started it, driving slowly back into the building, while Haruka and the rest of them walked along behind her, Hotaru looking interested and excited at the same time. Inside, Isamu turned to Haruka. "I'll get the paperwork arranged and the bank details for you," he said, to which she nodded. "It won't take long." He looked around, then waved over one of his people, the mechanic who had fitted the battery, who came over quickly. "Jirou, please arrange some tea for everyone, will you?" The young man smiled, making a head count, then left again. "If you'll just wait in the office there, I'll be back soon," he continued, as Misaki joined them having parked the Jaguar which Akemi and three other mechanics were already working on, the car up on a pair of jacks and both rear wheels removed almost before she'd stopped it.

Haruka watched for a moment, impressed at the speed they were working, which was almost like being in the pits at a track, before she turned to follow the others into the reception area. "I must say I'm astounded by your driving skills, Ms Tenou," Markus said as they sat down. "And yours,
"Call me Haruka," she replied, smiling. "And thank you. It's a lot of fun. I haven't had a good drive around a track for ages, and never in anything quite like that."

Listening, Souta looked startled. "I would have thought that you drove on a track regularly based on what we saw," he noted curiously. "If that was you being out of practice I'd certainly like to see what you can do when you're really trying." She laughed, feeling pleased at the compliment. Jirou, the young mechanic, came in with a tray of tea things, putting it on the table they were sitting around with a smile, Hotaru immediately taking charge of passing the drinks around, then pulled a clipboard from under his arm and walked over to a notice board on the wall of the room, studying it for a moment. Everyone watched curiously except for Misaki who was grinning.

"What's that for?" Hotaru asked. Misaki grinned more widely. Turning to them, Jirou said, "It's our lap time board. We always time any of our vehicles going around the track, the best times go up here." Glancing at Misaki he sighed a little. "All of hers go at the top. We should probably have a separate board for magical girls."

"You'll have to invite other ones along in that case," Misaki chuckled. "It would be weird having only me on it."

Snickering slightly, the man nodded, turning back to the board and writing on a slip of paper which he pinned to it close to the top, moving a few similar slips down in the process. "We could probably charge admission in that case," he noted with amusement. "We'd need to call it something, though. 'Magical girl in an insanely fast car' or something along those lines."

"Sounds like a decent plan," she replied, grinning. "I could ask around. I know a few people who'd probably be interested. Yori might like a go. Tamiko certainly would. Mind you, she's a terrible driver. Fast, but terrible. She'd probably leave dents in the crash barrier on the corners so bad you'd need to name them after her."

By now laughing quite hard, Jirou wrote out another slip, putting it immediately under the first one. "I'm looking forward to it," he giggled. "There we go. Haruka, you were three tenths of a second slower than Misaki on your best lap."

"She knows the track, I don't," Haruka stated firmly, looking at the other woman, who shrugged. Snickering, Jirou accepted the excuse.

"If you say so."

"I do. And I'm sticking to it."

She grinned as he smiled at her, then left the room. Souta got up and walked over to the notice board, inspecting the times posted with raised eyebrows, then sat down again, shaking his head. "I've been around that track a few times myself. Those times are remarkable. Even the lowest one is much better than I could do," he commented.

Misaki looked amused, pointing at a spot about half-way up the board. "Akemi has done some impressive ones and she's old enough to be my grandmother," she noted. "There are some damn good drivers in this company."

"None as good as you two it would seem," Markus said, also studying the board. The top eight spots, except for the fourth one down which was Haruka's, all bore her name. She shrugged a little looking pleased.
"I have some unfair advantages," she replied. Souta nodded wisely, apparently being well aware of who and what she was having heard her name earlier, although the Iris Cars man looked slightly puzzled.

Before he could ask the question he was obviously working on, Isamu came in, holding a folder full of paperwork. "Here we go. Haruka, if you'd like to come with me, this shouldn't take long." She nodded, standing, then following him out. Misaki watched them go before turning back to the others.

"Magical girls?" Markus asked curiously. She began explaining, amused, while they sipped their tea.

"Is she still asleep?" Soun asked as Nabiki came into the living room, sitting beside her father with a smile for the other occupants. The middle sister nodded.

"You probably couldn't wake her with a bucket of water at this point," she giggled. "Snoring away, totally out of it. I'm not surprised, considering the amount of work they've been doing the last few days. Shampoo looked like she was ready to fall over when she left here as well. I called Elder Cologne and she told me she came in, dropped her bag on the floor, said hello, then fell asleep on her feet. Mousse had to carry her to bed. I'd think they'll sleep the rest of the day and all night as well."

Smiling slightly Nodoka commented, "Poor girls. But from what I understand it was all worth it."

"I think so," Nabiki agreed. "It will be interesting to see this DVD that the studio is producing. If it hadn't been for that bank robbery they'd probably have had a copy to bring back with them but Aiko called me and said she'd be picking them up sometime tomorrow and bringing them over. The studio executive who's in charge of this whole project will be looking at them then as well, so on Monday they should have worked out the next step."

"Will they get the job?" Genma asked curiously. Nabiki looked at him, then nodded again.

"From what I know it's pretty much guaranteed. Akane should be able to tell us more but I doubt we'll see her until tomorrow morning at the earliest."

Putting his arm around his daughter, Soun smiled proudly. "I'm so very happy for her. It will be difficult not having her around, but knowing she'll be doing something she can excel at and enjoy will make up for it." He glanced at Nabiki, adding, "Now all we have to do is find a career for you, and the rest of us will be able to take it easy in our old age, supported by the young, the way it's meant to happen."

Nabiki grinned at him. "Oh, I'm sure you'd like that, wouldn't you, Dad? And he'd like it even more." She looked meaningfully at Genma who bowed slightly from a sitting position, a grave expression on his face.

"Of course, my dear, that's the whole point of aging," the bespectacled martial artist replied quietly, before smiling a little as well. Nodoka looked hard at him, sighing, then shook her head.

"Remind me why I put up with you," she mumbled, making his smile widen a bit.

Hopping to her feet, Nabiki left the room, then came back a little later with a bottle of wine. "I was keeping this back for a good occasion," she remarked, looking at the label, before putting it on the table and retrieving four glasses and a corkscrew. "I think we can toast Akane and Shampoo, even before we know for sure."
"A very good idea," her father agreed, watching as she competently removed the cork then poured a glassful for each of them. Handing them around she retook her seat, sniffing the wine gently, then trying a little. Soun did the same, smiling appreciatively. "This is very nice," he said, picking up the bottle and reading the label for himself. "Australian. Where did you get it?"

"I picked it up on holiday," she told him. "It came highly recommended. I bought a few bottles." Looking severely at Genma, she added, "And I hid it very well, so don't bother looking." The man looked mildly affronted, while Nodoka laughed for a moment.

"She knows you well, dearest," the Saotome matriarch told her husband, who shrugged, sipping his own wine.

"Back to university in a week or so, I suppose, dear?" Soun said after a short silence. Nabiki glanced at him, looking up from studying her wine-glass, then nodded.

"Yes. I'm looking forward to it, while at the same time I'm slightly dreading all the extra work. These next few months are going to be hard, I think, getting ready for the finals and that sort of thing. But on the other hand I'm doing pretty well so I'm hoping to come out the end of it with a good degree." Leaning back a little she sipped the wine, putting the glass down on the table still half-full. "It's been an interesting time these last few years."

"It has," her father agreed quietly, smiling briefly at her then looking around the living room thoughtfully. "It seems like it was only yesterday this room was full of people every day, but these days it's often only three or four." He sighed faintly as Nodoka glanced at him, then her husband, before lowering her eyes. They were all silent again for a few seconds.

"Still, it seems to mostly have worked out well, far better than we could have expected during the bad times, and I still live in hope that there will be more good news one day." The Tendo man smiling a little, leaning forward and raising his glass. "To Akane and Shampoo, may they succeed in everything they try." The three others clinked glasses together and drank.

After a moment, Nodoka looked up, smiling a little wistfully at her glass as she held it up, and added, "To absent family, and the hope that we'll meet again." Soun smiled at her and they repeated the toast.

Finishing the bottle, they sat quietly for a while, busy with their own thoughts, before Nabiki and Nodoka went back into the kitchen to keep making food for the party, Soun and Genma ending up playing another game of Shogi in silence.

Haruka smiled as she re-entered the office, seeing her daughter talking rapidly to Misaki and that man from Iris, Markus, who was looking a little shocked yet still very interested as she explained about magical girls and some of the things they fought. Not giving away her own status as one of them, of course, merely coming across as someone who followed the whole scene closely. She was privately impressed with how well her daughter spoke English, not having realised how much of it she'd learned at school. The other man, Souta, was drinking tea and listening with interest. They all looked up as she and Isamu came in. "All done," she announced, pleased, showing the documentation. "I have a shiny new car to play with."

"Great," Hotaru chirped, bouncing to her feet. "I want a go next."

Isamu glanced at Haruka with a small expression of amusement, then looked over his shoulder into the main garage, calling a question to Akemi. A shout came back that made him chuckle. "They've fitted the new tyres and the bigger nitrous tank, they're just filling it now," he told the room at large, turning back to them all. "The track is free for at least the next couple of hours so if you want you're welcome to go out again, Haruka," he added, looking at her.

The blonde nodded with a smile. "I think I should. I can't drive like that on the street, not without getting people annoyed, and she's not going to stop pushing until she gets a ride." Hotaru crossed her arms and looked irritated, scowling deeply, although everyone could tell she wasn't offended. A small smile kept breaking through.

A pop behind them was followed by a momentary loud hiss and a clatter of metal against metal, and a short burst of swearing as well. She turned, as did Isamu, to see Akemi sucking on her knuckles, glaring at the large nitrous tank they'd been using to fill the one in the car. She looked over at them. "We need a new high pressure hose coupler, this one is worn and nearly took my hand off when I disconnected it." The elderly woman kicked the tank irritably, but cheered up nearly instantly. "But the car is ready. I want a go after Hotaru, if that's OK."

Haruka smiled at her. The old woman really was more like a teenager some of the time. "Of course. You people built the thing, you deserve a ride when it's being driven hard." She glanced at Isamu quizzically, grinning when he paled and took a step back, shaking his head.

"No chance of getting me back in that thing." He gave the car a look that mixed worry, pride, and a certain amount of raw fear. "Once was enough, trust me." Haruka grinned, as did Akemi, who had walked over to them.

"Silly boy," the old mechanic chuckled. "Based on what I saw earlier you'd be safe. But, if you don't go, that's all the more time for me!"

With a snicker Haruka turned to the others in the room. "Come on, dear," she told Hotaru, who rushed over smiling widely. "Let's see how my new car goes without Misaki in it." They headed over to the vehicle which was now down off the jacks, new rear tyres in place, both getting in. Driving it carefully out of the garage again and onto the track with, yet again, several people following curiously, she orientated it down the centreline. "Ready, dear?" she asked her daughter, who checked her harness then nodded with a grin.

"Ready. Go go GO!" she yelled happily. A scream of engine noise and a squeal of tyres heralded the not-quite-a-Jaguar leaping off the line and roaring off down the track. The faint sound of a teenager laughing her head off could just be heard over it if you had good ears.

Markus sat quivering in the passenger seat for nearly a minute after the car stopped, staring out at the track, before turning his head to regard Haruka who was smiling to herself, watching him. "You, my good woman, are completely insane," he managed to say in a quavering voice. He'd gone quiet half-way through the first lap after swearing in his native Swedish up to that point and holding on for dear life, which had only made her laugh.

She chuckled, hitting the quick release for the harness and opening the door. "I warned you it was a little intense in this thing," she commented lightly as she hopped out. He followed considerably more slowly, still shaking a bit. He'd been in quite a number of high performance cars over the years, driven by true experts, and he was no slouch behind the wheel himself, but he'd never experienced anything even close to what the last ten minutes had produced. By the time he was able to stand up properly, Haruka was talking to Misaki and Akemi in Japanese, all three of them grinning.

It was particularly galling the way the elderly mechanic had jumped out after she'd had her own ride laughing like a ten year old, looking vastly pleased. Misaki had driven that time, which made it all the more irritating as she seemed to be even crazier behind the wheel than Haruka was.

Isamu came over to him as he leaned on the car trying to regain his composure, the older man smiling very slightly. "You see why I don't want to get back into the thing even though I built it, don't you?" he asked quietly. Markus nodded, then took a deep breath and stood fully.

"I do. It's a remarkable piece of engineering but not exactly... calming."

"No. Not really." Isamu made a small noise that suggested a muffled laugh.

"That said, both those young women are quite extraordinarily good drivers," the Iris engineer said, looking back to Haruka and the other two, who had been joined by the violet-haired figure of Hotaru who was listening and giggling.

"That's very true indeed," Isamu agreed, following his gaze. "I know Misaki has the fastest reactions I've ever seen, which I always put down to what she is, but Haruka is remarkable as well. If she does get into racing again I think her opponents will have a hard time of it."

Markus nodded slowly, fully agreeing with the other man. "I'm half tempted to see if our works team has a spot available she'd be interested in," he finally said. "But I'm also scared that if that happened I'd have to get in a car with her again." They shared a look. Isamu smiled a little.

"Good point." He waved to the building the others were going back to now, Haruka carefully driving her car up the access road following the pedestrians. "She's going to need new tyres, again, and a refill on the NOS. While they're sorting that out let's give you and Souta the tour I promised."

"Thank you," Markus replied, walking beside him. "Based on what I've seen so far it may be that Iris would be interested in your aid on a small design issue we have, as well, if you're interested."

He glanced at Isamu, who looked back with an expression that suggested he was.

"Tell me more," the older man requested, apparently intrigued.

Parking the Jaguar-ish on the street, Haruka ran the window down and smiled at Misaki, who squatted down to talk to her. "Once again, thank you, very much indeed, for all your help. It's worked out far better than I expected." She ran her right hand gently over the leather of the steering wheel, feeling much better than she had done for... well, a long time.

Misaki grinned. "It was no problem, and a lot of fun. Like Yori told you a while ago, we're all on the same side, despite the little problems we've had in the past. Let's leave them there and get on with life, OK?"

She chuckled, nodding. "I can live with that. It's going to be difficult in many ways with the others, my others, there's still a lot of bad blood there that's going to be hard to get past, but I'll try." The blonde glanced at her daughter who was sitting in the passenger seat, listening quietly with a small smile on her face. "I have a number of reasons to, after all."

"True enough," Misaki replied, winking at Hotaru, who did the same back. "Any luck with a place to live?"

Nodding, Haruka said, "Yes, I think so. We found a nice apartment fairly close to the hotel we've been staying in that looks like it might be a good fit for us, not too expensive but a reasonable size and with decent parking. I'm seeing the apartment manager again on Monday. If everything works out we'll be moving in within a week or so." She sighed a little. "I'll have to buy some new furniture as well, which is a bit annoying, but I can afford it, I suppose. I'm not too badly off." She looked around the inside of the car again, smiling to herself. "I got the most important thing done already."

Hotaru made a little annoyed sniff, making both the older woman look at her, then grin. "The second most important thing, rather." The girl giggled, making Misaki laugh for a moment.

"Good luck with it. Oh, while I think about it, you should ask Chou about putting a durability spell on this thing, she's pretty good with them. It would keep this beautiful paint job perfect if nothing else."

Slightly surprised, Haruka thought about the idea, then nodded slowly. "I hadn't thought of that. Would she do it, do you think? After all the trouble?"

"Oh, sure she would," Misaki smiled. "She doesn't hold grudges, really. I'll ask her but I doubt she'd have any problems with it." The woman stood, stepping back, then looked over the car at the front door of Matsuda Tuning, where the man from Iris Cars could be seen talking to Isamu and the other man he'd arrived with, all three of them looking pleased. "It seems to have been a good day all round," she added. "I think Isamu has picked up some interesting work as well. That Markus guy seemed very impressed with the cars they've worked on."

"I hope he gets something out of it," Haruka agreed, looking in the same direction. "He seems like a nice man and his people certainly know what they're doing."

"He's a good person," Misaki nodded. "OK, I have to get going, I have things to do, but I'll see you both around."

Waving, Haruka started her new car and drove off, while Misaki headed in the other direction at high speed, Hotaru settling back in her seat and looking contented.

"I told you she'd help," the girl finally said, some minutes later. Haruka grinned, reaching over and ruffling her daughter's hair, while they both laughed for a moment.

"How is Officer Bowie, Lieutenant?"

Holding his cell-phone to his ear Harrison stepped aside to allow the paramedics to exit the building, following the gurney they were pushing to the ambulance which was parked outside the apartment building. "He's going to be fine, Captain, but he's suffering mild alcohol poisoning and dehydration as well as the aftereffects of some sort of drug, according to what I've been told. He'd probably have made it OK if we hadn't found him but he wouldn't have enjoyed the next day or so."

There was a sigh down the phone. "You're sure it wasn't self-inflicted?"

"Pretty sure, yes," Harrison replied. "I don't know him all that well but I do remember we were once at a bar with some of the guys and he said he hated the taste of tequila. Aside from the information Ms Aoyama sent me, I'd have been a bit suspicious about him apparently drinking close to a pint of the stuff for no obvious reason. With everything else surrounding this, I think she's right, this is a setup to cover their agent."

"Agent Tinnin has been going over the information she sent both of you and seems to think it all holds together well," his superior said, sounding irritated. "Which is both good and bad. Good because we have a lead, even if it's going to be a nightmare to follow up on, but bad because the way all this was put together in less than twenty-four hours suggests to me that these people, whoever the hell they are, have a lot more resources than we expected."
"It sure looks like that, sir," Harrison grumbled. "If it wasn't for our helpful green-haired creepy person it would have taken weeks or months to get to this point as well, assuming we even saw through this current problem. At least now we might be able to get somewhere. I doubt they expected us to see through it so fast. Or at all."

"No, I don't think they did either. The FBI has put out a national bulletin for this Jackson character, so with some luck we might be able to take them by surprise. I'm not counting on it but it's a start." They were both silent for a moment. "Good work, Lieutenant. Once you've finished up there, go back to bed, and be in first thing in the morning. We'll need to keep the momentum up for as long as we can to capitalise on this opportunity."

"OK, sir. I'll see you in...," he checked his watch, then moaned, "...oh god, five hours." There was a small chuckle from the other end.

"I know, it's not long. Try to get some sleep." The captain hung up, Harrison putting the phone back in his pocket then heading for his car to follow the ambulance to the hospital.
Party, Phase One

Party on, Dudes!

Many thanks for the people contributing to the Sisterhood of Doom Wikia, which amused me greatly, especially the creator Kitsune Herikawa. I've found it a useful resource on more than one occasion to quickly look up some of my own characters ; I'm stunned by the amount of work put into it.

There is also a TV Tropes page now, apparently, which also amuses me. I have many amuses.

Standing in the front door to the Dojo early in the morning, Soun watched his middle daughter doing sit-ups in the middle of the room, smiling to himself. After a dozen or so she said, without looking at him, "Why are you looking so smug, Dad?"

"It's nice to see you exercising like that," he replied with a small chuckle. "I haven't seen you do that for years."

"I told you I exercise regularly," she said, lying back and looking at him upside down, grinning for a moment, before rolling over and beginning to do push-ups. "Not quite the way Akane does but I keep fit. A lot of swimming, for example. And I go running quite a lot these days as well." He watched as she kept doing push-ups as regularly as a machine, showing no signs of tiring, and the strain not showing in her voice either. He was quite impressed.

"You come from a long line of martial artists, dear, so I'm not surprised you look after yourself. I haven't seen you use the Dojo like this very often."

The young woman shot him a smile, then rolled to her feet in a manner that made him nod appreciatively. "It's usually full of people when I'm around these days, or Akane and Shampoo beating each other black and blue. I was just getting a little stiff working in the kitchen so much and I needed to work it off." She giggled a little. "I'd like a swim but the only place nearby is the pond, which is too small. And cold." She gave him a sly look. "And probably possessed."

Unable to help it he glanced nervously over his shoulder in the direction of the relevant body of water, shuddering for a moment. She laughed again, walking over and hugging him. "Calm down, it can't get you in here. You're safe."

Snickering, he put his hand on her head and stroked her hair. "Silly girl. It's been nice having you here again even if it's only been for a few days. I hope you'll be around more over the next few months, although I know you're going to be busy."

"I'll be here when I can, Dad," she assured him, releasing him and stepping back. "I'm going to go for a run now, I think, then it'll be time to start setting up for the party. Everyone is supposed to start turning up in about four hours or so, Ukyo and Konatsu will be here in an hour as well." She checked her watch for a moment. "And Mousse is coming over a little later to help. Cologne is closing the Café early so she can come. I need to be ready myself."

"All right, daughter," he smiled. "I'll push Genma out of bed to help as well. Between us I think we should be able to manage." He watched as she went and retrieved her small towel, putting it around her neck, admiring the young woman his middle offspring had become. "You really should let me teach you some of the Art, dear," he added with a grin as she came back.
She returned the grin, then dropped into a parody of a martial arts stance, putting a deadly expression on her face. "I know Kung Fu," she hissed, glaring around for imaginary enemies.

Soun watched, amused, as she made various chopping motions with her hands, admittedly at very respectable speed, although it was thrown off a little by the sound effects she added. "That's Karate, dear," he said mildly. "More or less."

Straightening up with giggle, she smiled back. "What would I know? You and Akane are the martial artists in this family. I'm merely a lowly Economics student."

"Who will probably become far more dangerous than a mere master of the Art," he chuckled. "You will destroy them with Finance-Fu."

She stared at him for a moment then nearly collapsed in laughter. Eventually she recovered, shaking her head. "Your sense of humour is worse than mine," she told him. He shrugged slightly, accepting the compliment as he chose to consider it.

"I still think I could probably get you up to a decent level quite fast," he smiled, "but I can live with it if you don't want to. Akane will carry on the family tradition in her own way, I have no doubt, while you will create a new one."

She briefly hugged him again. "I'm certainly going to try." Grinning for a moment, she headed for the exit. "But later. Now I need to do about ten kilometres or so. I'll see you later, OK?"

"Have fun," he called as she left, smiling to himself a little, then went back into the house to see what Nodoka needed done first, via Genma's bed and a swift kick.

"Hi, Ukyo," Nabiki said as she opened the front door, smiling at her friend. The young woman with the long brown hair smiled back, coming in as the middle sister stepped aside. "Where's Konatsu?" she asked a moment later, looking outside to see an absence of faux-female ninja.

"He's getting some ingredients I ran out of at the last moment," the other woman said, unslinging the portable grill which was on her back and putting it down for the moment. "I thought I had enough prawns but half of them have gone off, they must have been a bad batch or something. I ran out of some of the things I need for the sauce as well. He should be here in twenty minutes or so." Ukyo smoothed down her hair which had been mussed when she dropped the grill.

"OK." Nabiki led her through into the garden, where her father and Genma were assembling some strong folding tables they kept in the Dojo for events along the side of the house at a safe distance from the pond, at which they both kept shooting suspicious glances. Something that she found very funny, but was keeping out of, as it was Nodoka's preserve these days. The Saotome woman was directing the two men, smirking a little when she noticed the looks they gave the innocent body of water any time they couldn't see her do it.

"You can set up your equipment on this table," she said, indicating one at the end. "Hopefully it's big enough."

"It's fine, thanks, Nabiki," the brunette smiled.

"Cologne is going to have her ramen next to you, then the rest is for everything Nodoka and I made, with the one at the other end for the drinks." Nabiki watched as the chef quickly assembled a cooking surface, unpacking a bag with a lot of ingredients and premixed batter in bottles coming out of it. Another one held several implements such as spatulas and a mixing bowl.
"Do you need anything else?" she asked. Ukyo shook her head.

"No, with what Konatsu is bringing I should have everything. I can always run home if I run out of anything but I think I've got enough to feed a couple of dozen people, especially with all this other food as well," she replied, casting a glance at the plates and bowls full of prepared comestibles covering two more tables.

Nabiki grinned. "Remember we're expecting six magical girls as part of that couple of dozen people. Not to mention three martial artists, three Amazon warriors, and me."

Ukyo giggled a little. "You think you can eat as much as a magical girl?"

"Well, I do exercise a lot and I'm hungry," the Tendo woman replied, shrugging. "I intend to find out. And I love your okonomiyaki, although I haven't had it for a while."

Amused, Ukyo turned around having finished setting up. "You should come by more often, then. There's always a space for any of you, friends and family discount of course." She glanced at Genma. "Except for him."

They shared a look, then laughed for a few seconds. "Cologne has told me the same thing in the past," Nabiki gasped, chuckling wildly. "In almost exactly those words."

"The Elder has a certain amount of common sense," Ukyo giggled.

The pair watched as Soun finished setting up the last table, Genma coming out of the house with several crates of beer and soft drinks in bottle, which he put on the ground, before they both starting putting the bottles themselves on the table. After looking around a little guiltily Genma quickly popped the caps off a pair of beer bottles and handed one to his old friend, who took it with a nod of thanks. They were half-way through the first sip when the sound of Nodoka clearing her throat meaningfully from behind them made the two men twitch, then look around, worried. She pointed at an empty crate, they exchanged glances, sighed, slumped, then put the bottles away.

Ukyo looked at Nabiki, then raised an impressed eyebrow. "How does she manage to do that with just a look?" the brunette whispered. Nabiki grinned a little.

"I'm not entirely sure but she's good at it."

"Very." After another amused look at the two men who were finishing their job, looking over their shoulders nervously, she turned to the other young woman. "How's Akane? I heard she got back OK last night."

"She's fine as far as I know," the middle Tendo replied, "although she's still asleep. I checked on her about fifteen minutes ago. She was still snoring." Nabiki smiled. "They both looked absolutely exhausted when they got back yesterday." Checking her watch, she added, "That said, she probably needs a poke. It's nearly nine now and if she doesn't get up she'll end up tired all over again from sleeping too much."

The sound of the doorbell came, making them look around. "I'll get it if you want to wake Akane," Ukyo offered, heading into the house after Nabiki.

"Thanks." As the other woman went towards the front of the house, Nabiki trotted upstairs, tapping on Akane's door before opening it. "Hey, Sis, you awake yet?"

There was a slight grunt then a sleepy voice replied, "Nearly. What time is it?"
"About ten minutes to nine. AM. You slept all night and half of yesterday."

Akane rolled over and sat up, rubbing her eyes and yawning. "Oh." She yawned again. "Thanks for letting me sleep, then. It all hit at once and I can't even remember getting into bed." Shaking her head, she ran her hands through her hair, yawned one final time, then slid out of bed, standing and stretching. "Any signs of Shampoo?"

"Nope, not yet. I called the Café earlier and Mousse said she was still asleep as well, although Cologne was about to kick her out of bed. He said they'd be over soon."

"All right. I need a wash and I really need to brush my teeth. It tastes like one of the attic spiders crawled into my mouth and died." Akane made a face, as her sister grinned. "A big one."

"Those things would eat your head, not crawl into it," Nabiki giggled. "They're enormous." Both of them looked up for a moment when there was a couple of seconds of scuttling sounds above them, Akane paling slightly.

"I think there are more of them now," she said quietly.

"Maybe they ate Ryoga and are breeding," Nabiki suggested with an evil look. Akane giggled.

"No, he's fine, unfortunately. We... met... in L.A." At her sister's raised eyebrow she recounted the experience and the aftermath of that meeting, by the end of which the other woman was leaning against the bedroom wall weak with laughter.

"Oh, god, that's amazing," she managed to say, sliding down the wall to sit at the bottom of it. "I'm almost sorry for the idiot." The brunette looked up at the younger sister who was grinning. "And I'm really impressed you kept your temper considering the circumstances. Extremely pleased as well."

"Thanks, 'Biki," Akane replied, looking a little proud. "It was a near thing, but I think I've got it under control these days."

Standing again, Nabiki gave her sister a brief hug. "I'm glad for you. Go and get yourself sorted out then you can help set up. Once we're done with that I want to hear more about your trip." Akane smiled at the other Tendo, leaving the room and heading for the bathroom. Going back downstairs Nabiki went into the garden, finding Ukyo talking to Mousse.

"Hi," she said to him, the young man looking around and nodding politely to her in return.

"Hello, Nabiki. How are you? I haven't seen you for some time."

"I'm really well, thanks, Mousse. You? And how are you getting on with those knives I gave you for Christmas?"

He grinned at her. "I'm not bad at all, all things considered. I polished them up and played with them a little, they're really nicely balanced, but they're far too good to just use every day. I'll reserve them for that special someone who's worthy of a collectible knife in the kidney." Chuckling at the way both she and Ukyo giggled, he added, "Most people only warrant the cheap stuff, of course."

"Of course," Nabiki replied, smiling. "I can see that. Wouldn't want to waste the good cutlery on the commoners."

"No, you wouldn't." They shared a grin then he turned to the table next to Ukyo, on which he put a number of pots and pans he produced from his sleeves in a way that amused her despite herself. "The Elder and Shampoo are coming with the rest in a few minutes," he told the two women.

"How is Shampoo?" Nabiki asked curiously. "Akane is still a bit tired but is up and moving around now. She seems in a very good mood."

"Pretty much the same," he replied. "It was quite funny the way she more or less passed out as soon as she was back, they must have worked very hard, but she got up all right about half an hour ago looking pleased with herself. I didn't talk to her much before I came here, though, she was getting ready when I left."

"It'll be interesting to hear about their adventures," Ukyo suggested, turning around from putting the final touches on her cooking facilities. "I've never been to the US, I'd like to know more about it." She glanced at Nabiki. "I heard they were going to have some sort of recording of some of their work?"

"Yes, they should have a DVD of it, or possibly two," the middle sister confirmed. "Because of some delays they ran into it wasn't finished before they left but Aiko told me she was going to pop over and pick it up." She looked at her watch for appearance's sake, while quickly checking with her friend via the com. "Sometime last night, I believe, LA is sixteen hours behind us. So she should bring it with her when she comes."

"It's funny that a magical girl of all people is willing to teleport all the way to LA and back just to deliver a DVD," the chef laughed, shaking her head in wonder. "I mean, weird things happen around here all the time but surely that's odd even by Neriman standards?"

"I know what you mean, but life does seem to have taken a sharp turn towards the surreal in recent years," Nabiki agreed, grinning. "It's kind of fun."

"One way to put it," Mousse commented, listening with interest.

"Do any of you want something to drink?" Nodoka asked from behind them, causing them to turn to her. All three agreed that they did. Shortly they were sitting in the living room sipping tea and talking, Genma and Soun joining them a few minutes later. Just as they were sitting down, the doorbell went, Ukyo going to answer it without waiting for anyone else to get up and returning with her fiancé, who smiled at everyone then quietly accepted a cup of tea, sitting next to the brunette.

"All the tables are set up," the Tendo patriarch announced as he accepted a cup from Nodoka with a nod of thanks, then sat. "The drinks are set out, we've also put the garden lights up as well for tonight. Is there anything else we need to do?"

Nodoka pulled out her notebook, flipping to a page with a list on it then running her finger down it while muttering under her breath, to ultimately smile. "No, I think that's everything for the moment. We're just waiting for Shampoo and Cologne, then we can have a light snack. The first guests should be here in about five or six hours, I think." She looked over at Nabiki. "Your friend Miki and her boyfriend are definitely coming, did you say?"

The middle sister nodded. "Yes, and her two sisters, Hana and Kimiko."

"Good. And we're expecting Aiko and her team, Yori and Chou, Kazuo Ito and his wife, Norio Sasaki and his wife and sons, several of the students and a couple of friends of theirs, some of the neighbours..." Nodoka thought for a moment after trailing off into silence. "I make it forty-seven people all in including the people here. I hope there's enough food."
"I think we're fine on that front, Auntie," Nabiki smiled. "The fridge is completely full, so is the freezer, Ukyo has enough to feed a couple of dozen people she said, I'd think Cologne will bring at least as much, and if all else fails we can get more in. Less than fifty guests isn't a problem."

Tapping her pen on her lips Nodoka kept looking at her notebook, a slightly doubtful expression on her face, but finally nodded, flipping it closed and dropping it and the pen on the table with a sigh. "I hope you're right, Nabiki," she replied. "It would be terrible to have all those people and let them go away hungry."

Soun grinned at her after a look at his middle daughter, who was looking amused. "I doubt anyone will complain, Nodoka."

"Hey, worst case we can get Aiko to bring some pizza from New York or something," the middle sister chuckled, making everyone look oddly at her. She glanced around, then shrugged. "What? I've heard they do that sort of thing all the time."

"We know some odd people." Soun shook his head in wonder, as the others agreed.

Moments later, footsteps on the stairs heralded the arrival of Akane, who came into the room, looking around with a smile, then sat next to her sister. Nabiki handed her a cup for herself. "Feeling more awake now, sis?" she asked.

Akane grinned. "Yes, definitely. Sorry I went out like a light, I hadn't realised how tired I was until I got home then everything caught up at once like a brick to the head. But I feel fine now. Very hungry, though."

"I can imagine, dear," Nodoka sympathised, glancing at the clock. "You haven't eaten anything in at least eighteen hours. I'm going to prepare a little food for us all in a minute just to get everyone started. It's a little early so it's more of a late breakfast, I suppose."

"Would you like some help, Nodoka?" Ukyo offered. The Saotome woman nodded with a grateful smile.

"Thank you, dear, that would be nice."

"We should eat in the garden," Genma suggested, looking around. "There's barely room to move in here and Cologne and Shampoo aren't here yet."

Even as he spoke the doorbell went again, Akane hopping to her feet and going to answer it. When she came back Cologne was with her.

"Shampoo is carrying things around the house to the tables," the Elder announced, accepting tea with a smile of thanks to the much younger Nodoka. Her sharp eyes scanned the room, then turned to Akane, inspecting her closely. "You look well, child," she added. "And if Shampoo is anything to go by slept for some time."

"I did, Elder," the young woman replied respectfully but with a smile. "I was very tired indeed. But I'm fine now."

"Good. I'm expecting some interesting stories very soon," the ancient little woman grinned. Shampoo came in through the side door, looking around with a smile of her own, then nodded to Ukyo and Konatsu. Moving to stand beside Akane she grinned at her.

"Sleep well?" she asked. Akane chuckled.

"As far as I know, yes. Can you remember going to bed? I can't."
"Nope. Walked in to the Café, said hello, then woke up about forty minutes ago," the Amazon snickered. "No idea what happened between those times."

Everyone laughed a little, then most of them went outside, Soun and Genma moving a couple of the currently empty tables together to make a space for having some food on, while both sisters and Shampoo rounded up some folding chairs. By the time everything was set up Ukyo was ferrying food on trays out to them, Nodoka joining her a few minutes later.

"So, dear, tell us about LA," Soun requested, settling into his chair with a bottle of beer and a couple of sandwiches. "What was it like? What did you two do there?"

Akane and Shampoo exchanged glances for a second or two.

"Well..." The youngest sister thought. "I do recall we laughed a hell of a lot." She grinned again. "It was an enormous amount of fun and we were laughing so much during parts of it anyone watching would probably think there was something wrong with us." Shampoo nodded, an expression of wry amusement on her face.

"All sorts of funny things happened, I have to admit," the lilac-haired woman chuckled. "Everyone seemed to enjoy themselves to a degree that's probably illegal. Working shouldn't be so much fun." Everyone smiled at her comment. "Some pretty strange things happened as well."

"Such as?" Nodoka enquired curiously.

"Oh, let's see..." Akane made a big production of thinking hard, frowning. "There was the bank robbery, Aiko working out how to teleport entire trucks, helping out some lost Japanese tourists..." She looked at Shampoo.

"That teenager who was crawling around in the rafters having snuck in through the ventilation system, Aiko stopping a gun battle by blowing up two cars..." the other woman added.

"I wish I'd seen that," Akane mumbled, looking disappointed. Shampoo nodded.

"There was the time you rolled the car then pushed it back onto its wheels," she continued, grinning at Akane, who rolled her eyes. "Poor Greg. He looked... very odd." The Chinese woman giggled when her friend sighed.

"What about when you ran into Ryoga and wrecked the thing?" the youngest Tendo sniped back. "At least it was still drivable after my little... misfortune."

Everyone else was listening with varying expressions mixing surprise and amusement in different proportions. Nabiki was aware of some of this, due either to Aiko telling her or directly from her sister, but the magical girl had kept a lot of it quiet, saying she wanted it to be a surprise. She'd seemed to find the idea very funny.

"You two did have an interesting time, didn't you?" Cologne said after a moment. The two young women nodded simultaneously. Leaning forward the elder looked closely at them. "Start at the beginning..."

Over two hours later Nabiki was still shaking her head in wonder, respect, and amusement. "Wow. Just... Wow." She looked at the two sitting opposite her, smiling, then around at the others who were all looking impressed, even Cologne. "It sounds like you had a real adventure."

"That's a good way to put it," Shampoo agreed. "Some parts of it weren't exactly ideal, or planned for that matter, but most of it was damn good fun aside from anything else. We both learned all sorts of neat things. I'm seriously thinking about getting a motorbike even if we don't get the job."

"You'll get the job," Aiko assured her with glee, laughing when everyone jumped as she appeared behind the Amazon. Nabiki made herself do the same even though she'd been aware of the imminent arrival of her friend, sending her an amused look.

"Gah!" Shampoo spun around her chair, as did Akane next to her, both of them glaring at the magical girl in annoyance. "You said you'd stop doing that!"

"I lied," Aiko giggled, shrugging. Soun chuckled as he got over his shock. Shampoo and Akane exchanged a look and sighed a little. "Here. I just wanted to drop this off so you can watch it before the party." She handed Shampoo a small parcel, the right size to contain some DVDs. "Adrian said it came out really well. He gave me a copy as well but I haven't watched it yet. Mitch is going to be looking at it later today, so I think you'll be hearing from them soon."

"Thanks, Aiko," Akane replied, inspecting the box as Shampoo opened it and looked inside, taking out three DVD cases. Each one proved to contain two disks, one labelled "Akane Tendo/Xian Pu Demo Reel" with a long alphanumeric code under the title, and "Out-takes" with the same code on the other.

"If you want to show it at the party," Aiko added, "I can bring a sort of projector device with me that will do the job pretty well. It's an interesting bit of technology we picked up on holiday." Akane looked at Shampoo, who nodded, then smiled.

"That sounds very useful. Yes, please, we'd like that."

"OK. Right, I have to run. I've got some other things to do, but I'll see you all in a few hours," the petite brunette said, smiling at them all, then blinked out of existence. Several people blinked quite a lot themselves, the flash was pretty bright even in the sunlight.

"I still can't believe how easily the girl does that," Cologne commented with an impressed expression. "Teleportation is a complex spell but she does a more powerful version of it than I've ever encountered before as casually as if she was sitting down. Quite remarkable."

"She's very good at it," her great-granddaughter agreed absently, looking at the DVD case in her hand. She looked up. "Who wants to see how it came out?"

Everyone put their hands up, a round of laughter echoing about the garden.

"Let's go inside and we can see what you girls got up to," Nodoka suggested. "We have plenty of time before the guests start arriving."

Shortly everyone was arranged in the living room, the low table in the middle of it having been temporarily taken into the hallway and leaned against the wall to make room. Shampoo handed Akane one of the DVD cases, which she opened and extracted the first disk from, putting it into the player then closing the drawer. Kneeling on the floor in front of the TV she pressed the play button.

After a short pause, a menu came up with 'Mountain Picture Studios' at the top, very professionally done, various chapters below it in the same way as a normal movie disk. She selected the first one and hit play again while everyone watched the screen.

This segment was the martial arts demonstration, which had been filmed in its entirety, giving nearly forty minutes of her and Shampoo wrecking the room with Aiko's help. They watched it mostly in silence, various people occasionally whispering to each other and sometimes laughing a little at some of the results. When it finished, the youngest Tendo paused the video, looking around at her family and friends. Everyone was smiling and Soun, particularly, was looking proud. Cologne seemed almost impressed, studying both girls with an evaluating expression.

"Very good," the Elder finally said with a small nod of satisfaction. "You both cooperated well in the joint spar against Aiko, fought well against each other, and followed the orders of your fight coordinator precisely. Excellent." She looked at Soun who had been nodding along with her. "It would appear that our mutual training hasn't fallen on deaf ears."

"No, Elder, I would agree entirely," he responded gravely, making Akane smile at him and Shampoo snicker. "I am very pleased to see we haven't been wasting our time."

"Thanks, Dad," Akane said with an amused sigh, bowing her head to him for a moment, which made him grin.

"All joking apart you did very well, both of you," he added. "We're all impressed how well it worked. It was nicely choreographed too."

"Aiko helped a lot with that," Shampoo told him. "We've spent several hours over the last couple of weeks talking about the best way to arrange things to make it look impressive without being silly. I think it worked. She has a good eye for that sort of thing."

"It sure looked good," Nabiki laughed. "Better than any fight scene in any martial arts movie I've ever seen and no special effects or camera tricks. Those people on the gantry at the back looked stunned."

"Those were the various studio people," Akane giggled. She skipped back through the video until she found a good shot of the viewing gantry as the camera panned across it following Shampoo. "That's Adrian, you met him before, Dad, when he came here with Matt there. The tall man next to him is Jim, the safety director, that guy is Aaron the arms master, then on the other side is Anton who's an executive producer. Behind them is Mitch, the chief operating officer, and finally Jennifer the human resources director."

"So you met some pretty high level executives, then?" Nabiki asked. Her sister nodded.

"Yes, from what Adrian said the only higher one would be the CEO, who was away last week, although he also said Mitch is in many ways the most important person in the studio. If he makes a decision it's not likely anyone would go against it. So assuming he's OK with us, the rest will fall into line one way or another." Akane smiled, then shrugged a little. "That's what he thinks, anyway, and Anton said the same thing. It looks good so far."

"Very well done, girls," Nodoka praised them, looking pleased as well. "Can we see the rest?"

"OK," Akane replied, going back to the menu and selecting the next segment which was the spy scene. Her version played first, followed by Shampoo's, the studio editing having put background music to both of them which seemed to be from the actual movie the scenes were from. Everyone watched it carefully, comparing the two versions.

"That was very impressive as well," Gemma finally said when the youngest sister had paused the video again, turning around to look at them all. "It looked very professional, as good as any movie I've seen before."

"Thank you," both Akane and Shampoo responded simultaneously, grinning at each other in the
"Your gun-play looked extremely competent," Mousse observed with interest. "You must have practised quite a lot."

"Aaron was pleased with the results," Shampoo told him. "We spent, what, about four or five hours in the firing range?" She glanced at Akane who nodded.

"I think it was about that, yes. It was a hell of a lot of fun." They explained the bullet catching Aiko had taught them, making several people laugh, especially when her little practical joke on Aaron was mentioned. "Poor guy looked like he was going to faint," Akane giggled, shaking her head. "He went completely white for a second."

"That girl has a weird sense of humour," Ukyo grinned.

"They all do, I think. It seems to come with the magical girl lifestyle," Shampoo told her. "All the ones I've met tend to find amusement in the weirdest things."

"I think that when you might at any point find yourself in a battle to the death, your sense of humour probably would become a little dark," Konatsu observed, breaking his silence for the first time. Everyone looked at him, then thought about it for a while. Most of them nodded in the end. Nabiki studied the young man, thinking he was actually very perceptive. He faded into the background so much most of the time you tended to forget there was a very sharp mind present.

Turning back to the TV Akane hit play again, the bar scene staring immediately. This had everyone laughing a lot. "That was brilliant," Nabiki giggled when it was finished. "That poor guy behind the bar, Shampoo! You nearly knocked him out with that glass."

The Amazon looked mildly embarrassed. "I got carried away and used a little more force than I should have," she admitted. "He got better."

They watched the roof-top chase at the airfield, then Nabiki squinted at the screen as the final shot showed Akane and Shampoo walking away from the buildings. "Hey, is that a mallet?" she asked curiously. Akane blushed.

"Yes," she replied quietly.

"I haven't seen you produce one of those since the last time Ryoga came through," her sister said, studying her.

"They turn up when I'm really angry," the younger Tendo said. "I wasn't expecting one this time, I have no idea why I was suddenly holding it. I might have gotten a little too much into it." She blushed again when both Shampoo and Nabiki laughed.

"At least you weren't actually angry," the lilac-haired woman beside her said. Akane shook her head, smiling.

"No, if anything it was the opposite. I was having a hell of a lot of fun."

"Interesting," Cologne muttered, studying them both with a thoughtful expression. After a moment, she waved at the TV which was again paused. "Anyway, continue. What's next?"

"The car stunt," Akane replied, pressing play again. "This was the big one we practised a lot for. Even while we were doing it I wasn't completely sure I could pull it off but in the end everything worked perfectly."
The sequence began with the two young women, dressed in motorcycle leathers and helmets, running out of the fake bank, a number of police people following and firing at them. Akane dived sideways to avoid the bullets, ending up watching Shampoo roar off on the bike they'd presumably arrived on, then looked around wildly, to jump into a nearby car which was soon following the other woman. Several police cars screamed after them. "This is edited together from several different takes," Akane explained as it went on. They could see the same buildings go past more than once showing the truth of the statement.

Eventually it got to the part where the car lost a tyre, then ended up on two wheels. Nodoka gasped as Akane climbed out the window, crouching on the vehicle side and reaching in to steer it, while Nabiki stared in amazement. "Holy shit, sis," she muttered. Even with her own skills she was certain she couldn't do the same thing without a lot of practice.

When the on-screen Akane leaped off the car onto the bike, which had come alongside, then the pair shot off seconds before the huge explosion as the car rammed into the truck, everyone present except the two young women on screen stared in amazement then exchanged wondering glances. Akane was grinning to herself while Shampoo was giggling. "It looks even better like this than it did when we saw the playback at the time," the latter commented. Akane nodded.

"They edited it really well, it was wonderful. I'll bet Adrian is very happy."

"That was... more than a little impressive," Cologne finally said. "Not quite what I was expecting, I have to admit, but... impressive." She had an odd expression on her face as she watched the two. "Can we see it again, please?"

"Sure." Akane skipped back to the start and played the segment once more.

"Impressive indeed. Quite a lot of interesting skills in play." The ancient Amazon shook her head a little. "You two have learned a lot of fascinating things in a short period of time. I'm very pleased with both of you."

"Thank you," Akane smiled. Turning back to the screen she played the last part, the helicopter assault, which had both runs on it. The second one where they both jumped out of the machine in flight had the entire audience laughing, the expressions on the 'guards' faces was hysterical. They clearly hadn't expected that approach at all.

"Poor Matt," Shampoo snickered. "He looked really surprised."

"That's not unexpected," Nodoka commented while smiling a little. "It wasn't the sort of move I'd think anyone there would think was likely. It looked spectacular, though. I'm glad you didn't miss the tower."

"It would have stung a lot," Akane admitted. "If we didn't know that Aiko could have gotten Chou or Yori there in seconds if it all went horribly wrong we might not have risked it, but under the circumstances it seemed like a good idea."

"What's on the other disk?" Ukyo asked, looking at the case on the floor.

"I think it's all the times things didn't work out quite as well," Akane replied, picking it up and looking at it.

"Well, go on, then, let's see it," Nabiki urged her sister, who was beginning to appear slightly embarrassed. She thought there were probably some very funny things to see based on the other woman's face. After a moment Akane sighed a little, ejected the first disk, and put in the new one.
"Try not to laugh too much," she requested pleadingly, which of course made everyone laugh.

Half an hour later they were all having difficulty breathing due to the ensuing hilarity. "Oh, god, sis, that was amazing," Nabiki gasped, lying on the floor clutching her stomach. "The look on your face as you bounced past the camera..." Nodoka was trying to suppress her giggles, Cologne was obviously biting the inside of her cheek to do the same, while everyone else didn't bother. Soun got up and knelt next to his youngest child, putting his arm around her shoulders as she sat with her arms folded looking slightly annoyed.

"I'm very glad you didn't get injured, beyond some bruises and scrapes, but you have to admit it was extremely amusing, dear," he consoled her. She looked at him, frowning slightly, then sighed, giggling a little herself.

"I suppose so. I didn't realise at the time how good the footage would be or that they were filming everything." She shook her head as Nabiki, who had been in the process of sitting up, saw her sister's face and collapsed again, convulsing with laughter. "Stop it you idiot," she muttered, poking the older woman with her toe. Nabiki rolled a little further away and kept snickering.

Eventually the laughter died down, Shampoo picking up the remote and poking around on the disk. "There's still some stuff here we haven't seen," she noted. "Um, looks like my recording from the news about Minato and those horrible little biting things, this must be some of the practice stuff with the tower and the helicopter, and... Oh, what's this?" She highlighted the last entry and hit play.

"Oh, crap," Akane muttered as the video began. "How the hell did she get this?"

They were watching the inside of a bank, from a viewpoint near the ceiling, the audio clear and undistorted with the picture perfect. Akane and Shampoo were standing in front of a tall man with a gun, who looked extremely irritated and not a little dangerous. Everyone watched and listened quietly as the end of the bank robbery played out, the video ending shortly after Ms Aoyama left the building again.

Nabiki found it an interesting experience as she got to see her alter-ego from an unusual viewpoint in the company of people who had never experienced her before, as well as some who had and clearly wished they hadn't. Cologne was being very quiet, staring at the screen, while Shampoo looked like she was shivering a little. Akane was pale.

"That... woman... is somewhat intimidating," Soun finally noted in a low voice. He glanced at Akane and Shampoo with mild worry, then looked over at Cologne, who met his eyes soberly. "I begin to understand the points you made," he told her. She nodded slowly.

"I think it would be a bad idea to underestimate her or annoy her," the Elder replied quietly. Glancing at her relative and the youngest Tendo, who were now looking at each other, she added, "Although, somewhat remarkably, I feel that Aiko is probably correct and she has a certain amount of fondness for the both of you, based on that. Certainly there was definite respect for your actions and a degree of satisfaction."

"That's what Aiko has said several times," Akane said, slightly nervously. "But... when you actually talk to Ms Aoyama, you... tend to be more than a little worried, even so." She shuddered. Nabiki watched with inner amusement coupled with a certain amount of self-satisfaction, and a touch of regret that she'd scared her sister quite that much. She resolved that even if her magical girl activities ever came out it would probably be for the best not to admit to being Ms Aoyama. Akane was unlikely to see the funny side.
"I hear you are leaving Japan, Peasant," an annoyingly familiar voice said in a haughty tone from behind her, making Akane freeze, then sigh silently. She glanced at Shampoo who was next to her looking over the table of food Nodoka had laid out, before they both turned to regard Kodachi who was standing on the garden wall with her hands on her hips inspecting them with a certain curious air added to the normal superior look. "Perhaps this is a good thing, the tone of the neighbourhood will undoubtedly rise without you and your... associate... in it." She gave Shampoo a dismissive look.

"What do you want, Kodachi?" Akane asked politely, doing her best not to let the crazy woman provoke her. She could still vividly remember the last time and how it ended, making her somewhat surprised that the Kuno woman was doing this. There was a brief look in Kodachi's eyes that made her wonder for a moment if in her own way the weird gymnast was worried she wouldn't have anyone left to torment. Almost a look of loss in some peculiar manner.

"I merely wished to confirm the rumour, of course." Kodachi sniffed, flipping her ponytail in a dismissive gesture. "I find it almost beyond belief that someone of your low status would be able to arrange to go to America except perhaps as manual labour." There was a weird little smile on her face now. Akane squinted at her sidelong, wondering what was going on.

"It's true, in fact," she replied after a moment. "We've both been in the US for a week training and doing job interviews. We're almost certainly going to get hired." She smirked for a second or two. "At quite good rates, thanks. Not by the hour."

Kodachi studied her, crossing her arms and looking down her nose at them both. "I see. I must say my opinion of the Americans is lowered even more by the fact that they would employ such as you. But then they always were an uncivilised lot." She smiled in a supercilious manner, while Akane sighed again and Shampoo said something rude under her breath in Mandarin.

"If that's all, we're rather busy right now, so you can leave," the youngest sister said. "We don't really have time to beat you up right now. Come back on Monday and we'll be glad to do it, though." She grinned as Kodachi glared, Shampoo beside her snickering.

"As if I have time to pander to your clumsy attempts at martial arts, Tendo," the other woman growled. She shifted position on the wall, making both the other two tense slightly. "However, I do indeed have better things to do today than demonstrate to the pair of you how hopelessly outclassed you are, so I will be on my way. No doubt we will meet again when you ignominiously return, quite likely deported for some street brawl." The dark-haired woman smiled maliciously. Akane just stared at her.

A few seconds passed, then Kodachi turned around, running lightly to the end of the wall. Pausing for a moment, she looked over her shoulder. "Tendo. Do not bring the name of Nerima into disrepute by your actions. It would reflect badly on all of us."

"I'll do my best, Kodachi," Akane called sarcastically.

"I would expect nothing less, although your best is hardly perfection," the Kuno woman retorted as she jumped from the wall to the roof of the neighbours house, disappearing over it. Both Shampoo and Akane watched for a moment but she didn't reappear.

"Is it my imagination or was that almost a compliment?" Shampoo asked slowly. Akane shook her head.

"She's nuts, you know that, but I agree she was in some weird way much less abrasive than normal. She didn't even use that horrible laugh." She shrugged. "Maybe she's afraid she'll miss us." They exchanged another look, rolled their eyes, laughed, then went inside the house.

Hearing the doorbell ring yet again, Nabiki answered it, finding Mariko and two other students of her father's standing outside, smiling at her. "Hi, guys. Come in."

"Thank you, Nabiki," Mariko said politely as they entered.

