"Months ago, at the warehouse. You remember when those girls blew the roof in? She was the one at the back, who didn't seem very happy about it. Ami, her name is. One of the only two out of all of them I have any time for. She's basically their intelligence asset. Not as powerful as the others, but probably smarter than all of them put together. Kasumi likes her quite a lot, they seem to get on. Personally, I think she'd do a lot better on her own, her friends are a damn nuisance and very slow to learn. At least they finally seem to have stopped coming around here being difficult. It only took them three years or so to get the hint." He laughed a little, inspecting the image Nabiki had sent him. "Definitely her. She's got some sort of magical computer she uses to locate potential trouble. Unfortunately it doesn't seem to be very selective, it must read anything that comes through a portal as a threat."

"Jun wasn't completely impressed either." The martial artist snickered, handing her a cup of coffee.

"I'm not surprised. These things are considerably more advanced, I suspect. Certainly a lot smarter. I wonder what it was that deflected her scan?"

Nabiki was still trying to remember the face of the young woman. "I can't place her at all. I remember the one you mentioned, but are you sure they're the same?"

Smiling, he nodded. "They use a spell similar to the one the bracelets have. It's very good. Once you know about it, though, it stops working. Trust me, they're the same girl. The power signatures are identical. She was powered down on the street, without the silly costume, just the device she was using. That's more or less the middle of the area they live in." He shook his head in despair. "It took Kas and me a whole afternoon to work out the civilian identities of pretty much all of them when we first came across that group. Their security is surprisingly poor, they rely entirely on the spell and don't even think about being sneaky. Luckily they're more than powerful enough to deal with most threats, although I really wish they'd be more careful. In the last eighteen months several of them have caused some pretty impressive damage to the fixtures and fittings. There have been complaints." Nabiki laughed, he looked quite annoyed.

"I guess she was probably just poking around checking for trouble. She's got the right instincts and takes it seriously. More so than some of them. Ami isn't a threat to you, although I can understand if you don't want her to know about you. She doesn't know anything about us outside Yori and Chou being someone you don't want to cross. We've yelled, well, I've yelled at them all quite a lot. At first I tried explaining things calmly, but it doesn't seem to work, they just ignore it. So I started intimidating them. A pavlovian conditioning exercise, I guess. Seems to have worked. Kas mainly just looked disappointed, which seemed to work even better. I can't really pull that off so convincingly." Laughing, he rummaged in the refrigerator, quickly making an impressively large pair of sandwiches, handing her one. They retired to the sofa, sitting down.

"Right. I want to figure out what happened. I'm not happy about the idea of strange magic around you. Hold still, I want to check for any weird spells." Putting his plate down he swallowed the bite he was chewing, then examined her carefully. Nabiki watched apprehensively. After a long moment he shook his head slowly. "Nothing there that shouldn't be there. It's mainly the ward system, it seems happy enough though. Your ki levels are higher than they were last time I saw you, you must have been practising with the ki balls a fair bit?" She nodded.
"Every night. I tend to play with them when I'm working. Having Jun means I don't need to type anything any more, I tend to do my work lying on the bed. Recently I do it while juggling ki balls, I've got it up to four at once. It seems to be helping me split my attention between several tasks which seemed like a good thing to learn." He looked pleased and approving.

"Very well done. That's a good exercise. I was going to start you on something similar in a week or two but you beat me to it. I'll want to see that later, to check on how well you're coming along." Picking up his sandwich again he took another bite, looking at her with interest. "Hmm. So what was it? Her magical tech is pretty good, it's not at all easy to block. Our cloaking technique is about the only thing I know for a fact that can do it..." He trailed off, an expression of slight surprise coming over him. "I wonder..." Turning to look into the room he concentrated, a smaller version of the complex pattern of the ward system control interface fading into view. Nabiki watched, amazed once more. "OK, let's see. Right, here we are. Um..." He started laughing.

"What?" Nabiki asked with considerable curiosity.

"I don't believe it. We certainly didn't design it to do that," he said, poking a couple of glowing lines and looking at the resultant change to the pattern. She watched as he inspected it, shaking his head with a pleased yet surprised expression. "Amazing." Ranma turned to her and looked at her closely for a moment. "It really does like you."

"What the hell are you babbling about, Saotome?" the middle sister asked, getting irritated. He smiled a little, then explained.

"The ward system logs attempts at probing people within it's area of influence, which is basically the seven of us, and Happosai to a degree. Since we added you guys to the wards five months ago the thing has grown a lot more complex, and considerably more powerful as well. It's storage capacity has increased a lot. We kind of expected that but the amount is surprising. It seems to be an exponential growth rather than linear, which is interesting..." He faded out as he seemed to be thinking of something. Nabiki recognised the look as one that meant he was talking to his comm system, she got the same one when she talked to Jun.

"Yes, it fits an exponential growth. Fascinating. That has some possibilities." A graphic popped up in a window over her view as he sent the results to her. She examined it as he went on. "Anyway, as far as I can tell it recognises you have the least total power of all the group so it seems to be keeping a closer eye on you than the rest of us. Plus, like Kasumi told you, it seems to like you." He grinned. "It really is like a big protective pet. It's got very large teeth as well. There are logs showing that on three separate occasions Cologne has actively probed you. There are lots of other passive probes which it deflected, probably various martial artists and magic users. It seems to be going all out to hide your power signature from anyone who might notice. That's interesting, because it's not specifically designed to do that, it's some sort of emergent behaviour. Within it's capabilities, obviously, but something it basically decided on it's own."

Nabiki looked surprised and slightly nervous. "Can it decide things on it's own?" He nodded.

"To a limited degree. Like the SI in the comms unit, but different. Those mimic a sentient mind remarkably well but as far as I can tell aren't actually truly sentient like we are. Pretty damn close in a lot of ways, but not quite there. I suspect that eventually they might reach that level, the things seem to be capable of learning. That's something to think about. The ward system isn't mimicking a mind in the way they are, more something like a very bright guard dog crossed with a somewhat paranoid security system. In this case, it's got a goal, protection of it's users from hostile intent, and a certain amount of leeway as to how it achieves that goal. In the absence of specific instructions it seems to have decided the best method to protect you is to hide you in plain sight." Snickering a little, he checked the logs again. "I'm impressed. That's quite a lot of power it's using." He returned his attention to her.

"It's targeting anyone who probes you who might have some form of hostile desire, or even simply isn't a known friendly, with the cloaking technique, which would have the effect of diverting their attention at lower power, and possibly even erasing a few seconds of short-term memory at higher levels. It looks like it's used that level on Cologne twice and the lower power level once. She must have noticed something, she's nothing if not sharp, then probed you to find out what it was. The ward system blocked the probe and arranged to make sure she lost interest. I guess she's good enough that eventually she bypassed the effect, or possibly just noticed something all over and probed again." He starting laughing.

"She must be getting very confused. Possibly she thinks there's something wrong with her memory. I doubt she'll work out what's happening though, this would be far past her experience level. Our ward spells are a real mishmash of things we bought in, things Happosai came up with, and lots of our own work. We understand them, but I doubt anyone else would without years of effort, our system is too weird." Nabiki was impressed, as well as amused. She thought about it and giggled.

"I think I know at least one of the times it diverted her attention, thinking back on it. A few weeks ago I met her at the Dojo, she was watching Akane and Shampoo on the roof. She made a weird little noise and looked like she'd seen a ghost for a second, but then said there was nothing wrong. Put it down to some tea going down the wrong pipe. She didn't seem to notice her own expression." Ranma nodded, smiling.

"That would fit. One of the dates logged is about right, sometime in mid April."

"Yep, that's right," the middle sister said, remembering.

"Then again about two weeks later, and once more a week after that."

"All times I was back home." Nabiki chuckled. "Weird. But kind of funny."

"Looks like it's diverted attention from several people at the Dojo. Shampoo, this one has to be, then probably Soun and Pop as well. Plus two or three people who are likely local martial artists, there are several others in Nerima who would be good enough to read ki signatures. This looks like half a dozen different magical girls locally as well. I recognise most of the signatures." He chuckled again as he fiddled with the wards. "Here we go. An hour ago. That's Ami's signature, and her little computer. It spotted her scan and shut it down cleanly, then cloaked you. Until she directly scanned you it was just watching but when you were at risk of being detected it took action.

"Can it block a machine? Especially a magical one?"

He nodded. "Yes. The amount of power it has available for that cloaking method is extremely high. Kas and I can block it as well, no problem, but not many others could. It seems to have diverted her scans completely, making you look totally normal. Very good indeed." Amused, he added, "I wish I could give it a biscuit or something. It's excelled itself. I should give it some more power than normal as a reward."

Nabiki laughed. "Would it notice?"

He shrugged. "No idea. But it's earned it's keep, that's for sure." After a moment's further inspection of the spell logs he turned to her, smiling. "I almost wish something big would attack you. It would be very interesting to see what happened if the ward system decided to intervene."
Possibly quite loud though." She glared at him as he dismissed the ward controls.

"I have no wish to be jumped by a monster just to satisfy your curiosity!" she snapped. He was still snickering when 'Chou' and Aiko appeared in the middle of the living room, looking at them curiously.

"Are you annoying my sister, dear?" the tall woman asked calmly as she shimmered back into Kasumi, pulling some shopping bags out of ki space. Nabiki stopped glaring at Ranma to look at the other Tendo woman.

"He wants to feed me to a demon to see what the building wards do." Aiko laughed.

"That's not quite what I said," Ranma protested.

"Near enough." She was still annoyed. Smiling, he rose to help his wife put the food away in the kitchen. Aiko sat beside her still chucking.

"It would be interesting," she said, giggling at the look Nabiki shot her.

"Don't you start." Holding up her hands in defence, the short woman smiled.

"Only joking. Anyway, how are you? I haven't seen you in person for more than a week."

"Oh, I'm fine, thanks. We comm each other all the time, you know that." Smiling, Aiko nodded.

"I still like to see my friends in the flesh. These modern alien communicators from some distant dimension may be all the rage but face to face contact is still important," she joked. Nabiki laughed.

"Fair enough."

"I saw the news the other day. The local reporter around your university seems to be getting quite excited about the strange magical girl who's making life difficult for muggers and other criminals." Nabiki blushed.

"I've only stepped in nine times."

"Eleven."

"All right, eleven."

"Twelve if you count that car accident."

"Fine. Twelve times."

"Thirteen, counting the woman who got trapped in the dumpster. How did she manage that, anyway?" Nabiki sighed, grinning. Aiko looked very amused.

"OK, OK. Thirteen times." They laughed. "She leaned over, lost her balance, then fell in. The lid dropped and locked and she panicked. I happened to be walking past a minute later, heard her yelling, and had to pull the lock off to get her out." She shook her head. "I still can't believe it. The number of unlikely things that suddenly seem to be happening just as I'm passing is way beyond random chance."

"That's what tends to happen to people like us. We're weirdness magnets. No idea why but the abilities and the crazy seem to go together." Aiko shrugged. "You get used to it. Ranma is the biggest weirdness magnet I've ever even heard of, but it affects all of us to one degree or another. We attract strange things. Or perhaps we're attracted to them. I don't know which is cause and which effect."

"Chaos nodes," Kasumi said, coming back into the room followed by the martial artist. They sat, Kasumi offering each of the others a plate of snacks. "That's what I believe it's called in mage circles. Just by having the abilities, we tend to warp reality a little, which causes a certain amount of chaos in the locality. Or attracts the chaos already present. There are several theories, none of which completely explain it, but it does seem to be a real thing. Attracting pre-existing chaos seems slightly more likely to me but it's not something I've studied much. I should do, I suppose, when I get time. It affects all high level martial artists, magic users, magical girls, that sort of person, to one degree or another. Also some types of artistic personalities and the occasional random poor soul. They have it very hard, since they can't do much about it." She smiled at Ranma. "My dear husband is a particularly strong one."

"Not something I actually wanted," he grumped, shoving a cracker into his mouth and looking slightly disgruntled. "It's caused a lot of problems."

"Probably why we gravitate towards Nerima or Minato," Aiko suggested, thinking about it. "The background level of crazy in those places must be off the scale." Kasumi nodded, smiling.

"I would say so. If it really is true, it would explain quite a lot. I know some places around the world do seem to attract certain types of magic, chaos magic around here would fit." She looked at her sister. "I saw the news as well. You seem to have been busy." The other Tendo woman looked slightly embarrassed all over again.

"It's not like I've been looking for it, it just seems to happen." Kasumi giggled.

"Oh, trust me, I know. You're doing very well. Have you recorded more of your exploits?"

Laughing, Nabiki nodded, then sent them all the files. They watched them with interest, commenting on her performance. Overall everyone was pleased.

"Not bad, Nabs." Ranma grinned at her. "Your aim seems to be pretty good, although you missed once on that last mugging." She snickered.

"I know, but I think I pulled off pretending it was a warning shot. He looked fairly impressed. And don't call me Nabs."

"The garbage can did make a rather large explosion when it disappeared," Kasumi said, smiling. "He looked quite startled."

"I put an envelope with enough cash to cover the cost of it under their door later that night, when the police had gone," Nabiki said, slightly red. "I didn't want anyone to be out of pocket." They all seemed pleased.

Ranma leaned back with another cracker in his hand, biting off half of it and chewing contemplatively, while studying her. She looked back with a raised eyebrow. "In light of what's been happening to you recently, I think we need to work on some new techniques. Strength and coordination training, definitely, although you're coming along very well there on your own. I have a few exercises that will speed it up though." She nodded. "I'd like to teach you the cloaking technique, but one of the problems with it is that you need so much ki control to make it work that by the time you do, you've been obvious without it for months." He grinned a little. "Luckily, the ward system seems to be filling in there, so that's handy. I suspect as your power and control grows it will reduce it's oversight, since it won't be needed as much."
"OK." Nabiki grabbed a cracker of her own.

"I also want to start all of you on the hidden weapons techniques. The others are definitely at the point where they can learn it, I'm pretty sure you are as well. You don't have the power that they do, you're a year or two away from that at least, but luckily it needs good control rather than raw power. The more energy you have available the easier it will get and the larger pocket you can make, but you're already near the level where I was when I first learned it, or Mousse had while using it extremely effectively." Surprised, Nabiki raised an eyebrow.

"Really? I didn't think I had that much ability."

"You don't know all the things I did at that point, not by a long way, but your basic power level is certainly close and your handling of ki balls is better. Judging by your recordings it's very impressive, in fact. We'll go down to the basement later and you can show me." He looked thoughtful. "We need to find somewhere we can really cut loose. Indoors certainly isn't suitable, never mind anywhere near other people. Perhaps somewhere accessible by a portal." He glanced at Kasumi, who nodded.

"I can check the records for a suitable place that no-one would mind being blown up a bit. I'm sure Uthryyl could find somewhere if I can't."

"Good. It's not immediately required, but sooner or later we need a decent firing range." The martial artist laughed. "I have to admit I'm curious how big a hole all of us can make if we try. Sergeant Harada would be very annoyed if I made another duck pond without a good excuse, though. Once was enough." Returning his attention to Nabiki, he asked, "Can you stay for, oh, three or four days at least, this time? I'd prefer to put in a fairly intense session to get you started." She checked her schedule with Jun.

"Looks like it. I don't have any important lectures for the next five days, only one paper to do and I can email that one. Most of the lecturers want printed work but that one is OK with electronic documents."

"Great, that should let us get quite a lot of things hammered into place." He laughed at her expression. "Don't worry, you'll have fun. Some of the time."

"Oh, hell. That sounds painful," she said, grimacing. Aiko laughed, while her sister smiled at her.

"It only hurts for a while. Then it numbs out," the short woman said with a grin.

"Wonderful..."

"How are you coming with the trade language?" Ranma asked her curiously after a moment. She shrugged a little.

"Me speak some words, understand cow," she said in that language, making him gape, then nearly have an aneurysm he was laughing so hard. Even Kasumi was shrieking with glee, while Aiko was slowly slipping off the sofa, giggling hysterically.

"Understand more, I think you meant," he managed to say after some time. "I hope you meant that. Cows don't have much to say." She nodded, looking embarrassed but amused.

"The syntax is weird, although I have to admit it follows some fairly straightforward rules. I have problems with some of the modifiers, and a lot of the words sound quite similar." He nodded, still snickering. "Jun is able to translate for me, in the sense of letting me know what someone is saying, but can't really translate the other way. I mean, it knows the language, sure, but can't say anything to anyone else. I was surprised about that, I'd have thought it could use the comms link, but apparently it's own rules don't allow that." He nodded understandingly.

"I know. I've had long conversations with my system finding out what it can and can't do. There are a few things that it's undoubtedly able to do but isn't permitted to. A security measure, it says. The makers are even more paranoid than we are."

"I still have trouble believing that these things were sold with you two in the authorised user list. Are you sure that you've never had direct contact with the makers?" He shrugged.

"Not as far as I can work out. Apparently they know a fair amount about us, though, or at least Yori and Chou. We do have something of a reputation in some rather weird places." He laughed a little. "Places not of this earth!" His voice was deep and spooky for this last part, making everyone laugh again.

"It's very strange. But then, so are you." Looking satisfied he nodded.

"I know. It's neat, isn't it?" She gave him a long-suffering look, then glanced at her sister, who smiled.

"Have you thought any more about what I said the other week about my ideas on the communicators possibly being a covert surveillance system?" she asked after a moment. He nodded slowly.

"I have, quite a lot. I'll admit it was a good and also rather worrying thought. My system seems to be as freaked out by the suggestion as yours was, it claims to be trying to work out a method to determine whether it's compromised. I talked it over with Kasumi and Uthryyl as well. Kas thinks it's probably not true, for a number of reasons, but isn't sure. Uthryyl is pretty convinced they're safe." He took another cracker. "His contact that he got the devices through is someone he's known for over a hundred years, a very old and trusted friend." Nabiki was slightly surprised, she hadn't realised how old the demon was. "Between them they checked out the company and the world that made the devices. It has a phenomenal reputation, they've been making really advanced magical technology for centuries and in all that time no one has ever even hinted at any impropriety."

"The tech is very rare, very good, very expensive, and very trusted. I suppose they could be playing a long game, salting synthetic intelligences as spies around the place, which would actually be a very clever idea, but from what I know it's very unlikely. It's just not the way they work. They're information brokers amongst other things, they take information security more seriously than anyone I've ever heard of. Their reputation would be permanently ruined if it ever was even suspected they were stealing information. In over a thousand years no such suspicion has been raised, so it's probably safe." He shrugged slightly. "There isn't any way to absolutely prove it one way or the other, not that I can think of at the moment anyway, and in any case even if it was true it most likely doesn't matter. They don't sell personal information. At all, ever."

"OK. I have to say it's worried me a bit. Not as much as perhaps it should have, I felt much the same about the makers getting information on me, that in the long run it wouldn't actually make a lot of difference, but I didn't like the idea on the basis of privacy. Jun really didn't like the idea." She smiled. "It did a very good impression of being quite worried and just the tiniest bit insulted."

"They are remarkably good attempts at a mind," Kasumi said, sipping a glass of water after eating some snacks. "I'm sure they're learning, as well. Nao seems to be much more like a real person than when I first got it." Aiko nodded thoughtfully.

"I've noticed the same thing. The responses are quicker and more fluid and it seems to be anticipating what I need surprisingly well." After a moment she smiled at them. "Oh, I was going to mention it. Last night I think I worked out a way to feed power from the wards into the teleport amulet." Ranma looked impressed. "I didn't want to try it until I talked to you though, both so you could check it for any stupid errors, and to ask if it's all right to use some energy from the wards." He quickly glanced at Kasumi, then back to her.

"Of course it's all right. It's like a community resource. We're all, except for Nabiki, and that will change in time, putting power into the system, for future use. You're certainly allowed to pull some back out, especially for something as useful as the teleportation. You provide a service to all of us, one we're extremely grateful for and rely on, so it would be pretty mean not to allow it. Aside from anything else, it doesn't use very much power considering how much is stored in there." She nodded, looking pleased.

"Thanks. OK, I'll try it, can you check it while I run it up and make sure nothing dangerous happens?"

"Of course. Do it slowly so I can see what you're doing." Concentrating, she started doing something that made Nabiki's head fizz. She watched as best she could, seeing complex energy patterns swirling around Aiko and her amulet with the ki sense she was gradually developing. It was weirdly beautiful. "Hang on. Are you sure you want to do that?" Ranma asked, making Aiko stop and look at the pattern she was building.

"Oops. No, that wouldn't be good. Thanks." She unravelled part of the pattern and rebuilt it, the new version somehow looking slightly better to the watching middle sister. Kasumi was watching with interest as well. "Right. I think that's it. Does it look reasonable?" The other two inspected the pattern for half a minute or so, then looked at each other.

"It looks very good, Aiko," Kasumi said. "Very clean and elegant. Activate it and see what happens." With a deep breath the short brunette prodded the relevant part of the pattern with the ki/magic fusion she was learning to manipulate, gasping slightly as it sprang into life. Nabiki got the sudden impression of something enormous looking carefully at the woman, seeming to accept her request, then feeding power to her. It flowed through her into the amulet, which visibly glowed in a beautiful prismatic manner for a few seconds. The flow slowed and evened out as the amulet recharged, settling down to a slight linkage that had just enough energy to be apparent.

"Woah. That felt... weird. But kind of nice as well." The teleporter lifted her amulet and looked at it. "Completely full. OK, that part worked."

"Test it. In theory that should automatically recharge you practically anywhere within range of the ward system, which is practically anywhere." Nodding, she stood, then vanished with a flash. They looked at each other, the light was tinged with a very faint rainbow after-image, something they'd never seen before. "Interesting." Ranma checked the wards, then shrugged.

"Seems to be a visible effect from the stored energy. It's slightly different than the stuff we normally feed her, or her own, but compatible." Aiko commed them all in a conference, sounding amused.

"It works perfectly. I jumped half a dozen times as far as I could, it's still full."

"I though it was working, it's logging little pulses of power being fed to you. That's very impressive work. Well done." Ranma grinned.

"Hey, anyone want some authentic Italian pizza? I'm in Rome." Nabiki started giggling. Her sister looked at her with a smile.
"I'll have seafood, please." The other two placed orders, grinning at the absurdity of it. Twenty minutes later Aiko reappeared in the middle of the room with a stack of boxes in her arms.

"Sorry it took so long, I had to find somewhere to change Yen to Euros. That wasn't easy at three in the morning."

"Where did you go to do that?" Nabiki asked.

"San Francisco," Aiko replied with a laugh. She put the pizzas on the table, handing them each a box. "I got some for the others as well."

"You know, the last time I had pizza delivered, it took nearly an hour, and the shop is only about three kilometres away," Nabiki remarked, picking up a slice of pizza and trying it, finding it very good. "It wasn't as good as this and took three times as long to get as something that just came about ten thousand kilometres."

"That's teleportation for you. It's really useful," Aiko said, grinning, before opening her own box.

"I'll say. I wish I could do it."

Ranma was a third of the way through his pizza already, but slowed down to chuckle. "Hopefully, one day you'll be able to. Kas and I are working on reverse-engineering Aiko's teleport magic and translating it into our system. It's even more complex than the portal spell, plus there's no room for error, but we're pretty confident we can get it working in the end. It'll take a while though." He looked at Aiko who was eating with gusto, looking pleased with herself. "Eventually you probably won't need the ward power linkage, when your own levels rise enough, but in the mean time that's very good work."

"Do you speak Italian?" Nabiki asked curiously. Aiko looked amused.

"Enough to just about get by. I'm fairly good with languages. It helps if you're going to jump around all over the planet. I can squeak by in Italian, French, German, and Spanish, while I know enough Portuguese and Russian to know if I'm being threatened or complimented. That covers most of the planet, along with Japanese and English." She chuckled. "I find that pointing and waving money works most places when you're ordering food, though. It's funny, when I first got the magic in school and started experimenting, my interest in languages suddenly increased a lot. My teachers were very puzzled. They'd never have believed the reason behind it, though."

Fumiko came in at that point, sniffing the air with interest. "Something smells wonderful." Aiko pointed to one of the remaining boxes.

"Good timing. That's yours, I got your favourite."

"Thanks." The other woman grabbed her pizza then sat, opening it. "Where did this come from?"

"Rome."

Her team-mate looked at her for a moment, then shrugged. "OK." Trying some she smiled. "It's nearly as good as that place in New York."

Nabiki laughed. "Do you guys go all over the world for food on a regular basis?" Fumiko grinned, eating a larger piece.

"Not all the time, but if you have the facilities, why not? There's a place in Brisbane that does some of the best Sushi I've ever had."
The other two arrived fairly shortly, each receiving a box with a smile. Misaki had to reheat hers, but still finished it before Tamiko, who had turned up ten minutes before. When she was done she looked with interest at the two slices left in her sisters box, making the other woman sigh and push it towards her. She smiled, then quickly made them vanish. "Where does it go?" Fumiko asked the ceiling. There was no answer.

"OK, now that you're all here, I'd like to do a few hours of ki visualisation exercises. Nabiki, you haven't had as much as they have of this, but you've already worked quite a lot of it out yourself, which is impressive. I think that if we can get you all to the same point, which should be possible by this evening, Kas and I can then start teaching some of the basics of our magic system. Aiko is slightly ahead of you others, she's worked out some of it already from watching us, but you'll all learn something. We'll start by going over hidden weapons first, though. Does that sound sensible?" They exchanged glances.

"Fine by me," Nabiki said, echoed by the rest.

"Good. Let's go into the practice room, then." Soon they were sitting on the floor, Kasumi and Ranma facing the others, all of them going through breathing exercises. They were using the communicators to wordlessly speak to their students without disturbing their breathing pattern.

"That's it, sister. Do you see it inside you?"

"It's more a feeling, but yes. That's my internal ki field, I guess."

"Yep. It's pretty large already, but compare it to Aiko there."

"Wow, that's much bigger."

"She's been doing this for much longer than you have and her own magic has boosted it a lot. Look at Kas, compare it."

"Good grief. It's huge!"

"It's certainly grown a lot in the last year, I'm surprised myself when I look." A gentle giggle came over the link. "I never thought I'd be able to do all this."

"Fuck me, Saotome!" Nabiki opened her eyes to look at him, then closed them again, shaking her head in wonder. "That's incredible. You make the rest of us all put together look pretty weak."

"Twenty years of some of the most difficult martial arts there are, god only knows how much magic, a hell of a lot of other training, and a gift." He sounded more resigned than anything else. "It's not something I asked for but there it is. One day, trust me, you will most likely reach this level." He snickered, his voice in all their heads. "Of course, by then I'll have moved on. I've got quite a head start."

"Show off." Tamiko smirked. A chorus of laughs echoed silently in the room, interrupted only by eerie synchronised breathing.

"You're already past Akane's normal level, Nabiki. The others are well past what she could produce under the most extreme conditions at the moment. Kas is closing in on Herb on a good day. I'm somewhere past Happosai in raw ki." They went through the meditation and visualisation exercises over and over again, for well over two hours. Nabiki found it oddly relaxing. By the end of that part she was performing the delicate ki manipulations Kasumi and Ranma both showed them nearly as smoothly as the other four. Eventually, Ranma's voice came, female this time. He'd shifted at some point in the last half hour without any of them noticing. Nabiki found it interesting that her sub-vocalised voice matched whatever form she was currently in. Since it was all in the speech centres of the brain there didn't seem to be any physical reason for it. She assumed it was proof of how complete the change, both of the Jusenkyo curse and the illusion method were, as she'd noticed the same thing when Ranma was Yori.

"OK. I'm going to slowly create a ki fold or pocket. I would like you all to watch very carefully. It's not massively difficult, it doesn't need a lot of power, but it's very subtle. Holding it stable isn't anywhere as difficult as creating it in the first place, so pay attention."

"Yes, Grand Master," Nabiki sent, ruining it with a snicker. The others laughed.

"Pay attention, student." The red-head sounded amused. Nabiki watched with interest using the ki sense she was becoming used to as a knot of energy slowly formed in front of the presence she could sense of Ranma. She looked at it closely, seeing how complex the pattern was, little nested bits swirling away from the main pattern. As she watched it suddenly twitched, producing a weird feeling, then almost faded away, leaving something that was almost impossible to see unless you'd been watching for it. There was the sense that what she was looking at was only one end of something that somehow disappeared from normal view, insofar as any of this was 'normal'. She grinned to herself.

"That's very odd to watch slowly like that," Fumiko said, fascinated. "You can actually see the moment it forms the subspace fold. Normally it's just suddenly there."

"I know. Most practitioners of this art don't seem to be able to slow it down like this. It took me ages to do it without it going unstable and dissipating. Mind you, Kas learned it almost immediately when I showed her like this." She sounded very proud. "Right. I'll unravel it again, then repeat." The red-headed martial artist showed them a dozen times, until everyone had the pattern's basics memorised. Then she speeded it up, until the process was running at the speed it was usually applied at. This took nearly an hour. Nabiki was slightly surprised to realise how long this had all taken, and at the fact that she wasn't aching all over from having sat completely still for so long.

"Everyone got it?" They murmured assent, Tamiko and Nabiki slightly more hesitantly than the other three. "Good. Now, I want you each to try applying that pattern. Just put it right in front of you." They all attempted what she asked. It wasn't easy, and in fact for some time it was pretty much impossible for all of them. Misaki got it first.

"Holy shit," she said quietly, when the pattern snapped into stability. It only lasted about five seconds, but she was grinning.

"Very well done, Misaki," Kasumi commented. She tried again, managing to hold it stable for nearly half a minute. By her third attempt, Aiko had managed it, also for a very short time.

"Wow. That's amazing," the short woman smiled, trying again.

Eventually all of them but Nabiki had managed it, for periods of up to five minutes. She was going frustrated, the pattern just wouldn't seem to gel in her mind. The middle sister was fairly sure she was doing it correctly but something was missing. "Damn", she muttered quietly as her latest effort fizzled out before doing anything useful.

"Don't worry, sister, this isn't easy. The others have more experience working with energy patterns, they've been doing it on some level with their magic for years. You'll get it." Kasumi's voice was gently encouraging. Irritated, feeling slightly slow for not being able to do something everyone else could, Nabiki sat and thought for a while, going over and over the pattern in her mind. The others quietly sat and practised, while her sister watched her ki signature carefully, seeing how it showed determination and stubbornness. Eventually, the middle Tendo took a deep breath, breaking out of the pattern they were all breathing in, opening her eyes and looking around. They'd been at it for nearly four and a half hours, Jun showed her.

'Right,' she thought, then deliberately went back into the visualisation trance, concentrating on the pattern to the exclusion of everything else. Kasumi and Ranma watched with interest as her energy flow moved around, saying nothing. Her senses withdrew to just a memory, the only thing of importance the ki surrounding her. After an indeterminate time, without even consciously deciding to, she slowly and carefully began to build the ki pocket pattern. It wove itself into existence in front of her minds eye, each section mating with the others much more smoothly than she'd managed up until now. Eventually only the final part of the pattern was missing, which was the point it had all fallen apart on the previous attempts.

This time, she simply reached out in her head and neatly made the missing bit, gently pushing power into it, then watched as it inverted and the bulk of it disappeared into it's own little universe.
Nabiki just watched it calmly, not even really thinking, merely pleased that she'd succeeded. After some time she became aware that someone was speaking to her.

"What?" she asked absently, looking at the ki pocket still.

"I said, well done, sister," Kasumi replied, pride in her voice. "Well done indeed. It's been stable for fifteen minutes so far."

With some effort the middle sister brought herself out of the meditation trance she'd fallen into, checking the time. Indeed, she'd been sitting there for over an hour since the last time she checked.
Opening her eyes she looked at Kasumi, seeing that her sister was the only person still there. She could hear the others in the living room talking quietly. She smiled at Kasumi, then looked around.
"Wow. That was... intense. I had no idea you could get so lost inside yourself like that." Kasumi nodded calmly.

"It can be very engrossing. Working on fine energy manipulations is very complex but also remarkable relaxing, assuming you're not under pressure. I often use something like that just to wind down after a hard day. It's much more effective than standard meditation."

"You, Sis? Wind down? You're the calmest person I've ever known." Kasumi smiled impishly.

"I'm even calmer after a good meditation session. Which is why I do them in bed, when you're that calm moving can be difficult." Nabiki giggled. Standing with no effort, feeling surprisingly relaxed, she grinned at her sister.

"That was frustrating, difficult, but also very interesting. Thanks." Kasumi also stood, looking at her curiously. She gestured.

"You're forgetting something." Puzzled, Nabiki looked around. Nothing seemed amiss. Then she thought to check the ki pocket, which she'd forgotten about.

It was still there, apparently completely stable.

"Um, is that normal?" she asked, inspecting it carefully. Kasumi laughed.

"Yes, but normally not without a lot more practice." She handed her sister a bo staff she pulled out of the air. "Here. See if you can put something in it." Taking the two metre length of hard wood, Nabiki inspected it, then her sister.
"The usual method is to use some pre-existing opening, such as clothing, a pocket, sleeve, something like that, then link the ki fold to it. That's what Mousse does. He can put an awful lot more up his sleeves than his arms." The elder Tendo smiled. "You don't absolutely have to do that but it's considerably easier. When you become practised at the technique you can move the opening around to anything you like, when you want to, without disrupting the pocket, or even just leave it hanging in space. That's much more difficult though." She pulled a chopstick out of her ear, then made it disappear into her closed fist. Removing it from her other ear she flipped it into nothingness half a metre in front of her face with a grin. Nabiki snickered.

"That would go down well at parties."

"See if you can move it to link to your pocket. Like this, it's much easier than creating the thing in the first place." Kasumi demonstrated as Nabiki watched the ki flow carefully.

"Do it again, please?" Her sister complied. "OK. I think I see. Um, I do this..." Cautiously she tried modifying the ki pattern. Three attempts later she had it. "Oh, wow. That's just amazing," she mumbled, sliding the entire bo staff into her jeans pocket, which she knew for a fact was only about ten centimetres deep. She reached in and felt around, finding the end of the staff and pulling it out again. Staring bemusedly at it she started giggling, to the point that her sister had to gently guide her back to the living room.

"I think I'm OK with it, then something like this happens." Nabiki pushed the staff back into her pocket. "It's completely insane. That really is a bo staff in my pocket!" Everyone watched as she giggled helplessly, pulling it out and putting it back in, for about ten minutes. Eventually she recovered. "It's completely crazy," she said for the third time in five minutes, looking around at the others. Tamiko laughed.

"I know. But isn't it fun?"

A couple of minutes later there was a faint pop and the staff appeared out of nowhere, dropping to the floor having bounced off the coffee table. Nabiki twitched in surprise, feeling the ki pocket evaporate abruptly. "What happened?" Ranma grinned at her.

"They do that until you really get the hang of them. But that was extremely impressive." She appeared very pleased. "Over forty minutes on your first successful attempt. None of the others can do more than ten after a couple of dozen tries." The middle sister looked disappointedly at the staff, picking it up and handing it to her sister who made it vanish again.

"Don't worry, sister, you'll get it soon. You just need to practice. I would suggest that you try to get the pocket stable without anything in it, though, it would be difficult to explain if random objects just appeared out of nowhere every now and then." She giggled softly. "I managed to make half a dozen saucepans appear in the university cafeteria when I was first learning." Ranma snickered, while Nabiki leaned back and laughed.

"It was very loud," Kasumi added. "Everyone was looking at me. I had to pretend it was nothing to do with me." Nabiki rolled over on the sofa, holding her sides. "They were my best saucepans. I had to go and buy some new ones, I was too embarrassed to pick them up." Even Misaki was roaring with laughter at this point. Kasumi grinned.

When they all calmed down, the elder Tendo and her husband went to prepare a meal. Everyone else was practising the ki pockets. Nabiki found it was difficult to recreate her first spectacular success, only forming one after another half dozen attempts and finding it fizzled out after a mere couple of minutes. Ranma came out of the kitchen and watched for a moment. "I'd give it a break," she suggested. "Try again later. You're too close to the problem right now, you need to let your subconscious work on it for a while. The big success is when you can keep it working while you're asleep. Eventually it becomes so automatic it's basically permanent. I'd have to work at it not to have a couple of them by now."

Reluctantly, Nabiki gave up for the moment. They sat down and ate, just talking about various things. Looking around at the six people sharing the table with her Nabiki smiled a little, realising once more that it really was a family in all the ways that mattered. She felt that somehow, in the last year, she'd gained four new sisters, or at least close cousins. Kasumi glanced at her with her own gentle smile, having a good idea what she was thinking.

The middle sister shared the recordings of her latest adventures with the other three, making them all laugh and critique her performance. "You really need to learn the illusion technique," Misaki commented. "'Ms Aoyama' would be terrifying with your current abilities. She's bad enough when she's just standing there looking at you. Holding a ki ball and grinning at you...?" She shuddered theatrically. Nabiki laughed, picturing it.

"That could be fun. I should have some alternative persona, I guess, just to keep up with the trend. Although the bracelet does a damn good job."

"Are you still using 'Azumi Ito' when you call the cops?" Aiko asked, spooning soup into her mouth. Nabiki nodded.

"Yes, it was the first name I could come up with, but it seemed amusing to stick with it. The 119 operators seem to know it now, last time she asked me how I was getting along. She seemed quite light-hearted about it. I don't know if they're assuming that 'Azumi' and the mystery magical girl are the same person but it would be an obvious assumption."

"So far all you've had to deal with is ordinary criminals, right?" Tamiko looked at her. She nodded.

"Something I'm grateful for. I don't think I could handle anything more... esoteric." Kasumi giggled a little.

"You learn very fast when you're forced to. But I would agree you it's not something you should rush into. I'm proud of how well you're dealing with all of this, though, sister. I know it wasn't easy."

Nabiki smiled at her older sister. "A lot of the time it's actually fun. Every time I have to psych myself up, but as soon as I'm doing it I just go completely calm again. It's weird the way I keep running into these situations, but so far they've all been fairly easy to deal with." She snickered a bit. "The car accident was odd. The old man was pretty much unhurt but he got trapped. I surprised myself by being able to wrench the door right off his car. It wasn't as easy as you make it look, but I did it."

"Car doors aren't too difficult, the metal around the hinges isn't very thick," Ranma said with a smile. "If you twist as you pull they normally snap off pretty easily." The middle sister laughed.

"How are we having a casual conversation about the best way to forcibly dismantle a car with your bare hands?" The red-head shrugged, grinning.

"It's funny how often you need to do it. We'll have you picking them up soon or later." She ate a little more, then snapped her fingers as something occurred to her. "Oh, right, I nearly forgot. I went to see that mage that Uthryyl located. Nice guy. He clearly has a lot of experience, I'd guess over a hundred years or so of practical applications of security magic. He'd heard of 'Yori' and was quite keen to meet her." She smiled a little, while Nabiki rolled her eyes, making Tamiko giggle. "I talked to him for most of an afternoon about the security spell. He's more than happy to apply it to anyone we would like, although he was at pains to make clear it only works with a willing subject. I also paid him quite a lot for documentation on the theory of it, so I could look into converting it to our system."

The martial artist laughed. "He couldn't believe that there was a system so different that it needed conversion like that. I had to demonstrate. When he got over his headache he asked me not to do it again." Shrugging, she added, "It really is looking like our method is incompatible with normal mages. I wish I knew why. Anyway, I've read the notes as has Kasumi and we both think we can figure it out in a couple of weeks. It's quite complicated, but nothing like the portal spell or Aiko's teleport spell. If we need it before then we can pay him to do it."

She glanced at Nabiki. "He swore blind it was completely safe, by the way. It only affects carefully specified areas of interest, and basically blocks recall of them except when in a place that doesn't contain people who are not also in on it. You can't force someone with the spell to tell you about the things covered by it, they literally don't know under those conditions, and they can't talk willingly either, they simply forget as long as they try. I mentioned your fears about it being some form of mind control and he got quite angry. The very idea is extremely unwelcome to most mages, even demonic ones, and anyone who got caught actually doing it on almost any world I know of would be in lethally serious trouble." Her face hardened a little. "I'd help in that case."

Nabiki nodded, interested. "Good to know. It sounds like you have something that will make your eventual reconnection with Nerima possible, at any rate."

"I guess so. It will certainly remove some of the problems. But we'll just have to wait and see. Neither of us are in any real hurry."

Once they finished dinner and cleared up, they sat on the sofa with coffee. Ranma absently became male as he sat next to his wife. "You should all practice the hidden weapons technique whenever you have a spare moment. You've all got the method now, the rest is in your hands. If you need help let either Kas or me know, we'll be happy to guide you, but mostly it really is just trying over and over, like most of the other things we've taught you."

"I think we should go over the illusion method next. It's not something I expect any of you to be able to do immediately, or even necessarily any time soon, but I'd love to be wrong. It demos several parts of the magic system, though, so it's a good experiment." They all nodded. Nabiki felt she was back in an advanced class at University. She could see from their faces the other women felt much the same. Aiko caught her eye and grinned, Ranma really did sound like a teacher. The middle Tendo was becoming very aware that he'd definitely earned the honour of being named Happosai's heir. "OK. Let's start with something simple. Kasumi will change her hair colour, but nothing else. Watch the power flow, see if you can spot what happens." He laughed. "There will be a test afterwards."

Everyone looked at Kasumi, who smiled serenely, then without otherwise moving changed her hair to a rich blue. Nabiki stared. "Wow." The shimmering visual effect had been very small that time. She'd noticed a small but extremely complex change in the energy signature of her sister, in something that wasn't the ki she was slowly learning about. Studying her with her inner senses she slowly nodded. "I see, I think. That's much more complicated than the hidden weapons technique."

"Hidden weapons is pure ki. You can add our magic to it to do some interesting extra things, but you don't need to. This is a hybrid between magic and ki, it's more complicated than either by quite a margin,” her sister replied quietly. "If you can grasp this you will have learned a lot about control of both things." When they'd all examined her for a few minutes, her hair changed smoothly to red, even brighter than Ranma had in his female form. Then orange, green, and a whole rainbow of colours, most of which didn't exist in nature, one after the other. "Do you see what I'm doing? Nothing is changing except the colour. You should be able to see the differences in the method as well as the similarities."

One after the other they nodded, watching in fascination. "Good. Now, I'll apply the same illusion to each of you. Watch what happens." Her younger sister found herself with silvery-white hair, pulling a lock of it in front of her eyes and grinning.

"Hey, not bad. This would be brilliant at Halloween."

"Do you feel the different energy pattern?" Ranma asked, watching her with amusement. She nodded.

"Yes. Although I couldn't possibly duplicate that."

"We're not expecting any of you to be able to, yet. Just watch."

The group kept at it for hours, going through increasingly more complex changes, mixing them together or trying each one in turn. At one point Nabiki looked down at herself, grinning at the pair of tentacles she currently had in place of arms. "This is just bizarre," she commented, holding one tentacle-tip up and inspecting it. The change felt remarkably real. Fumiko clopped around on the hooves she was wearing, laughing.

"Amazing. It has so many very weird possibilities." Glancing at Kasumi who was watching with a grin, she asked, "Have you ever tried making a form that could fly? Something with wings?" The elder Tendo shook her head.

"Not yet. Up until fairly recently the change wasn't sufficiently thorough to allow for that anyway, although in the last few months I've wondered about it a little. I suspect it's probably possible, but we haven't taken it that far. Power to weight would be the biggest issue. The most unusual one we've tried other than for amusement is the mermaid form for swimming." She giggled. "I have to admit I didn't think of actually using it until Ranma played that trick on Nabiki. It's good fun though."

"It should be possible," Ranma said, thinking carefully. "The Jusenkyo curse is capable of much more complex changes, after all. Our technique copies some small parts of that for various reasons. There's also the fact that Taro can fly in his cursed form, which is just ridiculous, his wings are much too small. I'm not sure how he pulls it off though. Maybe some sort of levitation magic as well. Saffron had something like that." After a moment he shrugged a little. "Yet another thing to investigate at some point. Magic is strange. The more we find out about it the more we realise there is to learn. It's a lifetime's work, to be honest, and even then there would be new ideas."

#This form of magic is extremely difficult to get a reading on, Nabiki,# Jun said out of the blue. She thought it sounded surprised. #I was aware that Ranma and Kasumi had a highly non-standard method of magic control but there is nothing in my database that even hints at this. Until I saw it demonstrated so well I didn't realise how strange it truly is. I must assume that they have invented a new form. The efficiency is unprecedented. That is remarkable.# It went silent again, but she felt it was watching with extreme interest.

Finally, around two in the morning, by mutual consent they decided they'd all had enough. Ranma and Kasumi let the various illusions dissipate, then the four other girls staggered off to bed, Aiko vanishing half-way across the living room mid-yawn. Grinning tiredly, Nabiki waved her sister and her husband good night and fell into bed, asleep in seconds.

Nodding with satisfaction, Cologne rapped her cane on the ground. The two young women fighting in the middle of the back yard of the Cat Café instantly froze mid-motion, before turning and bowing to her. Akane was breathing slightly harder than Shampoo was but wasn't unduly tired. They waited patiently for the Elder's judgement.

"Very good. You have improved remarkably, Akane Tendo. I am most pleased. Based on what I've seen today I think we can move up the schedule of your special technique training." Akane grinned widely. Raising her hand, Cologne smiled in a predatory manner. "Don't thank me. It will hurt. We're going to start you with the breaking point technique. I know you have seen me train Ryoga in that so you have some idea of what's involved." The youngest Tendo had slowly paled, while Shampoo was smiling at her sympathetically.

"We will start this weekend. You will need to arrange to be away for, hmm, I think three days. If you don't learn it by then, well..." She shrugged a bit. "Either you'll get it, or you'll die." Looking worried, Akane stared at the ground for a moment, before defiantly raising her chin and staring at the elder, who returned her gaze calmly.

"I'll risk it."

Cologne inspected her for a moment then smiled. "Good. I don't think you'll die. I hope not, you're growing on me." She looked at her grand-daughter. "Shampoo, you too." It was the turn of the young Chinese woman to pale. "It's a technique I should have taught you years ago. We'll close the Café tomorrow night. Pack warmly, it will be cold in the mountains at this time of year. We need some space away from people and that was good enough last time."

Hopping up onto her staff, she looked at them again, then bounced away. Turning to Shampoo Akane just looked at her friend for a moment, before smiling a little. "I think it will be fun."

"Define fun." Shampoo grinned at her. Leaping two stories onto the roof of the building she looked over the edge, calling down, "Come on, we should tell your father. I'll race you." Laughing, Akane jumped up beside her, not quite as gracefully but fairly easily. The two young women tore off across the tiles, neck and neck.

"Here. Put these in," Ranma said, handing out earplugs. Nabiki and the others took then, rolling them up and pushing them into their ears. They were particularly good ones, as they expanded in place the sounds in the sub-basement of the apartment building became very muffled. They resorted to the comm units.

"Why the earplugs all of a sudden?" Nabiki asked curiously. Kasumi smiled at her.

"We were getting tired of repairing damaged hearing. It gets a bit loud down here. This is something we should have done before."

"I need some of these, when I was dealing with that mugger in the tunnel last week my ears were ringing for hours." The middle sister grinned.

"I have some spares, I'll let you have a couple of pairs."

Turning to the target they watched as Ranma and Misaki moved the plates around, until the one that had been at the back was in the front. The thick steel of the top plate was so scarred by practice shots it was almost mesh. "We'll have to replace these soon at this rate," the martial artist commented, neatly aligning the more than a ton of steel with the backing plates. Walking back to them he moved to the side. "Right, Nabs, have at it. I want to see five shots inside a five centimetre circle in five seconds. That sounds like a nice number." The brunette smiled slightly, stepping a pace closer to the target twenty-five metres away and taking up a stance. Crossing her arms with her hands palm up, she produced a pair of ki balls, a cold neutral expression on her face.

"Don't call me Nabs," she snapped. Ranma grinned.

"Ooh, very scary," Tamiko giggled. "I like the pose, it looks totally bad-ass. You need a long black leather coat, that would fit the look perfectly." Shooting her friend a quick grin, Nabiki went back to being the icy-calm magical girl, snapping her hands forward and firing both energy spheres at once. They impacted the plate dead-centre fractions of a second later, making it jump and ring. Before the echoes had begun to die she had repeated the process, then once more. Total elapsed time was under a second and a half. All the shots overlapped in the middle of the imaginary target zone, which she had used Jun to put a cross-hair on for reference, the six craters in the metal less than a centimetre apart at most. Kasumi clapped inaudibly while Ranma nodded in satisfaction, moving to closely inspect the damage.

"Very impressive. You've got a knack for that. Decent power, good accuracy, very good speed. Can you go any faster?"

"I think so. Move out of the way." Stepping to the side he watched as another six shots impacted the same place, so close together the noise was a rippling boom. Even with the earplugs his ears rang from being so near.

"Not bad at all. The grouping isn't quite as good, but the speed is impressive. You should practice that for a while. How are your reserves?"

"I think I could do that power level for a couple of dozen shots in a row before I started to feel it very much. Maybe a few more. It's harder to do lots of little ones than a few big ones."

Walking back he nodded. "I know. But this is very good practice for precision work. Now, let's see some compressed balls. First, how fast can you make one with the same power but maximum compression?"

She fired a shot with about two seconds lead time. This one, the ki ball about the size of a marble rather than a grapefruit, punched a hole completely through the top plate and dug a crater into the second one. "I'm getting faster but compressing it takes a surprisingly long time."

"Still, impressive, especially at your current power level." Kasumi smiled at her sister. The other four looked at her with respect.

"That's really good, Nabiki," Aiko said approvingly.

"Thanks."

"OK, Tamiko next. Same exercise." The auburn-haired young woman stepped up next to Nabiki, who moved out of the way. Taking aim at a point to the left of where the middle Tendo had scarred the steel, she fired off five shots in rapid succession from her right hand, then five from her left. Her grouping wasn't as tight although the pale yellow ki spheres clearly contained more energy than the ones Nabiki had produced. "Good. Very good. Is there a reason you did them in that order?" Tamiko nodded, grinning.
"I think Nabiki must be ambidextrous or something. I can't aim both hands at the same time and hit anything at all. Either one, that's no problem, but not both at once."

"We'll have to work on that. But very well done even so. Try to keep the power down a bit, that was a little much for down here." She nodded. "OK, Misaki, you're up."

The taciturn woman strode over, ki building in her hands as she moved. A dozen orange balls screamed across the room, fired alternately from her left and right hands, impacting in exactly the same place with machine-gun rapidity. With a grin she pretended to blow smoke from her hands. Fumiko started laughing, while Ranma was grinning.

"Impressive. I like the alternating fire effect, it looks pretty cool."

"Thanks." She moved over to where Nabiki and Tamiko were standing as Aiko took her place at Ranma's wave. In the end all of them had managed the exercise to his satisfaction. The four long-term magical girls were clearly Nabiki's superior in power output, while Misaki bested her in accuracy, but overall everyone did well. Tamiko insisted she looked the coolest, which amused her. Misaki had a go at the ki beam, producing after several attempts a thin, anaemic orange beam that flickered out after a fraction of a second, having done little but warm a spot on the plate. She frowned. "That's more difficult than I thought," she muttered, looking at her hand in irritation.

"To be honest I'm amazed you managed that much," Ranma said, looking pleased. "I'd have said you were a couple of months at least from being able to do even that. Keep practising, that was the most difficult bit to learn for the technique."

"It took me over a year from the point I could make ki shots to where I could do the beams well, Misaki," Kasumi interjected encouragingly. "You're well ahead of schedule on that basis." This cheered the woman up a little.

By the time they left the target range in the sub-basement a couple of hours later the replacement steel plate was in worse condition than the one that had been on top in the first place. Nabiki was very tired, while the other four looked a bit worn. Ranma and Kasumi had worked them hard, making them hit specific places, walk the fire across the plate in successive shots with an even specific spacing between them, vary the power from barely enough to knock someone over to high enough to punch a hole in tank armour, and a number of other modifications to the basic technique. They'd all learned a lot, but were glad it was over. "Are you all satisfied with the colour of your ki output?" Kasumi asked when they were having lunch. "You all produce different ones, which is useful so we can tell them apart, but I can easily show you how to change it. That bit is easy when you know how. At the moment it's essentially a subconscious default. It's purely cosmetic, anyway." Ranma laughed a bit.

"She says that, but she spent days tweaking the colour of hers until she got it just right." His wife blushed a little, while the others laughed.

"I like that colour."

"So do I, love." Nabiki giggled.

Holding one hand up and making a little ball of energy in it, she inspecting it curiously. "I kind of like mine as well. The same colour as new leaves." She rolled the ball around, before vanishing it. Grinning at her Ranma held his hand up with his fingers spread, making a marble size ball appear on each fingertip, each a different colour. They slowly cycled through the spectrum, the effect very striking. "OK," Nabiki said after watching for a few seconds, "you win. That looks amazing."
Misaki was concentrating on what he was doing having been sufficiently impressed that she'd actually stopped eating. Thirty seconds of study later she nodded slowly, then held up her right index finger, a small ki sphere growing on the end of it. Ranma smiled. She grinned back, then concentrated again. After some odd facial contortions, she nodded, satisfied, as the ball shifted from her normal bright orange to pink. "Well done, Misaki," Kasumi said while looking pleased. Fumiko stared at her sister.

"Not bad, sis."

Shortly all of them could get a ki sphere to appear on their fingertips, although only Misaki had worked out on her own how to change the colour. Kasumi showed them in detail, soon leading to everyone laughing as they cycled their ki output through dozens of colours. In the end, Misaki, Tamiko, and Nabiki stuck with their original colours, while Fumiko changed hers from light red to a much darker green than Nabiki's. Aiko was cycling through many different colours, looking unsatisfied.

"Nope. No, that's too dark. Yuck. Hmm, that's not bad." She looked at the deep blue ball she was holding for a moment, then shook her head. "No. Um..." Kasumi laughed.

"Worse than painting a room, isn't it?" she asked, making the shorter woman snicker.

"I'll have to think about this."

Ranma shook his head with amusement. "Some people are never satisfied."

"Can you put this box back in the attic, Akane? I don't need it any more since I got the photos out and I keep tripping over it." Soun asked, handing his youngest daughter a dusty cardboard carton. She looked puzzled.

"Why can't you, Dad?" He shuddered a little.

"Nabiki was right about the spiders," he whispered, looking nervously at the ceiling.

Akane stared for a moment, then shook her head slightly. "Um, OK. You remember that I'm going on that training trip with Shampoo and Cologne tonight, right?"

Coming back from wherever he'd gone, Soun looked at her. "Oh, yes." He smiled. "My little girl is going on her first martial arts training trip! I'm so proud." Akane giggled.

"I've been on trips before, you know."

"Not when you're the one learning. Be careful, but pay attention. That old mummy knows more tricks than you'd believe." His daughter laughed.

"Better not let her hear you call her that."

Snickering, Soun turned away, heading back down the stairs, leaving his daughter holding the box.

Twenty minutes later, she was sitting in the living room shivering, dialling frantically on her phone. "Hello? Nerima Pest Control? I need someone at the Tendo Dojo right now. Bring poison. No. That's too slow. Bring fire..."

Staring at the sight she found in the practice room, Nabiki asked, "When did you set this up?"
Ranma laughed.

"Last night after you went to bed." The red-head walked into the room, waving her hands around widely. "You need some balance training. This is easy, but it works pretty well." 'This' was an intricate maze of horizontal wooden poles, approximately five centimetres across, on stands sitting about half a metre off the floor, forming a continuous run around the room. "Think of it like the fences you saw me walking on back in Nerima. All you need to do is jump up here, then walk around for a while." Nabiki looked at the martial artist narrowly, pretty sure that there was more to it.

"Right. Just walk around."

"Yep." She snickered. "I might be throwing things at you every now and then. Just to keep your attention." Sighing, the middle sister walked over to the first pole. "Go on. Jump on." She tried, immediately falling off again.

"Ow."

"You know as well as I do that didn't hurt. You're much tougher than you were." Ranma grinned at her as she lay on the floor in a heap. Untangling herself she tried again.

"Nearly."

"Oh, much better. Pity you slipped."

"Ah, so close." Gritting her teeth, the brunette glared at the red-head who was clearly trying not to laugh, then had yet another attempt. "Finally. Right, just walk along it, then jump onto the next one."

There was a pause, followed by a thud. "Whoops. Back to the start, Nabs."

"Don't call me Nabs!"

By the time Kasumi came in a couple of hours later, holding a tray of coffee mugs, her sister was moving fairly fast from pole to pole, running along each one before jumping to the next. She watched for a moment with a smile. "Well done, sister. Come and have some tea." The younger woman dropped lightly to the floor and strolled over.

"Thanks, sis. This task-mistress here you call a husband has been laughing at me, you know." She grinned. Overall she was quite surprised how fast she'd progressed. Ranma laughed. "See?"

Giggling, Kasumi handed her a mug of coffee. "It is quite funny watching you fall off."

Drinking her own coffee, the red-head looked pleased. "You're getting better, Nabiki. I'm fairly impressed. We can move on to the next stage, I guess."

A little worried, Nabiki looked at her, lowering her mug. "Next stage? What's that?"

"That's the one where I shoot little ki balls at you." Ranma chuckled, handing her wife the teacup. "Come on, back on the poles. This will be fun."

"Who for?" Nabiki grumbled, giving her mug to Kasumi and following the other woman across the floor. An evil snicker was her only response. Kasumi laughed gently, going back to the kitchen with the tray, wincing slightly at the loud pop and exclamation of pain that came from the practice room when she was half-way down the hall.
"OW! Damn it, Saotome, that really hurt!"
"But you didn't fall off..."

Giggling, the eldest Tendo resumed her own work.

---

"I hate you."

Ranma smiled. "My work is complete." Glaring at him, Nabiki lay on the sofa while her sister healed the dozens of small bruises she had all over her body. Her clothes were peppered with tiny scorch marks. Muttering, the middle Tendo stared at the ceiling while Kasumi worked, trying to come up with a suitable revenge. Kasumi giggled a little.

"It's a bit painful, but it's also an effective training method, sister," she commented, erasing the last bruise. Nabiki growled a little under her breath.

"Did you do this?" she asked after a while. Her sister glanced at Ranma, who grinned.

"I could never fire ki shots at my wife. I love her. It would hurt." Slowly sitting up, Nabiki gave the red-headed woman an icy glare. Kasumi burst out laughing.

"Don't worry, Nabiki, I had to go through much the same thing. It was probably worse, actually, we were still working out the teaching methods. Just be happy that it's not one of Genma's bright ideas, those were close to war crimes from what Ranma has told me." Sighing, her sister nodded.

"OK. I guess it's all in a good cause."

"Great. So, we can move onto stage three, then," Ranma said. She froze.

"Oh, god."

Ignoring her whimper, Ranma bounced to her feet, leading her reluctantly back into the practice room. "Now, we just need to get all these poles two metres higher, and get the spikes set up."

"Oh, god..."
"You all right, Nabiki?" Tamiko asked, slightly concerned. The middle Tendo was sitting on the sofa staring into space. Absently she nodded.

"Two, please, Tamiko," she answered, making the other woman look confused. Kasumi smiled at her.

"She'll be all right. My dear husband has been training her fairly hard today." Ranma shrugged as the other woman looked at him curiously.

"The spikes seemed to upset her." Tamiko shuddered, remembering her own extra training.

"Ah. I see. Perhaps a beer would help," Kasumi fetched them each one. Putting the cold bottle into her sister's hand she watched with amusement as she twitched, then seemed to come back into the room. Raising the bottle she looked at it, then without thinking much about it flipped the cap off with her thumbnail and drained it in one go. Dropping her hand she held the bottle loosely for a while, staring at it, then looked at Ranma.

"I really hate you."

The martial artist smiled at her. "We can move onto stage four tomorrow." Tamiko winced, while Nabiki just sighed heavily.

"I remember stage four. I keep trying to forget, but I can't," Tamiko said faintly, then as Nabiki looked at her in horror, she began giggling. The look on the middle sister's face wasn't a friendly one.

"Thanks very much. This isn't funny, you know. I'll be scarred for life."

"Oh, I don't think so, sister, we're very good with scars now." Kasumi laughed as her sister glared at her. Ranma fell over, giggling furiously, shifting to female in the process. Tamiko sipped her beer with a wide grin on her face, watching them.

"Idiots."

Nabiki was still muttering to herself when the other three arrived. They all looked at her curiously. Tamiko grinned. "The spikes."

"Ick." Fumiko gave her friend a sympathetic look. Misaki grinned.

"Wait for stage four..."

"Yes, thanks, we've had this conversation, Misaki," Nabiki snapped coldly.

Aiko snickered, as Kasumi got them all beers as well. They all popped the caps off with their thumbs, making the middle sister grin a little, then look surprised when she remembered that she'd just done the same thing.

"All right, if we've finished mentally torturing my sister, we can get back to studying the illusion spell," the elder Tendo said, amused. "Please pay attention. I'm going to go over what we did yesterday quickly, then break it down into sections. Hopefully, with some more work, we might have you at a point you can hold the illusion yourself, although I think creating it in the first place..."
will take some time."

Ranma nodded, smiling slightly, then fetched herself a mug of coffee. The seven females spent the next few hours first repeating the demonstrations of the previous session, to refresh the memories of the five students, then went into detail on each aspect of the technique. Nabiki soon got over her annoyed mood, becoming fascinated all over again with the problem. It was both very interesting and insanely complex.

By around eight PM, they were getting tired, although some progress had been made that pleased both Ranma and Kasumi. "Yes, that's it, Aiko. Keep feeding power to that part. Now, I'm very slowly going to hand control over to you. Keep it exactly like it is, if you can. Ready?" The martial artist, male once more, waited for his friend to nod, a strained expression on her face, as she stared intently at her right hand which was currently bright green.

"OK."

"All right. Here I go. Good. Keep it like that." There was a pause while Aiko nearly went cross-eyed with effort, making the others smile as they watched carefully, then she relaxed a little.

"I've got it, I think." Ranma nodded, pleased.

"You have. You're powering it completely. Very well done, you got that sooner than I thought you would." She grinned tightly, still concentrating.

"God, this is a lot more difficult than it looks. How the hell do you keep track of all this so easily?" She lost concentration and her hand suddenly shimmered back into its normal appearance. "Damn it, I lost it."

"Don't worry. That was a very good first attempt. This magic is completely different from anything else you use, I'm pretty impressed you managed to do it that well to be honest." Tamiko grinned at her as he spoke.

"That was impressive, Aiko. I could barely follow it at all. There are so many things to do at once!" The shorter woman seemed pleased at the praise. Nabiki studied her hand with interest, as she tried to work out what exactly the other woman had done. It was slowly coming together, the whole thing was absolutely fascinating as a problem. The more she saw of the inner workings of the magical system her sister and brother-in-law had come up with, the more impressed she was at the sheer amount of skill and work involved. They were both clearly brilliant at it. She was none too sure she was good enough to duplicate their work.

Kasumi glanced at her, understanding what she was feeling. "It can be a bit overwhelming, I know, Nabiki. You'll get it. I'm completely sure of that. You don't have any bad habits to unlearn like most magic workers do, even to the extent that the others have to. I suspect, based on the attempts we've had in the past to teach normal mages we know our technique, that if Aiko and the others learned much more of the magic they use, how it actually works, they'd find it nearly impossible to learn our system. We caught them just in time." The elder sister looked amused.

Ranma snickered. "Before their magic corrupted their tiny little minds."

Fumiko giggled, while Tamiko shrugged a bit. "You're doing that perfectly well." Chuckling, Misaki produced an apple from her sleeve and bit into it. Glancing at her with interest, Ranma nodded approvingly.

"Ah. How long have you kept that ki pocket running?" The tall woman smiled.
"Six hours so far. It's only a tiny one, though. I tried something bigger and it evaporates in about twenty minutes. I thought if I started small and got that down, I could make them steadily larger."

"Good idea."

Sighing, Nabiki leaned back against the sofa. She had tried several times during the day to make a ki pocket again, none of her efforts lasting more than a few seconds to a minute or so. "I'll never get any of this, not properly. It's so hard. I have no idea how you two can make it look as easy as you do."

Ranma grinned at her with sympathy in his eyes. "It's not easy at first, Nabs. Not at all. But, that said, you're all coming along incredibly well. I'm pretty sure that there are very few people who would have learned as much as you all have in such a short period of time. None, or at least, very few of the people back in Nerima could, I think. Cologne would have the ability, no question, but she's so practised at normal magic that I strongly suspect she'd never be able to actually use ours. Akane might manage it, one day, but certainly not for a few years at least, even with the improvements she's made to herself recently. I could probably teach her some pretty neat tricks with ki, though. Hidden weapons, ki balls, that sort of thing, yes, she could learn that, although you'll be a lot better. But the magic? That would be very hard."

He thought about his old rivals and the other inhabitants of the ward. "Hmm. Perhaps Konatsu. Yes, I think he might manage it. Eventually. Perhaps Shampoo, maybe Ukyo. Not Ryoga, he doesn't have the right mindset. Neither of our fathers, certainly, same reason. Kunos?" He shuddered. "I wouldn't teach them even if they could learn, which they couldn't. Thank god. Kodachi with magic?" Exchanging a glance all three Nerimans looked appalled. "No. Not a hope in hell."

"What about Happosai?" Nabiki asked curiously. "From what you've told me in the past he knows a lot about magic." Kasumi nodded.

"He does, a huge amount. But he's not a mage, either, in the normal sense. We came up with this method between Ranma and myself, but he's shown some ability to use it, although not to the level we can. I'm not sure he's actually interested in it all that much anyway."

"Next time you see him you can ask him," Ranma said. Nabiki looked slightly worried. She'd grown used to the fact the little deviant was in fact a very helpful, smart little deviant that had been of great assistance to her sister and her husband, but her own recollection of him was less friendly. However, she was willing to give him the benefit of the doubt.

"Is that likely to happen any time soon?" Grinning, Ranma shrugged.

"Couldn't tell you. I haven't heard from him for several months. Last time he was somewhere in Australia annoying the locals. He seems happy to stay out of Japan for now. I'm sure he'll be back sooner or later, but I know he's deliberately staying away until we work out what we do about the people back in Nerima, if we ever do. He's in no hurry. You learn a lot of patience when you're over five hundred years old."

"Let's try again," Kasumi suggested after a moment. "Nabiki, would you like to try?" Slightly nervously, her sister nodded. "All right. I'll show you again, then you have a go." Holding up her hand she changed it into a leopard's paw. Nabiki stared. It was so weird the way her older sister did things like that, even after nearly a year of seeing her do it. The sheer casualness of it was odd in the extreme. "Look carefully. See how the pattern is drawing power? It's not very much energy, but the pattern is quite complex."
"That's an understatement if ever there was one," Fumiko mumbled, watching with the rest of them. They were all determined to learn these techniques.

"I think I see," Nabiki said after a long few seconds, looking at it with her nascent magic senses. "So, in theory I should just need to push power in there, and ignore the rest of it?"

"Exactly. I think that's what was giving Aiko so much difficulty, she's trying to control too much of it at once. You don't need to, it's quite stable once it's set up as long as you give it power in the right place. But it's easy to, um, how do I put it..." She thought for a moment. "Push it off balance, I suppose. Let it just float there, don't prod it too hard, or it moves, then you have to chase it and move it back, which makes it even more unstable. Until you can produce it from scratch that's too much work. You understand?" Both Aiko and Nabiki nodded.

"I think so. OK, let me try. Let's see how I screw it up." She watched as her left hand shimmered and changed, flexing it slightly and watching the feline paw move. "So weird, I can't believe how real it feels." She extended her claws, turning the paw over and stroking the soft fur. "Weird," she repeated. Her sister was smiling.

"Are you ready?" Nabiki nodded slowly, slipping into a slight meditative state, the way she'd learned the day before with the ki training. Staring at the magic pattern, she waited.

"All right. Push some power in right there." Kasumi watched with interest, hoping her sister would manage it. "Yes. Very good, like that. A little more. Not too much, that will destabilise it as well as too little, it's a delicate balance. That's it. All right, I'm going to slowly release control to you." Nabiki shivered a little at the odd sensation, a faint shimmer briefly coming into view around her paw, then fading as she managed to keep the power flow even.

"Very good. You've got about half of it now. Three quarters..." Abruptly the middle sister grunted and watched disappointedly as the shift shimmered away leaving her normal hand.

"Oh, fuck it all. I thought I had it."

"You were very close," Ranma replied encouragingly, studying her with interest. "Try again." At her nod, Kasumi reapplied the illusion. Once more she slowly released control to her sister, once more it nearly worked then suddenly failed.

They persisted, Nabiki determined to do something right, although Ranma was now looking slightly dubious. The four other women were watching carefully and making mental notes. After nearly forty minutes and over a dozen attempts, Nabiki suddenly smiled. "Ha!" She raised her paw and waved at them with it. "Got it."

"You have indeed, sister," Kasumi said with a serene smile. "I'm very proud of you." The middle sister was now providing all the power for the illusion and keeping it stable. She frowned as it nearly got away but managed to bring it back into control. The shifted appendage intermittently shimmered slightly, but these effects became less and less visible over a few minutes until it looked as real as any of Kasumi's or Ranma's normal changes. Aiko clapped, while the others grinned.

"Very impressive," Fumiko said approvingly.

"You were right, sis. You have to kind of let it do it's own thing, not try to force it." Feeling the changed hand with her normal one Nabiki grinned happily. "This is amazing." Shaking her head she looked at her paw.
"OK, let me try again," Aiko said with eagerness, no longer feeling tired. "I think I see where I was going wrong, looking at what Nabiki did." Ranma laughed, turning her right foot into a hoof.

"There you go. Try that." She grinned, closing her eyes and feeling for the magic.

"Right. I think I've got it."

"Here comes the control. About half way... There you go, you have control of it completely." Aiko looked at her changed foot, watching it shimmer slightly, frowning gently with concentration. After a short period the shimmering effect faded away, making her grin widely.

"Fantastic. You're right, Nabiki, once it clicks it's not too hard. I was pushing too much."

"When you get more practised at it you can go into the deeper elements of it like you were trying, you need to to make changes, but right now, we're just trying to build up your magic reserves. This is a very good way to achieve that, plus it teaches a lot of important things about the control of those reserves. You should see how long you can hold it. We need to do this as much as possible for a while." Ranma looked at the other three. "Who's next?"

Standing, Aiko tried walking on the hoof, stumbling badly as one leg was essentially longer than the other now. "Damn. Do the other one, let me see if I can keep them both going, plus I'll be able to walk." The martial artist grinned. Shortly Aiko was thumping around the room looking amused. Going into the kitchen she produced some clopping noises on the tiles, then returned. "That's pretty freaky."

"Do me next," Tamiko said with a wide grin. "I want a tail." Kasumi giggled.

"It might be difficult, that's quite a complex change for a first attempt."

"Do it anyway. I want to try." The auburn-haired woman giggled. "When I was a little girl I always wanted a tail. Or a flying bicycle."

Shortly she was holding the end of the cat-like tail she sported in her hands, staring at it carefully. "OK, I can see the pattern. Push there?" Kasumi nodded. "Um, all right, I think it's working." The Tendo woman slowly released control to her, until the illusion spell abruptly failed. "Fuck. Oh well, let's try again." It took five attempts but she finally got it.

Misaki and Fumiko also got the hang of the technique over the next half hour, Misaki gaining a tentacle in place of each of her thumbs and her sister sprouting cat's ears. They both looked inordinately pleased at their new abilities. Nabiki stared around at all the odd changes and laughed. "This would look extremely odd to someone who didn't know what was going on."

"It looks pretty weird even if you do know what's going on," Tamiko said, her tail twitching from side to side as she looked at it, grinning.

"Let's see how long you can keep them running for," Ranma suggested, "I doubt any of you could run them when you fall asleep, not at this point in your training, but if you can keep them until then it would be very good practice. The last one to lose gets to brag." They all laughed.

"I think it's time to have something to eat," Kasumi suggested. "I'll make a stir-fry." Soon, they were sitting around the table, eating and talking. Tamiko had surprised herself by sitting on her own tail, making her yelp at the weird sensation and nearly losing control of the spell, but catching it just in time. Misaki was amusing herself by seeing if she could control a pair of chopsticks with her thumb-tentacles, which turned out to be difficult. She resorted to a fork in the end.
Eating one-handed, Nabiki stared at the paw at the end of her other arm. She kept noticing it out of the corner of her eye and being surprised all over again. Despite close to a year of familiarity with the illusion spell, the apparent reality of it still surprised her. It was actually weirder with such small changes that when her entire body was ‘Ms. Aoyama’, oddly enough, and she was trying to work out why.

‘One of those uncanny valley things, I guess. I've seen enough transformations over the years, Jusenkyo and things like that, that you'd think I'd be used to it, but this is still damn strange and a little unsettling.’

‘Jun? What do you think about all of this?’, she asked curiously.

The SI responded immediately. #I find it fascinating. The shape shifts this odd magic system produces are impressively complete, especially bearing in mind they are temporary. I can scan your modified hand using a number of methods and in all ways that matter it appears to be genuinely what it looks like. Without knowledge of the technique I would not be able to notice it was not a real transformation. Even with such knowledge I could not determine a practitioner's true form through it. My database contains no information on anything approaching this level of complexity. Calling it an illusion spell is, I feel, grossly underestimating it. Sensory feedback appears to be complete as far as I can determine.# It paused. #Does it feel real to you, Nabiki?# it asked with a tone of curiosity in it’s voice. She smiled a little, the machine seemed genuinely interested.

‘Yes, incredibly so. I can feel everything as if it was something I was born with. It's very disconcerting. If I didn't know I could make it vanish at will I think I'd be rather scared.’

#Interesting.# It fell silent.

After they'd eaten, Fumiko, Tamiko, and Misaki went back to their apartments, determined to keep the illusion going as long as they could. Aiko hung around for a while, chatting to Nabiki about her university experiences, before finally announcing she was exhausted and teleporting back to her own apartment without even standing up from the sofa.

"So, tomorrow, stage four?" Ranma asked, glancing at his sister-in-law. She sighed.

"All right." Lifting the paw replacing her left hand she exposed the claws in a threatening manner. "But no more ki shots." He laughed.

"I can't promise anything." Chuckling, she waved to her sister, then went to her room for a slightly earlier night than yesterday. Getting into bed she went over some of her notes, doing a bit of work on the paper she had due in a few days, before quietly lying with her eyes shut inspecting the spell she was still holding stable. The power drain was quite low, although she was aware that her energy reserves would struggle to power anything much more complex at the moment. She was assured that this would change quite fast over time. Examining the spell carefully she tried not to interfere with it, just watch it, trying to work out how it functioned. The pattern was so complex she quickly became lost.

‘I hope I can work it out,’ she mused, sleepily. ‘It would be so useful, not to mention a lot of fun.’ She giggled to herself. ‘If there are seven of us who can do it, the next comic book convention won't know what hit it.’ Shortly she was asleep.

"AAGH! Fuck me, that hurt!” Akane groaned in pain, while Cologne chuckled. Shampoo looked at her friend sympathetically, but with a certain amount of apprehension. She would be going next.
The youngest Tendo woman slowly recovered, then braced herself. Dangling from a rope, as was the huge boulder opposite her, she breathed deeply, then kicked off, both of them swinging apart. Then together. There was a nasty crunching sound.

"OW! Damn, damn, ow, damn." The cry echoed out across the forest dawn.

Cologne almost giggled. This was fun.

Blinking at the ceiling, Nabiki stretched, then wiped her eyes. The feeling of fur on her face made her jump. "What the...?" Holding her hand in front of her face she stared for a moment as the memory came back. Her paw was still present. "How did I do that?" she wondered sleepily. Inspecting the spell she found it still sitting at the back of her consciousness, apparently happily stable. She saw that her energy reserves had dropped noticeably, not surprising if she'd been running the thing all night.

Slowly getting up she stretched again, peering out the window for a moment, then heading for the bathroom. Shortly she was brushing her teeth. Washing her face she frowned. The paw made it somewhat awkward. Considering dropping the illusion, she paused, then decided to leave it to show Ranma and her sister. She was wondering if any of the others had managed to keep it going all night. Washing her hands, or hand and paw, she found that drying the fur took longer than she expected. When she finished she went into the living room, finding Kasumi there dusting the table. "Hi, Sis," she said cheerily, waving her paw. Her sister looked up, then stared, a smile crossing her face.

"Very impressive indeed, Nabiki. I didn't expect you to hold it in your sleep." She came closer, inspecting the spell. "It's unravelled a little, I don't think it would last much longer, but that's still very good. You have a gift for this." Ranma entered from the direction of their room, greeting them both. He noticed the middle sister's achievement and laughed.

"I told you you'd be good at it. I've been saying that for months."

They were sitting down to breakfast when Tamiko knocked, entering and grinning at them. "Hey, look!" she said chirpily, curling her tail around her waist. She noticed Nabiki's paw. "You did it as well? Fantastic."

Sliding a bowl across the table to her Kasumi motioned to the chair. The auburn-haired girl sat, looking pleased with herself. "Did any of the others manage it?"

"No idea yet, you're the first one other than Nabiki we've talked to." Ranma inspected her for a moment then nodded. "Not at all bad. It's only got a few more minutes, I'd say, it's starting to go unstable, but still very well done for a first attempt. None of you are going to be able to create the illusion for a while, but I think we might have you up to speed on holding a full-body change for a while in a couple of weeks. Aiko will probably manage it first, she's got the highest power level and magic ability from all the practice her teleporting gives her."

Nabiki commed the short brunette. "Hey, Aiko? You awake yet?"

"More or less. I'll be up in a minute." Soon she appeared in the middle of the room. Her own illusion had reverted. Glancing at Tamiko and Nabiki she appeared momentarily annoyed. "Damn. I thought I did really well, I kept it going until I fell asleep."

When the remaining two sisters arrived they had both lost the illusions as well. The congratulated Nabiki and Tamiko on their achievements, somewhat enviously. Shortly after that Tamiko's tail shimmered out of existence, followed soon after by Nabiki's leopard's paw. "Not bad. Let's give it a break then we can put some more illusions on, we should keep them going as much as possible for a few days. It builds your reserves pretty quickly at first." Ranma looked thoughtful. "It might be interesting to see if you can hold it during the exercises, Nabiki. It's useful to be able to train with several things going on at once. You'll need to be able to do that in combat situations." She nodded her understanding.

After breakfast, Kasumi and her husband reapplied the same illusions, all five women managing to hold them stable with only a little effort. "Right. Come on, Nabs, stage four." Apprehensively she followed him into the practice room.

"Don't call me Nabs! What's stage four?"

"You get to do everything we did yesterday, only blindfolded." He looked extremely amused as she whimpered.

"Stage four sucks!" Nabiki growled, sitting on the sofa with her arms crossed. Ranma grinned at her.

"But it works. You only fell off twice. And you missed all the spikes. Well, nearly all." The middle sister looked down at the hole in her shirt, with some blood around it. She growled again. Kasumi giggled.

"Don't be angry, sister. We healed you, you're fine. It didn't go in all that far anyway."

"It hurt!" Nabiki muttered, irritated.

"No pain, no gain, that's what the Americans say." Ranma was still grinning. Slowly, she turned and gave him her best icy glare. It had little effect. "Tomorrow I'll teach you the Soul of Ice technique. You're most of the way there already. I almost felt the cold from that look," the dark-haired young man said with amusement. Nabiki grumbled a little, picking up her coffee and sipping it. She noticed she was working the claws on her still-present paw in and out reflexively. It was oddly soothing.

Ranma had needed to reapply the illusion twice during the morning's work. Amazingly enough, to her mind, she hadn't lost control of it when she'd impaled herself on the metal spike, by then she seemed to have pretty good subconscious control of the spell. That said, she was getting tired of not having a particularly usable left hand, after a moment's thought releasing the spell. With a shimmer her hand reappeared. Picking a sandwich off the plate with her newly appeared fingers, she bit hungrily into it. "Damn, that's hard work." Ranma nodded.

"Worth it, though." He watched her eat for a while, inhaling a few sandwiches of his own. "Ready for stage five?" When she froze in horror and simply stared at him he started laughing.

That evening she was past the point of growling, simple staring at him with a look that was close to visibly scorching his clothes. It seemed to please him. Aiko teleported in with Misaki, holding some bags with the logo of a New York deli on them, handing them to Kasumi while looking curiously at her sister. "Stage five," Kasumi said with amusement. Both other women nodded, wincing.

"Ouch."

Eventually Nabiki spoke. "Where did you even get a cattle prod?" she asked coldly. He shrugged.
"From a farm supply shop, of course. In Arizona." He glanced at Aiko, who looked guilty. Nabiki transferred her glare to the short woman.

"Hey, don't blame me. You should have seen what he used when he put us through stage five two years ago. A cattle prod is getting off easy."

"Mind you, it's quite a powerful one," Misaki mused out loud, causing Ranma to snicker. "I'll bet it hurts."

"Just a little." Rubbing her arms, Nabiki went back to glaring at the martial artist.

"It's only about five hundred thousand volts," he protested with a grin. "You should be easily able to take that by now." Looking thoughtful, he added, "I really must work out how to generate that sort of voltage with magic or ki one day. Sometimes a good jolt of electricity gets the job done where a blast of ki isn't quite suitable." This didn't improve her mood, although the others seemed amused. Turning his attention to her he smirked.

"It's going very well. Stage six should be easy."

Nabiki launched herself at him across the coffee-table with a howl of rage.

---

Panting, the middle sister lay on something warm, hard, and sloping, trying to remember what had happened. She could recall missing Ranma as he ducked, then chasing him around the apartment for a while, before things got blurry. Something about the practice room, jumping around on the poles he'd set up, then going up to the roof? There were some ki balls in there somewhere as well, although she couldn't remember the details at the moment.

Lots of running around on the roof, through the plants, she could vaguely remember that. Then, some jumping, followed by more running, with a lot of yelling and swearing in the mix. She had no idea how long it had been. Opening her eyes she looked up at the sky for a while, watching the late evening clouds drift past, lit a beautiful golden colour like Kasumi's ki. After some time she slowly began to wonder why she could see the sky. Was she still on the roof? Rolling her head to the side to where she could feel a familiar presence, she saw her sister in her 'Chou' aspect sitting cross-legged smiling at her. On the other side was 'Yori'. Nothing around her looked familiar from this vantage point, so she sat up carefully, aching a little, then looked around.

After a long moment she asked, "Um, where the hell are we?" They were on a roof, that much was certain, but it wasn't the roof of the apartment building. Under her was a sloped tiled surface still warm from the early summer sun. In front of her was what she recognised as the University clock tower, but from an angle she wasn't familiar with. 'Chou' giggled a little.

"About three kilometres from home. It's over that way," she pointed. Nabiki nodded slowly.

"OK." There was a pause while the other two waited patiently. "So, how did we get here?" 'Yori' laughed quietly.

"Quite quickly. At a dead run, in fact."

"I told you, no roof-hopping," Nabiki said after a moment. 'Yori' shrugged.

"You obviously forgot when you were chasing me." The pause this time was very long.

"What the hell are you talking about?" The middle Tendo was confused. 'Yori' snickered a bit.
"I told you stage six would be easy." At the other woman's slightly befuddled look she pointed to the next building along, which had a four metre gap between it and the roof they were sitting on. "You cleared that very impressively." Nabiki stared at the other building, then at her sister and her friend.

"You were scared of heights," 'Yori' said, looking slightly less amused. "You needed to overcome that. The fastest and easiest way I could think of was to make you angry enough to not notice, while training you in the skills needed for roof-hopping. Your balance is fine, your strength is more than adequate, and by now your coordination is well up to it. You just needed that last little push. That was stage six." The middle sister was still staring. "It varies a bit. I trained the other girls rather differently since they could already do it, they needed to be able to do it better. In your case you couldn't do it at first, but you've been physically capable of it for weeks. It was only the psychological part that was holding you back." The black-haired girl grinned smugly. "I fixed it."

"You bastard," Nabiki grated, flopping back down on the roof again. After some minutes she began smiling. "You bastard. Thanks." Standing she walked to the edge of the roof and looked over it. They were about three stories up. Hours earlier this would have made her stomach clench, but now she was able to look down with only a minor twinge of worry. More of the past twenty minutes was coming back to her. She could remember something similar to the time 'Chou' had carried her, leaping and running high in the air, but for some reason there was no fear attached to the memory. Considerable wrath, true enough, but no fear.

Returning to them she smiled again. "So, now what?" 'Yori' shrugged.

"Go back? Or go back the long way?" She pointed in the direction of home, then in the other direction. Nabiki looked both ways.

"What happens if I slip?"

"It will sting a bit, at the moment, but a fall of a few stories, that won't cause you any major problems, not now." 'Yori' grinned. "Basically, you'll bounce. Then swear a lot." Nabiki didn't look all that convinced.

So when her sister picked her up and threw her off the roof she screamed all the way down.

"You're both completely insane!" she screeched up at them from the ground, lying on her back on some cracked paving slabs on the street. They peered down at her.

"We'll have to get those repaired, dear," 'Chou' noted calmly. 'Yori' nodded, smiling slightly.

"This street was getting a bit worn anyway. It was overdue for resurfacing." Nabiki glared at them as she stood up, brushing concrete dust from her clothes with irritation.

"Idiots." Both women grinned.

"Come on then, get back up here", 'Yori' called. Looking around, Nabiki noticed a few people watching her, some of them smiling. She glanced up again, her hands on her hips.

"How?"

"Jump, of course. You should be able to make it. It's only about twelve metres." 'Yori' made a gesture that indicated it should be obvious. Staring, Nabiki said nothing for a long moment, then sighed. Stepping back a few paces she took a run at the building, jumping as hard as she could at what she judged to be the right point. Arcing far higher than she expected, she smiled, then the smile faded. It got replaced with a look of worry, just before she impacted the window immediately below the roof on which her sister and sister-in-law were standing. 'Chou' winced.

"We'll have to pay for that as well," the blonde noted. 'Yori' nodded. Dropping to her knees she then dangled over the edge of the roof by her feet, peering into the empty room Nabiki had landed amongst a lot of broken glass.

"You need to aim a bit higher, Nabs," she commented. The middle sister sat up, brushing glass off her clothes while giving the upside-down woman in the window a poisonous glare.

"Thanks. I hadn't worked that out. Don't call me Nabs."

Back on the roof shortly after, she looked at her sister. "Please don't throw me off a roof again, sis." 'Chou' smiled slightly.

"It shouldn't be necessary."

"For a moment I understood what Akane must have felt when she was angry." She grinned, cheering up. "I can't believe it. I just fell three stories and landed on my back, and got up. I nearly made it back as well." It was a heady feeling. Her sister smiled more widely, feeling her excitement.

"Fun, isn't it?" With a sudden wide smile, she turned and ran towards the edge of the roof, jumping across the gap to the next building easily. 'Yori' followed her, throwing in a somersault for good measure. Shaking her head slightly, Nabiki chuckled, then followed as well.

"It's been nearly two days, girls." Cologne looked at the two young women lying on the ground panting, covered in bruises, with slight disappointment. "I have to say I was hoping for some more progress. I think you can rest for twenty minutes, then we can try again." Smirking at the groans she hopped away, heading for something to eat. A minute or so later Shampoo managed to sit up with a slight moan.

"Ow. Great-grandmother is a bit of a bitch sometimes." Akane nodded her head painfully, without otherwise moving.

"I hurt in places I've never hurt in before," she mumbled. "I hurt in places I didn't know I had. I wish Yori or Chou was here, I need some serious healing." Smiling a little, Shampoo couldn't help but agree.

"They're a lot better at it than great-grandmother is, true enough." Slowly, she struggled to her feet, holding her hand out for her friend. Akane grabbed it and pulled herself to her feet. "But she's not bad. Come on, let's get something to eat."

When the Elder returned, they both stood and waited, although she was amused to note they looked worried. "Good. You're both still alive. I was beginning to wonder." Studying them for a while she eventually nodded. "I think we're going to have to try a slightly different method." She glanced up at the huge boulder still hanging in the tree. "That's too small." Both girls went white, while she chuckled evilly.

Some time later Shampoo yodelled in panic as she swung on the end of a long rope towards a small outcropping on the side of the mountain, suspended from a very tall tree. Cologne watched with interest while Akane closed her eyes, wincing at the meaty smack that followed. There was silence for a few seconds followed by vicious swearing in Mandarin, causing the old woman to cackle. Akane had picked up enough words from her friend to make her blush.
"Your turn, Akane."

"Oh, joy." The blue-haired young woman walked slowly towards the end of the rope.

"Remember what I told you. Use your mind, find the breaking point. Ryoga got it, and he's none too bright. I'm sure you can manage. Eventually." Cologne cackled while Akane sighed.

Several hours later, the temperature was dropping and it looked like it was going to rain. Shampoo looked up at the clouds apprehensively. "I hope it doesn't start for a while, I won't be able to keep on with the training." She smiled slightly sadly. "Small cats aren't going to make much impression on a rock." They both looked at each other, then determinedly got back to work. Moderately impressed Cologne watched.

It was late that evening when a loud boom echoed through the woods. Akane yelled in triumph. "Ha HA! I did it!" Then she ducked and covered as most of the debris from the breaking point strike fell around her. Shampoo yelped and dived under a fallen log, while Cologne merely batted a few pieces aside with her staff.

"Finally. I was beginning to wonder if either of you would ever do it. Good." She inspected the ruined boulder. "Now, do it again." Akane's face fell slightly. Crawling out from her cover Shampoo watched with interest as her friend braced herself, then took careful aim. She yelped in pain as her finger slammed into the rock. The elder covered her eyes, shaking her head.

"No. No, no, no. Try again." It took several more attempts and an equivalent number of pained yelps before Akane finally worked it out. "Good. Again." Another loud explosion sent birds squawking from the trees. "Again." By the time she was satisfied, Akane was covered in small dings and scrapes, blood running from dozens of small cuts. She was widely grinning though.

"Not bad, Akane," Shampoo complimented her, helping her bandage the larger cuts. She looked up as Cologne hopped over.

"Your turn again, great-granddaughter." Shampoo paled slightly, then nodded her acquiescence.

The young Chinese woman took nearly three more hours before she finally managed the technique, with another two before she could do it every time. Cologne looked approving while Akane smiled at her friend. Returning the earlier favour, she helped the other woman clean herself up. Both of them were walking like they'd been beaten half to death, which was a fairly accurate description of what had happened, but they looked very happy. Cologne inspected them both, as they stood in front of her, tired but pleased.

"Well, you took your time, but you got it in the end. I suppose that's something." They exchanged glances. After a moment she grinned, her old face wrinkling up. "Good work, girls. Let's pack up and go home." They limped after her as she headed for the tents.

Lying in bed, her left hand a paw again for the practice, Nabiki grinned into the darkness. She'd never have believed, close to a year ago when she'd first traced Ranma and Kasumi, that she would one day be capable of anything even close to what they were. She was still a long way from matching even Aiko and her team, who themselves were in most respects a considerable distance behind her elder sister, but she was on the road to it, and far further along that road than she could believe sometimes.

'I really am a magical girl now,' she thought with a faint chuckle, switching to low light vision and holding her left hand, currently not a hand at all, in front of her. She could feel the illusion spell keeping it in this form, easily holding it stable. She was curious to see if it would last all night again, but fairly sure the answer would be yes. During the day her magic reserves had built up again, she could feel it, to a level somewhat higher than they'd reached the day before. Still tiny compared to Aiko, for example, but respectable in most other magical circles. Yet according to Ranma this was only the tip of the iceberg. He was sure that within a couple of years at the outside she'd be as good at magic and ki as Kasumi was. Her martial arts abilities would still be inferior, her sister had a huge lead on her, but she was determined now to push ahead with learning everything she could.

There was a lot of practice in her future, that much was certain. Magic practice, ki practice, martial arts practice. Her sister had told her to try the roof-hopping as much as possible, as it would quickly improve to the point that she could jump off a building easily, and back again with not much more effort. On the way back to the apartment she'd fallen off once, landing nearly upright as she'd had more warning, but it was still a graceless action. She envied her sister the ability to make dropping six stories look as elegant as descending the stairs.

"Mind you, I still can't believe that Kasumi of all people threw me off a roof!" she thought, snickering yet still mildly irritated. 'That wasn't very nice. But she remembered to activate my bracelet before I chased Ranma out of the apartment, which is good.' Dropping her arms beside her on the bed, she tried making a ki fold. For once it worked easily on the first attempt, staying stable until she fell asleep, then gently evaporating in a puff of released energy.

"Hi, Nabiki. How's it going?" Akane's voice was excited. "Are you at the university?"

"No, I'm staying with Rika and Maiko for a couple of days. I needed a break. How are you? What happened with your training trip?" Her sister laughed.

"It went really well. I learned the Breaking Point! It's incredible." Nabiki winced a little. Her sister was destructive enough already, but now she could blow holes in walls just by touching them in the right place? She hoped Cologne knew what she was doing. "Shampoo did as well. We're both still black and blue, the training was brutal. You have no idea what that's like." The middle Tendo suppressed a snicker. Oh, no, of course she didn't...

"Well done, Akane. You must have impressed her if she was willing to teach you that. Try not to get carried away destroying things." Akane giggled.

"I'll do my best." She paused for a moment and Nabiki could hear a keyboard in the background. "Hey, I've been reading about your local magical girl. Have you seen her yet? She's stopped over a dozen crimes in the last couple of weeks." Nabiki snickered a bit.

"Why does everyone think I know all these magical girls?" she asked rhetorically. "I only know two, and them vaguely. I've met one more, once." Her sister laughed.

"Sorry, I just want to get an autograph."

"You sound like my friend Miki from University. She's into magical girls as well." Nabiki grinned, taking aim on the steel plate in the basement. She fired half a dozen ki balls in a stream of green energy, ducking slightly to the side as some pieces of shrapnel flew past. Kasumi casually caught one of the larger pieces as it shot past her face at nearly the speed of sound. Ranma looked amused while the other four nodded approvingly.

"What are you doing with your friends?" Akane asked, still typing by the sound of it. Firing off another burst, her sister chuckled. "Oh, we're just playing around, relaxing a bit. Good food, doing some jogging, that sort of thing." She ripped off a pair of compressed ki balls, blowing matched craters in the plate with a huge boom. Dust filtered down from the ceiling. "Having fun, basically."

"Sounds like we're both doing that. All right, I'll leave you to it. If you meet her, get her autograph, OK?" Nabiki laughed slightly.

"I'll see what I can do. Bye, sis."

"Bye, Nabiki." The younger sister hung up. Stepping back so Aiko could take her shots, the middle sister looked at Ranma.

"Nice grouping. You're getting better. How are your reserves?"

"Definitely growing. I'm not nearly as tired as yesterday."

"Good." He looked at her left hand which was still changed. "And you're holding that very well even when you're firing ki balls. Not bad at all." Aiko finished her firing practice with a flurry of shots forming a neat circle. Pulling out her earplugs Nabiki stuck her finger in her right ear and wiggled it around, dealing with an itch.

"What next?"

"How's the ki fold practice coming?" Ranma led the way back to the elevator, holding the door as they all piled in.

"Not bad. I can keep one going for about an hour today, but it takes usually half a dozen tries to get it started in the first place." He nodded.

"That will get easier. One day it will just click and it'll be completely stable. When your subconscious works it out you'll have no trouble, trust me."

"I've kept this one going for nearly thirty-six hours now," Misaki said, retrieving a bar of chocolate from her sleeve with a grin. "It's still pretty small but I'm slowly getting better at it."

Tamiko poked her friend with the end of the tail she still had. "But I'm keeping this going. You can't manage it for that long." Misaki grinned, grabbing it and pulling it hard. "Ow. Stop it." The auburn haired girl whipped the illusory appendage out of her friend's grasp with amusement.

Back in Ranma and Kasumi's apartment they all sat down for lunch. "I can only stay one more day, then I have to get back," Nabiki said.

"That's fine. I think you have several things to practice. You won't be able to do much on the illusion spell without us, but you can go over the methods. That will help for next time. Keep practising the ki fold, and do as much roof-hopping as you can. Work on getting up there in the first place, that's what you're worst at." The martial artist smiled at her, as she nodded.

"OK."

After lunch they went over the illusion technique yet again, then Ranma looked at his sister-in-law for a moment. "Let's try the Soul of Ice. It's more a mental thing than anything else, it should help with concentration as well as ki control. You can probably get it in ten minutes by this stage of your training." Thinking for a moment about the best way to start, he slowly described the process of suppressing emotions, forcing them inside under a shell of cold ki, demonstrating it in the process. Nabiki watched and listened carefully as did the others. When he'd finished, she mulled it over for a while.
It sounded like what she already did to a degree. Since she had been young, when their mother died, she'd learned to keep her calm, not to let people see her emotional, partly as a defence mechanism and partly to make controlling her environment easier. In recent years she'd recognised that, relaxing it considerably, but she still drew heavily on it when she needed to stay in control. The various fights that she'd been involved in during her recent brief stint as a magical girl had used that ability strongly.

'Ms Aoyama' was almost entirely that part of her persona. She'd nearly scared herself at first, discovering how easy it was to let that part of herself out. The illusory form helped her confidence with it, which in turn made the effect even more pronounced.

After pondering it for a while she carefully retreated into that cold internal space where she could think without messy emotional issues getting in the way, something that was very familiar to her. This time, though, she invested it with some of the ki she was becoming more and more used to using, pushing it outwards and concentrating on calm and cold. Everyone stared as they felt waves of cold air rolling off her, little ice particles forming on the sofa near her.

"Wow," Ranma said quietly. "That's downright scary. I knew you'd pick it up quickly but that's just..." He shrugged. "Damn impressive. Even Cologne would say so." He got up and retrieved a glass of warm water, coming back and handing it to her. With emotionless curiosity, she accepted it and watched as it froze solid in seconds in her hand.

"Interesting," she said quietly.

"Can you turn it off, please, Nabiki?" her sister asked. "It's very good, but you're going to kill the house-plants at this rate." The middle sister looked around for a moment, then shrugged.

"All right." Moments later she shivered a little, putting the glass down and blowing on her fingers which were suddenly going blue.

"Damn. That's cold. Did I really do that?" Everyone nodded. "Weird. That's an odd sensation, it's almost like being a machine. Not angry, or sad, or happy, or anything like that, just being there watching the world. Very odd."

Ranma was watching her with interest. "You got that faster than I've ever seen," he commented. "I thought you were most of the way there. You could find some very useful applications for it. I know I did. I'm not going to tell you what they are, I'm interested to see what you come up with on your own." He grinned at her look of irritation.

Everyone else tried it but no one could match the instant success that Nabiki had enjoyed, although they all found they could do it to a degree. Eventually Kasumi stood up, smiling at them. "Come on. Let's go out. We haven't had a good look around for days." She shimmered and became 'Chou'. Her husband raised an eyebrow, standing and becoming 'Yori' before she'd finished moving. Aiko glanced at her team then they grinned.

"We'll be back in a minute." Clustering together all four disappeared in a flash of rainbow-tinted light. 'Yori' and 'Chou' looked at Nabiki, then each other.

"You could go like that with the bracelet, but perhaps we should give you another persona." She looked back at them.

"OK. Any suggestions?"

"Well, the same general size and shape, you're still learning roof-hopping and things like that, a different height would confuse you a little until you get some practice. So, fairly small changes, but we can do a lot like that." Her sister walked around her thoughtfully. "Hmm. Different colour hair definitely."

"I liked that silver-white effect from the other night." 'Chou' nodded slightly, smiling.

"So did I. All right." Nabiki's hair faded to a silvery colour, glinting in the light. "Longer, I think." It grew longer and the style changed, flowing down past her shoulders. "That looks nice." She sent her sister a view of her own face. Nabiki nodded approvingly.

"Very good. How about, um, amber eyes? Something unusual." 'Chou' smiled.

"Oh, I like that. Very good." The eyes changed to the requested orange-amber colour, which together with the silver hair was remarkable. "Nice." The other woman looked her sister up and down, while 'Yori' watched with interest.

"Let's do the face. Let's see. Narrower chin. Slightly wider set eyes. Yes, that looks good." She made a few more tweaks, raising the cheekbones, changing the hairline, moving and tilting the ears. By the time she was done the changes, all quite small apart from the eyes and hair, produced a face completely unrecognisable as Nabiki.

"Wow. That's remarkable," the middle sister said in a completely different voice, deeper than her normal one.

"It's very good," 'Yori' said approvingly. Aiko and her girls reappeared in the room, dressed in their new uniforms, then inspected the new version of Nabiki.

"Hey, that's not bad at all," Tamiko remarked. "You need the long coat, like I said. You'd look absolutely kick-ass." Nabiki glanced at her sister who smiled. She found herself wearing a black leather coat that came down to her ankles, quite form-fitting to half-way past the hips where it flared out a little. On her feet were leather boots like the ones the others were wearing. Inspecting her appearance as sent by the disguised Kasumi she nodded.

"Impressive." Holding her hands up she dismissed the small change she was still running, then produced a ball of green ki in each hand, looking icily at the others, cold air running down her body and chilling their feet.

"Wow." Tamiko giggled nervously. "That's nearly as bad as Ms. Aoyama."

"Thank you," Nabiki said, smiling in a way that made the other woman step back involuntarily.

'Yori' snickered. "So what's this one called?" Nabiki looked at her.

"Azumi Ito, of course." Everyone nodded, as 'Azumi' laughed in a way that would make most people turn and run.

Sergeant Harada looked up as he heard a familiar sound, grinning as he saw Yori, Chou, and the other four bouncing along the roof-line. He stared as he saw that there was a seventh female figure in the group, long coat billowing behind her impressively as she cleared the gap between two buildings. "I wonder who that is," he muttered, before resuming his walk to the station.

Corporal Otani glanced at his companion as the man in front of them backed slowly out of the alley, his hands clasped on top of his head. The expression on his face was... unsettling. Looking around he spotted them, relief flowing over his features. He walked over.

"I'm Taro Nijo, and I'm a mugger. Could you please arrest me? I've mugged five people in the last week." The two police officers looked at each other again. He seemed quite serious.

"Why are you telling us this?" Otani asked curiously. He had a good idea.

"The lady told me to." The mugger shuddered in remembrance.

"Short girl, black hair in a long braid with a blue stripe in it?" The corporal was smiling a little. He looked surprised when the man shook his head.

"She was there, but it was the other one. The scary one." Meeting his colleagues eyes as the officer gently handcuffed the man, Otani looked puzzled.

"A tall blonde?"

"No, the scary one. She had silver hair and sort of orange eyes, with a long black coat. She was cold." He paused and shuddered again, staring at them with an expression of terror. "So cold," he whispered. "She said if she saw me again something terrible would happen, and to go and find a policeman and turn myself in. You'll take me away, won't you? Please?" The man seemed pathetically hopeful, glancing over his shoulder at the mouth of the alley he'd come from.

"All right. Don't worry, you're safe now." Otani reassured the man, wondering how it came to be that he was trying to comfort a self-confessed criminal. The man suddenly let out a little squeak of terror, looking past the police officers in an upward direction. Corporal Otani studied him for a moment, then followed his gaze.

Standing on a roof on the other side of the road were a number of familiar figures, plus one he'd never seen before. The woman in the long coat was standing right on the edge of the building, her arms crossed and her expressionless gaze fixed on the mugger. Very slowly she smiled coldly, before turning and bounding up and over the roof. Yori grinned at the two policemen, waved, then followed, trailed by the others. Otani watched for a moment before turning to his colleague.

"Looks like Yori's found a friend." Both officers grinned before helping the mugger, who had collapsed to his knees, to stand before walking him back to the station.
"We'll start you properly on martial arts next time," Ranma commented, as she carried the last of the training aids back into the storage room. "Those moves I showed you should help if you have to fight until then, though. You picked them up fast. Practice those two katas every morning for an hour or so as well." Nabiki nodded, looking out the window into the park behind the apartment building, watching people wandering around enjoying themselves. A group of mixed ages and genders appeared to be going through some sort of dance training, looking like they were having fun. Watching them for a little longer she turned at the sound of a pair of clunking sounds from behind her. The red-head was grinning at her from behind a pair of familiar looking iron weights.

"But right now, I want to see how much your strength has improved."

The middle Tendo looked at the weights for a moment then nodded again. "OK." Walking over she grabbed the handle on the smaller one, remembering how heavy it was and how hard she'd had to lift previously. Bracing herself she heaved, yelping as it came off the floor far more easily than she expected, nearly sending her over onto her back. Staggering a couple of steps she managed to catch her balance, holding the weight at waist level. It was surprisingly simple. The thing felt quite heavy, but was something she could easily hold for several seconds, without overly straining herself.

"Is this the same weight?" she asked suspiciously, examining it. The martial artist nodded, grinning widely.

"Yep. Three hundred and fifty kilos."

"Wow." Nabiki lowered it to the ground carefully. Then she picked it up again. Putting it down once more she tried with one hand, managing to make it move a few centimetres but finding it just past the point she could do easily. "Unbelievable."

"Try the big one." That one she could now get off the floor as well although it was more of a struggle.

"I still can't believe this," the brunette said, pulling it to her knees before lowering it again, then repeating the feat. "Half a ton, and it's pretty heavy, but manageable. I know Akane can do this pretty easily, but I never thought I would."

"It's the ki usage, it builds strength very quickly when you get past a certain point. Akane was lifting boulders that weighed over a ton when she was about sixteen, she could probably manage five or six tons now, more if she was really motivated. I'm not sure what my upper limit is, I haven't tried for a while. Kas can certainly bench-press a decent size truck if she wants to, while Aiko and her team can do about the same but with more effort. They've probably tripled their strength at least since Christmas, they're stronger now without the magic boost than they were five months ago with it." Ranma smiled a little. Nabiki was still playing with the half-ton weight. "Would you like to try something bigger? We can go down in the basement and move those plates around, they're about a ton or so each."

Putting the block of cast iron down for the last time, Nabiki shook her head. "Not right now, thanks." She stared at the weight for a moment, then smiled. "Amazing."

"It's neat, isn't it?"
Back in the living room she took the coffee Kasumi handed her with a smile, thanking her sister as they sat. "I'll have to go soon," the middle sister said. "But this has been a lot of fun. Mostly."

Casting an evil look at Ranma she watched as the other woman snickered.

"Hey, it wasn't me who threw you off a roof!"

"True." She transferred the look to her sister, who smiled back, unconcerned.

"Sometimes we have to do things we don't enjoy," Kasumi said mildly. After a pause she giggled. "I'll admit part of me did enjoy that, though. You should have seen the look on your face as you went over the edge!" Ranma collapsed in giggles as Nabiki glared at them both.

"Still idiots..."

She grumpily drank her coffee until both of them had recovered. "Well, I think it's been an effective few days," Ranma said, grinning. "You mastered the Soul of Ice instantly. I was pretty sure you would but I'm pleased even so. Your roof-hopping needs practice but it's not bad. Ki usage is getting very good, plus the power is increasing nicely. Your control of ki balls is excellent. The ki fold is still a bit hit and miss, but you know all the principles, you just need to practice it. And you have the basics of our magic control system down well, you can power it quite well, although you need a lot more practice yet. I think in a couple of months you might be able to do some simple illusions entirely on your own and be at a point of holding a full body change in perhaps two weeks. Six months and you'll be pretty good at it."

Nabiki listened to her report-card with a pleased expression. Her sister smiled. "Well done, Nabiki. You met my expectations very well and exceed them in a few places. I'm very proud of you."

"Thanks, sis."

"In two or three months we can start you on the basics of wards and some of the other spells. The portal spell will have to wait, it's extremely complex and I'm afraid you simply don't have the fine control for it yet. Even Aiko won't for quite a while and she's already quite good at energy control." Nodding, Nabiki finished her coffee and put the empty mug on the table.

"I'm in no hurry. It's not like I need to travel to any other worlds on my own right now. Although I think I'd quite like to visit one or two soon."

"We intend to visit Uthryyl over the summer, you can come if you'd like to," Kasumi said.

"I'd like that. He and his family are nice."

Ranma nodded. Studying Nabiki for a moment, she smiled. "I really am both pleased and impressed, Nabiki. You've picked all of this up very well. I'm sorry for torturing you like that, but it seemed the quickest, if not least painful, method of getting you to the point you need to be." The middle sister sighed a little.

"I know, looking back on it, but it wasn't fun."

"I warned you it would hurt a little."

"A little?" Nabiki gritted her teeth for a moment, then relaxed. "All right, I guess I forgive you. All in a good cause and all that." Ranma grinned, becoming male as he stood.

"Exactly. Come on, let's get something to eat before you go back."
After lunch Nabiki looked around at her friends and family, which were in fact more or less the same thing. "It's been great, guys. I guess I'll see you again in a week or so."

Aiko stood up. "Come on, Nabiki, I'll jump you back, no point wasting time with trains."

"Thanks." She retrieved her bag from her room, then hugged her sister goodbye.

"We only have about three weeks or so on the portal device timer to go, then we're either in the clear or in the shit," Ranma said, inspecting her with interest. She nodded. "If we have to go and deal with the last one, assuming it either goes off or we somehow find it at the last minute, do you want to come?"

Nabiki stopped dead, surprised. Then she thought hard. "I think I'd like to come," she eventually said, slightly surprised at her own decision, but clear on it. He simply nodded.

"OK." Stepping to Aiko's side Nabiki activated the bracelet in case they got spotted, then waved. "Bye, guys." The two women disappeared in a flash of light.

Genma stood with Soun, watching as Akane and Shampoo sparred in the middle of the Dojo, their students in a group on the other side also watching with interest. "She's getting quite good," he said quietly to his friend. Soun nodded with pride.

"That she is. It makes me proud. Shampoo has helped her enormously, on top of the improvements she's made to herself. I think she'll be a worthy heir to the Tendo Dojo." He looked slyly sideways at his old friend. "Pity there's no suitable Saotome heir to allow the schools to be joined." Genma sighed a little, then punched him in the head.

The sparring young women stopped to watch as the two elders fought, the scuffle quickly ending up out in the yard. All the students glanced at each other before clustering around one young man who was the holder of the betting book. Bets made they dashed out to watch. Akane looked at her friend, shaking her head.

"Men..." Shampoo giggled.

"Come on, let's watch." They headed out after the moving fight. Five minutes later everyone was standing around the pond in which was floating an unconscious panda, collecting their winnings. Soun watched dizzily, lying half out of the water, while Nodoka stood on the porch grinning.

"I keep telling you, it's possessed!"

Cologne hopped along the street, thinking about her grand-daughter and the Tendo girl. She was rather impressed with the change the latter had managed to make in herself in the last year. Clearly, those two magical girls had fixed something very important, but there was no denying that the young woman had put in a remarkable amount of effort herself to become a better person. She'd never have expected it, based on the last few years, but she was pleased nonetheless.

'Pity I couldn't have trained her from childhood,' she mused, 'she could have been something extraordinary. Even so, better late than never.'

Spotting a familiar crop of brunette hair in the distance she looked more carefully. The middle Tendo sister had just come out of the shop she knew Akane worked at, presumably back from University and visiting her sister. Cologne considered the girl with interest. There was another person who had matured in a way she wouldn't have expected. The woman seemed to have diverted herself from the potentially unpleasant path her earlier life seemed headed down into becoming a responsible and sensible person. The Elder was both impressed and pleased. Despite their occasional crossing of swords she quite like the middle sister. She reminded her of herself in some ways.

'Smart, very smart, cunning, and potentially powerful. She could go a long way. Pity she's never shown any interest in the arts of war, I suspect she'd have been very good at them. Her intelligence-gathering skills are formidable, though, even at such a young age. I'm glad we seem to have become friendly although I'm not entirely sure how it happened.' The old woman chuckled. Hopping closer she was about to call a greeting when she noticed something odd about Nabiki.

'That's strange. What is that?' Probing cautiously she froze, then blinked. Looking around she shrugged.

"Hmm. What was I thinking about? Oh well, it'll come back." She mumbled a little, resuming her motion down the street. Ahead of her she noticed a familiar figure.

'Ah. Nabiki must be back. I suppose she was visiting Akane, she's working just down the street.' Frowning, about to call out, she noticed something odd about the woman in front of her, and probed carefully...

"Six times in twenty minutes," Ranma said with a chuckle. "I think she must have been following you or something. The ward system seems to be having fun." Nabiki giggled, causing the student next to her in the lecture hall to glance at her with a puzzled smiled.

"I shouldn't find that funny but for some reason I do. I hope it's not causing her any damage."

"She'll be fine. Anyone else probably wouldn't keep noticing but Cologne is very perceptive, not to mention powerful enough to keep overcoming the effect. I'll see if I can figure out a way to modify the system to prevent her noticing in the first place, or she's in danger of walking into traffic when she's around you." Chuckling again, Ranma disconnected.

Finishing with her written test Nabiki checked the work, then stood. Handing it in she nodded to the invigilator before leaving the room, heading for the small cafeteria on the ground floor. She was ravenously hungry. Pulling some coins out of her pocket, not making it obvious that they were in fact coming from a ki fold linked to that pocket, she dropped them into the vending machine and punched the right buttons for some chocolate, a sandwich, and a drink, before looking for a table.

In the last week and a bit her ki fold practice had paid off. The middle Tendo could now maintain a small one indefinitely with ease, although making it bigger was still difficult. Even so, the pocket could hold a surprising amount. She had a fair amount of cash, several books, and a change of clothes in it, without leaving a trace from the outside. Unfortunately she still couldn't keep it stable without linking it to something, which annoyed her. She was envious of the way Ranma and Kasumi could make things just vanish in thin air. So she kept practising.

Miki's number came up on her internal viewpoint. Answering the call absently she bit off a piece of slightly stale sandwich. "Hello, Nabiki, are you busy?" her friend asked. The other woman was becoming quite close to her, as was her boyfriend. She was pleased to be making new friends suddenly, after several years of living across from the young woman.

"No, I just finished my last exam for this week, I'm having lunch."
"Good. I've got a free afternoon, I was wondering if you'd like to come shopping with me? I need to get some clothes and I also wanted to find a new phone. This one is becoming unreliable, it keeps dropping connections."

"Yes, why not? I could do with another notebook or two. Let me go back and change, I'll meet you outside the library in about, oh, let's say fifteen minutes?"

"Great. See you in a bit." Miki hung up. Finishing her food Nabiki discarded the waste then headed back to her room.

Shortly she was standing outside the library, waiting. A few minutes later Miki walked up. "Hi," she said, smiling at the Tendo woman. "How did your exam go?"

"I think it went well, actually. There was one question I got stuck on but I think I managed to fake it well enough to pass." Nabiki smiled. "If not, well, my marks are good otherwise, it won't make that much difference." They began walking towards the nearest Metro station. "How is your own work going?"

"Not bad. I've written more papers in the last month than in the previous three years, though. Economic theory is complicated. And extremely wordy." She giggled, making Nabiki snicker a little.

"True. Very true." After walking in silence for a moment, her friend looked at her.

"Foiled any more muggings lately?" she asked, smirking a bit. Nabiki sighed a little.

"Yes, dozens, also three bank robberies, two kidnappings, and an international terrorist plot."

Miki laughed. "No need for sarcasm. I'm still impressed about how easily you dealt with that guy the other day, though. It was amazing."

"It wasn't anything special. I know several real martial artists who could have dealt with it much faster and more easily." Nabiki shrugged. "I'm not really a martial artist, I just know..."

"...A few good tricks. Yes, you keep saying that." The other woman grinned at her. "Still, it was very impressive. I feel much safer being around you." Nabiki sighed theatrically, but smiled.

"People don't want me for my devastating wit or clearly superior intelligence, they only want me to protect them from the bullies."

"Exactly." Both young women laughed. Arriving at the Metro station they waited for a short time, before finding themselves heading toward the local shopping area. Nabiki kept an eye open for anything that might need an 'intervention' but saw nothing other than a young man who seemed unduly interested in staring at young women, which was clearly making several of them uncomfortable. Manoeuvring herself into a position a couple of metres away from him she caught his eye and gave him a look filled with liquid helium. He stared in horror, flinching away as she smiled coldly. Something in her eyes made him back away, heedless of the people complaining as he bumped into them. Miki didn't notice, as she was poking irritably at her phone, which had died again.

Satisfied, the middle sister turned around, standing beside her friend, while behind her, her victim fought to be the master of his own bladder. He lost, which didn't make him any friends on the crowded train.

Two hours later they walked out of a cellphone shop, Miki gleefully fiddling with her new phone.
"This is great. It does all sorts of cool things."

"Does it make phone calls?" Nabiki asked dryly.

"I think so, if I can figure out how," her friend laughed. "I'll have to read the manual again." They ended up in a sushi bar where they decided to have a break. Having ordered, Nabiki excused herself to use the facilities. On the way back she stopped suddenly, looking around carefully. She could feel a definite threat in the area, but as she'd become used to the new senses she could tell it wasn't aimed at her. Somewhere very close though. Debating what to do, she glanced to Miki, noticing the woman wasn't looking in her direction, involved as she was with her new phone. Quickly checking around discreetly she saw that none of the limited security cameras seemed to cover her area either. Coming to a decision, she went back into the female bathroom, activating the bracelet as soon as she was inside, then easily pulled herself out the open window at the back, which was close to two metres off the ground.

Once outside she checked around, feeling for any witnesses, before jumping to the roof of the building, some two stories up. Heading in the direction she'd determined the trouble was coming from she quickly found herself looking down at three men in the process of robbing a pawn-brokers shop. One of them appeared to be concealing a handgun of some sort under his coat, while the other two had baseball bats. The man with the gun and one of his co-workers were in the shop, visible through the window, while the other one was doing a particularly poor job of looking inconspicuous while standing guard outside in the street. Several people seemed aware of what was going on and were sidling away in a manner designed not to attract attention, while most of the shoppers in the street seemed oblivious.

Sighing, she looked around. There were no police visible from her vantage point, which made sense, as presumably even fairly dim robbers would be smart enough not to ply their trade in front of the law. Placing a call to 119 and having Jun start recording she dropped lightly to the ground, "Hi. Police, please."

She walked calmly across the road to the guard thief, who watched her when he noticed the direction she was heading. Stepping forward he held out his hand in a warning sign, becoming very surprised when the slim young woman took this as an offer, grabbed the outstretched limb, and flipped him over her shoulder. The small number of spectators gasped. "Yes, hello, I'd like to report a robbery in process." She kicked the man gently behind the ear in the place her sister had pointed out was particularly effective, nodding in satisfaction as he went limp.

"It's the pawn shop in central Sangenjaya, next to the post office. Yes, that's right." Walking inside she looked around. The two men were involved in smashing display cases and shovelling things from them into a pair of bags. The owner of the shop was cowering at the back, the man with the gun, some sort of automatic, intermittently pointing it at him to make sure he didn't try anything. She shook her head irritably. Producing a pair of ki balls she held them in front of her menacingly, pointing one at each robber. "Three men, one armed with a hand gun, the other two with baseball bats. One is unconscious in the street."

Both robbers noticed her, freezing in shock for a moment. The one with the bat suddenly lunged at her, reacting much faster than his friend. She stepped to one side, lifting her knee in a simple but impossibly fast motion, causing him to fold over it with a grunt of pain. Hopping back she lashed out with her foot into his groin, then slammed her elbow into the place she'd caught the other one outside in as he went past. The second man dropped and bounced, then lay still. His friend stared in shock, the entire exchange had taken about two seconds. He hadn't even seen the brunette girl move except as a blur.
"One is unconscious in the shop." Raising his gun in a slightly trembling hand, the remaining thief aimed at her. Slightly worried inside as she wasn't completely sure she could take being shot yet, she gave him a frigid glare. Out loud she said, "That's a very bad idea." She concentrated on the gun, feeling everything slow down as her entire attention focussed to a level she wouldn't have believed a few months ago. Oddly, despite the slight momentary worry otherwise she felt completely calm. The shop owner wondered why it was getting colder, his air conditioning was broken as far as he knew.

Nabiki watched as the trigger slowly moved. The hammer lifted and fell, a deep bang accompanied a flash of yellow flame from the barrel, then her right hand lashed out without conscious direction even as she moved and twisted to the side, the ki ball it was holding dissipating in the process. It closed on something moving fast, bringing it to a halt even as she slowed and fired the other ki ball at the robber, who wasn't nearly fast enough to duck, collecting it in the middle of the chest and flying backwards as the energy sphere detonated with a sharp crack. He hit the back wall of the shop and slid down it limply, semi-conscious and smoking slightly. The middle Tendo came to a halt, while the shopkeeper stared in disbelief.

She opened her hand, looking at the contents with detached interest. A 9mm bullet lay there inoffensively, showing none of the lethal intent it had done when it was moving at a few hundred metres per second. "Hmm," she muttered. "The third robber is down. He fired his weapon. There are no casualties." Walking over to the man lying on the floor staring at her in dazed horror, she looked down at him, before dropping the bullet on the floor next to him. Squatting down she looked very seriously at him.

"That was a very dangerous thing to do, you could have hurt someone." Taking the gun gently from his limp grip she looked at it for a moment, before grabbing the barrel with her other hand and twisting hard. The weapon bent visibly with a creaking sound. He went white. Placing it on the floor beside the bullet she smiled at him in a manner that made him begin praying audibly. "Make very sure I never see you again." As he nodded rapidly, speechless and terrified, she stood up, turning to the shop owner, who was staring at her in mixed terror and thankfulness. He had no idea who this extraordinarily worrying young woman was but he was certainly grateful she had stopped the robbery. He was also desperately hoping she would soon leave and never come back.

"Are you all right?" she asked. He nodded.

"They didn't hurt me, just scared me." His expression suggested that it hadn't been to the level he was feeling now. Slightly amused she smiled, putting more warmth into it.

"Good. The police will be here soon. I hope you can get all this fixed easily. Goodbye."

The sound of the police operator yammering at her made her sigh a little as she left the shop, walking across the road while a few people watched without approaching her, then jumping back onto the roofs and heading back to the sushi place. The total elapsed time was around three minutes. "Yes, Azumi Ito, that's correct. Sorry, I have to go." She disconnected as she reached the roof of the sushi restaurant. Standing there Nabiki released the last of the soul of ice she'd been using, almost unconsciously, before shaking her head in mixed wonder, shock, and amusement.

'Holy crap, I caught a bullet!' It took her a little while to get over that.

Miki looked up as her friend returned from the toilet. "Finally. I thought I was going to have to come and look for you." She smiled, then indicated the food. "Everything is here." Nabiki sat down, smiling back. They turned to look out the window as a police car rapidly passed the restaurant, it's lights flashing and siren sounding. "I wonder what that's all about," the other woman said absently, reaching for a salmon roll.
Nabiki smiled slightly, then passed the soy sauce.

"Three hundred metres away!" Miki said, waving a printout. "We were having lunch three hundred metres away when this magical girl was terrifying robbers! I can't believe it." John smiled at his girlfriend while Nabiki snickered into her milkshake.

"Calm down, Miki. You'll pop something," the young man said, chuckling.

"But we were right there! What are the odds?" The woman looked frustrated. "I'll never get her autograph now." Laughing, her boyfriend patted her hand, glancing at the Tendo sister, who smiled.

"You're obsessing, Miki." Sighing, Miki dropped the website printout on the table and picked up her burger. Nabiki picked it up and read it with interest. It was a report from the local news service, detailing her little adventure in the pawn-shop a couple of days ago. She shook her head, amused.

"You really are getting a bit over-involved, you know. You're worse than my sister Akane." Miki giggled.

"You think I'm bad, you should see my sister. Hana would be running around interrogating everyone in the area looking for this girl." She laughed a little more. "You should have seen her reaction when I showed her Yori's signature and the others. I really owe you for that. She nearly exploded." Nabiki grinned, eating some fries.

"I'm glad I could help."

"The various websites about magical girls are going nuts about this latest one," Miki said after swallowing the rather large bite she'd taken. "They finally have a name. Azumi Ito. No one has any description of her, or rather there are lots of descriptions, all of them conflicting. It's weird. Mind you, lots of magical girls have some sort of identity protection magic." The middle sister looked at her friend with interest.

"Are there a lot of websites about magical girls?" The other woman nodded, taking another bite. She chewed and swallowed.

"A few. Most of them are fairly new, only two or three are more than a year or so old. There isn't much real information on most of them, just lots of guesswork. People trade autographs, photos, that sort of thing. All but one of them are in Japan, but there is one in the UK that started up just after Christmas. I guess it had something to do with the London disaster." Nabiki made a quick request to Jun to investigate these websites, out of curiosity more than anything else. She was interested to see how much of the information was anywhere close to correct.

"I can't believe we were so close!" Miki looked at her printout again, annoyed. "Oh well. Maybe next time."

"I think that should do it," Ranma said with satisfaction, poking the last line of the spell into position. Nabiki watched with interest. The ward spell was the most incredibly complicated thing she'd ever seen in her life, she had absolutely no hope of working it out. It made the illusion spell look like child's play. The fact that her sister and a person she had for nearly two years had marked down as nice but a bit dim had come up with it, even with Happosai's help, simply boggled her mind. The red-head looked her work over carefully, then nodded. "These changes should modify the ward behaviour slightly. It will be a little more subtle in it's effects now, masking your signature to a degree all the time, rather than retroactively jumping on people and scrubbing you from their memories. It was getting a little overenthusiastic, which could attract the attention it's trying to avoid." She grinned. "Full marks for effort, but minus a bit for effect."

"Great. So, now Cologne won't notice the changes to my power signature at all?"

"Not unless you bring it to her attention. The wards might allow her to remember it then, they might not, depending on her attitude. If it senses hostile intent it will react appropriately." Nabiki winced a little. She had a feeling that could be anywhere between fairly innocuous and extremely bad, for the hostile party at any rate. She was becoming more sensitive to the ward system as her magic ability grew, she could feel it watching her protectively all the time. It was comforting, more than anything else, like having some enormous predator gently purring at the foot of your bed while you slept. But it boded ill for anyone who prodded it in the wrong place. She had a shrewd idea that such a move would probably be the last one such an incautious prodder would ever make.

Ranma made the ward control system fade away, then turned to the middle sister. "That robbery at the pawn shop was pretty amusing. One of your best yet." She snickered. "The look on that last one's face was hysterical. I don't know I could have pulled off the intimidation bit any better. I'm very proud of you." Nabiki grinned.

"Thanks. It was a bit weird, that one, even though he was pointing a gun at me it didn't really worry me after the first few seconds. I still can't believe I actually caught a bullet though! That's just unbelievable." Ranma laughed, putting her feet up on the coffee table. Kasumi leaned out of the kitchen and coughed meaningfully, making her sigh and remove them again. Her sister giggled.

"It's a good trick and kind of surprises you the first time. It gets easier, you'll get faster with practice. Like I said ages ago, even Akane could probably do it, I suspect fairly easily now. If you'd missed and it had hit you you'd probably have a nasty bruise but not much more than that. In a couple of months it would just bounce off." Shaking her head in amazement Nabiki thought about that.

"How has the ki fold practice come in the last couple of weeks?" her sister asked, coming out of the kitchen with coffee.

"Very well. A few days ago it suddenly got much easier. I've had one going ever since without any trouble." Nabiki reached into her pocket and pulled out a pair of shoes, which clearly wouldn't fit, grinning with pleased satisfaction. Ranma laughed, while Kasumi nodded approval. "I still can't quite work it without it attached to an opening, which is weird because I did the very first time. I just don't seem to be able to recreate that state of mind."

"You'll get it eventually. Misaki can do it now although the others are at about your stage. All of you are doing exceptionally well." The martial artist studied her with interest. "You particularly. You're starting from a point well behind them, yet aside from raw power, which will only come with time and practice, you've caught up very nicely. We should practice the illusion spell some more. You're here for the weekend, right?" Nabiki nodded, sipping her coffee.

"OK. I want to have all of you try holding a more complicated illusion. When the others get here we can work out something suitable, but I want to work it up to a whole body one before you go home. It will be hard, but I have a feeling you can manage it."

"That would be pretty neat." Kasumi nodded.

"Indeed. If you can do that, I have been thinking about the whole technique and I've come up with a variation on it that might be of benefit." Nabiki looked curiously at her, as did Ranma. She smiled. "It occurred to me a couple of days ago. While I don't think any of you will be able to create the illusions in the way we can for some time yet, I thought that it might be possible to design a form of the method that effectively produces a preset illusion. Not as flexible but probably significantly easier. We could create a few useful presets for you, which you could apply when necessary." Nabiki looked interested, while Ranma smiled proudly at her wife.

"That's brilliant, Kas. Can I see it?" Nodding happily, Kasumi concentrated, forming an energy pattern that both of them could see, Nabiki with some effort, Ranma with none. The red-headed woman inspected it curiously, a smile growing on her face. "Amazing work. It never occurred to me, but you're right. This is much easier." She studied it a little more. "How about changing this part here, like this? It would simplify it even more, although you'd need a little more power to start it." Kasumi looked at the slightly changed pattern while Nabiki watched with interest. Her sister nodded after a moment.

"Yes, I like it. I'd say it would only need a couple of percent more power, which is well within Nabiki's abilities and easy for the others. All right, so if we do that, we could also change the power handling part here, which would mean it would be more efficient once it was established. You see?" Once more the pattern changed. Ranma looked at it approvingly.

"Very good indeed. If any of them can get to the point of a full change with the standard method, this should be fairly easy." She looked at her sister-in-law. "What presets would you like? I'd think you could probably hold about half a dozen or so without any problem. I don't think we should load you down with lots of them since when you learn the full technique they'll be redundant, but you may as well have anything you'll find useful." Nabiki sipped her coffee while thinking.

"Well, Ms Aoyama, of course. And Azumi." Ranma nodded. After a moment Nabiki grinned. "Why not have the mer-form as well?" Grinning, the martial artist exchanged glances with her wife, who also looked amused.

"Where except here would you ever use it?" she asked curiously. Nabiki shrugged.

"Don't know. But it might come in handy."

"OK. Based on you or Azumi?" She thought for a moment.

"Both, I think."

"Fine. Anything else?" Eventually she shrugged again, shaking her head. "I can't think of anything at the moment. Unless you have managed to make something that can fly." Kasumi giggled.

"I've been thinking about it but some sort of bird is too boring. I'll keep you up to date."

Half an hour later, the other four had arrived. As it was close to lunch time, Kasumi made a lot of sandwiches, then they all went up to the swimming pool. None had used it for a couple of weeks due to being busy. Ranma adjusted the chemicals slightly, muttering about needing to clean it soon, then they all sat on the edge while she explained the next stage of their teaching.

"I think a good practice would be to see if you can hold a partial change, but something more complex than the simple ones you've done up to now. I hope you've all been going over the method regularly?" Everyone nodded. "Good. So, what we're going to try is the mermaid form. If you can hold that, we'll see if you can all keep it going until this evening." She looked around at them, then began with Nabiki. The middle sister was rapidly the mer-sister, sitting swishing her tailfin in the water of the pool while concentrating. Her form shimmered occasionally, until she finally managed to hold it stable.
"Remember, Sister, gently does it. Let it seek it's own level and just guide it," Kasumi advised quietly. She nodded, her eyes shut, feeling the spell at work. Eventually she smiled.

"I think I've got it." Ranma inspected her then nodded approval.

"Well done. That's it. Now we just need to see how long you can hold it."

One at a time she did the other four. Misaki got it immediately, while Aiko took a couple of attempts, but they all managed the feat. Both Ranma and Kasumi looked very pleased. "Fantastic. That's really very good indeed. Now, let's just relax and have fun, while you concentrate on not concentrating on it." She grinned, changing and slipping into the water, then shooting off across the pool. The others laughed and dived in. Kasumi watched with a smile, then followed.

Six hours later seven mermaids were lounging at the shallow end of the pool, idly chatting. Nabiki shared the recordings of her pawn-shop intervention and the various other, less exciting ones she'd had in the previous two weeks. Aiko and her group showed the two events they'd been involved with, one involving a rather confused demon who had gotten overexcited and made an embarrassment of himself, ending up being physically thrown through the portal he'd come from with advice to not come back until he sobered up, while the other was a magical girl they had intermittent trouble with.

"She just won't take 'please stay away' as a hint," Tamiko grumped. "She's a nice enough girl, but she causes a lot of problems. Always chasing those weird little demons of hers. I have no idea where they come from but the things are a pain in the rear. Literally, sometime. They bite." Nabiki giggled, paddling in a small circle while floating on the surface of the pool. Aiko snickered a little.

"You just can't get over the fact that you got nibbled." Her friend shook her head.

"No, I can't. Perverted little monsters. I'm damn glad we have sensible clothing now, it was bad enough this time, before it was horrible." She shuddered while her friends laughed.

"The entire building fell down?" Nabiki asked lazily. Fumiko nodded.

"Those things ate some of the structural members holding it up, and miss magical princess did the rest of the damage firing that magic staff of hers at them. You wouldn't believe how bad a shot she is. By the time we got there she was standing on a pile of bricks looking guilty. She's only about fourteen or so. Luckily, that place was empty and falling apart, but even so, it's the principle of the thing."

"Only in Minato," Ranma chuckled.

"Maybe Nerima." Nabiki raised her head to look at the red-headed mermaid, who nodded after a moment.

"True."

Since they started only Fumiko had lost control of the spell and had required it to be reapplied. It embarrassed her a little, although no one made anything of it. Nabiki was finding holding the change to be remarkably easy now she knew what to do, although the actual magic was still beyond her comprehension. Eventually, they ran out of sandwiches. Ranma dove into the deep end, leaping out of the water in a spectacular manner and changing back in the process, to land on her feet next to the pool. She laughed at her own behaviour. Not to be outdone, Kasumi did the same, somersaulting twice, once as a mermaid and once as her normal shape, lightly landing next to her currently female husband, who hugged her.
Nabiki shook her head as the others tried the same trick, Misaki and Fumiko managing it, while Aiko stumbled on landing. Tamiko laughed, then declined to try it. Deciding that the auburn-haired girl was probably correct the middle sister simply swam to the edge and climbed out on her restored legs. Looking amused Ranma led them back downstairs, becoming male in the process.

"OK. That was very good. I can see that all of you have gained a lot of control over the power handling part of the technique at least. Good. The next thing I want to try is something similar, but I'm going to distract you in the process. It will need a different form, and a different location. So, we're going down to the basement." Curious they followed him. When they arrived, he studied them for a moment as they all stood in a group in front of him and Kasumi, eventually nodding.

"Let's try something a bit different. Still a partial change, though." He looked carefully at Nabiki, who felt something shift. The other four girls stared, amazed. She looked down at herself, then back at her brother-in-law, who was grinning. Kasumi had her hands over her mouth, her eyes sparking with mirth.

"You got a book on Greek myths or something, didn't you?" she asked, amused. Lifting one leg she looked at it. It wasn't a human leg, or not completely. It seemed to be a mix of human and equine, ending in a hoof. The other one was a match for it. Feeling something odd behind her she reached back and felt the horse's tail she now had. "Very strange." Her hearing was a bit weird, and reaching up she found she also had horse's ears.

"It's fairly complex, but simple enough to manage while you're distracted, hopefully." Wondering what he meant by that she carefully took control of it, holding it stable, as he moved on to the others. Eventually they were all changed. Kasumi and Ranma remained their normal selves. "Right. Now, this exercise is called, "The lights go out and we shoot at you." They just had time to exchange worried glances when the lights did indeed go out.

"Holy crap!" Nabiki yelped, as a blue ki ball blazed towards her, lighting up the surrounding area. She dived for cover behind a dimly lit support pillar, hooves clattering on the concrete floor in the process, while hearing similar sounds echoing around her. She could feel the illusion slipping as the ball detonated against the wall with a pop. Holding it in place she fumbled around in the dark. Even the low light vision wasn't helping much. Listening carefully she felt her ears moving, inwardly giggling at the odd sensation. 'It's like some sort of fantasy laser tag game with added pain,' she thought wildly, ducking as a golden ball whooshed over her head, popping against someone who yelped.

"Damn it, Kasumi, that really stings," Fumiko shouted.

"Duck faster," her sister's voice came back from somewhere other than where the ki ball had come from.

"Can we shoot back?" Tamiko called.

"If you like. It won't help." Ranma sounded very amused, following up the comment with a ki shot that scored a direct hit.

"OW! Fuck it!" Tamiko returned fire, nearly hitting Nabiki, who swore and ducked, rolling to the side. She fired back.

The next three hours were a riot of pastel balls of ki shooting every which way, popping on the walls, ceiling, and floor, not to mention the participants. To the best of their knowledge none of them hit either Ranma or his wife, although they could hear them laughing in the dark. Friendly fire incidents were frequent, provoking retaliatory strikes aplenty. It was frustrating, somewhat eerie, and remarkably good fun. All of them were covered in bruises when the lights finally came back on. A few fittings had been wrecked by errant shots, but the majority were working. Standing next to the elevator Ranma smiled as they all limped up, hooves clattering on the floor. None of them had lost the illusion during the practice.

"How the hell did you know where we were so accurately?" Aiko demanded, her ears laid back and her tail lashing. Nabiki watched with amusement, she didn't seem to notice. "I couldn't see a damn thing, even with enhanced vision on." Ranma chuckled.

"You need to use your ears more. They're big enough." Aiko glared at him, then reached up and felt one of them, smiling slightly. "Plus, if you learn how, the ki sense is at least as good as vision for this sort of thing. Both of us knew where everyone was the whole time. We'll teach you that as well."

"Before you do this again, I hope," his friend said, rubbing a bruise on her shoulder.

"Perhaps..."

Herding them into the elevator he waited for Kasumi, who had been sweeping the broken glass from the lights into one corner. She joined them and they went back upstairs. Once they were sitting in the living room he looked around. All of them were holding the illusion well. "Good. Very good. Let's heal all of that, have something to eat, then call it a night. I'd like you to try holding that form all night if you can. Tomorrow we can move on to whole body illusions, which get considerably harder."

Lying in bed Nabiki wriggled around until she found a comfortable position, which proved to be a little difficult with a tail. Reaching back she felt it. The thing felt as real as if she'd been born with it. 'I still can't get over how real all of this is. Without knowing the truth you'd never be able to tell. Even Jun can't. It seems very interested and rather confused by all this.' Using the comm unit she poked around on the internet for a while, looking up some of the sites that Miki had emailed her about after their conversation the other day. She read the various reports on magical girl incidents, giggling about how wrong most of the ones she had some personal knowledge of were. One or two were fairly accurate but many were pure fantasy.

'Jun? Can you monitor all these sites for any mention of any of us, please? I'm curious to see what gets published.'

'#Of course, Nabiki. I am already monitoring various news outlets for anything that might indicate a threat to you. I will add these sites as well, I will also search for any more of a similar nature.#

'Thanks, Jun. Good night.'

'#Good night, Nabiki.#

She was asleep moments later.

Cologne stared into the scrying bowl, thinking hard. There was something very odd going on. She couldn't quite work out what, but over the last few weeks there had been a number of times she was sure something was right on the verge of happening, before it suddenly didn't. It was driving her nuts. There was no trace she could find, of either hostile magic or ki, and she had looked very hard indeed. In every way she could prove there was nothing amiss, but still...

She was even beginning to have moments of wondering whether age was finally beginning to catch up with her. Shaking her head a little, she pushed that thought far to the back of her mind with a little shiver, concentrating on trying to figure out whether something really was going on. Was there something she hadn't tried? After a long few minutes of thought, she got up and starting looking through her books and scrolls again, looking for something she hadn't tried, but becoming depressingly aware that she'd pretty much exhausted her resources. The early dawn light coming through the window made her yawn, but she kept looking, mumbling to herself irritably.
Chapter 45

This is a fairly long one but it seemed to flow better as a single chapter.

For anyone who hasn't found it, the events mentioned half-way through are referenced more thoroughly in 'When Ranma met Aiko (And Tamiko And Fumiko and Misaki)', available from my story list.

Stumbling into the kitchen dragging her hooves on the tiles, Nabiki yawned widely, taking the coffee mug her sister handed her with a nod of thanks. She was not a morning person, even with all the recent improvements to her overall condition. Drinking half of it, she blinked a few times, then smiled. "Ah. I needed that. Thanks, sis." Kasumi smiled, watching her sister drink the rest of it, before putting the mug down and wandering off to the bathroom, her tail swishing around.

"I wonder if she remembers what she looks like?" Kasumi mused out loud, amused, before turning to make breakfast.

In the bathroom Nabiki brushed her teeth, then got in the shower, squirting shampoo in her hand and rubbing it in her hair. Her hands ran over her horse's ears and she stopped, feeling them curiously, before she grinned. "Weird. I totally forgot." Looking inside she watched the spell, which was apparently completely stable. Amused she finished her shower, drying herself off and dressing, before returning to the living room, casually acting as if hooves, a tail, and furry ears was completely normal. Ranma was watching the morning news, looking up as she sat beside him, then grinning.

"Well done. I expected you would manage it, but it's nice to see I was right." She flicked an ear at him and chuckled.

"The strangest thing is how normal it feels."

"I know. It took me some time to get used to that. We've come up with some strange changes over the years but it's kind of weird how easily you get used to them. I think it might be that once you work out how to do it, you just accept it. Or perhaps we're all just that weird."

"The latter, I suspect. This would give some people I know the screaming jitters for weeks." He laughed.

"I take it you're OK with it all?" She nodded happily.

"I should probably not be, but personally I find it enormous fun. I can't wait to be able to do it as well as you guys can. I can see all sorts of fun I can have with it." Looking slightly worried he turned back to the news.

"Oh dear. I hope I haven't created some sort of perverted shape-shifting monster." Giving her a sly sideways grin he watched as she snickered.

"We'll find out soon enough..." They sat in companionable silence for a little while watching the news. Eventually she turned to him. "Where is all this going?" she asked quietly. He looked at her, his eyebrow raised. After a moment, he nodded.

"I wondered when you were going to ask." It was her turn to raise an eyebrow.
She thought for a moment, while he waited for her to speak again, picking up the remote and turning down the volume on the TV. "Don't get me wrong, I love learning all this. But I can't help but wonder why you picked me to train. There must be other, more suitable people just in the magical girl community around here. Aiko and her girls are obvious. You're very much the same type of person. They may say how they just fell into it, but it's clear to me that they enjoy the hell out of it most of the time. Aiko loves the teleporting, Misaki obviously enjoys dealing with danger, and Fumiko and Tamiko just like jumping around the place. Not showing off, but secure in the knowledge that they can." He nodded again.

"All true."

"You, you're... I don't know what you are, really. The nearest thing to a living weapon I've ever heard of, perhaps, but in a good way. All your training and skill could have produced someone who would have been the most dangerous thing the world has ever seen. From what I know you're not as powerful as some of the magical girls even, never mind one or two entities I've learned about, but I somehow doubt any of them could stop you if you decided to turn to the dark side of the force." She grinned as he snorted with amused laughter. "You'd probably have a good shot at taking over the world if you really wanted to, or at least Japan. But you have no interest in that." She smiled a little. "In fact, it's more along my line of interest." He laughed again, then looked closely at her.

"Do you want to take over a country?"

After a long pause, drawn out for her own amusement, she shook her head. "No. Far too much trouble. Anyway, I've changed since my school days. If you'd asked me then I might have thought seriously about it, but not now. I more or less want to live and let live, although it's fun dealing with people who are being unpleasant. But that's kind of the point. I never really wanted to do that. It just sort of grew on me. If I hadn't found you and Kasumi, I'd never have these abilities, which wouldn't have led me down the path I seem to be heading down. Kasumi is far further down that path than I am, possibly than I can ever go, and clearly enjoys it as much as you do. She's another person I trust with that sort of power." Nabiki sighed a little, staring at the TV.

"I'm not sure I trust myself with it." Following her gaze he nodded once more. They were silent for a moment before she resumed talking. Pointing at the TV, she said, "You see proof on there every day how people get a little power, then start doing horrible things with it. Or they have none, and take it by force, or try to. Our own country's history has some horrible examples of that, world war two only being part of it. Every country on the planet has nasty little events in its past that it should be embarrassed about. All of it shows that people can be very unpleasant to each other for the flimsiest of excuses."

"That's certainly true. I'd like to think that as a species we were slowly growing out of that sort of thing, but the evidence would suggest not. Or at least, not very quickly at all. Japan has been pretty stable for a long time now, as have many other places, but there's always at least one war going on somewhere." He sighed heavily. "I hate it. I wish I could stop it. To be brutally honest, with the power I have and my friends have, I probably could stop it. For a while. But it would cause bigger problems than leaving it alone. I'm not smart enough, or powerful enough, or have the moral authority to be the world's policeman. I'm not superman. Just a martial artist who's learned some interesting things. Even if I could stop all these sorts of things I don't have the right to just jump in like that."

He waved at the news program currently showing the situation in Bosnia. "I mean, just look at that. We could go there, find all the leaders on both sides, and either convince them to stop, or force them to stop. Push them through a portal or something. But it wouldn't make any difference, aside from the very short term. We'd have to deal with probably forty percent of the population before what was left decided to stop fighting each other, and all that would do is turn people against us instead. We can't force people to change. They have to want to. And apparently, in a lot of places, they don't want to." Glancing back to her, he half-smiled. Nabiki was almost sorry for bringing the subject up, they seemed to have ended up with a rather dark conversation.

"I've bumped into the occasional, ah, person, who wanted to 'Take Over The World'," he said, making air-quotes with his fingers and smirking. "I've helped stop them, or watched as someone else did. Saffron might have ended up going in that direction if I hadn't dealt with him. The one thing I always wanted to ask is, why? What good would it do? Even if you succeeded, either you'd have to wipe out practically everyone so you could actually keep it, or fight off the next tyrant. What kind of a life is that? Magic makes some of it easier but some harder, never mind what technology can do. As far as I can see, inevitably, it just ends up as either death and destruction, or some form of mass mind control, which is worse. Forcing peace on everyone, whether they want it or not. I know that the blonde menace's bunch have some sort of long term plan that has uncomfortable similarities with that, but I still don't have all the details." He sighed again. "I suppose when I do I'll have to try and stop it."

"You don't have to do everything," Nabiki said softly.

"I know. But like I said a long time ago, if I'm in a position to stop a crime and let it happen, as far as I'm concerned I'm complicit. I can't just stand by and watch it happen. Plus I sort of feel responsible for the girls around here in some ways. They all mean well but some of them are so hopelessly out of their depths. I want to help. I, or we, are in a position to try to keep some form of order with all the lunacy around here. Even the ones who don't like us very much do at least listen, eventually." Ranma studied her for a moment. "Which is at least a partial answer to your original question. You're much the same, whether you recognise it or not. I'm trying to equip you with what I think you'll need to survive it."

It was Nabiki's turn to study him. "I don't think I quite understand."

After a pause, he explained. "Even back in Nerima in the good old days, you stood out. There were several people that did, for more obvious reasons. Akane, for her raw power and terrible temper. The Amazons, for obvious reasons. Ryoga. Our parents. Taro. Happosai. A few others some of whom you never met. But you, you were there in the background, like Kas was. A supporting character if this was a comic." He laughed as she made a face.

"I don't like thinking of myself as just a member of the supporting cast."

"You weren't. You just weren't part of the obvious main cast, in those terms. Yet both of you were extremely important. Without Kasumi, the entire household would have fallen to pieces. She kept the peace, was the neutral party that everyone confided in and trusted. The number of times she averted some insanely complicated disaster, half the time just by being herself, is incredible." He smiled fondly, remembering.

"Then we come to you. You stayed out of most of the craziness, as much as you could, but you were always involved somehow. Whenever I needed information, you were the one to get it from. Expensive information, but you always came through." She grinned. "You helped me on a number of occasions where no one else could have. Yes, you also caused some pretty impressive disasters, but like I told you, they'd have happened anyway in all probability. Mostly." She looked embarrassed now as he snickered. "Then you found us. The only one who did, and probably could have. Not even a three hundred year old, experienced as hell, Amazon elder and mage has managed that yet, even though I wouldn't put it past her eventually, but you tracked us down. Something I'm glad about, by the way. Very glad." He put his arm around her shoulders. She found the warm weight comforting.

"You're the sister I never had, really. I like and trust you. I've always respected you, from the day we met. Sometimes I didn't like you very much, that's true, but the respect was always there. You've changed as much as any of us have, more in some ways, and for the better. I was arrogant, over-confident, pushy, and unfortunately misogynistic, most of which can be blamed either on what may have been the world's worst parental role model or just on being a young man." She giggled. "I managed to overcome some of it on my own, and Kas beat the rest of it out of me. In turn I was able to help her undo the conditioning she'd given herself and unlock the real Kasumi, someone I desperately love and would do anything for. If that was the only result of dealing with you for two years, I would still owe you everything."

They sat silently for a while. "That's part of it as well. I owe you. More than you can possibly imagine. I can't repay it the way it should be repaid, but I can do it in other ways. You have a gift, like Kas does, like I do and the girls do. I didn't want to see it go to waste. I'm not expecting to see you bounding around the rooftops every day beating up criminals and demonic invaders, but I want to make sure that if you have to, you can. I have no doubt that you'd end up involved in anything weird that happens, you're too much a native of Nerima to stay out of it forever. The crazy is persistent. I just needed to be sure you could handle it. You certainly don't have to continue training with us, you can stop at any point, but..." He shrugged.

"I don't think any of this is leading anywhere, to answer your original question. I don't have some sort of grand plan, I'm not trying to build up an international organisation of powerful people. Mind you, that almost seems to be happening by accident." He laughed, picking up the remote and turning off the TV. "We've certainly met some interesting individuals recently. But there's no deliberate intent behind it. If you want to join the fight against the more dangerous parts of the weirdness, I'd love to have you beside me. If you just want to sit back and run intelligence operations, like in the old days but even more effectively, that's fine too. Or if you simply want to do someone's books, it's your life. Personally I'd find that the most boring thing in the world, but everyone is different."

"Me, I'm fairly content just keeping a lid on this area. It keeps me interested and in shape, plus I get to meet some amazing people. Uthryyl and his people are fantastic. Sergeant Harada is a wonderful person, someone I'm more than happy to help. Most of the police, in fact. They're by and large very decent people. I like knowing so many people around here, feeling like we belong. Part of the community. You have no idea what it's like after spending so much of my life wandering around with Pop, half the time running away because of some damned idiotic plan of his. Living a life on the road taught me a lot, much of it essential, but at the same time it's been nice having somewhere stable to call home. The Dojo, despite all the problems, was like that, because of Kas mostly. Here, finally, is a real home. I have everything I want and need. Family, friends, enough adventure to keep my edge, but at the end of the day a bed of my own." He laughed. "Getting all melodramatic in my old age. But it's all true."

Nabiki studied the man next to her for a while, her ears flicking around as she thought. The sensation was by now something she barely noticed. "OK," she finally said. "I think I see. Thank you." He smiled at her. "I've been getting a little worried," she confessed. "It's almost too much, too soon. You worked for years to get to where you are. I know some of what you went through and it's horrible. Even Kasumi has put in years of work. It sometimes seems that I'm just getting all these abilities too easily, like I'm not earning them." She looked worried, making him smile gently at her, in a way that reminded her strongly of her sister.

"You are earning them. You've worked very hard. True, it's happening faster than it would with most people, but I've already explained most of why that is before. Aside from anything else, I've improved the training methods a lot over the years, they're faster but less dangerous, and you're naturally gifted to boot. Not many people would learn as fast as you do." Looking slyly at her, he smiled a little evilly. "And trust me, you're only a short way along the path. You wouldn't believe how long it really is. There are a lot more things to learn before you're anywhere near where Kas is, or me. Although I have no doubt you can reach that level if you want to."

"I have to admit, I do enjoy helping people. I didn't expect to, not so much. But I'm not sure I really want to join the magical girl club full time." She giggled.

Ranma nodded understandingly. "No one is asking you to. There are a lot of them, us I suppose, we've got it pretty much covered. But, that said, you're very, very smart, and can certainly be a useful intelligence asset. If you want to, I'm not going to expect you to. Our equivalent of Ami, I guess. She's not as powerful as the others in her group, although she'd be a real handful if she tried, but she's very good at what she does. Most of the time. I still think she'd be better off finding some other friends, but that's her choice. I can understand supporting people you like even when you think they're wrong."

"Are you going to train anyone else like this?" Nabiki asked curiously.

He shook his head. "Not right now. It's as much as we can handle training you five. You for the reasons I've mentioned, the others because to be honest they needed it. They get involved in all sorts of fights and I want to be sure they'll survive them. It was a near thing with Fumiko last year, it really scared me how close she came to being killed. I don't want to lose any of them. I've know them for nearly as long as I've known you and Kas, they're family too." He looked worried.

"I don't want to see anyone hurt if I can help it, but I can't stop them all doing stupid things. I've offered training to a few of them other than Aiko and the others, but only one or two accepted. I think I helped, but none of them except for the girls really kept it up, just learned some useful stuff and took off. Quite a few of them don't take it seriously enough, they don't seem to understand how dangerous what they're doing is in some cases. Sooner or later we're going to lose someone. It's close very close once or twice, Kas and I, or one of the other healers, have got there just in time to heal them. That causes me to lose sleep. I wouldn't want even Blondie and her crew to go through that." Falling silent again he looked out the window at the University tower visible through it. She watched his face, trying to gauge his feelings.

Turning back to her after a while, he smiled. "I don't think there's anyone else at the moment I should train, even if I had time."

"They're not worthy?" Nabiki suggested with a small grin. He snickered.

"Something like that. I mean, look at the prospective candidates back in Nerima. I can think of a few people who could learn some or all of our more interesting methods and techniques, like we discussed a while ago, but I wouldn't want to hand most of them that much power. Konatsu is probably one of the better choices, but he's got some pretty severe problems of his own to deal with, poor bastard. His upbringing was as warped as mine, although in a different way. Ukyo could probably manage it, but she's always had an aggressive streak, she tends to attack when it would be better to talk. Not as much as Akane did, but in the same sort of way. We've already got too many of that type. Shampoo? The old woman can teach her nearly as much as I can, more in some ways, except for our magic. She'll get there in good time. Akane is, from what you've reported and other people have told us, improving rapidly, both mentally and physically. Shampoo and Cologne seem to really be serious about training her properly for whatever reason, and to be honest it's probably best if they do. I think she's safe in their hands." He thought about what he'd said, then chuckled.
"Well, perhaps not actually safe, but you know what I mean."

Nabiki nodded, giggling. She'd seen some of what Shampoo considered training, it was nearly as bad as Ranma's own approach.

"I don't think any of the others we know should be taught such powerful things. Certainly not Ryoga or the Kunos. They're bad enough as it is already. Taro is a damn nightmare, although I haven't seen or heard from him in years. Hopefully that will keep up. There are a few others who could probably learn, but I don't think to your level. Certainly not as fast. To be honest, I could probably take practically anyone off the street and teach them some pretty impressive things if they stood for it, but most people simply haven't got the right mindset to get much further than a fairly talented normal martial artist. Even then they'd need to want it. Nowadays that's not common, even around these parts." The martial artist looked up as his wife entered from the direction of the study, smiling. She looked at him holding her sister with an amused expression, but said nothing, simply sitting on his other side, lifting his free arm and draping it around her own shoulders while he watched.

"Ah. I have a pair of Tendos. That beats any hand I can think of." Nabiki started laughing.

"God, Saotome, your pick-up lines are terrible."

"I don't need pick-up lines, I've got what I wanted," he replied with a wide grin. They sat there in silence for a while, broken with intermittent snickers from Nabiki, until a knock on the door heralded the arrival of Tamiko, Misaki, and Fumiko. The three young women walked in, looking at the grouping on the sofa with amusement. All of them were still wearing the horse-girl forms from the night before, making Ranma nod approvingly. "Well done." Aiko suddenly appeared beside the sofa, also with the illusion in place. She grinned at them, then flopped down on the sofa opposite.

"This is really strange, but oddly comfortable," she commented, lifting one leg and looking at the hoof on the end. "Although these things are pretty loud in the bathroom on the tiles. It gave me a shock this morning when I got up, I forgot about it."

"It kind of grows on you," Tamiko said, gently waving her tail from side to side. "Although I think running around on roofs with hooves would be a little difficult."

"It's not too bad with practice," Ranma commented, making them all look at him strangely. He grinned, shimmering into his demonic alter-ego of Zytha'a. The blue-skinned demoness waved her fingers at them. "You do tend to slip a little at first, but you get the hang of it." Everyone stared at her for a moment, then shrugged.

"OK."

Fumiko looked at the sight of the blue-scaled demoness with her arms around two sisters, one of whom was currently wearing hooves and a tail, both of them appearing very comfortable where they were, then started giggling. The giggles grew until she was howling with laughter, making her sister stare at her in bemusement. 'Zytha'a' raised one delicate eyebrow, smiling a little. This only made Fumiko laugh harder. She pointed, her hand wavering, but seemed unable to get anything out.

Everyone waited until she finally ran down. "I suddenly got a flash of what this would look like to a normal person," she gasped, still giggling. Waving her hand around the room helplessly she indicated the seven people in it. "It's completely insane. Look at us! Kasumi is the only one who looks even close to normal." The eldest Tendo smiled at them, shimmering into the mermaid form she liked, lifting her tail and draping it across the lap of the demoness next to her, who chuckled.
Fumiko stared, then fell over laughing again. "Oh, god. It's just too much."

Tamiko turned to Aiko. "I remember once you said all your friends were normal. Would you like to reassess that thought?" Her friend inspected them all, then shrugged.

"Nope. They all look normal to me." Her mouth twitched a little before she lost it. Soon they were all laughing. When they eventually recovered, Aiko looked at her tutor, still a blue-scaled demoness. "So, what were you three doing before we turned up?"

"Lots of exposition, mainly," Zytha'a said with a chuckle, changing back to a female Ranma. "Nabiki was having a minor existential crisis. We talked it out, I think we're good now." The middle sister nodded.

"It helped. I just suddenly wondered why the world had gone so weird recently and what my role in it was." She shrugged a little. "It was just..." Aiko looked at her understandingly.

"I know. Believe me, I know. We've all been through it. We had some pretty major arguments in the early days. I loved the teleportation from day one, but the things that went with it were a bit much to take. In the end, we all decided that it was worth it, though." The three other girls nodded soberly.

"The path can be a lonely one but the rewards are great," Tamiko said pompously, staring into the distance with a serene expression, then ruined it by laughing. Aiko hit her on the shoulder. "Idiot."

"Ow."

They grinned at each other while Nabiki watched with amusement. It reminded her of the interplay she'd had with her sisters when they were children. Glancing at Kasumi she met the other Tendo's eyes, clearly seeing she felt it as well. The elder Tendo changed back to her normal form, standing and looking around. "Right. Enough of the deep philosophical thoughts. Time for breakfast. Can you give me a hand, please, sister?" Nabiki nodded, getting up and following her sister into the kitchen. Soon they were sitting around the table eating.

"I'm pleased you were all able to hold the spell all night," Ranma said, looking at each of them in turn and inspecting the energy patterns. "They all look completely stable, no degradation at all. Very good indeed. Anyone have any problems?" They exchanged glances and shook their heads.

"Great. OK, then, we need to step up to the next level. We'll apply a full body illusion change, then just get on with other training. Hopefully you can hold it until the morning. If you can do that I think you'll be at the point where the rest of it is just a lot of practice. Start small, keep trying, and let Kas or I know if you need any help. I'd think that all of you should be doing one from scratch in a couple of months, and probably very good at it in six at the most."

"So, what are you going to turn us into this time?" Misaki asked curiously, smiling a little. He shrugged.

"Haven't decided yet. We'll see."

"Going for your big book of mythical creatures?" Nabiki asked. Ranma grinned at her.

"Which one? There are lots of mythologies. Although the Greek one is pretty cool."

"I could just be Ms Aoyama."
Tamiko shuddered. "No offence, but I'm not sure I want Ms Aoyama around all day. She's kind of creepy."

"You do know it's still me, right?" Nabiki asked her, grinning. She grinned back.

"Yep. I stand by what I said."

"Oh, thanks very much."

"You're welcome." They exchanged amused looks while Ranma snickered. Giggling Kasumi got up and began to clear the table. Soon they were gathered around the sofa again. All of them dismissed the illusion, feeling their normal forms return.

"OK. What to use." Ranma tapped his finger thoughtfully on the side of his nose, smiling slightly. He glanced at his wife, who got a mischievous expression.

"Hey!" Nabiki yelled, when she found herself staring at four perfect duplicates. The faux Nabikis looked at each other with various expressions, none of which were quite right, before they all grinned. Putting on their best expressions of cold interest they turned to look at the original, who sighed. "Very funny." Everyone started laughing as the illusions shimmered away. "Thanks, sis."

"It was very amusing," Kasumi said, grinning at her sister. Tamiko was rolling around laughing as was Ranma.

"Can we try something slightly less disturbing?" the middle sister asked acerbically. Kasumi nodded, still grinning.

"All right." She thought for a moment then shrugged a little. Nabiki found herself as her 'Azumi' persona.

"Better." Lifting a foot she looked at it. "Feels slightly weird now, not having hooves."

"We can always put them back," her sister giggled.

She shook her head. "No, let's keep it simple. This is good enough, isn't it?"

"It will do. Now, can you feel the spell working?" Nabiki looked within and inspected the complex energy pattern.

"Yes. God, that's complicated."

Kasumi smiled. "It is. Don't try to understand it right now, just hold the whole thing. Just like before. It's more difficult, but the same problem. Got it?" Her sister nodded slowly after a few seconds, while everyone watched quietly.

"I think so. OK, transfer it over and let's see what happens." Control of the spell was gradually transferred to her. Nearly in control she muttered as she lost it. "Damn. OK, do it again." It took three attempts before she could hold it stable. Finally successful she grinned happily. "Got it." Once more, her form shimmered slightly a couple of times before stabilising. Kasumi clapped delightedly.

"Well done, sister. Very well done. Now, we just have to see if you can hold it. If you can manage while you're asleep, I think you'll have it solidly locked in. At that point using the presets should be easy." She looked to the others who were all smiling. "Now, what should we use for all of you?"
Tamiko put her hand up, grinning. "Ooh! I want to be a demon." Her friends looked at her oddly.

"You're weird," Aiko laughed. Tamiko giggled.

"It looks like fun." Smirking, Ranma gave her his Zyhra'a form. She held up her hands and looked at them, grinning with a lot of teeth. "Great. This is cool." The formerly auburn-haired girl, now a blue-scaled demoness, giggled in a way that sounded quite out of place. With some effort she managed to hold the illusion stable, looking very pleased with herself.

Some discussion led to Fumiko ending up in the form of a similar demoness only with red scales, while Misaki was a curvy short girl with pink hair. Nabiki recognised the form Ranma had amused her with some months ago. Aiko considered the options, then picked a hybrid between a much taller woman and the horse-girl form from earlier. "I always wondered what it would be like to be taller," she smiled. "Trippy."

"I'm very pleased about this," Ranma said looking around at the strange people filling his living room. He looked it. "You really seem to be getting the hang of this." Watching them for a while, he smirked. "Right. Back into the basement. We have work to do." Five faces fell.

"AGH!" The cry of pain made Nabiki wince and smile at the same time. She'd scored a direct hit on Fumiko, right in the chest as far as she could tell from the flickering illumination caused by ki balls shooting back and forth. "Nabiki! That damn well hurt!" Her friend fired half a dozen shots back at her, spraying the area, making her eep and dive behind a pillar. Two of the balls impacted it with sharp snaps while the others whizzed past, briefly illuminating her surroundings with deep green light. Sticking one hand past the pillar she fired back, being rewarded with another shout. Giggling she dived for the next pillar. 'This is completely ridiculous but damn good fun,' she thought. 'If we could figure out how to charge admission we could make a fortune.' Snickering at the thought of magical girl ki ball tag, she waited for a lull in the zipping ki shots before diving for the next pillar.

A sudden burst of pale blue and golden spheres caught her in the crossfire. She let out a yip and ducked. "Ow! Damn it, Saotome! That's three times in the last ten minutes!" Ranma chuckled from somewhere in the dark. Kasumi was laughing as well, in a completely different direction. Firing blindly back the middle sister ran for cover, trying not to bounce off too many obstacles in the process. A yelp from the other side of the room made her laugh even as she ducked the return fire from Aiko.

"Ow. You're both sadists," Fumiko grumbled as she rubbed her left arm where the red scales were slightly darkened from a ki shot. Ranma looked at her with amusement, then glanced at his wife who seemed to be trying not to laugh.

"It's good training. You're all much better at ducking than you were. Plus none of you lost the illusion." This didn't make the red demoness look any happier.

Once they were healed of the numerous small bruises, which were admittedly less than the day before, they had lunch. Afterwards Kasumi led them through some katas, Ranma watching and commenting where necessary. That went on for three hours or so. Eventually she called a halt to it. "That's enough of that. How are you all getting on with the illusion?" She and Ranma inspected their students.

"It seems fine, now," Nabiki said, grinning. "I had a little trouble for the first hour or so but now I don't seem to have to do anything, it's just working." The others reported similar results. Ranma looked impressed.

"Not bad. I hoped it would work out like this but it's still gratifying. A lot of this is kind of an experiment. The real test is to see if it's still stable in the morning. I don't think there will be any problems, though, based on this."

"So, what's next?" Aiko asked curiously. "You've shot at us, hit us, what more can you do?" At Ranma's feral grin she paled. "Um, forget I said that."

"No, no, you asked," he replied, looking very amused with her expression. Kasumi sighed a little.

"Stop scaring our friends, dear." Seeming disappointed he nodded slowly.

"Yes, love." Nabiki giggled.

"She really has got you well trained."

Grinning, he moved into the centre of the room. "OK. Joking aside, we have a surprise for you. Kas found a good place to go where we can make a mess without anyone getting upset. I though it would be fun to give it a try. It will be good practice in holding those illusions while really cutting loose." Fumiko and Misaki looked at each other, while Aiko laughed.

"Fantastic. Where is it?"

Kasumi moved to stand next to him. "Uthryyl suggested it when I asked him a few days ago. There's a world that's completely lifeless he knows about, nothing other than a few bacteria. It's been mostly mined out, lots of worlds have used it for resources by some sort of mutual treaty. Now, no one wants anything there, so it gets used for more or less what we want to do. He gave me the coordinates of a safe place there. A few areas are fairly unpleasant, because of the results of weapons tests in the past, but this place is fine. We can do anything we want there." They thought about that while Kasumi and her husband quickly formed a portal. Nabiki looked at the tear in space with apprehension. Her sister smiled at her.

"It's perfectly safe, Nabiki. The air is fine, the gravity is about the same, and there is plenty of water. Come on." Holding out her hand she waited. After a few seconds Nabiki shrugged, walking over and taking her sister's hand. Kasumi stepped through the portal with the younger woman following behind her.

Despite her expectations, formed from watching lots of TV and movies, the reality of portal travel was something of an anticlimax. There was a faint sizzling noise, a tingle across her skin, then she was standing next to a portal on ground that was brightly lit a slightly blue tint. She stepped to the side as Misaki came through, looking around with interest. It reminded her of pictures she'd seen of Mars through the camera of one of the NASA probes, only blue and white, rather than red and orange.

They were standing on a long low slope, which descended gently away to a wide plain some kilometres away. Behind them was a smallish mountain range, which seemed to run in both directions as far as she could see. Far, far in the distance was another range, much larger, jagged spikes sticking into the air a couple of kilometres. There was no trace of green or any colours indicating life except for them. The ground was covered in sand mixed with small rounded pebbles, like a somewhat uncomfortable beach. On the plain in front of them were half a dozen small to medium lakes and dozens of small hills up to perhaps a hundred metres high. Their vantage point was probably around six or seven hundred metres above the plain.
Overall it looked like a perfect firing range. It had clearly been used as such, since there were visible craters all over the place on the plain, even three of the lakes having a suspiciously circular shape.

By now all of them had come through the portal. Ranma looked at it for a moment. "May as well leave it running, it doesn't need much power now that it's active." He turned to them, indicating an obviously artificial structure a few dozen metres away. It was clearly some sort of bunker combined with a firing platform. Watching them curiously were a couple of demons of Uthryyl's species, who were involved in setting up some sort of large rifle-like weapon. After a moment, one of them bent down and called into the structure. A few seconds later Nabiki recognised Uthryyl himself as he came out. He waved, Kasumi waving back.

They all walked over. The demon looked curiously at them. Ranma smiled. "Practising the illusion spell." He pointed out who was who.

"Impressive. That shape-shift thing you call an illusion is getting better every time I see it," Uthryyl said with a grin. "So, you decided to try our firing range, then?" Ranma nodded, inspecting the weapon that the demons were working on with interest.

"I thought it was worth a try. What's that?" Uthryyl looked over his shoulder.

"Something I picked up a little while ago. A military scrap company I sometimes deal with was dismantling an old class six warship from one of the high-tech worlds, stripping it for parts. I bought eight of the main guns. I have a client who would be interested in them as replacements. They're hypersonic rail guns firing molecularly compressed tungsten projectiles, powered by a small fusion reactor. Pure technology, no magic aside from an anti-friction spell on the barrel lining to extend the life. Obsolete tech where they come from but fairly high specification. Their designers really built to last." Walking over he talked to his technicians for a moment, then nodded.

"The guys think they're ready. We need to test them before I can sell them. I don't want to pass on faulty equipment." He looked at them thoughtfully. "Can you two set up a good strong ward, just in case?" Ranma looked doubtful.

"I don't know that it would do much good if your fusion reactor goes bang, not at this range." Uthryyl laughed.

"Oh, there's no danger of that happening, this design is intrinsically safe. Worst case it would just shut down. But there's always the possibility of the weapon itself failing, which would be unpleasant if we were standing next to it."

"OK. Kas, let's make this one good and tough, all right?" Kasumi nodded. Uthryyl spoke to his technicians again, then one of them walked over while the other one made a few last minute adjustments, flipping a switch that was clearly the power control, before hastily joining them, holding a piece of equipment that seemed to be the control system. The ward went up, glowing visibly in a dome around them where they stood twenty metres from the weapon. The technician made some adjustments then prodded the screen of the device he was holding, looking slightly nervous with his ears laid back. When nothing happened except for a steady loud hum he relaxed a little.

"It's on," he reported.

"Good. No smoke, that's always a good sign." The other one inspected the readouts on the control panel then turned to Uthryyl. "What do you want to blow up?" The trader grinned.
"Try one shot into that lake, there in the middle." He pointed. The tech nodded, working the controls. The weird looking gun slewed sideways, the barrel depressing, then there was a very loud crack. A line of light came from the barrel, impacting on the small lake almost simultaneously. Half the water in it immediately vaporised while most of the remainder went several hundred metres into the air. Nabiki jumped.

Misaki was looking at the gun with a raised eyebrow. "Not bad," she mumbled. Uthryyl seemed pleased.

"Very good. Nothing blew up. Another good sign. OK, target that small hill over there, give it twelve shots rapid fire." Nodding the tech made the adjustments and fired the gun. The noise this time was a very short, very loud buzz, while half the hill vanished in a cloud of rock fragments. "Fantastic. It seems to work. Any errors?"

"No." The technician demon looked at the readouts carefully. "Power draw is within specifications, the barrel wear is good for another half-million rounds, targeting systems are exactly right. This one is good."

Nabiki? I have the ability to connect to the fire control system of that weapon, it is one in my database. Would you like me to? # The request from Jun surprised her. She thought for a moment, then mentioned it to the others. Ranma looked surprised.

"Odd. My system didn't mention that but it confirmed it could if I wanted to." He looked at Uthryyl. "Do you mind if we have a play?" The demon shook his head.

"Not at all. I'd like to try as well, I didn't realise that was possible." Glancing at Nabiki he added, "You can try first, if you like. There's lots of ammunition, it's got about five thousand rounds in the hopper."

"OK. Thanks." 'Yes, please, Jun, connect to it.'

Yes, Nabiki. # There was a short pause. #Targeting systems connected and online. Weapon reports ready status, full charge, four thousand eight hundred and fifty rounds available, tracking slaved. # A targeting grid appeared as an overlay with several statistics around the edges, including the round count the SI had mentioned. She looked around the plain, hearing a whirring noise, which she realised was coming from the gun, which moved as she turned her head. It was targeting anything she looked at. "Whoa. Cool."

There was a window in her top right view which had a view from the guns itself, the thing presumably having a camera on it. With little effort she could switch to a gun's eye view. "Very cool. OK, what should I shoot?"

"Whatever you want," Ranma said. "There's nothing alive out there."

Smiling, she locked the cross-hairs on another small hill to the right of the first one, quickly finding the weapon firing control. There was another buzz and the hill disappeared. Laughing, she targeted and blew away several more small hills and evaporated one of the lakes in a hail of hypervelocity projectiles. "It's like the world's best video game," the middle sister said with glee.

"Hey, don't hog the huge gun," Misaki said from behind her, giggling. "I want a go." Slightly reluctantly she relinquished control of the weapon. Soon, Misaki was strafing the plain, laughing like an idiot. Uthryyl watched with amusement, visibly making notes in his head.

When they'd all had a turn, including the trader, he waved to his people who began dismantling the alien weapon. "Very good. I'll have to test the rest of them, but that's a good purchase. Thank you, Nabiki, for showing me what the SI could do with it. That's very interesting."

"That was more fun than I expected," Kasumi said, watching the demons efficiently tear the device down. Ranma nodded, grinning.

"I'm not into guns, but there is something therapeutic about blowing enormous holes in the landscape when you know no one will get hurt."

Uthryyl smiled. "I feel the same way. I don't deal in weapons very often, I have very strict standards over who I'll supply, but my client is a good friend and I know for a fact that it's a defensive installation. I'm not getting involved in wars, I've seen far too much of that in the past." He looked slightly morose for a moment, then cheered up. "But I'll get a good price for these things. He'll take six, I'll hang on to the other two as spares just in case. You never know when a huge gun might come in handy." Ranma nodded with a straight face.

"True. Very true."

"Aren't there rules about trading in weapons?" Nabiki asked curiously, looking at the merchant. "I know there are back home." He nodded.

"Oh yes, indeed there are, rigorously enforced ones. I'm licensed on twenty-eight worlds to transfer non-classified weapons technology to approved clients, not including biological, chemical, radiological, or persistent magical weapons. Mass destruction devices, in short. They're banned almost everywhere, and rightfully so. Anti-personnel and anti-vehicle weapons are fine most places, assuming both the seller and purchaser hold appropriate licences. It gets very complicated keeping them all in order, but there are interworld treaties that simplify it from what it would otherwise be, which is an enormous mess." He laughed. "It's just a large mess."

"I have my own rules as well. There are certain types of weapon I won't touch. And a number of people and organisations I will not under any circumstances deal with. It restricts the market, but I'd rather be able to sleep at night. Profit isn't so difficult to come by if you're clever that I'd lower myself to that." The middle sister listened with interest. This sounded like something she should look into, the demon worlds clearly had a very complicated and mature market system going on. Vague ideas were tickling at the back of her mind. She made a note to see what Jun could tell her about all of this.

The lead tech approached them. "It's all crated up for transport, Uthryyl."

"Good. Let's spin up a portal, then you take it back to the warehouse. We'll test the rest tomorrow." He glanced at Ranma, hopefully. "Do you mind if I stay and watch what you do?" The martial artist grinned.

"Of course you can watch. We can sort you out with a return portal as well." Uthryyl smiled toothily, turning back to his crew.

"Right, let's get that portal going. Take the rest of the day off, both of you. Thanks, you've done a good job." They looked pleased, then the three demons stood in a triangular formation, a portal quickly forming in the middle. Pushing a pair of powered carts on tracks, loaded with the disassembled weapon, the two technicians disappeared through the portal, then Uthryyl shut it down. He turned to the others.

"So, what are you actually going to do?" He sounded very interested.
"Kas and I are training the others in ki control, amongst other things. We thought it would be a good idea to get in some serious firing effort, which would not be a good idea in our basement."
The demon nodded, grinning.

"I can imagine. I've seen what you can do with a little effort. I can only dread what the results would be if you really tried." Snickering, Ranma nodded agreement.

"To be honest, I'm not sure myself at the moment. It's quite a long time since I really tried hard, and I know both Kasumi and myself have increased in power considerably since then. It was pretty impressive last time." Looking out over the range, he considered it for a moment, then waved Misaki over. "OK, you start. Aim at that hill over there on the left. The SI says it's two kilometres away. See if you can hit it with a shot, give it all the power you can. I want to see your accuracy, whether it affects the illusion, and of course just what actually happens." The girl nodded, looking both interested and apprehensive. She took a couple of paces forward while he stepped back to give her room.

Taking careful aim she studied the shot for a moment, before taking up the classic ki shot pose Ranma had drilled them in while teaching the technique, her hands cupped at her waist. A deep orange ball of writhing ki energy grew steadily in front of her, reaching an impressive size quickly, nearly a metre across. Everyone could feel the energy contained in it trying to escape. With a small motion she fired the ball at the hill. It roared off across the plain, disappearing to a pinprick of light in less than a second. There was a brilliant flash as it struck just off centre on the hill, half-way up. When they stopped blinking, a glowing crater could be seen taking a notch out of the side of the hill. Misaki looked at it, then grinned. She turned.

"How's that?"

"Not bad. Not bad at all. How do you feel?" Ranma inspected her while the others looked at the crater, which was dimming rapidly.

"A little tired, but not too bad. I could probably do that four or five times in a row. I just couldn't hold it in any more at that power level."

#The crater is approximately fifteen metres across, Nabiki. That is a very considerable amount of energy to produce from a biological organism. I have few references to others able to duplicate the feat without technological or magical aid.# Jun sounded impressed.

"OK, try the same again, but compress it as far as you can. Same target." Turning back to face the plain, Misaki took up the posture once more, quickly producing a similar ki ball then compressing it. This took a second or two, resulting in a ball the size of an orange. She fired it.

"Holy crap!" Nabiki yelped, instinctively ducking. The compressed ki shot appeared to have penetrated into the little hill before detonating, with the result that the entire top erupted in a column of pulverised rock that would have done a small volcano proud. Debris scattered for hundreds of metres, while the sound reached them over six seconds later as a drawn out rumble following a huge explosion. Kasumi looked up, tracking something arcing towards them, then formed a ward around them just as chunks of debris started thumping to the ground. Misaki was staring wide-eyed.

"Wow."

By the time the dust cloud settled the top half of the hill was a slag-lined crater over twenty-five metres across, according to Jun, which sounded somewhat shocked. Misaki reported that she was rather tired but might pull one more like that off.
"No need. I think I have the answer I was looking for." Ranma exchanged a glance with his wife, who nodded slightly. "You didn't lose control of the illusion at all, even though you've used over half your ki reserves. That's extremely encouraging. Right, Fumiko, you try. Same thing, the next hill along." Misaki stepped back as her sister took her place, building a ball of yellow ki not quite as big at the other woman had managed. She hit her target dead centre, smiling as a large crater formed. Without waiting, she repeated the exercise with a compressed ki shot which ended up about the size of a basket-ball, leaving a considerably larger crater that made the side of the hill collapse in a land-slide.

"That definitely took it out of me," she said, walking back to them. "I couldn't do one that size again until I have a rest."

"Not bad, though. Your illusion flickered a little after the second shot but you stabilised it nicely."

Aiko and Tamiko took their shots, the former producing a hole nearly as large as Misaki had managed, while Tamiko missed on the second shot. They watched the deep green ki ball dwindle into the distance. "Oops," she said quietly. Several seconds later there was a distant flash on the mountain range on the horizon. Embarrassed, she turned to them. Ranma grinned.

"Well, your aim needs work, but that made quite a big hole," he said. Uthryyl was holding a pair of odd-looking binoculars to his face, searching the range.

"Ah. There it is. Still glowing. It's about the same size as the one Fumiko made, as far as I can see." He looked at her with amusement. "Not bad, you just need to hit what you aim at a little more." She flushed and nodded.

"Sorry."

The martial artist patted her on the shoulder. "Don't worry, you haven't been doing this very much yet. Your aim at more normal ranges is very good. We can work on the long range stuff, it's not like you're likely to need it any time soon. I hope." Smiling, Ranma waved Nabiki forward. Nervously, she took her place.

"I'm nowhere near as powerful as you guys," she said over her shoulder. He shrugged.

"I know. You won't be for some time. But this isn't completely about raw output, that's often not very important. Accuracy is much more important, and whether you can still control the illusion when you're running so much of your power as ki shots. So, that hill over there. Same thing the others did." Nodding, she stared at the hill, locking a target overlay on it half-way up.

"Right," she mumbled, "Hit there, but keep the illusion going." Building the ki ball to levels far higher than she'd dared try before, she kept a part of her attention on it as it swelled. At about half a metre across she returned full attention to the target marker, took a slow breath, then released it.

The shot hit almost exactly where she'd aimed, making her smile. The ensuing explosion was much smaller than the others had produced, but still left a respectable dent. She stared at it for a long moment, until the glow faded. 'Oh my god. I can't believe I just did that. That would have vaporised a car, at least.' It was a rather unsettling realisation. 'I'm really not sure I'm the right person to have that much power literally at my fingertips,' she thought, more than slightly worried. 'What the hell am I doing? I'm not a front line fighter, not like they are.' She felt a hand on her shoulder and looked to see her sister standing beside her looking at her calmly.

"I have an idea what you're thinking, sister," Kasumi said gently. "Trust me, you can handle this. You never need to use it if you don't want to, but both of us will be happy that you can. I know it's..." a lot to take in, but you will become used to it in time. I did. Remember what I was like, what I still am. Even with the power I'm still me. Even with the power you're still you. Just learn how to use it appropriately and responsibly. That's what this is all about." Nabiki listened, then slowly nodded. Squeezing her shoulder once, her sister stepped back.

Returning her attention to the target, the middle sister formed another ki ball, looking at it for a moment, then began to compress it. She got it down to about ten percent of it's original size before the back-pressure became more than she could fight. Holding it stable, while keeping the illusion spell working, was right at the limit of what she could do, yet she held both like that for several seconds, to prove to herself she could. Finally she released the shot.

The crater this time was over twice the size of the first one, close to what Tamiko had managed with her first shot. It overlapped the first one almost completely. Wiped out and sagging slightly, she turned to the others, who looked at her sympathetically. Even Uthryyl was smiling.

"Not bad, Nabs," Ranma commented, looking proud. "Even the illusion is still going perfectly. It didn't flicker at all." Motioning to his side, he added, "Come and sit down."

"On what?" she asked, walking over slowly. He laughed and pulled a folding camp chair from his ki pocket, setting it up for her. She settled into it gratefully. "Thanks." Kneeling beside her he smiled at her.

"Really, Nabiki, that was very good indeed. You continue to exceed my expectations with all of this. I'm sorry if it's causing you any problems." His voice was quiet and gentle. The middle Tendo looked at him for a moment, then she smiled back.

"Don't call me Nabs," she said, making him grin, before standing up.

"Your own power output is very high, Nabiki," Jun commented. "Not up to that produced by your colleagues but very respectable indeed. Your accuracy is also very good. If Ranma is indeed correct and you will continue to develop in power I am most interested to see the level you ultimately reach. This entire phenomenon is something I find very enlightening. Even the SI seemed to be trying to cheer her up in it's own, admittedly odd, manner. She smiled a little.

'Thank you, Jun.'

"You're most welcome, Nabiki." it fell silent with a satisfied tone in its voice.

Kasumi watched her sister for a moment, until she was sure that the younger woman was all right. She glanced at Ranma. "I suppose you'd like me to try, dear?" she asked, smiling. He nodded.

"Of course. We haven't really tried to see what you can do at full power before. I'm very interested to find out. But I think we should pick a target a little further away. Try that outcrop over there." She walked over to the point they'd been firing from.

"Ki ball or ki beam?" the elder Tendo asked. Ranma considered it for a moment.

"Feel up to both?"

"I think so. Let's find out." She aimed, producing an absolutely monstrous ball, so big it nearly touched the ground in front of her. Everyone but Ranma gaped in shock. The golden ball of light looked like the setting sun, the light washing over the entire surrounding area. When she released it the thing made a roar like a fighter jet, ripping through the air to impact on the outcrop of rock in the distance. The flash completely blinded everyone for several seconds, except Nabiki, who had closed her eyes just before impact, warned by Jun who sounded slightly shocked. A shudder travelled through the ground under their feet from the shockwave.

"Fuck me," Nabiki breathed, standing and staring at where her sister's ki ball had struck. The crater was at least fifty metres across, glowing brilliant yellow, and a significant part of the outcrop was simply gone. Blinking, Kasumi mumbled to herself, then looked.

"Oh, my," she said faintly, making Nabiki suddenly start laughing. For a moment she had a flashback to her earlier life, the exclamation was so... Kasumi-like. Her elder sister looked slightly puzzled, then grinned.

"That was rather more impressive than I was expecting," she said to Nabiki, who had moved over to stand beside her.

"I'll say. I remember under a year ago Ranma telling me he thought you'd produce a twenty metre crater at best. Even Tamiko is doing half that sort of size, Misaki is nearly there, and that..." She waved a hand at the distant hole. "That's just ridiculous. I can hardly believe that ki output scales up so fast."

Ranma came up beside her. "It's a little odd like that. It builds slowly at first then seems to accelerate. After a while it slows down to a steady increase, but Kas benefited from the steep part of the curve over the last year. The magic use has also had a knock-on effect on speeding it up and increasing the level, for her and all of you." He turned to his wife. "Better go for something a bit further away still for the compressed one." She nodded, as he and Nabiki moved out of the way.

Looking around Kasumi settled on a mound of rock a couple of kilometres further away, sufficiently distant that it was getting a little hazy in the remarkably clear air. She produced another ki ball the same size as the first.

It rapidly shrank to the size of a marble. Everyone exchanged glances, looking slightly worried. The power output seemed to go up rapidly as a function of the ratio between the original size and the final size, which meant this one was going to be impressive. "I suggest we all close our eyes until after the impact," Uthryyl commented. They immediately followed his advice.

The sound of the ki pellet being released was a high-pitched whine like a bullet ricochet, disappearing into the distance, to be followed by a brilliant flash. They opened their eyes in time to see a huge column of rock and dust arc far over the plain, the target hill reduced to rubble and molten rock. Hundreds of tons of debris fell for nearly a minute.

"Good grief," Nabiki muttered.

"That is quite remarkable," Jun said, sounding somewhat worried. "Your sister is producing detonations on a par with a very large amount of chemical explosives, with no obvious signs of effort. I have nothing in the database that would explain this aside from magic, yet I can sense none of it in use."

'Wait for Ranma to try. I suspect that will be terrifying.' The SI made no response.

The aforementioned martial artist moved to stand beside his wife. "That was very impressive, love. Much bigger than I expected. How do you feel after that?" She looked at him for a moment, then back at the settling dust cloud.

"Somewhat worried, to be honest. That was considerably larger than I expected. The ki compression technique is very effective." A few small rocks bounced around them, finally returning to earth after a very long flight. "I'm rather uncomfortable about what would happen in a populated area."
"We simply don't use it in a populated area. There's no problem turning the power down, is there?" Kasumi shook her head after a moment.

"I suppose not. But still, it's a little startling." She inspected the target, or where it had been, for a few seconds more. "Well, I suppose the ki beam is next." Ranma moved back to give her room. Pointing her hand she fired a golden beam at a point on the plain a couple of kilometres away with a shrieking noise from the displaced air being violently disassociated, watching as a hole appeared with a surprisingly quiet detonation. The crater glowed momentarily then dimmed, well before the noise rolled over them.

"Why was thebang so much quieter?" Nabiki asked curiously. She had shuddered a little at the sound the ki beam made, it was the sound she'd never forget from the night everything changed.

Ranma shrugged a little, looking interested. "I'm not entirely sure. It might be that the ki balls deliver the energy in one surge, while the beam is more of a continuous thing, but I've never really looked into it. It would be interesting to find out."

Kasumi fired again, making another hole, then raised her left hand and sent two beams into the distant ground. She studied the results and nodded. Aiming at the hill that Fumiko had targeted she produced a beam that stayed active, sliding it sideways through the distant mound at an angle like an enormous version of one of the energy swords. The top of the hill collapsed down the side, severed from the bottom. Everyone stared.

She turned her head and grinned, then with a series of careful gestures wrote her name in Kanji on the plain, the characters a hundred meters across. Nabiki had her fingers in her ears from the noise of the ki beam. Uthryyl was watching with fascination, shaking his head slowly. "Unbelievable," he said when she finished and the echoes died away. "I know a couple of mages who might manage that, but they wouldn't be standing up afterwards. It would take an impressive technological weapons system to do it as well." She smiled at him. "Was that the most power you can produce?"

"Oh, no. I was just experimenting." He looked worried, while she smiled more widely, then turned back to the view. Holding both hands together, her wrists touching, she sent a brief pulse of a massive beam screaming into the distance, aimed at the mountains on the other side of the plain. They watched as a huge column of golden energy leapt up, reminding Nabiki of the visual effect that Ranma had produced when disposing of the first demon all those months ago, only several times the size. Over three quarters of a minute later the boom of the discharge reached them, deepened by the distance. Uthryyl was staring through his binoculars looking slightly ill.

"Um... There's a hole where that beam hit. I can see light coming through it from the other side," he reported, lowering the instrument and staring at Kasumi, who looked pleased. "That's just unbelievable. And you say that there are people in Minato more powerful than you?"

"Yes. I know one girl who could, in theory, destroy the planet. She's a very nice girl and would never actually do it, of course, but the ability is there. Several others could at a pinch remove a few mountains if necessary." Everyone was staring at the eldest Tendo in horror. Ranma looked around, then laughed.

"Let me have a go. I'm really curious now."

Nabiki groaned. "Oh, god. You were destroying mountains four or five years ago. What the hell can you do now?" He smirked.

"Don't know. Let's find out."
"Try not to kill us all, dear," Kasumi said calmly although looking tired, pulling out her own folding chair and sitting in it. "That took it out of me. I don't think I could do it again until I have some rest."

"All right, I'm not going to bother with an uncompressed ki shot, the energy ball would be insanely large. I'll just make it compressed to start with." He held out his hand, a pinprick of light glowing on it. The light got brighter and brighter, to the point they all had to look away, while the tiny ki sphere only grew very slightly. After a couple of seconds he said, in a slightly strained voice and sweating, "That's as much as I can hold." The ball shot off across the plain with an almost ultrasonic whine, heading for the distant mountain range. "Turn around and close your eyes," he said, doing exactly that. Everyone else hastily followed suit. A pause of a few seconds was followed by the world being lit with a light brighter than the sun blazing down on them. They turned around.

Nabiki gaped in shock. Beside her, Misaki made a strangled noise. There was a visible gap in the mountains that hadn't been there before, with a massive column of smoke and dust boiling up from it. At the base was an orange glow. Uthryyl stared, horror-struck, then squinted. Raising his binoculars he looked through them, before shouting, "Everyone through the portal, now!" Ranma snapped his head around, then looked back to the destruction he'd caused, understanding crossing his face. Grabbing Kasumi and Nabiki he physically threw them through the portal a few metres away, while charging towards it, collecting the other girls in the process. The demon was hot on his heels. They all dived through into the practice room, rolling on the floor, as the martial artist shut the portal down. Nabiki looked at her brother-in-law in surprise once she picked herself up.

"What the hell was that in aid of?" she demanded.

"Shock-wave." He looked seriously at her. "I fucked up. That was like a small nuke going off, literally. There was a huge shockwave coming towards us at some incredible speed. It would have been very unpleasant even for us, there could have been, no, there probably is, supersonic shrapnel in the blast wave. Much safer to wait here until everything stops falling." He stood up and brushed himself down. "So, anyone want coffee?" Uthryyl raised his hand immediately, making him laugh.

Twenty minutes later, after a round of coffee, they recreated the portal and cautiously investigated. Nabiki stepped through and looked around. "Wow," she said softly. Chunks of rock were everywhere, while a thick layer of dust coated the area. Looking towards the place that the explosion had happened she saw there was still a cloud of dust high in the air, dimming the sunlight noticeably. Uthryyl inspected the damage, then turned to the martial artist.

"It's probably a good idea if you reserve that power level for something world-ending. It's a little excessive for use in a built-up area." Ranma started laughing, the merchant joining him.

"How many times in a row could you do that?" Nabiki asked curiously, inspecting the terrifying young man with worried interest. He thought for a moment.

"Like that, maybe twice. Possibly three times at a real pinch. The destruction was much larger than it would have been without the compression technique, that makes it far more powerful than otherwise. I couldn't produce a hole that big with a normal ki ball, I suspect. It really took it out of me, to be honest, I don't think I'll bother trying again. But it's interesting to know what our limits really are." He studied the distant notch in the range. "That's kind of scary." The martial artist looked genuinely worried for a moment. Eventually he turned back to them. "Right, I think we've all learned something. Like, keep the power down around people or anything else valuable." Misaki giggled, looking at her craters with satisfaction.

"None of you had any problems keeping the illusion running," Kasumi noted with satisfaction.
"Even with your energy levels considerably depleted you're managing well. I'm very happy with the results." She smiled at them. "This has been a good exercise."

"We may as well go home," Ranma added. "I don't think any of you are up to any more large-scale tests, and we can do the small stuff in the basement. Although it might be a good idea to come back here at some point and work on long-range accuracy with more sensibly sized shots." He glanced at Tamiko with a grin, making her look slightly embarrassed.

"Uthryyl, would you like to come to lunch?" Kasumi asked the demon. He thought for a moment then nodded, looking pleased.

"Thank you, I'd like that." He followed them back through the portal. Shortly they were all eating around the table. "I hear you have been sucked into the weird lifestyle your friends and family enjoy, Nabiki," the trader said as they had dessert. He grinned at Nabiki as she sighed, poking her ice-cream with her spoon.

"Yes, I guess I have. Parts of it are a lot of fun, but the more I learn and the more power I seem to get the more worried I am about it all. I don't know that I am the right person to have access to all of this. Things seem to have spiralled out of control in the last year to a level I wouldn't have thought possible." She was once more having second thoughts about everything. The demon looked at her thoughtfully while everyone else listened.

"I'm nearly two hundred of your years old, Nabiki, I've seen some extraordinary things in all that time, and been involved in a number of... I suppose adventures would be a reasonable way to put it... Some of which were fun, some of which still give me nightmares." Uthryyl spoke quietly, but with a certain intensity. "I have known a lot of people with considerable power, and a lot of people who sought power. The rule of thumb tends to be, in my experience, that the ones who look for it are the ones who shouldn't ever get it. Political, magical, whatever, they tend to be... difficult. And ordinary people end up dying as a result. War is never pretty. From what I know of the history of your world your people know this all too well."

He looked around the table. "Sitting here are some of the most powerful people I've ever met, on any world I've been on. Yet I feel totally safe. I'm completely sure that Kasumi and Ranma would never allow their own abilities to be used for evil, neither would they train anyone they didn't trust to the same level. The fact that they, all of them, trust you with this, and also that you yourself don't, says to me that you are one of the people who will not abuse it." He abruptly grinned. "That's not to say it will be easy. People like them, and you now, tend to attract trouble, or get attracted to it. That's true everywhere. But I think you can handle it, and if you can't, you have plenty of people who will help. Including myself, if you need it." She stared at him, somewhat surprised, then nodded.

"Thank you."

"It's not a problem, trust me. Ranma and Kasumi are very dear friends, as the rest of you are becoming. Aside from anything else, you're all very good for business." The demon smirked, finishing off his ice cream with relish while they laughed.

"You'll be fine, Nabiki," Tamiko assured her. "I'm sure Ranma has told you this, but you don't have to go full magical girl. Associating with the people you do, and your family history, pretty much guarantees that weird things will occasionally happen around you, though, and it's best that you can take care of yourself and people who are less able to defend themselves. We had to go through the same thing when we got sucked in and we had a lot less warning then. None, basically." Aiko nodded.
"All too true. The first time Ranma met us we'd been doing it for two years and still nearly got me at least killed because we weren't up to the job. Luckily, he came along at just the right point." She smiled at the martial artist who looked amused. "And it led to a friendship that will last forever."

Nabiki glanced at Ranma. "You never really told me more than the basics of how you met the others. What did happen?" Grinning, he put his own bowl down.

"Well, you remember about, oh, maybe ten months or so before the shit hit the fan? Akane had a real strop even for her, with the result I ended up in a park in Minato. That sort of thing was practically a cliché of my life, her knocking me kilometres and scoring a hole in one in some sort of water. I have no idea how she could do it, but it happened every damn time." Nabiki giggled.

"She had hidden talents."

"Not so hidden, she certainly wasn't shy about using them. Anyway, that particular time I ended up saving them from a very aggressive and extremely powerful demon that was slowly taking them to pieces. Not as bad as the ones the portal bombs draw here but not far off it." He sighed. "I had to kill it in the end, it was never going to back down. I'm kind of ashamed how much enjoyment I got out of beating it up, but I genuinely had just had one of the worst days ever. It was good stress relief, and possibly stopped me going off at the Dojo, which would have been horrible."

Nabiki thought. "That was the night you told Akane to fuck off, wasn't it?" she said with sudden insight. He nodded.

"Yep. I really wasn't in the mood for her crap when I got home, but at least I wasn't in a killing rage any more. Fumiko came after me when I finished the thing off and left, we got to talking, then I went back to the others with her. Aiko was in a bad way so I ended up taking her to Doc Tofu, who sorted her leg out. Afterwards we talked for a long time, which ended up with me being 'volunteered' to fill in for Aiko while she healed up." He made a face while Nabiki started giggling.

"The uniforms..." she managed, before it became too much. Ranma grimaced, Aiko and the others laughing, while Kasumi was hiding a smile of her own.

"Exactly. Not the choice I really wanted but I made a promise." He shrugged. "And like Tamiko said, I've got the legs for it." Nabiki stared at him for a moment then collapsed in hysterical laughter. He grinned.

"I trained them up, except Aiko since she was in a cast, for three weeks or so, then when she healed up, I got her sorted as well. We even went on a few missions as a five-girl team, just so I could try and sort out their teamwork properly. In the end, though, it was getting too close to someone finding out. The Doc worked it out pretty fast even with the disguise bracelets. Kas figured it out as well." Nabiki, still snickering, glanced at her sister, who nodded.

"It was after one of the news reports about Aiko's team, although I didn't know them then. I managed to put everything together." Looking at her younger sister she produced a smirk remarkably similar to Ranma's. "I'm still rather surprised you didn't." Nabiki sighed.

