Timeless

by cynical21

Summary

What happened after Justin left for New York

Notes

This is NOT a quick read. It will run to many, many chapters, and it will take quite some time to publish. Furthermore, not a single chapter will prove light or frothy. In addition, I make no apologies for the fact that I adore Brian Kinney. Thus, anyone who does not feel the same will probably want to avoid this story like a big dose of ebola.

Standard declaimers apply. I write this as a labor of love, and make no profit from it.

Also, as usual, if you're looking for sweetness and light and fairy tale romance, you're in the wrong place.
Chapter 1

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*

It was only time. He had said so himself.

Only time.

Except that it was time without end, and he had known it from the beginning.

But that wasn't quite right either. One element of it was infinite, true enough - the part that was the absence of the young man who had once been the center of his world. But another element - the primary element - would end when the moment was right; when the damage inflicted by time's relentless passage would make it impossible to continue the existence he had embraced throughout his life.

Less than a year passed before he knew that he had been right from the beginning. He had allowed himself to watch from a distance - had followed the articles in the Times and in the art magazines and read the insider reviews that Lindsey thoughtfully provided for him, and things were turning out exactly as he had expected.

Justin was taking the New York art scene by storm, heralded by virtually every critic as a "new, sexier version of Jackson Pollack".

His first big exhibition was only three days away, at a very exclusive, very prestigious little gallery called Bergéree in the East Village.

Brian had received a personal invitation a week earlier, followed by dozens of messages on his answering machine, confirming the time and the place and the circumstances.

He had answered none of them, and failed to RSVP.

It was not that he didn't want to go, didn't want to see Justin. Didn't want to walk into the place where he would find the young man and promptly throw him down and fuck him through the floor. Yes, that was exactly what he wanted to do.

But he wouldn't.

First of all, it would be counterproductive. That time had passed. And secondly, it would violate the only rule he'd ever cared to live by: no excuses, no apologies, no regrets.

Brian Kinney did not allow himself to regret anything, and if, perhaps, there was a quiet spot deep in his heart - a dark, locked space contained within a pristine wall which was full to the brim with the tears he never allowed anyone to see or fathom - it was absolutely no one's business but his own.

Beautiful hazel eyes - eyes that had mesmerized an entire generation of gay men, along with a not insignificant number of women, gay or otherwise - gazed down into the dark amber of his drink and did not focus on the memories that stirred in his thoughts.

He did not allow himself to dwell on the past, or to ponder any questions of what might have been. He had never once, for example, reflected on the fact that he had volunteered, during their very brief formal engagement, to give Justin exactly what he'd always claimed to want - total commitment, total love, total acknowledgement of his feelings. Of course, Justin had ultimately realized that a devoted, committed, totally faithful Brian was not the Brian he had fallen in love with. At almost the same moment, Brian had realized what Justin would be giving up in order to become his spouse, and known immediately that it was a sacrifice that he could not accept and Justin would one day grow to resent.

It had been an intensely busy year.

Thus he had come to the only conclusion he could reach. Their commitment to each other - their love for each other - was simply not meant to be. So he'd found other things to occupy his time.

He had rebuilt Babylon, even though he'd meant to sell it; he had canceled the sale of his loft, and the purchase of the big estate that Justin had wanted to christen "Bri-Tin", had grown his business into a huge success, with offices in Philadelphia and, just recently, in New York, although he never went there himself. He had even invested time and effort in a little private project of his own involving honest-to-God manual labor, and who the fuck would ever believe that about Brian Kinney. And he had regenerated his old lifestyle, in a renewed effort to fuck any new man who caught his fancy, although he never again broke his rule about no repeats.

He had built a good relationship with his son, taking him on a trip to Disney World and spoiling him with designer duds for tots and an obscenely huge pile of expensive toys. He forced himself to spend holidays at Debbie's house so he could be a peripheral part of a family unit, and he and Mikey occasionally engaged in familiar adolescent behavior, to renew their connection to each other.

But inside, Brian remained alone. And more so with every passing day.

He sat on his horrendously expensive Italian sofa and spent a moment gazing at the framed photograph of his son, and listened as the phone rang. He made no attempt to answer it, and was not surprised when the voice on the answering machine sounded weary and frustrated.

"You're not coming, are you? I think I knew it all along. It's really . . . over. Isn't it?"

There were a few seconds of silence, the sound of a deep breath being drawn, and a soft click.

Brian glanced at his watch. Almost ten, but not really too late.

He dialed the familiar number quickly, and was inordinately grateful that Lindsey's dulcet tones greeted him, rather than Melanie's brusque rumble.

"Are you going to New York?" he asked, without preamble.

"Yes, of course," she answered, not even bothering to chide him for rudeness. "Shall I meet you there?"

"No," he said sharply, "but I need a favor."

He explained quickly and succinctly what he wanted and then waited for Lindsey to respond. There was a heavy sadness in her voice when she did.

"Brian, why do you . . ."

"Will you just do it, please? Or do I need to make other arrangements?"

"I'll do it," she said quickly. "But can't you at least . . ."

"Oh, for Christ's sake, can we please not have another session of Dyke Psych 101?"
He could almost hear her frown. "Mel's right. You really are an asshole."

"Which has nothing to do with what I asked. So . . ."

"I'll do it," she answered with a sigh, "But I don't have to like it."

"No," he agreed. "You just have to do what I asked."

"And you?" she snapped. "What are you going to be doing?"

"Same as always," he replied easily.

"Brian," she said, after a slight pause, "we've talked to Debbie several times lately. And we've heard some ugly rumors about things happening in the Pit. Gay-bashing. Vigilante crap. Nasty graffiti on some of the Liberty buildings. Shit like that. Is everything okay? Are you . . ."

"Awww," he drawled. "The kwazy wesbians are worried about wittle old me? I'm touched."

"Don't be touched," she snapped. "Be careful. I don't want to have to explain to my son why his daddy had to depart to shop in that great Armani superstore in the sky."

Brian heard the genuine concern beneath the strident tone, but refused to respond with equal candor. "You know me, Linds. I'm indestructible."

In the small townhouse in Toronto, Melanie leaned forward across her partner's shoulders and called out her greeting. "Night-night, Asshole."

"Sleep tight, Cunt," he responded, equally loud.

He hung up and spent a few moments gazing down into his glass of JB. It was still early, and Babylon would be filled with energy and music and bright lights and plenty of firm young bodies, any number of whom would be more than happy to court his favor and suck his cock.

On the other hand, the semi-concealed doorway to the little space which he had come to consider his inner sanctum was slightly ajar, dark and offering no hint of what lay within it, but somehow not the least bit forbidding. The fruit of his own labors. He knew it was a little silly, but he was rather proud of his accomplishment.

He poured himself another drink . . . and went seeking sanctuary.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

tbc
Chapter 2

Melanie came down the stairs, barely stifling a yawn, and paused at the landing to watch her partner/lover/better half (much better, she sometimes admitted, but only to herself) page through the colorful brochure that she and Justin had designed to send to potential buyers and collectors, to whet their interest in his upcoming exposition.

But this was, apparently, not just an idle review, as Lindsey was busily scribbling on a yellow pad, taking notes on something.

"What's up?" asked Melanie, as she descended the last three steps.

"Just jotting down a few points."

Melanie lifted one quizzical eyebrow. "What kind of points?"

Lindsey did not look up to meet her partner's dark eyes. "Just . . . points."

Melanie grabbed the brochure and jerked it from Lindsey's fingers, and thumbed through the bright, glossy pages. She skipped over a brief bio of the artist, and a few reproductions of favorable reviews - skipped over a photo of Justin and a synopsis of the gallery and its history - skipped over a couple of pages displaying a selection of impressionist works, distorted visions of familiar objects rendered from strange perspectives. Compelling and stark and arresting, but impersonal - almost cold. Melanie kept scrolling through, until she came to a portrait - a face barely etched against shadows, a not-quite-profile rendered in dark values. Then she looked up and saw the shadows move in Lindsey's eyes.

"This one," she said, tapping her finger against a distinctive chin.

She turned more pages, until she came across a slender shadow limned against a scintillant light, a silhouette of dark hair against darker gloom.

"And this one."

More paging, more images, and then . . . a face. Pale, unfinished, vague. Unmistakable.

"And this one, most of all." Then she leaned forward and took the tablet from Lindsey's hand and saw immediately that she was right.

Her smile was just slightly smug. "How much is he willing to pay for them?"

Lindsey sighed. "No limits. Only . . ."

Melanie's smile shifted, touched with a wisp of sadness. "No names." It was not a guess.

"Right. No names."

"Any more?"

Lindsey nodded. "Just one, but it's not in the brochure. I'm not even sure he plans to sell it, but he might. Now."

"Why does he always have to be such an asshole?" Melanie demanded. "Why couldn't he just . . ."

Lindsey stood and moved forward to wrap an arm around her partner. "How quickly they forget," she quoted with a small smile.

"What do you . . ."

"You stood right there in our old house, just a few days before we left, and you told him that he had to be good to Justin, that he needed to remember how much Justin was giving up to be with him."

"Yeah. So?"

"So," Lindsey looked over toward the mantle where there was a framed snapshot of Brian and his son, "he remembered."

"And what? He gave up what he wanted? For Justin's sake?" Melanie laughed, and it was not a pretty sound. "Brian Kinney? Are you out of your fucking mind?"

Lindsey just smiled. "Am I?"

She dropped a kiss on Melanie's cheek, quickly put her things away and went up to bed, while Melanie just stood and watched, not even bothering to try to conceal her skepticism.

Brian Kinney? Sacrificing his wants and desires for someone else's happiness?

Bullshit!

She looked down then at the image of Justin's face - a semi-profile sketch that graced the front of the pamphlet - a minimalist effort that focused on the huge eyes and the mop of hair and the smile that had earned him the nickname, Sunshine. The smile was beautiful; he looked really happy. And yet - was there really a shadow of sadness in those lovely eyes?

Would Brian have given up everything he wanted, just to be sure that Justin was able to reach for his dreams? Brian Kinney?

Bullshit!

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"Ma-ah-ah!" wailed Michael, stretching the single syllable into three as his palm cradled the cheek his mother had just slapped. "What'd you do that for?"

"Because you're not listening to your mate," she replied smartly.

"And that's your business because?"

"Because he's right," she observed, with a cheeky grin for her son-in-law who was pouring soy milk over his serving of oatmeal (a dish that Debbie usually referred to as 'turds and whey').

"You should listen to your mother, Mikey," said a husky voice as a new arrival slid into the empty spot on Michael's left. "Be a good little wifey and obey your lord and master."

"Shut up, Brian!" Mikey snapped, not particularly in the mood to be teased - or to be addressed as 'Mikey'.

Brian spotted the smirk on Emmett's face as the big Nelly-bottom dumped sugar in his coffee.

"Somebody piss in his Cheerios?" he asked with a wink.

"Piss off!" snapped Michael. "Not that it's any of your business, but I don't see why I should have to go traipsing off to New York just because the twink has an art show."

Brian ducked just in time to avoid the flash of a spread hand that smacked the side of Michael's head with a sharp snap.

"Ma-ah-ah! Will you stop?"

"Shame on you," retorted Debbie. "That 'twink', as you so charmingly put it, is a member of this family, and we all need to show him our support."

Brian opened his mouth to respond, but wisely subsided when he saw that Debbie was still poised to strike.

"Hey, Brian," said Ted, from his seat in the corner, with his own version of a twink cuddled up beside him, "care to car pool?"

Brian flicked a spec of dust - more imagined than real - from the sleeve of his Armani jacket before fixing his accountant with a frigid stare. "Car pools are like boyfriends," he answered with a snarky smile. "I don't do either."

"So," said Emmett, pursing his lips to blow on his still steaming coffee, "when are you leaving, and where are you staying? The Ritz, maybe? Or the Plaza? Or are the two of you just going to rough it in Justin's little flat?"

"None of the above," Brian replied. "And what does a man have to do around here to get a cup of coffee?"

"Don't get your Prada panties in a twist," snapped Debbie, leaning over to fill his cup. "And stop dodging the question. Where are you staying?"

"Rubens at the Palace," he answered, bending over to inhale the aroma of his coffee. The table went silent until Ben, Michael's partner, spoke up. "That's quite a commute."

Brian said nothing, lifting his cup to take a cautious sip.

"What is that?" asked Michael with a grin. "A hide-away for gay porn kings?"

"It's a beautiful hotel," answered Ben as he studied Brian's face. "In London."

Michael blinked rapidly. "You . . . you're going to London?"

Brian nodded.

"After the show?" said Emmett, suddenly overwhelmed with visions of men in Elizabethan costumes and the changing of the guards at Buckingham Palace.

Brian sipped before answering. "Instead of."

"You little shit!" cried Debbie, getting right down in his face, shoving forward to slosh his coffee, although he was agile enough to avoid the splash.

Brian, unperturbed, looked up at her and smiled. "It's business, Mother."

"Business, my fat ass!" Her eyes narrowed. "How can you do this to him? You know it will break his . . ."
"He," Brian cut in sharply, "is a hell of a lot stronger than you - any of you - give him credit for. He'll be fine."

"But . . ." Michael paused to avoid spluttering. "But we could all go together. Explore the Big Apple. Find their version of Babylon - shit like that. Why would you . . ."

"I told you. It's business."

"Business!" snapped Debbie. "And all the English ass you can fuck."

He grinned. "That too. We're considering expanding our operations 'across the pond'. Good for business . . ." the grin widened and grew slightly venal . . . "and good for me."

Somehow, although everyone at the table heard what he had said with perfect clarity, it was somehow not as loud as what he hadn't - quite - said.

"Debbie?" he said, after a moment of silence.

"Huh?"

"Breakfast?"

"What?"

"You planning to feed me, or . . ."

It was uncertain who was more surprised when she simply straightened up and went to order his omelet.

The question ringing in everyone's mind remained unspoken, but it continued ringing nonetheless.

Brian had a meeting to make - as always - and although he firmly believed in being fashionably late, he never pushed it to the point of rudeness. So he finished his omelet, drained his coffee cup, gave Michael a quick, thorough kiss on the mouth - designed to annoy Ben to no end - and made his exit.

The silence that lingered in his wake was deafening.

Blake left quickly, followed by Ben, both having jobs to attend, leaving behind the crucial core of a friendship that went back almost twenty years - the crucial core, minus one. The critical 'One' - the one who had always been the nucleus around which the others revolved.

Michael had been focused on tearing his napkin to shreds. Once that was done he looked up and stared at Ted. "Is he serious?"

Ted, as Brian's primary accountant, was eminently qualified to answer. "He might be," he admitted. "Some of our big clients have been making noises about expanding into European markets."

"But he could open up a branch over there without actually having to go himself," Emmett pointed out. "He did it in New York. Still hasn't been there, has he?"

Ted shook his head. "Left it all to Cynthia. Bet she never dreamed how lucky it would prove to be when she hitched her wagon to the star of the fag prince of Pittsburgh."

Debbie sat down beside her son, offering coffee refills to the three before serving one for herself.
"And you don't find that the least bit suspicious?" she asked. "The fact that he once was so caught up in going to New York that he was ready to sell his beloved fuck nest, and now he can't be bothered to drop in, even when he owns an office there?"

Ted stared into his coffee. "I think maybe . . . there's nothing left here to hold him."

"It's his home," Michael insisted.

Debbie stirred her coffee while gazing out into bright, liquid sunshine, and was suddenly struck by a memory - the look in Brian's eyes on the day Justin had left for New York. He had been quintessentially himself on that day, brash and sardonic, witty and acerbic, supremely confident. And yet - she had never been sure of what it was that she had glimpsed in those hazel depths from time to time, and she knew he would never tell her.

But it was enough to make her wonder. Michael believed that Pittsburgh was Brian's home.

But she wasn't so sure. She wondered, occasionally, if he had been forced to stand still and watch as every vestige of home had turned and walked away - with his blessing.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

tbc
Chapter 3

Debbie Horvath, nee Debbie Grassi, AKA Debbie Novotny for much of her life, knew a thing or two about secrets and how to keep them. And another thing or two about pain, although no casual acquaintance would ever have entertained such a bizarre notion.

Debbie was belly laughs and crude humor, a foul mouth and an indestructible will, not to mention the Italian equivalent of a Jewish mother - squared, according to her only son.

But for all her brass and sass and superficial willingness to bare her own soul and everybody else's, Debbie knew full well which secrets needed to be aired and discussed and lampooned and exposed to a blast of fresh air, and which ones needed to be kept.

Brian Kinney was the perfect example of the latter.

There were only a handful of people that could lay any claim at all to knowing Brian, in other than a Biblical sense, of course. In that sense, the number of those with intimate knowledge of him was legion, and getting larger every day, or even every hour on some days.

But those numbers didn't count, although Brian would have disputed that premise vigorously.

But beneath all the glitz and the fucking and the raw sex, the number of people who had ever been admitted into the tiny enclosure at the core of his existence was very small: Mikey, of course, who knew him best of all in some ways and, strangely, not at all in others; Justin, who knew him intimately but only through the eyes of love; Lindsey, who would probably have been his wife if they'd been straight, who accepted him for exactly what he was and who knew way more than she was ever willing to tell; Debbie's brother, Vic, who had finally succumbed just two years earlier to his HIV affliction after fighting it off for decades and who had had an uncanny ability to see through the bullshit and understand Brian better than almost anyone else. And Debbie, who believed - rightly or wrongly - that she knew him as no one else ever would or could.

It might have surprised her to learn that Brian sometimes agreed with her, but it would not have surprised her at all to know that he wasn't particularly pleased to acknowledge it. Brian preferred to live beneath the layer of camouflage that he'd created. He preferred to remain unseen and unknown, except for the surface persona that he allowed everyone to see, and, for the most part, Debbie accepted that. Except, of course, for those times when she deemed the horseshit a little too thick and him a little too smug and in need of a subtle (or not) application of ego-busting.

Still, as she set a huge dish of cannelloni on the table and watched her husband and semi-permanent boarder (and the newest addition to her not-quite-adopted family) dig in, she was conscious of a vague disquiet lingering in her mind - a sense of impending gloom, if not doom. Was Brian really considering leaving Pittsburgh, and, if he was, what did it really mean?

Michael had told her once about an episode with his best friend, a quick little moment when Brian had mused about the perfection of those who had lived hard and died early, remaining forever young and beautiful, like Kurt Cobain and James Dean and Jim Morrison.

She realized suddenly that she had never once been able to visualize Brian as an older man: Brian at 40 or 50; Brian as anything but young - and beautiful. And it bothered her, although she had no idea why.
"Yummy," said Emmett, not quite drooling, but coming close as he sniffed at the aroma of his pasta. "Debbie, you are sooo not good for my waistline, but who the fuck cares?"

She favored him with a smile. "You'll work it off later, Sweetie. Isn't it Cowboy night at Babylon?"

Emmett helped himself to a big slab of garlic bread. "It is," he answered with an exaggerated sigh. "Twinks in chaps, oh my God! A veritable parade of forbidden fruit - emphasis on the fruit, of course."

"Why forbidden?" she laughed. "I thought the idea was . . ."

"Oh, it is," he agreed. "It's just that they're all so eager to shake those fabulous little tushies in Brian's face, that the rest of us feel a little . . . left out."

She winked at him. "But it doesn't usually take him long to make up his mind, leaving the field clear for the rest of you. Right?"

"What a wonderful way to look on the bright side!" he laughed. Then he frowned. "But he's not . . ."

"Not what?" she asked, as he hesitated.

"Just not quite . . . himself," he replied. "Not so quick on the uptake. Not so instantly interested, if you know what I mean."

She stared. "If you're trying to tell me that Brian Kinney has lost interest in fucking the latest twink-of-the-day, then I need to start getting ready for the Second Coming."

"No. Nothing like that. He's still the undisputed king of the fast fuck - not to mention the first fuck. He just . . . I don't know. It's like his heart's not in it."

Debbie chuckled. "Honey, his heart was never in it. Only his dick."

He smiled and continued eating, and she wondered, not for the first time, why he wasn't three hundred pounds of blubber.

Across the table, her husband, Carl, folded his newspaper and took a big swig of his beer. "You boys aren't going out cruising by yourselves, are you?" he asked, wiping his mouth on his sleeve.

Emmett sighed theatrically. "Alas and alack, mon amis. There aren't many of us left to cruise, since Ted's found his one true love in Blake and Mikey's wrapped up in wedded bliss with Ben. And Brian - well, Brian doesn't really cruise, does he? Never had to. So that pretty much leaves little ol' fabulous moi. Right?"

"Yeah, whatever," answered Carl who was still, even after all the time he'd spent getting used to Debbie's world, not always comfortable with Emmett's flaming gayness. "But just be careful, OK?"

Debbie fixed her husband with a suspicious glare. "What's up, Carl? What do you know that you haven't shared with us?"

He took a big bite of cannelloni, possibly hoping that Debbie might just let it go if he took long enough to chew and swallow.

No such luck. Her gaze was steely and unwavering.

Carl allowed himself a small sigh of frustration. "I don't really know anything. But there are rumors going around. Seems like Stockwell is making a little noise, trying to get back in the picture, and gay-bashing would be right up his alley. Let's face it; he tried to downplay his homophobia last time out, and it didn't work, and there are plenty of homophobic assholes out there who would love to see him succeed in his agenda." He paused and studied his plate, obviously not wanting to have to meet his wife's eyes. But he knew she wouldn't be content until she knew it all, so he looked up, and pretended not to see the small flinch when she realized that he was trying to avoid saying something she would not want to hear.

"Let's face it, Honey. Prop 14 only failed by a tiny margin, and its supporters are still around and still itching to put all the queers in their places."

"Or their graves," she snapped.

He didn't bother to argue, taking another sip of beer before going on. "And we all know that his trial was just a big joke. No way was he going to be convicted. Even after all his nasty little secrets were exposed, he still had a lot of supporters, and he's got a long memory. And now, he's got some new financial backing," he continued gently. "You remember Chris Hobbs?"

"How could I forget the little bastard who got a slap on the hand for nearly killing our Sunshine. Why?"

"His father and grandfather are among Stockwell's financial supporters, and that's some big money, and big money still talks around here."

Debbie waited, knowing there was more.

"And . . ." Carl looked as if he could hardly believe it himself, "Justin's father too."

Debbie recoiled as if she'd been slapped. "How . . ." She paused to take a deep breath, and tried again. "How could he do that? After what they did to his son, how could he . . ."

Carl shrugged. "How could Brian's mother celebrate the fact that he got cancer as a 'reward' for his deviant lifestyle?" He reached out to touch his wife's face with gentle fingers. "I don't know how, Honey. I just know that there's trouble brewing. We like to think we've come a long way since Matthew Shepherd, but sometimes I think we're just fooling ourselves. There's been more vandalism in the neighborhood lately, and more street fights. That Casey kid from down on Quinton Street wound up in the hospital when he tried to defend his cousin against a street gang. Neither one of them is gay, but the cousin is small and a little effeminate, and somebody apparently decided that he was close enough to crossing the line to need a little lesson. He got off with a few bruises, but the other one - bigger and stronger - wound up with a broken arm and cracked ribs."

"Jesus, Carl," said Debbie. "You really think . . ."

"Can't prove anything," he replied, "since there were no witnesses. The cousin claims the toughs said they were gonna make sure he was never tempted to turn faggot; they deny it. But I don't think there's much doubt. They wouldn't dare pull shit like that if they didn't think they'd get away with it."

He took a deep breath and dropped the other shoe. "I think he's looking for payback, Honey. He's out for blood."

She went very still and her eyes were suddenly dark with shadow, and he knew immediately what she wanted to ask. But she didn't, and her silence was a major indicator of how frightened she was to hear the answer.

The two of them stared at each other, both having forgotten that they weren't alone at the table until Emmett cleared his throat. Debbie turned to look at him and was momentarily stunned to see that there were tears in his eyes.

"Did I hear you right?" he asked, barely audible. "Did Brian's mother really . . . really say that to him?"

Debbie frowned at her husband, before leaning forward and putting her arm around Emmett's shoulders. "That she did, Honey. But we shouldn't have mentioned it in front of you. Guess we've just gotten too used to having you around, but you know him well enough to know that Brian wouldn't want you to know about it. So if you ever mention it to him, he'll probably cut off your balls and feed them to you with milk and sugar, for breakfast."

"But . . ."

"But what?" she asked when he seemed reluctant to continue.

"But he's . . . Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake. How could she . . ."

She smiled. "And that makes him a hero, doesn't it? The entire gay world wants to fuck him, or to be him - or both." Her voice hardened. "And his own mother gloated when he was stricken with cancer. What does that tell you?"

Emmett shook his head. "That life sucks?"

She hugged him closer. "Sometimes, even for Brian Kinney."

Emmett was not, somehow, as surprised as he felt he should be.

And Debbie - Debbie played with the food in her plate, falling silent as she drifted back in time, as she allowed her mind to call up old memories and old images: Brian at 14, black and blue and bloody and broken, hanging on to consciousness with the last of his strength and remaining rigidly silent when pressed to explain the injuries. Brian at 15, stumbling to the door at two in the morning with his clothing torn and filthy and his back a mass of bloody welts, in agony but refusing to cry. Brian at 16, pulling himself up onto her porch with his one functioning arm, barely able to stand, with blood pouring from a swollen lip as he held himself at a strange, awkward angle to spare him some measure of the pain from broken ribs.

Brian - hurt and bludgeoned, and yet still - somehow - beautiful.

The physical abuse - or the marks it left at any rate - had ended when he got old enough and big enough to defend himself, but the physical abuse, as bad as it had been, had never been the worst of it. She didn't know when - or if - the emotional and spiritual abuse had ended.

Sometimes - even knowing all she knew about what had made him the man he was - he made her so angry that she wanted to just beat the shit out of him herself. But she never would, because someone, at one time, had done quite enough of that, never managing to make the tiniest dent in the armor he wore around him.

Mikey knew, of course, and she was pretty sure that Brian knew, as well, although she'd never really told him. She was proud of her sons - the one of her blood, and the two of her heart - and she loved them both, even if she didn't always want to. She loved him, and it hurt deep inside her when she remembered how few were the people who understood that he deserved to be loved, and that he was capable of love in return.

He was, after all, Brian Kinney; out and proud - make that double-proud - and as arrogant as a young god. So, she thought with a rueful smile, what's not to love?

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

I love the night life.
I got to boogie . . .

Michael felt the rhythm pound through his bloodstream as arms wrapped around him from the back, and he felt the firmness of a massive dick move against his ass, and he smiled, not stopping to realize that some people might have thought it a little strange that he recognized the touch of that body as easily as if it had belonged to his life partner. Which it didn't.

He turned within the framework of those arms, and gazed into smoky hazel eyes that always seemed to spend a tiny fraction of time staring directly into his soul before glazing over with the warm luster of casual lust and affection.

Michael blinked and wondered if there would ever come a time when the first glimpse of Brian's face didn't make him catch his breath, just a little, and raise a mental fist against whatever gods might be. Nobody deserved to be that beautiful.

Brian offered him that smile - that smile that was only for Mikey, or so he told himself - and took his mouth in a hot, lingering kiss, but only after making sure that Ben was watching. Michael knew, on one level, that he should refuse the honeyed sweetness of those lips; knew that Ben, even though he seldom said anything, didn't much care for the sight of his husband being semi-devoured by the ranking gay stud of Pa. or for the fact that Michael was always Brian's first dance of the evening, whenever the couple visited Babylon. But Michael could not bring himself to break the pattern. Not because he enjoyed the kisses, although he did. And not because he never quite got enough of watching and feeling Brian writhe against him, although he didn't. But those weren't the reasons he was reluctant to change things. His reasons were more simple than that. He didn't resist Brian's kisses because he was the only person who still had an opportunity to do so. Because Brian didn't kiss anybody else, any more. Not like this.

Oh, he might drop a quick smooch on Em or Lindsey or some casual acquaintance who managed to claim his attention for a little while. Or even Cynthia, his girl Friday, on occasion. But real, deep, tongue-filled kisses were reserved for only one person. He only kissed Michael; everybody else he just fucked, one way or another.

They moved to the music for a while, body to body, until another set of arms, surprisingly strong, slipped around them, making Brian the filling of a queer sandwich. He leaned back, turning his head slightly, to brace against a buff shoulder, and fitting himself into the space beneath the brim of the silver spangled cowboy hat worn by the new arrival.

"Why, Grandma," he drawled with a grin, wriggling his hips suggestively, "what a big . . . basket you have!"

Emmett laughed and nuzzled against the dampness of the soft hair at the nape of Brian's neck. "The better to fuck you with, my prince."

Brian laughed. "In your dreams, Queenie." But there was no hostility in words or tone, and he was content to continue dancing, braced in the arms of both his friends. And Michael reflected that this too was something new. There had been a time, not so long ago, when Emmett would have been hesitant to approach Brian, unless specifically invited to do so; when, if he dared join their little duet at all, he would have stepped in to embrace Michael, avoiding intimate contact with Brian's sculpted body. These days, he no longer had such reservations, although he undoubtedly knew that there were lines drawn in the sand that he would be foolish to cross.

Nevertheless, Michael thought, as he watched how Brian allowed his big Nellie friend to enjoy the closeness of their bodies, there was a sweetness about the image of the two of them together, and neither seemed eager to pull away from the intimacy.

Until the inevitable happened. One moment, the three friends were moving as one; the next a new arrival shoved his way into the tableau, and Brian was suddenly targeted for individual attention.

Emmett watched and smiled as a sweet young thing in fawn-colored suede - chaps, vest, boots, and hat - draped himself against Brian's torso and wrapped well-muscled arms around his neck.

"I been looking all over for you," said the young man.

"Yeah?" Brian's smile was just slightly arch. "For what?"

"They say . . ." Dark, thick-lashed eyes fluttered closed as Brian wrapped an arm around a slender waist.

"They say . . . what?" he asked, pressing close.

"They say you're the best. They say nobody fucks . . . like you."

The smile became a grin. "And you always listen to what 'they' say?"

The lithe body scooted closer. "Shouldn't I?"

Long-fingered hands gripped slender arms, hard enough to bruise. "How the fuck old are you?"

"Eighteen," came the answer breathlessly. Then the young man leaned close enough to whisper. "Legal, and old enough."

Brian smiled, and wrapped both arms around the boy's waist, resting his hands on the ass cheeks left bare by the chaps. Then he began to walk, pushing the firm young body along ahead of him.

"Brian!" Michael called after him. "We need to talk."

Brian didn't pause. He just turned enough to shout out his answer. "Later."

"But . . ."

Then he did pause, to maneuver his young partner around in a quick spin so he could see Michael's face. "Later, Mikey. Right now, I've got a lesson to teach." He smiled into dark eyes, and stroked a soft cheek with the back of his hand. "This won't take long."

Then he continued on his way to the back room.

"Shithead!" Michael muttered, to no one in particular.

Emmett, engrossed in an inspection of a line-up of chaps-clad bare bottoms, getting ready to compete for the title "King of the Babylon Cowboys" heard the note of disgruntlement in his friend's voice, and managed to drag his eyes away from the rosy mounds of flesh long enough to offer up a sympathetic hug.

"Let it go, Michael," he said, leaning close enough to be heard. "You know you're not going to change his mind. Brian Kinney doesn't do changing his mind."
"Yeah, but . . ."

Emmett deliberately looked away, not because he didn't want to see what was in Michael's eyes - he already knew what he would see there - but because he didn't want his young friend to see what might show in his own.

It wouldn't do for Ben's partner to realize that the whole world knew the elemental truth about what was in his heart. He was truly devoted to Ben - truly cared for him, truly loved him.

But his heart belonged to Brian, and always would.

"Where are you going?" Michael demanded as Emmett strode away, adjusting his spangled hat to a rakish angle.