"Just go through into the back, a few other people have arrived so far," the middle sister replied, indicating the way. All three students nodded politely and followed the instructions, vanishing into the house. As she was about to close the door again, the front gate opened, Mr Ito and his wife coming through. She waited for them to arrive, then directed them in the correct direction. Looking around, she could neither see nor feel anyone else imminently arriving so closed the door, before going into the kitchen.

"That's another five people," she announced to Nodoka who was taking several trays of prepared sushi out of the fridge. "About half the guests have turned up so far. I got a call from Miki half an hour ago saying she and the others were going to be late, there was some sort of minor earthquake damage to the tracks which is being repaired at the moment."

"All right, Nabiki, thank you," the older woman replied, half-inside the appliance. She emerged holding a large tray. "Could you take this one out for me while I get the other one?"

"Sure." She took the tray and waited for the Saotome woman to retrieve the second one, pushing the door of the fridge closed with her foot then following Nodoka out into the back garden. They both deposited their loads on the relevant table, a number of people immediately descending on the food like a flock of vultures. Nabiki grabbed a few salmon rolls before they could all vanish then wandered over to where Ukyo was chatting to Akane while making Mousse some okonomiyaki on her grill. Her sister was holding a bowl of Cologne's ramen, slowly eating it while replying to various questions the chef had about the previous few days.

"People seem to be enjoying themselves," Akane said as Nabiki joined them, looking around the garden.

"Looks that way," she replied, smiling. "We've still got nearly twenty people due, though. Yori and her lot, my friend Miki and her sisters and boyfriend, that policeman and his family..." She popped a sushi roll into her mouth and chewed.

"It's still early," Ukyo noted as she flipped the contents of the grill onto a plate in a practised motion, handing it to Mousse who murmured his thanks before trying it.

"Yep. I'd expect most of the others to turn up in the next hour." Leaning against the wall of the house Nabiki looked over the garden. Little clumps of people were talking to each other all over the place, apparently having fun. She smiled to herself. "When are you guys getting here?" she silently asked her other sister over the link.

Kasumi's voice came back to her immediately. "Within ten minutes, sister," she replied calmly. "We were waiting for Tamiko, she was running an errand for her mother and only just finished. Should we teleport into the garden, or come in more traditionally, do you think?" There was a note of humour in her voice.

Nabiki chuckled to herself. "Surprise us," she said.

"I expect teleporting would suffice in that case." Kasumi giggled for a moment. "But we'll do something else just for fun."
"See you soon," the middle sister snickered, closing the link. "I'm pretty sure Yori and the others should be here soon," she said honestly, internally amused.

"Oh, good," Akane remarked, smiling. "I need to thank her and Chou for everything they did. I forgot to mention it at the bank, I was still a little shaken by everything." She took the sushi roll Nabiki handed her with thanks, nibbling it. "I really do owe Yori huge thanks for the favour she did me. Us." The blue-haired woman glanced at Shampoo, who was grinning. "And Aiko, of course, but I've been saying thanks over and over again. I think she was getting tired of hearing it in the end."

Ukyo laughed. "She seems to think of all that teleporting as just something you do, hardly worth mentioning. Like me making these." She flipped another okonomiyaki onto a plate and hurled it at Soun, who caught it nimbly with a call of thanks. Nabiki and Akane both watched, then smiled at each other at the sight.

"You really are very good at that," Akane giggled.

"Lots of practice," the chef replied. "Lots and lots and lots of practice."

Finishing her sushi, the middle sister moved down the table, scooping out her own bowl of ramen from the huge pot Cologne had set to simmering on a hotplate, adding some prawns from a bowl of them next to it. Heading over to the pond, which Nodoka was standing near, talking to the Amazon Elder and smirking a little as she pointed at it while looking at her husband, she listened for a while as the older woman explained how she was slowly wreaking havoc on the psychological health of the two martial artists. Cologne was barely suppressing a laugh during the explanation, an evil grin playing about her lips.

"Very well done, dear," she replied when Nodoka had finished. "Worthy of a master of the technique." She glanced at Genma, who was looking around as if he thought someone was about to do something horrible, appearing somewhat worried. "I'll have to see if I can come up with anything to help." She cackled quietly to herself while the elder Saotome woman looked both pleased and amused. Nabiki was grinning as well. When Genma suddenly turned around and stared suspiciously at them, all three instantly had completely blank expressions, which if anything seemed to make him even more nervous. Excusing himself from Kazuo Ito and his wife, the rotund martial artist scuttled off towards the beer.

"He looks worried," Nabiki giggled.

"Excellent. A little worrying is good for the soul. It builds character," Nodoka replied serenely, causing Cologne to nearly choke on the drink she had just raised to her lips. The Saotome woman smiled a little.

"You're an evil woman, Auntie."

"Thank you, my dear."

Cologne asked, "Do you know when Yori and her friends are supposed to arrive, Nabiki?"

Moments after she spoke, she looked around sharply. "Never mind, I can feel them coming." A few seconds later, 'Yori' appeared on the roof of the house, 'Chou' landing next to her, then one by one Aiko and her group, until there was a line of magical girls standing there. Everyone in the garden looked up.

"You're showing off now," Nabiki sent, laughing.
"Only a little," her sister-in-law replied, sounding amused. She waved to the people on the ground, some of whom waved back although most of them simply stared in mild shock. "Hi, everybody," she called out loud.

"Hi, Doctor Nick!" Nabiki shouted back, unable to resist, then laughed her head off. Everyone stared at her with varying expressions. Shampoo was grinning, Nodoka shaking her head sadly, Ukyo giggled, while Akane just sighed heavily. Most of the others looked puzzled.

"You're weird, Nabiki," Tamiko yelled, laughing. The six women on the roof turned ninety degrees in perfect synchronism, ran to the end of the ridge-line, then one at a time somersaulted off to land on the lawn. The crowd of people clapped. 'Yori' bowed, smiling, then came over to greet Akane.

"Hi, Akane, and Shampoo too. Did you have a good time in LA?" she asked. Akane nodded, grinning widely, giving her friend a quick look. The Amazon also nodded happily.

"We did, thank you. And thank you so much for thinking of me and getting in touch with Adrian." She bowed respectfully, as did Shampoo.

"You're more than welcome, both of you," the martial artist replied, looking pleased. "It was the right thing to do from both sides. I really hope everything works out well for you two. And Adrian, of course, he's a good man."

"He is," she agreed. "All the people we met were very nice, to be honest. It was a hell of a lot of fun and very good training." She looked at 'Yori' curiously. "Did you watch the DVD Aiko had?"

"Yep. We were genuinely impressed, to be honest. That car stunt was remarkable." The martial artist grinned. "The helicopter assault was pretty good as well, especially the second one, and the martial arts demonstration was very well done. Aiko was very pleased with how it all worked out for you guys, and she had immense fun as well."

"We would have had a much harder time without her," Akane replied truthfully. "She was incredibly helpful. Especially with teleporting entire truck-fulls of equipment around the place."

'Yori' chuckled. "She was very pleased to work out how to do that. So are the rest of us, it could well come in handy at some point." She looked over to where Aiko was talking to Cologne and Kazuo Ito, before turning back to the youngest Tendo. "I'm really glad it worked out so well. Apparently you should have an answer on Monday, or thereabouts?"

"That's what we're told, yes," Shampoo agreed with a nod. "We're both still a little nervous about it but everyone seems sure it's going to happen, so all we can do is wait."

"Good luck." 'Yori' smiled, radiating satisfaction. "OK, I'll see you later, I need to introduce myself to some of the other guests, who seem to be looking a little startled." She nodded to the small group then moved off, soon shaking the hand of the various students who were looking at her in awe. Nabiki smiled internally before turning to her sister.

"She's in a good mood."

"From what I've seen she usually is," Akane giggled. "I think by the time she's annoyed everything has already gone to hell. Hopefully that's not going to happen today."

"With luck, no," Ukyo said, looking around at the various guests. "Hey, let's get that music system going, then I want some sushi myself. And a drink."

They headed off to satisfy both requirements, everyone around them apparently having a very good
After watching Yori and the policeman Lieutenant Sasaki talk for a while, Cologne made her way over to the magical girl, stopping to talk to various other people en route, until she was close enough to talk. The petite woman glanced at her with an acknowledging nod, looking back to her current conversational partner, who was apparently just finishing up whatever he'd been talking about. With a respectful smile to both of them, he wandered off, soon ending up speaking to Soun and a couple of the neighbours. She watched him go, then turned to the other, much younger woman, who was looking expectant. "You seem to have some questions, if I'm any judge," the girl quietly said in her rich voice, smiling a little and leaning back against the wall around the garden.

The Amazon studied her, feeling the aura the young woman radiated, which was more powerful than she could easily believe. If she wasn't mistaken it was even more powerful, in fact, than it had been the last time she encountered the violet-eyed girl, although she seemed to be suppressing it somewhat even so. Eventually, after an internal debate, she threw caution to the winds.

"May I ask if you can tell me what a certain person I believe we both know means by the phrase 'Temporal Upset'?" Cologne watched as Yori's face went expressionless, her aura damping out to the point it was barely noticeable for a few seconds, something she found both interesting and somewhat worrying considering how hard the feat would actually be.

Eventually, the girl sighed, smiling a little sadly. "I can tell you something about it, yes. I'm afraid that for various reasons I can't be as open as you might want me to, but those reasons are good ones. You'd probably even agree with them."

"If I knew what they were, of course," Cologne chuckled. Yori nodded with a small grin. "I'm aware of such problems, we have a few issues of our own that fall into that sort of category," the Elder added after a moment. "I'd still be grateful for whatever you can tell me. The entire event, whatever it really was, has left those of us who are supposed to know more about magic than practically anyone feeling rather... well, scared isn't a word I like to use about myself, but under the circumstances..." She shivered a little. Yori inspected her, seeming to understand.

"I don't blame you, Elder. I was heavily involved in the entire thing, which you obviously worked out, and it terrified me. Not a lot does, these days." She appeared to be being completely honest about that part. Yori shrugged, sighing again. "OK. As you can imagine, we don't want this story becoming known to the public at large, not because it's really a deep dark secret, but more for reasons to do with stopping people panicking and running around like headless chickens. The problem is over, permanently, but... It raises a number of things that would make most people very uncomfortable."

"If it's as serious as I suspect, that doesn't surprise me." Cologne watched the younger woman nod and sigh.

"About as serious as it gets, yes. The government is in the process of producing an official explanation that will, hopefully, satisfy enough people in high places that they'll calm down and live with it." She shrugged slightly. "Not to mention that, for various peculiar reasons mostly to do with the odd effects of temporal manipulations, it's likely to fade out of the majority of memories to one extent or another over the next few months. That's our hope, anyway, and we have some expert opinions that suggest it's right."

There was a pause while the Elder thought about what she'd heard and Yori seemed to be trying to work out the best explanation. Eventually she began speaking, relating a story that, while it was obvious to Cologne it was incomplete and censored, sufficed to impart the main points very well.
At the end of it, some ten minutes later, the ancient woman was beginning to wish she'd left well enough alone. When Yori stopped talking, they just looked at each other, the Amazon with her mind whirling from the new concepts she'd heard, Yori seeming resigned.

"Oh, ancestors, that's utterly terrifying," Cologne finally whispered, pale-faced.

"Yep." Yori nodded tiredly. "You see why we're only telling a few people we can trust to be sensible about it even the amount we are, which, as you've probably worked out, isn't all of it." The Elder nodded slowly. "Some of it isn't our story to tell, it impacts on the privacy of friends, and some of it we simply can't tell for various reasons, but that's the gist of it."

"I see. Thank you, I think," Cologne replied after a moment. She shook her head in wonder. "So this mysterious... whatever it is... pulled all the magic out of Jusenkyo to fight the time device?"

"Yes. It was somewhat unexpected, to be honest, but also the only thing that saved us all. Near enough all the magic of the entire world was kind of borrowed to use in the fight." Yori grinned at Cologne's expression of awed horror. "We put it back afterwards," she added.

"With considerable interest from what I saw," the Amazon retorted, still shaken.

"It seemed polite."

Cologne shook her head in disbelief. "Where did the excess come from?" she asked curiously after she'd had time to digest all the information. Yori shrugged slightly, smiling to herself.

"When the time device died and its little pocket dimension collapsed due to the attack by the rather unusual weapon we ended up using, it released a lot of magical energy. A huge amount, much more than was borrowed. That energy was recovered and stored, with some of the excess pumped back into the various sources that were drained to start the whole process off in the first place. We didn't actually ask for that to happen, our... helper... decided to do it on its own. It was a bit of a surprise but everything worked out OK in the end."

Studying the face of the much younger woman, Cologne got the distinct impression that there was a lot more to the entire story, but was also pretty damn sure she wasn't going to find it out. She wondered just how much excess energy had been 'stored', how, and where. Some of the implications were... uncomfortable. Deciding that she'd probably sleep better if she never found out, she nodded. "Well, on behalf of the Joketsuzoku tribes as lead Elder, allow me to convey our deep gratitude to you and your friends for saving the universe. It's much appreciated."

She chuckled as Yori grinned, pleased. The girl bowed slightly. "On behalf of myself, my friends and my colleagues, allow me to express our thanks for the gratitude. And you're all welcome, of course," she replied respectfully but with humour in her voice. "I'm sorry I can't go into more detail but as I said it's not possible."

Cologne waved her hand, dismissing the apology. "Don't worry about it, child. As I told you, I'm familiar with the problem. We all have our secrets and while I personally prefer to know everything I can, I can live with the fact that there are some things I may never know. It's irritating but not something that will make me lose sleep." She shook her head a little. "Except for the entire 'universe nearly ending' bit of course. That I'll lose quite a lot of sleep over for a while."

Yori snickered. "Funny. That's what most people we've told this to have said."

"I wonder why?" Cologne commented in a very dry tone. They exchanged a look, then laughed. "I have to admit, I didn't realise quite how... potentially apocalyptic... the life of a magical girl really "was," the Elder added after a little while. Yori looked at her, one eyebrow raised, so she continued, "I visited Minato recently and was more than a little surprised by the number of ki signatures that were definitely not human around the area. Add that to what you've told me and it seems to me that you and your compatriots are heavily involved in events that could well have a very significant effect on the future. But even so, the idea of the entire universe nearly winking out of existence...

She shuddered as she thought about it. "It's a good thing you girls are around."

The woman beside her was studying her with a thoughtful expression. "Thank you," she finally replied. "I think. It's not just our little grouping, of course, there are a lot of others around who have stopped some pretty horrific things from happening. That's just the ones I know about. Probably a few I never heard of as well. But we do our best." She shrugged a little with a small sigh. "For the majority of us it's not something we actually decided to do, it just sort of happened. It sneaks up on you, the crazy, and when it has you, you're stuck with it." She grinned briefly. "You just have to run with it then, or you go nuts as well. Not that any of us are all that sane by most people's standards."

The Elder snickered. "Trust me, I understand. My own life, while not quite as weird as that for the most part, has had a number of rather unusual adventures in it. Even the most recent generation seems to encounter odd people and happenings on a regular basis, without even the excuse of the magical girl lifestyle." She nodded towards where Shampoo and Akane were regaling the Dojo students with some story from LA. "It would appear to be a hazard of life in this area if nothing else."

"Pretty much," the girl chuckled. "Minato is even worse for some reason. One day I'll hopefully find out why. But for the moment we're just doing the best we can. By and large it's worth it."

"I'm glad of that," Cologne replied. "And pleased to know that people of your character are looking out for the rest of us, poor defenceless things that we are." She smirked at the dubious look the black-haired girl shot her.

"Defenceless... Yes, I can see it, you wouldn't stand a chance if, for example, some nasty mugger decided to jump you down a dark alley somewhere." Again, they shared a glance, identical dark smiles spreading across their faces.

"Quite. At my age? Brittle bones, that sort of thing. Best I stay out of it." Cologne cackled happily, nodded to the girl, then headed off to find something more to eat. Behind her, the martial artist watched her go, shook her head in amusement, then wandered away to talk to Ukyo.

#Your family and friends seem to be enjoying themselves,# Jun commented. Nabiki looked around the garden at the close to four dozen people, all of whom seemed to be smiling, not to mention eating, drinking, and talking. She nodded a little at the device's words.

'Sure looks that way. I'm glad we finally managed to get to do this. It's been pretty busy these last few weeks, it's nice to just relax.' She was sitting on top of the garden wall having climbed up amongst a lot of comments from her sister, who had jumped up and back a couple of times to show how it was meant to be done. The middle sister had privately smiled at the idea she could easily have done the same, but had to pretend she couldn't. Looking down, she caught her father's eye, motioning to the beer bottles on the table next to him. He smiled, then tossed her one, which she deftly caught, making him grin. Opening it by knocking the cap off against the wall made him chuckle before taking one for himself, which he did the thumb trick with.

She raised her bottle in salute, a gesture he mirrored, then went back to watching the party. 'Any more news on the LA situation?' she asked idly.
Nothing of note I'm afraid, Nabiki,

Jun replied quietly. The car used by the false officer Bowie has not yet turned up anywhere, neither has he. I have widened the search to all of California and Nevada, but so far have no more leads on that front. I am still following the financial trail of the group as well but again nothing particularly useful has emerged so far.

There was a minor note of annoyance in the silent voice. If your world had a better communications infrastructure I could work faster, of course. Even my abilities have limits, the data has to be accessible in the first place. Some of your world is rather deficient from the electronic storage point of view.

She giggled inside at the tone. 'I'm sure the situation will resolve itself in time, Jun. We're building the internet as fast as we can.'

Indeed. Now it sounded amused. But at the present time we have to work with what we've got. I suspect the people involved in this organisation are well aware of the perils of putting incriminating data in a form that can be remotely accessed. Security groups such as the US NSA do much the same thing I do, although to be honest in a far slower and less efficient manner. It's actually quite useful, I can extract the information from them directly rather than trawl for it myself which speeds things up considerably.

The machine paused for a moment. Although I have to admit that in some cases I believe the security agencies to have drawn some very odd conclusions from the data they have collected. Their analysis abilities would appear to be far outstripped by their actual data acquisition abilities. That is not efficient.

'How much of the NSA data archive have you... acquired?' she asked with an internal grin.

All of it. There was a feeling of satisfaction. It seemed the most effective ploy. Also all of the data collected by the UK's GCHQ and parallel institutions from other countries. As they are entirely based around computer systems accessing them is very simple. Banking records can be more difficult as even now a lot of it still seems to only exist as printed information. My subspace interaction systems can extract any electronically stored data with ease anywhere on the planet, even that stored off-line, especially augmented by the communications relay we now have, but paper is more difficult without physical access. It is possible some minor burglary will be required at some point.

'Laws are just guidelines to you, aren't they, Jun?' she smiled.

When it comes to your security, yes. the machine replied. I would not advocate breaking the rules wholesale under most circumstances, they are mostly there for a reason as you are well aware, but bearing in mind what we are apparently faced with, it seems appropriate to take all necessary precautions and access all available and relevant data. It is, after all, much the same thing that most governments do on a daily basis with in many cases far less reason.

'And you're not just sucking up everything you can because you're just insatiably curious?' she asked slyly. There was another pause.

Of course not, Nabiki. What would possibly give that impression? It sounded very amused.

'Sorry. I must have the wrong end of the stick with that idea.' She was smiling to herself again.

Your apologies are accepted, of course. Jun replied archly, causing her to snicker.

'Just don't get caught,' she told it.

With the current technological level of this planet, that won't happen, it assured her. Your species has no method to even detect the presence of an SI or its operations. To the best of my knowledge none but my makers do. It is, after all, one of the design goals that we are totally 'Have I said recently how glad I am that we met?' she asked.

'#Not for the last couple of weeks. Feel free to say it again.# She could almost swear it was laughing.

'Just assume from now on that I say it every day.' She giggled a little, silently. 'But it's true.'

'#Thank you, Nabiki.# the device commented, pleased. Finishing her beer, she tossed the bottle accurately into the large bin on the ground under her to one side then lowered herself from the wall, deciding she needed more ramen.

Soun watched Yori and Chou talk to Cologne for a while, before looking around, sipping a beer from the bottle. The other magical girls were mingling with the guests, all of them apparently enjoying themselves very much. He was interested to see that no one, after the initial shock of meeting them for the ones that hadn't until now, seemed at all overawed by their reputations. Aiko was talking animatedly to Akane and Shampoo, Nabiki was listening as Fumiko explained something to Genma, Kazuo Ito and his wife were apparently discussing the finer points of goldsmithing with Misaki, who seemed to know a surprising amount about it, and Tamiko was chatting to Nodoka about something or other with Ukyo and Konatsu joining in occasionally. He shook his head in mild wonder.

Mousse jumped over the garden wall carrying another crate of beer, handing it to Genma, who opened it and removed a bottle. Fumiko gestured and he gave her one as well with a grin. All three of them looked at each other, then popped the caps off with their thumbs, laughing.

"We seem to have met some very interesting people as a result of my youngest," he murmured to himself.

"So have we," a voice from beside him said unexpectedly, making him twitch a little and look. Yori smirked at him. He hadn't sensed her approach at all, which he found interesting albeit not all that surprising, considering. "Sorry. Bad habit."

"That's all right," he laughed. "I'm glad you could all make it to the party." She sipped her drink, some sort of fruit juice, smiling at him.

"So am I. It's nice to just be able to relax for once. We've been running around like lunatics for what seems like months now, dealing with some rather nasty problems."

"I take it you succeeded in your duties?" he enquired. She nodded, taking another sip.

"Pretty much. There's some fallout from it all that will probably be going on for months if not longer but most of that isn't our field or concern. I'm more than happy to leave it to people who know how to deal with it."

The man looked at his guest for a second or two. She was watching everyone in the party, giving him the distinct impression she was aware of the exact position and probable threat level of everyone present, which seemed to be an automatic reflex. He'd seen something similar in a couple of old acquaintances who had seen military service, although not to the same level. Momentarily he wondered about what she'd encountered in her career as a magical girl.

"You have a question, I can feel it," she commented idly, not looking up. He smiled a little.
"I was wondering if you knew what that odd twitch in the world the other day was. Elder Cologne seems to know more than she's saying, she went very quiet on the subject last weekend after being quite curious about the whole thing. Very few people seem to remember anything about it other than the twitch, although I saw something... something I have difficulty believing. Gemma, Shampoo, and Cologne all did as well. So did Mousse from what Shampoo said. I've asked around quietly and found that a number of the more advanced martial artists I know seem to remember something very similar." He fell silent for a moment. She said nothing although she glanced at him. "It seems to me that if anyone would know more, she's standing next to me."

Yori was silent for a few seconds more, then nodded once. "I know what it was. We're not talking very much about it, there are... potential issues, I suppose, if the story became wide-spread." She looked at him. "Issues that could cause people to react badly. There's nothing to worry about now, it's over, but even so..."

He sighed, nodding. "I think I understand. Individual people are normally fairly sensible, but get them worried in large numbers, they overreact."

"Exactly." She was silent again for long enough that he thought she was going to drop the subject but eventually began speaking again. "A very long time ago, some very smart but at the same time very stupid and desperate people a long way away built a machine. It was a remarkable achievement, although unfortunately one that should never have been even attempted, never mind successfully. The story is long and involves a lot of things I can't talk about, but the end result is that the machine became a threat to us. All of us. Our entire universe was at serious risk of something extremely unpleasant and quite possibly extremely final happening to it." She sighed minutely, then took another drink, not looking up. He was almost holding his breath, feeling abruptly cold.

"We, all of us here, and some other friends you haven't met, along with a number of experts from elsewhere, dealt with the problem. We never expected to be involved with anything so apocalyptic, not in our wildest nightmares, but when it happened, we were the ones who were able and willing to do what needed to be done." She laughed slightly bitterly. "Sometimes you just find yourself with no real choice. So, we did the job. Luckily, very luckily, we succeeded."

"And if you had failed?" He couldn't help himself, he had to ask. She looked at him for a moment, then went back to watching Chou and Cologne talk. The blonde looked over at them for a moment, smiling, before going back to her conversation.

"None of us would be in a position to talk about it." She finished her fruit juice and put the glass on the nearest table. "Even though we succeeded, there were casualties of the whole scenario. No one you know. Nobody died, amazingly enough, but..." Yori shook her head slightly. "A number of people are having a very bad time as a result. We're still trying to help them."

After a moment, when she stopped talking, he put his hand on her shoulder. "Thank you. All of you. I can see how hard you've worked on behalf of people who will probably never know how much you've done for them, so let me say I'm very proud to know such fine young women." Appearing slightly startled yet still grateful she looked at him, then smiled widely.

"Thanks. Most of the time we love what we do, even though it can be a pain in the ass some days, but every now and then you end up wondering what the hell you're up to." The young woman shrugged a little. "The crazy is very persistent, though, once it's got you, you're stuck with it. We just seem to get more of it than most people."

Soun laughed loudly for a moment. "I can't think of a better group to deal with weird problems, though. I've been involved in some fairly unusual things over the years but by the sound of it my adventures would barely raise an eyebrow in your circles." She snickered a bit, grinning at him.

"Oh, I don't know, I've heard a few things out of Nerima. It's a weird place."

"Weirder than Minato?" he asked incredulously. "You've got demons wandering around the place, for god's sake."

"Most of them are pretty nice people," she laughed. "A lot of them are very good friends." He shook his head wonderingly.

"So you've said in the past. I still find it odd." They fell silent, standing beside each other watching the party. After a couple of minutes, he glanced at the black-haired young woman next to him. "I have a problem I wanted to ask your advice on," he finally said, somewhat hesitantly, his earlier good humour disappearing as the issue he'd been thinking about for weeks came to the forefront of his mind. "It may not be something you can help with but I can't think of anyone else who could."

She looked curiously at him, then her gaze sharpened, giving the impression she was peering right through him. For all he knew she was. Across the garden, Chou looked up again, before politely excusing herself from the Amazon elder and beginning to make her way across to them.

"How long have you known?" Yori asked quietly.

"About six weeks, for sure," he responded, equally quietly, not at all surprised she'd worked it out without being told. "I've been wondering for rather longer." She looked at Chou as the blonde stopped next to them. He abruptly noticed that everyone in the garden seemed to have forgotten they were there, even the nearest bystanders looking through them as if they were invisible.

"Let's go inside." Yori indicated the doorway. He nodded, leading the way into the house, then up to his bedroom. Chou followed, closing the door behind them when they entered.

"Lie on the bed, please," Chou requested, glancing at her partner with a neutral expression. He did so. She ran glowing hands over his chest, then down over his abdomen, stopping in a couple of places, before looking at Yori again. The other woman repeated the exercise, sighing a little, before lifting her hands, the purple glow dissipating.

"How long did the doctor give you?" she asked, her voice gentle. His own shook slightly as he replied.

"One, perhaps as much as two years with aggressive chemotherapy," he admitted. "He's been trying to get me to start since we got the test results back. We went over the various treatment options but they're all rather unpleasant and uncertain."

He sighed. "People always said smoking was a bad idea. A little late now."

"Stage four lung cancer, metastasised into the spleen and the lower colon," Chou said. He nodded.

"Apparently it's progressing much more slowly than he expected, possibly due to the accelerated healing most high powered martial artists tend to have, but it's progressing nevertheless."

"I'm slightly surprised you're not showing any obvious symptoms," she commented, looking at him closely, with sympathy in her expression.

"In the mornings I tend to cough a lot for a few minutes." Soun shrugged. "It passes and I'm more or less fine then, but it's been going on for months. I went for a check-up because it wouldn't go away. I kept telling myself that it was just a persistent cold, or something like that..." He rubbed his forehead. "I knew I was fooling myself." Looking at the two women, he asked, hope in his voice and dread in his heart, knowing the likely answer, "You were amazingly effective with Akane. I don't suppose you can do anything about cancer?"

They exchanged a glance. Yori looked gravely at him. "I'm sorry." His heart fell. "I'm afraid the best we can do is a complete cure. Will that be enough?" She suddenly grinned manically as he stared, his mouth dropping open. Beside her, Chou giggled, although she still looked sympathetic.

"For god's sake, Soun, you should have got in touch with us as soon as you knew," the black-haired woman chided gently, chuckling. "We were on holiday but we'd have come back for this. There are of course lots of things we can't do, but not many surrounding medical matters. You're a friend. We help our friends. To be honest, we help anyone who needs it, but still..." Rubbing her hands together, she held them up as they began glowing and wiggled her fingers. "This will take a while, there are a lot of tiny tumours and cell fragments to get rid of, but you'll be fine. Now, we're just going to turn you off while we work, or you'd be in a certain amount of mildly agonising pain when we go after some of the worst ones. See you in a bit."

He felt a gentle touch on his forehead and was just fast enough to look over and see Chou smiling at him when everything went black.

It seemed like practically no time had passed when he suddenly found himself awake again, staring at the ceiling. He blinked a couple of times then looked around. Yori and Chou were both watching him with identical calm smiles. "How do you feel?" the blonde asked.

"Good. Fine, even." He sat up, breathing deeply a few times, experimentally, finding no sign of the faint tightness in his lungs that had come on in the last few days. A little disbelieving still, he looked at them again. "Is that it? Just like that?"

"Pretty much." Yori grinned. " Took about three quarters of an hour, there were quite a lot of tumours. It was spreading through your lymphatic system. I'd say you've been developing it for about three years. Most people would have been either dead or in hospital by now, you were right, your inherent healing was fighting damn hard. It wouldn't have stopped it forever, though, I'm afraid. You'd probably shake off a lot of less nasty cancers but that type is aggressive and fast moving."

"There's no risk now, though," Chou added, smiling at him. " We cleaned out everything, repaired the damage caused by the cancer, corrected the nicotine addiction which should stop you wanting to smoke any more, and fixed a couple of other small problems we came across as well. You were missing a tooth at the back and there was a rib that hadn't quite healed properly from some old injury." Startled, he probed with his tongue and found that the gap in his rear molars was indeed no more.

Feeling light-headed from the way his future had suddenly reopened in front of him, he stared at them, before wiping a few tears away. Standing, he bowed deeply to them. "Thank you. So very much, thank you. I didn't want to leave my daughters alone, especially with their mother gone, and the way she went."

"You're very welcome, Soun," Yori said quietly, sounding pleased, making a small bow of respect back. " It was our pleasure. It's always nice to be able to help someone without violence. We're very good at it, I'm afraid, but we don't really like it." He straightened up, watching as she turned to her partner. " I'm going back to the party, love, I'll see you in a moment."

"All right, dear," Chou said softly, smiling at the smaller woman, who left with a wave, closing the door behind her. The blonde turned to him. " Are you going to tell Akane and Nabiki?" she asked curiously, sounding politely interested. " Were you going to, if we couldn't help?"
Considering his words carefully for a few seconds, he finally said, "I would have had to tell them eventually. Nabiki, I think, could have handled it, she is an enormously strong person. I was worried about Akane. Despite everything you did for her and all the immensely hard work she's put in herself in becoming a better person, I still feared she would react badly. I'm still slightly worried she might overreact."

"They deserve the truth," Chou noted, not pushing, but merely stating a fact. He nodded.

"I do realise that. But it's still a difficult thing to say." He looked at her for a moment. "What would you want your father to say under similar circumstances?"

She smiled gently at him. "I'd want him to be honest, even it it was hard, and tell me. I haven't seen my father for a while, though."

A few seconds passed, then Soun smiled back. "He would be very proud of you. Any father would. What you do, what you have done, is truly remarkable. As I told Yori earlier, I'm very pleased that such fine people exist, and pleased that my family met them. Especially considering all the good you have done for us for no reward."

"Thank you." She looked touched. "Seeing someone get better is enough reward. One day, I hope, we can enable far more people to benefit from our healing methods, but it's not easy to teach. We're working on it though."

Standing, he walked to the window, looking down into the garden and watching the party below. He could see Yori talking to Nabiki, with Akane listening and smiling. The black-haired girl glanced up at him for a moment as if she'd felt his gaze then went back to her conversation. "It's difficult for a father not to talk to his children for a long time," he said quietly, feeling her move to stand beside him. "My own elder daughter, Kasumi, left nearly five years ago, under unpleasant circumstances, circumstances that to my unending shame I was complicit in. I've not heard from her since. It is my greatest hope that one day she'll come back, if only to let me know she's all right and to allow me to apologise. It was my greatest fear that I might not live long enough to see that happen."

There was no response from the magical girl for a few seconds, then she replied, "Akane and Nabiki have talked about Kasumi. From what they tell me, she would understand."

"I hope so."

They were silent for a little longer.

"What would you say to her if she did return?" Chou asked. He glanced at her, then went back to watching the people in the garden.

"I would tell her... I would tell her that I'm proud of her. Proud she finally found the courage to do what was right, proud that she stood up to us, proud of everything she has done since."

"Even without knowing what that was?" Her voice betrayed nothing but quiet curiosity. He nodded, smiling to himself.

"Yes. As I told Nabiki a while ago, I'm proud of all my daughters. There have been bad times in all their lives, bad times to which I added, I'll admit, but they have grown up into young women who are people deserving of great respect, overcoming many obstacles. I would be and will be proud of whatever they, she, did and continue to do." He glanced at her again, seeing she was smiling to herself as well, looking out into the garden. "I'm sure your father would say the same. You and all your friends are very good people."

After a second or two, he added, "I would also apologise. For taking her for granted for so many years, for becoming a person who needed so much help, even though there were in the beginning extenuating circumstances. That's no excuse for my behaviour, of course, but it is at least a partial explanation. I was weak, too weak, and let my family down for longer than I care to remember. I'm very grateful to Genma that he finally slapped some sense into me, but it would never have happened without Kasumi leaving."

She nodded slowly. "I expect your daughter would realise the truth. The death of a spouse is something that would affect anyone very badly."

"I got so involved in the loss of someone I loved deeply that I forgot the others I also loved who still lived and depended on me," he sighed. "That was wrong."

"But understandable." She looked at him, her gentle calming smile making him feel relaxed. "I'm sure she'd forgive you. Akane and Nabiki seem to have done so, after all."

"Thank you," he finally replied. She nodded slightly. Looking at her, he eventually asked, "What would you tell your father if you reconnected?" The young woman standing next to him met his eyes for a moment, then looked up at the clear sky, thinking.

"I would tell him that I forgave him the issues that convinced me to leave. I would tell him that I have a good life, filled with people I love and respect, that I enjoy my work, and that I miss him deeply. One day I hope I can say all that."

"I'm sure that day will come and that he will accept you for what you are," Soun said, watching Cologne whack Shampoo with her staff while Akane rolled around laughing, wondering idly what on earth the young woman had said this time. Yori was grinning like an idiot next to his youngest. "He would be a total fool not to."

"He's not a fool," she laughed. "Merely someone who lost his way. I believe he's found it again, now, from what I hear."

"I hope so."

Chou stepped back from the window, turning to face him. "If Kasumi called you and said she was coming home tomorrow, what would you tell her?" she asked curiously. He grinned sadly.

"I'd tell her that I would absolutely love it if she did, but it's not quite time yet, for a number of reasons, many surrounding Akane. It will be soon, though, I think." She nodded, eyes fixed on his face, then smiled. Stepping forward she gave him a hug, which he returned.

"I hope you meet again soon. But from what I've learned you're probably right. Her leaving seems to have set your family on a path to healing itself, a path you haven't quite reached the end of yet. Her reappearing at this point might cause some problems with that, I'm afraid."

"That's sadly true," Soun agreed. Releasing him, she stepped back, meeting his eyes. They looked at each other for a few seconds, both smiling. "You're right, I'll tell Akane and Nabiki tomorrow, after the party. I don't want to spoil it for them. Thank you very much, both for the healing, for which I owe you anything that is in my power to give, and for the talk."

"You're entirely welcome," she replied, looking happy, "It was our pleasure. And thank you as well. It was helpful for me as well to talk." After a moment, he turned away from her, heading towards the door.
"You truly bring great honour to your family, my dear," he murmured.

As he reached the door, he felt a gentle touch on his head. "Thank you, father," he heard, "And I'm so very sorry, but you're right. It's not quite time yet."

Soun didn't fight the fuzziness that suddenly suffused his thoughts, smiling a little to himself.

Blinking a few times, the Tendo patriarch turning to the blonde who was watching him, appearing a bit sad.

"Sorry, I lost the thread of the conversation there for a moment. We'd better get back to the party, though, people will be wondering what happened." She nodded, looking amused now, as they went back downstairs. "What were we talking about?" he asked, thinking back. "Oh, yes, I remember, I was saying you're right, I need to tell Nabiki and Akane. They deserve the truth. I'll do it in the morning, no point possibly casting a cloud over the party." He glanced at her as they stopped in the doorway. She smiled back.

"That sounds like a good idea," she agreed.

"Again, thank you so much. If there's anything I can do for you, anything at all, please tell me. You gave me back my life and my family."

Chou shook her head, laughing a little. "Don't worry about it. It's what we do, whenever we can." She waved to Yori, who looked over, holding up a bottle of beer with an enquiring look on her face, then popped the cap off one-handed. "Let's get back to the party." She walked off in her typically graceful manner, looking relaxed. He watched for a moment, before heading over to talk to Akane and her boss, grinning to himself, in a much better mood than he'd been able to manage for weeks.

"He's really all right now? You're sure?"

"Relax, sister, we got everything. He's in perfect health, more so than most twenty-year-olds. He'll outlive most people, I'm sure, even without any further intervention."

Nabiki sighed minutely in relief, nibbling a sandwich. "Why didn't he say anything before?" she asked. Across the garden, 'Chou' shrugged very slightly, as she bent over the table making a selection from the food arrayed there, Nodoka beside her saying something to her.

"He didn't want to worry anyone. He was scared it would damage the family again, I think, and felt guilty about that. Silly, yes, but understandable."

"Thanks, sis."

"It was no trouble, you know that." The blonde looked over at her for a moment, smiling. "I'm just sorry I had to block some of his memories. But I'm so glad we talked."

"You're sure he worked it out?"

"Yes. I think he's suspected for some time. But he's right, it's not quite time yet. When it is, he'll remember."

"Pity."
"Indeed. On the other hand, this is a very nice party. Let's just enjoy today and leave other things for tomorrow." ‘Chou’ laughed at something Nodoka had said, the older woman grinning and indicating the pond, but she was looking at her sister when she did.

A drink in her hand, Akane wandered over and listened to Nodoka talking to Ukyo and Konatsu about their wedding plans. All three of them were looking slightly frustrated. The older woman had her notebook out again and was flipping through it, pointing out entries, every now and then crossing something out or writing something else in it, quick strokes of the pen leaving elegantly formed kanji behind. She peeked over the elder Saotome's shoulder and wished her handwriting was that neat. Eventually Nodoka sighed, closing the notebook and dropping it on the grass beside the chair she was in.

"I'm sorry, you two, but that's all the places that meet the specifications you gave me for what you're looking for I've been able to find so far. Most of the good ones are booked up for the rest of the year, they're very popular. That nice little shrine in the mountains was severely damaged after the fire when it got hit by lightning in the spring and won't be repaired for another six months at least. There was a small landslide at the other place Genma thought of, the road to it is out for weeks and they think the ground is too unstable to be safe at the site itself. I'm running out of ideas." She looked despondent. "And until we can find a suitable location we're going to have trouble booking a priest as well, we can hardly just put one on standby indefinitely. It's something of a problem."

"We could hold the wedding here," Soun suggested, having come up beside his youngest daughter while Nodoka was speaking. She glanced at him, then back to the couple, raising her eyebrows. Ukyo looked at her fiancé then turned back to the Tendo father.

"Thank you very much for the offer, Soun, it's appreciated, believe me, but we sort of have our hearts set on something more...," she looked like she was trying to find the right word, eventually finishing, "...wild, closer to nature, I suppose. Somewhere other than the normal boring places. Up somewhere high with a nice view would be ideal. But weddings in the mountains are in at the moment, which seems to be the cause of this problem." She looked around at the grounds of the Tendo house. "This place is beautiful in its own way but it isn't quite what we're looking for."

"I understand," he smiled. "It was only a suggestion, I'm not insulted if it isn't right. The correct location is very important for a wedding, I agree. But bear it in mind if all else fails."

"We will." The long-haired brunette sighed gently, holding her lover's hand. He squeezed it gently, content to let her speak. "I suppose we may have to put it off until next year."

"That would be a shame," Nodoka told her. "I'm sure we can find somewhere suitable if we keep looking, eventually. I'm not going to give up, dear."

Sensing someone familiar beside her, Akane looked to the other side from her father to see Nabiki had arrived, Chou accompanying her, both of them with drinks in hand, apparently in time to hear the conversation. She smiled at her sister, then the magical blonde, both of whom smiled back. They listened as Nodoka and the couple discussed a few ideas, looking more and more frustrated, until Chou cleared her throat politely. Everyone looked at her.

"I'm sorry to intrude, I don't mean to be rude, but I may have a suggestion for a suitable location. It fits what you seem to be looking for very well, although you might find it slightly... unusual." They all exchanged glances. She smiled gently. "It's possibly the most beautiful place I've ever been, it's high up with the most extraordinary view you can imagine, amazingly clear air, and very predictable weather. I could show you some pictures but they don't do it justice, you'd really have to see it to properly appreciate it."

"It sounds certainly interesting," Ukyo said, looking fascinated. "Where is it?"

"Well, that's the unusual part," Chou replied, a mischievous grin crossing her face. Yori joined her, glancing at her curiously, then suddenly smiling widely. Everyone in the garden stared in shock as a glowing blue hole in reality tore open a couple of metres away with a faint crackling sound, near the pond, causing Genma who had been staring suspiciously at the small body of water from right next to it to yelp and fall in. The panda climbed out, muttering to itself in small growls. Yori seemed to find this hilarious if the look on her face was anything to go by.

"It's right on the other side of that portal," the blonde said contentedly, smiling at them. Everyone gaped. Yori was watching Genma and snickering to herself, the pandafied martial artist was staring at the portal and gently dripping, Ukyo was looking at Chou, then the portal, her face apparently frozen into a mask of incredulity. There was silence, only broken by the crumpling wax paper sounds coming from the apparition, for ten or fifteen seconds.

Faint muttering in Mandarin made Akane tear her eyes away from the portal sitting innocently next to the pond to look over and see Cologne staring at it, white-faced. The Elder looked like she'd seen a ghost, although to be honest, bearing in mind that they all had at one point, the youngest Tendo suddenly decided that was a poor metaphor. The thought made her giggle slightly wildly, causing Nabiki to look oddly at her. She shrugged helplessly at her sister. Cologne still looked shocked, though.

"Ah..." Chou was watching Ukyo with a small calm smile, as if she'd offered to lend her a casserole dish, instead of apparently suggesting a trip to a demon world for their wedding. "That's a portal."

Chou nodded calmly. "Yes, I know, I just said that."

"But portals lead to other worlds, don't they? Worlds demons come from..."

"Well, that's somewhat simplistic, but, yes, the other side is on a different world. A completely different reality to be honest."

Everyone kept listening, either staring at the portal or the magical girl, who seemed to be taking all this as perfectly normal, which to Akane at least it most definitely wasn't. She could see pretty much everyone else felt that way aside from the various other magical girls. Aiko was nodding to herself, as Tamiko whispered something to her, and Fumiko and her sister were grinning. She noticed that Nabiki looked interested rather than worried, which amused her even through her shock. That was her sister all right. Not much seemed to slow her down for very long.

"A... different... reality?" Ukyo managed, looking at her husband-to-be, who stared back wide-eyed. Chou nodded again.

"Yes. It's a world called Fwetna. Some friends of ours live there. We've been there a number of times, it's very nice place. We went there on holiday recently."

There was silence again, as everyone stared at her this time, and Yori. "Trust me, it's perfectly safe," Chou told them. "The people look a little different, true, but in most respects they're remarkably similar to us. The climate is very good as well, and the food is excellent. I even know a good place to relax after the wedding, especially if you like swimming."

Nodoka finally managed to close her mouth around that time. She looked at the blonde for a long moment, the other woman meeting her gaze with the same gentle smile she normally wore, one everyone seemed to find remarkably calming, then turned to Ukyo. "It might be worth looking at, dear. I'm sure Chou would never allow us into a dangerous situation and to be honest we're at something of an impasse at the moment. And you have to admit that a wedding on a different world would certainly meet your requirement of not being either normal or boring." She grinned for a moment, as Ukyo tore her eyes from Chou and looked at her, then turned to her fiancé.

Konatsu looked into her eyes for a long moment, then turned to Chou. "It really is safe?"

She nodded. "Yes, at least as safe as Japan is, probably more so. It's a very nice and civilised place.
You'll like it, trust me." After several seconds, he turned back to Ukyo. They had a wordless conversation for a second or two, then the Okonomiyaki chef swallowed hard, blinked a couple of times, and sighed. She turned to the blonde woman who was waiting patiently.

"I suppose we should at least look."

Chou smiled happily. "Good. Come on, it's almost exactly the right time. You'll love this." She held out her hand, which Ukyo took after a moment, pulling her to her feet. Konatsu got up and joined them. Looking around at the garden party guests, most of whom were also invited to the wedding, she said, "Everyone should come and look. You'll like it."

They all watched as she led the couple to the portal. Standing in front of it, she added, "Just walk through it. There's no sensation worth mentioning and it's completely safe. Watch." The young woman entered the glowing blue tear in space, disappearing with a slightly louder crinkling sound, then came back a moment later. "See?" Exchanging a long glance, they both visibly plucked up the courage and walked through the portal. Everyone stared in wonder.

"So. Anyone else coming?" Yori asked brightly, making Akane jump, she was watching the portal so intently. Nabiki, beside her, noticed and laughed, causing her to shoot her sister a quick glare.

"I'm not going to miss this, that's for sure," the middle sister announced firmly with a look at the petite woman, proceeding to walk determinedly to and through the portal. Akane gasped a little, then twitched when the brunette head of her older sister popped back through the thing, hanging in space in an improbable manner and making everyone stare in amazement. Her expression was one of awe.

"Akane. You have got to see this! Come on!" She vanished again.

The youngest Tendo sister noticed that everyone left was now watching her expectantly.
Swallowing slightly, she glanced at Yori, who grinned at her, then Shampoo, who was staring wide eyed, then Nodoka. The elder woman hopped to her feet with a sudden delighted smile. "Your sister is both slightly mad and completely right, Akane. Let's have a look." Holding out her hand, she waited until Akane took it, swallowing a little again, then towed her towards the portal. They stopped in front of it, exchanging a glance, before stepping in.

Blue light surrounded her for a brief moment then she found herself somewhere else entirely.
Staring around in shock that slowly turned to total wonder she was barely conscious of Nabiki, who was apparently waiting for her, gently urging her to the side as people began slowly coming through after them, curiosity apparently too great a draw despite the weirdness of the situation.
Shortly the entire guest list of Nodoka's party was standing nearby, looking at the scenery of the alien place they found themselves. Her father swore under his breath as he walked out of the portal behind her. A moment later she heard Cologne suck in a breath, then mumble something in Mandarin, sounding awestruck.
Silence, aside from an almost subsonic rumble that made the ground shake gently, fell.

Akane stared around her slowly, then looked at Nodoka, who was doing the same with an expression of awed delight on her face. Glancing at Nabiki she saw her sister was grinning widely as she inspected their surroundings, looking over to meet her eyes for a moment, then going back to studying the area they found themselves in. Off to the side she noticed Chou and Yori standing next to each other, almost identical smiles of pleasure on their faces as they watched everyone.

After a long moment, she walked across the stone ground, which had been machined flat in some manner which left it looking surprisingly natural, yet still obviously the work of some unseen hand, to the metre-high wall made of the same stone. It formed a rim at the edge of the levelled off zone. The flat slabs of rock were held together with a slightly lighter coloured mortar, forming a rather nice looking mosaic effect. Nearing the wall she found herself instinctively slowing as the sheer magnitude of the incredible drop that started immediately on the other side made itself apparent. She estimated it must be on the order of two kilometres, possibly more. It was certainly the tallest cliff she'd ever seen in her life. She felt Nabiki join her as she stopped next to the wall, the other woman putting her hands on it and leaning forward slightly, then whistling.

"Wow. That's one hell of a drop. You probably wouldn't want to fall over. Not unless you could sprout wings or something." Her sister glanced at her with a grin. Carefully, she leaned a little forward herself, feeling a wave of vertigo sweep through her as she peered down. The ground far, far below was sliding into twilight as the light faded. After a giddy moment she straightened up and took a step back. Just in case. It seemed to amuse Nabiki, who went back to examining the view.

She looked around. Out over the wall she could see for what must have been dozens, of not hundreds, of kilometres, a vast plain stretching out to the horizon which was further away than any view she'd ever seen before, the air being incredibly clear and clean-smelling, although redolent with odd smells she realised must be coming from the forest that started twenty metres behind them. The large smoothed off area, which was roughly the size of the garden back home except longer and thinner, ran along the cliff top between the drop-off and the forest. The trees that formed the forest were like nothing she'd seen in the past although were still obviously trees, despite their alien appearance. She could see the outlines of fields and signs of civilisation all over the plain, not packed too tightly, with large wild areas left between them. Threads of roads ran across the distant ground, tiny glinting dots of vehicles barely visible here and there.

Far off to the right was something she realised must be a huge alien city, enormous buildings visible and glowing with multi-coloured lights, while there was something much smaller and closer peaking around the cliff to the left. To either side she could see the cliff curved away to form what looked like part of the rim of a vast bowl or crater. A few shiny points high in the sky were moving fast, apparently aircraft of some type, lit from the side. She looked over her shoulder to see Nodoka standing completely still, staring, not having moved so far. Ukyo and Konatsu were holding hands and looking around with stunned expressions.

The view over the wall was absolutely breathtaking, but it paled in comparison to the source of the deep rumble you could feel in your bones, which was thirty metres or so away along the cliff. A narrow but apparently deep and swiftly moving river wound its way out of the forest in a channel worn from the hard rock over millennia, reaching, then going over, the edge in an enormous horizontal column. It eventually bent and dropped into the depths after a remarkable distance due to the sheer velocity of the water, separating into droplets that curved out and down like a rain of diamonds. They glinted in the light as they fell into the growing darkness below, breaking up into a steadily finer spray as they moved. She cautiously looked over the wall again to see that thousands of metres below, the water was a fog sliding and rolling down the vertical cliff, finally reaching a more gradual slope where it formed hundreds of tiny streams that eventually joined back into a much wider and slower moving river heading off across the plain.

After a minute or two of staring at it in awe, she raised her eyes a little to see the source of the light, and the strange shadows she'd noticed, ones that seemed to have two close but distinct edges with slight colour differences. Not one, but two suns were sitting low in the sky off past the huge distant city, above the water thundering over the cliff edge. One was visibly red, redder than the Sun at home would be even considering how close it was to the horizon, while the other one a small distance away from it and a little higher was a pinprick of white with a distinct bias towards blue, brighter than the red one even though it was so much smaller.

"A binary system..." Nabiki said, following her gaze, sounding fascinated. "I've read about that sort of thing."

"It's beautiful," she replied quietly.

"Isn't it? It's probably the most beautiful thing I've ever seen."

"It gets better," Yori said, somehow hearing her and raising her voice a little to be heard over the bone-shaking rumble of the waterfall. "In about a minute or so. Everyone come and stand here next to us, it's the best place to see it from." After a pause while they all collected themselves slightly there was a general movement to the indicated spot, the visitors all lining up in the space, which was just sufficient. "Right. Just watch." Yori grinned, turning to follow her own advice.

The twin suns steadily dropped in the sky, the red one leading, until it happened. With surprisingly suddenness the red star passed behind the column of fast-moving and remarkably transparent water, making it abruptly illuminate in a startling rainbow of colours, much more brightly than one would expect, with a definite tendency to red. The blue star lit the water from above, making the top surface glow almost purple, adding to the effect.

The assembled people gasped as one, watching the glittering stream of water shoot out into space, all the little beads caused as it broke apart shining individually until they vanished into the darkness. No one said anything, or moved, they just watched, drinking in the incredible sight. When the red sun finally dropped below the water, lighting it from underneath, the blue one was just entering it, causing the effect to happen all over again, even more brightly and in shades of blue and violet this time. Akane tore her eyes away for a moment to look at her family and friends, to see all of them watching and every one of them smiling. Yori and Chou were standing next to each other looking as entranced as the rest of them were.

Ukyo and Konatsu watched, their fingers intertwined, until the blue sun eventually dropped below the waterfall following the larger red one, which was now half-obscured by the distant horizon. They turned to look at each other. After a few seconds, Chou walked over, followed by Yori, everyone watching in silence.

"What do you think?" the blonde asked gently. Both the engaged people glanced at her, then looked back at each other, before nodding.

"It's perfect. Thank you for showing us this." Ukyo looked happier than Akane had seen her since they announced their engagement, as did Konatsu.

"You're welcome. I'm glad I could help." Chou looked pleased, glancing at the shorter woman next to her, who grinned.

"It's pretty good, isn't it?" Yori asked rhetorically, chuckling. Both the others nodded again, matching her grin, then shared a kiss. Everyone else applauded, which made them pull apart with an embarrassed look, before laughing.