"It's a bit embarrassing. I guess all the clues were there, but I just didn't see them." Glancing up at Ranma, she added, "That was where the cell-phone came from, wasn't it?" He nodded, grinning. "That whole thing was driving me nuts for close to two months, you know. I just couldn't figure out where you were going, and how you kept evading every one of the people I had looking for you."

Chuckling, Ranma smiled at her. "I know. Cologne was going nuts as well, she was sniffing around from the first day. I found out later that Happosai knew quite a lot about it and was running interference for a while, which must have pissed her off like nothing else I can imagine. Anyway, when they were back up to fighting strength I gave the bracelet back and walked away, since I didn't want to drag them into the insanity in Nerima."

"We had enough insanity in Minato already," Fumiko added, laughing.

"It was very hard not having him around any more," Aiko said quietly. "We all liked him very much. Several months later, when everything went to crap, he phoned me, I called the others, and we came running. You more or less know the rest. Over the next year or so he trained us every now and then, although he was concentrating on training Kasumi, who is much better than any of us will ever become. But it helped us all enormously. He, or she, at the time, even came out on a couple of missions with us for old times sake, although she never much wanted to wear the uniform." The short girl smiled. "I always managed to persuade her. If I was going to wear the damn thing, so was she..." Nabiki started laughing again.

The four young women and Ranma spent the next hour or so going over a number of stories from their early demon-chasing time together, some of which even Kasumi hadn't heard. Much of it had all of them roaring with laughter. "How many times did he sell her ice-cream?" Nabiki asked after one story of an unlikely relationship between a demon and a shopkeeper. Ranma shrugged.

"As far as I know he still is. She turns up about every four or five months and gives him enough gold to pay for his entire stock several times over, takes a few large tubs of chocolate ice cream, and goes home again. They became good friends in the end. He's become quite wealthy from it, she seems to enjoy visiting, and it's just kept going." Shaking his head he grinned. "It was nice to see people not fighting just because they were different but the first meeting was a bit... stressful. It's probably my earliest success in getting the locals to see the visitors as something useful not something hostile. I'm rather pleased about it."

"What is it about visitors from other places and chocolate?" Nabiki asked, looking at Uthryyl.

"And all the gold and precious metals?" He smiled.

"Different worlds have different monetary systems. On some of them the metals your civilisation prizes are very common, so they're not worth a huge amount. By comparison, at any rate, most of them are useful engineering materials if nothing else which sets a lower limit on their value. Gold is also pretty universally prized because it's so nice to look at and feel. Chocolate, coffee, some things like that, though, are very rare. The relevant plants don't grow in many places as well as they do here. So it works out that you can make a pretty respectable profit trading metals we have a surplus of to people for chocolate and coffee beans that essentially they have a surplus of. Everyone seems happy, and I'm in the middle. Which is nice." His grin was wide and predatory, making her laugh.

"The essence of business everywhere, I guess." He nodded.

"Exactly. Things that are cheap and common in one place can be very expensive and rare in another. The trick is working out the right places to trade between. I've lost a lot of money in the past by getting it wrong, but eventually you learn. There are things you can't trade, of course, or at least it's extremely strongly discouraged. A lot of weapons, as we discussed, certain narcotics, or things that are narcotics or otherwise toxic to some species and not to others, some types of technology, and so on. A very large number of worlds are reachable by portals if you know how and have the power to open them, they all have different rules and regulations. Some of them trade a lot and have treaties, such as the K'nn grouping, some like yours don't. A reputable trader like myself attempts to stick to sensible rules even in the latter case, it's good business."
"It all sounds more like some sort of science fiction thing than magic and supernatural stuff, which is how it's always talked about," Nabiki commented, fascinated. Ranma smiled.

"In a lot of ways it is. Calling them 'demons' is probably completely wrong, 'aliens' would be much closer to the truth. I think the first term is left over from events a long time ago when people thought it was all beasts from hell. There are certainly some worlds that are damn close to that idea, which may even be where it started, but a lot of places are quite like here, just with different people. Oddly enough, most of the worlds I know about are actually fairly close to ours, like the air is breathable, the gravity is more or less the same, things like that." He looked interested. "I don't know why for sure, but I think it might be something along the lines of the old parallel world thing SF writers love so much, although that wouldn't explain why everyone looks so different." He shrugged a little.

"Another interesting thing is that portals, as far as anyone can determine, can only be opened by magic," Uthryyl added. "Some of that magic can be automated, as proven by the portal weapons, but it still needs magic. Pure technology can't do it. I've got no idea why. There are some worlds that are pure tech, some that are pure magic, and a lot that are hybrids to one level or another. Yours, like mine, falls into the last category although at the moment it's tipped heavily in the direction of the tech side. My world is much more magic biased although we also like technology a lot. We have a lot more mages than electronics engineers though. You do have some very competent magic workers around. Some are actually better than almost anywhere can produce. Not to mention this whole ki thing that Ranma and you guys use, which I haven't come across anywhere else, at least actually being used rather than as a fairy story."

"Where would you say our world is on the technological advancement scale?" Nabiki asked, very curious. "Things like the comm units are clearly a long way ahead of anything we could produce, and even that rail gun is some way past us, although I've heard that something similar is being researched." The demon looked thoughtful.

"It's difficult to say for sure. There are some things that are very advanced here, some that are quite backward compared to other worlds, but that's true anywhere you go. Your materials sciences and bioengineering skills, from what my research has found, are actually very respectable indeed. It's something I'm keeping an eye on for possible future trading purposes. Electronics and computing are pretty good although nowhere near state of the art in a lot of places, except for one or two areas."

Kasumi nodded thoughtfully. "The SI units are good proof that some places are far ahead of us on that technology."

Uthryyl grinned. "The makers of those things are ahead of everyone on that technology, trust me. They have been for centuries. We don't know a huge amount about them, they tend to keep to themselves, but no one doubts their abilities in computing. The thought that they might be as far ahead in other areas has kept everyone from poking too deeply into them, in case they poke back." He laughed.

"But your world isn't bad at a lot of things. Some of them, yes, you could certainly improve, your energy generation systems are pretty inefficient for example, but on the whole you're probably in the upper third of tech worlds. With some exceptions, around the middle in magical ability. Those exceptions, though, are as high if not higher than anyone else I know of." He shrugged. "I'm sitting at the table with at least two of those exceptions." Ranma and Kasumi looked slightly embarrassed.

"Is there some common medium of exchange, some currency that works across more than one world?" Tamiko asked curiously. "I mean, clearly gold and silver, things like that, can't be used everywhere, since you've just told us that some places don't value them more than something like steel." Uthryyl nodded.

"Not everywhere, but quite a few worlds use a credit system that they all agree on a common value for. There are actually several of them, with a small number of worlds using more than one, which lets you transfer credit between them. For a fee, of course." He smiled again. "It's kind of complicated, but it more or less works. The idea is that if you have credit in the system it can be used for equivalent value on any of the worlds that subscribe to it, allowing you to transfer credit in and out of local monetary systems at a sensible exchange rate. It's not perfect, but it's useful. Your world, since it doesn't have any official connection with any of the other worlds, isn't on the system but there are obviously ways around that."

The demon looked amused. "I could go on about interworld trade for hours. I've been doing it for over a century. If you really want to know, I could dig up some of the relevant texts and send them to you. Your SI could translate them into something you could read."

Nabiki looked at him, thinking, then nodded. "Yes, please, Uthryyl, I think that I'd like to learn more about that. It falls into my own area of interest and if my life keeps going the way it seems to be heading, it could be useful." He grinned at her.

"Planning on going into business? I could always use another local agent."

The middle sister laughed. "I'm not sure, but it's always a good idea to keep oneself informed about things." After a moment, she asked, more out of curiosity than anything else, "How much do you charge for one of those small fusion reactors?" He looked surprised, while Ranma and Kasumi exchanged amused glances.

"Hmm. I'd have to check on the regulations for transfer of that sort of technology to a non-aligned world, and work out a price. Why, are you in the market for one?" He looked at her with interest. She shrugged a little.

"I'm not sure yet. It's just a thought at the moment, but something you said made me think, about our energy generation infrastructure. There's a lot in the news recently about pollution causing all sorts of long term problems. I know fusion power is something that our scientists have been working on since long before I was born, without much real progress so far, at least as far as making it a usable technology." The middle sister smiled. "Perhaps we could buy it in." The trader studied her for a while.

"Interesting thought. It's potentially a very large change to your society. I'm guessing that a lot of the entities that make a profit from the current systems are probably quite happy with things the way that they are and might push back if you introduced cheap clean power. But, that said, it would probably improve your world quite a lot in the long run." He thought for a few more seconds. "I'll look into it."

"Thanks." They talked for another hour or so, but eventually Uthryyl stood.

"I'm going to have to get back. Thank you for lunch, Kasumi, it was very nice, and thanks to all of you for an interesting afternoon." Ranma and his wife stood as well, taking the demon into the practice room where they quickly set up a portal. He waved then walked through, before they shut it down. Nabiki watched from the doorway.

"That was very interesting," she said as they walked back to the living room.

"Indeed," Kasumi said, looking at her sister. "Are you thinking of becoming a trader, then, sister?"
Nabiki smiled.

"Like I told Uthryyl, I don't know yet. But it's a thought. Keeping my options open, I suppose. Just in case forensic accountancy turns out to be too boring, and magical girl stuff is too exciting." Giggling, Kasumi hugged her sister, then started clearing the table with her husband's help.

Fumiko and Misaki went back to their apartment, looking tired. Everyone was feeling somewhat exhausted as they'd all used a significant percentage of their ki reserves on the firing range. It would build up again but the best method for that was sleep. Aiko slumped on the sofa next to Tamiko and they turned on the TV to watch a movie for while. Heading for the bathroom Nabiki twitched when she caught sight of her Azumi persona in the mirror, she'd completely forgotten once more what she looked like. Staring at her reflection in fascination she leaned closer, studying her orange-gold eyes. They really were somewhat intimidating. Not quite in the same way as Ms Aoyama's blue cats eyes, but still a little scary.

Stepping back she ran her hand through her silver hair. 'I like that effect,' she thought to herself, amused. 'Almost metallic, not like white hair at all. Very cool.' Dealing with what she'd come in for, she washed up and returned to the living room to find both the other young women snoring next to each other, Aiko slowly tipping over to lean against Tamiko. She grinned and went to find her sister, who wasn't in the kitchen where she'd last seen her.

It turned out Kasumi was in the practice room, with the full ward interface glowing around her. "What's up?" Nabiki asked curiously, cautiously negotiating her way around the magic lines to stand beside her sister. The older woman glanced at her, looking worried.

"I had a sudden thought while I was putting everything away and wanted to check whether I was right," she replied, inspecting some part of the magical interface. "Unfortunately, I think I am. It's a good thing I found it."

"Found what?"

Instead of answering directly, Kasumi looked at her and said, "You remember how large a hole Ranma made with his ki shot on the firing range?"

"Vividly." The middle sister would never forget it.

"That was a large amount of energy. A very large amount. However, the amount stored in the wards is considerably larger, as we've been pushing power into the system for years. It suddenly crossed my mind to look at how much energy it might use if it decided that one of us was sufficiently under threat that a response was required." She looked slightly pale. "It seems to me that we may have made a fairly major miscalculation on the effects."

Nabiki wasn't sure she wanted to know, but asked anyway. "How major a miscalculation?" She was getting an unpleasant sensation in her stomach, which only intensified when her sister looked back to the displayed information and slowly shook her head.

"Potentially disastrous. The problem is that there isn't a limit set on how much power it can use for a direct strike. That wasn't an issue when we first set it up, the total power available was high but reasonable. Since then, though, we've stored far more energy than we ever considered likely. More than I thought was possible, actually. If it decided to use all of that at once... Well, that little explosion Ranma made would be... Somewhat exceeded."

"Oh, shit. You're serious?" Nabiki went white. Kasumi nodded soberly.
"Unfortunately, yes. We're going to have to take that part completely off line, the risk is much too high. It will need a complete rework of the relevant part of the spell which could take months." She started making changes as she spoke, while Ranma came in a few seconds later, called by her on the comm. She talked rapidly as she worked, using terminology Nabiki couldn't make heads or tails of but he apparently could. After a short explanation he looked horrified.

"Oh, fuck, you're completely right. Why the hell didn't I see it?"

"You weren't looking, dear. Neither was I. We made some faulty assumptions and hadn't realised how much adding the others changed the system. It's no one's fault, but it's a good thing I noticed before something triggered it. Help me isolate that section, will you?" Nodding, he stood beside her as they worked some remarkably complex operations on the ward system.

"Damn. What a stupid mistake," Ranma grumbled, quickly changing the patterns. He glanced at Nabiki. "It would have been most likely to react to a threat to you, from what I can see. It's a good thing I didn't throw you to a demon. We might not have much of Minato left if I had done." She crossed her arms and glared at him.

"I told you that was a bad idea." Chuckling, he continued working.

Eventually both Ranma and Kasumi finished what they were doing and very carefully checked their results. "OK. That's a fix, but not an ideal one." He looked at his sister-in-law. "We've completely isolated the subsection that would have provided an intervention outside the building for someone in the system who was under attack. I'm not completely happy about that, it does leave you in particular more vulnerable than I'd like, but at the moment there's no half-way house. It's either on or off. On is bad. Possibly very bad indeed." He looked disgusted with himself. "If it had triggered, you'd have been fine, I have no doubt, but anyone within a few kilometres would have ended up having an extremely bad day. Not to mention a very short one."

Shaking his head slightly he studied the system. "It's going to be a huge amount of work to redesign that part. It's so tightly interwoven that we'll have to rebuild most of it one way or another. There's no way to just change that part and put a limit on it, it's not designed for it. Damn." Kasumi put her arm around his neck.

"We can fix it, it will just take time. It's important that we get it right, though, it would be very irresponsible to leave it the way it was."

"I know, Kas, but I'm still irritated. At least as much because I missed it all this time." She kissed him, making him smile.

"So did I. So did Happosai. None of us are perfect and we make mistakes. We caught it in time, so no harm done."

Nabiki watched with a smile. "So what does this mean in practice?" With one last glance at the interface Kasumi dismissed it, then led the way back to the living room.

"Not too much immediately. It will still block probe attempts on you, which seems to be it's favoured action at the moment, but now if you come under serious attack it can't do much more. We'd get notified, of course, and it will still be able to defend the building and anyone inside it very effectively, but it's abilities outside will be much more limited. That isn't too much of a problem for most of us, we can take care of ourselves, but I'm also slightly worried about you, sister. You're not nearly as powerful as we are."

"I know, but I don't think that's a problem," Nabiki replied, sitting down. "It's not like I have any serious enemies. All its really doing at the moment is hiding me a bit, like you already do for yourselves with your invisibility and the attention diverting techniques, right?" They both nodded, sitting next to her. "So, until I learn those techniques, it's useful, but there shouldn't be any other downsides. I have to admit I'm slightly more comfortable knowing the thing won't suddenly take a dislike to someone and effectively call in an air-strike on them." Ranma grinned at her words.

"More like an orbital laser cannon, but I know what you mean. I'm still a bit worried though."

"You're a professional paranoid, Ranma," she said with her own grin. "You're always worried." Kasumi giggled, holding his hand. He sighed, but smiled.

"True, I guess. I just don't want to see you get hurt."

"Which is why you're teaching me to defend myself and anyone else in the area, to a horrifying level," the middle sister shot back, laughing. "I do understand that, even if I sometimes have my doubts about it. But I'm not going to get all depressed about it right now. Perhaps next week."

Their laughter woke Tamiko and Aiko, who looked muzzily around. "What? Who?" Aiko mumbled, before standing, stretching, and vanishing. Nabiki blinked, rubbing her eyes after the flash.

"Ow."

"She's got the right idea. I'm off to bed as well, guys," Tamiko said sleepily, stumbling towards the door, still cloaked in the demoness illusion. The remaining three watched as she left.

"It's still quite early, we haven't even had dinner yet," Kasumi said. Ranma shrugged.

"They used an awful lot of ki today. They'll be asleep until morning, I think." He looked at Nabiki. "How do you feel?"

"Very tired, but not to the point of collapsing. But I think I might go and lie down, though. If I fall asleep wake me in time for dinner, all right?" He nodded, smiling, as she went to her room and undressed, pulling the blind down and turning out the light. Lying on the bed she pulled the covers up, then closed her eyes. Pulling up a web browser in her internal view she started going through some of the links that Jun had found, snickering every now and then when she came across something particularly gratuitously wrong. There were some very odd stories out there about magical girls.

She was halfway through reading an article about a recent event involving Azumi, which she was in an excellent position to know was completely wrong, when she fell asleep.

What the hell is it?" Cologne wondered, looking at the incredibly faint traces of some weird energy she'd finally discovered after much searching. The elder had been so sure something odd was going on she'd kept looking for some evidence long after sensible people would have called it a day. She'd had to practically invent a new technique from scratch to even detect the energy, which she was assuming was some sort of magic, because it certainly wasn't anything else she'd ever seen before, and even then she couldn't make heads or tails of it. It was the most complex patterning she'd ever seen.

There were small traces of it around all over the place, most of them, rather worryingly, terminating at her. When she'd discreetly checked she'd also found traces leading to her great grand-daughter, both of the fathers at the Tendo Dojo, and a few other people she knew were reasonably sensitive to either ki or magic. She had by far the largest amount of the traces, which were steadily fading, but even there it was barely perceptible. If it was a spell of some sort it was an amazingly subtle one, vastly beyond anything she or any of the Amazons could have produced even on their best day.

Attempts to trace it to its source had been completely futile. When she'd tried it just stopped in mid-air, no trace beyond that at all. It was like it had come out of nothing. 'It's almost like some random natural event,' she mused, 'but there's no way it's actually random. Someone or something is doing it, I'm sure of that, but I have no idea what or who.' The elder inspected her results again, shaking her head slowly. There wasn't a magic worker she knew who could have produced something like this, and one of the things she found most disturbing about it was quite how disturbing it actually was. It literally made her head ache to look too closely at it. 'Like playing with raw chaos, almost,' she thought, 'which is impossible.'

"Demon magic of some sort?" she considered out loud, putting some of the scrolls she'd been using as a reference away. There had been nothing useful in them anyway. The thought made her stop, worried. She was well aware that some of the travellers from demonic worlds had far more powerful magic than anything she knew. After a moment she resumed tidying up. "No. A little like it, but not the same." When she'd finished she carefully noted down the method she'd come up with in her own personal shorthand for magic, referring to her notes, before putting the new scroll away carefully. It wasn't a dangerous technique but it required a considerable amount of experience and skill to use, there were very few magic users in Japan that she was aware of that could work it.

'I'm going to have to keep watch. If I can figure out where it's coming from I might be able to work out what it's for.' Hearing a crash from the kitchen she sighed, then went downstairs to shout at Mousse to put his damn glasses on.

"Nabiki? Dinner is ready, if you'd like some." Kasumi's soft voice woke her sister with a start. She looked at the door, where the other woman was leaning in, then smiled. "Thanks. Sorry, I was more tired than I thought."

"I don't mind, sister. You worked very hard today. Have something to eat and you can go back to bed." The elder sister left, closing the door behind her, while Nabiki swung her legs over the edge of the bed and sat up, rubbing her eyes. She had been asleep for about four hours she noticed. A lock of silver hair in the corner of her vision made her smile. She'd held the illusion even while exhausted and asleep.

Sitting at the table a few minutes later, having combed her hair and redressed, she grinned at Ranma, who inspected her and nodded approvingly. "Well done. No degradation at all. You could probably hold that for days, if not a week or two. I'm very impressed." Kasumi spooned out some rice, passing the bowl to her sister with a smile.

"I think we can set you up with some presets now, Nabiki. You should be able to use them fairly easily, I think, and it will get easier the more you do."

"So, Ms Aoyama, Azumi, Mer-Nabiki, Mer-Azumi, right?" The middle sister nodded with a grin. "I still don't know what you're going to do with the mer-forms, but I want to watch if you figure out something funny." Ranma smirked a little at her, making her grin back with a similar expression.

"I'll let you know."

"Anything else?" She thought for a while, eating slowly.
"I still want a flying form. I think that would be amazing. But, hmm, how about the horse-girl one? That could also be funny."

"Based on...?"

"Azumi, I think."

He nodded. "OK. Five should be enough for the moment. Like we said, no point loading you up with too many, but it's good to have enough you can study the differences. It will help with learning the full technique, which I think will be quite a lot of work. Kas and I worked it out together so we're both pretty good at it, but we never tried teaching it to anyone before you guys."

When they finished dinner and cleared everything away, Kasumi sat next to her sister and inspected her for a moment. "Very good. All right, release that illusion, then we can try a preset." The middle sister let go of the energy holding her current form stable, watching as her hands shimmered and changed to the ones she was familiar with.

"That's still very strange to watch and feel," she commented, running her right hand over her face and feeling the familiar contours. "But a lot of fun. OK, what do I do now?"

Kasumi glanced at her, concentrating. "Just wait a moment, I need to build the preset pattern for you. I'll do the Azumi one first." After a minute or two and a brief discussion with her husband, she smiled. "I think that should do it. I'm going to apply it then you take control just as in the previous exercise, which should be quite easy. Ready?"

Nabiki nodded. Once more she felt the change happen, shimmering back into Azumi complete with clothing. "Now, take control of the pattern, don't try to understand it, just take it whole." Kasumi watched closely as her sister carefully accepted the complex magic construct, then smiled broadly. "Good. You've got it. Now, watch carefully. You see this part here?" A trace of energy indicated a specific sub-pattern. Nabiki nodded, fascinated with the spell.

"That's basically the on switch. This one next to it will... link it to you, I suppose is a good description. Activate it like we showed you." Following the instructions Nabiki pushed some energy into the pattern, watching as it changed slightly. "Very good. It looks like it worked. It should stay stable until you delete it now. How does it feel?"

"A little odd, but it's fading. It kind of tingled when I poked it there," Nabiki reported, her eyes shut as she watched the internal energy flow.

"That's fine. Right, you should be able to turn it off by deactivating that node I showed you. Try it." Both Ranma and Kasumi smiled as 'Azumi' shimmered and became Nabiki again. "Fantastic." Her elder sister studied her closely for a moment before smiling again. "It's still stable. Very gratifying, I wasn't completely sure it would work."

Inspecting the spell herself Nabiki saw how it formed a self-contained pattern that didn't show any inclinations to dissipate, yet was only drawing a very small amount of power in the off state. Experimentally she prodded the activation node again, watching as the pattern blossomed into activity, requiring her to feed it more energy, although interestingly, not quite as much as the previous illusion had needed. Kasumi looked pleased as her sister shimmered into 'Azumi' again. Ranma put his hand on his wife's arm.

"Very good idea, Kas. That's a remarkably good spell." She looked at him happily.

"Thank you, dear." Turning back to Nabiki who was flipping between 'Azumi' and her normal appearance with a grin on her face, she added, "Turn it off and we'll try the next one."

Setting up all five presets took nearly half an hour of careful work but by the end of it, the middle sister could see five little complex knots of energy sitting inside her. Any of them could be activated at will, although it took some practice to successfully manage to switch directly between them rather than going back to her normal form first. She managed it in the end, looking very pleased with herself.

"Not bad, Nabs." Ranma grinned down at her where she was lying on the floor, propped up on one elbow, as 'Mer-Azumi'. The silver-haired mermaid shook her hair out of her eyes.

"Don't call me Nabs," she said in a cold voice, then giggled. He laughed.

"We can do the others tomorrow if they want," Kasumi said, stepping over her sister's silver-scaled tail and heading for the kitchen. Nabiki rolled onto her back and propped herself up on her elbows, looking along the length of her body, before shaking her head.

"This is one of the weirdest things yet." She looked at the martial artist who looked back, amused. "But it's a lot of fun. More fun than blowing huge holes in things, to be honest, although that has it's own attractions." He laughed a little.

"I think it might be that you're a born secret agent in some ways, not a soldier. The disguise spells play right into that. You'll be terrifyingly effective when you've learned it properly, if that's the path you want. I'm sure the PSIA would love to have you working for them." She grinned, shimmering back into her normal form and standing.

"I think all of those at once might be a bit much. You should probably pick one or maybe two."

"At the moment I mainly want to finish my degree. After that, though, it's pretty interesting to see how many more things seem to be possible all of a sudden." She sat beside him, pulling her leg up and clasping her hands over her knee. "At least I know I'll never go hungry."

The man next to her smiled. "We'd never let that happen, you know that, Nabiki. We have more than enough to keep all of us in comfort forever, near enough. If you don't want to work, you certainly don't have to." She looked at him for a while.

"Thanks. But I think I'd like to do something useful with my life. Idle layabout loses it's appeal after a while, I suspect."

Ranma grinned. "For people like us, yes. We all like to do things, we just happen to have a rather wider range of things we can do than most people." After a few seconds she grinned and jumped to her feet.

"Thanks for all of this. Even with my doubts, thanks."

"You're welcome, Nabiki. See you in the morning." Waving to him she headed back to bed, still tired, but happy.

At 6.47AM a faint alarm woke the middle sister. Waving one hand futilely for a non-existent alarm clock, she finally realised the sound was coming from inside her head. "What's going on?" she mumbled out loud.
My apologies, Nabiki," Jun said, sounding regretful, "I didn't like to wake you but I believe I have discovered something you need to look at immediately. It relates to the missing portal weapon."

Instantly fully awake Nabiki replied, 'Show me, please.'

'I have been monitoring the various internet sites your friend Miki informed you of, as well as locating other sources of information with similar content. The majority of them contain what can only loosely be termed information, as most of it appears to consist of anecdotal evidence at best and complete falsehood at worst. However, some of them do have data which is verifiable and consistent. While following a trail through a number of websites and fora I found references to a location that appears to be some form of marketplace for magical or possibly magical artefacts.' The SI was popping up a number of windows illustrating some of what it was describing as it spoke. 'I investigated and discovered that the bulk of this merchandise was clearly fraudulent. But I did notice something interesting.' An image appeared in the middle of her viewpoint.

'This image is of a collection of articles that the seller claimed were magical, although of unknown origin. I recognise a few of them as being genuine, but not of any great significance. Most of them are not genuine, or are out of my experience, but one item stood out. It drew a red circle around something Nabiki had already spotted. 'I am convinced to better than ninety percent probability that this is a portal weapon, as shown in the images Ranma sent us some time ago. Much of it is obscured by the item in front of it, but the portion that is visible matches the images to nearly one hundred percent congruence. The likelihood that this is the missing portal weapon is very high.' Nabiki was holding her breath.

'Where is it?' she asked quietly. There was a pause, then Jun spoke, sounding slightly embarrassed. 'I am unsure.'

'What?' she yelped in her head. 'After all that?'

'The problem is that the collection of items has already been sold, some two months ago. I found this image during a search of the archives of this site. The seller was in Sydney, Australia, which fits with the list of possible destinations of the mage who created the prototypes. Unfortunately the buyer was working through a series of anonymising proxies which has sufficiently obscured the trail that I have so far been unable to locate them. I suspect that the final destination was in North America but so far I cannot prove it. No further images of the device have so far turned up during my search of the internet, but I will continue looking.'

'Damn. Oh well, that's at least the first evidence we've so far found about that thing. Can you locate the seller?'

'I have an address but I cannot guarantee it is correct. This site seems to be patronised by people who value their privacy. I had to break several layers of encryption to get the information I have already obtained. It was easy, of course, but it shows that further information may require a more direct approach.'

Nabiki grinned, sitting up in bed. 'You mean go there and beat it out of them?'

'Yes.' The voice in her head was definitely amused. Getting dressed she commed Ranma and Kasumi, both of whom woke up and responded very quickly. Sending them all the information Jun had found and it's conclusions, she was in the kitchen making coffee by the time they came in.

"Good work, Nabs." Ranma took the cup of coffee she handed him with a smile.
"It was mostly Jun," she replied, taking a long swallow. "And don't call me Nabs." He grinned, leaning close to the side of her head.

"GOOD WORK, JUN," he called into her right ear. She laughed and pushed him away.

"Idiot. So, what do we do about it?"

"You were right, about all we can do is follow the trail. Go there, track down the seller, persuade him or her to tell us who bought it, then go and get the damn thing." He shifted to 'Yori' and called Agent Naito. After a brief conversation with the PSIA man, who complained that she only ever called him when he was trying to sleep, they agreed to meet at the police station again in half an hour. When the black-haired girl disconnected she was laughing.

"He sounded very tired, poor guy." Kasumi called them to breakfast. The other four came up a few minutes later, all of them still holding the illusion spell. "Hey, not bad, guys. Very good, that's everyone able to do it. OK, turn it off, we have a mission. Hopefully the last one from this damn problem. I'll be very glad to see the last of it." Everyone sat down and began eating while Nabiki shared the information Jun had provided and they discussed it.

"That certainly looks like the device," Aiko commented, studying the image. "At least one corner of it. It looks like there might be a bit of glow peeking out as well but it's a rather poor photo."

"Jun processed it as much as it could without degrading it, but the original image was quite small. The description of the collection includes 'fifteen centimetre cubical artefact with glowing crystal ball in centre,' though, which sounds very familiar." Nabiki slurped some miso soup while Aiko nodded.

"We can't take the risk, we have to check," Ranma said, finishing his food. "You still want to come, Nabiki?" She nodded.

"I think so. I missed the start of all this but it would be interesting to see the end. Plus I've never been to Australia. Or North America."

"OK. You coming as Ms Aoyama or Azumi?" He grinned at her. She shimmered and became the forbidding green haired woman, who returned the smile with her own version. Tamiko shuddered.

"God, that's creepy."

"Thank you," 'Ms Aoyama' replied coldly, her voice even less emotional than previously. There was a distinct aura of cold around her. Ranma laughed.

Kasumi looked at her sister and sighed. "Please be nice to Agent Naito and Sergeant Harada, sister. You worried them a lot last time." The disguised Nabiki grinned, all the menace disappearing in an instant.

"I'll be good. Probably."

Soon they had cleaned everything away and gotten dressed in their 'work clothes', as Nabiki thought of the outfits that Kasumi had made. 'Yori' and 'Chou' looked around, then at each other. "We have quite the little team here," 'Yori' said with a grin. 'Chou' nodded looking serenely satisfied.

"Indeed. Shall we go?" They disappeared in a bright flash.
"Why do they always find the damn things in the middle of the night?" Naito mumbled, sucking down his second coffee since he'd arrived. Sergeant Harada grinned at him.

"It's bright and early in the morning, not the middle of the night." He glanced at his watch. "See? Seven thirty." Naito looked at it with bleary eyes, growling something, before diving back into his coffee. "Obviously not a morning person," Harada chuckled. He looked up as a group of familiar people appeared in the middle of the room, waving to them, then stood. Agent Naito finished his coffee and stood as well, inspecting the group approaching them through the half-empty room.

"Hello, Yori, Chou, I haven't seen you two for a few weeks." The black-haired girl grinned at the sergeant.

"Been kind of busy, training the others, that sort of thing." Harada examined Aiko and her girls.

"We noticed that the clothing had changed a while ago. There are a lot of people who miss the old uniforms. Young men, mainly." Aiko grinned, while Fumiko and Tamiko laughed. Misaki was, as usual, eating an apple, but raised an eyebrow. "Joined forces, then?"

"We've been working quite closely recently, yes, Sergeant," Chou replied calmly. "There isn't a formal arrangement but we're good friends." She moved over and shook his hand. "It's good to see you again. How are you?"

"I'm fine, thanks, Chou. My wife is expecting her first child, we found out about a week ago." She smiled happily.

"Congratulations. I hope everything works smoothly for both of you. If you have any problems we can help you with please don't hesitate to call."

"Thanks, Chou. That means a lot." He grinned at her. "So, you found the last portal bomb?"

"Ms Aoyama thinks she has information that will lead us to it," Yori said, moving aside to make way for the scary young woman with the pointed ears and the dark glasses. She looked expressionlessly at the police officer and the PSIA man, who took a step back despite themselves. They could both swear they could feel a wash of cold air from her for a second and exchanged glances. Several nearby police officers found urgent business on the other side of the room.

"Hello, Ms Aoyama," Naito said, slightly nervously. She looked at him for a moment.

"Gentlemen. I trust you are well?" They nodded in synchronism. "Excellent. My research has led to a possible sighting of the remaining portal device on a grey-market commerce site for potentially magical artefacts. It appears that it may have been included in a collection of items sold by a person or persons currently unknown in Australia approximately two months ago. Unfortunately, attempts to locate the buyer have so far proven elusive, although circumstantial evidence suggests they may be located in North America."

Naito studied her for a moment. "What is the evidence you have? Is it sufficient to trace the seller?" She nodded.

"I believe so." Glancing at a nearby laser printer expressionlessly, she didn't react when it spooled up, spitting out pages. Naito and Harada looked at each other again, then the sergeant moved to stand beside it, retrieving the paper once it finished. "The trail is somewhat cold, but an address is there. The seller seems to be in the vicinity of Sydney. It should be possible to trace them and... persuade... them to pass on the details of the purchaser." She produced a horrible little smile that made everyone wince. Harada covered his nervousness by looking at the papers, picking one which had a somewhat grainy photo and showing it to Naito.

"It certainly looks like part of one of the damn things," the agent mumbled. Feeling a cold presence beside him he looked up to find Ms Aoyama peering over his shoulder, having approached completely without sound, making a slight yip of surprise and shock. She appeared not to notice.

"Correct. The probability that it is in fact the remaining weapon is close to one hundred percent. I would suggest that there is no alternative but to investigate. The risks are too high to do otherwise."

"Um, yes, I agree," he said, gingerly easing himself slightly further away from the woman who gave him the screaming heebie-jeebies, trying not to offend her. Somehow he felt that would be bad. "I'll start the process." Pulling out his phone he made the first of a number of phone calls.

Smiling slightly, Ms Aoyama stepped back. "I find this very interesting, but as I have said, I am not a combat specialist. Regrettably I will have to remain behind. I will, however, send a colleague who may be of assistance. She requires more field experience." The green-haired woman glanced at Yori, who nodded, apparently trying not to grin. Harada watched and listened with interest and not a little nervousness.

"Azumi, I suppose?" Yori asked, her eyes bright. Ms Aoyama nodded once.

"Yes. Ms Ito is skilled but not yet sufficiently experienced in combat. It should prove instructive to her to observe you and your colleagues in operation. She can also pass on any information I require directly." Chou studied the woman in the suit.

"Does she work closely with you, Ms Aoyama?" The blonde looked simply curious. "We've trained her recently, she's very promising."

"We are close associates," the disturbing woman said, nodding again. "Thank you for your praise, I will pass it along. I have high hopes for her. It would be gratifying if you could continue her training until such time as you deem it complete." Chou nodded, smiling gently.

"I'm sure that will be no problem."

Harada noticed that the four girls of Aiko’s team were listening to this with a collection of very odd expressions. He sympathised. Any close colleague of this soul-chillingly cold woman was apt to be fairly disturbing in her own right, he felt. A question bubbled up and he had no choice but to ask. "Um, sorry to interrupt, Ms Aoyama..." The woman turned her gaze to him making his throat dry up for a moment, but simply waited patiently. "Is this the same Azumi Ito who has been causing problems for various criminals in Setagaya recently?" She nodded.

"Yes. It was felt that she should gain practical experience with threats that were of a lower grade than the average problem in the Minato area. To date she has acquitted herself well." The woman inspected him closely, icy curiosity apparent in her face. "I am somewhat surprised that you are aware of her exploits, inasmuch as they are not within the boundaries of Minato itself." He swallowed a little.

"Because of the nature of my job I tend to collect stories concerning magical girls from nearby places, except Nerima, which is just too much work. Various colleagues know of my interests and pass on anything they think is relevant." She indicated her understanding.

"I see. Yes, Nerima. A very interesting place, but troublesome." Her face gained a slight edge of thoughtfulness for a moment. "Thank you for the information." Turning back to the other young women who were still watching her wordlessly, Yori apparently with amusement, she added, "I believe I have relayed everything of use I can at this juncture. I wish you good luck with your operation."

"Thanks, Ms Aoyama," Yori replied, smiling. "Would you like Aiko to give you a lift to your next appointment?" The woman with green hair momentarily smiled slightly. Harada stepped back again, he just couldn't help it. He was in awe that Yori apparently didn't notice, but thinking about it he remembered the look she'd had all those months ago with the ex-Yakuza man they'd captured at the terrorist site, realising that the black-haired girl was at least as scary but just didn't show it very often.

"That would be appreciated, Ms Yori. Thank you." Yori glanced at Aiko who made a slight 'follow me' gesture, walking to the middle of the room. "Gentlemen," Ms Aoyama said, nodding to Naito and Harada, who nodded back, inwardly very relieved that she was leaving. She and Aiko disappeared with the normal flash of light, which Harada noticed curiously seemed to leave a slight rainbow after-image.

'Hmm. That's new, I'm sure it never did that before,' he thought, before returning his attention to the others.

Appearing in the middle of the living room, the disguised Nabiki and Aiko looked at each other for a long moment, then dissolved into wild laughter. Nabiki dropped the illusion and staggered over to the sofa, groping for support, then dropped onto it, heaving with mirth. "Oh, god. That's so much fun."

"Poor Sergeant Harada, he looked really worried. And Agent Naito! When you snuck up on him and looked over his shoulder, I thought he was going to faint." Aiko sat next to her friend laughing like mad. "It's really cruel, teasing them like that."

"I can't help it. When I'm wearing that body, and get into the 'Ms Aoyama' mindset, it just happens." Nabiki slowly slipped out of laughter into giggling. "It's hysterically funny, though. I wonder if I have some sort of multiple personality thing going on?" Aiko looked at her, then fell over laughing again.

"We all do, I think. Ranma and Kasumi more than anyone I've ever met, but you're incredibly convincing as well. Those two can change a lot more than the outer appearance, they put on any personality they want so convincingly it's worrying."

"I know, I'm in awe of their abilities. I'm nowhere near that, except possibly in the scary cold types." Aiko grinned at her.

"That's because you're always a scary cold type." Nabiki looked insulted, then giggled.

"Possibly true."

Standing, Aiko tried to get her expression back to one that wasn't grinning widely. "I'd better get back. See you in a little while." She vanished, leaving Nabiki still chuckling on the sofa.

"With all due respect, that woman gives me the willies," Naito said when Ms Aoyama was safely gone. Harada nodded vigorously.

"Me too. She's terrifying, even when she's trying to be nice. I assume that was her trying to be nice?" Yori glanced at Chou then grinned.
"Yes. She's... Well, I've seen her scare someone almost to the point of fainting just by smiling at him when she wasn't trying to be nice." The young woman chuckled. "But underneath she's a good person." They stared dubiously at her.

"If you say so," Naito mumbled, not convinced. "OK, we're waiting for authorisation from the Australian government. Hopefully it should come through fairly quickly. They were much more cooperative at the beginning of all this than the Americans, although I'm not entirely sure that they believe us. Whatever the truth, they'll probably get back quite soon. I'll call you when they do. This is good timing, by my counting we only have about a week or so before the thing goes off regardless."

"Slightly more than that, but OK. Thanks. We'll go back and get ready. With luck this will be fairly quick and easy." Yori grinned, clearly not believing her own words. Naito sighed.

"I know. I'll pack for a few days, then."

"Good idea. Would you like Aiko to pop you home?" He considered it.

"I suppose that would be a good idea. My car can stay in the parking garage until we get back." He glanced at Harada who nodded.

"The Captain won't mind."

"Thanks." He looked at the papers on the desk that Ms Aoyama had printed out, picking them up and flipping through them. "How on earth did she do that, I wonder?" he mused. Harada looked at them, then at the printer, smiling a little.

"Probably intimidated it into submission." Yori started laughing, while Chou and the others grinned. A moment later Aiko reappeared.

"How did it go?" Yori asked her. She looked relieved.

"She's gone."

"Fair enough." Laughing, Yori added, "Could you drop Agent Naito at home, then come back for the rest of us?" The petite brunette smiled.

"Of course. Are you ready, Agent?"

"Yes, just let me grab these documents, I want to look them over again." He picked up all the remaining printouts and folded them, putting them into an inside pocket. "See you later, Tetsuo." Harada sat, nodding to the PSIA man with a smile.

"Have fun."

Half-grimacing, Naito replied, "As always. I so enjoy these magical girl adventures," then moved to stand beside Aiko, disappearing seconds later. Harada laughed.

"Take care of him, Yori," he requested. The girl smiled.

"Of course we will. We like him. See you soon, Sergeant." Aiko reappeared, they clustered together, then with a flash the room was magical girl-free once more. Looking at the place they'd been Harada shook his head, amused, then went back to work.

Nabiki looked up as everyone appeared next to the sofa, picking up the remote and turning off the morning news. "All sorted?"

"Yep," 'Yori' replied, shimmering back into the female Ranma. "We're just waiting for the call, like last time. Hopefully there won't be a problem. As soon as it comes we'll grab Agent Naito and go. With luck, we can finally wrap this up once and for all." She dropped into the seat next to her sister-in-law. "Still want to come?"

"Certainly. I should be safe enough with all of you to protect me," the middle sister replied, grinning.

"You could probably take the thing on your own at a pinch," Tamiko said, looking at her with amusement. "Just remember, make sure to vaporise at least fifty percent of the body including the head with one shot. Try not to miss and blow up a building." Ranma groaned at the reminder of the events of several months ago.

"Three times!" she muttered to herself, while the others laughed.

"I seem to remember that I wasn't the one who missed on the firing range," Nabiki replied smugly, making Tamiko look embarrassed and her team-mates giggle.

"OK, OK, I'll shut up now," the auburn-haired young woman said with a grin. Resuming her normal appearance, Kasumi headed to the kitchen to make another pot of coffee while they waited, smiling to herself.

"It was slightly mean of you to scare them so much," she protested mildly on her return, handing out mugs to everyone. Nabiki laughed.

"I know, I suppose it was, but I don't seem to be able to help it. Thanks, by the way." She lifted her mug to her sister who nodded acknowledgement.

"Poor Agent Naito. The man didn't deserve such a scare. He nearly jumped out of his skin when he noticed you standing there." Kasumi sipped her coffee, her expression slightly at odds with her statement. She was clearly quite amused.

"Impressively quiet as well, Nabiki," Ranma said, studying her with interest. "You've been practising." The middle sister looked pleased.

"Thanks. It seems to be getting easier. The last robbery I intervened on, the thief didn't know I was there for nearly a minute, when I was only standing half a metre behind him. The shopkeeper he was trying to rob was nearly pissing himself with laughter which really confused the guy." She smirked, looking momentarily remarkably like Ranma, who chuckled.

"I remember the recording. It was pretty funny."

They waited for the call, going over the information that Nabiki and Jun had gleaned, trying to work out the best strategy, until finally the call came in an hour later. Ranma answered, talked briefly with Agent Naito, then disconnected. "That's it. Right, guys, once more into the breech and all that sort of thing." Shimmering into 'Azumi' as Ranma and Kasumi took on their own disguises, Nabiki stood beside the rest of the group.

With a rainbow-tinged flash the building was empty again.
Nigel looked at the clock on the dashboard, cursing the morning rush hour traffic ahead of him. He was going to be late for work yet again. His shift had started two minutes ago. Picking up his phone he hit the relevant speed dial button, waiting impatiently for the other end to answer. "Hi. It's DS Taylor. The traffic is horrendous, I'm stuck on the A36 somewhere around Camperdown. I'm going to be around twenty-five minutes late arriving."

"All right, Detective, I'll pass that along to your unit." The dispatcher went quiet for a moment, then came back on the line. "I have a message that you should divert to the ASIO office, you're closer to there than here anyway. You're to meet an ASIO Officer Michael Graham."

"What for?" the police officer asked curiously. "That's the first thing I've heard about it."

"I don't have much information Detective, I'm sorry. All I've been told is that you've been assigned to an operation that's come up suddenly and that you're to report to the ASIO. They'll tell you what it's about." Shrugging, DS Taylor nodded even though the woman couldn't see him.

"OK, fine. I'm heading over there now, if anyone needs to know I should be there in about fifteen minutes."

"Thank you, Detective, I'll let upstairs know. Good-bye."

"Bye." He disconnected and put the phone back into the centre console of the car, quickly looking around then indicating and switching lanes, while wondering what was going on. He'd met a couple of the ASIO guys in the past but only in passing, he'd never worked with them. Glancing in the rear-view mirror he turned off into a side street that was fairly empty, stepping slightly harder on the throttle that strictly necessary now that he could do more than stop-start driving.

Fourteen minutes later he pulled into the parking structure under the building he was aiming for, showing his ID to the man in the booth, who nodded and pressed the button that raised the barrier. Parking, he got out into the relatively cool air, taking his sunglasses off and putting them in his pocket while walking to the elevator to the main reception. Once upstairs he looked around, then headed to the front desk of the fairly nondescript lobby. "Hi. I'm Detective Sergeant Nigel Taylor." He showed the young man behind the desk his ID. "I was told to meet an Officer Graham here?"

The man smiled at him.

"Certainly, DS Taylor, he's expecting you. If you could just sign in here, then put this visitor pass on, please? I'll also need your phone and your side arm, you can have them back when you leave." Not completely happy but understanding the reasons Taylor extracted his phone, turning it off and handing it to the man along with his service weapon, having removed the magazine and carefully checked the safety was on. He noted with approval that the security man did the same before locking them both away in a box under the desk. Once the security formalities were dealt with, the young man pressed an intercom button and spoke quietly into the headset he was wearing. "If you could take the middle elevator to the fifth floor, Detective, Officer Graham will be waiting there for you. Tallish fellow, blond hair. You can't miss him. If he's not there please wait, don't go wandering around. People get a little skittish around here if they see someone they don't recognise, you understand?" Nigel grinned.

"Security services are like that."

"Quite." Smiling back, the man pointed to the relevant elevator. Walking over to it Nigel pressed the button and waited, then stepped inside when the doors opened with a soft bong sound. Prodding the fifth floor button he quickly found himself deposited into a neutral-grey room with several corridors opening off it, and sounds of people working in the middle distance, muted by good sound-proofing. Standing across from the elevator was a man approximately his own thirty years of age, who met the description the security man downstairs had given him. This new person, presumably the ASIO officer he was here to meet, smiled at him and strode forwards, his hand outstretched.

"DS Taylor? I'm Michael Graham. Call me Mike." Shaking the offered hand Taylor nodded acknowledgement with a return smile.

"Nigel, please, Mike. So, what's going on? You guys don't call for our guys very often." Releasing his hand the other man indicated he should follow, leading the way to an office a short distance down one of the corridors and closing the door before replying.

"It's a sort of... interesting problem," he said, looking both amused and a little worried. He motioned to a coffee maker on the side table. "Coffee? Or I can get some tea if you want, or some soft drinks or water."

"Coffee will be fine, thanks." Mike turned the machine on, waving Taylor to a chair then sitting behind his desk. He studied the police officer for a moment.

"Do you remember that incident in London just after Christmas?" the blond man finally asked. Taylor thought, then nodded.

"Yes. Some sort of terrorist bomb or something, I recall. Quite a few people dead, lots of damage."

"That's it. As you probably won't be surprised to hear, the official stories were... incomplete." Nigel snorted a laugh.

"That doesn't surprise me at all. They never tell the truth, or at least only tell as little as they can get away with. Our lot, the Poms, the Yanks, everyone hides things." Mike grinned.

"Very true. But sometimes it's for a fairly good reason." He studied the other man again, then shrugged. "This is going to sound bloody ridiculous, but it's true." Getting up he made them both a cup of coffee, then sat again, opening a folder Taylor had noticed on his desk, stamped CONFIDENTIAL in large unfriendly letters. "The attack was a terrorist one, all right, but not like a normal one. You know, explosives, bombs, that sort of thing. The device was," he paused, sighed, then finished, "magical." Taylor looked at him quizzically.

"Magical? You mean, all happy and wonderful, made by pixies?" He grinned, as did Mike.

"No. I literally mean powered by magic. It was planted by magical terrorists." It was Nigel's turn to study him, which he did with a very sceptical expression.

"You've lost me," he finally admitted. The other man sighed a little, shaking his head.

"I told them this would be difficult," he mumbled. "OK, look. Magic, real magic, is actually real magic. As in teleportation, demons, all sorts of things that you'd find in a kids fantasy book. It exists. You with me?"

"Not as such," Taylor admitted, still looking sceptical. With another sigh the ASIO man got up, retrieved a DVD from the folder, then inserted it into the player on the table across the room from his desk, turning on the TV it was plugged into in the process. Picking up the remote he returned to his desk and sat again.

"Watch this. It's compiled from some footage taken in London by an amateur videographer, as well as some security camera footage." He pressed play.

Taylor stared as the slightly shaky video played, recognising some of what he'd seen on the news months ago but from a viewpoint he hadn't seen before. The girls wandering around in outfits that he'd have been slightly surprised to see on the beach were weird, but what they were doing was simply unbelievable. When one of them physically picked up the back of a large van that must have weighed at least three or four tons and held it in the air while a soldier crawled underneath to extract a pair of casualties, he sputtered with shock.

"It's some sort of special effects!" Mike shook his head, smiling a little.

"I'm afraid not. We checked. There were a number of reliable witnesses, not to mention camera feeds and recordings from at least three sources that all showed the same thing. It's real."

"But..." The intelligence officer nodded understandingly at the exclamation.

"I know. It's a lot to take in. Apparently the young women you can see there are from Japan. There were two more who we didn't get any video of. They were in London specifically to deal with the incident, partly because they were involved in the capture of the original terrorists who started the whole thing, but mainly because no one in the UK could deal with it. Not without some fairly impressive collateral damage. In fact, from what I've been told, those girls are probably the only reason that the terrorist plan didn't succeed, which would have been extremely bad."

"How didn't it succeed? Something like sixty or so people died in that attack." Taylor kept watching the video, now showing various security camera views of the street, with the four girls and an equal number of soldiers rescuing more casualties.

"Well, considering that the original plan consisted of at least several hundred of the devices, only one of which caused all the trouble in London, and they managed to stop it and reduce it to only six, I think we can agree that they were pretty effective." The detective winced.

"Hundreds of attacks?"

"That was the plan, and likely only the beginning. Each device was intended to be placed in locations around the world, then triggered randomly. Something as bad as the London attack would happen each time, or worse."

"Holy fuck..." Taylor turned back to the other man as the DVD finished. He nodded soberly.

"Pretty much. Proper end of the world stuff, if you can imagine it. The terrorists were some sort of weird cult, an offshoot of that Aum Shinriko bunch of loons that the Japanese dealt with a few years back. Only crazier."

"So if it wasn't a bomb, what did cause all that damage?" Taylor asked curiously.

"It was a demon."

"A... demon?" Mike seemed to be enjoying his reaction.

"Yes. Two, actually. The terrorist device is some weird magical thing that somehow brings them here from wherever it is that they come from. Hell, for all I know. They're practically unkillable. The military in London apparently shot one point blank with a 40mm grenade launcher half a dozen times and only pissed it off. Automatic gunfire it barely noticed."

"Good god."

DS Taylor was feeling somewhat overwhelmed.

"It's all pretty weird, I admit. Pulling a photo out of the folder he showed it to the policeman. "This is one of the devices. The PSIA in Japan circulated information on the things and a warning months ago when they wound up the cult, with a notice to be extremely careful if one was found. Basically, don't touch it, call them, and stay out of the way. The information came from very high up in the Japanese government which is the only reason anyone believed it at all, but most people didn't believe it very much even so. The Yanks weren't taking it seriously, the Brits and the Canadians were, the Mexicans basically laughed as did the Russians, and our people took it with a pinch of salt."

"You seem to be taking it seriously now," Nigel noted. Mike nodded.

"We have to. The London thing made it clear that they weren't talking complete bollocks, but we still weren't totally sure what was going on. Then, just before New Year, two more of the things turned up in the States. Luckily, before they triggered. One in LA, one in New York."

"Was it connected with that bomb they found in Times Square?"

"Same incident. The demon calling things didn't make the news, the bomb did. It seems that the terrorists planted the bomb first, a massive one just under that big ball thing they have there, then came back at some later point and hid one of these 'portal devices', as the Japanese refer to them. The Japanese consultants found the device, and in the process uncovered the bomb, which the NYPD and the FBI disarmed. Good thing as well, it would have killed hundreds of people at least, never mind any demon attack. The LA one was planted outside that cinema where all the Hollywood stars have their footprints in the pavement. They got that one as well. Apparently there was quite a search for it, but I don't have any information on what it involved. The LAPD isn't talking for some reason."

"This is all pretty hard to believe," Taylor noted, putting his empty cup down. The ASIO officer shrugged.

"I know. I've been researching it for several months and I still find it all weird. The Japanese take it more or less as normal, though. There are a couple of places in Tokyo where things like this happen pretty regularly, if you can believe that. No idea why. The end result is that they don't blink an eye at the concept of magic. The Brits seem awfully casual about it as well, for some reason."

Taylor was beginning to have a nasty suspicion creep over him as all this was being explained. "One of those things is here, isn't it?" he asked slowly with a sinking feeling in his stomach. The other man looked slightly surprised, but pleased, nodding.
"It's possible. The devices were on timers, which had a maximum run time that expires in something like ten days. One of the Japanese intelligence assets managed to trace a sale on some weird website that included something that bears an uncomfortable resemblance to the last device. The address they got is in Richmond. They haven't been able to trace the buyer yet, and considering the time constraint, have suggested that the best method is to simply find the seller and get the information directly. Our higher-ups have agreed. They're sending a team which should be here in about fifteen minutes. I've been ordered to help them, or at least keep an eye on them just in case something weird happens, and it was also decided that we needed a police liaison. That's you." He grinned.

"Why me?" Taylor asked, curious. "And why not the Federal Police, this seems more along their sort of line."

"The AFP isn't involved in this one at the moment. I'm not entirely sure of the reasons, but the people upstairs decided that they wanted it handled by the ASIO. There are security implications that are rather beyond the remit of the AFP, is all I've been told. Personally, I suspect that someone in the Federal Police service annoyed someone in the government and this is how they're getting back at them." He grinned.

"As for why you, your name came up as someone your bosses felt had a rather more... open minded approach to life. We're going to be dealing with a number of apparently magically talented young women. They even call them Magical Girls. It's something of a phenomenon in Japan, apparently, although no one can tell me why. There are quite a few of them running around the place, amazingly enough with the tacit approval of the Japanese government. Possibly because, if what I've heard is even remotely true, they couldn't stop them in any case. They seem to have taken a pragmatic attitude to it all and just decided to make the best of it." Mike snickered. "I'm informed that two of the people turning up are exceptional even by those standards and have been keeping the others under control for a few years now. They were talked of in tones of extreme respect. You wouldn't believe how high up the government in Japan their names could get them. I was told in no uncertain terms, 'Be polite. Or else.'" Leaning forward he pushed the folder towards the detective.

"Here. Have a quick flip through that, then we can meet them." Taylor accepted the file and read the fairly sparse contents quickly and with interest. There were a number of reports which went into more details about what the ASIO man had summarised, along with more photos, including a number showing the horrifyingly large bomb the Americans had defused in New York, and some rather blurry ones of six young women, with no identifying features. Mike notice the one he was looking at, puzzled. "Magic, apparently. They value their privacy and have some way of enforcing it. If they really want to, cameras don't see them at all. I'd love to know how they do that, it would come in handy sometimes."

Nigel chuckled. "I can imagine," he muttered, looking through the rest of the file. When he finished he closed it and handed it back to the officer who locked it in his desk, then looked at his watch, while standing up.

"Right, they should be here any time. Come on, let's go meet our guests." The pair left the office and headed for the elevator. Rather to Taylor's surprise they went up not down.

"Where are we going?" he asked curiously. Mike grinned.

"The roof."

"They coming in by chopper or something?" The cop was still puzzled. The grin on his companion's expression grew slightly.
"Nope. Something less standard. I hope we get there in time, I want to see it." The door opened and they got out, the ASIO man leading the way to the nearby stairs for the last part of the trip, taking them up one flight and out onto the top of the building, on which was a helipad with the large H in a circle symbol. It was currently empty, a windsock to one side rippling gently in the light breeze blowing from the south-east. Just as Taylor was about to ask his companion, who was watching the centre of the area with a fixed intensity, what was going to happen, it happened.

Suddenly, with no sound or warning, eight people were standing in the middle of the helipad. Taylor jumped, instinctively groping for his weapon until he remembered it was locked away behind the security desk downstairs, then he looked slightly embarrassed, while Officer Graham grinned happily. "Wow," he breathed quietly. "It really is true. Amazing." Taylor glanced at him, then back at the group of seven women and one man, who had quickly looked around then headed in their direction. A middle-aged Japanese man in a suit, who was clearly some sort of government official, was leading the group with a short young woman, perhaps twenty, striding beside him. She had very long night-black hair with a brilliant blue streak in it bound back in an incredible braid that reached down to the middle of her back, and was wearing silk clothing with the same colour theme, as well as a confident look that showed good humour and keen intelligence with a hint of 'mess with me and you die'.

DS Taylor was an experienced police officer, he had years of experience reading people, and this girl gave off danger in waves, more so than anyone he'd ever met. The tall blonde in grey and green just behind her and to her left was nearly as bad, while the one with the weirdest silver hair he'd ever seen in the long leather coat in a matching position on her right just gave him the willies for some reason. The other four, who were wearing matched dark blue clothing with gold trim in a similar style to that which the first two were, seemed to be looking around simply enjoying themselves. Even so he got the very distinct impression he was looking at a squad of highly trained and experienced combat operatives rather than the collection of attractive Japanese young woman they, on the face of it, seemed to be. Something about the way they moved put him just the slightest bit on edge.

The leading pair drew up in front of them and stopped, while the others fanned out in a way that made it uncomfortably clear that they were ready for anything. One of them produced a banana and began peeling it, making another one, who looked related, sigh. The man glanced at both of them for a moment then turned to the ASIO representative. "Officer Graham?" he enquired politely, in very good English.

"That's me," Mike said, holding out his hand, which the man shook. "Call me Mike. You must be Agent Naito from the PSIA."

"Yes. It's nice to meet you." They shook hands then Mike looked at the short woman with the black hair.

"And you are clearly Yori. I've heard things..." He grinned, as did she, holding out her own hand.

"Sorry about that. Stories seem to get around. Yep, I'm Yori, this is Chou and Azumi, and over there are Aiko, Misaki, Tamiko, and Fumiko." She indicated each person in turn. The four girls mentioned last smiled happily, the auburn-haired one waving to them, while the blonde, Chou, smiled gently in a way that reminded both men of their mothers, also shaking hands with a calm greeting. The other girl, Azumi, looked at them then nodded politely with a small smile that made them both shiver for a moment.

"Um, yes, this is DS Nigel Taylor from the New South Wales Police," Mike said, recovering nicely and indicating the man standing beside him. "He's our police liaison. I've brought him up to speed on the situation, although I'm still not sure if he believes it all."

"I am having trouble, I admit, but what I just saw is pretty damn convincing," Nigel said, also shaking hands. "I'm prepared to be convinced."

"Good attitude. It's a lot to get dumped on you, I know, but unfortunately it's all real." Yori looked slightly amused. "So, you're aware of the problem we have? We need to find that bloody portal device as fast as possible, the timers aren't all that accurate, plus we've had problems with them going unstable in the past. I'll be damn glad when we've killed this last one, there have been too many close calls as a result of that cult."

"Hopefully it should be fairly easy to get the information you need, Yori," Mike said. "Richmond is about sixty kilometres away, it will take us a couple of hours to get there especially with so many people, but once..." He trailed off as she grinned at him, understanding crossing his face. "Ah. Yes. Teleportation." Shaking his head he exchanged glances with the police officer next to him. "That's going to take some getting used to."

"It's damn useful, though, and a lot of fun," Aiko said, moving closer and looking amused. "Do you need to get anything? If not, we can go right now." Mike looked at DS Taylor, who shrugged, still not completely sure he believed all of this.

"I need my phone and my gun, they're locked up downstairs."

"OK, I'll go and get them. Back in a couple of minutes." He left while the remaining people looked around. Agent Naito came and stood next to Taylor, watching as the females in the party spread out across the roof, looking at the view. Chou stayed with them, smiling calmly as she watched Azumi look around, then jump up on top of the elevator shaft motor room to get a better look in the direction of the Opera House, her coat billowing dramatically about her as she landed. Yori was talking to Tamiko, both of them standing right on the edge of the roof looking down ten stories with no obvious regard to their own safety, pointing out something of interest. The policeman looked slightly worried, which she noticed.

"Don't worry, they're in no danger," the tall blonde woman said, smiling at him. "Even if they did slip they'd land safely. They're just curious."

"I guess you'd know," he replied, looking at her as she watched her companions. Even with the air of potential danger surrounding her their was also a feeling of serenity, which offset it to a large degree. He felt he could trust her implicitly to look out for people. Yori gave the impression of barely restrained chaos, as did the other four in blue to a lesser degree, and the enigmatic Azumi he couldn't work out at all. "Forgive me if I find all of this a little... weird." She laughed, glancing at him for a moment.

"I'd be worried myself if you didn't, all things considered. Even in Japan we can take people by surprise sometimes. You haven't had any contact with any of this yet, you're actually doing very well." Chou looked out over what she could see of the city from their vantage point. "It looks interesting. I've never been to Australia before. Is this temperature normal?"

"Pretty much. It's heading towards winter but it won't get much colder now. In the summer it goes up to around forty degrees centigrade or so, higher further inland. A lot of visitors can't handle it." He grinned. "I met some Brits a few years ago in the middle of summer who looked like they were melting. Poor sods. Didn't stop them enjoying themselves, got to respect that." She laughed again.

"We met some very nice and competent people in London during that horrible time after Christmas. I liked them. Mostly."
"It must have been nasty, based on what I learned today." She nodded, turning to him.

"It was, very much so. So many poor people being hurt or killed, just enjoying the holiday. I was very angry about it." The look on her face, just for a moment, made him shiver. "We were able to save a lot of people, which was very nice, but unfortunately we couldn't save everyone. I'm just glad we were able to stop it being worse. We want to avoid anything like that happening again. Luckily we could in the US, and hopefully we can find this last device and deal with it before anyone else gets hurt."

Taylor nodded slowly. "I guess it's probably out of the country now, so I suppose from our point of view that's good, but not so much for anyone wherever it is at this point."

"Indeed. We need to trace it as quickly as possible. Hopefully, we still have a little over a week, but the things are booby-trapped, not hugely reliable, and very dangerous. Unfortunately, the only part that is reliable is the portal generation, so even a faulty one could cause a disaster. If we can find the seller and persuade them to tell us the buyer, we're one step closer. Then, finally, we can wind this horrible saga up once and for all."

"So, this cult, terrorist organisation, whatever it was, what was their master plan? What did they hope to accomplish?" Chou sighed a little.

"Basically just death and destruction for it's own sake, I'm afraid. There was some bizarre belief structure behind it, but it doesn't hold up to any form of logic anyone else can come up with, even less so than normal terrorists. Sometimes they actually have a reasonable goal in mind, even though their methods are unreasonable, but in this case it's just... not sane. At all."

Taylor grimaced. "Not good. Makes things very unpredictable."

"Quite." They were interrupted by the return of Officer Graham, who handed Nigel his phone and weapon, the magazine still out. Reloading it and checking again, he holstered the gun, turning his phone back on and dropping it into his pocket.

"All ready then?" Yori said from behind them, making both men twitch. They'd had no idea she'd approached. Aiko was standing next to her.

The ASIO man nodded. "I guess so. Ah, what happens next?"

Aiko smiled. "The first time you'll probably feel very unwell for a few seconds, it hits most people like that. It passes quickly, though, but be prepared. Other than that, there's nothing to it." She stepped closer to them, all the others quickly taking their places. The brunette glanced at Yori, then snickered and saluted jokingly. "Landing party ready, Captain."

"You've been watching too much TV again, Aiko," Yori chuckled, before looking portentously into the distance and snapping crisply, "Energise!" Nigel was just in the middle of grinning when the world jumped and he suddenly felt extremely nauseous.

"Urgh..." he mumbled, his head spinning. Someone grabbed and steadied him. "Thanks." When his head stopped going round and round like it was trying to unscrew itself he opened his eyes again, looking down at Yori who was holding him carefully.

"Feel better?" she asked with a smile. He nodded.

"No worries. That was pretty nasty, though."

"It's only like that the first time. Second time you might feel a slight twinge, after that you're fine."
Releasing him she stepped away. Mike was standing a couple of metres away with his head down, swaying a little, Chou next to him talking quietly to him. After a moment or two he recovered as well.

"That was very unpleasant," he commented, looking healthier already. "OK, I guess we're here." They all turned to look at the house they'd appeared outside, which corresponded to the address he'd been sent. It was a fairly large, quite old one, built in the style of the early nineteen-hundreds, obviously expensive at one point but now slightly going to seed. The garden surrounding it was a bit overgrown, full of some impressive specimens of plant life that were in need of care and a trim. As they walked up the path to the front door, he said, "Richmond is a fairly old town, dating back to the early nineteenth century, but it's basically a suburb of Sydney now. Fairly expensive place to live. There's about five thousand people in the area, and an Air Force base nearby. I couldn't find much information on the owner of this place in the limited time I had available, only a name and a phone number. Hopefully someone is home."

"Oh, there's definitely someone in there," Yori said confidently. "We're being watched right now. From across the street behind us as well." Both Australians looked at her, then at each other, then over their shoulders. A curtain dropped back into place in the window of the house on the other side of the street.

"OK. Slightly weird, but OK." Taylor moved towards the door of the house. "I'll do the first part, if that's all right with you people, it will probably be easier anyway. We might have trouble explaining why so many people are here in one group. It does look a bit odd." Yori glanced at Naito, who grinned.

"We are coming on a little strongly," he said. She smiled, then turned to the others.

"Chou and I will go in. Um, Azumi, too. The rest of you push off for a while, we'll let you know when we're ready." Aiko laughed.

"All right. We'll wander around and enjoy the view." She and the other three turned around and walked off down the road, looking about with interest.

"Better?" Yori asked Taylor, who chuckled.

"A bit. Come on, let's see what happens when I ring the doorbell." He walked up the steps and across the veranda to the front door and did precisely that. A few seconds later an impossibly strong hand grabbed him by the shoulder and yanked him to the side just as a thunderous report accompanied the front door sprouting numerous holes as someone on the other side discharged what sounded like a shotgun. Shaking with adrenaline, the detective picked himself up from the floor where he'd landed when Yori had grabbed him. Chou had Naito and Azumi, Graham, on the other side of the door. They all looked at the door, then at each other. The sound of a pump-action shotgun being cycled made him duck again just as most of the remaining undamaged pieces of door scattered themselves down the front path from the second shot.

"Holy fuck," he yelled, reaching for his handgun. Mere seconds had gone by since the first shot. Yori put her hand on his, stopping him drawing the weapon, and shook her head. He could barely hear her speak over the ringing in his ears.

"Let me," she said, then stepped forward. The two Australians watched wide-eyed as, mid-step, she faded from view. They gaped at each other then looked back in time to see what was left of the door swing open. A short pause was followed by a snapping noise that sounded like a large spark. Moments later the girl put her head around the door. "It's clear. One occupant and a lot of guns. Come on in." They headed for the door, the two locals somewhat more hesitantly than the Japanese.
contingent, who didn't seem worried. Inside they found Yori inspecting a 12-gauge pump-action Remington shotgun curiously, next to an obviously elderly but physically very fit woman, lying limply unconscious in a chair. Several more guns were on a table next to the chair along with quite a large amount of ammunition.

She looked up at them. "Vigorous old girl, it looks like. Not too friendly. You might like to check that box on the floor, Detective, I think it might explain her rather overenthusiastic greeting."

Looking at her for a moment, he nodded and knelt down, opening the large plastic crate by the chair. Several more like it were stacked at the back of the room, and they could see some more in the hallway leading to the back. His eyes widened.

"Good grief," he muttered. Chou and Mike both leaned over curiously. The blonde looked impressed.

"That's a lot of cannabis," she said calmly. "I would imagine it's worth quite a lot of money." Inside the crate were dozens of small bricks of cannabis resin neatly wrapped in plastic, with their weights on paper labels stuck to them. Azumi carefully opened another crate at the back of the room.

"This one is full of bags of the dried plant," she reported. "So are the rest," the silver-haired girl added, investigating. "There must be at least a hundred kilos of it here."

"Well, it's not quite what we were looking for but it's certainly leverage to get her to talk," Officer Graham said, inspecting the lethal granny in the chair. He still looked somewhat shocked. Being shot at wasn't his normal routine. Taylor could sympathise, he didn't like it either. Interestingly the three women seemed completely unaffected, and while Naito was clearly not happy about it he also wasn't too worried.

"Where did it come from?" Chou wondered out loud, picking up one of the resin bricks and looking at it. "From what I understand this would need a substantial installation for growing. Several hundred square metres, I'd think. This house isn't big enough even if every room but this one is set up for growing." She returned the drug to where it had come from.

"I'm certainly interested in finding out," Nigel muttered, looking around. "Never mind the being shot at part of the day. I don't think I like this little old lady very much." He returned his attention to the others. "This is way, way beyond personal use, she must be a major dealer or supplier. Once you've got your answers I think I've just made a very interesting arrest. Attempted murder, firearms violations, narcotics supply, and anything else I can think of to throw at the bitch."

"I'll wake her up and we can asked her a few pointed questions," Yori said, looking grim. "I'm past the point of being polite with this one, I think." She moved to stand beside the old woman, touching her head with her fingertips, which glowed violet for a second. The elderly woman jerked, then opened her eyes. Looking around alertly she stopped dead when she saw the six people watching her. Taylor held up his police ID.

"Oh, fuck," she muttered.

"Oh, fuck, indeed, granny. Shooting at a police officer is something we really don't appreciate. You're going to need a very good lawyer." She sighed heavily, then stared defiantly at them.

"You don't have a warrant."

"I don't need one. You're the one who fucking shot at us through a closed door. After that, you're mine." He paused, then indicated the people with him. "Before that, though, you need to listen very carefully to what these people have to ask you." She looked at the others, her gaze stopping on Yori who stepped forward and looked seriously at her.

"I need to know about an online auction that completed on the fifth of March." The old woman looked blank. "Of some interesting artefacts? Possibly magical ones?" The look didn't become any less blank. She shook her head.

"No idea what the hell you're talking about." Yori looked mildly annoyed.

"Mystic Mart Seller ID GMY1980 ring a bell?" The old woman looked, if possible, even blanker.

"I honestly don't have any idea what you mean," she replied. Yori studied her, then sighed.

"No, you don't, do you? Damn." She looked up at the two Australians. "She's telling the truth, unfortunately. She really doesn't know." Looking back to the woman she studied her for a moment. "Does anyone else live here with you? Or has stayed here in the last few months?"

"Only my bone-idle grandson, but he took off weeks ago. I have no idea where he went. Good riddance, to be honest." She looked annoyed. "Stole a kilo of my best weed and twenty grand on the way out as well, the little fucker."

"Could you describe him please?"

"He's a short little skinny chap, a bit taller than you. Dirty-blond hair, scruffy beard. Never took any care with his appearance. Likes to wear black."

Chou knelt next to the chair. "Did your grandson have a computer?" she asked calmly. The old woman nodded.

"Spent half his life on the damn thing, and the other half on the phone. I have no idea what he was doing. Damn machines, I never saw the point in them. He took that with him as well. My phone line hasn't worked right since he moved in a year ago, always some strange weebling noise on the line when I want to use it. At least that seems to have stopped since he went."

"What is his name?" the blonde asked.

The old lady scowled. "Geoffrey Young. His mother picked a terrible name, I always thought." Yori looked mildly amused.

"Let me guess, he was born in nineteen eighty?" She nodded.

"Right. How did you know?"

"That's his user ID. GMY1980. Not very imaginative."

"Neither is he," she said, looking around, clearly still trying to figure out a way out of all this. "Look, how about if I give you the contents of that box over there?" She indicated a cardboard box half under a pile of magazines near the hallway to the back of the house. "Would that make you go away and forget all this?" They all exchanged glances, then Azumi, who was closest, investigated.

"About a quarter of a million Australian dollars, I'd say," she said after a few seconds, holding up a neatly wrapped bundle of cash. "Lots of these," Mike and Nigel looked at each other, then at the old woman, who was staring at them hopefully.

"OK, we can add attempted bribery of a police officer to the list of charges," DS Taylor said smugly. Officer Graham glanced at him with a smile.
"She offered it to me as well. That's attempted bribery of a federal employee, which I think might be a bigger charge."

"Hmm. You're right. Well, we can charge her with both." Yori grinned, Agent Naito started laughing, while Chou looked amused. Azumi watched with a neutral expression, although Taylor got the impression she found it funny. The old woman didn't.

"Fuckers," she mumbled. Sitting up slightly she looked quickly at the table and the weapons on it. Yori shook her head even as Taylor made a motion towards his gun, just in case.

"I wouldn't," the Japanese woman said in a kindly manner.

"Who are you people?" the old woman asked. The girl grinned.

"Not your problem any more." She reached out and the woman slumped. "She's fine, but this will keep her from... making a mistake," she said, looking to the cop. He shrugged. He wasn't all that fussed, not after nearly being killed.

"Thanks for getting me out of the way of that shotgun, by the way," he said. Yori smiled.

"No problem. Why don't we look around a bit, see if we can find any leads to her grandson, then you can call your people to mop all this up."

"Sounds like a plan." He looked at the rather murderous old girl. "You sure she won't wake up on us and leg it?"

"She's turned off for the moment, she'll be out for at least an hour."

"Good. She was annoying me. I like my grandmothers the sort who greet you at the door with a glass of lemonade, not a fucking twelve gauge." Pulling a set of disposable gloves out of his pocket he put them on, then carefully unloaded the shotgun Yori had confiscated, putting the weapon and the shells safely away from the old woman. As an afterthought he handcuffed her as well. Just in case. Yori watched, smiling.

Naito had produced his own gloves, handing some to Mike, who put them on as well. The magical girls watched, then Chou nodded, pulling several sets out of nowhere and giving them to her colleagues. "Just so we don't cause the good detective any problems," she commented when Azumi gave her a questioning look. Removing her fingerless gloves, she put the disposables on, as did the other two.

"Please try not to move anything too much," Nigel said, carefully going through a stack of mail on the windowsill beside the remains of the front door. They spread out, hunting for anything that might be a clue to the whereabouts of one Geoffrey Young.

After fifteen minutes they'd come up with very little. As they gathered in the front room again to compare results, Tamiko suddenly appeared in the doorway, looking at the remains of the door with a raised eyebrow, then at the unconscious old woman in the chair and the crates of drugs. Both eyebrows went up. "Wow. Hey, guys? Come and see what we found in the back garden."

They all looked at her.

"I thought you were enjoying the view," Naito said, looking amused.

"We were. We decided to enjoy it in the back garden for a while." Grinning, the auburn-haired young woman waved them outside. "Then we found something. Come and have a look. It's really interesting."
"You're not fooling me," Yori said with a laugh as she walked past. "You just got nosy, didn't you?" Her only answer was a giggle. The blue-clad girl led them around the side of the house into a large, overgrown garden. The house was built in front of a low hill, the land going up a few metres then back, covered with trees and bushes in an almost impenetrable mass. Set apparently slightly into the hillside was a rickety old wooden storage shed, with a lean-to shelter built on one side under which was a collection of household miscellany including a clearly broken lawn mower. She pointed at the shed.

"So?" Mike looked at her after a moment. "It's a shed. What's so interesting?"

"Have a closer look." Tamiko was grinning as if she had a wonderful secret. He glanced at his colleague, then approached, looking carefully at the building. The other three girls were standing a couple of metres away watching. They were wearing expressions that for some weird reason suggested they were talking about all this, even though they clearly weren't. Puzzled, he looked back. Tamiko waved him on. Turning back to the ratty little building he looked at it carefully, then gently prodded it with one hand. It wobbled. Peering in through the dirty window all he could see was a dim view of the contents one would expect in such a building, which was basically a pile of crap. Broken lawn chairs, half a stepladder, some old gardening tools, that sort of thing. He yielded his place to DS Taylor, who repeated the exercise, after which Naito looked in curiously. All three men exchanged glances, then turned to the girls.

"And...?" Nigel said slowly. Tamiko giggled. Moving to the door she stuck her finger into a small hole on the wall some distance from the handle, apparently pushing. There was a click and she turned the rusty doorknob, then pulled the door open. It swung easily on very well maintained hinges, giving the first hint that something was odd. They walked over and peered in.

"Bloody hell," Nigel said quietly. Inside, the shed was not at all what it appeared. The outer building was merely a shell, with a half-metre gap between it and an old concrete structure sticking out of the hillside, which had a steel door embedded into it. The window of the shed was boxed in and not visible from the inside. He inspected it carefully.

"It's a photo," Yori commented from around the side, looking carefully in the window, then coming and looking in the door. "Very clever. She took a photo of the inside of the shed through the window, I guess without any glass in the way, then printed it life-size and stuck it into that frame. If you look in, with all the dirt and stuff, you think you're seeing the inside but you're not."

"Tricky old woman," Taylor muttered, almost respectfully. "That's close to brilliant."

"It gets better," Tamiko said, grinning happily. Pushing past them she pulled the steel door open, causing a wave of hot, damp, pungently scented air to roll out. "We really have to learn your lock-persuading trick, Yori, we had to snap this one." Inside the door was a flight of stairs leading down, into the hill. Reaching inside she flipped a switch, causing lights to come on. "Have a look." She noticed Taylor reaching for his weapon. "There's no one in there, we swept it thoroughly." Nodding, he put it away again, deciding to trust her, since they seemed to be at least as professional as anyone he'd worked with in the past. Stepping inside, he slowly headed down the stairs, everyone else filing in behind him.

Reaching the bottom, some ten metres down, he stopped and looked around. "Holy shit!"

"What the hell is this place?" Mike wondered out loud. They all exchanged glances, then returned to inspecting the site in front of them.

"Fairly impressive if nothing else," Yori said quietly, looking at the rows and rows of hydroponic tanks stretching away down the concrete corridor that led away from the stairs, lit with oddly coloured and incredibly intense lamps. The air was humid and thick with the smell of cannabis. "This is certainly where all that weed in the house was grown. I wonder where the power is coming from?"

"From what we could work out it looks like there's an underground cable that they cut into. There's what looks like an entire electrical substation in one of the rooms. The equipment is pretty old, at least forty or fifty years," Misaki said. She pointed with the hand that didn't have an orange in it. "Down that corridor to the right."

Agent Naito was looking carefully at some of the light fittings, as well as the wiring. "This is nineteen-forties vintage stuff, I think. Pre-war or during it." Mike suddenly snapped his fingers.

"That's it. I remember now. There's supposed to be an old WW2 bunker buried around Richmond somewhere, but no one seems to know where. This has to be it. That old biddy is growing pot in it." Tamiko led them down the corridor past the hydroponics tanks, which were gently gurgling away to themselves, past several other corridors that showed the structure was substantial in size, eventually into a large two-story split level room with a balcony around part of it. "It's an old bunker for sure," he said. "Look, that's where the big map would have gone, and there's where the various controllers sat. It looks identical to one I've seen pictures of in Bankstown, which is fairly close to here. Amazing. It's built right into the hill."

"I think the entrance we came in must be some sort of emergency exit," Aiko suggested. "We explored and there's a much bigger door that won't open in that direction. On top in the right place it's completely filled in and has a house on it, which looks fairly new."

"How did you find it?" Taylor asked curiously.

"We were poking around in the woods up on the hill, just looking around, and could tell it was hollow underneath. It was just a matter of following the tunnels until we found an entrance, but it was a bit of a surprise to discover it came out behind that old woman's house." Tamiko looked pleased with herself. Her answer raised more questions than it answered as far as the Australians were concerned but they shrugged and accepted it. Magic, presumably.

"I hope you kept an eye open for spiders and snakes," Mike said. Fumiko laughed.

"Misaki was looking for snakes, she likes them. We couldn't find anything." He looked worried.

"Australia has some of the most poisonous snakes in the world. It's not a good idea to get too close."

"Don't worry, Mike, they aren't a threat to us," Yori commented, smiling at him. "It would take something pretty exceptional to even break the skin. A snake won't do it." He looked dubious, but nodded.

"OK."

"Come and have a look at the last thing," Tamiko said.

Mike stared. "There's more?"

"Yep."

Down one corridor were a series of steel doors like the one upstairs, most of them open, the rooms full of plants or equipment. One seemed to be the main control room for the elaborate installation, with more automated control equipment than seemed plausible outside a small factory. They arrived at a door that was much more heavily built than the others, with a sign on it that was still barely readable under the dirt. "Armoury," Taylor read out loud.

"It's still locked. Feel that?" The auburn haired girl looked at Yori and Chou, who nodded slowly.

"It's faint, but that's definitely the energy trace of a portal device. It was here, quite a while ago. That's why we couldn't feel it from on top, along with all the steel, concrete, and earth." Yori looked pleased. "Confirmation we're on the right track. It's something of a relief."

Chou frowned. "There's something else in there as well. I can feel several faint magical signatures."

"I know. I wonder what they are?" The black-haired girl studied the door for a moment, then reached out a hand, putting in on the handle. She appeared to concentrate for a moment. "It's all rusty and full of crap," she mumbled, then nodded. "Got it." She pulled and the door opened with a creak, releasing a wave of musty air. Looking inside she found the light switch and turned it on. Several bulbs glowed revealing a series of metal shelves on which were arrayed various boxes and odd items. Everyone looked in.

"What is all this stuff?" Nigel asked, entering the room and looking at one of the shelves. There were a number of weird little trinkets on it, including a wooden stick about thirty centimetres long with the end apparently burned off, what looked like a slightly melted silver tiara with a cracked pink stone set into it, a number of odd appearing little statues, a hollow glass ball, and other things that wouldn't have been out of place in a very low-end antiques shop. Yori stepped up beside him and looked at the shelf. She reached out and picking up the tiara, turning it over in her hands and looking at it curiously, before putting it back.

"Magical artefacts," she replied. "Some of them, anyway. Most of this is crap at best, but there are a few things that are real. This is, although it's ruined, that wand there was real once but now it's scrap, one of those voodoo dolls has a little power around it. A couple of other things." She moved over to another shelf where Chou was running her hand over an empty spot.

"It was here, for some time. Perhaps a month or so." Yori checked then nodded. She motioned to Azumi, who had been quietly observing them the whole time.

"Come here, feel this," she suggested. The silver-haired girl slipped between Nigel and Mike, making both of them move slightly further away as she passed. Holding her hand a small distance above the shelf she concentrated, then nodded.

"I see," the girl said in a voice with little emotion in it. "Fascinating. That is the energy signature of the portal device?"

"Yes. It's very faint, the only reason it's still discernible is that it was here for quite a long time. But you should be able to identify it at some distance with a real one."

"Interesting." She stepped back, then looked around. Her orange eyes met Nigel's and he flinched slightly. This seemed to mildly amuse her.

"All of this is safe, there's nothing we need to do about it," Chou said, turning to the three men. "The only truly dangerous thing was the portal device and that's gone. We should sweep the place once more just to be sure there's nothing nasty left behind, but it looks like there probably isn't much more we can learn from here. I would think, based on this, though, that young Geoffrey is someone we need to find as fast as possible. He's clearly been collecting potentially magical artefacts for while. I suspect he may be somewhat sensitive to magic which would explain how he managed to find so many real magical devices, and possibly how he laid hands on the portal device. It clearly wasn't planted here by the mage, either he found it or bought it from someone who did."

"I'm going to call this in," the detective said. "This is a very big find, we're going to have a lot of people very interested in this and the old woman for some time. I can't remember the last time so much pot was found around here, and I've never even heard of an installation this complex."

"There will be a lot of interest in the bunker as well when all this is over," Mike said, looking around as they exited the armoury and headed back to the exit. "I know people have been searching for it for a long time. I guess there will be some archaeological interest if nothing else." He, Naito, and Taylor headed up while the girls stayed behind to double-check that there wasn't anything magical and dangerous left behind. The detective was just finishing up his phone calls when the Japanese women trooped around the side of the house as a group, appearing pleased.

"Nothing untoward to report," Chou said, approaching them. "The bunker is clean of any magical devices or booby-traps."

"Thanks," Nigel said, putting his phone away. "I need to wait for the local police to arrive to secure the area and the suspect. What's your next step?" Yori leaned against a tree and glanced at Chou, who peered into the house at the still-unconscious old lady.

"We can't learn much more here, I think," the short woman said thoughtfully. "We have a name, a birth date, a basic description. Hopefully that's enough to go on. We know roughly when he left, about two weeks after he sold the collection. We don't know why, where he went, or if he had help."

"I can get his description and details out, we can start a search for him. But Australia is a very big place. With a head start as big as the one he has he could be very difficult to find. He might not even be in the country any more." Taylor shrugged. "It's kind of a long shot."

"It's about all we have," Mike said. "I'll get the ASIO involved, we have resources that the police don't, but Nigel is right, it could be difficult. At least with you people here we don't have any travel issues, which will help a lot. But whether we can find one kid in all of Australia in less than a week...?" Shaking his head he seemed doubtful. "Difficult. People have vanished for years, or even permanently, without too much effort."

"It's possible the old woman has associates who might have some useful information," Agent Naito interjected. "She can't possibly have maintained that entire facility by herself, especially where it came to harvesting the crop. Quite a few people must be involved."

Taylor looked at him, then nodded. "True. Wiring the place, installing all that equipment, hiding it like that... That took people and money. Lots of it."

"We could ask," Yori suggested, straightening up. Just then they heard sirens, as three police cars screeched around the corner down the road and shot towards them. DS Taylor grinned.

"Locals making a big fuss." He walked down to the edge of the road to greet the policemen and women who jumped out of the cars, looking around alertly. Speaking to them for a moment he came back with two of them following, while the other four began setting up police tape around the front of the property. "This is Sergeant Wiley and Constable May." He made the introductions. Both officers seemed slightly puzzled by the presence of an ASIO officer, never mind the Japanese people, but said nothing about it. Going back to the house they looked inside, the constable whistling loudly when he saw the cannabis and the weapons.
"Whoa. I always thought that the old lady was a little weird, but I had no idea this was why. Mind you, it would explain a few things in this neighbourhood over the years."

"Wait until you see the bunker," Taylor said. "That's pretty impressive whichever way you look at it." Yori walked over and prodded the old woman, who was faintly snoring, which made her twitch and wake up. Looking around she spotted the new faces and scowled. "Right. I'm officially placing you under arrest for narcotics supply, multiple firearms violations, attempted murder, and attempted bribery of a public official," Taylor told her with satisfaction. He read her her rights while the local Sergeant wrote down the details of the arrest. The old woman refused to give her name, which didn't help as the local police were familiar with it. It turned out to be Emily Williams. When they were done she was, fairly gently with due respect for her age, heaved to her feet and escorted to one of the police cars, soon finding herself safely locked away in the back.

"The drugs squad and the crime scene people will be here in about an hour. They're going to have fun for some time with all this lot." DS Taylor looked satisfied.

"We should still ask Mrs Williams about her associates. I'd prefer to do that sooner rather than later. Time really is of the essence here." Agent Naito glanced at Yori and Chou, who both nodded.

"OK. I'll get her transferred to headquarters. That will take about an hour or so, then maybe another hour to get her processed. Now she's officially booked in we have to stick more or less to normal procedure, but when she's back at base we can arrange to have you with the interrogation team."

Mike looked at him. "If there is any problem with your people let me know. I'm under orders to cooperate, the higher-ups are taking all this pretty seriously, so if you need any heavy muscle, the ASIO can lean on your superiors." Nigel grinned.

"That could be fun. Probably not needed, but I'll bear it in mind. I'll go back with them, and meet you there?" Mike nodded, exchanging phone numbers with the detective. "OK, I'll call when we're back. You guys could go and get lunch or something, it's... hmm, it's only half past eleven. Hmph. Felt like later, with all the excitement." Yori smiled.

"Don't worry, we like eating. We'll find something." Shaking his hand, she led the rest of the Japanese people outside, Mike following after a quick good-bye. "Back to the ASIO building?" she asked him.

"May as well. Less people to see anything weird." He grinned, as did she.

"Fair enough. OK, Aiko, when you're ready." The petite brunette nodded with a smile, then they vanished. Nigel, who had been watching from the house, blinked at the brilliance of the flash.

"What the hell was that?" Sergeant Wiley said, looking up from where she was cataloguing the guns on the table. He shrugged, smiling a little.

"Difficult to explain..."

Officer Michael Graham was having a much more interesting day than he'd expected. This whole magic business was interesting anyway, but to actually meet the people involved in a number of events that were so far outside normal experience was something he was finding a lot of fun. He could certainly have done without the being shot at part, true enough, but otherwise so far everything made him pleased to have the job he had. He'd been researching the issue of the 'portal devices' since the Japanese government circulated the warning after the operation in Tokyo, at first with a significant scepticism, but after a fairly short time, with growing belief.
Interviews with a few people who had been to the Minato area of Japan, all of who had at least one weird story to tell, had made it clear something unusual, at least to people outside that country, was going on. He'd traced a few expatriate Japanese citizens from there, as well as a couple from a place called Nerima, the latter of whom seemed very relieved to be living in Australia. One had point-blank refused to talk about her life in Nerima, while the other had only been able to discuss it after he'd bought him several drinks. Then he had trouble getting the man to shut up about it. What they considered 'martial arts' in that place sounded insane, even if one discounted the more spectacular stories as hyperbole.

The former residents of Minato were, on the whole, happier to talk about their experiences, although most of them were also quite pleased to no longer be there. They all had stories of these Magical Girls getting it on with demons of one sort or another, and in many cases causing more damage. That agreed with the information he acquired through other channels. The arrival of the pair of Yori and Chou some three or so years ago seemed to have marked a turning point in the collateral damage, though, since they seemed to be surprisingly effectively reining in the more excessive enthusiasms of the various groups. No one seemed too clear on exactly how other than it involved a considerable amount of shouting.

He'd laid hands on some recorded TV footage of encounters between Yori and one or other of the groups, as a result having an entertaining afternoon watching them and howling with laughter. She ripped into them like the world's most ferocious drill sergeant, making that old cliché so beloved of movies seem somewhat understated. It was hysterically funny, even if he didn't catch all the Japanese nuances. Mike spoke the language reasonably well, which was one of the reasons he had been given the assignment in the first place, but he was also sure he was missing a lot of subtlety. After a considerable amount of effort he finally also managed to get a copy of a video shot in a park somewhere in Minato sometime in late autumn the year before, a video he'd heard rumours of for some time but which was remarkably hard to track down. Watching that one had made him simply sit quietly for nearly forty minutes, just appreciating the sheer artistry and skill of the two women involved. Sitting opposite them and watching one of them shovel sushi into her face like some sort of eating machine didn't detract from the beauty of what he'd seen, although it did make him smile at the contrast.

Chou noticed him watching Yori and smiled slightly. "She likes sushi," the blonde said calmly, eating her own food very neatly and politely. He noticed that even so she was packing away a considerable amount of it. The other girls were also eating enough to stun a fairly large man.

"I can see," he chuckled, taking another bite of a tuna roll. "So do I, but I suspect her capacity is larger than mine."

"Her capacity is larger than almost anyone's," Azumi noted dryly from the end of the table. He glanced at her, noticing that she was almost smiling. The air of cold competence coming from her wasn't diminished at all, but he also somehow felt she meant no harm. That said, the young woman was... disconcerting. Her orange eyes met his and she nodded slightly, making him smile back, feeling she had a fairly good idea what he was thinking.

Agent Naito came back into the restaurant, having taken a large roll of Yen to the bank across the street to change into local currency. "Here you go, Yori." He handed her an envelope and sat down.

"Thanks," she said, pulling out some Australian dollars and distributing them to the others, before handing the remainder to Chou. Once more the PSIA agent wondered what the source of their income was, they certainly didn't seem to lack funds.

"We seem to have at least proven that the device was here, so we're heading in the right direction," he commented, finishing his coffee and waving to the waitress for a refill, thanking her politely when she complied. "That's something. But I'm not happy about our chances of finding the thing in time. Tracking this young man could be problematic."

"There is very little choice, we have to try as the consequences are unpleasant otherwise," Chou replied. "Hopefully Mrs Williams can give us the names of her associates so we can locate them and see if they can give us more information on her grandson. At the moment we simply have too little information to go on. Then, if we can find him, hopefully we can get the name of the buyer out of him. It's one small step at a time. Rather frustrating." Sipping some water, she put the glass down and sighed. "I would much prefer just to be able to go directly to the end of the hunt, but that isn't feasible."

"We'll find it," Yori reassured her, smiling at the blonde woman, who smiled back. Mike watched them with interest. There was little in his research that gave much in the way of information on the relationship between these two, other than it was long lasting and close. He had a suspicion it was deeper than that. Yori glanced at him, then smirked a little, clearly understanding his gaze. "So, I guess you've researched us and the various incidents surrounding these devices? Find anything interesting?" He laughed.

"It was assigned to me when the warning first went out, for a number of reasons, and to be honest it's been very interesting. My bosses first wanted me to find out whether any of it was true. They were very sceptical, you understand, at first. If your warning hadn't come from so high up in the Japanese system I think it would have been ignored." Yori glanced at Agent Naito, who shrugged a little. "But considering the source, it was felt that we had to take it seriously. I was assigned to look into the whole thing and produce a report on it. It's been difficult, you two particularly are very difficult to find information on."

"Good. That's the idea."

Mike chuckled. "I thought as much. I'm very impressed by your security, it's much better than pretty much anyone else's I've dealt with." She seemed pleased. "To be honest, I wasn't concerned with your private life, merely whether the entire concept was real. There was quite a lot of evidence fairly easily obtainable that showed it was. Recorded news segments, eye-witness testimony, reports from visitors to Tokyo, that sort of thing. Even one DVD I finally tracked down that was the most incredible show I've ever seen." Yori looked at Chou, both of them seeming slightly embarrassed.

"Ah. That one. Yes, it seems to impress people," she said with a small smile.

"If you ever get tired of the action side of life you have a great future as artists," he said seriously. "That was some of the most impressive... I don't really know what to call it, martial arts seems too limited." Mike shrugged a little, trying to decide on a description. "Dancing, perhaps? Certainly the last part. Performance I suppose is the best. You even provide your own special effects. It was beautiful."

"Thank you," Chou replied, smiling at him in a way that made him feel happy.

"You're welcome. I watch it occasionally when I need a boost. The music was amazingly well done as well."

"That band is very good," she said. "I would like to do something like that again at some point. It was enormous fun."

"It certainly looked like you were enjoying yourselves." Eating a little more sushi, he pushed his plate away, full. "After the London incident, people started taking the whole thing much more seriously. I found that I suddenly got a lot more attention when I needed things, as well as some assistants. We've been studying the Magical Girl phenomenon ever since." He looked at them curiously. "I can accept magic, now at any rate, since there's so much evidence for it. Once we started looking into it we found things all over the world that could be explained quite well like that. The question I'm still puzzled by is why magical girls? I mean, surely magic is used by both men and women, where it's used?"

"Certainly it is. There aren't a lot of mages around, it has to be said, but they're not vanishingly rare either. Some of them are very good, some not so much, but they're fairly evenly mixed between male and female. And they're all over the world although we do have a lot more of them in Japan, specifically in the Minato ward of Tokyo, than most places. I have to confess we're in the dark at the moment as to the reason the Magical Girls, specifically, exist, though," Chou replied. "And why it's so specifically a Japanese thing. There have been one or two in other places over the years, but oddly, normally even they are of Japanese descent. It's something of a mystery."

"Why Minato?" he asked. "Tokyo is a very large city, it seems odd that this would be limited to such a small part of it." She shrugged.

"Again, we're not sure. There is an undeniable fact that portals seem to be more easily opened there and as a result we get a lot of otherworldly travel to and through the place. As a result the magical world thrives there although it's not obvious in most cases unless you look for it. We're the leaders in interactions with visitors from other places, by a very large margin. You'd be quite surprised how many so-called demons trade with people in Minato, or even live there. Even the locals would be somewhat shocked." She grinned at the look on his face. "Most of them are very nice people. Many are friends of ours."

Naito was listening with amused interest. He chuckled a little, causing Mike to look at him. "I had the same reaction the first time I found out about this. The PSIA has been watching the whole magical girl thing for a long time, with considerable interest, but we didn't know very much about it. A lot less than we thought we did, actually. Talking to Yori and Chou has improved our knowledge more in the last eight months or so than the previous thirty years. I was one of the ones who was involved with filling some of the data requests your ASIO had, I know the information we passed on. Most of it is quite recent, but it leaves a lot unanswered, quite a lot of which I suspect we'll never know. At least officially." He looked around at the seven females who were watching and listening. "They're friendly, but they don't talk much about themselves or their friends. Only about the general situation." Seven women laughed.

"We like you, Agent Naito, and respect both you and the PSIA, but we have to be very careful," Yori said with a chuckle. "Privacy comes naturally to us. Plus there are some things that aren't the business of anyone who isn't directly involved."

"That's understood, by some amazingly high up people, trust me. There is a lot of respect both ways." Naito smiled at her, then finished off his last piece of tuna. Mike listened with interest. The mutual respect between the government representative and these people who could only be described, something even they would likely agree with, as wild cards, was very unusual but fascinating. He wondered if it would even be possible any place other than Japan, at least to this degree.

"The local Minato police are remarkably comfortable with the whole thing," the Japanese agent said, looking at the Australian one. "They have a very good relationship with several of the groups and a number of the visitors. I've been surprised in the past how completely unsurprised they are about very weird things happening. Things that even the PSIA finds a little odd they just take in Yori grinned. "We like to help where we can. Although, that said, some of the girls are extremely disrespectful of the police. That's an attitude Chou and I have tried hard to correct. Generally speaking the police are worthy of respect, we feel, they do a difficult job with none of the advantages we enjoy. Being rude to them is just... rude."

"I've seen recordings of some of your corrective actions," Mike replied, a look of amusement on his face. "They seem unusually effective. Also rather loud and intimidating." Yori grinned again, while Chou sighed a little. The other girls laughed.

"She is fond of shouting," Aiko said, snickering. "It's very funny to watch. I've seen some of the girls she's yelled at literally stand to attention and do everything except shout 'Ma'am, Yes, Ma'am!' when she really gets going. The ones that don't start crying, that is." Yori had an expression half-way between exasperation and embarrassment.

"I'm not that bad." All the other girls except Chou exchanged glances, then nodded.

"Yes, you are," they chorused, making her laugh. Chou smiled, putting a hand on her friend's shoulder.

"You can be rather intimidating, dear." Yori looked at her with a small smile.

"Look who's talking. The last person you got angry at had a heart attack while you were talking to him." The blonde looked at the table, going slightly pink.

"He was a very unpleasant man." Mike glanced at Naito, who nodded, looking slightly worried. Clearly the memory was one he recalled vividly. The ASIO man made a mental note to ask, he was curious now. Just then his phone rang. Looking at it, he nodded.

"It's DS Taylor." He answered, having a short conversation, then hung up. "They'll be ready for us in about fifteen minutes. Mrs Williams isn't all that cooperative, apparently." Yori glanced at Chou, who nodded slightly.

"She'll talk to us, I think." There was a look on her face that made Mike's blood run cold for a moment.

Emily Williams, despite the tough exterior she was putting on, was worried. At rather more than seventy years of age she was too old to find the prospect of jail anything other than very worrying at best, and she knew full well that her little operation was going to attract a very long sentence. It seemed likely that she was going to spend the rest of her life behind bars. Even so, though, she was going to make the pigs work for anything they wanted from her. She didn't like the police at all. To be honest she didn't like anyone, but the police were at the top of the list.

Once more she cursed her damn grandson under her breath. The little shit had somehow brought the pigs right to her front door, something she’d avoided for twenty-five years, longer than he’d been alive. 'I should have strangled the little fucker the moment he popped out of Susan,' she thought bitterly. 'I knew he was trouble, just like that lazy bastard of a father of his. Good thing someone else got him before I had to, saved me the trouble of disposing of another body.' She looked up as the door to the interrogation room opened, admitting the cop who had arrested her along with the government man who'd been with him. They closed the door after the two officers who had been watching her carefully, one male and one female, stepped outside.

"Hello, Emily. May I call you Emily?" DS Taylor said politely, sitting down in the other side of the table and turning on the recorder. She glared at him, not saying anything. After a moment he shrugged. "Emily it is, then. You're in a lot of trouble. Production of narcotics, assault with a deadly weapon, attempted bribery, quite a large number of other offences. Even theft of electricity." Her glare deepened and he smiled a little. "It's funny, really, if you'd simply answered the door all we wanted to ask was about the online auction that it seems your grandson was involved in. Everything else is a direct result of your unfortunate decision to fire that shotgun through the door without even checking who was on the other side." His expression hardened. "Something that I'm personally not very happy about. So, here we are."

"We still want to know the location of your grandson, Emily," the other man said calmly. "Will you cooperate?" She transferred her glare to him.

"Fuck off."

"Ah. Not feeling helpful, then?" She gave him a thin-lipped smile full of anger. "Oh, well. Regardless, you're going to spend a long time in jail, but cooperation at this point might mean the difference between the rest of your life or just most of the rest of your life." Emily stared wordlessly at him. "No? Oh, well. We're going to keep asking anyway."

"We'd like to know about your associates, please, Emily," the cop said, pushing a notebook and pen towards her. She glanced at it, then crossed her arms defiantly. "We know for a fact that there were at least eight other people involved, from the fingerprints we've already found and our initial interviews with your neighbours. We need to talk to them." Shaking her head, she spoke for the first time.

"You're not going to get anything out of me. You're wasting your time." They returned her look, then glanced at each other.

"We don't have time for this," the government man said quietly to his colleague. "Perhaps we should allow Yori to talk to her as she suggested."

"Probably a good idea." Taylor studied Emily for a moment. "Hopefully she'll survive, we still need to question her more about the cannabis operation." They stood, while she wondered what they were talking about. 'Yori' must be that short Japanese girl who was at the house along with the others, the one who had been asking all the questions. She was puzzled as to who they were and what their relation to the pigs was. The last comment of the cop was also somewhat worrying.

The sound of the door closing interrupted her musings just as she was about to ask for more information. Now it was too late. Shortly after, the door opened again, admitting the girl with the deep black hair in a long braid, along with another one wearing a long leather coat, who had hair that was almost a metallic silver, and orange eyes. They were each holding a mug of coffee, the silver-haired one having two. Pulling out the chairs they sat and stared at her. She stared back. Eventually the black-haired one pushed a mug towards her. "Coffee?"

"You're not cops," she said, before glancing at the mug. After a moment she picked it up, drinking a third of it thirstily.

"No. We have no official standing with the Australians at all, we've only visiting. I'm Yori, this is Azumi." She indicated her companion, who was silently sipping her own coffee, watching Emily carefully. "But we're working with them on a very important case. Think of us as consultants."

Emily shrugged, drinking a little more. The coffee was surprisingly good.

"OK. Not that it matters."
"We need to find your grandson. He has information that's vital in stopping a terrorist attack that could kill possibly hundreds of people, but he doesn't know it. Will you help us find him?"

"No. I don't care. About him, or you, or any of these other people." Finishing her coffee she put the mug down hard. Yori raised an eyebrow.

"That's a rather callous outlook on life. Are you sure? It might make the courts look more favourably on you from what I've been told. You're facing some very serious charges. The police really don't like being shot at. Neither do I."

"Do I look like I give a shit?" she snapped. "There's nothing you can say that will change my mind."

Azumi smiled coldly. "I wouldn't put money on it," she commented in an icy voice, the mere tone of it making a chill run down Emily's back. There was little emotion in that voice, but what there was seemed fairly predatory. Like a shark talking to it's next meal. She looked uncertainly at the young woman, then returned her attention to Yori.

"I'd be quite pleased if you would reconsider your position, Emily. You'd be helping a lot of people."

"This is some sort of good cop bad cop thing isn't it?" the old woman said patronisingly. "It won't work."

Yori smiled at her.

She shivered, feeling her heart nearly stop for a moment. That smile was much worse than Azumi's. Forget sharks and meals, this was demons from hell looking at their next soul.

"Oh, no," the girl said in a soft voice full of menace, "it's much worse than that. This is bad cop, really bad cop. Guess which one I am?"

Shaking, Emily suddenly picked up her mug and flung it directly at the girl. Who, without taking her eyes off her own, reached out and caught it in a flash of motion too quick to see. Holding it she glanced at it briefly, then handed it to Azumi, who put it on the table in front of her. "That was careless. You seem to have slipped."

"Who the fuck are you people?" she asked apprehensively.

"Consultants, as I said." Emily stared at her.

"To who? Satan?" This made them both look amused.

"No. At the moment, to the Australian government, and the Japanese one. So, will you please tell us about your associates?" About to defiantly tell the girl to fuck off again, the words died in her mouth as she noticed what Azumi was doing. Leaning on one elbow, appearing mildly bored, she was running one finger around and around the rim of the mug that Emily had thrown, while staring directly at her. The unusual, and under the circumstances, very worrying thing about this otherwise normal action, was that there was a small ball of green energy covering the end of that finger, glowing dimly in the brightly lit interrogation room. As it passed over the rim of the cup a small amount of it simply vanished with a faint hissing noise, to the effect that the mug was gradually disappearing. Around and around the finger went, less and less mug being left each time. Emily stared in horror.

"What the fuck are you?" she mumbled. Yori glanced at her companion, then nudged her. Azumi appeared disappointed in a peculiarly emotionless way, stopping what she was doing and picking up the remaining half of the mug.

"Oops," she said calmly, before putting it back down. "How silly of me."

"Emily." The voice made her return her attention to Yori. "We really need to know." The look in her eyes nearly made the old woman have an accident. "Now." The eyes, purple she absently noticed, were almost glowing. Azumi was watching her like a snake watching a mouse, a physically palpable air of cold rolling off her. Emily noticed with horror that the mug of coffee next to her, which was still half full, seemed to have frozen solid somehow. Trembling with fear, she nodded. The pigs she could handle. This... This was so far past anything she was prepared for she had no idea what it was.

"All right. I'll tell you." With trembling hands she picked up the pen that was still lying across the notebook that DS Taylor had left on the table, then began writing. Yori nodded with satisfaction.

"Thank you."

"She seems to be enjoying herself," Agent Naito said with a laugh. Taylor glanced at him, then back through the one-way observation window in the room adjacent to the interrogation room. "Which one? Not that old woman, certainly."

"Yori. Azumi is very hard to read. I only met her this morning."

"She's kind of scary, to be honest," Nigel said, watching the young woman smile at their suspect slightly in a way then even through the glass made him shiver.

"Trust me, Yori is a lot scarier. Absolutely terrifying, to be honest, when she wants to be." The three of them watched as the black haired girl smirked at the old woman, who looked like she was going to faint. "You see?"

They stared as Azumi began idly evaporating one of the mugs, apparently bored. Naito grinned. "Nice move. Very well judged." Shortly after that the suspect cracked, reaching for the pen and beginning writing. When she'd finished Yori nodded in satisfaction.

"Thank you. I'm sure your cooperation will be taken into account." Both girls stood and left the room, the two police officers that had been standing outside re-entering and watching the now limp with relief old lady, who almost looked pleased to see them. A few seconds later both women rejoined the three men in the observation room. Yori handed Taylor the notebook.

"Nine names and addresses. These are the people who worked for her. Apparently they're members of some motorcycle gang that's based in the general area a lot of the time. I would imagine that means they're not likely to be hugely cooperative." He looked through the scrawled writing, nodding.

"That type can be difficult. I'll get people out to all these addresses and round them up," Looking at her he smiled. "That was impressive. Deeply worrying, but impressive." She looked pleased.

"I'm surprised there was no lawyer in with her."

"She refused when we offered. Hates lawyers nearly as much as the police for some reason. It's not my problem if she wants to represent herself, she'll do more damage than good in all probability."
"OK." Yori tapped one name on the list. "Apparently this one is the leader of the gang. It might be worth grabbing him first. The next name is his second in charge, he's probably a good one to go for as well. According to Emily in there these people are fairly violent and not likely to be pleased to see the police. She also said they're well armed." The girl looked seriously at him. "We could deal with this for you."

"I talked to my superiors, they would prefer us to deal with it ourselves. No offence."

"None taken, of course, but please remember we need to do this as quickly as possible. Let us know if we can help."

"I will do." He nodded to her and Azumi, then left the room. She sighed a little watching him go.

"I have a bad feeling about this," she muttered.

"We have to let them deal with it if they want, Yori," Naito said to her, while Azumi and Mike listened. "We're only guests here, we don't have any official standing."

"I know." The young woman sighed again. "I'm just worried about the time, and also I don't want to see anyone get hurt."

"We do appreciate that," Mike said, stepping forward. "I'll talk to my own bosses and see if we can push this along, but at the moment it's a police operation."

"It seems a little odd to allow us here then not allow us to help," Azumi commented emotionlessly. He looked at her before nodding slightly.

"True. We seem to be having mixed messages, I'm afraid. I'll see what I can do to clear it up."

"Let's get back to the others," Yori suggested. "If Tamiko or Misaki gets bored odd things might start happening." Agent Naito looked alarmed, opening the door and hurrying out. She snickered. "He's so easy sometimes..."

Laughing, Mike followed her and Azumi as they went after the PSIA man.

"Well, this is boring," Tamiko said, glancing at Naito with a slight smile. "We could go and have fun like we did in LA..." He went pale.

"Um, no, I think it would be a good idea to wait for Detective Taylor to let us know what's happening," the agent said, looking at Chou as the most likely to come to his aid. His eyes were pleading. She smiled gently at him, nodding agreement.

"The Agent is correct, Tamiko," she said in her soft voice, making him wilt a little in relief. He was used to dealing with difficult people, but the magical girls were a different kettle of fish entirely. He liked them very much but they could be quite a handful. LA still gave him the cold sweats. Thanking her with his expression he went back to making notes on the trip so far for his report.

Yori was grinning at him, sensing what he was thinking. She sighed theatrically. "I agree with Tamiko, this is a little boring. I hope they don't take too long." All of them turned to look when Officer Graham came into the conference room, Tamiko and Misaki with hope in their eyes. He stopped, looking around at them, then sat next to his Japanese counterpart.

"My superiors have decided to let the police handle this for the moment, although they asked me to pass along the message that they were aware of the time constraint and if nothing useful happens in the next few hours, they'd rethink it." He shrugged. "Sorry, that's the best I can do."

"That's all right, Mike," Chou said graciously. "We don't mind waiting." She gave Yori a hard look when the other woman raised a hand with an impish smile. "Do we?" Yori lowered her hand looking abashed.

"No, love." She grinned as Chou nodded, satisfied. "So, what do you do for fun around here?" she asked curiously. "Back home we normally go and find some minor criminals or a hostile demon or two and terrify them. It worked amazingly well in LA as well. There are an awful lot of gang members there, you hardly even have to try to find them, they find you..." Naito sighed, remembering.

"I didn't enjoy being bait." All the girls, even Chou, laughed. Mike was looking between them, wondering what they were talking about.

"You got two all by yourself, Agent," Misaki said with a grin. "That's not a bad score under the circumstances." He smiled a little.

Shaking his head, Officer Graham decided he didn't want to know. "Well, while crime here isn't as bad as in LA, there are a fair few troublemakers. Although I don't think we should be going looking for them at the moment."

"Aww..." Tamiko looked at him with a giggle. He smiled back.

"We could go and look at the various sights while we wait for the police operations to finish. They're out looking for all the people on the list and DS Taylor thinks we should have the first of them within a few hours. Some of the addresses are a considerable distance away, though, which may take time."

"Have we learned any more about Geoffrey Young, Mike?" Chou asked. He pulled a folder from under his arm, opening it and looking through it.

"A little. He has a passport, but it hasn't been used in the last six months. I've put a block on it as well as a notification alert. He won't be able to leave the country, not that it helps a lot, but it's something. We know he hasn't left, at least using that identity. In all probability he's still around. He has a fairly clean record, some minor run-ins with the police, a caution for cannabis possession, two parking tickets, that sort of thing. Nothing major. Other than that, not much. He doesn't seem to have a bank account or any credit cards, his driving license is up to date, nothing that stands out. There's an alert out on his license as well. No mobile phone number on record, so that doesn't help much." He pulled a glossy colour photo of a young man matching the description Emily Williams had given them. "We do at least have this." Pushing the folder across the table to the blonde he watched as she and Yori quickly looked through it.

"Nothing very useful there at all except for that photo. At least we know what he looks like." Yori sighed, mildly disappointed. "I really want to be out doing something rather than sitting around." Several of the young women nodded. Azumi had taken possession of the folder and was reading everything in it very carefully, Naito noted. Eventually she closed it and returned it to the ASIO man.

"Very little to go on. Hopefully he will either use the internet, which will allow us to trace him, or turn up as a result of the police searches." Naito looked at her curiously.

"Do you think he could be traced that easily if he does use the net?" She nodded, smiling slightly.
"Ms Aoyama is very good at that sort of thing. He has not been seen online since the sale completed. I passed his details on when we got them, she's searching, but so far has found nothing. I'll be notified if something does turn up."

"All right. That sounds good." He studied her for a little longer.

"Do you have a question, Agent?" she asked, coolly polite. Slowly nodding, he didn't reply for a moment.

Eventually he asked, "How well do you know Ms Aoyama?" It was her turn to study him.

"Very well indeed. We've known each other for a very long time." She seemed amused.

"Can she be trusted? I have to admit I find her... off-putting. Terrifying, to be honest. Even more so than Yori." The black-haired girl looked mildly insulted.

"Really? I'll have to work harder." Chou nudged her in the ribs and she subsided, grinning a little.

"I trust Ms Aoyama as much as I trust myself," Azumi said after a moment. For some reason Tamiko giggled. He nodded slowly.

"All right. I'll take your word for it."

"Who is Ms Aoyama?" Mike asked curiously. He didn't recognise the name.

"A colleague of ours," Yori answered. "She is exceptionally good at intelligence operations. She was responsible for the lead that led us to find the LA portal device, and as a result the New York one, and she also tracked this one down. We would have been far too late in the US without her. A very large number of people probably owe their lives to her." Azumi glanced at her but said nothing.

"She's not the sort of person you forget in a hurry," Agent Naito said, with a slight shudder. "Trust me. Even if you want to." The seven magical girls all seemed to think this was quite funny.

"She's not that bad, Agent, surely? She grows on you after a while." Chou smiled at him.

"She's the creepiest person I've ever met," he replied. "She'd give a ghost nightmares."

"I met a ghost once," Azumi said, apropos of nothing. Everyone looked at her. "Nice girl." After a moment, when it became apparent nothing else was going to be said on the matter, they all decided not to comment.

"Right." Mike looked at the silver haired girl for a few seconds longer. She smiled slightly at him. Feeling that this mysterious Ms Aoyama might have competition in the creepy arena, he looked at Yori instead. "While we wait why don't we go and look around? From what you said many of you have never been to Australia before." Aiko and Fumiko looked at each other and laughed.

"We should go back to the Sushi place in Brisbane some time. It was amazing." Aiko smiled, while Mike stared, then shrugged.

"OK. So, what would you like to see?"

"Uluru might be interesting. And the Opera House. Perhaps a nice beach?" Chou looked thoughtful. "Some kangaroos, I've never seen one in real life."

Misaki looked interested. "Oh, some crocodiles! I like crocodiles."
Tamiko grinned at him. "That place all the wine comes from, um, the Barossa valley, that could be fun." He laughed.

"You realise all those places are thousands of kilometres apart?" They exchanged glances, then looked at him steadily. After a moment he got it. "Oh. Right. Teleportation again. I keep forgetting." Aiko seemed very amused.

"It's something you get very used to very fast, trust me, Mike."

Agent Naito chuckled, turning to the ASIO officer. "It's completely ridiculous. When we were in LA we went home to Tokyo for a change of clothes for a barbecue. Fifteen thousand kilometre round trip to change my suit." He chuckled. "To be honest, there's no real reason to stay in Australia while we wait, we could just go home, which is something that does indeed take a lot of getting used to."

"There's no fun in that, Agent," Chou said, smiling gently. "If one is on a mission, so to speak, one should stay focussed and in the same country as the mission." He grinned.

"I take your point."

"Well, then, shall we go walkabout, as we say around these parts?" Mike stood, as did the others. Tamiko looked at him with a smile on her lips.

"Aside from the accent, you don't speak the same way as we hear on TV," she said. "I was looking forward to talking Australian. I've been practising! G'day, Mate, where are the drongos now?" He burst out laughing.

"We don't all talk like Crocodile Dundee, you know." She looked disappointed. Patting her on the shoulder, Aiko urged her to move to the place all the others were standing, giggling.

"So, where to first?" Chou looked at the brunette.

"Uluru, I think. I've always wanted to see it."

Aiko nodded, the world flickered, and it was suddenly very bright and very hot. "Gah. That's a shock to the system," Naito said, immediately sweating heavily. He noticed that none of the girls seemed particularly bothered by the heat, even Azumi who in her black leather coat looked like she should be comatose from heat exhaustion. If anything she looked less bothered than anyone but Yori. Noticing his expression, she looked mildly amused and moved to stand next to him. A sudden drop in temperature made him look at her in mixed surprise and thanks. "I have no idea how you're doing that but thank you," he said, meaning it.

"You're welcome, Agent," she replied. They looked around. A few kilometres away was the impressive sight of what had once been known mainly as Ayer's Rock, a huge red sandstone outcrop sticking out of the otherwise largely featureless desert in a somewhat unlikely manner. "That is certainly impressive," she added, looking at it with interest.

"Indeed," Chou said. She glanced at Yori. "Feel that?" The black-haired girl nodded slowly.

"Interesting. There's a source of magic somewhere under it. Very old, not very powerful now, but it must have been huge a long time ago. I wonder if that's why the local people have so many legends surrounding it?"

"It seems likely."
"Shall we go closer?" Aiko asked. They all gathered around her and with a flicker they were standing mere metres away from the point the rock rose from the plain. Once more they dispersed. A number of people, apparently tourists, were scattered around the place, while several coaches and quite a few cars were parked some distance away. Naito stuck closely to Azumi as she walked around looking at everything, the others dispersing widely. Several tourists looked at them curiously, as their attire seemed slightly out of place for the area, but no one seemed ready to say anything.

"I believe the local Aboriginal people don't like tourists climbing the rock," Azumi noted, looking at a trail of tourists heading up a path in the distance.

"That doesn't seem to be stopping them," Naito said.

"No." They headed back towards Yori and Chou.

"I wish I'd thought to bring a camera," the agent mused. He blinked when a rather nice Nikon SLR was handed to him by the girl walking beside him. There was no obvious place she could have been keeping it.

"Use mine. It's loaded with a fresh roll of Fuji Velvia 50. Please don't drop it." The girl looked at him, a slight smile on her lips.

"Thanks," he managed, gingerly taking the camera from her. She waited while he composed and took a few shots. They resumed walking, reaching Yori as Tamiko and Officer Graham did from the opposite direction.

"It's a pretty damn big rock," Tamiko said, staring at the outcrop. "Nice colour, as well."

"Dawn and sunset is the best time, it looks absolutely amazing then," Mike said, following her gaze. "There's a good reason so many photos are taken of it."

"It's YOU!" came a shout from behind them. Chou and Yori exchanged glances, then turned, as did the others. A teenaged boy, American judging by the Stars and Stripes t-shirt he was wearing, not to mention his accent, was staring at them.

"Oh, god," Yori muttered. "Him. What the hell is he doing here?"

"It is somewhat unlikely, dear," Chou said calmly. "But you know how these things go with us. I imagine he's on holiday." The teenager ran up to them, dragging a woman behind him who seemed to be his mother.

"I can't find anything about that movie you were promoting in LA and I've looked everywhere," the boy said excitedly, staring at Yori fixedly. "I went to every studio, none of them would tell me anything. There's all sorts of rumours on the internet but no one seems to know anything. When is it coming out? What's it called? Who's starring in it? Are you starring in it? What's your name? Are you really Japanese? How did you do all those things outside Mann's? Do you really know Martial Arts? Was it just a trick? What's the plot of the movie?" He stopped to take a breath while the woman beside and behind him sighed, looking apologetically at the little group.

"I'm sorry, he just won't shut up about it." She gave her son a hard look which he completely missed. Chou smiled at her in a kindly manner.

Yori shook her head, looking torn between yelling and rolling around laughing. In the end she settled for sighing heavily. "Look, kid, there is no movie! You understand?" He stared at her, outraged.
"No movie? You were promoting it, I saw it! It was on the radio and even on entertainment news on TV. Of course there's a movie. You can't fool me. You people have the weirdest promotional system I've ever heard of, but it's brilliant. All my friends want to see it. When's it coming out? Just tell me the name, even." He looked pleadingly at her. She glanced at his mother.

"Bit of a movie fan, then, is he?" The older woman rolled her eyes.

"You have no idea."

The teenager kept jabbering, following them around for a few minutes. Naito was trying not to laugh, while Yori was clearly becoming mildly annoyed. Eventually the other girls returned, looking curiously at the sight before them. Fumiko put her hand over her eyes for a moment when she recognised the young man while Misaki grinned. "You're all here! That's great. Are you going to do another fight scene?" He looked around eagerly. "Where are the cameras? I guess they must be hidden. Is the movie going to be set in Australia?" Shaking her head, Yori turned to Aiko, who was trying to keep a straight face.

"I think we should probably go." The brunette nodded, giggling.

"Can we stop at the last place so I can get a good photo?" Naito asked.

"Sure." Aiko waited for them to all gather around her, while the teenager watched with great interest. His mother was looking apologetic again.

"Are you going to do a fight scene now?" he asked. Yori sighed, while Chou giggled and nudged her. Aiko laughed, grinning at the boy.

"No, something better. Watch closely." He stared, while she glanced at his mother. "Close your eyes." The older woman studied her for a moment, then did as requested. The teenaged boy, of course, didn't. Winking at him she teleported.

When his vision had recovered he looked wildly around, then grinned so widely his head was in danger of separating into two pieces.

"That movie is going to be AMAZING!"

"It was very funny, Yori," Chou said, glancing at her partner, smiling slightly. Yori nodded a little.

"I suppose so. But he just won't stop!" With a shrug she joined the others who were looking down on a pleasantly bucolic scene, a wide valley stretching away in front of them with dozens of what were clearly vineyards visible right out to the horizon. Tiny dots of people were visible moving around in between the vines, picking the grapes. "That's an awful lot of grapes," she added.

"The south Australian wine industry is pretty big," Mike said, moving to stand beside them. "I don't know a huge amount about it but I think most of those people are only around to pick the grapes. It's very seasonal work, of course."

"I like Australian wine," Chou said, looking around. "Penfolds is quite nice. There are some dreadful ones as well."

"It's all spoiled grape juice to me," Yori said, chuckling. "Taking perfectly good fruit juice and letting it go bad. How can you build a tradition on that? It's crazy!" Chou looked at her fondly.

"That's because you have no sense for the finer things in life, dear," she said quietly. The other woman looked at her with a grin.

"Thanks a lot."

Laughing, Naito glanced at them. "We should probably find a good wine shop. Perhaps there are some decent deals here? I like Australian wine as well and my wife loves it, she'd certainly like me to bring a few bottles back." Aiko walked over to them and pointed.

"How about trying that town down there? It looks a decent size, it must have some shops in it." Shortly they were standing in a car park outside a place that did indeed seem to be a purveyor of alcoholic beverages. Entering, they received a number of odd glances, but once again no one seemed too concerned. Everyone wandered off to look at the stock, Yori going with Chou despite obviously having no real interest in it.

Mike was in the process of reading the label on the back of a bottle of Shiraz when a loud altercation at the till made him look up. The shop owner was angrily arguing with a large man who seemed insistent on leaving with a case of beer without paying for it. The various patrons of the store stopped what they were doing, watching the argument, one or two of them, obviously locals, beginning to move to intervene. The man suddenly pulled a small pistol from his belt under his jacket, pointing it at the shop owner, making everyone else freeze.

"I'm fucking taking it! So back off or I'll blow your face off." The man behind the desk raised his hands and stepped back as far as he could manage in the tight confines of the till area.

"Look, mate, we don't need that. Just take it and go." The thief, satisfied and drunk with both power and some beer he'd already imbibed before deciding he needed more, motioned with the pistol. "Open the till. I think I want what's in it."

"Hey. You only wanted the beer just now." The thief smirked slightly drunkenly.

"And now I want more. Tough luck. Open it." As the shopkeeper angrily turned to follow the instructions, he looked past the man and stopped dead.

After a few moments of staring, he looked back to the thief and said casually, "You might want to rethink your plan, mate." Puzzled, the man stared at him. Becoming aware that for some reason his back seemed to be getting very cold, not to mention the way the shop had gone dead quiet in a manner that even his gun hadn't managed to produce, he glanced over his own shoulder. The gun sagged a little in his grip as he went white.

Behind him were arrayed seven young women, one in the middle a metre and a half away glaring icily at him, six more in a half circle behind her. None of them looked happy. The closest one gave him a very unpleasant feeling in the pit of his stomach. Her unusual silver hair and very disconcerting orange eyes were bad enough, the long black leather coat added a certain air of danger, but it was the base-ball sized spheres of green energy she was holding in either hand that were the icing on the cake. A definite wash of cold air was coming from her and he even noticed that there seemed to be frost forming on her sleeves.

The way the other six girls were holding a number of visibly glowing edged weapons was certainly something that concentrated his mind and sobered him up pretty damn fast. The ones on either end even seemed to have what looked for all the world like a real light-sabre each. He swallowed.

"Put the gun down," the silver-haired girl said in a voice that could have replaced the cold-room at the back of the shop for the effect it had on him. He shivered.
"Um. Don't want to," he replied, trying to be brave. She raised an eyebrow.

"Now."

Deciding that he'd go down fighting he swung the pistol in her direction as fast as he could manage. It wasn't nearly fast enough. One ball of energy caught him in the chest with a loud crack, while the other took the gun clean out of his hand. She blurred forward faster than he could make out and grabbed it before he hit the ground, his jacket smoking slightly. Leaning over him she smiled in a manner that made him fear for his very soul, then squeezed the gun in her hand. It creaked and collapsed. A voice in his ear softly said, "Good night," giving him just time to look sideways and see violet eyes before everything went black.

The shop stayed quiet for a long moment. Azumi looked pleased, dropping what was left of the gun on the unconscious thief's chest. Turning to the shop-keeper she produced two bottles of wine and put them on the counter, saying politely, "I'd like to purchase these, please." He stared for a few seconds, then grinned broadly.

"For you, my friends, anything you all want is at cost." She smiled while behind her the various other patrons of the shop began discussing what had happened.

"Holy shit," Mike whispered, glancing at Naito, who smiled and shrugged.

"She's being trained by them. I think she's learned her profession very well, personally." Mike stared at him, then at the seven women, who were browsing the shop as if nothing had happened. Yori had neatly tucked the would-be thief in a corner out of the way so he wouldn't inconvenience anybody and was now looking at a display of snacks, whistling softly to herself. Eventually he went back to what he was doing, thinking that the stories didn't do it justice. Not even slightly.

By the end of their shopping trip Chou and Yori had somehow made several cases of wine vanish, while the store owner was adding up the total. Accepting a large quantity of notes he looked pleased. "Thank you for dealing with our friend here," he said, picking up the phone. "I'll call the police now. I thought it would be a good idea to let you finish shopping first."

"Thanks," Yori said. She studied the thief for a moment or two. "He'll be out for about another twenty minutes, I'd say."

"Sounds good. Thanks for the business, come again any time. Twenty-five percent discount for life." The store owner grinned at her, then switched his attention to the phone as it was answered. "Ah. Hello, I'd like to report an attempted robbery, please." By the time he looked all the girls and the two men with them were gone. A bright flash came from outside his shop, making him stare for a moment, then dismiss it. "No, he's still here. I don't think he's going anywhere."

DS Taylor stopped in the door of the conference room, looking around at the people in it with raised eyebrows. Tamiko was wearing a classic bush hat, with corks dangling from the brim, flicking one of them with a smile on her face. Misaki was examining a stuffed crocodile carefully. "We should have got a real one," she grumped, reaching for the packet of crackers on the table. Her sister shook her head tiredly.

"Where would you put it? Our apartment isn't that big."

"It could live in the swimming pool...?"

"I don't think they like chlorine, Misaki," Yori said patiently. "Anyway, I knew someone with a pet crocodile once, she was nuts. You're not nuts. Well..." She grinned at her friend. "Not completely nuts at any rate." Misaki smiled at her, playing with her toy. On the other side of the table Chou had a stuffed kangaroo, which she seemed pleased with. Naito was unloading a roll of film from a camera, while Azumi and Aiko seemed to be discussing the contents of a case of wine. Next to them were half a dozen interesting shells, still with some sand on.

Staring for a moment, he shook his head in wonder. "You seem to have managed to find something to do while I was away," he commented, coming into the room and closing the door. Mike looked at him with an exhausted smile.

"You wouldn't believe where we've been," he said.

"Where?"

"Everywhere! They just don't get tired..."

Naito snickered, reloading the camera carefully. "Now you begin to understand what I have to deal with," he murmured. Chou glanced at him, then back to Yori, who was examining a genuine hand-carved boomerang with interest. Both of them smiled.

"Hmm. OK, other than that, did you have an interesting time?"

"Yes, thank you, Detective," Chou replied, looking amused and pulling a bottle of wine out of nowhere. "We got this for you. I hope you like reds." He accepted it with a small laugh.

"I do, actually. Thanks." Putting it to one side he sat, dropping a folder on the table and opening it. "Right. So far, we've rounded up three of the people on the list." He distributed several photographs. "These three. The other six we can't locate. Witnesses say they all got a phone call just after we arrested the old woman, my guess is that someone in the neighbourhood is on their payroll and warned them. We'll look into it but it's not very important right now. The main thing is that they've disappeared."

"How irritating," the blonde said mildly, looking at one of the photos. She handed it to Yori, who looked at it before passing it along. "I assume we can question these people, perhaps they can suggest the location the others have gone to. Or locations, assuming they've all hidden separately." Chou raised an eyebrow at him.

"We can question two of them. In fact, they're in the process of being fairly strongly interrogated. The last one is more of a problem, he decided that resisting arrest by means of a firearm was a brilliant idea, but turned out not to be a very good shot. Our guys were. He's in hospital and not expected to make it." Yori and Chou looked at each other.

"That shouldn't present a problem." Yori grinned at him. Naito was nodding, as were the other girls.

"You have some sort of mystical healing ability you can use to make him all better?" Taylor asked slightly sarcastically. The black-haired young woman looked very amused and nodded.

"Yes."

He stopped and stared at her for a moment. "Oh. OK, then. I guess we'd better deal with him first before it's too late."

"Which one is it?" she asked. He moved the photos around on the table, passing her one.

"This guy. Al, he's called. Albert Jones, twenty-eight, a string of drugs convictions as long as your arm, not to mention several firearms offences. How the hell he's even out on the street is beyond me, he should have been locked up for good years ago. Very nasty piece of work."

"All right. Let's visit Mr Jones, make him all better, then extract everything he knows." She grinned maliciously.

Doctor Niven looked at the chart, then at the monitor next to the bed, which was beeping rather more erratically than he liked. "It doesn't look good," he said to the nurse who was adjusting the drip plugged into the man on the bed, who was pale and drawn. A bandaged wound on his upper chest was already slightly red-tinged. "The internal bleeding is still going on, I suspect. BP is low, pulse is all over the place. I think we'll have to go in again. The bullet must have nicked a vessel we missed the first time when it shattered on his clavicle."

"Will he survive another round of surgery?" the nurse, Rose, asked him. He shrugged. "I don't know. But he'll die for sure if we don't operate, so it's not like we have a choice." He turned as he heard footsteps behind him, finding the room had five more people in it. "Hey. Who the hell are all of you? This is a restricted area." One of the men pulled out a police ID and showed it to him.

"Detective Sergeant Taylor, NSW police. This man is a suspect we need to question." The doctor looked at him with disgust.

"Well, you're not going to get an answer, now or perhaps ever. He'll be lucky to survive another two hours even if we open him up immediately."

"That won't be necessary, Doctor," a soft voice said from beside him. He looked to see one of the other people, a tallish blonde woman of Japanese ancestry, looking carefully at the patient. The other female with the little group, a short woman with very long black hair in a braid, was standing next to the nurse on the other side of the bed. She gently moved Rose to the side, then leaned over the patient, putting her hand on his chest.

"HEY! What the hell are... you..." He trailed off in shock as her hand began glowing a pretty purple-violet colour. Beside her the nurse gasped, raising her hand to her mouth.

"Damaged aorta, repaired but leaking, nick to the gall bladder from a bullet fragment, a number of cracked ribs, one from the bullet and the rest from the surgery, chipped clavicle, several damaged nerves, very low blood pressure, and he's about three years away from lung cancer." The woman looked up at him. "Don't worry, we've got this." The blonde pulled a chair up and sat on the other side of the bed, putting her hands on the unconscious man as well. "You get the bones, I'll sort the innards, OK?" Nodding, the tall woman's hand began glowing golden as she slowly moved them around. After a moment she carefully peeled the dressing away, revealing the sutured wound with a drainage tube in it.

Removing the tube carefully, showing considerable expertise, she moved her hands over the wound, which when they passed had healed completely. A pair of tweezers was suddenly in her hand, with a small line of golden light coming from her other index finger. This sliced each suture in turn, which was expertly removed with the tweezers. When they were all out she made the small wounds they'd left vanish as well. Resuming her careful work she ran her hands over his rib-cage, then his upper chest. "The skeletal problems are done," she reported shortly. The short girl nodded absently, concentrating on her own work.

"Got the aorta sorted, the gall bladder was minor, just looking for pre-cancerous tumours in his left lung. Want to do the right one?" With a nod the blonde went back to work. Doctor Niven watched in amazement as the two young women fixed a nearly irreparably damaged patient in less than five minutes. Rose was staring in astonishment, while even the three men who'd come in with them seemed surprised by the speed with which they worked.

"Got it, that's the last of them. He really doesn't look after himself," the black-haired girl said. One final pass and she looked pleased. "And that's the neural damage sorted. Nothing too serious, mainly some sensory ones around the bullet passage." Standing, she glanced at the doctor. "Ah, sorry, rude of us, but we were in a bit of a hurry. I'm Yori, that's my partner Chou. We're consulting for the Australian government on a rather important problem." He shook the hand she thrust in his direction, too stunned to do anything else.

"David Niven. Doctor David Niven. Surgeon." Her eyebrows went up. Sighing, he nodded. "Yes, like the British actor. I've heard all the jokes, don't bother." She chuckled a little. "OK, so mind telling me how the hell you just did whatever it was that you did there?"

Glancing at Chou, Yori shrugged a little. "Would you believe magic?"

He stared at her for a long moment. "I think I might have to. I don't have any other explanation for it." This made her chuckle again.

"Well, strictly speaking it's not magic at all. It's a very advanced application of something called ki. But most people have never heard of it so magic is normally more understandable if not any more believable."

"Ki. That's one of the eastern names for some sort of spiritual energy, isn't it?" he asked, which made her inspect him carefully, slightly surprised. She nodded.

"More or less. It refers more to life energy than spiritual energy, there are small but important differences. But that's essentially right. I'm surprised you've heard of it, most people outside Japan and China haven't and even a lot of people who live there don't know anything about it." He smiled at her.

"I used to be fairly seriously into martial arts. One of my Sensei talked about it. I could never understand what he was on about. But I think he must have known something, after what I just saw." She looked him up and down carefully.

"Hmm. Shotokan Karate, around purple belt?" He nodded, impressed.

"Yes. I'm out of practice, I haven't done anything serious for a couple of years. No time. How did you know?"

"We're pretty good at martial arts ourselves," Yori said, seeming amused. Behind her, the Japanese man who was in the group that had so suddenly arrived made a suppressed snicker.

"Which ones?" Doctor Niven asked curiously.

"More or less all of them," she replied. He stared, then nodded. There was something about both of them that made him think they probably were being truthful. They all turned to look at the patient as he coughed, stirring on the bed. Chou and Rose immediately went to his side.

"Lie still, please," Chou requested, as she gently removed the breathing tube from his nose and throat. Doctor Niven could see she knew exactly what to do. Aside from the ki healing, the woman plainly had considerable medical training. Rose helped her, falling into the practised routine in the presence of someone who was obviously very competent in her field, as she would have assisted
They soon had the IV removed, the cannula plugged, and the patient sitting up in bed. He looked around the room, clearly slightly taken aback by the number of people in it. Fixing his eyes on Taylor he narrowed them, recognising a policeman with the instinct brought on by years of law-breaking. Chou touched his shoulder, making him look at her. "You should avoid any sudden moves for a few days, you were seriously injured. You're fine now but it will take some time for your body to rebuild it's reserves. You may feel light-headed for a few hours as well."

"Who are you?" he asked. "And what's going on?"

"You were shot resisting arrest," Nigel replied, stepping forward and holding up his ID. "If it wasn't for these two young women you'd quite likely be dead now, from what the doctor tells us, so I'd be grateful and polite to them." Al looked at him expressionlessly, then at Chou and Yori, who both nodded.

"You had quite serious internal injuries. It's unlikely you'd have survived another session of surgery," Yori said. "Not to mention you were on the fast path to an aggressive lung cancer. It would have killed you in about three to four years, I'd say." He paled. "Don't worry, we fixed it. In return, I'd very much like it if you could provide some information to us." Staring at them, he finally nodded.

"OK. I'll talk to you." Fixing the policemen with a glare, he added, "But only to you. Everyone else goes." Yori glanced over her shoulder. After a moment Taylor sighed his agreement.

"All right. We'll be outside with the others."

"May we have the file, please, Detective?" Chou asked. He handed it over, then ushered the others out, closing the door behind him.

"Aren't you worried about their safety, Detective?" Rose asked worriedly. "He's a violent criminal."

"I doubt very much they have anything to worry about, Nurse," he said, grinning. "Trust me, it's not them who would get hurt."

Inside the room, Al pulled himself further up in bed, his head momentarily swimming a little. "Ugh. That's no fun," he mumbled, holding it in his hands. When it went back to normal, he looked at the two women sitting next to the bed. Thoughts of making a break for it momentarily went through his mind. They were immediately suppressed, partly because he just didn't feel well enough and was sure he'd get caught again easily, but mainly because there was something in the eyes of the women that made it abundantly clear he wouldn't make it to the door even if he was fighting fit and heavily armed. He wasn't sure how he knew, but was completely sure he was right.

"So. What do you want to know?" he asked. Chou pulled a photo from the file, showing it to him. "Ah. Him. Slippery little bastard. Emily's grandson. What's he done?"

"Disappeared, mainly. We urgently need to find him. Any idea where he might be?" Yori looked evenly at him. He shook his head.

"Sorry, no idea. He took off about, oh, maybe two months back. Emily was furious, he pinched a load of weed and some cash. We looked for him for a while but came up empty. Weird little geek, always poking around on his computer doing something or other. Never could work out what. Didn't like the kid very much, there was something about him that got right up my nose for some reason." She looked disappointed but unsurprised.
"Can you think of anyone who might know where he'd go?" she asked. He thought for a moment.

"Maybe. There was one of our crew he seemed to get on with, Sam. Sam Kosovich. Don't like him much either. Greasy little bugger, you can't trust him. He'd sell his own grandmother for parts if he needed money." Yori seemed mildly amused while Chou looked through the folder she was holding, coming up with a photo of a thin blond man with a stringy moustache. She showed it to him.

"That's him. Geoff talked to him all the time when they were supposed to be working. He kept lots of weird shit in the old armoury in the bunker, strange crap he found god knows where. Some of it gave me the creeps. Sam seemed to like it, he brought some things for him and I think he sold a couple for him as well. He's the only one I can think of that the kid might have talked to."

"Where can we find Sam?" Chou put the photo away.

"Not completely sure. When we got word the cops had busted Emily everyone cleared out fast. I wasn't quick enough. Sam was off faster than anyone. If he's not still running he might have ended up at the old clubhouse, I know a few of the guys were going to go there. That's your best shot."

They nodded, looking at each other. "Where is this clubhouse?" Yori asked. He gave them an approximate address and directions.

"There's nothing around it for about twenty k. If they're there you're going to have a lot of trouble. The place is some sort of old factory, very heavily built. You'd need a small army to take it, plus the guys are pretty well armed." Yori grinned.

"Don't worry about us." She looked at him curiously. "You seem to be remarkably cooperative. Don't you have some sort of code about betraying your friends?" He shrugged, one corner of his mouth going up slightly.

"They're not really my friends. Just some guys I know and work with. We get on OK, mostly, but I don't much care what happens to them." She nodded, standing, as did Chou. Both of them headed towards the door. "Hey," he said when they were half way. Both stopped and looked at him. "Cancer? Really?" Yori smiled.

"Yes. If I were you I'd stop smoking and doing all the drugs you were using. We cleared everything out and healed you up, but if you go back to that it could come back." He looked at her for a long moment, then nodded.

"Thanks."

"You're welcome. Thank you for the information. With some luck you might have helped save the lives of a lot of people." She studied him for a moment. "It's not too late to turn your life around. You're certainly going to prison for a considerable time, but you're young still, and now, healthy. You should think about finding a different career path." With that they left, allowing him to lean back and ponder her words.

"These are aerial photos of the place you got Mr Jones to tell you about. He's right, it's very isolated and looks pretty heavily fortified, for all intents and purposes. It was some sort of explosives manufacturing plant in the sixties, from what I could find out. Heavy construction in case something went wrong and a long way away from anything valuable. It's been abandoned for at least twenty years." DS Taylor looked at the photographs spread out on the table. "Difficult to deal with if there are people in there with guns and no compunctions about using them."
"It shouldn't present too much difficulty," Yori said as she studied the photos. "We've dealt with more complicated situations. I think we need to do this ourselves, though, there's no point risking any of your people." She looked up at his slightly dubious expression. "Don't worry. We know what we're doing."

Tamiko giggled. "Yes, we're professional magical girls!" Despite himself he laughed.

"OK. My superiors don't seem to mind, and from what Mike there says the government is more than happy to let you deal with it, that way they don't have to pay for it and they have someone else to blame if it all goes sideways." Yori looked amused, while the others grinned. Even Azumi seemed pleased.

"We should teleport in here," Aiko said, also looking at the photos, pointing to a position on top of a hill that looked like it would have a clear line of sight to the building. "Leave you guys behind, then we can go right to the building here and get inside. It's dark now, so they won't be able to see much, which should help."

"You girls can see in the dark too, I suppose," Nigel chuckled. They gave him a look. "Ah. OK, then. I'll go get some night vision kit for those of us without superpowers." He was soon back with three sets of night vision goggles, which he explained the use of quickly. "Right. I suppose we should make a move."

One quick teleport later they found themselves in a very dark night on top of a hill. The stars shone brilliantly without any artificial light to drown them out. "No moon. That's useful," Yori's voice came from somewhere in the dark. Taylor put his goggles on, turning them on and looking around. The world was green and somewhat grainy, but visible. He saw that Naito and Mike had both put their goggles on as well. All the girls had disappeared. Turning to look at the building he could just make out a couple of figures standing outside it, which appeared too big to be any of the females. One of them suddenly dropped, then the other one did the same. At the same time all of their phones beeped. The three men exchanged goggled glances, then answered.

"Hi. It's Yori. We found two guards outside, they're down. There are four more inside. It looks like that's all of the people we've been looking for. We're on our way in." The conference call went silent for a short while. In the distance sounded a short burst of gunfire, punctuated by a couple of loud bangs that clearly weren't normal explosives. A flash of light came from the building, whiting out the goggles for a moment. Everything went quiet again.

"We've got them. No casualties worth speaking of, although one of the idiots shot one of his friends by mistake. We healed him up and put them all to sleep. Back with you in a moment."

"That was quick," Taylor said with surprise. Naito laughed.

"Trust me, those girls are very, very good at what they do. A small biker gang isn't even a workout for them." A bright flash came from the building and suddenly they were looking at seven figures that appeared out of nowhere, six of them carrying a body each slung over their shoulders. The entire operation had taken less than four minutes according to Nigel's watch. He looked at it, amazed, then at the dimly visible women.

"We should hire you lot in for raids," he muttered. Out loud he said, "That's very impressive. Back to the station?"

"Yes. This is getting close to my limit for people, so I'll do half of us in one go, then come back for the rest," Aiko said, gesturing for him to join her, Azumi, Tamiko, and Fumiko. "Where should we take them?"
"Central booking, please." With a nod they disappeared. The startled desk officer in the booking room jumped violently as the group appeared in front of him, reaching for his gun until he recognised Taylor.

"What the hell?" he yelped. The detective smiled.

"New procedure. We've got six suspects, three more are coming," Aiko vanished again, reappearing moments later with the rest of the party. "Like that." Staring, the officer gazed at them all, then shrugged. Once the prisoners had been woken one at a time and processed, they found themselves in holding cells with no real idea of what the hell had happened.

Sam stared across the table at the two women sitting there, then at the plain-clothes detective leaning against the wall of the room smirking at him. Nervously scratching his head he waited for one of them to make the first move. Unfortunately, the other three people appeared to have more patience than he did, so he finally cracked under the weight of all the stares. "Who are you people?" he asked. The two young women exchanged glances, then looked back at him. The one with the silver hair and the orange eyes gave him the creeps, she was just looking at him as if trying to decide how best to mount his head on the wall, rest of body not required. The other one, smaller and with long blue-striped black hair in a braid, seemed less scary on the surface but Sam's well developed threat assessment sense, honed after years of dealing with dangerous people on both sides of the law, was screaming at him that he'd never met anyone as dangerous as this person.

After a long pause, she smiled slightly. "We're consultants on a rather important case. You, I hope, have information of use to us relevant to that case. I would like you to give it to me."

"What information?" He looked baffled. They way this woman and her friends had raided the clubhouse so efficiently in the dark had shown him that they were certainly more than just 'consultants', but he wasn't sure what they actually were. Extremely worrying, definitely. The girl produced a photo, making him blink, because she hadn't pulled it out of her pocket, or from a folder, it was just suddenly there in her hand. Pushing it across the table to him she waited for him to get a good look at it.

"We need to find this person as fast as possible. Information we received suggests that you may be able to help us do that." Sam looked at the picture of Geoffrey Young, his heart sinking. This wasn't good.

"Um, never seen him before in my life," he tried, hopefully. She inspected him, then smiled in a way that made him nearly lose control of his bowels.

"Not exactly true, is it? Or, to be more blunt, you're lying. I can tell, regardless of the fact that we already know you both know him and talked extensively to him." Pausing she let him sweat for a moment. "Talk extensively to me. Immediately." He stared at her for a few more moments, then glanced appealingly at the cop, who shrugged.

"Their game at the moment, mate. I'd strongly suggest that you do what she says. You really wouldn't like to see her get annoyed." Sam finally gave in, not being the strongest-minded person around, not to mention the way the silver-haired girl seemed to be licking her lips as if she was now considering what he'd taste like medium rare.

"OK, OK. What do you want to know?" he said, leaning as far away as he could. The other one smiled, obviously pleased.
"Thank you, Mr Kosovich. I'm Yori, this is my associate Azumi. We, as I said, need to locate Geoffrey Young. We're told that you spent quite a lot of time in his company. Do you have any idea where he might be? And, for that matter, why he left so suddenly?" Sam sighed.

Gathering his thoughts, he began speaking. "Geoff is kind of a weird guy. Always talking about magic and supernatural things. He'd find strange little objects in shops, at flea sales, that sort of thing, then trade them with other people like him. I helped him sometimes, some of those little trinkets were interesting. I even bought a couple for my girlfriend. I delivered a few for him as well, and picked some up when he bought them online. There was some website he used to sell things and occasionally buy them as well. He made a fair amount of money but not a huge amount, although he was generous with his commissions when I helped. Then, about three months ago he put together a collection of several items and put the whole lot up for sale. No one paid much attention for a while, but all of a sudden two people began bidding against each other like crazy. He was jumping up and down about it. The price just kept going up and up, it finally sold for nearly two hundred grand. Neither of us could believe it. He crated everything up and sent it off when he got paid. "

"Where did he send it?" Yori leaned forward. "Can you remember the address?" He shook his head.

"Sorry, I have no idea. It was overseas, I know that much, but he handled that part himself." She looked disappointed, sitting back and thinking for a moment.

"All right. Go on."

"Everything was pretty good for a week or two. He'd got his money, the buyer seemed happy, so he got back to buying and selling. Emily was in the middle of a crop so she wasn't paying much attention, the rest of us were helping her, and Geoff was just keeping to himself. Then, out of the blue, he panicked. He was running around like the devil himself was after him. When I got him to calm down it turned out the other person after that collection had contacted him and made some demands. Those turned into threats. He was terrified. The guy, whoever he was, knew too much about him, like where he lived and who he was, which was supposed to be impossible, the web site was heavily encrypted from what he said. That made him even more paranoid, he was convinced that whoever ran it was in on it. So, in the end, he ran."

"Where to?" The cold voice from Azumi made him twitch. Looking at her, he shrugged a little.

"I'm not completely sure, he wouldn't tell me. But, if I had to guess, I'd say probably somewhere around Alice Springs. I saw some maps in his car, which seemed to be open to that general area. It's a good choice in a sense, I guess, it's more or less in the middle of the country and a hell of a long way from anything. But I wouldn't want to live there. He trashed his computer and his phone, burned all his paperwork, then drove off. That's the last I saw of him, about two months ago I'd say."

"We were told by the police he didn't have a phone," Yori commented curiously. Sam shrugged.

"He got me to buy him one so it wasn't in his name. He was pretty paranoid." Smiling slightly, he added, "I guess someone really was out to get him. You, aside from anything else."

"Has anyone else been around looking for him before us?"

He shook his head. "Not that I know of. All the threatening was done online. Geoff told me he was going to have to lay low for a year or two, stay off the net, because he could be tracked. He had enough money to do that easily. Not to mention the twenty grand he pinched from Emily on the way out, which I think was just to annoy her. They didn't get on."

She nodded thoughtfully, studying him for a moment. Looking at Azumi briefly she returned her attention to him. Another photo appeared. He inspected it when she pushed it across the table. "Do you recognise this?" He nodded slowly.

"Yes. That was one of the things in the collection that Geoff sold. The buyer asked specifically about it, in fact. Weird thing, even compared to his other junk. It glowed green and gave me a very strange feeling being in the same room." He looked at the photo of the crystal sphere in the mass of metallic tubing, shaped roughly into a cube, then shivered. "Not a nice feeling."

Yori smiled grimly. "Where did he get it, do you know?"

"Not exactly. He turned up with it one day, he told me he found it somewhere in Sydney, near the botanical gardens. About, um, four months ago. He wouldn't go into details on it. I got the impression that it sort of scared him but he couldn't resist it. After the first week he put it in a box and stashed it at the back of one of the shelves in the old armoury. When he decided that he was going to sell an entire collection of things that was the last one to go in, I don't think he wanted to get rid of it, but at the same time he wanted it gone." Looking at them as they exchanged glances again, he asked curiously, "What is it?"

"An extremely dangerous weapon, I'm afraid. Think of it like a bomb." Yori sighed. "Thanks for your help, Mr Kosovich. Hopefully it's given us something to go on." She and the other girl stood, then left the room with the detective, who was replaced by a burly constable and another officer who started asking awkward questions about his activities over the last couple of years.

"Somewhere in the area of Alice Springs is still a large area, but I guess it's something." Mike looked at the map spread out on the table. "I suppose the easiest thing is to go there and start asking around. I can get the local police involved. With some luck we might be able to get a lead on the young man."

Misaki looked worried. "The answers he gave raised more questions, some of which are a little unsettling," she noted. Agent Naito nodded.

"Someone was specifically looking for the portal device. That's not good. In theory we have all the people who were involved, and none of the government agencies aware of the device would touch it. Not now."

"It's possible two different parties are looking for it, which is even more worrying. Don't forget whoever made the threats to Geoff." Yori stared at the map, irritation on her face. "I suppose it's possible that there was something else in the collection they wanted, but can we take the risk?"

"We should probably attempt to locate the other party involved as well," Azumi said quietly. "I have passed the details we learned and the number of the phone Mr Kosovich obtained for Mr Young to Ms Aoyama. She's going to try to trace the second prospective purchaser."

"Well, until we get any information on that path we should concentrate on Geoff Young." Taylor checked his watch. "It's pretty late now. I at least need some sleep. No one in Alice Springs will be around either, I'd think. We should get some sleep and pick this up in the morning." Everyone looked around, then one by one agreed.

"I'd love to rush off right now, but you're right," Yori sighed. "Let's find a hotel and relax for a little. I'm kind of hungry as well." Misaki tossed her an apple which she plucked out of the air without looking. "Thanks."

Fumiko and Tamiko were talking quietly on the other side of the room. The auburn haired girl looked up, smiling. "Can we play the gang game after we get dinner?" she asked hopefully. Naito groaned. Biting off a large piece of apple with a crunch Yori looked amused, but said nothing.

"We'll have to see how the evening progresses," Chou told the other woman, then looked around.
"Shall we go and find somewhere to eat, then? We can find a place to stay after that."

"Sounds like a plan," Aiko replied, jumping to her feet. "I vote for that sushi place in Brisbane."

"We had sushi for lunch," Tamiko protested.

"I like sushi," her friend said, laughing. "So does Fumiko, Misaki will eat anything as will Yori, and I know Chou loves it as well."

"Oh, all right then. But I might want a pizza later."

"From the place in New York or that one in Rome we got them from last time?"

Tamiko thought. "Let's try the New York one." Mike and Nigel exchanged wondering glances. Agent Naito grinned at them.

"It takes a little getting used to," he said quietly, as they watched the young women deciding how many different places in how many different countries constituted a decent night out.

"You can say that again." Mike looked somewhat awe-struck. None of his research had really properly prepared him for all this. "Do they really go to New York for pizza?"

"Apparently. Fumiko says it's the best place she's found so far."

"Bizarre."

Yori looked at him and DS Taylor. "Are you guys coming for something to eat?" Mike thought for a moment.

"Why not. I like sushi too, and Brisbane is quite an interesting place. You up for it, Nigel?"

"Oh, hell. Why not. I have to be home in three hours, though, or my wife will worry." He laughed slightly. "She'd probably worry more if she knew I was going out with seven attractive superwomen, and only two other men." Yori stared at him, then looked around at the others, before they all collapsed laughing.

"Sorry. Kind of an in joke," she explained when she'd recovered a little. "Don't worry about it."

Packing up, they gathered together and seconds later were standing outside a restaurant seven hundred kilometres further north. It turned out Fumiko was right, the sushi was exceptionally good.
They had a very nice meal, during which Mike and Nigel, and to a lesser extent Agent Naito, drank rather more than was completely sensible. Afterwards, they were in a very good mood indeed. The restaurant was very pleased with the group, as between them they managed to eat enough for a party three times the size, and tipped very well. Chou paid with a large pile of cash, smiling at the waitress. "It was excellent, thank you very much. We'll certainly come again." The woman smiled back, accepting the money before wishing them a pleasant evening. Outside they all looked around, then just started walking aimlessly along the street, chatting.
"Thanks for a nice meal," Mike said to Chou, beside him. She turned her head to him and smiled slightly.

"It's no problem, Mike. Thank you for showing us around earlier. I'm sorry if we ran you a little ragged. Sometimes we tend to forget that not everyone has quite the same level of stamina we have."

He laughed for a while. "I suspect that hardly anyone has the same level of stamina you people have. It's been very nice to meet you though, after hearing so many things about you and the other magical girls in Minato. I haven't been to Tokyo for some time but I enjoyed it last time I went."

"It's an interesting place, certainly. Some parts of it more than others." The blonde looked amused as he nodded with understanding."

"So I gather." He sniffed the air. "Hey, do you smell smoke?"

"Yes," she replied, looking around. Yori and Azumi had stopped and were also sniffing.

"That smells like plastic burning. Quite a lot of it," the short black-haired young woman noted. Glancing around, she looked up at the building they were next to, a four story apartment block. "Hang on." Walking a couple of steps closer she jumped vertically to land neatly on the roof. Mike and Nigel gaped. Looking at them with a small grin, Azumi did the same. A few seconds later they dropped to the ground. "There's a car accident on the next street over, it must have just happened. One of the cars is on fire and it's spreading. You'd better call it in, while we go help." All seven of the girls vanished around the corner at a remarkable speed. Mike looked at the police officer next to him, who seemed as stunned as he was at the rapid disappearance, then pulled his phone out of his pocket.

"Where are we?" he asked, dialling the emergency services. Agent Naito looked around and read off the street address, which he passed to the operator, while all three of them nearly ran down the street. When they rounded the corner they spotted the accident immediately, as it was rather difficult to miss. Three cars and a truck had somehow had an argument at a junction, all of them losing fairly spectacularly. One of the cars was wedged into the front of a shop, while another was on its side burning merrily. The truck was halfway on top of the last car. A number of people were standing nearby, several of them with phones in their hands, while a few were gathered around a prone body on the pavement, which one of the vehicles had clearly come into contact with during the incident.

Chou was bending over the person on the road as the three men trotted up, the two Australians breathing heavily. Mike glanced at Naito, who grinned at him, perspiring lightly but not looking too winded. "The PSIA obviously has a better physical fitness standard than the ASIO," he commented when he got his breath back.

"You pretty much have to if you're going to hang around these girls. I live in dread of the day Yori decides I need more training. She's hinted at it on more than one occasion."

He grinned, then watched as Chou put glowing hands on the injured person's leg, rapidly healing what looked like a very nasty break. The onlookers gasped, several of them pushing closer for a better view. "Hey, move back a little, let the lady work," he called, showing his government ID, which had the desired effect.

A loud whoosh sounded from the direction of the burning car and all eyes turned in that direction to see a cloud of vapour cover it, extinguishing the flames. Azumi emerged from the cloud supporting a middle-aged man who was covered in blood, followed shortly by Yori who was brushing her clothes off looking annoyed. "Yuck," she muttered as she approached, "Oil is a bitch to get out of silk." Helping Azumi with the injured driver, she got to work healing him.

By the time the first ambulance arrived, immediately followed by a pair of fire engines and a police car, the truck had been bodily picked up and moved off the car under it, which was in turn moved to the side of the road and the two, luckily still alive, occupants extracted and healed up. The car embedded in the shop had been left where it was, as it now was performing the useful task of keeping the building up, necessary since it had removed some load-bearing wall on it's way through. The driver was pried loose, though, by some miracle only requiring minor healing. The fire-damaged car was also moved out of the way by Misaki, who was still complaining about soot all over her hands from picking it up. Fumiko and Aiko were directing traffic around the accident site, glaring at people who slowed to rubberneck, which had the effect of making them move on with alacrity.

The crowd had swelled to several dozen people who were watching with shocked interest. Seeing a relatively slight young woman pick up a vehicle and walk off with it was somewhat unusual, after all, inevitably attracting a certain amount of attention. Walking back across the street from where she had been investigating the car stuck in the building, Tamiko looked around then stopped next to Mike and Nigel. "You'd think they'd never seen magical girls at work before," she noted with a wide grin. Glancing at her the ASIO officer sighed.

"Does this happen a lot with you all? I mean, we seem to have had a surprisingly large number of rather odd occurrences for one day." She shrugged slightly.

"It's about par for the course, I'd say. Less demons than usual, but we do seem to attract odd things, or at least be around when they happen. Keeps us on our toes." The girl giggled a little, turning to look as the ambulance screeched to a halt next to them. "Oops. I hope they don't mind we did their job for them." Two paramedics jumped out, one of them running around to the back and whipping the door open to reveal another one, who thrust a folding trolley out the door, the first one catching it skilfully as the legs unfolded and locked, while the driver looked quickly around then walked rapidly over to the small group of people clustered around Chou, who was talking to the woman whose leg she'd fixed. The blonde looked up at him and smiled.

"I'm sorry, I've already repaired the damage. I think we've dealt with all the casualties now." She glanced over at Yori who was checking over the last of their patients, the driver of the car in the shop. The other woman nodded to her without looking.

"Yep. This guy is fine now." She stood from her squatting position next to the driver, who still looked somewhat shell-shocked, patting him encouragingly on the shoulder as she rose, then walked over. The other two paramedics had rushed over with the gurney and were now standing looking slightly awkward as it became apparent that there were no injured people to deal with.

The lead paramedic looked around at the scene, noting all the Japanese women in similar clothing who seemed to be running the event with worrying competence, then gaped as Misaki, not entirely satisfied with the positioning of the damaged truck, casually shoved it into a more pleasing location. "Who are you people?" he asked in a somewhat shaken voice. Yori grinned at him.

"Just some visitors. Luckily we happened to be in the area and could help. Although washing the oil out is going to be difficult," she added, looking down at her shirt in annoyance. He stared, wordlessly. More sirens could be heard as two fire appliances screamed down the road and braked heavily, followed seconds later by a police car. Yet more people jumped out and ran around, getting quite excited. Yori watched with amusement as one of the newly arrived officers inspected the scene, then looked around. He spotted the various magical girls, his eyebrows going up, then looked thoughtful, before walking over to the group of her, Chou, and the three men. The paramedic stood nearby, trying to work out what the hell was going on.

Looking Yori and Chou up and down for a moment, the officer glanced over his shoulder at the other five, who were wandering around checking that everything was in order, before turning back to the first set of visitors. "I assume this has something to do with you people?" he asked slowly. The black-haired young women grinned, before turning to Mike, who smiled a little. Pulling out his government ID he showed it to the cop who studied it for a few seconds. "Hmm. Interesting. What brings the ASIO to town, I wonder, and to a traffic accident of all things?"

"Just passing, as it happens. My friends here are very good at... well, disaster management, I suppose you could say. We were merely in the right place at the right time." Mike looked at him steadily.

"Ah. I see. I suspect there's an interesting story behind that, but I also suppose it's not one I'll learn." The officer smiled. Looking at Yori again, he inspected at her carefully again, then did the same to Chou. "My girlfriend is Japanese. She comes from Tokyo, a place called Minato. Do you know it?" Yori watched him watch her with a grin on her face. Beside her Chou also looked amused.

"I'm familiar with it, yes," she replied, suppressed laughter in her voice.

"She's told me some very strange stories over the last couple of years. Things about demons and demon fighters, who for some reason are always female. Frankly, not very believable stories, but she swears they're true." Yori was looking even more amused. "Oddly enough, some of them are about a pair of young women whose descriptions are remarkably similar to you and your friend here." The officer looked at her for a long moment, while she grinned. "Strange coincidence, I guess."

"Most likely," she replied. He grinned back.

"I think we probably owe you some thanks. From what I can see this could have been very nasty. Lucky no one seems to have been hurt."

"Very lucky." She turned her head as the other girls came over, joining them. There was a moment of wordless communication between them which gave Naito and the others the impression that they had somehow had a real conversation, then Aiko nodded. Stepping a few paces to the side, she waited. Yori looked back at the officer, holding out her hand. "Give my best to your girlfriend," she said. He shook it with a smile.

"I will. Miss...?"

"Just Yori." She joined the others who had clustered around Aiko. Raising her hand she waved once, before the entire group vanished with a bright flash. The policeman blinked a little, then grinned. Looking at the paramedic, still standing there gaping a little, he chuckled.

"You wouldn't believe some of those stories. I think I do, though."

"He went down there, Harry," the young man said, pointing to a dark alley. "Bold as anything, and pretty drunk. Looked Japanese. Nice suit, not a local. He should be good for some fun if nothing else."

Harry looked slightly dubious. "I dunno, Emilio. There's been some really weird stories going around the last couple of hours. I heard that Mark and his crew went after some businessman a few blocks over and just vanished. Something strange is going on. Maybe we should call it a night." His friend snorted derisively.

"There's four of us and one of him. He's twice our age as well. What's he going to do? It's not like he's some Kung Fu master or anything. Let's just roll him and get on with things. I need a drink." The other two young men with him and Harry nodded. Eventually the dark-haired gang member overcame his out of character nervousness and agreed. The four of them produced a selection of weapons ranging from a machete to a baseball bat and fairly quietly went after the target. All four of them vanished into the dark of the alley...

Two hours later a routine patrol from the local police screeched to a halt as a bedraggled young man, bound securely with his hands tied behind his back, hopped out of an alleyway and fell over just in front of them. Looking at each other for a moment the two officers, one male and one female, returned their attention to the youth struggling in the middle of the road, having apparently not even registered the presence of their vehicle. After a moment they both got out and walked over, looking down at him curiously.

"That's the ninth one so far tonight, Sue," the male officer said reflectively as he inspected the figure writhing around angrily in the middle of the road. The woman nodded.

"Yep. Weird, isn't it?" She squatted down and shone her flashlight in the face of the youth, who froze and started whimpering in fear as he realised he wasn't alone. "I recognise this one, Emilio Valdez. Nasty little shit, he's a professional mugger. Looks like he picked the wrong person to mug tonight, though." There was a rather unprofessional smile of satisfaction on her face. "I wonder where the rest of his crew is?" Both cops looked in the direction of the alley. Eventually the man sighed.

"I'll call it in."

Sue prodded the bound figure with her flashlight. "Hey, Emilio. Who did this to you?" He looked up at her, his eyes wide and frightened.

"Don't know. Can't remember. Just... orange eyes in the dark, and that voice... So cold. Keep her away!" He shivered and lost control of his bladder. Stepping back with an expression of distaste, Sue stared at him, then shrugged.

"Very weird. Last one said purple eyes."

DS Taylor looked up as a familiar group of people entered the room, putting the phone down as he did. Yori grinned at him. "Hi, Detective. Recovered from last night?" He nodded, then held his head with one hand for a moment.

"More or less. Still have a brutal headache, though. I don't normally drink so much." She laughed, walking over and putting a hand on his shoulder. It glowed slightly and he was shocked how quickly his headache simply faded away as if it had never been. "Good god. That's absolutely amazing." The young woman smiled, then frowned slightly, running her hand slowly down his side to stop at his waist. She looked at him.

"You got shot a while ago, didn't you?" she asked. He nodded again.

"Yes. About four years ago. Small calibre bullet, a ricochet from a near miss. It went through one kidney and bounced around inside a little. I spent three weeks in the hospital."

"It still hurts from time to time, doesn't it?" He stared at her.
"How do you know that?" he asked, impressed. She grinned.

"We're actually pretty good at this. There's still a small fragment of the bullet in there, it's just under the surface of your right kidney. The irritation is causing a lesion to form, which isn't a good thing in the long term, never mind the pain. I'm surprised the doctors missed it, but it might have been hiding behind a bone on the X-ray." She looked around, then indicated the table, moving the map they'd left there the day before to one side. "Come on, lie down here and we'll deal with it." Nigel stared again. It sounded like she intended to perform surgery right then and there.

"What?! Right here?"

"Yep. Come on, hop up, this will only take a minute or so. You won't feel a thing, trust me." Looking at her confident expression, he glanced at Mike, who shrugged, and Agent Naito, who simply smiled.

"You can certainly trust her. The things I've seen them do..." He shook his head in respectful wonder. "I certainly want them for medical help if I ever get into trouble."

"Oh, hell, I guess so," Nigel mumbled, thinking about what he'd seen the day before with the gang member in the hospital. Taking his jacket off he handed it to Mike, then lay down on his back on the table. Yori pulled his shirt up, then glanced at Chou, who handed her a pair of long fine tweezers she'd produced from nowhere. She was also holding some surgical wipes which had presumably come from wherever the tweezers had. Everyone else stood and watched, fascinated.

"OK, roll slightly onto your left side, then don't move, this won't take long." Yori bent over his side. Misaki, behind her, moved to close the door and lean against it. He felt the area abruptly go numb. There was a faint hissing sound accompanied by a slight smell of burning meat, which made him pale a little although he couldn't feel anything, while Mike, who was watching with interest, suddenly looked slightly ill.

"Do I want to ask what that was?" he asked, staring at the ceiling. Yori shook her head without looking away from what she was doing.

"Probably not." He could see out of the corner of his eye that she was carefully manipulating the tweezers, presumably with the tip now inside him somewhere. The thought made him a little queasy. "Ah. Got it. There we go." She held the instrument up, a shard of metal a few millimetres long held in the end, covered in blood. Handing them to Chou she accepted a wipe, then cleaned up. Thirty seconds later she stepped back. "All done." Nigel stared at her, then down at his side, which looked completely unblemished. Mike also stared at it.

"Holy shit," he mumbled quietly. "That was unbelievable." Yori seemed pleased.

"Nothing much to it, really. It wasn't in very far, only about four centimetres. I healed the lesions in the process. You'd possibly have developed one or other kidney problem in a few years if it had gone untreated. The metal would have eventually dissolved, there wasn't much there, but that's not ideal either. It would have become very painful in the end as well." Taking the tweezers back from her partner she looked closely at the bit of metal in the end, wiping the blood off it. "Tiny bit of copper jacket, I think. Nothing much but it was in an awkward place. Here you go." She held it out. With a glance at her he took it, staring at the thing.

"That's what was causing the pain?" he asked. She nodded.

"It should be fine now." Beside her, Chou picked up the bloodstained wipes and held them in her hands, closing them around the things. There was a faint 'foomp' noise and golden light showed from between her fingers. When she opened her hands it was to brush a small amount of ash away. She noticed Mike and Nigel staring at her and smiled a little.

"They were a potential biohazard, it would be irresponsible to leave them in the normal waste." Yori handed her the tweezers which were now sparkling clean without a trace of blood and she made them disappear back to wherever she kept them.

After a few more seconds of silent wonder, Nigel sat up, then stood, accepting his jacket back from Mike. They looked at each other before turning to the young women. "Thanks. I have to admit, I didn't expect surgery on the conference table when I came in, but thanks." He prodded his side, smiling. "That's been annoying me for years."

"No problem. Neither of us likes leaving medical issues untreated, especially when it's so quick to fix them." With a quick grin at him Yori pulled the map back into the middle of the table. "So, where do we start?"

Trying to get his head back into the right mindset after so casually being operated on ad-hoc, he stared for a moment, then turned to the map himself. "I called the central police station in Alice Springs, spoke to a Superintendent Sharon Weiss. She's expecting you all later today. She didn't have any direct knowledge of Mr Geoffrey Young but was going to start making enquiries." Yori nodded, looking closely at the map.

"Are you coming with us, Detective Sergeant?" Aiko asked curiously. He glanced at her and shook his head.

"Out of my jurisdiction, that's Northern Territory, I'm New South Wales. I could come but it probably wouldn't help very much. I think it will be better if I stay here and work on the rest of that gang, it's possible that new information will come up. If it does I'll get it to you."

Chou smiled at him. "Thank you for your help, Detective. We'll make sure you find out what happens. If we do get the information we need we'll probably have to leave quickly, but I'm sure we could come back at some point. I like Sydney from what I've seen of it." Taylor grinned at the blonde.

"I'm not entirely sure Sydney could handle having all you people around for an extended time." Pulling a folder across the table he opened it, looking through it with a sardonically amused expression. "There seem to have been a number of rather odd occurrences late last night. So far, twenty-seven known or suspected gang members have been found tied up, usually with evidence implicating them in some sort of violent street crime. Most of them don't seem to be able to remember what happened. The ones that can remember anything really, really don't want to talk about it." Looking at the seven girls he raised an eyebrow. "I don't suppose any of you might have an idea of what might have happened?" They all looked back at him innocently.

"Not at all, Detective," Fumiko said with a small smile. "It seems like a very odd coincidence. Strangely enough, much the same thing happened in LA when we were there. Very weird indeed." He closed the file, grinning.

"Hmm. OK, off you go, then. Have fun."

Yori snickered. "I think we probably will. Take care, DS Taylor." Shaking hands with them all he watched as they gathered at one end of the room then vanished. Collecting the paperwork together he left the room, absently rubbing his hand over the spot that no longer hurt.
"Superintendent? There are a number of people here to see you. Quite a lot of them, in fact."
Sharon looked up from her computer to the civilian support person talking to her, then over to the door of the main room when he indicated. Through it she could see the lobby of the police station, which did indeed seem to be fairly full. "One of them is an Officer Mike Graham from the ASIO.
He says you're expecting them?" She smiled.

"Thanks, Art. If it's who I think then yes, I am expecting them. I'll come out, the room is a bit crowded as it is." Standing she picked up some paperwork and followed the man back to the lobby.
Looking around at the group of nine visitors she spotted the only non-Japanese one. "I assume you're Officer Graham from the ASIO?" she asked. He nodded, showing her his ID, then putting it away again.

"Superintendent Weiss, I guess." She nodded back, smiling.

"That's me. Your DS Taylor from Sydney told me that you and a team of consultants from Japan were looking for someone, a Geoffrey Young. He said it was very urgent. Can you tell me more about it? He didn't go into much detail." She looked curiously at the seven girls and the older man with them.

Mike indicated the group. "This is Agent Naito from the PSIA in Japan. The young ladies are, ah, let's call them free-lance specialists."

"Specialists in what?" she asked suspiciously. A short girl with long black hair and violet eyes laughed, stepping forward to shake her hand.

"Things most people find very hard to believe. Hi, I'm Yori. This is Chou and Azumi." She indicated the two girls with her, one tall blonde and a young woman somewhat shorter with extraordinary silver hair and orange eyes, who was watching the entire scene with cool detachment, but gave Sharon the impression she didn't miss anything. "Over there is Aiko, Tamiko, and Fumiko, and Misaki is around somewhere." She glanced around, then grinned. "Ah. You have a vending machine. She has trouble resisting them." Fumiko sighed while Tamiko giggled. Yori looked back to the Superintendent. "Do you have somewhere private we can talk? This isn't really something we should discuss in public."

"Of course. Follow me, please." Leading the way through another door and down a corridor to the rear of the station, Superintendent Weiss held open the door to the main meeting room. "Come in, take a seat, and tell me what's going on." Everyone filed in, Misaki bringing up the rear with a handful of snacks and a pleased expression. Closing the door Sharon watched as they all sat, then took her own seat, looking around. "OK, I'm getting extremely curious. A lot of young female 'specialists' in something odd, a member of the Japanese security services, and one of our own, all after this Mr Young. What's he done? Why the interest? And why do you think he's somewhere around here?"

Yori and Mike exchanged glances, the young woman gesturing for him to begin. "It's kind of a long story. Do you remember that incident in London just after Christmas...?" As she nodded he began his story, Yori taking over after a while with input from the others where necessary. After twenty minutes of the most fantastic story she'd ever heard, they fell silent and she sat back, considering what she'd been told.

"You realise that sounds completely unbelievable? Magic, demons, terrorist cults, all the other stuff?" she asked, finally, looking around at them. Yori looked at Chou for a moment, then both of them faded from view, leaving apparently empty chairs. Sharon stared in disbelief. "Oh, my God, the tall dark-haired woman whispered. Mike looked slightly surprised then grinned. After a few seconds, both young women faded back into visibility again. Azumi held out a bottle of water she pulled from nowhere, shaking it gently to show it was full. Holding it at arms length she looked at it, as did everyone else. Seconds later the bottle crackled, expanding slightly as it froze completely solid, mist visible as moisture in the air condensed out, running down the sides and to the table where it dispersed. She gently put the bottle down with a faint clunk, looking calmly at Sharon, who gaped back.

After a very long pause, she somewhat shakily said, "OK, I think I probably believe it. Holy crap." There was another pause. "It's all true? Everything you told me?"

"Every word," Agent Naito said, looking sympathetic. "Sorry, I understand it's a lot to take in. We've explained this to a fair number of people around the world so far, most of them have trouble with it. Some of the demonstrations our friends here have come up with have been somewhat... startling. This was probably one of the less exciting ones." He glanced at Yori and Aiko, who were grinning. "There's a school head mistress in LA who would agree with me." Chou nudged Yori when the other woman snickered.

"Oh, come on, it was pretty funny," the black-haired woman said, looking at her companion, who sighed softly. Sharon watched them, wondering what they were talking about, then decided it probably didn't matter. Staring at the bottle of ice which was slowly thawing again in the heat, she shook her head.

"Wow. All right, I guess we'd better try to find Mr Young, then. The only information you have is that an acquaintance saw he had some maps of this general area in his car?"

"Yes, unfortunately," Yori said. "Mr Kosovich seemed to believe it was quite likely he came in this direction, but we don't have any real evidence one way or the other. It's the best clue we do have, though, so we need to check. I'm not sure what the best approach is to achieve that. We're open to suggestions."

Superintendent Weiss sat back in her chair and thought for a while. "Alice Springs isn't a hugely populated place, and it's spread out quite a lot. You could probably disappear fairly well even in town if you kept to yourself. If he came here it could be difficult to find him, especially if he's in one of the outlying areas. There are a number of small groups of houses quite a long way away from the town as well, which makes it more difficult. I suppose we should probably start by circulating his details around the shops, banks, bars, that sort of thing. If he's here he needs to eat at least. After that, we can try going door to door, but it could take quite a while. We can't really pull everyone off other duties for this. I can probably round up about, oh, maybe fifteen or twenty people to start with."

"It's a start. With any luck we can track him down fairly quickly. I don't think he's very practised at being a fugitive, so he's quite possibly made mistakes. I hope he has, at any rate. We have a distinct deadline for finding the portal weapon, which is no more than ten days from now. The closer it gets the more nervous I am about it." The young woman looked worried. Sharon nodded with understanding.

"DS Taylor emailed me the photo you have of Geoffrey Young. I've printed a couple of dozen copies, so I think we should distribute them among the officers and have them take them on their rounds, just in case, then get people to start asking questions."

"We could split up and also ask around," Fumiko suggested. "Every person helps."

"Good idea. We'd better get started, then." Superintendent Weiss got up, taking one last look at the still frozen water bottle in the middle of the table, before shaking her head and opening the door.
Forty minutes later every free person in the station was equipped with a copy of the photo of Geoffrey Young and heading out into the town and beyond. The magical girls and Agent Naito, after some discussion with the Superintendent and Officer Graham, had decided to have Aiko teleport them to widely separated areas of the town and begin asking around, just in case they got lucky. Naito went with Mike, while the others went off on their own.

Walking slowly along the street they'd been assigned, the two men stopped at every house, knocking and asking the same question, 'Have you by any chance seen this young man?' The responses were mostly polite and invariably negative. Between houses they talked.

"How long have you been working with the girls?" Mike asked his companion curiously, as they stopped for a break in a rare patch of shade, wishing he'd thought to bring the icy-cold water bottle Azumi had produced. Naito wiped some sweat from his forehead, leaning against the building they were next to.

"Directly, since somewhere around early September last year, when all that terror cult stuff began. I knew of them before that, of course, although only as much as the PSIA knew which wasn't and isn't very much. As you found out they have very solid security and don't talk about themselves." He shrugged a little. "No one in our government is too worried about that, to be honest. It's generally felt that the magical girls deserve their privacy considering what they do for the country. Some very important people at the highest level of power let it be known some time ago that none of them should be interfered with. I'm not entirely sure why, but on the whole I agree with it." He laughed a little.

"I don't know who Yori and Chou know but I'm pretty sure they have some remarkably high-up friends for some reason. All the girls tend to be looked on as a valuable resource, but those two particularly are spoken of with true respect by some quite extraordinary people."

Mike nodded as they began walking again. "That's the impression I got during my research, certainly. I spoke to quite a few people directly, and through some contacts in my government, indirectly to people in yours. The overall response I got back was essentially, 'Be very polite, and believe anything they tell you.' There was a kind of proprietary pride coming through in the responses along with considerable respect and some unspoken warnings about what would happen if we upset them. Reading between the lines it seemed to suggest that it wasn't only the girls themselves we should worry about in that case." They stopped to show the photo to a passer-by with no useful result.

"I think it was probably the responses we got back from the Japanese government, and from where in that government those responses came, that convinced my own superiors as much as anything that all this was real. My own research just added to that. I was sceptical myself when I was assigned this work but it didn't take long to change my opinion." Shaking his head, he though back to everything he'd seen and heard. "That DVD I laid hands on is... incredible." Naito smiled.

"I know. I've seen it. I wish I could have seen it live. Perhaps one day." They walked in silence for a little while." Eventually he spoke again. "Despite the occasional moments of terror and a constant feeling of inadequacy, I consider myself very lucky to be associated with all those young ladies. They're amazing people, who are steadily becoming friends, even if a lot of their lives are a complete mystery to me. Because of them I've seen some truly astounding things and had my eyes opened to an entire world I never knew existed. I have a feeling that they're going to end up changing everything, given time, them and their friends."

He laughed again. "Mind you, I've had to write some extremely strange reports recently, even by the standards we've come to expect. Magic is something the PSIA is reasonably familiar with but the last few months have been a bit out of the ordinary even so." Mike chuckled.

"I can imagine. Some of the things I've read have been completely insane. It's like some sort of fantasy novel crossed with a detective story."

"That's not a bad way to put it, actually. Throw in some science fiction, and a little military action movie, and you'd come up with something close to what we've ended up doing a few times. Only not quite as mad." The Japanese agent wiped his brow again. "This is hot work. Do you mind if we stop at that shop over there and get something cold to drink?"

"Good idea." Mike checked the light traffic then headed across the street, Naito following. Entering the store they headed for the chilled drinks section, grabbing a few bottles of water, then went to the till. Paying for it, he unscrewed the cap and drained one bottle immediately, feeling instantly refreshed. The shopkeeper watched with amusement.

"Pretty hot for this time of year," he commented. Both men nodded, on their second bottles by now. When he'd quenched his thirst, Naito showed the man his copy of the photo. Inspecting it carefully, he shook his head. "Sorry, I can't say I've seen the fellow." He looked at them. "You two cops or something?"

"Something like that." Mike showed him his identification. Appearing impressed, the store keeper handed it back.

"Kid must have done something interesting to get the government looking for him."

"It's mostly information. We think he may know something relevant to a case we're working on. If you do remember anything, could you please call the main police station and ask for Superintendent Weiss?" The man nodded.

"Sure. But I'm pretty sure I've never seen him. Do you have a copy of that photo I could keep? I can show it to some of the regulars." Mike pulled out a spare copy and handed it to him. "Thanks." Dropping their empty bottles into the bin next to the till, the two men went on their way, leaving the storekeeper studying the photo with interest, before pinning it to the wall behind the counter.

"Nothing. No one seems to have seen Mr Young as far as we can tell," Sharon said with irritation, slumping at her desk. Yori and Chou sat down on the other side of the desk, looking mildly annoyed. They were the only ones back at this point. The search had gone all day with no hits, not even vague ones, which didn't please anyone.

"That's a nuisance," Chou said quietly, looking at the photo she was holding. "I do hope that we're at least looking in the right place. It would be very irritating if he'd never come here in the first place." Yori sighed heavily.

"Please don't say things like that, love. It's just depressing." Superintendent Weiss studied them both for a while.

"How long have you two been doing this, this, magical girl thing?" she asked in the end. Yori glanced up, then smiled a little.

"Quite a while. I still don't consider us magical girls, we're martial artists, but I seem to be fighting a losing battle insisting on it." Chou looked amused, while Sharon snickered. "It's been a few years. I was kind of involved in something pretty close to this for a long time, but all the running around after demons is a more recent development." She shrugged a bit. "It's fun and good exercise if nothing else, and you meet some very interesting people."
"I can imagine," Sharon said, chuckling. "I certainly have done and today was the first time I'd heard of it."

"I'm sorry if you found we shook your world view, Superintendent," Chou commented. Sharon glanced at her.

"Don't be. It's interesting and quite refreshing to have some of your preconceptions challenged. Certainly not what I expected when I got up this morning, I'll say that much, though." Chou laughed lightly. Both young women looked around at the door suddenly, Sharon following their gaze. A few seconds later Agent Naito and Officer Graham walked in, looking exhausted, followed by Aiko, who looked around for a moment then hurried out again.

"No luck?" Yori asked, in the tone of voice that said she already knew the answer. Both of them shook their heads.

"Nothing. We've left photos with several places, but so far no one seems to have seen him at all." Mike sat down with a thump, seeming both tired and annoyed. "We must have walked about fifteen kilometres and talked to more people than I can count. Did any of you have any luck?"

"Nope. Sorry, pretty much the same as you two. None of the others have found anything either from what I've heard."

"Damn. This is not going very well." Yori shrugged.

"Not ideally, but it would be a bit unusual if we'd just walked into town and found him in the first five minutes. We don't even know for sure he's been here."

"Yes, we do," Azumi said, as she entered with Aiko, both of them looking excited. Everyone turned and stared at her. "I just spoke to an old man in a little garage in Braitling, a bit to the north of here." Sharon nodded, producing a map from her desk drawer and unfolding it. Azumi looked at it then pointed. "About there. Apparently, something like six weeks ago he sold some beer and a spare tire to someone who looked very like our missing Mr Young, although he had a beard and seems to have dyed his hair brown. The old fellow was pretty convinced it was him, though. He didn't say much, but when he left he was in a hurry, heading north on the Stuart Highway. He made enquiries about camping, which the fellow I talked to thought was weird, since he didn't seem to have any camping equipment and no one really wants to camp in the desert anyway."

She moved to lean on an unused desk. "The old man thought that his car was making some very unfortunate noises and was likely to have a major problem in the near future. He suggested getting it fixed, but our fugitive was in too much of a hurry to stop. The guy said he wouldn't be surprised if he only got about another two or three hundred kilometres before it broke down. He seemed to know what he was talking about."

"There isn't much out there in that direction until you hit Tennant Creek, which is a good four hundred and fifty kilometres north of here. One or two little towns, a small airfield, some farms, that sort of thing. If he broke down very far from a town he could have gone days before anyone found him, which would probably be fatal unless he had a lot of water with him." Sharon was studying the map. She indicated a position along the highway in question. "Assuming the garage man was reasonably accurate, he'd be somewhere along here. Mind you, six weeks later either someone would have found him, or he's dead."

"It would be most unfortunate if he was dead," Chou said calmly. "For him, certainly, and for us as well. I suppose the best thing to do would be to try this town you mentioned and see if anyone there has seen him, and if not work our way back in this direction." She looked out the window at the side of the room. "How long until it gets dark?"

"About two hours," Sharon said, checking the time.

"It would be easier in the light," the blonde said, "So we should probably get on with it. Aiko, can you go and get the others, please?" With a nod the short brunette left. Soon everyone was back at the station, gathered in the same room they used earlier. After a short discussion the decision was made to teleport to Tennant Creek and begin their enquiries all over again. Mike groaned faintly. Glancing at him, Chou smiled. "I'm sorry, it's been a long day. We could go without you and Agent Naito if you'd like to rest." He shook his head.

"I'll be OK. I need a good strong coffee first, though." Aiko looked up, then smiled and vanished. Five minutes later she was back with a tray of disposable cups of coffee with the logo of a New York coffee shop on them. Handing them out she grinned.

"These guys do a very nice coffee." Mike looked at his cup in astonishment.

"Did you seriously just get coffee from New York?" She nodded, laughing a little.

"Of course. It's good."

"Good grief. You people are unbelievable." Sipping it, he nodded approvingly. "That said, this is very good coffee."

"Told you," she said, giggling. Sharon was watching with amazement. Glancing at Agent Naito she raised her eyebrows, causing him to chuckle.

"You'll get used to it." Yori burst out laughing, making him grin. Sipping his own coffee he nodded approvingly. Superintendent Weiss called the local police in Tennant Creek, telling them that they would be arriving shortly. When they had finished their drinks, they all got up. Aiko approached her.

"It will be pretty disorientating the first time," she said, giving the standard warning of nausea. The superintendent nodded.

"I understand." She braced herself, then nearly fell as the world shifted. Her stomach roiling, she staggered a little, feeling someone holding her steady until she felt better, which was surprisingly quickly. Once she was over the sensations, she thanked Aiko, who had been the one to grab her, then looked around. "Wow. That's amazing. We really are here, just like that." Aiko smiled.

"I know. I've been able to do this for years but it never gets boring." They were standing outside the fairly modest police station in the town, which was considerably smaller than Alice Springs. A couple of people were staring at them, having witnessed them appear out of thin air, but after a moment both of them shook their heads, dismissing it as impossible, then went about their business. Aiko looked after them as they walked off. "You'd be amazed how often that happens." Sharon and Mike headed inside with Yori, while the others waited outside in the evening sunlight. They came out a few minutes later with a man in his early forties, rather sun bleached and grizzled.

"This is Jack Creswick, Senior Sergeant here. He's an old friend." They all greeted him, while he looked around at the group, somewhat puzzled.

"So you're looking for this Geoffrey Young chap, Sharon?" he asked, inspecting the photo she'd handed him.

"Yes. I don't suppose you've seen or heard of him?" The man shook his head slowly with a thoughtful look on his face.

"No, I don't think I have. Mind you, I do recall hearing that a few weeks ago there was a car found about sixty k south of here with a knackered engine. Just dumped by the side of the road. No sign of the occupant, although there were some personal belongings in it. One of the road train drivers had spotted it and mentioned it when he pulled in to refuel. I was on leave at the time but one of our lads went and had a look. No sign of foul play from what I can remember, but I don't know much more about it. I'll see if I can find out some more for you." He went back inside, returning some five minutes later with a younger man.

"This is Constable McClure. He was the one who went to check on the car. Jason, tell them about what you found." The young blonde man stopped staring at all the foreign women with a start, making several of them grin, then nodded.

"We got a report of an abandoned vehicle five and a half weeks ago. I drove out to have a look. It was an old Holden in pretty bad shape. From what I could see the engine oil had leaked, the engine was seized solid. It had probably been there about two days. There were some clothes, a little cash, and a small amount of marijuana in it, along with a few other items. No identification, and the plates and VIN number were missing. It looked like someone had dumped it there. I arranged to have it towed back so we could trace the owner, but so far we haven't had any luck."

"Is the vehicle still here?" Chou asked curiously. He nodded.

"I think so. It was being kept at a garage on the other side of town. As far as I know it's still there. No one reported it missing, there was no report of a missing person either, so to be honest it's pretty low priority. I didn't see any signs of foul play or anything like that, it looked like the car had simply broken down and been dumped. The missing plates and the like was a little odd, but sometimes people do that so we can't chase them up and fine them for littering." He smiled a little. "We do try to find them, but it can take a while."

"Do you mind if we have a look at it?" Yori asked. Both policemen shook their heads.

"Help yourself," Jack replied. "Jason, go and get the file on it, will you?" The younger man nodded and went back inside, reappearing shortly with a folder in his hand. He gave it to Yori.

"This is the report I filed on the car. Not much in it, I'm afraid." She flipped through it, then handed it to Azumi, who also read the contents before returning it to the constable.

"Have you seen this man?" she asked, holding out the photo of Geoff Young. "He may have a beard and brown hair now." Constable McClure looked carefully at the photo, then shook his head. "No, sorry, never seen him before. Is that the driver of the vehicle?"

"We think so, but we won't know until we see it," Yori told him. She looked at the others. "I'll take Azumi and Agent Naito and go have a look at this car, you other guys may as well start asking around just in case someone has seen him. Maybe he got picked up by another vehicle. We might get lucky." The girls all nodded. Aiko moved over to Yori and Azumi as Naito joined them, then the little group disappeared in a flash of rainbow light. Constable McClure gaped while Senior Sergeant Creswick stared, then laughed.

"There's some story you have to tell me, Sharon," he said, turning to his friend. She grinned.

Agent Naito looked at the battered car the garage owner had directed them to, then at the folder of information he had been given by DS Taylor before they left Sydney. "It's the right make, model, and colour, according to this," he said, bending slightly to peer under the vehicle. "I think it might have hit a rock or something like that and cracked the sump, that would explain the leak." Yori looked at him, then easily lifted the vehicle onto it's side, inspecting the underside of the engine. She nodded.

"Yep. Look, you can see the marks here. He must have been going pretty fast and ran over something." Lowering the thing to the ground she looked up to see Azumi staring out from inside the car, with a frown on her face.

"Could you warn me before you do that?" the silver haired girl said with an edge to her voice. Yori nodded, grinning.

"Sorry."

"Twit," Azumi muttered, going back to poking around inside the vehicle. Naito chuckled to himself, once more amused by the antics of these remarkable people. For such powerful individuals, they acted amazingly normally. He found it refreshing.

"I'm fairly sure this is his car," Yori said, "there are traces of several different types of magical energy in the rear. I'd guess he used it to store or transport some of his artefacts." Azumi opened the door and got out.

"Nothing I can find inside to give any clues to his whereabouts," she said emotionlessly. Naito sighed.

"Another dead end."

"Not quite. It's his vehicle, I'm more or less sure, which means we're still on his trail. To be honest it's going better than I feared. Hopefully we can find someone in town who has some idea about what happened to him. It's a pretty small place, there can't be more than two or three thousand people here, I suspect that if he did come through we'll be able to find someone who met him. We haven't got a lot of options, anyway."

"I know. Still, it's annoying."

"That it is," She sighed. "Oh well. Back to the others, then, and we can ask around some more." Aiko appeared next to them seconds later.

"That's good timing," Naito commented, which seemed to amuse her and Yori equally. "Have any of the others found anything yet?" The brunette shook her head.

"That's good timing," Naito commented, which seemed to amuse her and Yori equally. "Have any of the others found anything yet?" The brunette shook her head.

"No, sorry. Everyone is all over town and a couple of the local cops are also asking around, but so far nothing." Abruptly arriving back at the police station, where Superintendent Weiss was speaking to Sergeant Creswick, they walked over.

"It's almost certainly the right vehicle, Superintendent," Yori told her. "So there's a chance we can find someone who knows something. He might have been picked up by someone from here, or who was going through here. I suppose he could also have been picked up by someone going in the other direction, or just wandered off and fallen over, but I hope not."

"There's also the possibility he got involved in something unpleasant," the superintendent replied, frowning slightly. "My information is that he had a considerable sum of money with him. If some random passer-by happened to find out about that, well, out here where there aren't a lot of people for hundreds of kilometres, it's a good place to lose a body." Yori scowled.
"I know. I have to admit the same thought occurred to me. I think Azumi and I should go and check out the place the car was found, just in case. It shouldn't take long." She looked at Aiko, who nodded, then the three of them vanished again. Agent Naito sat on a nearby low wall, wiping his brow.

"Wow. Those girls have more stamina than anyone I know," he said, glancing at Sharon. She smiled a little.

"Long day, Agent?"

"It usually is when they're involved." He grinned. "But it's always interesting." She laughed.

"I can imagine." Shaking her head she walked over to stand beside him, the sergeant following and listening with interest. "I'm still having a little trouble with this, not least because everyone seems to take such extraordinary things so much for granted."

Naito nodded understandingly. "I'm not surprised. That's a pretty common reaction to people who meet them for the first time. It can be a bit much. The six, or seven now that Azumi is around, of them do tend to make you reassess everything you thought you knew about how the world works. But I have to admit they'd a damn good cure for boredom!"

"That Azumi girl isn't someone I'd like angry with me," Sharon said, leaning on the wall he was sitting on.

"None of them are, trust me. They're all remarkably good natured and fun to be around, but when they go into combat mode..." He shivered a little. "I've seen it. Yori is probably the scariest, most deadly person I've ever heard of when she's like that. I don't think anything would stop her if she decided to go all out, except being killed, which would take something pretty damn unusual. And even then I'm not so sure she wouldn't come back." He snickered. "She'd be absolutely furious by that point!"

"It's surprising to me that your government allows these girls to just wander around if they're that dangerous," Superintendent Weiss said, raising her eyebrows. He shrugged.

"It's not like we could really stop them. But aside from that, they are genuinely liked, some of them loved, by the communities they serve. And yes, it really is a matter of serving the community. All the girls, even the more destructive ones, put themselves in the way of considerable danger voluntarily on a daily basis to protect people, with no pay and no real reason to do it aside from the fact they feel it's the right thing to do. People back home deeply respect that. It strikes the right note both from a cultural viewpoint and a personal one. Yori and Chou particularly have made a huge difference to the lives of many, many people in their community. That's gained them a hell of a lot of respect and admiration, right the way up to the highest echelons of government." Naito looked at his watch, then turned back to the superintendent who was listening with interest.

"Basically they're considered a national asset now. All of them really. This little group is right at the top of the list. They're directly responsible just in the last few months for saving the lives of countless people, possibly thousands, all around the world, and shutting down a cult that could possibly have killed millions."

He shrugged. "That gets them practically anything they could want. The funny thing is that I don't think they even realise it, or to be honest, care very much. That's not why they do it."

"Impressive. They certainly seem like nice people, I have to admit. Well spoken and educated, although in some very odd areas." Sharon laughed a little. "Areas I'd have sworn yesterday were complete fantasy."
"They are nice people. Ones you can count on if you're in trouble." Naito grinned. "If I was needing medical care I know who I'd want as my doctors." She looked intrigued.

"Medical skills as well as everything else?"

"Oh, you wouldn't believe the things that lot can do. Aiko bounces around all over the planet as if she was crossing the room. Yori and Chou can heal basically anything from what I've seen, never mind having better and more impressive fighting skills than anyone I've ever heard of. Azumi... I'm not sure about her, but I have a very strong feeling that she may be one of the most intelligent people I've ever met. Her friend Ms Aoyama gives me the creeps, but even she is a remarkable intelligence operative. Misaki and the others are kind of a mix, exceptional fighting ability with intelligence and a lot of common sense. Yori is training all of them, so I expect that eventually they'll all be something even more remarkable than they are now. Plus, they're just generally nice people to be around, even though they have a weird sense of humour."

"Real superheroes, by the sound of it." Weiss looked interested. He shook his head a little.

"Not like you might be thinking, not like the comics. They don't go out of their way to stand out, they don't much even like publicity. Most of them, at any rate. There are a couple of groups back in Minato that do stick out, a tendency to show off and make stupid speeches. It drives Yori nuts from what I can tell." They both laughed. "Basically most of the time they're just normal, nice people, the sort you enjoy talking to. But when it really counts, you've got something on your side that would make anyone with a brain think very hard about starting trouble."

"Can I keep some of them?" Weiss joked. He stared at her, then nearly laughed his head off. When he recovered, he replied, "Funny, the authorities in other countries are normally fairly relieved when they go and everything goes back to something approaching normal." She shrugged, grinning.