"So many rosebuds," replied Emmett with a sweeping gesture toward the row of chaps-wearers, "so little time."

~~~~~~~~~~~*

*I Love the Nightlife - Alicia Bridges/Susan Hutcheson

tbc
"I didn't do it for you."

Emmett had to bite his lip to suppress the grin that wanted to break out in response to that statement as he wondered how many times Brian had spoken those exact words over the years, with exactly the same intention - to find a way to do a friend a favor and simultaneously perpetuate the image of Brian Kinney, self-serving prick.

"Of course you didn't," he agreed, "but my mama would whup my little ass until it was beet red if I didn't smile and say thank you at the appropriate moment, and that would really cramp my style. Who, after all, would have any interest in a beet red Nellie bottom, hmmm? So thank you anyway, even if it's all just one-hand-washes-the-other business."

Brian did not - quite - roll his eyes, but Emmett knew it was a near thing.

"You just make sure that my client's diva princess slash bitchy-cunt daughter gets the fabulous wedding of her dreams, so I get the fabulous contract of my dreams and make lots of fabulous lovely money."

Emmett adjusted his silver hat with a flourish. "Not to worry, Dahling. An Auntie Em wedding is becoming the newest status symbol for the nouveau riche, so serving your interest also serves mine. Getting in bed together is good for both of us."

Brian blinked. "Leave it to you to phrase it that way."

On impulse, Emmett dropped a quick kiss on Brian's cheek before whispering in his ear. "Not to worry, Hot Stuff. I won't tell a soul."

And Brian laughed out loud - a lovely, liquid, robust sound that Emmett found charming one moment, and melancholy the next, as he realized how long it had been since he'd heard it. He drained his Cosmo for lack of something better to do, and in order to conceal the softness in his eyes - a softness that he knew Brian would not appreciate.

"So," said Michael, sidling up to the bar with Ben draped around him like a cape, "how was your twinkie?"

Brian smiled, ignoring the slightly snarky tone of the question. "Hot, tight, eager, sweet..." The smile became a grin..."and currently cream-filled - metaphorically speaking, of course."

"You're disgusting," snapped Michael.

"And you, little prince, are pathetic," replied Brian, completely unperturbed. "Every time you venture out of your rose-covered cottage, you get your panties in a twist."

"Why do you want to go to London?"

"Because it's there?"

"Stop dodging the question. Why are you . . ."

Brian spun and leaned back against the bar, positioning himself so that he could study the crowd for potential fuck-candidates, and offered his response with a bit of a throaty growl in his voice. "Because I want to have tea with the queen and check out the arse on the fabulous Prince Harry. Because I want to see what it takes to make the palace guards drop trou and bend over. Because I want to fuck my way across Piccadilly Circus and get sucked off as I float down the Thames. Because I want to hear how sexy that accent is when some Anglo-twinkie begs me to fuck him. Why the fuck do you think I want to go?"

"I think . . ." said Ben.

"Nobody asked you," Brian interrupted.

Once more, Emmett hid a smile, and wondered - as he often did - if Ben ever realized how much amusement he provided for Brian, especially whenever the professor donned his veneer of urbane sophistication - although that was absolutely not what Brian called it - exactly as if he were putting on a clean shirt.

Michael, meanwhile, was rolling his eyes. "Have you thought about this?" he demanded. "Really thought about it, I mean. Just imagine all the stuff we could all do together in New York. Especially considering how much we didn't get to do the last time we were there - also because of Justin. We could go to Times Square and Central Park and the Empire State Building and Radio City Music Hall, and . . . oh, oh, go see The Lion King on Broadway and shop at Bloomingdale's and eat at the Brooklyn Diner and go see Letterman and . . . I mean, I know we'd have to attend Justin's big show first, but we could make it quick, you know. We could pop in and . . ."

"And listen to smug, supercilious, pedantic, cunty little critics with bad comb-overs expound on the social significance of Dadaism and the deliberate negation of traditional artistic values while they surreptitiously check out your charming little ass and try to figure out how to maneuver you into the men's room. Then later maybe we could loiter at the Carnegie Deli to try to catch a glimpse of Liza and her entourage." He paused and regarded Michael with a lifted eyebrow. "Or maybe just cut to the chase and get mugged on the subway. All part of the attractions of the Big Apple."

"You don't have to be so sarcastic," Michael replied, not quite pouting - but coming close.

Brian looked up and spotted the steely spark of anger in Ben's eyes, there and gone in a blink, and he smiled. Then he carefully draped his arms over Michael's shoulders and pulled him close until they were eye to eye.

"Mikey," he said slowly, "listen to me. Are you listening?"

Michael huffed a dramatic sigh. "Of course I'm listening."

"You do not need me to go to New York with you so you can do all those things. You just grab the old ball and chain, strap the kid into his car seat in the rented minivan, and book a suite at the Plaza. Then you proceed to seek out all kinds of famous places to introduce to a little fag PDA and the sight of your fabulous little bum - Yankee Stadium, Broadway, the Brooklyn Bridge, the Guggenheim . . ."

"Jesus, Brian! Is everything about sex to you?"

Brian didn't even bother to try to frame an answer; he simply gave his oldest friend the look he always used when he wanted to say, "Are you fucking kidding me?" without actually saying anything at all.

Even Ben had to laugh.
"But I still don't understand why . . ."

Brian shifted and leaned forward to whisper three words in Michael's ear. "Yes . . . you do."

And Michael had a moment of epiphany, realizing that he did, indeed, understand. Then he had to turn away from his old friend, to conceal the surge of melancholy within him, not so much for what he knew as for what he did not know. He had always believed that no one knew Brian as well as he - that no one else understood him at all. He had only recently come to realize that there were many facets of Brian's personality, his core, that no one knew. Not even him; not even Justin. Maybe not even Brian himself.

But the bottom line was that Brian would not react well to any suggestion of pity, no matter the source, and it was the height of stupidity anyway - for Michael Novotny Bruckner to waste a single moment feeling sorry for Brian Kinney - the model for Rage himself, the super hero with powers like no other.

Except that there was something . . . something only half-formed and still seeking definition. Something that was not quite as it should be. Something not quite . . . Brian.

"Hey, Emmy Lou," Brian drawled, "don't look now but your Southern Comfort just walked in."

Emmett's face lit up as he turned to greet his current love interest who was actually a very old love interest: Calvin Culpepper, of the Hazlehurst, Mississippi, Culpeppers, was striding toward him, sculpted torso bulging in all the right places under a red satin western shirt that looked more poured on than worn.

They had kissed good-bye that morning when Calvin had departed for his new job as a physical therapist at Allegheny Hospital, and they had met up for lunch at the diner, but the intensity of the greeting between them would have been appropriate for soul-mates reuniting after months of separation.

Brian watched, wearing a small, enigmatic smile. Neither Michael nor Ted had yet come to accept Emmett's new obsession, both holding on to their doubts and their skepticism, given their old friend's less than spectacular track record in relationships. But Brian, for no reason that anybody could discern, had welcomed the new arrival with typical sardonic humor, if not exactly open arms, and Calvin had blossomed under the attention, apparently able to see Brian with unambiguous clarity, without the filters created by years of exposure and experience.

And there had been an unexpected benefit from his fresh perspective; Emmett had begun to see things he had not noticed previously - things that initially surprised him, until he realized that these things had been a part of Brian all along, only no one had bothered to try to interpret them. Then he had wept for the loneliness such a realization implied.

It reminded him of the title of an old Star Trek episode (dear to him because he'd always loved the manly physiques of its stars - along with the fledgling but innovative liberalism of its philosophy): Who Mourns for Adonis?

Who indeed - and Adonis would certainly never mourn for himself.

"Rico," called Brian, gesturing to capture the bartender's attention, "cosmos on the house for my friends."

"And for you, Mr. Kinney?"

Brian turned as the sultry, cultured voice fell on his ear, almost like a caress.
"You're not Rico," he said flatly, one quick glance taking in thick dark hair, cobalt blue eyes, lips that curved into a sweet smile that begged for licking and exploring, broad shoulders, muscled arms, and a narrow waist.

"No, sir. I'm Tony. Rico's mom's in the hospital, so he asked me to fill in for him. Hope that's all right with you, Mr. Kinney."

Brian smiled and did not quite succeed in concealing his disappointment. "So . . . you work for me, right?"

The tall, buff young man glanced at his watch. "I do now - but in eleven minutes, I won't any more."

Brian leaned forward. "Maybe you'd like to explore your . . . possibilities," he said softly, thick lashes dropping to camouflage the hungry gleam in hazel eyes. "In the back room." He turned and started walking away, pausing to glance up at the clock above the bar. Nine minutes to midnight. He turned back, and his smile was hot enough to melt steel. "Just . . . walk slow."

"Bryan?" Michael called after him, the insipient whine in his voice threatening to break out into full-fledged frustration.

"Later, Mikey."

Michael was looking slightly bewildered. "What the fuck was that all about?"

"Jesus, Michael," said Ted. "You've known him all your life, and you still don't know that he doesn't fuck the hired help?"

With great deliberation, Tony, the interim bartender, nodded to the young man who had just arrived to relieve him, carefully logged out of his computer access, and removed the western-style vest and spangled hat he'd been given as his costume for the evening. Then he moved around the bar and started toward the back, moving very slowly.

"Shit!" muttered Michael. "Poor fuck doesn't know what he's getting into."

Emmett drained his cosmo as he turned to stare into Michael's eyes. "Don't be silly, Sweetie. Of course he does. Just like everybody else here does. Granted, he's no saint, but one thing Brian Kinney does not do is lie - or make promises he doesn't intend to keep. He just fucks; that's what he does, and that's what most guys want from him. It's what he was born to do. I mean, how many men do you know who can qualify as a walking wet dream - the way he does. You, of all people, should know that."

He paused and caught Ted's eye, and knew that they were both thinking the same exact thing. Michael should certainly be familiar with that effect; he had, after all, spent his whole life studying that trademark strut as Brian walked away from him.

Michael watched until Tony disappeared down the stairs; for a moment, he even debated following him, and trying to make Brian see reason and understand how childish and perverted his actions were, but then he looked up and saw Ben's eyes, dark and shadowed and filled with something he couldn't quite identify.

"Is he ever going to grow up?" he grumbled turning back to the bar.

Emmett and Ted exchanged another look over the top of his bent head, and both of them heard the response that they thought they should offer - but didn't.
Still, in their minds they heard it anyway. It was just two words, unspoken, but loud enough, somehow, to drown out the thumpa-thumpa.

"Are you?"

It wasn't much to look at, day or night, light or dark. It was small, cramped, old, faded; the heating was problematic, at best, and the plumbing only barely functional. The walls were slightly less grimy than when he'd moved in, but only because his mother, on one of her whirlwind visits, had refused to leave him to live in such squalor and dragged two bags full of cleaning supplies up four flights of stairs, before proceeding to scrub everything in sight and resort to the use of caustic cleaners to remove years' worth of crud from the tiny toilet and miniscule sink that were the flat's only concessions to the concept of indoor plumbing.

The bed was narrow and lumpy; the furniture, warped and barely functional, and he'd been there just long enough to figure out that it would be just as miserably hot in high summer as it was freezing cold in dead winter. He had no kitchen, no shower (unless he ventured downstairs and waited his turn in line, inviting the speculative gazes of the two cougars who shared the fairly large apartment in the third floor southern wing or a groping by the elderly old queen who occupied the studio apartment across from the community bathroom). He had only one real window in the flat, and it looked out toward the roof of the adjacent house where he was pretty sure he was an object of great visual interest to the middle-aged bus driver who lived there.

His flat (he couldn't bear calling it a 'loft', even though the term would have been appropriate) had only one thing to recommend it; fully half of the north-facing wall had been replaced by a sloping skylight, exposing the cramped, dingy little room to the most beautiful, pure, natural light that was available within the five burroughs. And that, of course, made everything else unimportant. It didn't matter if he didn't eat here (although he did bring in take-out and his mother had insisted on buying him a tiny fridge for milk and juice and beer) or bathe here (Daphne's cousin never seemed to mind when he borrowed her shower, although she did sometimes stare at him a bit strangely) or even sleep here (although he mostly did). What mattered was that he painted here; he dreamed here; and he remembered here. This was where he lived.

He stood before his skylight and gazed out into the darkness, his left hand lazily rubbing the soft skin beneath his navel. There was little to see at this hour of the night, although there was never real darkness in the City. He looked up and tried to find a star in the night sky, but gave it up quickly. Nothing to wish upon - and no wish worth making.

In two short days, if any small percentage of his agent's customary bullshit could be believed, he would enter the ranks of "Self-Supporting Artists" - those who not only earned critical acclaim, which he'd already achieved in some small measure, but also a living wage, or the beginning of one anyway. Monica was convinced that his exhibition would be successful enough that he might even be able to get out of Bed-Stuy and upgrade to someplace in the Village.

He thought she was probably being overly optimistic and, maybe, just a trifle patronizing.

His stuff was good; even he knew that. But it was also something of an acquired taste. He knew that too. Although the art world was more tolerant and less condemning than other venues, it was still a bit of a stretch for the casual collector to be able to contemplate work that was blatantly homosexual in nature without a tendency to cringe away and turn the eyes elsewhere, resorting to surreptitious glances to satisfy both curiosity and any more prurient interests.

Still, it was good - original, fresh, even riveting in some ways, and completely non-derivative. He just didn't know if it was good enough.

And he didn't really know if it mattered, for he couldn't quite ignore a tiny little voice whispering deep in his mind, reminding him that the one person for whom it was intended, the one to whom it was meant to speak, would never see it.

Brian was gone - and Justin wasn't stupid enough not to know why. He had even known it from the beginning, though he'd tried to deny it.

This was his dream - his chance to light up the world with his art and his gift - and he would never do that if he insisted on clinging to his past. He knew it; he understood it; he even believed it.

It was what he wanted, and he was poised on the brink of success.

But what would it mean without . . .

He knew that Brian would never come for him, never step up to get between him and his dreams.

Never fit in to the world he wished to conquer.

It infuriated him that Brian had made the choice for him - that he had chosen to remove himself from the equation, to eliminate temptation. In some ways, he wanted to drive to Pittsburgh and storm into that exquisite loft apartment, and tell the prick exactly what he thought of him - before throwing him down and fucking the shit out of him.

He was enraged - and he was grateful, because he knew himself well enough to know that he would not have been able to make the choice on his own - grateful because Brian had chosen for him.

His hand drifted lower, and he slipped his fingers around his engorged cock and sprawled back on the bed, imagining other fingers touching him, working him, invading his body and sending him up into the stratosphere of euphoria. Brian's hands. He had always loved Brian's hands. And Brian's smile. And the sultry fire in those incredible hazel eyes. And the lines of that exquisite body. And Brian's dick. Absolutely like no other.

Shit!

He needed to get up and get dressed if he had any hope of being on time. Steven had scored tickets for Grey Gardens at the Walter Kerr Theater, and he would be very upset if Justin ran late - although he certainly knew by this time that the young artist had been thoroughly infected by a former lover with a love for the drama of arriving late enough to be the center of attention for avid eyes. And Justin still drew 'avid eyes', everywhere he went. He didn't notice it much himself, but he knew it to be true. It had been Brian, of course, who had drawn his attention to it; Brian, who had always bolstered his sense of his own beauty.

Brian - always.

Steven was a lovely man, probably the perfect man for Justin. Bright and educated and sophisticated and elegant. And very eager to introduce his young lover to the cultured, eclectic lifestyle he lived, centered around his recently remodeled brownstone in Soho. Steven was an investment counselor with a prestigious Wall Street firm - a product of old money and impeccable breeding and a family tradition of erudition and political connection. He was also quite beautiful and a skilled and generous lover.

And he loved Justin and wanted to marry him, without reservation and with every intention of allowing Justin to pursue whatever dream he might choose to seek.
Steven was perfect, except for one small fact.

He wasn't Brian.

But Brian was gone, and Justin knew that he wouldn't be coming back, knew that Brian had foreseen what Justin had refused to accept - that Justin Taylor, artist of world-wide renown, would never be able to co-exist with Justin Taylor, husband of Brian Kinney.

It was truly a case of two different worlds in which he could not exist concurrently.

And the rules they had established so long ago no longer applied, of course. To either of them. He was sure that Brian had moved on - that he no longer limited himself to one sampling from any of his multitude of fucks, that he no longer returned to the loft every night, that he no longer withheld the sweetness of his kisses from his trick of the moment.

Strangely, breaking those rules - the ones that he himself had imposed - had proved to be the hardest step to take. But he had managed it, because he knew he must, and because he could hear in his mind the scornful laughter of his ex-fiancé if he had admitted to such sentimentality.

He did love Steven. He really did.

With a deep breath, he pushed himself off the bed, ignoring the half-hearted protest of his semi-hard dick, and went to retrieve his best suit - the Armani that had been selected and tailored for him for . . . but best not to think about that.

Steven was waiting. Maybe it was time to join him - and give him what he wanted, like an answer to the invitation he had delivered just yesterday, an invitation to spend the next two weeks at a fabulous resort in Tahiti, where splendidly appointed guest cottages were built out over the water and one could look down through a transparent floor to watch the magic of ocean life on display in a turquoise-tinted paradise.

Exquisitely romantic - and everything that Brian Kinney would never be.

Maybe . . . it was time.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

tbc
"You scared the shit out of me, Kiddo," said Margo Renton, administrative assistant, social secretary, and Jill-of-all-trades for Maxwell Bates, owner of the Bergerie Gallery, an exclusive little showplace for up and coming, avant garde artists. Like young Justin Taylor. She was fanning her face with a copy of his brochure, her hand clinched at her chest.

"I'm sorry, Margo," Justin answered with an apologetic smile. "When I saw the lights on and realized that someone was still here, I thought I'd just check in, and see . . ." He paused, and rosy spots erupted on his cheeks.

Margo, a painfully thin woman with eyes as dark as Renaissance-era stained glass and cheekbones to die for (he thought he'd like to paint her someday as a stereotypical representative of dykedom, even though she claimed she wasn't) was not given much to sentiment, but she couldn't quite resist favoring him with a tiny smile. "It's okay, Honey. First time out of the gate is always traumatic. So . . . you want to walk around, and take a look?"

"Can I?" he asked, almost afraid to believe.

"You may," she said pointedly, with a glance at her watch. "If you hurry. No time for a leisurely stroll - I do hope to get home in time to actually spend a few hours in my bed - but a quick pass should be okay."

"It's pretty dark," he observed, stepping forward slowly.

"In that case," she answered, stepping back behind the ultra-modern, angular reception desk and reaching for a concealed switch, "let there be light."

She watched with a small smile as Justin walked slowly to the center of the display area and then simply stood, surrounded by his art - the accumulated production of his life. None of it was new to him, of course. And all of it was new to him.

Along the left hand wall, portable display panels featured his impressionist work - abstract and emotional, almost turbulent, even bordering on violence once or twice. Here was his passion: lust, love, terror, rage, his biting need to strike back, to avenge himself and to reach out and grab the things he hungered for, to possess that which he desired; strong shapes and silhouettes, studies of light and shadow rendered mostly in shades of ochre and gold, in earthtones with slashes of crimson and copper, slashed through with blades of obsidian and swirling tempests of brilliance, lurking beneath dark seas under a swollen, bleeding sun. Colors that might have been reflected in eyes that never seemed to be the same color twice, eyes that changed with the seasons and with the passions that touched the heart.

Farther in, a group of haunting sketches and bright portraits and still-life studies had been arranged to compliment each other - faces, bodies, an open hand, a length of rope draped over a fencepost, a lock of hair that curled around a strong jawline, fingers that stroked a swollen penis. Two women, locked in a steamy embrace; a faded jacket draped across a chairback; two men, silhouettes only against a twilight sky; a little boy burying his face against his father's shoulder; a classic Corvette streaking down a rain-swept highway; a child asleep on an old quilt; two hands clasped - man and child; a dirty city street, neon-lit and lurid; broken pottery and tarnished brass; laughing faces, frowning faces, pensive faces - joy and sorrow; hope and despair, certainty and doubt.
On the opposite side, brilliant sprays of color formed the foundation for his graphic efforts - things that had been created in the same place that had given birth to Rage and Zephyr and J.T. - massive bodies and muscles contrasted with slender grace; dark justice tempered by luminous mercy; unswerving purpose touched by whimsy. It was the art of the streets, of the masses - the art of childhood dreams and fantasies and nightmares.

His eyes swept over it all, and he felt his heart start to race with a rare, unexpected sense of accomplishment.

Then he moved forward, his eyes finally finding what he had really come looking for. The art . . . of Brian.

Strangers or casual acquaintances might not have recognized the identity of the model for all of the pieces arranged along the back wall of the gallery, especially since some of the images were shadowed and unclear, and many were only fractured glimpses of a profile or a feature. But anyone who knew Brian Kinney - really knew him - would recognize him at once, needing only the most minimal clues; the sardonic lift of one eyebrow, the sensual half-smile barely touching sculpted lips, the strong lines of a broad back tapering into a slender waist. Brian, walking away, his face only just visible but something in his posture or the cant of his head announcing that he was trying not to laugh; Brian sprawled in an easy chair, illuminated by a pale lamp, lost in thought; Brian at rest, eyes closed, bare and beautiful and totally natural; Brian in the shower, or running on a treadmill, or relaxing in a spa. Brian thinking; Brian laughing; Brian brooding - dancing, drinking, working, smoking . . . grieving. Only one like that. Brian . . . beautiful.

"Fuck," said a cultured voice, close enough to send warm air into the blond strands at the nape of Justin's neck. "I really, really want to hate him, but . . ."

Justin turned to smile up at Steven Fletcher. "But?"

Steven shrugged. "But I can't. Because you make me see him through your eyes." He paused then, and moved closer, studying one particularly bold image, featuring Brian standing at a window with his arms crossed, a cigarette dangling from his lips and smoke curling around his face. "Is he really . . . that beautiful?" he asked finally.

Justin looked away quickly, but not quickly enough to hide the flicker in his eyes. "This," he said with a sweep of his hand, "doesn't even come close. He's the most vital, most intensely alive person I've ever known. Bigger than life; bigger than . . . anything."

"And yet," said Steven, reaching up to brace his hand against Justin's shoulder, "here you are."

Justin nodded. "Yeah. Here I am."

The rest remained unspoken, but Justin didn't have to be a mind-reader to know what Steven was thinking. If Brian Kinney was truly the love of his life, what was Justin doing in New York?

It was a question that he frequently asked himself - and just as frequently could not answer.

"Well?" said Margo, moving forward to adjust the spotlight on a charcoal sketch of Brian, asleep at his desk with his head propped on folded arms. "Does it please you?"

"Oh, yes," Justin answered, his smile more than justifying his nickname, although no one in the city even knew his nickname, which pleased him for some reason he didn't care to explore. "You've done a beautiful job. But . . ." his gaze swept the room.

"Ahhh," she responded, a glint of something ambiguous in her eyes, "you're wondering about the "piece de resistance, aren't you? Well, it's in the perfect spot, assuming you decide to display it. Have you . . . decided, I mean?"

"Not really," he answered, shoving his hands into his pockets. It was a curiously touching gesture, making him look even younger than his twenty-four years. He had lost no time in shedding the suit coat and the tie he had worn to the theater, and was now completely relaxed in dark pants and a white dress shirt, sleeves rolled up and half unbuttoned. Margo thought his appearance perfectly charming, and achingly young.

"We're getting down to the wire, Hon," she said gently. "You're going to have to decide . . . soon."

"I know."

Steven wandered a little further into the room, absorbing the energy and the beauty of Justin's work, allowing the young artist to follow with his eyes. Classically handsome, with dark hair, gray eyes, a sculpted face that always wore just a trace of stubble, and a tall, beautifully conditioned body, Steven looked perfectly at home in the elegant setting. He looked around the room, obviously savoring the items that caught his eye, but he couldn't quite resist glancing at the shadowed area at the top of the small, spiral staircase in the rear corner of the long, narrow room.

The gallery was not particularly large, but it was quite impressive. It had been converted from an old brownstone, and the contractor had carefully preserved the original lines and classic details of the structure. The main display area took up most of the ground floor, excepting only the shallow vestibule and reception alcove and a small utility area providing space for a tiny kitchenette and a powder room. Upstairs there was a balcony that overlooked the main display room, leading to two offices - one for the owner and the second for Margo herself - and a small, secure area for storage of art work awaiting display or sale. In addition, there was a shallow offset, located directly adjacent to the stair well, and it was in this choice location that the gallery often displayed the primary feature of any exhibition. Featureless walls, covered with charcoal-colored raw silk, formed an octagonal chamber, a simple setting, with nothing to distract the eye of the viewer away from the room's focus. The lighting was dramatic and deliberate. Anyone who stepped into the alcove would see the artwork - and only the artwork.

Such was the case now, pending Justin's decision.

There were two paintings set up on easels in the tiny niche, both covered with soft, dark drapes, with nothing else in the room except some tasteful greenery to soften the angles of the walls and floor. There was no window, no furniture. Nothing but the art.

The best things he had ever done, and he knew it - knew, in fact, that they were the best things he ever would do.

What he didn't know was whether or not he could bear to part with either of the two, or even allow anyone to see them.

One he'd finished only a few days before, using a tiny photograph to refresh the image in his mind, but mostly working from memory, calling up a vision of a powerful moment he knew he would never forget; the other he'd done just before he left Pittsburgh, and had kept completely to himself, except for one person. Lindsey had seen it when she'd come to help him pack up for the trip - seen it and gone to her knees, rendered completely speechless.

She'd never managed to say a word about it, but then, she'd never needed to.

He knew it was a masterpiece, that it had the power, in and of itself, to make him an artist of great critical acclaim.

If only he could stand to expose it to the world.

"Justin," said Steven, very softly, "I understand that this must be difficult for you, that your art is very . . . personal. God! Is it ever! Anyone could see that, and feel it. You have a huge gift, to be able to reach out and touch people where they live. But if you really want to light up the world, to make people see life as you see it, as you want them to see it, you have to . . ."

"Let it go," Justin supplied, when it was obvious that Steven could not go on.

Steven confined his response to a quick nod.

Justin stood in silence for a moment, eyes closed, his breathing shallow and steady and calm, careful to betray nothing of the massive conflict that arose in his core whenever he tried to resolve this issue. Steven was right; it was difficult, but only Justin truly understood why. It wasn't simply a matter of opening up his past, allowing people to see it through his heart; it was a matter of releasing his hold on it.

To share it was . . . to give it away.

When he opened his eyes, Steven was staring at him, frowning slightly, obviously discomfited by what he read in Justin's face.

"You're right," Justin whispered, stepping forward and starting up the stairs. "You're so right."

"Justin? What are you . . ."

The blond artist paused and turned to look down at the dashing young man who only wanted to give him the world - Paris, Florence, Vienna . . . Tahiti, for God's sake - who offered so much and asked so little.

"It's time," he said, his voice carefully emotionless, "to let it go."

Steven looked away quickly, unwilling to allow his young lover to interpret the flare of emotion in his eyes, but Justin had already resumed his climb and seemed to be focused on nothing but the shadowy alcove where the heart and soul of his work were cached.

Steven, meanwhile, turned back to study the display on the rear wall and moved closer to examine a particularly striking portrait in which hazel eyes, half hooded by a fringe of long lashes, contrasting beautifully with a crimson shirt, looked up at the artist solemnly, without a single nuance of humor or passion or emotion - a portrait of repose which should have been boring, flat, without depth or meaning - but wasn't. It shouldn't have been able to speak at all. Instead, it spoke volumes. It said, "You can look; you can want; you can seek. You can even touch. But you will never own."

Bastard.

Steven was careful to say nothing, to allow nothing to show on his face. But inside, beneath the layers of sophistication and the meticulously crafted public persona, he could not deny the existence of a fleeting urge to reach out and destroy what he knew he could never have. If he was very lucky - and very clever - he would achieve his goal; Justin would be his. But something deep inside him, in a place that he never allowed anyone to see, confronted a truth that he would never be able to change; he might manage to be the last to claim his young lover's heart, but he would never be the first.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
The executive office of the owner of Babylon was neither large nor lavish, but it was distinctly Brian Kinney. There was very little furniture in the small room, but each item was a gleaming example of Mies van der Rohe's genius. There was only one painting, but it was an original by an artist who was currently unknown, but wouldn't be for long. Only one photograph occupied a place of prominence on the sleek surface of the desk, but it offered a likeness of an exquisite face, captured in a moment of bright laughter, and it was displayed in an antique Tiffany sterling silver frame. A bank of monitors covered one wall, the only visible evidence of a state-of-the-art security system. One decanter - Waterford crystal - containing Brian's favorite whiskey.

Spare. Lean. Elegant.

Like the man leaning back in his executive chair, illuminated only by the single lamp that provided the sole source of light in the room that had no natural light of its own - no windows, no skylights, no reflections. He was more shadow than substance, but it was an elegant shadow - black Armani suit with jacket unbuttoned contrasting perfectly with a shirt of scarlet silk by the same designer, limned only by the lamp's indirect glow.

He wore scarlet often these days, and wondered if anyone ever remembered that Justin had always loved it when he wore that color. He rather hoped that no one would make the connection.

In front of his desk, two men sat in Bauhaus chairs, waiting in comfortable silence as Brian poured out three shots of JB.

"You're looking good, Brian," said the larger of the two.

Brian smiled. "Thanks, Drewsie. You too."

Drew Boyd, star quarterback of the Ironmen and only recently outed, allowed himself a small grin. "Emmett's the only one that's ever called me that."

Brian leaned forward, and there was something almost predatory in his posture. "You're lucky he didn't call you a lot worse."

The quarterback's eyes flared with a brief flash of anger, before he remembered the full circumstances of his final meeting with Emmett. Then he nodded slowly. "Yeah. You're right."

Brian smiled, silently reflecting that there were only a few people who would credit that he could admire a man's willingness to face truth without flinching. Still, he thought Boyd might be one of those who could understand and appreciate his attitude.

"So," he said after distributing the glasses, "what brings you here?"

Boyd leaned back in his chair, savoring the smoky sweetness of the whiskey. "Thought I'd do you a favor."

Brian's smile was just slightly venal. "Do you really think I need your . . . favors?"

Boyd laughed aloud. "Don't be cheeky. Remember, I've seen you in your underwear."

"That's hardly a distinction."

"Anyway, I meant a different kind of favor. I hear you're looking to beef up your security."

For the first time, Brian allowed his gaze to wander, and to drift down and back up the body of the individual seated at Boyd's side. Broad-shouldered, buff, perfect six-pack, flat belly, dark hair and eyes and a lovely cleft chin (a feature that Brian always found difficult to resist). This time, however, he'd make an exception, because he'd have no choice. This guy was straight - interesting, but straight. What a shame!

He looked the stranger straight (no pun intended) in the eye. "I take it that the beef he's talking about . . . is you."

"It is. My name is Lance Mathis, Mr. Kinney."

"He's my cousin, Brian," said Boyd. "But he's a good man, for all that."

Brian nodded, studying the newcomer's face more intently. "Okay, let's get down to brass tacks, Mr. Mathis. I know queer when I see it, and I know straight. I'm never wrong. So how are you going to feel when - notice I didn't say 'if' - you have to stand up to a group of your fellow breeders in defense of a bunch of fags or a couple of drag queens?"

Lance Mathis smiled. "Do you know where I got my start in security? I grew up in Hyannisport. Near Cape Cod, you know. And my father worked his entire life for a pretty well-known family there. You've probably heard of them. And if there's any family, anywhere in the world, that's more devoted to equal rights for everybody, regardless of race, religion, sexual preference, I can't imagine who they'd be."

Brian smiled. "Which would make you . . .?"

"Extremely well trained."

But Brian was not yet convinced. He leaned forward and braced his chin on his clasped hands. "Maybe we need to be a little clearer here. I frankly don't give a fuck about your political correctness - or lack thereof - or how liberal your family background might be or how much you're into the peace movement or Zen Buddhism. What I want is a strong man who knows how to use his fists when it's necessary, who fights when he needs to - not because he believes in the cause but because it's what he gets paid to do. That's what I'm looking for. Not some do-gooder crusader who'll get carried away in his devotion to truth, justice, and the American way, or some such crap. So can you deal with that, or do I need to look elsewhere?"

Mathis stood up and leaned forward, extending his right hand. "You're a straight shooter, Mr. Kinney. I didn't expect that, so no bullshit about my beliefs or my liberal leanings. Just my assurance that you'll get what you pay for."

Brian took the hand and shook it firmly. "Can't ask for more than that. You can start tomorrow. I assume you're expensive."

"The best always are."

Brian poured another round of drinks before pushing back and propping one Prada-clad foot on the corner of his desk. "I couldn't agree more."

After Boyd and Mathis left his office, Brian spent a few minutes reviewing proposals for upcoming promotions and signing off on those he approved. Then the monitors lining the left-hand wall of the executive office flared to life as the big front doors were opened and regulars began to pour through the entrance, after getting the nod of approval from the over-sized muscle man that Brian had christened the Gatekeeper. Sipping at his whiskey, he sprawled back in his chair, spent a moment gazing at the lovely face looking back at him from the photograph on his desk, before spinning slowly to check the images on the monitors and gauge the size of the crowd. Then he smiled his satisfaction when he glanced at the exterior scenes to see the thick line wrapped around the block.

Another big night at Babylon; another sizeable chunk of change in his pocket.

He did not move nor turn his head when a discreet knock sounded at the door.

"Brian?"

"Hmmm?"

"Got a minute?"

Lazily, he spun away from the monitors to look up at the tall blonde standing just inside the doorway.

His smile was minimal. "Barely. It's . . . Brett, isn't it?"

The blonde's smile was a trifle slow in forming. "Actually, it's Brandon."

"Oh." Brian let his gaze settle on the computer monitor on his desk, obviously uninterested in continuing the conversation. "Sorry about that. I'm not good with names." He paused then, reaching out to tap in a command on his keyboard and then waiting a moment to check out the data that came up on the screen. Only then did he look back up at his visitor's handsome face. "Was there something you wanted?"

"Not exactly," said the man who had set out to topple Brian's position as the most desired man in Pittsburgh just the previous year - and failed. "Just wondered . . . can I sit down?"

With the regal aplomb of a king of the realm, secure in his arrogance, Brian nodded toward a chair. Privately, he had long since admitted that their little competition had been an exercise in stupidity. Still, it had been a victory, albeit a small one in the grand scheme of things. Nevertheless, in a world where failure was too frequently the norm, he always reminded himself to savor the triumphs. Even the small ones.

The visitor seated himself, and Brian waited, feeling not even a slight compulsion to break the silence.

Brandon braced his elbows against the arms of his chair, and steepled his fingers. "This is a little awkward."

One single lifted eyebrow was the only indication that Brian had even heard him.

Realizing at last that Brian was not going to give him any kind of verbal cue or comfortable opening, the blonde leaned forward abruptly and focused his gaze on Brian's eyes. "I want to know why."

"Why . . . what?"

"Don't fuck with me. You know what."

Brian shrugged. "It's been a long time. Why are you asking . . . now?"

Brandon tilted his head and examined Brian's expression closely. "You're a busy man."

It didn't really qualify as an answer, but Brian let it pass. Then he decided abruptly that he didn't much care for this game. "I am indeed. As for your question, the answer is simple. Sometimes, a man discovers that having something is not nearly as much fun . . . as wanting it. Your ass is charming enough, but in the end - if you'll excuse the expression - it's just an ass, not really very different from any other."

Brandon blinked. "One might say the same . . . about your cock."

This time the grin was slow and easy and insolent. "One might. One might also say that Everest is just a mountain, or the Pacific is just an ocean. Right?"

He stood then and slowly removed his jacket and dress shirt, revealing the black wife-beater he wore beneath, his actions declaring that this little interview was over. Then he retrieved his new Hugo Boss leather jacket from the tiny closet in the corner and checked his image in the full length mirror on the door, as Brandon Wright watched, the rage that swelled within him betrayed only by the tense lines of his body - rage tempered by an unexpected and unwelcome surge of lust.

He did not want this arrogant prick. He did not.

His dick, however, seemed to disagree.

He got to his feet and moved forward, almost - but not quite - invading Brian's personal space. "You know," he said in a soft husky voice, "if we walk in together, we'll attract every eye in the place."

Brian grinned before leaning forward and dropping a kiss on the blonde's forehead - the kind of kiss a rock star might bestow on a rabid fan - or a maiden aunt. "I already do, and I don't like to share."

Brandon looked down quickly, but not quite quickly enough to prevent Brian from identifying - and ignoring - the flash of fury in his eyes. With a final tug to make sure the leather jacket was perfectly arranged to show off the body beneath it, Brian stepped around the blonde and opened the door, gesturing for his guest to make his exit.

Brandon paused as he turned to leave and stepped close again, to stare directly into Brian's eyes. "You're playing with fire, you know," he whispered, before leaning close and licking at Brian's lower lip.

Brian just smiled. "You're not that hot," he answered, and pushed his visitor out the door, none too gently.

Then he stood and waited while Brandon walked away, dismissing the tall blonde from his thoughts as soon as he was out of sight.

No one would ever be able to say that Brian Kinney didn't live in the moment.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

TBC
Justin stood in a thick pool of light at the head of the stairs, his hair reflecting bright gold under the directional beam of a perfectly-placed spot. Directly ahead of him lay the shadowed alcove that was his destination, the carefully arranged lamps above the arched entrance still dark, controlled by a concealed switch inside the doorframe.

He sometimes thought that it was the most tragic conflict: light, so critical to the creation of great art, was ultimately a weapon that could completely destroy it. Thus the two items that rested upon easels within the alcove remained shrouded in soft covers, protected from the treacherous glare of the spotlights which would paint them in liquid brilliance and draw every eye once switched on. Until that moment, they would remain in the dark. Safe. Protected. Unrisked.

Priceless - to him, anyway.

He paused and turned slightly, to look down to the display floor where Steven was standing motionless in front of one of the smaller, more intimate pieces - an image of Brian at his most inscrutable, perfect face just emerging from shadow, hazel eyes fully shielded, untouchable, unreachable - and irresistible.

Justin watched for a moment, and saw much more than Steven would have been able to credit - saw the tension in the set of broad shoulders, saw the slight hitch in the breathing, saw the involuntary clinching of the jaw. Saw and understood, knowing that, if the situation were reversed, he would be hard pressed to accept that another man was central to his lover's very existence, central in his heart.

He knew it could not go on.

He turned away, leaving Steven the privacy of his thoughts, knowing that he should invite his lover to join him, to share the intimacy of his work. Knowing he should, and knowing he wouldn't.

Not yet. First he had to face it himself - alone.

Moving forward abruptly, allowing himself no room to maneuver, he flipped the switch that filled the room with light and stripped off the covering of the smaller canvas.

Best, he knew, to make this a two-step process.

It was a compact piece, perhaps half life-sized. It was also simple - a head/torso shot of a man napping against brightly colored cushions, with an infant cradled against his shoulder, also sleeping; Brian Kinney with his hand curled protectively around his son's tiny body.

Justin had heard snide remarks made by several of Brian's friends when they'd looked at the snapshot from which the portrait had been painted, and he had been amazed by their indifference and their inability to discern the elemental truth revealed in the image.

He wondered if he was the only one who could see the incredible depth of the love displayed therein.

He thought not - hoped not - and, provided that he could bring himself to share it with the world, he was pretty sure that others, people who did not know Brian - never would know Brian - would see it too, and wish for a moment that they were fortunate enough to know such an extraordinary young
His eyes were soft with luminous memories as he reached out to touch the face on the canvas. He knew that all of Brian's friends and acquaintances - not to mention Brian himself - would have snorted their scorn at the notion that there was anything innocent about Brian Kinney. Honest? Yes - many would say to a fault. Unpretentious? Invariably. Straightforward? Guileless? Unapologetic? Yes, yes, and yes.

But innocent?

Perhaps, thought the young artist, it only existed in the eyes of the beholder. His smile was bittersweet. Was he the only one to see it, because he was the only one who wanted it to be so?

He didn't even pretend to know. Not anymore.

He only knew that the portrait was beautiful. The most beautiful thing he'd ever seen.

 Except one.

He let his eyes linger for a moment, tracing the features with the tactile sweetness of memory.

Then he moved further into the enclosure, proceeding to stand before the larger portrait, closing his eyes, taking a deep breath.

Reaching, touching - lost in anticipation.

Lost in fear.

There was nothing graceful or subtle or controlled in his movement as he jerked the drape away from the final canvas. And even then, he did not open his eyes right away.

It wasn't as if he didn't know what he would see. Or did not see it in his mind every hour of every day.

It was just . . .

He opened his eyes, and it was exactly as he'd known it would be.

Instantly, without a moment of transition or a second to prepare, he was there, inside the image, living the moment again.

He was still caught up in the look on Brian's face as he'd made his proclamation. It had been quintessential Brian, without the bells and whistles and hearts and flowers, without the embroidery. A statement of fact, without frills.

And it had echoed all the way down into Justin's soul.

"We're not like your parents. And we're not like a pair of dykes marching down the aisle in matching Vera Wangs. We're queers, and if we're together, it's because we want to be - not because there are locks on the doors . . .

"And when I come home, I'll also be doing exactly what I want to do - coming home to you."

Then Justin had summed up his own needs, his own conditions, surprising himself with the scope of his demands and how desperately he wanted Brian's agreement.
The kisses they'd exchanged following their moment of truth in the middle of Babylon's dance floor had been hot enough to draw groans of envy from the surrounding crowd.

They had come home together then, no further words being required, locked up tight in the intimacy of the moment, in the certainty of what had been said and, just as certainly, in what had gone unsaid, but had been heard anyway.

At least for that moment.

Later, Justin would allow himself to forget - to be coaxed and prodded and deluded and lured away, to be enticed and jerked into a place he never wanted to be.

But for that moment, he had felt the rightness of the connection between them.

That had been the night when he was finally able to taste and savor the truth of what had begun to grow in his heart. He had claimed, from the beginning, to love Brian, but he had been lying to himself. He had wanted Brian, needed Brian, lusted after Brian - even wanted to be Brian. But he had not really loved him, had not even known what real love was. Not until that night when he had felt it building inside him, and looked up to see it gazing down at him from Brian's eyes.

Words remained unspoken, unneeded.

They had barely made it to the bed, shedding clothes along the way, bodies straining, clinging, holding, blending, yearning to be one. Brian had taken one little detour - just long enough to hit the play switch on the sound system - before scooping Justin up in strong arms to rush him to the bedroom and toss him across the mattress.

But that was the last thing he'd done in a hurry that night.

They had fucked many times during their months together, in every conceivable configuration - face to face, front to back, spooned, Justin astride Brian's lap - impaled on his massive cock. There had been blow jobs, hand jobs, shower fucks, floor fucks, public fucks in Babylon's back room and all possible variations on the same theme - on the bed, on the sofa, on the kitchen table, on the lounge chair, bent over the sink, against the wall.

But until that night, Justin had never experienced what it was like to be worshipped by Brian Kinney. It would happen again, periodically, but it would never be quite as special, quite as perfect, as the first time.

Brian had started slow, nibbling at his lover's feet, licking and tasting and nuzzling and sucking. Then he'd worked his way slowly northward - ankles, calves, knees. Who knew that a tongue exploring the back of the knee could produce such mind-blowing sensations? It was at this point that Brian had paused to look up and study the look on Justin's face, his smile expressing his delight in his lover's trembling body and hitching breath, in the glow of lust and need that was almost visible beneath alabaster skin. He had moved on then to the thighs, the hips . . . laughing softly as he skipped over the main attraction, except for a quick swipe of his tongue to taste the bittersweetness of the pre-cum dripping from the slit of Justin's cock, and continued the upward journey - belly, navel, chest, underarms, nipples (with special attention to the jeweled ring dangling from the right one.) Further, exploring the valleys and planes of the collarbone, the shoulders, the tender hollows of the throat.

"Brian?" Barely audible, barely breathing - barely even able to breathe, as his lover nuzzled into the velvet softness under his jawline.
"Hmmm?"

Hazel eyes, ablaze with lust - and so much more - had stared down into midnight blue.

"Make love to me."

For the space of one frozen heartbeat, Justin had feared he'd gone too far, as he saw the brief flare of furious resistance threaten to engulf the brilliance of desire, but he hadn't waited to give it a chance to grow. Instead, he'd surged upward, claiming that incredible mouth, driving his tongue into the velvety depths, into the place he most wanted to be.

Into the center of Brian Kinney.

Holding the kiss, refusing to release those lips, or the body that was wrapped around him, Justin had reached out and retrieved a condom and the lube from a bowl on the nightstand, and managed to twist his body just enough to gain sufficient access to sheath his lover's straining cock with the latex. Then it was time to pull back just a little, to invite Brian into his own center.

"Fuck me!" he'd whispered. "I want you to fuck me so hard, so deep, that I can feel you in my fucking throat."

Brian had shifted as if to turn Justin to his stomach, but the younger man had resisted. "No. I want to see your face."

Brian had hesitated briefly, but then he'd simply settled back against the slender body beneath him, and squeezed a generous mound of lube into his palm. He'd taken Justin's lips once more in a searing kiss as he worked his hand down between their bodies, past Justin's throbbing erection, past his perineum to the pucker of his opening. He hadn't wasted much time there, but he'd been thorough. One finger, then two, then three - scissoring to open the tight channel, to provide maximum access.

"You ready, Sunshine?"

"Always."

Another kiss, consuming and being consumed, and then . . .

He had been filled many times before, filled to the point of bursting, but never quite like this. The first time they'd been together - the first time he'd ever been fucked - Brian had told him that it would always hurt a little, that the hurt was a part of it - and Brian Kinney never lied. But understanding had come only gradually, from experience. The pain was a part of it - a necessary part, that fired the nerve endings and opened the pleasure centers of the mind, preparing the way for the incredible sensations yet to come: the blue-hot pain of first entry, a strange blend of heart-stopping hurt and breathless anticipation, quickly morphing into red-hot pleasure as Brian adjusted his angle to make sure his cock stroked across the nub of his lover's sweet spot with every thrust as he pushed deeper and deeper until he was everywhere within Justin's slender body, filling him beyond capacity, beyond comprehension, and finally - finally - blossoming into the white hot ecstasy of an eruption to rival the Big Bang of creation.

Justin, so boneless with pleasure that he could barely retain his grasp of reality, had felt the music swelling around them - the cadence of the song underscoring the grinding beat of their joining, the rasping voice saying everything that they could not manage to voice, the haunting lyrics wrapping them, driving them, caressing them as they held each other, resonating with the breaths they could not quite catch.
"I don't want to miss one smile;
I don't want to miss one kiss;
I just want to be with you,
Right here with you, just like this.
I just want to hold you close,
Feel your heart so close to mine,
And just stay here in this moment,
For all the rest of time."*

Justin had felt it fill him, as he let himself fall into rapture, into incredible sensation such as he'd never known before, exactly like a collision of stars, exploding into infinity. He flew, soaring on the melody and the euphoria within him.

And there above him, as his body convulsed, consumed in the fire of his own passion, he'd seen the vision - the most beautiful thing he had ever seen, or ever would see through all the years of his life.

Brian Kinney, caught in the mindless bliss of orgasm, mouth open and gasping, and eyes molten with desire and completion, sweat running in rivulets down across the muscle and sinew of a chest heaving for air, looking down and allowing his expression to say what his lips would not be able to whisper for a very long time.

Justin knew at once that he would paint it, because he couldn't not paint it, because he knew he would never see anything or experience anything or touch anything again that would fill his soul so completely.

Because this was his Brian - the center of his universe.

He came back to awareness of the moment slowly and had to force himself to stand still, to allow his racing heart to settle, to pull his consciousness back out of memory and into the now, with the chorus of the song still echoing in his mind.

"I don't want to close my eyes;
I don't want to fall asleep,
Cause I'd miss you, baby,
And I don't want to miss a thing.
Cause even when I dream of you,
The sweetest dream will never do.
I'd still miss you, baby,
And I don't want to miss a thing."

It was still - probably always would be - his favorite song, and he could never hear it without remembering that night, and Brian's sardonic, tongue-in-cheek explanation for his fondness for Steven Tyler: lips twisted into a smirk, eyes barely twinkling, and a drawling voice observing that anyone with a mouth like that must be a world-class cocksucker because God, as everybody knew, didn't make mistakes.

"Jesus Christ!"

He had not heard Steven's approach, had not noticed when the older man had come to stand behind him and look over his shoulder, and he had to fight off an urge to turn around and push the man away. This was private; this was only for him; this was . . .

What he had to let go of, if he ever hoped to build a life without Brian. Steven reached out and touched the canvas, his finger trailing down across the image of the hand of the individual who was only seen as the object of the desire in the primary subject's eyes. One hand braced against a gleaming chest, one leg draped over a bulging shoulder, and one reflection - vague but definitely blonde - revealed in the luminous surface of hazel eyes.

"Jesus Christ!"

It seemed that neither of them could think of anything else to say.

Justin waited until his lungs could once again draw breath, until his heart ceased to hammer in his chest. Then he turned and walked out of the alcove, pausing only to extinguish the lights, leaving Steven standing there in the dark.

At the bottom of the stairs, Margo stood waiting, her face asking the only question for which she needed an answer, and Justin paused, eyes huge but somehow seeing nothing except a huge, gaping darkness that threatened to consume him.

"Well?"

"Yes," he whispered.

"Yes, what?" She could not afford ambiguity. This was too important.

"Yes. Display it."

"And?"

He closed his eyes. "Yes." It was only a whisper. "Sell it."

Then he walked to the street door and made his exit, never looking back, and she watched him go, wondering why she was so sure that he was leaving behind the only part of himself that he cared about.

Brian leaned against the bar, sipping his JB, eyes scanning the crowd, pleased with the numbers and the excitement and the exuberance, less pleased by the visual reminders of the dark time in which they were living. His customers, as always, were a vivid, colorful bunch, running the full gamut of gay society. Drag queens and trannies, bears and twinks, subs and doms, tops and bottoms and every variation in between. And the beautiful people, of course - the ones that defied classification, that seemed to exist in a niche of their own, destined to be desired and watched and hungered for by everyone around them.

Like Brian, although he no longer spent much time reflecting on his place within their ranks.

But there were others in the crowd, unremarkable except for their ability to blend in while still, somehow, remaining separate. Since nothing in the gay community was the 'new' black - in that only the real black would ever do - they were dressed discreetly, black t's and jeans, or black muscle shirts or jackets, black boots. Completely unremarkable. And yet, if one knew what to look for, they were easy enough to distinguish from the exuberant dancers and drinkers and cruisers around them. It wasn't in their clothing or the shape of (hard) bodies; it was in their eyes. Eyes that were never still, never glazed with lust or vacant with drug-or-alcohol-induced euphoria.

The strong, stalwart, generally tall-dark-and-handsomes danced and talked and mingled and flirted; they appeared to party, but they never got lost in the role.

Brian knew a moment of sharp regret. There had always been a small number of security personnel at Babylon. Like any night club, anywhere, it saw its share of rambunctious patrons or belligerent party animals who didn't know when to quit or how to take 'no' for an answer. But not like this. The world had become an uglier place, and Brian had been forced to take measures to deal with it. He did it because he had to, but he didn't like it.

His budget for security staffing had more than doubled since he'd reopened the club.

"They're very good," said a voice in his ear. "If I didn't know what to look for, I'd never have noticed."

He turned and found himself almost nose to nose with Lance Mathis, and knew another brief moment of regret for things that were simply not meant to be. "Now you know how good you have to be," he replied. "Are you?"

"He won't let you down, Brian," said another voice, from his other side, and he looked around to find Drew Boyd pressed against his back.

Brian laughed. "In this neighborhood, this is called a Manwich, Boys. If you're not careful, you'll be giving people the wrong idea."

But Drew was no longer the shy, semi-virginal, freshly-outed infant he had once been, and he only edged closer, settling against the length of Brian's body, close enough to leave little to the imagination. "You know," he said softly, barely audible, "you're a legend in your own time, Kinney. Every time I hook up, every guy I fuck, tells me that I haven't really been fucked, until I've been fucked by you. Maybe you'd like to demonstrate . . ."

Brian closed his eyes as he felt an agile tongue swirl around his ear.

Then he sighed and pulled away slightly, suppressing an urge to curse fate and the twisted, perverted, obscenely inconvenient sense of loyalty that kept him from taking advantage of an offer almost too perfect to resist. He turned to face the extremely well-endowed, extremely beautiful football player. "You're a real temptation . . ."

"But?" Drew's eyes were dark with lust.

"But you're . . ." Brian looked up and saw Emmett looking down at them from his place in the middle of the overhead catwalk, "off limits."

Boyd followed the direction of Brian's gaze, and his eyes softened for a moment. But they grew hard again, and distant, as Calvin Culpepper emerged from the crowd to claim Emmett's attention.

"Fuck!" It was barely a whisper, and Boyd was quick to look away, but not quick enough to prevent Brian from seeing what he was trying so desperately to conceal.

"Give yourself time," Brian said softly, leaning in to whisper directly into Boyd's ear. "You've still got a lot to learn, but . . ."

"But what?" The big football player was not in the mood for flirting or pleasantries. He desperately wanted to fuck. Even more desperately, he wanted to fuck this beautiful, delectable creature who was murmuring in his ear. And more desperately still, he wanted to . . . but he wouldn't let himself think about that.

Brian smiled. "When you're all grown up, you come back to see us. Something tells me he'll still be around."
"What about his Mississippi belle?"

Brian let his eyes drift down the massive body, and then back up before offering his answer. "You're a fucking football super-star with a dick even a dyke would die for. And you were there first. Right?"

Boyd's smile formed slowly, but brightened quickly to a full grin. "Thanks, Bri. You're a regular ray of sunshine."

Brian went very still, but managed to swallow the caustic response that trembled on his lips.

Meanwhile, Lance Mathis was letting his gaze sweep around the huge room, observing, learning, memorizing details and the lay of the land. "So," he said finally, after taking a generous swallow of his draft beer, "where's yours?"

"My what?" Brian allowed just a trace of annoyance to creep into his tone.

"Your security."

Brian laughed. "Your job will be to protect my customers," he replied, "and my source of income. Not me."

"That's very noble of you," Mathis answered with a doubtful grin. "But don't you think . . ."

"I'll tell you what I think," Brian interrupted, seeing no reason to curb his sarcasm or his annoyance over being questioned. "I think I saw this place go up in flames once before, and I don't intend to have to see it again. I think there's a big, bad, ugly homophobic world out there, full of fag-haters, that gets off on hurting gays, as much as they can, as often as they can. All gays, not any one of us individually. They don't know who we are and they don't give a fuck. They just want to do as much damage to as many of us as possible. And that is what I mean to prevent. That's your job. Got it?"

"Oh, I got it," said Mathis, "but . . ."

"But what?" Annoyance had escalated, now headed into full-blown anger.

Lance looked around again, eyes drifting from one face to another and reading an astonishing variety of emotions directed toward the man at his side: lust, of course - that was a given - fondness, envy, need, admiration, longing, sadness, and in a couple of cases, anger - deep, visceral and pulsing with dark energy. Shifting slowly, drawing closer to his new employer and managing at the same time to insert himself between those angry observers and the object of their rage, he framed his answer.

"But I still think you ought to be careful, Mr. Kinney."

Brian was pleased - but still annoyed - to note that the man displayed not the slightest nuance of being intimidated or bothered by his peevishness.

"After all, it would be a real shame if something happened to a Liberty Avenue Living Legend."

For a moment, Brian looked as if he might be considering taking a swing at something or someone. Then he erupted with bright laughter. "Fuck you," he finally managed to splutter.

Mathis leaned forward with a grin. "In your dreams, Stud-Muffin."

But his eyes remained dark and watchful. He was rather surprised to realize that he was looking forward to his new job, and to getting to know this enigmatic individual who generated such an extreme range of passions from so many people. He had not expected that, had, in fact, expected to dislike the man who had been described to him as an arrogant prick - intensely.

Instead, he found that he was marginally intrigued.

It would be interesting, and . . . He frowned as he went back to studying the crowd, watching the people who watched Brian as he moved off toward the catwalk, drawing attention as irresistibly as a magnet drew iron filings. Mathis suppressed a sigh and tried to tell himself that he was imagining things. He didn't really have a bad feeling about this, did he?

It was 80's Hard Rock night, and Pour Some Sugar on Me was blasting from the speakers as bits of white crystalline glitter fell from the ceiling.

Calvin and Ted were enjoying a dance together as Emmett shifted to allow Brian to squeeze into an open spot at the railing so they could share the view of the dance floor below. Abruptly, Emmett moved closer, draping an arm around Brian's shoulders and turning to stare directly into hazel eyes, pausong for just a moment to notice that the white glitter might look silly on everybody else but, on Brian, it looked magical - like fairy dust. Of course, he couldn't say as much; somebody might overhear and give him endless shit about being under the spell of the infamous Kinney mystique.
Instead he leaned close and spoke softly - relatively speaking - for Brian's hearing only. "You could have fucked him, you know. I wouldn't have been angry."

Brian smiled. "I know."

"It would have been okay."

Again the smile. "I know."

"Asshole!" Emmett tried to swallow his grin, but wasn't completely successful. He knew why Brian had turned Drew down, and he also knew that he would never succeed in getting Brian to explain himself. Brian Kinney didn't do explanations, but sometimes, if a person was very lucky and very persistent, that person might eventually begin to glimpse the nature of the truths that were never explained.

When Emmett leaned forward suddenly and dropped a kiss on Brian's temple, the younger man recoiled, shocked in spite of himself, pretending he didn't hear the barely audible "Thank you, Baby" that was whispered in his ear.

Determined to deflect any suggestion of sentiment, Brian regarded his old friend with a skeptical leer.
"One day, Emmy Lou, you're gonna have to choose . . . between a cock and a hard place. You know?"

"You never heard of a three-way?" Emmett retorted.

Brian burst out laughing, providing a treat for almost everyone around him. "Ah, Auntie Em," he said finally, "you restore my faith in the fickleness of fagdom."

"Not to mention my unfailing fetish for fashion focus, Sweetie. I do so love a good alliteration, don't you? In fact . . ." The tall queen paused and framed Brian's face with his hands, a speculative gleam rising in his eyes. "I do believe I have the pluperfect latest fashion accessory for you, Hot Stuff."

Brian, never one to ignore any potential new development on the fashion front, simply lifted an inquisitive eyebrow, prompting Emmett to dart off into the crowd, returning just moments later with one hand concealed behind his back, to find that Brian was regarding him with blatant suspicion as he approached. "This doesn't involve anything weird, does it?" asked the slightly alarmed club owner. "No shaving my head or tattoos on my ass or anything . . . right?"

"Don't be silly," Emmett retorted. "Avant garde I may be, but even I know better than to tamper with perfection."

Brian blinked - slowly. Had Emmett just called him perfect? Finally acknowledged the painfully obvious?

He had no time to think about it, as Emmett stepped forward quickly, arms raised, and deposited something soft and black on top of his head, pausing to adjust the new accessory to the just-right angle.

Then he just stood for a moment, enjoying the view. "Oh, yes, Baby Boy. It's definitely you."

Brian reached up to touch the very soft, very black, very expensive fedora that sat atop his head, adjusting it to the perfect rakish angle before turning to look into the nearest mirror. He'd never really been into hats, but . . .

"Damn!" he breathed.

Emmett grinned. "Like it?"

"I look . . ."

Brian twisted to check out a different angle. "All of the above?" he asked finally.

"Modest too." The new voice bordered just a bit on grumpiness. "And since when do you wear hats?"

"Since now," Brian answered. "I'm exploring my inner Indiana Jones. And what are you two doing here anyway? If you keep showing up like this, you'll risk losing your membership in the Stepford fags sorority."

"Charming as always, Brian," said Ben easily. "As for what we're doing here, ask Michael. He's the one who insisted that we had to come."

"I did not," Michael retorted indignantly. Then he took a deep breath. "Well, maybe I did, but I couldn't just . . ."

Brian rolled his eyes and finished Michael's sentence. "Couldn't just leave me alone to run my own life?"

Ben and Emmett exchanged indulgent smiles, both knowing what came next. Michael bit his lip, eyes downcast and filled with shadow, before he cocked his head and gave his oldest, best friend the pout that had been manipulating Brian for twenty-odd years. "Dance with me?" he asked finally.

"Fuck!" Brian whispered, obviously aware of what Michael wanted. Nevertheless, when Michael reached for him, he allowed himself to be pulled toward the dance floor, not wasting a single moment wondering if he was ever going to learn how to resist Michael's wiles.

They moved well together, in the manner of partners who have danced together over many years, and when they approached one of the small elevated platforms that were sprinkled around the floor, the couple who had been dancing there just disappeared, leaving the field clear for them, as if by magic.

They were belly to belly, with Michael's arms looped around Brian's neck, and Brian's hands resting at Michael's waist. They danced wordlessly for a while, forehead to forehead. Then Michael lifted his mouth and invited the kiss he knew Brian would not refuse.

"I don't want you to go to London," Michael said, shouting to be heard above the music. "I want you to go with us, to New York."

"Michael . . ."

"You're going to break his heart," Michael continued. "You know that, don't you?"

"Since when," Brian demanded, "do you give a shit whether or not Justin's heart is broken?"

Michael stared into Brian's eyes and felt compelled to offer up a tiny truth. "It's not his heart I'm worried about."

Brian's smile was lopsided. "You are so pathetic."

"I'm serious," Michael insisted, pulling Brian's head down so that they were virtually nose to nose. "Do you know how long it took me to accept . . ."

"Accept what?" Something in Brian's tone suggested that he might not want to hear whatever his old friend had to say.

Michael took a deep breath. "To accept that he could give you something that I couldn't. I didn't want to believe it, but I did, finally. I had no choice." He paused, and his voice dropped to a level that Brian had to lean close to hear. "I finally saw the truth, saw that he was able to touch you in a way I never could."

Brian shrugged, stepping back and dropping his hands. "So he touched me. Lots of guys have touched me." He waggled his eyebrows suggestively. "And lots more will. That's not a reason . . ."

"Are you going away, Brian?" There was raw desperation in the question. "Are you leaving . . ."

He didn't say the final word, but Brian heard it anyway.

"Not to worry, Mikey," Brian assured him, nuzzling his nose into the hair curling around Michael's ear. "No matter where I am, you're always with me."

"But that's not the same."

Brian leaned forward and kissed his old friend again. "Nothing stays the same, Sweetheart."

Michael sighed. "So when do you leave?"

"First class on flight 2633 to Heathrow, Saturday afternoon at 5:30. A good meal, a few drinks, and a comfortable night's sleep - maybe a little extra-curricular activity in the loo, and I wake up to a brand new Sunday morning in jolly old England."

"But the opening is tomorrow night. You could still go with us. I mean, they do have flights out of LaGuardia to London, don't they?"
There was no smile in Brian's eyes as he went very still and looked down into Michael's face.
"Listen to me, Michael. Are you listening?"

"I'm listening." Reluctant, petulant, but determined to hear whatever truth Brian was ready to share.

"I'm staying away from New York. Not just for him. Not just for me. For both of us. He's not coming back, and I'm not going after him, so neither one of us is going to be forced to sacrifice who we are in order to prove our love. That's not love. That's a fucking certificate of title."

"And when exactly did you figure that out?" Michael demanded.

Brian compressed his lips together, and huffed a small sigh before replying. "I always knew . . . from the beginning."

He turned then and began to move away.

"Brian . . ."

Michael followed, reaching out to try to compel his old friend to turn back, to continue the conversation, but Brian was obviously finished talking. Thus when Michael grabbed his arm, to spin him around to re-engage, Brian twisted and jerked free, causing him to stagger against the individual to his left. As luck would have it, that individual was one of the serving staff, laden with a tray filled with pitchers of frozen strawberry Margaritas. Pitchers and contents went one way, tray and waiter went another, and Brian went a third.

Of those involved in the collision, only Brian escaped unscathed - no doubt due to the luck of the Irish that he always claimed for himself; the waiter and the individuals standing nearby were not so fortunate.

Emmett, who had just cut in on Ted and Calvin while swinging himself directly into the path of the glass deluge, stood rigid, his bright pastel tunic transformed into a soggy, frosted, berry-crusted mess, accented by bright droplets of blood erupting from a cut on his forehead, the result of a flying particle of broken glass. Others were shaken or splashed or pushed aside or disheveled, but only Emmett suffered any injury. Around them, the music, the dancing, the noise went on, flowing on around the little eddy in the river of nightly chaos.

Brian, of course, was the first to recover and the fastest to react. He grabbed a towel from the bar and got to Emmett's side just as the big Nelly bottom scrubbed at his face with his hands, and opened his mouth to scream when he stared down at them and recognized the brilliant scarlet of fresh blood.

"Oh, my God!" he shrieked. "I'm bleeding." Brian caught him as his knees buckled and succeeded in easing him down to the floor, while pressing the towel against the contusion on his forehead as both Michael and Ted babbled incoherently, with Ben and Blake rushing forward to comfort their respective spouses but contribute nothing to resolving the situation.

Brian was too busy trying to clean away the blood from Emmett's wound to offer much in the way of comfort to the victim, confining his comments to a string of curse words, since he was not particularly given to murmuring sweet nothings, and Emmett was in full panic mode anyway, and not in the right frame of mind to listen to reason. Then there came a strange frozen moment as a shadow fell across Brian, just before he was abruptly lifted aside as easily as if he'd been a child, to be replaced by a massive body intent on nothing but getting down to the level of the tall young body bleeding so profusely all over the lime green sequins encrusting the front of a draped, bias-cut shirt.

Emmett continued to shriek without missing a beat, in the manner of a true classical diva. "Oh, my God! Am I bleeding to death? Oh, my God!"

Strong arms, massive arms, wrapped around the drama queen as a deep voice offered reassurances. "You're gonna be fine, Baby. I promise."

Emmett looked up, mindless fear blazing in his eyes, until he recognized the face bending over him. He fell silent in mid-scream. Then he tentatively lifted one hand to touch the face looking down at him.

"Drewsie?"

"In the flesh, Baby."

"Am I . . ." Emmett paused and tried to swallow the huge lump in his throat. "If I'm . . . dying, will you just . . . hold me?"

Brian rolled his eyes and opened his mouth to respond, but a hard look from Boyd caused him to rethink his smart remark.

"You're going to be fine, Honey," said Drew gently. "It's a nasty wound, but you've had worse. By tomorrow, you'll be as good as new."

"Will I be . . . scarred?"

This time, Brian couldn't completely suppress the urge to laugh, despite Boyd's not-so-subtle warning glance, so he leaned forward, stretching to see around the football player's broad shoulders. "On your feet, Scarlett," he drawled. "Tomorrow . . . is another day."

Emmett allowed himself to be pulled up and set on his feet, but he was unsteady and very pale.

"Jesus, Emmy Lou," Brian muttered, "you really look like shit. Would you please cowboy up, and be a big girl. It's just a scratch."

Emmett sniffed hard and lifted his head in order to look down his nose at his friend. "The sight of blood always makes me lightheaded. It's a family thing, I'll have you know. My Aunt Lula once fainted and fell down a flight of stairs when she had a simple nosebleed."

"Geez, Emmett," said Michael, "you really look awful."

Emmett took advantage of the moment to put on his best Bette Davis hauteur. "And I'm freezing too. Must be in shock."

Brian rolled his eyes again. "You're not in shock. You're cold because you're wearing a pitcherful of frozen Margaritas. Put on your jacket, and you'll be fine."

Emmett grabbed the towel out of Brian's hand and tried to wipe the frozen glop off his chest. "I don't have a jacket," he said coldly. "It would spoil my entrance. And now I'm going to catch my death going out half-drowned into the cold, pitiless night."

Drew Boyd regarded his old flame tenderly before turning to settle an expectant gaze on the club owner.

"Shit!" said Brian. "Just go have a drink, on the house. It'll warm you right up."

"I don't want a drink," snapped Emmett, growing annoyed with the whole situation, with Brian, and with himself. "I want to go home."

Brian sighed, and, with one more roll of his eyes, slipped out of his brand new Hugo Boss jacket and draped it across Emmett's shoulders, laughing at the stunned look rising in Emmett's eyes. Finally, he took off the fedora and set it at a rakish angle atop Emmett's head. "There now," he said with a pained smile. "You've never looked better." Then he leaned forward and his voice dropped to a harsh whisper. "And if it comes back with a stain, I'm going to cut off your balls and feed them to you on toast."

It was at that moment that Calvin Culpepper apparently decided to reassert his territorial rights. He stepped forward and took Emmett's hand to lead him, following Brian's gesture, toward the private rear entrance, usually only available to employees, leaving Drew Boyd standing on the dance floor wearing a strange, unsettled expression.

Brian nodded to his club manager, signaling him to make sure normal operations continued; then he guided Boyd to the bar where he requested a bottle of JB and a clean glass. "Here," he said, not unkindly. "Drown your sorrows with the good stuff while I go check on Emmie-Queen-of-Scots."

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

Deep winter had passed, but there was still a deep chill in the air as Brian stepped out into the alleyway behind the club. It was darker here than in the front, illuminated only by occasional street lights and a single fixture over the door. During the summer, there would be plenty of foot traffic (and fuck traffic) here, but it was still too cold for that. For now. Only employees used this entrance on a regular basis, and only management was allowed to drive through the passageway.

Brian wrapped his arms around his middle, trying to ignore the frigid air against his bare skin. Now where the fuck was Emmett?

He looked left, then right, and finally spotted a dark silhouette leaning against the wall at the end of the alley.

Shivering and muttering curses under his breath, he started forward. He was only half way toward his target when an SUV screeched to a stop at the corner, and three dark, bulked-up figures leapt from the vehicle and raced forward, attacking the lone figure leaning against the wall and dragging him back toward the street.

"Jesus!" Brian shouted, breaking into a run. "Emmett!"

He was only half way there when he saw one massive hand swing a metallic object in a sharp arc that ended with a solid clunk, as the 'something' connected with Emmett's skull.

Brian ran faster, barely aware that there were running footsteps behind him, and that another car had pulled up behind the SUV. He yelled again. "Leave him alone, you bastards!"

Then one of the three shouted something, and they all jumped back into the car and sped away leaving Emmett crumpled motionless on the cold cement.

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

*"I Don't Want to Miss a Thing" -- Diane Warren

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

tbc
In some ways, Brian would never remember the events of those critical moments with any clarity. In other ways, he would never be able to forget them.

He would not remember, for example, that he had hesitated just long enough to shout for help before breaking into an all-out sprint to try to prevent disaster, but he would remember the panic that flashed through his body like an electric charge. He would not remember the flying leap that almost allowed him to grab one of the assailants as they raced away, but he would remember the towering black rage that made him want to smash their faces with his fists. He would not remember the words that one of them shouted at him as he tried to get to them, but he would remember the snarl of hatred that twisted the shouter's face.

On the other hand, Michael, who'd been first to hear Brian's shout for help and first to respond, with Ben at his heels, would never forget a single moment of it, mostly because he had never been more scared in his life and also because it was one of those ultra-rare moments when Brian Kinney lost the ability to maintain the façade that he customarily wore like a second skin. One did not forget such rare occurrences.

He had seen Brian angry on a number of occasions, and it was a small source of pride to him that he was one of the few who would even have noticed, for Brian, above all else, was perpetually in control of his emotions. In anger, he did not rage or roar or get physical; instead, he used the razor-sharp wit and agile tongue that could cut an adversary to ribbons without drawing a single drop of blood. That was Brian, and anyone who had ever been unlucky enough to incur his wrath had almost certainly emerged from the encounter feeling mangled and devastated but without a single bruise to show for it. In point of fact, most would probably have preferred physical wounds.

On the other hand, Michael had also been around on some of the exceedingly rare occasions when the Kinney gift for verbal slicing and dicing and reducing an opponent to a quivering mass of shame or impotence had given way before a fury too intense to swallow. He had even, on one occasion, been the object of that towering wrath. He still remembered vividly the sickening crunch of Brian's fist impacting with his own face at Lindsey and Melanie's anniversary party, after Justin had turned his back on Brian in order to play house with his fiddling twinkie. Of course, he also remembered what he had said to earn that anger.

To this day, he still didn't know if he was more ashamed of having actually made those ugly, outrageous, vindictive remarks or of failing to stand up and admit his culpability when everyone who witnessed the incident did what they always did, what they all seemed to need to do on a regular basis: blame Brian. Blaming Brian - without bothering to learn the pertinent details of any given situation - seemed to be what they all did best. Of course, they would usually learn later - or figure it out for themselves - that the blame was misplaced, one way or another, but such understanding was usually relegated to an offhand random afterthought, mostly unexplored and almost never verbalized.

It was a process not unlike the chain of events when a sensational news story was discovered to be a total fabrication or a blatant mistake; the original headlines would have screamed in huge, bold-face type above the masthead on the front page; the retraction would be buried on page 41, below the obituaries.
Nevertheless, Michael knew that Brian in a rage was not a man to be trifled with, and he held his breath as he watched his oldest friend sprinting down the alley, knowing that Brian was furious enough to take on all three of Emmett's attackers if he could just get to them in time. When Brian leapt forward, and one of the attackers paused to yell some filthy insult at him, Michael shouted out a warning, uncertain of whether he was more afraid for Brian or of Brian.

He was, after all, one of the few people in the world who knew what Brian was capable of, if pushed too far. He remembered the bloody broken hand of a football jock who had believed that he could safely inflict humiliation and injury on a helpless faggot without fear of reprisal. He remembered bloody noses and black eyes resulting from Brian's willingness to defend those who were less able to defend themselves from the homophobes who delighted in terrorizing gay kids.

And he'd often reflected that Chris Hobbs - that piece-of-shit homophobic fuck who had attacked Justin with a baseball bat - was an incredibly lucky bastard. If Justin had not required Brian's total attention as he lay bleeding out his life on that garage floor, Michael was pretty sure that Dobbs would have died that night, and probably in great pain.

Brian Kinney didn't start fights, but he frequently finished them.

Luckily, on this occasion the opportunity for a confrontation did not develop. The three had enough of a head start so that they were able to make it into their vehicle and speed away before Brian was close enough to stop them.

Emmett was curled up on his side, with his arms wrapped tight around his head, when Brian dropped to his knees beside him, face frozen in a grimace of fear as he felt a huge solid block of ice form in his gut. Calvin arrived just a second later, from the opposite direction.

"Where the fuck were you?" Brian demanded, as he laid shaking hands on Emmett's back, desperate to feel the murmur of breath or the pulse of a heartbeat and terrified that he would find neither. His own breath came harshly, and he had to pause for a moment and shake his head, to pull himself back out of the grip of black memory and into the present.

This was now; not five years ago.

This was Emmett; not Justin.

"I went to get the car," Calvin answered, the pitch of his voice suggesting that he was only a heartbeat away from panic. "Is he . . ."

Brian's fingers probed beneath Emmett's jawline and found . . .

"He's alive," he muttered. Then he felt the warm wetness coating his fingers. "But he's bleeding. Here, help me lift . . ."

But it turned out that no help would be needed. For the second time in a matter of minutes, Brian was shunted aside and replaced by a burly body with a single, unyielding purpose - to get to Emmett, to protect Emmett.

Brian, never fond of being manhandled, even under the best of circumstances, swallowed his annoyance and turned to deflect the human tide that was rushing forward, forming a clot of bodies that blocked access to the path that needed to be clear.

"Get the fuck out of the way," he snarled, pushing Michael and Ben and Ted aside as Drew Boyd lifted Emmett and cradled him against his chest.
It was a testimony to the fear that drove them all that the crowd fell back immediately, in complete silence, as Brian raced toward the corner with Drew, carrying Emmett as carefully as if he were a helpless infant, at his side, and Calvin bringing up the rear.

Behind them, Lance Mathis - who knew more than a little about police procedures - did his best to preserve the crime scene, but the central figures in the developing drama had no room for thoughts beyond the immediacy of their need to get help. There was no mention of calling for an ambulance or dialing 911; they all knew it would be faster to take advantage of the silver Audi SUV still idling at the curb than to wait for help to arrive.

Brian was there first and behind the wheel without a single thought of who the rightful owner of the car might be or who should be driving, while Calvin hurried to help Drew slide into the back seat with Emmett still clasped tight against him, before leaping into the front seat as Brian peeled away from the curb.

The hospital was a fifteen-minute drive, even in light traffic.

They made it in nine flat.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

When the silver Audi pulled up in front of the Novotny/Horvath residence, it was almost two in the morning, but the house was as brightly lit as a shopping mall at Christmas time. Brian sighed, wondering briefly if this interminable day was ever going to end, before shoving the gearshift into park, eliciting a sub-vocal throat-clearing from Calvin who was now seated in the back seat, arms wrapped firmly around tonight's hapless victim.

In the passenger seat, Drew Boyd tried to swallow a smile, but without much success. He was so relieved - so overjoyed actually - that Emmett had suffered only minor injuries, that he would have smiled at almost anything. Nevertheless, if asked, he would have admitted that Calvin's irritation over Brian's less than reverent treatment of his trophy-Audi would have brought a smile to his face under any circumstances.

Brian turned to look into the back seat as Emmett stirred himself and sat up and shifted toward the door.

"You okay, Emmy Lou?" Brian asked softly.

Emmett kept his gaze averted, strangely touched by the gentleness he heard in a voice that was more commonly laced with sardonic wit. "Except for having flashbacks, to my Hazelhurst days of infamy, you know, I'm fine as frog's hair, Bri."

Brian glanced toward the house and saw the front door open and a thick knot of bodies emerge.

"Ready to face the inquisition?"

Emmett sighed. "I don't suppose it would do any good if I employed my very best Garbo impression and announced that 'I just vant to be alone'."

Brian grinned. "I count two Novotnys and one Schmidt in that crowd, so . . ."

"Yeah. That's what I thought." Emmett paused for a moment, before reaching for the door handle, tugging his jacket - Brian's very expensive jacket - closer around him and noticing for the first time that the leather had been torn and shredded during the attack. He knew that he should have been horrified, should offer abject apologies, but he couldn’t, and the look in Brian's eyes assured him that he needn't worry about it any further.

"Hold on there," said Drew, hurrying to climb out of the car to race around to the other side to take Emmett's arm. "Let me . . ."

"No need," said Calvin abruptly, moving to do the same. "I can handle it."

Brian smiled into Emmett's eyes as the two scurried for position. "Don't you just love triangles?" he asked with a smirk. "It's my favorite geometric shape."

"Shut the fuck up," Emmett replied, but a smile was tugging at his lips, even though he was still very pale, almost as white as the bandage that obscured his jawline on the left side of his face, and the smaller one that was stretched above his right eye.

"Enjoy it, Baby Boy," Brian whispered, leaning close. "You sure as hell earned it tonight."

Emmett tilted his head and quirked an eyebrow as he studied Brian's face. "Why do you do that?"

"Do what?" Brian was genuinely curious.

"You don't call anybody by pet names. Except Michael, and Justin, of course. But lately, you call me anything but Emmett."

Brian's smile was winsome. "Lately, I think of you as anything but Emmett."

Emmett frowned slightly, not quite sure how to take that answer. So he reverted to the original subject. "So . . . getting bashed qualifies me for membership in some kind of elite club?"

"No," Brian replied, eyes going dark with shades of memory as he looked away. "But surviving does."

Emmett did not bother to offer up a verbal answer, but the gentleness in his eyes spoke volumes. He knew full well what Brian was thinking, and who he was thinking of.

"What are you doing standing out here in the fucking cold?" The voice was shrill and piercing and unmistakable. "Get him into the house before he freezes solid. I've got hot cocoa," said Debbie, marching up and latching on to Emmett's arm as he climbed out of the car. Then her voice dropped to a near-whisper. "With angel's balls, Honey. Just for you."

Few indeed were the individuals who would be brash enough or brave enough to risk the outrage of Debbie Novotny when she was in her smothering mother persona, but she realized quickly that she'd met her match - twice - when Drew Boyd stepped up to take Emmett's arm on one side, and Brian Kinney - the very same Brian Kinney that she'd been attempting to intimidate for twenty years - stepped up on the other.

Neither Debbie nor Calvin Culpepper stood the smallest chance of deflecting either of those two irresistible forces in full protective mode.

Emmett hung between his two primary protectors like a rag doll, propelled along by the sheer force of their momentum, as some small part of him enjoyed being the focus of so much concern, not to mention reveling in the mastery of two decidedly alpha males.

There were a few moments of confusion inside the house as Drew and Brian helped Emmett out of his coat and got him settled on the sofa, as Calvin hovered for a bit before squeezing himself into the cushioned corner at Emmett's side, while Michael, Ted, Blake, and Ben took seats in a semi-circle facing the object of their concern, as Debbie served up hot chocolate for the crowd and the vanilla pudding laced with maple syrup for Emmett that was his favorite comfort food.

Then she turned and spent a wordless moment (a genuine rarity for Debbie) studying the expression in Brian's eyes, before moving into the kitchen and pouring out two hefty servings of whiskey which she handed to Brian and Drew. Both thanked her with a silent toast, before retreating to separate corners of the room, glad to relinquish the spotlight but still painfully alert. Drew's eyes never left Emmett's face, but Brian pointedly shifted his gaze to stare out the window, seeking solace in the darkness. Still, he said nothing, watched nothing, contributed nothing, but he listened carefully as Emmett tried to answer Ted's typically-phrased no-nonsense question.

"What the fuck happened, Em?"

Emmett paused to take a sip of steaming cocoa before attempting an answer. "I don't really know," he said finally. "To tell you the truth . . ." He hesitated, glancing toward Brian before completing his response, "I don't remember much of it. Except for the crowbar. That made a lasting impression, let me tell you."

"Jesus, Em!" said Michael, eyes going wide and lightless. "That's what they hit you with?"

He nodded. "Think so. That, and a few well-placed kicks. Did it ever occur to anyone that steel-toed boots should be registered as lethal weapons? But their aim was off - with the crowbar, I mean - so it was just a glancing blow." He took another sip of chocolate. "Think it would have been a lot worse, if Brian hadn't come out when he did. They were distracted, so . . ."

All eyes turned to regard Brian, who, of course, ignored them all.

"Everything's a little fuzzy," Emmett continued. "When we were walking to the car, I was still feeling a bit shaky. From the sight of blood, you know. So Calvin told me to just stay there and lean against the wall while he went to fetch the car. I closed my eyes and waited. Then I heard the shriek of breaks, and . . . after that, it's only bits and pieces. I think they were shouting at me . . . but I don't remember what. It's just a . . . blur."

"But the doctor said you're okay, right?" asked Debbie, coming up behind the sofa and laying her hands atop his shoulders. "All set for the Big Apple tomorrow. Right?"

Emmett was slow to answer, his eyes once more seeking Brian's only to find that Brian was still gazing out into the night. "Ahhhh, I don't think so, Deb," he said finally. "There's no permanent damage," he hastened to add, looking up to see the concern on her face. "The worst of it is a couple of cracked ribs, but I'm going to look like one of my Aunt Lula's crazy quilts for a while - all in black and blue - and I've got a mild sprain in my right ankle, so it's probably not a good idea for me to be doing a lot of walking. Plus my ugly purple bruises would only clash with Justin's beautiful primary colors artwork."

Brian was not quite able to suppress a grin. "We can't have that, now can we?" he muttered, but Drew Boyd was the only one who heard him. The brawny football player did not - quite - wink at him.

Debbie was nodding, trying to hide an upsurge of disappointment. It was not often that she got a chance to visit New York for any reason, much less to rub elbows with the city's artistic elite. "Of course, you can't go traipsing around like that. And we're going to stay right here with you, to make sure you're okay and . . ."

"You most certainly will not," Emmett snapped. "Justin is counting on you, especially since some . .
"He hesitated, once again glancing toward Brian. "Since he'll be needing support from family and friends, and you're going."

"But we were all going together," Michael pointed out. "With you and Calvin."

"And you still are," Emmett repeated, "with just one tiny change."

"But, Honey," Calvin said suddenly, "I'm not leaving you here alone."

Brian leaned forward and cleared his throat. "So what am I? Chopped liver? He won't be alone."

Then he looked around and met Drew Boyd's eyes and immediately recognized the flash of gratitude he read there - just before Boyd looked away, deliberately resuming his inscrutable expression.

"You?" laughed Michael. "You're going to look after Emmett? You couldn't take care of a goldfish."

Brian smiled, but there was no warmth in his eyes. "Oh, I don't know," he drawled. "You're still around, aren't you?"

For a moment, no one spoke, as they tried to ignore the elephant in the corner, for they all knew the truth of it, one way or another. Especially Michael and Debbie, who had lived it. Brian Kinney had protected and defended Michael from all comers - bullies and bashers, sadists and sociopaths - since the day they'd first met, when they were only fourteen years old. Because of more recent events, it wasn't a memory they particularly enjoyed recalling, especially Michael, who still wondered, sometimes, how he could possibly have allowed himself to forget so much and toss it away, as if it hadn't mattered at all.

Except that it had mattered - would always matter - no matter how hard he tried to deny it.

"I'll be just fine," said Emmett, overriding the awkwardness. "And you," he added, dropping a kiss on Calvin's cheek, "absolutely must go along. Unless, of course, you want to try to stuff Debbie into Ted's fuck-me-mobile."

"Hey," said Theodore, "how come when Brian buys a vintage 'Vette, nobody says a word? But when I buy a Miata . . ."

Eight pairs of eyes regarded him in complete silence.

"Okay, okay," he mumbled. "I see your point."

"Look," said Debbie firmly. "It's not that big a deal. I'm sure Justin will be just fine, and . . ."

Everybody was a bit surprised when it was Brian who spoke up. "You should go, Deb. You should all . . . go."

"Well, so should . . ." But something in his eyes caused Debbie to fall silent, something that reminded her of why Justin had gone to New York in the first place, and why she sometimes felt the stirring of a vague sense of guilt when she considered how Brian's life had turned out.

They had all believed that convincing Justin to pursue his big dreams in New York would ultimately be in his best interest, would save him from throwing his life away on the Brian Kinney they all professed to know so well - the one who would never be able to commit to anything on a personal level.

None of them, apparently, had spared a single thought of what it would do to Brian, because . . .
well, because Brian could take it - had always taken it, no matter what life decided to dish out to him. And because he could, no one ever spent a lot of time worrying about how he would manage it. He just would, and that was all that mattered. But sometimes, once in a great while, she wondered; sometimes she felt a moment of doubt and uncertainty. But not often, and not for long.

Still . . .

How, she wondered, would the rest of them cope if they were forced to endure . . .

But she didn't want to think about that. Instead, she wanted to concentrate on all the good things in her life, all the things that had worked out exactly as she'd wanted, all the parts of her idyllic existence. Her son and his partner and their cozy home, her grandchildren, her man, her extended family.

She carefully avoided looking toward Brian Kinney.

Debbie wasn't much given to introspection or to reflection on causes and effects or old mistakes, but she did know that some mistakes could never be corrected - and just didn't bear thinking about.

Instead, she managed to swallow the empty feeling that was rising within her, and felt a huge rush of relief when Carl Horvath came through the door. The pundits had it all wrong, she thought; it was distraction that was truly the better part of valor.

Carl had not had a good day and wasn't really in the mood for socializing. Nevertheless, since he'd become a part of Debbie's life, he'd been forced to adapt himself to her lifestyle and her schedule. He knew that she was a good woman, with a big heart and a kind soul, but he also knew that she was prone to see things the way she chose to see them rather than as they really were, and that there were certain things that she would prefer not to know.

Therefore, he knew he had to be careful in choosing his words; he simply wasn't up to dealing with escalating hysteria at the end of such a day.

When he walked into the house, the first person he saw was Brian Kinney, in familiar circumstances. Brian - with the group, but not really of the group, and painfully aware of the distinction. Carl often wondered why none of the rest of them seemed to notice it.

One look into shadowed hazel eyes told him that he need not have worried about any confrontation with Kinney; if such a confrontation were to happen, it would not be tonight, and it would be at the time and place of Kinney's choosing.

The detective often thought that it was amazing how far young Kinney was willing to go to protect the people who orbited around his life, not to mention how unaware of the depth of his protection those same people remained.

But Debbie was an entirely different matter. He sometimes felt like he had developed the skill of walking on egg shells to a new artform.

When everyone turned to look at him, he knew there was no way out of giving them some kind of information. Eggshells, indeed.

He took a moment to hang up his coat before turning to face the questions in their eyes. "I don't have much to tell you," he said quickly, before looking over at Brian. "Except that your new security man would have made a hell of a cop. If you're smart, you'll put him in charge and let him run the whole operation as he sees fit."
Brian nodded, but offered no comment.

"But there wasn't much to be done. We got a broad description of the vehicle - a big, black or dark blue expensive SUV - might be a Caddy or a Lexus but no one was sure, with some kind of logo on a rear glass. Three men who attacked Emmett, all wearing dark clothes and caps, and one or two more waiting in the car. Most of the witnesses thought they were white, but not everyone was sure."

"That's all?" Debbie's voice was almost at screech pitch.

Carl once more glanced toward Brian, and saw what he was looking for in dark eyes.

"So far," he replied to Debbie, before looking down at Emmett. "You okay, Kid?"

Emmett, who was almost as fond of Carl as he was of Debbie, simply smiled and nodded.

"Good. Think you'll be up to coming down to the station tomorrow, and giving us a statement?"

Emmett looked as if he'd rather take a root canal, but he nodded anyway.

Then Carl turned back to look at Brian. "You want to make sure he gets there?"

Brian's smile was diffident, as he reflected that Horvath was skilled at getting what he wanted without divulging more than he had to. It was probable that no one else would comprehend that Emmett wasn't the only one who would face questioning.

"I think that's my cue," said Brian in lieu of a direct answer. "It's late, I'm fucking beat, and I've got meetings in the morning, so . . ."

"But you don't have your car," said Michael. "How will you . . ."

Brian held up a hand to forestall his old friend's protest. "I've been walking Liberty Avenue since I was fourteen, Mikey. I think I can find my way without too much trouble."

Then he proceeded to retrieve his worse-for-the-wear jacket from the coat rack, shot Emmett a quick, slightly venal grin, and headed for the door.

"Hold on a minute," said Horvath, before turning to speak privately to Drew Boyd for a few seconds. The football player listened intently, before nodding and stepping into the kitchen where he took a cell phone from his pocket and made a quick call. Then both he and Horvath crossed the room to join Brian at the entry, where Boyd paused for a moment to look once more toward Emmett, his face softening slightly as he nodded good night.

No words were exchanged between the two, but then again, none were needed.

Calvin Culpepper was sitting very still, eyes fastened on his hands which were folded tight in his lap, and Brian felt a quick pang of sympathy for the southerner, who was truly a very nice guy. Only everyone knew that, sometimes, nice guys really did finish last. It wasn't a particularly pleasant thought, but it was very true.

On the porch, Brian zipped his jacket before turning to face Carl Horvath, only slightly surprised to note that Drew Boyd was still waiting there beside them.

Horvath got right to the point. "We don't know much about what happened tonight, Brian, but we know enough to be alarmed. There's some ugly crap going on right now, and Liberty Avenue is suddenly at the center of the shitstorm. So I want you to be careful. Until we know more, it's best not to take chances."

"What chances?" Brian replied impatiently. "I'm just . . ."

"Just walking down Liberty Avenue," Horvath interrupted. "Like you've done since you were fourteen. Yeah, I know. But it's a different world today, and not necessarily a better one. Every kid that runs the street now is a potential target."

The grin flashed again. "Well, thanks for the compliment, Detective, but I'm not - quite - a kid any more."

"No. You're a very successful businessman, and someone who's never made any secret of being gay. That could put a big fat bull's eye on your back."

Brian shook his head, still unwilling to concede any concern. But then he looked up and saw something shift in the detective's eyes, something dark and filled with foreboding. "OK," he said softly. "What is it that you're not telling me?"

Horvath drew a deep breath. "So far, there's nothing to tell, except to point out that it's stupid to take unnecessary risks." Then he grinned. "And Brian Kinney might be many things, but stupid ain't one of them."

"So what is it that you want . . ."

He was interrupted by a squeal of brakes as a dark green Range Rover came to a stop at the end of the driveway.

"I want you to get in that car and go home. No going back to Babylon; no stops at Woody's or anywhere else. And . . ."

Brian didn't bother to suppress a sigh. "And?"

"No tricks."

The sigh became a chuckle. "You can't possibly think that a trick could be responsible for this."

But Horvath was not amused. "And you can't possibly know what I'm thinking. So just humor me. OK?"

"For how long? I've got a reputation to maintain, you know."

Horvath nodded toward the car idling at the curb. "Yeah, well, one night without fucking ain't gonna cost you your title, Champ. As for tomorrow, we'll see. But for now, just be a good boy, and let your new chief of security see you home."

"Fuck!" snapped Brian, irritated for no good reason.

"Is that an invitation?" called Drew with a smile, from his place at the bottom of the front steps.

"Fuck you!" Brian retorted, without missing a beat.

Carl then patted him on the shoulder, and made brief eye contact with Boyd, who was still smiling. "Don't worry," said the quarterback. "I'll see that he does as he's told."

"What are you?" Brian snarled. "My daddy?"
But he didn't wait for an answer, choosing instead to stalk down the driveway toward the waiting Rover.

By the time he made it to the car, with Drew just a step behind him, Brian had progressed from mild annoyance to a simmering anger. He had never liked being ordered around or treated like a child in need of protection - even when he was a child in need of protection - which he had almost never received anyway. He had spent his entire life taking care of himself, many times under circumstances that put him in extreme peril, and come through unscathed. Mostly.

And it didn't assuage his ill humor at all when he climbed into the passenger seat to note that Lance Mathis was wearing a smile that clearly acknowledged that he knew that his new boss was on the verge of being royally pissed.

"What the fuck are you doing here?" Brian demanded.

"I called him," said Drew as he slid into the back seat.

"For what?"

"To see that we both get home safe."

Brian turned to glare at his newest employee. "I told you. I don't need protection."

Mathis smiled. "Whatever you say."

"And who made you my chief of security? Did I miss something?"

The smile widened to a grin. "You've been a little busy."

"Fuck this!" Brian snapped, and twisted to reach for the door handle, only to find himself immobilized by arms like steel bands that wrapped around him from behind. "What the fuck . . ."

"Brian." Drew Boyd's voice was very soft, but there was a note of iron in it that got Brian's undivided attention. "We can stay here like this all night if you insist on acting like a shithead. I spend my days taking on 300-pound linebackers, so do you really think you're going to manage to get away from me? And besides, it's not like I'm not enjoying the view, if you catch my drift." And he deliberately let one hand slide down inside the leather of his captive's jacket, to caress a patch of bare skin.

"I - don't - need - a - babysitter!" Brian spat through clinched teeth, heaving himself sideways and around and managing to dislodge Drew's wandering hand when he surged up and took the quarterback's mouth in a violent kiss that was more a physical assault than an exercise in foreplay, so he reasoned that it was not - technically - a violation of his self-inflicted rule - mostly.

To his own surprise, Drew pulled back and burst out laughing. "You're one tough little shit," he admitted, "and I really, really would love to fuck you through the floor." But he paused then, and cupped a surprisingly gentle hand around Brian's face. "But I'm guessing that's not going to happen." His voice sank to a whisper. "For more reasons than one." Then he nuzzled for a moment at Brian's ear, dropped a small, chaste kiss on his brow, and loosened his grip. "Now sit down and shut up, and let Lance do what he does best."

"Which is what?" Brian demanded, slightly breathless and not happy about it.

It was Mathis who provided an answer. "Keep you alive, to fuck another day."
Brian chewed a bit on his bottom lip before settling back against the leather headrest and closing his eyes - the closest he was prepared to come to an admission of defeat. He still wasn't pleased with how things were going, but he thought - maybe - he could learn to live with it.

For now.

The delegation from Pittsburgh, along with Melanie Marcus, stood in the middle of the art gallery, eyes wide as they tried to take in everything at once. But it was almost too much to comprehend.

Not the space so much, as the gallery was actually not as large as the one where Lindsey had been employed before taking off to Toronto. But what it lacked in size, it made up for in elegance, and in the stature of its clientele. They had barely entered the building before they'd spotted two internationally acclaimed movie stars and a world famous fashion model whose face had been on every major magazine in the world during the past year. They all recognized those luminaries, of course, but it was left to Ben to identify two best-selling authors, a Grammy-winning composer, a couple of major political movers-and-shakers, and one Pulitzer-winning playwright. On the other hand, it was Ted who attached famous names to a couple of stars of the Metropolitan opera and some members of the elite of New York society. There were also network news people, some familiar actors and actresses from major television programs, and one hugely successful talk show host.

"Wow!" Debbie's normally raucous voice was barely audible. "Sunshine's really hit it out of the ballpark with his first swing, huh?"

"Absolutely," replied Ted. "It's hard to believe he almost gave up everything to be . . . well. He should be grateful that he didn't pass up the chance to be here. That would have been a real tragedy."

Calvin Culpepper, who still didn't feel completely at home among these individuals who were Emmett's family in all but blood, looked around with interest and noted that all the guests seemed to be mesmerized by the quality of the artwork. But Calvin knew the story of Justin and Brian, had listened carefully to the details as Emmett told the tale, and couldn't help but wonder.

This was undoubtedly a triumph for the young artist, but was it enough, he wondered, to make up for what had been sacrificed to achieve it?

Then again, he reminded himself, he didn't know Justin at all, and he knew Brian only slightly, so it certainly wasn't up to him to draw conclusions. And judging from the looks on the faces of his companions - these people who knew both parties extremely well - he was probably way off-base. They looked as if they were certain that this occasion would be everything that Justin had ever wanted in his life.

Although he had seen something in Emmett's eyes when they'd said their good-byes earlier in the day - something that seemed to suggest otherwise.

"And what about the new boyfriend?" asked Debbie. "Jesus! Jennifer must be over the moon. This guy is every PFLAG mother's dream."

"You think?" asked Michael softly. "Because she doesn't exactly look overjoyed."

They all turned then to study Jennifer Taylor as she stood talking to Lindsey and one of the critics who had the artistic clout to make or break a young artist. From the look on his face, he was preparing to do just that, to Justin's advantage. There was no mistaking the look of pride in her eyes as she watched her son conversing with several members of the social elite, explaining a fine point in one of her favorite examples of his work: a self-portrait of the young blonde standing at a window looking down at a busy street, with a pair of firm, muscled arms wrapped around him from behind. There was no face to identify who the arms belonged to, but then again, there was no need for one. Anyone who knew Justin, knew him as he had been before he abandoned the wilds of Pittsburgh for the rarefied atmosphere of New York, would know immediately.

Jennifer had always loved that painting - had even planned to purchase it, if she could swing the price - but her hopes had been dashed when she saw the discreet but irrefutable tag that was affixed to the frame when the exhibition opened. Sold. She hadn't realized that some of her son's work had been subject to early sales, as a courtesy to other gallery owners.

The show was proving to be a huge success, in part because of the gushing reaction of so many of the visitors to the gallery and the fact that they were among the rich and famous who never had to worry about stretching the budget to cover a luxury purchase, and in part because of the pre-sales, which included the pieces that Jennifer quickly recognized as Justin's genius at work in its most elemental, pristine form.

Including the focal points of the entire exhibition - the two paintings that resided in their special niche at the top of the stairs.

How could anybody look at those two magnificent works of art, she wondered, and fail to see the core truth of her son's existence? Brian Kinney might be physically absent from his life, but he lived still in Justin's heart. She thought it likely that he always would, even though Justin and all his Pittsburgh friends were busy denying it.

Steven was at Justin's side, as he had been all evening, one hand constantly touching the young artist - at the nape of his neck, on his shoulder, stroking the small of his back. Just touching, lightly, almost casually, but with great purpose.

Jennifer had the strangest notion that the hand was the equivalent of the discreet "sold" signs that were affixed to many of the works of art on display.

She was being irrational, and she knew it. If she could have designed a man to partner her son - having finally conceded that there would never be a woman who would set him "straight" - Steven would have been close to perfect to fill the bill. Handsome, sophisticated, intellectual, cultured, socially adept, generous, loving, and blessed with old money and the bluest of blood; what was not to love? She watched as he basked in the glow of Justin's success, as proud of his lover's accomplishments as he would have been of his own, and she smiled when he glanced toward her, undoubtedly having sensed the weight of her regard.

What was not to love indeed? Except . . . but there was no point in going there. The past was dead; there was no going back, and she truly had no idea why she should even want to. It wasn't as if the one her son had left behind had been his perfect match. She knew that; hell, they all knew that. And she turned to exchange smiles with the crew from Pittsburgh to reassure herself. It was there, in all their faces. They knew, as well as she did, that this was where Justin belonged; this was what he was meant to do, and what he never would have done if . . .

She looked once more toward her son and caught him staring at the canvas before him, a strange, winsome little smile touching his perfect lips, as Steven laughed in response to some witty comment from the talk show host who was not known as a huge supporter of the arts.

Jennifer wasn't sure, but she had a fleeting notion that Justin had not heard a word the man had said.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
tbc
Chapter 8

"You gotta give the devil his due." Debbie's comment was meant to be discreet, but it fell into a conversational lull in the gallery, like a stone into still water, sending out ripples in all directions, threaded through the quiet sweetness of the music of a string quartet. "He may be a total shithead, but you can't deny that Brian Kinney makes one drop-dead-gorgeous model."

The Pittsburgh delegation, dressed in their most elegant attire, which ran the sartorial gambit from the formality of the tuxedos worn by Ted, Blake, and Calvin, through the more casual business suits sported by Michael and Ben, to the spangled scarlet of Debbie's satin gown and Melanie's characteristic black, was standing in front of a canvas that was more shadow than light, that displayed a model in profile, definitely not clad in his Sunday best - or anything else, for that matter - emerging from a striated cloud of steam or a swirl of smoke, indistinct, unclear - and unmistakable.

Nearby a tall, slender man with salt and pepper hair, clad in an Armani suit, Prada shoes, mother-of-pearl cuff links from Tiffany's, and a crimson silk scarf, was studying another rendering of Brian, this one a view from the back, showing just a bare shoulder, the nape of the neck caressed by dark, sweaty hair, and a nuance of jawline. "Is that the model's name?" he asked softly. "He permeates the entire exhibit - even in the works that don't focus on him - and forgive me for saying it, but he doesn't look like a total shithead."

"That's because you're seeing him through the artist's eyes," said Melanie quickly, secure in her certainty that Justin had never been able to see Brian as he was, rather than as he wished him to be.

The man turned piercing gray eyes to her and studied what he saw in her face. "Really? I'm not sure I'd agree with that. I find that artists are usually able to see things more clearly than other people. They tend to put aside preconceived notions, and see truth."

Melanie turned to look at the next portrait, a backlit profile of Brian's face, chin balanced against his fist, obviously lost in thought, and even more beautiful than usual. "Trust me," she said firmly. "That's not the true face of Brian Kinney."

"Pity," said the man. "I'd like to meet the man who could inspire such a vision."

Justin and Lindsey approached at that moment, just in time to hear the comment.

"Yes," said Lindsey firmly. "You would. How are you, Gareth?" The soft gallery lighting enhanced her blonde delicacy and the beaded, re-embroidered ivory silk of her bias-cut gown.

"I'm fine, Lindsey. And I want to thank you for sending me a heads up about this exhibition."

"My pleasure. I thought you'd like it. And this is the artist. Justin, this is Gareth Kyle. He writes for the Times."

"I know who he is," said Justin with a diffident smile, stepping forward to shake the columnist's hand. "Thank you for coming, and thank you for recognizing the inspiration for so much of my work."

"Your muse?"

Justin winced, not at all comfortable with the connotations inherent in that word. "No. My first love.
At least, he . . . was." He looked away then, momentarily dismayed and wondering if anyone had noticed his hesitation, or if anyone would understand how hard it was for him to speak of Brian in past tense.

Kyle's smile was slightly wistful. "I'd love to 'recognize' him, in person."

"Yeah," Justin replied softly. "So would I."

"Shit!" Melanie muttered, not quite under her breath. "The asshole's not even here, and he still manages to steal the show."

Of them all, only Calvin, Blake, and the Times columnist noticed the quick frown that touched Justin's face, and the tiny flare of resentment that flashed in the depths of blue-on-blue eyes, but none of them could avoid noticing when the young artist abruptly took Michael's arm and pulled him away from the group. When Debbie stirred as if to intercept them, it was Ben who stepped forward and stopped her, with a murmured comment that she should give the young men a moment of privacy. Her grimace clearly indicated what she thought of his suggestion, but she accepted it anyway, albeit not very graciously.

"How is he?" Justin, speaking very softly, knew full well that he didn't have to specify who "he" was.

Michael did not - quite - squirm. "He's . . . Brian, doing what he always does. Did you expect him to fall apart?"

Justin sighed. "I don't know what I expected, except . . ."

Despite himself, Michael felt a surge of sympathy. "Except that you thought he'd follow you here."

After a brief pause, Justin shifted slightly, eyes unfocused and filled with shadow. "I didn't think he'd just walk away."

Michael looked over at one of the many images of Brian's face that lined the wall in front of him. "He didn't. Remember? You're the one that walked. Not that I blame you," he hastened to add when he identified the flash of anger in Justin's expression. "It was what everybody thought you should do, and I guess your success here proves that everybody was right. Only . . ."

"Only?"

"Forget it. I'm just . . ."

"No. I don't want to forget it. Tell me what you were going to say."

Michael hesitated. Then he took a deep breath. "I just never quite understood why you had to come to New York to paint, especially after Brian . . . " He paused then, reluctant to turn their conversation into a hostile exchange. Justin surely knew, as well as Michael did, that the concessions Brian had been willing to make, for Justin's sake, had been unprecedented, even unimaginable to those who thought they knew him best. "I mean, don't people paint in other places?"

"Yeah. They do." Justin paused to survey the crowds around them, to spend a moment basking in the glow of his success, as he listened in on the appreciative murmurs of the browsers, to grasp for validation of his choices as old, familiar doubts assailed him. "So he's really OK then? I don't need to worry about him?"

Michael's sympathy was immediately replaced by a surge of irritation. "He's Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake! He's survived more shit than you can even imagine, throughout his whole fucking life, and he'll sure as shit survive you too. In fact, he's on his way to London. Looks like Kinnetik is going to be opening up a new office there."

Justin swallowed his own annoyance, understanding that Michael did not like having to explain Brian's vulnerabilities, or even acknowledge that he had them. "Like the one he opened here?"

Michael flushed. "Yeah. Only, according to Ted, it was Cynthia who did all the work here. I don't think Brian has much stomach for the Big Apple these days."

"Really? I remember a time when it was all he wanted."

"Yeah, so do I. What can I say? Things change."

Justin turned quickly, to give his old frenemy his full attention. "So is that what you're telling me? That he's moved on? Are you saying that he doesn't . . . love me any more?"

It surprised Michael how much he wanted to shout out his response, to confirm Justin's suspicions by denying what he knew to be the truth. But ultimately, he couldn't. "No. I'm not saying that. But you should know him well enough to understand that he's never going to come after you. He's never going to allow his need or his love for you to interfere with the life he thinks you want." He looked up then, and saw Steven making his way toward them. "And it looks like he's right. Your new main squeeze seems to be everything Brian isn't - a perfect candidate for your affections. Your mother - and mine - must be so proud."

There was no way Justin could fail to identify the faintly acidic quality of that statement, but there was also no time to respond to it as Steven was upon them then, eyes full of questions and concerns, with Justin's mother and best friend approaching from another direction. The young artist put on his most dazzling smile, determined to entertain his guests, to sparkle for his audience - to stifle the ugly little voice that insisted on repeating the same phrase over and over in his mind. He could have come here - to be with me - and he's going to London instead. He could have come here.

He looked up at Steven, and saw the love and pride in the eyes that gazed back at him . . . and came to a sudden decision, wondering why it had taken him so long to see the light.

The conversation then turned to introductions and reminiscences and catching up with gossip, old and new, and deliberately ignoring tired, unanswered questions. But there was ultimately no way of hiding from the face that looked down at them from every canvas on the wall behind them; they were all aware of it, though most managed to maintain their silence and maneuver the conversation toward other topics.

Except for Debbie Novotny, of course, who had never maintained her silence about anything, for any reason. She wound up at Jennifer's side, with Daphne standing wide-eyed and flushed nearby, while Steven regaled the rest of the group with a running commentary about the volume and value of Justin's sales and the intensity of the critical acclaim the show was generating. Debbie tried to pay attention, but was quickly lost in the logistics and vagaries of artistic marketing; then she looked up and found herself the focal point of a pair of hazel eyes that almost seemed to follow her as she moved. It was not a particularly comfortable sensation, and she deliberately turned away. Then she concentrated on telling herself that it was just her imagination insisting that she was still being watched.

"Pretty fuckin' impressive, huh?" she asked, speaking more softly than was her wont. "Guess there can't be any doubt any more about him doing the right thing."
Jennifer, elegant in a dark green Dolce & Gabanna frock, looked puzzled. "The right thing?"

"Yeah." Debbie laughed, and heads turned to follow the sound. "It's pretty damned obvious that coming to New York opened all kinds of doors for him. He's a big success story now."

Jennifer turned to look at her son, who was staring up toward the second story, toward the niche that sheltered his two most special paintings - two that the general public never got a chance to purchase as they'd already been sold before the exhibition opened - and she noted that he looked comfortable and relaxed. But not terribly . . .

"Yes," she said softly. "I guess he is."

"And the new boyfriend . . . well, who wouldn't be pleased as punch? Handsome, classy, rich, attentive . . . and treats Justin like he's some kind of precious jewel. Just about perfect, right?"

"Right."

Debbie frowned. "Look, Honey. You might try for a little more enthusiasm. This is every mother's dream, for her kid. Isn't it?"

Once more, Jennifer studied Justin's face; then she turned and saw a flicker of . . . something in Daphne's eyes as the young woman moved away. "Is it?" she asked quietly. "Is it really?"

"What do you . . ."

"Look at him, Debbie." Jennifer's voice was suddenly harsh, like the friction of shifting shards of broken glass. "Really look, and let go of your preconceived notions about what you want to see. What you'd want to see if he were your son. Look at him, and tell me what's really there."

Debbie tried to do as Jennifer asked. Tried to find the right thing to say . . . and wound up choking on her silence.

Jennifer said nothing more; she simply walked away, following Daphne to a small loveseat near a window alcove, for she knew that she would not get the blunt, uncompromising answer she was looking for from Debbie. Although honest to a fault, Debbie had one major shortcoming in any attempt to explore truth; she saw the world through lenses distorted by her own dreams of conventional fairy-tale endings. Debbie loved Ben, whom she had come to accept as her son's permanent partner, although that acceptance had come slowly because of his HIV-positive status. But she had never quite gotten over the fact that Michael had once had a doctor for a lifemate - the ultimate achievement for the scion of a less than affluent family. The pleasure of speaking the phrase "My son-in-law, the professor" would never quite measure up to the joy of being able to utter the words, "My son-in-law, the doctor."

As for Brian . . . Jennifer honestly didn't understand why Debbie's opinions of the young man wavered so drastically. Sometimes she appeared to love him like a surrogate mother would; other times, she seemed eager to condemn and abandon him to whatever fate awaited him. And she had never been reticent in expressing her disapproval for the way he treated Justin, choosing to believe the worst of her son's longtime friend and blame him for every bump in the rocky road of his relationship with Justin.

Jennifer would have liked to believe that everything was Brian's fault; it would have been comforting, but it wouldn't have been fair or accurate. Justin had made his share of mistakes too. She closed her eyes and remembered a scrawny musician with a ridiculous goatee. Debbie and the group she thought of as her extended family had accepted Ethan Gold and welcomed him into the group.
without a second thought, never realizing that he was a pretentious, posturing little cretin who would prove adept at saying the things Justin wanted to hear and meaning none of them.

But Daphne was a different story. Daphne knew Justin like no one else did, not even Brian. And Daphne would not split hairs over truth.

"So," said Jennifer as she took a seat beside her son's best friend since childhood, "what do you think?"

"I think what I've always thought," Daphne answered, taking a tiny sip of champagne from a fluted glass. "Justin's a huge talent, Mrs. Taylor. He deserves every success."

Jennifer turned once more to look at her son, who was now in deep conversation with Lindsey Peterson and a couple of eccentric looking young men in less-than-formal dress. "I agree, but that's not what I meant."

Daphne shifted in her seat, and her eyes moved quickly from one place to another, as if unsure where she wanted to rest them. Finally, she settled for staring into her glass. "Mrs. Taylor, I don't . . ."

"Daphne, please." Jennifer's voice was very soft, just above a whisper, but it was very firm and filled with resolve. "You know what I'm asking. Is he . . ."

"Daphne, please." Jennifer's voice was very soft, just above a whisper, but it was very firm and filled with resolve. "You know what I'm asking. Is he . . ."

"Steven is very good to him," Daphne interrupted. "He's a really nice guy, and he loves Justin. He's even been kind enough to tag along with us while Justin shows me the sights, and you know he has to be bored to tears. We took a carriage ride through Central Park, and I'm sure he just wanted to roll his eyes and look at us as if we'd gone crackers. But he didn't. He was really sweet and caring and . . . He'd do anything for Justin. Anything at all."

"And?"

"He's perfect, isn't he? I can't imagine how he could be more perfect. Can you?"

Jennifer said nothing. She just quirked one eyebrow - and waited.

"Except," said Daphne slowly, "for one thing."

Jennifer sighed. "Which would be what?"

Daphne refused to look up, becoming enthralled in watching the bubbles rise in her goblet. "I'm sorry, Mrs. Taylor. I know what you want to hear, what you want to believe. And if I could give you what you want, I would."

Jennifer sighed. "It's all right, Daphne. I think I have some idea of what you're trying to say."

"I know you don't want to face the truth. I know it goes against everything you've ever wanted for him." Daphne looked up then, and there were tears in her eyes. "But I can't change it, any more than you can. Steven is perfect . . . except that he's not Brian. I don't know what the future holds for Justin; I hope he's able to be happy with whatever lies ahead. And if he chooses Steven, I hope they can make a life together. But the bottom line is never going to change; in this one respect, he is never going to change. Nobody is ever going to replace Brian in his heart." She looked down again, and her voice sank to a whisper. "I'm sorry."

Jennifer took a deep breath; then she rose and moved slowly toward the corner of the room where the largest, most detailed portrait - life-size - of Brian Kinney was framed in a pool of light. She was surprised to find Daphne at her side when she stopped to stand looking up at it.
"Mrs. Taylor . . ."

"Don't you think it's time you called me Jennifer. After all, you're a major force in my son's life."

Daphne smiled. "OK, Jennifer. Would you mind if I gave you some advice?"

Jennifer smiled. "At this stage, I think I could use some."

"You might not like it much."

The smile grew broader. "There are plenty of things that I don't like much, but that doesn't mean I don't need to hear them."

Daphne nodded, and spent a moment considering how to phrase her suggestion in the least offensive way. Then she realized that it wouldn't matter much; if Jennifer wanted to be offended, she would be, no matter how tactfully the idea was presented.

"When you look at Brian," Daphne said softly, with a glance toward the stunning face captured on the canvas, "you still see what you saw the first time you looked at him. Even though you try not to. Even though things have changed drastically over the years, you still see the man who stole your baby boy's innocence. You see the predator, the child molester that your husband accused him of being."

"No, I . . ."

"Yes, you do," Daphne insisted, although her voice was very gentle. "That's the first thing you see. And then, you begin to see all the other versions of Brian Kinney. You see the image he allows others to see. For example, you see him through Debbie's eyes - as the brash, bold, uncompromising, flamboyant rake, who always cast the shadow that kept Michael from the limelight, who loved Michael, but couldn't be in love with him the way Michael (and his mother) wanted. Then you see him through Lindsey's eyes, as the heartbreaker who knew exactly what she wanted from him, but refused to pretend to be someone he wasn't in order to make her dreams come true. You see him as Mel sees him, as the man who was first in Lindsey's heart and might - just might - still hold that title, now and forever, and the person who was able to father Gus, something that she couldn't do. You see him as Ben sees him, as the obstacle to his total happiness with Michael. As Ted sees him, with jealousy and envy and a suppressed rage over the fact that he can strive for it his whole life but he'll never be Brian. Even as those who don't really know him see him. As the maverick, the rogue, the one who dares to challenge everybody's conventions and refuses to compromise what he expects of himself and everybody else. Even what he demands . . . from Justin."

Jennifer stared into the eyes of the portrait, that glowed with so much life yet revealed so little. "OK," she said slowly. "If you're right - and that's a big if - how should I see him? What should I see when I . . ."

Daphne's smile was gentle. "You have to cast off everybody else's perceptions, and forget what they see when they look at him, because here's a fundamental truth. Every one of them sees Brian as they need to see him and as he allows them to see him, to enable them to feel smug and self-satisfied and condescending, or, sometimes, just to survive with ego intact. But the truth is that this guy is the most honest, most upfront, most truthful man I have ever known. And I can say that because I don't see him through the eyes of love, although I admit to spending about an hour in the throes of Brian Kinney infatuation - just like everybody else in the world. But ultimately, I only see him as the man who lives in my best friend's heart, and that's how I judge him. And I honestly don't understand why so few of us see him as he really is - as the most generous, caring person I've ever known, because he not only busts his balls to take care of all the people he cares about, he also makes sure that they never have to say thank you. Most of the time, in fact, they don't even know about it, because they don't want to know. It's easier that way. Is he a narcissist, the way Melanie loves to proclaim? Just take a look at him." She nodded toward the beautiful portrait, and laughed. "Shit! Can you imagine anybody who looks like that not knowing that he's fucking beautiful? But that's strictly from the physical perspective. Inside, that's different."

Then she paused and turned to stare directly into Jennifer's eyes. "And one more thing. If you can put aside all the filters imposed by everybody else's opinion and see him clearly, you'll realize that he's also the person who'll love Justin as no one else ever will. Every day for the rest of his life. He was willing to marry him, for God's sake, even though he absolutely does not believe in marriage. I mean, why should he? Given the state of the institution, why should any of us? But he was willing to do it. For Justin. And that's the bottom line. For everything he does, for everything he doesn't do. It's always for Justin, and it always will be. Even if they never see each other again. Even if Justin chooses to stay away from him forever, to build a new life with a new partner, to put the past behind him. Brian will allow it - will live with it - and will go on loving Justin as he always has, without ever once trying to put him in a cage. For Justin. It always bothers me that almost nobody understands that. It says a lot about the man he is, and it's a shame that there are so few who are able to hear it."

"But why?" asked Jennifer, stunned by the depth of Daphne's certainty. "Why would he . . ."

But Daphne was turning away, having spotted Justin moving toward them. Still, she paused and favored his mother with a sympathetic smile. "I think that's a question that I have no right to answer," she explained. "One you should put to Brian. And maybe, if you catch him in the right mood and at the right moment, he might give you an answer. Not necessarily an honest one, but honest enough, perhaps, for you to be able to figure it out. Because Brian never lies, you know. Not when it matters.
He might sidestep and obfuscate and camouflage and deflect, but he never lies."

With a final smile, she went to find Justin, who was understandably excited about the success of the night. He had sold eleven of his paintings, for a respectable sum, and he had drunk enough champagne to be feeling no pain.

Then Daphne noticed the pale specter of old misery in his eyes as he glanced once more toward the niche at the top of the stairs, and she revised her opinion. The pain was never entirely absent.
Probably never would be. But he was learning to live with it.

She wanted to be happy for him - wanted to believe that it would all turn out for the best. Wanted not to know that he was learning to close himself off, to turn away from what he had always wanted most to settle for what he was currently wanting at all.

The evening wore on, and it was late when the crowds began to thin.

It was Steven who proposed that the group of old friends should decamp and resume their reunion at a small, all-night bistro down the street. Justin and almost everyone else assumed that he was just tired and looking for a more comfortable spot to loosen his tie, sit back and have a drink and relax, but Daphne understood his motivation when she spotted Margo Renton going into the display area at the top of the stairs with a young man at her side, carrying packing materials. It was immediately obvious that the show was really over, and the two paintings were about to be crated for shipping.

Daphne considered how it might feel to stand by and watch as the products of one's creative genius - the offspring of one's lifework - were boxed up to be sent away, to a new home in a strange place, ever to be seen or touched again.

She was glad then that Justin was going to be spared that experience.
"You're looking particularly lovely tonight, Daphne," said Ted as they all settled into an over-sized booth at the dark and sooty old tavern called Nathan's Pub. She smiled as she shrugged out of her jacket, and her silver tunic, bright with beaded embroidery, glistened in the light shed from the frosted globe of the wall sconce behind them.

Justin flashed his friend a mischievous grin. "Yeah. Brian always said that he'd fuck her."

"There are plenty who do," said Ben, and Michael looked at his husband with a surprised smile. Comments issued in defense of Brian were rare in this group; from Ben, they were even rarer, and Michael was pleased. Then his smile faded slightly, as he gave his reaction further thought. Things had been different since the night Babylon had gone up in flames. So had Brian, and so had Ben's attitude toward his husband's oldest and best friend. Michael was glad, he thought. Still, it had always been a tiny source of comfort for him to know that Ben would take his side in any dispute with Brian, no matter what. He realized abruptly that he didn't want to think about the possibility that such an attitude might have changed.

"So," said Melanie quickly, eager to change the subject, "have we decided our itinerary for tomorrow? Anybody up for a tour of Yankee Stadium? Or . . ."

"Jesus, you really are a dyke," laughed Ted. "I was thinking more along the lines of a matinee of Mamma Mia. Or a major shopping spree at Bloomingdale's."

Lindsey laughed. "Ted, you're living proof that fags have replaced diamonds as a girl's best friend."

Debbie turned to Justin, her smile beaming. "What about it, Sunshine? How about you give us a tour of your favorite places?"

Justin smiled and opened his mouth to respond, but paused as Steven wrapped an arm around his shoulders. "I'm afraid that won't be possible, Debbie," said the broker. "We have a plane to catch."

"Really? I didn't know you were planning a trip," said Jennifer. "Where are you going?"

Steven smiled. "We're off for an adventure in paradise. The South Pacific. Specifically, Tahiti."

"Oh-my-God!" said Daphne. "That is sooo romantic. But I thought you were still thinking about it."

Justin did not offer a verbal response. Instead, he simply turned to give her a tiny smile, but she clearly heard the words he didn't bother to speak. Brian was going to London; that was explanation enough.

"Well, he finally made up his mind," explained Steven. "Tomorrow morning, we're off on a flight to the coast. Then on to New Zealand. And from there, we sail to Fiji and surrounding points. We'll be at sea for ten days on a sailing schooner, before debarking at Papeete, where we'll spend another week at a luxury resort."

"Wow!" said Debbie, obviously impressed. "That's some trip. Sounds almost like a honeymoon, doesn't it?"

Jennifer and Lindsey both just happened to be looking straight at Justin at that moment, and both had a momentary urge to recoil from the flash of anger that sparked in his eyes as he turned to look at the woman who had taken him in off the streets, time and time again. In spite of everything, it seemed, there were some things that he was not prepared to tolerate.

"No," he said quickly. "It doesn't."

"Or maybe you could elope," Debbie went on with gusto, obviously having missed the thunderous expression on Justin's face. "Have the captain of the ship perform the ceremony. Could anything be more romantic than that?"

"Wow!" laughed Steven, raising his glass toward Debbie and totally unaware of the not-so-minor typhoon brewing at his side. "I like your style."

"Do you?" said Justin, staring down at the shot of whiskey - Jim Beam, of course - that the waitress had just set down before him. He lifted the glass and swallowed the liquid in one gulp, never once looking up toward the man who had been so quickly accepted by his old friends as his new boyfriend. When he spoke again, there was a hoarseness in his voice that said much about the depth of his annoyance. "Well, hey, why stop there? Maybe we can get the natives to toss rose petals on the waves for us and play the Wedding March on their ukeleles as the sun goes down over a turquoise sea. Then you can lock me into a chastity belt, to safeguard your conjugal rights, of course, and keep me tucked away on some deserted island, so that I'm forever off-limits to the rest of the world."