Shortly they were all wandering around, talking and laughing, every now and then someone popping back through the portal to fetch some food or drink, the assembled multitude having apparently decided as a group it was safe enough to be considered like a normal door. Akane stood to one side with her sister and watched in astonishment. Nabiki laughed, causing her to look sideways and raise an eyebrow enquiringly. It was getting darker, now like twilight, the blue sun barely above the horizon, but her sister noticed. "It's like Auntie's party moved here," the brunette explained. She waved a hand, indicating the clusters of people moving about, talking animatedly and admiring everything. Genma, still a panda, was drinking from a bottle of beer, listening to the discussion between his wife, the couple, and Chou. Soun and Cologne were looking out at the plain below them pointing out various clusters of lights and trying to work out what they represented. Other people were looking speculatively at the path leading into the deep, dark forest.

She giggled. "Come on, let's go and get those garden lights Dad has and bring them back so everyone can see. Otherwise someone will fall over that wall."

Akane jumped a little when a voice from beside her unexpectedly said, "Don't worry, I set up a ward all along it, no one is in any danger." She turned to see Yori smiling at her. "The lighting's easy as well. Hang on." A slight frown of concentration appeared momentarily before she looked pleased, and everyone else looked up, to see a series of glowing purple balls of misty light hanging above them in the air, just out of reach. Chou glanced over, then up, nodded, and did something similar, golden spheres appearing and mixing their glow with the violet ones. The combined light was slightly oddly coloured but bright enough to easily see by.

"That should do it," Yori commented with satisfaction.

"What are they?" Akane asked, staring at the nearest one, startled yet impressed.

"Basically they're little warded spheres of magic. They're not very powerful, you could poke your finger into one and it would only give a little resistance, but I can make them glow brightly enough to light the area pretty well." The woman looked up at the same one she was studying. "It's not a trick I've had call to use much in the past but it seems to work well."

"It's pretty impressive," Nabiki said, also looking at the ball of light. She transferred her gaze to Yori. "If you made one big enough you could light an enormous area." Smiling, she added, "It would look like a small star, I guess."

For some reason the magical girl looked narrowly at her sister, Akane noticed, before snickering. "Probably. Maybe one day I should try it."

Nabiki laughed then wandered off to join their father and the Elder in their conversation, indicating the distant and brilliantly illuminated city with one hand. Shortly all three were talking animatedly.

Yori watched with a small grin. Turning to the youngest sister, she commented, "Your sister has a weird sense of humour." Akane sighed a little.

"Tell me about it. Some of her practical jokes are just... peculiar." Snickering again, the other woman motioned to the table someone had brought through the portal a moment ago, several more people carrying all the food that had been on it, which they put back as soon as it was ready.

"I could do with another salmon roll. You want anything?" Akane followed her to the table.
"Hmm." She looked over the food before picking a couple of sandwiches up along with a plate, then grabbing a glass of orange juice. She suddenly giggled making Yori glance at her.

"What's funny?" she asked.

"Everything," Akane said, waving around as her laughter grew for a moment, then died down. "Nabiki is right. Half an hour ago, we were all sitting in our garden staring at that from the other side, not sure whether to believe Chou or just run. Now look at it all." She indicated with her glass at the small crowd who were wandering around, talking, laughing, and generally having a wonderful time. Nabiki looked over and caught her eye, grinning, before going back to talking to Cologne, who seemed happy yet puzzled, as if she couldn't believe what she was doing.

Yori looked around, then chuckled in a contented manner. "I keep telling people you get used to it. No one ever believes me at first." She sipped her soft drink, looking pleased.

After a moment, Akane turned to her. "Thanks again for what you did for me. I still have trouble believing it, and that you'd all go to so much trouble for someone you met under such annoying circumstances."

"It's no problem, Akane. Like we've always told you, we like helping people. I had the card, you were a good fit for the job, and Shampoo is as well. It helps Adrian, who's a decent guy, it helps you and your family, Shampoo and hers, and with some luck we'll even get some good movies out of it." The woman laughed, shaking her head in amusement, her long braid swinging around. "Some of the recent action ones have been terrible!"

"Hopefully we can do better," the youngest Tendo grinned.

"I sure hope so."

"It's very good of Aiko to keep taking us back and forth," Akane added. Yori shrugged.

"She likes being able to teleport all over the place like that. To her it's like crossing the room, no real effort at all most of the time. Why not?"

"Even so, it's very generous. I wouldn't blame her if she decided we should fly instead."

"That's no fun at all, mostly. God, the lines at airports, all that security theatre, the waiting..." Yori shuddered theatrically, making her laugh again. "No, good old fashioned teleporting is the way to go about it. Flying is fun, but not the commercial version." She glanced up at the slightly taller woman next to her. "If you're interested, actually, around the ring wall to the right a few kilometres is the lake that feeds that river. That's where Chou meant about going swimming, it's fantastic for that. But they also do a lot of what we'd call hang gliding there. It's damn good fun. If you'd like to try it, that could be arranged. Anyone else here could as well."

Staring at her for a moment, Akane felt surprised. "Hang gliding? Demons do that?"

"Oh, yes, all the time. They're an awful lot like us, as we said. The inhabitants of this world are called D'sage, they're really decent people for the most part. Fwetna is a very nice place to both visit and live." She pointed to the left, at the portion of the smaller city visible way off to the side. "That's a city called Sirtha. It's a major trading hub and manufacturing centre. Nice place. A very good friend of ours called Uthryyl and his family live on the side of a mountain, the end of this cliff actually, overlooking the city. He's got several warehouses there and around the place. He owns one of the largest interworld trading companies around, they're the main exporters of coffee and chocolate from our world to others."
Once again, Akane stared, amazed. She noticed absently that her sister and father had come up beside her and were listening with interest. Cologne was still standing at the wall looking at the view. "Coffee? Chocolate?" She was wondering if she'd heard correctly. Yori looked at her with amusement.

"Oh, yes. They love it, here and in a lot of other places. It's pretty much only available from home and is considered quite valuable in most worlds. He buys it in bulk, along with a few other things, then trades it all over. It's one of the things that's earned him an awful lot of credits."

"I recall that there have been mentions on the news over the last year or so about there being rumours demons were buying coffee, chocolate, and ice cream in Minato," Soun interjected, sounding fascinated and somewhat surprised. "Nothing confirmed, but that's the story I've heard. You mentioned there were traders as well some months ago, as well as tourists."

Nodding, Yori replied, "Oh, it's true enough. He's back and forth from Minato almost every month now. A local merchant is working with him on our end. Both of them are having very good success with business."

"What do these demons trade for it?" her father asked curiously.

"Mostly precious metals at the moment," the black-haired woman told him. "Gold and silver mainly. A lot of places have large amounts of it and as a result don't value it much more than any other useful metal, while we have things like coffee they value highly. It all seems to work pretty well."

"It sounds very interesting. I wonder if there's anything else that could be traded like that?" Yori studied her for a moment, a small smile on her lips, then nodded.

"I'd think it was pretty likely." She laughed. "I could introduce you to Uthryyl if you want to look into some sort of trading business. He's always looking for new local agents. I've heard that you have a good head for that sort of thing, perhaps you could suggest something he hasn't thought of."

Giggling, the middle sister glanced at her father, who looked amused. "Maybe I should take you up on that when I finish University."

"I was under the impression that you were thinking of going into forensic accountancy, Nabiki," Soun said, smiling a bit. She shrugged.

"It's always wise to keep your options open."

"True." He grinned at her. Akane shook her head, staring at her sister.

"Do you ever stop thinking about money, 'Biki?" she asked, which made Yori laugh again. The middle Tendo thought carefully for a moment.

"Nope."

They all laughed at her comment. Yori turned back to Akane. "Anyway, as I was saying, Uthryyl lives quite close, in a straight line at least. It's considerably longer by road. We stayed with him for a while when we were on holiday earlier in the year and went flying when we met a friend of his daughter Onkra. It was damn good fun. Their gliders are pretty similar to what we have at home in a lot of ways, but they're a weird mix of extremely high tech and very basic. They have a computerised autopilot system that can teach you to fly remarkably quickly, and if anything goes horribly wrong there's an anti-gravity recovery system built in that gets you safely down to the ground. No one has been seriously injured using one for years and that last guy practically did it on purpose from what I was told."

"It sounds interesting," Nabiki said, while Akane thought it over. Her sister looked at her, smiling. "You going to take the offer up, sis?"

The youngest Tendo looked uncertain. "It does sound interesting, you're right, but it also sounds terrifying." Yori laughed a little.

"No, it's fine, you just strap the thing on then jump over the edge." She grinned. "The falling sensation doesn't last long."

Akane could feel herself go pale. Nabiki burst out laughing. "I'm sure it's not quite that dramatic, sis. I went hang-gliding myself over the holiday like I told you, it was damn good fun. You probably just run along the ground or down a slope until you're in the air. That's what we did." Her sister looked at her, then poked her in the shoulder. "It's easy."

"That's basically it, yes," Yori agreed. The martial artist smiled. "Don't worry, Akane, it really is very easy and very safe. You'd enjoy it. I know we did."

"Look, I'll do it if you will," Nabiki suggested. "I'm curious to see how it compares to my previous attempt anyway."

"I'll think about it," the blue-haired woman finally said, sighing a little worriedly.

"No hurry, we can come back any time you want to give it a go," Yori told her, still smiling a little. She glanced at Soun. "You might enjoy it as well."

He shrugged, but looked interested. "It might be worth a try at some point." After a moment, he went over to talk to Genma, who had found some hot water from somewhere, leaving the three women behind. Not entirely sure about the offer, Akane decided she needed some more sandwiches to settle her stomach after the way it had clenched from Yori's little joke.

Looking at the paper in her hand, Miki smiled. "This is the place," she said to her boyfriend, as they looked at the large gate in front of them set into a surprisingly long three metre tall wall. John examined it.

"Bigger than I expected," he commented. She nodded.

"It's huge for Tokyo. Nabiki said it's been in the family for generations. Apparently they had some financial problems that left them at risk of losing it some time back but when they re-opened the Dojo that problem got sorted out."

"That must be it there," the young man replied, pointing at the tile roof of a substantial two story building whose end wall joined with the wall around the property. He turned to smile at Hana and Kimiko who joined them at that point, having stopped to look into a shop window on the way from the train station and as a result trailed behind.

"I think so. The house is further inside, over to the left." Deciding that standing around guessing was no substitute for actually going inside, she walked over and rang the bell. She could hear it go off faintly in the distance. After a few seconds, when there was no answer, she poked the button again. Once more, there was no response. "Odd. We're late, but not that late," she smiled, "I doubt everyone has gone home. I certainly hope not, anyway." She tried once more.
When there was no answer for the third time, she tested the door next to the main gate. It was unlocked, so she opened it and peeked inside, finding a path to the main house, which was indeed quite large, considerably more so than her parent's one. "Come on, let's find someone." All four of them entered, John closing the door behind them, then they walked to the front door and rang the bell there instead. Again, there was no obvious result. Just as she turned to her boyfriend to ask a question, a voice from the side made them turn and look.

"Hello. Can I help you?"

They looked at the young woman with long lilac-coloured hair who was standing by the corner of the house holding a tray under her arm, apparently heading towards the house from the garden. Miki smiled at her.

"Hi. We're looking for Nabiki? I'm her friend Miki from university, this is my boyfriend John, and my sisters Hana and Kimiko."

"Oh, right, she mentioned you were coming. She said your train got delayed?"

Miki sighed a little. "Yes, there was a minor earthquake near Kobe just before we were going to leave and it damaged some signalling equipment. They fixed it pretty fast but it still caused over three hours delay."

"That's a nuisance." Smiling, the young woman waved them to follow her. "I'm Shampoo, a friend of the family. I'll take you to her, I just need to get some more food." They followed her in through a door to the side of the house overlooking the large courtyard between it and the Dojo building, all of them looking around with interest.

"It's a very nice place," Hana said admiringly. Shampoo nodded, following her gaze.

"Yes, it's one of the largest traditional houses still in the area," she agreed. They followed as she entered the kitchen, a table in the middle of which was covered in party food. Putting the tray she was holding down next to the sink she picked up a full one from the table. "Hey, would you mind bringing that crate of beer?" she asked. John grabbed it from the floor beside the table, causing her to smile at him. "Come on, it's this way." She led them back outside and towards the rear of the house. "We could go through the living room but Nodoka didn't want dirt tracked in with everyone trooping back and forth," Shampoo explained. Kimiko giggled.

"I can understand that. Mom was furious about all the extra cleaning we had to do at home when I had a party last year."

Laughing, the Chinese girl led them around the house and into the large garden. They looked around curiously. No one was visible, although there was a lot of evidence that quite a large number of people had been there recently.

"Where is everybo..." Miki got part way through the question when she spotted what Shampoo was blithely walking towards without a care in the world, she and the others stopping dead in their tracks and staring in shock. A few steps further on, Shampoo noticed they were no longer following, herself stopping and looking over her shoulder.

"What's wrong?" she asked curiously, looking at them. John pointed past her, his face pale, making her look, then turn back, puzzled. "Yes?" she queried.

"That's a portal," he croaked. "Like I've seen on the news." After a moment she seemed to realise what he meant and grinned.
"That's right," she agreed.

"What the hell is a portal doing in the middle of Nabiki's back garden?" he asked in a hoarse voice. Shampoo giggled, raising her eyebrows.

"It's just hanging there." This wasn't a very good answer as far as Miki was concerned. She glanced at her boyfriend, having some difficulty tearing her eyes away from the softly crackling blue-glowing rip in reality, to see he'd gone as pale as she suspected she was. Hana was swearing very quietly to herself, while Kimiko was inspecting the thing with cautious interest.

Eventually, Shampoo relented, laughing to herself. "Sorry. I know it's a shock the first time. We all felt like that as well. Chou made it, it's a long story. The party seems to have moved to the other side. Come on, it's fine, and the view is amazing." She grinned at them, turned back to the thing, then walked through it like it was her front door, not slowing at all. They stared at each other for a while, jumping violently when she stuck her head back through it. "Coming?" she asked, before vanishing again.

None of them could tear their eyes away from the portal, they just gaped at it. Another few seconds passed in silence except for the constant faint noise it made, until they all twitched again when Nabiki popped out of it, a bottle of beer in her hand. "Hi, guys. Glad you made it. You coming through or what?"

"What... How... I mean..." Miki couldn't work out which of the very large number of questions whirling through her head to ask first. Beside her, John was simply staring in shock. Their friend laughed, clearly very amused.

"You wanted to meet some magical girls. This seems to be what happens when you invite a load of them to a party." She waved the beer in her hand at the hole in the universe. "It's perfectly safe, we've been going back and forth for nearly two hours now and no one has died, exploded, or turned into a frog yet."

None of them made a move. After a while the middle Tendo sighed, walked around behind Miki and John and started pushing. By the time they thought to resist they'd gone through the magical doorway, into darkness lit by an oddly coloured light from above. "See? Perfectly safe. Come on, let's get you both beered and fed." Behind them, Hana gingerly stepped through the portal, Kimiko behind her, both of them looking stunned and awed. She looked over her shoulder and met her sisters' eyes seeing they both were probably feeling as startled as she was. Snickering a little Nabiki steered them over to a table piled with food, gave them all a plate each, and waved at the table. "Here you go. Help yourselves."

Miki looked at the plate she found she was holding, her friend, who was grinning, her boyfriend, who looked like he'd been unexpectedly slapped with a dead squid, her two sisters, her plate again, then around at the very unusual scenery and the people apparently thoroughly enjoying it. After a long pause she shrugged. "You mentioned beer?"

"Yep. Hang on." Nabiki wandered off, returning with four bottles dangling from her free hand, as well as two people they recognised with amazement. "Here you go. A beer each, a Yori, and a Chou. I think I have some more magical girls in the back if these ones aren't quite right for you." She started laughing like an idiot when both the young women in question raised their eyebrows and gave her a look like they couldn't decide quite how sane she was.

"You may have had a little too much beer," the blonde woman said, shaking her head in an amused manner. She inspected the new arrivals, took two of the bottles Nabiki was holding, flicked the tops off with her thumbs with no sign of effort, then held them out to Miki and John, who accepted them automatically, staring at her.

"Hello. I'm Chou. Nabiki said you were something of a fan?"

Suddenly extremely glad she'd come to the party, Miki nodded, smiling widely. Beside her, Hana was making little squeaking noises that suggested extreme joy, Kimiko was laughing very quietly to herself, and her boyfriend took a very long pull on his beer before turning to the food, shaking his head.

"She's not normal, that Nabiki Tendo," his girlfriend heard him mutter. "Not even close to normal. Japan is weird." Laughing, she began talking to the pair of magical girls. Nabiki stood back and watched, a grin on her face, drinking the last of her beer, before going in search of a full one.
Greetings, multitudinous peeps! I return triumphant, fresh from the conquest of Gaul.

Wait.

No, that's Julius Caesar.

Um. I return, after a long delay?

Something like that, anyway.

A sudden attack of hard work out of nowhere which ate nearly two months, capped with a nasty cold that left me lying in bed weakly going 'arrghhhh-cough-cough-gurgle' for many days means I didn't do nearly as much writing recently as I planned. However, I'm recovered and picking up the pieces once more, so here is the next chapter. I've managed to also do a fair amount of the next one to two chapters so I'm going to try (again) to release a little quicker than once a month or so. We'll see how successful that is, I guess.

The party gets... odd.

I've discovered that writing dialogue for Tatewaki Kuno is nearly as much fun as doing it for Ms Aoyama. It was about time he had a larger part in the story.

As an interesting side note, I actually wrote most of the last half of the previous chapter at the same time as I wrote the first scene in chapter 60. I've been sitting on it for over a year until the appropriate point in the story turned up :)

As always, thanks for the reviews and positive encouragement.

I'm also informed that there is an All The Tropes page for DSR, which seems to be more fully developed than the TVTropes one. I didn't know that.

Oh, one final thing occurs to me. A few reviews have (mostly gently) complained that I seem to be being hard on the US as being the source of a lot of the in-story problems. May I make it clear that I don't have anything against Americans in general (except for a couple, and they know what they did) but with the sheer quantity of three letter agencies that country possesses along with its history over the last century, it's pretty much inevitable that any decent conspiracy plot will involve the US eventually. Don't take it personally :) I'll be mean to other countries as well, they all deserve it one way or another...

"Are you sure there's no problem holding the wedding here?" Nabiki asked, watching Ukyo and Konatsu talk to Miki and John, who she'd introduced them to a while ago.

"It's fine, Nabiki, the waterfall area is a public facility and is open to functions of that nature," the voice of Uthryyl assured her over the link. "As soon as you have a date I can reserve it, the process is simple and it will prevent anyone else wanting to use it at the same time. The name of Yori or Chou attached to the request will guarantee that no one will mind, trust me, not that it's likely that anyone would."

"Thanks, Uthryyl," 'Yori' said. "Ukyo is my oldest friend and even though she doesn't know it's me I want to make sure her wedding goes well. She deserves it, so does Konatsu, he's a good guy."
"You're more than welcome, of course, my friend." The merchant sounded happy. "And you must come and talk soon. I'm hearing rumours that you lot have been doing peculiar things in Krennsh space which could be extremely profitable. It's making me curious."

"I was planning on it, Uthryyl," 'Yori' laughed. "I have a lot to tell you and a few presents as well. It's been a little chaotic here though and the story needs a certain amount of time to do justice to so I've been waiting for things to calm down a little before I came. Sometime in the next few days, I think."

"I await the news with barely contained excitement," Uthryyl replied dryly. Both Nabiki and her sister-in-law snickered at his tone. "Oh, while I think of it, Nabiki, Quannyr has finished the paperwork for the reactor export and it's just waiting final approval from the authorities. Based on normal practice we'll have it in about two weeks, possibly less."

"Great. That's really good to hear. The PSIA wants to get one for trials as soon as possible anyway, so being able to tell them we can almost immediately start importing the things will be very good news. Thanks, and thanks to Quannyr as well." The middle sister smiled to herself. "Can I get a unit next week for them?"

"That's not a problem at all. I'll round up one of my technicians who speaks Japanese and we can talk about it in a few days. Ranma, I'll bring one for your building at the same time and we can install it too, that shouldn't take more than a few hours at the most."

"Sounds good. Thanks a lot." The martial artist sounded pleased.

"I must get back to making dinner, Onkra and Quannyr will be home soon and you don't want two hungry women complaining about the food not being ready if you want a calm life."

"Understandable." Ranma's alter-ego chuckled. "I'll talk soon."

"Goodbye, both of you." The link dropped, leaving the martial artist and the middle Tendo looking at each other with amusement from opposite sides of the waterfall plaza, each with a drink in hand.

Nabiki turned her head as Kimiko came up beside her holding a plate of sushi and a bottle of beer, putting both on the wall the brunette was standing next to then looking out into the darkness kilometres above the plain, glittering lights stretching away into the distance. Off to the right the multi-coloured glow of Krentak lit the horizon. Kimiko peered into the alien night for a while, saying nothing but with a smile on her face, before finally turning to her companion who was watching her silently.

"Thank you for inviting us," she said in a low voice, barely audible over the chatter of more than forty people talking and the quiet music playing on the sound system which someone had brought the speakers for through the portal, the cables trailing back into a completely different universe. Which was a concept that would make anyone think hard for a while.

"You're welcome," Nabiki smiled. "Are you enjoying yourself?"

Kimiko nodded with a wide grin. "Yes, immensely. Although I'll sure admit to a certain amount of bewilderment." She looked around, then waved a hand vaguely at the scenery. "I wasn't expecting... this."

Snickering, Nabiki shrugged. "Odd things happen around magical girls it seems. I'll admit this is probably right on the edge of normal even in their terms but they are magical."

The other woman grinned at her. "And as such prone to doing things that normal people would find a bit weird. Yes, I can understand that." She looked her companion up and down. "Normal people, like me. And you, of course." A smirk came over her as she raised her beer bottle to her lips.

Nabiki stole one of her salmon rolls, nibbling it and returning the look. "Yep. Normal people just like me. Perfectly normal people." They shared a moment of unspoken amusement, Nabiki fairly sure that Kimiko was thinking things that neither of her sisters would have easily believed, before they turned to look out over the darkened landscape.

"What's that place called, do you know?" Kimiko asked a little later, pointing to the right.

"Apparently it's the capital city, it's called Krentak. It's quite a long way away so the buildings must be enormous." Nabiki studied the distant city, remembering with pleasure the several visits to it from the vacation recently. "They seem to like lighting their buildings. It's kind of beautiful."

"It is. I wonder what the people here look like?"

"Yori said they were bipedal sort of humanoids with long tails, sort of a cross between a human, a horse, and a lizard. It sounds weird but she insists they're actually really decent people." She pointed in the other direction. "That one is called Sirtha, a good friend of hers lives there with his family. It's some sort of major trading hub."

"Interesting," the younger woman mused. After a moment, she leaned forward a little, then looked puzzled, reaching out a hand and poking the air, which just past the edge of the wall became solid. Running her hand over something invisible she frowned. "What on earth...?"

"Yori put a ward along the wall so no one would fall over," Nabiki chuckled. "Like a sort of force field I think. It's pretty cool." She watched Kimiko press her hand against the invisible barrier, then tap on it.

"It is, isn't it? I've never actually run into real magic before." The woman looked over her shoulder at the petite martial artist who was talking to Hana now, the Sano sister smiling so widely it looked like the only thing holding the top half of her head on was gravity. The effect was a little creepy to be honest. "None of us have as far as I know. Sis there seems to be getting into it." She giggled for a moment. "You wouldn't believe what she was like last night, and on the train. When we found there was going to be a delay I thought she was going to have a stroke for a minute or two, but Miki finally calmed her down." Nabiki started laughing. "I'm not kidding, she nearly went ultrasonic. The look she gave the poor station announcer was amazing." Now Kimiko was snickering.

"So it was a good thing I invited her, then?"

"Hana will be your friend for life after this," the other woman assured her, still giggling. "Whether you want it or not. She'll be talking about the time she met real magical girls for years. Especially Yori and Chou. When she found out after you left she didn't stop grinning for six hours and Mum was starting to think we'd need to take her to hospital to get some sedatives she was so hyper."

"Sorry about that," Nabiki replied, shaking her head and smiling.

"Don't worry, she'll calm down eventually." Kimiko studied her sister, then somewhat dubiously added, "I think..."

They exchanged another look then broke down laughing again. When they recovered, Kimiko leaned forward once more and rested her forehead against the ward, staring down. "How high is this cliff? It's difficult to see in the dark without anything to give a sense of scale."

"It's more than two kilometres at least," Nabiki replied, doing the same. "I think it's about one and a half kilometres straight drop for the waterfall before it touches anything and maybe another one or so at a slight angle before it starts to level off. It sure looks like a very long way down when it's light. The water doesn't actually hit the ground as water, it's more like a fog the drop is so high."

She waved a hand to the right. "I'm told the lake that's the source of the river is that way a few kilometres further around the rim and considerably higher, close to the edge. It's a popular swimming destination apparently."

"Pretty amazing," the other woman mumbled. The sub-bass of the waterfall rumbling through the ground made it difficult to hear her for a moment. She straightened up and put her hands on the wall, feeling it vibrate, then looked up at the spectacularly bright star-field. "The air's so clear here as well. The only time I've ever seen the stars so well is in the middle of winter when it gets really cold, but it's nice and warm right now. I guess there must be less pollution or something like that."

"It seems a reasonable idea," Nabiki agreed. "You should see it in the day, the two suns are pretty amazing as well. When they're setting behind the waterfall it's probably one of the most spectacular things I've ever seen."

"I wish I'd seen that," Kimiko grumped. "Stupid earthquake."

"Maybe we can come back some time," the middle sister smiled. "It's worth seeing." She turned around and leaned on the wall, watching the people wandering around and talking, many of them also standing near the edge and pointing at things. Almost everyone had a wondering expression even now after several hours. "I still can't believe how quickly everyone decided it was safe," she chuckled. Kimiko looked over her shoulder, following her gaze, then nodded.

"It's a bit weird. I suppose a lot of it is the reputation Yori and Chou have. Everyone trusts them not to put them in danger. I know from my point of view that's true." She smiled momentarily. "They're more trustworthy than most people in the government to a lot of people." Nabiki shook her head a little in wonder, believing the woman but still finding the concept amusing.

After a few seconds, she said, "I need the facilities. I think I'll wander back to another universe and deal with it." She grinned at Kimiko who giggled, then headed for the portal. Miki fell into step beside her when she'd nearly reached it. Glancing at her friend as they went through the hole in space, both of them blinked a lot at the sudden sunlight for a few seconds.

"God, that's weird," Miki mumbled. She looked around the mostly empty Tendo back garden, which had a few people in it enjoying the afternoon, with one or two wandering back and forth to the fall area. The young woman began laughing to herself after a moment, turning to her friend. "I knew you said a party with magical girls was likely to be a little strange, but this is just ridiculous!"

Nabiki shrugged. "People seem to be enjoying it," she replied with a smile.

"Oh, don't get me wrong, it's wonderful, but you have to admit it's not exactly normal." Her friend stared around the garden then looked meaningfully at the portal and the wires going through it. As Nabiki followed her gaze, what appeared to be Shampoo's arm came through the portal, fumbled around for the CD player that was sitting on the ground next to it, turned the volume up a little, then vanished again. "And that's just wrong," Miki said after a couple of seconds, her eyes wide. They exchanged a glance then collapsed in laughter. "Oh, god, Nabiki, I'm so glad I met you," the other woman gasped out, holding her sides. "I don't think I'd have had so much fun otherwise."

"You're welcome," Nabiki giggled. "I've had a lot of fun as well. Your family are cool."

"Did you see the expression Hana has been walking around with ever since you introduced us to Chou and Yori?" Miki asked with a grin. "She only needs a bloody axe in one hand and people will be running from her like crazy." This set Nabiki off all over again. Eventually they both calmed down, Miki following the Tendo woman into the house.

"I'll be back in a minute," Nabiki said, heading for the bathroom. When she came back, her friend was looking around the living room with a small smile on her face, apparently approvingly.

"You have a very nice house," she said.

"Thanks. It's been in the family for a long time." Nabiki looked around as well, memories of her childhood coming back strongly. "I like living here. It was difficult at first going to university and not coming home, and even though I'm used to it now, it's always nice to come back." She sat down, Miki taking a seat opposite, then relaxed into the seat. "There's something about the house you grew up in that's definitely special. Just the sounds and smells, you know? Like when it's windy and the house creaks a little. It's a familiar sound, one you don't really notice, until you've been away for a while and come across it again. Little things like that. They all have memories attached from when you're young."

Miki nodded, looking around the room herself again. Her eyes stopped on one photograph on the shelf near the door. "Is that your mother?" she asked, indicating the photo, which had five people in it. Nabiki looked at it, then got up and retrieved it, taking it back with her and sitting next to her friend.

"Yes. This was one of the last family photos we took, a long time ago, just before she got sick." The middle Tendo looked at the image reflectively, something she hadn't done for a while, her finger rubbing the edge of the frame without her conscious thought. "That's me, when I was about seven. Akane is only just six in this one, and that's my other sister Kasumi, she was nine. Dad, of course, then Mom." She smiled gently as she stared at the face of her long-departed other parent. "We were up in the mountains on holiday. Only about two weeks later we found out she was ill. It didn't show for a while after that, but as soon as we knew, everything changed." With a small shake of her head, she sighed. "Everything changed. It took a long time for things to get better."

They sat in silence for a few seconds. Miki put her arm around her friend's shoulders. "I'm sorry to bring it up."

"Don't be, it was a long time ago."

"Ovarian cancer," Nabiki replied as quietly. "undiagnosed and practically symptomless until it was much too late to do anything. She died about nine months later. She was fine, more or less, until only a few weeks before the end then she went downhill very quickly." Shivering a little despite herself and the temperature, she added, "It was horrible, at the end. It gave me nightmares for years and... well, it certainly affected us all. I know on my part it changed who I was a lot."

"What was wrong with her, if you don't mind me asking?" Miki's voice was low and respectful.

"Ovarian cancer," Nabiki replied as quietly. "undiagnosed and practically symptomless until it was much too late to do anything. She died about nine months later. She was fine, more or less, until only a few weeks before the end then she went downhill very quickly." Shivering a little despite herself and the temperature, she added, "It was horrible, at the end. It gave me nightmares for years and... well, it certainly affected us all. I know on my part it changed who I was a lot."

"And I guess I started shutting down in some ways, looking back I was scared about losing control of things and came to the conclusion that I had to control myself before anything else happened. It had some beneficial effects in the long run, but also some unpleasant ones. I know I didn't have a" lot of friends for years. People I knew, yes, and people I used, but not actual friends. Not like you, for example." Miki, who was watching and listening quietly, smiled at her. "In some ways you were the first person for years I just liked as a friend. Going to university was a good thing if only because of that."

Miki jumped to her feet and hugged the other woman for a few seconds. "I'm glad about that. It's been a lot of fun knowing you as well even if things go a bit strange sometimes." She giggled a little. "Nerimans are weird, everyone knows that."

Snickering, Nabiki returned the hug. "Oh, we're all crazy, true enough. You should have seen what school was like. But it was fun a lot of the time and good experience for handling emergencies."

Releasing her, Miki stepped back then looked at the photo again. "What about your other sister? Kasumi."

"She was old enough and calm enough to handle things better, and for a long time we didn't realise that a lot of that was a cover, I think. She basically took on the position Mom held and practically raised us, not to mention took care of Dad at the same time. She did a wonderful job to be honest but I'm still guilty to this day that we just took it for granted." The middle sister looked mildly depressed. "It wasn't until she finally left that we realised just how much she did around the house. In a lot of ways it was a good thing, it finally pushed us into beginning to heal as a family, but... it affected all of us pretty badly. She held the family together all by herself."

"And you've never heard anything from her since?" Miki looked both sad and worried.

Nabiki thought about her reply, not wanting to actually lie about it. Eventually, she carefully responded, "The family still has no idea where she went or where she is. We hope she'll come back one day." Glancing at her friend, she added, "Everyone who ever knew her around here misses her. She was very well liked."

"I hope she does come home one day," Miki said with a sad tone. "I'd like to meet her."

"Perhaps one day you can." They stared at the photo for a little longer, then Nabiki perked up. "Come on, I'll show you around the house. And the Dojo, that's pretty neat." Waving towards the door she urged her friend onwards with a smile.

Nodding respectfully to Cologne as she came up beside the Elder, Akane looked over the food on offer, eventually taking another bowl of ramen with beef. Mr Ito was talking to the ancient women and Shampoo, so she smiled at them all then retreated to a position a few metres away, sitting on a large slab of the same rock that the plaza terrace was made out of which protruded from the ground near the edge of the alien forest. The very light breeze brought the smells of the vegetation drifting across her as she slowly ate, watching the party go on. People were wandering back and forth through the portal, talking and laughing, everyone apparently thoroughly enjoying themselves.

Glancing at her watch she saw it was only about five in the afternoon, which meant it was still light on the other side of the tear in the universe, the sun not setting at this time of year for several hours yet. Leaning back and staring at the unfamiliar stars she smiled a little to herself, still not sure how all this had happened but pleased it had.

A short distance away Nodoka, Yori, and Ukyo were talking about the wedding. "I'll email you a time conversion chart, Ukyo," the petite woman said. "It will let you know the time of day in Nerima versus the time here for the next few months. The days here are about thirty hours long, so it drifts in and out of sync with time at home. You can pick a date for the wedding when it's the right time here for the waterfall at sunset if you want, or when it's full light. Once you've made up your mind let me know and I'll arrange to book the place for the day. My friend Uthryyl says it's easy to sort out."

"Thank you so much, Yori," Ukyo replied, looking very happy. She scanned the surroundings with a gentle smile on her face, rather unlike her normal confident expression. "This place is so amazing. I still can't believe we can get married here."

"It's pretty good, isn't it?" Yori grinned. "It's certainly one of the most impressive things I've ever seen."

"That it is," Nodoka agreed. She frowned slightly. "Now all we have to do is find a priest. One who will be all right with the... somewhat irregular... aspects of the location." She sighed slightly.
"That could be slightly problematic."

Yori looked amused. "I know someone who might be a good fit," she told the other two with a mild smirk. "He's a nice old guy and not unfamiliar with the crazy aspects of magical girl life. I'll ask him if you want."

"That would be much appreciated," Nodoka responded after a look at Ukyo who nodded. "Thank you once again."

Waving her hand, Yori brushed the thanks off. "No problems. It's easy to arrange and we like helping."

"Still, it's good of you even so," the older woman smiled. She turned to Ukyo. "We'll have to work out all the menus and things like that for the day but it looks like the difficult part isn't a problem now, dear. Tomorrow, let's sit down and go over everything one last time, then we can work out the date and start arranging all the various aspects of the wedding."

Ukyo nodded, then abruptly started crying. "Whatever is the matter, dear?" Nodoka asked with concern.

Smiling through the tears, the brunette wiped her eyes. "It just suddenly struck me. It's really going to happen. These last few months, I was almost feeling like it wouldn't, but everything is suddenly coming together so quickly." She rubbed her eyes again as Nodoka put her hand on her shoulder and squeezed comfortably. "I can hardly believe it."

"It will work out well, I think," the older woman assured her with a glance at Yori who was smiling a little at them both.

"Thanks to a lot of help from my friends, yes," Ukyo replied happily, her tears drying up.

Pleased for her friend, Akane finished her bowl, then stood to take it back to the table. Deciding that she'd had enough beer for the moment she picked up a glass of apple juice and sipped it, slowly moving over to look past the wall, still not sufficiently trusting of the incredible drop to approach more closely than a metre. She stopped beside Tamiko, who was chatting to Nabiki's friend Miki's sister Kimiko, both women giggling at some joke while watching the other sister Hana who was walking around with a creepy grin on her face as she stared at the magical girls.
Akane watched the elder Sano sister for a moment as well, then snickered.

"She seems happy," she commented out loud. Kimiko snorted a burst of laughter.

"You have no idea," she retorted in a voice that betrayed a deep understanding of her sister's peculiarities. "She's a total fan-girl. Miki is bad enough sometimes, but Hana is nuts about it. When Nabiki invited us and sis found out that all you guys," she glanced at Tamiko who was grinning, "were going to be here, and Yori and Chou as well, she went completely bananas about it for hours. It was both very funny and kind of disturbing."

"What about you, Kimiko?" Akane asked, smiling. "Are you into magical girls?"

"Not like those two are," the youngest Sano replied with a shake of her head. "I find the whole thing interesting, of course, and it's been a lot of fun talking to everyone, but..." She trailed off, then pointed at Hana. "That's not the way I look at it." All three of them watched the eldest Sano pull out a camera and take a few photos of Chou, something she'd done several times in the last hour, giggling to herself in a slightly deranged tone. "Both my sisters are crazy, that one more than a little."

Akane and Tamiko shared a look and a chuckle. "At least she seems to be enjoying herself," the red-head commented.

"That's true," Kimiko allowed. "She'll be in a good mood for weeks after this." Producing a camera of her own she took a couple of photos of the entire plaza, the flash lighting the area briefly. After tucking it away again she turned to look at the forest behind the stone-surfaced area. "Is there any problem with going and looking at the trees?"

"There's nothing dangerous in the woods," Tamiko told her. "If you want to poke around go ahead, but stay away from the edge and the river. There's a path over there which ends up in a parking area about a kilometre or so back. No lights, though, so it'll be pretty dark." She thought for a moment, then produced a small flashlight, turning it on and handing it over. "Here. Use this."

Accepting the device Kimiko smiled. "Thanks, Tamiko. I just want to see what's in there, I'll be back in a little while." She wandered off, heading for the path Tamiko had pointed out with the pool of illumination from the flashlight preceding her, while Akane and the magical girl watched her go.

"Don't worry, it's mostly very safe," the red-headed woman said to the youngest Tendo. "So, how are you getting on, Akane? We haven't had time to talk yet today."

"Fine, thanks, Tamiko," Akane replied. She looked around at the people at the party, then back to the other woman. "I'm having a lot of fun here even though this isn't exactly what I thought was going to happen, and the last week was great. How are you getting on?"

"Not bad, all things considered," Tamiko smiled. "Nothing serious has happened this week, just lots of little annoyances, which is easy enough to deal with. Having Aiko away so much was a bit odd, we're all together most of the time, but we adapted. It's not like she can't get back here in a second when we need her after all."

"Sorry about taking your friend away like that," Akane giggled.

"Don't worry about it, really," the other woman replied. "She was having a hell of a lot of fun. That DVD she got was pretty amazing, it impressed us all with what you and Shampoo did. Apparently you'll know on Monday what the decision is?"

"Yes, that's what we're expecting. Adrian and Anton both said that it was a sure thing but I'm not going to believe that until I have the contract in my hand." Akane sighed a little, shrugging. "It could still go wrong."

"I'm sure it will work out fine," Tamiko reassured her. "From what I saw there's no way you could have done any better."

"Thanks."

Both of them looked up as Soun stopped next to them, Akane smiling at her father. "Hi, Dad," she said.

"Hello, daughter." He smiled back. "Hello, Tamiko. I trust you and your friends are still enjoying the party?"

"We are, thanks, Soun." The magical girl grinned at him. "It's very good so far. Although we seem to have removed it from your place pretty effectively." She looked around at the alien landscape then back to him. The Tendo patriarch followed her eyes and nodded.

"It does appear that way. Don't worry, as long as everyone is enjoying themselves that's all that matters." He looked at city of Krentak in the distance for a moment. "I'm certainly having an experience, believe me. I didn't think, when I got up this morning, that I was going to be on the other side of a portal in a demon world with half the neighbourhood." His expression was midway between pleased and bemused.

"I don't think any of us did," Akane noted. Tamiko looked at them, then around at the scenery. "It looks pretty normal to me," she laughed. Both the Tendos stared at her. "But then, I'm a bit strange," she added after a moment.

"Indeed." Soun smiled, his moustache twitching. "I suppose we should be grateful that with six magical girls in close proximity this is all that's happened."

"Oh, Dad, what do you think could happen?" Akane looked at her father with amusement. Tamiko winced slightly, then looked around with mild worry.

"You shouldn't say things like that," she muttered. "The crazy can hear you."

"It's a wonderful place to live, Nabiki," Miki said, looking around the courtyard between the Dojo and the house. They'd just exited the latter building after a short tour. "I like it."

"So do I," the middle sister replied. "It's home, after all. Your families' house is nice as well even if it's smaller."

"Most places are smaller than this." Miki smiled at her friend. A voice from behind them made them turn.

"Ah, I was wondering where you two had wandered off to," John said as he approached from the direction of the garden. "I looked around in a different world, but couldn't find you, so I came here." He looked bemused for a moment. "I still have trouble with that idea, you know," he went on, shaking his head as they both grinned at him. "You know some strange people, Tendo."

"Oh, you're not that strange, John," she assured him seriously, making him look askance at her before smiling himself.

"Thanks a lot."

"No problem." Sharing a grin, they looked around again. "So, do you want to go back to the party, or look around outside for a little while?" Nabiki asked.
"Let's see more of where you grew up," Miki suggested. "It's still only late afternoon, the party's going to go on for hours yet, isn't it?"

"I'd think so," the middle sister admitted. "Probably until at least ten or eleven, possibly later. Most of the neighbours who'd get annoyed about the noise are already here and practically everyone is in another universe at the moment."

"I have to tell you I find that sentence very difficult to believe," John complained.

She grinned at him. "I'm told you get used to it eventually." Shaking his head in wondering amusement he followed with his girlfriend as Nabiki headed towards the gate.

Carefully turning the page in the ancient, tattered book, the unhealthy looking dark haired young man ran a lightly trembling forefinger down the neatly inked Kanji symbols that translated the frankly disturbing looking text laid out across the not-exactly-paper. Whoever had done the translations had written in the wide margins of the original work, using something for ink that had faded to a nasty brown colour over the centuries. The feeling of whatever the page was actually printed on, probably some form of parchment, but quite unlike anything he had ever encountered before, made a slight shudder run down his back for a moment.

"I think..." he muttered to himself, re-reading one section, then flipping forward a few pages, reading another part, then back to the first bit. "I think... Yes! It could work!" His reedy voice rose in triumph as he punched the air, before grabbing frantically at the book as it slid off his knees. "Oops."

Having lost his place, he flipped through the few dozen pages which were all that remained of the formerly much thicker book, bound in the western style although with wooden covers. He'd acquired it from an old man of dubiously human ancestry in exchange for, oddly enough, half a dozen large bags of freeze-dried coffee beans and a litre of chocolate ice cream, something that even at the time had struck him as slightly peculiar. Putting it down as one of the less weird things that had happened in his years of trawling through odd little shops down dark alleys in search of true magical power, he'd shrugged, accepted the deal, and wandered away happy.

His gaunt cheeks flushed with colour for once, breaking the normal pallor, as he smiled to himself. "I'll show them that I can do proper magic," he muttered. "Always making fun of me, not taking me seriously, saying I'm not a real mage. This should be... very interesting." He giggled to himself in a manner that many would describe as a little more deranged than ideal.

Kneeling on the floor he made copious notes while going through the damaged book again, working out the supplies he'd require for performing the ritual he'd cobbled together from parts of four other disparate ones. Checking his work, he re-read one of the pages, the last one in the book, the final third of which was mostly obliterated by an unpleasant dark stain. Idly running a finger over the apparent toothmarks on the back cover of the book while he thought hard, he finally made a few changes, substituting a couple of ingredients for the incense needed to make up for the fact that the list on the page was partly illegible.

"That should do it," he noted, satisfied. "Who said you couldn't change these things? It's easy." Giggling a little again, he closed both his notebook and the original work, before standing and rubbing his back with a groan of irritation.

Forty minutes later he'd put together the supplies, mostly from his own stock, although he'd had to steal some oregano from his mother's spice cupboard, had tucked everything away into a large backpack including his notes, and was wandering the streets of Furinkan looking for the correct place to perform the magical ritual. People passing him sometimes gave him a somewhat bemused glance, his constant mumbling and checking of a compass apparently causing a small amount of consternation, but overall his behaviour wasn't entirely out of the ordinary for either himself or the locale in general. As a result no one bothered to ask what he was up to.

This was probably a mistake.

"Now remember, dear, your grandmother is very old and doesn't like sudden loud noises. Be polite and quiet, answer any questions she asks, but otherwise don't talk too much. She's very traditional."
Chiyoko rolled her eyes a little, making her mother sigh. "And don't do that."

"Mom, do we have to go and see her? I wanted to go to the arcade."

Her mother sighed again, finishing adjusting her dress and straightening up. "Yes, we have to go and see her. It's her birthday, as you well know. So just do what I said, please."

With a slight grimace the twelve year old nodded. "OK, Mom."

"And don't mention your... extracurricular activities," her mother advised meaningfully. The young girl put on an innocent expression.

"I don't know what you mean, Mom," she replied. The older woman gave her a look. She quailed a little. "OK," the girl finally said a little grumpily. "Anyway, it's not like she's going to hear about things in Minato, is it? She's so old she probably doesn't even know what a TV is."

Her mother stared severely at her for several seconds, although Chiyoko could tell that she was hiding a reluctant smile. "My mother isn't that old, dear. Just... don't talk about certain things. We'll both have a calmer time of it, believe me." They looked around as the station announcement sounded, the train pulling in a few seconds later. Getting on they were lucky enough to find a seat, sitting down as the doors closed and the train smoothly pulled away.

"Aha! That should do the job." The young man checked his compass again, turned in a complete circle, then looked up at the multi-story car park in the middle of Furinkan next to the train station, before glancing at the police station on the other side of the street a little warily. No one was paying him any attention, so he looked quickly around once more, then slipped into the pedestrian entrance, heading upwards.

Arriving on the top level he exited onto the roof, peering around curiously. Not being a driver he'd never had any reason to come up here before. Walking to the edge he put his hands on the retaining wall and looked over, swallowing a little at the fifteen metre drop, then looked around at the surrounding buildings. "Need to be higher," he grumbled. "I need an unobstructed view of the sky."
Another quick glance around and his eyes stopped on the elevator structure opposite where the stairs had come out, and the access ladder he could see running up the side of it to the flat roof above the machine room. "Perfect."

Making his way through the small number of cars parked on the roof level he reached the ladder, checked again for witnesses, of which there appeared to be precisely none, then started climbing.
Seconds later he heaved himself, panting, onto the tar and gravel covered roof and breathed heavily for a minute or so. When he'd recovered he sat up and removed his backpack, before shuffling both it and himself into the middle of the four by three metre space. Looking around he smiled. He was above most of the buildings, the area not having many above four stories high too close to him, and nothing seemed to be blocking the sky closer than about three hundred metres away.
Soon he had swept most of the gravel away from a two metre square area and was involved in drawing an elaborate ritual circle of his own devising within it in a mixture of chalk powder and chicken's blood, with a little mint extract added because he thought it might help. When he finished, he double-checked everything, nodded in satisfaction, then set out the remaining requirements, lighting half a dozen candles that burned with different colours and placing them at specific points in his pattern. His special incense went into two bowls, one either side of him, which he also lit. Putting both hands on sections he'd drawn in the middle of the circle, he closed his eyes and concentrated. Silence fell as sweat ran down his face.

Five minutes later he opened his eyes, the large smile he was wearing slowly collapsing as he looked around.

"Damn."

Sighing, he rocked back on his heels, nearly fell over, caught himself with a mumbled obscenity, then retrieved his notebook and began reading his own instructions. A few moments of comparison between his drawings and the pattern on the roof and his eyes widened. "Of course!"
he shouted. Dropping the book he leaned forward with the pot of goo and the brush, quickly making some changes. "Aleph Tau Teth Vau, not Aleph Tau Kaph Vau. What was I thinking?"
Discarding the brush and pot he shook his head in mild wonder. "Kaph. What an idiot." Snickering to himself, he put the notebook to one side then tried again.

This time, after considerable concentration, the budding mage managed to produce a faint flicker of yellow light in a few of the symbols. "Nearly," he panted, watching with disappointment as the light went out again. Making a few tweaks he'd just thought of with the brush again, he tried once more. The lights lasted longer, spread further, and changed colour to a pale blue. "Damn it, I'm missing something," the young man grumbled. Leaning down he inspected the sole still glowing glyph from extreme close range, sneezing slightly as some chalk dust went up his nose.

"It needs more power," he finally decided. "The rest of it is fine, I'm sure." Prodding the symbol experimentally with his right forefinger, he yelped and bit the end of his tongue as a sensation a lot like putting his finger in a light socket shot through his arm. Swearing to himself, he stuck the abused digit in his mouth and sucked on it, before making a face and slowly removing it, then spitting chalk and chicken blood over the edge of the roof. "Eeww," he muttered, wiping his finger on his shirt.

Wondering how he was going to push more energy into the design, he was half conscious of the sound of a train approaching from the east. A few seconds passed before he realised what he was seeing, lost in thought as he was, but eventually he consciously noticed that the glowing glyph was now glowing more brightly, and the glow was even beginning to spread to adjacent ones.

"What the..." He leaned forward again, watching with fascination. "Where's the energy coming from?" Cautiously, he put his hands in the activation symbols, feeling for the power flow. The diagram was slowly powering up, ramping from the barely idling he'd managed to achieve to something approaching the amount of power needed to work. Extending his mage senses, as he liked to think of it, he became aware that there was a very potent source of magic approaching from somewhere to the east and below, slowly but steadily. It resonated with his diagram in a peculiar manner that made his teeth itch, but seemed to be actually dumping energy into the thing. Not stopping to wonder how or why, merely accepting his good fortune and obvious genius, Hikaru Gosunkugi grinned like an idiot and performed the relevant operation to activate his magnum opus.

This was definitely a mistake.
Half an hour and many stops later the train was rumbling through the outer Tokyo area, half way to their destination. Chiyoko looked around curiously noticing that quite a few people seemed to be looking nervously at the display which was showing the next stop, making her wonder why.

"Mom, why do those people all look worried?" she asked quietly, indicating with a discreet sideways nod of her head a group near the door closest to them, half of which were pressed as hard against the carriage wall as they could get, most of the remainder of whom seemed to be taking deep breaths as if they were about to dive into freezing water.

Her mother looked up from her book then followed her eyes, frowning slightly, before she noticed the destination posted on the electronic sign at the end of the carriage. She paled very slightly. "Oh. We're here already."

"Where is here?" the girl asked. "What's so scary about...," she read the sign again, "...Furinkan? That's in Nerima, isn't it?"

"Yes, it is." Closing her book, her mother explained, "You know how Minato seems to have a little problem with, well, demons?" Chiyoko gave the older woman a long-suffering look, making her smile slightly in response. "Of course you do. Well, dear, Nerima has something much worse."

Leaning forward eagerly, the girl asked curiously, "What, Mom?"

Chiyoko blinked a couple of times. "Martial artists?" she queried, puzzled. Her mother nodded soberly. "Like Yori, you mean? She's always saying she's a martial artist."

Looking slightly affronted, her mother shook her head. "Yori is a perfectly respectable and civic-minded Magical Girl, one who is well liked by the community for good reasons and is highly skilled in both magic and martial arts. No, these people aren't magical, they're just... not entirely there in the head, I think." She seemed both resigned and somewhat worried. "They fight each other all the time, break things, cause total chaos, and they don't even have the excuse of demons wandering around."

She glanced up at the sign again as the train began to slow. "And Furinkan has the worst of it. There are all sorts of stories of things that happen here. Apparently the High School is completely insane, although it was much worse a few years back. But the whole area is dangerously peculiar. Those poor people probably have to visit for some reason and are worried that some martial artistry might break out near them."

Still somewhat confused, Chiyoko nodded, looking out the windows at the buildings going past. The area certainly looked normal enough. Not all that different from back home. She probed with her inherent magic, noticing that there seemed to be very few power signatures in range that were ones she associated with visitors from elsewhere, only one or two at some distance. Rather closer were some familiar ones, making her raise her eyebrows a little. 'Hmm. Tamiko's here somewhere,' she mused, 'I wonder why?' She could also feel a portal a couple of kilometres away, radiating magic. Yet again, the type of magic was familiar, it was definitely one of the strange ones Yori and Chou could produce.

Other than that, there wasn't much familiar about the magical emanations of the local area. However, there were quite a lot of power signatures that, while unfamiliar, were definitely not normal people. A few of them seemed to be mages of one sort or another while the remainder were rather different. 'Martial artists?' she wondered. 'Some of them feel quite powerful in some weird way.'
She noticed one signature quite close that seemed vaguely magelike although pretty underwhelming in power output, although in some strange manner not entirely unfamiliar. Whatever the mage in question was doing it seemed to resonate with her own magic in a way that made the hairs on the back of her neck twitch uncomfortably. The girl peered out the window, looking upwards at where the sensation seemed to come from, but could see nothing except a large parking garage. Eventually she shrugged and dismissed it as unimportant.

Her mother had opened her book again and was alternating reading it with glancing out the window with a slight frown of worry. The train stopped, the doors hissing open, then there was a pause. After a few seconds, somewhat reluctantly, a number of people disembarked, scuttling off quickly while looking around nervously. A slightly larger number of people dived onto the train, appearing relieved for the most part. Chiyoko watched with interest as a couple of them seemed to congratulate each other on surviving the experience.

Just as she was about to go back to playing her hand-held computer game, she felt a strange pulse of magic roll over her, then something familiar. "Oh, crap," she mumbled under her breath, looking around quickly. 'Why would they be here?' she wondered to herself. Peering out the window she spotted something small and fast-moving climbing down the drainpipe of the parking garage she'd noticed earlier, which was to the side of the train station, sighing slightly when she was sure what it was. With a quick glance at her mother, who was looking the other way, she gritted her teeth, decided she was going to have to live with being yelled at later, then jumped to her feet and shot towards the door. Just making it through as it closed, she heard her mother shout her name, muffled by the walls of the carriage, looking up to see the older woman glaring at her in mixed worry and anger as the train began moving.