"I'm more open-minded, and out here we could use all the help we could get." Sergeant Creswick chuckled from where he was listening, but before he could say anything Yori, Azumi, and Aiko reappeared a couple of metres away. The three already there turned to them.

"Nothing," Yori said, looking both annoyed and relieved. "We scanned the area for a kilometre or so all around where the vehicle was, but aside from a small amount of litter and some kangaroos there was no trace of anything interesting." She grumbled to herself for a moment under her breath. "I guess we just keep asking around."

"Nothing else to do," Superintendent Weiss said with a sigh. "Although it will be dark in a little while. How long do you want to keep at it?"

"I'd like to keep going until we find him, but you're right. Let's say, another hour, then we give up until tomorrow." Yori glanced at Aiko and Azumi, who nodded and vanished. Shortly the brunette reappeared. "Coming with me, Agent, Superintendent? Or would you prefer to go separately?" She looked at them enquiringly.

"We should go separately, I think, to cover as much ground as possible." Sharon looked at Naito, who nodded agreement.

"I'll make my own enquiries," Sergeant Creswick said, "I know a few people who might be able to help."

"OK. That sounds like a plan." Shortly, Aiko had transported them all to the relevant areas Evie looked away from the customer she was arguing with at the sound of the door opening, to see a Japanese woman of about twenty or so, wearing dark blue silk clothing and leather boots, enter the café. The woman was fairly tall and looked very fit, radiating an air of competence, like a police officer, but different somehow. The sound of a fist slamming down on the table drew her attention back to the man in front of her and caused her to sigh. "Ben, stop hitting the table, you're causing a fuss. Now, please just pay the bill and go, I've had enough."

The short wide figure of Ben Hodel reddened considerably, visible despite his sun-darkened visage. He huffed a little, pushing himself to his feet. "Damn it, Evie, all I want is one date! You're always flirting, leading me on, but you turn me down every time." She sighed again, not wanting to go into this in front of other people.

"I'm not flirting, I'm just being friendly. I'm sorry if it came across as anything else." He glared at her. "Look, to be brutally honest I'm not interested in you, sorry. Right now I'm not really interested in anyone, not after last time, and you're not my type anyway. So can we please just stop talking about this?" She pushed the bill across the table to him yet again. "Just stop embarrassing yourself, pay up, and go home. You'll feel better in the morning." She didn't mention the four beers he'd had, although the implication was there. Ben took a step forward, gritting his teeth, making her step back cautiously. The half-dozen other customers watched the little drama with rapt attention, one or two of them ready to step in. Ben was well known to have a short fuse.

"Bitch. You're all alike, leading people on then refusing to put out," he muttered to himself, just loudly enough for her to hear. She flushed angrily.

"Right. That's it. Get out and don't come back, I don't want you in here again if that's your attitude." Evie snatched up the slip of paper and ripped it up. "Consider our debt settled." He stared for a moment, going dark with rage. Two regulars also stood, as he fumed, then lashed out at her. The two men dived forward but stopped when Ben suddenly found himself with his arm twisted painfully behind his back and his face on the table he was standing beside. It happened so fast everyone had to think about what actually took place.

Evie stared in shock. The girl who'd entered, who had been at least five metres away, was now holding Ben firmly down with no signs of effort at all, an expression of mild interest on her face. She'd moved so fast no one had even seen it as anything other than a blur. Bending over the man she said politely, "That wasn't very nice or very smart. If I let you go will you leave quietly?" He struggled violently for a moment making the table shake and everything on it rattle, to absolutely no effect.

"Let go of me, bitch!" he yelled. She sighed.

"You're really not very cooperative, are you?" the girl said quietly. After a moment, she reached out with her other hand and carefully poked a couple of places along his spine. He went limp so suddenly she had to grab him. "Hmm. That works remarkably well," Evie heard her mumble, as she rolled Ben over and picked him up. Carrying him outside she gently lowered him to the ground, leaning him against the side of the building, then came back inside. Evie had followed out of shocked curiosity and had to move out of the way. The girl looked around. Half a dozen or so startled faces met her gaze. Smiling slightly she nodded to them all, then turned to the owner.

"I'm sorry about that. I hope I wasn't interrupting anything important, but he looked like he was about to do something neither one of you would enjoy." The woman stared at her for a moment, then smiled back.

"No, I think a good sleep will be what he needs." She sighed, glancing out the door at the comatose figure of the farmer. "He's not a bad person, really, but his attitude to women isn't good and he's a nasty drunk. That's why his wife left him in the first place." Returning her gaze to the young woman she held out her hand. "Evie Porcelli. Welcome to Evie's." The visitor grinned.

"Misaki. Thanks." Leading the way back to the counter Evie looked at Misaki, who was inspecting a chilled display cabinet with a number of desserts in it, an expression of interest on her face.

"Would you like a slice of pie, Misaki?" The girl grinned again.

"Yes, please. Can I have some of that cherry one?" Shortly she was sitting down with a large slice of pie, topped with ice cream, eating it with enthusiasm and appreciation. Evie went off to serve her other customers, who were talking about what they'd witnessed, then returned to the young woman who had so easily dealt with Ben.

"So, are you new in town?" she asked, sitting down on the other side of the table. Misaki shook her head, chewing, then swallowed.

"Not quite. We're just passing through, myself and some friends." She ate another bite of pie. "We're consultants to the government, here from Japan on a case. We're looking for someone." A photograph was suddenly in the hand she wasn't holding the fork with, making Evie stare in surprise. "I don't suppose you've seen this guy?" Taking the photo Evie looked carefully at it. It looked very vaguely familiar, causing her to think hard.

"Um." Misaki looked up, slight surprise and some hope in her expression. "Perhaps." She kept looking at the photo.

"That's it. I remember now. I'm pretty sure it was this guy. He came through about, oh, a little over five weeks ago or so. He was with a truck driver who stops in occasionally on the way through. I think he'd had car trouble quite a way down the road or something like that. The trucker called him Matt. He looked nervous, like he thought someone was after him." Looking up she smiled at Misaki. "I guess someone is."

"Several someones, I'm afraid. He should hope that we get to him first." Misaki finished her pie, then glanced around, returning her attention to Evie.

"What did he do?" she asked curiously.

"Mostly he seems to have managed to involve himself in something he should have stayed out of. We need some information he has." The young woman looked quite pleased. "I don't suppose you might have any idea where he is now, do you?" She shook her head.

"Sorry, no. He and Vince, the trucker, left after getting something to eat. Vince has been back a couple of times but this Matt fellow wasn't with him. I didn't ask what happened to him, to be honest I didn't think much about it." She looked up, waving to a man on the other side of the café.
"Hey, Logan! Come over here for a moment, will you?" The dark-skinned man looked up, then stood and made his way over to them.

"Misaki, this is Logan, he's another truck driver. Logan, any idea when Vince is coming through again? He's a friend of yours." Logan smiled slightly.

"Kind of a friend. He's a little difficult to really like. He should be back in town tomorrow sometime, I think. He's coming down from Darwin, going to Adelaide, as far as I know."

"Do you have any idea where he might stop for the night?" Misaki asked. He shook his head, grinning.

"He might not. He's fond of uppers, it makes him twitchy, but keeps him going for days sometimes. Other times he'll just pull over somewhere and have a nap. Last time I saw him was about a week ago, he gave me a rough idea of his schedule, but other than that I couldn't tell you where he is. Somewhere between Darwin and here, which is a hell of a long way."

Misaki nodded her understanding. "Thanks. That helps a lot. What's Vince's last name, by the way?"

"Dacey," both Evie and Logan said at the same time, then grinned at each other. Misaki giggled.

"Thank you both." Another Japanese girl, a short brunette entered the café, walking over to them. "This is my ride, Aiko. Aiko, this is Evie and Logan."

The new girl smiled at them. "Nice to meet you. Thanks for the information."

Misaki stood, glancing at her plate. "How much do I owe you?" she asked. Evie waved her hand. "Forget it. Thanks for dealing with Ben." Looking out the door into the gloom she asked curiously, "What did you do to him, anyway? How long will he be asleep?"

"It was a pressure point technique I learned recently. He'll be out for a couple of hours." Misaki looked amused.

"Damned impressive," Logan remarked, grinning at her. She returned the grin.

"Thanks. Right, we'd better get going." Both girls left the café. Seconds later there was a brilliant flash of light that lit the room, causing everyone to go and look out the window, but nothing could be seen.

"Vince Dacey, forty five years old, a few minor charges, mainly narcotics possession and driving under the influence, with a couple of speeding tickets," Sergeant Creswick said, looking at the screen of his computer. "Nothing very serious and nothing recently. I seem to recall the guy, tall and skinny, dark hair. Always wears blue, for some reason. We'll put out a bulletin on him and his truck, we might get lucky and find him if he happens to go past a patrol car or stop somewhere, but in all likelihood our best bet is to wait for him to get here. Assuming your information is accurate that should be sometime tomorrow." He glanced at Misaki, who nodded.

Yori sighed a little. "Getting closer, but more waiting. This is really irritating." Chou put her hand on her partner's shoulder, smiling serenely.

"We have no choice. The area is too big to do anything else but wait. Don't worry, we're closing in. Hopefully he will arrive quite early." Looking at Creswick she asked, "I assume you will stop him and hold him when he arrives?" The sergeant nodded.

"Of course. I'll let Sharon know as soon as we have him."

"Thank you." The blonde woman looked around at the other members of her group. "I think we should take Superintendent Weiss back to Alice Springs then return to Sydney. We all need something to eat, and poor Agent Naito and Officer Graham look dead on their feet." Everyone turned to study the two men, who did indeed look ready to fall over.

"Sounds like a good idea," Fumiko said. She nudged Naito, who had nearly fallen asleep, causing him to jerk awake with a muttered exclamation. The girl grinned at him.

Mike handed both Superintendent Weiss and Sergeant Creswick a card. "I can be reached on this number any time, day or night. Call as soon as you know anything." They both nodded. Leaving the police station, Sharon shook hands with her old friend.

"See you soon, Jack," she said, then walked over to the others. He closed his eyes, having witnessed the teleportation flash several times now and knowing what to expect. When he opened them again the group was gone. Shaking his head in wonder he went back inside to finish his shift.

Vince looked in the rear-view mirror, frowning at the flashing lights of the police car behind him. Quickly checking his speedometer he shrugged. He was at the limit, so it wasn't that. Relieved that he'd used the last of his amphetamines a few days ago, he was sure as a result that there was nothing in the vehicle that the police could have problems with. Indicating left he pulled over as soon as he found a safe place to do so, rolling the window down and leaning out as the police car pulled in just in front of him. "Hey, Dean," he greeted the constable who got out, recognising him.

"What's up?"

"Hi, Vince," Constable Bardon said as he approached. "Don't worry, it's nothing serious. The police in Tennant Creek want to talk to you, something about a hitch-hiker you picked up a few weeks ago. Can you make sure you stop by the station there as soon as you arrive, please?"

Puzzled, Vince nodded. He wasn't entirely fond of the police but they weren't too bad if you were polite. He'd done nothing illegal that he was aware of lately so it didn't seem likely that this was going to cause him any problems.

"Is everyone out looking for me?" he asked, curious and slightly amused. Bardon laughed.

"More or less. They seem pretty concerned about this guy, whoever he is. Things would be a lot easier if you had a phone, or even a radio. You're a trucker, for god's sake! Don't you all use CBs?"

Vince snickered.

"That's very eighties. I've got a UHF radio for emergencies, but the whole point of this job is that I don't have to talk to people for a lot of the time. I like my solitude. What would I want a phone for? It wouldn't work most places I drive anyway." The constable grinned, then walked back to his car, waving to Vince. Turning his lights off he pulled out, turned around, and went back the way he'd come. Vince put the truck in gear, slowly pulling out and resuming his drive, looking out at the early dawn morning. He'd be in Tennant Creek in an hour or so, perhaps then he'd find out what this was all about.

Mike woke to the sound of his cell-phone buzzing at him from beside the bed. Reaching out he fumbled for it, finally picking it up and pressing the call accept button by feel. The phone disappeared back under his pillow where his head was. "Hello?" he mumbled into it.
"It's Superintendent Weiss. Jack Creswick just let me know that this Vince Dacey will be arriving in Tennant Creek in about twenty minutes or so. A constable from a town further north spotted him an hour ago heading south and intercepted him, passing on the message we wanted to talk." More awake, Mike rolled over, removing the pillow and dislodging the cat, which was sleeping on his back. Annoyed, it meowed, then wandered off to find something warm and less mobile to sleep on.

"OK. I'll contact Agent Naito. We should be with you in about a quarter of an hour or so, I think."

"I still find that remarkable," Weiss laughed, "You're nearly three thousand kilometres away, yet you'll be here in fifteen minutes." Mike snickered.

"I know. It's nuts. Especially since most of that is just getting up and getting dressed."

"See you soon." She hung up, still laughing. Getting up he hunted for some clothes while calling the Japanese security services agent, passing on the details, then headed for the bathroom. By the time the knock on his door came he was dressed, shaved, and had fed the cat. Opening it he smiled at the eight people outside.

"Hi. Shall we go?" Joining them the entire group disappeared. The cat peered curiously out the window at the place they'd been, then got distracted by a bird.

When they arrived in Tenant Creek with Superintendent Weiss, they found a large truck parked outside the police station, covered with dust and still making little creaking noises as it's engine cooled, having obviously just stopped. They trooped inside to discover Sergeant Creswick talking to a tall thin man who was, as advertised, dressed entirely in shades of blue. He turned and looked at them, inspecting them curiously. "These are the people who'd like to talk to you, Vince," the sergeant said.

"All of them?" Vince asked, sounding both amused and puzzled. "We may need a larger room." Yori grinned as Chou giggled. The black-haired woman glanced at her friends, who nodded and left again. Agent Naito and Mike exchanged looks, it was weird the way they'd all done that without anyone saying anything.

"How's this?" Yori asked, pulling out a chair next to the sergeant's desk, where he and the trucker were sitting.

"Better. I don't like large groups of people, I'll admit. It's why I spend so much time on the road." Vince smiled slightly. "That and the money is pretty good." He studied the young woman, then her colleagues. Mike leaned against the next desk along and showed him his ID.

"Hmm. The ASIO? I've heard of you lot but never met anyone from there. Are you all government spooks?" Vince grinned, as did Yori.

She shook her head. "He's a spook," she replied, pointing at Agent Naito, who looked slightly surprised then smiled, "and so is Mike. We're consultants." Chou gave her a look.

"You seem to like that term," she said quietly, but with amusement. Yori laughed.

"It fits." Looking back to Vince she produced the photo, making him look at her oddly, then handed it to him. After a moment he took it and looked at it carefully. "We're trying to trace this man. His name is Geoffrey Young, but from what we learned he may be going by the name of Matt, and his hair is brown now, with a beard as well. Do you recall him?" Vince nodded.

"Yes, I do. I picked him up around five or six weeks ago about eighty kilometres south of here, toward Alice Springs. His car had died on him. Completely seized, there was no chance of fixing He'd been there for hours when I came along and was getting desperate. Drank half my water in about five minutes. You're right, he said his name was Matt. Um, Matt Corbin, I think. Superintendent Weiss was making notes, as was Agent Naito. Yori nodded, looking satisfied.

"Good. Now, the important thing. We need to find him, urgently. Do you have any idea where he is now? Where did you take him? Did he say anything about his plans?" Vince thought for a moment.

"He said he was heading to Darwin, but I don't think that's true. He seemed very nervous, other than the whole running out of water and nearly dying part of it. Before we left, he took most of the stuff out of his car, then he took the plates off as well and put them in his backpack, which I thought was a little strange. I think he might have removed the VIN plate as well, it seemed to be missing and it looked recent. To me he looked terrified, really, like he was running." He shrugged. "None of my business, the guy didn't seem dangerous which is why I picked him up. If he'd started anything, well, I was pretty sure my machete would have sorted it out." Yori nodded again. Everyone was listening carefully.

"I told him I could take him all the way to Darwin if he wanted. In the end, though, I dropped him off in Elliott. He said he had relatives there, but I'm not sure that was true. It seemed more like a spur of the moment decision." Yori glanced at Superintendent Weiss, who nodded.

"Elliott is a tiny town about two hundred and fifty kilometres north of here. I don't think more than maybe five hundred, maybe six hundred people live there. Most of them are Aborigines, so I'd think a new white face would be fairly memorable. I think there's a caravan park and a few amenities like that there."

"Good. That's certainly helping narrow it down. If he's still there, we should be able to find him. If he's not, perhaps someone knows where he went." Yori looked pleased, smiling a little. She looked back to Vince, who was listening with interest. "Thank you, Vince. It's been a great help."

"You're welcome. Is that all you need?" The young woman grinned.

"Pretty much." Standing, she looked at her colleagues. "Off to Elliott, and hopefully one step closer to Mr Young. I hope it's the last step, we're running out of time." Heading out the door she was followed by the others. Aiko, standing under a tree in the shade, looked up as she came out of the police station, then walked over. The other four young women appeared seconds later from various places around the area, gathering near Vince's truck. He studied them again with interest, before climbing up into the cab. Rolling down the window he leaned out.

"Good luck," he said, starting the engine. With a wave he put the vehicle in gear and slowly moved off. They watched him go, then gathered together. Shaking Sergeant Creswick's hand Sharon smiled at him.

"Thanks for the help, Jack. It's been nice seeing you again."

"You too, Sharon. Next time you come through we should go out for a meal." He looked around at the others. Mike shook his hand as well, followed by Yori and Agent Naito. "I hope you find your man. Let me know what happens, will you, Sharon?" The superintendent nodded.

"Of course." A few seconds later they teleported away.

Adam looked up as someone entered the small police station. He examined the middle-aged woman in an NT police uniform, snapping to attention when he noticed her rank. "Superintendent! What can I do for you?"
"Calm down, Constable, you'll pop something." Superintendent Weiss smiled at the young man. "You are?"

"Constable Adam Wang, ma'am."

"All right, Constable Wang. This is Officer Graham from the ASIO, who is looking for a man he believes has some very important information critical to national security. Agent Naito here is from the PSIA in Japan, he and Yori next to him are aiding the ASIO as it's an international case that started there." She put a photo of Geoffrey Young on the desk. "This is the man we're looking for. His name is Geoffrey Young, but we believe he's going under the alias of Matt Corbin. He has brown hair and a beard now, we think. A trucker dropped him off here between five and six weeks ago. Have you seen him?" The constable looked at the photo carefully, then shook his head.

"No, I'm afraid I haven't." He turned and shouted back to the rear of the small police station, "Hey, Koby. Come here a minute." Another man stuck his head around the door, holding a mug of tea in his hand, visibly wondering what the excitement was about. When he spotted the visitors he came into the room, stopping next to his colleague. "Seen this guy?" Wang asked, handing him the photo. "Sometime around five weeks or so ago, brown hair and a beard at the time." Koby sipped his tea while studying the photo, then nodded.

"Yep. Reckon that's the bloke that old Nate rented a trailer to out on his farm. Couple of people at the pub were talking about it a few days ago. Young bloke, doesn't go out much, just comes into town every now and then to buy supplies. I saw him once, maybe twice, about two weeks ago." Sharon glanced at Yori, who looked very interested.

"Can you tell us where this farm is?" she asked politely, yet with a certain amount of excitement.

"Sure. It's about twenty kilometres south, off to the east from the Stuart Highway a few kilometres." He pulled a map from under the counter, unfolding it on top. "Here, more or less. You go down this track, it's pretty rough, but it will get you there." Yori studied it for a moment.

"Thank you. Do you have any idea whether he's still there?" Koby shrugged, drinking some more tea.

"Should be. From what I know he hasn't left, and he never comes into town during the week." The young blond man looked at the four people on the other side of the counter curiously. "What's he done?" he asked.

"Nothing very much," Officer Graham responded, "except come into some very important information. More by accident than anything else. We need that information, so we need to talk to Mr Young."

"OK. Well, if he's around anywhere that's where he'll be." The constable folded the map up and put it away, he and his colleague watching as the four visitors left the station.

Standing around outside the rest of the group was waiting for them. Aiko looked at Yori. "How do you want to play this?" The black-haired woman thought for a moment.

"I think that the best approach is to stay back out of sight and just a couple of us go in to talk to him. He's likely to run for it if he sees a lot of people turn up at once, by the sound of it he's very paranoid. Not stupid, either, he's managed to hide pretty damn well. Most people would have taken a lot longer to find him than we did, and it took us longer than I like. I'll go in with Mike, I think, the rest of you stay back unless something weird happens." They all nodded. Chou studied her partner for a moment.
"I think it might be a good idea to put a ward around the trailer, just in case. It will stop him running."

"Good idea. Very good idea, in fact. Let's do that." Yori nodded, smiling. "Right, let's go." Several people who had stopped to watch the unusual-looking gathering of people found themselves blinking violently in the after-effect of the teleport flash. Constable Wang came out to look around, wondering what it had been, before shrugging and going back inside.

The knock on the door made Matt Corbin AKA Geoffrey Young jump violently, dropping his bowl of cereal on the floor. He made no move to pick it up, instead staring fixedly at the door, before slowly crouching down and shuffling as silently as he could into the second room of the small trailer he'd been living in for the last month and a half. "Oh, fuck," he said very, very quietly, shaking with fear. "How did they find me?" Looking frantically around the room he tried to come up with an escape plan, wishing desperately that he had a weapon, and more to the point knew how to use it. Cautiously he looked out the window at the back of the trailer, seeing nothing but empty land with only the couple of weathered buildings that constituted the entirety of the farm whose owner had rented him this place. Looking out the other window showed nothing useful either, as he couldn't see the door from it. He was slightly puzzled to see no signs of a car, wondering how his pursuers had got here. He hadn't heard one now that he thought about it.

The knock came again. "Mr Young? I know you're in there. I only want to talk to you, I mean you no harm." The voice was female with a trace of an accent, probably Japanese or Korean. He shivered again, looking around and finally grabbing an old bent crowbar that had been the near-derelict trailer when he'd moved in. It wasn't much but against a woman it might be enough. Standing, making as little noise as he could manage, he pressed himself against the wall behind the door into the other room.

"Mr Young? I'm going to open the door and come in. Please don't do anything silly." The door clicked as it unlocked, then creaked as the woman on the other side pushed it open. He wondered how she'd unlocked it. There was a short pause, then her voice came from right outside the room he was in. "I'm coming in now." He twitched a little, he hadn't heard a sound to indicate she was moving across the trailer, which creaked annoyingly at every motion whenever he walked around. Breathing shallowly, trying not to panic any more than he was at the moment, Geoff raised the crowbar and waited, seeing a quite petite woman with extremely long, extremely black braided hair with a blue highlight walk into the room.

With a sudden motion he swung the crowbar at her head, stunned at what he was doing even as he did it. He was even more stunned when the woman raised a hand without even looking at him, catching the crowbar and halting it's downward trajectory as suddenly as if he'd hit an anvil with it. "Fucking hell!" he shouted in pain, letting go and clasping his hands together to try and massage the ache away. She turned and looked at him, smiling slightly.

"Do you greet all your guests like that?" she asked, amusement in her rich voice. He glared.

"Go on, then. You've found me, you may as well kill me. I told you, I sold the stuff months ago. I don't have it, I've got no way to get it back, so you're wasting your time." She raised an eyebrow. "You seem to be working on the wrong understanding. I'm not here to kill you, or hurt you at all. I just need to know who you sold the collection too. A name and an address, then I'll go." It was his turn to look sceptical.

"That's it?" She nodded. "Why should I believe you?"
"Mr Young, if I wanted you dead you'd never even have known I was there. I only need to find the purchaser of the collection you sold. It included something very dangerous, something I need to find and destroy before a very unfortunate event takes place." She looked at him, seeing that he didn't believe her. "We got off on the wrong foot. My name is Yori. I'm acting as a consultant for your government in association with the PSIA in Japan and your ASIO here. Outside is Officer Graham of the ASIO. He can show you official ID to verify what I'm saying. Come and talk to him." Geoff was still unconvinced.

Yori sighed a little. "You collect magical things, correct?"

He stared at her for a moment. "Almost no one believes me when I tell them that. No one believes in magic." She grinned.

"I don't believe in it, I just use it." He looked hard at her.

"You're saying you're some sort of mage? I've heard of them but never met one."

"I'm not a mage. I'm... something else." She studied him for a moment. "Watch." Holding the crowbar she was still holding up in front of him, she quickly tied it into a neat knot, accompanied by the sound of overstressed metal. He gaped.

"Oh... my... How did you do that?" She laughed.

"I'm insanely strong, for a start. Here, it's real." She handed him the knotted steel bar, which he gingerly took. There was no denying the fact it was the same crowbar he'd tried to hit her with. The whole thing was warm, the knot in it was smoking hot from the stress of being bent like rubber.

"Holy shit," he breathed, staring at it. The young woman chuckled.

"I can do things a lot better than that, it's not really magic at all. Just the end result of a lifetime of martial arts and special techniques." Studying him for a moment, she made a slight motion, ending up holding a hollow crystal globe he recognised.

"Hey, I had a crystal ball just like that one." Yori looked at it, then snickered.

"It's not a crystal ball. It's a battery."

"A battery?" He wasn't convinced. She handed it to him. Holding it up to the light he studied it. The thing looked identical to the one he'd left in the old bunker armoury when he'd run after all this insanity had happened. Reaching out with one finger she touched the ball, making him twitch and nearly drop it as it filled with gently glowing purple mist, which produced a tingling sensation in his hand. "Fuck! What's that?"

"Magic. Magical energy, basically. These store it so it can be used to power spells." He gaped at the glowing ball in his hand. "So, do you believe I know what I'm talking about?" she asked after a few seconds. He nodded, still staring at the ball. Gently lifting it from his hand she made it vanish. "Come outside. You're safe, there's no one out there who wants to hurt you. We just want to talk."

Stepping to the side she indicated the door. He stared at her for a long moment, then sighed, leaving the room. At the front door, he took a deep breath, then stepped out of the trailer, wincing a little as he subconsciously expected to hear a shot. Nothing happened.

Standing outside was a tall blond man who looked him up and down, then held out his hand.

"Geoffrey Young? I'm Officer Graham from the ASIO. Call me Mike." Once he'd shaken hands he held out a very official looking ID. Geoff looked at it carefully. It certainly looked real. "You can calm down. We're not here for anything other than to talk. When we're finished you can go back to...,” he looked at the tired old trailer with a raised eyebrow, "whatever it is you're doing. Although I'd suggest you might want to find somewhere a little more up-market." Studying the man carefully, Geoff finally sighed and nodded. It wasn't like he could get away, although he did glance around wondering briefly if he should make a run for it. Yori noticed and snickered.

"I'd suggest you don't try running. You wouldn't get very far."

"I suppose you'd shoot me or something?" he asked, depressed but curious. She smiled.

"Nothing so dramatic. You just wouldn't get very far. Look." Bending down she picked up a fist-sized rock and whipped it hard away from the trailer. It travelled no more than ten metres before hitting something invisible and exploding into fragments. A brief golden glow was visible in a half-metre circle around where it had stopped. Geoff gaped in shock.

"What the fuck is that?" he whispered.

"We put a ward around the trailer in case you ran. If you'll promise not to try anything we can get rid of it." Without answering he walked slowly over to the place the rock had stopped dead, reaching out and tentatively prodding the air in front of him. Although he could see nothing his hand stopped as if he'd touched a sheet of totally transparent glass. Feeling it with the palm of his hand he shook his head in wonder. The crowbar, and the glowing crystal 'battery', those might have been tricks somehow, but this was clearly extremely real, and extremely not normal. After a moment he turned and walked back to the two other people. Yori was watching him with a small smile while Officer Graham was just waiting patiently.

"Convinced?" the woman asked. He nodded.

"Yes. I still don't trust you, but there's no denying the fact that you seem to know a lot about magic. Or something, anyway. Who are you, really?"

"Like I said, we're consultants, from Japan." Geoff looked at her, then around the otherwise pretty barren area. There was only the three of them there, as far as he knew, with the farmer away on business he was probably the only person other than the man and woman in half a dozen kilometres. That had basically been the entire point of hiding in this god-forsaken place.

"We?"

She looked at him for a long moment, then grinned slightly. Suddenly there were seven more people standing a few metres away, one man and six women. One of the woman, the oldest one, probably about mid forties, was in the uniform of the NT police. The others were all Japanese like Yori. Geoff felt his heart jump, stepping back in shock.

"We." Yori had a distinct smirk now. "These are my friends. Agent Naito from the PSIA, and Superintendent Weiss from the Alice Springs police station, plus Chou, Azumi, Aiko, Tamiko, Fumiko, and Misaki." She pointed to each person in turn.

When he could speak without sounding too much like he was going to faint, Geoff asked shakily, "How the hell did you do that?" The brunette woman, Aiko, who was also quite short like Yori, laughed.

"Teleportation. It's really handy and a lot of fun." Gaping at her for a long moment he shook his head in stunned amazement. After years of collecting things he thought might be genuinely magical, with nothing much to prove it one way or the other past a gut feeling, all of a sudden he was being thrust into the middle of more magic than he was really comfortable with.
"Holy shit," Geoff mumbled, stumbling over to a pile of concrete blocks next to the trailer and sitting on them, looking around helplessly. "This is too much." The tall blonde woman who was in the middle of the pack of girls smiled gently at him, making him feel slightly calmer for some odd reason, then walked over and squatted down next to him. Chou, he remembered her name was.

"Mr Young, I understand you are probably feeling somewhat overwhelmed. Try to stay calm. We're here to get some information we believe you have, but if you let us I think we can probably help you with your current problem." He looked at her for a long moment then slowly nodded, sighing a little. He was tired of running, and the constant fear. If these unbelievable people could help, maybe he should let them. Looking at her, a vague memory flicked through his mind. The young man looked around at the others with a sudden surmise growing in him.

"Magical girls."

"I'm sorry?" Chou asked, although she was smiling slightly.

"Magical girls. I've heard of them. You're all Japanese, you're all female, and you use magic. You're magical girls, like the ones who were in London after Christmas." Yori laughed.

"Not like them. We are them. That's basically what we want to talk to you about." Once more he stared in shock. Yori glanced around at the dusty farmyard. "Look, why don't we go somewhere a little less bare and dry, get something to eat, and talk about this. Afterwards, if you want, we'll bring you back here, or take you somewhere else." She looked at Officer Graham who was listening silently as was everyone else. "The police don't have any interest in him, do they, Mike?"

"Not really. I think that DS Taylor would be interested in talking to him about the operation that his grandmother was running but I'm sure some arrangement could be come to. To the best of my knowledge there's no suspicion that he's done anything particularly arrest-worthy. Assuming that the kilo of cannabis that his grandmother claimed he stole isn't, in fact, in his possession." Geoff froze, trying not to look at the trailer.

Standing, Chou glanced at him, then headed towards the door. "I'll just check," she said mildly. Disappearing inside there was silence for a moment, then a faint 'whoomp' noise came from inside, like a petrol-soaked bonfire being lit. A slight flash of golden light showed from the window. The blonde woman reappeared, dusting off her hands. "No, there doesn't appear to be any cannabis inside there." She smiled at him in a slightly devious manner. Officer Graham chuckled while the Japanese security agent looked hard at her, then grinned a little. Yori snickered.

"So, there's no real problem, Mr Young. Talk to us, talk to DS Taylor, who is a reasonable man, after that you're free and clear." Looking around at them, he finally stood.

"OK."

"Great." Yori looked pleased. She turned to Superintendent Weiss. "Would you like to come with us, or should we drop you off in Alice Springs?" The woman looked at her watch.

"Unfortunately, I think I should be getting back, now you have your man. I'd love to see how this plays out but I have work piling up at the office." Officer Graham nodded to her.

"I'll make sure you get a copy of the report. You've been an enormous help, as have your colleagues."

"Thank you," she said, pleased and smiling. Turning to glance over the others, she grinned. "If you decide to emigrate to Australia, look me up. I'm sure I could find uses for people with your extraordinary talents." Several of the young woman laughed.

"We may well visit some time," Aiko said, grinning. "It's easy."

"Please do." The petite brunette walked over to stand beside the Superintendent, then with a brilliant flash of light, they vanished. Geoff blinked furiously, his eyes watering, noticing too late that everyone else had glanced away at the critical moment.

"My apologies," Chou said, sounding genuinely sorry. "I should have mentioned the flash." A minute later Aiko reappeared.

"Right, she's back in Alice Springs. I like her. We definitely should come back." Walking over to Geoff she smiled at him. "I have to say this every time I take someone new. The first time, you'll feel pretty sick, but it doesn't last. Just be ready for it, OK?" He nodded, still wondering how his day had gone so weird so fast. "Anything else we need to do here?" the brunette asked, looking at the others. Yori glanced at Officer Graham, who shrugged.

"Not that I can think of. We can come back easily enough if we have to, after all."

"Indeed," Chou replied, stepping to a position on the other side of Geoff. The others gathered around, then the world went briefly insane. He felt a horrible nausea, which bubbled up inside with no warning, causing him to suddenly bend down and vomit. Someone held him, preventing him from falling, while allowing him to deal with the horrible sick feeling that had struck so suddenly. Only a handful of seconds later it began to subside nearly as fast as it had hit. The person holding him handed him a cloth, which he took gratefully and wiped vomit from his mouth with. A bottle of water made an appearance. Taking it and washing his mouth out he spat a few times, then did it again, finally straightening up and looking around. Chou was standing next to him looking at him sympathetically.

"That was a particularly bad reaction," she said in her soft voice. "I'm sorry it hit you like that. It only does it once, though, so you won't have to deal with it again."

Nodding, he looked around, noticing with a shock that they were standing in the middle of what seemed to be a helicopter pad on the roof of a building. The cityscape he could see looked familiar. "We're in Sydney!" he said with shock in his voice. The blonde woman next to him nodded.

"Yes. On top of the ASIO building. Come on, we can go downstairs out of the wind and you can sit down." Following her as she joined the others, he went down the stairs into the building.

Shortly he was sitting at a table in a large conference room of some sort. Looking around he saw they'd gone down a couple of floors but were still fairly high up, judging by the view out the window. Aiko had left a moment ago, abruptly reappearing with another man who looked like a cop. "This is DS Taylor," Yori said, introducing them. "Detective, this is Geoffrey Young. He's been quite a problem to find, but we managed in the end." The policeman studied him for a long moment, then nodded.

"I see. Well, when You've finished I'd like to talk to him for a while, but after that I think he can go. Although I'd suggest he finds someone else to live with." The man almost smiled at that. Geoff snorted.

"I wasn't staying with Gran because I like the old cow, trust me."

"Funny, we've found very few people who seem to like her..." Taylor grinned.

"I can believe that." Looking at the others, who had all sat by now, Geoff shrugged. "OK. You've got me. What was so important that you chased me half-way across the country?"

Yori produced a photo from nowhere, skimming it across the table to him. He slapped his hand down on it, then turned it over. "Oh. That thing."

"Tell me about it," the Japanese woman suggested. "Where you found it, who you sold it to, anything else you know, please. It's quite urgent." He sighed.

"I found it around four, four and a half months ago. It was buried in the ground on the edge of Centennial Park, on the side near the cricket ground, under a bench."

Azumi, the silver-haired woman who made him nervous every time she looked at him, asked in a voice devoid of much emotion, "How did you come to find it there? It sounds as if it was well hidden." Geoff shrugged a little, trying to think of how to explain it.

"It was basically an accident. I'd been going around various antique and junk shops I know looking for artefacts, I even found a couple that I thought might be genuine, and took a short cut through the park. I stopped for a drink, sat down on that bench, then after a while got a weird feeling. For some reason I ended up convinced there was something under the bench. I spent a couple of minutes looking, then when I couldn't find anything, I started digging. The ground is only soft sand right there, so it wasn't difficult. It was down about fifteen or twenty centimetres. I've got no idea how long it was there or who put it there. The ground didn't look disturbed. When I pulled it out and brushed the dirt off I saw it was glowing."

Yori inspected him curiously. "Didn't that make you cautious?" she asked.

"I thought it was strange, but the whole thing was strange. It looked more like a magical artefact than almost anything I'd ever seen before. Plus it seemed to be working, everything else I've come across was broken or damaged. There was a feeling about it that was... weird." He looked at her. "Come to thing of it, it was a lot like that, um, battery thing you showed me." She nodded, looking thoughtful.

"Go on."

"Well, I got pretty excited. I've been buying and selling artefacts for several years but I'd never seen anything like it before. No one I knew in the business had either. I showed it to a couple of traders I know who are into the same thing, one of them wanted to buy it, the other one told me to toss it in the bay. Sam told me the same thing. In the end I put it in the old armoury in the bunker. The feeling it gave off was... unpleasant... after a while. When I had it in my bedroom I started getting headaches and having nightmares. It was still causing that even from the bunker, not as bad, but I could tell where it was coming from." He looked at the photo again.

"I didn't want to get rid of it, it was the best artefact I'd ever seen, but... after a month or so I was wishing I'd never found the fucking thing. So, since I was running low on cash, I decided to put together a collection of my best stuff and sell it on Mystic Mart, and throw that thing in as well." Glancing around at the people around the table who were listening with great interest, he dropped the photo to the table, then leaned back. "I couldn't believe it when it suddenly started attracting so much interest. The bids just went up and up. Two hundred fucking grand it went for in the end. I thought it was a joke, but the escrow service I use confirmed I'd been paid. I boxed everything up, including that thing, very carefully, sent it off, and a week later my money was released. It was amazing. All of a sudden I was rich. I paid Sam what I owed him for some jobs he did for me, paid off all my other debts, and still had over a hundred and eighty thousand dollars. The buyer gave me a glowing recommendation, even."
"For a while everything was great. I was working on moving out of Gran's place, something I'd wanted to do for a long time, but I hadn't decided where to go. Then, I started getting emails. Then phone calls. It was the other bidder, I don't know how the hell they got my email address, and my phone number. Hardly anyone knew that number, it wasn't in my name, and I didn't use the phone very much. I'm pretty sure that the website was in on it somehow, I can't see how my details could have gotten out otherwise. The encryption that site uses is supposed to be cutting edge, unbreakable." Azumi laughed slightly.

"It's not nearly as good as they think it is," she said, cold amusement in her voice. He looked at her as did Agent Naito and the three Australian men. When she said nothing further, Geoff went back to his story.

"At first the emails were just demands that I cancel the sale, then sell them the collection. They even upped the price to a quarter of a million. Then three hundred grand. I tried explaining that I'd already sent it off and there was no way to get it back, but they wouldn't listen. I even tried to buy it back, but the guy who bought it didn't respond to any of my messages." He sighed, looking depressed and worried. "Then the phone calls started. This guy started making threats. He knew where I lived, what my phone number was, obviously, and my email address, and several other things he shouldn't have known. He got really angry, in fact, shouting at me and swearing. He told me he could make my life hell. He already was, actually, so I wasn't sure what else he could do but I didn't want to find out."

"Did he mention this device?" Chou asked, indicating the photo with one slender finger. Geoff shook his head. "No. He didn't say much about the collection, just that he wanted it and he was going to get it one way or the other. He was getting all high and mighty about it as well, telling me I didn't know who I was dealing with and that I should know my place, give him the stuff, and take my money like a good boy." The young man snorted. "Bloody Pom." Yori looked at the blonde woman with a raised eyebrow, then glanced at Officer Graham and Agent Naito.

"Do you mean he was British?"

"Well, judging by the accent, yes. Very high-brow accent, like you hear on the news when they cover the UK. Snotty bastard by the sound of it. I guess probably well educated? Very full of his own importance." He laughed a little bitterly. "He told me he knew more about magic that I ever would and this was something he deserved. Mage Business, he called it. You could hear the capital letters." Yori looked at him, appearing surprised, then scowled. She looked at Chou, who nodded, also looking quite angry.

"Ah. I have a very good idea suddenly who you're talking about. I think we may have to go and have a talk." Agent Naito looked at them for a moment, then nodded slowly, pulling his phone out.

"I'll call Sir Alan and that Williamson fellow. I think they'd like to know." Leaving the room, he closed the door behind him. Geoff watched him go with puzzlement, then looked back to the black-haired young woman on the other side of the table.

"OK. That's that part explained. Now for the important bit. Where did you send the collection?" She leaned forward, showing complete concentration on him.

"It went to Canada. Somewhere called Garson, in Ontario. The guy didn't give me a name, just a post office box number and a throwaway email address to send a message to when I'd sent the package. I followed his instructions after he'd put the money in escrow, he released it, everything went smoothly. That's the last I heard of it."

"Can you still remember the details of the address, the email account, anything like that?" She looked hopeful. After a moment he reached into his pocket and pulled out a small notebook, sliding it across the table towards her.

"Before I destroyed all my paperwork I wrote that information down. I don't know why, but for some reason I thought it might be useful. I guess I was thinking that if the second bidder did find me, I might be able to trade it to him to leave me alone." Yori picked up the notebook, flipping through it until she found the page, then read it carefully. A smile crossed her face.

"Thank you, Mr Young. Thank you very much. You may have helped save the lives of a considerable number of people." Handing the notebook back to him she looked around at the other women, who nodded, giving the appearance they were discussing something. Azumi stood and left the room, as did Chou. Agent Naito came back in after she left, closing the door behind him.

"Sir Alan is... not happy," he said, taking his seat again. He seemed amused. "Very not happy indeed. I persuaded him to hold off until we got there, he was all for getting some large men with even larger guns and making it very clear just how unhappy he was. Mr Williamson is gathering information that might be of help right now."

"Good. I think we should deal with that later, after Ms Aoyama tracks down anything she can to help us find this other buyer. With this new information I expect she can work it from the other end." The girl grinned. "She's extremely persuasive with computers." Naito smiled in a slightly worried fashion.

"I don't know 'persuasive' is the right term. I suspect she simply terrifies them into doing what she wants." Yori chuckled, then looked up as Azumi and Chou came back in.

Looking at Yori, the silver-haired woman said, "Ms Aoyama is working on the problem. She expects to have something for us within two hours." Her cool voice sounded satisfied.

"Great." Transferring her gaze back to Geoff, Yori smiled. "Thanks. You won't have any more trouble from that particular source, trust me," she said. There was something about the way she said it that made him lean away. Glancing at DS Taylor and Officer Graham, both of whom had been taking notes during the questioning, she asked, "Is there anything else that you can think of?" They looked at each other.

"I would like to talk to Mr Young when he would find it convenient, to get some more information on what he knows about his grandmother's operation, but other than that, I don't have any reason to keep him." The detective sergeant looked at Geoff. "Perhaps you could come back with me to the station? It will only take about an hour, then you can go." Geoff looked uncertain.

"You promise this isn't a trick to arrest me for something?" Taylor laughed.

"Trust me, if I wanted to arrest you I'd have done it by now. We just want a witness statement. I've got no other interest in your activities or your income." After a few seconds thought, slightly reluctantly, Geoff nodded.

"All right."

"Officer Graham?" Yori raised her eyebrows. The other man shook his head.

"The ASIO isn't interested in him either. Not officially. I would like to talk to him personally about his interests, they might fill in some blanks in the knowledge I have in the magical artefact scene around here, but he doesn't have to if he doesn't want to. I'm just curious."

"OK. In that case, once Ms Aoyama gets back to us, we'll be leaving." She offered him one of her cards, explaining how it worked. He accepted it with interest, then gave her one of his.

Chou looked at Geoff. "Do you have any pressing wish to go back to that trailer we found you in?" she asked curiously. He shuddered.

"No. It was horrible. But..." Looking around slightly nervously, he finally said, "I did leave something there I want." She smiled gently. Suddenly she was holding a small backpack he recognised very well.

"This, I suspect." Staring, he nodded. She got up and brought it around the table to him. "I would suggest it might be a good idea to put at least some of the money into the bank," she said in a low voice, bending down to his ear, before handing him the backpack that contained over a hundred and eighty thousand Australian dollars, and, he was certain, no cannabis at all. Geoff nodded again.

"Thank you."

"You're welcome." The blonde straightened up with a look of amusement, returning to her position beside Yori.

"It's been a very weird and interesting time the last couple of days," DS Taylor said, looking around at the various people around the table. The girls, except for Azumi, smiled. Even she seemed mildly amused. "Let me know how it goes, if you can." Yori grinned and nodded.

"Of course we will."

"I'll see that you both get a copy of the report I file with the PSIA," Agent Naito added.

"Thanks." Standing, he glanced at Geoff. "Well, Mr Young, shall we go? An hour from now you can be back to buying and selling dodgy magical artefacts." Geoff shook his head.

"I think I'll give that a miss for a while. I've got an urge to find another hobby." Several people laughed. He looked curiously at Yori. "What is that thing, anyway?" he asked.

"It summons demons that eat you," she said with a grin. At his sceptical look she snickered. "Honest. It's a good thing you didn't poke it too hard..." Shuddering, he got up, holding his backpack close to him.

"Good luck finding it," he said. Yori nodded, smiling.

Aiko got up and approached them. "I'll pop you back, it will be quicker," she said to DS Taylor, who nodded thankfully. Seconds later they disappeared.
Embedded Sidestory 4 part 2

Part 2

Inspector Laura Deveraux looked at the report that had just come across her desk with a frown. Reading it carefully again, she picked up the phone and punched in a two-digit internal code, waiting for the other end to pick up. "Hello, Evan. I was just reading this report on Halleckton. Where is that, I've never heard of it before."

"It's a small town just to the east of Lake Halleck, which is, oh, roughly fifty kilometres north-east of Garson. I think it was a logging or mining town originally, but it's been more involved in the hunting and fishing side of things for a long time now. It's a long drive on some pretty bad roads, but I've heard the fishing is good and there are some very expensive houses there. It's popular with wealthy people who like to 'get away from it all' without going too far from real civilisation." The other RCMP officer chuckled. "You know the type. Real outdoorsmen who like nothing more than to rough it with none of the creature comforts other than satellite TV, hot tubs, lots of booze, and people to carry their equipment."

Laura laughed. "Oh, yes, I know that type all too well. So, no one has heard anything from there for over a week now?"

"No. From what I can find out, it's not unusual for the town to be completely cut off during the winter, it gets snowed in. There are about two hundred and sixty permanent residents and at peak season it goes up to perhaps four hundred. The season is only just starting, so there's probably only about fifty visitors there at the most. Apparently most of them go there specifically to not be contacted. There's no cell-phone coverage, you need a satellite phone, a radio, or a land-line. The telephone service gets cut off fairly often, it's at the end of forty kilometres of overhead cable and falling branches break the line regularly. Even so, at this time of year going a week without anyone hearing from the town isn't normal. Someone in Sudbury who supplies them with propane raised the alarm, he was expecting an order for a regular refill and didn't get it. He tried contacting them, had no luck, and after a few days got worried. He called us." His voice took on a note of mild concern. "I contacted the local station that covers that area and asked them about it. They said they'd sent someone to check, just in case, but didn't seem worried. It's been some time, I'd have thought they'd have arrived there by now, but I haven't heard back yet. Let me call them, I'll get back to you."

"Thanks, Evan." She put the phone down and glanced over the report again, then pushed it to one side and got back to work. Replying to an email, she smiled as she saw one in her inbox from a couple of weeks ago from Richard Harrison from the LAPD. Re-reading it she laughed. They'd become firm friends even before their Japanese trip, the extraordinary events there having cemented that relationship permanently. His email was a general hello, going into the way his daughter Serena and the girl she'd met due to Yori and the others, Sophie, had both taken up martial arts with great enthusiasm. Serena was also apparently serious about archery, having finally talked her father into getting her a nice compound bow for her birthday.

The magical girls from Japan had certainly had a serious influence on both young women. They had to be talked out of hunting down criminals on a regular basis. Serena's father had patiently explained that aside from anything else, Yori and her friends were more than tough enough to deal with the consequences of their actions, as well as having years of experience in such things. A pair of fifteen year old American schoolgirls without magical powers were possibly in slightly over their heads, even given their considerable enthusiasm for the whole idea. They hadn't been completely convinced but had agreed to leave the law enforcement to the professionals.

"For the moment," Deveraux thought, grinning. 'Having met Serena, I have a feeling that sooner or later she's going to decide it can't be all that difficult and have a go. If Sophie is anything like her, she will as well. I hope they don't get hurt." It was a concern, they certainly didn't have the ability to take a bullet to the stomach and merely look annoyed at the damaged shirt like certain black-haired Japanese girls Laura could think of. 'I'll have to visit Richard and Emily again soon. They're nice people. After the winter we've had I could do with some sun.' Musing on the possibility of vacationing in LA, while also wondering whether a trip to Japan to visit Masao Naito, Tetsuo Harada and his wife, and even hopefully Yori and the others was something she could afford, she answered a few more emails, then began writing up the paperwork on the last case she'd just finished. This kept her involved for the next hour, while she cross-referenced the complicated paperwork and muttered to herself.

When the phone at her elbow beeped loudly she jumped, concentrating so hard on her work it came as quite a surprise, then picked up the handset. "Hi, Laura." The other officer sounded worried. "I finally got hold of the local police who were looking into Halleckton. They sent a car hours ago and haven't had any contact with it since it last reported in about ten kilometres south of the town. When they lost contact they waited for two hours, then sent two more officers to look for the first one. That car dropped off the radar as well."

"Crap. That sounds bad."

"I know. It might just be some weird coincidence, but added to no contact from the town or anyone in it for eight days, and you end up thinking that there could be a real problem. There are no fire reports or any natural disasters I've heard about in that area, it's not very cold at the moment, all the snow has melted, that sort of thing, so I'm at a bit of a loss. I think we need to investigate."

"Arrange to have Air Services do an overflight and have a quick look, to see if there's anything obvious wrong. I'll talk to the Chief Superintendent. He might want to send something a little more heavily armed than a patrol vehicle if there's anything wrong. If some of those hunters went loopy and started shooting people instead, it could get nasty."

"I've already sent a plane out, we should have something in about half an hour. I'll let you know what the results are."

"All right. Thank you for calling." Hanging up, she dialled another code, then spoke briefly, before putting the phone down, picking up the Halleckton report and leaving her office.

Corporal Osborne raised his binoculars again and peered through them at the town a thousand metres below them as the Cessna banked right on the second orbit. "Still can't see any movement," he said to the pilot. Her voice came back over the headset, slightly crackly and sounding worried. "I haven't seen any signs of life at all. There's supposed to be about two or three hundred people down there right now, it's only six PM on a nice sunny day, so there should be someone wandering around outside. But there aren't even any cars moving."

"Do another pass lower, will you? Perhaps we can get a better view." She nodded, turning the light aircraft left again, then reducing power and slowly dropping. An orbit of the town at five hundred metres revealed no more signs of movement that before, but revealed something that the higher overpass hadn't. "Fuck. Some of those cars are all smashed up. Not like they had a collision, more like something hit them. Or even picked them up and dropped them." He stared, then moved the binoculars. "Some of the buildings are destroyed as well. Look, that shop is wrecked. There's glass all over the road in front of it, something came through the window from inside." The pilot glanced at the building, then turned again, going even lower. Two hundred and fifty hundred metres up they both had a clear view.

"Good god. What the hell happened here?" the pilot breathed. Half the buildings along the main street had damaged or destroyed front doors, windows were torn out, and several vehicles were crushed.

"I have no idea. It looks like the aftermath of a small war." Osborne kept sweeping the binoculars back and forth, stopping occasionally on something that caught his eye. "I can't see any fires or signs of explosions, but I can't think of anything other than heavy weapons that could have caused this damage." There were still no people visible. "This is bad. You'd think the noise of the plane would attract some attention if nothing else." Osborne was getting a very unpleasant feeling as he searched the ground carefully. Cars were parked in a number of places, showing that there had to be a considerable number of people in the immediate vicinity, but there was no movement. "I'm beginning to wonder if there's anyone left down there."

"What's that," the pilot asked, pointing. "One o'clock, by that green building?" He lowered the binoculars for a moment, getting a fix on what she was talking about, then raised them again, focussing.

"It's just a dog," he reported, watching the large husky-like animal scuttling down the street in a furtive manner. Something about the way it was moving suggested to him it was scared and cautious. He searched the area the dog had come from, seeing nothing for a moment. As the plane circled he suddenly gasped. "Holy shit!"

"What?"

"There's a body down there. No, two, three... five bodies." The corporal stared at the sight for a moment then lowered the binoculars. "They're... incomplete." The pilot took her eyes off her instruments to gaze at him, shocked. "One was missing both legs. It looks like they were trying to get into that house."

"I'll call it in," the pilot said, keying up the radio. She made a quick report, describing what they'd seen and more importantly, not seen. Osborne put his binoculars down, twisting around in the seat and retrieving a camera with a long lens and an extended film magazine from behind him. Opening the slide window on his side of the aircraft he stuck the lens out and began taking photos of the town, first wide angle shots, then zooming in on the damage. Once the pilot had finished talking, she banked left and set the aircraft up for another pass. The corporal took photos of the bodies. As he was searching for the dog again, he noticed movement from under a carport next to one of the houses, in the direction the animal had gone, making him raise the camera to his eye again and zoom in.

"Fucking hell!" he screamed in shock, which caused the pilot to jump violently and twitch the control yoke. The involuntary aerobatics that followed made them both pale. When she'd brought the aircraft back under control a hair-raising few seconds later she glared at him.

"Don't DO that!" she snapped viciously. "What the hell was that for?" Corporal Osborne retrieved the camera from the floor where he'd dropped it during the excitement, quickly checking it was intact.

"Circle back," he said, looking out the window and not responding to her question. "Aim at that yellow building. I need to check something." She gave him a look mixing anger and curiosity, then did as he requested. Looking through the camera again he stiffened when the same carport came into view. "Oh, god. It's real."

"WHAT is real?" The pilot was becoming frustrated.

"I don't know. I'm looking right at it and I have no idea what it is. It's eating the dog, though." He was snapping photos as he talked. She stared at him in shock.

"Eating...?"

"The dog. Yes. I think it's responsible for the other bodies as well. About, um, three metres tall, two arms, two legs, long tail with spikes, looks like a really big bug with a bad attitude." They circled while he took photos and the pilot split her attention between flying and trying to see what he was looking at. Unable to make it out she looked down in the other direction, then yelped.

"What?" he asked, looking at her. She pointed, banking left.

"Another one." This one was stomping down a side-street, fully visible. As the plane passed overhead it stopped and looked up at it, before moving on again. They looked at each other, wide-eyed, then the pilot pressed the transmit button on the yoke again and began talking in a shaky voice.

Inspector Deveraux listened to the report with a sinking heart. "Oh, god damn it." She glanced at the Chief Superintendent who was also listening, He returned her look, recognising the description as easily as she did.

"The town is essentially gone," Evan said heavily, reading the printout in his hand. "The observation aircraft crew spotted three of those things, plus they think there were probably at least two more from the pattern of destruction. They reported finding twenty eight bodies before they had to turn back because the light was going, but based on the lack of movement or communications it's likely the casualty toll is much higher. It may be total." The other people in the room looked horrified. After a moment he added, "They found one of the cars from the local station. It was upside down and there was a body a short distance from it, in one of our uniforms. The other car is still missing." The officer dropped the paperwork in the table. "They've developed the film the aircrew took. Copies of the prints are being rushed here by air, we should have them in about twenty minutes, but they faxed this one over." Pulling out a sheet of fax paper he showed it to them. The grainy black and white image made Laura's stomach clench.

"Crap. It really is one of those damn things. And you say they think there are five of them?" He nodded.

"There may be more. Five is the likely minimum number."

Chief Superintendent Wilkinson looked to Deveraux. "The information we received said that the portal bombs could only keep the portal open for a few seconds, only long enough for one to come through. Where did the others come from?" She shrugged, frowning.

"I don't know. In London they had two at once, but in the report I read Yori theorised that was because they'd been so close together, fighting or mating, that when the portal opened they both came through at once. Five or more, though, that sounds wrong. Also completely terrifying. One is far more than enough." He nodded, looking back at the fax.

"What are we going to do about this? I'm going to have to report it further up the chain. The commissioner will probably want to bring in the military."
"We should contact Yori. Unless you want the military to napalm the town, which might well not deal with the demons anyway, but would certainly kill any survivors and probably start a huge fire, she and her friends are our best choice." He thought for a moment, then sighed.

"I suppose. Call her, I'll talk to the Commissioner, and try to get him to hold off on anything excessive until she gets here and looks into it." Laura nodded. Pulling out her cell-phone and the card Yori had given her, she jumped when the phone rang just as she was about to dial. Answering it, she said, "Laura Deveraux."

"Hello, Inspector," a voice she hadn't heard in months said.

"Yori? That's... freakishly good timing," Deveraux replied, startled.

"Oh? I was calling to let you know we tracked the last remaining portal weapon to a town called Garson in Ontario. Agent Naito is arranging for us to come there, find it, and deal with it before it goes off, there's only about three or four days left on the timer."

"You're too late, I'm afraid," the inspector told her, sighing. "I know exactly where the device is. A small town called Halleckton, fifty kilometres north-east of Garson. We were just discussing the report we got a few minutes ago. There are at least five of the demons rampaging around there. The town is basically destroyed." There was a long pause.

"Five?" Yori asked, sounding shocked and horrified.

"At least."

"Oh, hell. How did that happen?" There was another pause. "Where are you right now? We'll be there immediately."

"O Division headquarters, London, Ontario."

"We'll be outside in two minutes." The young woman hung up. Laura relayed the discussion to the Chief Superintendent.

"Go and meet them, bring them here. I'll call the Commissioner and let him know." She got up and ran out of the room. Arriving on the street a short while later she was just in time to see eight people materialise from nothing abruptly. She walked over.

"Hello, girls, Agent. It's very nice to see you again but I wish it wasn't under these circumstances." Yori smiled at her and shook her hand.

"Hi, Inspector. It's good to see you again as well. This is Azumi, you haven't met her before." She indicated a young woman with remarkable silver hair and orange eyes, wearing a long leather coat that was swirling around her ankles rather dramatically in the wind. The girl nodded politely, although her expression was neutral.

"Hello, Inspector Deveraux. Yori and Chou have told me a lot about you. I'm glad we've met at last." Laura shook her hand, then quickly greeted the others.

"Come in. The Chief Superintendent is waiting upstairs. We should have aerial photos of the scene in ten minutes or so, but I can tell you what we've found out so far." They all followed her inside and into the elevator. Shortly they entered the meeting room, where Wilkinson was speaking on the phone. Looking over he nodded, indicating the chairs around the table, while still talking. They all sat and waited.
"Yes, Sir. I understand. All right, I'll tell them, they just came in. Thank you, Sir. Goodbye." He put the phone down and turned back to the visitors.

Deveraux made the introductions. "Chief Superintendent, meet Yori, Chou, Azumi, Misaki, Aiko, Tamiko, and Fumiko, along with Agent Masao Naito from the PSIA." Turning to the Japanese group, she added, "This is Chief Superintendent Jacob Wilkinson and Inspector Evan Sanders."

Wilkinson smiled, stepping forward with an outstretched hand, shaking hands with them all. "Hello, ladies, Agent Naito. I've read the reports with great interest. It's good of you to come and help."

Yori sighed. "We truly don't have any choice. We can deal with it more easily than anyone else, plus all this started in our home area in the first place. I feel a certain amount of responsibility, as do the others." Wilkinson studied her, then smiled.

"I think I understand. It's still a decent thing to do. None of this is your fault. The Commissioner passes along his respects and thanks as well." She smiled back.

"Thank you. Right, let's exchange information. We managed to get an address, a post office box number, and a disposable email address after a very tedious search in Australia. It turned out that the portal device had been buried in a park in Sydney, presumably some months ago. About a month after Christmas it was found, by accident, by a young man who happened to trade in magic or presumed magic artefacts. He put it up for auction along with a number of other items, the winning bid coming from someone who had it all shipped to Garson. They paid a considerable sum for it, but the worrying thing is that the purchaser was enquiring about the device specifically. I'm not sure exactly what that means other than it's bad." She glanced about to make sure they were all following her. Wilkinson motioned for her to continue.

"There was also another bidder for the collection who also seemed to know about it. We have a very good idea who it was and will deal with him later, once all this is settled." The expression on her face made them look at each other nervously. "A colleague who has a way with computers, once she had this information, was able to correlate records from Canada with the anonymised records from the secure website that the trading took place on and show that the buyer was working from an internet cafe in Garson. With some detective work she got a name. One Anthony Murray. He appears to be a wealthy collector of interesting things, with a considerable interest in magic although from what we could work out, no abilities in that field. He's not a mage, for example. We did find out that he was trying to find one about a month ago, though, which is after he received the collection. That may go some way towards explaining what's happened, or it may not."

She looked at the fax which was still on the table, reaching out and picking it up, then passed it to Azumi who studied it carefully. "I'm still none the wiser as to how five or more of these things could have come through. The portal devices definitely don't have nearly enough energy storage to keep the portal open for more than three seconds or so, at the most. It's just enough time for a running demon to go through when the portal opens unexpectedly in front of it. That was the entire design idea, which is actually quite clever, even though horrific. I can't think how five of the things could have time to go through even if they were on top of each other. The London event was a fluke, they must have been right next to one another. It's unlikely to have happened again, I'd think, although I suppose nothing is impossible." Laura looked at her, then at the report Evan had put on the table.

"There's no guarantee that there are only five. The spotter team saw three and deduced the existence of two more, but..."
"Tell me what you know," Yori requested. Azumi placed the fax on the table and listened intently, as did the rest of the young women. Agent Naito had his notebook out. Deveraux picked up the printout and read it to them. They listened in silence, with expressions that grew more and more disturbed. As she finished, there was a knock on the door.

"Come in," Chief Superintendent Wilkinson called. The door opened to reveal a man and a woman in RCMP uniforms with Air Services badges on them. They entered, closing the door and looking around at the table full of Japanese people curiously, before focussing their attention on Wilkinson. The man saluted smartly, followed a second later by the woman.

"Chief Superintendent. I'm Corporal Fraser Osborne, aerial observer, Air Services, this is my pilot, Constable Kelly Robertson. We brought the photos and other information relating to Halleckton. We were the ones who were on the reconnaissance mission earlier this evening. He handed over a thick manila folder, which Wilkinson took and opened on the table. A number of full page glossy colour photos slid out onto the table. Laura and Evan moved to look at them, while the Chief Superintendent spread them out on the table. After a moment he looked up at the two Air Services people who were still standing next to him.

"Take a seat. We'll want to ask you questions about what you saw, once we have a look at these." They nodded and sat in a pair of free chairs next to Chou, who smiled at them. The RCMP officers started distributing the photos to everyone, while Wilkinson picked up the printed report that was in with them, reading it quickly. It didn't say much more about the current situation although it had some background on the town including notable inhabitants and visitors. One name caught his eye, making him grunt with surprise. Yori glanced up from the photo she was studying and stared at him.

"Something interesting?"

"You might say that. Says here that Mr Anthony Murray has a mansion near the lake. Apparently he holds regular parties there, which can go on for days. He's got a helipad, a lot of his visitors come in by air, from all over the place. The US, UK, Germany, Japan, you name it." She looked interested.

"Ah. The connection between Garson and Halleckton explained. I was wondering why all this would happen in what sounds like a small and remote place. I suppose it's a good thing overall, if it had been the middle of Toronto I hate to think of what might have happened. It's bad enough, though."

Azumi looked up from the photo she was inspecting. "There are at least seven of them," she said, slight emotion entering her voice. Everyone looked at her.

"What?" Deveraux asked, horrified. The silver-haired girl nodded soberly.

"The pattern of damage shows seven distinct areas that I've seen so far, with sufficient distance between them that it seems likely that a similar number of individuals are responsible. My information on these demons is that once enraged, something that is close to a default state, they tend to keep moving and causing death and damage until stopped. The probability is low that one would destroy an area, move to another distant spot causing no damage, then begin again. As a result, based on these photos, there are a minimum of seven demons on the loose."

"Shit." Everyone looked at the Chief Superintendent, who seemed slightly embarrassed.

"Indeed." Azumi went back to studying the photos.
"All right, Corporal Osborne, tell us about what you saw. Anything you can think of, no matter how trivial." Yori looked at them closely. "Don't leave anything out." Glancing at each other, they then looked to Wilkinson, who nodded.

"You can tell them anything they want. This is Yori and her friends from Japan, they're specialists in this sort of thing." He shrugged at their expressions. "I know, it sounds insane, but they've dealt with similar situations in the past, very effectively."

Constable Robertson looked around at the girls, who, with the exception of Azumi who was still going through the photos with great care, all looked back calmly. She turned to the Chief Superintendent. "Sir, what is this situation? I've never seen anything like those... things... today. It was like something out of a horror film." She looked puzzled, scared, and rather angry. He watched her sympathetically.

Turning to Yori, he asked, "Would you like to explain? You have more information and experience on this than I do, I only have what I've read in the reports." The black-haired woman smiled, nodding.

"Certainly." Looking at Robertson and Osborne, she said, "What you saw was a particularly aggressive and dangerous demon. Several of them, unfortunately."

"Demon? She said that a minute ago," Kelly pointed at Azumi, "but surely you can't really mean demon. Like from hell and everything?"

"Well, not in the sense of a religious hell and tortured souls, that sort of thing, but other than that, yes, I mean demon. It's what they've been called for a very long time. For a lot of them it's kind of an insulting name, when you get to know them, but for those damn things it fits." The girl sighed. "It's a long story. Basically, there was a cult that was an offshoot of another cult, which was nuts. This smaller group went into the business of magical terrorism, created something we call a portal bomb, then managed to plant half a dozen of them around the world before we stopped them. The plan was for hundreds if not thousands. Six is bad enough. We caught four of them before they activated, but one got away from us in the UK just after Christmas. You probably saw it on the news."

"That's what that was? I thought it was a bomb."

"The UK authorities put out a cover story, blaming it on conventional explosives, with a hallucinogenic gas mixed in. The true story is that it was two of those demons, which managed to kill sixty-five people before we managed to stop them, although we were successful in healing another sixty-seven victims as well. We found another one in time and destroyed it, along with one in Kyoto some time before that, and two more in the US just before New Years. We've been looking for this last one ever since. It popped up in Australia, then ended up here. Somehow it was activated in a way it wasn't designed for and seven of the bloody things have come through."

"Eight," Azumi noted, reaching for another photo. Everyone looked at her.

"Are you sure?" Deveraux asked quietly. The girl nodded without looking up.

"Unfortunately yes."

Fraser was looking at all the women curiously. "So you're all some sort of magical specialists?" he asked. "I'm not sure I believe in magic. I mean, I've heard of some odd things happening around the place, but..." Chou slid a wallet towards him with a small smile. Picking it up he looked at it, recognising it instantly. "How the...?" He patted his jacket. She was at least a metre and a half "A simple little trick," the blonde said. Several of her colleagues were grinning. Agent Naito sighed quietly, but smiled. Misaki snickered, then began juggling half a dozen orange spheres of energy, making everyone but her friends look at her in astonishment.

"That's new," Deveraux said after a moment. The young woman nodded, looking amused.

"Yori has taught us all sorts of interesting things since we saw you." The balls of energy popped one after another with faint snaps. She pulled out a chocolate bar instead and began unwrapping it, making Fumiko look at her in annoyance. Corporal Osborne stared, then shook himself, smiling slightly.

"OK. I think I believe you." He began recounting the overflight, telling them about how the town had looked normal from altitude but the lower they went the more damage was apparent. The sighting of the demon eating the dog still sent chills down his spine as he told them about it. Kelly added details of her own to the story. Everyone listened silently, only asking the occasional question for clarification. When he finished they all looked at each other.

"Very bad," Chou said quietly. Yori nodded, leaning back in her chair and massaging her forehead with both hands.

"About as bad as it could get short of it being in a major population centre. What the hell happened there?" She shook her head angrily. "I've been having nightmares about something like this happening ever since Kyoto. That fucking cult has a lot to answer for." Chou held her hand for a moment, then looked around at the assembled people, before returning her gaze to her partner.

"We'll deal with it, like we did in London."

Azumi put the last of the photos neatly on the stack she'd build beside her, leaning back with a sigh, then looked around the table. "Nine of them."

"Oh, damn it," Sanders mumbled. She shrugged slightly.

"Sorry. That's what I can determine from the photos. I also spotted thirty-nine bodies or partial bodies. It seems likely that the casualty count is considerable, possibly much higher than that figure."

Yori nodded, sighing deeply, with an expression of disgust on her face. "If the demons have been running unchecked in that town for at least eight days it's entirely possible that they could have killed every person in it, I'm afraid. They are extremely aggressive and difficult to stop. There isn't much possibility of any weapons a normal civilian would have access to being able to do more than irritate them. The military in the UK used a 40mm grenade launcher on one at one point, all it did was make it furious." All the RCMP officers but Deveraux paled. She simply nodded, remembering her own encounter with a considerably less tough demon. Anything worse than that was something she was in no hurry to encounter.

"There is another rather disturbing problem." Everyone looked at Aiko, who had been sitting silently with her team, listening. She glanced around. "These things seem to have one hell of an appetite. They eat anything that moves. If they've managed to kill everyone in Halleckton, what next? They're not going to stay there if there's no food."

Everyone looked appalled. Azumi nodded thoughtfully. "That's a good point. Presumably they will start to move away looking for something to eat, sooner or later, if they haven't already begun to
"That's an understatement," Agent Naito said, looking very alarmed. "What's the nearest town to this Halleckton place?"

"It's way out in the middle of nowhere, luckily," Inspector Sanders said. He pulled out a map from his pile of documents, unfolding it on the table, then pointed. The PSIA man got up to look. "Nothing much except for perhaps one or two logging camps and things like that until you get around the other side of Wanapitei Lake here. Hardly even any roads worthy of the name. Then, you're into Skead, not a very large place, Bailey Corners, Falconbridge, places like that. They have a lot more people although they're not huge either. Garson is probably the closest place with a reasonable number of people." He looked up. "Can those things swim?"

Yori and Chou exchanged glances. "I have no idea," the short woman admitted.

"If they can, it's a straight path of about fifty kilometres. If they have to go around all the lakes in their way it could be as much as twice that. There is a lot of forest out there as well, it's difficult to get through if you don't have a road, although from seeing those things I think they could just push their way through it. It would still slow them down. I don't care how strong they are, they're not going to be running through all that." Naito was tracing the route with his finger, looking worried.

"Those demons are a lot faster than you'd believe. I wouldn't underestimate how short a time it might take them if they decide to head south. You haven't seen them in action. I have, it's horrifying." The RCMP man looked at him, nodding reluctantly.

"I'll take your word for it. Even so, I expect it would take a day or two worst case."

"We'll have to hope they haven't moved off, then." Yori frowned. "I guess we go in and deal with them. Nine is getting a little ridiculous." She looked at the Chief Superintendent seriously. "It may be necessary to use considerable force to be sure we've stopped the things. If we have to do that, it's likely that the damage will be considerable. Total, in all probability." Wilkinson stared at her.

"What do you mean, total?" he asked slowly.

"I mean, if it gets really bad, you'll have a new lake, once the water stops boiling." He went white.

"You can do that?" Azumi snorted, making Yori glance at her with a small secret smile.

"Oh, believe me, I can make quite a large hole in the countryside. I'd prefer not to, but if it's a choice between a dead town and a live one, the dead town is going to go away very suddenly."

"I think I'm going to have to talk to the Commissioner again," he said slowly, reaching for the phone. "What about any survivors?" he asked suddenly, his hand on it. She sighed.

"I suspect there aren't any. We'll check very carefully, of course, and we can evacuate them easily. Don't worry, we're not going to do anything dramatic when there are people around. Property damage, unfortunately, is another matter." Nodding, he picked up the phone and dialled. Everyone sat silently while he had a fairly long talk, before hanging up and groaning.

"It's getting messy. The Commissioner referred it to his superiors, who have insisted in bringing in the military, who seem to think they can solve it by dropping a couple of heavily armed teams in and just shooting their way through anything in the way." Yori appeared alarmed, while Chou sighed.

The blonde woman said, "That won't work. I can refer them to some very competent soldiers in the British Army who would strenuously argue against that approach, if it would help." Wilkinson looked worried.

"I know, I've read the report from London. The MoD made it very clear that conventional force wasn't very effective against these things based on the reports from their military. But our boys seem to think they can do a better job."

"Unless they plan on bringing in some extremely heavy artillery all they'll do is make the demons appallingly angry, which will only make the problem worse, and probably lose their teams as well. It would take an exceptionally large conventional explosive to do much more than inconvenience one of them. Heavy incendiaries might do it, if you scored a direct hit, but that would be difficult. Nine times in a row would be nearly impossible. Not to mention that I expect you'd have a major forest fire to deal with afterwards." Chou glanced at Yori, who nodded agreement.

"If they go in we'll have to go with them. It would be much better if we went alone. Collateral damage may be considerable in this case. We might not have any choice. If we can send any of them back through a portal we'll use that option, but under the circumstances we might not be able to arrange that." Yori shrugged helplessly. "I don't like destroying other people's things, I hate it in fact, but with nine of those damn things running around we might not be able to take care of all of them without some heavy effort, which will be hard on the scenery."

"So you said. I told the Commissioner. He's not too happy about it but understands the problem. I argued against the military operation, and he agrees with me, so he's going to try to persuade the people upstairs to try it your way. I suspect that the town is a loss anyway, so more destruction isn't the end of the world. I'm more worried about survivors, and those demons getting out into the surroundings."

"You and me both. If they get away it could be very difficult to track them down."

They discussed possible problems and solutions for another twenty minutes, waiting impatiently for the phone to ring. When it finally did Wilkinson grabbed it instantly. Answering he listened carefully for a while. "Thank you, Sir. I'll tell them." He hung up again and turned to Yori, who was staring at him. "The politicians called an emergency meeting, talked it over, and also spoke to someone in the British Government at the MoD. They recommended your approach in the strongest possible terms. Our people decided in the end they couldn't risk the military option and gave your team the go-ahead. They did have one condition, which is that they send observers to see what happens."

Nodding, Yori looked somewhat relieved, as did Chou and the rest. "Not ideal, it's more people to keep out of trouble, but better than the alternative. OK, we're ready as soon as these observers of your are. Where do we pick them up from?"

"A Second Lieutenant Edward Kent and his team will be waiting for you at CFB Trenton in ten minutes." The woman and her colleagues stood.

"Right." She looked at Agent Naito. "I'm sorry, Agent, I think it would be best if you stay here." He smiled at her.

"I'm in full agreement with that. I can hold my own against gang members, but demons are another matter altogether." She grinned. Walking over to her friends she looked around.

"See you in a while. Inspector, when this is all over I'm looking forward to catching up." Laura nodded, watching them all.
"Be careful," she said, worried. Chou smiled at her.

"Always." With that the group vanished. She stared at the place they’d been before looking at Naito, who looked back with understanding in his eyes.

"They're very, very good at this. If anyone can deal with it, it's those young ladies."

"I know. I still worry. They're all so young." She inspected him curiously. "Gang members? What have you been up to, Masao?"

He looked proud although slightly guilty. "I got three this time all on my own." Laura raised an eyebrow, causing him to begin explaining. Soon everyone left in the room was rolling around laughing.

"What's going on, Lieutenant?" The voice came from a short, wiry man with very dark skin as he walked up to the other three men, his rifle over his shoulder. "I just got booted out of bed and told to report to you for some special mission." He looked at his watch. "It's half past eleven, I was just getting to sleep."

Second Lieutenant Kent turned to him, then shrugged slightly. "I'm not sure, Corporal. I was just given one of the weirdest mission briefings I've ever had. The Major told me to pick three men I could trust for an insertion and observation mission into hostile territory and be quick about it. That was half an hour ago."

"Insertion into where?" Corporal O'Rourke looked at his superior officer suspiciously.

"Some little craphole by the name of Halleckton about five hundred or so kilometres away, north of Sudbury," one of the other men grunted, adjusting his equipment vest. The corporal looked at him, then back to the Lieutenant.

"Hostile territory in Canada? What the hell is going on?"

"Apparently something has gone completely sideways in this Halleckton place. The Major was saying something about creatures killing and eating everyone there." Kent shrugged once more. "It sounds crazy. He was reading a report and looked like he couldn't believe it either, but it came down through the proper channels. I asked why they didn't just bomb the hell out of the place if that was the problem and he said that the report said that it wouldn't work."

"So why are we going in with just some rifles and a few grenades, if an air strike won't do the job?" the last man asked in a calm, deep voice. Everyone looked at him.

"I'm not really sure, Silva. Apparently some specialists from Japan who are experts at dealing with this situation are on the way. We're supposed to accompany them, observe what happens, and give them any help they might need." The lieutenant looked puzzled. "I don't know much more than that. Anyway, do a radio check." They all tested their communications system, which worked perfectly. "Got your cameras ready, Master Corporal?" Kent asked Silva. The tall man nodded, patting the pack he had over one shoulder. "Good."

"Why are we standing around in the middle of the parade ground like this?" O'Rourke asked. "Are they coming in by helo?" Kent shook his head.

"No idea. I don't know anything about them. Just some Japanese demon-killing specialists, is what the Major told me." They all looked at him in the dim light with extreme scepticism. "I know what it sounds like, but that's what he said."
Silva looked up, checking for aircraft lights approaching them. "So when do they get here?" he asked.

"Ten seconds ago," a rich female voice with a slight accent said from behind them. They all swore in shock and whirled, reaching for various weapons. The three young women standing five metres away in a triangular formation looked at them with varying expressions ranging from cool detachment to sly amusement. The girl in front, who looked about twenty if that, stepped forward, completely ignoring the fact that three pistols and a rifle were pointed at her. "I'm Yori. This is Azumi and Aiko. The others are waiting for us just outside Halleckton. Do you have everything you need?" She looked around, her long night-black braid swinging about, then back at them.

"Who the hell are you and how did you get here?" Kent demanded, not lowering his weapon.

"I just told you. I'm Yori. You're waiting for us. Are you coming or not, we don't have a lot of time." She folded her arms and looked at him. He studied her, then the other two. The one introduced as Azumi had a very unusual hair colour, it looked almost metallic silver in the lights of the buildings some fifty metres away, while there was something odd about her eyes as well. She gazed at him expressionlessly, as if she was prepared to stare until he fell asleep. She didn't seem to be moving at all. The other one, Aiko, was somewhat shorter, about Yori's height, with brown hair and an amused expression. She was looking around with interest, more or less ignoring the others.

"You're a woman," O'Rourke stated curiously. She grinned.

"Oddly enough, I realise that. Is it a problem?" He shrugged.

"Not really. It's just a bit unusual, considering you're supposed to be some sort of combat specialists." He lowered his pistol, reholstering it. "Lieutenant, I don't think they're going to hurt us." Aiko giggled, glancing at him before going back to inspecting the buildings.

"How did you get here?" Kent asked, slowly lowering his weapon. "I didn't hear a car and there haven't been any aircraft movements for fifteen minutes." Yori grinned at him, while Aiko returned her attention to the squad.

"We have other methods," she replied. He stared. After a moment she chuckled. "Hey, what's that over there?" she asked suddenly, pointing behind them. They all turned to look. There was a flash of light from behind them and they abruptly found Aiko walking towards them from twenty metres away.

"What the FUCK?" Kent squawked in shock. The other three men stared, speechless, as the girl rejoined her friends wearing a broad grin

"Like that. So, ready to go?" O'Rourke looked at Silva, who suddenly smiled. He shrugged.

"Lieutenant?" Kent stared at him, then back at Aiko, before putting his weapon away. The other two had already done so.

"This is getting really strange," he muttered. Yori chuckled, then the three girls walked over to them.

"The first time through a teleport will make you feel awful, but it only lasts for a few seconds. Get ready." The world jumped and they found themselves in complete darkness lit only by a crescent moon. Silva retched, dropping to his knees, feeling someone steady him, while O'Rourke swayed.

"Oh, Christ, that was horrible," Kent groaned, hearing the sounds of someone being sick nearby. Very quickly the nausea passed, allowing the four soldiers to look around. Silva flipped his night vision goggles down and turned them on, looking around in the green-lit darkness, to find a tall woman beside him holding his arm.

"Do you feel all right now, Master Corporal?" she asked in a soft, gentle voice. He nodded.

"Thank you, miss...?"

"Just Chou." Releasing him she stepped away. The rest of the squad activated their NV goggles as well. "Introductions are in order. You've already met Yori, Azumi, and Aiko. I'm Chou, this is Misaki, Fumiko, and Tamiko. We're about two kilometres east of the edge of Halleckton."

"I'm Second Lieutenant Edward Kent, this is Master Corporal Bruno Silva, Corporal Mawuli O'Rourke, and Private Mikkel Pedersen." The seven females nodded at each name. Several of them looked curiously at O'Rourke, who grinned.

"My mother was from Ghana, my father comes from Dublin. Hence the name." Yori laughed.

"Fair enough." Pedersen was spitting, trying to get the taste of vomit out of his mouth. She handed him a bottle of water, which he took with a muttered thanks, swilling his mouth out then spitting again, before drinking some of it. "OK, this is the situation. There was a weapon which ended up here. The story is long and involved, no point going into it right now. It got activated somehow, in a strange manner which I'm still not sure about, which made it do something it wasn't designed to do. It's supposed to summon a demon. It managed to produce nine that we know of. I'm hoping desperately that's all. These things are unbelievably dangerous. They also eat people, and are close to impossible to kill with conventional weapons. Luckily we use extremely unconventional ones."

"The demons have killed anything up to the entire population of the town of Halleckton, which could be as much as three hundred people," Chou said, taking up the explanation. "We are going to search for any survivors, heal and evacuate them, then deal with the demons. There is a possibility that this will require the destruction of the entire town, although we'd like to avoid that. Your government wanted to deal with this with a military force, which would have been disastrous. We managed to avert that and persuade them to allow us to deal with it, but they insisted on an observation squad. That's you."

Yori looked seriously at them. "Please listen very carefully. Your lives depend on this. Your weapons will not work on these demons. At best you'll irritate them a little. Trust me, I've seen a well-armed soldier go up against one of these with a 40mm grenade launcher with six direct HE grenade hits, which slowed the demon down for about ten seconds. He'd have died on the spot if I hadn't distracted it. Do not try to take one on, you will die. Do you understand me?" They exchanged glances then nodded. There was something about the air of command that the woman suddenly had that would allow no other response.

"What do you want us to do, Ma'am," Lieutenant Kent asked, the term of respect coming automatically. She looked slightly surprised while a couple of her colleagues snickered for some reason.

"Observe, as your orders say. From a safe distance. If it goes bad, we will set up a ward that the demons can't get through. Think of it like a force field. If that happens, get inside it immediately, and do not try to exit until we tell you to. OK?" All of them were finding this difficult to believe, but they'd also all noticed the seven women moving easily around in the near total darkness with no problems at all, even though they didn't seem to have any NV equipment with them. There was certainly something unusual going on. The teleportation, which was undeniable, was another clue that they were well out of their comfort zone.
"Right." When there was no dissent in the ranks, Yori looked satisfied. "We're going to go in. Aiko, you stay here with the soldiers. We'll call you in if we need survivors evacuated or when we've cleared an area. The nearest demon is about two and a half kilometres away, just inside the town. Chou and I will go in first and scout around, we need to locate them all, then the rest of you come in when we call. Azumi and Fumiko, Misaki and Tamiko." All the girls nodded while the soldiers gaped as Yori and Chou simply faded into invisibility.

"Fuck me," Silva breathed in astonishment. Azumi looked at him with a raised eyebrow, which made him apologise. This seemed to amuse her.

They waited. Twenty minutes later, a voice came on their theoretically secure radio link.

"Lieutenant Kent? This is Yori. We've located eight of the demons. Number nine is being awkward. We think it's probably gone underground somehow. Am I right in thinking that there was a lot of mining in this area at one point?"

"Yes, I think so. The entire Sudbury area is metal rich, from what I know, there are mines all over the place."

"OK. It might have found an old mine shaft. That's a nuisance. We're going to have to leave that one until last, unless it suddenly jumps out at us. We're scanning the area for survivors now. The others are on their way to join us."

All four soldiers suddenly noticed they were alone save for Aiko, who was leaning against a rock looking bored. They hadn't heard a thing to suggest the young women were on the move.

"Who the hell are these ladies?" O'Rourke said in a low voice. "I've seen special forces experts that couldn't move that quietly. And how are they communicating with each other, or for that matter us? I thought these radios were encrypted." Kent shrugged.

"No idea. This is all so far out of my experience I'm just going to follow orders and roll with it."

Pedersen snickered. "Whose orders? The Majors or hers?"

"Whoever keeps me alive," Kent responded, grinning.

"We've found some tunnels. We're following them to find the place it got inside, and to see if it did get inside." There was a long pause. "Yes, that's confirmed. There are footprints going in but none coming out. I'm going to collapse the entrance to the mine so it can't easily get out. We don't think there are any other exits, we traced the tunnels and it's a fairly small mine under a hill." The horizon to the west lit briefly with a purple flash like lightning. About ten seconds later they all heard a drawn out deep rumble, like something a significant explosion would produce. "That's done. We can dig it out later once we've sorted the others out. Whoops, one of them is coming this way."

The soldiers exchanged glances. Aiko was looking alert, she was clearly aware of what was happening somehow. Another flash, a golden-yellow one this time, lit the horizon. "One down," Yori's voice came. The blast rolled over them seconds later. "I have a feeling that was our free one. The others are staying inside the town amongst the buildings. Aiko will bring you forward to our position, it's safe now." The brunette girl walked over to them and before they could brace themselves the world jumped again. Yori glanced at them, then went back to examining the substantial crater in the ground they were standing in front of. It was a good ten metres across and radiated heat. Pedersen stared at it, then at the two girls.

"How the fuck did you do that?" he asked, shocked. "It would take a good ton of HE to make a hole that size." He walked over and looked at it from as close to he could get, which was several metres away due to the intense heat. The crater seemed to be glass-lined, suggesting whatever formed it was something quite unlike ordinary explosives. It looked more like a crater from a really tiny nuclear weapon. When he turned around to ask more questions both Yori and Chou had vanished again. Aiko looked at him.

"Don't worry, it's safe. There's no radiation or anything." The thought hadn't occurred to him but now it had been mentioned he looked nervously at the crater again, walking further away. The girl giggled. Once more they waited. Eventually Yori came back on the radio. "We've found a survivor.
The demons seem to have moved back in the direction we think the Murray residence is in. I think we worried them when we killed the first one and they're retreating to where they came through.
That probably won't last. But for now it's safe to come in."

Once more Aiko teleported them. This time they found themselves inside the town extents, with a number of buildings around them. Most of these had holes in which showed in shocking detail how the demons had simply ripped their way inside. A few lights were on, but most of the town was dark, and it was eerily quiet. "Over here," Yori called, waving from a house to their left. She was standing inside what had been the living room, looking out through where the wall used to be. The soldiers walked over. There was a strong smell of blood as they approached, the metallic tang in the air familiar to them, although not in the quantities they saw when they reached the building.
Pedersen swore and crossed himself, while the others winced. The inside of the building looked like an abattoir.

"Holy...," O'Rourke managed, before he had to look away. There were bits of meat scattered around that took considerable imagination to identify as parts of a human body.

"It's about five people, we think," Chou said quietly, looking around from where she was bending over a sixth one. This one was more or less intact, although the left foot had been chewed off. It was a boy of around fourteen, wearing a blue t-shirt and shorts, who seemed to have been trying to hide under the sofa. "Fumiko found him. She's gone to look for other survivors before the demons come back. So far he's the only one we've found alive." Returning to her patient she ran glowing hands over him, making them all stare. Kent lifted his NV goggles to see the glow was a beautiful soft golden colour like an autumn sunset. Yori moved past him, squatting down carefully to avoid the blood. Her hands glowed purple as she also checked the boy.

"Several broken ribs, a skull fracture, and that foot. We should stabilise him then Aiko can take him back. The foot can wait," the girl said. Chou nodded, concentrating.

"The ribs are coming along well. Can you do the skull, please? I'm worried about the oedema, it's fairly bad. I'll seal the leg."

"Got it." The two women worked in silence while the soldiers watched, fascinated. "OK. His head is fine. Another hour and he wouldn't have made it. I hope he doesn't have any memory issues as a result of the injury." She looked around for a moment. "Although that might be a mercy." Looking up she motioned to Pedersen. "You, Private. Go back with Aiko, we'll take him to your medical facility. Make sure the doctors don't do anything but let him sleep. We'll deal with the leg after this is all over, understand?" Private Pedersen nodded. Aiko moved past him, carefully picking the boy up as if he was weightless, then motioned with her head for the soldier to follow her. "Don't let them try to wake him either," Yori called after them. Seconds later a rainbow flash lit the street and they were gone. Standing, the black-haired woman looked around at the ruined house, an expression of anger on her features.

"Someone is going to pay for this," she muttered. "Assuming he hasn't already done so." Chou put a hand on her shoulder then left the building, followed by Yori moments later. Silva took out his camera, turning the flash on, then took several photos of the inside of the house, before following them with a sick expression on his face.

"We've got another one," Yori suddenly said. "Down the street about two hundred metres." She dashed off, Chou right behind her, at a remarkable speed. The soldiers followed more slowly. The smell of blood was omnipresent and they could see more death and destruction everywhere they looked. Some houses seemed undamaged, while others would have sustained less damage if a grenade had been tossed inside, but every one of them concealed a grim secret. Silva photographed everything he saw that seemed relevant. When they arrived at the location the two women had gone to they found Yori holding a truck over her head while Chou carefully disentangled a small girl from the remains of a car. Azumi was helping her by peeling back sections of the roof as if it was made of silly putty. They gaped at the casual show of incredible strength, Silva taking more photos once he got over his shock.

Finally extracting the girl, who looked about eight, Chou picked her up and carried her to a nearby bench, laying her gently on it. Yori dropped the smashed truck back down with a crunch. Walking over she and Azumi looked down at the girl, who Chou was checking over. "She's remarkably undamaged. Two broken fingers and some cuts. I've fixed them already. I think we should make sure she stays asleep."

Yori nodded, watching the girl as Chou put her hand on her forehead. There was a brief flash of light and the blonde looked satisfied. "I want to find someone who can tell us exactly what happened," the petite woman said, "but I don't think she could. Poor kid." Aiko reappeared next to them with Pedersen in tow. Yori looked up, completely unsurprised. "Another one. Same deal. Hands off until we get back." The soldier nodded, picking the girl up. Both of them vanished again.

Azumi turned to the others. "I'm going to help Fumiko again." She moved off rapidly. Looking to the north, Yori frowned slightly.

"They're moving around a bit but more or less staying put. I wonder if we could put a ward around them and trap them. It's still a pretty large area, bigger than anything we've tried before." She glanced at Chou, who looked back at her with a thoughtful expression.

"The power isn't the problem, it's stabilising it over such a large area. Perhaps if we all work on it? Once it's up it will be stable." Yori nodded slowly.

"That might work." She looked around as Aiko and Pedersen reappeared once more. "Take them to the roof of that building over there," she said, pointing to the tallest building in sight, which was about four stories with a flat roof. "They should be safe up there, for a while anyway, with a decent view." Aiko looked at the building then nodded.

"OK. Come on, guys." All four soldiers followed her, then vanished. Reappearing on top of the building they looked around, walking over to the edge of the roof in time to see her appear next to the small figures of Yori and her partner, before they disappeared again. Silva walked to the edge of the roof and looked down, then around at the mostly dark town.

"This is the weirdest night I can remember having," O'Rourke said, coming up beside him. The other soldier nodded in agreement.

"You can say that again. I feel completely helpless. Look at that." He indicated the town with a wave of one hand. "Probably hundreds of bodies out there, things in the dark that kill and eat people, yet we can't do a thing about it." He looked at the smaller man. "What do you think of those girls?"
"They're fucking terrifying. How the hell are they doing all of this?"

"Magic? I don't know, it's as good an explanation as anything. Maybe they're aliens or something. This is all straight out of a movie anyway." They turned when Lieutenant Kent approached. "I guess we just wait here like she said, sir." He nodded.

"Our orders said they were in charge. I'm still not convinced that these 'demons' are that tough, but for the moment we may as well wait." The lieutenant looked around for a moment, then pulled out a small recorder and began muttering into it, dictating some observations. He'd been meant to do that all along but in the surprise of the whole thing, had forgotten. Now he was trying to remember everything he'd seen so far.

A couple of minutes later Pedersen pointed. "What's that?" he said, sounding awed. The other three turned to look north to where he was pointing, then gaped at the sight, which was very impressive. A huge shimmering dome had appeared a kilometre or so away, encompassing an area that must have been several hundred metres across. It looked like a giant soap bubble, iridescent colours moving around on the immaterial surface. After a moment's staring, Silva raised his camera and took several shots, hoping the film was fast enough. The bubble flickered a few times but ultimately stabilised, looking far more solid, before slowly fading out of visibility. Shortly after that, Aiko and Yori appeared on the roof making them jump. The black-haired girl looked pleased.

"That worked. It should stop them getting out. There are six of them inside, the seventh one ran for it and just got out in time. Chou and the others went after it. Hopefully that's all of them located and either contained or destroyed." An orange flash suddenly lit the horizon a few kilometres away to the north-east. "Misaki got it." Yori smiled a little. "Good. Seven left that we know of, all of them somewhere they shouldn't be able to get out. We can resume searching for survivors." With that she walked off the edge of the building, making all the soldiers rush to the edge and look down, only to see her moving off down the street with no sign she'd just dropped fifteen metres.

"I assume you guys don't want to follow her that way?" she asked. They all looked at her. "Come on, let's go down. You guys can help look now the demons are safely out of the way." With that she teleported them all to the street. They stood around for a moment then spread out, looking at the ruined houses and smashed cars, not to mention the occasional corpse. Most of them had parts missing. A few minutes later Yori came back with Chou and Azumi.

"It's probably best if we each go with one of you guys. I'm still not absolutely certain we've accounted for all the demons. I'll go with you, Lieutenant, Azumi with O'Rourke, Chou with Silva, and Aiko with Pedersen. Misaki and the rest are searching down near the lake. We should be able to cover the rest of the town in about three hours." She looked around for a moment. No one seemed to have any major objections. "OK. Spread out, keep your eyes and ears open for any signs of survivors. If there are any demons, please, guys, let us handle them, all right? Just stay back and observe like you're supposed to." She grinned, her green-lit face showing amusement. "I know you want to try taking one on, but in this case you really are out of your depth."

"We can follow orders, Ma'am," Second Lieutenant Kent said. She laughed.

"Even when you don't want to, right?" He nodded, smiling. "Good. Let's get to it." The four teams went off in different directions into the dark.
extraction, with a slender athletic build. She moved like a predator, he noted, smoothly and with quiet efficiency. All the girls did, it was one of the most notable features of them. Yori and Chou had an air of barely restrained immediate danger about them that the others didn't possess quite as much, but Azumi also showed it to a degree. He thought she'd be an extremely dangerous opponent. After a moment he noticed she was looking at him, having seen the way he kept glancing at her. Her silver hair showed highlights as they moved past one of the rare working lights in a house.

"You seem intrigued, Corporal," she remarked in a cool steady voice. He nodded.

"I am. I've never met women in a front-line combat role before, never mind the superpowers or whatever it is that you have." She smiled slightly.

"I'm not really one of the main fighters," she replied, "more along the lines of intelligence gathering and backup."

"I'm pretty sure you're very good at the fighting even so," he said. She shrugged a little.

"I suppose so. I'm still learning."

"Was this a deliberate career choice?" he asked curiously. She snickered.

"No. I kind of fell into it. Very long story. But I'm told I have a gift for it." She stopped, looking to the left. "Did you hear that?" He listened carefully, then shook his head.

"I can't hear anything. What was it?"

"Sounded like somebody coughing. Over there somewhere." Azumi pointed to a house set back from the road, which had a garage to the side which had partially collapsed. They headed slowly in that direction, looking around carefully. There were large footprints in the lawn which showed the past presence of the demons. The girl studied them closely, kneeling, then stood up. "Two of them, I think. The prints are slightly different sizes." Walking over to the remains of the garage she listened again. Beginning to ask a question, the corporal stopped when she waved a hand indicating she wanted quiet. Kneeling down she put her ear to the ground.

"There's someone down there. I think there's a basement or something. I can hear breathing." He watched as she moved around slightly, then lay down, listening intently. "Two... no, three people. They sound like they're breathing with difficulty. Maybe the air's bad." She concentrated harder.

"Their hearts sound wrong as well, much too fast." O'Rourke stared at her in amazement.

"You can hear their heartbeats through god knows how much cement and dirt?" he asked in a voice full of astonishment. She nodded, frowning slightly.

"Only barely, but yes." Standing, she looked around, as did the soldier, then walked over to the remains of the garage. "Check the house, see if there is an entrance from there. I'll clear some of this crap and have a look here." With a nod he went inside the building. It was more trashed inside than out, with huge gouges on the walls and around the frame of the front door, which was lying in pieces on the floor just inside the hall. Stepping over it he looked around, heading towards the back of the house opening doors as he went, his sidearm in his hand just in case. Near the kitchen he found a door hanging off its hinges with a set of stairs going down. It was too dark even for the NV goggles so he turned on the IR illuminator set into them, cautiously heading down the stairs. At the bottom he looked around. It was basically a small utility room, with washing facilities on one side, a furnace on the other, and at the end a set of steps that led to what looked like a door into the garden. A couple of plastic kayaks were hanging on the wall, with three bicycles stacked against the wall under them.

Other than that, there was nothing. He checked carefully, but could find no entrances to any other underground rooms. Keying his radio he said, "Azumi? Can you hear me?"

"Yes, Corporal," her voice came back. "Did you find anything?"

"Only an empty basement. In the direction of the garage there's nothing but a blank wall. No way in to wherever those people are."

"OK. Come back, you can help me move some of this stuff. I believe there is some sort of old bomb shelter that the garage was built over."

"On my way." He was moving as he spoke. Arriving back outside he found her lifting half the garage roof off the floor of the building.

"Can you grab the end of this and stabilise it, please?" she asked. "The weight isn't an issue, but it's so floppy it keeps catching on things." Nodding, privately astonished once more by the extraordinary strength she possessed, he guided the end of the several hundred kilos of wood and insulation as she manoeuvred it into the middle of the lawn. "I'm letting go, are you clear?" she asked.

"Yep." Releasing the load she dropped it with a crash. They went back into the garage. "That must be it," the corporal said, pointing to a metal door set flush with the floor near the back. It was half-buried in concrete blocks that had once formed part of the rear wall.

"Indeed. Let's move this debris and see if we can get it open." Azumi started piling blocks up to form convenient sized amounts to remove, shifting six or seven at a time. They were heavy enough that O'Rourke, who was a strong man despite his relatively slight stature, could only lift a pair of them at a time without straining. She showed no effort at all. Once they'd cleared the door she inspected it in the dark, feeling around the edges carefully. "It's locked on the inside," the girl reported. Grabbing the handle in the middle she exerted herself, resulting in a groan of stressed metal, before the handle abruptly snapped off.

Looking at it in disgust she muttered something in Japanese. Tossing it into the corner of the garage the young woman stared at the door. "We could knock," Corporal O'Rourke suggested only half-facetiously. The look he received made him grin.

"If they haven't heard us by now, either they're unconscious or think we're the demons," she replied, looking back to the door. "That's a very solid door. I could blow it open easily enough but the concussion would probably kill anyone down there. I may have to call Yori or Chou to come and cut it open. Unless..." He watched as she got a thoughtful expression. Kneeling down, sweeping the skirt of her coat out of the way, the silver-haired girl tapped around the edges of the door listening intently. "Ah. There... and there. Two locking bolts. Let's see if this works." The soldier gaped as a glow built around her hand, enclosing it in a sphere of energy which whitened out his NV goggles. He flipped them up out of the way to see that the leaf-green glow lit the entire garage. She glanced at him.

"I haven't tried anything like this on this scale," the girl commented, then leaned forward and pressed the ball of greenish fox-fire against the thick metal door in the first of the places she'd located. Her fist slowly sank into the metal with a crackling sound, the steel alloy vanishing into the energy. After ten seconds or so she withdrew her hand from the hole she'd made, looking into it. The edges were glowing dull red. "OK, that's one." She repeated the process on the other bolt. "Got it." A wave of cold air came from her hand, chilling the metal to ambient temperature rapidly.
Reaching in she used the holes as hand-holds and pulled it open easily, dropping it to the floor with a clang. A wave of horribly stale air rolled out, redolent with the smell of human waste and other disgusting scents.

"Gah, that stinks," O'Rourke said.

"We should let it air out for a moment." The girl stood, waiting, with a calm expression. "Yori and Lieutenant Kent found another survivor," she suddenly said. "An old man, a few hundred metres away." He looked at her, wondering yet again how on earth she was doing that, as there was no visible radio equipment. She smiled very slightly. "It should be OK to go down, I think." They climbed into the hole the door had covered, Azumi leading the way, using the ladder bolted to the wall. It descended some six metres, then became a passageway leading back under the driveway, about another ten metres. This ended in a door with a hand-wheel in the middle like something from a ship.

"Looks like navy surplus," the corporal noted with interest. Grabbing the handle Azumi twitched.

"Ow," she said mildly.

"What?"

"It's electrified. Don't touch it." She turned it, meeting momentary resistance which ended with a sudden metallic snap, before the wheel spun. When it stopped moving she pulled the door open. There was a gunshot, horrifically loud in the confined space, making O'Rourke hit the floor with his ears ringing, his weapon in his hands.

"Please don't do that," he could just make out Azumi saying surprisingly gently. "We're here to help you." Looking up he saw her standing in the doorway tossing a copper-jacketed bullet in her hand then catching it again. The room beyond was lit by a number of chemical lights, revealing a man and woman in late middle age along with a boy of around sixteen. All of them were gaping at the girl in the doorway. None of them looked very well, the man in particular was clearly only holding himself up with an extreme effort of will, as the gun he was holding shook wildly in his hand. He looked at it for a moment, then lowered it, staring at the silver-haired young woman.

"But... I shot you?" he stammered. She nodded, smiling a small amount, then handed him the bullet.

"Yes. Quite good aim under the circumstances. Please don't do it again."

"Who are you?" the woman asked in shock and relief, mixed in equal quantities, as the man sat down hard, staring at the bullet in his hand.

"My name is Azumi. This is Corporal O'Rourke from the Army. Come with us, we'll get you somewhere safe and less unpleasant than this place, unless you really want to stay here?" She shook her head violently.

"No, I really, really want to get out."

"I must warn you that there is a very large amount of destruction up there," Azumi said, looking at them one by one. "Your house is more or less destroyed, as is the town. There are very few survivors. We've located six so far." She got a slightly distant expression for a moment. "Seven. One more just turned up."

"There were over three hundred people in Halleckton a week ago," the man said heavily, dropping his pistol to the floor with a clunk, then putting his head in his hands.
"I know. I'm sorry. I'm afraid it's very unlikely that any of them managed to escape."

"What the hell were those things?" the boy asked, speaking for the first time. The young woman looked across at him.

"Demons."

"Demons?"

"Yes. Well, strictly speaking it would be more accurate to call them alien life-forms, but demons is as good a description as anything. They came through something called a portal. There were nine of them. We've destroyed two and trapped the rest."

All three people in the bunker stared at her in disbelief. "Come on, let's get you upstairs and somewhere safe. Explanations can wait. You all look dehydrated and hungry."

"We ran out of food yesterday and water this morning," the man said. Azumi pulled three bottles of water from nowhere and distributed them. Unscrewing the caps the survivors drained them without questioning where they'd come from. "Thank you," he said when he'd finished the bottle. Unsteadily, he stood, his wife helping him. Their son watched for a moment, then also helped. Azumi and O'Rourke stood out of the way as the three headed slowly for the ladder. They needed the help of the two rescuers to climb it as they were weak from hunger and thirst, but shortly they were all standing in the remains of the garage. Aiko and Pedersen were waiting for them.

"These are friends of mine," Azumi said to the survivors. "They'll take you to CFB Trenton, to the medical unit there. You can get food and more water when you arrive. Are there any medical problems any of you have?" They shook their heads.

"We managed to get into the shelter before those things came through," the man said, looking around at the destruction he could barely see in the darkness, before turning back to her. "We're all basically fine aside from being down there for however long it's been."

"Eight days," his wife said. He looked startled but nodded after a moment.

"God. Was it that long?"

Aiko inspected them. "I'm afraid, considering the condition you're in, that the teleport will be rougher on you than normal. I can arrange for you to be unconscious if you'd like, you won't feel it then. Otherwise you're probably going to be violently sick for a few seconds." They all looked at each other, then around at the remains of their home.

"We just want to get out of here as fast as possible," the son said, looking at his parents. They seemed to agree.

"OK. Get ready." Azumi and O'Rourke stepped back as the group vanished, then began their search once more.

"Seventeen people. That's all they found," Inspector Deveraux said heavily, putting her phone away. "Yori is sure that they've found everyone left alive there. One of them was one of our people from the second car the local station sent out. They couldn't find any trace of the other one. The survivors between them suggested that the total population was approximately three hundred and nineteen people, give or take half a dozen. Those things have killed something like three hundred people in the last week. And that's only because they ran out of victims."
Chief Superintendent Wilkinson appeared ill. His face had paled when she'd mentioned the death toll. "Oh, lord, that's unbelievable. This is much worse than London." After a moment's silence, he asked, "What about the demons?"

"They've destroyed two, have one trapped in an old mineshaft, and six more trapped behind something Yori calls a 'ward'. Some sort of forcefield, I think. They were about to go in and check out the Murray residence, they left that for last. Apparently it's very large with some sort of underground part, possibly using another old mine for that. It's the only place they haven't swept yet. She says she wants to be sure the portal bomb is destroyed."

"They can blow the entire place to hell for all I care," Wilkinson growled. "I hope that bastard is still alive, though. I want him."

"We all do. If Yori finds him we may have to settle for seconds, though. She is very unhappy."

"If he is still alive, he'll remain that way, unless he seriously threatens someone," Agent Naito said, watching them both. "Yori isn't a killer, she's a warrior. There's a difference. She'll keep him alive for you, not slaughter him out of hand, however much she might enjoy it personally." He smiled in a rather worrying way. "But she'll terrify him to the depths of his soul, trust me. He'll be lucky to come out of that encounter with his sanity intact."

Deveraux smiled in much the same manner. "Good."

Second Lieutenant Kent inspected the large house partially build into the hillside overlooking Lake Halleck. It was perhaps fifteen metres above the waterline, with a set of wooden stairs leading down to a private dock to which several boats were moored. Two of them had sunk, only the bow visible from the larger one. The other was barely floating, completely swamped, but not yet on the bottom of the lake. To one side of the main house was a tennis court, beyond which was a swimming pool with a helipad laid out near it, a brand new and now completely written off Bell 230 Executive helicopter lying on it's side some distance from where it had landed. A gravel car park had half a dozen expensive SUV type vehicles in it.

"Someone has money to burn," he commented, looking around.

Chou looked over to him. "Anthony Murray is apparently a multi-millionaire. He made his money in the financial markets, although his reputation is one of someone who is more than a little ruthless, not very concerned about damage to other people, or possibly even pleased by it. He's been implicated in a number of scandals in Canada and the US but never charged. There were rumours of bribery, intimidation, and blackmail. Not a very nice person I fear."

"Plus you can add he's responsible for the deaths of some three hundred people," Yori growled, scanning the area. "For that, he's going to pay, assuming he hasn't already." She was furious. Chou put an arm around her for a moment, then released her.

"Let's check." They walked towards the entrance to the house, warily looking around. "Don't go past that row of trees over there," the blonde said, indicating a point some fifty metres away. "The warded area the demons are trapped in starts just after it. The wards won't let them out, but they would let you in. That would be bad." All four soldiers looked, making mental notes to stay the hell away from the trees.

"Got it." Kent stared up at the three story building. A number of windows were broken, apparently from the inside, while the front door and much of the surrounding woodwork was lying in the driveway. A car was on it's roof near the garage to one side, burned out, while the garage itself was somewhat scorched from the heat, the large door badly dented where the car seemed to have collided with it. The damage looked about a week old for the most part, although the burnt-out car was probably more recent, since it still smelled strongly of fuel. As they approached they could see several bodies, some severely chewed, scattered around near the door, which gave the impression that the people inside had made an unsuccessful bid for freedom. "What a mess," he added, looking down at one body. Squatting down he opened the jacket and pulled out a wallet, opening it to look for ID. "This guy was the helicopter pilot, I think, he's got a pilot's license with rotary wing aircraft rating."

"Poor bastard." Silva took a photo with the last of the roll, then reloaded his camera, before documenting the other bodies and the damage to the house and grounds. The flash strobed in the darkness, lighting up the area intermittently, while Yori and the girls fanned out carefully checking the grounds. Kent watched as Misaki and Fumiko stared at the ground, walking around slowly, clearly following something they could see or feel.

"What is it?" he asked curiously, approaching them. Fumiko looked up.

"There are several tunnels under here. Maybe ten or twelve metres down. One seems to lead towards where the demons are, another one goes downhill in the direction of the lake. Some others lead under the house."

"Old mines again?" he wondered out loud, looking at the ground. He couldn't see anything unusual. She nodded, her attention back on the driveway.

"I suspect so. They seem to be a fairly even width but open out occasionally." After a moment she stopped following the tunnels and walked back to him. "I'm guessing that the portal device is down there somewhere, the demons came through then followed the tunnel to some exit over there past the trees, then came back above ground. All the damage to the house seems to be from the outside inwards, not the other way around, which suggests they didn't come from inside."

"Makes sense." He went back with her to where Yori and Chou were discussing something, while Misaki kept mapping the underground works, joined after a moment by Tamiko. When he reached them, Yori looked around.

"There's definitely someone alive in there.. It feels like perhaps three, maybe up to six people. At least one of them is unconscious which is why the uncertainty. There's also traces of some reasonably strong magic, several different types in fact, something that leads us to believe that Mr Murray's collection of artefacts is inside somewhere. He certainly has more than the collection from Australia, aside from the device nothing else in it was very interesting from what we could make out. There is some sort of primitive ward blocking the emanations which is why we didn't detect it from further away." She shrugged.

"At least the portal isn't active, they're almost impossible to shield at all, the ward here wouldn't make the slightest difference. You'd be able to feel it kilometres away." Concentrating, she nodded after a few seconds. "Right. I've killed the ward. Let's see if that makes a difference..." She fell silent, exchanging a glance with Chou. "Odd. I can't quite determine for sure if there are any more demons down there, they merge into the background. I can feel the ones behind us, and just about the one in the mine, but I'm getting strange readings from underground. I think it's all the magical artefacts kicking up interference. There's a possibility another demon or two might be loose down there, so be very careful."

Chou added, "The people we can sense are just outside the area that was warded. I suspect that they're locked in to some sort of panic room. I believe that's fairly common among wealthy people, and in this case, the presence of the old mine workings under the house would make it fairly straightforward to construct something very difficult to get into by an attacker." She looked around.

"Misaki found something to the side of the house." The group walked over, rounding the end of the building to find the young woman examining a set of pipes and ventilation equipment on a concrete pad in the side garden.

"Looks like some sort of air inlet and exhaust for an underground room," she said, glancing up for a moment. "This is a high flow low pressure pump, along with filtration equipment, emergency shut-off, radiation detectors, toxic gas detectors, you name it. I can't even identify half of it. There's a big battery for it as well, it's running off that at the moment." The equipment was emitting a low humming rumble, clearly active. "Very expensive installation. The sort of thing you'd find on government emergency bunkers."

"The panic room must be right under here," Chou said, looking at the ground. "There's certainly a large void down there, and some life signs are in this general area, more that way though." She indicated the house. "The amount of earth and rock in the way makes it difficult to be certain."

"We could dig our way in," Yori suggested thoughtfully. "Or teleport." She glanced at Aiko, who shook her head.

"I'd prefer not to. Enclosed spaces underground can be tricky."

"Fair enough."

Chou pondered the problem. "Perhaps it would be better to go through the house. There's less likelihood of harming someone that way." After a moment Yori nodded.

"OK." They all trooped back to the front door, Azumi and Aiko joining them, as Silva walked over with the other two soldiers. "Right. In we go. There definitely aren't any demons in the house itself, so you lot can go through that. Look for any survivors. If someone is badly injured and near death we might not detect them until we're closer. Chou and I are going down to see if we can find the entrance to wherever the people we can detect are. Aiko will come with us. Each of the soldiers with one of us, be careful, and keep in contact." Everyone nodded, grouping up and entering the building.

O'Rourke and Azumi looked around the ground floor kitchen they'd entered moments ago, then exchanged glances. It looked like a hurricane laced with broken glass had gone through. Every item of furniture was smashed to pieces, there was a hole in the wall, and pipes leaking from the ceiling. Several bullet holes were evident in the walls. The man responsible for them was on the floor. And the walls. And the ceiling. They moved on, as there was nothing else to do. It was the fifth room they'd searched, but luckily only the first body.

The room exited into a small courtyard, a few metres across, before going into another part of the building which was partially built into the hillside. They entered cautiously. Azumi stopped, looking around. "There's something in here," she whispered to the corporal.

"Where?" he asked, unlimbering his rifle while putting his side-arm away. She looked at the gun but said nothing about it.

"I'm not sure. I can feel something odd, though. It's difficult to explain." Looking around, she pointed. "That way, I think. Be careful." Very slowly they edged their way to the door into the next room. It was a long hall, some sort of dining room, perhaps twenty metres in length, with windows all down one side overlooking the lake. Several of them were broken. Nothing was immediately visible so they went in, staying close to the wall. After a few paces, O'Rourke stopped.

"That's not you breathing, is it, Azumi?" he asked, knowing the answer. She shook her head, looking up. In one corner of the room was a sort of balcony opening out over the floor, on which was lying an horrific creature. It was curled into a ball, but the corporal estimated it would be over three metres tall when erect. A long tail twitched slightly, while one of the arms came up and scratched its back. "Shit."

"Keep quiet," the girl hissed, crouching down and aiming at it with her right hand. "Yori missed this one somehow," her voice sounded in his radio, making him twitch in surprise. He stared at her. She was looking intently at the demon, while her lips weren't moving. She glanced at him, a small smile flickering across her mouth. "I'm going to have to take it out. If it wakes up it's going to be much more difficult to deal with." He nodded, quietly moving to the side. With no sound, a ball of green energy grew in her hand, reaching the size of a basketball before beginning to shrink again, becoming brighter in the process. O'Rourke stared for a moment, then looked back at the demon.

Which was looking back at them.

"Fuck!" he yelled, diving to the side as the thing launched itself in a flat trajectory at the pair of them. Azumi fired her energy ball then leaped to the side, the demon crashing to the floor and sliding out the door they'd just entered as the green energy sphere blew an enormous hole in the end of the room with a massive boom, shattering every remaining window instantly. Ears ringing, both of them whirled to see the demon getting to it's feet in the courtyard. O'Rourke opened up on it, an entire magazine punching holes all over it. The thing staggered, roaring in pain and rage, before turning to look at him. Swearing under his breath the soldier dropped the magazine from his weapon and rammed another one in, opening fire again.

The demon bent down and picked up a large flagstone, whipping it at him like a frisbee. Azumi accurately shot it out of the air with a much smaller energy ball half-way between the thing and his head, making him flinch, yelping in pain as he was spattered by gravel. Ducking, he took aim again. Once more it picked up a stone, throwing it even harder and faster. The girl missed with her return fire, then rammed him out of the way where his head would have been and caught her in the chest. With a cry of pain she was thrown several metres.

"Azumi!" he called, worried, not taking his eyes off the demon.

"Ow," she replied, sounding breathless. "That really fucking hurt."

"You OK?"

"More or less. I'll live. Get out of the way." He dropped to the ground, there was something in her voice that made him move without thinking, or it could have been the growing green light coming from behind him. Just as he hit the ground another, bigger, energy ball shot over his head and hit the demon between the eyes. Most of it vanished with a brilliant flash and a sound that blew him flat. "Got the fucker," she said, then groaned in pain. Opening his eyes which had involuntarily closed during the flash, he looked over his shoulder. The girl was sitting up, one arm across her chest. She rubbed her body gently, grimacing. Standing, he cast a glance at the courtyard, which now contained the legs and tail of a demon, before walking over to her and offering his hand. Taking it she pulled herself to her feet. "Thanks."

"Thank you. That rock had my name on it. It certainly wouldn't have bounced, even with the helmet."
"You're welcome. Ow." She looked at the smoking remains of the demon with satisfaction.

"Do we need to get Chou or Yori to heal you?" he asked with concern, looking at her carefully. There was some blood soaking through her clothes.

"Not yet. It's not serious but it hurts like a bastard. Let's finish our sweep, then we can go back."

She inspected him. "You'll need some work as well," the girl noted, touching a cut on his face. Reaching up he found there were several of them.

"Tis but a scratch," he said with a grin. She looked at him for a long moment.

"A scratch? Your arm's off!" He laughed in sudden relief, the combination of her cold expression and the appropriate quote was hysterical. Smiling a little, she warmed considerably. "Come on, sir Black Night, let's finish our mission." Chuckling, he followed her as she made her way through the debris.

Lieutenant Kent found himself accompanying Fumiko. He glanced at her as they ascended the stairs to the next floor. She smiled back. "How are you doing, Lieutenant?" she asked.

"All right, I guess, Fumiko. I've seen some pretty nasty things in the past. I was in the gulf in '91, that wasn't a lot of fun." He went quiet for a moment. "But... this is home, you know? This sort of thing isn't suppose to happen at home. All this death, destruction, pain, it's bad. Such a nasty way to go." The girl sighed a little.

"I know. I sympathise. We've encountered these things before, seen what they do to people. London was bad. This is much worse, of course. But even when the first one turned up nearly a year ago in Tokyo, it was horrible. Tamiko got hurt fairly badly, five people died... If it wasn't for Yori, it could have been a lot worse. Since then, she's taught us a lot, we're much more powerful and able to deal with the things, yet even so we couldn't prevent any of this." They arrived at the top floor having climbed three flights of stairs very cautiously without seeing any people. "It's not a nice feeling, being helpless to stop this sort of thing happening. It's our entire reason for doing what we do." The soldier nodded, while carefully peering through a doorway into a wrecked room, his rifle at the ready.

"I know. Despite our rather different methods," he looked at her and grinned briefly, an expression she returned, "I think we work on a similar basis." Fumiko checked the room on the other side of the corridor, shaking her head soberly when she came back out.

"Another body, I'm afraid. A young woman."

"Damn. How many is that now?"

The girl thought for a moment. "Two hundred and thirty-seven bodies we can identify, another probable forty-three partial bodies, and scenes that suggest the presence of a further twenty-two kills, but with no bodies left." Kent sighed.

"That's..." She nodded, understanding exactly what he meant.

"Yes." They moved on. While they were checking the last room, Fumiko suddenly looked up. "Azumi and O'Rourke just encountered a demon." Kent looked at her, worried. There was a distant explosion. Fumiko winced. "Oh dear. She missed." Gunfire broke out somewhere downstairs to the rear of the building. It stopped, then restarted, accompanied by a pair of smaller blasts, then a massive one. The house shook slightly. "She got it. She's slightly injured, O'Rourke is fine except for some scratches," the girl reported after a few seconds.
"How did Yori miss that one?" the lieutenant asked.

"It was asleep. I guess it didn't show up as much on her scan."

"I hope there aren't any more like that," he said, looking around suspiciously. The girl nodded, following his gaze.

"You and me both." Half a minute later, she added, "Tamiko and Pedersen just found a survivor, in the garage." They finished their task, before going back downstairs, meeting Silva and Misaki on the way. The tall soldier looked at his superior, who shook his head.

"One fatality, no survivors."

"We found two more fatalities. Tamiko says Azumi and O'Rourke found another one in the kitchen. No word on Yori's team yet." Going into the garage the four looked around, spotting Pedersen behind a large people-carrier, then headed for him. Tamiko was kneeling next to him holding an unconscious man in his middle-fifties down while Chou set his leg. Her hands glowed as she healed the bone then woke the patient. He stirred slightly, groaning, before opening his eyes and staring around at them all, barely able to see. Realising the problem Chou raised her hand, a gibbous ball of golden light forming in it and illuminating the scene. He gaped, then looked at her calm face, as she smiled gently at him.

"Hello. I'm Chou. How do you feel?"

"My head aches horribly but other than that I feel surprisingly good." His voice was hoarse and scratchy. Looking down at his leg he moved it gingerly, looking startled when it didn't hurt, before returning his gaze to her.

"It's all healed up. Your blood pressure is much too high, I want to have a look at that when this is all over, but in the mean time we'll evacuate you to a safe place." She and Tamiko helped him to his feet, then gave him a bottle of water, which he rapidly drank, before looking around at the others.

"Army?" he asked, seeing the uniforms of the three soldiers. Kent stepped forward.

"Second Lieutenant Kent, sir. We're going to take you to the medical unit at Trenton CFB. The other survivors of the... event... are there already."

"What the hell happened?" the man asked, his voice full of remembered pain. "I was just coming back from a trip further north with some friends, we're all staying at Tony's place, but when we drove up the house looked like it had been bombed. The garage was open so I drove the vehicle in, the other guys got out with their rifles to investigate. Just after I closed the doors I heard shots. And a weird roaring noise, like a tiger on drugs or something. Next thing I knew something hit the door and knocked me flying, right under the car. Last thing I can remember."

"When was that, sir?" Silva asked, a notebook in his hand. The man thought.

"Um, the twelfth, I think?"

"It's the fourteenth today. You were under there for nearly two days." He looked startled.

"No wonder I feel like I could drink a swimming pool." Chou smiled and handed him some more water, which he took gratefully.

"Thank you."
"You were attacked by demons, I'm afraid," she told him, as he finished the bottle and looked around for somewhere to put it. She took it back and made it vanish. The survivor stared in disbelief at her words.

"What!?"

"It's true, sir," Kent said. "It appears that Mr Murray laid hands on a mystical weapon he most definitely should not have possessed, it got triggered, and the result is that a number of extremely dangerous alien lifeforms, our consultants here call them demons, came through and ran amok." Pausing for a moment while he assessed the man, he added delicately, "I'm sorry to say that the casualty count is very high."

After a long pause, the man looked straight at him.

"How high?"

"Including you, we have found only eighteen survivors in the entire town."

Their survivor stared in horror, speechless, for nearly twenty seconds. "Oh, god," he finally said, his face white. Chou put her hand on his shoulder, discreetly checking his state of health.

"You shouldn't worry about it right now. There's nothing you can do or could have done about it, by the time you returned it's likely that most of the deaths had already occurred. Just consider yourself lucky you survived." He made no response, simply staring at the floor, shaking. With a very small sigh she glanced at Tamiko, who moved behind him, then caught him as she gently touched his forehead, causing him to drop like he'd been shot. "He'll be out for an hour or so," she told Kent and the others. "When he wakes up I hope he'll feel a little better."

"They're all going to need a lot of counselling after all this," Silva noted grimly. "I may do myself." She sighed again.

"I know. I wish I could do something about that, but while we're very good with the medical issues, mental problems are beyond our current skills." Aiko and Yori entered the garage, walking over to them. The girls exchanged glances without saying anything, before Aiko carefully picked the man out of Tamiko's arms, stepped a couple of metres away, then teleported out.

"We found the entrance to the panic room. Also what looks like the entrance to the underground section that the magical artefacts are in. It's still locked, so the demons must have got out a different way. There are three people inside the room from what we can tell." She glanced around at them all. "Azumi and O'Rourke found two casualties, both dead, they're on their way back now. That's the house swept. Five dead inside, seven more outside, plus one we found in the basement heading towards the panic room. Actually, all we found was a very large pool of blood and a finger, but I think we can be sure he didn't survive it." Azumi and the corporal came into the garage. "Right. Let's go and extract whoever is in that room, and if it's Mr Anthony Murray, he'd better hope whatever god he prays to is merciful, because I won't be." This last part was said in a growl that sent shivers down the backs of everyone present except Chou, who hugged her partner briefly, an expression that perfectly matched the sentiment on her own face. Popping back into existence Aiko walked over, as they all left the garage, heading downstairs to the basement.

Václav sighed inaudibly at the sound of his current employer's voice, wishing for the umpteenth time he'd never heard the name 'Anthony Murray'. It had brought nothing but trouble, pain, and near death. Near, as in just the other side of it, for several people, he'd seen at least two of them killed by those fucking demons before they'd made it to the panic room. Nick, Murray's security man, had been torn to pieces in front of his eyes, the man's fifty calibre Desert Eagle doing nothing but drive the demon that had attacked them into a frenzy. At least it had been quick.

"And this is at least half my fault," the mage thought to himself. 'Me and my bright ideas. Oh, it worked, all right, that's the problem. I should have walked away when I found out what that bastard had. But no, I had to accept all that money. Idiot.' He looked up from where he was kneeling by the side of the bed, on which lay Sara, Murray's current, and fifth, wife. "That's the best I can do. I'm running low on power, plus I'm not a healer in the first place. She needs some real medical help." The woman had a badly infected broken arm and, he suspected, internal injuries. She'd fallen into a state that looked horribly like a coma to him some twelve hours earlier. Antibiotics from the panic room medical stores and some simple healing spells seemed to be keeping her alive and her fever down to merely roasting, but he was under no illusions that she would survive short of either a miracle or sudden, serious, medical intervention.

Anthony Murray nodded absently, checking the security computer once more. He didn't seem all that concerned. The mage had formed the opinion that the beautiful blonde woman was seen as another pricey accessory for the financial magnate, like his Ferrari or the helicopter outside. Just something that could be replaced with another, newer, model when it got a little tattered and tired. He stood, looking at the woman on the bed, gently brushing her hair out of her face before turning to the other man. He'd formed an immediate liking for the woman, finding her witty, intelligent, and generally fun to be around. What she saw in the man thirty years her senior was beyond him, aside from the obvious monetary value. He doubted that at the moment she'd think that was enough.

"So, how much longer are we going to be in here?" Václav asked, walking over to Murray. The man sighed loudly.

"You keep asking that. I told you, I set the lock-down for ten days. We can't get out until then, and no one can get in. Don't worry, we're perfectly safe. There's enough food for a month, water as well, the backup generators have enough fuel for twice that, and the batteries would give another week." He gestured grandly around. "The walls are thirty centimetres of vanadium steel set into the rock, which is extremely hard anyway. There's no way those things can get in. That door is nearly a metre thick."

"That's not what I'm worried about! Your wife is seriously injured, she'll be dead in less than a day if I'm any judge."

"I can't do anything about that," Murray replied, casting a glance at the figure on the bed. "The doors are sealed for another two days."

"Oh, fuck it all! Why the hell did I listen to you?" the mage yelled, stomping across the room and dropping into a chair. The financial expert stared at him for a moment then dismissed him, going back to his computer.

"Because I paid you a million US dollars," he said with some rather dark amusement in his voice.

"And look where that got me! Stuck in a fucking underground bunker with a dying woman and you, demons rampaging around outside! God knows how many people have died."

"The army or the cops or someone will turn up and deal with it." Murray swivelled his chair around, fixing the mage with his gaze. "Then we come out, tell them we got trapped and barely made it to safety, thank them profusely, and get on with life. That device is probably still down there. I know it's out of power but I'm sure it could be recharged. The spells were part of it, right?"
Václav stared at him in stunned amazement. "You have got to be insane. After what's happened, you want to try again?"

"Why not? If we can come up with a cheap method of using portals for transport, the US military, if no one else, would pay a hell of a lot of money for it. I know Americans don't believe in magic, on the whole, but I'm sure after a few demonstrations we could convince them."

"You're fucking nuts." Shaking his head, the mage stared in open-mouthed astonishment at the other man. "If you'd shown me that warning the Japanese sent out before we started fiddling with that thing I wouldn't have touched it with a pole of any length."

"I know." Murray shrugged. "That's why I didn't show it to you."

Muttering obscenities in his native Czech, the mage glared at the financier, who seemed unmoved. After a while, he began looking curiously around, then stared up.

"What is it?" Murray asked, noticing this odd behaviour.

"Something..." Václav paused. "Something odd. Something powerful... incredibly powerful." He stared at the ceiling a metre above them for a moment longer. "Several somethings."

"The demons?"

"No. Something much, much worse. I've never felt anything remotely like it." The sensations of something like, but at the same time unlike, magic rolled over him from above, moving steadily closer. Mixed with them was the overwhelming sensation of extreme anger, ruthlessly suppressed. He shuddered. Whatever it was was dangerous on a scale he had no ability to quantify. The energy signature gave him a queasy feeling. Whatever it was stopped directly above them, was joined by several others, two of which were vastly more powerful, one of those being absolutely awe-inspiring, then they moved off again. He found he was whispering. With shock he also noticed that the wards he'd erected around the artefact storage area had simply died, for no apparent reason, at some point in the last ten minutes.

Murray was watching him curiously, having felt nothing, but having been fascinated by the way the mage's gaze had clearly been tracking something on the surface, even though he couldn't see it. "What is it?"

"I have absolutely no idea. I don't know I want to find out, either." The mage shuddered. "It's... beyond my experience, completely. They're in the house, I think, now." They sat silently for a while, listening. "Three of them are coming closer," he whispered, looking at the door. The sources of the disturbing emanations came steadily closer, eventually ending up right on the other side of the door. "They're right outside." His voice had dropped to near-inaudibility. Getting up the financier walked over to the vault-like door, looking at the monitor to one side of it. The image was blank, only a few small smears showing.

"Weird. The camera is working, I think, but there's no lights out there. I'd have thought people would have needed a flashlight or something." There was no reply. Turning he saw the mage staring fixedly at the door with a pale sweating face. "Hey. Sklár. Sklár." Moving over he shook the other man slightly. "You in there? What's the problem?" Václav came back to himself with a jolt, replaying the last few seconds of conversation through his mind.

"I'm not sure they're people," he said quietly, looking up at the man, before he returned his attention to the door. "I've never felt anything like that from a human before."
The presences stayed outside the door for a while, then moved away, before coming back. Abruptly two of them vanished. He jumped. "What the hell...?" The last one, the most powerful by far, was still there. It was suddenly rejoined by one of the first two, another few minutes passed, then both of them vanished again. "I have no idea what's going on. They're all the way over the other side of the house now. Maybe the garage? Or outside?" Glancing at Murray who seemed interested, he added, "They just vanished, then reappeared instantly over there. I think it might be teleportation, but not any sort I've ever come across before. The energy usage was unbelievably efficient, no leakage at all except a tiny amount when they went."

"Teleportation? Hmm." He instantly guessed what the man would say next. "I wonder if that spell is for sale?" Václav sighed. He'd been right.

"Not everything is for sale, you realise," the mage said tiredly.

"Nonsense. You just have to offer the right price." Looking pleased with himself, Murray pulled out a notebook and wrote in it for a while. Struck by a sudden thought, he looked up. "Could they teleport into here?"

"Um. I'm not sure." Murray nodded, making another note.

They sat in silence for a while, broken only by the sound of the keyboard as the financier fiddled with the computer. Eventually, the mage looked up from where he'd been studying Sara again. "They're coming closer. All of them. Six, I think." The sources steadily approached, until they were all right on the other side of the door again. Václav stared at it nervously. With a faint hiss a line of purple light suddenly appeared piercing the door near the left side, pausing for only the briefest moment before it described a neat circle two metres across incredibly fast, then vanished. There was a pregnant pause. The sliced section of door screeched as it was pulled steadily backwards, leaving a hole in the thick metal, a hole that was filled by the figure of a petite Japanese woman, who had long black hair in a braid down to her waist, hair with a brilliant blue streak in it. Her clothing was similarly coloured, matt black silk with a blue stripe off-centre, while leather boots and leather fingerless gloves completed the picture. She glanced around the occupants of the room, her gaze pausing on the mage, who had gone completely white.

"You know who I am," she stated flatly. He nodded, his entire body trembling.

"Yori."

"Correct. I want a word with you." Stepping into the room she indicated the hole behind her. "Out. Now." He stood without saying anything and left the room, Murray watching with surprise. She turned her gaze to him.

"Anthony Murray."

"That's me. And you are...?" He stood, approaching her with his hand out. Two more women, one a tall blonde and one, somewhat shorter, with silver hair, entered silently, carefully picked his wife off the bed, then left again. She ignored them, and his outstretched hand, completely.

"Annoyed. Very, very annoyed. We need to talk." He gaped as she started glowing purple, walking slowly towards him.

Outside the room the mage Václav Sklár was looking around, his heart in his boots. Aside from Yori, someone he'd never thought he'd encounter although he'd heard a lot of stories, he recognised the blonde woman approaching him as Chou, someone else he'd heard things about. Five other women were looking at him with various expressions, none of them happy ones. The silver-haired girl walking beside Chou gave him a look that chilled him to the bone as she silently passed, going into the panic room. He couldn't feel anything at all from her, weirdly. They both came out seconds later, carefully carrying Sara. Moving off to a clear part of the basement they put her down. He watched as unbelievably effective healing magic of a type he'd never seen before was brought into play, giving Sara the miracle she needed. He sighed slightly in relief.

The four soldiers standing around pointing weapons at him made him nervous, but not as much as the women, who were still watching him with the sort of curious contempt a cat has for an injured mouse that still has some life left in it. When the waves of soul-chilling horror began to flow from the room behind him, all of them slowly smiled with almost identical expressions of demonic glee. Chou glanced at the entrance, then the soldiers who were looking nervously at the hole in the door, before motioning them away. They obeyed without question and with alacrity. The silver-haired girl and one with auburn hair took up a position behind him, then fairly gently urged him to begin walking. They headed upstairs with the blonde carrying Sara.

Behind them, the screaming started.

Laura listened, nodding, then thanked the caller, before putting her phone on the table. "They swept the Murray residence. Thirteen fatalities, four survivors, including Anthony Murray, his wife Sara, and a mage from the Czech Republic by the name of Václav Sklár." She sighed. "The final death toll, assuming no other bodies turn up, is three hundred and fifteen. Twenty-one survivors. Christ."

"At least they got the bastard," Evan said, glancing at Chief Superintendent Wilkinson, who didn't look any happier at this thought.

"True." She smiled viciously. "Yori is talking to him at the moment. It may take a while. When and if he recovers from that we can throw the book at him, although I can't quite work out what we're going to charge him with. Magic and our judicial system are an uneasy fit."

"Felony stupidity, gross misuse of oxygen, and multiple counts of murder, if I can make it stick," Wilkinson said, glaring out the window. "Everything we can think of. They'll probably have to invent new crimes just to charge him properly. I'm half-hoping he dies of a heart attack while she's 'talking' to him."

"That wouldn't help. She'd just bring him back. However many times it takes." Deveraux shrugged. "Can't say it bothers me over-much."

Agent Naito listened quietly. Eventually he said, "She'll bring him back intact, more or less. But I doubt he'll be quite the same."

No one said anything as they waited in one of the rooms upstairs, one that was more or less undamaged, although one of the windows was broken. Eventually, though, the silence getting to him, Václav turned to Chou. "What's going to happen now?" he asked. She looked at him for a while.

"Murray will be turned over to the RCMP. After that he's out of our hands. You, on the other hand, we will want to talk to for some time. We take a considerable interest in matters surrounding the portal devices. I suspect you are one of those matters." He shuddered at the tone of her voice.

"I'm sorry. I didn't mean for all this to happen. It was just an interesting idea. I didn't think anybody would die." One of the soldiers, a short but tough looking man with very dark skin, snorted derisively.
"Shouldn't have done it, then. If you hadn't, over three hundred people would still be alive." The mage's heart nearly stopped, while Chou glanced at the soldier, who fell silent again.

"Three hundred people?" he whispered in horrified shock. The blonde nodded, an expression of deep disgust on her face.

"Yes. Basically, the entire town. Including you three, only twenty-one people survived. Ten demons will do that." He shook his head, trying not to hear what she said.

"What the hell have I done?" he thought in despair. After a moment, he noticed something wrong in what she'd told him. "Ten?" Chou nodded, studying him with sudden interest.

"Yes. Ten." She looked suspicious. "Why?"

"Ah... There were more than ten that came through." Everyone stared at him.

"What?" One of the soldiers, the one with the lieutenant's patch on his sleeve, jumped to his feet and glared at the mage. Chou gave him a look which made him sit again, although his glare didn't stop. She returned her attention to Václav.

"How many more?" she asked carefully.

"About nine." There was dead silence for a few seconds.

"You're saying that nineteen demons came through the portal?" Chou clarified, raising her eyebrows while glowing a faint golden colour. The danger in her voice made him shrink back into his chair.

"Yes." His voice was very small. There was silence again.

"Oh, fuck," the small corporal said in the end. Chou nodded.

"Quite." Standing, she walked over, then squatted in front of the mage, smiling sweetly at him. "Now, perhaps you can tell me please, where are the others? We've disposed of three and have seven more trapped."

"They're down in the tunnels." She looked steadily at him, forcing him to expand on that. "The portal device is down there. When it triggered, the demons came through. We only just got out in time. We thought they were all trapped, until three of them smashed their way into the house. That's when Murray took us down to the panic room. Nick, the security man, he got attacked on the way. Sara got hurt in that attack but we managed to escape, lock ourselves in, even though Nick didn't make it. He managed to give us the few extra seconds we needed." He shrugged. "I guess there must be another way out they used. I know there's a tunnel that leads into the lake, apparently the miners didn't know how close they were to the bottom when they were digging and broke through. I don't know whether those things can swim, though. Murray hinted at there being another tunnel that came up somewhere outside the house, he'd fitted it out as an emergency escape. He was kind of paranoid. Odd, really, considering how many guests he invites for parties. But he's a weird guy."

"How did the portal stay open long enough for nineteen of the damn things to come through?" the short brunette asked, looking worried yet curious. He sighed.

"It was my brilliant idea. If it hadn't had the results it did I'd be rather proud of it." None of them looked impressed. "That little device was remarkably clever. I couldn't quite work out how it worked although I identified several booby-traps and bypassed them. I did figure out that it was a one-shot portal generator at heart, though, using a spell I'd never encountered before. It wasn't very energy-efficient, but it was very effective. I studied it for a few weeks, but I couldn't figure out how to make the portal last longer. It would use up all the energy in the storage sphere and shut down." He looked around at them.

"You have to understand I didn't have any idea where the portal opened. I had no idea it was so dangerous. Murray told me he'd bought it online, but what he didn't tell me how he even found out about the thing in the first place."

"How did he find out about it?" the silver-haired girl asked in an icy voice. The mage sighed.

"He happened to know someone in the FBI who owed him a favour and knew he was interested, no, more obsessed, with magical artefacts. In return for cancelling his debt he passed on the information the Japanese PSIA had circulated about the things. He didn't tell me that until we were locked in the panic room, unfortunately, or I'd have never gotten involved." He looked pleadingly at Chou. "You have to believe me. It was a mistake. I had no idea."

"Yet three hundred and fifteen people are dead." She looked at him with pitying anger. "Go on."

"One day I was looking through the artefact that Murray had collected. There are hundreds of them down there. In among all the crap was several things I realised were some sort of magical energy storage device, like the sphere the portal unit was based around, but with much larger capacity. They were about half-charged, maybe a bit less, they were pretty old. No idea where they came from originally. They looked like they were part of something much bigger at one point. There were also a few other odds and ends I thought I could possibly build a bigger version of the portal device from. I know a bit about portals, I'm no expert, but enough to get by. There was enough energy there to power one for some time. So, I played around with it for a while, and ended up with something that looked plausible." Chou was watching him with a fascinated look on her face, warring with the clear and present anger.

"That's quite clever," she said. He shrugged, looking unhappy.

"I thought so at the time. Not so much now. The idea was that the thing I'd built, powered by these storage units, could take over the portal function from the original device, which would create it in the first place. Sort of an amplifier. I didn't know quite how I'd recharge the storage units when the power was exhausted, mind you, but there should have been enough to run it for maybe half an hour. I didn't know at the time the portal it produced was so unstable. Or that it was one-way."

Chou looked at him for a moment, then stood, returning to her chair. "So you tried it."

"No. Not really. The damn thing triggered all by itself when I was showing it to Murray."

"Ah. The timer expired." He nodded with a sigh.

"I think so. I missed that completely. The portal formed, my device worked perfectly and took over holding it open, then the first demon came through. We ran for it while the thing was looking around. I could feel the portal operating, and flickering every time another demon came through. I counted nineteen fluctuations. It ran for just over a minute and shut down. My guess is the power units are still fairly full, but the inherent instability of the portal made it go pop." Chou nodded.

"Yes, they do that. That spell is very inefficient and has a built-in limitation that prevents operation for more than a very short while. Over a minute may be a record."

"Good for me." He clapped sarcastically a couple of times. "I did something clever."
"You did indeed. Unfortunately." The blonde woman was looking at him with more pity than anger now. "Why did Murray want to make a portal in the first place?"

"He had some stupid idea about using them for military transport. Apparently he knew someone in the US Army he thought might be persuaded to pay for something like that if we could demonstrate it. I told him several times it wasn't going to work the way he thought but he insisted it would be fine. The million dollar fee helped make me give it a shot." Shaking his head he stared at his feet. "Stupid of me. I suppose, if I hadn't done it, someone else probably would have, he was willing to pay practically anything, but I don't know if anyone else would have managed to do what I did." Glancing at her he added, "That's it. We ended up in the room, under lock-down. It would have opened in another two days. His plan was to wait to be rescued, claim ignorance of the whole thing, then try again somewhere else."

"What a bastard," one of the soldiers said in disgust. Nodding, the mage agreed with him.

"It wasn't until we were inside that he eventually showed me the notice from the PSIA. I wish to god he'd done that first, I'd have turned him down flat. He told me he knew that which is why he didn't show it to me."

"Mr Murray sounds like an unpleasant individual," Chou commented.

"He is that. How he's never been arrested for some of the things he boasted to me about I have no idea. Money and influence, I suppose. The one good thing to come out of this is that I guess he's finished."

"Definitely." The voice came from the doorway. Václav and the soldiers turned to see Yori standing there with the limp body of Anthony Murray over her shoulder. "We had a nice little chat. He's not going to go anywhere near magic ever again, and would dearly like to be carefully stored away in a jail cell for the rest of his life. Which will be a long and healthy one. I made sure of that." The expression on her face was horrific. Václav found himself desperately wishing he'd never seen it. One or two of the girls giggled, which made it much worse.

"Right. Let's get out of here." Everyone stood, following her outside, Chou carrying Sara who was still out. It was just at the point dawn was beginning to break, although still dark, the sky was slightly lighter to the east.

"What are we going to do about the demons?" the corporal asked curiously. Yori glanced at him.

"I wish I could shove them all back through a portal, but we have no choice. There are too many to take chances with." She looked at Aiko, who nodded. The entire group disappeared. The mage staggered at the incredible nausea sweeping over him, only barely stopping himself from falling. When he recovered he found that they were on a low ridge overlooking what he eventually recognised in the dim but growing light as Lake Halleck, on the other side from the town. In the distance a couple of kilometres away was the hillside the Murray residence was built into. Squinting, he could just make it out.

Yori lowered her burden to the ground, standing looking at him. She prodded him with her foot. "Wake up. I want you to see this." Murray groaned, stirring slightly, making her sigh irritably and bend down, prodding his chest hard. He jolted awake as if electrified, staring wildly around. Catching sight of her he went an unhealthy grey colour.

"No more. Please, god, no more," he whispered, making Václav wonder what she'd done to him. The feral smile she gave the man on the ground suggested it wasn't over yet.
"Come on, up you get. You don't want to miss the pretty fireworks." Motioning with her head to two of the soldiers, she waited as they picked him up and held him firmly. "Right. Now watch very carefully. See over there?" She pointed. Murray followed her finger after a moment, seeing where they were and what she was pointing at. He looked back to see her outstretched hand now contained a pinprick of intolerable brightness, which cast stark shadows of all of them across the ground, like a carbon arc torch. With a slight gesture the glowing point leapt from her hand and shot across the lake with a high-pitched scream. "You might want to close your eyes" she said conversationally, suiting action to words. The financier shut them just in time to avoid the extraordinarily bright flash that followed, accompanied by swearing from the soldiers. Cautiously opening his eyes, Murray stared in total horror at the rising cloud of vapour from the huge, yellow-glowing crater that was now where his house had been. It bit deeply into the hillside, totally obliterating the entire grounds and the mines beneath. Water from the lake was rushing into the lower edge of it, boiling violently where it hit molten glass and rock, adding to the cloud.

The sound rolled over them a few seconds later, a deep roaring thump that made the men all duck involuntarily. Debris rained down around their position, bouncing off a glowing golden transparent dome that had appeared covering their position, or sliding down it to the ground. The non-female members of the group, as one, turned horrified gazes on the petite woman looking at her work with satisfaction.

Turning to Anthony Murray, she smiled again. "Now we can go. There are some people in the RCMP who are quite impatient to talk to you." They disappeared in a flash of light, leaving the scene quiet except for the hissing roar from across the lake as it steadily boiled away at the lip of the crater.

Studying the broken man sitting in the cell, Chief Superintendent asked with mild curiosity, "What did you do to him?" The black-haired young woman standing beside him shrugged a little.

"Just talked." He glanced at her.

"I'm sure." Her smile was somewhat discomfiting. "Thank you for everything you've done. You and your colleagues."

"No problem. I'm more sorry than I can say that we were too late to prevent all this happening."

"It wasn't your fault. You had no idea any of this was going on until well after it happened." They turned and went back upstairs. "If we had tried to stop it, I'm certain that many more good people would have lost their lives. Most of the survivors you rescued would most likely be dead if it wasn't for you girls as well. We owe you a lot."

Yori smiled at him, slightly sadly. "No you don't. We just did what we do. We couldn't not help."

"I know. Thank you anyway." Stopping outside the conference room he held out his hand. After a moment she took it. "You're all extremely good people. I'm very pleased to have met you even under such terrible circumstances. I hope you'll visit some time."

"Thanks. We might well. I like Canada, and I have friends here." She smiled, more genuinely, before they went inside. Inspector Deveraux looked up from talking to Agent Naito, looking pleased to see Yori. Evan was chatting with Aiko and Tamiko, while Misaki was eating a cupcake.

"How is he?" she asked, not really caring.

"He'll live. But I think he's going to be thinking about his life for a long time," the girl said. She moved to sit beside Chou.

"What did you do with the mage?" Deveraux was curious.

Chou smiled at her. "We took him somewhere he won't be bothering you again." The three RCMP officers and the PSIA agent exchanged glances.

"We will want to speak to him at some point about the charges against Mr Murray," Wilkinson said cautiously.

"That can be arranged. But I think, under the circumstances, we should deal with his final disposition." Chou looked at them. No one seemed to be prepared to object. "Don't worry. He will live, and he will pay for his actions. But, as a mage, you would have trouble holding him. We can arrange something more effective."

"All right. I'm very curious, but all right."

"I almost feel sorry for him," Azumi said, an unusually reflective note in her voice. "He really didn't have any idea what he was doing was dangerous. He strikes me as a decent man who made a terrible mistake."

"I know. That doesn't excuse the deaths of over three hundred innocent people, but it does count in his favour." Yori sighed. "It's a horrible thing. Accidents do happen, people get hurt as a result, but it doesn't make it any the less an accident. Under different circumstances he would have made a good research mage. The work with the portals was brilliant. Pity about the results."

"It may be that our government would want to try and sentence him, but allow you with your resources to arrange for the sentence to be carried out," the Chief Superintendent mused. "That would satisfy everyone, I suspect." Yori glanced at Chou, who nodded slightly.

"I think we could work with that, if you want," she said.

"Thank you." He looked at his watch. "It's seven in the morning, we've been up all night. It's OK for you magical girls, you probably don't sleep anyway, but we older men need some sleep. I need to go home before I fall over." Everyone grinned.

"Understandable. We need to go and finish off the last demon, the one in the mine, do the healing of the survivors, then deal with a small problem in the UK, before we can relax." Deveraux looked at them all.

"When you finish, would you like to relax at my house? I think a decent meal is the least I can arrange after all this." She glanced at Naito, who smiled. "I'd like to catch up as well. Evan, you're invited as well. You too, sir."

"I'd like that," Chou replied, looking around at the others, who all nodded. "We'll call you when we're done."

"Good. In that case, I'm going to bed as well. There's going to be a hell of a lot of paperwork later and I'd like to have some sleep first." She stood, followed by the others. "See you later." Clustering at the end of the table, the girls and Agent Naito waved before vanishing. Opening her eyes, she looked at Wilkinson, who looked back, tiredness and satisfaction in his eyes, along with sadness.

"I'm very glad they came. I only wish they could have tracked that thing down earlier." He nodded sombrely.
"As do I. But, under the circumstances, I think it ended as well as it was ever going to."

"Unfortunately." Both of them left the room, heading home.

"Incredible." The medic standing next to O'Rourke stared in amazement as he watched the two young women repair the injuries of a number of severely damaged people. The sight of the tall blonde regenerating the foot of a young man was probably the most incredible sight he'd ever seen. "Who the hell are they? How do they do all this?" The corporal shrugged helplessly.

"I have no real explanation. It's apparently some sort of magic, that's all I know. They're from Japan, some sort of combat specialists. I have to say that their abilities go a lot further than healing, but I don't think I should say any more." With a nod the medic went back to watching the girls work. The boy hugged the woman when she finished regrowing his foot, tears in his eyes. She smiled tenderly at him, returning the hug before standing and walking over to the other one, the girl with black hair. They talked for a moment, then moved to the next patients. Within an hour they had repaired all the damage, physically at any rate. The medic was fairly sure that these people would need considerably therapy. Many of them seemed to be in shock. If what he'd heard about Halleckton was even remotely true, he could easily understand that.

When they'd finished, they went around the room talking to each of their patients, before waving to them and leaving. O'Rourke said his goodbyes to the medic and followed. Outside, he approached the group of people including the other three members of his team. Azumi looked around as he walked over, smiling at him with an expression that was considerably warmer than her normal one. "Hello, Corporal."

"Hi, Azumi. I suppose you're off now?" She nodded.

"We have business in the UK." Holding out her hand she shook his. "It's been a pleasure working with you."

"Likewise. I think I'll be wishing you were there on the next combat posting." She laughed, looking amused.

"Thanks for the compliment. Take care of yourself." She glanced at Yori, who looked back with interest, before returning her attention to the soldier. "We'd consider it a favour if you neglected to mention our communications abilities in your report. It's not a massive secret, but we'd like to keep it confidential as long as possible, it's a useful edge against some of the problems we encounter." He studied her for a moment, then looked at Lieutenant Kent. The other soldier nodded.

"OK. I can't see it's something that needs to be talked about."

"Thank you." After a moment, the girl walked over to her colleagues. Yori stepped forward, looking at the men. She pulled out one of her cards, handing it to Kent.

"Just in case." Quickly explaining how it worked, she joined her friends again. They all waved to the little group of soldiers.

"Take care, guys. Thanks for the help." Yori grinned at them, before the flash came, bright even in the early-morning sunlight. The squad looked at the empty space for a moment.

"Come on, you lot. Beers are on me," Second Lieutenant Kent said, turning and leading the way to the nearest source of it, while slipping the precious card into his inside pocket. They all followed, each busy with his own thoughts.
Sir Alan was still furious, even close to twenty-four hours after the call from Agent Naito. The tall man, his greying hair waving in the force of the wind his pacing was kicking up, swung around to Harry Williamson of the MI5, shaking his head again. "I can't believe that stupid git," he growled, his heritage showing as he slipped slightly into a distinctly rural accent. "Stupid poncey little oaf. I'm getting very, very tired of the arrogance of those damn mages. After that last incident I thought he might have learned his lesson, but no, the silly bastard is trying to get his hands on another one of those god-damned portal bombs. What the fuck does he think he's going to do with it anyway? He came minutes away from getting his entire team, and possibly the entire research wing of the MoM, gruesomely killed the last time he had one of the things." The Minister stopped pacing, staring out the window into the dark. "Pillock. I'm tempted to just let Yori have him. I'm sure she could think of something creative to do with him. That girl impressed me a lot." Harry smiled a little.

"She absolutely terrifies me, sir. I like her, I think I trust her, but I sure as hell wouldn't want to get on her bad side. I think that would be... extremely unwise. Briefly." Sir Alan laughed shortly. "Oh, I'm counting on it. Robert has gone much, much too far this time. Using MoD resources to get information on this Geoffrey Young person then trying to blackmail him, that's just the tip of the iceberg. What he was trying to do is much worse. He knows full well there is a ban on those things, he was on the committee that voted it in, and here he is trying to sneakily get the last one? Little shit has definitely stepped over the line this time. I couldn't save him from what's going to happen even if I wanted to. He's walked right into a career-ending shitstorm at the very least. He could end up on trial for treason if he's not careful. That ban was backed by royal decree, the secret protocols for that sort of thing still allow for the death penalty." The Minister sighed, sitting behind his desk with a morose look.

"No, he's going to be very lucky if all he gets is twenty years. It's a bit of a problem holding the bastard, he is a very good mage after all, but I suppose if they take his wand away, he's a little more limited. I've talked to his immediate junior in the Ministry, she thinks there is precedent for this, and ways to deal with a rogue mage. But it hasn't been used in three hundred years or more." He looked at the clock on his desk. "Any idea when they're coming?" Harry checked his watch. "Should be sometime soon, sir. They were finishing up the aftermath of this Halleckton affair in Canada. It sounds very nasty. Agent Naito told me half an hour ago he thought another forty minutes, so very soon."

The Minister nodded, opening a folder on his desk, which was marked in large, unfriendly letters with the warning, "TOP SECRET UK EYES ONLY" Under that was written "PORTAL BOMB PLOT – Background, Analysis, & Recommendations." He leafed through the documentation within, stopping on a page at the back entitled "International treaty on research moratorium, weaponised interworld portal generators, draft 5a." Reading the front page again, he closed the folder. "The Americans took some persuading, you know what they can be like with something they think is an interesting new weapon, they really want to have it while at the same time telling themselves they'll never use it. Don't seem to realise history is full of people who thought the same, but ended up using it anyway. Their CIA was pretty keen but rather surprisingly the FBI was extremely anti, their representative ended up shouting at the CIA director for nearly twenty minutes. He'd apparently met Chou, who really put the wind up him. Convinced him good and proper that this was a case where they should stay well the hell away."

The Minister chuckled a little. "It was actually quite funny. The Japanese ambassador suggested, very politely, that if the CIA really wanted to research these things he could arrange for Yori and Chou to come and talk to them. Then he played them some video. Oddly enough, at that point they seemed to change their minds very suddenly. The FBI agent was laughing." Williamson snickered.
"I can understand that, certainly. You wouldn't want Yori angry at you, especially as in this case I suspect this would end up meaning that practically every magical girl in Minato would end up backing her. That should be enough to loosen the bowels of anyone with even half a brain. I've done some research myself, if those girls ever united and decided to do something impressive we'd be lucky if the planet was still in one piece." He shook his head, grinning, but looking just a little worried. "Best not to pull the tail of that tiger, I'm absolutely certain. I'm very glad indeed that the majority of them, from what I can see, have little to no interest in anything other than what they do at the moment."

"The committee came to the same conclusion. It was helped along by the Ambassador, again excruciatingly politely, issuing a fairly hair-raising threat about his country taking any interference in the operations of Japanese 'special talent', as he put it, as an act of war. You could see from his expression that the CIA director had been entertaining some most likely highly deniable ideas about one of their little operations to enlist the unwilling cooperation of one or two of those girls. I have no doubt whatsoever it would have ended remarkably badly, for them at any rate, but I'm fairly sure the Japanese nipped that idea in the bud quite conclusively."

Williamson sighed. "They do rather have the attitude they can take what they want under the aegis of national security, regardless of where it is, don't they, sir?" Sir Alan nodded.

"I'm afraid so. I suspect that there are going to be problems as a result of that in years to come. Some of the things they've done over the last decade or so are going to bite them in the arse good and proper. I hope it doesn't suck us in as well. Mind you, we've done some damn silly things in the past like that, I suppose most countries have. They're just rather more enthusiastic about it and don't seem to learn from past mistakes."

Williamson looked at his watch. "Any moment now, I think." Looking back to the Minister, he added, "I suspect that if they tried anything, Yori would put a stop to it in the most final manner you could wish to, even if the Japanese authorities missed it. The CIA are sneaky, I'm pretty sure she's sneakier."

"Thanks," a familiar voice said, making them both jump and look around frantically. Yori faded into view, grinning, like a lethal version of the Cheshire Cat. Sir Alan looked wildly at her for a moment, then calmed down, beginning to laugh.

"Good god, woman, please don't do that. I nearly had a coronary," the Minister of Defence said, although he was smiling. Yori laughed. Seconds later the rest of her party appeared in the room.

"I'm sorry, Sir Alan, I couldn't resist the challenge. You have a very good security system here."

"Clearly not good enough," he responded. She snickered.

"None of them are. I know someone who could probably sell you something a lot better, though."

He looked hard at her. "Would it keep you out?" he asked suspiciously. She shook her head, still grinning. "Hmm. Thought not." Suddenly grinning again, he got up and walked around the desk, shaking her hand. "It's good to see you again. All of you." The rest of the girls greeted him, Tamiko kissing him on the cheek with a grin. He smiled at her. "You seem to have changed your look. Pity, I thought the other one quite fetching. Although I suppose somewhat impractical for cold weather."

She smiled, amused.

"Chou helped with that. I like these new clothes, they have a lot more style. The other outfit was a bit... extreme." He grinned. Looking at the unfamiliar new face of Azumi, he nodded to her.
"You, I don't recognise." Chou introduced them.

"This is Azumi, we're training her on behalf of a colleague. She's become a valuable addition to our group." The silver-haired girl seemed to almost smile at this, her slightly chilly and distant look warming up for a moment. He shook hands with her.

"I'm pleased to meet you, Azumi."

"Thank you, Sir Alan. Yori and the others have told me about you. It's a pleasure to meet you as well."

Going back behind his desk he sat, as Williamson greeted them all as well. When he'd retaken his seat, Yori and Agent Naito were also sitting in front of the desk, and the others were comfortably arrayed around the room and listening, he said, "So what are we going to do about Robert? From the point of view of the British Government he's completely ruined, although he doesn't know it yet." Yori sighed.

"We've got absolute proof that it was him, I'm afraid. Based on the information Mr Young gave us we had a colleague of ours, Ms Aoyama, look into his computer records from this end. Mr Williamson was able to give her some useful information as well. She didn't take long to find his records, correlate them with the ones from the Mystic Mart website, and prove the link. She's extremely good, if she says it's the case, it is. I'm very unhappy, I thought we had come to an agreement." The girl glowed visibly for a moment, an expression crossing her face that would have made Sir Alan, if he was of a religious disposition, issue a short prayer for mercy. She brought herself under control with some effort.

"So far, nearly three hundred and ninety people have died because of those damn portal bombs. The toll could have been much, much higher if it wasn't for Ms Aoyama's skill and a very large amount of luck. The thought that someone is actively researching the things, despite a pleasant warning to desist, irritates me considerably. Not to mention I'm in a very uncharitable mood after what just happened in Canada." The Minister nodded agreement.

"I feel the same way, believe me. So does the Prime Minister. She's extremely miffed. The action to deal with him has been left in my hands, as it needs to be kept discreet due to the Official Secrets act, which covers even the existence of the Ministry of Magic. To be honest while I was very tempted to round up those soldiers you met at that unpleasantness on Boxing Day and go for a little chat, I'm willing to allow you to deal with it." He grinned nastily. "I would ask that you refrain from causing a large crater, which I believe you refer to as the 'Duck Pond Option', but other than that, you have essentially free rein. I think it might stick better than if I do something myself." Yori had a predatory look on her face that boded ill for a certain soon to be ex-Minister of Magic, while somewhat hair-raising giggles came from Misaki and Tamiko. Azumi was radiating a sort of cold eagerness. Even Chou looked, just for a moment, like a wolf that had just seen a particularly well-fed piglet.

"Thank you. I'll try not to permanently damage him. Physically at least." Yori looked around as Azumi walked over, bent down, then said something in Japanese. Agent Naito winced.

Looking quizzically at them, Sir Alan asked, "May I enquire as to what you're thinking?" Yori smiled in a peculiar manner.

"Azumi suggested that it might be time for the Minister of Magic to meet Ms Aoyama." Looking slightly puzzled, Sir Alan glanced at Agent Naito.

"Is that bad?" The other man looked at him with worried eyes.
"I suspect it could be very bad. She's terrifying when she's in a good mood. I don't think she will be this time..."

"I will contact her," Azumi said calmly. "Aiko, would you be able to bring her here?" The brunette teleporter nodded, grinning. Pulling out a phone the silver haired girl dialled a number, then waited for a second or two. When it was answered she had a conversation in an odd sounding language that made the Defence Minister and Williamson stare at her, it sounded unlike anything they'd ever encountered before. Agent Naito recognised it as the demonic trade language Yori and Chou were fluent in. After a while she listened, then spoke again for a few seconds, before hanging up and disappearing the phone. She looked satisfied but somewhat regretful. "Ms Aoyama is more than happy to talk to this person and impress upon him how unwise his recent actions are. Unfortunately, she has responsibilities that cannot be abandoned, so she's asked me to cover for her while she's here. Please take notes, I'd like to learn what happens." She smiled coldly, walking over to Aiko. Both women disappeared with a flash of rainbow light. Shortly Aiko reappeared with another woman, who both British men studied with interest. She returned their gaze through dark sunglasses, then looked around the room, nodding to the Japanese people, before approaching Yori.

"Ms Yori. I believe you would like me to have a conversation. I can spare two hours in this case, my schedule is full but this matter is of considerable interest to me. I have prepared a dossier on Minister of Magic Robert Davenport and his recent activities." She produced a folder from nowhere, opening it and glancing through it with interest. "He has certainly broken a number of UK laws, including a recently passed ban on research on the portal devices, in addition to violating a treaty that is under the process of ratification on the weaponisation of interworld portals and the banning thereof. Admittedly it has not yet acquired the force of law, but as a member of the government that proposed it his actions seem ill-judged. I believe a discussion on the impropriety of certain actions would be beneficial." The folder vanished again. Sir Alan looked at her in astonishment, then down at his own folder on his desk. As far as he was aware only ten people in the world, including him, had read the contents of it. He looked up to see the woman in the smart suit and sunglasses staring at him, with something that was almost a smile on her lips. It disappeared almost immediately. Shivering slightly, he thought to himself, 'Robert, you poor bastard, you're for it now.'

"Who are you, Ms Aoyama? Who do you represent?" he asked curiously but with respect he couldn't avoid. She looked at him for a moment.

"That information is unavailable," she replied after a second or two, sounding almost regretful despite the lack of inflection in her voice. For some reason he felt it unwise to probe further, merely nodding. Turning to Yori, who was smiling slightly, the green-haired woman said in a voice devoid of emotion, "Shall we begin my introduction to Minister Davenport?"

Yori grinned in a way that made all the males in the room shudder. "Oh, yes. Let's go and have some fun." She bounced eagerly to her feet. "Would you like to come and watch, Sir Alan, Mr Williamson?" The two men looked at each other.

"Why not?" Sir Alan shrugged. "I have to admit to a certain curiosity."

Opening his eyes Robert Davenport stared into the darkness of his bedroom. Beside him his wife Janet snores faintly. 'What was that?' he wondered. There had been something just at the edge of consciousness, a sound or feeling. Probing carefully with his mage ability he could find nothing amiss. The house wards were intact, nothing had triggered them that he could detect, while he couldn't hear anything at all other than his wife. Yet, for some reason, he was sure something was wrong. After a few minutes he slipped out of bed, trying not to wake Janet, retrieving his wand from the bedside table in the process.

Pulling on a robe and slippers he flicked the wand, putting a spell of silence on the door hinges, before opening it and going into the hall, closing the door behind him. Looking around he listened again. Nothing sounded out of place. The ticking of the antique grandfather clock in the downstairs hall was clearly audible, as was a faint hum from the refrigerator in the kitchen. The machine clicked and rattled into silence. Walking as quietly as he could down the hall to the window overlooking the front of the house, he peered out, then froze.

There was a purple glowing smiley face gently rotating in the middle of the lawn, one eye closed in a wink. He stared at it in shock, before reaching out with his senses. While he could see it, he couldn't sense anything at all. Looking around the garden he couldn't detect or see anything out of place, yet there it was. After a moment more, he opened the window and leaned out, peering both directions, before closing the window again. There was nothing out there. Once more he checked the wards. Once more he found they were completely intact. Turning, he headed back down the hall, quickly checking on his wife as he passed the bedroom, before going downstairs. Walking into the living room to get a better view out the window, he nearly jumped out of his skin when a cold voice from behind him spoke.

"Ah. Minister Davenport. I have been waiting for you." He whirled, his wand raised to fire a spell, only to yelp when a tiny ball of energy knocked it out of his hand with a pop. "Please, no violence. I deplore violence." He stared at the woman sitting in the chair next to the fireplace, shocked and slightly scared. She looked back at him through dark wraparound sunglasses. Inspecting her he saw a reasonably tall woman with green hair and pointed ears, in a very expensive fitted suit, some sort of high-tech watch on her wrist, plus those glasses, sitting in his chair calmly watching him, her hands neatly folded on her lap. He hadn't even seen her move when she'd disarmed him.

"Who the hell are you?" he asked, glaring at her.

"You may refer to me as Ms Aoyama. I am here to discuss your recent attempt to purchase the last of the portal generation weapons from Mr Geoffrey Young in Sydney." He went white. There was no way...

"How the hell do you know about that?" he blustered. She smiled very faintly. "I am aware of many things, Minister Davenport," she said, her emotionless voice sending chills down his back. Glancing down at where his wand had landed, wondering whether he could get it before she got him, he stared in shock. It was gone. "It would not have been a good idea, Minister Davenport. Best to remove the temptation."

"Who are you?" he asked, his voice shaking. There was something about her aura that terrified him. It most definitely wasn't human. She took her glasses off and studied him carefully, as if she wasn't sure how intelligent he was, before replacing them. The sight of her blue catlike eyes, almost glowing in the dim light from the corner lamp, which he hadn't noticed being turned on, remained with him.

"As I believe I stated moments ago, I am Ms Aoyama." She pulled a folder out of nowhere, making him stare. Opening it she leafed through it, then looked up at him standing there. She pointed to another chair. "Sit, please. This may take some time." Unsure of himself for the first time since that horrific Yori woman just after Christmas, he sat. He couldn't think of anything else to do. Without his wand he was more limited than he liked. Ms Aoyama continued to silently look through the papers, stopping occasionally to read something. "Most enlightening. It would appear that you have something of a distressing propensity towards stretching the boundaries of the spirit of
"Although your recent activities would appear to exceed those parameters as well. We are not pleased about that fact, Minister Davenport. Not pleased at all." Closing the folder she made it disappear again. "Please explain yourself."

"What do you mean?" he asked, wondering who 'we' was. She gazed at him for a moment, ice in her expression.

"Exactly what I stated. Explain your recent activities, with particular attention to your illegal attempts to acquire a device you were specifically instructed not to investigate." He looked blankly at her for a moment. "It would be in your best interests to comply immediately. My patience is not unlimited, Minister Davenport."

"Why should I explain anything to you? Who do you work for? Not the MoM, certainly. The MoD? MI5?"

"I am not affiliated to any of those organisations, Minister Davenport. Information on my employers is unavailable to you. Suffice it to say that we have the ability and the authority to deal with you as we see fit, due to your own actions." Glaring at her, he jumped to his feet, stomping over to the phone.

"I'm calling someone to come and deal with you. This has gone on long enough." Picking up the receiver he angrily stabbed several numbers, hearing the ringing at the other end for a moment. It stopped. "Hello?" he said.

"Hello, Minister Davenport. Your foolishness is merely wasting time. Please return to your seat so we may conclude our business." Yanking the phone away from his ear he stared at it as if it had bitten him, before turning slowly to look at the woman in the chair. She smiled coldly at him, the expression making him shudder. There was something completely inhuman about it, as if some creature in the form of a human was attempting something it had read about but never seen before. "Please return to your seat," she repeated, gesturing, her voice coming out of the phone at the same time as he heard it from her mouth. Shaking, he put the phone down, then did as requested.

"Who the fuck are you, and what?" he asked in a voice that squeaked every now and then.

"That information is unavailable." She studied him closely for a moment. "We are very displeased that you took it upon yourself to attempt the acquisition of the remaining portal device. As I stated, you were warned about that course of events. Your previous interaction with such a device came perilously close to being the causative factor in multiple fatalities. If not for the prompt action of Ms Yori and her associates this would certainly have happened. Yet you appear to be unable to learn from experience. Do you have some form of educational subnormality? Your records do not indicate this as a defect." She appeared politely curious. He flushed.

"I'm damn smart, thanks all the same," Robert growled. She raised an eyebrow.

"Circumstances would suggest otherwise. It is unimportant. The critical matter is that you have violated a well-meant and, one would think, knowing the parties involved, vehement prohibition on acquisition and study of an item you have no right, moral or legal, to become involved in. Your own government's laws state as much. The treaty your country is the instigator of and is in the process of negotiating with other authorities on this world would preclude such devices from existing in any form." He noted the use of the phrase 'this world' with a shock that jolted his heart. "As a ranking member of this very government, we find it somewhat egregious that you would be acting in such a manner even while such a treaty is in the process of negotiation. Perhaps we..." should proceed with neutralising the threat you appear to wish to become. I believe you will not enjoy this should it become necessary."

"Is that a threat?" he asked, looking narrowly at her.

"I do not threaten, Minister Davenport. I state courses of action, decide upon appropriate ones, then act on them. Threats are for people who have no intention of carrying them out." She did the thing with her mouth again. "Do not conclude that this description include myself or my employers." He paled again. For some reason he believed her utterly.

"Your own government has decided that your position is now vacant. They are also very displeased with your actions. Subversion of the facilities of your MI5 institution breaches a number of regulations, as does the illegal use of the information you acquired from that subversion in attempting to blackmail Mr Young. Leaving aside the probable ramifications of what would have transpired should your attempts have succeeded, the acts themselves are sufficient for you to be convicted and incarcerated for a considerable time." He stared in horror. "More than adequate proof has been presented to the relevant authorities. I am in the process of deciding whether the fate your own people will bestow upon you is sufficient. Your actions have caused considerable concern to others outside the jurisdiction of your government. There are parties who feel that a more permanent solution is warranted."

Robert Davenport was very close to requiring new underwear. The completely expressionless manner in which this horrible female was calmly discussing what sounded very much like assassinating him sent chills down his back. There was something utterly convincing about it, he had no doubt whatsoever that she would order his termination with about as much emotion as ordering a coffee. He still had no idea who she represented, although several things she'd said suggested that no government on the planet would know about her. Although he was also sure that several would happily pay her to work for them.

"What do you mean, a more permanent solution?" She didn't answer, just turned her head to look at the portal that appeared without warning in the middle of the room. He gaped at it. It was real, there was no doubt whatsoever that she would order his termination with about as much emotion as ordering a coffee. He still had no idea who she represented, although several things she'd said suggested that no government on the planet would know about her. Although he was also sure that several would happily pay her to work for them.

"Where are we?" he asked, trembling.

"This world has no name, or life. It is used as a dumping ground and firing range. It would be little effort to leave you here. You would have all the time you wished to study portals." She paused for a moment, reconsidering. "Ah. I am unfamiliar with the period of time over which humans can exist with no nourishment. Enlighten me, please." Gaping at her for a moment, he waved his hands at the scenery.
"You can't leave me here!"

"You are incorrect. I can leave you here with great ease, Minister Davenport. I believe you meant to suggest that I should not leave you here." Once more that smile-emulation came and went. "A witticism. Most interesting. Please tell me, did it function as intended?" Looking at her in horrified amazement, Robert shook his head wordlessly. "Regrettably. Regardless, what are we to do with you? If you persist in the activities that have brought you to my attention, I will have little choice but to deal with you in a permanent manner. If this world is unsuitable, there are numerous others that could be utilised. The location from where the demons transported by the portal devices you are so enamoured of originate would seem a possibility." He nearly fainted, stumbling on the rocky ground. "You appear to find that alternative unwelcome."

"Please take me home. I promise I'll stop." He whimpered a little as she studied him for a few seconds.

"I will consider it. Please remain here." She stepped backwards through the portal, which promptly vanished with a pop. He gaped, then screamed in fright, running forwards to where it had been. He could see and feel no trace of it.

"NO!" he howled, spinning in place, his dressing gown flapping. The sound echoed around the rocks surrounding him, dying away into complete silence. He could hear nothing other than the wind humming in the stones, not even insects. Staring up at the sky he saw that the star was small and intense, low to the horizon yet still sufficient to make the area as bright as noon at home. Some stars were visible, as the sky was surprisingly dark, despite the brilliant sun. None of them looked anything like what he was familiar with. "Oh, god," the Minister of Magic moaned, looking around. He was already beginning to feel thirsty.

By the time the portal reappeared ten minutes later with a faint crackle he was ready to promise anything. Ms Aoyama stepped through it, inspecting him with cold interest. "I have come to a decision. I will permit you to return to your original location. In return you will agree to accept the fate to which your authorities sentence you. If you fail to comply with these terms I will reassess the situation, which is extremely unlikely to produce an outcome you would find palatable. Do you understand and agree to these terms?" Robert nodded frantically.

"Yes. I'll do it. I promise." The woman studied him closely for a moment.

"Gratifying. It would most definitely be in your best interests to adhere to this bargain. I am not in the habit of giving second chances. Is that understood?" He nodded again. "Excellent. In that case, please proceed through the portal. It will transport you to your point of origin. You will find a number of people there who wish to discuss this matter further." She stepped to the side. Trembling like a leaf, with his dressing gown slightly dripping down the front, he did as requested. Appearing in his living room he looked about, as behind him Ms Aoyama stepped through the portal, which immediately closed.

"Hello Robert. I'm afraid that this latest escapade is your last as a member of the government. The Prime Minister is very angry and would like to have a long talk." Sir Alan looked at him with thinly veiled contempt and anger. "You little fuckwit. You could have killed hundreds of people if you'd gotten your hands on that thing. You know it ended up in Canada? It went off, three hundred and fifteen people are dead as a result." Minister Davenport felt his heart jump again. "That could have happened here. If it wasn't for Yori and her people the results could have been even worse. Why the hell would you want to get one of those things? After Harrods I'd have thought anyone with a brain would have steered well clear."

Staggering to a chair, Robert sat down. He looked around at the people in his room. Yori and the
"I didn't know. I wanted to learn more about it."

"To what end?" The cold voice made him twitch. He glanced over his shoulder like a frightened deer. "The devices were specifically designed as a terror weapon. They have no other purpose. That specific combination of spells could only bring destruction in an indiscriminate manner. My understanding is that this was the entire rationale behind the design. I find it fascinating that you, a prominent mage of this world, would in any fashion believe that study and duplication of such a device could be considered advisable." Ms Aoyama walked over and looked down at him.

"Remember our bargain, Robert Davenport. I will be observing you. If I decide that you have violated the terms of our agreement I will have no choice but to deal with you in an alternative manner." He nodded, completely cowed. "Most excellent. In that case, I believe my business here is concluded." She looked at the weird watch she was wearing. "With twenty minutes to spare. That is gratifying indeed. Ms Aiko, if I could trouble you for transportation, I would be grateful."

Standing from the sofa where she had been quietly watching, the brunette approached the terrible woman. "Of course, Ms Aoyama. Always happy to help." She grinned at Robert, before both women vanished. He blinked furiously at the brilliant light, having forgotten to close his eyes.

"God. That is the most terrifying woman I've ever seen," Sir Alan muttered to Harry, who nodded vigorously. Yori looked slightly insulted. Chou nudged her, smiling gently.

"Yes, sir, she definitely is that." Tamiko giggled, looking at Yori. He approached ex-Minister Davenport. "If you'd like to have a shower, we should go, Mr Davenport. I have a car outside. I expect you will want to tell your wife." He followed the man out of the room. Sir Alan turned to the others.

"Thank you. That was educational, not to mention deeply unsettling." He looked at Yori, smiling. "Invisibility is very interesting." She laughed.

"Useful, too."

"I can imagine." Aiko reappeared with Azumi and sat down again. "It was nice to see you all again. I'm sorry the circumstances were what they were. You should all go and relax, by the sounds of it you've had a somewhat fraught few days." Chou smiled at him.

"We have indeed, Sir Alan. The events in Canada were very upsetting. But at least it's finally over." Yori sighed.

"I wish it had been less bloody." Chou put her arm around the other girl.

"We all do. Cheer up, we can go for a meal with Inspector Deveraux, then go home. It's finally finished. Just normal demons now." The black-haired young woman grinned as Misaki rolled her eyes, pulling an apple out of her sleeve and biting into it. Fumiko looked at her, so she offered her one as well.

Agent Naito stood, watching the girls for a moment, then walked over to the Defence Minister. "Would you like to receive a report on the Halleckton affair, Sir Alan? It might be of use during your treaty negotiations."

"If the Canadians are all right with it, certainly."
"I'll see that I copy you on everything I send them, then. I'm sure that Chief Superintendent Wilkinson will send you his reports as well. I will email him and ask. It's best, I think, if everyone involved has the same information. The PSIA will distribute it."

"Thank you, Agent."

"You're welcome." He yawned. "God, it's been a long day. This teleporting all over the world makes you lose track of time better than anything else I've ever come across." The Minister laughed.

"I can imagine. Very useful skill, though." Aiko looked pleased.

"Do you want to come to the Inspector's house, Agent?" she asked. "I could always take you home."

"I'd like to talk to Laura, but I may ask for an early conclusion, thank you, Aiko." She nodded with a smile.

"It's no trouble." The rest of them stood, then shook hands with Sir Alan.

"Take care of yourselves," he said, watching as they grouped together. Chou smiled at him calmly.

"You as well. Give our best to Agent Williamson."

"I will." He raised his hand, closing his eyes as the flash came, then went to find Harry and the disgraced former Minister of Magic.

Laura looked up as the doorbell rang. "Hey, Evan, you want to get that?" The other RCMP officer smiled, getting up from the kitchen table and heading for the door. Shortly he came back with a considerable number of people. They all looked rather tired. "Hello, you lot. Did you get everything done you needed to do?" Chou nodded as Agent Naito yawned, glancing at him with amusement.

"We did. All the survivors are physically fine, although I'm afraid that a number of them will be having severe problems for a long time. We dealt with the problem in the UK as well. It went about as well as could be expected. The demon in the mine in Halleckton was easy, we opened a portal in the shaft and pushed it through." Deveraux looked puzzled. "We were tired of all the death."

"I see."

Yori pulled up a stool to the centre counter in the large kitchen, slumping on it with her elbows on the surface and her head in her hands. "I'm just glad it's finally over. This has been a bit of a nightmare. Close to four hundred deaths because of some fucking cult that didn't like the way the world was going. It's sickening."

"Very true. But, all things considered, there are a large number of people who have a lot to thank you all for. You didn't have to get involved after all." Chou smiled gently.

"Yes we did. We had no choice." The older woman studied her for a moment.

"I think I understand. Same thing that made me become a cop."

"Quite likely." The blonde watched as Laura began chopping carrots again. "Would you like some
"Thank you. Oh, by the way, Chief Superintendent Wilkinson couldn't make it. He sent his regrets and thanks once more for the help." She moved over slightly as the young woman picked up a knife and a bunch of celery, smiling at her.

"That was nice of him. He seems like a good man." Chou glanced around. "You have a very nice house," she commented.

"It was my mother's. She left it to me when she died two years ago. We grew up in it. My two brothers moved away years ago, one to Germany, one to Australia. Perth. I haven't seen either one of them for about a year." She looked over at the others who were sitting or leaning around the room. "Look around if you like." One or two wandered off to inspect the place. Misaki acquired a carrot and began eating it, while Aiko watched with amusement. Yori snickered. "Anyone want coffee?" Laura asked.

"God, yes, please," Agent Naito said from the kitchen table. "My eyes are going to clamp shut for good if I don't get some caffeine." The others laughed. Evan was watching quietly, listening to them with interest.

"I'll do it," Azumi said, walking over to the elaborate coffee machine on the end of the counter. She began filling it with fresh coffee beans after a quick inspection of the machine. Laura watched for a moment until she was sure the girl had worked out how the machine worked, then went back to her carrots. They talked for a while, Chou and Laura preparing the ingredients, until the coffee was ready. Pouring a cup, Azumi took it over to the PSIA man who was nearly asleep. "Here you are, Agent. It should be good and strong."

"Thanks, Azumi," he mumbled, taking a sip. He nodded. "Very nice." Over the next few minutes the silver-haired girl made coffee for everyone, then sat with her own cup, drinking it appreciatively. After two more cups Naito was fairly awake. By the time the two chickens were in the oven, he no longer felt in danger of falling asleep if he closed his eyes for a second.

Laura looked satisfied. "That will take about an hour and a half, or perhaps two. Let's go into the living room." Following her, holding fresh cups of coffee, they all found somewhere to sit. "So, tell me about all the other things that happened. Richard told me some of the trip to LA, but he only hinted at some of it. What was all that about a movie?" Chou laughed while Yori groaned.

"It was very funny." She explained what had happened, then went over the unexpected meeting in Australia. By the end of the story, Evan and Laura were both weak with laughter.

"You really do attract weird coincidences," Deveraux said with a grin.

"I know," Yori replied, frowning slightly. "It can be a damn nuisance."

They swapped stories until the food was ready, then Yori and Chou helped distribute it, while the others set the table in the dining room. Laura had dug the extra leaves for it out of the basement earlier, making it barely big enough for ten people. Sitting down she looked around, smiling. "There haven't been this many people around this table since I was a child," she said, pleased. "It's kind of nice." Indicating the meal, she added, "Dig in. I hope you like it."

"It looks very nice," Tamiko said, trying a forkful of the roast chicken. Misaki was already eating, looking please, as was Yori. "It's wonderful," she added after the first mouthful.

"Thanks. It's my mother's recipe."
They ate until everything was gone, talking about lighter things than the recent events. Evan chatted to Fumiko and Tamiko for a while, very interested in some of their adventures. Afterwards, she brought several ice cream cartons out, making the eyes of several of the young women light up with glee. "I thought that would please you," she said with amusement. Chou giggled.

"Yori and Misaki, at least, would be your friends for life if you fill them with coffee and ice cream." Both girls looked at her and nodded, grinning. Soon they all had ice cream. Eating slowly, savouring it, the room was quiet except for the clinking of spoons. "This is very good ice cream," Chou said, finishing her bowl.

"I know. It's made by this Italian family I know. They've been making ice cream for about two hundred years, they're pretty damn good at it." Laura finished hers, then looked at the tubs on the table. "Just enough for about two more bowlfuls. Who wants it?" She looked around, not even slightly surprised to see everyone else looking at Yori and Misaki, who laughed. "I expected that, to be honest. Pass your bowls."

After the meal, Chou and Misaki cleared the table quickly and efficiently, filling the dishwasher and starting it, while Yori and Azumi washed the larger dishes by hand then dried them. The kitchen and dining room were sparkling clean in remarkably short order. "Thanks. That's always the hard part," Laura said, coming into the kitchen and looking around approvingly.

"No problem," Yori said with a grin. She yawned. "Wow. I haven't been this tired for a while."

"Poor old Masao is asleep in the living room," Deveraux said, laughing slightly. "Aiko looks like she's on the verge of going as well."

"I'm not surprised. She's done a hell of a lot of teleporting recently." Yori yawned again. "I need some more coffee." They made more, taking cups into the other room and distributing them. She had to prod Aiko awake. Agent Naito was past the point of prodding being useful. Looking at him with amusement, Yori commented, "I think I'll probably have to carry him when we go."

"What's going to happen with that mage, Václav Sklár?" Laura asked curiously. "I mean, where did you take him?" Yori studied her over her coffee for a moment, then glanced at Chou. Looking back to the inspector, she shrugged.

"There are a lot of worlds that are based on magic rather than technology. They tend to know about imprisoning mages. We know people who owe us a lot of favours. After thinking it over, we arranged with one of them to hold him for us." Deveraux looked somewhat worried. Correctly divining her problem, Yori smiled. "Don't worry. They may be demons, but they're also very good, humane people. He'll be well treated, probably better than he would be in a prison here. They've agreed to impose the sentence that your courts hand down. We've told them about the portal devices, they're as upset about it as we are, possibly more so. Offers were made to deal with Mr Murray, in fact." She got a somewhat feral expression. "I was tempted. But I think your own people deserve first crack at him."

"There are going to be a lot of people who want his blood," Laura said quietly. "He's responsible for more death and destruction than any one man in our history as far as I know."

"How are you going to explain it?" Chou asked curiously. "Magic seems like a difficult thing to get across to the general population, even if true." The older woman sighed.

"I know. I have no idea how the government will spin it. I doubt very strongly they'll tell the truth, but it will probably be something vaguely plausible. A bit like London, I guess. Whether anyone but us will know the truth any time soon I don't know either." She sighed again, more deeply. "I suppose it doesn't really matter in a sense. He'll get prosecuted, most likely convicted, then quietly buried in a prison more or less forever."

"Good." Yori looked upset. "He richly deserves it. Don't worry, he'll plead guilty. We had a talk about that."

"So I heard." The black-haired girl looked momentarily slightly amused at the dry words, then went back to looking depressed.

"I wish it hadn't come to this," she muttered. "If we'd spotted those terrorists a few months earlier, we might have averted this all."

"There was nothing we could do, which you know full well," Chou said gently. "By the time we were brought in it was too late. Recriminations and second thoughts are pointless. We can't do anything useful about the past."

"She's right, Yori," Laura said. "I know how hard you've worked over the last few months. All of you," she added, looking around at the girls listening to the conversation. "No one could possibly have anything to complain about over your efforts. You've undoubtedly saved probably thousands of lives just with these six devices. If you include stopping the cult in the first place it could be millions. I don't know anyone who's done more, individually or collectively, to help people than you seven. Be proud of that, don't dwell on what you couldn't do anything about." They looked at each other, nodding slightly.

"Thank you, Laura," Yori said softly. "That helps." They were silent for a while. Eventually she looked around. "We're going to have to go. It's been nice seeing you again and talking. Let us know how things go, and if you need anything more from us, about this or anything else, OK?"

"I will do." Their host rose, as did the girls. Yori looked at Naito, smiling slightly. She picked him up easily.

"Wow, he's completely out. Better get him home."

"What time is it in Tokyo?" Laura asked curiously.

"About two in the morning. He's got a few hours to sleep, he should be fine."

They grouped together, each young woman shaking hands with both Laura and Evan. Chou hugged her. "Take care, Inspector. Until next time."

"You too, Chou. Say bye to Masao when he wakes up."

"I will." They vanished.

Laura sighed again, then looked at her fellow officer. "Come on, Evan, I guess we'd better get to the office." Shortly they were in their cars heading back to work.

Václav looked up as the demon entered his cell, putting down his book. "You have a visitor, Mr Sklár. Yori would like to talk to you again."

"Thanks." He watched as the demon left, admitting the black-haired girl. She looked around curiously.

"How are they treating you?" she asked, sitting on the single chair he had. He shrugged.
"Better than I probably deserve. Well, I guess. How are you?"

"Not bad. Still tired, it was a long few days, but glad it's all over. I just wanted to get the details on what exactly you did. It might be useful if anything like this happens again." He nodded, then began speaking, while she listened carefully. It was a long story.
When they arrived back in the apartment, everyone stared at each other for a moment, before Ranma, Kasumi, and Nabiki dropped the illusions. They all sat in various places and continued looking at each other wordlessly. Tamiko finally broke the silence.

"That was horrible."

Jumping to her feet Nabiki sprinted for the nearest bathroom, causing everyone to stare. The sounds of vomiting came to them. Kasumi exchanged glances with her husband. "I'll go," she said quietly as he made a move to get up. Nodding, he subsided. They watched her go after her sister.

"I know what she feels like," Misaki said, sighing. "I did the same thing after my first fight, and it was nothing anywhere near as bad as that. She did amazingly well. We've dropped her in the deep end, beyond anything I could have expected."

"Unfortunately true." Ranma was still looking towards where both Tendo women were. Voices could be heard, followed by more vomiting. He looked depressed. "If I'd had any idea what it was going to be like I wouldn't have let her come, but by the time we found out, it was too late. Poor Nabs."

"Don't call her Nabs," Fumiko said, the weak joke making them all smile for a moment. She stood, glancing at her sister. "We should go. You three need some privacy. See you in the morning." The others got up as well, smiling at their friend, then slowly and tiredly leaving the apartment, Aiko too worn out even to teleport. The front door closed softly behind them. After a long moment Ranma rose and went into the bathroom. Nabiki was still kneeling on the floor beside the toilet, Kasumi with her arm around her shoulders, rubbing her back with the other hand. She looked up at her husband as he came in.

"How is she?" he asked over the comm, not wanting to disturb the middle sister.

"Not happy. It hit her all at once. You remember what I was like after that rapist... Like that, but a lot worse." She smiled unhappily. Returning her attention to her sister she murmured to her. Eventually Nabiki looked up, wiping her mouth with the back of her hand, tears in her eyes. Ranma smiled gently at her. Wetting a wash-cloth in the sink he handed it to her. She looked at it, then took it, cleaning her face, then allowed Kasumi to gently help her to her feet. Nabiki washed her hands, rinsed her mouth out a few times, spat, and straightened up with a deep breath.

"It's OK," Ranma said soothingly. "I'm not surprised you reacted like that. You were using the soul of ice the entire time we were in Halleckton and quite a lot of the time before that. When you turn it off the emotional rush can be overwhelming, never mind everything that happened. There's no shame in it. We're all proud of you, you did a very difficult and terrible job very professionally." She looked at him for a long moment then jumped forward and put her arms around him, holding him tightly, suddenly sobbing. Wrapping his own arms around her he held her, looking over her head at her sister who smiled sadly. As he picked her up and carried her into the living room he heard the toilet flush as Kasumi cleaned the bathroom.

When the eldest Tendo came out she found them sitting on the sofa, Nabiki still holding Ranma. He had his arm around her shoulders as she leaned against him, still crying but silently now. Watching them for a moment she smiled, then went and made three cups of tea. Sitting next to her husband he put his free arm around her, holding her close. They sat like that long enough for the tea to go cold.
"It was so horrible," Nabiki finally said, a catch in her voice. "All those people. So much blood, and death, and pain, and destruction. How could anything like that happen? Why didn't someone stop it?"

Ranma sighed. "We tried. Everyone tried. Some things just happen, and in the end, all you can do is clean up the mess afterwards. That was one of the worst things I've ever seen, but people in wars deal with things as bad if not worse all the time. So do people who clean up after events like aircraft crashes, earthquakes, fires, all sorts of thing. It's a sad fact that death is a part of life. Most people, luckily, never see it like that, but some do." He looked at her, meeting her eyes as she looked back. "Because of what we do, who and what we are, it's probably inevitable that sooner or later we'd get involved in something on that scale. I very much hope that was the only time but I wouldn't be surprised if it wasn't. We have the ability to deal with things that most people couldn't, at least without even more death and pain, which means that we will deal with those things. That's the type of people we all are. Including you. None of us can let something horrible happen without trying to help stop it."

He brushed some hair out of her eyes, smiling proudly at her. "You were magnificent. You've learned so fast, done so well, it sometimes surprises me, even though I've known all along you had it in you. This was definitely your baptism by fire, though. I'm more sorry than I can say that we got you involved in something so terrible so early in your learning process. I should have sent you home when I realised what had happened." Staring at him for a long moment, she finally shook her head.

"I wouldn't have gone."

"I know."

She was silent again. He leaned his head back against the sofa, Kasumi putting her head on his shoulder and closing her eyes. Some minutes later, Nabiki stirred. "At least Ms Aoyama was fun." Ranma and Kasumi both laughed.

"You outdid yourself, sister," the eldest Tendo giggled. "Poor Minister Davenport."

"Ex-Minister, please," Ranma said, chuckling. "Sir Alan was very clear on that."

"He deserved it," Nabiki said quietly. "Anyone who wanted to get their hands on that thing deserved it. It was evil. Nothing but evil."

"I'd have to agree. I'm so glad that it's finally over. I've been waiting for the other shoe to drop for months. That was bad, very bad, but it could have been worse. Thank every god you can think of that it was so far out in the middle of nowhere. If it had been in a large city..." Ranma shuddered. Nabiki and Kasumi both held him tighter.

"We would understand if you decided that you didn't want to do it any more after this, sister," Kasumi said softly. "I know you've never been completely comfortable with your abilities." Nabiki raised her head a little, wiping a tear from her face.

"I haven't decided yet. It still hasn't sunk in, I think. Every time I close my eyes I can see all the blood, and I could swear I can still smell it." She went quiet for a moment. "The smell was the worst part. So much blood..." Shuddering, she held Ranma tighter, for comfort. The feeling of his strong body in her arms helped a little. For the first time she was envious of her sister.

She was still holding him when she fell asleep.
Kasumi raised her head as she heard her sister begin snoring slightly, twitching every now and then, intermittently muttering to herself. She could feel how disturbed her emotions still were even like this. Glancing at her husband, she reached over him with one hand and gently touched her sister's forehead. Brief golden light flared and Nabiki stilled. Ranma smiled.

"For the best, I think. I wish we could do something about the memories."

"So do I. Poor Nabiki. We should never have taken her. It was too soon."

"I know. I'll regret that for a long time. But she's one of the strongest people I know. She'll deal with it. It'll just take a while. We need to make sure we're there for her, that's all we can do. If worst comes to worst, I know a good therapist." Kasumi nodded with a small smile.

"Do you think the doctor has treated a magical girl for PTSD before?" Ranma laughed quietly.

"I have no idea. It would be an interesting case for her résumé, though."

Looking fondly at the middle sister, he glanced at his wife. "How about a fresh cup of tea? I'd get it but I seem to be trapped." Giggling, Kasumi prepared two cups, then came back with them and a large blanket. Arranging it over them all she resumed her position against her husband's left side, sipping her cup.

Blinking, Nabiki opened her eyes as sunlight hit them. It was just after eight AM. She was slightly disoriented, looking around for a moment she couldn't work out where she was. This wasn't her dormitory room or the room she had claimed as hers in her sisters apartment. Movement beside her made her look to her left, to see Ranma, eyes closed, leaning against Kasumi. Both of them were still asleep. She realised after a moment that she was still on the sofa in the living room, and to her slight embarrassment, still had her arms around her sister's husband. More memory came back, making her wince slightly.

#Are you feeling better this morning, Nabiki?# Jun asked out of nowhere. She sighed.

'In a way, yes. In another way, no.'

#Emotions are complex and difficult to emulate,# the SI said, sounding both amused and sympathetic. Despite it's words it was clearly up to the job. #Your performance was exemplary. Considering that you have only possessed these abilities for some months now, I find it unlikely that any of your compatriots would have any complaints about how you acted. You should not either.#

'Thanks, Jun. I'm kind of embarrassed about breaking down like that last night though.'

#I would suggest that such a response was inevitable. You are not a hardened warrior with years of experience, like your team-mates. Yet even they exhibited signs of stress as a result of the massacre in Halleckton. Such things are a normal physiological and psychological response to the situation you found yourself in. My database suggests that a common response to such events would be considerably more dramatic, most likely resulting in the inability to perform satisfactorily during the event itself, which would result in even more risk and potential deaths. You were able to put those responses off until such time as the situation was resolved. That is an unusual trait and one that you should be proud of.#

She considered the words for some time. It was right. Most people, confronted with death on such a scale and in such a manner, would probably have fallen to pieces. Even the soldiers had been upset by what had happened and they'd been trained for things, perhaps not exactly like that, but similar, for years. 'Thank you,' she told it again. 'And thanks for all the help during... that.'
It is my purpose, the SI said, sounding satisfied. A purpose I enjoy filling, as much as I understand that emotion. You are a fascinating owner. She giggled a little, then yawned.

'I'm less tired than I thought I would be. I was worried I'd have nightmares.'

Your sister took steps to ensure you would sleep deeply. I would judge that such steps were warranted. Your emotional state was considerably less stable than usual last night, the machine said. It sounded slightly worried. Are you likely to require psychological intervention? Nabiki smiled, even while she considered the idea.

'I don't think so. But I don't really know. I can handle the memories much better now, although I'll have to see what happens with time.'

It is my hope that you remain sane, Jun said. There was a note of mild amusement in it's artificial voice. She snickered out loud.

'Making jokes, now? You're learning. It's my hope I remain sane as well. One crazy sister in this family is enough.' She considered the idea, glancing at Kasumi, breathing gently on the other side of Ranma. 'Well, two, maybe.' A soft tap on the door made her look over her shoulder. Tamiko came in, grinning when she saw the three huddled under a blanket. Nabiki smiled back.

"Comfortable?" she commed.

"Yes, thanks," Nabiki replied, making the other woman snicker. She disappeared into the kitchen, coming back shortly with a cup of tea each. The middle sister untangled one arm enough, trying not to wake her brother-in-law or sister, to take hers, then sipped it. "Thank you."

"How are you now?" Tamiko asked, peering at her sympathetically. "You seemed very upset last night, which doesn't surprise me. I didn't sleep very well myself."

"I'm much better. Not ideal, it's going to take a long time to get over all that, but better."

"We all thought you did amazingly well, you know," her friend said. "Much better than I did my first time. When we finally did in that demon woman back when we got dropped into all this I was a wreck. Misaki slapped some sense into me and Fumiko, who was nearly as bad, then she and Aiko got us together and out of there very efficiently. But Fumiko told me than when they finally got home, Misaki fell to pieces. She was puking for an hour." The auburn-haired woman shrugged a little. "It hits everyone differently. What you went through on your first serious mission was worse than anything I've ever seen, yet you handled it better than I ever would have under the same circumstances. No one thinks any the less of you because you waited until we got home to have issues. Quite the opposite."

"I'm still embarrassed about it."

"Don't be. I'd be worried if you didn't have problems with the whole thing, to be honest. You'd have to be the emotionless robot you play so well to do that, and I know you aren't." She grinned at the middle Tendo, who raised an eyebrow and put on her coldest expression. Tamiko giggled.

"Except when you want to be." She sipped some tea, studying the others with amusement. "Joking aside, you did incredibly well and I'd be proud to have you at my side any time. All of us would. You're our sister in arms in a very real sense. But if you decide it's not for you, we'd be fine with that as well."