He looked up then, and met Daphne's gaze, and she flinched away from the pain and the anger she read in his eyes. He stood abruptly and stared directly into Debbie's face. "I am never going to be part of an... arrangement, that is governed by locks on my door."

Then he turned and strode out of the tavern, leaving a shocked silence behind him.

"Now what the fuck does that mean?" asked Debbie, still stunned by the level of venom she'd heard in the young artist's tone.

Melanie rolled her eyes. "What do you think it means?" she snapped. "It means Brian Fucking Kinney strikes again."

"Melanie," said Ben, very calmly. "For once, could you just shut the fuck up?"

The sudden silence around the table and the look on Ben's face proved that no one was more shocked than Ben himself, except maybe for Michael, who could not quite suppress the smile that trembled on his lips. He had always considered himself Brian's primary defender, but he knew that he'd failed to live up to the title on a few occasions. And now, it was surprisingly comforting to know that he might have a little help, once in a while.

When Steven muttered a hurried good night, and took off after Justin, the group from Pittsburgh lingered at the table, each musing in his own way over what had just happened.

Some were stunned; some were disturbed; some were complacent, and a couple were having trouble controlling an urge to laugh. And Melanie sat frozen and silent, still trying to figure out what the fuck had just happened.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

My house has many rooms; I occupy but a few. The rest go unvisited.

Brian sat at his desk and studied the framed sketch that he had just removed from the shipping carton in which it had arrived. He read the words that circled the drawing, as he idly played with the big swath of bubble wrap which had protected it. He'd always found it surprisingly therapeutic to pop those bubbles, especially in stressful moments.

This shouldn't be such a moment, or so he told himself. He was here - in his element so to speak - in the place where he "would never grow old". Or so he comforted himself in his more maudlin moods. He didn't allow himself to dwell on the fact that such moods seemed to be coming more frequently of late. At any rate, there was certainly nothing to be concerned about in this solitary sanctuary.

The office was dim, illuminated only by the gooseneck lamp that generated a cone of radiance on one side of the desk, leaving the rest of the room a study in shades of gray. Even the security monitors were dark.

Thus, there was nothing to distract him from his examination of the drawing, except for the dull thumpa-thumpa background of the music in the club - muted by the sound dampening properties of the room's heavy insulation - and the haunting mellow majesty, newly remastered, of John Coltrane's Blue in Green, playing on his private sound system.

He told himself that the tightness in his chest was only because he'd picked up a case of sniffles during his midnight adventure of the previous evening. It couldn't possibly have anything to do with the feelings stirring inside him, generated by the artist's rendering of a poignant moment.

It was a detailed sketch: Justin sleeping, face cradled against a pillow with one hand cupped beneath his chin, mouth slightly open, dark lashes emphasizing the smooth expanse of perfect skin. And hovering above him, Brian's face, eyes lowered to gaze at the sleeper, his expression open and vulnerable, yearning . . . and needful.

The words were printed in an oval arc around the image - saying nothing or saying everything, depending on how one looked at it. Bright fleeting images of Justin - a thousand different Justins but all, at heart, the same - flickered in his thoughts, stirred his memories, reminded him of what had been and was no longer.

My house has many rooms.

One part of Brian hated the sketch and hated Lindsey for drawing it and sending it to him - for knowing him well enough to pour the essence of his soul into a drawing. Another part of him loved it, and realized that she had known how it would make him feel, and why he would never allow anyone else to see it. He knew exactly where it would hang.

He remembered when she had first recited those words for him, in the process of telling him about her confrontation with Sam Auerbach. He had been careful, at the time, not to react, not to allow her to see how such simple phrases had struck a chord within his own consciousness - but apparently not careful enough. It surprised him sometimes how well she knew him, under certain circumstances. Almost as much as it surprised him when she demonstrated that she didn't know him at all, under others.

I occupy only a few.

He thought it ironic that she had uttered the phrase that provided a clue to the man he was, and failed to connect the dots. He himself didn't often allow himself to think about all the parts of him that he had deliberately shut away over the years, parts that would have left him too open, too vulnerable, too accessible.

A very small, smug smile touched perfect, sensual lips. Brian Kinney - Enigma. It was the role he'd been playing all his life; the one he intended to continue to play. It pleased him somehow to realize that most people sought to be understood, to be needed; to know that Brian Kinney was unique, in The rest go unvisited.

He spent another moment taking in the details of the sketch, illuminated by the palette of reflected memory, as his fingers traced over the contours of that beautiful face.

Unvisited, indeed.

When a discreet knock pulled him out of his momentary reverie, he was grateful for the interruption and quickly tucked the drawing into a desk drawer before pressing the switch that would unlock his office door.

A distraction - any distraction - was preferable to sitting here in the gloom and mourning for what was no longer his to mourn.

Justin was sliding into the back seat of a cab when Steven caught up with him and managed to push his way inside before the vehicle pulled away from the curb with a screech of tires and a pulse of smoke.

"Justin," the broker panted, trying to catch his breath after his mad dash, "what the fuck was that? Why would you . . ."

But Justin was in no mood to be subjected to a third degree. Instead, he found himself eager to strike out, thirsty for blood.

"Why would I what?" he snapped. "Why would I resent my loving companions planning out my life for me? Why would I object to playing a role in some fantasy shit that they - and you - want to write for me? Why would I be sick and tired of hearing the sniping directed at the man who saved my life, the man who could have been here and . . ."

He fell silent abruptly, and turned away, unwilling for Steven to read the depths of the devastation in his heart.

The young broker could not quite suppress a sigh. "Is that why you agreed to go to Tahiti with me? Because he . . . isn't here."

Justin continued to gaze out the window. "Do you want the ugly truth . . . or a pretty, comforting lie?"

Moving slowly, tentatively, Steven wrapped his arms around Justin's shoulders and braced his forehead against a stiff, hunched shoulder. "Justin," he whispered, "I just want you. However I can have you. Whatever you're willing to . . ."

The young artist turned then, to regard his companion with weary eyes. "Even if I say that you will never have me entirely? Even if I make you understand that I can never really leave him, and seeing him or never seeing him again won't change that. Is that really what you want?"

"Not exactly," Steven admitted. "But I'm willing to believe that time will change things. That he'll one day be a part of your past, instead of the focus of your present." He looked away then, and his voice sank to a whisper. "Or the promise of your future."

Justin shook his head. "I agreed to go to Tahiti because Michael told me that Brian is on his way to London. That's the bottom line. Not because I have all these romantic fantasies; not because I want to be swept away by some Prince Charming on a white charger or sail off to paradise with my knight in shining armor." His voice was suddenly hard, and cold. "But because I don't want to be here, in this country, when he's not. Now - you decide if that's a good enough reason for you, because there's nothing you, or any of my so-called old buddies, can do to change that."

"Justin . . ."

"No," It was almost a snarl. "I've left this unsaid for too long, and I need to say it. For you . . . and for me."

He paused then and waited, realizing that he was teetering on the brink of a no-return moment, and willing to allow Steven a chance to back away - to never have to hear what he needed to say. Of course, refusing to hear it would be tantamount to riding off into the sunset - alone - but it should be Steven's choice to make, and Justin would not do anything to force the selection.

Finally, after a long pause, Steven shifted and turned to look out the window, obviously unwilling to meet Justin's gaze or to witness the play or emotions in his companion's eyes. "Go ahead," he said softly. "Say whatever it is you need to say, Only . . ."

"Only what?"

"When you're done, I get to say my piece. OK?"

Justin just nodded. Then he spent a few moments composing himself and organizing his thoughts.
When he finally began to speak, his voice was surprisingly calm, almost emotionless. "I'm not sure how to say this so you'll understand, but I'll try. And you need to know that I'm not exaggerating.
This is the way it is. Whatever I am today, I am because of Brian Kinney, no matter how much my old buddies try to dispute it. He saved my life, and then he gave me everything I needed to become the man I am. Without him, I'd be dead, but it's more than that. Without him, I'd be lost and frightened and timid and afraid of my own shadow. He dragged me back into the world, when I was ready to just crawl into a hole and die. He didn't just give me everything he had to give; he gave me everything I needed to be able to rejoin my life, instead of just letting time roll along without me. He was the center of my life, my world, my universe . . . my heart." He paused then and turned to look at his companion, refusing to say more until Steven shifted to meet his eyes. "And he still is," he said then, refusing to flinch from the pain he read in Steven's expression. "Will that ever change? Maybe, but I'm not sure. But I do know one thing, and you need to know it too. I'm here, in New York and in this place in my life, because he refused to take advantage of the opportunity to tie me to him and keep me with him. And right now, all he'd have to do to bring me back would be to pick up the phone and simply say four words. 'Come back to me,' and I'm there."

He reached out then and touched Steven's face with gentle fingers. "And I don't really think that will ever change. I think some part of me will spend the rest of my life waiting for that call. Not that he'd ever make it, because he'd always feel like it would put pressure on me to do what he wants me to do, rather than leaving me free to make my own choices."

"He loves you that much?" whispered Steven.

And Justin was surprised by how easily the answer came to him. "Yeah. He loves me that much."

Steven's eyes fell, and he was suddenly fascinated by the clinching of his own hands. "Then, forgive me, but - what the fuck are you doing here? To be loved like that . . . by someone you obviously love just as much, why would you hesitate?"

It was Justin's turn to sigh. "Because . . . I need to be everything that I can be. That's what he expects from me. That's the gift he gave me. If I just run back to him, just turn away from everything that he pushed me to explore, than I . . ." He saw the disbelief in Steven's eyes, and fell silent, offering a rueful smile. "I know it doesn't make sense. Most of the time, it doesn't make sense to me either. But . . . if I don't reach for the stars, if I don't explore all the possibilities that he helped open for me, then he's going to believe that I . . . sacrificed my life - my golden future - to be at his side. And the really bizarre part of all this is that he'd be right. I'd do it without a second thought, and I'd be happy with it. I know I'd never regret it, until the day I'd have to look into his eyes and know that he's blaming himself for taking away the life he thinks I want to live. I have to grow into the man he thinks I am."

"For how long?" The question was barely audible.

Justin did not - quite - shrug. "As long as it takes."

Steven thought about it for a moment, before offering a small smile of his own. "You do realize that's totally fucked up, don't you?"

"Yeah." Justin replied, relaxing into a small laugh. "That's practically a textbook definition of Brian and Justin. Totally fucked up, but . . ."

Neither of them spoke for a while, as the taxi sped toward Bed-Stuy. Then Steven took a deep breath and reached out to take Justin's hands in his own. "Well, I confess that this is all a little disconcerting." Then he smiled. "Actually it's more than that; it's a fucking revelation, and I won't pretend that it's easy to swallow. But I still want you to go with me," he said softly, deliberately not lifting his head to meet Justin's eyes. "I understand that you don't - that you can't love me . . . yet. But I'm not willing to give up on us. I don't expect perfection, and I don't expect you to forget Brian. Just, maybe, you can make a little room in your heart for me, so that, one day, maybe he won't be your everything. I won't pretend that I'm happy with it, but I'm a patient man. And I think you . . . we . . . are worth waiting for."

Justin closed his eyes, and tried not to see the face that always came to him out of the darkness. "You're sure you want to settle for . . ."

"Let's not be too quick to define it," Steven interrupted, with a small, self-conscious laugh. "As for what I want, let's think about it. Times Square and the cold grunge of late winter, or exploring Papeete with your oh-so-charming ass? Bed-Stuy and the smell of garbage trucks, or snorkeling at Moorea? Clinging to a subway strap, or nude sunbathing at Venus Point? Which do you imagine I'd choose?"

Justin grinned, touched and aware that he should probably be ashamed of taking advantage of Steven's feelings. "Well, when you put it that way . . ."

Steven's smile was brilliant, but he was very careful to allow himself not the slightest nuance of gloating over his small victory. It was certainly not all he hoped for, nor all he was determined to have when all was said and done, but it was a start. The beginning of the end - for Brian Kinney.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~
tbc
"Hey, Boss."

Brian was little more than a dark silhouette against the cone of light beside him. "What's up?" he asked softly.

Alonzo Velez stood framed in the doorway, uncertain if Brian was having one of his intensely private moments. Lately, he seemed to be having them rather frequently. "Can I get you anything?"

Brian looked up at his club manager with a single lifted eyebrow. "Such as?"

Alonzo shrugged and offered up a tentative smile. "Whatever."

The second eyebrow lifted, to join the first. "Since when do I not ask, when I want something?" He sounded more curious than annoyed, for which Alonzo was grateful. Brian was a good boss - even-handed and appreciative and generous to a fault - but he did not suffer fools gladly, or at all, if he could help it.

Alonzo stepped further into the office and closed the door behind him. "Sorry," he said as the tentative smile widened. "The truth is that some of the regulars are asking about you. You know how they are. They just like to know you're around."

"Really?" Brian was obviously skeptical. "How do they even know I'm here? And why does it matter to them anyway?"

"I don't know how they know," Alonzo admitted. "They just do. Maybe they check for your car when they come in or something. As for why it matters, your guess is as good as mine. But it does. So . . . are you planning to spend the whole night up here by yourself?"

"Now you're sounding way too much like a Jewish mother," answered Brian, becoming slightly impatient with the entire conversation. "I'll be down later. Now, unless there's something else . . ."

"As a matter of fact, there is. Emmett is waiting to see you."

Brian sat back in his chair, and an arc of golden light touched his face, exposing a trace of confusion in his eyes. "And?"

"Just wanted to give you a heads up."

Abruptly, Brian stood and came around the desk until he was face to face with his employee. "OK, that's it. What the fuck is going on?"

"Nothing. I just thought you'd like to know."

"Since when," Brian said slowly, eyes never leaving Alonzo's face, "is it your job to screen my visitors? You've never done it before, and . . ."

"Actually," Alonzo interrupted firmly, "I have. I just never thought it was necessary to tell you how many times we intercepted visitors who were . . . um . . . well . . ."

"Who were what?"
The Latino from Trenton fidgeted for a moment. Then he took a deep breath and figured it was time to come clean. "Who were determined to get into your pants, by whatever means they could. We always figured that you preferred to choose your tricks yourself, instead of being chosen. Not," he said quickly as he saw a flicker of anger surge in hazel eyes, "that you couldn't have handled them yourself. We just took it upon ourselves to make sure you didn't have to."

Brian stood unmoving for a moment, obviously deciding how he felt about his employee's admission. Then he smiled, and Alonzo was swept by an intense feeling of relief, only to reflect, moments later, that it shouldn't matter so much. It was just a job, and Brian was just a boss. Although . . . it wasn't, he admitted reluctantly. And he wasn't.

"But," Brian said suddenly, "even though you may have been intercepting my more . . . enthusiastic visitors, you've never before found it necessary to check with me before admitting friends or acquaintances or business appointments. Not even last night. So . . . why now?"

"Well," Alonzo replied slowly, "it's just . . ."

Brian barely managed to swallow a huff of resentment. "Where is he?"

"Ummm . . ."

"Come on," the club owner snapped, patience worn completely through. "Where's Mathis?"

Finally, Alonzo grinned. "Planted at the top of the stairs, like your own personal commando. And you can trust me when I tell you that nobody is getting past him, without your explicit permission."

"Cerberus at the gate? That's not what I hired him for," Brian almost growled. "He's supposed to be protecting my customers. Not me."

"He is protecting your customers," Alonzo replied calmly. "From his vantage point, he's got a view of the entire interior of the club, and his staff is covering the few areas that he can't see from where he is."

Brian frowned. He wasn't quite sure exactly how Mathis, newly hired, had become his chief of security. It had just seemed to be the natural thing to do, especially considering that he had previously had no one in that position. Up to this point, each contracted guard had patrolled his own specific area of the club, without oversight. It was, he guessed, a sign of the times that he had felt compelled to reorganize and upgrade the service.

"Yeah, but . . ." he started, still not pleased with the unexpected ramifications of the arrangement.

"Boss," the club manager said gently, "let him do his job. He knows what he's doing."

"But I don't need a babysitter or a bodyguard."

Alonzo just stared at him for a moment, saying nothing but letting the look in his eyes say it all. Then he decided to speak, but only with an oblique reference to what they'd been discussing. "We live in hateful times, Mr. Kinney. Strange when you consider that so many of the haters identify themselves as Christians, and I was always taught that God is love, but it is what it is."

Brian returned to his desk and sat down, leaning back and propping his feet on the corner of his desk. "No arguing with that," he conceded, "but it still doesn't explain why I need a bodyguard."

"Maybe you don't," Alonzo admitted. "But what if you do? It can't hurt anything if your security chief keeps an eye on you, now can it?"
Brian grinned. "Could cramp my style."

Alonzo laughed outright. "Jesus Christ Himself could be standing over your shoulder watching every move you make, and every trick you fuck, and it wouldn't 'cramp your style' one bit. And you know it."

"Yeah, okay," Brian retorted, reluctantly accepting that this was an argument he was not going to win. "However, I still want to talk to him. But let Emmett in first."

In the semi-darkness, Coltrane's horn launched into How Deep Is the Ocean, and Brian pulled a handful of files out of a desk drawer, grateful for something to do, something to focus on, something to get lost in, besides the music.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

By the time Emmett arrived at the door of the executive office, Brian was in full professional mode, examining a contract proposal with a local distillery for establishing a new line of credit for the club. He waved Emmett to a chair as he called up the company's background information on his computer and spent several minutes comparing data between the new vendor and one he'd done business with in the past.

Emmett was content to sit and wait, losing himself in the soft jazz renderings rising from the owner's private music system. The slow, elegant measures of Naima seemed to ride the current of the smoke from Brian's cigarette.

When his examination of the vendor's files was complete, Brian was finally ready to talk, but Emmett, by that time, had lapsed into a state of semi-euphoria, drifting within the eddies and currents of the music.

After calling his friend's name twice, Brian chose to simply sit and wait until Emmett settled back into himself. It wasn't as if he had anywhere to be or anything to do that demanded his immediate attention. He had, after all, spent the entire night deliberately not thinking about where he might have been, had circumstances been different.

Thus, when Emmett finally shook himself and opened his eyes, it was to focus on an image of a beautiful face - a truth that even the most ardent Brian-hater could not dispute - wrapped in the gentle melancholy of Coltrane's sax and draped in a carefully woven web of forgetfulness.

Emmett sighed and felt a deep abiding sadness stir within him, a sadness that he knew to be little more than a pale reflection of the great gulf that existed in the heart of his companion.

"Brian?"

"Hmmmm?"

A beat of silence before Emmett continued very softly. "Do you need a minute?"

Brian sat up quickly. "Why the fuck would I need a minute?" he snapped.

But Emmett refused to engage. "Because you're having a bad day. Because it has to be eating you alive, even if you refuse to admit it or think about it."

Brian sat back in his chair and compressed his lips, as he always did when he was biting back words he didn't want to say. "You're pathetic," he said finally, not quite smiling. "How's your booboo?"

Emmett flexed one shoulder with a grimace. "Mending," he admitted, "but manageable, proving, of course, that you can't keep a good queen down."

"You're an inspiration to us all, Little Mary Queen of Scots," Brian laughed. "So, you wanted to see me?" He lifted one sardonic eyebrow. "You're not suing me, are you?"

"Hmmm. I hadn't thought of that." Emmett rolled his eyes. "Let's see now. Could I get used to a life filled with Armani and Versace and Gucci? A Rolex on my wrist, as I sip Dom Perignon and drive around in my Lexus?"

Brian simply waited, certain that Emmett would get to the point, once he'd worked it out for himself.

"I suppose I could, but . . ."

"But?" Brian prompted when Emmett fell silent and looked for a moment as if he were unsure how to proceed.

"But . . . there's something that I want more. Something I think I need."

Once more, Brian leaned back, slouching comfortably. "Such as?"

Uncharacteristically, Emmett refused to meet Brian's eyes, choosing instead to stare off toward the darkened security monitors, as he took his time formulating an answer. "I need," he said finally, "to understand."

"Understand what?" And there was a sudden, definitive coldness in Brian's voice.

Emmett took a deep breath. "Understand why you're here, and, more to the point, why you're not somewhere else, somewhere you really should be."

Brian sat up straight and squared his shoulders. "Does the phrase 'none of your fucking business' mean anything at all to you?"

Emmett nodded. "Yeah. It means what it's always meant. It means you're going into camouflage maintenance mode, in order to stay concealed beneath the layers of distortion you always use to distract anyone who might get a glimpse of who you really are, but . . ."

"I don't have time for this," Brian said abruptly, getting to his feet.

"Yes. You do." For once, there was not even a tiny nuance of uncertainty in Emmett's voice as he raised his eyes to stare directly into that perfect face. "And if you don't, you need to make time. Because I'm not the only one that needs this, Brian. You need it too."

"Now why would you think that I . . ."

"Because nobody should have to walk alone, all the time."

Brian went very still, almost forgetting to breathe. "What the fuck are you talking about, Emmett? I'm never alone, unless I choose to be."

"Sorry, mon ami," Emmett replied softly, "but the truth is that you're always alone, because you always choose to be. And we - the people who are supposed to be your friends - we've allowed it, because it was convenient. Because it gave us what we needed, and it cost us nothing. Because it left us free to take advantage of the situation, without giving anything back."
Brian sat back down, but there was no disguising the anger in his voice when he answered. "In case you didn't hear me the first time, what the fuck are you talking about? I don't . . ."

"Don't what? Don't need anybody? Yeah, we all understand that. You've trained us so well, that we wouldn't dare question your ability to stand alone. And the shame of it is that we let you get away with it. We all bought into your act."

"Look, Emmett, I don't . . ."

"A few years ago," Emmett went on, ignoring Brian's attempt at deflection, "Michael and I were sitting and talking one night, and we both realized how easy it is to assume that we know each other, as friends, until we realize how little we really know. How often we cover ourselves up, and refuse to share who we really are, and how often we don't tell each other the important stuff. That happens to all of us, but it happens even more when one of us is so determined to stay hidden inside the façade that he presents to the world that he blocks everyone who attempts to get close enough to see the truth. We all just assume that we know each other, and it comes as a real shock when we find out that we don't. Not really. Which is why you - especially you - take us all by surprise sometimes. Because we only know the person that you allow us to see - the callous, heartless shit that you profess to be. Because we're never allowed inside, to see who you really are."

Brian's face was a mask of disinterest as he stared into the eyes of a friend who had suddenly transformed himself into a potential menace. "I don't know what you're talking about. I'm an open book."

Emmett grinned. "Yeah. Fuckin' Finnegans Wake."

"Jimmy and I go back a long way," Brian laughed, slightly surprised by the aptness of Emmett's literary reference. "It's the Irish in me."

"It's the bullshit in you."

Brian's eyes went wide. He was totally unaccustomed to being challenged by Emmett Honeycutt, and he had to remind himself that Emmett was a lot sharper than most people could imagine.

"Jesus, Brian! You had cancer, for fuck's sake, and none of us even noticed, until the radiation hit you so hard that you couldn't hide it any more. Don't you think there's something totally fucked about that?"

Brian chose not to respond, still uncomfortable with even the most casual reference to his physical trauma.

"Anyway, here's the thing," Emmett continued. "If I expect you to open up to me, to let down those walls that you've built around yourself, then I have to be willing to do the same, don't I? So here goes.

"Ever since I came to Pittsburgh - lo, those many years ago - I've portrayed myself as an out-and-proud gay man. Reveling in my flame, so to speak."

"Except for your little side-trip into pseudo-heterosexuality," Brian pointed out with a slightly venal smile.

Emmett clasped his hands. "Yes, and leave it to you to remind me of that little episode. But, nevertheless, the reality . . . my foundation, if you will . . . came from a separate place. You see, I never had the option that you have - or Michael or Teddy or Justin or millions of other queer boys. There was never a closet deep enough to hide what I always was. Even if I'd had a closet, which I didn't mostly. But if I'd had one . . .” He looked up and deliberately allowed Brian to see the misery in his eyes. "If I'd had one, I'd have used it. Out and proud didn't come easy to me, Brian. I had to learn it. When I was growing up, I was the laughing stock of Hazelhurst, Mississippi, and the terrible burden that my family had to bear. My mother loved me, I guess, but she was never able to face the truth about what I was. Not even on her deathbed. I was there when she died, and so were all my brothers and sisters, and she called each one of them by name as they took her hand to say their good-byes. Except me. She looked right through me, and said nothing, and I understood why. She couldn't stand to look at me, to see what I was. Because she considered me to be her failure. Truth is that only my grandmother and my Aunt Lula were ever able to accept me and love me. For the rest, I was the ugly, shameful secret that couldn't be kept. The pervert. The abomination. And I . . . God, I wanted to be straight, Brian. I wanted to be cured, to make them proud of me. Every night, I'd get on my knees and beg God to 'fix me'. And every morning, I'd curse Him for not answering my prayer."

Brian closed his eyes, overwhelmed by the dreadful truth he read in the lines of Emmett's body, in the tightness of his mouth, and the clinching of his fists. But he was still Brian Kinney, he of the hard heart and the sharp tongue. "And you're telling me this because?"

Emmett sighed. "Because I need to know who you are, and I can't expect to do that unless I let you know me as I am. Because I never let you know before. I never let anyone know. But I was wrong to keep it hidden, because it's a part of what made me who I am today. I can never go back to Hazelhurst. I didn't even go back for my father's funeral. Because I wasn't invited - didn't find out about it until he'd been dead and gone for over a year - but I wouldn't have gone even if I'd known. Because I can't be that person any more. But there's a small part of me that's still afraid, that still worries that I could go back to being that silent, terrified child, mortified over who I was. It's still in here, still a part of me."

"You won't," Brian said abruptly. "And none of that was your fault, Emmett. Surely you know that."

Emmett looked up then, not even trying to hide the tears in his eyes. "I do. But do you?"

"Me? Who said anything about me?"

"Maybe that's the problem," Emmett said softly. "It's been far too long since anybody said anything about you."

"Listen to me, Emmett," Brian said sharply. "Are you listening?"

"I'm listening." Gently spoken, accompanied by a tender smile.

"I know . . . I can see that it was hard for you to talk about this. But you didn't have to put yourself through all that. I figured it out a long time ago. Most of it anyway. It doesn't exactly take a rocket scientist. Southern boy, born and bred, and raised in the heart of the Bible Belt, in Baptist Capitol, USA. Who couldn't figure it out? And if you still blame yourself - for any of it - then you're a stupid fucker who needs to get his head out of his ass. So why would you . . ."

"Because I know pain when I see it, Brian. And for too long, I didn't let myself see it. Didn't want to see it, because if I did, if I allowed myself to understand what was standing right in front of me, then I'd have had to admit that you've been walking beside us through all these years - right here, right beside us - and none of us ever bothered to find out who you really are. We say we know you; we think we always know what you'll do next and why you'll do it, when the simple truth is . . . we don't have a fucking clue. And while it's certainly true that this is the way you've wanted it to be, it says more about us than about you. It says we were too complacent, too self-satisfied, to even make a tiny effort to find you amid all the camouflage. And it says something else, too. It says we're stupid and callous and lazy. And I, for one, am sick and tired of not knowing you. I want to know you. I want to understand you. I want . . . to help you."

"I don't need your fucking help." Clipped - bitter - almost a snarl.

"Yes, you do. Maybe not me, specifically, but somebody, Brian. Somebody needs to be here. To listen. To let you do . . . whatever it is you need to do, so that you can move forward. Take the next step to wherever it is you need to go. So just let it out. Just . . . say it."

"Say what?"

But something in Emmett's face made it clear that there was not going to be a way to avoid his questions, that there would be no room for dodging the issue, unless Brian was prepared to call in his security people and have them throw Emmett out into the streets, and it was obvious that Emmett knew that it would never come to that.

"You love Justin," Emmett said softly. "You can laugh about it, scoff at the idea, claim that you don't believe in love - only in fucking, pontificate about the futility and silliness of commitment, deny it until hell freezes over. But that changes nothing. You love him, and you just stood there and let him walk away. More than that, you practically tossed him out on his ass. On top of that, you have to know that he loves you too. Jesus, how many times does he have to come back to you before you admit it? Before you understand that he chose you, above all things. So why . . ."

"Because he didn't." Cold, flat, unyielding words, emphasized by eyes gone dark with anger or despair, and only Brian knew which.

"Didn't . . . what?"

Brian rose then, and moved over to the blank bank of security monitors that allowed him to survey his domain when he chose to do so. But he didn't touch anything, electing instead to watch the vague, almost formless outline of his own reflection in the darkened glass. "Didn't choose me." His tone was flat, completely without emotion, except for a tiny, barely noticeable break in the first word.

"What do you mean?" stammered Emmett. "Of course, he did. He . . ."

"Think it through, Emmett. Think it through."

But Emmett found that he could not wrap his mind around whatever it was that Brian was getting at.
"You're wrong. He always . . ."

"Came back to me?" Brian turned and looked directly into Emmett's eyes, and, for perhaps the first time in his life, didn't bother to erect the barriers that always kept people from seeing him as he really was, and Emmett felt as if he were standing at the edge of a precipice, staring out into a cold, dark chasm of forever. "Justin was meant to fly, Emmett. To spread his wings and reach for the sky. And he does. Always has. And he only comes back to me when somebody or something clips his wings.
He never came back because he wanted to; he came back because he had no place else to go."

"Brian, he loves you." Emmett couldn't understand why Brian could not see how his young lover felt.

"I know he loves me," Brian said softly, returning to the desk and resuming his seat. "But loving me isn't going to give him what he wants. Think about it - clearly, without all the rose-colored romantic trimmings. The first time he left - when he found his twink fiddler - he only came back because the twinkie was an idiot. If Ian - or whatever the fuck his name was - had just been smart enough not to lie to him, Justin would never have left him. They would have flown - together. Then, when he went to Hollywood, and started living every gay man's dream, he only came back when the project was shot down. If the movie had taken off and he'd found his own little niche in sunny California, he'd still be there. Still flying. Then, after the bombing . . . that time it was my fault. Because I was so scared by what almost happened that I let him see how much I cared about him, and he felt obligated, because he has this ridiculous idea that he owes me something. But I can't be what he needs me to be. Can't give him what he wants, what he's always wanted. I just don't have it in me. He can't fly with me. In the end, the only thing I've ever managed to do was to keep him dirtbound, to weigh him down. So, while it's undeniably true that I've done plenty of things in my life that I'm not proud of, I will not do that. Not any more."

When he fell silent, Emmett felt as if the air in the room had suddenly thickened, that it was harder to draw breath. "You don't really believe that. You can't. You're Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake."

Brian's smile was brittle. "Yeah. I'm Brian Kinney. I look in the mirror every day to make sure that I'm still young, still beautiful. But that's all I am, Emmett. All I've ever been, and it's all on the surface. Inside . . . inside I'm just . . . empty. All the things that Justin wants and needs, I just don't have them to give."

And Emmett, abruptly, found that he couldn't stand to be in this place, hearing these words, and understanding this man - not for another minute. He had demanded to be allowed to know Brian Kinney, and he almost laughed as he realized how bitterly true certain old adages could be. One really should be careful what one wished for.

When he stood and hurried from the room, he was acutely conscious of the heavy silence behind him, broken only by the haunting strains of Ev'ry Time We Say Good-bye.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

It didn't take long to pack his things. When he'd come to New York, he hadn't brought a lot with him, assuming that he'd soon be back in Pittsburgh. That, of course, had proved to be a misconception, but he'd had very little use for the kind of clothing he'd once worn every day, when he'd been intent on enticing and holding the attention of a man with a sense of style that would have put a GQ editor to shame.

Thus his closet - such as it was - contained very little in the way of haute couture. No Armani or Ralph Lauren or Prada, but plenty of Levis, Nikes, and Tommy Hilfiger casuals - his one concession to fashion. But even the things he thought of as his 'good' clothes were frequently smeared or speckled with paint, as he rarely stopped to think about protecting his garments when artistic inspiration struck.

But there were two items in his closet - tucked carefully into a heavy-duty garment bag - that were as pristine and perfect as on the day they were first lifted out of layers of tissue, from boxes wrapped in bright gold and scarlet paper - while the person who had chosen them and purchased them and wrapped them and tucked them under a fabulously decorated Douglas fir sat back and watched.

Justin closed his eyes and let the memories of that day engulf him. He remembered waking that morning to find Brian leaning over him, to feel the gaze of passion-dark eyes and the silken caress of warm lips nuzzling at his skin. Remembered the amazing sensations as he was stroked and pleasured and finally taken, possessed completely by the man who owned his heart. Remembered the way the two of them had spent the morning playing with the toys they'd bought for Gus, along with the exceedingly private toys they'd bought for each other. Remembered Brian's face, eyes soft with love and joy, and the rich ring of his laughter as his son went wide-eyed, stunned and filled with wonder over the battery-powered bright red Jeep that he would subsequently ride all around the loft, plowing through drifts of bright paper and tissue and tinsel, and ending up crashing into the tree and generating chaos, to his father's delight. Remembered the happy faces of friends and family as they'd dropped in throughout the day, all of them basking - one way or another - in the reflected glow of the happiness that he and Brian had created together. For a while.

And remembered, finally, the tenderness in Brian's eyes as Justin had lifted the gorgeous Hugo Boss leather jacket from its nest of tissue, and the cashmere sweater from the second box - the wheat-colored sweater that Brian would later assure him was a perfect match for the color of his hair. Romantic moments had never really been Brian's thing, but he had surpassed himself that day, even though he would forever deny it. They had been alone in the loft by then, Brian having waited until their guests departed to present the last of his gifts for his young lover.

Justin would never forget that moment, for it had marked a very special first in their relationship. After he had voiced his protest, claiming that it was too much and too expensive, and received a patented Brian Kinney shut-the-fuck-up look for his trouble, he had laughed and confessed that he loved both gifts. Then he'd hurried to put them on and proceeded to model them for the gift-giver, who had stood watching him, saying nothing for a while, as he'd strutted around the loft, doing his best impression of a runway model. Then Brian had stepped forward, to adjust the way the jacket sat on his shoulders, before dropping a kiss at his temple.

"How do I look?" Justin had asked, thousand-watt smile firmly in place.

Brian had been slow to answer, taking his time before leaning forward to offer his response in a broken whisper. "You're . . . beautiful."

It had been the first time he'd ever said it, although Justin had sometimes glimpsed it in his eyes at certain unguarded moments. Nevertheless, he had never said it before, and Justin was immediately wrapped in a euphoric happiness that was unlike any he had ever known.

Brian Kinney thought he was beautiful. Thus, he was.

He stood at the door of his makeshift closet and reached for the dark-colored bag. He had worn them last on the night before he'd left for the city, when they'd gone to the Diner to make his farewell appearance, to say his good-byes. Then they'd come home, and he'd packed them away in silence, promising himself that he would wear them again - soon, when Brian came to New York so they could renew their commitment to each other.

Then they had spent the hours of darkness making love, each drinking in the other, each dining on their bottomless passion as if they'd never dine again.

Brian would come; he had flown up into the morning believing that.

But it had not happened. Brian had not come, and now, Justin was becoming convinced that he never would.

He unzipped the bag and wrapped his fingers in the downy softness of the beautiful, hand-woven sweater, before lifting it and rubbing it against his face.

He had only worn it for the man he loved, had promised himself that he would never wear it for anyone else.

But perhaps he'd been wrong.

Perhaps the time had come.
"It's possible that it wasn't just a random attack." Lance Mathis didn't allow himself to flinch away from the anger he saw flaring in Brian Kinney's eyes, but it was a near thing, and he was forced to swallow a smile at the realization that this out-and-proud queer boy could step up and intimidate with the best of the macho men. He rather thought he wouldn't enjoy being the target of Kinney's rage.

For his part, Brian sat slouched behind his desk, careful to maintain his façade of rigid control. The flash of anger was quickly suppressed. "Yeah. I figured that out from the way Detective Horvath kept dancing around the issue and coming back to the same point over and over again, hammering away, asking Emmett what he remembered and what his attackers might have said, and if he recognized anybody. Then he asked me pretty much the same thing. I didn't want to upset Emmett so I just let it pass."

Then he sat forward and clasped his hands under his chin. "But you work for me, so no more dancing. What are you getting at?"

Mathis smiled, but there was no warmth in his eyes. "The simple truth is that there were plenty of potential targets on the streets at that hour. So it's possible that it wasn't just a coincidence - that Emmett was singled out deliberately."

Brian's smile was cold. "And why would anybody want to hurt Emmett?"

"Aside from the fact that he's a flamer of the first order," answered Mathis, "that's the question, isn't it?"

Brian said nothing for a while, simply studying his security chief's face. Then his eyes shifted to take in the expression of the brawny individual seated beside Mathis, and he spent another few minutes analyzing the expression he saw on the face of Drew Boyd.

"Sooooo," he said finally, "if you really believe that, why are you both in here, instead of down at the bar watching Emmett's back?"

Drew Boyd flashed a smile that had set hearts aflutter all over the world - both gay and straight worlds - when he'd become the model for Brown Athletics' new line of underwear. "Come on, Brian. You're not that dumb."

With a sigh he couldn't quite swallow, Brian stood and walked to the bank of security monitors and switched the system on, immediately banishing the shadows that had consumed the room and painting everything in a rainbow kaleidoscope of radiance. It took only a moment to pick out Emmett as strobe lights struck glints of ruby and topaz from his brilliantly striped shirt.

"He was wearing my coat," he said softly.

"Yes. And a hat that obscured his hair and face. And given that the two of you are about the same height, and that he exited the building through a doorway usually reserved for employees or management . . ."

Brian's eyes swept the crowd, scanning for familiar faces, for friends old and new (although the former were in shockingly short supply on this evening), for hot bodies and faces, potential problems, potential tricks."Why would anybody . . ."

"At the risk of being repetitive," said Mathis, "you're not that dumb. You've made more than your share of enemies along the way, some of them very powerful, and your determination to be upfront about who you are - what you are - would be more than enough to piss off every homophobe in the country. You repeatedly, consistently, flaunt your lifestyle, and get in the face of anybody who crosses you. Jesus, Brian! The true miracle is probably that nobody ever went after you before.

Brian was silent for a while, watching the crowd and considering what Mathis had said. "But you don't know for sure."

"No," Mathis admitted, "but chalk everything up to coincidence is just asking for trouble, don't you think?"

Brian's smile was brittle. "You're wrong, by the way."

"Wrong how? You can't just stick your head in the sand and hope this will go away."

But Brian was shaking his head and lifting one hand to forestall the impending lecture. "Not that. You're wrong to assume that nobody ever tried before."

Mathis and Boyd exchanged glances, neither quite sure how to respond.

And Brian's smile became a soft huff of laughter. "I'm a fag, Boys. In Pittsburgh. And I never did see much point in hiding it. I just learned my lessons early. Such as the one that taught me that the only way to survive was to be tougher, faster, angrier, and smarter than any motherfucker who tried to intimidate me or 'put me in my place', as they termed it. Conventional wisdom claims that fags don't use their fists." He flexed his hands as old memories assailed him, and he smiled again. "I trained myself to be the exception to that rule."

"So," said Mathis, drawing the word out as he considered what Brian had said, "you're thinking that you can take care of yourself? That you don't need anyone to look after you?"

Brian pinched the bridge of his nose, fighting back the first twinges of a headache. "It's worked for thirty years."

"Yeah," said Mathis, "but the number and power of your enemies may have increased dramatically. Look, I understand that this . . . offends you. That you're insulted by the idea that you might need a little protection, but it would be stupid to disregard the threat. And, before you get your tits in a real twist, let me assure you that I know how to be discreet. I've had plenty of experience dealing with . . . ."

Brian didn't even try to suppress a grin. "Drama queens?"

A pale flush tinted the security chief's cheeks; he wasn't accustomed to being read so easily. "I was going to say prima donnas," he admitted.

Brian was suddenly distracted by a figure on the security screen, featuring a buff physique bulging out of a black wifebeater, topped by a classic face and a mop of dirty blonde hair. "Yeah, all right," he replied absently, abruptly bored with the entire conversation and turning to make good his escape. "But I don't want to see you, hear you, notice you. You'll give a whole new meaning to the expression, on the down-low. Got it?"

"Understood," Mathis answered, exchanging quick smiles with his cousin. "And just so you know, Drew has agreed to keep an eye on Emmett, just in case we're wrong about their intentions."

Brian paused as he went toward the door, and allowed his eyes to drift down to examine the complete package of Drew Boyd. His smile was suddenly sensual. "Now there's a real hardship," he quipped.

Boyd blushed charmingly.
Brian laughed. "Is this a freebie, or do I have to pay for the queer jock to ogle his favorite Nelly-bottom?"

The big quarterback got to his feet and moved forward so he could look down to study Brian's expression, eyes dwelling on the symmetry of that perfect face and the enticing shape of those sensual lips. "If necessary," he said softly, lifting one hand to trace the strong jawline, "I'd pay you."

Brian's lips compressed suddenly, as he suppressed another bark of laughter. "You can't afford me."

It was Drew's turn to laugh. "You really are an obnoxious little prick . . ."

"Nothing little about it," Brian retorted.

"Yeah, right. I'm an NFL quarterback, you know, and a rich man. But that's beside the point. Charming as your perfect bubble butt may be . . ."

"Let me guess," Brian replied, in his best lesbianic lilt. "It can't compare to your one true love."

Drew simply smiled.

"Now if you boys will excuse me," said Brian, with a glance toward the monitors to make sure his target was still in his sites, "I have bigger fish to fry."

"Just . . . keep your eyes open, OK?" said Lance Mathis.

"Hard to do," Brian called over his shoulder, "when you're getting sucked off, but I'll think about it."

And he was gone, leaving the security chief and the quarterback to exchange rueful smiles. "Come on," said Mathis. "I think I'll send out a couple of guards to patrol outside, and to keep an eye on his car. If last night is any indication, that's a likely spot for trouble."

"Yeah," said Drew. "That's probably a good idea, since it's perfectly obvious that he's not going to waste his time worrying about anything beyond his next blow job."

Mathis nodded. "No doubt he's an arrogant fucker. So why is it that I'm really beginning to like the little shit?"

Drew Boyd smiled. "Maybe because he's . . . one of a kind?"

Mathis laughed. "Well, there's no arguing with that."

~*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*_*)_

When the buzzer went off, he almost ignored it. Who in the world would be at his door at this hour of the night?

Then he sighed. Who indeed?

When he hit the intercom, the mystery was solved. "Justin? I know it's late, Honey, but let me in. Please."

He didn't offer a verbal response, but he did hit the switch to unlock the door at the first floor entrance.
When Jennifer reached the landing outside his little hole-in-the-wall, Justin was waiting at the door. "Mom, what are you doing here?" he demanded, albeit softly. "It's two in the morning."

"I know," she replied as he backed up to let her in. "But I wanted to make sure everything was . . ." She paused and took a moment to study his face. "You were upset when you went tearing out of the tavern. And I didn't know if you . . ."

"If I what?"

She looked around the room, and spotted the suitcase lying open on his bed, and the clothing laid out around it.

"Guess that answers my question," she said with a gentle smile. "You're really going with Steven?"

"You have some objection?" His voice was very soft, but there was no way of disguising the bright spark of anger swelling within it.

"No, Honey," she said quickly. "No objection. Just a . . . concern."

"About?"

She took off her coat and settled herself on the side of his bed, the only place available for sitting. "Justin, I'm not here to register my objections or voice my doubts. I just want to be sure that you're not rushing into something that you might not be ready for."

He turned away and walked to the window where he stood gazing out into the darkness. "I think," he said finally, "that I've waited long enough. Don't you?"

"What I think doesn't really matter, does it?" she replied. "It's what you think that counts. Are you really ready to . . ."

She fell silent, unable to actually speak the words, but he heard them anyway.

"He's never coming, you know," he whispered. "And I'm tired of watching the door, watching the clock, watching time slipping away from me."

Jennifer took a deep breath, as she noted the rigid lines of his back and the set of his shoulders and recognized the emotion that gripped him so firmly. He could tell himself that it was over, that he was through with waiting and dreaming, but she knew better. Brian Kinney might be relegated to his past, but he was not yet ready to let go of everything they had been to each other. She sometimes wondered if he ever would be.

"You have to do what feels right to you, Honey," she said finally. "But I hope you're not just running away. Because that doesn't work, and I ought to know. I tried running away from the truth about your father, and look where that got us."

"Mom, please . . ."

"Okay," she said briskly, accepting the inevitable. He would talk when he was ready to talk, and not a moment sooner. "If I'm lucky, my cab is still waiting for me, so I should go. Do you need help with your packing? What about this?"

And she lifted the exquisitely soft cashmere sweater from its plastic cover, and started to fold it.

"No," he said quickly, hurrying forward to take the garment from her and place it carefully back in its protective bag. He offered her a smile, but it was only a pale reflection of his characteristic grin. "That's not exactly suitable for a tropical paradise, is it?"

"But . . ."

"No," he said firmly, picking up the garment bag and putting it back in the closet. "This stays here."

Jennifer did not bother to argue, as it was obvious that there was a great deal he was not saying, and his expression warned her to back off.

She sighed then, realizing that he had actually said very little, and she wondered when her lovely, big-hearted, overly impulsive, achingly candid son had become such a reclusive, closed-off stranger. She left him then, heavy-hearted and wondering if she had missed something, if there was anything she could do to fix what was so obviously broken, whether he admitted it or not.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It had been a night like most others.

When Brian had descended to the main floor of the club, he had been inundated with warm greetings and innuendos and propositions, gifted with smiles and come-hither looks and caresses that were not nearly as incidental as they seemed, subjected to bold invitations and explicit offers whispered in his ear, and he had taken advantage of a couple of them, allowing the target he'd spotted from his office to give him a most satisfactory blow job, and selecting a second companion - young and brunette with beautiful green eyes - to fuck within an inch of his young life. Then he'd stood at the bar for a while, drinking shot after shot of Jim Beam, watching the crowd, and talking a bit with Emmett and Drew and Alonzo.

Sexually, it had been satisfactory, as most of his nights were.

Beyond that, he didn't allow himself to think about it.

It was almost three when he decided that the night was no longer young, and it was time to seek solace in the oblivion of sleep. Alone. He deliberately ignored the significance of the hour as he retrieved his leather jacket - brand new, of course, and purchased just that day to replace the one damaged in the attack - from his office and headed toward the private exit.

From his vantage point near the stairs, Lance Mathis noted his employer's intention and spoke into his hand-held radio. Then he headed down, still speaking into his hand set and gesturing to get Drew Boyd's attention. Thus, by the time Brian got to the entrance to the exit tunnel, the security guards on patrol outside the building were already alerted to his approach and positioned to watch as he made his way to his car, and Lance, Drew, and Emmett had exited through a different door where they could observe the entrance to the back alley. Lance's car was parked nearby, in a spot he had chosen deliberately on his arrival at the club, to give him this particular vantage point at this juncture in time. In this way, Brian would only be out of sight for a few seconds; it was the perfect plan.

Of course, even the most perfect plan might be flawed if the fundamental information on which it's based is incorrect.

Lance took a deep breath, enjoying the briskness of a chill wind that was swirling odd bits of detritus through the air. After hours spent in the smoky/boozy/God-only-knows-what miasma of Babylon's atmosphere (or, as Brian referred to it, the 'faggot fragrance of freedom') the smell of the night air was invigorating. Drew, meanwhile, was busy adjusting the bright chartreuse scarf that Emmett had chosen to accent his gold and scarlet ensemble, tucking it tight into the neck of his pale quilted jacket to make sure Emmett didn't catch a chill.

They had been standing there for a few seconds, talking quietly, when they heard the roar of a motor, coming from the alley behind the club, a deep, pulsing, throaty growl that conjured up visions of leather-clad bodies astride powerful machines.

"What is that?" asked Emmett idly, just as Mathis jerked his radio from his belt and began to speak into it.

At that moment, three things happened simultaneously.

From the shadowed aperture of the alley, a dark figure emerged in a burst of speed, leather jacket, gloves, and helmet all a lightless black, contrasting beautifully against the crimson gleam of the classic 2002 Screamin' Eagle Harley Davidson customized Road King, and accelerated off into the night heading away from the individuals who could only stand and watch it go.

At almost the same moment, a huge, black Cadillac Escalade careened around an adjacent corner and raced off in the same direction, a lurid logo affixed to its rear window catching a ray from a passing street light to illuminate its features: a small gay-rights flag, obscured by a scrawled X that was not-quite-shaped like a swastika.

The third thing that happened was triggered by the second. Emmett staggered, and would have fallen if Drew had not grabbed him, as memory came roaring back, cued by the image of the logo. He closed his eyes as he saw it again, heard it again.

He had rolled himself into a ball as he heard the vile screaming voice that promised him that he would know pain like he couldn't even imagine, that he would never again be young and beautiful, that he would be deformed and ugly like the filthy faggot he was, that the whole world would realize that he was no hero; then he'd felt the brutal blows from heavy boots striking him, heard the crunch of ribs cracking. And then - a beat of silence - and another voice, low-pitched and guttural. "Fuck! It's not him. We gotta get out of here."

"Oh, my God!" Emmett gasped, clinging to Drew's strong arms. "They weren't after me. It was Brian they wanted. All along, it was Brian."

Lance was already running toward his car, shouting instructions into his handset, and cursing himself for his failure to pay attention. He had taken every contingency into account in his efforts to protect his boss; every contingency, except one. He had made sure that Brian's car was well-guarded and secure. Only . . . Brian hadn't come to the club in his Corvette on this night, because he had not gone home in it the night before. The 'Vette had remained in its niche near the club all day. Instead, he had come on the bike - the bike that was now carrying him out into the darkness, away from those who would protect him, away from safety and into . . .

Lance forced himself to stop thinking that way. He didn't have time to speculate; he only had time to run . . . and hope.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

tbc
Chapter 10

Chapter Notes

Be warned - this chapter is NOT for the faint of heart. When I say "Here be dragons", we're talking Smaug-level, no nonsense butchery.

Chapter 10

Brian Kinney was a free spirit. In fact, he was almost the poster child for the entire concept - an individual who lived his life according to his own unique principles (even if there were many who chose to believe that he had none). He never pretended to be anything other than what he was - gay (first and foremost), bright, unapologetic, brutally honest, intellectually gifted, ambitious, demanding, adventurous, promiscuous, and impatient with posturing of any kind. Unique, in all things, and unbound by the conventional morality that others might try to apply to him, which was not to say that he didn't have a very explicit moral code of his own, but it was one that he kept to himself, rarely allowing anyone to perceive it.

But the truth was that he never felt freer, or less restricted, or more unconfined, than when he was cruising down the road on his Harley, enjoying the throb of the power between his legs (and no, the deeper meaning of that particular metaphor was not lost on him).

This was especially true in the wee, small hours of the morning, when the streets were virtually deserted and he could safely ignore the limits applied by regulatory laws and traffic congestion. Thus, when he emerged from the alley behind Babylon, he was already close to maximum acceleration, and when he came to the next corner, where the narrow side street intersected a major thoroughfare, he didn't bother to slow down; he simply took the corner at speed by leaning into the left turn at a sharp angle, before roaring down the 4-lane boulevard, ignoring traffic lights and speed limits and even, to some degree, the laws of physics. If there had been a police patrol car around, he'd have been busted - and saved. But there wasn't, so he continued on his way, reveling in the freedom of the ride and the speed of his passage, and ignoring anything that might be lurking behind him, safely submerged beneath the growl of his engine.

He had never bothered to analyze how he felt when he was in this particular zone; it pretty much defied analysis anyway. But he occasionally imagined that the sensation was similar to what an eagle must feel when it soared into the sky, freeing itself from the chains of gravity.

Scraps of poetry always sang within him at such moments, and he understood the poet's musings on a visceral level, knew what it was to "slip the surly bonds of earth, and dance the sky on laughter-silvered wings."*

Flying.

The thought struck him before his rational mind had a chance to rein it in.

Flying. Like Justin.

He was suddenly not quite so enamored of the sensation, or so caught up in the revelry of the moment. So eager to reach for infinity. So free.
Up ahead, at a major intersection, he saw a traffic light shift from green to amber, and spotted the headlights of a bright red 18-wheeler sporting a familiar logo, as the driver began to ease the big rig forward. For a moment - a moment, he knew, of complete madness - he debated making a dash for it, pinning his hopes on being fast enough to roar through the intersection safely (somewhat) with a couple of inches to spare, before the truck could completely block the way.

Even though the rational part of his mind was insisting that there was no way he could make it, he almost gave in to the impulse, almost listened to the tiny little whisper in the back of his mind which occasionally reminded him of how spectacular it would be to risk it all, to take the chance that might result in leaving this dark, dreary world in a blaze of glory. Like Cobain, or Dean, or Hendrix. Forever young. Forever beautiful.

For the space of a heartbeat, he wavered . . . and wondered. The same thing he always wondered: what would it be like? What came next, if, indeed, anything came next? How hard would it be to find out? And how easy would it be to just . . . let everything go. Feel nothing. Know nothing.

As it happened, he was teetering on the verge of a pivotal moment, the confluence of a set of circumstances that would prove to be a major turning point in his life. Of course, he had no way of knowing that, as such moments occur in every life and are almost never recognized in advance. Nevertheless, if he had given in to his impulse, and continued to accelerate, pouring on the speed, he would have cleared the intersection safely, if only by a matter of centimeters, while the truck would have blocked the way for the vehicle coming up behind him.

And he almost did, but survival instincts (flawed but imminently rational) kicked in and prompted him to slow down instead of speeding up; it would prove to be one of the costliest mistakes of his life.

He eased off the accelerator and coasted, biding his time and hoping the light would turn before he was forced to come to a complete stop, thoughts still spinning around his own personal intimations of mortality.

Thus, he did not see the huge, black SUV until it was upon him, until he felt a loop of rope settle over his shoulders and jerk itself tight as a ham-handed fist wrapped itself in the collar of his jacket and yanked him sideways off the bike. He was momentarily suspended in mid-air, then pulled toward the side of the big vehicle, where he was slammed into the door, knocking the wind out of him and banging his head against the frame, before being dragged into the dark interior.

He was still struggling to regain his breath when he was thrown facedown onto the floor, and felt himself grasped by rough hands as a heavy weight settled onto his back, while someone pulled his helmet from his head before shoving his face against the rough carpet.

Then he heard the hoarse laughter.

"Well, look what we got here, Fellas. I think we caught ourselves a real live faggot, and a pretty one too."

Brian had spent his whole life fighting his way out of tight corners while simultaneously making sure that anyone who dared to attack him lived to regret choosing him as a target. It was all he knew, and he saw no reason to change now, but when he tried to buck up and twist away from the weight on his back, he immediately realized that he was heavily outnumbered. There were at least four wide bodies around him, focused, for the moment, on keeping him prone and immobilized.

Nevertheless, it wasn't in his nature to simply settle down and accept whatever fate might have in store for him, so he spent a few seconds gathering himself and mastering his breathing. After a short time, he realized that his assailants had assumed that he was too overwhelmed to fight back, perhaps even only semi-conscious; then he used the strength of his legs and body to thrust himself upwards, while twisting violently, using fists, arms, and elbows as weapons. Regardless of the gravity of his situation, he felt a surge of adrenaline-fueled glee as his elbow connected solidly with someone's face and he noted the sudden gush of warm blood from a broken nose. At the same time, he sank his fingers into the soft tissue beneath another's jawline and squeezed with all his strength, reducing his target to gasping for breath.

"Son of a bitch!" snarled a guttural voice in his ear, as he was grabbed from behind and immobilized by massive arms. "He sure don't hit like a fuckin' fairy."

For a few seconds, there was pandemonium, as Brian continued to struggle, managing to kick out and catch one of his attackers squarely in the balls and another in his kneecap. Both screamed as they went down.

But in the end, there were simply too many of them, and they were too big and too brutal and too determined. Once more Brian was forced down, and this time his assailants had learned a valuable lesson. This time, they would take no chances. Moving quickly and roughly, they retrieved the rope they'd used to capture him, and bound him tightly so that he could not fight back. Then two of them sat astride his prone body, to make sure he couldn't wriggle free as another jammed a gag in his mouth.

Immobilized by their combined weight, Brian was once more having to fight to breathe, but he was marginally surprised to note that he had yet to succumb to panic or desperation. Then he sensed that someone else had joined the circle around him - someone who had been content thus far to sit back and watch and enjoy the spectacle of his capture.

For a few moments, there was only silence and a slight shift among his attackers as they moved aside to grant the newcomer access.

Up to this point, Brian had been filled with rage, intent only on inflicting as much damage as he could. Then he felt a pressure against his shoulder as the man who had just knelt beside him leaned forward, bracing his weight against Brian's body, and spoke slowly, as if savoring the words, and there was no doubt that everyone inside the vehicle was listening intently.

"Get us out of here," said the voice, a deep, raspy baritone with just a hint of a brogue threading through the rough accent. "Before his fuckin' private army comes along. Take us to the rendezvous, where it's nice and private and dark, where we can take our time and enjoy every second of this special occasion." The man shifted forward suddenly, and Brian almost gagged from the stench of an unwashed body, as the voice dropped to a rough whisper. "I promise you this, Pretty Boy. We're gonna make it a night you'll never forget."

Brian felt the SUV accelerate hard, and turn sharply to the right, and he fought to draw a deep breath, remembering what lay in that direction. The warehouse district, where there were blocks and blocks of decrepit old storage buildings, most of them long-abandoned. A derelict place which was virtually unoccupied even during daylight hours, and ghostly at night, a place where few dared to walk.

A place where people went to lose themselves, or to dispose of things they did not want, things that were used up and broken.

Strangely, it was not until that moment that he actually began to understand the danger he was in. Understand and, with barely a second thought, accept it. He remembered the actions and the demeanors of the men who had attacked Emmett just the night before, and knew immediately that these were the same people, with the same intentions.

He closed his eyes and let himself drift, for just a moment, realizing that he might very well not survive this encounter, and it struck him suddenly that it was one thing to contemplate relinquishing his hold on life and going out in the proverbial blaze of glory, but was very much another to accept that his life might be taken from him.

But he would face whatever came, as he always had, with few regrets.

He would have liked to have had a chance to say good-bye to the only three people who had ever really mattered to him - his son, his best friend . . . and the only man he would ever love.

He thought about Gus, and felt a deep abiding sadness that his child would have to grow up without a father, but he was pretty sure that Gus would not really remember him any way, and the little boy would be well taken care of by his lesbian mothers.

He thought about Michael, who had always been there for him - almost; who had always loved him, even when he tried not to. But Michael had Ben now, and J.R. and Hunter. Michael no longer needed Brian to run interference, to stand up for him and protect him. He would survive the loss, no matter how much he might mourn.

But Justin . . . Justin would always remember, would never allow himself to forget. Brian could not deny that, knowing that for all the things that kept them apart and kept them from living out their lives together, no one would ever love him as Justin loved him, just as no one would ever love Justin as Brian did. So it was inevitable that Justin would grieve for him and go on grieving - for a while. But eventually, he would recover and go on with his life so, in the end, the world would continue without him, as if he'd never lived at all. And maybe, said an ugly little voice inside him, it would have been better that way. Still, Brian hated to think about the pain his young lover - the only soul mate he would ever know - would endure.

So he would fight to survive, to prevail, to make it through, although he knew the odds were against him. Still, he would not die docile and indifferent, nor for lack of fighting to live. But in truth, he had to admit that he had always known this day might come. Invincibility had always been a cloak he chose to wear, but it had been no more than a convenient illusion, worn for appearances only, to comfort those who depended on him and needed him. No one, after all, was immune to the viciousness of hatred and intolerance and the cruelest cut of all - random chance.

He took another deep breath, and tried to focus, to think, to find a glimmer of light in the darkness.

But as he thought, as he plotted, struggling for breath and desperate to find a way or make a way, he was aware of a small voice buried deep in his consciousness - a voice that whispered only one thing.

"Good-bye, Sunshine."

His respite, and the opportunity to contemplate his fate, was brief.

When he felt himself lifted roughly and slammed into a new position, as brutal hands ripped away his jacket and shirt and tore at his skin, he tried to brace himself, to summon the toughness he knew he would need as he once more became the center of attention for the thugs gathered around him. At that point, he couldn't concentrate on anything except the initial stages of pain which he knew was only going to get worse before it got better - if it ever got better - and his resolve to endure whatever he must in order to survive.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
"Mother-fucker!" snarled Lance Mathis, careening around the corner in pursuit of the motorcycle that had vanished into the night. "I should have known. It was right in front of my eyes, and I never saw . . ."

"What?" demanded Drew. "What was right in front of your eyes?"

"Boots!" snapped the security chief.

Drew and Emmett exchanged glances, each convinced that their companion had momentarily lost his mind in the urgency of the moment, as Lance floored the accelerator of the Land Rover. "Boots?" they both echoed, obviously confused.

"He was wearing boots," Lance explained impatiently. "A label queen like Brian Kinney doesn't wear biker boots unless there's a reason for it. Versace, maybe, or Prada. But not biker's engineer boots. I saw them. I just didn't put two and two together. So . . . I should have known."

"Ummm, Sweetie," said Emmett gently, "I hate to burst your bubble, but I've seen Brian wear boots lots of times, so there was no way . . ."

Mathis didn't bother to suppress the eye-roll. "Not like this. These were real boots - the kind Harley riders wear. And the jeans were a clue too. Not 7's or True Religion. Real, honest-to-God 501's. Not even close to what you'd expect from a man who probably wears Gucci underwear."

Emmett closed his eyes and visualized Brian as he'd looked when he'd come down from his office, playing his slinky, predatory walk for all it was worth, and realized that the security chief was right. On this night, Brian had forsaken sartorial elegance for street creds, and none of them had picked up on the clues.

"Still," he reasoned, "you shouldn't blame yourself. You've only just met Brian, so how could you know . . ."

Mathis smiled, but there was no warmth or joy in it. "I make it my business to know everything about my clients, and I learn fast. I picked Drew's brain for everything he knew about the man, and I checked him out online. And then I talked with his employees - who tend to see a man more clearly than his friends do. So trust me when I tell you that I know more than you think I do. As for knowing the man behind the mask . . ." He paused and glanced toward his cousin, and there was a nameless shadow in his eyes that neither of his companions could quite identify. "I doubt that anybody - anywhere - really knows that man. Because he surrounds himself with walls - for protection - and never lets anyone inside to see who he really is."

Emmett's mouth gaped. "How did you know that?"

Mathis paused before answering, locked up for a moment in dark memories of another beautiful young man who had been forced to lock his heart away from the world. "I've seen it before," he said finally, his tone making it clear that he would say no more on the subject.

"Did you reach Horvath?" he asked, as Drew shoved his cell phone back into his pocket.

"Yeah. He's bringing the cavalry, but . . ."

"But?"

It was Emmett who dared to ask the question. "Where should he bring them? How do we find him?"

"Well," Lance replied, his voice subdued, "we can start right there."
Emmett turned to follow the direction of the security chief's gaze and gasped as he took in the sight of the big, powerful motorcycle lying half-way on its side, against the curb, with its front wheel jammed against the base of a street light.

Lance slowed and drove past the Harley, glancing at the bike only long enough to determine if it would reveal anything about the condition or location of its rider (it didn't), then coming to a stop as he reached the next intersection, his gaze sweeping left, then right. The only vehicle in sight was a big red 18-wheeler two blocks down on the left, signaling to make a right turn. In the opposite direction, there was nothing but an empty stretch of road disappearing into the darkness, beyond the spectral shape of a rusted-out railroad crossing signal just visible within the meager glow of the last functional streetlight.

"Now what?" asked Emmett, not quite able to suppress the fear that sent his voice into a higher octave.

Lance Mathis watched the truck make its swing onto the thoroughfare that would lead to the entrance ramp of Interstate 279 a few miles to the north and knew that, if the Escalade had managed to make that turn ahead of the big rig, it was probably long gone, and their chances of intercepting it almost non-existent.

Then he turned and looked off to his right, noting the shabby condition of the street and the buildings that stretched off into the darkness.

He had almost nothing to go on, except for the vaguest suspicion of a hunch. From what he'd seen of Kinney, he would not go down easily or without a fight, and his abductors might not have any desire to prolong their time in the vehicle. If Mathis was right about their intentions - and he'd have bet big money that he was - then they wouldn't want to risk drawing attention to themselves or keeping their victim in the car for too long just in case he managed to find a way to upset their plans. Kinney was nothing if not resourceful, and it was fairly certain that his attackers knew that as well as Mathis did.

"What's down there?" he asked abruptly, gesturing to the dark area to his right, wishing that he'd had more time to study the city and familiarize himself with potential trouble spots.

Drew and Emmett exchanged uneasy glances. "It's the old warehouse district," Drew said finally, then hesitated before adding, "They call it the Dead Zone."

Lance nodded. "Yeah. I'm sure they do. So . . . I think that's where we're going."

"What?" Emmett squawked. "Why?"

Lance sighed. "Because it's my best guess. Because it's all we've got. Because, if I'm wrong, then there's nowhere else to go."

"But what if . . ."

Lance spun the wheel to the right, and accelerated sharply. "Look. I don't really know anything. But my instinct tells me that these bastards are too anxious to get on with their fun to waste time driving to some remote place out in the country. Especially when there's a pretty remote place close at hand. And if you're thinking that they could be anywhere by now, blazing up 279 at 100 mph and already out of reach, you're right. They could be, and if you are, the bottom line is that we're not going to find him. Not in time, and, maybe, not ever. So do we just give up and stop looking, or do we take the only chance we've got, and go searching? And hope that we've guessed right."

For a moment, it looked like Emmett wanted to argue, but, in the end, he didn't, opting instead to settle into the back seat and chew on a ragged cuticle, as Drew once more drew his cell phone from his pocket and hit the button to activate a pre-programmed number.

"The warehouse district," he said without preamble, when his call was answered. "And no sirens. If they hear us coming, there's no way he's coming out of there alive."

Then he paused and listened for a moment. "No, we don't know where exactly. We might even be completely wrong, but it's all we've got." Then he frowned. "Although you might want to send a patrol car to intercept a Coca-Cola truck that's barreling up toward 279. No way of being sure, but the driver might have seen something."

Lance darted a quick look at his cousin, before favoring him with a grin and a sharp thumbs up. Sometimes, out of sheer luck, amateurs spotted things that pros might miss.

He desperately hoped this was one of those times.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

He had promised himself he wouldn't pass out, and he'd succeeded - mostly. But he had drifted a bit, floating on the surface of nothingness after a particularly nasty kick to the groin coinciding with a blow to the diaphragm. But drifting had done nothing to dissuade his attackers; they had simply gone on with the bludgeoning, figuring - correctly - that he would feel it sharply enough once he surfaced from his near-fugue state.

Thus it was that he had no idea how much time had passed when the SUV stopped, and he was dragged from the back of the vehicle and trundled into a dark building, where the only light came from a group of lanterns hanging from hooks on the walls and overhead rails, a couple of handheld torches, and the flicker of a fire burning in a barrel. The concrete floor underfoot was stained and cracked, and the cavernous chamber into which he was dragged echoed in the darkness and was frigidly cold, with a layer of frost on the piles of debris that had accumulated in corners and against rusted metal walls.

Despite the fact that he'd been barely conscious only moments before, he did not go easily, struggling and fighting against his bonds as he was wrestled forward. He managed to drive a knee into the groin of one of his assailants and twist free for just a moment, just long enough to notice that there was a small platform on the other side of the building, with another door, directly across from the one through which he'd been dragged, and that there was a group of figures standing nearby, looking down on his struggle.

He could discern nothing about them, except that there appeared to be four of them and that they were careful to remain in the shadows, removed from the activity taking place below them, but close enough to see it all.

The big boys, he thought. The powers that be. He could not identify a single feature on a single face. And yet, he thought, he knew them. Not perhaps by name. But he knew nonetheless.

They wanted to revel in his pain and his terror - to bathe in his humiliation. They wanted a show.

He actually managed to dredge up a smile. They wanted a show, and he would give them one, but it would not, perhaps, be the one they were expecting.

Then he was driven to his knees under the blow of fists joined together and swung from behind to connect with the base of his skull, forcing him to fight to remain conscious as he was jerked backward and slammed against an iron railing. Two sets of arms wrapped around him from behind to keep him still as three men scurried to chain him, spread-eagled, to the upright metal supports, securing him at wrists, shoulders, neck, torso and knees. When they were done, he was immobilized completely, with no room for error. A twist too far in one direction or a lunge in another would serve to cut off his air and render him more helpless than he already was.

Yet, he still struggled, unwilling - unable to simply give up and give in, managing, somehow, to head-butt the first of his attackers to step up and come close.

"Son of a bitch!" snarled the luckless assailant, as blood gushed from his nose. "I've had enough of his shit. Somebody give me a knife, and . . ."

"Not yet!" said a voice from the shadows - low-pitched, cultured, almost emotionless. Yet, somehow, everyone in the building sensed the satisfaction that threaded through each word.

"There is yet much to be done," the voice continued. "Much that our guest has to atone for."

Brian lifted his head and stared toward the speaker, and summoned up a rough, bloody smile. "What's the matter, Sport?" he asked. "You jealous because I wouldn't suck your dick?"

No one offered a verbal answer, although there was the faint whoosh of indrawn breath from one of the watchers as the massive individual with the horrendous body odor stepped forward to grasp Brian's left hand and proceeded to break two of his fingers, as nonchalantly as if he were snapping a stick.

Brian drew a hoarse breath, and bit down hard on his bottom lip, but he did not scream.

The finger breaker leaned forward and nuzzled his big nose against Brian's ear and spoke very softly. "You think you're gonna be able to resist all this, and hold your tongue. Think again, Baby Boy. Hold it all you want. Fuck, bite it off. But you're still gonna scream before we're done with you. And we'll see how much you like it when you get to choke on a real man's dick."

Despite the cold sweat that had broken out on his forehead, Brian looked up to meet the cretin's eyes, lips twisting into a smirk. "A real man?" he asked, ignoring the blood in his eyes and the agony in his hand. "Like you? Why don't you untie me, motherfucker, and we'll see who the real man is. Cause it looks to me like you boys are afraid to go one-on-one against this poor, helpless little faggot. And by the way, anything you stick in my mouth, you fucking better be prepared to lose."

"Yeah?" barked one of the others, a big redhead with a beer belly and a fleshy, pock-marked face. "You think you're a real tough guy, don't ya? But how about this, Pretty Boy? How you gonna feel when a real man reams your ass?"

"I'll let you know," Brian snapped, "if I happen to come across one."

"That's enough," said the cultured voice, slightly irritated now, and growing impatient. "Kindly keep your juvenile smack talking to yourselves. Mr. Kinney has more important things to learn tonight."

Brian managed a smile. "So," he said softly, "this is personal."

"Did you ever doubt it?" A new voice this time, higher-pitched. Less refined. "Did you really think that you could just go on flaunting yourself, throwing your depraved lifestyle into the faces of decent people, and never have to answer for it?"

"Decent people," Brian repeated, eyes sweeping the circle of thus around him. "Like this fine crew you've hired to do your dirty work?"
A third voice, muffled slightly, but amused and . . . something more. Hungry? Brian, for the first time, felt his blood run cold. He knew bald, unbridled hatred when he heard it, and he was hearing it now. "Do you really think we would soil our hands . . . with the likes of you? No, Mr. Kinney." The syllables of his name were spoken like a curse, dripping venom. "It's time you learned your place. For too long, you've crossed the wrong people, and believed that you could just walk away from the chaos you've created. You've wrecked homes, torn apart families, and destroyed efforts to take back our streets and our country from abominations like you. So now, you've made yourself a target for people who don't appreciate being betrayed by a swaggering, child-molesting pervert. So let me tell you what's going to happen. You're going to pay the price for not staying in the shadows where your kind belong. When we get through with you, nobody's ever going to mistake you for a pretty boy again. You'll be lucky if anybody can even stand to look at you. Just imagine - the stud of Liberty Avenue, transformed into a freak - a broken, mangled lump of flesh that people will laugh at, and cringe away from. After tonight, no one's ever going to think you're beautiful again."

The voice dropped to a near whisper. "No one's ever going to fuck you again, or let you fuck them. Even if you were able to get it up, which - trust me - you won't be."

Brian stifled a sigh. So that was the plan. He was meant to survive this night, and wish he hadn't.

The hulking thug, the one he'd silently christened Stinky, stepped forward again, and grinned at him, exposing crooked, stained teeth. "Ain't that poetic justice, Sweetheart? And when we're done with all that, when we've reduced that sweet little face to raw hamburger, we've got a little parting gift for you." He paused and pulled an item from his pocket and held it up for Brian to see. The captive managed not to flinch away from the sight . . . but only just.

A syringe, obviously used, dirty, with a huge, bent needle. It didn't require much in the way of intuition to figure out what it meant.

"So how about it, Pretty Boy? Just imagine - the Stud of Liberty Avenue, broken and ugly and unfuckable . . . and wasting away from AIDS. Exactly what you and all of your kind deserve."

And there was suddenly no more time to respond, no more opportunity to defy or resist - no more nothing as the blows began to fall. As the bruisers hefted chains and cables and straps and set to work, using fists and boots and whatever else came to hand. He felt the sickening crunch as a steel-toe connected with his shin and smashed it like kindling; he felt ribs shatter, felt his left femur snap, felt his skin split and shred under the massive assault. And still he did not cry out.

Then there came a pause, as the thugs took a moment to catch their breath, and Brian managed to lift his head and peer through a curtain of blood to stare at them. Waiting. Just waiting.

At that moment, Stinky came close and wrapped his fist in Brian's hair, jerking his head back so that they were virtually nose-to-nose. "Tell you what, Little Faggot," said the big man, with an ugly smile. "I'm feeling merciful tonight. So here's the thing. You're still gonna leave this place, when all's said and done, as a dickless fag. No gettin' away from that. Still gonna be broken and busted up and ugly as a fuckin' troll and infested with disease. But, if you just put on your best manners and beg oh so sweetly, maybe we'll end it all early. Maybe you don't have to take another beating, and another, and another after that, before we turn you loose. So, what do you say, Sweetheart? Want to kiss my ass and ask nicely."

Brian said nothing for a moment, simply staring back at the man who literally held the life of his captive in filthy, massive hands.

Then he slowly gathered himself, pursed his lips, and spat into the troll's face. "Fuck . . . you!" he said softly, not even bothering to raise his voice, knowing it was not necessary. Knowing the words would burn like acid and drive the man to new heights of rage, but finding that the satisfaction earned in having said them was worth it all.

Stinky recoiled, and hastened to wipe away the spittle that had landed on his lips and nose. He would not, could not, admit to being embarrassed by his victim's defiance. Instead, he let himself ride the crest of the fury rising within him. Then inspiration struck, and he pulled an item from his coat pocket and knew instant gratification as he saw Brian close his eyes for just a second as he recognized it.

The snick of the switchblade was loud in the silence that surrounded the two of them.

"Let's see how long you can stay quiet now," he laughed.

He wasted no time in going to work, slowly and deliberately carving shapes and symbols into his victim's body and face, his face alight with glee as he gloated in the power he had over the mutilated flesh under his hands.

Brian did not scream, but, after a while, he began to moan, only partially conscious by this time. Blood had pooled beneath him, and his attackers were driven to greater frenzy as they realized that they were running out of time. Unless they wanted him dead - and the powers-that-be, watching from their elevated position, had been clear in their insistence that this was not what they wanted - it would be necessary for them to hurry and finish up. Especially since the best was yet to come, from their perspective. Although some among the spectators were beginning to have doubts.

One in particular. The softest of the voices, the one most filled with vitriol, finally spoke up. "If you go ahead with that blade," he called out, "you're going to kill him. And that's not what you're getting paid for. He needs to live - to suffer - to pay for his sins."

Stinky paused then, and looked down at the blade in his hand, still caught up in the vision of what he had intended to do with it. But he knew the man was right. If he went through with what they'd planned - if he castrated the pervert - there would be no extended justice. The little bastard, who had proved far tougher than anyone could have predicted, would simply bleed out and die, without ever even knowing how much damage had been done, without ever even feeling all of the pain he had earned.

And they still hadn't reaped the reward of hearing the motherfucker scream and beg for mercy.

"Shit!" he muttered, growing angrier by the moment. No way was he going to let this little fucker get the best of him. No way . . .

He took a step back then, and looked around, waiting for inspiration to strike. And when it did, the thugs around him, the ones who had been enthusiastic participants in the destruction of their victim up to this second, were suddenly not so sure they wanted to be a part of what came next as they read the cold, monstrous look in his eyes.

Stinky moved to a corner where a rough container of old, rusted tools and pieces of iron spilled its contents across the dirty floor. He dug through the assortment and finally found exactly what he was looking for.

But he didn't immediately come back to resume his assault against his victim's body. Instead, he walked to the barrel where they had built a fire from old broken shards of lumber, and thrust the item he'd found, a yard-long length of angle iron, in to the heart of the flames.

"Strip him," he instructed his gang of thugs after staring into the flames for a few minutes. "Maybe we can't afford to let him bleed out, but there's more than one way to fuck him up "... his smile was an ugly, twisted thing... "so he can't ever fuck up anybody else again."

Brian, only half conscious by this time, tried to muster enough strength to fight off the hands that reached for him, but, in the end, it wouldn't have mattered anyway. They didn't bother to try to unbutton and remove his jeans the conventional way. They simply grabbed the switchblade and cut them off, not caring how many cuts they inflicted in the process.

He struggled to breathe, to hold on to his determination, his sanity - but he didn't know if he could face this.

Nevertheless, he forced himself to brace himself as straight as possible, trying to ignore the icy touch of the frigid metal against his bare skin and the nasty, hungry gleams of the eyes that watched him, reveling in his helplessness and the damage they had managed to inflict on his body. For his part, he didn't bother to look too closely, knowing what he'd see. He figured he'd see it soon enough, unless these motherfuckers miscalculated and killed him.

A development, he thought, which would not be without certain advantages.

But there was no time now to think about that, for Stinky was starting toward him, and there was no doubt that they had come to the critical moment of the entire fucking night.

The smile on the thug's face was lurid, his eyes glittering with an unholy glee and a compulsion to inflict pain, to dispense his ugly brand of justice, reflecting the orange glow of the object he held in his hand - the length of angle iron fresh from the fire.

"Time's up, Pretty Boy," said Stinky, hefting the piece of metal like a baseball bat. "If you were thinking you'd get through this night without screaming... think again." Then his voice sank to a whisper. "Oh, and when we're done with you, we're gonna take care of your pretty little blond boytoy. You didn't really think we'd forget about him, did you?"

Brian glanced over toward the observation platform and saw one of the watchers step forward and lean into the railing in front of him, eagerness and impatience written in every line of his body. The man spoke then, so softly that his words were barely audible, but there was no mistaking the malice in them.

"Now you learn the most important lesson of your life, Kinney - the wages of sin."

Brian closed his eyes and reached desperately for some kind of control, some kind of strength, but all he could hear was the snide snicker of shared laughter rising from hell's version of a peanut gallery.

"New York never sleeps," said Daphne, hoisting her glass toward her companion. "And it's a fucking miracle."

Michael just smiled, not bothering to offer a verbal response, appreciating the coldness of his vodka-rocks glass as he drew it across his forehead in an effort (probably futile) to ease the headache that was pounding behind his eyes.

The hotel bar was dark and almost deserted, except for a few diehards scattered among the shadows. The two from Pittsburgh were the only ones who were not alone. Even so, neither of them seemed eager to make much effort to communicate.

"I couldn't sleep," Daphne volunteered after a few silent minutes. "Couldn't even bring myself to go to bed. Don't know why."

Michael offered up a small smile. "Me neither. And it's funny because I'm really tired. And I never have trouble sleeping." He thought about that for a moment, before shaking his head. "Well - almost never."

Daphne nodded, contemplating the dark liquid in her glass. "Something bothering you?" she asked finally.

He shrugged, aware only of a vague sense of unease, of something being . . . off. "I don't think so, but . . ."

"But there must be something," said the voice of a new arrival, leaning in over his shoulder.

Lindsey slid onto the bar stool next to him, and signaled the bartender to bring another round for her friends and one of Daphne's chosen poison for herself.

"You too?" asked Michael. "Where's your . . . other half?"

Lindsey smiled. "Sleeping the sleep of the innocent," she replied. "Mel doesn't do insomnia."

Michael nodded. "Yeah. Ben too. And my mother is probably sawing wood loud enough to keep an entire floor awake."

"I resent that." Debbie took the stool next to Daphne after greeting Michael with her customary head-slap, which did absolutely nothing to assuage his headache.

"Ma," he whined. "What the fuck are you doing up?"

"How do I know?" she complained. "The bed's too soft? The traffic's too loud? The room smells like disinfectant? Something."

"Yeah," said Michael after a while. "Something."

Debbie ordered her drink, and no one was even slightly surprised when Ben showed up a few seconds later, rumpled and sleepy, but obviously concerned. He stood behind Michael, draping his arms around his young mate's shoulders. "I woke up," he explained, "and you were gone. I got . . . worried."

"Sorry," Michael answered, dropping a kiss on his husband's hand. "Didn't mean to worry you."

"So," Ben went on after a pause, "what's this? You guys plotting something or . . ."

It was Lindsey who interrupted. "Actually, we're all pretty much wondering the same thing. We're here, and we have no idea why."

"You don't think there's something wrong, do you?" That was Debbie, ordinarily the most pragmatic of individuals, though occasionally given to leaping blindly to unwarranted conclusions. It seemed, however, that even she was not immune to the macabre fancies arising from the wee small hours of the morning.

"What could be wrong?" asked Ben.

No one answered for a while. Then Daphne voiced her concern. "Well, I don't know about anything else, but . . . Justin could be making the biggest mistake of his life."
"What?" That was Debbie, shrill, almost resentful. "What the fuck does that mean? He just had the night of his life, and he's off to fucking Tahiti, for Christ's sake. With the man of his dreams, by the way, so how . . ."

Daphne just stared at her, waiting for reality to kick in. When it didn't, she sighed and offered up a succinct explanation. "The man of his dreams is in Pittsburgh, Debbie. And always will be."

Debbie made a 'pfft" sound in her throat. "So what? He's supposed to spend his whole life grieving over the Mighty Kinney?" She drained her drink in one gulp. "Brian had his chance, and blew it.
And Sunshine's moving on, just like he should."

Daphne looked up then and saw that Michael had turned to look at her, understanding exactly what she was saying. "You know, Ma," he said slowly, "just because Steven is rich and famous and a member of New York's high society doesn't make him right for Justin. Doesn't mean that he can make Justin happy."

"And you think Brian can?" she laughed. "Dream on, Michael. Brian is never going to change, never going to . . ."

"I'll drink to that," said Lindsey suddenly, "and pray to the powers that be that you're right."

She turned then, and met Ben's eyes, and saw something flicker there, a flash of understanding, of approval, but she was still surprised when the professor lifted the drink the bartender had just handed him, and said firmly. "To Brian!"

"To Brian!" echoed the others around him, hoisting their glasses, except for Debbie who looked as if she thought they all needed their heads examined.

Lindsey and Michael exchanged smiles, both suddenly grateful that Melanie was not present to add her typical acerbic comment.

"You can all think what you want," Debbie observed finally, "but Sunshine's gonna be just fine without the Stud of Liberty Avenue."

Even though several of them wanted to voice their disagreement, it was Daphne who had the last word, and she spoke it while staring into her glass, her eyes dark with certainty. "You're wrong, Debbie. He may survive; he may endure, he may have success beyond his wildest dreams, but he's never going to be 'just fine' as long as Brian is not by his side. And one more thing," she paused, and her smile grew wistful, "this was not the 'night of his life'. That happened years ago, on the night he first 'saw the face of God'."

She rose then and made her way to the door, moving carefully to avoid weaving.

"Now what," said Debbie into the silence that enveloped the group, "is that supposed to mean?"

None of the three men in the car dared to voice it, but they were all keenly aware of the passage of time.

Emmett, particularly, was having trouble controlling his breathing, and the first tendrils of panic rising in his mind. It had been too long, and every second that elapsed might very well be Brian's last.

They had been cruising the warehouse district for half an hour, chasing shadows, seeking some sign, some indication, that the SUV had been here before them, the difficulty of their task compounded by the need for discretion. They dared not let their prey know that they were nearby, for the thugs would surely make quick work of their victim if they realized they had been discovered.

Emmett's eyes smarted from peering into shadows, trying to see what was hidden, trying to pierce the darkness.

"This is hopeless," muttered Drew as they pulled around a corner, and his voice was loud in the stillness, broken only by the moaning of the wind and the whoosh of the tires on the slushy surface of the streets. Though there was no more ice on the pavement, there was still a wintery residue, and dirty snow was still packed along the edges.

Emmett opened his mouth to voice his own growing concern, when he spotted something as they rolled past the entrance to a tiny alley off to his left.

"Stop!" he said sharply. "Back up."

Lance looked up and met Emmett's eyes in the mirror. "What?"

"In the alley, there was . . . something."

Lance sighed. He doubted that Emmett had managed to note something that both he and Drew had missed, but he was desperate enough by this time to grab for any nuance of a clue.

He backed up slowly, and peered into the yawning blackness at the mouth of the tiny passageway that was barely wide enough to be termed an alley.

"What do you . . ."

"Tire tracks," said Drew suddenly. "Look past the entrance. There are tracks in the snow back there."

Lance paused and tried to see what the others had noticed. Was there something there, or was it merely wishful thinking? He drew a deep breath, realizing that, at this point, it didn't make much difference. They were out of time; Brian was almost certainly out of time, and this was as good a direction as any.

"Make the call," he said tersely, as he eased into the alley before parking the car to block the entrance. Then he got out of the car.

Drew spent a few seconds looking around to get his bearings; then he spoke into his cell phone briefly before making his exit into the frigid night.

When Emmett moved to follow, Drew was standing in his way. "Emmett," he said softly, almost whispering, "you need to wait here, Honey. This is no place for . . ."

"For what?" Emmett demanded. "For a silly little faggot who couldn't possible help to rescue a friend? Get out of my way, Drew."

"But . . ."

"He's my friend, and I'm going."

From the other side of the car, Lance met his cousin's eyes. "I think you better listen to him," he said gently.
Without another word, the three started down the alley.

There were three buildings in the vicinity, all dark and foreboding and on the verge of collapse, and Lance knew that they dared not pass any of them up, assuming that they couldn't possibly be what they were looking for. There was simply no way to be sure.

So they spent a few minutes checking out the first one which opened onto another alley that intersected the one they were on, at right angles. They were just finishing up, hoping they hadn't missed anything, when Drew suddenly stiffened.

"Did you hear that?" he asked, head turning frantically to locate the source of the sound.

"Hear what?" Lance demanded.

"I'm not sure. A rattling, like chains or something. Or . . ."

And then there was no more need for speculation or uncertainty as a scream split the night, a scream, thought Emmett, that he would never forget as long as he lived. The scream of a damned soul, in eternal torment.

"Jesus!" he breathed, but there was no time to gather himself, as Lance and Drew had already taken off at a dead run toward the dark hulk of the next building down.

As they approached, the scream seemed to waver and fall away; and then there was another sound, possibly even more horrible than the scream had been.

There was no mistaking the sound of laughter.

The three rounded the corner and saw the SUV blocking their passage, with another car beyond it, dark and big but only the rear fender was visible as it was parked just around the corner of an intersecting alley. Still, there was no way they could take the time to investigate, all three of them intent on only one thing - to get to Brian, to prevent a repeat of whatever had driven him to that inhuman scream.

Brian Kinney did not scream. It simply did not compute.

Nevertheless, they were only half-way to the doorway on the other side of the SUV when they heard it again.

"Wait," Lance shouted desperately as Emmett threw himself forward, knowing nothing except that he could not endure that sound for another second. "There are guards."

But Emmett was beyond caring, beyond caution. He had to get to Brian, had to . . .

The warning shout came from a thug who had been at the opposite end of the alley when they'd made their approach, and occurred just as Emmett burst through the doorway, with Drew and Lance on his heels.

Then he slammed to a stop, suddenly unable to move a single muscle as he took in the terrible, bloody tableau in front of him.

Brian, chained up like a cut of meat, hanging against a metal railing, naked and bleeding and bludgeoned to the point where he was unrecognizable, with four hulking bruisers gathered around him, and the frigid air was thick with the stench of scorched flesh. Three of the thugs were frozen in shock, the weapons they had used on him still in their hands. But the fourth - the biggest of them all - was still moving.

"Son of a bitch!" he snarled, still intent on his victim, as he lifted the heavy piece of red-hot angle iron away from its contact with Brian's torso, and swung it upwards, putting all his weight behind it. When it impacted against the side of Brian's head, there was a terrible crunching sound, and the scream was silenced.

Emmett started forward then, frantic to reach his friend, frantic to stop this horror, but he knew he wouldn't get there in time. The ogre seemed to be so caught up in bloodlust that he didn't care that he'd been caught or what might happen next.

He lifted the piece of metal again and aimed it toward Brian's groin, determined to complete his task.

Emmett screamed then and . . .

Three shots rang out.

The thug went down like a broken doll, and the only sound was Emmett's sobbing, and the rising howl of sirens in the distance.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

* High Flight -- John Magee Jr.

tbc
"Call 911," shouted Lance, as he raced forward with his 9mm Beretta still clasped in his hand, obviously intent on the only thing that really mattered now, getting to Brian and changing the focus of the awful scenario laid out before them. It was no longer about seeking and finding; it was now about saving. "And Horvath. Get them here, now."

Drew Boyd was already dialing, looking around as he did so, and watching as the group of thugs ran for the exit, stumbling over each other in their desperation, perfectly content to leave their fallen comrade behind. He noted too that there was another door on the far side of the decrepit old building, and he thought he'd caught a flicker of motion there as he and his companions had raced into the room, but he couldn't be sure. He didn't waste time worrying about it; there were more important things to do. He had to help Brian; that had to be the primary focus, but he also had to . . . he wasn't even sure how to phrase it. He had to protect Emmett, to rescue him from the hellhole into which he'd fallen, but he wasn't even sure such a rescue was possible, for Emmett was moving through his own version of perdition, so bound up in the perception of horror that he seemed unaware of anything else. He had recoiled away from the staccato sound of the gunshots as Lance fired, and since that time, his face had been white and vacant and terrified - the classic expression of an individual in the first stages of shock - and he had avoided looking at the body crumpled on the dirty concrete beside the metal posts where Brian was chained.

Lance was the first to reach Brian and forced himself to pause and take a deep breath before attempting to release Brian's bonds. Every primal instinct within him was screaming that he must hurry, that any hesitation might be fatal, but another voice - more controlled, less panicked - told him that his employer's life was literally in his hands and haste might be even more lethal than delay. He dared not risk doing more harm than good.

"Emmett," he shouted as he stepped close to wrap his arms around Brian and shift him into a less awkward position, easing the weight off strained arms and shoulders. "Get over here. I need help to get him down without hurting him."

Until that moment, Emmett had remained frozen, almost petrified, but he came to himself quickly, in the necessity of the moment. Then he leapt forward, trying to figure out how best to aid his friend, and, in the extremity of his desperation, he stepped over the body of the dead thug without a second glance.

"See if you can take some of his weight while I loosen these chains," Lance instructed. "We can't let him fall."

Emmett did not hesitate, stepping close and easing his arms under Brian's to hold him close, noticing the slickness of blood and its sweet stench, and managing to avoid the band of charred flesh that stretched across the left side of Brian's chest, from just below the nipple to the lower edge of the rib cage. He was careful to keep his touch as light and gentle as possible, and noted that Lance was doing the same. Nevertheless, there was no avoiding a certain amount of jostling, and they had barely begun the process of freeing him when Brian groaned, a deep, guttural sound that seemed to rise from the bottom of his belly.

Emmett at first did not understand why the sound, ugly and painful as it was, generated a tiny burst of joy within him. Then he realized; it was the first clear indication that Brian was alive. Until that moment, he had not been sure.

When the chains were loosened, he lifted Brian as easily as if he'd been a baby, and laid him across his own lap, cradling him and wrapping him close. When Lance shucked his own jacket and draped it over Brian's shoulders, Emmett tucked it around him, noticing that Brian was beginning to shiver. Then he looked up at Drew, who was tucking his phone back into his pocket. Without a moment of hesitation, the quarterback slipped out of his suede Hugo Boss and spread it over Brian's lower limbs, completing a small cocoon of warmth around the bruised and battered body.

Brian made no sound, but Emmett thought he felt a tiny movement, not quite a tremor, as if the chilled body were shifting closer, seeking any nuance of comfort it could find.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

It was an ocean, but not like any ocean he'd ever known before. It had currents and undercurrents, surges and tides, ripples and eddies. But there was no real sensation of vastness, no bouyancy, no wetness, just . . . pain, in every conceivable variety, in every possible lurid color, endless and bottomless, ranging from a deep crimson purple throb to fiery, jagged blades of molten gold.

He'd never imagined such pain, and knew he could not tolerate it for long. Knew that if he just let go, just let himself sink into the darkness reaching up from below with greedy fingers, that the pain would end.

Only . . . he couldn't. Not yet.

There was one thing he had to do, one task yet to complete, a task that mattered more than the agony that pierced every inch of his body and flowed like molten glass through his veins. He wasn't even completely certain what the words meant, but he could still hear them just the same, repeating like a broken record, in a voice as intensely frozen and cold as the currents through which he was drifting were boiling hot.

". . . when we're done with you, we're gonna take care of your pretty little blond boytoy. You didn't really think we'd forget about him - did you?"

The pain was coming in waves, each stronger and more fierce than the last, but above it, or below it, or beyond it, there was something else - something that sought to offer solace, even though there was no real solace to be found. Still, there was a glimmer of soft radiance in all the lurid layers of color around him - a beacon amid the technicolor fury of the storm.

A voice that murmured nonsense words - meaningless but rhythmic and compelling.

"Brian, don't you dare die on me, Brian. Are you listening to me? Brian, you better not die on me."

The litany went on and on, and then repeated itself, never pausing, never faltering.

A ray of pure light breaking through bands of lurid color.

He could not - quite - reach it. But he had to reach it. There was no other choice. The price of failure was simply too high to contemplate.

Emmett. The name came to him suddenly. That was the name of his ray of light. Strange. Something inside him insisted that it should have been Michael, although he really couldn't attach faces or memories to either name.

But it wouldn't really matter. The only thing that did was the message, if he could just summon up the strength - and the will - to speak it.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~
The ambulance arrived in a garish, brilliant rotation of scarlet lights reflecting on drifts of dirty snow, and the paramedics rushed forward, pushing a gurney ahead of them, focused only on taking whatever steps were necessary to save the life of their patient. Emmett greeted their arrival with a sense of relief, eager to let them take over. His efforts at revival had proven useless, and he was feeling more and more helpless, and less and less confident.

Brian was deathly white, and his breathing had grown progressively more shallow as they'd waited for the arrival of the emergency team. After doing all that he could think of to protect his boss, Lance had gone to meet Horvath and the police and to aid in the search of the area and efforts to learn the identity of the attackers, who had managed to make their escape prior to the arrival of the police.

Meanwhile, Drew hovered nearby, after dragging the fire barrel closer to try to provide a little warmth for Emmett and the figure draped across in his lap.

The body of the man Lance had shot lay ignored, checked by Lance only briefly to determine that the thug was, indeed, dead, although the three holes in his head was a pretty fair indicator.

Emmett shifted his position to give the ambulance attendants better access to Brian's torso, but he was surprised when they attempted to move Brian to the stretcher they had placed nearby, to find that it was not such a simple task as they'd expected. Brian's fist was clinched tight around Emmett's lapel, so tight that it could not be dislodged. Emmett and Drew attempted to pry it loose, but with no luck. Then, to the astonishment of the entire group, the fist clinched tighter and, against all odds, Brian stirred and opened his eyes to stare directly into Emmett's face.

"Brian?" Emmett whispered, suddenly unable to breathe as he was impaled by hazel eyes, as sharp and keen as a blade. "Jesus, you're awake. What are you . . ."

Brian's lips moved, but he hadn't enough breath to create sound.

Emmett gestured to the ambulance personnel, to keep them from lifting their patient away from him; then he leaned close, putting his ear against Brian's lips.

At first, there was only the faint susurration of broken breath. Then he heard it, gasping, barely audible, but definite.

"Justin's . . . next. Don't . . . call him."

The last word barely spoken, riding on a long, slow sigh into oblivion, a languid drift down into a layer of ocean where there was no more pain.

The second time the emergency team attempted to move him to the gurney, he was as limp and unresisting as a rag doll.

"I'm riding with him," Emmett declared to Drew, as the paramedics prepared the patient for transport, "but you have to give Detective Horvath a message for me. It's really important."

"Okay." By this time, Drew would have agreed to anything in order to ease the incipient panic he easily read in Emmett's demeanor. "What do I tell him?"

"Okay." By this time, Drew would have agreed to anything in order to ease the incipient panic he easily read in Emmett's demeanor. "What do I tell him?"

Emmett drew a deep breath. "He said that Justin is in danger. You have to tell Horvath to make sure he stays away. If he comes back here . . ."
Drew sighed. "That's why he regained consciousness, isn't it? To make sure Justin would be protected."

Emmett nodded, tears welling in his eyes. "And I'll be damned if I'm going to take a chance on him surviving this horror, only to wake up to find out that the person he loves more than life itself was taken from him."

Drew stared down at Brian's face and watched as the paramedics wrapped him in insulated blankets. He managed not to cringe away from the sight of the mangled body, but only barely. "You really think," he whispered, "that he's going to... survive this?"

"He's Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake," Emmett snapped, barely able to contemplate the possibility of a world where such a man could be reduced to a broken memory. "He'll survive. You'll see."

Drew did not argue, choosing instead to wrap his arms around Emmett and offer the only comfort he had to give - the warmth of a lover's touch.

"Sir," said one of the paramedics urgently as he adjusted the last strap on the stretcher, "we have to go. We need to get him to a trauma center, right now."

Emmett hastened to follow. "How bad is it?" he asked, as he climbed into the back of the ambulance.

One of the paramedics began to hook the patient up to the medical equipment in the vehicle while another spoke into a radio handset. No one volunteered an answer to Emmett's question, but he didn't really need one.

He had never seen so much blood, he thought. And he would never have imagined that a human body could take so much punishment and... He tucked himself safely into a corner as the ambulance began to move, siren already screaming.

Brian was so still, so limp, so...

But he wouldn't think about that. He would put on his best Scarlet O'Hara persona, and trust that tomorrow would be a better day. A tomorrow, confirmed by a quick glance out the ambulance's rear window, which was already upon them.

As the emergency vehicle went streaking through the dawn-kissed streets of the city, he managed to stay out of the way of the attendants as they worked over Brian with growing urgency, but he got close enough to reach out and enfold Brian's cold fingers in his own hand. It wasn't much, but it was all he could do, his only means of speaking to his old friend, to say, "I'm here, and I'm not going to leave you."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

Carl Horvath stood in the middle of the old warehouse, staring down at the body crumpled at his feet, and was suddenly aware of every one of his years. How, he wondered, had he come to this point? When had he made the transformation from Carl Horvath, good, diligent, competent, run-of-the-mill detective, just a few years shy of retirement, to... he had to stifle a small, weary smile, despite the grimness of the moment... Carl Horvath, defender of Gayopolis? It seemed appropriate, somehow, to think in terms that would be perfectly clear to his not-quite-legitimate stepson.

How had it come to this, he wondered again. And how in God's name had Brian Kinney been transformed from primo badboy/pain in the collective ass of every hypocritical politician and every pulpit-pounding homophobe, to a helpless victim?
One of his not-quite-wife's favorite expressions came to mind. "Don't tell me the world's not going to shit," he muttered, not quite under his breath.

Apparently, he'd spoken more loudly than he'd intended, as Lance Mathis paused in the act of lighting a cigarette, and gave the cop a small, grim smile. "The world is going to shit," he confirmed.

Horvath nodded and took a deep breath. Time to put personal concerns aside, and deal with the business at hand, ugly and tragic as it might be.

"I assume you've got a license for the gun," he said, not quite making it a question.

"I do," replied the security chief, "but if I didn't, I still would have shot him." He paused, taking a deep drag of his Marlboro before continuing. "Though I'd have preferred to have had a chance to dispense a little justice of my own before granting him the peace of the grave."

Horvath glanced over toward the iron bars where the thug's victim had been chained and barely managed not to cringe away from the pools of blood lying black against the broken cement. "That bad, huh?"

Lance shuddered. "Count your blessings that you didn't see what they did to him. It's funny, you know. You always think that you'll get used to it as time goes by, but you never do."

Drew Boyd arrived as his cousin was speaking and reached out to lay a comforting hand on Mathis' shoulder. "If you could get used to that, you wouldn't be human."

Mathis just nodded, before turning to allow his eyes to sweep his surroundings. "Crime scene techs on their way?"

Horvath nodded. "And the coroner," he added. Then he knelt by the body at his feet and studied the thug's face, noting the expression of surprised disbelief with some small measure of satisfaction. He wasn't supposed to allow himself any emotional involvement with his cases, but he thought that Boyd's observation would extend to cover this situation. He would have had to be less than human not to feel some relief that this cretin had died before he could complete his unholy task.

The man was lying on his side with the piece of angle iron he had used as a weapon still clutched in his hand, his arm extended over his head. The sleeve of his jacket had ridden up, revealing the edge of a dark mark on his forearm. Moving carefully, more to avoid the wrath of the coroner for tampering with the body than out of any nuance of respect for the dead, Horvath pushed the sleeve higher and stared at the inked figure he'd exposed.

"Shit!" said Mathis, closing his eyes and rubbing his forehead with thumb and forefinger.

"What?" asked Drew. "What is that?"

He then proceeded to search the dead man's clothing, removing the wallet he found in the rear pocket of dirty jeans.

The driver's license showed an address in northeastern Ohio, and provided the name of the bearer: Andrew O'Malley.

"Off hand," the detective said slowly, "I'd guess we've got ourselves a member of the Order of the Blood."
"Jesus!" whispered Drew. "You think Brian pissed off some white supremacy nut job?"

"No," Horvath said quietly. "This is just a thug-for-hire, with delusions of grandeur. No doubt Brian pissed off a lot of people through the years, but this . . . " He paused to glance once more toward the carnage on the floor around him. "This had to be personal. It wasn't enough to kill him. They wanted to destroy him - break him - before he died."

Mathis nodded his agreement. Then, unexpectedly, he dredged up a tiny smile. "Proving," he drawled, "that they didn't know him very well."

"What do you mean?" asked Drew, who didn't know Brian nearly as well as Emmett did. Not even as well as Mathis did, because the security chief always made it his first priority to get to know his clients intimately.

Mathis sighed. "He'd die first."

"Still might," Horvath pointed out reluctantly.

Mathis nodded. "I know. But still unbroken."

Horvath smiled. "I can't even begin to tell you how many times I had to bite my tongue to keep from biting his head off, or literally sit on my hands to avoid taking a swing at him. God! He could be the most infuriating, demanding, cocksure, in-your-face bastard you can even imagine. But . . ."

"But?" Drew prompted.

"At the end of the day, you had to admit that he had balls the size of melons - and more nerve than sense. He . . . re-educated me, I guess. Until I came face-to-face with him, I never realized that a queer could also be a real man." He smiled again. "Even if he was more concerned with how his ass looked in skin-tight leather than how to defend himself. He was almost fearless, something the rest of the world doesn't expect . . . from a fag."

He flushed as he caught Drew Boyd's eye. "Sorry, Drew. It was just . . . heterosexual ignorance. Until Debbie came into my life, I didn't have a clue."

A bustle at the doorway announced the arrival of the crime scene specialists, and Horvath rose to his feet with a sigh. "Now for the hard part," he said wearily.

"Reports?" asked Mathis. "Paperwork? Facing the press who are probably already on their way as we speak?"

"All of the above," answered the detective. "But first things first. Facing the press and my bosses will be child's play, compared to facing Debbie."

"Wait," said Drew quickly. "You can't. Not until you know the rest."

He then proceeded to relay Emmett's message - and Brian's request - and both Horvath and Mathis understood immediately that Kinney had managed, in the face of insurmountable odds, to confirm their opinions of him.

Balls the size of melons indeed.

The group of Pittsburgh tourists found it difficult to agree on much of anything as they prepared for a day of sightseeing in the city, but there was absolutely no argument about where to have breakfast. One could not, after all, spend a day in New York without dropping in, at least once, at the Brooklyn Diner.

Thus it was that the group, minus only Jennifer who had caught an early flight to Boston to visit family, found itself wandering down W. 57th Street just after nine A.M., debating the merits of Tony Bennett's Cinnamon-Raisin-Pecan French Toast (Calvin's choice) as opposed to the iconic delights of Smoked Salmon on a Bagel (Melanie's preference).

The morning was cold but dry, and they were looking forward to a busy, enjoyable day. Melanie and Lindsey seemed particularly glad to be present, and happy with the chance to catch up and renew connections. Living in Toronto had proven to be a blessing for them in many ways, but it had not come without certain costs.

They had missed their friends - some more than others - and one of them had missed one particular old friend so intensely that she sometimes wondered if the move had been worth it. But she had never dared to voice that idea, knowing how much emotional turmoil it would generate.

Still, this would be a lovely day, and even if she could not speak face-to-face with the one she missed so much, she could pump their other friends for information and learn all there was to learn about how Brian was faring - without Justin.

Lindsey frowned a bit over that thought. She wondered if she would ever quite be able to cast off the tiny shards of guilt that lingered in her heart, knowing that she had been the primary source of the impulse that had brought Justin to the city, to the center of the art world in search of his professional fulfillment, at the cost of his personal commitment to Brian.

It had been the right thing to do. She still believed that, in her certainty that Warhol would never have become Warhol had he been content to remain in Pittsburgh.

But . . .

Sometimes - usually late at night when she couldn't sleep - she still remembered the look on Brian's face as she and her partner had driven away from the house that had been their home for so long; as they'd taken his son away to a new life while he pretended that it didn't matter, that losing Justin and losing Gus was just another minor example of the general shittiness of daily life. His expression had revealed nothing, unless a person knew what to look for.

And Lindsey had always known how to see some part of what he kept so well hidden.

He would survive; Brian Kinney would always survive. But . . . she wondered if she even wanted to know how much he hurt inside. She wondered if she would even have the strength to endure it if she should ever find out.

Better, she realized, not to know.

"You're awfully quiet," said Melanie, falling back from the group in order to take her partner's arm. "Missing Gus?"

Lindsey smiled, and swallowed a tiny surge of annoyance. Lately, Mel had begun making not-so-subtle little comments, suggesting that Lindsey favored Gus - her son with Brian - over Jenny Rebecca, Melanie's daughter with Michael. The accusation was preposterous; Lindsey could not imagine how she could love their beautiful little girl any more than she did, but she knew the motivation behind it. Just as she'd always understood Melanie's deep, abiding resentment of anything that was even remotely related to Brian. And she knew it would never end. Melanie would always know that Lindsey loved Brian - had always loved him, would always love him, and had loved him long before she even met Melanie; something Melanie would never be able to accept graciously.

"Missing both of our beautiful babies," she replied, ignoring the intended barb and putting on her brightest smile.

Melanie was right, of course; she was just missing the kids. That was the reason for the tiny hub of uneasiness that she felt in her belly. What else, after all, could it be?

When they reached the diner, they were lucky to find a couple of adjacent booths where they proceeded to study the menus presented by a personable (and gay, according to Ted's supposedly impeccable gay-dar) young waiter, while they accepted lovely, steaming mugs of coffee and chatted about where they should go first.

Of them all, only Michael and Lindsey were somewhat subdued, neither showing much enthusiasm for the items on the menu. Ben finally ordered for Michael, opting for chocolate chip buttermilk pancakes, when Michael seemed unable to make up his mind. Still, Ben put it down to excitement over the prospects of the day, and didn't dwell on it. Especially since Michael simply nodded his agreement to the selection.

The waiter, whose name was Greg, took their orders efficiently, then spent a few minutes making recommendations about places they might like to see. Thus, by the time their food arrived, they had tentatively agreed on where to go first.

Debbie and Ted had agreed to split an order of the Tony Bennett specialty, and were rolling their eyes over the exquisite taste when Debbie's cell phone rang, in the distinctive opening bars of Can't Help Lovin' that Man of Mine, and Debbie laughed as she flipped it open. "Hello, Pittsburgh," she crowed. "Wish you were here. You'll never guess what we're . . ."

She paused then, listening intently. "What? Carl, I can't hear . . . what did you . . ."

The group had been chattering among themselves, raving about the quality of the food with Melanie emitting exaggerated moans of pleasure as she bit into her bagel, and still arguing the merits of Radio City as opposed to the appeal of MOMA - except for Michael and Lindsey who had gone silent and wide-eyed with the ringing of the phone.

But all followed suit, shutting up in mid-sentence as they saw Debbie's face blanch pure white as she appeared to gasp for air.

When she closed her eyes and swayed, mouth gaping, it was Ben who grabbed the phone away from her. "What is it, Carl?" he asked.

He listened for a few seconds, before taking a deep shaky breath. "Is he . . ."

At that moment, Michael grabbed his husband's arm and jerked until Ben turned to face him. "It's Brian," said Michael, knowing that he was right, even if he didn't know how he knew. "Isn't it?"

Ben could only nod.

"How bad?"

"Bad," Ben answered, putting his arm around Michael's shoulders, understanding how difficult this was going to be for the man who had been Brian's best friend since childhood. "We have to go home. Now."
The group scrambled then to make their departure, gathering their things quickly, as Ben concluded his conversation with the detective and quickly explained what had happened, deliberately leaving out all the grisly details, most of which existed only in his imagination as Horvath had told him only what he needed to know.

"Wait!" said Daphne, eyes huge and welling with tears, as they left the restaurant. "We have to find Justin. He has to know."

Ben sighed, wishing that he did not have to be the one to tell them. "He can't know," he said firmly.

"What . . . what do you mean?" Michael demanded, his face chalk white around eyes filled with shadow. "He has to know."

"He can't," Ben repeated, knowing that he had no choice but to explain. "He's on a plane on his way to Tahiti, remember? And . . ."

"And?" Michael again, leaving Ben with no alternative but to tell them the whole truth.

"Brian remained conscious long enough to make sure the police knew. This wasn't a random attack. Brian was chosen deliberately, and Justin . . . was next on the list."

Lindsey stumbled as she turned away from Ben, looking around for a taxi, or a subway entrance - anything to focus on, to beat back the terrible yawning blackness that was looming in her mind, threatening to consume her. In desperation, she leaned against a handy lamp post, trying to fight off the terrible nausea in the pit of her stomach, trying not to visualize what her mind insisted on showing her.

"Jesus, Linz!" snapped Melanie as she came up beside her. "Will you please take it easy? Where do you think you're going? There's nothing we can do. Our flight home doesn't leave until . . ."

Lindsey turned then to stare into the face of her partner, eyes wide with disbelief. "You think . . . I'm going home?"

"Well, of course we're . . ."

But Lindsey was not listening, not really even interested. "You do whatever you like," she said quickly, ignoring the typical suspicious sneer forming on her partner's face, "but I'm going to Pittsburgh."

Matthew Keller did not suffer fools gladly, and he regarded the student nurse who stood in the doorway of his cubicle with undisguised contempt. "What do you mean when you say that 'they need me'. Who the fuck needs me, and why?"

"The ambulance just rolled in," she explained, voice all atremble but determined to deliver the message as dispatched, despite the bite of panic rising in her throat.

Everyone knew that Keller could be a monster when he chose, but everybody also knew that, when one got right down to it, he was the absolute best at what he did. There was no more gifted trauma specialist anywhere in Pittsburgh - maybe even anywhere in the world - and Nurse Beck had not minced words.

"Get Keller down here now."
"Nurse Beck sent me to bring you down." She straightened under his glare. "You didn't answer your phone."

He gave her his patented sneer. "That's because I was sleeping," he said coldly. "I've been up all night."

"And you might be up all day," she snapped, surprising herself with her own degree of determination. "You've got a new patient."

Keller wanted to argue, to protest, to deny, but this slip of a girl had zeroed in on his one vulnerability. He had never in his life found a way to resist the drawing power of a "new patient". Especially since no one ever risked generating his considerable rage unless the patient in question was in dire need of his extraordinary skills.

He had spent his life resisting more conventional temptations. He had almost no personal life, confined his sexual experiences to occasional fucks as they came available, had stopped communicating with his dysfunctional family years before, and spent his spare time engaging in the only hobby he'd ever allowed himself - tennis - although these days he was hard-pressed to find suitable opponents. He almost never lost, and he was a terrible winner, so most people avoided him like the plague.

As a consequence, he spent much of his time alone, when he wasn't working. But he was almost always working. He grumbled about it incessantly, but rarely took time off.

He didn't admit it, but it was the love of the challenge that kept him at his desk in the hospital, and a deep-seated need to justify his own existence.

"What's your name?" he demanded abruptly, rising from the poor-excuse-for-a-cot that he'd smuggled into his so-called office.

"Melinda Cowell," she answered sharply, "and you'd better hurry. He's in bad shape."

"Aren't they all?" he muttered, but he was moving more quickly, snagging his lap coat from its peg by the door as he followed her into the hall. "What happened?"

"Somebody beat the bejesus out of him?" she answered. "They're saying it's a hate crime. Apparently, he's gay."

"Shit!" said the doctor. "The world sucks sometimes, Nurse Cowell."

"I'm not a nurse," she explained. "Just a student."

"Yeah? Well, get ready to get a look at the ugly face of reality, Student Cowell. Do we know who our victim is?"

The student glanced down at the chart in her hands, before she handed it to him. "The chart says 'Kinney. Brian Kinney'."

The young doctor managed, just barely, not to stumble or recoil from the sudden realization.

Brian Kinney. Holy shit!

He did pause then to take a look at the chart, to scan the information provided there. But it was woefully inadequate. Blunt trauma. Multiple wounds. Broken bones. Excessive blood loss. And that was just for starters.
Brian Kinney.

Matthew had to struggle not to allow himself to descend into broad sweeps of memory, of the days of his youth, when he had been a pre-med student and Brian Kinney had already been well on his way to becoming the legend of Liberty Avenue, even though he was only a lowly undergraduate. Of course, it had also been undeniably true that Kinney was already stunningly beautiful and filled with the incredible self-assurance that would quickly establish his place in the world.

Brian Kinney - his first love, and the man who had taught him what it was to be out and proud.

Shit!

According to the standards of medical ethics, he should recuse himself from the case, knowing that he would be hard-put to maintain any degree of professional detachment. However, Keller was no fool, and not given to false modesty. For the kind of treatment that Kinney would need, if he were to have any hope of surviving his injuries, only the best trauma specialist would do.

And Matthew Keller was the best in his chosen field; no one would even try to dispute that fact.

He barreled into the elevator with the student nurse at his heels, knowing that there was no other choice.

No one would know about his connection to Kinney; they had parted long years before, each knowing that they would not survive staying together. They would destroy each other if they tried, two super egos competing for dominance.

But now the time had come for Keller to do what he did best - to cheat death and restore life.

In a way, Brian Kinney had saved him, at a time in his life when he had been most vulnerable. Now, he would return the favor.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Emmett had been pacing the floor for two hours, growing more and more distressed, when Drew Boyd joined him and convinced him to sit down and drink a cup of coffee. The coffee was nasty and bitter, but Emmett gulped it gratefully, eager to find something - anything - to distract his mind from the terrible dark thoughts that kept assaulting him.

"They haven't told you anything?" asked Drew after he managed to settle Emmett into the corner of the waiting room.

Emmett shook his head. "They brought some forms for me to fill out. They wanted to know his next of kin, but I . . . couldn't . . ."

"Does he have family?"

Emmett drew a deep breath. "Not that he'd claim. I had to give them his mother's name, but . . . God! I hope she'll have sense enough to stay away. If he thought she was here, I can't even imagine how he'd react."

Drew draped his arm around his companion's shoulders. "It's okay, Honey. I doubt he's going to know anything, for a while."

If Emmett noticed Drew's hesitation before adding that last phrase, he chose to ignore it. "How about you?" he asked. "Did the police find anything?" Then he remembered the message he'd delivered.
"Did you tell them? Is Justin . . ."

"Perfectly safe," Drew assured him. "Detective Horvath got in touch with his agent, and found out that Justin took off on a flight to the South Pacific early this morning. Nobody's going to be able to get to him for now, and, by the time he comes back to the country, hopefully this will all be over and done."

Emmett looked down then, his eyes brimming with tears.

"What is it, Honey?" asked Drew gently.

Emmett tried to put on a little smile, but failed miserably. "It's just . . . I know this is what Brian wanted. For Justin to be safe. I still can't believe that he was able to hold on long enough to tell me. But . . . when Justin does find out, when he learns what's happened, he's going to be so hurt, so devastated that he wasn't here, that Brian had to go through this alone. And if . . . God! . . . if Brian . . ."

"Hush, now!" Boyd whispered. "You know, everybody keeps talking about what a tough little shit he is. He's going to be . . .

"You don't know that," said Emmett sharply. "Nobody knows that."

"You're right," said a new voice.

Emmett and Drew jumped to their feet, and turned to face the new arrival.

"I'm Dr. Keller." The surgeon was young and well-built, with sandy blonde curls and brilliant green eyes. Emmett thought that, under other circumstances, he'd have labeled the man a hottie. But not now.

"Nobody can know what's going to happen to your friend. However, I can make some educated guesses."

Emmett was staring at the man's lab coat, which was smeared with dark stains.

"How is he?" he finally managed to ask.

"Not good," replied Keller. "But you already knew that, didn't you? We've managed to stabilize him, for the moment, but we've got a lot of work to do. He's got more broken bones than I care to list, including a skull fracture. Severe blood loss. A punctured lung. Some organ damage - kidney, liver, spleen - but we're not going to know the full extent until we go in and take a look."

"Jesus!" whispered Emmett.

"Is his next of kin here?" asked Keller, his eyes sweeping the waiting room.

Emmett sighed. "I guess that would be his mother, but . . . I don't even know how to . . ."

"That's all right," said the doctor abruptly, suddenly awash with memories of Brian's comments about his mother. "In an emergency - like this - the hospital won't require permission to treat him. We're prepping him for surgery now, but we have to wait to get in a new blood supply. We've already infused him with all of our RH-negative stock, so . . ."

"Hey," said Drew. "I'm O negative."

The doctor offered up a gentle smile. "But you're gay, Mr. Boyd. The whole world knows that by now. And gays . . ."

Drew nodded, swallowing his anger. "Yeah, okay. I get it."

"Dr. Keller?" Emmett's voice was very soft, very small. "Is he going to . . ."

"Not," replied the trauma surgeon, "if I can help it." Then he smiled. "And if I can't help it, no one can."

Emmett closed his eyes, visualizing Brian as he'd seen him the previous night - Brian Kinney, perfect, radiant, beautiful. "God!" he whispered. "They wanted to mutilate him, to destroy him, to . . ."

"Yes," confirmed the doctor. "I'm sure you're right. There's nothing as certain to piss off homophobic pricks as a beautiful gay man, is there?"

"Did you know him?" asked Drew, noticing a faint spark of anger in the physician's tone.

Keller evaded the question. "Everybody in Pittsburgh has heard of Brian Kinney, the Stud of Liberty Avenue."

Emmett nodded. "Sometimes he'd make me so mad I'd want to spit, and I've begun to think he did it deliberately. But he was always . . . beautiful."

Drew could only nod, as the doctor tried to find words of reassurance - something he was not very good at, even at the best of times.

"Will he . . . be beautiful again?" Emmett's question was barely audible.

Matthew Keller took a deep breath, and closed his eyes recalling the horrible damage done to his patient's beautiful body. "I don't know," he admitted finally, unable to offer up a lie.

But a tiny little voice inside him would not be silenced, one that insisted that there had to be a way, and he was damned well going to find it.

But first things first. First he had to save a life; then he'd worry about finding the means to restore it.

Nurse Beck made another check of the surgical instruments laid out before her, knowing that it wouldn't do at all for Keller to call for something only to find that it wasn't ready for him.

Then she turned to study the displays on the monitors, noting the patient's vital signs, which were far from optimal. Under ordinary circumstances, the young man would not be here, awaiting the first stroke of the surgeon's blade, but the circumstances were far from ordinary. If they waited for the patient to be adequately stabilized, it was likely that they would never get the chance to save his life.

Brian Kinney would not awaken to face a new day unless Keller was able to repair some of the damage done to his body by the cretins who had attacked him.

Lastly, the nurse took a moment to study the patient's face, as Keller scrubbed up. The doctor had been right in what he'd said to Drew Boyd. Everybody in Pittsburgh had heard of Brian Kinney. His face was almost as well known as Iron Man football heroes, and, from a strictly impersonal perspective, much more beautiful.

Only it wasn't beautiful now. Gloria Beck closed her eyes, suddenly almost overwhelmed with sorrow. How could anybody have done this, she wondered. And why did it matter where this young man stuck his dick, to the beasts who had taken it upon themselves to destroy this living work of art? She just couldn't understand how the world had become such a dark and violent place.

Then she opened her eyes, and was almost overwhelmed for a second time, but this time it was with shock at the surreal quality of what the scene laid out before her.

Matthew Keller was standing beside the patient, his gloved hands carefully lifted to avoid contamination. But he was not studying the patient's condition or trying to diagnose a problem or looking at the monitors. Instead, the most gifted young trauma surgeon in the northeastern United States - known to medical staffs throughout the region as the Notoriously Egotistical Bastard - was leaning forward, his lips just caressing the patient's temple, whispering words that were only barely audible. "I've got you, Baby," he was saying, "and I'm not going to let you go. You hear me, Brian? It's Matt, and I'm not going to let you go. Just rest now. You're safe - with me."

Then he straightened up, and noticed that Nurse Beck had heard and understood every word.

"You got a problem with that?" he demanded, suddenly all business again.

Gloria Beck smiled beneath her mask, and knew that he had seen it and decided to ignore it.

"Not a one," she answered, her voice deliberately without emotion.

"Then don't just stand there," he snapped. "Hand me a fucking scalpel."