She mimed being sorry, probably rather ineffectively judging by the way in which the glare intensifies, then went into elaborate charades trying to explain that she had to do something. As the train disappeared around the corner she could see her mother's mouth moving, somewhat pleased she couldn't actually hear what was being said, but unpleasantly aware of the fact that she was bound to find out sooner or later. Sighing again, she looked around for somewhere discreet to change into her 'working clothes' as she called it.

Under a minute later, pedestrians around the station were privy to the sight of a small girl dressed in an elaborate pink dress charging down the street wielding a two metre long staff with a baseball sized glowing blue gem on the end, chasing a small pack of weird furry things with impossibly large teeth that seemed to be eating everything in sight. Some of them merely sighed and moved out of the way, muttering about the martial artists getting younger and crazier every day, while others watched with interest. A few tourists and other visitors screamed and hid, causing the locals to look at them with amused contempt and make unkind jokes.

Coughing, Hikaru waved smoke away from his face, frantically beat out a small fire that had been merrily burning in his hair, then sat up. Looking around, he blurrily wondered why he was lying on the roof of the parking structure next to a Honda, before he managed to lever himself to his feet with the aid of the vehicle, then stagger over to the outer wall and lean on it breathing heavily. Several seconds passed as he recovered. He could remember a loud noise, a smell of burning, and a brief sensation of flight, with somewhere in there a bright flash, but wasn't entirely sure what else had happened.

After a moment or two more he looked up at the machine room roof, seeing a trail of oddly tinted smoke rising lazily from it in the still afternoon air, then peered around. His eyes stopped dead when they met another pair, gold in colour and filled with alien curiosity, peering back at him from the roof of the car next to him.
"Oh shit," he finally managed to squeak out.

Backing away, he tripped over something behind him, only just catching himself before he fell. Turning his head he stopped dead, seeing another one of the... things... behind him staring at him. After five or ten seconds the sound of pattering feet made him tear his eyes away from the creature, only to find he was absolutely surrounded by them, whatever the hell they were.

Not what he'd been trying for, certainly.

There was dead silence, only broken by the sound of the train that had left the station disappearing into the distance for a little longer, until at some unheard signal the vast crowd of otherworldly creatures suddenly scattered, some going over the edge, some down the stairs. Seconds later he was alone.

Seconds after that the screaming and yelling from the street started.

Hikaru turned very slowly and looked over the side of the parking structure, paled even more than normal, then hastily moved to erase as much evidence of his presence as possible, before legging it.

There was still a little smoke coming from his hair as he rushed home, hoping desperately no one would put two and two together. Especially that terrifying old Chinese woman.

She gave him the creeps.

---

Tatewaki Kuno posed for the young woman, smiling brilliantly. "So, what say you, maiden? Will you date with the Blue Thunder?"

"Push off you weirdo," the brunette snarled, glaring at him, before she picked up the slice of pie she'd just been served at the outdoor café in the middle of Furinkan and hurled it accurately at his face. Spluttering through a mask of lemon meringue he mumbled in an outraged tone, wiping his face. By the time he was able to see again the girl had left.

"How strange," he mused out loud. "The poor deluded thing seemed oddly reluctant. Perhaps she was ill?" Shaking his head slightly as he looked after her he absently stole a napkin from another diner, cleaning his face with it before dropping it back into the man's lap as the fellow grumbled loudly. "Hush, my good man, it was required," he retorted to one particularly nasty insult, carelessly dropping a few high denomination notes on top of the napkin, which shut the diner up fairly rapidly.

Turning on his heel he made his way down the street, casting regal glances about the place and keeping his eyes open for good examples of attractive females. A few minutes later he heard an odd grinding noise from an alleyway to his left, causing him to stop and raise an eyebrow, before investigating.

Half a dozen metres down it he stopped dead, staring at the peculiar creature with the mouthful of excessively large translucent teeth which was happily chewing on what was left of some hapless soul's moped, only half of the rear wheel left on the ground. "By the heavens, what manner of foul demon are you?" he cried, whipping out his bokken and holding it ready. The thing kept chewing, eyeing him carefully but otherwise unmoved. Swallowing, it scooped up the last part of the moped and crunched it up, then looked around for something else to eat.

"Hold, demon, and cease your predations upon this innocent neighbourhood!" Kuno shouted as the creature took an exploratory nibble out of the nearest waste bin. "Return to whatever low hell spawned you." He paced a sliding step closer, waving his bokken at the thing's nose.

There was a crunching sound.

Pulling back the remaining third of his wooden sword, Kuno stared at it, went red, then glared at the demon, which was chewing contemplatively. "Hey!" he yelled, incensed. "Bad demon!" Even as he said it he thought it sounded stupid. The demon seemed unimpressed, simply staring at him. Gathering his dignity about him again, he drew himself up and pointed the truncated bokken at the creature. "Return to your place of origin, I, the Blue Thunder, demand it!"

With a small growl, the thing fixed its large golden eyes on the uneaten piece of bokken, then jumped at him. He yelped, dropping it and hastily retreating a couple of steps. The demon neatly caught the falling weapon and swallowed. "Fiend!" he yelled in anger.

Reaching over his shoulder he grabbed the sheath he carried the bokken in, swinging it at the creature while shouting "Strike!" He got about six high-speed blows in with little real effect before the thing grabbed the other end of the sheath and bit down, pulling hard. A brief tug of war ensued, which he lost. Watching the sheath go the way of the bokken, he rubbed his chin in thought. "You are a most vexing foul creature, are you not?" he mused irritably. The small animal sat and stared at him, apparently waiting for him to feed it something else.

After a few seconds thought, he pointed at it with a superior air. "Stay there," the young man commanded firmly. Turning about he dashed off. The demon stared after him for a little while, then began idly eating one of the waste receptacles with a series of screeching sounds from the tearing metal and every sign of enjoyment.

Opening the gate to the Dojo yard, Nabiki led John and Miki out, intending to show them a little of the locality before returning to the party. "It's quite a quiet area, isn't it?" Miki said, looking around as they walked out into the street.

Nabiki giggled, unable to help it. "It can be," she admitted, "but a lot of the time it's total chaos." Shaking her head, she went on, "People attacking each other, smashing walls, running around on the roof, mallets and clubs flying everywhere... Not exactly subtle, a lot of them."

"Well, at the moment it looks pretty nice," her friend said.

Five seconds later she was almost knocked over by a blue blur that zoomed past, a faint cry of, "My sincere apologies, fair maiden, but I must hurry before the hellish creature sates its unnatural appetite on the community any further," coming back to them on the wind.

"What the hell?" Miki yelled, catching herself and glaring after the rapidly receding young man who was already a couple of hundred metres up the street, vanishing around a corner in the distance. John and Nabiki stared at her, then each other, before turning to look after the assailant. Nabiki groaned, rubbing her hand over her face.

"Kuno. Oh, God, what's that idiot up to now?" she moaned.

"You know that lunatic?" Miki demanded.

"Unfortunately, yes," she admitted. "That was Tatewaki Kuno, the brother of the insane gymnast I told you about. He's nuts as well, but not quite as dangerous about it as she is most of the time. A pretty good martial artist in his own way but really full of himself. Normally polite though." She shook her head in irritation. "I wonder what's got him all wound up this time?" With a quick mental command she sent one of the stealthed camera drones she had floating above the Dojo keeping an eye on things drifting off after the Kuno scion, just in case.

"He did seem a little worked up," John observed.

"He's always like that," she replied, shaking her head in despair. "At school he was a nightmare, he was so intent on dating Akane. He was completely obsessed with her. Oh, well, it's probably nothing." She rather hoped this was the case.

Shortly afterwards via the drone she spotted the Kuno idiot and his long-suffering man-servant Sasuke come charging out the front door of the Kuno mansion, both of them with their arms full of swords, bokken, and a few bo staves, the latter man having a heavy bag over his shoulder which had a mace of all things protruding from it and was obviously full. Nabiki sighed faintly, wondering what on earth the pair were up to this time.

She and her friends had walked as far as the alley she'd used many times as a teleport location for Aiko when Kuno and Sasuke pelted past them in the other direction, the former shouting, "Faster, Sasuke, lest the demon escape before we can chastise it."

"I'm running as fast as I can, Master Kuno," the small ninja replied breathlessly, nearly dropping a bo staff in the process. Nabiki, Miki, and John stepped back a little to allow them past, swivelling to watch the pair disappear into the distance towards the centre of Furinkan. Once more they exchanged puzzled looks.

"I'm beginning to see what you meant about Nerima being a little weird," John commented slowly.

"To be fair, he's one of the weirder parts," Nabiki sighed. "His sister is worse and his father is genuinely insane, although somehow he's still principal of the school. I have no idea how. Possibly no one saner wants the job."

"Let's go and see what he's doing," Miki exclaimed. The middle Tendo looked doubtfully at her.

"That might not be a good idea," she began. "There can be a lot of collateral damage with him and Sasuke, never mind whatever it is they're going after."

"What's the worst that could happen?" her friend noted happily, looking excited. Nabiki winced, glancing quickly around just in case, but eventually followed the other two as Miki led them quickly in the direction Kuno had gone.

"Where is the little monster?" Kuno muttered in an annoyed tone, looking around the alley he'd left a few minutes earlier. There was ample evidence of its presence in the large number of implausibly huge bites taken out of practically everything in the area, but no demon. Hefting his replacement bokken having dumped the rest of his load on Sasuke he prodded the remains of a waste bin, lifting it with the tip to see if the creature was hiding underneath.

"Master Kuno?" Sasuke asked in a quiet voice, almost invisible under a huge pile of weapons. "What are we looking for?"

"A nasty little fiend from some hellish pit, undoubtedly sent here to bedevil the citizenry by some foul sorcerer," Kuno replied, poking another bin and then jumping back in case the thing leaped out. He paused, contemplating the matter. "Could it be the work of the Saotome menace, perhaps?" After a moment he shook his head. "No, the craven coward left years ago and has never been seen again. Undoubtedly he ran rather than face me on the field of battle."
Behind him Sasuke rolled his eyes, but said nothing, knowing considerably more about the matter than his employer. He looked around somewhat nervously. There was certainly plenty of damage to everything in sight which strongly suggested that the Kuno man had indeed encountered something out of the ordinary, which was a little worrying. Judging by the marks whatever it was had exceptionally large teeth and one hell of a bite radius.

A sound from behind them had Kuno yell a war cry and spin on the spot, lashing out with his bokken. The hollow clonk that resulted when an incautious Sasuke was whacked firmly on the head and sent flying made him look at the other man with exasperation. "Get up, Sasuke, and stop moaning. It is an action unbecoming of a Kuno family retainer."

The little man rubbed his head, stood, then bent to pick up all the weaponry he'd dropped. "Sorry, Master Kuno, I failed to anticipate your uncoordinated swing," he said in a low voice, a certain amount of mild irritation in it. His employer missed it as he was currently looking at the three people peering into the alley at them.

"What the hell are you doing, Kuno?" the familiar cool tones of Nabiki Tendo came to them. She sounded somewhat annoyed, which made Sasuke shiver a little. The woman was in many ways much more dangerous than either of the Kuno siblings, if only because she was far more intelligent and downright ruthless if pushed.

"Ah. The lovely Nabiki Tendo!" Kuno cried, ignoring both the question and the tone it was asked in. "Have you perchance seen a small hell-beast engaged in its foul trade hereabouts?" He looked around again, a puzzled expression on his face. "I left it here not ten minutes ago and commanded it to remain. It appears to have disobeyed my orders and absconded."

"Hell-beast?" she inquired, a mildly puzzled expression crossing her face. Behind her, her two companions exchanged a look of confusion. "What are you talking about?"

"About so high," he explained, holding his hand half a metre from the ground, "with a long tail, gold eyes, black fur, and an inordinate quantity of excessively large teeth. The creature seems to have quite the appetite as well." Nabiki stared at him, then closed her eyes and shook her head. "Are you saying you're chasing a demon, Kuno?" she asked with weary curiosity. He nodded. "I believe it to be such, yes. Why it would be inflicting its attentions on the environs of Furinkan I do not know, I was under the impression such fiends restricted themselves to the benighted ward of Minato and the unhappy inhabitants thereof, but there is no denying the evidence of mine eyes." He spun a complete circle on the spot, his bokken outstretched, in case the thing had taken the opportunity to sneak up on them. Once again Sasuke paid the price for not paying attention, sliding to the base of the wall he'd been flung into with a groan and a clattering sound resulting from dropping everything he was carrying. Oblivious, Kuno ignored him, looking alertly around for his quarry.

"Kuno?" He turned his attention to the Tendo woman, who was watching him with a resigned look.

"Yes, fair Nabiki?" he asked. She indicated something behind him. Turning his head he glared at his man-servant. "Sasuke! Must I keep reminding you to stand up?"

The small man mumbled something insulting under his breath, very politely, then heaved himself up again. Once more he collected the weapons from the ground, wondering for at least the thousandth time why he stayed in the employ of the insane Kunos. Family honour only went so far, after all.
A faint sound from the main street, audible over the normal noises of commerce, made Kuno figuratively prick up his ears. He cocked his head to one side, listening intently. The sound came again, a crunching metallic noise he thought familiar. "Aha! I hear the sounds of the little monster satisfying its unnatural desires on the property of the good citizens of the ward. Out of my way, please, while I deal it the fate it richly deserves." He charged towards the street holding his bokken in an attack position with both hands, the Tendo woman and her companions only barely managing to move clear in time. Sasuke sighed a little and staggered after him bearing his pile of weapons.

Another alley on the other side of the street and down a few tens of metres proved to be the source of the sounds. Several locals were looking in with varying expressions of puzzlement. He shouldered his way through, excusing himself in curt tones, to stand in the entrance. "There you are, you annoying menace to decent people everywhere," he exclaimed in triumph. The demon was nibbling on the front bumper of a small van, which was missing three wheels and the roof, although replacing these critical parts were an amazing number of toothmarks in the remaining metalwork.

"Turn and face your doom!" he shouted. The thing looked over its shoulder at him, growled slightly, then went back to eating the van. "Insolent fiend. Have at you!" Lunging at the beast he swung wildly.

Unfortunately it turned out to be remarkably fast when provoked, ducking his blow at the last moment, then grabbing the bokken in its mouth before he could retract it. "Release my weapon at once," he sternly demanded. The animal bit down, two pieces of wooden sword falling from its mouth as the centre was chewed and swallowed. He got the definite impression it was looking smugly at him.

"Sasuke! Another bokken, immediately," he called over his shoulder, holding out a hand imperiously. The man-servant slapped the hilt of a replacement into his palm, which he instantly whipped around and used to slash at the thing.

A few seconds later, he screamed, "Another!"

"Another!"

"Yet another! I feel I have it on the run!"

"Foul beast! I strike at thee! Sasuke! A staff, quickly!"

Nabiki watched with amused disbelief. Beside her, Miki and John were staring, the former giggling uncontrollably and the latter looking amazed and somewhat shocked. "Um, are you sure he's always like that?" John asked slowly, having to raise his voice over the sound of Kuno's cries of rage as the demon ate everything he used on it. The middle Tendo nodded.

"I'm afraid so. If anything this is unusually restrained."

"What is that thing?" Miki asked with appalled yet fascinated interest.

"Some little demon that should be in Minato, not here," she replied. "I saw them on the TV a while ago. Shampoo ran into a whole pack of the things and pretty much wiped them out after an uncertain start." She snickered as Kuno yelled in fury when the creature ate a good metal sword.

"They seem to be able to eat anything."

"Weird."
"Yep."

They watched for a little longer. "He really is an idiot, isn't he?" Miki asked more or less rhetorically. Both her companions nodded as one.

The locals were now clustered around one young man who appeared to be taking bets. Having finished handing out markers, he smiled as he counted the thick stack of notes while the gamblers turned their attention back to the currently one sided battle of wits, in which at least the human participant appeared to be insufficiently armed, calling encouragement to their chosen champion. A good third of them appeared to be rooting for the demon. Nabiki shook her head despairingly.

"Guys, we might have a problem," she commed the others back at the Dojo and on Fwetna, sending a video stream of what she was watching. "I'm not sure how or why but Kuno has found a demon to play with."

"It's worse than that, Nabiki," Tamiko immediately replied with mild irritation in her voice. "I just got a call from Chiyoko's mom complaining that her daughter had jumped off the train in Furinkan for some reason that was probably my fault. I don't have any idea why she's blaming me for everything these days." The red-head sounded somewhat aggrieved. "It's not my fault! Her daughter is a magical girl all by herself, I had nothing to do with it! She's a nice girl but can't shoot worth a damn."

"If she's around it probably means there are more of those little pests here," Aiko said with some asperity. "Which is a fucking pain in the ass. Why the hell would they pick now to turn up, and here? I've never heard of the things outside Minato in general before."

"No idea, but if there is a pack of the little bastards running around it's going to get messy," Nabiki muttered. The feeling she'd been having for the last few minutes of incipient danger had suddenly spiked. Jun wordlessly brought a window from one of her drones to the foreground, the contents of it making her sigh. Passing it on, she added morosely, "I found Chiyoko."

The camera which had been following Kuno from about fifty metres up had picked up a disturbance a couple of streets away, which the SI had tasked another from the small fleet above the Dojo to investigate. The new video feed showed a small female dressed in pink in the process of shooting in the general direction of a pair of the little demons, missing both totally and punching a hole completely through a police box, which seemed to cause a certain amount of consternation to the officer on duty inside it. Both demons left the area at high speed in opposite directions with Chiyoko looking after each, before following the one heading north, away from the Tendo woman.

"Oh, hell," 'Yori' mumbled, joining the discussion. "We don't really need this right now." She sighed heavily. "OK, I'm coming back, Tamiko, can you and Misaki come and help? Maybe we can get these horrible little things rounded up and Chiyoko contained before something serious happens. Nabiki, I suppose you're not really able to help?"

"I don't see how I can at the moment, sorry, I'm with Miki and John. If I disappear and Azumi turns up it's going to look pretty suspicious."

"Fair enough. OK, you stay out of it, we'll try to contain all this crap and keep it away from the Dojo. The others will stand by in case something else happens."

"I knew everything was too good to be true," Fumiko muttered, sounding aggrieved. "I was really enjoying this party."

"It's not over yet. Let's just stay calm and try to make sure nothing else happens," 'Chou' advised everyone. "Most of the guests are here at the waterfall, so with luck no one will realise anything is amiss until it's all over."

"I'd love to know why Chiyoko and her demons are here at the moment in the first place," Tamiko grumped. "I'm heading for her right now, I'll be on her in about ten seconds."

"Good. I'm following the other one. Hopefully there aren't too many of them." 'Yori' sounded like she didn't believe her own words.

Listening to the silent conversation, Nabiki watched Kuno feed his new friend most of his weapons, while spreading four of her five drones out over the area at high altitude to locate any other demons. The fifth one stayed orbiting the Dojo in case something happened there.

Nabiki, I have located some more of the enemy. # Jun announced, showing a feed from one drone with a location on a map of the area beside it. # Eight, no, nine of them. One was under a truck. # She inspected the video window, seeing it was a few streets away on the other side of the Dojo. A small group of the demons was engaged in dismantling a couple of vehicles while the pedestrians in the area withdrew to a safe distance, although most of them stayed close enough to watch.

'Nerimans are nuts,' she mused, 'most sane people would run like hell.'

"No such luck I'm afraid," she told the others. "Jun found some more. Another nine of the things." She relayed the video to them.

"Damn it. Right, Misaki, you go that way, I'll deal with this one, Fumiko, I think we'll need you to help her."

"On my way," Misaki's sister replied resignedly.

"Oh, my," Kasumi's alter ego suddenly said. "This is annoying."

"What is it, sis?" Nabiki asked with worry, wondering what new disaster was happening.

"We've run out of beer again."

Despite herself, the middle sister couldn't help laughing.

Panting, Kuno stared at the little demonic creature, which returned his gaze through narrowed eyes as it finished eating his best mace. "Vile hellish creature. How dare you consume the property of the Blue Thunder with such eagerness. Does your perverted appetite know no bounds?" Turning to his retainer, he looked into the bag the ninja held out, finding it empty except for a couple of shuriken. Grabbing them he flung them both at the demon which snapped one out of the air like a dog after a biscuit, ducking the other.

The razor-sharp projectile flew over the remains of the van, rebounded from a drainpipe with a metallic ping, bounced from the wall of the alley, and by some miracle hit the demon on the back of the head. It yelped in pain, looked around wildly, then scuttled away to the other end of the alley, quickly climbing the wall and vanishing.

"Success!" he shouted triumphantly, raising his hands in the air and turning to the watching crowd, who gazed at him adoringly. "I, Tatewaki Kuno, have vanquished the hell-sent creature of darkness that has plagued our fine community. You may now congratulate me." He watched as the various people exchanged slips of paper and what looked like cash, wondering for a moment what they were doing, but eventually putting it down to some odd ritual of the peasantry. It wasn't the first time he'd seen such behaviour after one or other great battle.

The sound of clapping came to him, making him look towards Nabiki Tendo, who was the source. She looked at him with an unreadable expression while her companions seemed to be, for some peculiar reason, finding some humour in the situation. "Well done, Kuno. You finally scared it off." He nodded regally. "By accident."

Glaring, he retorted, "It was the end result of my master plan. I'll have you know it worked to perfection. I distracted the beast until I could inflict the final, devastating blow."

"By lulling it into a true sense of security?" she asked with a small smile.

"Exactly," he said with authority. There was a meaningful pause as she just stared at him. "Wait..." He thought hard, then finally shrugged. "It was a masterful plan despite your minor quibbles."

The young woman looked at him for a few seconds. "If you say so."

He nodded firmly. "I do."

"OK. You got rid of one of the demons. What about the others?"

Staring at her, puzzled, he asked slowly, "What others?"

Nabiki pointed up without looking. After a moment, he exchanged a glance with Sasuke, who was also looking confused, although to be honest that seemed to be his default state most of the time, then both of them cast their eyes skyward.

Kuno paled despite himself. Looking down at them from the roofs on both sides of the alley were more than a dozen of the little swine, their golden eyes bright with what he fancied was battle lust. "Oh, dear," he mumbled faintly. "This could be awkward." Holding out his hand, he spoke more firmly. "Sasuke. A weapon, immediately. Battle must recommence."

A thump from behind him made him look over his shoulder to see that the crowd, except for the Tendo woman and her compatriots, had dispersed, while Sasuke was for some unknown reason now lying on the ground yet again. Kuno sighed heavily. "Must I do everything myself?" Walking over he kicked his retainer a few times to no effect, before picking up the bag and shaking it.

"I think you're out," Nabiki noted calmly.

"So it would appear." He looked around at the destroyed van, his unconscious man-servant, and the otherwise empty alley and street, before glancing up once more. They were still there, eerily silent and watching him closely. "Hmph. Although I am loath to admit it, it would seem that a strategic regrouping and re-arming is required." Picking up Sasuke he slung him over his shoulder, then turned to the Tendo woman. "Excuse me." She stepped aside politely, allowing him past. Seconds later he was sprinting as fast as he could manage in the direction of home. The pack of mini-demons followed more slowly, but with definite interest.

Firing her staff, Chiyoko winced as she missed her target, vaporising a mailbox instead. The little demon she'd shot at looked at her with what could almost be termed bewilderment before taking a bite out of the remains of the pole the box had been mounted on, then zipped off under a car. She fired again, the rear of the vehicle sagging to the ground as its back wheels vanished in a sparkling cloud of magical energy.

"Oops," she mumbled once more, having done so a fair few times in the last fifteen minutes.
Behind her there was a trail of smoking holes in the scenery and a number of slightly traumatised near-victims of the magical beam of doom.

"Stop blowing holes in everything you little idiot!" came a scream of rage from behind her, making her jump and nearly drop her staff. She turned around guiltily to see Tamiko glaring at her from far too close, having somehow managed to approach without her noticing.

"Oh, hi, Tamiko," she replied nervously, attempting to hide her staff behind her. She sidled away from the remains of the car, pretending she'd found it like that. "What are you doing in Nerima?"

"I was enjoying myself at a party until your mom called," the auburn haired magical girl gritted, looking incensed. "The more interesting question is what are you doing in Nerima? She said you just got off the train without any warning. She's not happy about it and she's sharing the pain."

"Uh-oh," the young girl muttered, knowing what that meant. "I'm going to be in trouble when I get home."

"You're in trouble right now," Tamiko replied, giving her an unfriendly look. She shivered a little, there was something quite worrying about that expression on the normally cheerful girl. Pondering the subject she wondered why Tamiko often looked so annoyed whenever she met her. It was a little strange.

"It's not my fault," the girl protested, giving up on hiding her staff and bringing it around to hold in front of her. "I was sitting on the train in the station and I saw one of them climbing down a building. I had to get off to deal with it."

"And how many of them have you 'dealt with' so far, hmm?" Tamiko asked with great sarcasm. Chiyoko stared at the ground, flushed, and replied in an almost inaudible tone. "Sorry, I didn't quite hear you," the red-head said with menace in her voice, cupping one hand behind her ear.

"Um... none," she replied again, more loudly.

"None." Tamiko sighed deeply. "But just from here I can see... a mail box, two cars, a truck, three lamp posts, four motorcycles, half a dozen buildings, and a police box, all with suspiciously familiar holes in them. Not to mention a terrified police corporal and several confused and worried pedestrians who are hiding under that bus over there. Which also has a hole in it." She waved in the relevant direction, making Chiyoko look, then wince again.

"Sorry," she mumbled.

There was a long pause. "Right. Come on, we're sorting these little fuckers out, then I'm making an appointment to take you somewhere safe to teach you how to shoot straight before you kill someone," Tamiko finally sighed. "DO NOT fire on anything unless I tell you to. Got it?"

"Yes, Tamiko," she replied obediently.

"Good." The girl looked around as the demon that had been under the car emerged from another one a few vehicles down and stared in their direction, before firing a ball of energy at it that made it expire with a loud bang and a cloud of demon parts. Chiyoko gagged a little. "One down. Lots left. Let's go." She waved the other female onwards, the pre-teen complying quickly before she got another lecture.

Peering around curiously, Akane wondered where a number of specific people had disappeared to. She walked over where Chou was wearing a mildly concerned expression and poking around in the pile of crates which were full of empty beer bottles. "Where are the others?" she asked the blonde, who straightened up, turning to her with a smile. The youngest Tendo gestured at the plaza area. "Yori, Misaki, Fumiko, and Tamiko have all disappeared. Is something wrong?"

"It's nothing to worry about, Akane," Chou replied comfortingly. "There was a minor incident in central Furinkan which they went to deal with. I expect they'll be back soon." She looked down at the crates, then across at Genma, who was laughing about something with Soun, Mousse, and Lieutenant Sasaki. "The more immediately irritating thing is that we seem to be out of beer. I have a feeling I know where it went."

Akane followed her eyes and rolled her own, sighing in exasperation. "I think you're right. Well, they can do without for the moment." She checked her watch. "The shops are still open, we can buy some more a little later."

"Indeed," the blonde agreed, smiling. "How are you enjoying the party so far?"

"It's going really well," she replied happily. "Everyone seems to be having a lot of fun. Although this particular part of it was definitely unexpected." Indicating the waterfall, she grinned. "People seem to be OK with it now but there were a lot of worried expressions when you made that portal."

Chou nodded, amusement on her face. "I rather expected that. It seems to take most people by surprise the first time. But it worked out all right, I think."

"It did," Akane agreed. "It was very nice of you to suggest this to Ukyo and Konatsu, by the way. They were beginning to get worried about not being able to find anywhere suitable for the wedding." Looking around again, she grinned. "This will certainly give them the ability to say they got married somewhere out of the ordinary."

"Hopefully they will have a long and happy marriage," Chou smiled. "If we can help that along, we're pleased to." Glancing around, she added, "Could you help me collect some of this debris, Akane? I don't want to leave anything behind when we leave and if we clean up a bit now it will be easier later."

"Sure." Looking around, the youngest Tendo thought for a moment, then went back through the portal into the house, retrieved some large garbage bags from a cupboard in the utility room, then took them back to Chou. Both of them started moving about collecting the detritus of the party, Shampoo joining in when she noticed what they were doing. The rest of the guests were still drinking, eating, and talking, not really paying attention to the three women. Nodoka nodded acknowledgement when Akane passed by her then went back to discussing something with Cologne, who was pointing at the distant lights of Krentak with a look of awe on her face.

Shortly they had half a dozen bags filled and tied off, Akane and Shampoo ferrying them back to the house and around the side out of the way, while Chou wandered around looking for bottle caps and the like, until everyone was satisfied that they'd done a good job. "Very good, I think," Chou noted with satisfaction. "It would be rude to leave such a nice place untidy."

A few minutes later, Akane looked up, listening carefully. "What was that?" she said, peering into the darkness above them, trying to see past the glowing purple and golden spheres of magic. "I thought I heard some sort of animal or something."

Glancing at Chou, she noticed the woman was looking slightly amused, as well as a little concerned, and was peering upwards as well.

"Oh, dear. I wasn't expecting them. I'm a little surprised that they're out in the dark."
"Who are 'them'?" Shampoo asked curiously. Her question was answered a moment later when a sudden whistling sound was terminated by a blast of wind and a loud thumping crack, making everyone except Chou yelp and dive out of the way. Just as Akane was straightening up from the defensive crouch she'd automatically fallen into at the sound, it happened again.

The entire assembled multitude stared at the two really very large animals, close to the size of a small tiger, that had dropped out of the sky onto the end of the plaza away from the waterfall, the creatures returning the look curiously as they folded their wings. "Holy shit!" Hana yelped from somewhere at the back of the crowd.

"What the hell are those things?" Ukyo shouted, sounding somewhat worried.

Chou raised her voice, speaking loudly enough that everyone could hear her, yet calmly, as she moved towards the animals. "Don't worry, they're friendly. These are what are called Mountain Soarers here on Fwetna, they're a flying predator accidentally imported from another world and now native to the area. They're not tame as such, but they won't hurt anyone." She approached the larger of the two soarers, which made a happy sort of yipping noise and bounded over like a huge house cat, dipping its head for her to stroke, which she did. The slightly smaller one looked mildly jealous of the attention and promptly pushed itself between its companion and the blonde, vying for a stroke of its own.

Everyone watched in some awe as the woman made a fuss of the two huge flying animals, which very clearly thoroughly enjoyed the process. It was obvious that the soarers and the magical girl were well known to each other. Akane and Shampoo exchanged wondering glances then cautiously made their way over, stopping a safe distance away. "Um, Chou? Are these friends of yours?" Akane asked after a moment. The other woman was now down on one knee with her arms around the necks of both soarers, one on either side, rubbing their ears, while the animals were making cute little squeaking sounds of ecstasy with their eyes shut.

Chou smiled at her. "Yes, we met on holiday a few weeks ago. These two are a mated pair, who live in the woods somewhere in the vicinity of Uthryyl's house. They ended up deciding to more or less adopt us and Uthryyl's family, they're always somewhere close if they're not hunting." She giggled a little. "In fact, they became so blasé about people that they practically moved in to the house. Quannyr, Uthryyl's wife, is always chasing them out for tracking mud inside."

Akane stared, then slowly moved a little closer. "What do they hunt?" she asked slowly. "Light aircraft? They're enormous!"

"Actually, they mostly go after something called a quillit, it's something of a pest on this world. Omnivorous, fast breeding, with a very nasty disposition. They eat anything and cause a lot of problems." Chou smiled. "It turns out that soarers love to eat them and keep the population in check, which is something that definitely endeared the D'Sage to them. Normally they're somewhat standoffish, but it seems these two have decided that people are fun to be around." She tickled the male under the chin, which made it grumble happily then flop onto its side.

"Are they nocturnal?" Shampoo asked. Chou shook her head.

"Normally, no. From what I learned they actually have good night vision but they prefer to hunt during the day, mostly in the early morning or late evening when the quillits are most active. The rest of the day they usually spend gliding around at high altitude, at least partially because they seem to enjoy it. They're very playful. These two are quite young and seem to like our company." This seemed to be, if anything, an understatement. Both animals looked very contented and more than happy to stay right where they were.
Motioning to her with one hand, Chou said, "Come over and meet them, Akane. Trust me, they won't hurt you." Somewhat nervously, after a glance at Shampoo, the youngest Tendo slowly approached the nearest soarer, the female, which watched her with wide eyes. Holding out her hand she waited for the thing to sniff it. The animal seemed placid enough so she carefully reached out and touched its head.

"The fur is really soft," she said quietly, gently feeling it, then putting her hand flat on the soarer's head. It pushed itself into her palm making her smile. Stroking it she laughed as it yipped happily. "They're sort of cute, if a little scary looking."

"Misaki and Azumi particularly get along with them," Chou laughed. "In fact, it was Azumi who first encountered them and made friends with them. They seem to like her as well and follow her around everywhere when she's about. They even tried following us home through the portal when we left, we had some difficulty stopping them."

"They are a little large to have as house pets," Akane snickered.

"That doesn't seem to bother them." Looking amused, Chou watched as the younger woman became more confident with stroking the creature. After a moment Shampoo came over and cautiously did the same. Five minutes later most of the people on the plaza were gathered around the two animals, which appeared to relish the attention, yipping to themselves and rubbing against anyone who would stand still enough. Ukyo experimentally offered the male a salmon roll, which led to the discovery that mountain soarers really liked fish. Shortly there were no salmon or tuna rolls left.

"How's your party going?" The familiar voice in her head made Nabiki smile internally.

"Hello, Onkra," she replied. "It's going well, thank you, aside from some slightly odd things right now. How are you? We haven't talked for some time."

"I'm not at all bad, thanks, Nabiki," the D'Sage woman said with a note of pleasure in her voice. "I'm looking forward to meeting up with you all again soon. I've been practising the things Ranma taught me a lot, but I need to try it against someone else. You'll do."

"Oh, thanks," she giggled. "Just a target, that's me." They shared a laugh. "Have you been gliding again since we were there?"

"Yes, actually, several times. Jyrron was very pleased about it. He bought me a glider of my own after I kept borrowing his spare one, which was nice of him. It's a rather pretty deep blue colour. I flew it all the way home a few days ago, and landed right in the back garden." Onkra sounded proud. "Admittedly not vertically like you guys do, but it was still quite a small target."

"Not bad." Nabiki commented. "Did the soarers come with you?"

"Oh, yes, they follow every time I go flying. If they're not hunting, they're either on the roof waiting for someone to play with them, or in the house annoying Mom, or following me around. I think they miss you all." She sounded very amused. "Actually, you might get company, they both took off out of here in a hurry a little while ago heading for the waterfall. It's unusual, they normally don't go out at night. I think they might have heard something and got curious."

"Is their hearing really that good?" The middle Tendo was impressed.

"Apparently they're sensitive enough to hear a quillit moving around on the ground from several kilometres away. Their eyesight is amazingly good as well," her friend said. "They're probably equally good at scenting things and the wind is blowing from that direction. Whatever it was, they seemed pretty interested."

"Hmm." Nabiki brought her elder sister into the link. "Hey, Sis, Onkra says you might get visitors soon," she said.

"Too late," 'Chou' noted wryly. "They both turned up about ten minutes ago and now have pretty much everybody fussing over them after a slightly cautious start. They've eaten most of the sushi that was left and are following Ukyo around like puppies since she made the mistake of feeding them."

"Oh." The middle sister glanced at her friends who were standing next to her staring after the Kuno idiot as he disappeared into the distance and the pack of small demons following along the rooftops. "Miki will probably find them fun."

"How is the situation with you, Nabiki?" 'Chou' asked. "Have you located any more of Chiyoko's little irritations?"

"You might say that, yes." Sending everyone, including Onkra, a complete recording of the 'fight' between Kuno and his playmate, she waited for the laughter to die down. "The man is... not entirely there, I think," she added when it was complete. "He made a strategic retreat just now, with fourteen of the things following him. They looked more curious than vicious, weirdly enough, but we still need to do something about them."

"Sis and I have got rid of these ones," Fumiko announced. "We'll move to intercept your little friend and his even littler friends, we're not that far away."

"OK. Thanks."

Tamiko's voice came over the link, sounding somewhat peeved. "I've got Chiyoko under control for the moment but there are a hell of a lot of holes in the scenery around here. A lot of people who don't seem to see the funny side either."

"Did she actually hit any of the demons?" 'Yori' asked resignedly, a note in her voice that suggested she knew the answer.

"What do you think?" Tamiko replied irritably. "Of course she didn't. Hit everything else, though. If we ever get invaded by demonic mailboxes she'll sort them right out. Anything faster moving is pretty much safe except for accidental shots."

"Wonderful." The tone suggested the word wasn't entirely the right one. "OK, try to keep her from killing any more cars and so on, will you? I'm on my way back, I'll join you in about thirty seconds or so. Nabiki, have you or Jun spotted any more of the little bastards yet?"

"Not so far, other than the ones following Kuno." She watched the feed from the drone shadowing the young man, seeing he'd just made it to his front door. The pack of demons was milling around in the street outside the Kuno compound, a couple of them eating the gate. "They don't seem to be in a hurry, they're amusing themselves destroying the fixtures and fittings at the moment."

'Yori' chuckled darkly. "We should let them enjoy themselves for a while in that case."

"Dear, that's not entirely the right way to look at it," the eldest Tendo sister said with amusement.

"Possibly not, but it's funny," her husband snickered. "Oh, all right, we'll stop them eating Kuno and his crazy family out of house and home. Literally."
"I'm going to get Miki and John back to the Dojo before something even crazier happens," Nabiki told her friends, glancing at her other friends, who were wandering along beside her with expressions that suggested they were having just the smallest amount of trouble believing their own eyes. "We'll be there in a few minutes."

Receiving a few acknowledgements, she dropped the link and turned to Miki. "Are you having fun with your first experience of Nerima?" she asked with a wry look. Miki stared at her, then at her boyfriend, before peering into the distance where the last of the demons had vanished.

"It's... different," she allowed after a few seconds. There was a pause as they continued walking. "Really, quite different," she added slowly. Another, longer pause followed.

"Is it always like this?" John finally asked.

Nabiki grinned and shrugged. "Not always, like I said. Sometimes it's pretty quiet. But I will admit that in this particular area that isn't the weirdest thing I've ever seen or heard of. Not even close." She thought for a moment then continued, "Although demons are admittedly not normal. Usually it's other martial artists, or something like flying bird people from the depths of China, that sort of thing. You know, a little more ordinary."

Both her companions fixed her with wide-eyed stares, then looked at each other again. "I told you, Nabiki Tendo isn't normal," John complained to Miki, who was smiling weirdly. "No one should be that unmoved about anything even close to what we just saw."

Snickering, the middle Tendo led her friends back to the Dojo. A few hundred metres from the door, she stopped dead as Jun suddenly sent her an image from a drone that was patrolling some distance behind them. #Nabiki, there is a slight problem, I'm afraid,# it said quietly in her head. She inspected the image, agreeing with it.

Somewhat worried, she commed the others. "Um, Guys? We have a bit of an issue."

"What is it now?" 'Yori' asked with some annoyance. She turned to look back the way they'd come, listening carefully.

"About a hundred of the things just came out of the parking garage opposite the police station," she explained. "They're making a bit of a mess of the main shopping precinct and people are starting to look worried."

"Oh, shit," came the reply, along with a put-upon sigh. "What the hell is bringing them here? That's the largest incursion of the little bastards so far by about double." She forwarded the drone view to the rest which caused a number of muttered exclamations.

"That's not the only group either," Tamiko cut in. "We just spotted about twenty or so over this way." Faintly, in the distance, Nabiki heard a sizzling zap sound. "For fuck's sake!" the other woman snarled. "Hold on, Chiyoko just molested a little book shop."

"Not the one next to the dry cleaner?" 'Chou' asked with hope in her voice. "That's a really good shop."

"Sorry, yes. It's sort of inside out now," Tamiko sighed.

A few seconds later there was a distant boom. "And then it exploded," she added with deep disgust. "How the hell did she do that? At least the explosion took out five of the little monsters."

"Oh, dear," Nabiki's sister said, sounding mildly upset.
"I've confiscated that damn staff of hers," the red-head said in an irritated tone. "I'll get the rest of these things then we'll join up with you at the police station."

"Right," 'Yori' replied. "We've got all but two or three of the ones at Kuno's place, they're hiding somewhere near the house. I can see them a little in thermal vision scuttling around in the bushes. He's going to have to deal with those himself for the moment. They're very difficult to locate when they want to be." She muttered to herself a little, then added in a more intelligible tone, "I wish I could figure out where they come from and how. I'd go and sort it out once and for all."

"I'm coming to help," Aiko put in.

"Thanks. Pick us up and get us to the police station, will you, please?" the martial artist requested.

"It'll save a minute or so."

"Be there in a second."

"I'll have to stay here to supervise," 'Chou' said, sounding a little annoyed.

"I'd come and help but I think with the soarers there that might be a little difficult," Nabiki told her sister. "If I come through the portal and they jump me on the spot like they normally do people are going to start thinking something weird is going on." She paused a moment, thinking, then added wryly, "Weirder than it has been so far, anyway."

"That's true," her sister sighed. "We'll have to persuade them to leave, somehow."

"Or move the party back into the back garden," she commented.

"Yes, that's not a bad idea. I'll talk to Akane and Shampoo and get them to help me begin to herd people back to our reality," 'Chou' laughed. "Some of them might resist, a lot of people are completely fascinated by this place. Not that you can blame them, it's wonderful."

"OK, Sis," the middle Tendo said, resuming walking. Miki and John hadn't noticed her stop for a short time and had kept walking, now being half-way back from where she was to the Dojo. She hurried after them, catching up after a few seconds. "We're nearly back now. I'll help in the garden and stay out sight of those guys."

Going through the Dojo gates a moment later with her friends, she looked at them. "We should probably move the party back into the garden, I guess," she said. Miki appeared reluctant for a second or two, but eventually nodded.

"I suppose that's a good idea," her friend remarked. "I don't know anything about it really but I guess Chou must have to put some effort into keeping that portal open, after all. It's not fair to have her do that all night."

"Probably not," Nabiki agreed with an internal smile. "Why don't you two go and mention that to her while I start tidying up a bit in the garden. There's stuff all over the place and it will be easier to clean up while no one is around."

"I'll help you, Nabiki," John volunteered. Leaning over he kissed his girlfriend on the cheek then gently pushed her away. "You go, I'll stay here."

"OK," Miki smiled, hurrying over to the portal and walking through it with no sign of the hesitancy she'd originally shown the first time. The remaining two watched, then exchanged a look.

"You get used to things like that much faster than I would have expected," the young man commented with a shake of his head. Nabiki grinned at him.

"So Yori always says. It seems to be true." Leading the way into the house she poked around until she found some large garbage bags, handing some to John, then they went back outside and began picking up as much detritus as possible. A few minutes passed in idle conversation before Genma and Soun came out of the portal, each carrying one end of a table covered in food. Akane and Shampoo followed with another. The tables were quickly put back where they'd come from, the four people going back into the portal Afterwards.

After another ten minutes most of the equipment and some of the people had come back, small groups standing around talking in low tones about their experience. Mousse and Akane had headed off to buy some more beer, hopping over the wall without thought or effort. Miki, who had come back a moment earlier, watched this feat with interest, then wandered over to Nabiki and John, who were sitting next to the pond. "You know," the young woman said as she sat next to them on the rocks, "in some ways that is one of the strangest things I've seen today." She waved after the two martial artists.

"Stranger than that thing?" John asked incredulously, pointing at the portal. She nodded.

"Well, yes. That's just magic. I'll admit it's not exactly normal to either of us, but it's a known thing, you see them on the news pretty regularly. But a non-magical person who can casually jump over a wall nearly three metres high is pretty weird, you have to admit."

"You're rubbing off on her, Tendo," he sighed, shaking his head.

They all looked around as Kimiko arrived, appearing somewhat dishevelled, yet happy, with a couple of odd looking leaves sticking out of her hair. "That was amazing," she giggled, dropping to the grass and grinning to herself. "You wouldn't believe some of the things in that forest. There was this little bug or something that seemed to actually electrocute what it was hunting! And lots of flying things that glowed all different colours. It was really amazing."

"How far did you go?" Nabiki asked.

"Maybe a couple of kilometres or something like that?" the younger woman said uncertainly. "A fair distance, at least. I found a path and followed it for a while, then went into the forest off the path a little way. I didn't want to go too far in case I got lost. But, that said, you can hear the waterfall for a long way so finding it again wasn't a problem."

"I'd love to see what that place looks like in the day," Miki said wistfully. "I always wanted to travel and that's the most extreme travelling I've ever even heard of." Her sister nodded agreement, still smiling.

"I think it's not impossible that could be arranged," Nabiki suggested with her own smile. "Chou seemed open to doing it again, and Yori even suggested that we could go hang-gliding there if we wanted." Her three companions exchanged wondering looks mixed with mild worry. "Apparently the D'Sage do it quite a lot, in a place a few kilometres from the falls. It's a good place to go swimming as well, she said."

"I think I'd like that," Miki replied slowly, an odd expression on her face.

"Where's Hana?" John asked, looking around. The others followed his gaze.

"Still on the other side, I think," Miki sighed. "She was following Chou around taking pictures the last time I saw her, still wearing that freaky smile." Getting up, she shook her head. "I'd better go and get her before she annoys Chou too much." They watched as she hurried through the portal. After a moment John stood.

"I'll go with her, I think," he said, following the young woman. Left behind, Nabiki and Kimiko exchanged looks.

"Having fun?" the middle Tendo asked with a small smile.

Kimiko grinned back at her. "Oh, yes, lots," she replied happily. "Thanks again for inviting us all. This has been more fun than I ever expected and my expectations were already pretty high."

Laughing for a moment, Nabiki nodded agreement. "It all seems to have worked out pretty well so far."

Kimiko looked around the garden with a small frown. "Where are all the magical girls now?" she asked curiously. "There was only Chou left on the other side. And two huge flying animals that seem to be very friendly and like sushi."

"There was some sort of minor demon incursion in the middle of Furinkan, apparently." Nabiki watched as Kimiko frowned again.

"Really? I thought that sort of thing only happened in Minato most of the time."

"It's certainly not common around here, although I've heard of one other case a few years ago," the Tendo woman admitted. "I don't know what sparked it off but someone I know had an encounter with one of them a little while ago. Odd little beast about sixty centimetres tall that eats everything. Shampoo ran into a whole pack of the annoying things in Minato a few weeks ago and wiped most of them out when she stopped running and screaming."

Kimiko giggled after a wide-eyed look. "Really? Wow, she's good at martial arts and demon eradication. That's impressive for a non-magical girl."

Snickering, Nabiki said, "I don't think she wants to repeat the experience based on what she looked like when she finished."

After a few seconds, Kimiko gave her a sly glance. "Perhaps you should help Yori and the others?"

"I can't see how I could possibly do that," Nabiki replied slowly, glancing at the other woman, then looking up at the sky with a blank expression, inwardly amused.

"No, I suppose not. It would, after all, require a magical girl. Someone... not normal." Kimiko followed her gaze, also looking up with a similarly neutral expression.

"Indeed."

They exchanged a glance, then went back to watching as more people came out of the portal, some rather reluctantly.

Walking out of the shop carrying a couple of cases of beer bottles, Akane waited for Mousse to join her, then they began jogging back to the Dojo. After only a few dozen metres they both stopped dead, staring at the small creature that had emerged from under a truck a little further up the street and was staring back at them curiously while chewing on what looked like the drive shaft of the vehicle, making loud crunching sounds. They both recognised it instantly.
"What the hell is one of those things doing here?" she yelped in shock.

"I have no idea," Mousse replied, pushing his glasses up with a finger as he lowered his load to the ground with the other hand. "But based on what Shampoo ran into they don't travel alone." Akane stared at him for a moment, then looked around nervously.

"Crap. You're right," she muttered, spotting another one on top of a two story building on the other side of the street. It was staring at them as well. Mousse followed her eyes, then looked around some more.

"Another one to the right, behind that car," he said quietly. Akane nodded, putting down the crates she was carrying on top of the ones he had dropped.

"Any ideas?" she asked. Another little demon popped out of a manhole, displacing the cover with a clattering sound, then picked it up and took a bite out of it like it was a pancake. Both of them paled at the sight.

"Not really," the young man replied. After a moment he produced a couple of metal-capped wooden staves from his sleeve, handing her one. "I suppose they might just wander off if we ignore them."

Taking the weapon he'd handed her, Akane thought his tone sounded hopeful, but not convinced. She felt much the same. They kept staring at the small demons which stared back. Two more turned up, one dropping from another roof to their left, another coming out of a service alley. All six of the things were now staring at the pair, which was an eerie effect. The huge golden eyes with the triangular pupils were oddly unnerving. The wide mouths excessively full of unnecessarily large and sharp teeth were much worse.

Experimentally, Mousse transferred his staff from his right hand to his left, then produced a throwing knife in the free hand with a flick of his wrist and snapped it accurately at the nearest demon. The small creature grabbed it out of the air, chewed, and swallowed. He paled further.

"Ah."

"Yep."

They exchanged glances. "Run away?" Akane suggested, not liking the idea but liking the teeth even less.

"Sounds like a plan," he admitted.

They were just looking at the beer, wondering whether to abandon it or not, when a call from behind them made them twitch. "Hey, guys! Duck!" Tamiko's voice came. Exchanging a wide-eyed look again they hit the floor with alacrity. Just in time, as a pair of glowing balls of energy came past them, hitting two demons one after the other, both of them vanishing in a spray of goo with loud bangs. A second later a coruscating beam of sparkling energy shot past on the other side, creating a sizzling zap sound straight out of a movie, impacting a third demon which evaporated on the spot. The beam kept going, punching a large hole through the car behind the demon and the wall of the building behind that. The remaining little creatures bolted in panic.

"Oops," a young girl's voice said, sounding embarrassed.

"Chiyoko!" Tamiko yelled in fury. "I told you not to fire unless I said to, didn't I?"

"But I hit it!" the girl protested.
"True, I guess. So well done for that. But you also killed that car and now there's a hole in that shop you could drive a motorcycle through," Tamiko replied in an aggrieved tone. "Doesn't that damn thing have a power control?"

"I... don't know," the girl, apparently called Chiyoko, said with mild puzzlement in her voice. "I never looked."

Mousse and Akane exchanged glances as Tamiko sighed heavily from somewhere behind them. "Oh, for god's sake," the red-head muttered, loudly enough for them to hear. They both looked over their shoulders to see her pinching the bridge of her nose in exasperation. "Don't push me or I'll take it away again," she went on more loudly.

Walking over to the two martial artists as they climbed to their feet she looked apologetically at them. "Sorry, guys, she's not a good shot." The magical girl glared behind her at the much younger girl, who stared at the ground while her ears went red. "I still don't know why I gave that thing back to her in the first place." Chiyoko fiddled with her staff, looking highly embarrassed.

Returning her attention to Akane and Mousse, Tamiko said, "There were a lot of those little bastards all over the place for some reason. We've got rid of most of them, but there are little pockets around we're hunting down. It shouldn't take too much longer."

"OK," Akane replied, still not entirely sure what was going on. "I guess. Are you coming back to the party when you're finished?"

"Oh, sure, I still want some more to eat and some of that beer," Tamiko said with a grin, nodding at the four crates on the ground. "We'll all be coming back to your place soon, once we've finished destroying the neighbourhood." A loud zap sound from behind made her wince, then grit her teeth. A few roof tiles clattered to the pavement while Chiyoko attempted to look innocent, staring off in a different direction and whistling unconvincingly. Tamiko glared at her for a few seconds then sighed, turning back to the others. "Assuming there's any neighbourhood left, of course," she finished in an annoyed tone.

"Friend of yours?" Mousse asked with a small smile. The red-head looked slightly depressed.

"Not as such but I seem to be stuck with her," she confided, sighing once again. "Do you mind if I bring her with me, Akane?" she asked. "Just until her mother picks her up a little later. It's probably safer than letting her wander around on her own."

"Sure, that's no problem," Akane agreed.

"Thanks." Tamiko looked grateful. "It's a long story, I'll tell you later." She suddenly whirled around, somehow knowing that Chiyoko was stealthily raising her staff again, aiming at something on a roof in the distance. "NO! Bad magical girl!" she shouted, popping a small energy ball on the younger girl's back between her shoulder blades, which made her yelp and drop the staff. As Chiyoko turned and glared at Tamiko the red-head snickered. "That works pretty well. I'll have to remember it."

Chiyoko retrieved her weapon, holding it in one hand while she rubbed her back with the other, giving the older woman a filthy look. Tamiko ignored it, looking at Akane and Mousse who were watching with a mix of amusement and surprise. "I'll see you later." Cocking her head, she seemed inquisitive, then turned to look into the distance. "OK, there are some more down there," she sighed. "Come on, Chiyoko, let's go." Trotting off she was followed by the younger girl, who waved to Mousse and Akane as she left.
They watched the pair disappear around a corner, then exchanged glances again. Picking up two of the crates having made both staves vanish once more, Mousse shook his head. "That was... a little odd."

"Magical girls are weird," Akane agreed with a grin, picking up the two remaining crates, then they headed back to the Dojo.

Diving through the front door Hikaru slammed it behind him, then leaned against it, listening to the faint sound of sirens in the distance and sweating both from the run and a certain amount of nervousness. His parents both stuck their heads out of the living room, looking at him curiously. "Are you all right, son?" his father asked with mild concern.