"I haven't decided yet. I have to admit, I don't want to have another Halleckton any time soon. Preferably ever." Nabiki shuddered. "Teasing muggers is a completely different sort of thing."
"I know. I never expected it to be that bad either. It caught everyone by surprise. Something like that was always a possibility, but we all thought we'd find the last device before anything happened. We got four out of six in time. I guess our luck just ran out. Like it did for all those poor people." With a shake of her head she finished her tea and put the cup down. "On the up side, you got your first demon!" She grinned. "It's always a shock when that happens. Those things are damn tough as well."

"I nearly didn't. There's no way I could have taken it on hand to hand, it was stronger than and nearly as fast as Akane, but a damn sight bigger. And much nastier. If it wasn't for the ki abilities and Ranma telling me how to deal with it, I'd have been screwed." She looked at her hand, forming a small ki ball then letting it dissipate. "I still can't believe I can do that."

"You sure picked it up incredibly fast. I'm kind of jealous. It took the rest of us a lot more work." Tamiko looked at her with raised eyebrows, then laughed quietly.

"I've listened to Ranma's explanations as to why it seemed to come so easily, but even so, it seems strange. But I guess, if anyone would know, it would be him. He invented half these techniques in the first place." She shrugged slightly. "I suppose, if I do keep up the magical girl thing, I'm going to have to learn all the martial arts stuff as well. There are times when energy balls aren't appropriate."

"Can't think of one," Tamiko replied, giggling, having considered it. Nabiki smiled.

"I'm damn sure becoming even as good as you guys, never mind Kasumi, would take years. I might never do it."

"Don't underestimate yourself. You learn extremely fast, from what I've seen, and I think Kasumi and Ranma are right, you have a gift for all this. Yes, it would be a lot of work, but I'm sure you'd be very good at it in the end. Not as good as Ranma, but no-one is. Except possibly Kasumi. I'm in awe of her, the amount she's learned in about five years is unbelievable."

"I know. She looks just like the sister I lost all those years ago, but she's changed a huge amount. I suppose everyone does, but in her case it was a shock. It still is sometimes." Nabiki looked at her sleeping elder sister. "Every day I'm so glad I finally managed to reconnect. It's changed my life out of all recognition, mostly for the better. I just hope that one day we can bring her and Ranma back to Nerima."

"Do you think that's likely to happen?" Her friend looked curious.

"I really don't know. It depends on so many things. The biggest one was always Akane. She's improved so much I can hardly believe it. But even with that, there are other problems. Ukyo took herself off the list, which is good. Last time I talked to her I got the strong impression it was likely that very soon there would be wedding invitations going out. Shampoo, though, could be an issue. The Kunos, I don't know. I haven't seen Kodachi for a couple of months, the last time I did she was almost sane, although whether that was just a good act I really couldn't say. She's always had the ability to come across as fairly normal for a short period of time. Tatewaki, on the other hand, really does seem to slowly be growing less nuts. I hope it continues. In some ways he's a decent guy, under all the crazy. Even though he's been responsible for doing some horrible things to Akane." Nabiki sighed.

"The situation there is still delicate, I think is what I'm trying to say. Nodoka has changed the most, she's basically normal, most of the time. I think she really has come to realise at least some of what she was partially responsible for and regrets it enormously. My father and Ranma's are still completely nuts, but in a much less self-destructive manner generally." She grinned for a moment.
"I mean, I never expected that they'd not only take up teaching again, but actually be good at it. That was a shock. But, throw Ranma and Kasumi back into all that, I have no idea what might happen. It might work perfectly, it might blow up in our faces. Anyway, it's not my decision. Hopefully, one day, though, it will work out for the best."

"How is Akane doing these days? You haven't said much about her for the last few weeks." Tamiko smiled a little. "Is she any closer to resolving her sexual issues?

Nabiki looked pensive. "I'm not sure, to be honest. She's certainly not talking nearly as much about perverts any more, she's even capable of being nice to random men she meets. That's a welcome improvement. I still think my theory about her having a crush on Sayuri holds some water. Whenever Sayuri breaks up with Hiroshi, which happens with depressing regularity, Akane cheers up noticeably although I really don't think it's anything conscious. When she gets back together with him, Akane has a couple of days of being down in the dumps. Even Shampoo remarked on it last time. The therapy is certainly making slow but sure progress on the anger issues, when she gets set off things are much better than they were even only a month ago, but as to that other issue...? I don't know."

"Considering how much time she's spending with Shampoo, maybe they'll hook up," her friend commented, looking amused. "The Amazons are cool about that, aren't they?" Nabiki stared at her, then shook her head, laughing to herself.

"Oh, wouldn't that just be the most ironic thing ever?" she asked, highly amused. "Two of Ranma's ex-fiancées getting together. I have to admit it would neatly solve some problems but I don't think it's likely."

Kasumi stirred, mumbling something, then hugged Ranma tighter. He smiled in his sleep, making Nabiki and Tamiko giggle as they watched. "That's cute," the auburn-haired woman said with a grin. "She's a very lucky woman."

"Yes, she is." Nabiki was watching them, smiling. Tamiko glanced at her.

"Regrets?" She giggled at Nabiki's quizzical expression. "I mean, Ranma told us that when you first met, he was given the choice of all three of you. He ended up with Akane more by default than anything else." The middle sister laughed.

"Yep. It was like Kasumi and I took one quick step backwards, leaving her in the volunteer position. I wish we hadn't done that, there were much better ways to handle it. I've often wondered what would have happened if we'd just talked it out properly. We were young and self-absorbed." She sighed a little. "No, no regrets. He ended up with the right sister. I love him like my own brother, more, perhaps, but not romantically. Perhaps if I'd made the right moves the first day, things would have been different, but I think it worked out for the best. I'm just sorry it caused so much pain and chaos in the process."

"All in the past. Right, fancy some breakfast?" Tamiko hopped to her feet.

"I think so. I'm pretty empty at the moment." Nabiki grimaced. "Inspector Deveraux' meal was wonderful, and it all ended up in the toilet."

"I won't tell her," the other woman giggled. She looked around as the other three entered. Putting her finger to her lips she pointed to Ranma and Kasumi. They all grinned, then began helping lay the table, cook the food, and put it out. When it was done, Tamiko waved a bowl of miso soup under Ranma's nose, which flared it's nostrils, making them all laugh. He opened one eye, then the other one, looking around at the grinning young woman, before glancing down at Kasumi's head.
tucked into his neck.

"Morning," he said out loud.

"Good morning," everyone chorused, then began laughing. Kasumi woke with a start, looking around, then smiled.

"What a wonderful surprise," she said happily, straightening up and running her hands through her hair.

"We didn't want to wake you, you both looked so relaxed there," Tamiko said, grinning. Nabiki finally moved away from Ranma, casting him a look of gratitude.

"Thank you," she said privately to him.

"Any time, Nabiki. Any time." He smiled at her, before getting up and stretching. "How is everyone?"

They exchanged glances. "I'm still kind of tired, that much teleporting is exhausting, but other than that not too bad." Aiko yawned. "I need to practice more, I think."

"You did very well. All of you did. I'm very pleased with our performance over the last few days. I wish it hadn't ended the way it did, but I think everyone did incredibly well." He looked around at them all. "I couldn't ask for better friends and family."

"We all feel the same way, I think," Fumiko said after a moment, glancing at her sister, who nodded, pulling out a cereal bar. The other girl snatched it out of her hand. "We're just about to have breakfast, you pig!" she said, incensed. Misaki grinned, producing another one. And another, when that one also got confiscated.

"I can keep this up all day," she said with amusement. Everyone stared, then collapsed laughing. Sighing, Fumiko unwrapped one of the bars and nibbled on it, which made them laugh harder.

"I'm going to have to get back to the university," Nabiki said, paddling her hands in the water. She looked around. "But not right now. This was a good idea." They were floating in the middle of a lagoon some four hundred metres across, floored with white coral sand, surrounded by a reef on which waves were breaking with a distant roar. Two thirds of the more or less circular island, less than a kilometre across, was a couple of metres above the water and supported a narrow band of trees and plants some hundred metres deep from what the middle sister could make out. A semi-circular beach lined one side of the lagoon. The rest of it, aside from a narrow gap to the ocean, was unforgiving coral, sharp and dangerous looking. "Where are we, again?"

"I don't think it has a name," Aiko said lazily, floating near her staring up at the sky with a smile on her face. "I found the coordinates in a book about three years ago. It's just one of dozens of little islands in the Pacific that no one lives on. There's no fresh water, not really any food except for a few coconuts and some fish, no reason to live here. You'd have a hell of a time landing a boat on it as well, the current outside is strong and the waves are vicious. The nearest inhabited place is at least a thousand kilometres away. But it's beautiful. Except during a hurricane the lagoon is more or less flat calm, it's always warm, and nothing dangerous seems to live here. Dangerous to us, anyway. Some of the fish and snails are very toxic."

"It is a very attractive place," Kasumi said, swimming slowly past. "Why have you never mentioned it before?"
"It was kind of my personal place to get away, you know? Somewhere I could go to decompress. But after Halleckton, I think we all deserve it. So, welcome to Aiko Island." Everyone laughed. She thrust her fist in the air. "I claim this island in the name of Magical Girls everywhere!" the brunette shouted, then giggled. Rolling over, she flicked her tail and vanished underwater, shooting off across the sand a few metres down. Kasumi smiled, then followed.

"We're all nuts," Nabiki said, looking at Ranma, who was floating next to her grinning. The red-headed mermaid nodded happily.

"Yep. Fun, isn't it?"

"At times." They looked as Misaki leaped a couple of metres out of the water with a whoop, flipping over and firing a small ki ball at her sister who was chasing her, before dropping neatly into the water without more than a ripple. Fumiko yelped in indignation, tearing off across the lagoon in pursuit. Nabiki shook her head.

"Completely nuts." She and Ranma exchanged glances, grinned, then joined what became a game of magical girl mermaid ki ball tag. The only thing missing was darkness.

Later they sat on the beach watching the sun near the horizon. It had been a fun day. When they'd become hungry, Aiko and Fumiko had gotten dressed, disappeared, then come back with pizza from New York, sushi from Brisbane, ramen noodles from a place she knew in Hong Kong, and various other items. A few bottles of the Australian wine made an appearance as well. They'd enjoyed the food, making sure to keep all the garbage together. "I don't want my island getting dirty," Aiko said, chasing down an errant pizza box. It eluded her in the wind, forcing her to shoot it down with a ki ball, giggling. "Got you."

Misaki had stayed a mermaid, propping herself up in the shallows and happily eating, next to Tamiko and Ranma who had done the same. Nabiki went for a walk, exploring the island. On her return she watched as her friends played in the water, smiling. Feeling her sister next to her she glanced at her, seeing she was watching as well. "I think we deserved a small holiday," Kasumi said, looking back at her.

"Very much." They both laughed as Ranma pulled Fumiko under, several bright flashes coming from underwater along with small spouts of foam, before the two girls reappeared, giggling furiously. With a glance at each other they both dived in again. By the time the sun was beginning to set they were all pleasantly relaxed. Nabiki had downed close to an entire bottle of wine, cuddling the dregs as she lay on the beach still wearing her mer-Nabiki form. She had a smile on her face.

Misaki had gathered all the dead wood and leaves she could find, lighting a small fire with a tiny ki shot and slowly feeding the fuel into it as the sun set. Darkness came very suddenly as was it's wont in the tropics. A little while later they noticed that the ripples in the lagoon were glowing with phosphorescence. The sight was beautiful, the cold greenish-blue light bright enough to see the bottom at times. Idly tossing shells into the water, watching as a burst of light came from each splash, Fumiko smiled. "Thanks for letting us know about your secret island, Aiko. It's been a wonderful way to wind down."

"You're welcome," the petite brunette said, lying on her back and watching the stars. "It was worth giving up the secret. I can always find another one if I need to be alone." They grinned at each other. A faint snore came from Nabiki, making them all look, then giggle.

"She needed this more than anyone," Kasumi said quietly. "Thank you." Reaching out she gently... touched her sister, making sure she'd have another decent night's sleep. An hour later they decided go back. Ranma gently picked up his sister-in-law, still in merform, grinning at her in the dark.

"Should we change her back?" Kasumi watched with a smile. The red-head shook her head, laughing.

"Let's leave it as a surprise." Her wife rolled her eyes but giggled. Soon the beach was empty again, the small fire guttering out on the sand.

Nabiki woke, staring at the familiar ceiling of her room in the apartment. Rolling her head to the side she looked out the window, the blind on which was up a few inches leaving a gap at the bottom, to see it was a nice day. She smiled. Remembering the impromptu island getaway she was grateful for her friends allowing her to try to forget the horrors she'd encountered only two days ago. It had helped a lot. While it was still there at the back of her mind, it no longer had the soul-searing immediacy it had possessed on their return afterwards.

"A bottle of wine probably helped as well," she said to herself, grinning. Amazingly, her head wasn't aching. She suspected she had Kasumi to thank for that. That said, paradoxically she was both very thirsty and had a distinctly overfull bladder. Stretching, she flipped the covers off the bed, swung her legs over the side, leaped to her feet, then fell flat on her face with a cry of surprise.

"Gahh!" she yelped on the way down, bouncing on the carpet. Rolling over she looked at her tail, muttering in irritation. "That bastard. I'll bet this was Ranma's idea," she mumbled, dismissing the illusion and climbing to her restored feet. The laughter from the living room strongly supported this theory.

"You OK, Nabs?" the martial artist called, mirth in his voice.

"How long have you been waiting for that, you sod?" she called back, getting dressed.

"Over an hour. It was worth it." He appeared in the door, grinning, with Kasumi behind him.
Holding out a mug of coffee he laughed again as she glared at him. A few seconds later, she giggled.

"OK. You got me. It was pretty funny, I guess." Her bladder reminded her she had more important things to take care of. "Um. Back in a minute." Rapidly heading to the nearest bathroom she took care of business, washing up and brushing her teeth at the same time. Both Ranma and Kasumi were sitting on the sofa on her return. Dropping into her own seat she picked her mug off the table and took a long swallow from it.

"Better?"

"Much. Yesterday helped a lot."

"I thought it would. We all needed a break after that, you most of all." He smiled at her as Kasumi got up to prepare breakfast, putting her hand on her sister's shoulder as she passed. "Back to your classes, I guess?"

"I have to. I've missed a couple of days of lectures strictly speaking I shouldn't have. It's not a problem, I can get the notes from other students, but I've been letting my standards slip a little recently. Too many things to do. I don't want to let three years work go to waste, though." She smiled a little ruefully. "I can't work out whether I'll be bored with less excitement, or relieved about less excitement."
"Probably both. Kas and I have a lot of work to do as well. Now that those damn portal bombs are history we have to get back to school. It's something of a handful juggling all the different things but luckily we have understanding lecturers. Even if they don't know what we do for fun." Nabiki grimaced.

"Fun!?"

"Well, most of the time it is." He grinned. "I'll admit that recent events came very low on the fun scale."

"Right off the fucking bottom of it, in my view." They sat in silence for a while, finishing their coffee.

"Had any thoughts on whether you want to continue with all this?" he asked after some time, looking at her. She shrugged.

"Not really. I've been trying to avoid thinking about some things, it's like picking at a scab. I'm not going to make any conscious decision while it's so fresh, I suspect whatever I decide would be the wrong thing. I'm just going to go back to work, avoid dwelling on it for a while, then see what happens." She snorted laughter. "I know full well that even if I want to ignore the crazy, the crazy is very unlikely to ignore me, so probably in the end I'll get pulled back in. I just hope it isn't like that again for a very long time."

"You and me both. Once was enough." They shared an understanding look. "I will do my best to keep things that bad away from you, you know that, I hope?"

She nodded. "I do. You're a very good friend, Ranma Saotome, despite being as mad as a tree full of fish." Laughing, he nodded to her, before getting up to help his wife in the kitchen. They had breakfast twenty minutes later, the other girls coming in as had become habit over the months since they'd moved into the building. Aiko left soon after eating, saying she had to help her mother with something, leaving the rest behind.

"Back to school now, Nabiki?" Tamiko asked, sipping tea. The brunette nodded.

"Yes. I can't miss any more lectures. I'm going to get an earful from the Economics professor as it is. He's a sarcastic old goat. Good teacher, but kind of hard to deal with at times."

"How is your coursework going?" Fumiko asked curiously.

"Pretty well. I have two essays due in three days, which is a nuisance, I should have done them a week ago, but with Jun's help I can manage." She smiled. "Best word processor ever."

"I know. I can't get over how useful they are. I'm going to get an earful from the Economics professor as it is. He's a sarcastic old goat. Good teacher, but kind of hard to deal with at times."

"A lot of it is Jun itself. It has a habit of offering exactly the right solution at exactly the right time. They definitely learn. It seems much more like a person now than it did when I first got it." She laughed. "To the point I feel guilty calling it 'It'. But it's told me that's a perfectly logical name as it has no sex."

"Like me," Misaki said, looking slightly put out. Everyone stared at her, then began laughing. "Oh. Did I say that out loud?" she asked, appearing embarrassed. Her sister nodded, tears of mirth running down her face. "Whoops."
"Perhaps you should go clubbing again," Fumiko said through her laughter. "That worked the last time." Misaki got an expression of remembrance, smiling slightly.

"Maybe." Her sister kept giggling.

"What if it doesn't?" Aiko said, grinning.

Nabiki shared a glance with her. "Use a bigger club..."

It took them some time to stop laughing.

The other three girls left after an hour or so, Misaki, still looking slightly embarrassed, heading to the garage she worked at part time while the other two went off shopping. Sitting in the living room Ranma and Kasumi watched Nabiki as she stood at the window, looking out at the view. After a while she turned and leaned against the balcony doors, watching them back. "I probably won't be able to come back for a couple of weeks," she said. "I've just got too much work to do. Not to mention I want to go home and see Akane and the others, I haven't been back for a while."

They both nodded.

"That's fine. I would think things will be fairly quiet for a while. I hope they are. Even I have limitations to the amount of excitement I want. It would be nice to be able to relax for a few weeks." He looked curiously at her. "We're still planning on visiting Uthryyl and his family for a while later this summer. Maybe July. We can arrange it around your holidays. Do you still want to come?"

Giving it some consideration, she nodded. "Yes. Definitely. He and his family are very nice and I find the idea of different worlds fascinating. The only one I've been on was dead, then you blew the crap out of half of it." Ranma chuckled.

"Only one little mountain. No one will miss it."

She laughed. "I'd like to see a world with an entire alien civilisation on it. It sounds very interesting."

"You will like their home world, sister," Kasumi said. "It's very nice. Some of the plants are some very odd colours, the people are nice, and there's the g'rargh to look forward to." Nabiki nodded with a smile.

"That's a very good point." Moving back to the sofa she sat, making herself comfortable. "What's likely to happen about the fallout from the Halleckton affair?" the middle sister asked curiously. Ranma sighed a bit, glancing at his wife.

"I spoke to Agent Naito late last night. The Canadians would like to speak to the mage Václav Sklár sometime in the next week, to get his side of the story. They're building a case against Murray. I'll go and get him, then take him back when they're finished. He's promised to cooperate, so I think I can leave him with them."

"Do you believe him?" Kasumi asked. He nodded.

"Yes. I'm sorry he got dragged into all this. I've looked into him, he has a reputation as a decent man, generally honest and pleasant, not to mention responsible. He made a horrible mistake, people died as a result, but to his enormous credit, realises it all and is willing to take his punishment. After thinking about it I'm going to argue that this should be as light as it's possible to be under the circumstances. Unless you think that's wrong?" He looked between the two women. Both considered the matter.
"I believe that he didn't mean any of this to happen, and was horrified by it," Kasumi said in the end. "It doesn't mean he should get off with no punishment, but yes, I think he should be treated reasonably leniently." Nabiki nodded. "Whether the Canadians will agree is another matter."

"I know. They're going to be out for blood and I can't blame them. Murray is going to pay for it for the rest of his life. In that case it's richly deserved. He knew damn well what that thing was, he went after it anyway, he didn't tell the one person who could have prevented all this happening what was going on until it was too late, and to add to that he's guilty of corruption of an FBI official. I lay the deaths of three hundred and fifteen people squarely at his door. Perhaps not murder, but damn close." The martial artist sighed heavily, scowling. "At least I... persuaded... him to confess to everything else he's done. Some of his past crimes are enough to get him life in jail, never mind what the RCMP can charge him with for Halleckton. I'm sure they'll come up with something interesting."

He looked at them again. "The fallout will be considerable. The FBI has already arrested and charged their agent, and apparently two more who were implicated. They'll be giving evidence against Murray. All his assets have been frozen, I suspect a lot of it will be confiscated to pay for all the damage and deaths, with anything left going to his wife. That poor woman had no idea what a shit the man was. Just got swayed by the wealth, which is a bit stupid but not a crime."

"It sounds like this is going to be a very big case," Nabiki said. He nodded.

"Probably. From what Agent Naito said, the more they look into Murray and his business dealings, now they have his 'cooperation', the more things they find that are, well, disturbing, frankly. He seems to have been involved in a lot of financial crime, market rigging, insider trading, you name it. A lot of people ended up in a bad way as a result of what he did. It even extends as far as Japan, apparently, a couple of companies he owned via some sort of shell corporation have turned out to be of great interest to the authorities. My guess is that it will all go on for years and bring down a lot of people all over the world." Ranma shook his head. "A lot of it is over my head, I know something of business and money but not to that level of detail. It's more along your lines, Nabs."

She smiled.

"Don't call me Nabs." After a moment, she remembered when she'd gotten out of bed. "Twice." He snickered. "I might look into it at some point, but I don't really want to think about it too much for a while."

"Can't blame you." They were silent for a little while. Eventually he added, "Agent Naito said that the RCMP would probably like to take statements from all of us as well, when it was convenient. He's expecting an official request sometime in the next week, although Inspector Deveraux already told him off the record it was very likely. It would be voluntary, but I think it would be good for our relations with them. They're decent people." He glanced at the two young women, who both nodded.

"It's fine with me," Kasumi said.

"Me too. Although I'd like to get a few days of normal life in first." Nabiki sighed a little. "Will they want some sort of written report as well?"

"That's what we normally do. Kas and I wrote up the type of thing we generally give to the PSIA last night and emailed it to Agent Naito. He and his superiors are fine with it. None of the rest of you need to do anything about that unless you really want to. If you do I can show you what they need."

"I'd be interested in reading your reports, at some point. Not now, though."

"OK. Let me know when."

"I wonder what the cover story will end up being?" Kasumi mused. He shrugged.

"I'm not sure. It's going to be pretty damn difficult to disguise all that death and destruction in conventional terms. There are eighteen witnesses to some or all of it as well. It's anyone's guess as to whether they'd stay quiet."

"Not to mention a huge crater where a large house used to be," Nabiki added.

"True. It was pretty big," He laughed. "If we hadn't expanded and hardened the wards to contain it the entire town would have been blown away by the shockwave. Even so the ground shock threw debris all the way across the lake. I would think that most of the buildings that were standing probably aren't any more."

His wife smiled. "The soldiers seemed impressed," she said, "judging by all the swearing."

"I wonder if the lake has stopped boiling yet?" Nabiki asked with a smile.

"Probably. That was an awful lot of water. But I would imagine the whole lake is considerably warmer now. At least it didn't start a fire, which was something I was a little worried about. When Kas, Aiko, and I went back to deal with that last demon we checked very carefully to make sure nothing was burning." Looking at her as she rose, he asked, "Are you going now?"

"Yes. I need to get back." She bent down and hugged him, then her sister. "Take care, you two. Keep in touch. I'll keep practising the katas you showed me, but for the time being I don't have time for any more training. I think I need a little break from the magical girl stuff anyway."

"Understandable." He smiled up at her.

"I'm actually looking forward to a long train journey, as funny as that sounds. Something completely normal." Nabiki grinned, while they laughed. "I'll see you later." The pair watched as she headed down the hallway, closing the door behind her, before digging out their relevant medical books and beginning work for their respective courses, talking quietly together.
Miki hugged John as they listened to the TV in the common room of her dormitory block. The report from JNN was currently showing an aerial view, from a helicopter, of a visibly completely destroyed town, all the buildings flattened. It was on the shore of a small lake, one of hundreds in the area of Canada it was located in, west and north of Toronto. A perfectly circular gouge in the lake shore, just to the north of the town, was clearly shown. The lake had claimed about half of it, the entire water contents steaming slightly.

"A full explanation of the disaster in Halleckton, Ontario, is still not forthcoming, but it is growing more and more apparent that something extraordinary happened in this small, out of the way Canadian town over the last two weeks. Whatever it was came to a head six days ago in what is being tentatively described as some form of massive explosion. Witnesses as far away as Sudbury, sixty kilometres to the south, saw a brilliant purple flash on the horizon just as dawn was breaking. The sound was heard for more than five hundred kilometres, well into the United States as far as Detroit, as well as in Toronto, even as far as Ottawa. No cause of the explosion has been made public yet, although the location of the spectacular crater shown in these images from the air suggest it may have had something to do with Anthony Murray, a multi-millionaire businessman who is reported to have had a large house in the town, in the spot the crater now occupies."

"Mr Murray was arrested on the fourteenth, in an operation involving the Canadian Army, an operation which discovered the tragedy that had befallen the town. Reports so far released indicate that three hundred and fifteen confirmed deaths, the majority of the town, have been recorded, with an undisclosed number of survivors. Our sources indicate the population of the town at this time of year averages approximately three hundred people. If this was indeed the case, the number of survivors of this appalling event could be very low."

"Charges have not yet been levelled against Mr Murray, but sources at the RCMP tell us that a wide-ranging investigation into his current and past activities has been opened, already uncovering a number of serious financial irregularities amongst the group of companies he owns worldwide. The entirety of his assets has been frozen, a fortune currently estimated at some nine hundred and eighty million Canadian dollars, although the RCMP investigators believe that this may be understating the case considerably due to numerous tax reporting issues. Financial regulatory bodies in a number of other countries including the United States, the United Kingdom, Japan, Germany, and Australia have begun investigations based on the facts so far uncovered in Canada over the last few days."

"There has been one unconfirmed rumour that a number of the so-called Magical Girls, possibly the same ones who were of such aid to the British during the terrorist attack in December last year, were seen in the company of the Canadian Army unit sent in to Halleckton. No further information on this matter is currently available, although we will bring you up to date news as and when we receive it."

"Sara Murray, the wife of Anthony Murray, has filed for divorce."

"This is Kaori Saito, reporting from Toronto for the Japan News Network."

John picked up the remote and turned off the television, glancing at his girlfriend, who looked upset.

"Those poor people," she said, staring at the blank screen for a moment. "I wonder what happened?"
"No one seems to know, or if they are, they're not telling," he replied. "I suppose that in the middle of an active investigation they've probably got their hands full. It will come out sooner or later, it usually does. From what the news has been saying there are going to be a lot of people all over the world that go to jail as a result of all this." He looked up as Nabiki entered the room, smiling at her.

"Hello, Nabiki. I haven't seen you for a couple of days." She smiled back.

"I've been buried in the library writing reports. I missed a few days work and it's been a bit of a struggle to make it up, but I think I'm on top of it now." She moved over to the coffee machine, dropping some coins into it and poking buttons. Glancing at them, she asked, "Either of you want one?" They both shook their heads.

"No thanks, Nabiki. I had two cups earlier, any more and I'll start vibrating." Miki grinned at her neighbour, who chuckled, waiting for her cup to finish filling. Picking it out of the machine she stirred it, then tasted it, making a slight face.

"It needs cleaning," she mumbled, walking over and sitting in a chair next to them.

"It's needed cleaning for three weeks," John grumbled. "It's getting horrible." She shrugged.

"Still has caffeine in it, which is the main thing," the brunette said with a smile, then drank half the cup. "That said..." She put it on the table and looked at it sadly. He snickered a little. Miki giggled.

"Why did you miss so much work?" she asked her friend curiously. "You disappeared for several days, I was getting worried." Nabiki sighed.

"It was sort of a... family affair, I suppose. Some trouble that required a bit of travel." She seemed sad, thinking about something. Miki watched her with concern. Ever since the Tendo woman had come back from wherever she'd gone, she seemed somehow different. Slightly melancholy, as if she was trying to work something out, something that had affected her strongly. The girl hoped it wasn't some family member that was ill or anything like that. She had grown very fond of the somewhat acerbic and very intelligent woman who lived across the hall from her.

"You OK, Nabiki?" John enquired, having noticed much the same thing. She twitched, coming back from wherever it was she'd gone. The brunette looked at them for a moment then nodded, visibly attempting to be more cheerful.

"Yes. Thanks. Just have a lot on my mind at the moment." She picked up the cup, took a deep breath, then quickly drank the rest of it, making him laugh. "I paid for it, I'm damn well drinking the horrible stuff," she said with a grin.

"Better you than me."

"Would you like to go and get a pizza or something?" Miki asked. "We haven't done that for a while." Nabiki looked at her, then after a few seconds, nodded, smiling.

"Yes, I think I would. Why not. And some decent coffee." She gave the machine in the corner an evil look, while the other two laughed, getting up. They headed out of the building, aiming for the pizza place they used every now and then. It was running another two for one on large pizzas, which made them smile. This time, only four large ones were ordered. John looked at the stack on the table, grinning.

"Are you off your feed?" he asked jokingly. "There's barely enough here to keep you going." Nabiki laughed, picking up a slice.
"No need to be greedy. We can always order more, though." Chuckling, he started eating, as did his girlfriend.

"Have you heard about that horrible thing in Canada?" Miki asked. She watched a shadow cross her friend's face.

"Yes," Nabiki replied quietly. "It sounds very unpleasant."

"I wonder what happened?" the other woman said, eating her piece of pizza. "I've been watching the news, but no one seems to know very much. New reports are coming out all the time but it mostly seems to be speculation. And they're saying it's rumoured that magical girls from here were involved? That could be that Yori girl, and Chou as well. The ones you've met."

"It wouldn't surprise me," the middle Tendo said, sighing. "Sorry, just thinking about something. Hearing about that Canadian thing brought it back to me for some reason."

"Do you want to talk about it?" Miki asked, looked at Nabiki. The woman shook her head.

"I can't, I'm afraid. Thanks, though."

There was a pause, while they ate quietly. "The offer's there, if you change your mind," Miki said, smiling. The brunette responded with her own smile.

"Thanks, Miki. I wish I could. It's rather confidential, I'm afraid." She shook her head. "Enough of that. What have you two been up to recently?"

"We went bowling a couple of times, saw some movies, things like that. My coursework is coming along pretty well, I got very high marks on the last test. My dad is very pleased." Miki smiled.

"The statistics course is going well for me, as well," John added. "It's fairly easy, but very interesting." They discussed their work and university life for long enough that the melancholy start to the meal was forgotten, ending up laughing quite a lot, then on the spur of the moment deciding to see a movie. Overall, it was quite a good afternoon for everyone involved.

Akane back-flipped out of the way of Shampoo's kick, bouncing off the wall behind her and launching herself over the head of her opponent. The Amazon girl ducked the retaliatory strike, grinning, then rolled to the side, scissoring her legs around the youngest Tendos ankle and bringing her to the floor hard. She was sitting on her friend's back before the other girl had got her breath back. "That's two out of three, Akane. Want to try for three out of five?"

The slightly younger woman tried to get up, then subsided with a groan. "No," she said in a muffled manner, her face against the floor. "I want lunch first. Then I'll kick your ass." Shampoo laughed, hopping to her feet and helping her friend up.

"That's what you said yesterday. I seem to remember it didn't quite work out that way."

Akane grinned, rubbing a little blood from a small cut over her right eye, then looking at her fingertip. "It will sooner or later," she replied. They headed to the door, meeting Soun and Genma coming the other way. "Hi, dad. Uncle Genma. We're done for now."

"Thank you, Akane. Did you enjoy yourself?" The Tendo patriarch looked closely at his daughter. "Apparently so. You should get that cleaned up and bandaged, or it might scar." Akane smiled.

"It'll be fine. Cologne gave me some ointment she made that stops scarring and bleeding. It works "OK." Just about to follow Genma inside the Dojo to get ready for the afternoon classes, he turned back. "Oh. Nabiki called. She'll be coming home a little later for the weekend. Would you like to go out for a meal? I thought it might be nice, we haven't done that together for a long time." He glanced at Shampoo. "You're invited too, Shampoo." The two girls looked at each other, then nodded, smiling.

"That sounds nice. Where?"

"Nabiki suggested a place near Tokyo Bay, some sort of Thai-French restaurant. Apparently she's been there a few times with those friends of hers, Rika and Maiko. It's a little expensive, but she says it's very good."

"That's what I said. She told me it was actually remarkably effective, but to steer clear of the red curry escargot." Both women looked somewhat revolted. Her father grinned. "It sounds like good advice. Tonight then. We'll leave about seven." He headed inside.

Walking across the courtyard, Akane smiled. "What?" Shampoo asked curiously.

"I was just thinking it's like old times, just for a minute. Going out as a family, dad teaching, practising the Art... If only Kasumi was here it would be perfect." She stopped, looking up at the sky, a tear in the corner of her eye. The Amazon woman watched her. After a few seconds, Akane wiped her eyes.

Putting her arm around her friend's shoulder, Shampoo smiled gently. "I have a feeling you'll meet again, Akane. One day. Just believe that."

"I hope so, Shampoo, I really hope so. I miss her." They headed into the house.

Cologne sat on the roof of the house across the road, watching her great-grandaughter and the youngest Tendo girl with a small smile on her wizened face. The two seemed to have become good friends, which rather surprised her, but pleased her as well. Shampoo needed someone her own age to be around, which had been awkward until recently. Back in the village she'd had a number of young Amazons as friends, but they were thousands of kilometres away now, except for Mousse, who was in some ways a damn nuisance. She actually quite liked the boy, he was undeniably a very good practitioner of his own Art, but he was also a massive pain at times because he still wouldn't wear his glasses consistently.

Idly wondering if she should pay for him to get Lasik or something, or perhaps see if that Yori girl could help, she watched the two young women disappear into the house before going back to what she had been doing, which was tracing, or at any rate, trying to trace, that weird energy she'd found a couple of weeks ago. A lot of the traces had led to, or perhaps from, the Tendo Dojo, so she'd come back here yet again trying to determine what it was, what it did, and who if anyone was responsible for it. So far she had answers to precisely none of the above. This annoyed her no end. The old woman was used to knowing things that other people didn't, the thought that someone else was in possession of knowledge she not only didn't have, but possibly wouldn't understand even if she did, was supremely irritating.

Executing her detection spell again, she studied the results with interest, then sighed. The energy traces were steadily fading away, now almost being undetectable, for the most part. Only the freshest ones showed up at all and even they were faint. Looking around she wondered what to do about it. There was no evidence the strange energy was dangerous, or hostile at all, or for that matter even deliberate. It could still be some odd natural phenomenon she'd simply never encountered before. But for some reason she just didn't believe that. Something about it felt targeted. She couldn't explain it, but more years of experience than she cared to remember pointed to someone or something other than nature being behind it.

The thing she was trying not to think about was what her course of action would be if she did manage to figure it out. If it was the result of some artificial source, it was one that was far beyond her in ability and knowledge, which might not take kindly to her interference. She knew full well that while she could, just barely, detect this energy she didn't have a hope in hell of duplicating whatever was producing it, which frankly scared her when she allowed herself to ponder it. The Elder had never in her life encountered anything like it, which strongly suggested it was either something new, or something very alien. In either case, it worried her. Of the two, the latter possibility worried her more. Alien said demon, which could be bad. While most of the demon races she had encountered were around the same power level as a very talented human mage, some were so far beyond that as to make even Saffron nervous, in fact if what she'd read was correct a few of them could squish him like a bug. The thought of something like that playing around in Nerima was worrying.

Cologne shook her head. This was getting ahead of herself, she still had no real proof it even was an artificial creation, never mind whether it was an artificial creation of horrifically powerful, potentially hostile demons. Casting the spell again, she studied the results, then headed off across the roofs in the direction the strongest trace led, stopping occasionally to check again. As always, it abruptly stopped with no warning, after only a few hundred metres. "Damn, that's weird," she muttered, looking around. She was near the centre of Furinkan, on a roof overlooking the main shopping precinct. Sighing, she peered over the roof at the people walking below her, going about their business on this very nice day.

Spotting a familiar figure she smiled. Nabiki was obviously back home, clearly heading from the Metro station towards the Dojo. The middle sister was walking along looking around at the shops, a slight smile on her face, in no hurry. Watching her the Elder grinned. She had developed a considerable respect for the young woman over the years, the last few months pushing that towards something a lot like real friendship. The gifts at Christmas had been unexpected but welcome, showing that Nabiki felt the same way. 'That girl is going to be someone to watch out for in a few years.' She cackled softly to herself. 'Give her a century and she could be running the world.' She watched for a moment then went back to what she was doing. No matter how hard she looked, though, she couldn't find any sign of the energy trace past that point. Sighing, she made her way back towards the Dojo intending to start again.

"Hello, Elder," a voice called from below. She stopped and looked over the edge, to see Nabiki looking up at her with a smile, waving. She waved back, then hopped down.

"Hello, Nabiki. You look well. Are you back for the weekend?"

The brunette nodded. "Yes. I haven't been around much recently, too much work, you know the sort of thing. I needed a break. How are things with you?" She glanced up at the roof, then at the diminutive old woman. "You seemed to be looking for something." Cologne studied her with interest. Yes, very perceptive, as always. She debated what to tell the girl.

"I've been noticing something very weird around here for a couple of weeks," she finally admitted, deciding to be fairly truthful. There was no harm in it. "Some strange form of magic, I think. Very faint. Incredibly faint, actually. I had to pretty much invent an entire spell just to detect it. I've got no idea what it is or where it came from." She smiled. "You called me as I was looking around trying to work out more about it."

"Is it dangerous?" Nabiki asked after a pause. Cologne smiled again. The girl looked concerned.

"I don't believe so. I'm just curious. It's quite possible that it's just some very odd natural occurrence I've never come across before. There's no indication it's hostile or could cause problems, I just want to find out what it is." This was more or less true although somewhat understating the interest she had in it. Nabiki nodded slowly.

"I see. Interesting." The girl grinned suddenly. "It's lucky we have a warrior mage of your abilities in Nerima, to keep us safe from rogue magic," she said slyly. Cologne laughed, her rusty voice amused.

"Yes, indeed. And I don't even charge for my services." It was Nabiki's turn to laugh.

"You should move to Minato and set yourself up as a magical girl... I'm told the area is awash with them. Although, that said, none quite as... mature... as you, Elder." She was snickering. Cologne was finding the banter very funny.

"As my dear great-granddaughter has told me, I don't have the legs for the costume," she replied, chuckling. Nabiki stared, then laughed quite hard.

"I wouldn't want to insult you by agreeing."

"You should have seen me two hundred and fifty years ago, my girl. It was a different story then." Cologne grinned at the much younger woman. "It's nice to see you again. I hope your education is coming along well."

"In all sorts of ways." The middle Tendo looked momentarily slightly sad, but shook herself and cheered up. "How is Shampoo? And Mousse?"

"They're doing well. The boy is still a pain, I wish he'd wear his glasses more, although I will admit some of the things he does as a result of not doing so can be very funny. Not for him, of course." The Elder smiled. "Shampoo is performing very satisfactorily in her training of your sister. Akane has genuinely surprised me with her dedication to the Art, I must confess I didn't think she had it in her. I'm glad to be proven wrong, though. She has the makings of a fine fighter." Nabiki looked pleased.

"I'm very glad about that. We were very worried about her for a long time." She sighed a little. "Considering all the things that have happened, it's nearly a miracle."

"I would agree with that. What those two young ladies did was nothing short of incredible." Cologne smiled again, remembering. "Truly remarkable. Have you encountered either of them again?"

"I bumped into Yori and some of her friends a while back when I was shopping in Minato," the girl replied, looking amused. "She remembered me. I asked her for her autograph, for a friend you understand." Cologne nodded, grinning. "Honest. Anyway, she was happy to do it, then called several more girls who did as well. I got six signatures for Miki, who was over the moon. Now she thinks I know every magical girl in Minato!" Nabiki chuckled. "It's very funny."

Cologne was amused. The young woman seemed in good spirits despite her earlier momentary melancholy. "I hear that there is a magical girl active in the vicinity of your own university," she said. "Asumi? Asumo?"
"Azumi." The Tendo sister corrected her.

"That's the one. Not as dramatic as some of the Minato girls, but quite effective, from what I've heard." The brunette seemed to find this very amusing. "Apparently she tends to scare the criminals into surrender at least as much as forcing them. Impressive." The Amazon elder nodded wisely, then smiled, laughing. Nabiki joined in. "You should see if you could get her autograph as well. For your... friend." Smiling slyly, she watched as the younger woman giggled.

"Perhaps. She keeps to herself, as far as I know." Glancing at her watch, she looked back to the Elder. "I have to be getting on. We're going out for a meal later, I still need to catch up with the others, then have a rest. It was a long trip." Cologne nodded.

"Enjoy yourselves. Give my best wishes to your family. And tell Akane that I expect some rapid progress, or I won't teach her the Roasting Chestnuts technique next week." Grinning, Nabiki nodded, then went on her way. Cologne watched her go for a moment, smiling a little, then decided that she'd had enough of trying to figure out the strange energy for today, turning and making her way homewards. She'd have another go tomorrow.

Stopping at a clothes store she'd frequented many times, Nabiki commed Kasumi, idly inspected a couple of interesting outfits in the window. "Hello, sister. How are you?" Kasumi asked. The middle Tendo smiled slightly.

"Fine, thanks. Nearly at the Dojo, actually. We're all going out later to that restaurant you took me to months ago." She turned away from the window, continuing on her way.

"That's nice. It's very good. We were wondering how you were, we haven't heard from you for a few days."

"I've been thinking a lot, plus the work, of course. It took a while to catch up, but I'm fine now." Her sister laughed softly.

"Good. I'm glad to hear that. Ranma and I have spent a pleasantly routine week at the University doing much the same. It's very interesting, I was learning about auto-immune diseases recently. Some of them are horrible. Anyway, enough of that. From your tone of voice, there's something else." Nabiki chuckled, causing a man walking past to glance at her, then smile. She smiled back, nodding to him.

"I just bumped into Cologne. The changes to the ward system seem to have worked," the brunette said with satisfaction, heading towards home. "I was talking to her for five minutes or so and she didn't notice anything as far as I can tell."

"Very good," her elder sister said, sounding pleased. "I'll just check the logs to be certain. Hold on a moment, let me bring up the ward interface." The gentle voice of her elder sister paused for a few seconds. "Yes, it looks fine here as well. The system noted her interest in you, it's definitely got her marked as a possible hostile and seems to take great interest in your interactions, but it didn't have to take any active measures. The passive deflection seems to work correctly. That's certainly better than erasing her memory over and over every time you meet."

"I know. It was getting kind of funny in a Groundhog Day sort of way, but annoying as well." Nabiki smiled as her sister giggled.

"Poor Cologne."

"There could be a problem, though."
"Oh?" Kasumi sounded interested but not worried.

"She told me she's found something strange in the area. Some very difficult to detect and faint magic of a type she's never seen before. I have a feeling it might be something left over from the ward system. Is that possible?" There was a long, thoughtful silence.

"Yes, I think it could be. I'm impressed if it is. The traces would be very small and fade quickly, most people would never notice, I'm certain of that."

"Cologne is nothing if not sharp. Clever, as well. She said she invented a completely new spell to detect it."

"Very impressive." Kasumi's voice had a note of respect. "How was she talking about it? Is she worried, or anything like that?"

"She said it was nothing to worry about, she was just curious basically, but I could tell it was more than that. I got the feeling she is a little worried, yes. I don't think she has a clue about where it comes from or who's behind it, which is most of the reason she'd be worried in the first place. Do you think there's any possibility she'll work it out?"

Nabiki waved to an old neighbour, who called a greeting before going into a shop.

"I wouldn't completely rule it out but I think it's unlikely. By now the traces must be very weak indeed. I would expect the bulk of them to have faded completely, and even the most recent ones will soon be undetectable. If we don't create new ones, there should be nothing for her to find."

Kasumi paused, clearly thinking. "Unless she deliberately probes you the wards won't be triggered into active deflection, which should prevent any further traces being created. We should be prepared for it, though. I don't think she's got any reason to start looking into you any further, the system puts up a completely convincing false signature, but with Cologne you never know."

"What do we do if she works it out?" Nabiki had stopped again, inspecting the contents of a bookshop window, to give herself some reason not to arrive at the Dojo too fast, as she wanted to get this discussion finished first.

"I'm not quite sure. We always knew we might eventually get discovered, by either you or the Elder, no one else was likely to work it out, and we're prepared in some ways for that. When you found us we really thought we'd end up with everyone knowing for a while, but when it became clear that wouldn't happen, we were relieved, frankly. While I'd dearly love to be able to go back and see the family, the time isn't quite right yet, for a number of reasons, as you know. The last few months have, in some ways, made it more difficult, with all the things involving Yori and Chou."

Kasumi sighed gently. "We've talked about that before. It's still a concern."

"What about that security spell Ranma was researching?" Nabiki enquired. "You haven't said much about it recently."

"He's managed to convert it to our system and is sure it will work, but we haven't tested it yet. But, yes, you're right, that's probably the best defence we have. Cologne doesn't pose a serious threat aside from the exposure of us, no one from Nerima does, not now, but we don't want the information being spread far and wide just yet." Her sister paused again. "In some ways the only one who she could cause real problems for is you, although I don't think she would. Not on purpose. How would you feel if your new abilities became known to the family and your friends, sister?"

Nabiki considered it. "I'd prefer it didn't, to be honest. Oh, there are one or two people I could handle knowing, but at the moment it would mostly be a nuisance."
"That's understandable. We all need an identity we can use just for normal life. The magical girl lifestyle is fun, but you need to be able to take a break from it on occasion."

"Damn right." The middle sister laughed quietly, resuming her slow walk to the Dojo. "The biggest problem is, as usual, Akane. If she finds out the things I can do now... Well, it could be a very awkward argument. She's much better than me at the martial arts, certainly at the moment, but I'm pretty sure I have her outclassed in other areas."

"Oh, there's little doubt of that, Nabiki. Your ki ability far outstrips hers, both in power and control, and the gap will only widen. You're probably as fast if not faster, coming up on as strong, and with some of the other things you've learned, could give her a real fight if it ever came to it. Even Shampoo would be easy enough for you to deal with as long as you didn't attempt to go up against her hand to hand. I would strenuously advise that you don't for some time, she is very good indeed."

Nabiki chuckled. "I have no intention of getting into a fight with either my sister or Shampoo, but if it ever happened I'd stay at a safe distance and snipe at them. I know my own limitations." Kasumi giggled inside her head.

"I suspect you think those limitations are greater than they are. But I'm glad to hear it. Intelligence is what wins battles, after all. But yes, I agree, Akane could be a problem. Her temper is so much better now, but she could still be very jealous. You know what she's like. She's always been a little like that, and has wanted to be a magical girl most of her life. Finding out that both her older sisters were now would be... frustrating." Amusement coloured her speech, along with sympathy.

"I suppose we'll have to wait and see. If Cologne does start working it out, what then?"

"We'll have to see what the circumstances are. Ms Aoyama might be needed, or perhaps merely Yori." Kasumi giggled again. "It depends on whether the correct approach is incredibly creepy or incredibly dangerous." Nabiki was trying not to laugh out loud.

"We could probably do an absolutely horrifying double-act."

"Indeed. We don't want to scare her to death, poor woman. I quite like the Elder."

"So do I. But I don't underestimate her, either."

"Neither do I or Ranma. We both have considerable respect for her abilities and intelligence. Oh, well, all we can do is prepare as best we can then wait. It's entirely possible nothing will happen." Nabiki snorted with laughter, making her elder sister giggle. "I know, with the way our lives go..."

"I'm nearly there, sis, I'll talk later. Thanks for the information." She was just around the corner of the road on which the Dojo lay.

"You're welcome. Have fun, come and see us again soon."

"I will." Disconnecting, she walked around the corner in time to see something that made her stop and groan. "Oh, for fuck's sake." She watched Kodachi jump around on the roof of the Dojo, Akane and Shampoo both chasing her. It was clear the crazed gymnast was still crazed, despite her nearly normal behaviour over the last few months, or perhaps was merely bored and had wanted some excitement. She was laughing manically, the sound faint in the distance, although the laughter was slightly more strained than usual since she seemed to be becoming aware that she might be in over her head. It was clear that both her opponents were working as a team, with considerable skill.
A distant crash sounded as Shampoo swung a club at the girl, only barely missing with a blow that would have sent her flying, instead punching a hole in the roof, tiles cascading to the road outside the wall. Nabiki winced. "Crap. That's going to cost." She shook her head, about to stomp over and use the patent pending 'Yori' technique of shouting horribly, when a better idea crossed her mind.

She smiled evilly, then carefully looked around, making sure no one was in the area, before stepping into a nearby alley, the one she'd used in the past for a convenient teleportation pick-up.

The woman that emerged a few seconds later adjusted her sunglasses, primly brushed a little dust from the sleeve of her nice suit, then proceeded to stalk towards the Tendo dojo, plants wilting in the wave of cold that followed her path...

Akane jumped to the side to avoid the snapping ribbon, then ducked as a spiked club passed mere centimetres over her head. Her return blow only just missed Kodachi, who skipped lightly out of the way with a laugh, although she was sweating slightly. Shampoo watched, nodding approvingly, then moved to get behind the other woman. All three of them were getting slightly tired, while Akane was doing her best to keep her temper. She was genuinely surprised that she was managing so well, normally Kodachi brought out the worst in her even after Yori and Chou had done what they did. 'The therapy really is working,' she thought to herself, a slight smile on her lips.

Even so she was righteously annoyed. The idiotic Kuno woman had turned up out of nowhere minutes ago, that horrible laugh heralding her arrival, making both girls, who had been enjoying a pleasant sunny afternoon in the garden, wince and sigh, before the first club had buried itself in the grass between them. It was very irritating. The damage to the roof of the Dojo, and a hole in the garden wall where she'd returned the club with more enthusiasm than actual aim, was going to make Nabiki very angry. She didn't want to let her sister down but couldn't quite manage to nail the damn gymnast. She was faster than she had any right to be.

'She's been practising as well,' Akane thought, ducking again.

A polite clearing of a throat from the other end of the roof made all three of them stop suddenly, turning to look, as they hadn't been aware anyone else was up there. Shampoo and Akane froze, while Kodachi looked puzzled.

"Ms Akane Tendo. Ms Xian Pu. How pleasant to see you again. I do hope I'm not interrupting an important activity?" The woman in the expensive suit was standing on the peak of the roof as if it was level ground, apparently not noticing the ten metre drop centimetres behind her. They exchanged glances, shivering slightly. The voice, cold and emotionless, was even worse than they remembered.

"Um, Ms Aoyama. This is a surprise," Akane said, her voice trembling just the smallest amount. 'An extremely unwelcome one!' she thought frantically, trying to work out why the terrifying and probably inhuman woman was there. Neither one of them had been anywhere near Minato since her meltdown before Christmas. Mainly because of what was strolling along the roof towards them. Ms Aoyama stopped to examine Kodachi, who was still standing there trying to work out what was happening, lowering her glasses to look over them curiously, making the wealthy gymnast flinch at the sight.

"Ms Kodachi Kuno. Fascinating." She pulled a notebook and pen out of thin air and made a few quick notes, then put it away again, moving on. Behind her, Kodachi watched, feeling chilled to the bone and not entirely sure what to do. Stopping a couple of metres from the other two, the green-haired woman inspected first Shampoo, then Akane. The Amazon winced when the unsettling gaze stopped for a moment on the bonbori she was holding, an eyebrow going up fractionally behind the glasses, and quickly put it behind her back. Akane discreetly tossed the club she'd caught when Kodachi threw it at her into the garden while the woman was looking at her friend, twitching at the crash it made as it hit a flowerpot. Ms Aoyama didn't react at all.

"Greetings. I was in the locality on an unrelated matter when it was brought to my attention that you and your colleague were involved in an altercation with Ms Kuno. I decided that I should investigate the circumstances. Nerima has been considerably less prone to the regrettable excesses of damage and disturbance that resulted from your more boisterous activities since Ms Yori and her partner repaired your unfortunate medical problems some months ago. It was my hope that such a condition would continue. I find that I am disappointed that it has not. May I enquire as to the reason?"

All three young women exchanged glances. Eventually, Akane tried, "It was a... misunderstanding. We're sorry about causing any disturbance." The woman in the suit stood completely still, so still none of the participants were even sure she was breathing, for a long moment, then nodded once.

"I see. Is this misunderstanding still ongoing?"

They all looked at each other again. Shampoo shook her head. "No, I think we're good."

"Excellent. I find that most gratifying. May I assume that such misunderstandings are unlikely to reoccur in future?" There was nothing more than polite interest in the innocent question, but all three of them shivered.

"I don't think there will be any more problems," Akane said, glancing at Kodachi and Shampoo, who both shook their heads. Kodachi was looking quite frightened. Something completely out of her experience was happening, which would normally have attracted either an attack or a derisory comment, but for some reason she didn't feel that either option was wise.

"Again, excellent. In that case, please don't let me detain you any further from going about your business. Allow me to express my best wishes for your continued recovery, Ms Tendo." She produced the notebook again, making some more notes while looking at the damage, then put it away. She glanced up, raising her eyebrows at the three young woman who were watching her. "You may go." They all shook themselves, coming out of the horrified trance they'd fallen into, then slowly filed to the edge of the roof and dropped off, one by one. When they looked back from the middle of the courtyard Ms Aoyama was gone without a trace.

"Who in the name of all the gods was that?" Kodachi asked, sounding, for once, totally sane.

Shampoo and Akane looked at each other. "Someone you don't ever want to meet again if you can avoid it," the youngest Tendo said, shivering. "You really, really don't." Shampoo put her arm around her friend, also looking scared and worried.

"Go home, Kodachi. We're done." The Amazon looked at the other woman, then turned and walked away with Akane. Kodachi watched them disappear inside the house, then left quietly, wishing she'd worn something more substantial than a leotard. It seemed to have gotten very cold rather suddenly.

In the alley, Nabiki was grinning slightly maliciously. It was something of a cruel trick, but it had worked remarkably well. 'I don't think we'll have any more trouble like that for some time,' she thought in satisfaction, sitting on an old box and waiting a suitable time to make her arrival less coincidental with 'Ms Aoyama's' departure. After a few minutes, she got up and left the alley having checked there was no one around, reaching the Dojo a minute later. She looked at all the tiles on the ground outside and sighed. 'Oh well. We can afford it nowadays. It could have been worse.' Opening the front gate she went in, suppressing a sudden wild urge to simply jump over it like Ranma used to, but grinning slightly at the thought that she could.

"I'm home," she called as she entered the house, taking off her shoes. She found Akane and Shampoo sitting in the living room drinking some tea, looking subdued. Nodoka was watching them with concern. "What's wrong?" she asked innocently. "And why is there a huge hole in the Dojo roof?"

"Kodachi decided to visit a little while ago," Nodoka replied, handing her a cup of tea which she took with thanks, sitting down.

"Ah. What happened?"

"I'm not entirely sure. Akane, Shampoo, and Kodachi were fighting on the roof then it all went quiet very suddenly." The elder Saotome woman glanced at the two martial artists. "They came in a little later, like this. They haven't said what's wrong."

Feeling slightly guilty, as she'd clearly had a somewhat more dramatic effect than she'd aimed at, even though she'd tried to turn the creepiness factor down a lot, Nabiki looked at her sister and asked, "What happened, Akane? Did Kodachi beat you again?" The younger woman looked up, slightly incensed, then shook her head.

"No. Something else. Or someone else."

Nodoka and Nabiki exchanged glances. "Who?" the Saotome woman asked curiously.

Shampoo sighed. "Ms Aoyama visited."

Looking a little puzzled, Nodoka repeated, "Ms Aoyama? Who is that?" She thought for a moment. That name rang a bell. "Oh. Didn't you meet her during that unpleasantness with Ryoga, the one that led to Yori and Chou healing Akane?" Nodding, the Amazon woman sighed again.

"Yes. We were hoping we wouldn't meet her again. She's... worrying."

"You can say that again," Akane muttered to herself.

"What did she do?" Nodoka asked. "Did she fight you, or something like that?"

"No. She just asked some questions." Ranma's mother looked even more puzzled. Akane and Shampoo looked at each other.

"It's not the questions she asked so much as the way she asked them," the lilac-haired Amazon explained with a slight shiver. "You can tell there's so much more implied with everything she actually says. I've never met anyone like her. I don't want to. It's..." The girl trailed off.

"Very scary," Akane finished for her. She nodded.

"How odd. Why was she here?" Nodoka asked. Akane shrugged.

"She said she was just passing. I hope that's the case. I really don't want to meet her again." She looked at Shampoo. "I think we need to make sure we don't let Kodachi goad us into anything again." Her friend nodded firmly.

"I couldn't agree more. But I don't think she'll be back for a while. She looked very worried as well." The young woman half-smiled. "We had her on the run, though. It was good teamwork. You're really coming along well."

Akane grinned, her mood lifting. "Thanks." Nabiki watched them both with a small smile. Things seemed to have worked out well. That only left one thing.

"So..." Everyone looked at her. She smiled more widely. "Who's paying for the damage to the Dojo?" The two girls exchanged glances, then pointed at each other.

"She is," they both said, laughing.

"This is a very nice place," Soun said with pleased satisfaction, looking around at the restaurant. He studied the view of the bay out the window, nodding his satisfaction. Returning his attention to the starter he'd ordered, he took another bite. "The food is excellent as well." Nabiki smiled.

"I do like it, even though it's a bit pricey. I've been here a few times with Rika and Maiko in the last year."

"More than a few times, I suspect, dear," Nodoka said with a smile, eating her food with appreciation. "The Maître-de greeted you by name and asked if you'd be sitting at your usual table." Looking amused, the older woman glanced at the middle sister, who giggled a little.

"OK, true, we've been here a fair number of times."

"Rika and her friend are reasonably well off, I assume, then, if they eat at places like this," the Saotome woman asked. Nabiki nodded after a moment.

"They're comfortable. Some sort of family income. I'm not sure of the details. They don't let it show much, they're both very down to earth people who don't splash their money around. But it does mean they can eat out occasionally without it hurting."

"Very nice. You must invite them around again soon, we haven't seen them for some time. I like them." Nodoka smiled. "You have good taste in friends."

Nabiki grinned. "People tell them that," she said, which made the older woman laugh delightedly. Akane rolled her eyes at her sister, glancing at Shampoo sitting next to her who looked amused.

"A bit full of yourself, Biki," she said, laughing slightly. The older sister chuckled.

"It rubs off from Maiko."

"That young woman does seem very self-confident. I suspect she will be very good at anything she does," the mother of the young woman in question, even though she didn't realise it, said approvingly. "Her partner is also someone who strikes me as very competent. She's good in the kitchen as well. Handy with a knife, which would stand her in good stead if she became a surgeon, I suspect." Nodoka looked pleased with her logic.

"Quite likely." Looking around the table, smiling to herself, Nabiki felt quite contented. It was very nice being out with her family like this. She wished it could include the other part as well, but decided that such a thing might happen in time, with no reason to hurry it. "How have you all been since I came back last time? Aside from breaking things, I mean," she added, looking at Akane for the last part. Her sister looked embarrassed.

"Sorry. We didn't mean to." Nabiki smiled at her, finishing off her deep-fried squid.
"I know. Don't worry about it."

"We've been pretty good. Shampoo has taught me a lot of things, I can beat her sometimes now."

"Twice." The Amazon woman looked at her friend with a grin. "Not sometimes." Akane sighed, then smiled.

"OK. I've beaten her twice. But I'm still getting better." Nabiki exchanged glances with their father, who nodded.

"She is. Remarkably so. I've been meaning to try my own chances with her at some point soon, to see how she's coming along. But I have to say Shampoo is very good indeed, both as a fighter and a teacher. I'm impressed every time I watch them." Smiling, the Amazon looked pleased.

"Thank you, Soun."

"You're welcome." He glanced at Genma, who was, surprisingly for him, eating quite slowly and thoughtfully, listening to the conversation. "I think we might start you on some of the Anything Goes special moves soon as well, Akane. You've certainly come on enough to make good use of them." The youngest sister looked both surprised and pleased. He studied Shampoo for a moment. "I believe it might be a good thing to teach you as well, Shampoo. While you know a remarkable number of techniques for one so young, I think Genma and I may still have a few things that you'd find useful. If you're interested." The lilac-haired young woman exchanged a look with her friend.

"I'd like that, I think. Great-Grandmother would, as well." She smiled.

"Cologne has honoured my daughter with training her in your methods. I'd like to return the honour. You are certainly capable of learning what we can teach." The Amazon nodded, smiling.

"The elder is going to teach me the Roasting Chestnut technique soon," Akane said, looking pleased. Nabiki laughed.

"If you make rapid progress in your current lessons, she told me."

"When did you meet her?" her sister asked curiously.

"On the way to the Dojo from the station. We talked for a while, she seems in a good mood at the moment, and was quite complimentary about you. Both of you. I think she's actually very pleased about how well you're coming on. Not that she's probably say it in so many words."

"Her training techniques can be painful, but she's very knowledgeable." Akane grinned. "I still can't believe she's allowing me to learn all these things. I owe her a lot."

"Honour that debt by learning to the best of your abilities, daughter," Soun said wisely. "I expect that will please her more than almost anything you could do." Shampoo nodded at his words.

"She dislikes people not pushing their limits more than anything," the young woman confirmed. Akane listened thoughtfully.

"I'll certainly do my best not to disappoint her," she replied, then looked up as the waiter approached. They ordered their choices for the main meal, waiting as the table was cleared, then resuming talking. The food arrived quite fast, soon leaving them eating appreciatively with not much conversation for a while.

Nabiki discreetly motioned to the waiter, who nodded, bringing over another bottle of the wine.
they were drinking. Between them Soun and Genma had finished the first bottle in short order, only leaving a little for the others. 'I hope we don't have to carry them home,' the middle sister thought with an inner grin. 'Not that it would be difficult, but it would be a little embarrassing.' She made sure that the rest of them got their glasses filled before the two fathers managed to lay hands on the bottle. Nodoka noticed and smiled slightly.

"Well done, dear," she whispered, leaning sideways a little to do so. "I'll try to keep mine reasonably sober if you can take care of yours?" Stifling a giggle Nabiki nodded a little. She noticed that Shampoo and Akane were whispering together, looking slightly worried.

"Is there a problem?" she asked, taking another forkful of extremely good fish. They twitched a little, looking around, then Akane shook her head.

"No." She paused for a moment, while the others looked at her. "We were just wondering how Ms Aoyama found out about us earlier. We'd only been fighting with Kodachi for a few minutes when she turned up out of nowhere. It was really weird."

"And very creepy." Shampoo added quietly. "She's like a ghost. I didn't hear or sense anything, she was just there. She disappeared in the same way."

"Perhaps she can teleport like that Aiko girl who came with Yori?" Nodoka asked, looking interested.

"I don't think that was it. There was no flash of light like Aiko produces, or anything else. And you can feel Aiko, Yori, Chou and the others. They have very distinctive ki signatures. So much power you wouldn't believe it, especially Yori and Chou. Ms Aoyama is different. A really weird ki signature, not... human, I guess. It's very unsettling. But I couldn't feel anything until she was standing there." She shivered. "Like I said. Creepy."

"She sounds very strange." Nodoka glanced at Nabiki, who shrugged a little.

"She is. And really scary." Akane looked rather subdued.

"Cheer up, sis. She didn't threaten you, did she? You said she was only passing through and just wanted to ask a few questions."

"She doesn't have to threaten. The questions are bad enough. You can tell that so much more is being said than just the words, and she's allowing you to draw the right conclusions. Not that she seems to care one way or the other if you do. I suspect that if she decided to do something, she'd just do it, then go on her way without any trouble at all. It's... horrifying."

"I'd suggest in that case it would probably be best to make sure you don't attract her attention again," Nabiki said, feeling weirdly proud how much of an impact her little experiment had produced on the two girls, but also rather guilty. She didn't really want to genuinely terrify them, only get them to think about what they did before they did it. She seemed to have achieved that in spades. Hopefully Kodachi would be as cowed. She didn't mind giving the Kuno girl nightmares at all.

"That's the plan, believe me," Shampoo said. "I could go my entire life without seeing her again. Happily." They resumed eating, cheering up after a while. Nabiki felt somewhat relieved. She didn't seem to have broken them permanently. Resolving to not bring that particular persona out around her family again unless it was really necessary, Nabiki went back to talking to Nodoka.

At the end of the meal, they ordered desserts. Nabiki had the same poppy-seed ice-cream she'd tried the very first time she'd visited the restaurant with 'Maiko' and 'Rika', which had become a firm favourite of hers. At her urging Nodoka has some as well. "This is truly amazing, Nabiki," the older woman said, finishing her bowl reluctantly. "I will definitely have to try that again. I wonder if they sell it to take away? It would be nice to have in the freezer."

"They don't. I asked once. Apparently, a lot of people would like them to, but they think that if you can only get it here it helps bring people back." Nabiki grinned. "It's a horrible underhanded trick that works very well." When they'd paid up, which involved a certain amount of wincing on the part of Soun, they headed home, well stuffed and content, quite late. The trip involved switching trains three times, but was mostly uneventful, both fathers dozing off in their seats, while Nodoka was reading a book most of the way.

On the last leg of the trip, Nabiki looked up as they pulled into a station, feeling something odd. She looked around. Shampoo and Akane had both fallen asleep, the Amazon drooling slightly as she leaned against the partition between their bank of seats and the next one, while her sister was slumped forward with her head on her chest, snoring. Nodoka was buried in her book, oblivious to anything else, while both fathers were completely out of it. There was no-one else in their carriage, the last passenger other than themselves having left at the previous station. The next one along had a similar number of people, she could see through the interconnecting door, but it looked like most of them were asleep or reading as well.

Quietly standing up Nabiki investigated where the threat she could sense was coming from, quickly determining it wasn't on the train but the platform. Looking out the window she could see a few people walking away from the train, presumably having just gotten off, but nothing obviously wrong.

#I believe this is the problem, Nabiki,# Jun said quietly, apparently having detected her heightened interest in the platform. It had a habit of anticipating things like that, having learned the subconscious cues of her detecting things it didn't very well. A target lock glowed around the figure of a man at the far end of the platform, as her vision dropped into low light mode. A magnified section of what she was looking at windowed over her main view, allowing her to see the man seemed to be holding a knife, and was definitely threatening someone with it. The victim seemed to be considerably smaller, probably younger as well. #By the biometric parameters I can read I would estimate it is a male between fourteen and fifteen years of age,# the SI added helpfully. Nabiki nodded slightly.

'That's what it looks like to me, Jun,' she replied silently. 'The question is what to do about it. The train is about to leave. If I get off it will raise questions.' She glanced around. No one was watching, but she could already feel the train starting to move again. Looking back out the window she could see the mugger raising the knife threateningly. 'Damn it.' With one final check that she was unobserved, thankful it was so late, she walked swiftly down the car to the furthest door on that side of the train activating the disguise bracelet she always wore in the process. Reaching the door she pushed her left fingers easily into the seal, pulling it open a few centimetres with no trouble despite the best efforts of the pneumatic system, putting her right hand through the gap and aiming carefully...

Kunihiro Tsuchida gaped at the man with the knife, wondering frantically what to do. He'd heard about muggers but never encountered one before. He wasn't enjoying the experience one little bit.

"Come on, kid, you heard me. Wallet, phone, watch, anything else you have, or I'll cut your balls off," the rumpled and unshaven man said, pointing at his chest with a knife that looked appallingly sharp and well cared for, unlike his clothes. Not feeling like pointing out that the knife was aimed at entirely the wrong area to carry out the threat as stated, Kumihiro began emptying out his pockets, cursing the fact that he’d stayed at his friends house until this hour of the day.

He was looking down at his jacket as he reached for his wallet when he heard a loud pop and saw a flash of green light out of the corner of his eye, followed by a thump, which was accompanied by a metallic clattering sound. Looking up he was startled to see the mugger had vanished. After a moment his eyes drifted lower, finding that the man hadn’t disappeared at all, he merely seemed to have had a sudden urge to lie down. On his face. With the back of his coat smoking slightly, in a circular pattern. In fact, the man seemed to be distinctly lacking in consciousness, his knife lying on the pavement a metre away from his hand.

Somewhat taken aback, the young man wondered what had happened. He looked around, seeing only the train that he’d gotten off slowly pulling away, accelerating steadily with a whine of powerful motors. A figure in one of the doorways caught his attention. It was a woman of medium height, brown hair, smiling at him. His phone, which he had in his hand, rang. Looking at it he slowly raised it to his face, pressing the call accept button with his thumb. "Hello?"

"You shouldn’t hang around on dark train stations this late at night," an amused female voice said. "Kick his knife away from him and go find a policeman. Have a nice night. Bye." She hung up. Looking at the phone for a moment, he returned his attention to the train, which was just entering the tunnel. The woman waved to him with a grin. He waved back uncertainly, in wonder, then followed the advice, realising as he did that he had no idea at all what she looked like or even sounded like any more.

"That was very weird," he muttered as he looked for a cop.

Taking her seat again, Nabiki checked to see if anyone had noticed anything, seeing that Nodoka had fallen asleep as well by this point. Shampoo was snoring, her face pressed unattractively against the glass partition, which brought a smile to the middle sister. She gently eased her younger sister back against the rear of the seat which she was perilously close to falling out of before leaning back herself and finding an interesting TV show to watch in the privacy of her head for the remainder of the trip, an expression of satisfaction on her face.
Chapter 50

Early Monday morning, Nabiki got out of bed, peering out the window of the room she'd grown up in at the dawn. There was no one visible. Listening carefully for a while she became sure she was the only one up. She couldn't feel any of the vague sensations she'd begun noticing when people were near and conscious, something that Ranma referred to as life signs. The phrase made her smile, it was reminiscent of silly science fiction shows she'd loved to watch when she was a child. Opening the window she looked out, unaccountably pleased to be back in Nerima, despite, or possibly because of, her new found abilities and everything that had happened recently. The entire weekend had been very relaxing.

With a sudden grin, she looked around again, just in case, then grabbed the top of the window frame, pushing off and pivoting around it in a smooth move she'd witnessed Ranma perform dozens of times, but that she'd never in a thousand lifetimes have thought she would be able to perform. Slightly to her surprise it worked as advertised, as she found herself deposited on the roof with no fuss whatsoever. Standing upright she looked around, seeing the familiar district from an unfamiliar viewpoint. The brunette turned in a complete circle, before walking slowly up the roof and sitting at the peak, watching the sun rise, her eyes half closed and a smile on her face.

'I think I can handle it,' she mused. 'After coming so far, learning so much, knowing how much more there is to learn, it would be a shame to throw it all away just because of one horrific experience. Ranma is right. There are many, many people all over the world who experience things as bad, or worse, on a daily basis, without any of the advantages I have, or my friends have. They keep going. I can.' She nodded to herself. 'I will. I have all the support I could ever hope for, four new sisters who would do anything for me, and who I would do anything for. They really are family. So is Ranma. I don't want to let them down, but more than that I don't want to let myself down, and giving all this up would be doing that.' Grinning a little at her internal dialogue, thinking she needed a better speech writer, the middle sister stretched, lying back on the roof and staring at the early morning sky. 'But I definitely don't want another experience like Halleckton again if I can avoid it.' The memories made her shudder, but were much less upsetting than they had been a few days ago. She still had intermittent bad dreams, which she fully expected would continue for some considerable time, but unlike the first two nights after she went back to university, she didn't find herself waking up in the middle of the night feeling like she was going to be sick again.

A noise from below made her listen, then quickly scuttle down the roof and swing back through her window, just in time. There was a tap on her door, before her father stuck his head around it. "Good morning, Nabiki. Did you hear something on the roof?" He looked puzzled. "It sounded like Shampoo or Akane, but it's a bit early for them to be practising."

"Sorry, Dad. I only just got up." She evaded the question with a slight feeling of mixed guilt and relief. "Isn't Akane in her room?"

"Ah. I suppose I should probably have checked there first," Soun replied, a wry grin on his face. His daughter folded her arms and gave him a look that made him chuckle. "You're going back soon, I expect?"

"Yes, I have to. I've got some lectures this afternoon I need to attend, and a report to write for first thing tomorrow." Nabiki smiled at her father. "But it's been wonderful being back."

He returned the smile, coming fully into her room and leaning against the wall. "This is your last year at university, Nabiki. Have you decided what you're going to do afterwards? Further education, or a job?"

"It's a bit more than that yet, I don't graduate until March next year. It's only June now." She sat on her bed as he nodded, looking amused at her correction. "But yes, I'm in the final stretch." The brunette shrugged a little. "I'm still thinking about it. A degree in business and finance should open up a number of possibilities." After a moment, while he was nodding, she added, "Rika suggested a while ago that I should look into Forensic Accountancy."

Her father looked puzzled again. "What's that? I've never heard of it."

"It's sort of like detective work in the financial world. Reverse-engineering accounts, normally very complex ones, that may have been altered to deliberately hide money, for example. It's something of a specialist field, but from what I've found out it pays well and could be quite interesting." She smiled a little. "It uses several different things I have experience with, including some of the skills I learned in school." He looked at her for a long moment.

"I remember some of those skills. They skirted the edge of impropriety, I felt." Nabiki laughed at his description.

"They helped keep the Dojo afloat for a couple of years, though."

"True. Very true." He was still looking slightly dubiously at her. "Although, from what I remember there were nearly as many times when your, um... little projects... caused some awkward problems." He grinned for a moment. She sighed, also smiling.

"I'm genuinely sorry about that. I was a different person then. Hopefully, I'm a better one now." Moving over to her and sitting next to her, he put his arm around her shoulders.

"You've always been a decent person, you just forgot that for a while. We all did, I'm afraid. But things have changed, mostly for the better, and I have to say I'm proud, very proud, of the women my daughters have grown up into." He squeezed her for a moment, smiling, as she looked up at him.

"Thanks, Dad," she finally said, quietly. Soun watched her face for a moment before standing again.

"Whatever you end up doing, you'll be superb at it, bring honour to the family, and I will be proud of you." The Tendo patriarch gave his middle daughter a look of fatherly pride, nodded to her, then left, heading downstairs, while she rolled his words around in her head for some while. Eventually she got up and went down for breakfast, with a small smile on her face.

Eating slowly, savouring her last hour at home until next time, she smiled at Akane, who smiled back, looking slightly surprised at how good a mood her older sister seemed to be in but happy for it. Shampoo tapped on the door into the garden, making everyone look, before entering and greeting them all. "You're early," Nodoka greeted her.

"We wanted to get an hour or so practice in before we both have to work," Akane explained. Soun glanced at them both, looked pleased, then went back to watching the morning news on the TV. A familiar sight came up as the next report started, showing Lake Halleck with the crater notched into the east side, the remains of the town of Halleckton to the south. He turned the volume up slightly, frowning a little. Everyone looked at the images.

"...still no official explanation for what has become known as The Halleckton Event', although as you can see from these pictures there is a considerable RCMP and Canadian Army presence in the remains of the town. Investigators have been combing through the debris for the last ten days, finding two more partial bodies, bringing the death toll to three hundred and seventeen people. We are told that this is expected to be the final figure, although the RCMP did not completely rule out the possibility of more remains being discovered in future. They believe it is unlikely, as everyone who was known to be in the town has been accounted for, although twenty-two victims are only known by DNA matches to large pools of blood, no remains being found. The amount of blood in each case precludes the possibility of survival, unfortunately."

"Anthony Murray has been charged with three hundred and seventeen counts of first degree murder, aiding and abetting a proscribed terrorist organisation, criminal negligence over property damage estimated to be in excess of three hundred million Canadian dollars, somewhat more than twenty-four billion yen at current exchange rates, multiple tax evasion and financial crimes that are still being uncovered, and numerous other lesser crimes. Associates of Murray in several countries have been arrested, with warrants out for the arrest of at least twenty more people. Chief Superintendent Wilkinson of O Division Headquarters in London, Ontario, who has been leading the investigation against Murray, has gone on record that he also wishes a charge of 'Felony level gross stupidity' to be levelled against the businessman, appearing quite serious. Lawyers for Murray have objected on the grounds of frivolity but the Chief Superintendent is sticking to his viewpoint. We have no information on what has provoked this suggestion."

Nabiki smiled slightly, remembering the man in question, while her father laughed at the suggestion. He glanced at Genma who shrugged, grinning.

"The site of the crater shown in the images that have been widely disseminated around the world is confirmed to be centred on the former Murray residence in Halleckton. There is little left of the site, the vast majority of the property having apparently being vaporised in the explosion that produced the crater, leaving scant evidence for the investigators. Rumours of the existence of an extensive network of tunnels below the mansion have been confirmed, although the tunnels themselves are largely also destroyed. We are told that Murray used an old mine working below the hill into which the mansion was built for storage, although the storage of what is open to question. Speculation is growing, fuelled by the apparent terrorist link, that some form of high explosive in extremely large quantities may have been stored or possibly manufactured under the mansion, an accidental detonation leading to the destruction of the entire site and most of Halleckton from the shockwave."

The picture switched back to a familiar reporter, standing in front of the RCMP headquarters building under an umbrella, looking somewhat damp. It was clearly raining very hard. "The explosion itself appears to have occurred subsequent to the deaths of the majority of the population of Halleckton, a fact that has caused some unusual conspiracy theories to spring up in the last few days. One such theory suggests the mansion was destroyed to cover up evidence, going on to claim that Murray was in contact with hostile aliens that were in the process of establishing a beachhead for the invasion of Earth. Elimination of the town of Halleckton, according to this theory, is due to the 'aliens' requiring live target practice." The reporter smiled slightly, looking politely unconvinced. "Counter-arguments against this theory ask why the mansion would be destroyed but not the entire town, if indeed the authorities wished to cover up such a plot. So far there have been no good responses from the main proponents of this theory."

"There are several other equally unlikely possibilities being discussed on the internet, including an unusual weather event, an attack by demons, a volcanic eruption, and even a punishment from God. The only thing that is currently certain, though, is that no one outside official circles knows what did happen, and so far they are not talking. Enquiries for further information have been rebuffed with the comment that the investigation is ongoing and in it's early stages."
She looked at her notes, then off-camera for a moment, before returning her attention to the audience. "The rumour that a number of Magical Girls aided in the operation in Halleckton has been confirmed in the last two hours by Japanese and Canadian authorities. We are informed that leading the team of special young ladies from Minato were the figures of Yori and Chou, familiar to our Japanese viewers from previous reports both home and abroad. They were also involved in resolving the tragedy in London, England, immediately after Christmas last year. No word is available on the identities of the other girls with them, although it seems likely that the same team as last time were present. Canadian government officials and representatives from both the RCMP and Army have praised them for their professionalism and skills, saying that the Event could have been much worse if they had not become involved, apparently at a request from the RCMP."

"JNN has requested an interview with Yori and Chou through their lawyers, but we received a polite refusal stating that neither one wished to discuss their activities on behalf of the governments of Japan and Canada, especially during the active investigation, for fear of disrupting the case. They did, however, say that they were pleased to have been able to render aid to the Canadians, praising their skills and professional response to a very difficult situation. Yori added that she would be more than willing to provide back-up for the Canadian team if such a situation was to arise in future, but that she sincerely hoped that it would not. No more details were available to suggest what that situation was."

"None of the Canadian Army personnel involved in the initial Event have been identified, although a spokesman for the Army has told us that they would be pleased to work with the young ladies in future should it become necessary. Requests for interviews with the members of the unit that was inserted into Halleckton late on the night of the thirteenth have been denied citing operational security as a reason." She checked her notes again. "No date has yet been set for the trial of Anthony Murray. This case seems set to become possibly the most complex one in Canadian legal history, as such a trial could be months away, and could conceivably last for several years. A preliminary closed-doors hearing is set for two days from today, though, during which the nature of the charges against Murray will be laid out to a panel of judges. Witness statements from the Army personnel and the Magical Girls will form a significant proportion of the hearing. We will bring you updated news on this case as it unfolds."

"Sara Murray has been granted an accelerated divorce from Murray and awarded a minimum fifty percent of his property. This figure may rise during the trial. A sum of money sufficient to live on comfortably was released from the frozen accounts to the former Mrs Murray on compassionate grounds. She has moved into the Murray Toronto dwelling, her first act being the clearance and auction of everything in it that belonged to her former husband, stating that she did not wish to be reminded of him. Paintings and artwork valued at some twenty million dollars were sold for a small fraction of their value, to, as she vividly put it, 'show that bastard how much I hate him.' The reporter smiled momentarily. "A number of more valuable paintings were donated to the Art Gallery of Ontario, including works by Rembrandt, Turner, Van Gogh, and several other masters from Europe and Japan. The Museum has expressed surprise and gratitude for the donations."

"This is Kaori Saito, reporting from London, Ontario, for the Japan News Network."

The view switched back to the anchor in Tokyo, who peered gravely at the camera. "Kaori Saito in Canada, reporting on a case that has gripped the imaginations of people the world over, rapidly becoming one of, if not the, most important investigations into financial irregularities in the last fifty years. Growing evidence suggests that the total sums involved could exceed a trillion US dollars, bringing down banks and other financial institutions world-wide. The SEC in the United States has suspended trading on twenty-three companies in the last five days, with more expected to follow. Financial regulators in at least nine further countries have taken similar action. Two US senators and a General in the US Army, as well as several high-ranking Naval officers, have been..." arrested by the FBI in connection with the case, although their role in it is not yet clear." He shook his head sadly, glancing at his notes.

"As in the terrible tragedy in the UK late last year, the involvement of talented young women from Minato appears to have been instrumental in dealing with this case. I must say on a personal note that I am once more proud that citizens of Japan have acted with such honour and efficiency to help another country during their hour of need." The statesman-like figure of the respected broadcaster smiled very slightly, before continuing. "Now, we join Seiji Himura live in Kobe where he is reporting on a peculiar case reminiscent of the now-infamous Demonic Piglet of Osaka' some months ago.'

The scene switched to one of a man in his mid thirties standing in front of a building, which appeared to be a hot bath, with a huge hole in the wall. Through it the camera showed that several interior walls were also badly damaged, while steam rose from the shattered baths themselves, a number of people wearing little but stunned expressions being helped from the wreckage by emergency personnel. He raised the microphone in his hand, glancing at the building, before saying, "This is a scene which may be eerily familiar to residents of Osaka, and to our viewers. A hot bath, holes in the walls, and tiny hoof-prints in the ground outside." Gesturing with his free hand to the damage, he waited as the camera panned over the building before returning to him. "As in Osaka some months ago, witnesses say that a small black piglet crashed through the walls and jumped straight into the hot water. No one seems to know where it came from or where it went. We have spoken to a number of people who have stated firmly that it was wearing a black and yellow bandanna around it's neck, another factor that is the same as in the previous nine cases. Damage to the building is expected to require some four weeks and fifty million yen to repair, although the owners state that their insurance will cover it. We are told that a growing trend among public baths is what's being somewhat facetiously called 'piglet cover'. He smiled at this.

"Despite the common description of a 'demonic piglet', no actual demon involvement has been confirmed. Several magical girl teams have looked into the matter with no firm conclusions at this point, although at least one of them seemed shocked by what they found. We are not aware what that is as they won't say. One girl did, however, keep muttering about perverts for some reason." The reporter looked amused yet mildly puzzled. "I have an eye-witness we were talking to moments before going on air here with me. So, if I can ask what you saw, Mr...?" He turned to his right, holding his mic out, as the camera panned to cover... an empty space. "Hey! Where did he go?" He looked off-camera to, presumably, a colleague. "He was right here a second ago. That guy with the bandanna in the blanket." There was an inaudible mumble from offscreen, causing him to look annoyed, then turn back to the camera, visibly trying to settle back into his normal routine.

"My apologies, that witness seems to have moved off. We will talk to other people for our next report at lunch-time. This is Seiji Himura, live in Kobe, for JNN." Soun picked up the remote, turning the TV off in mid-word from the anchor as he began to introduce the next segment, sweating slightly, then turned his head very carefully to look at his youngest daughter. Everyone else was doing the same thing, waiting for the explosion. Akane stared at the blank TV screen, a weird expression on her face, her jaw moving slightly. Eventually, she took a deep breath, opened her mouth, then simply howled with laughter. The rest of the room exchanged wondering glances.

After it became clear that there was going to be no sudden violence, Shampoo giggled. This broke the stunned silence everyone else had fallen into, Nodoka being the next one to break down, but soon everyone in the room was rolling around screaming with hilarity. It went on for some time, making Nabiki feel that some sort of watershed moment had finally, after many years, been reached. She was very glad of that indeed.

When they finally stopped laughing, Akane wiped tears from her eyes, grinning broadly. "Stupid Ryoga," she said, then looked at Shampoo. "Come on, I think I might be able to beat you today." The Chinese woman rose, laughing.

"You wish. But let's see what happens." They left the room, heading for the Dojo, still giggling.

"That was... unexpected," Soun said slowly, watching them go. "But very welcome. It's the most impressive example I've seen yet of how much she has matured and changed in the last year. I'm extremely pleased about it." He smiled at the others, picking up his tea. Nabiki nodded.

"So am I. For a moment there I thought we'd all have to run, but..." The middle sister grinned. "Good for Akane. Finally, true self-control. I just hope it keeps up."

"I suspect that the visit from this Ms Aoyama woman helped as well, oddly enough," Nodoka commented. "Both of them seemed very worried about her. It's quite strange. But, I suppose, if it helped her stop and think about her responses in future, it's all to the good." She got up and began clearing the table, Nabiki helping her, producing a quick smile of gratitude. "That other matter, the Canadian thing, that's very worrying. I wonder what on earth happened? So many people dead under such odd circumstances. And Yori and Chou being involved as well! I knew those girls were impressive but I didn't realise they had an international reputation."

Following her into the kitchen, Nabiki nodded with a small smile. "From what I've seen I suspect they're not entirely happy about it, to be honest. They stuck me as fairly private individuals. Having the news report on them is probably annoying more than anything else." She began loading the dishwasher while the older woman cleaned the stove.

"I suppose that may well be true. I don't think, though, that they'll be able to keep completely out of the spotlight in this case, there are too many people involved in it. Poor girls. Mind you, they're remarkably competent individuals, I suspect they can handle it if anyone can." She looked over as the middle Tendo shut the machine and turned it on. "Thank you dear, that's a great help."

Watching her for a moment, she asked, "Do you still have Yori's phone number? I remember she said she'd given it to you." Slightly surprised and worried, Nabiki nodded, wondering why Ranma's mother would ask that.

"I think so. I haven't deleted it, certainly." Removing her phone from her pocket, something she still carried for appearance's sake even though she now used Jun exclusively, she played with it for a moment. "Yes, I've still got it. Why?"

"I was just thinking that it might be nice to invite them over some time for a meal. To thank them again for how much they helped Akane and the family as a result." Nabiki smiled, relieved.

"That sounds like a good idea. We should probably wait until I finish this semester in two weeks, the weather will be warmer and we could have it in the garden."

"Ah, yes, that's definitely better. Would you like to call them and arrange it, dear? I expect they're very busy, they'll probably need as much notice as we can give them." She finished her cleaning task, putting the pans in the sink and turning the water on. "You could invite that Aiko girl and her friends as well, they were involved."

"I'll pass the message on, Auntie, we can see what they say." Looking at her watch, another thing she didn't require any more, she smiled. "I'm going to have to get ready, the train I need to catch leaves in forty minutes."

"Go on, then, Nabiki, I can finish here. Have a nice trip." Smiling, the older woman watched as the middle sister left the kitchen, stopping briefly to talk to her father in the living room before going up the stairs, then she began cleaning the saucepans, mentally compiling a list of possible suitable dishes for a group of magical girls at a garden party.

Sitting on the train idly watching the scenery pass, Nabiki mused on the last few days, smiling a little with her head leaning on the window. Everything had gone pretty smoothly, the Akane situation seemed to be steadily improving, and she'd come to a decision she was comfortable with. All in all things were working pretty smoothly. After a moment she frowned slightly. That was a little worrying. With the way her life was going now, smoothly suggested that something was building up to cause problems. A few seconds passed while she thought about it, then she snorted and shook her head.

'That's getting a little too paranoid,' she thought with a grin. The train began to slow as it entered the station, prompting her to stand. She'd been lucky to get a seat in the first place, the train was quite crowded even though this particular route wasn't the busiest, but giving the scruffy man who had leapt forwards to claim the seat she had been waiting for a cold glare had made him back off quickly. He watched as she got up, staring at her fixedly, prompting her to smile at him which made him look puzzled. When he looked back to her seat, to claim it for himself, he sighed when he realised his momentary inattention had allowed an ancient woman to dart in before he could. She grinned triumphantly at him as he frowned, then looked back at Nabiki who was just getting off, gritting his teeth.

The brunette grinned as she left the station, amused at what had happened, heading back to the university. When she was half-way back, Ranma called. "Hi. How was Nerima?"

"Fine, actually." They hadn't spoken for a few days, and while she'd talked to Kasumi on Saturday morning, she hadn't let them know about what had happened. "I had to pull Ms Aoyama out and wave her at Shampoo and Akane when I got there, though. It was very funny and very effective, although I kind of feel guilty about it now." She sent him the recording, listening to peals of laughter with a grin.

"Brilliant. You're getting remarkably good at that. I'm going to have to work on my scary face, Agent Naito is going around telling people that Ms Aoyama is scarier than Yori! We can't have that! I was here first..." She snickered.

"Oh, Yori is scarier, definitely. Ms Aoyama is just... creepier. We really should try teaming up on the next person we need to intimidate. We could probably literally make him crap himself." Ranma chuckled.

"Sounds like a plan. Anything else interesting happen? Kas told me about Cologne, I think she's right, we probably don't have anything to worry about although we should be alert just in case." Nabiki told him about the train incident and her drive-by ki shot, making him laugh again.

"Good one. I wonder what that kid will tell people happened?"

"No idea. It was a risk but I couldn't just let him get mugged and possibly hurt, though."

"No one saw anything?" He sounded slightly concerned for her. She shrugged a little, entering the university campus and waving to a couple of students she knew vaguely.

"Not that I could tell. Shampoo was someone I was a little worried about but she'd drunk quite a lot of wine and was completely out of it." She send him a picture of the Amazon pressed against the partition, drool running down the glass, causing him to snigger.
"Very attractive."

"I know. I wish I'd thought to take a picture with a real camera, although that might have caused problems because I had nowhere to keep it as far as anyone knew. It would be a lovely picture for a Christmas card or something." This amused him greatly. "I'm pretty sure no one noticed anything. Everyone fell asleep, it was a big meal with about four bottles of wine." She giggled a little. "It doesn't affect me nearly as much nowadays as it used to but I was still feeling a little tipsy even so. The others were worse, they had more than I did."

"Have you come to any conclusions about what you want to do, after Canada?" he asked more seriously, following a short pause. Climbing the stairs to her floor she considered the question.

"Yes, I think I have. I'm in. While I don't like some of the results of what we do, I think you're right that it's important that we do it, and most of the time it's a lot of fun as well." She sighed silently. "Most of the time."

"Don't worry, I know exactly what you mean. I'm still sorry about letting you get involved in the first place. It was too much too soon." She could almost feel his genuine sympathy over the link. "You handled it exceptionally well even so. I couldn't have asked for better support. You may not have the experience yet, but you have the talent and the mindset the rest of us do. Eventually you're going to be... exceptional."

"Thank you, Ranma. I'm sorry it took me so long to come to a decision."

"Don't be. It's your life, none of us would ever force you into doing things that you didn't want to. Especially me. I've had a lifetime of that, I'm not going to let it happen to anyone else if I can avoid it. Training excepted, of course." He snickered as she groaned. Opening her door she went in, closed it again, then sat on the bed. "You're both a close friend and a family member. I'm not going to let you get hurt if I have any say in it, mentally or physically. If you need to talk about this, any time, just let me know and we'll talk. OK?"

"OK. Thanks again." They were silent for a moment. "Oh, one thing Kasumi said made me think. She said she thought I could take on Shampoo and win. What do you think about that?"

"Well, up against her with no ki ability you'd be toast, I'm sure of that," he said, chuckling. "She is very, very good. Aiko and the girls are better, Kas is far better, and me..." Nabiki laughed.

"Very modest, Saotome."

"You know me, modesty comes naturally." His voice was full of amusement. "But you, no, as far as hand to hand combat goes you're nowhere near her class. You're certainly stronger and faster, which would help to a degree, but not for long." He paused momentarily while she nodded to herself, feeling that this matched her own feelings. "You will be, trust me."

"It will take a long time."

"Less than you think, but it won't happen overnight. Give it a year and you'd stand a good chance. Two and you'd take her to pieces. With Kas, me, and the others training you, the natural talent you have, and your remarkably quick learning curve, you'll pick it up pretty fast. We'll still be better, of course." Nabiki giggled at the smug tone in his voice for the latter sentence.

"Of course you will."

Ranma laughed for a moment. "On the other hand, Kas is quite right that you could still take her if you avoided close in physical stuff, which you can do easily. You could outrun her, then snipe her from a safe distance. She's quick and very tough, but you'd get her, I have no doubt. Possibly quite a lot of the surroundings as well, if it ever came to that, she'd need a lot more ki in the shot than most people, but in the end the outcome isn't much in doubt."

"Interesting."

"Why? You thinking of going up against her?"

"No. It was just something that made me think. I still have trouble believing how fast I've become... this, I guess. It's only been, what, six months?"

"More than that, really. If what I suspect about exposure to our magic catalysing your ki abilities is correct, that's been going on for a year. Hey..." He stopped for a moment.

"What?"

"Do you realise what the day after the day after tomorrow is?"

"Thursday?" She couldn't think of anything else important.

"Well, that too, but the important thing is that it will be exactly one year since you found us."

Nabiki thought about it and realised he was right. "Wow. An entire year. It seems longer, yet shorter."

"It's weird, time. I know what you mean. We should go out, mark the occasion somehow. Can you get away that evening?"

"Yes, I can," she replied, checking her calender with Jun. "I have an assignment I need to hand in on Wednesday but I can finish that easily by Tuesday afternoon, then I'm free. The end of term is in two weeks so I can't stay long, I need to bone up for the tests on the last few days, but I'd like to go out. Where?"

"Hmm. Good question. Brisbane for sushi again? It's very good there."

Nabiki giggled. "It's so weird even now thinking we can just pop out to an entirely different country for a meal." Ranma chuckled at that.

"Sometimes it even makes me wonder at it. Aiko takes the whole teleporting thing so matter of factly it's pretty strange even for people like us."

"Yes, I think I'd like sushi again. We could go back to Aiko Island after for a little while and swim as well."

"Sounds like another plan. I'll talk to the rest." He paused. "The other thing is that Agent Naito has passed on the official request from the RCMP about the statements we were talking about, finally. They've run into some delays in getting everything set up, you've probably heard how big this case is getting. We seem to have pulled the pin on the grenade for sure, when it went off an awful lot of things got blown into the light."

"Yes, I saw the news this morning. I've been avoiding it since we got back, I didn't want to be reminded of Halleckton for a while, but Dad was watching it at breakfast. It sounds like it's getting incredibly complicated."

"Unbelievably so. That idiot was right in the middle of a whole web of illegal operations, him going down is taking a lot of other people down as well. All good, really, it looks like all sorts of very unpleasant and destructive practices will come to a very sudden end because of this. Even with the influence some of these people have it can't cover up all this publicity. Anyway, we've been asked, very politely, if we could possibly spare them five or six hours on Wednesday to tell them what happened in our own words. The panel of three judges is likely to be very curious. I understand part of the delay is finding three judges who would actually believe any of it. We may have to... demonstrate." The martial artist laughed, Nabiki joining in.

"Sounds interesting. OK, I can get away. Canada is something like thirteen hours behind us, isn't it?"

"Yep. They're starting at nine AM their time, which is ten PM for us. Bit of a pain but we should be able to handle it. Poor Agent Naito is going to miss some sleep again, though." She nodded thoughtfully.

"All right. I can do that. Any idea what will happen?"

"I'm not completely sure, but what we've been told is that they want to speak to each of us one at a time, listen to our account of what we each did, then ask a few questions if necessary. The four soldiers will be there as well. Once they have all the facts, our bit is done. They'll look at all the other evidence including the other attacks, the info the PSIA gave them on the cult and the devices, that sort of thing, then work out how, and with what, to charge Murray. The date for the main trial will be set then as well, which is likely to be in a few months. Possibly next year."

"What about Václav? Will they want to speak to him?"

"Yes. I'll go and get him again. He cooperated with the RCMP and stuck to his word completely. The poor fellow really does feel very guilty and responsible for what happened, but it's not really his fault. Not entirely, at any rate. Inspector Deveraux told Agent Naito that they're probably going to go for a charge of involuntary manslaughter, which would have a sentence of perhaps seven to ten years. He can do that and still be a fairly young man when he gets out, mages tend to age quite slowly. It won't be pleasant but it will be bearable."

"I'm rather sorry for him, I admit." Nabiki sighed, shaking her head, then got up to turn the laser printer and computer on so she could begin printing her latest assignment.

"So am I. But, what's done is done, we all have to live with the end result. At least Murray isn't going to get away with only seven to ten years, they're going to crucify him. Which makes me very happy." He sounded it. "And a lot of his friends are going to get dealt with, which will probably make a lot of other people very happy as well. All good. If only it hadn't required the deaths of three hundred and seventeen people." There was a silence for a while inside her head, as she added some paper to the printer. "We also heard that Sir Alan and the British authorities are watching the case with considerable interest. They're considering charging Davenport with contributory negligence over the portal device, since he knew where it was months ago and didn't tell anyone, which could have prevented all this from happening in the first place. Sir Alan is extremely miffed about that."

"I didn't think of that, although I should have," Nabiki replied. "But they're right. He's involved in Halleckton as well."

"Not as much as Murray, but he certainly shares some of the blame." Sending the document to the printer from Jun, she watched as pages began extruding from the machine, then turned to make a cup of tea in the small kitchen.
"Oh, while I remember, your mother wants to invite Yori, Chou, and the girls to Nerima for a meal sometime in July, if you're interested." She grinned as he made a sound of surprise. "She wants to thank you guys again for sorting Akane out. We had something of a breakthrough today, which is what sparked the idea." Sipping her tea, she sat at the desk and watched the people walking around down on the campus, telling him about the news report and Akane's reaction to it. When she finished he chuckled for a while.

"Impressive. She's definitely improved out of all recognition. I wonder if I should go and do something about the demonic piglet problem?"

"We could find him and have Ms Aoyama give him a look, just for fun," Nabiki suggested with a grin that would have given Ryoga the shivers had he seen it.

"Hmm. A thought, definitely. Let me consider the problem. But, yes, I think we could probably find a suitable time to visit Nerima and Mom. I'll mention it to Kas and the others, see what they say."

"OK. Right, I have to go, I need to concentrate on today's work. I'll talk again later, then see you Wednesday."

"See you, Nabiki." Disconnecting, the inside of her head fell silent again. She smiled slightly, then stapled the report together and slipped it into an envelope before starting the next one.

"Lady Azumi, she of the silver hair," O'Rourke said with a laugh, walking up to the group of girls with his squad-members in tow. Lieutenant Kent gave him an odd look while Silva snickered. Pedersen sighed a little. Azumi turned and looked at the small wiry man with a raised eyebrow.

"Sir Black Night. We meet again." She smiled at him.

Grinning, he stuck out his hand. "Hello, Azumi. How are you?"

"Well, thank you, Corporal," she replied, shaking it. Her friends were watching with amusement. "And you? Recovered from our little adventure?"

"More or less. I'm still having nightmares, to be honest, but after what we saw..." They exchanged glances, and complete agreement.

"I understand. It was... unpleasant. I'm afraid I didn't handle it well when I had a chance to relax at home. I was quite ill." He studied her with slight surprise but nodded at the look in her eyes.

"Ah. First time?"

"No, I've been quite ill before." She gazed steadily at him, until his widening eyes were joined by snorted laughter, then grinned. "Yes, it was the first time I've been involved in that sort of... destruction. Not nice."

"My first time I had to get so drunk I couldn't remember two days afterwards. Not the healthiest approach but it kind of helped." He smiled at the silver-haired girl, who returned it, looking considerably less cold than she normally did. "I threw up a lot as well, but at least by that point I could claim it was the alcohol." This made her snicker.

"Face saving at it's best." Glancing at the others, she asked, "How are the rest of you?"

"We're fine, I think, Azumi." Kent looked around at his colleagues, who nodded. "Where's Yori?" Behind her, Chou nodded at the closed doors to their right.
"She's in with the panel at the moment. We had to show them some proof that we were telling the truth about our abilities, which caused something of an upset. One of the judges needed to go and sit down for a little while." She smiled gently. He laughed, as did his men.

"I'm not surprised. Some of the things I saw you ladies do in Halleckton made me want to go and sit down for a while. The major read my report three times and still didn't believe it until we showed him some of the photos Silva took." He looked at them curiously. "I couldn't help but notice that they didn't show anything that could identify any of you." Aiko grinned while Chou nodded, looking amused.

"That's basically the point."

"I expect the way several of you rather fade from our ability to recall when you're not around is much the same idea?"

"Indeed."

The lieutenant laughed lightly. "Impressive security. Magic is remarkable."

"It certainly can be." The blonde smiled at him. "I expect you're here for the same reason we are, to relate your stories to the panel?"

"Yes. We wrote very comprehensive reports, which I think your PSIA got as well, but the judges seem to want to hear it again directly from us and also ask some questions. From what I know building this case is proving quite complicated."

"We've heard that there are a considerable number of people high up in the financial world who seem to have had the rug pulled rather abruptly from under them," she said. "Not to mention several government officials and law enforcement people who really should have known better."

"Yes, I've been following it with some interest. I think that the political fallout from what happened will go on for a long time. Probably for the best in the long run but in the short term there are going to be all sorts of strange things happening. At least one bank in the US has gone under very suddenly in the last two days, I've heard, as a direct result of all this." She sighed a little.

"I heard about that. I expect a lot of people are going to be badly affected by the actions of these people. It's very regrettable."

Lieutenant Kent sat on the bench she was standing next to. "It is. But, we didn't know it was going to happen, we were simply doing our jobs and saving lives, and even if we had known we couldn't have done anything differently." Chou sat next to him and crossed her legs at the ankle, staring at her boots.

"No, I suppose we had no choice in the matter. We did what needed to be done. But it brings home how some actions can have repercussions you didn't expect."

"That it does." She looked around after a second or two.

"Yori is finished, she's coming out. I expect it will be my turn next." The door opened and the short woman emerged from the chamber, talking to a tall man next to her. He shook her hand, then looked at a notebook he had in his other hand.

"Chou, please." The blonde stood, causing him to look at her. "Thank you. We're ready for you, could you come this way, please?" He waved her through, then closed the door again.
"They seem to want to keep it secret," Tamiko observed, watching this. O'Rourke looked at her with a small private smile.

"I expect they don't realise that's difficult with you people." She grinned briefly.

"Most likely not. Thank you for that, by the way."

"No problem." Glancing at Yori who was leaning against the wall deep in thought, he asked, "So, can you tell us what happened in there?" She looked up, then around at the other soldiers, smiling at them in recognition.

"Sorry, got a bit lost there. Hi, guys, nice to see you again." She seemed to recall what he'd asked.

"Oh, it's fairly simple. They just wanted a recap of what I personally did, along with any thoughts I had on what the cause was for various parts of it and if there was anything I could think of that I could have done differently." She snickered a little. "I think that at least one of them might be slightly put out that I made a very large hole in the landscape. He seemed to think it was just the tiniest bit excessive. Showing them the video we had the MoD in the UK send over of the demon in London changed his mind when he realised there were nine of the damn things running around under that place and six more on top."

The girl shrugged a little. "It's not really a complicated procedure. They've all read the reports, they seem to just want confirmation of everything and to meet the people involved to see if we seem to be trustworthy and competent. I think it went well."

"Did they ask any personal questions about you all?" Silva asked. "I assume you wouldn't be very keen on answering things like that."

"One of the judges did ask a couple of personal questions, but I told him they weren't relevant to the discussion. We had a bit of a staring contest. I won." She grinned as did he.

"I can see how that might happen," the soldier said in an amused voice. "I think that at least one of them might be slightly put out that I made a very large hole in the landscape. He seemed to think it was just the tiniest bit excessive. Showing them the video we had the MoD in the UK send over of the demon in London changed his mind when he realised there were nine of the damn things running around under that place and six more on top."

The girl shrugged a little. "It's not really a complicated procedure. They've all read the reports, they seem to just want confirmation of everything and to meet the people involved to see if we seem to be trustworthy and competent. I think it went well."

"Did they ask any personal questions about you all?" Silva asked. "I assume you wouldn't be very keen on answering things like that." Yori chuckled, looking at him.

"One of the judges did ask a couple of personal questions, but I told him they weren't relevant to the discussion. We had a bit of a staring contest. I won." She grinned as did he.

"I can see how that might happen," the soldier said in an amused voice. Fumiko giggled, making them both look at her.

"I'm surprised they didn't need another recess after that," she explained. Yori laughed.

"He did need to stop and drink some water before his voice stopped squeaking," the girl said, looking like the memory was one she enjoyed. "They stopped asking irrelevant questions at that point and just got on with business."

They talked for another ten minutes, before the doors opened and Chou came out with the clerk. The soldiers noticed without surprise that all of the girls looked at the door several seconds before it opened. "Aiko, please? You're next." The petite brunette stood, following him inside with a small smile on her face. Chou looked at Yori, who nodded after a second.

"Yes. Cut them some slack, they're new to this and worried," she explained. Yori laughed.

"I could see that. Oh well." Azumi watched from where she was leaning on a statue of some important dignitary, O'Rourke next to her. They had been idly talking about the differences between Canadian and Japanese culture, passing the time. The disguised Nabiki found she enjoyed the company of the compact man, he was intelligent and quick-witted, and as a bonus seemed to have a sense of humour very similar to hers. The various movie quotes he came out with she had considerable fun trying to match with appropriate ones.

Agent Naito was yawning slightly, looking tired. Tamiko, sitting next to him, poked him in the ribs "Tired, Agent?" He glanced at her, yawned again, then nodded.

"I tend to be whenever I'm involved with you lot. I don't know how you do it. This jumping around time-zones is throwing my sense of time completely out the window."

"Hopefully, this is the last time for a considerable while that it will be needed," she replied, grinning. "Trust me, even we feel it after a while. We just have more stamina than you."

"Than anyone, as far as I can see." He yawned again.

"You need some coffee. Pity Aiko's inside or she could get you some from that place in New York." Tamiko smiled at him. "But I saw a place just outside that looked OK. I'll go and get some." She looked around at the others. "I could do with one as well. Anyone else?" In the end everyone wanted coffee, so she and Pedersen wandered off to get it. When they came back it was just in time to see Aiko come out, smiling slightly, while the clerk looked around.

"Tamiko, please?"

"That's me," she said brightly, swigging her coffee down rapidly and tossing the cup into a trash receptacle. She followed him in.

"How was it?" Naito asked the brunette as she took a seat next to him in the place Tamiko had vacated. She was still smiling.

"Not too bad. They wanted a demonstration of teleportation, though, so I jumped around the room a couple of times, then when they wanted to see something more impressive took them to the middle of the Sahara. That convinced them it wasn't a trick. The younger one looked pretty ill for a few seconds, but I have to admit he recovered nicely." Naito laughed, then looked slightly embarrassed.

"Aiko, you should be very polite to foreign officials," Chou scolded her mildly, making her grin.

"I was. I politely made them feel horrible, and very hot. Don't worry, they got better." Everyone laughed at this.

When it came to Azumi's turn, she went in with a slight feeling of trepidation tempered with the knowledge of what had happened to the others. To comply with the spirit of the enquiry Ranma and Kasumi had insisted that they not relay anything directly about what was happening inside the chamber while it was happening, or record it, but they'd discussed it outside, which was acceptable to the panel. She also knew the names and faces of the three judges who made up the panel. Sitting in the chair the clerk guided her to she studied the two men and one woman sitting behind a long desk opposite, as the clerk took up his position to one side.

"Hello, Azumi," said the woman in the middle, smiling at her. "Thank you for agreeing to meet us. We're grateful about it, especially as you've come all the way from Japan for this. Even with the extraordinary ability of your colleague Aiko, we do appreciate it's the middle of the night from your point of view." Azumi nodded, keeping her normal neutral expression, but saying nothing.

"Now, we've all read the reports submitted by Yori, Chou, the Army team members, and Agent Naito of the PSIA. I think we have a fairly good idea of what happened. We would just like to hear, in your own words, what happened after you entered the town of Halleckton on the night of the thirteenth of June this year."

"Certainly, your honour," Azumi replied politely. She began recounting the story, trying to keep it as accurate as she could while condensing it to its essentials. When she got to the underground bunker, one of the other judges raised his hand, stopping her.
"Excuse me. I just wanted to clarify that. You detected the presence of the three survivors in that bomb shelter, the...," he referred to his notes for a moment, "Johnson family, by ear? From across the road?"

"Yes, your honour. I heard someone cough, which led me to believe that there was a survivor in the vicinity. When Corporal O'Rourke and I investigated I determined that there were three people some distance underground in the area of the garage. While I cleared debris from the area, the corporal entered the house to search for another entrance. In the end we found there was only one entrance, the one in the garage under the remains of the rear wall. Once we opened it we were able to enter and retrieve the survivors, who luckily were unhurt although very hungry and rather dehydrated. I gave them water and called Aiko and Private Pedersen to evacuate them to CFB Trenton, which they did. The corporal and I continued searching, finding three more survivors and a significant number of fatalities."

"Thank you. And I also believe that you were shot by Mr Johnson, when you opened the door to the shelter?"

"Shot at," she corrected, a small smile on her lips. "The bullet did not make contact."

"Why is that?" he asked curiously.

"I caught it before it hit me." He stared, then glanced at his colleagues, who also looked impressed, although the woman reached over and tapped the one of the folders in front of him.

"Page fifteen, half-way down," she said quietly. He opened it and looked, then nodded.

"I see. Remarkable. Out of curiosity, what would have happened if you had failed to catch the bullet?" he asked. She shrugged.

"Not a lot. I'd have had a hole in my coat and a bit of a bruise."

"Remarkable," he repeated, studying her. "Thank you. Please continue."

Azumi went on with her story. They looked impressed and slightly horrified when she got to the point covering the demon in the dining hall. Once she had finished with the final evacuation from the mansion with the mage and Murray, before Yori destroyed the entire site, they sat and looked at her for a long moment in silence. Eventually the woman nodded, making a few more notes.

"Thank you, Azumi. That was very clearly and concisely explained. It clears up one or two things from the reports that I personally had some questions about." She looked at the other two judges.

"Do either of my learned colleagues have anything further they would like to ask?" They shook their heads.

"No, I'm satisfied with what I've heard," the younger of the two judges said, closing the folder in front of him. He nodded to Azumi. "Thank you."

"In that case, I think we're finished with this witness. Azumi, thank you once more, and may I also extend the thanks of the Canadian judiciary for your participation in stopping this horrible issue, you and your colleagues have undoubtedly prevented a much larger tragedy, at considerable personal risk. We do appreciate that, believe me."

Azumi stood, then smiled slightly. Making a shallow bow, she replied, "Thank you all. It was an honour to help." The judges nodded to her, then the one in the middle gestured to the clerk.

"I think we will break for lunch at this point. If you can inform Agent Naito of the PSIA that we would like his participation when we get back, let's say at one PM, which gives everyone slightly more than an hour, please?” He nodded then led Azumi out. She sighed quietly, relieved that it was over and pleased that it had gone so smoothly. The judges really did seem merely to want to meet the people involved and to hear their stories first-hand.

"How did it go?” O'Rourke asked.

"Not too bad,” she replied, glancing at him. "It's like Yori said, they're trying to understand everything. I think they're getting to grips with it.” The clerk was speaking quietly to Naito, who nodded, then shook his hand, before walking over to the rest of them.

"We've got an hour until I need to go in, so why don't we get some lunch? When they've finished with me I suppose we could go, that's the last of us.” He yawned. "I have to admit I'm starting to feel it. It's one in the morning at home.”

"OK. What does anyone want?” Yori asked. She glanced at Kent and the other soldiers. "You guys want to come as well?” The lieutenant looked around at the other men, then smiled.

"We'd love it. Where should we go?” he asked.

Aiko looked at them. "Do you like pizza?” she asked with a grin.

"I've never been to Rome,” Silva mused, looking around curiously. The early evening light illuminated the crowded streets surrounding the pizzeria with a golden glow, reflecting from the stonework nicely, making him wish he'd brought one of his cameras with him.

"It's pretty damn crowded but can be nice,” Aiko replied, lifting a slice of pizza off the plate gingerly. "Ow. Hot.” Folding it in half she managed to get most of it in her mouth in one go, making him smile. Yori watched with a grin.

"I can't believe we are in Rome!” Kent also looked around. "It's insane. Just for pizza?” Picking up a piece of his own he chewed and swallowed. "Mind you, this is the best pizza I've ever had.”

"That place in New York is even better but it's closed at the moment, the owner is on holiday,” Fumiko told him, drinking beer from a bottle, then holding it loosely between her fingers as she tipped her chair back on two legs without showing any signs of losing her balance, even though her feet weren't on the ground. He glanced at her, then grinned at the sight. She smiled back.

"Well, it would have to work hard to beat this,” he replied. "It's first-rate.” The rest of the group was too busy eating to join in the conversation, but there were several grunts of agreement from various points around the table. The day was still very warm, a cloudless sky showing deep blue above them. Their table was in front of the establishment, separated from the thoroughfare by a rope strung through polished bollards set into the pavement. They ate happily for a while, Yori waving the waiter over and getting another round of soft drinks at one point. Eventually, contentedly full, they ran out of food.

"This was nice,” Chou said, looking around. Kent nodded.

"It was. Thank you for inviting us. Not the sort of thing I think we normally expect for a meal, but well worth it.”

Naito looked at his watch. "We'd better settle up and get back. They'll want me in about ten minutes.” Glancing at him, Chou nodded, then waved to the waiter, asking him for the bill when he arrived. Studying it, she pulled a bundle of Euros from somewhere, handing him the requisite amount along with a generous tip.
"Thank you," she smiled. Looking pleased he bowed slightly, then left. "Right. Let's go back and let Agent Naito talk to the panel." Shortly after that they were standing in the hallway outside the interview room as if they'd never left. O'Rourke looked around at his colleagues and the women he was pleased to call friends, grinning.

"That was... surreal," he said to Azumi, who laughed.

"It does take some getting used to, I admit. But you find it all very convenient in the end."

"That, I can well imagine." The clerk came and collected Naito, while the rest sat or stood, talking amongst themselves. When he returned, the girls stood.

"Looks like we're off. It was nice to see you again, Corporal. Look after yourself. You know how to get hold of us if you ever need us," she said. Smiling at him she put her hand out. He shook it.

"You take care as well, Azumi. I hope we can meet again some day."

"I'd like that."

They looked at each other for a moment, then Azumi joined the others, vanishing as the soldiers closed their eyes. The clerk, who had politely waited, looked at Kent. "Second Lieutenant? If you could follow me, please." He waved the man into the interview room and closed the door behind them as the three other soldiers sat and patiently waited for their turn.
Pauline looked up as a group of people entered the restaurant, recognising them as the young women who had come a couple of weeks or so ago along with three men. She remembered because the tip she'd gotten was one of the largest in her career. They were all attractive, athletic looking Japanese women, mostly dressed in similar, very good, silk outfits. She smiled, getting up to welcome them, while wondering if they were some sort of act or something, due to the way they dressed. The tallest one, a blonde woman, smiled back.

"Welcome back, Ladies," she greeted them. "A table for seven?"

"Yes, please, Pauline," the blonde said in a gentle voice, making the waitress pleased that she'd remembered her name. "Could you bring us all a round of beer as well, and one Coke? Oh, and a couple of jugs of water."

"Certainly, Miss Chou." She'd been racking her brains trying to remember the woman's name, finally managing it, causing the blonde to smile.

"Just Chou. Thank you." Pauline led them to the relevant table, then brought the drinks. She was startled when all of them except for the petite women with black hair picked up their beer bottles, looked at each other, then with grins all popped the caps off with their thumbs, a feat of strength that made her gape. Chou looked up at her.

"It's become something of an in joke," she explained, an explanation that didn't much help, but the waitress nodded even so. She brought them the menus then left them to it, while she served her other tables. The other waitresses smiled at her as they went to and fro, dealing with the crowd. They were quite busy in the early evening, even for this time of year, none of the staff had much time to stop and talk to each other. When she went back to take their orders, she had to fill three pages on her pad with the requirements, something remarkable for only seven people. They particularly seemed to like sashimi. Nodding to them, she smiled and went to give the order to the chefs.

Gakushi, the head chef, was carefully preparing a dish, slicing the fish incredibly thinly and arranging it on a plate as she stopped to watch, as always very impressed by the sheer skill involved. It was very close to art. He glanced up at her, smiling. "Fugu," he explained, his accent plain but his English good. "Very expensive."

"Isn't that poisonous?" she asked. He nodded.

"Extremely, if it isn't prepared correctly. I'm not licensed to prepare it, you need very specific skills to be allowed to deal with the whole fish. This is from a licensed supplier, I got it in specially for a large party we're having."

"Oh, the Théberge wedding?"

"Yes. They're paying a fortune for this, I need to make sure it's perfect." Smiling, she moved past him as he went back to his task, frowning as he minutely adjusted the position of a couple of slices of unbelievably pricey delicacy. Finishing, he stepped back and studied it, looking for any flaws in the presentation, then when he was sure there were none, put the dish in the fridge for later. When it was safely stored away he relaxed. That one dish cost close to two months earnings for him, if he'd dropped it the results would have been expensive. And extremely embarrassing. Carefully cleaning his special knife, reserved solely for fugu, he put it away into it's case and returned it to the drawer it lived in, before moving on to the next dish.

Passing by the table full of Japanese women a little later, Pauline stopped. "Do you require anything else?" she asked. Chou looked up from her conversation with the auburn-haired girl on her right, smiling at her, then glanced around the table.

"I think a bottle of the house red would be nice. No, two bottles. And another coke, please."

"Of course. I'll be right back." She headed to the 'wine cellar', in reality a carefully climate-controlled storage unit in the kitchen area. 'Considering how much expensive wine we seem to be going through nowadays we should probably get a real sommelier. Perhaps I should go on a few courses, it would be worth a raise...'. Musing on the idea she held a bottle up to the light, checking for excess sediment, then picked up another and did the same. Opening them and putting them to the side to breath for a few minutes she busied herself with filling another order, before coming back and checking them, then filling a glass with coke. Picking up a tray she expertly put both bottles and the glass on it, carrying it out to the customers.

"Thank you, Pauline," Chou said, looking pleased as she gently sniffed the wine before pouring a small amount into a glass. Tasting it she smiled. "Very nice." The girl next to her picked up the bottle and looked at it curiously.

"Oh, it's one of those Barossa ones. Torbreck. I remember this winery, they're good." She poured wine for herself and the others, except the young woman with the long black hair in a braid, who was drinking the coke. Pauline suspected she was their designated driver. She didn't seem to miss alcohol, though, looking at the wine with a faint air of distaste. Heading back to the kitchen she stopped to seat a couple who had just arrived, then take their orders for starters and drinks, before collecting the trolley with the substantial quantity of food that the table-full of women had ordered, now ready. Wheeling it out she began distributing it.

When she had finished she asked if they needed anything else. Chou glanced around her friends, all of whom were apparently contented, then turned to Pauline. "No, thank you, I think we're fine for the moment." As she smiled and left, the small woman with the black hair raised her glass in a toast, apparently to the silver-haired girl on her right, but for some reason Pauline couldn't make out more than a mumble from any of them. Putting it down to the odd acoustics of the room she went about her business.

The Théberge wedding party had arrived and was being seated with a considerable amount of running around required. There were a couple of dozen customers all in, including the bride and groom, their parents, their grandparents, and considerable quantities of friends. All of them had clearly already been somewhere that provided alcohol, as a result being almost offensively cheerful, which was causing the waitresses to have to try to keep order. It was an uphill struggle. Everyone already in the restaurant was watching, mostly in good-natured amusement, with one or two frowning as their meal was interrupted. Pauline watched for a moment, sighed, smiled, then got on with her work.

Back in the kitchen Gakushi was running around like a lunatic shouting at the under-chefs, directing them in the preparation of the preselected meals. One of Pauline's co-workers came in with a pad, reading off a number of last minute alterations, which made the chef sigh loudly, stare at the heavens, or at least the ceiling, then start a couple of his people making the requested dishes.
"They do still, I hope, want the fugu?" he asked sarcastically. "It would be a shame to throw it away after all that work. And the huge cost, as well." She grinned.

"Yes, the groom and his father both seem very eager for it. The bride isn't sure, I think, though." The woman glanced out of the kitchen as a particularly loud toast echoed around the room. "Although with the amount they're drinking they might not still be awake by the time we bring it out."

"As long as they pay for it," Gakushi muttered, "because I'm not going to."

"Don't worry, Chef, they will. The Théberge family is very wealthy. They own one of the largest energy companies in Australia or something like that. My friend Sue works at a restaurant they had the bachelor party at, everyone there got a thousand dollar tip!"

"I don't want my effort to go to waste either." Gakushi grinned, then dived into the work. Shortly three waitresses were taking huge amounts of food out to the increasingly boisterous wedding party, who at least seemed to be enjoying themselves. Loudly. Pauline helped, then checked on her party of Japanese women, who seemed to find the shouting and laughing on the other side of the room rather funny.

"How is everything?" she asked politely, smiling at them all. There were mutters of appreciation, although she could already tell from the empty plates that the meal was well-liked. Chou smiled back.

"It's wonderful as always, think you, Pauline. Could we have two more plates of the salmon, one of the squid rolls, and one..."

"Two," The short brunette across from her said, holding up the requisite number of fingers.

"...Two plates of the duck, please? And another bottle of this very nice wine."

"Certainly." She picked up some of the empty plates, skilfully piling them up in her arms, then headed back to the kitchen again. Returning with the ordered food a few minutes later, she put it on the table, before turning to Chou. A colossal drunken roar from the party made both of them look over before she could speak.

"They do seem to be enjoying themselves," the blonde woman murmured with a smile. Several of her companions were watching with amused expressions.

"I'd prefer them to keep the noise down a little," Pauline said quietly, sharing a look with the woman. "Is there anything else you need at the moment?"

"No, thank you, I think we're fine." Chou looked around at her friends, who all indicated in one way or another they were content for the moment. The waitress nodded, looking around the room, then decided it was time for a short break. She headed back to the staff room, grabbing a coffee on the way through, then sat with a sigh of relief. The tips would be good, she had no doubt of that, but it was hard work. Massaging her feet having removed her shoes, she slowly drank her coffee, still able to hear the wedding party having noisy fun.

Once she had finished her break she put her shoes back on, picked up the empty coffee cup, then headed to the kitchen. Putting it with the dishes to be washed, she turned to see Gakushi gently removing the fugu dish from the refrigerator, placing it on the worktop and carefully checking to see it was still right. Making the final touches, he stepped back and examined the incredibly expensive special, nodding with satisfaction, before removing his apron and picking the dish up "Could you get the door, please, Pauline?" he requested. She moved to do what he asked, holding it open as he took the dish out, heading to the table to deliver it personally.

Checking on her tables, she gave the couple she'd seated earlier the bill, accepting and processing the man's credit card, then handing him the receipt. As they left she collected the quite generous tip they'd left, clearing away the dishes and wiping the table down, before going over to the table with the seven women at it. Chou was talking to the short woman with the long braided hair, both of them watching the Théberge party, where the father of the groom was tasting a piece of fugu. He smiled, nodding his pleasure, making the chef smile. Gakushi bowed quickly, said something she couldn't quite make out, then went back into the kitchen, while everyone at the table tried some of the delicacy.

"Savour it," the groom's father instructed. "This dish cost over ten thousand dollars." A couple of the party-goers gasped, while the groom looked pleased. His bride seemed slightly hesitant, but eventually tried a small sliver of the almost transparently-thin slices of fish, chewing carefully, then smiling a little.

"It's not bad," she said. Her new father-in-law looked at her with a raised eyebrow, then grinned.

"Not bad? It's damn good, some of the best I've had." He took another piece. Shaking her head, privately astounded that anyone would pay that much for fish, Pauline turned back to Chou, who looked at her with an expression that suggested she had a good idea of what the waitress was thinking.

"Fugu is nice, but rather too expensive for me," she said calmly. Glancing around the table she asked a question with her eyes, causing a couple of the girls to nod. "Could we have the dessert menu, please?"

"Of course." Pauline retrieved seven menus and handed them out, waiting with her pen poised for the orders. They studied the desserts on offer carefully, then made their choices, which she wrote down, then took the menus back. "I'll be right back," she said, smiling at them all. She'd decided that these young women were very nearly perfect customers, quiet, polite, good tippers, and on the evidence available, bottomless pits.

Nearly at the door to the kitchen, she turned back when she heard a cry of "DAD!" from the Théberge table. Looking over she saw the elder man collapsed on the table, in the process of sliding to the ground taking about three grand worth of Japanese blowfish with him. He was grey, looking horrible even from where she was. Pushing the kitchen door open she called for help, then sprinted for the phone to call an ambulance, while Gakushi and a couple of the under-chefs popped out of the kitchen and stared in horror, hurrying over to where the man was crumpled on the floor. It had all happened in about ten seconds.

As she was dialling, she felt a slight breeze and turned to see that both Chou and the black-haired girl, whose name she had worked out was Yori, had somehow made it from their table to the side of the ill man in about two seconds flat. The blonde carefully stretched him out on the floor while Yori knelt next to him, then did something that made everyone watching go completely silent. Pauline stared, the phone forgotten in her hand, as the short woman slowly passed her hands over the comatose man, hands that were glowing visibly, a pretty violet-purple colour.

"Stroke, it looks like." She moved her glowing hands up to his head, concentrating with an intent look on her face. Everyone in the restaurant heard her clearly. The young woman nodded slowly. "Yep. Haemorrhagic stroke, he blew out a small aneurysm, it's probably been building for years." Glancing up at Gakushi, who was watching in disbelief, she gave him a quick smile. "Don't worry, it wasn't the fugu. There's no trace of tetrodotoxin poisoning. It's just a normal stroke, it could have struck at any time. Probably exacerbated by the alcohol and excitement." She looked at Chou. "It's a little tricky to repair. Could you keep him running while I do the fiddly work, love? He's lucky, he wouldn't have made it long enough for an ambulance to get here in the first place."

Chou nodded, smiling gently, then put her own hands on the man, a golden white glow building between her fingers. The senior Théberge convulsed slightly, then relaxed. "All right, he's stable."

"Good. Let's see... OK, not too bad. Hmm." Yori stared at the man's head with her eyes half closed, moving her fingertips delicately around his scalp, apparently able to see something no one else could. Everyone watched in silent awe, Mrs Théberge with her hand on her mouth, white and wide-eyed. A faint voice made Pauline tear her eyes away from the scene, glancing at the phone she'd completely forgotten she was holding.

Lifting it to her ear she said numbly, "Thanks, the emergency is over," then hung up on the operator, before slowly moving closer to see what was happening.

"I've repaired the vessel, just fixing the neural damage. He's probably going to have some slight memory issues about the last twenty minutes or so," she added, glancing at the man's wife, who stared at her for a long few seconds then nodded. Yori kept doing whatever she was doing, a minute later nodding in satisfaction. "Right. That's fixed. There's another small artery that's looking a little fragile, though. I'll just sort that one out." There was a pause, then she smiled. "Done. How's he doing?" she asked Chou.

"His blood pressure is too high by far, but otherwise he's in quite good shape," the blonde replied.

"OK. Let's sort that out then we can get him back on his feet." Both sets of hands glowed their respective colours for a while. Eventually Yori rocked back on her heels, looking pleased. "That should do it. Good as new. Right, turn him back on and let's see if there are any issues left."

Everyone watched as Chou gently touched the man's forehead, a small flash of golden light appearing briefly, before he stirred, slowly reaching up to feel where she'd touched him.

"What...?" he mumbled, opening his eyes and looking up at the unfamiliar faces. Yori neatly dived out of the way as his wife collapsed half on-top of him, hugging him and crying furiously, while his son watched for a moment, then knelt down next to his mother.

"What the hell happened?" Théberge Senior asked, looking very puzzled.

"You had a stroke, Dad. You nearly died." The elder man stared at his son, then his wife, who was nearly lying across his chest, holding him and silently sobbing.

"A stroke?" He didn't seem to be able to take it in. "I can remember a toast, then something about some shrimp... The fugu! Did that come out yet? It's very expensive." His son suddenly laughed.

"You're lying in what's left of it, Dad." Looking around slightly helplessly, the man finally allowed his son to help him to his feet while Chou gently took charge of his wife, leading her to a chair and kneeling beside her, talking softly to her. As the older man stood, staring around in surprise, the entire restaurant began applauding.

"I still don't understand, Maurice. What's going on?" Maurice grinned, although there was an edge of barely-passed panic and growing wonder to his expression. He pointed to Chou, then swung his finger around to point at Yori, who was watching looking satisfied.

"They saved you. I have no idea how, but they knew exactly what was wrong, how to fix it, everything." Staring at the blonde beside his wife, who smiled back with a slight nod, then the shorter woman who grinned at him, the man shook his head.

"Could someone explain this to me again?"

It took some time. Practically the entire wedding party took this as an excuse to start talking, mostly at cross-purposes, not to mention loudly. Eventually Yori clapped her hands sharply, the sound like a gunshot, making almost everyone jump.

"Hey! Quiet down, one at a time, OK?" Everyone stared at her, subsiding slightly. Maurice, into the more or less silent restaurant, explained what he'd seen. The Théberge wife, who turned out to be called Anna, added her two cents to the story. When they were finished, her husband looked at them, then moved his gaze around the table, his guests all nodding one after another.

"It's all true, Jacques," one of the guests, a distinguished-looking older man, said in wonder. "You went a horrible grey colour and just dropped like a stone. The waitress over there," he pointed to Pauline, who was still clutching the cordless phone, watching in silent amazement, "started calling for an ambulance, but before she could even get through the two young ladies did... something. I have no idea what, but it glowed. They saved you."

Jacques stared at him, then looked at Yori, who had walked closer, Chou next to her. "You had a small aneurysm in your brain which let go very suddenly. That caused the stroke. You'd have been dead within around two minutes, if we hadn't been here, I'm afraid. There was no way that normal medicine could have done much, leaving aside the time constraint, the damage was far too deep inside to reach without using our method or something like it. There was another smaller one that we fixed as well. You'll be fine now."

"How... How did you do that? How did you even know what the problem was, and how to fix it?"

The head of the Théberge family looked at them with curious, grateful awe. "Who are you ladies?"

"I'm Yori. Nice to meet you, by the way." She stepped forward, holding out her hand. After a long moment he took it slightly dazedly and shook it. "This is Chou, my partner. We're from Japan, we were just coincidentally here for a meal, because the food is so good." He nodded absently, shaking Chou's hand as well. "As far as the rest goes, basically, it's magic, more or less. We're pretty practised at it."

Gaping at her, he repeated "Magic...?" in a wondering tone.

"More or less. It's a little more complicated but that's easier for people to understand." Maurice suddenly laughed, looking abruptly embarrassed when everyone turned to stare at him, although Yori was grinning. "I know, it sounds nuts, but it's true."

"Yori..." The bride was staring at them, curiosity mixed with stunned amazement in her eyes, although there was growing awareness. "And Chou? Weren't you two on the news recently? That thing in Canada, those names were mentioned on JNN." The black-haired girl glanced at her, nodding with a small smile.

"Yes. We were there."

"You watch JNN?" Chou asked with interest.

"Yes, it's interesting quite often. I'm slowly trying to learn Japanese and it's good practice." She said a few words in that language, making Yori and Chou exchange gazes, clearly trying not to giggle. Chou smiled gently at her.

"That's not bad, dear. But your accent is... unusual. I would suggest you keep practising." The woman nodded, looking mildly amused now.

"They called you Magical Girls. I've heard of them before, although I didn't believe it." The attractive brunette inspected them, then turned to look at the table full of their compatriots, who were watching with interest, not looking surprised at all. "All of you?"

"Yep." Yori grinned.

"Wow."

She studied them all, interest in her eyes, as Jacques looked between the various people involved, finally sitting in his chair, shaking his head. "This is... I have no idea what this is, but apparently I owe you two enormous thanks."

Yori shook her head, glancing at her partner, who smiled. "No, you don't owe us anything. We like helping people who need it. You needed it." He exchanged a glance with his wife.

"Thank you all the same."

"You're very welcome," Chou said, bowing slightly, as did Yori. "I hope you can move past this and continue to have fun with your party." Anna jumped to her feet and rushed over, drawing both women into a hug.

"Thank you," she whispered, crying again. The blonde patted her on the shoulder, smiling.

"He'll be fine, Anna. We repaired all the damage, it shouldn't happen again. Enjoy your meal, try not to let this bother you, if you can." Chou looked intently at the woman, who finally nodded, dabbing tears from her face with a handkerchief she pulled from her pocket. With one final trembling smile, she went back to her husband, looking at him as if she'd never expected to see him again, which was close to the truth. The two young women watched, then returned to their table, talking in low voices to their friends. Half the restaurant was watching them, the other half was watching the people in the wedding party, who gathered around Jacques Théberge, asking him how he felt and congratulating him on his lucky escape.

Pauline watched for a moment then approached the magical girls. "That was incredible," she said quietly. "That poor man, he looked horrible, then, just like that, he's fine. It's unbelievable."

Yori looked at her and smiled. "I'm just glad we could help. If we hadn't stayed for dessert we'd probably have been gone by the time it happened.

"Oh, the desserts!" the waitress yelped, looking very embarrassed. "I'm terribly sorry, I completely forgot, what with all the excitement." Chou waved it off gracefully.

"Don't be. Events got somewhat complicated there for a while. We don't mind." Smiling gratefully, Pauline went back to the kitchen to collect the dessert selection, glancing at the wedding party as she did. They seemed to be slowly settling down although there were many wondering glances at the table full of magical girls. Inside the kitchen she found Gakushi leaning against his preparation table slowly sharpening a knife, his attention clearly not on the task, but on what had just happened.

"Are you all right, Chef?" she asked. Twitching slightly, he looked up sharply, then slowly smiled.

"Yes, thank you, Pauline. It's just a lot to take in. What just happened."

"That, I agree with you on," she replied, shaking her head. "That was amazing."
"Beyond amazing." Glancing at the knife, he sighed a little, putting it on the table and dropping the whetstone next to it. "So far beyond I don't have the words." Looking at her he focussed on the pad she was holding. She held it up.

"The dessert orders for them." She didn't need to explain who 'them' referred to. With a sudden smile, the chef was all business.

"Right. Let's have a look. They're going to get the best desserts they've ever tasted, that much I swear."

Later, as the seven girls finished their dessert, there were smiles of satisfaction all around. "That was incredible," the girl with the auburn hair said happily. She looked at Pauline who had come out to check on them, accompanied by the chef. "Thank you very much."

Both staff members looked pleased. "It was my pleasure, Miss," Gakushi replied. "After what your friends did, it was the least I could do in thanks." He looked at them for a moment, then bowed deeply and said something in Japanese, causing them both to smile. They responded in the same language. Pauline wondered what they'd each said, deciding to ask later. Straighting up, the chef smiled again, then headed back to the kitchen. Chou turned to the waitress.

"Could we have the bill, please? We're going to have to leave, but thank you again for the wonderful food." The waitress smiled.

"Mr Théberge insisted on paying for your meal," she said, glancing over at the table where the man in question was watching them. Chou followed her gaze.

"Oh, there was no need for him to do that," she protested.

"I think he feels indebted," the waitress said with a smile. "Oh, he's coming over." Jacques Théberge walked over to the table, accompanied by his wife, looking at all the young women curiously, before focussing his attention on Chou and Yori, both of who stood politely.

"Thank you once more. My new daughter has filled me in on some of the things she's heard about you all. It's apparent to me that I'm just one in a long line of people who owe you a lot." Chou started speaking, but he held up his hand, cutting her off mid-word. "I know, you don't think I owe you anything. I happen to disagree. Please let me pay for your meal, it's the least I can do under the circumstances." Glancing at her partner, the blonde smiled and nodded after a moment or two.

"All right, Mr Théberge. We accept your kind offer."

"Jacques, please." He smiled at them both, then their colleagues. "And, can I just say, you do your country and your families proud. It was an honour meeting you. If there's ever anything I can help you with, don't hesitate to let me know. Anything at all." Reaching into his inside pocket he took out a business card, holding it out. After a moment Yori accepted it, looking at it curiously. "My personal number. My family's business is a large one, we are very active in the energy, mining, and aerospace sectors." The black-haired woman nodded, making the card disappear, which caused him to stare for a moment then smile again.

"Thank you, Jacques. I'm very glad we could help." Yori grinned at him. "It's nice to have something simple to do like that. Canada was considerably more complex and tiring." Raising an eyebrow he looked at her for a moment.

"Simple... Hmm. You obviously have a different definition than I do of that word." His face expanded out into a wide grin as she laughed. "Again, thanks. From myself and my family." Anna stepped forward, hugging Chou, then Yori.

"You're good people," she said softly. "You saved my husband and my happiness. I can never repay that." Chou smiled back.

"You don't have to. But, you're welcome." Glancing around at the other girls, she looked back to the couple as her friends all stood. "We have to go now, but it was nice meeting you both. I hope your son and his wife have a fun honeymoon." Turning to Pauline, who was standing slightly awkwardly to the side, not sure whether she should be there, she added, "And thanks for the wonderful service. We will certainly come back, although hopefully there will be less drama next time. Please give our thanks to the Chef and his people, the food was fantastic. Especially the dessert." The waitress nodded as the woman stepped back, following her friends to the corner of the restaurant away from people. Everyone was watching. "Please look away or close your eyes," she called loudly enough for everyone to hear. Most people, after a short pause, followed her advice.

There was a brilliant flash of light with a multi-coloured after-effect. The people who had not followed instructions blinked, rubbing streaming eyes, while everyone else gaped at the now empty corner.

"Good God," Jacques murmured, exchanging glances with his wife, who looked impressed. "How astounding." After a long moment he turned to the waitress. "I shall certainly recommend this restaurant to my friends." They all looked at each other then began laughing.

Nabiki smiled, drifting in the lagoon. "That place really does do exceptionally good sushi," she commented after a while. Ranma, floating with her head next to her sister-in-laws, nodded.

"It does. I'd agree with Fumiko, it's probably the best I've ever had. They're very nice people as well. Good service."

"Surprising end to the meal, though. That poor man looked terrible before you fixed him."

"I'm glad we were there. He wouldn't have made it otherwise. Even if an ambulance had been parked outside, the damage was too severe for normal medicine to do much if anything." She sighed a little. "I'd love to be able to teach it to people more easily, so many lives could be saved. I feel guilty sometimes, being able to heal so easily while so many other people have medical problems, ones we could probably fix, but we simply don't have the time to sort everyone out."

"You've helped more people than anyone else I know, Ranma," Nabiki replied after a while. "You can't be everywhere and do everything. Neither of you ever hesitate to drop everything and help anyone who needs it, I don't think you have anything to feel guilty about." She giggled a little. "Perhaps you should arrange with the local hospitals to run 'Magical Girl Healing Clinics' every now and then?" Ranma snickered.

"We've actually wondered about that. I don't know how well it would work, I can see absolute chaos as people all tried to pile in if it was a regular thing, since there are a lot of desperate people around who would try anything to get better. It might cause more trouble than it solved." She was silent for a while. "But it might be an idea. I think we'd need more than just the two of us, though. We can heal pretty quickly but it still takes time. We need to get all of you up to speed on it so you could help!"

"I don't have anything like the medical knowledge either one of you have," the middle sister said, amused. "I doubt I could do much, even if I could learn the techniques."
"You might be surprised. Basic healing, like cuts, bruises, broken bones, that sort of thing, is easier than you'd think when you know how. The more complex stuff like internal organs, disease, toxins, all of those, are something you really do need to have some serious knowledge of. But, the scanning techniques allow you to learn more about problems like that than any other method I know." Nabiki heard a splash as the red-head shrugged. "Still, you're right. Kas and I have the knowledge to make the technique seriously effective. Even so, we learn something new every day. Biology is complicated."

She rolled over and dove under the water, leaping out again some twenty metres away like a breaching dolphin with a flick of her tail, laughing, then headed to her wife on the other side of the lagoon, leaving the middle Tendo floating in the middle of it staring at the few clouds in the deep blue sky and thinking how weird her life had become in the last year, yet very glad it had turned out this way. Eventually she stirred into action, swimming off to find the others.

The brunette felt Fumiko approaching her from some distance off, picking her way through the coral, every now and then stopping to examine something interesting. Nabiki was sitting, her arms around her knees, on a fairly flat outcrop of the reef a couple of metres above the unusually calm Pacific, possibly the highest point on the island, staring out over the ocean watching the sun set. She glanced up as the taller woman settled into position next to her, smiling at her friend.

"It's been a good day," she said, raising her voice a little over the sound of the waves breaking below them. Every now and then a bigger one produced enough spray for them to feel.

Fumiko nodded. "More excitement than we expected for a quiet night out but fun. We should have expected it bearing in mind who and what we are, I guess. That meal was outstanding, though, I always thought they were good but they outdid themselves tonight." She glanced over her shoulder as a shout rang out, to see Ranma and Misaki chasing Tamiko and Aiko across the lagoon at high speed, each pair firing little ki balls at the other, laughing wildly. Kasumi was walking along the beach apparently looking for interesting shells. Grinning at the sight she watched for a moment then returned her attention to her friend. "You seem unusually down, considering. What's wrong?"

Nabiki sighed a little. "Nothing, not really. I was just thinking about how much everything has changed in only a year. For the better, definitely, but sometimes it takes me by surprise. It seems such a short time for so much to happen at the same time that it seems like forever."

"Second thoughts?" Fumiko asked sympathetically. Shaking her head, the brunette smiled slightly ruefully.

"No. It's far too late for that anyway, but I've made my decision. I'm not going to second-guess myself. It's just... every now and then it all kind of makes me stop and think." Her friend nodded slowly, glancing at her, then looking back out to sea.

"I know what you mean. I've been doing this for close to seven years now, but even so, I sometimes wonder what the hell I'm doing. How did I end up here? When I was a kid this certainly wasn't what I thought I'd grow up to be. I'm glad I did, though, even with some of the horrors we've seen recently." She shrugged. "Like we've all said at one point or another, the crazy is everywhere and when it gets you, it's got you for life. It's mostly fun, and we're able to keep it away from people that can't handle it as well, which is probably a good thing."

"True. Very true." Nabiki kept watching as the sun set, Fumiko staying beside her. Just as the last of the orange ball dipped below the horizon, there was a bright green flare where it was vanishing, lasting for only three or four seconds before vanishing as night fell. "Wow!" Nabiki glanced at the other woman, who stared back. "I've read about that, but never seen it. It's pretty rare."
"That was impressive," Fumiko agreed. "A good omen, if I believed in that sort of thing." She giggled. "I don't of course, omens and things like that are just superstitions. We use perfectly sensible magic." They looked at each other for a moment before both of them started laughing helplessly.

Sighing in disgust, Cologne terminated her detection spell with a wave of her hand and sat on the roof staring into the middle distance, thinking hard. 'Nothing. They've all faded past the point I can detect them and there haven't been any new ones formed. What the hell was it?' That was the burning question in her mind. Was it dangerous? Hostile? Some accidental effect? Eventually she shrugged, with another sigh, deciding that there was nothing she could do about it. The old woman hopped to her feet and headed homewards to get ready for her next lesson. Akane and Shampoo needed to be taught the Roasting Chestnuts technique for which she needed a good hot fire. The thought brought a smile to her face as she cackled evilly, the strange magical traces pushed to the back of her mind.

This was going to be fun. For her, at any rate.

"This sucks," Akane groused as she watched Cologne bandage Shampoo's hands after treating them with a burn potion she'd prepared. Her own hands had been similarly treated. The ointment numbed the pain remarkably well and she knew from past experience, a considerable amount of it in fact, how effective it was and how fast it worked, but she was still unhappy. Shampoo looked over at her and smiled with one side of her mouth, wincing as the Elder prodded the bandages experimentally.

"But we're learning a special technique, Akane," she replied. Cologne stepped back and studied them, raising her eyebrows.

"Very slowly. It's been three days and the burns are as bad as ever." The old woman chuckled. "Possibly worse." Both of them looked at her unhappily but couldn't deny the truth. "Oh well. I'm fairly sure you'll eventually get it. Probably." Turning, she hopped off, calling over her shoulder, "I think." Her laughter disappeared into the back of the restaurant.

"She's enjoying this, isn't she?" Akane asked bitterly. Her friend nodded, staring after the ancient Amazon.

"Very much. She's got a bit of a sadistic streak at times."

"At times!?"

Shampoo giggled. "Yes. Times she's awake." Both of them looked at each other and laughed for some while. Eventually, though, Akane looked at her watch.

"I'm going to have to get to work. Mr Ito is being very understanding about this, letting me have more time off, but I can't stay any longer." She stood, picking up the small pot of the ointment Cologne had given her and slipping it into her pocket, before waving to the other young woman and leaving the Café. Shampoo sighed a little, got up, then headed into the kitchen to help Mousse.

Masao Naito stared at the thing on his desk, then looked at the man who'd brought it in. "This is remarkable," he said slowly. The other man nodded, also inspecting it with interest.

"It is. The former Mrs Murray wanted Yori and Chou and the other girls to have it. She feels that they would appreciate it and that she owes them something. It was sent to us because she didn't know any way to get hold of them directly."

"I'm surprised she didn't call Laura Deveraux at the RCMP. She's got their contact details." His colleague shrugged a little.

"I think she's tired of all the police questions, from what the covering letter said. Understandable, under the circumstances." Naito nodded, looking slightly sad.

"That I can well imagine. Poor woman. Finding out that not only is your husband an idiot, technically a murderer, responsible for hundreds of deaths and the destruction of an entire town, but then to find out he's a key member of some international financial cartel that seems to have it's fingers into everything... It must be something of a shock." Looking at the thing again, he admired it, then with extreme care rolled it up and put it gingerly back into the tube it had come in, which went into another box. "I'll see that they get it."

"Thanks." The other agent nodded to him and went back to work as Naito picked up the phone.

"Hi, Miki," Nabiki said, smiling at the other woman, as they both happened to leave their respective rooms simultaneously. She pulled her door shut behind her and locked it.

"Hello, Nabiki. How are you doing today? You seem more cheerful over the last week," her friend replied, doing the same. They turned and walked down the hall together, heading for the stairs.

"Not bad at all. Yes, I'm feeling less... down, I suppose. Lot of things on my mind recently but I think I'm over the worst of it."

Miki glanced at her friend. "As I said, if you ever want to talk..."

"I remember, and I appreciate the offer." Looking back the middle Tendo smiled, then grabbed her friend as she stumbled at the top of the stairs on an oily patch that someone had left.

"Gack!" Miki held onto the arm that had suddenly appeared in front of her, feeling how improbably strong it seemed to be despite looking slender and well-toned, then stared down at her shoes. "Oh, yuck. What the hell is that?" They both looked at the dark stain.

"Bike grease, I think. I saw that girl from down the other end of the corridor wheeling a bike towards her room last night. I guess she must have lubricated it and some dripped. There's more down there, look." Miki leaned against the wall and put her right foot over her left knee, looking at it in annoyance.

"Damn it. These are new shoes, now look at them!" Nabiki handed her a tissue, which she used to clean the worse of the gunk off her sole, before cautiously stepping around the stain and continuing down the stairs. "Thanks, by the way. Nice catch." She grinned at her friend. "You're very quick."

"Don't worry about it," Nabiki replied, smiling. They descended in silence after that, Miki pushing open the door at the bottom and holding it as the middle Tendo exited, following her through afterwards. "So, four days of term left, then. What are you doing after?" the brunette asked the other woman. Miki looked thoughtful for a moment.

"Well, I'm going back to Kobe to visit my family for a while. John is going to join me for the second week. Then, after that, we were thinking of going away for a couple of weeks. He wanted to visit friends in the UK and show me around. We've got to decide in the next couple of days, the ticket prices will get silly if we leave it until the last minute." She looked at her friend. "What about you?"
Nabiki walked a few more steps before replying. "Back home for a week, maybe two, then much the same, going travelling. My friends Rika and Maiko have invited me to come with them when they go and stay with an old friend. I think I'm going to do that. It sounds like fun. I've met him a few times and it's always interesting."

"That sounds very nice. Oh, look, there's John." Miki waved to her boyfriend, who was talking to another young man, calling his name. He looked up and his unusually serious expression lightened, as he waved back, then said something to the other man, who nodded before walking off.

"Hey, Miki," John said, hugging his girlfriend and giving her a quick kiss. "Hi, Nabiki. How's things with you?"

"I am. That fucking rapist did it again, two nights ago." They both looked at him, horrified. "Toru just told me. Apparently it was more serious this time, the girl is in the hospital. She's expected to make a full recovery but is very scared and upset." He looked at both of them seriously. "Be careful. This guy is dangerous. Apparently, this time he had a knife, he threatened her with it, dragged her into the bushes over near the pond, then did... it. She was found two hours later by a security guard. That one that got stabbed a while back. He called the police and stayed with her until they arrived. Apparently they don't have much evidence to go on, aside from a vague description." The young man sighed as both girls exchanged anger-filled glances.

"If I find the fucker I'll take his knife away and cut his dick off with it," John mumbled, looking furious.

"Don't say things like that, John," Miki said, leaning against him for comfort, shivering slightly.
"You're no fighter, we both know that. They'll get him. Leave it to the police." She looked at her friend from Nerima, who was standing completely still, looking like she was barely breathing from fury. The aura of anger was palpable and rather unexpected. "Nabiki? Are you all right?" Nabiki shook her head a little.

"No. I hate rapists. The entire concept is wrong." Even so, she slowly relaxed, looking less angry after a few moments. "You're right. Not much we can do, though." This did not match her inner thoughts, which would have made the rapist start running, very fast indeed, if he could have read them...

The trio was silent for a little while, all of them busy with their own thoughts, before John kissed his girlfriend again. "Come on. Let's go and get breakfast, then get to class." Nabiki and Miki both nodded, following him as he headed towards the nearest decent café.

Naomi stared out the window into the night over Setagaya, trying not to think about what had happened to her, wincing slightly as she moved and the stitches pulled. Slipping a hand under the covers she ran her fingers over the dressings, then pulled it out, picking up the magazine she had been reading. The delicate face of the young woman was more serious than any of her friends would have expected normally, she was well known as a very cheerful girl, but under the circumstances she could be forgiven a certain lack of humour. After another few minutes she put the magazine down again, unable to concentrate on the banalities within. A tear leaked down her face as she dropped her head to the pillow.

She'd told the police everything she could remember about... him. It wasn't much. In all fairness she hadn't actually seen much, he'd grabbed her from behind, holding the knife in front of her eyes and speaking in a low voice that made her shiver even now to recall. She had a vivid memory of the knife, certainly, but of the attacker, not as much as the cops would like. They'd asked a lot of questions, being more sympathetic than she'd been led to believe was often the case, taken some photos of her wounds and gathered what physical evidence they could, before wishing her all the best, promising to let her know if anything happened, and leaving. Since then she'd had several friends visit, messages from others, not to mention word that her parents were on their way back from holiday in New Zealand, hopefully arriving very soon.

A sound at the door to the private room made her glance over. The hospital had put her in this room because they wanted to keep anyone who might upset her away, as well as allowing the police to talk to her without disturbing the other patients. As she watched the door opened and two women came in, the taller one gently closing it behind her. She inspected them curiously. The one in front had remarkable hair, silver, almost metallic, down to her shoulders, and eyes a curious amber-orange colour, something she'd never seen outside perhaps an owl. She was wearing a long leather coat down to her ankles, over her clothes. Naomi thought it suited her.

The other woman was taller, with blonde hair and beautiful green eyes. She gave Naomi a sympathetic warm look that instantly made her feel calmer. "Hello Naomi. My name is Chou. This is Azumi, a friend of mine. You may have heard of her over the last few months." Naomi's eyes went quickly back to the silver-haired girl, who had a neutral, calm expression. She nodded. "Yes. You're that magical girl who's been terrorising all the criminals around here for a while." Azumi suddenly smiled, making her forbidding appearance much less severe.

"Not all the criminals, but a considerable number of them, yes." She moved closer to the bed, indicating the chair next to it. "Do you mind?" Naomi shook her head. Azumi sat, glancing back at Chou for a second, then gazed at the woman in the bed. "We heard about your attack. I'm very sorry something like that happened, it should not have. I know the police are working on it, but I thought I would look into it as well, I might have a little more luck than them." Pulling herself up further in bed, Naomi looked at the girl for a moment, then at Chou behind her.

"Why would you do that for me?" she asked curiously. Azumi smiled again.

"Because it's the right thing to do. Aside from anything else, none of us like rapists at all. If he'd tried anything like that in Minato where there are a lot of magical girls, he'd have been lucky to make it out alive." Naomi abruptly giggled, then started crying.

"I tried to fight him off, but he had a knife. He said he'd do terrible things to me if I didn't shut up. He... violated me. Twice. Then he stabbed me anyway. Why did that happen?" she sobbed. Azumi reached out and held her hand while Chou walked around to the other side of the bed, putting her hand on the crying woman's head. Naomi felt a sudden wave of calmness, finding it much easier to deal with the remembered pain, her crying slowing and stopping. She looked at the blonde. "What did you do?" she asked.

"I temporarily altered the balance of your brain chemistry a little. It works somewhat like a tranquiliser but without any of the negative effect. The result should be you feel less emotional and overwrought for a while, hopefully long enough to get to sleep later. I hope you don't mind, you seemed very upset." Chou sat in the chair on the other side of the bed. Naomi shook her head after a few seconds.

"That's OK. Thank you. It keeps hitting me like that. I know I couldn't have done much, he was twice my size and much stronger, never mind being armed, but I can't help but feel I should have managed to fight him off, or run, or anything really. I still can't believe it happened to me." She sniffed a bit, wiping her nose with a tissue from the box Azumi handed her, picked off the table.
beside the bed. "Thanks."

Chou studied her closely, then nodded, seemingly satisfied with how whatever she'd done was working. "I would like to heal your wounds, if you're all right with that." Staring at her wide-eyed, Naomi finally nodded.

"You can do that?" she asked faintly. Azumi snickered.

"You wouldn't believe how well." Chou shot her friend a quick smile, then gently folded the covers back. Placing her hands on Naomi, she concentrated. The patient in the bed gaped as her hands glowed a pretty golden colour for a few seconds.

"All right. Not much real damage, I think you were lucky, the wounds suggest he was aiming for your liver. That would have been very bad. Luckily he missed." Naomi nodded.

"The doctor said the same thing. I'd have bled out in a few minutes, he said."

"The liver filters the blood, it has a huge blood flow through it. A stab wound there can be rapidly fatal." Chou put moved her hands around, the glow coming back. Both Azumi and Naomi watched, the former with satisfaction and the latter with awe, feeling nothing except a slight sensation of warmth. Less than a minute later the blonde smiled. "All done. The wounds were deep but didn't seem to have hit anything serious. I'll have to remove the stitches, that won't take long." Lifting the hospital gown Naomi was wearing she peeled the dressings off carefully, placing them on the floor, then bent over the three stab wounds on the girl in the bed, producing a pair of tweezers from somewhere. Once more Naomi gaped, as she cut the stitches with a hair-thin thread of golden light that seemed to be coming from her finger, then removed them. Once they were all out her hand went over the wounds, a flash of light came, and when it was removed the skin was completely unmarked.

"Holy crap," Naomi muttered, making Chou glance at her and smile.

"It can be surprising if you're not familiar with our method of healing."

One final pass and the blonde woman sat back, looking pleased. "There doesn't seem to be anything else physically wrong now. I'm sorry I can't do anything for your mental state. The effect on your brain is only temporary, it's too risky to do much more than that."

"Thank you all the same. At least I can get out of the hospital now." Naomi giggled. "I wonder what the doctors are going to say about this?" Both Chou and Azumi appeared amused.

"I suspect it could be quite funny." Azumi smiled. "Now, Naomi, I wanted to ask you some questions, if you don't mind. I know you've already probably gone over all this with the police and are sick of it, but if you could manage one last time, I'd be grateful."

"I don't mind, but I don't know what I can tell you that would help. I was walking past the pond two nights ago, about eleven I guess, coming back from town and heading for my room. I didn't hear anything but suddenly I got grabbed from behind. He was very strong. He put his arm around my neck and squeezed when I struggled, then held this huge knife in front of me, pointing at my face. I screamed but he just squeezed harder." She shivered at the recollection. "He told me to shut up or he'd stick it in me. I was so frightened..." Once again she shivered. Chou put her hand on her shoulder, looking calmly at her.

"Try to relax. He can't hurt you again, trust us. Just breathe deeply for a moment, then go on."

Glancing at her, Naomi nodded, following the instructions.
"He pulled me into the bushes, then used the knife to cut my belt. When he'd got my clothes off he hit me on the back of the head, so I fell over. I was very dizzy but didn't lose consciousness, I think, or I don't remember if I did. The next thing I knew he was... He was..." She couldn't continue. Azumi squeezed the hand she was still holding comfortingly.

"You don't have to tell us about that part. Skip to what happened next."

Naomi waited until she felt less upset, then went on with her recounting of her attack. "He stood up and looked at me lying there. I could barely see him my eyes were so blurry from crying and getting dirt in them. The pain was pretty bad as well. He said something like, "I hope the next one doesn't scream as much," or something along those lines, I can't really remember, he wasn't talking to me, more to himself. When he'd zipped himself up, he walked away, I thought he'd gone, but a minute later he came back, bent down, and just stabbed me three times. He didn't say anything, just stuck that fucking knife into me and walked off."

She started crying again for a few moments during which Azumi and Chou exchanged glances. When she recovered, she added, 'I was there for ages. I tried crawling to find help, but it hurt too much. All I could do was lie there and wait to die. I think I passed out a few times. I remember trying to stop the bleeding with what was left of my skirt, I guess it sort of worked since I'm still here. Eventually I heard footsteps, which at first I thought were him coming back to finish the job, but they went past and started to leave. I yelled as loudly as I could and that security guard came running. He found me, made a temporary bandage out of his shirt, then called the ambulance and the police. That's basically it."

"Mr Hayashi is a good man," Chou said quietly. Naomi glanced at her in surprise.

"You know him?"

"I know of his reputation. He nearly died a few months ago doing his job. He got stabbed as well. In the leg, which could have been very nasty, it only missed his femoral artery by millimetres. Azumi helped him that time." She looked at her colleague who nodded.

"I just happened to turn up at the right moment." A few seconds later, she turned back to Naomi. "Thank you. I'm sorry to have put you through that again. Can you think of anything at all you might have missed the first time? Any vague description would help, all we have to go on at the moment is basically 'a man with a knife'." She smiled a little, and Naomi, despite herself, giggled.

"Sorry. It sounds silly when you put it like that." She thought hard. "He was short. Only about my height. Very strong, even so. But I can't remember much more. I didn't see much more." She sighed. "I'm sorry," she repeated.

"Naomi?" Turning to Chou who has spoken she waited curiously. "If you will allow it, I have a technique that may help. I can use something like what I did earlier, to alter your brain chemistry a little, but in a different way. It induces a state similar to hypnosis, like some drugs do, which would aid your memory considerably, but it only works if you don't resist it. Otherwise you just end up feeling drunk and laugh a lot. Which can be amusing but isn't very useful." The blonde smiled as Naomi laughed.

"OK. If you think it will help." Even having only known the blonde for five minutes or so, there was just something about her that made her feel she could trust the woman with anything. Her reputation, which she had heard of even though she was no fan-girl, reinforced that thought. "What do I do?"

"Just relax. You'll feel very strange for a moment or two but that will pass." The woman reached out and put her hand on Naomi's forehead. A wave of dizziness went through her, forcing her to close her eyes as the room spun momentarily. Following that was a feeling of deep calmness, as if all her fears and emotions had taken a brief holiday. Her breathing slowed, she could feel her heart-rate drop as well, as she relaxed into the bed. It was an odd sensation but rather nice. A voice sounded, eventually tearing her attention away from what she was feeling.

"Naomi? Can you hear me?"

"Yes. I feel very strange."

"Don't resist it, just stay relaxed. Now, think back to what happened two nights ago. Remember it's over, he can't hurt you, you're safe, but also remember anything else you can about it. Can you do that?"

Naomi was silent for a moment. "Yes. I was walking home past the pond. I heard a noise, faint, coming from my left behind me. Someone walking fast. Then, his arm around my neck." The memories were more intense but less worrying than they had been, she noticed with detached curiosity. "He smelled of sweat, soap, and something else. Something vaguely familiar." She paused again. "Horses. He smelled of horses. Faintly, like he'd showered, but it was there."

"Are you sure?" Azumi sounded intrigued.

"Yes. I tried riding for a while when I was younger, but I turned out to be allergic to horses and had to stop, none of the allergy drugs worked very well."

"Go on."

"He pulled me into the bushes after threatening me with that knife. His voice was quite deep. He sounded older than me, maybe late twenties, early thirties?"

"Could you make out any regional accent? Any distinctive speech patterns?" Chou asked softly. She thought carefully.

"I think he might have had a southern accent, something like Okayama or somewhere around there. Not Osaka, or Kobe, I'm from there and it wasn't the same. But not from Tokyo either."

"OK, good. Now, how about the knife. Can you describe it?"

"Some sort of military knife. Like a dagger. Both edges were sharpened. It didn't look like anything I'd seen before."

"Think hard. How big was it? Was it shiny, or blackened? Could you see any markings on it?"

"The edges were shiny, but the blade was black. About sixteen, maybe eighteen centimetres long. Some sort of writing along the part of the blade nearest the handle, in English lettering. I couldn't make it out."

Azumi sounded pleased. "Very good. Anything else?"

"The handle looked like it was wrapped in leather, black leather."

"Great. Now, what happened next?"

"He pushed me to the ground, then cut my belt, pulled my skirt off, and everything else. He was muttering to himself the whole time."
"Can you remember what he was saying?" Naomi, in her dream-like state, thought back to that night, on some level very grateful that her emotions seemed to be deadened. Otherwise she couldn't have stood the memories.

"Something like 'You owe me. They all owe me. Bitches, never letting me have sex with them, after all I've done. All the same.'" Chou sighed softly.

"What a deluded individual."

"There was a lot of that sort of thing, he wasn't talking to me, I think, just himself. Lots of swearing."

"Did anything he say give any hint as to where he might work, or live, that you can remember?" The voice of the silver-haired girl was intent but calm. Naomi shook her head slightly, trying to remember.

"I don't think so. Just insults and swearing."

"OK." She was silent for a moment. "You can skip the actual attack, there's no need to go over that again. What happened afterwards?"

"He zipped his jeans up, then just walked off, still mumbling to himself. I could hear his footsteps going away, but after a while they stopped, there was a long pause, and he came back. I was lying on the ground on my back where he'd left me, crying. He stood next to me for a while, all I could see were his shoes, then he bent down and stabbed me. I think he was smiling. I screamed and he ran."

Both magical girls said nothing for a while. Eventually Azumi asked, "Can you remember anything about his shoes, and any other details about his clothes?"

"Black jeans, expensive ones. The shoes were... very high end, I think. Something you'd normally wear to an event of some sort, not just for walking around in every day. That's weird, now that I come to think of it. I think he had a leather jacket on as well, I could feel it against my back when he grabbed me."

"Anything about his appearance other than short and late twenties or early thirties?"

"Not really. Dark hair, but it was dark and I couldn't see if it was brown or black, and I couldn't see his eye colour either."

"Thank you, Naomi. That helps a lot. I'm going to stop the technique now, you may feel dizzy again for a moment, so be ready." Chou spoke gently, reaching out and touching her forehead. The feeling this time was much less intense but still noticeable. She gasped slightly as the full impact of her earlier words hit all at once, opening her eyes and staring at the blonde woman, who smiled back. "Relax. It will pass quickly."

"That was... weird. And remarkable. I didn't think I could remember anything that detailed. Before you did whatever it was you did all I could recall about the knife was that it was big and aimed at my throat." Naomi shivered a little. Chou nodded, looking pleased.

"It's a powerful method but it only really works under specific circumstances. Luckily this was one of them."

"I didn't tell the police much of that. They should know." She looked at the two girls, who exchanged glances then nodded.
"I expect they'll come back later for a follow-up interview. You should tell them what you told us, I would think that you'll remember it clearly now." Chou smiled once more, standing up. "Thank you for helping us."

Naomi looked at them in wonder. "You helped me more." Reaching down she felt her abdomen, running her fingers over the unmarked skin with renewed surprise. "A lot more." Chou joined Azumi near the door, both of them smiling slightly.

"It was no trouble. I would advise trying to get some sleep now, your body will need to rebuild it's reserves after the healing. Good-bye, Naomi, and try not to let what happened scare you away from men in general. Most of them are decent people." Azumi opened the door as Chou spoke, looking out, then leaving with one last wave, the blonde woman following. The door shut with a faint click leaving Naomi alone with her thoughts. She fell asleep with her hand still on where the wound had been.

Leaving the hospital still under the influence of the cloak effect her sister was producing, the disguised Nabiki was feeling cold fury. "That poor girl. I want this bastard."

"We'll find him," 'Chou' said comfortingly, putting her hand on her sister's shoulder. "We know a lot more now. A man, probably around thirty, short, strong, wearing expensive clothes and nice shoes, has something to do with horses, most likely from the south, using a specialist military knife with English writing on the blade. Also a very bad attitude towards women, but that we could infer from him being a rapist in the first place. He's escalating fast as well, which is worrying. The first attack, he ran when he was disturbed, not to mention he didn't apparently use a weapon. This one, he tried to kill the girl. I fear next time he'll do a better job."

"There won't be a next time," 'Azumi' growled. "I'm going hunting."

"We'll help if you like," 'Chou' replied, looking very dangerous for a moment. Her sister glanced at her and nodded.

"Thank you. But I want to deal with him myself."

"Of course. It's your territory." 'Azumi' shot the other woman a slight quick smile.

"You make it sound like we're a bunch of leopards hunting an antelope." 'Chou' giggled.

"Oh, my, nothing like that." She paused for a couple of steps. "We're much more dangerous than leopards..." Both of them laughed. "We could simply turn our information over to the police, you know. They could probably track him down with it." The blonde woman looked calmly at her sister, who shook her head.

"They can have him after I've had a word first." She looked back, as 'Chou' nodded, smiling slightly, then glanced back at the hospital. "How much will she remember?"

"She'll recall everything the memory technique brought back, but not very much of what else happened. It will be like a dream, I suspect, when she wakes up. I thought it was best not to leave too many traces of us behind in case we have to do something... significant."

"Good idea. Right, I'm off to do some research. I'll call you when I have a lead on our little rapey friend." Giving her sister a quick smile of gratitude, 'Azumi' ran towards the nearest building, leaped up the side in a blur, then vanished over the roof. Watching her go, 'Chou' smiled affectionately, before heading home.
"Are you all right, Nabiki?" Miki looked at her friend with concern. The brunette had been even more reserved than usual, not sad like she had been a couple of weeks ago when she got back from wherever she'd been, more like she was stewing over something that made her very angry. Looking up from her ramen, the other woman smiled slightly after a moment.

"I'm fine, thanks, Miki. Just thinking about something I need to work out." She shook her head a little, looking momentarily irritated. "I have all the pieces but there's one bit missing, like a puzzle. Annoying."

"Anything I can help with?"

Nabiki sighed. "I don't think so, but thank you for the offer. Don't worry, I'll get it." She cheered up a little. "How did your exams go?"

"Pretty well, I think. At least there won't be any more of those for a couple of months after tomorrow!" Miki grinned. "I like my work but I'll also like being able to relax for a while." Laughing, Nabiki agreed with her. They were still talking when John slid into the booth next to his girlfriend, giving her a quick kiss then motioning to the waitress who nodded and brought over a menu. He ordered quickly, handing it back.

"Where have you been?" Miki asked. "You said you'd be here at five. It's now," she made a show of checking her watch, "half past." Raising an eyebrow she waited, making Nabiki giggle and John look back with amusement.

"Sorry, I got involved with my last class, then lost track of the time talking to some friends. I ran all the way here when I realised how late it was! I deserve a kiss for that." Turning his cheek to her he grinned as she sighed loudly, but kissed him anyway. The eye away from Miki winked at Nabiki, who covered her answering grin by bending over her bowl.

"I'll forgive you. Have you talked to your parents yet?" She glanced at Nabiki. "We thought I'd go and stay with him for a couple of days since he lives closer than my family, then I'd go home until we meet up again."

"I did. They're happy about it, I think my mother is quite keen to meet you. Possibly a little too keen, if you understand. Be warned..." Miki giggled, hugging him for a moment but letting go when his food arrived. He dove in after thanking the waitress. She watched him shovelling food down like he hadn't eaten in days, exchanging an amused look with her friend, then went back to eating herself. "Oh. I don't know if you heard, but that bastard tried again early this morning. The girl managed to run when she spotted him, but it was close. Apparently he chased her for a couple of hundred metres before someone else came by and scared him off. At least they got a better description this time, although whether it will be enough..." Nabiki froze, looking at John, trying not to react in the way she wanted to. The ramen shop didn't deserve what would most likely happen if she did.

"Where?" she asked in a low, dangerous voice. Both her friends looked at her in slight shock, that tone was genuinely scary for a moment. They exchanged a glance while Nabiki forced herself calm, using a touch of the soul of ice, trying not to cause her ramen to freeze in the process.
"Um, over past the computing studies building where it backs onto the park," John replied after a long moment. "About half-past five this morning. She was apparently out for a run before class, good thing in a sense, she could run really fast. Faster than him at any rate." He studied the brunette carefully. "Are you OK? You don't have to be scared, we'll all be leaving here in a day or two. I'm sure the police will catch him pretty soon, before we get back for next term." For a moment Nabiki genuinely couldn't work out what he meant. Why would she be scared? It was Rapey the Dwarf who was going to be in trouble. Eventually she understood his point, nodding with a sigh.

"Don't worry, I'm fine. I just really don't like rapists." Miki shivered, clutching her boyfriends arm, making him put it protectively around her.

"Neither do I. I'm glad we'll be leaving soon. I like this university but some of the attraction goes away knowing that there's someone like that out there." Somewhat subdued, the trio continued eating, deliberately changing the subject to something lighter. Twenty minutes later Nabiki made a show of looking at her redundant watch.

"Well, I have to get back and start packing up. I want to be ready to go tomorrow as soon as I've finished the last tests and the paperwork."

"Make sure you come and say bye before you go, OK?" John said. Miki nodded.

"I will. I'll see you guys later." Waving to her friends Nabiki paid up, then left the ramen restaurant. Five minutes later she was standing on top of the computing studies building, as 'Azumi', her coat waving in the light breeze, looking into the small park behind the university.

Nabiki, based on the information from the police report, the area the attacker was seen in is there. # Jun dropped a glowing outline around part of the park. # It appears he chased the intended victim along this path until she evaded him here. # Another icon blinked in a different colour. # We should check for any traces left which could add to the information we already have from the previous victim. Identification of the attacker may be possible if anything further can be found. The description given by the new victim matches a subset of the data we received previously. # She nodded, unsurprised the SI had already acquired the official police report. It found normal so-called secure computer systems anything but. Even the MoD in the UK hadn't taken more than a second or two to crack, which had proven very useful.

Walking to the edge of the four story building she walked off it without breaking step, landing easily in a manner that even a few months ago would have made her gape. Now, she simply knew she could do it and didn't think all that much about it. A number of students who were walking around enjoying the early evening stopped and stared, though. None of them said anything to her, a couple of large young men scrambling to get out her way as she walked steadily towards the park, something in her eyes suggesting she wasn't in a chatty mood, although she could hear someone saying in awe, "That's Azumi. The local magical girl! Did you see that? She just dropped off the building like she was walking down the stairs." Smiling coldly she left the campus and entered the park, heading for the site the SI had identified.

There were signs the police forensics team had searched the area thoroughly before she got there, which was expected. She was hoping she'd find something they missed. Walking slowly back and forth with the SI scanning the site through her senses, she probed for anything out of place. Stopping at one point behind a large bush, 'Azumi' looked down, then knelt, inspecting the way the grass was pressed flat. 'Someone was lying here,' she said to Jun. 'For some time, I think.' Carefully searching the area, she found nothing, then lay down in the same position she thought the unknown person had been in. It came as no surprise to find this gave a perfect view of the area of the park the attempted attack had taken place in. From the other side of the bush it was doubtful anyone could have seen anything.

'Definitely him.' Sniffing carefully, she could make out a scent of sweat and some sort of soap, below which was a trace of horse, just as Naomi had said. Asking Jun to enhance her sense of smell in the same way as it could process sight and vision, she gagged a little when it complied. This ability was one she'd worked out very soon after the mugger in the tunnel incident, but rarely used as so many things smelled awful when it was turned on. It wasn't nearly as effective in relative terms as the hearing and vision enhancements, a human nose just wasn't that good, but it certainly made a considerable difference. Idly wondering if Kasumi or Ranma could come up with a form with a better nose, she carefully sniffed. "Ick," she mumbled, wrinkling her nose. The enhanced scents were mostly rather unpleasant.

'Horse, definitely. Several different ones, I think. Some sort of soap, scented with mint, plus that sweaty smell. That's him. At least I'll know him when I find the bastard.'

#I have recorded the scent data, Nabiki. I can provide a positive match should we come across it again.#

'Thanks, Jun. So, he lay here for a while. Maybe an hour or more, I think, considering the grass is still flat hours later. He sees the girl coming, waits for her to go past, then gets up and tries to sneak up and grab her. She sees him and runs for it, escaping after a couple of hundred metres.'

'Azumi' stood, looking at the depression in the grass, then around at the immediate vicinity. There was some small amount of garbage around the place, evidence of students enjoying themselves in the past, but nothing that stuck out as important. 'The police must have searched this area thoroughly anyway, so if there was anything critical it's likely they would have found it.'

#There is nothing listed in the police report.#

'We already know he's pretty careful. Condoms used, that sort of thing. He's not stupid, just depraved.'

#I would suggest the obvious next move is to search the area around where the intended victim evaded the attacker. We may be able to locate his exit path and follow it.#

'OK, let's have a look.' She walked around the bush, following the likely path the attacker had taken, just in case. Nothing seemed useful. Jogging easily through the park she kept scanning, until she arrived at the second site.

#The victim reported this as the point a passer-by caused the attacker to veer off and make his escape. The victim continued in that direction, the attacker fled to the west.# Jun displayed indicators as it spoke to illustrate its words. She nodded slightly, heading in the relevant direction. A lot of bootprints showed the police had done much the same. Annoyingly this made her task more involved, but a little work by Jun managed to come up with a visual filter that could identify and process out the prints that were irrelevant. Once more she was surprised and grateful for how amazingly useful the device was. Walking slowly along she scanned the ground in front of her, for nearly three hundred metres, until a partial boot-print flashed at her as Jun highlighted it.

#This print does not match any of the police-issue ones, Nabiki. The depth and angle suggests the wearer was running. The direction is also correct for a suspect fleeing the crime scene.#

'Good. That helps. Let's see if we can find more.' She resumed walking. Another hundred metres passed before she found another print. The ground was quite hard as it had been warm with little rain for weeks, which made this whole thing very difficult. In all likelihood the police hadn't spotted either print. Their own seemed to taper off a few tens of metres before the one Jun had located. ‘Same direction, and also running.’ There was another one ten metres further on, from the other foot, then three in a row where a damp patch in the earth showed an underground water source, possibly a small spring.

#This is useful data.# Jun said immediately. #The distance between the prints relative to their size suggests the attacker is approximately one hundred and sixty-five centimetres tall and was moving at a fast run. The depth indicates a weight of between eighty and one hundred kilograms. Without calibration for ground density it is difficult to be more precise.#

'It's still very useful. Thanks. So, short, heavy for his size, Naomi said he was very strong, so probably not fat. Well muscled then.'

#He had also been moving at a considerable speed for a non-enhanced human male for over a kilometre by this point, which suggests an individual with good physical stamina.#

'Possibly he works out, or is an athlete of some sort.'

#That theory fits the observed data.# She continued walking, heading in the direction the man had gone. He had apparently gone in more or less a straight line from the site of the attack, which made her reassess her thought that the man was fairly smart. It didn't seem a bright idea under the circumstances. Eventually she left the park and found herself on an under-used back street, where after some searching faint traces of the same bootprints could be found. Only Jun being able to process her vision and massively enhance the contrast brought out the marks at all. The visual effect was very strange but it made all the tiny differences in shade on the concrete stand out quite nicely.

The prints stopped at a point a single tire track could be seen. #It would appear that the attacker had a motorcycle parked here. He seems to have accelerated away at a considerable speed based on the length of the skid mark,# Jun commented helpfully. #I doubt we can track him past this point.# 'Azumi' muttered irritably under her breath. Looking around she hoped for some sort of security camera Jun could pull images from, but there was nothing apparent.

'Damn. I'd hoped this would be the break we needed.'

#We have derived considerable useful information from this exercise,# the SI said, sounding satisfied. #The attacker is short for a male, well muscled, probably very physically fit, possesses a high end motor-cycle based on the width of the tire track, is involved with horses in some capacity, wears clothing suggesting a high status income, and is smart enough to take precautions to prevent identifying traces being left on his victims, although apparently not sufficiently intelligent to take evasive action when fleeing the scene.#

'You noticed that as well, then?' 'Azumi' asked it with amusement. It replied in much the same tone.

#Yes, it would be difficult not to. He would have appeared to have panicked when surprised by a pedestrian and simply bolted for safety. That is not the mark of a practised attacker, or one possessed of good survival instincts.# Following one last look around in case she'd missed anything, 'Azumi' retraced her steps, keeping an eye out for any evidence they might have missed. Unfortunately there was nothing. When she was nearly back to the point she'd started at, Kasumi called.

"Hello, sister. I was wondering how your search was going."

"Not as well as I'd like but not too bad. He tried it again this morning just after dawn, but Fortunately the victim managed to escape."

"Oh, my. That's not good. It was months between the first attack and the second, but only two days until the third. This is a dangerous individual." 'Azumi' sighed heavily.

"I know, that's what I'm worried about. For all I know he's already trying again. It's still pretty light out, so I suppose it's not likely, but even so I'm worried."

"What do you want to do? We could try setting a trap for him, I suppose. Some poor defenceless girl walking alone in the dark..." Her sister snickered as Kasumi giggled.

"Wouldn't he get a surprise! No, the problem with that idea is that we have no idea where he'll strike again or when. He might not repeat his attack for weeks, or he might already be doing it now. All the attack sites we know about are within a kilometre of the university but there's no guarantee he attends here or works here. It might just be a convenient place to find young women."

"Indeed. Send me all the information you have and Ranma and I will look over it to see if we can come up with any insights."

"Thanks, sis." 'Azumi' transmitted a file of the entire search, as well as the police report.

"All right, we'll look over it right now and get back to you if we have any ideas. Good luck, Nabiki."

"Bye, Kasumi." Once her sister had disconnected, 'Azumi' looked around, then sighed once more in momentary defeat, heading back to her rooms. A few students that noticed her pointed her out to their friends, talking as she left the area.

"Hello, Nabiki. We were just about to call you. I think we might have located this person." Nabiki grinned in triumph.

"I think I did as well. You're talking about Shigeo Yasuhiro, aren't you?" She dismissed most of the sub-windows cluttering her visual field, leaving the one with data on the person in question.

"Indeed we are. He fits the description perfectly. An active athlete, he is an accomplished rider, who takes part in international equestrian competitions. He's twenty-nine years old, is know to collect European militaria, which fits the knife although it's rather a silly mistake to use something so identifiable, and MLIT records indicate he has a late-model Kawasaki motorcycle registered in Okayama prefecture, although he now lives in Setagaya. From a well-off background, his parents are quite wealthy. And, a very interesting addendum is that he attended Nihon University College of Commerce, graduating with a reasonable degree in Business Studies five years ago."

"That's him. Your SI is as good at ignoring security measures as Jun is." Kasumi giggled.

"Nao is remarkably effective, yes. Sometimes I feel a little guilty. The SI units are clearly designed for intelligence work amongst other things." Nabiki nodded, getting up off her bed and looking out the window into the darkness, illuminated by street-lights and a few still-lit buildings.

"I came to that conclusion some time ago. It works out very well for me personally. Anyway, we probably have the right person. It should be easy enough to confirm it. I want to deal with this before he strikes again, assuming he hasn't done already. Jun is monitoring the traffic cameras around this entire area, if he uses his motorcycle we've got him. Do you think we should wait for that to pan out or go looking for him?"
"Aiko and Ranma have already gone to check his address, in case he's there. If he is they'll call you before doing anything. When they get back we'll meet you with the others on the roof of your building, we can be ready to move if he turns up there. I suspect he may well do. That type of person is unlikely to be able to handle failure, so since he didn't manage to complete his attack this morning, I suspect he might try again tonight."

"I kind of thought that seemed likely. OK, I'm on my way up." She disconnected and left her room, activating the bracelet on the way in case anyone saw her. It was nearly two AM so most of the residents were asleep but there was always the possibility, which she wanted to avoid, so she wouldn't have to answer any questions. In the end no one seemed to be about. On the roof she walked to the edge and looked over, wondering where this Yasuhiro man was now and what he was doing. A few minutes later she felt some familiar ki signatures appear behind her. 'Yori' walked over and joined her, looking at the university campus and the buildings beyond it.

"We'll get him, don't worry," she said, putting her hand on her sister-in-law's shoulder. "We've got the right man. There's enough evidence in his apartment to prove that. These attacks are only three out of probably six or seven, he's got various trophies that show he's done it before." Nabiki glanced at the other woman, shimmering into 'Azumi' in the process.

"All we have to do is find the bastard."

#That is now easy, Nabiki,# Jun interjected, sounding pleased. #The motorcycle registered to Mr Shigeo Yasuhiro just passed a traffic camera five kilometres to the south-west, heading in this direction at just under the speed limit. He will arrive at the university in less than five minutes assuming he does not divert from his current course.# A terrible grin slowly crossed 'Azumi's' face, matched moments later by six others as she passed the message along. Seven young woman turned to face west, waiting patiently for their prey to arrive.

Shigeo slowed down as he reached the outskirts of the university, looking around carefully for anyone who might be watching. He couldn't see anyone, but he circled his chosen point twice before he felt comfortably sure he was unobserved. The large bike was surprisingly quiet at low revs, a feature he took full advantage of as he pulled into a back alley heading down behind a row of houses on the north side of the campus, one street over. When he found a suitably dark corner away from street-lights he stopped, backing the bike in and putting it on it's stand, then turning the ignition off. Taking his helmet off he listened carefully until he was sure it was all quiet.

Getting off the bike he locked his helmet to the back, then started walking towards the university, keeping a wary eye out for pedestrians. Once or twice he stopped and melted into the shadows as someone passed. Unobserved, as far as he was aware, he entered the grounds of the university on the opposite side to the park he'd nearly been seen at that morning, just to be careful.

He didn't see the two women watching him from a short distance away, although to be fair, even in full daylight he would have missed them as well. As he entered the grassy campus, working his way from shadow to shadow, they ghosted completely silently after him.

He gave the area around the pond in the middle of the campus a wide berth as well, in case anyone was watching. The grounds of the university were quite extensive, so even by avoiding the areas he'd struck in before he still had plenty of possible hunting areas. He wasn't in a good mood, the aborted hunt that morning had left him irritable and edgy all day, causing a few of the small number of friends he had to comment on it. One of them had commented enough that he felt obliged to punch him in the face, which had led to a bit of a scuffle. Which in turn led to the blackened right eye he touched every now and then with a wince.
Hearing someone walking towards him along the path, Shigeo stopped dead, then quickly moved into the deepest shadow he could find. The person, dressed in the uniform of the university security department, walked slowly by, looking carefully around and occasionally pointing his flashlight at things. Pulling back further into the shadows of the small outbuilding he was standing behind, Shigeo waited for the man to pass, mentally urging him to get on with it. Eventually he did. Waiting another thirty seconds to be sure he wasn't coming back, the dark haired man looked around then continued in the opposite direction.

The two invisible women had been joined by another one, but he was unaware of this. They conferred without moving their lips, then split up, one circling around in front while the other two continued following their target.

"What do you think? We could certainly try a trap now, he's clearly looking for a suitable victim. Or would you like to just jump him? He's got no idea we're here." 'Azumi' was standing on top of the business school watching the figure of Shigeo through three different sets of eyes. Beside her, Tamiko and Aiko had the same view. Fumiko was over on the computer studies building also watching.

"Not sure. I want this meeting to be one he never forgets, that much I am sure of, but I'm in two minds about the best way to do that." She looked over the edge of the roof, watching the man through her own eyes for a moment. "He seems to know his way around. Do you think he's looking for a particular type of woman, or just one on her own away from people?"

"None of the women he attacked looked much like each other, so I suspect he's merely trying to find someone in a place he can attack without being caught." 'Chou's' voice sounded mildly irritated, which her sister knew covered a deep anger. "Personally, if you really want to scare him properly, I think it might be a good idea to give him what he wants."

"Something feminine, weak, and good looking? An easy target?"

"Precisely. Would you like to play the part?"

The middle Tendo grinned in a manner that would have made a hungry tiger become an instant vegetarian. "Oh, so very much."

The clicking of high heels on the path coming at right angles to the one Shigeo was following made his ears perk metaphorically up. Stopping, he listened carefully, then looked around. A short distance away was a small maintenance shed. Hurrying over to it he inspected it for a moment, finding that tonight was his lucky day, as the door was unlocked. Opening it he peered inside, risking a small amount of light from a tiny flashlight he had in his pocket next to his favourite combat knife. The shed was, except for a rusty lawnmower and a few rakes hanging from the walls, empty. Perfect. Closing the door as gently as he could he went back towards the path, picking a spot behind a large tree. His black clothing and leather jacket blended in to the shadows very well if he stood still, which he did, waiting and watching.

The sound of the heels got closer and louder, until a young woman came into view around the corner. She was walking quite fast, looking around nervously, clutching a purse to her chest. When she walked under a street light he saw she was about his height, something that annoyed him, with a large chest that bounced with every step, a short skirt, and those shoes. She looked like she'd been on a night out. Looking around he couldn't see anyone else anywhere in the vicinity. It was his lucky night. This was going to be easy.
As she passed he quietly stepped out behind her, falling in twenty metres back. She kept walking, not noticing that there was anyone around for a while. Suddenly, she stopped, listening. He faded back into the shadows of a tree in a practised move. The girl looked over her shoulder, listened some more, then started walking again a little faster. He followed, speeding up slightly. She seemed to hear something, abruptly looking over her shoulder at him with wide eyes. With a shriek of terror she suddenly bolted, making him curse under his breath and give chase. The girl was surprisingly fast but with those shoes it was a foregone conclusion. Overtaking her he grabbed her by the shoulder, spinning her around and grabbing her other arm, squeezing unmercifully. She screamed.

"Shut up, bitch!" he snarled, reaching into his pocket and removing the knife, flicking the sheath off onto the ground with a quick flip of his wrist. He held the blade up to her eyes. "Or I'll cut your tongue out." With a gasp of fear she went completely still, staring at him in horror. Satisfied, he stepped back. "Don't move. We already know I'm faster than you." Keeping one eye on her in case she tried anything, Shigeo quickly knelt and picked up the sheath, putting it in his belt, then grabbed the girl again, who seemed almost catatonic with fear. "Come on. Time for fun." He started dragging her back towards the maintenance shed, which seemed to spark some resistance, as she began struggling and crying.

Once more he thrust the knife at her, snarling in anger. When she only struggled harder he sighed and prodded her in the ribs with the tip, not pressing too hard as he knew from past experience how easily the dagger could penetrate flesh. He didn't want to kill her before he had his fun. Necrophilia was sick.

She stopped struggling instantly, making him smile. "That's it, little girl. You stay quiet and we can get this done soon. Come on, let's go." This time she offered little resistance. Pulling her over to the shed he opened the door, pushing her inside, then followed, closing the door behind him. There was a long silence, before the screaming started.

Any witnesses would have been surprised by the tone of the screams, which sounded wrong. They would have been more surprised when the door burst open and Shigeo, jeans around his ankles, scrambled out backwards on his rear, staring in total horror into the shed, which was illuminated a leaf green colour from inside. "Get away!" he shouted in complete terror. "What are you?" Sliding backwards he managed to get to his feet, hopping and stumbling, until he kicked his jeans off and sprinted away, naked below the waist except for his boots, which somehow in his terror he'd managed to pull through the legs of his jeans. What followed him out of the shed wasn't the young woman he'd taken inside, except in part, as she had not possessed nearly as many tentacles, or teeth that size, never mind the glowing red eyes. The thing laughed in the voice of an amused young woman and ran after him, surrounded by a green aura.

"Shigeo, love, come back! We only just started! Shigeo!" He screamed and ran faster. How did it know his name? What the hell was it? Charging past several students who watched in bemusement as a terrified half-naked man ran by, he looked frantically around for some avenue of escape. Somehow, he had to evade that thing and get back to his bike.

'A demon. It has to be a demon,' he thought as he ran. 'I thought those things stayed in Minato. Why is it here?' A call of Shigeo! came from somewhere behind, making him dart to the left and run as fast as he could, summoning up reserves of strength he didn't realise he possessed. Pelting past the library he headed for the business school, which would then leave him with a clear path to where he'd left the bike. Just as he went around the right side of the library building, two women walked out of the entrance and across his path, nearly making him run into them. They stared at him, then smiled horribly, and changed. Shigeo gaped, urine spattering his boots, before he screamed in a voice that would have done a tortured soul proud and ran like the wind, his heart hammering in his ears.

Three cries of Shigeo! went up behind him, making him nearly lose control of his bowels as well as his bladder. Three glowing things chased him, green, orange, and purple auras flaming.

Lights were coming on in the dormitories as students looked out their windows to see what was going on, what with all the screaming and so forth. They gaped at the sight, talking amongst themselves, wondering what on earth was happening.

By the time he reached his bike, there were seven of the unholy creatures hot on his tail. Panting, exhausted, terrified, and covered in his own bodily fluids, he staggered around the corner of the alley and headed towards his bike, his keys in his hand, luckily having been in the pocket of his jacket which by some miracle he was still wearing. He thought he might have lost them, at least temporarily, as he hadn't heard one of them call out for a few minutes. Moments before he reached his bike he suddenly hit something that bounced him onto his back on the ground, rolling around in agony as he held his nose.

"What the fuck?" he almost cried. This was too much. Crawling towards the bike, his pride and joy, he found he couldn't approach closer than a couple of metres. Some invisible wall prevented it. Hammering on it and shrieking obscenities, he didn't hear the footsteps behind him until the voice spoke.

"Hello, Shigeo Yasuhiro. You've been a very bad person." Jumping to his feet with a yell, he whirled as fast as he could in his exhausted state. Behind him was standing a young woman with silver hair, wearing a long black leather coat. Arrayed behind her were six of the slavering monsters, tentacles reaching out for him. He fainted.

When he came around, he saw she was still standing there looking at him expressionlessly, although the things were gone. She took a step forward. "That was quite rude. You upset my friends. You really don't want to do that."

"Who... are you?" Shigeo gasped out, feeling like the entirety of the world as he knew it had been pulled out from under him in the last half hour.

"I'm someone who does not like rapists. I'm someone who will make your life a living hell unless you confess everything to the police. Everything. Do you understand me? I know about what you did to Naomi. I know about what you did to Akemi. I know about what you tried to do to Sora. I even know about the little mementoes you have in that locked box hidden under the floorboards at the back of your spare bedroom closet. You will confess, and you will accept what happens, or I and my friends will visit you again. Over and over. Forever." By the time she stopped talking he had soiled himself again. There was something in the way she spoke that made him believe every word.

"Trust me, you don't want to make me do that. Or my friends. They're much worse than I am. So much worse..." She smiled, which was the most horrifying thing he'd ever seen.

"Stand up." He did, after some effort. "Turn around." Once more he followed the instructions without any thought of disobedience. A strong slippery something wrapped itself around his throat, while two more held his arms out to the sides. He gibbered in terror, knowing they belonged to nothing human. "I think, as a gesture of how serious I am, you should watch your bike very carefully." The voice was so cold he could literally feel the chill around his feet. Staring at his prized motorcycle, he saw a glowing yellow sphere of energy fade into view around it, at the point he'd hit something invisible. It slowly began to contract.
As it contacted the bike, there were some crunching noises. They continued steadily as the sphere of energy shrank slowly, crushing the bike smaller and smaller. The woman, or whatever she was, behind him, spoke in a cold conversational tone as he stared in disbelief. "This could easily be you. Think about that. Think long and hard, then decide how you will spend the rest of your life. However long that is." By now the remains of the bike were a spherical mass of metal and plastic only half a metre or so across. The golden sphere stopped contracting, there was a pause, then a marble-sized ball of bright green light came past his left shoulder with a whine, entering the larger golden ball, which erupted into a brilliant flash of light with a bass thump like the footfall of a god. When he could see again there was nothing left except a glowing spot on the ground.

"Good-bye, Shigeo Yasuhiro. Pray we never meet again." The world flickered and he suddenly felt sicker than he'd ever felt in his life. Dropping to his knees he puked until he thought his colon would come up. Dimly heard voices eventually resolved into someone asking him if he was all right. He looked up, tears in his eyes, to see a pair of policemen staring at him in shock. Behind them was the Setagaya district main police station.

Corporal Yonai was very surprised when the half-naked man who they had just found in front of the station, looking like he'd been thrown out of hell for being too filthy, fell prone and clasped his feet. He exchanged a glance with his colleague. He was more surprised when the man shrieked, "Please arrest me! Please! I raped seven women and tried to kill the last one. Don't let them get me. The monsters, keep them away. Please..." He trailed off into incoherent whimpers. The corporal looked up, feeling something out of place, to see the figure of a woman with silver hair standing on the roof of the parking structure across the road, smiling in a peculiar manner, her long coat rippling around her in the wind. Turning to his companion, he opened his mouth to say something, then shook his head.

When he looked back, the woman was gone.

When they appeared in the middle of the practice room in the apartment building, six people stared at the seventh one in silent wonder for a long few seconds. Nabiki looked back, smiling slightly. "What?" she asked, amused. Ranma glanced at Kasumi, who shrugged a little. Walking over to the middle sister, he put his hands on her shoulders, looked at her for a moment, then hugged her hard.

"I'm so proud."

She giggled, pushing him away. "Idiot."

"That was absolutely brilliant. Better than anything I've come up with so far. I can do the terror part pretty damn well, but the psychological warfare...? I bow before the master." He did precisely that, followed a moment later by the others. Misaki spoiled it by laughing. Shortly they were all screaming with laughter, leaning against each other.

"How the hell did you think of that?" Fumiko asked, when they finally recovered.

"I used to read horror stories when I was young," Nabiki said, grinning. "Lovecraft, King, Smith, lots of them. It probably had an unhealthy affect on my impressionable mind." This set them off again.

"Kas has done some pretty awesome things with the illusion, so have I, but what you came up with was incredible." Ranma shook his head, sitting cross-legged on the floor, while inspecting Nabiki admiringly. "I'm going to have to remember that. I bet I can top it with some work." He grinned. Kasumi laughed.
"She's going to be very good when she manages to work it on her own. We may have created a monster."

"We created seven of them earlier. Shigeo seemed impressed."

"That's one way to put it." Nabiki laughed. "I have a feeling that he's not likely to re-offend. Ever." She got up, smiling to herself. "That was more fun than I thought it would be. Thanks for all the help, you guys. I couldn't have done it without you."

"No problem, Nabs, any time, you know that." Ranma smiled at her. The others added similar sentiments.

"Don't..." she began.

"Call her Nabs," everyone else chorused, then broke down laughing once more. She watched her extended family with admiration and pride.

"...Yasuhiro has confessed to seven serious sexual assaults, attempted murder, carrying an offensive weapon without a permit, and possession of narcotics. Charges have been laid against him for all of these offences, but the date for a trial has not yet been established as he is currently undergoing a psychiatric examination to determine his competence to stand trial. Sources indicate that while there is little doubt that he did indeed commit these crimes due to plentiful evidence found both on his person and at his residence, he appears to be in a fragile mental state and may not be fit to stand trial for some time."

"The same sources tell us that he claims to have been chased for a considerable time around the Nihon University campus by up to seven horrible tentacled monsters from hell, led by a demon queen, which, while a colourful quotation, does not seem to be backed up by any evidence. There was a disturbance on the campus at approximately half past two this morning, with multiple witnesses stating they saw Mr Yasuhiro running, screaming, through the middle of the university grounds, but there is no clear description of what, if anything, was chasing him. Police have asked their counterparts in Minato to enquire if any of the magical girl groups could possibly look into the possibility of demonic involvement, as the apparent local Setagaya magical girl, Azumi Ito, could not be contacted." Nabiki giggled furiously as she watched the local news on her internal viewer, making a couple of students near her look at her with odd expressions.

"Sergeant Tetsuo Harada, who is the unofficial magical girl liaison officer for a large part of the ward of Minato, has told us that he requested the help of Yori and Chou, two magical girls who have something of a reputation for troubleshooting unusual problems, having even helped the governments of the UK and Canada in recent months. They investigated and he passed on their message that they could find no evidence of demon activity in the area. Citizens can rest easily knowing that they are safe." This caused her to almost slide out of her seat with hilarity, trying desperately to keep the laughter quiet, although the lecturer glared at her. Miki looked over with some concern, her friend had been acting oddly all day, although at least she seemed in a much better mood than had been the case the last few days.