It was almost four when Calvin Culpepper pulled his Audi into the parking lot of Allegheny Memorial Hospital, having shaved almost an hour off the customary five-and-a-half-hour drive. Though some of the occupants of the vehicle had made a valiant attempt to keep the conversation going and pass the time early in the ride, most had finally given up the effort. No one had spoken at all in the final two hours.

They had been more crowded on the trip into New York, with Ted and Blake taking up the third seat, and their luggage piled on the roof rack. But on the return, the two had elected to join Lindsey and Melanie in the car they'd rented for the journey. Melanie had grumbled, but finally relented when she'd realized that Lindsey was going ahead with her determination to come to Pittsburgh, whether or not Melanie decided to accompany her.

Calvin, correctly gauging the mood of his passengers, did not bother to try to find a parking place for the Audi. Instead, he simply pulled up before the front entrance of the hospital, and allowed all his riders to disembark. He was just pulling out to cruise around and search out a place to park when he spotted the rental Toyota pull in behind him, allowing Lindsey, Ted, Melanie, and Daphne to exit, while Blake went to park the car.

Michael had been first out of the car, and was first through the doors, breaking into a sprint once he was inside. Ben and the rest of the group followed more circumspectly. Nobody bothered to stop at the desk to ask directions. They had all been here before, so they knew exactly where to go.

When Michael tore into the waiting room, Emmett leapt to his feet and sprang forward. He had not realized how alone he felt, even with Drew at his side, until he saw Michael burst into the room, even though Lance and Cynthia Whitney, Brian's assistant, had joined them earlier in the day, and were still there waiting.

Emmett reached for his old friend, and they were immediately in each other's arms, giving and receiving comfort and sharing tears.

"How is he?" Michael demanded, as the rest of the group arrived. "Have you heard . . ."

"Nothing," said Emmett. "He's been in surgery for hours. And nobody's told us anything. Oh, Michael, I'm so scared. He was so . . . broken and . . ."

"Thank God you were there," Michael interrupted. "Thank God you got there in time."

Emmett was shaking his head. "Not in time to save him. I'm so sorry, Michael."

"What the hell happened?" demanded Debbie, speaking more to Drew and Lance and Cynthia than to Emmett who was obviously incapable of providing cogent answers.

But Ben knew that Michael, as well as some of the others, were not ready to face the blunt reality of what Brian had endured. "Not now," he said firmly, his eyes warning Debbie - always hungry for the details - to back off. "I'm sure we'll hear the whole gory story, all in good time."

Lindsey, who had entered the room without speaking to anyone, circled around the group and made her way to the nurse's station where she spoke to the woman on duty. "Excuse me," she said softly, "but can you please check on the condition of Brian Kinney?"

The young nurse looked up from the chart she was working on. "Are you family?"

Lindsey mustered up a smile. "I'm the mother of his child. Does that count?"

The young woman - her badge said "Barbara" - wavered for a moment; then she smiled. "I'll make a call."

"Thanks," said Lindsey, turning back to the crowd, knowing what she would see, and she was right. Melanie was staring at her, eyes gleaming with anger. The reaction, of course, to the 'I'm-the-mother-of-his-child' remark.

On the other hand, Michael and Emmett were looking at her as if she had just qualified for sainthood.

The nurse had just lifted the phone to make her call, when the doors to the surgery suite opened, and Matthew Keller strode into the waiting room.

Although Emmett and Drew were the only ones who were supposed to know who he was, that turned out not to be the case.

Lindsey's eyes were suddenly huge. "Matthew?" she said softly. "You're taking care of him?"

"Hello, Lindsey," replied the physician, suddenly not sure where to look. He had not counted on this, on running into one of the few people who knew everything about his relationship with Brian. "And yes. I am taking care of him."

"Oh, thank God," she said, throwing her arms around him. "I know you won't let anything bad happen to him. Will you?"

He smiled, and whispered into her ear. "Not as long as I've got breath in my body."

"How is he?" asked Emmett, unable to bear another moment of uncertainty.

Keller released Lindsey and turned to face the group. "He's . . . holding his own. For now, that's pretty much all we can expect."
"How bad was it?" asked Ben.

Dr. Keller sighed. "He had quite a bit of internal damage, but I think we’ve managed to repair it all. The most dangerous thing was the pressure on the brain. He was bleeding into his skull, under the fracture. But we were able to relieve that. Had to remove his spleen and repair a tear in his lung. Then there were bones to set, lacerations to stitch up." He offered up a tired smile. "It was a long, complex surgery. And I don't want to give you any false assurance. He's still got a long way to go. But . . ."

"But?" That was Lindsey, staring into his eyes and employing her familiarity with him to gauge his honesty.

"But I think . . . I believe he's going to make it. We've put him into an induced coma, to give him a chance to heal. Now don't misunderstand me. It won't be fast, and it won't be easy, but he'll make it. I intend to make sure of that."

Then Michael and Emmett and Ted were throwing their arms around each other, too relieved to even voice their relief, and Debbie was laughing with Daphne and Ben, as Cynthia collapsed into her seat, covering her eyes with her hands and counting on the confusion of the moment to conceal the tears that were streaming through her fingers.

Only Lindsey was still standing there, still waiting, as Melanie stood by to observe, her face stony and emotionless as Lindsey stepped forward to speak softly into the doctor's ear.

"If you let him die," said the woman who had known the physician since his days as a callow undergraduate, "I will have your balls. Understand me?"

He offered up his first brilliant smile of the day. "I promise."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TBC
The ICU waiting room was smaller than the one in the ER, but no less forbidding. Institutional gray walls, molded plastic seating units, attached to metal frames, all a nondescript gray that might once have been blue, arranged around Parsons-style coffee tables, scratched and chipped, and covered with months-old editions of Newsweek and People and Ladie's Home Journal. In the corner, ready to dispense its battery-acid grade sludge, an industrial-sized coffee machine was nested among stacks of Styrofoam cups, a remnant of the days when service guild members hovered nearby to offer succor and comfort to anxious family members. The volunteers were long gone (mostly), but the machine remained, old and cranky and barely functional, but vital in its purpose.

When the group of Liberty Avenue denizens (an accurate sobriquet, even if many of its members no longer resided there) made it to the cluttered chamber, Emmett made an effort to show some signs of rekindling his characteristic flame by throwing up his hands in mock horror. "Omigod!" he exclaimed. "Who decorated this place? The Brothers Grimm?"

"It's okay, Honey," said Ted, offering up a weary smile. "Not everybody can have your fabulous sense of style."

"I know, but why must hospitals choose an ambiance that's more suitable for a mausoleum? Don't they understand that a few splashes of magenta against a chartreuse background would do wonders for patients' spirits?"

The words were cheerful enough - vintage Emmett - but the delivery was pallid.

"Or give them a heart attack," laughed Debbie, managing to sound almost normal.

Emmett dredged up a smile, but it was a half-hearted effort.

Though they had not spent much time talking about it, the general demeanor of the entire group was proof enough of their relief in learning that Brian would recover; they were all reaching for normalcy, for the insouciance that acquaintances would have expected of them, and those self-same acquaintances might even have been convinced by their cheerful display. Those who knew them well, however, would have noted the strained quality of their efforts.

Even so, only Ben, Drew, and Calvin recognized the fundamental irony underlying their attitude, realizing - as most of the group did not - that Brian, despite their shared tendency (or perpetual need) to blame him for all the wrongs in their lives, to question his motives and doubt his morals, to resent his successes and revel in his failures and savor his troubles like the taste of fine wine, was the cement that held them all together, the sun around which they all orbited.

Thus there were vague shadows lingering around them all, even as they expressed their relief. They would never acknowledge it, probably never be willing to even consider it - but something inside them knew it, nonetheless. They had come close today to losing the tie that bound them to each other.

And the day was not done yet.

Of them all, only Michael and Lindsey were still wrapped in total silence, feeling no desire to generate a false sense of well-being - content enough with the doctor's assurances, but not yet able to let go of their anxieties. They sat together, somehow taking comfort from the non-verbal sharing of old memories. Melanie loitered nearby, occasionally trying to make casual conversation, but her efforts were mostly futile, which only added to her growing discontent.

The group had dwindled somewhat in number by this time. Daphne and Blake had gone out to scout for take-out, as it had become obvious that most of them had no inclination to go home. The decision to stay wasn't rational or sensible, as they'd been told that chances were slim to non-existent that they'd be allowed to see the patient any time soon, that visiting hours in the ICU were stringently enforced and only two visitors at a time would be allowed to enter the unit. And, most certain of all, Brian would not be awake any time soon to even be aware of their presence. Yet they lingered, needing to share insights and comments and complaints, needing to be together in their determination to proclaim their independence, to demonstrate to the world that they could sit here in this place and calmly contemplate the nature of his mortality and prove that they did not need Brian around to function as the nucleus of the group. Even if they did.

Lance Mathis had stayed for a while, answering the group's questions as succinctly as possible, saying no more than necessary, but he had departed after a brief conversation with Dr. Keller, informing Drew that he was going to check in with the police to offer his help with the investigation.

Cynthia had also disappeared, after following the trauma surgeon back to the nurse's station when he'd finished addressing the group. They had talked together for a while, very quietly, and Emmett had noticed, at one point, that the surgeon had taken her hand and moved close enough to whisper something in her ear. Then he had escorted her down a nearby corridor, and they had disappeared through a double doorway into another section of the hospital.

Emmett wondered for a moment where she'd gone, uncertain of what she might be doing, but almost certain that she had not left the hospital. She wouldn't. After giving it some thought, he concluded that she was probably handling the paperwork for Brian, just as she always did.

No one among the group of old friends could exactly define the relationship between Brian and his chief assistant - not even Ted, who worked closely with both. But Emmett sometimes speculated that Cynthia might know Brian better than any of them, better even than Michael and Debbie and Lindsey, who had known him longest of all. Still, she was a very private person, and she kept her personal thoughts to herself - including how she felt about her boss. Nevertheless, Emmett had seen the look in her eyes when Keller had made his proclamation, and he had seen the tears she tried to conceal.

It didn't explain everything, but it explained enough. He as pretty sure that Cynthia loved Brian; he just wasn't sure in what way.

He curled himself into a bedraggled old rocking chair by the window, and stared out into the growing gloom of twilight, caught up in a brand new, previously untested realization: they all loved Brian, (although a quick glimpse of Melanie's face forced him to recant the absolute nature of that observation). Okay, almost all, even though there were plenty of times when they didn't like him in the slightest. It was a strange, odd kind of love, unlike any other - but real enough for all that.

He looked down toward the front of the hospital, and watched as a car pulled up to the emergency entrance and a woman jumped out of the front seat and hurried toward the doors with a child in her arms - a little boy with dark hair, a little boy who would one day grow up to be a young man. Would he ever face the kind of horror that Brian had faced on this day? Would people hate him because he was different, because he was not made in an image identical to those around him, because he believed differently or talked differently or worshipped differently - or loved differently? Emmett closed his eyes . . . and was swept into hellish memory, suddenly unable to hold it back for another moment.

Then he felt strong arms close around him, and he was weeping and could not restrain himself, could not remain silent, as both Drew and Calvin knelt beside him, each determined to offer comfort, with not a single thought of competition.

"Oh, God," he cried, "you can't imagine . . . what they did to him. How could anybody be so vicious, so cruel? And why? Why would they . . . They didn't just want to kill him; they wanted to destroy him, to take this beautiful man and make him into something hideous, something horrible and grotesque. Oh, God!"

And he was suddenly surrounded by the people who loved him, each trying to offer comfort, to ease his pain.

But strangely, it was one pair of arms he longed for particularly - the one who loved Brian - who knew Brian as almost no one else did. For a moment, he realized that it would have been perfect if only he could have reached out and touched Justin, but that could not be, so he leaned into Michael's arms, and allowed himself to be held.

"But he didn't give up, Micheal," he sobbed. "Even after the . . . torture they put him through, he held on. God, he was so broken, so damaged. I don't know how anybody could endure that kind of pain and still hold on, but he did. He did . . . because he knew he had to. He had to hold on, so he could tell us, for Justin."

"Tell us what, Em?" asked Michael, his hands stroking his friend's back.

"That . . . Justin was in danger. That Justin was next."

They all felt it then - a pale cold veil of dread, settling over them like a shroud, although only some recognized its meaning. Most were too caught up in the desperation of the moment and the need to offer comfort to their distraught companion to explore the deeper meaning of his words. But a few saw it immediately.

Ben looked up and watched as Melanie experienced her moment of epiphany, as she got her first glimpse at the full picture of the horror that had stalked the young man who had been her nemesis for so many years. Behind her, standing silent and gazing out into the growing darkness, Ted was trying to deal with the same kind of rising awareness.

In the shock of the moment, Melanie opened her mouth to give voice to her realization, to express her consternation, only to be silenced by the look in Ben's eyes. Bad enough, he reasoned, for the group of old friends to have to cope with the ordeal of Brian's trauma; the full realization that he had been a chosen victim rather than a random target could wait until later, until they were better prepared to face it.

He lifted his hands to rub his temples as he tried to figure out how he was going to tell Michael without sending him into a full-fledged panic.

Closing his eyes against the onset of a massive headache, he took a seat near the window and slumped forward, covering his face with his hands. He thought longingly of his lovely, comfortable bed in their lovely comfortable home, of their son, Hunter, who had spent the week-end with a friend, who had once had a huge crush on Brian, during the period before he'd discovered that he was actually straight, and Ben wondered how the teen-ager - who had been through so much - would react to the realization that the hot-and-mighty Kinney was not truly invincible after all.

Jesus! Was there no end to the complications that might arise from this endless, incomprehensible day?
The headache was getting worse.

He sat back in the chair, turning his head so he could look up through the window to watch the light draining out of the evening sky. It was, he thought, akin to the manner in which joy could drain from the human heart. He knew plenty about the loss of joy, and realized that there was no way to avoid the gloom that was rising in his mind. It was a familiar mood, although he experienced it only rarely. Most of the time he was able to concentrate on the things in his life that were beautiful and right, but today was not comprised of such things. Today he had tasted potential tragedy and sorrow, and it mattered very little that it would be anguish once removed, so to speak. He looked into his own heart and understood that he had come to care about Brian during the years since Michael had come into his life - care quite a lot, in spite of his initial misgivings. It had surprised him when he had come to understand that there were hidden levels in his husband's best friend, levels that only a few individuals had ever been allowed to see, levels that explained why Michael loved Brian so much, even though Ben had never actually been able to define the truth of those levels. But it didn't really matter. It only mattered that Michael loved Brian, truly, deeply, without reservation, and would never be able to recover fully should Brian be taken from him.

As for the rest of it - the never-discussed, deep-seated truths about Michael's feelings for Brian - they would remain undiscussed. Ben had come to full acceptance a long time before, understanding that there was no way of changing the reality. He would live out his life knowing that, had Brian been able and willing to do so, Michael would have been claimed many years before he and Ben ever met, forever off-limits to anyone except the man who would always be first in his heart.

It had not been an easy pill to swallow, but doing so had been the only way for Ben and Michael to build a life together.

Thus, he thought, some tiny, ugly part of him should have been tantalized by the notion of an existence free from Brian's influence. He hoped it was a measure of his maturity and his selfless love for his husband that he had resisted such an impulse.

He smiled, reflecting on how extremely fucked up life could become.

Ben felt a heavy weight settle in his chest. He could not bear to think about how Michael would have fared if Brian had died at the hands of his attackers.

He recalled the bad times of his own life - both the ones he had already shared with Michael, and the ones he had not yet chosen to reveal. He didn't think it was because he was deliberately avoiding full disclosure; it was just that he knew how hard it was for Michael, a natural optimist, to face the uglier truths of life. It wasn't, he realized, an ideal time for reflections like this, but ultimately, he had no choice but to let the memories come, let the sensations of loss wash through him. He remembered losing his father to heart failure, and his younger brother to a rare blood disease; he remembered watching his mother's slow, miserable, relentless slide into the mindless landscape of Alzheimer's, culminating in the unavoidable decision to confine her to a sanitarium when she could no longer care for herself; he remembered Paul, the gentle, soft-spoken young man who had taught him so much about the art and power of love, who had changed his life forever, who had ultimately infected him with HIV, and who had died just a couple of years earlier. And he remembered the day that he always thought of as the last day of his youth: the day he'd learned that he was HIV positive.

He sometimes wondered how he'd managed . . . to survive.

"Because," drawled a sardonic voice that called up an image of a droll smile, "you're a tough motherfucker. Like me."
He opened his eyes and was, somehow, not surprised to see who was sitting beside him.

"I thought you were at death's door," he observed.

The familiar face - unblemished, unbroken, and yes, Goddamn! beautiful - was giving him that patented Brian-Kinney smirk. "Reports of my death have been greatly exaggerated."

Ben wanted to frown, but couldn't. "You like using that line, don't you?"

The image shrugged. "When the shoe fits . . ."

Ben sighed, reflecting that he really must be tired, if his psychotic delusions were choosing to speak in clichés.

Still, it would be rude to proclaim that he knew a dream sequence when he saw one, just in case he was wrong, and it was this horrible day that had been the nightmare and this surrealistic moment was the reality. "Not so exaggerated," he observed. "You nearly died, you know."

"Yeah. I know. And if I had . . ."

"If you had," Ben interrupted, loathe to say it but realizing it needed to be said, "I don't know how Michael . . . how he could have . . ."

"That," snapped the image of Brian, "is your responsibility. If I can't be there for him, you have to. Understand?"

"Of course, I understand." Ben knew instinctively that one of Brian's primary purposes in life was to annoy the people around him, to get under their skin enough to force them to re-examine their lives and their philosophies and see things in a new light, but that didn't prevent him from feeling the irritation. "I just don't know if I can, not like you do."

The image of Brian chuckled. "You remember when your Stepford fag neighbor opened up his little couturier shop? What was his name again?"

Ben struggled not to grin. "Eli Gruber."

"Right. Gruber, seems appropriate somehow," replied Brian's image, his tongue tucked firmly in his cheek. "And remember how excited Michael was, so eager to believe that his good friend was going to let him buy Armani and Prada - disguised under different labels, of course - at knock-off prices, and how he didn't want to hear that you can only pay knock-off prices for designer items if the items are knock-offs to begin with?"

"Oh, I remember," Ben admitted. "And I also recall how upset he was with you when you referred to the shop as 'Fags Are Us'."

Brian shrugged. "I believe in telling the truth."

Ben couldn't really argue with that. "But it's not always necessary to use a broadsword when a paring knife would do the job just as well, with a lot less pain."

"Whose pain?" demanded the image of Brian. "Michael's? I'm thinking it would have been a lot more painful if I'd stood by and said nothing while he paid $200.00 for that pseudo-Gucci shirt only to find out later that it was a polyester fraud."

"Yeah, well, Eli certainly wasn't overjoyed with your comments."
"Are you kidding me? Are you saying it would have been okay for Eli to run his little crap emporium, ripping off friends and neighbors, but it wasn't okay for me to call him on his bullshit?"

Ben paused, remembering how angry Eli and Monty had been with Brian, how they had denied his assertions and been cold and distant to both Ben and Michael for weeks thereafter. Until the day when Ben had decided to make an attempt to mend fences, by stopping by the store to speak to Eli, only to find it closed and shuttered.

Apparently, Brian had not been the only one to recognize the shoddy nature of the merchandise. A few days later, Eli and Monty had apparently managed to swallow their resentment and resume their easy friendship with their neighbors - almost.

Ben frowned at the realization that there were, occasionally, still some awkward exchanges between the two couples, but that was not germane to this moment. "What does all of this have to do with what Michael would need from me, if you . . ."

"Bought the farm?" Brian's image appeared to be enjoying the conversation. "You can say it, you know. Dying has never scared me all that much."

"Okay. If you died. I still don't see . . ."

"I know, Zen Ben." The smart little smirk had become a tender smile. "But listen to me. Are you listening?"

"Yes. I'm listening."

"Do you want to know why I love Michael so much, always have and always will? It's not because he follows me around like a faithful little pup, or because he accepts me when no one else will, or believes in me when everybody else doubts. It's because he has the purest heart of anybody I've ever known. Michael wants to believe the best of everybody. Wants to trust people, wants to show everyone who he really is, and be accepted, just as he's willing to accept everyone else."

"So you're saying he's gullible?" Ben didn't much like the sound of that.

"Fuck, no!" Obviously, Brian didn't like it either. "It's not that he's gullible. It's that he wants to believe that the people he cares about are all as honest as he is. He's so eager to trust that he buys into the fantasies that people use to disguise realities they can't deal with. The sweetness in Michael isn't just a show or a sham. It's real; it's who he is. It's the best part of him, but it's also the worst part of him - the part that leaves him open and vulnerable. So that's what you have to do for him, Ben, if I'm not around to take care of the problem. You have to prevent him from letting himself be used and manipulated by the people he loves."

"And how exactly am I supposed to do that?"

The smirk was back. "Sometimes, by acting like a total shit."

"But I'm . . ."

"What? Too spiritual? Too well-adjusted? Too rational? All of the above?"

"Well . . ."

The look on that beautiful face was suddenly pensive, suddenly difficult to decipher. "If you love him enough . . . you'll find a way."
"Hey, Ben! You awake?"

The professor managed, barely, not to jerk upright, resurfacing from his dream with a soft grunt.

Looking down at him with a guarded expression was just about the last person he would have expected to see here, under the circumstances, although a moment's consideration made him realize that he really shouldn't be surprised.

Monty Peabody, after all, was employed here in this hospital, as a lab technician.

"Hey, Monty," he replied, rolling his head from side to side in an attempt to relieve the kink in his neck. "Must have dozed off."

Monty was pushing a cart loaded with blood sampling tubes and needles and similar supplies, but he pushed it aside and took a seat beside Ben, saying nothing for a moment as he watched the interaction between Michael and his friends.

"You guys must have had a rough day," he said finally. "It's all over the news, but you know how the press exaggerates everything. I'm sure it's not as bad as they're saying."

"Actually," answered Ben wearily, "it'sprobably worse. Although I haven't seen the reports."

Monty shook his head. "What a shame! We live in evil times, Ben."

"Yeah. We do."

"Well, listen!" Monty said as he stood and reached for his cart. "I'm going to go in there and get the real scoop. Find out what's really going on."

"Thanks, Monty," Ben replied, not quite sure why he was feeling a vague sense of alarm, "but that's not necessary. We talked to the doctor, and . . ."

"Yeah. I heard that Keller is the attending. He's got quite a reputation around here."

"For what?" asked Michael, suddenly appearing at Ben's side.

Monty frowned. "For being a first class prima donna and a royal pain in the rear. But . . ."

"But?" Ben read the concern in Michael's eyes and wished he could figure out a way to warn Monty to gauge his words carefully.

The lab technician sighed. "But for this kind of trauma case, he's probably the best there is. It's just that nobody knows why he has to be so . . ."

"Kinney-like?" That was Ted, having just wandered over to join the conversation.

"Exactly," said Monty, relieved that someone else had said what he was thinking, although he was pretty sure that he'd noted a faint trace of fondness in Schmidt's voice that he thought totally unwarranted. Everybody - everybody who counted anyway - knew that Kinney was a loose cannon of the first order, as he and his partner had good cause to know, and it was certainly not surprising that the Stud of Liberty Avenue had wound up as a target for gay bashers. The only real surprise was that it hadn't happened sooner. The man had practically begged for it.

But one look at the faces of the people around him convinced him that he would do well to keep that thought to himself.

Still, he couldn't wait to talk to Eli, who would understand exactly how he felt and share his ambivalence. It was, of course, a tragedy that such hatred and violence existed, and that the homophobic cretins would probably get away with it, but . . .

"I'll be back in a few minutes," he said smoothly, "with all the inside information."

"Monty," Ben said uneasily, "you don't have to do that."

Monty merely grinned. "Hey. What are friends for?"

He hurried toward the ICU doors, pausing to punch in the code that would open them, as he perused the documents on his clipboard and straightened his tie.

"Apparently," said Melanie not quite below her breath, "they're for ignoring HIPAA restrictions."

"What's that?" asked Michael.

Ben and Ted exchanged glances. "That's what he'll be violating," Ben explained, "if he comes out here spouting confidential patient information to anyone who wants to listen."

"Hey!" said Debbie, eager to learn anything that could be learned, and not very concerned with how she learned it. "We're not just 'anyone' you know. We're all family here. Why shouldn't we be told whatever . . . ."

"Because," said Melanie, who looked as if she couldn't believe that she was about to speak up on Brian's behalf, "it's privileged information, and Brian is the only person who has the right to determine who should be allowed to hear it."

"Well, he's hardly in any condition to say anything, is he?" Debbie snapped, sure that she had come up with a perfect response to end the debate.

But Melanie, despite the fact that she had resented him with every breath for longer than she could remember, knew Brian well enough to figure out that he would not leave such questions unresolved. She knew, for example, that he had both a will and a living will, though she knew nothing about the details of either document. Her smile was slightly venal as she realized that what she had to say would not please those who heard it. "Granted. He can't speak now. But do you really think he would have left something like this to chance?"

"No," said Lindsey, eyes dark and haunted. "He wouldn't."

"So," said Debbie uncertainly, "do we have any idea who he might have . . . ."

At that moment, with perfect timing that no one would bother to notice, the elevator doors opened with a ding, and three people exited into the hallway, walking rapidly toward the nurse's station, as Lindsey, Michael, and Debbie spoke in perfect unison.

"Well, it sure as fuck isn't her."

"Why?" asked Ben. "Who is that?"

It was Lindsey who answered, sounding unutterably weary. "His mother, his sister, and - unless I'm mistaken - the fucking priest."

"The . . . fucking priest?" Ben echoed.
"Literally," said Melanie, good humor somewhat restored.

Ben tried to think of something appropriate to say, but quickly recognized the futility of the effort. How in the world could one respond to that?

It was amazing, he thought, that a person could actually be bored cruising at 30,000 feet and sitting in the lap of luxury. First class seating - plush and contoured and reclinable though it was - was still no more than a cushioned cocoon inside a metal framework, and all the in-flight movies, video games, trays of canapés, delectably prepared entrees, and a constant flow of pricey wines and spirits couldn't compensate for the fact that one was locked up inside a steel cylinder, hurtling along at supersonic speeds and defying the laws of gravity.

He nestled into the plush blanket the attendant had provided for him and watched the television screen in front of him as Heath Ledger and Jake Gyllenhaal, in cowboy persona, tried to devour each other in the reunion scene of Brokeback Mountain. This was the second time he'd watched it during the flight, and he was now lamenting the fact that he'd never taken the time to see it when it was still in theaters.

Who would have believed, he wondered, that a film about Wyoming cowboys could have provided a relevant and beautiful look at homosexuality in its purest form? He was pretty sure that even Brian would have liked it.

And where the fuck did that thought come from anyway, and why did it matter?

When the scene ended, he closed his eyes for a while, and felt the full weight of the day settle upon him. His body was already feeling the effects of extreme jet lag, the kind that resulted from following the sun across the surface of the globe, and he kept glancing out the window, expecting to find the leading edge of twilight, only to discover the perpetual presence of relentless extended afternoon. He was beginning to yearn for the soothing fall of evening, which did not bode well for the hours ahead, as the sun would continue to keep pace with them for a time while his body would insist that it was he who was out of sync with reality.

It would be early morning when they arrived in Wellington, and he would somehow have lost an entire day, which he would recover, of course, on the return journey, although his internal clock would contend that the day should be edging toward late afternoon. He knew the geography and the physics of it perfectly well, but intellectual certainty was ineffectual in adapting one's senses to the vagaries of time. He was more tired than he'd expected, perhaps because of the emotional roller coaster lingering from the previous night, but he was afraid that if he allowed himself to doze now he would find it impossible to sleep when the time was right.

Steven, of course, had no such dilemma. He was busily conducting business as usual via computer, monitoring a corporate merger between three pharmaceutical companies with a combined annual income of five billion dollars and participating in a conference call with associates from Barnes, Fletcher, and Corrigan. All in a day's work for Steven, of course, who was completely submerged in corporate consciousness when he was in his professional zone, shutting out everything else. It was a world of which Justin knew nothing, and he occasionally wondered why he wasn't jealous of his boyfriend's fascination with it. But then he remembered how he had always been aroused by Brian's compulsion to be the best advertising exec in the business, and thought he might be beginning to understand his own motives. He had a thing for power - not for the phenomenon itself but for the men who wielded it. He knew, of course, that he could intrude if he really wanted to, and distract his companion with a seductive offer of a bit of slap-and-tickle in the lavatory, but he found that he really wasn't all that interested. He had joined the ranks of the mile-high club long ago, courtesy of one Brian Kinney on a flight to San Antonio for a white party in 2004, but he'd never been tempted to duplicate the performance with somebody else. Probably because he knew that any such attempt would only serve to call up old memories.

Always old memories, as it was becoming more obvious with each passing day that there would be no more new ones.

He knew the time was fast approaching when he would have to open his fingers and let those memories slip through, like grains of sand, and turn away to build new memories, new castles in new sands.

But not quite yet.

He picked up the phone, provided for all first class travelers courtesy of Qantas, and dialed his mother's cell phone, suddenly anxious to share a family moment and hear a familiar voice, but the call went straight to voice mail. Next, he went down the line, attempting to reach various friends and acquaintances, starting with Daphne and ending with Lindsey, but without success.

What the fuck? Was everybody in Pittsburgh too busy to answer the phone?

The last number he dialed was the most familiar of all, the one that was still first in his contact list, but the only response was the same terse three words that he'd heard every time he'd dialed it of late.

"Leave a message."

He was struck with the realization that these might be the last words he ever heard spoken by that voice - remote, detached, distant - and he was astonished by the depth of the pain generated by that thought.

Abruptly, he signaled to the flight attendant to bring him another drink - a double - which he tossed back in one big gulp. Then he started dialing again. On his second attempt, he got lucky.

"Daphne?" he said sharply. "Where the fuck are you?"

"Justin?" Her response was broken and garbled. "Is that you?"

"Who else?" he laughed. "Where've you been? I've been calling you guys all day?"

There was a noticeable pause, and the line was filled with sporadic static. "Daphne?"

". . . breaking up . . . been a long day . . ."

"But where are you?" Justin repeated.

Another pause, and he had the strangest sensation that it had nothing to do with the quality of the connection.

"Picking . . . dinner," she said finally.

"Oh, yeah? Where? If you're going to the Stage Deli, be sure to try the Derek Jeter with a cappuccino shake. It's my favorite."

Again the pause.

"Sounds great. I'll make sure to . . . rybody. How's . . . trip going?"
"Oh, fine," he answered, "Still flying. I was wondering . . . has anybody talked . . . to Brian? Did he go to . . ."

". . . breaking up, Justin. Why don't you ca . . . later?"

"No, wait," he said sharply. "Is Michael there, or Lindsey or . . ."

"Gotta go." That part was clear at least. "Hope you have . . . ulous time. Bye now."

"Daphne . . ."

But the line went dead, with another burst of static. For a moment, he held on to the handset, debating whether he should try someone else in the group. But finally, reluctantly, he placed it back in its cradle, before reaching out to pull the shade down over the window and arranging his pillow to cushion his head.

It had been a silly question to ask anyway. Of course, Brian had gone to London. Why wouldn't he? Which meant that for every mile the Qantas jet traveled, the 767 that was carrying Brian toward Europe was covering the same distance, in the opposite direction. They were soon going to be as far away from each other as it was possible to be on planet Earth.

He closed his eyes, and tried to ignore the voice screaming in his mind - the one that kept insisting that he . . . that they were both making the biggest mistake of their lives. Only . . . he knew that there was nothing he could do to make it right, to turn it around, to turn them around. Brian had taken that option away from him.

Fuck this! Fuck the endless afternoon, jet lag, the international dateline. Fuck it all. And, finally, fuck Brian, who had not asked, had not bothered to talk to Justin to find out what he really wanted, who had, as always, taken it upon himself to decide what was best!

Fuck it all! He burrowed into his pillow and decided that he didn't really give a shit what the clock said or whether or not he would be able to sleep on schedule when they reached their destination. It was time for a nap.

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

"Congratulations, Boss," said Liz Ethridge, Steven Fletcher's executive secretary. "Your father is going to be over the moon when he hears this."

Steven paused to check on his companion and was glad to see that Justin had nodded off. The young artist had been testy and moody all day, and obviously needed to get some rest. "Thank you, Girl Friday," he said finally, softly. "Although if you think he doesn't already know about it, you're delusional. He probably knew before I did."

Liz smiled, and he was struck, for probably the millionth time, by how much she resembled the ideal image of a society grandmother, with her elaborately coifed silver hair, her pale skin, and perfectly manicured nails; it was even more remarkable because she was actually a childless Lesbian who had no maternal instincts and no interest in developing any. Except, of course, for her feelings for Steven. She had been his assistant since the day he'd emerged triumphant and summa cum laude from his degree program at Harvard and made his debut in his father's company, and her loyalty was complete and without boundaries. She took care of Steven, no matter what.

"Can you speak freely?" she asked softly, as the last of her fellow conference participants made their exit from the dark-paneled boardroom.
Steven glanced once more toward Justin, confirming that he was sleeping soundly. "Within reason," he answered quietly, as he adjusted his headphones to make sure that anything she might say would remain private between the two of them.

She frowned and pulled a notepad out from beneath the stack of documents in front of her. "You had a call earlier," she said. "I would have told you about it sooner but I was pretty sure you wouldn't want it to become public knowledge."

"What's wrong, Liz?" he said quickly, sensing that this was something extraordinary enough to cause her some concern.

"It was Justin's agent. Olivia Ruiz."

"Calling me?" He couldn't quite conceal his surprise. "Why on earth would she call . . ."

"Because," she answered with a sigh, "she was apparently instructed not to call Justin."

"Instructed by whom?" He was growing impatient with her vagueness.

"By the Pittsburgh police department," she replied. "There's been . . . an incident."

"What kind of incident?"

She took a deep breath. "I assume you know who Brian Kinney is?"

Steven closed his eyes, suddenly certain that he was not going to like what he was about to hear. "What about him?"

She proceeded to answer his question, to provide the stark, unembellished details, concluding the account with two bald statements. No one was sure whether or not Kinney would live, and everybody was sure that it was incredibly important that Justin stay away, until the culprits could be caught and put away. His safety depended upon it.

When she fell silent, Steven said nothing for a while, reflecting only that he'd been right on target. He didn't like it at all. And he liked his choices even less.

"So I'm supposed to . . . what? Pretend I don't know?"

Her eyes were soft with sympathy. "You're the one who knows him best, Dear. If you tell him, what will he do?"

He huffed a bitter chuckle. "Probably try to hi-jack the plane. Or go looking for a parachute. Anything he has to . . . to get there. To be with . . ."

She nodded. "And put himself in terrible danger in the process. So I guess you have to ask yourself how much you love him. Tell him the truth, and be prepared to see him at risk. Or keep quiet, and risk losing him when he finds out. I'm sorry, Honey. I know it's a question of damned if you do, and damned if you don't."

He nodded and rubbed his eyes with his fingers. "I can't take a chance on anything happening to him," he said softly.

Her smile was gentle. "Well, if it's any consolation, apparently you're not the only one who feels that way. It seems that Kinney managed to hold on just long enough to pass along the warning. Looks like this is one special young man to inspire that kind of devotion."
"Yes," he replied. "Very special."

"Is there anything I can do?" she asked, determined to appear unruffled and unaffected, and never mind the big lump in her throat.

He took a moment to consider, as he turned once more to gaze at Justin, to bask in his beauty and an indefinable quality of innocence that the young man always wore, no matter that he had not been truly innocent for many years. "Yes," he said finally. "You can call his mother, and tell her I'll do what I must to protect him. No matter what it might cost me later."

"Michael!" Debbie's voice was as sharp as a scalpel. "She's his mother. Don't you dare . . ."

"Stay out of this, Ma," said Michael, in a tone he had used only rarely in his life - hard and determined and unyielding.

"You can't interfere in this," she insisted.

"Oh, yeah? Watch me!"

Thus when Joan Kinney and her daughter arrived at the nurses' station, Michael was there to meet them, with Lindsey just a half-step behind him.

In truth, neither of Brian's old friends had any notion of how they might be able to run any kind of interference on Brian's behalf, but both were determined to try. Michael understood why his mother felt the way she did; Debbie had always believed that a mother knew best for her child. She had even believed that - for a while - about the skanky bitch who'd tried to take Hunter away from him and Ben, although she'd finally been forced to concede that she was wrong in that instance.

But Debbie didn't know the whole truth about Brian's relationship with Joan. Hell! For that matter neither did Michael or Lindsey. Because Brian had never been willing to tell them all the gory details. But they knew enough to be certain that his mother would be the very last person Brian would want at his bedside while he lay helpless and comatose, and they were determined to do anything they could to assure that his wishes were carried out.

Joan regarded Michael and Lindsey coldly as she approached the desk, and Clair, Brian's sister, looked at them with obvious dislike. "Michael," said Joan with a barely-there nod. "Miss Peterson." Lindsey, who had been an acknowledged Lesbian while still a teen-ager, had always been Joan's least favorite of her son's questionable acquaintances. "I can't understand why you didn't call me. Why I had to learn that my son is at death's door on the noon news. As you can imagine, I've been frantic to see for myself."

Lindsey and Michael exchanged glances and silently agreed not to point out that it had been several hours since that report had aired, and that Joan, had she been truly frantic, would have arrived much earlier.

"He's not at death's door, Mrs. Kinney," said Lindsey. "The doctor assured us that . . ."

"If you don't mind," snapped Clair, "we'd rather hear it for ourselves. And we want to see him. Right now."

The nurse behind the desk was on the phone, speaking softly, when Joan leaned on the counter and cleared her throat. "My name is Joan Kinney, and I want to see my son, Brian, immediately."
Laura Van Deere had only been on duty for a couple of hours, but she already had a feeling that this was not going to be one of her better days. An excellent judge of character and skilled in evaluating people's body language and attitudes, she knew at once that there was a lot going on under the surface between these new arrivals and the individuals who had been here all day, waiting for news about their friend.

The priest, silent until this time, stepped closer and appeared to be trying to calm the two women, but neither seemed in the right frame of mind to listen.

"I'm sorry, Mrs. Kinney," said the nurse. "But only Dr. Keller can authorize anyone to see your son, and he . . ."

Joan Kinney's eyes were suddenly huge. "Keller? Did you say Keller? You don't mean . . . Matthew Keller, do you?"

The doors to the ICU sprang open suddenly, and it was no longer necessary for the nurse to provide an answer, for the doctor was suddenly there, in the flesh, and regarding Brian's mother and sister with a smile that spoke volumes - none of it repeatable.

"I'm so touched that you remember me, dear St. Joan."

Brian's mother drew herself up and put on her best disdainful sneer. "You are not going to oversee my son's care, I can promise you that," she snapped. "I want to see the medical director. I want to see . . ."

Matthew Keller held up one hand. He was still smiling. "And I don't give a fuck what you want. Brian is under my care, as authorized by the individual he entrusted with his power of attorney, and - surprise, surprise - that person is not you." He glanced over at Clair, and the smile got uglier. "Now, take your troll offspring out of here, and don't bother coming back. You won't be allowed to see him, unless and until he invites you himself."

"You have no right," insisted Joan, "to come between a mother and her son. No right."

"I have every right," he retorted. Then he looked over and saw Debbie watching him with wide, unbelieving eyes. "It's just too bad that nobody ever stepped up to do it when it might have done some good. When they might have saved him . . . from you."

"Doctor . . . Keller, is it?" That was the priest, obviously hoping to play peacemaker. "Don't you think you're being a bit harsh? She just wants . . ."

The physician was quick to interrupt. "Forgive me, Father . . ." His smile became sardonie, "but I know exactly what she wants. And luckily, so did Brian - well enough, at least, to make sure that she never gets a shot at getting it."

"Nevertheless," said Tom Butterfield, "she is his next of kin, and she's got a right to know . . ."

"A right?" Matt laughed. "You think she's got a right to know anything about Brian?"

He reached out and touched the cross the priest was wearing, and a strange, manic light flared in his eyes. "Tell you what, Rev. Why don't you get St. Joan here into the confessional, and ask her a few pointed questions - ask her about how she learned not to see what her son endured at her husband's hands. Ask her about how she expected him to stand up and step in, when his old man was looking for someone to take his drunken rages out on. Ask her how she saved her cunty daughter and herself, by providing an alternative target for the old bastard."
"Matt," said Lindsey uneasily, "I'm not sure . . ."

The doctor offered her a gentle smile, in deliberate contrast to the sneer he'd directed at the Kinney women. "Well, I am sure, Sweetheart. I promised you I'd save Brian, and I will. And that includes making sure he's safe from the people who should have protected him when he was too young to do it himself."

Joan and Clair looked at each other, and realized that they had no choice but to accept the inevitable. They would seek alternatives; possibly even legal redress. There were always ways, if people were determined. And they were both determined and motivated, just in case. After all, if Brian did not survive this trauma - this punishment for his evil lifestyle - there was plenty of incentive to try to step in and be in the right place at the right time. He was a huge success - financially - and they were, after all, his only living relatives. So . . .

But today, they would not win this little battle, and Joan was a bit concerned at a shadow she spotted in the eyes of the young priest who had been her solace for so long. She was furious at Matthew Keller for daring to speak of private family matters that did not concern him, but she was even more furious at her son, for revealing things best kept concealed, things that he had seen from his own distorted perspective and interpreted in his typical, selfish manner. He knew that she had had no choice but to allow things to happen as they had, because Brian had been strong enough to take what his father dished out, while she and Clair would have been destroyed by it. There had been no other way, and Brian had known it.

Then he had grown up and betrayed her, turning his back on her needs and his sister's vulnerability, like the selfish traitor he was.

But there was no point in going into those things here. Brian had obviously poisoned the minds of these people, these low-life sinners and fornicators who were staring at her as if they had a right to judge her. So she and her daughter would withdraw, conceding the battle, but biding their time before attempting to win the war.

Michael and Lindsey stood with Matt Keller and watched as the group walked away. None of them drew an easy breath until the two women and the priest stepped into the elevator.

At that point, Michael turned to look up at the doctor and offered a tiny, tentative smile. "Remind me," he said quietly, "never to piss you off."

Matt Keller laughed. "If you ask anybody around here, they'll be glad to tell you that I'm a self-absorbed, cock-sucking bastard who doesn't give much of a shit about anybody. And mostly, they'd be right. But I do have one saving grace." He paused, and something dark and heavy moved in his eyes. "I take care of my friends. Always."

Then he turned and walked away, and Lindsey took Michael's arm in a proprietary gesture, before leaning in to whisper in his ear. "I think that Brian is going to prove - once more - that he's the luckiest fag in the world. That self-absorbed, cock-sucking bastard is going to turn out to be the Kinney guardian angel, and he's not going to let his patient get away with defying him. So Brian will have no choice but to get well."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

tbc
"Dear God!" Debbie's voice was little more than a whisper, for possibly the first time in recorded history. "Do you think he's right? That she really . . ."

They all stared for a moment at the double doors through which Dr. Keller had disappeared after delivering his ultimatum.

"I think he's exactly right," said Lindsey finally, her eyes huge and filled with shadow.

"Then why didn't he ever tell us? Why would he keep quiet? To protect her?"

Michael turned to stare at his mother, startled by the note of resentment in her tone. "Why does that surprise you? That's what she expected him to do, trained him to do, wasn't it? Are you really all that shocked? How could you forget . . ." His voice broke, and he buried his face in his hands, suddenly swept into lurid memory.

"Michael?" Ben was there - of course - to take his hand and offer comfort. Only there was no real comfort to be had.

"I remember all of it," said Michael, barely audible. "Sometimes I wish I didn't remember so well. I can't even begin to count how many times he showed up at our house. Sometimes in the middle of the night. Bleeding and bruised and battered. With cracked ribs and black eyes and busted lips and God knows what else. Jesus, you'd think I'd have gotten used to it after a while, but I never did. But . . . he never would explain what happened. Other than to say that Jack was in one of his moods. Which meant that the old bastard had been drinking again. That was all he'd ever say, but I knew what it meant. There never was a meaner drunk than Jack Kinney."

Ben felt a heaviness settle into his chest, and wondered if these people, this group that depended for its very existence on the young man lying comatose now in an ICU bed, had any idea how lucky they were that Brian had not grown up to use his natural charm and beauty and cunning to seek revenge on a callous, uncaring world. "Didn't anyone ever try to stop it?" he asked finally, deliberately not looking toward his lover's mother.

Michael sighed. "Uncle Vic did - once. Tried to convince Brian to go to the cops. Even offered to go with him. But Brian . . . he refused. He wouldn't say why, but I always figured it was because he knew it wouldn't do any good. Hell, half the guys on his dad's bowling team were cops. I think he'd already figured out that they wouldn't make much of an effort to protect him. Because his old man was one of the 'good old boys'. And because he already knew that he was different, even way back then."

His smile was wistful - almost painful. "Brian . . . blossomed early."

Debbie settled into the chair beside him and clasped her hands in her lap. "You have to realize," she said slowly, to no one in particular. "It was a different world back then. You just didn't go around interfering in family matters."

"Jesus!" said Ben softly, shaking his head in disbelief. "And it surprises you that he has problems with trusting people? It's a fucking miracle he's not a raging psychopath."

Lindsey stepped close and favored Michael with a gentle smile. "I don't think it was his mother, that he was protecting."

And it was suddenly just too much for Michael to bear - the uncertainty that surrounded him, the fear that filled him, the loneliness that no one could assuage... the beautiful, beloved face that might never again be as he remembered it, as he loved it, so he jumped up and tore off down the corridor, not knowing where he was going or why, only knowing that he could no longer stand to be there, in that place, in that moment.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

There was always an aura of solemnity in the ICU; it seemed somehow more silent, more separated from reality and cushioned against the intrusion of ordinary sounds than other areas of the hospital, even though the constant hum of the medical machinery and the beeps and blips of vital signs monitors made true silence impossible. Still, the large chamber felt different from its counterparts, more filled with solitude and an awareness of the frailty of life, which, was, of course, blatantly ridiculous since it was exactly the same as every other unit in the hospital, except that it was more controlled and more carefully monitored.

There were sixteen cubicles in all, arranged in a broken oval around a central command post - the bailiwick of the specialized nurses and nurse practitioners who ruled the roost from their seat of power and watched lesser beings tiptoe through their domain. Monty Peabody had never been particularly fond of RNs in general, and these arrogant, overbearing, ICU-trained RNs in particular, believing that they gave themselves airs they had not earned. The lab tech had long ago come to the conclusion that only the doctors - the demigods of surgical suites and trauma centers - were fully deserving of the homage of the masses, and even then, only some of them.

Present company definitely excluded, he thought to himself, as he went about his business of drawing blood from the port embedded in the patient's left shoulder, while Matthew Keller sat on an exam stool, studying the displays on various computer screens and jotting entries into a bulging medical chart.

Since the physician appeared to be paying no attention to anything but the data he was perusing, Monty took advantage of the opportunity to study Kinney's injuries, although there wasn't much that he could actually see. Bandages covered face, throat, and chest, arms and both hands, leaving only the left shoulder bare and mostly intact, except for a line of stitching across the bicep. Dark hair, freshly washed, spiked above snowy bandages on one side of the patient's head, but bare skin was visible on the other, just peeking out from beneath white gauze. Nothing at all could be seen of the face, and he could not tell anything about the lower body as it was covered with several layers of blankets, provided by caring nurses who knew full well that their patients were almost always hyper-sensitive to the chill of the unit. Of course, thought Monty, if the attending physician would simply finish up and take himself elsewhere, it might be possible to get a quick look - just to learn if any vital organs might have suffered some terrible retribution for the dissolute life Kinney had...

"Any reason you're loitering here?" said Matt Keller suddenly, rising and moving forward to stand beside the bed. "Unless you're planning to check his catheter - or administer a blow job to try to revive him - you should...

"That's ridiculous," Monty replied, stumbling over the syllables. "I was just..."

"Hoping to get a look at his cock?" Keller's gaze was hard as flint and flecked with ice. "Well, you certainly wouldn't be the first, would you?"

"Why should I care about his cock?" Monty drew himself to his full (such as it was) height and tried to stare the doctor down, but Keller remained unruffled, barely able to stifle a smile as he realized that the lab tech had almost choked rather than utter such a nasty profanity, but had realized that substituting an anatomical term would sound ridiculously prissy.

"You're queer, aren't you?" asked the doctor dismissively, as if that explained everything.

"So what?" the lab tech snapped.

Keller offered a little eye-roll. "So is there a fag in Pittsburgh that wouldn't sell his left nut for a chance to check out the legendary Kinney package?"

Monty sniffed. "There certainly is."

The doctor actually grinned. "Well, that's good then, because you'd be wasting your time standing around here, waiting for an opportunity that's never going to come. However, just for the sake of preventing mass panic, you and all of gay PA will be relieved to know that the Stud of Liberty Avenue remains as studly as ever."

Matt Keller was glad that he was staring straight at the snoopy lab tech at that moment. Otherwise he might have missed the fleeting glimmer of disappointment that flared in the man's eyes as he considered his response. "Well, I'm sure all the thousands of tricks he's slept with will be delighted."

Keller nodded. "And all the ones who haven't had the privilege will go on wondering what they've missed."

The doctor smiled then, gratified to note a quickly-suppressed glint of resentment in the lab tech's eyes.

For his part, Monty gathered his supplies and headed for the door, fuming but knowing that it would not be wise to say what he was thinking. Best to just make his escape while he could, allowing the doctor to concentrate once more on his notations in the medical chart.

But it was immediately obvious that Keller was not quite done with the subject. "By the way," he called, not bothering to look up, "when I said that gay PA would be relieved to hear the news, that did not constitute permission for you to spread it."

Monty tried to look offended, but failed miserably, realizing that the doctor had sensed his intentions with alarming accuracy.

"Of course not. I would never . . ."

"Oh, I know you wouldn't." The interruption was immediate, and very cold. "Not if you value your job."

When the lab tech made his exit, moving, Keller noted with some satisfaction, with all the grace of a scalded cat, the doctor put aside the medical chart and hoisted himself to sit on the side of the bed in a spot where he could look down into his patient's face. Though he could not see any more than the cunty lab tech had seen, memory kicked in and supplied what was missing. The physician in him saw the wounds, but the man in him saw only the beauty.

When he spoke, his voice was very soft and achingly tender. "Flat on your back and out like a light, and you're still stirring the shit, Sonny Boy. Must be why I always loved you so much.

"You know, I have no idea if you can hear me or not. Even though I'm the great, incredibly gifted, all-knowing Dr. Keller, I don't know that - and neither does anybody else. So maybe I'm just sitting here talking to myself. But, just in case I'm not, I want you to listen to me. Are you listening?
Actually, it's kind of nice to be able to say whatever I want without having to put up with your mouthing off and arguing with me. But there's no arguing with this. You just have to shut up and understand me. I will make you well again. And not only that.

He leaned forward then and touched his lips to the tiny little spot of bare skin just above Brian's left ear, just an inch below the site of the skull fracture which had almost proved fatal, while he reached up and stroked his fingers through a lock of dark hair. "I won't only make you well, Sonny Boy. I'll make you perfect again, one way or another. I promise you that. Those motherfuckers who did this to you are not going to win this war. You will be Brian Kinney again. I swear it."

He sat back then and spent a few seconds just listening to the rhythmic sound of his patient's breathing. Then he looked up, recalling, for just a moment, the catechism he had spent many years of his youth learning.

"And You," he said firmly, showing not the slightest nuance of reverence or humility, "better not make a liar out of me."

God, according to the stern old Daughter of St. Vincent de Paul who had presided over his schooling, always listened, even if the person doing the praying was an arrogant prick.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

"Son of a bitch!" Police Chief Phillip Mitchum had very little in common with his predecessor. He was not handsome, did not have a buff body, exhibited very little personal charm, and was intensely apolitical. He was, however, a very good cop - honest and dedicated and forthright, and not given to mincing words. "Do you have any idea how much I don't need this right now."

Carl Horvath took a deep breath, and offered up a little silent prayer before opening his mouth to respond. He was walking a very thin line here, and he knew it, but he also knew he had no other choice.

"Yes, Sir," he said slowly, "I think I do. But I also know that this is something you can't afford to ignore. Whether we like it or not, we're sitting on a powder keg here. And it's not going to just go away. It's been building up for a long time, and this thing with Kinney . . . well, it just might be the last straw."

Mitchum rubbed his hands through thinning, dirty blonde hair. "You know, none of this would have happened, if these people would just stop making such an issue of everything, and learn to keep their heads down."

"These . . . people?" Lance Mathis steepled his fingers in front of his face. "By that, I suppose you mean homosexuals. Gays and Lesbians and . . ."

"Well, of course that's what I mean," snapped the police chief. "Why can't they just . . ."

"Go away?" Horvath took a deep breath. "Sorry to tell you this, Chief, but I know from first hand experience; they're not going anywhere. And they're not going to back down." His tone was reasonable, even sympathetic, but very firm. "Those days - the days of 'don't ask, don't tell' - they're gone. It took decades for many of them to develop the courage to come out of the closet. And they're not going back in. Not for anybody."

Mitchum's eyes narrowed as he stared at the man who was on a short list to make chief detective in the homicide division. "You almost sound like you approve, Carl."
And there it was. The issue he'd spent the last couple of years avoiding - in public anyway - but there was no longer any way of evading the question; not if he wanted to be able to live with his conscience, not to mention the woman whose house he shared. "Actually, Chief, I do. It wasn't something that came easily to me. In fact, up until a few years ago, I was a lot like you, I suspect. I didn't hate homosexuals; I just didn't understand them. And in some ways, I still don't. But I've learned a lot recently, from the woman who is the most important person in my life. And from her son, who happens to be gay, and their friends. It's not necessary for me to understand why they are the way they are; it's only necessary for me to know that I don't have to right to judge them, or to deny them the same rights that the rest of us enjoy.

"You may not approve of Brian Kinney and his lifestyle. And you might wish that he'd just keep his face out of the papers and his name out of the news. But that's not going to happen. And your approval - or mine - isn't going to change the fact that his notoriety doesn't give anybody the right to do what they did to him. I know it might be hard for you to accept, but I can tell you, from firsthand experience, that it's true; he is, no doubt, what most heterosexual people would call a raging fag, but he's also as gutsy and honest as any man I've ever known. So maybe we all need to rethink how we define manhood.

"Ever since the whole ugly truth surfaced about your predecessor and Kinney's involvement in that, there's been trouble brewing. You've got extremists that are ready to start a war to try to enforce their version of 'What America Ought To Be', and you've got the minorities - of every persuasion - ready to stand up and fight to defend themselves. Plus, you have to remember that Kinney has a lot of friends - some of them very powerful - who don't seem to care one way or another where he sticks his dick. The bottom line here is, that if we don't do something PDQ, we could be looking at war in the streets."

Carl leaned forward, hands clasped tight in a desperate attempt to open his superior's eyes. "It's not the way it used to be, Chief. Things that you and I could never have imagined have opened doors that a lot of people would have preferred to leave closed. But there's no going back. People like Harvey Milk and Barbara Gittings, John Aravosis and Elaine Noble - they've changed the world. And people like Brian Kinney and his friends aren't going to just sit back and let the homophobes and bigots change it back. We have to deal with that."

Mitchum's eyes were cold, but, at least, thought Carl, he had listened. The detective found, to his annoyance, that he was barely breathing, waiting to learn what would come next, which would determine the direction they would all have to take for the future.

"So," said the chief slowly, reluctantly, "what do you propose?"

Carl barely managed not to sigh with relief. "We've been trying to sort this thing out since the bombing at Babylon. That's more than a year of busting our butts to follow up every clue, check out every lead. But we're still no closer to knowing who's responsible. We don't have the resources, the manpower, or the clout necessary to do a thorough investigation. And frankly, I think we have to consider that there are certain elements within the department who aren't exactly enthusiastic about seeing this thing solved. Seems like every step we take forward, something seems to . . . slip through the cracks and send us back to the starting line. So the logical thing to do is to get somebody who has the means to get the job done."

"Namely?"

Carl and Lance Mathis exchanged glances. "Chief Mitchum," said Mathis, "what happened at Babylon and what happened to Brian Kinney have one thing in common." He drew a deep breath. "They're both hate crimes."
Mitchum suddenly looked older than his 53 years. "That's what I thought you were going to say." He took a moment to light his pipe, blatantly ignoring the No Smoking sign on the wall just outside his glass door. Inhaling deeply and savoring the special blend of tobacco which was one of his very few personal perks, he stared at Mathis through a curtain of smoke. "I assume there's a specific reason for your presence here."

Mathis smiled. "I happen to be well acquainted with a member of an elite FBI team, someone who's very interested in the developments in this case. Her name is Alexandra Corey - Special Agent Alexandra Corey - and she can be here tomorrow."

Mitchum's eyebrows climbed toward his receding hairline. "You've already spoken to her?"

"I have," Mathis confirmed. "But only unofficially. Nothing happens until you give the word."

Horvath elected to remain silent, knowing that he had done all he could.

The police chief rose and went to stand at his window, staring down into the heart of the city that looked to him to preserve civility and administer justice.

"All right," he said abruptly.

"All right what?" Horvath did not dare assume.

"The word," he said with a sigh, "is given."

Lance Mathis closed his eyes, allowing himself a sigh of relief and acknowledging a reluctant but heartfelt surge of admiration for the police chief, recognizing the difficulty of a man caught between two cultures and struggling to do the right thing. It was, he thought, long past time to get the big boys - even if the big boy in this case happened to be a big girl - involved and put an end to the horror that hovered over this city.

Both Ben and Debbie were quick to leap to their feet to rush off in pursuit of Michael, but, as it happened, Lindsey was just a trifle faster as she stepped forward to intercept them both.

"Let me," she said firmly.

"Why you?" said mother and partner in unison, both slightly annoyed by her intervention.

"Because," she said firmly, "this isn't about you and Michael. This is about Brian and Michael, and neither one of you can really know what this is doing to him, much as you might want to."

"But you can," said Melanie, unable to control the strident note of bitter resentment in her voice.

"Yes," Lindsey replied, turning to regard her partner with steady eyes. "I can. I know that probably makes you angry; I guess I even understand why it would. But Michael and I have ties to Brian that we trace back to our childhood, ties that words can't begin to describe. And now is not the time to be playing petty little games of jealousy and one-upmanship. Now, I'm going to Michael, and I'd appreciate it if the rest of you would just . . . back off."

She turned then to walk away, but not before she caught a glimpse of the pleased smile on Emmett's "And just how do you think you'll find him?" Debbie yelled after her.

Lindsey smiled. "I don't have to find him," she called without bothering to turn around. "I know exactly where he is."

As she pushed through the door into the stairwell she sent up a tiny, silent prayer of thanks for Brian's habit of regaling her with his more outrageous stunts and urges, like the one that had struck him on the night of Gus' birth, a temporary temptation to defy gravity and leap from the roof of the hospital. Another possible means, of course, of going out in a blaze of glory.

She smiled gently, knowing that he wouldn't really have gone through with it. If Brian Kinney ever did decide to devise his own exit from existence, it would not be in a way that left him crushed and mangled and grotesque; it would be arranged, rather, so that he would remain as beautiful in death as he had been in life, forever to linger in the memories of his friends as "Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake".

But not today, she thought grimly. And not ever, if she had anything to say about it.

Of course, she wasn't really fooling herself. She knew full well that she had never had any real control over what Brian might choose to do, although she had, on occasion, applied the screws to try to force him to bend to her will. She sighed as she took her first steps up toward the roof, realizing that she was a little bit ashamed of herself for sometimes using the guilt card to keep him from doing things he might really have wanted to do.

Struck by a sudden thought, she paused in mid-step and felt her breath catch in her throat. Did Brian ever have dreams - things that he had wanted with his whole heart but never reached for, because he was restrained by ties to those around him? Had she and Michael and Debbie and . . .

She resumed her climb more slowly, with a dull ache in her heart, trying to convince herself that she was being silly - that Brian Kinney did not deal in fantasies or dreams, that he was all about reality and living in the moment. She was still trying as she approached the final landing that would lead her to the roof exit, and she took a deep breath, offering up a whispered promise, just in case. "No more, Love. Never again."

She pushed through the door and saw exactly what she'd expected to see and forced herself to proceed slowly, to refrain from giving voice to a flash of panic.

Michael was sitting on the ledge at the edge of the roof, his feet dangling in space as he shivered and stared down into the shadows below, hands tucked under his arms and his face awash with tears.

She spent a few seconds trying to find the right words, before realizing that there weren't any, and that she didn't need them anyway. Ultimately, she simply stepped up and sank down beside him, before wrapping her arms around him; then they cried together.

For a time neither of them spoke at all, but it was Michael who finally found himself unable to remain silent. "I can't lose him, Lindsey," he whispered. "I thought . . . after everything that went so wrong between us over the last couple of years, I thought I'd . . . outgrown him, you know? I thought I'd proved that I didn't need him any more. But . . . oh, God! . . . how could I have done the things I did, said the things I said to him? How could I have let myself forget what he meant to me, what he did for me? How could I? He was always there for me - always, and I just . . . I let myself get so caught up in all the bullshit." He drew a deep shaky breath. "He was right. I did betray him."
"No, you didn't," she soothed. "You got a little distracted, maybe." She paused then and drew back so she could look up into his eyes. "From time to time, I think we all did. I mean, think about it, Michael. During that whole stupidity over Jenny Rebecca's custody, we all went a little psycho, and I think Brian served as a distraction for us through it all. It was always easier to blame him and yell at him about every little thing than to figure out what was really going on, and I think that's been the story for a lot of our lives. Hell, I sometimes think he let us do it on purpose, because it was easier for us that way. But in the end, you found your way back to him."

"But why? Why did I let myself turn into this pretentious prick, so eager to impress people that I didn't really give a shit about, while I just . . . walked away from him, from everything that mattered to me? When all that crap was going on, I once told Ben that I didn't even know who Brian was any more. But the truth was that he was the same person he'd always been. It was me who'd changed, and all I wanted to do was strike out at him. Why did I have to hurt him like that?"

"You weren't trying to . . ."

But Michael was not going to allow himself to avoid speaking truths he knew he should have spoken long ago. "Yes," he said sternly. "I was. Do you know what I said to him? When he tried to apologize to me, I said that just because we'd been friends all our lives didn't mean that we had to stay friends. I wanted to hurt him. And I did. I saw it in his eyes, and . . . I was glad, Lindsey. I was glad that I could hurt him, because . . ."

"Because?"

He could not bring himself to meet her eyes. "Because he always knew the truth, even though he almost never said it. Just . . . once in a while, it would slip out, when he'd let his guard down a little bit, or when he was high - or drunk."

His smile was rueful. "He called it 'my secret identity'."

Then he did meet her gaze and knew that it wasn't necessary for him to say it; she obviously already knew. "I think you know," she said gently, "that he would have, if he could."

He nodded. "Yeah. I know you're right. And I guess that's why I . . . did what I did. I'd managed to convince myself that . . ."

"That it wasn't you," she finished for him. "You convinced yourself that he could never love anybody, until . . ."

"Justin," he breathed. "God! I didn't want it to be true. So what kind of friend does that make me, that I was so jealous that I'd rather he'd spent his whole life alone, fucking everything in sight but never loving anybody, than to have him find it with someone else?"

Her smile was gentle. "I'd say it makes you human, and . . ." She forced herself not to look away, "one of the crowd. You're not the only one, you know."

Michael pulled back quickly and stared at her in disbelief. "You?" he gasped. "But you're . . ."

She managed a tiny laugh. "Which just goes to prove that none of us is immune to the Kinney charm." Then she laughed again. "Except Melanie, of course."

He dredged up a smile. "Yeah. If she starts drooling over him, it's the Apocalypse, for sure."

"Now," she said gently, with an exaggerated shiver, "don't you think it's time we climb down from this glacier and go find ourselves a nice hot cup of coffee?"
He nodded, but still made no move to depart. "I don't know how to explain it to Ben," he murmured. "I mean, how can I expect him to accept..."

"Ben loves you, Michael," she interrupted, "and I think he might surprise you. You know, it's not exactly easy for people to understand the relationship between you and Brian. Neither one of you has ever been willing to explain it or to help people figure it out, and God knows it's not a typical friendship, by any means. Still, I'm pretty sure Ben understands it. He knows how much Brian means to you, so I don't think you need to worry." Her smile was suddenly a little brittle. "He's not Melanie, you know."

Michael suddenly leaned forward and touched his lips to her forehead. "I'm sorry," he whispered.

She didn't ask what he meant. She didn't need to.

But still he turned for a minute to look out across the city. "We came up here the night Gus was born," he said. "He wanted to fly. Like Superman." His voice broke a little before he continued. "I always wondered if..."

"If he meant it?" she asked.

He could only nod.

She tucked her hand through his arm and urged him up from the ledge, while considering her response. "In a way," she said finally, "I think he always means it."

They made their way then toward the stairwell, and Michael couldn't quite figure out why he found her words comforting. Then he stopped trying to understand it, and simply accepted the comfort for what it was - a gesture between friends.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

It was full dark by the time Lindsey and Michael made their way downstairs to navigate the labyrinthine corridors of the huge hospital in search of the public cafeteria. But the growing lateness of the hour seemed to have no effect on the number of individuals packed into waiting rooms or standing around in hallways or coming and going through the big front entrance.

A quick conversation with a med tech near the ER revealed that there'd been a major pile-up on the turnpike involving a school bus transporting a college basketball team and a group of supporters, and it didn't look there would be any respite from the pandemonium for quite a while.

Michael nervously glanced down one particular corridor, stark and cold and featureless, and was caught up once more in a rush of devastating memory: Brian's face, as white as porcelain and as rigid as granite, absolutely still and chiseled and awash with silent tears, his hands and clothing dark with bloodstains he couldn't bring himself to wash off. Michael couldn't be positive, of course, but he was pretty sure that nobody else had ever been allowed to see Brian Kinney in such a state. For three days, they had sat there together, while friends and acquaintances of Justin and his family had come and gone, moving around them as if they'd been rocks buried in a stream, and during that time, Brian had not spoken at all, except to answer direct questions from hospital staff members and police officers. He had not slept, had not eaten, had hardly moved from his place there against the wall, and had barely even spoken to Michael. And yet, even without words, Michael had known how important it was for him to be there, especially at those moments when Brian would look up to find Jennifer Taylor staring at him, obviously struggling to maintain her silence, biding her time until she felt freer to speak her mind.
Michael had never talked about it to anyone, but he knew nonetheless; he had saved Brian's life that night - had anchored him to the bedrock of reality and refused to let him slip away, consumed by guilt and remorse. Later, after his misadventure in Portland had ended and he’d come back to Pittsburgh, he’d heard the scoffers saying that Brian had simply walked away from the trauma of that night, uncaring, and hurried to replace his broken boytoy with a newer, shinier model, but Michael knew better - knew that that event had cost his best friend. He had tried, once or twice, to make people understand the horror of what Brian had endured then, but he knew that his efforts had been futile. People generally saw only what they wanted to see, he knew, and most of the people who lived in the periphery of Brian's life did not want to acknowledge that someone like him was not quite as invincible as he seemed. It was simply easier to classify him as a heartless shit.

Sometimes, Michael was amazed at how little people actually knew about the phenomenon who was Brian Kinney.

A few months later, it had been Brian's turn to step up and repay Michael's kindness. New memories swept in to dislodge the old, and now he dwelt on the dark days when it was he who had been lost in fear and despair, frightened of being alone, terrified of losing Ben, and it had been Brian who had been there for him, offering reassurance and strength and comfort, and asking nothing in return. All the more reason, he thought, why he should be ashamed of what came later.

"Hush now," said Lindsey with a sad little smile, the softness in her eyes saying that she'd watched the play of emotions on his face and knew where his thoughts had led him. "There've been good times here too. This is where Gus and J.R. came into our lives. And where Ted and Justin and Ben - and you . . . recovered and came back to us. And it's where Brian will come back to us too. Just you wait and see."

The cafeteria was crowded at this hour, mostly with evening shift members or day staffers just ending their rotation.

"You hungry?" asked Michael, looking askance toward a crowded buffet table, adjacent to a salad bar offering slightly wilted produce.

She shook her head. "There are only a few universal truths, Michael," she said with a lopsided smile, "but the fact that hospital food sucks - and not in a positive, life-affirming way - is one of them."

"Still at the head of the class, I see." Matt Keller appeared at her side and wrapped an arm around her shoulder, greeting her with a brilliant smile.

She laughed softly. "After you," she replied. "And Brian, of course."

"Of course," he agreed. "If you want my advice, stick to the coffee. And the cinnamon rolls won't kill you. They bring them in from a local bakery, so they're actually edible."

Lindsey looked up then and spotted a strange look on the physician's face as he stole surreptitious glances toward Michael while they placed their orders at the coffee bar. Her breath caught in her throat then, as she realized why.

"Oh, God!" she said suddenly. "What was I thinking? You two have never actually met, have you? Matt, this is . . ."

"It's okay, Linz," said Keller. "I know who he is"

Michael frowned. "How? How do you know me?"
The physician's voice was suddenly very soft. "The famous Michael Novotny? Even if I'd never seen a photo of you - which I have, ad nauseum - I'd have known you anywhere."

He then turned and led the way to a table by a narrow corner window and sank into a chair, every line of his body announcing a bone-deep weariness.

Michael followed more slowly, wondering if he was imagining the tiny note of resentment he'd heard in Keller's voice.

"Long day?" asked Lindsey as she studied the physician's face.

He dredged up a smile - barely. "You have no idea."

Michael took a sip of coffee, still lost in thought, while Lindsey considered how best to approach her old college acquaintance, to convince him to answer questions she had not dared pose when they'd spoken before.

"Matt, I . . ."

"He's going to be all right, Linz," he interrupted, staring down into his own cup. "You can stop . . . obsessing."

"I do not obsess," she said, with just a nuance of irritation.

"Of course, you don't." He didn't bother to try to hide his indulgent smile.

"What did you mean?" said Michael suddenly, having decided that the best approach, as usual, was to simply spit out the question without preamble.

"About?" Keller propped his elbows on the table and braced his chin against clasped fingers.

"The 'famous Michael Novotny'?" Michael raised his hands to make quotation marks with his fingers.

Keller's smile was a barely-there effort. "Brian used to talk about you all the time."

"He did?" Michael sounded as if he thought he might be the butt of some kind of joke.

"He did."

When Michael glanced at Lindsey, he was somewhat surprised to see her nodding her agreement.

The three fell silent for a time, content to sit and drink their coffee, which was surprisingly tasty and satisfying.

But Michael, as all his friends knew, was not one to leave well enough alone while questions went unanswered. His voice was very soft and his eyes somewhat unfocused when he spoke again. "All that stuff you said earlier . . . to his mother . . . how did you know all that?"

Keller did not look up. "How do you think? From Brian, of course. How else would I know it?"

"He told you." Michael tried not to sound as if he did not believe the physician, but he wasn't particularly successful in the attempt. "Why would he . . ."

The doctor's gaze softened as he lifted his eyes to study Michael's face. "Why would he tell me when he didn't tell you? Is that what you're wondering?"
Michael nodded. "I always thought he told me everything."

Keller took a moment to consider his choice of words before offering an answer. "Michael, you were - probably still are - the kid brother he never had."

"Only one thing wrong with that picture," replied Michael sharply. "I'm older than he is."

"In some ways, maybe," answered Keller softly. "But that doesn't mean he didn't want to protect you, when he could."

Michael was suddenly intent on gazing into his coffee cup. "So you were at Penn together," he said softly. "Roommates?"

"Christ, no!" laughed Keller. "We'd have probably beat each other to a bloody pulp if we'd tried to live together. In fact, that's how we met."

"What?"

"I made a pass at him, and he decked me."

Michael and Lindsey exchanged grins. "Brian?" Michael tried to picture it - and couldn't. Keller, after all, was the kind of guy that the gang had always classified as 'hot', so why would . . .

"His mother had just dropped him off after a week-end at home," Keller explained, "and he wasn't in the mood."

"Brian is always in the mood," Michael laughed.

But the laughter was forgotten when Keller regarded him with somber eyes and said, "Is he now?"

And Michael remembered then how his best friend always behaved after spending any length of time with either of his parents. "No," he admitted. "I guess he's not. But I still don't understand why he would tell you things that he never talked about - to us."

Keller did not answer immediately, turning instead to gaze out into the darkness beyond the window, while Michael and Lindsey looked at each other and wondered if he would answer at all.

"Probably," he said finally, "because he knew that there was nothing he could tell me that I wouldn't understand."

He paused then, obviously debating whether or not to continue, and when he did, there was a cold detachment in his tone that was chilling to his listeners. "When I was eleven years old, my father almost killed me because I stepped in to try to keep him from beating my mother. The only reason he didn't succeed was that I grabbed a steak knife off the table and stabbed the fucker in the gut."

The silence around the table was thick with horror as Michael and Lindsey stared at him, having no idea how to respond to such a confession.

Keller continued, his voice completely emotionless. "One of the neighbors called the cops, and when they came . . ." He paused to take a deep breath and, perhaps, to compose himself before going on, "my father told them that I'd attacked him, and that he'd only hit me to defend himself. They didn't believe him . . . at first."

Another pause, and a deeper sigh.

"Until my mother backed him up."
Michael's eyes were huge as he contemplated how it must feel to be betrayed by both parents. "What happened?" he asked, unwilling to hear it but unable to resist asking.

"I wound up in juvy hall, until they sorted it out. Then they shuffled me into foster care. I won't bore you with the details."

"Jesus!" breathed Lindsey. Then she looked at him with wounded eyes. "I never knew any of that. Why didn't you . . ."

"I never told anybody," he answered, "except . . ."

"Brian." It was not a question.

He nodded and paused for a moment to take a sip of his rapidly cooling coffee. "But that should explain why he felt he could tell me things that he couldn't say to you."

Michael frowned. "But he's my best friend. I still don't understand why . . ."

"Michael," said the doctor sternly, "he didn't want you to have to know what he endured."

Michael turned to study Lindsey's face. "That's what you meant, isn't it? When you said it wasn't his mother that he was protecting."

She nodded. "He always protected us, Michael. Even when we didn't realize that we needed protecting."

Keller's smile was gentle. "And, as far as I know, he still does."

Lindsey turned then to peer into his eyes, hearing something in the tone of his voice that said there was still more that they didn't know, and she hesitated for a moment, not sure that she wanted to hear whatever else there might be.

"You haven't seen him in a long time," she mused.

"No," he agreed. Then he smiled, but the weariness was still heavy upon him. "Not in several years."

"Why is that?" asked Michael. "If you care about him like you said, why would you stay away?"

Keller sighed. "Because we're too much alike. We always wind up hurting each other. Fighting like pit bulls. With words - or worse. But we do keep in touch, when we need to." He paused for a while, once more lost in thought. "I don't think you ever met Daniel, Lindsey. You and Brian had already graduated when he and I met."

She shook her head, and flashed him a gentle smile. "No. I never did, but Brian told me about him. He said - let me see if I can remember his exact words - that Daniel was 'the pretty boy you settled for when you couldn't have him'. Does that sound about right?"

The doctor's smirk was indulgent. "Yeah, that sounds like Brian." He sighed then, and crossed his arms on the table, bracing his chin against his forearms. "And maybe he was even right, to some degree. In the beginning any way. Daniel was a geneticist, researching birth defects when we met, doing important work. He was brilliant and beautiful - well, you get the idea. I can't even begin to tell you what he was to me. Let's just say I thought he was God's way of making up for the shit I went through as a kid. Anyway, we went through a shitload of trouble before we finally managed to make a life together, and I thought - we both thought - it would be forever."
"Daniel had a twin sister - the only other person in his life who was important to him, who loved him as much as I did. Anyway, we'd been together about a year when she came to us with an incredible idea - a gift she wanted to give us. She had decided that she wanted to become a nun, but, before she did, she wanted to offer herself as a surrogate for us. To carry my child - a baby for us to raise."

He closed his eyes. "It was just . . . perfect. Our child would carry genes from both of us, would be as much our biological child as possible, for two men. Even Brian was impressed. After he got through laughing his head off at the idea of me as a father, not to mention verbally exploring the idea of 'incest, once removed', as he called it. Anyway, about a year later, Matthew Daniel Griggs-Keller came into the world. We called him M.D. And when I held him in my arms the first time, I realized something. I realized that Brian was right, at least a little bit, in claiming that I loved Daniel because he reminded me of Brian. Because my son not only resembled Daniel; he looked a little like Brian too. God, he was beautiful."

"So where is he . . . now?" asked Lindsey, sure that she was not going to like his answer - and she was right.

Keller was slow to respond, apparently looking for an easy way to say it but realizing finally that there wasn't any. "He's dead. He was just two when he contracted meningitis. We caught it early, of course, and rushed him to the hospital, but he was allergic to the antibiotics, and . . . there was nothing we could do. We put him to bed that night, happy and healthy and perfect. And fourteen hours later, he was gone. If it hadn't been so tragic, it would have been ludicrous. With all our knowledge and medical skill combined, we couldn't even save our own son"

He paused then, obviously struggling for words to express the rest. "It felt as if the profession that I'd served for my whole life had betrayed me."

"Oh, God, Matt," whispered Lindsey, grasping his hand. "I'm so sorry. I can't even imagine what you must have suffered."

He didn't bother to look at her, still lost in dark memory. "I called Brian, and he came, just like I knew he would. He didn't say very much, because he knew what most people never figure out. That there's nothing that one can say that'll make a fucking bit of difference. But he came and he stood there with me and he cried with me, and that meant more to me than all the words and all the flowers and the speeches. Just because he was there, to hold my hand. Daniel and I, we couldn't . . . nothing was ever the same again, and he . . . he didn't have a Brian to save him. A month later, Daniel was gone. I don't know where he went, or where he is now. I only know that Brian saved me. Not because he knew how to make it better - nobody could have done that - but because he just refused to let me go. He held on and forced me to put one foot in front of the other, one step at a time. Even when all I wanted was to die too. He just kept holding on, refusing to listen when I yelled at him to fuck off."

He fell silent for a time, obviously still lost in thought. Then he smiled. "I'd have died then, if he hadn't forced me to keep going, and sometimes I hated him for it. Then, a couple of years later, it was my turn to force him to do the same, when he called me, after . . . after Justin got bashed. I was in the middle of my second residency then, at Johns Hopkins, on a neurosurgical rotation that was so Goddamned exhausting that I couldn't get away. But I called him every night, talked him through it, so he knew what to expect and how to cope. Did you know that he came here every night while Justin was here? Just to watch over him, to make sure he was safe."

Michael looked devastated. "No. I didn't know. Something else . . . he never told me."

Keller sighed, his exhaustion growing deeper with every breath. "Because he didn't want you to feel compelled to help him cope with his guilt. He didn't want to cope with it at all." He raised his eyes then, looking first at Michael and then at Lindsey. "He didn't want to survive it. It nearly killed him, because he believed that it should have been him, not Justin. He still does. I think that's one reason he was ready to . . ."

He paused in mid-sentence, and Lindsey and Michael looked at each other, both sensing that he had something else to say, something that was important, that they needed to know. But they also sensed that it was something that Keller was reluctant to reveal.

"What, Matt?" asked Lindsey gently. "He was ready to what?"

"I think," he replied slowly, "that I've said enough."

"No," said Michael, his voice steady, filled with certainty. "You haven't. He called you . . . when he found out he had cancer. Didn't he?"

Keller hesitated before nodding.

Michael closed his eyes and cast his thoughts back to a bitterly cold day, a dark day in his family history - the day they had buried his beloved Uncle Vic. He remembered the vivid scarlet of the roses against the mahogany gloss of the coffin and the numbness of his fingers as he'd shoved them into his pockets vainly seeking warmth, and the crunch of the frozen ground under their shoes as they'd walked away from the service.

And Brian's face. He'd never been quite sure just why it was the look on Brian's face that had lingered in his memory - the look on his face and the words he'd spoken as they'd all left the cemetery, even though what he'd said had gone almost unnoticed at the time, had been no more than barely audible words against background noise.

"He planned to just . . . die, didn't he?"

Lindsey gasped as she turned to peer into Michael's eyes, not wanting to believe that he could possibly be right.

But Keller, after a moment of hesitation, confirmed it. "Yes. He did. Initially, he planned to reject the treatment the doctors proposed. As he phrased it, he wanted to take a fast trip to Ibiza, party til he dropped, and then discreetly disappear. He claimed that it was the tasteful thing to do."

Michael nodded. "I remember when he talked about that. We all thought he was just being the Brian that we all know and . . ." He turned to study Keller's face. "You were the one who changed his mind."

Keller smiled. "Ordinarily, I'm glad to take the credit for miracle cures, but, in this case, all I did was yell at him to tell him that he was a stupid shit. I've never been entirely sure, but I think it was Gus that changed his mind." He then turned a speculative gaze toward Michael. "And maybe you, to some extent. At any rate, he experienced some kind of epiphany that made him decide to have the surgery. Until then, he'd pretty much decided that he was going to be the new James Dean - remaining forever young and beautiful."

He smiled again, and there was a glow of affection in his eyes. "I don't suppose it comes as a shock that he's obsessed with his own physical perfection."

It was Lindsey's turn to smile, but there was little joy in her expression. "Which brings us to a pertinent point," she said softly. "Namely, what happens now? Will he ever . . ."

Keller's eyes narrowed, and his face went rigid and harsh. "I've given my whole life to the practice of medicine," he said. "It's time now for it to give something back. I will not lose him." Then he remembered that these two people loved his old friend even more than he did. "And neither will you."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

The other side of the world. Literally the other side.

Justin sipped at his Cosmo and wandered out through the French doors, to lean against the balcony railing and gaze out across the breathtaking panorama of Oriental Bay. The water, beautifully pure and crystalline, was a natural version of an abstract painting, comprised of hundreds of variations of colors, like the facets of carefully cut emeralds and sapphires and aquamarines stroked and polished by fingers of sunlight, framed by the broken crescent of the beach road that seemed to contain the city of Wellington in its narrow band of stylish structures reaching for the sky, gleaming white and coral against the verdant green of the hillsides beyond. On the bay itself, various types of sea-going vessels rode the combined forces of time and tide, sails billowing in graceful arcs before the wind.

The quality of the light was incredible, as pure and unfiltered as any he’d ever seen, painting everything in strokes of exquisite liquid brilliance, and he felt an almost uncontrollable urge to grab a canvas and his brushes and capture it all.

It would be easy enough. His art supplies were carefully packed into a canvas carry-all, stowed in the closet of the luxury suite behind him.

He could already see it developing under his hands, growing and stretching across the canvas, transcending the physical dimensions of the scene, incorporating fragments of images that were rising in his mind. He closed his eyes and could still see it, but with enhancements uniquely his own. In actuality, the view was sharp and flawless, each element as crisp and perfect as the symmetry of a snowflake, but in his mind, he saw it filtered by a veil of rain, storm-washed and windblown and battened down. Surviving, with beauty intact, just waiting to reclaim its place in the sun.

His fingers twitched as he visualized the process of bringing his vision to life, building it layer upon layer, capturing the beauty, the infinity, the microcosmic clarity of the image, and wrapping it all around a distinctive silhouette.

But he just stood there, not acting on the impulse. His mind was engaged; even his fingers were eager to begin. But his heart wasn’t in it.

It was, quite literally, a different world, in more ways than one. He sighed. But it still incorporated the part of him that he could not quite manage to leave behind.

Would he forever see that one, unforgettable face every time he closed his eyes?

Steven had been wonderful all through the journey, had gone to extraordinary lengths to detach Justin from the melancholy that had gripped him since the night of his exhibition, which now seemed lost in some alternative timeline.

So . . . what the fuck was he thinking, to be here in this fantastic, incredibly beautiful place, preparing for the greatest adventure of his life, exploring a culture rich beyond his wildest imaginings in the company of a gorgeous, loving companion - and all he could think about was what was missing.

Well - almost all.

There was the guy standing on the adjacent balcony, smoking a Gauloise, wearing nothing but a towel that left little to the imagination. And Steven was meeting with an important client, a multi-billionaire who had risen to the peak of his profession at age 50, before retiring to his private paradise in the hills above the city, leaving his investments in the capable hands of Steven's father.

So he did have several hours to kill and . . .

The beautiful brunette with the awesome six-pack and the glorious tan and eyes of a surprisingly vivid green turned toward him with a smile that could only be described as come-hither (and no, he shouldn't stop to consider that such a descriptive term was much more Brian Kinney than J.T. standard) and waited for his response.

And he opened his mouth to offer it, but . . . He realized, not quite too late, that it would be in really questionable taste to spend his leisure hours fucking some gorgeous stranger while the man who was picking up the tab for this whole trip was - figuratively, at least - slaving away to pay for it. And the fact that the 'slaving' was probably occurring in a 5-star restaurant over a bottle of Veuve Clicquot and a Kobe steak didn't mitigate the facts.

With an apologetic smile, Justin retreated from the balcony and looked around for something to fill his time until Steven's return. He could, of course, set off to explore the city, but he was still a bit jet-lagged, and he knew that Steven would be disappointed if he chose to go off by himself, so he decided to hold off.

His laptop was lying on the inlaid surface of the Queen Anne desk that occupied its own little alcove in the sitting room of the suite, and it occurred to him that he'd had virtually no contact with the outside world since he'd boarded the plane in New York. Time, perhaps, to do some catching up.

It was no surprise when he booted up that a discreet chime announced that he had mail. Did anyone in the world who had an email account ever boot up without getting that message? It was one of the new constants of modern living.

But when he glanced at his Outlook Express screen, he was surprised to see that one of the 43 messages awaiting his attention was marked as "high priority" - an unusual enough circumstance to prompt him to click on the item without bothering to notice the identity of the sender.

There was a brief delay before the screen began to fill with a sharp, indelible image.

Justin stared for a moment, unwilling, unable to process what he was seeing. Then he went to his knees, suddenly unable to breathe, as his mind receded into blind panic.

There was no mistaking the subject of the photograph staring up at him, or the meaning of the six-word message scrawled in bright red all caps below it.

"Not so beautiful now, is he?"

Later, he would wonder how long he knelt there, staring at what he would have given his life to avoid seeing: Brian's face - there was no mistaking those features that he knew so intimately - but no longer Brian's face. Bloodied and torn, distorted and mangled. Mutilated.

After a long time - minutes, hours . . . months, how the fuck could he be sure . . . he blinked, and managed to search for the name of the sender.

Virtuoso-Uno.

Of course. Who else? He had heard from Ethan Gold a few times since their ill-fated affair had ended - a few long, rambling letters trying to justify the violinist's behavior or attempting to impress Justin with the degree of his professional success. Mostly, he'd deleted them without bothering to read the rambling exhibitions of massive ego.

He wished he'd noticed who'd sent this one, and deleted it unseen.

Only, if he had, he wouldn't know . . .

Fuck! He still didn't know. But he was about to find out.

He used the hotel phone to place his call, realizing that a signal from his cell would register his identity on the phone he was trying to contact. And he didn't want that, because he was pretty sure that the call would go unanswered if the recipient knew it was from him.

It took a while for him to get through as he imagined the signal bouncing from satellite to satellite to land lines to cell tower to . . . who knew what? He paced as he waited, barely able to contain an urge to scream. But finally, thankfully, the connection was made, and he heard what he'd hoped to hear.

"Hello."

Justin drew a deep breath, prepared to speak fast. "If you fucking hang up on me, Daphne, I'm never going to speak to you again. Now you tell me, is he all right, or . . ."

He heard her sigh, and even felt a twinge of pity, realizing that he was probably putting her in an awkward position. But that couldn't be helped. "Justin, I can't . . ."

"Don't you fucking tell me that," he yelled. "I know he's hurt. I have to know he's not . . ."

"No," she said quickly, recognizing the futility of trying to keep up the pretense. "He's not . . . dead. He's . . . they put him in an induced coma, to help him heal, but he's . . ."

"What? He's what?"

"Oh, God, Justin," she said, not quite able to swallow the sobs that were rising within her. "They almost killed him. How could anybody . . ."

He closed his eyes, wondering if he could endure the truths that she had to tell him, knowing that he had no choice. "Tell me he's going to be all right," he begged.

It took a moment for her to compose herself. "The doctor says . . . he'll live."

Justin took a deep breath, knowing that there was more - so much more - but nothing that couldn't wait until he could find it out for himself.

"Why didn't you tell me?"

Daphne tried not to flinch away from the fury she heard in his voice, realizing that she couldn't really blame him. If he had kept something this important from her, she wondered if she would ever have been able to forgive him.

"He didn't want you to know," she said finally, knowing it was not good enough, but not knowing what else she could say.

"Fuck!" She winced away from the volume of the expletive, and the degree of rage it contained. "What kind of fucking lame excuse is that?"

"Justin, I'm . . ."
"Don't say it," he snapped. "There's nothing you can say that will . . . Fuck! It doesn't matter. I'm on my way, and if he wakes up before I get there, you tell him he's a fucking son of a bitch for trying to . . ."

"Justin," she shouted, as the people around her turned toward her, their faces twisted with alarm as they realized what was going on, "he doesn't want you here. He . . ."

"I don't give a flying fuck," he said in a voice filled with deadly calm, "what he wants."

"Justin, no . . ." But she knew that her protest was futile. Justin was already gone.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~
tbc
Chapter 14

The concierge of the Copthorne Oriental Bay Hotel was normally a serene, virtually unflappable individual, polished and self-assured and confidant of his abilities to meet and exceed the expectations of the guests who called on him for extensive personal services - even when those guests turned out to be the most outrageous, demanding, unreasonable prima donnas imaginable. In almost twenty years of providing these services at the premium hotel, the Brisbane native had never once had cause to doubt his ability to function and fulfill his purpose with admirable aplomb. Until, that is, he was forced to go head-to-head with one fuming, nearly demented, barely-in-control Justin Taylor, who might look like a kid who belonged in a remake of The Brady Bunch, but behaved more like a Panzer-division storm trooper.

The blonde youth was standing in Adam Cargill's office, having rejected the offer of a seat with nothing more than a disdainful sneer; he was almost vibrating with impatience.

"Mr. Taylor, please," said the concierge, not - quite - wringing his hands. "If I could help you, I would, but I . . ."

"Fine," snapped Justin, bending over to pick up a nondescript duffle bag and a canvas carry-all. "You can deal with explaining to Mr. Fletcher why I'm not here, when he returns to the land of the living." He paused long enough to flash the older man a snide smile. "And you should assume that he's not going to be pleased."

"But . . ."

"Don't bother! I have no time to discuss . . ."

"But Mr. Taylor, the airline was very specific. They can't accommodate your . . ."

"You let me worry about the airline," Justin retorted. "You just worry about explaining yourself to Steven."

"But if you'll just give me ten minutes, I'm sure . . ."

"I don't have ten minutes," Justin replied, with what he considered admirable restraint. Just what part of "I have to go now" did this pussy-whipped sycophant not understand?

In truth, Cargill was neither pussy-whipped nor sycophantic; he was just an employee trying to do his job, caught between corporate policy and the determination of a young man who had not the slightest interest in company rules.

The concierge, recognizing true desperation gleaming in blue-on-blue eyes, really wanted to help the kid. Only he dared not disobey the hotel's most stringent regulation: one did not, under penalty of dismissal, interrupt a closed-door, security-guarded, private meeting between VIP clients, for anything less than a terrorist attack or a raging fire. When such clients paid for absolute discretion and a guarantee of non-interruption, they weren't kidding.

Finally, Justin simply nodded and turned for the door.

"Wait!" Cargill drew a deep breath and wondered if he would forever be doomed to be putty in the hands of adorable little blonds with huge blue eyes and perfect bubble butts.
With an impatient grunt, he depressed a button on his telephone and waited for a response. "Send Jonathon in here," he snapped when the call was answered.

"What am I waiting for?" demanded Justin, in no mood for game playing.

Cargill grabbed a pad from his desk and tossed it on the counter. "Write a note," he said quickly, "and I'll see he gets it. And, for God's sake, don't tell anybody. I could lose my job for this, you know."

Justin didn't stop to consider; he simply wrote the first thing that came to mind.

"I have to go. If you already know what happened, no explanation is needed. If you don't, none would be enough. I'm sorry."

He hesitated then for a fraction of a second, before scrawling Love, Justin at the bottom.

"The limo is waiting, Mr. Taylor," said Cargill, "but . . ."

Justin didn't wait to hear the rest. He was gone before the concierge could voice his certainty that there really was no need to rush because the airline had been very specific. Cargill sighed; he had no idea what might have happened to send the young blond on a mad dash to the airport, where he was almost certainly destined to spend many frustrating hours fidgeting and worrying and pacing, on stand-by while waiting for a seat to become available on a flight - any flight - headed east. The kid would have a very long day.

Cargill made sure that Jonathon - the waiter currently attending to the needs of the very special guests in the very private dining room - knew which of them to approach with the note; then he returned to his regular tasks, relieved to be able to do so, believing the crisis averted. But in assuming that the worst was over, he was destined to be proven wrong. When Steven Fletcher stormed into his office less than five minutes later, he knew immediately that he had been ridiculously optimistic.

"Get me a car - right now!"

"Of course, Mr. Fletcher," Cargill replied smoothly, in the mistaken belief that a serene response might serve to pour oil on troubled waters. "However, let me assure you that there's no cause for alarm, or need to hurry, for that matter. The young man is unlikely to be able to get a flight out any time soon. He's . . ."

Steven glanced at the man's ID tag with cold eyes. "It's obvious to me, Mr. Cargill," he almost snarled, "that you don't know the first thing about Justin Taylor. He may look like a sweet, unassuming little cherub, but, when the need arises, he can move mountains. Or airlines, as the case may be. So, if you have no desire to find yourself standing in the unemployment line - get me a car . . . now!"

At that moment, it would have astonished Adam Cargill, as he struggled to control an almost irresistible urge to tell this obstreperous, overbearing, pompous ass what he could do with his threats and his demands, to discover that Fletcher was ordinarily the most laid-back, mild-mannered, and courteous of men, completely opposed to any notion of using the power of his name, his money, or his position to demand special favors. But this was different; this was Justin, for God's sake.

And it struck him in mid-stride as he headed for the door at a near run that there was still something he could do - something Justin would not expect. Something that might very well put the young man he loved beyond all reason directly in harm's way. But something that would - at the same time - give his young lover the thing he wanted most in the world.
Steven paused, more torn than he had ever been in his life.

Then he sighed and walked back toward the private dining room where he had just left one of his company's most important clients to watch, open-mouthed and outraged, as his broker deserted him without explanation.

This was going to be a tricky moment, and he knew he was going to have a hell of a lot to answer for. His father, in fact, might never forgive him. But he would do as he must. For Justin - even though he was almost certain that what he was doing would be the last thing he ever had an opportunity to do for the young artist.

He should resist; he should pretend ignorance. He paused in the doorway to touch fingertips to his temple, hoping to ease the headache that was rising there. He should look after his own best interests, which did not, not, not, include providing a means for Justin to realize the desire that was driving him now. Steven knew that he should take his seat at the table, offer up some excuse about a momentary lapse, and resume his meeting. He knew he should . . .

But . . .

Andrew Ellis was sitting exactly where Steven had left him, champagne glass still in hand, eyebrows still raised, mouth still open, undoubtedly wondering what the hell had just happened to send the representative of his brokerage house racing from the room as if pursued by an army of screaming demons. He didn't appear outraged - not yet - but he was obviously working on it. Steven took a deep breath, mentally girded his loins . . . and jumped in with both feet.

"Andrew," he said abruptly, allowing himself no more opportunity to dither, "you deserve an explanation and an apology, and I will gladly offer both, ad nauseum. On my knees, if necessary. But first, I must ask you, beg you, to trust me. Because I need a really, really big favor . . . and the explanation will have to wait until later."

Ellis lifted his head, arching one eyebrow even higher, and stared up into the face of the handsome young man who was so like his venerable father in so many ways and so unlike him in others. Steven Fletcher was the younger generation, the new wave who would one day soon remake the shape of Wall Street and global markets, always providing he learned to keep his eye fixed firmly on target, and avoid unnecessary distractions.

Still . . . Andrew was quiet for a moment, swept back suddenly into memories he had not examined for a very long time. Memories of a young life, a different life, lived before he had taken up residence in the heartland of respectability, leaving behind a youth that was a far cry from the world he occupied now. He was quiet for a moment, taking time to light a cigarette and enjoy a sip of champagne before looking up and regarding young Fletcher with a faint smile.

"What kind of favor?"

Funny - he couldn't remember anything about where he'd been before or how he'd gotten here, although there was not the slightest doubt about where he was. Babylon was like no place else in the world; it had its own smell, its own ambiance, its own rhythm, its own pattern of sound and silence. Still, he should know where he'd been before - shouldn't he? Unless he was drunker than he thought. Or maybe that pig, Anita, had finally done it, had finally cooked up a batch of shit in her bathtub to pass off as "E" when it was really some kind of toxic soup that would send him on a horrible trip to rival the very worst LSD experience any child of the 60's had ever endured.
Still, even then, he should recall something . . . shouldn't he?

But nothing came to mind, beyond a few faded images - a glimpse of dancing in a ballroom, a few random drawings of a comic book hero, an infant looking up at him with beautiful solemn hazel eyes - and a few words that seemed to have dribbled into his consciousness - words that didn't make much sense.

Was there a voice - male, he thought - that denied any desire to get a look at the cock of the Stud of Liberty Avenue?

Was the fucker crazy?

And had someone mentioned that he would be Brian Kinney again? Well, of course, he would. Who the fuck else would he be? He was . . .

He lifted his eyes, somehow already knowing what he would see, although he knew that didn't make any sense. How could he know?

He managed not to flinch, not to frown. He managed not to allow anything to show on his face; it wasn't such an impressive trick, since he'd been doing the same thing his whole life - although not quite like this. It was not quite as simple this time, while he was intensely conscious of a blade of frozen steel slicing through his heart. He wanted to be angry, wanted to feel betrayal as he watched Justin break the rule that he himself had imposed. Words swirled in his memory, underscored by the thumpa-thumpa rhythm around and through them. "You don't kiss anybody on the mouth . . . but me."

The rule, apparently, no longer applied.

He tried to be angry - tried to hate the two young men who turned to look at him as they made their exit. But he couldn't find it within him. He couldn't hate Justin, couldn't resent him for needing what Brian could not give him, could never give him.

He had known it was coming; known that Justin would walk away, pursuing a dream of romance and a fairy-tale ending; a dream that Brian could never allow himself to provide.

He wanted to scream, to cry, to hurl himself forward and let rage take him as he refused to relinquish the only thing that mattered, the thing his heart insisted he must fight for, must win back.

But he couldn't, because he understood, on some sub-primal level, that Justin would be happier without him, happier with someone who could give him the things that Brian couldn't and wouldn't, and that was all that really mattered.

So he did none of the things his heart told him to do. He just stood there and watched, carefully preserving the Brian Kinney image he'd spent his life building.

Untouched and untouchable.

Only . . . deep down, in a private place that no one would ever see, some small part of him curled in upon itself, turning away from a pain too deep to endure, and died. Leaving behind a small, intense core of icy cold that would never thaw, never be warm again.

Then, it was on to the next trick, the next drink, the next hit . . . and he had an incredible urge to laugh as a bizarre thought erupted in his mind - a tag line from an old movie: "In space, no one can hear you scream."
The space around him expanded abruptly, reaching out toward infinity, and just like that, Babylon was gone; Justin and the fiddler were gone; the only thing that remained . . . was the cold. Somehow he knew it would never leave him.

He drifted then, his mind in free fall, only occasionally touching down to brush against reality: footsteps coming and going, gentle hands that touched him with a cool but not uncaring professional detachment, strange electronic sounds, not unlike a world constructed inside a video game, soft voices uttering words unconnected with the images in his mind. Once in a while, a voice he thought he should know . . .

"You scared us to death, you little shit . . ."

". . . hang on, Brian. Gus needs you . . ."

". . . Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake . . ."

But none of them grabbed him or inspired him to try to formulate an answer . . . or touched the coldness inside him.

Until . . .

Babylon again. Was he only alive there now? Was everything else just . . . gone? His back braced against the wall and some anonymous trick with a beautiful face worshipping his cock with tongue and suckling as he listened to the beloved voice on the phone.

"You're not mad, are you?"

The automatic response fell from his lips without thought. "Why would I be mad?" Why indeed? Of course, he wasn't mad. How could he be mad when he knew that Justin was doing exactly what he should be doing? When his young lover was living a life every young person dreamed of - making a movie, for God's sake, and fucking movie stars - flying in his element, while the rest of the world remained dirt-bound.

He hastened to reassure Justin, to let him know that he should not concern himself with how Brian might feel about his decision to extend his visit to the fantastic world that was Hollywood. And he resisted the urge to reply in kind when his young lover ended their conversation with a tender confession. "I miss you."

Brian disconnected quickly and stroked his fingers through the hair of the young man kneeling before him, but he was careful not to look down, not to see the dark hair and the buffed-up body that was definitely not Justin.

Instead, he leaned back and closed his eyes and saw a truth that he'd been doing his best to ignore. Justin had come back to him once, after the debacle of the fiddling twink; he had been lucky that time. He wouldn't be that lucky again. What, after all, could he offer to compete with the incredible adventure the young man was living now?

Justin was gone, and it was time to face it. He would not be coming back. It was time to let him go.

He felt a quick compression in his chest, as if his heart had somehow skipped a beat, and then he felt the first rush of orgasm take him and pull him out of his thoughts, out of his awareness, and he had never been more grateful for the distraction.

And yet, as molten heat exploded in his groin and through his body, he was suddenly aware of something that rejected the distraction and the heat: deep inside, in a place where he almost never allowed himself to go, a core of ice flexed . . . and grew colder.

". . . to wake up. Please . . ." Slightly whiny, even needy.

"They all . . . for you, you know. We can't . . ."

"Temperature slightly elevated . . . swelling in . . ."

". . . give'em all the big 'fuck you'. I know you can . . ."

But none of that really concerned him or grabbed his attention.

He was too busy drifting, until . . .

Babylon. Again. But different this time. Darker somehow, twisted into a moment he knew he didn't want to endure. But it was futile to resist, even when he knew . . . Ted and Emmett, both wearing an expression he was all too familiar with - the one that announced that they were smug in the certainty that they'd found a way to get through his defenses, to hurt the person who dwelt within the fortress, and he wondered how they could really believe that he'd never figured it out, that he didn't know how gleeful they were when they managed to inflict pain on a person who never allowed himself to show it.

But this time . . . this time he wasn't sure he could hold it together, for this time, it was not just a betrayal from one of the people closest to his heart. This time, it was a conspiracy - a joint effort to mock everything he was. Justin . . . and Michael, joined together in their disdain for his life and his choices. He believed in liberty, in never holding on to someone who wanted to be free, in giving his heart without demanding a certificate of title in return.

Justin had rejected all that. Rejected him and embraced the philosophy that Michael and Ben had adopted. And there was really nothing he could do but accept it. But perhaps, this time, he would not completely resist the urge to acknowledge the betrayal, to speak out.

So he would vent the anger, the sense of betrayal. But . . . only once. And then the mask would fall firmly back in place, and he would concentrate on constructing higher walls to guard his heart. It was a harsh lesson, but he would learn it.

What other choice did he have? His whole life had been spent learning to endure things that would have destroyed those without his strength and his determination. He would endure, and he would make sure no one would ever understand the degree of the hurt it cost him.

He was Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake! They all needed to believe that there was nothing he could not withstand, nothing that could pierce the fortress built around his heart.

He would make sure they could go on believing that.

And if the dark core within him - the one filled with relentless ice - grew darker and colder, it was not necessary for anyone else to know it. The cold, by this time, was an old, familiar companion. Unlike other companions, it would never leave him.

He would endure. He would always . . .

Drifting again, everything dissolving into a strange, surrealistic landscape of pain and blackness, whispers and detached voices, and . . .
Quick images of dancers and writhing bodies, of familiar faces in unfamiliar settings, of fire and blood and death, and then . . .

He stretched like a cat, reveling in the feel of creamy bare skin beneath him, in the intimacy of two bodies irrevocably joined, connected physically, but more than that. Connected heart-to-heat, soul-to-soul.

Justin, finally and totally, a part of him. Their kisses were slow and tender and spoke of having all the time in the world to explore each other, to rediscover each other, to . . .

Shrill, electronic beeping, loud and insistent . . .

". . . temperature spiking . . ."

". . . blood pressure dropping. Heartbeat erratic . . ."

"Justin," he whispered, gazing down into eyes that were now growing wide, reflecting something more than firelight, reflecting the rising voltage of pure panic. "Justin . . . I'm . . . sorry I . . ."

"Sorry's bullshit . . . Brian, don't you lea . . ."

It was the cold, of course. The cold, just as he had always known it would be. In spite of the blessed warmth of the fire against his skin, and the precious warmth of the body pressed close against him, it was the cold that would finally triumph and take away all that he'd managed to claim. It was the cold . . .

". . . call a code, STAT. And get Keller . . ."

It was early morning now, and only Michael and Ben were present in the waiting room, having dropped in before work, in the hope of getting a chance to have just a moment with the patient, even though, forty-eight hours after the fact, he had still not wakened from his coma, although Dr. Keller assured them that it would not be much longer. Still, it was comforting, somehow, to stand beside his bed and watch the rise and fall of his breath and note the occasional tremor that they chose to interpret as Brian's efforts to return to the land of the living.

Thus they were the only ones there to hear the clipped, cold announcement on the PA system: "Code blue, ICU. Code blue, ICU. Dr. Keller, 6117 STAT."

Ben was quick with easy reassurance. "It could be anybody, Michael. There are lots of other patients in ICU, and Dr. Keller is probably the primary physician on call. Don't jump to conclusions."

But Michael remained unconsolled. Ben meant well, meant to offer comfort and ease his husband's mind. Only . . . he didn't know Brian, the world's foremost drama queen.

Michael just nodded and continued to gnaw on the cuticle that he'd already reduced to bloody shreds - knowing, and wishing he didn't.

Airports were a lot like hospitals, he thought. Pretty much the same the world over, even if one qualified for admission to the VIP lounge. Which he did, courtesy of Steven, of course, and the first class ticket he was trying to exchange for an earlier flight.

Today. That was his only stipulation. It had to be today.

The real problem was that the stupid airline had no flights headed for the US mainland until the regular daily departure at 9:45 PM. Six and a half hours away. Six and a half useless hours, separating him from where he needed to be.

Justin sat in a booth in the discreet darkness of the bar, nursing his Beam and muttering under his breath. Of course, there was also the slight difficulty posed by the fact that the flight was fully booked, with no available seats - first class or otherwise - but he would deal with that problem when the time came. There would be someone willing to negotiate; there had to be. In the immortal words of someone who was currently much too far away, "Money talks". He would just have to make sure that it said the right thing to allow him to prevail. Meanwhile, here he sat, nursing his drink, firmly ensconced on the stand-by list, and staring at his watch, knowing that he needed to eat, that he would probably be sick if he didn't, but unable to bear the thought of food.

The bartender was giving him another come-hither look, and he reflected that it was really too bad that he was gay, as she was quite pretty and obviously interested. But he confined his response to a pale smile, before going wide-eyed as he noticed the commercial that was playing on the TV behind the bar. Endovir - The AIDS drug - the ads which had been the first to be produced by Kinnetic Corp, the product of the advertising genius of Brian Kinney.

It was truly a small world, he thought, allowing himself a tiny sigh. Only not quite small enough - today.

Justin closed his eyes and knew that it was time. He could put it off no longer. He wasn't even sure why he had done so up until now, for the knowing or not knowing would change nothing.

But it was time to know.

He retrieved his laptop from his carry-all, and attached it to the Internet outlet beside the table, then waited while it booted up. Allowing himself no chance to procrastinate, he clicked on Google and typed in Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, waited for a moment, and managed - barely - not to flinch as the front page of the largest of Pittsburgh's dailies appeared on the screen.

The article was just a small piece at the bottom of the front page, bearing the headline "Kinney Attack Under Investigation."

Justin took a deep breath, trying to ignore the hard thump of his heartbeat and the huge lump in his throat, and began to read.

"According to a statement issued by the Pittsburgh Police Department, the attack on local businessman, Brian Kinney, is being treated as a hate crime and federal involvement in the investigation is pending. Mr. Kinney, owner and president of the advertising firm, Kinnetic Corp, and of the gay nightclub, Babylon, which was the target of a terrorist-style attack last year, remains hospitalized at press time, still listed in critical condition.

Detective Carl Horvath confirms that a number of leads are being pursued and interviews with potential witnesses continue. The attack occurred last Friday evening, as Mr. Kinney was abducted by his attackers after leaving his nightclub prior to closing. No official statement concerning the severity of the attack has been issued, but unconfirmed reports suggest that he was badly beaten, and his injuries were extensive; however, an unidentified source reports that the doctor overseeing his care indicates that he is 'cautiously optimistic' concerning his patient's chances for recovery.

The individual who was killed during the police rescue has been identified as George McCormick, a resident of Chicago and ex-convict allegedly affiliated with the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang.

No further details have been released at this time. The police department is urging anyone who might have information concerning this attack to call the TIPS hotline as soon as possible."

Justin leaned his head against the back of the booth and closed his eyes. There was a picture, of course. He had known there would be. Who, after all, would resist the urge to publish a photograph of that face? Brian, not quite smiling, not quite smirking, but something in between. Just quintessentially Brian - and quintessentially beautiful.

There would be more - much more - he was certain, if he called up an earlier edition: the front page article from the day after the event. He just wasn't sure he was ready to know it all.

Still, there was no point in delay. He lifted his hand to initiate the search, but had not completed the gesture when he became conscious of a presence standing over him.

"Hello, Steven."

The young broker did not offer a response until he'd made himself comfortable on the opposite seat, bracing his hands against the table and signaling for the bartender to bring him a drink along with a refill for his companion.

"Justin." Just that. Just his name and no more.

And Justin took a moment to draw a deep breath. "You knew," he said, without a trace of uncertainty, his voice admirably steady despite the anger erupting like a flame in his chest.

Steven sighed. "Yes."

"Why . . ." Another deep breath, obviously struggling to remain calm. "Why didn't you tell me?"

Steven reached forward and touched his finger to the photograph still centered on the computer screen. "Because he didn't want you to know. If I understand it correctly, he fought like a son of a bitch to remain conscious long enough to make sure the powers that be knew to keep you away."

"Because?"

Steven wanted to look away, wanted not to see the fury rising in those incredibly blue eyes, but couldn't. "No one knows for sure, but it's only logical to assume that they . . . threatened you. That they told him they'd be going after you next."

Justin's eyes were drawn once more to the photograph on the screen. "And that was enough - for you and for him - to decide to keep me in the dark?"

Steven sighed. "It should be pretty obvious that both of us only had one thing in mind. To keep you safe."

"Yeah, well . . ."

"Justin, think about it. Please. If he manages to come through this, how do you think he'd feel to discover that he survived, and you didn't?"

Justin's eyes narrowed, becoming cold, dark slits. "Now you think about it, Steven. Suppose I survive it, and he doesn't. Do you really think my life would mean anything to me? That I could just . . . go on, without him?"

"You've been without him," Steven pointed out, "for the past year."

Justin's smile was tentative, sweet, wistful. "I've never been without him, although I admit that, for a while, I thought so too. But the truth is he's always with me."

Steven felt the pain bolt through him. "Then . . ."

"I'm sorry, Steven," Justin interrupted quickly. "I owe you a huge apology. I used you to try to cover up the hurt I felt when I thought I'd lost him, and that was completely unfair to you. Because I've only just now realized something. I can't lose him; he's a part of me, whether he admits it or not. Whether we're together or not. He'll always be a part of me, and me of him. That's not going to change."

"But he sent you away." It was a desperate protest, a last ditch effort to point out the obvious.

"Yeah, he did," answered Justin. "And I, like a stupid twat, let him do it, because I let myself buy into the bullshit." Then he looked deep into Steven's eyes, obviously sorry for the pain he knew he was causing, but unable to maintain his silence. "Even though I knew better. I even said it once, when Lindsey was spouting all her bullshit about why I needed to go to New York, why I could only grow into the artist I was supposed to be if I answered the call. I told her then that New York wasn't my opportunity of a lifetime, that Brian was. And then - like an idiot - I let myself forget it. Because he was determined not to stand in my way. To let me go find myself. But . . ."

"But?" Steven suddenly sounded much older than his 36 years.

"But I will never be the man I want to be without Brian. I don't know how we'll do it, how we'll pull it off, but, whatever we do, whatever we're meant to be, it will only work . . . together."

Steven could not find a single word with which to form an answer,

"I'm truly sorry."

And what was there, after all, to say to that? The young broker found no response sufficient. Still, there was something he needed to say, even though it would serve no useful purpose.

"I know," he said finally. "So am I."

"It wasn't meant . . ."

But Steven waved him off. "Please don't offer me platitudes, Justin. It won't help. And it's not like I hadn't already figured it out, you know. I think I always knew. But I . . . I just couldn't turn around and walk away. Even though I knew it was the best thing I could do. But I . . . I really loved you, you know. I wanted to give you the world."

Justin's pale skin made the flush that touched his face seem almost garish. "I'm . . ."

"I know," Steven said quickly. "You're sorry. And so am I." He smiled then, with a sweeping gesture that seemed to encompass the island around them. "This was meant to be the trip of a lifetime, a trip that would make you . . ."

"Forget everything?"
"Not everything. Just him."

Justin could only sigh, and offer his ultimate truth. "If I never saw him again, never heard his name, never touched him - and spent the rest of my life traveling to every beautiful place in the world - he would still be here." He touched his heart with his thumb. "Right here.

"I'm just sorry that it took something like this . . ." he nodded toward the article on the computer, "to make me realize it."

"I know."

Steven stood up then, and spent a moment staring down into the beautiful eyes that were looking back at him. Then he leaned forward and dropped a quick kiss on Justin's forehead.

"Good-bye, Baby," he whispered. Then he turned and walked away, and Justin watched him go, feeling a sense of shame when he couldn't muster up a single ounce of regret for what might have been.

So he had not been lying when he'd said that it had always been Brian, even when he'd tried to believe that it wasn't.

He glanced once more at his watch. Six hours and twenty minutes.

He pulled his laptop toward him, looking for a way to pass the time. Looking for the whole story. Only . . .

"Mr. Taylor?"

He looked up to find a young man in a dark suit standing over him.

"Yes?"

"Your flight is ready, Sir."

Justin blinked. "My . . . flight?"

"Yes, sir."

Justin cleared his throat. "I'm sorry, but I thought there were no flights out . . . until tonight."

"That's correct. There are no commercial flights out, until this evening."

"So what are you talking about?"

The young man smiled. "I'm sorry. I thought you knew."

"Knew what?"

"Mr. Ellis' Gulfstream is waiting on Runway 3, fueled and ready to go. We'll have you in Pittsburgh in no time."

"Mr. Ellis?" Justin echoed. "But I don't even know Mr. Ellis."

"No, but you do know Mr. Fletcher. He's the one who called in a . . . favor."

Justin felt a pang of guilt. He had not even offered his thanks for everything Steven had done for him
- was still doing for him, and, knowing the corporate world as he did, he doubted that such a 'favor' would come without strings attached.

He really should take the time to express his gratitude, for both the favor and the generous spirit that was the driving force behind it. He really should, only . . .

The jet was waiting. Pittsburgh was waiting. Brian . . . was waiting.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Though it was very early, Lindsey had been up and about for several hours. She was finding it difficult to sleep these days. Sleeping in a hotel; sleeping in Pittsburgh again. Sleeping while Brian was locked away in a sleep from which he might not awaken. She missed her children; she missed her home; and she missed the man who had been such an integral part of her life, for such a long time. What she didn't miss, in the least, was the shitty attitude her partner had been displaying since they had arrived here. She had tried to be understanding, to accept how difficult it must be for Melanie to be here, in this place, under these circumstances - to know, as there was no denying, that her partner had always been at least a bit in love with Brian Kinney.

But that did not excuse the pissy attitude, while Brian lay suspended between life and death.

Lindsey had, after all, left him here when she and Melanie relocated to Toronto. Left him here, conveniently forgetting how distraught she'd been on the occasion of his thirtieth birthday, when he'd been the one threatening to move away, to build a new life in New York.

Why was it, she wondered suddenly, that all of Brian's friends took it upon themselves to determine what was or was not acceptable in his life, but felt free to pursue their own interests, no matter what their actions might do to him?

Especially when he did so much for them.

Like now.

She had not spent a lot of time at Kinnetic since Brian had opened it, and she felt a little like an interloper when she followed Cynthia into the inner sanctum - his office. It was just as she remembered it, of course - elegant, streamlined, beautiful. Like its owner.

"Cynthia, I really appreciate your . . ."

"No need to thank me," said Brian's assistant. "I didn't do anything. It was all Brian. Did you really think he'd made no provisions for Gus?"

Lindsey sighed. "I know he's always sent a check every month. But that was before he . . ."

"It's a trust fund, Lindsey. He set it up years ago, and the income is still there. It won't change just because he's not available to write the checks."

"I have to admit," said Gus' mother, "that it would have been really tough . . ." She laughed gently. "Okay, it would have been impossible without the money he sent."

Cynthia regarded her solemnly. "You know, Linz, I have to tell you that I was always a little surprised that Melanie was willing to accept his help, given how she feels about him."

"We-ell!" Lindsey drawled. "As to that . . ."
"She doesn't know." Cynthia's tone made it obvious that it was not a question.

"No. She doesn't."

Cynthia gave a tiny, tight little smile. "You guys have an interesting arrangement," she said. She was careful to guard against any nuance of disapproval that might color her tone, no matter what her private opinion might be. This was the mother of Brian's son, and if he had no problem with the way she lived her life, then his administrative assistant would certainly abide by his decision.

Nevertheless, Lindsey felt a chill anyway. She did not like feeling as if she had to lie to her partner, especially when she was sure that Cynthia was comparing her deceitful behavior to Brian's brutal, unrelenting honesty - and finding her wanting.

"Do you need it now?" Cynthia continued.

Lindsey nodded. "Especially with all the added expenses of the hotel, the trip to New York, and the car rental. It all adds up, you know. I even wondered if it might be possible for us to use Brian's . . ."

"Not a good idea." There was no uncertainty in Cynthia's voice. "One thing that he would not want violated is his privacy. The loft is off-limits. However, if you like, I'm sure he'd want me to arrange for Kinnetic to pick up the tab for the hotel. And I'll make a stop at the ATM on my way to the hospital. Will that do?"

"That'll be fine."

"A thousand," said Cynthia. "Right?"

Lindsey nodded and took a moment to study the décor of the office. Minimalist, with lots of space, and clean, uncluttered lines - exactly the kind of spare elegance Brian had always preferred in his surroundings, the kind of ambiance that served as a perfect setting to emphasize the beauty of the individual at its center.

"One more thing," said Cynthia suddenly, and Lindsey spun to study her face, hearing something strange and slightly disconcerting in her tone of voice.

"I don't know if you do much Internet surfing," said Brian's executive assistant, "but for the time being, you should avoid it like the plague."

Lindsey opened her mouth to deny any interest in web browsing, but then it occurred to her that this was not a non sequitur; this was an issue with a very specific point.

"Why?" she asked abruptly. "What is it that I shouldn't see?"

Cynthia stood up and walked to the window to look out into watery morning light, and took her time choosing her words - something that was so out of character for her that Lindsey felt the first flush of true alarm. Though she could be discreet to a fault when acting on Brian's behalf, Cynthia was not exactly renowned for her tact. "There was apparently someone at the hospital the night they brought him in. Someone with . . . a camera. There are photos posted all over the Web, especially on certain homophobic sites."

Suddenly, Lindsey's knees buckled, and she dropped into a chair that was just close enough to catch her. "Oh, my God!" she whispered. "It's not enough that they almost destroyed him. Now they have to flash pictures of what they did to him all over the fucking world. What did he ever do to make these people hate him so?"
Cynthia's face was like a mask, absolutely without expression, cold and distant but in striking contrast to the strange current of dark emotion threading through her voice. "He's queer, Lindsey. That's all it is, no matter how much they might claim that it's because he's too bold, or too flashy, or too defiant. It's really not any of those things. He fucks guys. That's the first reason, the primary reason. And . . . he's not afraid of them. Reason number two. Put them together, and he becomes their version of the Anti-Christ."

Lindsey nodded, slightly surprised by the veiled layer of passion she heard beneath the words. Cynthia was not much given to emotional extremes; in point of fact, Brian had often referred to her as his "voice of reason".

"You know," she said slowly, "you should feel very proud of what you've accomplished here. With Brian, I mean."

Cynthia turned away from her contemplation of the uninspiring vista beyond the window and regarded the other woman with cool detachment. "Meaning?"

"Meaning that Brian isn't much given to trusting straight people. Yet, he trusts you implicitly. Doesn't he?"