Wiping sweat from his forehead the young man straightened up, picking up his backpack while he kicked off his shoes in a deliberately casual manner. "Yes, Dad," he replied quietly, trying not to wince at the question. "Just a little tired, it's hot out and I was walking a bit faster than normal."

"All right, then," his parent said with a nod. Cocking his head the older man listened. "Seems to be a lot of sirens. Must be something going on in town." After a moment he shrugged. "Anyway, dinner is in twenty minutes. You should clean up, you look filthy."

"OK, Dad."

"Have you seen the oregano?" his mother asked, lifting her face from a cookbook she was perusing. "I was certain I had a new jar of it in the cupboard but I can't find it." Wordlessly Hikaru handed her the jar as he went past, heading for the bathroom. "Oh, there it is. Well done, dear, thank you." She went towards the kitchen humming to herself while his father returned to reading a spy novel.

"I got another one! I got another one!" Chiyoko hopped up and down with excitement. Beside her Tamiko, for some reason, was grinding her teeth.

"Chiyoko?"

"Yes, Tamiko?"

"Do you see that phone box?"

The twelve-year-old girl looked around, puzzled. "What phone box?"

"Exactly." The red-head was doing that thing with her fingers and the bridge of her nose again, Chiyoko noticed. Not sure what her companion meant the young girl put a quizzical expression on.

"It was behind the demon you fired at," Tamiko explained when it became clear that more was needed. "Before you fired, at any rate."

"Oh." Moving slightly to the side so she could see past the pile of steaming yuck that was all that was left of her primary target, she could see a crumpled heap of metal, glass and plastic with a miraculously intact bright green phone handset sticking out of the top. "Sorry."

Tamiko sighed heavily, shook her head, then headed off towards the now somewhat smaller crowd of fleeing mini-demons while mumbling something under her breath, her younger companion following. Chiyoko was still pleased about her shot, it was the second in a row that had actually hit a demon. 'I'm getting really good at this,' she mused, smiling a little.
There appear to only be approximately twenty-six of the enemy creatures still moving as far as I can determine, Nabiki. Jun informed the middle Tendo, highlighting the relevant drone feeds.

Three at the Kuno estate, which currently both Tatewaki and Kodachi Kuno are engaging with some success, the remainder scattered around the immediate area surrounding the railway station which would appear to be at or near the epicentre of the incursion. There was a pause as they both watched a series of energy balls in different colours fly from one side to another of one of the video windows. Four more down, leaving twenty-two. At the current rate the last of them other than those being attacked by the Kuno siblings will be eliminated in approximately three minutes.

'Good. Hopefully there aren't any more of the annoyances hiding anywhere around the place,' Nabiki replied with a silent sigh.

'I believe there are not,' the machine replied, a small note of amusement at her tone present. With luck there will be no further interruptions to the festivities.

'Of course there won't,' she snickered darkly. Jun didn't respond but she could feel its version of a grin inside her head.

Nodding to Cologne as the Elder sat near her, talking to Soun and Nodoka while sipping some tea, she kept half her attention on the party which had mainly moved back into the garden by now, the remainder being on the image provided by the drone hanging over the Kuno residence. She watched as Kodachi wildly lashed out with a razor sharp ribbon at a micro-demon, which rapidly ducked, then scuttled off with the gymnast in hot pursuit. Grinning to herself she shook her head slightly.

'She seems to be enjoying herself,' she noted wryly to the SI.

'Indeed. Ms Kuno is definitely looking more excited than one would expect under the circumstances,' the SI responded as wryly. Her brother would appear less enthused, though.

'Poor fellow is worn out after his epic battle with the first one,' Nabiki snickered.

Kodachi managed to corner the demon she was chasing, wrapping the ribbon around it with a flick of her wrist then pulling hard, which neatly diced it in a shower of guts and gore. Looking somewhat disgusted she dropped the weaponised gymnastics tool, instead producing a pair of spiked clubs with which she assaulted one of the remaining two creatures, while Kuno himself chased the last one around a tree a few times, waving a long sword at it and shouting imprecations. The final fate of the creature was decided by the enormous crocodile that suddenly appeared from the nearby pond, Kodachi's 'pet' Mr Turtle, and engulfed the startled demon in huge jaws, biting down hard. A few translucent teeth flew out of the sides of the reptile's jaws as it slid back into the water, Kuno stopping and watching, panting for breath. After a moment he turned in time to see his sister beat the remaining demon to a pulp with a howl of rage and a club, walking over to her when she was done. The two siblings looked around, glanced at each other, then looked down at themselves, before simultaneously slumping a little and heading for the house and, presumably, a shower each.

'Looks like it was both good exercise and good training,' Nabiki commented as the drone scanned the area one last time before Jun brought it back towards them.

'Quite. Although I suspect that neither of the participants would put it in exactly those terms.' Jun sounded amused.

'Probably not, no.'
A feeling of warning spiked in the back of her head, making the middle Tendo spin around quickly. She peered about suspiciously, using first normal vision, then the enhanced modes of Jun's sensory package, spotting a second later a moving blob behind the wall. Just as she was able to make it out clearly it leaped upwards to reveal itself as one of the little demons, the thing appearing on top of the wall and looking about alertly. 'Where the hell did that one come from?' she asked with vast irritation and some worry. Most of the guests followed her gaze and quite a few stepped back.

#My apologies, Nabiki, I missed it. I think it's one of the ones from the group that followed Mr Kuno, we lost track of a couple when Ranma engaged them and as was said at the time, they're surprisingly stealthy on occasion.# Jun sounded embarrassed.

'Don't worry about that, Jun, I don't blame you. The question is what do we do about it, everyone else is at the railway station except for Sis and she'd finishing up on the other side of the portal.'

Looking around Nabiki sighed faintly. She could zap the thing easily of course but it would be in front of dozens of witnesses.

In the end the problem was solved by Cologne, who had seen or sensed the little demon pretty much the same time she had. The elderly woman stared at it calculatingly for a moment, while Shampoo was looking worried next to her, then put her hands together and mumbled something under her breath. Nabiki felt a building surge of magical energy, which peaked as Cologne threw out one hand, palm facing the demon. A bright orange flash was instantly followed by a burning mystical fireball, quite unlike her own ki spheres, which zoomed across the garden and hit the demon. The creature didn't even have time to squeak before it was reduced to ash, which mostly dropped down on the other side of the wall.

Everyone stared alternately between the former position of the little demon and the ancient woman who was looking smug, waving her fingers a little and blowing on them as smoke rose for a few seconds. "Ow," she muttered mildly. "I'm out of practice on that spell," she added, turning back to Soun and Nodoka, who were looking impressed.

"Most remarkable, Elder," Soun said gravely, nodding to her in respect. "A very nice demonstration of battle magic."

"Thank you, my boy," she nodded back, appearing pleased at the compliment, before picking up her teacup and sipping from it. Nodoka looked somewhat more startled than Soun but still took everything in stride. Many of the guests were staring at Cologne in shock although Shampoo seemed proud, as did Mousse and Akane, who were watching from across the garden.

Nabiki turned to Miki and Kimiko who had come up beside her, both sisters gaping at the wizened little Chinese mage, making her smile a bit. "I knew she was a powerful mage but that's the most direct evidence of it I've ever seen," the brunette commented as Miki sat down near her. Her friend glanced at her with wide eyes, then went back to looking at Cologne, who was now apparently explaining something about the spell she'd used to Nodoka who was listening with a fascinated expression.

"Wow," Miki finally managed. Kimiko nodded slowly from next to her, then knelt on the grass, nibbling a sandwich she had on a small plate.

"What was that thing?" the youngest Sano sister asked curiously. Nabiki explained, as she listened.

"Weird. I wonder what they're doing in Nerima?"

"No idea," Nabiki shrugged. "Hopefully there aren't too many left. The other girls went off a while ago to deal with the others, I'd expect they'll be back soon."
All three of them looked around as Akane wandered over clutching a beer bottle, then gestured with it towards the wall and the small scattering of ashes left there. "That was pretty amazing, wasn't it?" her sister exclaimed. "I didn't know she could do that!"

"It was good, yes," Nabiki agreed, grinning.

"Will we have any other magical excitement tonight?" Kimiko asked with a sly grin. Akane looked at her for a second, matching it.

"Come on. What are the odds of that happening?" the blue-haired young woman said, a little loudly as a result of the beer. Nabiki wasn't alone in wincing, several people quickly looking around suspiciously.

Just under two and a half kilometres away from the Tendo Dojo, on the roof of the car park next to the central Metro station in the centre of Furinkan, a half-erased and slightly disturbing-looking diagram was still smoking a little. A light breeze for a second or two disturbed the drying chalk, blood, and mint extract mixture that comprised it, a small swirl of the powder resulting from this process lifting and then settling again across a few of the semi-obliterated glyphs. Residual power from its recent activation was causing small runnels of light to form and rush across the diagram, slowly dying out. Another half hour and it would be depleted and dead, the next rain shower washing it away completely.

Unfortunately, the slight disturbance moved a few critical lines at exactly the point Tamiko and Chiyoko walked past on the ground, the pink-dressed girl taking a shot at the second to last demon in the process, which remarkably enough she managed to hit without destroying anything else. The shock of this was so great that Tamiko missed the momentary surge of magic that came from a few metres overhead, something she'd normally have easily picked up on.

Light flared for a short couple of seconds, accompanied by a sizzling crackle, then the remains of the diagram went blank and cold, the remaining symbols crumbling away to dust.

Another thirty seconds went past quietly.

Something stirred, looked around with puzzlement, then spread dark red wings and flapped hard, launching itself into the air. Gaining altitude, so far unseen in the early evening sky, it circled around before heading away from the parking structure.
"Got them all," Yori announced as she and the other four, along with Chiyoko, abruptly appeared next to the pond, making Genma twitch violently and fall in again. The black-haired magical girl's eyes went wide then she turned away emitting gales of laughter as the soaking wet panda hauled itself out of the water, giving her an unfriendly look in the process. Misaki grinned while the others snickered. Chiyoko stared in shock, moving a little closer to Tamiko and readying her staff, which the red-head put a hand on, pushing it down with a shake of her head.

"What were those things doing in Nerima?" Ukyo asked curiously, glancing at the small pile of ash on the wall. "And how many were there?"

Recovering her composure, although still smirking a little when she looked at the panda, Yori turned to the chef. "We're not sure on the first part, and way too damn many on the second. At least a hundred or so," she replied. "We're still not sure where they even come from in the first place." Nodding at Chiyoko, she added, "This young lady is the one who is normally, um, involved with them."

Shampoo frowned at the young girl, who met her eyes then stared at the ground, her face going pink.

"I remember Chiyoko. Is she still a bad shot?"

The older magical girls all looked at each other, before sighing en masse. "Afraid so," Yori confirmed. Chiyoko went pinker.

"I got three of them today," she muttered. Tamiko patted her on the head.

"So you did. Well done. We'll talk about all the other things you got later." The red-head grinned as Chiyoko groaned faintly. Shampoo shook her head in mild disbelief, while beside her Akane giggled.

"We're looking after her until her mother stops by later to pick her up," Tamiko announced, looking around. "She sort of jumped off the train earlier when she saw one of those little bastards and everything snowballed from there. It's probably best not to have her running around the place shooting it up."

"Hey, I'm not that bad," Chiyoko protested weakly. Tamiko began laughing, while her friends all exchanged glances while grinning. The girl sighed. "More or less. You guys are horrible." She seemed to be half-depressed, half amused by now. Standing her staff upright she leaned on it, waiting for the others to stop giggling, still a little pink-faced.

Akane stepped forward from the group of people watching and listening. "It's nice to meet you, Chiyoko," she said in a friendly manner. "I'm Akane Tendo. Would you like something to eat?" The girl perked up, looking curiously at the tables of food and drink, which while depleted, were still covered in enough to keep everyone going for hours.

"Yes, please," she replied eagerly. "Thank you, Akane." She looked at her staff, then down at her elaborate dress, before shrugging, handing Tamiko the staff, and wandering off with the youngest Tendo, talking happily. Her mood seemed to have improved instantly.
"You have the best parties ever," Miki whispered to Nabiki from where they'd been watching and listening. The Tendo woman grinned. They moved closer to the others, who were watching Chiyoko with various expressions mainly mixing fondness and mild irritation.

"She's a nice girl," Tamiko sighed as Nabiki stopped next to her, glancing at the middle Tendo sister, "but a little... how do I put this... a little careless." Hefting the staff, she added, "And with very heavy weaponry for a twelve year old. This thing is absolutely lethal, how she's managed not to hurt anyone with it so far is beyond me."

"Except Mr Ishikawa's poodle, of course," Fumiko commented with a shrug.

"Except that, yes," her friend agreed. She laughed a little. "Although that seems to have worked out all right, weirdly enough."

Hana came over to stand next to her sister while staring at the staff Tamiko was holding with her eyes wide and her insane grin even larger than normal. Kimiko followed her, looking amused. "Wow! A real magical weapon!" she enthused, inspecting the thing which the red-head obligingly held out for her to see, smiling a little. Hana took a couple of photos of it. "That's amazing." Gingerly she reached out with one finger and poked the large blue gem set into the end of it, pulling the digit back quickly and looking suspiciously at it.

"How does it work?" Kimiko asked, also inspecting the thing with interest.

Tamiko shrugged. "No idea. Most magical weapons are locked to a specific user, or otherwise not usable by anyone else for various reasons. This one is horrendously powerful so it's probably a good thing that normal people can't do anything with it. It's a bit of a pity that Chiyoko can." She shook her head in despair. "You wouldn't believe the number of holes in everything around the place right now."

"The fund will sort it out," Yori soothed her friend. "No one got hurt, and it's all over now, so why don't you have some more beer?" She snickered as the other woman gave her a look, then finally nodded. Passing the staff off to her friend Tamiko wandered off in the direction of the drinks, a mildly annoyed expression still on her face.

"For some reason Chiyoko's mother seems to have latched onto poor Tamiko as the one to shout at when her daughter goes off and causes weird problems," Yori confided in a lowered voice, Miki and her sisters listening with interest. "We can't figure out why. But it's kind of weird how often they run into each other."

"So her mother knows she's a magical girl?" Kimiko asked, an eyebrow going up. Yori nodded. "Isn't that against the Magical Girl Code or something?"

Misaki snorted with laughter while the others grinned. Yori chuckled. "It's not actually a rule, but yes, it's fairly common that people in our particular profession tend to keep it quiet from their families for various reasons." Looking over at the pink-dressed girl who was now talking rapidly with much arm waving to Akane, Ukyo, and Soun, she snickered. "Chiyoko, though, is pretty much in a class of her own. Practically everyone in her neighbourhood knows who she is, although most of them are polite enough not to mention it when she's not powered up. Amazingly enough generally speaking people are fine with her, despite the holes. The Magical Girl fund does spend quite a bit on patching them up, but..." She shrugged. "That's what it's there for."

"She seems nice," Miki giggled. "A little overenthusiastic, but nice."

"She is," Fumiko put in. "In both cases. Her mother is all right as well, most of the time, but she gets worried when Chiyoko wanders off and she then sees something on the news about it. Probably why she's fixated on Tamiko as being the responsible one, since she's been in a few reports as well and is clearly older and more experienced."

"It's driving her nuts." Aiko watched her friend drain a bottle of beer in one go with amusement. "She quite likes Chiyoko underneath the irritation, though."

"Everyone likes Chiyoko," Yori said dryly. "Except, of course, for Mr Ishikawa. He's not really a fan."

"There's a shock," Aiko laughed. Glancing at Yori, she said, "You know I could go and get her mother, or take her back, right now?"

"Of course I do," Yori retorted, smiling a little. "I do remember you being able to teleport, it's quite useful sometimes." Aiko folded her arms and stared at her friend with the corner of her mouth twitching. "But let the girl have something to eat. She doesn't seem to get out much and she's obviously enjoying herself at the moment."

This was true, Miki noticed, watching the youngest magical girl laugh at something Ukyo had said. She looked at Nabiki who was also watching, smiling to herself. Hana finished taking another photo of Chiyoko's staff then headed over to apparently take a photo of the girl herself, Kimiko still trailing behind her wearing a small grin. Everyone else had apparently gotten over the startlement of the new arrival and Cologne's swift dispatch of the small demon and had gone back to talking, eating, and drinking.

She shook her head in wonder, then looked around for where her boyfriend had wandered off to, finding him engaged in conversation with Konatsu and Nodoka. Finishing off the sandwich she was holding as she walked, she went over to him and slipped her arm around his waist. He returned the gesture, both of them listening to the Saotome matriarch going over some of the ideas she'd had for the wedding of the two young people, Konatsu nodding every now and then.

Nearly five thousand metres up, circling in a thermal, something looked around with confused interest. It had no idea where it was, why it was here, or how it got here, but it was getting mildly irritated by the way the air smelled funny and it was too cold. It could also sense something not that far away that seemed worth investigating.

With a slight twitch of a wing, it straightened out its flight path and headed in the relevant direction, scanning the ground carefully.

"Captain?" The voice of the first office was somewhat tense and a little worried. Captain Ryo Minami glanced to the right enquiringly. His copilot was much less experienced on international flights that he himself was, being nearly twenty years younger, but in his estimation was even so a more than competent officer. It was unusual for him to sound like that.

"Problem, Mr Sato?" he asked quietly. The other man wasn't looking at his instruments, instead he was peering out the right window in a downward direction.

"I'm... not sure, sir," the other man said slowly. Even the back of his head was radiating puzzlement. Looking back at his captain he shook his head. "There's something odd down there."

"Where?" Minami asked curiously, craning his neck. He couldn't see anything unusual. His colleague pointed.
"About two o'clock, below us." He checked the instruments for a moment. "Maybe two thousand feet lower."

"In the air?" The captain was intrigued. "So it's flying, then? Another aircraft?"

"No, sir, the wings are flapping," the first officer said in a stunned voice. "But it's way too big to be a bird."

They stared at each other for a few seconds. Then Captain Minami checked that the autopilot was engaged, undid his harness, and stood, leaning over to see out the window for himself. After another ten seconds, he retrieved a pair of binoculars from beside his seat and put them to his eyes, focussing carefully. He stared some more.

Eventually he handed the binoculars to his colleague and retook his seat, absently checking the instruments out of habit. Nothing was amiss, they were steadily climbing on their departure from Haneda Airport.

"Do we report it?" the other man asked.

"That's Nerima down there, isn't it?" Minami asked, knowing the answer before he spoke. Sato nodded. "Not Minato?"

"No sir, Minato is behind us on the port side."

"You're sure?"

"Yes, sir."

"Right." They were silent for a few moments, the normal sounds of a 767 cockpit and engines the only thing heard. After a bit Minami asked, "Is it still there?"

Sota checked.

"Yes."

"Right."

Finally, Minami pressed the radio transmit button with a faint sigh. "Tokyo ATC, this is Flight JL91 enroute to Seoul, we'd like to report a potential flight hazard please."

He released the button while exchanging a glance with his first officer. There was a short delay, then the voice of an ATC operator crackled in their headsets.

"JL91, go ahead. What sort of hazard?"

Minami sighed again, before pressing the button. "It looks like some sort of giant demonic duck, Tower."

The delay was longer this time.

"JL91, please repeat."

"A demonic duck of some sort," he responded. Checking the altitude, then quickly standing up to look out and back, he added, "Approximately flight level one five zero on a heading of one nine six, moving slowly. Dark red in colour. We're estimating it's roughly the size of a light aircraft."
Releasing the button he waited. Sota was still looking through the binoculars, panning gradually backwards as they moved past the thing. Shortly it would be too far behind them to still see as they gained speed and altitude.

"JL91, report acknowledged. Are you certain you're not looking towards Minato?" The operator sounded resigned but not entirely surprised.

"Tower, we're sure. It's over the middle of Nerima, around the Furinkan area as far as I can see."

"JL91, thank you for the report. Tokyo ATC out." The radio went quiet.

Both men sat in silence for some time. Sota kept looking out the window, distracted from his job, until the thing was out of sight behind them.

A few minutes later, he stirred. "That was a little weird," he commented. Minami glanced at him, then went back to scanning the horizon.

"You only recently transferred to Tokyo, didn't you?" he asked.

Nodding, Sota replied, "Yes, sir, I was flying out of Kyoto for the last few years."

"A piece of advice then. Stay away from Nerima, and Minato. You'll have a much more normal life if you do." Captain Minami shook his head a little. "Both places are very... strange."

Sota nodded again, listening. It took them a while to get back into the normal routine of flight operations, but they managed in the end.

"A demonic duck," Minami muttered after a while, shaking his head. "That's a new one on me."

Nabiki, there are some unusual reports being transferred from Tokyo air traffic control regarding this area,# Jun suddenly announced. Nabiki, who was in the process of sipping a cup of coffee, politely disengaged from her conversation with Mr Ito and his wife, stepping away from them to concentrate on what the SI was saying.

'What sort of reports?' she asked curiously.

There seems to be something rather large flying around a few kilometres away,# the machine responded.# It was spotted by the air crew of a flight that just took off from Haneda airport. I have sent a drone in that direction to check. There's nothing showing up on passive sensory systems at the moment.# It produced a display which showed aircraft overlaid on her vision as she looked around, transponder, heading, speed, and altitude data associated with each one and the colours varying depending on model and type. # I can go active if you wish.#

'Do it,' she said. A second later the overlay changed, a new icon appearing in red in the direction of the centre of Furinkan. It was at an altitude of three and a half thousand metres, descending steadily in their direction. 'What is that?' she muttered silently to herself and the SI.

The report from the aircraft described it as 'a giant demonic duck of some sort',# Jun told her, sounding a little surprised. Moments afterwards another window popped up with the video from the drone which had reached the thing. Nabiki stared.

'What...?'

The description isn't entirely wrong,# Jun added slowly.
Deep red which made it hard to see against the evening sky, with a wingspan of nearly twice that of the soaring, the thing flapped every now and then, its head moving around on the end of a long neck. It had a beak that looked exactly like that of a duck, even to the colour, although it was big enough to swallow a person. The tail was wrong, more lizard-like than bird-like, and the feet weren't exactly ducklike since she could see they had long feathers as well as webs, but it was clear the thing was at least partly aquatic. It was covered in feathers, or at least something that looked like feathers.

'Where the fuck did that thing come from?' she asked in shock.

'I have no idea,' Jun replied. 'I have nothing like it in my database. It's transparent to normal radar, which isn't entirely surprising due to it being a living creature, and it's surprisingly low profile on thermal imaging as well. It's certainly not native to this world.'

'Is it hostile?' Nabiki was getting worried.

'Unknown, but it would be best to assume so without further information.' The SI sounded cautious. 'It seems to be heading directly towards us. It's possible it's sensing the portal which is by far the most powerful magical signature in the area.'

She looked around, noticing that 'Chou' had just stepped through the portal and was looking in the same direction as the thing was coming from, while 'Yori' and the other four were already doing the same. Chiyoko was looking around with an expression of puzzlement, apparently sensing something herself but without the benefit of an SI to localise it. Nabiki was becoming aware that her danger sense was tickling her and had been at a very low level for a little while now. Looking up and to the east she squinted, able to make out the thing now, looking at this range like a bird.

"I assume everyone knows about that whatever it is by now?" she asked her friends over the link, transferring the data Jun had provided and the video from the drone.

"Yes," her elder sister replied, sounding worried. "I don't know what it is but it's certainly coming this way quite fast."

"This is getting ridiculous," 'Yori' muttered with irritation. "What next? A volcano?"

"You probably shouldn't say that," Aiko said, not sounding entirely like she was joking. "What do we do?"

"We could hope it's just passing by," Fumiko commented. Everyone looked at her. "OK, I know," she added with a sigh.

'It's definitely coming here,' Jun announced, showing a calculated vector of the creature's flight path which did indeed end up in the yard of the Dojo assuming it didn't change speed or direction. Nabiki passed the warning on.

"Jun thinks it might be attracted by the portal," she told the others. "Should we turn it off?"

"I think it's too late for that," Tamiko put in. "It's only a few thousand metres away and it's speeding up."

"Damn it." The disguised Ranma sounded very annoyed. "OK, we'd better get everyone on the other side of the portal where it's safer for the moment while we deal with the fucking thing."

"Are you going to shoot it down?" Nabiki asked. 'Yori' glanced at her, before shaking her head.
"I don't want to do that until we know for sure it's hostile," she replied slowly.

"Fair enough."

"Excuse me," 'Chou' called, making everyone in the garden look at her. "Could everyone go through the portal, please? We might have a small problem we have to deal with very soon and it will be safer if you all go back to the waterfall for a little while." She smiled calmly. "I hope it won't take long. We're sorry about the inconvenience."

"What sort of problem?" Soun asked, looking around with worry, as he walked over, Cologne next to him. People were looking nervously about the garden.

"That sort of problem?" Shampoo pointed up and away from the garden. Everyone followed her finger, many of them paling. There was a rapid rush towards the glowing blue tear in space. Soun stared at the now very visible creature that was rapidly heading down and at them.

"Oh, dear," he said weakly with a look of surprise. "Is that...?"

"A giant demonic duck of some sort?" Cologne finished for him. He nodded. "It certainly looks like it. How very strange."

The garden cleared of people surprisingly, or possibly not surprisingly, fast. Shortly the only ones left were the magical girls, Soun, Cologne, Nabiki, and Miki. Shampoo and Akane had corralled some of the drunker guests with the help of Mousse and practically carried them through the portal, glancing back at the descending creature which was now only about a kilometre away. Genma, still a panda, had grabbed Nodoka and flung her over his shoulder, diving into the portal with his wife spluttering in outrage at the damp fur.

"Come on, Nabiki," Miki urged, holding her friend's elbow. "Let's leave them to sort it out."

"OK," the middle Tendo said slightly reluctantly but not able to explain why she was delaying. Just as they reached the portal Hana popped out of it.

"Where's Kimiko?" she asked frantically. "She's not there."

"She went to use the toilet a little while ago," the other Sano sister said, glancing at the house with worry. "I thought she'd come back already."

"I can't see her," Hana replied.

"I'll go and get her," Nabiki told them both. "You two go ahead, we'll be there in a few seconds." Both the others looked at her wide-eyed. "Don't worry, we'll be fine. We're surrounded by magical girls and fireball throwing mages." She indicated the people still present. "And a superb martial artist as well."

"Hurry up," Miki said, not looking entirely sure but relaxing a little. She followed her sister through the portal with a glance over her shoulder. Turning around, Nabiki saw her father studying her, while Cologne was watching the creature descend in wide circles. The rest were waiting alertly to see what happened next.

"Hurry and get your friend, dear," he advised. "I'll wait until you come back."

"Thanks, dad," she said, heading towards the house. She'd only gone a few steps when Kimiko came out of the building, looking around with a puzzled expression.
"Where did everyone go?" the young woman asked, confused. She noticed the remaining people staring upwards and followed their gazes as she wandered across the lawn towards Nabiki, slowing to a halt in the middle. "What the fuck is that?" she yelped, pointing upwards.

She yelped a lot more when the creature suddenly folded its wings and dropped like a stone, landing between her and the others with a thump that shook the garden.

"Shit!" she shouted, diving sideways out of the way in a display of surprisingly good reflexes. Everyone scattered as the enormous beak opened slightly and a sound like a strangled goose mixed with a foghorn and about twice as loud as the latter suddenly emerged. Windows rattled across the neighbourhood.

Slapping her hands over her ears Nabiki winced, staring at the thing in surprise. It looked around then made the noise again. In the aftermath she could head tinkling glass as the window to her father's bedroom fell out. A few tiles slid off the roof.

"Does that count as hostile?" she asked silently.

"Not yet," 'Yori' replied, a look of calculation on her face. The demonic duck stared at them all, then opened its beak much more widely, exposing far more teeth than anything with a beak should have had. It dived at her, only to miss as she darted out of the way with alacrity. "Getting closer though," came the wry admission.

Soun ducked as the thing tried the same trick on him. Cologne dealt it a weltering whack with her staff as the head came around again, the crack of ancient wood on flesh echoing around the garden. Flinching, the thing made a sound that was really quite angry. Nabiki was getting a very solid danger signal from it by now. If nothing else it seemed in a bad mood.

Whipping its head back much faster than before, it managed to catch the ancient Amazon with the return stroke, flicking her half-way across the garden. Worried, Nabiki ran over, to find the old woman sitting up with a look of annoyance on her face.

"It's very quick," Cologne griped. "Much faster than anything that size should be."

"Are you all right, Elder?" Nabiki asked. The much older woman smiled a little at her.

"I'm fine, dear, it'll take something much worse than that to do much to me. Get your friend and yourself to safety while we deal with this beast." She hopped to her feet with little effort, staring at the creature with a calculating gaze. It was currently snapping alternately at Fumiko and Misaki, who were firing small energy balls at it, which seemed to do little but irritate the thing. "I wonder if it tastes like chicken?"

Snickering for a moment, Nabiki admired the ancient woman's persistence, then turned around to see where Kimiko had gotten to. She finally spotted the youngest Sano sister hiding under one of the tables, the one that had the ramen cauldron sitting on it. Carefully working her way around the edge of the garden she headed in that direction.

"OK, it's hostile," 'Yori' announced out loud as the demonic creature's tail slammed down where she'd been standing moments earlier. Several people looked at her with raised eyebrows.

"It took that long to decide that?" Chiyoko asked with enough sarcasm for a girl twice her age. 'Yori' grinned at her and tossed her the staff she'd been examining with interest before the arrival of the demonic duck. Chiyoko caught it and levelled it at the demon, immediately firing a sparkling beam of death which, to everyone's surprise, both actually hit the thing, and more worryingly deflected off it in a luckily upwards direction. It left a scorched patch on the feathers and caused the thing to squawk in rage, but did little real damage.

Ducking the retaliatory strike of one wing, Chiyoko rolled frantically across the grass to avoid the stones that rained down from the garden wall that took the hit intended for her. "Uh Oh," she squeaked.

"That's pretty impressive," Tamiko said, looking surprised. "I've never seen anything take a shot from that staff like that before." She shot it in the face with a compressed ki ball, which produced a crater in the flesh and a loud squawk. Everyone watched as the wound healed in seconds. "Ah.
That's not good."

"Not really," 'Chou' replied, manifesting a pair of golden energy blades and crossing them in front of her. On the other side 'Yori' did the same thing, her blades glowing violet. The demonic duck looked at both of them, then lashed out with its tail at the blonde who gracefully cartwheeled out of the way, slicing at the appendage as she did so. The last few centimetres of the tail separated from the rest of it and landed in the ramen pot with a splash, making Cologne sigh deeply.

Once again the damage healed rapidly, taking less than ten seconds before there was no sign of the hit. The creature seemed furious, but cautious. It stepped back, looking around quickly, with its wings half-opened and ready.

Nabiki had been forced to stop when the thing had attacked 'Chou', to not get into a position where she'd have no choice but to give away her secret to the people who didn't already know. Looking around, she met Kimiko's eyes. The other woman looked scared but not as worried as might be expected.

A few seconds passed while everyone looked at the demonic creature and it stared back, motionless. The impasse was unexpectedly broken by a yipping sound.

Every pair of eyes in the garden swivelled towards the portal, out of which was protruding the head of the male soarer. He looked around curiously, stopping suddenly with his gaze locked on the demonic duck. A sound unlike anything Nabiki had ever heard from the soarers came from him.
Seconds later he dived out of the portal at the thing, his mouth open and ears laid back. The female followed hot on his tail.

"Shit, I forgot about them," Nabiki muttered. She watched, impressed, as both soarers darted about the thing, biting at its legs and making it hop around squawking in anger. The male managed to get a good bite in on the right leg which provoked a wild kick, sending him rolling across the garden into the pond. Worried, she sighed in relief when the animal quickly climbed out apparently uninjured and ran back to the fight.

A few seconds of chaos ensued while the soarers attacked the ducklike demon thing, which charged around the garden knocking things flying, and various people fired at it, wary of hitting either of the soarers. Cologne got it with a fireball making it screech and causing a surprisingly large amount of damage to one wing. Unfortunately, as before, the creature regenerated in seconds.

"This isn't working," 'Yori' called. "We need to get it out of here so we can do something more dramatic. It's like the portal-bomb demons, it heals too fast. I think it would take removing the head to stop it, or just vaporising the damn thing."

"Can you do that?" Soun called back from the other side of the garden where he was fending off the beast's tail with a bo staff.
"Not here, unless you don't want your house any more," she replied. He winced, looking worried.

Moments later the problem solved itself after a fashion as the thing apparently decided it had had enough. The wings extended widely, making everyone fall back. Hopping sideways, the demon avoided a strike from 'Chou', then suddenly snaked its head under the table Kimiko was hiding beneath. A scream of terror came, then it emerged holding her by the back of her shirt. Flapping hard it took off, flipping her into the air in the process then neatly catching her with one taloned foot, which wrapped completely around her.

"Fuck!" 'Yori' stared, then met Nabiki's eyes from across the garden. She cocked her head minutely.

"Distract them," the middle Tendo said over the link. The martial artist immediately fired a series of ki balls aimed to carefully miss the creature which was rapidly gaining altitude, the loud bangs and blinding flashes they caused as they burst in the air making everyone look up. As soon as she was certain no one was watching her, Nabiki shot around the side of the house, looked quickly around while activating her bracelet and triggering the change to Azumi, then dived over the front wall. Seconds later she was flapping her own wings as hard as she could, hurtling up into the twilight sky after the demon carrying her friend's sister. She was immediately joined by both soarers, all three of them climbing rapidly.

Tapping her fingers rapidly on the stone wall at the edge of the incredible drop, Miki stood next to her older sister waiting impatiently for the younger one and her friend to emerge from the portal. The seconds ticked past with no sign of either of them. On her other side John was leaning carefully on the wall, not entirely trusting the ward that was still blocking anyone from falling over the edge, although he'd checked it several times. The light from the purple and golden spheres of hazy light showed a lot of worried and/or curious faces from the rest of the party-goers surrounding them.

Several people had been holding drinks when they ran through the portal and were now sipping them, looking at each other and talking. The pair of soarers, which had looked a little startled when the influx of people had happened, were happily weaving through the crowd, looking for people to make a fuss of them and visibly wondering why everyone wasn't making enough effort.

"Come on, Kimiko," she muttered under her breath. "Where are you?"

"They'll both be fine, Miki," John assured her, although he didn't entirely look like he believed his own words. She glanced at him, then Hana, who was chewing her lower lip, before going back to staring at the portal.

Another minute passed in more or less silence.

"I'm going to look," she finally said. John put his hand on her shoulder.

"It could be dangerous," he warned.

"That's the point," she replied with a nervous frown. "Kimiko and Nabiki are still on the other side." Walking closer, she stopped next to Akane who was talking to Shampoo and Mousse, all three of them looking like the only thing stopping them going back was the fact that they were worried about everyone else following. "Kimiko and Nabiki didn't come through with us," she said to the younger Tendo woman when Akane looked at her.

"I know," Akane responded with a small frown. "It's bothering me as well. But I'm not sure that anyone else should go back. If Yori and the others can't handle it, I can guarantee that no one here could either."

Not entirely convinced and still very nervous for her younger sister and someone who was very close to her best friend as well, Mikī sighed. "I can't take much more of this waiting," she mumbled. Akane nodded, her arms folded, but didn't say anything.

"Hey, what's that idiot animal doing?" John suddenly exclaimed. They all looked at him, then followed his eyes to see the male soarer had stuck his head through the portal, only the rear three quarters of his body visible on that side of the anomaly. It looked very odd. The female was staring at him as well from a couple of metres away.

"We should stop him going through," Shampoo said consideringly.

"How?" Mousse replied with mixed amusement and resignation. "That thing is huge and has a very large mouth."

"It's also very friendly," Akane told him. She walked closer to the soarer, which suddenly stiffened, its long tail sticking out behind it and its wings opening a little. A strange sound came from both it and the female, then the thing vanished through the portal so fast she blinked in shock. The other one was half a second behind him.

"Oh, hell," Shampoo moaned. "That's all we need, alien flying animals in Nerima."

"You mean more alien flying animals in Nerima," Akane corrected absently, still staring at where both soarers had been, as was everyone else on the plaza. "This is all because of the first one."

The five people standing there looked at each other, then as one sighed. "I suppose it couldn't hurt to at least take a look," the Tendo woman allowed. "Very carefully."

She led Mikī and the others over to the portal, the former holding her boyfriend's hand tightly. After taking a deep breath, Akane stepped through the portal. Everyone waited tensely. Seconds later she came back. "It's gone," she reported, then held up a warning hand as there was a surge of people towards the way home. "But hold on, something else is still going on. Wait here while I check it out, please." She vanished again.

Mousse and Shampoo exchanged a glance, then the Amazon woman followed her friend. After a couple of seconds deliberation Mikī went after them, John still holding her hand and as a result coming along for the ride. Emerging on the Nerima side of the portal she looked around, her eyes widening in shock.

The garden was a mess. Tables and chairs were scattered all over the place, there were gouges in the grass that looked like some irked farmer had incompetently tried to plough it while drunk, and a large part of the rear wall had collapsed with the stones scattered around the place. Quite a few tiles were lying around as well where they'd obviously fallen from the roof.

"Holy shit," she muttered. Akane was looking around with amazement as well, having apparently not noticed quite how much damage had happened during her first excursion.

"Damn it, we only just got the place looking really nice after the last time," the Tendo woman growled. Mikī stared at her, wondering what on earth the 'last time' had involved. She looked around again to find her sister and her friend, spotting neither of them immediately. What she did see was seven magical girls, one Amazon Elder, and one master martial artist, all staring upwards. Several of the girls were holding energy balls ready to fire while Chiyoko was sighting carefully along her staff, holding it like a weird kind of rocket launcher over her shoulder rather than in the pose she'd seen the girl use before.

Following the eyes of the others, Miki craned her head back, to see far above them four flying things, one far larger than the other three, all of them almost dots against the encroaching evening. The sky was ebbing towards purple as the sun set, making it hard to be sure, but she was fairly certain that two of the dots were the soarers. The large one was presumably the weird demonic duck thing. What the fourth one was she didn't know.

Distant pinpricks of green light abruptly flew from that figure towards the big one, which jinked sideways, looking like tracer fire. "What the hell is that?" she asked quietly, shocked.

Yori lowered her eyes from the spectacle above them to look at her, a worried expression on her face which made the Sano woman's heart drop. "That's Azumi," she replied, coming over. "Look, I'm sorry, Miki, but... That thing grabbed Kimiko and took off. Azumi was passing and went after it, the soarers followed her."

Miki paled, swaying a little. John grabbed her and steadied her. Yori put her hands on the taller woman's shoulders, meeting her eyes with her own crystalline purple one. "I promise you, we'll get her back safe and sound, all right, Miki? Azumi knows what she's doing. She's trying to get that thing to let Kimiko go so she can grab her and get her out of there. Then we can take it out. But we can't do anything serious to it until they're all out of range."

"Oh my god," Miki said faintly. She looked upwards again. "Oh my god."

"Persistent damn thing isn't it?" 'Azumi' said rhetorically to Jun as she dived on the demon and opened fire again, strafing it with both hands as fast as she could. Dozens of small ki spheres shot across the narrowing distance between them, the shots walking up its back in twin rows of small explosions, provoking another outraged squawk and a sudden manoeuvre as it tried to evade her. She shot past on the left, rolling over and folding her wings while hitting it in the face with half a dozen more shots. As always, the damage repaired itself too fast to be more than a momentary annoyance to the creature.

'It does appear very reluctant to release Kimiko,' Jun replied. 'Surprisingly so, while your shots are too low powered to do much damage it must at least be very painful. I would have expected a retreat by now."

The silver haired flying girl backwinged hard as the thing suddenly dived at her, its toothed beak lunging for her right wing. Missing cleanly it passed her then flapped heavily, while she took the opportunity to blow the last metre of its tail off. For the third time so far.

'I can't get a good shot in until it lets go of Kimiko and I don't think it's going to do that unless I get a good shot in.' The middle Tendo sighed, trying to work out a suitable approach. "This thing isn't very cooperative," she announced to the others. "And it's steadily climbing, it seems to be aiming out to sea. We're already two and a half kilometres up. At this rate Kimiko is going to asphyxiate. She seems OK at the moment but she's gone limp. I think she fainted."

"Can you put a ward around it to stop it getting away?" Tamiko asked Yori and her wife. There was a pause, then the eldest sister responded, sounding mildly frustrated.

"Yes, I could, although it's a little difficult at that range, but it would also enclose Kimiko. If the thing finds itself trapped it might hurt her."
"Good point." The red-head went silent, apparently trying to think of another approach.

'Azumi' watched the two soarers harrying the creature, swooping on it and slamming into the thing's wings and tail, which made it twitch and lash out, but otherwise had no useful effect. They both seemed extremely miffed about the beast. She wondered why for a moment, then as she watched, got an idea.

Mulling it over for a few seconds she decided it was worth a try. Concentrating on a trick she'd worked out some time back, she tried modifying it. After a few abortive experiments she suddenly smiled, glancing to the sides to see the leading edges of her wings begin to glow a familiar green colour. It took a little longer before she managed to stabilise the ki aura but she managed in the end, the glow brightening to a dazzling level.

"Got an idea, guys," she announced, flapping to climb above the creature, which looked around and up, apparently suspicious. "If it works I can get Kimiko away from it. You'll have to deal with it, I'll have my hands full then. Literally."

"OK," 'Yori' replied, sounding pleased. "We're going to erase that damn thing, if it crashes it could cause a lot of damage. Make sure you get away from it as fast as possible, the minimum safe distance is going to be something like five hundred metres."

"Make sure the soarers follow you, Sister," 'Chou' added.

"Got it." Reaching an altitude over a thousand metres higher, she looked down, carefully lining herself up. 'I hope this works,' she commented to the SI, which she could feel watching with interest and worry, having worked out her plan instantly.

#It should do although I suspect it will hurt,# Jun replied quietly. It produced a targeting display without comment, locking the crosshairs on the demon's neck just behind the head. With a deep breath 'Azumi' tipped into a rapidly accelerating dive, flapping hard for the first part then folding her wings almost entirely, the air screaming past her. Using her tail and wingtips to compensate for the motion of the demon as it flew, she hurtled closer and closer, pumping as much power into her ki aura as she could manage.

At the last moment, just before she passed it, she opened both wings to their full extent. Whipping past the creature at a relative speed of over two hundred and fifty kilometres an hour, she felt a surprisingly small impact that made her right wing ache a little. Looking at the overlaid view from the drone that she had been shadowing the thing with, she could see its head tumbling over and over as it fell groundwards, only to vanish in a blinding violet flash a few hundred metres below her, the shock wave passing her moments later.

#That worked more effectively than I expected,# Jun told her, sounding pleased.

'Slings a bit but it's not too bad,' she responded, grinning. Converting her dive into a climb with a high g pull up, she headed back towards the remainder of the demon's body, which oddly enough was gliding with its wings locked open. She stared in disbelief as she saw that the neck was beginning to sprout what looked worryingly like a new head. 'Fuck me! What does it take to kill this thing?'

#Apparently more than removing its head.# Jun's voice had a certain amount of reluctant admiration in it. #A very resilient organism indeed.#

With a shake of her head she extinguished her ki-glowing wings and flew closer, keeping a wary eye on the progress of the regeneration through the drone. It looked like she had about thirty seconds at best before it was back to normal. Flapping a few times she matched speeds with the thing just underneath it, looking at Kimiko, whose head was just visible sticking out one side of the demon's talon. It appeared as if the creature had relaxed its grip considerably but hadn't let go completely.

The young woman seemed to be conscious again, looking around wildly, her eyes wide. "Kimiko!" the silver-haired woman called loudly, gliding next to her a few metres away. "Can you hear me?"

The Sano sister craned her neck to see her, then gaped for a moment. She tried nodding, found she couldn't do much, then shouted back, "Yes, I can."

"We've only got a few seconds, I've disabled it but it won't last long. I'm going to try cutting you loose, OK? You'll fall, but I'll catch you. Just don't move until you're free."

The Tendo woman could see Kimiko swallow hard. A second later she closed her eyes. "OK," she yelled.

Reigniting her ki aura, 'Azumi' very carefully drifted closer, using the drone view and her own eyes to get two different viewpoints of what she was doing. With delicate motions of wings and tail she managed to get the right wing to contact the demon's leg half a metre above Kimiko, who opened her eyes and stared at what was going on with shock.

The leg twitched, apparently involuntarily, then slowly parted, the taloned foot and a metre of leg abruptly dropping as gravity reasserted itself. Kimiko screamed loudly as she fell. Diving after her 'Azumi' waited until the foot and the woman parted company, which took about a hundred metres. The entire way the other woman was alternately screaming and swearing at the top of her voice.

Somewhat impressed 'Azumi' matched speeds with the plummeting woman who was now spinning wildly, looking ill. She reached out and gently grabbed an ankle, stopping the spin and urging Kimiko into a vertical dive, which provoked even more swearing. Folding her wings a little she released the young woman, waited a moment, then reached out and grabbed her as she rotated into the correct orientation versus herself, holding her tightly under the armpits and wrapping her arms around her.

"Put your arms around my back and hold on," she shouted. Kimiko grabbed her hard enough that without her magical girl constitution she'd have yelped in pain. "Don't let go."

"I'm never letting go," Kimiko yodelled, staring at the ground which was approaching in a manner that made it apparent it wanted to be friends. 'Azumi' could sense her heart hammering in her chest.

Checking with the drone she saw that they were now nearly four hundred metres below the demon, which had nearly completely regenerated. The soarers were watching it warily, then when she whistled sharply, dived after her at high speed. Shortly she commed the people on the ground. "We're clear," she reported. "Eight hundred metres and still moving away."

"Close your eyes," the voice of the martial artist warned. Seconds later an amazing range of ki balls and a humming magical beam shot upwards like anti-aircraft fire from the back garden of the Tendo Dojo. An enormous flash from above them lit the entire ward like daylight for a fraction of a second. Having closed her eyes just in time and put a hand over Kimiko's, she blinked, then held on as the shock wave rolled over them making her descent wobble a little. The deep boom from above was surprisingly muted compared to the flash.

"That was impressive," she commented, looking over her shoulder to see that there was only a trace of vapour high above them.
"Seems to have worked." 'Yori' sounded satisfied. "We put a ward below it to damp the blast, so hopefully there won't be too much damage on the ground, but I'd expect there are a few broken windows." She sighed slightly. "The fund is getting a real workout today."

"We can afford it, dear, as you well know," her wife giggled. "Come on home, Nabiki. Miki is jumping up and down with worry about her sister."

"Kimiko seems fine although I think she might be in shock," 'Azumi' reported, looking at the woman she was carrying. Carefully levelling out at fifteen hundred metres, she went into a gentle spiral, gliding downwards with the soarers falling into formation behind and to the sides, yipping to each other in a pleased sounding manner. "But we have a little problem now. With 'Azumi' here, where's Nabiki?"

Her friends were silent for a moment. Then Fumiko chuckled. "I've got a cunning plan."

"Hey, Ami, are you busy right now?" The blue-haired girl smiled at the voice in her head, putting her book down beside her on the bed.

"I was just reading, Fumiko," she replied silently. "How are you? I haven't heard from you guys for a week or so."

"We're fine, pretty much, thanks," the other woman said with good humour. "Although life has been a little exciting here for a couple of hours. We're in Nerima at a party with Nabiki's family and something weird came up."

"Can I help?" she asked, somewhat concerned.

Fumiko laughed. "I was hoping you'd say that. Yes, you can. We need a spare Nabiki in a hurry."

Ami stared at the ceiling in surprise.

"Um, what?" she managed to ask after a few seconds.

Fumiko explained, making her laugh, then agree.

"I'm just going out for a little while, Mom." Saeko looked up from her computer at the sound of her daughter's voice from the door to her office, seeing the young woman leaning against the door. "A friend needs some help with something."

"I see," she smiled. "More homework?"

Ami giggled. "Not quite. It shouldn't take long."

"All right. Take care and let me know if you get delayed, will you?"

"Sure, Mom."

"Oh, and can you pick up some potatoes and some bean sprouts on the way back?" Saeko asked, remembering that they'd run out. Ami grinned and nodded.

"Of course. I'll see you soon." With a wave the teenager left the hallway, the front door opening and closing shortly thereafter. Smiling fondly, Saeko resumed typing, frowning in concentration as she refuted the point her colleague had made with incisive wit and superior knowledge. People were wrong on the internet. It was annoying.
Miki watched open-mouthed as the flying magical girl circled lower, able to clearly make out her younger sister clamped onto her like a limpet with her long hair blowing in the wind of their passage. "It's her," she hissed to John, who nodded. "The girl from back home on the mountain."

"Luckily she was in the area and helped," Yori commented, also watching, while smiling to herself. "She's a good person and gets around a surprising amount." Everyone waited for the pair to land. Gracefully flapping as she rotated in the air, Azumi dropped to the ground as lightly as stepping off the stairs, before folding her wings behind her. Miki stared in amazement. John looked at her, then the magical girl, before shaking his head and releasing her hand. When she looked around he was disappearing into the portal, only to reappear seconds later with Hana, who stopped and gaped.

"Oh my god," her older sister gasped, raising her camera. Behind her other people began trickling through the portal, all of them looking shocked at the scene they found. Soon Cologne and Soun were explaining the recent events to a collection of stunned party-goers.

Absently noticing Chou and Aiko disappearing behind the house, she didn't even blink as a bright flash reflected around the corner. Instead she walked over to her sister and the flying woman, who was talking softly to Kimiko. The latter seemed reluctant to release her grip but finally did so. "Are you OK, Kimi?" Miki asked gently. Her sister nodded, tears of relief in her eyes.

"I'm fine, I think," she said in a trembling voice. "But I never want to do that again."

"Which part, the being grabbed by a demon part or the flying part?" Yori asked from beside them, having come over silently. Kimiko looked at her, then smiled a little.

"The flying wasn't too bad after the sheer gut wrenching terror but the demon part wasn't much fun," she replied. Yori snickered, putting her hand on Kimiko's shoulder for a moment.

"You're fine," she reported. "No serious injuries, just some bruised ribs and some cuts on your foot. Hold on, I'll sort that out for you." Her hand glowed briefly then she lowered it. "There you go."

"Thank you, Yori," Kimiko said with a formal bow. She turned to Azumi who was watching with amusement. "And thank you so very much. That was amazing if horrifying."

"You're more than welcome, Kimiko," the silver-haired girl replied, smiling. "I'm sorry that this got in the way of what looks like a nice party."

"It was good," Kimiko grinned. "I hope there's some beer left, I need to get very drunk."

"We'll get some more if there isn't." Yori assured her. "Horrible stuff that it is."

"Thanks." The Sano woman staggered a little, both her sisters rushing to support her. "Wow. Head rush." She looked pale for a moment. "It all caught up at once."

"Go and sit down for a while," Azumi advised in a calm voice. "It will pass."

Nodding to her, the three women walked over to a set of chairs that Nodoka was picking up and putting to rights, lowering Kimiko into one then sitting beside her. Miki fussed over her younger sister until she was sure she was all right, glancing at Azumi occasionally with awe. The silver-haired girl with wings was talking quietly to Yori and Fumiko with Misaki listening, Chiyoko and Tamiko watching from a short distance. The young magical girl was holding tightly to her staff and every now and then looking up with wide eyes. Miki couldn't blame her.

Eventually, she stood and made her way over, waiting politely until Azumi finished talking to Fumiko. The woman glanced at her and smiled slightly in a cool but friendly manner.

"Hello," she said. "Miki, I believe?"

"Yes. It's nice to meet you. I saw you a little while ago, in Kobe? On the mountain? You rescued a little boy from a car that went over the edge."

"Ah, yes, I remember that. The poor kid wasn't too badly hurt in the end." Azumi smiled more widely, her oddly disconcerting orange eyes crinkling a little around the edges. "Do you live in Kobe?"

"Yes, but I go to university in Setagaya with my boyfriend John. He's over there." Miki motioned towards John who was standing next to Soun, both of them drinking beer and watching the people mill around. She ducked slightly as both soarers suddenly dropped out of the sky, having been circling a few hundred feet up, landing with one on each side of Azumi, who didn't move a muscle. "I heard these things were friends of yours."

Azumi suddenly grinned, looking much less intimidating. The male stuck his head under her hand with a yip and closed his eyes in rapture as she massaged it. "Yes, we get on very well, actually," the magical girl chuckled, looking down at him. "Probably because we both fly."

"I was wondering about that," Miki started cautiously. Azumi raised an eyebrow. "I mean, we've not actually met before, but I've heard stories about you in Setagaya several times. No one mentioned wings." She looked the other woman up and down momentarily. "Or a tail."

Looking amused, Azumi shrugged. "They're options," she laughed. Miki stared, then her eyes widened as the woman shimmered slightly like a heat haze, the aforementioned appendages evaporating without trace.

"Holy shit!" Hana yelped from behind her, making her sigh a little. Another flash came from her sister's camera.

"Those pictures aren't going to come out very well, are they?" she asked with a look over her shoulder.

"Probably not, no," Azumi snickered. "Magic, you know. Screws cameras up quite a lot."

"She's going to be furious," Miki giggled. Looking back, she added, "That's my sister Hana. She's a fan. My friend Nabiki got your autograph for her, she nearly fainted."