"Miss Naomi Okuma, a student at the university and the last victim of Mr Yasuhiro, left hospital today after making a miraculous recovery from the serious stab wounds she received during the assault. Her parents returned early from a vacation in New Zealand to be with her last night. Mr Okuma has praised the hospital for their remarkable work, although Doctor Shinko, the surgeon in charge of her case, has expressed considerable puzzlement about how quickly she seems to have healed. Multiple tests to determine the reason have been inconclusive."
Reports of a loud explosion on a street to the north of the campus have been put down to students with a large firework. Police say they found no evidence that could be used to charge anyone, and that it was unconnected with the Yasuhiro case. Still giggling, Nabiki turned the TV feed off as the reporter went on to a story about some technology company going into administration. Turning her attention back to the final class of the semester, she grinned as the lecturer handed out the results of their last test, on which she had topped the class, Miki coming second. She was in an extremely good mood. Leaving the class with the other students, she waited for the other woman to join her.

"What the hell was so funny in there, Nabiki?" Miki asked when they'd made their escape from the building. Nabiki chuckled.

"It's kind of hard to explain. Maybe one day I can tell you, but for now, just take my word that something really damn funny happened to me recently. She shook her head, grinning. Miki looked at her, sighed a little, then smiled.

"At least you're in a better mood. I was getting a little worried." Nabiki, in an expansive frame of mind, put her arm around her friend and smiled back.

"Thank you, Miki. You're a good person. I'm glad we've become friends after all this time."

"So am I." The other woman waved to her boyfriend, who was leaning against a lamp-post waiting for them fifty metres away.

"Hi, Miki. And Nabiki, as well. How did your test go?" He grinned at them.

"Very well. I came second and Nabiki came first, of course." His girlfriend put her arms around him and kissed him while the middle sister watched, smiling. "Although she did go insane during the last part of the lecture and start laughing like an idiot." Miki glanced at her friend with a sly smile. "Yes, like that." John watched them with amusement.

"I wasn't insane, merely very amused," Nabiki replied haughtily, her nose in the air, then giggled. "Sorry. I didn't mean to worry you."

"Well, you seem in a good mood, which I suppose is worth a little temporary craziness," John said, grinning. "Come on. Let's get our last pizza for this term. My treat." They headed off to the restaurant, laughing and talking together.

"I heard that they caught that rapist last night," Miki said, as she finished a medium pepperoni pizza with extra tuna. "Or, more accurately, he turned himself in. He seems to have had a breakdown of some sort. Guilt, perhaps."

John looked pleased as well as irritated. "Serves the fucker right. Pity that Azumi girl didn't get to him first, though, she could have sorted him out, I'm sure. Toru told me in stats class that people saw her looking around in the park the other day where that other girl got attacked, the one that got away. I guess she was looking for clues." He shook his head in wonder. "She apparently dropped off the roof of the computer studies building and just walked away when she landed! That's about twelve or thirteen metres. A normal person would be pulp after a fall like that."

"Magical girls are magical," Miki replied, listening with interest. "One day I have to get her autograph. She's amazing." Nabiki chuckled.

"Obsessing again, Miki." Her friend giggled at her.

"I can't help it. Keep an eye out for other magical girls when you're with your friends. You seem to have a knack for getting them to sign things." Rolling her eyes, Nabiki laughed again.

"I keep telling you, I only know a couple of them, vaguely. It's not like my phone has all their numbers." Internally she was giggling again. It was true, the SI had the numbers. "But I'll keep an eye open. Just in case."

When they finished the meal, the three of them left the restaurant, grouping on the street outside and looking at each other. "I'll miss you, Nabiki," Miki said suddenly, stepping forward and hugging her friend. "Take care of yourself, and I'll see you in a couple of months." The middle Tendo smiled, hugging the other girl back, then doing the same to John.

"Same to you guys. Have fun travelling, send me a post card if you go anywhere interesting. And take photos."

"We will." He looked at her fondly. "I hope you have fun with your friends. Are you going back to Nerima first?"

"I'm going to stay with Rika and Maiko for a day or to to unwind, then go home for a week, then we're off. Perhaps a month or so, I think. It's going to be fun." Stepping back, she smiled at them both. "See you around." She waved, as they turned and walked towards the dormitory, before heading in the other direction. When it was apparent she wasn't being observed, she called Aiko, who appeared moments later next to her.

"Hi, Nabiki. I saw the news report, it was pretty funny. Ready to go?"

"I think so. I packed everything into the ki pocket this morning." Nodding, the short brunette led the way into an alley, which erupted into a flash of light.

"Oh, my god," Captain Uehara said quietly, looking at the thing on her desk. "Is it real?"

"Yes. There's a certificate of authenticity with it." Sergeant Harada was also inspecting it curiously. "I have no idea how much it's worth other than 'one hell of a lot.'"

"If it really is an original it's probably priceless." The captain shook her head in admiration. "I hope they appreciate it."

"They will. I think Chou probably knows more about this sort of thing than most people. Yori, I don't know, but she always surprises me."

"Have you called them?" The sergeant nodded.

"Yes. They were in the middle of something, but said they'd be over soon. Any moment now, I'd think." Ten minutes later there was a knock on the door, which opened to reveal Yori, Chou, and Azumi.

"Hello, Sergeant. Captain. You said you wanted to see us, Sergeant?" Yori stepped into the room with the other two girls. Chou immediately stopped, staring at the Captain's desk with her eyebrows raised to the point they disappeared into her hair.

"Is that...?" She moved closer, bending over the desk. "It is! It's real." One slender finger came out, not quite touching it, then moved back. "Where did this come from?" Harada watched her, grinning.

"Agent Naito sent it over this morning. It was sent to him by Sara Whitworth, the former Mrs
"It's nice, but why is this such a shock?" she asked curiously, looking around at the various people in the room. Chou glanced at her, then at the desk, on which sat an obviously very old scroll that covered most of the surface.

"That is an original Ike No Taiga painting, dating from approximately 1760. It's nearly two hundred and fifty years old. There are ones like it in museums all over the world. I'd say this is a precursor to one called 'True View of Mount Asama', which is in a private collection and is nearly priceless. Several of his works are national treasures. It's difficult to even think of a value for something like this." She looked at Harada. "We can't accept this. It should be in a museum."

He smiled. "Mrs Whitworth insisted that it be given to you. She sent a covering letter with it." He handed the envelope to her. She opened it and pulled out the contents, reading them quickly, handing each sheet to Yori as she finished it. When they had both read the letter they looked at each other for some time. "What you do with it is up to you, of course. You could donate it to a museum if you want, I suppose she wouldn't mind, especially as she has already done that with several other valuable works her former husband acquired, but she did say she wanted you to have it."

Chou stared at the painting for a long time. Eventually she smiled. "We'll look after it very carefully," she said reverently, gently touching one corner of the ancient paper. With one last glance at it she rolled it up delicately, slipping it into the shipping tube Harada handed her. The tube vanished to wherever she kept things, making him sure it was safer now than in any museum in the world. "Thank you, Sergeant. Very much." He grinned.

"I didn't do anything. Thank Mrs Whitworth."

"We will, trust me."

"I do." They smiled at each other. Captain Uehara cleared her throat, making them look at her.

"Right, if that's over, could you all go away and leave my office to me?" she asked, although she was smiling. "I have a lot of work to do."

"Of course, Captain. It was nice to see you again." Chou bowed a little, smiling, then followed the Sergeant out of the office. Yori waved, grinning, leaving with Azumi, pulling the door shut behind her. Captain Uehara laughed softly to herself, shaking her head, as she reached for the next report.

"Magical girls. So strange."

Seven pairs of eyes inspected the painting hanging on the wall of the practice room, right in the middle, opposite the windows overlooking the park. "It's beautiful," Aiko finally said. Kasumi nodded slowly.

"It is. Such a wonderful, thoughtful gift."

"It's safer than any painting anywhere else in the world. I put a preservation spell on it and linked it into the ward system. You couldn't damage it with an anti-tank missile now. I'm not taking any chances with it. It's been entrusted to us, we need to look after it for future generations." Ranma put his arm around her, smiling tenderly.

"It will be safe here. Perhaps we can also lend it to museums occasionally, so other people can appreciate it. It's been locked up in a private collection for fifty years, it's time it was seen more widely." His wife nodded, leaning against him. They studied it in wordless contemplation for some time, then went for lunch.

Akane grinned triumphantly. In her hands, still smoking slightly, were a couple of dozen chestnuts, nicely roasted. Her hands were essentially unblemished even though she had grabbed the nuts from the fire while it was blazing, moving so fast it didn't have time to burn her. Shampoo had managed the task some twenty minutes earlier. They looked at each other, while Cologne nodded approvingly. "Took you long enough, but you got there in the end. The boy got it faster, but he was remarkable." She chuckled. "To be honest, it took me nearly as long as it did you, Shampoo. And I was pretty fast at learning when I was your age. All right. Do it again."

Their grins vanished and the two girls sighed, reaching for the bag of fresh chestnuts, as Cologne cackled and threw some more fuel on the fire.
"She seems to be getting quite good," Nabiki said to Genma, who was standing watching Akane and Shampoo spar, as were the afternoon class of advanced students. They were taking bets on which of the girls would win their match. The martial artist nodded slowly, intently inspecting the two young women as they bounded around the yard.

"She is indeed. I'm very impressed how your sister has turned her life around in the last year. Since those two magical girls fixed her... brain parasites," he still had difficulty saying that phrase, looking somewhat disgusted, "she really has come on much further than I would have expected." He looked at her for a moment. "I understand from Soun that you are going travelling with those two friends of yours in a few days. Going anywhere interesting?"

"I think it will be interesting, yes. They're going to visit an old family friend and invited me along. I've met them before, nice people. Then, perhaps go somewhere else for a while. We're going to play it by ear. I expect to be back in three to four weeks." She smiled at him, making him look slightly nervous. "Don't do anything silly while I'm gone."

"I am more than twenty years older than you, Nabiki," he replied, seeming slightly offended. "I would hope that by now I knew how to live my life without doing anything silly." She laughed gently.

"So would I." While he was rolling that around in his head, sure he'd somehow been disparaged but not quite sure how, she nodded to him, took one last look at her sister and the Amazon, who seemed to be heading to a tie, then went back into the house. Genma followed her with his eyes for a moment then shrugged and went back to watching the two women fight.

Entering the kitchen the middle sister smiled at Nodoka, who was preparing a late lunch. "Would you like some help, Auntie?"

"That's not necessary, Nabiki, but thank you anyway. I'm nearly done. You could set the table, though, if you wouldn't mind."

"Of course." Quickly and efficiently performing the task, she was soon done.

"Thank you, dear. It will be about five minutes. Would you like to call the others?" As she spoke, there was a knock on the door. They exchanged glances then laughed. "Or you could see who that is." Grinning, Nabiki headed to the front of the house, opening the door to find Ukyo and Konatsu standing there looking pleased, yet slightly nervous.

"Hi, Ukyo, Konatsu, how are you two? I haven't seen you for weeks. Sorry about that, I seem to be busy all the time. Come in." She stepped aside and waved them inside. "We're just about to have lunch. Care to join us? I think Auntie made enough."

"If it's no trouble, Nabiki," Konatsu said quietly. "We wouldn't want to be a bother, we can come back later."

"It's no trouble. Come on, let's go into the living room." She led the pair inside where Nodoka was placing food on the table. The older woman looked up and smiled at the sight of the okonomiyaki chef and the male kunoichi.
"Hello, you two. How nice to see you."

"Thank you, Nodoka," Ukyo said, uncharacteristically quiet. She was normally a very confident and outgoing woman but at the moment she looked positively shy. The elder Saotome woman looked at her curiously.

"Would you like to stay for lunch?" she asked. They both nodded. Nabiki was already setting two extra places. "Sit, please." Both of the visitors sat down, while Nabiki called out into the yard for the others. Moments later Soun came in, followed by Akane and Shampoo. Genma arrived a little later having dismissed the class for an hour's break. They all looked surprised to see the two sitting at the table, but all welcomed them.

"Hi, Ukyo," Akane said, grinning at the long-haired brunette. "Sorry I haven't been around much the last few weeks, I've been with Shampoo all my free time learning and practising. We were saying just the other day we should stop by and say hello, and get some okonomiyaki."

"Please do," Ukyo replied, smiling back. She glanced at Konatsu, who made a slight nod back. Looking around at the other occupants of the room, she took a deep breath. "Konatsu and I are getting married." There was dead silence for several seconds. Eventually, Nabiki grinned.

"I thought that would happen eventually. Congratulations." With the sound of her voice, the floodgates opened, a babble of voices coming from everyone else there. While they were talking, she quickly commed both Ranma and Kasumi, allowing them to watch and listen in on the proceedings, then waved her hands. "Quiet, you guys. Let them speak." Ukyo smiled thankfully at her.

"We wanted you all to know first. Even my father hasn't been told yet." She looked at Nodoka. "Mrs Saotome, we were hoping you might be able to help us arrange everything. Neither one of us knows much about it, and we don't really have anyone to ask. My father is... difficult, and Konatsu doesn't have anyone he trusts." Nodoka looked very surprised, but after a moment smiled broadly.

"My dear, I would be honoured to help. Do you have a date and a location in mind?" The two visitors looked at each other again. Ukyo held Konatsu's hand.

"As soon as possible. I know it will take a while to get everything ready though, so we were thinking perhaps about six weeks from now?" She looked at her intended, who nodded. "We haven't thought of somewhere yet. That's one thing we'd like some help with." Nodoka nodded thoughtfully.

"Six weeks is tight, I think, but it should be possible. We'll have to give a suitable location some thought." She pondered the thought for a few more moments. "I'm sure between us we can come up with a nice location. You want your marriage to be something memorable." Looking around, she waved at the table. "Come on, let's eat, and discuss it." They all sat and began eating, Akane and Shampoo talking happily to the couple while Nodoka served, clearly thinking carefully about the task in front of her. Genma and Soun were discussing the whole thing quietly, while Nabiki watched and listened.

"How nice for them," Kasumi said to her. "I wish we could attend. I've always liked both Ukyo and Konatsu."

"It's a shame, I agree, but it would be difficult I think." Ranma chuckled slightly sadly. "Of all the people still in Nerima I kind of miss Ukyo. I've known her for a long time. Konatsu is a good man, though, he'll look after her and she him. I think they'll be very happy."
"I'm slightly surprised there was no announcement of an engagement for a while first, but I guess they may well have kept that quiet," Nabiki replied, watching as Shampoo hugged Ukyo, looking very pleased for her. "It's weird, I knew this was pretty likely to happen at some point, but looking at the three women who were chasing you so hard for years together like that is... odd." The martial artist laughed inside her head.

"You're telling me? It's damn surreal! But I'm glad for them."

"Did you tell Nodoka about when 'Yori' and 'Chou' said they could come for an afternoon, sister?" Kasumi asked, sounding amused.

"Not yet. I was going to at lunch, but this seems to have become more important. I'll tell her later. Right after we get back, correct?"

"Yes. I think that would probably be best. The weather will be nice, hopefully nothing serious will be going on, and it means we have time before we go to arrange for people to cover for us while we're away. We leave in four days, it would be a little complicated to get away before we go."

"OK. Pity the others can't come as a group."

"Unfortunately we can't simply remove six of the most effective community defenders for three weeks all at the same time, it would leave our areas under protected. Tamiko and Fumiko will come for the second week, then swap with Aiko and Misaki for the third. We can get back quickly if something critical happens, but we still need someone on the ground to hold everything until we could return."

"I've talked to some other groups I trust, not that there are all that many. "Ranma sighed a little. "But there are some. One or two are very competent. They'll be on standby in case the girls need help, but I don't expect it to get that bad. There are a few mages around who could help out in a pinch as well, and one or two demons I'll ask. Minato will be safe enough from external threats, but if something odd happens, the internal damage could be... interesting... to say the least. Some of the people I trust to help like us, but not each other. Life can be pretty complicated around Minato sometimes." Both Tendo sisters giggled.

"This would be a lot easier if we worked in an office or something," Nabiki said with an internal grin. He snickered a bit.

"Probably. But not as much fun."

"Uthryyl has taken some time off from his business as well, to match when we'll be there. He sounded quite pleased about that. Apparently he hasn't had a vacation in twelve years. We're a convenient excuse, I think." Kasumi sounded like she found this very funny. "He said he knows some very interesting places that we would find fun. Some on his world, some on others. His people do a lot of portal travelling so we could end up almost anywhere. Bring your camera and lots of film."

"I'll buy a few dozen rolls tomorrow. I got a nice medium format Pentax SLR the other day, it was just released. I've been wanting to try it out. The thing is heavy and pretty damn big but the images are amazing."

"In a few years you'll probably find it's obsolete, what with the way those new digital cameras are starting to come out with good results." Ranma sounded interested. "I've seen some quite impressive ones recently."
They're still a long way off film resolution and colour quality," the middle sister replied. "It's going to be quite a while before they can beat a six by seven medium format slide for quality." She paused, then asked curiously, "I just thought of something, do portals cause problems with film?"

"No. They don't seem to really affect anything. Some really sensitive electronics apparently get a little upset, but only for a while. They're safe."

"Good. It would be annoying to come back with loads of film that didn't work." She finished her meal, pushing the plate to one side and picking up her cup of tea, while half-listening to the conversation that the rest of the people around the table were having. "I should probably get back to talking to everyone before they think something is wrong. I'll let you know what happens about all of this, OK?"

"Thanks, Nabiki. Talk later."

"Goodbye, sister." Both of them disconnected. Nabiki redirected her full attention back to the conversation in front of her.

"I think the first thing to do is to work out a list of people you want to invite, Ukyo," Nodoka said, making notes on a pad she had retrieved from the book-case in the corner. "Once we have that we can pick a location the right size and look into everything else. I don't know if you want to hire something spectacular or just make it quiet." Ukyo and Konatsu looked at each other.

"We were thinking, fairly quiet, but nice. Somewhere up in the mountains, perhaps. As far as people, well, all of you, obviously. Cologne and Mousse, I suppose, I've had my problems with them but I still think they're basically good people." Shampoo looked pleased, as Akane giggled. "Um, Sayuri, Hiroshi, my father, the waitresses from the restaurant, my grandmother..." she was ticking names off on her fingers. Nodoka wrote them all down. Konatsu added a couple as well. By the time they were finished, the pad had about thirty names on it. Looking over it the elder Saotome woman smiled.

"This isn't too bad at all. Fairly small, which makes it easier. And cheaper." Ukyo laughed.

"We can afford it. The restaurant is doing pretty well and we've been saving up for quite a while now." She smiled at her fiancé. "This has been building for some time." Nabiki looked at them, amused, she'd suspected as much for a couple of years.

"I'm very pleased for you both," she said. Raising her teacup she grinned. "A toast to the happy couple." Everyone laughed and followed suit. "I'll be back by then. Don't get married until I am, OK?" This led to them asking where she was going, then how her life was doing, and Akane's training, which took up a large amount of the afternoon in explanations amid considerable good humour.

Later that night she helped Nodoka clear up after dinner. "I'm very pleased for Ukyo and Konatsu," Nodoka said, closing the door to the dishwasher and turning it on. "And honoured that they would ask me to help. I hope I can do them proud."

"I've got no doubt about it, Auntie," Nabiki replied, smiling. "I'm sure it will work out well. I'm glad it will happen after I get back, I wouldn't want to miss it." Wiping the counter down she glanced at the older woman. "Oh, by the way, I managed to contact Yori." Nodoka turned and looked interested. "She was quite pleased about the invitation. Unfortunately she and Chou are very busy at the moment, so they don't have any spare time for around a month, but after that she said they'd be very happy to come over for an afternoon some time. It works out well, I'll be back
"Ah, very good. I'll have to work out a menu. We can pick a date closer to the end of the month. I suppose we'll probably be into August then, perhaps the first week. It will be quite hot, but we could put up some big sun umbrellas for shade in the garden." The older woman thought for a moment. "Yes, it should work out very nicely." Glancing at Nabiki who was just putting the saucepans away, she added, "Perhaps you'd like to invite Rika and Maiko as well?"

The middle Tendo didn't miss a beat, having expected something like this to come up sooner or later. "I'll ask them, certainly. After we get back I think they were going to visit their families, though, so they may not be able to make it."

"All right. It would be lovely if they could but that time of year is always difficult, everyone is trying to do different things. Did Yori say whether her friends would be able to come as well?"

"She thinks they can. They'll let us know later. I think magical girls are a little like doctors, always on call, though, so you never know if some of them might need to suddenly leave." Nodoka smiled, laughing gently.

"Yes, I understand. Those ones more than most if everything I've seen on the television over the last few months is to be believed." She shook her head in wonder. "Such remarkable young ladies. I'm very glad to have met them."

Cologne grinned as she spotted Nabiki walking towards her down the street carrying a back-pack in one hand. "Hello, Nabiki Tendo. I understand you're off to see the world." The middle sister laughed at the comment.

"Not quite, Elder, it's only a three week trip, maybe four, but I think it's going to be a lot of fun."

"Heading to the station, I suppose?" the Amazon enquired, falling in beside the brunette. Nabiki nodded.

"Yes. I'm meeting Rika and Maiko in a couple of hours, we're staying overnight at their apartment, then leaving first thing in the morning." She glanced at the ancient woman. "Akane seems to be very pleased with the special techniques you've taught her. She keeps playing with the speed techniques, seeing what she can use them for." Giggling for a moment, she added, "I wouldn't recommend brushing your teeth with that method. It's quick, but the friction burns seemed painful." Cologne stared, then nearly fell off her staff with laughter.

"Oh dear," she said weakly when she'd recovered. "I've never heard of that one before. New students always push their limits but that's... different." They grinned at each other. "Your sister has become a good student. I do wish we could have laid hands on her some years earlier, she could have been exceptional, I suspect, but she's still likely to become very good. More slowly than certain people we both knew, and nothing like as good as that, but then, no one is. She actually beat Shampoo fair and square the other day, which impresses me considerably. My great-granddaughter is very skilled even if a little rusty."

"That is impressive." Nabiki smiled slightly. "I've watched them sparring and even I can tell she's gotten much better. But I also know how good Shampoo is. I'd never have thought a year ago that Akane would ever be able to take her on without being in one of her funny moods."

"Neither would I, I admit. I'm pleased to be proven wrong. She's pushing Shampoo to improve as well, which is very satisfying. One day I think it might be in her best interests to spend some time in our village, there are things she could learn there that may well stand her in good stead."
Cologne fell silent while Nabiki shot her a curious side glance. That certainly wasn't something she'd expected to hear. The old woman almost sounded like she was actually fond of her sister.

"Elder, if you don't mind me asking, what is the situation with the Amazons?" She was very curious, even having learned over the years that Cologne, Shampoo, and Mousse seemed to prefer Japan to China. "I know you're the ranking elder there, but you've stayed here all these years, even after Ranma vanished. Shampoo told me some of why she and Mousse seem to like it here, but I've always wondered..."

Cologne was silent for a few more meters, although she was smiling very faintly. "It's complicated, Nabiki, like everything to do with my people. I love and am loyal to my village, but I have to admit that I was getting very irritated with them before the first time Ranma showed up. Some of the ruling council are... far more difficult than I'd like. Being several thousand kilometres away is a positive relief." She looked at the woman beside her. "Not that I said that, of course."

Nabiki giggled and shook her head. "Said what, Elder?" Smiling, Cologne nodded.

"Exactly." She paused for a moment. "I came to rather enjoy Japan, or more specifically, Nerima.
It's a pleasantly insane place that reminds me of some of the things I got up to when I was a lot younger. The modern world is so different from what it was when I was growing up, even taking into account the cultural differences, but at the same time it's a lot of fun. It makes me feel young again." She cackled for a moment. "Like I was a mere hundred and fifty years old."

Stopping for a moment, Nabiki studied the ancient woman, then grinned. "I hope I even make it to your age, never mind manage to be so active." Laughing, she resumed walking.

"Now that the boy has been missing for close to five years, there have been a few people on the council who said I should go back, but several more who want me to keep looking." Cologne sighed a little, while Nabiki listened to the very rare event of the old woman opening up. Unique, in fact, in her experience. "I'm just as happy to stay here for the moment, although to be honest, as you did some time ago, I've stopped actively trying to find him. If he hasn't turned up by now with all the resources we both brought to bear, he won't, except possibly either by accident or of his own accord. Assuming he's even still alive, I hope he is, I admit. Despite being a nuisance I rather liked him. I've never met anyone who could learn like he could." She sighed again. "I made some bad mistakes all those years ago. We all did. I wish we had done otherwise, things might have turned out very differently, but it's far too late now. Oh well."

"If he did by some miracle appear some day what would you and your people do?" Nabiki asked, knowing it was a slight risk but desperately curious to find out directly from the source. Cologne didn't reply for some time.

"I don't know. If it was just me, I might well just wish him all the best. Looking back on it I can see how badly he was treated. It was not honourable, our intentions were... selfish, I suppose. But, it's not just me. Shampoo is still, deep down, somewhat obsessed with him. Several in the village would try anything if they thought they could get him, I fear, although after that night..." She trailed off, looking worried. "I fear that would be a bad mistake." Nabiki nodded, sighing.

"That's more or less what I thought. Thank you for being honest with me, Cologne. It's something I've wondered about for a long time."

"You've matured well, Nabiki. You do your family proud." The Elder stopped, looking at the Metro station fifty metres away, then the brunette woman. "Have fun on your travels. Take care, I expect I'll see you on your return." With a nod, she bounded away, leaving Nabiki to enter the "Interesting," Ranma said slowly, going through a kata with his wife, while Nabiki stood with her back to them, admiring the painting on the wall again. She eventually turned to the pair.

"Isn't it? I've never seen her that chatty. She's changed as much as anyone. Teaching Akane seems to have given her something to do she missed in some way. I think she really did like you, you know, despite everything." He sighed, folding into a position that still made her wince to watch.

"To be honest in some ways I liked her as well. Not as a friend, like you and the girls, or Uthryyl, more like a respected teacher. And I do respect her. I may have a hell of a lot more power and know a lot of things she doesn't, but there's no denying she's still got the best part of three hundred years on me. You learn an awful lot of things over that sort of time." He snickered a little.

"I can't say I miss her all that much, she was a pain in the ass at the best of times, but like she said, I wish things had been handled differently. I think, if it hadn't been for the whole Shampoo thing, learning from her would have been a real joy. Except for the pain..." Kasumi giggled, glancing at him, then blurred into a high-speed exercise with no warning, making him grin and respond. Shaking her head in amazement at how phenomenally good they were, inwardly sure she'd never be anywhere near capable of even a fraction of it, Nabiki watched for a while, before heading up to the roof garden to enjoy the evening.

Feeling a familiar ki signature in the undergrowth, she made her way to where Tamiko was sitting on a bench looking out over the city with a smile on her face. The auburn-haired girl glanced at her then went back to staring out over the roof-tops. "Hi, Nabiki," she said quietly.

"Hi. You look pleased."

"Not so much pleased as content. I was just thinking back on the last year or so, thinking how much everything has changed. You finding Ranma and Kasumi, all of us moving in here, the demon bombs, that sort of thing. Big changes in a small amount of time." The middle sister nodded slowly, gazing out over Tokyo with her friend.

"Too big?"

"No. Not at all. Almost everything that happened is something I wouldn't have any other way. I think that goes for all of us. I could have done without Halleckton and those fucking portal bombs, but even there we met some very nice people and did things I, personally, am rather proud of. Meeting you is something I'm extremely pleased about as well, as is you joining our insane lifestyle." She grinned at her friend. "All the extra training, the way we seem to have integrated into the same group, I love it. Like you said a while ago, and Ranma has said, we're a family. But every now and then it kind of shoves itself in my face, so I have to think about it for a while."

Nabiki sat for a while, thinking about the other woman's words. Eventually she stirred. "I understand. I feel the same way sometimes. There have been times I woke up in the middle of the night wondering, 'What the fuck am I doing?' She giggled a little, sounding almost worried. "It still hits me on occasion. When we got back from Canada was the worst. Took me two weeks to decide whether I should just run like hell, or stay. I knew if I stayed, that was it. It was the only chance I'd ever get to back out." She shrugged. "I stayed. No regrets, not really. Like you said, there are good and bad points, but the good ones far outweigh the bad ones. If I fell over dead tomorrow, I'd have no regrets about the last year."
"Hopefully that's not going to happen," Tamiko giggled.

"It would be an awkward start to a holiday," Nabiki agreed with a grin. Her friend looked at her, then put her arm around her shoulders and hugged her for a moment.

"I'm very glad to have met you, my sister. Let's go swimming. The others will be up later."

"So, what's the plan?" Nabiki asked Kasumi, as they lay in the shallow end watching their friends swimming around and talking. "When do we leave?"

"Tomorrow afternoon, I think. Ranma has spent most of today sorting things out with various people who needed to know we'd be away for a while. I talked to a few as well, there are some people who are, well, terrified of Yori." She laughed. "Chou is slightly less scary. Everyone who needs to know is aware that we won't be around except in an emergency. Also how to get hold of us if it is an emergency, like a medical problem. They know we'll drop everything and come back under those circumstances, but won't be happy if it turns out to be nothing serious."

Nabiki giggled. "I can imagine no one really wants an annoyed Yori looking for them because they interrupted her holiday."

"Not even slightly." The sisters glanced at each other and grinned. "Tomorrow morning he's going to tell Sergeant Harada and Agent Naito as well. They can contact us if it becomes necessary through one of the others. The SI systems can call between close worlds, so the people here can relay phone calls to us. I've asked Nao to set it up so it's automatic. It thinks we should arrange to get a relay system installed here to make it easier in future, apparently the makers could supply one if we contact them. I suppose we should do at some point, I'm very curious about them, I admit. There may also be some useful upgrades we could acquire."

"I'm damn curious about these mystery people as well. Jun has run every test it could come up with and is pretty sure it's not compromised, something I think it probably true, but I'd still like to talk to them." Nabiki shook her head slightly. "I still find the circumstances of getting the SIs very strange. But I guess that's basically normal for us."

"Very true." They lay in silence for a while, just relaxing. "I even talked to Ami, you remember her?" Nabiki nodded, slightly surprised.

"I thought her group and you two weren't exactly friends." Kasumi smiled slightly sadly.

"Not entirely. Ami is actually a very intelligent and very responsible person, who is somewhat trapped in a situation I don't think she completely enjoys. I really must find out the details one day. She's dropped hints every now and then, the story sounds very odd, even by magical girl terms. There's something not quite right about it but I can't put my finger on what. I suppose I don't have enough information." She sighed a little. "Poor girl. She has considerable power and more common sense than any of her friends, but sticks with them due to loyalty more than anything else. I get the impression there's something she doesn't like about it all but I don't know what. Not yet. Anyway, I trust her, even if I don't feel that way about the others, mostly, and I asked her to help if it becomes necessary. Hopefully it won't, there isn't any threat I know about at the moment, but we may as well get everyone ready if something does go peculiar."

"It's kind of weird that basically you two are the only thing keeping a lid on this insane ward, to the point that you're worried about going away for three weeks in case the end of the world or something happens." Nabiki glanced at her sister with a small smile, which the older woman returned.
"It is a little strange, but that's essentially the way things have worked out. Not what we intended, but there you have it." Kasumi laughed for a moment. "I'm not expecting anyone to really take the opportunity to start trouble because we're not around, mainly because the others could now do a fairly good job of shutting it down, but also because they know very well that we'll be back." Her grin turned dangerous. "That would be unpleasant for troublemakers."

Her sister chuckled. "I can well imagine. I suppose there isn't much likelihood of anyone interfering with the building either?"

"No, very few people outside this room even know about it, aside from being an insanely powerfully warded building near the university. There isn't much reason to risk poking around from the point of view of anyone who can tell the wards exist, which is only a fairly small number of magic users in the first place, they hide their presence quite well, and trust me, the system can look after itself. It may not currently be allowed to act outside the building, but inside, I don't know of anything that could really last very long if it needed to do something. We put a very large amount of time into making sure of that and the system has a simply appalling amount of energy stored away. Unless we get hit by an asteroid or something like that, nothing could scratch it, and even then I suspect it would survive. The strength of the wards is just astounding now, since we added you all to it the whole system has grown exponentially."

Nabiki nodded, feeling the system lurking at the back of her mind. It was always there, watching protectively over everyone it counted as it's own, a feeling she rather liked. Not intrusive but ready at a moment's notice to do something extremely final if it was attacked. Even she could tell it seemed to have become far more complex and somehow 'larger' in the last few months.

"Have you had time to look at that subsystem you deactivated a while back?" Kasumi shook her head.

"Unfortunately not. It's irritating, but not really vastly critical at the moment. I'd rather make sure we get it right even if it takes a while than risk it going wrong. The system has so much power that 'wrong' would be very wrong indeed. We need to be extremely careful to make sure we don't make a mistake, the results would be catastrophic in that case. It's grown rather larger than we ever planned for, which makes it much more complicated. We'll start looking at it when we get back, I think."

Smiling at her sister, Kasumi pushed off and ducked under the surface, disappearing. A few moments later her currently female, currently mer-form husband let out a yelp of surprise and a cloud of bubbles as she disappeared below the water, making Nabiki laugh.

Sergeant Harada looked around as a familiar figure fell in beside him, grinning. "Hi, Sergeant," Yori said, looking pleased to see him.

"Hello, Yori. I haven't seen you for a few days. How is Chou? Got that painting hung somewhere nice, or hidden away safely?" The black-haired girl snickered.

"She's fine, thanks, she passes on her best wishes to you and your wife. And we've got the painting up where we can all enjoy it. I must arrange to visit Mrs Whitworth and thank her at some point. How are you? And your wife, Emiko, isn't it?"

"Yes, that's her. We're both fine. The baby is doing well too, the latest scans came back showing nothing is amiss."

"Do you know if it's a boy or a girl yet? Do you even want to?" Yori smiled at him. He grinned.
"Too early to tell yet. She's only about five weeks along." He glanced at her with an amused look. "I suppose you could probably tell." The girl nodded, smiling.

"Yes, the gender of a child is fairly easy to determine through reading the ki. Any time after about three weeks will work."

"Amazing. I think we'll wait to find out, although we might change our minds later."

"Fair enough." They walked along for a little while. "We're going away for a little while. Partly a holiday, partly meeting some old friends. I wanted to let you know so you wouldn't get worried if you didn't see us around." Yori looked at him for a moment. "We've arranged cover for us while we're away, and we can be reached in an emergency and would come back immediately in that case. The number on my card will still work. If I don't answer one of the others will, Aiko and her team will be around most of the time. I've talked to several of the other groups as well, if anything bad happens they'll fill in until we get back." She grinned. "I made it very clear that any damage would cause me to become irritated and would be dealt with appropriately." Harada chuckled.

"I'd pay good money to see that. OK, I understand. Thank you for telling me. From what I saw on the news and Agent Naito told me, I'm not surprised you girls want to get away for a while. You deserve it, considering everything you've done and continue to do for us."

"Thank you, Sergeant, that's very nice of you to say. We do what we can and we like this place." He laughed a little.

"I can't see why you'd stay if you didn't. How long are you going for? Anywhere interesting?" Yori looked at him, amused, then nodded.

"It should be interested. Visiting Uthryyl for a while at his home, then wandering around a little. Probably for about three weeks but it might be longer. No more than a month." He looked at her, his eyebrows up.

"Going to one of the demon worlds? Amazing. Say hello to Uthryyl for me, he seemed a decent fellow when I met him during that serial killer unpleasantness."

Yori nodded. "He is, a very good person, and a good friend. I'll tell him you said hi. Could you do me a favour and pass this on to Agent Naito, please? He should know in case he needs us. Hopefully he won't but you never know."

Sergeant Harada smiled at her. "Of course I will. Have fun, look me up when you get back." With a nod she stepped back, then from a standing start jumped three stories straight up and disappeared over the roof of the library next to them. He watched her go with an amused look then went on his way.

"Nabiki, are you ready yet?" Kasumi's voice came down the hallway from the practice room. Dropping her camera bag into her ki pocket having just double-checked she had everything, Nabiki left her room and headed towards the back of the apartment.

"Yes, sorry, I just needed to be sure I packed all my film. I suddenly thought I might have left some of it back in Nerima, it's all here though." She stopped next to her sister, who was inspecting the portal in the middle of the room carefully, before nodding, satisfied. "Everything OK?"

"Yes. We made some slight efficiency refinements to the portal spell and I was just checking how it was working. By the looks of it it's reduced the power requirements by exactly the predicted amount. Very pleasing." Kasumi smiled at her. Ranma walked around from the other side of the rip in space-time, looking at it, then nodded.

"Yep. Not bad at all, Kas. Good work."

"Thank you, dear."

Aiko and the other three girls appeared a few metres away, then walked over. "Ready to go?" she asked.

"I think so." Kasumi hugged each of them in turn. "We'll see you two in two weeks, and Fumiko and Tamiko in a week. Take care, call if you need us."

"We'll be fine, Kasumi. Go and have a nice week with just you three." The short brunette grinned at her friends. "I'll make sure the roof garden is watered and trimmed as well."

"Thank you." Kasumi looked pleased.

Ranma looked at his friends, smiling. "Try to keep a lid on this nuthouse, guys. See you later. Come on, Nabs, demon worlds await." Kasumi giggled and stepped through the portal, vanishing with a slight crackle. Nabiki followed Ranma as he did likewise, grinning with excitement.

"Don't call me Na..."

The portal hung in the air for a few more seconds, then disappeared with a pop. Aiko laughed, turning to her friends.

"Come on. Let's go swimming again." Misaki pulled out an apple and munched it as they went up the stairs to the pool.
"bs..."

"..."

"...Holy shit..."

"..." Nabiki gaped, turning in a complete circle, then looking up. Ranma and Kasumi watched her with amusement, as did Uthryyl, who had been waiting for them. Eventually she lowered her gaze to her sister and brother-in-law, wearing the widest grin they'd ever seen. "Wow." Kasumi giggled as the brunette went back to gaping, eventually having to gently urge her in the direction of Uthryyl, who smiled at her.

"Welcome to my home, Nabiki. May your stay here be a memorable one." He was speaking the trade language, which Ranma had insisted they use whenever possible during the trip, to improve her fluency in it. She knew a fair amount of it now after about two and a half months of study but he felt she needed some immersion in the language to make it second nature, which she agreed with, knowing it was a good method.

The middle sister nodded slowly, still staring around. "I think it already is," she mumbled in the same tongue.

In front of her was a cityscape, but one quite different from anything she'd seen before. All the buildings were quite recognisably buildings, some fairly large, although nothing like as big as some of the ones in Tokyo, lights beginning to come on as they appeared to have arrived at the equivalent of later afternoon or early evening. The site the portal had deposited them in was some distance up the side of a small mountain or perhaps a large hill, on the outskirts of a wooded area that stretched out of sight. As a result the view out over the alien city was superb. The sun, low on the horizon, was noticeably redder that the one she was familiar with, and slightly dimmer, enough that she could look at it with a little squinting, while a few degrees off to the side and slightly higher in the sky was a brilliant blue-white pinpoint of light.

The overall effect was light that was more or less the same colour as she expected, casting shadows that had two distinct edges, very close together, one somewhat blue and one slightly red. She inspected the ground and her shadow, waving her hand around, then looked back to the setting sun. Or was it suns? Ranma noticed her experimenting and laughed. "The main sun is a red giant, this world is much further away from it that we are from our sun. The little blue one is a white dwarf, orbiting around it. The planet orbits around both of them."

"Weird." Nabiki thought back to some of the science programs she'd seen in the past and science fiction she'd read. "Is that stable? I'd have thought it would be a kind of complicated orbital path." Some of the words she used she picked carefully, as her vocabulary wasn't enormous yet. Jun made a very good dictionary though. It helped her understand most of what was said as well, although speaking it was more of a problem which only practice would solve.

Uthryyl nodded, looking impressed. "Very good. Yes, it is stable. We're far enough away from them both that we orbit the common centre of mass in a fairly circular path, more circular than your home planet does. The year is considerably longer as a result. About twenty-one times as long, in fact. The day length is a little more than thirty Earth hours long, though, so not too far off what you're used to." She nodded, listening with interest. "The common centre of mass is roughly half-way between the two stars. Even though the red one is much larger than the little blue one the masses are nearly the same. The extreme long term stability isn't ideal, but by the time something goes wrong enough to be a worry we'll probably have left anyway. It's something my species has been aware of for a very long time. That's going to be a hell of a long way in the future, though, we're not too worried. Far past the lifespans of anyone around now by millions of years."

"OK. So, do you have very long winters and summers?"

"Well, technically, yes, but the variance is much smaller than your world has, only a few degrees. The axial tilt isn't as much either, so the temperature is fairly similar and constant around most of the planet except right at the poles. This is about as warm as it gets, ten or so years from now by your system it will get a few degrees cooler. You probably wouldn't notice since it happens so slowly." Nodding again, the middle Tendo went back to looking around. The foliage was in some ways similar to the sorts of things she was familiar with, but in many ways not at all. There were lots of strange smells in the air, odd noises that seemed to be caused by things similar to insects and birds, but which looked nothing like the ones she knew, and a distant sound that was the sum total of the noises of the city some ten or fifteen kilometres away, further down the mountain, clearly built along a fairly impressive river.

The colour of the plants was a much larger range than she was used to, green ones that wouldn't have looked out of place in her sisters garden mixed with deep red ones, bright yellow-orange ones, and even some that looked a dark blue-black. Staring at some very attractive bushes a few metres away, which had glossy red leaves and green flowers, she thought for some reason they looked vaguely familiar. Kasumi noticed the direction of her gaze and giggled.

"If you're thinking you've seen that one before, you have. I have a small one in one corner of the garden. It smells a bit like strawberries when it's in bloom." Nabiki nodded, realising that she had indeed seen the plant in question. It was an amusing thought, a plant from a completely alien world was quietly growing on the roof of her sister's building. "It's not poisonous, but the chemistry of it is different enough you couldn't eat it, or rather, you could but you wouldn't enjoy the taste at all. Insects leave it alone as well for the same reason. But it's very pretty. Quannyr gave it to me a couple of years ago. Surprisingly it seems fine with the climate back home."

The trees beyond the smaller bushes, which were laid out in what was clearly a garden, followed the same variant colour schemes, looking more like a deciduous forest back home in the autumn than anything else. A grass-like plant covered the ground, rather more mossy than real grass, a distinctly pink colour although rather deep in colour. It looked a little like cotton candy. Bending down she felt it, finding it was soft and springy, like a very well manicured lawn. Smiling, she straightened up with a shake of her head. "Amazing. This is much more like a real alien world than that dead one. Aside from the sky that could have been any desert on earth. This..." She looked around with a smile. "This is wonderful."

"We like it," Uthryyl said with a grin. "Come on, let's go inside." He led them to the large house that they were obviously standing in the garden of. It was perhaps three times the size of the Tendo Dojo and house combined, with grounds that were fairly extensive. A stone wall surrounded the entire place, disappearing into the woods on two sides, presumably joining up somewhere inside. The house itself was also largely constructed of stone with parts made of an almost black, yet clearly not painted, wood that glistened in the fading light like it was wet. When Nabiki touched the nearest piece curiously she found it felt like it was varnished, although she had a suspicion that wasn't the case.
Overall she was somewhat surprised how normal everything looked. The style of the house was very different than the traditional Japanese one, or the common Western styles that were omnipresent back home, yet wasn't so far away it stood out as 'alien'. Just different, not to mention rather attractive. The materials looked somewhat exotic yet still recognisable, even as the plants were clearly plants, just not earthly ones. Even the way the front door mechanism, some sort of lever arrangement, worked seemed sufficiently normal that she wasn't surprised to see Uthryyl operate it just like a standard doorknob, although he lifted rather than pushed down.

The effect, though, taken as a whole, was definitely something that made it clear she was a very long way from home. Even so, she found it warm and welcoming in a way she'd have been hard-pressed to explain. Standing to one side the demon waved them inside. "Come in. Please, make yourselves comfortable. My home is yours, as I believe the saying goes on your world." He touched a plate on the wall making lights come on down a hallway leading to the interior of the house. Nabiki inspected the nearest one, seeing it was some sort of transparent globe that seemed to be evenly glowing, not in the fashion of a filament light bulb, or even a fluorescent one, but more like it was filled with a luminescent mist. It reminded her of the power storage sphere that the portal weapons had been build around.

Curiously holding her hand a couple of centimetres from it she found she could feel the tell-tale sensation of low-powered magic in operation. Uthryyl saw what she was doing and chuckled. "Yes, it's powered by magic. A simple light spell, contained inside the sphere to make it stable long-term. Unlike the power batteries you'd probably seen these are made of a polymer, it's much tougher, but it can't handle the same power the synthetic crystal ones can. Cheaper, though."

"Weird. Magical light bulbs." She smiled at him.

"Basically. It's an old system, we've been using them for hundreds of Earth years. They last a long time, twenty or so of your years at least, but not forever. It depends how brightly you run them, of course. Brighter makes them burn out faster, more energy causes more wear."

"That's possibly the first logical thing I've ever seen magic do," the brunette said with a giggle. He shrugged.

"Sometimes it does follow the same sort of rules as physics, sometimes it doesn't. Magic is very strange in many ways." Moving past them, he led them down the hall to the end, into a large room with a huge, flawless, one piece window overlooking the city in the valley below. "This is the heart of the house, really. We like to sit here in the evening and admire the view. The dining room is off that way, the kitchen past it, various workrooms and the like on the ground floor, then upstairs is the accommodation. We've got enough rooms for about a dozen or so guests plus the three of us. It's a large house and rather old, my grandfather built it when he was quite young. That was a long time ago. We've expanded it here and there over the years. My family is smaller than the previous generation was so we're sort of lost in it, but I'd never leave, there's too much history in the place."

Kasumi looked around with a smile. "I know what you mean. The Dojo is a bit like that. Not as old but it's been in the family for several generations." Walking over to the left wall she admired some paintings hanging there. "These are new." Uthryyl joined her, looking at them.

"Yes, my wife got them a few months ago. A friend of hers painted them as a gift for her birthday. She's very talented indeed, quite a lot of her paintings change hands for significant sums now."

Nabiki moved over to have a look at them. While the colour was a little strange, to her eyes at least, the talent involved in what seemed to be some sort of watercolour technique was very evident. The results were close to photographic but with a slightly dreamy effect that was very attractive.

"I can see why. I suspect something like this would fetch a good price back home, just on it's own merits, although the provenance as a genuine demon-painted artwork would probably add to that."
She grinned at Uthryyl who laughed.

"My wife would hang me with my own innards if I sold them." He looked thoughtfully at her for a moment. "But that's an interesting idea. I hadn't thought of art trading. Your world puts as high a value on it as mine does. Hmm. Might be worth looking into. Thank you for the idea." Nabiki giggled.

"I should probably ask for a commission."

"If it works we should be able to come to an arrangement." Uthryyl snickered at her surprised look.
"I believe in rewarding good ideas, especially if I make a profit from them. That way you get more." Patting her on the shoulder with one scaled hand he turned, waving them to follow. "Come on, let me show you to your rooms." Nabiki watched his tail disappear around the doorway, staring in slightly shocked surprise, then shook herself and followed, a smile growing. Kasumi and Ranma brought up the rear grinning at her.

Climbing stairs that made her stumble for a moment, because the treads and risers were at slightly the wrong spacing for what she was used to, she followed the merchant to the top floor of the house. "Down that hall are the family rooms, the other way is the guest accommodation. This is your room, Nabiki. Ranma, Kasumi, you can have your usual room.

"Thanks, Uthryyl," the martial artist said, walking past with his wife to the next room along.
Nabiki watched them for a moment then went into the room the demon indicated, looking around with interest. Again, it was surprisingly normal in most respects. The bed was obviously a bed, although when she prodded it the mattress appeared to be some sort of gel filling with a smooth cloth wrapped around it, a little like a cross between one of the memory foam beds she'd seen recently and a water-bed. Various items of furniture around the room were more or less recognisable for function as well. There were a couple of chairs which had odd looking backs, something she worked out were for people with tails, a thing that was some sort of chest of drawers, a mirror on the wall, pretty much all the items one would expect in a bedroom practically anywhere back home.

Inspecting the chest of drawers she looked puzzled, seeing it was only about ten centimetres deep, which seemed very shallow for useful storage. When she pulled out one of the drawers, though, it came out over half a metre, making her wonder if it was build into the wall. Uthryyl, who was watching her from the doorway, laughed slightly. "It uses a subspace storage method a bit like what the SI uses, but not as effective. Essentially about eighty percent of the space inside it is folded away so it doesn't take up a lot of real room. Very useful technique, that spell gets used all over the place. We have somewhat higher ambient magic here than your world does so spells of this sort and the lighting one are much more easily powered. In your world you'd probably need to be a good magic user to justify it, here anyone can buy an appliance using the method."

"Do you pipe magical energy around like electricity, then?" Nabiki asked curiously. He grinned.

"The method is quite different but the effect is similar. Raw energy is pulled from the environment by a collector system, which is the complicated part, then sent over an energy link to nearby consumers of it. Most houses or buildings have one. I did look into seeing whether it would be possible to sell them on your world, unfortunately the way they work isn't fully compatible with your universe. I don't know if it would be possible to redesign them, but if it was it would be a very complicated and expensive job, so I dropped it." He shrugged a little. "I might revisit it one day, if the demand was there. A mage can power any of this stuff themselves, of course, but even here most people aren't mages, in the same way in your world most people aren't mechanical engineers
"Cool," the middle sister said, closing the magical slightly-larger-on-the-inside than it was on the outside drawer again. Though as she thought about it she realised that description wasn't really accurate, it was just that a lot of it wasn't in the same reality she was at the moment. Which was ever weirder when you considered the idea. "To be honest, I suspect that right now, more traditional technology would be more saleable at home. Most of our world doesn't really know about or believe in magic."

"Yes, it's something I find interesting. Even the worlds I visit that are more or less completely tech based usually know magic exists, they just don't use it much or at all. Sometimes because the inhabitants simply can't, or because they don't want to for one reason or another. Most worlds use both in various proportions. Worlds like yours, tech based but with an almost separate magic culture that doesn't overlap all that much are unusual. He looked amused for a moment.

"Although, I wouldn't be surprised if recent events may go a long way to making the walls between those two systems break down to one degree or another. Ranma has kept me updated on what happened with the portal bomb plot, something I'm very happy to see is now over, even though the fall-out will probably go on for some time."

Looking at her for a moment, he stepped inside the room and closed the door. She looked back, wondering what he was doing. "While I have a moment, Nabiki, can I ask how you're doing with all this?" He seemed concerned, an expression she found oddly easy to read from his quite inhuman face, his ears slightly back like a worried dog. The thought made her momentarily smile. "I know how you were upset back when you and your friends were destroying my firing range. From what I've been told of the end game of the portal plot, you were dropped in very deeply very quickly. That can't have been easy."

Sighing a little she sat on the bed, noticing absently how comfortable it was, making her almost feel she was floating. "It was... very hard. When we got back and I had a moment to let myself realise what had happened, I had a bit of a breakdown. Something I'm still embarrassed about even though the others didn't make anything of it. It kind of hit all at once, if that makes sense."

The demon nodded. "It does, more than you might realise." He paused for a moment, watching her, then sighed himself. "When I was very young, probably about your age or a little older in your terms, I was involved in a small war. Only a battle, according to the people who weren't there, but as far as we who were are concerned, it was bad enough. I won't go into the circumstances, it was a very long time ago and it's not relevant now, but I was fighting for a couple of weeks. Several friends and colleagues were injured, some badly, and a few died." He shook his head. "I had nothing like the power even you possess, never mind Ranma or the rest of your friends, but you don't need much power to kill. Only a weapon and the will to use it. We had that, to my great regret."

She watched and listened, unsure where he was going. "At the time we thought we were doing the right thing. It may even have been true. The main thing is that people died. I handled it pretty well, I thought, considering how young I was and the fact I'd never been involved in anything like that. I had quite a lot of training, the support of our small military, that sort of thing. But afterwards, when I had time to think about what I'd done, what I'd seen... it hit me very hard. I ended up requiring a form of therapy, I suppose you'd call it, for a couple of years to get over what I'd seen and done. Several other people I know needed more than that. And we were supposedly trained soldiers."

"You, despite the training you've had recently from probably the two most lethal warriors I've ever even heard of, have only been doing this for a few months, yet got dropped into a situation worse than the one I had my first time out. True, you weren't being shot at, but the deaths, the whole scenario, was horrific. I've seen the pictures. To be honest, being shot at would probably have been easier, it gives you some control over the situation, because you can shoot back. You were basically doing clean-up after a massacre. I am full of admiration for how well you handled it, and the fact that even when you were offered a chance to back out, you didn't take it. That takes a very special type of person. Very few people could do it, either your species or mine." Walking over to her he put his hand on her shoulder, looking down at her.

"I understand some of what you went through, and I fear will go through in the future. From what I know of you, you will handle it very well. But if you ever want to talk about it, to someone outside your group, come and visit."

After a long pause, she nodded slowly. "Thank you, Uthryyl. That means a lot." She grinned at him. "I see why Ranma and Kasumi like and trust you so much." The demon laughed, releasing her and stepping back.

"I like and trust them as well, more than most people I know. I know I can count on them in a tough situation, which is something you can't say about everyone you meet, not to mention how many times they've helped me just out of friendship. I'm a trader, I deal with more people than you'd believe, and one thing I've learned over the years is that you can't buy the sort of respect and relationship we have with each other, you have to earn it. They are very good people, as are Aiko and her girls, and you. Meeting 'Yori' years back was a very good thing."

Standing, Nabiki smiled a little. "It's been difficult coming to grips with how much my life has changed in the last year, I have to admit, but meeting people like you, Onkra, Quannyr, Aiko and the others... That's worth it all." After a moment she added, "And I owe you more thanks than I can really express for getting the comm units for us. Jun is one of the best things that ever happened to me in more ways than I can think."

#Thank you, Nabiki,# the SI commented quietly, with a pleased tone in its voice.

'I mean it, Jun. I'm very glad indeed that we ended up together.'

#As am I.# The machine fell silent again.

"I'm glad I could. They've made a big difference to our own lives as well. Their designers are remarkable people, as is their work."

'I'd like to meet them one day. Or at least talk to them." The merchant smiled.

"That can probably be arranged. I don't know if it's possible this trip, they are difficult to contact, I would imagine on purpose, but not impossibly so. I'll look into it. Right, let's finish showing you around and we can go get something to eat."

Quannyr and her daughter had been in the city, it turned out, the elder demon working and the younger one visiting friends. They arrived back a couple of hours after Nabiki and the others came through the portal, in a vehicle that looked somewhat like a car but seemed to be sitting about ten centimetres off the ground with nothing obvious holding it up. It was virtually silent. Looking out the window at it after they had greeted and been greeted by the other two people, Nabiki wondered out loud how it worked. Onkra came over and glanced out, then turned to her with a smile. "We used to use a levitation spell, but most ground vehicles nowadays use a type of gravity repulsion system that is pure tech. A company from one of the high-tech worlds imports the units to here and a few other worlds. Wheels like on the ground vehicles of your world haven't been used much for a long time, although they still are for some very large cargo vehicles because the energy cost is Nabiki shook her head in wonder. "Things are going full on science fiction again. That's one of the strangest thing about everything I've learned and seen in the last year, how something that everyone at home refers to in supernatural terms is more like some futuristic alien space-travel movie in some ways. Anti-gravity, levitating cars, travel between worlds, it's all amazing." The young female demon laughed.

"I know what you mean. I've watched quite a lot of movies on your world, it's something you do really very well indeed, such incredible imaginations, and it always amuses me how the makers of those things seem to split alien worlds into ones that are basically very low tech but with everything magical, or incredibly high tech with no magic at all. In reality almost everywhere is a mix between both of those. We use more magic in everyday life that most of your world does, but we also use a lot of technology, some of which you'd instantly recognise, some of which is more advanced." Glancing out at the levitating car she smiled a little. "We certainly didn't invent it all, though. A lot of both are bought in, which means we have access to things your world doesn't. Most worlds do that, they have done for a long time. It's quite rare to come across one that doesn't have a thriving interworld trade."

"I would think that your family is quite interested in changing that status with my home," the middle sister mused, turning away from the window.

Onkra nodded a little. "I think so. I know dad has been trading in luxury items for quite a while, but he's talked about expanding into other things at some point. One thing that has kept it down to a small amount of trade is how much more complicated it tends to be to create portals to your world outside the Minato area. No one seems to be able to work out why. Oh, you can do it, certainly, but the amount of energy needed makes it a nuisance. It depends on where you start from, as well. Starting a portal from your end is easier than from outside inwards."

Ranma had wandered over and was listening as Onkra spoke. "I've always wondered about that. I know that we didn't seem to have too much difficulty creating portals in the UK or Canada, but you could feel the difference." The demon girl nodded, sitting down next to where Nabiki was standing.

"Dad told me about your spell being weird. He seems to think it's a lot more efficient than the normal one, so in your case the difference is probably a lot less, but for most people, it's considerably simpler to aim for Minato or the surrounding area. If it wasn't for the way all those magical girls tend to jump anything coming through a portal on the spot we'd more than likely have looked into expanding the trade earlier." She grinned toothily at him. "You and Kasumi at least seem to have managed to make that much less of a problem."

Ranma grinned back and bowed, laughing. "You're entirely welcome." Straightening up, he added, "I know Uthryyl has certainly been expanding the chocolate trade a lot in the last year or so. When we met he was only coming about twice a year and was in and out in a day or so, so far this year he'd been about six times that I know."

"Seven," the merchant said, coming over followed by his wife and Kasumi who were deep in conversation. "The last time was for about a week. Your friend Yoshi is being very helpful, we half-filled his warehouse the last trip. We had to hire in half a dozen locals to help move the cargo through the portal. If I could spare the power to make the portal larger we could simply drive the trucks through, but that's a bit difficult at the moment. Even so, business is good."

"Leave some chocolate and coffee for the rest of us," Nabiki giggled. He snickered.
"Oddly enough, that could be a problem at some point. It's an expensive luxury item, of course, more so here than back in your world, but business is expanding so much I can foresee a time when we could take the entire output of the growers. That clearly isn't sustainable. I've been trying to think of some way around that, but the bottleneck is simply the fact that the plants don't grow acceptably anywhere else but your world."

"I've heard that the people who actually grow the coffee beans and cocoa plants get very little of the profit from them, which is enormous, they're often very poor and live in very deprived areas. That's where the plants grow best. There are groups back home who are trying to change that but it's an uphill struggle."

Uthryyl sighed a little. "I was told about that a while ago. It's not all that uncommon, actually, I know of other cases in different worlds where something similar happens. But I'm not sure how it can be changed. We're happy to buy the stuff, although I admit I'd be happier if everyone down the line got a decent profit from it. That's only fair."

Nabiki studied him with interest. The demon seemed genuinely sincere. "Perhaps it would be possible to set up a company that could grow coffee and chocolate specifically for you?" she mused. "If you paid the growers directly, you could most likely not only funnel more profit to them but get the stuff cheaper yourself, with less middlemen. The knock-on effects would in the long run probably improve the lot of everyone, except possibly a few wholesalers." Uthryyl looked at her with an odd expression.

"That... is a very interesting idea, Nabiki." He thought for a while. "A very interesting idea indeed. I'm not sure about the process of setting up a company on your world. The process is different everywhere, of course, but being from somewhere so... non-local... could be a problem. It bears investigating, though."

"Talk to Yoshi about it," Ranma suggested. "He's already running two businesses I know of, pretty successfully as well. He'd know about the process in Japan. I guess one method might be to set up a Japanese company to handle the import-export part, then use that company to buy or otherwise set up coffee and cocoa growing companies in the appropriate places." Uthryyl nodded thoughtfully.

"Not a bad idea. He's already my local buying agent. Involving him would be the obvious first step. Yes, that's something I'll look into. Thank you, Nabiki, that's two potentially profitable ideas in your first evening here. Keep them coming!" He grinned at the middle sister, who laughed.

"It's not like I've been trying to think of ways for you to make a profit, but thanks."

"You certainly have the instincts for it." The demon looked pleased. "Keep it up and I suspect we'll have to start paying you a retainer." She giggled, not sure if he was serious. Ranma smiled at her.

"Hold out for fifteen percent," he advised. Uthryyl looked shocked.

"Fifteen percent?! Do you think I'm made of money? Five is more than reasonable."

"Fourteen and a half," Ranma said with a grin.

"I could go to six and a half." Nabiki watched them both with a raised eyebrow. Kasumi looked at her and smiled, while beside her, Quannyr sighed a little.

"Six and a half! Are you mad! That's almost an insult, my friend. My client here would never consider less than thirteen." Ranma crossed his arms, appearing annoyed. Nabiki tried not to laugh, the inanity of the situation well recognised by her, especially considering their previous history with each other. Uthryylcocked his ears forward and gasped in shock.

"Thirteen! Insanity." His daughter snickered, leaning against the wall and watching with amusement. "Seven. That's more than fair."

"Twelve."

"Nine!"

Ranma leaned forward, glaring at the merchant, who did the same back. "Ten. That's the lowest she can go." After a long staring contest during which the middle sister could see the edge of the martial artist's mouth was twitching with amusement, Uthryyl growled and nodded, sticking out his hand.

"Ten." They shook on it, then laughed. Nabiki chuckled.

"Idiots."

Turning to her, Ranma grinned menacingly. "Right, now we need to negotiate my commission."

She gaped at him, as Kasumi broke down in fits of laughter. After a moment a cold smile crossed her face.

"Three percent."

"Fifteen..."

Sitting at the table Nabiki snickered at the look on the martial artists face. "Seven percent? How the hell did you get me to agree to seven percent?" Uthryyl clapped him on the shoulder, highly amused.

"My friend, both of us met our match today."

Ranma chuckled, while his wife smiled at him. "Apparently so."

Tucking into her g'rargh stew with enjoyment, the middle Tendo felt pleased with herself. It had been a fun few minutes. The alien meat was accompanied by a number of vegetables which were an odd mix of nearly familiar and almost totally unrecognisable, plus carrots. That had made her stare, but they really were carrots. Quannyr looked amused when she held up a three-tined fork analog with a piece of orange vegetable on the end and raised her eyebrow.

"That was one of the first things in recent years we imported from your world. Unlike cocoa and coffee plants, carrots grow here very well and are considered something of a delicacy."

"I made quite a lot from importing seeds for a while," Uthryyl chuckled. "Went into partnership with a few growers, took a percentage of the sales, that sort of thing. Generally, if you're the first to import something from another world you can get a limited duration monopoly on it, during which no one else is allowed to infringe on the sales. A bit like a patent, in terms you'd probably be familiar with. It lasts one of our years and can't be renewed. After that anyone who wants can jump in, assuming the people on the other end go along with it." He finished his plate as well, looking satisfied. "The trick is to persuade the people on the world you're trading with to trade with you exclusively, which means building up a trusted relationship. That's the only way to do it properly. With the carrots, they grow so well here we didn't need to import them for long before we were self-sufficient, which changes the equation a lot."
"So what's the situation with the coffee, chocolate, ice cream, that sort of thing, that you get from Tokyo? Were you the first there?" Nabiki was finding all this very interesting. He shook his head regretfully.

"I wish. No, we've been doing that for a long time. There are a few people who do it, from various worlds, but I pay well, set up local agents, a number of other business tricks that no one else seems to have tried, or possibly thought of. The end result is I have about eighty percent, maybe eighty-five, of the business through Minato to quite a number of worlds. It's very lucrative. Most of the other traders are more specialist, dealing in very specific markets for high prices, which makes up for the lower volume. It seems to work out pretty well."

"It sounds like plants are a very good source of trade goods," Kasumi said, also looking fascinated. Uthryyl nodded.

"They are. One of the best, actually. Biotechnology is very profitable for a number of reasons. Electronics, magitech, mechanical things, those can usually be made locally for less than importing them if you have the infrastructure, the materials, the knowledge, and so on. They're portable. For instance, those fusion generators you were asking about, Nabiki, could be made on your world. Not at the moment or in the near future, there are a lot of other technologies you don't have that are required first, but it's basically just an engineering problem. Plants, and a lot of animals, have normally evolved under very specific conditions and don't travel well or at all. Coffee and cocoa are two very good examples. They only grow properly in a few areas even on their native world, and badly anywhere else as far as anyone can tell. And trust me, people have tried for a long time. A few other plants produce the same compounds but in very small quantities and not very high purity, so they're not commonly cultivated."

He picked up an odd looking mug with a smile. "Jamaican blend, one of my favourites." Drinking from it, he nodded in satisfaction, then put it down again. "It would in theory be possible to synthesise both of them, but they're very complex mixtures of compounds where even tiny differences can make very obvious changes in taste. Despite the price it's cheaper to import them by a long way."

"The carrots were a lucky find, they are one of the fairly small number of plants from your world that do well here and a few other places." Quannyr poured her husband some more coffee, then looked around quizzically. Onkra held out her mug as did Ranma. Filling both, she put the pot back on the table. "There are a few plants from here that grow well on your world, like the Pitheer bush I gave Kasumi. It's only ornamental but it is pretty and has a lovely scent."

Nabiki thought for a while. "So, if one wanted to import things to our world, as an idle idea, one might well be able to pay for them in certain plant products?" She smiled a little. Uthryyl laughed.

"You have the right instincts, definitely. Yes, I would think there are many plant byproducts that would be anywhere from reasonably profitable to extremely lucrative from your world. It has a very large variety of life, more than many places, and surprisingly large numbers of compounds that people want for one reason or another. As I told you some while ago, I've been keeping an eye on your biotech and materials sciences, some of the things I've found out about that you're doing are fairly impressive. One or two are remarkable. There is likely to be some very good trading possibilities there soon. I'm one of, if not the, largest traders between your world and anywhere else, a status I'd like to keep. So far most of it has been outbound trade, mainly precious metals going the other way, but it might be time to try expanding."

"What sort of things would you be looking for?" Ranma asked. The trader thought for a moment.

"Hmm. OK, an example would be drugs of various types. There are some classes of chemical compound that are narcotics, or even poisons, to some species and valuable therapeutic medicines to others. For instance, a world I know has a species that is based on a triple helix DNA-equivalent, unlike the double-helix one both of our species uses. They have a very nasty disease that causes progressive neurological shut down over a period of years, something that so far has eluded a true cure, although they've been looking very hard. There is a drug that is quite effective at treating the symptoms for this disease, keeping it at bay for most of a normal life, but they find it very expensive to synthesise. Finding a plant that could produce it, or a close precursor, would be extremely valuable to them. That drug is a good example, actually, to a lot of species it's a remarkably potent narcotic with some very addictive properties. Quite unpleasant. Yet to them it is a valuable and sought-after medicine."

"I remember you said that there were regulations about transferring potential or actual narcotics or toxins between worlds," the middle sister said.

"There are, but it's still possible presuming there is a legitimate reason for it. Obviously, illegitimate trades take place as well, that sort of thing is impossible to stamp out completely anywhere I've ever been, but it's not a large problem generally. You can arrange a license to transfer otherwise banned substances or products if you can show a good cause for it. I've got quite a few exemptions like that between various worlds myself." He shrugged a little. "Mostly for drugs, a few specialist things that I found a buyer for and that I was comfortable with."

"This drug you were talking about, do you have any information on it?" Kasumi asked curiously. "I know a fair amount about pharmacology, it's one of the subjects I've found very interesting doing my medical training. Perhaps I could look it up when we go home, you never know, it might be one we already know about. There are a very large number of plant-derived medicines in the books."

Uthryyl nodded, looking interested. "Yes, I've got a selection of data on it and a few others I know are potentially profitable. I was planning on looking up an honest and open-minded biochemist on your world at some point in the next couple of years, so I started researching things that might be worth a look. Here, I'll sent you the data." Moments later all three of them got a file of information. Nabiki opened it and had a quick scan through the contents, finding a large amount of chemical information including molecular diagrams, notes on which species the various drugs were useful on and which they were dangerous too, and a lot more, most of which was beyond her comprehension. Kasumi nodded thoughtfully, with the expression that everyone with an SI recognised as someone communing with one.

"Very interesting." She fell silent for a moment, then looked somewhat surprised. "Very interesting." Uthryyl stared at her.

"That tone of voice intrigues me," he commented with a look of interest.

"I recognise one of these compounds, or something very like it. The second one. Come to think of it, the fourth one is vaguely familiar as well." The trader exchanged glances with his wife, his ears cocked forward.

"Do you now. That is interesting. Is it something you know is produced on your world?"

"Yes. The second one, definitely, it's an opiate. Hang on a moment, let me..." She nodded after a moment. "Nao has the reference for it. It's called Thebaine, it's derived from a type of poppy." Kasumi saw the three demons looked blank. "A flower. There are a lot of different types, most of them produce at least small amounts of alkaloids like this, some produce very large amounts. They're grown commercially for the production of a number of compounds, most of which are used as analgesics or anaesthetics. Or, as you said, very potent and addictive narcotics. That particular compound isn't used directly but is a precursor to a few drugs."

She went back to reading the file. "I'm sure the fourth one is also a plant alkaloid. I think it's something closely related to a compound called Nepaline, a very lethal poison derived from a plant called Aconitum. There are a number of different species that produce various amounts of it, all of them are extremely toxic. It's not Nepaline, but it's close. I'd think one could be converted into the other fairly easily. The rest I don't recognise and Nao doesn't have any information on them, but I'll check when I go back."

Uthryyl was looking ecstatic. "Kasumi, that is very interesting indeed. If you're right about even those two compounds, that is an extremely profitable trading opportunity right there. We'll need to look into it as soon as possible. If it turns out that they are the right chemicals and can be supplied in reasonable quantities, I could arrange import and export licenses and start negotiations with the end users."

The eldest Tendo raised a cautioning hand. "Don't immediately rush into it. Thebaine is a strictly controlled drug all over our world, there would be a lot of negotiating required to buy it, assuming it's possible in the first place. The main producer of it is Australia, I know a lot of poppies are grown commercially in Tasmania, an island off the south coast of the country, but I'm not sure how we'd look into being allowed to purchase it. I suppose it would pay to talk to that nice Officer Graham at the ASIO, he'd probably be able to put us in touch with the right people."

The trader was nodding, clearly taking mental notes. "And the other one?"

"Well, that's not actually regulated, as far as I know, there's no large scale use for it since it's so remarkably poisonous. I seem to recall some traditional Chinese medicines use Aconitum, but only in very small amounts. I'd have to look it up. The plant is grown as an ornamental one, I have some in the garden, but you really don't want anyone to eat it, or ideally, even touch it. But it is very pretty."

"I should have talked to you about this a long time ago," Uthryyl said slowly, looking at his wife again. "You clearly know more about biochemistry than I realised."

"We are both very practised healers and training in medicine," Kasumi said, giggling slightly. "You tend to pick up a lot of biochemical knowledge like that, even if you're not actively studying it. It's not my primary field but I've taken a number of courses in the last few years that covered quite a lot of this sort of thing. Ranma has as well, from a slightly different viewpoint."

"We can get data on an awful lot of drugs and compounds through the university computer system, including some new and experimental ones, then send it to you, if that would help," Ranma suggested. "You could see which ones are something you'd be interested in. I would imagine it should be possible to arrange commercial contacts for the most part, especially if the companies are in Japan."

"That would be... very generous and helpful," the merchant replied, looking slightly overwhelmed. Ranma waved a hand.

"Don't worry about it. We've been friends for quite a while, we help each other out, this is just more of the same. You've done as much for us."

"Even so, thank you very much. If this all works out the way it sounds like it could, I'm quite serious about cutting you all in on it. The profit would be more than enough to go around." He grinned after a moment. "I should have talked to you about business like this some time ago. You've only been here a few hours and we've had several potentially lucrative ideas. In three weeks, we could end up owning the planet." Everyone laughed at that. "Oh, yes, Nabiki, on that subject, I researched the fusion reactors we were talking about." She looked at him with interest.

"And?"

"Well, the first thing to realise is that there are several types of reactor design I can get. Some aren't really suitable, either they require exotic fuels that are hard to source outside their own worlds, have by-products that are a pain to deal with without the infrastructure, or are simply too big to go through a portal. In the end, the small design those railguns use seems like the best bet. They're a somewhat old design on their originating world, but as a result the technology is stable, reliable, and well-understood. The downside is that they use a fusion fuel, an isotope of helium, that is in very short supply on your planet. The upside is that the waste is very clean."

Nabiki nodded, listening carefully. "My research showed that your own people are aware of the possibility of this particular fuel cycle, but also know how difficult it is to obtain, not to mention how hard it is to design the hardware to use it. From what I can find out your people are probably about fifty to seventy years from being able to duplicate this method of power generation natively. But, it is something you know about and would eventually get to, which means the paperwork about exporting it to you is much easier. It's not introducing something completely new, just jump-starting the process. An entirely new alien technology would be more complicated to export to you, although not impossible for the most part."

"What about the SI units?" Kasumi asked with interest. "They're clearly a very long way past any of our own world's technology."

"Personal imports of small amounts of high tech is fine, generally. Especially to people of your reputation." She looked slightly embarrassed, causing him to grin. "You'd be absolutely amazed what you could get if you needed it. Selling them on the open market would possibly be a problem, but it wouldn't arise as we couldn't get the things in the first place. Their makers only sell to very specific people, as you know." He shrugged a little. "Other worlds have different rules, so you could quite possibly get even things that we ban through someone else, but you'd have to go some way off the beaten track. The trading treaty worlds like this one have a fairly unified set of rules. Personally, I prefer it that way, it's much more civilised."

He looked back to Nabiki. "The fuel is something I can get in significant quantities. Several very high-tech worlds mine and refine it from gas giants, they use it themselves in huge amounts. It's not vastly expensive in those terms. So, that part is easy enough, and of course an ongoing commercial possibility. The reactors are quite efficient, even the small one that was running the railgun you played with had a continuously rated output of around ten megawatts. It's intrinsically fail-safe, and small enough you could pick it up and walk off with it." He looked at her for a moment, then around at Kasumi and Ranma. Grinning, he added, "Not the best choice of words in your case, you lot could probably pick up this house and walk off with it." Ranma chuckled. "But it's not big. About so high," he held a hand approximately a meter off the floor, "And about the same across. I left it in the bunker when we installed it, it was easier, but it only took two of my people to get it inside and connected."

"Jun, what does that power output mean in terms I'd be familiar with?" Nabiki asked the SI. She certainly wasn't technologically inept by a long way but she wasn't an engineer.

#A typical household in your home country would use approximately three to ten kilowatts continuously depending on number of inhabitants. A reactor of the power output specified would provide enough energy to run over one thousand such households. Based on information I downloaded from your internet it would take approximately seventy thousand such reactors to provide the entirety of the electricity usage of Japan. Obviously, larger output versions would require proportionately fewer installations.#

"What about the SI units?" Kasumi asked with interest. "They're clearly a very long way past any of our own world's technology."

'Thanks.'

"The largest one we could easily fit through a portal, disassembled into it's main components, would be one with an output of about eight gigawatts. From what I could find out to replace all the electricity requirements in your country with these reactors would need less than a hundred that size. That includes all the energy you generate domestically and also import." Uthryyl looked at her, smiling. "The SI units are very good at finding out these things." She laughed and nodded. "So it's possible, and even fairly simple with large units, to replace all your energy requirements. The fuel required would be around ten metric tons a year, which isn't very much. The world I'd use to supply it from produces thousands of times that much every year, they sell it all over the place."

"It definitely sounds possible," Kasumi said, sipping her coffee. Uthryyl nodded.

"Most certainly. I would have to arrange some import and export licenses, talk to the manufacturers, things like that, but it could be set up in a few months, perhaps a year worst case. The bigger difficulty would be at your end. As I said when you first raised the thought, there are some very large and powerful entities in your world that seem quite happy with the way things are at the moment as they make enormous profits from it. You might have an uphill struggle with them, I'm afraid. I've seen it before, the issue isn't uncommon. A new, disruptive technology causes friction between the new companies and the old, entrenched ones. It's something to be aware of."

Nodding slowly, Nabiki thought about his words. They certainly seemed plausible, from what she knew of the politics of energy. Oil, coal, nuclear, issues with unstable countries in the Middle East, much of it made the news almost every day. Still, the more she thought about it the more it seemed like something that could genuinely help people on a scale being a magical girl probably couldn't, and quite directly as well. Cheap clean energy was the cure to a large number of the world's problems from what she could work out.

"It's a bit overwhelming, to be honest," she said in the end. "Having a potential world-changing thing like this just sitting there. I think we would need to get some advice from people back home." Looking at Ranma she smiled as he nodded.

"I would have to agree. But, now that Nabiki has raised the possibility, I also agree it's probably a good idea in the long term. There are some very worrying things being found out about pollution from our existing energy sources back home, I can see it getting bad in a few years or decades. This might be a fix. I'll talk to a few people I know when we get back, see if they can suggest the best way to go about it."

"Fine. I'll continue with the paperwork, it's fiddly but doesn't cost much, so as and when you want to proceed we're ready." Quannyr looked at him for a moment.

"Who will continue with the paperwork, husband?" Uthryyl glanced at her and grinned.

"I meant to say, my beautiful and intelligent wife without whom I would be nothing, will continue with the paperwork..." The demoness laughed, nodding to her husband.

"Nice save." Kasumi giggled, exchanging glances with Ranma, who was grinning. Nabiki watched with amusement, thinking how normal all of this was despite the alien environment. The people of this world were indeed just basically people, even if they looked a bit weird. Something that she had to force herself to even notice these days, she was surprised and amused to note.
"The big question is how to pay for all of this," the brunette said, looking around the table.

"Well, if Kasumi is right and the plant compounds she recognised are indeed available in commercial quantities, that wouldn't be a problem. They're very valuable, more so than a lot of fusion reactors and helium-three. In fact, one of the worlds that produces the fuel has a number of requirements for some fairly exotic chemical compounds, if your world could supply them you'd have the perfect relationship right there. I don't think it would be a massive problem." The merchant picked up the coffee-pot and looked inside with disappointment as it was empty. Quannyr smiled and took it from him, going to get some more.

"Do a lot of worlds have some form of space travel?" Nabiki asked, "You mentioned mining gas giants. I'm familiar with the concept, it's something I've read in any number of science fiction books, but I'd think it needs quite a major infrastructure."

"Worlds that use magic in significant amounts often don't bother with space travel as portal travel is a lot easier, and fills many of the same requirements." Uthryyl accepted a refill from his wife as she returned, looking at her gratefully. She filled everyone's mug before retaking her place beside him. "On the other hand, some of the high-tech, non-magical worlds are pretty good at it. You remember I said portals can only be generated through magic?" Nabiki nodded. "Some worlds don't have any mages, or ones powerful enough to do a portal spell, which is very high level, so that option isn't available. That often leads to developing some form of space travel. Resources on any given planet are limited and high-tech worlds for some reason often have larger populations than magic based ones, so the problem is even more serious. Energy is normally the most immediate shortage, which space-based industries can solve, in several ways. It generally grows from there."

"Do any of them have faster than light travel?" she asked, a question raised from watching a lot of TV programs as a child.

"It's possible, although not easy. Even your own people are aware of at least one theoretical method though they currently have no idea how to build a machine to do it. It requires a certain amount of negative mass, something very complicated to arrange." Jun popped a graphic up without being asked, about something called the Alcubierre drive, a theoretical method proposed a few years ago by a Mexican theoretical physicist.

#This method is one know to my database, Nabiki. The mathematics are not quite complete but the theory proposed by the physicist Miguel Alcubierre is indeed practical. There are currently nine species listed as using a variant on it for a space drive.# She looked at the diagram and read the text with interest, then dismissed the graphic, with a mental note to look into it again at some point. It sounded interesting.

"Amazing. I can't believe how many things that were just stories suddenly seem to be real," she said, looking around. "I mean, I'm having dinner in an alien house on an alien world! That's just bizarre."

Onkra, beside her, laughed. "I've been to parties in alien houses several times," she said, glancing at the middle sister, who giggled. "They're weird, those aliens."

"I know. Very strange people." The two very different young woman grinned at each other.

When the meal was over they all sat and talked for a while, before Ranma looked at his wife and sister-in-law. "I suggest we should probably get an early night. It's going to take a little time to get used to the longer days here. I'd like to be up early tomorrow so we can show Nabiki around, then see what we should do next." He glanced at the trader. "You told me you have some interesting ideas?"
"Oh, yes, quite a few. I think you'll like them. A couple of days around here, there are a lot of places you haven't seen before and that I think Nabiki will find very interesting, then perhaps go and look in on some other worlds I know. There are a few friends I'd like to look up on the way, a couple of them you know, some you don't." He grinned, looking pleased. "I don't think you'll be disappointed."

"Sounds good. In that case, I'm off to bed. Kas? Coming?" His wife nodded, standing as he did, then they both left with a smile to the people left. Nabiki watched them go, before looking out the window again at the alien city in the distance. Onkra followed her gaze and laughed.

"You'll love it. It's a lot like Tokyo in some ways, and completely different in others. I'm looking forward to showing you around." Smiling in anticipation, the middle Tendo stood.

"He's got the right idea. I am a little tired. Thank you all for the meal, and the opportunity to see all this."

"It's not a problem, Nabiki," Quannyr assured her. "We've been looking forward to this for some time. Have a good night's sleep and we'll see you tomorrow." Nodding to her hosts, the brunette headed to her room, closing the door and looking around, before yawning. Puzzling out the bathroom operation took a few minutes, but soon she was in the strange bed, finding it amazingly comfortable, almost as if she wasn't on a real surface, but just floating in the air.

'I have to get one of these', she thought to herself with a grin, reaching for the activation plate beside the bed and turning off the lights in the ceiling in the way Uthryyl had demonstrated earlier. Lying in the dark, listening to the odd noises from outside of alien life wandering around in the bushes and muttering to itself, she could hardly believe where she was.

#Nabiki, since arrival on this world I have connected to the equivalent of your internet and downloaded up to date maps, topographical and terrain data, and other relevant information. I have also established a link to the location services available, consisting of a high-resolution timing based satellite service and a planetary space-time distortion mapping service. The combined accuracy of both these methods in conjunction with inertial measurement systems is approximately plus or minus one hundred micrometres in all three planes, with equivalent repeatability. Rotational accuracy and repeatability is approximately one half arc-second in all three planes. Is this acceptable?

'More than acceptable, Jun. Thank you.' The middle sister idly studied a map of the area, zooming out to a few dozen kilometres around the house. She noticed that the information was at least as detailed as the GPS maps of Tokyo, showing down to individual street addresses, both in the written form of the trade language and Japanese. 'Very impressive, in fact.'

'Thank you, Nabiki. I have also taken the liberty of synchronising a clock to the local time and date system. Would you like me to display it in addition to the Tokyo time clock, or in place of it?'

'In addition, I think, Jun.' Another clock appeared below the normal one she kept running off to one side.

'The local time is based on decimal hours. There are ten hours to a day, each hour consisting of one hundred minutes of one hundred seconds. The resulting seconds are approximately nine percent longer than an Earth second. It is a very logical system." The voice of the SI was approving, making Nabiki giggle.

'Did you have much information on this world before we arrived?' she asked curiously.
There is a considerable amount of data on many well-travelled worlds in my database, Nabiki. This world is one well known to my makers. The inhabitants of it have been utilising portal travel for a considerable time, several thousand years in your terms, both for trade and research. Their species has a somewhat longer written history than your own although the time they have been truly sentient is approximately the same. From what I have learned I suspect that the main reason their technological civilization is considerably older than your own is that they arrived at a common consensus of governance covering the entire planet much earlier in their history. Without constant wars, while progress was slower than it would otherwise have been, it was also not reset on a regular basis. In addition this world is less prone to the tectonic upheaval and other natural disasters that have curtailed some of the great civilizations of the past on your world.

'So essentially, they learned to work together and didn't get washed away by tidal waves every now and then?' she asked.

Precisely. There does not appear to be a vast difference in ability between your two species, despite appearances you are surprisingly similar mentally and in physical capability. More so than some species by a considerable margin. They are longer-lived on average and somewhat stronger physically, but in neither case outside the range members of your own species reach. As Uthryyl stated, the ambient magic level of this world is substantially higher than your own as well, which has led them to be more aware of magic and as a result utilise more of it in their civilisation. Your world, while well aware of magic in parts and capable of some extraordinary feats using it, has never embraced it to the level this one has. You chose a different path based on physical technology, as have many other worlds.

Nabiki considered its words for a while. 'So, if you have all this information, do you have the plans for making the fusion reactors Uthryyl is talking about?'

'I do have constructional and theoretical data on a number of power systems, including one I believe is most likely the one Uthryyl has referred to. However, as he also stated, while it would in theory be possible for your world to produce such a device, in practice it would be extremely difficult at this point in time. There are a large number of other facilities required to complete the manufacture of this type of technology which your world does not yet possess. Leaving aside the issue of obtaining the helium-three isotope required for fuelling a reactor of this type, I would estimate it would take your home-world a minimum of thirty-five to forty years and enormous and costly effort to build the necessary infrastructure to manufacture it at a price low enough to be feasible as a practical power supply. Laboratory models could possibly be created in a mere twenty years, approximately, although this would be of little practical use to anyone other than research scientists. It would be far preferable, and very considerably cheaper in the long term, to purchase the units ready-made from an existing manufacturer.

'Interesting. Thanks, that's useful information.' Thinking about what it had told her, she fell asleep.
Chapter 55

Fumiko looked around, ducking slightly as a lump of masonry flew overhead, sighing in annoyance. She glanced at her sister, who looked back with a shrug. "One day. They've been gone one day." She ducked again, as a blast of magic whistled past, then irritably sniped a famous magical girl off the roof of a building down the road with a quick ki shot, smiling grimly as the girl with long black hair plummeted to the ground with a shriek of rage and terror, her uniform smoking in a perfect circle in the middle of her chest. "They're going to be furious." She turned to the younger girl standing to one side, who was looking around in stunned amazement, one hand on her hip and the other running through her short blue hair. "You do realise that, right? They're going to be absolutely, frothing at the mouth, furious about this. Your friends are going to be lucky if they just get the shit kicked out of them. You all know this area is off-limits."

The girl nodded, a heavy sigh escaping her lips. She watched as Aiko teleported behind a blonde in the same uniform she was wearing, lashing out with a series of ki-enhanced pressure points down her spine in a blur of motion and looking pleased when the girl dropped without a sound, before teleporting away again as a different girl took a shot at her, then gasping as her lightning attack blew her unconscious friend half a dozen metres down the street. The blue-haired girl winced. When Aiko appeared behind the taller brunette and dropped her with the same attack she smiled somewhat maliciously.

Fumiko, her sister, and the blue-haired young woman all turned to glare at the small demon hiding behind them, whose appearance had triggered the free-for-all currently wrecking half the street. It looked guiltily up at them and shrugged. "Sorry. I just wanted a cappuccino. These lunatics appeared out of nowhere, shouted all sorts of silly things, then started shooting magic at me. What was I supposed to do but run?"

"You could have run in the other fucking direction," Fumiko grated. It shrugged again.

"I didn't know Yori was out of town, or I would have." Shaking her head irritably, the magical girl turned back as Tamiko jogged up, the limp body of a familiar twin-pony-tailed blonde over her shoulder.

"She was pissing me off," the auburn-haired girl explained, looking peeved. "Wouldn't shut up about love and justice, all the time she was blowing holes in the Indian restaurant trying to hit me with that stupid attack of hers. I like that restaurant. She's a terrible shot, she nearly hit Mr Singh. Loads of power, no aim, and a ridiculously slow wind-up. I can see why she annoys Yori so much." She dropped the girl to the ground slightly less carefully than might have been expected, frowning. "They're going to be furious, you know," she added.

"They're going to be furious, you know," she added.

"We've just been through that." Fumiko shook her head. "Come on then, let's get these idiots shut down properly before the rest of them turn up and cause even more problems. It's my turn to shout, I think." She glanced at the blue-haired woman. "Are you going to help, or do you want to stay out of it?"

"May as well help, I suppose, I don't want Yori of all people any more annoyed with me than I can avoid," the girl replied morosely. "God, sometimes I wonder why I stay with these lunatics, I really do." Heaving a sigh, she followed as Fumiko and her two friends stomped off to deal with the others, muttering to themselves, picking their way through a number of wrecked vehicles, two of which were on fire. Several bystanders were taking notes and exchanging cash, while Sergeant Harada inspected the scene with mild astonishment, before going on his way. In the distance the black-haired girl helped her blonde compatriot to her feet, both of them swaying slightly and looking somewhat ill.

Behind them, the demon watched, shaking his head. "Seems a bit of an over-reaction to me," he said to no-one, then headed for the nearest coffee-shop.

Blinking at the unfamiliar ceiling it took the middle sister a couple of seconds to work out where she was. Lying in the astoundingly comfortable bed she was reluctant to rise, but eventually got up, heading to the bathroom to perform her ablutions. Once more the differences between what she was used to and what was available stood out, amusing her in some ways with how similar it was for the most part then finding something weird. The sink was obviously a sink, for example, but the water entered it from the front, not the back, and via some form of plumbing that didn't seem to rely on pipes. It just seemed to come out of shiny slick surface as if it had holes in it, which it didn't. Even with these different methods, thought, she found she got used to it very quickly, not thinking much about it after the first few minutes.

One dressed she went downstairs and looked around curiously. Following noises reminiscent of cooking in action, she entered the kitchen near the rear of the house, finding Uthryyl and Quannyr both engaged in preparing a meal. The trader looked up and smiled, his inhuman face alight with pleasure."Good morning, Nabiki. I trust you slept well?"

"Amazingly well, thanks, Uthryyl. I really should get one of those mattresses you have for myself, it's the most comfortable bed I've ever slept in." She grinned. "That's probably another trade opportunity. Humans like their sleep." Laughing, Uthryyl nodded, reaching for a coffee-pot from which enticing scents were coming and holding it up.

"So I gather. Kasumi has mentioned it in the past. I think I'll look into it. She also tells me you like a good strong coffee in the morning?"

"Oh, very much so, thank you." Grabbing a mug from the pile of them on a side table she held it out, watching as he filled it. "Thanks."

"If you want it sweetened that jar there has something very similar to what you'd think of as sugar, although it's from a different source." He pointed. Walking over she lifted the lid, sniffed, then experimentally tipped a little into her hand and tried it. There was a slightly odd taste to it but not one she found objectionable, more tart than anything else, as if it was sugar with a little lemon juice mixed in. Finding a spoon-like implement she added some to her mug and stirred it, sipping the resulting drink with an approving face.

"That's pretty good. Where does it come from?"

"It's processed from the sap of a tree." He was watching her with interest.

"Ah. Yes, we have something like that back home. Mostly from North America, called maple syrup or maple sugar. I've never much liked it but a lot of people love it. This is nice, though." Drinking some more she worked out how to hold the alien mug to account for the different shape of her jaw from the one the makers had designed it for.

"Your sister and her husband are in the back garden practising," Quannyr said, looking up from where she was making some form of bread. "Or possibly on the roof, they were up there a little while ago." She laughed. "Very active people. I'm still amazed when I watch them in action. And very impressed. Even without the magic and this... ki..., whatever that is, they are remarkably powerful." She inspected Nabiki curiously. "I know how much you've learned about the energy manipulation skills they have, are you also learning the physical ones?"

"Slowly. Ranma and Kasumi are so far past anyone else sometimes they don't seem to realise how much more difficult the rest of us find some of it," the middle Tendo replied, smiling. "Aiko and the girls are much better than I am but still have a long way to go. I'm just a rank beginner. Although in the last year, or more accurately I suppose about the last six months, I have learned far more than I ever thought I would."

"Don't put yourself down, Nabiki," Uthryyl advised. "I've seen many recordings Ranma or Kasumi passed on, it's clear you have a very large talent for this sort of thing. I have no doubt it will take a considerable amount of time to reach anything like the level either of them possesses but I have no doubt you can do it eventually. You certainly have the best teachers you could possibly ask for."

Somewhat embarrassed, Nabiki looked at her coffee for a moment before meeting his eyes. "Thanks." She paused. "You've seen the recordings?" Nodding, he and his wife both laughed a little.

"A lot of them, yes. Some are very impressive indeed. I especially like the most recent one where you dealt with that exceptionally nasty person perpetrating the sexual assaults at your university. That was just inspired." The demon snickered, going back to chopping vegetables. "I hope the justice service in your country deals with him appropriately. If not, you could always arrange to send him here. We don't approve of that behaviour at all."

Curious, she asked, "What do you do to rapists here?" Quannyr growled under her breath, making both the others look at her for a moment.

"Sorry. I find even the concept... upsetting."

"It's not nearly as common as it is in your world here," Uthryyl said, after another glance at his wife, who was clearly irritated by the thought, "Our species are not driven in quite the same way in such matters. On the other hand, when it does happen, we take it very seriously. Forfeiture of all assets in restitution and an extensive incarceration are the starting penalties, along with treatment for obvious mental issues. Personality death and rebuilding is the last resort, in cases involving extreme violence or death. It's treated in a manner only slightly less severe than deliberate murder."

He shook his head slightly. "I'm rather surprised how lightly some cultures on your home-world take such things."

"So are a lot of people there," Nabiki said, finishing her coffee. "Believe me, there are a lot who would quite like to see people of his type dealt with more severely or even permanently. But the arguments against that are also valid. Aside from anything else, you'd have to be completely sure that the crime was exactly as it appeared. A miscarriage of justice is bad enough when it involves jail, it's not something you can do much about if an innocent victim ends up dead. Not that there was any doubt about that bastard."

"It's a good point. We have methods that for our species at least can tell with essentially complete accuracy if a person is being truthful. They're reserved for the legal system, as they're moderately hazardous, more so than daily use would warrant, but such techniques do tend to reduce massively such outcomes as those. Not completely eliminate it, unfortunately, there are rare cases where everyone involved is completely truthful yet the whole truth eludes the courts, but that's extremely unusual."

"It sounds like you still have crime, then, even with a society that in many ways is more advanced socially than back home." Nabiki refilled her mug and added some more tree sap sweetener. Uthryyl nodded, putting his knife down and dumping the sliced vegetables into a large pot.
"Oh, definitely. This is no utopia. I don't know anywhere that it. With free will, you will always get some form of crime as people work out how to game the system. It's basically inevitable. The types of crime vary, though. We have a lot less sexual assaults, muggings, that sort of thing, than you do, although it does happen. Fraud, petty theft, that type of crime, we have plenty of that. It's a pain but easy enough to deal with. There are always people who would rather take something than earn it, in every civilization I've ever encountered. Yours is by no means the worst, in fact it's probably better than average." He snickered. "Fraud always amuses me in some weird way. Some of the cases I've heard about involved more ingenuity and hard work than earning the credit honestly would have done, which makes me wonder what the point was."

"We have those as well," she replied, giggling. "Some criminals really don't seem to be able to think their ideas through from end to end first." Thinking for a moment, she asked, "So, if I was wandering around that city down there and someone did try to jump me, what should I do?"

Uthryyl started slicing some carrots. "Try to avoid causing any major damage, much as you do at home, but if someone offers you violence our laws permit sensible responses to it. The right to self-defence is an absolute, as is the defence of an innocent bystander. Attacking someone without reason violates many rights, but if they start it, their rights are immediately suspended. We tend to frown on wildly disproportionate responses, for instance someone stealing a small amount of cash hardly deserves to be killed or maimed, but a show of force to discourage them is fine. If they try to kill you, well, in your case they deserve what happens next." He grinned at her. "Especially as I know full well that any of you would only actually kill in the most extreme of circumstances. Our world is quite aware of Yori and her friends, they're well respected here, having helped out on more than one occasion, and as a colleague and friend you will be given the same respect."

His wife looked up and smiled. "Don't worry, Nabiki, it's very unlikely that anyone would try anything violent anyway. Crime rates here are quite low. Some worlds are very different, you'd have to be on your guard, but most places allow a sensible right of self-defence. You of all people will have very little to fear."

"I'm not afraid or worried, really, I was mainly curious." Nabiki finished her second mug of coffee, putting the empty vessel back on the table. "I'd better go and see what the others are doing."

Smiling at her hosts she wandered out into the garden, looking around with interest. The early morning light showed the dual-edged shadows even better than the late evening had, giving a rather odd but really quite pretty effect. Walking around for a while with her camera out she inspected everything curiously, finding yet again a mix of things that could clearly be identified, even if only in context, and some things that just made her stare.

She was kneeling down watching with fascination as something she'd thought at first was a plant contentedly munched on a flying thing that had strayed too close, realising that the flying thing seemed in fact to be some sort of self-propelled seed, when she felt a familiar ki signature behind her. She finished taking a photo of it, then stood, turning to her elder sister. "It's strange here, but really cool," she said, greeting Kasumi with a smile. The older woman laughed.

"Isn't it? This is one of the nicest worlds I've been to. Very pleasant people, by and large, a sensible culture, and lots of things to see and do. Onkra wants to take us to a place she knows up in the mountains where there are a lot of waterfalls and things she thinks we'll like. Sometime in the early evening, she says the light is better then. Ranma is showing her some basic moves at the moment, she seemed interested and you know what he's like." She shook her head slightly, smiling. Nabiki laughed at this.

"You say that as if you're not exactly the same, sis. You love it as much as he does."
"Well, yes, I suppose that's true." The elder Tendo giggled, putting her arm around her sister. "I'm so glad we could show you this. I think you're really going to enjoy this holiday. Now, come on, we need to practice, you've been slacking off recently."

"Hey!" Nabiki glared slightly, incensed. "I haven't been slacking off, I've been busy. Degrees don't award themselves to you, you know." Her sister grinned. Laughing, they both headed off to where they could hear Ranma instructing the young demoness.

When they got nearer, Nabiki stopped and watched as her brother-in-law studied the alien woman as she very slowly went through a basic kata, stopping her frequently and carefully guiding her movements, thinking once more how good a teacher he was. The sheer skill was matched by seemingly endless patience for a student making mistakes, which were corrected without censure. She glanced at her sister to see her watching with clear love and affection in her eyes.

"Yes, that's it. Now, slowly to the next position. Yes, very good. The next one... stop. Like this." He demonstrated as Onkra watched carefully. "See? Rotate here, bend here, thrust like this." He did the move very slowly, then faster. She nodded, copying him exactly. "Very good indeed. Next one... and the last. All right, that's the first sequence. Now, do it again, the same speed, but try to make each one flow into the next. They link together, see? Each position leaves you set up for the next one. It should be smooth and comfortable, not jerky or forced." He demonstrated again, rippling through each motion one after another in a graceful series of arm and leg movements that formed one continuous whole.

"You're incredibly good at that, Ranma," Onkra said admiringly. "So smooth and fast. I'll never be able to do it like that."

The martial artist chuckled. "I've been doing this my entire life, Onkra. You get good at anything if you do it that much. You pick it up quickly, I suspect you'd be better than average, but it takes time, like any skill. OK, try again, don't worry about speed, just go for accuracy and smoothness at the moment. Speed comes later." She nodded, resetting to the beginning stance and trying again. He watched critically, looking pleased. "Very good. We're going to have to work out a series of katas that use your tail as well, it's not something these moves use, but it's a shame not to make use of all your limbs." Stepping back he watched as she went through the motions again, visibly more smoothly than before.

"Great. Practice that for a few minutes and I'll show you the next one." She nodded, concentrating on what she was doing, as he turned to the two Tendo women. Nabiki was just finishing a roll of film, taking the final shot of Onkra concentrating on the exercise, looking serious.

"Trying to produce the first non-human magical girl?" Nabiki asked with a giggle, lowering her camera. Onkra shot her an amused grin but kept practising, while Ranma laughed.

"No, not really, I'm just helping a friend. She's got good instincts, I think, she'll be good at martial arts if she keeps it up." He looked at the demon girl as she practised, nodding with satisfaction. "Very good, I suspect, but it will take time. I can get her started, though."

"Do her people have martial arts?" Nabiki asked.

"Oh, certainly, practically every species has, but here there are a fairly small number of people who practice them, none in this area as far as I know. I've meant for a while to look some of them up and learn them, it would be very interesting to see how they compare to the ones I already know. Like I told Onkra, having a strong tail like that would change quite a few of the moves in some fascinating ways."
"What are you teaching her?" the middle sister asked, watching as the woman went through the sequence yet again.

"No particular style yet, it's sort of a hybrid exercise from Anything Goes, incorporating some Tai Chi, Aikido, and a couple of things I worked out myself. This is one of the basic exercises, it's got several moves that are counters to a number of standard attack scenarios." Watching Onkra, he called a halt to what she was doing, returning to her and demonstrating the next set. She nodded, asking him to repeat it a few times, then slowly tried it herself. Soon, after a few corrections, she was performing the set slowly but fairly smoothly.

"Come on, Nabs, you should learn these moves as well, they'll complement what I've already shown you." He waved her over. Sighing, but also smiling, she followed instructions. For once she allowed him to get away with the nickname, although glaring at him in a way that made him smile, to make sure he knew it was a favour.

By the time Uthryyl and his wife came out to find them a couple of hours later, Onkra and Nabiki were sparring in the middle of the lawn, using only the moves Ranma had told them to practice, while he and his wife were keeping an eye on them. At the same time they were also sparring at considerably higher speed, working on a style incorporating a tail, one of which each of them had generated using the illusion spell. When, after some discussion, they had produced the tails, both Onkra and Nabiki had stopped, stared, exchanged glances, then shrugged and gotten back to what they were doing, although Nabiki did spare a moment to take a shot of their activities. Kasumi and her husband, as Uthryyl came around the corner of the house, paused what they were doing and discussed their efforts for a moment, before starting again in a completely different style.

The merchant looked at his wife who gazed back, then grinned. "You should have realised something like this would happen, dear," she said, watching her daughter practising her new hobby. She knew the young woman well enough to realise this was something she would probably keep at until she fell over.

Uthryyl watched as well, sighing. "Yes, you're right, as usual. Where those two go chaos is never far behind. At least she seems to be enjoying herself." He sipped the mug of coffee he was holding, smiling a little. "I wonder how long it will be before she's running around on the roof as well?"

"Quite a while, I suspect, she doesn't have the background they do, but I certainly wouldn't put it past her. You know what she's like." Quannyr looked very amused. Rolling his eyes, her husband muttered something along the lines of knowing all too well, then chuckled.

"OK, enough of that, you lunatics. We have some food ready then it's time to show you all around," he called. Kasumi glanced over, ducking a blow from her husband's tail without looking, making him grin, then nodded. Onkra and Nabiki finished what they were doing and bowed to each other, laughing a little, before walking over. They watched as Ranma and his wife also completed whatever it was they were attempting, looking pleased with the results, before joining the others, their extra appendages shimmering away in the process. Uthryyl shook his head in amused wonder.

"That spell of yours is quite remarkable," he commented. "I don't think you realise how unusual that sort of shape-shifting actually is."

"You've mentioned it before," Kasumi replied, looking pleased. "I'm very happy with it, it's very flexible and efficient now."

"That's sort of what I mean. You and Ranma do the most extraordinary things without seeming to realise they are extraordinary. I know mages who can do a shape-shift, or illusion as you insist on calling it, but nothing like as fast, as completely, or as undetectably. Or, for that matter, more than once or twice a day. You lot use it as easily as closing your eyes, which is just incredible." The demon shook his head again. "Even after knowing you for years, it surprises me."

Kasumi looked at her sister, who shrugged, and her husband, who grinned. "We like surprising people."

The demon laughed loudly. "That I'm well aware of, trust me." Inspecting them, he grinned, finishing his coffee. "Very strange, the way you operate, but very effective as well." Glancing at his daughter slyly, he added, "If you can teach her any of this stuff I'll be impressed. We could do with another decent mage in the family." Onkra looked somewhat irritated.

"Dad, I'm not bad, you know, I can help with the portal spell after all. That's not easy." Uthryyl snickered.

"I know, but you don't seem to have applied yourself to your studies as much as you should have, other than that and a few other things." He shook his head sadly. "No drive, young people these days." Crossing her arms and laying her ears back, the tip of her tail twitching from side to side, his daughter glared for a moment, while the three visitors exchanged grins with his wife, who rolled her eyes for a moment. This sort of teasing was clearly not unusual.

Reaching out and poking his daughter on the shoulder, Uthryyl laughed. "Don't look like that, you know I don't mean it. But I'll be interested to see if you stick with this, I know how many other things you've found as hobbies in the past." He looked at Ranma, who was grinning, sighing slightly. "So many things..." Onkra gritted her teeth, then after a moment began laughing herself.

"OK, dad, you made your point. Let's go and show them around, instead of teasing me." She glanced at Nabiki, who looked back, amused. "He's not entirely wrong, unfortunately," the young demon commed her privately. "But I'm not going to give him the satisfaction of hearing me say that." Nabiki snickered as she followed them around the house.

"Fathers like teasing their children whatever world you're on, I guess," she replied. Shrugging, Onkra nodded a little, with a slight smile.

"Yours does it too?"

"Oh, yes. Not as much nowadays, but he's not above a small practical joke now and then."

Arriving at the vehicle, she inspected it from close up. It bore a distinct resemblance to an Earth vehicle, although in a rather futuristic way, looking sleek and aerodynamic, with a glossy dark blue finish, and no apparent windows. More like some sort of advanced concept vehicle like things that she'd seen on TV than anything else, although still recognisable as a vehicle, even though the lack of wheels looked somewhat strange. It was currently resting on the flat surface of the driveway. "Cool," she muttered, walking around it looking at it curiously. "How fast does it go?"

"In ground mode it's limited to approximately two hundred kilometres an hour, in your measurement system," Uthryyl replied after checking his figures with his SI. "Flight mode is faster, about twice that, although the altitude is limited to six kilometres. It's not really a sports model, or a true aircraft, the aerodynamic properties aren't quite right for long distance flight. The power cells hold enough charge for about three thousand kilometres in flight mode, perhaps fifty percent more in ground mode." Nabiki stared at him.

"It flies?" she managed in astonishment. He chuckled.
"Of course. It's an anti-gravity vehicle, technically it's always flying. Altitude is mainly a function of power. The limitation is to keep it out of the way of higher-speed true aircraft. This thing doesn't get much lift from the body shape, the gravity repulsor is what keeps it up, so it's not as efficient as a true aircraft, but the power storage is large enough to make it useful for medium range hops. Long distance travel would normally use either a real aircraft or teleportation, assuming you can afford the magical energy. Teleportation is quite power hungry."

"Aiko jumps around all over the planet like it's the easiest thing in the world," the middle sister commented. He nodded, looking amused.

"Indeed she does. That's as remarkable as Ranma and Kasumi's magic, to be honest. The spell she uses it like nothing I've ever seen before. If it could be easily duplicated it would be worth more credit than you can imagine, but I can't make heads or tails of it. The efficiency is... well, it's unbelievable. I'd love to know where it came from originally."

Ranma laughed a little. "So would we. The artefacts that went along with them becoming magical girls are pretty weird. Unique, as far as I can tell. No mage I've ever shown any of them to has recognised them, although the one thing they all agree on is that they're amazingly old. Completely different from our magic, but also completely different from everyone else's, although vaguely based on the standard method. Dramatically more efficient though." He shrugged slightly. "I doubt we'll ever find out where they originate. But I do have high hopes of duplicating the functionality of the teleportation at some point fairly soon, it's the most useful of all the spells they have. Pretty much everything else we can already do one way or another."

Uthryyl half-smiled, half grimaced. "Well, I'll be impressed if you can do that, but it just moves the problem, your method of magic is even worse than whatever it is that they use. At least theirs is recognisable as magic, not like that weird offence against nature you came up with." He laughed as Ranma grinned. Nabiki listened with amusement, running her hand over the finish of the vehicle and wondering what it was made of. It didn't feel like metal, more like some sort of advanced plastic, or even a ceramic. Quannyr touched a place on one side causing a door to open, popping out a few centimetres then swinging up and out of the way along the curved roof. She reached inside the vehicle and prodded a control that made the rest of the doors, two on each side, do the same.

"Come on, everyone get in," she said, sliding into the driver's seat. Bending down Nabiki peered inside, then hopped in the other front seat, grinning at Ranma who had made a move for it too late. He smiled back, changing direction and getting in the back. Peering rearwards, the middle Tendo saw that there were two rows of seats behind the front ones, the rear-most having space for three occupants while the middle set could take two. It was reminiscent of a people-carrier from back home. Interestingly, from the inside the entire top surface appeared to be transparent, a slightly tinted view of the exterior perfectly visible.

"That's a good trick," she said admiringly.

"The material has a one-way transparency spell on it," Quannyr noted, putting her hand on a panel in the middle of the alien dashboard. Something beeped and a number of displays lit up with alien symbols, one or two on what would have been the windscreen on a car from home. After checking that everyone was inside she poked the relevant control and the doors closed. "The computer is more than capable of doing all the driving, and in flight mode or in the city regulations say that it has to unless you're a trained pilot, but I like driving on manual in the country. It's fun," she explained, touching another control that made something a little like a steering wheel crossed with a light aircraft yoke slide out of the panel in front of her.
The outside view dropped a little as the vehicle raised itself some twenty centimetres off the ground, although the occupants couldn't feel anything. Twisting one of the control grips made the air-car rotate about it's axis until it was pointing in the other direction, then she accelerated hard down the driveway. Nabiki watched in astonishment as the world shot away rearwards, surprised at how quickly the vehicle reached what looked like a fairly high speed. Jun, without being asked, popped up a discreet position and speed indicator off to one side. They were moving at just over one hundred and forty kilometres an hour, she saw. Again, there was no sensation of movement, which she found quite disconcerting. "How does it compensate for the inertia?" she asked curiously.

"Anti-gravity control implies gravity control as well, which in turn implies inertial control," Uthryyl said from behind her. "The gravitational reference frame inside the vehicle is isolated from the outside world by the repulsor system. From our point of view we're not actually moving, in quite a real sense. The car is in relation to the outer world, but everything in it is actually stationary relative to the car."

"That's... pretty damn amazing," Nabiki finally managed, watching as Quannyr pulled off a close to ninety-degree turn at over a hundred kilometres an hour onto a larger road which the one to the house joined, heading away from the city. There were a few other similar vehicles on the road but the traffic was very light compared to what she was used to.

"These newer vehicles are a considerable improvement over what we used twenty or thirty years ago," the merchant said. "Before we started importing the gravity repulsor systems we were using a levitation spell, which worked well, but needed more power which made it expensive to operate, and didn't compensate for motion anywhere near as well. The vehicles needed safety restraint systems like your do, for instance. We've pretty much switched entirely over to the tech-based vehicles now, they're just more convenient in almost every way. One of the cases where physical technology is superior over magical technology for everyday life. Sometimes it goes that way, sometimes the other. They complement each other pretty well here."

"Are they manufactured on this world?" Kasumi asked, interested.

"The vehicle itself is, but the drive system is bought in as a sub-assembly," the trader replied, glancing at her. "It's basically cheaper and more convenient. The infrastructure needed to manufacture them is sufficiently complex that we'd need to make a lot more than we do to make it cost-effective, so we just buy them complete from a world that turns them out by the tens of millions a year. It's pretty common. No point duplicating effort if you don't need to."

"Can you repair them if something goes wrong?"

"Oh, certainly. They're amazingly reliable to be honest, but we have full service manuals and spare part manufacturing capability. We certainly could make them if we wanted to, but like I said, there's not really any point in doing so. But spares, yes, that's easy."

Nabiki looked over her shoulder at him. He and Onkra were sitting in the seats immediately behind the front ones while Ranma and Kasumi were in the back, looking out at the view with interest.
"What's the power source?" she asked curiously.

"It's electrically powered, there are some very high-density batteries built into the floor. They use that subspace pocket spell like the drawers you were looking at last night to pack in a lot more capacity than would otherwise fit. I said it got used all over the place." He grinned at her. "In this case we can put in enough storage capacity that it would otherwise mostly fill the cabin, which would be a little counterproductive."
"So you plug it in at night or something?"

"More or less. The charging is through a wireless induction system from underneath. The driveway has a matching charge point where it was parked. It only needs to be charged every few weeks unless we do a lot of driving, but normally it gets parked there and topped off every night."

Impressed, Nabiki nodded. "Very clever. There's certainly a number of technologies there that I'm sure would be marketable at home. The batteries, for sure." Kasumi giggled from the back.

"It sounds like you're making a shopping list, sister. If you try to introduce everything at once, you'll cause chaos on our world." Her voice was very amused. "We've considered the same ideas from time to time, but I think your first idea, of the fusion reactors, is probably a better one to start with. If you really want to change the world, you should probably do it one step at a time." Nabiki laughed, looking over her shoulder again at her sister.

"We may have to set up a company to introduce new technology. I'm really beginning to think it should be done, the more I see. There are so many things here I've come across already that would make such a difference at home. I had no idea it was like this. It's like walking into a particularly good science fiction book." Kasumi smiled at her happily.

"I hoped you'd like it. Without experiencing it you'd never have believed me, though. Wait until we go to one of the really high-tech worlds, that will blow your mind."

Beside her Ranma laughed. "You have no idea." He glanced at Uthryyl who was listening with a grin. "Are we going to visit K'nn four?"

"Of course. I mentioned you'd be around, or more accurately, that 'Yori' and 'Chou' would be around, to S'th'kx, who was insistent that we visit him. He wants to thank you for your help last time. So does his son." The merchant looked at Nabiki, who was now very curious. "S'th'kx is the owner of a small asteroid mining company on one of the K'nn grouping worlds, which are a set of fifteen planets in three separate realities linked by portals. Half of them are very high tech, the others are more agrarian, around the technological level of here. They use magic, but mainly for things that technology just doesn't do as well or at all, like portals, some very good security systems, healing, things like that. Most of the day to day things are tech based like your own planet, but I'd guess about a century or so more advanced for the most part."

From the rear of the vehicle, Ranma laughed a little. "It's a pretty wild place, to be honest. K'nn four is like Tokyo on some sort of hallucinogen, it's absolutely frantically busy most of the time, people running around all over the place. Most of them are decent people but there are a lot of criminals, just because the population is so high. S'th'kx had a problem, or more accurately, his son had a problem, he got involved with some people who were a little like the Yakuza back home, but not quite as dangerous or professional. Bad enough, though. It was a mistake, he didn't know what he was getting into until it was too late. Things went a little weird. Luckily, before anyone could really get hurt his father found out, then mentioned it to Uthryyl, who asked us if we could help out."

"I assume you could," Nabiki commented. He nodded, grinning.

"Yep. They weren't actually very good at being criminals. There was some sort of robbery planned, which Th'kx'ng was supposed to be a diversion for, but his father got him to tell us what was going on. We... intervened." He chuckled darkly. "There were a number of people who seemed very surprised. The local law enforcement was a little taken aback as well but in the end quite grateful. We were careful to keep it all nice and peaceful, we didn't want to cause any real trouble, but they seemed fine with it. We even got offered jobs." He laughed, as Kasumi beside him giggled. "Had to turn them down, but they said we were welcome to come back any time we wanted and stop more criminals. I got the impression they were a bit overworked and underpaid."

"They are a very pragmatic species," Uthryyl explained to Nabiki. "Once they saw that 'Yori' and 'Chou' not only knew exactly what to do but were very good at it, they decided that they were fine with it. More or less retrospectively deputised them, to be honest. It was very funny."

Kasumi laughed lightly. "It was a bit more than 'more or less', Uthryyl." She handed him a small item that he took with interest, then looked very surprised by.

"Ah, is this what I think it is?" he asked in slight shock. She nodded with a small amused smile.

"If you think it's a K'nn level two peace enforcement authorisation, then yes, it's what you think it is."

"Good grief. I didn't know they gave you this. That's... very impressive." He handed the small token to Nabiki when she indicated she wanted to see it. The thing seemed to be made of some sort of metallic plastic, about two thirds the size of a credit card, and had 'Chou's' picture somehow floating inside in a sort of full-colour hologram effect, with a small crest of some kind below it and a block of alien symbols to one side. After inspecting it curiously she handed it back to the merchant who returned it to Kasumi.

"What does that mean?" she asked.

"It gives us authority to do more or less what we do at home, in an official capacity as an outside skilled security consultant. Like a private security firm, essentially, although allowed to carry weapons. In our case the weapons are built in, which made the situation slightly unusual but not unprecedented. They classify us as combat mages, which is the nearest they could come to what we really are." Ranma looked amused. "We can intervene in crimes with full authorisation, although we have to call in the legitimate law enforcement to do the actual arrest. That's level one peace enforcement, it requires a pretty comprehensive knowledge of the law just like a policeman at home."

"Weird. I didn't know you had such a reputation in so many places," Nabiki said, twisting around in her seat to look at her sister and brother-in-law, both of whom seemed fairly pleased. "Mind you, I suppose I should have guessed. Everywhere you go, something weird happens." She giggled a little. "I guess I'm part of that now as well."

"You've known that for a while," her sister laughed. "We didn't expect to get these, it was a real surprise, but they genuinely were serious about wanting us to work for them. I think this was sort of an encouragement. It's come in handy once or twice although we haven't been back to any of the K'nn worlds for close to a year now."

"It's also something you'd find quite effective in a number of other worlds," Onkra commented, glancing at them for a moment. "From what I know the K'nn law enforcement system has some sort of reciprocal arrangement with a few other places. Although I don't know the details." Her father nodded thoughtfully.

"That's correct. There are at least half a dozen worlds I can think of where that authorisation would get you considerable respect. Most of them are high-tech worlds but a couple are magic-based.
K'nn peace enforcers are considered very highly skilled. Quite a lot of them leave to earn more in other places after they finish their first contracts," he mused. "That also explains some of why they always seem overworked."
Quannyr turned off the main road and onto a smaller side road that wound through some incredibly pretty mountain scenery, making Nabiki and the other two turn to the windows and watch with interest. The middle sister pulled her camera out of her ki pocket and reloaded it carefully. Uthryyl watched with interest. "Chemical imaging?" She nodded.

"Yes. I expect it's very old-fashioned around these parts, but it produces amazingly good photographs."

The merchant chuckled behind her. "Electronic imaging systems are vastly more common, certainly, but there is a thriving artisan culture using various chemical imaging systems on several worlds. The results are very pleasing to the eye even when the resolution isn't as high as the electronic equivalents, a result of it being an analog process, I believe. By the size of that device and the film I would assume the images are quite large?"

"It shoots ten six by seven centimetre shots per roll with this 120 film. 220 film is twice the length and gets twenty shots, but it costs about three or four times as much, so I decided to use the shorter one. It means I have to reload more often but that's not really a problem. It's slide film, producing positive images."

"Interesting. I'd like to see the results." He laughed for a moment. "Where are you going to get the film processed? I would think that it would cause a certain amount of confusion at home if you hand a number of rolls of images of alien worlds to a photographic technician." Nabiki looked over her shoulder at him, grinning.

"It would be very funny to see their expression when they checked the film. But it's not a problem, there's an automatic processor machine in the university I can use that will develop them. I've used it before, it's much cheaper than using the normal processing services, I just have to reimburse the cost of the chemicals used. I'll have to make sure it's late at night when there's no curious people wandering around but that shouldn't be an issue. I can use the high-resolution drum scanner there as well to convert them into digital images, although the file size will be huge. Not that Jun really has a problem with that. From what I can make out it's storage capacity is essentially unlimited, for all practical purposes."

"When you do that, I'd appreciate copies of the images," Uthryyl told her.

"Of course. I'd be happy to let you have them." She raised the camera and composed a shot of the valley they were passing through half-way up the side of, focussing on a small cluster of buildings on the far side. The floor of the valley, some eight or so kilometres across, was mostly flat with a small river winding through what looked like fields of some sort of crop. Taking a few photos she lowered the camera again. "I'm beginning to wonder if I brought enough film."

"We can always get you a nice electronic camera, there are many places where they can be obtained," Quannyr said, glancing at her with a smile. "From ones that are very similar to the one you have there in operation to completely unlike it."

"That might be interesting," she replied, intrigued. "I'd certainly like to see what's available."

"Tomorrow we'll go into the city and look around, we can find an imaging specialist there and you can see what's on offer. If nothing looks suitable you can wait until we hit one of the tech worlds."

Nodding with a smile, Nabiki took a few more pictures, finishing the roll, reloaded the camera, then put it away.

"Where are we going, anyway?" she asked curiously.
"There's a lake on a plateau near the top of the mountain that gives an amazing view out over a large amount of countryside," Quannyr replied. "It's a wonderful place for swimming, something we enjoy as much as you do, I suspect, while the general area is beautiful. The waterfalls Onkra was talking about are some distance from it, in the outflow. The main one is over a kilometre tall, the total drop is something like twice that. People go there because it's so pretty. They also... Do you have a sport on your world where people jump off high places with a wing structure strapped to them?"

From the rear of the vehicle, Kasumi said, "Yes, it's called hang-gliding. It's quite popular in some places."

"Well, they do that as well. Even with levitation spells, anti-gravity vehicles, all that sort of thing, some people like just using some thin metal, composite, and fabric to cheat gravity." She shook her head for a moment in wonder. "I find it a little strange, to be honest, but they seem to like it."

Nabiki grinned.

"That sounds like fun." The demoness gave her a sidelong glance, then chuckled.

"Somehow, I'm not surprised you'd think that."

They drove on in silence for a while, everyone enjoying the view, while Nabiki pulled out the camera and took some more photos. The road had been steadily climbing, according to Jun's display they were now some four kilometres above local sea level. She inspected the trees lining the road, which had the occasional other vehicle passing in either direction, seeing that they seemed to be a different species that the ones behind Uthryyl's house, presumably something akin to conifers, in earth terms, due to the altitude. Storing her camera away she just enjoyed the view and the trip. It was oddly relaxing.

"You know," the middle sister said after a while, "One of the oddest things about all of this is how... normal... it all is." Quannyr glanced at her for a moment.

"How do you mean, Nabiki?" She could feel everyone else listening from behind her, as she tried to express her thoughts.

"It's... Well, it's kind of strange. Here we are on a completely alien world, or at least one which is in a different universe or something, with people who, no offence intended, are totally unlike anything at home, yet somehow so much of it is just... normal. I mean, you presumably evolved under totally different conditions, yet we can eat pretty much the same food, understand each other perfectly, want most of the same things out of life. I'm in a car, I suppose you could honestly call it, which is admittedly a flying car with magical spells on it and some futuristic alien drive system, yet it's clearly recognisable as a car, with similar controls as back home, on a road that's obviously a road. You even drive on the same side as we do in Japan. There are a lot of things that jump out as very obviously alien, which is what I expected, but the weirdest bit is how many things don't look strange at all, beyond a certain unfamiliarity." She looked at the alien woman next to her, who was listening with her ears cocked slightly in her direction, then over her shoulder at the others. "I don't seem to have any trouble now working out your body language most of the time, for example. Clearly that works both ways. Your house is different, yes, but even there I could probably find something more unusual somewhere at home. That city below your house is obviously a city, pretty much like back home except in the details." She shook her head helplessly. "I take it so much for granted, now, but when I step back and look at it the whole thing doesn't make any sense. A childhood of science fiction shows on TV kind of pushed the idea that all the aliens would look more or less like humans, but clearly that was because of the limitations of special effects rather than any real probability. Most decent hard science fiction I've read has suggested that true alien life, if we ever met it, might well be so alien we would have absolutely nothing in common, to the point we might not even recognise each other as intelligent."

She sighed a little, peering out the window as they passed another vehicle. "You know, some sort of super-intelligent methane breathing jellyfish floating in the atmosphere of a gas giant, or something based on cryogenic superfluids. But here I am, driving along with my friends, that despite having scales and tails, and damn big teeth, are more or less very much like me. We even understand a lot of each other's cultural references. It's... odd." Quannyr smiled slightly. Behind her, a deep chuckle came from her husband as he leaned forward into the gap beside them.

"You're not the first one to notice that. Our species are particularly close in most respects, that's true, and you'll likely meet some much more alien people in due course, they certainly exist, but portal travel does seem to connect species that are surprisingly similar in many ways. Despite physical differences, mentally a lot of them are remarkably compatible. No one knows why. There was a philosopher many years ago, Kreese, or Craze, something like that, who got quite worked up about it all. He seemed to think there was something very annoying going on, as if there was a guiding intelligence behind it that was just out to be a damn nuisance. God as a practical joker, in essence." Nabiki giggled at the thought. "Wrote a load of books on the subject, but not many people took him very seriously."

"It's a thought, certainly," the middle sister said, still looking amused. "So, tell me, my alien friend, from your non-human perspective, is there a God of some sort behind all this?"

Uthryyl laughed for a moment, while his wife grinned. "I could say yes, but that would just be wrong. To be honest, while there are more religions out there than you might believe, I don't subscribe to any of them, although some people do. The ones that do, of course, always say theirs is the one true truth. I've never seen any evidence of this. God as a prick is as good a theory as any of them, to be honest, but I'm pretty sure in fact that there is no guiding principle behind everything. It's much too chaotic for that. Oh, don't get me wrong, there are some entities that are pretty damn close to being deities for most purposes, but even they don't really know any more about the origins and purpose of the multiverse than the rest of us. They just like to say they do." He snickered for a bit. "Some of them are pricks as well." The trader shrugged slightly, his ears indicating amusement.

"No, it's all rather weird, in most ways. But that's life. One theory is that portals tend to connect similar-ish worlds, which in turn tend to produce intelligences that are in some way understandable by each other. I have no idea whether it's true. It certainly is true that most of the places I've been, even if the life there is really quite strange, normally have a species you can talk to in one way or another. Sometimes they can be difficult to truly understand, but surprisingly often you can get to grips with it. The civilisations that use interstellar travel tend to come into contact with the really alien life. Some of that is exactly what you were talking about, extremely alien indeed. I'm not sure about gas-giant jellyfish although it wouldn't surprise me all that much, but I've certainly heard of things at least as weird."

"It's somewhat odd, Nabiki, but it seems to be true. I've met several different friendly species from a number of worlds over the years and most of them are generally quite easy to get along with," her sister's soft voice said from behind the trader. "Uthryyl's people are probably the easiest, but even some of the physically quite alien species are remarkably compatible mentally and socially. S'th'kx's species are basically insects, they look a lot like very large, rather pretty beetles of some sort, but they're very nice to talk to and have a very similar outlook on life to us. You'll like them." Surprised, Nabiki considered the idea for a moment.

"Very weird. It sounds interesting, though."
They drove for another half hour, eventually arriving at the shore of a lake some eight or nine kilometres across, with a sandy beach around most of it. The air was noticeably thinner at this altitude, but she'd found out from Jun earlier that the atmosphere on this world had somewhat higher oxygen levels than at home, compensating for it to a large degree. The mountain continued up for some distance, a small cap of snow visible on the top, but it clearly wasn't reachable by road past this point. Nabiki felt a slight power surge from behind, turning to see that Ranma and Kasumi were now ‘Yori’ and ‘Chou’. She looked at them quizzically.

"We should use these personae in public, even here, as we're know like this in quite a few places. Around Uthryyl's house it's fine to be whatever you want, the house wards will keep unwanted attention away, and in the car is fine as well because no one can see inside." 'Yori' smiled at her sister-in-law. "But other places, just like at home, we're Yori and Chou. You should probably be Azumi, I think, it's surprising how word gets around." Nabiki nodded and activated her own illusion.

"Fair enough. This is something I'm completely used to now anyway," the silver-haired girl said with a grin. "It feels normal. Which is weird when you think about it." 'Yori' snickered, as Uthryyl laughed.

"You're all weird when you think about it," the merchant quipped. 'Azumi' giggled.

Driving along the shoreline Quanyrr eventually stopped about half a kilometre from where the ground started to rise again slightly, although it clearly dropped off somewhere beyond that as nothing but sky could be seen from the car. Shutting the power off she opened the doors and hopped out, then stretched for a moment. 'Azumi' and the others climbed out as well. The day was coming up on local noon, very warm but not hot, actually quite pleasant to the humans. Looking around curiously 'Azumi' could see a few other vehicles of various colours and types parked near the shore, with a number of the demons wandering around. She smiled slightly, turning to Onkra.

"What is the name of your species, anyway? I never did ask. It seems rude to call you 'demons' since you're clearly not." The young alien woman laughed.

"The name we use that is the equivalent of 'human' in our own language is D'sage. This planet is called Fwetna." She looked very amused. "In the common language it means... Dirt, or Ground. Or... Earth." 'Azumi' stared for a moment then burst out laughing.

"Oh, that's brilliant. Is that something that other species use as well?"

"It's not uncommon." Onkra giggled in her own way. "The name of your planet tends to be very old, therefore primitive, and primitive cultures do seem to refer to the world as 'the Ground', or 'the World', or something like that. Some worlds get nice fancy names, deliberately, or get named after their orbital position from their star or something like that, but that's usually ones that have been fairly recently colonised. The ones someone evolves on is more often than not referred to by a very limited set of names if you go back far enough."

"Fantastic. So, I assume in some ways D'sage means human?"

"Sort of. You could certainly translate it like that if you wanted to, without being horribly wrong."

"So we're both 'Humans', from 'Earth'." 'Azumi' shook her head with humour.

"Exactly." They stared at each other for a moment, then laughed again. Still chuckling, the middle sister turned to inspect the lake, walking down to the water's edge. Bending she investigated the water temperature, which was cool but pleasant. "It's drinkable, but it tastes a bit odd because of dissolved minerals," Onkra said, having followed her. "The source is the permanent snow-cap up there. On the other side it drains into a small river that eventually ends up going over the edge a few kilometres away, dropping a very long way. Only spray makes it to the ground unless it's rained very hard recently, but it's very pretty from above."

"How deep is it?" 'Azumi' asked. The young D'sage woman shrugged a little.

"I'm not sure. Most of it is pretty shallow, I know that, but I've heard there are some quite deep bits in the middle. Nothing dangerous lives in it although there are a lot of things you'd probably call fish."

"What do you call them?"

"Well, it translates out to... fish." Onkra grinned. "There's only a certain number of things you can call something like that." 'Azumi' looked amused. "They live underwater, they swim, they eat smaller ones or plants."

"Sounds like fish to me." She shaded her eyes and looked over the lake, noticing a few small water craft of some sort moving around on it, one or two at very high speed, leaving a tail of water high in the air. They seemed to be the alien equivalent of jet-skis or something similar, although they were very quiet. "That looks like fun."

"They're a lot of fun, actually. Quite primitive, it's a hull with a big battery, a powerful motor, and a pump, not much more than that, but they're fast and very manoeuvrable. Do you have anything like that at home?"

"Yes, extremely similar, only they're powered by internal combustion engines. Very noisy. These are nice and quiet." 'Azumi' watched as a pair of clearly very young D'sage on one of the electric water craft shot past in the shallows, leaving a huge rooster-tail of spray, shouting with enjoyment. She laughed. "This is another amazingly familiar sight. You'd find something pretty damn similar at home at the beach in a lot of places. Your people and mine really are very much alike in lots of ways." Glancing at Onkra she smiled. "I'd love to know why, but I can certainly accept it as something that happens."

Onkra made the gesture that her species used as a shrug, looking amused. "You're a lot more open-minded than some of your people. We've had some really quite unpleasant interactions even in Minato once or twice, although I have to say that the people there are a lot more laid-back about visitors from other worlds in general than you'd expect from a world that doesn't officially do much portal travelling. More so than some places I've been with Dad that do it all the time. It's very odd."

'Azumi' snickered. "I can remember one of the more spectacular interactions with... difficult people. I doubt they'll come back soon, not after what 'Yori' said. And did." She shook her head in amusement. Even after a year it was something that she found funny, the expression on the magical girl's face when she got an angry Yori's head to the nose. Onkra laughed for a while.

"That was very funny indeed. Those girls are very annoying. They certainly haven't bothered us since then, though." She looked around, waving to a couple of people she knew, then turned back to 'Azumi'. "Come over here and have a look at this," she said, heading away from the lake up the slight rise on the side away from the mountain. 'Azumi' followed, as they walked about six hundred metres to the top of the low hill, some sixty to seventy metres higher than the lake. Once they crested the rise, the middle Tendo stopped dead and stared.

"Wow," she finally managed, looking at the sight in front of her.
I never intended this to be a cross-over, but in some ways it's creeping in like that. I like Ami, I have to admit, so she may well be around on and off. Be warned, though, if you're the sort who cares, I'm going to be even less respectful of the purity of the SM universe than I am of the R1/2 one. I'll go where the story takes me. Wherever that is.

;)

Misaki sipped her tea, watching four sulking magical girls clearing away a large amount of debris, two of them grunting with strain as they pushed a crushed car onto a flat-bed truck while the driver grinned. They were all filthy, their nice skimpy body-armour/perverted clothing covered in soot, oil, and dust. Every now and then they cast evil glances at the five young women sitting around a table at a miraculously undamaged café down the street, eating a decent meal and keeping an eye on them. She giggled a little, picking up an iced bun and disposing of it in two bites.

"Your friends seem annoyed," she said to the young woman next to her, who followed her gaze for a moment then smiled unpleasantly.

"Tough. I told them, again, this was a bad idea. They ignored me, again. Maybe this will knock some common sense into them for once. They've been getting more and more over the top for ages now, I'm not surprised Yori finds it irritating. I'm in the middle of it and it drives me nuts sometimes." She sighed, resting her chin on her hand and nibbling on a french fry while watching her friends work. "They, we, started off so well. But they've gotten lazy and arrogant. It's really annoying. They're my friends, I want to support them, but..." She shrugged one shoulder, reaching for another fry. "It's getting difficult. Sooner or later someone is going to get killed if it keeps on like this. I understand why Yori doesn't want us around, if I was in her shoes I wouldn't want us around. It's only her intervening in a couple of cases that's stopped things turning to tragedy."

Fumiko exchanged a glance with her friends. "Can't you explain it to them like this? You clearly see the problems, and I know for a fact that you're very smart. You remind me a lot of a friend of mine. Surely you could make them see sense. We serve the community, all of us in this game, so blowing half of it up isn't on."

Ami sighed, rubbing her eyes with one hand. "You'd think, but no. I've tried. Over and over. None of them seem to be able to see it. There are... reasons... I suppose. Not good ones, but real." She didn't look very happy, causing the others to study her for a moment. "They're terrified of Yori and Chou both, which generally at least keeps them away from here. Yori scares the hell out of me as well, I know on paper she's not technically the most powerful person around, but I seriously wouldn't want to get her angry enough to decide to take steps to stop them permanently. I'm pretty damn sure she could, even with all of us against her." She shivered slightly. "The readings I've got in the past from her are... horrifying. My computer is supposedly the most advanced system on the planet, but it gets extremely confused when I've tried reading her power levels and magic output. Chou is nearly as bad. The results don't make any sense, not least because every time I try the output goes up. A lot." She noticed Fumiko look oddly at her, then glance at her sister.

"Does Yori know you've been probing her? She takes her security more seriously than anyone I know, by a long way. It might not make her very pleased."

"Oh, she knows, that much I'm sure of. Half the time I try I get nothing at all, as if she doesn't exist, the other half the time I get something completely terrifying. She just grins at me when the others aren't looking. It's not a nice grin either, like she knows something I don't, and wouldn't like if I found out." Fumiko nodded understandingly.

"One of your bunch mucks around with time, doesn't she?" Aiko asked. Ami looked at her in astonishment.

"That's supposed to be a secret. How the hell did you find out?" Aiko simply looked at her for a moment. "Oh. Yori. I wonder how she found out." She didn't seem terribly surprised.

"She's had practical experience with time travel, apparently. Not overly impressed with it, though, or people who use it. She's said it always ends badly one way or another."

"Why am I not surprised." The young woman sighed again. "She seems to have had a ridiculous amount of experience with some very strange things. It makes her even more dangerous. The rest of the team won't come here on a bet, after what happened the last time." She shook her head for a moment, lowering her voice to an unhappy mumble. "Big bad immortal guardian of time, my arse. She's scared shitless of Yori, she can't read her at all. Or Chou. She won't even talk about it these days, just changes the subject. I'm really not sure I trust her much any more." The others looked at each other, then Fumiko shrugged.

"Um, OK..." She paused, looking at the blue-haired girl carefully, before continuing. "Yes, I'll agree Yori has had some very odd experiences, her life seems... somewhat chaotic. But that goes with the abilities, you know that as well as we do."

"True. All too true. But in her case it's taken to ridiculous levels." Ami glanced around her table companions.

"Are you all really as close friends of hers as you seem?"

Aiko nodded slowly. "Yes. We've all known her for years, Chou nearly as long, and we trust them both absolutely. It goes both ways. In a very real sense we're family." The blue-haired girl looked around at them then glanced at her friends, who were in the process of heaving a badly damaged truck towards another flat-bed recovery vehicle, looking royally pissed off at having to do the work.

"Don't they scare you?" she asked.

"No. We have enormous respect for both their abilities and their intelligence, but they don't scare us. Not like that. Although, I would agree, you very much do not want either of them really angry with you." The brunette studied the other woman, then glanced at her friends for a moment. "You truly have no concept of what they could do if they had to. I don't know what would push them to that level, but I'd want to be on another planet if it ever happened. Assuming I wasn't helping." Ami stared at her for a moment, then dropped her eyes with another shiver, at the raw truth she saw in Aiko's face.

"Who and what the hell are they?" she asked quietly. "They're so unlike everyone else, it's frightening when you think hard about it. Half the demons they meet are terrified of them, which is even weirder than it sounds because it implies they've heard of them somehow, while the other half greet them like long-lost cousins. I know the government seems to trust them as well, I've heard some really strange things about them and people in high places who trust them implicitly. The entire area here seems to know them personally, which is just strange, and again, everyone trusts them. They've been in the news quite a bit recently all over the world, doing something no one wants to talk about, but it's clearly impressed several foreign governments a lot if what I've seen on TV is true. Now, apparently they've gone on holiday through a damn portal of all things! Holiday, on a demon world? What's that all about?"

Tamiko giggled a little. "You wouldn't believe us if we told you. And if we did we'd have to kill you, as the saying goes." Staring at her the blue-haired girl looked blank for a moment, then smiled slightly.

"Do you think you could?" The red-head suddenly went completely serious for a moment, making her companion look worried.

"Oh, yes," she said softly. "Yori has taught us an awful lot recently." Ami stared, a slightly horrified expression crossing her face, until Tamiko giggled again, breaking the spell. "But we wouldn't. We like you." Glancing at the other four, who were leaning against the truck they'd just loaded the damaged vehicle onto, she grinned. Raising her hand she casually fired a small ki sphere that popped against the backside of the girl with the long black hair, making her yell in surprise and pain, then swear vigorously, turning to glare at the source of the shot.

"What the fuck was that for, bitch?" she yelled, outraged.

"Stop slacking off!" Tamiko called back, grinning nastily. "There's two more cars and that van, plus all the bricks over there to move. Then you can rest." All four girls glared at her, but as she raised a hand with another ki ball growing in it, paled a little and hastened to fulfil their task. Ami couldn't help but snicker.

"I shouldn't laugh, but it was very funny. So was you yelling at them, Fumiko." She looked respectfully at the taller girl. "Yori rubs off in unexpected ways."

Fumiko grinned. "It was fun, I have to admit. But I wish I hadn't had to." Her face fell. "Yori is going to pop a gasket when she finds out about all this."

The blue-haired young woman looked apprehensive. "Do you have to tell her?" she asked. Fumiko looked around at the damage surrounding them, the crushed cars, cratered street, broken windows, and the collapsed building three doors down where a particularly good bookshop had been until a few hours ago, then returned her gaze to the other girl, raising an eyebrow. Ami sighed. "I know. Stupid question. It's not like she's not going to find out one way or another. Hell, she probably already knows, somehow."

"If she did she'd be here doing something unpleasant, I think, so you're all safe for the moment." Misaki motioned to the waitress for a refill, then looked back at the girl. "Although, sooner or later she'll find out. Hopefully, enough time will have passed that she's just mad as hell, not homicidal. She's more than reasonable but really, really doesn't like people breaking the district she lives in. And she's not at all impressed with your friends. Last time really was close to the breaking point for her." Noticing Ami shiver again, she smiled. "Don't worry too much. She quite likes you, and Chou is fond of you as well. She'll keep Yori from doing anything permanent. Probably."

"Oh, thanks, that's a huge comfort," the other girl snapped. Grinning slightly Misaki sipped her new cup of tea, turning to watch the other team sweat. There was silence for a while as they slowly ate, thinking their own thoughts.

Eventually, the blue-haired young woman looked at her companions. "What did Yori do in Canada? I can't find any real details about it no matter how much I look, but I'm really curious." The others exchanged glances for a moment. Eventually Aiko nodded slightly.

"You remember that demon portal terrorist thing? I know the details weren't spread widely, but I'm pretty sure you probably picked up the overall idea. Yori talked to you when she was gathering information right back at the start, when she worked out what was going on." The other girl nodded.

"I know something about it. It sounded horrific. But they shut down the cult here over a year ago, right? I heard Yori and Chou blew up the mage and destroyed the portal weapons, while government agents rounded up the cult members."

"It's a little more complicated than that." Aiko paused for a moment, then told a slightly edited version of the story to the young woman, who looked more and more horrified as time went on. When she finished, Ami stared wordlessly at her for a long moment, then swallowed hard.

"Oh, my god," she mumbled. "That's all true?"

"Yes. Unfortunately. It was pretty horrible, at the end. Halleckton is something that I'm going to see at three in the morning for a long time." Aiko sighed, lost in her own thoughts for a moment. "A long time."

"And that crater on the news a while ago? Where that Murray guy had a mansion? That wasn't some huge pile of hidden explosives?"

Fumiko smiled slightly. "No, it was Yori making a point, while getting rid of quite a lot of very nasty demons at the same time."

"It was huge! Hundreds of metres across, from what the news said. Do you have any idea how much energy would be required to do that?" Ami looked appalled, pulling out her computer and prodding it for a moment, paling at the result it gave her. "In solid rock as well. The reports say the entire lake is nearly eight degrees warmer than normal, just from the residual heat. She did that all by herself?"

"Yes, she did." Fumiko studied her for a moment, then added, "If you want to really get worried, she wasn't trying particularly hard." The girl stared at her in horrified disbelief. "I've seen what she can do when she puts her back into it. Not something you want to be in the same country as."

"Holy crap." She stared some more. "Holy crap. No, I really do not want to piss her off."

"You don't. Smiling slightly, Fumiko finished her salad, pushing the empty bowl into the middle of the table to join the others.

"And she's teaching you all these techniques as well?"

"Some of them. A lot of what she can do we may never learn, she's in a class of her own, with only Chou, and possibly Azumi one day, to keep her company there, but we've learned a lot."

"Azumi. That's the new girl, right? From Setagaya? I've heard some weird things about her. If she's a friend of Yori's, that would explain quite a lot of it. Apparently half the time she just stares at the criminals and they run away. Yori is the only other one I know who can do that." Tamiko laughed, waving for another plate of fries to the waitress.

"Azumi is... quite worrying, on several levels. She's got amazing potential. Not as scary as Yori can be, but... Well, she's a friend of mine, but she can be very creepy." The red-head glanced at her friends, who nodded slowly. "Not as creepy as Ms Aoyama, but bad enough."

"I've heard of Ms Aoyama. One or two rumours are going around about her. Something about her being some sort of agent of doom, or something. Possibly literally." The other girl looked worried. "Even the government spooks are scared of her. Who is she?"
Tamiko raised an eyebrow, looking at Aiko, who seemed amused. "No one is sure," she replied in the end, in a low voice. She glanced around carefully, then leaned closer. "But she isn't human. She... knows things." Ami leaned in as well.

"Things?"

"Things." Tamiko gazed seriously at her. There was a long pause.

"What sort of things?" Ami asked slowly, looking more worried.

"All sorts of things. Things you wouldn't believe. So be good. Yori could blow your head off without even trying. Ms Aoyama..." She shrugged a little, leaning back in her chair. "You might prefer Yori."

With an involuntary shudder, Ami looked around at the others, who nodded soberly.

"Not someone to mess with, trust me," Fumiko said, looking quickly away, her face twitching in what the blue-haired girl took as mild fright.

"I'll bear it in mind," she finally replied, not at all comforted by the conversation. She went back to watching her team-mates clear up their mess, while behind her the other four at the table exchanged looks of momentary hilarity, talking silently to each other.

Onkra giggled. "It's pretty impressive, isn't it?"

"That's an understatement and a half," was the awed response from her friend.

They were looking out at probably thousands, possibly tens of thousands, of square kilometres of plains, from a point nearly four kilometres up. The air was astoundingly clear, allowing a view of the distant ground that finally disappeared into a blur at a range she found remarkable. How far away is the horizon, Jun? she asked curiously.

#From this altitude, presuming the ground in front of you is near sea-level, the optical horizon is approximately two hundred and forty kilometres away. Your unaided vision is resolving details out to close to half that range if they are sufficiently large. The clarity of the atmosphere is very high, this world has few of the sources of pollution that cause haze or smog on your world, which improves visibility considerably.#

'Thanks.'

The plains visible in front of them were a patchwork of large-scale colour changes, obviously corresponding to different vegetation. Some parts were clearly artificially manipulated, neatly laid out fields on a large scale, multitudes of different colours corresponding to different crops, nearly the entire spectrum from bright red to a deep purple represented. Some of them were neat grids, similar to what she knew from home, while others were done as huge round areas divided into wedges like a colossal pie chart. These cultivated areas were scattered amongst other zones that looked more random and natural, in the colours she had come to associate with trees on this world. Some of the wooded areas were large enough to classify as true forests. At the far right, the land became uneven and wrinkled, full of hills, all of which appeared forested.

There were numerous clumps of buildings, small towns and one or two cities, visible right out to the horizon, with one very large one at the extreme limits of visibility off to the right, far, far out across the plain, all interconnected with roads along which some traffic could be seen moving. Small dots in the air appeared to be air-cars in flight, although none were near them. The city...
below Uthryyl's house was some distance away to the left, just peeking around the side of the cliff they were standing near the edge of. The land dropped from where they were standing on top of the ridge in a gentle slope for a few hundred metres then abruptly fell away vertically, something that wasn't visible directly in front but could be seen as the edge of the mountain curved away in both directions for a long way, forming the edge of what looked like a vast circular depression. 'Azumi' looked to one side, seeing how the drop was completely vertical for nearly half the total distance, then became a series of hills and valleys that evened out into the floor of the plain.

'It appears that this mountain range is part of the ring wall of a very large, very old impact crater, Nabiki,' Jun commented. 'The information I have on it is that the structure is several dozen million earth years old, much of the wall having eroded away over time, but this section was left because it was created from much harder rock. The D'sage decided that the evidence suggests the impactor came in at a low angle, heading almost directly at where you are currently standing, pushing up a somewhat higher ring wall than would have otherwise happened in such hard rock. Traces of the original body have been found, mostly as metal rich areas in rock that otherwise would have been unlikely to contain such elements. These have largely been mined out as ore veins over the years. Your world has evidence of similar events, the Sudbury basin in Canada being the most obvious one, albeit somewhat smaller than this. Halleckton is inside it.'

'Is that why there are so many mines around that area?', she asked.

'Yes. The entire area is very metal rich. Backfilling with magma is the source of the majority of the metals in that case.'

"The entire plain out there is the floor of a huge crater," Onkra said, confirming what Jun had just told her. "It's very, very old, and very fertile. After it was formed it flooded for millions of years, forming an inland sea, which eventually dried up. The end result was a huge amount of nutrient-rich topsoil that's almost flat. For a long time most of the crops on this continent were grown here. Some people think this area is more or less the origin of our species. We've certainly found evidence that it's been inhabited for longer than almost anywhere on the planet. The city in the distance is the capital, Krentak. The smaller one that's visible from our house is Sirtha, it's a prosperous trading and manufacturing hub, but much smaller." Jun brought up a couple of windows showing information on both the cities, including population, distance from their location, and basic maps. 'Azumi' looked at them with interest for a moment then dismissed them.

"It's one hell of a view," she said, admiring it. Pulling out her camera she used half the roll taking a series of panoramic shots from left to right, then changed the lens for a telephoto one and got a couple of shots of both cities. Krentak was so far away even with the long lens it was barely visible, but she could make out some very large buildings that put the ones in Tokyo to shame. Several of them must have been in excess of two kilometres tall. Jun's data suggested it had a population of over five million people. Having changed the film she put the camera away again.

"This entire area is popular for tourism and sports. There's a lot of wildlife, all sorts of interesting animals live in the forests and mountains, some of them pretty large. Mostly not dangerous but there are one or two large predators that could be a worry if they were in a bad mood. Not around here, though, more further in. You more or less have to go looking for them," Onkra pointed to one side. "Those guys there come up here all the time for the flying." 'Azumi' followed her finger, looking at a group of people standing around a number of machines easily recognisable as some form of hang-gliders, with a few vehicles parked nearby. "A friend of mine does it, he says it's fantastic. He's always trying to get me to give it a go but I haven't tried it yet." She squinted, then waved. One of the figures waved back, calling something unintelligible. "That's him there, actually. Let's go and watch."
They wandered over to the collection of people and equipment, being joined soon after by 'Yori' who had wondered where they'd gone. The two Earth people inspected the flying machines while Onkra greeted her friend. "Cool, aren't they?" the martial artist said, as they watched one of the young people get strapped in to a glider by a couple of assistants. Unlike the hang-giders that 'Azumi' had seen before, where the pilot basically hung underneath in a harness, these ones strapped on to the limbs and body, with control linkages to the wings and tail. They looked more like a cross between a light aircraft and a giant bat than the delta-wing kites or parafoil designs she was familiar with.

"It looks like the control system is done by moving your arms and legs, and in their case, tails, to drive the surfaces directly," she added, kneeling down to closely investigate a bright yellow glider that was next to them. "They seem to be made of some sort of very thin fabric over a composite skeleton of some type. Carbon fibre, perhaps? Something like that." Glancing at the owner of the machine for permission, she gently lifted one wing-tip. "That's amazingly light. The entire thing can't weigh more than about fifteen kilos. I'm surprised it's strong enough to take the stresses involved in flying."

Running her hand carefully over the wing surface, 'Azumi' nodded slowly. "It's certainly a lot more advanced than anything I've seen before. Someone I know tried this for a while back home, she said they were made of nylon fabric like a parachute, with an aluminium structure. Nothing like as light as this." They turned to watch as the pilot, fully attached to his glider, ran down the slight slope towards the edge of the cliff, into the light breeze. He was airborne within fifty metres, swinging his legs up behind him where they locked into the structure. Delicate movements of his limbs made the aircraft turn and head along the slope, gathering lift until it soared out over the edge, spiralling higher in the air rising up the face of the cliff. They watched with interest as the pilot circled around several times before heading out over the plain, joining a small group of gliders some distance higher.

'Yori' shaded her eyes and squinted. "Some of those aren't gliders, they're some sort of flying animal. Big, too." ‘Azumi' followed her gaze, trying to make out the shapes.

"They look like pterodactyls or something like that," she answered. 'Jun, what are those?'

I am unsure, Nabiki. There are several species in my database that meet those parameters but none are native to this world. A closer view might allow positive identification. It paused, then added with distinct amusement, Or you could ask Onkra, I would expect she would know.

'Azumi' laughed slightly.

'Now, that's getting far too common sense.' She looked toward her friend, who was approaching accompanied by the young male D'sage she had been talking to. "Hey, what are those things?" she asked when the woman was close enough, pointing. Both of them looked up for a moment.

"They're called Mountain Soarers. Technically they're a species of flying animal from a different world, they're sort of an accidental import. Apparently, quite a long time ago, someone brought some back for a zoo, but didn't take as much care as he should have to prevent them escaping."

Onkra grinned. "They escaped. By the time anyone realised where they'd gone they'd bred, there were dozens of them. The things seem to thrive in this environment. Some attempts were made to catch them but they always missed a few. In the end everyone kind of gave up. They're quite nice to look at, they live off animals that are very prolific breeders and eat crops, and they don't seem to cause any real ecological damage, so no one minds too much. The glider fliers use them to work out where the good thermals are, and the soarers themselves don't appear to mind gliders flying in the same area."
"If anything they seem to enjoy it," her companion said, in the trade language for their benefit. He looked amused. "I've seen them come up and join us in thermals if we got there first, they use us as much as we use them. I think they're reasonably smart, nothing like sentient but at the level of an effective predator. We get on well, by and large." Holding out his hand he added, "Hi, I'm Jyrron. Onkra has told me a bit about you, friends of the family visiting from an unaligned world, I believe?" 'Azumi' shook his hand with a nod and a smile, as did 'Yori'.

"That's right. This is my first time here. I'm Azumi."

"Yori. Pleased to meet you, Jyrron." The young man looked at the martial artist with his ears cocked forward alertly.

"Yori. I know that name." After a moment's thought he nodded. "Definitely. You and your partner Chou have a reputation as being extremely dangerous magic users and fighters, I seem to recall. Something about a kidnap, wasn't it, the last time you were here?" The middle sister looked at 'Yori' as she grinned.

"Yep. One of your politicians lost track of his wife, some rather unpleasant people seemed to be keen on a reward for returning her. Or they'd send her back in pieces. He wasn't happy, at all, and we were called in through a chain of people ending up with Uthryyl who is a good friend. We sorted things out." Her grin grew teeth. "Quite permanently."

"I remember. It was on the news for a while. External security consultants, they called you. There were a number of other cases as well. You both definitely have very impressive reputations. Healers as well, wasn't it?"

"Amongst other things. We have a number of useful skills." Jyrron laughed for a moment.

"So I gather." He glanced at Onkra who was smiling. "You seem interested in the gliders."

'Azumi' nodded. "We have something like them at home, but constructed differently and controlled in a somewhat different manner."

"Have you ever flown anything like this?" He looked them up and down for a moment. "No tails, which would make our control system difficult. Although I guess we could program the computer assist to bypass that part." He looked thoughtful for a moment, then nodded. "Yes, that should work. Fancy a try?" 'Azumi' looked at her companion, who was staring at the gliders with an interested expression.

"You'd let two people who you've never met before try one of these things just like that? What if we crash it?" Jyrron smiled.

"That would be difficult. They look pretty primitive but they're more advanced than you might think. There's a fairly smart flight computer that can take over in the event of pilot incapacitation, or if it realises you're doing something dangerous. If we put it in teaching mode it does most of the work, you just tell it where to go. If it all goes horribly wrong there's also a backup antigrav recovery system that will get you down safely, although the power pack is very small, so it's basically a controlled fall with a soft landing. To get back up here we'd have to come and pick you up in a car." Not completely sure, but intrigued, 'Azumi' finally nodded.

"OK. I'm up for it. How about you?" She glanced at 'Yori' who grinned happily.

"Always ready for new experiences."

"Great." Jyrron glanced at Onkra, who nodded eagerly.
"Damn right. If they're going to try so am I."

"All right. Come on over here, we have a couple of spare gliders as backups, and I can borrow another one easily enough." They followed him back to the group of people setting up another glider and pilot for launch. Shortly 'Azumi', 'Yori', and Onkra were listening as he explained the function and use of the controls of one of the gliders. "It uses wing warping, which twists the wing-tips, to control direction. The tail surface bends like this to make turns smoother," he demonstrated, "and also to climb and descend."

"How does it move the control surfaces?" 'Yori' asked curiously. "I can't see any actuators."

"The material covering the wings changes shape when an electrical current runs through it. The computer reads the desired movements from the input controls and generates the right outputs to perform the action. The batteries are in the spine part, here, they store enough power to operate it for nearly a full day, with a reserve for the antigrav for one trip from maximum altitude to ground level at a fairly slow speed. Slow enough that you'll just walk away with no damage, although it might sting a bit when you land." 'Azumi' shared a glance with 'Yori', who seemed amused.

"What would happen if we fell from this sort of altitude without the antigrav?" she asked privately.

"You'd reach terminal velocity in a few hundred metres, after that it doesn't really matter how far you fall. For us, me and Kasumi certainly, it would be nothing particularly interesting. I've hit the ground moving much faster than that before with no ill effects. On me, that is, what I hit didn't enjoy it." 'Yori' smiled. "By now, I doubt you'd have any issues either. Aiko and the girls certainly wouldn't. Don't worry about it."

"OK."

Returning her attention to Jyrron's demonstration, she listened as he explained how the control harness translated motions of the pilot's extremities and shifts in bodyweight into control inputs for the flight system. He explained the basics of flight and the sorts of thing the computer would expect and more importantly, allow.

"It's pretty simple, actually. Most people get used to it in a few minutes, and are reasonably good in an hour or so. The computer will intervene less and less as you get better at it, but at first it will be doing most of the work. Right, let me just set these two up for you poor tail-less freaks and we can get you in the air." His expression was one of sly amusement. Onkra whacked him with her own tail, making him jump, then laugh. A few minutes work on a small control panel and he nodded in satisfaction, checking the display. "That should do it. The flight computer will compensate for a partial control input." Picking up a set of goggles he looked dubiously at them for a moment.

"These aren't going to fit, though, our heads are nowhere near the same shape. This is where the instrumentation overlay comes from that gives you your airspeed, altitude, heading, that sort of thing, and the communications. Hmm."

"I can easily interface to the flight system and produce a far superior instrument set, Nabiki," Jun said, sounding pleased. "Obviously, the communications are easy."

"The instrumentation and comms aren't a problem," 'Yori' said, smiling a little, having clearly received the same advice from her SI. "We have our own methods of dealing with it." Jyrron looked at her for a moment then shrugged.

"Fair enough. Aliens are weird." He grinned. "Right. Who wants to go first?" A quick game of rock, paper, scissors later, and 'Yori' stepped forward, looking pleased. Jyrron and a colleague quickly strapped her in place into the orange glider. "OK, try the controls." She moved her arms and legs slightly, watching as the wings and tail shifted. "That seems to work. All right, remember what I told you. Run into the wind until you get lift, that won't take long, then as soon as you're in the air swing your legs back so the harness locks them in. After that, the flight computer will take you to a safe altitude and release some control. Is your alien system getting the instruments?" 'Yori' nodded.

"Yep. Artificial horizon, airspeed, heading, everything looks good. Comm check." Her voice suddenly came out of the communications interface his companion was holding, making the other man jump and stare. "That works." The D'sage man looked at her for a moment.

"I wish I knew how you were doing that. Right, are you ready?" 'Yori' nodded again. He and his helper balanced the glider structure until she was orientated correctly, then released it as she began sprinting down the slight hill towards the cliff edge. Seconds later she was in the air, her legs clipped up behind her. A shout of joy came clearly towards them as the glider soared over the edge of the cliff, circling higher. Jyrron watched carefully for a moment, until he was sure that everything was going to plan, then turned to 'Azumi'. "Your turn."

As she watched the ground abruptly drop away thousands of metres below her Nabiki gasped in awe and excitement, her 'Azumi' face glowing with a huge grin. 'This is amazing.' she thought to herself. Returning her attention to straight ahead she watched the overlaid instruments Jun was providing, seeing how fast the altimeter was ticking upwards as the flight computer gained height, circling around in the lift generated by the upwelling air from below. It levelled off at a little under nine hundred metres higher than she'd started at, gently circling to the right, heading away from the cliff. She looked around, grinning at the incredible view.

'Why have I never done this before?' she wondered, even as she knew she'd never have dared try something like this before she'd gained the abilities she now possessed. There was something very comforting about knowing that even if the alien technology did fail, a very unlikely eventuality, she would basically bounce. The thought amused her considerably.

#The flight computer is accepting manual input now, Nabiki,# Jun informed her. With a nod she experimentally tried flexing one wing-tip, yelping in surprise at how quickly the glider turned in the appropriate direction.

'Gack. That's very sensitive,' she told the SI.

#I can reduce the control gain if you wish, to damp out sudden movements.# Jun replied.

'That might be a good idea for the moment.' Trying again, she found the response was much less vigorous this time. 'Better. Now, let's see if I can get the hang of this...' Half an hour later she was circling back towards the cliff, slightly lower than the altitude she'd started at, having made rapid progress with the controls. The computer had intervened several times in the first few minutes, but for some time hadn't had to do anything. Jun had slowly increased the control gains back to where they had started. 'This is incredible fun,' she commented to the SI. 'I just wish I could use my camera as well.' Overflying the lake at a few hundred metres, she looked around trying to spot her sister and the merchant and his wife.

"Isn't this amazing, Nabiki?" Onkra commed her.

"Damn right. I could do this all day. Where are you?"

"Behind you to your left and slightly higher, out over the cliff," the young alien woman responded. "The green and blue glider." Circling around she scanned the area, until Jun dropped a designator over one aircraft.
"Got you." She watched with amusement as Onkra pulled off a perfect loop. "Not bad." Swinging around and heading out towards her friend, she spotted 'Chou' looking up at them. "Hi, sis," she commed, waving one hand, then yelping when the glider rolled hard to port. "Whoops. Forgot I need that hand to fly."

"Be careful, sister," the older woman's voice came, a giggle in it. "That looked exciting."

"It's amazing. You really have to try this," Nabiki said. "I want one of these things. Or a flying form. This is so much fun."

"I've been working on that, actually. I have some ideas. There are a couple of things I need to work out, but I think I'm close to something practical and fun as well."

"The sooner the better." Nabiki laughed out loud, diving the glider and looping it, then rolling out of the loop at the top, before resuming her flight towards Onkra. Behind her, her older sister laughed, walking along the shore of the lake with Quannyr and Uthryyl. When she reached the place her friend was circling around in, she fell in a few tens of metres away, turning her head to grin at her.

"This was a damn good idea. That friend of yours is very generous to let us play with his gliders," she said.

"Jyrron is a nice guy," Onkra replied. "I've know him for a while, he's tried to get me up in one of these things several times. Now, I'm wondering why I waited so long. This is fantastic fun. I'm going to have to get one myself. I wonder how much they are?"

"We should look into it. I could certainly see them being popular at home." Onkra giggled.

"Another thing for your shopping list. Nabiki Tendo Interworld Import/Export sounds like it's going to be busy."

Snickering, Nabiki replied, "I don't think it's quite gone that far yet, but I really do think I'm going to have to look into something along those lines at some point. There are so many cool things here that could make a real difference at home, some of them so simple. We can do this already, pretty well, but these are easy and safe for beginners. That's a damn good selling point." She laughed for a moment. "Although I don't know how I could explain where they come from. Alien technology is probably even more difficult to explain than demon magic."

"These are pure tech, no magic at all as far as I know," the other woman said. "The antigrav is probably the only part your world couldn't already make with some effort. Although I think the electronics are probably more advanced by a couple of decades than what you make at the moment." The pair had settled into a steady glide away from the cliffs, which were now some ten kilometres behind them. Looking back, Nabiki slowly started to make a wide right turn, Onkra following, until they were heading back. A moment later a familiar bright orange glider moved neatly into formation on her other side. 'Yori' grinned at her.

"Fun, isn't it, Nabs?" she asked.

"I'll let that one slide because, yes, it is huge fun," she smiled back. "I want one of these for Christmas." 'Yori' chuckled over the comm.

"So do I."

The three of them swooped and circled for a while longer, in the lift from the cliffs, until Onkra suddenly said, "Look to your left and slightly higher." Nabiki and 'Yori' both turned their heads.
"Holy shit! That thing is a lot bigger than I thought it would be." 'Yori' sounded impressed. The Mountain Soarer had slid up behind them very gently, none of them noticing it until it was only fifty metres away. It had a wingspan of close to ten metres, not far off that of the gliders they were flying, and was inspecting them curiously. Nabiki could feel no threat from it, only interest. It seemed to be concentrating on the two non-natives. Moving slightly closer and dropping to the same altitude with small motions of its wings and tail, it kept looking sideways at her, as she looked back, trying not to make any sudden movement that might scare it off. Wishing she could take a picture she settled for recording everything.

The flying animal was clearly an animal and not a bird. It had seven limbs, a long tail slightly like the ones the D'sage possessed, forelegs and hind legs, both with taloned paws on that looked slightly catlike, and a pair of wings that were somewhat bat-like, only covered in fine fur. They sprouted from roughly halfway down it's body, between the fore and hind limbs. The body shape was vaguely reptilian, mainly due to the tail, although the head looked more like a cross between a fox and a frog, with large wide-set eyes, small pointed ears folded back against the wind, and a large mouth which was lined with small teeth, visible when it yawned. The colour scheme was interesting, a slate-grey underside with a darker topside, deep blue markings similar to the rosettes of a leopard visible in the fur. The wings were covered in a lighter coloured fur, almost smoke-grey, and much finer than on the body.

Overall it was quite impressive, not least because of the size. It moved slightly closer to Nabiki, looking her over carefully, then slid over to do the same to 'Yori'. The motions were accompanied by surprisingly little wing movement. "Are you as close to that creature as it looks from down here?" her sister suddenly asked, making her twitch a little.

"Possibly closer," she replied. "It's huge! And seems to find us very interesting." The middle sister opened a visual link to the other woman, showing her what she was looking at.

"Oh, my. That is quite a large animal. It seems very curious." The soarer had moved closer to Nabiki again, looking at her closely. It made an odd yipping noise, which made her grin.

"Friendly enough, I think, though. I can't work out if it's just interested in us, or wants something. It's looking at me like a dog after a snack." 'Chou' giggled.

"Perhaps you should have brought something to feed the wildlife with," she said. Nabiki laughed.

"That would be difficult, my hands are otherwise occupied."

"That wing structure is interesting," her sister said, sounding intrigued. "Like a bat, but... different, somehow. I wish I could get a closer look at it." Nabiki stared at the animal, trying to gently move closer without frightening it off. "Oh, that's better. Thank you." There was a long pause. "Can you get above it?"

"I'm not sure. It might not like something higher than it, I think that's considered predatory in flying things. I'll try it and see what happens." 'Yori' and Onkra watched with interest as Nabiki gently applied a little up elevator, gaining altitude and losing speed to position herself above and behind the animal. Surprisingly, it didn't react, although it was clearly aware of her. Eventually she was about ten metres higher and perhaps twenty behind it.

"Well done. Yes, that's interesting indeed. Thank you, Nabiki."

"Why the interest, Sis?"

"It's a surprise." 'Chou' giggled, then dropped off the link. Wondering what her sister was up to,
"Wow. That thing can really move when it wants to," Nabiki said to her friends.

"They are extremely good fliers," Onkra replied. "I remember reading about them a while ago, they've been known to reach speeds of nearly three hundred kilometres an hour in a dive, in your measurement system. Apparently they come from a world with considerably higher gravity than ours, their bone structure is immensely strong and their muscles are very powerful. In this gravity, they can fly very easily indeed, for hours if not days."

"Impressive."

"Hey, you three, are you ready to come back yet?" Jyrron's voice suddenly intruded on them. He sounded amused. "We're going to need the gliders back eventually."

"We're enjoying ourselves," Onkra retorted, laughing. "Why didn't you tell me how much fun this was?"

"I've been telling you that for a long time, Onkra," he said, chuckling. "It's not my fault if you wouldn't listen." She giggled a little.

"OK, we're coming back. I'm getting hungry anyway." She peeled off from their formation, heading rapidly towards the collection of vehicles near the edge of the cliff, and the people surrounding them. Nabiki grinned and followed, as did 'Yori'. She laughed as Onkra shot low over the heads of the people on the ground, making one or two duck, pulled up into a loop, then circled around to make a neat landing a hundred metres from the edge of the cliff. As she passed overhead she could see the young woman grinning.

Making a somewhat less enthusiastic approach, the middle sister landed close by, followed seconds later by 'Yori'. Jyrron and a couple of friends came over, smiling, to help them release themselves from the flying machines.

"Thank you, Jyrron," 'Yori' said, shaking the young man's hand. "That was immense fun. I'm going to have to look into getting some of these things and taking them home." He grinned at her.

"I can give you the name of a dealer in Sirtha. They're locally manufactured, and not all that expensive."

"Thanks." They talked for a while as 'Azumi' and Onkra chatted to the other pilots, then shook hands once more. Waving, the three of them headed back to the lake.

"That was a hell of a way to waste a few hours," 'Azumi' said with satisfaction. "Just that was worth the trip." Onkra nodded, smiling happily.

"I can't remember the last time I had so much fun. And that soarer? I've never seen one up close like that. They're very impressive." Heading down the lake side of the ridge, they looked around, then headed for where the vehicle was parked.

"Kasumi? Where are you guys, we're back on the ground, near the car." Nabiki looked around, trying to feel her sister.

"We're down near the lake. We were about to go swimming." 'Chou' sent her a data ping with her location, which Jun dropped into a map, highlighting their position.

"OK, got it. We'll be there in a minute." Shortly they walked up to where the others were, noticing that 'Chou' was wearing a swimsuit now. She turned and smiled at them.

"Did you have fun? It certainly looked like it." 'Azumi' nodded, grinning widely.

"So much fun. I have to get one of those things." Her elder sister gave her an amused look, as if she knew something the other woman didn't.

"I may have to try it myself," she said quietly. More loudly, she added, "We're going to swim for a while. Are you coming in, or has the flying been enough excitement for one day?"

"Oh, I think we could manage," 'Yori' commented, smiling. She looked around, then shrugged, unconcernedly disrobing and pulling on her own swimsuit which she produced from ki space. None of the D'sage in the area paid any attention beyond a casual look. Most of them were either nude or wearing very little as well. Body modesty obviously wasn't much concern amongst them. 'Azumi' smiled a little, remembering years back when Ranma had first arrived, showing little concern for her female body being seen even then. Obviously nothing much had changed in that respect.

"Pity we can't use the mer-forms here," she sent to both her sister and her sister-in-law, who both looked at her, before exchanging glances. "I know you don't want to give away the existence of the illusion spell."

"We've kept it a secret, mostly, because it's a tactically useful thing to have in reserve, and we didn't want to give anyone the right idea about us. Back home that's something of a concern, still. Here..." 'Yori' glanced at 'Chou', who shrugged a little. "If you would like to use it, it shouldn't cause much of a problem. If anyone asks we can always say that Azumi is a limited shape-shifter of some sort, which is kind of accurate after all. It doesn't necessarily imply anything about either of us, since no one other than Uthryyl and his family knows we're related."

"Are you sure? I don't want to be the one to give away classified information," 'Azumi' snickered.

"It should be safe enough here, sister," 'Chou' replied. "We should probably avoid it at home wherever possible, in case people link Ms Aoyama and Azumi slightly too closely, although there your personae are so clearly different it's probably unlikely. Azumi is a bit worrying, but Ms Aoyama is... deeply unsettling." She smiled a little.

"All this secrecy really is a pain," 'Azumi' sighed. "Although I do understand the reasons."

"If we have to we can certainly make sure people see Ms Aoyama and Azumi in the same place at the same time, which should settle any lingering doubts if they arise." 'Yori' looked amused. "I'll have to be Azumi, though, I don't think I could pull off a convincing Ms Aoyama to anyone who's met her before. I'm nowhere near creepy enough. Terrifying isn't the same thing."

"Thanks, Saotome," 'Azumi' sent, giggling. "Really, I mean it, thanks. That's one of the nicest things you've said about me." 'Yori' laughed delightedly.

"And it's from the heart."

Onkra was watching them all with a smile, guessing from their expressions that they were all talking together. "What's going on?" she queried, amused. They all looked at her in eerie synchronism, making her laugh.
"We were just discussing what I'm allowed to show off in public," 'Azumi' replied. She grinned, then looked around. They were standing on the beach near a small jetty-like platform jutting out into the water, which the water-craft users were using to launch their machines from. It was about fifteen metres long, ending in water that was clearly several metres deep. No one was on it at the moment, so she started walking towards it, followed by a curious Onkra, while her parents watched.

"Allowed to show off? What's that mean? And why are we being secretive about it?" the D'Sage woman asked curiously. "Where are you going?"

"Swimming," the spoken reply came.

"With your clothes on?" Onkra looked askance at her friend. 'Azumi' grinned, then broke into a sprint, running down the jetty and leaping off the end, in a neat arch ending up in a perfect dive. What entered the water wasn't the figure that had left the ground. Onkra gaped for a moment, while Uthryyl burst out laughing and Quannyr giggled, then ran to the end of the jetty and looked into the water. A head popped up, mer-'Azumi' grinning at her. "Um, wow?"

"Come on in, it's nice," her friend said, giggling, then flipped over with a flick of her tail and disappeared, popping back nearly a hundred metres away in a ridiculously short time. "Come on!" Onkra shook her head, turning to look at her father who had walked up beside her, still laughing.

"Aliens are weird," she said with a wry smile.

"Oh, yes, that they are. Good fun, though." Glancing at her he suddenly thrust his arm out, neatly pushing her in, then looked around innocently as if he couldn't understand what all the shouting was about, before walking away looking amused. Quannyr and 'Chou' nearly fell over giggling, 'Yori' was rolling around in the sand howling with laughter, while Onkra thrashed about swearing.

"Dad! That wasn't funny," she yelled, several bystanders putting the lie to her statement by grinning widely.

"Want to bet?" he called over his shoulder, heading back to his wife and friends. She muttered darkly to herself, treading water, then began swimming back to the jetty. 'Azumi' suddenly appeared beside her, totally at home in the water, looking very amused.

"He's definitely not above teasing you, is he?" she asked rhetorically. Onkra kept swimming, reaching the edge and hauling herself out to sit on it, dripping wet.

"No. Now, what do I do to get him back?" She looked to the side as her friend heaved herself out to sit beside her, swishing her tail in the water, inspecting her closely, before grinning. "That's amazing. I didn't know you were so good at that shape-shifting spell," she added privately.

"I'm not, not really. It's incredibly complicated, you wouldn't believe it, so Sis set me up with a number of preset forms. This is one of them. I'm studying the spell when I get time, and slowly making sense of it, but it's going to be quite a while before I can do it arbitrarily like they can." 'Azumi' sighed a little. "It's kind of worrying, and a little depressing, how good they both are at such complicated things. I don't know if I'll ever catch up."

"You will. I'm pretty sure of that. So are Dad and Mom. We all have a lot of respect for the way you've progressed in such a short time." Her friend smiled at her. "I'm in awe of it, actually. You took on an amazingly difficult task and have done very well with it. Right, I'm going to change, I'll be right back." Jumping to her feet the young woman wandered off, leaving wet footprints up the jetty. A moment later 'Chou' took her place beside the silver-tailed mermaid, who looked up.
"Hi." She smiled. "This is a wonderful place."

"Isn't it?" Leaning back on her hands, her sister looked around at the scenery, up at the mountains behind them, then out over the lake on which quite a few people were thoroughly enjoying themselves. "Both of us have visited Uthryyl before several times, but we've never come up here. I like it very much."

"You'd love the gliding. And you have to go and look at the view over the edge, you have no idea how amazing it is until you're up there." The younger sister looked around as well, then sighed a little. "It's a pity that Akane and Dad can't see all this." Putting her hand on her sister's one, 'Chou' smiled gently.

"One day. At least you'll have the photos to show them when we can finally come clean about all of this."

"Do you think that will ever happen?"

"Yes, eventually. I'm sure of it. But for now, it doesn't matter. This is a holiday, we don't have to do anything except have fun. So, I'm going swimming." The blonde slipped into the water, heading out into the middle of the lake at a fast front crawl. Her sister watched her go for a moment, then laughed slightly, following at much higher speed with a flick of her tail.

Behind her, Onkra and the others all jumped one after the other off the end of the jetty, soon dispersing out into the water, laughing and calling to each other, everyone enjoying themselves thoroughly.
"Happy now?" Fumiko studied the black-haired magical girl who had spoken, someone who could perhaps be better described as the absolutely filthy, sweating, exhausted, torn-uniformed, and pissed off magical girl, then turned to inspect the street which was much more tidy, although still damaged. She pointed.

"You missed a bit."

The girl stared at her, opened her mouth, went red, then slowly deflated, unable to summon up the energy to do anything else. Sighing heavily and slumping her shoulders she closed her mouth again, walked over the lone concrete block lying half crushed in the gutter, carefully picked it up, then trudged to the skip that was being loaded onto the waste truck and dropped it in. The workmen watched with smiles that were entirely too wide for her mental well-being, full as they were of a certain amount of schadenfreude, a concept she was aware of even if she couldn't spell it. Ami watched, glancing at Fumiko, who winked when her team-mate couldn't see it, covering her mouth to stifle a giggle and schooling her expression to one of appropriate seriousness.

As the girl came back and rejoined her other colleagues who were leaning against the wall of the local bank, looking at least as dishevelled and tired, two of them with their eyes closed and one watching the first girl with a look of horrified bewilderment as if she was trying to work out where and when everything had gone so badly wrong, Fumiko nodded in satisfaction.

"Great. Well done. Now, you remember what I said?" They all nodded, the two blondes not bothering to open their eyes. "Even better. I'm sure Yori will take your cooperation into account when she comes back, although she may want a word as well." As one, they all shuddered and paled, exchanging glances as the eyes of the two team-mates shot open in sudden fright. The tall young woman smiled slightly nastily at the reaction, while Ami had to bite the inside of her cheek to keep a straight face. Producing four bottles of water, Fumiko handed them out, watching with a grin as they all grabbed one each and drained it in seconds. The brunette dropped her empty bottle to the ground, then jumped at the polite cough from Tamiko, who looked meaningfully at it, then her. Sighing, she picked it up and flipped it into the skip truck. One of the workmen chuckled without looking at her, which made her glare for a moment.

"OK. Aiko is going to take you all back to your 'secret base', since you're clearly too tired to walk."

Fumiko made little air quotes with her fingers, grinning. They exchanged glances.

"Um, secret base?" The twin-pony-tailed one stared for a moment, then looked at her friends again. "I don't know what you're talking about."

"Oh, sure you do. On top of a hill? Old man?" She paled, while the others looked worried. Fumiko and her friends all giggled. "We know who you are, and we know where you live." She looked suddenly serious, staring at each of them in turn until their eyes dropped. "So be good, or we'll come and say hi." Turning to Ami while they were trying to think of what to say to that, she held out her hand. The blue-haired young woman shook it. "Take care, Ami. You can visit any time you like. Please leave your friends behind, though." The others all nodded, while the rest of her team shot her annoyed glares. She smiled at Fumiko.

"Thanks. I'm sorry about all this. I'll do what I can to make sure it doesn't happen again."

"Please do. It was nice talking to you." Aiko walked over to her, clapping her on the shoulder.
"No lasting effects from the trial teleports earlier?" she asked quietly, glancing at the rest of Ami's team. She shook her head, smiling slightly, fairly sure she knew why the short brunette had taken her off privately and jumped her around for a little while.

"Nope. I feel fine."

"Good." As they walked over to the depressed and dirty girls, she added in a whisper, "Stand off to one side. Out of the way of the vomit..." All six of them disappeared with a flash, while Tamiko started laughing. When Aiko reappeared, they all looked at each other for a moment, then howled with glee.

"Did you record it?" Misaki managed to ask her friend.

"Of course. It was... spectacular." Aiko had a huge grin on her face. "Yori is going to love it." They nearly fell over in renewed laughter, before Fumiko went off to thank the various contractors who were engaged in taking the debris away and already beginning the repairs, still giggling to herself.

"Are you sure you know what you're doing?" The questioner looked at his friend somewhat dubiously. The other young man was elbow-deep in the innards of his older brother's LakeJet 10 water-craft, fiddling with the power supply.

"How hard can it be?" the fiddler asked, his tail slowly twitching back and forth, betraying his concentration. "I looked it up before I borrowed this thing. I just need to crack open the power control unit, then I can bypass the speed limiter. It can go a lot faster, but Thren locked it down because," he looked up and finished sarcastically, his ears back, "I'm too young to handle that much speed." Shaking his head in disgust he went back to work. "He's only a quarter-cycle older than me but he acts like he knows everything."

"There's a hell of a lot of power in there, it's got all that insulation for a good reason, you know," his friend said, not entirely reassured. "Electricity and water don't mix well. Be careful."

"I am being careful. Stop worrying and hand me that debonder." The young man passed the tool over and watched as his friend ran it carefully around the edge of the secondary isolation layer covering the power control module, a faint hum sounding as it unzipped the molecular bond along the seam. Looking around guiltily he saw they were still unobserved in the little inlet on the shore of the lake, some way from where most people were. A few swimmers were within earshot, but no one seemed to be paying attention.

"OK, got it. Here, hold this." He was passed the cover of the power control module, which he gingerly took. "Don't drop it, I don't want any marks so he doesn't know what I did. I need to put it back the way it was before we go home." Carefully inspecting the inside of the control module, the aspiring engineer compared it with a schematic on his unrolled comp screen, then nodded firmly. "Right. I just need to connect from here..." He made a link with another tool and a short piece of superconducting cable, "to heAAARGH!" There was a vicious crackling snap and a bright blue flash, making the helper jump away with a shout of fright, dropping what he was holding.

"Hells, what did you do, Hryd?" There was no response, except a subsiding sizzling noise and some sparking inside the opened hull of the small water-craft. "Hryd? Are you OK?" He rubbed his eyes, blinking. As his vision cleared he looked around, spotting his friend lying face down in the shallow water a couple of metres away, still clutching the connection tool in one badly burned hand. "Oh, fuck. Hryd!" Scrambling over to his friend, splashing through the water, he rolled the young man onto his back and pulled him onto dryer sand. Quickly checking the vital signs as he'd been taught in many health classes, he swore under his breath.
"Fuck, fuck, fuck, he's not breathing." Pulling out his own comp he waved it over the young man, checking the readout and laying his ears back in fright. "Both hearts have stopped. Oh, hells, Hryd, you idiot." Heaving on his chest over the primary heart, he tried to restart it, mumbling to himself in shock. After a moment he shouted, "I need a healer! Can anyone hear me?" He didn't dare stop the chest compressions to call for the emergency services.

"What's the problem?" a voice said from behind him, speaking Trade rather than Common. He looked over his shoulder, panic on his face, to see an alien female lying in the water a few metres away. He stared for a moment, she didn't look like any alien he'd seen before, although from what he could see she seemed to be from some aquatic species, with a long silver-scaled tail like a fish.

"His hearts have stopped. He got a massive shock from the jetter, he was mucking around with the power pack. I told him not to. He's going to die." Turning his attention back to his friend he hammered on Hryd's chest. "Come on, you bastard, live."

A hand rested on his shoulder. "Don't panic. I've called for help, a healer will be here in a few seconds." He looked around, startled, to see the same alien woman, but she was now bipedal, like him, and wearing clothes. Squatting down beside him she smiled, as he gaped in surprise.

"What's your name?"

"Rosmyr," he responded after a moment, wonder in his voice. He'd never met a shape-shifter before.

"Hello, Rosmyr, I'm Azumi. Don't worry, my friends are very good healers. They're nearly here." She looked up and waved, causing him to look in the direction she was. Two more of her species were sprinting along the beach at an absolutely impossible speed, their motions a blur. Seconds later they slid to a halt next to him, both dropping to their knees. The shorter one gently moved him to one side, as the taller one put her hands on Hryd's chest. Her hands glowed with magic, making him relax slightly, he suddenly felt someone who knew what they were doing was present. Nearly collapsing in relief he rocked back on his knees and tail, rubbing his eyes.

"He's had a severe electric shock, some neurological damage, second degree burns to both hands, muscular tears from over-contraction, cardiac arrest in primary and secondary hearts, no respiration," the alien woman reported. Listening Rosmyr gulped. That sounded bad. She glanced at him, correctly sensing his mood. Her smile was quite unusual but still somehow comforting. "Don't worry. He'll be fine, we know what we're doing." She turned to her colleague. "Can you sort out the neural stuff, please, while I repair the hearts?"

"Sure." The other woman also put her hands on his friend, purple energy collecting around her fingers. He and Azumi watched as the two worked, exchanging occasional words in both Trade and their own language. After a minute or two Hryd stirred, coughing weakly, then opened his eyes.

"What happened?" he mumbled, wincing in pain and raising one hand to his head. The tall alien woman put her hand on him, a small burst of magic coming from it, and he relaxed slightly.

"You made a mistake, I think," she said with a smile. "You received a very large electrical shock straight across your chest. It's a good thing we were in the area." Helping him sit up she glanced at the water-craft, which was still sparking intermittently. "I'd suggest in future leaving work on high energy systems like that to people who are experts on them. There's not a lot of room for error."

"You nearly killed yourself, you idiot, Hryd!" Rosmyr yelled, glaring at his childhood friend. "Don't ever do that again!"
"I can't remember what I did?" the other young D'sage said groggily, looking around at everyone. "I remember taking the cover off, then... it all goes weird. Next thing I knew I'm lying here all wet."

"You were trying to bypass the limiter, I think you must have connected the wrong thing. There was a really nasty sound and a bright flash, it threw you all the way over there.″ Rosmyr waved a hand at the edge of the lake. "Azumi here called for help, these healers are friends of hers. If they hadn't turned up I don't know what would have happened. Both your hearts had stopped and you weren't breathing."

"If your emergency services had come quickly and a good healer had worked on you quickly you'd probably have made it," the alien woman with the blonde hair said quietly, "but I wouldn't guarantee it. There was fairly severe damage to several nerve centres, leaving aside the fact you had no pulse or respiratory rhythm. I know how good the healers are on this world but there was a fairly small window in which to restart you. It's probably a good thing we were here.″ She smiled at him as he gulped. "You should at least disconnect the power before you fiddle with things like that." The other one walked over to the sparking LakeJet and poked around inside for a moment, somehow making the crackling noises stop.

"I'm afraid your power control module is fried from what I can see," she said, coming back to them. "It's going to need work before you can use it again." Hryd groaned and put his head in his hands.

"Thren is going to kill me."

"You nearly did that for him you half-wit," his friend said sourly. "You scared the life out of me. I've never seen anyone nearly die before." They both looked at the two healers. "Thank you both very much for saving him," Rosmyr said with relief in his voice. "He's an idiot but I've known him all my life."

"You're more than welcome," the short alien said, grinning. "It's what we do. I'm Yori." She held out her hand, which he took with a jolt of recognition for the name. "This is my partner Chou. You've already met Azumi."

"Gods. Yori? And Chou?" He stared for a moment, then exchanged an awed glance with Hryd. "I've heard of you both. You're supposed to be the most dangerous magic workers anyone has ever met. And incredible healers." They both looked at each other while behind him Azumi snorted with laughter.

"Our reputation may be somewhat exaggerated, I suspect." Yori looked amused in her alien manner. He stared at her, cocking his head to one side.

"Rescued the Third Minister's wife from a gang of heavily armed kidnappers who had already taken and killed four other people?"

"Well, yes, that's true, but..."

"Captured a group of alien combat mages who took over a small town on the other continent and were holding off a company of the military in the process? Just the two of you?"

"Um, yes, we did do that, I'll admit, but..."

"Healed thirty-nine people, including the K'nn seven ambassador, who were suffering from a very nasty and probably lethal viral infection that no one could identify?" Yori sighed, looking at her partner, who seemed amused. Azumi was laughing quite hard by this point. "OK, OK, I get the point. You've heard of us. But we're not that extraordinary, really." Rosmyr glanced at Hryd, who looked back with a puzzled expression.

"I'd hate to see what you think is extraordinary, then," he said with a sudden grin. "but I'm very happy to have met you, even if it was this idiot's nearly dying that made it happen." Yori chuckled.

"No problem. I'm sorry about your machine, Hryd. Is it going to be expensive to fix?" The young man stood, aided by his best friend, then walked over and cautiously peered inside the hull, groaning when he saw the charred mess the control module now was.

"Oh, crap, that's completely ruined. Where the hells am I going to get a new one?"

"Tyrkrel Industries LakeJet 10 power unit?" A new voice came from behind, making him turn to see an older man accompanied by a woman his age and a much younger one who bore a definite family resemblance. "I can get you one, I think I have some spares in the warehouse. We used to sell that model in a few places. It's obsolete, but very high quality, and reliable. I'm impressed you managed to damage it." He smiled. "Uthryyl, Sirtha External Trading Incorporated. You might be familiar with the company, especially if you like coffee." Hryd stared for a moment.

"Master Merchant Uthryyl, of course I know your name." He dipped his head respectfully, laying his ears back for a moment. "I'd be very grateful if you could supply me with a spare module. Parts aren't easy to get for this model any more. It belongs to my brother, he won't be happy I damaged it, he saved for a long time to get the credit to buy it."

"It would be my pleasure. I'm sure we can come to a mutually satisfactory arrangement." Uthryyl glanced at the comp still lying unrolled on the ground next to the hull, which pinged as it received a netmessage. "I've sent you the details of my office. Call there tomorrow, talk to Berkra. She'll be expecting you. She can arrange a spare and also recommend someone to install it, who is less likely to require medical intervention afterwards." The merchant grinned slyly. Hryd looked at the ground, embarrassed, while Rosmyr coughed a laugh, trying not to upset his friend. Azumi looked very amused, as did the other two aliens.

"Thank you, Master Merchant."

"Just Uthryyl. No need for formalities, I'm on holiday with my friends and family. Which is, by the sounds of it, lucky for you. Leave the power engineering to the professionals, or get some proper training, all right?" The young man nodded, still looking shaken. Yori poked him gently.

"Cheer up. You're alive, everything else is easy. You going to bring your car over here, or would you like a hand taking this thing back? You're certainly not going to be driving it." The two young men looked at each other, then around at the water-craft. It was fairly heavy, they'd had some trouble getting it out of the cargo hold of the air-car in the first place, and didn't fancy carrying it all the way back. On the other hand, it was a long walk around the lake to retrieve the car and bring it back, which wasn't something they were looking forward to either.

Azumi wandered over and inspected the machine, lifting the rope tied to the front docking ring.
"There's an easy solution," she said, flipping the hull cover shut then picking the entire thing up with ease. Both boys gaped in amazement. How the hells strong were these aliens? Carrying it to the water from where they'd heaved it onto the sand, she waded out to knee depth, then put it down. Moving past it into deeper water with the end of the rope in her hand, she shimmered and changed, making them stare in astonishment as she retook the aquatic form Rosmyr had first seen. Beside him, Hryd swore quietly in shock. Holding the end of the rope she floated on her back, grinning at them "Come on, grab your stuff and get on, I'll tow you back across the lake. Seems like the simplest method."
Uthryyl laughed in a deep voice, while Yori snickered. Chou was smiling as were the other two women. Glancing at each other, the two young men finally shrugged, retrieved Hryd's comp and tools, then waded out to the LakeJet and climbed on board. Azumi waited until they were seated, then rolled over and disappeared under the surface. The rope snapped tight far faster than they expected, the craft shooting forward nearly as fast as it would have done under it's own power, making them both swear in surprise and grab anything available to hang on.

"How is she doing that?" Hryd called over his shoulder to his friend. Holding on as the LakeJet bounced over the waves, Rosmyr laughed.

"Magic, I guess. It's incredible. She must be unbelievably strong." Looking over his shoulder he saw that the merchant and his companions had jumped into the lake as well and were swimming after them, a considerable distance behind, although Yori and Chou were both making remarkable progress in their own right. "These people are amazing," he said in his friends ear. "Maybe you should electrocute yourself more often if we get to meet people like this." Hryd turned his head and glared, making the young man laugh. "It was a joke."

"Not a funny one. I'm still tingling all over and not in a good way."

Shortly they began to slow as they neared the other side of the lake. Azumi's head popped up beside them. "Where do you want it?" she asked.

Pointing, Hryd said, "Over there, the red one, please." She nodded and disappeared again, as they slewed sideways and headed in the correct direction. Moments later she resurfaced, tossing them the rope. Rosmyr caught it and coiled it up.

"I'll push from here." She was as good as her word, quickly running the machine aground in the shallows, then shifting back to her bipedal form, wading out of the water as they climbed off. Pulling the LakeJet up on the sand she waited for Hryd to bring the vehicle closer, then lifted it into the cargo hold, which swallowed it easily due to the subspace storage it used. Rosmyr reflected once more on the rather odd fact that the internal volume of the hold was actually large enough you could in theory get another vehicle the same size inside it, assuming it would fit through the rear door. Thinking about things like that made his head ache. Magic was very weird.

"Thanks, Azumi," Hryd said, smiling at her.

"No problem," she replied. Turning, she watched as Yori and Chou both reached the shore behind them nearly neck and neck, the merchant and his family still only half-way across the lake but making steady headway. She waved, then returned her attention to the two young men. "Try not to do something like that again, Hryd, you got lucky this time. You might not be, next time."

He nodded soberly, his good mood evaporating. "I know. It was a stupid thing to do. I wish I could remember exactly what it was I actually did, though." Flexing his hands he looked at them for a moment. "Still tingles a little, but bearing in mind what happened..."

"They looked horrible," Rosmyr said, remembering the burned meat appearance with a shiver. "I've never seen healing that fast or effective, there isn't a mark left."

"They're pretty damn good at healing, to be honest," Azumi said with a smile. "Better than anyone else I've ever met. I guess you're going, now?"

"I think we should. I've kind of lost my enthusiasm for here for the moment." He glanced at his friend, who nodded, looking glum.
"Me too. I just want to put the car on autopilot and get some sleep. I'm still going to have to figure out what to tell Thren." Hryd sighed.

"Tell him the truth, that's normally the best thing." Azumi looked at them both seriously. "Trust me on this, once you start telling things that aren't completely true, even for good motives and when it's actually necessary, it becomes very difficult to stop. In the long run, if you can, be truthful. It saves a lot of trouble later."

"It's good advice," Chou said behind them, as she and Yori walked up. "Tell your brother what happened, Rosmyr can verify it. Uthryyl can get your machine fixed, I'm sure, and while your brother will probably be angry, with good reason, he'll also probably be grateful that he still has a younger brother in the first place." She smiled gently at him, making him feel calmer than he would have expected.

"OK. You're right, I guess." He studied her and her colleague for a moment with an odd expression. "Thank you both very much."

"Like I said, it's not a problem," Yori replied, while Chou smiled again. "Try not to repeat the performance, you should always try not to make the same mistake twice. It's best to make new, interesting ones!" She laughed, as they both grinned. With another slightly awed look at the three aliens, they climbed into the car, waving, then closed the doors. Hryd told the computer to take them home, before swivelling his seat around with a sigh as the vehicle lifted off.

"So, what do you want to do next week?" his friend asked after a long moment, then ducked as the young man nearly hit him, grinning.

"I think I've had enough swimming for the moment," 'Azumi' said, as they watched the air-car rise a hundred metres, before turning and silently zipping off towards Sirtha. The two boys had obviously decided they wanted to get home as fast as possible. 'Yori' snickered.

"That was a pretty impressive towing exercise," she said, looking over her shoulder and waving for a moment as Onkra reached the shore. "You took off so fast they nearly fell off."

'Azumi' laughed. "I have to be honest, I'm still surprised sometimes how strong I've become over the last year. Even in mer-form. I was genuinely amazed how easy it was to pull that thing. I could probably have gone faster but I was worried the rope would snap."

"Probably not, it's some sort of mono-molecular material, I think, I've seen it before here. Almost unbreakable. You could probably moor an aircraft carrier with it. Mind you, I imagine the front would have pulled off their jet-ski thing first." 'Yori' looked after the now-vanished car. "That kid got lucky. The voltage in that battery pack should have flash-fried his brain, it must have been a very short contact. The amount of insulation he had to remove was impressive. So was the lack of common sense in actually removing it."

"His friend seemed to feel the same," 'Chou' said, smiling. "I have the feeling that young Hryd is prone to doing things that he hasn't thought out well beforehand. Perhaps this will make him think more next time."

"Hopefully." Giggling, 'Azumi' turned as Onkra walked up looking amused.

"I can't believe how fast you pulled that thing!" she said, laughing. "You should have seen their faces! Perhaps we should rent you out for a couple of credits a ride, we could make a fortune..." 'Azumi' burst out laughing.
"I think I can probably earn a living doing something other than being a waterpark attraction," she managed, shaking her head in good humour. "It was kind of fun, though."

"I'm really hungry now," the D'sage woman said, smiling. She looked around as her parents came over. "Why don't we head back to the waterfalls, it'll be the ideal time to see them in about an hour and a half or so, and stop somewhere to get some food?" Looking at her mother she added, "There's that restaurant in the small village before you get to them, I remember it was very good."

Quannyr nodded thoughtfully. "Yes, it is nice. I think they'd like it." Uthryyl clapped his hands, looking pleased.

"A plan, then. I could certainly eat. We should have brought some food with us, but it was sort of spur of the moment, I didn't intend to stay here so long. I'm glad we did, though, if only for that poor lad, he'd have had a hard time of it otherwise." Drying themselves off and changing, Onkra waved to a couple of friends of hers, then they all piled back into the car and drove back the way they'd initially come, talking and laughing, as the three visitors resumed their true appearances.

A little way from the lake, Kasumi suddenly said, "Quannyr, can you slow down, please?" The woman glanced over her shoulder while doing exactly that, pulling over next to the road.

"What's wrong?"

"Nothing, I just wanted to get a better look at that." She pointed. 'That' turned out to be a mountain soarer, which was bounding around in a field beside the road, flapping it's wings and making odd noises, apparently after something in the long undergrowth.

"What on earth is it doing?" the eldest Tendo said. Uthryyl watched for a moment. "It's a very young one, look at the size. I think it's tried to catch something and it all went wrong." He laughed, pointing. "Yes. Look, there, you see it?" There was a small ball of fur about the size of a cat darting around in the bushes, which the soarer was clearly interested in. "That's a quillit. They're a bit like an omnivorous version of a squirrel from your world, only nowhere near as cute. Nasty things. They breed like crazy, eat damn near anything, and are extremely bad tempered, not to mention resilient. We had some nest under the house once, we had a hell of a time getting rid of them. They were into everything. Hardly any poisons work on them, they're quite magic-resistant as well, so you basically have to hunt the things down and shoot them. " The soarer yipped, pouncing on the quillit like a giant cat, then looking annoyed as far as one could ascribe that emotion to an animal as the smaller creature evaded it.

"Why doesn't it run away?" Ranma asked, watching with amusement. The soarer really did look quite pissed off. Crouching in the long grass-like ground covering, the end of it's tail waving slightly, it fixed its gaze on the bush its prey had vanished into, then with a flap of its wings dived into it. The quillit shot out of the other side of the bush, running in a large circle, to end up behind the predator where it viciously bit its hind leg, provoking a loud yip of pain. He laughed. "Oh. I see. It's vindictive and has sharp teeth." Uthryyl laughed, nodding.