Cynthia smiled. "Maybe that's because he and I don't see each other as examples of our sexual orientation. He's Brian. I'm Cynthia. And we're a damned good team, so why would it make any difference who we fuck?"

Lindsey dredged up an indulgent smile. "That sounds like an example of a very mature attitude - something I wouldn't ordinarily associate with Brian Kinney."

Cynthia abruptly moved to Brian's desk, ostensibly to check something on his calendar, but Lindsey thought it rather strange that the other woman was careful to avoid direct eye contact. "Maybe," she said slowly, "you don't know him quite as well as you think you do."

Lindsey opened her mouth to laugh off the suggestion, slightly outraged at the notion that anybody could possibly know Brian Kinney better than she did, but she was forestalled by the sudden buzz of the office phone.

It was still very early in the day - too early for business as usual.

Nevertheless, Cynthia picked up the receiver and answered with cool professionalism.

Then she said nothing, merely listening, her face very still and pale. When she sank into Brian's executive chair, Lindsey knew that something must be very wrong, knew - somehow - that Brian's desk was a place that was almost a shrine to his place in this company. Nobody would just sit in Brian's chair, not unless there was suddenly no alternative.

"When?" Cynthia's voice did not break, but it was very soft.

"Of course," she said a few seconds later. "I'm on my way. And Lindsey Peterson is here with me."

She hung up then, and hesitated for a moment, the only indication of her concern being the way she clamped her teeth on her bottom lip.

"What is it?" asked Lindsey, a surge of cold fear flooding through her body.

"We have to go. Now."
"Why?"

"Brian. They're rushing him back to surgery. Something's . . . wrong."

Cold fear morphed immediately into blind panic. "What? What's wrong?"

Cynthia took a deep breath. "They don't know. Keller's doing an exploratory procedure, to try to find the problem."

Lindsey confined her response to a nod, grabbing her purse and heading for the door, the terror inside her now making it hard to breathe, to think, to remember how to put one foot in front of the other.

The two women left the office together, sharing the same compulsion. They had to get to Brian, to be there, to be close by, just in case he should . . .

But the thought stopped there, just short of stepping off into a void that neither of them was willing to explore.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

Justin sprawled on the plush sofa and allowed himself to savor the comforts usually afforded only to the very rich. This, he thought as his eyes swept the cabin of the Gulfstream 550, noting the soft lighting, the designer signature of the décor, the state-of-the-art communications system, the whole luxury package, was an entirely new definition of living the good life.

Then he frowned. Good life or not, there was no way to defy the laws of physics. He was still many hours away from Pittsburgh, and a series of calls placed to various individuals there had failed to yield the results he'd sought. The hospital had provided no answers to his questions, just as he'd expected. He was not, officially, a next of kin, or even family, and the Patient Relations staffer who had taken his call had been polite but firm. Mr. Kinney's condition was still listed as critical. For anything more, the caller would have to contact a family member.

Only there weren't any; at least, none that Brian would tolerate being anywhere near him during such a difficult time. And since the Brian Kinney manual on how to live life as he saw fit did not rely on random chance to insure that things turned out the way he wanted, Justin was certain that the necessary arrangements had been made to keep Joan and Claire Kinney at a safe distance.

There was Michael, of course, and Ben. And Debbie. All of whom Brian loved deeply. But . . .
Justin tried to imagine either of the Novotnys - mother or son - having to handle the critical decisions concerning Brian's care in a life-or-death situation - and couldn't begin to visualize it. No. That would inflict a burden on them, a sense of responsibility. Brian would never allow that. Ben, of course, could probably handle the weight of choices that might have to be made, but as Michael's husband, he would not be acting alone.

Lindsey? She was, after all, the mother of Brian's only child, and they shared a long, complex history. But it was a well known though seldom verbalized fact among the extended family that Lindsey loved Brian. Sometimes excessively, or even compulsively. Added to that was the whole hate/more hate dynamic between Brian and Melanie, and it seemed unlikely that Brian would compound the problems that he inevitably caused between the two Lesbians by giving Lindsey the authority to decide his fate.

So, no. Not Michael, not Debbie, not Lindsey. But there had to be someone, someone who . . .

Justin smiled, and the flight attendant who was approaching with his dinner was momentarily dazzled. Too bad, she thought, that this one so far beyond the pale - gay as blazes and completely unapologetic about it.

Justin stood and moved to take a seat at the bar, and took a deep breath, enjoying the delicate fragrance of lobster newburg as the attendant filled his wine glass with a fine sauvignon blanc. He was not really hungry - had not had any interest in food or drink since he'd opened that horrible email. But he knew he would need his strength if he were to have any hope of out-maneuvering the ranks of Kinney's Army. For he did not fool himself. Brian was nothing if not resourceful, even if he was lying comatose in the ICU. He would have made his preparations carefully, a long time before such arrangements were needed.

But he knew now where to begin - the only logical place.

So he ate. Sparingly, but sufficient to the needs of the moment.

Then he settled back into his seat on the suede-covered sofa, savoring his second glass of wine and pulling a small, leather-bound book from his carry-all.

He wondered, as he stroked the soft cover, if he was the only person who'd ever gotten close enough to Brian Kinney to discover one of his closely guarded secrets - something that Brian would undoubtedly classify as a weakness. Yet, after a bit of fumbling and completely uncharacteristic embarrassment, the Stud of Liberty Avenue had admitted a surprising truth. He had a fondness for certain works of a few of the poets ordinarily classified as - Romantic.

Byron, in particular. Justin thought it entirely appropriate.

The book fell open at a bookmarked page, as Justin had known it would. He had no idea why this particular verse had always seemed to speak to him, as it had somehow spoken to Brian before him.

The book was old and worn. It had resided in a drawer in Brian's desk for many years before he had one day placed it in Justin's hand, saying nothing with his mouth, but saying everything with his eyes. Since that day, through good and bad, thick and thin, being with Brian or without Brian - loving him or hating him - it had never been beyond Justin's reach.

He looked down at the page, and the verse was waiting for him. He didn't really have to read it. It sang in his mind, as it always did.

\[
\begin{align*} \text{In secret we met--} \\
\text{In silence I grieve,} \\
\text{That thy heart could forget,} \\
\text{Thy spirit deceive.} \\
\text{If I should meet thee} \\
\text{After long years,} \\
\text{How should I greet thee?} \\
\text{With silence and tears.} \end{align}
\]

He felt the sting in his eyes, and could almost hear that sardonic voice whispering in his ear, that it really wasn't worth crying over. Only it was. He was. And it was time to recognize the truth, and to move heaven and earth to make sure that Brian, finally, recognized it too. There had been entirely too much silence, too many tears.

It was time to shout it from the rooftops.

Brian Kinney belonged to him; they belonged together - and fuck anybody who tried to stand between them.

* When We Two Parted -- George Gordon, Lord Byron

tbc
OR # 7 had certainly seen its share of crises over the years: trauma victims clinging to life by a thread, some saved and some not; patients rushed in from the intensive care unit or the emergency room or the OB suite, crashing, convulsing, bleeding out, in cardiac arrest, flat-lining, or exhibiting any of a dozen other varieties of extreme distress, all requiring the implementation of desperate measures in striving to reach a single goal - the prolongation of life. Sometimes the prolongation was brief: a matter of minutes or hours or days. Some times, there was no prolongation, and even the most heroic measures proved futile.

And sometimes, remarkably, the measures taken proved so effective and the intervention so successful that the result could no longer be termed just a prolongation; sometimes it became a matter of a life saved, of death averted and sent packing.

In effect, the surgical suite was regularly and repeatedly transformed into a battleground, a site of bloody confrontation between the powers of death and destruction and the skills of the individuals who fought to push back the night and rekindle the radiance of life renewed. Those who fought that battle invariably faced the conflict with a cool pragmatism, refusing to be awed by the power of the opposition. It was the only way to achieve the necessary cool professionalism required to function with any hope of success.

When victory was won and the dark invaders finally repelled, the room - only recently christened Keller's Lair by the hospital incrowd - was sometimes filled, temporarily, with a strange sense of dissociation, a weary lethargy that was the complete antithesis of the urgency and near-panic prevalent only a short time before. It was as if the successful effort had drained the entire group of surgical personnel - the assault force of medical intervention - of every ounce of energy and resilience, leaving them boneless and empty although very happy.

First among the exhausted soldiers in that army of very special forces would be the surgical prodigy himself. Matthew Keller frequently emerged from the frontlines of the battle barely able to stand, limp and pale and listless and wanting nothing more than his bed and the bliss of consciousness released.

But not today.

When the surgical procedure was finished and the crisis averted; when the shrill alarms of vital signs monitors went silent, no longer signaling catastrophe; when the patient resumed breathing on his own, without requiring a ventilator to inflate his lungs, Matt Keller was still in his element, still strong and vital and eager and flush with victory. Not because he hadn't poured heart and soul into his work - as he always did; not because he'd held back any particle of strength or power that might be the last little deciding factor in whether or not a patient lived or died. He'd done all that - and more.

But this was no ordinary patient, and his efforts, no matter how exhaustive, were too intimately tied to the fate of the man whose life was literally in his hands to allow him to pull back and release his hold on the ties that bound them together. He would pour his life force - every ounce of it if necessary - into this body. But he would also get something back, a constant reinforcement of his own strength. The contact between them was more of a loop than a one-way passage, and the benefit and energy that circulated there would either benefit both - or neither.

The surgical staff, well accustomed to the eccentricities and habits of their young prodigy, watched... with growing disbelief as Keller prepared to close and complete the procedure. Matthew Keller never closed. That was, in his own parlance, what assistants were for.

When RN Gloria Beck lifted her eyes and looked as if she might open her mouth to question him, he simply stared at her. Daring her to make the comment or the suggestion.

Luckily, she knew him well enough to take the hint.

"Nice call, Doctor," she said finally, understanding, as only a well-trained trauma nurse would, that the patient had been very fortunate that it was Keller who had been the man in charge. Another doctor - possibly even a very good one - might have missed the diagnosis, and the only explanation for young Mr. Kinney's failure to survive the surgery would have come from the autopsy performed to determine cause of death.

Luckily, that had not happened. Keller, acting on a combination of medical expertise and gut instinct, had called it correctly and acted accordingly. Even more luckily, the young surgeon's skill in performing emergency exploratory procedures was almost legendary among his peers, enabling him to find and eliminate the problem when many others might have failed to do so. Virtually undetectable and skulking beneath the trauma inflicted on other major organs, the patient's badly lacerated gallbladder had begun to hemorrhage into surrounding tissues, its condition deteriorating rapidly, compounding other problems and making diagnosis even more difficult.

If there had been any delay or if the physician had hesitated even slightly, it might well have been too late. Damage to the gallbladder from blunt force trauma was a rare occurrence and thus not always recognized in such cases, and the organ had been on the verge of rupture by the time Keller found the source of the problem.

Young Mr. Kinney had been very lucky indeed.

He would live. And that was all that Matt Keller cared about. There might be consequences. Side-effects. A price to pay.

But Brian Kinney would live, and . . . Matthew allowed himself a weary smile . . . he would undoubtedly do so beautifully. The smile faded a bit, but only for a moment. It was time to call in the cavalry, thought the physician. He had known from the beginning, from the moment he'd walked into the room and come face to face with the degree of his patient's injuries, that he would eventually get to this point, although he had to admit, if only to himself, that he had not been thrilled with the prospect.

Still, the moment was at hand. He would not allow his own reluctance to jeopardize his patient's chances for a complete recovery. Even had the patient been anyone other than the man who was, in so many ways, the love of his life.

Time to face the music.

"Beck," he said sharply, as he administered a tiny, almost invisible stitch to close the last of the laparoscopic incisions, "I need you to locate someone for me."

The nurse looked up, slightly uneasy with the note of uncertainty she detected in his voice. Matt Keller was never uncertain of anything.

"Who?"

He turned then and spent a moment looking down into his patient's face, inspecting every mark, every bruise, every laceration, the image before him overlaid in his mind with the image called up from memory. The contrast almost took his breath away, and reinforced his resolve.

"Find Rick Turnage. I need to talk to him."

"When?" she asked, mind already reeling. How the hell was she supposed to . . .

"Yesterday," he replied.

She was too much a professional to display any misgivings she might experience, but she knew both Matt and Dr. Richard Turnage well enough to justify experiencing more than a few. "Now there's a name I haven't heard you speak in . . . what? Three years?"

He hugged a tiny laugh. "At least. And I'd have been more than happy to never speak it again. But . . ."

"But?" she prompted when it appeared he would not continue.

"Sometimes," he said softly, "only the best will do, and a man's gotta swallow his fucking pride and do what's necessary."

Beck smiled behind her mask. "Well, who would have dreamed that this ordinary, run-of-the-mill day would spawn a miracle? For you - of all people - to admit that he . . ."

"He's an arrogant, self-serving prick and a canker sore on the arse of mankind." Then he paused to draw a deep breath. "But he's also the best at what he does, and, in this case, only the best will do."

The nurse was silent for a moment, observing the gentleness of his hands as he continued his task.

"Jesus!" she whispered finally. "You must really love him."

He merely looked at her, a hard glitter in his eyes daring her to say more.

Then he shifted his focus, forgetting everyone and everything except the man lying supine and helpless under his hands, and leaned forward so that he was almost nose to nose with his patient. His lips moved gently, generating only the faintest whisper of sound. "I made you a promise, Baby. And I aim to keep it, even if I have to eat a shitload of humble pie in the process."

He stepped back then, peeling off mask and gown and gloves, his mind already turning to the next task at hand. To wit - facing Michael.

He had not allowed himself to dwell too much on the facial expression worn by young Novotny (and why in hell was he thinking of him in that way when Michael was actually older than Brian and the same age as Matthew himself?) when the trauma team had wheeled their patient out of ICU and raced off down to corridor to the staff elevator, which was waiting to take them down to the surgical suites on a lower floor. There had been no time for explanations or assurances, only a hurried statement that Brian had developed complications and needed more surgery. But Matt had not quite managed to forget that look either. He had seen enough blind panic in the course of his life to recognize it, especially when it was couched within a framework of despair.

Michael had been terrified, had been forced, for the first time in his life, to contemplate the possibility that Brian might never come back to him.

Matt knew that feeling, had felt it himself on more than one occasion, and knew that he had to take steps to relieve it. Not for Michael; he frankly didn't give a shit about Michael. But Brian loved the little nerd - always had and always would. So it was time to ease Michael's pain, for Brian's sake.
He was only three steps into the waiting room when he found himself surrounded by avid faces, barely able to contain the panic that sparked in their eyes. He looked around, recognizing Michael, of course, and his partner; his mother, Debbie; Lindsey and her 'husband'; Brian's friends, Emmett and Ted, and his assistant, Cynthia. Other faces were familiar, but he could not put names to them. But it didn't matter anyway. It was Michael who was front and center, and who was not going to relinquish his place, no matter who tried to remove him.

"Is he . . ." Huge brown eyes were glossy with tears that could not be denied.

"He's all right, Michael."

The tears spilled over, then, far beyond control, and Michael, obviously not knowing what else to do, wrapped his hands in the collar of Keller's lab coat and just let them flow. "What was wrong?" he managed to whisper.

Keller debated whether or not to go into the technicalities of what had happened, but realized immediately that there was little point. Even if some of these individuals were able to grasp the medical jargon, it would make no real difference. They didn't need to be able to understand the terminology or define a cholecystectomy or comprehend why it had been necessary; they only needed to know the result.

"Complications from the original injuries," he said smoothly. "When there's so much damage, it's easy to miss something."

The group was quiet, eyes haunted and filled with shadow, until Cynthia spoke up - pragmatic and rational. As always.

"And how can you be sure you haven't 'missed' something else?"

He summoned up a weary smile for her, recalling how Brian always referred to her as his "good right hand". "Medicine isn't nearly as exact a science as most doctors would have you believe, so there's no such thing as 'sure' in a situation like this. But I've exhausted every possibility I can think of, and, if I did miss something, I promise you that I'm going to be close enough to step in and fix any other problem that might arise." The smile faded, to be replaced by grim resolve. "He will survive this."

As he spoke, his eyes moved from face to face, gauging the reactions of the various members of the group. It was not surprising, he supposed, that there would be such marked variations in how the individuals responded to his words. Brian's relationships with these people ran the gamut, after all, from the kind of friendship that defined lifelong commitment to a barely-controlled hostility that masked an even deeper resentment. Thus, Michael's expression was almost incandescent with relief and hope restored while Lindsey's partner (Melissa? Melinda? Something like that?) looked as if she couldn't decide whether or not she dared display annoyance at the degree of Lindsey's concern. Lindsey, however, merely looked exhausted, and Keller knew exactly how she felt.

"When can we see him?" demanded Michael's mother. "We haven't even had a good look at him yet, you know. We need . . ."

Matthew raised a hand to stop her in mid-tirade. "You'll see him when it's safe to do so, and . . ." He paused and let his tone of voice shift to emphasize his meaning, "when he wants to see you."

"He'll be waking up soon then?" That was Emmett, the shadows in his eyes reminding the doctor that it had been this young man who'd participated in Brian's rescue and who, as a result, had actually seen the worst of what had been done to him, rather than just imagining it, like the rest of the people in this room.

"Soon enough," he answered gently. "We'll keep him sedated for a while, to give him a chance to begin to heal. And to control his pain. In fact, he'll probably sleep all day today. But I see no reason to extend the induced coma, especially since the swelling in his brain has begun to subside. He'll wake up when he's ready."

With that said, Keller dredged up a tired smile and turned away, to hurry down the corridor, disappearing around a nearby corner and leaving many of the group frustrated with the terse quality of his responses.

"I don't get it," snapped Debbie. "Isn't the family supposed to be kept in the loop, to know . . ."

"Debbie," said Lindsey softly, "much as we'd like to think so, we're not."

"Not what?"

"Not family."

The redhead's eyes grew huge. "Well, if we're not, who the hell . . ."

"I don't know," said Melanie slowly, eyes dark with speculation, "but we could probably find out. At least, some of us could." She looked up then and regarded her partner solemnly. "You're the mother of his only child, so . . ."

"No," said Lindsey sharply. "I won't use that, and I won't invade his privacy."

"But you have a right . . ."

"The only rights that matter in this," replied the blonde, "are Brian's rights."

"As usual." That was Melanie again, not quite inaudible and not quite able to conceal her impatience with the thrust of the conversation.

Most of the group trailed back to their seats, each lost in his own thoughts, while Emmett took his leave, hurrying off down the corridor and disappearing around the same corner where Dr. Keller had vanished only moments earlier. Seconds later, Cynthia also made her exit, with no more than a silent nod to Lindsey to signal her departure.

Emmett did not - quite - break into a run once he was out of sight of his friends, but it was a near thing. He needed to speak with Matt Keller privately, and he needed to do so right now. But he had taken only a few strides down the hallway when he realized that it was not to be. Whatever conversation he could manage to have with the surgeon, it would have to be with an audience, for Drew was coming out of the elevator just a few feet away, and Lance Mathis was with him, and neither of them looked to be in a mood to be shunted aside.

But Emmett was determined that he would not spend another minute living with the horrible uncertainty that had stuck in his mind with painful persistence since the moment he had first looked down into Brian's mangled face. He would endure it no longer. So he pushed past his one-time lover and his companion and hurried toward the doorway at the end of the hall. It was one of a half-dozen just like it, virtually indistinguishable each from the others, except for a small, discreet metal sign affixed to the wall beside it, with the words "Doctor's Lounge" engraved on the surface.

Emmett did not hesitate, nor take any notice of the fact that he was no longer alone. He did spare a quick thought to observe that most of the people who knew him well - or thought they did - would have been shocked to see him now, to comprehend the intensity of his determination to get an answer to the question that was driving him. Forceful was simply not an adjective that anyone would ordinarily use to describe him.

But fear, he thought, can turn the most mild-mannered pussy boy into a raging lunatic, and this particular pussy-boy had reached his limit.

Matt Keller had just poured a cup of black coffee almost caustic enough to etch glass when he found himself under intense scrutiny from three pairs of eyes. Two of his observers appeared to have simply tagged along for the ride, uncertain of where the road would lead them, but there was no mistaking the intense focus of the third. Emmett Honeycutt had come for answers, and would not be turned away until he got them.

So much, then, thought Keller, for his intention to close his eyes for a few minutes before entering his latest observations into the medical chart that he carried under his arm.

The doctor felt a sudden, intense surge of sympathy for the young man standing before him, along with a quick swell of gratitude that Brian had managed to inspire such loyalty from someone who did not appear to be infatuated/intoxicated or otherwise in love with him. For Brian, true friendship, offered up without traces of lust or romantic fantasy, was a rare blessing.

"You're not supposed to be in here," Keller pointed out with a sardonic smile.

"Sorry," replied Emmett, in a tone that clearly belied the word, "but I need to talk to you. Alone."

The doctor's eyes flicked to Emmett's companions.

"They don't count," Emmett explained. "They're not emotionally invested in . . ."

Keller spotted a shadow moving in Drew Boyd's eyes, and was quick to realize that Emmett was not entirely correct in his assumption. It was not, however, anything that needed to be addressed, and he let it pass. "Honeycutt, I . . ."

"Emmett," said the young man quickly. A strange melancholy touched his face then, and his next remark seemed to be a non-sequitur, but the doctor was somehow certain that it wasn't. "Nobody gets to call me . . . that."

Keller nodded. "Emmett, then. Look, I appreciate that you're concerned, that you think you have a right to . . ."

"No," said Emmett quickly. "Not a right. I have no rights here. Except . . ."

When he fell silent, it was obvious that he was struggling to find the right words to express his concerns, and Keller forced himself to be patient, to give the young man the time he needed.

"We saw," he said finally, with a nod of his head to include the two men at his side, "what they did to him. The others - the rest of the Brian Kinney fan club that's assembled out in the waiting room - they came later. After he'd been cleaned up and bathed and bandaged, so they didn't see how bad it was." He shuddered then and closed his eyes. "And I think I'll always be grateful for that. For some of them, anyway." Then he dredged up a tiny smile. "If Michael had seen him like that . . . it doesn't even bear thinking about.

"But here's the thing, Doc. The first thing - for all of us - was to be sure that he would survive this, and now you've told us that he will. But if you know Brian as well as you seem to think, then you know that simple survival is not going to be enough, for him."

Emmett's eyes were suddenly huge and very liquid as memory raced through him like a raging tide. "I remember the first time I ever saw him. He was away at college when I first came to the Pitts, and Michael and I became friends while he was gone. Then, when Michael found out that he was coming home, that was all he could talk about, for weeks on end. It was Brian will love this, or Brian won't want that, or Brian will do that better than anybody, so, by the time he actually arrived, I was heartily sick of hearing his name. And prepared to dislike him intensely because I figured that nobody could live up to all that hype." His smile was self-deprecating. "What the fuck did I know?

"And then . . ." he closed his eyes as if reliving the moment. "It was a Saturday morning in the spring, one of those fabulous, brilliant mornings when the whole world feels new and reborn, and he came walking into the diner with his arm slung around Michael's shoulders, and I . . . I could barely catch my breath. I never admitted it to anybody. Certainly not to him. But he knew it anyway. Brian always knew, I think. He was twenty-two years old, and he was the most beautiful thing I'd ever seen. He walked in, and it was like he lit up the room, brighter than any ray of sunlight, and everybody there just basked in it."

He sighed and took a moment to compose himself. "I need to know . . . if that Brian Kinney is going to survive. I need to know that you can . . ."

The physician did not answer immediately, choosing instead to take a seat beside a narrow window and stare out into an overcast afternoon.

"Please, Dr. Keller," Emmett continued. "I know you can't divulge confidential information, but please, can you just tell me if . . ."

"I remember too," Keller interrupted, as he watched a helicopter approaching from the South and descending toward the helipad on the roof. "That's how most people react on first meeting Brian." Abruptly, he turned away from the window and looked up to meet Emmett's gaze. "I can't fix him," he said flatly. "The damage that was done to him was . . . horrendous. All I could do - can do - is to save his life. But . . ." He smiled, but there was no joy in the expression. "Knowing Brian, I doubt he'll thank me for that, all things considered. You know, as well as I do, that 'being Brian Kinney' - in all his glory - has always been the primary focus of his existence, so . . ." He stood up then and stepped forward until he and Emmett were face to face, with no room for subterfuge between them. "While I, personally, cannot give back what they took from him, I do know someone who can."

"Meaning?" Emmett wanted to believe, wanted to hope, but dared not allow himself to accept meaningless placebos and empty platitudes.

Keller lifted one hand to rub his eyes with thumb and forefinger. "My med school graduating class was truly outstanding," he said, apparently apropos of nothing in particular. He looked back at Emmett then, and his smile was diffident. "It produced a number of brilliant physicians, including, if I say so myself, the preeminent trauma specialist in the eastern United States, and . . ."

"And?" Emmett did not know why the doctor seemed loathe to continue, but he had run out of patience.

"And the best fucking plastic surgeon in the world."

"Wow!" said Lance Mathis, observing the physician with a shrewd gaze. "Bet that hurt, didn't it?"

Keller's grin was sardonic. "You have no idea."
"So who is this genius?" demanded Emmett. "Is he here?"

"No."

"On his way, perhaps?"
The doctor sighed. "No. Not yet, anyway."

Emmett was not comforted by the note of ambiguity he heard in Keller's voice. "And why is that?"

"Because I haven't asked him ... yet."

"Because?" Emmett's friends would undoubtedly have been surprised by the relentless nature of his interrogation of the physician, but he was beyond caring.

Keller took a deep breath. "Because he's a narcissistic prick who wouldn't bother to spit on me if I was going up in flames. Because we can't stand each other, and I'd rather slit my throat than ask him for a favor. Because he'll almost certainly hang up on me when I call, after telling me in no uncertain terms to fuck off. But mostly because I haven't yet figured out how to beg piteously enough or to prostrate myself sufficiently or to manipulate the situation into such an irresistible challenge to his superiority that he'll have no choice but to agree to come."

Emmett's smile was suddenly very gentle. "Wow! You really do love him, don't you?"

Keller thought that he'd be perfectly content if everyone would just stop saying that, no matter how true it might be.

God help him! He really did love Brian Kinney, and the little fucker was going to owe him - big time - when this was all over.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"We're about thirty-five minutes from touchdown, Mr. Taylor," said Jill McCain, the flight attendant who had been seeing to his needs throughout the long wearisome flight. He had dozed fitfully from time to time, but he wondered if she had managed to sleep at all. Since she'd been constantly available whenever he'd looked around for her, he rather doubted it.

"I've prepared a light lunch for you," she explained, "although I'm sure that the time difference has you completely uncertain of what you should be eating or when. Still it's mid afternoon here, and you haven't eaten all day."

"I'm not hungry," he replied, suddenly irritated at being the center of so much attention. Then he realized that he'd spoken sharply and was instantly ashamed of himself.

"I'm sorry," he continued. "You've been nothing but kind to me, and I'm acting like a shit."

Her smile was gentle. "You're acting like a young man who wants nothing more than to get to the person he loves in his hour of need. Don't apologize."

"Don't apologize," he echoed. "My boyfriend would agree."

"Then he's a very wise man, isn't he? Now come along and eat. It's just shrimp scampi, and a tiny Banoffee Pavlova."

"A what?"
"If I understand correctly," she replied, "you were in and out of New Zealand so quickly that you never even got the chance to experience our most delectable confectionary masterpiece. And we can't have that, now can we? A Pavlova is a meringue. In this case, one that is combined with banana slices and caramel sauce. And you absolutely cannot have visited New Zealand without ever having sampled a Pavlova. It would be a national disgrace."

"I'm really . . . :

"Not hungry. I know. But perhaps you'll be so enchanted by the taste that you'll want to take a sample to your boyfriend. He might love it."

He laughed to imagine the look of horror on Brian's face on being presented with such a concoction. Then he paused to reconsider. Perhaps it was time to tempt Brian to rethink his priorities. Perhaps this . . . incident would encourage him to do so.

Always provided . . . but no. He wouldn't explore that thought, wouldn't let himself wander into that dark, dreadful realm of possibility.

Instead, he would eat. Hungry or not. To gird his strength.

The intercom buzzed discreetly. "Mr. Taylor," said the pilot's voice, "we've just been advised that an escort will be meeting you when we land. And you're not to leave the plane until they arrive."

"Escort?" Justin snapped. "What kind of escort?"

There was a tiny pause before the pilot replied. "Pittsburgh PD. A Lieutenant Horvath, I believe."

"Shit!" said Justin, rising and walking to the window to gaze out on the cloud bank below, suddenly feeling the first faint rise of panic. Horvath. So it was real; there would be no more eluding the truth.

Jill McCain looked on with sympathy. She knew virtually nothing about what was happening in this young man's life, beyond the barest bones of fact. But she knew distress when she saw it, and fear, even if he was remarkably good at concealing it.

She stood by in silence, as the young man made a quick call on the plane's sat-phone. Well trained in the practice of discretion, she carefully avoided listening to his conversation, noting only that he appeared satisfied with what he'd heard when he put the phone down.

"Can I get you something?" she asked.

"No," he started, then hesitated. "Yes. You wouldn't happen to have any cigarettes on board, would you?"

She laughed. "French, English, or American?"

So he smoked - chain-smoked - for the remainder of the trip. Brian's brand. Marlboros. And the Pavlova remained unsampled.

"I'm not a prisoner," Justin said coldly, his eyes staring out through the rear window of the squad car. "You can't hold me."

"Justin, please." Horvath pretended not to hear the note of desperation in the young man's voice, pretended not to know how terribly afraid he was. "Please try to understand me. We have no idea where the threat comes from, but we do know that it's real. Brian . . . for him to have clung to consciousness in spite of everything, just to pass on the message. It has to be real."

"I don't care. I'm not going into hiding because of some homophobic pricks that might be stalking me."

"What happened to Brian makes it a lot more than a threat, Justin. This is serious."

"I know that. Brian's lying in a hospital bed, so . . ."

"With all due respect, you don't." Horvath's certainty left no room for argument. "You haven't seen him yet. And I gotta be honest with you. I'm not sure you should. Not until he's . . . stronger."

"Stronger," said Justin flatly. "What does that mean? What is it that you don't want me to see?"

Horvath sighed. "Justin, he's . . . it was really bad. He may not want you . . . to see him this way."

"I know what to expect," Justin insisted. "Some helpful soul couldn't wait to send me the photo."

The detective winced. He too had seen the photographs that were turning up all over the internet - photographs he hoped would go unnoticed by Debbie and Brian's friends. Still, he knew that nothing would prepare Justin for the real thing. "You only think you know, Son. No photograph is going to prepare you."

Justin sat back and returned to staring out the window where a slow, iron gray rain had begun to fall. Appropriate, he thought, for the city of steel.

Horvath was still talking, but Justin's mind had begun to wander when the car came to a stop and someone slid into the passenger-side front seat.

"Justin," said the detective firmly, "I want you to meet someone - someone who is going to stick very close to you during the next few days."

The young artist looked up to stare into sable eyes that were studying him intensely, without a single spark of sexual interest. "This is Lance Mathis," Horvath continued.

"I do not need a bodyguard."

Horvath opened his mouth to respond, but Mathis beat him to the punch. "On the contrary. You do need a bodyguard, whether you want one or not."

"Yeah, well, I don't see that you get a say," Justin snapped.

Mathis smiled. "Oh, it's not me who's saying it. It's Brian Kinney. Unless you want to argue with him."

Justin turned to look at Horvath. "Who the fuck is this?" he demanded.

"Meet Brian's new chief of security." Horvath's smile was slightly venal. "And just in case you're considering throwing one of your drama queen-outs, consider this. If something happens to you on my watch, I only have to answer to my superiors - and Debbie, God help me! But if something happens to you on his watch, he'll have to answer to Brian Kinney. Would you wish that on anybody? Even your worst enemy?"

"No, but . . .."
"Why not just give it a chance?" said Mathis. "I promise to be discreet."

"Shouldn't you be protecting Brian?" Justin snapped. "Shouldn't he be at the top of your list?"

"Who says he's not?"

"Then you won't have time for me." Justin's retort was triumphant, as if he'd come up with a point that was irrefutable.

Mathis smiled. "You let me worry about that. Mr. Kinney's reach is greater than you think."

_Fuck! Walked right into that one._

Justin opened his mouth to try again, but closed it quickly when he read the determination in the security chief's eyes and realized that this was an argument he was not going to win. Even if he refused to give in and insisted on getting his way, Mathis would simply fall back just far enough to carry out his mission and avoid any direct confrontation.

He was quiet for a while, considering options. "Do you have any idea... who..." And he was amazed to find that he could not even summon up the breath to finish the sentence.

"Not yet," replied the detective. "But we're going to get them, Justin. It just takes time."

But the younger man was not reassured. "You guys said the same thing a year ago, and you still don't have any idea who planted that bomb at Babylon."

Horvath nodded, conceding the point. "However," he said slowly, "this time we're going to get some help. Some very powerful help. But that doesn't change the fact that you're at risk, and..."

"All right," Justin said abruptly, wanting to hear no more about his own need for protection. "On one condition."

"And that would be what?"

"That you take me straight to the hospital. No more of this 'he wouldn't want you to see him' bullshit. OK?"

Horvath sighed, understanding that further argument would be futile. Then he reached into his pocket and pulled out an object that was wrapped up in a handkerchief. "There's one more thing," he said softly, his voice reflecting a tiny glimmer of uncertainty. "Something that - well - that I thought you might want to return to him."

"Like what?"

It was Horvath's turn to look away, and Justin was astonished to realize that the detective was slightly embarrassed. "All of his personal effects - everything he was wearing that night, such as it was, is in police custody now. As evidence. Most of it is probably beyond salvaging anyway, and plenty is missing, I'm sure. His wallet was gone, and his watch. Which suggests that, even though this was undoubtedly a carefully planned attack, there was also an element of opportunism in it. The criminals that arranged it were only out to teach him a lesson, or to kill him in the most painful, gruesome way possible, but the thugs that carried it out weren't above stuffing their pockets with whatever extra loot they could lay their hands on. But this... they didn't touch this. Probably didn't consider it worth taking. But I remembered it. From another time, and it occurred to me that I couldn't recall ever seeing him without it. So..."
He opened the handkerchief and reached out to drop the object into Justin's hand.

Justin stared for a moment, and could not suppress the rise of tears in his eyes as he recognized the shell bracelet that Brian always wore.

For a time, there was only silence in the car, except for the sound of breath roughly drawn, as Justin fought to control a sudden, almost irresistible urge to weep. Beyond that, there was only the soft voice of the patrolman/driver as he answered a radio call.

"Thank you, Karl," Justin stammered finally. "I can't... this will mean so much..."

Horvath sighed. "Just keep it to yourself. Nobody needs to know."

Justin nodded. "If he was wearing his watch -- and that's a big IF, by the way -- it's a Patek Phillipe. He bought it to celebrate the grand opening of Kinnetic. It's engraved with his initials, and the date of the opening."

Justin spent a moment more staring down at the bracelet and tracing his fingertips across the shells before tucking it into his pocket. Then he turned to stare at Lance Mathis with cold eyes and a no-nonsense expression. "As for you, you do what you have to do, but keep your distance. OK?"

Mathis nodded. "I promise. You won't even know we're there."

Justin sighed, resigned to his fate. That was exactly what he was afraid of.

"Assuming that you're not yet ready to face the thundering herd," said Lance Mathis, "I thought we'd go in the back way. Also assuming that you have permission to see him at all, that is."

Justin nodded. "Oh, I have permission all right. Although, it wouldn't make any difference if I didn't." His eyes were suddenly hard and cold. "One way or another, I'm going in to see him. Right now."

Mathis flashed him an insolent grin. "Somehow, I think I detect the teachings of the master, don't I?"

Justin had the grace to flush. Mathis was right. In many ways, he had become more and more like Brian in the years since they'd first met - a development for which he had cause to be extremely grateful. He had always had a healthy level of self-confidence, but Brian had taught him to exercise it without apology or regret.

Not a bad legacy, he thought.

Instead of driving up to the hospital's main entrance, they took a little detour and turned, instead, into a narrow enclosed parking area, a spot reserved for medical directors and VIP staff members, where a uniformed parking attendant waved the patrol vehicle through the gate with a smart salute.

Justin got out of the car quickly, sparing no thought to his luggage that was tucked in the trunk of the patrol car, sparing no real thought for anything, except the only thing that mattered.

From this angle, there was only one visible entrance into the building, and the door was swinging open before he was half-way across the lot. Later, he would pause to wonder why he had not been surprised to recognize the man who appeared in the opening; he was, after all, a famous individual, instantly recognizable anywhere in America and especially in Pittsburgh. But, at the moment, it seemed only natural that Drew Boyd should be standing there waiting for him.
"Thanks, Cuz," said Lance Mathis, closing in behind Justin. "Anything new going on here?"

Boyd smiled. "He's still unconscious, but they just brought him back to ICU."

"And the doctor?" asked Justin.

"Waiting to see you," replied the quarterback, "and not too thrilled about it."

Justin muttered something and barreled through the door, leaving the football player to cock his head and lift one eyebrow at his cousin, obviously perplexed. "Did I hear him correctly? Did he just say, 'Tough shit'?"

Mathis grinned. "You did, and he did. So let's get a move on. This is one show I definitely don't want to miss. This is going to be the classic example of an irresistible force clashing with an immovable object, and neither one of them has a goddamned clue what they're up against. We could be on the verge of witnessing the creation of a Black Hole."

They moved up the stairs together, quickly enough to keep young Taylor in sight, but maintaining enough distance to allow them to speak without being overheard.

"He really OK?" Mathis asked, not entirely sure why he was somewhat reluctant to hear the answer. There wasn't a gay bone in his body, so he didn't know why it should matter so much, why he cared what Kinney might look like when all this was behind him.

Only - somehow - it did.

"Doctor says he'll live."

The security chief favored his cousin with an inquisitive glance. "That's not exactly what I asked, is it?"

Boyd sighed. "Jacob needed to take a piss, so I relieved him for a few minutes, and that's when they brought Kinney back into the ICU."

"And?"

"And they hadn't finished replacing all his bandages - on his face - before they moved him back into his bed."

Mathis closed his eyes for a moment. "Bad, huh?"

"Bad enough. When I think about how he looked before, I just . . ."

"What? Just what?"

Boyd took a deep breath. "I just want to kill somebody, to get my hands on one of those fuckers that did this to him and rip him apart."

Then he shook his head, and started moving more quickly up the stairs.

"What's your hurry all of a sudden?" asked Mathis.

The quarterback did not slow down. "If it hits me like that - and I barely knew the man - what do you think it's going to do to that kid?"

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
Drew Boyd was both right . . . and wrong.

Justin was about to get hit with something that no amount of warning or foreboding or experience could have prepared him for, but it was many years since he had been a kid, and the man who stepped forward to intercept him as he plunged through the rear entrance - actually a service entrance - to the Intensive Care Unit, seemed to be aware of both facts instinctively. Radiating belligerence, Justin was immediately ready to take on the world and move it, if necessary, in order to get to Brian, but Matt Keller was equally determined to stop him, and he had help.

Both Boyd and Mathis, along with a third, muscular young man who moved forward from a small alcove located within a pod of patient rooms, stepped forward to end the confrontation before it could actually happen.

"Get out of my way," Justin snarled, still struggling against the multiple sets of arms that restrained him.

Keller could not quite swallow a quick smile, regardless of the gravity of the situation. "I take it this is Justin," he said to no one in particular, noting in passing that the kid was fucking gorgeous, and realizing that he had expected no less of the individual who had managed to do what no one else had ever done in capturing the heart of Brian Kinney.

It was doubtful that Justin, totally focused on reaching his goal, knew or cared who was blocking his way. "I said, get out of . . ."

"Not," said Keller sternly, "until you listen to me."

"But I need . . ."

"Better listen up, Kid." The doctor's voice was diamond-hard and offered no quarter. "I don't give a flying fuck what you need. This is about what Brian needs. Understand me?"

Justin went very still and rigid, but he was not ready to concede defeat. "You think you know what he needs?" he demanded. "Better than me? You don't . . ."

Keller stared at the young man, struggling not to laugh in his face. So earnest. So beautiful. So confidant. And so unprepared for what he would have to endure. "Look, little shit," he said firmly. "I know you think that nobody could possibly know Brian Kinney better than you do. Because he loves you. Right? And you love him. Because you're soul mates, or some kind of romantic bullshit like that, so how could anybody possibly know him better? Right?"

Justin's eyes were huge by this time, and flashing with anger. "Right," he snapped.

"Wrong." Keller wasn't in the mood to tolerate any romantic drivel. "Because, in this one instance, you don't know him half as well as I do. I've known him longer, through more crap and trouble and shitty history than you can even imagine. And I have one more advantage that all the fucking and dick-sucking and rimming you two might have shared can't come close to."

"And what's that?" Justin's temper was growing harder to control with each passing moment.

The doctor leaned forward until he was virtually nose to nose with the love of Brian's life. "Maybe," he said softly, "you've had your dick inside him." Then he paused and realized that he wasn't even sure that much was true. "Maybe. But I've been up to my elbows in his guts, trying to put him back together and keep him from bleeding out all over the fucking floor. So right now, as much as you might think he needs you and your tender loving care, he needs me more. Which means that I'm the one who calls the shots here. Every step of the way. Until he's well enough to call them himself. So . . ."
"...are we clear on that?"

"Crystal!" snapped Justin. "Now get out of my way."

Keller shook his head and finally gave in to the smile that would no longer be denied. "God damn!" he almost laughed. "Brain Kinney, twisted around the finger of a gorgeous little twink. Who'd a thunk it?"

"I'm not a twink."

"Of course, you're not. So... do you want a full report on his condition or..."

"That depends."

"On?"

"On whether you can talk and walk at the same time."

Drew Boyd and Lance Mathis very deliberately did not look at each other as the young blond strode across the room toward a particular cubicle, as unerring as a guided missile, leaving the surgeon to pursue or not, as he chose.

In the end, with a tiny self-deprecating chuckle, he chose to give in and proceeded to provide a crisp, concise summary of Brian's condition and treatment.

But he fell silent as Justin stepped through the door and got his first glimpse of the patient. Luckily, Drew had followed and was close enough to be able to lean forward and catch the younger man as his knees buckled, and he lost his balance.

"Fuck!" he gasped, closing his eyes for a moment as he reached for composure and struggled to breathe. He had believed himself to be adequately prepared, and sufficiently girded against whatever he might see. He could not believe how wrong he'd been, for nothing could have prepared him for this. The acute awareness of his own helplessness, his own vulnerability to the cruel indifference of fate left him reeling. "Fuck!"

Matt Keller said nothing, understanding that, at such a moment, there was nothing he could say that would make any difference. But he studied Justin's face with an unexpected surge of tenderness, realizing that he had been uncertain of how he would feel about this kid; this callow young man who was - God, he could barely even credit it - the love of Brian's life. But he saw immediately that he could lay to rest the one concern that he hadn't previously dared to contemplate. Whatever else the young man might think or feel or do, whatever problems he might cause, one thing was immediately obvious: Justin Taylor loved Brian Kinney with his whole heart.

And that was enough to make everything else unimportant.

He also understood something else - that the entire population of the state of Pennsylvania could have come trooping through the ICU at that moment, and Justin would have seen, heard, or noticed nothing but the man who lay silent and still before him.

He moved forward inch by inch, his body stiff and graceless like a flawed marionette, until he was pressed against the side of the bed, his eyes huge and empty somehow.

"Brian." Just a whisper, but broken for all that. "Brian... please."

Keller was compelled to step forward then, to shrug off a strange inertia and try to offer some kind of consolation. "I don't think he can hear you."

Justin, ever perceptive, noticed the slight hesitation and raised his eyes, filled with tears he made no attempt to hide, to study the physician's face. "But you're not sure, are you?"

Keller offered a tiny, reluctant smile. "No. I'm not sure."

And Justin went back to staring down into Brian's face, of which he could see little beneath layers of fresh bandages. "Can I . . ." The young man paused to draw a trembling breath. "I want to see him. I want to see what they . . ."

"No." There was absolutely no uncertainty in Keller's immediate response. "You don't."

But Justin was not one to give up anything without a fight. "I have a right . . ."

"Don't go there." Brisk, stern, cold. "I told you before. This is about his rights. Not yours."

"But he's my . . ." He fell silent then, unable to find words that would say enough to express the need rising inside him.

"I understand," said the doctor gently, surprised - and a little annoyed - at his own desire to offer comfort to the young man. "Better than you think. But you're not ready for this. And neither is he. You're just going to have to trust me on this."

That got Justin's attention, and his eyes were suddenly ablaze with renewed determination. "And exactly why should I trust you?" he demanded. "I don't even know you, so . . ."

"No, you don't," Keller admitted. "But Brian does. He knows me, and he trusts me, and that's going to have to be enough. For now."

Finally, after a whirlwind of conflicting emotions spun through his mind, Justin was forced to concede the point. For the moment.

"Can I have a few moments with him - alone?"

The doctor hesitated, obviously doubtful.

"I promise not to rip his gown off and fuck him raw."

Keller grinned and nodded. The kid might be under control - for the moment - but he was certainly not intimidated or defeated.

"Spunky little shit, isn't he?" he muttered to Boyd as the two of them left the cubicle.

The quarterback chuckled. "Does that surprise you?"

Keller glanced back toward the two occupants of the room, remembering all that he knew of Brian Kinney. "Not in the least."

Justin didn't notice when they left; he was too wrapped up in the physical presence of the man laid out before him.

How could it have been a year since he'd seen him? How could he have stayed away for so long? Because it was what Brian wanted, was that it? That was bullshit, and he knew it. He sighed as the epiphany struck him; he'd always known it. What would he have done if . . .
He flinched as he was assaulted by a sudden, piercing pain in his core, huge and black and devastating. He had always managed to believe that Brian would always be here, waiting for him - a rock that could stand in the face of any battering, a Gibraltar that neither time nor tide could take from him, a deathless certainty. But this - this was the reality. Brian had almost died. Brian was not immune to the cruelties of fate or random chance. And what would Justin have done - how would he have lived - if Brian had not.

The realization struck him with mind-bending force. Brian could have been lost to him forever.

It was followed immediately by a second one, just as strong and just as real as the first. Being Andy Warhol would have meant nothing to him, without having Brian to share it.

Carefully, gently, in full knowledge that he must be breaking a hundred rules and not caring in the least, he lowered the railing on the side of the bed and hoisted himself up, threading his way through IV lines and plastic tubing and electronic wires until he was able to press himself against Brian's side and tuck his face into the hollow beneath that beloved jawline.

Only then did he begin to talk, to speak what was in his heart.

"Fuck this shit, Brain. Do you hear me? Because, if you do, you better fucking listen to me. Are you listening? This shit ends - now. Because guess what. I do not want to be Warhol, or Pollock, or fucking Picasso. What I want . . . is you, is us. Brian and Justin. And I know that's what you want too. Us, together. Natural and real and free. No fucking rings, no fucking ceremonies, no fucking locks on the doors, and - listen to this, because this is the really important thing - nobody's fucking business but ours. I can't believe that we both bought into the bullshit and let other people decide what was right for us? Well, no more, Brian. Nobody is ever - ever - going to pull us apart again."

With exquisite gentleness, he touched his fingertips to a tiny patch of bare skin at the base of Brian's throat. "So you better get well, and come back to me. Because I'm not leaving you again. I'm never leaving you again. No matter how hard you try to push me away. Understand? I'm - not - going."

Then he remembered the bracelet in his pocket, and he dug it out, careful to avoid jostling the motionless figure at his side.

"If you can hear me, you'll know what this is. You must be missing it; you've worn it as long as I've known you. So here. Let me just put it on you."

He eased the blanket down to expose Brian's arm and fastened the bracelet around his right wrist, taking great care to do so gently. "This is me," he whispered, "holding your hand. Holding you close to me. Binding us to each other. I will never again be further from you than this."

He adjusted the bracelet to his satisfaction before pulling the blanket back up and tucking it close against the faintly metallic chill in the air. Then he touched his lips to the small patch of skin behind Brian's ear. "I love you," he whispered, unable and unwilling to control the tears welling in his eyes. "More than my life, more than anything, and I can't, I won't live without you any more. Don't you leave me, Brian. Please. Come back to me."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
tbc
Chapter 16

A slate gray sea. Everywhere. Only . . . it wasn't really wet. But it was cold and slick against his skin. Except . . . it wasn't really his skin. There was something in the way, something between his skin and the water that wasn't - quite - water. And the water was not quite as silent as it should have been.

There were strange sounds, that might have been of the sea, but weren't. He wasn't sure how he knew that, or even that he knew it at all. How, after all, could he say for sure, when he had to concede that he didn't know anything - for sure.

He wanted to open his eyes, to see if everything was as gray as he thought it was. Only he wasn't really sure why he thought it was gray since he could see nothing but darkness.

Thus he did not know if his eyes were already open and seeing only a darkness that was everywhere, that had consumed everything. Or if his eyes were closed, and the darkness was confined to his own thoughts, his own mind.

And in the end, did it really matter?

He was floating; of that much, he was reasonably sure. But on what, or in what he could not say.

In fact he could not say much of anything, except that he understood, in a primal way, that to stay here, to remain in this darkness and perpetual emptiness was to turn away from everything in his life that he'd ever cared about; it was to surrender, to give up, to concede defeat. There was no rational thought process involved in knowing this: rational thought processes were not accessible in this dark abyss. But he knew it just the same. So, something insisted, he should struggle; he should reach . . .

But something else inside him knew better - knew what lay there waiting for him, daring him to try.

Here, all was dark and empty . . . and safe. Here, there would be no more pain, no more despair, no more wanting what he could never have. Here was the absence of all the old, familiar hurts that had lived in his heart for as long as he could remember.

Here . . . was peace. The end of striving for what he could never touch, the end of needing, the end, he supposed, of all things.

Except for the cold. There would, apparently, be no end to that.

Was this, then, the true definition of hell? Not the raging flames or the blistering heat or the eternal molten corruption of flesh and bone, as propounded by the old fundamentalist preachers and the Bible thumpers, after all, but the exact opposite - the relentless cold of being completely, irrevocably, eternally alone, untouched and untouchable.

He had spent his entire life trying to touch someone, trying to find the right someone to touch, only to find himself, ultimately, alone.

Time, perhaps, to accept what he could not change. A memory stirred, words spoken by him? To him?

He couldn't remember the circumstances, but he remembered the words.

"That's how we all came in. That's how we're all going out."
Alone. Did anything in between the two extremes really matter at all?

He decided that he didn’t want to know.

In fact, he wanted not to know. Anything. Ever again.

Only . . . he was really, really tired of the cold, and found, to his own amusement, that he had a sudden overwhelming need to feel the warmth, just once more. For just one moment. But, in order to touch that warmth, to put aside the bitter frost, even for that micro-burst of time, he would have to navigate back through all the barriers and the darkness and the monsters that inhabited the night.

The pain. He had endured it when he had to, had withstood it long enough to do what he knew he must, to put up the only wall that mattered, the one that would protect what must be protected at all costs.

But now, could he really bring himself to step back into that tempest, to open himself up again, to feel again?

No, he . . .

"You back again?" The voice was close, almost in his ear, and he didn't even pause to think about the whys and wherefores. He simply opened his eyes.

"Aren't you tired of hanging around in a place you don't want to be?"

The cold was still there, as bitter and biting as before, but the face looking back at him was warm and pleasant and wreathed with a smile. Vic Grassi hadn't aged at all since the last time they'd seen each other, but then . . . he wouldn't, would he? Not in this place.

"Not my choice," he answered, and wondered why his face felt so stiff, as if cast in stone.

"Yeah. Sucks, doesn't it?"

He thought he nodded, but he wasn’t entirely sure. "So," he said softly, "did I really do it this time? Am I . . ."

"Not yet." Vic's smile was exactly what one would expect from the old queen, smug and slightly sardonic. "But it's still do-able, if you decide that's what you want."

Brian felt his breath catch in his throat. "Why . . . why would I want that?"

Vic's eyes were suddenly very gentle. "Because you're tired of all the bullshit, Kiddo. And you're tired of being alone."

"I've never been alone."

Vic didn't bother to argue; he just let the sadness in his eyes speak for him.

Brian thought about it - thought about what he remembered of what had happened to him and felt something old and primal shift within his consciousness. "But I will be . . . now. Won't I?"

The older man smiled. "Who is Brian Kinney? Isn't that the real question?"

"Not who he was before." The answer was harsh, guttural, bitter.

"Maybe," said Vic, "but maybe that's good thing."
To his own surprise, Brian dredged up a smile, and was instantly conscious of the tightness in his face and the pull of muscles too long unused. "What? Some kind of poetic justice? Beauty . . . and the beast?"

"The person you were," Vic replied slowly, "is still there. Inside you."

The smile grew wider. "Nobody ever gave a shit about what might be inside me, Vic. It was only what was on the surface that they wanted."

The older man shrugged. "Some of them, maybe. Are those the ones you really care about?"

And it was suddenly too much. Brian found that he didn't want to see any more, hear any more, feel any more. So he closed his eyes.

But Vic was persistent, if nothing else. "So that's it? You're just going to walk away. What about him?"

The sigh seemed to rise from the very bottom of his soul. "It's the best gift I can give him."

Vic was silent for a while, and Brian dared to hope he might have given up and gone looking for fresher, rarer game. But no such luck.

"If you choose to leave him behind, he'll find a way to go on. You're right about that much. He's learned everything you ever tried to teach him. He's strong and bright and as beautiful in his way as you are in yours. But if you go, make no mistake about it. You take his heart with you. He'll never love again, Brian. Never. Is that what you want for him? Is it . . ."

"Better not to love at all, than to be locked up in a cage, behind bars of pity and duty - and commitment." He pronounced the word as if it were the vilest curse. "Because of some dumb notion that he owes me his life because I'm damaged."

"Did you?"

Unable to resist trying to fathom the strange tone in the older man's voice, Brian opened his eyes again to confront his nemesis. "Did I what?"

"Did you take him in, take care of him, watch out for him . . . did you owe him your life, because he was damaged? Because he was too weak or foolish or stupid to fend for himself?"

"No, but . . ."

"So what makes you think . . ."

"Because he did it before." The words came swiftly, without forethought, and it was only after they were spoken that he realized how true they were, how much he had always believed them, even if he'd never quite dared to confront the issue. His voice sank to a whisper. "And I - shit - I let him do it. Because I was too weak to fight him off, to stand up and make him understand that I could manage on my own."

The older man's smile turned venal. "Oh, that's right. The great and powerful Kinney can handle anything, can't he? All by himself. Even cancer." Then he sighed. "Jesus, Brian! Don't you understand that nobody - nobody - should have to endure something like that alone? Once in a while, we all need somebody. Even you."

Brian looked away. "Yeah, well, considering how I've lived my life, I think it would be pretty fucking stupid to expect anybody to be there for me."

Vic reached out and laid a hand on the younger man's shoulder. "Why? Because you think you've never been there for them? Is that really what you think?"

Brian didn't offer an answer - just a look that spoke volumes about truth as he perceived it.

"So . . . you want to watch them while they grieve over you? That can be arranged, you know. The laws of physics don't apply here. Only metaphysics." Vic grinned, obviously pleased with his pun. "You can pretty much do anything you . . ."

"No." Not even a tiny little nuance of uncertainty. "I don't want to see."

"You sure? Not even for old time's sake? One last look . . . at his face?"

"No. I just want . . ."

"To be left alone." The old man sighed. "Forever is longer than you can imagine, Brian."

The smile came then, bittersweet and haunted. "It's only time."

For a while, silence reigned. And the cold, of course. And Brian, settling once more into the chill of night, thought that maybe he should ask Vic; maybe Vic would know if it would just continue to get colder and darker. Maybe . . .

"He's here, you know."

Though Vic was speaking softly, the effect was like a shout in the stillness around them.

"Who's here?" Not bothering to open his eyes and hoping that failing to do so would encourage the other man to wander off in search of a new target.

A tiny little snicker of sound told him that he was shit out of luck.

"Justin. He's here."

"Fuck!" Hazel eyes were suddenly wide, and seeing entirely too much.

'Sorry, but that's one thing you can't do. Not right now anyway."

"Fuck!" His mind was reeling, trying not to remember, trying not to know why it mattered so much, why it was so vital that Justin not be here. "I asked them to do one little one thing. Just one fucking thing, and they can't even do that right."

Then he paused and his eyes filled with suspicion. "How the fuck do you know he's here?"

"I know," answered Vic, "because you know."

"Me? How do I . . ."

"Close your eyes, and reach out with your mind. Concentrate. You've been too busy blocking the signals your body is trying to send you to let yourself notice."

Brian's face twisted into a snarl. "That's because the signals from my fucking body hurt like a motherfucker."
"I know. But that's the only way. Concentrate on your right hand. Just that one little area, so it won't be too . . . unbearable. Just let it come to you."

"Easy for you to say," Brian grumbled. "You're dead, so nothing can ever hurt you again."

He ignored the quick smile he saw on the older man's face.

Fuck! If Justin was really here, if the pricks had let him come despite the extreme measures Brian had taken to keep him away, then somebody was going to pay - and pay dearly - once he was strong enough to . . .

"So," the voice was not - quite - laughing at him, seeming to come to him now from a distance. "I guess this means you won't be keeping me company any longer."

Fuck!

But there was no resisting any further. Except for one tiny question that still needed an answer.

"You're not . . . really here," he called out, no longer able to see the figure he was addressing. "Are you?"

The fact that no response was forthcoming told him all he needed to know.

Concentrate on just the hand, huh? Think about moving just the one finger, just one . . .

Oh, fuck, that hurt like a son of a bitch!

But beyond the hurt there was - just barely - the faintest trace of warmth, of tender fingers stroking, touching, and a voice - gentle on the surface, but not so gentle underneath. Rough and uneven, driven by strong emotions that were not composed only of sweetness and light. There was anger there as well, grim and struggling with fear and need.

"Don't you leave me, Brian. Please. Come back to me."

Fuck!

He knew there was no resisting it now.

So he reached, and, for the barest fraction of a moment, he felt it - the warmth, the solidity, the sweet breath of life. Then the pain hit, and he reeled back, knowing that he could not touch the one without enduring the other. So he let go, sinking back into the bliss of nothingness, of no pain, but . . . not forever. It was inevitable now; he could not let himself take the easy way out, could not embrace forgetfulness.

Could not endure the cold.

He would wait, because he had no choice; his body had betrayed him by leaving him too weak, at this moment, to resist the sweet seduction of limbo. But he would heal. Quickly.

He knew it was futile, knew he would not be heard, but found that he could not resist the urge to try to speak, to transmit the thought that sang in his mind.

"Wait for me, Sunshine. I'll be back."

Then he managed a mental smile, as consciousness faded. No choice any more. He would be back. Like the Terminator, and he planned to more than live up to the name when he returned. His friends
By the time Nurse Beck bustled into the room, Justin had disentangled himself from the plethora of tubes, wires, and sundries attached to Brian's body and settled on the physician's stool beside the bed, reluctantly relinquishing his full-length body contact in favor of clasping Brian's right hand. And he was smiling, brightly enough that the nurse - jaded by too many years of watching people in dire moments, sometimes at their worst and other times at their best - was slightly taken aback. She wanted to be intensely annoyed at the boy and his temerity - he was, after all, where he absolutely should not be - but she couldn't quite reach the level of irritation that should have come so easily.

"What are you doing in here?" she asked, less gruffly than she'd intended.

"Dr. Keller brought me in."

She glared. "Yes, well, Dr. Keller has a tendency to ignore the rules, when it suits him. But I . . . what are you smiling at?" She hadn't intended to ask that, but found herself completely unable to resist when his smile had broadened into a grin.

Justin, to her chagrin, appeared completely immune to her tone of voice and the level of impatience it should have conveyed. "He smiled at me," he answered, never looking away from the patient's face, "and he squeezed my hand."

"How the hell could you tell?" she demanded, examining Brian's bandages to make sure they were still in place and doing the job they were meant to do.

But Justin was not in the mood for pragmatism. "I just know."

Beck glanced quickly at the various indicators that measured every aspect of the patient's physical condition, and found them showing pretty much the same thing they'd been showing since he'd been brought in after his first surgery. The patient was unconscious, albeit no longer comatose.

She wanted to be abrupt and stoic, so it surprised her when her voice and manner took on an unexpected gentleness. "Honey, I know you want to believe that, but . . ."

Justin didn't bother hearing her out. "I know what I know," he said.

Thinking that she should disabuse him of his flight of fancy, she opened her mouth to do exactly that but realized, suddenly, that there was no harm in allowing him to indulge in his little daydream. If it gave him hope, what did it matter that it was all a figment of his imagination?

"Beck!"

There was nothing remotely gentle or diffident in Matt Keller's voice as he barked her name.

"Yes, Doctor?"

He barreled into the room, exuding his characteristic aura of barely-controlled energy, before coming to an abrupt halt.

"What the fuck is he doing in here?" he demanded, barely looking up from his perusal of a printout in the bulging chart he held in his hands.
"He says you let him in," she replied calmly.

"Oh. Yeah. Right. But ... get him out of here. I need to ..."

"I'm going," interrupted Justin, still totally focused on the patient, leaning forward and touching his lips to a patch of bare skin below Brian's bicep. Oddly, though both the physician and the nurse were completely focused on their respective tasks, both paused and watched in complete silence, frozen in place and not understanding why. Then the moment was past, and Justin stood and walked out of the room.

"Shit!" That was Keller, and it elicited a quizzical stare from the woman who had become his most trusted assistant during his tour of duty at Allegheny General.

"What?" she asked.

"Nothing," he said quickly, determined not to display the upsurge of tenderness that was rising inside him. "Just . . ."

Beck didn't smile often, but when she did, her face was filled with warmth and understanding. "Yes," she said softly. "I know."

He closed his eyes for a moment, pinching the bridge of his nose to ward off the headache that was threatening to engulf him. "Did you find him?"

She managed - barely - not to roll her eyes. "Finding him wasn't the problem."

"So what did he say?"

"Before or after the 'Tell Keller to fuck off' part of the conversation?"

He flashed her a roguish grin. "Since I'm hoping that wasn't the end of it, let's say after."

"You should be careful what you wish for," she replied. "After that rather rude remark, he continued - and this is a direct quote - 'Never mind. I'll tell the motherfucker myself. Tonight. He should wait for my call.' Then he hung up on me."

Keller moved to the side of the bed, and spent a moment gazing down at his patient, looking in vain for any signs of consciousness returning. "Wake up, Fucker!" he whispered. "If you only knew what I'm going to put up with - for your sake - you'd be on your knees giving me a blow job as we speak."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

So far, he had been really lucky, he thought, as he quickly made his way toward the elevator just down the hall from the ICU waiting room. Now, if his luck would only hold for . . .

"Justin!" It was as much a screech as a shout. "Where the fuck do you think you're going?"

Not lucky enough.

If anyone else had noticed him, he might still have managed to steal away, if he was fast enough and sneaky enough.

But with Debbie?
"Hey, Deb," he managed to gasp as he found himself wrapped tight in her embrace. "Sorry, I didn't see you there."

"Of course, you didn't," said Michael with a grin, stepping up to lay a gentle hand on the young man's shoulder, brown eyes meeting blue and saying more about shared concerns and mutual understanding than any words could have conveyed.

"Where else would we be?" demanded Debbie as she stepped away to get a better look at him.

"Christ, Sunshine. You look like shit."

He shrugged. "I did just fly half way around the world, you know. Literally. So I'm a little jet-lagged."

"Right," she crowed. "Tahiti, huh? That Steven is really something, isn't he? What was it like? Did he come with you? How'd you get here so fast? When are you going back? Where is . . ."

Justin took a deep breath and rattled off his response. "Not Tahiti. New Zealand, Yes, he is something. It was great - what little I saw of it. No, he didn't. I came on a private jet, a Gulfstream. And I'm not."

"Not what?"

He sighed, not eager to have this discussion but knowing that Debbie would not just drop it, no matter how reluctant he was. "Not going back. Now, if you don't mind, I'm a little tired, and . . ."

"Well," she interrupted, not particularly pleased with what she heard in his voice or saw in his eyes, but knowing better than to make an issue of it now, "you shouldn't have hurried. You won't be allowed to see him anyway. Not until . . ."

"I already did," he interrupted.

"You already did . . . what?" she demanded.

"See him."

Debbie's eyes were huge, as were those of some others in the group. "Well, how the fuck did you manage that? Some of us are still waiting to get our first look at him."

The blonde answered her with a wink. "Just lucky, I guess."

The look on her face said clearly that she didn't believe a word of it, but couldn't figure out how to get the answer she really wanted. With good reason, Debbie considered herself a master at extracting information from the members of her extended family, but had learned, long ago, that both Brian and Justin were immune to her methods, when they chose to be.

"So, how does he look?" she asked.

The only answer he offered was a half shrug.

Instead he looked around, dredging up a gentle smile for Ben and Lindsey, and a cool nod for Ted and Melanie and he couldn't remember the name of the guy who was sitting across from Ben - a guy who lived near the Novotny-Bruckners, he thought, but he couldn't quite place him. Then he realized that he didn't much care. The sight of the man's face - long and pale and vaguely bovine - conjured old memories that he didn't care to examine, like the one of a smug voice observing, "Of course he went to Australia, since he's already slept with everyone on this continent."

And yet here the man sat, obviously pleased to be included in the group, as if he had a right to be here among those whose hearts were tied irrevocably to the fate of the man lying unconscious within the ICU, even if they didn't all realize it.

And then Justin realized that it wasn't so much the memory of the man's snarkiness that disturbed him; it was rather the fact that no one who had been there to hear the remark had bothered to offer a single word in Brian's defense, despite the fact that it was only due to Brian's generosity that the fundraiser had been possible at all, and he was struck with a dawning recognition of how often such things had happened, and how many times Brian's so-called friends - himself included - had just accepted whatever comments petty little cretins chose to make without ever once speaking out.

Some friends we are. Even though the very idea of Brian wanting or needing anyone to defend him was ludicrous.

Sensing that he was being watched, Justin looked around, and found himself the object of scrutiny by a pair of shrewd, knowing eyes, and realized immediately that his thoughts were being monitored and approved.

Cynthia was studying his face from her spot in the far corner of the room, late afternoon sunlight catching in the curls piled atop her head. The hairstyle was a dead give-away. She only swept her hair up and pinned it when she didn't have any time to spend fussing with it. Obviously, she had been a very busy young woman, and Justin knew he had cause to be enormously grateful for her efficiency, her intelligence, and her dedication to her employer. She smiled a greeting for him, but did not break off her conversation with the well-built, casually-dressed young black man at her side, who was speaking softly to her, while Lance Mathis and Drew Boyd stood relaxed and at ease nearby, obviously following every word and occasionally nodding their agreement.

Justin would speak to her later, but that could wait. It wasn't Cynthia, after all, who had the answers he needed. It wasn't Cynthia who had been there, had seen it all go down, had witnessed what had been done to Brian. It was Emmett who had experienced all that; thus, it was Emmett he needed to see. And, judging by the look of dread on that young man's face as he turned to face Justin, he knew it perfectly well.

He had been standing at the window, staring out into the rapidly falling twilight, before turning to smile a weary welcome to the new arrival, and Justin felt his breath catch in his throat as he realized that he was seeing something unprecedented in his friend's eyes, something that spoke of things known that could never again be unknown - of innocence irrevocably lost.

When Michael would have pulled him aside, obviously wanting to tap into the intimate understanding that only Brian's closest friends could attain together, Justin favored him with a gentle smile, but pushed past him. He knew what Michael wanted and needed, and he hoped that he would be able to provide it in time. But not now. What he needed now, he needed from someone else, and it was something that he knew Michael would not be able to tolerate.

"Welcome home, Baby," said Emmett as he enfolded Justin in a warm embrace. "Can't tell you how good it is to see you, except . . ."

"Except what?" Justin replied, content to rest briefly within the circle of his friend's arms.

"Except," said Emmett, allowing just a trace of disapproval to taint his words, "that he didn't want you here. The fact that he managed to remain conscious to say that . . ."
"Did you really think I'd stay away?" Justin understood that Emmett felt that he had failed to accomplish the mission that Brian had set for him, but he also needed to make it clear that neither of the co-conspirators should have appropriated the right to make decisions for Justin.

"What I thought," Emmett replied, without a note of apology, "was that maybe you wouldn't find out, until . . ."

"Until what? Until it was all over? Until the danger was past? Until what?"

"Justin, I . . ."

But Justin was not going to back down on this; it mattered too much. For this time, of course, but also for any other times that might arise in the future. He needed to make himself perfectly clear.

"I know you felt that you had to do as he asked," he said softly. "I really do understand that. But you need to understand this. If I . . . if he had . . ." To his intense annoyance, he found that he couldn't bring himself to say the words. "If I'd been too late, I would never have forgiven you. Any of you. Can you understand that?"

But he was not the only one who was determined to be understood. "If it kept you safe - the way he wanted - then I'd have learned to deal with it. You could hate me for it, but, at least, you'd still be alive, to remember him. To mourn for him."

"Emmett, I . . ."

"No, Justin." Emmett's eyes were dark with shadows that would remain with him for the rest of his life. "You don't know - can't know - how hard he fought, how much it meant to him. As glad as I am to see you, and as much as I know you want to be here, there's still a part of me that just wants to beat the snot out of you for ignoring his wishes." He paused then, and tried to swallow around the huge knot in his throat. "You can't imagine what he went through to try to keep you safe."

Justin simply stared for a moment, realizing that the room around them had gone silent as everyone tried to listen in on their conversation. "No," he agreed finally, "I can't. But you're going to tell me."

"No, I . . ."

"Emmett." Justin waited, watching as his big Nellie-bottom friend almost cringed away from the idea of talking about what he'd seen, what Brian had endured. "Emmett, you . . ."

"I can't, Justin. I just . . ."

"Listen to me, Emmett. Are you listening?"

For a tiny moment, something flickered in Emmett's dark eyes, a reflection of gentle memory. "Yes. I'm listening."

"If he endured it for me," Justin whispered, "then I can endure it for him. Don't you see, Em. He had to watch what happened to me, had to kneel at my side while I lay there on the cold cement, suspended between life and death, had to sit there, helpless and lost and scared, not knowing if each breath would be my last. And to this day, he still has nightmares about it. I know he does, even though he's never said it. Now, if he could stand it, so can I. So you're going to tell me." Then he looked around, reading the looks on the faces of his friends and the intense interest in the faces of those who were not his friends. "But not here," he said quickly. "Let's take a walk. I need a cigarette anyway."
Emmett summoned up a sardonic smile. "Another graduate of Father Kinney's school for wayward boys."

There was a faint snicker of laughter from somewhere in the room, but it definitely did not come from Justin. "Why do you do that?" he said firmly, clearly. "Why do you all do that? You all blame him for every bad habit I have. What am I - some kind of mindless brat who can't be held responsible for any choice he makes, who can't think for himself? In case you've forgotten, I was smoking the first time we ever met. And, just so you know, just so you all know, everything I ever learned that helped me grow into the man I wanted to be - every lesson that mattered - I learned from Brian Kinney."

He turned then to head for the door, pulling Emmett with him and waving Michael off when he looked as if he wanted to accompany them. But he paused at the entrance and looked back at the circle of faces that were regarding him with huge, shadowed eyes. "You know what? You should all take some time to stop and think about it, and ask yourselves what lessons he might have taught you. You might be surprised."

Then he was gone, Emmett at his side and the young black man who'd been talking to Cynthia trailing behind them, eyes moving constantly, sweeping in a continuous arc to cover every angle of approach. Drew Boyd and Lance Mathis stood together, watching them go, appearing satisfied with the circumstances, but Cynthia, from her spot near the corner, was less sanguine. "You sure about this?" she said softly, looking up to meet the security chief's eyes.

"Yeah. I'm sure."

She pursed her lips and studied his face with narrowed eyes. "For your sake," she replied, "you better be right."

"You trying to scare me, Princess?" asked Mathis, biting his lip to keep from smiling.

But she wasn't kidding, and her expression told him he'd better be listening. "Scare you? Why would I do that? You're certainly smart enough to figure it out for yourself."

"Figure what out?"

Then she smiled, but it was not the least bit comforting. "What your life would be worth if something should happen to that kid on your watch. You know the old saying about the fury of a woman scorned? Well, remember this. No shrew that ever lived could hold a candle to Brian Kinney in a rage."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

When the elevator doors opened to admit Justin and Emmett, they came face to face with a slender young man with dirty blonde hair and a narrow face, whom Justin did not immediately recognize. Hunter Novotny-Bruckner had changed quite a lot in the year since Justin had moved to the city. He was taller and brawnier; his skin was no longer deathly pale, and his face had filled out, eliminating the hollow gauntness leftover from the days when he had been forced to live on the streets and barter his body to survive. His eyes were different too, no longer filled with shadows of desperation and a cynical disregard for all the things in life he had been denied.

Justin greeted him with a nod. Despite their shared youth, they had never been close, since they'd had nothing else in common. Justin, despite his final alienation from his father and the entire Taylor side of his family tree, had lived a life of privilege prior to his coming out, while Hunter had known nothing but hardship and betrayal from the time of his birth until stumbling into the opportunity of a lifetime with Michael and Ben. Thus, Justin assumed at this time, that he had nothing to say which might interest the younger man. So he simply stood aside and waited for Hunter to make his exit from the elevator, but it was quickly obvious that Hunter had a different idea. After studying Justin's face during an awkward moment of silence, he turned to focus on Emmett's; then he moved further back into the elevator car to allow them room to enter with their discreet shadow bringing up the rear.

"Aren't you . . ." Justin began.

"I'm going with you," the boy replied, in a tone that seemed to leave no room for debate.

"I don't think that's a good idea," said Emmett quickly. "Justin and I have some things that . . ."

He did not bother to complete his statement, but his eyes were filled with anguish, and Justin finally nodded his agreement, although he wasn't sure why he felt compelled to do so.

The four rode in silence for a while, as the car descended, but Emmett was still perturbed by the idea of having to speak of what he knew to even one young man - much less two.

"Hunter," he said gently, watching the numbers flit by on the floor indicator, "I think you should turn around and go back up. Ben and Michael will be so glad to see you. Since you started spending so much time in Penn Hills - with Natalie's family - they don't see as much of you as they'd like, and I'm sure . . ."

"Emmett, please," said the young man, raising a hand to stop the flow of words. "I really need this."

But Emmett was not going to be so easily persuaded. "Why? Why would you need this? I understand, if only barely, why Justin might feel the need to hear all the gory details, from some perverted sense of indebtedness. But you don't really even know Brian, so why would you . . ."

"But I need to know him, to understand the man he is, so I can . . ."

Though the words were addressed to Emmett, it was Justin who was struck with a sudden epiphany. "So you can move past him," he said softly, sympathetically.

The boy nodded.

But Emmett was still confused. "Hold it! Just hold on here. Why would you give a shit - beyond the fact that he's like a brother to one of your dads - what Brian Kinney is really like, or how he dealt with what was done to him? You're not even gay."

Hunter took a deep breath, as if preparing to confess something horrible, something unspeakable. "It's not that simple," he said very softly. "Yeah, after I was able to put an end to my life as a hustler . . ." He paused and flushed, took a deep breath and seemed to summon up a new resolve before he started again. "As a whore, I found out that I really didn't enjoy taking it up the ass. That it was pussy I wanted. And I looked back on every one of my tricks, and hated them for using me and hated myself for letting them do it, for selling myself so cheap and telling myself that it was something I wanted. Something I enjoyed.

"But I never did enjoy it. I was just fooling myself, because I knew I didn't have any other choices. I never once met a man that I really wanted. Not until . . ."
Emmett's eyes were suddenly huge, and dark with understanding. "Until Brian," he said gently.

The boy nodded. "Until Brian. He was so beautiful, so perfect, and so much more than all those bastards who used me and then threw me away, like yesterday's garbage. He refused to use me, to take what I was so eager to give him. For the first time in my life, I really wanted a man, and he wouldn't even give me the time of day. Until all that shit with the cop. I let myself get fucked by a murderer and swiped the condom full of his jizz, and I did it for one reason. I didn't give a shit about Jason Kemp or justice or any of that shit. I just wanted Brian to see me - really see me. Not as this pesky kid who kept hanging around; not as Michael and Ben's stray foundling. But as Hunter, as a person who wanted him, and who was worth wanting."

"But he didn't," said Justin, remembering what it was like to want Brian so badly and realize that the desire was futile.

Hunter shrugged. "Not the way I wanted. But that night, when he took me back home, he tried to stick up for me when Michael and Ben went ballistic. And I realized something in the middle of that whole fucked up mess. Ben and Michael loved me; that went without saying. But Brian - somehow - understood me, and tried, in his own strange way, to defend me. That was something no one had ever done for me. I didn't know how to feel or what to think, and I never got a chance to figure it out.

"I never got the chance to get to know him, and I see now that it was something I needed to do. To understand him, and how he looked at life, how he was able to accept things that would have destroyed anybody else, and how he was able to see through my big act and accept me, without judging me."

"But you moved on," Emmett pointed out. "You're doing well in school, well on your way to becoming the next F. Lee Bailey, according to Michael. And you're with Natalie now." He looked over at Justin. "And she's really lovely, Sunshine. They're adorable together, just you wait and see."

Hunter smiled. "Yes. She really is. But I just feel . . ."

"Like you have unfinished business with Brian?" That was Justin, not quite sure how he felt about Hunter harboring feelings for Brian, but knowing in his heart that the younger man was not a threat. In fact, he realized that he believed - had believed for a long time - that there were no threats to jeopardize his place in Brian's heart.

The younger man smiled. "It may be silly, but I feel like I need to get to know him and to tell him how much it meant to me. How much it still means to me. And how sorry I am about all the shit that came after. Because I never let myself forget what he did for us, for me, what he was willing to give up to help Michael protect me. Even if everybody else did forget it."

By this time, they had reached the lobby, and their silent escort gestured toward a courtyard off to the left, a quiet, shady place with free-form benches arranged around a quiet reflecting pool and only one exterior entrance - ideal for security purposes.

It was a perfect spot for their discussion, as it was currently deserted, and filled with shadows - a place where they could speak freely and not worry about being interrupted or overheard.

Emmett chose his position carefully, opting for a shadowed nook with the only light source behind him. Justin and Hunter took their places side by side in front of him, as their bodyguard blended into the gloom near the exterior doorway.

When Emmett began to talk, his voice very soft, almost monotone in his effort to say everything that needed saying without breaking down into emotional excess, it was as if the three of them were enclosed inside a sphere of silence, where no sound could penetrate from beyond the circle as the rest of the world fell away into shadow and timeless stillness. It was not a magical time, not an occasion for joy or fulfillment or enlightenment. Instead, it was dark and frightening and filled with regret and remorse, and none of them would walk away from it unchanged.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Matt Keller had intended to spend the evening in his tiny little cubicle, dozing when he could, or playing Tetris, perhaps, which somehow helped him to focus his mind and order his thoughts. Maybe he would have phoned for Thai take-out - a fondness he had developed in the company of one Brian Kinney - or, in desperation, tackled the Times crossword puzzle. Anything - anything at all - to keep from watching the clock and trying to figure out what he would do if Rick Turnage refused to be persuaded to work his magic on Keller's VIP - very important patient.

But he had quickly realized that he could not bear to sit still and just wait, so he had gone for a walk, strolling around the park that was situated down the street from the hospital, his cell phone tucked into his pocket. He needed to clear his mind of all the extraneous crap that seemed to accumulate there every day and concentrate on how to do his best for his patient - and his patients. It wasn't, after all, as if he only had one.

As he walked, he forced himself to think about the others: the five-year-old boy with severe abdominal damage inflicted by his psychotic mother wielding a meat cleaver in her determination to cut the devil out of his body; the twenty-one year old soccer player struck by a car and sent plunging through a plate glass window; the autistic teen-aged girl suffering from severe congestive heart failure resulting from a genetic defect; the young black woman with multiple skull fractures inflicted in a beating administered by a jealous boyfriend.

And those were only the most critical of the group for which he was responsible.

And Brian Kinney, of course, who had been as badly injured as any of the others, but appeared to have pulled back toward life before reaching the point of no return. Physically, at least. Mentally and emotionally - well, that might prove to be a different matter altogether. He believed in Brian - in his strength and his courage and his ability to survive whatever life might throw at him, but this . . . this was not going to be a walk in the park, by anyone's definition.

Matt walked and smoked - another habit he usually blamed on Brian Kinney, although, in his more honest, lucid moments, he admitted to himself that it was something he would almost certainly have resorted to on his own, as a result of the extreme stress he endured in the practice of his profession.

A glance at his watch revealed that it was later than he'd thought - past time for Turnage to have called. So he would return to the hospital, and make the call himself, if he could only figure out what to say.

As he left the park, he looked up, and paused, transfixed by the image that caught his eye. In a small square located at the center of the major intersection across from the park entrance, a small sign was situated in such a way that it caught the attention of everyone who passed by, either walking or in a car. Low floodlights focused on the image, and every line, every angle in the arrangement led the eye of any observer to the center of the display.

It was ingenious. It was also indisputably the work of one Brian Kinney, another confirmation, as if any were needed, of how well the man knew his business.
The image was of a small child strapped onto a gurney being bundled toward a waiting medical helicopter, small arms reaching back for someone left behind. The caption was simple. "Is this how you'd want to say good-bye?"

Beneath the image, the sub-text was stark and black. "Your donation makes sure Allegheny General is all he'll ever need."

Shit! The man was a fucking genius. Every parent/grandparent/godparent or foster parent within a hundred miles had dug deep to pony up funding for the new transplant clinic the hospital was trying to build as a direct result of this advertising campaign.

Keller sighed and turned toward the hospital, his mind still focused on the ad campaign and the power of the photograph. He froze in mid-stride. The power of the photograph.

He was smiling when he resumed walking, when his cell phone rang.

"Keller."

"Where the hell are you?" That was Beck, tactful as always. "I've been paging for ten minutes."

"I needed some air."

"Since when does cigarette smoke count as air?"

"Yeah, well . . ."

"Never mind. I thought you might like to know."

"Know what?"

"That someone - some very special someone - seems to be waking up."

"Fuck me. I'll be right there."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The waiting room was almost empty by that time, visiting hours having ended over an hour earlier. After Justin, Emmett, and Hunter had returned from their little expedition - solemn and pensive and subdued - the extended family, two by two, had trouped into the ICU and stood looking down at Brian's bandaged face and studying the monitors that surrounded him, hoping that the indicators blinking in green were all signs of good news. To everyone's surprise, Justin had gestured for Hunter to accompany him as he'd stepped forward to be first in line, and the two had spent several minutes within the inner sanctum, speaking to Brian and to each other and sharing things they never bothered to disclose to anyone else, not even Ben or Michael. The rest had waited impatiently for their turns, but no one had quite dared to voice their irritation when the young men lingered, ignoring the fact that the minutes were ticking away. When they'd finally made their exit, the others had divided the time remaining between them, all speaking to the patient in soft, muted voices and taking advantage of the opportunity to touch him - his hands or his hair or any bare spot of skin they could find. Debbie and Michael had each touched his forehead with their lips. Lindsey had lifted his hand and dropped a kiss on his fingertips while Melanie looked on in silence, and Emmett had spent a couple of minutes whispering in his ear.

Then they had all said their good nights, and Justin and Emmett had gone off together, with a new security guard accompanying them under orders to drive them to the destination of their choice and remain there to watch over Justin until his relief arrived. Ben and Michael had also departed, with Hunter and Debbie in tow, and Theodore, Lindsey, and Melanie in their wake.

It had been a long day.

In the end, only Cynthia remained in the waiting room, filling out a new set of insurance forms and waiting to speak with Matt Keller, providing he returned to the hospital before she decided to retire. In addition, Lance Mathis was still somewhere around, and one of his hired guns was standing guard near the ICU entrance while another prowled the halls.

Cynthia was grateful to notice that Mathis was taking no chances, although she was beginning to wonder if the man ever slept; both Brian and Justin would be safe under his oversight.

She finished up the paperwork and delivered it to the duty nurse before gathering her belongings and preparing to depart. That was when Matt Keller came barreling through the ICU door, pausing at the nurse's station to hand the RN a sheaf of documents and instructing her to dispatch them by fax to the number written at the top of the first page. Then he turned toward Cynthia, and she rose quickly, noting the brightness in his eyes and hoping that she was not wrong in thinking it promised good news. She had not, up until this moment, allowed herself to consider the alternative, to suppose that Brian might not make a full recovery; she did not know how she would handle that.

Then he dropped into the chair at her side and offered her a weary grin. "Damn, I'm good."

To her own surprise, her knees were suddenly too weak to support her, and she collapsed back into her chair. "Please don't be cryptic," she said sharply. "I'm not in the mood."

"He's waking up."

She closed her eyes for a moment, and bit her bottom lip to keep it from trembling. "Can I see him?"

"Not tonight," he replied, correctly interpreting the relief in her eyes and reaching out to take her hand. "He's still mostly out of it, but he's stable enough for us to move him out of ICU in the morning, and put him in a private room. You'll be able to see him then, although he still may not be awake. For the next few days, he'll be in and out of consciousness, and the more he sleeps, the better off he is. He's still going to be in a lot of pain, so the painkillers are going to make it difficult for him to stay awake for any length of time. So, for tonight, go home. Get some rest." To her surprise, he leaned forward and kissed her forehead. "He's going to be fine, and he's very lucky to have you."

She nodded, suddenly more exhausted than she had ever been in her life.

When she left, after taking a few moments to collect herself and re-establish the mask of indifference she wore so well, Keller rose quickly and hurried back into the ICU, pausing at the desk to check on the condition of his other patients before returning to Brian's bedside just in time to see lashes fluttering and one hand lifting from the bed as if reaching for something.

The doctor enfolded it within both of his own, and leaned forward until he was sure his patient could see him - providing he chose to focus.

"Brian? Can you hear me?"

After a beat of silence, the answer came, and the tone was undeniably, quintessentially Brian Kinney. "Why? Did you think I'd be deaf?" It was weak and halting, but there was no mistaking the sarcasm laced through it.

Keller grinned. Whatever else might be damaged - and he didn't bother to try to deny that there would be plenty - the wicked intellect was intact, and demanding a response in kind. "Actually, I thought you might be dead, but it seems that, once again, those reports have been greatly exaggerated. How do you . . ."

"Like I lost a round with Godzilla. Any more stupid questions?"

Keller was quiet for a moment, checking vital signs and considering how much he should say at this juncture. He finally decided on keeping it simple, for now. "Do you know where you are?"

Because of the bandages covering his face, only the irises of Brian's eyes were actually visible to the doctor, so how was it, he wondered, that they could still convey so much contempt. "Ibiza? South Beach? St. Tropez?"

"Smart ass! Would you just . . ."

Eyes clinched briefly, and a tremor acknowledged a fresh wave of pain rushing through the battered body, but Brian was not about to slip back into the comfort of drug-induced sleep until he got answers to the questions he'd awakened to ask.

"Where . . . is . . . he?"

Keller sighed, realizing that he should have known, should have been prepared for this particular interrogation. "He's nearby, Brian. He . . ."

"Fuck! I'm . . . tell Honeycutt . . . I'm going . . . to kill him when I . . . get out of this fucking . . . bed."

The doctor chuckled. "Yeah, I'm sure he's quaking in his boots. But you shouldn't be angry at him. He did convey your message. But your little blond . . . he has a mind of his own, you know. I don't think a brigade of Ninjas could have kept him away from you, so Honeycutt never had a prayer."

A twitch in the bandages around the patient's mouth made Keller wonder if he was trying to smile. "Yeah. Stubborn little shit."

Keller nodded. "Stubborn, but not reckless. He's being well looked after, I promise."

Then he placed a gentle hand on Brian's forehead and regarded him with a warm affectionate smile that would have astonished most of the people who thought they knew the physician well. Neither warmth nor affection were ordinarily part of his repertoire of expressions. "Why don't you get some rest now? And - in case you're wondering - you're going to be just fine."

And those eyes were looking at him again, already knowing more than they should. Never once, in all the years they'd known each other, had he been able to lie to Brian, and he would not start now. There had always been only truth between them, and he could offer nothing less now.

But not tonight. Tonight he would simply kiss his old friend good night and wish him sweet dreams, even though he was pretty sure it would be a long time before such dreams were possible again for Brian Kinney.

For now, all he could do was find a way to survive the nightmare.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"tbc"
He leaned against the wooden railing on his deck to stare out into the starlit mass of the Atlantic and watch brilliant white breakers accost not-quite-so-brilliant white sands, as he listened to the thunder of the surf and noted the pale tracery of lightning that flickered far out to sea, while a fitful wind swirled around him, molding his linen shirt to his body and tousling thick, dark hair until it stood on end. Master of all he surveyed; the phrase was particularly appropriate, he thought, as he gazed out upon the crescent of beach that comprised the border of his private reserve, stretching from the promontory on the left where the tall spire of a lighthouse perched at the edge of a steep drop-off that plunged straight down into turbulent water, to the row of dunes far off to the right that marched away from the broken shoreline. It was beautiful and pristine, and it all belonged to him.

Then he was reminded of another minimalist phrase which had become his mantra of late.

Rank hath its privileges.

He was living proof of that. It was definitely good to be the best in his field. And if that was a slight exaggeration - there was, after all, the rest of the world which might dispute the claim - it really didn’t make much difference. He was the best in this country, and nothing else really mattered, for this was the place where it mattered most - the place where the demand for his services generated incredible profits and allowed him to indulge himself in any lifestyle he might choose.

Being the best had provided him with the wherewithal to live the life he'd always wanted, and to surpass the standards established by his father. The old man, after all, had been one of the best - a member of an elite group - and had achieved an astonishing level of professional and financial success while inspiring his only son to aspire to even greater heights.

Thus, Joseph Richard Turnage was still renowned worldwide as an accomplished plastic surgeon, even though he'd been retired for almost a decade, but J. Richard Turnage - he had dispensed with the despised "Jr." when he'd hung up his first shingle - had established himself at a remarkably young age as the premier plastic surgeon of his generation; perhaps of any generation to date. At this point, he was only thirty-seven years old, and his reputation for incredible skill and mastery of his art was surpassed only by his notoriety as a pompous, arrogant prick who not only refused to suffer fools gladly, but actually refused to suffer them at all. Thus, he was almost impossible to work for or live with, and the only people who could tolerate him were those who profited enormously by the association. Because of his expertise and an intuitive feel for artistry and beauty, his services were constantly in demand among the so-called 'beautiful people' - the movie stars and models and trophy wives who depended on the perfection of their faces in order to live their glamorous lives.

Rick Turnage was the man who created and/or maintained that perfection. It had made him very rich and enabled him to pick and choose which patients he would accept and which he would reject, and he was the only person in the world who understood the criteria he used for determining which was which.

Except - maybe - for one annoying bastard. He closed his eyes and visualized the documents that were currently sitting in the center of the blotter on the massive teakwood desk in his private office. Son of a bitch! This was not something he had expected to deal with at this time. He had other things on his mind, other priorities that needed addressing.

Like the voluptuous redheaded journalist who had come to interview him just ten days earlier, and agreed, several hours later, to join him for a week on his yacht, for a Caribbean cruise. As a man who sought to create beauty out of ugliness, he was always fascinated by loveliness that occurred naturally, without his intervention, and the journalist was one of a miniscule number of individuals who had needed no enhancement from him to qualify as the 'real thing'. Thus, he was enchanted and intrigued and eager to explore the depth of her charms.

He had reached the zenith of his profession, but, strangely, that achievement had coincided with reaching the nadir of his personal life. He and his father hated each other; his mother had gone missing on a trip to the Far East six years earlier and was presumed dead; his third wife was in the process of learning to hate him as much as her predecessors; his twin sister resented his success and his fame and his failure to display what she considered "proper family devotion"; and he could not remember the last time he had seen or spoken to either of his two sons.

He consoled himself by believing that it was simply the price of greatness. And by taking advantage of the attentions of the string of exquisite individuals - mostly women - who were eager to fill the empty places in his life, for their own ulterior motives. Primarily, they enjoyed the fact that those places were invariably filled with all the trappings of his life of luxury, but they also were pleased to be seen in the company of the man who created such beauty for others while needing no such service for himself, for Rick Turnage was as beautiful in his own way as any product of his skill.

Physically.

And he relished the rewards of his skill and his looks - rewards like the idylls he envisioned in the company of his newest passing fancy.

And now . . . this.

Shit! And even more annoying than the timing was the nagging suspicion that the fucker who had interrupted his plans had known exactly what he was doing.

It wasn't the first time he'd had good cause to despise Matthew Keller, and he was sure it wouldn't be the last.

He turned away from the spectacle of the sea and went back inside, pausing at the bar just within the entry to pour himself a hefty shot of Chivas Regal before continuing into his office where his desk was set into a bay window with a panoramic view of the ocean. The office was dark except for the golden cone of light falling from the vintage Tiffany lamp that sat on the corner of his desk, and it was no more than an element of random chance that the illumination fell directly on the grainy portrait that was sitting atop a sheaf of documents he had tossed there earlier, in a display of temper.

He didn't want to look at that face. And yet . . . in truth, he did want to look at it. But not like this. Not at this grainy, imperfect image that was about as clear as one could expect of something expelled from a fax machine.

With a disdainful snort, he sank into his high back leather executive chair, and swung to face his computer monitor as he tapped out a series of commands on his keyboard. It was only a matter of seconds before the screen lit up with the image he'd selected, and he sat back to stare at it.

He'd been right (as usual). The image provided by the fax machine was a poor substitute for the full-color perfection of the photograph culled from the pages of an article in a professional magazine.

Hazel eyes stared back at him from a face that was decidedly not smiling, but the gleam in those eyes clearly indicated that the man behind the face found something amusing.

Smart, bright, and blessed with brilliant sardonic wit; that was patently obvious in a perfectly proportioned face.
A perfect face - almost.

And that, of course, was the secret that Turnage had never revealed to anyone. True perfection, in symmetry and design and proportion, was beautiful to behold, but was, ultimately, boring. To make it truly stand out - truly pop - such a face needed some small detail that was a departure from the predictable lines of perfection.

And here it was, staring back at him, and forcing him to acknowledge, as he did only rarely, that nature, when it chose to do so, was still better at designing the ideal human form than he was.

The man's chin was not - quite - as large as it would have to be to reach true perfection, and the not-quite-smile touching those incredibly sensual lips seemed to say that the man knew it perfectly well, and dared anyone to point it out. There was no doubt at all that this man knew he was beautiful, and reveled in it; knew that anyone who looked at him would be consumed with either lust or envy.

Turnage stared for a while, sitting back and allowing his eyes to study each feature, wondering if there was a way to improve any one of them, to make the whole more beautiful than it already was. Then he leaned forward and generated another command, and the head shot vanished, to be replaced by a casual pose: Kinney, in impeccable Armani, standing with two stunning blonde women at his left, and another blond - an exquisitely beautiful young man - at his right, and the doctor's eyes narrowed. The caption indicated that this was a moment, caught on film, of the opening of the man's advertising agency, but the story told by the photograph was much more interesting than the one conveyed by the copy. While both of the women were staring up at Kinney as if he were the center of the world, he, in turn, was staring down at the blond young man beside him, one arm wrapped firmly around the youth's waist, and it was obvious that the women - and the rest of the world - could have faded into oblivion, and the two men would never have noticed, so lost were they in each other's eyes.

Gay, then! And that much more intriguing for it. Gay, and bold enough to make no secret of it.

Turnage wanted to snarl his rage as he felt the hook, dangled before him by that motherfucking Matt Keller, embed itself more deeply in his tenderest tissues.

Fuck! He didn't want to do this. He wanted to go to Barbabos, and to St. Thomas - to Paradise Revisited - while fucking the redhead every hour on the hour. He wanted sin and surf and frozen margaritas as the sun sank over tropical waters. He sure as shit didn't want to go to Pittsburgh.

But there was one thing - only one thing - that he wanted even more than his sensual pleasure; it was the thing that kept him perpetually seeking out new cases and accepting new patients, when he could have simply rested on his laurels. He wanted . . . his Mona Lisa; his Starry Night; his Sistine Chapel.

His masterpiece - the one he'd been seeking all his life; the one case which would prove to be his ultimate accomplishment, his greatest work of art.

Still, he really, really didn't want to go to Pittsburgh, of all places.

But, if he took the bait Keller had set for him, there would be no help for it. Yes, his clinic was here, just a couple of miles away from his beautiful seaside home, and yes, he would be free to insist, as he always did, that the patient come to him, treatment and surgery to be scheduled at the convenience of the physician. But even he could not - quite - get away with demanding that this young man, now so badly damaged and clinging to life by a thread, according to the chart information Keller had provided, travel half-way across the country for treatment that might not be feasible, or even possible. In order to determine whether or not he could do the job that Keller was asking him to do, he had to accept the bait - and go see for himself.
When he picked up the phone and dialed, he promised himself that he would allow only three rings; thereafter, all bets were off.

He almost snarled when the dreaded response came after only two.

"Keller."

"How bad is the damage?"

"I sent you . . ."

"Yeah. Which is about as revealing as a kid's finger painting. So . . . how bad?"

A sharp huff of breath, quickly suppressed. "As bad as I've ever seen. They did a hell of a job on him."

Silence then. "Is he as . . . was he really . . ."

"The most beautiful man I've ever seen." There was no uncertainty in Keller's words. "And that's not just my opinion. Ask anybody. Ask . . ."

"I don't want to ask anybody. I want you to tell me the truth. If you're lying to me . . ."

"Look, Turnage." All patience exhausted now, but fury still held in check, if only barely. "No matter what we may think of each other - you and me - the one thing you can't accuse me of is lying to you. Not ever. And you're smart enough to know that if there was anybody else - anywhere in the world - I could trust to do this job, I'd have called them. You're the last person, literally, that I'd ask for this kind of favor. But . . . this time, it matters. Only the best will do."

More silence, punctuated by a distant roar that was the constant growl of the sea while Turnage mused. "If you're wasting my time, you're going to pay for it."

"OK."

"And if I do this, you're going to owe me."

"We'll see about that."

"Look, motherfucker," snarled the plastic surgeon, huge blue eyes gone icy with resentment, "who do you think . . ."

"I think," Keller interrupted, "that I'm the man who just gave you something you've spent your whole life looking for."

"What the fuck do you . . ."

"Your masterpiece." Sharp, flat, unapologetic - and holding not a trace of uncertainty. "It's what you've always wanted, isn't it?"

The only answer was a beat of silence, followed by the sharp sound of a disconnect.

But it was enough to make Keller smile. The hook was set; the bait, taken.
The silence between the two women was neither comfortable nor easy; it was, instead, heavy with words not yet said but lingering unspoken. Waiting.

The room was spacious and well-appointed, a great improvement over the tiny one they'd taken when they'd first arrived in Pittsburgh; the upgrade was, of course, courtesy of Kinnetic Corp, a fact that they both knew, but neither had actually acknowledged.

Lindsey was the first to break the silence, although she could have thought of at least a million things she would have preferred to do.

"I want him here, Mel. Surely you can understand why . . ."

"Oh, I understand all right." Melanie's voice was harsh, almost strident, and bordering on shrill, threaded as it was with bitter resentment. "I understand that it's taken us a whole year away from this place - away from him- to finally get him out of our lives so we can be a real family. And now, first chance you get, you want to drag Gus back here, so Brian can play daddy again. At his convenience, of course. Never mind how it might screw things up for us. And for Gus."

Harsh words of accusation rose to Lindsey's lips, but she forced herself to swallow them, to pause and think carefully before saying something she would regret.

Instead of blurting out the bitter recriminations that were screaming in her mind, she chose to walk to the window and stare out into the darkness, watching a spring wind play among the branches of a red maple just budding with the promise of warm weather to come. "That's not fair, Melanie," she said slowly. Gently. "When we took Gus away to Toronto, I promised Brian that he would still be a part of Gus's life, that I would make sure his son didn't forget him. And since then, I've allowed you to systematically try to dismantle every link that connects them to each other - to do everything you could to get Gus to forget his father ever existed, despite the fact that it's never seemed to bother you too much to take advantage of Brian's generosity and his love for his son, when it's convenient for you. Because of everything we endured . . . before, I didn't want to make an issue of it. I thought it would just blow over, with time. But it's not fair, Mel. It's not what I promised in order to get him to give us his blessing."

"Don't you dare talk to me about what's fair," Melanie snapped. "It's my salary that's always provided for us. It's my hard work that enables me to keep you in style and allow you to dabble in your precious art and keep Gus in the best private schools while my daughter has to make do in a crappy daycare center that . . ."

Lindsey spun quickly, her eyes wide and filled with shadow. "Excuse me. Did I just hear you refer to J.R. as your daughter? Is that what you just said to me? That's odd, because I always thought she was our . . ."

But Melanie's voice trailed away into silence as she realized what she had said - and what she had almost said - and she experienced a moment of bitter regret, for she knew in her heart that the accusation was unfair. Lindsey loved J.R. every bit as much as she loved Gus. But . . . why did it have to be this way? Why was it that, every time she looked at the little boy who was supposed to belong to her and her partner, all she could see was the beautiful face of Brian Kinney?

Fuck!

When Lindsey sank into the overstuffed chair near the window and spent a few moments fighting to regain her composure, Melanie was suddenly conscious of a specter rising in the room, a ghost of old pains and not-quite-forgotten anguish, and she felt a lump forming in her throat that felt like a chunk of dirty ice. Thus, when Lindsey began to speak again, Melanie recognized a deadly coldness in her voice that seemed perfectly suited for the moment. "Is that the real reason you wanted to move to Toronto, Mel? Was all that rationalizing about keeping our kids safe and building a new life in a place where we'd have the right to be a real married couple just . . . an excuse?"

"Of course not. Why . . ."

"Because I'm not quite as stupid as you seem to think I am." There was a terrible, new resolve in the blonde's tone, a determination that Melanie had never heard before. "For years, I allowed you to paint Brian as the villain of this piece. Even when I knew better. And let's just clear the air here, shall we? You and I - together - chose the daycare that J.R. attends, because we both agreed that the staff there was the most loving, most nurturing, most dedicated of all the places we visited. The fact that it was not the most expensive one we investigated was just a bonus, not a criteria for judgment. As for my 'dabbling' and your 'keeping' me - I am well aware that my job doesn't establish groundbreaking legal precedents, or change the world, but it does allow me to encourage artistic efforts and help young people develop their talent, so it feels worthwhile, to me. And I happen to be very good at it, so it allows me to earn a decent salary. Not, of course, on a par with yours, but if you've convinced yourself that I couldn't survive on it, maybe you should think again. Particularly since neither one of us has ever survived without a little help from a very special friend. And you may claim that you were unaware of Brian's contributions over the years, but we both know that would be a lie. Just because I didn't rub your face in it doesn't mean that you didn't figure it out. As you're so eager to remind me, you're not that stupid."

Melanie's cheeks flushed hot and red as she rose and crossed her arms across her chest. "As if you've ever passed up a chance to force me to remember how much he's always been a part of our lives. And now you want to bring our son back here, simply because . . ."

"Because it's what he would want," Lindsey interrupted. "And because he has a right to expect it. Have you really managed to forget that the only reason you have parental rights to Gus at all, is because Brian gave them up to save our marriage? Is it possible that you've convinced yourself that never happened?"

"I - don't - care!" Melanie snarled. "I don't want him in our lives; I don't want to have to put up with his bullshit, or with you making excuses for him, or with how you feel about him."

"He almost died, Mel."

Melanie opened her mouth and managed, by the thinnest of margins, to close it again without uttering the toxic words that were trembling on her lips, but it was immediately obvious that her effort was in vain. Spoken or not, Lindsey had heard them anyway, and could only stand and stare at her partner, eyes full of a terrible certainty.

When there was a discreet knock on the door, it was debatable which of them was more relieved at the interruption.

Or more surprised when the identity of their visitor was revealed.

"Daddy," said Lindsey, her voice faint with disbelief as she opened the door. "What are you doing here? How did you find me?"

Ron Peterson stood motionless and stared in silence for several seconds at the daughter he had not seen in more than a year. Then he glanced toward Melanie, and was quick to identify the glitter of anger in her eyes, confirming his suspicion that he was interrupting a confrontation of some sort, based on the muffled words he'd overheard as he'd come down the hall.

"I'm sorry," he said quickly. "I've come at a bad time."

"Actually," replied Lindsey, deliberately avoiding looking toward her partner, "your timing was perfect. But I still don't understand how . . ."

"The news has been full of the story about Brian's attack," he answered, "so I figured you had to be in town."

Then he reached out, moving slowly so as to allow his daughter the opportunity to resist should she choose to do so, and wrapped his arms around her shoulders. "I know how much he always meant to you, and I . . . well, he is the father of my grandson. So I called his assistant; and she was kind enough to tell me where to find you. You know, I'm not sure why but . . ." He leaned back and favored her with a tentative smile, "I always kind of . . . liked him. Although your mother . . ."

Lindsey looked up at him, studying the gentleness in his eyes and hearing something almost unprecedented in his voice. "Where is Mom?" she asked, knowing without asking that her mother was not waiting somewhere in the corridor.

Mr. Peterson sighed. "Corfu, I think. Or Kalamos, maybe. What day is it?"

"She's in Greece? What in the world . . ."

"She and Lynette went to see Mamma Mia on Broadway a couple of months ago, and got inspired. So they're island-hopping in the Aegean."

Melanie cleared her throat, obviously weary of being ignored, but Lindsey forestalled the comment she was about to make by grabbing her handbag and taking her father's arm. "Why don't you buy your daughter a nightcap?" she suggested with a smile.

The Petersons - father and daughter - departed quickly, leaving Melanie to brood and simmer and look for a suitable outlet for the rage building inside her.

Lindsey ordinarily confined her consumption of alcohol to an occasional glass of wine or, at celebratory moments, a champagne cocktail. But she didn't hesitate when she seated herself at the hotel bar beside her father. "JB," she said to the bartender. "A double."

"Make it two," said Ron Peterson as he regarded her with one raised eyebrow. "Are we celebrating?" he asked with a tiny smile.

"We are," she replied firmly as the bartender poured their drinks. She lifted her glass to touch it to the one her father was holding. "Brian's going to live. That's cause enough, don't you think?"

He nodded, and they drank together. Then he chose to stare into the mirror behind the bar, rather than look at her directly. "I have to confess, Daughter Mine, that I've never completely understood your relationship with him - given your sexual orientation, I mean."

She surprised herself with a tiny laugh. "Join the crowd," she replied. "I don't think anybody understands it exactly - including me and Brian. But however we might try to explain it or define it, it's real and it's precious. To both of us - and to our son."
Ron shifted his gaze and sat for a while staring down into his drink. "He's not here with you, is he?"

"Not yet," she answered hesitantly. "I assume you heard some of the conversation Melanie and I were having when you knocked on the door. That was the subject of our discussion. I want Gus here. Immediately. And Melanie . . . disagrees."

"Has Brian asked for him?"

She shook her head. "Brian hasn't regained consciousness yet. But when he does, I think he'll want to see his son." She sneaked a quick glance at her father's face and surprised something in his eyes that she couldn't quite identify. "I know you and Mom don't think much of my . . . life choices, Dad. Or of the people I've chosen to include in my life, but Brian - no matter what you might have heard about him - loves Gus very much and, in his own admittedly oddball way, he's been a good father. For one thing, he's always been there to provide for Gus - and for me - when I've needed him, even though Melanie has not always been very . . ."

"Hospitable?" Mr. Peterson did not appear to be surprised by how easily the right word came to him.

Lindsey smiled and nodded and drained her glass. Then she turned to regard him directly. "Why are you here, Dad? The real reason. I don't think it's just that you got tired of being on your own while Mom's globetrotting."

Since her father had always been gifted with a facile tongue and a quick wit, Lindsey was marginally surprised - and slightly alarmed - when he was slow to respond and when, as he began to speak, he still refused to meet her eyes.

"I've missed you, Linz. More than you know; more than your mother knows, and I . . . lately, I've begun to realize that I don't want this to go on. I want . . ." He sighed, and drained his drink. "I want to get to know my grandson. And I want my daughter back. It's time to mend fences, before it's . . ."

"Before it's what?" she asked, not quite able to control the tremor in her voice.

"Before I get too old to enjoy the reunion," he replied, with a bright smile. But Lindsey was almost certain that this was not what he'd originally intended to say.

"But why now?" she demanded.

He shrugged. "Maybe because of this whole debacle with Brian. I mean, he's a young man, strong and capable and healthy, and yet . . ."

"And yet, he almost died."

"Right."

Lindsey sipped and thought. "What else?" she said finally, knowing there was more.

His smile was slightly self-deprecating. "It looks like Lynette is not going to be able to have children," he admitted. "They're not sure yet, but . . ."

"Oh, Daddy, I'm sorry," she said gently as she thought about her sister and the extended family that loved her so much. "Mom must be devastated."

He simply nodded, his eyes suspiciously bright in the gloom of the bar. "Well, you know your mother. She'll . . . survive."
Lindsey was quiet for a time, playing with her glass, watching her father out of the corner of her eye and hearing something... else. Something he wasn't saying. Something, she finally realized, he was not going to say - not yet. Not tonight.

So it would be left to her to make the next gesture. He had come to her, had trusted her with the few comments he was able to make.

"Dad," she said slowly, tentatively, "I'd really like for Gus to be here when Brian wakes up. But I'm not comfortable with leaving. If something should... go wrong, and I wasn't here, I don't think I could ever forgive myself. And I don't want to hire some stranger to bring him to me. I think it would frighten him. I thought maybe Melanie would go, but I don't think that's going to happen. So, if you're available...

If she hadn't been staring at his face in the mirror, she doubted she would have noticed the bright, crystalline blaze of pure joy that lit up his eyes, and then, of course, she had to pretend not to have seen it because she had a feeling that he would be embarrassed to admit how much it meant to him.

"You know," she continued, "I have a daughter too. You've never met her, but I know you'd be as enchanted with her as everyone else is. Only I don't know if Melanie would allow..."

He nodded. "I understand, Honey. I don't want to cause you any trouble, but I'd be glad to bring them both back, if all parties agree. Whatever you wish. And I'll leave first thing in the morning." He fell silent for a moment before reaching out to touch her face with gentle fingers. "And... thank you, Lindsey. I can't tell you how much it means to me."

When he reached for his coat, apparently ready to depart, she grabbed his hand and gave him a genuine bright smile which reminded him of the relationship the two of them had shared when she was much younger. "You don't have to run off right now," she laughed. "Let me write down the address for you, and directions."

His smile was gentle. "I know the address, Honey. I made certain of that, and I even got directions on MapQuest - months ago. Just in case."

She looked down quickly, not sure she wanted him to see the luster of tears rising in her eyes. "I never dreamed you'd... care enough to do that."

"Lindsey," he said softly, "I never stopped caring. It was just..."

"Mom," she said firmly, knowing she was right, but also knowing he would almost certainly never admit to it.

He frowned. "You have to keep in mind that she grew up in a different world, and she never learned how to adapt to the way it changed around her. I know it's been hard for you to accept, and I wish I could have figured out a way to fix it. I wish I'd been there for you, when you needed me."

"You're here now," she said, touching his hand once more. "And that means more than I can tell you. Thank you, Daddy. But she won't be happy with you, will she? Maybe we should just keep this..."

"No." If he had been tentative and uncertain before, that was no longer true. "I've kept things too much to myself over the years. And it certainly won't be the first time your mother has been less than happy with me." He leaned forward and covered her hand with his own. "It's time to settle this. You're my daughter, Lindsey, and that's not going to change. I don't want to waste what time... any more time."
With a small sob, quickly swallowed, Lindsey put her arms around her father, and rested her forehead against his shoulder, briefly amazed at how comforting it was to be able to do so. So she snuggled a bit closer, and enjoyed the familiar scent of his aftershave and the faint residue of the special blend of pipe tobacco he had used for as long as she could remember.

Thus she did not see the quick grimace that touched his face or the flicker of pain that flashed in his eyes as he let himself understand how much he had lost that he would never be able to regain.

But this much he could do for his beloved daughter, too long estranged and pushed away because of the demands of convention - this and a few other things he needed to arrange, even though he knew it would never be enough.

---

Kinnetic had never been so quiet, she thought. Even late at night, there was almost always someone working against a deadline or scrambling to capture an image or an idea before it faded with the moment or feverishly attempting to transcribe vision into reality - to create something so perfect for its purpose that it would impress the man who was the heart and soul of the company, even though the man himself would have laughed at such a romantic notion. Many times, regardless of the hour, Brian could be found in his office, having lost track of time in the grip of inspiration. At such times, he frequently did his best work, tapping into something inside himself, some wellspring of intuition that produced unique methods for capturing imagination or generating interest.

Cynthia had often watched him work at such moments, marveling at his degree of concentration and the depth of his perceptions, always being very careful to avoid attracting his attention. One did not, after all, interrupt genius in full creative mode, and she occasionally allowed herself a moment of smug satisfaction in the knowledge that she was one of the few who understood the depth of his talents. Though his education had been intensive and extensive, it had only provided the polish, to put the finishing touches on his abilities; the ability itself had come naturally. No one - including Brian - could ever quite define how he always found the perfect way to present the messages he was charged to deliver; he just did it.

But he wasn't doing it now, and neither was anyone else.

Cynthia entered his office slowly, her eyes sweeping the room to make sure it was as immaculate as he preferred before proceeding to his desk where she touched a fingertip to a sensor concealed beneath a carved molding; a quick pulse of light scanned her fingerprint and dispatched an electronic signal to a mechanism that opened a hidden panel in the wall between Brian's office and his private bath.

The safe was small but state of the art, accessible only to Brian himself and to Cynthia. Inside were a number of files containing data vital to the company operation, details from his investment portfolio and copyright certificates and Gus's trust fund, certain enormously valuable contracts, certified copies of Brian's will and other legal instruments, insurance policies, and his personal documents, including his copies of Gus's ID and custody papers.

It was these final items Cynthia withdrew from the safe, glancing at her watch to confirm that Lindsey and her father would be arriving shortly. Since Ron Peterson was ready to depart for Toronto to fetch his grandson and bring him back to Pittsburgh, Cynthia had agreed to provide the necessary documents to make sure that there was no difficulty at the border in bringing the little boy into the country. Since Brian had not yet recovered sufficiently to tell her what he wanted her to do in this instance, she was operating on sheer instinct, but she couldn't imagine that, once he was awake, he would not want to find his beloved son at his side.

She retrieved the items she needed and relocked the safe, before turning to make her exit. But she had only taken a few steps when she hesitated in mid-stride, glancing toward the big desk that dominated the room. She went very still and found, to her amazement, that she was trembling and barely able to stand.

She had almost lost him; he had almost died, and this was the very first time she had allowed herself to consider all of the ramifications of losing him and how it would have impacted on her life.

Cynthia did not love Brian - not, at least, in the way that other people loved Brian. Not like Justin loved Brian, or Michael loved Brian, or Lindsey loved Brian - even though the latter two would never have admitted that the love they had for him was not so very different from the love that Justin had for him. They had long ago managed to adjust their perceptions to convince themselves that their feelings for him had no romantic connotations.

Cynthia had never bothered to voice her opinions on the matter; not even to Brian himself. But she knew the truth, just as he did, though he had never verbalized his certainty either. But he knew, just the same.

But she wondered if he understood how she felt about him. Probably not, since she didn't entirely understand it herself. She was not in love with Brian Kinney; she did not worship him or sit at his feet and allow him to guide her through life. She did not believe him perfect or infallible; in truth, they argued and fought at least as often as they co-operated and agreed.

But she did love him, in her own way, for she knew something that only a very few individuals were privileged to know. Brian was the most honest individual she had ever known, and while she would never be naïve enough to believe him incapable of lying, she did know, without a single doubt, that he would never make a promise he didn't intend to keep.

He was the brother she had never had and the best friend she ever would have, and their relationship had grown and deepened during the year since Justin had decamped to New York. She was now a member of a very elite fraternity, and yes, that was the right word, despite its gender bias. This fraternity only had two members: her and Michael Novotny, and the criteria for membership was very narrow. To wit - they were the only two people in the world who had ever been allowed to see Brian Kinney cry.

That simple truth said as much about the two of them as it did about Brian; he did not trust easily but, when he did, he trusted with his whole heart. And it left him unexpectedly vulnerable.

She had come to understand that only slowly as their friendship had grown and deepened, and she resolved that she would never, never betray that trust. Not the way Michael had.

She was constantly amazed that Michael had never realized how deeply he had hurt Brian, but she had gradually come to understand the reason for his ignorance. Obviously, Brian had never told him, had never allowed him to see the hurt he'd inflicted. Any more than he had ever allowed the rest of the people who made up his extended family to recognize how often and how thoroughly each of them had betrayed him over the years.

Sometimes, in moments of frustration or anger, she thought that she'd really enjoy having a chance to confront all of them, and force them to see the truths that none of them had ever been willing to acknowledge or examine.

But no. She sighed, as she heard the discreet chime that announced the arrival of her visitors. She would remain silent, no matter how much she longed to make them understand the depth of their betrayal. She would remain silent, because that was what Brian would expect from her. Unless, of course, they ever came to her, to question the whys and wherefores.

She smiled as she moved toward the door. If that should happen, unlikely though it was, then all bets were off.

She hurried to the lobby, inspecting the contents of the file she was carrying to make sure it contained everything Mr. Peterson would need, glancing once more at her watch to gauge how long it would take her to finish up here and get to the hospital.

Today would be the day, she thought. Today Brian would open his eyes and return to the land of the living, and she intended to be there when . . .

She rounded the corner and stepped into the lobby, expecting to be greeted by a smiling Lindsey and her father, but the tableau awaiting her was not at all what she'd anticipated.

She found Lindsey crouched on her knees, eyes huge and welling with tears with one hand clamped tight over her mouth while the other was clinched against her chest, clutching a rolled-up document. She seemed to be gasping for breath while her father knelt beside her, stroking her hair and murmuring soothing, nonsense words in her ear.

"What . . . what's wrong?" Cynthia asked, suddenly finding her own breath difficult to draw. "It's not . . . he's not . . ."

Mr. Peterson stared at her for a moment, confused and uncertain, before he realized what she was asking. "No, no," he assured her. "He's . . . fine, as far as we know. It's not that. It's . . ."

Cynthia forced herself to center, closing her eyes and managing a deep cleansing breath. It took a moment, but she was finally able to regain her composure and summon up the ability to deal with whatever new crisis had arisen. "What's wrong?" Her voice was steady this time, and cool, almost without inflection.

But Lindsey could not find any words to convey her horror, so she simply extended her hand and dropped the item she'd been clutching to the floor. It was a rolled up tabloid sheet that opened as it fell, revealing the garish images that covered the entire page.

Brian Kinney - before and after.

Cynthia managed, barely, not to stagger as she forced herself to lean forward and pick up the paper. It wasn't as if she hadn't already seen the images, as these were the very same photos that had been flooding the Internet ever since Brian had been attacked. But it was different somehow - more immediate, more deliberate, more intense - to see it printed on news stock and hold it in one's hands.

She stared for a moment, unable to utter a single word. She recognized the photograph on the left side of the page; it had been taken during the party to celebrate the launch of Kinnetic Corp, and showed Brian looking down at someone, wearing a soft smile. Although there was nothing in the photo itself to indicate who he was looking at, Cynthia knew that it had been Justin at his side, Justin who had put that smile on his face. The second image, adjacent to the first, was not quite as crisp or focused - snapped, no doubt, in haste, by someone who just happened to have a digital camera handy, and recognized a golden opportunity when it presented itself.

She had seen the picture before, but she had not allowed herself to really look at it, until now.

It was Brian's face, all right, but a face distorted and mangled, torn and sliced and mutilated and, in a few places, laid open to the bone - swollen and lurid and robbed of all its beauty, though still, somehow, recognizable.

The headlines were huge and printed in brilliant scarlet. At the top of the page, the line read, "Beauty . . . and the Beast."

And at the bottom, equally large and vivid, "The Wages of Sin."

There was no logo, no masthead - nothing to indicate who might have produced the page. And on the reverse, there was only a vitriolic outpouring of homophobic nastiness, identifying Brian as a "notorious homosexual with a record of depraved behavior and accusations of child molestation" and claiming that he had gotten what he deserved for choosing to indulge his filthy perversion and flaunt himself in the faces of the God-fearing Christian community of Pittsburgh.

Lindsey continued to weep, rocking herself now in a jerky rhythm, still breathing erratically.

"Where did you get this?" Cynthia was finally able to ask.

Ron Peterson sighed. "They're all over the place. Stacks of them on top of every newspaper stand, and beside the doorways of every building on Liberty Avenue."

"Jesus!" she whispered. "How could anyone . . ."

Ron Peterson stood abruptly and walked to the window where he stood looking out into the soft pastel brightness of a spring morning. "I don't know," he said softly. "I feel like I should apologize. Even though I would never . . ." He paused and tried to swallow around the huge lump in his throat. "I never thought that something like this could happen here."