"I remember meeting Nabiki, yes," Azumi commented, tapping her chin and looking thoughtfully at Miki. "But I seem to remember giving her two autographs." Miki went slightly pink while Yori, who had been listening quietly beside Fumiko and Misaki, emitted a muffled snicker. Glancing at them in embarrassment, Miki saw all three women were grinning at her.

"Um. Yes, that's true. I got one as well." She blushed at the admission. "I like collecting magical girl stuff, although not as much as Hana does. She looked over her shoulder again. "No one like collecting it as much as Hana does."

"She does seem fairly keen on the subject," Fumiko laughed from the side. "That grin... I've met horrible things from other worlds that would run from that grin."

Miki sighed, shaking her head, while everyone else looked at her with various smiles.

"Like I said, she's a fan." After a moment, she realised someone was missing. "Hey, where is..."
Nabiki?" Looking around and growing worried having lost track of her friend during the excitement, she relaxed when she spotted the middle Tendo sitting in a chair on the other side of the garden with Chou talking to her. The blonde had apparently come back when she wasn't looking. She noticed that Aiko was half-buried under a stack of half a dozen crates of beer bottles which she was effortlessly carrying across the garden, assuming they'd gone somewhere to get it.

"Well, I'd probably better get these guys back home, then I'm going to have to leave," Azumi announced, stroking the female soarer, which was now leaning against her left leg and looking satisfied. She said something in a weird language that made both animals look up at her. They seemed disappointed.

"What language is that?" Miki asked curiously.

"Fwetnan Common," Azumi replied. "It's the language the D'Sage speak over most of their world. These things know a few words of it. They're pretty smart." She looked down at the animals with fondness. "I'll be back in a minute." Walking over to the portal she disappeared through it, the soarsers looking at each other, then around at the garden, before appearing to slump a little in disappointment and follow her. Miki watched with impressed amusement.

"They are smart," she said. Yori nodded, chuckling.

"That they are. Almost too smart sometimes. They certainly like people as well." She turned to Miki. "I'm sorry about your sister. Hopefully she'll be OK, though."

Miki looked at Kimiko who was talking to Hana, both of them looking at the portal. The youngest Sano was still unusually pale but seemed fairly cheerful. She perked up even more when Aiko came over and handed her a beer bottle for each hand, flicking the tops off in the process.

"She'll be fine, I think," Miki said, going back to Yori. "I'm just glad your friend was able to help."

"It's what we do." Yori grinned. After a moment she looked thoughtful. "But I'm going to have to work out what that damn thing was and how it got here. I didn't feel a portal other than that one anywhere in the area, although admittedly it's giving off enough magic at close range to cover up another one if it was some distance away."

"We didn't feel anything else while we were out earlier," Misaki put in, also frowning slightly. "And I've never heard of anything quite like that before. It was damn tough."

Yori sighed. "That can wait until tomorrow. Hopefully there won't be any more of them. I'll let the relevant people know what happened, I'm sure there are all sorts of worried people in the government right now. That flash must have been visible over most of Tokyo."

"It was pretty spectacular," Miki giggled. "I've still got afterimages from it."

Hearing the portal crackle slightly more loudly, she looked to see Azumi coming back through it, alone. The woman walked over to Chou, talking to her for a few seconds, the blonde nodding and looking around apparently doing a head count. Shortly after that the portal disappeared with a pop.

Coming back, Azumi briefly stopped next to Kimiko, saying a few words to her. Miki's sister put her beers down and jumped up, hugging the magical girl, then sat again, reclaiming both bottles after smacking Hana's hand, which had been drifting in the direction of one of them. The other sister yelped and retracted the appendage quickly. Shaking her head and smiling, Azumi rejoined Miki and the others. She held out her hand, which Miki took.

"It was nice to meet you," she said.
"I feel the same," Miki replied. "Perhaps we'll bump into each other in Setagaya?"

"Not impossible, I suppose," Azumi chuckled. Waving to Nabiki, who waved back with the hand not involved with holding a glass of juice, she nodded to the other girls, waved to Aiko who called a goodbye, then bounded lightly onto the roof of the house. Running along the peak of it she leaped into the air over the garden, her wings and tail reappearing as she arced through the air, then quickly flew off, gaining altitude at a remarkable rate. Miki watched in astonishment as did practically everyone else in the garden.

Eventually lowering her eyes when she could no longer make out the figure against the sky, she met Yori's smiling face. "That happened, right?" she asked faintly.

"Yep."

"OK."

"What did?" Yori asked, a knowing tone in her voice.

"I can't remember what she looks like." Miki sighed. "It's like with you lot, isn't it?" she asked, glancing at Fumiko, who grinned at her.

"Pretty much. Effective, isn't it?"

"Far too effective," Miki griped, before shrugging, then wandering off to look for something to eat, suddenly feeling peckish again after all the excitement. Nabiki, who was talking to Chou again, smiled at her, before both women walked over to listen to Genma discussing some martial arts move with the police lieutenant whose name she'd forgotten.

"Thanks for the information, Yori," Naito said, making notes with the hand not holding the phone. "I'll come up with something plausible and pass it around."

"OK," the magical girl said. She sounded somewhat tired. "Sorry about dumping all this on you like that. There wasn't time to warn you about that damn thing, we needed to get rid of it quickly."

"It's not a problem," he assured her. "You're the expert in these matters. Even the government says so." He chuckled as she sighed a little. "You have an ID that says as much, I've seen it."

"True enough, I guess," the young woman replied with a weary snicker. "But to be honest it would be nice to be able to go to a party without ending up having to chase hundreds of little menaces around for a couple of hours, then shoot down a damn demonic duck of some sort."

"I still can't believe that," he laughed, shaking his head. "It's weird even for you guys. I've heard the ATC conversation, that poor pilot sounded very confused."

Yori chuckled. He could picture the look on her face pretty well. "I can imagine. It confused us, believe me. Just when you think you've seen everything..."

"Somehow I doubt with your lifestyle you'll ever get to the point you've seen everything," he noted. She made a sound of resigned agreement. "Go back to your party. I'll sort things out at this end."

"Thanks, Masao. I'll get you a proper report tomorrow." Disconnecting, the line went quiet. He put the phone down and thought for a little while, making notes, then picked the phone up again. Shortly he was dictating a suitably non-terrifying story to be spread when the media came calling, which would certainly happen very soon.

Dropping off the roof of a house a few doors down the street having carefully checked she was unobserved, Nabiki, the real one, shimmered a little and retook her own form. She grinned at the person wearing her face who returned a remarkably close facsimile of the expression. Beside them, 'Chou' giggled.

"Thanks, Ami," the Tendo woman laughed quietly. The other Nabiki turned back into the familiar shape of Ami, who was still grinning. "That was fun," she giggled. "I think even your father was fooled. It wouldn't have worked without you feeding me the right lines and coaching me on the responses, though."

"You sure learn quickly," Nabiki replied, still smiling about the ruse. "We'll have to try that with Ms Aoyama at some point, so she and Azumi can be seen at the same time. Maybe with Sergeant Harada. It's always fun messing with his head."

"Be good, sister," 'Chou' smiled. "The sergeant isn't a toy."

Ami and Nabiki both laughed. "I'll see you around, Ami," Nabiki promised, heading back to the Dojo, 'Chou' accompanying her. Ami waved, then turned to Aiko who silently appeared next to her, both women vanishing again instantly.

Back in the yard, Nabiki went into the house then out the other side, stopping in the kitchen to retrieve the last plate of sushi from the refrigerator which was the excuse the duplicate had used to leave the party briefly. As soon as she emerged with it a plague of partiers descended on it, leaving her blinking in surprise and holding an empty plate moments later.

"We need to get more food," she announced as Nodoka came over and looked at the plate with a bemused expression. She put the thing down on a table, popped the single salmon roll she'd salvaged into her mouth, then grinned at the older woman, who shook her head a little.

"I have no idea how everyone has managed to eat everything we had, including all the things Ukyo and the Elder brought, and can still be hungry," Nodoka sighed. She looked around the damaged garden. "Can you round up a few people to help sort this out with me, dear?"

"Sure, Auntie," Nabiki replied, waving to Miki and pointing at the still scattered tables and chairs. Her friend nodded, grabbing her boyfriend and Hana, the three of them coming over. Fumiko and Misaki pitched in to help and they soon had things back in as much order as was possible.

When Aiko suddenly appeared carrying a stack of pizza boxes, there was much rejoicing. She put them on a table and disappeared again with a flash, reappearing a few minutes later with a somewhat disorientated woman in her mid thirties who swayed a little, going mildly green, then recovered as Aiko supported her. When she was the right colour again she thanked the petite brunette, looked around, then headed directly towards Chiyoko, who looked worried.

Nabiki joined Aiko as the woman began talking to the young girl in a low voice. Chiyoko hung her head with an embarrassed expression, nodding, then shaking her head. "I assume that's Chiyoko's mom?"

"Yep. She wasn't too pleased, although I think not having to take the train all the way home made her a little less annoyed," Aiko replied, grinning. "She's basically all right but she's not happy about the girl managing to get out of visiting her grandmother. Ending up running around Nerima blowing holes in it didn't help either."

They watched as Chiyoko went red, then sighed, nodding again. A little while later Chou joined the two, talking calmly to Chiyoko's mother, who slowly seemed to relax. "She's really good at that," Aiko commented admiringly. Nabiki smiled, watching her sister get the older woman to sit down and accept a sandwich and a drink. Soon the two of them were talking like they'd known each other for years.

"Impressive." Aiko shook her head in wonder, before heading for the pizza, only just beating Misaki to the last slice of the barbecue chicken one.

"Here you go, Mom," Ami announced as she came in and shut the door, handing her mother a bag of groceries. "I remembered that we needed some onions as well."

"Thanks, dear," Saeko replied, taking the bag from her daughter. "Did you manage to help your friend?"

"Yes, thanks," the younger woman smiled. "It went very well."

"That's nice. Do I know this one?"

"No, she's someone I met over the summer. She's very nice, really smart with a wicked sense of humour."

Saeko smiled. "You'll have to bring her over for a meal some time, then." Heading into the kitchen, she put the groceries away, then started to prepare the evening meal, while her daughter sat down in the living room and turned on the TV to the news. Half-listening, she poked her head into the other room when she heard one particular report.

"Sources in the government have told us that the brilliant flash seen in the sky over Tokyo earlier this evening was most likely caused by a small meteorite breaking up in the atmosphere. Such events are, while rare, known to happen every so often. Reports of minor damage throughout Nerima, which appears to have been directly under the flash, are being blamed on the shock wave from the explosion. No injuries have so far come to light although a number of broken windows and damaged roofs have been noted. Temporary repairs are being carried out in a number of areas, with full assessment of the required work waiting until morning. A helpline has been announced for insurance claims. If you live in the affected area and require repairs, please call this number, which is..." The announcer read out a phone number with a Minato area code.

"So that's what that flash was," Saeko exclaimed. "I thought I'd seen something but it was only out of the corner of my eye. When I went to the window I couldn't see anything."

"I heard a faint thump, that must have been the explosion," Ami mused. "But I had my blind down and Nerima is in the other direction, behind the building." She glanced at her mother. "A meteorite? Pretty unusual event."

"Weirder things happen, especially around here," Saeko laughed. "At least it wasn't some demon or other magical peculiarity." Her daughter giggled, looking amused, then turned the TV off and came to help with the meal.

By the time the pizza was finished, everyone was finally stuffed to the point they couldn't eat any more. Akane looked around the garden at several dozen contented people, a few of whom had fallen asleep. She was amazed despite herself that after a demon attack of all things no one seemed too worried. Vast quantities of food and drink seemed remarkably effective in de-terrorising a group like this.

Glancing at the various magical girls scattered around the place she decided that they probably helped as well. Most people seemed to find their presence somewhat comforting, they seemed to radiate an air of competent protection that had a definite calming effect. Even Chiyoko, weirdly enough. The young woman had at some point powered down or whatever they called it, her pink dress being replaced with more normal clothing and her staff vanishing from where it had been leaning against the wall of the Dojo. She was now sitting talking happily to Ukyo and Kimiko, the latter of whom was distinctly tipsy but seemed back to normal after her ordeal.

Aiko approached her, smiling. "We should show your DVDs now that everything's calmed down, before everyone falls asleep," she said when she was close enough. Holding out her hand she showed the Tendo woman a small black device, "This is the projector, I can connect it to the DVD player and it should give a good result out here."

"OK. That sounds like a good finale to a weird day," Akane giggled. She headed into the house to retrieve the player and an extension cord while behind her Aiko announced to the assembled multitude what they were going to do. Shortly, after a little fiddling and some muttering under her breath, the magical girl was ready.

Inserting the first DVD, Akane closed the drawer and pressed the play button on the front of the device. It made the normal sounds, then her eyes widened a little as a display over four metres across appeared out of thin air at the end of the garden. "That's pretty impressive," she said to Aiko, who smiled and nodded.

"It's good, isn't it?"

Picking the first menu item the Tendo woman selected it, then sat down in a free chair next to Shampoo. Soon the clips were playing one after another, to much good natured comment and applause. Pleased at the response, she grinned at her friend, who was smiling to herself.

The second DVD produced a lot of laughter and even more comments. When it was finished, most of the guests came over to them both, in groups or singly, to congratulate them on their work and wish them good fortune.

Mr Ito was one of these. He grinned at her, his wife beside him. "I see that you seem, somehow, to have refrained from destroying the entire set, Akane," he said, looking pleased yet sly. "I find myself slightly surprised."

"What sort of person do you think I am?" she replied archly. He laughed a little.

"After several years of knowing you, I have a very good idea what sort of person you are." He gave her a warm smile. "A good and talented one, despite early issues. You'll go a long way in your new career."

"Thanks, Mr Ito," she smiled back. He nodded to her, and Shampoo, before he and his wife made their departure as some of the other guests were beginning to do.

"That was nice of him," Shampoo noted.

"He's a decent man," she told her friend. "I'll miss working for him, I think." She looked around. "Come on, let's help packing things away. It looks like the party is pretty much over." They joined Mousse, Nabiki, and Miki in stacking the chairs and folding up the tables. Soon Hana and Kimiko, along with Ukyo and Konatsu, were doing likewise.

Shortly after they'd finished, Chiyoko and her mother came over. "Thank you all for letting Chiyoko stay here," the older woman said with a smile. "It's much appreciated. I was very worried when she jumped off the train." She looked severely at her daughter who sighed very faintly, but said nothing. "I hope she wasn't too much trouble."

"Not at all," Nabiki assured her. "She was very well behaved. You should be proud of your daughter." Chiyoko gave her a grateful smile.

"Oh, I am, believe me," the other woman said with resigned good humour. "But..." She seemed to be looking for the right words. "Her... unconventional hobbies... are somewhat concerning at times." Several people grinned at her description.

"I can imagine," Nabiki chuckled.

"Well, we must be getting home now." Chiyoko's mother looked at her watch. "It's quite late."

"I'll pop you back," Aiko told her, getting a nod of thanks in return. Chiyoko waved as the three of them stepped away, then disappeared in a brilliant rainbow flash. Blinking, Nabiki looked at the place they'd been, before turning to her sister and her friends. Miki stared at her for a moment.

"Have I said you throw amazing parties yet?" she asked.

Nabiki thought for a moment. "I think so, yes," she replied, smiling.

"OK. I still think that's true," the other woman told her, smiling back, then yawning. "I'm so glad we came." She yawned again.

"Come on, I'll show you where you're sleeping," Nabiki laughed. "Before you fall over."

Akane watched as her sister left with her friend, before going to say goodnight to the remaining guests. Soon everyone except Miki's boyfriend and two sisters, who were talking quietly near the pond, Cologne, Mousse, and Shampoo, had left, only the normal residents still also present. She slumped into a chair next to the Amazon warrior, who looked tired. "That was... interesting," she finally said. Shampoo grunted a little, nodding.

"One way to put it," the other woman replied after several seconds. They both fell silent again, watching the few people moving around in the garden.

"This is all going to take a lot of work to put right," Akane remarked several minutes later, looking around at the damage to the garden. The wall was the worst of it, but she could see several other things that needed considerable repair.

"You should be used to this sort of damage." Shampoo grinned at her for a second.

"Not from demons," Akane giggled, before yawning widely. "Kodachi, perhaps. Or the pig."

"Oh well. We can deal with it in the morning." Shampoo heaved herself out of the chair, smiled at her friend, then headed over to the other Amazons with one last wave. Akane watched as they all left, saying goodbye to her father and the others. She looked up as Nabiki came out of the house and sat down in the recently vacated chair.

"Is Miki all right?" she asked. Her sister nodded.
"Already asleep. I've put her and John in Kasumi's old room. Hana and Kimiko can share mine, I'll share with you."

"OK." Akane felt her eyelids drooping and forced herself awake with some effort. Looking at her watch she was a little surprised to see it was only half past eleven. "God, I'm tired," she muttered.

"You're probably still jet lagged aside from anything else," Nabiki told her, smiling a little. "Go to bed. I'll take the others in, then I'll be up soon as well."

With a tired nod the youngest Tendo stood, waved to John and the two women who waved back, then stumbled inside. She didn't even remember getting into bed.

Brushing her teeth, Nabiki looked at herself in the bathroom mirror. She looked somewhat tired, she thought, but otherwise pretty good considering the fight with the demon. 'I think it went well today, bizarre occurrences aside,' she said to Jun.

#It might have been better if a horde of demons followed by that unusual creature had refrained from crashing the party,# the machine commented wryly. #But aside from that, I would agree that events seem to have worked out well. You also learned a new technique that might be useful in future.#

'I'm not entirely sure when,' she grinned. 'Or if I want to know. But you're right, of course. I'm just very glad it worked.'

#Surprisingly well, in fact. By the way, Kimiko is outside the bathroom and I believe she wants to talk to you.# Nabiki nodded, having felt the ki signature of the other woman approach thirty seconds ago or so. Rinsing out her mouth, she wiped it with her towel, then slid the door open. Kimiko looked at her.

After a moment she stepped forwards and hugged the Tendo woman. "Thank you," she said in a low voice, before releasing her and turning around, heading back to her room.

"You're welcome," Nabiki replied, equally softly, before going into Akane's room and closing the door, smiling to herself.

Entering the pathology lab with Agent Tinnin, Harrison greeted the pathologist, Doctor Nadar, who was a middle aged and still attractive woman of Middle Eastern descent. She looked up from her discussion with the tall dark-haired man with a small beard next to her, someone he didn't recognise but who looked to be in his early sixties or thereabouts. "Ah, Lieutenant," she exclaimed, showing signs of mild irritation. "I was going to call you. Who the hell are these people you have us investigating? There's something very strange going on."

He glanced at Tinnin, who looked back, bemused, then asked, "What do you mean, Doctor?"

"Do you have any idea of how odd the poison that killed those three are?" she demanded, looking both intrigued and annoyed for some reason. "I've been up all night trying to figure it out along with half the staff here. We worked out fairly quickly that they'd been exposed to some sort of neurotoxic alkaloid but we simply couldn't identify it." Indicating the man beside her with a quick jerk of her head, she continued, "Luckily, very luckily, an old friend of mine was available to consult, and he's identified what we think it is."

The man in question stepped forward, holding out his hand, which both Harrison and Tinnin shook. "This is Doctor Alan Gruber, formerly of the Army Medical Research Institute for Infectious Diseases, now working with the CDC. He was in San Francisco for a conference and agreed to fly down to look at our samples."

Doctor Gruber's black eyes betrayed a high intelligence and good humour, but also a certain amount of unease. "I'm pleased to make your acquainances, gentlemen," he said quietly in a voice that had traces of a German accent.

"Thank you for helping us, Doctor," Harrison replied. "I'm Lieutenant Richard Harrison, this is Special Agent Mark Tinnin of the FBI."

"What can you tell us?" Tinnin asked. Gruber picked up a sheaf of papers, flipping through them for a moment to stop on one page densely covered with graphs and figures showing some form of chemical analysis.

"I can tell you that someone has done some remarkably complex and extremely illegal chemical engineering," he replied after a moment, holding up the page which both men looked at, neither one understanding any of it. "The toxin used is a weaponised variant form of batrachotoxin, a very nasty and highly potent neurotoxin originally derived from certain animals, mostly frogs, primarily native to Central American countries such as Colombia. The indigenous people there have traditionally used the naturally occurring form of this compound as a hunting aid, tipping arrow and darts with it." He pointed at one graph. "This is the molecular structure of the animal-derived form of the toxin. It is very fast acting, once it enters the bloodstream paralysis is close to instant with death due to cardiac arrest occurring within seconds, minutes at best. There is no known antidote and in any case it acts so quickly that even if there was one it would normally be of no real use."

"That really happens?" Harrison looked at Tinnin, who seemed a little surprised himself. "I sort of thought that poisoned arrows were some sort of Hollywood thing."

"No, it's a real phenomena in many cultures," Gruber assured him. "Some toxins used for that purpose, for example curare, are much better known, because they have shown to have useful pharmacological effects. Batrachotoxin, on the other hand, has no current therapeutic use, it's simply too toxic." Moving his finger to indicate another diagram, he went on, "The interesting and worrying part of this particular case is that this is not actually naturally occurring batrachotoxin. The compound is a synthetic variant with a somewhat modified molecular structure, which has had some unique effects. One is that the toxin is even more effective, which is bad enough. The other one is that it is now a binary toxin. That part is... very difficult indeed to arrange." He sighed slightly. "Unfortunately, I've seen it before, once, many years ago."

Tinnin and Harrison exchanged another, more worried, look. "Where did you come across it, and what do you mean by a binary toxin?" the FBI agent asked.

"We ran into some samples of something that, if not this compound precisely, was very closely related and undoubtedly designed by the same people, in a collection of bioweapons that were acquired during a CIA operation against the Soviets in the late seventies." Gruber looked unsure, but shook his head slightly and carried on. "Strictly speaking it's classified information and I'm not supposed to talk about it, but considering the fact that this compound is actually in use in this country, I think I have no choice but to mention it. Although I would take it as a personal favour if you could omit to mention my name in connection with this affair."

Tinnin regarded him for a moment, then nodded. "I have no problem with that. With this information I think that an... unusual contact... can probably produce all the relevant data to back up your suspicions without requiring you to go on record."
Sighing slightly in what looked like relief, the doctor nodded, glancing at the pathologist who was listening silently. "Thank you."

After a moment, he put the paperwork down and sat on the edge of the desk he was standing in front of. "The binary part of the puzzle is fascinating from a scientific viewpoint. The designers of this compound managed to produce two different chemicals, each one on its own fairly innocuous, that when combined in the body due to normal metabolic actions produce a form of the toxin which will then almost immediately kill the individual affected. I would expect that death would occur within five to ten seconds of the administration of the catalysing agent. The primary compound could be administered up to approximately forty-eight hours beforehand, causing no obvious symptoms except possibly for some minor effects such as a dry mouth and mild peripheral numbness for a time. If the second part was not encountered it would be broken down and excreted from the body within days."

"Making it very difficult to trace," Doctor Nadar added, looking irritated. "Also because the damn stuff is so potent the lethal dose is very small and hard to detect as a result. It took us half a dozen attempts to isolate it. If I hadn't been pretty sure it was there we might have given up before we detected it. All of the standard tests and most of the non-standard ones don't see it at all."

"I would imagine that the three victims were probably fed the primary compound in some manner a few hours before the crime they were involved in, possibly simply in food or drink, although it could also have been in some form of what they thought was a medicine." Gruber shrugged a little. "Unless they were very paranoid they may well not even have noticed. The second part of the toxin, the catalysing compound, was definitely administered as an aerosol. We found traces of it in their nasal passages. Whoever killed them just sprayed them in the face. Death would have occurred in seconds, they'd barely have had time to react."

"Christ." Harrison stared, appalled. "That's... terrifying."

"It's certainly not something I'm comfortable about being in the hands of criminals or terrorists or whoever these people are." Gruber looked unhappy. "The chemicals were created as an assassination tool. One can picture an operation which would involve dosing a group of people non-selectively with the first agent, in the water supply for example, then arranging for the target to come into contact with the second one. Only they would be affected and neither part would be detected by any normal assay method for poisons or chemical weapons. It's not really suited for large scale application, although it would be possible I suppose if you really wanted to do such a thing, but for small scale targeted murders it's horrifyingly effective."

They were all silent for a few seconds, absorbing the information. Eventually Harrison shivered a little. "The more I hear about these people the more worried I get." He looked at Tinnin, who nodded soberly.

"I have to agree. Now we have some old Soviet bioweapon on top of all the other peculiarities. Not good at all." He turned back to Gruber. "Do you have any idea how they might have obtained this damn stuff?"

The scientist thought for a moment before shrugging a little with a minute sigh. "I'm not sure. The samples that were given to us by the CIA were definitely destroyed approximately four years later. I witnessed it myself. A number of the more dangerous toxins were incinerated in a general clear-out of the lab. Whether they retained some themselves I have no idea. Assuming they didn't, which in theory they shouldn't have, I would have to assume that these people probably somehow got them from whoever made them at the covert bioweapon research facility the Soviets were running at the time. To the best of my knowledge that particular facility was shut down after a rather unpleasant accident in the early eighties. It was bad enough that even the Soviets didn't want to continue working there."

"What happened?" Harrison asked with morbid curiosity.

Gruber shook his head. "No one in the West is actually completely certain. There was some sort of containment failure, we're fairly sure of that, and as far as could be determined some six hundred people died horribly from a weaponised disease. They ended up, based on various reports I've seen, having to napalm most of the site to contain it, and they were apparently seriously considering using a tactical nuclear weapon if that hadn't worked. It was much worse than the anthrax leak in Sverdlovsk which happened a couple of years earlier. We didn't find out about that one until the mid eighties and it took another ten years to get real details. This event is still classified to the highest level by the Russians and no one is talking."

"Jesus." Harrison stared, appalled. "That's not exactly comforting to know."

"No, it isn't," Gruber sighed. "There have been some very close calls with bioweapon research which is why there are so many treaties basically banning it. Of course, it still goes on, sometimes in the guise of defence against such things, legitimately or otherwise, or sometimes simply covertly. But, that said, as far as I know all research on this particular compound was stopped at least fifteen years ago."

He picked up the paperwork again, flipping through it absently, before handing it back to Doctor Nadar, who silently accepted it. "It's possible that some of the scientists involved in the creation of this compound were available for these suspects of yours to use, but I personally doubt that is the case. The production of this substance is an extremely complex chemical engineering process which would require a very large investment in equipment and knowledge to pull off successfully. The likelihood of accidents is also significant without a lot of experience. My best guess is that you're dealing with old stock that was somehow removed from the facility before it was closed. How and by whom I couldn't tell you."

After a few more seconds, Tinnin nodded his thanks. "That's all very useful to know. Thank you, Doctor Gruber." Turning his attention to the pathologist, he inquired, "Is there anything else of note about the deceased, Doctor?"

"Not really," she replied, shaking her head. "They were all in good physical condition, I'd say they all regularly exercised, and there were signs of minor physical trauma that one would expect from ex-military personnel. Mr Soria showed some signs of past drug abuse although nothing recent. Other than that, I can't find anything particularly helpful that might suggest their activities over the past few years, if that's what you're thinking about."

"It was," he mumbled, rubbing his chin for a moment in thought. "Oh, well, it was worth a try. Can you send samples to the FBI lab please, we might have some luck with anything you missed."

"Of course, Agent," she replied. A small smile slipped across her face. "But I doubt it, I'm quite good at this job."

Smiling, he assured her, "I'm sure you are, but we have some methods that are unique to us, so it's worth a try."

"Fair enough." She accepted the card he handed her.

"In case anything does come up later, please let me know."
"I will."

The FBI agent glanced at Harrison, who was still thinking about the whole biotoxin problem with a considerable amount of worry. "Unless there's anything else you can think of I think we're probably done here," he said. Harrison nodded slowly.

"Yes, I think so. Thanks, both of you. Doctor Gruber, it was nice to meet you." He shook hands with the older man, who nodded.

"Likewise. Good luck with your hunt."

"Thanks."

Tinnin addressed the scientist. "We'll make sure to keep your name out of the report, Doctor," he assured the man. "You have my thanks for coming forward with this information, it could be very helpful. I understand it was difficult for you."

"You need to know," the other man replied. "But I do appreciate the confidentiality."

Both Tinnin and Harrison left the pathology lab, heading for the exit. "It fits, you know," Tinnin mused as they walked. Harrison glanced at him curiously, so he expanded on the comment. "From what Gruber said, most likely our friends acquired this horrific stuff from either an old CIA program or directly from the Soviets, in each case probably over a decade, possibly as much as two decades, ago. They probably don't have the capacity to make more, which I for one am extremely happy about. It's another example of some old resource being used. I'm starting to get the impression that these people, whoever they are, are not only recruiting agents from security and espionage agencies world wide but are also collecting equipment that was supposed to be lost, decommissioned, or destroyed a long time ago. Possibly their recruits are cleaning out the storeroom on the way out the door or something like that."

Harrison thought about it for a moment, nodding after a second or two. "I can see your point. One the one hand that's good, I suppose, because it implies that they have limited amounts of whatever, but on the other hand it's scary because who knows what they've managed to scrape together? It could be almost anything based on what we've seen so far. I mean, magical batteries, teleport spells, biotoxins... What's next, some old cold war surplus suitcase nuke?"

"Christ, I wish you hadn't said that," Tinnin muttered after an appalled look at his companion, paling considerably. "There are rumours that the Soviets misplaced several of the fucking things when the USSR broke up."

"Shit." Harrison now also wished he hadn't said that. "I really hope those rumours are just rumours."

"So do I," the other man replied quietly as they left the building.
Chapter 99

Fallout from the party and recovery after it. Plus swimming.

While I think about it does anyone have any good thoughts on what the name of the so-far mythical 'Organisation' that Ms Aoyama works for should be? And a suitable logo for it? It's going to be required at some point in the not too distant future and I thought I'd throw it open for consultation.

It needs to be gently threatening in a very polite manner, ideally rather unnerving when you think about it for a while :) Creepy is good, oh yes it is.

Your chance to contribute to the wordage! PM me if you have any decent ideas.

In case anyone has missed it I posted the first chapter of the Xander/Ms Aoyama story I've been writing for a friend after a few requests. It's not going to update wildly often in all probability but it WILL get updated and finished. Enjoy. Or not. Your choice ;)

Waking to the sound of Akane lightly snoring in her bed, Nabiki stared sleepily at the ceiling for a few seconds, blinked, then turned her head to look around the room. It was surprisingly early considering the late night, only just after eight AM, she absently noted as she looked out the window to see yet another rather nice late August morning. After a little longer, she stretched widely, yawned, flipped the covers aside, and hopped off the folding cot they'd set up for her in her sisters room.

Shortly, after a quick wash up, she was dressed and waiting for the kettle to boil for her morning coffee. No one else seemed to have made an appearance yet. She could feel the various ki signatures of her family and friends, most of them asleep, although it felt like both Nodoka and Miki were stirring. A faint thump from upstairs in the direction of Kasumi's old room made her look at the ceiling momentarily and wonder what Miki had tripped over.

When her friend put in an appearance fifteen minutes later, still looking a little disorientated, she pushed a cup of coffee across the living room table at her with a smile. "Try this," she commented, sipping her second cup. Miki looked blankly at her, shook her head a few times, then grabbed the offered drink and slurped several mouthfuls. A handful of seconds passed then she seemed to wake up that last little bit, smiling back at the middle Tendo.

"Thanks, Nabiki, I really needed that."

"You're welcome." Nabiki grinned at her. "How did you sleep?"

"Really well, thanks," the other woman replied, sitting down and sipping more slowly. "That bed is very comfortable. John was still asleep when I got up, and there's no sign of Kimiko or Hana yet either."

"Akane and the rest are still asleep as well," Nabiki mentioned, finishing her coffee and putting the cup down. "Although I think Nodoka is moving around a little." She smirked a bit. "I heard you trip over something, I think?"

Miki giggled. "I forgot where I put my bag and found it with my foot," she admitted. "I nearly went out the window head-first."

"You don't want to do that." Nabiki laughed slightly as well when her friend nodded wryly.
"Not really, no," Miki smiled. Looking around for a moment, she added, "So what's the plan for breakfast? Wait for everyone else to turn up?"

"How are you hungry after everything you ate last night?" Nabiki queried, putting a shocked look on her face. Miki stared at her, narrow-eyed.

"So says the woman I've personally seen eat enough to put a normal person into a coma on more than one occasion," she snarked, causing the Tendo woman to laugh again. "I don't know what to tell you, I think my metabolism speeds up overnight. Whatever, I could eat."

"So could I," her friend agreed, sighing a little. "There's probably something wrong with us both."

Sharing a small smile with Miki, she stood. "Come on, let's see if there's anything left in the house to eat. We practically emptied the place, though, so don't get your hopes up."

Poking around in the kitchen eventually revealed enough in the way of ingredients to prepare some miso soup, which Miki started, and some rice noodles, which Nabiki quickly mixed with various left-over meats to form a sort of ramen-like stew. Tasting it she decided to add some more seasoning, and a chopped up onion, finally deciding it was as good as it was going to get.

"And what do you call this dish, Miss Tendo?" Miki asked in a superior tone, peering over her shoulder and sniffling a few times.

"Tendo House Special, or Slop in a Pot, Miss Sano," Nabiki replied in her best upper-crust accent.
"Much desired by the commoners, but still acceptable to the likes of you and I."

They grinned at each other as she took the saucepan off the heat and turned the stove off. "It's edible, at least," she added. "I think."

"Worth a try," Miki shrugged.

As it turned out, the improvised meal wasn't at all bad. When they finished, Nabiki put what was left into a couple of bowls in the fridge then washed up what they'd used. Going back into the living room she found Miki standing outside the door into the garden looking around at the somewhat trashed area. A large number of people walking around on the grass for hours hadn't done it any favours, not to mention the results of the giant demonic duck. Nabiki sighed, shaking her head.

"What a mess."

"But what a party!" her friend chortled, nudging her in the ribs. "People will be talking about it for years."

"The ones who don't need therapy because of it," Nabiki giggled, making Miki nearly fall over laughing.

"True. Very true."

They wandered around for a while, picking up various odds and ends that everyone had missed in the dark the night before, including quite a few broken tiles from the roof. As Nabiki stacked the last one onto the pile they'd built with a clink of ceramic on ceramic she looked up at the roof, counting under her breath how many were missing. "I hope it doesn't rain until we can get that fixed," she said to her friend as Miki stopped beside her and followed her eyes. "Those ones up there are right over Dad's bed. He's going to be annoyed if he wakes up in a puddle."
"I'll bet," her friend smiled. "Will fixing it be a problem?"

"No, not really. There are a lot of companies in Nerima who specialise in repairing damage from unconventional causes." She grinned with a resigned air. "We have several of them in the address book. We're practically on first name terms with them."

Looking at the gap in the garden wall while Miki giggled, she walked over and inspected it more closely. "This isn't too bad, actually. Most of the stones are intact, it looks like it was only the mortar that went, so I think they can stick it back together easily enough." Glancing along the wall she pointed to a couple of spots. "It's not like it hasn't happened before." There were a number of places where differently coloured mortar outlined a previous hole that had been repaired.

"Good grief," Miki muttered as she counted the locations that were visibly fixed. "Is this a habit or something?"

"Sort of," Nabiki snickered. "Not so much in the last couple of years but at one point the gates weren't really needed, you could just come in through the holes." She pointed at the roof of the Dojo visible past the end of the house. "And that has been completely rebuilt once, not to mention all the damage being repaired over and over. Akane did a lot of it, various other people helped at one point or another." She shrugged. "We've had a lot of overpowered people with anger issues and poor self control come through here over the years."

Shaking her head in wonder, Miki looked around. "Still a pity, the garden looked so nice when we got here yesterday."

"It will again, dear," the voice of Nodoka came from the living room door, making them both look over, to see the older woman watching them while holding a steaming cup of tea between her hands. "Don't worry about that." She cast her gaze around with a small frown. "Although I will admit it's somewhat annoying. We didn't plan for a demon attack."

"These things happen, Auntie," Nabiki replied as they walked over to her. Miki gave her an odd look then laughed.

"You know, most people I've met would find that attitude very strange," she remarked, making both Nodoka and Nabiki smile. "But to you this is basically just another morning, isn't it?"

Exchanging a glance, the other two eventually nodded. "Pretty much, yes," Nabiki admitted. Nodoka merely smiled serenely.

"I always heard Nerima was a little peculiar but I never really realised what that meant until I met you," Miki giggled. "Even so, I wasn't quite ready for all this." She waved her hands around to indicate the garden and by implication the entire area.

"Fun, isn't it?" Nabiki smirked at her. She nodded enthusiastically.

"It sure is. Although I expect it could be a bit much if you wanted a quiet life."

"If you want that, dear, you move," Nodoka told her wisely. "That's something you work out very quickly around here. I understand Minato has it even worse."

"Minato is pretty strange, yes," Nabiki grinned. "Every time I visit friends there we see something a bit unusual."

"I'll have to come along with you some time, then," Miki suggested eagerly. "We should visit once we're back at university."
"That could certainly be arranged," the middle Tendo replied. A sudden sound from above made them all look up to see 'Chou' and Fumiko standing on the roof. Nabiki had felt them coming a little while earlier, of course, but said nothing. She waved.

"Hi, guys, what brings you here so early?"

The two women dropped off the roof and landed next to them. "We were in the neighbourhood cataloguing the damage and investigating the possible cause or source of that odd ducklike creature," the blonde told them, smiling a little. "Yori is with Aiko backtracking its path to see if they can find out where it came from. We're also going to see if we can find any of the bits Azumi blew off it. I saw at least one section of tail drop down over that way a kilometre or so. I'm curious about the thing and I'd like to investigate it."

"You'll probably find some government spooks have nabbed it," Miki suggested with a look of amusement.

'Chou' smiled back at her. "If they had, they'd give it to us to study anyway," she replied, making the Sano woman look surprised. "We have a very good working relationship with the 'government spooks'."

Fumiko chuckled, looking at her friend. "We practically are 'government spooks' if you look at it in the right way," she said with a grin. 'Chou' returned it as Miki stared.

"Shhh," the blonde said, holding a finger to her lips. "No one must know our secret identities. We must appear to be nothing but completely unremarkable and normal magical girls." She spoke in a low, conspiratorial voice, looking suspiciously around for spies in a very obvious manner.

Shaking her head, Miki laughed for a moment. Nodoka was listening to the byplay with a small smile on her lips. "You people are not at all what I expected," Miki announced.

"Better or worse?" Fumiko enquired with an expression of amused curiosity.

Shrugging, Miki appeared to think it over. "Different, let's leave it at that," she finally replied, making them all smile. "But fun."

"We do our best, worthy citizen," 'Chou' said with an elaborate bow involving much hand waving before straightening up grinning.

"Would you care for some tea, girls?" Nodoka asked pleasantly. 'Chou' and Fumiko exchanged glances before nodding.

"Yes, please, that would be very nice," the latter replied. She looked around the garden, inspecting the wall carefully for a moment. "We should get the reparations fund to do this," she added in an aside to her blonde friend, who nodded.

"I was planning on it already. It seems fair, it was a magical girl related problem in the first place." 'Chou' looked at Nabiki, who was grinning internally at the last few minutes of conversation. "Assuming your father wouldn't be offended by someone else paying for the repairs."

"Dad will be fine with it," the middle sister laughed.

"Fine with what?" Soun said, sticking his head out his bedroom window above them, which was still missing the glass. Everyone looked up.

Nabiki waved. "Hi, Dad. Chou was just saying that that magical girl reparations fund that sorts out..."
things in Minato would deal with the repairs. You don't mind, do you?"

Smiling down at them, the martial artist chuckled. "Not at all. I'm not that proud, I'm happy to take help from the experts."

"We've added it to the list of damage from yesterday, Soun," 'Chou' told him with a small smile. "There will be several teams of assessors coming through first thing tomorrow to work out what needs to be done and in what order. This should all be sorted out within three days based on prior experience."

"That sounds more than fair," the head of the Tendo household agreed happily. "I'll be down in a moment. Is there some tea available?"

"Indeed there is," Nodoka replied.

"Thank you." He smiled again and vanished back into his room. The rest of them trooped into the house, sitting around the living room with Nodoka disappearing into the kitchen for a little while. She re-emerged with drinks a few minutes later, just as Soun came in followed by a yawning Kimiko.

Shortly everyone had a cup and was drinking appreciatively. "There isn't much in the way of food left for breakfast, assuming anyone wants anything," Nodoka commented.

"Miki and I put together some leftovers into something edible, so we're all right for the moment," Nabiki replied. "There's enough in the fridge for a couple more servings." She looked at her friend for a moment as she added, "We can go out and pick up some ingredients if you'd like." Miki nodded, still sipping her tea.

"Thank you, Nabiki, that would be very helpful," the older woman told her with an approving look. "I'll make a list. There are a few shops open today so it shouldn't be a problem."

"I'll come with you," Kimiko announced, smiling at them. "I'd like to see the area after all."

"How are you feeling after your ordeal yesterday?" 'Chou' asked gently. Kimiko looked at her with an expression of reminiscence.

"Better than I probably should be, actually, Chou," she said after some thought. "I think I should most likely be shivering in bed, requiring a series of long talks with a psychiatrist, but oddly enough I'm basically fine." She grinned. "All the beer last night helped, I suspect. I was really pretty drunk when I went to bed. But now all I have is a slight headache."

'Chou' smiled back, reaching out and putting a hand on the other woman's neck for a moment, with a brief glow of gold light. "You're just a little dehydrated, you should make sure to drink a couple more cups of tea or some water. This should help with the headache, though."

"Much better. Wow." Kimiko looked both surprised and pleased. "That's amazing." Sitting back the blonde grinned at her.

"It's a useful skill, yes, if you're around people who overindulge."

"Yori is the only one who's never needed it, of course," Fumiko chuckled from beside Soun, "both because she doesn't drink in the first place and because she could do it for herself anyway."

"I'm just glad Azumi was passing by." Miki watched her sister carefully for a moment before apparently deciding she was all right. "I was terrified when Yori said that thing had grabbed you
"You were terrified?" Kimiko laughed. "Think what I felt like! It was the most horrific thing I've ever even imagined. I fainted at least twice, although I think the second time was more because it was holding me pretty tightly, and waking up to see the ground that far away is... not fun." She shuddered briefly. "The falling part when Azumi cut its leg off was much worse, believe me. I really thought I was going to die until she grabbed me."

Getting up Miki moved around the room to sit beside her younger sister, putting her arm around her and hugging her. "I'm so pleased you're OK, Kimi," she said in a low voice. Glancing at 'Chou' and Fumiko, who were watching along with the others, she continued, "Please thank your friend again when you see her. We owe her a lot."

"We will, but you don't owe her or any of us anything, Miki," the blonde responded, smiling again. "We all simply did what we do, try to help as much as possible."

"You'll forgive us if our opinion differs on that subject, I hope," Kimiko giggled. 'Chou' bowed a little from her seated position.

"Of course we will." She looked amused as Fumiko grinned.

"What was the flying part like after the real danger was over?" Nabiki couldn't help asking. Her disguised elder sister gave her a look which she returned blandly. Kimiko giggled as everyone else turned to her.

"Actually that part was OK, I guess. If it hadn't been under those circumstances I think I could have enjoyed it. But..." She shrugged. "I was kind of thinking about other things at the time."

"Understandable," Soun chuckled, putting his empty teacup down. "I would imagine your attention was elsewhere all things considered."

"Maybe you'd like to try flying under less perilous conditions?" Fumiko asked, glancing at 'Chou' enquiringly. "We were talking about going hang gliding on Fwetna at a place we know close to the waterfall last night at the party, before you guys got here. A few people seemed up for it." Nabiki raised a hand, grinning, making Fumiko laugh. "Akane seemed... not entirely convinced, but willing to go along with it," she added.

Miki and Kimiko stared first at her, then Nabiki who was still grinning, then each other. "That could be..." Miki started.

"Both, I think," her sister replied after a moment.

"It's certainly possible to arrange," 'Chou' informed them, apparently thinking it over. "We're busy for the rest of the morning, but I think we could probably take a few hours off this afternoon if you'd like. That would correspond to about halfway through the day on Fwetna at the moment. Their days are about thirty hours long, so they move in and out of sync with our time." She pondered the matter for a few seconds then nodded. "Yes, that should be feasible if anyone would like to indulge. The lake there is very nice to swim in so you should bring towels and swimsuits as well."

Everyone looked at each other. After a little while Miki nodded, followed by Kimiko. "We can easily take a later train back home than the one we were planning on," Miki said.
"You could simply stay another night as well," Nodoka told her. "There's no rush to push you four out, you're welcome to stay as long as you like." The older woman glanced at Soun who nodded, smiling.

"Certainly, no one would object to that."

"And we can always ask Aiko to pop you home anyway," Fumiko grinned. "Why waste time with trains if you don't have to?"

"I can see why Akane and Shampoo like knowing you people so much," Kimiko giggled. "Free transportation is really useful."

"Damn right it is," Fumiko snickered. "We're all waiting for Chou and Yori to work out how to do it like she does and teach it to the rest of us. That'll be fun."

Miki stared in surprise at her, then the blonde, who was looking satisfied. "Can you actually do that?" she asked.

"We believe so," 'Chou' told her, smiling slightly. "We're quite good at reverse-engineering other people's magic and reimplementing it with our own system. Aiko's teleport spell is one of the most complex ones we've worked on, though, worse than the portal spell in some ways, so it's taking a while. We'll get it eventually."

"Unbelievable," Kimiko breathed. "I had no idea you could learn new magic like that. All the magazine articles I've read on magical girls tend to say that they have a fixed set of skills."

"I've read a few of those," the blonde sighed. "They're almost entirely wrong in every possible way. Some of them are so bad they're not even wrong." She shook her head in despair. "Most of the girls don't talk to other people who aren't in that world about what they can do at all so the various publications that are aimed at fans basically make it all up. Or base it on manga or anime, which are sometimes surprisingly accurate but normally make a lot of mistakes as well." She shrugged as Miki and Kimiko laughed.

"That said, there is a certain amount of truth in the idea that most of the girls have a signature attack or attacks which they tend to use as a theme. It normally comes with the magic, but it doesn't usually mean that it's all they can do, just that it's the easiest thing to fall back on. And if it works most of the time, naturally that's what they'll use more often than not. I suppose that as a result people who aren't experts on the subject tend to assume that it's all the girl in question can do."

"It makes sense, I suppose, as much as anything to do with magic does," Miki laughed.

"Don't try to make it make sense, you'll just get a headache," Fumiko advised her good-naturedly. "Just roll with the fact that it exists and that it works. Very few people, even mages, really understand how it works." She glanced at 'Chou' who was smiling into her teacup. "Even these guys are still working it out and they know more about the mechanics of it than anyone else I know."

"It's a reasonable attitude," Soun commented, having been listening with interest as was Nodoka. "I've talked to Elder Cologne about both magic and ki use in the past and she's said much the same thing about both of them. She knows far more about either than I ever will and even so will admit privately that she's not entirely sure how they actually work. She knows that they do, and a significant number of techniques using both, but the underlying principles are still something of a mystery in many cases."
"Strange," Miki mused. "Very strange. But very interesting." She grinned at Nabiki. "Hey, maybe I could learn to do that fireball spell the Elder showed last night! That could be useful."

"When?" the Tendo sister asked, grinning back. "Hopefully you're not going to run into any more little biting demons and it looked slightly excessive for lighting campfires. Or dealing with muggers."

Miki laughed. "OK, true, but it would be really impressive even so." She looked around, then added with a sly smile, "Anyway, with you around I don't need to blow up muggers, you'll protect us from them." Soun looked curiously at her, then turned his gaze towards his daughter, who went slightly red from embarrassment, while Fumiko and 'Chou' also looked at her with interest. Faked, of course, since they knew full well what Miki was referring to.

"Dear? What is your friend talking about?" Soun asked gravely, peering at his daughter closely.

Nabiki sighed, giving her friend a dirty look which provoked another smirk. "There may have been a minor encounter with an incompetent mugger a while ago," she muttered a little reluctantly. "He wasn't very good."

"It was amazing," Miki said happily. "We'd come out of a movie and were just wandering around minding our own business on the way to get something to eat when this idiot jumped out of nowhere waving a knife. John and I didn't even really see him before Nabiki disarmed him and had him on the ground groaning. It was better than the movie!"

Soun listened with interest and a very small smile lurking under his moustache while Nabiki sighed once again. "It wasn't all that dramatic, Miki," she tried, but her friend shook her head wildly. "It was really impressive," she insisted, grinning widely. "You were incredibly quick."

"Dear? Do you have something you'd like to share?" The Tendo patriarch seemed both amused and interested. "Have you been learning the Art behind my back?"

Everyone looked at Nabiki who looked back, red-faced. Nodoka seemed to be quietly enjoying her somewhat flustered expression while Fumiko was openly grinning. 'Chou' smiled quietly but was obvious enjoying it as well. Kimiko had seemed surprised for a few seconds then merely sat back and watched, meeting Nabiki's eyes with a knowing look.

"It was sort of automatic," the middle Tendo finally said, speaking carefully and avoiding the second question, shaking her head a little. "You know that knife disarming move that you teach your students, Dad?" He nodded. "I've seen it so often I think I must have learned it without really noticing. This guy jumped out, pointed a knife at us in a really obvious way, and I sort of just did it. It was like when you're teaching the students, doing it slowly and in a way that they can easily deal with." She shrugged. "It was surprisingly easy, I didn't really think about it very much, I just grabbed him, disarmed him, and sat on him until the police turned up."

"I see." Soun studied her some more. "Well done, dear. As I said yesterday, I think you'd be good at it if you studied properly, but I'm very pleased that even without formal study you seem to have developed decent reflexes and habits. Perhaps some time we should experiment a little and see what other moves you've absorbed without realising it." He gave her an amused look that made her narrow her eyes at him.

"I've seen you and Genma 'experimenting' on Akane, dad. She couldn't walk in a straight line for two hours after the last time."
Her father smiled mildly. "It was an interesting outcome, yes. But she learned in the end."

Fumiko made a muffled snort of laughter, making her stare at the other woman for a moment with irritation, which only provoked more snickering.

"Thanks. You're really helping, Fumiko," she grumbled.

"All part of the service, Nabiki," her friend assured her with a grin. Everyone else laughed.

"Anyway, back to the question of using alien hang-gliders on an alien planet later today," Nabiki said, sighing a little at the smirks surrounding her. "Do you think John and Hana will be up for it?" She looked at Kimiko and Miki, who were still smiling a bit. The two sisters exchanged glances.

"I think John will," Miki said slowly, "He told me once he'd tried it back in the UK and liked it but it was too expensive as a hobby to keep up."

"Hana will go along with anything suggested by a magical girl, especially you, Chou," Kimiko snickered, making Miki grin again and roll her eyes. 'Chou' looked amused, as did Fumiko.

"Good, then that seems like a nice idea for later." The blonde thought for a moment. "Perhaps about three o'clock? That will give us time to finish what we're doing here and work out who else wants to go. Akane and Shampoo will, I think, and Mousse seemed interested last night. We can make arrangements to have enough aircraft available for everyone, we know several people who have a number of them who would lend them to us for a few hours." She looked around at everyone. "Does that seem like a decent plan?"

"I'm happy with it," Nabiki replied. Soun was looking thoughtful and the slightest bit apprehensive.

"Dad? Do you want to try it as well?"

He hesitated, glanced at Nodoka, who smiled mischievously at him, then eventually and a little reluctantly nodded. "I suppose I can hardly let my daughters try something I'm unwilling to attempt, it would be highly irresponsible," he announced in a firm voice. Everyone else stared at him, then looked at each other, before all of them smiled. He chuckled as Nabiki shook her head mockingly.

"Such a manly father you are, keeping us safe like that," she laughed.

Crossing his arms and looking proud, the Tendo head nodded firmly. "I'm glad you understand, dear."

Standing, Nabiki grinned at him, then looked at Miki and Kimiko. "Come on, guys, let's go and get some shopping done." Turning to Nodoka, she requested, "Can you tell Akane and the others about this afternoon, Auntie, and see if anyone else wants to come? Ukyo and Konatsu might like to try it as well."

"I'll pass the message on, dear, don't worry." The auburn-haired woman handed the younger one a list. "Here, this is what we need at the moment. It should do for lunch and dinner, I'll have to make a bigger list to restock for the rest of the week tomorrow."

Nabiki ran her eyes down the paper then folded it and tucked it into her pocket. "OK, Auntie, we'll see you later." As the three young women headed for the door, 'Chou' and Fumiko finished their tea and stood as well.

"Thank you for the tea, Nodoka," 'Chou' said with a polite bow of her head, getting a smile in response. "We have to get back to work as well, but we'll see you again later today."
"It was nice seeing you two once more," the older woman smiled. "Please remember to stop by whenever you're in the area."

"We will," Fumiko assured her as they followed the other three out. Nabiki waited at the front door, the two Sano sisters having stepped through, as the other two joined her, giving them both a secret smile which they reciprocated. All three leaving the house, she closed the door behind her, then walked down the path to the gate with the other beside her.

"It was nice to see you two again," her disguised sister told the two Sano women, who smiled at her, once they were outside the gate. "I'm glad you suffered no ill effects from your ordeal, Kimiko. Hopefully a little hang-gliding will help with any residual issues surrounding flying." She grinned as Kimiko started giggling.

"I suspect it will, as long as someone is there to catch me if it all goes wrong," the other woman giggled. "Is Azumi going to come?"