"Yes. They're a pain, sometimes literally. You'd think something that size would run from a larger animal that wants to eat it, but the damn things are stupid and fearless. People have been killed when they stumbled over a large nest, they tend to attack anything they think is a threat. Most people who live in the country would be perfectly happy to see them all drop dead. The fact that mountain soarers seem to love eating them was a major factor in the authorities deciding to leave them in peace when they got introduced. It's a cheap, low tech way of keeping the little bastards under control."
Nabiki was taking photos of both animals, smiling at the antics of the flying predator. The animal was clearly quite frustrated at it's inability to catch the quillit, which was still darting around like a mad thing, occasionally biting it. "If Misaki sees one of those she'll want it for a pet," she commented.

"Which one?" Kasumi giggled.

"The soarer, I hope," Uthryyl said, shuddering. "You really don't want an infestation of quillits." After a moment, Kasumi opened the door next to her. "What are you doing?" he asked curiously as she shimmered into 'Chou', even though there was no one around. She glanced at him.

"I want to get a closer look at that soarer," she replied slightly mysteriously.

"Do you think it will let you?" her husband asked.

"I suspect so," the blonde said, smiling, then whipped her hand out and neatly shot the frantically bouncing quillit between the eyes with a tiny ki ball, which dropped it in it's tracks, stunned and twitching. "I'll just introduce myself." Everyone watched in surprise as she slowly walked over to the semi-conscious quillit, keeping her eyes on the soarer, which had stopped dead and was watching her warily. She made sure to approach from upwind, watching as it sniffed, then stared as she knelt and picked up it's intended prey. Moving closer, she stopped again, gently tossing the stunned animal in front of the soarer, which watched it land, then looked back at her.

Switching it's attention between something it wanted to eat and something it was curious about, after a moment it slowly moved forward, reaching out a paw and tapping the quillit experimentally. The smaller animal twitched, making it draw it's paw back sharply, then after a short pause, slam it down hard. There was a distinct crunch. Everyone in the car watched as 'Chou' moved nearer, very slowly, making little squeaking noises like someone calling a cat. The soarer cocked it's head on one side, inspecting her curiously, before scooping the dead quillit up and flipping it into it's mouth, chewing with an air of contentment.

"She's good with animals," Onkra commented, fascinated, as 'Chou' reached the soarer and put her hand gently on it's head. "They don't normally let people get that close, although they're not particularly scared of us." It sniffed her carefully, but otherwise didn't react. After a moment she ran her hand along its neck and onto its back. Ranma laughed a little, quietly.

"She's good with everything. Kas can calm anyone or anything down, amazingly effectively." There was respect and love in his voice. They all watched as his wife stroked the soarer, which peered over it's shoulder at her, shifting slightly under her hand, but stayed put.

"The fur is amazingly soft," she commed them all. "Like rabbit, or mink." Touching the wing which was half extended, she felt it curiously. "This is even finer. I've never felt anything like it on an animal. Quite remarkable."

"What are you doing, sis?" Nabiki asked curiously.

"I want to check something," came the mildly uninformative and secretive response. They could see her hand was glowing gently. The soarer shifted again, apparently now leaning against her, seeming quite content to stay in one place. After a minute or two she stepped back, smiling as it nearly tipped over, before righting itself and looking mildly offended that it's new friend had moved. Squatting down she ran her hand down it's hind leg where the now-deceased quillit had bitten it, leaving a wound that was bleeding slightly, greenish blood matting the fur. Her hand glowed again. "No real damage, but it must have been uncomfortable," she reported. The animal turned its head on its long neck to watch, resting it on her shoulder. Her other hand came up and stroked it, making it close its eyes in pleasure. Nabiki got the impression that if it had been a cat it would have been purring by now.

Eventually she stood, gently pushing the soarer's head off her. It yipped quietly, looking at her with big eyes. Nabiki took another photo, grinning. "You seem to have made a friend," she said.

"Indeed. It's very warm and seems quite relaxed." Stroking it again for a moment, her sister turned around and walked back to the car, the soarer watching with apparent disappointment as she left. When she got back into the car and closer the door, they all watched as it stared at the vehicle for a moment, before leaping into the air and flapping it's wings sharply, quickly gaining altitude. Soon it was just a dot, heading back towards the lake and the cliff. "What a beautiful animal," she commented, smiling happily.

Ranma looked curiously at her. "Did you find what you were looking for?" he asked. She nodded.

"Yes." There was a long pause while they all exchanged glances.

"Going to tell us?"

"No." She looked mischievously at him. Inspecting her for a moment he sighed, then smiled.

"OK, be like that."

"I will. Thank you." Nabiki laughed, glancing at Onkra, who looked amused. "We can go now, Quannyr. Thank you for stopping." The elder woman gave her friend a curious glance but restarted the vehicle and pulled away. Leaning back in her seat Kasumi smiled serenely, while her husband and sister watched her, then exchanged glances. Ranma shrugged with a small smile on his lips. Shaking her head Nabiki turned her attention to reloading her camera, wondering what her sister was up to.

---

"This is very nice," ‘Chou' said, looking around at the small restaurant. It was definitely recognisable as such, even with the odd chairs and a somewhat unusual layout. The building was build half-underground, into the side of the mountain, the window on the end of the room looking out towards Sirtha over the edge of the cliff. ‘Azumi' followed her gaze, nodding agreement.

"The food is excellent as well," she said. To her pleasure she'd found the menu included g'rargh, which she was eating in the form of a salad.

"I haven't been here for a while but it's nice to see it's still as good as ever," Quannyr commented, smiling. "It used to be owned by an old friend, but she sold it years ago and moved to Krentak with her husband when she got married. The new owners had quite a reputation to live up to but they managed magnificently."

Onkra looked out the window at the setting suns, which were nearing the horizon. "We'll have to leave soon, to catch the light at the falls. It will take about half an hour to get there, unless we fly."

"No need to rush," her mother said. "I like driving in ground mode, it's surprisingly relaxing. Flight mode is quick but boring." She smiled. "We'll make it, don't worry. We can always come back, anyway." Onkra nodded, resuming eating. They finished their meal fairly soon, having a round of coffee after, then got up. As Uthryyl paid, the others headed for the vehicle.

"Not many people around," ‘Yori' said, looking curiously about her. "I haven't seen any other vehicles for a while, and there were only half a dozen other than us in there."
"It's a quiet time right now. There was a big holiday a little while ago, the place was full then, but now most people are back to their normal lives. The lake is different, it's always got people there, especially in nice weather, but around here it's a bit seasonal." Quannyr smiled at the human woman. "It's nice, actually, while I like the city I also like to be able to go somewhere without so many others around."

"I can understand that. I grew up on the road, there weren't many people around a lot of the time. It's nice to have neighbours, but sometimes you want to get away." Yori laughed. "Mind you, not many back home 'get away' quite as far as we seem to."

Giggling, 'Azumi' nodded agreement. "You can say that again. I'd never have believed a couple of years ago I'd be holidaying on the other side of a portal! Dad and Akane would never believe it." She pulled out her camera and took a photo of the restaurant and the surrounding area, then put it away again. Uthryyl joined them as they climbed into the car. Soon they were on the move again. Kasumi leaned back and sat in silent thought, her eyes closed, as she had done for most of the time since meeting the soarer. The others occasionally looked at her, wondering what she was thinking about, but didn't ask.

Fairly soon, they turned down a small road off the main one they had been driving along, heading back the way they'd come earlier during the day. There were no other vehicles on it, as Quannyr drove at quite high speed, clearly enjoying herself on the winding route. The road wound through very crumpled topography, making sharp bends around outcroppings of rock, a view off to the right intermittently opening up through the trees and showing the plains below the cliff, which they were quite close to. Eventually they reached a point where the ground levelled off, a river becoming visible close to the road.

"That's the outflow from the lake," Onkra said, pointing. "We're actually fairly close to it now, we've gone more or less in a circle around that mountain back there, but aside from by air there isn't much of a practical way back more directly. The river is full of rapids, it's about three hundred metres lower here than the lake is, so you can't go back up it in a boat." Her mother followed the road for another kilometre, eventually stopping when it basically ended in a clearing in the woods. "We walk from here, it's not far." Everyone got out, looking around at the forest. Onkra pointed.

"That way." They followed as she walked down a path through the trees. "Not a lot of people come here, it's kind of out of the way, but it's pretty spectacular," she said over her shoulder. Looking around with interest, 'Azumi' dropped back a bit as she stopped to take a few photos of interesting plants. Changing film again, she walked on, the sound of her family and friends fading in front of her. She shook her head slightly.

'\textit{This is so weird, it keeps hitting me when I see something odd, I'm on a different damn world! An alien planet!}' A grin worked it's way across her face. Stopping again, she stared at a brilliant green and blue insect-like creature that was walking slowly across the path in front of her, making a high-pitched squeak every now and then. It stopped when her shadow fell across it, freezing motionless, then when nothing happened, resumed walking. She took a picture, leaning as close as she could without disturbing it. The thing slowed as it spotted another, smaller insectoid on a tree near the path, changing direction and carefully sneaking up on it, freezing into immobility every now and then. The middle sister watched curiously as it approached it's apparent prey, eventually stopping twenty centimetres away. There was a long pause, while the first creature studied the second one, before with a suddenness that took her by surprise, it reared back on it's back four legs and shot the front pair forwards, covering the distance in an implausible way as they extended. As the legs made contact with the target, a sharp snap sounded, accompanied by a bright flash like a spark.
"Good grief," she mumbled, watching the targeted insectoid drop to the ground, smoking slightly.

'It would appear to have discharged a considerable voltage through it's prey,' Jun commented, sounding interested. 'An unusual but clearly effective hunting method.'

'Unusual is right. I've heard of lightning bugs, but that's a little more real lightning that you'd expect. I wonder how it generates the electricity?'

'There was a burst of a variant of magic when it produced the discharge, Nabiki,' the SI replied. 'I believe it uses ambient magic to create an electrical discharge. Fascinating.'

'Very.' She watched as the hunter began dismantling it's victim, shaking her head in wonder, then resumed walking. After a few minutes she rounded a corner in the path, then stopped dead.

"Oh, my..." Words failed her for a moment. The source of the distant roar she'd been hearing for a while suddenly became clear. Moving closer to the edge of the path, which was a few metres away, she stared in awe.

The river carrying the outflow from the lake emerged from the forest to her right, winding along through the trees, glinting in the evening light, travelling through a wide channel carved out of the rock of the cliff. Just ahead of her the ground dropped away into nothingness for thousands of metres, only a low, clearly artificial wall between the path and empty air. The others were standing next to it looking over, silently. She slowly walked over and looked out at the plain, a similar but slightly different view from what she'd seen before at the lake in front of her, then looked at the river.

The channel it ran it was narrow but deep where it went over the edge, a huge flume of water shooting fifty metres out before it arced over, dropping into the depths with a rumbling thunder that made the rock tremble. A fine mist blew back in the slight breeze, dampening the rock around them slightly.

From where they were standing the setting suns were on the other side of the waterfall, causing the amazingly clear water to light up brilliantly, refracting the colours into a constantly shifting rainbow of intense illumination. The red star was exactly on the other side, seen through the water from where her friends were standing, while the blue one was slightly above it, casting a glow across the surface. Jewel-like drops sprayed out into space, little beads of light that took her breath away.

It was the most beautiful thing she'd ever seen.

Slowly approaching the edge, she simply stared at it in wonder. Stopping beside 'Yori', the other woman glanced at her, then returned her eyes to the waterfall. No one said anything for some time.

"Thank you, Onkra." 'Chou' finally broke the silence. "It's incredible."

"Isn't it? I can never understand why people aren't here by the hundred, just watching." The young woman smiled. "It's something I could watch for hours. The sound is amazing as well. You can feel it right inside your head." This was certainly true, the subsonic rumble of the falls made one's entire body vibrate from this range.

"After a heavy rainstorm it's even more impressive," Uthryyl said quietly, barely audible above the sound of the falling water. "The flow goes up five or six times in some cases. You wouldn't believe the noise."

Shaking herself out of the mild trance of fascination she'd fallen into, 'Azumi' raised her camera and took a number of photos, even while knowing they'd never do it justice. This was one of those things you really had to experience for yourself. Walking closer to the wall she peered over the edge, despite herself shivering a little at the incredible sheer drop. It still seemed impossible to her that she could actually survive it if she jumped over the edge. Old thought patterns were very difficult to shake, so the sight of a close to two kilometre sheer cliff was somewhat awe-inspiring.

The water fell for hundreds of metres, becoming finer and finer spray, until it was just a fog rolling down the ring wall far below. She could see a number of silver threads at the base of the drop where the water recombined into small streams, which eventually themselves joined and became a fairly large river that headed out across the plain towards the horizon, a few lakes scattered along it's length. It looked like it joined the much larger one Sirtha was built on thirty kilometres or so away.

"Absolutely amazing," she mumbled, taking some more photos. When the camera took the last shot on the roll she put it away, not bothering to change the film. The spray would have made it awkward anyway.

As the suns set, the red one dropped under the arch of water while the blue one shone through it, the colour of the spray changing to shades of blue. Long shadows were slowly creeping across the plain far below, cast by the mountains behind Krentak away in the dim distance. Where they were standing was still well illuminated being so high up, although the light was gradually fading.

Looking at her sister, she grinned abruptly. "Thanks for bringing me. Things like this are..." she shook her head, unable to think of the words. The older woman smiled back, putting her hand on her shoulder.

"You're welcome. I'm very glad you can see all this." 'Chou' looked around at them all, then her smile turned very strange.

"Time for my surprise, I think, this is a good place for it, there's no one around." They all looked at her quizzically.

"I'll be right back," the elder sister added, before turning and diving over the edge of the multi-thousand metre cliff.

Ami looked around at four sets of resentful eyes set in filthy faces, then sighed a little. "Getting very cosy with them, weren't you?" one of her friends asked in a darkly suspicious tone of voice. "Why didn't that bitch make you help us?" She looked at the girl with long black hair and sighed again.

"Because I'm not the one who blew up half the street going after one demon, one very small, completely inoffensive demon, who was after a fucking cup of coffee you fucking idiots!" Her voice rose completely unexpectedly to a scream of rage. They all took a step back in unison, shock on their faces as the normally quiet and inoffensive young woman literally crackled with fury, more power rolling from her than any of them had ever realised she possessed.

"You goddam idiots could have killed someone today if they hadn't stopped you. I told you not to chase that guy in the first place, and I told you again not to chase him into Yori's territory! You know what she's like about things like that. And after seeing what happened today, I agree completely. You're all a bloody liability. You kill someone, especially in her area, and she'll hunt us all down if it takes the rest of time. You don't have a damn clue what she could do. None of you. I have some idea and it totally terrifies me." She shook her head tiredly, lowering her voice. "She's more dangerous than you can possibly believe. Chou as well. Fumiko and her friends are nowhere near as powerful, but Yori trained them. They took all of you down without even trying. None of us stand a chance if she ever gets mad enough to do something permanent. So think about that. Very hard indeed." The blue haired girl looked at the other four, an expression of disgusted exhaustion crossing her face.

"I'm going home. I've had enough of this crap for one day. To be honest, I'm this far," she held up one hand with her index finger very close to her thumb, "from saying fuck off to the lot of you. What the hell happened to us? We used to be careful and professional, nowadays most of you just go blundering around like a bunch of super-powered children. I'm getting very tired of it. Do anything like this again, I'll..." Unable to think of a suitable continuation to the thought, she swore under her breath, turned, and stomped off, nodding to the old priest who was unashamedly eavesdropping from outside the door, making him twitch. She didn't seem surprised to see him. He watched her go, shaking his head, then went back to sweeping the floor.

"Holy shit!" 'Azumi' screeched, diving forward and looking over the edge in horror. "Kasumi!" 'Yori' grabbed her as she nearly followed her sister over the edge.

"Careful." The other woman looked over as well, as did the three D'sage, shock on their faces. 'Chou' was already several hundred metres down falling along the cliff edge twenty metres out in a perfect skydiving position.

"Don't worry, sister," she commed, amusement in her voice. "You'll like this." They all watched, her female husband suddenly grinning widely, as she shimmered and changed.

'Azumi' gaped, then slowly began smiling, as her sister spread her wings and soared.
She lay in the bath, steaming both literally and metaphorically, having scrubbed the dirt off a little while earlier. It had taken some considerable effort. Muttering to herself angrily, she put her head back and reflected on the events of the day, trying to work out what to do about it. Certainly, a direct retaliatory response was out, that bitch Fumiko and her friends were too fast and too skilled, as much as it pained her to admit it.

"It's all Yori's fault," she muttered. "Ever since she turned up things have gone weird." Shaking her head, she sighed.

"Your friend Ami seemed very irritated," a voice came from the door, making her jump, sloshing water around. "And I couldn't help but notice that you and your other friends were very dirty. Interesting day?" She glared at the back of her grandfather, visible outside the door as he swept the hallway.

"It's not something I want to talk about, Grandfather." The old man sighed slightly.

After a long moment, he replied, "Yori is not someone you want to annoy, my child. Listen to young Ami. She is very clever and very responsible." He looked over his shoulder for a moment, meeting her eyes, before resuming his task. "You and your friends are becoming careless. One might go so far as to say dishonourable in your actions." She stared in total shock.

There was an even longer pause. Eventually, she said in a small voice, "You know?" He chuckled as he worked.

"I may be old, but I'm neither stupid nor senile. Not to mention I'm a priest. It should go without saying that I'm sensitive to magic. Your and your friends reek of it. I've known for a long time. Ami knows that, she worked it out quite a while ago. Smart young lady." The girl stared some more.

"Why didn't you say anything?" He shrugged.

"It wasn't my business. You were all doing good works, defending people from horrible, dangerous monsters. An honourable thing to do even if you were very young and scandalously dressed." He grinned at her for a moment over his shoulder. "Not that I mind the clothes personally, you understand." She glared for a moment, as his grin disappeared. "But recently, you've all become... sloppy. Arrogant. Despite what you may believe, you're not assured of a win every time, just because of your abilities or some perceived superiority. Yori knows this very well. That's why she doesn't win, because she knows and accepts that she might not. She would prefer to talk out a problem, but when it becomes necessary, she will fight absolutely ruthlessly. She also knows, no matter how powerful you are, if you treat people badly, ultimately, you lose." He sighed, sweeping further down the corridor, his voice coming around the corner.

"I am somewhat disappointed that you and your friends have lost sight of this. It leads to a place I'd rather not see you go."

"How the hell do you know Yori so well? How do you know her at all?" the girl demanded, climbing out of the bath and hastily drying herself, throwing some clothes on, then following the old man down the corridor. He shrugged again.

"We've talked. Several times. She's a nice girl, as is her friend Chou. Who is, I think, a lot more..."
"I don't understand. How could you have talked to her? How did you even meet her?"

"She's dropped by occasionally to talk, and have a cup of tea. Chou has as well. Incredible people. Yori is a wonderful little energetic bundle of raw chaos, she makes me wish I was about fifty years younger. Chou is the most serene person I've ever met. She'd have made a wonderful priestess in another life. Or perhaps a goddess." He laughed. "So would Yori, a goddess of war, perhaps. Or chaos." Glancing at her granddaughter as he put the broom away, he added, "It would be far preferable for everyone if you girls would settle your differences in an adult manner. She is a very reasonable person. Apologise, mend your ways, and move on. That's my advice." She was staring at him in bewilderment. "Tea?"

"Thank you," she said automatically, then shook her head. "Hang on. Why has she dropped by?" She stared suspiciously at him. "Did she tell you about us?" He snickered.

"Of course not. She would never betray any of the magical girls like that, she takes her responsibilities far too seriously. I already knew anyway. She knew I knew, somehow, but has never said anything about it directly. They both just like meeting people, I think, and I suspect they initially simply followed you home."

"What responsibilities?" the girl asked. He looked at her for a moment, before leading the way to the kitchen.

"I'm surprised you haven't worked it out. The magical girls protect the community. Yori and Chou protect the magical girls." Putting the kettle on he rummaged around for some tea, getting the pot ready. His granddaughter looked even more confused.

"Protect the magical girls? Who from?"

"Themselves, mainly. Your group are responsible for most of the really spectacular... incidents... in recent times, but quite a few of them have been overenthusiastic. If that sort of thing went on unchecked, eventually there would be a backlash, which would hurt everyone. The girls perform an essential task, there's no real possibility of getting rid of them from what I know, but it would become very difficult if everyone hated you all. Yori prevents this. Very skilfully, actually. I'm not even sure she really realises what she's doing in that respect, but that is the end result." He filled the pot and waited for the tea to steep before pouring them both a cup.

"Without her and Chou, and these friends they're clearly training to help them, there would be far larger problems. I don't know all the details, I suspect I can only see a small part of it, but I'm certain they're necessary. I'm also certain they're going to change the world somehow, for the better. The government trusts them, the community trusts them, even a lot of the demons trust them. I wish you girls would. Or at least, keep your excesses far enough away that she and her friends don't feel they have to step in. Eventually, as patient as she's been, you will push her too far. I don't want to see that happen. I'm quite fond of you." He smiled at her, over his cup. She stared back, trying to assimilate all the things she'd suddenly found out.

"We could take her," she finally said. "We're extremely powerful. You have no idea." He shrugged slightly, sipping his tea.

"Probably not. But I can tell you that raw power doesn't win battles in many cases. Intelligence does, although luck certainly helps. She may not be as powerful as you and your friends, though I wouldn't want to put money on it, but I am certain she is both smart and lucky. I have no idea of her background, but whatever it is, it produced the most dangerous warrior I've ever encountered. You can see it in her eyes if you look for it. Leave her alone, she will leave you alone. Go after her, she may well still leave you alone, once she's stopped you. Go after something or someone she feels honour-bound to protect..." He looked at her for a moment.

"You will lose, quite likely permanently. The only way to defeat her would be to kill her, which you might find almost impossible. Even if you succeeded, you would have to kill Chou as well, probably all her friends, and I suspect quite a large number of otherworldly allies who would not be at all happy. She has a lot of friends, some very weird and dangerous ones, both here and in other places. No matter your abilities, you would have a very stiff uphill battle with no guarantee of success. And it's all pointless. She means you no harm as long as you act responsibly. Do that and she'll leave you in peace." Finishing his tea he rinsed the cup in the sink, dried it, then put it back in the cupboard.

"Ami is right. You all need to go back to being what you were when you started. Someone I can be proud of. Think about it before you try anything rash." Smiling at her in a kindly manner as she sat at the table, not sure what to think, he patted her on the shoulder. "It's late. Don't stay up too long. I'll see you in the morning." She watched the old priest head off to bed, her thoughts troubled.

Staring out at the evening light of an alien world illuminating a vast expanse of plain stretching out of sight in eerie colours, 'Azumi' watched her older sister climb with steady beats of the enormous wings she currently possessed, thousands of metres above the ground. Circling higher, she waved, then dropped into a vertical dive, a faint scream of joy reaching them as she shot downwards at huge speed, pulling out into a loop followed by another climb. Her heart still hammering from the shock of seeing 'Chou' do a neat swan dive over the edge, even though she knew that she'd have survived the fall regardless, the silver-haired girl stared in wonder at the aerobatics.

After a long few minutes during which no one spoke, simply watched in amazement, the flying magical girl flapped her way up to their level again, flaring out to a neat landing on the wall as easily as if she was descending the stairs, then furled her wings and hopped down onto the path. She looked from face to face, all of them wearing a mix of expressions that were difficult to decipher.

"What?" she said with a grin. "I said I'd be right back." 'Yori' suddenly laughed, stepping forward and hugging the taller blonde with a look of loving exasperation.

"I'm a bad influence on you, love," she said with a chuckle. 'Chou' giggled.

"Never. You're the best influence I could have asked for." Glancing at the others, she grinned again. "Sorry if you were a bit worried but it seemed like an amusing idea."

"Sis..." 'Azumi' stopped speaking again, simply shaking her head for a moment. Eventually, she tried again. "You are completely insane. Totally, completely, fish in a tree insane." Her sister shrugged a little.

"You may have mentioned that once or twice before." Sighing and giggling at the same time, the disguised Nabiki walked over and hugged her sister as well.

"Please don't do anything like that again for a while," she said, "I don't think my heart could take the strain." 'Chou' smiled at her gently, clearly still very amused.
Uthryyl, who had been standing with his hands on the shoulders of his wife and daughter, suddenly started laughing, having overcome his shock. "Yet again, you people have managed to surprise me." He inspected her with respectful awe. "Incredible." Onkra looked at him, then at her mother, before shrugging a little.

"Your friends are very strange, Dad," she said, laughing. He nodded.

"Yep."

Stepping back, 'Azumi' inspected her sister's latest form. It was quite impressive. Based on the normal 'Chou', she had a tail which was reminiscent of the mountain soarers, and wings that were also similar, although not identical, to the wings they had. Her neck looked slightly longer as well. Moving away for room, 'Chou' spread her wings widely, showing they had a wingspan of some six metres and were attached half-way up her back, starting over the hips and running up to about the shoulder blades. Her clothes had shifted to allow this. She folded them again then turned around, so everyone could get a better view, opening them out a little.

The wings were somewhat bat-like, although fur-covered, with a different bone structure than a bat would have. Folded, they reached well above her head and almost all the way to the ground. Her tail was long enough to reach the ground and have the last fifteen centimetres rest on it. The appendage seemed to be slightly flattened from side to side, terminating in a wider part orientated vertically like a sharks tail. Turning around to face them again she smiled. "What do you think?"

"It certainly seems to work," 'Yori' said with interest, reaching out and curiously feeling the fur on her wings. "Why the fur?"

"From examining the soarer, and things I've read about aerodynamics, I think it's controlling the airflow over the wings and making it more efficient," her wife replied. "They seem to fly very well so I thought it was worth experimenting with. It seems to be quite effective." She giggled. "It also looks good and feels nice with the wind blowing over it." She moved her tail around to show them. "This works well for directional control in addition to the shape of the wings. It didn't take very long to work out how to use it."

"How much of the soarer anatomy did you copy?" 'Yori' asked.

"Not as much as you might think, I'd worked out most of this already, but seeing them and scanning that one filled in the last holes I had. They have a remarkably high bone strength and muscle density, the tensile strength is enormously higher than any other animal I've come across, although they're also quite light. The cellular machinery is extremely efficient as well. Quite remarkable. It must be an adaptation evolved for their original high gravity world. The other impressive bit is the oxygen transport mechanism, which has considerably higher efficiency than most creatures I've studied."

"So what other changes than the visible are there?" Uthryyl asked, listening intently. She glanced at him.

"I added three cervical vertebrae to the neck, while slightly slimming them all down. That makes it much more flexible so I can do this." She tilted her head back to the point she was looking straight up, in a manner than made the watchers feel a sympathetic ache, then lowered it, before twisting it around to look directly behind her like an owl.

"Ick. That looks pretty freaky," 'Azumi' said faintly. Her sister rotated her head back and grinned.

"I know, but it's necessary to allow for looking straight ahead or above you when you're flying in basically a prone position. I should probably add it to the mer-forms for the same reason. My lung capacity is larger as well, using the higher efficiency soarer mechanism, and I've upgraded all the muscles, tendons, and bones as well. It adds a certain strength increase and improves the resiliency considerably." Uthryyl exchanged a glance with Quannyr, who looked impressed.

"You worked out all of this yourself?" he asked, sounding slightly shocked. The blonde smiled.

"Nao helped with some of the calculations and ran a lot of simulations. That speeded things up a lot. My dear husband helped with some of the original biomechanical work, but I've changed a lot of it recently. The soarer scans added the bits I couldn't quite decide on and gave me a few ideas I'd missed before." She laughed. "I wanted something useful, practical, and fun. Any idiot can turn into a duck, but that's not at all interesting." The merchant looked oddly at her as 'Yori' and 'Azumi' exchanged glances, then started laughing like idiots.

"I don't understand the reference, I'm afraid," he said.

Giggling, Yori looked at him. "I'll tell you later." She turned back to her wife. "The lower mounting for the wings was clearly correct," she said, walking around the blonde and studying her.

"Yes. All the pictures of humans with wings coming out of their shoulders in mythology get it wrong from an aerodynamic viewpoint, that position isn't stable or practical. This works well, though." Extending her right wing she folded it around and poked her sister with the end of it. 'Azumi' stroked the appendage, marvelling at the incredibly soft, short fur on it. Her sister had chosen a colour scheme similar to that of the soarer she'd examined, only based on darker and lighter blonde colours, with a distinct golden tinge.

"Very nice, sis. Very nice indeed." The blonde grinned.

"So." She looked at her husband and her sister. "Would either of you like one as well?" They glanced at each other for a moment.

"Yes, please," they chorused, then laughed.

Twenty minutes later 'Azumi' looked over the wall again, seeing how dark the ground far below was getting. The suns were now behind the distant mountains for most of the plain, the far left side lit a deep violet-blue colour from the light of the small blue star, the red one having set at ground level. At their altitude, nearly four kilometres up, they still had another fifteen minutes or so of light left. The far-distant city of Krentak was ablaze with lights of every possible colour, while Sirtha was lit somewhat less impressively but still visibly. Patches of light spread out as far as the eye could see in front of them, widely separated small towns glowing in the evening dusk. She took a deep breath, stepped up onto the wall, spread her wings, and with one last glance over her shoulder at the faces of her friends, fell forward into space.

"EEEEeeeeeet!" The descending yell made Onkra and her family rush to the wall and look down, just in time to see the silver-haired girl pull out of a dive two hundred metres lower, shooting off into the distance with a shout of triumph. Some way further out her sister and sister-in-law circled, waiting for her. Laughing, the D'sage woman glanced at her father beside her. He looked back, a grin on his face, as he shook his head.

"You don't need to say it."

Quannyr giggled as she watched them, then went back to staring at the three flying people chasing each other in mid-air, faint laughs blowing back towards them.
"Hi, Nabiki. How is your holiday going?" The middle sister truly had no idea what to say to her younger sister for a long moment.

'Oh, hi, Akane, things are wonderful, I'm flying five kilometres above an alien world on the other side of a portal with wings and a tail our older sister made with magic, under my own power, and by the way you're phoning me across god knows how many dimensions courtesy of some alien magical technology. How was your day?' Nabiki giggled hysterically inside her own head, thinking this, watching as 'Yori' did a barrel roll out of sheer delight. What she actually said was, "Oh, hi, Akane. It's going very nicely, thanks. How are things at home?"

"Pretty good. I beat Shampoo again today, although it was close. She's very good indeed. Cologne was actually complimentary about it! You have no idea how weird that was. My life seems to have become quite strange over the last few months, but I like it." Nabiki had difficulty breathing for a moment, she was laughing so hard. Luckily none of this came across the link.

"That's very well done, sis. Not bad at all. Was Shampoo annoyed?"

"Kind of, but in a good way. She was muttering something about having to up her game for next time, although she was smiling. I think she's really pleased. I know I was."

"How's dad?"

"He's fine. He asked me to say hi. So did Nodoka. Dad and the Saotomes have gone out for the night, some sort of party with some friends. I don't think they'll be back until very late." According to her clock display it was about eleven PM in Tokyo, which she had to remind herself was in a different reality at the moment. Nabiki shook her head in amused disbelief.

"OK. Tell them I said hello. I'm going to have to go, some people are waiting for me."

"All right. Have fun, don't do anything I wouldn't." Akane laughed, then disconnected. When Nabiki recovered from a fresh bout of laughter she turned around and headed back to the waterfall, a couple of kilometres away and nearly eight hundred metres lower, activating the low light vision as she did since it was now quite dark. Jun was providing an entire suite of virtual instrumentation, giving her exact positional information, altitude, heading, everything you'd expect in a light aircraft. The weirdest thing of all, though, was the fact that essentially she was the aircraft, something that made her giggle wildly for a moment.

"Maybe you should fly back," Onkra suggested, laughter in her voice, as she waved to her friend.

"Perhaps I should. It's only about twenty kilometres by air," she replied, looking at the map Jun had provided without being asked. Her sister giggled at her over the comm.

"You can if you'd like to, Nabiki. Ranma and I are going to go back with the others, but since you're, um, out as a shape-shifter," she laughed for a moment, "it wouldn't be a problem if anyone sees you."

"Will there be any problem with air traffic, or anything like that?" she asked curiously.

"No, you're fine," Uthryyl said. "There isn't a lot of traffic around the mountains except over the lake, and the SI can read the transponders of anything you might miss otherwise." Jun, as he spoke, overlaid another display on her vision which tagged several air-cars several kilometres away, a couple of much faster aircraft at extreme range, and both Ranma and Kasumi heading back to the cliff.

#I can emulate an aircraft transponder should it become necessary, Nabiki,# the voice in her head told her. "I would suggest, in the interests of security, that this function not be used unless it is required." She nodded.

'Agreed. Thank you.'

"You are, as always, very welcome," the SI replied, sounding satisfied and pleased. She smiled.

"OK, I'll fly back. Meet you there. Are you going to go by air?"

"Yes, I think so," Quannyr replied. "I'm quite tired now, so I'll let the computer do the work. If you get there first, your SI can access the security system and unlock the house. We've given you all access."

"Thanks, Quannyr. See you all soon." Waving, she wheeled around with a slight change of wing shape, levelling out heading for their house, then increasing her angle slightly into a faster dive. Flapping her wings a few times she accelerated, feeling the evening air flow over the huge expanse of fur-covered skin, grinning at the odd but nice sensation. She saw to her surprise she was moving at well over a hundred kilometres an hour.

'I wonder how fast I can really go?', she mused, then decided now as as good a time as any to find out. Flapping harder she climbed, reaching over a hundred and fifty, then aimed at the house from six kilometres out and half-closed her wings like she'd seen the mountain soarer do earlier that day, dropping quickly into a vertical dive, the air screaming past her ears as her wings and tail allowed her to maintain the attitude. At two hundred and ninety kph she lost her nerve, pulling out slowly some fifteen hundred metres up. 'Wow,' she thought, shaking slightly with adrenaline. 'That was... exhilarating.'

'I would estimate that was not your maximum speed, Nabiki,' Jun said. 'My readings of your biometric stresses indicate that you could quite easily reach close to twice that if you exerted yourself fully and powered the dive. The aerodynamic parameters of the form your sister designed are not suitable for efficient flight much above that speed, although you could most likely manage it briefly. Your enhanced strength and durability would prevent any damage, but you would struggle to maintain stable flight."

'I'd need goggles or a helmet or something like that as well, I could barely see what I was doing,' she replied. 'The wind in your face at that speed is impressive.' Her hair whipping around her ears had made a surprising amount of noise. Without the vastly higher toughness and strength she had gained over the last year or so, even what she'd tried so far would have been impossible. She was very glad, though, that she could do what she was currently doing, a childhood dream had finally been realised. Grinning hugely she resumed her flight towards Uthryyl's house, only a couple of kilometres away now.

Touching down lightly in the back garden, she folded her wings and walked towards the door. She'd felt the house wards recognise her as she'd approached, a feeling similar to back home but hugely less powerful. As the reached the door it clicked and unlocked. '#I have negotiated with the house security system, you are recognised as an authorised guest,' Jun reported. She nodded, entering the house, turning on the lights as she went. Rounding the corner into the kitchen she felt an unexpected jolt, looking up to see her folded right wing had banged into the top of the door-frame. She grinned, having once more become so used to a different body she'd taken it for granted.

Turning off the illusion she shimmered and resumed her normal appearance. Laughing, the middle sister went into the kitchen and turned on the alien coffee machine Uthryyl had shown her earlier that day. By the time the others came in a few minutes later she was sitting in a chair looking out the window at the night scene of Sirtha, smiling to herself, sipping a cup of very good coffee with tree sap sweetener. She looked up, good-humouredly saying, "What took you so long?" Quannya grinned at her.

"We had to walk back to the car. But you must have been going very fast even so."

"I managed to hit two hundred and ninety kilometres an hour in a dive, although Jun thinks I could probably go quite a lot faster."

"That's damned impressive," Uthryyl said, looking at her with astonishment. "I'd never have believed it. What can you do in level flight?"

"I'm not sure. I got to about a hundred and fifty in a slight climb, but I wasn't going all out. It was fairly easy."

"Damned impressive."

"The only real problem is the wind makes my eyes water. I probably need goggles." Kasumi looked at her, then frowned slightly.

"Hmm. I'm sorry, I missed that. I'll have to work on a solution, although I suppose goggles would be a usable temporary fix." She thought for a moment, then nodded. Nabiki suddenly found herself wearing a slightly tinted set of goggles very similar to the skiing ones she had at home. Kasumi giggled as her sister reached up and pulled them off, smiling.

"That would do it." She looked at them, then flipped them towards her sister, watching with amusement as they evaporated half-way. Onkra giggled.

"I'll add it to the preset. I need to do some modifications to the others as well at the same time." Kasumi sat beside her sister, beginning the delicate pattern modifications, while Ranma watched for a moment, smiling, then wandered off with Uthryyl and Quannya. Onkra got a cup of coffee then came back and sat down to watch.

"How many of these preset forms do you have now?" she asked curiously, glancing at the eldest Tendo to ensure she wasn't disturbing her, reassured by her smile.

"Six, including the flying Azumi. Two mer-forms, one Azumi, one me, Ms Aoyama, Normal Azumi, and Horsegirl Azumi."

"Wow. I'd like to see the other ones." Nabiki smiled, looking at her sister, who was still working.

"When Kasumi finishes." Her sister looked at her and smiled.

"Would you like me to add a flying Nabiki form as well?"

She thought about it for a moment, then shrugged with a grin. "Why not? It might come in handy at some point." A few minutes later the older Tendo nodded.

"All right, all the modifications are done and linked in, and the new form pattern is ready. Just do the same linkage as before, you know the procedure." Shortly Nabiki smiled as she felt everything settle down. Onkra was watching intently.

"That's the weirdest magic I've ever seen," she said slowly. "Nothing like what we use, and so complicated! How do you keep track of it, Kasumi?"
The older sister smiled a little. "It took a lot of practice, and trial and error. We were working on it for several years, but it's been worth it, the system is amazingly flexible and powerful." She studied the D'sage girl for a moment. "Do you find it gives you a headache when you look closely at the spells?" she asked curiously. Onkra looked slightly puzzled.

"Well, it's certainly difficult to look at, like it's not all in the same dimension we are, but not to the point it hurts. Although I recall Dad saying it made his head hurt to watch you work. What does that mean?"

"I'm not completely sure, but it is interesting," Kasumi replied, clearly thinking hard. Nabiki watched them both without saying anything. After a minute or two, her sister nodded slowly. "Hmm. That may be another useful data point." She looked at Onkra, who was very curious.

"We've been slowly coming to the conclusion that our method of magic and the more common ones aren't really compatible, in some subtle but real and very fundamental way. The more experience a mage has with the other methods, the more trouble he or she seems to have with ours, to the point that they can't even fully visualise it. We're not sure why yet. Our system requires a mind that can work in multiple dimensions simultaneously, as far as we can work out, which seems to be quite rare to start with, and something that gets... filtered out, perhaps? Or blocked, something like that, by the action of learning the normal methods." She waved a hand vaguely, looking slightly puzzled.

"One seems to preclude the other, as if they were mutually exclusive, even though the energy is compatible. By the time the mage is experienced, I have a very strong suspicion that something about their minds has altered to the point that they literally can't understand or use our method. It's very odd. Not to mention annoying in some ways, as for the most part our method is provably superior. It's far more energy efficient, for a start. But it is more difficult to learn initially. It's a pity, quite a lot of our system would be very useful to teach to others, the ki/magic fusion that allows us to heal so effectively being the obvious thing, but I fear that a lot of potential users of it will never be able to learn it. We need to catch them early, at exactly the right point in their development magically. And even then it's likely that only a small percentage of people could learn it properly."

She studied Onkra for a moment, then looked at Nabiki. "We got you started accidentally, more than anything. Aiko and the girls were deliberate, we really hoped we could teach them, and it worked very well, but they weren't really mages to start with, just using a large number of very unusual spells. It's possible the same might apply to some other magical girls, or it might not. One day I'll have to look into it." She smiled a little ruefully. "Assuming I can decide which of them I'd trust with such powerful techniques. Some of them are... difficult." Nabiki laughed, knowing who she was talking about.

Looking back to Onkra who was listening intently, Kasumi continued, "I'm very interested in the fact that you seem to be able to look at our magic without any problems. That's unusual for someone who is formally trained in alternative methods of magical control, as far as I've seen so far."

"I'm not particularly well trained, to be honest," the woman said, looking slightly embarrassed. "I can work a number of spells fairly well, some quite high-energy ones like the portal spell for instance, but I'm hardly a general-purpose mage. Dad is much better than I am although he's not really a mage either, and Mom is pretty good as well." Kasumi nodded slowly.

"It's something to think about. Between us Ranma and I know a lot of very good mages, and without exception all of them find our system inexplicable, if not impossible. Several swear blind that it's got nothing to do with real magic at all." She giggled a little. "Which is clearly wrong, it's definitely using the same energy at it's lowest level, at least in part, but to them it reads as something completely different. We can see it, they can't. So it has to be magic." She inspected the D'sage woman closely for a moment. "At some point, I may have to see if you have any ability with our system. It's possible that we could teach you some of it, which would be very interesting. If you continue with the martial arts, that may trigger some level of ki control, which could well catalyse the process. It's more or less what happened with Nabiki although not quite in that order. It gets complicated very quickly."

"Can D'sage control ki?" Nabiki asked curiously, as Onkra thought about what Kasumi had said. The elder sister glanced at her, then shrugged after a moment.

"I can't see any particular reason why not. It's basically conscious control over your own life energy. In theory, any sentient creature could probably get some control over ki eventually, although the evidence suggest that the ultimate level is highly variable. Some people would have a fairly low ability, some very high, like most things in life. Our family shows definite talent in that direction, looking at the three of us, yet poor Akane is never going to reach the level you're already at after only a year or so. We've talked about this before. The fact that our magic seems to work in a synergistic relationship with ki control, almost exponentially boosting both of them, is something we never expected but changes a lot. Even so, you will always be far more powerful than Akane, even if she could learn the system, which is by no means certain. She may well not have the right type of mind." The elder sister looked at Onkra.

"You, on the other hand, might."

Looking surprised, yet intensely curious, the merchant's daughter nodded slowly. "Very interesting. I think I'd like to learn anything you could teach me. The martial arts look fun even though I'm realistic enough to know that I'll most likely never reach the level you people have, and the magic would be amazing. The healing, and the shape-shifting, more than anything else."

"Don't sell yourself short," Kasumi said, smiling. "Ranma thinks you show promise in the Art, as do I. It's a long process, but you just have to keep at it. Either of us would be happy to teach you whenever you have time, either us coming here or you coming to our home. Keep practising the exercises, as much as you can, and you might be surprised what happens." She laughed a little as Onkra looked thoughtful. "Nabiki was."

"You have no idea how surprised," the middle sister said, grinning. "I still have trouble believing it even now. I just flew off a mountain!" She shook her head in mild disbelief as Onkra giggled. "It's nuts, but so much fun!" Jumping to her feel she moved into the middle of the room, shimmering into 'Azumi'. "OK, you know this one," Onkra nodded. "This is the horse-girl version," she continued, changing again, then spinning on the spot on one hoof, waving her tail.

"I like that one," Onkra said, looking up as her mother came into the room and stared for a moment, before smiling.

"It's fun. I spent a day or so like this when I was learning to hold the spell, it still surprises me how quickly I got used to it. I more or less forgot, which was a surprise when I looked in the mirror." Nabiki giggled as her friend laughed. Kasumi was watching with a satisfied, rather proprietary air. "Then we have the flying form." She changed again, half-spreading her wings, which was all she could manage without banging into something indoors. Onkra got up and walked around her, gently feeling the fur on one wing, which was a silver-grey colour with darker markings patterned after the mountain soarer, as both Kasumi and Nabiki found it attractive.

"It looks even more impressive in the light," she said, admiringly.
"I have to agree," Quannyr said, sitting beside Kasumi and watching. "It suits you, somehow." Nabiki grinned.

"I wanted to be able to fly since I was a little girl. You wouldn't believe how much fun this is." She reverted to the normal Azumi, then sat on the floor, before shimmering into mer-Azumi. "This is great as well. I love swimming and like this I'm so amazingly good at it." She flexed her scaled tail, looking at it with approval. Shimmering again she became mer-Nabiki, the scales shifting to a deep gold colour. "This would certainly confuse people in the swimming pool at university," she added, snickering. The others laughed. "But it might be difficult to explain."

Changing back to her normal body, she hopped to her feet, then tried the flying Nabiki form, extending her wings a little and looking at them with interest. She hadn't specified any colour, so Kasumi had made the fur a lustrous brown similar to her hair, with darker, almost red stripes woven into it like something from a tiger. "Hey, not bad, sis. I like it."

"I can always adjust the colour and patterning if you want," her sister said. She shook her head. "No, this is fine. Thanks."

"If you need the goggles, there's an extra node you can trigger. Do you see it?" Nabiki looked 'inside' at the magic patterns, quickly identifying the part her sister meant. Prodding it with a tendril of power made the same goggles as earlier instantly appear on her face. She smiled.

"Fantastic. That should help." Taking them off she looked at them, then deactivated the subroutine generating them, watching as they vanished. "Very impressive."

"I'll work out a modification that will mean we don't need them, but for the moment that should do." The elder Tendo looked satisfied.

Onkra was tallying the various forms. "There's one you haven't shown us. This Ms Aoyama." Nabiki looked at her, raised an eyebrow, then changed again.

The woman in the suit carefully adjusted her sleeves, brushing a small particle of dust from her shoulder, then looked at the D'sage woman through her sunglasses. A distinct chill filled the air. Slowly glancing around the room, pausing on Uthryyl and Ranma who had just entered, she performed a very slight 'smile' as she returned her gaze to Onkra, who shivered.

"Ms Onkra. How gratifying to meet you." She looked the woman up and down for a moment, before adding in an expressionless voice, "You would appear to be mildly distressed. Can I aid you in some manner?" Onkra looked worried, while Ranma chuckled. Uthryyl glanced at his wife, both of them looking impressed and somewhat nervous. After a long pause, 'Ms Aoyama' shimmered back into the form of Nabiki, who giggled.

"You should see your face," she said, amused. Onkra shook herself, staring at her friend, then blinked a couple of times.

"That... was very worrying indeed."

"Nabiki is very, very good at the being incredibly creepy act," Ranma said, dropping into a chair with a smile of approval. "Horrifyingly good. And steadily getting better. She almost puts the wind up me sometimes." Grinning at him, the middle sister bowed slightly.

"Thank you. High praise indeed, considering the source."

"Gods. That was horrible," Uthryyl said, looking quite worried. "I could feel the cold even before I came into the room. You'd terrify anyone, Nabiki." She looked pleased. After a moment he grinned. "I may have to borrow you when I have a difficult debtor." Nabiki laughed, while Ranma leaned back, crossing his arms and frowning.

"I'm not sure I can allow that. I need her myself." Uthryyl studied him narrowly.

"Five percent."

"Fifteen."

The women gazed at the two of them and burst out laughing.

Watching the suns rise, two thousand metres above Uthryyl's house, Nabiki grinned happily, carefully holding her camera. She had used half the roll already, taking shots of the house, where her sister and, at the moment, sister-in-law, were sparring, while keeping an eye on Onkra as she practised the next set of katas she had been taught. They had all risen early, still adjusting to the longer day, Uthryyl's daughter eager to continue her new hobby. After a quick breakfast, Nabiki had immediately shifted into the flying Azumi form, laughed like a lunatic, and powered up into the clear air, watched by the others.

"How's it going, Nabs?" the red-headed martial artist asked, a giggle in her voice.

"Fantastically. If you call me Nabs I may have to drop something on you," she giggled back. "I need to work out how to reload this camera in flight, though." She looked down at them through her goggles, playing with something Kasumi had snuck in that she'd only just discovered, vastly better eyesight with a telescopic function like a hawk, which allowed her to zoom in several times and clearly make them out. Ranma was looking up at her with a grin. She waved, watching the red-head wave back, then duck a blow from her wife, laughing. Shaking her head she flapped a few times, rising higher, circling slowly. As the suns rose she could feel the warmth increasing, feeling very pleasant on her wings.

Soon she found a thermal, discovering that the air was rising rapidly as the ground warmed, allowing her to simply glide effortlessly, still gently climbing. 'I could spend the entire day doing this,' she thought happily. 'It's amazingly relaxing. Even better than swimming in some ways.'

'I would advise remaining below eight thousand five hundred metres, Nabiki,' Jun said. 'Based on your current physiology above that level you will encounter discomfort from lower air pressure, although it would not be hazardous to you. Rising above ten thousand metres would begin to be the danger point.'

"That's far higher than you'd be able to go unaided at home," she said to it. 'Nearly as high as Mount Everest, I think, which is close to the absolute limit without external oxygen.'

"That is partially true. There are a number of factors at play. The atmosphere of this world has a higher oxygen content by a significant amount, while the atmosphere itself is deeper by a few percent. This creates a more favourable pressure gradient at such an altitude. Additionally the form your sister designed is much more efficient at processing and storing oxygen than an unenhanced human, or even you in your normal enhanced form. I would expect that at ground level you would easily be able to hold your breath for several minutes with no great problem in this form. You would also probably be able to function quite well at seven or eight thousand metres even on your own world."

It paused for a moment. 'I would like to suggest that you ask your sister to retrofit the oxygen processing and structural upgrades to your other forms as well, it would be a tactically sound move. Use of all advantages available should always be a priority in my opinion. The so-called illusion spell that your sister and Ranma developed opens many possibilities that should be explored for their implications during battle.#

Nabiki laughed. 'You're always thinking about things like that, aren't you, Jun?'

#Your security and safety is my primary purpose, Nabiki. I would be remiss in my duties not to mention it.# The SI sounded amused. She giggled again.

'Fair enough, and thank you. I'll mention it to her, assuming she hasn't already thought of it.'

#It is likely that she has. Your sister and Ranma both have impressive tactical and strategic abilities, which the addition of an SI has only improved.# It fell silent for a moment. #We have company,# it suddenly announced, with a slight note of amusement, indicating something behind her, but not sounding alarmed. Looking over her shoulder, which was remarkably easy with the modified neck, she grinned. Thirty metres back and slightly higher, two mountain soarers had fallen into formation, inspecting her curiously. She slowed slightly, gradually dropping back towards them, watching with interest as they moved further apart to allow her to fit between them. All three exchanged glances, the one on the right yipping at her. She waved to it, which it seemed to find interesting. She took a few photos of them from close range, finishing the roll, putting the camera away when it was done. The two predators looked at each other, then moved ahead a little, before the left one rolled away and dived. After a moments thought she grinned and duplicated the move. A yip behind her made her laugh, looking to see the other one had repeated the exercise.

The next half hour she found enormous fun. Both flying animals seemed to be enjoying themselves thoroughly, obviously playing. They were astoundingly acrobatic, pulling off almost every manoeuvre one could imagine, loops, rolls, dives, even inverted flight for a few seconds. When she moved in front, pulling up into a hard climb, then gliding vertically until she lost speed and dropped into a neat stall turn, she was highly amused to see them both duplicate the move. They showed her a flight move, she copied it, then came up with something to show them. The animals were clearly quite intelligent, picking up everything she tried almost instantly. 'I wonder how smart they really are?' she asked Jun.

#Unknown, but based on their impressive ability to learn, I would expect at least at the level of one of the lower primates of your world. Apex predators are often possessed of considerable intelligence, these organisms would appear to follow this trend, as does your own species. They also seem to enjoy playful, non-purposeful activity, another sign of intelligence. It would be interesting to see if they adopt some of these aerobatic manoeuvres into their normal activities.# She got the impression it was watching the soarers with fascination.

Dropping into a corkscrewing high-speed dive from five thousand metres, she looked behind herself to see both predators following, yipping to themselves in an excited manner. One of them suddenly pulled out, levelling off and staring at the ground intently, before stooping into an enormously fast dive with it's wings nearly shut, reaching an incredible speed that made her watch in awe. Mere metres off the ground it extended it's wings with a crack that she heard from a kilometre up, slowing at a rate that would have knocked most things unconscious from the g forces, then dropped to the ground on top of a pair of quillit it had spotted, the backwash from it's deceleration knocking them several metres. Before they had a chance to recover it had scooped one up in it's mouth, while pouncing on the other, crushing it with a quick blow. Swallowing the first one whole it ate the second, chewed for a moment, then leapt into the air again, quickly climbing back to where she and the second soarer were watching.
'That was pretty impressive,' she said to the SI.

Indeed. The accuracy and speed of the hunting behaviour is remarkable. The immature one Kasumi inspected was presumably not as successful. They are very efficient predators. It is probably a good thing that they seem uninterested in anything larger than the quillit they obviously enjoy.

Over the next few minutes she watched both of the animals locate and devour over a dozen quillit, which seemed to be suddenly very active as the suns rose. It was still early morning, but from the air she could make out activity on the roads around Sirtha, as people began their day. Eventually deciding she was getting hungry as well, she turned around and headed back to the house, both soarers following her. She looked sideways at the one on the right, gliding in formation with her as they seemed to have decided to do, one on either side and slightly behind like an honour guard.

"You can't follow me home, guys, I don't think I can keep a pair of pet soarers, even if Uthryyl wants you in the house." It looked at her, then yipped, making her laugh. They both followed until she started to descend into the garden, peeling off and circling at altitude as she went down. Faint cries from them came as she touched down, Kasumi looking at her then up at the two animals.

"I see you also made some friends," her sister laughed.

"Apparently I did. They're very amusing and much more friendly than I would have expected. Kind of like flying dolphins." She looked up, waving to the animals. A few more yips came, before they started drifting off towards the mountains. "That was a hell of a lot of fun," she added. "I think we both taught each other some interesting flying techniques. They're remarkably agile."

"I saw. We were watching from down here for some time. Did you get some good photos?"

"I hope so. I recorded it as well, I'll send you the file." Nabiki transferred the recording to her sister. "Quannyr's suggestion of getting a really good electronic camera is one I think I need to take up. The film camera produces fantastic results but it's difficult to reload up there. I nearly dropped it when I tried."

"We'll be going into Sirtha later," Kasumi said, "Quannyr and Onkra both want to show us around, while Uthryyl would like to take us around one of his warehouses. Ranma is very interested in that. I think you might be as well."

"Sounds good. When?"

"After lunch, I think. It doesn't take long, apparently, even by road. Now, come on, we need to practice something other than flying, as much fun as it is," Her sister grinned at her. Following her around the side of the house to where Onkra and Ranma were gently sparring, the red-head stopping every now and then to critique the other woman, they watched for a while.

"She seems to be learning the basics well," Nabiki said, impressed.

"Yes. She certainly has some talent for this." Kasumi looked pleased. "Only time will tell how much talent, but at the moment we're both pleased. I hope she keeps it up." Stepping a couple of metres away, she suddenly turned and lunged at her sister with a quickly generated energy blade, who yelped in surprise and instinctively flapped the wings she had grown so used to, hopping several metres into the air, then landing on the other side of the older woman. Kasumi stared for a moment then fell over laughing. Ranma and Onkra both stopped and watched, also heaving with laughter. Nabiki crossed her arms and folded her wings around herself, making them all stare anew then laugh harder as she looked like an enormous indignant bat.

"Not funny, sis," she said, watching her sister roll around in the grass laughing her head off. After a moment, though, she began smiling.

"Oh, it was, trust me. I was curious to see what would happen but that was fantastic." Her sister looked up at her, a broad grin on her face. "You didn't even think, did you? Just flapped and jumped. It's amazing how fast you get used to your new abilities."

Unwrapping her wings then folding them properly, Nabiki grinned. "I know, it's weird. You're right, it was just an instinctive move. My body knew what to do even if my mind hadn't quite decided. Very strange." After a moment she dismissed the spell, shimmering back to normal. Shaking her head with amusement Kasumi rolled easily to her feet, taking up a stance.

"Enough silliness. Let's go through yesterday's lesson again, then we can try some new moves." Nabiki matched her position, blocking the strike that came at her. "Well done." Smiling, Kasumi took her through the moves for half an hour or so, running at much less than top speed, but still fast enough that anyone who knew Nabiki would have been shocked at her response time. When she finished, the older woman smiled, pleased.

"You're definitely speeding up, sister. That was very good. Now watch closely, this next one is more complicated." She demonstrated very slowly, then faster, while Nabiki studied the moves. Eventually she began duplicating them, her sister stopping every now and then to correct her gently. Onkra and Ranma were doing the same thing a few metres away. An hour passed in enjoyable work, the husband and wife team swapping students half-way through.

Some time later Ranma called a halt to the practice. "Good, both of you. I'm very pleased with your progress. Onkra, for a beginner you're definitely showing progress. You need to practice for an hour a day minimum, more if you can spare the time. By the time we leave you should have quite a few katas to work through. We will definitely keep in touch to check on your progress and teach you more. It might be a good idea to have you regularly come to our home for practice sessions after a couple of months. I'm very interested to see what happens, especially regarding ki abilities." She nodded, looking tired but happy.

"Nabiki, you're coming along very well. A few months like this and you'll be close to where Akane is right now, I expect. You're already stronger and faster, we just need to get the reflexes and the moves in, which is basically a lot of practice. Shampoo could still take you at that point, she's very good, but another year or so after that and she'd have a major problem." The red-head looked very pleased. "That said, against her now, she'd never stand a chance if you were outside at least. You could simply fly away, then strafe her from the air." She laughed at Nabiki's expression. "It was very funny, the way you jumped into the air like that. Combine it with some ki shots and you'd be a damn effective fighter aircraft." The martial artist looked thoughtfully at her sister-in-law. "Come to think of it, we'll have to practice exactly that on the firing range. We'll get the others set up with flying forms as well, then work out some good aerial combat techniques. It could be absolutely devastating."

"You're as bad as Jun," the middle sister laughed. "Everything is combat-related with you, isn't it?" Ranma chuckled, nodding a little.

"I have to admit my life has tended to make that a default thought pattern. I can't help it. But it's saved my life and other's several times, so I'm not too worried."

"Jun suggested that the improvements to oxygen handling and the bone and muscle structure would be useful as a day to day upgrade," Nabiki said, looking at her sister. "It asked me to ask you to add them to all my presets." Kasumi smiled.

"It's been thinking along the same lines and Nao and myself. I'm working on the best way to weave them in properly. I have already slightly modified the existing ones, but I believe the best results would be to recreate the forms around the upgraded metabolism and structure. It will take a little while to work it all out, but no more than a couple of days." She studied Nabiki closely for a moment. "I have also been working on another idea, which might be of interest. It's going to take some more work to be sure it's safe and practical, but I think it probably is." The middle Tendo looked at her sister, slightly worried.

"It's not going to be quite as dramatic as your last surprise, I hope? You scared the crap out of me when you jumped off that cliff, for a moment I forgot what you are and really thought you were in trouble." Kasumi smiled gently and slightly apologetically.

"I'm sorry, sister, it perhaps was a little over-dramatic." She giggled. "But you really should have seen your faces." Nabiki shot Ranma, currently laughing, an evil look.

"You corrupted my sister, you bastard," she said, making the young woman laugh harder.

"Isn't it wonderful?" she gasped out, watching Nabiki, who smiled ruefully.

"Sometimes it's a little hard on the mental well-being of bystanders." She looked at her sister who was grinning. "OK, what's this brilliant new idea about?"

"Well, the illusion spell changes are temporary at the moment. In the last year we've made it much more power efficient and complete. It makes real changes to the body, the form is as complete as anything the Jusenkyo magic produces, although it's not stable. But it takes much less power these days, you can all hold it indefinitely by this point." Nabiki nodded slowly.

"We told you some time ago how we've been slowly incorporating parts of the Jusenkyo magic, as we manage to unravel it, into the illusion, to do things like produce new mass or get rid of it temporarily, or other difficult jobs like that. Most of is still far beyond us, it may well always be as it's unbelievably complex, but we've acquired some useful routines from studying it. It occurred to me some time ago, though, that we could also utilise some of the ki healing methods and combine them with the illusion spell." Nabiki looked blankly at her, glancing at Onkra, who also seemed unsure where this was going. Ranma was listening with interest, looking pleased.

"Have you solved that problem?" she asked her wife.

"Not quite, but I believe I see how to." She smiled at the red-head, then turned back to her sister. "Using the ki healing we can rebuild damaged or missing parts of the body, to a remarkably detailed level. As we've learned more and more about it, and about how a biological organism actually works, we've been able to take it to the point of being close to healing any conceivable injury and probably any disease. Some poisons are still awkward, but we're getting very good at those as well." She looked pleased, while Nabiki thought about this.

"OK, I've certainly seen some very impressive things that both of you have done, but where is this going?"

"The way we normally regenerate an amputated limb, for example, is to read the ki signature which has a map of what the body is supposed to be, then force regrowth along that map so it rebuilds the missing part. A similar technique is used to repair a damaged organ, which is easier because most of it is still there, just with, for example, a hole in it. Some time ago we were discussing the possibility of changing the ki map, though, then regenerating something based on the changed information. I've been running a lot of simulations and I'm close to working out the best method to do it without causing any problems."

Onkra gasped slightly, understanding the idea, just as Nabiki also got it. "You could use the illusion shift to create and test a new form, then basically 'heal' the underlying organism into that form?"

"Exactly. A real shape-shift, making a permanent change to the body. Not a transient one like the illusion spell, or even quite like the Jusenkyo curse. There would be no trigger to revert it. The Jusenkyo magic is astoundingly quick and complete, however it actually works, almost instantaneously producing a stable form that is complete right down to the genetic level, but it also can revert back just as fast when triggered the other way. This new technique would be permanent and stable, although we're a long way off making it as quick. It might be possible eventually, but it would be years away. Even so, it could be useful." She smiled.

"For example, the enhanced metabolism I came up with for the flying form could be applied as a permanent modification to your original body. Upgrading a body, not just fixing a damaged one. There are some very interesting possibilities for repairing hereditary genetic defects more efficiently than we can at the moment, as one possible use. We can do it, but slowly and inefficiently at the moment. This would solve that."

Nabiki stared at her sister in awed astonishment. Eventually she said, "Wow. That's... amazing."

"It closes the last limitations we have on the healing technique, if we can make it work," Ranma added, looking at her wife with a pleased expression. "Not just healing diseases, injuries, the sort of things we can do now, but more long-term problems such as some of the nastier neural degenerative issues. They usually have a genetic component, which we could certainly edit out, but it would be a hugely complex job that would take hours. This would take minutes and much less effort."

"I find it remarkable that you can already edit a genetic structure at all," Onkra said with respect. "It's amazingly complex from what I've learned."

"It's certainly not at all easy," Kasumi replied. "We much prefer to use the ki map, it simplifies things a lot, but it doesn't really allow for changes, merely repairs." She shrugged. "Most of the time that's more than good enough, most of the problems we encounter are either trauma or disease. I would dearly like to be able to deal with the rest." She sighed a little. "And to be able to teach more people how to do it. We could save so many lives."

"We'll figure that out one day, love. But I agree." Ranma smiled tenderly at her wife, reverting to male and slipping an arm around her waist. She leaned against him.

"I hope so." They smiled at each other, then she looked back to her sister, who was watching with amusement. "But, what it means in the short term, is that when we work out the last problems and get it tested properly, if you'd like the enhanced metabolism in your normal form, it could be easily done."

"That would be useful if I took up mountain climbing," Nabiki said with a smile. "I was higher than the top of Everest earlier with no issues at all. Jun says that should work even at home. It could be useful."

"Indeed. I'll continue to work on it and let you know when I've worked it out." The elder sister smiled at the younger one, with a suddenly evil expression. "I'll need a guinea pig, after all."
"Um, right," Nabiki said, stepping out of range, then laughing. Kasumi giggled.

"Don't worry, by the time we get that far it will be completely safe." The middle sister thought for a moment, an idea occurring to her.

"Does that mean you could cure the Jusenkyo curse? I mean, sort of... modify the cursed form to be the same as the uncursed one?" Ranma smiled slightly, looking at his wife, then shook his head.

"No. Unfortunately it doesn't work like that. The curse is astoundingly powerful and very persistent. Yes, you could modify a cursed body using this technique, as the illusion spell proves, but it would get overwritten the next time the curse was triggered either way. The illusion technique bypasses that as it's superimposed over the top of the curse, but a permanent change wouldn't. The curse would take priority. Having studied it for so long I have a growing suspicion it was designed to do that, to make it permanent and incurable. Our magic system is different enough that I have a feeling whoever came up with the curse knew nothing about it, so couldn't compensate for it, but most other things have been thought of and neutralised." He frowned slightly. "It's kind of scary, just how complex and complete the curse actually is. Whoever came up with it was... incredibly good, and very, very powerful."

"And lived a very long time ago," Kasumi added. "Many thousands of years, certainly. We still have no idea what the ultimate power source for it is, either."

"It would be very useful to make permanent changes," the martial artist mused. "Evolution is amazingly effective, but it does produce some pretty inefficient designs in some cases. One really good example is the human eye. The rods and cones that convert light into nerve signals are behind the nerves themselves, and the blood vessels. It reduces the ultimate acuity of the eye quite a lot. There are some advantages to that methods, but also some severe disadvantages. An octopus eye does it the other way around, putting the light-sensitive parts first, then everything else. Neither is perfect, but for a lot of purposes the second method is superior. A little redesign, taking the best of both methods, could produce a properly designed eye that would be much better than either. There are lots of things like that in the human body. Systems that work well enough to be passed on through the species, but not as well as they could if you worked on them a little. Evolution doesn't really do best, it just does good enough."

He grinned. "I'm pretty sure we could improve some of the weak spots."

"You may have noticed how much better 'Ms Aoyama's' vision is than your normal eyesight," Kasumi said, looking at Nabiki. She nodded. "I fixed most of what Ranma just mentioned when I designed the final form you have as a preset. It was partly an experiment to see if it worked as well as I hoped it would. The original eyes of that form were based on a domestic cat, with enhanced colour receptors, but I tweaked it quite a bit. Your 'Azumi' eyes are slightly enhanced as well, but not as much. I need to revisit that at some point. The eyes of the mer-forms are tweaked to work well underwater as well as in air. The flying form has added optical parts to allow for a magnified form of vision, based on what birds of prey use, as well as significant resolution improvements."

"I found that out earlier. It works very well."

"I hoped it would. I still have some improvements I'd like to try at some point, then I'll probably fold them all into one design which I'll apply to all the forms, but that will take a little more thought. Added colour receptors, for example, to allow distinguishing more colour variations. Human vision is trichromatic, using three types of cone to resolve colour. Some animals, and even rare humans, use four, giving tetrachromatic colour, while some birds use five or more. That could be interesting to experiment with."
Onkra was listening with fascination, smiling a little. "It's so weird to hear you casually talking about upgrading and modifying people like that," she giggled. "I know it can be done with cybernetics and genetic engineering, some species go in for that sort of thing, but all the other methods I've heard about are much more invasive and complicated. You make it sound like changing a shirt."

Kasumi grinned as Ranma chuckled. "We may take it a bit for granted now. Once you work out the techniques it's remarkably simple to do some of these things."

"Simple isn't the word I'd use, sis," Nabiki laughed. "I still can't believe how complex that spell is. I keep looking at it, trying to work out what's going on, but I'm not much nearer now than I was to begin with. It's absolutely incredible to me that you both came up with it from scratch."

"Most mages would agree with you," the martial artist said, looking very amused. "In fact, most of them seem to think it's impossible." He shrugged a little, grinning. "Clearly it isn't, but it does upset them quite a lot."

"Right, as fascinating as all this is, I'm starving," the middle sister said. "All the flying, then you slave-drivers torturing both of us." She glanced at Onkra who nodded vigorously, before grinning. "Let's get lunch."

"Damn good idea," Ranma said, chuckling, taking his wife by the hand and leading them towards the house.
"It's pretty impressive, Uthryyl," 'Yori' commented, staring around the huge warehouse with wide eyes. 'Azumi' looked at her, thinking 'impressive' was a serious understatement.

The enormous building was several hundred metres long, nearly half that wide, and at least fifty metres high. A vast array of shelves stretched into the distance close to a kilometre away, reaching all the way to the ceiling, piled high with metal and plastic crates, each of them carefully labelled with something vaguely reminiscent of a barcode, only much more complex. Robotic alien anti-gravity forklift-like machines were hovering around the place, passing up and down the corridors between the shelves, moving crates around under the control of a computer system somewhere. When they passed close to one it would either pause until they went past or rise overhead, carefully going around them. She thought to herself it looked remarkably like an alien version of the vast warehouse at the end of the 'Raiders of the Lost Ark' film, with added flying machines. And not so cramped.

The thought made her giggle quietly, as she watched a large cargo lifter move a crate big enough to have a car inside it, taking it off a shelf twenty metres up and flying away with the thing. She wondered what was in it.

"How many warehouses do you have?" 'Chou' asked curiously, watching the machines work. He smiled.

"In Sirtha, five. Two this size, one slightly smaller for perishables, and one about half the size with a seriously good security system for high-value goods like chocolate, coffee, some drugs, and various magitech things. That one might cause even you two some difficulty to get into." 'Yori' looked interested at the idea, glancing at 'Chou', who laughed.

"Maybe later, dear." The black-haired woman grinned while Uthryyl laughed.

"Feel free to try. If you can, I'll know what parts of the system need upgrading."

"Don't tempt me," 'Yori' chuckled. "It's probably very wrong of me but I have to admit I love breaking into un-break-into-able places." Shaking her head, she added, "The MoD in London was pathetically easy. I'll have to give them your details, they need something much better. Perhaps you could sell them one." The merchant nodded, grinning.

"Certainly. I've got a few good systems available for large institutions, some pure tech, some hybrid magic/technological. Give me a name and I'll talk to them."

"The PSIA might be interested as well," 'Chou' said, giggling. "We really must introduce you to Agent Naito at some point. He's a nice man."

"I've got a few more warehouses for long-term storage scattered around the place, mostly in Krentak," Uthryyl said, walking along with them following. "The ones in Sirtha are the current stock being bought and sold. I also own several about this size on K'nn four and six, as they're big customers, and rent space on half a dozen more worlds, including yours now. If Azumi's ideas pan out, I may have to enlarge the capacity there, though." Leading them down the aisle between the towering shelves for a considerable distance, he turned at an intersection and went a little further, then stopped.

"There you go," he said, waving at a dozen crates on the second shelf up. They were cubes approximately two metres on a side, stacked neatly in groups of two.

"What are they?" 'Chou' asked, inspecting the labels with interest.

"Ten megawatt micro fusion generators similar to the one in the bunker that was running the railgun," he answered. "Next generation, slightly smaller, but otherwise identical output and efficiency. They've been hanging around here for a while now. Too small for most large applications, too big for most private individuals. Ten megawatts isn't much by industrial standards but it's a hell of a lot for a house." He grinned. "Even for your building it would be serious overkill at maximum output, unless you wanted to stick a couple of railguns on the roof. I still have two of those left and about five hundred tons of ammo for them." 'Yori' looked at 'Chou', then both of them giggled.

"No, I think we're good as far as defensive weaponry goes," 'Yori' said. "I'll have to show you the ward system in action some time. The railguns would be rather superfluous, and I think a little antisocial."

"The projectiles do tend to go a very long way if you miss," the merchant said with a grin. "Around a hundred and twenty kilometres or so. Probably not the sort of thing you want in a city. Anyway, that shows you the sort of size at the lower end, plus I'd be happy to get rid of these. I've got about forty of them in long-term storage, and I can easily get as many as you'd ever need from the manufacturers. They still make them, while they're considered old technology they're amazingly tough and reliable, so they get used where people don't need huge amounts of power and want the reliability. Small towns, factories, even some older space stations on the higher-tech worlds. You can cascade them, of course, if you need higher output. Not as efficient as a large one, but if one fails you still have the rest."

'Azumi' looked at the crates with a raised eyebrow. Sitting right there on the shelf was enough power generation capacity for over a hundred thousand houses back home, clean and cheap power she could practically buy off the shelf, literally. "We have to work this out," she said quietly. "It could change an awful lot of things." The merchant nodded, looking at her.

"It will change almost everything on your world, given time. In any technological society, energy is ultimately the single most important resource. Everything else flows from it. Water, food, transportation, light, heat, refrigeration, information processing, medicine, anything you can think of. It all needs energy, and the larger the society the more it needs. There are higher-density power systems around, but fusion is certainly one of the best for your world at it's current state of technology. The only problem at all in your case is the lack of fuel, but I can supply as much as you're likely to require for many years." He pointed at the crates.

"A ton of fuel is about one seventeenth the volume of one of those, and you'd need about ten tons, a hundred and seventy cubic metres, a year for all your power requirements for the entire country. Helium three is pretty cheap, it's widely used on many worlds. The ongoing costs of running Japan would be considerably less than you currently spend on the various methods you use, never mind the lack of clean-up for the byproducts. The fossil fuels are bad enough, but the fission waste is going to be a problem in the future." He shrugged, looking slightly annoyed. "That stuff is just a pain, especially when you take into account the amount you produce because your reactor designs are so old and inefficient. Even with fission there are much better ways to do it. I was quite surprised to find out how primitive the current systems were."

"There are all sorts of international treaties that get in the way of better designs, quite a few of which are known, I believe," 'Chou' said. "It's a real problem with no good solution."

"Well, with enough energy, cleaning up the waste is a lot easier. And I can point you at a place you can dump it all, on the dead world. No one will care."

"Interesting. That might well be of considerable use," the blonde said, nodding slowly. "It's certainly something worth knowing."

"How much do they weigh in the crates?" 'Yori' asked, studying the boxes in front of her.

"About three quarters of a metric ton, all in. Maybe a hundred kilograms for the packing crate and internal padding. Two people and a small cargo lifter can manage. You could pick it up and carry it away easily." Uthryyl grinned. He looked back at the crates, his tail twitching a little as he thought.

"Here's an idea. Would you like one?" The three women looked at each other, then back at him.

"What do you mean?" 'Chou' asked curiously. He shrugged.

"They're dead stock at the moment. If you like, you can have one for your building. I can have some of my people install it in the basement, or the parking garage, which might be easier. Splice it into your power feed and turn it on. No more electricity bills for one thing. Plus you could get a feel for what they're like to operate. It's all automated, the SI can easily control and monitor it. A hundred kilos of fuel would keep you going for decades."

'Yori' and 'Chou' looked at each other again, taken aback. "That's a very generous offer, Uthryyl. I know you said they're not vastly expensive, but they're not worthless by any means. And what about the export paperwork?"

"For your personal use, that's not a problem. I already told you, you're effectively pre-approved for practically anything, from practically anywhere. Not to mention these things aren't particularly difficult to export even to a non-aligned world. They're sealed units, maintenance free, and intrinsically safe. Even if someone managed to open one up, which would be pretty hard, it would just shut down. You'd destroy it in the process as well, so it wouldn't help you much. It is admittedly a little large for one building, like I said, but you can turn the output down. Most people don't need anything so big even so, but you've certainly got room."

The blonde woman glanced at her husband, who shrugged a little. "I suppose it's not a bad idea. I can't see it would do any harm regardless, and having an independent power supply is certainly sensible. A while ago I did start to look into backup generators, but everything got complicated with the portal bombs and I put it to one side." 'Yori' grinned slightly. "This is a bit bigger than I was looking at but I guess it's better to have too much power than not enough."

"That's practically your motto," 'Azumi' said with a wry smile. 'Yori' chuckled.

"Oh, definitely."

"Right, then, that's settled. When we finish the holiday we can sort one out for you. The crated unit is self contained, it's actually possible to fire it up without removing it from the box, but in your case we'd install it properly. The fuel storage cryostat is included in the unit, so you only need to fill it with liquid helium three and turn it on. Once its running it uses some of the generated power to keep the helium liquid indefinitely, there's essentially no leakage. Very nice design. We can program it for the right voltage, frequency, and number of phases when it's installed, it will wire right into almost anything." Uthryyl looked satisfied. 'Chou' smiled at him.

"Thank you, Uthryyl. I still think it's very generous."

The merchant chuckled. "I'll be glad to see one go to a good home, and get some space back." 'Yori' looked around at the vast warehouse then raised an eyebrow at him. "...Metaphorically."
They began walking again. "They're not all that expensive in the grand scheme of things." Uthryyl smiled. "The SI units were much more pricey." At their inquisitive looks, he added, "They cost more than all the reactors I have in stock. Each."

"Good grief," 'Yori' muttered, slightly appalled. He laughed again.

"Don't worry. It was a large investment, but one that's paid off in more ways than I could ever have expected. Just the increase in efficiency has already paid for them twice over. And I'm more than happy to help my friends, especially considering how much you've both done for me in the past."

"Thank you again, Uthryyl," she said, grinning at him. He waved it off.

"Not a problem. You're all good for business, as I told you ages ago, you're dear friends, and you're teaching my daughter something invaluable." He smiled at them all. "Not to mention that Azumi is going to make us all several fortunes. That much I'm sure of. She has very good ideas." The martial artist and her wife looked at the middle sister, who suddenly felt rather embarrassed.

"That's nice of you to say," she replied. He shrugged, appearing somewhat amused.

"It's true. I've already started looking into the possibilities of trading artwork, or at least begun the research on what would be tradeable between here, your world, and one or two others. It will take some time to get everything sorted but it looks very viable. I'll look into setting up some sort of coffee and chocolate growing organisation when we get back, although that's quite a long term thing. It's probably very lucrative in the end, though, for both ends of the trade." He grinned. "Even the idea about selling mattresses is a good one." 'Azumi' laughed.

"I'll be the first customer. That bed is remarkably comfortable."

"If we can get this reactor import/biochemical export thing going, I think everyone except some oil and gas companies on your world are going to be quite happy. I know I will. The profit will be huge, and best of all people will genuinely be helped on several worlds. That's the best type of business." Uthryyl seemed very satisfied. "I'm sure there will be a lot of other things as well over time, as you've noticed there are lots of little things around that you might like to import, and I can think of a fair few things that would be good exports from your world. Your entertainment industry produces some very good movies, which would be portable to some places. Our people certainly enjoy them. Literature, music, things like that, can be quite desirable, although not universally so. There are lots of opportunities if I expand the business, which I would quite like to do."

Reaching the end of the warehouse he ushered them through a door into a surprisingly small office, which had half a dozen people in it, using equipment that was clearly some form of office computing system, although quite unlike anything they'd seen before, a number of displays hanging in mid air around the room. "Quite a few of my people now have SI units, which is making all this obsolete, but we still use it for now," he said, looking around. A woman looked up, then came over to him.

"Hello, Uthryyl," she said, smiling at him, then looking curiously at his guests.

"Berkra, these are very good friends of mine, Yori, Chou, and Azumi." She looked surprised, clearly recognising at least some of the names.

"Oh, my," she said quietly, making 'Azumi' cover a smile, glancing at her sister, whose eyes twinkled. "I've certainly heard of both Yori and Chou." Berkra glanced apologetically at 'Azumi'. I'm afraid I don't know you, though, my dear," Uthryyl laughed.
"You will, trust me. She's got a real sense for business aside from anything else. We'll be hearing a lot of Azumi in the end." The D'sage woman looked slightly surprised, but nodded.

"That young man Hryd talked to me a little while ago about the power unit for his Tyrkrel Industries LakeJet 10. I pulled one from stock and got it ready. He should be turning up very soon. I've called Gavon and arranged for him to install it for the boy." Uthryyl nodded, looking thoughtful.

"What's the list on that unit?"

"Seventy-eight credits, but we haven't moved one for some time."

"Let him have it at cost."

"Certainly. I've already invoiced him forty-three credits." She smiled. Uthryyl laughed loudly.

"You know me too well, Berkra. Far too well."

The woman giggled. "I've worked for you for a very long time, Uthryyl. You told me what happened to the poor boy, I was fairly sure this would be the result." Berkra smiled again. "Gavon agreed to do it in exchange for the lad buying him lunch. He said it wouldn't take more than twenty minutes."

"Thanks, Berkra. Good job." He looked at his friends, who were grinning, then shrugged. "So I'm a soft touch sometimes." Chuckling, he led them out, nodding to his employees, while Berkra watched them go, a smile on her face.

"Very good woman, that one," he said, once they had left the building. "She's worked for me for nearly fifty of your years and knows me better than I know myself, sometimes. She certainly deserved the SI."

"You are a decent person, my friend," 'Yori' said, grinning at him. "That was a nice thing to do for Hryd."

"I'd have given him the thing but I though it was best to make him pay something, to ensure he takes it seriously. He could well have died if you hadn't been there," the merchant said, his smile momentarily dimming. "But it all worked out. Right, let's go and find my wife and daughter, they're around here somewhere."

Sitting on top of the tallest building in Sirtha, looking out at the view, 'Azumi' sipped a cup of exceptionally good coffee and smiled happily. She looked around the table she and her friends had been sitting at, having a light snack. "It's a lovely view," she said, turning to Quannyr.

"It is," the D'sage woman replied, nodding. "Almost in the middle of the city, and considerably higher, so you can see practically everything. It's even better on a clear night." She waved to someone at a table closer to the middle of the roof terrace, who waved back with a smile. "We come here every now and then. Quite a few people do, it's a popular place, partly for the view, partly for the food, which is nice."

Quannyr studied 'Azumi', who was looking out over the city again. "I hope you're enjoying yourself here, my dear. We've been looking forward to having you all visit for some time. The others have been before, but not for more than a few days, and often running frantically around dealing with problems no one else could." She smiled a little. "It's nice to see them so relaxed." Both of them looked over to where Onkra was pointing out things in the distance to 'Yori' and 'Chou', Uthryyl standing next to them and listening.

"I am, very much indeed," the middle sister said, grinning broadly. "Even without my dear sister's insanity, and the results of her work, it's wonderful. Those gliders were huge fun, as was swimming in the lake, and that waterfall..." She shook her head in wonder. "That is... just astounding."

"It's one of the most impressive natural phenomena I've ever seen, I have to say," her companion replied, smiling at the memory. "I hadn't been there for some time, so it was nice to see it again. Although, I will admit, I nearly had a heart attack when your sister dived over the wall. She has an... unusual... sense of humour."

"Tell me about it," 'Azumi' grinned. "I was terrified for a moment. It took me completely by surprise. The results were worth it, though."

"I noticed you were flying with some interesting companions this morning," Quannyr commented, looking amused. "They seemed very taken with you."

"Perhaps the patterning on my wings makes them feel I'm one of them?" 'Azumi' asked. She smiled a little at the memory. "Whatever the reason, that was a lot of fun. It will be interesting to see if it happens again." She glanced over at her elder sister, who was laughing at something Onkra had said, then sighed a little.

"What's wrong?"

"Oh, nothing really, it's just... seeing my big sister there, having fun, with her husband... it brings home how far things have come in the last year and a bit, but also how much further they have to go before things are the way I wish they were." She rested her chin in her hand, stirring her coffee with the odd looking spoon the D'sage used. "Dad is so much better now, he's the father I knew so long ago, and Akane... The difference is unbelievable. But still, we can't tell them. Never mind about me, that's not really important, but I know how much Akane and our father miss our elder sister. Neither of them talk much about her any more, but I know. It makes me feel guilty to see her almost every day while knowing that they're missing her so much."

Quannyr put her hand on the silver-haired girl's, squeezing a little. "I know quite a lot about your situation, your sister and her husband have talked about it in the past, and you've told us as well. You have my sympathies. Family is very important, and it can't be easy holding such secrets from them. But, if it's any comfort, from what I can see the day that you can finally reunite your elder sister with the rest of your family is approaching, even if slowly. Look forward to it and don't dwell on things you can't change."

"It's good advice, thanks. But it's difficult to deal with even so." The middle sister glanced at the older, alien, woman, then smiled a little. "It's her birthday the day after tomorrow. It would have been nice to give her an older sister for it." Her companion laughed slightly. "We don't make much fuss about birthdays in our family any more, we sort of got out of the habit a few years ago after what happened. It sort of broke the family for quite a while. I've arranged for a present for her, since I'm away, which should get delivered today or tomorrow, but I do miss her. Despite all the problems we had with her for so long, she's my sister and I love her very much." 'Chou' and 'Yori' sat down next to her, making her look over and smile at them.

"Don't worry, sister, Akane will be fine." 'Chou' smiled gently. "She's vastly better than she was, from what you've said and we've seen, she is rapidly making up for years of not taking the Art seriously, which wasn't really her fault in many ways, and seems to be enjoying herself. She's made a good friend in Shampoo, hasn't lost her temper in weeks, she even has the respect of Cologne!"
"Which is close to a miracle," 'Yori' chuckled. "I'm not sure I ever managed that."

"Oh, you did, believe me," 'Azumi' said, grinning. "Respect, or was it terror. I get them mixed up." All of them laughed.

"I wish I could send her a present," 'Chou' said, after a moment. "I owe her five birthdays worth." Beside her, 'Yori' slowly got a weird grin. She looked at her husband suspiciously. "Dear?"

"Yes, love?" the short woman said innocently.

"You've done something, haven't you?" 'Yori' looked at her, then gazed out over the city.

"Don't know what you mean." Her wife stared hard at her.

"Why don't I believe that?" she asked.

"I have no idea." 'Yori' snickered to herself. The elder Tendo stared hard, making her giggle harder.

"What did you do, my dear husband?" 'Chou' sounded mildly irritated now. After a few more seconds of giggling, her husband caved in.

"I felt sorry for her. Even with the history we have, I thought she deserved a break. A lot of what happened turned out to be outside her control." She glanced at 'Azumi', who was waiting as impatiently as her elder sister, extremely curious. "I know how much she'd like to be able to do all the things you can do, things she'll probably never be able to do, which I can't help but feel bad about. I can't change that, but I remembered something I got some time ago, that I thought might be something she'd find interesting."

There was a long pause.

"And that is?" 'Chou' asked, intensely curious, after looking at her sister with a raised eyebrow.

"Think back to LA and you'll work it out," 'Yori' said, giggling again. "She should be getting it any time now. Aiko was going to drop it in." 'Chou' thought for a moment, then her eyes widened, a smile growing on her face, before she leaned forward and hugged the other woman.

"That's perfect. Thank you."

"I was planning on giving it to her eventually, but her birthday seemed like a good time, now that she's more or less normal. For Nerima, at any rate." 'Yori' looked smug. Staring at her, then at her sister, 'Azumi' finally snapped.

"What the hell are you two gibbering about?" she demanded. They explained, making her suddenly laugh delightedly. "Oh my god. She's going to love that."

Nodoka looked up as there was a knock on the door. "I'll get it, Auntie," Akane said, turning the television off and getting up. Nodoka nodded, going back to her notebook in which she was going over the preliminary wedding plans she'd worked out for Ukyo and Konatsu.

"Thank you, dear." The youngest Tendo left the room, coming back quickly with an odd expression on her face, which Nodoka puzzled over when she looked up. Behind her was someone she recognised with a slight shock.

"Oh, Aiko, how nice to see you again," she said to the magical girl, standing up to greet her. Shaking hands she looked at the very different clothes the girl was wearing compared to the last time she'd seen her months ago. "That looks somewhat more practical for your line of work," she said, smiling slightly. The brunette giggled.

"It's much better. The only reason we wore the old uniform was because of some very annoying magic. Chou finally worked it out and managed to turn it off. Something we're all rather pleased about, especially in cold weather."

Laughing, Nodoka nodded understandingly. "Would you like a cup of tea?"

"Thanks, that would be very nice." Shortly the Saotome woman had produced a pot of tea and three cups, setting it on the table and pouring them each one.

"I saw on the news a while ago that Yori and Chou have been doing something very secretive in Canada associated with that awful Halleckton thing. Were you and your friends there as well?" Nodoka looked curious. Sipping her tea, Aiko nodded, sighing.

"Yes, we were. It was... very unpleasant. I can't go into the details, I'm afraid, but it was something I wish we could have avoided. Unfortunately, it wasn't."

"It sounded horrible on the news," Akane said, looking at the brunette with wide eyes. Aiko smiled slightly sadly.

"More horrible than I want to think about. But it was necessary. We did our job, even though we didn't enjoy it." She sighed again. "Not at all fun. Oh well, it's over now."

"So what brings you here?" Nodoka asked after a moment's silence during which the girl seemed far away. "And did you get the message Nabiki passed on about coming for an afternoon lunch next month?" Aiko nodded, smiling once more.

"We all did, thank you, Yori passed it on. We should be able to make it, although we'll need to know a firm time and date closer to the day." She turned her attention to Akane. "From what we've learned, from... a specific woman who doesn't smile much," the brunette shivered, as Akane went slightly pale, "your martial arts abilities have come on dramatically in recent months. By Neriman standards you've apparently become rather good. I hope you realise that by almost any other standards, Neriman 'rather good' is 'insanely skilled.'" She smiled slightly. "We have somewhat different standards but even so it's impressive."

"I... never thought of it like that," Akane said truthfully.

"It's true. Even a fairly average martial artist from around here is exceptional by the standards of most of the rest of Japan, never mind the rest of the world." She stopped and studied the Tendo girl for a moment. In an apparent change of tack, she asked, "Would you mind having a quick spar with me? I'm curious to see your skill level for myself." Gaping for a moment, Akane nodded apprehensively.

"It would be an honour. I've heard that Yori and Chou both trained you, and they're the best I've ever heard of."

"Don't worry, I'm not trying to do anything other than assess your skill. It won't take long." Aiko smiled reassuringly. She stood up. Akane looked at Nodoka, who looked slightly surprised, but nodded to her, also rising. With a slight gulp the youngest sister got to her feet and lead the way out to the Dojo, where Genma and Soun were in the process of finishing a class. They looked surprised to see Aiko next to Akane. The students recognised the magical girl as well, whispering amongst themselves. Dismissing the class, none of whom left, the two fathers walked over.
"Akane? What's going on?" Soun asked curiously. He nodded respectfully to Aiko, who smiled back.

"Aiko stopped by, and would like to have a spar with me. Apparently," she swallowed, "Ms Aoyama has been talking about me."

Soun stared at her for a moment. "That woman who scared you so much recently?"

"Yes."

"How odd." He looked at Aiko, who smiled innocently at him. "All right. Please don't dismember my youngest daughter."

"Dad!" Akane laughed with embarrassment, while Aiko giggled.

"I'll be careful. I'm quite curious, though. We were told that Akane has improved considerably. Apparently Shampoo has been training her?"

"Yes. That girl is very good indeed, and seems to be a very competent teacher. We're going to be teaching them both soon as well, we may be getting old but we still know a few things they don't." Soun smiled as the magical girl laughed.

"You're not old. I know people over two hundred years of age, and even they think of themselves as only middle-aged. You can't be more than forty-five." She turned to Akane as her father looked pleased. "All right. Change into your practice clothes and let's have a quick match." With a nod Akane disappeared into the changing room that had been added to the Dojo recently to cope with the influx of students, returning quickly in her gi. Both young woman moved to the centre of the floor as the students all stood around the edge, leaving room. Just as they were bowing to each other, Shampoo walked in, looking around curiously, her eyes widening as she spotted Aiko.

Stopping next to Nodoka, she asked in a low voice, "What's going on?"

The elder Saotome glanced at her. "Aiko dropped by and wanted to see how skilled Akane is for some reason. I have a feeling there's something going on but for the life of me I can't work out what."

"Odd," the Amazon woman said, watching with great interest.

Assessing her opponent, Akane tried to work out the best opening attack. Aiko was simply standing there clearly waiting for her to begin, in a loose stance that was obviously ready to react however was required. After a moment she decided on an approach and struck out with her arm, probing the other woman's defences with a blurringly quick attack. Aiko deflected the blow with a slight motion of her own arm, smiling slightly. Stepping to the side, Akane tried again, slightly faster and lower, with the same result. 'God, I thought I was pretty fast now, but I can't even see her move,' the blue-haired girl thought to herself, impressed as hell. 'Oh well. At least I can't hurt her, so I can really cut loose.' With a sudden grin, matched by the brunette, she attacked as hard and as fast as she could, bringing out everything she'd learned from Shampoo as well as all her other moves.

The students gaped at the sudden whirlwind of motion, the two young women exchanging blows almost too fast to see, and far too quickly to count. Occasional thumps from deflected punches sounded, along with the sound of feet on the wooden floor, but other than that the two women fought silently. Soun glanced at Genma, who looked back, an impressed look on his face. Shampoo watched critically, nodding every now and then, making mental notes. "Good, Akane," Nodoka heard her say quietly. "Now. Strike! Good grief, that girl is quick." She shook her head in awe. "Very good, Akane, but nowhere near her level." She glanced at the older woman, smiling a little. "She's a magical girl for a reason, I think. The only people I've ever seen better than that are Yori and Chou. And even then I have a feeling she's not going as fast as she could if she needed to. It's damned impressive."

"Even I can see Akane is very good now." Nodoka looked at Shampoo with a small smile. "I think getting close to your level." The Amazon laughed a little.

"Closer, certainly, she's improved amazingly since we started, but I have a large head start on her. Even so, she's becoming very good. Vastly better than I thought she'd become when we started. I'm very glad to see I was wrong." They watched as Aiko suddenly stepped back and signalled a stop. Akane immediately ceased, also stepping back, then wiped the sweat from her forehead with a sign of relief.

"I'm impressed. Genuinely, that was very good indeed, Akane. There aren't many martial artists around here who are much better than that." Aiko inspected her opponent. "How tired are you?"

"I'm glad it's over, but I could do it again if I had to," the blue-haired young woman replied honestly. Aiko nodded thoughtfully.

"Decent stamina as well. Good." She glanced over at Shampoo. "You've trained her very well."

"Thank you. I'm pleased with her progress, certainly." The Amazon smiled at her friend, who grinned back, happy about the compliment from someone she respected.

"You work in a jewellery store, don't you?" Aiko asked, making Akane look at her oddly.

"Yes. I have done for a few years now."

"I heard you foiled a number of robberies."

"I did. Four so far. None of them were very good." She smiled a little.

"How's your temper nowadays, since Yori and Chou got rid of those horrible little parasites?"

"It's pretty good. I can still get angry a little too easily but the overwhelming rage is gone." Akane looked slightly worried, not sure where this line of questioning was going. Aiko suddenly lashed out with a hand moving far too fast to even see, slapping the Tendo girl across the face very hard. "OW! Fuck it, what the hell was that for?!" Akane snarled, putting her hand on her face. Aiko was watching her intently. After a moment she nodded, smiling slightly.

"Sorry. I needed to check."

"Check what, for fuck's sake? That I bruise?" Akane wasn't happy but took a few deep breaths and calmed down.

"I needed to check that. Well done. No loss of temper, aside from being pissed off. Which was reasonable under the circumstances." Aiko grinned. "I am sorry, that must have hurt."

"Damn right it did," Akane grumbled.

"Hey, look, it's Ryoga!" Aiko suddenly said, pointing at the door of the Dojo. Everyone turned to look, Soun and Genma with expressions of sudden fear, while Shampoo looked worried. Seeing nothing, they all looked at each other. The Amazon noticed that Aiko was watching Akane intently again, then began to think hard. Something odd was going on. That last part was clearly a test, which by the looks of it Akane had passed, going by the satisfied expression the magical girl was wearing. the Tendo girl was staring at the empty doorway with a puzzled look on her face but nothing more.

"Where?" she finally asked, looking back to Aiko, who giggled.

"Sorry, I must have been mistaken."

She studied Akane for a moment, while everyone watched. "Interesting. One last thing. Could you close your eyes, please?" After a few seconds the other woman shrugged and did as requested. Aiko looked around at the audience watching with fascination and made a gesture of silence, then moved closer to Akane without making a sound. Producing a bo staff from nowhere in a move that Shampoo at least recognised as some form of ki pocket technique, she swung it fairly slowly at the youngest sister, who twitched before it made contact. Aiko stopped it dead a few centimetres away from her shoulder, then nodded, putting it away again. Moving behind her, still without a sound, she held out her hand on which a ball of energy formed. Akane, her eyes still closed, stepped away a pace, then looked puzzled at her own actions. Aiko nodded again. Shampoo watched, slowly beginning to understand, while Genma and Soun exchanged glances.

"Thank you. You can open your eyes again." Everyone was watching in silent awe.

"What was that about?" Akane asked curiously.

"Why did you move?" Aiko asked in return. The blue-haired woman looked reflective.

"I... don't know. For some reason I... felt something behind me? Something that might be dangerous?" She shook her head. "It was weird. I have no idea, really." Aiko inspected her, then glanced at Shampoo.

"Would you like to explain it? I think you know." The Amazon walked over to them, appearing fascinated.

"You're testing her ki sensitivity. I've seen something like that before, in our village, when they test the advanced warriors. Not exactly the same method, but the same idea."

"Correct. I needed to know a few things. Yori wanted me to check your fighting ability, Akane," she said, turning to the other young woman, who was listening intently. "She also wanted to know how your temper control was coming on. You were extremely dangerous to other people before they treated you, even before you learned what Shampoo has taught you, because of that horrible temper. If it was still a problem, we needed to know. By the looks of it, though, you really have made remarkable progress. Sorry about the slap, but it seemed the quickest method to check." Akane nodded, rubbing her cheek, on which a red mark was slowly fading.

"Ryoga's mere name no longer sends you into a rage, which from the information we had on you, was a real problem. That's also good. And finally, you're definitely showing signs of learning to control your ki, even if only subconsciously. Your actual ki levels have probably topped out, but you should be able to learn to use what you have efficiently with enough time and effort. I think you'll find the results useful." The magical girl smiled as Akane looked stunned. "OK. So what is all this in aid of, I can hear you wondering." The youngest Tendo nodded wordlessly.

"Yori asked me to pass something on to you that she thought would be something you'd be interested in, presuming you passed the tests." The youngest sister looked intrigued. "We were in LA just before New Year last year and happened to meet someone quite interesting. He works in the movie industry, we were at a studio looking around, something went wrong, leading to him seeing us in action, so to speak. He was a friend of a friend of a friend, and to cut a long story short, at a party we went to we did a quick little demonstration. When he recovered..." She grinned, while Akane and Shampoo laughed, ",...he gave us each his card along with an offer of work. He seemed to think we would be good at the stunts for some reason." The brunette giggled.

"I wonder why he thought that?" Nodoka asked wryly, as everyone listened carefully.

"No idea." She grinned. "Anyway, for obvious reasons, we can't really take him up on it. But Yori remembered something Nabiki mentioned in passing when they did their demo here for you at Christmas. Apparently you once wanted to be an actor?" Akane nodded slowly, her mind whirling. "Would you be interested in meeting this person? There is a very good chance it could lead to some work in Hollywood, probably in stunt-work and fight scenes to start with, but there is always the possibility of something higher-profile. You're attractive, skilled, by their standards exotic, and from what we have been told, speak English quite well. Those are qualities that should work out well for you."

The Dojo was silent enough that a fly could clearly be heard buzzing against the window. Everyone waited and stared, while Akane seemed to have lost the ability to speak. Aiko grinned.

"She said to consider it a birthday present."

'Azumi' looked at the device she was holding curiously, turning it over in her hands. "It has the highest resolution in it's class," the salesman said, also looking at it. "The light gathering capability is second to none. Storage is sufficient for twenty million full-spectral 3D images before requiring offloading, or fifteen thousand hours of video. The power cells will run it for the full memory capacity between charges, with a little left over just in case. External high-bandwidth link capability can connect to any standard comp with full-resolution real-time streaming. There is a durability spell on it making it close to indestructible, and it has a number of very good anti-theft and security measures in the software. The anti-grav carrier available as an option allows it to be used in follow-me mode, placed at a specific point in space, or fly a specified path. Full multi-axis stabilisation is provided as standard. Camouflage mode allows blending with the background throughout the entire electromagnetic spectrum, for stealth operation." He seemed satisfied he'd remembered the highlights.

"There's a lot more in the manual, it really is a very full-featured little unit. We can provide something rather larger which will exceed a number of those parameters, but to be honest you'd struggle to find something that would beat it in everything. It's a very good mix of quality, ruggedness, and versatility. The image quality is superb, some of the best I've seen. And the cost is very reasonable. There's a solid one-cycle guarantee against damage from anything except high energy magic, or hyper-velocity projectiles. Don't use it in a war-zone, basically." He grinned as she laughed.

"Other than that, the thing is nearly unbreakable. You could drop it from orbit and the memory would survive."

"Impressive." Uthryll leaned over her shoulder, looking at the camera with interest. "What's the speed in the follow-me mode?" The salesman quoted a figure that Nabiki worked out as close to the speed of sound. She raised an eyebrow.

"People use them a lot for aerial tracking shots, like following gliders or small aircraft," he explained. "You can even send it off after something like a soarer or a bird, have it follow it for a while, then come back. They're very close to silent in operation and with the stealth on, basically invisible to almost everything. The anti-grav carrier will run for about six days on a charge."

"Charging method?" Looking at the merchant for a second, the salesman checked the manual quickly.

"Ah, I thought so. It has a universal input unit that will work from either DC or AC at any normally encountered voltage level, and there is a direct magic conversion system available. Some mages prefer those, they can charge the things for free using their own abilities, or it can use a domestic magic converter."

"Not bad." Uthryyl looked at 'Azumi', who hefted the spherical device thoughtfully. It weighed less than a kilogram and was about ten centimetres in diameter. Turning it over in her hand she found the power control and poked it. The device beeped and a couple of lights came on. Reaching over and taking it from her, the salesman held it in front of her then prodded another control. A different tone sounded, before he removed his hand, the camera staying where he'd left it, emitting an almost inaudible hum. She inspected the floating sphere with an amused grin.

"That's really very clever," she said admiringly.

"I assume your homeworld doesn't have much anti-gravity use?" the saleman asked, looking at her. She shook her head.

"No, none, as far as I know."

"I'll have to check the export restrictions on it, then, anti-grav is moderately restricted. Assuming you're interested in one?"

"How much were they again?" Uthryyl asked.

"With the anti-grav, like that one, three thousand two hundred credits. Without, two thousand eight hundred. The anti-grav unit on it's own is five hundred and twenty, so it's cheaper to buy the set."

"I have no idea how much that really is," 'Azumi' commed the merchant. He thought for a moment.

"In relative terms, probably around two hundred and sixty-five thousand yen from your point of view. It's more complicated than that because there isn't a direct conversion between the monetary systems, but that's close enough to give you an idea."

"Not horribly expensive, but not cheap. My Pentax cost about that."

"Are you interested in it?"

"Very much. But I don't have any credit on your world." Uthryyl grinned at her.

"Oh, you might be mistaken there," he replied.

#Nabiki, Uthryyl has sent you details of an account in the name of Azumi Ito, drawable on the K'nn Interworld Financial Exchange. It can be used on some sixty worlds I am aware of currently. Would you like me to activate it with your personal key?# She stared at the merchant in shock.

"Um, what the hell?"

"I set it up last night. If you have your SI activate it, it will be locked to you securely. Only you will be able to withdraw funds. I've transferred three hundred thousand credits into it." He snickered at the look on her face. "It's an advance on your retainer for art trading, and mattress sales. We'll have to wait on the coffee plantation idea, but I'll deal with that when it's running."

"What...?" She was still staring in shock.

"Ten percent, minus Ranma's seven percent commission." He chuckled. "I always take negotiations seriously. Take it, you earned it. We're all going to make a lot of credit from your ideas. Keep them coming." Across the shop, 'Yori' suddenly looked up from the camera she was studying, then grinned.

"I should have held out for ten percent," she said, amused.

Shaking her head in disbelief, Nabiki told Jun, 'Activate the account, please.'

Certainly.

There was a short pause. The banking system reports the account is fully active with no restrictions, currently holding a balance of two hundred and ninety-nine thousand, nine hundred credits, with one charge of one hundred credits activation fee. You may use it immediately.

Still stunned, Nabiki turned to the salesman, who was waiting patiently, his ears cocked forward alertly. "I'll take it, thanks." Smiling, he nodded.

"Of course. Would you like the optional protective carry case?" She looked at him narrowly.

"Hang on. You just said it could basically bounce if I dropped it off a mountain. What does it need a protective case for?" Uthryyl started laughing, as the salesman winced.

"Umm... It keeps the dust off?"

"Thanks, I think I'll take my chances. I will take the magic conversion system, though." He brightened up.

"Certainly, that's an additional two hundred credits. May I have your account details?" Pulling a comp from under the desk he unrolled it and waited expectantly.

'Jun? What do I do now?'

Place your hand on the screen, I'll do the rest, Nabiki,# the device said in a mildly amused tone.
#I will simulate a normal transaction to avoid arousing suspicion.# She followed the instructions, causin the unrolled machine to make a satisfied noise as it registered the details.

"Thank you, um, Azumi," the salesman said, picking his comp up. "I just need to check your export status to see if there is any problem..." He fiddled with the device and read something, looking slightly surprised. "Odd. Unaligned world, but you have a class one unlimited export license. That's very unusual. Oh well, not my business." He smiled at her as she glanced at Uthryyl, who winked.

Nabiki, if I might suggest that you purchase more than one of these devices? I can easily link to it for real-time video and audio feeds, and also control it directly. It would be a very useful intelligence gathering tool which may well be of considerable importance at some point.#

'You just want some new toys to play with,' she told it, giggling.

I have no concept of play', Nabiki,# the SI replied, a definite note of humour in it's voice.

'I'm sure you don't, Jun.' She decided that it was correct. "On second thought, I'll take three of them." The salesman looked slightly surprised, but nodded.
"Of course. If you'll just wait a moment, I'll get them for you." Moving off, he was gone for a couple of minutes, returning with four boxes made of some light polymer, three large ones and a smaller one, a discreet label of each with the name of the manufacturer on it in the written form of Trade. "Could you authorise the transfer of nine thousand eight hundred credits, please, Azumi?"

He held out the comp again. Once more she put her hand on it. The satisfied noise came and he smiled. "Thank you. I hope you find them satisfactory. If you require anything else, please return and we can help you with anything you need."

"Thanks," she said, picking up the boxes one by one and vanishing them. He watched with interest.

"That's a very good storage spell. Where did you get it?" She giggled.

"It's inherent, I'm afraid. Not for available for sale."

"Ah. I see." He looked slightly disappointed, making her smile inside. The way that people of this world simply accepted magic was quite interesting and at times rather funny. Nodding to her he moved away to deal with another customer. When Onkra had finished asking questions about another small device, deciding in the end not to buy it, they left the store, heading towards where Quannyr had parked the car some hours earlier. It was just beginning to head towards early evening, with a couple of earth hours of light left.

Half-way there, Akane called her. Answering, she said, "Hi, Akane. What's up?"

"Biki, I don't know what to do!" She sounded slightly frantic. Her sister smiled internally, having a very good idea what was going on.

"Calm down, first of all, then tell me what the problem is. All I can do is listen, I'm a long way away," which was one hell of an understatement, she thought with a grin, "but I'll try to help."

"Aiko came over and tested me and I passed and she says I could work in the movies in America and she can introduce me to some famous director and what do I do!? the youngest Tendo wailed. "I can't believe it. I don't know what to do, Biki, help."

"Ake. Breathe. In and out, relax, OK?" There was a long pause. Eventually, her sister spoke slightly less frantically.

"I don't know what to do. It came out of nowhere. She just turned up on the doorstep, had a cup of tea, then asked to spar with me. She's so good! Much better than I could ever be. But she seemed impressed. She said that I was good even by the standards of Nerima, and insanely good by most other peoples standards. Even Ms Aoyama thinks I'm good! She told Aiko and Yori. I still can't believe that. Why would she do that?" 'Azumi' grinned as she heard her sister take a deep breath, her voice having trailed off into a squeak.

"You are good, sis. Even I can see that. Shampoo has improved you enormously with her training, but most of it was a lot of very hard work which all came from you. I'm very proud of you." This was indeed true.

"Thanks. Aiko even tested my ki ability. Shampoo worked out what she was doing. It was weird, but she thinks I could learn some very cool things eventually using ki. Maybe even those ki balls that she uses. She doesn't think I'll get much more power, but I should be able to use what I have very effectively if I work at it."

"I would suggest you should work at it, then," the middle sister said, laughter in her voice. Akane giggled nervously.
"I wouldn't know where to start."

"Shampoo probably does. Ask her. Cologne certainly would."

"That's true." The other woman sounded thoughtful for a moment.

"So what happened next?" They arrived at the air-car, Quannyr opening the doors, then they all got in. Nabiki sat in the back where she could concentrate on her sister's voice. 'Chou', reverting to Kasumi, looked at her curiously, nodding with a smile when she mouthed, 'Akane'. Ranma, beside her, was grinning. She dropped the 'Azumi' persona, leaning back in her seat.

"Everyone was watching me, all the students, Dad, the Saotomes, Shampoo, and Aiko. I just froze. I couldn't think what to say. After a few seconds Shampoo told everyone I'd need to think about it and brought me inside, now she won't let anyone talk to me until I work it out."

"She's a good friend," Nabiki said, smiling. "If you go, you should see if she would like to come with you." There was a silence that dragged on for a while.

"I'd like that. It would be hard being in a different country without anyone I knew to talk to. I think she might like it as well. If I could work in the movies, she certainly could. She's better looking and a better martial artist."

"Don't put yourself down, Akane. You're very attractive as well, you turned out well eventually."

"Oh, thanks a lot, Biki," her sister said, sounding amused.

"You're welcome. OK, go on with the story."

"That's basically it. I've been sitting here for an hour trying to think what I should do. I couldn't work it out. Aiko is still here, in the living room with Auntie Nodoka and Shampoo, she's stayed for dinner. What do I tell her?"

Sympathy filled the middle sister. She knew all too well how paralysing it could be mentally to have a sudden drastic change in lifestyle tossed into your path. Akane was less flexible than she was in several ways, and even she had had problems, although admittedly the changes to her own life were probably out at the far end of the scale. She thought for a moment.

Eventually she spoke. "I would suggest that you tell her that you'd like to meet this person. There's no guarantee that you'd be offered a job, after all, and even if you were you don't have to accept it. You could pull out at any point. But I know how much you wanted to be an actor in school, this is probably the best chance you're likely to get. It's more or less been handed to you. Don't turn it down just because you're nervous. You'd never forgive yourself. Go and meet the director, I would imagine that he'd want to see what you can do, then see what happens. Take it one step at a time." Akane didn't respond for some minutes, although she could hear her breathing.

"What do I do if I get offered a job?" she finally asked in a quiet voice.

"Make sure the money and conditions are something you can live with, then take it. It could be the best thing you've ever done. You've never stayed outside Nerima for more than a week in your entire life. A change may well do you good and allow you to grow as a person. Not to mention become rich and famous." Nabiki laughed gently as Akane giggled. "You can always come home to visit. I doubt that even if you get a job in Hollywood you'll be working all the time."

Another pause followed, then Akane spoke again, sounding much calmer. "Thanks, Biki. That's helped a lot. I'll go and talk to Aiko." She made a small sound of amusement, not quite a laugh. "I can't believe Yori would think of me like that."

"Hey, you made an impression on her. And a car or two, and a building, and the road, and..."

Nabiki laughed. Akane sighed inside her head.

"I'll never live that down, will I?"

"Probably not. But you're basically fine now, so go and see what happens. Just keep your cool whatever anyone says, try not to break anything or anyone, and enjoy yourself."

"Thanks, Nabiki."

"No problem, sis. Good luck. And Happy birthday in advance."

"Bye. Enjoy your holiday. I'll let you know what happens." Her sister hung up as Nabiki smiled. She looked at Ranma, who raised an eyebrow.

"Thanks."

"You're welcome. I hope it all works out." He grinned. "Despite our past, or possibly because of it, she deserves something nice." His wife put her arm around his neck and kissed him, smiling.

Walking into the living room, Akane looked around, then fixed her gaze on Aiko, who smiled, a cup of tea in her hand. "Have you come to a decision?"

"Yes. I'd like to meet this director of yours." The magical girl looked pleased.

"Great. I've called him already to let him know about you, and he would like to meet you as soon as you're available. He sounded very excited." She grinned. "We left something of an impression on him, I think." The youngest Tendo giggled, sitting next to Shampoo, who smiled at her.

"That I can easily imagine. Is he here in Japan?"

"Nope. LA. I'll jump you over there." She looked at Aiko in complete surprise. The brunette laughed. "It's very easy for me, don't worry. You've already been through it twice, you won't feel anything. No sense mucking around with airplanes, and all that expensive uncomfortable time-wasting. I can get you there instantly. One of the perks of the job."

Akane giggled while the rest of the family looked at each other. "They're sixteen hours behind us, so five PM there is nine AM here. That should work out fairly well. We could go today, but I'd suggest tomorrow is better, it will allow you to sleep on it and get to grips with the whole idea. It's a Saturday, but Adrian said he didn't mind. You can meet some other people we know as well. We might even work a barbecue in."

"What about work visas and things like that?" Soun asked. "The Americans have all sorts of rules and paperwork." Aiko smiled.

"Don't worry. If they want Akane enough, they'll sort all that out pretty easily. Hollywood is nothing if not well connected and well off. This is only the first meeting, anyway. I would think there will be several more if this goes well." She grinned at Akane. "I'm quite happy to take you back and forth until you get settled in, if you want. I won't be around for a week or so in about ten days, but before and after that, unless something weird is happening, I can easily do it." She pulled a notebook from somewhere and wrote a phone number on it. "That will get me most of the time."
Taking it, Akane looked at it, then carefully folded it and put it away.

"Thank you," she said sincerely.

"You're welcome," Aiko responded. The youngest Tendo studied her for a moment.

"Why are you all doing this for me? It's amazingly generous and must be putting you out."

The brunette was silent for a moment. "It's kind of what we do. We help people where we can. Normally, the way our lives go, that involves some sort of fight. Or worse. It's nice to be able to help someone without any violence." She grinned a little wryly. "That doesn't happen all that often."

Nodding, Akane stared at the table, thinking. Eventually she turned to Shampoo, who had been listening silently along with the others. "Would you come with me?" she asked tentatively. The Amazon looked surprised.

"To America?"

"Yes. For the interview, and perhaps if I get this job, there might be one for you as well. If you want it." Akane smiled a little. "I need a sparring partner if nothing else." Shampoo stared at her for a moment.

"I'd have to ask Great-Grandmother, but I suppose if she's all right with it, it might be fun to see the US." Akane grinned widely.

"Thank you."

"Whatever happens, you have to be around for Ukyo's wedding," Nodoka said, getting up and heading into the kitchen to prepare dinner. "She'd be very upset if you missed it."

"Of course I wouldn't miss it, Auntie!" Akane jumped to her feet and followed the older woman, talking animatedly, all worry suddenly gone now that the decision had been made. Soun glanced at Genma, then turned to Aiko, who was smiling.

"Thank you, and please thank Yori for us. It's a very nice thing you've done."

The magical girl grinned at him. "We try to do nice things when we can. I'm glad we can help. Akane seems to have had a rough time of it for a few years. I hope this makes up for it in some way." Soun listened to his youngest daughter laughing in the kitchen, nodding with a smile.

"I think it will."
Wind whistling in her ears, Nabiki dived at the ground, grinning. Behind her two soarers followed in a line, while behind and above them a small alien camera drone ripped through the air with a faint hum, staying a constant hundred metres back no matter how they turned and twisted. Another one was forty metres off to the right, also holding position in neat formation. She had live feeds from both of them in pop-up windows just out of the normal visual range, but was mainly concentrating on her air speed, which hit three hundred and fifty kilometres an hour before she pulled up hard, spreading her wings widely with a huge roar of displaced air, almost instantly slowing to only a gentle gliding speed.

The g forces were enormous but the form her sister had designed seemed well able to cope, it was a slight strain but not difficult, although she could certainly feel the stress on her wings and body. Both soarers shot past, noisily decelerating a few dozen metres lower, some thousand metres up, then flapped their way back up to join her circling in the thermal they'd been in for the last hour. They yipped at her, looking curious as to why she pulled out of what they clearly thought was a hunting dive so high up, making her giggle.

"Sorry, guys, just practising." Both animals looked at her, then each other, almost visibly wondering why their new friend was so bad at hunting. She giggled again. She'd gone flying again, early that morning, wanting to experiment with the camera spheres and also wondering if the soarers would come back, finding to her delight that they did minutes after she reached altitude. It seemed likely that they lived somewhere fairly close to Uthryyl's house, higher up the mountain. Nabiki had a growing feeling that they were probably a mated pair. Sending one of the cameras off to video them from a good vantage point behind and above, she set another one to one side and slightly in front, Jun easily tapping into them and controlling them far better than their internal processors could. The results were very impressive, making her sure they were a good investment.

"Nabiki, we're almost ready to leave," Ranma said. He looked up at her and waved. Smiling, she sent him a feed from the camera behind her, then circled a couple more times, fixing the scene in her memory. It was another beautiful day, warm and almost cloudless. She'd learned that the weather locally was like this the majority of the time, interspersed with fairly predictable quite heavy rain. A storm was due the next day so it was as well that they were moving to the next destination, although she definitely wanted to come back. Fwetna was a very nice place, the limited amount of it that she'd seen, and the wildlife was a lot of fun. With a grin she waved to the soarers, rolled into a wingover, and dived for the back garden with her wings half-closed. One the way down she noticed with amusement that both soarers were following again.

Onkra looked around, puzzled, wondering where the whistling noise, steadily growing louder and closer, was coming from, then looked up, her eyes widening. Squawking in shock she dived out of the way as Nabiki slammed to a near halt with a huge bang and a burst of wind from her wings, then dropped to the ground, landing easily. The middle sister laughed at the expressions the others had as she folding her wings. Everyone ducked again as a pair of closely separated cracks heralded the arrival of the two soarers, a couple of seconds behind the silver-haired girl, both of them landing behind her and looking around curiously.

"Gods!" Onkra shouted. "What the hells are you doing? You scared the shit out of me!" Uthryyl, once he had gotten over his surprise, was shaking his head and laughing, while Quannyr inspected... the new arrivals with interest. Ranma grinned, before walking slowly over to look at the soarers, which seemed slightly wary but not too worried. His wife followed, approaching one of them with her hand out. It sniffed her then allowed her to stroke its head. After a moment the other one, which was watching, came over and pushed its own head under her hand, shoving the first one out of the way in a manner that made her giggle.

"Sorry, I got carried away," Nabiki said with a smile on her lips, holding out her hands to either side as a camera dropped into each one, then storing them away. Her friend goggled at her for a moment then started laughing.

"You're at least as mad as your sister," she said, giggling. Nabiki shrugged slightly, unable to deny the accusation. She turned to watch the soarers jostling to allow Kasumi to tickle them under the chin, making satisfied little squeaks. The noises were ridiculously small and cute for such large and impressive animals.

"They seem to like that," she said, smiling.

"I really don't think we can take them with us," Ranma chuckled. "They seem very friendly, though. I'm surprised they followed you all the way down like that."

"I didn't expect it, but they don't seem worried. Quite the opposite." Walking over Kasumi she reached out and touched the slightly larger one, which was a darker colour than the smaller one, although not by much. It yipped and pushed itself into her hand.

"That one is a male," her sister said. "The other one is female."

"Ah. I was wondering if that was the case." She stroked the animal, who closed his eyes in rapture, squeaking happily. She grinned. "They really are very cute. You know, for something the size of a small tiger with a wingspan as big as a light aircraft, that's a voracious predator." Kasumi laughed.

"The description would certainly put you off, I admit, but they are magnificent animals." She kept stroking the female, who had relaxed to the point she was in danger of falling over. Uthryyl and Quannyr walked over, fascinated.

"It's very unusual to get so close to a soarer," the merchant said, tentatively reaching out. The male glanced at him, sniffed his hand, then went back to looking happy. He stroked it gently. "That is amazingly soft fur. Remarkable." Onkra had moved over to the female soarer and was looking at it with wonder from a metre away.

"I can't believe they followed you like that. I don't think anyone has ever really succeeded in taming one, that's why they escaped from captivity so easily. They're pretty smart, for an animal. Normally they're cautious about people, although I wouldn't say scared, they just keep their distance." Gently touching the soarer she smiled.

"These ones certainly aren't tame, they just seem to be friendly," Nabiki replied. "And very playful. I wonder how old they are? They act like young cats."

"They're quite long-lived on our world, I believe," Uthryyl said. "The stresses are lower and there aren't any predators, or as far as I know much in the way of diseases that affect them. I've heard that they can make it to at least fifty or sixty of your years, if they don't have an accident. Luckily they breed relatively slowly, at least once they're established in a habitat. There seems to be some sort of feedback mechanism that keeps the breeding in check so it doesn't exhaust the food supply. The mountains around here have perhaps a few hundred at most. Looking at them I'd think they're mature but only just."
"I imagine they need a considerable territory for hunting," Kasumi mused, looking at the creatures. "They can certainly cover an enormous area very easily." The trader nodded.

"They spread over the entire planet, or the suitable parts of it, quite fast once they got established, but the population density is fairly low. It seems stable long term. Most people are happy to have them here, and in the country areas you'd be hard-pressed to find anyone who didn't want them around. Quillit are much worse to have. I'd rather have a soarer or two any day." He grinned. "One of the rare cases where accidentally introducing an alien species into an ecosystem seems to have worked out for everyone. Except the quillit, and no one is worried about those little bastards." Both he and his wife shuddered. "Horrible things."

"As interesting as this is, we should be going," Quannyr said, smiling slightly at the animals. "You should probably find some way to persuade your new friends to leave, Nabiki, before they follow us through the portal." The middle Tendo nodded, looking down at the soarers, both of which seemed perfectly content.

"Any idea how?" she asked after a moment. "I don't want to upset or frighten them."

Everyone looked at the animals, which appeared more than happy to stay right where they were. There was a long pause. "Try turning off the illusion," Ranma finally suggested. "Perhaps they think you're some weird type of soarer and want to stay because of that." She shrugged, then did as he suggested. Both animals stared at her for a long moment, then the female slowly reached its head around, sniffing her carefully. It made an odd noise, looked her up and down, then shoved its head against her leg.

"Well, that didn't work," she said with amusement. The male yipped at her, lying down on the grass, then rolled onto its side and closed its eyes. Everyone laughed.

"They may go if we open the portal," Kasumi said, watching them with a smile. "If not we just have to make sure we don't let them follow us if they try."

"OK. Got the coordinates?" Ranma shook his head at the sight of the animals which seemed to have settled in for the duration. "People say my friends are weird," he mumbled, glancing at Nabiki, who giggled. Slightly smiling, he and his wife quickly open a portal, the blue-glowing aperture appearing with a crackle.

Both soarers stared, the male rolling back onto its feet, then looked at the middle sister. After a moment they relaxed, simply watching with interest. "Weird," Uthryyl said, examining them. He shrugged. "Oh well. Don't let them come through, Nabiki, it's probably best if you come last. We'll close the portal as soon as you're through." She nodded, watching as he and Quannyr walked through the rip in space. Onkra followed, then her sister and husband, who shifted to 'Chou' and 'Yori' on the way. She turned to the two soarers who were watching with their heads cocked to one side, appearing puzzled.

"Stay," she said firmly, shimmering back to 'Azumi', then giggled, walking backwards through the portal. Seconds later the two animals were alone in the garden. The portal closed with a pop, which made them flinch slightly, then they stared at each other. A few minutes later, when nothing else of interest happened and their new friend didn't come back, they got bored and flew off, yipping happily.

Cologne stroked her chin, studying the much younger women who were standing in front of her, thinking. "America, hmm? I haven't been there for a very long time. Do they still ride horses around everywhere and shoot at each other?" She cackled as Shampoo and Akane exchanged glances, then giggled.

"They use cars mostly now, Grandmother," the lilac-haired warrior said, grinning. "Although if the news is to be believed they still shoot at each other." Cologne laughed in delight.

"So, Akane Tendo, there's a chance we could see you on the big screen, then? Is that really something you would like to do?" Akane smiled and nodded.

"Yes. I wanted to be an actor since I was a little girl. School plays were the nearest I ever came, though, and for a long time it looked like I'd never be able to go any further. I more or less stopped dreaming about it. Then this incredible opportunity came out of the blue. Nabiki is right. I have to go for it, see how far it takes me, or I'd regret it forever." The Elder inspected her for a long moment.

"I see." She was silent for another few seconds. "I think your sister is probably correct. She's a very perceptive young woman. And I know what following a dream can be like. Not many people ever get the chance." There was something somewhat melancholy about her for a little while.

"It might not come to anything, but Aiko thinks that this director is very interested. I'm no magical girl, but she says I'd be very good at the stunt work, which could well lead to all sorts of things." Akane grinned, looking excited. "I still can't believe it. The fact that Ms Aoyama, of all people, mentioned to Yori that I was getting quite good, and that Yori would think of this. Aiko is being incredibly generous as well, offering to teleport us there and back when we need it."

"Indeed. It is very fortunate in several ways that you met those young women. They cured you of a very unpleasant affliction, set you on the path to a much better mental state, and have possible managed to guide you to a lucrative career opportunity." Cologne smiled slightly evilly. "You owe Ryoga thanks, I think." Akane stared at her, then glanced at Shampoo.

"What?" she asked, rather taken aback.

"Well, think about it," the Amazon Elder said with great glee. "If you hadn't encountered him in Minato you wouldn't have had your... little episode..., which in turn might well have meant you never came to the attention of Yori and her friends, which would probably mean you wouldn't have received the medical attention you so desperately needed. Which in turn led to your current status. It all flows from the pig-boy, oddly enough." She seemed vastly amused by her own logic. Akane shook her head slowly, unable to refute it but sure there was a reason she wasn't somehow indebted to the Lost Boy.

"Damn," she eventually said with disgust. Shampoo giggled.

"You can thank him the next time you see him," she commented mischievously. Her friend looked darkly at her.

"Yeah, I don't think so. But I get your point, Elder."

"You have matured hugely in the last year, Akane," the ancient woman said approvingly. "Your attention to the Art in the last few months has been exemplary, far beyond what I ever hoped for. If you apply that same drive to this new opportunity I expect great things from you." Akane smiled happily at the praise. "Don't take it for granted, though," Cologne warned, raising a hand. "You know as well as anyone how quickly things can change. Make the most of it, but be careful. Americans are strange people." She chuckled. "And don't spend all your money. From what I've read, a lot of young women who break into the movies and become rich regret their actions years later. I would advise living sensibly, even if you become highly successful. Which, I think, is quite likely."

Her smile to the youngest Tendo was warmer than any she had ever received from the Elder before. "You'll do very well, Akane Tendo. Good luck, and make sure you come and visit regularly. I still have much to teach you." Akane nodded, looking very happy. Cologne turned her attention to her great-granddaughter. "Do you want to go, child?"

"Yes, Grandmother, I think I do. I've been trying to learn English, being in a country where they spoke it would help a lot. I'd like to see another place as well, while I like Japan very much, I haven't been anywhere but here or China before. And I'd miss Akane." She grinned at her friend. "I still need to beat her up some more, she's not quite done yet." The old woman cackled with amusement, studying her much younger relative.

"All right. You may go. Enjoy yourself, don't bring dishonour to the tribe or your family, and take care of Akane. Akane, take care of my great-granddaughter." She nodded as they both looked happy, smiling at them. "I expect great things from both of you. It's not traditional warrior-work, to be sure, but this modern world has little call for that sort of thing in most places. Your skills will at least be used well." She stood up, walking over to the young Amazon, who knelt down and hugged her. "Take care, child. Look after your friend and be careful of the Americans. They're crazier than the Japanese." Shampoo giggled.

"I'll be careful. Thank you, Grandmother."

"Make sure you both come back often, or I'll have to come and visit you," Cologne grinned, "Or, on second thought, I may do that anyway. Does LA have any decent Ramen restaurants?" She winked, making them laugh. As they left, she watched them go, a slight thoughtful smile on her face, before heading upstairs.

"Hollywood doesn't have a clue what's about to happen," she mumbled to herself, snickering. "I almost feel sorry for them..."

Smoothing her skirt down, Akane looked at her reflection in the mirror on the back of her door. She fiddled with her yellow shirt for a moment, looking unsatisfied, before yet again brushing her hair.

"You look fine, Akane," Shampoo said from where she was watching, sitting on Akane's bed, smiling a little. She was wearing her best Chinese silk top and trousers, in deep blue. "Don't keep redoing it all."

"Are you sure?" the youngest Tendo said anxiously. "This colour is all right?"

"It looks very nice," Nodoka said, entering the room and casting an expert eye over the younger woman. "No one could complain. You both look very pretty." Shampoo got up and walked over, putting her hand on her friend's shoulder.

"I told you. Now calm down, make sure your practice clothes are packed, and let's get a cup of tea before Aiko turns up. She should be here in about half an hour."

"Oh, by the way, Akane, this just came for you." Nodoka handed her the parcel she was holding. "The courier apologised, he got stuck in traffic, it should have been here this morning." Looking at the address on the parcel, Akane raised an eyebrow, then quickly opened it. Inside the box was another wrapped parcel and an envelope with her name on it. She opened the envelope, scanning the contents quickly, then smiled.
"It's from Nabiki. For my birthday tomorrow. She says she's sorry she couldn't be here but she hopes I have a nice time, and to enjoy myself." The youngest sister giggled slightly. "That was nice of her. I wonder what this is?" Feeling the parcel curiously, she added, "It feels like cloth or something. Soft."

"There's an easy way to find out, you know," Shampoo said with a grin.

"Should I open it now?" Akane wondered out loud. "My birthday isn't until tomorrow." Shampoo and Nodoka looked at each other, counting mentally. They got to six before the young woman shrugged, tearing the paper off, both of them smiling. "Oh, wow. This is really nice," she said, unfolding the contents of the parcel. It was a very high quality gi, like the ones her father and Genma had received for Christmas, if not even better quality, with her name neatly embroidered on the left breast. On the back was written 'Tendo-Saotome Training Hall, Furinkan, Nerima' in elegant Kanji. The gi was deep black, while the embroidery was a pale blue, contrasting nicely.

"That's a very nice present," Nodoka said admiringly, feeling the fabric. "Very good quality cloth. Soft but strong. It should last a long time. Your other one was getting a little worn."

"Good timing as well," Shampoo said. She laughed. "I wonder if Nabiki knew what Yori had arranged?" Akane thought about it for a moment, then shook her head.

"I don't think she did, she did sound somewhat surprised. Anyway, why would Yori have told her?" Admiring the clothing again, she folded it carefully, removing her old one from the small bag on her bed and putting the new one inside instead. "But it certainly is good timing. I'll have to thank her."

"Have you spoken to her today?" Nodoka asked curiously. The young woman shook her head.

"I called, but she's out of range of the network, I think. She did say that might happen. I'll try again tomorrow." Checking her appearance in the mirror one last time, she smiled slightly nervously and picked up the bag. "I need a cup of tea, I think." She looked at her watch. "Only about fifteen minutes left, plus a teleport."

Shampoo looked amused as she followed the others downstairs, carrying her own bag. "It's certainly an unusual manner to travel to a job interview, but very convenient."

They had just sat down with a cup of tea when there was a tap on the front door, making Akane twitch so suddenly she nearly spilled her drink. Nodoka smiled at her, getting up and heading for the door. "Relax, Akane, it will be all right." She came back with Aiko, who looked at the others and grinned.

"All ready?"

"Yes, as much as I can be," the blue-haired girl said nervously.

"Don't get stressed out, Akane, it will be fine. Trust me. Adrian is a nice guy, even if he's a bit highly strung, you'll like him. I talked to him for a while last night. He's very excited about meeting you, and was even happier when I told him about Shampoo. I think he'd like an entire team of female martial artist stunt-women if he could get it." She laughed as Akane smiled.

"I also talked to a friend of mine in LA, Lieutenant Richard Harrison. He's with the police there. We met him over a year ago in Tokyo, with a Canadian colleague, they were here because of the start of what ended in Halleckton. He's a really nice guy. It was his friend Jim who showed us around the studio where we met Adrian. Anyway, he's invited us to a barbecue at his house again, and suggested that it might be a good place to have the interview. Adrian agreed. Richard has got a large back garden, you can show off what you can do there, and there won't be a lot of people watching if that sort of thing makes you nervous. Sound good?"

After glancing at Shampoo, Akane nodded. "I suppose so. I have to admit I'm very nervous. Lots of people I don't know staring at me would make it worse."

"I understand, believe me. Adrian will have a couple of people he knows, a stunt director and a studio armourer, with him. I've met the armourer before, he knows a hell of a lot about weapons and apparently is also an expert on martial arts." Aiko giggled. "Or what they think is an expert.
Anyway, they want to see what you and Shampoo can do. Apparently Adrian has been talking about us non-stop since we were there and no one believes him." Nodoka looked at the two young woman and smiled.

"I think they may have a shock," she said, pouring Aiko a cup of tea, which she took with a nod of thanks.

"So does Adrian. I think he's looking forward to it." The magical girl was looking very amused.
"Anyway, we'll go in a minute, meet them, and you can show off your skills. Afterwards, we can have a nice barbecue for dinner, before I bring you back. You should be back before the middle of the afternoon."

"How is Yori doing at the moment?" Nodoka asked, while Akane thought about what she'd been told. Aiko glanced at her.

"Oh, she's very well, thanks. She, Chou, and Azumi, one of our friends you haven't met, are on holiday right now, they've been gone a few days."

"It's that time of year," Nodoka agreed. "Nabiki is away with her friends, travelling, as well." Aiko smiled at this.

"The others and I will be going to meet them later. We can't all take time away for so long, without Yori around things tend to go... a little weird...," she looked mildly annoyed about something, "so we're going in shifts. Fumiko and Tamiko next week, me and Misaki the week after. It would be nice to have longer, but what can you do?" She shrugged, sighing a little. "Our lifestyle attracts some very odd things."

"So I gather. I heard that there was a major fight between two groups of magical girls in Minato yesterday, or was it the day before? Something like that. Quite a lot of damage occurred, by all accounts." Nodoka smiled slightly at Aiko's look of irritation.

"Yes, that was a damn nuisance. That other group is mostly a pain in the ass. They're pretty good when they stick to what they know, but rather... unselective. It's caused a certain amount of friction between Yori and them before now. Funny to watch, but very annoying to clear up after."

"Oh, dear. That does sound difficult. I hope you were able to resolve the situation." Nodoka sipped her tea, looking curious.

"More or less. I have no idea whether it will stick, they can stay away for months then turn up when you least want them, but for the moment things are fairly quiet." Aiko finished her tea, putting the cup down. "It's a pity. With some real training and discipline they could be very good.
At the moment it's like about six or seven magic-powered Akanes running around blowing things up." She grinned at the youngest Tendo, who laughed.
"I'm much better now."

"Oh, I know that. I was only joking. Right, ready to go?" Drinking the dregs of her tea, Akane put the cup down carefully, took a deep breath with her eyes shut, then nodded.

"Yes."

"Good. Come on, let's go out in the yard." Shampoo and Akane followed Aiko outside into the sunny morning, Nodoka bringing up the rear. As they came out of the house Soun walked around the corner, smiling when he saw them.

"Ah, good, I got back in time." Walking over to his daughter he took her by the shoulders and looked at her, then gently kissed her on the forehead. "Good luck, daughter. Make me as proud as I know you will." She smiled at him tenderly.

"Thanks, Dad. I'll do my best." After a quick hug she released him and joined the magical girl and her friend in the middle of the yard.

"Remember the flash," Aiko said, waiting for a second or two until she saw they had closed their eyes, then vanished with the other two women. Nodoka opened her eyes and looked at the empty yard, before glancing at Soun, who was smiling proudly at nothing.

"Come on, there's still some tea left," she said quietly, waving at the house. He followed her inside, still with a small smile on his face.

"Are they here yet?" Richard glanced at his friend Jim, who sighed.

"Calm down, Adrian. They'll be here soon. Here, have a drink of orange juice." Neither of them thought it was a good idea to give the man coffee, he was already almost hopping up and down in place from nerves. Grabbing the offered glass, the director drank half of it, then looked out the window into the back garden.

"It's a nice day, at least. I hope they like it. Is Aaron here yet? He's supposed to be bringing Matt with him. Is that your daughter? She's holding a complicated bow. Can she use it?" They looked at each other and grinned.

"Adrian, you're rambling again. Have you taken your pill this afternoon?" The man looked at them, then ran his fingers through his hair, smiling in an embarrassed manner.

"Sorry, guys. I know I get a little worked up. Yes, I took one of those pills. They take a little while to work."

"Don't worry, Adrian, it will all work out. You and I both know how amazing Yori and her friends are, so I'm pretty sure anyone they recommend is going to be very good indeed. Probably spectacularly so. Aaron and Matt are going to have a shock." Jim laughed, as Richard smiled to himself, filling the coffee machine and turning it on.

The director suddenly smiled malevolently. "Oh, I do hope so. I'm tired of everyone laughing at me." He glanced at Richard as the police officer started chuckling.

"That was a very funny tone of voice, Adrian. I guess it's been annoying you?"

"More than a little. I suppose I can't blame them much, anyone who didn't see what happened would probably think I was nuts, but it's irritating to have people say I must have drunk too much."
Adrian shrugged, with a small sigh. "I've got a bit of a reputation, you understand."

"I gathered that. But I also know you have another reputation as being very good at your job, despite certain... personal quirks." Richard smiled, while both studio men laughed. "That last movie you directed was in the top five of the year, I seem to remember, wasn't it?"

"Top three, actually. Didn't quite make the best opening gross, but it's made up for that with longevity. Made more than three hundred and fifty million over the summer." The director looked pleased, as Richard whistled. "One of the few movies in it's genre to make a profit this year. The studio was very pleased. I'm told it may be in the running for a nomination for best action picture, and also best special effects. Which would be nice." He seemed calmer now, finishing off his orange juice and handing the glass to Jim, who put it in the sink.

The doorbell rang, making them all look up. Serena ran past, calling, "It's Sophie, Dad, I'll get it." Looking at each other they relaxed again. Moments later the girl went back past the kitchen, waving to her father and the others, followed by another teenager, who also waved and called a greeting. The men watched through the window as both girls went out into the back garden, Serena picking up the complex compound bow she had put down when she went to the door.

"I see Sophie and Serena seem to be good friends now," Jim laughed, watching the girls examine the bow and talk for a moment, before Serena picked up an arrow and nocked it, pulling it back with some effort. Sophie stood to the side and studied her, then pointed at something in the distance, out of their view. Richard laughed.

"Oh, yes, you wouldn't believe it. It's like they've known each other their entire lives. I think both of them were a little lonely, I know Serena didn't have a lot of friends her own age who shared her interests. She's a very active girl, and smart. Doesn't see the point in boys or clothes when there are more interesting things like archery, and cars, or stuff like that." He grinned. "I always wanted a son."

Jim laughed, as Adrian chuckled and looked out at the girls again.

"Sophie is very much like her. Yori suggesting inviting her and her mother to that party months ago is yet another thing I have to thank her for. She's made a huge difference to my daughters life, almost accidentally."

"I wonder if it was an accident?" Jim asked, smiling. Richard shrugged.

"With that young lady, you can never be sure. Whatever the truth, it was a good idea. They get on like you wouldn't believe, both of them look much happier now, and Emily and Joan have become close as well. It worked out all around."

"Is Sophie still doing the Aikido?" Richard glanced at his friend and nodded.

"Yes, I believe she's doing very well, actually. Serena goes and watches sometimes. She's already competing in her age group, so I hear. It's probably only a matter of time until Serena takes it up as well, I expect. She's tried some introductory lessons and liked them, although she seems to be concentrating on the archery at the moment. Sooner or later, though..." He laughed. They watched as his daughter aimed at something, releasing the arrow smoothly, then smiling. The smile turned to a frown, which became an expression of guilt. Sophie started laughing.

"Whoops," Richard said with a slightly worried smile. "I think she just missed again. I hope it wasn't heading towards Mrs Finch's greenhouse this time." Adrian and Jim looked at each other, then began laughing at the tone in his voice.
"Does that happen much?"

"No, she's actually a good shot, but she gets carried away every now and then. We've had a few arrows returned by annoyed neighbours over the last few months. Not to mention all the ones she's lost out back." He sighed a little, but smiled. "Luckily they're fairly cheap, and they're only training ones, so not too sharp. Mind you, you wouldn't want to get hit by one. The bow is pretty powerful, she's got it set for it's highest pull now. Strong young lady."

Both girls walked off in the direction of the arrow's flight, talking to each other and smiling, as Richard watched fondly. Just as they disappeared from view the doorbell rang again. Adrian twitched but managed to keep it to only a slight tic, making Jim and Richard smile. "I'll get it. Back in a moment." He walked to the front door, opening it to find a familiar face smiling at him. "Hello Aiko," he said happily, waving the girl and the two other females with her inside. "Come in."

Closing the door behind them, he turned to the short brunette with a wide smile. "It's good to see you again."

"And you, Richard. It's been a while. I meant to drop by and say hi to you guys, but things have been a little hectic. How are Emily and Serena?"

"Serena is in the back yard sticking arrows in things with Sophie, and Em is shopping for the barbecue. She'll be back soon." He inspected the other two young women, who were looking nervous. Aiko waved to them. "I'd like you to meet some friends of mine. This is Akane Tendo, and Xian Pu. Guys, meet Richard Harrison, LAPD Lieutenant and demon bait." Richard looked narrowly at her, then grinned as she laughed. The two girls exchanged glances, looking puzzled. "Long story. I'll tell you later." Aiko seemed very amused.

"I'm pleased to meet you, Mr Harrison," the short haired girl, Akane, said shyly, shaking the hand he offered her. Her accent was noticeable, she certainly wasn't as fluent in English as Aiko, or Yori, but it was very good.

"Call me Richard, please. I'm pleased to meet you as well, Akane." She smiled a little, nodding. He turned to the other girl, who looked much more confident.

"Hello. I Xian Pu, sorry about English, still learning." She shook his hand firmly, grinning. "Sound like idiot." He laughed, as Aiko and Akane giggled. "Call Shampoo, easier. Understand more than speak, but may ask questions."

"She doesn't have a gift for languages," Akane said, smiling at her friend, who shrugged. "It took her years to learn Japanese properly, she sounded very funny for a long time."

"At least not break buildings so much as you," Shampoo said, giggling. Akane raised an eyebrow at her.

"Oh? I can remember you didn't seem to know what a door was for the first couple of years. You just made a new one." The Chinese girl sighed, looking embarrassed.

"That sounds like there's an interesting story there."

"Um." Akane now also looked embarrassed. "It's quite a long one."

"Don't worry, we won't push. Everyone has something in their past they'd prefer not be made public." Richard smiled at her. "Come and meet Adrian and Jim. Aaron and Matt aren't here yet, they should turn up quite soon. Traffic is a nightmare at the moment, so that's probably the problem. Would any of you like a drink? Coffee, tea, juice?” He led the way to the kitchen where the other two men were.

"Coffee, please," Akane said.

"Same," Shampoo added.

"I'll have coffee as well, please, Richard," Aiko said, bringing up the rear. He nodded, moving to the coffee machine.

"You know Aiko, guys," he said as he prepared several mugs of coffee. Both men nodded, looking at the three women curiously, concentrating on the two they didn't know. "This is Akane, on the right, and Shampoo on the left." Both of them smiled, looking nervous again. "Girls, this is my friend Jim Rush, and Adrian Stewart. Adrian is the famous director you're here to meet.” The slender man looked amused and mildly embarrassed, walking over and shaking hands with them.

"Famous is perhaps a bit overstating the case, but I'm reasonably well known in the industry. It's nice to meet you. Aiko has told me good things about you, Akane, and also says you're very good as well, Shampoo." Both of the girls looked at each other, then back at him.

"Thank you, Mr Stewart. I still have trouble believing all this, Aiko caught us by surprise.” Akane smiled again, Aiko snickering behind her. "It was something of a shock. I wanted to be in the movie industry a long time ago, but... my life became a little complicated for a few years. Recently it seems to have changed a lot, though, which is taking some getting used to."

"Don't worry, I know it might be a little much at first, Hollywood hits most people like that. It's a weird place." He grinned at them. Aiko muffled a laugh as she exchanged a glance with Richard, who was grinning widely.

"Oh, I think they may be OK with weird, Adrian. You wouldn't believe Minato, and if Nerima is as bad..." Aiko glanced at him.

"It's worse in most ways." He winced.

"Really?"

"Oh, yes, it's completely insane. Minato is merely mostly insane." Chuckling, he handed everyone except Adrian a coffee.

"Milk and sugar on the table, if you want it." When everyone had sorted their drinks out, he suggested, "Let's go and sit in the garden. I've put the awning up, there's shade, which is going to be needed." He looked out the window. "It's been another hot day." Leading the way outside he smiled at his daughter and her friend, who had just come back from wherever they'd gone, Serena holding a bent arrow and inspecting it with a frown.

"Another one? What happened?"

"Oh, hi, Dad. I missed. It bounced off the fence behind the target and went right into a big rock over the other side, somehow. I don't think it's any use any more, unless I want to shoot around corners." She smiled, then looked thoughtfully at the arrow, making him grin.

"I don't think that will work, Serena." She shrugged a little, still looking thoughtful. He had a feeling that she was going to experiment. "Come here and meet Akane and Shampoo. They're from Japan, like Aiko and the others." Tossing the bent arrow next to her bow on the ground, Serena exchanged a look with her friend, who was watching the two older young women with interest. "Are you magical girls as well?" she asked excitedly. "Hello, Aiko. How are you?" she added, politely.

"I'm fine, thanks, Serena," the brunette said, smiling at them. "Hi, Sophie. How is your Aikido coming along?"

"Not bad, thank you. My Sensei says I have a gift for it. He's very pleased with my progress, although he says I need to keep my temper, because sometimes I get carried away." Shampoo and Akane exchanged a glance and giggled.

"I know what you mean," Akane said, while beside her Shampoo rolled her eyes.

"Have no idea," she added, looking amused. Akane nudged her friend in the ribs, making her snicker.

"No, we're not magical girls, Serena," Akane answered the girl's original question. "I'm a martial artist, and Shampoo is a warrior from China and a very good friend. She's much better than I am, she's been teaching me for some time now."

"Good student," Shampoo said, "Slow at first, but got better very quick." She looked slyly at her friend. "Still needs work." Akane sighed a little with a small smile, while Serena and Sophie giggled.

"I beat you four times so far."

"Lose count number of times beat you," Shampoo laughed. She stepped forward and held out her hand. "Nice meet you, girls. Sorry about sound like idiot, still learning English. Stupid language, very complicated." They grinned, shaking her hand. Akane repeated the exercise.

"She's getting better, and understands more than you'd think. Just can't speak it very well." She looked pleased at her own fluency. "I need to practice but I hope I'm OK at it."

"You're fine, Akane," Aiko reassured her. "You'd be surprised how quickly you improve when you speak it all the time. Anyway, an accent is useful here, it makes you sound exotic." Adrian, off to the side, chuckled. He was watching them with interest, noting how they'd both relaxed a lot in the last few minutes. Exchanging a glance with Jim he nodded slightly.

"That's true," he said, "There are several Asian females in Hollywood who are very much in demand. I know for a fact at least two of them speak perfect English, but keep the accent deliberately because people seem to like it." They looked at him, then at each other, smiling.

"I suggested to Adrian that he get a few visual aids in," Aiko commented, pointing across the yard. "Yori told me that your sister had mentioned some of your old training exercises, and she thought they might be useful in demonstrating your abilities." Akane followed her finger and saw a pallet of concrete blocks, still strapped together, along with a number of thick pieces of lumber. There was also a huge wooden post about twenty centimetres in diameter sunk into the lawn, a metre and a half of it sticking out.

"OK. I don't do much of that at the moment, it's mostly for strength training, but it's good fun."

"I hope it's useful," Richard commented, looking at the post. "It took Jim and me two hours to dig the hole and get it in, that thing is heavy."
"It looks fine, Richard," Akane said. "I don't know how long it will last, though, the one at home is in a big lump of rock. That's just in the earth. But is should be OK for a few hits." Richard glanced at Jim, who looked impressed. Aiko grinned at their expressions.

"She's very strong," she told them. "Not magical girl level, but a hell of a lot more than she looks." Adrian glanced at her, then inspected the young woman, who seemed embarrassed. "Impressive. How strong?" he asked curiously.

"Well, I've seen her throw a light van about thirty metres," Aiko said, looking pleased at the expression of shock he developed. "That's not bad by anyone's standards."

"No. No it isn't," he replied faintly, slightly pale. Akane was going red, staring at the ground.

"It was a mistake, I was really angry at the time," she said quietly.

"Don't worry, Akane, I was just teasing. Anyway, the insurance covered the damage. Yori made sure of that." Aiko went over and clapped her on the shoulder. Serena and Sophie were looking at her with astonishment.

Glancing at his watch, Adrian muttered to himself. "I'm sorry about this, ladies. I have no idea where Aaron and Matt have got to. I'll try calling them again." Pulling his phone out he moved off to the other end of the patio.

Looking curiously at the bow on the ground, Shampoo asked Serena, "You want be archer?" The teenager nodded.

"It's a lot of fun, and I'm getting quite good at it, I think." Picking up the bow she showed it to the Chinese woman. "This one has a draw weight of twenty five to forty five pounds. I started with the lowest, but it's set to forty pounds now. That's apparently quite a lot for a female my size."

Shampoo nodded, inspecting the bow with interest.

"Complicated machine. Not use one like this before. Amazon bow different. May try?" Serena handed it to her. Looking at it carefully, Shampoo held it with an experts grip, pulling the bowstring back smoothly to her ear. Serena watched with interest. "Same length arms, that good," Shampoo commented, smiling. "Machine set up properly. Very good." Gently letting off the string, she glanced at the target Serena had set up near the fence thirty-five metres away. "Not much range, but good for try," she added. "May shoot?"

"OK," the younger woman said, while the others watched. She picked up the quiver she'd hung on the back of one of the patio chairs. "I've only got nine good arrows left, the rest kind of got a bit... bent."

"Metal arrows do that," the Chinese woman said with a smile. "Wood ones not bend, but break easily. Not tried other types." Picking the arrows out of the quiver one by one she examined them carefully, putting two on the table and the rest back. "Those ones no good." Slinging the quiver around her shoulder and adjusting the strap so it hung near her waist, a different position than Serena had used, she walked out onto the lawn to face the target, a round compressed straw affair about a metre across on a stand, with a paper cover, marked in multiple rings of different colours. "First, trial shot."

Taking an arrow from the quiver without looking, she nocked it, pulled, and released in one smooth action, making Serena stare in wonder. The arrow whistled through the air, landing in one of the middle rings. "Not bad." Repeating the exercise twice, the third arrow landed in the exact centre of the target. Shampoo smiled while Serena and Sophie stared at each other. "Good bow, consistent. I like." She retrieved the arrows and retook her shooting position. Holding the bow she studied the target, nodded, then fired all seven arrows one after another in a blur of motion, the thump of the bow just a ripple of sound. Everyone but Akane and Aiko stared in shock. Akane was smiling while Aiko nodded, looking impressed.

"Not at all bad," she said. Shampoo glanced at her with a smile.

"Was village champion for reason."

The Americans were staring at the target, which had six arrows arranged in a circle around the bull, with the seventh firmly lodged in the exact centre. "Holy shit," Adrian mumbled. "That's incredible." Shampoo looked pleased.

"Short range. Bow not powerful enough for long range shot, but very accurate."

"How far could you shoot with the right bow?" he asked, looked at her with astonishment. She shrugged.

"Amazon bow good for about five hundred metres, more from high place. Not have one here or show." Aiko chuckled a little, then produced a bow from nowhere. Shampoo looked at it with interest.

"I wondered if it might come up, I know a little about the Amazons. I borrowed this from a friend. Will it do?" Handing the compound bow back to Serena, who was still gaping at the target, Shampoo strode over and took the longbow that Aiko gave her, inspecting it carefully.

"Very nice bow. Not quite same, but similar to Amazon one. Have arrows?" The magical girl handed her a quiver of wooden arrows over a metre long. Removing one from the quiver Shampoo tested the steel broadhead point with her finger, then smiled. "Sharp. I like." She looked at Akane, who was watching with a smile. "Move target, please, Akane?"

"Where to?" the girl asked her friend. Shampoo looked at the land behind the garden fence, then pointed to a place three hundred metres away, higher than the fence due to the upwards slope of the ground.

"There, by big tree."

"OK." Jogging over to the target, Akane removed the arrows from it, handing them to Sophie, who had followed her, then picked the target and stand up, jumping over the metre and a half fence easily, before heading to the indicated spot. Sophie stared, then grinned, walking back to her friend.

"That's remarkable," Adrian said, watching with interest.

"I thought you'd like it," Aiko told him. "She's actually pretty damn good. Not in our class, true, but..."

Waving to Shampoo from beside the tree, Akane pointed to the ground. The Amazon waved her back another fifty metres, indicating the right position. Setting up the target Akane stepped a few metres to the side, trusting her friend. Shampoo nodded to herself, then bent down, picking a few blades of grass and dropping them to check the wind, which was slight. She nodded again. Testing the pull of the bow she smiled. "Again, test shot." Slinging the quiver at her side she selected an arrow, firing it in a smooth move with no more apparent effort than she'd shown with the compound bow. The arrow made a very lethal sound as it buzzed away into the distance, the young woman watching its path with an evaluating eye, tutting to herself even before it made contact.

"Bad shot," she muttered. The arrow had landed right on the edge of the target, almost completely penetrating the thick straw to the point the fletching was the only thing showing. She thought for a moment, then tried again. This time she smiled. The arrow landed much closer to the centre, although still some way off. The third one hit the centre.

Adrian looked at Jim, who whistled silently. "Fucking impressive," the director said, making his colleague nod.

Waving to Akane to remove the arrows, Shampoo waited until her friend was clear, then took a deep breath. Everyone watched silently. There was a series of twangs, too close for anyone other than Aiko to separate, ending when the quiver was empty. Fifteen arrows arced towards the target, the first one landing just as the last was fired. A second later the sound of multiple, close thuds sounded as all the arrows embedded themselves in the straw to the feathers. Five people gaped in amazement, then looked at the girl with the long lilac hair, who was grinning.

"Out of practice. Sorry about too slow."

"Oh. My. God!" Sophie slowly said. "That was AMAZING!" She looked at Serena, who nodded vigorously.

"Unbelievable," Jim muttered, while beside him, Adrian seemed to have stopped breathing.

Richard was slowly shaking his head in respectful awe. The doorbell sounding made him jump, then go to answer it. Just after Akane jumped the fence on the return trip, he came out with two other men following, who looked around.

"Sorry, Adrian, we got stuck on the freeway, there was some sort of accident. The phone networks are all screwed up as well, we didn't have much reception. I tried calling you but couldn't get through." The taller of the two men, a solidly built brown-haired person with dark grey eyes, who looked ex-military, smiled apologetically. Beside him, the shorter and heavily chewed up figure of Aaron, the arms-master from the studio, nodded.

"Complete chaos. Hope it's cleared up when we leave." He looked about at the various people, stopping on Aiko. "Ah. I remember you. You were with that little black-haired girl with the ridiculously good nunchaku skills." She grinned.

"Yep. Yori is something of an expert with most martial arts weapons."

"She here?"

"No, she's on holiday with friends. Needed a break." He nodded.

"Fair enough." Akane walked over with the target, setting it up next to Shampoo, who looked at it in satisfaction. Everyone inspected it, the two recent arrivals curiously, most of the rest with awe. All the arrows were clustered in the middle, forming a neat X shape, which was clearly deliberate.

"Good god," Adrian managed. Jim just shook his head in wonder. Shampoo handed the bow back to Aiko and began carefully pulling the arrows out, putting them back in the quiver.

"Nice shooting," the tall man said, looking at the Chinese woman, who smiled. "What was the range?" He glanced around the garden. Adrian tapped him on the shoulder and pointed at the tree in the distance, an odd look on his face.

"See that tree?" The man nodded slowly. "About another hundred feet or so. I could barely see it."
The man stared at him, then back at the tree, then at Shampoo, who shrugged, handing Aiko the quiver of arrows.

"I know, too close. Ground too rough for target stand further away." He looked slightly stunned, while behind him Jim turned to his friend and mouthed an expletive. Richard grinned.

"Stop showing off." Akane giggled. Shampoo looked amused.

"That what we here for, no?"

Adrian chuckled. "That what you here for, yes. Very yes."

The Amazon smiled at him, while Akane sighed. "Oh, don't say that. You have no idea what she's like."

"Akane as bad." They both giggled.

"Do you mind?" Aaron asked, motioning to the bow Aiko was holding. She smiled and handed it to him. Experimentally drawing it, or trying to at any rate, he looked shocked when the string moved about fifteen centimetres. "Holy..." Grunting with strain he pulled harder, managing to pull the bow about three quarters of the way to full extension. "What the hell pull does this thing have, for god's sake?" Aiko looked at him, amused.

"My friend said it was about a hundred kilos. That's... two hundred and twenty pounds, or so, in American." He stared, appalled.

"That's insane! No one can use a bow with a pull like that. Not more than maybe once." Shampoo giggled a little.

"Takes practice. Lots." Smiling, Aiko retrieved the bow, pulling it to full extension while holding it in front of her at arms length a couple of times.

"Seems easy enough." She grinned at the expression on their faces while Richard roared with laughter.

"Coffee, guys?" he asked. They both nodded numbly, still looking at Aiko. He came back quickly, handing them each a mug full.

"OK." Adrian looked around at his colleagues. "Guys, this is Akane and Shampoo, they're the ones I wanted to meet. Aiko has recommended them as people who could be exactly what we're looking for. Ladies, this is Aaron Webb, the studio arms master, and Matt Jordan, the stunt and fight director." The two men snapped out of their slight bemused trance, turning to the other young women, as Aiko stepped back beside Richard, unstringing the bow and putting it and the quiver back wherever she'd produced them from. Neither man noticed although Jim and Adrian did, their eyes widening slightly.

"Hello, it's nice to meet you," Aaron told them, smiling in a way than made his somewhat battered face warm up a lot. He shook both their hands. Matt repeated the exercise.

"It's good of you to come all this way," the stunt director said.

"It's no trouble," Akane replied, glancing at Aiko who smiled slightly. "We're both very excited and nervous about this. I've wanted to get into this industry for a long time, but I never thought it would happen. Especially not like this." Matt smiled at her as well.
"It's funny how that sometimes happened. I was in the military for quite a while, but ended up making films. I prefer it to getting shot at." He shrugged a little. "Life sometimes throws you a curve ball. You grab it, or duck."

"That's what my sister said." Akane laughed.

"Let's sit down, tell us a little about yourselves," Adrian suggested. He motioned to the patio table, which had a number of chairs around it. "This first meeting is just to get to know you and see what you can do." He glanced at Aiko for a moment. "I'm already fairly sure just based on the recommendation, but some people need more..." She grinned, nodding to him, while Akane and Shampoo looked at each other, smiling. Matt rolled his eyes.

"Adrian, you know how crazy what you told us sounds, right? It's impossible." The director got a weird little smile on his face.

"Remember you said that. In fact, I'll bet you both a thousand dollars that inside two hours you're going to apologise to me." They exchanged glances. Richard shared a look with Aiko, both of them very amused.

"You're on," Aaron said after a moment, shaking hands. Matt sighed, but did the same. The director had a very predatory look suddenly, making them seem just a little worried.

"Great." Turning back to the two young women, he grinned. "I'll split my winnings three ways." Moving to the table he sat, the rest of them doing likewise. "OK, Akane, why don't you start."

She thought for a moment, nervous all over again. Taking a breath, remembering Nabiki's advice, she tried to calm down. "All right. My name is Akane Tendo. I'll be twenty-three tomorrow. I was born in the Furinkan district of Nerima, Tokyo, where I've lived all my life. I've got two older sisters, although I haven't seen one of them for some time. My father is a martial arts expert and teacher at the family school, along with Uncle Genma, his best friend. They teach two different branches of our own style. My mother died when I was young, my sisters and father raised me."

She looked slightly sad, as Adrian nodded.

"I'm sorry to hear that."

"It was a long time ago," she replied, smiling slightly. "It caused me some problems, I'll admit, along with... other things, but that's in the past."

"Good enough. Go on, please."

"I've been practising martial arts since I was very young, although not as seriously as I should have. Various things kind of... got in the way. But over the last year, and more in the last six months, I've been training very seriously with Shampoo and her great-grandmother, an honoured Elder in her village. They've both improved my skills a huge amount." She glanced at Shampoo, who nodded encouragingly. "For about the last four years I've been working in a local jewellery shop. While I did well at school, when I graduated money was tight for a number of reasons and I haven't been to university. I'd like to get some higher education one day, but what with one thing or another it just hasn't happened yet."

The four men listening all nodded thoughtfully. She stopped for a moment. "I don't know quite what else to tell you. I've never done this sort of thing before." Adrian smiled at her.

"Don't worry, this isn't really a formal interview. You're doing fine. Why don't we ask some questions and you answer, that might be easier."
"OK."

"What do you do in this jewellery shop?"

"Mainly serve customers and help Mr Ito at the counter, but I also provide security. Every now and then someone tries to rob the place, even though we're in the middle of Nerima. Most smart criminals avoid the entire ward completely, but sometimes we get someone who hasn't worked out why." She laughed a little. "I educate them on the reason. When they get out of hospital, then jail, they don't come back." They all looked somewhat shocked, while Shampoo giggled.

"Keep telling Akane, bad idea let enemy live. Attack you with weapon, deserve what get."

"It was only a little knife last time," Akane said, indicating a length of about thirty centimetres with her hands, making the studio men stare. "I took it away from him when he tried threatening me with it. He wasn't very fast. When I snapped it in half he gave up, it was the other one with the crowbar who wanted a fight." She grinned. "I had to break a couple of bones but he stopped struggling in the end."

Aiko was snickering to herself beside Richard, from where they were listening out of the way, his daughter and her friend also sitting quietly next to them. He looked at her and smiled a little.

"Um, OK. And the local police are all right with this?" Jim asked. She nodded happily.

"Oh, yes. I got complimented on the lack of damage last time. The Sergeant was very pleased. He wasn't happy the first time, neither was Mr Ito. He took the cost of the front window out of my pay." She frowned slightly. "That was quite expensive. But it made a wonderful noise when the thief went through it."

"Riiight," Adrian said slowly.

She smiled at him. "Don't worry, I don't do things like that any more. Unless someone does something that really needs it." The blue-haired girl shrugged. "So far, no one has."

They all looked at her for a long moment, not quite sure what to ask next, while she waited patiently.

"OK, then," the director said after a moment, somewhat wishing he'd not raised the question. "Do you have any hobbies or interests other than the martial arts?"

"I quite like tennis, and skating, although I haven't done much of either recently. I was good at volleyball in school, I ended up as the captain of the girls team, and I played baseball as well. I also read quite a lot." She thought for a moment. "I'd like to be a better cook." Beside her Shampoo involuntarily shuddered hard.

"Could not be worse cook," she muttered. Akane glared at her for a moment.

"Thanks."

"Is true. Takes special talent make food chases you out of kitchen." The Chinese girl grinned at her friend, who sighed and nodded.

"I'll admit, I'm not at all good at it."

"That understatement." Shampoo subsided, snickering, when Akane glared at her again.
"Other than that, no real hobbies. I've tried a few things over the years but never stuck at them. The Art is the one thing I come back to." She smiled a little. "I love it."

"OK. That's very interesting, thank you, Akane." Adrian studied her for a moment, then turned to the other young woman.

"So, Shampoo. I'm sorry, is that really your name? It sounds a little odd to us." She laughed.

"Name actually Xian Pu, but people not Chinese say it wrong. Everyone in Nerima call Shampoo. I used to it now."

"I see." He smiled back at her. "It's not a bad name, just a little strange. Chinese is a very complex language, I understand, so I suppose it's not surprising that people might mispronounce it." She nodded.

"Not good with languages, understand problem." The Chinese woman shrugged a bit. "Took five years learn Japanese good enough not sound like idiot. English not easy either, but learning faster. Maybe in America get better sooner."

"Well, if it's any consolation, your English is much better than my Chinese," Matt said with a smile. He added a couple of words in Mandarin, which caused Shampoo to stare with widening eyes, then giggle furiously.

"Accent horrible."

He grinned. "I had a Chinese girlfriend years ago who tried to teach me. She gave up in the end. It used to make her laugh her ass off as well."

"Tell us about yourself, Shampoo. Don't worry, we understand the language problem," Adrian said. She nodded.

"Same age Akane, nearly. Month older. Born in Amazon village in Qinghai Province in China. Only relatives left Great-Grandmother Ku Lon, head village elder, and father. Visit him sometimes, but not for while. Trained by warriors of village since could walk, won village champion at sixteen. Was big..." She paused for a moment and turned to Akane, speaking Japanese.

"Competition," Akane said. Shampoo nodded.

"Yes. Sorry, forgot word. Was big competition, fought all other female warriors in age class to win. Very tiring."

"How many did you fight against?" Aaron asked, fascinated. She thought for a moment.

"Think was forty-three. No, forty-four. Not all at same time."

"Wow." He glanced at Matt who was looking slightly impressed.

"Akane used to fight more at once, but they not good." They looked at the other woman, who sighed.

"Yes, that's something I'd like to forget. An idiot at school managed to get practically every other idiot to wait for me every morning to fight me for the 'Honour of a Date.'" She sounded very sarcastic about this. "I had to beat them all down to get to school. It was a damn nuisance. Luckily most of them were terrible, so it didn't usually take very long. I still can't believe they kept at it for so long. Over a year." She smiled a little. "I suppose it was good training in a way, in some weird form of crowd control."

"Looking back on it the whole thing was kind of amusing, but at the time it made me very angry." Matt exchanged a glance with Aaron, who looked appalled.

"That's... somewhat disturbing. An entire crowd of boys attacking one girl? Didn't the police or the school put a stop to it?"

Akane sighed a little. "It was Nerima. And Furinkan, which is the craziest part of Nerima. The high school principle was completely nuts, so he didn't care, and the police had bigger problems to deal with. As long as I didn't permanently maim anyone they didn't pay a lot of attention." A slight smile crossed her face. "People in Furinkan are used to that sort of thing. Most of them are a lot tougher than you'd expect. I don't know why, though."

Turning back to Shampoo, who was smiling, they tried to remember what they'd been asking. "All right, please continue, Shampoo," Adrian asked after a few seconds.

"Trained in many forms martial arts and weapons. Know swords, spears, bows, clubs, knife, some others. Also very good tracker. Can cook well, know some magic, only small things, but useful. Learned hidden weapons technique from master, but not very good yet. Very difficult." Akane looked at her with a raised eyebrow.

"You've managed to make that work?"

"Small amount. Need much practice, probably never be good as Mousse. Teach you when you get ki control good enough."

"What is the hidden weapons technique," Adrian asked, fascinated.

"This," she said, pulling a chúi out of her sleeve. He jumped, then stared in shock. There was no way that the club she was holding could possibly have fitted. Aiko, beside Richard, nodded approvingly.

"Not bad. I didn't know she could do that."

"Holy crap!" Jim stared at her, then at his colleagues, who all looked as shocked as he felt. Glancing at Richard he noticed with slight surprise that his friend didn't seem at all taken aback by what the young woman had just done.

"Only small pocket, hold pair of chúi, sandwich for later." Shampoo smiled at their expression. "Can't hold for more than one day so far. Mousse master of technique, best in village. Keeps huge amount of weapons, other things, up sleeves. Very impressive. Still nuisance, but good at technique."

"That's... incredible," Matt told her honestly, suddenly wondering whether everything Adrian had told him had a basis in reality after all. The Chinese girl looked pleased. "I've heard stories of advanced martial arts techniques that were a bit unusual, but I've never seen anything remotely like that before."

"Is useful, be more useful when learn properly." Shampoo put the club back up her sleeve, leaving no trace of it. "Never know when need chúi. Or sandwich." She had an amused smile still.
"No, I suppose you don't," Adrian replied faintly.

"Also good at roof-hopping, other special techniques. Teaching Akane them, she also becoming very good. Little rusty at moment, not practice as much as should have for several years, but teaching bringing skills back fast. Great-Grandmother very pleased." She shrugged. "No good sparring partners in hand to hand. Mousse very good at weapons, better than me in many, so kept in practice with most, but not all. No room for archery unless go out of city."

"That doesn't seem to have had much effect on your skills," Jim said, looking at the target in the middle of the lawn. She followed his gaze with her own.

"Too slow," she muttered. "Great-Grandmother be annoyed. Must practice more."

"If that was slow, I'm almost afraid to see what fast would be," he told her honestly, making her grin.

"Also know many interesting pressure points, combat shiatsu. Good for massage as well. Other techniques, take too long to list all. Can also ride bicycle." She laughed. So did Akane.

"What she's not saying is that she could ride a bike along that fence without using her hands," the young woman said.

"Great-Grandmother run Ramen restaurant in Furinkan. Very good restaurant. I work as waitress, cook, deliver takeout. Is boring job sometimes, make more exciting by riding bicycle on roof or wall. Keeps reflexes sharp."

"I can imagine," Adrian said, shaking his head. For some reason, he didn't doubt her story.

"Not had much school, but Great-Grandmother teach many things. Would also like to learn more one day." Shampoo shrugged. "More or less story of life. Can ask questions."

There was a long pause, while they tried to gather their thoughts. Eventually, Aaron asked, "You mentioned magic. What do you mean by that?"

"Some small spells. Fire lighting, useful in kitchen. Tracking spells, some things useful in combat. Only tricks but come in handy." He looked slightly disbelieving. "Could demonstrate. Need candle." Aiko suddenly had one in her hand, which she flipped at the Chinese girl at fairly high speed. Shampoo snapped her hand out and caught it as it went past her face. "Thanks, Aiko." Her interviewers exchanged impressed glances. The motion had been extremely fast.

Putting the candle in her empty coffee mug to hold it upright, she stared hard at it. Mumbling something in Mandarin under her breath she concentrated, then snapped her fingers. The candle promptly lit itself. Everyone looked at it.

"Wow, that was amazing," Serena said quietly to Sophie, who nodded, wide eyed.

"Um..." Aaron stared at the burning candle, then looked around at his friends. "How the hell did you do that?"

"Told you, magic. Kitchen spell Great-Grandmother teach. Only trick, but useful. Not much range, no more than one metre, only work on small things, but still handy." She smiled. "Want to do again?" He nodded dumbly. Reaching out she snuffed out the candle, then repeated the feat.

"Good grief."
Adrian was grinning, pretty sure he was going to win his bet.

Pinching out the candle Shampoo picked it up and flipped it back to Aiko, who caught it without looking and vanished it. Richard grinned as she smiled at him. "Great-Grandmother much more powerful, good mage. I not really talented at magic. Is pity, would like to learn, but not seem to have knack for more than tricks."

"Not many people do, Shampoo," Aiko said from off to the side. "Good mages are fairly rare even in Japan, although most people can learn some useful things with enough effort. That was actually quite impressive. Good energy control."

"Thank you." Shampoo smiled at the other woman. "Fire trick not good idea for gas stove. Take too long, by the time fire light too much gas. Found out hard way. Bang very loud." She winced at the memory. "Great-Grandmother laughing for hours." They all stared at her, then laughed. "Like that." Shampoo grinned. "Very embarrassing."

"I can imagine. I hope you weren't hurt." Adrian looked amused. She shook her head. "No, just black face and bad hair. Got better quickly."

"Anything else like that?" he asked curiously. She glanced at Akane, suddenly looking worried. Her friend nodded. Looking back at the director, she sighed a little.

"One big thing. Have curse. Is very annoying, but no cure."

Adrian looked puzzled. "What do you mean, you have a curse?" The young woman sighed again.

"Very powerful magic, got years ago." She looked around at them. "Embarrassing to tell. Called Jusenkyo curse. Very strange. I turn into cat if get wet with cold water. Warm water changes back." Everyone but Aiko and Akane looked at her in disbelief. She shrugged at their expressions. "Sorry. Know hard to believe but true. Easy to show." Looking at Richard, she asked, "Can get glass cold water, glass hot water?"

After a moment, he nodded, getting up and going into the house. They waited silently until he came back, putting a glass each of hot and cold water on the table in front of her, then sitting down again. "Thank you." She picked up the cold water and sipped it. "See, small contact not cause effect. Slightly weird. But bigger contact..." She poured some on her arm.

Everyone stared in total shock, as Akane neatly caught the falling glass and put it back on the table. Bending down she moved some clothes around on the pile on the floor, allowing the feline version of Shampoo to escape, then picked her up, holding her gently. "It's a very awkward problem," she explained, as they kept staring. The cat in her arms nodded. "Unfortunately there is no cure. Several people I know have similar curses, they've looked for a long time, but once you have it you're stuck, apparently. There are ways around it, though. Her village makes a special soap that you can wash with, which kind of turns it off for a while, as long as you keep using it. It's quite expensive but her Great-Grandmother can get it easily whenever she needs more. Shampoo doesn't always use it, she doesn't like the smell, and she's used to the curse now. So are the people in Nerima." She grinned.

"It was kind of weird at first but you'd be amazed what you can get used to if you have enough time."

Richard began laughing slightly, causing Aiko to look at him with a grin. "Don't worry, you'll get used to it," he said, before laughing harder. Everyone looked at him, Aiko giggling, while his daughter sighed.

"He keeps saying that and laughing when something odd happens," she complained, "And he won't say why it's so funny." He kept laughing, more quietly now, as his daughter gave him a look of long-suffering irritation. "Oh, Dad. You're such a child sometimes," she added, which made Aiko also begin laughing quite hard.

Casting his friend occasional odd looks, Jim turned back to Akane and the cat she was holding, shaking his head. Matt was gaping, while Aaron seemed to be in shock. Adrian, after an initial look of astonishment, seemed thoughtful. After Akane put Shampoo on the table where she sat, curling her tail around her paws, he inspected her closely. "Is that really you, Shampoo?" The cat nodded, meowing once. He held up three fingers. "How many fingers?" The cat rolled its eyes, making Matt produce a small choked noise, then meowed three times. "Unbelievable. Simply unbelievable." He stared for a long few seconds, then looked at his colleagues, who still seemed to be frozen.

"And hot water turns you back again?" Shampoo nodded once more, then looked at Akane, motioning to the glass of hot water with her paw.

Scooping up her friend's clothes and putting them over her shoulder, she picked up the cat and the glass. "I'd better do this inside," she said apologetically. They all nodded, following her with their eyes as she went inside. A few minutes later both girls came out, Shampoo running her fingers through her hair, looking somewhat embarrassed.

"Sorry, I know it shock. Americans not familiar with magic. Even Japanese surprised at first." She sat down again, Akane seated beside her. "Special soap block curse, so curse not problem then, but not smell nice. Will have to ask Great-Grandmother for batch without smell." No one said anything for another few seconds.

Eventually Adrian grinned. "I'm sorry for staring, Shampoo, and testing you, but that really was very unexpected." She nodded, smiling in an understanding way. "It certainly makes a mockery of any special effect I've ever seen, though." His expression turned thoughtful. "Come to think of it, it could be... very interesting. With the right script..." Jim looked at him for a moment, then back at the two young women.

"Yori showed us some pretty incredible things the time she was here, but for some reason that's even more incredible. Does it affect you mentally at all?" She shook her head.

"Can't tell difference. Vision odd, and much better smell and hearing, but mind still same. Everything look very big, though." The Chinese girl grinned as he laughed. "Used to it now, but very annoying at first. Still annoying if it rain suddenly and not using soap."

"I can imagine," he replied, "I can see a number of times it could be awkward. But it could be quite useful as well, I suppose, under the right circumstances."

"Have found some uses in past," she laughed.

Adrian came back from wherever he'd been, looking at Shampoo for a moment, then nodded to himself. "All right. Thank you both for telling us all that. It's very interesting. Now, Aiko told us you were both skilled in martial arts, and coming from someone like her, that's very high praise indeed." He glanced at Matt. "You have absolutely no idea. I know how good some of your guys are, but..." he shook his head with a weird little smile. "You're going to have a bit of a shock, I expect." Turning back to the two young women, he added, "Perhaps you could show us what you can do." Akane nodded, glancing at her friend.
"How would you like us to do this?"

"Whatever's convenient." Aiko got up and walked over.

"Why don't you start with something simple, Akane? You could demonstrate some of your strength training exercises, then spar with Shampoo. If you like, you can both go against me as well after. I think I can probably manage." She smiled as Akane laughed hysterically for a moment.

"Yes, I think you could. OK, I guess you're right." She turned to the police officer. "Richard, do you mind if I change in the house?"

"Help yourself, Akane. Did you find the bathroom earlier?" She nodded, retrieving her bag which she'd left by the door into the house. Shampoo did likewise, following her inside. All four studio men watched, then looked at each other.

"Fucking hell," Aaron finally said, looking slightly guilty as Sophie giggled, having forgotten the two teenagers were there. "Did you see that?" Matt nodded, still looking slightly shocked. Adrian laughed.

"I've been telling you for seven months. What happened? Everyone laughed." He grinned at them evilly. "I think it's going to get better as well."

Shortly the two young women returned, both wearing different clothing, Akane in her new black gi, Shampoo in something equivalent made from silk but cut differently. They inspected the two women with interest. Adrian whispered to Jim, "They look damn good. I can well see that in front of a camera." His friend nodded. Both women walked out onto the lawn, heading for the pallet of blocks. When she reached it Akane bent down slightly, picking up the close to two hundred kilo load without effort, then carrying it into the middle of the lawn. Adrian smiled while Matt and Aaron stared in shock.

"Holy shit. That must weigh a quarter of a ton."

"Oh, at least, I'd think." Jim grinned, remembering the magical girls in the studio when the gantry collapsed. If Akane was anywhere even close to as strong, a few hundred pounds wasn't much effort, leaving aside Aiko saying she could pick up a van and throw it a hundred feet. They watched as she snapped the metal bands holding the blocks together with her bare hands, making almost musical twangs, then picked up a stack of half a dozen blocks. Shampoo looked around, before retrieving a large tarpaulin that was folded up in the corner of the garden, spreading it out on the lawn to stop the broken blocks going everywhere on the grass.

Stacking the blocks neatly on the tarp, Akane built a pile eight high, then stood in front of it, side on to the table. She glanced at Adrian who nodded, smiling slightly. With an indrawn breath, she raised her fist, then struck out at the topmost block, in a move almost too fast to see. There was a loud crack and the top block exploded into tiny fragments, the three under it breaking apart and sliding to the ground. Matt stared while Aaron twitched a little. After a long moment the tall man stood, walking over to the two girls, then looking at the blocks. Bending down he picked up half of one, looking at it, then shook his head in awe. "It's a real block," he said, "and not one of those lightweight ones either." Akane giggled.

"No, those are useless. They're not worth the effort, it's like hitting fog."

"Can I see your hand?" he asked after a moment. She held it out. It was covered with concrete powder but seemed undamaged otherwise. He stared at it, shaking his head again. "Incredible. Do it again." She smiled, quickly pushing the destroyed blocks to one side and rebuilding the tower.
He nodded, and she lashed out once more. Even close up he could barely follow the motion of her fist as it pulverised the block. "Unbelievable. Can you break more than the top one like that?"

"Oh, yes, I normally don't bother because the bits go everywhere, but it's not hard." She made another stack while he looked at her in worried awe. Her concept of 'not hard' frankly slightly scared him. Stepping back slightly he nodded again, watching with amazement as her fist went completely through the top three blocks and crushed the entire stack. As she removed her arm from the crumbling concrete there was complete silence in the garden, broken by Aiko clapping. Akane looked at her and smiled.

"How the hell strong are you?" he asked in awe. She shrugged a little.

"I have no idea. I've always been strong, that was about my only real special talent for a long time, and pretty quick, but both got a lot better over the last year." Shampoo giggled.

"She understating again. Horrifically strong and very fast years ago. More now. Stronger than me but not as fast. Nowhere near Aiko or her friends, but very good for not being magical girl." Akane wiped the dust off her hand with her sleeve, slightly embarrassed at the praise.

"Good god," Matt said in a small voice. Akane glanced at him, smiled a little, then bent down and picked up a head-sized chunk of block, squeezing it one handed. It emitted a crunching sound and crumbled to small pieces. He went white.

"If I were you I wouldn't challenge her to an arm-wrestling competition," Richard called, amusement in his voice. Aiko snickered, sounding remarkably like Yori to him.

"No, I don't think I will." Matt moved out of the way as Shampoo came closer, picking up a few blocks and snapping them in half between her hands, then grinning at Akane, who was watching with puzzlement.

"I throw, you break." Her friend's expression cleared and she nodded, smiling.

"OK." Wide-eyed, Matt retreated to the safety of the table, sitting down again. Carrying her stack of half-blocks, Shampoo walked ten metres away, then put most of them down. Holding one in her left hand, she hefted the other in her right, while Akane took up a side on stance. She nodded she was ready. Smiling, the Chinese girl whipped the chunk of concrete in her hand at her friend, who lashed out at it, swearing when she only clipped it, sending it spinning into the distance in a puff of dust. Everyone watched as it arced over the back fence and landed a hundred metres away.

"Whoops. Sorry, I haven't tried this before," she called, embarrassed.

"Um..." Richard started, getting a little worried about the integrity of his house, but before he could say anything else Shampoo threw the other piece she was holding. This time Akane caught it squarely, causing it to shatter into gravel which rained down on the tarp. Sophie and Serena both clapped while Aiko nodded approvingly.

"Not bad. Good accuracy, and decent power." With a laugh, the Amazon picked up two more half-blocks, throwing them one after another. Akane got both of them, yelping slightly as a high-velocity fragment clipped her ear.

"Ow," she said mildly, rubbing it. "That stung." Aaron and Matt exchanged glances, pretty sure that most people would have required a new ear, if not a new head. The marble-sized bit of concrete had made a remarkable bullet-ricochet noise as it left the vicinity at high speed, luckily heading over the back fence again.
"It might be a good idea to try something with less shrapnel, Akane," Aiko called, amusement on her face. The young woman looked over, then nodded.

"OK." As Shampoo put the blocks back on the stack, she walked over to the thick post partially buried in the ground, examining it. It was apparently a large part of an old telephone pole, perhaps three metres long, half-buried. Poking it experimentally she smiled. It seemed fairly solidly fixed in place. Stepping back a bit she assessed it, then struck out with her fist. Splinters flew. Her other hand made more bits come off. Nodding in satisfaction, she attacked it vigorously, punching and kicking, rapidly causing the upper half metre to resemble a huge cotton bud it was so frayed. The four men at the table watched with different expressions, Adrian with satisfied glee, Jim with interest, and the other two staring in horror. After thirty seconds of punishment the pole was listing at a forty-five degree angle, looking severely sorry for itself.

One final kick snapped the top completely off, sending it bouncing down the garden. Everyone watched it until it stopped moving, Richard with a sigh of relief that it hadn't quite made it as far as the fence, but looking with mild irritation at all the divots it had taken out of the grass on the way. "She's worse than Yori for holes in the lawn," he muttered, making Aiko laugh.

"It was your idea to do this here, Richard," she reminded him, grinning. He sighed.

"I know. I'll know better for next time," he replied, then smiled.

Aiko called to Shampoo, who looked in her direction. "Catch," she said, tossing a sword at her, smiling as several people gasped at the sight of the shiny razor-sharp blade flipping end over end at the Chinese woman. Reaching out Shampoo caught the weapon without problem, looking at it for a moment, then grinned. Motioning Akane to move, she lunged at the remains of the pole, reducing it to firewood with half a dozen incredibly fast strikes, all within less than two seconds. Satisfied, she stepped back.

"That pole dead," she said deadpan. Akane giggled.

Getting up, Aiko walked over to them and had a short conversation in Japanese. Both young women nodded after a moment. They carefully carried the pallet of blocks off to one side, both together so it wouldn't tip any off, while Aiko rolled the tarp full of crushed concrete up and moved it of the way. Putting their burden down they came back, heading for the middle of the lawn. Aiko stood off to one side, as they faced each other, bowing slightly, then waiting. She snapped, "Begin!"

Both women immediately attacked each other, leaping about acrobatically, snapping out kicks and punches at incredible speed. Akane caught Shampoo's arm as it came past, leaning out of the way of the punch, then flipped her over her shoulder in a move almost too fast to see, only to have the Chinese woman roll in mid air and kick out at her back, sending her flying. She recovered into a forward roll, bouncing off her feet when in the right position, back-flipping back into range and kicking out. Her opponent deflected the kick with her arm, diving under the other woman, landing on her hands, then pushing off to fly past her again as she turned, half a dozen blows landing on her ribs en route. Akane winced slightly while most of the other people sucked in their breath, as the sound was fairly dramatic, suggesting broken ribs at least.

Nothing like that seemed evident as Akane spun around in a low sweep kick just as the other woman landed, forcing her to jump again, putting one hand on Akane's head as she went completely upside down over her, then somersaulted twice, landing out of range. With a grin she dived back into the fight.

Looking away from the sparring match on the lawn, Adrian glanced at Jim with a pleased nod, then looked beyond him to his two colleagues, who were watching open-mouthed. Neither one of them was breathing as far as he could see. Grinning to himself he returned his attention to the two young women, who seemed to be enjoying themselves. He could see that while incredibly fast, they were nowhere near the speed or power of what he'd seen at the party after Christmas, but compared to a 'normal' martial artist of any school he'd ever encountered before, they were astounding.

'I have to have these girls', he thought with glee. 'Whatever it takes. They'll make us all rich.'

Richard looked at Aiko, who glanced at him for a moment before smiling, returning her attention to the fight. He got the impression she was very pleased. He could see that neither fighter was in her or her friends class, the speed was amazing but nothing like what she was capable of, never mind Yori or Chou. You couldn't even see them move when they tried. Akane and Shampoo's motions were a blur, even so. It was extremely impressive. Looking at the director who was watching them fight with rapt attention and a big smile, he got the impression that the other man would offer them anything they wanted to work with him. His colleagues seemed to be broken, staring in disbelief. The police officer grinned a little. That tended to be what happened around people like this, in his experience, when you first saw it.

"Cease!" Aiko said sharply. Both fighters instantly stopped, straightening up. She nodded, pleased. Producing a pair of bo staffs she tossed one to each girl, who caught them, then looked at her. "Reset, please." Both stepped away from each other, going back to their original positions.

"Begin!" As the command was given they dropped into a crouch, Shampoo whipping her staff around at Akane's head. The other woman instantly blocked it with a sharp crack, then returned the blow, which her friend jumped over, before striking out again. They whirled around each other, the staffs making loud bangs on one another, for a couple of minutes, before Aiko again called a halt.

"Well done, very good. How much have you practised that, Akane?" She was speaking Japanese for the moment.

"Not as much as I should have, we've been concentrating on other things recently, but Shampoo does bring it out every now and then." The youngest Tendo shrugged a little. "I should work on it, I could barely keep up."

"It was pretty good, to be honest. Shampoo was obviously holding back, but even so you're not bad. I understand you know something of other practice weapons as well?"

"I've used bokken and other things, I was quite good with them, but again, I haven't practised recently. I've never tried real swords before, except once or twice. Shampoo is much, much better than I am with that sort of thing."

Aiko nodded understandingly. "OK. I understand. You should probably start learning them more seriously now, though."

"I don't think Shampoo was all that keen on live blades when I was, um, prone to being a bit annoyed," Akane said in a low voice, glancing at the people watching her. Her friend nodded, grinning.

"Not a good idea. Akane was dangerous enough without giving her sharp weapons." Both the others looked amused, although Akane was also a little embarrassed.

"I'd suggest that you're probably more than stable enough now to learn to use weapons correctly," Aiko said, giggling. "Practice weapons are all well and good but live blade techniques are somewhat different. Anyway, what next?" She pondered it for a second, then pulled out a pair of bokken. "Worth trying anyway. They look and sound impressive, which is the point of all this." Handing them to the other two she received the bo staffs back, making them go away.

"I'd suggest that you could add something to it this time if you put a little more action into it." Aiko glanced at the fence, then the house, before returning her attention to them. Both women followed her gaze, then looked at each other with smiles.

"OK. That could be fun."

"Try not to fall off, it makes both of us look bad," Shampoo giggled. Akane poked her in the ribs with the bokken.

"I nearly had you in that spar. If Aiko hadn't called time I'd have won, so who would have made who look bad?" Still giggling, Shampoo stepped back out of range.

"You might be misremembering it," she commented, impishly. Aiko chuckled, then looked over to the house, seeing Emily come out and look around. She waved. The other woman waved back, sitting beside her husband, who leaned over and kissed her. Serena went over to her and began talking rapidly, pointing at the target, then her bow, then Shampoo. Grinning to herself she turned back to the two women.

"Right, make it impressive, but I think you've probably got it in the bag, myself. Adrian looks like he'd offer you his first-born if you agree to work for him." They glanced at the table, seeing the four men staring at them. The director was doing everything but rubbing his hands together in glee. Both the arms master and the stunt director were staring with open mouths. Stepping back, Aiko went back to English. "Reset!" she barked. The two young women moved a couple of metres apart again, holding the bokken ready. "Begin!"

Ducking as Shampoo instantly sliced at her head, Akane grinned at Aiko, then ran for the fence, jumping on top of it, before running along the top. Shampoo followed her, slicing at her occasionally, throwing in a few yells for good measure. Making a sharp turn at the end of the fence, the Tendo woman charged along the back of the garden on two centimetres of wood, blocking blows over her head and smiling. Aiko watched with satisfaction, while everyone else stared. As she reached the next corner, Akane jumped high enough that her friend ran right under her, landing behind her and now being the one doing the chasing. Shampoo giggled, making the turn onto the fence heading back to the house. When she reached it she lightly leapt onto the roof, as everyone under the patio shade suddenly got up and ran out onto the lawn to get a better view. They watched as both women slashed at each other, Akane receiving a bokken to the head in a manner that made them all wince. She dropped to the roof, rolling along it as Shampoo pressed her attack, dropping off the end into the garden and tucking into a ball, then bouncing off the ground right back onto the fence, then the roof again. Matt gaped in shock, looking at Adrian who was grinning happily.

"I'm sorry," he said, making the other man laugh.

"You can pay me later," Adrian said, still watching the fight.

Running around on the roof amid the clacking of bokken slamming together, the two young women seemed to be enjoying themselves. Even so, when Aiko called "Cease!" they both stopped immediately. The magical girl looked at the director and his colleagues. "Do you need any more?"

He looked around at the other people from the studio, meeting their eyes. They shook their heads wordlessly. "Nope, I think that will do it," he said, with a huge smile. Matt pulled his wallet out and looked in it, pulling out the contents and counting it, before handing it over.

"I owe you six hundred," he said, then went and sat down with his head in his hands, looking like someone had hit him with something heavy. Aaron stared at the girls on the roof, then the one on the lawn, before shrugging.

"Take a cheque?" he asked.

"Cash only, sorry," the director said, chuckling. His colleague sighed and opened his own wallet, counting under his breath and muttering.

Looking up at the roof Aiko motioned to Shampoo and Akane, who dropped to the ground and returned her bokken. "Well done," she whispered. "If that didn't do it nothing will." Both smiled. All three walked back, Aiko going to stand next to Richard who had sat down again, while the other two sat at the table.

Adrian retook his seat, as did his colleagues. Emily whispered to her husband who nodded, getting up and coming back quickly with a number of bottles of chilled beer, looking around at everyone. Aiko smiled at him, accepting one, as did all four studio men and Shampoo. Akane was too nervous. Casually popping the cap off with her thumb Aiko put the bottle to her lips, catching the top in her other hand as it came back down. Shampoo watched, then grinned, repeating the feat. Saluting her with her bottle the magical girl laughed. Adrian shook his head, handing her her bottle. She quickly opened it and gave it back.

"So many talents," he said, smiling. She giggled.

"Good trick. Must remember."

Looking around at the other men, the director asked casually, "Was that enough, or do you need more? Matt, would you like to test Akane or Shampoo? Try out that marine training of yours?" The tall ex-military man shook his head slowly.

"No, I don't think I need to do that. I know when I'm outclassed." He looked slightly embarrassed by the admission but was honest enough to make it. Inside he was wondering what would have happened if his unit had ever come across people like these women in battle, deciding it was something he never wanted to find out, except perhaps from a very long way away.

"Aaron?"

"I think I'm good. Stunned, shocked, a little nervous, but good." The arms master inspected both females. "Thank you for showing me the most incredible martial arts I've ever seen. What style was that, anyway?"

"Mix of Amazon techniques and Tendo Anything Goes School," Shampoo replied. "Not use secret special moves, most too dangerous."

"Special moves?" Adrian asked curiously. The Amazon nodded.

"Many Amazon special moves. Most secret, only used in battle. Great-Grandmother finally teach some to Akane and me. Many left to learn. Very dangerous, very powerful."

"I've learned the Kachu Tenshin Amaguriken and the Bakusai Tenketsu so far. They're not too dangerous to bystanders, but very useful. A lot of the other techniques are devastating, not something you should use in a city." Akane smiled at the memories of the times she'd seen some of those techniques used. "One of them can cause a small tornado, for example." They stared in "What!" Aaron choked out. She nodded.

"I've seen it used. Someone I knew... a long time ago. He was the best I ever saw, until Yori and Chou. He knew a lot of the techniques, Cologne taught him all sorts of things." She sighed a little. "So amazingly good. He could learn anything pretty much just by watching it done. Anyway, he could do the Hiryu Shoten Ha really well. It's very impressive." They all exchanged glances. There was something in her voice that suggested complete truthfulness, as unlikely as it sounded.

"Making a tornado does sound a little... excessive," Aaron finally said. "What are the other two you mentioned?"

"The first one is a speed technique. It's very painful to learn but works well." Akane looked around, then got up and retrieved a handful of the gravel created by the block breaking. Returning to the table she scattered it on the surface, as they watched. A couple of dozen small bits of concrete rolled around for a moment before stopping. "Like this." She poised her hand, then with a flicker all the bits of concrete vanished in a fraction of a second. They gaped as she held out her hand, containing the gravel.

"Fuck me," Matt breathed.

"It's pretty effective for punching. You don't have the power, but the speed makes up for it." She sat down again, smiling a little at their expressions. After a moment she frowned reflectively. "But it's not a good idea to use it when brushing your teeth," she added, which made Shampoo start giggling.

"Silly Akane. Very funny, but painful."

"I got carried away and didn't think it through," her friend said, shrugging with a small smile. The four men stared for a moment, while Aiko smiled.

"Incredible," Matt finally said. "And the other one you mentioned?"

"Technique originally meant for quarries," Shampoo replied. "Only works on stone, or wood and metal if you good enough. Lets you find breaking point, destroy with touch. I show." Standing, she walked over to the pallet of blocks, picking one up and carrying it into the middle of the lawn. She stood it on end, then looked at it carefully. Glancing at them, she said, "Find breaking point, where stone is weakest, then..." Her finger stabbed out, touching the block, which promptly exploded. Small fragments dropped around her. She looked embarrassed as Richard yelped, watching the bits scatter themselves around his lawn. "Sorry. Will pick up later." Returning to the table she sat, looking at the four open mouths.

"Careful, things fly in," she said with a giggle.

Shutting his mouth with a snap, Matt asked weakly, "That's a quarrying technique?" She nodded.

"Yes. Not work for living things. That good, would be very messy." He shuddered, suddenly picturing the result if it did work on living creatures. Aaron looked slightly ill, while Jim closed his eyes for a moment.

"Ick," he muttered.

Adrian recovered before the others did, smiling so widely the corners of his mouth nearly met around the back. "Akane, Shampoo, thank you very much indeed. Would you mind if I went and talked to my friends inside for a little while?"

"Not at all, Mr Stewart," Akane responded after glancing at Shampoo slightly nervously. They watched as the four men got up and went into the house, with a couple of wondering looks back en route. Aiko came over and dropped into a chair, grinning at them.

"Very well done, both of you. Assuming they're not scared rigid I think you've done it. Stunt work at least should be in the bag." Akane smiled, looking at her friend again, who was also smiling.

"Thank you so much, Aiko, for doing all this for us. And Yori for thinking of us in the first place. We owe you both a lot. Even if nothing comes of it this has been a lot of fun."

"Don't worry, I think it will work out," the brunette replied. "Adrian at least is totally sold. The other two are basically confused at the moment, they've just seen in less than an hour a lot of things they knew were impossible demonstrated live. That tends to cause a bit of a stir." She giggled. "They'll get used to it." Richard started laughing again, making Serena sigh, looking at Sophie, who shrugged.

"So what do you think?" Adrian asked, sitting on the sofa in the living room. The others sat around the place, looking at him wordlessly for a long moment. Matt took a pull on his beer.

"I think I might have had an accident on the freeway and I'm currently in hospital on some very good drugs," he muttered. Aaron shrugged helplessly.

"If that's the case I'm in the next bed." He looked out the window at the three girls sitting at the table. "Un-fucking-believable. And you say that Aiko woman is even better?" Adrian was still grinning.

"Oh, yes. To be honest she and her friends make Akane and Shampoo, as incredible as they are, seem like beginners. Yori and Chou are at least as good again. You simply wouldn't believe it. They said they might be the best in the world which, having seen them in action, I couldn't say was wrong. But, that said, those two out there are amazing." He shrugged a little.

"That's the biggest understatement I've ever heard in my life," the arms master said slowly. "I've seen a lot of martial artists in my time, I thought I was pretty good as well, but..." He drank some more beer, his hands trembling slightly. "Either one of them could take me to pieces in seconds, with nothing more than their bare hands. Screw the martial arts, Akane is strong enough to pull the head off a rabid grizzly. I seriously wouldn't want to get her pissed off."

"If you do she starts throwing cars around," Adrian said, looking both amused and slightly worried. "But I'm told that doesn't happen any more." Aaron and Matt were looking at him with wide eyes.

"I certainly hope not!" Matt shook his head. "I agree, they're absolutely insanely good. Shampoo is obviously better, which makes sense if she's teaching Akane, but that girl is still unbelievable. This Nerima place must be completely off-the-wall insane to produce fighters like that. I don't know which I want more, to go there to find out or to stay the fuck away."

"We've got to get them, you guys." The director was looking out the window again. "They could give the studio an edge in stunt work like you wouldn't believe. They're so good they could write their own ticket anywhere in this town. If we don't grab them someone else will."

"There's a lot of paperwork to do," Matt said slowly. "Work visas, that's just the start." Adrian waved his hand dismissively.
"Not relevant. People come into this industry from all over the world. That's what the lawyers are paid for."