Lindsey turned to study him, disbelief rising in her eyes. "Daddy, don't be deliberately stupid. It's only a little over a year since some cretin planted a bomb at Babylon, and killed eight people. Simply because they were gay, and happened to believe they should have the same rights as everybody else. This . . ." She gestured toward the lurid tabloid page without really looking at it . . . "This is exactly the same thing. They wanted to kill him - to destroy him - and now they're gloating because they think they've succeeded."

Cynthia looked up then, and the two women stared at each other, sharing the same thought. It was Cynthia, however, who gave it voice. "If they think that, they're in for one fucking big surprise."

At that moment, Cynthia's cell phone rang, and a glance at the screen indicated that it was Matt Keller calling.

She had to pause to take a deep breath, struggling to believe that it could not be bad news. The tabloid sheet had shaken her, and made her doubt her determination and certainty, but she would not let it take away her faith.

"Hello."

"Good morning, Number One." Keller's voice was bright and strong and gave no indication that he had spent the better part of the night fighting to save the life of an accident victim. "I think you might want to get your ass over here."

"Is he . . ."

"Not yet," he replied, "but he did regain consciousness last night, for a few minutes."
"And," she paused to take a deep breath, "was he . . . all right?"

She could almost hear the smile in his voice when he replied. "He was exactly as you'd expect him to be. So I think your wait is almost over."

She closed her eyes and took a moment to whisper a two word prayer.

"I'll be there in a half-hour," she assured him.

"No big rush," he answered, "but you might as well be prepared. The herd is already gathering. And we've moved him to a private room, so they won't have to wait for ICU visiting hours to see him."

She swallowed hard, not entirely sure that Brian would be pleased to waken to a chorus of babbling voices, but not bothering to voice a protest. Once she was on the scene, she would make sure he would not be troubled by unwanted visitors.

She quickly thrust the documents for Gus into Ron Peterson's hands, and gestured for Lindsey to accompany her. "You," she said to the man, "go get Gus and bring him back here so he can see his father."

Then she grabbed Lindsey's arm and pulled her to her feet. "And you come with me. He's out of danger, and they think he'll be waking up soon."

Lindsey huffed a deep breath and managed to stand up, her face taking on an expression of grim resolve. Then she leaned forward and plucked the tabloid from Cynthia's hand, rolling it up so the images were no longer visible, and tucking it under her arm. "There are some people," she explained in a faint whisper, "who ought to see this."

Cynthia regarded her solemnly. "Yes. There are," she said finally. "Now let's go."

Michael had arrived first, except for Lance Mathis of course, who had been there all night, and proceeded to call everybody else, and they had all hurried to the hospital, but hesitated to barge into the room en masse. Thus, they had decided to drift in gradually - two by two - to avoid the unwelcome attention of the duty nurse. The hospital's policy on visitation was not terribly strict, except in the critical care areas, but nobody wanted to push their luck. So they'd strolled in, trying to look as if they had every right to be there, and taken their places, making sure to keep their voices down and avoid attracting attention.

Thus the posse was fully assembled before the dietary staff had finished serving breakfast, except for Justin, who was picking his mother and sister up from the airport on their return from their visit to Jennifer's family, and Lindsey and Cynthia, who'd had a task to perform at the Kinnetic office. Everybody - except Melanie, of course - had been curious about the nature of that errand, but no one had quite dared to question since Melanie's relentless frown had discouraged any expression of curiosity.

As they'd entered, each of them had moved to Brian's bedside and spent a moment staring down at him, looking in vain for some sign that he was conscious of their presence. Both Michael and Emmett had leaned forward to whisper something in his ear, and everyone else - except Melanie - had gotten close enough to touch him briefly, clasping his hand or stroking his face or his arm. Then they'd all settled themselves to wait, taking up chairs around the room or leaning against the wall, all positioned so that they could watch for any indication that the patient might be waking up.

Ben and Hunter had engaged Ted and Blake in quiet conversation, discussing the upcoming publication of Ben's latest story in The New Yorker, while Drew Boyd had retired to the hallway to talk with his cousin as Mathis took his turn at standing guard, both of them turning to greet the latest arrivals as they stepped out of the elevator. Michael and Emmett remained mostly silent, content to watch Brian, barely aware of the others in the room, while Debbie had settled herself in a chair by the window, suddenly caught up in a feeling of déjà vu. It had not been so long ago, after all, that she had sat in just such a room, waiting to learn if her only child would awaken from injuries inflicted by the same kind of homophobic bastards who had tried to kill Brian.

Michael had survived, and so would Brian. She could not allow herself to consider any other possibility. But . . . no, she would not think about that. Not now.

Eli Gruber had been the last to arrive, entering when his partner had come bustling in, in scrubs and lab coat, carrying his supplies for drawing blood. At that moment, Emmett had glanced at Michael, looking as if he wanted to question the man's right to be present at such a moment, but, in the end, he chose to remain silent, not wanting to cause a fuss over something that wouldn't matter anyway. Eli had then gravitated toward Melanie who seemed to welcome his presence and his interest in her opinion on a new version of Proposition 14 that was being sponsored by a local right-wing group.

For his part, Monty Peabody rather enjoyed being the center of attention as he went about his task of drawing blood from the port attached to Brian's shoulder. Thus, when he was done, he spent a few extra minutes making sure that the specimen tubes were correctly labeled, and then proceeded to reposition IV lines and check out the display on the monitors. In truth, he knew little of what all the data meant, since he was simply a lab tech who had taken a couple of courses in phlebotomy to qualify for a slightly higher pay grade. But it seemed a very professional thing to do, and he didn't want to miss out on any opportunity to impress his neighbors, the Novotny-Bruckners, and their friends.

Still, he was usually competent in the performance of his duties. But this particular patient had certainly done nothing to earn either his concern or his compassion, and he couldn't quite suppress a sense of satisfaction in seeing the mighty Kinney brought so low; thus he was not as gentle as he ordinarily would have been as he tugged the blanket up to cover the patient's arms and noticed a slight tremor through torso and shoulders, a response that was almost a flinch and that might indicate some measure of discomfort. The medical staff had noted on Kinney's chart - which Monty had made a point of inspecting just as if he knew what all the cryptic notations and abbreviations meant - that the patient would soon begin to regain consciousness for short periods of time, and Monty wondered if the moment might be at hand.

But he decided it would be inappropriate for him to make such an announcement. In fact, it might be amusing to . . .

"My, my, my!" he said with a quick glance around the room. "How the mighty have fallen, hmmm? Have you guys heard about the article in the tabloid that's all over the streets? I hear it's quite . . . graphic."

"Yeah, I heard about it. Beauty and the Beast, huh?" Ted's voice sounded strange, as if he wanted to say more, but didn't quite dare.

"Homophobic pricks!" observed Mel. "What kind of shitheads would do something like that? Still . . ."

Ted looked up, picking up on a strange jarring note in her tone, and met her eyes, immediately reading the expression there with perfect clarity. "Still," she repeated, "there is some tiny little nuance of poetic justice in all this. If you know what I mean."
Debbie turned away from the window where she'd been watching passing traffic, and spotted the tentative smiles that neither Ted nor Mel could quite conceal and closed her eyes quickly, not wanting to see or understand the meaning. "Like finding out that the idol has feet of clay after all?" she asked. Then her eyes went wide as she wondered how she could have allowed herself to say such a thing. Brian had almost...but no. She preferred not to think about that. In truth, she would have preferred to not even know it. If the invincible Brian Kinney was not immune to the fickleness of cruel fate, then what chance did the rest of them have?

The complete, total silence in the room was broken by a small, quickly stifled titter, and no one was exactly sure where it had originated. Nor did anyone really want to know.

Except for Emmett, who was definitely not laughing as he got to his feet, staring at the faces of the individuals around him. "I don't believe you people," he said softly. "I can't believe that any of you - no matter how much you might resent Brian - could find anything even remotely funny in this."

"Oh, come on, Em," said Ted. "Surely even you can understand a peon's interest in seeing the mighty Kinney taken down a peg or two."

Emmett stared at his old friend, and had the strangest sensation that he was looking at someone he didn't know at all. "Would that be the same interest that the savages who did this had - in seeing a fag cut down to size?"

"Aren't you giving him a little too much credit?" said Eli Gruber, not bothering to suppress the snoot in his voice. "He wasn't anything special to them. They just wanted to kill a fag - any fag. And this one came along at the right time, and just happened to be the perfect target, seeing as how he's forever all over the newspapers, rubbing people's faces in his decadent lifestyle."

As it happened, Ben was the only one who was looking in Emmett's direction at that moment, and he was startled when Emmett flinched away from Eli's words, flinched as if to evade a physical blow. What in the world would account for that, he wondered. But he didn't get a chance to ask.

"Did they now?" said Emmett, very softly. "I wonder. Or maybe they intended to get exactly this reaction. Maybe what they wanted was to destroy someone who was a walking work of art - to take away the man he was and make him into something else. Something that people could cringe away from - and feel superior to, or laugh at. And if that's what they meant to do, then you're giving them exactly what they wanted, aren't you?"

The silence that fell this time was neither easy nor comfortable. Nor did it last long as Lindsey and Cynthia chose that moment to step into the room from the corridor, where they had been talking quietly with Lance Mathis when they'd overheard the comments made concerning the tabloid article.

"Bravo, Emmett," Lindsey said gently, stepping forward and reaching up to drop a kiss on his cheek. Then she moved to the bed where Brian lay silent and motionless, with only the gentle inhale and exhale of breath indicating that there was life yet within his body. She nudged Monty aside none too gently so she could edge closer and spend a moment staring down at the bandages that covered the patient's face, her fingers clenched around the newspaper rolled up in her hands.

It took several moments for her to compose herself, before she turned back to survey the faces of the group, and she was not surprised to find that none among them was quite brave enough to meet her eyes. Except Cynthia, of course, who looked as if she was ready to take on an army.

"I'm with Emmett," said Lindsey, so softly that all of them had to concentrate to hear her. And maybe that was her intention. "I can't believe it either."
First she looked at Ted. "How many times has Brian Kinney saved your ass, Teddie?" Then she turned to look at Debbie, then Michael. "How many times has he saved us all? How many times has he stepped up, to protect us, to rescue us? How many fights has he fought for us? How many that we know about - and how many more that we don't? I mean, never mind the wedding that never would have happened without him, or the jobs that never would have been there if he hadn't seen to it, or the prison sentence that was avoided because he intervened. Or the homophobic bastard who would have been mayor if Brian hadn't stepped up and risked everything to make sure it didn't happen. Or how about saving Justin's life? We know about those things, because there wasn't much he could do to hide them. But there's plenty that none of us know - because he never told us. For example, did any of you ever stop to wonder how Justin managed to stay in school after he decided to run off with his fiddler? I mean, he obviously had no money, and his rat-bastard father wouldn't support him, and he couldn't qualify for financial aid because his family was too well off. Well, let me enlighten you. Brian paid his tuition. Paid it without saying a word, even to Justin, and when Justin went to him, to tell him that he didn't have to do that in light of all that had happened, Brian's only response was, 'A deal's a deal.' He had promised to pay for Justin's schooling, and he would do so. No matter what, and it had nothing to do with who was fucking whom."

She paused and waited, but no one said anything. Then she looked at Debbie. "And if you're thinking that he might have bragged about it later, let me set you straight. The only reason I know about it is because Justin told me, on the day he came to me and confessed that he'd figured out that he'd made the biggest mistake of his life - that he was terrified that Brian would never take him back. But that's not Brian, is it? Brian always takes us back, even when we act like total dickheads."

She turned away then, and looked out into the brilliance of the morning. "I know a few other things too. Things I'm not supposed to know, because Brian never told me any of it, never wanted anybody to know. For example, I was in his office one day - several years ago - waiting for him to finish a meeting so we could go to lunch, when I noticed that his checkbook was lying on his desk, and, being just as nosy about Brian's life as the rest of you, I couldn't resist taking a peek. It didn't take long for me to understand what I was seeing because it answered a question I'd been wondering about. You see, I knew that big corporations aren't known for acting out of the goodness of their hearts. Like mortgage companies, for example. If anyone really spent any time thinking about it, they'd figure out that no commercial lender is going to allow a homeowner to suspend payments on their mortgage for almost two years, without penalties or interest or threats of foreclosure, simply because the homeowner has a sick brother who requires total care 24/7, and there's no way the owner can go to work to earn money to pay the mortgage. And yet, that's exactly what a certain mortgage company did. Isn't it, Debbie?"

Debbie Novotny's face went stark white as she rose slowly to her feet. "What are you saying? They agreed to . . ."

"Yeah," Lindsey interrupted sharply. "Sure they did."

"I went to them myself," said Michael. "They said they'd allow it because my mom had been a loyal customer for so many years. They said . . ."

She regarded him with raised eyebrows. "Uh, huh!"

Debbie's eyes were suddenly huge. "Brian," she whispered.

"Brian," Lindsey echoed. "And that's just one time that I happen to know about - not because he told me, but because I stumbled across the evidence. Anyway, it always made me wonder how many other times such things happened, and nobody ever knew. I figure that Cynthia probably knows more than any of us, only she's too loyal to give him up, but I'm pretty damned sure that there's a lot more that we'll never know. But apparently, when it comes to Brian, he can never do enough. For us - who are supposed to be his friends - it's always a case of 'What have you done for me lately?'."

She sighed. "I always thought that we all made him the target of our snotty little snipes because he was so much tougher and brighter and braver and more beautiful than the rest of us, and I guess I was right, as far as it goes. But I think it was also because he was always stronger and able to take whatever we dished out, without caving in or folding up. But do we really believe that he was never hurt by it? That he didn't notice how often we assumed that he was guilty, only to find out later that we'd been wrong? And I'd bet that none of us ever bothered to step up and apologize for misjudging him."

She paused then and turned to stare at the silent occupant of the hospital bed. "Of course, he'd have just laughed it off if we'd tried, because that's how he is, isn't it? But there's no denying that all of us - including me - acted like a bunch of shitheads."

"Oh, come on, Linz," said Melanie, eyes sparking with anger and the jealousy that she was never completely able to conceal. She would never quite find it in her heart to forgive Brian for being Gus' father - or Lindsey for deciding that he should be. "Even you have to admit that he usually asked for it."

Lindsey, who had known Brian even longer than Michael had, and loved him through all that time, although not the way a woman usually loves a man, turned to regard her significant other with a cold stare. "You know what?" she said softly. "He was right. Sometimes, you really are a cunt."

"What do you . . ."

"Before you go patting yourselves on the back - for your witty repartee and your cleverness, perhaps you should take a look at the article that has you all so amused, so you can get a really good laugh at his expense." She flung the rolled-up newspaper at Ted, who had to grab it to keep it from hitting him in the face. It fell open in his hand, and he stared at the images - side by side, full page images - of Brian as he had been, at the height of his beauty, and Brian as he'd been when brought in to the hospital that fateful night, as he lay close to death. In livid, full color, the contrast was devastating.

No matter how much they had heard about what the article depicted, there was no way they could have been prepared for the horror of it.

"Oh, God!" Ted's voice broke as he stared at the photographs, as the vile, vicious images assaulted him, assaulted them all, making them struggle to breathe, to understand how anyone - no matter how homophobic or vindictive - could have done such a thing.

No one else seemed able to speak. Not even Melanie.

"Get out!" said Lindsey coldly. "Everyone except Em."

"What?" snapped Michael, leaping to his feet in outrage. "I didn't say anything."

She turned cold eyes to glare at him. "No. You didn't."

"But . . ."

"He spent his whole life looking after you, and you couldn't muster up a single fucking word in his defense."

"Now wait a minute," said Ben, obviously uncomfortable with the confrontation but unwilling to allow Michael to be singled out or targeted.
"No, you wait a minute," Lindsey snapped. "All of you can take your sanctimonious, pseudo-flower child, supercilious, oh-so-superior attitudes and go enjoy your own inflated opinion of yourselves, because sitting here gloating over what those motherfuckers did to him is sure as shit not doing him a God-dammed bit of good, although I'm sure it's making all of you feel much better. So get out!"

"You have no right . . ." said Debbie in a pallid imitation of her customary bluster, obviously still shaken.

"No, she doesn't," said Cynthia, speaking up for the first time as she fished a document out of her over-sized Gucci handbag. "But I do. If you knew Brian at all - which, by the way, most of you do not - you'd know that he doesn't leave things to chance. This is his power of attorney. Signed, sealed, notarized, and delivered, authorizing me to make decisions concerning his care, his life . . . whatever decisions need to be made while he's incapacitated. And right now, I'm making this one. Lindsey is dead right. Get - the fuck - out!"

No one moved for a moment, until the door opened and two figures stepped into the room - Drew Boyd and Lance Mathis - and the security chief moved to stand at Cynthia's elbow, his eyes moving to meet those of everyone else in the room. Only Emmett had enough presence of mind to notice that the young man they had all met within the last few days - diffident and friendly and unassuming - had suddenly been transformed into someone who was a force to be reckoned with. If any of them had thought to resist Cynthia's instructions, they immediately realized the folly of the notion. There was no doubt that Mathis was ready and willing to do whatever he had to do to fulfill his duty, to defend and protect the young man who was the only reason for his presence here, and God help anyone who might try to interfere.

The group rose quickly then, stumbling as if in shock and too stunned to offer up any coherent protest, and headed for the door, with Eli, pale and all atremble, in their midst and Monty, who had enjoyed the little uproar he'd generated until the two blonde bimbos had stepped in to spoil the fun, bringing up the rear.

"Oh, and speaking of cunts," said Cynthia, her eyes cold and her face set in the mode that had terrified subordinates for as long as she'd been Brian Kinney's good right hand, "there's one more thing." She moved forward and stood nose to nose (or rather nose to non-existent hairline, since she was several inches taller) with Monty Peabody, and her voice dropped to a sinister near-whisper. "If either you or your cunty, pretentious, self-important, sycophantic, puffed-up, pathetic little pussy-partner ever come near him again, then you're going to find out just how vindictive this pissed-off non-lesbian feminist bitch can be. Because I'm not Brian; I'm not nearly as forgiving or as laid-back as Brian, and you might be surprised to find out that, for such a worthless, immoral, promiscuous fuck-up, a man so richly deserving of your contempt and condemnation, he has an astonishing number of friends - and contacts - in some very high places - friends who can actually appreciate the fact that he's the most honest, unhypocritical man they've ever known. Contacts that he would probably never use, because he doesn't think that way. But I do, and I'd be perfectly happy to use them all. In short, by the time I'm done with you, you might just wake up from your little Stepford fag, pseudo-intellectual existence to learn that it's an extremely bad idea to fuck with Brian Kinney."

"You can't threaten me," whined Eli. "Who do you think you . . ."

She smiled, and Emmett was glad he was not the object of her scorn. "I'll tell you who I am," she said softly. "I'm the personal assistant of the man who single-handedly devised the advertising campaign that has raised over eight million dollars for this hospital's new transplant clinic. Now . . . who - the fuck - are you?"

She turned her back on him, and treated Emmett and Lindsey to a big smile as she heard him scurry
Thus, the group found themselves standing around in the hallway, slightly disoriented and not altogether certain of how they'd come to be there and still stunned by the sudden change of direction of their day. They all paused to exchange glances, none of them quite sure of what to say, as Monty and Eli made a hasty retreat, neither of them comfortable under the cold unflinching gazes turned upon them. Then Ted held up the tabloid article that had sparked the confrontation, and they all crowded in to take a closer look at the lurid item and to inspect the grisly photographs. By the time they had seen it all and read it all and absorbed the ugliness and the vitriol from its cruel rhetoric, there wasn't a smile in sight - only the horror of having, even for one moment, lowered themselves to the level of those who'd written it and spread it around like the disease it was, and Lindsey and Cynthia, watching from the doorway, knew a moment of powerful vindication.

"You go, Girls," said Emmett with a gentle smile, as he draped an arm around each of them. "Remind me never to piss either one of you off."

"Fuckers!" Lindsey snapped, before turning to look up into his face. "You OK, Honey? You haven't exactly had it easy lately yourself."

He nodded. "I'm all right. A few bumps and bruises in places best left unmentioned, but nothing to worry about."

She turned toward the bed, sparing a small smile for Drew and Lance. "If you three hadn't gone after him . . ." she whispered.

"You know," said Cynthia, as she moved around the bed to study her boss's face - what little of it she could actually see, "I have to confess that I'm glad I wasn't there. I don't know if I could have stood . . . seeing him like that."

Emmett's smile was gentle. "I imagine that you've seen him at his worst. Maybe even more than we have."

She nodded. "I guess - in some ways. I've seen him drunk and drugged out and sick and scared and desperate and . . ." She paused to draw a deep, hoarse breath, remembering how he'd looked in the days following Justin's departure, "lost. But I've never seen him helpless. Brian Kinney . . . doesn't do helpless." Her smile was tremulous. "It just upsets the natural order of things."

Emmett didn't know Cynthia nearly as well as he knew Lindsey, and he was a little hesitant about approaching her, but, in the end, he just stepped up and wrapped his arms around her waist and pulled her back against his chest. "Don't think about that. We have to believe that it's only temporary and just thank God that we were in the right place at the right time to see those guys take off after him, and that Lance was right there, with his car."

"They'd have killed him," said Lindsey, and this time the tears would not be denied although she did not give in to the urge to sob out her anger and her frustrations.

"One way . . . or another," Emmett admitted, remembering his discussion with the police and with Lance and Drew and the conclusions they'd all drawn, and closing his eyes against the images that rose in his mind - the vicious snarls on the faces of Brian's attackers, the hatred and the lust for violence, and the power of the blows they struck at him, and the terrible sound of the impacts of fists and boots and unyielding metal against defenseless flesh. Between those memories and the equally vivid ones of his own experience as a victim, he didn't sleep much these days, and wondered if he ever would again, without having to endure those graphic images playing out in his mind. He sighed as a gentle hand touched his shoulder and he felt soft lips just brush the nape of his neck.
"Hush now," he said gently, his eyes rising to acknowledge Drew’s caress as he took Lindsey’s hand and enclosed it with his own. "You know he wouldn't want you to cry."

"No," said a strained voice, barely audible, "he wouldn't."

Cynthia, of course, was quickest to recover, except for Mathis, who managed to look completely unsurprised, and first to react, as both Emmett and Lindsey dissolved in fresh tears. She leaned forward and took Brian's hand, touching him as gently as if he were fragile and breakable, which, in a sense, he was at that particular moment, although he would quickly demonstrate that he was still Brian Kinney, still invincible, still undefeated. "Welcome back, Boss man," she said firmly, allowing not the slightest hint of a tremor to affect her voice. Still, she couldn't quite resist a compulsion to bend down and drop a fleeting kiss near his ear - one of the few places on his head that was not swathed in bandages.

When he whispered something that she could not quite catch, she moved to place her ear near his mouth so he could repeat it.

Then she smiled.

Two words from him, and she was on cloud nine. How ridiculous was that? But still, Brian Kinney did not pass out praise like sticks of gum. To get it, one had to earn it.

Two words in a broken whisper. "Good girl."

And it was enough.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TBC
Chapter 18

Fuck!

He didn't want to be here, but he'd had no choice.

Fuck!

And now the fucking plane was late, so he'd have to wait around even longer, and he had a momentary urge - almost a compulsion - to run out of the airport and hail a cab and leave his 'escort' in the dust. Only, if he did that, he would not only have to answer to Lance Mathis and his staff, along with half of the Pittsburgh PD; he'd also have to answer to Brian Kinney, once Brian had sufficiently recovered to voice his displeasure, and one thing Brian Kinney had never been loathe to do was use that voice, loudly, vehemently, repeatedly. It was silly of him to worry about it, Justin knew, as they had rarely managed to go more than an hour at a time without getting into some kind of argument over one thing or another, but he was hoping that his first contact with an awake, alert, conscious Brian would involve lots of tongue action - albeit carefully administered due to the patient's condition - and sweet nothings and admissions of regrets for lost time, and not so much of recriminations and accusations.

So he was stuck, in more ways than one.

Fuck!

All he had wanted when he'd dragged himself to bed the previous night, tucked up safe in his mother's townhouse with his fucking bodyguards prowling the premises like hungry tigers, had been to grab a couple of hours of shut-eye to help him shrug off the remnants of jet lag, and rise in the wee hours of the morning to haul himself back to the hospital and wait for Brian to open his eyes. At that point, that had been the sum of all his desires - for Brian to open his eyes and look at him and recognize him.

And yell at him. He knew that was on the menu, without having to be told. He didn't bother speculating on which emotion would be dominant when the moment came - anger or elation. But it didn't matter. He was prepared for either one; the only thing that mattered was that Brian would wake up. Nothing else was relevant.

He had not let himself think beyond that point.

Earlier, when he'd left the hospital, he had intended to go to the loft - to the only place in the world that felt like a real home to him. But he had realized, in route, that the place would be too "Brian", that he would be inundated by memories and flashbacks and visions, and that sleep would never find him there; that, in the final analysis, it wasn't the loft that was his home; it was Brian, and, without him, the loft was just four walls and a floor - beautiful, but empty.

So, after he and Emmett (and their eternally vigilant bodyguards) had shared a quiet drink and a brief conversation at Woody's, he had directed his driver to veer off so he could return to his old home and crawl into his old bed, a remnant of his old life, pre-Brian, seeking nothing but unconsciousness. Still, sleep had not come easily, and he had tossed and turned until physical exhaustion had finally claimed him and pulled him to the brink of oblivion.

Unfortunately, that strange, timeless moment between awareness and slumber had provided the cue for Carl Horvath to enter, stage left, and present his soliloquy.
Justin had known, of course, that his mother was due to fly in early in the morning, had known that she had no idea of what had happened in her absence. Though the local news had been full of it, the attack on Brian had not made the headlines of the national press or the network broadcasts, primarily because it had not happened in New York or LA or Washington; Pittsburgh was still provincial enough to go unnoticed - mostly - by the national media. Thus, Jennifer was flying in without having any idea of what she would learn on her return or even that her son had returned from his adventure in paradise.

And that, he had believed, would be all right. Jennifer was nothing if not adaptable. She would hear it all soon enough, and she would cope, as she always did. But Horvath had insisted on forcing him to see another side of the equation, at the direction of a new player who had not yet made her appearance on the scene.

FBI Special Agent Alexandra Corey - despite the fact that she had yet to set foot in Pittsburgh - apparently had a very long reach and a mind keen enough to see things that others might overlook. According to Detective Horvath, anyway.

It had been pushing two AM when he'd called, and Justin had grabbed for the phone on its first ring, his heart hammering in his chest as he leaped to an erroneous conclusion.

His relief to learn that he'd been wrong had been immediate, but short-lived.

In less than two minutes, he'd decided that Special Agent Alexandra Corey had earned herself a permanent spot at the top of his shit list and that he did not like the way her mind worked, although he could not - in good conscience - dismiss her concerns.

She had certainly done her preliminary homework, coming to conclusions that he would rather not be forced to consider, especially when wrapped up tight in the spectral shadows inherent in the darkest hours of the night. Only, he couldn't refuse.

If she was right, there was simply too much at stake for him to ignore her.

Thus, here he sat in a hard plastic chair, staring with weary, bloodshot eyes at the arrivals/departure board, noting that Flight 1611 was shown as due to arrive in ten minutes. That meant another half-hour, by the time it landed and passengers disembarked, and he wished, for the hundredth time, that he had simply insisted that Horvath dispatch someone else to meet Jennifer and Molly on their arrival and give his mother the bad news. But the detective had pointed out - with annoyingly irrefutable logic - that Jennifer might very well refuse to accept the information provided to her unless it came from someone she could trust, and that, regardless of the source, she would be devastated and bordering on panic when confronted with the possibility that she and her daughter might be in danger from some unknown, vicious assailant, or that her son might be in even greater peril.

That had been the scenario posited by Alexandra Corey, who had examined all the evidence and concluded that the primary target - going all the way back to the attack on Babylon, and maybe even beyond - might well have been Brian Kinney and, if so, that those who were close to him - those he loved and cared about - might well be in extreme danger. Especially in the case of the young man who was widely recognized as his lover, along with anyone who might have family ties or close relationships to either of them.

Even the surviving Kinney family members - mother and daughter - were under discreet surveillance pending resolution of the investigation, which, Justin was certain, would not come soon.

He sighed and sat back, bracing his neck against hard plastic and allowing his mind to drift, watching idly as two birds - wrens, maybe, or sparrows, and how should he know since, in his estimation, one bird was much like another - flitted around through the exposed metal rafters overhead. There were, he thought, plenty of places in Pittsburgh that could be described as uninspiring, but few more so than this very drab, very utilitarian airport. He felt sorry for the birds.

He closed his eyes and tried to think of something else - something bright and warm and pleasant and filled with color. Like Liberty Avenue. His smile was tentative, reflecting the fact that he really, really didn't want to be here. He wanted to be with Brian, holding his hand, touching his face, breathing his scent. Savoring his essence - the thing that made him Brian Kinney, that distinguished him from everyone else on the planet.

And even more than that, he wanted to be walking down Liberty Avenue at Brian's side, waving to friends and acquaintances, enjoying the color and the raucous atmosphere around them, laughing at the antics of Emmett and Ted, or exchanging eye-rolls over Michael and Ben's latest exhibition of pseudo-hetero-convention, noticing but pretending not to see all the lustful looks and envious glances directed toward them from the people who watched them pass by, engaging in the verbal sparring that was the life-breath of their relationship - taunting, teasing, squabbling . . . wanting. Christ! He had never wanted anything or anyone more than he had wanted Brian Kinney - every minute of every day. How the fuck had he let himself forget that, or let someone else convince him that anything was more important than the feeling that engulfed him when he was in Brian's arms? A feeling of perfect belonging, of rightness, of destiny fulfilled.

Justin loved Lindsey - he really did - and he knew that Brian also loved her, in his own rather oddball way. But sometimes - like now - he just wanted to smack her and sneer at all of her artistic pretentions. He had gone to New York because he'd allowed her fantasies to infect him with a hunger for recognition which he'd never experienced before, a hunger that made him forget what he would have to give up in order to reach for the brass ring she had dangled in front of him.

Fuck!

With an impatient shrug, he stood and moved toward the arrival area where his mother would soon (please God!) make her appearance, as he suppressed a grimace of irritation when his 'escort' took up his customary position behind him, strolling along and projecting an easy nonchalance that betrayed nothing of the man's skill and professionalism. Justin had definitely not wanted to like the man, nor to admire his abilities, but he'd reluctantly come to realize that Jared Hilliard was probably exactly the kind of individual you'd want to have around in a moment of dire need.

Tall, well-built, strong and graceful, the light-skinned black man had incredible eyes of a color somewhere between green and blue and managed, somehow, to fade into the background and achieve a level of obscurity despite startling good looks and a brooding physical presence. In addition, he had an easy, self-deprecating humor that Justin found appealing, and he caught himself speculating on how Brian would react to the man, for whom the phrase 'smoldering good looks' might have been coined.

Then he frowned, realizing abruptly that he didn't like where his thoughts were leading.

He and Brian had never had a monogamous relationship, unless one took into account those strange, surreal weeks following the bombing of Babylon, when neither of them had been themselves. He had never admitted to anyone - except Brian himself, of course - that he had not much cared for the people they had become during that period. They had both tried to walk the straight and narrow, and become strangers with little or nothing in common, and that, as much as anything else, had laid waste to their plans for building a life together.

Bottom line? Brian would be all over this guy, if he got a good look. And if Hilliard was amenable. Justin wasn't yet sure, but Brian would be. That much was certain; the Kinney Gay-dar was virtually infallible.

Now all Justin had to do was figure out how he felt about the prospect. He closed his eyes and let his mind drift. Brian - fully recovered and restored and beautiful, smoldering hazel eyes undressing the delectable bodyguard and sending an unmistakable message in the process; Brian, shucking out of his clothes, never bothering with buttons - just pulling the shirt off over his head, along with the tie and anything else that might be in his way; Brian, sprawled on the bed, perfect body on display and perfect lips smiling an invitation; Brian . . . irresistible. And . . . what the fuck was the matter with him? He had just returned from a year in which he'd been denied the man, the body, the person who meant most to him, and here he was fantasizing about that same man, enticing someone else into his bed.

What the fuck?

_He_ wanted Brian - exclusively, permanently, privately - with no outside intervention or interference. Didn't he?

He opened his eyes and found Jared Hilliard staring at him, with brows arched and beautiful eyes alight with speculation and a tiny smile.

What the fuck?

"Justin?"

Thank God, and never mind why.

"Justin, what are you doing here?"

"Hi, Mom. Welcome home, and let's get your luggage while I tell you all about it."

He really hated admitting that he was wrong about something, but it was immediately obvious that Horvath - and that smart-ass FBI bitch - had been right.

He'd barely begun to tell her what she needed to know, when Jennifer stopped walking, hands clasped to her chest as if fighting to breathe. He was forced to pause and wrap his arms around her, with Molly gathered close to his side, and simply hold her, to give her time to adjust, to absorb what no mother should have to endure. She needed him now, and he could not just walk away, even though he didn't want to be here; he wanted to be with Brian, holding his hand and waiting for the moment of his awakening. But Brian, no matter how wounded, was strong - was always capable of surviving, of facing whatever life might throw at him and facing it alone if necessary, even when others could not.

It was one of the things he loved most about the man - and also one of the things he loved least - an intimate part of the enigma that was Brian Kinney.

Fuck!

Jennifer's eyes grew wider and darker as Justin talked, and by the time he was done, her face was haunted and haggard as she contemplated the possibility of danger to her beloved son and daughter at the hands of some unknown cretin hiding out there in the darkness of his own evil, plotting his sick revenge against Brian Kinney individually, or against those who inhabited his world. She had known such fear before, but she was no better equipped to handle it this time than last. Memories blended with dread, and she flinched from the thought of Justin, bloodied and bludgeoned and suspended between life and death - past or future.

And one thing more.

When, she wondered, had this happened? When had the brash, brutally candid young scoundrel who had stolen her son's heart managed, somehow, without her knowledge or consent, to work his way into her own? When had it begun to matter to her what fate might hold in store for Brian Kinney, who certainly neither wanted nor needed her concern or her care but . . . had earned them anyway?

She closed her eyes and thought about Brian, hearing pale whispers of everything that Justin was not saying. Then she deliberately allowed herself to remember the first time she had ever seen him, fighting down the pangs of resentment that always rose in her when she thought about that moment. The memory was still vivid and harsh and heavy in her chest, stealing her breath away, as she retasted the bitterness of the sight of this man, this grown man, and the knowledge of what he had done to her innocent son.

And yet . . . she could admit now what she could never have faced back then. Even at that moment - hating him, resenting him, loathing him - she had seen it, and the voice had whispered in her mind.

Christ! He's beautiful. And together, they're breathtaking.

She had known it, even then, years before Kinney had finally faced his own truth, had finally admitted that he had fallen in love with her son; she had known that Justin's life would be irrevocably intertwined with that of Brian Kinney.

And now . . . dear God! What would happen to them now?

Emmett stood silently, hands clasped tightly behind his back, awaiting his turn to welcome Brian back to the land of the living.

Well, not exactly. More like waiting his turn for execution, for he knew that Brian was not going to be pleased with him. He had, after all, been charged with one task, and one task only, and he had managed to fail spectacularly.

Brian Kinney was not the kind of man who tolerated failure or fools, and Emmett's first instinct, on realizing that Brian had awakened during the ugly exchange between the members of the group who were supposed to be his friends, had been to hit the door running and not look back.

But the lapse had been brief. He always thought it ironic that he - the ultimate drag queen - should have such an unswerving sense of what it meant to be a real man, a definition that had nothing to do with sexual identity and everything to do with honor and decency. He had acquired it not from his father or his other male relatives, but from his beloved Aunt Lula and the grandmother who had died when he was still living in Hazlehurst, Mississippi - the only members of his family who had ever really loved him and accepted him for what he was. It would be a shameful thing to run away from the consequences of his own actions.

So he would stay here and await Brian's displeasure, no matter how much he dreaded the lash of that sultry voice and the ice that could flash in those beautiful eyes so much better suited to seduction.

He deeply regretted that Brian had wakened in time to overhear the ugly commentary from his so-called bosom buddies. And there was little doubt that he had heard it, even though he'd said almost nothing about it. But it was there to see, should anyone care to look for it - not in his words, but in the tone of voice and the shadows in his eyes, barely visible within the frame of snowy bandages.
He had spoken to Cynthia first, their words barely audible and very brief, and almost entirely professional, except for an initial emotional exchange, demonstrated by the quick brush of a kiss and hands clasped gently. Then Lindsey had pushed forward, barely able to restrain a desire to throw herself into his arms and obviously determined to distract him from what he had overheard, carefully phrasing questions about his injuries and avoiding any reference to the attack, and babbling about Gus and how eager he was to see his dad.

At that point, Emmett and Drew had exchanged glances, wondering if they were the only ones who noticed how much Brian was striving not to say, dismissing her concerns with typical Kinney aplomb.

Emmett had turned away then, finding it too painful to watch the tears welling in Lindsey's eyes and the extraordinary gentleness with which Brian managed to lift a hand to wipe them away. Instead, he chose to stare out into the growing brightness of the morning and wonder how many times the exact same thing had happened in Brian's life - how many times he had simply stood tall and firm, shrugging off the pettiness and the jealousy and letting it fall away, never allowing himself to react or respond to the hurt. Probably, never even allowing himself to feel it, although Emmett wasn't exactly sure how one could achieve that level of stoicism. Unless it had become necessary for survival. Unless one had endured so much thoughtless cruelty and withstood so much pain at the hands of those who purported to be friends that it became automatic to raise new layers of insulation, new walls to deflect new hurts, so that, eventually, one became invulnerable, untouchable.

Alone.

Reluctantly, he allowed his mind to drift back, to sift through years of random memories, of nasty little barbed comments dropped deliberately into lulls in the conversation and intended to be overheard, of snide observations uttered to compensate for feelings of petty jealousy and inadequacy and the gay equivalent of penis envy, of gleeful responses to every occurrence that could be twisted to reflect badly on Brian or might result in some kind of discomfort for him, even though he never once displayed such a reaction, of the cruel smiles and venal laughter at his expense whenever anything happened that might prove painful or inconvenient or costly for him, as if he'd deserved their scorn and ill will.

And how - exactly - had he done that?

Emmett was appalled to realize that he couldn't come up with a single rational response, except for the one truly unforgivable sin; Brian had earned their contempt and enmity by having the flair and the intelligence and the moxie and the courage to be the man they all wanted to be - and couldn't.

"Will you kindly stop dripping all over me."

Emmett grinned. Now there was the Brian Kinney they all knew and . . .

*Christ! We really do love him, although I don't think any of us have ever realized how much, or stopped to consider how often we turn to him or how much we need him. Or what we would do . . . Christ!"

"Sorry.” Lindsey managed an awkward little laugh, obviously grateful for something to cover up the silences that were dwelling all around them, filled with words none of them dared say, as her eyes remained fixed on a patch of bare skin just above Brian's ear, as if she couldn't bear to look anywhere else.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
Brian watched as the mother of his child tried not to stare, not to see and comprehend what she was seeing, and he took a deep breath, understanding that this was the first hurdle - the first instance of people trying to be kind, trying not to flinch away from the sight of him. He would get used to it - in time - just as he'd managed to get used to other things over the years. It was amazing what one could learn to endure when one had no other choice.

"Why are you still here?" he asked, in a soft, strained voice.

"Where else would I be?" she replied, reaching out to take his hand.

"With Gus," he answered, managing to convey his impatience in two clipped syllables.

"Gus will be here soon," she said, thinking to reassure him.

"Why?" Even more clipped and more impatient.

"Because he wants to see his daddy."

"Lindsey." He managed, barely, to avoid snapping at her. "He won't even recognize me, and, if he does figure out who I am, it's going to scare the shit out of him. Don't even think about . . ."

"Don't you even want to see him?" Typical Lindsey - all sentiment, no sense.

"Why? So I can watch him scream and try to run? All he's going to see is Frankenstein's monster. Don't you get that?"

"But . . ."

"No buts," he said, his voice sinking to a whisper. "I'm not going to subject him to that."

"But what do I tell him when he asks to . . ."

"Tell him I love him. For now, that's all he needs to know. He shouldn't have to think about the rest."

He lifted his hand and smoothed a lock of hair back from her face. "Now, go make peace with your husband who is bound to be majorly pissed off because you're here with me instead of . . . wherever with her. I need to talk to Emmett."

For a moment, she hesitated, and he could see that some small part of her wanted to argue, or, more accurately, felt that she should argue, should insist on remaining at his side, even while a larger part of her was grateful for the reprieve. He debated whether or not to comment on it, but decided that it was better to ignore it and allow her to escape with dignity. He was sure it was a reaction that would become more and more familiar with time.

He also noted the sympathetic glance she directed toward Emmett and almost opened his mouth to offer reassurance. But that would have been completely out of character, and he wasn't quite ready to face the questions that would undoubtedly arise too soon for his liking. So he just waited until she made good her escape before shifting his gaze to the big Nelly-bottom. When Emmett stepped toward him, obviously nervous but managing to maintain eye contact in spite of it, Brian felt a twinge of conscience over what he felt compelled to do, but he was caught off guard when his old friend began to speak without waiting to be addressed.

"Brian, I'm so sorry. I'm so sorry."

"For what? For not doing the one thing I asked of you?"
He was caught even more off guard when Emmett shook his head. "No. Not that. I'm sorry that you had to hear all that bullshit. I know you've always understood why they all . . . why we all treat you like . . ."

"The black sheep of the family?" If he could have smiled, he would have. It was unfair, perhaps, to enjoy Emmett's squirming, since he had been one of those least guilty of multiple offenses, but even tiny nuances of vengeance should be savored when offered up so sweetly.

Emmett nodded. "You didn't deserve it."

This time, he did smile, and felt the burn of abused muscles and tissue around his mouth urge him to avoid doing so again. "After all these years," he said softly, "do you really think I give a shit?"

Emmett's smile was very gentle. "Of course you don't."

Brian closed his eyes, and was grateful that his injuries and the bandages that covered them made it unnecessary for him to guard his expressions. He was, of course, a master of doing so as he'd had years and years of practice, but he was pretty sure it was an art he would no longer need to depend on. He doubted anyone would be looking close enough to notice from here on out. "I assume he refused to listen to reason."

"I did try, Brian. Honest to God. I told the cops, and I made sure that nobody in the family called him. But . . . somebody did. I don't know who, and there was just no way to stop him. You know how determined he can be when . . ."

"When duty calls." And even though the face was completely obscured, there was no way to avoid hearing the caustic wit erupting in those three simple words.

"Duty?"

"Yeah. What else?"

"Haven't you figured it out yet?" Emmett did not mean to sound quite so irritated; God knew Brian had enough to deal with without having to fend off verbal jabs, but this was really too much.

"Figured out what? That he's here because we're 'committed'? Because it's the 'right thing' to do?"

"Brian, you can't . . ."

"Get out!"

"What?" Emmett's eyes were suddenly huge, and dark with tears unshed. "Why would you . . ."

"Because," thick with acrid sarcasm, "I don't want you here."

"But . . ."

"Mathis!"

"Yeah, Boss?"

Brian turned to meet the steady gaze of his chief of security. "You still work for me?"

"Unless you're firing me." Mathis was not - quite - smiling.

"Then get him out of here."
Emmett watched in disbelief as the security chief turned toward him, eyes cold and determined, and knew that, if he chose to turn this into a confrontation, he would inevitably lose.

"I don't understand you," he said slowly, looking back at Brian and trying to determine what it was he was seeing in those hazel eyes.

"Few do." Was that a glint of humor, of smug satisfaction he saw there? Or was it something else - something darker and heavier?

Emmett took a deep breath and squared his shoulders. He really didn't want to allow himself to express anger or frustration at such a moment, and he didn't want to fall back on Lana-Turner theatrics to save his dignity, but there were times when a drag-queen just had to do what a drag-queen had to do. Thus, he spun toward the door and made his exit with a flourish, pausing only to direct a smoldering glance toward Drew Boyd. "Are you coming?"

Boyd's smile was achingly tender. "In a minute. Wait for me in the hall."

When Emmett was gone, there was a moment of expectant silence, before all four occupants of the room shared a moment of awkward laughter. Then Boyd stepped forward so that he could look directly down into Brian's face. "Under other circumstance," he said, with a diffident smile, "I'd beat the shit out of you for treating him like that."

"That would be redundant," replied Brian, completely deadpan.

"But, for the moment, I think I'll let it pass."

"That's big of you. Now why don't you toddle along and go console your boyfriend. There are things I need to discuss with . . . my people."

Boyd nodded and started to turn away, but was held in place by Brian's hand clasping his sleeve with a surprising amount of strength for a man who had just awakened from a coma. The big quarterback allowed himself to be pulled forward until he was close enough to hear the words that the patient whispered. It was only one sentence and, when he pulled back to try to read the eyes within the bandages, Boyd could almost believe that he'd imagined it.

Then he smiled and straightened up, confining his response to a quick nod, eyes filled with a soft glow of understanding and, perhaps, something more - something that recognized and mourned the textured layers of tragedy and unavoidable destiny.

---

Cynthia had been glad to be given tasks that required her to focus on the minutia of the situation, to handle pending business decisions and practical problems, to address the needs of clients and work assignments, to find Matt Keller and advise him that Brian wanted to see him.

Thus, she left the room feeling relieved and feeling guilty for feeling relieved, knowing that Brian had seen and understood what she was feeling - and why.

It had never mattered to her that her boss was a creature of rare beauty, except for the fact that it was a source of pride for him and a formidable weapon in his ongoing assault against the narrow minds of the advertising establishment. After an initial hormonal stir - something she was sure every woman experienced on first sight of Brian Kinney - she had shaken off any latent feelings of attraction and determined that it was more important, from a professional standpoint, that she get to know the man beneath the façade rather than the luminary who lived on the surface.
And she had never regretted that decision; nor did she regret it now.

But being one of the few individuals ever allowed to get close to the inner Brian had never prevented her from enjoying the gorgeousness of the package or his ability to use it to his advantage.

And now - Matt Keller's promises notwithstanding - that gift, that package, might be gone forever, irrevocably damaged. It would not impact how she saw him or how she felt about him; she would make sure of that. But it might very well impact how he saw himself, and that could create fundamental changes in the man he was.

That was something she wasn't sure she could deal with.

So she set about her errands with firm resolve and a degree of satisfaction in having enough to do to allow her to avoid thinking too much.

Only she'd failed to anticipate one thing.

Michael.

When she rounded the corner to approach the nurses' station, she realized that she should not have been surprised that he had waited. The only real surprise was that he had done so alone, that there was no sign of his mother or his lover or any of the rest of his customary entourage.

She ignored him at first, taking her time in addressing the charge nurse and arranging for Dr. Keller to be paged to Brian's room, but if she'd hoped that Michael might take the hint and take his leave, she was doomed to disappointment.

When she had finished her conversation and carefully reviewed some insurance release forms, she turned to face the young man, schooling her features to show no emotion beyond mild curiosity.

"Michael," she said firmly, "I don't have a lot of time, so . . ."

"Cynthia," he interrupted, his eyes downcast and bruised, somehow, as if battered by the emotions raging inside him, "please. Just . . . give me a minute."

She wanted to say no; more than that, she wanted to shout at him, to tell him to stand up straight and stop acting like a pussy, or to get down on his knees and beg for forgiveness he didn't deserve. Either way would be an improvement over this timid, self-effacing demeanor. Still, this was Michael, who was beloved of Brian Kinney, whether or not he deserved it.

"Come with me," she said finally, leading him into an unoccupied consultation room and closing the door to give them some privacy.

"Michael," she began . . .

"Wait!" he replied sharply, his voice breaking as he struggled to find the right words. "I know what you're thinking. I know that I've . . ."

"Sit down, Michael," she said abruptly, accepting that this was a conversation she was not going to be able to avoid. "Maybe it's time we had a little talk, whether I've got time for it or not."

"I know what you're going to say," Michael answered.

"Do you? Somehow I doubt that," she replied. "Because, if you did, you probably would have run out of here screaming before coming anywhere near me."
"What do you mean?"

"What I mean," she said, her voice steady and flat, "is that you should have been the one to stand up and tell your so-called friends and family where to stick their fucking attitudes. Instead, Emmett had to do it, while you sat there with your thumb up your ass, letting them do what they always do - vent their anger and petty jealousy at Brian's expense. Would it interest you in the least to know that . . . he heard it all? He was awake the whole time. Doesn't that make you want to run out and tell them? It'll probably make their day, and yours."

He sat heavily, dropping into the nearest chair and rubbing his face with his hands. "Shit!"

"I'm always amazed that you guys never seem to figure it out," she observed, "that you always get caught. Do you really think he doesn't know what all of you think of him?"

"But I always speak up for him. You should know that."

"I know you make a token attempt," she retorted. "Occasionally. But I also know something else - something no one else knows, but you. Which makes it even harder to understand how you can just stand by and let it happen. He trusts you, Michael. And he loves you. The only person he ever loved more was Justin, but that was a different kind of love. Which might explain everything, I guess, if you're like your mother, and can't forgive the fact that he was never able to give you the kind of love you wanted from him. He loves you like a brother - like you were blood - but maybe that wasn't good enough. It certainly wasn't good enough for your mom. But . . . Christ, Michael! How could you have turned your back on him the way you did? How could you forget all the times he was there for you? Even when Ben wound up in the hospital, and you were scared shitless that he might die, who came through for you? Who bolstered you up and gave you the strength to face it? Who dropped everything to be there when you needed him? He spent years and years taking care of you, and when I think about how you betrayed him, how it was more important to you to impress your cunty new neighbors than return the loyalty that he showed you every day of his life, I wish . . . Shit! I wish I was big enough to punch your lights out. And it's pretty obvious to me - hell, to everybody if they only had the balls to admit it - that you only decided to treat him like shit when you'd found somebody else to watch out for you, when you thought you didn't need him any more. So you figured you'd get even, since he wouldn't lie and pretend to feel something he didn't. You decided you'd do everything you could to pay him back for not giving you the one thing you wanted from him - the lie that he wouldn't tell."

"No, I . . ."

"Do you have any idea," she said coldly, "how many people have ever - ever - seen Brian Kinney cry? No, I can see that you don't, so let me enlighten you, dear, sweet, innocent Michael. There are exactly two of us. That's how much he trusted you, how much he believed in you. You and I know things about him that no one else knows. Not even Justin. We know what his parents, his family did to him, how much they hurt him, how strong he had to be to survive. Things he's never said to anyone else, things no one else would even believe. So how do we come to this - this unbelievable bullshit, which is just another example of how you repay him? And now . . . what? You want me to run interference, to clear the way for you to take your place at his side again? Until the next time it's not convenient for you to remember what he should mean to you?"

"He told you all this?" he asked, appalled at how much she knew, and just slightly angry although he couldn't have said exactly why.

She stared at him. "What? You're insulted because he talked to me? Well, let me remind you of something, Michael. Everybody - even the mighty Brian Kinney - needs someone to talk to, sometimes. Although, in my case, it was usually when he was drunk as a lord or high as a kite, or so Goddamned hurt that he just couldn't manage to keep it to himself."

He flushed and looked down, flinching away from the contempt he read in her eyes.

"Jesus! Don't you people ever think beyond the end of your noses? Don't any of you ever try to understand how he feels or why he does the things he does? Or is it just easier, not to mention more comfortable, to assume the worst? Even when you should know better."

He continued to stare down at his hands, hardly daring to look up to meet her gaze. She was right, and he knew it, but it was something he didn't want to think about. He had never wanted to think about it, because it was easier not to know. "So . . . are you going to help me? Or not?"

She sighed, obviously considering her options. "If I do," she said finally, "it's not for you. Whether you deserve it or not, Brian loves you."

"So you'll talk to him for me?"

"I'll talk to him," she replied, "but not for you. The choice is his, and I'll expect you to abide by it."

He nodded and leaned forward impulsively to give her a hug, assuming immediately that everything would work out as he wanted, since Lindsey had been completely right in one of her observations: Brian really did always forgive them. It was only logical to expect him to do so again.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

After Cynthia's departure, Lance Mathis moved to the window to gaze down into the park across the street, watching a group of elderly men sitting on park benches, enjoying the growing warmth of the spring morning. He was careful not to look directly at his boss, sensing that Brian needed a few moments to organize his thoughts and figure out how to express them most efficiently. Mathis understood that there weren't many people who would go to such lengths to make sure their words would be understood so completely, and he admired both the ability and the determination.

But he knew, instinctively, that he was not going to enjoy this discussion. Kinney was entirely too perceptive - too bright to have failed to ferret out the truth of the situation.

When the first comment came, it was exactly as he had foreseen - straightforward, to the point, and unassailable.

"This was no random act of violence." It was not a question. "This was personal."

Mathis confined his response to a nod, knowing that Brian had more to say.

"If you're as smart as you think you are, you've already figured that out. So where's Horvath?"

"He'll be here later," Mathis answered. "He's waiting for the big boys to make an appearance."

Brian nodded. "FBI?"

"Yes."

"A hate crime then."

"Yes. And these people are extremely good at their jobs. Just so you know. I've worked with them before."

Brian nodded, but did not appear overly impressed. "And have you - or they - come up with a theory about how far it goes, or what it means?"

Mathis moved forward and stood looking down at his boss, trying - without much success - to read the expression in those shadowed eyes. "Only the obvious - that you were the primary target. You've made a lot of enemies, Brian. Possibly very powerful enemies. It might have started out as a political issue, but you said it yourself. At the end, it was personal."

Brian was silent for a while, his eyes turning toward the light streaming in through the window, but Mathis was certain that whatever he was seeing had nothing to do with what was really there. "It's not over. Is it?"

The security chief could not quite suppress a sigh. "No way to know. But you've already figured that out."

"Yeah. I have."

Mathis was surprised to realize that he didn't want to hear the rest, although he knew he had no choice. "So . . . what have you decided to do?"

The answer was little more than a whisper. "What I have to."

"Brian, I'm very good at what I do, and I can . . ."

"Can what? " Brian's voice was suddenly strong and steady, without a nuance of uncertainty. "Guarantee that nothing else will happen, that no one else will get hurt?"

Mathis hesitated, and it was obvious that he wanted to give the reassurance that Brian was asking for; it was equally obvious that he couldn't, in good conscience.

Instead, he settled for taking Brian's hand, as if to shake it. "So tell me what you want me to do."

"Whatever you can to repair what's broken," Brian answered. "But this is my fuck up. Mine to fix. Just . . . try to be in the right place to pick up the pieces, if I screw it up."

"All right, but . . ."

"And one more thing. The main thing, which has two parts."

Mathis understood, somehow, that this was the crucial moment - the point of this entire conversation - as he watched Brian awkwardly shift his arm - cast and all - to allow him to touch the fingers of his left hand to the bracelet that circled his right wrist; the meaning of the gesture was not lost on the security chief. Then the young father turned his head slightly, just enough to be able to see the photograph of Gus that Lindsey had left on the table beside his bed. "You work for me," he said softly, voice barely above a whisper, "and I'm telling you that you have one job that supercedes everything else. You use whatever resources you might need to try to prevent further trouble. Money is no object; you do what's necessary. But this one thing is your personal responsibility, and I want your word on it."

Mathis nodded. "You have it."

"Then you understand what I'm saying? If it comes down to a choice . . ." Brian's eyes were suddenly filled with a terrible, steely resolve. "There is no choice. And no bullshit excuses. Got it?"

The security chief wanted to pretend that he did not comprehend, that he could hedge his bets and claim a simple misunderstanding should the need arise. But he couldn't. One did not play word games with such a request. It meant too much; it asked too much. He would follow Brian's orders if there were no alternative, even though he wasn't entirely sure how he would ever learn to live with it.

"Got it," he answered finally.

But Brian was not quite ready to let it go. "You understand that this is the only thing that matters to me. If anything happens to . . ."

"It won't." Mathis met Brian's gaze squarely, his eyes clear and filled with resolve. "I swear it."

Brian spent a moment studying the man's face. "Fuck this up - either part of it," he said finally, "and you're a dead man. That's a promise."

Mathis did not smile, for, in truth, he wasn't entirely sure that the man wasn't dead serious.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Sometimes, she thought, you learned more from what a person didn't say. Like now.

Cynthia did not allow herself the luxury of a sigh. She had been playing this role for many years, and now was certainly not the time to start regretting it. It was what she was expected to do. She was Brian Kinney's good right hand, and if that sometimes meant acting as the palace guard, then it was just another part of the job description. Even when it went against the grain.

He had not explained his reasoning; he frequently didn't.

But she knew the whys and wherefores. She only wished she didn't, as she walked into the waiting room, knowing that the next few minutes would not be pleasant. But it wasn't really the next few minutes that concerned her. After all, she didn't get paid (and paid extremely well, incidentally) to waste time worrying about Michael Novotny or any of the members of his pseudo-family.

But there was very little she could do for the man to whom she did owe her loyalty, and that was the really hard part of all of this. She knew, better than anyone, what this day would cost him, even as she realized that, this time, he would never speak of it. There were still some things too personal, too intimate, to be put into words. He had told her what he needed her to do, expecting her to follow his instructions and ask no questions, but that didn't mean he didn't understand how difficult her tasks would be, or appreciate the fact that she would do them, no matter how much she might prefer not to. The day wouldn't be easy for her either.

Michael was no longer alone when she found him. Ben and Hunter were with him, and Debbie had obviously had time to regroup and reassess and make up her mind to reassert her place in the ensemble of Kinney manipulators.

Cynthia felt a twinge of sympathy as she recognized the flare of joy in Michael's eyes when he saw her coming toward him. It was obvious that he'd already leapt to a conclusion about how he expected things to go.

"So," he said by way of greeting, "is it safe to go in?"

She took a deep breath and put on her most professional demeanor. "I'm sorry, Michael. He's not seeing anyone today."

It was truly amazing, she thought, how quickly that boyish countenance could morph into crushed martyrdom, complete with puppy-dog eyes and trembling lower lip.
It was Debbie, of course, who stepped forward to speak for them all.

"Now just wait a minute here. You have no right to keep him from us. We're family, after all. His only real family, and . . ."

"Mrs. Novotny." The voice was firm and unyielding, and Debbie faltered, unaccustomed to being addressed so sternly. "Please don't make this any harder than it has to be. Cynthia is simply following Mr. Kinney's instructions. It would be a shame if hospital security had to be called in to reinforce them."

But Debbie was not one to give up without a fight. "And just who the fuck do you think you are?" she demanded.

Lance Mathis smiled, and the entire group who had turned to stare at him felt a distinct chill as they noted the ice in his eyes. "I'm the man who gets paid to see that he gets what he wants. And what he wants, right now, is to not have to deal with his . . . 'friends.'" Though the inflection on the final word was slight, they all heard it and knew exactly what it meant.

Ben shifted slightly, and, for a moment, seemed to debate the wisdom of challenging Mathis on Michael's behalf. But he quickly abandoned that notion as he saw the security chief turn to study him, dark eyes filled with steely resolve. The professor immediately relaxed his posture as he realized that his size advantage would mean nothing in a confrontation with someone with advanced combat skills and the will to use them.

Finally, reluctantly accepting the futility of further protest, the group gathered their things and headed for the elevators, as Cynthia and Mathis turned away. But Hunter had lingered for a moment after the rest of them departed, and laid his hand on Cynthia's arm to delay her.

"Just do me a favor," he said quickly. "Just tell him . . . he's still Brian Kinney - to me."

Then he was gone, and Cynthia busied herself with digging for something in her handbag, refusing to meet the solemn gaze Mathis turned on her. He was not, of course, the least bit fooled, but he decided to let her think she'd managed to conceal the shimmer in her eyes. She was a spunky, resourceful woman, with the tenacity of a bulldog, and he admired her tremendously, and had no desire to embarrass her.

"Nice kid," he observed, deliberately walking away to return to Brian's room and prepare for the next task at hand, the one he would rather have avoided if he could.

Cynthia, with exactly the same thought in mind, followed reluctantly.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

Britin! Perhaps the name had not - quite - been brilliant, but it had grown on him. Briefly, anyway. For as long as the dream had lasted.

The last night there had been magical, although he had been the only one to understand that it would be the last night. He had chosen not to mention it to Justin, realizing that there was no point in underscoring the inevitability of the truth he had discovered.

He would allow Justin to hold on to his fantasy, for as long as he could, knowing that he would awaken to the starkness of reality soon enough.

And now, it was only a memory, fading slowly into the tapestry of his life.
But he could still go back, still recall enough details to bring it vividly to life.

The crackle of the fire generating showers of sparks to rise into the darkness of the chimney and dropping reflections of brilliance on the hardwood floors; the velvety crimson of the duvet and the way it provided perfect contrast for the pale luster of Justin's hair, and the luxurious texture of silk sheets against warm skin; a tray of appetizers sitting on a low table by the bed, offering foie gras, turkey Galantine with truffles, mousse de Saumon Fumé, and mushroom quiches, along with a fine bottle of cognac, and a separate platter of the tiramisu that was Justin's favorite; the soft glow spreading out from clusters of candles scattered around the room, painting the shadows with traces of golden radiance; the blended fragrance of the gardenias, rubrium lilies, and eucalyptus that filled the huge porcelain vases flanking the full windows; the mellow drift of soft romantic voices from the speakers - Melissa Manchester and la Streisand and the Isley Brothers; the sound track from Moulin Rouge.

And, if he concentrated, he could still call up the lyrics rendered in Patti LaBelle's dulcet contralto:

"Give me the world,
And I'll give you heaven.
Love will set us free
As long as we believe
The best is yet to come."*

He had tried not to listen, not to recognize the irony of hearing that song in those circumstances.

Most of all, he could remember Justin, in all his perfection: skin like pale satin, face flushed with need, exquisite lips rough and swollen with passion, pupils dilated and rimmed with sapphire, warm breath tasting uniquely Justin, body trembling with anticipation.

He had knelt at the foot of the bed and found it almost impossible to catch his breath as he surveyed the feast laid out before him, his cock steel-hard and twitching as he tried to resist an overwhelming urge to simply leap forward and plunder that soft, yielding body. Justin had smiled, knowing exactly what was in store for him, reading Brian as easily as a printed page, and biting his lip, barely able to contain his desire.

Brian had crawled forward, and draped himself over that supple body, easing himself down and fitting himself into the v between his lover's legs, hardness meeting hardness. He had closed his eyes then, indulging a need to memorize the sensation, to store it up so that he would be able to call it up. When it was gone.

For he had known the truth, even then, even when he'd determined that he would not speak of it. In just two days, Justin would be gone, and the 'For Sale' signs would go up in front of the house. 'Britin' would revert to what it had been before - just another big country house, with a tennis court and swimming pool and stables - and no one would ever realize what it might have become.

For a while, they had simply gazed into each other's eyes, neither quite sure what to say. After a time, Brian had leaned in and begun exploring the face, the mouth, the body that he loved so well, saying with actions what he chose not to say with words. Then Justin had turned the tables, and pushed Brian over onto his back so that he could proceed to initiate his own exploration of the exquisite body beneath him.

They had taken their time, stretching out the experience until finally, unable to hold off any longer, Justin had slipped a condom over Brian's leaking cock, greased it with a liberal portion of lube, and then lifted his body until he was in position to push down and impale himself, gasping as he felt the rigid hardness breach the first ring of muscle. Then he had pressed down, until he was filled, ignoring the initial pain until it gave way before the first wave of euphoria, when he began to ride, leaning forward periodically to explore Brian's mouth with lips and tongue, until desperate need compelled him to move faster and push harder. At that point, Brian had gripped him with bruising hands and held him firm while he thrust up into molten tightness, thrusting harder and harder still until they had both fallen over the edge of rapture, into a star-struck landscape of mindless oblivion.

Afterwards, they had lain together in silence, neither knowing what to say, both sensing that it was a good-bye of one sort or another.

The house would survive perfectly well without them. The only question - unasked - was whether they would survive without the house.

In the end, it had been Brian who extinguished the fire and doused the lights and locked the door behind them as they walked out of the house for the last time.

It had been Brian who never looked back. Not even once.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Brian wasn't sleeping - exactly. Instead, he was drifting between planes of existence, floating on a layer of intravenous painkiller and exploring a painfully reconstructed memory. It was preferable, for the moment, to inhabiting reality, but he knew it couldn't last.

When he gradually became aware of muted words and whispered exchanges in the room around him, he felt a momentary urge to sink deeper within himself and allow sleep to take him, to avoid the necessity of re-entering the moment.

Only he couldn't quite convince himself. It was a matter of taking the coward's way out and postponing the inevitable, so he took a moment to reinforce his resolve before reaching for full consciousness, bracing for what lay ahead.

But he would allow himself one tiny indulgence, one infinite moment of time suspended before stepping into the next phase of his life. He was careful not to move a single muscle, to allow his eyes to open only slightly. Just enough to see the face of the individual who was standing at his bedside, eyes moving down the length of his body. Just enough to revel in the gentle stroke of fingers trailing across a patch of bare skin on his bicep - a touch he was pretty sure he would never experience again.

God! Why must the little twat always be so beautiful? Why couldn't that beauty at least begin to fade, so that it would not be quite so painful to behold? He was frowning, of course, blue eyes dark with concern, undoubtedly distressed by what he saw, but there was no mistaking the faint smile just touching those perfect lips. A smile that said he was glad to be home, glad to be in this place, glad to be at the side of the man he still loved, regardless of the circumstances.

Brian knew that Justin did love him, only not - quite - enough. Not even close to enough to compensate for everything it would cost to indulge it. That was what had sent him to New York, and to Hollywood before that, and to his twink fiddler even before that. The love was real. But it had never been enough, and it sure as hell wasn't enough now to justify risking life and limb.

It was time, he knew; the only course of action open to him was to close the door on the past and lock it tight enough to assure that it could never be re-opened.

He opened his eyes and waited to see how long it would take before anyone noticed; he took advantage of the short-lived chance to look his fill.
It didn't take long at all.

"You're awake." There wasn't a trace of uncertainty in Justin's comment. "Are you . . ."

"What the fuck are you doing here?" His voice was scratchy, slightly hoarse, but steady enough.

"Nice to see you too," the blonde replied with a smirk, leaning forward as if to drop a kiss on the patient's forehead.

But Brian managed to flinch away from contact, and spoke again, voice cold and distant. "Why aren't you in Pago Pago, or wherever the fuck you're supposed to be?"

Justin's smirk morphed into a smile that spoke volumes, that said that he didn't give a shit how annoyed Brian might be that he'd ignored the warnings and the prohibition and come anyway. "This is where I'm supposed to be."

Brian moved his head slightly, his eyes sweeping once around the room to see who was present, stopping briefly on the faces of Justin's mother and his best friend, before moving on to read the sadness in Cynthia's eyes. She appeared to be the only one who had any idea what lay ahead, and he was sorry that he'd felt compelled to make her a part of this.

"Why?" he snapped.

"Why what?" Justin was still smiling.

"Why do you think you should be here?"

"Because we're . . ."

"What? Committed?" Cold, clipped, sneering. "You've said that to me before, you know. Only, it didn't last very long, did it? It was only a couple of months before you were jetting off to Hollywood to grab your share of the good life there. And then, when they tossed you out on your ass, you came crawling back . . . for a while. But that didn't last either, because you got your little heart broken again, so you decided to run off to live with the Stepford fags. And then, after I went temporarily insane and let myself be suckered into offering to marry you, you had to go chase your dream to seek fame and fortune in New York. Did it ever occur to you that I might eventually get tired of your shit and find myself a new blond boy-ass to fill my bed and suck my cock?" He paused and closed his eyes, knowing it was a cowardly thing to do, but unable to stop himself. "It wasn't all that hard to do, you know."

"I know what you're doing," Justin said quickly. "We go through this every time something happens to you, when you don't want me to . . ."

"How about if I just don't want you . . . period. Fuck you, you little shit. I don't need you. I never did. The only reason I kept you around was because you were a hell of a fuck. That's all."

"Brian," said Jennifer Taylor, obviously confused and reluctant to interfere, but unwilling to see her son treated so, "stop this. You don't mean this, and . . ."

"Why does everyone assume that I'm incapable of speaking for myself? I'm tired of this shit. I was right from the very beginning. I never should have let myself buy into the whole 'love and marriage' bullshit." He turned and looked straight into Justin's eyes, steeling himself against the misery rising there. "I don't love you, and I don't want you here. I decided to cut you loose the last time you turned tail and ran. Now get out. Go back to your rich, sugar-daddy, Wall Street banker and your Greenwich Village-Boho lifestyle. You should never have come back."
But it still wasn't enough. Even though there were tears in his eyes, Justin was still shaking his head. "Being mean to me has never worked," he whispered. "You're not getting rid of me."

"I already did. Yesterday's fuck. Does that ring a bell for you at all?"

"You're just saying this," Justin said slowly, fighting hard to hold on to his composure, "because you're scared for me. And you don't want to be a burden for me. It's what you always do. I know you too well."

"You don't know me at all." There wasn't a single nuance of warmth in Brian's tone. "I've moved on, Justin. I've done what I should have done a long time ago. You should have done the same."

"I don't believe you."

Brian was momentarily grateful that his face was swathed in bandages, for he wasn't sure he could have managed to conceal how much it hurt to proceed to the next step. He lifted his hand and beckoned Cynthia to come forward. "Tell him," he snapped.

Cynthia had watched the exchange between the two former lovers with growing dread, hoping against hope that her participation would not be required, that Brian would be proven wrong in his assumption that he knew how Justin would react in this situation. But she sighed as she prepared to recite the lines she'd been given, realizing that she should have known better. Nobody knew Justin better than Brian, and if he hadn't been completely sure, he never would have asked her in the first place.

"Justin," she said slowly, looking down at her hands and obviously unwilling to meet his eyes.

"I said, 'tell him',' Brian snapped.

Cynthia nodded. "He . . . found someone new. After you left."

"So?" Justin retorted, his jaw set in stubborn resistance. "Isn't there always someone new? Every fucking day?"

"Not like this one," she answered gently. "This one . . . he keeps this one around."

"What? What do you mean?"

"Jesus Christ!" Brian snapped. "What did you expect? That I'd spend the rest of my life grieving over you? That I'd go into mourning and wind up alone and heartbroken? Don't fucking flatter yourself. I'm Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake. I don't do heartbroken. I picked myself up, dusted myself off, and went out and found the perfect man for me - the perfect fuck who knows how lucky he is to have me. That's something you never managed to learn. Now - for the last time - get the fuck out of my sight."

"So where is he?" Even now, even reeling under the emotional assault, the young man still had the courage to fight back, to demand, and Brian could barely breathe around the pain in his heart. "If he loves you so much, where is he?"

"Where I want him to be. Where he's safe," he snapped. "Where nobody can get to him. Unlike you. So, if you're smart, you'll haul ass out of here, before you get mistaken for somebody who matters to me."

It was at that moment that Matt Keller walked into the room, just in time to hear the end of the conversation. His eyes, very green and glinting with understanding, locked with those of his patient and conveyed that Brian was going to owe him - big time - for his timely intervention.

"What's going on here?" he asked sternly. "He doesn't need anyone upsetting him, you know. So I suggest you all leave."

Brian deliberately turned his head toward the window, away from the young man who was still staring down at him. He didn't want to see any more, didn't want to say any more. Didn't want to be any more. But there was no avoiding hearing the last thing Justin would say before accepting defeat and turning to walk away.

"I love you, Brian," said the young blonde, barely audible voice thick with unshed tears. "I'll always love you."

That was all, except for the flurry of footsteps and a quick whisper from Daphne. "Fuck you, Brian!"

Then they were gone, and the silence in the room after their departure was profound and heavy. Matt Keller busied himself for a moment with studying the patient's chart, while Lance Mathis made a quick call on his cell phone, before taking up his post at the doorway to make sure no one else could gain entrance.

Only Cynthia dared to approach the bed and stare down at her boss, saying nothing, but waiting until he decided to acknowledge her presence. When he did, with nothing more than a shift to allow him to meet her eyes, she did not flinch away from the misery she read in his gaze.

"Sometimes," she said softly, "I really, really hate you."

He could only sigh and touch her hand with trembling fingers, knowing exactly how she felt. "Yeah. Me too."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

*The Best Is Yet to Come - Cynthia Di Mari Biggs, Dexter Wansel
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~
tbc
Chapter 19

It was not yet noon, but the diner was already filling up with the early lunch crowd, and all the usual suspects were ensconced in all the usual places.

As usual.

Emmett was struck with a not-so-silly notion that this tacky little diner with its ever-changing array of tacky little seasonal decorations was more home to 'the gang' than any residence would ever be.

Debbie was behind the counter, dishing out pea soup and lemon bars and cheeky, down-and-dirty wisdom in equal portions between bouts of an ongoing gossip session with her friend Ida and one of the diner regulars, a beat cop who was studying the lunch menu scrawled on the chalk board near the serving window.

In their regular booth, Ben, Michael, and Hunter were seated across from Lindsey and Melanie, with the professor and the lawyer exchanging enthusiastic comments about the latest pro-gay legislation in Canada while lamenting the newest efforts by anti-gay fundamentalist Christians in Pennsylvania to compel inclusion of a rewritten Prop 14 on the next election ballot. The back-and-forth between the two was almost - but not quite - enough to compensate for the brooding silence of the remaining three, and the hard glint in Melanie's eyes suggested that she was close to reaching the end of her emotional rope and erupting into one of her customary take-no-prisoners assaults.

Nevertheless, neither Michael nor Lindsey seemed to be paying much attention, and Hunter appeared lost in thoughts of his own.

In the next booth, Blake was regarding Ted with an indulgent semi-smile, schooling himself to overlook the faint but undeniable notes of cattiness that threaded through the accountant's current rant about his employer. The abuse counselor knew that it was just Ted's method for coping with things he could not yet comprehend or accept - a self-defense mechanism that would subside once the current crisis was past - but he hoped the passing would come sooner rather than later as the refrain had become increasingly abrasive throughout the morning. Still, he assumed that the tirade would end quickly, once Ted worked his way through his resentment of feeling relegated to secondary status while Cynthia had been Brian's primary spokesperson throughout this entire debacle.

Meanwhile, across the table, hunched into the corner of the booth, Emmett was stirring his coffee and savoring its warmth. It might be spring outside, but there was still a chunk of raw ice residing in his chest that showed no signs of thawing. He would have preferred to pretend that it was nothing more than a facet of the climate - but he knew better.

And so did Calvin, who was concentrating on ignoring Ted's continuous monolog and regarding his old friend with a sweet, tentative smile.

"You look tired, Honey."

Emmett frowned. "I am, I guess. A little bit, anyway."

Calvin nodded, but continued to study Emmett's face, trying without success to read the expression that was lurking in those dark, hooded eyes. "But that's not what's bothering you. Is it?"

Emmett dredged up a smile. "Of course, it is. What else would it be?"

That was a cue for Ted to pause in mid-tirade and turn his attention to the individual he would always consider his best friend. "Why don't you tell us?" he asked, not bothering to try to conceal his testy attitude. "You've been moping over something, ever since you got ..."

"Bashed?" Emmett provided the word that Ted apparently could not say. "You call it moping; I call it something else."

"Such as?" There was only a faint nuance of a sneer in Ted's tone, but Emmett heard it as clearly as a clarion call.

His eyes darkened, shadows reforming and growing denser. "Re-thinking things," he replied evenly. "It's amazing what a little near-death experience can do to a person's perspective."

Ted did not - quite - resort to rolling his eyes. "Very profound. Don't think too hard or you might strain something."

Emmett blinked, as both Michael and Ben turned around to listen and to check out the look on Emmett's face, in response to Ted's snarky remark. It was immediately obvious that the young man understood the motivations behind Ted's caustic commentary, and was striving to retain his composure. He knew Ted - better than almost anyone else did - and he realized that the snarkiness was just a means to avoid a loss of control and an emotional meltdown. But that didn't make putting up with it any easier.

"Hey!" said Ben, raising his voice to be heard over the babble in the diner while Emmett remained silent. "Something like this should give us all cause to think twice."

"About what?" Ted snapped, and only Blake was watching closely enough to note that his hands were trembling. "What's really changed? Homophobes have been around forever, and going after somebody like Brian . . . well, it's just miraculous that nobody ever nailed him before. After all, it could have been any of us."

"Could it?" asked Emmett finally, staring down into ink-black coffee. "I wonder."

"Meaning what?" The conversations around them had begun to fall silent as Ted's level of annoyance - and his volume - had grown, while Blake seemed increasingly distressed.

"Meaning," Emmett said softly, apparently once more intent on defining the exact color of the semi-sludge in his cup, "that he's not like the rest of us. Not really."

"Oh, puh-leeze!" At this point, everyone in the group understood that Ted had lost whatever small degree of patience he'd had left. "Don't tell me you're going to buy into this whole 'Brian Kinney Mystique' crap. You're just getting your knickers in a twist over that photo-shopped bullshit in the tabloids."

Emmett's gaze was steady as he studied Ted's face, and, once more, he fell silent for a while, debating whether or not to point out what he knew to be true - that the images in the tabloid had been accurate and unretouched. Ultimately, he decided to leave that issue unaddressed and allow the group to seek solace in their illusions should they choose to do so. At the same time, he refused to be intimidated by Ted's petty malice. "Did you hear the things that Cynthia said to us yesterday? Did any of it register, or did everyone just decide to ignore it? Like always?"

"What the fuck . . ."

"She said," Emmett continued, "that none of us knew Brian. I've been wondering . . ."

"Wondering what?" asked Michael, very quietly.
"If she was right. Or if she might become right from this day forward." He took a sip of his coffee.

"What the fuck is that supposed to mean?" demanded Melanie, lips twisted into a sneer. "If anybody was ever more of a fucking open book than Brian Kinney, I can't imagine who it might be."

Emmett and Ben both turned to stare at her, while Michael and Lindsey looked at each other.

"He's different," said Emmett slowly. "I can't explain it . . . exactly. But I know it's true. He's not the same. Something is off."

"What's off?" asked Debbie, delivering a pink plate special to the next table before turning to join in the conversation.

"Brian," answered Ben, worried eyes resting on Michael's face. "Emmett thinks . . ."

"Since when has Brian not been off?" laughed the Liberty Diner diva.

But Michael understood exactly what Emmett meant. "I don't know, Ma," he said softly. "It feels different this time. Everything could . . . change."

Debbie paused for a moment, something pale and formless rising in her eyes, before wading in with her customary determination to dismiss any suggestion that she might not know Brian Kinney as well as she thought she did. She had, after all, made a semi-career of trying to cut him down to size - even if he'd always refused to stay cut - and she had no intention of looking at him from a different perspective now. So she huffed a half-laugh before offering up her rebuttal. "He hasn't changed since he was fourteen years old, and he's not about to . . ."

To everyone's surprise, it was Hunter who spoke up, cutting off the observation she'd been repeating, in one form or another, for more than a decade. "You know something? You people really are amazing. Some of you have known him for longer than I've been alive; I've known him for - what, three years max? - and I've seen huge changes in him, just in that short time. But you - you all manage to see exactly what you expect to see, what you've always seen. Makes me wonder if any of you ever really saw him at all. And now, the only one of you who's actually talked to him since all this shit started, is trying to tell you that something's different. And you don't want to hear it."

It was Ben who turned to study the look in his son's eyes, while Michael's gaze shifted out into the brilliance of the midday vista beyond the windows, but it was anybody's guess what he was really seeing. Meanwhile, Ben lifted a gentle hand to touch Hunter's face. "When did you get so smart?" he asked with a smile.

"If Emmett's right," the boy continued, "then it could make a big difference, in all your lives."

When the entire group - except Emmett - turned to stare at him, he easily read the denial in their eyes, and he laughed. "Christ! You don't even know, do you? He's the center that holds you all together. Whether you like him, or you love him, or you resent him, or you hate him" - a quick look at Melanie punctuated that observation - "without him, you've lost the tie that binds you all together."

Most of them were instantly ready to dispute his words, to deny the possibility, to disbelieve, and a couple of them, of course, were incensed at the very idea.

Except . . .

Inside, beneath the bravado and the scoffing and the need to deny, every one of them was aware of a tiny core of uncertainty. A tiny little voice that could only whisper two words.
"You don't have to stay." Brian's voice was rough, tremulous, barely audible.

Both Cynthia and Lance Mathis stood at the foot of his bed and regarded him with steady, unflinching eyes. "Maybe she doesn't," Mathis replied calmly, "but I'm not budging."

He carefully avoided noticing the poisonous glance Cynthia directed toward him, while observing that it was amazing that a man swathed almost head to toe in bandages could manage to convey simmering rage through nothing more than the flash of hooded eyes.

"Didn't we just have a detailed discussion about your primary responsibilities?" Brian snapped, voice suddenly full and firm, with only the faintest indication of the pain it cost him to speak so forcefully.

"We did, and I've got it covered. I'm not going anywhere."

Matt Keller looked up from his study of the data displayed on a cardiac monitor array. "Unless," he said, "he says otherwise."

"Doctor," Mathis began, "you can't . . ."

Keller's smile was cold. "Want to bet?" He stepped forward and laid a gentle hand atop Brian's shoulder. "Whatever you may think, Mr. Mathis, in this realm, the patient is the crown prince."

Brian turned slightly to stare up into the face of his old friend. "And what does that make you?"

Keller grinned. "King of the hill, and the only one who can over-rule you."

"I'm not leaving," Mathis repeated, crossing his arms and regarding the doctor with a defiant gaze.

Brian took a deep, painful breath. "It's all right, Matt," he said finally. "In the end, there's no way to hide this . . . mess. Is there?"

Keller hiked himself onto the edge of the bed and promptly forgot about everything and everyone in the room, except his patient.

"How bad?" Faint or not, there was no mistaking the determination underlying those two simple syllables.

"Bad enough. But not . . . irreparable."

Brian sniffed. "Bullshit! You might be the snow-job master, Old Friend, but you've never once managed to snow me. Don't even think about trying now. I want . . ."

"The truth," Matt interrupted. "You think I'd try to give you anything less?"

Brian's eyes were dark, but his gaze was steady. "I think you might, if you weren't sure I could handle it."

Matt sighed. "That's one thing I've never wondered about. Brian Kinney always handles the truth."

Brian closed his eyes. "Even when it's ugly," he said softly. "So just spill it."

Keller nodded. "No point in me giving you chapter and verse of the damage. You can take a look at the chart, if you like. Suffice to say the list is long and complicated: skull fracture with concussion, punctured lung, plenty of broken bones - ribs, clavicle, arm, hand, ankle, jaw, cheekbone. Multiple lacerations to your gallbladder, so we had to remove it. Major blood loss, torn ligaments, severe bruising to internal organs. Any or all of that could be considered major damage, but it's all begun to heal, largely because you were in fantastic physical condition to begin with. If you hadn't been, you'd be dead today. And there is some good news. You have some strained muscles and a dislocated shoulder, but there's no discernible damage to your spine. You're going to need some extensive physical therapy but should regain full motion eventually in your hand and wrist. And, although there's no way to be sure yet, I don't see any indications of major nerve damage. In time, everything can be fixed."

Brian didn't say anything for a while; he just continued to stare at his old college friend and waited. Then he sighed, and phrased his question with utmost efficiency. "Except?"

Keller drew a deep breath. "I won't lie to you, Brian. The bastards did a hell of a number on you. The damage to your face - your appearance - it's extensive. You've got a long road ahead of you."

Brian turned away then, and looked out the window, his eyes caught by a jetstream slowly dissipating across the blue vault of heaven. "A long road," he repeated. "To where? To reach a point where the mother of my child can stand to look at me without flinching? Or where my good friends can congratulate themselves on tolerating my appearance so they can indulge a chance to gloat over - what was the phrase - 'how the mighty have fallen'?"

Keller folded his arms and waited until Brian decided to look up once more and meet his gaze. "You know me better than that," said the doctor. "Do you really think I'm going to let that happen?"

Brian felt the quick twinge of the smile he could not quite muster. "Despite your own inflated opinion of yourself, you're not God! You can't fix this."

The physician frowned. "You're right. I can't."

Brian looked down quickly, but not quite quickly enough to prevent the doctor from noting the icy glint of despair forming in his eyes. He was quiet for a while, his breathing jerky and rough. Then he looked up again, and Matt felt a heaviness around his heart as the despair was replaced by grim resolve. "Thanks, Doc. Anyone else would have tried to soften the blow. I appreciate that you didn't. So now I just have to figure out what to do next. Maybe I can find myself a stylish mask and scout out a basement under the local opera house. But whatever I do, I need some time to think, so, if you don't mind . . ."

"But I do mind," Keller interrupted. "Because I'm not done. I admitted that I can't fix this. But I didn't say that it can't be fixed. And if you're going to accept this - just sit there and feel sorry for yourself - then I only have one question. Who the fuck are you, and what have you done with Brian Kinney?"

"What the hell can I do?" It was not quite a snarl, but close enough to put a smile on the doctor's face.

"You can do what you always do, what you've been doing all your life. You can give 'em all the big 'Fuck you!' You can refuse to quit. You can fight."

Brian closed his eyes. "Matt," he whispered, barely audible, "I'm tired."

"I know," replied the physician, his fingers closing around Brian's hand. "And I'm sorry, because it's not going to get any better. Not anytime soon. But . . ."
Brian opened his eyes then, and found Matt's face just inches away, beautiful green eyes bright with promise. "But what?"

"You're not going to have to do it alone, this time. And I'm not going to let you give up. I promise you. You will be Brian Kinney again. And, in the process, maybe you'll learn something you should have learned a long time ago."

"Like what?"

Keller smiled; the note of suspicion in the clipped response was very faint, but it was enough to confirm what he'd been hoping to find in his old friend. The body was damaged; the flesh was weak, but the spirit was still there, waiting to resurge.

"Like being 'Brian Kinney' doesn't have a fucking thing to do with how you look."

"Of course." That couldn't possibly be a pale hint of laughter in that hoarse whisper - could it? "It's what's inside that counts. Right?"

After a beat of silence, Matt Keller burst out laughing. "Okay," he admitted, after taking a moment to regain control of himself, "so that's a pretty stupid comment, all things considered. But that's not really what I meant, anyway. I hope you know how hard it was for me to admit that I, personally, can't 'fix you', as you put it. But I do know who can. He's an arrogant bastard, and a first class prick with delusions of godhood, and, if he stepped in front of my car in the express lane on the freeway, I wouldn't even slow down. But he has one saving grace. For this - for what you need - he's the very best, and he can do what I can't." He leaned forward then, and touched his forehead to Brian's shoulder. "He can restore what they took from you. He can make sure that the bastards don't win."

Brian turned his head, brushing his brow against his old friend's cheek, before pulling back to regard him steadily, refusing to flinch away from the dark truth reflected in green eyes. "How long?" he asked finally.

The doctor huffed a sigh and managed a tiny, lopsided smile. "I don't really know. I can tell you that you're looking at several months before your injuries are healed. Probably several more before the therapy is completed. But the only one who can make an educated guess about the rest is Rick Turnage. He's flying in tomorrow."

"He's really that good?"

Keller grinned. "He's almost as good as he thinks he is. Reminds me of somebody else I know."

"Does that mean . . ."

The grin became a chuckle. "Yep. You're probably going to hate each other's guts."

"So why should I trust him? And why do you?"

"Because he's a driven man. The only thing that means anything to him - anything at all - is to be the best, the most skilled plastic surgeon in the world, and he's spent his whole life looking for the one challenge that will prove that he is. And I think . . . I really believe it's going to be you."

Brian's eyes were suddenly filled with uncertainty, but he did not verbalize his misgivings. In truth, he wasn't sure he could, because he wasn't sure what it was about the whole scenario of Rick Turnage as savior that bothered him.

Keller lingered for a moment, trying to determine if Brian understood what he'd been told, but, in the end, he just got to his feet and moved off. He had provided all the information he could; the rest would be up to Turnage. And Brian. The physician allowed himself a tiny smile as it occurred to him that the plastic surgeon was about to find out that one never realized one's dearest ambition without paying a hell of a price.

The room was quiet for a while, while Brian pondered what he'd heard. Then he looked up and noticed that Cynthia was watching him carefully, glints of renewed hope flickering in her eyes. He looked away quickly, but could not quite suppress the surge of anger that engulfed him. False hope was something he would not encourage.

He did manage, however, to conceal his disquiet quickly - to camouflage it as something else. "Cynthia," he said, lifting a hand to summon her closer, "I need you to do something for me. I forgot to ask Lindsey something. Would you see if you can locate her?"

Cynthia frowned, and regarded him with some small degree of suspicion. "Why don't you just call her cell phone?"

He didn't miss a beat. "Because this is something private, something about Gus that we need to discuss, face to face. Please?"

She moved around to the left side of the bed, ignoring Matt Keller, ignoring Lance Mathis, ignoring everyone and everything except the man who was the primary mover and shaker in her world.

"I'm not leaving," she whispered, bending forward so no one else could hear. "Do you really think there is anything - anything - that would make me turn my back on you? Do you think your looks make any difference to me? After what you did for me? Do you really think I'm that shallow, Brian?"

He stared up at her, and knew that it was time to concede defeat. It had been almost two years since the event - the 'what you did for me' - had happened, and he could count the number of times either of them had ever referred to it on the fingers of one hand, so he knew that this was her way of pulling out the big guns. He might be able to fool the rest of his extended family, to bully them, or manipulate them, or deceive them. But it wouldn't work with her; she knew him too well, knew the man beneath the façade as almost no one else did. Still, he'd give it one more shot. "You don't have anything to prove to me," he said solemnly. "And there's no need for you to have to see . . ."

"Shut - up. And do what you have to."

He hesitated; then he nodded before turning his head to regard Matt Keller with a steady gaze. "Show me."

There was no room for argument in either words or manner, but the doctor did not move to obey.

"Brian, I don't think this is a good idea."

"I know you don't, but do it anyway."

"Why?"

"Because I need to see what they did to me. I need to know how much they hated me. So you either take the bandages off now, or I do it myself. Which is it?"

Keller didn't bother trying to conceal his irritation. "Fuck, Brian!"

"In your dreams," replied Brian, and Keller had no trouble visualizing the smirk hidden beneath the bandages. "Now are you going to . . ."

"All right, all right. Keep your pants on."

Lance Mathis grinned. "Bet that's not something you hear too often."

"Fuck!" said Brian. "Everybody's a God-damned comedian."

Woody's - pool hall, barroom, and gay watering hole par excellence - was never really empty, but, in mid-afternoon, it was relatively deserted and a pretty good place for sharing a quiet - or not-so-quiet - conversation. And, in this case, it would allow Emmett to kill two birds with one stone, so to speak. If one could wrap one's mind around the notion of identifying two very different but equally awkward confrontations as 'birds'.

Drew Boyd had called first, requesting a face-to-face sit-down, and Emmett had only hesitated for a moment. Caleb had patients scheduled all afternoon, and Darren had persuaded his cousin to fill in for Emmett for a few days in their party-planning partnership, to allow Emmett time to heal, physically and emotionally. So his time was his own, until the middle of the following week when he would have to climb back on the proverbial horse and finish planning the Berlinger/Rabelais wedding that was to be the social event of the spring season. Weddings by Auntie Em had become the new haute status symbol for Pittsburgh society, but he did not spare the time to reflect on how satisfying it was to have become the premier social event planner of the area. In spite of his success, he never really thought of himself as anything other than a little piece of hick/trash from Hazlehurst, Mississippi.

It was an opinion that would stay with him throughout his life, despite the fact that he would be loved deeply and wholeheartedly by people who knew better.

He had agreed to meet with Drew at mid-afternoon. The quarterback had been diffident during their conversation, requesting rather than demanding, determined but prepared to accept 'no' for an answer, if necessary, which, of course, insured that Emmett could not possibly deny him.

The second call had been far less subdued or polite.

Justin had been loud and abrasive and almost rude. And panic-stricken. He had not said much beyond, "I need to see you. Right now." But what he had not said had conveyed much more than the words he did speak. His voice had been raw and hoarse, as if he'd been screaming. Or crying.

Emmett was no fool; he knew immediately what had happened and why Justin was so devastated. What he didn't know was whether or not he could figure out how to fix the problem, or if, indeed, he should even try. Brian's motives for the actions he was taking were complex and not easily explained, and more was at stake here than protecting someone from the rage and outrage of homophobic monsters.

He thought back to the conversation they'd shared in the waning hours before this current nightmare had begun, and understood that it wasn't only bodies that were at risk; it was hearts. Souls perhaps. Lives, to be lost or gained on the whim of a moment.

Emmett wondered if he could get away with faking a sudden bout of appendicitis. But Drew - damn him - was right on time, and the opportunity died aborning.

When they were seated at one of the tables at the rear of the room, Emmett with his signature Cosmo and the quarterback with a shot glass and a bottle of Chivas, neither seemed to know how to open the conversation. Emmett sipped at his drink, unaccountably nervous, before taking a deep breath and looking directly into sable-dark eyes.

"Not to be a stickler for protocol," he said with a smile, "but you called me, Honey Chile. So what was so urgent?"

For a moment, it appeared that Drew might be content with just gazing into Emmett's eyes, as he was suddenly swept into memories that he had kept under lock and key for over a year. "I wanted you to be the first to know," he said finally, lifting his shot glass as if to propose a toast.

"Know what?"

Drew leaned forward, his eyes fixed on Emmett's mouth. "It's my birthday," he whispered.

Emmett sighed. "Yes, well, unfortunately, we all have one of those every year, you know. So . . ."

"Not like this. If you stop and think, you'll remember that you were the one who told me to call you . . . for this one."

Emmett, in the process of taking a sip from his Cosmo, gulped as he grasped the deeper meaning beneath Drew's supposedly casual announcement, and choked on the sweet liquid, turning rose red, and gasping to catch his breath.

As a diversion from the intensity of the moment, spluttering around a vodka and cranberry juice cocktail left a lot to be desired, thought Emmett, but it had done the trick well enough. When he managed to regain his composure, they were both able to smile and ease back a bit from the brink of emotional overload.

"You mean it?" Emmett asked finally, dabbing at his chin with a napkin. Though entirely focused on whatever answer Drew might provide, he found that he could not - quite - bring himself to look directly into the athlete's eyes.

Drew leaned forward and folded Emmett's left hand into both of his own. "I have never meant anything more," he replied. "You know me, Em. I'm not good with words. I don't have a clue how to make you understand how much it means to me that you were willing to give me the time to get to know myself, as a gay man. To explore and learn about the new world that opened up to me once I was finally able to come out.

"But I have explored it now. And I have learned. And I won't lie to you and claim that I didn't enjoy the hell out of the experience. Only . . ."

"Only what?" Emmett was surprised to find that he was almost holding his breath, barely able to contain his need to hear the rest.

"Only, after a while, you begin to understand that all the gorgeous guys in the world don't make up for the one you really want, the one you can't stop thinking about, the one that means more than any fuck." He paused and dropped a quick kiss on the tips of Emmett's fingers. "The one that makes you feel whole."

Emmett closed his eyes, not yet willing to be overwhelmed by the emotional surge that was rising within him. He could not afford to be swept away, only to find that he had allowed himself to hear what he wanted to hear, rather than what his one-time lover was actually saying. "And that would be . . . who?"

Drew grinned. "You gonna make me say it?"
Emmett tilted his head and put on his very best Lana-Turner arch expression. "I think I've earned the right to hear it."

The grin became a rough chuckle. "Yeah. You have. So here goes. After sampling all the joys that the gay world has to offer, I've finally come to my senses and realized that all I want . . . is you, Emmett." Then he frowned. "But I understand that you might not feel the same. You gave me the freedom to find out what I really wanted, and I'd be a piss-poor excuse for a man if I didn't do the same for you. I know you're with Calvin now. He seems like a nice guy, even though he's not nearly good enough for you. But then, I don't think anybody is good enough for you. Including me. But I just felt like telling you was the right thing to do. You don't owe me anything. Not even an answer, if you don't want to give one. I just . . . wanted you to know."

And, having said his piece, the big athlete pushed back from the table and stood up.

Emmett looked up at him, at a loss for words, perhaps for the first time in his life. "Wait!" he managed finally, as Drew turned to move away.

The football player froze, but remained silent. He had said everything there was to say; it was up to Emmett to decide if anything more was needed.

"What did Brian tell you?"

Drew couldn't quite conceal his surprise at what he perceived as an off-the-wall change of subject. "What?"

"What-did-Brian-say-to-you?" Each word was distinct and bitten off, crisp and to the point.

"Why does that matter?" The quarterback was obviously uncertain about the meaning of this turn in the conversation, but he did settle back into his chair, intrigued in spite of himself.

"It matters," said Emmett slowly, "because I need to be sure that this declaration isn't just a ruse to allow you to stay close to me and make sure I don't get bashed again. I know Brian blames himself for what happened to me. Hell, I'm beginning to think he always blames himself for everything, all the way back to original sin. So much so that I think it's entirely possible that he threatened your life if you don't take it upon yourself to watch over me."

Drew's smile almost - but not quite - camouflaged the flash of annoyance in night-dark eyes. "Do you really think I'd be scared of anything Brian Kinney might say to me?"

Emmett shrugged, unintimidated. "I don't know. He scares the shit out of me sometimes."

The quarterback was startled into a snort of laughter. "Okay," he admitted. "I see your point."

"So, what did he say to you?"

Drew hesitated, choosing to look down at the hands he was clasping on the table rather than to meet Emmett's questioning gaze. Then he sighed. "He told me that it was time to get my head out of my ass and reach out for what I really want, before it's too late."

Emmett's initial response was a slow blink. He remained silent for a while, and when he did choose to speak, he was careful to avoid any inflection in tone or voice. "And was he right?"

Drew smiled. "He's a smart little fucker. Too smart, sometimes."

"Sooooo, you're . . ."
"Emmett, do you love Calvin?"

Again, Emmett blinked. "And if I do?"

"Then this conversation is over," Drew replied gently. "I didn't bring this up to cause you pain or to make you feel obligated, or guilty. I just wanted you to know how I feel, so . . ."

He rose again, and this time he wasted no time in starting to walk away.

"I don't, you know."

Drew paused in mid-stride, uncertain of whether to stay or go, uncertain of anything except how much depended on what Emmett might say next. "Don't what?"

Emmett stood up and moved around the table, stepping forward and deliberately invading the big man's personal space. "I don't know how you feel, and I don't . . . love Calvin." He paused and was forced to look away for a moment, to pretend that he couldn't read the bright flicker of relief in Drew's dark eyes. "And, just to be totally upfront about it, he doesn't love me either. He's a good friend - and a great fuck - but we both knew from the start that this was never meant to be a forever-thing."

Drew smiled, and slowly slipped his arms around Emmett's waist, stifling an impulse to disagree with his lover's assessment of Calvin's feelings. He was pretty sure that Emmett was wrong; he had seen and recognized the emotion in the southerner's face while watching the two old friends sharing an intimate moment. But he figured it was best to let this particular sleeping dog lie. "So, if you don't love him . . ."

Emmett's smile was slightly coy. "I'm feeling a little uncertain here. Things have been really weird lately, and I'm just a little . . ."

"I love you, Emmett." Drew's voice was steady, filled with certainly. "I think I knew it from the beginning, but I wasn't ready to deal with it. Now, I am. But only if it's what you want." He smiled and lifted a hand to cup Emmett's cheek. "I think I've learned something from a . . ." the smile grew slightly sardonic "mutual acquaintance, about what love is - and isn't. I know now that it shouldn't be a prison cell. That's not love; that's possession. I love you, and all I want is to make you happy. And safe, and, just incidentally, to fuck you into next week. At your convenience, of course."

Emmett grinned. "Would right now be too soon?"

Drew sobered abruptly, as he gazed into Emmett's eyes, searching for reassurance, for confirmation, for an end to loneliness. "Then . . ."

There was no more uncertainty when Emmett responded. "I think I loved you the moment I first saw you. Even when you pissed me off by acting like a homophobic prick. And I think I always will."

"Then what are we waiting for?"

Emmett could not quite suppress a sigh. "That," he replied, looking up to watch as two new arrivals walked through the front door.

The big Nelly-bottom had to fight off an urge to grab his old/new lover and go racing out the rear exit. Judging by the look on the face of the young man who was charging toward him, wide-eyed best friend in tow, it was obvious that his second meeting was not going to be nearly so satisfying as his first.
The silence inside the hospital room was so intense that noises from the street below barely penetrated air that felt as thick as a blanket as Brian stared at his reflection in the large hand mirror that Nurse Beck held at the proper angle and distance for him to be able to examine the condition of his face.

To their credit, neither Cynthia nor Lance Mathis had uttered a single sound nor allowed the tiniest flicker of expression to touch their faces when Dr. Keller had removed the last of the bandages and stepped away to allow the nurse access to the patient. Exhibiting an admirable degree of professionalism, Beck had gently and efficiently cleaned the wounds before taking the mirror from Keller’s hand and positioning it for Brian’s convenience.

The four observers all experienced exactly the same reaction to watching the patient's first glimpse of his own appearance; they all wished to be elsewhere, to not have to see the dark shadow of despair rising in hazel eyes - the only reaction Brian allowed himself. He did not flinch, did not gasp, did not look away. Did not speak or sigh or weep. He just looked, turning his face slightly, from side to side, to get a better view.

Then he nodded to the nurse and turned away.

"I need to speak to Dr. Keller," he said, his voice very soft but completely steady. "Alone."

"Brian," Cynthia began, the spontaneous clinching of her hands the only indication of the level of her distress, "you don't . . ."

"Alone," he repeated - still softly, but with greater determination.

Though it was obvious that both Mathis and Cynthia wanted to protest, in the end both simply nodded and walked out into the hall, with Nurse Beck bringing up the rear.

Matt Keller closed the door behind them, took a moment to take a deep breath and make sure his demeanor was entirely professional, and only then turned to regard his patient with an appropriate degree of composure.

He didn't have long to wait. "Nobody can fix this." It was not a question; it was a statement of perceived fact.

Keller moved forward slowly, his eyes noting all the damage to a face that had once been perfectly beautiful, but was now only a ruin, a broken reminder of what had been destroyed. Battered, distorted, torn, mutilated. "Brian, I . . ."

"No bullshit!" The mangled features contorted into a twisted smile, and, for the first time, Keller could not quite suppress a grimace of pain. "I'm an ad man, Matt - a master of bullshit, so don't waste my time or yours. This . . ." He lifted a bandaged hand and touched his knuckles to his chin, none too gently. "This isn't going away. It's not going to get better; it's not a temporary condition; it's not a fucking boo-boo that's going to heal." He paused and swallowed hard, not quite successful in dislodging the lump in his throat. "This is who I'm going to be. From now on. And your boy-genius surgeon should find better ways to occupy his time."

When he jerked his hand away from his face and clinched it into a fist, Keller had no choice but to move quickly to grab it; he couldn't be certain of Brian's intentions but he was pretty sure he recognized a deadly anger and desperation in his patient's eyes. He had never doubted that Brian could and would handle whatever shit life might throw at him, but he was struck by a flash of memory, a scrap of conversation between the two of them after Brian's cancer recovery.

"I didn't want to live, diseased and damaged and imperfect. I wanted to die," Brian's voice over the phone was strangely hollow, as if his mind was wandering through a bleak, empty landscape. "To leave everything and everyone behind, and party til I was ready to drop and then just disappear. No good-byes, no grief, no tears, no weeping over might-have-beens. Forever young, forever beautiful."

"So . . . why didn't you?"

Matt closed his eyes and visualized Brian's shrug. "Debts to pay. Promises to keep."

The physician had chosen not to express his own sense of relief over what Brian had ultimately decided, or his profound sadness in the realization that his old friend had truly wanted to die, had never realized how much he meant to the people who loved him. Had, in truth, never understood how much he was loved.

Keller sat beside his patient, and regarded him with weary resolve. "Do you trust me?"

"With this?" The scorn in Brian's voice was as sharp as a blade. "You really are having delusions of godhood."

Keller leaned forward until his face was only inches away from his patient's, and braced his hands against the bed on either side of Brian's shoulders. "Shut up, and listen to me. If this had happened just a few years ago, then you'd have been right to doubt. You'd have been fucked, and not in a positive, life-affirming way. But we live in an age of miracles, Brian. Medicine has become an art, as well as a science, and the man who's going to work his magic on you is a fucking Michelangelo. And, by the way, you have no idea how hard it is for me to say that."

"So that's what I'm going to be? His fucking Sistine Chapel?"

"If that's what it takes to fix you," Keller replied with a shrug, "who gives a shit?"

Brian managed, somehow, to narrow his eyes, despite the swelling around them. "I don't know if I like the idea of being somebody's masterpiece. Is he queer?"

Keller shook his head and smirked. "I never cared enough to wonder where he puts his dick, though I do seem to recall an entourage of nubile young things with IQs down to here and boobs out to there. Maybe he's bi. You're the one with the infallible gay-dar, so you can figure it out for yourself."

Brian settled back against his pillow and stared up at the ceiling, focusing on nothing more than the tiny flicker of the fluorescent light fixture and concentrating only on breathing, ignoring everything but the in-and-out process of filling and emptying his lungs. Then he looked down and met Keller's eyes, peering deep into jade green depths to search for intimations of truth. "You really think he can do this? Turning Quasimodo into Casanova would be easier, I think."

"I really do. I wouldn't lie to you."

"But you don't know for sure?"

The fact that Keller's gaze faltered briefly spoke volumes before he had a chance to find the right words to cover up his misgivings. "Brian, you can't just . . ."

"Listen to me, Matt," Brian interrupted, reaching out to wrap his fingers in Keller's lapel. "Are you listening?"
"I'm listening, Asshole. When have I ever not listened?"

Brian swallowed, closing his eyes for a moment, searching for the right words, but without much success. "I don't know how to deal with this. I don't know how to . . ."

"You're still Brian Kinney."

The patient could not quite suppress a sigh, and his attempt at a smile was painful to watch. "Brian Kinney," he said softly, "is beautiful. Always was. That's what Michael always said to me, whenever I had doubts about what I should do or . . . whatever. It's the only thing I ever had, to make me different, special. Without that, I don't know who I am."

"Oh, Baby," Keller whispered, "one day, I hope you'll begin to understand how beautiful, how special you really are, and always will be." Then he deliberately leaned forward and kissed Brian's lips, with excruciating gentleness, to offer comfort, without pain.

When he sat back, he was careful to avoid staring at Brian too intently, understanding instinctively that his old friend needed a few moments to regain his composure and rebuild the defensive walls that allowed him to function in spite of the pandemonium around him.

It was a delicate moment, potentially destructive, but the awkwardness was quickly eliminated when the doctor summoned Nurse Beck back into the room to apply fresh bandages to Brian's injuries, and Cynthia and Lance Mathis re-entered together. Cynthia was talking on her cell phone, eyes narrowed in concentration while Mathis was studying a photocopy of a police report, and Brian, in his attempt to ignore what the nurse was doing, found it reassuring, somehow, that both seemed focused on business as usual rather than caught up in the livid trauma of the situation.

Normalcy had never seemed so sweet.

Until, that is, the door opened again, and he knew that any semblance of normalcy within this framework was the illusion rather than the reality - that the drama surrounding this particular situation had only just begun.

Detective Horvath was first through the door, arriving in time to get a detailed look at the damage done to Brian's face. He had, of course, seen extremely graphic photos of what the attackers had done, but it was different, somehow, seeing it in the flesh. He came forward, nevertheless, without hesitating, and reached out to lay a hand on the patient's shoulder, refusing to flinch or allow himself to look away.

Brian took a deep breath, understanding how difficult the detective must find it to bury his natural reaction to such carnage and present a façade of detachment. "Hey, Carl," he said. "If you'll give me a minute - to finish getting my face on, as it were - I'll be right with you."

He was pleased when he noted that Horvath had to struggle to suppress a surprised grin. It seemed that his adoring public - as well as those who were not so adoring - was expecting to see him chastened and wallowing in self-pity and seeking sympathy. Well, fuck that!

His gaze was steady as he regarded the cop, sensing that Horvath might have pertinent information for him. Then he noticed that someone else had entered the room, someone who was standing just inside the door, apparently waiting for permission to come closer, someone whose features were indistinct, backlit by the reflected glare from the hallway.

"Hello, Brian," said the detective. "It's good to see you."

Brian managed a small chuckle. "Yeah. You too. So what can I do for Pittsburgh's finest?"
Nurse Beck finished with her task and ignored the cop as she checked the patient's IV. "How's the pain?" she asked softly.

"Thriving," Brian replied, with typical snark.

She glanced toward Keller who confined his response to a nod, authorizing another dose of narcotic painkiller.

"Could we hold off on that for a bit?" asked Horvath. "I really need to get a statement from him, while he's fully alert."

Both doctor and nurse looked as if they were going to object, but they were over-ruled by the patient. "It's okay," Brian assured them, before turning to confront Horvath with a level gaze. "If you make it fast."

Horvath nodded. "Short and sweet, I promise. Only there's someone you need to meet first. Someone you're going to get to know very well, before this case is over."

Brian sighed. "The Feds?"

"So far," said the stranger standing in the doorway, "just one Fed."

"So," drawled Brian, "where's the task force?"

A pleasant baritone laugh provided accompaniment as the individual came forward, right hand extended. "You shouldn't believe everything you see on TV. The task force - for now - is me."

Brian looked up and had the strangest sensation, as if the young man coming toward him was someone he had known before, although he was dead certain the two of them had never met. He would have remembered.

"My name is Chris McClaren, Mr. Kinney," said the newcomer, his fingers closing around the hand that Brian had lifted, just as if they'd met in a board room or at a social event, totally discounting the fact that the hand he took was swathed in bandages. "I'd say that it's good to meet you, but I'm sure you wouldn't agree, under the circumstances, so I'll spare you the pleasantries."

As it happened, Cynthia was staring at Brian's face at that moment, and she would always wonder how it was that she was the only one to notice the spontaneous flash of insatiable curiosity - and something even more elemental - that struck him as McClaren took his hand. Then she shifted her focus to the FBI agent, and saw the same exact response reflected in his expression.

Both were masters of self-control - and masks - so the reactions were quickly suppressed, so quickly that no one else even noticed. But Cynthia continued to stare at the two of them for a while - wondering what she had just seen, and then wondering if maybe she had just imagined it all. Especially when Brain immediately demonstrated his customary brass.

"How refreshing!" he replied. "Someone with the guts to mention that I have a right to feel like shit. Now can we get on with this? I need my beauty rest."

Chris McClaren took up a position behind Horvath, apparently willing to let the local constabulary lead the questioning, but Brian wasn't fooled. The man was totally focused, prepared to ignore everything and everyone around them to concentrate on whatever Brian had to say. Of course, the fact that the agent was built like - what was that disgusting expression that Emmett was so fond of? Oh, yes. A brick shit house - was something of a distraction for the patient. And the rest of the features - Jesus! Ash blonde hair framing a perfect face, featuring sculpted cheekbones, sensual, molded lips, dimpled chin, strong, symmetrical nose, and large beautiful eyes, the color of a summer sky surrounded by a ring of twilight blue, rich as sapphires, and fringed with thick, dark lashes. Shit!

As beautiful as any man he'd ever met, and, being Brian Kinney, he'd met more than his fair share. Only now . . . shit!

"Agent McLaren is a profiler, Brian," said Horvath. "And, coincidentally, a specialist in undercover work. He's going to be your . . ."

Brian did not - quite - roll his eyes as he was struck with the irony of the situation. "Beard?" he supplied.

"Just call me 'Whiskers'," drawled McClaren.

Brian looked up at the agent and saw something indefinable flash in those blue eyes. "Like Magritte's pipe?" he asked, his voice conveying a tiny, barely there nuance of amusement.

McClaren was not - quite - successful in concealing a surprised smile. "Precisely."

"Are you good at your job?" Brian didn't have time for bullshit, although he was gratified to realize that his instincts were as keen and true as ever.

"Extremely."

The patient sighed, his thoughts turning - as they did so frequently - to a lovely young face, a perfect young body, and the more lovely and more perfect heart and soul behind the exquisite physical image. "You'd better be," he observed, realizing that he alone knew how hard the task would prove to be. Justin was nobody's fool, and he would be expecting some kind of ruse, some kind of trick to undercut his stubborn determination to resume his place at Brian's side. He had been hurt by the things Brian had said to him, but he had not been convinced.

It would take more than the cruelty that Brian had wielded so wickedly. It would take hard evidence.

Brian spared a glance at McClaren's body. Hard evidence, indeed.

"This is bullshit!" Justice had entered the pool hall in a state of high dudgeon, and he hadn't yet managed to calm down, despite the efforts of Daphne and Drew Boyd to encourage him to do so.

Emmett, strangely enough, had said very little, apparently content to wait, to allow the younger man to vent his feelings of frustration and betrayal before attempting to reason with him. In addition, while he listened carefully to everything Justin had to say, he was also still caught up in the memory of his conversation with Brian, and found himself, for the first time, looking at events through new lenses, from a new direction.

It was amazing, he thought, how none of the group of people he considered his closest, best friends had ever once managed to step outside the box they all occupied and move around the emotional barriers that had been constructed for them. They had never seen the real Brian Kinney, because the real Brian Kinney had never allowed himself to be seen.

Only now, perhaps he had grown weary of the game, or perhaps he had simply assumed that his task was done, that no one would ever be sufficiently interested or motivated to look for the deeper meanings behind the mask.
Perhaps he had simply decided to stop hiding.

So caught up was Emmett in his thoughts that he did not at first notice when Justin retreated into a sullen silence, eyes locked on Emmett's face.

"Did you hear anything I said?" demanded the young blonde in a tone thick with acid. "Or am I keeping you from something more important?"

Emmett's eyes were soft with sympathy, but his voice was remarkably steady when he started to speak. "You're assuming that I have the answers you want. But I don't. On the surface, Brian seemed much the same as he always did, after you left. But underneath... he changed, Justin. He allowed all of us to go on as always, assuming that he would revert to the life he'd always lived. And we did, just as he planned. Only it wasn't real. Whatever Brian became once you were gone, he became... alone. None of us really knew him any more."

Justin barely managed not to flinch away from a truth he did not want to hear. "He says he found someone else. That he found someone who would give him what I couldn't. Surely, if that had happened, you would have known. All of you would have known."

"Would we?" Emmett sighed. "I've begun to wonder if any of us ever really knew him at all. In thinking back, I've remembered time after time after time when we all assumed that we understood why Brian did the things he did and how he would react to whatever we threw at him. But we didn't really. And at those times when we did finally figure out what he'd done, we almost never understood why."

"Brian has never been one to hide who he is, what he is, so why..."

Emmett nodded. "That's what he trained us all to believe. But he's a little older now; he's lived through a lot, so maybe he's not quite so contained. Maybe it's not quite so easy to lock out the world."

"What the hell do you..."

Emmett reached out and touched Justin's cheek, sorry that he felt compelled to speak what was in his heart, but knowing he had no choice. "He believes," he said gently, "that he was never what you really needed, or wanted. He believes that you left him - time and time again - because he couldn't be the person you needed him to be."

"Why on earth would he think such a thing?" Justin was outraged, furious. "I always came back. Every single time..."

"But only," said Emmett, "when you had no other option. At least, that's how he sees it. When you needed him to help you find your way back after the bashing, when the fiddler proved to be a pretentious, backstabbing cretin; when you felt obligated to take care of him when he had cancer; when Hollywood turned its back on you; when he was so devastated with guilt and fear after the bombing that he tried to become something he's not - something he thought you wanted him to be. From his perspective, it was never because he was your sole reason for living." He sighed and was surprised to feel tears rise in his eyes. "Like you were - for him."

"And you know this... how?" Justin demanded. "He wouldn't tell you that. Brian Kinney doesn't admit things like that."

"Ordinarily, I'd agree with you," Emmett replied softly. "But he's... I don't know how to explain it except to repeat what I said before. He's different. He still lives his life on the surface just like he always did. Still indulges and enjoys all his addictions; still has any trick he wants and fucks everybody who catches his fancy; still works as hard as he plays and sets the world on fire professionally. Shit, he's up for a Clio award this year, and he's landed some really big name, international accounts. He's still Brian Kinney - the Stud of Liberty Avenue. Except... something inside me insists that's it's all just a false veneer. Underneath, he's not the same.

"But you admit that he still loves me? Right? You said that I was his reason for living. Right?"

Emmett nodded. "You always were, once he got over the initial shock. I don't think Brian ever intended to let himself love anybody, because he never believed he was... well, let's not go there. That would just be speculation on my part. Anyway, I think it says plenty that he cared enough to refuse to lock you up behind closed doors, to always make sure that you had the option to decide where you wanted to be. That much hasn't changed. But I think... look, I don't know anything about a new guy. But I do think he might have reached a point where he doesn't believe any more."

"Believe what?"

Emmett took a deep breath. "In the two of you. I think he might have just given up."

Justin suddenly seemed to find it hard to breathe. "He... really told you that? He really believed that I only came back because..." He closed his eyes, and tried to swallow the lump in his throat. "How could he think that? Why would he..."

He opened his eyes then, to find his oldest, best friend staring at him, her lovely dark eyes filled with pity - and something more. "Daph?" he murmured, needing reassurance, needing to hear someone tell him that Brian had no right to believe such a thing. Only, that wasn't what he saw in her eyes.

"I love you, Justin," she said gently. "You're my best friend, and you always will be. But you've always been the one to walk away. I think the reason Brian always stood back and let you go was that he didn't believe he was the one you needed or loved. I think he always expected that you would leave him, sooner or later, and you made it pretty clear, you know. Over and over again. I guess he might have finally found a way to accept it."

Justin stood up abruptly, his mind reeling as he spun and walked to the bar where he sank down on a stool and buried his face in his hands. He had listened to everything Emmett had said, everything Daphne had said, and he had wanted to scream out his denial, to dispute every word.

But he couldn't. He couldn't because... they were right. He had always been the one to walk away. But not for the reasons Brian thought.

Oh, God! How could he have been so blind, so stupid? He had walked away, time and time again, because he was hungry to taste everything that life could offer, because he was curious, because he wanted to see and experience the entire world. But only if he could be sure that, once he had sampled it all, tasted it all, experienced it all, he would be able to come home.

To the only home he'd ever wanted.

To Brian.

So why, he wondered, had it never occurred to him that he might find, when he was finally ready to return, that what he'd left behind might not be waiting for him?

His heart had insisted that Brian would always be there. But now...

No. He wouldn't accept this. He couldn't believe this. He rose and moved back to the table to study Emmett's face, and his eyes were filled with grim resolve. "You said that he was only able to hang on, to endure what they did to him, because he wanted to make sure I was safe. A person wouldn't do that if... if not for love. He still loves me. I know he does."

"I don't doubt that, Justin," Emmett admitted. "But loving you is one thing; waiting for you - believing in you - could be another. He might just be tired of watching you walk away."

Once again, Justin buried his face in his hands, suddenly swept into a cold awareness that he wanted to push away, to resist. How could he have fucked up so badly? And why had he never considered the consequences of his actions, without the fucking rose-colored glasses? "What have I done, Em?"
he whispered. "I love him so much. I don't know how to live without him."

Emmett exchanged glances with Drew - soft, loving glances filled with sympathy for the young blond's obvious anguish - and moved to the bar to drape his arm across Justin's shoulders. "It's funny, you know," he said softly. "All of us - his so-called friends - wanted nothing more than to make sure he never changed, that he'd always be the Brian Kinney that we expected him to be. And you, who claimed to love him, seemed to want nothing more than for him to become someone else - the man of your dreams. And, in the end, we all screwed ourselves over. He changed, while all of us stayed the same. We're all still here, in the same place, and he's..." He paused as he felt Justin shudder under his arm. "I'm sorry, Sweetie, but I think he's just... gone."

Justin went very still then, as he felt Daphne step close and lay her head against his shoulder, offering the solace of a gentle touch. But it was not enough. Nothing, he thought, would ever be enough.

He wanted to scream, to yell at his companions to leave him alone, to break things and rage against the unfairness of it all. He wanted to push them all away, to strike out blindly, to hurt someone or something, so maybe he would feel his own hurt a little less. He wanted to blame somebody, but he couldn't, for there was ultimately nobody left to blame. Nobody except... What had he done?

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
tbc
Chapter 20

The tall, thin redhead hunched his shoulders against the chill in the air, pulling his windbreaker more tightly around him and wondering when spring would finally arrive and chase away the last remnants of winter. Though the sun was bright and the sky incredibly blue overhead, the temperature hovered still around the fifty-degree mark, and the fitful breeze that gusted through the streets and swirled bits of debris along the sidewalks still carried a hint of frost.

He leaned against the faded brickwork of the barber shop on the corner, ignoring the occasional glare of the wizened and aproned old man who was slowly pushing a broom around the interior of the front room, a man who appeared to be even older than his shop. The redhead kept pale gray eyes trained on the entrance of the building opposite, its flight of steps shaded by a garish red awning. He squinted to peer through the big front window, jamming his hands deep into his jacket pockets to warm them while focusing on the young man silhouetted against the mirror over the bar. He could have gone into Woody's, of course, and enjoyed both the coziness of the interior and a drink to warm his gut, but he knew he had to be prepared to move quickly should the need arise. And he also had to try to preserve his anonymity, according to the instructions he'd received from his boss, following a recommendation from his predecessor.