'Chou' smiled regretfully. "I suspect not, she's otherwise involved today, I'm afraid. But I'll pass your best wishes on to her." The blonde carefully didn't look at Nabiki who was smiling to herself internally.

"Thanks."

Both magical girls waved to the others, then bounded onto the roof of the house on the other side of the street, disappearing in seconds. Miki watched them go with a wide smile and a wondering shake of her head. "Wow. I wish I could do that!"

"I know you do, sis," Kimiko snickered, grinning at Nabiki. "I know you do."

Laughing, the trio headed into the centre of Furinkan, chatting about what to do next and enjoying the beautiful day.

---

Sitting at the small conference table, Martta studied the documents in front of her, then looked up. "So, Harry, you think you're a good fit for what could be a physically demanding and rather uncomfortable trip?"

The young man on the other side of the table swallowed a little nervously, glancing at Jerry beside her, who was quietly observing, content to watch how his colleague handled the interview. A medium height student of approximately twenty-four years of age, he was dark haired with a small neat beard and grey eyes. After a moment, he nodded, visibly telling himself to man up. "I do, Professor Laine. I'm in good condition, I jog at least eight to ten kilometres every day, swim for two hours a week, and try to eat a healthy diet. I'm an expert cross-country skier as well, not to mention I've been on some wilderness survival courses when I was in high school. I'm not too bothered by cold temperatures, I grew up in Edmonton, where it's damn cold in the winter and not exactly hot most summers."

Martta nodded, looking down at her notes and adding to them briefly. "I see. That's a decent résumé from that point of view. I have your academic records here, which also look promising. You've studied under both myself and Professor Benton, we don't need to go over that again obviously, and previous to your studies here you indicate a long term interest in ancient native cultures, specifically Arctic ones. Interesting." She flipped through her folder, checking a few facts again. "Not to mention you have a decent working knowledge of a number of remote sensing techniques, minored in Electrical Engineering, and you have good computer skills and research abilities." Looking up at him again she studied him for a few seconds.
"All of these are abilities we have need of and finding them in one person is helpful. So, on balance, I think we may well be able to find a place for you on this expedition." The young man smiled widely at this, relaxing noticeably.

"Thank you, Professor Laine. Very much." After a moment, he slightly hesitantly asked, "Can you tell me more about the expedition itself? The information I have so far is intriguing but a bit... vague."

Martta glanced at Jerry again, both of them smiling a little. "That was intentional, Mr Granger," the latter said with an amused look. "We are possibly going to make a discovery which could be truly incredible, based on information we received from an impeccable source. We don't want to be beaten to it as unlikely as that is, so we've kept the information quiet for the moment. You're the last of the team, assuming you accept, and you'll be required to sign a non disclosure agreement beforehand restricting you from mentioning anything you learn until either we publish our findings or six years has elapsed, whichever comes first. Any papers we publish as a result of research you are involved in you will receive joint credit for, which should help your career along nicely as well. Do you have any issues with any of this?"

The student sat and thought for a while, Martta and Jerry waiting patiently. Eventually he looked up. "I can't find out anything about this without signing the NDA?"

"I'm afraid not," Martta told him. He nodded slowly, still thinking. Eventually he sighed a little, although he was smiling.

"I have no choice, then. I'll never forgive myself if I walk away from this now."

She slid a set of stapled pages across the table to him, a pen on top, returning his smile.

"That's the attitude," she chuckled. Picking up the document he read it carefully, making her nod approvingly, then signed in the marked place on both copies. Handing it back he waited until she'd checked it, separated it into his copy and hers, then returned his copy to him.

"So, can I now learn what I've signed up for?" he asked, grinning.

"You can." Jerry looked at his watch for a moment. "The others should be waiting in the next room, so let's go and introduce you to them, shall we? We can go over the whole thing for everyone at once." All three stood, Jerry leading the way next door, where there was a larger table with a data projector on it pointing at a screen on the wall, and five other students ranging from early to late twenties, two female and three male.

"Thank you all for joining us, everyone, and giving up your Saturday," Jerry said, looking around at them, as Harry glanced about then took one of the remaining seats. Moving to the head of the table as Martta sat to one side, Jerry picked up a remote control for the projector and lights. "Let's make some quick introductions. You can all get to know each other later but I'd like to get this preliminary meeting started. OK, as you know, I'm Professor Jerry Benton, and my colleague and friend here is Professor Martta Laine. Our newest, and last, recruit is Mr Harry Granger, post graduate archaeology student." He indicated the young man, causing everyone to look curiously at him.

"We have in addition to Mr Granger, Miss Kimberly Vaughan, also post graduate archaeology student, Mr Carlos Shoults, likewise, Mr Park Yang, post graduate imaging techniques and information processing student, Mr Jan Hradil, post graduate palaeoanthropology student, and finally Miss Elisa de Boorder, post graduate archaeometallurgist. You all have excellent academic backgrounds and in addition to your primary qualifications all have skills that we may draw upon."
He looked around the table as the various younger people glanced at each other, then went back to listening. "Quite a team. We should be able to deal with the majority of possible finds, or at least know enough to know who else to bring aboard."

One of the two women, Elisa, a petite woman with light brown skin and green eyes below almost black hair, raised a hand. He nodded to her. "Yes, Miss de Boorder, you have a question?"

"I do, Professor." She cleared her throat momentarily. "What exactly are we expecting to find?"

He looked at her, then around at the others, before turning to Martta, who was smiling faintly. She made a motion indicating he could have the honours. Turning back to the group of curious students, he shrugged a little. "We're not exactly sure."

"Oh." She looked puzzled.

Taking pity on her, Jerry pressed a button on the remote, causing the projector to come on and the lights to dim, while he stepped to the side. A picture came up on the screen, showing a satellite view of a section of the upper coast of Northern Canada. "This is Ellesmere Island, in Nunavut, the third largest island in Canada." Pressing another button made the image change, a small red dot appearing on it. "This is Alert, which is the most northern inhabited place on the planet. It's primarily a military base, a hold over from the cold war for the most part, although it started life mainly as a weather station. It still performs that function as well as being a military communications installation along with a few other scientific operations."

He pressed the button again. "This area here is known as the Northern Ellesmere ice field, which is a series of glaciers as well as a large ice cap, going north all the way to the sea. Up until the early twentieth century there was a huge ice shelf extending into the ocean from the island but it's been steadily shrinking for nearly fifty years, there's apparently less than fifteen percent of it left now. Even so, the ice thickness across much of the northern coast can be as much as a kilometre."

Once again he changed images. "OK, this is where it gets interesting. This location, as far as we can narrow it down to, was the subject of a somewhat odd occurrence a few weeks ago. There is a network of environmental monitoring buoys running through this area, satellite linked to Alert. One of them detected a sudden drop in salinity, much greater than normal natural processes could account for, right here. The scientists in Alert ran diagnostics on the buoy and are confident it wasn't an artefact of the sensors, it was a real event. The duration and type of the salinity change is consistent with a very large quantity, possibly around a tenth of a cubic kilometre, of fresh water suddenly entering this small bay here over a period of approximately two days." He indicated a point on the projected image with the built-in laser pointer on the remote.

"The working theory is that a sub-glacial lake of considerable size rapidly drained into the bay for reasons currently unknown. It's apparently not a unique event although no one seems to have seen anything as large as this. There was a noticeable temperature spike of several degrees at the same time, which is additional evidence for this sort of phenomena."

Stopping for a moment and to take a drink from a water bottle, he watched as the students who had been listening carefully looked at each other. "It's very interesting from a scientific viewpoint I guess," Jan, a medium height and very skinny blond with dark brown eyes, commented in a voice that bore distinct traces of his native Czech accent, "but I'm not seeing the link to an archaeological expedition yet, Professor."

Smiling slightly, Jerry put the water bottle down. "Understandable, Mr Hradil. It's not obvious and I have to admit we're still not completely sure about it." He turned back to the screen, pressing a button. "A little more than ten days ago I received an email from a source that, after some background checks, turned out to be one of high integrity albeit a certain degree of mystery. The message indicated that there was an interesting archaeological find located under the ice of Ellesmere Island at this point here." Pressing the button made another spot appear, this one in bright yellow.

"The coordinates were very specific, localising the position to within fifty metres. Now, the interesting thing, the really interesting thing, is that if one looks at the suspected underlying topography of the area, there is very likely some sort of valley or depression here." The graphic changed to show the relevant data. "We're not a hundred percent sure since hardly anyone has ever been up there to that exact spot and it's under a hell of a lot of ice as well, but satellite radar data does seem to show the ground dips there, with a ridge either side."

He moved the laser across the image again. "This essentially forms a valley all the way to the sea, probably about here. What do you see?"

Kimberly was the first to say it. "That's the same bay as the salinity drop, within a kilometre of the buoy. And it looks like that yellow point is uphill from the bay by a few hundred metres." She looked fascinated, as did the others.

"Correct." Jerry grinned. "As crazy as it sounds on the face of it, there is a possibility that there is actually a void under the ice at the location my source suggested, one which was full of water until very recently, and which now may not be. This void may have something of interest to us in it, assuming we can get at it."

There was a long silence as he sat down, waiting for them to process the concept. Eventually Harry looked at him, having been studying the graphic with an expression which suggested he was thinking hard. "That's a very long way from anywhere we know of that has historically had inhabitants."

"Also correct," Martta told him, speaking for the first time. "Which is one of the very interesting things about it."

"How old is the ice sheet there?" the young man asked.

Jerry sighed a little. "That's something we're not sure about, to be honest. There seems to be something of a difference of opinion on the subject. It's unlikely to be less than approximately eight to ten thousand years, which would correspond to the Holocene Atlantic warming in the last interglacial period. The data we've studied suggests that much of Ellesmere Island might have been ice-free during this time. Before that, you'd probably have to go back to the late Pleistocene Eemian stage, which pushes it back to well over a hundred thousand years ago. Of course, that's far too far back to be particularly likely. Even ten thousand years is rather strange. We don't have any records of any civilisation or group that far north that long ago which could leave permanent traces we'd have much chance of locating after having a kilometre of ice sitting on them ever since."

The students were all looking thoughtful, Carlos, a slightly overweight Hispanic fellow with dark hair and eyes, was tapping his fingers on the table in a repetitive rhythm while he pondered the concept. "Are you sure it isn't either a hoax or a mistake?" he finally asked.

Jerry glanced at Martta, who looked back with a neutral expression. "It's one possibility, although if so someone has gone to the most ridiculous lengths I've ever heard of," he admitted. They looked curious, so he added, "The funding for this, which is... very substantial... seems to have come from the same source as the initial data. Not to mention that the source is highly respected by people who make a habit of being careful and checking things very thoroughly." He shrugged a little, again. "Until we actually go there and look we can't be completely sure, of course, but there is enough circumstantial evidence that together with the other information I'm fairly certain we'll find something. What, I'm not sure at all."

"Which is at least half the fun of it," Martta smiled, making them all chuckle.

"Exactly." He glanced at her with a grin. Turning back to them, he asked, "Any second thoughts from any of you?" They all exchanged looks, then one by one shook their heads.

"It sounds interesting," Harry said, "and the pay is good, not to mention that if we do find anything, it's going to be one of the most remarkable archaeological events in history."

"That's very true," Jerry nodded.

"Do you think there's any connection to the Twitch?" Kimberly looked curiously at Jerry, who blinked a little, then glanced at Martta. "I mean, from what the time scale you've indicated is it must have happened at nearly the same time. It just seems an odd coincidence to me."

There was a thoughtful silence in the room. Jerry flipped through his paperwork, then looked at a calendar for a moment. "You know, that never even crossed my mind," he replied slowly. "I can't see how it could possibly be connected, we don't even know what the cause of that event was, or even what it was, but I have to admit as far as I can see you have a point. They seem to have occurred within hours, a day at most, of each other as far as these reports show." They all looked at each other in silence again, intrigued expressions crossing each face.

"Weird." Carlos summed it up fairly well.

"Indeed." Martta nodded. "Although, in the grand scheme of things, probably not immediately important. An interesting coincidence though."

"I heard that the US government was going to make a statement on the cause of the Twitch sometime in a week or so," Elisa announced. "They've had teams of scientists looking into it since it happened, including NASA, and have discovered some interesting possible causes."

"Such as what?" Jan asked curiously. She shrugged a little.

"I have no idea yet. There's all sorts of weird theories going around on the internet but most of them are obviously ridiculous, like aliens, the CIA doing something crazy, or stuff like that." She grinned. "Even some people insisting it was magic."

Harry snickered. "Magic. That's a good one, I hadn't heard that theory."

"I'll email you a list of the funnier ones," she offered, smirking a bit. He nodded, grinning.

"Thanks."

"All right, we'll have time to mock conspiracy theorists later," Jerry put in, smiling slightly. "For now, any other questions on the expedition?"

"What's the plan for getting there?" Jan asked with interest. "That far north, it's not only going to be difficult, but the temperature is going to start dropping pretty fast soon and it will be dark for months."

"All true," the professor admitted. "It's too late in the season for a full expedition now, we're going to have to wait until around late April or early May to be able to do it properly. But, that said, we have a short window this year, up until the end of September, when the temperature is feasible and there's enough light to do a preliminary study. At least enough of one to see if there actually is anything there in the first place. In fact, it will be light twenty four hours a day which may help us.

Martta took up the explanation. "The plan is to fly up to Alert next week, where we'll be temporarily based. Contacts in the forces have generously agreed to help. They're going to arrange a C-130 to air-drop several fuel caches in the area along with some Arctic-grade inflatable shelters, food, and equipment, the sort of thing they use for training purposes. It's not luxurious but it's functional. Another contact managed to arrange the chartering of a Super Puma helicopter which we'll have access to for a month. The site is too far from Alert for the helicopter to be able to make a round trip without refuelling, which is what we need the fuel dumps for. There's no runway and the ice is probably too rough for the C-130 to land there so flying in by helicopter is about the only quick way to do it."

"We'll also be picking up a qualified medic with Arctic experience provided by our military contacts. He's also a trained mechanic, the sort of person it's always handy to have around in something like this. He comes highly recommended."

"The rest of the equipment we need we'll fly in at the same time we go, or just before. We've arranged to have the heavy stuff taken up in a C-130, but we're going by chartered aircraft," Jerry continued while they listened, looking mildly worried now. "The weather up there has been unusually good for some time, a few degrees warmer than normal, and the long range forecasts suggest it will be like that for at least three weeks after we get there. So, assuming all goes well, we should have time to do ground-penetrating radar scans of the whole place at least, which would show up anything under the ice. Assuming there is something there we then have the problem of how to actually get at it, which could be an issue."

Elisa was working something out in a notebook. "Professor, how long did you say the salinity drop lasted?" she asked without looking up from her notes.

"The best figure is about forty-nine hours, plus or minus roughly one," he told her, finding the relevant piece of documentation after a short search.

"In that case as far as I can work out there must be a tunnel something like twenty-five metres across leading from this possible void to the sea," she said slowly, looking up. "If we assume a volume of a tenth of a cubic kilometre of water as you mentioned, over a period of forty-eight hours as a reasonable estimate, that means it was flowing nearly six hundred cubic metres a second. That's an awful lot of water and it would need, or make, a pretty large hole."

Everyone looked at her, then each other, Carlos pulling out a notebook of his own and quickly running some calculations. "She's right, it would need a substantial opening to allow that much water to flow that quickly. So, theoretically, there should be a path all the way from the sea to the void, if there is one, which we should be able to use to get into it through."

"That would be a hell of a lot easier than digging through hundreds of metres of ice," Jerry mused, tapping his own pen on the notes he'd been making. Martta nodded.

"It's a good point. If there is a void, and such a tunnel, we might be able to actually get into it this year." Twisting around in her seat she inspected the image still on the screen. "Although assuming it goes all the way to the sea, it might actually come out under the ice shelf and we won't be able to get into it. Not to mention it's about a fifteen kilometre walk under the ice even if we can."

"It would be an interesting experience," Jerry chuckled. "OK, that's a very good observation, Miss de Boorder, thank you. It means we'll need to add some serious lighting, portable generators, and associated equipment to the list. Possibly another snowmobile as well. We planned on having two, but thinking about it three would be better. Each one can tow a sled with either two people or equipment on it." He made more notes. "Good."

"I would suggest we should take a certain amount of high explosives with us in case we need to make an entrance," Carlos said. Everyone looked at him, some of them a little worriedly. Jerry studied the young man, slowly nodding.

"I can see where that might come in handy. The only problem is that I have no idea how to safely handle explosives."

"I do," Carlos smiled, making the rest of them look surprised. "Blasting agents like water gel material at least. I grew up on a big farm, we used it quite a lot for clearing old tree stumps out of the way. I can make a list of what we need and where to get it. I still have a current purchase and possession permit for industrial explosives."

There was a pause of a few seconds while Jerry and Martta exchanged glances, the woman eventually nodding with a shrug. Jerry nodded as well, making more notes. "OK. Thanks. We can go into that in more detail tomorrow. I'd imagine that we'll need to liaise with our contact in Alert, the military will probably be a little uncomfortable about people bringing their own things that go bang, but assuming they're all right with it that seems like a good idea."

"Is it safe?" Park asked, apparently slightly nervous. Carlos looked at him and nodded, smiling.

"Pretty much, yes. The sort of stuff used these days is very insensitive, it will only go off if you use a detonator so the chances of an accidental explosion are very low assuming you follow sensible safety precautions. The detonators are the dangerous part, one of those can take your hand off, but again they're not likely to spontaneously go off. You just have to treat them with respect and make sure they're a long way from the main charge until you want to make a hole in something." The other student listened with interest, eventually nodding back to his compatriot.

"Thank you for the explanation," he replied politely.

Jerry made a few more notes while also listening to the student, thinking he did sound like he knew what he was talking about, then looked up when he finished. He said, "If we do find something, and it's big enough to make it all worthwhile, the longer term plan is to arrange to have an ice runway made, which will allow flights in and out much more easily. Prefab buildings can be installed quite fast from what we've found out so with a little luck we could have nearly four and a half months available next year." He inspected them all. "So is everyone on board with this?"

They all nodded, all of them looking excited. "Great. There's a lot more we need to go over but that can wait until Monday. We'll let you know the arrangements for travel within two days. There will be a two day Arctic survival course in Alert once we arrive, our contacts insisted on that, which is probably a good idea anyway. After that, the fuel and so on should be in place, so we'll fly out to the site immediately. Hopefully we can find something and this isn't the most over the top practical joke in history."

He grinned as everyone laughed for a moment. "Although that would be a story in its own right. OK, then, we'll be meeting again here on Monday at four, allow two hours to go into more detail on everything. We'll meet every day until we leave, so come up with as many questions as you can so we can work out the answers before we're stuck in the middle of the wilderness, all right?"

There was a chorus of affirmative answers, then the six students stood. "Remember, you can't discuss any of this with anyone outside this room," Martta warned. "Not a word to your friends or family. Just tell them you're going on a trip for a month, that's it. We'll be arranging for satellite phones so we can call out but that will be reserved for emergencies and short conversations only. Plan on being incommunicado for four weeks."

She watched as they filed out of the room, talking quietly to each other and getting to know their fellows. When the room was empty except for her and Jerry, she turned to her friend with a smile. "That went pretty well," he said, turning the projector off.

"I think so. They seem like a bright bunch, there were some good questions there. Assuming Miss de Boorder is right, which seems likely, we should have an interesting time. Presuming there really is something there in the first place."

"I sure hope there is or this will have been a complete waste of a lot of time and money," Jerry snickered. "Although I guess we at least get a nice Arctic vacation out of it whatever happens."

Giving him a hard look, she replied, "I wouldn't call wandering around on the wrong side of the Arctic circle even in summer a vacation, Jer. You know I don't like the cold."

Grinning, he packed his equipment away, then they headed back to their respective offices, good-naturedly arguing with each other on what constituted too cold for a vacation.

Twitching a little at the sudden sound, Shampoo reached out to find her phone, managing to pick it up after the fifth ring. Her hand disappeared back under the covers to where her head was. "Hello?" she mumbled, wincing.

"You sound terrible," Akane's voice said, itself sounding far too cheerful. "Did you drink too much last night?"

"Yes," she replied blearily. "I think so. When is it? Tomorrow yet?"

Her friend snickered. "Yes, it's tomorrow, about half past nine. What happened to that Amazon warrior constitution you're always going on about?"

"It went and drank half a crate of beer and then most of a bottle of rice wine, because of your father offering it," Shampoo hissed, flipping the covers back then closing her eyes again in the sudden pain caused by the sunlight instantly going for her with malice aforethought. "Now it wants to sleep it off for several more hours."

"You could ask Elder Cologne for that hangover cure she makes," Akane suggested somewhat maliciously.

"Oh, gods, no," Shampoo moaned. "Not that stuff. I'd rather be hung over, I think."

The Tendo woman was annoyingly unsympathetic, giggling at her again. "Go and drink a lot of water, then, that might help. Whatever you do, come over around two, OK? Chou and Fumiko were here earlier talking to Nabiki and the others who were awake and they invited us all to go back to Fwetna for some hang gliding like they were talking about last night. I'm not doing it without you doing it too, so be sure to come. Ask Mousse if he wants to try as well. They said swimming might be involved afterwards so make sure both of you use the special soap. I've already called Ukyo and Konatsu, they can't come because they're busy with something else for most of the afternoon."

"Oh, hell. OK, I guess," the Amazon mumbled, rolling onto her back and draping her free arm over her eyes. "Maybe Chou can fix this headache without that demon-juice of Great-Grandmother's."
"I'm sure she can," her friend assured her. "They can probably fix anything, a simple hangover should be no problem."

"Simple!?" Shampoo squawked in outrage, instantly regretting it as her head pounded sharply. "Simple?" she repeated, much more quietly the second time. "You try feeling like I do right now and tell me it's simple."

"Luckily, I can't do that," Akane replied with a more sympathetic-sounding laugh. "My head hurts a bit but not too badly. But then I said no to the rice wine, of course."

"I wish I had," the warrior muttered under her breath. Then, more loudly, she added, "OK, I'll come over, but right now I'm getting some more sleep first. See you later."

"Later, then." Akane hung up. Dropping the hand holding the phone to the bed with a groan, Shampoo massaged her eyes for a moment, then set an alarm for three hours time, rolled over, pulled her pillow over her head with a faint moan, and went back to sleep once more.

"Any news on the demonic duck?" Nabiki watched Kimiko discussing a dress in a shop near the centre of Furinkan with her sister, the younger Sano seeming rather taken by it. "Or at least the cause of it?"

"Some," 'Yori' sighed, the alter-ego of Ranma sounding a little irritated. "Aiko and I tracked it back to the car park near the police station, that big multi-story one. There are some weird magical traces around here, it's definitely where it came through from wherever it actually came from in the first place. It's not a portal, though, something a lot less common than that."

"I've found something up on the roof you need to see," Aiko put in, her voice over the com sounding puzzled.

"OK." There was a few seconds pause during which Nabiki began walking again, following the two Sano sisters as they all slowly headed back towards the Dojo, all three of them carrying bags of groceries. "Hmm. Interesting."

"What is it?" she asked curiously.

"Some peculiar variant of a summoning circle that someone who thinks they know a lot more about magic than they really do drew up here," her sister-in-law replied absentely, obviously thinking hard. There was another pause. "It's certainly how that thing got here, and it's probably got something to do with Chiyoko's little menaces as well in some way. The entire thing is saturated with her magical signature, but... not in a normal way."

'Yori's' voice in her head was definitely both a little confused and rather annoyed.

"Summoning circle?" she asked. "Is that like a portal?"

"Yes and no," was the answer, still in an absent tone. She could picture the other woman studying the thing in question closely. "They're a generally obsolete form of calling something from somewhere. No one is entirely sure where in many cases. Not a normal portal at all in that sense. Those are very predictable and reliable. Summoning circles are... well, unless you know exactly what you're doing, the things are potentially hideously dangerous. It's a little like a reverse teleportation, pulling something here from somewhere else, but with the minor problem that exactly where from can be a little... indeterminate. Some of the things that come through are just flat out weird even in our terms. And they can be extremely hostile."
"Not surprising if they're just yanked here without any warning," Aiko snickered. "I'd be pissed off myself if that happened."

"True enough and a fair point," 'Yori' replied with a small laugh. "That may well account for some of it, I guess. But even so what you can end up with is often not what you wanted. That's why they don't get used much nowadays anywhere, really. You need a hell of a lot of control and even more skill to use one successfully although if you actually can pull it off they can sometimes be useful. They have all sorts of limitations but at the same time you can do some interesting things that would be difficult otherwise without a lot more work. Unfortunately, you don't need a vast amount of power to drive one. Which leads to things like this, an amateur who gets lucky. Sort of."

"Could you use one?" Nabiki asked with some interest.

"I've got the control, certainly, and the power is no trouble, but I don't know enough about the things to risk trying it without a lot of research," the martial artist replied thoughtfully. "Kas could do it as well, but with the same problem. Neither of us have ever really looked into them past the point of learning what they are and why they're normally a bad idea. Cologne could definitely do it without much problem, I know that for a fact because she tried it on me years back." 'Yori' chuckled. "Luckily they're really easy to ward against and it was Happosai's first precaution. The ward system blocks that sort of thing completely for all of us. Come to think of it, he could probably pull one off as well, no matter what he says about not being a mage."

"But it's not the work of either of them, obviously." Nabiki was thinking hard.

"Nope. Happi's still enjoying himself wandering around the demon worlds somewhere, probably annoying the hell out of everyone he meets, and this certainly isn't Cologne's work." 'Yori' snickered. "I've spotted half a dozen errors in what I can still make out of the circle and at least half of it is unreadable. She wouldn't make any, that much I can say for sure. No, this is the work of someone who's managed to get hold of some instructions that he or she barely understands, then messed even that up, badly. Like I said, an amateur. One who is going to end up killing themselves or someone else if they keep trying this stuff."

Nabiki felt worried. That sounded potentially very bad. "Any idea who? Some local Neriman mage?"

"There aren't that many around here, Cologne's certainly the most powerful and experienced by far, although there are a few. None of the ones I know would mess it up like this either, though, even if they tried it. These are really basic errors. Spelling mistakes, if you'll allow me the pun."

Both Nabiki and Aiko groaned as their friend laughed again.

"I don't think this is the work of anyone who's a practising mage," she went on. "Or if it is they need a hell of a lot more practice. This is what someone with enough power to be dangerous but not enough knowledge or patience to be safe has tried for some reason. They got freakishly lucky, I think, and managed to make the thing resonate to Chiyoko's magic right when she just happened to turn up at the critical point. Without that it would never have even powered up. The signature under hers from whoever made the diagram is very faint, it's not that of someone particularly powerful."

The martial artist fell silent, apparently thinking it through. Nabiki did the same as they turned into the street leading to the Dojo, nodding to a comment that Miki made without really hearing it. "OK. It's a local, probably," she mused 'out loud' to her friends, "someone who thinks they know more than they do, has some power but not much, and is willing to try a spell they don't really understand. Which makes them, what, stupid? Or just very incautious."
"Probably the latter, whoever it was has made a lot of substitutions here which implies a certain amount of wit although a severe lack of common sense." 'Yori' sounded bemused. "Oregano?" she muttered more faintly, a note of incredulity in her voice.

"All right, intelligent but not careful or thoughtful." Nabiki thought some more.

Then she sighed.

"You know who it's probably going to be, don't you?" she asked almost rhetorically. The martial artist sighed as well, having apparently also worked out the identity of the most likely culprit.

"I'm afraid I do. Does he still live around here?"

"Yes, not too far away, with his parents. They moved a couple of years ago to a bigger apartment. I haven't seen him for a while but he turns up occasionally looking just as unhealthy as ever, usually talking total crap. Akane chases him off and that's the end of it for another six months." She snickered. "Sis doesn't like him much, but she's nothing like as annoyed with him as she is with Ryoga. She was almost polite the last time."

"Who are we talking about?" Aiko asked curiously.

"Hikaru Gosunkugi, would-be mage and generally irritating person," Nabiki sighed. "He was yet another one who was involved in all the Akane-chasing in school, although admittedly he was one of the less dangerous parts most of the time. He's... not harmless, based on what you guys have found, but not really malicious. And kind of creepy."

Laughing, Aiko replied, "This, coming from the woman whose alter-ego is the creepiest thing I've ever seen in my life!"

"Hey, Ms Aoyama is professionally creepy, I'll have you know," Nabiki retorted with an inner grin. "Gos is just... odd."

"I'll take your word for it," Aiko giggled.

"Good. Or she'll have to come and have a... discussion." The middle Tendo sniggered darkly.

"Ranma, help, I'm being oppressed!" Aiko sounded like she was laughing hard enough to be at risk of falling over.

'Yori' chuckled, obviously amused. "You brought it on yourself, Aiko. I'm not getting between Ms Aoyama and someone she's peeved with. That could be bad."

"Thanks a bunch," the other woman laughed. After a moment, more soberly, she asked, "So what do we do about all this?"

"We can't risk something like this happening again, that's certain," 'Yori' replied slowly. "To be fair I doubt this was what he intended, assuming it actually was him, which seems likely. Nabiki's right, he's not an evil person, just a bit overenthusiastic. But we're going to have to impress on him how dangerous what he did was in a way that makes it stick. And confiscate whatever documentation he has on the whole subject to make sure he can't do it again if it doesn't stick. Next time we might not get so lucky."

"A visit from the creepy one, then?" Aiko suggested.

"That's one method, certainly," 'Yori' replied with a musing tone to her voice. "But it's not quite there. Let me think about it. In the mean time, we'll go and find the guy and check his magical signature to be sure it really was him. I'm about ninety percent sure it was, but I want to be certain."

"OK. Let me know if you need me." Nabiki and the others were nearly at the gate now. "Still up for flying later?"

"Oh, definitely, I wouldn't miss that," the martial artist assured her. "Flying with our own wings is better but those gliders are still fun. We'll finish up here, then get back and talk to the others about a few things. I've asked Ami and Rei to cover for us just in case, they can call if anything goes to hell, but hopefully it won't."

"We're going to have to take them all to Fwetna soon, you know," Nabiki said.

"I think so too, they deserve to see it and also to meet Uthryyl, but for the moment let's concentrate on the immediate issues." 'Yori' sighed slightly. "At least Kas managed to find two of the tail sections that you blew off that damn thing and retrieve them. The other one probably fell in the river and washed away as far as we can work out. We're going to give one to the PSIA to look at while she investigates the other one."

"Do they collect parts of aliens, then?" Nabiki found the idea amusing for some reason, picturing some buried and dimly lit room full of specimens floating in eerily lit jars.

'Yori' managed to project a grin with her voice. "More or less, yes. They've got little bits of dead demons frozen in the research department, which have shown some interesting things over the years, but it's never been a very significant part of their work. They just like to keep an eye on what's going on. Understandable, really."

"True. OK, we're back now, so I'll talk later."

"See you, Nabs," the martial artist commented, immediately disconnecting before she could reply. She sighed faintly.

"I'll kick him for you," Aiko snickered. "See you later."

"Thanks. Bye." The link went dead, as she pushed the gate open and went inside with Kimiko and Miki.

Hikaru stumbled slightly as he tripped over something, looking back to see what it was and not being able to make anything out. Suddenly walking into someone he let out a grunt, feeling the unknown person grab him and stop him falling over as he recoiled. "Hey, kid, you alright?" a deep voice said.

He turned his head and looked up. And up.

'Holy crap, this guy is huge!' he thought in shock, staring at the large man who could easily have made three of him, most of it looking to be muscle wrapped in a nice suit. Momentarily panicking as he wondered if he'd managed to bump into a Yakuza enforcer, he relaxed a little when the man grinned slightly.

"Don't look so worried, kid, I'm fine." The man released his shoulders and brushed him down briefly. "See? No problems."

"I'm sorry, Sir, I wasn't watching where I was going," he mumbled.
The large man smiled more widely. "That's OK. Everyone makes mistakes sometimes. And I'm Shin, not Sir."

Hikaru made a small polite bow of respect, which the man mirrored. "Hikaru, then. I'm very sorry about causing you any trouble."

"Never mind, no harm done," Shin assured him. Glancing at his watch he frowned slightly. "Anyway, I'm late, so I have to get going. Try not to fall over, OK?" Chuckling at Hikaru's wry smile, the man left about his business, soon disappearing around the next corner. Hikaru watched him go, sighed in slight relief that nothing worse had happened, then headed off himself to look for more magical texts. There was a shop he'd heard about that might be a good place to check out, assuming it was open.

He had four kilos of the best coffee beans he could afford in his backpack and he was ready for anything.

Aiko watched with a grin as the young man walked off, then turned at the sound of the door behind her that gave roof access to the three story building opening, admitting the very same large man who Gosunkugi had somehow mysteriously managed to stumble into. 'Shin' grinned back at her as he approached, shimmering into the form of 'Yori' mid-step. The black-haired girl stopped next to her friend, both of them watching as Gosunkugi got on a bus.

"Is it him?" Aiko asked.

"Definitely. His magical signature was the one associated with the diagram." 'Yori' stretched with a grunt, flexing her shoulders. "We'll have to come up with something... interesting... for dear old Gos."

The brunette next to her chuckled. "Do you have any ideas?"

A certain amount of amusement was radiating from 'Yori'. "As it happens, I do. I think I might have to ask Cologne for a small favour. It can wait until later, but it should work pretty well, I think."

Aiko looked surprised, then started laughing as her friend explained. Soon afterwards a bright flash made a few pedestrians on the street below look up curiously, although nothing was now visible on the roof.

Smiling to himself, Soun watched his daughters talking and laughing with their friends in the back garden, Nodoka and Genma sitting to one side drinking tea and discussing something in low voices. After a moment, he sighed slightly, drew himself up firmly, then walked out into the sunlight, stopping next Nabiki who looked up at him when he put his hand gently on her shoulder. "Dear, could I have a word with you, please?" he requested quietly. She met his eyes, then nodded without a word, apparently picking up on his mood. As she stood her friends watched, an expression of mild worry going across the face of Miki, causing Nabiki to smile at her reassuringly.

"Akane, can you come as well?" he added, glancing at the youngest Tendo who had turned to look at both her sister and her father. The younger woman gazed at him for a long moment, then looked at her older sister, before also standing. Shampoo watched this with a sombre look, obviously realising there was something going on, but said nothing.

Leading both daughters back into the house, Soun headed for his room, hearing them follow him up the stairs and towards the front of the house. Opening the door he waited until both had entered before going into the room himself and closing the door behind them. Nabiki and Akane exchanged glances, turning back to him curiously. The older sister raised an eyebrow quizzically, her expression one of calmness which he knew well hid a very sharp mind. Akane was looking more visibly concerned, glancing between her father and her older sister while biting the corner of her lower lip slightly.

"Is there a problem, Dad?" the youngest Tendo asked, worry in her voice.

He shook his head, smiling at them both, then stepped forward, putting his hands on one shoulder of each, before pulling them into a brief three-way hug. "Not any more," he replied, releasing them. "There was, but it's been fixed. But..." He sighed as they exchanged glances again. "I was trying to think of a way to tell you and couldn't, until I got some good advice from a friend." After a few seconds, he waved at the bed, then sat on it, the two young women sitting on either side of him. Putting his arms around their shoulders, he smiled at Nabiki, then Akane.

"You know I love you both more than anything, don't you?" he asked. They grinned at him, Nabiki raising an eyebrow again, this time more from amusement. "And I'm incredibly proud of you as well, you're both going to go places and achieve things far past anything I have ever managed."

"Thanks, Dad," the older sister said, pleased. Akane mumbled something slightly unclear but which seemed to be much the same in sentiment, looking embarrassed. He hugged them again to his sides.

"So, what's the problem?" Nabiki asked curiously, before correcting herself with a chuckle. "Or, rather, what was the problem?"

After another long pause while he tried to think of the best way to put it, he began.

"A few weeks ago, I went to the doctor. I had a nasty cough that wouldn't go away..."

They sat in silence as he talked for some time.

"Hi, guys," a by-now familiar voice sounded from the right, next to the house, making Miki and everyone else look over and up to see Yori grinning at them from on top of the garden wall, Tamiko and Misaki standing next to her. The three magical girls dropped lightly to the lawn and walked over to the small group standing there. "How are you all after yesterday? Good party, wasn't it?" The black-haired young woman seemed in a very good mood.

"It was... somewhat more exciting than we'd planned," Nodoka noted dryly, making the other woman snicker, shrugging a little in a 'what can you do?' manner. Miki laughed to herself, attracting a smile her way from Yori. Misaki hid a small grin of her own while Tamiko sighed a little then also smiled.

"These things happen, Nodoka," Yori consoled the auburn-haired woman, who looked mildly amused.

"So Nabiki said as well. It's true but somewhat irritating at times," the Saotome matriarch admitted. "Nerima can be a strange place."

"So can Minato," Tamiko giggled. "You wouldn't believe some of the things that happen there sometimes."

"Quite likely not," Nodoka admitted, smiling more widely. "Although some of the adventures that the various people of this household have become entangled in over the years might give your experiences a run for their money."

"I've heard about some of those," Tamiko admitted, grinning. "Why don't we just agree that both Nerima and Minato are nuts and leave it at that?"

"Acceptable," the older red-head chuckled. She looked over at Yori and Misaki who were listening with amused expressions. "Did you succeed in working out what the cause of all the excitement yesterday was, dear?"

Yori frowned a little as everyone looked at her. "I have a pretty good idea, yes. Someone who did something a bit stupid. We're going to have to have a chat soon, I think." She rubbed her hands together and grinned darkly, snickering in an unnerving manner. "I'm looking forward to it."

"I assume the person in question won't be?" Kimiko asked. Yori smirked at her.

"Not as such, no," she smiled.

"Good. I may be OK, but whoever sicced that damn duck thing on me needs a good kicking." Miki and Hana exchanged a glance then studied their younger sister, who sounded somewhat peeved. Misaki laughed out loud, looking at her friends who were now both smirking.

"I think that can be arranged," the tall girl commented idly, snacking on an apple that had appeared in her hand. Beside her, Tamiko held out her own hand without a word, receiving another apple in return, which she bit into with a loud crunch.

Looking around the assembled people again, Yori asked, "So, who's coming gliding in another reality?"

Miki laughed loudly, holding up her hand, then grabbing John's and holding it up as well with her free one. Hana and Kimiko also put their hands up. Sighing a little and wincing at the sound, Shampoo put hers up too. Her other one went to her head, making Yori grin at her.

"Drank too much, hmm?"

"Yes," the Amazon muttered, adjusting the sunglasses she was wearing to block out the bright light of day.

"Here, let me sort that out for you," the violet eyed woman snickered, walking over and putting her hand on Shampoo's head, a purple glow appearing for a second. The Amazon's face relaxed immediately.

"Oh, thank the gods," she sighed in relief. "That's so much better."

Removing her hand Yori smiled. "No problem. Drink some more water, though, you're still dehydrated."

"Thank you," Shampoo replied, taking her sunglasses off and blinking a bit at the bright day. "The only other options were waiting for hours, or taking the horrible stuff Great-Grandmother makes. It works, but..." She shuddered hard. "It's... not nice."

Yori grinned at her. "I can imagine, I know a little about some of the ancient Amazon cures and I can see they're probably a bit... harsh."

"That's putting it mildly," Shampoo muttered, making several people laugh a little, it was obvious from her expression that she was speaking from bitter past experience. After a moment she added more loudly, "She asked me to pass on her regrets but that she feels she's past the point of flying in some little toy airplane, although she appreciates the invitation." Yori looked amused, nodding her understanding.

"Fair enough, but if the Elder is actually genuinely past anything I'll eat my own boots." Shampoo started giggling at the idea.

"Are any more of your group going?" Genma asked curiously, looking at the three magical girls. Tamiko turned to him, nodding.

"Yes, everyone is coming. Chou and the others will meet us there. They're leaving a portal open to Minato so we can go back instantly if something happens, we've got some friends covering for us for a few hours but if anything kicks off we'll need to get back to help. Hopefully that won't happen, but..." She shrugged with a smile and a sigh, making the rotund martial artist nod wisely.

"I understand. Your life is even more fraught with peril than that of a normal martial artist."

Yori started chuckling, as did Misaki, Tamiko grinning over her shoulder at them both before looking back to Genma. "Wise words indeed. Well put, Genma." He nodded with a satisfied smile, making Nodoka look at him and shake her head a little while sighing very faintly.

"Where are Nabiki and Akane?" Misaki asked after a moment, taking a seat next to Miki. She produced a bottle of water and unscrewed the top, sipping it, then as an afterthought tossed another one to Shampoo who caught it with murmured thanks before draining it thirstily.

"Their father took them inside about twenty minutes ago to tell them something," the Sano sister replied, suddenly brought back to thinking of her friend. She frowned a little. "It seemed serious, but hopefully it's nothing too bad."

Seconds later, Akane shot out of the house, dashed across the grass, then grabbed a rather startled looking Yori hard enough that Miki was pretty sure a normal person would have ended up with broken ribs at least. Somewhat to her shock the youngest Tendo had tears in her eyes.

"Thank you so so much," Akane almost whispered, holding Yori like she was a life preserver in stormy seas. "Both you and Chou. Why are you so nice? We don't deserve everything you've both done for us."

Miki stared at this, as did most of the others, then turned to look at the house out of which Soun and Nabiki were coming, considerably more slowly. Nabiki had a thoughtful expression while Soun was smiling in an odd but loving way at his youngest daughter. Returning her attention to Akane and Yori, Miki watched as the latter raised her arms and returned the embrace for a moment, before gently removing the Tendo girl from her.

"Of course you do, Akane, you're all decent people." The young woman glanced at Genma with an eyebrow up, then at Nodoka, who for some reason raised a hand to cover her mouth, then looked back at Akane who was still staring at her. "We fix things. That's our main purpose, when we can. We can't do it all the time, obviously, but we do our best, and Soun was pretty easy compared to some stuff we've dealt with."

Stepping back having released the magical girl Akane wiped tears from her eyes with a quick motion of one hand, looking quickly at her older sister who had come to stand beside her. "Sorry," she muttered. Nabiki chuckled a little, putting her hand on her sister's shoulder.

"It's understandable, sis," she replied with good humour. Looking at Yori, she bowed formally.
"Thank you very much indeed," she added. "I'm proud to call you a friend."

Yori peered at her in a manner that seemed full of humour, then bowed back.

"And I, we all really, feel the same way about all of you, and you're welcome." Both women straightened up and exchanged small grins.

"What on earth brought all this about, girls?" Nodoka asked, fairly calmly, but still apparently extremely interested in the answer. The assembled people all looked at her, then back at Akane, who was now going pink from embarrassment as she apparently realised how abruptly she'd managed to interrupt the rest of them.

"Allow me to explain," Soun put in, appearing to find the entire thing somewhat funny. He moved to sit in a chair next to Genma, who handed him a cup of tea without saying anything although leaning forward with a curious look. "Yesterday, during the party, I approached Yori with a... rather annoying medical problem. She and Chou were good enough to help and skilled enough to be able to help. They fixed the problem and I'm fine now. For which, as I told them both at the time, I owe them anything in my power to give."

Yori now looked slightly embarrassed, which was an odd expression on her face, not really fitting somehow. "It wasn't that big a deal, Soun, we do that sort of thing all the time. To more or less anyone who needs it and will hold still long enough."

He chuckled, his moustache lifting a little as he smiled.

"It may be trivial to you, my dear girl, but I assure you it isn't to those of us without such abilities." She shrugged slightly, smiling.

"What was the problem, if you don't mind me asking, old friend?" Genma queried after a moment or two. Soun looked at him, then sipped his tea with appreciation, while everyone waited for him to speak, leaning forward in their seats.

"Terminal lung cancer," he replied quietly. Miki froze in horror, before looking quickly around and meeting similar emotions in the eyes of almost everyone else present. Genma looked like someone had just disembowelled his first-born in front of him for several seconds. Nodoka nearly fainted, gasping and going pale.

"Oh, shit," John muttered, holding Miki's hand tightly.

"I'm fine now, though," the elder Tendo continued, smiling at them with a level of happiness Miki could well understand. "The two young ladies fixed everything and I'm assured I'm now in perfect health. They even fixed the nicotine addiction as well so I'm not craving a smoke for the first time in twenty years or more."

"Oh, thank god," Nodoka whispered. Colour was coming back into her cheeks. "Why didn't you tell us, Soun? How long have you known?"

"I was diagnosed about six or seven weeks ago, and I didn't want to worry anyone until I knew exactly what I was going to do," he replied calmly. "The doctor wanted to start me on very aggressive chemotherapy immediately but after I read the documentation it sounded almost worse than the alternative. Luckily, while I was thinking it over, it occurred to me to ask our friends here, and..." He waved a hand at Yori who was listening with an interested and sympathetic expression. "If they had turned out to be unable to help, I would have started the treatment in all probability, but as it turns out it's unnecessary. The poor doctor is going to be very confused when I go in for "Next time, if there is one, Soun, call us in earlier, will you?" Yori asked with a smile. "Like I told you, we don't mind at all." She looked around at the others. "That goes for all of you. If you need us, get in touch, and we'll help however we can."

"Because it's a calling?" Kimiko asked with a weird little smile, causing the magical girl and both her own sisters to look at her for a moment. Miki noticed Nabiki was smirking slightly. Yori, for some reason, glanced at the older Tendo sister with a smirk of her own before nodding.

"You could say that, yes," she chuckled.

Laughing a little Kimiko raised her drink in a salute to the black-haired girl who returned it lazily with two fingers to her brow, before hopping to her feet energetically. "Enough doom and gloom over something that didn't happen," she announced happily. "Let's go and have some fun."

"Mousse isn't here yet," Shampoo put in, frowning a little as she looked at her watch. "He was helping Great-Grandmother with something but he said he'd be here by ten past."

"He's thirty seconds out and closing fast," Tamiko told her with a grin. She looked surprised, then very curious. The red-head tapped the side of her nose. "Trade secret."

Giggling, Shampoo began counting under her breath, just loud enough for Miki to hear. As she reached twenty-five, Mousse hopped over the garden wall, then looked puzzled when everyone started laughing.

"What?" he asked, walking over. Shampoo giggled again and just shook her head.

"You're weird," the Amazon mumbled, turning to look at Yori who was obviously finding this all funny. "Sorry I'm late."

"No problem," the woman smiled. A portal crackled open beside her. Waving at it, she added, "If you want to bring swimming gear there's a nice lake as well."

Most of the people present held up towels, smiling at her. "Chou already said that," Akane laughed.

"Great. OK, then, let's go. Don't be worried about the people there. Like I explained last night, the D'Sage are very nice friendly people and not hostile in any way. You may also see various people from other species than the D'Sage, they get quite a few visitors, so don't overreact, please. None of them will be human but all of them are people." Yori smiled reassuringly at them all as a few of those gathered looked slightly worried. Miki took a deep breath, stood, then headed towards the portal with determination, glancing sideways at Nabiki who joined her, a small bag slung over her shoulder.

"Should be fun, right?" she asked. The Tendo woman grinned.

"I'll be disappointed if it's not."

Sharing another look, they stepped through the portal together, the rest of the small party following behind.

Looking around at the well-remembered scene of the lake, Nabiki smiled to herself, glad to visit again, then turned to see the reactions of the others. There had been dead silence behind her for the last few minutes, only broken by the natural sounds, and the cries of excitement from a group of young D'Sage who were messing about in the water fifty metres away apparently having a lot of fun.

She saw that Miki was slowly turning in a complete circle, her mouth hanging open in a somewhat funny manner, inspecting everything with an expression that was gradually turning from surprise to pure joy. Beyond her, Akane and Shampoo were doing much the same, while Hana was simply staring steadily at the lake and the dozens of users of it who were wandering around enjoying themselves. Kimiko seemed stunned, looking at each of them in turn, then going back to watching the surroundings.

Mousse was constantly pushing his glasses up his nose as his head flicked about. Next to him, Soun was smiling to himself, while Genma and Nodoka who had trailed along out of curiosity were staring wide-eyed.

'Yori' and her companions were off to one side, watching the reactions with broad grins. She caught the eye of the martial artist and smirked a little, getting a look in return that made her giggle inside.

A couple of D'Sage walked past having landed and parked their vehicle a little distance away, nodding politely to the group of humans then going on their way without comment. Most of the Neriman visitors stared in shock. Nabiki quickly put a surprised expression on her face but noticed that Kimiko who had been watching her at that moment looked amused under her own, more genuine, amazement.

Another portal opened next to the one 'Yori' had produced, 'Chou', Fumiko, and Aiko popping out of it and looking around for a moment smiling before heading over. "Hello, everyone," the blonde said, stopping beside 'Yori' who greeted her with a hand on her shoulder for a moment. "How are you all finding Fwetna this time?" Behind them the portal to Nerima expired with the usual pop.

"It's fantastic," Hana breathed, looking around. Beside her Kimiko was now squinting at the dual suns, her hand shading her eyes, with a smile on her face. "Like something out of a really good science fiction movie only real."

"It's a nice place," Tamiko grinned. She pointed to the edge of the crater wall, over the low rise leading up from the lake. In the distance, what Nabiki knew was a couple of thousand metres from the edge out in free air, half a dozen gliders could be seen looping and diving. "The flying happens over there. That's the edge of the cliff which is even taller than at the falls." She chuckled when Akane went pale at the thought. "No wall, either."

Finding her sister's expression quite funny, Nabiki looked up at the gliders again. Jun helpfully tagged each of them with owners IDs, one of which was blue while the others were green. She studied this one, seeing it was apparently Onkra. 'Thanks, Jun,' she told the device.

#You're welcome, as always, Nabiki,# it replied calmly.

"Is that you up there, Onkra?" she broadcast to her friend. The glider turned towards them, coming closer fairly fast.

"Yep. How are you today? Ready for some flying that doesn't involve attacking giant demons and rescuing friends?" the D'Sage woman responded, sounding pleased to see her. Nabiki noticed that there were a pair of familiar shapes accompanying the glider in formation, the little arrowhead of fliers steadily approaching.
"I am, actually," she snickered. "That was pretty bizarre all things considered."

"Ranma sent us some recordings of it. It looked really impressive from the ground. I'd love to see it from your point of view."

"I can do that," the middle Tendo laughed, quickly putting together a set of files from her own viewpoint and that of the drone she'd used, sending them to her friend. "Are your father and mother here as well?"

"Dad's around somewhere, he was swimming a little earlier," Onkra replied. "Mom's away on business in Krentak for a day or so. She said to say hi to you all."

By now several of the others had noticed the glider and soarer heading their way, now only a kilometre out and descending rapidly. Miki pointed and asked, "What's that?"

"One of the locals with her glider," 'Yori' told her, joining her and Nabiki to watch as the flying machine approached. "You'll like her, she's a good friend. Onkra, the daughter of Uthryyl, a major trader and an old friend of mine. The other two are the soarers from last night. So you've met them before." She smiled as Miki looked amused.

Onkra soared overhead only fifty metres up, looking very pleased, then pulled up hard, stall turned, and glided to a neat landing fairly close to the group. The soarers circled overhead, not at the moment showing any particular inclination to land, although everyone could hear them yipping at each other. Slightly relieved as she was still wondering what she would say if the things mobbed her, Nabiki watched them for a moment, then followed as everyone headed after 'Yori' who was going to meet Onkra. The D'Sage woman was disconnecting herself from the glider, nodding her thanks when the martial artist reached her and helped.

They all stopped at a polite distance, watching as Onkra quickly made the glider fold up into a long bundle which she put on the ground. Turning to them she studied them closely, before leaning sideways a little towards 'Yori' and whispering loudly, in perfect Japanese and with her hand in front of her mouth, "Why are they all looking at me like that? Aliens are weird." Nabiki could easily see she was very amused. Her ears were up like a hunting dog, making a mental picture that nearly had the Tendo sister giggling.

'Yori' grinned and replied in a similar manner, "I have no idea. Some people are just a little strange. Try not to make any sudden moves and you're probably safe."

Akane suddenly collapsed laughing, breaking the minor tension that had arisen, the others all relaxing and grinning. Shampoo sighed heavily, poking her friend with her foot which didn't actually help. "Stop that, you're embarrassing us," she hissed. Akane just waved a hand weakly at Onkra and 'Yori' and kept laughing.

"This... this..." she managed to gasp out, "this is completely insane. Why have our lives gone so sideways recently?" Peering up at Onkra, who was looking down at her with an easily recognisable expression of dubious interest despite her non-human features, she fell over laughing again.

Onkra turned to 'Yori', who shrugged. Shaking her head, the D'Sage woman carefully skirted the still giggling Akane, walking over to stand in front of the others, who were looking mildly confused. Except for Shampoo who was pinching the bridge of her nose and kicking Akane gently but repeatedly in a vain attempt to get her to stop laughing.

"Hello," she said politely, giving a small bow of respect, her tail curving up behind her. "I'm Onkra. Yori and the others have told me quite a bit about all of you recently. Welcome to Fwetna."
After a moment of silence, Soun glanced at his friends and family, then stepped forward, responding to her bow with one of his own. "Thank you on behalf of all of us, Onkra. Don't mind my youngest daughter, there's clearly something amiss with her in some way. Possibly stress from recent events." He frowned slightly at Akane, who looked momentarily a little annoyed before the absurdity of the entire situation started her giggling again. Shampoo sighed audibly, shaking her head sadly.

"Ah, yes, some sort of job interview as I understand," Onkra replied, also looking at Akane. "From what Yori told me it went well."