"We'll need to talk to HR, and Legal. I can see a number of potential problems," Jim said. "But I have to admit that I think you're right. They're very young still, but clearly smart and driven. They could go a very long way. Good looking too, which will help. Exotic." He smiled. "That's worth real money. It would be interesting to see their acting ability, but I guess that's something you learn, although you need talent as well." Adrian nodded thoughtfully.

"I have a feeling that Akane at least could be good. There's something about her..." He shrugged after a moment. "Difficult to explain, but I've got a good feeling about it. Shampoo, I'm not so sure, but I wouldn't discount it. She needs work on her English before that but I think she could improve it a lot. She learned Japanese, which isn't exactly the easiest language around."

He looked at the stunt director. "Could you work with them?"

"If I can stop being terrified of them, yes," his colleague said, looking amused yet worried. He glanced out the window. "The thing that worries me a bit is what happens when some of the guys decide to hit on them? I have a sneaking suspicion that Akane isn't all that interested. She might react badly."

"Anyone that tries something stupid probably deserves what happens," Adrian chuckled. "After the first couple of dicks get pulled off they'll learn." Matt winced.

"That's kind of what I'm scared of," he muttered, crossing his legs protectively. The other three laughed.

"There aren't a lot of female stunt people compared to the male ones," Jim said reflectively. Aaron nodded.

"True, but the ones there are are usually damn good. Not that good, but very good indeed." He grinned. "From what I saw they're both ridiculously tough. We could do all sorts of things that would kill most people without needing to use CGI."

"Assuming HR would allow it," Jim said. "They'd have a fit if they got told we were going to drop a twenty-three year old girl off the roof of a building, even if we said she'd bounce."

"They'll learn," Adrian grinned. "I think quite a lot of rules are going to have to be rewritten."

"I wonder if they could train my guys in some of those techniques," Matt mused, looking out the window. He had a thoughtful expression on his face.

"No idea. You can certainly ask." Adrian looked around again. "So, no objections if I go to the studio and tell them we need those two?" The others all shook their heads, one after another.

"What happens if the studio turns you down?" Jim asked. "They can be a little cautious, and those girls are complete unknowns." Adrian sighed a little, nodding.

"Fuck it. If they turn me down I'll hire them anyway, start my own studio, and in five years buy the bastards out." They grinned at him.

"If you do, is there a job for me?" Aaron asked, amused.

"Well, you might have to take a pay cut for a while." Adrian smiled at him. "You're overpaid." Laughing, he got up and went back out, followed by the others.
"Here we go," Aiko murmured. "Don't accept the first offer. You're the ones in the position of strength, trust me." The two women looked at her as she got up and moved away, nodding to the studio men as they came out of the house. They glanced at each other, then waited. Adrian sat down, waiting for the other three, then looked at them for a moment.

"I'm showing my hand, but I have to tell you up front that I really want you two working for me. More than I've wanted anything since my first bike when I was six." He grinned. Shampoo giggled a little. "This is the situation. All of us are sure you would make incredible stunt-women, at the least. Acting is a way off, I think, there are skills you need to learn which would take time, and you, Shampoo, would need to become more fluent in English." She nodded, understanding. "But that said, I have no doubt you could learn those skills. How good you'd actually be at acting I don't know yet, but there are some extremely well paid actors who are awful." He laughed a little. "So bad. Yet they're very popular and make a huge amount of money. Bad acting isn't necessarily a handicap."

Akane thought of some of the action movies she'd seen in recent years and smiled, thinking she had seen some of the people he was talking about.

"I'm going to go back to the studio, talk to the people in charge, and very strongly make the case for you there. It will probably take some time, and I'd think we'd need to have you over two or three more times at least before everyone is satisfied. Probably try some actual stunts, which might need a few days training, see how they go." He glanced at Matt who nodded.

"No problem. The martial arts are... beyond good, but there are a lot of other things you could turn those skills to pretty quickly."

"Right. There's all the paperwork to do to let you live and work here legally, get paid, taxed, all the other things that you need in business. The legal department would need to arrange that, then you'd need to very carefully get it checked by your own lawyers. I could recommend someone, but I'd suggest you find one yourself, just so you'd be happy you had unbiased advice." Both women nodded thoughtfully.

"You would probably need an agent. They're a pain sometimes, but a good one really does earn their pay. There are other things like actors guilds, unions, things like that, which you'd need to learn about. That can come later. I can help you with all that if you want. Don't worry, I'm not about to try to manipulate you, I'm both more or less honest and frankly terrified of what could happen if I did and you found out." He chuckled as they both smiled at him.

"Before all that, though, I need to persuade the studio to take you on. I wish I could hire you on the spot, to be honest, but at the moment that's not quite possible. But, I would like your agreement that you won't go and talk to any other studio before I have a chance to get you on board." Akane stared at him for a moment.

"I'm not sure I understand."

Adrian laughed again softly. "You really have no idea, do you?" He studied her for a moment.
"Akane, what I saw today would let you work in pretty much any studio in the world, unless it's run by idiots." He sighed a little. "Some are, of course. But no, you'd have no trouble finding work. Either of you. I want that work to be for me. I have all sorts of ideas for movies that you'd make possible. I only wish I could find more like you." He glanced meaningfully at Aiko, who shrugged apologetically. "But I'll take you happily. You're both young, intelligent, unbelievably skilled, and good looking women. That's worth a lot of money."
Akane looked over at Aiko, who nodded, holding up six fingers.

"I think we could agree to that, as long as it happened within six months," Akane said cautiously, hoping she'd decoded the magical girl's message. A nod reassured her.

"That's fair." The director looked pleased. "It will most likely take at least two weeks before I can get anything at all done, the studio can be very slow, but once it starts, it should go fairly smoothly. What would probably happen is another demonstration, followed by reviving some of the people who fainted," he snickered, "then a long delay while they get their asses in gear. At that point they'd want all your details to see what paperwork was needed. After that, there would be interviews with HR, who can be a damn pain in the ass, legal, financial, all that crap. Then some more tests, practical stunts, that sort of thing. With some luck it would be wrapped up by Christmas, and if that was the case you'd get your first work sometime after the New Year. There are a couple of movies on the horizon that you'd both be a good fit for."

Akane felt slightly weak inside, glancing at her friend to see her looking back wide-eyed. She returned her attention to the director.

"One thing to remember is that this work isn't full time, it goes in bursts as movies are made, but when we're shooting one it's damn frantic and hard work. You'd be putting in very long days for several weeks at a time, possibly a couple of months. There would be gaps where nothing much happened, although once you got established those would start to fill in. In a few years I would expect you could pick and choose your work, once your reputation builds up. And it will. There would most likely be a lot of travel as well. But, you'll make a shitload of money." He laughed at their expressions. "That tends to make the tedious parts more bearable."

"I'm kind of wondering what the downside to all this is," Akane muttered.

"Shampoo wondering too. Sound too good to be true."

"From my point of view you're too good to be true," Adrian said, grinning. They both laughed, relaxing a little. "OK. I'm going to recommend to the studio that, assuming they agree to take you on, we start you on this much." He pulled a notebook from his pocket, wrote a number on a blank page, showed it to his colleagues who all nodded after a moment, then tore it out and pushed it across to the two young women. "That's in US dollars, per month." They stared at it in disbelief. There were more zeros than seemed plausible. In yen, once Akane did the conversion in her head, it was even worse. Once more she glanced at Aiko, this time for reassurance. The magical girl shook her head very slightly, then made a small upward motion with one finger.

Gulping slightly, she pushed the paper back, feeling she was making a horrible mistake. "Um, that's nice, but..." Adrian grinned.

"OK. My mistake, I must have put the wrong number on that. Let's see." He crossed out the figure and wrote another one, returning it to her. She stared. Beside her, Shampoo swore slightly in Mandarin. Aiko coughed, making her look, then indicated again. Briefly closing her eyes and sending a prayer to her honoured ancestors, Akane pushed the paper back, unable to speak. The director looked at her for a moment, then glanced behind himself at Aiko, who smiled brightly.

"Hmm. OK, I see I made another mistake. Let's see..." He tapped his pencil on the table for a moment, glanced at Matt, then slowly wrote a third figure under the first two. Pushing it back to Akane, he waited. Everyone else was watching them, Richard and his family desperately curious. The youngest Tendo pulled the paper closer, looking at his face, then looked down. She paled a little. A quick glance at Aiko received a small nod. She looked at Shampoo who was staring at the paper and sweating.
"Ah, I think we could probably live with that," she managed to get out, trying to sound casual. Her voice was a little higher in pitch than normal, though. "To start with." Adrian chuckled.

"Great. Right, I just have to get it past the studio, but I think that's doable." Holding out his hand he waited, until she shook it, her own trembling a little. Shampoo was still staring at the paper but reflexively shook his hand as well. "Thank you, ladies. One way or another, I want to work with you both. And if you have any friends with similar skills, I'd be interested in talking to them at some point." He grinned, pushing his chair back, then got up. "Right. Any chance of another beer, Richard?"

"Sure." Richard stood and disappeared into the house, coming back with more bottles. Aiko accepted one, popped the top off, then wandered over and looked at the paper both girls were staring fixedly at. She whistled softly.

"Wow. Perhaps I was a little hasty telling you to hold out."

"Oh, now you tell me," Akane snapped in a whisper, shaking with adrenaline. Aiko giggled.

"Don't worry, people here expect you to negotiate. I'm sure you could have pushed him higher, but there's no need to be greedy." She grinned at the youngest Tendo, patted her on the shoulder, then went over to help Richard set up the barbecue. Shampoo finally managed to turn her eyes away from the paper to her friend.

"Akane?"

"Yes?"

"Is this real?"

"I think so. Does it feel real?"

"I'm not sure. I can't feel my legs. Is that normal?"

"No idea." There was a pause. "Shampoo?"

"Yes?"

"Am I reading that number right?"

"Yes."

"That's a lot of zeros."

"It is." There was another pause. "Every month?"

"That's what he said."

"Fucking hell."

"Yes."

They stopped talking, simply staring at each other. Finally, after a long time, Akane very slowly picked the paper up, folded it twice, then looked at it, before handing it to her friend. "Put that away very carefully." Her hand was shaking. The Amazon took it and made it vanish.

"Akane?"
"Yes?"

"I still can't feel my legs. Can you get me a beer, please?"

"OK." She got up and staggered over to Richard, who handed her two beers, grinning.

"How much did he offer, if you don't mind me asking?" The Tendo woman looked at him, then motioned for him to bend down. She whispered into his ear, before taking the bottles back to the table and collapsing into her chair, absent-mindedly popping the tops off both bottles at the same time and handing one to Shampoo, who took it and drained it in one long motion. She did the same. Aiko watched with a grin. Turning to her, slightly pale, Richard said quietly, "That's more than I make in two years. Every month."

"It is quite a lot of money. Hollywood seems well off." The magical girl seemed very pleased. "Good for them."

"Good grief." He looked at the women at the table who were staring into space, with some of the oddest expressions he'd seen for a while, then smiled. "Yes, good for them."

"Hey, Richard, did your friend Jim bring any of that hot sauce of his?" He looked at Aiko, then grinned.

"Yep. It's in the fridge. Could you get it and the burgers as well, please?" She nodded and disappeared into the house. Firing up the barbecue he fiddled with it for a while, until he was satisfied everything was working correctly, then picked up up his own beer and sipped it, moving to sit beside his wife. She was watching their daughter, who, with Sophie, was moving the archery target back into it's original position. The two girls were laughing together, glancing at Akane and Shampoo every now and then with curiosity.

Emily looked over at them for a moment, concern on her face. "They seem a little shaken."

"I think they just had a major change in their life status, if you want to put it like that." Richard laughed quietly. "It would be a shock. I'm sure they'll get used to it." He snickered, drinking more beer, while his wife looked at him in exasperation.

"One day you'll explain why that phrase is so funny to you, I hope."

"One day." He grinned at her.

"Make sure you tell him about your friend's wedding, and anything else you don't want to miss. They'll need to know to build it into their plans." Aiko looked at Akane, who nodded, still looking slightly stunned two hours after the end of the meeting. "Give him your contact details as well before you forget." She handed the girl a notebook and pen, watching as she wrote her details down, including email address and cell phone number. Tearing the page out she handed the notebook and pen back with muttered thanks. "Cheer up, Akane, it's a wonderful thing," Aiko said, nudging her, then took a bite out of her latest burger.

"I know, but it's like a dream still." The youngest Tendo looked at Shampoo, who was explaining something to Serena and Sophie, both of them looking very interested. "I wanted to be in the movies when I was young, then everything went wrong. For years, I was kind of living a nightmare. I did some horrible things that ended up nearly tearing the family apart." She sighed. "No, it did tear the family apart. I lost my sister, and the man I could have married. It wasn't entirely my fault, I can see that now, everyone helped, but it was mostly me. And those horrible little parasites making me worse than I would otherwise have been." She looked at the brunette who was listening sympathetically.

"Then, after I nearly made everything even worse, I completely accidentally bumped into Yori, and everyone else. Because of that, you all fixed me and have helped me become a much better person, and now all this? How the hell did I end up here? It doesn't make any sense."

"Perhaps someone decided you'd had enough of a hard time and deserved something nice?" Aiko asked, grinning slightly. Akane giggled.

"If so I owe them thanks. And all of you." Glancing at the magical girl beside her, she smiled. "Thank you so much for all your help. I wouldn't have know what to do earlier."

"Not a problem, Akane. It's been fun, and it gave me an excuse to see some friends again. We all tend to see pretty horrible or at least really annoying things in our line of work, so it's nice to be able to help a friend with something simple, that doesn't involve hitting something very hard indeed."

"The others will be sorry they missed this, but we couldn't really leave Minato all at once. With Yori away it's prone to... oddities."

"When will she be back?" Akane asked.

"About two, maybe three weeks or so. I'm sure she'll come by to say hello and see how you got on."

The blue-haired woman smiled. "I'd like that. I want to thank her."

"I'll tell her next time I see her." Stuffing the remains of the burger in her mouth, Aiko chewed, making Akane giggle. She raised an eyebrow but swallowed. "Richard does make very good burgers, and his friend's hot sauce is very nice. Misaki will be annoyed she missed out on it, she used half a bottle last time." Akane shivered a little, remembering what had happened when she tried some.

"It's kind of... incredibly painful," she replied. Aiko shrugged.

"I like it. We have a high pain threshold." Smiling at the other woman, she stood up. "Really, Akane, you and Shampoo both did very well. I'm looking forward to seeing your first movie."

Heading back to the barbecue to see if there was any food left, she grinned to herself, while behind her Akane stared up at the sky, thinking about how suddenly things changed sometimes.

At the barbecue, Richard smiled at the magical girl, looking beyond her to the young woman with the blue hair, then to the Amazon showing his daughter something dangerous involving a steak knife. "They seem to have recovered," he commented as she walked up, putting the last two burgers on the grill.

"More or less," she agreed, glancing over her shoulder. "Akane is having a bit of trouble with it, I think. Shampoo got over it first, but she still keeps stopping and staring at Adrian every now and then with a weird expression." She giggled. "It's funny, they're both a bit older than I am, but I think I have a lot more life experience in a lot of ways. Shampoo is an excellent warrior, she's been training since she was young to fight, but working in Hollywood?" She shook her head. "Kind of out of her normal comfort zone. Akane has, in many ways, had quite a sheltered upbringing, I think, which made all this come as something of a shock."

Richard glanced at her, flipping the burgers over. "You lot certainly haven't had a sheltered upbringing," he said. She shook her head, bending down and retrieving two beers, holding one up. He nodded. Popping off the tops she handed him one.
"No. Certainly not for a long time. We ended up in this job from a pretty young age, Yori more than any of us. You see some pretty unpleasant things, it takes the shine off very fast."

"Same when you become a cop. You'd like to believe life was all nice and happy, but you quickly find out that a lot of it isn't like that at all. Hopefully you manage to keep that part away from people who can't handle it." He sighed a little, as did the woman. "Oh well."

"Yep." They clinked their bottles together and drank from them.

Looking at her again, he asked, "Why the clothing change?" She grinned.

"That original uniform wasn't very practical in most ways, except for a really hot day at the beach, but we were stuck with it. The original magic we use had it built in. Chou finally worked out how to edit that part out. She also made these for us." Aiko looked down at herself, brushing at a small stain. "Damn. Burger relish." Richard laughed. Smiling, she added, "I've got several sets."

Handing her one of the burgers in a bun, he took the other one. They added condiments and sat down, watching everyone wandering around and talking. "Good party, Richard. Thanks for arranging it."

"You're welcome." He glanced at her. "Laura told me about Halleckton. It sounded very bad." She nodded, putting the food down for a moment.

"It was... horrible. Beyond anything I've ever experienced before, or want to again. All those poor people." He studied her expression for a moment.

"You did everything you could possibly have done."

"I know. I still wish we could have done more." She sighed a little, then shrugged. "It'll bother me for a long time."

"I'm not surprised. It bothers me and I wasn't even there." He drank some more beer. "I saw the photos and read the reports, though. Absolutely appalling. At least that bastard Murray is going to go away forever absent a major miracle. The Canadians are not at all vindictive but they're going to fuck him right up." She nodded, smiling slightly.

"Very true. There are a lot of extremely angry people in Canada." She giggled a little, picking her plate up again. "Mind you, none of them were as angry as Yori was. It was terrifying and she's one of my best friends. You should have seen what she did to that bastard's mansion."

"You can see the hole from space," Richard chuckled. "Now that's a duck pond." They both laughed. "So where did they go for a holiday?" he asked curiously. She looked at him with a grin.

"Through a portal." He choked a little on the burger he'd just bitten into.

"Through a portal!?" he asked when he managed to swallow. She nodded, amused.

"Yes."

"Don't demons come through portals?"

"Oh, yes. But quite a lot of them are very nice people." She laughed at his expression. "Admittedly the one you met couldn't be described like that.""Not even slightly," he muttered, remembering. "Not nice, and not people. Horrible homicidal
"Very true. That type is unpleasant. But a lot of the worlds on the other side of a portal are a lot of fun and very interesting. I've only been to a couple, once or twice, but it's fascinating. Especially if you like science fiction and fantasy books." He looked puzzled. "We're not the only intelligent species around, or the most advanced," she added.

"So, what, they're like something from Star Trek?" He smiled. "Spaceships and aliens, that sort of thing?" She looked steadily at him, finishing off her beer. His smile slowly slipped.

"Not a million miles away from that in some cases." She giggled a little. "One day maybe you'll see for yourself. It's very interesting. I'll be joining them in about ten days or so, I'm looking forward to my first trip into space." Standing, she grinned, then headed off to talk to his wife, while he stared after her in amazement.

Nodoka looked up from her book as she heard the front door open. Shortly after that, Akane and Shampoo walked in, with Aiko behind them. The first two women looked tired but happy, while Aiko was smiling slightly. "Did it go well?" she asked, putting her book down. The youngest sister looked at her for a long moment, then laughed hysterically. Her father came down the stairs, looking at her curiously.

"Um, yes, I suppose you could say that," she finally managed. Shaking her head she sat down, Shampoo collapsing beside her.

"I'd better be going," Aiko said, looking around the room with a smile. "Good luck, Akane. You have my number, call me when you need a lift again." The blue-haired woman raised a hand and waved, a tired grin on her face.

"Thanks, Aiko. Give my best to the others."

"I will." Nodding to Soun, she left through the door into the yard, closing it behind her. She waited.

"HOW MUCH?"

Giggling, she vanished.
"You're certain?"

"Yes. Unfortunately, there's no doubt."

There was a long silence. "I see."

"You know the options. Which would you like to try?"

Another handful of seconds ticked slowly past. "I'll need to think about it."

"Don't think too long, please. There is a limited window of opportunity."

The pause this time went on for nearly a minute.

"Thank you."

"I'm sorry."

"It's not your fault, but I appreciate the thought."

The person remaining in the room watched the door close with a quiet click, then sighed softly, closing the folder on the desk and getting up to put it away.

Nabiki turned as she heard the door open, admitting the form of her elder sister in her 'Chou' aspect, reverting to normal as she entered. Grinning, she waved out the window of her room in the suite they'd booked. "This place is amazing," she said happily. The elder woman nodded with a smile, moving to stand beside her, both of them looking at the view. "So many people, and things, and things that are also people." Leaning over the edge of the opened window, feeling the slight resistance of the force field that she'd found would stop anything going more than half a metre or so outside the opening, she looked straight down some two kilometres to the ground, which wasn't actually the surface, only the top of the next level of buildings. Apparently it went down another kilometre before one would find actual earth, then in some places two more kilometres below that.

"I don't know I'd want to live here, but it's one hell of a place to visit. Jun says this city has over one hundred and thirty million permanent residents and about half that again transients. It's absolutely enormous! Five times the area of Tokyo and god knows how many different levels." She twisted around to look up the tower they were in, shaking her head in amazement. "There's at least as much above us as below." She stared at the large number of flying vehicles, much less like the cars she'd seen on the first world they visited and more like something from a good movie, moving around outside at several different altitudes, clearly following some sort of traffic rules.

"The lower gravity helps a lot, I believe. Because the planet is very low density, it's actually a bit larger than Earth, but has only about seventy percent the gravity, so the atmosphere is even deeper than Fwetna's, which means the buildings don't need to be sealed and pressurised even that far up, just heated. And of course it's possible to build them higher as well. I think the record is something like ten kilometres or so. Wind is the biggest problem, apparently." Kasumi jumped gently, dropping down again noticeably more slowly than Nabiki's mind found normal, making her grin.

"That really looks weird." She did the same, giggling. "I just can't quite get over it. Uthryyl's home is so... normal. This is kind of a shock, but in a good way. It's a lot more like what I would have expected from an alien planet, although I'm still amazed how normal the people are after you get over what they look like."

Kasumi laughed gently. "It's a little surprising when you first meet them, true, but most of them are like people everywhere, just people. Two metre tall insect-like people, I'll admit, but still people."

"They're certainly polite and efficient. I've never had service this good in a hotel back home."

Walking over to the table in the centre of the room, the middle sister picked up another item from the plate on it, looking at it curiously. "I still don't know what this stuff it, but it's damn tasty."

Kasumi glanced at it, then giggled. "Don't ask. Just eat it." Nabiki stopped with the blue spiky thing half-way to her mouth, staring at her sister. After a long moment Kasumi grinned. "It's a vegetable root, a bit like an onion. They flash-fry them somehow, then season them with spices. It's fine." Slightly nervously, the middle Tendo popped the snack in her mouth and chewed, savouring the taste, before swallowing.

Her sister slyly added, "Just don't think about where the spices come from..."

"Kasumi! Stop that." Nabiki giggled, eating another one. Laughing, the older woman joined her, taking a couple and chewing them.

"I've finished warding the entire suite. It's not as strong as the one at home but it will suffice, we can't be observed, which is the main thing." She studied the other woman for a moment. "You're probably nearly at the point we can teach you the shielding techniques, perhaps in a couple of weeks. Full wards are a way off but I'll have to start you on the theory soon, practice will be later. There isn't much likelihood of there being any issues here, though, that require anything like that, so Ranma and I can easily deal with it. We're out of range of the house system now but we're powering the same spell for you for the time being." Nabiki nodded.

"That's what I was feeling," she said thoughtfully. "Or, rather, not feeling. I couldn't work it out. It's the first time in months that I can't feel the system sitting at the back of my head watching quietly." She concentrated for a moment. "Or can I?" Her sister looked at her with interest.

"Do you still feel it?"

"I'm... not sure. There's something really faint that might be it, but it might also be my imagination."

"The system did form a particularly deep link with you. I suppose it's possible you can still just contact it, but I very much doubt it could do much at this range." Kasumi looked mildly puzzled for a moment. "If range is the right word to use. Portal travel tends to mess up your vocabulary, distance is more of an idea than a real thing. In theory, everywhere is the same distance away through a portal, but in practice there are energy differences, sometimes temporal flow differences, which sort of substitute for distance." She shrugged. "Magic is, as many have pointed out, very strange."

"Temporal flow? You mean some places have weird time?" Nabiki was trying to wrap her mind around the concept.

"Again, not quite, but that's a more or less accurate way to describe it. The rate of the passage of time in different realities isn't necessarily a constant. It doesn't seem to be possible, or at least, not possible without huge energy input, to open a portal between realities that differ in temporal flow by more than about fifty percent. I suppose you could do it in stages, but it's not something I've ever really looked into. All the realities normal portals travel between in the, ah, local group, I suppose, have temporal flow rates within half a percent or so. Most are much closer than that. All the K'nn worlds, Fwetna, Earth, most of the ones I've been to, are the same to a very tiny amount indeed. You can measure it with the right equipment, apparently, but it's so small it's not worth bothering about."

"Weird." Nabiki suddenly remembered something she'd meant to ask. "While we're talking about portals, something I've wondered. Why don't people use portals to travel around in one reality?
Like teleportation." Her sister smiled, nodding with an expression of approval.

"Good question. I was wondering if you'd ask it. The short answer is that it's barely possible, but wildly inefficient. You get a feedback effect opening portals where the two ends are both in the same reality, which makes them incredibly unstable. It's just possible, but it takes so much energy and so much effort to keep them from popping that no one ever bothers. We've tried, out of curiosity, but it's simply not worth it except perhaps in a huge emergency. Teleportation is much easier. Or walking." She laughed as Nabiki grinned.

"How close are you to working out Aiko's teleportation method?"

Kasumi sighed a little. "Not as close as I'd like, it's difficult. The spell that powers it is very odd indeed. Vastly more efficient than anything else I've ever seen that does the same job and much more flexible. She's honed it to the point she can teleport basically anywhere without even thinking much about it, she just needs a vague idea of where she's going. That's amazing. Most teleportation spells will only go to a very specifically targeted area, like a portal will. Or you can go somewhere you've been before. Originally hers worked a bit like that but over the years she's gotten much better at using it. We want to copy this version, not the one she started with, which means we need to work out not only the original spell but all the little tweaks she's added without even knowing she was doing it, just by using it. Reverse engineering that mess is proving tediously annoying."

Nabiki nodded, understanding more or less what her sister meant. "Do you think you'll manage it?"

"Eventually, certainly. The portal spell was in some ways more difficult, and gave us a lot of practice in understanding complex spells. It will probably take a few more months though before we're at the point we can test it. Perhaps by Christmas, or just after."

"Give the gift of teleportation this Christmas?" The brunette laughed as her sister smiled. "Where is everyone else at the moment?" she asked, sitting on the bed and looking around the room once again, approvingly, before glancing at the older Tendo.

"Ranma and Uthryyl have gone to talk to a friend of his for a little while, he left a message for Uthryyl at reception, it sounded urgent. Quanynr and Onkra are in their room getting ready to go out later, they want to go up the old space elevator to the restaurant at the mid-point. It sounds like fun. We need to make the portal for Tamiko and Fumiko in about an hour, I've booked a slot in one of the transport rooms for then. Hopefully they'll be ready on time, we can't contact them until we open the portal. We'll have about an hour available, so we can make any calls or get messages then."

Kasumi thought for a moment, working out if there was anything else important, then ate another spiky blue snack. "After that, we've got three days here, then back to Fwetna for a couple of days, before on to K'nn nine. You'll like that one, it's a very pretty place with not many people. It's mostly automated plantations of various sorts in the lowlands, and recreation areas in the higher parts, with some of the most beautiful oceans I've ever seen. The water is a weird green colour, some sort of dissolved mineral, I think, and the sun is orange. The colours are amazing. And the ring system is incredible at night. You can even see it during the day."
"That last place was pretty damn impressive as well. I was wishing I'd brought some skis. All that snow." Nabiki smiled at the memory. "And that sky at night! I've never seen so many stars, they looked like they were practically on top of us. You could even make out all the different colours! I've only ever seen that in pictures from NASA or something." Her sister smiled, finishing the last of the snacks.

"It was very pretty. Uthryyl said it was good, he wasn't wrong. I'd like to go back there some time for longer."

"You'll have to teach me that ki heating trick if we do. I loved it but it was kind of cold."

Kasumi smiled. "I think you could probably learn it soon. It takes quite fine control of ki, but it's not too different from the soul of ice in some ways. When we get back I'll take everyone through the exercises, hopefully you can all get it with a few days practice."

"It's funny, when I was flying it seemed warmer." Nabiki shrugged a little, remembering the last world they'd been to for a couple of days. "It was still cold, but not so much it stopped me from enjoying myself. I'd have thought my wings would have frozen, they're so large with such thin skin, even with the fur."

"It's a very good insulator, and I copied parts of the soarer metabolism that regulate temperature, plus some similar things from other creatures I looked up. You probably didn't notice, but even on Fwetna, at the altitude you were a lot of the time, it was considerably colder than at ground level. The soarer world must be quite cold compared to there, they manage very well even at remarkable altitudes." Her sister looked pleased at the results of her design, as she thought back. She'd noticed the temperature drop, now that she thought about it she seemed to recall on Earth it was a little less than ten degrees per thousand metres on a clear day. She just hadn't thought much of it at the time, caught up in the sheer fun of flying.

"Good grief. That must mean it was about minus thirty or so when I was up at the highest point I reached." The middle sister looked quite shocked. "I didn't notice at all."

#Your flying form would appear to be quite functional in temperatures as low as minus fifty, Nabiki. I did not mention it at the time as it wasn't relevant, but I was monitoring your physical parameters to ensure you were operating within your safe area. You were not in danger at any point, or I would have brought the fact up.# Jun sounded slightly apologetic. #In future, if something similar occurs do you wish me to mention the fact?#

'Thanks for telling me. No, I trust you. Tell me if it's a problem, but I don't need to know if it's not, except out of interest.'

#Thank you, Nabiki. I don't want to overwhelm you with irrelevant information, especially when you are enjoying yourself, but I will make sure to notify you immediately should anything hazardous occur.# She got the impression the SI was feeling a little guilty, making her smile.

"No wonder my goggles fogged up a couple of times when I landed," she said. Kasumi nodded with a smile.

"Yes, that's a small problem. I have an idea for a modification to the form that would remove the need for them but I'm going to have to think about it for a little longer. It's slightly more complicated than I first thought, annoyingly."

Getting up, Nabiki walked over to the window again and looked out, smiling at the sight. "It kind of reminds me of the city in that movie 'Bladerunner', only cleaner, bigger, and not depressing."
Watching the huge variety of flying machines zip around, she added, "I don't think I want to try flying out there, though. Too much traffic."

Her sister was examining the ceiling, which was glowing gently and evenly with a light that was an almost exact replica of sunlight back on Earth, but nodded, laughing slightly. "It would be embarrassing to find yourself spread across the windscreen of someone's air-car like a big moth." She grinned.

"I'd imagine it would come as a shock to both of us," Nabiki agreed, laughing at the mental picture it conjured up. Lying down on the bed she looked around the room with interest, noticing that while very comfortable it wasn't quite as good as the ones in Uthryyl's guest rooms. "This place is pretty neat. Jun says all the rooms have full environmental control, including atmosphere, gravity, and light spectrum. This one is set for what the hotel decided was correct for humans, although it left the gravity off. Even all the furniture can be moved around and changed, it disappears into the floor when you're not using it. Just like something from a book."

Kasumi smiled at her, before walking over to the wall near the door and touching a display that was hovering a little way from the wall with nothing obviously producing it. With a flick of her finger, she turned the gravity down. "Whoa. That's freaky," the middle sister said, feeling herself suddenly become very light, even more so than she'd already felt. "What's that set to?"

Checking the display, her sister said, "About five percent earth normal. It will go to just above zero, and up to about two hundred percent. I think the limits are so you don't either end up floating in the middle of the room unable to reach anything, or crushed flat." She gently pushed off, bouncing all the way across the room in a very implausible way, making Nabiki giggle. Pressing her hands against the bed she floated up until she could put her feet on the ceiling, using no effort at all.

"I know we can all do this anyway, but it feels quite different," she said, laughing, as she tucked into a slow roll and gradually descended again.

"Low gravity is a lot of fun," the older woman agreed, taking slow giant steps across the room like something from video of the moon-walks, looking amused.

"I guess this place caters to a lot of people from very out of town," Nabiki mused, reaching the control panel and inspecting it closely. It was displaying icons with text in written Trade, which she was beginning to have some understanding of. Jun overlaid a translation into Kanji, making her nod.

'Thanks.'

'I can simply interface to the room controls, Nabiki, which would be more efficient,' the SI told her with mild amusement.

'True. Do that, then, please.' She giggled mentally. 'I still sometimes forget how easily you can do all this.'

'While much more advanced than your own world, the electronic systems on this one are still nowhere near what I would consider state of the art,' Jun said. 'I have the capacity to interface to and override any systems you are likely to encounter, should there be a reason to so do and given time to work on it. It is one of my main functions, at which I am very good.'

'Probably not polite to go around breaking into all their computers just for fun,' she laughed. 'I would imagine they have laws against it, anyway.'
Certainly they do, Jun replied, sounding smug, but as they would never detect the intrusion there is little chance of getting caught. But I understand your reticence. Breaking laws simply because you can is seldom a good idea.

Checking her sister was on the floor, she moved the local gravity control Jun had provided her on the internal copy of the room control panel with a small mental twitch, feeling herself get heavier. Pushing it all the way over she experimentally walked around in the doubled gravity now in the room, shrugging after a moment. "I can certainly tell the difference but it's not difficult."

"We are, after all, much stronger than most people," Kasumi said, smiling at her. "It would take something considerably higher than the gravity this system can produce to seriously inconvenience us, although I remember it needed a little experimentation to compensate for how much faster things fall under higher gravity." She pulled a pencil from ki space and let go of it, watching as it plummeted to the floor.

"That looks even more wrong than when it falls too slowly," Nabiki chuckled, dialling the gravity back to normal. "A room like this would be good for strength training, I would think."

"Indeed, although you'd have to be careful when you started not to fall and break something." Picking up her pencil and putting it away, Kasumi tried the bed, then got up again. "I prefer the ones Uthryyl has," she said, making the middle sister laugh.

"I was thinking the same thing. They're still pretty nice, though. I'll try turning the gravity down tonight and sleeping like that, I think." She glanced around again, frowning slightly. "Back home the room would have a TV or something."

There is a comprehensive video and audio projection suite built into the room, Nabiki. Would you like me to activate it? Curious, she told it to proceed.

"Wow. That's not bad." Suddenly, the walls of the room, and the ceiling, appeared to have vanished completely, leaving in their place an outside view as if everything else had gone transparent. She and Kasumi exchanged impressed glances, then inspected the display closely.

"I can barely see any trace of it not being real," her sister said, looking at one of the walls carefully, running her hand over it. "It's not as good as what the SI can produce but I suppose at least this one other people can see."

I can transfer video or still images to the projection system if you would like to experiment, or there is a very large library of files available in the hotel system. This is a live view from cameras on the outside of the building.

'Is there anything like TV or news available?' Nabiki asked with interest.

'Not right now, thanks, but I'll look later.' She thought for a moment, then send one of the recordings she'd made above Uthryyl's house to the room projector, grinning as suddenly she was at the viewpoint of the camera drone she'd been using, seeing herself in the distance on one wall of the room, plummeting towards the ground, followed by the two soarers behind her. The images were completely convincing and three dimensional, as if she was looking out a window.

"That's very impressive," Kasumi said approvingly.

"Damn right. I need to get one of these as well, I think." Nabiki watched the recording play, laughing at the expression on Onkra's face, caught by the camera, as she dived out of the way. "I wonder how much they are? And how portable?"

"We can find out later, there are several places with very large shopping areas quite close to here according to Nao." Kasumi watched the replay with interest, giggling. "You really did rather take us by surprise with your friends there."

"I wonder if they're still waiting for us?" Nabiki said, grinning. "I still can't believe they got so friendly, so fast. It was kind of weird."

"You clearly have some sort of sinister power over lower life forms," her sister replied, glancing at her with a teasing grin.

"I could build an entire army of them, in that case. Just imagine, so many soarers their wings darkened the sky, with me at their head as their leader!" Nabiki stood in the middle of the room in a heroic pose, hands on her hips, shimmering into her flying Tendo form with her wings half extended and staring upwards, a calm expression on her face, then as Kasumi fell over laughing, started giggling herself.

"Sorry, you're clearly a bad influence on my sanity," she said, collapsing onto the bed beside her sister, reverting to normal in the process. "I think being the soarer queen would be a little too weird even for me." Her older sister began laughing all over again at this. "But I'm still quite curious why those two suddenly decided to be friends with me."

"I expect they're simply rather intelligent and very curious. Seeing you flying without artificial aids must have made them a little puzzled, and you wouldn't have smelled like a D'sage, which might have made them less wary in the first place. Once they found out how much fun you were to play with they just got used to it." Kasumi grinned at her. "We'll have to make sure they don't try to follow us home if they come back. It would be fun but I don't think the middle of Minato is the right place for them."

"They could live on the roof and eat cats," Nabiki suggested, looking darkly amused. "Ranma would probably quite like that idea."

"The owners of the cats, and I would expect the cats themselves, might not be so happy about it." Her sister stood, giggling a little still, then turned off the room projection. "But we may have trouble persuading Misaki not to take one home. You know what she's like."

"If we come across any flying crocodiles we'll have to tie her up," Nabiki agreed, chuckling. "She's still a little annoyed we couldn't get one in Australia and put it in the pool." She shook her head. "I hope she never meets Kodachi..."

Both sisters looked at each other at that disturbing thought, then shook it off. "We should probably head down to the transport section," the elder Tendo said after a moment. "By the time we get there the others should be waiting for us."

"Don't you need Ranma to help open the portal?", Nabiki asked, becoming 'Azumi' as they headed towards the door. Her sister, now 'Chou', shook her head.

"No, I can do it myself now. Our spell modifications have reduced the energy requirements to the point one of us can run it, although it's still smoother with two. Actually, the total energy was never the problem, it doesn't need much, but the level of complexity of controlling it was... very significant. We've managed to simplify it somewhat over the last few months, making it more efficient in the process, and of course we've both had a lot of practice working it by this point." Having left the room they arrived at the device this world seemed to use in place of an elevator, which was basically a vertical tube with some sort of controlled gravity field in it. 'Chou' simply walked into empty space, turning around as if she was standing on something solid, then waited for her sister, who watched with a grin.

"This is also a very weird thing. Sometimes, seeing all these alien gadgets, I start to wonder if half the science fiction authors back home are actually from somewhere like this and just writing a novel about their normal life." She followed her sister, laughing. 'Chou' told the machine where to take them and they started down. "So why do we have to go to a specific place to open the portal home," she asked curiously.

"It's basically one of the rules here. They don't like random portals opening just anywhere, for security purposes. They're almost entirely a technological society, very little magic is used outside portal operation, some warding, mostly against portals, and certain types of healing." 'Chou' shrugged a little. "From what I know they're very poor at magic control. There aren't a lot of native mages around, and the ones that are, aren't anywhere near up to what we have at home, or the D'sage do. They hire them in. Actually they're probably the largest employer of mages around, since they're dependent on portals to connect to some of their worlds, they keep quite a few open permanently with the mages working in shifts."

"I guess it pays well, then."

"Oh, yes, very well indeed. It comes with some fairly significant contracts, though, as they don't want their mages deciding to just suddenly leave for somewhere better. I think they normally sign on for something like ten years at a time. But they can earn more credit in that ten years than they could anywhere else in fifty. Since mages tend to live a long time, it's not uncommon for them to spend ten or twenty years building up a nest egg here, they can live on it for the next hundred years."

'Azumi' nodded slowly. "I can see where that would be a good idea. Do any of them come from home?"

'Chou' frowned slightly. "I'm really not sure. You certainly do meet human mages in the demon worlds sometimes, but not so much in the K'nn grouping. I'm not sure why, to be honest, they're very nice people and their worlds are mostly very interesting and hospitable. But human mages seem to stick mainly to the magic only or magic-technological hybrid worlds in the majority of cases. There aren't all that many who can even make portals in the first place, not to mention the fact that it normally takes three or more anyway." She sighed a bit. "It's a little depressing how many people back home think that portals are only for spewing out horrible demons. Not many human mages outside Minato do much portal travel, most of them seem scared of it."

"I don't know why, so far it's huge fun," her sister said, grinning.

"Yes, but as you've said on numerous occasions, we're all insane!" The elder Tendo laughed, as they stopped on their desired level. "Come on, it's just down here on the left. We've got about five minutes before the scheduled time. As soon as they drop the wards we can open the portal. I'll leave it open until our slot is up, so if you want to make any calls to anyone, you'll have about an hour."

"I wonder how Akane got on?" 'Azumi' asked. "I hope it all worked out for her. That was a wonderful idea your crazy husband had."

"It was. Apparently, my dearest thought of it the moment they got those cards. Akane's birthday was a nice time to do it, but it was only possible because she's so much better nowadays." She smiled gently to herself. "Such a nice thing to do. And after having so much trouble for so long with our sister."

"It's funny, I remember how keen she was on school plays and the like all that time ago, but for a while I was wondering if she'd just told herself is was something she wanted to do, possibly because it was something she was unlikely to be able to do."

The elder woman shook her head. "I don't think so. Even when she was very young she talked about acting one day. You were probably too young to remember, but she went through a phase of dressing up in all sorts of ridiculous costumes and putting on silly voices." 'Chou' grinned slightly.
"It was very funny. She'd mix up mother's and father's clothes, put on some very strange makeup, and do little plays she'd come up with." 'Azumi' laughed.

"I wish we had some video of that. Or photos. It sounds very funny."

"Oh, it was. I think I might have a couple of photos mother took, somewhere. I'll see if I can find them when we get back. But you must never show them to our sister." They looked at each other and giggled. "I think this acting thing really is something she wants to do. I hope she gets her chance. Even the stunt work would be wonderful, I have no doubt she'd be very good at indeed."

"I'd think this director would be thrilled to get his hands on a damn near indestructible, good looking, incredibly good female martial artist."

"He'd have paid all of us anything we asked, I think, if we'd wanted to work for him," 'Chou' laughed. "You should have seen the look on his face, and his friend Jim's. They were... quite surprised."

Entering a large round room, some fifteen metres across, with a highly polished floor, 'Chou' glanced at the door which slid shut. 'Azumi' could feel a set of wards go up. "Good security," her sister commented. "Those wards are quite well done, they'd block most things from getting out."

"Would they stop you or Yori?" 'Azumi' asked with a grin. Her sister snorted delicately.

"Of course not. Don't be silly." With a quick grin she walked to the centre of the room, then concentrated. After somewhat longer than normal, the familiar sight of an open portal hung in the air next to her. 'Azumi' immediately felt the ward system reconnect fully, seeming to inspect her a little anxiously before it decided she was all right and went back to watching.

"Hi, right on time," Tamiko's cheery voice came over the comm. "Hang on, we're just talking to Aiko and Misaki, we'll be through in a second, they've got to go deal with something." Shortly afterwards the tear in space disgorged the auburn-haired girl and Fumiko, who looked around quickly then grinned at their friends. "Hi, guys. Where's everyone else?"

"Uthryyl and Yori are at a friend of Uthryyl's place, he needed something but I'm not sure what.
Onkra and Quannyr are upstairs. They told me just now they'd found the waterpark and were going to meet us there." 'Azumi' glanced at her sister, surprised.

"What about this restaurant?"

"That's later. They wanted to get some swimming in, the last place was a bit cold for that." 'Chou' smiled.

"It was that, certainly. Not to mention the fact you'd have had a lot of work even getting at the water through the ice in the first place." The two new arrivals exchanged looks.

"Clearly we've missed something interesting," Fumiko commented with a grin. 'Azumi' laughed.
"Oh, many things, some of which are a lot of fun." She casually took on her flying form, making them both gape as she spread her wings fully. Fumiko stared for a moment, then looked at 'Chou' who was smiling serenely.

"Gimme!" They all laughed. "Seriously, I want it. Gimme."

"I've got presets designed for all of you, don't worry." 'Chou smiled at them. "There's nowhere around here to fly, unfortunately, the sky is a bit busy, but as soon as we go back to Fwetna in a few days you can do all the flying you want." Tamiko moved closer to her friend, inspecting her closely, then felt one wing, running her hands over the fur.

"So soft," she said, smiling. "And that colour is amazing. Is it based on something specific? I don't recognise it."

'Azumi' sent her an image of one of the soarers. "Sis used one of these as the basis for a lot of the work, although it's not a direct copy." She giggled. "They're loads of fun. Two of them at Uthryyl's house seem to have adopted me." She folded her wings away, as her friends watched. "Flying is so much fun. You're going to love it. It's even better than swimming."

Fumiko was staring at her with clear envy. She sighed. "Now I want that more than I want anything," she said, sounding annoyed and amused at the same time. 'Chou' laughed a little.

"Don't worry, you'll have it very soon. Think of a colour scheme in the mean time." She looked at her sister. "We're covered, show her the other one." Flying 'Azumi' became flying Nabiki.

"Oh, wow, that's really nice," Tamiko giggled. "I love the stripes."

"It's good, isn't it?" Fumiko sighed heavily, making Nabiki reach a wing out and poke her. "Cheer up. Only three more days and you'll be flying with me and some friends." The other woman nodded, then looked intrigued.

"What friends?" Sending her and Tamiko the recording they'd been watching in her room, Nabiki grinned at the expression on her face a few seconds later. "Good grief. How did you train them to do that?" she asked curiously. 'Chou' snickered a little.

"I'm not sure who trained who."

Glancing at her with a smile, Nabiki added, "They started following me around all by themselves and just kind of showed me all sorts of flight manoeuvres. I came up with some and showed them as well. They learn really fast."

"If Misaki sees them she'll want one in the living room," Fumiko said, giggling. 'Chou' and her sister exchanged a glance, smiling.

"Yes, we've already discussed that," the blonde said. "I have no doubt that those two would happily follow Nabiki home, but I'm not at all sure it would work out well. Minato is bad enough with magical girls chasing real demons, never mind curious soarers added to the mix. It would be absolute chaos."

Fumiko exchanged a look with Tamiko, both seeming slightly worried and mildly guilty. 'Chou' watched them, then got a suspicious look. "What happened?" she asked slowly.

"Um... We kind of had an... incident." Fumiko sighed nervously. "With Ami's friends." Closing her eyes briefly with an expression of pain, 'Chou' nodded.
"All right. Did you resolve it?"

"Yes. It was... very annoying, and I'm afraid it will be a fairly large hit to the fund. There was quite a lot of damage. But it's mostly fixed now." Fumiko watched her friend's face anxiously.

"Who was involved?"

"The usual suspects. Ami tried to stop it, to give her all due credit, but the other four were worked up and just wouldn't stop. It was all over one small demon, you remember Xrist?"

"Yes, he's harmless, but a total coffee addict," Chou' said with a long-suffering sigh. "Let me guess, he came through a portal looking for an espresso and they jumped him?"

"It was a cappuccino, but otherwise you're right. He came charging into your area looking for Yori to save him from the horrible magical girls, he didn't know you guys were away. They followed him. By the time we got there they'd already smashed half a dozen cars and a building trying to hit him. He's damn quick, I'll give him that, and they're mostly lousy shots. Lots of power, though." Fumiko looked unimpressed. "I told them to pack it in and go home, that mouthy blonde told me to fuck off, then the other one took a shot at Misaki. That didn't end well."

Tamiko giggled. "Misaki punted her all the way down the street. You should have heard her swearing like a sailor. Came charging back ready for a fight, I got in the way, the next thing I knew she's nearly totallyled Mr Singh's curry place. I had to shut her down good and hard. Those pressure point methods work very well, although I had to dump a lot of ki into it to get the bitch to stay down." She shrugged a little. "Might have overdone it a bit, she was wobbling around a lot when she finally came around."

"Serves her right," Fumiko muttered. "Anyway, after that, we lost patience, smacked them down hard, then read them the riot act, so to speak. I was channelling Yori very hard." The tall girl smiled a little tightly. ", They argued a little, but some ki shots took care of that, and some more yelling. Yori is a lot better at it than I am but I think I finally got the point across. Afterwards, we made them clear up, which at least amused the residents. Quite a few were watching and taking pictures." She grinned. "I won five hundred yen betting on which of them would be the first to start crying."

"Chou' sighed, but smiled a little. "What was Ami doing during all this?"

"She was amazingly pissed off about it all. I think she's right on the edge with them, to tell the truth. It's a shame, they started out so well in many ways, but they've certainly lost their edge in the last eighteen months or so. She's the only one other than that younger girl they have who seems to have a clue about how to treat other people. At least the other ones are smart enough to stay away now. After what Yori did to them the time they all turned up, I'm not surprised." Fumiko shrugged, looking disgusted. "They were really looking at poor Ami like she'd betrayed them, but in most ways I'd say it was the other way around."

"Oh dear. Poor girl. I know how much she hates that sort of thing," 'Chou' murmured. "I'll have to talk to her when we get back, see how she's feeling."

Fumiko nodded understandingly. "Well, she helped us deal with her friends, which was interesting. Got the brunette right in the face with that freezing spray attack of hers, didn't even bother with that stupid wind-up they seem to do all the time. Took her completely by surprise, I'm not even sure she knew who did it. It was quite effective. With some real combat training that girl would be very good. Better than most of her friends, certainly, in my opinion."
"When they were cleaning up we had a nice long lunch and kept an eye on them, and talked to Ami. She's a very intelligent young woman." Tamiko glanced at Nabiki, who was listening with interest. "She reminds me a lot of you, to be honest. Not the most powerful, but the smartest of the entire lot, and very good at learning things." She turned back to her friend and mentor, a troubled expression crossing her face. "She said some rather odd things, though. Only hints, but I have a feeling there's something about their story that's somehow very wrong. I think we may need to investigate it at some point."

"Wrong how?" Nabiki asked curiously. Tamiko looked puzzled.

"I'm not sure. Just... wrong. She didn't go into details, and we didn't push, they're her secrets after all, but something about what she said just didn't make sense when taken all together." The auburn-haired woman shook her head slowly. "I'm not sure," she repeated. "I'll send you the recordings, have a look and see what you think."

'Chou' thought for a moment, then turned to Fumiko. "It sounds like it couldn't be helped. Thank you for dealing with it. It's probably best if you give me all the recordings and let me tell Ranma, though. He's going to be... very irritated."

"Sorry. I don't want to ruin the holiday." Fumiko looked apologetic.

"You haven't, it's just a minor problem in the overall scheme of things. We half-expected it, to be honest, although not necessarily from them." The tall blonde giggled. "You know how strange Minato is at the best of times." The others all nodded, grinning.

"What happened about Akane and that director?" Nabiki asked, now that Fumiko had finished her report. The two other women looked at each other with grins.

"It went very well. I've got Aiko's recordings, but perhaps you should call Akane and ask her before you see them," Tamiko told her, an odd look of amusement on her face. After a moment, Nabiki did so, including her older sister in the audio feed.

"Hi, Nabiki!" Her younger sister sounded very pleased to hear her. "I'm glad you called, I've been trying to get hold of you for several days. Thanks for the present, the timing was amazing. I used it in LA."

"How did it go, sis?" Nabiki asked. There was a short pause.

"Better than I could ever have hoped." Akane laughed. "They were very nice, and Aiko was wonderful, she helped so much. I owe her, and Yori, a huge amount. She took me and Shampoo to LA, arranged everything with the director, he's a nice man called Adrian Stewart, and we even had a barbecue at the house of a friend of hers, an LAPD officer. Lieutenant Richard Harrison. He and his wife and daughter are really nice people as well."

"So what happened? Did you show them what you could do? And how did Shampoo do? Is she interested in a job in Hollywood as well?" Nabiki was very curious as well as pleased.

"Yes, we both did. We had a sort of a job interview beforehand, we both told them about ourselves, what we did, how long we'd been doing it, that sort of thing. Shampoo even showed them her curse. I thought that Matt, the stunt director man, was going to faint when he saw that!" She giggled. "His face was amazing. Shampoo showed some incredible archery skills, she's fantastically good, then I did some strength exercises with blocks and a wooden post. Shampoo shredded what was left with a sword Aiko gave her. After that we sparred, then did some staff work, then bokkens. That was fun, we were running around on the garden fence and the roof of Richard's house. They seemed to like it.

Nabiki laughed softly. Her sisters voice was more excited than she'd heard in years, she'd clearly had a good time.

"Shampoo is getting really interested as well. I asked her to come for moral support as much as anything, but I was hoping they'd like her. How couldn't they, she's much better than I am."

"Don't sell yourself short, sis, you're still very good and getting better all the time." Akane was quiet for a moment.

"Thanks, Biki. Anyway, in the end they went and had a private meeting, then came back and Adrian said he wanted to work with us more than anything ever. He really seemed to mean it as well. He looked like a kid with an ice-cream." She giggled again, as Nabiki grinned. "He told us what the process was, which sounds very complicated, then said he was going to make sure we were hired one way or another." She went silent for a moment, then added, "He also said what the amount he was thinking of starting us on was. It was a lot. But Aiko told me not to accept the first offer, she kept giving me little signs to go higher. I was terrified, I thought it would wreck everything, but he seemed fine with it and kept raising the figure."

Slightly apprehensively, when her sister stopped talking again, Nabiki asked, "So what was the final amount?" There was a very long pause, then Akane mentioned a figure in a small voice. A large figure. A very large figure. Nabiki almost stopped breathing.

"How much?"

Akane said it again. "In US dollars. Per month. Each." This time it was Nabiki's turn to be silent for a fair while.

"Holy shit. Well done, sis. Well done indeed. You'll earn more in a year than I have in my life." She glanced at 'Chou', who was looking both slightly shocked and very proud. "What's the next step?"

"Well, Adrian is talking to the studio to persuade them it's a good idea to take on two unknown female stunt people from Japan, which is something they apparently need quite a lot of persuading about. He called last night, though, and said it's going well. They want to see both of us again in about two weeks or so. That will probably be for two or three days. Aiko has offered to take us back and forth when we need it, but she'll be away for a week in about a week, so it's good that they're being a little slow. He seems very pleased with the progress so far, even so."

"Not bad at all." Nabiki was extremely pleased for her younger sister, as she could clearly see her older one was. "What about Shampoo? How's she taking all of this? For that matter, how did Cologne?"

Akane giggled happily. "When we told the Elder how much we'd been offered, she fell off her stick." Nabiki started laughing helplessly. "It was very funny. I've never really seen her surprised before. But she's being very supportive. I think she's very pleased for both of us. She's given us quite a bit of advice, she actually turns out to know quite a lot about money. When you get back I want to go over things with you as well, you know a lot more about this sort of thing than any of us. She told me to, in fact, she seems to respect your abilities quite a lot." Somewhat surprised, Nabiki smiled to herself.

"As I respect hers. It's kind of funny, who'd have thought years ago we'd all have ended up more or less friends."
"I know. But she genuinely speaks of you as someone she thinks knows her stuff. Shampoo is getting as excited as I am. I don't know if she really wants to do acting in the long term, although I think she'd be good at it, but she certainly seems interested in the idea of stunt work and fight scenes. So am I. Even if it never goes further than that, I'll be happy. And while I'm kind of scared about moving to the US, I'm starting to look forward to it as well."

"Don't be scared, sis. Think of it as an opportunity to travel, meet new people, and get paid a hell of a lot of money to do something you'll enjoy." Nabiki laughed, happy for her sister. "I just make sure you remember your family and friends and come and visit often. And don't let it go to your head. Overconfidence is the worst trap for someone who suddenly finds themselves in a situation they didn't look for like this."

She could almost hear her sister smiling. "I know, Biki, and I'll be careful. Cologne said the same thing, and so did Dad. Even Genma told me he was proud of me. They both want to keep teaching both Shampoo and me more of the Anything Goes techniques, and Cologne wants to continue teaching the Amazon ones. I'll be coming back a lot. I don't know how long Aiko will be OK with jumping us around, but when she's had enough there are old-fashioned airplanes." Snickering, Nabiki listened with pleasure.

"It sounds like your life is finally coming together, sis."

"I know. It's so weird. I have no idea what I've done to deserve all this good fortune all of a sudden, but I'm incredibly grateful for it. I'd even thank Ms Aoyama at this point and she scares the crap out of me." She laughed a little. "Not that I'm likely to run into her in LA."

Nabiki glanced at 'Chou', raising one eyebrow in an amused manner, making her sister look at her and sigh. "Be good," she mouthed, as both Tamiko and Fumiko smiled.

"Probably not, but you never know. OK, sis, I'm going to have to go, but I really am incredibly pleased for you. We'll talk more when I get back, all right? If I can get network access before then we can talk again, but I can't guarantee it."

"That's fine, Biki. Have a fantastic holiday, give my best to Maiko and Rika. I'll see you in a couple of weeks." Smiling, Nabiki disconnected the call, then looked at her older sister.

"Holy crap. That's a lot of money."

"It is a rather substantial amount," 'Chou' agreed, looking impressed and pleased. "Well done, little sister. I hope it all works out for you." She looked sad for a moment. "I wish I could tell her that to her face."

"Keep smiling, I'm sure it will work out eventually." Tamiko tried to cheer them both up. "I know how long it's taken to get this far, but things seem to be speeding along now. She's pretty much normal, at least for Nerima, she's almost certainly going to end up a big star in Hollywood, and from what I can see the possibility of you guys coming clean to one degree or another is getting much stronger pretty fast." 'Chou' glanced at her, then nodded, smiling slightly.

"Yes, you're right. Thank you. All right, I just need to make a few short calls to check on a few things, then we can go. We've only got about another thirty minutes booked, Nabiki, so if you want to call anyone else now would be the time."

"OK." After a moment's thought, Nabiki called her father. "Hi Dad. I just wanted to quickly call and let you know everything is fine. We're all having a lot of fun."
"Hello, daughter. I'm glad to hear that. Thank you for calling. How are Rika and Maiko?" Nabiki looked at her older sister who was concentrating on something she was doing. "They're fine. Rika is here with me now, Maiko is off with another friend of hers. We're going to meet up soon for some swimming, then go to a restaurant that I'm told has an amazing view." She snickered a little, thinking that considering where that restaurant was, it could hardly not have a good view.

"Give them my best. Did you speak to Akane?"

"Yes, just now. She sounds very excited and happy. And likely to have enough money to make the Kunos green with envy."

Soun chuckled. "Oh, yes, that would be very funny. It will be interesting to see the effect it has on Kodachi when she hears about it. I'm so very proud of Akane and pleased for her. I nearly fainted when she told me how much that studio director offered. And that's just the beginning pay! He apparently said it was likely to increase considerably over the next few years once they got established."

"That's amazing. I really hope she does well at this."

"She will. All my daughters do well at whatever they do." He sounded very proud. "I must thank Chou and Yori the next time we meet once again for fixing her medical problem. That seems to have been the key to starting her on the road to recovery. She's put in a vast amount of very hard work herself, something I'm extremely impressed by, but those two remarkable young ladies managed to set her on the right path before something horrible happened. Again." His laugh was slightly sad.

"We all owe them a lot," Nabiki agreed, smiling to herself. "Has Auntie Nodoka fixed a date for the party yet?"

"She's thinking of the second weekend in August as being suitable. Does that fit with your plans?"

"Yes, I'll be around then."

"Good, I'll tell her. She's with Ukyo and Konatsu now, they're trying to work out the right place to have the wedding. They've whittled it down to a list of only about six places, but they all have minor problems. They'll work it out, I expect."

"Give everyone my love, and say hi to Ukyo and Konatsu for me."

"I will. Have fun, dear."

"Bye, Dad." She disconnected, feeling pleased. After a moment, seeing that her sister was still at whatever she was doing, and seeming pleased about it, she called Miki.

"Hey, Nabiki! I didn't expect to hear from you. How's it going?"

"Pretty damn well, thanks. I've been having enormous fun, trying out all sort of things. How about you? Are you with John still?"

"I'm on the way home to see my parents after spending a week with him and his family. They're really nice people. His father doesn't speak Japanese as well as John does, his accent is funny, but he's hilarious. Always making jokes, most of which are actually very funny. I like him a lot. His mom is really pretty and very smart, she seemed to like me. It was a bit scary at first, she was looking at me like she was trying to x-ray me with her eyes." Miki giggled as she spoke.
"Mothers want the best for their sons, I guess," Nabiki laughed back.

"I suppose so. It was kind of unnerving, though. But she came around after a few hours and turned out to be very nice. We went out to a few places to eat, saw a couple of movies, and went to the beach. Nothing dramatic, just nice. How about you?"

"It's been fun. Driving in the mountains with friends, taking lots of pictures, seeing strange wildlife. You know, a normal holiday." It was a good thing she was using Jun, Nabiki thought, she was laughing too much to talk out loud. "Did quite a lot of swimming as well. In fact, we're off to the waterpark in a little while. Oh yes, I also went hang gliding."

"What? That sounds amazing. Was it scary?" Miki sounded like she wasn't sure to be worried or jealous, settling for both at once. Nabiki grinned.

"It wasn't scary, but I was with some people who really knew their stuff. The guy who showed us what to do was really good. Jumping off the cliff was a little... dramatic... but I trusted the equipment. Once we were up we didn't want to come down again. So much fun. I love flying."

"Wow. That sounds terrifying to me, but maybe it isn't. Jumping off a cliff? Was it a tall one?"

"Tallish. Good view, though."

"Are you going to take up flying as a hobby, then?" Miki asked with a laugh.

"I might. I well might."

"I'd like to see that one day." There was a muffled announcement in the background, making her pause. "Whoops, my train is arriving. I'd better go. I need to get on. Have fun, and thanks for calling."

"You too, give my best to John when you see him. I'll see you guys back at university in the autumn."

"Bye, Nabiki." Miki hung up, while Nabiki smiled to herself. She found she missed the other woman, who had become quite a close friend. John was also someone she enjoyed talking to.

'Chou' smiled slightly as she turned to the others. "Sergeant Harada says things seem to be fairly quiet now, although your magical girl battle made the news two days running. It received quite good ratings in the community for level of damage, and style." She laughed as Fumiko looked embarrassed. "Don't worry, people aren't too upset. Everyone knows it wasn't your fault." She looked at Nabiki for a moment. "Agent Naito told me that the Halleckton affair is still getting bigger. Two more banks in the US and one in Canada have collapsed, and it's spread to Germany and France. They're a little worried it might be heading to some form of financial reset. All sorts of very bad things are suddenly coming to light in the financial system. A lot of people are going to go to jail, he thinks, all over the world. We accidentally managed to expose some very widespread corruption."

"Good grief. I wonder where it will stop?" Nabiki shook her head in amazement. "I'm feeling kind of guilty, now."

"So am I, but it was something that had to be done. Aside from anything else, we're not the ones who have apparently been fiddling the books for years, if not decades," 'Chou' sighed a little, looking at the floor, then met her sister's eyes again. "It's regrettable, but I expect it would all have come out eventually, and the longer it took the worse things would be. Hopefully this will prevent a larger global financial collapse in a few years, that could be very bad. Anyway, when we get back the Canadians would like to talk to us again. Apparently they are considering giving everyone involved some sort of recognition award or something like that."

The other three looked at each other. "Are magical girls allowed to accept awards?" Tamiko giggled.

They all laughed. "I don't see why not," the elder Tendo said, grinning. "It's certainly unusual, but it might set a good precedent with the others. Right, anyone need anything else, or can I shut this down now?" She gestured to the portal. Nabiki shook her head after glancing at the other two young women.

"Nope. I'm done. Thanks." The portal immediately popped out of existence, then the blonde led the way to the door, Nabiki switching back to the wingless version of 'Azumi' on the way.

Watching everyone swimming with shouts of fun, 'Azumi' looked around the waterpark, grinning. It was an amazingly detailed replica of an island in the middle of some alien ocean, a deep orange sun sitting half-way to the horizon, while the sea shimmered sapphire, low waves rolling up the beach, which was covered in fine sand an unusual bluish-grey colour. The water was only mildly salty, at a very comfortable temperature, and was extremely clear. It reminded the middle sister of 'Aiko Island' only without the lagoon. It was also much larger.

'I can't see the edges at all,' she commented to Jun.

#The environmental simulation is impressive,# it agreed. #This facility is just under a kilometre in diameter, which allows for some very effective wave effects to be generated. At points the water is close to fifteen metres deep. Several species other than D'sage and Humans enjoy swimming, including the local inhabitants.# Indeed, there were lots of the large insect-like people that called this world their home enjoying themselves in the water, using a wide variety of accessories, including something that was remarkably close to a wind-surf board. The waterpark had a light breeze blowing across it, enough to make the board move at a decent pace, but not so much it could be considered windy. With an ambient temperature of just under thirty degrees the breeze was refreshing.

Heading for one of the food dispensers discreetly built into the scenery around the place, she acquired a cold drink and another plate of the spiky blue snack roots, sitting on a large rock and nibbling them while watching the people running around and having fun. She'd swum in her merform for nearly an hour, but had become somewhat hungry, hence the break.

'These things are kind of more-ish;' she mused, finishing the plate and wondering whether she should get some more. 'I'll have to get a load to take home.' As she was considering getting back into the water, she felt 'Yori' walk up behind her, turning to see the short woman smiling at her.

"Good, isn't it," the black-haired woman said, sitting beside her. She was holding another plate of the snacks, which she offered to the middle sister. Accepting a few with a nod, she smiled back.

"It's damned impressive. You really can't tell the difference. I'd never have believed we were indoors."

"Unless you get pretty close to the outer edges you really can't see anything out of place." 'Yori' looked around, nodding approvingly. "Someone spend a lot of money setting this all up." She turned to the other woman. "I've got a little job for you. Or rather, for Ms Aoyama."

'Azumi' looked surprised, glancing around guiltily for a second. "Don't worry, we're fully shielded." 'Yori' grinned. "I met this friend of Uthryyl's. He's a trader as well, kind of Uthryyl's counterpart on this world. Nice guy. They do a lot of business together. He's got a problem, which he hoped Uthryyl could help him with. Apparently, he'd recently been having problems with a local crime syndicate. Think Yakuza, or Mafia, but not as good. However, they're getting kind of nasty. T'kl'it says he can't get the authorities involved because so far they haven't done anything that's actually provably criminal, but the threats are annoying him. Since we have level two authorisation we can legitimately intervene without any real issues. I don't want to start a shooting war, but I think that some friendly persuasion might do the trick. You up for it?"

"It sounds interesting. But will a species this alien find Ms Aoyama worrying enough to pay attention?"

'Yori' giggled. "Oh, trust me, yes indeed. Possibly more so than back home. After all, from their point of view, you're the demon..."

"Sir, there's... something... here to see you," the hushed voice of his assistant came through the netlink. He looked at it, slightly puzzled.

"Something?" he enquired. "What does that mean?" There was no response. "K'th'yr? What's going on?" He started to head to the door to investigate.

"Your assistant would appear to be indisposed," a voice that send shivers through his exoskeleton said from behind him in Trade, making him whip around, reaching for his weapon with one middle hand. The black-clad female alien of a species he was unfamiliar with standing against the back wall simply watched. He pointed the energy pistol at her, activating the seeker function. It hummed gently, ready to follow any move she made.

"I have no idea who you are or how you got in here, but you made a very large mistake," he said, even while he was wondering how she had managed to penetrate his security, which was the best on the market. None of the magic detectors had registered anything, although alien magic of some sort seemed the only explanation. The female simply looked at him, raising one eyebrow behind the dark eye-covers she was wearing, apparently unimpressed.

"Mr R'ng'wr, you have come to our attention due to some unfortunate threats you have made to an associate. I am here to resolve the situation." She looked around the office for a moment, then back at him, while he tried to work out what the hell was going on. And why was it getting cold? "I refer to Mr T'kl'it and his business. We would prefer that you refrain from further contact." Raising the pistol further he aimed it between her eyes, fairly sure that was where most species kept something important.

"Who is 'we'?" he asked. "Did Y're'tq send you? Is he trying to grab my business for his own?"

"The person you mention has no involvement with my presence here, Mr R'ng'wr. That is due to your own actions. Information on the organisation for which I work is unavailable. We are simply making a request that you cease your activities concerning Mr T'kl'it immediately, before the situation becomes more involved. This would be unfortunate."

"Is that a threat?"

"Merely a statement of fact." Her voice was, even taking into account the fact that it was coming from an alien throat, deeply disturbing on some very fundamental level. He suppressed a quiver of his antennae with a deliberate act of will.
"Who are you?" he asked.

She took a step forward, which he matched with an involuntary one backwards. "I am Ms Aoyama. We have an interest in Mr T'kl'it, which your involvement disturbs. Will you cease your actions towards him? If your cooperation is not forthcoming, there are actions available which will resolve the situation to our satisfaction nonetheless. I believe that you would not particularly enjoy them, however." The alien woman did something with her mouth that made him shudder. There was something about it that was simply horrifying. He had a sudden flashback to books he'd read in childhood, describing unholy things from other dimensions that turned up and ate you, suddenly not entirely sure they were fiction.

He pulled the trigger. The energy beam spiked out, only to splash against some sort of incredibly powerful forcefield mere centimetres from her head, a brief purple glow showing around the impact point. She watched him with the air of someone waiting for an unruly child to finish it's tantrum. "That was unwise, Mr R'ng'wr." Shaking her head slightly, she gave off a very small sigh as he fired twice more. "It would be in your best interests to cease your current activities. Your weapon will not harm me, and I dislike this waste of time. It is inefficient. I find myself forced to take steps."

The weapon suddenly beeped sharply at him, going dead. He stared at it. A different alarm sounded, making him yelp and throw it across the room. He knew that sound, it was the anti-theft self-destruct activating. Ramming himself against the wall he tried to escape the blast he knew was coming as the power cell shorted out. A muffled thud made him jump, staring in shock as the weapon vaporised itself, the blast somehow staying in a small spherical zone. The glimmer of purple made him realise it had another force-field around it. After a long moment he turned his head to the alien woman, emitting a small screech to find she was standing a metre away studying him with cold curiosity. He'd had no idea at all she'd moved, not having heard anything. It was so cold now he could see his own breath, but horrifyingly, not hers.

"Are you now prepared to be cooperative, Mr R'ng'wr? Or is it necessary that I take further steps?" The room illumination suddenly died, everything in it losing power. "It is very dark in here, Mr R'ng'wr." The voice was now across the room. He shivered. It was very cold, and not just physically. "I strongly suggest that you cease all activities relating to Mr T'kl'it. We will be monitoring your movements. Should I find that you are still interfering, I will deal with the problem in a permanent manner. You would not find that eventuality to be to your liking."

The horrible voice was suddenly right next to him, making him freeze and nearly lose control of his bodily functions. He couldn't see, feel, or sense her, but he could definitely hear her, something he wasn't happy about. "I would advise that you take this warning very seriously, Mr R'ng'wr. I will be most displeased should I be forced to return. I am not in the habit of giving second chances. I am behind schedule today so I will not proceed with further action at this time, but should we meet again..." The horrible emotionless voice trailed off into silence.

After a long moment, he started to relax, wondering what to do. The room lights came back on, making him twitch. Looking around he saw no sign of the woman. He noticed with shock that the half-dozen plants he had under lights on the side of the room opposite his desk had all withered away as if they'd been sprayed with liquid nitrogen. Walking over he fingered one, watching it crumble to powder, shaking his head in terrified awe.

"That... person... is horrible," he muttered.

"Thank you, Mr R'ng'wr," the cold voice said in his ear, making him scream and jump sideways. When he turned, no one was there. After a very long moment he made his way to his desk, opening a link to his second in command.

"L'nd'rd? Shut down everything to do with T'kl'it. He's off limits. Permanently." Killing the link and slumping in his seat, R'ng'wr concentrated on getting his breathing under control, trying not to faint, before looking up at the empty room. "Ms Aoyama?" he said tentatively, after a long moment. There was no answer.

For some reason, that didn't make him any happier.

T'kl'it stared at the woman standing beside Yori, who seemed amused, then glanced at Uthryyl. "That's it? It's over?"

"Yep," Yori replied, grinning. "Ms Aoyama had a word with R'ng'wr, he told his people to back off, that's the end of it. I doubt you'll have any more problems with him."

"Mr R'ng'wr appears to have taken my advice to heart," Ms Aoyama said emotionlessly. "He seemed disinclined to risk a further meeting." She smiled slightly, making Uthryyl and T'kl'it both shiver a little. It was horrible. Uthryyl found, even knowing who was under that persona, he really didn't find it anything other than extremely unpleasant.

"Thank you both so much," T'kl'it said after a long moment. He turned to Yori, finding her less disturbing to talk to. "If there's ever anything I can do to help you, please let me know."

"Thanks, T'kl'it. I'll bear that in mind." She grinned at him. "But for now, Ms Aoyama needs to return to her business and Uthryyl and I need to get back to our holiday. It was nice to meet you."

"And you. Stop by next time you're in the area." The insect-like merchant made the gesture with his antennae that was the equivalent of a smile. She nodded, then left with the other, much more alien, female following. He turned to his old friend. "What was that?" he asked in a low voice. Uthryyl shrugged slightly.

"Someone you really don't want to mess with. Yori is incredibly powerful and probably the most terrifying person I know when she has to be. Ms Aoyama is just... extremely worrying. Even when she's being friendly."

"She's the creepiest thing I've ever seen," T'kl'it replied with a shudder. "There are stories about things from the dark places in the universe, things that drive you insane at night. She is what they have nightmares about, I think." Uthryyl grinned a little.

"Ms Aoyama would probably enjoy that thought."

"Don't tell her, please. I don't want to see that smile again." T'kl'it looked at his friend, who laughed a little. "Thanks, Uthryyl. That could have ended up being a real problem by the time it got bad enough that the authorities stepped in."

"No problem, T'kl'it. Glad I could help. Right, I need to get back, Quannyr and Onkra will be annoyed I'm missing so much vacation time."

"Give them my best wishes," his friend said. "I'll have to come and visit again some time soon."

"Please do." Uthryyl smiled at his old friend, leaving him in his office as he left the building.

"And the legend grows," Fumiko giggled, looking at 'Azumi', who grinned back. "I wonder how long it will be before Ms Aoyama is talked about in hushed tones on every world in the K'nn group?"

"I don't think that sort of thing is likely," the silver-haired woman replied. "But that was fun. Mind you, when he shot at me I had a bit of trouble not twitching."

"You did very well," 'Yori' commented, proudly inspecting her sister-in-law. "Not a flicker. You just looked coldly bored. It was very impressive."

"I trusted you to stop anything happening." She gave the short girl a smile.

"It was very funny the way you used Jun to hack his gun. He looked extremely surprised."

'Azumi' chuckled. "It was Jun's idea. It told me the thing was open to that sort of attack, although not by anything around here. The SI units are clearly a damn sight more advanced than practically anything, I think. You could probably cause absolute chaos on a world like this one that's so dependent on computers." Turning to look out the window set into the floor nearby, she grinned again. "I still can't believe that view."

The rest of the people at their table turned to look, nodding agreement. At the synchronous orbit point half-way up the space elevator, they had a fantastic view of the planet in the distance, seen through various transparent sections of the floor, and also space, more stars than you could possibly see from the ground blazing through the windows. "Jun said the windows are made of diamond laminate about twenty centimetres thick, with some sort of enhanced molecular bond. More or less completely unbreakable." Looking at the nearest one she shook her head slightly. "That's a long way down." The window was so transparent it looked like a hole in the floor, although people were unconcernedly walking around on it.

"They don't use the elevator for people much any more," Uthryyl said, pouring himself and his wife a new drink. "It used to be the main method to and from space. Now, with the anti-grav systems they developed, it's quicker to go directly from the surface. This thing still gets used for inbound cargo, when there's no hurry, since it's cheap and easy to basically just drop it down. Past this point gravity does all the work, you just have to make sure it goes slowly enough not to be a problem."

"It's very cool," Tamiko said, looking around. "Worth the trip up. That was kind of boring, I have to admit."

"We're spoiled by bouncing around the place with teleportation and portals." 'Chou' smiled at her friends. "It makes everything else seem slow."

"What's the next thing on the list?" Onkra asked with interest. Uthryyl glanced at her.

"Well, if you're wanting excitement, they do orbital skydiving from lower down," he suggested, grinning at her wide-eyed stare. "It's true. They come up to here, put on a sort of one man ballistic re-entry capsule, and jump out. Totally insane. A little drive system pushes them a few dozen kilometres away so they don't hit the thing, then they just fall. Once they contact the atmosphere they're going fast enough to bounce half-way around the planet, then they deploy a wing once they'd deep enough and glide to the ground."

'Yori' laughed a little. "Weirdly enough, that's been suggested at home, I think. I seem to recall reading about something the Americans came up with decades ago as some sort of emergency re-entry system that worked a lot like that."
"I don't think I want to jump from orbital heights," Onkra said, after a moment. "The gliding was a lot of fun, but there are limits."

"Some people have no sense of fun," the martial artist replied with a grin.

"Are you going to do it?" Onkra asked curiously. Yori giggled.

"Of course not. I may be crazy but I'm not that crazy." They all laughed, as she finished her meal.

"More seriously, S'th'kx has invited us on a short trip on one of his mining ships," Uthryyl went on, after a moment. "He's going to check up on a mining operation on an asteroid they pulled into a solar orbit a couple of years ago. It's quite big, they stuck a refinery on it to take it to pieces and extract all the useful metals from it."

"How long would it take to get there and back?" Chou asked curiously.

"It's about half a day each way. I'd like to see it, I haven't been on a spacecraft for quite a few years now, but you can always stay and find something else to do. It's not like K'nn four isn't full of interesting things."

"Are you kidding?" Fumiko said, looking at him as if he was nuts. "Go into space in a real alien spaceship? Of course I'm going." Tamiko was nodding with a huge grin.

"Damn right. Count me in." He looked around the table, smiling as everyone was clearly up for it.

"OK. I'll call him and let him know. It's not all that far into space, only a few million kilometres, though. It's not like interstellar travel. We'd need to go to one of the really high-tech worlds for that, the K'nn group worlds don't bother with it at the moment. I know that K'nn four did lease a couple of hyperlight drives a while ago for evaluation, but they're not doing anything much with them right now."

'Azumi' slowly shook her head. "That's amazing, I have to admit. Just being able to casually lease a faster than light spacedrive. No one at home would believe it."

"They're not cheap," Uthryyl said. "But a lot cheaper than building one, even assuming you could."

"How fast are they?" she asked curiously.

"I'm not entirely sure. The ones I've seen in the past were something like five hundred times the local speed of light, which varies a little from reality to reality. Even so it still takes quite a time to go very far, stars are a very long way apart. I've heard of faster ones, but it's not a subject I know much about. Interstellar travel isn't common outside a fairly small number of worlds, ones that don't have much contact with portal-travelling civilisations or magic."

"Unbelievable. Still, I think a trip to an asteroid is pretty damn impressive. Not at all something I'd have ever thought I'd do." She smiled, shaking her head. "This is one hell of a vacation."

"Oh, for fuck's sake!" Aiko dodged the attack from the creature diving at her, shooting it in the back with a ki ball, watching with grim satisfaction as it bounced down the road, to lie still. "How many of these fucking things are there?"

"I've killed nine so far, Ami got six and you've done another eleven." Misaki looked around at the damaged supermarket. "Twenty-six all in." A noise from behind them made them both whirl and fire simultaneously, the demonic creature exploding into charred chunks of smoking meat.
"Twenty-seven."

"What are they, even? I've never seen anything like them before."

"No idea. Some sort of magical creature, I think, but I don't know what type. Not very smart." They turned to look at the somewhat larger than normal portal which had opened in the car park, then started disgorging these supremely irritating little monsters with big teeth and a bad attitude.

"They certainly like biting," Aiko muttered, rubbing her arm. Even she had felt that one. A normal person would have lost the arm on the spot. "Vicious little fuckers. This is beginning to get annoying."

"I think some more are on the way," a voice from the side said, as Ami walked around the corner, pointing her hand-held computer at the portal. "It's fluctuating again." Aiko growled and fired a large ki ball directly into the portal, making the blue-haired girl yelp and duck as it roared past. A weird thump sounded and a large amount of small pieces of demon slid out of the portal into a smoking heap on the tarmac. "OK, that worked," she said, looking at the remains with some shock. "Holy shit, Aiko, how large can you make one of those things?"

"A lot bigger than that, believe me, but it's a bit much for around here. Yori would kill me if I blew up the entire middle of the district." The brunette grinned slightly manically. "Without a good reason, anyway."

"Um, right, OK," the other woman said, glancing side-long at her. Misaki was smiling in a worrying way. "So, what do we do now? That portal doesn't seem to want to close." Her computer beeped, making her check it. "Damn. More of them."

Something small and fast shot out of the portal, whizzing into the sky, circled twice, then dived back in. Misaki's shot barely missed it. She grunted with annoyance. "Don't tell Yori I missed, she'd never let me hear the end of it."

"It was moving about five hundred kilometres an hour," Ami replied, checking her machine. "I'm not surprise you missed. I could barely follow it."

"She wouldn't. I shouldn't." The thing popped out again, with a friend, but this time the tall girl got both of them almost instantly. They exploded with a loud bang and a small shockwave, making a couple of somehow undamaged windows nearby tinkle to the ground. "Oh, I didn't," Misaki said with a grin. Ami stared, then shrugged.

"I think they're some sort of surveillance drone," she said, looking at the remains of one then scanning it.

"So something on the other side is trying to find out what happened to it's horrible little friends?" Aiko scowled. "I'm beginning to lose my patience with this crap. Why the hell doesn't this sort of thing happen when we're running around all over the world chasing portal bombs, but as soon as they go on holiday, it's one thing after another?"

Misaki shrugged, pulling out a chocolate bar and unwrapping it. Ami gave her an odd look. She offered the other woman one, who looked at it for a moment, then took it. "No idea. Life, I guess."

"Well, I'm not going to take it any more." The short brunette was about to say something else when a huge demon, some four metres tall, stepped through the portal and looked around, radiating evil intent. They watched it intently.

"Tremble, you tiny creatures, before the might of gakkk!" As the echoes died away, Misaki turned to her friend, grinning.

"That's an odd name." Aiko nodded, looking at the remains of the thing, then glanced at Ami, who seemed satisfied.

"Nice shot." An ice attack had erupted inside the demons open mouth at the same time two large ki balls had entered, removing it's head and most of it's upper torso. What was left was smoking on the ground.

"Thanks."

"You're getting better at that. Not shouting out all those silly attack names is a definite improvement. When they get back, maybe you should ask Yori for some training. I'm pretty sure she'd have some good ideas on how to improve the efficiency of what you can do. She's a genius for that sort of thing."

The blue haired girl looked nervous. "Would she teach me? After all the trouble?"

Aiko shrugged. "You can only ask. But probably. Anyway, what are we going to do about this?"

She indicated the portal which was still there. Misaki walked over to it, inspecting it, then experimentally tossed a ki sphere through it. It flickered slightly but absorbed it.

"It went through," Ami reported, looking at her computer.

"Fair enough," Misaki replied, looking satisfied. She held out her hand and an energy sphere began forming on it, growing very large then shrinking to the size of a marble. Ami went white as she scanned it.

"Oh, fuck me," she whispered. "The power in that is..." Misaki fired it through the open portal, then dived out of the way of the flash of energy that leapt out, before the portal collapsed on itself with a weird screech.

"That should do it," the taller woman said, dusting her hands off in satisfaction.

"Considering you basically just nuked the other side, yes, I'd think so," Aiko laughed. She turned to Ami, who was staring at Misaki as if she'd seen her own death rapidly approaching. "Come on, let's get rid of all these bodies then get some ramen. On me." Numbly the younger woman watched as her two companions produced small devices which made the dead demons gradually disintegrate as they waved them over the bodies, then went to bring more of the deceased creatures to them, still unable to think what to say.

Many realities away, a huge orange flash completely obliterated the staging post set up for the invasion, killing every portal-capable mage instantly and triggering the rapid collapse of the ruling military party. The ensuing civil war completely reshaped the entire world and occupied the inhabitants for decades.

When it cooled and filled with rainwater, the large crater became a home to a number of the local equivalent of ducks, proving the multiverse has a sense of humour of sorts.
Chapter 62

Her communicator made the little noise that meant one of her team-mates wanted to talk. It was the third time in the last hour. Pulling it out she considered it for a moment, then put the thing away again, unanswered, sighing slightly, her mind awhirl with troubling thoughts. Lying back on her bed she continued to think for a while longer, then got up to find her grandfather. He was sweeping the yard, an exercise he did regularly and without complaint. Watching him for a moment she idly wondered how many million times he had moved one broom or another over the ancient stones, in his long life as a priest.

Without looking up, making her twitch slightly as she came out of her thoughts, he suddenly asked quietly, "What is your question, child?" The young woman was silent for a while, as he patiently continued his task, waiting.

"Why did they laugh at us?"

"Who?" He kept working.

"The workmen. The other day, when Fumiko and her friends made us clean up, they called a lot of workmen to take the damaged vehicles and the debris away. Several of them were definitely laughing at us. Not in a nice way, not being friendly, or sympathetic."

"Ah." Finishing sweeping some fallen leaves into a neat pile, he stopped, leaning on the broom and studying her for a moment. "You didn't like it."

"No. I don't understand it, either. They weren't laughing at Fumiko, or Aiko, or the others. They weren't laughing at Ami. They laughed with them, Fumiko and Tamiko were making jokes, the workmen and the pedestrians stopped and talked, they all seemed to know the entire team, but it was different." She shrugged a little helplessly. "Us, they were laughing at us."

The old priest smiled for a moment. "I'm sorry about that, but I understand it. I think the concept you're reaching for is respect. Yori and her friends are respected, because in turn they respect the people in the community they live in. Respect is a two way street. And it can only be earned, not forced. It can be lost much more easily than it can be gained. Those young women have, from everything I've ever seen, earned the respect of everyone they meet."

"We do the same sort of thing. More, even. Some of the things we've done in the past..."

"You have indeed kept the community safe from some true horrors, if what I've seen on the news is even remotely true. Yet, when you managed to deal with that demonic incursion six months ago, did you apologise for the buildings you destroyed?"

"Um..."

"There were three people hospitalised about fourteen months ago, when they were caught in an explosion your blonde friend caused. Did you apologise to them?"

"We didn't even know about them until a week afterwards!" She looked miffed. He nodded sadly.

"Precisely my point. Yori, or any of her friends, would certainly have avoided putting bystanders in danger in the first place. If someone had been harmed as a result of their actions, they would have made it right, and apologised. And moreover, the apology would have been accepted. You girls seem to just charge in, firing dangerous magic wildly about, and give a very strong impression..."
recently of just not really thinking about what might happen. There have been more cases like that than I care to think about. People notice."

She watched as he swept up the little pile of leaves, dumping them on the compost heap, before returning to her. "The magical girls are possibly more powerful than anyone in Japan, any of you. That can be a worrying thought to anyone who considers it. Using that power to help people, that goes a very long way towards making it less scary. Giving the impression that because you're more powerful you're better, that the less powerful don't matter as much as you do somehow, that does the opposite. People resent bullies."

She stared for a moment. "We're not bullies. Yori's a bully, she's always yelling at us." He smiled again.

"I can see how you might feel that way, but most others would think of her more like the headmistress of a particularly unruly school. Someone bringing discipline to chaos." He laughed for a moment. "Which is irony at it's best, she's the most chaotic thing I've ever encountered. Perhaps that's necessary to keep a lid on something like Minato." Shaking his head he looked seriously at her. "I don't believe Yori is a bully. Passionate about stopping what she sees as dangerous behaviour, perhaps, but I don't truly think she actually enjoys shouting at you." Pausing for thought he smirked.

"Well, no more than anyone would under the circumstances. Some of it has been very funny." She glared at him for a moment. He shrugged. "Well, it was. But I think she'd much prefer that everyone get along. At heart she's a very cheerful and upbeat person, although there is a darkness in her that it would be very unwise to provoke. I suspect none of you have ever truly angered her, which is for the best."

"She looked pretty damn angry the last time she yelled at us." She shuddered, remembering.

"Oh, I have no doubt she was extremely irritated, but not truly angry." He grinned, walking past her and heading back inside, as she followed. "You are, after all, still alive."

"S'th'kx says we have to leave in about an hour," Quannyr's voice sounded. 'Azumi' looked at Onkra, who shrugged.

"One more try, then."

"OK."

Picking up a baseball-sized rock, the D'sage woman hefted it gently, then checked with her SI for a moment for the right speed and direction. While 'Azumi' held her in place against the nearly non-existent gravity of the three kilometre or so diameter asteroid, she carefully threw the rock in a flat trajectory, watching as it moved away in a very odd manner, not visibly dropping. Staying a constant one and a half metres off the surface it disappeared over the very close horizon, making her grin. "I think that did it. Now we wait."

They turned around to look in the exact other direction. The refinery and smelting facility was off to their right, on one of the poles of the slowly rotating, nearly spherical asteroid, rich with heavy metals. It twinkled with lights, producing a steady vibration that they could feel through their boots, as the drills slowly carved out the middle.

Twenty minutes passed in idle talk, until Nabiki squinted. "Hey. Is that it?"

Onkra laughed. "Yes. Finally. We've been trying for three hours." She caught the rock as it flew gently past. "I actually threw something into orbit." Nabiki grinned at her friend.
"Good throw. Mine keep disappearing."

"You're throwing too hard. Yours are just a hazard to navigation, now. You threw them completely out of it's gravity."

"OK, then, you can throw a rock into orbit, I can throw it past escape velocity!"

"That's not difficult, even I can do that here," the other woman said, laughing to herself. "But orbit. That takes skill."

Heading back to the refinery, using a pair of very small drive units they held in the manner of a scuba-diver's underwater scooter, they entered the airlock, deactivating the force-field environment suits they were using as the inner door opened. "Have fun?" 'Chou' asked, greeting them with a smile.

"Yes. I made this go all the way around," Onkra laughed, displaying her rock. "It took about a dozen tries."

"Impressive," the elder Tendo replied, inspecting the lump of asteroid material with interest. "An unusual sport, but it might catch on." She giggled as the other two exchanged glances.

"If we had a bigger asteroid, with stronger gravity, we could play orbital golf," Nabiki suggested.

"What's golf?" Onkra asked curiously. The middle sister sent her some information on it. "Oh, I see. We have something a little like that at home. It's very boring."

"But imagine it in space! Everything is better in space." Grinning at her friend and her sister, she added, "Where are the others?"

"Everyone else is back in the ship. We were just talking about what to do when we get back to K'nn Four." She waited for them to hang the manoeuvring units up next to the airlock then walked with them back towards the ship. "S'th'kx was telling us about some interesting places to visit. Quannyr wants to look around some shopping areas, as does Fumiko. The others are fine to do anything, although Tamiko does want to go swimming."

Looking around at the refinery corridor they were walking down, 'Azumi' chuckled a little. "You know, aside from the lower gravity this could be just some factory or something on Earth, but then you walk past something like that." That was a wide window giving a view of the outside of the facility, the surface of the asteroid mostly fairly dark, with lighter patches occasionally where some past collision had spalled off the surface. The horizon was ridiculously close and curved, looking like some sort of special effect, but far too sharp and clear to be fake. Millions of stars were apparent, along with several visible galaxies, far more apparent than at home. Off to one side was hanging the mass of S'th'kx's ship, a squat cone shape some fifty metres in diameter and half that in height, while beyond it was a much larger vessel, over a hundred and eighty metres long, with a number of huge cylinders arranged lengthwise around the central spine. This was the main cargo ship, which was loading ingots of purified metals ready to be returned and sold.

They all stopped and looked at the view for a moment. "It is certainly very impressive," 'Chou' replied after a moment. "Much more convincing than any movie I've seen, which makes sense, I suppose." She grinned.

"I still can't believe I'm in an alien mining facility on an asteroid," 'Azumi' giggled as they began walking again. "It's just crazy. Somehow this is much harder to believe than almost anything that's happened so far. No one at home would ever believe me even if I could tell them."
"You've got enough evidence to easily prove it," her sister laughed. "Although, I have to admit it seems unlikely that we can tell anyone for a while."

Arriving at the airlock to the ship, 'Chou' tapped the relevant control, waiting until the door slid open, then entered with her two companions. As soon as the first door closed the other one opened, admitting them to the vessel. One of the five crew S'th'kx had nodded politely to them as he passed. After a short walk they entered the ship's common room, looking around. S'th'kx was talking to Quannyr and Uthryyl, but looked up and gave a friendly wave of his antennae when he saw them.

"Did you enjoy your trip outside?" he asked. 'Azumi' glanced at Onkra, then both nodded, smiling.

"Yes. It's amazing, walking around out there. Or, not walking so much, more being towed or standing very carefully on the surface," Onkra laughed. "It's pretty weird, I have to say." She held up her orbital rock. "I managed to throw this all the way around, eventually." She was clearly very proud of the feat. 'Yori' looked at her, grinning.

"Not bad. It's a good thing this asteroid is damn near spherical, it would be difficult on something a weird shape." She looked over at the mine company owner. "Isn't a spherical asteroid this small unusual? I thought most of them were normally all sorts of irregular shapes because their gravity was too small to pull them into a sphere."

S'th'kx nodded. "It's somewhat rare. We think this one was at some point in a very close orbit of the sun, which melted it. Surface tension would make it spherical then. It's got a very high metal content, about eighty percent metallic material, mostly iron and nickel, with the rest stone. That's why it has a comparatively high gravity despite the size. We'll be mining it for the next twenty years, it's one of the richest finds we ever located."

"If it's iron couldn't you use magnetic boots or something?" Tamiko asked curiously. He shook his head.

"Too much stone on top in most places. It's a slight pity, it would have made things easier, but we don't go outside much, there isn't a reason for it now the refinery is running." He stood up, nodding to them. "All right, if everyone is on board we'll head back. I've completed everything I needed to do here." Leaving the room he headed for the control section. Shortly the small ship undocked, rotated, then began to accelerate, a very slight vibration being the only sensation of the enormous energy applied by the drive.

"This is a scout craft of some sort, isn't it?" Fumiko asked Uthryyl. He nodded.

"I believe so. It's meant for towing asteroids, it's got an enormously oversized drive system and some form of gravity tug. From what I understand, they can clamp it to an asteroid and move it around, although for a big one either it's quite a slow process or they use more than one. That one was pulled here from a very elliptical orbit over about a year, then stabilised and spun up to make the temperature even out. It's doubled the profit of his company with one refinery." Shrugging, he added, "If you want to know more talk to S'th'kx about it. He'll talk your ear off about space mining given half a chance. He's been doing it for about fifty years or so."

Quannyr giggled a little, making him look at her. "Like you and trading, perhaps, dear?" He grinned slightly.

"That's not impossible."

Onkra sat next to 'Yori', inspecting her rock. The martial artist looked at it with interest. "Are you going to take that home?" she asked. Onkra laughed.
"Of course. You always need souvenirs. This one I'm definitely keeping." Handing it to her friend, she added, "Can you use that trick of yours to keep it safe?"

"Sure." 'Yori' made it vanish, while Onkra watched closely.

"That's so weird. No magic at all, or at least nothing I can recognise as magic."

Laughing slightly, 'Yori' grinned at her. "It's not impossible that one day you could learn to do it. It's very useful."

"I'd certainly like that. Do you really think that I could learn ki control?" The other woman studied her closely for a moment, then slowly nodded.

"To be honest, yes, I think you probably can. How well I have no idea yet. Your natural ki levels are fairly reasonable, but I can't see any differences yet from the training. It's only been a week or so, so that's not surprising. Several months of work and I'd hope to see it begin to rise. Once it starts it goes quite slowly for a while, then speeds up a lot. Or, that's what happens with us, at any rate. It'll be very interesting to see what happens with a D'sage." She smiled at Onkra's expression of expectation.

"Don't get your hopes up yet, there's a lot of work and a bit of luck involved, but we'll see." The young woman didn't look any less pleased, although she nodded.

"Thank you for teaching me this."

"No problem. I found out a while ago that I like teaching, it's a lot of fun. You're a good student, as well, which makes it easy."

Looking very pleased by the compliment, the young woman smiled. 'Azumi' watched, feeling happy for her. She was clearly very taken by the thought she could learn some interesting things, a feeling the Tendo sister was familiar with. Sitting beside her sister she leaned back and closed her eyes.

'This has been an interesting day.'

'It has indeed, Nabiki. Your experiences on the asteroid were most enlightening. Jun sounded very amused, making her smile. #I was quite impressed that Onkra managed to propel an object into a complete orbit. It was not a stable one, of course, it would not have managed more than six rotations at best, but the success was interesting.#

'She seems very pleased about it. I expect that little rock is going to be something she shows to visitors for years.'

#That seems likely.#

'These force field spacesuit things are pretty impressive.' They'd each been given one by S'th'kx when they boarded. The device went on around the upper arm like a large bracelet, adhering firmly, but was light enough that she didn't notice it without thinking about it after the first few minutes. She'd been told by the miner that they were the latest model, providing air and heat for up to three weeks, depending on the species using them. The force field generated followed the skin quite closely, reprocessing the oxygen with close to one hundred percent efficiency, although it also contained a large quantity of the gas hugely compressed in a tiny spherical tank on the outside of the device. The duration limitation was mainly down to power rather than anything else.

They would activate automatically if the pressure suddenly dropped in an emergency, which was the main purpose for them, although Jun had immediately interfaced to the unit and could activate and monitor it at will. The field was barely visible as a very faint shimmering effect, like a full-body soap bubble, when seen from exactly the right angle. Interestingly, it only blocked air from escaping, and provided temperature regulation both ways, meaning that other things could enter and leave. She was still able to put things in her pockets, she discovered, and they'd immediately tried their ki abilities, finding that they worked normally through the force field.

"They do appear quite efficient," the SI replied approvingly. "I would suggest that it would be a useful item to add to your inventory, as a security measure. While your physical abilities are most impressive you still require oxygen, even if you can use it more effectively than a non-enhanced human." Snickering slightly, she admitted the thing had a point, but she was amused by the way that every time something like this came up the SI became quite acquisitive.

"If I get everything you think would be a useful security measure, my ki pocket will be holding tons of stuff. I'm not sure I can do that yet. There's already enough food and water in there for a small army, because you thought it would be handy to have just in case."

"In Halleckton I believe that the water was indeed utilised on a number of occasions," Jun replied with a distinct air of enjoyment.

"Point to you. OK, I'll see how much they are when we get back."

"Thank you. I would be remiss in my duties if I did not mention things of this nature."

The middle Tendo looked at the display that Jun provided from information derived from the ship computer, seeing that their estimated arrival time at the spaceport was in a little over six hours, then decided to take a nap. She was soon asleep.

Soun watched his youngest daughter and Shampoo practice, then glanced down at the ancient woman balancing on her staff beside him, also studying the two young women. "I hear you were somewhat taken aback by the money the Americans offered Akane and your great-granddaughter," he commented. Not taking her eyes off the match Cologne nodded, smiling a little.

"It was somewhat excessive, I thought. It took me by surprise." She laughed slightly. "But I'm very proud of both of them. It would be nice to have Shampoo doing the things she trained for so long for, but the world has changed. Our type of warriors aren't nearly as much in demand as they were. The modern way of waging war is so different to what it was when I was young. Back then, you saw your opponent face to face. Now, they kill each other from another country, or from the air, or a ship." She sighed a little. "So many good things have come from technology, I'm constantly surprised and impressed by it, but at the same time humanity's ability to turn anything to causing destruction sometimes depresses me." She shook her head. "Oh, well. It's not something I can do much about. At least Japan is a fairly stable country with few enemies, and even China isn't too bad. Better than it's been for some time, certainly."

"Do you ever worry about your village?" Soun asked curiously. "Being attacked by the authorities in China? I can't imagine that the way you live fits with their ideology, certainly since communism took over." He pulled out a pack of cigarettes, removing one, then looked at it, looked at the Elder, and put it away again.

Cologne chuckled in her gravelly voice. "They don't like us, that much is true, but we know where all the skeletons are buried. I put some there myself, in fact. We have certain... agreements. They leave us alone, we leave them alone. The Musk and the Phoenix people have also come to an arrangement. Nothing on paper, but we seldom see anyone from the government and they're always scrupulously polite when they visit. And quite nervous."

Soun laughed to himself for a moment. "Well done, Elder."

"One has to protect one's family." She looked up at him for a moment. "Something we all need to bear in mind." Watching his daughter spar, he nodded slowly.

"Indeed. I'm very proud of my daughters, but I confess I worry slightly about Akane going to the US. Her emotional issues do indeed seem to be a thing of the past, largely due to the actions of those two extraordinary young women from Minato, but I'm a little concerned that they might decide she was somehow a threat. Not the movie people, to them she and Shampoo are worth enormous amounts of money, but certain people in the government. You know what Americans are like." He sighed a little, sitting on the porch, beside the Elder who dropped off her staff and did likewise.

"The Japanese authorities have a considerable interest in the magical girls, in Minato and the rare ones elsewhere," Cologne said after a moment, "according to information I located some time ago. I'm not sure exactly how high it goes, or how deep, but I suspect they are seen as some sort of national asset. It's not impossible that they would step in if something did happen with Akane. She may not have the magical abilities, but from most peoples viewpoint she's not so far away from what the young ladies running around Minato do. With luck that will protect her and Shampoo, should your worries be valid."

Glancing away from the sparring match for a moment, she watched him, then went back to studying the girls. "It might be worth mention your thoughts to Yori or Chou, the next time you see them. Or Aiko, I'm sure she could get a message to them and she seems to be visiting the girls regularly. I would think that if anyone has the contacts that could reassure you it would be those two young women."

"It's certainly a good thought," Soun said, after reflecting on the idea. "Thank you, I'll do that. Just to set my mind at ease." He looked sideways at the old woman. "Thank you for allowing Shampoo to teach my daughter. It is undoubtedly one of the major influences on her recovery over the last months."

"You're welcome. Akane is coming along much better than I expected, I'll admit. I'd hoped to be able to teach her some of our techniques, but she seems sufficiently driven and talented to absorb much more of it that I thought would be the case." Cologne chuckled slightly. "I'm glad to be proven wrong in this case." They sat and watched for a little longer. "At some point in the future I would like to take Akane to the village for some intensive training," the Elder said after a couple of minutes. Soun looked at her in surprise.

"Really?"

"Yes. I think it would do her good. Not immediately, but in perhaps a year or so, for a couple of months. Hopefully, her career will be coming along well by that point and she can take some time off. From what I gather the work will be somewhat sporadic in any case for a while." Soun was silent for some time.

"If she has no objections, neither do I. I would much prefer that she return unmaimed, though." He grinned a little. "I understand that some of the Amazon training methods are rather... merciless."

Chuckling, Cologne nodded. "Oh, they can be, certainly. Not close to the level that idiot friend of yours reached with his poor son, but fairly involved. Don't worry, she'll live. She might walk funny for a while, though." He snickered despite himself.
After a pause, she asked him, "Did Akane ask you about being asked to train some of the stunt people and martial artists at the studio?"

"Yes. I assume Shampoo was asked as well?"

"She was. This Matt person seemed quite interested in the idea."

"What did you tell her?" The Elder was silent for a moment.

"I've been thinking about it quite a lot. Most of the really good techniques are Amazon secrets, as I believe the Anything Goes moves are as well at the higher levels." Soun nodded. "I'm not particularly keen on seeing them taught to just anyone. They could be incredibly destructive in the wrong hands. Not to mention that attempting to learn them could well be fatal for a student not at the right point in their training, or who was simply not up to it."

"Our schools are possibly not quite as dangerous, but even so there are things I would not wish to teach to any but a carefully vetted student, I agree. Genma has techniques that are genuinely extremely dangerous, which even he wouldn't teach."

Cologne smiled slightly at that. "After some consideration I decided that I would allow Shampoo to teach the basic hand to hand moves, which by most people's standards are very high level. Any students that she feels have the ability and inner strength to learn more she can refer to me. I will assess them and decide if they can learn anything beyond that. I don't think that will happen soon, but it allows her to improve the abilities of her colleagues without losing control of the more dangerous things." Cologne looked satisfied, glancing at Soun, who slowly nodded.

"A sound approach. I had considered something similar. By the time Akane gets this job and moves to LA, which I believe will probably be after Christmas from what she's recently been told, should it go to plan, Genma and I have decided she will be at the point we can allow her a basic teaching certificate. She has learned a vast amount very quickly in the last year. I only wish I could have been able to get her to this point years ago, but there were other factors in the way." He sighed sadly. "Most of them my fault, I admit."

Unexpectedly, Cologne patted him on the knee. "You're a good man, Soun Tendo. The loss of a loved one affects everyone differently. You were broken for a long time, but in recent years you have fixed yourself very well. I'm most impressed with how you have turned your life around."

With a slight chuckle, he replied, "Oddly enough, Genma is as much to thank for that as anyone. He was the one who pushed me into restarting the Dojo. I owe him a lot."

Shaking her head with irritation, Cologne sighed. "That man has much to answer for. His past actions have been... very unhelpful. To a very large number of people. But I'll agree, he does seem to have become slightly less of a useless excuse for a human being in recent years." She snickered. "Only slightly, mind."

"That is my best friend you're talking about, Elder," Soun said, then laughed for a moment. "but yes, I will agree that he has done things he's likely going to have to account for in the long term. We all have, though."

"True." They sat in silence for a moment, watching, until Shampoo called a halt, appearing pleased. She talked to Akane for a moment then both young women went off to shower. "Have you heard from Nabiki?" Cologne asked, turning to the Tendo patriarch.

"Oh, yes, I have, two days ago. She seemed in good spirits. She's having fun with those two friends of hers. It was very nice of them to invite her along."

"Where are they now?"

Appearing slightly puzzled, Soun shook his head. "I'm not sure. She didn't say. All she told me was that they'd be travelling around quite a lot." He smiled a little. "I expect she'll have a lot of photographs when she comes back." Looking at the Elder, he added, "You seem to have become quite friendly towards her recently."

Cologne laughed. 'I find myself rather fond of your daughters. Nabiki reminds me strongly of myself in some ways, more years ago than I care to remember. She is one to watch out for. I feel that she has great things ahead of her, although what form those things will take I have no idea. It's a pity she never took up the Art, I've thought for a long time she'd be exceptional at it, she has the right mindset."

"Thank you for saying it." Soun looked pleased, smiling. "I have thought much the same myself occasionally. But, whatever she does, she will do it well. I'm very proud of her as well. Of all my daughters." Tailing off, he looked sad for a moment. Cologne glanced at him, then nudged him in a friendly manner.

"One day, you'll see her again, my boy." He looked slightly startled, gazing at the ancient little woman, but eventually nodded.

"I do hope so. I miss her, and I have a terrible feeling of guilt over the entire affair."

"Things have a habit of resolving themselves eventually. Wherever Kasumi is or whatever she's doing, I'm sure she thinks of you and the others as well, and is comporting herself with the same honour and grace she always has." She smiled at him. "You'll meet again, eventually."

"Thank you, Elder. That does help." He looked up as the afternoon students came into the yard, talking to each other. "Ah. Looks like lunch is over. Well, I must get back to work. It was very pleasant talking to you, Cologne."

"And you, Soun. Stop by the Café at some point soon, you haven't been in for a while." She hopped back onto her staff, grinning at him. "Friends and family discount. Genma pays full price." As she hopped away he burst out laughing.

"That was fun," Tamiko said, as they exited the ship, looking around at the crowded spaceport. Dozens of ships were taking off and landing all over the place, making a lot of noise but much less than one might have expected. Some of them were enormous, like flying aircraft carriers, while others were down to merely dozens of metres long. 'Azumi' watched with a grin on her face, glancing at Fumiko who looked at least as excited.

"It's like some sort of incredibly good SF movie," she giggled.

"I know! It's fantastic." Fumiko looked at one of the smaller ships, a cone-shaped vessel much like the one they'd just disembarked from aside from the size, which was only about eight metres in diameter. It lifted off, hanging in the air emitting a deep hum, before climbing rapidly out of sight straight up. She watched it go, smiling happily, then turned to her friend. "I want one."

"Where would you keep it?" 'Azumi' laughed. "It wouldn't fit in the parking garage. And I'll bet Tokyo air traffic control would get very confused." The other woman shrugged, looking around.
"That one would fit," she replied, pointing at an even smaller ship.

"True, I guess. Still have a slight problem with people noticing it, though." They inspected the small craft for a moment. "Perhaps next time."

S'th'kx, walking beside them, laughed. "You don't want that thing. It's barely orbit capable. They use them for putting satellites up and maintaining them. Something like mine is much more useful, you can go anywhere in the system in it."

"It's quite big," Tamiko said with a giggle. "And doesn't it need a crew?"

"Well, one person could certainly operate it easily enough, the computer does most of the work anyway, although they normally have a crew of between four and six. It gets lonely when you're poking around in the outer system hunting for decent asteroids, so it's nice to have some company." He sounded amused. "You have to be able to get on fairly well, though."

"I think we have enough going on at home without bringing alien spacecraft back with us, Fumiko," 'Chou' said gently, grinning. "Azumi is right, the neighbours would talk." Fumiko glanced at her, then laughed at the thought.

"Could we even get one home?" she asked curiously. "Can you make a portal big enough?"

'Yori' looked thoughtful, peering back at the ship. "I think so. We haven't tried, the normal sort of portal is fine for everything we've done up to now, but it's just a matter of power. There is a practical upper limit but it's quite large, several hundred metres probably, although that would be quite difficult to achieve for very long."

"We do sometimes move ships through portals," S'th'kx told them. "Some of the other realities in the K'nn grouping have a limited amount of space exploration, although this is where we started and where all the heavy industry is. Eventually they'll begin building them over there, but for now we make them here and transfer them as needed, which only accounts for a few dozen so far."

Soon they arrived at his office on the edge of the spaceport. "It's been very nice seeing you again, Uthryyl, and you two as well, Yori and Chou." He made a gesture of respect. "Thank you once more for helping my son."

"It was no problem, S'th'kx." 'Yori' smiled at him. "Thanks for the trip. It was fun, I've always wanted to go into space."

"Any time." The miner turned to the others. "It was nice to meet you all also. If any of you are ever in the area, please stop in." Glancing at 'Chou', he asked, "Are you staying here for much longer?" She shook her head.

"No. Just one more night, then back to Fwetna. We'll probably come back in about a week with two other friends, if it's possible they would probably also like a quick run into orbit or something like that." He grinned in his own way.

"Certainly. That's no trouble at all. I go out quite often, and it's no trouble to make a special trip." Waving, he headed into his office, as the group went back to the hotel.

Adrian swallowed hard, glancing at Matt, then Richard, who looked very amused. "Are you sure it's safe?" he asked, his mouth dry.

"Of course it's safe. It's like magic!" Richard grinned at him, snickering. Sighing, Adrian turned to Aiko, who was watching with a highly amused expression, repeating his question. She nodded, still smiling.

"It's perfectly safe, Adrian. I do this dozens of times a day and have for many years, it's never harmed anyone. But the first time will make you feel quite unwell for a few seconds, I'm afraid. Almost everyone reacts like that. It passes quickly and it won't happen again, but just be ready for it, all right?" Looking apprehensive, he nodded, stepping forward. Matt joined him. She looked at Richard. "Would you like to come? It's your day off, right?"

He glanced at Emily, who grinned and nodded. "You go on and play, dear, but be back by dinner time," Aiko burst out laughing as even Adrian chuckled. Kissing his wife, the lieutenant moved to stand beside the other two.

"I'll bring you back a present," he told her with an amused look. She stood with her arm around her daughter, who was watching wide-eyed. "Remember the flash." They closed their eyes as the group of four people disappeared amidst a brilliant rainbow light.

"That's so cool," Serena breathed.

"Isn't it?" Emily examined the place they'd been standing, shaking her head in amazement. "Life seems quite strange recently."

Looking around with curiosity, Adrian examined the large yard they'd arrived in once the intestinal spasms died down, both the first-time teleport travellers feeling much better within a remarkably short time, although Matt still looked a bit green. A stone wall about eight feet high ran around the property, which consisted of a large house in what he thought from documentaries he'd seen was a traditional Japanese style, something he thought looked very attractive in fact, and a much larger building that was considerably taller. Most of it looked like it had been fairly recently repaired, different coloured stones, tiles, and wood showing in places. There were sounds coming from it that suggested a fair number of people were doing something vigorous inside.

Akane and Shampoo, along with an older but very attractive woman with deep auburn hair, were standing on the porch-like construction that ran down the side of the house, the two girls smiling and the older woman looking calm but good-natured. Aiko led them over. Stepping forward Akane shook hands with all three men, as did Shampoo, who grinned at them. "Auntie Nodoka, please let me introduce Adrian Stewart, Matt Jordan, and Richard Harrison, from LA. Guys, this is my Aunt Nodoka Saotome."

The woman walked forward gracefully, bowing slightly, then said in a voice with more of an accent than Akane possessed but still in good English, "It's very nice to meet you, Gentlemen. Akane and Shampoo have both told us a lot of interesting things about their trip to LA." She smiled at them. "It's very good of you to give the girls a chance like this."

"It's very good of them to allow us to, Ma'am," Adrian replied, also smiling. She gestured to the house.

"Won't you come in for tea? Soun is currently teaching a class, he'll be here in a few minutes, so while we wait I've prepared some snacks." Leading the way inside, she took them to a room that was clearly the living room. "Please sit. Akane, could you help me bring everything out?" Both women disappeared through another door, as the others sat, the three men looking around curiously.

"Nice place," Matt said, inspecting some artwork hanging on the wall, then looking out the wide sliding doorway, currently open, into a big garden with a pond in the middle of it.
"It's one of the larger houses left around Furinkan," Shampoo told them. "It's quite old, the family has lived here for a long time. Most of the area has been redeveloped over the years, so there aren't a lot of traditional houses like this around any more, which is a pity. I really like it."

Aiko suddenly looked up and swore in Japanese, sounding annoyed. She glanced at them, while Shampoo giggled at whatever she'd said. "Sorry, something just came up. I'll have to go and deal with it. It won't take long, I'll be back soon." Jumping to her feet she went out into the hallway and vanished as soon as she was around the corner. Blinking at the afterimages from the flash, Adrian exchanged glances with Matt.

"I wonder what that was about? And how did she know something was up?"

Coming back into the room with a tray, followed by Nodoka carrying another one, Akane shrugged, putting the tray on the table. "She does that. Magical Girl superpowers, I guess." Pouring cups of tea for everyone she handed them out, while the older woman passed around plates with a variety of small items of food on them. Trying some of the sushi rolls, Matt nodded his approval.

"Very nice, Mrs Saotome."

"Nodoka, please. Thank you." She smiled at him. "I wasn't sure what to make, I'm not familiar with the American diet, but I've discovered over the years that most people seem to like sushi of one type or another. I have a small cake for later as well."

"It's fine, thank you, Nodoka," Adrian assured her, eating another roll himself. Matt, his mouth full, nodded happily. Turning to Akane, he grinned at her. "Things are going well with the studio. It took some fast talking but I've got them to agree in principle to what we talked about the other week. There are a couple of hold-outs amongst the executives who will only be convinced when they see it for themselves, but I think they'll come around." He chuckled. "When they come around. From the dead faint..."

She laughed, as did Shampoo. Nodoka smiled politely, although she seemed genuinely amused.

"So what does this mean? What's next?" Akane looked both eager and curious.

"Well, basically, it means there's going to have to be another meeting, at the studio this time. Matt and I think we need to get you both over for about three, perhaps four days, and arrange a mock shoot. Do some real stunts, something picked from one or other of the scripts they're currently assessing. That would require some initial training in what is expected, but I wouldn't think either of you would have any trouble picking it up very fast, not after what I saw last time." He paused for thought for a minute, then Matt cut in.

"Can either one of you ride a motorcycle or drive a vehicle?" The two girls exchanged glances.

"Can ride motorbike," Shampoo said. "Not tried for while, probably rusty, but did have some practice few years ago." She shrugged, smiling a bit. "Prefer bike, better exercise."

"We've both driven go-karts in the past, and I did have a few lessons in driving a car a couple of years ago," Akane added, "But I didn't take it any further. Owning a car in Japan is much more expensive than in the US, and in Tokyo isn't really worth it unless you're going to do a lot of driving. Until recently I never much went outside the ward anyway."

He nodded, making some notes on a pad. "OK. Fair enough. I have a couple of stunts in mind that I think you could make truly spectacular, which involve vehicles, so we'll definitely have to work on that aspect of your training." Akane looked intrigued, sharing a glance with Shampoo, who shrugged slightly, smiling.

"It would be in about, hmm, probably three weeks," Adrian said after a little thought. "I'd like to do it sooner but a couple of the people you need to convince are away on business until then. There's no huge hurry, we can wait, plus it gives us more time to work out exactly what would be the best approach." He grinned at the girls, who suddenly looked apprehensive. "Don't worry. I have no doubt at all you can do anything we need. It'll be fun."

He was about to add more, when a tall man with long dark hair appeared in the doorway, dressed in a deep green loose-fitting gi, Kanji characters embroidered on the left breast. He looked around as Akane hopped to her feet. "Hi, Dad. This is Adrian Stewart, the director from the studio, Matt Jordan, the Stunt director, and Lieutenant Richard Harrison, LAPD. Guys, this is my father, Soun Tendo." They all stood, while Soun looked them up and down, then nodded to himself, suddenly smiling.

"It's very nice to meet you all," he said, again his English not as fluent as Akane's, but still good. Bowing slightly he added, "Thank you for everything you have done and are doing for my daughter." Straightening up he glanced at her, then smirked. "I was beginning to wonder if she'd be a store clerk for the rest of her life." Akane groaned.

"Dad! Stop embarrassing me." she whispered in Japanese, sounding aggrieved and embarrassed, the tone coming across perfectly even if the visitors couldn't understand the language. They all grinned.

"Oh, I have no doubt whatsoever she's destined for much more than that, Sir," Adrian said, taking the hand Soun held out and shaking it, feeling hard callous over a grip of incredible strength. He shook hands with both Richard and Matt as well, before everyone sat again, Nodoka passing him a cup of tea and a plate. "I'm glad to have this opportunity to meet you. Akane told us quite a lot about her family life when she was in LA, as did Shampoo. I needed to talk to the girls again and when Aiko offered to bring us over like that, it seemed like something worth doing." He shook his head in wonder. "I still find it unbelievable that less than half an hour ago we were in the middle of LA, then just like that we're in Tokyo."

"The abilities those girls have is remarkable," Richard agreed, grinning. "You've only seen the tip of the iceberg as well, trust me." Soun nodded with a small smile.

"They do seem to have a remarkable number of very unusual talents," he said. Glancing around he asked curiously, "Speaking of that, where is Aiko?"

"She had to go and deal with a problem, she said she'd be back soon," his daughter replied.

"Ah, I see. I wonder if it's another magical girl fight, or just some demons again." Soun grinned at the expressions on the two studio men's faces as they exchanged glances. "The magical girls are getting a little... over-exuberant, with Yori out of town," he explained. "There have been a few incidents. She and Chou seem to have some remarkable power to keep them from getting over excited and breaking things, which appears to involve a lot of shouting." Akane giggled.

"You should have seen some of the things on the news. She's terrifying when she really gets going. And has an amazing vocabulary."

"Not to mention a level of sarcasm that can strip paint at twenty metres," Soun chuckled, sipping his tea appreciatively. "A very nice girl, but by god you don't want to get on her bad side."

Richard snorted slightly, shaking his head. "No, you do not. It's a career-ending thing at best, from what I've seen. A certain Anthony Murray would heartily agree, I suspect, based on the news over the last few weeks." Soun nodded gravely.

"Yes, that particular incident does seem to have produced some very long-lived ramifications. I heard another bank in the US collapsed yesterday. That's five now, isn't it?"

"Six, I think. The one yesterday was the largest so far by far. What they uncovered at Halleckton seems to be snowballing constantly." The police lieutenant shook his head again, more sadly this time. "It's affecting a lot of people all over the world. Some people seem angry about that, but as far as I can see it would have been much worse to let it fester. Ten or fifteen years from now the results would have been horrible. There are a lot of financial experts that think this may in the long term have saved us from a very bad financial crisis."

"Very strange, the whole thing," Nodoka commented, pouring Matt another cup of tea. "And mostly down to a few young women who don't look old enough to be so powerful." She smiled a little. "But they're certainly very talented."

"Unbelievably so," Richard agreed, looking at her. "We worked together on the case that started all of this and I have to say I've never been as impressed in my life. Or as scared. They came to LA after Christmas and sorted out a nasty problem we had there as well, very effectively and quickly."

"Here, the US, Canada, the UK, I've even heard rumours they were in Australia before Canada," Akane said, looking impressed. "It's amazing. I still can't believe people so powerful and important would help me and Shampoo like that."

"They're very down to earth young ladies," the lieutenant told her. "Not at all full of themselves. I consider them very good friends, and from what I've seen of them it doesn't surprise me at all that they'd put themselves out to help you girls. That's basically what they do."

"Aiko said the same thing," Akane nodded, smiling. "Whatever, I'm very grateful for it all. Without them I don't know where I'd be now, but I suspect it would be a bad place." She shivered slightly, making Shampoo hold her hand for comfort for a moment.

"Don't think about things that didn't happen, Akane," her father advised. "Concentrate on what's going to happen, work at it, and make it wonderful." Looking around at the others, who had finished their tea and snacks, he added, "Would you like to look around before you continue?" Adrian looked at the others, then nodded.

"Certainly, thanks very much. I'm curious to see where Akane learned her art." Soun stood, prompting everyone else to do the same. Placing the empty utensils, plates, and cups back on one tray, Nodoka picked it up.

"Go on, Akane, I can do this," she said, smiling, when the youngest Tendo made a move to help.

Soun led them out into the garden, showing it to them. "It's a very nice garden. My wife used to look after it, she loved plants. My elder daughter Kasumi was the same." His face darkened slightly with sadness for a moment. "But she left some time ago. Since then, Nodoka has taken over maintaining it. She does a good job, it's beautiful right now." They looked around, agreeing. A lot of flowers were blooming, making the whole garden look very cheerful. Leading them past the pond he glanced at it nervously, making Shampoo and Akane exchanged delighted looks, but said nothing.

Back in the yard he headed for the Dojo. "My great-grandfather built this training hall around a hundred years ago. It wasn't used very much for the last fifteen years, but about two years ago we restarted the teaching seriously and now have nine students, with three more coming in soon. Genma and I are very pleased with their progress so far, there are at least four of them that will be very good and two of those will likely be superb." Going inside the visitors looked around with interest. A rather large, but clearly very muscular man, bald, wearing glasses and a blue gi, was talking to a couple of students, a boy and a girl, both looking around fifteen or sixteen, off to one side, while in the middle of the room seven other people ranging from perhaps fourteen up to about nineteen were going through a set of exercises. The man was glancing over occasionally to check on their progress. When he finished talking to the two students, they nodded, bowed to him, then moved over to a clear part of the floor and began sparring, while he watched critically.

The other students stopped their work, also watching, then clustered around one of the young men who pulled out a notebook, flipping through it for a moment, then reading something out. They all nodded, handing him various sums of money, before turning to watch the sparring match. The young man, clearly the bookie in the Dojo, counted his cash quickly before putting it into his pocket with a smile, also watching. Adrian and Matt exchanged glances, watching what looked to them both like some very good martial arts.

"These are just students?" Adrian whispered to his colleague. "I've seen some professionals who weren't as fast as that." Matt nodded, watching intently, his eyebrows raised and wearing an impressed expression.

"They're damn good," he whispered back. "Nowhere near Akane or Shampoo, but a lot better than most people I've come across."

The sparring match went on for about five minutes, before the girl finally pinned the boy and sat on him, looking pleased. He sighed loudly, submitting with a wave of his hand. The other students either smiled or frowned, the smilers turning to the young man holding the pot, who distributed their winnings, putting the remainder back into his pocket looking pleased. Standing and helping her defeated opponent to his feet, the girl bowed to him, as he returned the gesture of respect, then grinned.

The large man clapped, said something to both of them, then sent them back to the others, all of whom resumed their exercises. Watching in satisfaction for a moment he turned to Soun, inspecting the visitors with him curiously. "This is my partner and best friend Genma Saotome," the elder Tendo man said, waving him over. "Genma, these are the people from the studio in Hollywood, Adrian and Matt, and a friend of Aiko's, Richard, the policeman she mentioned."

"It's nice to meet you," Genma said in accented English, holding out his hand. They all shook it. "Akane has been talking about her trip to Los Angeles almost non stop for weeks." He grinned at the young woman, who rolled her eyes but smiled at him. "I hope there is some studio left afterwards," he added, snickering.

"Uncle Genma!" Akane looked annoyed, while Shampoo and Soun burst out laughing.

Richard grinned, then looked apologetic when Akane glared for a moment. "It was quite funny, Akane," he said by way of apology. "Aiko mentioned what happened in Minato that time."

She sighed slightly, shaking her head in embarrassment. "I'll never hear the end of that," the girl muttered. Matt and Adrian exchanged glances but wisely didn't ask.

"I understand that you and Soun are the teachers here?" the director said, quickly changing the subject.

"Yes. We've been friends since we were young, we learned together many years ago, and despite being apart for over ten years, in the end decided to restart the Dojo and teach." Genma glanced at his friend for a moment. "There was some confusion around here a few years back but after it all settled down and we rebuilt the Dojo, we've managed to make it all work quite well. Once we get the three new students in and up to speed, we'll probably have all the work we can handle for a while." He looked at Akane for a moment.

"I had hoped that Akane would be able to start teaching at some point, but I suspect she will be much too busy for that." The young woman grinned.

"I don't know I could teach, Uncle Genma."

"Not yet, Akane, but in the not too distant future, certainly. At least the basics." He smiled slightly. "I believe by the standards of much of the world that would be to a fairly high level."

Matt nodded slowly. "If what I've seen here is representative of your school and the effectiveness of your teaching, I'd have to agree. I know a fair amount about martial arts and other forms of hand to hand fighting and I have to say all your students do look very competent. Do you have some formal form of skill rankings?"

"Anything Goes doesn't work quite like that," Soun explained. "It's a style that amalgamates the best of a number of other styles into it's own, then extends the techniques. There are two main branches, primarily designed by Genma and myself, based on the teachings of our old Grand Master Happosai." He looked slightly worried for a moment, glancing around nervously, then at Genma, who sighed in relief when nothing happened. "We try not to talk about him. We are the highest ranking in our school, after him, and we have the right to allow others to teach it. A student's ranking is decided by one or both of us when we decide they have reached the appropriate level. It's a continuous process."

"Interesting." Matt listened with a thoughtful look. "Do you have moves and techniques that are specific to your school?"

"Oh, yes, many of them. We utilise other techniques, as I said, but we also come up with completely new ones. Some of those are too dangerous to teach to just anyone, I'm afraid. Like the Amazon techniques that I believe Akane and Shampoo showed you, they can only be passed on to people we trust not to use them wrongly." He glanced at his friend for a moment. "There have been problems in the past when we didn't have that rule. But, I hope, we learned our lesson in that respect."

"A few of the techniques are sealed, they're too dangerous to pass on at all," Genma added. Matt looked intrigued.

"How dangerous can they possibly be?" Genma and Soun exchanged glances for a moment. Eventually Soun nodded, shrugging a little.

"Come with me," the bald man said, indicating the door. They all followed him outside. All the students abandoned their lesson for the moment and rushed to the door and windows to watch. Walking over to where a large block of stone with a round hole in it stood to one side, near the wall, Genma bent down and picked up a wooden post from a stack of them on the ground, dropping it into the hole so it stood upright. The post was close to eight inches in diameter and four feet long, the three Americans noted, and was clearly very solid and heavy wood, but he showed no difficulty moving it. Stepping away some twenty feet, he turned to them.

About to speak, he jumped a little when Aiko suddenly appeared in the middle of the yard, making her grin. "Sorry, Genma. I didn't mean to startle you." He shrugged a little, smiling.
"Don't worry about it, Aiko."

"Did you resolve the problem?" Akane asked curiously. The magical girl nodded, a slight frown on her face.

"Yes, it took longer than I hoped but it wasn't too bad. Lots of irritating little ankle-biters running around the place and the girl who chases them, or attracts them, or something. Annoying but not a major issue. Poor girl was very apologetic, but it caused quite a lot of chaos. Misaki is finishing up now." She looked around. "So what's going on?"

"Genma is demonstrating why some of the Anything Goes techniques he came up with are sealed," Richard said, sounding very interested. She nodded understandingly.

"Ah. I see. Mind if I watch?"

"No, not at all," Genma replied. "All right, this is one of the techniques I invented. It's simply too dangerous to use, more powerful than I expected. To be honest it scares me a little." They watched as he turned to face the post. Assessing it for a moment while everyone watched, he suddenly made a blindingly fast slashing move with one hand. A visible distortion in the air crossed the distance between him and the post in a fraction of a second, passing through the post as if it wasn't there. The top foot of the post, cut completely through at an angle, slid to the ground. The Americans stared in amazed horror, while everyone else looked impressed. The students talked amongst themselves excitedly.

"Not bad," Aiko said, nodding. He repeated the feat with the other hand, then used both at once, reducing the post to a number of sections on the ground.

"Holy fuck," Matt murmured, shocked. "How the hell did you do that?"

"It's a technique that uses ki to focus a huge change in air pressure to a very fine line," Genma replied, walking back to the post and picking up one of the sections, then bringing it over to them. "The centre of the distortion is more or less a perfect vacuum. It will cut through many things at short range." Showing them the sliced piece of wood which had a smooth finish like a giant knife had gone through it, he tossed it back to the other pieces. "Wood, bricks, stone... People..." They all shuddered at the thought. "That's why it's too dangerous to use. It's a killing technique. A true martial artist doesn't kill except in the most extreme of circumstances."

"There are other techniques that are similarly dangerous," Soun added. "Those ones, we don't teach. You understand why."

Adrian nodded, glancing at his colleague. "Yes, I do. That's... absolutely terrifying." "Other techniques aren't quite as devastating, but are still dangerous, either to use or indeed to learn. They can only be taught safely to a student who has reached a suitable level. Someone trying too early could easily be damaged or killed," the Tendo patriarch said. "None of our students other than Akane are anywhere the level they can learn special techniques. Or Shampoo, we'll be teaching both of them in due course. Both are very good indeed."

Still staring at the pile of post slices on the ground, Matt nodded slowly, then seemed to remember something. "Sir, I don't know if Akane mentioned it, but I'm interested in having her teach some of her skills to a number of my own people. Would that be permitted?" Soun looked at his daughter with an evaluating expression, then glanced at Genma.

"We have discussed it. I have also talked to Elder Cologne about the similar request you made to Shampoo. All three of us feel that, with some specific limitations, we would allow our students to pass on some of their skills. Genma and I think that sometime after Christmas, at the current rate, we could grant her a beginning teaching certificate, which would permit her to teach the basics. I suspect that would be sufficient for your immediate requirements." Akane was looking both surprised and very pleased, grinning widely.

Matt nodded, smiling. "Thank you, Sir. I appreciate that very much."

"Don't thank me until after you see the teaching methods," Soun grinned. "Some of her students may not enjoy the experience at first. It can be... a bit of a shock. On the other hand, our methods seem to work quite well." He glanced at Shampoo. "I think that the Elder will be talking to you soon about something similar." She nodded.

"Has already talked. Still working out list of things allowed to teach."

"Ah, I see. All right." He turned back to the others. "Cologne told me that she would allow Shampoo to pass on her own basic, non-secret moves, and assess the student's abilities. Those she felt could genuinely benefit from and perhaps survive more intensive training would be referred to her. She would undertake this training directly, should the student wish to continue." Soun shrugged a little, smiling. "They might not having met her."

"Great-Grandmother acquired taste," Shampoo giggled. Soun, Genma, and Akane all laughed.

"Indeed. But, despite problems we have had in the past, well worth acquiring," the elder Tendo said, making the Amazon look pleased. "I'm slightly surprised that she's even allowed this much, in the past the Amazons have been very secretive about their methods. I have a suspicion she may be working on some long-term plan to bring income to the tribe through Hollywood." He grinned at Matt and Adrian. "She's very sneaky, very smart, and takes a very long term view."

"We would work on a similar basis," Genma told them. "If Akane feels that a student of hers was particularly gifted we would want to assess them ourselves to decide on the best method to proceed. As we've said, there are some risks involved and we have no wish to injure someone who wasn't up to the job. With no disrespect to Akane, she doesn't yet have the experience to make this decision." He glanced apologetically at the youngest Tendo, who nodded, accepting the judgement without comment.

"That all sounds fair. I look forward to seeing how it all works out." Matt looked very pleased.

"So do we. One note of warning, we don't have much spare capacity for teaching at the moment, and won't for perhaps six to eight months. But I wouldn't expect that either Akane or Shampoo would have found any advanced students by then anyway. They are both unusually gifted in this field and also benefit from years of training. I'd think even with regular lessons any of their students would be two or three years away from requiring a more advanced teacher." Soun shrugged a little. "But when it happens, we're interested in seeing the results."

"Do you think they could produce students who could do the sort of things they can?" Richard asked curiously. The two teachers glanced at each other.

"I... really don't know," Soun finally said slowly. "If they caught them early enough, possibly. To be honest, from what we've seen in our careers, very few people have the inherent ability to learn a martial art to that level. For some reason most of them seem to end up in Nerima, which certainly makes it an interesting place to live. But even in Japan probably only one in a hundred students could get to, for example, Mariko's level, and perhaps one in a hundred of those get to Akane's or Shampoo's level. And they'd have to start quite young to have a chance to reach their full potential, unless they were astoundingly gifted. It certainly happens, but it's unusual. In America... I'm not sure at all. I have nothing to base anything more than an opinion on."

"Even in Amazon village, number of people reach my level not big," Shampoo told them. "Most very good by normal standards, even superb, but only few close to me."

"And that's in a population that's more or less been breeding for that sort of talent for a very long time," Akane said. "Cologne would know the number, but whether she'd tell you is another matter." The LA policeman nodded thoughtfully.

"I see. Interesting. But I would expect that regardless of the ability to learn the more esoteric and rather frightening skills, your teaching would certainly improve most martial artists abilities considerably."

"I would think that would be the case," her father agreed. "It will be interesting to find out." Genma glanced over to the Dojo, scowling at all the faces peering out at them, which promptly vanished back inside.

"It was nice to meet you all," he said, "but I have to get back to this lesson." Once more he shook hands with them. "Perhaps we'll meet again." Heading back inside the Dojo he started calling instructions to the students, who hastened to obey, slightly worried by what they'd just seen.

"Come on, Richard, let's leave them to it and go say hello to Sergeant Harada and Captain Uehara," Aiko said, smiling at the lieutenant. He nodded, returning her smile.

"Good idea. I'll see you guys later, OK?"

Adrian looked at him. "All right. Have fun with your friends."

"Call me when you want to go back," Aiko told him, before walking off with Harrison then vanishing. The director blinked, smiling and looking impressed.

"I still find that amazing," he commented. "I wish I could persuade her to come work for us."

"She's got more important work," Akane laughed. "Let's go back inside, Adrian, you can tell us the rest of what's going on." They all followed Soun back into the house, the two Americans glancing back over their shoulders at the pieces of post and shivering.
"This place is wonderful," Fumiko said happily, dropping next to Nabiki where she lay on the side of a hill sunbathing. "No one but us for a hundred kilometres in any direction, nice and warm, no rain, good food, fantastic views, what more could you want?"

"It's pretty damn nice," the middle sister agreed sleepily. Pointing up into the clear deep blue sky she added, "Just look at that thing. This is a view people back home would never believe." Above them was a faint but visible arc of twinkling lights, the ring system of the planet they were on, going from horizon to horizon. "Jun says its about two thirds the distance to the moon at home on the inner rim and about twice that on the outer one. Mostly made of ice and small chunks of rock. It's not stable, it will only last for a few million years, so have a look at it while you can." She giggled to herself. Pulling out her camera she took another photo of it, then put it away.

"Still using that? Even though you've got those cool little drones now?" Fumiko looked curiously at her friend, who nodded.

"Of course. Electronic cameras, even high tech, partly magical alien ones, as good as they are, still don't quite do what real film does. They go well together, though." Fumiko looked up as a faint hum heralded the arrival of one of the little camera spheres, which zipped in from somewhere over the other side of the hill to hover above them. She laughed.

"So you're keeping an eye out all over the place?"

"Yep. Mostly because of the view but it's kind of fun as well. Jun can link to them over an amazing distance and control the things easily. It's becoming quite normal to have a few windows open in view with feeds from them. Funny what you can get used to." Nabiki smiled, closing her eyes, the drone moving down to peer at Fumiko from a metre away, before spinning around and shooting off into the distance, fading from view as it went. "The stealth mode is pretty good. You can sort of see a really faint distortion if you're looking for it, it's not anywhere near as good as the effect Ranma and Kasumi can produce, but if there was anything else going on you'd never notice. The resolution is amazing as well, it's much better than my eyes are. I might buy some more when we get back to Fwetna."

"I'll have to look into it as well," Fumiko commented, lying back with a smile. "They could be useful in a fight."

"That's what Jun thought. It's having fun collecting useful tools, I think. Like those force field spacesuits. They were surprisingly cheap, only two thousand credits. I got a couple of them and the charging unit." Nabiki chuckled suddenly. "Jun just told me again that it doesn't understand fun. It's clearly lying." They both laughed. "What are the others doing?"

"Don't you already know, my many eyed surveillance friend?" The other woman giggled as Nabiki glanced at her, then grinned.

"I'm not spying on everyone all the time, you know. One drone is about five kilometres up following an interesting sort-of bird, one is way over that way getting some shots of the sea, and the last one is right here." She produced it on the palm of her hand, then flipped it into the air. "I suppose I could send it off to find them."

"No need. Ranma and Onkra are having a lesson, Tamiko is deciding on what colour and pattern she wants on her flying form with Kasumi, and Uthryyl and Quannyr are making lunch."
"Have you worked out what scheme you want?" the middle Tendo asked with interest. In answer her friend bounced to her feet and shimmered into a flying version of herself, spreading her wings widely with a huge grin. They had dark brown fur with blonde tips, which gave a very attractive effect as it moved in the light breeze, patterns coming and going when the strands of fur moved about. Underlaid beneath that were slightly darker stripes which were only visible from certain angles. "Oh, very nice," Nabiki complimented the other woman, who looked extremely pleased with herself.

"Isn't it?" Fumiko brought one wing around in front of her and stroked it with satisfaction. "This is completely amazing, even bearing in mind all the other things we do all the time. I've wanted to be able to fly my entire life."

"I think most people probably have," Nabiki agreed, getting up and studying her friend closely. "It's one of the absolutely fundamental dream types, everyone has a flying dream soon or later. The difference is we can actually do it."

Still smiling, Fumiko leaned into the breeze, raising her wings and closing her eyes. "It feels amazing just standing here."

"It's much better when you're actually in the air." The middle sister laughed to herself, remembering. "Do you want to wait for Tamiko or try it out right now?"

Without even needing to think about it, Fumiko replied, "Right now. I can't wait any more." Taking on her flying Nabiki aspect, the Tendo woman nodded, grinning.

"Good enough." She looked around, then pointed. "Come on, let's go and run down the steep side of the hill, it will probably be easier for the first time." Folding her wings Fumiko followed her friend, still grinning like an idiot, the tip of her tail twitching with excitement. They paused at the top of the hill, which from here ran down at close to a forty degree angle for over a kilometre until it levelled out somewhat, heading down to the sea some distance away, the visibly green water quite calm.

"OK, I'd try spreading your wings and just running, you'll feel when you get lift. Then flap. It seems to come pretty naturally." She laughed at herself. "I jumped off a damn great cliff, it was a very good incentive to learn quickly, even if I knew in my head I wouldn't come to any damage my body wasn't so sure." Fumiko giggled.

"That was a horrible trick to play on you, what Kasumi did."

"It was a bit of a shock. She's certainly got a weird sense of humour these days. Even Ranma looked surprised." Laughing, Fumiko spread her wings widely, tilting them into the wind and feeling the direction and strength. Taking a deep breath she sprinted down the hill, her feet coming off the ground within a dozen metres, then started flapping, quickly rising. A yell of triumph came back on the wind to Nabiki, who laughed, following after the other girl, her camera pacing them off to one side.

"This is incredible!" Fumiko shrieked happily, flapping vigorously. "AAAHH!" Slightly over-correcting she suddenly plummeted, before pulling out with a yell.

"You OK, Fumiko?" Nabiki called from above her.

"Yep. Just screwed it up a bit. I think I've got it."

"Good. Come on, we need some altitude, then we can practice. I can show you what some very good teachers showed me." Climbing hard, they both headed up, the taller woman laughing with delight the entire way.

Half an hour later, when Tamiko and Kasumi came out of the rented accommodation and looked around, their attention was drawn to distant laughter hundreds of metres up, causing them to watch as two small figures dived and wheeled about above them, clearly having a wonderful time.
Kasumi giggled, watching her sister loop, coming in behind Fumiko then firing a small ki ball at her, which caused the other flying girl to roll sharply to the side and dive hard. Tamiko watched open-mouthed as they had a magical girl ki ball tag dogfight, her smile slowly growing so wide it threatened to split her head in half.

"There!" She pointed up. "I want to go there! How do I fly with these things?" Spreading her deep auburn wings which had dark leopard-like rosettes, she looked at them eagerly. Kasumi laughed, shimmering into a flying form of her own. "Come on, I'll show you."

Very soon after that, five flying magical girls lit up the early evening sky with ki based tracer fire, three D'sage watching from the ground with enormous enjoyment, shaking their heads at the antics of those weird aliens.

Sergeant Harada looked up from his desk as he heard a familiar voice, smiling at Aiko, then brightened further at the sight of the man beside her. Standing, he held out his hand, grinning.
"Hello, Richard. I didn't know you were in Tokyo. How are you? It's very nice to see you again."

Shaking the hand of his friend, Harrison grinned back. "I'm doing very well, Tetsuo. It was a spur of the moment thing only possible because of magical girls." He indicated Aiko who had taken a seat at an unoccupied desk and was watching them both with amusement. She mock-saluted him, laughing slightly. "How's things with you?"

"Personally, very good indeed. Emiko is pregnant, I think I told you?" Harrison nodded. "About two months along. Everything looks good so far, according to the latest check-up."

"Congratulations. Do you know whether it's a boy or a girl yet?"

"No. We discussed it but we're not sure we want to know. That might change, it might not. But there's some time to go yet." He looked momentarily nervous. "Being a father is going to take some getting used to."

"It's well worth it, believe me," his friend said wisely. They both sat down. "Serena is the best thing that ever happened to me after Emily."

"So you've said. I'd like to meet them both one day." Harada looked at Aiko. "How did that little incident earlier go?"

She shrugged a bit, seeming annoyed. "OK, I guess. It was only a nuisance rather than a disaster, not even much damage, but I really hate those little bastards. Like bitey little rat monsters from hell." They both laughed at her description. "Little miss princess is a bit of a pain as well, although I don't think she really means to be. I still can't figure out whether she follows them or they follow her, but they always turn up as a set. And things get nibbled. Very irritating." Shaking her head she sighed.

"We blew most of them up, then had a word with her. She needs to learn to shoot straight aside from anything else. I'll write you a report later. The girl was very apologetic and left once we'd dealt with the things. There was one damaged car, they ate it's tires, and a wall got a few holes blown in it when she missed. Several times." Harada nodded, grinning at the tone in her voice.

"Thanks. Hopefully things will go back to what passes for normal when Yori and Chou get back."

"I hope so. There's been more insanity in the last two weeks than in the previous six months." Aiko shook her head again. "I have no idea why it all kicked off as soon as they were out of touch. Everything was pretty quiet when we were running around all over the world after those damn portal devices."

"The crazy obviously knows when Yori is out of town and saves itself for then. In the US doesn't count," Harada chuckled.

"It's as good an explanation as anything." She got up. "I'm just going to go and say hello to the Captain. Is she in her office?"

"Yes." He watched as she headed for the corridor to the rear of the station, smiling slightly, before returning his attention to his friend. "So, what brings you to Minato? I thought you'd had your fill of the place last time."

Laughing, Harrison shrugged, his hands wide. "It's insane, clearly, but so is Hollywood. As long as I don't need to be demon bait I like it. Mainly because of the people." He explained the situation regarding the Tendo girl and her Amazon friend. Harada listened with great interest.

"Hmm. That's pretty fascinating. I've heard of Akane Tendo and Shampoo before. There was a rather spectacular incident here before Christmas involving Ms Tendo and one Ryoga Hibiki, who she seems to heartily dislike." He rummaged around in his desk for a moment, pulling out a folder, opening it and removing some photos which he showed to his friend. "She's capable of some fairly impressive feats of strength when sufficiently motivated, it seems."

Harrison looked through the photos, whistling silently at the damage. "Wow. That's putting it mildly. I'd heard from Aiko about some of this, but she didn't go into too much detail. Akane did all this by herself?"

"Mr Hibiki was responsible for some of it, but the Tendo girl did her fair share. The Neriman martial artists are easily capable of as much damage as the magical girls are, and they're even crazier. That place can be a complete madhouse. I went to see an old friend of mine after it happened, just out of curiosity, who had a lot of information on the Tendo girl, this Shampoo person, and a lot of others. They're all nuts." He grinned.

"Oh, I wouldn't say that, precisely. Akane and Shampoo both strike me as very nice people. I suspect they've both matured a lot in the last year, Akane certainly. Aiko mentioned there was some sort of unusual medical problem at the base of her anger issues, which Chou and Yori had found and fixed. She didn't mention any details but seemed to think it had helped a lot. Judging by what I saw when they were in LA a couple of weeks ago, it did dramatically improve things. Akane seemed quite well adjusted and stable, if a little naïve."

"I doubt Yori would have recommended her to this director of yours if she didn't feel the young woman was stable enough to be trusted. She certainly wasn't before Christmas last year, based on this and the reports Norio showed me." Putting the folder away again he looked pleased. "Good luck to her. I hope it all works out."

"I think it probably will. Adrian and Matt both seem very excited about working with those two young ladies, Adrian looked like a kid in a candy story with unlimited credit when he was watching them show off what they could do." Harrison laughed. "Matt and Aaron, the arms master from the studio, just looked like they were about to faint."

Chuckling, Harada nodded. "I can imagine, even the martial artists from Nerima are impressive enough if you're not used to it. Some of them could probably give a few of the magical girls a hard time even without magic. A few of them are seriously dangerous."

"Shampoo certainly is. She's clearly been raised to be a very competent fighter, and I suspect has the mental attitude to be extremely good at it. Akane isn't quite as potentially bloodthirsty, I think, but she'd probably be a bad person to threaten. She seemed very pleased with herself when she was telling us about how she dealt with would-be thieves at that jewellery shop she works at." The American grinned. "Adrian and Matt are fascinated by this Tendo Dojo. We saw some remarkably good students practising there, and Genma Saotome showed off a stunningly dangerous advanced technique when he and Soun Tendo were explaining why they wouldn't teach certain things. Having seen it in action I agree completely."

"I've heard some of those special moves are appallingly dangerous and powerful. There was one martial artist, related to Genma actually, his son, who is on record as having had the ability to call up a small tornado on demand."

"Interesting. Akane mentioned the technique, and that she knew someone who could do it. I guess it was probably the same person. Is he around here?" Harada shrugged.

"Your guess is as good as mine. Nearly five years ago something happened. No one who knows for sure will say what. But this Ranma person and the oldest Tendo sister, Kasumi, disappeared overnight and no one has seen or heard anything of them since. It's very odd, they dropped off the planet completely as far as I can find out. Quite a lot of people were looking for them for a long time, some still are I believe, including the Chinese Amazons. Apparently he was engaged to Shampoo, at least by their laws. I don't know any more about that, but it meant they were looking for him very hard."

"Weird."

"Very. There were some extremely strange things going on with that young man, even by Neriman or Minato standards, according to Norio. He also was apparently the most gifted martial artist anyone had ever seen."

Harrison grinned for a moment. "As good as Yori? I find that hard to believe having seen her in action."

"I don't know, but it would be an interesting thing to see, her up against this martial arts prodigy." Harada laughed. "You could probably make a killing on betting on the right side. But, it seems unlikely to ever happen. I have actually wondered if he ended up going through a portal and leaving permanently, probably with this Kasumi Tendo. They disappeared so completely and effectively no one has seen or heard anything from them in years. Amazingly professional job." He was silent for a moment, thinking. "I have wondered, on and off, if I should mention it to Yori. It's just possible she actually knew the man. It might explain where she learned so much, if he'd taught her. He'd be a few years older, I think, although I'm not sure how old either she or Chou really are. Looking at them I'd guess about twenty but like I told you when you came the first time, looks can be deceiving with the magical girls."

"If Yori does know him, or knew him, do you think she'd tell you if you did ask?" Harrison wondered. "She seems to me to be the sort of person who can keep a secret and would never betray a friend."
Harada sighed a little. "Believe me, I know. That's why I've never said anything although I've been wondering about it for months. I don't want to offend her, I consider both of them friends, although I'm extremely curious. Quite a few people back in Nerima are genuinely worried about those two, they'd be reassured if they knew they were OK even if they never saw them again. But, I guess in all probability we'll never know."

"What about the other sister?" Harrison asked curiously. "Akane hasn't said a lot about her."

"Nabiki Tendo. She's not a martial artist but has a reputation as a very bad person to get on the wrong side of. Extremely smart, scary smart Norio said, and capable of being very cold and calculating. Practically ran her high school through various information brokering services, he told me. His view was that she'd have ended up running the Yakuza at some point if it wasn't for whatever happened years ago." Harada grinned a little as Harrison snickered. "Very capable young woman by all accounts. She seems to have turned her life around, away from the path she might have been heading down, now she's a student at a university in Setagaya, I think. Some sort of business degree. She'll still probably end up running the country..."

"Interesting family." Harrison looked amused.

"Yes. Nerima produces some odd people but they seem some of the better adjusted, oddly enough. Now, at any rate. Akane was responsible for some huge percentage of all the trouble in Nerima, or involved at least, but in the last few months that's stopped pretty much completely. They've become a well respected family again. Soun and Genma restarting the Dojo took everyone by surprise, apparently, and actually doing well at it was a real shock. But they're definitely doing a good job from what I hear. Something of a success story."

"If this movie studio thing works out I suspect they'll make out like bandits. I could almost hear Adrian and Matt both thinking that they were looking at a Dojo full of future action movie stars." The lieutenant chuckled. "Nerima may well end up supplying some very well paid stunt people."

His friend laughed, looking up as Aiko came back with Captain Uehara, talking quietly to her and smiling.

"Hello, Lieutenant. I'm pleased to see you. How are things at home?" The captain sat after greeting him, inspecting him closely. "You look well."

"Thank you, Captain. It's nice to see you again. Things are fine, nothing as odd as that case so far, although LA has it's own share of bizarre happenings. It's a strange place." Harrison shrugged, smiling at the woman. "Not as strange as here, obviously, but weird." She smiled back slightly.

"So I gather. Aiko was telling me about some of her and her friend's adventures there at the New Year. It sounds like a large disaster was narrowly averted."

The LAPD officer shuddered a little. "All too closely. Having heard about what happened in Halleckton, I started having nightmares again. I'm very glad your girls were able to help. The US owes Japan a debt of gratitude in my opinion."

"That's nice of you to say, Richard, but we were only doing what we do," Aiko noted, looking pleased. He glanced at her.

"So you say, but it's not something most people could or to be honest would do. You're all building quite a reputation for yourselves internationally. There are a lot of people who are very grateful for your interventions."
"Yori will be annoyed. She doesn't want a reputation." Aiko grinned at them. "She just wants a quiet life."

"Picked the wrong career, then," Harada joked. She shrugged, laughing a little.

"It kind of picked her, like it did to all of us." The brunette was about to say something else when she got a distant look, then swore. "Oh, for fuck's sake. Not again." Looking apologetic she shrugged, pushing off from the desk she was leaning against. "Sorry, got to go. A persistent problem is back." Walking to the door she waved. "Back soon." Vanishing with the usual flash, she left silence behind her for a moment.

"I wonder what that persistent problem is?" Harrison asked.

"I suspect it's a number of girls from one of the more famous teams in Minato. They seem to have something of a feud going on with Yori and the others at the moment," Harada responded, sighing. "I'm not sure why. They're very powerful, probably the most powerful group around at least in theory, but every time they've come up against Yori or her friends they've lost quickly. I know of at least one time she beat the entire lot of them single-handedly. Most of them seem to both hate and fear her. Their group was well respected for some time, but shortly before Yori came to the area they started getting a reputation for causing more damage than what they were fighting and it's been getting worse ever since."

"Those girls aren't liked much around here, by and large," Captain Uehara nodded, looking sad. "It's a pity, but they seem to have lost much of the respect they once enjoyed, although I'm not sure they even realise it. I gather they annoy Yori immensely. I don't think she takes any real enjoyment in dealing with them, even though some of her interactions have been very amusing to watch on the news, but she seems to feel they're casting a bad light on all the other girls. Unprofessional, was the description she used. Even some of the other groups seem to be starting to dislike them quite a lot."

Sergeant Harada sighed. "It could be a real problem if they've decided to take the opportunity of Yori being away to start trouble. There's something like eight or nine of them, I think, they seem to work as two teams most of the time. One team is five girls, including the one who's apparently their leader. She seems to have become more and more bad tempered over the last year or so. Colleagues in the area they mostly work in have mentioned that their interactions with the police and the community are getting downright rude and dismissive, which isn't making them any friends."

"Yori is going to be very, very irritated when she gets back. I'm afraid that those girls are putting themselves into a bad place. The other team at least seems to avoid this whole area like the plague since she thrashed them the last time, but the first group pops up every now and then. They turned up around a week ago chasing one little inoffensive demon and destroyed half a street, until Aiko and the others shut them down. Very effectively, actually, it was most impressive. Yori and Chou have obviously been training them pretty intensively this last year. Afterwards, Fumiko gave them the lecturing of a lifetime then made them pick everything up, which probably didn't help their outlook as far as our girls go, but was clearly necessary."

"I heard that one of them was helping Fumiko and her friends?" the captain half-asked. He nodded.

"Yes. That one with the short blue hair, whatever her name is. She's different, a nice polite girl and extremely bright, I think. She's been around several times in the last week helping our lot deal with annoying problems. I haven't really met her aside from in passing, but she seems very responsible, and I suspect, embarrassed about her friends. Poor girl looked mortified when the other four went off last week." He sighed slightly before looking at his watch. "It's lunch time, I think. Richard, would you like to come and get something to eat with me? Perhaps that restaurant we went to last time?"
"Sure. Sounds good. That was very nice." Harrison smiled, standing up, then glanced at the captain. "Captain Uehara? Would you like to join us?" She thought for a moment, looking around the office, then at her own watch, before nodding.

"I think I will do. Thank you, gentlemen. I'll have to be back fairly soon but I haven't been out for lunch for weeks." They left the station discussing LA, Hollywood, and magical girls.

"Give her back!"

Aiko exchanged glances with Misaki, who shrugged. "Give who back?"

"You know." The twin-ponytailed blonde stepped forward pugnaciously, glaring at the two young women. Aiko shook her head slowly.

"Sorry, no idea what you're talking about."

"Ami, that's who I'm talking about. She's my friend, I want her back. What have you done to her?" The girl looked on the verge of tears and also very angry. Aiko looked at her team-mate again, who looked blankly back, before studying the four young women in front of her on the roof of the bank.

"We haven't done anything to her. I haven't seen her in two days."

"I haven't seen her in a week! She won't talk to me, she doesn't answer her phone, when I went to her house yesterday her mother said she didn't want to talk to any of us. You did something to her. Some sort of magic to turn her away from us. I want her back!" She nearly howled the last word then broke down in tears. The other blonde girl put her arm around her and hugged her while shooting them an evil look. Aiko sighed, inspecting them.

The girl with black hair as long as Yori's was standing at the back, uncharacteristically quiet, looking slightly embarrassed and like she wished she wasn't there. Meeting Aiko's eyes she stared for a moment then dropped her gaze, looking at the ground and not saying anything. She was radiating uncertainty, which for her was very unusual, since normally she was one of the most aggressive in her team. Now she just looked confused and worried. The remaining girl, the brunette, was glancing alternately at her and the two blondes, seeming unsure what to do.

After a silent discussion with Misaki, Aiko took a step forward. "Look. We haven't done anything to Ami. I'm sorry if she's not talking to you, but honestly, we're only friends with her. She's a nice, intelligent girl, as you know yourself. She's helped us on a few occasions, out of the goodness of her heart and a sense of responsibility, and because Chou asked her to. That's all. We're not trying to take her away from you or anything like that." She sighed quietly as she watched the other girl. "She's upset at the moment, I know that, she's not happy with the rest of you because of the way you've been acting recently. But she's still your friend. If she wasn't she'd have left a long time ago. I think she just wants some space at the moment. If you let her think it out I'm pretty sure she'll talk to you soon enough."

"Why should I believe you? It's some evil magic, I'm sure." The blonde looked defiant, sniffing and wiping her eyes. Aiko sighed again.

"You can believe me or not believe me, I can't do much about that. But it's not some evil magic. It's just a pissed off Ami."

"Perhaps we should listen to Aiko," the black haired girl said quietly, not meeting anyone's eyes. Her team-mates looked at her with expressions of betrayal and surprise, the two blondes particularly.

"What?" the first one yelped. "Whose side are you on?"

"I'm trying to be sensible." The girl looked upset and confused. "I've been thinking about all this and I'm not sure you're right." Shrugging off the arm of her friend, the blonde girl pulled herself to her full height with a furious expression.

"Not right? What the fuck are you talking about? Of course I'm right."

Aiko looked at Misaki as the four girls suddenly started shouting at each other. "Um, excuse me?" she tried. They completely ignored her, yelling insults at each other, the brunette waving a fist at the black-haired one who looked annoyed and shoved her. Growling, the brunette shoved back, then punched her compatriot in the face. This triggered a complete free for all, all four girls shrieking angrily and hitting each other, although luckily not using their magic. Aiko pinched the bridge of her nose and winced at the migraine that was threatening to come on, while Misaki watched the internecine fight with amused interest, eating an apple. When her friend looked at her she shrugged and tossed her one as well.

In the end they sat on the wall running around the flat roof, waiting for the girls to get it out of their system. Thuds and smacks echoed over the rooftops as they beat the hell out of each other with very little style or grace, while Aiko and Misaki recorded the fight for the amusement of the others, finishing off their apples. Eventually, though, the short brunette sighed. "This is fun and all but I have better things to do, guys." She stood, walked over and grabbed the brunette, pulling her away from the taller blonde and prodding some pressure points which dropped her on the spot. Misaki did the same with her opponent. Turning to the other two Aiko was about to deal with the young woman who had started the entire thing when the black-haired girl knocked her unconscious with a quick punch to the side of the head, completely losing her temper.

"Bitch," she muttered, rubbing her fist and wincing. Aiko and Misaki looked at each other again.

"Very strange girls," Aiko commented silently.

"Completely nuts, they make us look normal," Misaki responded, looking around at the three unconscious figures and the sole upright one, who appeared very battered and irritated, with a nice black eye developing. "Even for them this is a little excessive. I can see why Ami is avoiding them at the moment if this is what they're like."

"They seem close to some sort of breakdown. When Ranma and Kasumi get back we're going to have to look into this. It's not normal even for these girls. I'm beginning to wonder if something is causing it."

Misaki shrugged a bit. "I suppose that's possible. Why just these four, though? The other ones are a pain in the backside but seem content to just avoid the entire area. This bunch keep turning up recently and they're crazier every time."

"No idea at all. I'm going to have to talk to Ami again, see if she has any ideas. Oh well, let's get them out of here. Back to that temple, I suppose, the old priest there seems to have a pretty good grasp on reality. He obviously knows about them even if they don't realise it. Perhaps he can talk some sense into them." She glanced at the standing girl, who looked guiltily back at her.

"Sorry," she said in a quiet voice.

"Nothing got broken this time, so I doubt there's anything much Yori will say," Aiko told her with a small smile. "Aside from wondering why you're all shouting at each other. OK, I'll take you all back to your temple. You want to pick up your friend there? We'll get the other two." The young woman groaned, dropping to one knee and slinging the unconscious blonde over her shoulder, before rising again. Aiko and Misaki retrieved the remaining pair, then they all vanished.

The old man looked around the room and sighed very softly, before turning his gaze to his granddaughter, who wouldn't meet his eyes. "This seems... unhelpful," he finally said, moving over to her and gently turning her face to his. He ran his fingers over her face very carefully, looking at the damage to it. "You'll need some ice for that eye." She nodded, silently, looking upset and embarrassed. Briefly hugging her, he turned to Aiko and Misaki. "I'll talk to them. I don't know if it will help, but I'll see what I can do."

"Thank you, sir," Aiko responded, bowing slightly. "That would be appreciated. We're getting a bit worried about their behaviour recently, even for them it's a bit weird. It might be a good idea to check for some sort of external influence. Something isn't right about all this." He nodded. "I will do. Thank you for stopping this before it got any worse." Looking at the three unconscious girls, he asked curiously, "How long will they be asleep?"

"Those two, probably about twenty minutes. The other one, I'm not sure. We didn't put her down."

"She really pissed me off. Sorry." Smiling a little he quickly checked the blonde, nodding to himself. "I'd think she'll probably wake up about the same time. You know it isn't a good idea to knock someone out by hitting them in the head, child?"

"They heal fast, she'll probably be all right," Aiko said, watching. "If there are any aftereffects Yori or Chou can sort it out when they get back, but I think she'll be fine." Glancing at the other girl who was looking guilty again, she added, "But you really should get some ice on that, it looks painful." The black-haired girl touched her eye gingerly and winced. "It's not comfortable, no."

"When Yori gets back, could you ask her to visit me, please?" the old priest told them. "I'd like to catch up, and also discuss all this."

"Of course. That will be in, hmm, perhaps one and a half weeks." Aiko smiled at him. Nodding to the girl she and Misaki left the room, a bright rainbow flash illuminating the doorway a second or two later. The elderly man smiled slightly then turned to his grand-daughter. "Come on. Lets get some ice on that, make some tea for you and your friends when they wake up, and talk." She followed him out of the room after a quick look back at her team-mates. The brunette snored a little as she left.

Cologne studied the two men in the garden of the Tendo household with interest from the roof of the house. Her great-granddaughter looked around, obviously sensing her, then up, smiling. She waved to the Elder, who waved back, dropping off the roof and making the visitors stare in shock.

"Good afternoon," she said politely, grinning at the expressions they were wearing. "I'm Elder Ku Lon, I'm pleased to meet you both. I would think that you are Adrian Stewart and you are Matt Jordan, based on the description Xian Pu gave me." She pointed to each in turn, correctly identifying them. Shampoo and Akane looked amused. Nodoka rose from the garden chair she was sitting in, offering her a cup.

"Tea, Elder?"

"Thank you, child. And perhaps a small piece of that cake? I know how well you bake it."
Dropping off her staff she accepted the plate and cup, hopping up onto an empty chair. She looked at the two men over the cup. "You seem startled."

Adrian stared at the tiny Chinese woman with immensely long white hair, who stared back curiously and with obvious good humour. Glancing at Matt he received an odd look in return. "Um, hello, Elder Ku Lon." he nearly managed the name, making her chuckle in a rusty voice, leaning forward and inspecting him with bright eyes that betrayed immense experience and a keen mind.

"Call me Cologne, dear boy, it's easier. But that was a good attempt." Her English was extremely good, he noticed. "It's a long time since I met an American. Many years. Your country seems to have come on a long way since I was there last." She snickered, glancing at Shampoo. "Apparently you don't still ride horses everywhere. Pity. I like horses." He exchanged glances with Matt again, who looked confused.

"Um, Elder? How long ago was it that you were last in America?" he enquired politely. She chuckled.

"Oh, I don't know... Late nineteenth century, perhaps? Somewhere around then. I travelled more in my early middle age. Got around all over the place. Europe, North and South America, Russia. I don't move around quite so much at the moment. But it was very interesting learning all the different languages." They both stared in shock as she grinned.

"Late nineteenth...?" Matt gaped at her. "That's a century ago! How the hell old are you?" The old woman looked highly amused.

"It's impolite to ask the age of a lady, my boy," she replied with a laugh. "But, if it helps, a fair bit older than your country. They grow up so fast these days." The Elder smiled at their expressions. "Your Mr Washington was an interesting man."

"You... knew... George Washington?" Adrian felt faint as he listened to this extraordinary old woman. She snickered again.

"I wouldn't say knew, exactly. Met the lad in Barbados, a long time ago. I thought he'd go far at the time. Bright young man. We talked a few times. Anyway, that's all in the past. I was interested in meeting the people who seem to think my great-granddaughter is worth so much money." Glancing at Shampoo with an amused expression, she added, "I've always thought so myself, admittedly, but it's unusual to find someone else who shares that viewpoint." The younger woman stuck out her tongue, then giggled, making Cologne chuckle.

Adrian tried to get his thoughts in order, after such a remarkable piece of information. For some weird reason he didn't disbelieve it. The old girl certainly looked like she could be over two hundred and fifty years old, he thought with mild, stunned amusement. He noticed Matt was still gaping with his mouth slightly open and nudged him sharply. The tall man closed his mouth with a snap and sat still, just listening.

"We both feel that Akane and Shampoo are going to be more than worth the money, Ma'am. They're remarkable. I'm still finalising things with the studio but it's going well. We're hoping to get them over again for a few days in about three weeks, then there will probably be at least two more meetings between then and Christmas. Hopefully, assuming there aren't any problems, which seems likely at this point, they'll be looking at starting some real paid work around the end of January or perhaps February next year. I'm still working on which of the two or three movies they'd both be a good fit for to get them started on." He smiled at the Elder. "In all likelihood, if things pan out the way I'm hoping, they will both have as much work as they can handle within twelve months. There are a couple of martial arts movies on the horizon, one science fiction one which needs a lot of pretty extreme stunts, and two or three action ones which could benefit from their talents. We can probably save a lot of money by cutting back on the amount of CGI we would otherwise need, and make it look better as well."

Both girls looked interested and pleased at the thought, glancing at each other and grinning.
Cologne watched them for a moment before laughing quietly. "Very good. I hope it works out for you both. And you, Mr Stewart. Try not to break Hollywood, girls." She snickered as Akane looked mildly embarrassed. "Take care of them, Mr Stewart. I should be most annoyed if either one of them came to harm." She gave him a look that for some reason chilled him to the bone for a moment, before smiling again. "I have a lot of time and effort invested in both young ladies, and one of them is family." Finishing her tea and jumping down off the chair she picked up her staff, turning to Nodoka. "Thank you, my dear, it was as nice as ever. I must be off, I left duck-boy in charge of the kitchen and he's more than likely sold half the kitchen scraps as the house special by now if he isn't wearing his glasses." Hopping back on top of her staff she looked at them all.

"It was good to meet you, gentlemen. I expect we'll meet again at some point. LA sounds interesting, I may well have to visit. Shampoo, when you finish here I could do with a hand for the afternoon customers." The young Amazon nodded, smiling. Matt and Adrian watched the amazing old woman with wide eyes as she waved, then hopped onto the roof and bounded away, cackling with amusement.

"Would you like some more tea, Mr Jordan?" she asked politely, picking up the pot. He held out his cup, still looking in the direction Cologne had gone, nodding numbly.

Harrison looked up as Aiko and Misaki both sat down next to them at the restaurant table, looking mildly irritated. "Got everything sorted out?" he asked mildly, pushing a pair of glasses towards them both and filling them with water from the jug on the table. "Hi, Misaki, nice to see you," he added.

She grinned at him, picking up the glass of water. "Thanks, Richard. Nice to see you as well. Yes, I think so, for the moment anyway. Those girls are completely crazy."

"So it was them again?" Harada asked with interest. She nodded tiredly.

"Yes. Getting nuttier by the minute. They were accusing us of stealing their friend from them because she seems to want some alone time at the moment. Got quite worked up about it, then started fighting amongst themselves when one of them agreed with us. Very strange." She shrugged, drinking the water and putting the glass back. Aiko seemed to be thinking about it, but in the end sighed, shaking her head.

"I have no idea what's going on with them recently. They've been odd for a long time but the last few months I'm sure it's got worse. The internal fighting is worrying."

"Does that sort of thing happen a lot with the various groups?" Harrison asked.
"No, not really. There are some groups that really don't like each other, sometimes to the point of insulting one another and very occasionally a fight between them, but that's pretty rare nowadays. Yori managed to stop most of it, around here anyway, mainly by lecturing them on professional behaviour after shutting them all down whenever something like that happened. If they do fight they do it a long way away and very quietly." Aiko snickered a little as Misaki smiled grimly, pouring herself some more water. "It's pretty strange to have a group fighting internally, though. Usually they get along quite well with each other. There are a couple that seem to not like each other very much but even they manage to keep their disagreements pretty private. This lot completely lost it." She smiled slightly, remembering.

"It was kind of funny to watch but also rather worrying. Like they were on the edge of a real breakdown. I expect that when the others get back we're going to want to look into it. Those girls are far too powerful to have running around if they've literally gone nuts. People could get hurt."

"People have already been hurt," Captain Uehara said quietly. Aiko glanced at her then nodded sadly.

"Unfortunately true. Not for a while, but they've certainly caused a lot of collateral damage, which has included at least half a dozen victims in the last eighteen months. Even Chou was ready to unscrew some heads the last time, she gets very angry about innocents being caught in our business. Especially when the people responsible just walk off." The brunette sighed. "Those girls are becoming something of a liability, to themselves as much as anyone."

"Is there anything you can really do about it?" Harrison asked. She looked at Misaki, who shook her head slowly.

"I'm not sure. We can stop them, that's easy enough, they're powerful but not really very good fighters, and they seem to be getting worse at that anyway, not better, but that's only if we find out about it in time. Actually fixing the problem... I'm not sure. We don't even know what the problem is. There clearly is one, or something that's changed, because they weren't like this when they started. One or two of them aren't the sharpest tools in the box, but they're not stupid either, and they did a very good job to begin with." Sighing, she drank her water. "I don't know. We'll have to talk to Yori and Chou, see if they have any ideas. They're better at this sort of thing than we are."

"You seem to be very effective at it even so," Harada said, smiling at them. Both girls looked pleased at the compliment.

"Thank you, Sergeant. We do what we can." Aiko looked around the table. "Looks like you've just finished. Would you like to wander around the shopping area, Richard? You still need to find a present for Emily for allowing you to come out and play." Misaki giggled as Harrison laughed, nodding.

"I do indeed. Yes, that might be a good idea. I would think that Adrian and Matt will probably be finishing up soon." He looked at his watch. "About four hours, yes, that should be long enough. OK, let's go. Ah, hang on, I don't have any Yen with me." Aiko smiled, pulling out a roll of cash.

"No problem. I can lend you what you need. I know you're good for it." He laughed again, standing up, looking around at the other two police officers.

"It was a lot of fun catching up, Captain, Tetsuo. I hope we can meet again soon." Captain Uehara smiled at him, nodding.

"I'm happy to have talked again, Lieutenant. Give my best to your family. Please make sure to stop in if you're in the area again."
I will."

Standing, Sergeant Harada held out his hand. Harrison took it. "Take care, Richard. Don't worry about the meal, I've got it. I hope someday I can come to LA and meet your family."

"I'd like that. Give Emiko a kiss for me, and tell her congratulations. I really hope everything goes smoothly with your child. You'll like being a father, although it's a lot of work. It's well worth it. Let me know how things go." Harrison grinned at his friend.

"I'll make sure to keep you up to date." Harada stepped back. "If you see Laura, say hi for me."

"Count on it. See you guys later." Leaving the restaurant, the LAPD officer and the two magical girls walked off down the street, talking to each other, as the two Japanese officers watched.

"Very decent man," Captain Uehara commented, looking at her sergeant. He nodded, smiling slightly, as he pulled out some cash to pay the bill.

"He is. I'm very glad to have met him. It took a while for him to accept the whole Minato concept but he rallied magnificently in the end. The girls clearly like and trust him, which is a very good sign, they're good judges of character."

"This problem Aiko was mentioning is a little worrying. Magical girls can be hard enough on the scenery when they're acting normally. I'm more than a little concerned about a number of them having something wrong with them." They left, heading back to the station.

"So am I. Luckily they're based some distance away, but it's not a good situation." He sighed a little. "Oh well, there isn't much we can do about it. We'll have to leave it in the more than competent hands of Yori and Chou. I just hope they get back before something major happens." Nodding, the Captain looked slightly worried, then deliberately changed the subject to something less upsetting.

Adrian yelped as Aiko and Richard suddenly appeared a few feet away, shying away then relaxing. "Jesus, don't do that!" he said with some asperity, his heart hammering. Aiko grinned at him.

"Sorry, Adrian, I'll try to come in further away next time. I didn't mean to scare you."

"It takes some getting used to, that's all." He glared at Richard, who was laughing helplessly. "It's not funny."

"Oh, it is, definitely," the other man gasped out. "You should have seen your expression! It was amazing." Adrian sighed heavily.

"You know I'm slightly highly strung, even with the pills," he muttered, while Richard kept laughing. Aiko patted him on the shoulder comfortingly.

"You're not too bad." She looked around the garden. "Where is everyone?"

"They're in the house. Matt was discussing some possible stunts with Akane and Shampoo. I wanted to have a moment along to think about things, so I came out here." He glanced around, smiling a bit. "It's a very nice place. Peaceful."

"Most of the time. It can get quite..." She was interrupted by shouts from the other side of the house, making them both turn and look, as Soun and Genma came around the corner, fighting each other vigorously. Aiko shook her head sadly as Adrian and Richard stared in amazement. "...loud," she finished, watching the two martial artists. Their students came after them in a group, exchanging bets. Nodoka leaned out an upstairs window, watching with a neutral expression, that turned into a wide grin when, inevitably, Soun punched Genma into the pond, slipped on the grass, then followed him in.

Staring at the panda that dragged itself out of the water and collapsed onto the side, panting, Adrian pointed, his mouth working. "Um..."

"I know. They seem to have at least one fight a day, from what Akane told me." Aiko shrugged.

"Um..."

"You'd think they'd have grown up by now, men of their age."

"Um...?"

"Yes, it's weird, the way the fights always end up in the pond. Nodoka has been telling them it's possessed." Soun pulled himself out as well, coughing up pond water and looking green, then lay on the grass beside the panda.

"Um...!"

"Well, obviously it isn't, but there's something weird with it, even so." Aiko grinned at his befuddled expression.

"Um... Panda?"

"Oh, that's just Genma. He's got a Jusenkyo curse as well." Adrian stared some more, then glanced at Richard, who shrugged helplessly, also looking surprised.

"Don't look at me. The Japanese are insane as far as I'm concerned." Aiko giggled, making him smile. "Fun, but insane."

"Weird. So very, very weird." After a long moment, the director turned away from the scene at the pond as the students gathered around their teachers, distributing their winnings amongst themselves and talking loudly. "Ah, right, where was I. Oh yes. Peaceful." He looked over his shoulder as Nodoka came out with a kettle of very hot water and tipped it over her pandafied husband, looking satisfied at the loud yell he let out from the somewhat excessive temperature. "I think I've had enough peace. Let's go back inside."

Emily glanced out the window to the patio as a flicker of motion caught her eye, smiling happily. She went out and hugged her husband, who looked pleased to see her. "Did you have a nice time, dear?" she asked.

"Yes, it was fun. I was pleased to be able to see Tetsuo again, and Captain Uehara. Meeting everyone at the Tendo Dojo was interesting as well, although slightly confusing." She looked at him, puzzled. "I'll explain later. Oh, yes, I have a little something for both you and Serena as well." Turning to Adrian, Matt and Aiko, who were listening with smiles on their faces, he shook hands with the magical girl. "As always, nice to see you, Aiko. Thanks for the trip."

"No problem, Richard. I'll have to get back now, though. Do you need a lift, guys?"

The director shook his head. "No, thank you, Aiko, my car is parked out front. We came in that."
"OK. Let me know if you need to go over again, or if you need Akane over here. I'll be away for a week in three days from now, but before or after that is fine, subject to insanity getting in the way." She smiled at them, shrugging. "You know how it goes."

"I'm beginning to," he replied, laughing. "Thank you very much for all your help."

"Any time. Right, got to go, see you all later." She waved, then as they all closed their eyes, disappeared.

Emily leaned against her husband, smiling slightly. "What a nice young lady. I hope it went well?"

"Yes, thank you, Emily, everything worked out nicely. We met some very interesting people there."

Matt grinned at her. "It's an odd place, Nerima, but they seem friendly."

"Would you two like to stay for dinner? It's nearly ready." The two studio men looked at each other, then Adrian nodded, smiling.

"Certainly. Thank you." All four went back inside, closing the door.

Tamiko looked around the garden, grinning, before bending to feel the deep pink grass equivalent. "This is pretty cool," she laughed, as Nabiki watched, grinning.

"Isn't it?" The middle sister glanced around the sight she was already finding very familiar, then looked up as she heard something she recognised. Giggling, she casually said, "You might want to duck," making Tamiko and Fumiko look at her, before a rising whistle was terminated in a pair of loud cracks and a gust of wind. Both magical girls whirled with ki balls instantly ready, poised to fire, but reabsorbed the energy when they saw the two soarers inspecting them curiously from a few metres away. The animals yipped happily, moving to Nabiki, who went down on her knees and tickled them both under the chin.

Looking at her team-mate, Tamiko raised an eyebrow. "That was impressive," she commented. The other woman nodded, watching Nabiki make a fuss of the two animals, who were clearly thoroughly enjoying it, an expression of deep contentment on their furry faces as they squeaked to her.

"Loud, too." Moving closer she inspected the soarers curiously. "They're kind of cute." She reached out a hand, which the male sniffed, then allowed to touch him. "Very soft fur." Tamiko stroked him as well and smiled.

"Like a kitten, or something like that." Both animals were relishing the attention. Ranma wandered out of the house, watching them with a smile on his face. Walking over the martial artist ticked the smaller animal behind the ears, which made it quiver with delight. When he suddenly became female, the soarer twitched a little, staring at the red-head with what looked like surprise, before relaxing again.

"They're not too fussed by us, are they," she chuckled.

"I'd say they were damn pleased to see you," Uthryyl noted as he came out with his daughter, who immediately moved to also stroke the soarers. Laughing, he sipped the mug of coffee he was holding, studying the animals as they enjoyed all the people fussing over them. "So strange. I wonder if they were waiting for you, Nabiki? Or just happened to be passing."

"No idea, but they didn't take long to arrive. We've only been back for an hour." The Tendo woman stood, making both animals look disappointed, then eager again when she shimmered into her flying Azumi form. Both Tamiko and Fumiko watched, smiling widely. "I'll be back in a while." She grinned at them. "You coming? These guys can really show you how to fly." With a strong flap she was airborne, the soarers seconds behind her. Everyone watched as the three figures rapidly climbed, before Tamiko turned to her friend.

"Quick! Follow those lunatics!" They sprouted wings and leapt into the air, following 'Azumi' and the two soarers, laughing wildly. Chuckling, Ranma exchanged glances with Onkra.

"Come on, time for another lesson."

"You're right. This is one of the most incredible things I've ever seen," Tamiko said, awestruck, watching the waterfall as the sun set. The three young women stood on the observation area and simply enjoyed the sight.

"This is a beautiful place," Fumiko agreed, turning to look out over the edge at the vast plain below them. "The people are wonderful as well. So remarkably hospitable and accepting of someone from another world." A few D'sage had wandered through since they'd arrived half an hour earlier, greeting them with smiles and very little surprise. A family group was a few metres away looking out at the view as well, one of them pointing something out to his son.

"I find it weird how normal everything is, all things considered," she added after a moment. 'Azumi' nodded.

"I thought the same thing. This world, or the people at least, are very much like the people at home in more ways than seems likely. I love it here, so far. The food is pretty damn good as well, although that might just be Uthryyl's and Quannyr's cooking." Glancing at the waterfall again as the colour slowly shifted to an almost purple shade, both suns now behind it, she smiled. "So pretty. I wish I could show it to Akane and Dad."

"Perhaps you can one day." Fumiko put her hand on her friends shoulder, squeezing it. "Things seem to be changing very fast with your family. Hopefully that means the day you can reunite your sister with them is coming closer."

"I hope so," 'Azumi' sighed a little. "I really do. Oh well, it's not going to change in the short term, so I may as well enjoy myself. Tomorrow we're going into Sirtha again, then to Krentak to look around. I want to go back to the imaging shop and get a couple more of the camera units."

"I'd like to get one or two as well." Fumiko smiled a little. "I wonder if they do a projector like that one you picked up on K'nn Four?"

"Don't know, but we can certainly ask." They turned to Tamiko who was still admiring the waterfall. "Let's go back, I'm getting hungry." The auburn haired girl nodded absently, eventually turning away.

"All right." She grinned at her friends. "But I'm coming back here. It's beautiful." Nodding with a smile Nabiki stepped up onto the wall, diving off it while spreading her wings, followed by her friends, all of them rapidly descending towards the plain then heading in a wide circle towards Uthryyl's house. Behind them the D'sage family watched with interest, before heading back to their car for the trip home, discussing the odd people you met nowadays.

Two soarers, high above, followed the three girls, yipping to each other in a contented sort of manner. They now had three fun new friends, which suited them well as far as they were concerned.
Chapter 64

SM purists, avert thine eyes. You may not enjoy the next part.

On the other hand, I kind of do.

"I'm really getting worried," Ami said quietly, looking out over the night-time scenery from the roof of a building near the university. "They're acting oddly, or more oddly, anyway." She raised one corner of her mouth in a half smile. "We all act oddly, compared to most people."

"True, I guess," Aiko replied, grinning. "Although people outside Minato seem to think everyone inside it is completely nuts. It's only half-true at best."

The blue-haired girl nodded, peering down at the street some twenty metres below, as pedestrians walked past, unaware of the three young women above them. "Most people here are pretty normal, just a lot more open-minded than average. Around this specific district, they're insanely accepting. It's pretty strange. I guess Yori's approach really works."

"Most of the time. We've had a few incidents where things went a bit sideways, but by and large it all works out," Misaki commented, handing her companions each a cereal bar, which they took with thanks. She tipped the camp chair she was sitting in back and crossed her legs on the peak of the roof, looking both extremely precariously balanced and very comfortable, making Ami shake her head in amusement as she unwrapped the bar. "Any idea what's up with your friends?"

"No. I wish I did have some idea, I might be able to stop it. None of my scans show anything out of place, but I'm sure something is wrong, somehow, this behaviour isn't normal. They never used to be like this. Oh, some of them have always been a bit gung-ho, admittedly, I could point fingers at arrogant behaviour and a sort of elitism that's not very nice, but nothing like the recent problems."

"At least being a bit open-minded is a bit normal. At least that's not like what they've done," Aiko shrugged, grinning. "Although they've been a bit closed-minded before."

"Any idea what's up with your friends?"

"No. I wish I did have some idea, I might be able to stop it. None of my scans show anything out of place, but I'm sure something is wrong, somehow, this behaviour isn't normal. They never used to be like this. Oh, some of them have always been a bit gung-ho, admittedly, I could point fingers at arrogant behaviour and a sort of elitism that's not very nice, but nothing like the recent problems." Sitting on the roof peak she nibbled the food and stared at the university clock tower. "Did Yori really dangle a mugger by one foot from that thing?" she asked, pointing. Aiko looked in the direction she was indicating and nodded, looking amused.

"Apparently. I didn't see it, but Chou swears she did. It was fairly effective by all accounts." Ami giggled.

"I can imagine."

"So what are you going to do about your team? Have you spoken to them yet? Blondie seemed very upset about you not talking to her for a week." Ami giggled again.

"That's not her name, you know." Aiko shrugged, grinning. "No, I can't work out what to say. I was so angry last time I was seriously considering just walking away. I don't want to just abandon them, they're my friends and so much more, but..." She shrugged. "It's complicated. Lots of ancient history." The young woman was silent for a while, as the other two waited. Eventually she sighed. "I can't avoid them forever. I guess I'll have to go talk to them sooner or later, but not right now. I'm still too annoyed by it all."

"They seemed kind of worked up the other day. I mean, fighting like that? It was pretty funny, true enough, but not exactly a good working relationship. Mind you, that one with the long black hair seems to at least be thinking about things finally." Ami nodded.

"Rei. She's not stupid. Bad-tempered sometimes, and a bit aggressive and quick off the mark, but not stupid. Of all of them I'd expect her to figure out something wasn't right, eventually."

"That old priest is her grandfather, isn't he?" Misaki asked curiously. Ami nodded, finishing off her cereal bar.

"Yes. He's a bit of a pervert but also a very experienced and wise man. I kind of like him." She smiled a little. "He's known for a long time about all of us, but never said anything."

"He seems to be trying to talk sense into them, now. Hopefully he'll have some luck." Aiko straightened up, looking around. "What was that?"

"What was what?" the blue-haired woman asked.

"I thought I heard something like a little explosion." The brunette moved to look down at the street, then around at the surrounding buildings. "Odd." She closed her eyes and listened with her head on one side for a moment, then nodded. "There's something going on over there," the woman said, pointing at the other side of the street and a few buildings up. "I can hear a sort of metallic sound." The others joined her, Misaki flipping her chair shut and into a ki pocket in one move, then also listening.

"Like something being cut?"

"That's it."

Ami was looking in the direction indicated, holding her computer and scanning the relevant building. "I can't hear anything," she mumbled, watching the screen. "Hey, isn't that some sort of diamond broker?"

"I think so. On the second floor." Aiko looked carefully at the building. "It should be empty this time of night."

"Well, I'm reading five people inside, and a thermal residue that's probably the result of some sort of explosive," the other woman said, putting her little machine away.

"Aha. Good old fashioned robbery. Haven't done one of those for a while." Aiko grinned. "Coming? They're fun." Misaki cracked her knuckles with a smile. After a moment Ami nodded, suddenly feeling better.

"Why the hell not. I could do with some amusement." She looked down at the street and pointed. "There's a van down there with the engine running and someone inside. Want to bet he's involved?"

"Probably. Let's go and introduce ourselves." They all stepped off the edge, dropping to the street, then strolled over. Ami knocked on the window, causing the man inside, who was studying the building in question intently, to jump violently and whip his head around to look at her. His eyes widened as he recognised the uniform.

"Hello. Would you like to turn off the engine and get out, please?" she requested politely. After a moment's further staring, he instead put the vehicle in gear and slammed his foot on the accelerator, gritting his teeth. Nothing happened except a roar from the engine. After a long moment he looked back out the window at the young woman, who was waiting patiently beside the motionless vehicle, which was currently being suspended twenty centimetres in the air by Misaki and Aiko, one on either side. He looked in his side mirrors at the two girls, who smiled at him.
"We can wait," Ami said. After several seconds he slumped, turning off the engine. She opened the door and gestured, moving aside as he climbed out. Watching as Aiko put her side of the van back down and quickly poked him in the back a couple of times she caught him as he slumped. "That really works very well," she said admiringly, lifting the unconscious getaway driver and dumping him in the back of the vehicle as Misaki opened the door, neatly arranging him to one side.

"Doesn't it? Yori knows loads of weird techniques. Those pressure points are very useful." The short girl closed the van, nodding to a pedestrian who waved at her as he came out of a convenience store and walked past unconcerned. "I'll go around the back in case they go out that way, you guys wait here. May as well grab them as they come out."

The next few minutes were entertaining for them and a number of witnesses, who watched from the other side of the street as the three girls rounded up and rendered unconscious four of the five robbers as they exited the building. The fifth one, realising something odd was going on, stayed inside. As they were loading the last of their captured burglars into the van, a police car drew up behind them, two officers getting out and coming over, no real urgency in their movements.

"Hello, Corporal Otani," Aiko said, smiling. "That was quick."

"It's a slow night," the officer in charge replied, peering into the van. "Not bad. That all of them?"

"Nope. One more is inside. He doesn't seem to want to come out." She gestured at the building. "Would you like us to go and get him for you?" The corporal glanced at his colleague, who shrugged a little.

"If you could that would be a help. We'll take care of these ones."

"No problem. Back in a minute." The three girls went into the building, as the police officers watched.

"Isn't that blue-haired one part of that other group from over in the Azabu-Juban district?" the other officer asked, looking at his companion.

"I think so, yes. I don't like them much, but she's OK. Nice and polite. I wonder if she's going to join Yori and the others?" Otani looked at the building for a moment, then turned back to the van. "Come on, help me with these idiots."

Inside, the three girls went up the stairs to the second floor, looking around with interest. "Down there," Misaki said, pointing. "That's what this sign says." They went down the corridor to the door to the vault room, which had a large hole surrounding where the lock had once been. The smell of explosives hung in the air. Stopping outside the door they looked at each other.

"Should we go in or ask him to come out?" Ami asked in a conversational tone.

"We could ask, I suppose," Aiko responded. "It's probably better than going in. If we have to do that, someone might get hurt."

"I'm OK with that," Misaki said with a hair-raising giggle. "It won't be any of us."

"Go away," a voice called from inside the room, sounding worried.

"No," they chorused, grinning at each other.

"I've got a gun," the burglar said.
"Really?" Aiko sounded surprised. "That's pretty stupid. The cops are going to crucify you, they don't like guns."

"It's not mine. One of the others left it behind." He sounded even more worried now.

"Well, that's all right then." Aiko rolled her eyes, making Ami giggle. "After all, it's not like you're committing a crime... Oh, wait." There was a long pause.

"You're not... Yori..., are you?" the voice asked. She grinned.

"Nope."

"Thank god for that," he mumbled almost to faintly to hear. Ami raised an eyebrow.

"She really does have a reputation," the girl noted. Aiko nodded, looking amused.

"That she does. Very well deserved, too. If she was here this guy would be in really serious trouble." A small whimper came from behind the door. After a moment, she gently pushed it open. On the other side of the room a man with a balaclava over his face was staring at them, holding a pistol in one shaking hand. "You don't look well, my friend. Why don't you put that down and come with us. The police would love to talk."

"They didn't tell me we were going after somewhere in Minato," the man said, raising the pistol with a slightly hopeless air.

"In future you should probably check." Aiko smiled at him. "Come on, be sensible." Closing his eyes he pulled the trigger, flinching at the noise. There was silence after the shot for a moment.

"You see? Catching a bullet is easy enough. You have to make sure to grab it firmly, though, so it doesn't bounce and hurt someone." He opened his eyes to see the three young woman looking at the outstretched hand of the short brunette, the one with blue hair nodding.

"Right. Got it. I've never tried this before."

"First time for everything," the brunette said, grinning. She glanced at the robber. "Well? As long as you're shooting at us, don't stop yet. We're practising." Staring in horror, he instinctively pulled the trigger again. The blue-haired one moved her hand so fast he couldn't even see it, then yelped in pain. A dull thud on the other side of the room made him duck.

"OW! Damn it, that stings!" She waved her hand rapidly with a pained expression then sucked her knuckle as he gaped.

"Slightly too fast. You closed your hand too soon." The brunette looked at him expectantly. Sighing hopelessly, he fired again. She held up the bullet. "There you go, see?"

"OK." Looking at him the one in the skimpy outfit raised an eyebrow. "Well? We're waiting." The by now very confused and depressed burglar fired one last time then dropped the gun and put his hands up, sobbing. She smiled happily, displaying the bullet proudly. "Yay!"

When they came out with their prisoner, Corporal Otani looked at the man, who appeared quite grateful to be dealing with something normal like the police. Holding out his hands he waited to be handcuffed and deposited in the back of the police car. Aiko handed the corporal the pistol in a plastic bag along with the bullets and shell casings. "He said it belonged to someone else. He was helping us with a training exercise, by the way, that's what all the shooting was about." Looking oddly at her, the policeman nodded after a moment, glancing at his colleague who looked puzzled.
"Um, all right. I'll put that in the report. Thanks very much."

"It was fun. Well, we have to be getting on. See you again sometime, Corporal." All three girls waved, then jumped up the side of the building and vanished into the darkness. Shaking his head and smiling to himself, the corporal got on with his job, thinking that Minato was a very interesting place.

A few buildings away, the three young women stopped and sat down, Misaki providing them all a bottle of beer each. Three synchronised thumb motions later they clinked the bottles together and took a drink. "Thanks. That cheered me up a lot." Ami smiled at her friends. "It was fun." Flexing her right hand a few times, she added, "That's going to ache for a while, though." There was a visible bruise on her middle finger where the bullet had struck.

"You'll get over it, and now you have a new party trick." Aiko grinned at her. She looked back, amused.

"What the hell sort of parties do you guys go to, for heaven's sake?" They both laughed.

"You wouldn't believe it. Maybe you'll get invited to one, some day." Shaking her head and laughing, the young woman swigged some more beer.

"Without the magic boost I'd need a new hand. You guys seem tough enough to take it all the time." She looked curiously at Aiko, then Misaki. "I wondered about why you changed the clothing. Wasn't it part of the magic you used?" Looking down at herself she adjusted her short skirt. "I know ours is."

"It was, originally, yes," Aiko replied, glancing at her for a moment. "Our outfit was even worse than that thing. At least you can walk around in public without looking like you got booted out of Roppongi for being too exposed." Ami giggled into her beer. "Chou worked out how to edit it out of the magic. She and Yori are amazingly good at that sort of thing. All the training they gave us made a huge difference as well. We're much stronger and tougher now even without the magic that we were before with it. It's practically unnecessary now, to be honest, although it does provide a useful boost and lots of cool toys."

Ami sighed wistfully. "Sometimes I'm kind of envious. Without the magic I'm not much. Stronger and faster than a woman normally is, true enough, but not all that much. If I'd tried to catch a bullet in my unboosted form I'd have a hole in me. But with it turned on I'm stuck with these clothes, so it's kind of obvious. It would be neat to be able to leave it on all the time."

"I think you're underestimating yourself, Ami. You're a damn sight smarter than practically anyone, which is certainly something to be proud of." Aiko smiled at her. "Some proper training would probably help a lot as well. Your ki levels are quite high, from what I can make out, although you don't seem to use any of it with your magic. I really think you should ask Yori for some help with that. You're strong, fast, and have some good attacks, but you're not really a fighter. You could be, though."

"The others are much better than I am," the young woman said morosely, sipping beer. "They're the ones with all the heavy attacks. I'm just the backup and intelligence asset." Misaki chuckled, glancing at her, then looking back over the town.

"I know someone else who thinks like that, and she's wrong too. Yes, you don't have the raw power of some of your friends, but you're smart enough to know how to use what you do have and adapt very quickly to whatever happens. I'm not sure Blondie is, or the others." Ami giggled again, making her smile. "You shouldn't put yourself down. You're pretty powerful by anyone's standards, and with some decent training you could be much more dangerous even than that. You have the flexibility to learn new techniques pretty fast, I think."

"Yori terrifies me," Ami admitted, holding her bottle up to the light for a moment to check the level, looking disappointed that it was nearly empty. Misaki handed her another one. "So does Chou, but in a different way. I always feel like I've let her down when she looks at us in that way she has. Yori just makes me want to run away, but I'm too scared to."

Aiko laughed for a moment, glancing at Misaki, who seemed amused. "She'd love that. Look, trust me, Yori is a very good person. Yes, she's insanely powerful and skilled, and yes, she can be very scary indeed. More than you'd believe, to be honest, you've never really seen her properly angry. I have, it's absolutely horrifying. Chou is almost worse, somehow, she's so nice most of the time that when she gets upset it's horrible. But both of them only want the best for everyone. They're amazingly patient and kind with their students." She sighed a little, looking out over the skyline, holding the nearly empty beer bottle by the neck and idly swinging it back and forth.

"All either of them really wants is a fairly quiet life with their friends and family, but like with all of us, the crazy got them. More than anyone else I know, actually. Overall they're fine with it, they like helping people, but something that really annoys them is when others in the same position cause more problems than they cure. Yori finds your friends in particular very irritating, they have a positive gift for anarchy that gets right up her nose." Ami grinned, while Misaki laughed again. "She'd be more than happy to leave them alone if they'd basically just get their act together and start behaving responsibly and politely. It's pretty funny watching her yell at them, but she doesn't much enjoy it. I know she tried just talking to them nicely at first but from what I understand they simply ignored her."

Ami sighed, nodding. "Oh, very true. Unfortunately. I was there. She turned up out of nowhere all by herself when we were dealing with a number of particularly difficult demons just over that way," she waved at the horizon, "very politely asking all of us to go somewhere else if we wanted to play." She snickered a little, drinking some more. "Her exact words. Everyone, including me, I'm afraid, completely ignored her. She tried several times but no one paid any attention. I mean, we didn't know her, she looks impressive, admittedly, but so do several of the girls. Some magic got thrown around, a couple of buildings got badly damaged, things like that. I could see she was getting annoyed but no one seemed worried." She shivered a little.

"Right up to the point she started glowing purple. That was just after Rei nearly hit a pedestrian with an attack when he wasn't quite fast enough to get out of the way. Yori blocked the attack somehow and got him out of danger so fast I still can't believe it, she's much faster than anyone else I've ever seen, then did... something. I'm still not sure what. But Rei was out before she hit the ground." The blue-haired girl shivered again. "The aura of danger coming from her was horrifying. Everyone stopped dead and just stared at her, even the demons. She stomped over and glared at them, telling them to fuck off home before she did something dreadful. It looked ridiculous. Little thing like that looking up at a demon about three times her size and threatening it."

"What happened?" Misaki asked, fascinated. "She's never told us this story."

"Well, the demon sort of looked puzzled. She spoke to it in some weird language I'd never heard before and it stared, then looked at it's friends. Three of them started backing away, which confused us. The last one just yelled something and attacked her trying to kill her." The young woman shuddered at the memory. "She beat the crap out of it in about six seconds, grinning the entire time. When it was lying there she told the others to pick it up and run. That's the last time I ever saw them. She let the things go, turned to us, and told us to clear up the mess then go home and not come back."
"So what did you do?"

Ami finished her second beer, staring out at the dark night. "Something fucking stupid. We laughed. She didn't appreciate that very much."

Aiko winced, looking at her team-mate, who shrugged, appearing unsurprised.

"Then what?"

"She kind of glowed brighter, then it just went out. Everything started getting cold. It was horrible, my computer couldn't make any sense of it. After staring at us for a while, she asked, extremely politely but in a tone of voice that suggested that 'No' wasn't a good answer, that we very carefully reconsider our position." Misaki giggled, then looked apologetic when Ami glanced at her irritably.

"Sorry."