Jared Hilliard had passed the torch at the end of his shift with a wry smile and several well chosen words of wisdom, primary among them his conclusion that the subject of their surveillance - the young man whose safety was of paramount importance to them all - was chafing under the restraints imposed by his need for a bodyguard. Thus, it was pretty obvious that doubling the security, as Lance Mathis had decided to do, would disturb him even more.

So there had been no introductions, no public transfer of responsibility, no speech from Mathis to instruct the young man about how to make their job easier. Instead, there had been a quick, friendly good-bye from Hilliard, leaving Justin Taylor to breathe a big sigh of relief, in the belief that the powers-that-be had decided that he was no longer in danger.

Thus, the tall, thin redhead, AKA Tommy Boyles, and his partner - a short, stocky Hispanic youth with the unlikely name Angel Diablo - had not yet had much time for getting to know each other or their subject, since they had never worked together as a team before, although they had known each other - casually - for many years. They were still getting acquainted on a professional level, still not able to interact instinctively, but Boyles thought they would be all right, given a little time. Only, in a situation like this one, there was no guarantee that they would be granted the time they might need. Still, they had both developed good street smarts over the years, and, more importantly, they both understood what was at stake here.

Liberty Avenue and its environs had been home to them both for most of their lives, and one did not remain long in the neighborhood without learning about the tour de force known as Brian Kinney. It was common knowledge that a smart person - a person who wanted to survive and thrive in this environment - did not risk pissing off that particular individual. Not if the person in question wanted to keep his balls intact and functional.

Kinney could be an exceptionally good friend and an exceptionally bad enemy, or so it was rumored, or he could be completely indifferent to those who never happened to cross his path. The fainthearted of the area usually preferred to take up residence among the latter group, rather than risk the extremes of the former, but Boyles didn't yet know enough about the man to be ready to make a final decision. He needed more data - a chance to fill in the blanks.

He did know, however, that Kinney was so movie-star gorgeous, in a strictly physical sense, that he generated rumors by simply walking down a street, although Boyles was quick to admit that such knowledge did not require much in the way of deductive reasoning. The man was a legend in his own time, and the legend had it that he had been known to create spikes of sexual tension in men who had never before exhibited the slightest overt tendency toward homosexuality, although no one was quite willing to suggest that he had the power to turn straight men gay; only to expose tendencies previously denied. It was also said, with great accuracy, that he could have had almost any woman he might want, except for those of the lesbian persuasion, and even a few of those were considered not completely off limits. The fact that he'd never wanted one - mostly - apparently did nothing to dissuade the distaff legions of his fans.

In short, Kinney was everything that every gay boy wanted to grow up to be, from a certain point of view.

Except that now, if common gossip and the tabloids were to be believed, the idol had been twisted into a mutilated caricature of itself, and Boyles was not quite sure how to feel about that. He, himself, was not gay, but he was the son of a Lesbian couple, and he had always admired Kinney for his in-your-face honesty, as did both of his mothers, even though they sometimes lambasted him for his renowned disdain for romantic commitments. Still, even when they'd disagreed vehemently with his attitudes, they'd never denied taking pride in his refusal to pretend to be anything other than what he was. There was no denying that he was stubborn and arrogant, impatient and willful, and completely unrepentant - but neither could it be denied that he had not a single ounce of pretentiousness or dishonesty in him, and most of the denizens of Liberty Avenue found those lacks sufficient to compensate for the intensity of the less desirable traits he did possess.

But whatever else he might be, the one thing that no one would even consider disputing was his relentless sense of commitment which would drive him to exact retribution from those who did not perform up to his expectations in the framework of professional services. And that was exactly what this situation was, regardless of its genesis. His grim determination to protect Justin Taylor might have more to do with how hot the boy's ass was or how proficient he was in giving a blow job than any innate sense of responsibility for protecting the innocent, but the arrangement with the security people was strictly professional, and they would all rue the day they fucked up if they blew their assignments.

Thus, Boyles was quick to turn his face away, ostensibly to shield himself from the wind in order to light a cigarette, as young Taylor came stumbling out the front door of Woody's, with his best friend at his heels. The girl looked distraught, but Taylor just seemed focused - or determined, maybe. Like a man on a mission.

Boyles hesitated for a moment, just long enough to note that his partner had emerged from the shadows of the alleyway in the middle of the block, and taken a right angle into the sparse traffic on the sidewalk, with Justin and Daphne moving along at a good clip some twenty yards behind him. Boyles, on the other hand, hesitated just long enough to exchange quick glances with Drew Boyd, through Woody's front window, confidant in the big football player's ability to see to the safety of Emmett Honeycutt. Lance Mathis, after an intense discussion with the local constabulary, had agreed that the threat to Honeycutt was minimal, that the attack on him had been a case of mistaken identity rather than a deliberate assault; nevertheless, he had made sure that Boyd understood that no one could be 100% confidant in such a conclusion, so that the big quarterback would keep his eyes open and his focus where it needed to be to protect the man who was so vitally important to him.

The redhead spared a quick glance for Honeycutt and suppressed a quirky smile; it was undoubtedly true that Boyd - football hero, super athlete, and steaming hot hunk - could have had anyone he wanted, male or female. The fact that he had chosen this young man, who gave a whole new meaning to the phrase 'drama queen', was proof positive that there was no accounting for how Cupid aimed his arrows. Boyles didn't really understand it, but then again, there were plenty of hetero matches that were just as mysterious and beyond his ken. Such as the marriage between his tomboy, tennis-ace sister and a music teacher ten years her senior, a quiet man with a fondness for hot-house orchids. Not just polar opposites - no. Originating in alternative universes, and proving . . . what? The farcical nature of fate?

No one in either family understood it, but none could deny that the two seemed tremendously happy and content in their joining. Perhaps Boyd and Honeycutt would prove to be cut from the same patchwork.

None of which had anything to do with his assignment, so he put such thoughts aside and strolled off down the street, maintaining a casual demeanor while never taking his eyes off his quarry.

When the two friends hurried toward the Liberty Diner, he allowed himself to relax a bit. There were probably few places in the neighborhood that could be considered completely secure, but this one came as close as any. Anybody who might have it in for one of the diner's patrons would have to be seriously psychotic to risk confronting the extended family dynamic of the clientele in this place. There were virtually no strangers in the diner, because any who might wander in had only two options: to make a quick exit, or join the clan wholeheartedly in order to earn a welcome.

Both Boyles and Diablo had known Debbie Novotny since they'd been school boys, and both decided spontaneously that they could get away with dropping in - separately - for a quick cup and a lemon bar. Plus it would give them a chance for a bit of eavesdropping, to find out what young Taylor might be up to, always a bonus in clandestine surveillance circumstances.

And - a bigger plus - it would be warm and welcoming.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

Michael had mentioned - at least five times since lunch - that he should get moving and go open up his shop. Though his hours of operation were often erratic and subject to the whim of the moment, he usually did try to open for a few hours every day except for the Sundays, when he paid lip service to his Catholic upbringing. So he had continued to talk about it sporadically, as he watched Ben and Hunter depart for afternoon classes, both yielding to the need to adhere to prior commitments, but neither really comfortable leaving Michael to his own devices. Nobody had addressed the issue in depth, but all of them knew that this situation with Brian was harder on some than on others, and might well be completely devastating for Michael. Despite the rocky road the two had navigated over the past couple of years, their love for each other had endured somehow, in that they had both been reminded of what they stood to lose if they allowed the past to slip away and their differences to strand them on either side of an ever-widening gulf of petty misunderstandings.

Brian had been first to recognize the tragedy of the loss they were facing and try to close the gap, but Michael, in a pique of jealousy and old resentments and pettiness, had turned his back on the relationship they'd once shared and immersed himself in a new life with new loyalties, and told himself that he was content and happy and better off free of old bonds. It had been a lie, of course, but comfortable enough to allow him to ignore the emotional bruises he still carried.

It had taken the trauma and tragedy of the Babylon bombing to close the rift, to remind them both of what they had been to each other - to bring them back together, to repair what had been broken.

Except . . .

Michael wasn't entirely sure why he had always felt that something - some tiny, nameless, anonymous little something - remained unmended. Things had gone back to the way they had been before - before the bombing, before the rift, before the confrontations. Even, to some degree, before Justin and Ben and Hunter.

Except . . .

He had nodded as his partner and his adopted son had said their good-byes with hugs and kisses, assured him that they would be back as soon as possible, to be with him if he chose to stand vigil again, and made their departures, not entirely successful in concealing the degree of their concern. Michael was fragile right now, but they both knew that there was nothing they could do to strengthen him. If anyone could prop him up and restore his balance . . . that task would fall to someone else - someone who might no longer be willing or interested.

Ted and Blake had been next to depart - Blake to get back to the Rehab center and his afternoon session, and Ted, grumbling in one breath about having to be the pack horse to bear the weight of the absence of both Brian and Cynthia at Kinnetik, and observing in the next that he would take advantage of the opportunity to straighten out a few things while he had the chance to exert his own authority. That comment had elicited a raised eyebrow from Emmett, a frown from Blake, and a look of intense interest from Melanie, who had gathered her belongings and made her exit next, murmuring something about researching some legal precedents in the local law library.

Emmett had been next to go, after receiving a call on his cell phone and explaining that he'd been summoned to a meeting. He too had lingered for a moment after rising, watching Michael with traces of misgivings darkening his eyes to opaque jade. In some ways, he thought, he knew Michael better than almost anybody; better even than Ben; better even than Debbie, though not - quite - better than Brian, and he understood, instinctively, what Michael was being very careful not to say. Indeed, might never be able to say, no matter how painful the silence might prove to be.

But he left, finally, acutely conscious that he could not ignore the desperation of the voice that had spoken to him on the phone, begging his assistance. He made good his departure, but he wasn't particularly sanguine about it.

Still, in the end, there were only Michael and Lindsey, sitting across from each other and staring down into cold cups of coffee, both wishing they could go, wanting to go. But neither actually moving, both finding ways to avoid looking at each other.

Thus, when the front door banged open, propelled on a gust of chill wind, they both looked up and noted the entrance of a young Hispanic who slid into the booth behind theirs. Michael nodded to him, knowing that he had seen him before - at Babylon, perhaps, or out on the street, or here in the diner - but not recalling any specifics. Debbie, however, called out a friendly greeting, complete with name, but Michael was not sufficiently interested to pay much attention.

"So," he said finally, "I'm guessing we both have something else to do, but . . ."

Lindsey's smile was weary as she nodded. "Yeah, I guess. But I'm just waiting."

"For what?"

She braced her elbows on the table and clasped her hands. "My father is bringing Gus to me. He always liked it here, so I thought it would be easier - for him - to come here first."

Neither of them paid any attention when the young man in the booth behind them stood up and went to the door, quickly pulling a cell phone out of his pocket.

"Does he know?"
She shook her head. "How do I . . . I don't know how to tell him."

He nodded. "Maybe it won't come to that."

But she was not comforted. "He's going to ask for his father," she said softly. "You know how they are . . . together. I just don't know . . ."

"What about Justin?" he asked. "Do you think he could . . ."

She smiled. "Gus loves Justin. Like a big brother, I guess. But Justin isn't . . ."

"His daddy."

"Right."

They fell silent then, still avoiding each other's eyes. Until Michael could no longer contain himself. Until he felt compelled to speak.

"I talked to Cynthia," he said softly, his hands clinching around his coffee cup. "Or - more accurately - she talked to me. She doesn't exactly mince words."

She nodded. "Yeah. And I'm pretty sure she's not done yet. With any of us."

"Do you think . . . she's right?"

"About what?"

He sighed. "I don't really know. I think there was plenty that she wanted to say, but didn't. But I think she was right about one thing, which she didn't actually say, come to think of it. But she didn't have to. He's changed, Linz. Changed right in front of our eyes, and we didn't even see it. I think we might have finally let it go too far. I think we might have lost him."

He looked up then, and had no trouble identifying the panic rising in her eyes. But she didn't get a chance to voice it, as a blond tornado swept through the entrance at that moment, and shot toward them with all the purpose and intent of a guided missile, equal parts anger and determination gleaming in hard, blue eyes.

Justin did not bother with greetings. "You," he said, jabbing a finger toward Michael, as he slid into the seat at Lindsey's side. "If anyone can tell me the truth, it's you. So tell me."

Michael's eyes were suddenly huge and dark and not entirely happy with the role assigned to him, and he looked away quickly, desperate to find something else to look at, someone else on whom to focus his attention. When a lanky redhead in an Ironmen jacket came through the door and moved toward the counter, he wasted a minute trying to figure out if he was supposed to know the guy's name. But then he sighed, realizing that he could not simply continue to ignore Justin's demand. "Tell you what?" he asked roughly. "How the fuck should I know what . . ."

But Justin was not in any mood to be dissuaded or distracted, and appeared to focus even more tightly on Michael's face as Daphne slipped into the booth, slightly out of breath and red of face.

"He says . . ." Justin had to pause then, to take a moment to try to swallow around the lump in his throat. "He says that he finally wised up. That he realized I was never going to be happy just to be with him, and that he got tired of waiting." He hesitated briefly, and swallowed again, an audible gulp that was painful to hear. "He says he moved on, and found somebody new. Somebody who won't always be looking for something else or somebody else. Someone who'll accept him for what he is, instead of always pushing him to change into someone he's not."

Michael and Lindsey found that they could not bear to see the anguish building in those blue eyes. Instead, they looked at each other and tried not to remember what Michael had been saying before Justin's arrival. Was it all part and parcel of the same circumstance? Had they lost Brian? Had all of them lost Brian?

"So you answer me," Justin insisted. "You know him better than anybody. Or you used to. So if he has moved on, if he really found somebody else, you'd know it."

But Michael was shaking his head, still avoiding Justin's eyes. "That might have been true before," he said gently, "but I'm not sure it's still true now." He forced himself to look up then, and meet the younger man's desperate gaze. "He's changed, Justin. And I don't think any of us realized how much. I don't think we know him any more."

"But why would he . . ."

"Because," said Lindsey, strangely reluctant to give voice to the words rising within her, but unable to suppress them, or the tremor in her voice. "Because maybe . . . maybe he got tired of having to be what we needed him to be. Instead of what he is."

"I don't understand," whispered Justin. "I never left him. I never could leave him, except when he pushed me away. Why would he think . . ."

But Lindsey was not prepared to deal with empty assurances or specious claims. "Yes, you did, Justin." Then she took a deep breath, as the truth tore through her like an Arctic blast. "Jesus Christ! We all did."

Justin just stared at her, his face a mask of denial. "No," he said finally. "No, that's wrong. He could have stopped us. All he had to do - all he ever had to do was just say the word."

And they all saw it then - the truth that none of them had ever been willing to confront before, but only Lindsey found the courage to say it. "But he wouldn't. That's what none of us ever understood. He wouldn't say anything or take any action, to keep us from doing what he believed we really wanted to do. He wouldn't hold us, when he thought we didn't want to be held." She closed her eyes, and felt something cold and heavy seize and shatter inside her. "Brian Kinney doesn't believe in locking people in. He gave us all our freedom, and we took it, never once stopping to think of what it cost him to let us just walk away. Or what it might cost us, in the end."

She drew a deep, shaky breath and touched her fingertips to her temples to ward off the beginning of a headache. "He even told us - I can't begin to count how many times he said it - and none of us ever once stopped to ask ourselves what it meant."

"What?" snapped Justin. "What did he tell us?"

"That he wouldn't expect anyone to stay with him, to be tied to him, out of love. That that wasn't love; it was sacrifice." Her eyes were huge and dark now, and filled with old shadows. "And we just . . . we let him believe that. Because it was easier. Because it let us do whatever we chose to do, without having to stop and think about what it might do to him."

Justin found, suddenly, that he couldn't bear to look at her and read the truth in her eyes, so he turned to Michael instead. "So you're saying you don't know if he was telling the truth, if he actually found somebody else?"

Michael decided to ignore the sad, knowing smile on Lindsey's face and address the question directly. "If you're asking if he's told me - about anyone - the answer is no. I know he's still tricking. Hot and heavy and enjoying it, but that's Brian, isn't it? In some ways, he's gone right back to who he used to be, but . . ."

"But?"

Michael shrugged. "In some ways, he's different. But I can't really explain how. It's just a feeling. I'm not even sure . . ."

"Of what?" Justin asked quickly, when Michael looked as if he didn't know how to continue.

Michael took a deep breath. "Whether it's him who's changed . . . or me."

Justin's hands were clinched in front of him as he lowered his head to brace his chin against his fingers and closed his eyes. "So you think it's possible that he doesn't want me any more." It was not a question.

"Maybe," said Lindsey slowly, a note of speculation in her voice, "we're all asking the wrong question."

"What do you mean?" asked Justin wearily, realizing suddenly that he had never felt so tired in his life.

"Maybe we should stop asking whether or not he wants us, and ask instead just how much - how desperately - we want him."

"Meaning?" That was Michael, obviously confused.

"We all assumed he would always be there, for us to come back to, whenever we wanted. But now, if we finally recognize how much we need him, how much he means to us, maybe we have to fight for him. Maybe it's time we stopped insisting that he prove himself to us, and finally prove ourselves - to him."

Justin closed his eyes, unable - unwilling - to see what was being laid out for him. "But if he . . . if he's really moved on, really stopped . . . loving me . . ."

"Then you have a big decision to make," said Daphne firmly, pragmatic as always. She waited until he opened his eyes and turned to face her before continuing. "No matter what he feels now - or says he feels - you have to know that he did love you. God! It was like this blinding light that blazed around the two of you. It was there, for anybody who wanted to see it." Then she spared a sympathetic little smile for Michael. "Although there were some who chose not to. So here's the thing. Even if he has moved on and decided to put you behind him, that doesn't change how he felt about you, and . . . well, call me a romantic fool if you like, but I don't think a love like that ever really dies. So here's your question, Blondie. Do you love him enough . . . to fight to win him back? Or . . ." Again she paused, and this time the sardonic smirk was aimed directly at Justin. "Is it easier to just let him go? Because he will, you know. He'll go; he'll accept whatever you decide, just like he always did. He won't try to lock you up in a place you don't want to be."

"But why should I have to fight . . ."

Lindsey and Daphne exchanged sad smiles. "Why do you think?" asked the blonde, reaching out to lay a gentle hand on his arm.

And he saw it then, as he had not before; saw the destination toward which he was being led - the place he had to go, unless he was willing to simply accept defeat and walk away.
"Because," he admitted softly, barely audible, "I never did before."

Nobody with a soupcon of taste could have found fault with the interior design of Kinnetic Corp. It reflected Brian’s sense of style, of course, which was impeccable, not to mention unique and definitive. Anyone who had ever visited his loft would have recognized the ambiance immediately: spare and elegant and classic - Brian Kinney interpreted in form and function.

But the exterior of the building was something else again, something more in keeping with the neighborhood in which it stood. It had been structurally restored, of course, and thoroughly cleaned when Brian bought it, but nothing could really make it look like anything other than what it was: a former bath-house. All the polish in the world would not make it possible for it to disguise its humble beginnings.

Ted had voiced his misgivings about the place several times, patiently pointing out that it was an affront to affluent clients to expect them to navigate the byways and back alleys in the vicinity of Liberty Avenue in order to reach the company’s main office, but Brian - being Brian - had steadfastly rejected Ted's conclusions, pointing out that Kinnetic was not like Vanguard or any of the two dozen other successful - or not - ad agencies in the greater Pittsburgh area; he and his staff did not think in a box, did not work in a box, did not function in a box - and would not be housed or confined in a box.

All of which, thought Ted, was just Brian being Brian, insisting on marching to the beat of a different drummer. There was no disputing the fact that he was the heart and inspirational soul of the firm, but he was, in Ted's professional opinion, a little too caught up in preserving his own mystique to pay sufficient attention to the process of growing his company.

Ted knew about growing things financially, and he often chafed under his employer's singularly unconventional corporate philosophy. Brian saw things from a fairly unique perspective, which had, up until this point, paid off handsomely, but Ted was quick to realize that a large part of Kinnetic’s success had more to do with luck than skill. Flair and intuition, after all, no matter how intense, could not make up for solid practical management policies.

But the bottom line, for the moment, was that Brian still held all the reins and made all the executive decisions; thus, the headquarters of an increasingly successful company - currently on the verge of international acclaim - still looked like a slightly modernized example of urban blight, in an area where one hesitated to walk alone at night.

Of course, there was security; Brian might be obstinate but he was never foolish, and he had hired professionals to assure the safety of his staff and his clients. Thus, there were two visible uniformed guards on duty in front of the building during business hours, and constant electronic surveillance - inside and out - that was closely monitored by Kinnetic’s chief of security and his staff.

Ted had often suggested that such expensive security arrangements would be unnecessary if the firm were located in a more upscale area, but his suggestions were greeted with nothing more than a smirk and an eye-roll from his employer. Brian seldom resorted to stating the obvious, but everyone who worked for him knew the elemental truth: it was his way or the highway. There was no in-between with Brian Kinney.

Still, Ted thought, as he strolled into the Kinnetic lobby, things might change. Even Brian might change. He had, after all, never been a victim before, and being forced into such a position might encourage him to rethink his life and his philosophy. He might be a little less sanguine, or a little more biddable.
He paused in mid-stride. Biddable? Brian Kinney? What the fuck was he thinking?

The receptionist - a comely young man with huge gray eyes and a swimmer's build - greeted him with a smile and handed him his messages. The kid's name was Garrett Delaney, and he had been Brian's personal choice for the job. When Ted had objected, recommending a young blonde woman with big tits and long legs as more suitable for a 'public face' for the company, Brian had simply laughed at him and gone ahead to do exactly as he pleased.

As always.

But now . . .

Ted made his way back to his office, stopping to speak to a couple of his assistants along the way, and looking in at the art department where two of Brian's pet graphic artists were working on a new Liberty Air campaign. The airline, which had once been a small, local company, had grown by leaps and bounds in the period since Brian had begun to handle their advertising, having expanded into Europe and the Middle East in recent years and currently expanding operations yet again, planning new routes to South America and the Pacific. Brian had planned the theme of the campaign with his usual meticulous attention to detail and then turned the project over to the two young artists who worked directly under his supervision, his most trusted assistants. Both Chelsea Archer and Jerry Glynn seemed to be excited and happy with the ideas they'd developed to carry out the campaign Brian had planned, but Ted was less enthusiastic. According to Brian's fundamental advertising philosophy, it was always all about sex, in the end, but Ted thought that maybe it was time to expand the company's horizons and reach out to a more mature, more conservative audience.

He even mentioned that thought to Chelsea and Jerry, and found himself thoroughly annoyed when they looked at him with studied nonchalance before exchanging smug, secretive smiles. They undoubtedly thought that the wise course would be to appear to agree, and then go around him to get to Brian for his approval, since his was, ultimately, the only approval that really mattered at Kinnetic.

As always.

For now.

But things could change, Ted thought, as he continued on to his office, pausing for a moment to reflect that it was a little strange - given the man's obsession with preserving his own youth and beauty - that all of Brian's employees were physically quite lovely. Wouldn't it make more sense to surround himself with less attractive individuals in order to provide a greater contrast to his own stunning good looks? One day, when he had more time for philosophical musing, he would explore that train of thought to help him better understand the man who ultimately controlled his professional destiny.

He went into his office and closed the door, enjoying the elegance of the setting. Though most of the firm's executive offices were decorated in the same style as Brian's suite, if not quite so lavishly, Ted had been allowed to indulge himself in the décor of his own personal space, and chosen to go with softer, more muted tones - mocha and taupe and cream with occasional touches of dark amber - to blend with the warm finish of his hand-rubbed maple desk. It was a retreat for him, a place to get away from the sleekness and chrome and pale leather, and he felt that he functioned better here, thought more clearly here. It felt like a sanctuary.

He lowered himself into his buckskin colored suede chair and sat back to survey his domain. His. All his. He closed his eyes, and . . .

Suddenly the soft, comforting warmth around him faded and he was surrounded with black walls and film props and slick bodies gleaming under strobe lights, and he was inundated with the sounds of flesh slapping flesh and guttural moans and . . .

He sat up quickly. What the fuck? Why would he have slipped like that, back into a time he had long since put away in the darkest cupboards of his past?

He had been Ted Schmidt - Porn king. A rich man. A successful man. A man who lived a life other gay men could only dream of. Until it had all come crashing down around his ears, leaving him broken and destitute and dependent. All because of something that was not his fault. He had been reduced to depending on the charity of people who had once depended on him. Reduced to a shadow of himself, needy, drugged out, drowning in self-pity, and blaming everyone for his fall.

Everyone. Everyone except . . . but he quickly buried that thought in a place he didn't want to see.

Ted clinched his hands in front of his face and braced his forehead against them. And he would have stayed there, mawkish and needy and pathetic. Except for . . .

Oh, God! Could it really be that he had never completely understood how much he had needed what Brian had provided? And was he only seeing it now because . . . because he might actually lose Brian?

He did not often let his thoughts drift in this direction, for, if he did, he would be forced to try to analyze the relationship he shared with his employer, and that was a place he would prefer not to go. If he allowed himself to think about it, to study it, to explore it, he might find that everything he'd ever let himself believe, every opinion he'd ever held about the man that Brian was might be wrong. Dreadfully, totally, dynamically wrong.

For years, he had cloistered himself in the sedate, unapproachable realm of his ivory tower, constructed on his own private patch of the moral high ground, and observed the phenomenon that was Brian Kinney through the eyes of moral superiority. Brian Kinney - vain, promiscuous, vapid, shallow, narcissistic, unprincipled, unapologetic.

Unapologetic.

And what, when one got right down to it, did the man have to apologize for? For living the life that Ted and all of his buddies hungered for, even though they would have denied it with their last breath? For being the person they all secretly wanted to be, but couldn't? For never pretending to be anything except what he really was and for laughing in the face of others' pretensions?

And now someone, some vicious, vindictive, nameless someone, had struck Brian down, trying to destroy the private individual behind the public persona. Someone compelled by spite and contempt and undoubtedly convinced that they were acting on a moral imperative.

Someone not so awfully different . . . from me.

"Oh, God!" he whispered, burying his face in his hands. "What do we do if . . ."

He was so immersed in the first stage of raw panic that he did not hear his door open or notice the person who entered and stood looking down at him, until she spoke.

"I was wondering how long it would take," said Cynthia, not unkindly.

Ted jerked upright, trying vainly to wipe away the evidence of his tears. "What? How long what would take?"

But Cynthia knew Ted quite well, much better than he had ever realized. "For you to remember what he really means to you."

"Don't be ridiculous," he snapped, eyes going cold and distant. "He's my boss, for God's sake. And we need to figure out how to manage in his absence. That's my only concern."

"Of course," she agreed, tacitly accepting the restriction he was placing on the conversation. "I'll set up a staff meeting. First thing in the morning, I think, if that's all right with you."

Ted, being Ted, was determined to project an attitude of disinterest. "As you wish, of course. You are, after all, his 'good, right hand', as he so often points out."

Cynthia had turned to go, but something in his tone caused her to hesitate and look back at him. "This is going to be a difficult time," she said softly. "For all of us. But it'll also be a good opportunity for us to prove ourselves, to show that we can be what he needs us to be, to protect what he's built."

"Of course," he agreed, swallowing his annoyance that she seemed to think he needed to be reminded of how to do his job.

But still she lingered. "Ted," she said slowly, "there might be complications. Problems that arise from unexpected directions. We'll need to be very careful."

"I," he retorted, "am always careful."

She managed - barely - to suppress a sigh. Life, she thought, was never simple, and she was pretty sure that it was going to grow more complicated by the hour, from this point on. She wanted to say more, to discuss the deeper issues that might arise, but it was obvious that Ted was already resenting her assumption of authority in Brian's absence, and the fact that it had been Brian himself who designated her to take control only seemed to compound the problem.

Complicated indeed.

When Ted's phone rang - his cell phone - she made good her escape, still wondering how to begin to mend a fence she had not realized was broken.

For his part, Ted was relieved to see her go and answered the call, grateful for the interruption. He was not, however, quite so grateful when he realized who was calling, and was even less so as the conversation proceeded. By the end of the caller's opening paragraph, he was wondering what else could possibly happen in the course of this godforsaken day.

---

The level of pain was rising in fits and starts now, at times growing at a regular pace and at other times, progressing in leaps and bounds. But he forged ahead with his statement, pushing the pain away with the power of his mind and dredging up every fragment of memory, every scrap of perception, and every nuance of intuition in order to flesh out his story. He was successful, mostly, in resisting the urge to give in to the pain, but by the time he was finished, he was pale and shaking and slick with sweat, and everyone else in the room was staring at him, amazed by the degree of his determination and the depth of his courage.

Detective Horvath, Agent McClaren, Dr. Keller, and Lance Mathis were all forced to take a minute, to struggle to regain their composure after listening to the full account of the attack. Only Cynthia had been spared, when Brian had insisted that she get back to the office to assume the oversight of his company. She, of course, had not been fooled; she had known exactly why she was being dismissed and had come very close to refusing to go. But then she had realized the truth; there were truly some things that she preferred not to know. She had made her exit then, after getting some last minute instructions on various business matters from her boss and assuring him that she would be back in the evening.

Only after she was gone, with Nurse Beck following her out, had he begun to tell his story, his voice mostly steady, only occasionally faltering as he worked his way around a particularly vile, difficult moment.

"Anything else?" asked Horvath finally, clearing his throat and speaking very distinctly.

Brian shook his head. "If I think of anything else, I'll let you know."

"And you're sure," said McClaren, "that there were at least four individuals among the observers? And you didn't recognize any of them?"

"They never stepped out of the shadows," Brian replied, "and they didn't talk much. One of them never said anything at all, and the others kept their voices down. Barely above a whisper."

"So there's nothing you can tell us about them." That was Horvath, obviously discouraged.

"Not much," Brian admitted. "Except that they weren't street toughs." He dredged up a painful smile. "They were obviously vicious, homophobic cunts, but they were educated cunts."

McClaren nodded. "Yet - in spite of their precautions - you're sure that they knew you. That you were targeted for a reason."

Brian gasped as a particularly sharp bolt of pain thrust through his torso. "You don't hate like that," he managed to reply, "unless it's personal."

"Is there anything you need?" asked Horvath, frustrated by his own sense of helplessness.

"Morphine," retorted Brian through clinched teeth. "With a bourbon chaser."

"Your wish is my command," said Matt Keller, syringe in hand.

But Brian was not quite done. "One minute," he said softly to his old friend. "I need just a minute. With my beard."

"Brian," Matt said softly, "you're running on sheer adrenaline. And pure Kinney stubbornness. And it can't last. Let me . . ."

"Soon. Just give me one more minute."

When Keller, Horvath, and Mathis simply folded their hands and continued to regard the patient with steady resolve, he actually managed to roll his eyes to express his frustration.

"In private, please," he growled.

None of the three looked pleased with his request, but they all took a couple of steps back, granting some small illusion of privacy in lieu of the real thing.

McClaren, on the other hand, stepped closer and leaned forward, apparently content to wait for whatever Brian might throw at him.

"Are you gay?"
McClaren smiled, relieved to see that his first impression of Kinney was correct. The man would not tolerate bullshit or evasions.

On the other hand, he had not developed his reputation for matchless undercover work without developing certain invaluable skills. "Does it matter?"

"It could." Clipped and dry, and the FBI agent got the distinct impression that Kinney didn't really care if he was gay, bi-sexual, or devoted to bestiality. It was the impression that would count.

"Explain."

Brian sighed. "Look. I have no interest in getting myself killed. Or mangled again. And I'll do whatever it takes to avoid that. But when it gets right down to it, everybody has something that means more to him than his own life. In my case, there are actually two somethings. One is my son, but there's not much that you can do about keeping him safe. Except to understand that if anything happens to him, I'm going to hold all of you assholes personally responsible. But the other thing . . ." He paused and McClaren found himself mesmerized by the sheer power radiating from deep-set hazel eyes. "The other thing that matters to me is only safe if he and everybody else can be convinced that I no longer care about him. That I've found myself a new boytoy to obsess over. So this is the bottom line. I don't give a shit if you fuck girls, guys, grandmothers, sheep, or Persian melons, just as long as you can convince the world that you're getting fucked by me. Capiche?"

McClaren grinned. "If I'm that shallow, wouldn't I run from the newest version of Quasimodo?"

Brian actually managed a tiny laugh, which he had immediate cause to regret as bruised and bludgeoned abdominal muscles protested their abuse. "You'd be in love with the old me, and I was . . . irresistible," he said, tongue definitely in cheek.

"Yeah. I know."

"You know what?"

McClaren smiled. "I didn't get to be the best in my chosen field by going into situations without doing my homework. I know all about the notorious Brian Kinney."

Brian was silent for a moment, studying the man's face. "And do you return the favor? Do I get to know all about you?"

The FBI agent was not entirely successful in suppressing a smirk. "What do your instincts tell you?"

Brian sighed. "Right now, they only tell me that I'm past due for my morphine cocktail. But later . . ."

"Later?" accompanied by the quirk of an eyebrow.

"I'm never wrong," Brian replied softly.

McClaren laughed. "We'll see about that."

Matt Keller decided, at this point, that he had waited long enough, and stepped forward with syringe in hand. "Time for your candy, Lover Boy," he announced, "and no more procrastination."

Brian sighed, more ready for pain relief than he cared to admit. But still he held McClaren's eyes. "Talk to Cynthia," he said as the doctor administered the drug and it quickly began to work its magic. "She can tell you what you need to know. To be convincing."
"I'm always convincing," McClaren replied, but his tone was strangely gentle as he watched Brian's eyes begin to close.

"If you know what's good for you," the patient whispered, "you better be."

"Is he always like that?" McClaren asked as Brian finally allowed himself to settle into the welcoming arms of slumber.

Matt Keller huffed a tiny laugh and regarded the federal agent with exaggerated sympathy. "You have no idea," he answered, "and I'm not about to spoil the fun."

"His or mine?" McClaren looked genuinely interested.

But Keller's only answer was a smile.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

It wasn't often that Ted lamented the fact that he no longer had recourse to the blissful oblivion of an alcohol-induced haze, but he thought that, right at this moment, he'd have bartered his eternal soul for a couple of shots of Grey Goose and tonic. He didn't like what he was hearing; he didn't like being forced to shift his perspective and examine things from a new point of view. But he couldn't quite convince himself to ignore the possibilities being laid out for him.

Melanie Marcus was certainly not a perfect human being; she had her share of flaws, and some (such as, for example, the man who paid Ted's salary) would contend that she had a lot more than that. But whatever flaws she might have did not prevent her from being an extremely skilled attorney with a remarkable ability to organize her facts and use them to support her always rational arguments.

Exactly like the one she was making now.

Ted had listened for a while, interrupting only twice - once to voice his initial discomfort with the general topic and once to register the de rigueur protest of the direction her monologue was taking. But mostly, he'd just listened, cringing away from the stridency of her tone and the harshness of her language, but not quite able to dismiss the points she was making.

When she finally fell silent, apparently convinced that she had said enough to give him food for thought, he found that the words to express his misgivings did not come easily. Ted knew that he had not led a blameless life; on the contrary, he was to blame for plenty of things, many, or even most, of which he had never publicly owned. But he was not given to betraying loyalty that had been hard-won in the first place.

Finally, very cautiously, he expressed his first line of defense. "It won't be up to me," he said. "I'm an accountant, and that's the beginning and end of my territory."

"But it's a business," Melanie pointed out, once more entirely rational. "Isn't the money - the finances - the foundation for any business?"

"That's true, of course. But Kinnetic is a lot more than a balance sheet. It requires . . ."

"What?" This time, a faint vein of impatience erupted on the surface of the clipped response. "Creativity? Artistic integrity? Finesse? It's a fucking ad agency, Teddie. And it belongs to the biggest whore in Pittsburgh. Do you really want to use the word 'integrity' in any sentence remotely involving Brian Kinney?"
"Mel," he said quickly, "I know you and Brian have issues, but . . ."

"Issues?" she snapped. "You think we have issues? Do you have any idea what he's done to my life, how he's ruined everything that's important to me? He's fucked up my relationship with Lindsey, and with Gus, and it just never ends. Even when we're in Canada, he still manages to screw me over, every chance he gets. So don't talk to me about issues."

But Ted knew a lot about Brian's relationship with Lindsey and with his son; more, he suspected, than Melanie did, for it seemed unlikely that Lindsey had been completely up front about the support that Brian provided, given the depth of Melanie's resentment of anything remotely related to Gus' father. "Even if that's true, do you really think this is the time to think about payback? You're talking like he engineered this whole thing to lure Lindsey and Gus back to Pittsburgh, and you know that's not true. Whatever resentment you may have toward him, even you have to admit that he didn't deserve this."

Melanie confined her response to a sigh, but Ted got the message loud and clear. She didn't quite dare to speak it aloud, but Melanie could not summon up an ounce of genuine sympathy or concern for Brian's plight.

"But to get back to the point I was trying to make," he continued, "Cynthia will be the one making the day-to-day operational decisions, until he recovers."

"And if he doesn't?"

"What do you mean? The doctor said . . ."

"I know what he said," she interrupted, "but let me ask you this. Do you really think that a man who's based his whole life on being the hottest Stud of Liberty Avenue - on being able to fuck whoever, whenever, wherever - is going to simply accept that he's been transformed into an ugly, mutilated troll, to just pick himself up, dust himself off, and get on with his life? Or even that it would be possible to go on like before? Let's face it, Teddie; to reach the level of success he's had, the first thing he had to sell to his rich clients was himself. Are they going to be willing or able to continue their professional relationship with the lump of twisted flesh he's become?"

"I don't see why it should affect his work," he replied slowly.

"You don't?" she laughed. "Everything Brian does is bigger than life - his job, his lifestyle, his sexuality. Every fucking thing. Do you really think there's anything that won't change after this?"

Ted took a deep breath. "But you're still missing the main point," he insisted. "Kinnetic is wholly owned by Brian Kinney. No partners, no stockholders, no board of directors. In short, no one with any authority to interfere. And Cynthia is the person he will entrust it to, for as long as it takes for him to . . . to do whatever he decides to do."

"And what about the people who depend on him? What about his loyal staff, and I'm pretty damned sure they're loyal because he'd have fired their asses a long time ago if they weren't. And what about my son? Don't his interests need protecting too?"

Ted, being Brian's personal accountant as well as the firm's financial officer, had full knowledge of the trust fund that had been set up for Gus, but he was pretty sure that Melanie did not know of its existence. And he did not feel comfortable in giving her the particulars, considering such knowledge to be privileged information. Nevertheless, he felt compelled to defend Brian's intentions toward his son. "I'm sure Gus will be well provided for. No matter what. And it's all moot anyway. You're still not understanding that there is no one who can intervene in how he chooses to run his company, or who he chooses to take over on his behalf."

She was silent for a moment, obviously weighing options. Thus, when she spoke again, she seemed to shift her focus. "And what about Cynthia? Do you trust her?"

He sighed. "Whether or not I trust her is beside the point. Brian trusts her. That's all that matters."

"Because she's so eager to kiss his ass." The observation was laced with verbal acid. "And I notice that you didn't really answer my question."

"Actually," said Ted, recalling certain confrontations he'd witnessed between Brian and his assistant, "she doesn't. She's very quick to speak her mind, even when he doesn't like what she has to say. I think that's why he trusts her so much, because she never lies to him, or says what she thinks he wants to hear."

"Jesus!" she almost snarled. "He's got all of you brainwashed."

"Mel," he began, growing increasingly weary of the venom in her words.

"Okay," she retorted. "I get what you're saying. But I'd be ignoring my responsibilities to my son if I didn't at least suggest that someone needs to keep an eye on how the business is run. Someone with the acumen to focus on the profit margin and the company's financial stability, and not get caught up in the Kinney Mystique bullshit."

Ted relaxed back into his chair, recognizing that he was being schmoozed, but grateful for it nonetheless. His ego had taken a bit of battering in the last few days, because he did believe that he, rather than Cynthia, would have been a more logical, more prudent choice for running the firm in Brian's absence. He had, after all, proved himself repeatedly during the years he'd worked for Kinnetic, stepping in for Brian on many occasions and holding his own pretty damned well.

Of course, he had never been involved in the actual development of campaigns or exercised any artistic oversight, but how hard could that be?

Still, it was Brian's right to make the choice, and he had made it. Now Ted just had to live with it. Unless . . .

"You don't really think he'd just walk away, do you?" he said finally, barely able to articulate the thought.

Melanie replied without taking the time to censor her words, and thus spoke without artifice for the first time since the beginning of the conversation. "We should only be so lucky."

It was late by the time Cynthia made it back to the hospital - much later than she would have liked. But it couldn't be avoided. She had spent several hours on the phone with Kinnetic's most important clients, offering assurances, easing nerves, soothing anxieties . . . doing all the things that Brian usually did, in times of crisis.

She didn't fool herself; she wasn't Brian Kinney, and she didn't have his gift for juggling fifteen accounts at once and making them all squeal with delight in the process. But she had learned a lot from him over the years, enough to know that what they all wanted to hear was that they would get Brian back - in time.
So she had given them the reassurances they needed, all the while praying that she was telling the truth.

She believed in Brian, but she understood that everything could dissipate like smoke on the wind if it should happen that he could no longer believe in himself.

The hospital room was silent and deep in shadow when she entered, after having a quick but concise conversation with Matt Keller, getting the latest on Brian's condition and an update on the impending arrival of the great and mysterious Dr. Turnage.

Tomorrow would be an interesting day, she thought.

She was relieved to see that Brian was resting, and that he seemed more relaxed tonight than earlier in the day. He was not tossing in his sleep, or struggling for breath. And yet, as she approached the bed, she noticed something that only a very few people had ever been privileged to see. The faint glow of a lamp in the corner illuminated the track of a tear as it traced its way down his cheek.

So intent was she on watching him that she did not notice the figure that was sitting motionless in the alcove by the window.

"Why?" The voice was soft, almost silken, but it still startled her enough to make her drop her Dooney & Burke.

"Shit!" she muttered, bending to retrieve her handbag. "Why what?"

"Why is he crying in his sleep?"

Chris McClaren rose from his place by the window and stepped forward, pausing a couple of feet away from the bed with his eyes fixed on Brian's face.

"In case you haven't noticed," she retorted, "somebody beat the bejesus out of him."

He ignored the snarkiness of her response, and favored her with an understanding smile. "I noticed, but that's not why he's crying."

"How do you know that?"

The smile grew wider. "Because I always get to know everything I can about the people I'm charged with protecting. And physical pain, no matter how extreme, is not going to make this one cry."

She turned to stare at him, noticing for the first time that he had changed his clothes - and his persona - since she'd seen him last. Gone was the business suit, the dress shirt, silk tie and cuff links, the Prada shoes, along with the professional demeanor. The FBI agent had been replaced by a young, hip, playboy type - relaxed and cool, clad in jeans, boots, and black leather, and still drop-dead gorgeous.

"Wow!" she said as she got her first clear look at him. "You look wonderful and different."

He shrugged. "It's work."

She nodded. "OK. So who are you supposed to be?"

"We'll work that out in a minute," he answered. "After you answer my question."

She turned back to study Brian's face. "It's complicated."
He smiled. "Yeah. I figured. But I still need to know whatever you can tell me."

She sank into a chair beside the bed, and reached out to adjust the blanket that had slipped down to expose Brian's left shoulder. "I've worked for him for almost eight years, and I still learn something new every day. But the short version is that what you see on the surface is hardly even the beginning of the story."

"Deep then?"

"Deeply scarred, and coming from as far back as he can remember I think. That's something that almost nobody has ever been allowed to see. So . . ." She turned to examine McClaren's face with a hard, demanding gaze "whatever insider info you may have, you'd do well to keep to yourself."

"But this - these tears - they aren't for old scars. This is about the kid, isn't it? The reason he's so willing to accept my intrusion in his life. It's not to save his life. It's to save Justin Taylor. Isn't it?"

"You have done your homework, haven't you?"

He nodded. "But all the preliminary data in the world can't provide the intimate details. That's what I need from you."

She sighed. "It's fairly simple, actually. Brian Kinney never - never - believed in love. He believed in fucking, and he was the first to admit it. Until Justin Taylor came along, and kept coming back, no matter how many times Brian pushed him away. He just kept coming back, and one day - to his own astonishment - Brian woke up to find out that he loved Justin. Against his will, against his better judgment. He even proposed marriage, bought a big country house for them, planned a wedding. Until . . ."

"Until what?"

She hesitated. "Well, that's the real mystery, isn't it? According to Brian, they both decided that marriage wasn't for them, that neither of them was willing to let the other sacrifice the life they were meant to live, in order to be together. So Justin took off to New York to become the new Andy Warhol, and Brian went back to his old life. Only . . ."

"Only?"

Once more, she studied Brian's face. "He never explained it. Never even mentioned it much, but I always thought that he came to believe that Justin needed more than he could ever give him. I think he pushed Justin away one last time - hard enough this time to be sure that he would never come back. Not because he didn't love Justin enough, but because he loved him too much."

"And Justin?"

Her smile was gentle. "Needed Brian's love, like you or I might need air to breathe. Only, once he had it, he always seemed to find other things to grab his attention. I always thought it was because he was so young, that he still needed to explore everything that life might have in store for him. Only, I think he might have overlooked the fact that Brian would eventually come to believe that he wasn't what Justin needed at all."

The FBI agent reached into a slim leather case on the bedside table and extracted a photograph of Brian Kinney, taken at a recent awards banquet. He spent a moment examining the man's perfect features and elegant body, and noting that the smile he wore seemed just slightly out of character. "Would Brian be right to assume that?"
She sighed. "I don't think so. I think that, ultimately, Justin will come to see that nothing could ever be enough to compensate for losing Brian. Only by then . . ."

"By then?"

"You have to understand who Brian really is to understand what it would mean if he finally came to that conclusion. Once he believes that Justin will never be happy with him, there is nothing that Justin can do to change his mind. He's truly the ultimate immovable object."

McClaren huffed a small sigh. "Nothing's ever simple. So, do you think I'm his type? Will young Taylor buy into our little ruse?"

She let her eyes drift once more down his buff body. "Oh, you're definitely his type, from a strictly physical perspective. But who else are you supposed to be?"

"The name's the same," he answered, "but the identity is different, though it's one I use on occasion. I'm set up as a freelance photographer, working on a documentary about the impact of the outsourcing of jobs by American corporations on the working classes in places like Pittsburgh. All the records are in place to document my story. And I really am a trained photographer, so the studio that's been set up for me is supplied with a wealth of examples of my work."

"Interesting," she observed.

He grinned. "Like I said before, I do my homework. And I was pretty sure Kinney wouldn't waist his time on a postal worker or a violin teacher or a mama's boy from Newport Beach."

"Unless," said a hoarse voice from the bed, "he had a great ass."

Cynthia grinned, noting that McClaren seemed annoyed - for just a second - that Brian had regained consciousness without attracting the attention of the well trained agent.

But there was no time for discussion or repartee as they were interrupted by a soft, steady knock at the door.

"Brian? Can I come in?"

Brian and Cynthia breathed the name in tandem. "Emmett!"

"Didn't I throw him out earlier?" asked Brian, slightly confused over what day it might be, and where he was in the framework of time.

Cynthia's smile was gentle. "It's Emmett, Brian. Do you really expect him to give up without mounting a new attack - or six?"

Brian turned to look up at McClaren, noting the change in the man's appearance and approving of the look. Black leather might have been invented for just such an individual. "You ready for your debut, Friend?"

McClaren stepped forward and very deliberately, very gently leaned over and covered Brian's mouth with his own. "Action, Baby," he whispered.

His timing was perfect, as Emmett, obviously impatient and tired of waiting, came barreling through the door just in time to witness the end of the kiss.

The big Nelly-bottom did not - quite - voice the question that trembled on his lips, but he might as well have, as they all heard it anyway. It fairly reverberated in the silent room, as it flashed in his eyes.

Who in the hell are you?

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~
Chapter 21

Twilight was slipping toward true darkness by the time the front door of the diner sprang open before the determined assault of an excited six-year-old decked out in artfully faded jeans, an Ironmen t-shirt, miniature biker boots, and a horrendously expensive black leather jacket (horrendously expensive for a six-year-old anyway.) It was his favorite jacket, because it had been a gift from a very special someone, and because it allowed him to act as if he looked like that same special someone. Which he did, by the way.

His name was Gus Marcus-Peterson, but he sometimes introduced himself to new friends as Gus Marcus-Peterson-Kinney, not actually minding that it was a real mouthful, although he was very careful not to do so when his Mama was around. It was okay, though, when it was Mommie who was present.

He didn't pretend to understand why it should matter which name he used, but he had learned early on in life how to read his mothers' moods - when to indulge his urge to exercise his free spirit, and when to rein it in. He did not mention his daddy to Mama any more, because she always got this really pinched-up, squinty look on her face when he did, with lines like trenches forming around her mouth and eyes, and her voice getting all hoarse and rough. And sometimes she'd snap at him too, and get upset over stuff that wouldn't bother her at all at other times.

So he'd learned.

But right now, the diner was bright and filled with light, and there was only his mommie and Uncle Michael and Granny Deb present, so he felt free to race across the room and throw himself into his mommie's arms and shout out his demands.

"I love you, Mommie, and I missed you, and where's my Daddy?"

Granny Deb greeted him with a huge smile, but he did wonder why her lips were trembling - just a little - and why there seemed to be water dripping from her eyes. She was not really his granny, of course; he knew that. But she was J.R.'s granny, and she seemed to like it well enough when he joined his baby sister in calling her that. He didn't quite understand why he didn't have a real granny, but it was enough for him that he was loved, deeply and completely, by his moms and his daddy and so many other people.

And now, of course, he had a new Grandpa (new to him, anyway) to add to the group. He had been a little uneasy at first, when Leona - his babysitter - had introduced the gray-haired man as his grandfather and informed him that they would be traveling together - that 'Mr. Peterson' was going to take him to his mommie in Pittsburgh. But 'Mr. Peterson' had quickly knelt beside him and announced that his real name - to Gus - was 'Grandpa' and that he had been waiting a very long time for the chance to meet his grandson. After that, Grandpa had been very kind to him and smiled at him a lot, and he had quickly gotten comfortable enough to enjoy their drive down from Toronto.
Plus his grandfather had stopped off repeatedly during the trip to buy him lots of cool things - egg McMuffins and hamburgers and French fries and Cokes (which Mama never let him drink) and ice cream sundaes and a bunch of Hot Wheels cars and a big bag of Oreos and chicken nuggets and even a DVD player to use in the car, with copies of Toy Story and Finding Nemo for him to watch from the comfort of his brand new car seat. Thus, the man's eagerness to please, along with some remarkably candid and precocious observations from the boy that had his grandfather choking with laughter, had provided the final impetus for them to form a new bond, and by the time they arrived on the outskirts of Pittsburgh, they'd become bosom buddies.
"Jesus Christ!" whispered Granny Deb. "He looks more like Brian every time I see him."

Gus' smile was brilliant. He loved it when people said he looked like his daddy.

Ron Peterson raced through the door in pursuit of his grandson, slightly red-faced to have been outpaced by an exuberant six-year-old, obviously intending to apologize.

"It's all right, Daddy," Lindsey assured him. "I spend half my life racing around to try to keep up with him."

"He's a real live wire," he replied, pausing to dab his forehead with a handkerchief. "I haven't had a work-out like this since you were that age."

Lindsey swept Gus up into her arms and covered his face with kisses, much to his chagrin. He had reached that age where getting lipstick by his mother was at the bottom of his wish list.

"Debbie, Michael," said his mom, after another round of kisses, "this is my father."

"Mr. Peterson," said Michael, rising and extending his hand.

But Debbie, as usual, was more concerned with substance than style. "Well," she said drily, studying the man's face sharply as he shook Michael's hand, "it's about fucking time."

A quick grimace suggested that he didn't much care for her choice of language, but the flush that immediately flared in his cheeks acknowledged the accuracy of her observation. "Yes," he agreed, "it is."

She nodded and turned to take Gus from his mother's arms. "No matter how homophobic you are, how could you possibly resist Gorgeous Gus?"

The flush deepened, as he met his daughter's eyes. "I'm not, you know," he said softly. "Not really. I just . . . I guess I just don't understand, given what it costs, why a person would make that choice."

"It's not a choice, Daddy," she replied. "It's just . . . who I am."

He nodded, but still looked slightly confused.

"Want some advice?" asked Debbie, still cuddling Gus to her shoulder. "Stop trying to diagnose it or analyze it or understand it. Just deal with it, and get on with the task of living." Gus giggled as she tickled him gently. "And enjoy what you've been given."

"Where's J. R.?" asked Michael, trying not to sound resentful over the fact that Brian's son was here and getting all of Debbie's attention while his daughter was, apparently, still stuck in Toronto.

Lindsey did not exactly meet his gaze. "Mel thought it best for her to stay with Leona."

Mr. Peterson sighed. "I don't think she was able to put aside her distrust of me, to allow me to bring her daughter here."

"But she's my daughter too," Michael protested. "And Lindsey's."

Lindsey bit her lip and turned to regard him with a slight frown. "Thank you, Michael. And, in my heart, you're right, but, according to the law, she's not. I don't have any legal rights to J.R. I always think it's a little ironic - that Brian cared enough about Gus' future to give up his parental rights so Melanie could adopt him, and we could build a good life together, but somehow, that was never an issue with you. Or Melanie, for that matter. As far as J.R. is concerned, I'm just the wicked
"Why would you think that?" he asked, genuinely concerned over the hurt he heard in her tone and the shadows he saw in her eyes.

But she chose not to respond, struggling to forget all the harsh words and the accusations she had endured from Melanie in recent months - harsh words almost always engendered by some contact with or disagreement over Brian. Lindsey had hoped that putting physical distance between their little family and the man who was Gus' father would serve to defuse Melanie's growing resentment of him, but it had not worked. Perhaps it might have if Brian had been willing to simply fade into the woodwork and turn his back on his only son, but that had not happened, and she was virtually certain now that it never would. Brian Kinney had not expected to fall in love with his son - had not wanted to become so involved in the boy's life - but it had happened anyway, without his consent. And it wasn't going to change.

Unless . . . given what he had endured here, there was no way of knowing what would happen from this day forward. Brian might choose to back away from Gus, but not for the reasons Melanie would have preferred. If he chose to do so, it would be because of his deep and abiding love for his son - not in spite of it. It was strange, Lindsey thought, that none of them had ever picked up on how fiercely protective the man could be, or realized how much he was willing to sacrifice to preserve the safety of those he loved.

And that was the other thing, she realized with a smile. They had also never realized how much, how deeply, he loved. Because, of course, he'd never said it. And never would.

"You know," Ron Peterson observed, as he slid into the booth beside his daughter, "there was a time, when you and Brian were so close, that I thought . . ."

"Christ!" laughed Debbie. "Not you too. Makes you wonder how many people got their hearts broken when they fooled themselves into thinking they might snag the mighty Kinney for a son-in-law."

She did not immediately recognize the revealing nature of what she'd said, until Michael turned to look at her with a sad, unflinching certainty in his eyes. "Present company excluded, Ma?"

The involuntary bloom of bright spots of color on Debbie's cheeks were the only answer she'd provide, but they were enough. "Come on, Gus," she said firmly. "Let Granny fix you a hot fudge sundae."

But Gus, in his own way, could be as single-minded and focused as his father. "Don't want a sundae. Want my daddy."

The jangle of the bell over the front door drew Lindsey's attention briefly, and, if she had not been so distracted by trying to figure out how to explain the situation to her son, she might have stopped to wonder why the two individuals who were strolling up to the counter had been in and out of the diner at least three times during the afternoon. But she wasn't really paying attention, and the couple was not unlike dozens of others who had wandered in during the day, so she didn't spare them a second thought.

Chuck Valentia and Ricky Domingue took their places at the counter and pretended to study the menu on the wall while their actual focus was concentrated on one obstreperous little boy who was beginning to tire under the stress of a long, eventful day.

"Gus, you can't see Daddy tonight," Lindsey tried to explain, being careful to project only serene thoughts and warm comfort. "He's not at home, and . . ."

"Then where is he?" he demanded, not really interested in excuses. He wanted his daddy, and he wanted him now.

Lindsey was still scrambling for an answer when deliverance - from a certain point of view - walked through the front door, and none of the principal players in this particular little drama noticed when four different individuals - two inside the diner and two outside the window - all swore under their breath.

Tommy Boyles pretty much summed it up for all of them. Fuck! If Kinney's enemies happened to walk into this scene right now, achieving their goal of destroying everything the man cared about would be as easy as shooting fish in a barrel.

But Justin, who had spent the late afternoon wandering the streets around Liberty Avenue and figuring out what he wanted to do, was only focused on Gus as they ran toward each other and came together when the little boy leaped into Justin's arms, chanting his demands as an unbroken litany. "Want Daddy, want Daddy, want Daddy."

Justin simply clasped the child close to his chest and whispered his response directly in the boy's ear. "Then it's Daddy you'll get."

As it happened, Michael was the only one close enough to hear the exchange. "Justin, you can't just . . ."

"No?" Justin was almost snarling. "Who's gonna stop me?"

"Oh, I don't know," Michael answered. "Brian's army, maybe?"

But Justin was undeterred as he looked around to meet Lindsey's gaze and flash her a smile that was not quite the one that had earned him his nickname, but came close. "If it's really time to fight for him," he said softly, "then the war starts right now."

He turned then to face Michael, knowing instinctively that it was time for the two of them to finally put aside their differences and join ranks if they were to have any hope of success. "What about you? Want to enlist?"

Michael did not hesitate. "Hell, yes."

The entire group rose then, and made a rapid exit from the building, leaving only Debbie to stare after them, mouth gaping, as four young toughs scattered at various points around and within the diner scrambled to figure out just what the hell was going on and how best to cope with it.

In the end, they could only roll their eyes, hope they were lucky enough to go unnoticed, and take off at a dead run to keep pace with the individuals they'd been charged to protect and defend.

"Shit! Is the woman completely brainless? Why on earth would she risk the kid's safety by bringing him back here?" Lance Mathis was obviously, thoroughly disgusted.

Drew Boyd was sympathetic to his cousin's dilemma, but he kept his eyes trained on the door to Brian's private room where Emmett was currently trying to work his way back into his old friend's good graces. Or, at least, to convince Kinney to tolerate his presence.
Boyd had stayed at Emmett's side throughout the afternoon, and watched fondly as the big Nelly-bottom analyzed his way through an interpretation of Brian's behavior so that, by the time darkness was imminent, he'd managed (he thought) to figure it out and decide that he was not about to allow himself to be manipulated. If Brian thought he was going to be able to bluff his way through this particular head-to-head, he'd better think again.

"Settle down, Lance," Boyd urged. "She's not used to having to think in terms of defending her kid against lunatics like these. And if you're right to think that the perps haven't tumbled to the fact that Brian has a son, or figured out how to find him if they do know about him, then it's a fairly simple matter to keep the kid isolated from his old man."

"Yeah? Well, any hope of 'simple anything' in this mess just went out the window. Young Taylor just hooked up with the kid and seems to be on his way here, to bring the boy to his father."

"Shit!"

"Exactly. Looks like we're going to have to rethink our options. I really thought that Jared was right - that it would be better for Taylor to believe we'd eliminated him as a target. But now I don't think that's going to work."

"Even with Brian putting on his big rejection act?"

Mathis turned around and peered into his cousin's face. "Did you believe him?"

"No," he admitted, "but I have something of an inside track. Emmett knows Brian very, very well."

"Better than Taylor?"

Boyd had to concede that it was unlikely that anybody knew Brian better than his young lover. Which led him to believe that Brian would have to take his performance to the next level if he were to have any hope of convincing his target audience.

Which raised an interesting question; what would the puppet-master try next?

As Emmett made his way into the room, eyes wide and filled with questions, Chris McClaren leaned back in once more, touching his lips to Brian's ear and breathing a quick message. "By the way, Stud, I don't speak 'boytoy', and, if I did, you'd be bored stiff in thirty seconds."

Brian barely managed not to laugh and had to suppress a groan as his abdominal muscles protested the contraction necessary for that control, as he turned to regard Emmett with cold eyes. "What part of 'Fuck off' do you not understand?"

Emmett continued forward, unfazed. "Charming, as always, I see. But just . . . get over yourself, Brian. I've known you too long, and - regretfully - too well."

Brian blinked and ignored the quickly suppressed snicker of Cynthia's laughter. "You've been spending too much time around Debbie."

"Umhmm," Emmett agreed, not even trying to conceal his curiosity as he gazed at McClaren. "So aren't you going to introduce me to . . . Jesus, he's Goddamn gorgeous, isn't he?"

"Let me guess," laughed McClaren, as he stepped forward and extended his hand. "You're Emmett Honeycutt."
"How'd you know?" asked Emmett, accepting the handshake.

"Brian's told me all about you."

Emmett's eyes, bright with icy daggers, darted toward the bed. "Too bad I can't say the same. Who exactly are you?"

"More to the point," snapped Brian, "how is that your business?"

"Grumpy, isn't he?" said McClaren, without missing a beat. "He's had a rough day. I'm Chris McClaren."

"Grumpy is his middle name," replied Emmett, "but that still doesn't tell me who you are."

"He's a friend," said Brian, suddenly sounding weary and exasperated. "Anything else you'd like to know?"

"Actually," Emmett drawled, "there is. Such as . . . how come we've never met before, if he's such a good friend?"

McClaren smiled and opened his mouth to respond, but it was Brian who answered. "Because my life is not an open book. Some parts of it are private, and nobody's business but my own."

McClaren seemed, at that moment, to forget all about Emmett and his questions as he moved back to the bedside and clasped Brian's hand with gentle fingers. "If you're not careful," he said softly, "your friend's going to think you're ashamed of me."

"He's not that stupid," Brian answered, his voice gone soft and gentle as he pulled McClaren down and lifted his lips to receive another kiss.

A bit of nuzzling and another whisper in the ear. "How'm I doing?"

This time Brian did allow himself a bit of a chuckle with his murmured response. "Surprisingly well."

"Okay," snapped Emmett, not even bothering to try to conceal his frustration. "I get the point. But I still want to know . . ."

McClaren straightened up and produced an exaggerated sigh. "My name is Chris McClaren, and Brian and I are . . . old friends. We met in New York a couple of years ago, when we worked together on an ad campaign. But we've only gotten to know each other better . . . recently, when I got sent here on assignment. I'm a photographer, you see, so we move in the same circles. Professionally."

Emmett allowed his eyes to sweep down the photographer's sculpted body, taking note of pecs and abs and gluts to die for, not to mention the bubble butt and the discreet yet distinct swell of a healthy package, all remarkable beneath the stunning clarity of those blue eyes accented by the bright blue collar peeking out from beneath the black leather jacket. When he answered, his voice was just slightly breathless. "I'll just bet you do. Well, let me be the first . . ." He glanced toward Brian and decided to ignore the gleam of annoyance flashing in the man's eyes, "or the second, perhaps, to welcome you to beautiful downtown Pittsburgh. I'd love a chance to get to know you better, and to show you the sights."

Brian actually grinned beneath the cover of his bandages, thinking that he couldn't have asked for a better opportunity to further develop his plot, even if he'd written the script himself. God bless Emmett Honeycutt! "Down, Boy," he said sweetly, noting that Cynthia had turned toward the window, undoubtedly to hide her own smirk. "He's already seen the only sight that matters. Namely . . . me!"

Then the room went totally silent as everyone in it recognized the irony of what he'd said - Brian, perhaps, most of all - and he couldn't quite suppress the little gasp that escaped from his mouth as Emmett fought to maintain his composure and not flinch away from the raw, ugly truth swirling through the room like a cyclonic dust storm. Cynthia continued to stare out the window, absolutely motionless.

McClaren was the only one who managed to maneuver around the awkward moment and continue the conversation. "Actually," he said quietly, "there's no need. I was born and raised right here in the Pitts, although I've been gone a long time."

No one - except McClaren perhaps - would ever realize how difficult it was for Brian to formulate and verbalize a reply. "You picked a good time to come back," he managed to murmur.

The FBI agent - in perfect character - made no attempt to touch Kinney or offer any kind of physical soothing, but he did move closer to the bed and prop his hip against it in a proprietary manner. "Good timing is one of my better traits," he replied, with a playful waggle of eyebrows. But his eyes were soft with understanding as he met Brian's gaze.

Brian found, to his surprise, that it was difficult to look away.

Shit!

Why was he suddenly so sure that things were about to get even more complicated than before?

Then there was a disturbance in the corridor outside the door, and Brian closed his eyes, realizing that his little mental observation had barely scratched the surface of how complicated life could get.

Fuck!

But there was abruptly no time to worry about that, no time to even consider it as the door flew open, and everything happened so quickly that there was virtually no time to react or prevent anything.

"Daaad-deeee!"

Logically, rationally, he should have recoiled from the small figure racing toward him - should have turned away, refused to allow himself any kind of emotional response. But there was no way he could do that. No way he could refuse to welcome Gus into his arms, even if the assault of the small body generated excruciating pain in all the wrong places, all the places that were so badly battered and damaged. And yet, he still held on to the writhing torso and the flailing arms and legs, and clasped them tight against him, ridiculously grateful for small gifts; for the fact that he could actually smell the unique, little-boy aroma of his son - traces of the French fry grease on his fingers and chocolate syrup on his breath, of the sweat of a childish body and the special toothpaste Lindsey always bought for him, of the baby shampoo that she still used on his hair and the peppermint liquid soap that created the froth in his bubble bath. The scent was distinctive, and served to completely erase the lingering stench of bloody bandages and the sharp tang of antiseptics.

And, remarkably, for the fact that Gus knew instinctively where to find his daddy, not deterred for a moment by bandages or the physical distortions created by the beating his father had sustained.

And for the fact that the boy's penchant for non-stop chatter seemed to be in full operational mode, as he recounted the details of his journey and his day and his new grandfather and everything he'd eaten.
since he'd left school yesterday, and how he'd decided that he'd love to be a spaceman like Buzz Lightyear and . . .

Brian laughed, and to hell with how much it hurt. "Hey, Sonny Boy," he almost shouted, borne up on the tide of his little boy's enthusiasm and forgetting everything else - almost.

Until the child went suddenly silent, and reached out with tiny fingers to stroke the bandages obscuring his father's face. "Does it hurt, Daddy?"

"Not so much," Brian replied gently, "now that you're here. Does it scare you?"

Gus simply smiled and shook his head. "You're still you, under there."

"Out of the mouths of babes," said Cynthia softly, her face touched by a gentle smile.

The room was suddenly very full, and the new arrivals quickly arranged themselves around the perimeter, shifting into a vaguely us-versus-them dynamic, with Emmett standing astride the only neutral ground.

Brian appeared not to notice, still caught up in the warm delight of being the focus of his little boy's interest, but everyone else was intensely aware of the stirring of adversarial attitudes. Especially between two particular members of the crowd.

Chris McClaren's smile was steady, but his eyes were wary as he studied the new arrivals - one in particular. He recognized them all, of course; he had reviewed photos and profiles of all the people who were important fixtures in Brian Kinney's life. But he was pretty sure he would have known them all anyway, Their expressions and their eyes and - most of all - the way they looked at Brian would have identified them at first glance, except for the older man who brought up the rear as they all stumbled in.

Dark hair and dark eyes, filled with a furtive, naïve hunger, laced with a deep, albeit hopeless need - that was obviously the old friend, Michael, longing for something he could never have. And the smartly-dressed blonde sophisticate who attempted to conceal the depth of her feelings by focusing on the little boy in Brian's arms instead of the man himself - that was Lindsey, suppressing the very same yearning but slightly more successful in her effort than Michael.

But the one who mattered most - the one for whom Kinney was apparently willing to give up his life - would have been unmistakable, under any circumstances. Justin Taylor was as beautiful as anyone McClaren had ever seen - exactly as he would have expected of the man who had managed to steal Kinney's heart - and the fire in the young artist's eyes only served to enhance his beauty, and to underscore the intensity of his intimate connection with his former lover.

The two just stared at each other for a while, while Lindsey and Michael chose to focus on the central figure in this drama.

Brian, meanwhile, was doing a masterful job of ignoring them all, looking past them instead to focus on the only individual in the group that McClaren did not recognize.

"What the fuck are you doing here?" he demanded, his eyes sharp and clear as he stared at Ron Peterson, knowing as he said it that his choice of words would annoy the man.

But Peterson surprised him.

"Getting to know my grandson," he replied, "and . . . checking on his father."
Brian managed to convey a grin in spite of the bandages obscuring his face. "Well, fuck me, Freddie! I never thought I'd see the day when you'd refer to me as anything except 'that asshole who should have married my daughter'."

Peterson smiled. "I was kind of hoping you'd forgotten about that."

"Not likely."

The elderly man nodded. "I see your point." Then he moved forward and extended his hand to Brian. "You think we could . . . start over?"

No one else in the room was paying much attention, but Brian heard something odd in the man's tone, something that made him wonder what he was really being asked. "I don't know," he answered. "Can we?"

But he did extend his hand, and allow Peterson to grasp it. It wasn't much of a truce, but it would do, for the present. Brian thought he had enough drama going on his life at the moment; thus, any truce was better than none.

Meanwhile, Gus was going on with his soliloquy, while Lindsey was trying to convince him to relinquish his hold on his daddy and get down off the bed with Michael lending moral support, but with absolutely no hope for success as Brian was holding on to Gus every bit as avidly as Gus was holding on to him. Cynthia, meanwhile, had moved to stand by the head of the bed, her posture suggesting she was preparing to defend the castle walls, if necessary, and McClaren and Justin were continuing to stare at each other while Emmett stood by, so nervous that he actually resorted to wringing his hands.

Then everyone fell silent, coincidentally just as Justin stepped forward and looked directly down into Brian's eyes. "Is this him?"

"What are you doing here?" Brian's voice was cold - detached.

"Asking you a question." Justin snapped. "Is this him?"

Brian looked up at McClaren, hoping that the agent was as good an actor as he apparently thought he was. Then he took a deep breath before replying. "Justin, this is Chris McClaren."

The twitch of Justin's lips was more smirk than smile. "So you've heard of me?"

"Actually, I read your reviews. I understand you're the new darling of the New York gallery set."

"I do all right," Justin retorted, "but that's surely not all you know of me."

"No," admitted McClaren. "We have . . . mutual friends, and I've seen your work."

"At the loft," Justin said, obviously pleased.

"Uhhh, no. At Kinnetic, actually. It's very impressive."

Justin turned to look at Brian, shadows rising in his eyes. "At Kinnetic? You . . . moved my painting?"

"It's an investment," said Brian, without inflection. "One that I expect to pay off handsomely some day, when you become the new Warhol, so I couldn't very well just discard it, could I?"
"But it was a gift - my gift, to you."

Brian took a deep breath as Gus twisted against him and managed to jab an elbow into a particularly painful spot on his torso. "More like a partial payment for the money I invested in your aborted education."

Brian was surprised that McClaren knew about the painting that had once hung in his loft - a painting Justin had done when they were still together, which was so filled with personal meaning that it had gotten more and more difficult for him to look at it, an abstract work filled with promise and hope and belief in the brightness of a golden future. After a while, it had become a reminder - almost tactile and certainly visceral - of all he had lost, and he had hired someone to pack it up and transport it to Kinnetic, where it hung now in the lobby. He had originally intended to put it in his office, but even that had proved to be too personal, too problematic.

Of course, the image of it was still with him - would always be with him. He had only to close his eyes to see it. And there were other reminders as well, of which Justin knew nothing. Reminders which absolutely no one knew about, although a quick look into the vivid blue of McClaren's eyes made him wonder. But those reminiscences he only indulged on occasion. When the mood struck him. In his mind, he termed such moments his lesbianic lapses.

"He's not your type," Justin said coldly, forcing Brian to look up and meet his gaze.

Brian shifted Gus to a more comfortable position before offering a response. "How the hell do you figure that?" he asked, genuinely curious.

"He's nothing like me." Abruptly, the coldness was gone, and there was only a smug certainty, laced with humor, in the younger man's tone.

McClaren said nothing, but he did step closer to Brian, understanding that it was not his place to confront the young artist now, but sensing that this moment would be terribly difficult for Brian.

"Well, you're definitely right about that," Brian answered finally, sounding unutterably weary. "He's nothing like you. He knows how to figure out what he really wants, and how to fight for it. And then, when he gets it, he knows how to hold on to it - how to be loyal."

The hurt that bloomed in Justin's eyes was like a dagger in Brian's heart, but he knew that he must not yield to his own weakness. He must stay the course. And he was tremendously relieved when the hurt was quickly submerged beneath something that approximated contempt.

"Loyal? You think he's so loyal? To him - to all your pretty little tricks that fight for the chance to get fucked by the mighty Kinney - you're just the Stud of Liberty Avenue. Just a notch on their belts. Or, at least, you used to be, but let's see how loyal he is, now that what's on the outside is . . ."

And he stopped cold, his face going stark white as he realized what he'd almost said and prayed desperately that no one - especially Brian - would be able to finish the sentence for him.

But one look at Brian's face, as well as the faces of those around him, told him that he should have known better.

"Now that what's on the outside," said Brian in a soft, emotionless voice, "is as ugly as what's on the inside."

Justin opened his mouth to take it back, to do whatever it took to erase it, but, in the end, he knew it was too late. It hung between them like an oily shadow, and nothing would ever completely dissipate it.
He found that he couldn't think of a word to say, so he turned and ran.

"Daddy," said Gus, snuggling against his father's shoulder, "why Jus-sin crying?"

Brian turned to drop a kiss - slightly awkward due to the bandages - on his son's forehead. "Don't worry, Sonny Boy. Jus-sin will be just fine. He just swallowed something he didn't like, but he'll get over it."

"Maybe he will," snapped Lindsey, stepping forward to remove her son from his father's arms. "But will you?"

To her surprise, it was not Brian who answered, but Chris McClaren who moved to intercept her, preventing her from taking Gus from Brian; he stared at her, with eyes flecked with ice, and seemed to challenge her right to speak. "Maybe," he said firmly, stepping closer to Brian and helping him adjust his grip on his son, "you need to stop and figure out just where your loyalties lie, Ms. Peterson."

She glared at him. "I don't need anyone to remind me . . ."

"You don't? Tell me then; did you hear what the boytoy just said - or rather, almost said? Did that register at all, or do you just automatically dismiss anything that doesn't fit in with your preconceptions? Do you always cast him as the poor little victim?" Then he snickered. "Jesus! No wonder he ran away."

"Now wait a minute," said Michael. "You can't just . . ."

"I'm having a really hard time believing this bullshit," McClaren continued, with a sardonic smile. "You're getting your knickers in a twist because the twink got his feelings hurt. Is that what you want to focus on, in spite of everything that's happened here? Jesus Christ! Do you really expect Brian to agonize and weep over the fact that Blondie is going into queen-out mode - something that he does pretty often, according to what I've heard. Is that really what matters to you?"

"He was really hurt," Michael said quickly.

"He'll get over it," McClaren retorted, "and maybe, in the process, he'll even figure out that weeping and wailing aren't going to change anything. You either sit and cry over things that are wrong, or you set out to make them right. One or the other. Not both."

Throughout the exchange, Emmett looked from face to face, trying to read the emotions concealed behind shifting expressions - sensing anger and resentment and uncertainty - and something else, something he could not identify, something that made him want to run from the room and find a quiet hole to crawl into. Things were . . . different. Things felt different, and he wasn't even sure that the change was necessarily a bad thing. But it was enough to scare him, to make him wonder what would come next and whether or not their lives - all their lives - might be on the verge of a major transition, in a world which might never be quite the same.

Abruptly, Michael turned to face Brian, to stare at him with hard, accusing eyes. "Are you just gonna sit there, and let him shoot his mouth off like this? It's Justin, for God's sake. Your Justin."

Brian did not blink and did not flinch away from the smoldering anger he read in Michael's expression. He simply looked back, his eyes dark and unreadable. "That's the thing, Mikey," he said slowly. "He was never really mine . . . was he?"

"He could have been," said Lindsey, stepping forward and refusing to be intimidated or dissuaded this time, as she pushed past McClaren to pick up her son. Her voice was hoarse and rough with suppressed tears. "If you hadn't finally succeeded in pushing him away."

And they all went silent as time seemed to suspend itself, as the world seemed to hold its breath, waiting for Brian's answer. But time and the world - and everyone in the room - were doomed to disappointment, it seemed, for Brian said nothing, simply turning away and closing his eyes, apparently accepting Lindsey's final words as fundamental truth.

They all left then, except for McClaren and Cynthia, and Gus, wailing and begging to stay with his daddy, was the only one making a sound. Lindsey was enormously grateful that her son, in his exhaustion, required all her focus and attention, to comfort him for having to be separated from his father.

Otherwise, she knew, Justin would not have been the only one to exit crying. She didn't know which thing she found more difficult to process - that Brian had actually admitted that Justin had never truly been his, or that he had accepted her accusation without offering a word in his own defense.

In either case, it seemed that the man lying there in that hospital bed, wrapped up in a barrier of silence that nothing seemed to penetrate, had become a mystery, an enigma - someone none of them seemed to know.

Someone who was not Brian Kinney.

For a while, no one spoke at all.

Chris McClaren dragged an ugly easy chair to a spot near the door, positioning it so that his body would restrict easy access, before settling in and closing his eyes.

And Brian remained motionless, barely breathing, so that the only sounds in the room were the occasional beeps and blips of the medical monitors.

Finally, Cynthia could endure the heaviness around them no longer. "That was quite a performance," she observed. "Oscar-worthy, at least."

"Really?" answered McClaren, not bothering to open his eyes. "I'm holding out for a Tony myself."

Her smile was slightly venal. "No wonder you two hit it off so well, one snob to another."

She returned then to her post by the window, noting that the stars were quickly disappearing behind an approaching cloud bank. "Do you ever have trouble remembering who you really are?" she asked, not quite sure why she was feeling an unexpected sympathy for the FBI agent, but unable to resist an urge to probe beneath that glib surface.

"No." Short, sweet . . . and slightly irritated?

The sharp chime of McClaren's cell phone served to defuse a strangely awkward moment.

As the agent rose and stepped into the corridor to take his call privately, Cynthia moved to stand beside the bed and gaze down at her boss who had not moved at all since the mass exodus had emptied the room.

"Brian?" she said softly, hoping that he might actually have drifted into a peaceful sleep - but somehow knowing better.
"What?" he muttered, after a while.

"Are you . . ." She paused, recognizing the blatant stupidity of the question. Of course, he wasn't all right. "What are you thinking?" Better - though still not great.

Again, he was slow to answer, and when he did, it took her a moment to realize what he was doing.

"If there is a limit to all things and a measure
And a last time and nothing more and forgetfulness,
Who will tell us to whom in this house
We without knowing it have said farewell?"*

"That's . . . beautiful," she said slowly. "What is it?"

He turned in the bed to look up at her. "Just a scrap of verse that I always found interesting."

"You never cease to amaze me," she replied, a vague, unfocused anger sharpening her tone. "Here you sit, in the eye of a storm so fucking huge I can't even begin to take it all in, and you're waxing poetic - and philosophical."

He almost provided a knee-jerk response that she would have understood perfectly. He almost said, "Pain management." But, in the end, he didn't. He just closed his eyes, wanting this infernal, eternal day to be over. And if, within that thought - and within the lines of verse that kept repeating in his head - there was also the specter of a deeper yearning, a desire to have an end to all the drama that had become his life, he would just . . . worry about that later.

And in that thought, he was suddenly conscious of the upsurge of the awful, invariably inappropriate gallows humor that had both saved him and doomed him throughout his life.

What better time to indulge my Scarlet O'Hara?

He almost smiled, but remembered - just in time - how painful that might be.

"The inevitable byproduct of a liberal arts education," he explained with a characteristic eye-roll, effectively dodging the question, and conceding that she knew what he was doing as well as he did.

"You and the fed," she observed, watching his face carefully - but in vain - for any sign of what he might be feeling, "could be the new Bogey and Bacall. That was a hell of an act."

"Gotta make it convincing," he replied, barely audible. Then he opened his eyes wide and looked up at her, and she felt the full force of the personality that allowed him to control so many things and people in his life. "So don't you go having second thoughts about your part in it. You don't want to fuck this up."

"I know where my loyalties lie," she replied sharply. "But you . . . Jesus, Brian, you really cut him up and left him bleeding. He didn't deserve that. Not just for being too young to know what he really wants."

He paused then, and his eyes narrowed, and she braced herself for what she knew was coming.

Brian didn't like being crossed - not even by the people he trusted, especially under circumstances when he was dead certain that he was right. Like now. "It's not about what he deserves. What he deserves is to live, to be safe. To build himself a new, full, rich life, with someone who can . . . be what he needs them to be. What - you'd rather it was him lying here like this, beaten and bludgeoned and mutilated? Fighting for his life. Think about that, Cynthia. What they did to me . . . he wouldn't have survived it, even if they'd stopped short of actually killing him. Which they wouldn't have, because they'd have known what it would do to me if he . . . " Deep ragged breath then, before he continued in a smaller voice. "And if, by some miracle, he did manage to live through it, how would he endure becoming . . . " He lifted one hand and made an all-encompassing gesture at the battered mass of his body, and there was no mistaking his meaning, "this?"

"And you?" she asked finally, reaching out to take his hand and refusing to relinquish it even when he tried to pull free. "What happens to you?"

He looked up at her then, and she could hardly bear to meet his gaze, to read the raw despair and wretchedness in his eyes. "If these bastards succeeded in taking his life - or my son's - do you really think I'd want to survive it? If they died, because of me . . ."

"Brian," she said urgently, "it's not your fault. None of this is . . ."

But she fell silent abruptly as she saw the steady, uncompromising gleam of certainty in his eyes. It didn't matter what she said, or what she believed. All that mattered was what he knew.

Like everything else in his life, it was his fault. It had always been his fault.

Chris McClaren chose that moment to re-enter the room, and Cynthia had to admit that she was grateful for the interruption. Her devotion and loyalty to Brian were a central part of her life, and she would stand by him no matter what the consequences, but he wasn't the easiest person to deal with sometimes. Like now.

"Good news?" asked Brian, deliberately turning his back on his assistant, and giving her a chance to regain her composure.

"Maybe," the FBI agent replied. "Looks like we might have caught a break in the case. Thanks to the detailed information provided by your good right hand there."

"Me - what did I do?" Cynthia asked.

McClaren grinned. "You provided the receipt from the jeweler for his Patek Phillipe watch, including the date and initials engraved on the back of the case. And these thugs who enjoyed beating the bejesus out of a 'pretty little fag' when they got the chance, might have been philosophically sympathetic to the purpose of the cretins who hired them, but when you get right down to it, they were just hired muscle who weren't going to pass up a chance to hock a $30,000.00 watch."

"So you caught one of them?"

"Not quite yet, but we got an ID. Not just on one, but two of them. For the moment, they're under surveillance, in the hopes that they'll lead us to bigger fish."

"And if they manage to slip out the back door while you guys are twiddling your dicks?" Brian's tone was sharp, almost acidic.

McClaren refused to rise to the bait. "You really don't have a very good opinion of law enforcement, do you?"

Brian and Cynthia exchanged rueful smiles, both remembering Brian's previous brushes with the law, not to mention his interactions with a certain highly-placed member of the Pittsburgh PD.

"You have no idea," observed Cynthia, still smiling.
But again, McLaren needed no explanation. "In actual fact," he answered, "I do. Your exploits are the stuff of legend, Mr. Kinney. Even in the ivory towers in D.C., we heard about the fall of Chief Stockwell, and the 'concerned citizen' who managed to take him down. In fact, I even assisted in the FBI investigation that got him convicted, so I'm fully aware of your contributions."

Brian shrugged - and quickly resolved not to do so again as pain exploded across his back and shoulders. "Sometimes, a gay man's gotta do . . ." Then he paused and took a deep breath, realizing abruptly that there were certain things - certain places in his past that he preferred not to revisit. "Anyway, shouldn't you avoid calling me 'Mr. Kinney'? Just in case. You never know who . . ."

And his point was immediately proven when a visitor from earlier in the day made a return appearance, moving into the room very slowly, timidly. Ron Peterson obviously understood that it would be wise to move cautiously, all things considered.

"Could I speak with you, Brian?" he asked quietly, his eyes moving from person to person within the room. "In private?"

McClaren sensed that Brian was about to agree to the man's request, but he acted quickly to contain the situation. "Mr. . . . Peterson, is it?" he said softly. "I understand that you might have some private issues to explore here, but you need to understand this. Brian was brutalized and beaten and damn near killed by - forgive me, but - people who very likely share your general attitude toward queers like us. So if he wants to listen to whatever you have to say, that's up to him, but there is no way I'm leaving you alone with him."

"That's preposterous," Peterson protested. "You can't possibly believe that I would do such a thing."

McClaren shrugged. "In point of fact, I don't, but I'd be willing to bet that the men who did might well be respected members of your social set. In case you didn't know, homophobia is one of the last socially acceptable prejudices in our great free country."

"This," said the older man with a sweeping gesture toward Brian's injuries, "can't possibly be acceptable behavior, for anybody."

McClaren nodded. "Glad to hear you feel that way, but I'm still not leaving him alone. No matter what."

Brian spoke up for the first time. "It's all right, Mr. Peterson. Chris and I, we have no secrets from each other. And he knows how to keep his mouth shut. I promise."

Ron Peterson hesitated, but then he realized that this was a battle he was not going to win, so he just nodded. But then he turned to look at Cynthia and waited.

Brian sighed. "Cynthia," he said slowly, "why don't you go home? Feels like you've been here for weeks, and your mother is probably in a panic, wondering what's happened to you. So go home." He reached out then, and touched her hand. "And don't worry. The palace guard is on alert. I'll be fine."

She started to protest, started to insist that she was not tired, did not need to rest, would not dream of leaving. But then she realized that she really was almost exhausted - so exhausted that she was probably not doing Brian any good anyway. So she nodded, gathered her belongings, and said her good nights, touching Brian's shoulder as she went, and watching as McClaren settled in at his side.

Still, she was watchful as she went down the corridor, and was relieved to note that two of Mathis' security people were patrolling the hallway, and that Mathis himself was seated at a desk in a nearby alcove, studying a spreadsheet on a laptop computer. From what she could see, Brian was in good hands - not to mention what she couldn't see, and she was pretty sure there was plenty of that. She was certain that McClaren was not at all the type to put his trust in random chance, and it was a good bet that his particular brand of security would not be obvious to the casual observer.

Brian would be fine. Brian had to be fine.

Despite the fact that Ron Peterson had tacitly agreed to McClaren's presence during the conversation he planned to have with Brian, he was markedly reluctant to begin to speak, and Brian gestured for McClaren to come closer.

"Hey, Baby," he said softly, struggling not to laugh when he identified the annoyance in the agent's eyes, "why don't you see if you can find us some coffee?"

"I don't think you're allowed to have coffee, Lover," McClaren replied.

"Shit! But you are," said Brian, very reasonably, "and I think our guest could use some caffeine. Plus I might be grateful - very grateful - if someone found a way to help me . . . break the rules."

The FBI agent almost refused, though he was impressed with Kinney's ability to manipulate the moment. But then he reconsidered. "OK," he said finally, "but the door stays open."

Peterson nodded, and turned to look at Brian, obviously grateful for the intervention.

"He's very determined, you know," Brian volunteered as McClaren hurried out of the room, "so you better talk fast."

Peterson took a deep breath. "So be it," he said. "And I guess there's no need to sugar-coat anything. For you. The truth is . . . I'm dying, Kinney, and I don't want . . ." He took a deep breath. "I don't want to leave my daughter without resources when I'm gone."

He stopped then, apparently gathering his thoughts in order to continue, and Brian took a deep breath. "Are you sure? I mean, doctors make mistakes . . ."

"It's pancreatic cancer," Peterson stated, and Brian took a moment to admire the man's courage and calm. "And they don't generally make mistakes - about that."

Brian nodded. "I'm sorry, Mr. Peterson," he said softly. "What can I . . . what do you want from me?"

Peterson walked to the window to gaze out into the darkness. "I suppose it would be too much to ask for your trust - given our history - but I hope that I can count on your discretion, at least."

"Within reason," Brian replied cautiously. "I won't lie to Lindsey, but . . ."

"And I wouldn't ask you to. But keeping something to yourself isn't the same as lying . . . is it?"

"Some people would disagree," Brian replied. "Some - and your daughter would probably be among them - would consider it a sin of omission. Why haven't you told her?"

"Because I haven't quite figured out how to do it. It's a hard thing, to hear that your father is dying."

At that moment, McClaren came back into the room carrying a tray bearing three steaming mugs, along with packets of creamer and sugar and plastic spoons.
"For me?" asked Brian, not quite able to suppress a surge of gratitude. He was pretty certain Matt Keller would have McClaren's balls if he found out about the contraband coffee, but he couldn't think of anything - within the realm of the possible - that he wanted more right that moment than a cup of freshly-brewed, aromatic blend.

"Just keep your mouth shut, if you're questioned," McClaren retorted, and proceeded to prepare Brian's coffee, exactly the way he liked it, prompting Brian to wonder - again - just how the agent could know so much about him, right down to the smallest details.

"So," said McClaren as he passed the tray to Ron Peterson, "how long do you have?"

Peterson managed, barely, not to drop his cup. "How did you know?" he demanded.

"I'm very perceptive," the agent replied.

"And he eavesdropped from the hall," Brian suggested.

"That too."

Peterson settled into the armchair by the bed, and sipped his coffee, relaxing for the first time in hours. Which was surprising, since Brian Kinney was probably the very last person he'd ever have considered a source of comfort. Nevertheless . . .

"They're saying six months - maximum. I think it will be less. There's a family history with this disease, and I'm not inclined to optimism."

Brian regarded him patiently, but it was soon obvious that the man was having trouble finding the words with which to explain himself. "So what can I do for you, Mr. Peterson. If you're wanting reassurance that Lindsey will be taken care of, you don't even have to ask. She will be. Not only is she one of my oldest friends, she's the mother of my only child. So I'll make sure . . ."

Peterson nodded. "I never doubted that. No matter how I might have felt about you, in the past, I always believed that you cared for her - and for Gus. And I've taken steps to make sure that she'll be provided for - financially. As will Gus."

"You don't need to concern yourself about Gus," Brian said quickly. "My son is already well provided for and . . ."

"Please," Peterson interjected. "Please, just . . . indulge me. It appears likely now that Gus is the only grandson I'll ever have. Or, at the very least, the only one I'll ever have a chance to know. So this is not because he needs anything from me. I guess, in a way, it's because I need something . . . from him. I hope . . ." He paused then, and Brian saw that he was not quite as composed as he'd seemed, as his hands were trembling so violently that he had to set his coffee cup down in order to prevent spilling it. "I hope you'll allow me a chance to get to know him. Before . . ."

"I won't interfere," Brian assured him, but something in his tone said that the older man better mind his manners in the process, and put Gus' well-being above all else. "But that's still not what you wanted from me. Is it?"

"Except that your youngest daughter is a dyke," Brian interrupted, his voice suddenly cold, without a nuance of sympathy. "Bummer, huh?"
Peterson sighed. "I know what you must think of me, and I wish I could explain it so that you'd understand things from my point of view. The lady at the diner - Debbie, is it? - called me homophobic, but, if I understand that term, it's not accurate. I don't hate homosexuals, Kinney. I just don't understand them. But I've come to believe that, in the end, it doesn't matter. I've finally realized that I don't give a damn who my daughter loves, or why. The only thing that matters is that I love Lindsey . . . and I can't resign myself to all the time I've wasted before reaching that conclusion."

He stood up then and moved back to the window. "And now I'm never going to be able to make up for lost time. It's ironic, isn't it? I'm going to die, and never be allowed to get to know that beautiful little boy . . . because I was a stupid shit."

Brian could not quite suppress a quick chuckle. Mr. Peterson, unlike his daughter who could, when she chose, swear like a drill sergeant, did not ordinarily indulge in cuss words. "What else?" He was sure there was more the older man needed to say, and that the hardest part was yet to come.

Peterson took a deep breath and turned to meet Brian's gaze. "I honestly don't believe that I'm a homophobe, Kinney. For example, I don't hate you. I don't pretend to understand you, and I'd prefer not to think about the things you do . . . sexually . . . but I don't hate you. I don't really hate anybody; it's just not in my nature. But . . ."

Brian and McClaren exchanged glances, knowing that the crux of the matter was at hand.

Again, Peterson inhaled deeply, before just spitting it out. "But I really, really can't stand that bitch that my daughter chose to marry." Then he slumped back into his chair and seemed to hunch over, prepared to ward off the attack he was sure was coming.

Thus, he was completely caught off guard when Brian laughed. "You say that as if you expect me to be outraged and come charging to her defense." Then he chuckled again.

"Well . . . yes, I suppose that's exactly what I expected. I mean, you're both gay, and . . ."

"Mr. Peterson," said McClaren with a smile, "do you like every straight person in the world? Is that your only criteria for deciding whether or not you like someone?"

Peterson actually blushed. "I guess I never thought about it like that. Pretty stupid, huh?"

"No. Just typical," said Brian. "So, what exactly is it that you want from me?"

"I just want to be sure that Lindsey has someone she can turn to, if she needs help or advice . . . or even a shoulder to cry on. She doesn't share her personal feelings with me any more. Why would she, after all, since I haven't been there for her, in far too long? And her mother - well - there are some bridges that just can't be rebuilt once they're burned. At any rate, I don't think things are going all that well in her . . . partnership, and I don't trust Melanie Marcus to be there for my daughter. I may be wrong, of course, but I don't really think so. I think she's a petty, vindictive, self-absorbed . . ."

He fell silent for a while, and Brian resisted a thoroughly venal impulse to encourage him to continue.

"Anyway, that's what I want from you, Kinney. I want you to promise to be there for her, when no one else will. To take care of her, if she can't take care of herself. And - just coincidentally - to be the father that my grandson needs."

Brian nodded. "And," he said slowly, "you don't want me to tell her that you asked."
The older man grinned. "You know Lindsey - maybe even better than I do. Think about how she'd react if she knew."

"No, thanks," Brian retorted. "I'd rather not."

Peterson nodded and moved toward the bed, right hand extended. "Thank you, Brian. If I . . . may call you that. If you'd rather I didn't, I'll certainly understand."

Brian simply stared at him for a moment, before slowly lifting his hand. "You didn't have to ask, you know," he said softly. "I'd have looked after her anyway."

Peterson smiled. "I think I understand that . . . now."

"I wish you the best, Brian. I know this has been a nightmare for you, but I hope it all turns out well."

Brian nodded, and started to turn away. Then he paused, and glanced up to meet McClaren's eyes as a new thought occurred to him.

"Let me ask you something, Mr. Peterson," he said suddenly. "Did you mean it when you said you wanted a chance to get to know your grandson?"

He was watching the older man's face as he broached the question, waiting for the response. When it came, when a warm spark of undiluted joy flared in the man's dark eyes, Brian sighed and felt a strange compulsion. He was not ordinarily a praying man, but he felt a strange urge to offer up devout thanks for a perfect resolution to a prickly problem.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Chris McClaren wondered - idly - how many cups of coffee he'd drunk since his arrival at the hospital. Then he decided he was better off not knowing.

He had managed to grab a few hours of sleep, stretched out on the plastic instrument of torture that masqueraded as a daybed in corner of Brian's private room, but he never rested well when he was on assignment. Especially when he was not quite able to believe that all possible scenarios had been anticipated and prepared for. He was relatively certain that Brian was safe and his son was safe and his . . . whatever Justin Taylor was to him . . . was safe, but 'relatively certain' was never quite enough to grant him a peaceful night's sleep. Something was still nagging at him, although he couldn't put his finger on what it was.

At any rate, it was not quite dawn when he rose and checked on his charge (reminding himself that it would be equivalent to taking his life in his hands to refer to Kinney as a "victim") and found him still floating in a drug-induced haze. He had wakened twice during the night, rigid and trembling in pain, but the nurses had been quick to administer fresh doses of Demerol, and he was currently resting easily.

McClaren spent a minute gazing down at his bandaged face, visualizing how he had looked before and trying not to visualize how he would look now.

 Fuck!

He had not expected to like Kinney, and he had schooled himself many years ago to remain uninvolved in the traumas of the people he was charged to protect. But Kinney was unlike anyone he had ever met - completely unique. An individual who refused to take refuge in apologies or regrets or excuses, who insisted on facing life without embroidery or embellishment. That kind of bold, barefaced honesty was something completely new in his experience. It didn't exactly make him like Kinney, but it did make him insatiably curious to know what lay beneath the surface of such a complex personality, and rendered him uncertain that he could predict what the man might do next. Thus, it had been a long time since anyone managed to intrigue him so intensely.

The FBI agent took a minute to splash water on his face and wandered out of the room, nodding to the private security guard who was patrolling the hallway before continuing down the hall to the waiting room where the coffee maker was waiting. Along with a rumpled, sleepy-looking young man.

McClaren sighed, hoping he'd get a chance to swallow a few hits of caffeine before having to face the wrath of an incensed, blond drama queen.

Shit!

Justin Taylor was sprawled in a corner chair, his legs extended across a plastic bench, his head braced against a wadded-up jacket, still wearing the same clothes he'd worn the night before, only slightly the worse for wear. And he was staring at Chris McClaren with undisguised hostility.

McClaren swallowed a sigh, and poured himself a hefty dose of freshly-brewed battery acid which he preferred black and bitter. Then he sat down and regarded Justin Taylor with a steady frown.

"Are we going to have to fight this out," he asked finally, "or are you prepared to be reasonable?"

"I don't think there's anything reasonable in this whole mess," Justin retorted, his tone cold and churlish.

McClaren nodded. "Okay, then. You obviously have something to tell me. Or something to ask me. So let's just get it over with."

"Are you . . . for real? Is this thing between you and Brian - is it real?"

McClaren sipped and studied that beautiful face, noting that the incredible blue eyes were red-rimmed and swollen. "Why is that so hard for you to accept?" he asked, in lieu of a direct response.

Justin sat forward, and braced his forearms against his thighs. "It took me fucking forever to get through his guard, to get inside his walls. And I can't believe . . ."

"So you got in," the FBI agent said quickly. "But once you were in, you decided not to stay. So why should it matter to you if I . . ."

"I never left him. I never could."

McClaren met the blonde's gaze, and didn't bother to try to conceal the pity in his eyes. "Who are you trying to convince . . . me or yourself? Look, Kid . . ."

"I'm not a kid," snapped Justin, jumping to his feet. "And if you think he's ever going to forget me, you're just fooling yourself. He loves me. He's always loved me. You'll never mean as much to him as I do. Never."

McClaren rose slowly, and squared his shoulders, carefully guarding his expression so that it would not reveal how much he sometimes hated the things his job required him to do. "I'm not going to argue with you, Taylor. The bottom line is that he doesn't want to see you. You believe whatever you like - whatever makes you feel better - but you stay away from him."
"You're going to make sure he goes on feeling that way, aren't you?" Justin accused.

"You've done a pretty fair job of making sure of that yourself, you know. But Brian is a grown man. Nobody tells him what to feel or how to think, and maybe it's time you learned that."

"I'm not giving up," Justin almost snarled. "You keep that in mind." Then - unaccountably - he smiled. "You tell him I still love him - I'll always love him - and I don't give a shit what he looks like, on the outside. He'll always be beautiful to me. So you just watch your back - or your front - or whatever. Because I will come for him. If you really want him, you're going to have to prove it."

McClaren barely managed to suppress a grin, admiring the young man's spunk, even as he regretted the necessity for continuing the confrontation between them. He rather thought he could grow to like this stubborn, determined, hard-headed little fucker. "I'll remember."

He turned then and hurried back toward Brian's room, resisting the urge to turn around to check on the young man's reaction, and noting as he went that the individuals charged with protecting Taylor were exactly where they were supposed to be. Justin Taylor was not his responsibility, and driving a wedge between him and Kinney was the very best thing he could do for both of them right now. So why did it make him feel like such a miserable shit?

He slowed as he moved down the corridor on his way to a conference with Lance Mathis and a morning briefing from his boss, suddenly caught up in thoughts of how these two - Kinney as he had been and Taylor as he still was - how magnificent they must have been together, what a vision of beauty and grace they must have formed - light and dark, ingénue and sophisticate, positive and negative. Yin and yang. Perfect compliments.

All destroyed now, by the slash of assassins' blades and blows of molten iron and the vicious hatred of people who could neither understand nor tolerate such beauty.

_Fuck!_

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

He came awake quickly, roused by the murmur of voices and the singularly unpleasant sensation of having someone peel the skin from his face, inch by inch. Okay - not really. But that's how it felt, nonetheless.

Brian opened his eyes and looked up into the steady eyes of Nurse Beck, and wondered for a moment if the woman even existed outside the hospital setting, for it appeared that she was always around when he required attention. But he was grateful, nevertheless, for her hands were flawlessly sure and gentle, and he knew instinctively that the process of removing the bandages that covered his face would have been far worse had someone else undertaken the task.

"Good morning, Gorgeous," she said gently. "Glad to see me?"

"Not unless you come bearing an eighth of chronic," he muttered.

"Not quite," she grinned.

"How about a nicotine fix?"

"Fond of our addictions, are we?" This time, she actually laughed.

"You have no idea," he replied with a huff of exasperation, but his tone held nothing of hostility or resentment. He was just Brian - being Brian - and both Nurse Beck, and the doctor who was looking over her shoulder, knew it.

Unlike the other person in the room, who was standing at the foot of the bed, looking on in silence.

"How's the pain, Brian?" asked Matt Keller, his eyes fixed on the monitor screens, noting elevations in blood pressure and pulse rate - readings which suggested that the patient was far from comfortable. "We need to hold off on the meds for a bit, if you can handle it."

Brian closed his eyes. "I can handle anything you can dish out."

"Of course, you can." That was Beck again, obviously immune to his snarky attitude.

He elected to remain silent as she finished her task, discarded the soiled bandages, and spent a few minutes gently cleaning away the residue from his face. It was only when she stepped back that he got his first clear look at the individual who stepped up to take her place.

"Brian," said Matt Keller, "this is Rick Turnage."

The patient was quiet for a moment, studying the surgeon's face, and noting idly that he really must be in bad shape if he couldn't work up much interest in a man who almost defined masculine beauty. Then he dredged up a sardonic smile. "The miracle worker," he muttered. "Nice to . . . ."

"Don't speak!" Turnage snapped, eyes tracing the patterns of injury on the newly-exposed face. "I need to assess the damage."

Unperturbed, Brian turned slightly to meet Matt Keller's eyes. "Why do I feel like a BMW with a crushed fender?"

"I said . . . " Turnage began.

"I heard you," Brian retorted. "But, unless I'm mistaken, I'm the patient here, and you're the doctor, and that makes me the paying customer. So you might try asking for my co-operation instead of barking out orders like a fucking drill sergeant."

Matt Keller tried not to chuckle - and failed. "Dr. Turnage," he said, still grinning, "meet Brian Kinney. AKA - your nemesis."

But Turnage barely appeared to notice the words of either his patient or his fellow physician. Instead, he was busy retrieving a large tablet from the portfolio he had brought with him. He then proceeded to extract a charcoal pencil from a zipper bag, and adjust the lamp on the bedside table to shed light directly on the patient's face.

"What are you . . . " Keller demanded, preparing to step forward and intervene, if necessary.

"Shut up!" Turnage muttered as he began to move the charcoal across the paper with sure, bold strokes.

"What are you doing?" asked Brian, in a tone of voice that promised a complete lack of co-operation if he did not get an answer that was to his liking.

Turnage huffed an exaggerated sigh. "I'm drawing your face."

Brian's eyes were suddenly huge, and even Turnage, normally as sensitive and intuitive as granite, could not help but note the despair rising within them.

"Not as you are," he said firmly, without a nuance of either empathy or sympathy in the tone, "but as you should be. Will be, when I'm done with you."

"Wouldn't a photograph suffice?" Brian demanded.

"No, and would you please just . . . stop talking."

Matt Keller leaned forward, grinning. "He did say please."

"Fuck off!" Brian retorted, but the spark of humor in his eyes served to dissipate the shadows of despair, so Keller was content.

For the next few minutes, the silence in the room was broken only by the rough rasp of the charcoal against the textured sketch pad, but it didn't last long. In a surprisingly short period of time, Turnage paused, took another minute to study the ruin of Brian's face, before nodding and laying his pencil aside.

"Are you done?" Brian asked, not bothering to try to conceal his annoyance. "Am I allowed to see it?"

Turnage stared at the patient for a moment before answering. "You're allowed. In fact, you'll need to approve it, before we proceed."

Then he lifted the pad, took another moment to examine it to make sure it met with his satisfaction before turning it around for the patient's inspection.

Brian just looked at it, saying nothing. Then he reached out and extended one finger, just touching the rough surface and tracing the line of the subject's jaw. "How . . . how did you do that?" he asked finally, his voice barely rising above a whisper.

Turnage did not smile, did not offer vapid assurances. He simply explained it as he saw it. "It's still there. Your face, I mean. The bone structure, the foundation, in spite of the swelling and the fractures and the distortions. It's still there. It just needs . . . restoring."

Brian was staring, looking directly into his own eyes, seeing the face he had seen in the mirror every day of his life. The likeness was uncanny, since he knew perfectly well that it bore almost no resemblance to what he would see if he were to look into that same mirror at this very moment.

"And you can do that?" he asked, the tremor in his voice expressing his doubts. "You really think you can . . ."

"I don't think, Mr. Kinney," Turnage answered sharply. "I know. But it won't be quick, and it won't be easy. We've got a lot of work to do, you and I, and you're going to have to trust me."

Brian quickly shifted his eyes to meet the gaze of Matt Keller, relying on their intimate connection to convey what he did not want to verbalize. Keller smiled and nodded. "I told you, didn't I? He really can undo what they did to you." Then he glanced at Turnage, and his eyes went hard and cold. "And if he fucks it up, I'm going to make sure the whole world knows about it."

Brian smiled, and closed his eyes, content with his old friend's assurances. Reflecting that the old adage, "It takes one to know one", had been proven accurate once again, he recognized that Turnage was a prima donna of the first order, who would rather walk naked through an inferno than be forced to acknowledge failure.

There were no guarantees, but he found, for the first time since the beginning of this debacle, that he was able to allow himself a tiny inkling of hope.
Maybe - just maybe - life, as he knew it, was not quite over, after all.

"So," said Turnage gruffly, "when can we leave?"

"Leave?" echoed Keller.

"Leave?" asked Nurse Beck.

"Leave?" That was Chris McClaren, just returning to the room from his morning briefing with his boss and Lance Mathis.

"Leave?" Brian opened his eyes to stare at the surgeon. "Where the fuck am I going?"

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

*Limits - Jorge Luis Borges

tbc
Ben had fully intended to join Michael at the hospital after the conclusion of his last class of the day, but he’d been summoned to the dean’s office to deal with a couple of disciplinary issues concerning a group of his students who’d been targeted by gay-bashers, and it had been late when he’d finished.

He was slightly ashamed to realize that he was marginally grateful for the . . . alibi. Okay. For the excuse.

Thus, he was already at home, seated at the kitchen table working on a study plan and waiting for a pot of curried tofu with spinach and tomatoes to finish simmering on the stove. He was generally the cook of the family, and he usually endeavored to convince Michael and Hunter to share his enthusiasm for ultra-healthy, vegan cuisine, but, given how the last few days had gone, it wouldn't surprise him at all if Michael walked in with a Pizza Hut Meat Lovers’ Special. And if it provided any comfort for his young husband, then he would gladly put aside his aversion to America's favorite fast food. And Hunter, of course, would be delighted, if he decided to show up at home tonight.

But Michael was the issue; Michael, who needed comforting right now, and if pizza could provide it, Ben would be happy to grant his enthusiastic approval. He felt it was the least he could do, since he found himself seeking ever more rationalizable reasons to avoid what was becoming a more and more onerous obligation.

It wasn't, after all, like he hadn't spent almost every evening over the past ten days (Weeks? Months?) sitting around in various spots at Allegheny General - in waiting rooms and hallways and conference rooms and cafeterias and coffee shops and - on the rare occasions when it had been permitted - in Brian's room. But episodes in that last location had been few and far between - and even fewer and farther between as the days had passed, and it had become more and more obvious that their presence there, along with that of other members of the unofficial, extended Novotny family, was becoming problematic - for the hospital staff, the security people, for the police . . . and for Brian.

All of that, Ben was pretty sure Michael could have dealt with. Except for the last. That final straw had almost broken the back of a friendship born in the angst-ridden years of adolescence and enduring through a series of trials and tribulations that would have destroyed most relationships. Enduring - that was probably the term that best described what Michael and Brian had shared. Except, perhaps, for "magical", but that was a place where Ben was not yet prepared to go, still occasionally struggling with ambivalence in his feelings about a relationship that, try as he might, he could not quite comprehend. So "enduring" would remain the term of choice.

Except that there now seemed to be reason to doubt that it would continue to endure.

The last week had been exceptionally difficult. And there was hardly any chance that the next one would be any better.

Of course, there was some good news; Brian, despite the severity of his injuries and the original gloomy prognosis from the medical staff, was on the road to recovery. From a certain point of view. Damaged and bludgeoned organs were healing and beginning to function within normal parameters; bruises and contusions were fading; lacerations had been cleaned and closed and sutured; bones were re-knitting themselves, and the initiation of a stunning variety of physical therapy programs was laying the groundwork to re-establish the functions of muscles and sinews and nerves. His strength was beginning to return - hand in hand with his temperament. Never one to suffer fools willingly, he was rendered even more impatient and less forgiving than usual by the pain, weakness, and frustrations generated by his wounds. At the best of times, he would have been a demanding, infuriating patient, and these were far from the best of times.

In one sense - the most negative sense - Brian Kinney was making a comeback. But so far, that only seemed to apply to the hospital staff members and security people who had to deal with him directly.

For others, for the people who had known him for most of his life, it had begun to seem as if the man they had known might be gone forever. And the glaring omission - from every medical briefing, every doctor's statement - of any mention of his appearance and what might be done to repair it only served to emphasize the degree of the problem. No one spoke of it; no one asked, and the unmistakable conclusion was that no one really wanted to know.

During the first few days after his release from the ICU, virtually all the members of the 'gang', as Michael called them, had been in, around, and about the hospital every day, waiting for the doctors' briefings, available for running errands or handling day-to-day tasks as needed, and loitering near Brian's room in hope of being allowed in for a visit or - better yet - being summoned by the man himself. Even Melanie had lingered nearby, despite her unrelenting disdain for Brian and his lifestyle. She claimed that it was only because she wanted to offer her support to her partner, who was, in turn, only involved because Kinney was the biological parent of their son, Gus; no one bothered to challenge her contention, having no wish to incur her wrath. But, beneath their reticence, everyone knew the truth of the matter. Melanie hated Brian, not in spite of her partner's devotion to him, but because of it, and she would not risk leaving Lindsey alone and unsupervised within the sphere of Brian's influence, because she was so jealous of their relationship that she could not abide the thought of them interacting beyond the limits of her oversight.

However, in this case, she needn't have worried. Any visits or interactions between Brian and any members of the group - including Lindsey - were extremely sporadic, unfailingly brief, and thoroughly upsetting from the group's perspective. Whenever any of them managed to gain access to the room, Brian rarely spoke, barely seemed to listen, and appeared to recoil from any suggestion of intimate contact. The only facet of his familiar personality which he exhibited regularly and relentlessly, was the razor-sharp wit which enabled him to slice and dice his acquaintances with a minimum of words and a maximum of efficiency.

Except for the medical staff, chief members of his security team, and the police, only Cynthia and Chris McClaren had unrestricted access to him, and neither was shy about stepping up to bar the way when anyone else tried to intrude where they were obviously neither wanted nor needed.

Each of the extended family members had reacted differently, of course, according to his nature.

Melanie and Ted were initially annoyed by being excluded, but, as the days passed, their annoyance grew and morphed into smoldering resentment.

Melanie found it particularly difficult to accept that not only were she and her partner denied regular access to Gus' father, but that the little boy - the legal offspring of Melanie Marcus and Lindsey Peterson-Marcus, according to the marriage documents issued by the province of Ontario - had been spirited away in the company of his biological (as opposed to legal/official) maternal grandfather to some secret location deemed "safe" by the powers-that-be . . . and Brian Kinney. And Lindsey. The complicity of her partner in this little conspiracy rankled most of all. In short, by the end of the week, Melanie was fuming.

As for Ted, his emotional pique was a binary blend, an expression of both personal and professional perception. Since he had assumed oversight of the financial aspects of Kinnetic Corp, he had come to think of himself as a colleague of Brian's, rather than an employee. And most of the time, that was how Brian had treated him. But there were limits to how far that relationship could take him, especially within the realm of Brian's personal life. He had always understood that, even though it had never actually been spelled out. But now he had smashed face first into the impenetrable transparent wall of that limit, and his frustration was compounded by the fact that he had to stand by and watch others walk through it, apparently at will. Having spent much of his life denying an almost bottomless capacity for envy, he found it difficult now to admit and confront the reality of his weakness.

Debbie, of course, had reacted predictably - and loudly - being quick to question every restriction placed on the group's access to Brian, and then to denounce any explanation offered for said restrictions. And, when her denunciations failed to produce the desired effect - namely the lifting of said restrictions - she had proceeded to blame Brian, his doctors, the hospital staff, the individuals chosen to speak on his behalf, and the Almighty - not necessarily in that order - for interfering with 'family matters' which should not concern them. But the volume of her protests, over the course of the week, had begun to lessen, as the quantity gradually decreased, and the intensity of her emotional frenzy slowly settled to a level that was barely detectable. Silence did not sit well on Debbie, and the shadows in her eyes had grown in inverse proportion to the frequency of her verbal harangues. For one of very few times in her life, it appeared that Debbie did not know what to say or how to use her legendary 'big mouth' to manipulate people and circumstances to achieve what she wanted. In truth, it seemed that she might not even know what that might be.

Then there was Emmett, who had lurked around the edges of the family dynamic - of it but yet, somehow, separate, standing on the other side of a pale stream of dissension that had grown wider and deeper with every hour that passed. Separate - as he had never been before. Growing closer by the day to Drew Boyd and his solid, slightly brooding presence, as he simultaneously began to withdraw from his connection to Calvin Culpepper and from other old familiar supports. Calvin was terribly fond of Emmett, but had always understood that they were not meant to spend their lives together, so he accepted Emmett's secession with good grace and a smile. Emmett, however, was less sanguine, still not sure of what he really wanted. His flame, ordinarily brilliant as a signal beacon, had dimmed considerably during the same time frame, and Ben had noted a tendency on the part of the big Nelly-bottom, to sit back and observe his fellow family members, with a growing sense of uncertainty. It was as if he were seeing them all in a different light and from a different perspective and wasn't entirely sure he liked what he saw, although he'd been careful to avoid verbalizing his misgivings. Mostly, Emmett had kept himself to himself - a radical departure from his characteristic garrulous nature.

At first, Ben had thought that he was the only one to notice the difference in the young southerner, but apparently, he'd been wrong. Despite being wrapped in an almost seamless layer of introspection, Michael had seen it too and, eventually, remarked on it. But only to Ben and Hunter, and only within the privacy of their own little cottage, his demeanor akin to that of a small child confounded and confused by a deluge of strange, incomprehensible sensations.

Michael, Lindsey, and Justin formed the inner core of the cult of Kinney, even though none of the three would ever actually admit to that. They were all so intent on proving their strength and their independence and their lack of need for Brian or his approval or his support or his understanding that they were unable to face the truth - that it was all, fundamentally, a lie. The need existed; the need had, in point of fact, ruled their lives, even though Brian himself would never have made any conscious attempt to control them.
The control wasn't conscious, wasn't deliberate. And wasn't acknowledged by any one of them. But that didn't make it any less real.

They were floundering now, all without a rudder, without direction. All lost, and all virtually silent about the one vital question that occupied their minds.

What would happen next?

Lindsey and Michael had spent most of their time of late, seated in molded plastic chairs in the hospital waiting room. Waiting. Thinking. Dozing occasionally with faces braced against hands propped on hard arm-rests. Ingesting massive volumes of coffee and soda and vending machine sandwiches and stale doughnuts. Eyes fixed on a flickering television mounted up in the corner of the ceiling. But mostly just waiting. As the others chattered and gossiped and complained, the two of them spoke hardly at all.

As for Justin, he was a ghost that flitted in on occasion, just long enough to listen to the latest medical briefing, to ask pointed and pertinent questions about the patient's condition and prognosis. Then he would disappear again; no one really knew where he went or what he was doing, but it was obvious that he wasn't going far, as he was instantly present when there was any significant change in Brian's condition.

They were all there, at various times during the course of each day. They exchanged idle gossip and spoke of mutual acquaintances, of what they were having for dinner and the cannoli that had been added to the Liberty Diner menu, of what new film was playing downtown and the latest plots of favorite television programs and the new pianist down at the Rainbow Lounge, of how intensely they disliked Brian's new boytoy (even if he was drop-dead gorgeous) and how none of them had ever realized what a bitch Cynthia could be. Ted raved about the new production of La Boheme at the opera house, and Deb voiced her doubts that Meryl Streep could actually pull off playing the lead in the Mamma Mia movie that was coming out soon, and they all talked about things Oscar had gotten wrong in the past (Crash over Brokeback Mountain? Puh-leeze) and right more recently (The Departed as opposed to Babel, which nobody understood anyway) and about the new act that Shanda Leer was premiering for the next G&LC fundraiser, and the new house that Ted and Blake were looking to buy, and the upcoming production of Guys and Dolls at the local little theater.

Small talk, intended only to fill the empty hours.

They talked about everything and nothing, except what they pointedly did not talk about: Brian Kinney and the impact that the changes in his life would have on each of them. They were, in fact, so determined to ignore that subject that the silence around it grew and swelled and eventually threatened to consume them all.

Ben took a sip of his beer and realized that he had read the same paragraph in an interpretive treatise on the works of F. Scott Fitzgerald three times and still didn't remember what he'd read. So he gave it up and sat back in his chair, flexing shoulders and back to relieve muscle strain, and gazing out the window into a cold, heavy rainfall. That was when he heard the front door open, and he was up and moving before there was time for it to close again.

Michael was still shucking out of his raingear when Ben reached him, his hair and face dripping with rainwater, his skin pale and bloodless, and his teeth chattering.

"Hey, Baby," said Ben gently, quickly wrapping his arms around his young lover, disregarding the dampness of Michael's clothes. "You're freezing. Come on into the kitchen where it's warmer. And get out of those wet things."
Michael's only response was a nod as he stumbled forward, unzipping his jacket as he went, with Ben following close behind.

No pizza then. And no six-pack of the locally-brewed beer that he usually picked up every night from the little tavern down the street. No newspaper from the corner newsstand either, and no mail retrieved from the mailbox - all of which he usually brought in. No nothing.

Just Michael, hollow-eyed and shivering and wet.

And crying, without sound or sobs. Just waves of tears welling in his eyes and rolling down his cheeks.

"I saw his face," said Michael, in a rough, broken voice,

"What?" said Ben slowly, sure that he must have misheard. "You saw what?"

Michael turned in his arms and looked up into Ben's face, his eyes filled with despair.
"He let me in. Called me in, and wanted to know why I was hanging around there. Why I didn't go home, to you and Hunter. To my life."

He turned again, and went to the window, and the rivulets of rainwater running down the glass was reflected on his face, emulating the tears still streaming from his eyes.

"I was so fucking stupid," he continued, talking as much to himself as to Ben. "When he called for me, I thought . . . I was so happy because I thought it meant . . ."

He fell silent then, obviously unable to continue.

Ben stepped forward and wrapped his arms around Michael's torso, pulling gently to brace his young partner against his chest. "Come sit down," he murmured. "You're exhausted, and there's no need for you to stand here shivering. You can talk just as well sitting down. Come on, and I'll fix you some hot chocolate."

Michael roused a little then, his face thawing just a bit as he mustered up a weary smile for his husband. "That sounds . . . surprisingly good."

He dropped into a chair at the table and sat for a while in silence, content to watch as Ben zapped a cup of milk in the microwave before stirring in some Nestle's chocolate mix and topping the concoction with a mound of miniature marshmallows. Angels' balls, according to Emmett. The thought made Michael smile, until it occurred to him that Emmett might no longer be capable of such sweet whimsy once this debacle was over. Then he allowed the thought to expand to include them all, in the realization that whimsy might be in very short supply for a very long time.

He accepted the mug of cocoa from Ben and was grateful for its warmth against his frigid hands as he allowed himself to fantasize that it might also manage to banish the chill that gripped his heart.

But that fantasy was short-lived. He knew instinctively that nothing would accomplish that purpose, except time. Maybe, with a bit of luck.

"Take your time," said Ben, his eyes soft with concern and a desire to comfort, to soothe, to console, and - beneath everything else - to punish whoever had inflicted undeserved pain on the young man who had become the light of his life.
Even in the extremes of his distress, Michael saw it and was touched by it. And even comforted, to some small degree. He took a swallow of his cocoa, savoring the warmth and using the process as a delaying tactic to allow him to find the right words with which to tell the story.

Only . . . there were no right words. There was only the memory, expanding to fill his thoughts and pulling him back into a dark chamber filled only with the echoes of despair.

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