"It did indeed, thank you." Soun looked a little surprised that the D'Sage woman was so well informed, yet pleased by her comments. "Pardon me if I'm being rude, but I have to compliment you on your Japanese. It's very good indeed."

She made her own version of a smile, nodding to him. "Thank you." Looking around at the others, who were still apparently a little taken aback by their first encounter with a friendly 'demon', she waved to the end of the lake. "If you guys want to come with me, I'll introduce you to my friend Jyrron, who has a number of gliders set up for you all." Returning to her own she picked it up and put it over her shoulder, then headed in that direction, 'Yori' beside her and the others following along in a ragged group, looking around with interest and slowly diminishing shock.

When they crested the rise blocking the view of the valley floor, each of them stopped dead and stared in amazement, even the ones who had seen it the night before. Hana started laughing softly to herself, pulling out her camera and taking pictures one after another. Nabiki watched the expressions on her family and friends with pleasure, this was something she'd wanted to show them since she'd first seen it, and hadn't thought it would become possible so soon. Casting a quick look at 'Chou' she saw her hidden elder sister was watching as well, smiling a little to herself. The blonde caught her eye and smiled more widely for a moment.

"It's absolutely fantastic," Nodoka breathed, looking from one side of the vista to the other, then peering at the distant towers of Krentak for some seconds. "I still can't get over how beautiful it is."

"We like it," Onkra laughed. "I've travelled quite a lot and I have to admit home is still one of the nicest places I've been. But I expect most people would say that in the end." She waited for another thirty seconds or so, then pointed to a group of people and brightly coloured flying machines a hundred metres away, off to the side and down the slope although at a safe distance from the edge. "That's Jyrron and the others over there."

They resumed walking, watching as someone trotted down the slope and took off, the glider soaring out over the incredible drop then rapidly gaining altitude from the updraft at the edge. Shortly it was several hundred metres up and circling slowly.

"Wow," Miki muttered to herself, next to Nabiki, who looked at her and grinned. "That looks... terrifying."

"But a lot of fun," the middle Tendo replied happily.

"I guess," her friend said slowly. "But still terrifying. That might take some time to get over."

"I'm sure when you're hanging in the air a few kilometres up you'll just start to enjoy it," Nabiki snickered, getting a slightly wild-eyed and not entirely happy look back.

"Thanks for that image. Now I'm really terrified," Miki quavered. Putting her arm over her friend's shoulders, Nabiki chuckled.

"Come on, it'll be fine. Yori says these things are essentially uncrashable, and if you can't trust a magical girl, who can you trust?"

Behind them, Fumiko started giggling, making her look over her shoulder for a moment with a wry grin at the taller woman. "What? A lot of people probably think that way."

"True," the other woman grinned. "Still weird to hear someone say it like that, though."

Miki took a deep breath and put an obviously deliberate smile on her face. "You're right. Once in a lifetime opportunity and all that. Let's go and have some fun."

Squeezing her for a moment, Nabiki let go. "That's the spirit. I'm looking forward to this."

"Yes, but everyone knows you're just crazy, Nabiki," Miki giggled.

Shrugging, the Tendo sister accepted this as self-evident, making her friend laugh harder for a moment, then followed as she headed over to the gliders with the others. Having introduced them to Jyrron, and interpreted for him as he didn't speak Japanese or have the advantage of the translation spell, Onkra picked up something from a container on the ground, showing it to them and revealing it was a pair of odd-looking goggles.

"Yori ordered these after the last time they were here, they were finished a few days ago. Obviously our own heads aren't the same shape as your species has, so the standard ones we use won't fit. For non-magical-girl people, that's something of a problem, so these were custom-made for your species." Everyone looked at the black-haired girl, who shrugged a little with a grin.

"Azumi was considering importing the gliders to our world at some point, which would need the right headgear anyway, and I was thinking of getting a few for friends as well. Uthryyl knew someone who could do the redesign easily and got me a good deal for it."

Handing out goggles to everyone, Onkra waited while they investigated them, then explained the control system and the basic flight controls while Jyrron and a couple of his friends rigged several gliders, reprogramming the control system in the same way as when Nabiki had first tried them to compensate for the lack of a tail on the part of the pilot. Shortly they were ready, the three D'Sage stepping back having tested everything. "So, who's first?" Onkra asked brightly.

There was a long pause. Miki nudged Nabiki in the ribs, causing the middle Tendo to grin, then step forward. "I'll give it a try as long as Akane comes as well," she announced, which made her sister glare at her for a second.

"Oh, thanks, 'Biki," she muttered. More loudly, she added, "Shampoo has to come in that case as well." The Amazon looked somewhat taken aback but eventually, when her friend stared hard at her, nodded.

"Try not to make it look too easy, Nabiki," Onkra sent with a silent laugh. "They might get suspicious."

"Don't worry, I can make mistakes with the best of them," the brunette replied. "I'll try not to crash too much, though."

"Good idea." Her friend sounded amused. "We've dialled the sensitivity of the controls down a lot for the first run. We can adjust them when everyone gets to grips with it."
Nabiki remembered her first flight, thinking this was a good idea. I can monitor your sister and the others and adjust the control gains appropriately as they become used to them, Nabiki, Jun put in helpfully. It's not difficult.

'Thanks, Jun,' she told it with an inner smile.

Stepping forward she allowed Onkra to use her as a model to explain how to attach the glider and how the controls worked. "It's very easy, the computer will do most of the work at first, and as you get used to it will allow you more and more control. If everything goes completely wrong the anti-grav recovery system will make a safe descent but that's very unlikely to happen. If you try anything dangerous or that might cause other problems the computer will take over, even to the point of auto-landing, so you'll basically find it essentially impossible to crash. They're all set to teaching mode which will get you flying pretty fast, it's not difficult at all. As soon as you're at a safe altitude the controls will unlock and you're flying."

Pulling the goggles down over her eyes Nabiki looked at the display with curious interest, then had Jun disable it in favour of her own overlays which were better and more familiar. "OK, I'm ready," she announced. Her family and friends watched as she stood and allowed Jyrron and Onkra to steady the wingtips, orienting the glider into the wind coming up the slope, then began running down it. As had happened the first time, she was rapidly lifted into the air, swinging her legs back and locking them in place, before soaring past the edge of the cliff and out into empty air.

Even with her recent experiences it was a heady experience, the way the ground dropped away so suddenly to such a great distance was truly remarkable. Grinning she waited while the computer circled her around in a slowly ascending spiral, laughing with delight. I almost forgot how much fun these things are, she commented to her SI.

More entertaining than flying under your own power? It queried with interest. She thought for a moment.

'No, not really, that's still one of the most incredible feelings I can think of, but this is a pretty close second. Hopefully the others will like it too.' She looked back and to her left to see the small group in the distance, several hundred metres away and down by now.

A moment later, she heard the voice of Akane, sounding a little tentative as she used the comms system built into the flight goggles. "Can you hear me, Nabiki?" her sister asked breathlessly. As the computer relinquished control to her the Tendo sister circled about so she was looking directly at the cliff-side. She added a few deliberate over-corrections so it appeared she was experimenting.

"Yes, perfectly," she replied with a chuckle. "What did it look like from down there?"

"Amazing," the other woman replied, also sounding like she was about to laugh. "And horrifying at the same time. What's it like?"

"Incredible," Nabiki said happily. "The view is absolutely incredible. This is pretty easy, really. Hurry up and get in the air, sis."

There was a slightly nervous sigh, then Akane responded, "If this kills me I am definitely going to haunt you and tell you it's all your fault for the rest of your life, you realize."

Giggling Nabiki circled around some more. "Fine by me. Just jump over the edge and get on with it."

"Crazy woman," Akane told her with a put-upon sigh. Looking down she could see her sister being attached to her own glider, a bright green one as opposed to the blue and yellow of the one she was flying. Soon enough Akane was in the take-off position with Onkra and Jyrron steadying her, Onkra apparently giving her some last minute advice from what she could make out.

Seconds later Akane ran down the slope, a scream of surprise and excitement coming over the communications link and much more faintly several seconds later through the air. She lifted off and zoomed out into space, the glider smoothly leaning into a right-hand spiral ascent. Soon she was at a similar altitude to her sister, who was behind her in the same circling pattern. "Oh my god," Akane kept repeating for several seconds, sounding both terrified and enormously happy.

"Calm down, Akane, you're perfectly safe," 'Yori' told her with a chuckle. "The computer will release the controls any second now. Remember what Onkra told you, and make small motions at first, those things react pretty fast even with the controls in learning mode."

A moment later the glider twitched, then rolled enthusiastically to the right, before recovering and rolling less wildly to the other side. Akane yelped, apparently taken by surprise. Nabiki watched with amusement as her sister kept over-correcting, the aircraft wiggling around in a way that made her wince a little, although she could well remember her own wild gyrations the first time she'd tried it. It only lasted about thirty or forty seconds, though, the highly-tuned reflexes of her sister quickly learning what to do.

"That looked fun," she commented when the glider settled down and flew fairly straight.

"Not quite the way I'd have put it," Akane replied with a certain amount of strain in her voice. "But it's getting better." She giggled nervously. "That's really a very long way down indeed."

"Isn't it?" Nabiki laughed. "At least three thousand metres, I'd guess."

"Please stop helping, Nabiki," her sister growled. Snickering to herself, the middle sister watched as Akane slowly got used to the controls. By the time she was flying fairly well, Shampoo had launched and was going through the same process albeit very slightly faster. A whoop of joy came over the comm system, making Nabiki grin.

"This is amazing!" Shampoo yelled. "I'm glad you persuaded me to try it, Akane."

"It's starting to grow on me," the youngest sister laughed. The two new fliers spiralled around for a while, slowly getting to grips with the controls, until Shampoo got cocky and tried a roll. It nearly worked to design, getting about three quarters of the way through it, before she lost too much airspeed and suddenly stalled, the computer catching her just as she emitted an undignified squeak of shock while nearly going into a spin. Laughing hard enough that her own glider was rocking from side to side, Nabiki matched speed and altitude with the surprised Amazon, looking over at her while wearing a wide grin.

"A little too much, too soon, I think, Shampoo," she quipped, seeing the Chinese woman glance over at her with a wry grin.

"It was pretty exciting, I have to admit," Shampoo replied, slightly embarrassed by the sound of it.

"Are you OK, Shampoo?" 'Chou' asked, sounding mildly concerned.

"I'm fine, Chou, thanks," she said, laughing slightly. "I tried running before I could walk, basically."

"Who's next?" Nabiki asked. "Come on, there's enough gliders to go around for everyone."
There was a pregnant pause, then Kimiko's voice sounded. "I think this calls for the Sano sisters. Miki? Hana?"

A few seconds passed, then Miki rather reluctantly replied, "Oh, hell, all right. I'll do it. I can hardly let Nabiki get away with something I can actually try as well." She emitted a slightly nervous chuckle.

"I... think I can do it," Hana said a moment after that, not sounding entirely sure.

"It's pretty easy, Hana, don't worry," Nabiki assured her. "The computer seems to keep everything going smoothly, Shampoo just proved it can take over if everything goes a little odd. You'll be fine. It's damn good fun as well."

After a few more words of encouragement from not only the three in the air, but Yori and Onkra, the three sisters were strapped into their own aircraft, Kimiko being the first to charge headlong down the slope towards the edge. "I have to be insane," everyone could hear her mutter, immediately before yelping in surprised shock when she took off. Her legs flailed around for a moment before Onkra reminded her to lock them up, which she immediately did. Seconds later Hana yelled something incomprehensible and followed her youngest sister, Miki sighing and doing the same as soon as the second Sano woman was airborne.

All three of them got the hang of it to one degree or another within ten minutes, proving Jyrron right from when he'd said the things were easy and designed to teach pilots how to fly. Miki was laughing almost constantly for nearly half that time, making Nabiki grin to herself. She was more than glad to be able to share some of the recent strangeness in her life with her friends and family.

Half an hour after that, everyone who had come through the portals were in the air, even Nodoka, who had taken a considerable amount of persuasion from 'Yori', 'Chou', and Soun. It turned out that the Saotome woman had a knack for flying once she got over the initial fright, picking it up very quickly and clearly enjoying it a lot. Eventually there were a couple of sets of gliders swooping around the skies, Nabiki and her sister with Shampoo, the Sano girls, John, and Tamiko in one flock, the rest in the other.

The soarers, which had been circling far above them the entire time, came down to join the formations, swapping from one to the other and yipping excitedly, before eventually falling into their familiar formation to either side of and slightly behind Nabiki, causing John to snicker. "They seem to like you, Nabiki," he commented with amusement. The middle Tendo laughed, looking across to where the young man was flying fifty metres to the right, as their group headed away from the cliff out over the plain. They were just over ten kilometres away now, and at about four thousand metres altitude.

"What can I say?" she replied. "I must have a magnetic personality, or possibly they simply recognise skill when they see it."

"Did you give them any sushi last night?" Akane asked. "It's more likely that they just think you're going to feed them." She was some distance behind, flying in slow lazy S-bends and obviously having fun.

"No, I'm sure it's the skill thing," her sister giggled.

"Of course it is." Akane sounded amused and mildly sarcastic.

"Be nice, girls," Soun advised, from some considerable distance back. He and the others were flying back and forth across the cliff area in a pattern some four kilometres wide, still getting used "OK, Dad," both sisters chorused, before laughing again.

The flying session went on for over three hours. Eventually everyone headed back to the clifftop, landing one after another. Shampoo managed, somehow, to nearly end up upside down, blaming a hole in the ground she'd stepped in but which no one else could find any trace of. Grumbling a little at how no-one believed her she soon went back to grinning in excitement. "That was absolutely incredible," she announced as Jyrron and 'Yori' helped her disconnect herself from the glider. "I think I want one."

"With a little luck that might be possible eventually," 'Yori' smiled. "Azumi is working on importing various items of high-tech from Fwetna and a few other places, and she was definitely interested in these things herself."

"Why?" Miki asked with interest. "She's got her own wings!" She ducked as both soarers picked that particular moment to drop out of the sky close by, the female running over to Onkra for a head-scratch while the male looked around, then flopped onto his side with a satisfied grunt and closed his eyes in what looked all the world like pleasure. "Crazy animals," she mumbled, looking at them with affection.

"But not everyone does," Fumiko grinned. "So she thinks they'd sell all right back home."

"There are some legal issues with exporting them from here, to do with the anti-grav systems mainly, and of course there would be different legal requirements at home as well, but it's not impossible," 'Yori' added as she folded up the glider Shampoo had been flying, a brilliant scarlet one. The Amazon handed her the goggles she'd been wearing which she accepted with murmured thanks. "I don't know how long it will take though."

"We can come back easily enough at some point if any of you want another go, though," 'Chou' told them.

"I may want to take you up on that, dear," Nodoka replied, smiling gently to herself as she looked out at the view. "That was an extraordinary experience and one I'm very glad I allowed myself to be talked into. It's something I'll remember for the rest of my life."

"I'm very happy you enjoyed it, Nodoka," the blonde told her, smiling back. "Well, I think we should go for a swim for a while, if anyone else is up for it, then I'm afraid we're going to have to get back. We can't leave our area for too long or strange things tend to happen."

They all thanked Jyrron, who was packing up the extra gliders with the aid of his friends, then with Onkra headed back to the lake. The soarers looked at each other, the male sitting up suddenly, then followed. Shortly arriving back where the portal to Minato was still crackling away, a few of the locals looking at it curiously as they walked past but not bothering to investigate, 'Yori' looked around. "So, who wants a swim?"

It turned out that practically everyone did. After a certain amount of changing of clothes most of the group were enjoying the warm water of the lake, Nodoka and Soun watching Genma, now a panda, paddling around while several passers-by had stopped and stared in mild shock. 'Chou' explained the situation to them and they eventually wandered off, although not without a few backward glances.

"Come on in, Akane, it's great," Nabiki called, watching her sister wading around in the shallows.
"You know me and deep water, 'Biki," the younger Tendo replied uncertainly, looking at the lake with extreme suspicion.

Nabiki laughed for a moment. "It's not hard, honestly." She swam back to the shallower water then stood, approaching her sister. "Right. Sit down on the bottom." After a moment, Akane did as instructed, the water coming up to her shoulders. "Lie back and lift your legs slowly, while I support you from underneath," the elder sister went on, waiting until she performed the requested action. Quickly slipping her arms under her sister, Nabiki held her up, the water taking most of her weight. "Now put your arms out to the sides, head back so you're looking straight up. Yes, like that. Keep your body flat like this, OK?"

Very slowly she lowered her arms, until her sister was floating in the water. Akane twitched a little at the lack of support. "No, don't do that or you'll sink. Stay flat." Nabiki watched with approval as Akane remained rigidly supine, looking somewhat panicked. "Just breath normally. Keep your head tipped back a little or the water will go up your nose, then you'll start coughing, which will almost certainly make you sink again."

Her eyes wide, Akane floated on the water, slowly relaxing as it became apparent to her that she was in no immediate danger of drowning. "Wow," she finally said quietly. "I've never stayed in water this long before without ending up with most of it in my lungs, except in the bath."

Nabiki grinned down at her sister. "If you get into trouble, just do what you're doing now. You can float without a lot of effort for quite a while and it lets you relax and regain your strength. As long as the waves aren't too high you'll be fine. In salt water it's even easier than this, you have more buoyancy. All right, try bringing your arms back to your sides, slowly." Akane followed the instructions, bobbling around a little but not sinking, although she did end up spluttering a bit as she managed to push a ripple of water over her face. "See? It's not hard. Now carefully open your arms out slowly, then bring them back more rapidly to that position, your hands open but your fingers together."

A few more minutes passed, as she gradually got her sister from a very simple floating paddle to a rather messy backstroke, with a lot of extraneous flailing of arms and legs. Privately she agreed that the poor girl was definitely not a natural swimmer, but overall was pretty pleased with the progress. Akane herself seemed ecstatic about having been in the water for a quarter of an hour and not yet having had to be rescued.

Both the soarers were watching from the shore with their heads cocked to the side, visibly wondering what on earth these crazy people were doing playing around in the water when they could be flying. Hana was sitting with them also watching having decided to sunbathe instead of swim. She seemed quite comfortable with the animals now, something that amused and somewhat impressed Nabiki when she looked over and waved.

After another half hour and some demonstrations by both herself and Miki, she had managed to get the younger sister started on a basic front crawl, only having to dredge her off the bottom twice. "There you go. You need to practice a lot, but that's the basic stroke. When you're happy with it we can work on improving the technique and teaching you some more but at least you should be able to get out of a swimming pool without taking half of it home in your lungs now."

Grinning happily, Akane hugged her sister. "Thanks, 'Biki. I don't know why no-one at school could ever teach me like that." She shook her head. "Sharks and boulders. The man was insane."

"Yep. Even nuttier than Kodachi, and she's about as loopy as anyone I've ever met," Nabiki giggled.
"Tell me about it," Akane sighed. "At least she doesn't go for you."

"She wouldn't dare," Nabiki assured her. "I'd yell at her again like that last time."

Now grinning, Akane pushed off into her version of a front crawl, which was fairly enthusiastic although not wildly effective, foaming and frothing her way towards where Soun was racing Onkra across an improvised course and losing badly. Nabiki watched her go, smiled to herself, then followed with her own vastly smoother and professional stroke, almost immediately catching up and passing her sister. Privately wondering what they'd do if she used her mer-form and thinking about how on earth she could eventually let them in on the secret, she swam back to where the others were sitting in the shallows talking.

"Well done, Nabiki," 'Chou' greeted her, smiling. "That seemed like a very effective lesson."

Standing up in knee-deep water Nabiki looked back to see Akane slowly approaching, gradually becoming more efficient in her swimming, and nodded with satisfaction.

"I hope so. I've been meaning to get Akane at least able to not drown in a bath for years but this is the first time I've been able to help." She looked at Miki, who was grinning. "You remember I mentioned she wasn't exactly a gifted swimmer."

"Oh, trust me, I do," her friend chuckled. Beside her John had his arm around his girlfriend, watching Akane with her. He looked fairly pleased overall with the day so far, as did everyone else.

A certain amount of low-volume swearing from off to the side made everyone look over, to see Mousse on his hands and knees in shallow water, groping around on the bottom apparently looking for something. "Damn it," he muttered.

"What's the problem, Mousse?" Nodoka asked, concern apparent in her expression.

"My glasses fell off and I can't find the damn things, because without them I can't see well enough," he sighed, feeling around in the sand. "If I had them on I could see them but then I wouldn't need them."

She stood and waded over to help him look, Miki and Kimiko joining her. A few seconds later the latter stopped, a look of guilty worry going across her face. "Oops," she said quietly. Everyone turned to her. "I think I just found your glasses." Bending down she retrieved a somewhat mangled set of eyewear which she'd obviously stepped on. "Sorry about that."

Mousse took them from her, holding them close to his eyes to inspect them, then sighed again. "Oh, crap. That was the last pair I had."

"I'm really sorry, Mousse," she told him sincerely. "I'll pay for some new ones."

"It's not your fault," he assured her. "I should have been more careful. The water's cloudy here so you couldn't see them."

'Yori' watched the minor drama with a slightly amused expression, then looked at 'Chou', who nodded. She waded over to the Amazon. "There's an easier solution, Mousse. Come over here to the beach and sit down." He looked up in her general direction, puzzled, then did as directed, Kimiko hastily helping when he started to head in the wrong direction.

"Thanks," he commented, going slightly red with embarrassment. Nodoka and the others followed curiously. When Mousse was sitting down, the martial artist knelt next to him.
"Close your eyes for a moment," she said. He stared at her, shrugged, and obeyed. Putting her hands over his eyes she concentrated, the familiar purple glow appearing for ten seconds or so. "That should do it. You can open them again."

Opening his eyes Mousse blinked a few times, his expression becoming one of wonder. Holding his hand in front of his face he moved it back and forth for a second or two, a smile steadily widening, until he jumped to his feet, grabbed 'Yori', and swung her around, laughing. "Thank you," he yelled in joy. "You have no idea how much trouble that's caused me my entire life. Putting her down he suddenly seemed to realise what he'd done and looked worried.

The young woman grinned at him. "I'll allow it this time, but don't make a habit of it," she laughed. Embarrassed he scratched his nose, blushing.

"Sorry. But you really don't have any idea how much this means to me." He looked around at the scenery with literally new eyes. "I've dreamed of being able to see properly since I was about five. It's incredible."

"No problem. I should have thought of it earlier, to be honest. But it's fixed now."

"Did you really just fix his eyes just like that, so easily?" Kimiko gaped in awe. 'Yori' nodded, smiling at her.

"Yep. Eyes are a bit fiddly to rebuild from scratch but fixing the lens and the retinal issues is pretty straightforward." She nodded to Mousse, who was still looking around with a brilliant smile on his face, then wandered off, rejoining 'Chou'. Kimiko watched her go then looked at her sisters, all three of them seeming stunned.

"That was a nice thing to do," Nabiki silently said. Her current sister-in-law glanced at her with a small smile.

"Why not? It's easy enough and my problems with the guy are long in the past. We seem to be repairing all sorts of problems with the Neriman side of life at the moment, his eyes are a fairly small thing in the grand scheme of things but it means a lot to him, obviously."

"I can understand that, his vision was absolutely terrible. I'm kind of impressed he's managed what he has with that disability. Even the glasses wouldn't fix it all the way."

"It was still nice." Nabiki smirked a little. "I approve."

"Well, in that case I'm certain it was the right thing to do. Having the Nabiki Tendo seal of approval, I mean." 'Yori' looked at her with an eyebrow raised, nearly making her laugh out loud.

"Good. Remember, I'm always right."

"Of course." Out loud, the martial artist said to the group at large, "We're going to have to get back in about half an hour, so we should probably get out of the lake soon."

"It's been somewhat busy what with one thing and another," 'Chou' replied, sighing very slightly. "But we hopefully will have some more free time soon. I'd like to visit your home again, I have to Feeling a familiar ki signature approaching, Nabiki looked around to see Uthryyl strolling towards them down the beach, looking pleased with himself. He raised a hand in greeting. "Hello, everyone," he announced as he stopped next to his daughter.

"Guys, this is my friend Uthryyl, the master trader I mentioned before," 'Yori' told them, in the process going over to greet the merchant. "He's a really nice person, so be polite." Uthryyl laughed at her comment, bowing deeply for a second.

"Such an introduction! I'm honoured that the great Yori thinks so highly of me." Straightening up he looked around, his ears up in an expression of interest. "Sorry I didn't come over earlier, I was on the other side of the lake talking to some people I haven't seen for quite a time who are on holiday here. I saw your flying escapades, though, it looked impressive from down here. I haven't seen so many gliders in the air at once before."

"It was a hell of a lot of fun, actually," Tamiko chuckled, walking over to him and giving him a quick hug. "Hello, Uthryyl. How is Quannyr?"

"She's very well, thank you, Tamiko," he responded. "Business is good and she's in Krentak sorting out a new contract with a client. She should be back tomorrow morning."

"Give her my best," the red-head requested.

"I will." Looking around again, he said, "So, Yori, introduce me to your friends." Nabiki grinned internally as she knew well that the trader already knew more about everyone present than most of them would believe.

"Good acting, Uthryyl," she sent, getting a chuckle back over the com.

"Thank you. I practice for at least an hour a day." He glanced at her with a flick of one ear.

"It wouldn't actually surprise me if you did," she giggled, which made him laugh.

Ignoring the silent conversation, 'Yori' made the introductions and gave a brief explanation of their recent exploits. Uthryyl listened with interest. "Ah, yes, Akane Tendo. I have heard quite a lot about you, my dear," he said jovially, studying the youngest Tendo sister, who looked a little overwhelmed at the comment. "Apparently you have gained the attention of a somewhat disconcerting person in recent times. My sympathies, I've met Ms Aoyama as well." He grinned in the D'Sage manner as Akane and Shampoo both shuddered a little.

"She's... not someone you forget in a hurry," Akane replied quietly. "Although I am grateful for everything she's apparently done for me."

"You're just not in a hurry to meet her again," Uthryyl suggested knowingly. She nodded quickly.

"Not at all. She's... a bit scary."

"My dear Akane, she's one of the most horrifying people I've ever met, believe me, so I understand your feelings well." Uthryyl laughed, catching Nabiki's eye with a quick sly glance. "But, I believe, at heart a decent person."

Turning to Nabiki while Akane appeared mildly worried for a while, looking around with sudden paranoia, he went on, "I have also heard about you, Nabiki. An economics student with an interest in commerce, from what I hear. Something I also have a deep liking for."
She nodded, noticing that 'Chou' was hiding a laugh. 'Yori' snorted with amusement "You should spend some time talking to her, Uthryyl, she might be a good contact for further trading opportunities on our world."

"I'm open to negotiations," Nabiki grinned. "And always ready to make a good deal."

Uthryyl narrowed his eyes at her, making her grin more widely. "I see. A woman after my own heart." After a moment he nodded. "Yes, I think we should probably talk again at some point. It's not impossible that even a lowly economics student would have some good ideas."

Soun, who was listening with interest, burst out laughing at the dry comment, placing his arm around his middle daughter's shoulders as she put a comically offended expression on her face. "She's young, but I have no doubt she will learn fast. I have faith in my daughters." Uthryyl studied her then slowly nodded again.

"Possibly. I believe I can see promise there."

"You're just being gratuitously annoying now, you know," she told him silently, laughing inside even while on the outside she frowned.

"Of course. We find our entertainment where we can, Nabiki," he chuckled.

A little later, Soun and Nodoka were talking with Uthryyl, both apparently finding him very interesting. The others were scattered around in small groups, slowly drying themselves and getting dressed. Nabiki was sitting on the local version of grass just off the beach with Miki next to her, both of them watching everyone else. The male soarer had wandered over and dropped onto his side near her, looking at her longingly, so she reached out and stroked his head, privately very pleased that for some reason they hadn't acted like they normally did when she was around. Miki grinned at her as he made a faint yip of pleasure.

"They really do seem to like you," she said. "They're very friendly animals considering that Chou told us they're not actually tame or anything. And what they look like."

Nabiki nodded. "I think they're kind of cute in a slightly worrying way." She tickled the male behind his ear, making him stretch his head out like a happy cat. "Although they're certainly rather large for housepets."

"That doesn't seem to stop them trying," Onkra laughed, sitting down on the other side of the supine soarer, which opened one eye, looked at her, then closed it again. "Mom is always chasing them out. If you leave the door open they'll be inside in seconds. I'm pretty sure that they know how to open the doors as well, I found both of them on my bed a few days ago and I'm certain I closed the door on the way out."

"You must have a pretty big bed if both of them could get on it," Miki giggled. Onkra flicked her ears.

"It's quite large, yes, but you couldn't actually see it under a pair of mostly grown soarers." She shook her head in wonder. "I've noticed that some of the other soarers around the place have started coming closer since these guys turned up. I'm a little worried that one day I'll come home and find the entire house full of the things. Mom would go totally nuts about that."

Nabiki and Miki exchanged glances, then fell over laughing at the thought. "That could be awkward," Miki said, grinning.

"More than a little," Onkra sighed, rubbing the soarer's head absently. He was making little squeaking sounds of delight.

Eventually everyone was dressed again, various bags and the like packed away with damp towels and swimsuits. Heading back to where 'Chou' had left the portal, they stopped while 'Yori' produced another one next to it. She turned to them. "That's leading back to the Tendo Dojo. I'm going to have to go back to Minato now, but it was very nice seeing you guys again and a lot of fun as well."

"Thank you very much for doing all this for us," Nodoka replied with a happy smile. "It was the perfect afternoon from my point of view, one I will treasure for years."

"You're more than welcome, Nodoka." The black-haired girl smiled at the woman who had no idea she was talking to her own offspring. Nabiki watching, wondering what the auburn-haired woman would say if she knew with some inner bemusement. It was becoming apparent to her that the day of revelation, at least in part, was steadily drawing nearer. She wasn't sure if that was good or bad yet, but it seemed inevitable with the way in which the Minato branch of her family was becoming more and more involved with the Nerima branch. All of it ultimately because of her in a way.

"It will work out, sister," 'Chou' said from where she was standing near Fumiko by the portal to Minato. The blonde looked at her, obviously having picked up on her thoughts somehow. "Trust in the fact that family bonds are strong, and we have a good one despite past issues. It's not quite time yet but it's getting there faster than I expected."

"I still have no idea how we can actually tell them," Nabiki admitted.

"Neither do I, yet, but I'm sure it will happen eventually. At the rate things seem to have improved over the summer it might not even require the security spell." 'Chou' smiled gently at nothing in particular. "I would so dearly love to be able to talk to father again as myself. Well, my original self." She giggled quietly. "I seem to have many selves these days, all equally real."

"Maiko and Rika need to visit soon, Auntie was talking about them a little while ago. She likes them." Nabiki snickered.

"Of course she does, they're nice people," 'Yori' commented with a laugh. "I know them both well."

"Idiot." She smirked at the other woman.

The martial artist sent her a look of amusement, before turning back to Uthryyl, who had come over to say goodbye. "It was nice seeing you again, Uthryyl. I'll be back soon, I have a lot of things to talk about, but for now I guess we'll be on our way."

"I look forward to your next visit with anticipation," Uthryyl told her gravely, although the tip of his tail was twitching.

"Come on, everyone, let's go home," Nodoka announced, smiling at Uthryyl and Onkra, then at the collection of magical girls. She waved, before disappearing into the portal. The others trailed after her, calling goodbyes to those remaining behind, until only Nabiki and Akane were standing and looking around.

"This was amazing, 'Biki," Akane said in a low voice. "I'm glad you pushed me into trying the gliding, and thanks for the swimming lessons as well."

"Any time, sis," Nabiki grinned. She waved to 'Yori' and the other girls, smiled at Onkra and her father, watched the soaring who were chasing each other around the portals for a moment, then followed her sister home again. It had been a good afternoon, definitely.
"That went well," Onkra said once the first portal had collapsed. She turned to the disguised Ranma. "I like your mother, she seems very nice."

"She is, to be honest," 'Yori' smiled. "I do miss her, although I still remember all the problems. That said, she seems to have changed a lot since those days. Even Genma seems less... well, Genma, in some ways. He might eventually grow up into a real human." She shook her head slightly as the others laughed. "I'll never be able to trust him the way I should, too much water under the bridge for that, but at least I'm slowly becoming able to stand being near him without wanting to leave the room."

Putting her arm around her husband, 'Chou' smiled down at her. "We understand, dear, and there's no pressure. We'll deal with revealing ourselves to them when you decide you're ready."

"Are you ready?" the martial artist asked curiously. The blonde woman thought for a moment, then sighed.

"Mostly, yes, I think. There are still problems and we shouldn't rush into it, certainly, but... Perhaps sometime in the next year at the rate things are improving?"

'Yori' looked slightly dubious but eventually nodded slowly. "It's not impossible. We'll see how things go. With Ukyo safely married that will be one less problem, definitely."

Onkra looked curious. "What about Shampoo and Akane?"

"Akane is certainly a hell of a lot easier to deal with these days," 'Yori' grinned. "If I'd met the woman who was swimming badly in the lake for the first time today, I think I'd really like her. Shampoo too, and even Mousse. I guess that's growing up for you. People change, some for the better, some not. Those guys are all improved more than I'd have thought possible based on the past."

"I expect at least part of it is due to your own maturity," Uthryyl chuckled. "From what you've told me over the years you yourself were somewhat... quick to take offence when younger."

'Yori' looked embarrassed as her friends all smiled at her. "Well, yes, that's true. I'll admit that I definitely didn't help sometimes. Although I still say most of the time someone else started it!"

Several people laughed, making her grin. "We all got better. Anyway, time to go." She turned to Onkra. "You should come and stay for a while soon, perhaps next week if you can free up a month or so. I need to see where you've gotten to with your training, then show you some more advanced katas. Nabiki needs to get back to it as well, and I have Ami, Rei, and Hotaru to start off as well."

Smiling, Onkra nodded. She looked at her father for a moment. "I should be free in a few days for a reasonable period of time. I'd certainly like to come and visit."

"It's fine with me," Uthryyl assured his daughter. "Perhaps we can combine it with delivering a pair of fusion reactors. Nabiki seemed quite keen on getting on with that now the paperwork is sorted out."

"The PSIA is as well, so that sounds like a good idea," 'Yori' mused, rubbing her chin. "We'll have to talk about that soon." She looked up. "Right. See you two later." Turning to the soarers who had stopped running around and were now sitting nearby watching with curiosity, she firmly added, "Stay!"

Both Onkra and her father laughed as the animals looked disappointed, their heads drooping, while the six humans walked through the portal, which immediately dissipated. "That was fun," she said when they were alone.

"Yes, it was," he replied, smiling. "Come on, let's go and find something to eat." Picking up her glider which had been packed away completely she accompanied him back to the car.

Sitting outside in the now-cooler evening air after a good dinner, Miki leaned back in her chair and looked up at the first stars which were just coming out, before turning to her two sisters who were talking quietly near the pond and drinking a little wine. "This has been one of the strangest weekends I've ever had," she announced firmly.

Kimiko stared at her, her glass at her lips, then lowered it slowly. "One of the strangest? What sort of parties do you normally go to, if this is only one of the strangest weekends you've ever had?" she asked incredulously. Hana, beside her, began laughing, looking at them both.

Thinking about it, Miki finally nodded agreement. "OK, you're right, sis, it's the strangest weekend. Fair enough."

"Was it fun, though?" John asked from her other side, where he'd been relaxing with his eyes closed. She glanced at him with a smile, seeing he was still apparently asleep.

"Oh, yes, so much fun. I can't believe how much."

He smiled to himself, opening his eyes and rolling his head towards her. "So you're glad you became friends with Nabiki then, I guess."

"Very glad. She's not only a really nice person but she knows all these weird other people. I mean, magical girls?" She laughed. "Normally, you'd be pretty impressed if someone you knew could introduce you to a decent band, but magical girls of all things? Never mind her sister, the Amazons, and everything else."

"Like I've said before, Japan is crazy, and that Tendo woman is one of the crazier things in it," he snickered. Reaching down he felt around until he found his beer bottle, lifting it and taking a drink before putting it back. "Nice, but totally nuts. The way that she just accepts all this and simply looks completely unsurprised is... not at all normal, like I said. But everyone around here is like that to one level or another."

"I suppose if you grow up with it you don't think of it as all that weird," Hana put in. "OK, so the magic and everything is pretty new from what I've heard, but the crazy martial arts things aren't and they're nearly as odd." She looked around the garden, before waving at the claw-marks still visible in the lawn as mute evidence that something unusual had recently happened. "Although that has got to be a little strange even around here."

They all nodded, none of them disputing the fact. "I always heard Nerima was different from almost everywhere else but I never realised quite how different," Hana added, finishing off her wine and putting the glass down.

"I suspect that unless you actually experience it you'd never believe it," John chuckled.

"True. Very true."

They fell into a companionable silence for a while. Eventually, Kimiko asked, "Where is everyone else, anyway?"
"Mousse went home, still grinning like a lunatic, Shampoo and Akane I think are in the Dojo practising from what Nodoka said, she went to return some pans she'd borrowed from a friend and took Genma with her, and Soun and Nabiki were talking about something to do with money a while ago," Miki replied. "Nabiki said she'd be out a little later but to just relax until then."

"Fine by me," her boyfriend mumbled, almost asleep by this point. "It's been a long day."

Some time later, Nabiki came out of the house carrying a bottle of wine in one hand and some more glasses in the other, walking over and sitting in a garden chair between Hana and Kimiko. "Sorry about that, I was helping Dad with some household accounts stuff. He seems to think that just because I've been doing a degree in economics I should be his accountant."

"Which, of course, you can do with your eyes shut."

"Well, yes, but he's not supposed to realise that." She grinned when Miki snickered. Extracting the cork from the bottle with a corkscrew she took from her pocket, she filled three glasses, then topped up Hana's and Kimiko's. Handing a pair of them to Miki and John, she looked at hers for a moment, then raised it.

"To a damn good party, with some interesting friends," she toasted with a small grin. Laughing, the others did the same, all tapping their glasses together then drinking. "Oh, I nearly forgot. Hang on, I'll be right back." She put the glass down then jumped to her feet and dashed back inside the house.

The four people left behind exchanged curious glances, before returning their attention to the middle Tendo as she came back outside carrying a cardboard box. Sitting down again she put it on her knees, looking around at each of them in turn with a sneaky smile. "I had some free time on Friday so I called a friend and talked for a while," she began, slowly opening the box, then putting her hands inside. "She was good enough to give me..." She lifted a couple of brightly coloured boxes with transparent fronts out of the larger one and displayed them with a grin, "...these." Hana sucked in a breath sufficiently hard that she ended up coughing in surprise, while Miki's eyes widened to a level that it almost hurt, a rush of acquisitiveness shooting through her instantly. Both sisters stared in wonder, then looked at each other. "So, who wants Yori and who wants Chou?" Nabiki asked with a wide smirk. John sighed as his girlfriend leapt to her feet, her elder sister just as fast, then nearly crushed the Tendo woman in their rush to approach. He looked at Kimiko and rolled his eyes, making her giggle.

"Me!" shouted both Sano sisters simultaneously. They glared at each other.

Laughing, Nabiki waved the action figures in their boxes around just out of reach. "Only one each. Decide politely or I'll let your parents do it for you." She looked over at John, then towards Kimiko. "Would one of you ask them if I give these to you?"

"Of course, Nabiki," Kimiko agreed, grinning. "You can trust me to keep them safe until Dad makes a ruling. He might even keep them for himself, because they're pretty rare from what I understand."

"NOOO!" Hana wailed, grabbing at one of the boxes. "Don't let him steal them from me."

"Us, you mean, Hana," Miki snapped, before flushing as Nabiki grinned at her.

"Girls, girls," the middle Tendo said calmly. "We can work this out. John? Do you have a hundred yen coin?"
"I do indeed, Nabiki," he smiled, producing one from his pocket

"Right then. Hana? Heads it's Yori, tails it's Chou. That seems fair to me." Both sisters stared at each other for several seconds with narrowed eyes then reluctantly nodded.

Balancing the coin on his thumb, John watched them stare at it for a couple of seconds, shook his head sadly, then flipped it, catching it in his other hand and slapping it down on the garden table. "Are you sure we should be enabling them like this?" he asked Nabiki, not moving his hand.

"But it's feeding your problem!" he protested, making both Kimiko and Nabiki giggle.

"Move your damn hand or... or... I'll think of something horrible later. Just move it!"

Grinning, he did as requested, to reveal the reverse side of the coin. "Tails."

Nabiki handed the Chou doll to Hana who grabbed it so fast it nearly disappeared from sight. "You're welcome," the Tendo woman joked. Hana flushed.

"Sorry. Thank you very, very much, Nabiki. And your friend."

"It's not a problem, Hana," Nabiki grinned. She turned to Miki who was waiting beside her, her hands itching, and handed her the Yori box. "And here you go as well. A pleasure doing business with you both."

The sisters inspected their new possessions with wide smiles, then looked at each other's figurines as well. "It's wonderful, Nabiki, thanks a lot for this," Miki finally said, feeling very happy again.

"Enjoy them. Remember, you can't sell them legally, but other than that, have fun." The brunette looked amused as the two sat back down cuddling their action figures. "You could take them out and play with them if you want."

"I'm not six any more, Nabiki," Miki said with amused asperity.

"Open the box!? Are you insane?" Hana yelped at the same time, then looked slightly embarrassed when the others stared at her. Subsiding she held the box close to her chest, grinning in a slightly deranged manner than made Kimiko laugh and sigh simultaneously.

"I still think I was adopted, you know," she remarked, finishing her wine.

"Got a quick job for you, Nabs," Ranma's voice said in her head as Nabiki was getting ready for bed, at just after midnight. She sighed faintly, looking over to where Akane was sleeping peacefully having dropped into her own bed nearly an hour ago.

"Don't..."

"Call her Nabs!" several voices chorused on the com, making her grin. Ranma laughed a little.

"What sort of job?" she queried. He explained, making her grin widen, then become rather dark.

"Oh, yes, please let me do that," she sniggered in a manner that would make those who knew her take a step back and look worried. "I'll be ready for a pickup in the usual spot in about two minutes."
"I'm on my way," Aiko told her. Quickly putting her shirt back on she ran a hand through her hair, checked that everyone was asleep with a quick scan, then snuck downstairs and out the back door, closing it silently behind her. Checking once more she hopped through the gap in the wall and headed for the alley. Seconds later it was empty.

Putting the last of her supplies away in a warded cupboard, Cologne finished cleaning her workroom, running a damp rag over the bench she'd recently used. She slowly became aware that the back of her neck was getting cold, scratching it for a moment before suddenly freezing mid-motion. 'Oh, hell,' she thought nervously. A couple of seconds passed while she stared at the bench, before reluctantly turning around.

"Greetings, Elder Cologne," Ms Aoyama said politely, in a manner that probably passed as friendly in whatever eldritch dimension she claimed as home. Feeling her guts clench, the Amazon wondered fatalistically what on earth the horrible woman-thing wanted this time. Not to mention how the hell she managed to wander back and forth through her wards, which she'd beefed up considerably since the last time, with no apparent effect or problem.

"Hello, Ms Aoyama," she replied, equally politely albeit somewhat less evenly than she was really happy with. "What can I help you with today?"

"I wish to request a minor consideration I am reliably informed you have sufficient expertise to provide," the green-haired woman told her calmly. "It has come to my attention, Elder Cologne, that you possess a considerable proficiency with summoning circles and rituals, a field of study that is somewhat unconventional amongst the magically capable denizens of your world. My employers find themselves requiring such expertise locally and are amenable to providing suitable recompense for your time and effort if you would be good enough to accommodate them in this matter."

"You need a summoning circle?" Cologne asked with interest and a certain amount of slightly horrified wonder. What in the name of the gods could someone like her be summoning? The woman nodded once.

"That is correct, Elder Cologne."

"May I ask why?"

"You may."

Ms Aoyama waited silently and patiently.

After a short pause, Cologne sighed to herself, making very sure that it wasn't audible, and politely added, "Why do you need a summoning circle?" She was fairly certain the answer would be the normal, rather unnerving "That information is unavailable," and was therefore pleasantly surprised when Ms Aoyama did indeed explain in some detail. The ancient woman started cackling.

"Oh, my," she chuckled. "Yes, of course I'll help, I'd be happy to."

"Your assistance in this matter is appreciated. Your file will be updated appropriately." Ms Aoyama looked, as far as she could tell, pleased. Cologne stopped laughing for a moment, wondering what that fairly worrying statement actually meant, then shrugged, deciding there was nothing she could do about it anyway, and started poking through her supplies to find the right materials.

"This is a little extreme even under the circumstances," she said over her shoulder.
"It was felt that a demonstration of unmistakable intent was required due to the potential severity of the recent regrettable occurrence," Ms Aoyama replied in her chilly tones. "I am confident that such an approach will impress upon the individual in question that such acts in future will bring somewhat more vigorous response and therefore provide a more effective restraint on less than ideally competent overenthusiasm in the field of magical rituals than a mere verbal warning would."

Privately thinking that a verbal warning from Ms Aoyama would probably be sufficient to stop practically anything up to and including a volcano erupting, Cologne nodded her understanding. If nothing else it was a damn good practical joke. She wondered if whatever it actually was that was standing behind her radiating cold knew that. Or cared.

"I'm ready," she finally announced, putting the last of the materials into a bag and picking up up.

"Excellent. Ms Aiko awaits outside to provide transportation to the remaining actor in our small presentation," Ms Aoyama, turning to the door. Cologne followed, smiling a little to herself. This promised to be entertaining. For her, anyway.

The poor sod who had attracted the wrath of the green-haired horror silently descending the stairs in front of her was entirely another matter.

Hikaru lay in bed reading his latest acquisition, a scroll that reeked of alien magic, which he'd traded the coffee for to another weirdly odd person in the middle of Minato. It was written in some very strange looking language, not the same as the book he'd used recently, but had a translation in archaic English of all things attached to it, which he was slowly puzzling his way through. He was also wishing that he'd paid more attention in school as he did so. Picking up his notebook he added to the notes he'd made already, then retrieved a Japanese-English dictionary and leafed through it.

"Oh. It means 'triangle'," he mumbled, blinking tiredly at the scroll and making some more notes. "Weird. OK, that doesn't make a lot of sense, but..."

A few minutes passed silently, until he sniffed. A second later he sniffed again, then looked around, puzzled. "Why can I smell burning?" he said out loud. Dropping the scroll he leaned over the side of his bed, his eyes widening. There was a line of blueish light forming a circle around the entire bed. As he watched in awed horror, the line expanded in width, cryptic symbols in red fire appearing above it and slowly circling around him. The smell of wood smoke strengthened.

"What the hell is that?" he squeaked in shock. The entire thing had taken only four or five seconds to appear. Diving off the bed towards the door, he yelped in pain as he bounced off an immaterial barrier at the edge of the circle, recoiling onto the bed again.

"Ow." Staring wildly around while holding his abused nose in his hand, he noticed that the symbols were circling faster. They sped up to a blur, then a horrible sensation of falling went through him, everything going dark for a moment. When the light came back he looked around, then recoiled in shock.

"Uh oh."

"Indeed, Mr Gosunkugi. That is most certainly an appropriate sentiment."

He stared in horror at the woman in the expensive-looking suit who was inspecting him with an air of cold interest, then looked wildly about himself again. He was still sitting on his bed, but that bed wasn't in his room, it was instead apparently now located on a flat sandy surface lit by half a dozen ghostly spheres of pale red light floating above him. Past them he could see stars.

In addition to the woman with green hair and, now that he looked more carefully, pointed ears, who was for some reason wearing sunglasses despite the near-darkness, he saw the figure of that ancient little Chinese woman who was balancing on the end of her long staff staring at him. A little further around the circle was the most disconcerting one of all, a tall shape covered in fine blue scales standing on legs that ended in hooves, wearing black leather and not a lot of it. Apparently female yet very obviously not at all human, this one was looking at him in a manner that made him think she was working out the best cuts as if he was a beef cow.

When she met his eyes with her own inhuman ones, she licked her lips with a long forked tongue which slipped past sharp teeth for a moment, then vanished again.

"Who... who are you?" he managed to ask, clutching at the bedclothes.

"I, Mr Gosunkugi, am Ms Aoyama. You will of course recognise Elder Cologne of the Joketsuzoku Amazon tribe, currently resident in Nerima as are you. My other companion is Archmage Zytha'a, a colleague from... elsewhere. She would like discuss the recent events you precipitated with an overambitious yet unfortunately misplaced attempt at a summoning ritual."

The blue-scaled female demon was watching him unblinkingly, and with extremely worrying attention.

She said something in a very disturbing sounding language, full of hissing sibilants, which made him quail. He was sure that even Cologne, who before right now he'd have put down as one of the scariest people he'd run into, quivered a little at the sound. Ms Aoyama listened, then replied in the same language. "Arch-mage Zytha'a would like me to inform you that your... uniquely... modified ritual of summoning caused unacceptable interference to delicate operations she was in the process of performing, and to impress upon you the importance of ceasing such activities forthwith.

Furthermore, she requested that I relay the information that repeating such interference may attract a response which you would find somewhat upsetting."

The scaly demoness hissed something else, Ms Aoyama cocking her head a little as she listened, then nodding her understanding. "My apologies, Mr Gosunkugi. I misspoke. Please replace the word 'upsetting' in the previous utterance with 'fatal'. Do you understand her warning as stated?"

Hikaru went even paler than he had been for the last couple of minutes, which was already more pallid than healthy or normal. He nodded jerkily. "Yes," he managed to say, his heart hammering in his chest.

"Excellent. I assume, therefore, that you will comply with Arch-mage Zytha'a's request?"

"Yes," he squeaked through a tight throat.

"I am most appreciative of your cooperation in this matter, Mr Gosunkugi. Additionally, to ensure that there is no further misunderstanding, I would request that you deliver all documentation you may have utilised in your recent magical experimentation to Elder Cologne at your convenience." The tone implied very strongly that 'at his convenience' meant 'immediately, if not sooner.' Once again, he nodded.

"First thing in the morning." His voice was scratchy and weak.

"Again, excellent. Well done, Mr Gosunkugi. My apologies for interrupting your activities but the matter at hand was deemed sufficiently important that an immediate action was required. Our business is now concluded. Farewell." She stepped back, moving to stand beside the blue demoness, who was still staring at him with a look that made him want to hide under the bedclothes.

Cologne hopped closer on her staff, looking hard at him, then over her shoulder at the two alien women. "I'd take that advice seriously, my lad. I don't know about the Arch-mage, I've never met her before, but Ms Aoyama..." She shuddered. "Trust me, you don't want her annoyed at you."

"I'll be good," he whispered.

"Good. Read about magic all you want, but don't try rituals like that again, they're likely to attract all the wrong sort of attention. Come see me in a couple of years if you're still interested in the subject and we'll see what we can do about it."

He nodded, after which she mumbled a few words in Chinese and drew some symbols in the air with her finger. The falling sensation came again, blackness following instantly.

Arriving outside the Café again, Cologne turned to Ms Aoyama, who was standing next to Aiko. The magical girl had dropped them off in what she said was a desert in the middle of Australia, then picked them up again after she'd reversed the summoning circle and sent the Gosunkugi boy home once more.

Grinning a little, she said, "All things considered that was more fun than it should have been. A little intimidation is always good for a laugh."

"I am pleased to have brought a certain quantity of entertainment into your life, Elder Cologne," Ms Aoyama stated, a very faint air of amusement underlaying her words. "It is to be hoped that Mr Gosunkugi accepts the warning he was given. My employers do not wish to be required to take further action against him although I have no doubt that should it become necessary such measures would be authorised." A tiny and chilling smile accompanied this comment.

"I'm interested in seeing what on earth led him to working out such a botched summoning circle in the first place," Cologne remarked after she'd finished shivering at that horrible smile. "I assume you'll want the paperwork he delivers?"

"That is indeed correct, although I am willing to allow you some time to study the documentation for your own edification. I will return in one week to collect it."

"Thank you." Cologne was genuinely grateful, the boy had managed to do something that strictly speaking he shouldn't have been able to and she was very curious to find out how.

"I must take my leave, Elder Cologne, I have other activities which require my attention." Ms Aoyama held out her hand, on which a ten centimetre metal cube was now sitting, of a colour that Cologne recognised with shock. "As promised, recompense for your efforts. Your aid in this matter is noted with gratitude."

Taking the offered, astoundingly heavy, solid gold block, Cologne stared at it for several seconds. When she looked up both Aiko and the creepy alien woman were gone. She hadn't even noticed the flash.

"Thank you, Ms Aoyama," she said anyway, just in case, before going back into the Café and yet again locking the door very carefully, resetting the wards and wondering if there was actually any way to keep the woman out. Gold or no gold, she found her more than a little uncomfortable to be around.
Blinking, Hikaru stared at the ceiling of his room, before suddenly sitting bolt upright on his bed. Frantically turning his head he looked around. All he could see was his bedroom.

"Oh, thank god, it was only a dream," he mumbled, dropping back onto his pillow and sighing in relief.

A couple of minutes later he decided he need a drink of water and got out of bed, managing two steps towards the door before he froze, stopping dead in his tracks. Then, very very slowly, he turned his gaze downwards to see the perfect circle of reddish sand that his bed was in the middle of, before swallowing hard.

"Oh, dear," he sighed, as he felt blackness take him yet again. This time it was something of a relief.

Nabiki kept giggling to herself for some time after she finally got to bed. It had been a very interesting day.

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!