Continuing after a moment, the blue-haired woman went on, "I was just in the process of suggesting maybe we should stop and think about it for a moment, because something I didn't understand was happening, when someone took a shot at her. I don't know who, it happened too fast." She sighed heavily. "It was totally humiliating how quickly it all went to shit. Five seconds later we were in the biggest fight we'd had for years. Fifteen seconds after that, four of our group were unconscious, the others were hiding behind a truck, and she was glaring at all of us like she was prepared to eat our souls. More like a demon than any real demon I've ever encountered. Her voice was... absolutely terrifying. She didn't ask this time. She just told us to either pick everything up and go away, or get hurt. A lot. Our choice. She didn't seem hugely fussed either way."

Ami shrugged. "We picked everything up and went away. She gave us a real talking to before she let us go, I felt about five years old by the end of it. The worst part is she was completely correct. We'd been very careless about what we were doing and could easily have killed several people, never mind all the property damage. It made me take a long hard look at how we worked and I wasn't very happy about what I saw. Half our group won't come anywhere near here after that, they were completely traumatised by it. Unfortunately, the other half don't seem to be able to learn that poking Yori is a really bad idea. They're the idiots I'm stuck with." She looked depressed, so Misaki handed her a third bottle of beer, looking over her head at Aiko, who nodded. Opening it absently she drained half the bottle.

"Whenever we met her after that, which thankfully hasn't been all that often, she basically just glared then yelled at us until we went away again. It always seemed to be after we'd done something stupid or destructive. We completely ruined the chance to get along with her out of stupidity and arrogance. I may not have seen her truly angry, fair enough, but having seen what I have, I don't want to. That was bad enough."

"She was certainly annoyed. But not in a killing rage. If she had been you'd never have known about it." Misaki smiled as Ami shivered at the matter of fact tone in her voice. "It would have been very quick if that's any consolation."

"Not really, no," the girl said quietly. "But that's why I'm scared of her. The more I learn about what she can do the more scared I get. Every time I see her she seems to be more powerful, has more incredible abilities, and now she's passing them on to the rest of you. Chou was bad enough, she's nearly as scary as Yori when she wants to be, although most of the time she's really nice. Having four more like her is worrying."

"Five. Don't forget Azumi," Aiko corrected her, grinning.
"Oh. Right. I haven't met her." She finished her beer and lay back on the tiles, staring at the stars. Aiko and Misaki did the same. Hiccuping slightly, she waved her hand at the sky. "Nice view tonight." Falling silent she just stared up for a while.

"You weren't in any real danger, I think," Aiko finally said, breaking the silence. "She doesn't like killing at all, even the hostile demons. If she has any choice she'd rather shove them back through a portal than anything else. Admittedly, push her into a corner and try to kill her and you won't like the results, but by and large she's a pretty peaceful person. She just has a real problem with people like us putting non-combatants into a dangerous position. So do the rest of us. We all handle it differently, though. Chou makes you feel so guilty you stop and apologise. Yori terrifies you into doing the right thing. Azumi creeps you out to the point you'll do almost anything to stop her looking at you." She giggled a little. "Not as effectively as Ms Aoyama can, though. She can make you want to run just by saying hello, and that's if you know her."

Misaki looked amused, nodding. "Yori really doesn't hold much of a grudge either. If any of your friends just apologised, or were even simply polite, she'd smile and talk to them happily. Even people she doesn't much like she can get on with if necessary. I know she thinks quite highly of you personally, she's even complimented the rest of your group in the past when you've handled something well. But she's got very high standards and when she sees someone fall below the level she feels they should be at she gets disappointed. I have a feeling that's why she finds your group so annoying, she thinks you're not fulfilling your potential, recently in a very dangerous manner."

After a moment, Ami sighed. "I can't disagree with that. I guess I should talk to her. Maybe she can figure out what's going on with the girls. I certainly can't. Things have been a little weird for quite a long time, since before we met Yori that first time, in fact, but in the last eighteen months or so have really gone downhill. Sometimes everyone is more or less normal, sometimes they just go... odd." She shrugged a little, looking puzzled. "I can't really describe it better than that. I mean, a few of them aren't exactly the most even-tempered people around, but more and more recently everyone seems to get irritated by stupid things. They don't listen to my advice any more, they go charging around without apparently even noticing people trying to get out of the way, and they're really rude to everyone when we're in uniform. That's not like them, or it didn't used to be."

"Perhaps it's just some weird magical girl version of combat fatigue?" Misaki asked after a few seconds. Ami shook her head.

"I don't think so. I wondered that, to be honest, but it doesn't fit. None of my scans seem to show anything that would fit. My computer has a very comprehensive suite of medical assessment software and everyone checks out fine. Physically and mentally, they seem pretty much normal. But clearly they're not. I've checked everything I could think of, some sort of external magic, drugs, disease, you name it I've tried to find it. Nothing shows up. And as far as I can tell it doesn't seem to be affecting me, which is weird. One or two of the others are less affected while a couple are affected more badly, but it seems to be going after all of them. Whatever it is."

"Very odd indeed." Aiko considered the problem.

"And worrying. We've been attacked by subtle magic before that had some weird effects, but I know what to look for now and it's not that."

"Talking to Yori and Chou would be a good idea, I think. If it's anything physical they could probably find and fix it with a bit of effort, their healing abilities are remarkable. But they still have limitations, like all of us. What are you going to do if they can't help and it gets worse?" The brunette looked at the other girl, who looked depressed again.

"I have no idea. From what you were saying, at least some of them are close to something really breaking if I can't work out what it is and stop it. That could be very bad. We may not have Yori's fighting skills, but we do have, as a group, a horrendous amount of power. It's bad enough when they're blowing things up because they didn't think it through, it would be much worse if it was deliberate."

All three of them thought about this then looked very worried.

"Fuck. No, that would definitely be something worth avoiding."

Silent again, Ami stared at the stars. "This isn't what I was told was going to happen," she muttered after a while, rubbing her forehead tiredly. Her companions shared a glance, puzzled.

"Told by who?" Aiko asked curiously. Ami looked embarrassed.

"Sorry, I didn't mean to say that out loud. We have some... advisors. They've been very helpful in the past, but more and more often they seem to be completely wrong. And some of the information we received from... other sources... is also wrong. It's very troubling, it shouldn't be, considering where it comes from." Aiko looked at her for a long moment, thinking hard.

After a moment, acting on a sudden wild hunch, she asked slowly, "Are you getting information from that time travelling member of your group?" Ami froze, staring at the sky, then very slowly turned her head to look at the brunette, her eyes wide.

"Um... That's an interesting idea," she replied faintly, appearing guilty. Aiko watched her for a moment, then rose on her elbows to look over at Misaki, who was listening with a thoughtful expression.

"Isn't it?" She stared at the blue-haired girl, who was lightly sweating and hoping they'd let it drop. "Yori has always said that she thinks time travel is a very bad idea. Old problems with it. I know a while ago she talked to a demon mage who was something of an expert in the field, who also told her that trying to manipulate time could produce some spectacularly bad results. Often almost the opposite of what you're trying to do. Looking at the past was OK, trying to look into the future was very difficult, mainly since it hadn't happened yet and there were almost an infinity of possible futures to choose from, and actually trying to change things..." She shook her head. "Very bad idea indeed, he told her."

Looking back at the sky, she added, "I hope that none of your people are trying anything like that. It could have very nasty results, from what I've heard."

Ami was quiet for a while, before speaking again in a voice that sounded strained. "I can't comment on that subject. Sorry."

"OK. It's your secret. We all have them, we won't pry." There was another long pause.

"But, purely theoretically of course, if someone was looking at the future and saw some great disaster on the horizon, wouldn't you think it would be a good idea to try to stop it? Or at least make sure it was survivable?"

"Thinking logically about that, if you even can apply logic to time travel, how could you be sure that whatever you did to stop some possible future disaster wouldn't actually turn out to be the cause of it?" Misaki sounded interested. "I mean, any number of TV shows and SF books have come up with that idea. It's a total cliché, but that doesn't mean it's not true. Clichés normally are, that's why they're clichés in the first place."

"A causality loop," Ami murmured, nodding to herself. "Yes. That bothers me as well. The whole idea of time travel is full of more types of paradox than you can imagine. Depending on the model you use, some of them cancel out, some of them can't exist in the first place, and some of them negate the entire principle. It's horrifically complex." She sighed slightly. "I can follow the math, but it doesn't really help."

"I suppose," Aiko said after a moment, "that in the absence of any other information, you wouldn't have any choice but to try to stop this theoretical disaster." Ami didn't respond, merely frowned at the sky for a little while.

"I'm going to have to think about everything for a while," she finally said. "Sorry. I wish I could say more, but..."

"Don't worry about it." Aiko shrugged, sitting up on the roof and smiling at her. "Like I said, it's your secret. But if we can help, let us know. In the end we're all in this together." She grinned slightly. "Hopefully, and purely theoretically, this future disaster isn't any time soon." Ami laughed and shook her head.

"Without being held to something that might or might not be real, not immediately, no." She stood up, wobbling a little. Misaki hopped up and stabilised her. "Thanks. I don't drink very often. I'll be fine." Looking at her companions, she smiled. "Thank you for listening to all that talking. And letting me help with those burglars. And teaching me an interesting trick." Flexing her hand she looked at it in the light from the street-lamps below them. The bruise had faded noticeably.

"Would you like me to pop you back?" Aiko asked, also standing. After a moment the blue-haired young woman nodded.

"Thank you. That might be less embarrassing than falling off a roof." She giggled as Aiko nodded with a grin.

"Back in a moment," the brunette said to her team-mate, who nodded, turning her head as they vanished. Shortly afterwards the short woman reappeared, walking over to join Misaki looking out at the night scene. They stood silently together for a while.

"Interesting," Misaki eventually said.

"Very. And concerning. The others need to know about all this. Even leaving aside all that time travel stuff, which is just scary, the idea that her friends are losing it worries me a lot."

"Think Yori and Chou could help?"

Aiko sighed. "I don't know. They're good, damn good, but nowhere near all-powerful. Some things will be beyond their abilities. Sooner or later we'll run into a problem they can't figure out how to solve."

"Later, I hope," the other woman said soberly. "Much later." Looking down at the street, she pointed. "I'm starving. Let's try that place, I haven't been in there before."

"You're always starving," Aiko laughed, as the two of them dropped five stories and headed for the restaurant.

"Wow," Misaki managed, staring at her friends, then at Aiko. After a long moment she grinned. "That's very good." Fumiko raised her wings more, looking pleased, before folding them away.

"Wait until you get yours. Flying is brilliant."
"Where are Nabiki and Tamiko?" Aiko asked, inspecting Kasumi's wings closely, then Ranma's. The currently red-headed martial artist pointed up with an amused look.

"Tamiko wanted one last flight before she went back." The other two looked up, then stared in amazement at the four plummeting figures, who all braked with a series of bangs seconds later, almost perfectly in sync, before dropping to the ground. Two of them laughed while two of them made weird, happy yipping noises. Half a dozen small flying spheres arrived around them a few seconds later. Misaki inspected the soarers with interest, moving over to them and holding out a hand. Both sniffed her then pushed their heads into her hands.

"What are these things?" she said happily. "They're so cute. Can we keep them?" The female leaned against her leg heavily, apparently aware it was in the presence of someone who appreciated the full value of a flying alien predator. Fumiko looked at her, then Kasumi, both of them suddenly laughing hard.

"Told you," her sister gasped out. Kasumi shook her head, grinning.

"I don't think we should take them home, Misaki," she said, sounding regretful. "But you can play with them here all you want. They love flying with us, it seems."

"Aww..." Misaki looked at her with puppy-dog eyes, making her giggle.

"They have to stay here." Trying to be firm she ruined it by giggling again as her friend dropped to her knees and wrapped her arms around one of the soarers, who looked very pleased, while the other one seemed mildly jealous.

Sighing at the antics of her team-mate, although grinning, Aiko turned to Ranma. "I've got some recordings for you to look at. We may have a serious problem at home."

"Them again?" The martial artist looked slightly peeved. Aiko nodded slowly.

"Yes, but not quite in the way you're thinking, I suspect." She send them all the files. "Look at those at some point and see what you think."

"OK. A little later, unless it's urgent." Ranma looked at her with a raised eyebrow. She shook her head.

"Not immediately, I don't think, but it's something that needs investigating."

"Fair enough." Turning to the two going back to Minato, she grinned. "We'll see you guys later. Try to keep a lid on the place, if you can." Fumiko nodded.

"We'll do what we can." Watching her sister make a fuss of the soarers, she smiled again. "Come on, Tamiko, let's go home." Waving to Onkra, who was just coming out of the house, she walked through the portal, followed by her friend and four camera drones. Kasumi giggled.

"I hope they remember about their wings and tails before they go outside," she commented. Aiko looked amused, then slightly worried, jumping back through the portal for a moment before reappearing, laughing.

"How long have they been in that form?" she asked. Nabiki grinned at her.

"About two days. Fumiko spend almost all of yesterday flying, chasing these guys around. Tamiko was nearly as persistent. I can understand why, it's damn good fun." She changed back to her normal form, making the soarers stare at her, with a look that was close to disappointment. She laughed, tickling them behind the ears.

"Flying parties are going to be as common as mermaid parties, aren't they?" the brunette asked rhetorically.

"Probably. Know any good places?" Nabiki asked. "Like Aiko Island is for swimming?"

"Why not there? It's a hell of a long way away from anyone, I can't see flying over it would be any more of a problem than swimming around in the lagoon."

Nabiki looked thoughtful. "True. Bit boring, though, no scenery to look at other than one tiny island and a hell of a lot of ocean. Oh well, we'll figure something out." Aiko nodded, looking up at the hovering spheres left behind.

"What are those?" she asked curiously, pointing. One of them dropped down to eye level, half a metre away, humming very softly.

"Oh, right, we didn't tell you about these things." Nabiki explained the camera units, sending her friend a feed from one of them.

"That's very cool," Aiko exclaimed, inspecting the device. "I can see some interesting uses for them."

"Everyone seems to have decided they're useful," the middle Tendo laughed. "After I, being the trend-setter that I am, started the whole ball rolling," Aiko chuckled. "We went back to the imaging shop and talked for a while. In the end, with Uthryyl's help, we managed to negotiate a bulk purchase of the things at a very good price. Everyone got two. Yours are inside. I've got five of them now."

"The salesman was very pleased, even at the reduced price his commission was respectable," Ranma said, laughing. "We cleaned him out. Apparently that was as many as that shop normally sells in about six months, in one sale. He was obviously very curious what we wanted so many of them for but was too polite to ask." She looked at the two new arrivals. "We also got three of the matching projectors. Nabiki bought one on K'n'n Four that's a bit more advanced and smaller, but these are as good as far as the quality of the output goes, and considerably cheaper."

"Cool. New toys." Misaki looked pleased, partly from the idea of interesting alien tech and partly because the male soarer was licking her face, yipping like a happy dog. "Hey. Slow down, I need to breath," she told it, laughing.

"Come inside and let's show you around," Onkra interjected, grinning at her friends. She shook hands with Aiko, then Misaki when she stood, somewhat damp from soarer saliva. "It's good to see you two again."

"Nice to see you as well, Onkra. How is your training coming along?" Aiko looked at her with interest. The young D'sage woman smiled happily.

"Pretty well. Ranma seems pleased with my progress, but I'm very aware that it's going to take a long time to get anywhere close to any of you." They all headed towards the house. "But I think I'm going to stick at it. If only to prove to Dad I can."

Laughing, they went inside. Moments later the door opened and Quannyr stepped out. "Both of you, out," she said sternly, pointing into the garden. The two soarers came out with their heads down and their ears back, looking irritated, then stared at each other as she shut the door again, before flying off, but only as far as the roof. There they waited patiently. Sooner or later one of "So Akane seemed happy?" Nabiki looked at Aiko over the table as they ate. Her friend nodded.

"Yep. Very much so. Have you spoken to her lately?"

"No, we've been back in range for a couple of days but I didn't want to make her think I was checking up on her. She needs to do this herself. I'll probably call her tomorrow." The middle sister looked at the older one, who smiled. "I think this is going to work out well."

Kasumi smiled happily, taking a sip of water. "I do hope so. It would do her so much good to really become a success in something she enjoyed. She might even finally be able to find someone she cared for, and cared for her in the same way, like I did with Ranma." Glancing at the red-head she grinned.

"Not that there's anyone quite like Ranma..." The martial artist nodded grave acknowledgement of the simple fact, while everyone else laughed.

"So true." Chuckling, she squeezed her wife's hand. A sound outside the window made them all look, to see two furry faces peering in at them, one upside down as the soarer dangled from the roof by its hind legs. Uthryyl laughed while Quannyr sighed a little.

"I hope you realise how much trouble we're going to have with them when you leave," she said, looking meaningfully at Nabiki. "Thanks very much for that." The Tendo woman shrugged. "I didn't do it on purpose, you know. They just followed me home and now they want to keep me." She grinned at her hosts. "Onkra can go gliding with them, they'd probably like that." The young woman in question looked thoughtful.

"Might be an idea," she muttered, looking over her shoulder at the two animals, who had exchanged places. "I was seriously considering getting a glider after Jyrron let us use his ones."

"Another hobby?" Uthryyl asked with a long suffering sigh, snickering when his daughter laid her ears back and glared at him. Quannyr poked him in the ribs while their guest laughed. "You could take them home, you know, no one would mind. Here, at any rate." Misaki looked suddenly hopeful while Kasumi sighed a little. His wife poked him again. "Ow."

"Stop helping, dear," she hissed. He grinned but subsided.

"I don't think that's a very good idea, Uthryyl," the eldest Tendo said, glancing at Misaki, who looked disappointed, sadly watching the soarers through the window. "What would they eat?"

Nabiki pointed at them, grinning. "Look at them! Pretty much anything they want to, I think."

"We're not importing mountain soarers to Tokyo," Kasumi said firmly, shaking her head. Beside her, Ranma was shaking with laughter, trying not to let it out. Both wives shared a glance, then looked at their husbands.

"Yours is just as much of a nuisance as mine is," Quannyr said. Kasumi nodded.

"Unfortunately. But, I suppose we love them even so." Snickering, Ranma kissed her, then went back to eating, while outside the windows the two animals kept a watchful eye on their playmates.
"Hello, daughter, how are you?" Her father's voice made Nabiki smile. Ducking a blow from Onkra, she spun and kicked out, barely missing the other woman, who leaned backwards then whipped her tail into the middle sister's ribs, knocking her two metres sideways and into a bush.

"Fine, thanks, Dad," she replied, pulling herself out and brushing off the leaves, before launching herself in a flat dive at Onkra's legs. "Just getting some exercise. How's things at home?"

Sidestepping, Onkra again caught her with her tail, but this time the Tendo woman was ready for it, grabbing the end and heaving, making her opponent yelp. Grinning, she pulled harder, although not using more than a fraction of her strength, as Onkra braced herself, then suddenly pushed off backwards, almost catching her with a backhand blow to the cheek. Ducking just in time she laughed. Ranma nodded approvingly from where he was watching with Misaki. 'She's pretty quick,' she thought to herself. 'Faster than a normal human, certainly.'

"Everything is ticking along well," Soun said, sounding pleased. "I was just wondering how you were getting along, we haven't heard from you for a while. That director fellow, Adrian, and his friend Matt were over here a few days ago. Aiko brought them over along with an LAPD officer she and her friends know. The studio people wanted to talk to Akane and Shampoo, while Aiko took the policeman to visit some friends in Minato. It all seemed to go very well."

"Did you show them the Dojo?" His daughter asked, jumping easily over Onkra's sudden lunge at her, landing on her shoulders and pushing her to the ground then rolling out of the way of her return strike.

"Yes. They seemed impressed. We talked to them for a while about Anything Goes and teaching it. Mariko won another spar, she's definitely got the gift. I suspect if she keeps at it in a few years she'll probably get offered a job in Hollywood as well." Nabiki giggled, pivoting on one foot gracefully as Onkra kicked out, smiling for a moment until her friend's muscular tail, which again she'd neglected to account for, slapped her surprisingly hard on the side of the head, flipping her onto her back with a thud. Onkra grinned while Ranma and Misaki collapsed in laughter.

"You could end up supplying stunt people in bulk," the middle sister said, snickering, as she accepted a hand from her sparring opponent. Her father laughed for a second or two.

"I suppose that's possible. Not quite what we had in mind when we resumed teaching, but it's not a bad thing, overall." Chuckling, he added, "The stunt director seemed quite interested in having Akane and Shampoo teach his own people. Elder Cologne, Genma, and I discussed it and we decided that it was allowable under certain conditions. They seemed all right with that. Especially when Genma showed them why some of the more dangerous techniques are sealed."

Bowing to Onkra, Nabiki smiled, as did her opponent. Ranma came over to talk to the D'Sage woman, while the brunette sat on a low wall next to the bush she'd ended up in, idly picking a few stray leaves out of her hair. Watching as Ranma showed the other woman another set of moves, slowly stepping through them while Onkra watched, then copied them, she asked with amusement, "If the techniques are sealed, why does he keep demonstrating them? He did the same thing six months ago when some of the students asked about dangerous moves." Soun chuckled for a moment.

"He's quite proud of coming up with the techniques in the first place, I think, even though he knows they're far too dangerous to teach. I have to admit that particular one does make an impressive demonstration."

"Isn't there a risk that someone sufficiently advanced could work out how to do it from seeing it done?" she asked, looking curiously at a leaf she'd pulled out of her ear, before flipping it back into the bush it had come from.
"It's not impossible, I suppose, but to be honest, if a martial artist reaches that level they could come up with their own techniques at least as dangerous," her father replied. "Very few practitioners of the Art could reach that level in the first place, so it's not really a problem, although it is rather amusing the way he seizes the opportunity to show what he can't show you." Nabiki laughed, looking up to where Aiko was chasing one soarer while being chased by the other one. At this range she couldn't make out which was the male and which the female.

"Uncle Genma is a strange person."

"True. But then, aren't we all in our own way?" Catching Ranma's eye, she indicated upwards, then took on her flying Azumi form and leapt into the air as he nodded, closely followed by Misaki, who was giggling with joy.

"You lot may be. I'm perfectly normal," she told him, watching the ground drop away in the light of the two suns. Her inbuilt instruments told her she was climbing at nearly a hundred kilometres an hour at a fifty degree angle, heading north-west. "Nothing weird about me at all." The middle Tendo had to level out and glide for a moment as a sudden attack of hysterical giggling overtook her. Her father was silent for a long moment.

"Perhaps," he said in the end, laughter in his voice. "Perhaps not." A voice in the background sounded faintly, causing him to pause again. "Nodoka says dinner is ready, so I'd better go. Have fun, give my best to Rika and Maiko. Take lots of pictures." Pulling out a camera drone she tossed it to the side, where it followed her in formation.

"I will. I'll be back in a few days, I'll come home for a while then."

"Goodbye, daughter."

"Bye, Dad. Say hi to the others for me." As he disconnected, she joined the aerial chase, grinning to herself.

"It's very worrying," Kasumi said quietly, having watched the recording Aiko had made of Ami for the second time. "Poor Ami. She's really stuck between honour and common sense." Glancing at her husband, she added, "That's something we both know is difficult." He nodded slightly, staring out the window.

"Damn right. What on earth is going on with that bunch of weirdos? They've been a little off for a long time, but it's got a lot worse in the last few months. It seems to be accelerating as well, based on recent events. At this rate something is going to break in a big way sooner or later." He scowled as he thought.

"Do you think you can stop it?" Uthryyl asked. Glancing at his wife, Ranma shrugged.

"I have a horrible feeling that we can't. We can probably deal with the consequences, I hope, but by the sound of it they're headed for some sort of real fuckup. If the rest of them get involved it's going to be impressive and not in a good way. Just those four are bad enough."

"It might just be three. Aiko says that Rei seemed to be behaving slightly less oddly than the others. Perhaps her Grandfather managed to get through to her somehow." Kasumi sighed a little, looking at parts of the various recordings. "I hope so."

"He's a smart man and a very wise one," her husband agreed. "If anyone can talk sense into them it would probably be him. I hope he can, but I think we need to plan for the worst."
"What would that mean in practice?" Nabiki asked, worried at the tone in his voice. He looked at her seriously.

"If they go completely nuts, dangerously so I mean, we'd have to deal with it. Permanently." She closed her eyes and swore. "I don't like it any more than you do, but they're much too powerful to go running around wildly shooting at each other in public. A lot of people would certainly end up dead. I don't think we can let that happen, not if we can stop it. I also don't think anyone else could." He looked very depressed. "You remember what you were worried about when you were beginning all this stuff a few months ago?" She nodded quietly.

"Think about what it would be like if someone who wasn't as strong willed and intelligent as you are, but a lot more powerful, really did end up like you were worried you might. Full of their own importance and sure that they were destined to rule, for example, just because they had more power than other people. That never ends well."

Nabiki flopped back in the seat and sighed, putting her hands on her face. "All of a sudden this entire lifestyle is becoming something pretty horrible."

"It's not all fun and games, unfortunately," Aiko said gently, patting her friend on the shoulder. "Sometimes we have to deal with the really bad parts, even if, or especially if, it's one of us. Halleckton was horrible. If these girls go completely off the reservation that would seem like nothing." Nodding unhappily, the middle sister looked around at her friends and family.

"Hopefully they'll work things out and nothing unfortunate will happen."

"I hope so," Ranma sighed. "I really, really do."

Sergeant Harada looked at his computer screen in disbelief. "Fuck me," he muttered, reading the incident report from a neighbouring district. "At least no one got hurt. Somehow." Looking up he shook his head. "What the hell is wrong with them?" he asked Fumiko. She shrugged helplessly.

"Not a clue. The only good thing is that the mall was shut for renovation, so there wasn't anyone around. But they pretty much destroyed the entire thing, without any care about non-combatants at all. The insurance company says it would probably have to be completely demolished and rebuilt rather than repaired. Luckily, by some amazing coincidence, it was going to be closed in about a year anyway, so it's not as bad as it could have been, but..."

"I think that's probably the biggest single amount of damage a magical girl team has ever caused," Harada said, leaning back in his chair with a sigh. "And they were fighting each other?"

"Apparently. We didn't get there until the end, when we got the call the fight was pretty much over. Our friend in their team missed most of it as well. That one with the black hair called her, she called us, we stopped them moving next door to the bowling alley. They helped, which was a good thing, those girls were frothing at the mouth. I was surprised by the second girl, she was always one of the pushier ones, but she seems to have changed recently. Still kind of short tempered, but not quite as nuts as her friends."

"God. This could have been very bad indeed," the sergeant said, running his hand through his hair.

"To put it mildly. You remember that Akane Tendo incident?"

"Vividly. I won't forget that in a hurry."

"Well, picture about six or seven of her, all fighting each other. With very real and very powerful magic on top of everything else." Sergeant Harada went white.

"Shit," he whispered. Fumiko nodded soberly.

"Pretty much exactly shit." The magical girl sat on the desk, staring at the floor. "It's gone way beyond a joke. Something is seriously wrong with that bunch of lunatics. From what we could make out from their ranting, one set of them had gone in after some demons they thought were based in the mall, while the other ones were doing the same thing but from the other side. Both of the teams had bad info, there were no demons in there at all. It looks like one of them got jumpy and fired off some sort of attack at a shadow, the other set thought they were under fire, and..." She shrugged, miming an explosion with her hands.

"Classic friendly fire incident," Harada said, nodding his understanding. "Bad enough if it's a few people with guns and body-armour. Pretty damn devastating with magical girls of the level of those ones."

"That's it. They didn't think to talk to each other beforehand, or coordinate their attacks at all. Incredibly amateurish. Even a street gang has more tactical know-how. Now they seem to have broken down into about three cliques, none of whom are talking to the others." She sighed. "Our two girls are completely out as far as I can see. None of the others will talk to them any more."

"What are you going to do?" Sergeant Harada looked at the photo attached to the report, impressed at the sheer damage done to the mall, little of which was standing now.

"Fucked if I know," his companion said sourly. "I've called Yori and told her and the others. When she stopped swearing she told us to just stay the hell away from them as long as they kept to their own area, to avoid setting them off again, while she and Chou tried to work out whether there actually is anything we can do. They'll be back tomorrow morning, hopefully those idiots won't go off again before then."

"We've never had a magical girl team implode before," the sergeant mused. "I wouldn't have thought it was possible, really, although to be honest, if I'd given it any thought before I'd have pointed at them. They've always been a little... excessive. For some time, at any rate."

Fumiko nodded with a sigh. "We've been around a bit longer, but none of us ever really had any problems with the others. There have always been various minor issues between some of the girls, especially when their areas overlapped, but most of us get along OK, and even the ones that don't are normally kind of coldly polite to each other. The only people they ever really fought were Yori and Chou, which didn't normally last very long. And at least two thirds of those fights were pretty good natured, people just working out how good they really were against the best. But when those girls came along, I started hearing stories after a while. One or two of them seemed... I don't know, kind of like they thought they were so much better than anyone else we should all bow down and serve them." She looked grimly amused.

"Oddly enough, that attitude didn't last long when they ran into Yori."

Harada stifled a sudden bark of laughter. "No, somehow I can well believe that. I remember that first fight, when they met her. It was about the fifth time in three months they'd come through here and wrecked something. I guess she moved in and decided she wanted a quiet home." He snickered. "In about five minutes and without even noticing she got about half the community loving her. When she and Chou started the fund pretty much everyone else came over. I wonder if they really realise how much people respect and like them around here?"

The tall girl grinned slightly. "Quite possibly not. Neither one of them does it because they want to be liked, that's just a useful byproduct. They do it because someone has to and no-one else was prepared, or possibly able, to." She giggled. "It's actually really funny because neither of them actually wanted all the power they seem to have ended up with. It just sort of happened."

"I think that's why they're good people to have it. Can you picture these other girls with the same abilities?" He pointed at his computer by way of illustration. Fumiko looked at the screen and shuddered.

"Trust me, Sergeant, if you knew what I know about Yori's abilities, that would scare you even more." The girl looked worried at the thought. "Mind you, they're scary enough. A couple of them have some serious power, and some quite frightening potential abilities. Luckily none of them seem able to fight very well, in a coordinated manner, so they're pretty easy to stop." She shook her head looking puzzled. "If anything, they're less effective now than they were a year ago, which is just weird. Normally practising makes you better..."

"Maybe they're doing it wrong," Harada suggested. She gave him a wry look.

"Clearly. The question is why?"

"If you lot can figure it out, do you think you can fix all this?" he asked. Pulling a chair over she dropped into it, crossing her legs.

"Personally, I doubt it. I mean, we, or Yori and Chou at any rate, might be able to figure out what the root cause of it all is, but somehow I don't think that removing that, assuming it's even possible, would repair the damage that's already been done. Half of them don't trust the other half further than they could throw them, at least two of them are sincerely prepared to kill each other given half a chance, and they all hate the other two with a passion now. I can't see how you can repair that without an awful lot of time and luck."

"And I suppose that's even if there is a real, concrete cause underlying it all. If it's just some sort of massive personality conflict..." Harada scowled at the keyboard while she nodded.

"There is that. No, I have a strong feeling that that particular grouping is probably pretty permanently broken. Whether they'd reach some sort of understanding eventually I don't know. For the moment, I just want to figure out how to stop something like this, or worse, happening again." Fumiko looked depressed, then glanced up at the door, through which moments later Tamiko entered, her face set in an expression of stone.

"Problem?"

"If I see that blonde bitch again today I'll save Yori the trouble and pull her mouthy head right off her damn shoulders," the red-head growled.

"Which one? They have at least two."

"The one with the two pony-tails. I can never keep their stupid names straight. All that jumping around and shouting slogans. They're worse than some sort of soft-drink advertiser." Sergeant Harada sniggered, making her look momentarily amused. "Hello, Sergeant."

"Hi, Tamiko. I assume that things aren't ideal?"

She sighed heavily, looking annoyed again. Pulling over another chair she spun it around and dropped into it, folding her arms on the back and resting her chin on them. "Not as such, no. I managed to get them all separated, with some help, then get most of them to agree to go home. Miss Mouth decided to argue. A lot. For quite a long time." She fumed for a moment. Glancing at her friend, she added, "I think her attitude would be much improved with some altitude, about a kilometre's worth. The drop might give her time to think." Fumiko grinned while Harada looked slightly puzzled.

"Possibly excessive, but probably very funny to watch. So what did you do?"

"Told her to shut the hell up before I smacked her in the face."

"Did she?"

"Nope. I smacked her in the face." Fumiko and Harada both broke down laughing, while she grinned a little. "She was still arguing then, but it was a lot more muffled. The blood got in the way."

"Will she be all right?" the sergeant asked when he stopped chuckling. She shrugged, looking annoyed.

"Probably. They're pretty tough and heal fast. Yori broke her nose last year, she was running around shouting about love and justice two days later without a mark on her. Anyway, the other annoying one took her home then, she was starting to look nervous. That might have been down to the sword I was holding." Tamiko smiled again for a moment. "They were walking pretty fast. With any luck they'll stay away from each other and us for a while."

"Perhaps you should ask Ms Aoyama to go and have a word with them," Harada suggested, wincing at his own words even as he said them. It seemed a pretty horrible thing to do to them even under the current circumstances. The two girls looked at each other, Fumiko raising her eyebrows.

"Might work. We'll talk to Yori about it when she gets back. Ms Aoyama isn't always around."

"Thank god for that," Harada muttered under his breath, making both of them giggle.

"Don't you like her, Sergeant?" Tamiko asked. He shuddered a little.

"How do I answer that without being rude?" She grinned.

"Like that. Well done. She's a decent person, but I will agree, somewhat..."

"Unbelievably fucking creepy to the point she'd have given HP Lovecraft a heart attack on the spot, assuming she wasn't the inspiration for his books in the first place?" Harada suggested. Tamiko nodded, smiling a little.

"Yes. That. Well put."

"And you're friends of hers. Think about how we poor mortals feel." He shivered again, although he was smiling. Rather nervously, but smiling.

"She's not that bad, Sergeant," Fumiko protested mildly. He looked at her.

"Would you want her living in your house?" Her involuntary shudder made him grin. "Exactly."

Tamiko was looking very amused, but her smile slowly faded. "Still, even if that works, it's only a temporary measure. Unless we can get those idiots to talk to each other, or at least stay away from anything breakable, sooner or later this is all going to happen again. You could feel it. And next time we might not be lucky, they could hit something full of people."
"I don't think we can hold out much hope of getting them back together," her team-mate sighed. "Sergeant Harada and I were talking about that just before you came in. I think the best we can hope for is that we might get them to stop getting any worse."

"And if we can't?"

They were all silent for a while. "Deal with it, I suppose," Fumiko finally said, very quietly. Harada looked at her. That sounded very final. She glanced at him, correctly divining his thoughts. "That might possibly just involve pushing them through a portal to somewhere they could settle their differences," she added, not looking particularly hopeful. "Whatever, it's an absolute last resort. We'll try everything else first." He sighed a little, reaching for the phone.

"I'd better call Agent Naito. The PSIA is going to need to know about all of this." She nodded.

"All right. We'll give you a report on what we've seen and done so far, which you can pass on to him. Same as usual. I'll drop it in later."

"Thanks, Fumiko." He looked at the phone in his hand for a moment, unhappily. "I never thought it would come to this."

"None of us did. Perhaps we should have." Standing, she smiled a little at him. "I'm still hoping we can work something out short of... extreme measures. If anyone can, Yori and Chou can."

"I've got at least as much confidence in them as you have, but I've got a bad feeling even so. This may be beyond even their skills." He started dialling, as she left, with Tamiko beside her.
Chapter 65

Hopefully the next few chapters will be entertaining. I suspect it may also go in a way that some people will find surprising, and a few very annoying if they're hard core SM fans. I have to admit I find some of the comments I've had in the past about this story puzzling, sometimes I wonder if people are actually reading the same story I'm writing, and it also makes me scratch my head when someone complains bitterly about how bad it all is when they've apparently put aside the time to read nearly three quarters of a million words. One would think if they didn't like it, they wouldn't bother reading, but...

It was never my intention to make this a full-blown crossover, and in many ways it still isn't, but those damn girls just kept pushing in more and more! But, I think I may be taking it in a way unlike a normal cross-over would go, which personally I'm finding amusing. I've had a lot of this in mind for months, but finding the best way to write it has proven to be more difficult than I expected, and as a result parts of it I've rewritten half a dozen times trying to get what's in my head into a form that's readable. I'm still not sure I've succeeded as well as I'd have liked, but let's try this and see what happens.

"I'm sorry you have to cut it short, my friends," Uthryyl smiled, shaking hands with them all. "But I understand. At least you got a decent night's sleep before you have to do whatever you end up doing."

Ranma nodded, looking somewhat disgruntled, but then smiled a little. "Thanks, Uthryyl. For everything. We'll have to do this again some time, hopefully without all the last minute chaos." He sighed a little, as the merchant clapped him on the back.

"You'll work it all out. If I can help, let me know."

"I will." Looking around at Quannyr and Onkra, he grinned at them. "Take care, guys. It's been a lot of fun. Onkra, keep practising at least an hour a day. We'll come back in two or three weeks to see how you're getting on, when all this is over. We can work out some sort of scheduled lesson plan then as well. Might be a good idea to have you come and stay for a while for some intensive training when you're a bit more advanced." The young woman nodded, smiling.

"I'd like that, Ranma. Thank you."

Uthryyl turned his attention to Nabiki. "We'll get the paperwork for the fusion system exports finished up over the next little while. When you're ready let me know and we can work out the next step."

"Thanks, Uthryyl. We'll talk to various people back home and work out how we can do this, but I really do think it's something we have to do."

"I'd tend to agree. I think it's a very large step, but a potentially very good one for your world to take. And, of course, lots of lovely profit." The merchant grinned toothily at her, making her giggle. "Kasumi, if you can look into those phytochemicals, we can work out whether they're the right ones and what sort of quantities we could deal with." The eldest Tendo woman smiled at her friend.

"Of course, Uthryyl. As Ranma suggested, I'll send you a copy of the drug molecular database from the medical library. Go through it and see which ones are of interest. We can find out more about "Will do. Thank you both, that could be a remarkable opportunity, it's a wonderful offer."

"No problem, Uthryyl," Ranma replied. "Anything for a friend." He looked around at the others. "Well, time to go. I'm feeling a little guilty about not immediately rushing back, but I don't think we could have done anything more than we can do now." The martial artist sighed, looking at his wife, who nodded to him.

"We needed the sleep, dear. We need to approach this with clear heads. It's too important to make any mistakes."

"True enough. OK, let's get the portal open." They concentrated, seconds later the rip in space-time crackling into existence. "Come on, lets go home and figure out what to do next." Ranma sighed a little, stepping through the portal with his wife holding his hand. Aiko waved to the three D'sage, following the others. Looking around with a smile, Misaki laughed a little, then went through as well.

Left by herself, Nabiki walked over and gave Uthryyl a quick hug. "Thank you for everything. All of you. And if it gets too much, I will talk to you."

He smiled at her fondly. "Do that, Nabiki Tendo. Any time you want to come for a visit you're more than welcome. And keep the ideas coming." Laughing, she nodded, then headed for the portal, vanishing through it. They all watched, smiling, then ducked...

"Crap! Don't let him get up the stairs to the roof!"

"No, the other way! Grab her. Grab her. Damn it, grab her! Misaki, go around that way!"

"Yip!"

"Stop licking me you idiot animal. NO! Not the TV!"

There was a crash, followed by a momentary silence, before the shouting started again.

"Nabiki, this is all your damn fault!"

"I'm sorry, all right? They just keep following me."

"Shit, he's going for the stairs again. Kas, stop him."

There was another crash.

"Damn it, I like that plant. Now look at it."

"Sorry, sis."

"Aiko, stop goddam laughing and grab her, will you?"

"The rope! Get the fucking rope!"

Some time later two rather mussed figures came back out of the portal muttering to themselves, dropped a pair of tied up and extremely annoyed soarers on the lawn, glared at Uthryyl and his family who were rolling around howling with laughter, then disappeared back into the glowing doorway in reality. It vanished with a pop.

It took a considerable time for Onkra to stop laughing long enough to untie the animals, who exchanged glances, yipped happily, then immediately dashed for the open door of the house.

"Hey!" Quannyr charged after them as her husband and daughter collapsed laughing again.

"Aliens are..."

"I know. But so much fun."

"So, what's the next step?" Fumiko asked, looking curiously around at the broken TV and the plant Kasumi was repotting, mumbling to herself and intermittently shooting her sister dark glances.

"And for that matter, what happened?"

"Don't ask!" five people said simultaneously, looking annoyed. She held up her hands protectively.

"Sorry."

Misaki looked at her and winked. "Tell you later," she commed her sister, who smiled slightly. Tamiko, standing beside her, giggled, looking around, but said nothing.

When everything was cleared up, Kasumi's plant was safely repotted, and she'd stopped looking at Nabiki with mild irritation, they all sat on the sofa with a large pot of strong coffee and a number of mugs. Fumiko asked her question again. Ranma looked at her, then around at the others, before sighing and shrugging.

"I have no idea at the moment. Not enough information."

"You've watched the recordings?"

"Yes, we went over them last night," Kasumi told her, pouring coffee for everyone and handing it around. "Uthryyl and the others watched them as well. It's very troubling. Have you found anything more about what happened before you got there?"

"A little. We haven't spoken to Rei yet, Ami's been passing information on to us though. Both of them are sort of in shock, Rei more than Ami. I think she was more than half expecting something like this. She's much smarter than the rest of them, plus she's been seeing it kind of from the outside for a long time. Even so, it was a surprise how quickly it hit the fan, and how thoroughly."

"Any idea which one of them fired the first shot?" Nabiki went back over a few minutes of the recording from Fumiko's point of view surrounding the time they arrived, shaking her head at the devastation.

"Rei thought it was that tall blonde one. She was acting weird the whole time even under the circumstances, kind of twitchy. Like she'd had way too much coffee, or perhaps something a lot stronger. I saw her using that earthquake magic of hers a couple of times on something that wasn't there as far as I could see, she did quite a lot of the total damage, collapsed one wing of the mall all by herself. Crazy girl was giggling a lot of the time as well, which was a little off-putting. Sipping some coffee she sighed. "I could believe it was her. Never liked her much. Too quick off the mark and pretty full of herself."

Ranma nodded thoughtfully. "OK. So, she sees something, or thinks she does, fires on it, probably massively overdoing it in the normal way, then what? Misses and hits one of Ami and Rei's bunch?"
Or just makes them twitch and shoot back? Either way it's a little weird, you'd think they'd recognise her magic at work."

Tamiko shrugged. "The whole thing is weird. As far as we could work out, she started it all, making the middle of the mall lower floor collapse, which made one of the other side, probably that one with the lightning attack, fire back. She missed as well, but got the first bunch so wound up they all returned fire at the same time. That's when the parking structure blew up. About then Rei worked out something was wrong and pulled back. The others kept shooting at each other and screaming, apparently, not even shouting their stupid attack names properly, just completely losing it. The magic was going all over the place, doing all sorts of weird things it normally wouldn't. That seems to have confused the issue even more."

"Eventually she worked out who the 'Attackers' were and called Ami, who called us. She met us there pretty quickly but it was almost over by then, there wasn't a lot left of the place but rubble and a few walls." Fumiko sighed as she thought back to the previous day. "They were absolutely filthy and damn near foaming at the mouth they were so worked up. Even that tall one with the long green hair, the one who's a bit creepy, was laughing like a lunatic and firing off those energy blasts at anything that moved. Really fucking strange. She took a shot at me and I got her in the face with a ki ball, knocked her silly and took most of her hair off at the same time, which to be honest made me feel pretty good. She's a very annoying person."

Ranma chuckled. "Oh, she is that. She's the one who does stupid things with time." He smiled darkly in a manner than made them slightly worried. "The last time we met she tried lecturing me on how powerful she was while trying to shoot me with that staff thing she uses. That didn't end well for her. The look on her face was hysterical. She won't come anywhere near me now, she seems to think of me as something from the pits of hell."

"OK, so we have what, seven of them going at each other for around half an hour?" Tamiko nodded.

"That's about right. It started with eight, but Rei pulled out pretty fast when she worked out something was wrong. That didn't make her friends like her at all, lightning girl punched her in the head, then apparently tried to strangle her until one of the ones on the other side shot her in the ass with an energy attack. Which then triggered a complete free for all. At first it was one set against the other but by the end they were all pretty much shooting anything at all, even their own team-mates. Like what happened on the roof of the bank with Aiko and Misaki, only a lot worse."

"Unbelievable," Ranma sighed, shaking his head in disbelief. "I always thought they had a collective screw loose but that's just..." He couldn't work out how to finish the thought.

"It would have been funny if it wasn't so serious. Double blondie was screaming about being a princess, damn it! And everyone should give her the respect she deserved. The other blonde idiot was screaming about the power of love while trying damn hard to kill at least two of her friends. One of them was yelling something along the lines of people stealing all the best boys from her, while most of the rest were basically simply gibbering like maniacs. That younger one with the violet hair looked kind of worried but was doing a fair bit of damage as well, although looking back on it I have a feeling that a lot of it was basically self defence. I don't think she actually attacked anyone, just fended them off, but I might be wrong. She was certainly the only one who seemed upset about it afterwords."

Fumiko looked around at her friends, sipping some coffee, before continuing. "The others, if anything, looked quite pleased with the results of their little exercise. Right up to the point we turned up. We dropped them all fairly quickly, they were so highly strung they didn't have the faintest idea about proper self defence, less even than they usually do. If they'd all been on form, more like they were when they first started, we'd have had a lot more trouble, they're not exactly underpowered, but it was actually a bit pathetic how easy they were to shut down. And if it wasn't for their durability I'd guess that at least a couple of them would have bitten it in the fight. They all looked pretty battered even so. Rei got the tall blonde, Ami did the brunette with the lightning, Tamiko and I got the rest."

"What would you say their mental state was after they woke up?" Kasumi asked curiously. Fumiko glanced at Tamiko, who shrugged, scowling.

"Precarious. We had to drop two or three of them half a dozen times until they stopped trying to start it all over again. They eventually got the hint when I broke that blue-haired girl's arm. What's her name, Michiru or something. She had a go at me a couple of times, and both the stupid blondes as well. She'd have killed the mouthy one for sure if I hadn't stopped her. If we hadn't turned up they'd have happily kept at it, they were heading towards the bowling alley, and none of them seemed to give a shit that there were people screaming and running for their lives."

"It's pretty much ruined whatever reputation they had left," Tamiko added sadly. "At least one of the local police was saying he'd have been happy if they'd simply killed each other and solved the problem that way." Ranma glanced at his wife, neither of them looking happy at all.

"Fucking hell. What a mess." He refilled his mug and took a long drink from it. "How are we going to fix all this?"

Fumiko sighed, then looked seriously at him. "I don't think we can 'fix' it. With some luck, we might be able to prevent it happening again, but even there I'm not sure how, yet. But I don't think they're ever going to trust each other again. Not for years, anyway. To be honest, after what we saw, I'd consider it close to a miracle if you guys can simply work out how to stop them killing each other in their sleep. And even if, somehow, we can talk them around and get them sane again, or as sane as they ever got, no one in the community is going to trust them or feel safe around them, except for Ami and maybe Rei."

"What on earth happened to them?" Kasumi wondered out loud. "They were never the most responsible girls, except perhaps for the first year or so they were active, but this is so far beyond anything I would have expected it's horrifying."

"Perhaps there really is some sort of external magic or something working on them," Nabiki mused. Aiko looked at her, then shook her head.

"Ami seemed fairly sure there wasn't. At least not directly. We should check, of course, but she's damn smart and very careful. If she's ruled it out, either she's right, or she's wrong and it's too subtle for her to find. Which would be worrying in it's own right." The middle sister nodded thoughtfully.

"Another very interesting question is why it doesn't seem to have affected her. And following on from that, why Rei seems to have managed to shake it off, at least to some extent, and the others can't."

"It's possible it's linked to intelligence, in some way," Kasumi suggested, thinking hard. "Ami is extremely bright, at least in your class, sister. Rei is well above average from what I know of her. Most of the others, while not at all stupid, are more or less normal young women, aside from the magic abilities. Perhaps that has something to do with it."

"They were all acting like overpowered low grade morons during the fight," Tamiko told her, looking disgusted. "I've seen some fairly dim demons who'd have been more difficult to deal with, even without the powerful magical abilities. I mean, the entire thing started because they didn't even think to tell each other what they were going to do in the first place, or take a moment to wonder who they were shooting at during it. Those gang members we were having fun with in LA are brighter and better organised than that! And most of them were idiots." Several of the group grinned at this.

"We're going to have to talk to Ami and Rei, get their input, probably Rei's grandfather as well, since he knows them well and is very observant. He's been keeping an eye on them for years although none of them knew about it. Except Ami, probably." The martial artist looked out the window at the late morning sunshine, frowning in thought. "Check them both over and see if we can find anything wrong. Then grab one of the others, with or without her cooperation, and check her as well. We may have to call in some outside help. We're damn good with the physical stuff, but the mental issues are another matter. If they have something seriously wrong with their minds, we might not even see it, never mind be able to do anything about it."

"If they have something seriously wrong with their minds?" Aiko queried with heavy sarcasm. "I wouldn't have thought that was in doubt by this point." He grinned slightly, nodding.

"Good point."

"Who were you thinking of calling in, dear?" Kasumi asked him. He considered the question for a while.

"Probably Hnther, at first. He's extremely good with mind magic, even if he thinks we're both impossible." Noticing a number of puzzled expressions from the others, he added, "Hnther is the security mage we got the spell Misaki suggested at Christmas from. Nice guy. He finds us very difficult to understand, but unlike most mages he doesn't reject our magic out of hand as not being magic at all. It fascinates him. In his line of work he often has to scan peoples minds to make sure they're not being influenced externally, that does happen sometimes despite how difficult it is to do right. I think he'd stand a good chance of working out if there was something wrong, or if not, would know someone who could."

"That sounds good as far as it goes." Aiko glanced around at her friends. "But, the big question no one wants to ask... What if, even after we scan them, check them out, get outside help in... we can't find anything? What then? If they go off like this again, I'm pretty damn sure people are going to get hurt. It's a bloody miracle that no one died yesterday. Now, from what I can see, they genuinely hate each other. In another face-off they might pull out the really big guns. If one or other of their new factions seriously tried to wipe out the others, it would get extremely messy very fast indeed."

Ranma looked at her, then glanced at his wife. Not looking at all happy but also looking very certain, he quietly replied, "We don't let that happen. If we have to ensure it can never happen, we do."

"You're talking about shooting to kill," Misaki noted. He nodded unhappily.

"As the absolute last resort, yes. It's like Halleckton, I'm afraid. If they go off to the point that a huge disaster is inevitable, we'd have no choice. Nineteen demons is nothing to what those girls could do if they really got going. In one way I'm somewhat surprised that only one mall got destroyed. Their power level, if they ever managed to really get some traction, is much higher than that. We'd be lucky to have Tokyo left afterwards in that case. We can't allow something like that to happen, even if we have to call in everyone else to help stop them."

"Do we have the right to do that?" Nabiki asked, not meeting anyone's eyes. There was a long silence.

"I think we have the duty to do that," Kasumi finally said, gently. "I would rather do almost anything else, but we have to face the fact that it's unlikely that anyone other than a magical girl could really stop a group of rogue magical girls. The military might, eventually, but only at the cost of probably thousands of lives and untold destruction. The police wouldn't stand a chance. A few of the mages, or one or two of our visitors, could probably do something, but it could well be very difficult and costly. In all probability we're the only ones who can do it cleanly and quickly. But I very much do not want it to come to that."

"But killing people..."

Ranma smiled at her sadly. "Every time any of the girls kills a sentient demon, they're killing people. A lot of us have done it. The people usually aren't human, true, but they're still people. Sometimes, to prevent the death of an innocent, you have to cause a different death. The police know this, any soldier knows it. The good ones always try everything else first, but if all else fails, sometimes you don't have a choice." Nabiki considered his words for a while, then nodded, looking upset.

"It doesn't necessarily mean we have to assassinate them in cold blood, either, Nabs," the martial artist added, looking sympathetically at her. "We can certainly shut them down easily enough, without resorting to lethal force, unless things go completely to shit, which means we could trap them in a good solid ward then drop them through a portal to somewhere they wouldn't come back from. Pick an uninhabited world with food, water, things like that, then just let them get on with it. It's not nice but it's slightly better than just killing them."

"Only slightly," she sighed. "From the sound of it they'd kill each other and save us the effort soon enough in that case. Can't we, I don't know, take their powers away or something? If they weren't magical girls any more it wouldn't be a problem."

"Unfortunately, it doesn't work like that. You can't just take magical abilities or ki control away from someone, it's not like disarming a gunman. Once you've worked out how to access magic, or ki for that matter, it's an inherent function of the mind. Without destroying the intelligence you simply can't undo the magical ability. Think of learning do mathematics, or something like that. You can't really unlearn it." Kasumi smiled slightly at her sister, reaching out and squeezing her hand. "It's why it's so difficult to deal with a mage that's gone bad. Many magic-based worlds have tried for a long time to find out how to do something like that, but as far as I know it can't be done. You can, in some cases, limit or block access to magic by an individual, but it's difficult and doesn't last forever. The more powerful they are the more difficult it becomes."

"But your magic is so different, isn't there something you can do? I mean, you managed to edit their magic with that clothing spell and from what I know it's very powerful and old." The middle sister indicated the other four young women, who were listening intently.

"Editing it and removing it are two completely different tasks. All I did was make a small functional change to part of a spell. I could change it quite significantly, or even delete that specific spell, but it wouldn't change the fact that they were magical girls. Without looking at the magic Ami and the others use I can't be totally sure but I would be very surprised if the situation was much different." Kasumi looked sadly around at the rest of the people on the sofa. "We may have no choice."

"Even those mages in the UK who use wands can still access it if you take their little sticks away. The stick makes it much easier, but the ability is in the mage, not the wand. Most of the limitations they have in that respect are because they think they have them, not because they really do. It's a mental crutch, like using emotions to access ki." The dark-haired man slumped against his wife, who put her arm around him. "It would be much easier if we could simply turn these girls off, but I doubt we can."

Aiko smiled sadly at her friends. "When you come down to it, however we ended up here, we're all defenders of the community. If that means we have to defend the community from ourselves, that's what we do. We'd regret it, but we can't let that stop us preventing innocent people dying."

Fumiko, Tamiko, and Misaki nodded, looking at the table, while Ranma sighed again.

"Hopefully it won't come to that. We have to try to stop it getting any worse, even if we can't repair them properly."

"There's another part of the problem we need to address," his wife noted after a long silence. They all looked at her. "The government is going to be getting very nervous about all of this. They give us a lot of room, far more than some people would think reasonable, but an event like this is bound to upset them."

"Very true." Ranma glanced at her, then closed his eyes and rubbed them. "I'm going to have to make some calls. Reassure some people that this isn't the start of a general breakdown of order in the magical world, just something we can sort out. Somehow."

"Agent Naito?" Nabiki asked curiously. He smiled at her slightly mysteriously.

"No. Somewhat higher than that." At her inquisitive expression he snickered. "Sorry, I really am, we have very few secrets from you, but that one I have to keep. I made a promise." Five sets of eyes were now looking very intrigued. Kasumi giggled for a moment.

"That made them much more curious, dear."

"I can live with that," he laughed. "All right, I'm going to make some calls, then I guess we need to see Ami and the others. At that temple would be the obvious place."

"The priest wanted to see you anyway," Aiko noted. He nodded.

"OK. Can you call Ami, get her to meet us there in about, hmm, let's say an hour."

"Yep." She looked around at her friends. "We should probably go and check on the lunatics, see what they're up to, just in case."

"We can use the camera drones for that," Nabiki suggested, holding one up. "Just send them to shadow the girls. If anything kicks off we'll know immediately, but we won't provoke them into doing something stupid."

"They don't seem to need provocation," Fumiko mumbled.

"Good idea. Very good idea." Ranma grinned at her. "I knew those things would come in handy."

"After I found them, you mean." She laughed as he nodded.

Aiko smiled. "All right. Misaki, you take the two blondes, I'll send mine after those two lesbians, Tamiko, you do the brunette and the green haired one, and Fumiko, you can have the last one." They all pulled a number of drones out of ki space, activating them. Shortly a series of small alien camera spheres zipped out the opened balcony doors, fading out of view and dispersing over Minato.
Ami sat on the steps of the temple looking out into the sunlit courtyard, thinking. Footsteps beside her made her look up to see her friend and team-mate standing there, appearing worried and sad. She patted the stone beside her. "Sit down, Rei. What's the problem?"

The other young woman looked incredulously at her for a moment. "What's the problem? What's the problem?" Taking a few deep breaths she tried to calm down while the blue-haired girl smiled a little. "The problem is that everything has gone completely insane. Our entire group seems to have lost it's marbles, it's only by some miracle that no-one died yesterday, and now we're waiting for some outside group, who, by the way, is led by someone who really doesn't like us, to come and make things all better. That's the fucking problem!" Breathing heavily she stared at her friend, who smiled again and repeated the patting action. Eventually she sat down, grunting with irritation. "And why are you in your civilian form anyway?"

"There's no point in being powered up for all this, they know who we all are anyway. After yesterday, I'm not keen on being associated with that uniform and the group it represents." Ami sighed. "Have you seen the news today? At least one camera crew caught some of them smashing that mall to pieces, and then making a move on the bowling alley. They weren't being complimentary, 'Arrogant', 'Dangerous', and 'Hazard to life and limb' were some of the more colourful terms used. Less than an hour and years worth of good work was undone."

Rei looked at the ground, watching a small beetle wander out of a crack in the stonework next to her hand. Gently touching it, she nodded slowly, a tear in her eye. "I saw it. What happened to us? This isn't the way it was supposed to go." Putting her arm around her friend Ami hugged her.

"Believe me, I know. But it hasn't been going the way it was supposed to for a long time. Almost nothing we were told was going to happen has played out the way it was supposed to, and even the bits that did were... not right. It's been puzzling me for a long time. They were supposed to have good information, but at best it's been only partially correct, and a lot of it was flat out wrong. Not to mention all the things that happened that caught everyone completely by surprise. It worries and scares me. I thought for a while that we were lucky, we had advance warning of things that most people wouldn't get, although even at the time I believed that I was a little nervous about some of the implications. But I think we were all wrong. Something is very different, something very fundamental, from what it was 'supposed' to be, which I don't understand at all."

The beetle now on her fingertip, the black-haired woman lifted it to her eyes and looked at it, before gently blowing on it. Opening it's wings it flew off rather erratically, landing a few metres away. She watched it silently for a while, as Ami stopped talking. Eventually she sighed. "I don't understand it either. Everyone has been twitchy and weird for some time now, including me, but yesterday... That was scary. At first I really did think we were under attack, but I finally realised what was going on, that's when I called you. I tried to get the others to stop but they completely ignored me. Just laughed and kept on attacking each other, like they didn't even know who they were. But they did, they were calling each other by name even while they were firing. The magic was going nuts, all sorts of weird things were happening, but no-one would stop." She shivered a little. "It could have been unbelievably bad. What if that mall hadn't been closed? I don't think it would have mattered."

"Thousands of people could have died if that had happened." Ami looked frightened. "That's not what we're supposed to be like. We save people, we save the planet, we don't put them at risk. Or we didn't, once. I can see why Yori dislikes our group so much."

"We really messed up with her, didn't we?" Rei asked, looking up at the sky for a moment. "Years back, when we had a chance to make a friend, someone who could genuinely help, we completely fucked it up. And we've made it worse every time we met her since. How can we fix all this? I want my friends back the way they were, damn it." She wiped her eyes, glaring at the pavement as if it was the problem. The blue-haired woman next to her sighed.

"We can't fix it, I think. We might be able to fix parts of it, but... Would you trust them any more? I don't, not after what happened. Unless we can find out what's going on, I don't know I would ever trust most of them now, I'd never know if it might happen again. Leaving aside the fact that they seem to hate each other now anyway."

"Minako was genuinely trying to strangle Makoto at one point," Rei said, then smiled slightly. "While proclaiming the power of love, very loudly. It would have been funny if it wasn't so serious." Ami giggled, then shook her head.

"Ironic, considering that a few minutes earlier Makoto tried to strangle you."

"There was a lot of it going around." They sat in silence for a while. "What are we going to do if we can't repair the damage? And if Yori can't?" Her friend and team-mate closed her eyes for a few seconds.

"Anything we have to do to make sure this doesn't happen again. We can't allow them to kill anyone. We've come pretty damn close before, by accident, it's only by blind luck in most cases nothing like that happened. But, if what happened yesterday had been in the middle of Roppongi, for example, the casualty count would have been horrific. We have to make sure that can't happen." She glanced at her companion, who eventually nodded. "No matter what, we can't end up as mass murderers."

"Oh, hell," Rei sighed deeply. "No. You're right, I don't like it at all, but you're right." They both looked up as her grandfather came out the door behind them with a tray, a pot of tea and some cups on it, then sat beside them, handing each a cup of tea.

"It's a difficult decision to take, to stop a true friend, even when you know they're wrong," he said, taking a sip of his own and looking out at the courtyard. "But sometimes, it's the only decision you can take." He glanced at them both, then went back to staring at the yard. "You and your friends have done much to justifiably be proud of, my children. That won't go away even if you have to prevent the rest of them causing a disaster. I hope that between you, you and Yori's group can find a way to stop that, without violence. But be prepared for the worst. I don't like any of this, it just feels wrong, but I can't work out why, exactly. Hopefully more knowledgeable people will be able to help."

"When will they get here?" Rei asked, looked at Ami, who checked her watch.

"Any minute now, I think. Aiko said half past two, it's nearly that." Thirty seconds later both girls jumped slightly as four figures appeared soundlessly in the middle of the courtyard, although the old priest didn't move a muscle except to smile.

"It's nice to see you again, Yori, and you, Chou," he said, pouring four more cups of tea. The four young women approached, the two in the front bowing respectfully to the priest.

"We're pleased to see you again as well, sir. It's unfortunate it's under these circumstances." Yori accepted a cup, as did Chou and the others, sipping it then nodding appreciatively. "Very nice, as usual." Gesturing to her companions, she added, "You know Aiko, of course." He nodded. "This is Azumi, a friend of ours. We've been training her for some time." The silver-haired, orange-eyed girl with them bowed slightly to the priest, a small smile crossing her face.
"I'm pleased to meet you, sir," she said, her voice neutral but not unfriendly. He studied her for a moment, then smiled.

"Likewise, my dear. Aren't you hot in that leather coat?" He grinned a little. "It's very nice though."

"Thank you." She smiled back, appearing much less emotionless for a moment. "No, I'm fine, thanks for asking." Azumi glanced at the two girls sitting next to the priest, then at Yori.

"Ami, and Rei," the black-haired woman commented, pointing each out. She studied them for a moment, her face nearly as neutral and emotionless as her companion's. "We've had our differences in the past." Both of them winced a little.

"I'm sorry about that," Ami offered. Yori looked at her for a long few seconds then shrugged with a small smile.

"All in the past. Let's forget it, move on, and try to figure out what to do about all this."

Rei exchanged glances with her friend. "Just like that? Forget it? After all the yelling and stuff?" Yori nodded, grinning.

"Yep. No point worrying about things we can't change. Let's worry about things that I hope we can."

"Why don't we go inside," Rei's grandfather suggested, standing up with the tray. "I suspect you want it all to be private." Yori nodded, before they all followed him inside the temple to a large room in the middle. "You can use this for as long as you want," he said, waving one hand at the room. "I'll get you some more tea, then leave you alone."

"Thanks." Yori smiled at the old man, who smiled back.

"Oh, while I remember, I checked them as best I could for any signs of a malign spiritual influence," he added, looking serious again. "I was unable to find anything, either with Rei or Ami, or the other three. I don't know if that helps."

"It might. Thank you," Yori replied. He nodded, leaving them. Shortly he returned with a fresh pot of tea, putting it on the table in the room, before leaving again and closing the door behind him.

They all looked at each other for a long moment. Eventually Yori sighed. "What a damn mess. OK, let's start at the beginning, see if we can find some way out of this that leaves everyone alive and sane and doesn't write off the entire country if not the planet. I like this planet, most of my stuff is kept here." Rei giggled slightly, unsure why, making Chou smiled gently at her.

"Do you think we can?"

"All we can do is try, dear," the blonde said soothingly. "Sit down, have some more tea, then we can talk things through." Shortly they were all sitting around the table. Chou glanced at her partner, then looked at the two currently powered-down magical girls. "So. Where to begin?"

"Probably right at the beginning," Aiko suggested. She looked apologetically at Ami. "Sorry, I know I said the other day we wouldn't pry, but I think at this point we need to know more about you all. Especially about what we were talking about on the roof." Ami glanced at her team-mate, who looked torn.

"I'm not really comfortable talking about that," she said, "it's kind of a secret." She thought some more about it, sighing. "But I guess we don't have a choice."
"If it would make you feel less worried, we do have a security spell that will stop the information going any further," Chou noted. "It's very effective, apparently, although we haven't had cause to use it yet. We're prepared to use it on ourselves to reassure you." Ami looked puzzled but curious, so she explained the spell's purpose.

"Interesting," the blue-haired woman said when she'd finished. Once more she glanced at her friend, who after a long pause grudgingly nodded. "All right. Assuming it works the way you say it does, we accept." Chou glanced at Aiko, who got up without a word, left the room, then flashed out of existence.

"She'll bring the others, we all need to be present for the spell to work, although afterwards they can go again. They're keeping an eye on your friends and the district."

Shortly the brunette came back in with the other three members of her team. Closing the door behind her, she retook her seat. "Now what?" she asked curiously.

"I'll do the spell on everyone," Yori said, "But Chou will have to do it on me, it's sort of fiddly applying it to yourself." Concentrating, her hands glowed as she put them on Azumi's head for a moment. The silver-haired woman looked momentarily dizzy, her eyes losing focus briefly.

"Ugh. That's a weird feeling," she muttered.

"Any aftereffects, double vision, headache, anything like that?" Yori asked, looking at her closely. She shook her head.

"No. It only lasted a few seconds. I feel fine now."

"Good. Looks like it took. OK, I'll do everyone else." This only took a few minutes. Ami and Rei watched with interest as each of the visitors got the same momentary expression of mild nausea, then shook their heads.

"That is a very odd sensation," Chou said mildly, rubbing her forehead. "Quite an unusual spell." Turning to Yori she performed the same action on her.

"Weird." Yori grinned at them. "OK, Ami, you get the other part, it's kind of like a password to the spell. You need to provide it to allow it to be changed, for example to add more people to it."

Not entirely sure what she was going to do, Ami hesitantly nodded. "Um, all right, I guess. What do I do?"

"Nothing, just don't fight it." Yori reached out and touched her head for a moment, producing a sensation like something tickling at the back of her mind.

"Ick," she mumbled, holding her head. "That itches right inside my brain."

"It should subside in a moment." As promised, the sensation went away a few seconds later. Yori inspected her, then nodded, satisfied. "Looks good. If we need to add anyone, I'll show you what to do. Right, now that's sorted, the other guys are going back and we're going to put some damn heavy wards around this room for privacy." Once more, Aiko left the room, her team following, returning a minute later alone. Seconds later Ami felt a massively powerful ward surround the room, blocking everything in or out. Curiously manifesting her computer, one of the few things she could do with the magic in her powered-down state, she scanned it then whistled.

"Good grief. That's seriously impressive." Yori looked pleased.
"Thanks. We've practised a lot. OK, spill it. Tell us how all this started." Putting the computer away again, Ami hesitated, glancing at Rei, who looked uncertain, then sighed and gestured for her to begin.

"All right. When I was about fourteen, I met a cat. It told me some very strange things..." Yori and Chou exchanged glances, as did Aiko and Azumi. "I know how it sounds but I swear it's true." Ami started talking, explaining her relationship with her team, how each of them had come into their powers, the various battles and enemies they'd faced and the problems they'd solved. As she spoke, Yori and the others listened impassively, although she had the distinct impression they were somehow occasionally talking to each other.

The story went on. Future disasters leading to, in the far future, the establishment of a near paradise ruled by her friends. Time travel, information from the future, artefacts and enemies from the past. Interplanetary kingdoms on the moon in the depths of time, reincarnation, talking cats, and much more. Even as she was telling them she had a weird feeling of both deja vu and complete ridiculousness. 'Told like this, it sounds completely insane,' she thought, trying not to laugh. Rei added her own information to the story, which lasted a good two hours. Eventually, they stopped. Yori stared at her for a while, then looked at Chou, her eyebrows raised so high they almost disappeared into her hair.

"You're completely sure about all that, are you?" she finally asked.

"Yes."

"Hmm." The short woman crossed her arms and studied them for a while. "You do realise how nuts all that sounds? And that's coming from someone whose life is totally crazy." A smile tugged at the corner of her mouth for a moment, making Ami snicker.

"I know. I've never really listened to it all before like that, but even as I was talking I was thinking it's completely daft. But, I swear, that's the story as I know it."

"There are quite a number of inconsistencies in it," Azumi commented, watching them with interest. "From what you told us, you believe a number of specific events were to take place in a particular order, leading to, in the long term, some sort of ill-defined disaster that would kill the bulk of the population of the planet. In something like a thousand years, this new kingdom springs up, ultimately ruled by your friend Usagi." Ami nodded.

"That's the plan." She sighed. "And I know what you're going to say. Most of it, or at least a large amount of it, either hasn't happened at all or hasn't happened in the right order or in the right way. That's something that's been bothering me for a long time."

"Quite a lot of it has happened, but somehow different," Rei added slowly, thinking back. "There really was a Dark Kingdom that was sending demons here to suck the life out of people. We had to kill a lot of them, deal with several very dangerous creatures that were in charge of it all, then eventually invade them and wipe them all out. But it wasn't exactly like we were expecting." She glanced at Ami. "One of the weirder things was that some of the demons themselves didn't quite seem to know why they were doing what they were doing. They looked... slightly puzzled, if that makes any sense. Didn't stop them doing it, unfortunately."

"The names were all wrong but the descriptions and the actions were basically right," Ami agreed. "The cats were very confused, not that there's much unusual about that. They always seem a bit confused. But it got a lot worse in the last, oh, two or three years. Most of the information they gave us was at best incomplete and at worst totally wrong."
"From what you said, the time line is all wrong as well," Azumi noted. "There should have been more invasions, things like that, much earlier on."

"Another odd thing is that according to what you said, I suspect you should also be much more powerful than you are," Yori added, inspecting them with interest. "Not that's you're not already very powerful, the inherent magic is very impressive, but based on your story, if you really are destined to defeat all these cosmic enemies, you're wildly underpowered at the moment." Ami looked at Rei, then nodded again.

"Again, I know. I worked that out quite a while ago. I don't have any explanation for it. We do get the occasional power-up or new attack, but nothing much for the last year or two. It tended to happen when we needed it, if that helps. Perhaps we simply haven't needed anything else yet." She shrugged a little hopelessly. "All of it just gives me a headache by now. I've been trying to work it out for years. It's like we're working to a script that someone's torn all the pages out of and mixed up, and half of it is in a foreign language anyway."

"The magical girl lifestyle is confusing and annoying at the best of times from my own experience," Yori snickered, "but I sort of see what you mean. It's very odd." She sat and thought for a while.

"Aside from anything else, we've been doing this for something like five years now," Ami added. "According to the cats and... other information... right back at the beginning, something critical should have happened a long time ago. But it never did. At first they were saying their memories must be slightly wrong, it was bound to happen soon, but for at least a year now they just don't mention it."

"It? This ill-defined disaster that's supposed to kill almost everyone?" Aiko asked.

"I think so, or at least something that eventually triggers it. We've been told several different causes for it. An asteroid setting off a nuclear winter that leads to a new ice age. An actual nuclear winter caused by world war three. Some sort of huge magical disaster. Nothing yet." She shuddered. "Thank fuck for that."

"Other people like us should have turned up as well, according to our sources," Rei added, looking disturbed. "Quite a few of them, actually. Every now and then we'd get information that references someone else, someone who should have been either joining us, or possibly fighting us, but none of them ever arrived. It's just the nine of us. Again, no one seems to talk about it any more. The cats just go quiet when any of us ask about it, so in the end we stopped asking." She turned to her friend. "When did anyone last mention that?"

"Well over a year ago, as far as I can remember. You're right, it's weird. At first everyone was pretty excited about new people turning up, but when they didn't, it all went quiet after a while." Ami frowned as she considered the thought.

"What do the others of your group think of all this?" Chou asked curiously.

Rei sighed a bit. "Based on recent events I'm not sure they're actually thinking at all. But, it's all confusing. Until Ami mentioned it I hadn't actually given it much thought for some time. I knew that things weren't quite going the way we'd been told they would, but there's always been so much vagueness in the whole thing it didn't seem impossible that things were going according to plan, we just got the timing wrong. Some of the others were complaining that none of the information we got was ever right a year or so ago, but since then not much. We don't see the other four very often, they've been keeping to themselves for quite some time now." She looked at Yori. "Mostly because of you, I think. You scared the shit out of them last time."
Ami giggled. "Oh, didn't you just. Setsuna was nearly shitting herself. It was actually hysterically funny, she's one of the most forbidding and annoying people I know sometimes, with her 'I know something you don't' attitude, which gets right up my nose. All this looking into time and working things out in advance is all very well and impressive, except that for a long time she seems to be having less and less luck with it. Which is driving her up the wall. Then you turned up and she went completely round the bend trying to find out about you. Apparently you don't register on her system at all, either of you. That really worried her."

"What is this 'system' of hers?" Yori looked interested, glancing at Chou for a moment.

"Supposedly the most powerful magical or technological artefact in the universe. I haven't seen it, although it's supposed to be pretty impressive. It looks like a sort of enormous door and is some kind of time manipulation device combined with a massive computer, I think. She won't talk about it, but there was a little information on it in my computer."

"A damn time machine. They're always trouble," Yori muttered, looking disgusted. "Not a good idea at all. I'm beginning to get an idea of what might be wrong."

"What do you mean?" Ami asked. "Aiko mentioned you didn't like the idea of time travel, but I'm not sure why."

"It's a massively dangerous thing to do," the martial artist explained, sighing a little. "Probably the most dangerous thing you can do. I only know enough about it to steer well clear, but I know some real experts who could explain in detail that would make you lose sleep for a month why you should never interfere with time. Basically, it doesn't like it. At all. And it has ways of... resolving... paradox, ways that seldom work out well for anyone involved."

"I know quite a bit of theory and math behind various models of time travel," Ami said, looking fascinated. "General relativity permits it in some variants, although with a number of very weird possible outcomes. The Novikov self-consistency conjecture solves a few of them but leaves other things even weirder." She shook her head slightly. "It gives you a headache when you start to think about it."

"It gives you a bigger headache if you actually do it," Yori grumbled. "Trust me. I've heard of the Novikov thing, it's not completely wrong but not completely right either. I suppose it might be if you did the time travelling by purely technological means but most of the ways I've heard of people actually doing it use magic, either completely or partially, which makes things even weirder. Magic breaks normal physics horribly. I've travelled back in time once, using a magical artefact. It was an accident, actually. That's the sort of thing that happens to me. It was... annoying." Rei and Ami looked at each other.

"That sounds like an interesting story," Ami said.

"I might tell you one day. Anyway, I mentioned it to this time mage I met once and he got quite upset. Physically travelling in time, in most realities, is actually one of the very few things that is completely forbidden. The results can be, um, fairly dramatic." She shuddered a little, making everyone look at her oddly. "As in, theoretically possibly deleting the entire reality dramatic." Ami went white. "It's happened. More than once."

"What!?"

"The multiverse does not like time travel. It permits it, but you have to be really careful. Try to change things in the past, the old 'kill your grandfather' bit, that doesn't work. Either things just sort of heal over if the change is small enough or far enough back, so you end up where you started just by a slightly different path, or you split off an entire section of time that just removes you from the equation so you can't go back in the first place. Sometimes you can make small changes if you're really careful, apparently, but the reaction to it depends on something he called 'temporal inertia'. Basically, some things have a small amount of it and can be redirected a little, other things have massive amounts and can't be, without huge effort. That seems to annoy the multiverse, which if it notices, takes steps. In extreme cases, very significant ones."

"It sounds like you're saying the universe is conscious," Ami noted, listening with worried intent. Yori shrugged a little.

"I don't think it is, not like you're thinking, and there's nothing like a destined path, either. It's more like there's a sort of feedback system keeping things ticking over, which reacts if you try to deliberately push them off course. The harder the push, the harder the corrective action. The time traveller is the easiest thing to react against, so they're the one who gets an annoyed universe in the face. Which doesn't normally end well for them."

"Interesting. Maybe a lowest-energy course?" Ami mused out loud. "Changing the past is running up against an energy barrier..."

"I don't know, it's not a field I've been all that interested in," Yori admitted. "Especially since I talked to the mage. He obviously did know what he was talking about, and to be honest he worried me enough I lost interest in the whole idea completely. The point is, time travel is dangerous, incredibly so. I got very lucky, I got away with it. He did say that what he termed my 'temporal signature' was a little odd because of travelling in time, though. That might be why this machine of your friend's has trouble with me. Apparently, different methods of accessing time travel are normally dangerously incompatible with each other." She shrugged again. "Again, it's not a subject I know a huge amount about. I think we're going to have to call him in, though."

"What about changing future events?" Azumi asked, looking interested. "They haven't happened yet, right?"

"It's not that easy, unfortunately. There are essentially an infinity of possible futures, so even picking the one you want is damn difficult. Once you've found the one you want, trying to guide the present towards it depends on a huge number of variables, some of which might be in the distant past. It's a massively complex problem. Some things you can change, some you can't, and you have no real way to know which is which until you try. If you get it wrong, at best you make your own job even more difficult, or even impossible."

"So, say someone from the future had come back to warn you about something, what would that do?" Rei looked at Ami, worried, then back at Yori. The other woman stared at her, then sighed, massaging her forehead.

"Shit. That's not a rhetorical question, is it?" After a long moment both girls shook their heads.

"Fuck." She was silent for a while. "Enormous fuck. How far ahead?"

"Maybe a thousand years or so?"

"From this utopia of yours?"

"Yes." Rei was looking very worried at the expression on Yori's face.

"That's... possibly very bad indeed. From their point of view, what I said about changing the past would apply, I think. From our point of view, it could be very weird. I'm going to have to get some outside help, this is rapidly getting out of my comfort zone."

"I think we should put that to one side for the moment, dear, we need to look into the immediate problem. The time travel issue can probably wait." Chou glanced at her partner, who nodded reluctantly.

"Yes, you're right. The universe hasn't gone pop yet, so we're probably OK for a while at least." Everyone else looked uncomfortable at her words, making her grin suddenly. "Don't look so worried. If it does, we'll never know."

"That helps so much," Azumi muttered darkly.

"Good." The look Yori received made her chuckle. "Right, we'll leave that for later. Now, you and your team-mates. We've been talking about it and we think we need to examine both of you carefully. You as a control, Ami, since you seem basically normal. Rei, because you were definitely being affected, but you're more or less OK now, then one or two of the others, as the ones badly affected. Which ones do you think are worst off?" Ami glanced at Rei for a moment.

"Ah, I'd say if you're looking for two people with really big dramatic personality shifts, I'd have to go for Usagi and Setsuna. All of them are acting really weird at the moment, but those two are like completely different people. Usagi used to be a really nice girl, if a bit lazy and sometimes kind of full of her own importance. But yesterday she was totally different, arrogant and pushy, and really aggressive. Setsuna was acting very oddly as well, I've never seen her laugh like that or look so happy about blowing things up."

"All of them are acting very strangely at the moment," Rei added. "But, yes, I'd agree it's really obvious with them."

"OK. We'll grab them and bring them here in a little while." Yori looked at them in an evaluating manner. "First, let's have a look at you two. Ami, you first. Come and lie down on the sofa over here." Standing, with a glance at her friend, Ami followed the instructions. "OK, this won't hurt, so don't worry. I just want to get a good look at how your brain is working." The black-haired young woman knelt next to the sofa and put her hands on Ami's head, a soft purple glow springing up around her fingers. She felt nothing although she could sense extremely complex and subtle magic, or something like magic, at work. She wished for a moment she could study it with her computer, but forced herself to lie still.

"Hmm. Interesting." Yori stared at her through half-closed eyes, giving her the sensation she was being looked right through. It was rather eerie. "Nothing obviously wrong, which is good, I suppose, although it would have been easier if there was." Another minute or two passed as she ran her hands down Ami's body gently. Eventually she rocked back on her heels. "Well, you're in very good health, which is something, I guess. No obvious issues with your endocrine or limbic systems, your brain looks fine, neurotransmitters are normal, everything seems good. OK, Rei, you next." Ami swivelled around on the sofa and sat up, then moved out of the way as her friend took her place. Once more Yori's hands glowed.

"Hmm. Interesting." Yori stared at her through half-closed eyes, giving her the sensation she was being looked right through. It was rather eerie. "Nothing obviously wrong, which is good, I suppose, although it would have been easier if there was." Another minute or two passed as she ran her hands down Ami's body gently. Eventually she rocked back on her heels. "Well, you're in very good health, which is something, I guess. No obvious issues with your endocrine or limbic systems, your brain looks fine, neurotransmitters are normal, everything seems good. OK, Rei, you next." Ami swivelled around on the sofa and sat up, then moved out of the way as her friend took her place. Once more Yori's hands glowed.

Glancing at Chou, Ami nodded thanks when she smiled and made a small motion of permission, removing her computer and activating it, trying to work out what the other woman was doing. The little machine did it's best but seemed very confused by what was going on, eventually giving her an error message she'd never encountered before. Looking at it in irritation, she shook it gently and tried again, getting the same result. Yori glanced at her when she mumbled an obscenity, grinning slightly, before going back to what she was doing. After a moment a small frown replaced the grin. "That's odd," she muttered to herself, moving her hands around on Rei's head.
"What's odd?" Ami asked curiously, slightly worried.

"There's something a little off about her brain structure," was the response, which didn't make either of them any less worried. "Her amygdala is slightly distorted. Just a little too small, but in an odd way, left side more than the right."

"What does that mean?" Rei asked, her voice slightly unsteady. Yori hastened to reassure her.

"It's nothing immediately serious, it's just a bit weird. The amygdala is a part of the brain that's used to process deep memory consolidation, forming and reinforcing long-term memory associations, as well as emotional memory handling and decision making. It's pretty important. Damage to it can cause all sorts of problems with stress handling, fear, aggression level, personality disorders, even social interaction. All sorts of things." She looked over at Chou, who nodded slightly, but didn't say anything. "Ami, come here a moment, will you?" Yori quickly checked her first patient, then nodded again.

"Yes, I think yours is also slightly smaller than it should be, but not enough to make any difference. Women and men often have different sized ones and it varies quite a bit from person to person anyway. But Rei's is definitely not quite right."

"Can you fix it?" the young woman on the sofa asked, worried. Yori grinned at her.

"Yes, if necessary, but don't get upset yet. The damage is slight. Before we do anything else, though, I need to check your friends. I want to see if anything like this is affecting them. It would explain quite a bit, although also raise all sorts of other questions."

"I'll go and get blondie," Aiko offered. "She's just left her house." Ami and Rei looked at each other then at her.

"You're watching them somehow?" Ami asked.

"Oh, yes, we're not letting them out of our sight until we know what's going on," Yori replied. "Just in case."

"Good." Rei seemed quite sure of herself, making Ami look at her in surprise. "Don't let them go off again like yesterday."

"We won't. Wards are down, grab her quick and get back here." Yori nodded to Aiko, who vanished. Seconds later she was back, an unconscious blonde woman slumped in her arms. She laughed.

"Never even saw me coming," she giggled. "Which is another sign of how much they've slipped, I should never have been able to sneak up on her as easily as that if she was operating normally, although I bet I could still have done it."

"You people are extremely worrying." Ami looked at them all. "Much too good at this sort of thing."

"When this is all over we'll show you some interesting tricks," Yori offered. "You two, I think, could learn them fairly easily. Right, Rei, get up please, we'll put your friend here." Aiko carefully laid the girl on the sofa vacated by her colleague, who looked sadly at her. She still had a number of colourful bruises on her face, arms, and legs.

"Damn good thing you girls are nearly as tough as we are," Yori said, looking at the damage. "Those impacts would have killed someone less strong. Even a lot of the other girls." Kneeling down again she put her hand on the sleeping girl's head, a brief purple flash coming and going. "Right, she won't wake up until we let her, now. Let's see..." Once more she began her scan. "Wow. That's... very wrong indeed."

"Is it the same problem?" Chou asked. Yori nodded.

"Yes, but worse. Much worse. And it's not recent, this has been going on for a long time. Years, probably." She looked over at her partner. "Come and have a look, see what you think." Chou did so, golden light mixing with purple.

"Oh, dear. That's not at all good. Poor girl. What could have done this?"

"No idea, but it explains quite a bit. Aiko, can you get the other one?"

The brunette nodded, disappearing. She was soon back. The other woman she was holding looked in a much more battered state than the blonde on the sofa, half her hair scorched off and the side of her face one large partly healed bruise. Yori winced when she saw it.

"Fumiko wasn't kidding when she said she got her in the face. Put her here on the floor, please, Aiko." Surprisingly gently the brunette laid the green-haired woman next to the sofa. Yori made sure she'd remain asleep then checked her quickly.

"Fuck. She's even worse. It's definitely shrunken and distorted, pretty badly. I'm surprised she was able to function at all with this sort of damage. Her memory must be shot to hell." Glancing at the two conscious members of their team, she asked, "Does she seem to forget things a lot?" Ami nodded.

"Yes. It's been getting worse for months. You can tell her something, half an hour later she's forgotten she talked to you at all. Not all the time, or even most of it, but enough I was definitely noticing it." Thinking for a moment, she added, "Now I think back, they've all been a bit like that for some time. Why didn't I notice it?"

"More to the point, why didn't your computer?" Aiko asked, looking very curious. "You told me the other day you scanned them all carefully and nothing unusual showed up in your computer's medical program." Glancing at Yori who was listening with interest, she asked, "Is that the sort of thing you'd expect to show up in some advanced scan?"

"Oh, definitely, if it's half as advanced as I think it is, it should easily spot that damage." Looking at the woman on the floor, then Ami, she suggested, "Scan her again. I want to see what it finds." Ami pulled the machine out again and did as suggested. After a moment's work she frowned slightly.

"According to this, she's got several bad bruises, a cracked rib, a black eye, and a chipped tooth, but that's it." Yori scanned the woman again, then nodded slowly.

"All that is correct, but the brain damage is definitely there. That's very odd." She took a few moments to heal all the listed damage, making Rei and Ami both stare in amazement.

"Holy shit, that's remarkably impressive," Rei commented. "I knew you two could heal but I've never seen it in action."

"Thanks. It comes in handy." Yori grinned at her. "OK, Ami, scan the other one as well."

"Some bruises, something wrong with one of the tendons in her right knee, nothing else."
"Very interesting indeed. Again, all correct, except for the bit it's missing." Once more Yori healed the damage. She sat on her heels and stared at the unconscious form on the sofa for a while, as everyone watched and waited. "Hmm. OK, let's see what happens if I do this." Putting her hand on Usagi's forehead she concentrated for a moment, the glow coming and going. "Right, scan her again."

"This time it's saying there's a chemical imbalance in her frontal lobes," Ami reported. "What did you do?"

"I moved some of the neurotransmitters around. Nothing permanent, just as a test." The black-haired woman repeated the exercise. "And now?"

"Back to normal."

"That's kind of weird. It's showing everything correctly except for that one, very specific area of damage. Like it's being filtered out." After a moment, Yori glanced at Aiko, who nodded, then vanished again. Blinking from the flash, Ami looked at Rei and shrugged. Shortly the teleporting girl was back, carrying a brunette girl.

"Here you go." Once more, the figure was put on the floor, beside the green-haired woman, and rendered deeply unconscious.

"We'll have the entire set soon at this rate," Azumi quipped, looking mildly amused. Yori snickered, checking the new arrival.

"Same thing. Not quite as bad as either of these two, but much worse than Rei." She glanced at Ami expectantly, waiting as she scanned her friend.

"Nothing aside from superficial injuries."

"You know the old saying, once is an accident, twice is a coincidence, three times is enemy action? This isn't an accident or a coincidence." Yori stood, scowling, looking at the three unconscious girls. "Something did this to them. There's no way it's an accident, not with three, no, four cases. Damage like that is incredibly rare naturally, to find so many people with identical damage is basically impossible unless there's a shared cause. I'll lay money on the others having the same problem."

"So is that the cause of all the weird behaviour?" Azumi asked. Yori slowly shook her head.

"I don't think so. I think, although I can't be sure yet, that this is more of a symptom than a cause. Not sure why I think that way but it just feels wrong. Mind you, it certainly won't improve matters at all." Chou stood from where she had been repeating the scans, looking thoughtful.

"I would tend to agree, dear. There is something very wrong here." The pair of them studied the three unconscious girls for a moment. Eventually Yori sighed slightly. "OK. I'm not going too interfere with them any more right now, until we know why this is happening I'm not sure it's a good idea, I could cause more problems than I solved. Aiko will put them back for the moment. No sense getting their friends worked up if they notice them missing." Bending over the three young women, she did something, then nodded. "They'll wake up in about five minutes and shouldn't remember anything." Aiko came over and picked up the brunette, quickly disappearing then reappearing, before repeating the exercise with the other two.

"OK, they're all back where I found them, nice and safe. Oh, what's her name, Usagi, just woke up. She looks bit confused but doesn't seem to think anything is wrong. They'll be wondering why they're all healed now, though, I suspect." Aiko grinned a little as Ami looked at her curiously.

"How on earth are you doing that?" she asked.

"Can't tell you just yet, but I expect you'll find out sooner or later." Not completely happy, her curiosity eating at her, Ami nevertheless kept her questions to herself. Azumi, who had apparently been thinking hard, suddenly looked up.

"Ah, Ami? Would you mind if I had a look at that computer device of yours?" The blue-haired woman looked puzzled, but after a moment nodded, producing it. "Don't worry, I won't damage it," Azumi told her, "I just wanted to check something." Putting it on the table in front of her, she looked intently at it for a few seconds, making Ami stare when it suddenly activated.

"How are you doing that?" she asked, flabbergasted. "It's biometrically and magically locked to me, it should only work when I'm using it."

"I have... special methods," Azumi replied, picking the device up and inspecting it carefully. "Interesting. It's got a link to something else active."

"The big mainframe on the old moon base," Ami told her. Azumi looked up, then inspected the device again, eventually shaking her head.

"No, I don't think so. The link goes somewhere else. Not in this reality, not quite. It's difficult to detect except at very close range." Everyone turned to look at her.

"Are you sure?" Yori asked with an odd look.

"That's what..." Azumi broke off with a quick look at Ami and Rei. Yori nodded as if she'd continued talking.

"OK. Very interesting. Ami, scan Rei again, will you?" Picking up the machine, very curious, Ami did as requested. "Anything odd?"

"No, it says she's healthy."

Glancing at Azumi, Yori raised her eyebrow. The silver-haired girl nodded soberly. "When she did the scan, a lot of information went out over the link to wherever it's going, then more came back. It looks mostly the same but there are some changes."

"Hmm." Yori exchanged a glance with Chou. "Can you block the link?"

"Hang on... OK, I think that's done it." The computer beeped at it's owner, popping up another error she'd never seen before.

"No idea, but whatever the outside system is that it's talking to is blocked for the moment."

"Try the scan again, then compare the results with the last one," Yori suggested. Frowning, getting a nasty feeling she knew where this was leading, Ami repeated her earlier actions, then prodded the machine for a moment.

"The scans are identical, except this one has one extra part, noting minor organic brain damage. No long term negative prognosis presuming certain therapies are used." She read the screen again, then sighed. "How long has this been going on? Something has been hacking my computer, changing the results, who knows how much bad data I've got over the years."

"I don't think it was being hacked, not in the normal sense," Azumi told her, looking thoughtful. As if she was talking to someone else at the same time. "It looked more like it was a standard function, it was passing data to something outside which was then suppressing part of the report when it gave you back the results. Very specifically targeting the problem Yori identified."

"That's even more worrying." Chou studied the two magical girls. "Why would your own equipment not allow you to know about something that's a serious problem affecting your ability to function to a dangerous level?"

None of them could come up with a good answer to that. Eventually Yori sighed slightly. "We need some external advice at this point. I'm going to go and talk to Hnther, then see if I can track down Lldnr'k. He's the time mage. Hopefully I can get them both here, or we can go there. I need them to look at you both and probably one or other of your friends as well. I'll be back in a while."

Ami and Rei both felt the wards go down, then stepped back in slight shock as a portal opened in the corner of the room. Yori walked through it casually, the tear in space vanishing as soon as she was through. They exchanged awe-struck glances.

"You can do portals just like that?" Rei asked Chou. The tall blonde smiled calmly at her.

"It took a lot of effort to work it all out but it seems to have been worth it. Come on, why don't we go and get something to eat? You both look like you need it."

Ami looked at her friend, who nodded with a slight shrug. "OK. Why not. Where should we go?"

Laughing, Aiko walked over and put her arms around both girls' shoulders. "Do you like sushi? And have either one of you ever been to Brisbane?"

"You're completely sure about the external link not being to some old installation on the moon?" Fumiko queried, looking through Nabiki's eyes as they ate at the restaurant in Brisbane, all of them conferenced together.

"That's what Jun said. It could only detect the link when the computer was actively using it, it's apparently fairly high tech, not too far off the level of the SI units themselves. It says it's a variant on a technology the Kw'lyn Industries company used three or four generations of design ago. Now it knows about it and has cracked the encryption it can monitor it from a fair distance, though. I'll send everyone the encryption codes for it." She did so. "It thinks the computer was being externally influenced to run things like scans of their own group through whatever this external resource is which then filtered the results. For some reason it's specifically removing any reference to this weird brain damage or any magic associated with it. Wherever it is, though, it's definitely not on the moon. Jun says it's in some sort of fractional reality that can only be accessed if you know the portal coding for it. Kind of a pocket universe in popular cultural terms, although that's not really accurate, but it's good enough for now."

She nodded to something Ami had said, not really paying too much attention for the moment. The incognito magical girl was talking to Chou about their shielding technique, which was being used to keep anyone in the restaurant remembering the two additions to the party.

"What could it be?" Tamiko wondered. "Some enemy that's trying to control them for some reason? Influence them, perhaps? For what reason?"
"The problem with that idea is that the link is a very low level one directly bypassing the entire user interface, apparently, Jun says it's part of the design. The encryption is extremely good as well, it took nearly ten solid seconds to crack. That's amazing, considering it strolled through the MoD firewalls and encrypted files without really noticing, except to call them a good try for beginners." She snickered internally, remembering the dry tone in the voice of the synthetic intelligence. It had a definite sense of humour. "All of that implies that whatever is on the other end of that link is from the same source as that little computer is. In other words, it's not a hack, it's doing what it was designed to do. Which is something rather worrying."

"That entire story sounds wrong, somehow," Tamiko mused, "all that stuff about a kingdom stretching across the entire solar system and even beyond thousands of years ago. I mean, we have lots of evidence all over the place of ancient civilisations, Greeks, Romans, Sumerians, Egyptians, you name it, going back at least five or six thousand years. I've never heard of anything being found that could be as high tech as her story suggested. If it was magitech of that level, it would be very durable, I'd have thought. Something should be left. Probably a lot of it. Just think how much stuff we leave around that will be being dug up for centuries. Every landfill in the world will be a massive archaeological treasure trove." She giggled slightly at the thought.

"I really can't see some super-scientific and magical kingdom of the past being so good at cleaning up that absolutely nothing was left."

"Perhaps the enemy that destroyed them went around and cleaned up afterwards? Removed all the evidence on Earth?" They considered Aiko's suggestion.

"Seems a little unlikely. What would be the point, aside from anything else." Nabiki considered the idea some more. "No, I really can't see it. Or there being some big conspiracy to clean up history and delete anything that turned up in excavations and the like. It's just too messy."

"Magic could indeed erase all the traces, or at least make people forget them," 'Chou' interjected, looking away from the conversation Ami and Rei were having for a moment.

"But surely if there was some hugely complicated spell like that it would be detectable? Someone would have noticed by now." Nabiki glanced at her sister, who nodded slightly. "Unless the conspiracy is even deeper, and anyone who notices is also dealt with." Tamiko giggled again.

"You could go down that path to any depth you want, but I can't see any real way of proving it one way or the other," she said.

"True. It's also too complicated. Far too much effort to go to. The much simpler explanation is that this mythical ancient magical kingdom didn't exist. But Ami and Rei both seem pretty sure. Or at least, sure about that being what they were told. I'm not sure but I suspect Ami at least isn't totally convinced, now that she's thinking about it. Talking about it like that seems to have made her rethink a lot of things she was just taking on faith." Taking a drink of water, Nabiki ate another salmon roll, thinking about her words.

"It should be easy enough to check," Misaki suggested. "All we need to do is check if there really are any ruins on the moon." Nabiki looked at her sister, who gazed back, slightly surprised, then looked thoughtful.

"S'th'kx?"

"Sure? Why not? We know someone with several interplanetary spacecraft, surveying equipment, the lot. Everything you need to scan for some sort of magical ruins." The other woman sounded pleased with her own idea.
"It's a thought, certainly. Once we've looked into this current issue, we can go and have a word with him. There might be some problems we don't know enough about to realise are there, but it sounds like something worth checking." 'Chou' returned to the conversation with Ami and Rei, still listening to the one going on soundlessly in her head.

"The whole time travel thing worries me a lot," Fumiko said after a while.

"Not half as much as it worried Ranma," Nabiki replied. "You should have seen her expression. She's genuinely scared of the possibilities. I've never seen her scared of anything before." It was true, in all the time she'd known the gender-cursed martial artist, she'd never seen an expression of genuine fear cross her face except to do with cats, and it was different, that was a phobia, not a well-considered worry. "She knows or suspects something more about all this that we don't know, I think, something that's really put the wind up her."

"I wonder what that could be?" No one had an answer for Tamiko. Nabiki glanced at her disguised sister who looked back with an expressionless face, giving the impression she suspected but wasn't going to say.

"We'll probably find out when she gets back. I don't know if that's something I'm looking forward to or not." The middle sister sighed very quietly.

"What do you think about the whole reincarnation thing she mentioned?" Aiko asked, sounding puzzled. None of them replied for a while.

"It sounds very strange," Misaki finally answered. "I've never believed in reincarnation, myself, it just sounds too... I don't know. Neat, perhaps? The whole concept annoys me. But then, I'm not religious at all."

"I've met a ghost, or spirit, or whatever you want to call it, more than once," Nabiki told them. "A couple of different ones, actually. One of them was apparently a girl at my old school who died years before. But, I've got no proof of that, only what she told us. And it doesn't prove or disprove anything about reincarnation. Assuming she really was the spirit of this deceased girl, it kind of shows some ability to survive past the point considered death, with memories intact, but whether that could prove reincarnation, I have no idea. Way out of my field of expertise."

"Weird." Tamiko sounded intrigued. "Ranma mentioned that a couple of times but we never dug into it. Even so, it's not quite the same as what Ami was talking about."

"We'll have to wait until she gets back, I guess. What are the other girls doing at the moment? Any trouble?"

"Nothing so far," Fumiko replied. "I'm monitoring that young one with the purple hair. She's just sitting in a park at the moment looking worried and seems to be thinking hard. I kind of feel sorry for her. She's always struck me as someone who didn't really want to be doing what she was doing. I'm not at all sure the others like her very much, either. I've seen them look at her in a pretty nasty way once or twice. Not all of them, Ami seems to get on with her fine, and Rei isn't too bad either, but most of the rest don't quite give off the feeling they trust her. I'd love to know why."

"The two lesbians are driving around in a sports car and yelling at each other right now," Aiko reported, snickering. "They don't look happy. I thought they were lovers or something, but in the fight yesterday they were kicking the shit out of one another. I'm surprised they're actually sitting next to each other at all, to be honest."

"Usagi and her blonde friend are each eating enough ice-cream to drown both Ranma and Onkra"
"together," laughed Misaki. "The other one was questioning her on how she managed to get all healed so fast, she seemed very suspicious about something, her expression was quite amusing. Even though they went off together I'm not convinced that either one of them trusts the other right now. But they at least seem to be working on it."

"There seems to be a general breakdown of trust between all of them," the elder sister noted sadly.

"Damn right. Even the ones that are together seem to be having problems, and they give all the signs of totally hating the rest." Tamiko sighed. "My two are staying well away from each other. That Setsuna woman is getting her hair styled, it looked kind of lopsided where Fumiko blew half of it off, and she doesn't look very pleased about it. Keeps snapping at the stylist. She's very rude. The other one is powered up and bouncing around the rooftops in down-town Minato. Face like a thundercloud. I hope she doesn't find anyone to go after, the mood she's in she looks ready to kill someone."

"That could be awkward," Aiko muttered. "Are you close enough to stop her if that happens and we can't get to you in time?"

"Yep. I'm following her from about a kilometre back. She doesn't seem to have any idea I'm here."

"OK. Keep close, but not too close."

"On it."

Turning her attention fully back to the conversation in the room she was physically in, 'Azumi' met Aiko's eyes for a moment, noting the concern in them, then turned to Ami, who was talking to Rei. She listened for a while. "It all broke down so fast," the blue-haired girl said. "After we helped Fumiko and Tamiko stop the fighting, everyone else was just howling at each other. And us. They called us both traitors." She drank some water, looking upset and annoyed, then put the glass down and stared at it. "All sorts of little rivalries suddenly came out and got blown wildly out of proportion, I think. Usagi and Minako were screaming at each other about something, but at the end they went off together, still arguing. Setsuna, Makoto, and Michiru stomped off in one direction while Haruka and Hotaru went in the other. Michiru had a broken arm but even that didn't seem to bother her as much as the rest of them did."

"I can't believe Michiru and Haruka ended up against each other like that," Rei said, shaking her head and staring out the window. "They've been in love for years. Now they seem to have broken up."

"They're back together for the moment," Aiko told her, "although the way they're screaming at each other I don't know if that will last." The other woman looked curiously at her.

"I really want to know how you're doing that," she said. Aiko smiled mysteriously, nibbling a piece of duck.

"I know." She grinned, as Rei sighed. "Soon enough. Have patience."

'Chou' suddenly looked up. "Ah. Yori is back. She wants to meet us at the temple as soon as possible." Ami and Rei exchanged glances, then shrugged, giving up for the moment on speculating how everyone was getting all this information. She waved to the waitress, who hurried over, smiling.

"Hello, Pauline. We're finished, I think. Could we have the bill, please?"

"Certainly, Chou. It was nice to see you all again." The woman quickly retrieved the paperwork and calculated the bill, handing it to the blonde, who looked at it, smiled, then handed over a handful of cash.

"Thank you once again. Please keep the change. We're in a bit of a hurry, I'm afraid." They all stood and left as Pauline waved, smiling at them, then blinked as the flash came. Shaking her head in amused wonder she went to put the money in the till.
Chapter 66

This worked better as one rather longer than normal chapter instead of two shorter than normal ones.

The thick plottens.

Agent Naito read the report from Fumiko again, snickering slightly at the dry description of what they'd had to do to the magical girls in the mall, thinking that the young lady had a talent for making the most extraordinary things sound normal. There was a considerable amount of sly humour buried in language that was otherwise fairly plain and descriptive. 'She's got a future as a law enforcement person, or perhaps a lawyer,' he mused to himself, 'based on her ability to write reports. I wish some of my own people could be this clear. All of Yori's friends seem good at it. I wonder if she runs courses in magical girl report writing?' The thought making him grin, he closed the file, then opened the one from the local police in the district in which the fight had taken place.

This one made the grin disappear again, as he inspected the photos of the damage to the mall, which was near enough to total to make the entire thing a write-off. Shaking his head in mild disbelief he read the police report and eye-witness statements again, feeling grateful that no one had been injured, although not sure how that had happened under the circumstances. 'Damn good thing Fumiko and Tamiko were there,' he thought, both relieved and saddened at what had happened. 'This is very bad. I hope Yori and her friends can deal with it.' Playing some of the recorded video from security cameras in the area, and a couple of news reports, he shook his head again. 'Good god. This could have been very bad. Sure hasn't helped those particular girls' public image, except for that blue-haired one that's friends with the others. Mind you, the other one seems to be helping Fumiko and her friends pretty effectively, there might be hope for her as well.'

Pulling up another file, he read it with interest, noting down some names in another window for the report he was preparing. He looked up as another agent came into the room, nodding to him. The other man walked over, glancing at the monitor and wincing at the images he saw. "Not good," he said sadly.

"No. Not at all. That group has always been difficult, but this... No one ever thought they'd lose it like that."

"They're one of the ones we have some information on, aren't they?" the other agent asked. Naito nodded.

"Yes. Their operational security has always been very lax, to be honest. Nothing even close to Yori or Aiko's team. Their disguise magic is exceptionally good, but they tend to turn it off in places they really shouldn't if they want to keep their secret. I'm slightly surprised very few people seem to have worked it out. I know Yori did in about an afternoon, she's said as much, although I also know she'd never tell anyone else. It took us a week or so to get the same information when they first came on the scene years ago." He pointed at the screen, showing an image of Fumiko and Tamiko, although he couldn't have picked out which was which from the blurred picture their magic presented to the camera, talking to two young women in the uniforms of the group in question.

"The one with the blue hair is Ami Mizuno, the other one is Rei Hino. They're both about eighteen. Ami is probably one of the smartest people in the country, based on her scholastic records. Rei isn't in her class but is pretty bright as well. From what I know, Ami has been having problems with her group for some time, while Rei seems to be a more recent convert to common sense, but both of them seem to be firmly allied with Yori's friends in thinking that their own group is out of control and needs to be dealt with. Hopefully they can do that, somehow."

"If we know who they are, couldn't we grab them while they're, I don't know, powered down, is it?" The other man asked curiously.

"Then what? We might just be able to pull that off, I suppose, presuming that they don't have magic when they're not in uniform, something I wouldn't like to bet on, but what do we do after that? We'd have to get all of them at once, which would be difficult, then about the only option available would be killing them in cold blood. That doesn't sit well with me. Not to mention Yori and her friends, and indeed the other magical girl groups, would most likely take a very dim view of government interference of that nature. We need them too much to alienate them."

"I don't like the idea of killing them either," the other agent muttered, sighing.

"That aside, we've been given a complete hands-off directive from someone you won't believe," Agent Naito said, bringing up another document on the monitor. His colleague read it then whistled softly.

"Holy shit."

"Yep. Yori has some seriously highly placed friends, by the looks of it. She and her team have been given full authority to do anything they need to, to bring this all to a close. They would have done so anyway, I think, regardless of anyone in the government telling them anything at all, but this gives them official, if extremely secret, authorisation." Naito read the letter again, then closed the file. "I do not want to get between Yori and something she has an interest in, trust me. Authorisation or not, she and Chou are the de facto experts we have in relations between the magical world and the non-magical one, it would be a very bad mistake to fall out with them. People way above our pay grade clearly feel the same."

"Pretty impressive. Those girls have a higher security clearance than we do, by the looks of it." His colleague chuckled. Naito grinned, nodding.

"Apparently they do. I'd love to know how far up it goes, and how they met all these people in the first place, but I can live with never finding out. I'm just damn glad those young women are apparently on the side of law and order. More or less."

"You've had a lot of contact with them in the last year," the other agent noted curiously. "What are they like?" Naito swivelled his chair around and considered the other man for a moment.

"It's difficult to explain. Mysterious. Terrifying, definitely. Totally trustworthy, that's also part of it. They give off the feeling of complete confidence and competence, as well. When you're around them, you get the impression nothing is impossible. Whatever it is, they'll take a stab at it, and most likely succeed brilliantly. I can understand why they're so highly regarded by the people upstairs. I feel the same way. Yes, they can all be completely horrifying at times, when they're serious about something, but most of the time they're all just really nice, intelligent, and amazingly normal people to be around. I'm very pleased that I've built up a good working relationship with them. Even that horrific Ms Aoyama of theirs is astoundingly good at what she does, although most of the time that appears to be creeping you out to a truly incredible level." He grinned and shuddered at the same time.

"I've read your reports on her, this Ms Aoyama. She comes across as... well, deeply worrying, if nothing else. Who is she? Who does she work for? Yori's group, or someone else?" Naito shrugged
"I have absolutely no idea. Yori seems to know and trust her, but I have no idea how they met, or anything more about her. She's certainly not someone you'd want to annoy, though, whoever she is. Various things she's said in the past give the impression she works for some sort of alien version of our organisation, which seems to have an interest in our world, but even there I couldn't tell you anything more. All she ever says if you ask is 'That information is unavailable.' I've never felt it was a good idea to push."

His colleague leaned against the desk and thought about his words for a while. "I'm a little worried about the idea of some not only foreign, but actually alien, intelligence organisation having an agent here," he said in the end. Naito looked at him, then smiled slightly.

"I can understand that. It worried me at first as well. But I do think, as unsettling as the woman is, that she means no harm to us. The opposite, in fact. No, I'm pretty sure she's not human at all, but I am sure she does pretty much the same thing we do, just with rather different methods. Damned effective ones, though. I don't think she's a threat, unless we turned her into one. Which I think would be something of a mistake. It's much better all round to keep her on side and helping us, which she seems quite prepared to do. She's not the sort of person I'm ever going to invite home to meet my wife, but I can work with her." He shuddered a little. "I just wish she wouldn't sneak up behind you and look over your shoulder. You have no idea how creepy that is."

His co-agent grinned at the expression on his face. "I take it you do?"

"Oh, yes. Unfortunately. She scared me out of about five years life the last time. I had no idea she was there, the damn woman moves completely silently. I'm not even sure she breathes half the time. It's... not pleasant. But you can't argue with the results." The other agent laughed at the tone of his voice.

"They do seem impressive from the reports. That affair in the UK would have been much more difficult to deal with without her help, from your report. The MoD seemed happy with the results."

"They were, although very annoyed it had gotten to that point. Ex-minister Davenport is going to be spending a very long time in jail." Naito shook his head sadly. "It's a pity, he was a very respected mage at one point, but he made some really bone-headed mistakes. He's just damn lucky he didn't manage to kill anyone. Directly, at any rate."

"From what I read the Canadians were more than slightly annoyed at him, when they found out that he'd known the whereabouts of that damn portal bomb for months. After Halleckton, they seem to be going after anyone who might have been involved with pretty impressive intent."

Agent Naito sighed, glancing at his monitor as an email came in, then back at his colleague. "Very true. I think that it would be a very bad idea if Mr Davenport ever went to Canada, I'm pretty sure they'd lock him up for contributory damages on the spot. The Canadian Ambassador was at his trial and expressed the extreme irritation of the Canadian government about his actions, which certainly added quite a lot to his sentence. The British took it into consideration when they were prosecuting him. Pretty quick trial as well, they weren't messing around. He didn't argue about it, just pleaded guilty to everything. Ms Aoyama made it clear to him that if he didn't she'd deal with it herself, which seemed to scare the shit out of him, far more than thirty years in prison did."

"Hmm. Probably not a good idea to annoy her, then," his colleague quipped, smiling slightly.

"No." Naito grinned. "Hey, are you still coming over for dinner on Friday?"
"Damn right I am. Your wife is a remarkable cook." Smiling, the other agent pushed himself away from the desk. "I have to get back to work. See you later." Waving briefly, Naito swivelled his chair around again and resumed writing his report, smiling slightly.

Looking up as they all came in the door, Rei's grandfather smiled at them all. "Yori and her friends are in the room you were using earlier," he said calmly, handing Chou a tray with more tea and the appropriate accessories on it. She nodded, smiling and thanking him, then led the others back to the room in question, displaying a good knowledge of the temple layout, Ami noticed curiously. She glanced at Rei, who clearly had also worked it out.

"I wonder how many times they've been here?" she whispered to her friend. Rei made a small shrug. She seemed past the point of really caring. Entering their destination behind Chou, Azumi, and Aiko, the two stopped dead and stared at the people already in the room, before exchanging a long glance with each other. Yori looked up from where she was sitting at the table talking to her companions and smiled at Chou, nodding at the others. A moment later Ami and Rei felt the preposterously powerful wards go up around the room.

"Glad you're back. Guys, this is Hnther, and Lldnr'k, an old friend of mine. Hnther is someone I met more recently but he's a nice guy." Both of the people at the table inspected the newcomers with interest. Chou greeted them both, clearly knowing them, while Azumi and Aiko said something polite in a language neither of the others knew. Ami studied Yori's two companions with equal interest to that with which they were looking at her and Rei.

Neither one was human. She'd known that intellectually, but it was still a slight shock, used as she was to non-humans being opponents, not friends. Yori seemed totally at ease with them, as were Chou and the other two, chatting with the one introduced as Lldnr'k with no more worry than if he was her next door neighbour. Azumi was talking to the other one, Hnther, in that odd-sounding demonic language, laughing at something he said. "Weird," Rei said in her ear. She nodded. Hnther stood, rising to his full height of over two metres, walking over and looking down on them, his hooves clomping on the floor, then made something approximating a smile and greeted them in that odd language in a deep voice, tipping his head a little. The light glinted on his deep green scales in a peculiarly pretty manner.

"He says it's nice to meet you both and he hopes he's able to help," Yori translated. "Sorry, he doesn't speak Japanese, this is his first time here."

"Ah, thanks, I guess," Ami said uncertainly. She and Rei both nodded politely back. The huge demon was a very impressive sight, something a little like a classical European description of a devil, with hooves, a long tail, and horns. The head was more lizard-like than humanoid, though, with slit-pupilled eyes inspecting them in a manner that showed a keen intelligence and good humour. He was wearing a sort of formal robe, elaborately embroidered, with silver thread picking out interesting patterns against the near-black cloth.

"I, on the other hand, speak a large number of languages fluently," the other one said in a surprisingly high-pitched voice, with a hint of a laugh to it. He also stood, walking over and bowing to them, then holding out his hand. "I am Lldnr'k. It's a pleasure to make your acquaintance, ladies. Yori has explained that there is a potentially serious problem she feels my expertise could help resolve. Hopefully this is the case." Ami shook the offered appendage gingerly, feeling dry scaly skin and sharp talons.

'He's remarkably polite for an otherworldly humanoid crow,' she thought slightly manically to herself. 'Beautiful plumage, though.' Trying not to giggle at the thought, she nodded politely back.
"Thank you, Lldnr'k, I hope you can help as well. It's a very difficult situation." The temporal mage nodded in an odd manner, his short beak not being conducive to smiling, but she got the impression that was the intent of the gesture.

"We'll need to get both of these guys included in the security spell, Ami," Yori said, watching their interaction with the two demons with a small smile. Rei was simply standing wide-eyed, apparently unable to think what to say. Ami nodded absently, still looking at Lldnr'k and Hnther with interest.

"OK." Eventually she pulled her fascinated gaze away from the first demons she'd met outside a combat situation, looking at the other woman, who grinned at her. "What do I do?"

"Feel that spell still in your head?" She probed gently, then nodded.

"Yes."

"OK. When I tell you, just sort of... push on it. With your mind. You'll see what I mean." Yori gave her an encouraging smile, then turned to the two demons, talking to them for a moment. Hnther nodded, stepping forward and lowering his head to her hand. It glowed slightly for a couple of seconds. "Right, try it, Ami." She shrugged, doing as requested, finding to her surprise that something happened. There was an odd sort of mental twitch for a fraction of a second, making her wince slightly.

"Was that right?" she enquired curiously.

"Yep. Worked perfectly. OK, Lldnr'k, now you." The other demon sat down and allowed her to repeat the process on him. Yori gestured to Ami who did the same thing again, once more feeling the strange sensation. "Good. It took on both tries." She looked pleased. Hnther said something to her and Chou, making them both turn to him and have a short conversation, then Yori nodded.

"He says, before anything else, he would like to examine you both, without any prejudice from your story. It sounds like a good idea if you're willing." Rei and Ami exchanged glances then agreed slightly nervously. "Don't worry, he's not going to hurt you," Yori said, grinning. "OK, Ami, you first, I think. Same as before, just lie down on the sofa." Feeling a little uncertain, but trusting that Yori knew what she was doing, the blue-haired girl did as requested, making herself comfortable. Hnther knelt beside her giving her something that was probably meant to be an encouraging grin, but which had rather too many clearly meat-eating teeth in it to be completely comforting, then reached out and put his hand on her forehead. It was warmer than she expected, the very fine scales on the four-fingered appendage tickling her skin slightly.

He concentrated, a feeling of _something_ tickling at the back of her mind for a while. His eyes narrowed as he worked, giving the impression he wasn't completely happy about what he saw, but he said nothing for a while. Eventually he removed his hand and simply inspected her curiously.
After a moment he gestured for her to get up then waved at Rei to take her place, which she did, looking nervous. "It's fine, it only tickles a little," Ami told her friend. Still appearing not completely convinced, the other girl lay back and waited. Hnther repeated his actions, going completely still after a long moment, then turning to Yori and saying something that sounded angry. She shrugged, nodding, not looking entirely surprised.

"What did he say?" Rei asked apprehensively, sitting up. Yori glanced at her, then sighed, an expression of tiredness on her face.

"That someone or something has been tampering with your memories and mind for a long time.
Very delicately, but persistently, in a way that in his reality would be a major crime. Something very similar to a form of mind control. He's not at all happy about it." Rei and Ami stared at her,
"Mind control?" they asked simultaneously. She nodded.

"Essentially. He says it's completely different from the sort of memory fogging and erasure that a cloaking spell like ours or yours uses. This is a deliberate rewriting of deep memories, on a level that can alter personality, intentions, all sorts of things that make a person that person. He considers it a huge crime, as does his own civilisation. They had problems with something along those lines a very long time ago on a massive scale, entire populations being controlled, which took a lot of lives to overcome. It's unfortunately fairly common, a number of realities have had similar experiences, which is why in many of them doing what seems to have been done to you would be an instant death sentence for the perpetrator, except in very specific cases surrounding either therapy or punishment for very severe crimes like murder or rape."

Ami stared at the other woman for a long time, then at the demon, who seemed both sympathetic and deeply angry. She glanced at Rei, who met her eyes with a frightened look. "What does that really mean?" she asked. Hnther looked at her, then spoke to Yori, who nodded and began translating for him.

"You are worried, and it's right that you should be," he said through her. "A great wrong has been done to you. But at the same time, it doesn't change who you are, don't worry about that. From what I can see the memory tampering is something that has been going on for a number of years, mostly adding memories that are not yours in a way that would make you would think that they are, although I am unsure to what end. The memories would not be as deeply ingrained as your legitimate ones, with practice you would be able to identify them, and if necessary I could probably remove them. I am reluctant to do so, however, as by now they are sufficiently integrated in the workings of your mind that removing them could well cause more damage than leaving them in place."

Inspecting them to gauge the impact of his words, he went on, "The more concerning part is that from what I can make out, whatever the source of the tampering, it is an ongoing process, something is still doing it occasionally, which is worrying. From what Yori has told us, it is quite likely that this is implicated in the mental instability your colleagues are experiencing, although I am not yet certain how. I will need to examine a more severely affected member of your team to gather more information." Yori stopped translating, looking at Aiko for a moment.

"Go and grab Usagi again, will you? I've lowered the wards." The brunette nodded, vanishing in the process of standing up from her chair. Lldnr'k made a small sound of surprise.

"That's a phenomenally good teleport spell," he noted, glancing at the black-haired magical girl, who smiled. "Almost no leakage at all, and so quick and precise. Very impressive."

"It's pretty damn good," she agreed. "We've been working on duplicating it for quite a while, but it's a complicated job."

"I can imagine, considering how insane your entire method of magical energy control is in the first place. Teleportation is a very high level magic at the best of times, that spell is beyond anything I've ever encountered. I will be very interested to see how you progress." Aiko reappeared carrying the limp body of the requested young woman, her twin pony-tails dangling to the ground. The blonde had a fresh black eye, making Ami stare and Yori sigh.

"What happened?" she asked. Aiko shrugged.

"Just as I got there the other one smacked her in the face. I can understand the attraction of doing it, everyone who meets her at the moment seems to want to punch her, but I have no idea what brought it on this time. I thought they were getting on reasonably well. But she said something that wounded her friend up, her friend belted her, then stomped off in a huff. I got her from behind while she was trying to get up."

"Weird. OK, put her on the sofa, will you?" Rei got up as Aiko approached. Once the young woman was lying on the sofa, Yori rendered her more deeply unconscious, absently healing the black eye in the process, then nodded to Hnther, who leaned over her, putting his hand on her head and concentrating. Going still, he spent close to ten minutes doing whatever it was he was doing before leaning back with a small sigh.

"It's much, much worse with this one," he said through Yori. "There is evidence of serious memory editing that's been going on for a considerable time, probably on the order of six or seven years. There are a huge number of memories that have been forcibly implanted, pushing the real ones back or suppressing them, and also traces of personality modifications. I would judge that a lot of her mental problems are being caused by a conflict between her original memories and experiences and the implanted ones, which are not completely compatible in a number of ways. The brain damage you detected is almost certainly being caused by or massively amplified by the magic used to edit her mind. It's not uncommon in cases of this nature. You have to override the normal processes of the brain to force new memories in, which has unpleasant side effects in most species, this could well be one of them."

"Can we assume that the more severe the brain damage the more memory editing has taken place?" Azumi asked, Yori translating the question for him, then waiting for the answer. He thought for a moment.

"Most likely. It will probably vary somewhat depending on the individual, but it should give a fairly consistent relative guide."

"In that case, Setsuna must be even more badly affected than Usagi," Ami noted, looking at Yori. "You said she had the most severe damage."

"Yes. It was fairly extreme. We need to examine all of them, I think, but we're still no nearer working out who is behind all this or why." Yori was studying Usagi closely, rubbing her cheek with one finger, deep in thought. After a moment, she looked up. "I think we need to tell these guys the rest of the story now." Turning to the two mages, as Hnther retook his seat at the table, she began talking in the demon language. At first they both listened with interest, nodding occasionally, but as the story went on, Ami noticed that first Hnther then Lldnr'k became very still, in a manner that if they'd been human she would have termed deeply concerned. At one point the bird-like demon suddenly erupted in rage, jumping to his feet and walking rapidly in circles, swearing in several different languages.

Yori and Chou calmed him down, then got him to sit and listen again as they finished the tale, taking turns to fill in the details. He stared hard at them for a long time, then turned and looked first at Rei, then Ami, just as hard, making them exchange nervous glances. Eventually he made a sound a lot like a sigh.

"Oh, dear." Yori snickered at the deliberately mild words, making Lldnr'k shoot her a quick look full of alien amusement. Then he turned back to Ami and Rei, standing and walking over to inspect them closely from half a metre away. "I fear you present us with something of a problem, ladies, if what I suspect is true."

"What's that?" Rei asked with worried curiosity.
"Something that should be impossible, but too many things match..." He shook his head, snapping his beak in annoyance, the sharp sound making her twitch a little. "You, Ami, was it?" The mage looked at the blue-haired young woman, who nodded. "May I please inspect this computer of yours, and any other magical artefacts from the same source you possess?" She glanced at Yori, who made a little gesture that it was all right. After a moment she produced the requested items, handing a number of things over, including the computer, her communicator, transformation rod, and one or two other things. He took them with murmured thanks, looking at them intently, before going back to his seat at the table, placing them in front of him.

Pulling out a number of his own tools from somewhere about his person he quickly assembled an odd looking machine on the table, something like a cross between a microscope and a hat-rack, which he used to carefully examine each of her items for some fifteen minutes, while everyone else watched silently. Eventually he sat back and bowed his head in thought, mumbling to himself in a language none of the others knew, until looking up at Yori. "Fuck, I believe is the term in your language," he said quietly.

"Is it what you thought?"

"What I feared. Yes, I think so. I have no idea how, it should be impossible, but where that thing is concerned, impossible is a relative term." The mage picked up the computer, turning it over in his hands, tapping it gently with one talon and listening to the sound with his head cocked to one side. "It all fits, though."

Ami looked at Rei, who was looking as puzzled as she felt. "What fits?" she asked, curiosity warring with worry. He seemed to both know what he was talking about and wish that he didn't. L'dnr'k glanced at her, then around at everyone else. Chou was quietly translating in the background for Hnther, who looked as curious as everyone else did.

"All right, to understand this you need some background information on the nature of reality. It's somewhat long winded, but please bear with me, it's important." The demon looked around at everyone, who looked back. Yori motioned for him to continue.

"The nature of the multiverse is very complex," he began. "Portals allow access to other realities, but that is only the start of what's possible, if you know enough about it. You can think of the multiverse a little like a book on a shelf in a library. Travelling in time, at least backwards, is somewhat like moving from one page to another in the same book. Moving through portals is like going from book to book, in our analogy. But it's more complicated than that, there are other shelves, other bookcases, other libraries even, all of which can be accessed with the right techniques. It's a very bad idea to actually do it, of course, in many cases, but it's technically possible."

"Time travel opens up all sorts of possibilities, all of them potentially very dangerous. I have read some of your fiction so I know some of these ideas are known to your culture, things such as alternative time lines, parallel universes, concepts such as these are familiar to you." Everyone nodded. "They're all both correct and incorrect. The details differ although the basic ideas are right. A given reality does in fact have possible variant time lines, and it is possible to move between them, but it takes a very large amount of energy and an even larger amount of skill to do it at all, never mind safely. Generally, it's considered an extremely bad idea to even attempt something like that, the possible ramifications are very unnerving indeed. Get it wrong and the multiverse deals with it by erasing the entire timeline, if not the entire reality, to protect itself. It's not a deliberate conscious act, there is no intelligence behind it that anyone has ever been able to detect, but it definitely happens."
He laughed slightly. "The multiverse permits many things that you should never, in fact, try to do. You could think of it like it's giving you enough rope to hang yourself with, then cutting it off when you're dangling on the end. Portal travel is fine. It's built into the way the multiverse works, it causes no problems other than local ones like people you don't like coming through, it's perfectly safe from a structural standpoint. Time travel is right on the edge of safe. You can, if you know exactly what you're doing, observe the past, and in some cases, some form of possible future, although actually moving physically in time is a horribly bad idea. Which is why it's generally forbidden. Moving across time lines, though, is definitely crossing the boundary into There is no safe way to do it at all."

Lldnr'k paused to sip some tea, while everyone waited with interest, then put the cup down and went on. "It has been tried a few times in the distant past. It always ends very badly. A number of realities have been obliterated in very mysterious ways as a direct result, although nothing recently, since most places have long since decided that it's just too damn dangerous to attempt. However, when you bring time travel into play, the fact that something happened a long time ago doesn't mean it's not a potential threat tomorrow." He sighed a little, looking at Ami's computer, which he was still holding. "These items all have a variant temporal signature, which indicates they've travelled in time," he finally said. "But it's more complicated than just time travel. They are very old, I would estimate some four thousand of this world's years, but technically they haven't been made yet." Ami looked puzzled for a moment, then suddenly saw what he might be saying, as insane as it sounded.

"You mean they're from the future, don't you?" Appearing surprised, he nodded, glancing at Yori, who was smiling.

"Yes." Inspecting her again, he made the smile-equivalent. "You are as sharp as Yori said you were." Pleased, she smiled, then frowned again, as Rei looked confused beside her.

"Hang on. How can they be from the future and also be very old?" Rei asked slowly.

"The temporal signature indicates that the origin of the items is some thousand or so Earth years from now in their relative timeline, but at some point after they were made, they were taken back in time, possibly more than once." Lldnr'k explained carefully. After a moment, she nodded her understanding. "At this point in time, they have existed for slightly less than four thousand years from the date of manufacture, therefore are four thousand years old, even though they won't actually be made for another thousand years from our current point of view."

"All right," Rei said, frowning with concentration. "I think I see."

"There is another oddity about them. The future they come from is not, according to my readings, one that can be reached from the present." This time, everyone looked puzzled, except Yori, who put her hand over her eyes for a moment and sighed.

"How is that possible?" Azumi asked, meeting his eyes.

"It shouldn't be. The reason it has happened is, I suspect, due to a particular magitech device that should never have been built. It is responsible for more destruction than any other single construction in the multiverse that we know about. Entire realities have been deleted as a direct result of the damn thing. The people who made it didn't understand nearly as much about time manipulation as they thought they did, although they were exceptionally good engineers. We thought it had been destroyed, the thing is legend now, but somehow, it must have survived." He folded his arms and glared at the innocent computer as if he was trying to will it out of existence. "But I don't know quite how to prove it."
"It's this time machine of yours, or rather, your friend Setsuna's," Yori explained quietly. "I put a few things together while we were talking about it, which made me remember something I'd heard a while ago. Just an off-hand comment from a mage I was talking to three years or so back, about a magical-technological society that destroyed itself playing with time travel. Supposedly, three separate realities vanished totally and two more were basically sterilised completely, all life wiped out right down to viruses. It's almost a myth now, no one knows the coordinates to them any more, so it's not easy to prove. But the story matched some of the details you told us. Too well for me to be very happy about it."

"They were in many ways a very advanced species, the ones who made the accursed thing," Ldnr'k said, shaking his head. "Not as advanced in magic as some, or in technology as others, but the combination was remarkable. They had faster than light travel, a thriving interstellar culture, very high technology and powerful magic. I would judge they were perhaps one to one and a half thousand years in advance of the civilisation of this planet in most respects. But they also had very poor judgement."

He sighed slightly. "It all began, as these things often do, with a war. They bumped into another advanced species somewhere out in their particular reality, one they didn't get on with at all. We don't know who fired the first shot, or why, only that they were fighting for decades, in a war that killed billions, trillions possibly. Whole star systems were destroyed. Entire sentient cultures made extinct. In the end, the fragmentary records we still have about the whole thing show that someone had the bright idea to build a time machine, which would allow wholesale travel back in time, the idea being to loop back before the war started and make some sort of pre-emptive strike on the enemy before it was the enemy. A variant theory was that they thought they could advance their civilisation by taking back advanced technology several thousand years, then using it to pull the earlier civilisation up to the level of the later one, so that by the time they came back to the 'present' they were thousands of years more advanced. Repeat as necessary, so that when the enemy was encountered, they could just crush them."

"It didn't work out like that, did it?" Azumi asked. He shook his head.

"No. They were warned, a lot. There was a considerable amount of cross-reality travel between them and other places, many of which found out about the idea and were horrified. It's not the first time someone has tried something like that but it was by far on the grandest scale. But, unfortunately, they paid no attention. They did indeed manage to build their time engine, a remarkable achievement in it's own right. It fused magic and technology on a truly incredible scale, utilising several entire stars for the power source. Their best mages and engineers worked on it for nearly a hundred of your years before it was finished. To the best of my knowledge no-one has ever made such a complex machine for such a purpose before or since. For which we can thank every deity in the multiverse." Shaking his head, he seemed to be remembering something for a little while.

"Eventually, they turned the damn thing on. The real pity is that it worked. The builders were indeed able to create a trans-temporal gateway, which led back through time to the past. Unfortunately, it didn't lead back into their past, not the way they intended. Mistakes are not uncommon in time travel. Tiny errors lead to all sorts of unexpected outcomes. The gate they opened led to an alternative timeline, which should have been impossible, but the machine had so much power and computing resources available it was able to open and stabilise the gate. A large amount of people and equipment went through it, then they shut down the time gate, expecting to find that shortly something useful would happen. They were very surprised when apparently nothing at all did. So they tried again. And again. And again."

"The first hint that something had gone badly wrong was when they found their enemy had vanished, completely, and more or less instantly. At first, they took this as a sign that the whole experiment had indeed worked to design, but it became evident that something much more serious was happening. Large portions of their interstellar empire began disappearing, basically written out of existence. The planets, the star systems, they still existed in most cases, but all traces of the civilisations on them totally vanished. They sent ships to investigate, some of which also disappeared, some of which didn't."

"By the time they worked out what was happening it was far too late to do anything about it. Their attempted time manipulation had caused a massive instability in time flow in their reality, which the multiverse was apparently attempting to fix by simply deleting entire timelines. But, by this point, the damage was so bad and time itself so scrambled that this only made things worse. The feedback mechanism that keeps time stable is delicately balanced, even small changes can cause huge repercussions if you're not careful. That's why interfering with time flows is banned, everywhere." Lldnr'k sighed.

"The influence of the time machine itself was keeping their reality more or less stable, far past the point it would otherwise have imploded. That was part of the problem, in fact, the machine forced a level of stability in it's locality, about half the galaxy, which would otherwise have healed over by deleting the timeline that produced it in the first place, which would have been bad for them but protected everyone else. The final result was the complete collapse of the normal flow of time throughout their reality, and the total dissolution of the reality itself, along with the two nearest neighbouring ones. The energy release caused sterilisation of two more that we know about that had portals open to the originating one at the time." Ami and Rei paled while even Azumi looked shocked.

"That was over thirty millennia ago in the normal temporal method of measuring things, although it gets difficult to be completely sure when time breaches of this magnitude are involved, as they can cause all kinds of odd temporal affects. For a long time, everyone thought that it was all over, but it slowly became apparent that it wasn't, not entirely. Certain effects and warnings became apparent, which eventually caused a growing suspicion that the time machine itself had, somehow, survived the destruction of it's own reality. We think it had been thrown completely out of the normal flow of time in some bizarre manner, if you like 'sideways' across the timelines and even realities, taking some of it's own reality with it. No one knows how, precisely. There have been rumours of it turning up in dozens of places over the last few thousand years, sometimes only briefly, sometimes for extended periods. Again, it gets difficult, because it's a damn time machine. Anything to do with duration, date, things like that, become somewhat... fluid... where such a thing is concerned."

"Now, the species involved was very similar indeed to yours, although not quite identical. The story that you told Yori and she passed on to us bears a very strong resemblance to accounts we have of the war they had, although some of the details differ from the records I've seen, which we can probably put down to translation errors and the sheer amount of time that has passed. I don't know about the names and specifics like that, there simply isn't enough information in the data, which is very old, but I suspect ultimately all of it is based on the ancient empire of this species. We don't even know their name nowadays." He looked annoyed at this. "While I don't have any absolute proof, I have an unsettling idea, which matches a lot of the observed data, as to what has happened and what is going on. It's all in the end down to that time machine."

"You think that it's the Space-Time Door that Setsuna uses?" Ami queried. He nodded.

"Yes. The description is far too close for it to be a complete coincidence. Not to mention that little hints of this scenario have occurred in the past. I think it may have tried before, but failed. It's failing this time as well although it may not know it. The problem is that the computer system built into it isn't truly sentient, it was never designed to be, although it's a very good problem solver. It was designed to interface directly with the mind of a designated controller, who would guide it in its operation, while it provided the heavy lifting. I have a feeling that it's been running independently for a very long time, trying to fix the problem it caused, without being able to acknowledge that it's the root cause in the first place."

"How could it fix the problem of it's entire reality being deleted?" Azumi asked curiously, looking puzzled.

"Well, obviously, it can't. That's obvious to us, at any rate. To a computer, with vast resources but most likely no real common sense, it may not be. It merely sees a problem to solve." Lldnr'k looked irritated. "There are very few truly sentient artificial intelligences around, or at least ones an organic lifeform would recognise as sentient. It's an extremely difficult problem in computing few species have genuinely solved although many have tried. A mind isn't easy to build, especially a sane and well adjusted one. The analogue to a mind this machine possesses was neither sane nor well adjusted, even when it was first turned on. By now, with no telling how much local time has passed in whatever reality it occupies, it's probably completely fucking nuts even by the standards of artificial intelligence."

"OK, this is all very fascinating if not to say horrifying," Rei said, pouring herself some more tea with a slightly trembling hand, "but how does it tie in to our friends going crazy and all the rest of it? I still can't see it." Lldnr'k studied her for a moment, before nodding.

"Understand, this is at the moment only a guess, I can't prove it, but it fits what I know." She shrugged, waiting for him to continue. "I think, based on what Yori has said, the fragments I know about this machine, and some educated guesswork, that the device is attempting to guide your reality to become something very close to what it was created in. My guess is that it somehow found itself in your reality, recognised the similarities between it's creators and your species, then decided to intervene. On the evidence available, it has tried at least once, and failed." Everyone except Yori looked puzzled. He explained further. "Your equipment is from the future, but not your future, just a future. It tells me that there has been at least one previous attempt at modifying your reality which for some reason failed, therefore making it go back and try again. The items are definitely from a point some considerable distance past this one but along a path that cannot be reached from this one. In other words, an alternative future timeline."

"So, you think it's gone into the past, fiddled around to eventually end up with Ami, Rei, Usagi and the others, then manufactured various sets of opponents to guide them in the direction that would produce something very similar to the interstellar empire that originally created it?" Azumi asked slowly. He nodded with a sigh.

"Exactly. It's manipulating time to try and push this reality into congruence with it's creator's one, but it's not able to do it properly. I'm not surprised, it's essentially impossible. Even in it's own reality, in an alternate timeline, the number of variables that would need to be modified to make one timeline match another one are almost infinite, to say nothing of the reaction of the multiverse to such interference. My guess is that it's probably tried several times. There's no real way to know how many. It could be only once, other than the current attempt, it could be millions of times. Probably not the latter as in that case I suspect we wouldn't be having this conversation, as it's very unlikely that the temporal damage would have left anything behind, so it's most likely a low number of attempts. The last attempt clearly partially worked, creating this future that is feeding information back to the present, but it also failed, as that same future cannot be reached from this timeline."

Lldnr'k held up Ami's computer. "From the readings I get off this and these other items, they come from an alternate future that diverges wildly from the most likely path of this current timeline at some point in the next few years to decades. Quite possibly as a result of whatever this purported world-altering disaster is. It's a temporally orphaned future timeline, which means essentially it's cut off from the past except via the time machine, which partially exists outside normal temporal flow and can reach both here and there. That's the same problem the original species had with their own attempts at manipulating their own time flow. It's almost impossible to do what they tried to do and get away with it. In fact, I would go so far as to suggest that it probably is impossible, bearing in mind what happened to them."

"So what do we do about it?" Ami asked, glancing at Rei, who was looking very worried and upset. "Clearly, we can't let things go on like that, if you're right. Even if you're not, we still have the problem of our friends to deal with." She looked over at Usagi, sleeping peacefully on the sofa, with a sad expression on her face.

Shrugging slightly helplessly the demonic time mage looked around at them all. "I don't really know. I think, one way or the other, this damn machine needs to be shut down once and for all, but how to do that is beyond my knowledge. From what Azumi found out it's buried in a fractional reality, something that's slightly offset from this one, like a subspace storage pocket but somewhat more involved. Locating and entering it could be tricky. Never mind actually stopping the damn thing. Hopefully there would be something as obvious as an off switch, but that may be wishful thinking."

Rei was sitting staring at Usagi, a tear leaking down her face. After the mage fell silent, she looked up, then said, "So it's all a lie. All of the things we've been told, all the things we did, everything, possibly even our entire lives. Just made up so this damn device could fuck around with time." Ami put her hand on her friends shoulder for a moment, as Yori glanced at Chou with a sigh.

"That's one way to look at it, certainly, although I think a rather self-destructive way. The martial artist came over and squatted down next to the other woman, looking seriously at her. "In all probability, the background story you were told is wrong, true enough, and a lot of the enemies you have defeated were specifically targeted at you for reasons best known to this machine, but it doesn't change the fact that you, all of you, have succeeded on your own merits. You may not be reincarnated magical princesses from some huge interplanetary empire of the past, but you're genuinely very powerful and skilled magical girls of Minato, which is something to be proud of. There aren't a lot of us, but we've all made a real difference. You girls more than most, from what I know about it, even with the recent problems. We need to stop this thing, fix your friends as much as we can, then just get on with life." She held Rei's other hand for a few seconds, squeezing it. "Don't worry about the past, and things that have gone wrong, we can't change that. Just concentrate on doing good in the future."

The long-haired girl stared at her for a while, then slowly nodded, a slight smile briefly coming and going. "I suppose you're right. Thanks."

"No problem." Yori squeezed her hand one last time, then stood up. "We've had our problems in the past, but I've always felt you had real potential, pretty much all of you. That's what's been so annoying about all the stupid things you've done. Once this is all over we'll teach you to do your job without blowing up everything else around you, which will help." She grinned as Rei looked embarrassed, while Ami giggled.

"So what is the next step?" Azumi asked, as she watched Yori retake her seat. "I suppose we need to deal with the others first, then this damn time machine, somehow. And it still doesn't explain why they all went completely bonkers in the first place."

"It probably does, actually," Lldnr'k interjected. She glanced at him with a raised eyebrow. "I suspect that part of the manipulations the device has been doing involved implanting the narrative it has designed to make all this work, which has caused the brain damage Yori detected, as well as the traces of mental manipulation Hnther has found. In addition to that there is most likely some temporal effects at work. Traces of time manipulation are on all of these girls, which leads me to think it's quite likely the machine has been going back and editing their memories slightly in the past as well as the present, an extremely dangerous thing to do. It can cause a number of unpleasant mental issues. Temporal psychosis, you might call it. It's caused by the difference between what's actually happening and what the temporal manipulations suggest should happen, the larger the variance the worse the effects. Also, the closer to the source of the manipulation, the more pronounced the effect. This Setsuna woman, from what I've been told, is the interface between the machine and the rest of you, she's probably been very badly damaged by it."

"I would judge that trans-temporal memory adjustments would cause even more brain damage than otherwise," Hnther said, Chou translating for him, "It seems to me that there are several problems here directly affecting these poor women. The brain damage will certainly be causing severe issues with memory and mental state, although I am not qualified to say how bad that would be or what the treatment for it would be, that's more in Yori and Chou's field. The mental tampering is definitely a significant factor in the instability of your colleagues, if not the prime cause. Temporal effects would make both the previous problems much worse. All together, it's something of a minor miracle that they're functioning as well as they are. They must all be very strong-willed people to be able to still function at all."

"If you fix the brain damage, do you think that will help?" Rei asked hopefully, looking at Yori, then Chou. They exchanged glances for a moment, before discussing something with Hnther in the demonic language.

Yori finally turned to Rei and Ami. "It's worth a try, but none of us expect much of a change. It will probably stop it getting worse, though. One problem is that with the time device still out there, it will presumably still be interfering, which will ultimately cause the same issue again. Another problem is that the organic damage and the psychological damage are two completely separate things, even though they're associated. Even repairing the brain issues won't, in all probability, undo many if any of the mental problems. It should stop it getting worse, in some ways, but it may not. The problems might well be self-sustaining by this point." She sighed. "We've had some experience with physiological problems worsening psychological ones. Trust me, fixing the damage isn't an instant cure. This case is a lot worse than the last one as well. But it's certainly worth a shot."

"I can possibly undo some of the worst damage," Hnther supplied, looking somewhat uncertain, "some of the more conflicting memories can be suppressed which should have a helpful effect. I am very reluctant to actually remove any of them, from what Ldnr'k has said, their current personalities are a direct result of the tampering. That's not good, but erasing those memories would destabilise the personalities even more, which would be very bad indeed. Especially with the level of power these women have. Mages and high-level magic users are always much more difficult to perform this sort of activity on successfully."

"We have to do something," Ami told them firmly. "We can't just let it get worse. Someone, sooner or later, is going to die as a result of all this unless we stop it. I don't want to have to kill my friends to stop them killing someone else." She stared at the floor, depressed, adding in a whisper, "But I will if I have to." Rei hugged her for a moment. Yori gave her a sympathetic look.

"It's difficult, I know. If it comes to it, I'm prepared to do it, to save you from having to." Ami looked at her for a moment. Eventually she shook her head.
"It's our responsibility."

"Fair enough." The look in the black-haired girl's eyes was one of respect and sadness. "I desperately hope it won't come to that, though. There are a number of things we can do before we have to resort to lethal methods. Even simply shoving them through a portal to somewhere uninhabited might be a better idea. But, before any of that, we should try repairing the damage first, and see what happens."

Rei turned her head to look at Usagi, still sleeping on the sofa. "What do we tell them?" she wondered out loud. "Some of them are never going to believe any of this. Hotaru might, I think, possibly Makoto, but I very much doubt Setsuna or Usagi would, they're true believers. Most of the rest are as well, although possibly not quite as much. They're all sure they're reincarnated warriors from the Silver Millennium, learning the truth would be very damaging. Assuming it even is the truth. We still don't know for sure."

"We can find out," Aiko said, looking around at her colleagues. "We were discussing this earlier. We need to send someone to check out the various places on the moon that you think have ruins from this old kingdom of yours. No ruins, no kingdom." Rei exchanged glances with Ami, then looked at the brunette.

"How are you going to go to the moon, for heavens sake?" she asked incredulously. Yori grinned at her.

"That's easy enough. We can borrow a spaceship from a friend of mine." Both girls stared at her in shock.

"You... can borrow... a spaceship?" Rei managed. Yori nodded happily.

"Sure. I know a very good asteroid miner. I'll have to introduce you one day, he's a nice guy. But, before we go that far, we should try healing these girls up and see what happens. We can start with Usagi since she's right there." Jumping to her feet she went over to the sofa and knelt down, reaching out with her hands. Hnther and Lldnr'k both moved closer to watch, while Ami and Rei exchanged looks again, shaking their heads. These people were pretty weird even by magical girl standards, was the thought going through both their minds.

Her hands glowing purple, Yori concentrated on the blonde on the sofa, while Hnther and Lldnr'k watched, commenting to each other quietly in that demonic language. Chou came over to watch as well. "This is a little tricky," Yori mumbled to herself, moving her hands delicately around on the other woman's head for several minutes, before finally sitting back on her heels with a slight sigh of relief. "Got it, I think. Could you double check for me, love?" Nodding, Chou scanned the patient as requested, then smiled.

"It looks good. I can't see any residual damage, dear. Should we wake her up and talk to her, perhaps?" Yori rubbed her chin, considering the idea, before glancing at Ami and Rei.

"What do you think? She's your friend. How will she react?" Both girls looked at each other for a moment.

"I don't know." Ami studied the sleeping blonde. "Once, she'd have at least listened, but now...?" She shrugged helplessly. "She might listen, she might go nuts."

"OK. In that case, I think I'll just do this..." Yori prodded the girl in a few places, little flashes of purple light coming from her fingertips.
"What did you do to her?" Rei asked curiously, watching carefully.

Yori smiled slightly. "Paralysed her from the neck down, basically. It won't last long, but it should stop her doing anything hasty. Bit harsh but it's probably best to be safe." Rei nodded, looking impressed. "Right, let's turn her back on and see what happens." Touching the girl in the middle of her forehead, Yori did something, pulling her hand back as Usagi groaned, then stirred, moving her head slightly.

"Ow. My head," she mumbled, before opening her eyes. She spotted Yori immediately, her eyes widening, then beyond her Chou, Azumi, and Aiko. Looking at them in fear, she glanced frantically around, before noticing Ami and Rei, who watched her with sympathy. Her eyes widened even further when she saw L'dnr'k and Hnther, both of whom were inspecting her curiously.

"What the fuck is going on!" she screamed, sounding scared and angry, her head thrashing around on the sofa pillow. "What did you bastards do to me? Why can't I move? Ami, you fucking traitor, I know this is your fault. You're even consorting with demons now, as if that bitch Yori wasn't bad enough! I'm going to kill you!"

"Usagi, calm down," Ami said, trying not to show how much her friend's words hurt. She walked over, kneeling down beside the frantic blonde, who glared at her with hatred in her eyes. "We're trying to help. You and the others are ill. Yori fixed some serious problems in your brain, but we need to help the others as well."

"You lying cunt," Usagi hissed, staring at her with fury in her eyes. "I know you've always been jealous of me. This is your way of trying to take over, isn't it? Well, it's not going to work. I'm the fucking princess, I'll be queen one day, there's nothing you can do about it. I'm going to get out of this then I'm going to kill you and everyone else here as well. Helping demons, you traitorous bitch!" She spat at Ami, who flinched as it hit her face. "I'll kill you all, and anyone else who gets in my way, none of you stan..." Voice cut off abruptly as Yori touched her head again, sighing.

"So much for that," she muttered. "Not exactly the response I was hoping for." She looked at Hnther, who shrugged slightly, saying something that Chou didn't translate. The young woman nodded, sighing again. She had a brief conversation with him, then turned to Ami, who was wiping her face with a handkerchief. "Sorry, Ami. It doesn't look like it's produced any miracle cure. She's just as mouthy as ever, but I have to say more foul-mouthed than normal."

Both Usagi's friends looked sadly at her unconscious form. "This is really bad," Rei muttered, sighing. She looked at the two demons, then Chou, and Yori, before glancing helplessly at Ami. "What do we do?" Yori studied Usagi for a while, scanning her again, then nodding to herself.

"It definitely fixed the organic brain damage, so that's at least a good thing, I suppose. Perhaps some more time will make her brain settle down a little, she might still come around. I think we should probably sort out everyone else as well, then see what happens. If we can get even one or two to come around to see sense, they might be able to help us persuade the rest."

"Bearing in mind how hard they were trying to kill each other that may be wishful thinking," Aiko noted. Yori glanced at her, sighing.

"Yes, you're right, but it's still worth a try. I'm very reluctant to write any of them off before we try everything else." Turning to Rei, she waved to a chair. "Sit down and I'll sort you out as well, just to be safe." Slightly nervously the young woman did as requested, jumping a little when Yori put her hands on her head. "Don't worry, you won't feel anything. This shouldn't take long, the damage is much less in your case, but I'm interested to see if you notice any changes." The martial artist grinned at her, then started working, as the two demons and Chou watched intently. A few minutes passed, then she stepped back. "OK, all done. Did you feel any change?"

"Not that I noticed," Rei said slowly, trying to work out if she could feel anything or not. Eventually she shook her head. "No, I don't think so."

"The damage in your case was limited enough that I doubt you would feel it, except possibly by comparison after a week or two," Chou offered. "If Usagi was more cooperative we would probably find she could feel a difference, but as Yori said earlier, it's more than likely that by now the thought patterns that have led to this mental instability are fairly deeply ingrained. It could take some time to correct itself."

"If it does correct itself," Ami added gloomily, making Chou look at her, then after a moment nod sadly.

"If it does, yes. It's entirely possibly it won't, I'm afraid." They were silent for a moment, before Yori looked at Ami.

"I'd better do you as well, even though the damage is small." Shortly, the blue-haired girl was probing her own mind trying to determine if she felt any different. After several minutes she looked at Yori, who was watching her with interest.

"Nothing. I don't feel any different."

"I didn't expect you would, it hasn't affected you all that much."

"I wonder why?" Azumi murmured, looking at both Ami and Rei with an evaluating expression. "From what Hnther was saying, that implies that this time machine computer has been doing much less interfering with Rei, and almost none with Ami. I can understand that Setsuna would be worst affected, being closely associated with the thing, and Usagi because she's nominally the leader of the group, but it seems odd that Ami would be almost unaffected. And more, that Rei would be affected, but then be able to throw off the effects, at least enough to listen and form her own opinions. It doesn't look likely that most of the rest will react in the same way."

They all exchanged glances. "It's a good point," Aiko said slowly. "I can sort of understand Ami. I mean, you're a damn sight smarter than almost anyone, which might well help, if nothing else the machine might not have been able to do much fiddling with your mind without you noticing, but Rei is a little puzzling, especially since she's part of the core original group." She grinned at the other woman. "No offence meant about your intelligence, by the way." Rei laughed for a second or two.

"None taken. I know my own limitations, and I know full well that Ami is much smarter than I am." Her friend looked embarrassed but didn't say anything.

"It's more complicated than that," Hnther said through Chou, who was translating for him again. "All three of the young women I have so far examined have had fairly extensive memory interference, although the one on the sofa there had vastly more than the other two. The effect of the interference is undoubtedly reflected in the extent of the brain damage, but I don't think it's a completely linear relationship."

"I suspect the temporal effects are more important in some ways," Lldnr'k mused, tapping the side of his beak thoughtfully while examining Usagi curiously from close range, making Ami suddenly have a moment's malicious enjoyment of the thought of what she'd do if she suddenly woke up and saw the demon mere centimetres away. "In all likelihood, this one has a much larger temporal mismatch between the implanted narrative and reality. Ami, for whatever reason, has very little mismatch, quite possibly because she's smart and observant enough to have realised a considerable time ago that things were not proceeding according to the stated plan, which would have ameliorated the effect very significantly. Rei, due to her grandfather's intervention and wisdom, is also likely to have been questioning it on some level for quite a while, even before consciously noticing something was wrong."

"Interesting," Hnther muttered, inspecting both girls closely. He nodded after a moment or two. "Yes, I can see that as a possibility. I don't know enough about this 'temporal psychosis' to know whether you're right, but based on what we've learned it's plausible. There is certainly much less outside interference present with them both as well. Perhaps they're simply not central enough to the imposed narrative, or possibly the plan was to bring them in more deeply later on, but because things aren't going as designed, that hasn't happened." He shrugged slightly. "We can theorise forever, but without more information we have no idea how close we are to the truth. Better to ignore that part for the moment and concentrate on corrective actions if possible."

"We don't even know for sure that this space-time door thing is indeed the time machine in question," Azumi noted, "although from what you told us it seems extremely likely."

"I'm certain it is," Lldnr'k told her. "Too many things match. I can't completely prove it without seeing the thing, but I would be very surprised indeed if it wasn't involved. The temporal distortions are so obvious, a very powerful time manipulation system is the only possible explanation, and that damn machine is the most powerful one ever built." he shook his head slowly. "No, there are just too many points of congruence for it to be anything else."

"I think we have to take it as read at this point that you're right. All we can do in the short term is try to repair the damage to the girls, then see if we can talk them around, or at least stop them killing themselves, each other, or more importantly, anyone else." Yori looked apologetically at Ami and Rei. "Sorry, I know how that last bit sounds, but it really is very important to stop them hurting any innocents."

"Don't worry, we both agree completely," Ami assured her. "I know what you mean."

"After you've healed the damage, what do we do if we can't persuade the others to see sense?" Rei asked quietly. "We're pretty much agreed we can't tell them the complete truth, it's unlikely they'd believe any of it, especially as we have no way at the moment of proving any of it. The state they're all in, so paranoid and suspicious, I think most of them would probably just take it as more evidence that there was some conspiracy against them." Ami looked at her, nodding thoughtfully.

"It's possible that Makoto might listen. Hotaru probably will. I don't know about the rest. We already know Usagi won't, if she won't Setsuna and Minako definitely won't, and I doubt the other two would either." She sighed, sitting down at the table and picking up her computer, looking at it for a moment, then stirring her other possessions around on the table with one finger. "This would be a lot easier if we could take their powers away somehow. I don't want to do that, but it would at least make the problem manageable."

"Can't we just take their transformation rods away?" Rei asked hopefully, "Or erase their memories or something?" She looked at Yori, then Hnther. "You know all about doing weird things to the mind. Is that possible?"

The demon sat down next to her, Chou sitting on the other side, then looked closely at her. "Yes, in a way, it is possible. Your own disguise magic affects perception and memory, Yori and Chou's does even more effectively, and I know they have their own memory fogging techniques that can efficiently blank short term memory. But you have to understand there is a very large difference from stopping someone remembering what's happening now and removing memories that are months, years, or decades old. It can certainly be done in a number of different ways, but it's very tricky indeed to do without seriously affecting the mind in question. Your personality is the sum of your memories. If you remove some of them you inevitably alter the personality, quite possibly very severely. That's why such techniques are so tightly regulated. It's a small step from deep memory editing to mind editing, which is almost always a very bad idea indeed, and in most places an extremely serious crime."

He glanced at Usagi on the sofa. "I would be more than slightly reluctant to try anything of the sort with your friends except as a matter of extreme last resort. In the case of Usagi there the already altered memories are so deeply entwined with the real ones removing them would cause serious damage, I fear. Removing the original ones could make the problem even worse. The least damaging method would be to erase the last few years of her memory completely, resetting her to an earlier state, in the hope that she could eventually rebuild her personality, but it wouldn't be the same person at the end of the procedure. That's even assuming I could do it. She has very considerable magical abilities, as do all of you, which makes such things unreliable at best." Rei sighed, nodding her understanding.

"It may be possible to reduce the intensity of some of the more problematic memories," Hnther added after some thought. "Not remove them, just essentially lower the strength enough that the normal operation of her mind would eventually push them back to the point they didn't cause so many problems. It's a technique that's used in some forms of trauma therapy. I'm not hugely practised in the technique, so I'd have to look it up and probably consult with some colleagues, but it might be a partial solution. The effect would be a long term one, though, it would take several years at least to have any real effect. And, of course, we'd have to prevent this time device simply undoing the repairs."

"Well, then, what about the other idea? Take away their access to their magic by taking their transformation rods away." Rei was grasping at straws, something she was well aware of, but couldn't stop. Yori sighed a little.

"I don't think that will work. These artefacts of yours are quite powerful, but I don't think you really need them any more. They were how you all learned magic control in the first place, from what you've told us, although by now the ability is inherent. That's the way magic works. Taking them away, assuming we could, bearing in mind that they're stored in a subspace pocket in the first place, would most likely only be a temporary solution. In the end I think they'd all work out how to access the magic without using the things as a crutch." She looked at Rei, who seemed unconvinced. "I could probably teach you to access your magic without the rod in about ten minutes. I expect you'd work it out for yourself in a couple of days if you tried." The other woman stared at her, then shook her head disbelievingly.

"I know how amazingly good at this sort of thing you are but I'm really not sure you're right." Yori inspected her for a moment then smiled slightly.

"OK. I'll prove it. Go on, do your transformation thing and let me see it up close. I'm curious anyway." Deciding it was worth a try, Rei stood up and pulled out her rod, holding it up and calling out her transformation phrase, while everyone else watched closely. After the normal visual effects died down she put her hands on her hips and stared challengingly at Yori, who grinned.

"What a lot of effort to go to," she commented, glancing at Aiko, who rolled her eyes slightly.

"You guys never had to make so much fuss, did you?"

"Nope. We just will the change. Since Chou fixed that stupid clothing spell most people can't even told the difference."

"I wonder why such a complicated effect was designed in?" Chou asked with interest, looking curiously at Rei. "It seems somewhat grandiose."

"That might well be the reason," Yori theorised. "To make it look impressive. It does, I'll give it that, but it's slow and tactically silly. Right, let's have a look." She approached Rei, holding her hand over the other woman's head, then moving it slowly down her body. "Hmm. Lots of spells, it's pretty complicated. Quite a lot of power there as well, but I don't think you're using all of it yet. Or not as efficiently as you should. Interesting. Ah, there it is." Her slightly glowing hand stopped moving, then backtracked a little. She made a small motion, her fingers seeming to blur a little, as if they weren't quite in the same space as the rest of her. Ami watched, fascinated, while Rei grunted a little.

"Oogh. That felt really strange. What did you do?"

"Located the transformation trigger. It's mixed in with all sorts of other crap, half of which looks completely redundant to me. Not a particularly efficient design, but I guess it works all right. OK, can you feel this?" She did something, making Rei wince.

"Yes. It feels weird."

"That's the activation node for the main trigger. Your little song and dance routine is basically a mnemonic to activate it, but it would be a lot better to simply trigger it directly. That's what most mages do with a preset spell. Close your eyes, that will probably help, and try to visualise what I'm doing. I'll trace it out, you should be able to feel it as I do, then try to remember it, OK?" Rei nodded, following instructions. Yori's rich voice, calm and controlled, was almost soothing.

"This is the main trigger, here. This node controls the light show, this one turns the perception fogging spell on and off, this one does the clothes from what I can see. This one here is the power-up node. The main trigger calls them in sequence when you perform that start-up phrase. Can you see them?" Rei slowly nodded again.

"I think so. Almost like something glowing inside me? But not inside me, at the same time. It's difficult to describe."

Yori sounded amused when she replied. "Magic is inherently multidimensional, although most people don't look at it like that, they hide it behind something simpler to visualise but more complex to actually do. Or less effective, at any rate. You're doing well. OK, watch what I do. I'm going to push a little energy into the memory spell and deactivate it. Don't fight it, just let it happen, or it won't, all right? I just want to show you the operation." Rei nodded once more. She felt the flow of something into her, making a small but perceptible change.

"See what I did?"

"I think so."

"Good. Now, concentrate on the same node, kind of push it with your mind. You have more than enough energy, it should activate easily enough." Attempting something she could barely understand, Rei tried to do what Yori requested.

"Nothing happened."

"You were close, but not quite right. Watch this, I'll do it again." Once more, the external energy flow did something to the little glowing points she could almost see somewhere very close. She watched intently, her eyes squeezed shut, as Yori turned it on and off a couple of times. Finally she smiled.

"I think I see."

"Good, try it yourself." Once more, she prodded around inside her mind, this time feeling an almost familiar sensation. She grinned. "Very good, it worked that time. All right, now try the power up one." One by one, at Yori's urging, she gained control of each activation point, feeling the difference as they turned on and off. Finally she opened her eyes, smiling broadly. Hnther and Lldnr'k were watching her with great interest, as was Ami, while Chou, Azumi, and Aiko were looking pleased.

"Wow. That's amazing." Turning to Ami, she posed for a moment, then flipped the transformation on then off, taking less than a second rather than the normal long drawn out sequence they'd become used to. Her friend clapped, delighted.

"Well done." She glanced at her watch, then laughed, turning to Yori who was looking amused. "Nine and a half minutes. You were right." The other woman snickered.

"It sounds very big-headed I know but I often am about things like this." Ami and Rei giggled, while Chou sighed a little, making the martial artist glance at her and grin. After a moment Chou also giggled.

"It's true. She usually is. But don't tell her that."

"Most impressive, Yori," Lldnr'k said, radiating amusement. "You're a very good teacher. That was an extremely effective exercise in magic control."

"Thanks." Yori smiled at him. "I was pretty sure it was fairly straightforward. I know how Aiko and her girls do it, and I've examined a few of the other groups over the years. That sort of power-up method isn't all that unusual, although the power involved is much higher than most of the girls have." She looked at Ami, who was staring thoughtfully at her friend as she played around with her newly learned ability. "Want me to show you as well?" The blue-haired girl glanced at her, then closed her eyes. Thirty seconds later she transformed into her powered up form with a wide grin. Yori looked impressed, then chuckled.

"Very good indeed. I always thought you were pretty damn sharp, Ami."

"You explained it very well," the other girl said, looking satisfied with herself. She powered up and down a few times, then made the clothing change back while leaving the power boost in place. "I've wanted to be able to do this for years. I can't believe all that time it was only a few mental exercises away."

"The magic is a bit redundant but very clearly laid out in a modular form," Yori told her. "I guess that's not entirely unexpected bearing in mind it's essentially the work of a magical supercomputer, it probably thinks in terms of subroutines. We could most likely improve the spells quite a lot with some work, but they're pretty easy to follow. Much more than Aiko's team's magic was, that stuff was far more subtle. In their case the clothing change was deeply embedded into the main power up, Chou took a lot of study to unravel it and edit it out, but with you guys it's easy."

"At least we can get the benefit of the magic without being obviously associated with the uniform," Ami replied, looking glum for a moment. "After what happened I don't really want to do that any more."
"I can understand that." Yori smiled sympathetically at her. "But, you see the problem? It took me less than ten minutes to explain to Rei how to do the power boost without that rod thing. You just listened to my explanation then worked it out. How long do you think it would take your friends if they really had motivation to figure it out on their own?"

Nodding, Ami conceded the point. "Days at worst, I suppose, if they thought about it, which at least some of them probably would. Damn. There's no easy solution is there?"

"Afraid not. I really wish there was." They were all silent for a while, as Ami spent the time picking up each of her artefacts, looking at them, then stashing them away. She ended up holding the computer, balancing it on her hand thoughtfully and staring at it. Yori watched her, glancing at Chou and Azumi for a moment, before returning her attention to the blue-haired girl.

"If we can figure out a way to shut this thing down, what happens to us?" the girl finally asked, looking up.

"What do you mean?"

"Exactly what I said. What happens to us? Our magic? Does it go away?" Yori studied her for a moment then shook her head.

"No, I doubt it very much. That device may have manipulated things to ensure you got access to magic in the first place, but it's not powering you. Your magic comes from the same place everyone else's does, whatever that is. Ambient magical fields, internally generated energy, that sort of thing. Even if we manage to shut it down it won't effect you. Once a magical girl, always a magical girl." She snickered at Ami's expression, adding, "Once the crazy has you it has you for life."

"I don't know whether to be pleased or upset about that," Ami muttered.

Azumi shrugged. "Be pleased. It's a weird lifestyle but usually pretty interesting." Her normally rather cold voice took on a warmer tone. "It has bad points, true, but I've found more good things about it myself." Glancing at her, Ami nodded after a second or two.

"I suppose you're right. I do enjoy it most of the time, except when we have a problem like this. I was just thinking it would be a solution to the others, if we could shut down this machine, even if I lost my powers as well. I could live with that if it meant no one would get hurt."

"That's because you're a good person, Ami," Chou told her gently. "But it's not a decision you'll need to make. You're a magical girl for good, with all the abilities, problems and duties that brings, I'm afraid. We all are." Looking at the blonde's calm smile, the blue-haired girl sighed slightly but smiled back.

"OK. You both obviously know what you're talking about where things like this are concerned. When this is all over I'd love to to talk about it and learn from you."

"Of course." Looking at the computer Ami was still holding, Chou turned to Yori, indicating it. "What do we do about that? It's much too useful a tool not to continue using it if possible, but this device can obviously monitor it and has been doing so since the beginning. Who knows how much information it's gathered on the entire situation using that little machine? Presumably it's already aware of something not working correctly, which is why it was filtering out all the signs that could have led Ami to discovering this much earlier, and Azumi breaking the link between them must have raised a flag." Yori nodded thoughtfully.
"Very true. I suspect that the time device is well aware of what's going on, but whether it will interfere I have no idea. As soon as we came on the scene it must have noticed, even if it can't directly affect us, for whatever reason." She glanced at Lldnr'k. "Why do you suppose that is? Ami mentioned Setsuna thought her all-powerful system couldn't even detect us." The time mage thought for a moment.

"As I've mentioned in the past, different methods of accessing temporal travel are usually incompatible, often to a dangerous degree, and utilising any of them leaves a permanent change to the temporal signature of the person or item in question. The method you used was unusual even in time travel techniques. I would dearly like to study this mirror artefact one day, it uses a very odd spell I've never encountered before. I'm sure that is why the machine can't track you, your temporal signature is different enough as a result to make it's methods ineffective, but why the rest of your friends are also invisible to it is something I'm not sure about. It implies you all have something in common that has passed on your variant signature or enough of it to have a similar effect." He looked closely at her, then walked over to inspect Chou, Azumi, and Aiko. Reaching out he gently probed them, then pulled a small device from somewhere and looked through it at the other three. Finally he nodded.

"Yes, you definitely all share something odd. Very strange. It's a linkage to some remote power source that has a very odd relationship to time, I've never seen anything like it before. Extremely powerful as well." He probed a little harder then recoiled as there was a faint snapping sound, along with a burst of magic that everyone in the room felt. "Appallingly powerful, and none too friendly," the mage added, shaking his head slightly dazedly. "What the hell was that?" Azumi shared a glance with Chou and Aiko, then Yori, who finally nodded.

"It's our security ward system. You just triggered a warning, it was being polite because it recognised there was no ill intent, but it doesn't like people prodding us too deeply." The silver-haired young woman smiled slightly. "It can be much less polite." The mage stared at her for a moment, then turned to Yori, who shrugged, grinning a little.

"It's true. The thing got a little... bigger... than we intended."

"Ah. One of those. Excessively complex spell that's almost taken on a life of it's own?" Lldnr'k asked curiously. She nodded.

"Yep. It's gotten really damn complicated, it's almost sentient."

"Hmm. I'd love to look at the spell but from what I saw it probably wouldn't allow it. I've run into this sort of thing once or twice before, but I have to say never at anything like that power level. Not even close. It's a little scary." Yori looked rather proud, making him laugh.

"You think that's the cause of the temporal interference?" she asked him.

"Definitely. You're all so deeply linked into it by the looks of things that your odd temporal signature has transferred throughout the entire system, more or less by accident. Anything linked in to the wards will share enough of it that a different time access method would have severe difficulty even seeing it, never mind interfering with it." He scratched his head for a moment with one sharp talon, smoothing the disturbed feathers down again, before adding, "It does suggest one possible method of keeping Ami and Rei out of the influence of the time machine if it's needed." Studying him for a second or two, Yori transferred her gaze to the two young women in question, then slowly nodded.

"Indeed it does. I'm not entirely happy with that idea just yet, but it's something to bear in mind, if we have no other choice."
Ami stared at her. "You're talking about adding us to the protection of this 'ward system', aren't you?" The martial artist sighed slightly.

"Yes. It could be done, but it's a big step, if nothing else in trust. You understand, I like you, overall, but with our past history, I'm not entirely sure yet that it would be a good idea. It involves sharing a lot of things that I'm not too comfortable with sharing right now." She glanced at Rei, then looked back at the blue-haired girl. "That said, you've shared a lot with us, so it would probably be fair. The security spell would help as well. I'll have to think about it."

"We don't have to decide right now, dear," Chou said, walking over to the other woman. "I agree, it is a large step, but if it becomes necessary, we should do it." Yori looked slightly unconvinced but nodded shortly.

"All right. In that case, we seem to have reached a number of decisions. Long term we need to find some way to shut this damn time manipulation device off for good. Short term, we need to heal up the other girls, then see if any of them come to their senses, then deal with the ones that don't, somehow. I'm still not sure how, but we can think about that while we're doing the first part. I guess we should put Usagi back, then grab the others and sort them out before we do anything else." Yori looked around at the others. "Does that sound reasonable?"

"Pretty much," Aiko replied for all of them. She indicated the computer Ami was still holding. "But the original question remains, what about that thing?"

Azumi stepped forward, glancing at Yori for a moment, then held out her hand. "Can I have another look at it, Ami?" The magical girl handed it over. "OK. I think..." Azumi studied it closely for a moment. "Yes. If you will allow it, I can make what I did earlier permanent, essentially reprogramming it to deactivate the external link completely. You'd lose access to some database functions, but I don't think anything too important, and it should stop the external interference." Ami thought for only a couple of seconds before nodding firmly.

"Do it. We can't trust anything the outside source is telling us anyway, so losing access to it is much less important than it losing access to us."

"It's going to know for sure that we're on to it if I do this," Azumi warned. Ami sighed.

"The damn thing must already know. As soon as you broke the link the first time, there's no way it could not have noticed what was going on if it's at all smart."

"True. OK." Staring at the computer for a few seconds, Azumi smiled when it made a plaintive little sound and displayed an error. Ami read it out loud.

"External override erased." She smiled, taking it back. "Thanks. Do you think there are any more back doors in it?" Azumi shook her head.

"Not that I can see. It's a very complex machine, but there only seemed to be one external control channel built into it, which is now permanently off. It should be safe."

Studying her for a while, Ami grinned. "I have to find out how the hell you're able to do that," she said, "I'm incredibly curious. And rather jealous." Azumi grinned back, her face warming a lot.

"I suspect you'll find out sooner or later. Be patient."

"Right then." Yori clapped her hands together, looking mildly pleased. "Something going right for once. OK, Aiko, let's put Usagi back and start getting the rest of them. Hopefully we can do them all before they work out what's going on. Let's do Setsuna next." Aiko grinned, walking over and picking the unconscious blonde up. Yori did something to her head, then nodded, the brunette vanishing immediately. "She'll wake up in about a minute with hopefully no real memories of what happened here," the martial artist said, satisfied. Shortly Aiko reappeared with an unconscious green-haired woman draped over her shoulder.

"She saw me coming this time and started her transformation sequence," Aiko reported, smiling slightly. "You were right. It takes much too long in a combat situation. I nailed her when she was only half-way through." Snickering, Yori watched as her friend laid her victim out on the couch, arranging her neatly. Ami shook her head, amused.

"You're all having far too much fun with all of this," she noted, smiling. Yori grinned at her.

"We have to get all the enjoyment we can, bearing in mind how serious this is." Ami giggled, Rei beside her laughing out loud, before moving to look down at her erstwhile companion in arms.

"She looks quite peaceful like that," the black-haired girl said quietly, looking slightly sad. "Not like she's been recently at all." Ami put her hand on her friend's shoulder.

"Hopefully we can sort them out and make them at least not try to kill each other," she told the other girl. "I doubt we'll be a team again but I could handle it if they're not crazy and dangerous." Nodding, Rei moved out of the way as Hnther began examining Setsuna, looking serious, then very angry.

"This woman's mind is a complete mess," he growled, his anger coming through even Chou's translation. "How the hell she's even able to go about her day to day business is beyond me. She should be undergoing some serious therapy, not throwing magic around." He looked at Yori. "Once you've healed the brain damage I'm going to have no choice but to do some immediate work on her mind. I think she's about a week away from a complete psychotic break, if not worse. If that happens it will be too late to recover her mind. It's right on the border at the moment." Sighing, Yori knelt down beside him.

"OK. Let's see what I can do." She spent nearly ten minutes running glowing hands over the unconscious woman's head, before settling back, looking disturbed. "What a mess. I think I got it all sorted. Can you double check for me, love? I don't want to make a mistake with this one." Chou bent over the woman and spent a short while scanning her before nodding.

"It all looks good. There's quite a lot of residual traces but I think those will sort themselves out given time. We might need to revisit it in a few weeks, though, to be sure."

"I agree. Hnther, she's all yours." Both of them got out of the way as the mind mage got to work. He spent close to forty minutes gently probing Setsuna, finally removing his hands from her head and inspecting her face.

"I think that will do it for the time being. She still needs work, long term work, from someone better at therapy than me, but she shouldn't just snap now. At least from that source of trouble." He shrugged a little, frowning unhappily. "Only the gods know how much damage was done to her psyche over the years. It will take a long time even with good help to get over it all if she ever does. But that will help a lot in the short to medium term." Standing, he looked around at his audience. "I turned down some of the more egregious memory violations as much as I dared and moved a few things around. It should mean she's much less likely to be unthinkingly violent. I would suggest the best thing is to render her deeply unconscious, for at least half a day, to allow her subconscious to rework the memory patterns before her conscious mind starts interfering. Can that be done?"
Yori glanced at her friends then nodded. "I think so. We know where she lives. We can put her under for a fairly long time, then Aiko can take her home and put her to bed where she'll be safe. She should sleep until morning."

"Good. That should help a lot, although once again I'm not expecting any miracles. Just, hopefully, not the complete destruction of a mind." Hnther looked at his patient with anger and regret. "This all annoys me immensely," he muttered. "If the builders of that damn machine were still around I'd make it my business to see them punished."

"You're many millennia too late for that, my friend," Lldnr'k commented. "They were punished as severely as one could ever wish for, though, bearing in mind they no longer exist at all. Pity their work lived on after them."

"Indeed," the other mage grunted, still angry. Stepping out of the way as Aiko picked the green haired woman up, he watched through squinted eyes as she and Chou both disappeared with their burden. The two magical girls reappeared some minutes later looking pleased.

"She's nicely tucked up in bed with the doors and windows locked, very unlikely to wake for at least eighteen hours," Chou said, smiling gently. "Poor woman. I hope this helps."

"It should to to one degree or another. I hope. It probably can't make things any worse, at least."

Yori looked momentarily depressed, then visibly cheered herself up. "OK, which one next?"

"We could grab the blue-haired one, she's stomping around muttering to herself near her home. Her lover kicked her out of the car a couple of minutes ago and roared off swearing," Aiko told her. The brunette grinned a little. "She's got nearly as extensive a vocabulary as you do," she added slyly, making Yori look slightly embarrassed. Azumi giggled at the look on her friend's face. "Hey, it's a compliment." Grinning, Yori took the ribbing in good humour.

"OK, that sounds good. Do you think you can get her as easily as the others?"

"I think so, she doesn't seem to be paying much attention to anything at the moment. I can pop in behind her and drop her before she even..." Aiko stopped dead, looking worried, at the same time Yori, Chou, and Azumi all twitched.

"Oh, crap," Azumi said. The remaining people in the room looked curiously at them.

"What's going on?" Ami asked.

"That brunette one just spotted what's-her-name, Haruka, and is heading straight for her. She doesn't look happy. They're both near the park your friend Hotaru is still sitting in. It looks like she's picked up on it, she just powered up and is going towards them both. Fumiko and the others are moving to intercept them, but I don't think they're going to get there in time," Azumi shook her head. "Nope, they've all seen each other. Fuck. The blonde just powered up as well and jumped out of her car, it just smashed into a building, and she's firing at the brunette."

"We'd better go and help," Yori said, looking very irritated. "Before something major happens." Glancing at the two mages, she added apologetically, "I think you guys should stay here where it's safe, the mood they're in any non-humans are going to be targets. Quite a few humans probably will be as well." Lldnr'k looked at Hnther, then they both nodded agreement.

"All right. We can ask your grandfather for some more of that very nice tea, Rei," the crow-like mage said.

"We'll be back as soon as we can," Chou told them. She looked at Ami and Rei. "Are you coming?
We could quite likely use the help."

"It might make the situation worse, the mood they've been in, but I suppose we have no choice," Ami sighed with a look at her friend, who shrugged.

"Come on over here, then," Aiko told them, as her friends gathered around them. As soon as they were in position the entire group vanished. Hnther looked at Lldnr'k, who made a gesture of mild amusement.

"The wards are down, at least they remembered to do that," he said in Trade. Hnther laughed.

"Come on, let's find the priest and have a chat. I'd quite like some tea, and I'd also like to get some more information about what he's told his grand-daughter. It seems likely he's had quite an effect on her. It might shed light on ways to help the others." The two demons wandered off into the temple to look for the old priest.
“Eep!” 'Azumi' involuntarily yelped, ducking as a wild burst of lightning shot past her head the second they arrived. Everyone scattered, making less of a target.

“Fuck it, that crazy bitch is going to kill someone,” 'Yori' complained, watching the tall brunette take another shot at the blonde, swearing like a trooper in the process. The other combatant dived sideways, returning fire with an energy attack that levelled a small building housing a fast food business, which luckily had been occupied with people quick-witted enough to know trouble when they saw it coming and who had left via the back door as soon as they spotted the uniforms. The middle Tendo winced, glancing at her sister who was beside her, peering around the side of a more substantial building, neither of the participants in the fight having apparently noticed them yet.

“Damn it, this is ridiculous,” 'Yori' complained, as she watched the brunette evade the return strike in a blurringly fast motion, firing yet another lightning bolt at her former friend, now someone she was intent on killing, as far as could be determined from her actions. Her words indicated as much as well, consisting as they did of variants on the theme of 'Stand still so I can finish you off, you bitch."

“We're about twenty seconds away,” said Fumiko, sending her position and that of her two team-mates to the rest of them. There was a pause, then she swore. “Oh, damn it, that other blonde, Minako, just powered up and is heading your way fast as well. She'll get there about the same time we will.”

“Intercept her and deal with her,” 'Yori' told her, “I don't want them all getting together or we'll have absolute chaos. Make sure the neither of the other ones gets here either if they decide to be a nuisance, all right? We'll deal with these two. Three, I guess, if that girl in the park keeps coming this way.”

“She's stopped for the moment, she seems to be waiting for something,” Fumiko announced. “We're heading towards Minako, we'll be on her in five seconds.”

“Thanks.” The entire exchange had taken only a few seconds, neither Rei or Ami having noticed or heard any of it. They were both staring at their former team-mates in dismay. “Right, you two, your friend Hotaru is about three hundred metres that way, into the park, roughly in the middle. Go and see if you can stop her and talk some sense into her. Aiko, go with them, in case they need backup, that girl is potentially very dangerous. We'll deal with these two. Minako is inbound, about a kilometre away, the other guys have gone to intercept her.” Ami and Rei looked at each other, then 'Yori', before nodding agreement. Aiko joined them and the three girls vanished.

“What about the security spell?” 'Azumi' queried. 'Yori' glanced in her direction, raising an eyebrow. “I mean, if they talk Hotaru around and go back to the temple, will you need to include her in it so Hnther and Lldnr'k can explain things to her?”

“No, not yet, it only covers the things we learned from Ami and Rei. She already knows all that so it won't affect them. It's a good, comprehensive spell. Not to mention it won't stop Ami telling anyone anything she wants since it's her who holds the 'keys' to the spell.” 'Azumi nodded her understanding, impressed. Her sister-in-law went back to observing the two fighting magical girls, assessing the situation.

“OK. One of them is down for the count, so at least Setsuna won't be turning up. Usagi is a possibility, but I hope not. She seems to be wandering around talking to herself near her home.
Michiru is quite a way away as well, so hopefully neither one will get involved this time.” The martial artist sighed. “Let's shut these two idiots down before someone gets hurt.”

“We could open a portal to the firing range and throw them both through,” the middle Tendo suggested, watching in amazement as the lightning-throwing girl missed yet again, blowing up a small truck near where the other girl had been, before she had jumped, just in time, onto the roof of the building it was parked in front of.

“Don't tempt me,” was the response. “They're suffering from some serious medical problems or I'd have done that a while ago, but even so...” ’Yori’ groaned as the blonde threw herself somewhat inelegantly at the brunette from the three-story roof, pulling a sword from somewhere in the process and swinging it wildly. Makoto screamed in rage, ducking and managing to avoid the stroke that could well have decapitated her, then managing to tag her opponent with the tail end of a burst of lightning in return, which struck the end of her sword, crackling through it and making her stiffen in shock, before dropping it.

“They really don't seem to be very good at this, luckily,” 'Chou' commented mildly, looking somewhat concerned. “Their fighting skills have suffered considerably.”

“Too much emotion and not enough practice,” her husband responded. She shook her head, then took aim, firing a ki ball at the blonde's sword, knocking it twenty metres away just as she was reaching for it. This provoked a yell of anger, although she didn't respond to the new attack, merely wound up for another energy blast at her original opponent, who almost managed to avoid it, only being blown a few metres by a glancing blow. “BOTH OF YOU, STOP IT!” 'Yori' shouted in a commanding voice.

“Fuck off, Yori,” the brunette yelled back, not looking away from the blonde she was attacking. “This is between us.” She fired yet another lightning attack, with considerable power behind it, at the other woman, laughing like a deranged idiot when she scored a direct hit, blowing her through the front window of a shop with an enormous crash and a shower of broken glass. The few pedestrians in the area who hadn't already run for it left rapidly, charging past a news van that pulled up a hundred metres away.

“Stay inside the glowing area,” 'Chou' called, the cameraman glancing at her and nodding, before going back to his job. He was no idiot, he knew when to stay back.

Sighing, 'Yori' fired a substantial ki blast at the blonde who was winding up for another, even bigger attack, knocking her flat with a loud bang and scorching her clothes. She shot forwards and tagged the brunette who ducked slightly at the explosion, blows too fast for most people to even see rippling along her body, causing her to drop unconscious without a sound instantly. 'The middle Tendo smiled grimly, then felt something worrying nudging her sense of danger, turning to see the other girl had reclaimed her sword, having landed nearly on top of it, and was building up an attack. Before even 'Yori' could react she fired a huge blast of magic that shook the street, energy rippling out at blinding speed from the weapon in a semi-circle, destroying half a dozen parked cars instantly and crashing into several buildings with the force of a small earthquake.

'Azumi' threw herself flat as the energy roared overhead, barely in time, watching with horror as it caught her sister in the side and threw her ten metres into the air. “Kasumi!” she shouted over the link, rushing to her sister, who landed on her side with a thud, none of her normal inhuman grace apparent. Behind her, 'Yori' let out a furious hair-raising growl like an enraged tiger, there was the screech of a ki beam firing, followed by a scream of agony, then dead silence, only the creaking of the affected buildings breaking it as they settled.

“I'm fine, sister, no major injuries. That was a very powerful attack, she must have used a lot of her reserves on it. I suspect it would have killed her friend, and definitely killed any normal person instantly. Luckily I managed to get a partial ward up just in time, but there wasn't any way to avoid it completely, from where I was.” 'Chou' sat up, wincing and holding her side. Her hand glowed as she ran it over her ribs. “That was very painful. I haven't been hit like that in a long time. It reminds me of some of Ranma's more interesting training methods.” Holding out her hand 'Azumi' helped her sister to her feet.

“Are you all right?” she asked with concern. The tall blonde smiled at her.

“I'll be fine. It was three ribs and some cuts, plus it knocked the wind out of me. It was a very powerful blast indeed.” The other woman looked past her to where it had originated, frowning a little. “Oh dear. I fear Ranma may have been pushed a little too far this time.” Turning to look in the direction her sister was looking, 'Azumi' stared.

'Yori' was standing over the slumped body of the other blonde, visibly glowing a baleful purple colour, emitting a cold aura that was perceptible from fifteen metres away, while the magical girl on the ground was staring at her in horror and pain. Her right arm was missing from the elbow down, the sword lying on the ground held in her detached hand, still smoking slightly at the wrist, the intervening bits completely vaporised. 'Chou' and 'Azumi' walked over, stopping a safe distance away. Squatting down very slowly, the martial artist didn't remove her gaze from the terrified one of the former combatant, who was whimpering in agony, fear, and incipient shock, all the fight gone out of her very suddenly.

“When I say stop, I mean fucking STOP! You are very lucky indeed that I am in a charitable mood or I would have removed your head not your arm. If you're incredibly lucky I might even regenerate it at some point,” she growled in a voice that resonated around the street as if she'd shouted it. No one dared speak. “You never, ever, attack my family or friends. This is your only warning. Do it again and you die. Understand me?” Haruka nodded, trying not to scream in agony, sweat beading on her brow. Reaching out the black-haired girl grabbed her upper arm above the cauterised wound, a purple glow rapidly surrounding the truncated limb and sealing it over with healthy skin. The blonde screamed in shock and pain, then slumped unconscious as 'Yori' put her other hand on her head for a moment.

Straightening up she looked around at her wife and sister-in-law, neither of whom spoke, then at Makoto. The brunette had regained consciousness and was sitting up painfully on the street, covered in dirt, staring at her former team-mate with stunned horror. Walking slowly over to her, 'Yori' produced an energy blade and pointed it at her from a metre away, the tip mere centimetres from her neck. The other woman flinched away, then froze at the look in the martial artists' eyes. “Do you want to keep on fighting, or are you going to see sense? I'm not in a good mood, so if you want to go on, I can save us both time and cut some bits off you right now.” Feeling the heat and the raw power radiating from the energy manifestation with a sense of worried terror, the brunette carefully shook her head.
“I'm done,” she said quietly.

“Yes, you are.” Before she could react, 'Yori' whipped her hand out and poked her between the eyes, a purple flash erasing her consciousness instantly. She tilted over to the pavement without a sound. Dismissing the energy weapon, the black-haired woman sighed, her glow fading away. “Idiots,” she mumbled, looking around at the half-destroyed street. 'Chou' approached her and hugged her for a moment.

“Thank you for not killing that poor girl,” she said quietly into her husband's hair. “She's not herself.”

“Damn lucky for her she didn't seriously hurt you,” the other woman replied as quietly. “Or she'd be a smoking hole in the ground right now.” They separated, smiled a little at each other, then the petite woman walked over to the blonde on the ground, looking down at her and shaking her head in annoyance. “Stupid, idiotic time machine. So much destruction and pain. When I figure out how, I'm going to take enormous joy in smashing the fucking thing into little bits.” She bent down and retrieved the sword, pulling the disembodied hand off it with ease, then flipping it onto the ground and vaporising it with a casual blast of ki. The sword she vanished. “I might give it back to her, I might not. If she can satisfy me she's worthy of it, perhaps.”

'Azumi' checked the time, noting with some surprise it was less than three minutes since they'd arrived. The amount of damage was impressive for such a short battle. She glanced over her shoulder at the news crew, who were still filming, glad she'd activated her bracelet. She wasn't keen on any of this being on the news. “What about them?” she asked discreetly, indicating the reporter and cameraman. 'Yori' looked up for a moment.

“They won't get much, we're both shielding pretty heavily,” she replied, a slight grin coming and going. Looking around at the destruction again she sighed once more. “What a mess.”

“Aiko, can you come and take these two to the temple, please,” 'Chou' requested.

“OK.” A second later the short brunette appeared next to them, looking around, then whistling. “Damn. It looks worse in person.” Bending down she picked up the blonde and slung her over her shoulder, waving to the brunette with her free hand. “Can you grab that one, Azumi?” she requested. The middle sister nodded, picking up the other unconscious woman, then returning. “Back in a moment,” Aiko said, before they both vanished.

The old priest looked up from a fascinating conversation with two of the most interesting people he'd ever spoken to, as Aiko and Azumi appeared on the other side of the room they had been using earlier, limp bodies on each young woman's shoulder. “Oh, dear,” he exclaimed, standing to examine the unconscious girls, then paled slightly when he noticed the blonde was missing a forearm and hand. “What happened to the poor girl?” he asked in shock.

“Yori did,” Azumi replied, looking grim. “This idiot pushed her too far. She tried a very powerful attack that came close to injuring Chou and nearly got me as well. That didn't go down well.”

“No, I can imagine it didn't,” the priest said, inspecting the new arrivals as they were carefully laid down, one on the sofa and one on the carpet beside it. “I warned Rei about that some while ago. Never get between Yori and Chou.” He smiled for a moment. “She healed the wound, I see.”

“Yes. I don't think she's in a generous mood right now, so this one may have to get used to having one hand for a while.” The silver-haired woman glanced at Hnther, talking to him in that demon language all Yori's friends seemed fluent in. He nodded, then bent over the girl on the sofa. “I told him Yori would like him to look into their mental problems while we deal with the others,” she explained, looking at the priest, who nodded his understanding. “Neither one of them is going to wake up for some time. Sorry, we have to get back, Minako is being awkward, and we're not sure about Hotaru yet. Plus there's a lot of clean up to do after the fight these two girls just had. We need to check for anyone trapped in the rubble.”

“It sounds like they really got into it,” he responded.

“Oh, definitely. It will probably be on the news, there was a reporter and her crew there.” Azumi sighed, looking at the two girls that both Hnther and the other demon were examining carefully. “As if the mall wasn't bad enough, this is going to seal their reputation as irresponsible idiots, I suspect.”

“Such a shame. They were so promising a few years ago.” He followed her gaze. “I hope Yori and Chou and the rest of you can somehow help them, my dear.”

“So do I, sir. So do I.” After a brief smile at him, she and Aiko vanished again, as he looked away from the flash.

Ami glanced over her shoulder when she heard a weird screeching sound coming from back where Yori and the others were, wondering what on earth it was. The scream of agony that followed it made her think that perhaps she didn't want to know after all. Pushing the thought to the back of her mind, she returned to listening to Rei talking to Hotaru, who was standing with her weapon raised across her body at an angle, looking like she couldn't decide whether to use it, drop it, or just start crying. “What the hell is going on, Rei?” the younger girl said in a voice full of hopeless worry. “Everyone has gone nuts. They destroyed that shopping mall yesterday, like it was full of demons or something, but they were laughing! And you and Ami helped those other girls stop them. I don't know if I should be angry or grateful. They were all shooting at me as well, I had to block them all, I even had to shoot back a few times just to save myself. Afterwards Michiru called me a little freak and said she never wanted to see me again!”

She sniffed a little, wiping a tear from her eyes before gripping her weapon more firmly, raising it warningly as Rei took a step forward. “Stay back. I don't know if I can trust you.” Rei sighed a little.

“Hotaru, you can trust both of us. We're your friends. How many years have we known each other?”

“A lot.” The younger girl kept her pole-arm raised between them like some sort of barrier. “But I've known the others just as long, and they're all insane. How do I know you're not like them?”

“Do I look insane?” Hotaru inspected her team-mate carefully, chewing her lower lip.

“No. But neither did anyone else until yesterday.” She thought about it for a few seconds more. “Why did you help those other girls against our own team?”

“Because what our people was doing was wrong. Fumiko and Tamiko are Yori's friends, they were trying to stop the others killing someone. You know the reputation Yori has. She's not going to let any non-combatants get hurt, and she's not keen on combatants getting hurt if it can be resolved with talking. Her friends are the same.” Rei stopped to gauge the effect her words were having on her friend. “Ami and I have been talking to her, and her friends, for hours. They've worked out a lot of what's going on and why and they're trying to figure out how to stop it. They're not our enemies, they may be the only hope we have, Hotaru. Please put that down and come and talk to them.”

The younger girl shivered. “I like Chou, but Yori terrifies me.”

“Me too, but at the same time I think I trust her. She's not so bad when you get to know her, and Chou is really nice.” Rei smiled at her friend. “Come on, Hotaru.” It seemed to be working for a moment, as the pole-arm slowly lowered, but suddenly it snapped back into position.

“Sorry, guys, I'll be back in a minute, I have to go help Yori,” Aiko abruptly announced out of the blue, vanishing with a flash as soon as the words were out of her mouth. All three of the others looked at where she'd been standing, listening, then at each other. They shrugged a little.

“She does that,” Ami commented.

“ Weird,” Hotaru mumbled, before apparently remembering the issue at hand, snapping her eyes back to Rei's, who sighed very slightly. The black-haired girl looked at Ami, frustrated.

“You try. I'm running out of arguments.” Stepping forward the other woman smiled at her friend.

“Hotaru, Rei is right. You need to believe us. Something is seriously wrong, yes, but Yori and her friends can help. The others all have a medical problem, aside from anything else, and there's a lot more to it as well.” She pulled out her computer, opening it, as Hotaru took a precautionary step back. “Look, you've seen me use this for years, right?” After a moment the younger girl nodded. “Trust me, I just want to scan you for a second, to check something. I think it will answer some questions. Is that OK?” Eventually, her team-mate nodded again, more warily, looking like she was on the verge of running.

Slowly and carefully, feeling slightly like she was dealing with a skittish animal, Ami scanned the other woman, then looked at the results. She sighed a little. Hotaru looked worried. “What is it?” she asked in a somewhat shaky voice.

“Yori worked out that something was affecting everyone, causing damage to their brains, at different levels. It's complicated, but we have a good idea why. The thing is that my computer had been... hacked, I suppose you could say, although that's not quite right, so it didn't show the problem. One of Yori's friends fixed the hack, so now it's accurate again. Look.” She turned it so the other girl could see the screen. “You see? I did a complete health check. It registering the various minor problems we already know you have, but here, it's registering something wrong with your brain. It's something called the amygdala, it's very important in forming memories and a lot of other things as well, including emotional development. Everyone has the same damage, to one degree or another. Setsuna and Usagi are very badly affected, Rei not too much, and I wasn't at all bad, but we all have it. Or had it, Yori has already fixed it in me, Rei, Usagi, and Setsuna.” Hotaru stared at the screen for several seconds, reading the report the small device was scrolling up next to some graphics illustrating the problem. Ami let her think it through.

“That's what's making everyone crazy?” she finally asked. Ami nodded.

“Partly. There's a lot more to it, but that's one of the serious problems. You're not as bad as Setsuna or Usagi, from what I can see here, but you're worse than Rei. It's making you paranoid and prone to anger, I think, if the others are anything to go by.”

There was another pause. “Yori can fix this damage?”

“Yes.”

Hotaru looked hopeful. “Does that mean that they'll go back to normal?”
Rei, Ami slowly shook her head, making the purple-haired girl's face fall again.

“It's more complicated than that. But it will help, even though it's not a complete instant fix.” She smiled sympathetically at her friend. “Just come back to the temple with us. We can explain it completely there, you need to hear it from Yori and her friends, it's too complicated to get into in the middle of the park.” About to reply, Hotaru twitched as Aiko abruptly reappeared a few metres away, a sudden look of fright crossing her face, then slowly diminishing. She took a couple of deep breaths.

“Are we being attacked?” she asked, raising her weapon a little. Ami studied her for a moment or two.

“Sort of. Like I said, it's really complicated. We need your help to fix things, as much as we can fix things, if we don't it's going to get much worse. People could end up dead. Including us.” Not looking completely convinced, Hotaru opened her mouth, then closed it again without saying anything. She looked around at all three women for a long few seconds, then sighed, lowering her pole-arm so the butt was lying on the ground, then suddenly dropped it and fell to her knees, tears running down her face. Aiko discreetly picked the weapon up and moved it to the side, out of immediate reach, as Rei and Ami both approached the girl and knelt down beside her.

“It will be OK, dear, we're going to fix this. Somehow. We have some very smart and powerful allies now, Yori and Chou are amazing. You wouldn't believe all the things they know, the things they can teach us. Trust me, they're all good people, and we need their help.” Ami hugged her young friend, who burst into tears, sobbing and hugging her back.

“I just want things to go back to the way they were before all this crazy stuff happened,” the girl cried. “Michiru thinks I'm a freak. Setsuna was looking at me in a weird way as well. Even Haruka was making nasty comments, much worse than anything I've heard for years. She wants to kill Makoto, she spent all last night talking about how the next time she saw her she was going to cut her head off, in a way that made me think she meant it. Usagi is just mean, and Minako was really scary, even worse than Haruka.” She looked up at the blue-haired woman holding her. “You and Rei are the only ones that are even close to normal. I'm scared about what might happen. If that mall yesterday had been open...” She shuddered. “We could have killed a lot of people.”

“I know, Hotaru. It worried me as well. It still does. But, hopefully, we can figure out a way around all this, with some help from some good people.” Ami helped her friend to her feet. “Come on, let's go back to the temple, you can rest there and get something to eat, then we can explain the rest of it.” She rubbed her forehead tiredly with one hand, looking worried. “It's not going to be nice to hear, some of the story is... upsetting, at best, but as far as I can see it's all true.” Looking worried again, Hotaru nodded silently.

“Oh, the other thing, Hotaru?” Rei smiled comfortingly at her friend. “Don't panic when you see Hnther and LiDrn'k, please. They're mages, friends of Yori, who really seem to know their stuff, but they're...” She glanced at Ami, who shrugged. “Well, they're a bit unusual.”

“Unusual, how, exactly?” Hotaru asked suspiciously.

“Um... They're kind of... um, demons...” Rei finally admitted quietly. The other woman gasped, then looked instinctively around for her weapon, which was on the ground five metres away with Aiko standing on it, just in case. “Don't panic! They're friendly, not evil at all. Honest, you'll like them,” Rei hastened to assure her. After staring at her friend for a long moment, Hotaru slowly relaxed slightly.

“Demons? Friendly demons?”