He was standing at the window, watching rain lashing across the front of the hospital and reflecting that the first wave of spring had come and gone and been buried under the resurgence of winter. It was not an unusual event in Pittsburgh, and a faint, sporadic clicking suggested that there might even be a few ice pellets mixed in with the spates of raindrops. The lowering clouds had already blocked out any lingering remnants of the day, even though the clock on the wall claimed that it was still afternoon.

It would be a long, nasty walk to the bus stop, and an even longer, nastier one to get home.

So maybe he'd splurge, and grab a taxi.

When he backed away from the window, pulling his jacket tighter around him to ward off a chill that was more a reaction to the vista beyond the glass than to any actual change in temperature, he was surprised to find that he was alone in the waiting room, except for a shabbily-dressed young black woman who seemed to always be there (prompting some in their group to speculate that she might simply be a vagrant who had no place else to go). Her name was Yolanda, he thought. Or Solana, maybe. He wasn't really sure, because he had hardly spoken to her at all during this ordeal of waiting for the disaster to be over and because she wore an air of aloofness, in spite of the shabbiness of her appearance, an air that stated that she did not wish to share conversation or confidences.

It was strange, he thought, that they had occupied the same space and time over an extended period of days and yet seemed to know virtually nothing of each other. He was vaguely startled to realize that he didn't even know who she was here to see. And he wasn't sure how any of them had come to know her name (conceding, of course, that he didn't actually know it at all). Neither he nor any of his extended group had ever bothered to ask about her purpose here, and she had never volunteered the information.

Suddenly, that bothered him. Someone should have asked, he thought. Wasn't shared tragedy supposed to bring people closer together? And perhaps this was the right time. He wasn't sure where Lindsey and Mel had gone, or why his mother and Ted had not appeared yet this afternoon, or where Emmett might have drifted off to, but the fact that there were only the two of them in the room seemed to demand some effort to communicate.

He cleared his throat then, and moved toward her . . . but it was at that moment that Cynthia leaned through the doorway and gestured for Michael to accompany her.

All else was immediately forgotten, as he turned away, but he did notice a strange look in the young black woman's eyes as he changed direction.

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

Sharon Briggs, AKA Shoshona Jackson, allowed herself a quick sigh of relief as she watched the young man follow Kinney's assistant out into the hallway. She had realized early on that, if any of Brian Kinney's support group ever decided to approach her and try to figure out who she really was and what she was doing here, she had to make sure that it would be neither Michael Novotny nor Emmett Honeycutt. The others were either much too self-absorbed or much too distracted to be perceptive enough to discern anything beyond the ordinary, but these two could pose a problem if they got too close. Thus, she had been careful to avoid situations in which she would attract the undivided attention of either or both. Only sometimes, fate took a hand. She had not realized until too late that everyone else had departed, leaving her alone in the waiting room with Michael, and she had been contemplating a quick dash toward the lady's room to avoid any attempt he might make at opening up a dialogue when Cynthia had appeared.

She was very good at her job, possessing a singular ability to fade into the background, a skill much to be desired in undercover cops. But she also knew her limits. She had been watching this group for days now, not as part of Kinney's protection detail, but as a general observer. Watching for anything out of the ordinary, any details that might provide a clue to the identity of his attackers or the motivations behind the assault. In this aspect, she was alone in her task, completely separate from the other police/security people and from the FBI personnel who were undoubtedly assigned to the case, although she had failed to identify any of them. That was only to be expected, since, presumably, they were as good at their job as she was at hers. She was anonymous, as she preferred to be.

Thus far, she had learned nothing that might help to identify the assailants, but she had learned a lot about Kinney himself and the people who were a part of his life - enough to begin to understand the complexity of the relationships and to realize which of them were impacted most by the circumstances of the assault.

And to develop a reluctant, but abiding sympathy for a few of them. For young Taylor, with his huge blue eyes that tried so hard to conceal the depth of his love, and failed miserably. For Lindsey Peterson, who so obviously did not want to love Kinney, but couldn't help herself. For Emmett Honeycutt, who seemed to have lost his moorings as a result of this drama and was floundering for a direction. And for Michael, who, in some ways, loved most deeply of all, and had schooled himself to live with what he could never hope to change.

Sharon/Shoshona sighed again and tried to shift into a more comfortable position in her molded plastic chair. Yes, she definitely had to be on her guard. She could not afford to let Novotny get too close, to be able to look into her eyes and see more there than she was willing to reveal. It was not her job to get involved, to offer support or sympathy or comfort to the victims. Her only purpose was to solve the crime, to identify those responsible.

That was what she had to keep telling herself. Next time, she would be more careful.

"He wants to see you," said Cynthia as they walked toward Brian's room. "But . . ." She paused and Michael noticed that she seemed to be deliberately avoiding meeting his eyes. "But don't expect too much. He's tired, Michael. Very tired."

"I won't," he replied, but there was no disguising the glints of joy in his eyes. "But I'm just glad he . . ." He fell silent, obviously looking for words to express what he was feeling. "I missed him so much, and I was afraid - I thought he might still be angry with me."

She nodded, but could not quite suppress a sigh. "Just don't expect too much."

Michael felt a sudden nuance of unease, sensing somehow that she wanted to say more - much more - but was deliberately restraining the impulse.

As he entered the room, he saw that a nurse was positioned nearby, adjusting settings on a monitoring instrument. He also noted that Chris McClaren was standing in the shadows near a corner window, but he was staring out into the growing darkness rather than facing Brian. Cynthia moved to join him as Michael went toward the bed, and the two of them began to speak quietly, providing some small illusion of privacy for the two old friends.

Michael took a moment to compose himself as he approached the bed. He knew it would still be tremendously difficult to look into Brian's eyes and not flinch away from the evidence of his injuries, even though snowy bandages still concealed the extent of the damages. And he would never quite be able to forget what he'd seen in his old friend's eyes the first time they had come face to face after their initial confrontation when Brian had turned Justin away. He had waited for days for the chance to see his best friend again, to try to express his regrets for not speaking up when he should have, and, alternatively, for speaking when he should have remained silent. But when the opportunity had come, he had been filled with misgivings he could neither explain nor suppress. Still, he told himself that there had been no pity in his expression as he'd met Brian's gaze, that he'd been successful in hiding an impulse to look away, to refuse to see, but the dimming of the light in those beautiful hazel eyes had said differently. He had wanted to speak up then, to explain himself and to deny the sentiment that Brian would reject and despise above all things, but he hadn't known how to phrase it, how to make Brian believe it. So he had remained silent.

He was determined not to do so again. He would make Brian understand, make him see the truth.

Lightening was forking across the sky as he arrived at Brian's bedside, and he flinched slightly as thunder rumbled nearby. Then he looked down and found Brian's eyes studying him, very still and filled with shadow.

"Hey," he said softly, wanting to reach for his old friend's hand, wanting to lean forward and drop a kiss on any available bare skin, but uncertain how such a gesture might be received.

"Hey, Mikey." The voice was without inflection, but the use of the nickname was encouraging, he thought.

"How are you . . ."

"I'm fabulous." Not so good that, since the voice was laced now with irony. "How about you?"

Michael took a deep breath, and resolved to forge ahead, to say what needed saying. "Better now, since I can see you. I've . . ."

"Well," Brian drawled, "you're not exactly seeing 'me', are you? I mean, the real me is buried somewhere inside the mummy suit - right?"

"For now," Michael answered with a grin. "But you'll be back, good as new."

Brian blinked, and the murmur of voices in the corner ceased abruptly, as Cynthia noticed the faintest hitch in his breathing. She barely managed to suppress a sigh, sensing that this was not good.

"I will?" Brian said.

"Of course, you will."

"Of course, I will," echoed Brian, the sardonic note back in his voice. "So, did you and your wifey win the lottery? Or maybe Ben's novel - rejected at last count by thirty-odd publishers - suddenly became a bestseller?"
"No such luck," Michael admitted, not quite sure where Brian was going with this. "Still living day to day."

"Then why are you spending all your time sitting around here? Don't you have vintage comics to sell, or new issues of Rage to write? You should go home, Michael. I don't need you here."

Michael hesitated before replying. "Well, maybe I need to be here. Ever consider that?"

Brian's eyes were suddenly cold. "You managed quite well without me, for a long time, you know. While you and the Zen-Master and the littlest hustler were busy constructing your perfect, conventional, little Stepford-fag existence, so I fail to see . . ."

"That was wrong," Michael whispered. "I was wrong. I don't know why things went so bad for us. Or why I let myself forget what you meant to me. But . . ."

"Because it was time to move on," Brian interrupted. "Maybe that's why. It happens to all of us, sooner or later."

Michael sighed. "But we were lucky. We found our way back to each other."

"Lucky," whispered Brian. "You think we were lucky?"

Michael closed his eyes for a moment, almost overwhelmed with the upsurge of a pain too raw to process, and Brian, safely concealed within his gauze cocoon, saw it and recognized it, recalling similar ordeals he'd endured after Justin's bashing. But he was careful to suppress those memories and any indication of his understanding. "We were fucking lucky," Michael insisted. "I could have died. You could have died. But we didn't. We're still here. Brian and Mikey. Together. Invincible."

Brian took a moment, struggling to swallow around the lump in his throat, before responding. "You think we're invincible?"

"Of course, we are. You'll be back on your feet in no time."

"Yeah. Life is beautiful, right? Everything's gonna be right as rain?"

"Right, Dude. You're Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake! You'll always be young. You'll always be beautiful."

If he'd been listening then, he'd have heard Cynthia's hoarse inhalation and, perhaps, understood what it meant. But he wasn't listening. He was deep into his fondest fantasy - the notion that his were the magic words that would always renew Brian's courage and fuel his ability to reclaim his life.

He was smiling as he gazed down into Brian's eyes, until he noticed that it was not joy or confidence or contentment he was reading in those hazel depths. It was rage. And when Brian decided to speak, after several moments of painful silence, there was not an ounce of warmth or affection in his voice.

"Have you looked at me, Michael? Have you bothered to look and see what's really here, instead of what you want to see?"

The smile forgotten, Michael could only shake his head and whisper, "I can't see anything, Brian. I can't . . ."

"Then maybe it's time you did."

"Brian, please . . ."
"Please what?" No gentleness now. No irony. No compassion. Just hard, bitter anger, and blatant impatience. "Please say what you want to hear. Please smile and be grateful for your little cheerleader routine? Tell you what, Mikey. Let me show you something, and then we'll see if you still feel like cheering."

He gestured then toward Nurse Beck who was waiting nearby, and she stepped close and leaned over to whisper in his ear. "Are you sure?" she asked, obviously uncomfortable in the role he'd assigned her to play.

"Gotta be done," he answered, without a trace of uncertainty.

She only hesitated for a moment; then she methodically and efficiently cut away the bandages that covered his face. And Michael found himself rooted to the spot, wanting to turn and run, wanting to refuse to see, but unable to move a muscle.

Then it was done. The bandages were gone, and Brian's face was bare, and Michael wanted to look away. Wanted to refuse to see the ruin of the face that he had loved for more than half his life. Wanted to be anywhere - but here.

To everyone's astonishment, Brian managed to dredge up a small chuckle. "Do you have any idea how pathetic you are? Do you realize that it's not me who needs reassurance? That it's you who needs someone to prop you up? To let you believe in your silly daydreams"

"Brian, I . . ."

"Say it!" Hard and sharp and unforgiving, and demanding obedience.

"I . . ."

"Say it, Michael! Recite your little litany. Shout it out to the world, like always."

"You'll always be . . ."

"Oh, no, no, no." Taunting now, and cruel, as he had never been cruel before. "You have to say it all. Every word."

Michael could barely draw breath, and when he did manage to speak, his voice was only a whisper. "You're . . . Brian Kinney . . . for fuck's sake. You'll always be . . . young. You'll always . . . be . . ."

Then he fell silent, unable to continue, and Brian's face - a wretched reminder of what it had once been - twisted into a macabre smile. "Yeah. That's what I thought. Go home, Michael. Your silly fantasies are not going to fix this, and there's no need for you to hang around any more. I don't want you here. That part of my life is over. We are over."

Michael hesitated for a moment, his face as pale and still as frost, before turning to make his escape. But he stopped as he reached the door and spoke once more, pointedly avoiding looking back at his old friend's ruined face. "You always told me that . . . you loved me."

And Brian tried, with every ounce of his strength, to resist the urge to reply, but, in the end, could not quite manage it. "Always have," he whispered. "Always will."

But it was barely a breath, far too softly spoken for Michael to hear.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
"You know," drawled Chris McClaren, after Michael's departure, "I'm really fucking glad I'm not your best friend."

"Me, too," said Nurse Beck, who knew plenty about suffering and found it easy to recognize when she saw it, but not so easy to explain or rationalize.

"Thanks."

If the FBI agent had hoped to provoke Brian into explaining his reasons for his treatment of his old friend, he realized he was doomed to failure. So he elected to try a more direct approach. "Why'd you do that?"

For a while, Brian was silent, lying still as Nurse Beck replaced his bandages. Then, when he did choose to answer, he started with a question. "What does your dossier say about me, about the people who are closest to me?"

McClaren, Brian noted with approval, did not respond quickly, taking time to consider his answer. "It mentions that you have almost no contact with your blood relatives. It mentions young Taylor, of course, and Ms. Peterson. And your son, of course, although your ties to him are not exactly common knowledge."

"And?"

McClaren sighed. "And your lifelong friendship with Novotny and his family."

"So it's a pretty fair bet that anyone who really wanted to harm me might choose to go after them. Right?"

The FBI agent thought about it for a moment before answering. "Possible, but not likely. What are they going to do - go after anybody in Pittsburgh who ever smiled at you? Or sucked your dick?"

Brian managed a grin. "Better hope not, or you're going to run out of cops for guard duty."

"Still, that was pretty fucking cruel."

Brian huffed an exaggerated sigh. "Yeah, well, Michael is like a fucking pitt bull. Once he sinks his teeth in, the only way to get rid of him is with a fucking taser gun."

"Okay, but you didn't tell him that they're going to be able to repair the damage to your face. You could have at least . . ."

Brian turned then and fixed McClaren with a cold glare. "You really trust that Dr. Pygmalion can deliver on his promises? What if he can't? Am I supposed to tell my friends - the only people that I really give a shit about - that everything is going to be OK, when I don't have any way of knowing if he can really do what he says?" He turned away then and closed his eyes. "I don't make promises unless I know I can keep them."

McClaren simply stared at him for a while before offering a wry response. "Of course, you don't."

Nurse Beck continued her task, keeping her opinions to herself, but communicating her feelings through the gentleness of her touch. "Ready for your candy, Sport?" she asked finally, affixing the last bit of adhesive to his bandages.

"A Dilaudid cocktail?" he asked hopefully. "Or maybe a joint - for medicinal purposes only, of course?"
Her smile would have surprised a lot of people who thought of her as drill-sergeant material. "Dream on, Stud. Now - or later?"

"Not quite yet," he replied, the look in his eyes saying what he could never bring himself to verbalize, mainly because he sensed that she would be uncomfortable should he speak it. She would not like having anyone know that she had a soft spot for this particular patient - or any patient, for that matter.

"Brian," said Cynthia, a faint but unmistakable note of urgency in her tone, "this was hard on you. You need to . . ."

"I will," he answered. "But I need to see Emmett first." He looked toward McClaren. "Want to see if you can find him for me?"

The FBI agent moved toward the door. "Sure. I've spent my whole life training to be your errand boy."

"Smart ass," Brian muttered, as the door closed behind the agent.

"Reminds me of someone else I know," observed Nurse Beck, startling a short, painful burst of laughter from her patient. Then she paused to smile down at him. "I'll make sure they're waiting for your call. Just buzz when you're ready."

"You're too good to me," he replied, a wicked gleam in his eyes.

"Only because I'm so charmed by that hot little ass," she retorted, eliciting another laugh.

"Shame on you, Beck. Your grandchildren would be so disappointed."

"My grandchildren," she answered with a smirk, "are all teen-aged girls, and they'd think that their granny has excellent taste."

When she was gone, Cynthia moved close and regarded him with a sardonic smile. "Another convert to the Kinney fan club. For someone who professes to despise all straight people, you're developing quite a following among the members of the opposing team."

Instead of offering his customary snarky response, he took a moment to think about what she'd said, his tone pensive and contemplative. "Do you suppose the world is really changing?" he asked, as if the thought was strange, almost incomprehensible, to him.

"One homophobe at a time?" she replied, her smile twisting into a slight smirk.

He shrugged slightly, before remembering that shrugging was among those movements best left unpracticed in his current state. "Shit!" he muttered.

"Do you really care?" she asked then, surprised to realize that she was actually curious.

He only paused for a micro-moment before looking up at her with a sparkle in his eyes. "Not in the least."

Her face relaxed into a broad grin, as she realized that the resilient, irrepressible Brian Kinney that she knew and loved - or hated, depending on the moment - was actually enjoying a comeback. It felt a little like coming home after a long, unpleasant journey.

She hesitated then, knowing what she wanted to say, but uncertain of how he would react. Still, she had never developed a habit of curbing her tongue in their conversations, and she was not planning to start now.

"You know, of course, that Michael may never be able to recover from this."

He nodded. "I know."

"Then why . . ."

"Because he already has what he needs. Because there's nothing more that I can do for him, except . . ."

"Except?"

He took a deep breath. "Except make sure that he doesn't lose it, because of me."

"And when you've managed to push them all away? What then?"

"Then they'll be safe."

And then, for perhaps the first time in her life, Cynthia did curb her tongue, did refuse to speak the next thing that popped into her head. Because she was virtually certain that it would elicit no response except for a deep, almost empty silence.

But oh, she wanted to say it. Wanted to toss it out there, to try to spur a reaction. But she didn't, and it went unspoken. But then, as she looked into his eyes, she was almost certain that he heard it anyway, and responded exactly as she'd known he would.

And you'll be alone. In her mind, she almost screamed it.

And the only answer was a whisper in the darkness, a pale shadow moving deep in his eyes.

I know.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

Ben stayed up long past his regular bedtime, ostensibly working on his lesson plan, but mostly just sitting and listening to the rain.

Michael had gone to bed early, after managing - in fits and starts - to give an account of his confrontation with Brian, initially inspiring Ben to want nothing more than to go tearing down to Allegheny General and administer a thorough tongue-lashing to the young man who had once claimed to be Michael's best friend.

Only he knew it wouldn't do any good. Brian would simply sit there in his bed, and take it, and probably say nothing in his own defense, accepting the fact that he had it coming. Which, of course, raised a pertinent question. If he knew that he was being cruel and vindictive and malicious when he'd delivered his verbal diatribe, then why had he done it?

And the answer - like the question - was unavoidable.

Fuck!
Ben had heard the story - from several different sources - of the catastrophic birthday party that Brian had thrown for Michael when he'd turned thirty. When Ted and Melanie and Emmett had recited their versions of the events of that night, Ben's response had been to wonder how Michael had ever managed to forgive such treachery. But then, he'd heard the rest of the story from Debbie, and later, from Justin, and realized what Brian had really done.

Despite his own misgivings - which, in time, had proved to be entirely correct - he had given Michael what everyone else believed to be the opportunity of a lifetime; the chance to build a life with the sophisticated and well-heeled physician. It was only later, when the entire group had begun to see the changes wrought in Michael by his relationship with the good doctor, that most of them had begun to question their original perceptions.

Ben couldn't actually imagine a pretentious, affected, self-important Michael, but he had no choice but to believe that he had existed, as he'd heard it from Michael himself. And from others who were quick to agree, although never - not even via innuendo - from Brian.

But nothing that happened later changed the fact that Brian had sacrificed the relationship that had been a vitally important part of his life since he'd been just a kid, along with the (tenuous) good will of the entire extended family, for one single purpose - to give Michael a chance to reach for what he wanted; to be happy.

Ben had learned a lot in recent years - a lot about himself and a lot about Michael and even, in some small, remote way, a lot about Brian. Some of it he'd been grateful to learn; some - he reluctantly recalled the debacle when Hollywood had come calling in an aborted desire to make a movie out of Michael and Justin's comic book, when he had been almost consumed by a jealousy that had come close to destroying his partnership - he'd have preferred not to know. But one thing had become increasingly clear to him over the years.

He had learned to recognize love when he saw it.

Brian loved Michael, and Ben knew that. Had, in point of fact, always known it, even when he'd have preferred not to know. But the problem was that now, apparently Michael had lost the capacity to know it himself, and maybe that was for the best. Maybe being able to walk away from Brian - forever - was the thing that Michael needed most, to keep him safe and protect his future. He was, after all, so hurt right now, so overwhelmed with the pain of loss and betrayal, that he might never regain his equilibrium, never be able to look beneath the surface of Brian's actions to expose the meaning of it all. In addition, it seemed that Brian's enemies might be legion, as well as very well connected, so there was no way to predict how long the current precarious situation might endure.

And it was a certainty that, if Ben did nothing to help Michael find his way through this darkness, that Brian would simply maintain his silence. He would just let go, and, as a result, Michael would be safe and protected.

Ben felt as if he'd stumbled into a maze and was floundering for a way out. How was he to keep this truth - this enormous, life-changing truth - to himself? And if he did, if he succeeded in burying his certainty and allowed Michael to complete the process of turning his back on the man who had been a major focus of his life, was Ben really doing him a favor? Or was he condemning his beloved young partner to a life of unspoken mourning from which he would never be free, trapped for all time in a spectral grief that he would never be able to express or put aside?

Fuck!

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
Emmett had still not been able to decide how he felt about Brian's new main squeeze, except, of course, for realizing that the man was molten-lava hot. He had watched and listened as McClaren had taken their entire group to task in Brian's defense on the occasion of their first meeting, and he had felt an unexpected stirring of admiration. Not because he didn't understand the anger and resentment expressed by his friends when Brian had hurt Justin so terribly; he had felt Justin's pain like a knife in his own gut. But he'd also realized the bitter truth of McClaren's words.

No matter how much Justin had been hurt by Brian's accusations, the simple truth was that Brian had fabricated nothing, had not varied one micron from the realm of fact, although one might have argued with his interpretation of those self-same facts.

Emmett had been as uneasy and disconcerted at the conclusion of that entire ugly confrontation as any of the rest of the group. However, it was only later - in retrospect - that he had come to a startling realization. Except for Michael's customary half-hearted attempts, no one had ever made a genuine effort to defend Brian from the slings and arrows hurled by friends, enemies, or acquaintances on any number of occasions.

Brian either stood alone to defend himself or - much more commonly - simply accepted the consequences of being targeted, ignoring whatever ugliness might be thrown at him. And Emmett was amazed to recognize how frequently that had happened in the past.

It was food for extensive thought and gave him a new perspective from which to form an opinion about Chris McClaren.

Still, there was no denying that, in spite of his willingness to step forward to shield Brian from attacks - reasonable or otherwise - the man was extremely arrogant and brutally frank, impatient and relentless and sarcastic and possessed of a wicked, blade-sharp sense of humor; he was, in fact, a study in contrasts that left Emmett uncertain of whether to resent him or admire him. Or simply avoid him.

But that wasn't really a viable choice at the moment, since Brian had dispatched McClaren to summon Emmett to an audience in the master's presence.

OK, that wasn't really fair, even if Brian did frequently behave as if he were a member of the peerage, forced to deal regularly with commoners.

Still, it never really occurred to Emmett to refuse to answer the call, and he accompanied McClaren to Brian's room without protest, noting, out of the corner of his eye, that the man cut such an elegant figure that he managed to make 501's and a Notre Dame sweatshirt look as haute monde as Armani casuals.

Not unlike a certain ad exec/club owner who was, of course, deep in discussion and too busy to be disturbed when the two arrived at their destination.

The foot of Brian's bed had been converted into a display space during McClaren's absence, and Cynthia was exhibiting a sample of a promotional board for Brian's evaluation as they entered.

"This is the one that Andrew prefers," she was explaining, balancing a colorful poster against the bed frame. "And Ted agrees with him, but I . . ."

"Looks like a public service promotion for Breeders Central," Brian interrupted, studying the central image of the mock-up - a slightly impressionistic watercolor of a group of families tailgating outside some anonymous sports stadium, obviously caught up in pre-game excitement and expressing their delight in the subject of the ad - First Class, a new light beer being marketed by the Scofield Brewery. It had the advantage of being bright and eye-catching, and the artwork was quite good. Except that the object of the campaign was to sell beer, not win praise for the artist.

"Yeah," agreed Cynthia with a tiny smile. "Andrew feels that it's past time for us to 'expand our horizons'." The smile widened, and Brian could almost see the quotation marks around the words she was quoting. "To broaden our appeal and stress more traditional values, so that we're not locked inside confining parameters."

Brian blinked. "He really used those words. He actually said, 'Confining parameters'? Who the fuck talks like that?"

"Howard Bellweather?" Emmett suggested, and was gratified when even the bandages obscuring Brian's face were not sufficient to conceal the man's smile.

Cynthia's grin was also an approbation. "And, apparently, the second assistant to the art director at Kinnetic Corp. So what do you . . ."

"Show me what Heath came up with."

Cynthia pulled another board out of the canvas portfolio that she'd propped against the bed. "You should probably know that Andrew was not at all pleased that you requested Heath's input, especially on such an important project. He felt that you 'undermined his authority' by going around him to his subordinate."

Brian reached out and took the new board from her hands and braced it against his knees so he could get a good look at it. It only took a moment for him to make up his mind. Then he looked up at Cynthia and said, "Did you really have to ask?"

"Nope," she answered with a smug smile, "but if I hadn't shown it to you, they'd have argued that I have no right to make such a big decision."

He was quiet for a moment, apparently considering what she'd said. Then he turned the board around to display it to the new arrivals. "What do you think?" he asked, his tone suggesting that he expected only truth.

But they both took one look and understood that this image - this campaign - practically screamed its origin.

A tall, sophisticated, beautiful man, standing at a bar and lifting an icy bottle of the new beer, as if in a toast. And - across the bar - a beautiful, red-headed woman, exquisitely dressed and displaying splendid décolleté, responding in kind. Which, in and of itself, was a startling image, unlikely to be forgotten by the target audience. But that was not the end of it. Behind the woman, just emerging from the shadows in a corner, stood another man, equally beautiful and wearing an enigmatic smile - a man who was also lifting his bottle in an identical gesture.

It would be left to the audience to decide for themselves who was toasting whom, and the slogan scrawled in script across the bottom of the poster reflected that philosophy perfectly.

It's all about choice. First Class - or coach

Emmett grinned. "Edgy, sexy, and with the hand of the master all over it."

McClaren was more succinct. "It's Kinnetic."

Cynthia gathered up the samples and was preparing to pack them away, when Brian grabbed her hand and tugged to bring her close to his side. "I need you to do a couple of things for me," he explained, something in his voice telling her that this was a serious moment. "I need to see Andrew - like right now - and I need you to get Ted in here, so I can explain a few things."

She took a deep breath. "Brian, I am perfectly capable of doing what has to be done."

"I know that," he replied easily. "Otherwise, I'd have made other arrangements, wouldn't I?"

"I suppose, but . . ."

"It's about avoiding unnecessary friction," he explained. "If you fire him, then you're going to have to deal with the flak and the backlash. If I do it, they can't very well question me or blame you, now can they?"

"You do realize," she said slowly, "that logic has very little to do with how they're going to react." She smiled then, and her voice grew very gentle. "They're scared, Brian. Whether they'd ever admit it or not, they all know that you are the heart and soul of Kinnetic; that without you, it's just another ad agency."

He nodded. If he were prone to false modesty, he'd probably argue with her conclusions, but he wasn't, so he didn't. "In that case, we just have to make sure they understand that your voice is my voice. That you speak on my behalf, and that they'd best listen, if they know what's good for them."

Cynthia glanced uneasily toward the two men still standing in the doorway. "This is going to be especially hard . . . on certain people."

Brian turned to note the shadows forming in Emmett's eyes and knew that she was right, and that Emmett knew it too. But it couldn't be helped. He would do what he could to try to cushion the blow for those who would disagree - vehemently - with his choices, but, in the end, nothing would change. In the end, there were no other choices.

And what he was about to do was only going to serve to compound the problem. But - again - he had always trusted his own instincts, and now was definitely not the right time to start second-guessing himself.

"You just let me worry about that," he said finally, squeezing Cynthia's hand. "And give Heath a raise. That campaign is going to make me a very rich man."

"You're already a very rich man," she retorted.

"In the immortal words of . . . whoever the fuck said it, 'You can never be too rich, or too thin'."

"The Duchess of Windsor," said Emmett.

"Gloria Vanderbilt," said Cynthia.

"Babe Paley," said McClaren.

"See?" said Brian. "Experts all."

"So I'll see you tomorrow," said Cynthia as she finished packing up her portfolio. "And I'll send Andrew in first thing in the morning. When do you want Ted here?"

"Tonight," answered Brian absently, "but hold on a second. I need you to hear what I have to say to Emmett. This will impact you as well."
She paused then, a speculative gleam rising in her eye, and Brian almost smiled as he realized how well he knew her and how easily he could read her mind. She did not - quite - say, "What now?" But she might as well have done so.

"Brian?" said Emmett slowly, as he came toward the bed. "You're making me nervous. What's going on? Why would . . ."

Brian lifted a hand to silence the big Nelly bottom, and took a moment to choose his words. But, after a few seconds of silence, he simply took a deep breath and said what needed saying, apparently realizing that there was no way to cushion the blow.

"I'm not going to be here, Emmett," he announced. "And I need you to fill in for me."

Emmett gaped, and it was immediately obvious that he could not figure out which detail of Brian's statement to question first. So he went with the obvious.

"What do you mean, you're not going to be here?" Then his eyes widened, as a new, terrible thought occurred to him. "They haven't . . . found something else wrong, have they? You're not . . ."

"No," replied Brian quickly. "No, I'm not dying. But I am severely damaged. And I need time to adjust. And to heal. And to figure out where I go from here and how I . . . how I'm going to deal with everything. So I'm going to be away for a while."

"You don't need to know that, Emmett."

Emmett just stared at him for a while, obviously trying to get his mind around this new, unexpected development. When he spoke again, he sounded uncertain, almost frightened. "You're not going to be . . . alone, are you? I mean, this is not some Phantom of the Opera scenario, where you disappear into your own dark little abyss and spy on us from the rafters or something. Is it?"

"He won't be alone," said Chris McClaren, moving up to stand on the other side of the bed, his eyes almost opaque, revealing nothing beyond a glint of impatience.

Emmett nodded. "Well. That's good then.' Then he smiled. "Guess I've been around Teddie too much. Too much La Traviata and not enough Seinfeld. But . . . what did you mean? About me - filling in for you? How could I possibly . . ."

"Actually," said Cynthia slowly, realization dawning in her eyes, "it's a splendid idea. You'd be perfect."

"For what? Dancing on the bar at Babylon? I mean, not that I wouldn't love to, but . . ."

"To run Babylon for me," Brian's words were clipped and sharp, and filled with absolute certainty. Emmett blinked, and he actually gulped for air before stammering a response. "Are you . . . you can't . . . you've lost your fucking mind."

Brian shifted and leaned forward enough to lay his hand on Emmett's shoulder. "Listen to me, Honeycutt. Are you listening?"

Emmett was still fighting for breath. "I'm listening," he finally managed to reply. "And don't call me Honeycutt."
"Think about it, Emmett. I've got Ted to handle the financial end of things, and I've got a club manager to take care of stocking and inventory and staffing. But what - when you get right down to bedrock - is Babylon? When you eliminate everything else, Babylon is just a big, expensive party. Only it happens every night. Not just once in a while. And who, after all, is the pre-eminent party planner in the Pitts?"

But Emmett was shaking his head. "But, Brian, I know zero - zilch - absolutely nothing about running a business. This is . . . crazy."

"Actually," Brian replied calmly, "you know plenty about it. You just call it by a different name. The expertise you have isn't something that a person learns. It's something you either know, or you don't know - something you're born with. It's about making people happy, giving them a chance to enjoy themselves. To have fun." His voice was suddenly filled with undeniable humor. "And to fuck, of course."

Emmett grinned. "Can't forget that, can we? But I'm . . . Brian, Babylon is your baby. What if I . . . fuck it up? And how do I find the time anyway? I'm . . ."

Brian gave a half shrug. "This isn't a 9-to-5 thing, you know. There's plenty of staff to handle the day to day running of the business. What I need from you is inspiration, for lack of a better term. Someone to come up with ideas for the special events, the promotions, the contests. The fun stuff. And I can't think of anyone better suited . . ."

"You know," said Emmett suddenly, his voice taking on a speculative tone, "I have always thought about things I'd do, if it were up to me, that is. Like a Barbra impersonation night. And a Scarlet O'Hara ball theme. And a Cabaret celebration. And . . ."

"And," said Brian, sounding very self-satisfied, "you'd be making a good living while you're at it. A very good living."

"How good?" Emmett asked quickly. As a product of a very poor Mississippi family, he had never lost his penchant for focusing on the money.

Cynthia considered for a moment, then scrawled a figure on the message pad beside the bed. She showed it to Brian first, who nodded; then she handed it to Emmett, who blinked. Twice.

"Well?" said Brian.

Emmett looked up then, and focused on Brian's eyes. "But you . . . you're coming back, right? This is just temporary. Right?"

"Does that make a difference in whether or not you accept the offer?" Brian asked quickly.

"Then it's immaterial," Brian continued. "So - what do you say?"

"I say yes," answered Emmett finally, unable to suppress a delighted smile. "Yes. Absolutely, yes."

He leaned forward then, and dropped a kiss on a bare spot of skin above Brian's ear.

"All right, all right. Don't get moist."

"Thank you, Brian. I'm honored. To know that you trust me, I mean. And I won't do anything without your approval. I promise."
Brian looked up again to meet his eyes. "Yes, you will. You'll have to, because you won't be able to reach me. If you need guidance, or help in making decisions, then Cynthia will be available. I . . . won't."

Emmett saw it then, saw the dark truth lurking within those beautiful hazel eyes.

Brian believed that he was never coming back, that this goodbye was forever. Emmett wanted to deny it, to offer reassurance. But he couldn't, because he just didn't know.

Perhaps Brian was right.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

TBC
The only light in the vast room came from the fire burning brightly in the massive fireplace and a couple of vintage Tiffany floor lamps specifically placed to shed illumination on a group of antique wingback chairs located adjacent to the towering bookcase that stretched across one entire wall. As a result, though there were deep areas of shadow within the chamber, it was not really dark, as the brilliant flames were reflected and enhanced by the rich veneer of hand-rubbed paneling and wainscoting, the gleaming expanse of hardwood floors, the lustrous surface of polished brass fireplace tools, the deep patina of heavy, oak furniture, and the liquid amber of fine brandy sipped from crystal snifters.

It was a room that spoke of power, but only in a whisper. A shout would have been too crass, too plebian for such a rarefied atmosphere.

It also spoke of money - of the antique variety - and culture and family; the kind that could trace ancestries back to places like Kent and Knightsbridge and Harrow, and then on to Jamestown or Boston or the oldest sections of Philadelphia. And probably Salem, as well - although nobody was too quick to claim that, publicly.

Voices were never raised in this room, and no patron's slightest wish ever went ungranted.

The venue did not have a formal name; it was simply 'The Club'. And if one was welcome there, one had no need to question the lack of a proper name. On the other hand, if one wasn't, there was no point in asking, as one would never need to know the answer.

It was not a place to which one aspired to belong; it was, instead, a place to which one was born . . . or not. There was almost no middle ground.

The sprawling French colonial house had begun its life in the mid-nineteenth century, as the country estate of a powerful political leader who was, himself, the grandson of one of the city's founding fathers, but the 'country' aspect had dwindled away long ago, as the city limits had expanded, and expanded again and yet again. But the 'estate' part still applied, as political and financial pressure had been applied with great precision to keep the area a focus of upscale social standards and to preserve the ambiance of elegance and good taste. Thus the gardens were still expansive and immaculately maintained, the house had been modernized with great attention to detail and historical authenticity under the oversight of architectural specialists, and the staff charged with maintenance and service were exquisitely trained, products of a multi-generational tradition in that jobs had been passed down from grandfather to father to son, for decades.

Aaron Van Meider III was more than a century dead - no denying that - and his line had ended with a spinster great-granddaughter who had not lived to see the rise of the Hippie generation or the beginning of the Vietnam War, but his legacy assured that he would never be forgotten. His portrait - sternly posed in his military uniform - still hung above the heavily carved mantle in the main club room, and discreet markers throughout the house identified areas specifically designed according to his directions. A family heirloom collection of Towle silver, Waterford crystal, and Philippe Deshoulières china was still displayed in a breakfront in the carefully preserved dining room, and the kitchen staff still prepared recipes favored by his mother and his wife, producing gourmet cuisine that was served now in the elegant club dining room, carved out of one section of the house's original...
The rooms of the mansion were rarely crowded, which was one of the more attractive features of the house, and membership was both much desired and extremely limited, available only by family legacy, passing from father to son, etc., or - very, very rarely - by invitation.

It was a sanctuary for the elite of Pittsburgh's society; it was also one of the last bastions of sexism in that its membership was exclusively male, and women were not permitted within its walls except for those rare social occasions when ladies were required as escorts - flesh and blood accessories for the men of the hour. And, of course, as cleaning and kitchen staff. The glass ceiling did not exist below stairs.

On this night, there were only five individuals in the library, enjoying the luxurious comfort of the room which was particularly pleasant in contrast to the heavy rain driving against the French windows and the cold wind whistling around the eaves. Four lounged in deep-cushioned leather easy chairs, and the fifth was browsing through an eclectic selection of first editions, ranging from Dickens to Austen to Proust (which would surely have led any knowledgeable observer to conclude that it was the leather bindings and the antiquity of the books, rather than their content, that was so highly valued by the club members) to Sinclair Lewis to William Faulkner. The air was redolent of expensive cigars and aged brandy, and conversation was desultory as the evening wore on. They had all enjoyed a gourmet meal earlier in the evening, and were now contemplating taking their leave and making their way home.

Yet, they lingered, accepting droughts of brandy from the young waiter who had been assigned to see to their needs, and enjoying postprandial smokes. Though tobacco bans were becoming more and more common in public restaurants and bars all across the country, no one had ever dared to suggest such a thing in this last bastion of privilege . . . and no one ever would.

The waiter - a grandson of the man who had served as butler to Amelia Van Meiden before she died - poured out the last of the Hennessey cognac and took himself off to fetch another bottle. Just in case. The gentlemen might not require additional servings, but it would not do to leave anything to chance, as club members were unaccustomed to waiting for service. Young Nicholas, as he was called by the clientele, did not require instruction in how to perform his duties; it was a job he'd been groomed for since childhood.

The eldest of the group, a tall, elegant figure with thick, silver hair, lifted his glass and watched the refraction of flames within his goblet, as he took a deep drag from his imported Cuban cigar. Then he looked around, maintaining his silence until he was sure he had the undivided attention of his companions.

"What's the latest report?" he asked, as he watched swirls of smoke rise toward the coffered ceiling.

"No real change," said another of the men, dark-haired, with flecks of silver glinting in the reflected firelight. "Except for the rumors, which appear to be growing daily."

"So," said the questioner, "his condition is stable?"

"Yes."

"And his appearance?"

There was a faint but unmistakable vein of satisfaction in the tone of the slender man standing at the bookshelf who turned to offer a response. "Top secret, according to our source, but it's far too late for such precautions. The tabloid photos were all over the Internet before the sun rose the next morning. By now, the whole world has had a chance to get a good look at the ruin of Brian Kinney."

The older man smiled. "And you can be sure that most of them wanted to pin medals on those who inflicted the damage, even if they don't dare say so in public."

Another voice was raised then - softer, less forceful, slightly accented. "Can we be sure of that? There's a lot of talk in the media these days, about people becoming accustomed to ideas like gay marriage and legal rights for same-sex partners. Do you suppose it'll really come to that?"

The man at the bookcase snorted. "Not if we have anything to say about it. All of that is just the liberal press, trying to promote the queer agenda. Decent people - real Americans, like us - understand that accepting abominations like homosexuality is a major step toward the collapse of our society. People like Kinney and his kind - they're sub-human. They should all be exterminated, like the vermin they are."

"Still," said another man, stocky and balding, stretching his legs out toward the fire and slumping against the leather back of his chair, "we have to be careful. Even though we know we're morally right in what we're trying to do, the law - as enacted by the bleeding hearts - doesn't agree. And if we get careless, it might be difficult to defend our actions to the great unwashed, who care about nothing beyond who's playing in the Super Bowl, when the next Harry Potter movie comes out, and how they're going to afford their next smart phone."

The questioner chuckled. "Then we'd best make sure our fate doesn't wind up in the hands of the rabble. Now, about these rumors . . ."

"Nothing substantial yet," replied the dark-haired speaker, voice threaded with a delicious irony, "but our oh, so eager-to-cooperate source has been pretty accurate thus far. For example, the description of the reactions of Kinney's freaky friends to the tabloid article has been substantiated by a couple of different observers. Also, some of the data we've been able to verify seems to be confidential in nature, so it seems logical to trust the information. Especially since we've received corroboration from a second source, who also has no idea what's really going on." He paused and flashed a venal smile. "Which really says a lot about the level of intelligence - or lack thereof - among these cretins."

"So what, specifically, does the rumor say?"

"Supposedly, he's going away somewhere. To recuperate."

"And where would that be?"

The dark-haired man sighed. "We don't know yet. But we will. If the sources we've already tapped can't provide the information, we'll get if from others who will come into play as needed. Preliminary arrangements have already been made."

The older man nodded, clasping gnarled hands in front of his face as he turned to look out into the storm. "I'm still not satisfied that we did enough to get our message across."

"With all due respect, Sir," the softer voice again, slightly raspy now and lower pitched, "you weren't there. Even knowing what he is, it was . . . hard to watch."

"Hard to watch?" snapped the elderly man. "Do you have any idea what that . . . that piece of filth cost me? How much I invested, and how much it should have paid off, and, even more than that, what his interference cost us all. What we lost because of . . . " He paused and took a deep, uneven breath. "Don't you dare suggest that he didn't have it coming. All of it. In fact, he got off easy. He was supposed to wind up dying of AIDS. So no matter how much damage was done to him, it wasn't enough. He still deserves more."

"Of course, he does," agreed the dark-haired man, voice shifting into a soothing cadence. "And he'll get it, sooner or later. Meanwhile, there are other options." He paused and seemed to be considering his next words carefully. "We could still go after someone close to him, you know - someone who has special significance for him."

The older man was silent for a time, obviously lost in thought, ignoring the heaviness of the silence around him, as the others waited. In the end, there was no viable doubt about who wielded the real power in this group. Thus, there were a couple of faint but unmistakable sighs of relief when he resumed speaking, shaking his head. "No. Despite everything, blood still counts for something. There must be something else. Someone else."

"He's a fag, Sir." Back to the accented, low-pitched voice, now filled with venom and contempt. "He doesn't know a damned thing about loyalty or honor. He only cares about himself, and the only reason he would care about the other one is because he's got a perverted craving to claim ownership of that particular ass. No. You could condemn all of his so-called friends to the seventh level of hell, and it wouldn't change a thing. He's made it abundantly clear over the years that everything he does, he does for himself. And the only loyalty he has from the people around him is what he buys."

The older man grew thoughtful again, before speaking up to propose a new idea. "Still, he's always had a lust for material things. I met him once, and - before I knew what he was, of course - I admired his taste and his style. So, even if people don't mean anything to him, it's certain that material things do. His possessions, and his business. So, until we get a chance to reach our primary objective and complete what we set out to do, maybe we should shift our attention to something a bit more . . . accessible. And perhaps we also need to shift our tactics a bit. Find a different source for the hired help. After all, it wouldn't do to become too predictable, now would it?"

The dark-haired member of the group was shaking his head. "If you're thinking about any kind of direct action against his business location, best think again. Kinney is, without doubt, a revolting faggot and a pederast, but he's not stupid enough to risk the well-being of his big-money, low-class clients. Thus, the security for Kinetik was always virtually airtight due to the questionable reputation of the area, and it's even more so now, since the attack. Besides, there are other ways of handling matters on that front. Infiltration will serve as well as open warfare, with a lot less risk entailed."

Their young waiter made his return just as the speaker fell silent, and proceeded to offer a freshly-opened bottle of cognac, to the delight of the elderly man. He was approaching his eighth decade, and had never known any life other than one of privilege, but he never tired of enjoying his rank and the perks it provided.

"Thank you, Nicholas," he said with a smile, extending his snifter for a refill, and noting - just in passing - that the young man had beautiful gray eyes with thick, spiky lashes. Then he returned his attention to the group around him, as the waiter made his rounds. "Very well then. Perhaps something simpler. I seem to recall something about a . . . loft?"

So much, thought Ted, for a quiet evening at home, cuddling with his mate.

He had allowed himself a bit of a queen-out when Cynthia had delivered Brian's summons, but Blake had taken it in stride with characteristic aplomb. With, in fact, a little too much aplomp, from Ted's perspective. It bothered him sometimes that Blake seemed so seamlessly capable of adapting to the variables of random chance. Although such an ability was probably one of the traits that made him an extremely effective drug-abuse counselor, it was slightly annoying when one was craving an emotional echo of one's own feelings and gotten a voice of reason instead.

After all, he grumped silently, his work schedule frequently exceeded forty hours per week by a substantial margin, and it was presumptuous of Brian to assume that he could expect his employees to be at his beck and call at any hour. Ted had a life of his own, and Brian needed to respect that.

Of course, there was the inconvenient little truth that - without Brian - the life that Ted was leading, extremely comfortable, intellectually rewarding, and financially stable, would not exist at all. Once in a while, though rarely, he wondered what would have happened to him had Brian not come seeking his help in finding a way out of a financial crisis, had not interrupted his moment of sharing his plight with his therapy group, had not forced him to re-evaluate what he wanted to do with his life, and where his true forte lay.

But he never pursued the thought very far, because he realized that he almost certainly didn't want to know the answer to that question. He suspected, however, that the path he would have followed, in that event, would have eventually ended in a place where he would not have wished to be.

OK, so he owed Brian a lot.

Ted took a moment to look in the mirror as he washed his hands before exiting the men's room. It was silly, he knew; even presumptuous to assume that Brian would notice, one way or another, but, somehow, Ted always took the time to straighten his clothing and make sure that nothing was stuck in his teeth and that his hair was not standing on end before coming face to face with his boss.

Brian wouldn't care; that was an unavoidable truth. But, somehow, Ted did. He couldn't really explain it, but he had accepted it as a natural expression of who he was. Brian, he knew, would never look at him the way he looked at other men - as a potential partner for sharing a quick fuck, or a visit to Babylon's backroom or even a turn on the dance floor.

That was something reserved for others, for those who were not members of the Brian Kinney Friends' Club.

Which should have been a source of pride, he thought, as he stared at his own face in the mirror - that he was important enough, necessary enough, close enough to Brian to be permanently stricken from the list of potential tricks. And most of the time, it was.

Most of the time.

Except . . . sometimes he wondered if he was the only one of their little group who speculated, who hungered for an answer to a question he never quite dared to ask aloud. Did Emmett, for example, ever wonder? Or Calvin, or Drew? Or Ben - no, on second thought, Ben didn't have to wonder; Ben knew, but maintained a deliberate silence on the subject. But did Blake, even ever faithful, ever stalwart, unfailingly upfront-in-all-things Blake . . . wonder?

Then, of course, there was Michael, and, in his case, the question didn't need asking at all. Michael had always wondered, would always wonder, but would never know, for a very specific reason. No matter how he might shrug off the possibility, or what he might do to prove otherwise, Brian loved Michael in a very unique, very specific way - a way which would never allow the complications of a sexual encounter to come between them. So Michael, despite whatever longings he might still carry hidden deep beneath his surface, would never be a part of the circle that might have some hope of seducing the mighty Kinney.
And neither, for the most part, did any of the rest of them, although not for the same reason. The very suggestion was mind-boggling. And yet . . .

What would it be like, he wondered, to be singled out for just one night, to draw those hazel eyes and know, for a few hours, that they would see no one else? To be fucked - just once - by the legend? To be able to lay aside all the posturing of disinterest and snideness and admit to the temptation? And why was it so hard to determine what he might be willing to give up in order to find out?

Of course, all those secret longings and private fantasies involved the Brian who . . . used to be. The Brian who existed now only in memory.

Ted gasped, as he realized what he was thinking, ashamed of the thought, but not quite able to dismiss it, or the ugly little speculation over how it would feel to have lived that life and to know, beyond all doubt, that it was all over, that what had been would be no more.

He found himself staring, unblinking, at his own reflection, eyes wide with pupils dilated. He then shook off the reverie that had gripped him, and felt a moment of disorientation, wondering if this kind of fixation had been common for him during the dark days of his addiction - days of which he had no clear memory. He had been lost then, attracted to a dark place inside himself. Did Brian represent that same ugly hunger to experience what he could never really hope to achieve? And, if he had the chance, would he take by force what he could never hope to be given?

No! He was a decent, God-fearing man. An honest man, loyal to a fault. A decent, angry man, although, if pressed, he could not have explained exactly what he was angry about.

When he walked into Brian's room, Chris McClaren was there - of course - sprawled in an easy chair, his head pillowed by a wadded up sweatshirt, apparently deeply engrossed in a battered trade paperback copy of The Kite Runner, with Daughtry's It's Not Over playing softly on the iPod Classic sitting on the bedside table. Ted deliberately chose not to notice the pleasant bulge of muscles beneath the tight, black wifebeater (the kind made notorious by the infamous Brian Kinney) or the other, equally pleasant bulge beneath the 501's, as the photographer nodded a quick, disinterested greeting.

Brian appeared to be asleep, and Ted took a moment to appreciate the view. Apparently, the patient was making good progress, since some of the bandages which had obscured his upper torso had been removed, and there was a patch of bare skin visible now below his clavicle and above the gauze band that still braced the lower rib cage - a patch which happened to encompass the dark nubs of nipples and the clean declivity of the breast bone between them. Bare and beautiful golden tan skin, sufficiently perfect to provide a distraction from the memory of what still lay beneath the bandages that concealed that broken, distorted face.

"Enjoying the view?"

The sardonic voice jarred him from his momentary lapse, and Ted was grateful for both the dim lighting in the room and for his own swarthy complexion which did not display the flush of embarrassment easily. "Thought you were asleep," he mumbled.

"Obviously." Brian's tone remained slightly acerbic, but there was no real malice in it.

Ted dredged up a shaky smile. "An increase in the snark level is an excellent indication that you're getting better," he observed.

Brian shifted slightly, and could not quite conceal a gasp of discomfort as he did so. As luck would have it, a lyric from the song playing on the iPod served to underscore the moment, and Ted could not quite conceal an urge to flinch away from it.

... a part of me is dead and in the ground . . .*

And Brian, of course, heard it and recognized his employee's discomfort. "How prophetic!" he observed.

Ted was not often at a loss for words, but found that he suddenly couldn't think of a thing to say.

"Don't sweat it, Theodore," Brian said, after a beat of silence, and McClaren - still pretending complete absorption in his book - had to struggle to conceal a smile, wondering why so many of Brian's visitors failed to note the irony of the patient being the one to offer comfort to them.

"You wanted to see me?" Ted thought it best to dispense with the small talk and get down to the heart of the matter. He was certain that his tone of voice and manner conveyed nothing but a business-like attitude, but something in Brian's posture seemed to suggest otherwise.

"Sorry to interfere with your social life," replied the man who signed Ted's paycheck, his sardonic tone revealing exactly how 'sorry' he was, "but I think we need to clear the air and get a couple of things straight - business-wise."

"Okay." Ted was immediately relieved that this would be a job-related discussion. Almost as much as he was disappointed that it was not something more.

"I'm going to be away for a while, Theodore," Brian announced without preamble. "Maybe for a long while. And . . ."

"Away where?" Under ordinary circumstances, Ted would have guarded his tongue more carefully, to avoid revealing unseemly curiosity or concern. But Brian had caught him by surprise, and, incidentally, scared the shit out of him in the process. "Where are you going?"

But if he was hoping for an in-depth explanation, he was doomed to disappointment. "Just . . . away. You don't need to know where."

"But why? Why would you . . ."

"It's for my recuperation. Doctor's orders, and all that shit. But that's not why I called you here. I need you to . . ."

But Ted was shaking his head, and holding up his hands to indicate his understanding. "You needn't be concerned, Bri. I'll take care of everything while you're gone. You know I will, so you can just concentrate on . . ."

"Theodore." The voice was flat, unemotional.

"What?"

"Please stop interrupting, and listen to me. Are you listening?"

Ted knew the ritual, just as well as any of Brian's friends or associates did. "Yes. I'm listening."

Brian regarded his financial adviser solemnly. "You've been a valuable addition to Kinnetic, Theodore. And I trust that you feel that you've been adequately compensated for your efforts."

Ted nodded, understanding that they both knew that "adequately compensated" was a huge understatement, but he remained silent, sensing that there was more to come. And that it might not all be to his liking.

"While I'm away, I trust that you'll look after my financial interests. Safeguard my investments, monitor the trust funds, make sure that the money flows smoothly at Kinnetic. Just as you always do.
And exercise appropriate fiscal oversight. That's what I pay you for."

Again, Ted nodded, but with growing unease, as he waited for the proverbial other shoe to drop.

"However." It was truly amazing, thought Ted, that eyes almost completely obscured by swaths of gauze could still be so completely filled with firm resolve and determination and so easily readable - by design. "You're not an ad man. You've filled in for me on a number of occasions, when there was no alternative, and I appreciate your efforts. But it's not your forte. It's not what I expect from you, and it's not what you're going to do now. You're my accountant. Cynthia, on the other hand, is both my personal assistant and a skilled ad person as well. She knows the market; she knows my clients; and, most important of all from my perspective, she knows me. She understands how I want things done. So, while I'm away, you'll have full control of Kinnetic's finances, but the business will be under her control. Understand?"

Ted could only stare at his boss, mouth gaping. Surely, he must have misunderstood. Surely . .

"Theodore? Do you understand me?"

Ted managed - finally - to draw a deep breath. "Frankly . . . no. I don't understand. You think that Cynthia knows you better than I do? That she can . . ."

But Brian was shaking his head. "I don't just think it, Theodore. I know it. She does know me better.
And more to the point, she will do exactly what I want her to do. Even when she disagrees with me, which she often does. She'll keep one thing in mind. It's my business. And it runs my way, or not at all."

"And why would you . . ."

"Don't make this about you and me," Brian said quickly, "or a question about trust. Because it's not.
It's business. And she won't exactly be operating independently. She knows me well enough to understand when she can act on my behalf, without having to consult with me, and when she can't.
And that's what's needed here."

"Oh, I see," Ted snapped, unable to suppress his resentment. "You don't want a business associate who might have a clue about how a business should be run. All you really want is a talking head - someone who'll be your mouthpiece and come running to you with every little question, and never dispute the wisdom of the Mighty Kinney."

Brian was silent for a moment, simply staring at his employee and waiting for him to recognize the folly of his outburst. The epiphany wasn't long in coming.

"Brian, I . . ." Ted fell silent, when he realized that he had no idea what to say, or how to apologize for words spoken in haste.

"If that's how you choose to look at it," said Brian, his voice almost gentle, but with a core of pure steel running beneath the deceptive softness, "there's nothing I can do to change your mind. I trust you'll continue to look after my financial interests in a professional manner, and to remember that there is a bottom line here. Whether you agree with me or not, it's still my business, and it will continue to operate as I choose. If you can't abide by that, you'll have to decide what you want to do about it. But whatever action you might elect to take, it won't change my decision. Are we clear?"

"Brian, I'm sorry. I didn't mean . . ."

"Are - we - clear?" The tone was hard now, without a nuance of tolerance for any kind of vacillation.

Ted huffed a deep breath. "Crystal clear. And I . . . I won't let you down. Although I do hope you'll reconsider, and tell me how to reach you. In case I . . ."

"Cynthia will know how to reach me. She'll relay anything I might need to know."

Ted hesitated, obviously debating whether to say more or simply crawl away into the night, licking his wounds and realizing that they could have been much worse. But Ted, for all his conservative nature, was not particularly good at knowing when to concede defeat.

Brian sighed, wondering - again - if this interminable day was ever going to end.

"I know . . ." Ted started, then paused, rethinking his approach. "I do understand why you feel that Cynthia is the logical person to handle the operational facets of the business. I mean, she's the one who's been with you from the very beginning, although I could point out . . ." A hard gleam rising in the depths of hazel eyes made him stumble - and rephrase. "But this is about something more than business, Brian. This is about you, and those of us who care about you. Your friends. Your family. You can't just run away, and leave us all to wonder, every day, if you're . . ."

"If I'm what?" And this time, there was no denying the sharp vein of anger that coursed through the words. "Dead? If I die, I'll make sure someone informs you guys, OK?"

"I didn't mean . . ."

"Let's get one thing straight here, Theodore. I've never run away from anything in my life. Never. If I'm going away for a while, it's because it's necessary, in order for me to complete the healing process. That's it. That's all. I don't run, and I don't hide. And I'm not about to start now."

The final words were spoken in a harsh, guttural whisper, and the look in those hazel eyes dared Ted to speak the thought that was so obviously running through his mind. Brian Kinney had never once tried to hide before, but the undeniable, if unspoken, truth was that he'd never before had anything that he wanted to hide from. Ted wasn't sure if that would still be true when all was said and done. The images from the tabloid flashed in his mind, and he flinched. And knew that Brian saw and understood.

"Now, thank you for coming," Brian continued, his voice suddenly devoid of all emotion, "but I'm sure your wifey is awaiting your return with bated breath, so run along. Oh, and by the way, you'll need to prepare a severance package for Andrew, and prepare yourself for a tearful farewell scene when he comes to pick it up."

"You're . . . you're firing Andrew? But . . ."

"I'm firing Andrew," Brian said flatly. "You have a problem with that?"

"No, but . . ."

"But?"

Ted took a deep breath. "Nothing. No problem."
"Anything else?" There was a strange, unusual note of something in Brian's tone, something that only rarely succeeded in escaping the iron restraint he usually practiced so effortlessly. It took a moment for the accountant to recognize it for what it was; the man was in pain, and was struggling to contain it.

"No, I guess that's everything." But the flicker of something in his eyes gave the lie to the easy assurance.

Brian paused for a moment, his gaze steady as he studied his employee's face. "Take good care of yourself, Theodore," he said finally, his voice suddenly very gentle. But it sharpened again in the space of a heartbeat. "And of my money. I'm sure you remember what happens if you fuck it up."

Ted nodded, startled into a small, reluctant smile, and turned to make his exit, but found that he couldn't just leave it like this, with so much unresolved. "Brian," he said softly, forcing himself to look back to meet his employer's eyes, "I hope it doesn't offend you for me to say this, but I'm praying for you. Praying that you'll come through this okay - that everything will be all right in the end."

And he found then that he was glad he'd held that stern gaze, for he spotted just the faintest gleam of warmth flicker in the depths of those expressive eyes, followed immediately by the spark of that unmistakable sardonic wit. "From your mouth to the gay God's ear," came the response, and there was definitely a smile in the tone. "Thank you, Theodore."

When the accountant was gone, Brian closed his eyes and spent a few moments trying to ignore the keen regard of the young man who was staring at him so steadily.

"What?" he snapped finally, without bothering to return the gaze.

"On second thought," came the laconic reply, "let me amend my original observation. Not only do I not want to be your best friend, I don't want to be your friend - at all."

"Excellent, since you're not likely to make the cut either way."

McClaren grinned, and turned to gaze out into the storm that was still battering at the windows. "Just so you know," he said finally, careful to allow not a scintilla of emotion to creep into his tone. "If there's someone else you'd like to insult - by way of saying good-bye, I mean - it would be easy to arrange."

Brian gave up any pretense at sleep and turned his head to study the FBI agent's deliberately expressionless face. "Meaning what - exactly?"

"Meaning that he's nearby. Just in case you want to take another crack at beating him to a bloody pulp."

"Will you please stop talking in fucking riddles and just tell me what you mean."

McClaren stood up and walked to the bed so he could look directly into Brian's face - and read whatever might register there. "I'm talking about your boytoy-wonder. Seems it doesn't matter how hard you try to send him away, he just refuses to go."

Brian sighed and closed his eyes, and told himself that he had revealed nothing of the competing emotions of anguish and anger that had erupted in his mind. "Where is he?"

The FBI agent took his time answering. "You ready for your meds?"
"Later. Where's Justin?"

McClaren glanced at his watch. "At this hour, he's probably down in the rehab rec room. That's where he spends his evenings, playing cards with some of the regulars, or watching tv. Daytime, he's up on the pediatric wards. He's been teaching the kids up there to draw, while he waits for news about you. His network is impressive, by the way. None of us can figure out exactly how he finds out, but he always knows what's going on with you, almost before we do. I'm thinking maybe I should recruit him."

"Shit!" Brian managed to work his fingers under the bandages on his face to rub his eyes. "What part of 'Fuck off' does he not understand?"

"The part that you don't mean," McClaren replied dryly.

"What the fuck do you . . ."

"Give it a rest, Mr. Kinney." It had only taken a day or two for Brian to learn to resent that smart-ass tone of voice. "He knows you too well. You're not going to convince him, unless you work a lot harder at it. And that might not be a bad idea, all things considered. But first, you have to admit what it is you really want and why you keep pushing it away."

Brian's gaze was cold and steady. "You've known me for what? A week? And you think you have any clue about what I want? You don't. You . . ."

"Save your breath, Prince Charming. The effort is wasted on me."

By this time, Brian's resentment was beginning to subside to be replaced by a growing curiosity. "Just for the sake of argument," he said slowly, "what is it you think you know about me? And how do you think you know it?"

McClaren took a moment to walk to the door and check out the perimeter. One of Lance Mathis' watchdogs was exactly where he was supposed to be, sprawled in a plastic chair in the hallway and pretending to doze.

"I'm a profiler, Brian," he said finally, as he walked back into the room. "In order to do my job, I have to be able to read people. In depth. And not just the sociopaths I'm trying to catch either. It's just as important to understand the individuals they target. You point out that I've only known you for a short time, and you're absolutely right. But I already know things about you that your life-long friends have never figured out. Not because I'm smarter, or more sensitive. But because I watch more closely, and because I'm not blinded by feelings or desires."

"And what is it that you think you've discovered?" There was no disguising the note of challenge in Brian's tone, and McClaren was mightily tempted to speak up, to show off his expertise.

So tempted that he gave in to the urge, but only for a moment. "I know," he said softly, "why you keep trying to send him away."

Brian's eyes were flecked with ice as he studied the agent's expression. "Then, by all means, enlighten me."

But McClaren had regained his composure, already regretting his momentary lapse and wondering why this cocky, arrogant bastard seemed to be able to get under his skin so easily when others - smarter, brighter, slyer, and sharper - had never managed to do so.

"Not yet," he finally replied with a diffident smile. "When the time's right, you should expect to be blown away by my uncanny insights. But, for now, do you want to see him or not?"

"Not."

"It's not going to work, you know."

Brian closed his eyes, trying to ignore the certainty he heard in McClaren's tone of voice. "It's got to," he said finally, barely audible.

The FBI agent moved back to his easy chair to retrieve his novel. "Maybe," he said finally, "you need to rethink your strategy. Maybe you need to figure out how to keep him, instead of how to throw him away."

The silence in the room lasted for several minutes, and McClaren resumed reading, assuming that his last suggestion was going to go unacknowledged. Thus he was slightly startled when Brian did decide to speak.

"Keeping him is not an option."

The FBI agent sighed. He was almost certain that he had figured out why Kinney was so determined to sever his relationship with Justin Taylor, but knowing didn't make it any easier to ignore the man's pain - a pain, he was sure, that almost no one else was ever allowed to see.

"Meds?" he asked finally, realizing that nothing he could say was going to provide any solace for the lonely ache that Brian was enduring.

"Yes." Only a sharp inhalation, accompanied by a slight tremor that gripped his upper torso, indicated the degree of his discomfort.

A quick call to the nurses' station coincided with Gnarls Barkley, on the iPod, opining that maybe he was crazy*, and McClaren couldn't help but think the lyrics entirely appropriate to the moment.

"You want me to shut off the music?" he asked, as a young, Hispanic nurse with beautiful sable eyes came in to administer Brian's dose of painkiller. Like all of the medical staff members involved in Brian's care, she had been vetted and approved by an FBI security team. And, also like all the rest, she was somewhat enamored of their mysterious patient, and her touch was extremely gentle, eliciting a murmur of thanks.

"No. It's kinda soothing. Only, let's keep Three 6 Mafia and T-Pain to a minimum, OK?"

McClaren grinned, and made an adjustment on the iPod. After a brief silence, a new voice rose, and Brian allowed himself a sigh of satisfaction.

He drifted quickly into the arms of a blessed, drug-enhanced sleep, as Carly Simon sang about standing on a star and blazing a trail of desire through the darkening dawn.* For the moment, he found that he was perfectly willing to just let the river run.

Chris McClaren lowered the lights, and stood for a moment looking down at the shrouded face of the man whose life he was sworn to protect, remembering the photographs he'd seen, the pictures of this man in his prime, possessing a physical beauty that even the most ardent homophobe would have been hard-pressed to deny. He had heard the assurances offered by Rick Turnage, had listened to the practical observations from Matt Keller, and had considered the pragmatic statements from Nurse Beck, and he knew that they all spoke truth, as they knew it. But he also knew that Brian - in exercising his rational, no-nonsense attitude - was right; there were no guarantees, and it was, perhaps, kinder to offer no hope at all than to hand out empty promises.
Still, he reached down and touched a patch of bare skin just below Brian's shoulder and found himself smiling. No matter how much everyone insisted that Turnage could work miracles, that time would heal all wounds, and that Brian would be 'good as new', it was pretty obvious that most of them believed otherwise, that they all understood that the odds were stacked firmly against the rebirth of the Stud of Liberty Avenue.

It surprised him to realize just how vehemently he hoped that they were all wrong.

He wasn't entirely sure what holiday it was, but he knew it must be something, because Debbie only indulged her most outrageous decorating urges when she had some kind of valid cause to celebrate. Thus the diner was particularly garish on this occasion, decked out in bright, glittery foil doodads of brass and purple and crimson, in Mylar balloons and rainbow-hued baubles. It definitely wasn't Christmas, since there was not a snowflake or a reindeer to be found amid the glitter, but almost anything else was possible. Pride, maybe. Or May Day. Or Mardi Gras. Or RuPaul's fucking birthday. Something.

But it didn't really matter, because all the glitter, all the glitz, all the vinyl rainbows in the world could not obscure the Sunshine at the center of it all.

Deb was present, of course. So were Michael and Ben and Emmett and Lindsey and . . . Shit! For all he knew, Captain Astro and Galaxy Lad could have been dancing on the counter, and it wouldn't have mattered, for he saw only one face.

Justin was standing in the doorway, blue eyes huge and filled with bright glints of laughter, and the rest of the world was suddenly fading into an obscure blur as he could only sit at the table and watch as the man who had once (once???) been the center of his universe walked toward him.

The chatter of conversation continued around them, but neither was listening to anyone else's words, except maybe for a rich, dark voice in the background, as music floated on the surface of reality - Lou Rawls, he thought, as his attention was snagged - just for a moment - by lyrics that might have been written for this fragment of time.

"So meet me at the same place we fell in love before, so we can fall in love all over again."*

It wasn't the kind of music one ordinarily expected to hear at the diner, but it was so appropriate, so personal, so perfect, that he didn't think to question it. And it was obvious that Justin heard it and understood its significance too, because the glow in his eyes grew brighter as the song played on.

He was vaguely aware that plenty of voices called Justin's name, at first in joyful greeting and happy surprise and then - when he didn't respond - with a growing sense of exasperation over being ignored. But it didn't matter. Debbie and Michael and Ted and Melanie - even Jennifer and Daphne. None of them mattered, for he could tell by the look in those beautiful eyes that Justin saw only him.

They were in the middle of a crowded, bustling scene at the Liberty Diner, and they were alone in the world.

He opened his arms, and Justin was there, filling him, completing him, giving back the only real life he had ever known, and he wondered, in a fleeting moment of confusion, why he had ever let go of what he had once held in his hands - his own personal key to paradise.

Their lips met and clung, as Justin went to his knees and fitted himself into the V of Brian's legs and pressed their bodies together, chest to waist to crotch, pressing closer and harder until there was nothing to mark where one body ended and the other began. Between one millisecond and the next, there was nothing in the world except the taste and the scent and the touch of Justin's body, Justin's essence, Justin's heat, as Brian was suddenly lost in sensation, as everything around them fell silent, as if they were suddenly at the center of a stage, surrounded by an audience who realized that they were witnessing something incredibly rare, something virtually unprecedented - the kind of deep, visceral, bottomless connection that occurred all too seldom in the bustle of life. An emotion most of them would never be privileged to experience.

Justin pulled back just enough to whisper Brian's name, just enough to brace his face against Brian's cheek and flutter his lashes against beautiful golden skin. In turn, Brian opened his mouth to speak, but was silenced by the gentle pressure of two fingers against his lips. "Don't talk," Justin whispered. "I don't want to talk. I want to suck you; I want you to fuck me."

"Here?" Brian managed to laugh around the confining fingers.

"No." Something flexed then, and there was a sensation of movement, of transition, as Lou Rawls faded to silence, to be replaced by a different voice, a different melody playing in the background, while the bright ambiance of the diner became . . . something else. "Here."

Brian smiled, as the scene shift was completed, and it was his loft - moonlit, pristine, warm and cozy in contrast to a frozen world beyond the floor-to-ceiling windows, and the words of the song seemed once again to be a perfect accompaniment for the setting.

". . .tell me again how you'll still be there when the heartache ends."*

Justin stood silhouetted - nude and perfect - against the window, the moonlight painting him with a silver patina and rendering his hair a cap of spun gold.

Brian, equally bare, stood watching him, mostly cloaked in shadow but aware, nonetheless, that he made a beautiful subject for the artist's eye.

"Are you doing this?" he asked, a vague hand gesture indicating the shifting of setting, the musical backdrop . . . the magic.

"No. You are."

"Are you really here?" Brian moved closer, barely daring to breathe lest he destroy whatever illusion this might be.

"I've always been here."

"No. You . . ."

Even in the semi-darkness, the smile was almost blinding. "Come to bed."

Brian leaned forward, reaching, wondering if it could possibly be this easy, only to find . . .

. . . that it was. Justin lay beneath him now, stretched out against the expanse of midnight silk sheets, his fingers playing with a brand new nipple ring, braided and beaded in three colors of gold. "You should never have let me go," he was whispering, his pupils so distended that there was only a thin rim of sapphire surrounding the black circles.

"What?" Brian's response was sharp and rough. "Should I have chained you to the wall?"

The brilliant smile appeared again. "I was thinking . . . to the bed."
Brian leaned forward, closing his lips over the ringed nipple and used his teeth to tug lightly, just enough to elicit a soft gasp for breath, and he smiled as he felt the lithe, supple body writhe beneath him as arms closed around his neck. Then hands fisted in his hair and sought to push him downward, to where a large, impressive erection was throbbing against his belly.

"Please!" It was barely audible, more breath than whisper.

"Please what?"

The fist closed tighter, and jerked him up so he could look directly into glazed, heat-seeking blue eyes.

"I want you in me. Now!"

"But you beg so sweetly," he replied with a soft snicker. "Makes me so hot."

Justin's smile was different from his customary brilliant grin. It was, just slightly, smug. "You do realize that - in this circumstance - you can fuck me bareback."

Brian frowned. "Sunshine, you know . . ."

"Think of it, Brian." The whisper was like liquid heat against his skin. "No barriers. Nothing but you inside me. Your big, beautiful dick, buried inside my ass, with nothing to separate us. Touching me, like you've never touched me before."

"Justin . . ."

"Please. Please, Brian. Take me, like you've never taken anybody. Touch me, like you've never touched anybody. Claim me."

"I won't put you at risk."

The smile flashed again. "The only risk - here - is that you could let me go again, and we'd never have this. This - this is what we're meant to be. Don't you understand that yet?"

"Justin . . ."

But there was suddenly no more fight left in him, no more resistance as he felt that tight, hot body surge against him and draw him in. There was no transition, no time for second thoughts. One moment he was poised at that quivering opening, and the next he was inside - balls-deep and gasping at the sensation of molten heat completely engulfing him. He could not think, could not pull away, could not speak. He could only thrust, and thrust harder, and feel himself slip deeper, until there was nothing left to mark where he ended and Justin began. Until they were finally, totally one body. One being.

Blackness claimed him then, drew him in and wrapped him in an ecstasy so profound, so intense that his mind could no longer grasp it. He sank, and felt his body entwined with another, joined indelibly, falling together. Falling into darkness, falling into . . .

. . . pale light. Something flickering, hard-edged, sharp. Something moving against his back - hot but surrounded by bitter cold. "Your turn." The whisper was harsher than it should have been, and held something beyond need, beyond desire.

Something . . . wasn't right. There should be downy softness beneath his body, and silken skin against his back, and the fingers that traced down his spine should have been gentle, stirring his Voices rose, music flared.

. . . how's it going to be, when you don't love me any more . . .*

"Justin?"

"What?" Flat, hard, and not where it was supposed to be.

"Why are you . . ." Hands, gripping him from behind, hard and brutal and holding him still for . . . pain - vast, sharp, piercing through him like a blade, up through his body like a line of fire, ending deep within his chest and exploding outward, racing through every muscle and along every nerve ending like a river of molten lava.

Gasping for breath and struggling to free himself from the iron grip that bound him, he opened his eyes and knew where he was. And knew what was waiting for him; he had, after all, been here before, only this time . . .

Justin was standing there in front of him, hands braced against iron bars on either side of Brian's shoulders, and the look on his face . . .

Brian stared, and felt something vital, something irreplaceable, fracture and explode deep inside him, generating a physical and emotional agony that reduced the terrible pain that was blasting through his body to a trivial thing of no consequence. He felt the thick rod of flesh pounding into him, felt himself rip and tear and bleed, and still couldn't find it in his heart to care much, for the pain radiating from the core of his being was the only thing that mattered - a raging inferno that reduced everything else to ashes. For what he read in Justin's eyes was pure malice, and a towering, limitless, bottomless thirst for vengeance.

He turned his head and saw that the man behind him - the man who was plowing into his body with what felt like a battering ram - had a face that changed from one moment to the next. It was Ben; then it was Vic; then it was Rodney. Then it was the monolithic cretin who had tied him to these bars and tortured him with whips and knives and chains in the first place. Then, the faces shifted again - each uglier and more diseased than the one before. But, in the end, it didn't really matter, for they were all the same. They were all laughing, but none laughed louder than the young man who still stood looking straight into his eyes, the tears clinging to blond lashes expressing mirth rather than sorrow.

They were waiting for him to scream, to beg. But he wouldn't. Mostly, he wouldn't be able to speak at all, but he did manage to dredge up one word.

"Why?"

"So you get what you deserve." That face, so beloved, so cherished, was suddenly twisted into an ugly caricature of itself, filled with rage as it leaned closer. "And I get what I wanted - to fix it so you can never forget. So you understand what you lost, what you can never have again."

The sunshine smile was painful to behold. "What? Did you really think I was always going to come running back to you? Did you really think you were worth it?"

Brian closed his eyes, and, strangely, heard music again, something soft and melodic, working its way underneath the blood and the terror to touch a dark place deep inside him, something he could finally understand, and grasp. So he opened his eyes to watch as Justin turned and walked away, as the song swelled and filled his heart.
cause I need you more than I needed before, and now where I'll find comfort God knows, 'cause you left me just when I needed you most."*

He collapsed then, felt himself go limp and realized that he no longer cared what happened here, no longer cared about anything, as his only reason for caring was gone. Until a guttural, coarse voice muttered in his ear, and he realized that his assumption that nothing could hurt worse than what he'd already endured had been tragically, horribly wrong.

"He thinks he's safe," laughed the voice. "He's wrong. In the end, he's going to wind up facing the very same thing... That'll be his legacy - from you."

And just like that, he discovered the existence of a pain so deep, so integral to the person he was, that it defied imagining. It was then that he understood that all he really wanted, all that mattered now, was for it to be over. Everything he had done, everything he had tried to do, had mattered not at all; he had still managed to destroy the only thing he'd ever loved.

But he knew one thing for sure, knew that Justin was wrong in his assumption. Brian had always known that the day would come when the man who had claimed his heart would turn and walk away for the last time, would go and never return.

He had always understood that he was not worth the risk.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The cry was like something out of a nightmare - primal and raw and filled with such a dark intensity that it literally chilled the blood, and Chris McClaren was on his feet and leaping forward before he even realized that he was awake, as the last notes of Randy Vanwarmer's biggest hit faded to silence.

He didn't think, didn't observe, didn't even try to understand. He simply wrapped his arms around the man who had bolted upright in his bed, and held on, knowing that there was nothing more he could do.

He had been waiting for this - had understood that it must come sooner or later. Only, he had begun to fear that it never would.

Kinney was a special case, unique among all the victims he'd ever encountered - a victim who was determined not to be victimized, perpetually cool and composed.

Only he was neither cool nor composed now as he thrashed in McClaren's arms, struggling to free himself, to rid himself of the fragments of nightmare that still clung to him like chains, binding him tight within the bloodbath in his own mind.

"Let me go, let me go, let me go..." Each repetition was slightly louder than the one before, as Brian began to fight in earnest, to try to push himself upright and away from arms that restrained him; arms he did not recognize.

"Shit!" muttered McClaren, knowing that he dared not release the man who was in the grip of a panic which would not allow him to recall that he could not stand alone, that he would pay a huge price if he tried to climb out of his bed.

"Let me go, let me go..."

"Brian! Stop it. You're going to bust your stitches. At the very least. Be..."

"Let me go." Then a beat of silence, before the voice continued, rising now and strident with fear. "I have to find him. I have to tell him. Please, let me go."

He went silent then, but his body was still rigid, his muscles tensed and waiting for the right moment.

"Please let me go."

This time it was only a whisper, and there was no doubt that it was a plea, rather than a command.

"Sorry, Friend," said McClaren, knowing better than to relax his grip. "I can't do that. You're just . . ."

"But they're going to kill him. I can't . . ."

McClaren huffed his frustration. "Fuck it, Man. You're the one who nearly died. You're the one . . ."

Brian remained stiff and unyielding for a few seconds longer; then he seemed to fold in upon himself, and he let himself slump forward, coming to rest against the FBI agent's shoulder.

"Why?" he whispered. "Why did they . . ."

McClaren closed his eyes, looking for the right words and the right tone in which to speak them.

"Because it's a shitty world, Friend. Because there are people who can only justify their existence by trying to destroy those that are different. Because they only feel whole when they can tear someone else to pieces."

He lifted one hand to thread gentle fingers through Brian's hair. "Because they couldn't live with your beauty and your courage."

And, at that moment, Chris McClaren was granted the privilege of seeing something that only two people had been allowed to see in more than twenty years - Brian Kinney, weeping; something that his parents and his sister had not witnessed since he had grown old enough to go to school, something that most of the people who knew him at all would have denied as impossible. He did not sob, did not moan, did not wail. He just cried, exactly as he had when he was a very small boy - silently, hoping no one would notice. And, mostly, no one ever had. The FBI agent, sensing the rare quality of the moment, did not try to offer words of comfort. He simply held the lithe body against him, and rubbed soft, easy circles on Brian's back.

"Was Justin, was he . . . there?"

"What?" McClaren jerked back and tried to look into Brian's eyes, but that proved impossible, as they remained tightly closed. "Why would you think that? Of course, he . . ."

"But he will be. You need to . . ."

"What? What do I need . . ."

Very softly. "You need . . ." The explosion of motion and the burst of energy almost succeeded in throwing the FBI agent off the bed and gaining Brian the freedom he was trying to achieve, as the whisper became a near bellow. "You need to let me go. I need to find him."

"Son of a bitch!" snapped McClaren. "For a fag, you're a strong little fucker. Now stop that, before you do some real damage. Goddamn it!" He renewed his grip on the patient, struggling to subdue him, and raised his voice as he realized - belatedly - that he was going to have to call for help. "Shit! Somebody get in here and . . ."
The body that came racing through the door was only a blur in the dimness of the room, but McClaren was beyond caring which of the hospital staff or the security men might have answered his summons, as he was painfully aware that he was very close to losing control of both the situation and the man in the bed.

"Shit!" he muttered, as his chin came into direct contact with the upswing of Brian's elbow. "Just . . . fuck . . . grab his arm before he takes my fucking head off! What the . . ."

"Stop!"

Later, McClaren would spend a lot of time trying to analyze why he had reacted to that single, barked command by freezing in place and turning to stare at the new arrival. But then, he would recall the remarkable reaction by the other participant in their little fracas, and he'd conclude that he might have some small inkling of what had really happened.

Then he'd reconsider, and revert to thinking that he didn't really have a clue.

Nevertheless, the effect was instantaneous.

McClaren watched in stunned silence as a slender, blonde figure climbed up onto the bed, and settled against Brian's chest, arms lifting so that hands could thread through the dark locks which were not covered by swaths of bandage.

As for Brian, he took one deep, shaky breath, lifted a hand to cup the face of his new defender, and then immediately fell back against his pillow, slipping once more into an easy, tranquil sleep. As part of the same motion, the blond settled himself within Brian's arms, positioning himself so that the top of his head was tucked neatly under the chin of his former lover.

"What the fuck do you think you're doing?" McClaren demanded, although he was careful to keep his voice down, in the hope of avoiding more fireworks.

Justin adjusted himself so that his body was cradled against Brian's chest. "He has nightmares," he replied, by way of an explanation that didn't really explain anything.

The FBI agent almost snorted. "Of course, he does."

"What?" Justin retorted. "You haven't noticed?" His face was suddenly very pale, almost haunted. "He never talks about them, but he has them."

"You're not supposed to be in here," McClaren observed flatly.

Justin nodded. "I'll go. When he's settled down." His voice was very soft now, barely above a whisper. "I used to think that they started when I got bashed, but now . . . now I think they go deeper than that. I think he remembers things, things he's never told anyone. Not even me."

McClaren stepped up then, close enough to look down at Brian's face, close enough to lean forward and check his breathing and his pulse. "So," he murmured, "human after all, then?"

Justin laughed. "If you hadn't already figured that out, you're not as smart as you look, and not nearly smart enough to have any claim on . . ."

"On him?" McClaren allowed a tiny trace of annoyance to creep into his voice, and then was more than a little surprised to realize that it was genuine.

"Yeah. On him."
The FBI agent settled back into his chair and watched as Justin clasped Brian's arm to his chest.
"What were you doing hanging out in the hallway? Stalking?"

"You could say that."

"He doesn't want you here."

Justin hesitated, debating how to respond. Then he smiled. "Yeah. That's why he's sleeping like a baby, with me wrapped up in his arms." The smile faded. "You should know," he said slowly, "I'm not going to just give up and let you have him."

McClaren was equally careful in choosing his words. "Even if he loves me? Even if I turn out to be the one who can make him happy, make him forget the nightmares?"

The smile returned. "I've thought about that - a lot - in the last few days. But the bottom line is that you'll have to prove it to me."

"And if I do?"

Justin shifted around so he could stare at Brian's face, and reached up to smooth a lock of hair off his brow. "If you can really make him happy - happier than I can - then I'll walk away."

He sat up slowly, carefully easing his way out of Brian's embrace. Then he paused to look down at McClaren, and the smile was back. "But he's the only one who can make me believe it. Otherwise, you should just fuck off."

"Justin." McClaren's voice shifted into a lower pitch, and he was annoyed to note that there was a vein of uncertainty within it. "He's going to have a rough time for a while. He has to confront some things that he's never had to deal with before, things that you and the rest of his posse haven't even considered."

"Like what?" Flat, sharp, impatient, but filled with fear nonetheless.

McClaren sighed. "I know about what happened to you. At your prom, and . . ."

"He told you about that?" And there was no way of ignoring the depth of the pain contained in that simple question.

"Not exactly." The FBI agent knew that he should have just confirmed it, that it would have served to widen the gap that was forming between the former lovers, which would be exactly what Brian purported to want. But somehow, he just couldn't bring himself to do it. "But what happened to him - it's different. What that fucker did to you was an act of passion. It wasn't planned; it wasn't the result of a scheme to take your life away from you. It might have killed you, but it wasn't designed to punish, to inflict pain and suffering."

"Oh, sure," Justin snapped, voice dripping venom. "It was just a lovetap. Right?"

McClaren shook his head. "This . . ." he said, with a gesture that took in the condition of Brian's body, "this was a deliberate attempt to destroy the man he is, to punish him for being different, to strike such fear into him that he'll never be the same again. You don't know what it's like to realize that people can hate you that much, just because you're not like them. To be treated like you're some kind of sub-human monster. They tortured him, Justin. Everything they did - it was done to inflict horrible pain, to make him suffer. To make him regret everything in his life. To make him afraid and make sure that he could never regain his courage. It was payback, because he dared to face the world and refuse to hide himself away. That's . . . he's going to have to learn to live with that. It won't be easy, and it won't be quick. He's going to need time to figure it out."

Justin had risen by this time, and moved to stare out into the storm-lashed night. "And you know all this, how exactly?"

The FBI agent was almost startled into an ill-advised smile. The kid might look like Meg Ryan in drag, but he was no ditzy blonde. "Let's just say I've seen it before. For someone like Brian, someone who's always believed that he was in control of his life, it's going to be doubly hard, but until he learns to deal with it, there's no way he's going to heal from this, and no way he's going to be able to walk back out into the world and not see monsters on every corner. Every time someone looks at him, he's going to wonder who they are, and why they're staring at him. Every hand that reaches for him, every body that brushes against him . . . he's going to have to learn to accept the fact that there's never any way to be sure of how the people around you feel, and what they think - that safety is an illusion. That he's not invincible. He never was."

Justin closed his eyes, suddenly swept up in drifts of memory: Brian, as he'd been on the night they met - bare and beautiful and standing with his arms open, waiting for Justin to decide if he was coming - or going; Brian, as he'd stood waiting on a sidewalk, Gibraltar in a tide of uncaring humanity, there to give Justin a chance to spread his wings when he'd forgotten how to fly; Brian, risking everything, watching as his possessions were hauled away, facing bankruptcy and unemployment, but still managing to smile; Brian, standing alone and confronting the specter of cancer, determined to survive - or not - without relying on anyone's helping hand; Brian, struggling to make it across the finish line of the Liberty Ride, battered and weary - but unbowed; Brian, standing tall in the rubble of Babylon, filthy and bloodied and scared out of his mind, but radiant nevertheless.

But - finally - Brian, bludgeoned and bruised by life, but ultimately unbroken.

He smiled then, and McClaren felt a moment of intense jealousy, realizing that there was something here that he could not see, something that Justin knew that might very possibly never be known to anyone else.

"Yes. He is."

"Justin . . ."

"Your job," continued the blonde without missing a beat, "is to get him to remember it."

It was McClaren's turn to smile. "My job? So you're . . . what? Conceding defeat?"

"In your dreams," Justin retorted. "It's just . . ." His voice softened as he turned once more to gaze down at Brian's face, resting now in easy slumber. "Somebody's got to help him. If he won't let it be me, then you'll have to do." He looked up them and favored McClaren with a lopsided grin. "You're not quite the troll I thought you were."

The FBI agent could not quite swallow a quick burst of laughter. "You're too kind," he managed to retort.

"Just don't hurt him." There wasn't a trace of humor in that whispered comment that was as much entreaty as command.

"That's your area of expertise. Not mine." It was spoken so quickly that McClaren didn't even have time to regret the impulse before it fell into the air between them.

Justin's eyes were suddenly huge, and they both felt the surge of bright, vivid anger that flashed through him, that was almost powerful enough to compel him to spit out the denial that trembled on his lips.
Almost - but not quite. Justin had become extremely skilled in the twin arts of self deception and denial over the years, but he did not deal in lies.
The moment seemed to stretch out and surround them in heavy silence.
Until . . .
Bob Marley began to sing about Red, Red Wine, and they both relaxed into easy smiles, as Brian shifted in his bed, his breathing suddenly uneven.
"Got any Miles Davis on that thing?" asked Justin. "Or Coltrane?"
McClaren smiled. "My mother's family hails from Memphis. So what do you think?"
Justin nodded. "OK, then. A little lesson from freshman Kinney 101. When he's really tired or really troubled or just can't sleep, blues goes a long way to soothe the savage beast."
"I'll keep that in mind." A quick adjustment on the iPod found Monk's classic Straight No Chaser, and Brian settled once more into even breathing.
"Can I . . ." McClaren stood, and found it hard to speak what was in his thoughts. "Any messages?"
he asked finally.
"No." Huge blue eyes were now filled with shadow, and the soft glint of tears unshed. "He won't even remember that I was here. Will he?"
"Unlikely. The drugs he's on - they're pretty powerful."
Justin nodded and turned to walk away. Then he paused, and spoke without looking back.
"Whatever choice he ultimately makes, will you . . . could you make sure that he knows, when all is said and done, that I loved him. More than my life. More than I'll ever love anything else. And that I always will. Even if he never . . . " Then he drew a deep breath before completing the thought.
"Even if." There was, finally, nothing more to say.
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

1It's Not Over --- (Chris Daughtry) - Gregg Watenberg, Christ Daughtry, Mark Wilkerson, Ace Young
2 Crazy --- (Gnarls Barkley) - Brian Burton, Thomas Callaway, Gian Franco Reverberi, Gian Piero
Reverberi
3 Let the River Run --- Carly Simon
4 Let's Fall in Love Again --- Lou Rawls
5 When the Heartache Ends --- Rob Thomas
6 How's It Going to Be - (Third Eye Blind) - Stephen Jenkins, Kevin Cadogen
7 Just When I Needed You Most --- Randy Vanwarmer
~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~
tbc


Chapter 24

Waking was different these days.

He remembered a time - either fairly recently or ages ago, he couldn't really say which - when he had adored the sensation of waking at his leisure, cocooned in his cozy nest and luxuriating in the fact that he could choose whether or not to greet the day with energy and enthusiasm or simply slip back under the covers and drowse for as long as he liked. But, regardless of the method chosen, he had always made the transition from sleep to waking almost instantaneously, if not always enthusiastically.

That was no longer true. The process had changed.

Waking now was like stepping through a series of veils, each slightly less opaque than the one before it, ranging in color from a deep obsidian cobalt to the palest Alice blue.

Blue, of course. What else would it be? And would he ever again catch a glimpse of any variation of that color without comparing it to the only blue he ever truly wished to see again?

Shit!

It was harder to awaken now, even though he much preferred being awake these days, since the texture and the quality and the intensity of his dreams had changed so drastically.

Not that he hadn't had dreams before. He had always had dreams, but, until recently, he had been much more skilled at pushing them away and locking them into airless little vaults deep inside him, places which he would never choose to visit and from which those dark and twisted images could never escape.

Now, the vaults, it seemed, were full - almost bursting at the seams. Too full to contain the nightmares as efficiently as they once had.

Sometimes now, during the transition to waking, those images managed to wriggle free from their containment and follow him toward awareness.

. . . a pale spark of firelight, illuminating messy hair and a distinctive profile, barely glimpsed . . . and a voice that felt familiar, but not quite right . . .

Brian Kinney had never lived in fear. Not even at the worst moments of his life. Never . . . until . . .

. . . blood, bright as a fucking neon sign, pooling on dirty, cold cement, painting Rorschach inkblots on skin as pale as fresh cream, on a body limp and unresisting, cold and unresponsive under his hands, without a single nuance of breath or heartbeat to indicate that it was anything more than a lifeless mannequin.

Something in him had died that night, there in that dark, empty parking tower.

Something that had erupted out of his heart before falling, crushed and lifeless, into those dark vaults deep in his core; something he hoped never to see again.

He had learned what real fear was on that fatal evening, and it had taken up residence inside him, in the place vacated by . . . whatever it was that he had lost.

He had never quite succeeded in ridding himself of its toxic effects. It was still - and always would be - indelibly bound to his worst nightmare.

Still, the dreams that had assailed him lately, if not quite as unbearable as the piece de resistance of his collection, were proving difficult to manage. Like the one he'd endured just hours earlier. He did not remember details - a circumstance for which he was profoundly grateful - but he did retain bits and pieces of images. Enough, at least, to allow him to realize that something . . . something was different in this one; that he had seen something, or experienced something, or realized something that he had not confronted before.

Something that he was absolutely certain he did not want to know.

". . . most important lesson of your life . . ."

And then . . . something else that he not only wanted to know, but wanted to hold close to him . . . but couldn't.

He was shaken by a deep tremor, before deciding that it was better to waken than to linger on the fringe of sleep and risk epiphany.

When he opened his eyes, he found himself to be the object of scrutiny by three pairs of eyes, each conveying a different message - impatience, concern, and, in the case of Chris McClaren, something he could not quite identify.

The first and closest of them - as blue as any he'd ever seen (Goddamn blue . . . again!) - were staring at him with unveiled irritation, completely disinterested in whether or not he was ready or willing to awaken. Nurse Beck had informed him, during one of their remarkably frank little chats, that Rick Turnage would never win an award for his bedside manner. And she was dead right.

"Beauty sleep's over, Kinney," he said without preamble. "We need to get started."

Brian glanced toward the window, where the sky was still filled with storm clouds and rainwater still ran in rivulets down the glass. "If you'll check with my social secretary," he drawled, with a glance toward McClaren, "I'm sure you can schedule an appointment that isn't in the middle of the fucking night."

"It's after eight," said Turnage, sounding confused.

"Exactly." Brian closed his eyes, ignoring the grin on Matt Keller's face.

"Come on, Brian," said his primary physician. "Just answer a couple of questions, and you can go back to sleep. Until they bring your breakfast, that is - which should be in about five minutes."

"What is this?" Brian demanded. "A hospital or a torture chamber?"

Keller's smile was suddenly tender. "Now is that any way to talk to the man who just returned from a special excursion to Starbucks?"

One hazel eye opened, revealing a glimmer of interest. "Starbucks?"

It was a bit of a surprise to everyone in the room how quickly the patient was able to push himself to a sitting position and make a creditable grab for the tall cup the physician was holding.
"Ahh, not so fast," said Keller, just eluding the groping hand. "Questions first, latte later."

"Coffee first," retorted Brian, "or go find your own fucking answers."

"Oh, for Christ's sake!" snapped Turnage. "Give 'im . . ."

Chris McClaren shook his head and stepped forward, taking the Starbucks cup from Keller and then seating himself on the side of the bed to allow Brian easy access to the magic elixir.

"All right," said Turnage, after waiting just long enough to allow for a couple of swallows. "Provided you're sufficiently caffeinated now, maybe we can proceed. What I need, in order to finalize arrangements for your treatment, is photographs. Professional quality close-ups, if possible. From as many angles as possible. Do you have anything like that?"

Brian sipped again, and nodded. "Talk to Cynthia. There should be plenty in the files."

Turnage blinked. "You have professional photographs of yourself, in your business files?"

"It's an advertising agency, Doc," Brian replied, tongue firmly in cheek. "Image is everything."

"And besides," laughed Matt Keller, "he's Brian Kinney. Reigning king of Liberty Avenue, immortalized in song, story, and glossies in every gay magazine, newspaper, and nelly-bottom hope chest in the greater Pittsburgh area. One word, and you'll have more photos than you'll know what to do with."

Turnage, however, was no longer listening. He was focused instead on his Pocket Palm, busily entering notes and calling up data.

Brian lay back and turned once more to stare out the window, wondering briefly if the sun would put in an appearance today - or ever again. He was tired of the cold, tired of the grayness, and hungry for . . .

. . . warm, firm hands, ghosting over his skin as strong arms moved to wrap around him, and soft, familiar lips touched his throat, as a voice murmured against him. "He has nightmares . . ."

"Brian!" Chris McClaren was leaning over him, immediately aware that he had lost himself somehow, between one moment and the next.

"Someone . . . was here." It was just a whisper, barely audible.

McClaren stared down at him, before drawing a deep breath. He did not believe in lying to the individuals under his protection, and he would not start now. But he was tempted, for he was pretty sure he knew where this was leading. If he was correct, Brian was just taking the first steps on a very long, very difficult journey, and, uncharacteristically, he wished there was some way to spare the man the ordeal. But there wasn't. If he was ever going to be able to move beyond what he'd been forced to endure, he had to face what still lay ahead of him.

"Yes. Someone was."

Brian's eyes were suddenly filled with a bleak loneliness that was painful to witness. But it was a shadow that was gone almost before it could be seen, to be replaced by steady resolve. "Why?"

"You . . . had a rough night."

"Are you in pain?" Keller was standing close by, green eyes very bright in the morning dimness.
Brian huffed an impatient little sigh. "That brings up an almost irresistible urge to point out what bears do . . . in the woods."

Keller grinned. "I'll take that as a yes. However, Lt. Horvath called a few minutes ago and asked that we hold off on your joy juice for a bit. He needs to talk to you."

"But maybe," Brian pointed out - very reasonably, he thought - "I don't need to talk to him."

McClaren felt - and quickly suppressed - a surge of sympathy. He had realized, almost immediately, that Kinney was not and never would be one of those individuals who found catharsis or healing in the simple act of talking things out, but some things simply could not be overcome by avoidance. "No choice, Bud," he observed. "You probably don't remember it very well, but your first interview wasn't particularly productive. Just be grateful that he waited this long."

Brian shifted then, trying to find a comfortable position, and McClaren adjusted the bed controls accordingly, raising the head of the bed as Keller eased the patient up to allow him to reposition pillows and blankets, one arm bracing his longtime friend against his chest like a cherished infant.

"Fuck!" Brian snarled. "Would you please stop treating me like a fucking invalid!"

"Sorry, sweet cheeks," the physician replied easily, "but, for now, that's what you are. So . . ."

Both Keller and McClaren went silent, noticing a quick look of surprise in Brian's eyes as he moved to adjust his morning erection, some tiny little nuance of satisfaction in his expression indicating that he was delighted to find it just as firm and demanding as it had always been; then he felt something crinkle against his skin, something tucked into the strip of bandage that rode low on his torso.

"What is that?" asked Keller, as Brian extracted a folded piece of paper from its place against the softness of his belly.

McClaren smiled, remembering pale hands stroking and caressing a bare chest and the bandages that obscured parts of it, and pushing beneath blankets to touch whatever could be touched, as a slender body nestled against Brian's sleeping form. "Looks like someone . . . left a calling card."

"Well?" Keller, fully aware of his friend's hunger for privacy, carefully avoided letting his eyes drop to the crumpled slip of paper as Brian unfolded it and stared at it in silence, but he never took his eyes off Brian's face. Thus he saw, as McClaren did, the quick flicker of something in the depths of those hazel eyes - something there and gone within the space of a heartbeat.

"Nothing," Brian replied after the faintest hesitation. "It's nothing."

But when McClaren reached for the paper, Brian shook his head. "It's . . . private," he finally managed, tucking the note beneath his pillow and resolving any doubt that might have remained in the FBI agent's mind, about who had left the rumpled message.

"Fortuitously, from Brian's point of view, a disturbance at the door announced the arrival of a radiology tech with a wheel chair, precluding further conversation. "Mr. Kinney?" Brian managed - barely - not to wince away from the bright, cheerful greeting as a smiling middle-aged woman bustled into the room. "They're ready for you in x-ray."

Brian grimaced and glared at Matt Keller. "Not again. By the time I get out of here, I'm going to glow in the dark."

"Hey," replied Keller, raising his hands in quick denial. "This time, it's not me."
"That's true," said Turnage, still making entries on his PDA. "I ordered this set. I need to get a fresh perspective on how your healing is progressing, so we can determine when we can get you out of here."

The patient glowered. "I'd be doing handstands - and juggling - if I could just make myself believe that I won't be jumping out of the frying pan straight into the fires of hell."

Turnage blinked, but didn't argue. In fact, he shrugged. "How much is that face worth to you?"

Brian's gaze was remarkably steady. "Almost as much," he said flatly, "as it's worth to you."

The plastic surgeon watched in silence as the patient was transferred into the wheelchair and wheeled out into the hallway where two individuals waited to escort him down to the x-ray department - one uniformed police officer and one rather nondescript young man who would maintain a discreet distance from the subject of his surveillance, but would watch everyone and everything around him and be ready to act accordingly.

"Smart-ass!" It was barely a whisper, and Rick Turnage might not have even realized he'd spoken aloud, if Matt Keller hadn't snickered in response.

Brian's old friend regarded the plastic surgeon with a smug smile. "Trust me when I tell you," he said with an unmistakable air of satisfaction, "he's only just begun to confound you. I'm pretty sure that he's going to be your Starry Night but, by the time he's done with you, you'll be lucky if all you lose is an ear."

Chris McClaren allowed himself a small grin as the two physicians exited the room, still snarking at each other.

Then he did what he knew he must, although he wasn't particularly proud of himself for it.

Brian Kinney was a much more private man than most of his acquaintances would have believed, and McClaren respected that facet of the man's personality. But right now, under these circumstances, secrets were a luxury that Brian could not afford and his protector could not allow.

With a sigh, he pulled the slip of paper from the place where Brian had saved it, and read the lines scrawled upon it.

Then he wished he hadn't, as there was nothing there that anyone needed to know. It contained only the pain and hope of one heart, reaching out to touch another. But it was, of course, entirely too late to let it go unread - untouched - unsullied by the horrors of this serial tragedy.

I'll claim you
In the youth
Of some new existence,
Before there have been
Other promises
And old fears.

I'll look in fields
Where yellow flowers grow,
Remembering how you loved them so,
And on some hill
Where the wind blows free,
And sets the flowers dancing,
I'll hear you
Call my name,
And I will turn and you'll be there,
And I'll hold you again.*

McClaren spent a moment staring out into the gloomy morning before he carefully returned the folded, crumpled paper to its hiding place, handling it with the reverence it deserved.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

At this point, he thought, he had progressed beyond pitiful, all the way down to pathetic, which, of course, reminded him instantly of how that particular word sounded when employed as a condescending insult by one Brian Kinney.

But it was undeniable, nevertheless. When you'd sunk to the level where hospital cafeteria coffee had become acceptable - even passable - you had lost all sense of taste or propriety. Even though he'd never been a big coffee drinker - not nearly at the level, for example, of Brian Kinney, caffeine junkie - he was intimately familiar with the good stuff, as any Kinney associate would have to be.

But this - he stared down into his stained and discolored mug - this was something that one might use to peel paint from the walls, in a pinch. And yet, he drank it without complaint. In exactly the same way that he chewed on a bagel with the consistency of wet cardboard.

He could have called for aid, of course. His mother, Debbie, Cynthia, Daphne, Emmett - any or all of them would have come to his rescue, hauling in coffee and sustenance from Dunkin' Donuts or Starbucks or IHOP - or the Liberty Diner. All he had to do was ask. But somehow, he didn't, because he couldn't. And he hadn't a clue why not.

He could not explain it, but he felt compelled - more and more with every passing hour - to handle the situation without accepting help from anyone; it seemed somehow as if the real world around him was withdrawing inch by inch, falling away into a featureless blur.

Brian Kinney, rubbing off on him? Maybe. He didn't know. He only knew that he had to do this his way.

He spread a little cream cheese on his bagel, hoping to render it slightly less bland and more palatable, and thumbed through the slim book that lay on the table before him.

During this entire nightmare, he hadn't been able to find much for which to be grateful, beyond the obvious fact that Brian had survived his ordeal, after a fashion. But there had been one pleasant consequence. Much to his surprise - and almost against his will - he had made a new friend; someone who would never have been so much as a stray blip on his radar before he had come to this place and found his life caught up in tangled skeins of improbability. Which, he supposed as he took another sip of his coffee, served to prove that life did not progress by any definable logic.

Cedric Lasseigne had been sitting in the lounge area of the Rehab unit the first time Justin had walked into the area, looking for . . . in truth, he had no idea what he'd been looking for. Distraction, maybe? A cause to champion? A way to feel as if he could contribute something worthwhile? Or, perhaps, just a means to help him pass the time between one Brian sighting and the next. He still didn't know. But he was, nevertheless, grateful that he had made that particular choice, for it had provided an unexpected dividend.

There were a number of small tables scattered around the perimeter of the lounge area, and a number of different kinds of games in progress when Justin had wandered in. Dominos, checkers, several varieties of card games, even one Scrabble match, each drawing its own group of onlookers and hecklers. Patients, visitors, and staff members, all clotted together in pairs or trios or groups, interacting, chatting, sometimes squabbling.

Except for one person, seated alone at a small table near a corner window. The man was not particularly remarkable, except for the fact that he was the only person in the room who was not a part of a group and he had a thatch of silver white hair that was so bright it almost seemed to glow and so thick that it was literally standing on end. On the table before him, a chess board sat ready for use, complete with pieces, but he was not playing. Instead, his face was literally buried in a book, with several more stacked beside him on the corner of the table.

Justin was never quite sure what had drawn him toward the solitary figure, especially since his initial impulse had been to seek companionship elsewhere as the old man seemed a likely victim of Alzheimer's or some equally disturbing form of dementia. Yet, somehow, for reasons he would never fully comprehend, he found himself standing behind the man, reading the book titles over his shoulder.

"Hey," he said, recognizing an old, worn copy of Huckleberry Finn, "I've read that one."

Without missing a beat or raising his eyes, the elderly man replied, "Or course, you have."

Justin hesitated. "How do you know which one I'm talking about?"

"Have you read them all?" the voice - rough and heavily accented, but cultured nonetheless - retorted.

"No," Justin admitted, ducking his head to discern the other titles and finding none of them familiar.

Abruptly, the man closed his book and raised bloodshot gray eyes to meet Justin's gaze. "Veneration of Mark Twain is one of the roots of our current intellectual stalemate."

Justin blinked. "Huh?"

"Actually," replied the elderly man, "I was reciting it from memory. I'm afraid Mr. Toole was not terribly fond of dear old Clemens."

Interested in spite of a little voice in his head that was screaming that he should be running away as fast as he could, Justin took a seat across from the man, and regarded him steadily, noting pale skin, mottled with age spots and veined with a fine network of wrinkles, skin that was so thin it was almost translucent, and noble features that hinted of a strong bone structure beneath the ravages wrought by time. "I thought everyone loved Mark Twain."

"Mostly," said the man. "But Toole was nothing if not a contrarian. He found the greatest pleasure in exposing the clay feet of other people's sacred cows."

Justin opened his mouth to remark on the dangers of mixed metaphors, but closed it again as he realized that the comment, as stated, made a certain kind of twisted, sardonic sense, and, being a big fan of twisted humor, a la a certain Liberty Avenue stud, he decided to pursue a different verbal
The man closed his book and laid it on the table, pushing it forward so Justin could read the title, barely legible on the worn and faded cover. "A Confederacy of Dunces, by John Kennedy Toole," he read.

"Let me guess," said the older man. "You've never heard of it."

Justin shook his head. "Sorry."

The man shrugged. "It's your loss, Son. Not mine."

"It's that good?"

The man's smile was bittersweet. "I'm an old drunk who hails from New Orleans - traits that some sanctimonious individuals would probably describe as redundant," he replied, "and this book is . . . well, it contains the heart and soul of the life in my beloved city. It won the Pulitzer Prize in 1981, and the man who wrote it had been dead then - by his own hand - for more than ten years, never knowing that he had created a masterpiece. I always thought that was just wrong. If a man can create such an incredible work of art, shouldn't he know it? Shouldn't someone have recognized it while he still lived? And, if they had, might he have made different choices?"

Justin, for a moment, was caught up in thoughts of his own art and how it would feel if it should remain forever locked away from the individuals for whom he had painted it, if . . . someone should never see it. "Yes," he said softly. "Someone should."

"My name is Cedric Lasseigne," said the older man, holding out a gnarled hand to shake, "and I shouldn't presume to judge the book for you. You ask me if it's that good, and all I can honestly say is that it is, to me. You'd have to decide for yourself."

Justin grinned. "Isn't that what teachers are supposed to do? Tell people what they should and shouldn't like?"

Lasseigne's eyes skittered away from Justin's scrutiny. "I wouldn't know.

"I'm Justin," said the young artist. "Justin Taylor."

"And are you a reader, young Justin Taylor?"

Justin was surprised to feel a warm flush stain his cheeks. "Not so much," he admitted. "I've been busy."

Lasseigne smiled. "Yes, of course. The world is a busy place. But I repeat, it's your loss."

Justin gestured toward the chess set. "You play?"

One eyebrow - silver to match the hair - climbed toward the hairline. "No. I just like to sit here so I'll look like one of the intellectual snobs who do."

Justin's flush deepened. "I'm sorry. I don't mean to sound . . ."

"Condescending? Arrogant? Patronizing?"

"All of the above," the blond conceded.
Lasseigne laughed, and, despite the hoarseness that betrayed a lifelong addiction to nicotine, the sound was rich and full and pleasant. "I'm a southerner, Young Taylor. Not an imbecile. And as hard as it might be for a product of Pennsylvania Social Register breeding to understand, the two are not necessarily synonymous."

Justin grinned. "Faulkner was a southerner. And Caldwell, and Tennessee Williams and Thomas Wolfe. And Harper Lee."

The southerner's eyes softened a bit, as he looked at Justin - really looked at him - for the first time. "And you've read them all, no doubt."

"No." The flush was back and heating up. "But I've read some of them."

Lasseigne grinned. "Let me guess. American Lit 101."

"Well, yeah. Mostly. But I have seen A Streetcar Named Desire, like a dozen times, and I actually read To Kill a Mockingbird, just because a friend . . . just because I found it lying on a friend's bedside table."

The flush grew even deeper as he recalled the first time he'd come across the book, as he'd knocked it to the floor in a mad, desperate scramble for condoms and lube.

There was no way, of course, for Lasseigne to discern the reason for his embarrassment, but a glint in the man's eyes suggested that he might be seeing more than he should. "A very good friend, no doubt."

"Yeah. He . . . is." And he could not quite avoid the flinch that touched him as he realized he'd almost spoken in the past tense.

Lasseigne regarded him in silence for a moment or two, and, once again, Justin had a strange feeling that the man was looking straight through him, and seeing things he should not have been able to see. "So," he said finally, "are you open to new experiences, young Justin? Would you care to explore more of the work of southern writers?"

Justin shrugged. "Sure. Only . . . no Faulkner, OK? I don't need any help in finding things to be depressed about."

Lasseigne smiled, and Justin found that he was beginning to bask in the warmth of the old man's hard-won approval. "In that case," said Lasseigne, as he extracted a slender volume from the stack before him, "we'll start with baby steps. Which, with poetry, is sometimes a very good thing. Just give this one a try."

Justin accepted the small book, noting that it was just as worn as the others in the stack, and that the faded gilt of the title was barely legible. When he prepared to open it, the old man reached out and stopped him. "Just . . . let it open, at random," he suggested. "With poetry, it either grabs you, or it doesn't, and logical progression is not part of the process."

Justin managed - barely - not to roll his eyes, thinking to himself that his first impression might have been right after all; the man was certainly old enough to be experiencing bouts of dementia.

Then he opened the book and scanned the lines printed there.

And understood exactly what the old man had been trying to tell him, as he read about a star that had thrown its fire against the heavens and grown cold and died long before the poet was born, and he felt his breath catch as certain lines seemed to reach for him, to touch him with gentle fingers and explore the limits of his heart.

Lasseigne had simply smiled, and when they'd parted company later that day, after a hard-fought chess game and discussions over subjects ranging from the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina to Broadway's reception of Jersey Boys to the merits of Creole cooking as opposed to Tuscan cuisine, Justin had walked away with the book of poetry tucked under his arm, a gift from a friend he had not expected to make.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*.

Somehow, the sweet, short verses had become his mantra, his means of coping with the tiny victories and defeats of each day, and today would be no exception. He heard them constantly now - in the percussive rhythm of rain against the windows, in the cadence of footsteps hurrying down the hallway, in the babble of voices in the waiting rooms, and the rise and fall of traffic in the streets; they had become the background music of his life.

He sat and played with the handle of his coffee cup, and flipped the book open. By this time, it was as if it had been trained to open to the right page, and the words touched him again, as they always did.

It does not matter.
For it is the light
I follow,
Not the star.
It is the beauty,
Not the source.*

He could not explain exactly why it meant so much, or why it translated as it did in his thoughts. He only knew that it was Brian's face he saw as he read it, and Brian's voice he heard reciting it in his mind.

He closed the book and tucked it safely into the backpack beside him - safe and protected and waiting for the right moment, when it could be offered as a gift, the perfect means for conveying the perfect message, undoubtedly inspiring the recipient to respond with a perfectly beautiful, characteristic smirk.

Sometimes he thought he couldn't stand to wait another minute; sometimes he thought he would wait forever, if that's what it took.

"Well, well, well." The voice was sharp and hard as a blade. "The prodigal returns."

Justin didn't need to look up to identify the speaker, so he didn't. He found it much easier to contemplate the dark sludge in his cup than the malice he knew he would see in night dark eyes.
"Hello, Ethan. I thought you were off serenading the crowned heads of Europe, or something."

"I was." The violinist dropped into the chair opposite Justin's, and clasped his hands in front of him. "But one grows weary of all the glitz after a while, and longs for the simple life."

Justin grinned, unable to contain the urge. "You could always go back to peddling your art on street corners. That's pretty simple."

He looked up then, just in time to surprise a fleeting look of outrage in those dark eyes before it was quickly suppressed. One quick sweeping glance revealed that Ethan's life had been good, of late, if the well padded body was an accurate indicator. He wasn't actually fat - probably never would be, given his frenetic metabolism - but he had definitely not been going hungry. Of course, even if he'd still been rail thin, the beautifully tailored Hugo Boss jacket would have proclaimed his success resoundingly. Justin wondered if the violinist had chosen the style and designer out of some subconscious urge to try to one-up a certain stylish ad exec. He allowed himself a little smile as he realized that, if that had been the goal Ethan set for himself, he had failed miserably, as nobody wore Boss quite as spectacularly as Brian Kinney.

"That's something I don't miss in the least," said the fiddler. "My days of scrambling for pennies are long gone."

Justin nodded. "So I hear. Your tour was a success then?"

"As if you didn't know," retorted Ethan. "I'm sure you followed my progress. Madrid was wonderful, but Berlin . . . ahh, Berlin was a particular triumph."

"I'm sure it was," Justin replied. "Your grandfather would have been proud."

"Yeah. He would. So . . . what about you? Rumor has it that you were the toast of the New York art world. Until you threw it all away to come running back to Pittsburgh, to resume your post as boytoy to the mighty Kinney. But wait; he's not so mighty any more. Is he?"

Justin closed his eyes and swallowed the resentment that was threatening to choke him, knowing that an outraged response was exactly what Ethan was hoping to provoke. So, instead of venting his anger, he managed a cold smile. "What is it - exactly - that you want here, Ethan? I'm sure you have more important things to do."

"Not really. I guess it's petty of me, but I couldn't quite resist the urge to find out how it feels. What it's like to have deserted the person who should have been your soul-mate, the love of your life, to go running back to a beautiful face and body that's nothing more than a memory now. Tell me, can you even stand to look at him now?"

Justin finished the last of his coffee, and gathered his trash before rising to depart. He had meant to go without saying anything, but he found, ultimately, that he wasn't quite noble enough or forgiving enough to manage that. So he chose to express himself instead, speaking very softly. "First of all, Ian . . ." He surprised himself with a quick, brilliant smile "you were never my soul-mate, nor the love of my life. You were just a convenient fuck who managed to convince himself that he was so superior to everyone else - so prodigiously gifted - that he was above the constraints of such elementary things as common decency and honesty. And second of all, if you think that Brian's beauty has anything to do with his face or his form, then you're even more stupid and superficial than I thought you were when I left you." He turned away then, but paused before making good his escape to look back once more. "And thirdly, if you're very, very lucky, you might find out one day that setting the world on fire - music or art or whatever world it might be - means nothing if your heart is empty while you do it."
The violinist started to rise, the anger in his eyes fading abruptly to be replaced by something shifting and indistinct. "Justin, wait. I wanted . . ."

"Oh, and by the way," Justin interrupted. "I forgot to thank you. I'm not sure how you found out so quickly, unless you were keeping tabs on us while you were out conquering the music world, which would seem a little pathetic to me, but - hey, what would I know about life in the musical stratosphere - but if you hadn't been kind enough to send me that tabloid photo, I couldn't have gotten here so quickly."

The violinist's anger returned in full force. "You're making a fool of yourself. Word on the street is that he doesn't even want you here. So how long are you going to hang around, like some pathetic little lap dog, waiting for him to fuck you over again?"

Justin's eyes were suddenly very soft and unfocused. "As long as it takes, for I can't think of anything I would rather do than get fucked - over or otherwise - by Brian Kinney."

Anger fading again, giving away this time to desperation, and there was no disguising it. "No. Justin, please. I've never been able to let go of . . . us. Brian's gone, and, with him out of the picture, you and I can have it all. A perfect beautiful life. I can give you everything you ever wanted, everything he was never willing to give you."

Abruptly, Justin was no longer angry; instead, he felt only pity. "Ethan, there is no us, and whatever I might want, you can't give me, because it's Brian that I want. He's everything to me. And he will never - never - be gone, because he lives . . ." His smile was achingly gentle as he touched his fingers to his chest, "right here."

"No, Justin," Ethan cried, "You can't just walk away. You can't . . ."

"Ethan, I love Brian; I always did. I just let myself get distracted by you and your romantic bullshit because I was young and stupid and I didn't understand what I really wanted. Now, I'm sorry. I don't mean to hurt you. But you and I were just . . . a mistake. That's all."

"He turned you against me," snarled the fiddler. "That's all he ever wanted."

"No, he didn't," Justin answered gently. "You managed that all by yourself."

He sighed then, as he saw the cold, hard brilliance flare to life once more in Ethan's eyes and knew that there would never be forgiveness in the musician's heart; he would forever see Brian as the enemy, the man who had stabbed him in the back and stolen what should have been his. He would never understand that Justin had never belonged to him in the first place, that Justin had always belonged to Brian.

The cold, bitter stare was unnerving and served to suggest that Ethan would bear watching.

Justin turned and walked away, wondering idly just how many enemies Brian had managed to make for himself in the course of his lifetime.

And the answer, he thought, was frighteningly simple. Too many.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

"Here! Wrap up in this."

Brian turned toward the speaker just in time to snag a woven blanket out of the air, to prevent it from dropping over his head. "What the fuck?"
"Wouldn't want you to get cold," replied Chris McClaren, as he took his place behind Brian's wheelchair, dismissing the radiantly adolescent volunteer who had been instructed to escort the patient back to his room. The girl, blonde and pretty in a delicate, porcelain-doll way, looked as if she might want to argue, pale gray eyes regarding her charge with more than a trace of interest as she recalled the laughter they'd shared about Carrie Underwood's methods for dealing with a cheating boyfriend in her hit song that was just barely audible on the girl's iPod. In the end, however, she settled instead for blushing in response to Brian's murmured word of thanks and the slow smile that bandages could not quite obscure, prompting the FBI agent to note her dreamy-eyed stare and realize that Kinney's charm was not only a lot deeper than he'd originally realized, but was also virtually without conscious volition. It was as natural and effortless as breathing, and he wondered how many nights the girl would spend fantasizing about something that was not even remotely possible, although there was no way for her to know that. Unless she was a tabloid reader, of course.

Brian adjusted the waistband of the silk pajamas that Cynthia had run out to buy for him on the occasion of his awakening from his coma - Brian Kinney, after all, would not be caught dead, or comatose, in a dowdy hospital gown - and pulled the collar of his cashmere robe more tightly around his torso as he raised a cryptic eyebrow toward his FBI protector. "Unless you're planning an Arctic expedition, I think I'm dressed appropriately."

"Not to mention elegantly," replied McClaren, speculating on whether or not the cinnamon-colored robe might have cost more than one of the suits he usually wore to the office when he was not in undercover mode. (It had.) He then stepped forward to spread the blanket across Brian's lap, before returning to his position behind the wheelchair. "No Arctic explorations," he explained, digging in his pocket to extract a bright rectangular box. "Just thought you might be up for a little foray into Marlboro country."

Brian grinned. "'You keep this up and you might even turn out to be remotely fuckable."

"You wish," McClaren laughed, and then deliberately looked away so he would not see the quick smile that just touched the sensual lips barely visible beneath snowy bandages.

"So," Brian said softly as he was propelled toward a sliding glass door that opened onto a covered terrace, "what's this going to cost me?"

McClaren shrugged. "I figured it'd be easier to face your third degree if you can feed your nicotine addiction at the same time."

Brian grinned. "And you need a cigarette every bit as much as I do."

The FBI agent knew there was no point in denying it. "That too. You're a terrible influence."

"It's my calling in life," Brian replied, taking a deep breath as they emerged from the building. It was silly, of course, to entertain the notion that a single inhalation of decidedly damp, undoubtedly polluted city air could cleanse the lungs of all the toxic residue of a hospital environment . . . but he couldn't ignore the fact that it felt ridiculously therapeutic. Of course, with his next breath, he would take in a whole new set of toxins, the kind with which he'd been poisoning himself since he was fourteen years old.

"God bless Phillip Morris," he exclaimed as he felt the familiar burn fill his lungs, and the first hint of the buzz that a renewed acquaintance with nicotine would provide.

"You know," McClaren said slowly, after lighting his own Marlboro, "you could treat this as an opportunity to break a really bad habit."
"Said the pot to the kettle," Brian pointed out with a grin. "But you're missing the point. My addictions are the things that see me through the bad times, so why mess with success?"

"You do know that smoking causes wrinkles, don't you?" Only after he'd spoken did McClaren recognize the horrible irony of what he'd said, as he realized that he was grateful for the bandages that still obscured most of Brian's face, making it unnecessary for him to read the grimace of pain he was certain his remark had caused.

"Not a problem any more," Brian replied, very softly, head back and eyes half-closed. "Besides, excuse me while I enjoy the first rush I've had in weeks, so kindly keep your observations to yourself."

"I'm sorry, Kinney. That was a thoroughly stupid, thoroughly brainless thing to say."

"True though." The response was flatly spoken, unemotional. "And that's the one thing that I appreciate more than any other." He opened his eyes then, and regarded his protector steadily. "So do us both a favor, and don't start second-guessing what you say to me. I don't need empty reassurances or pious platitudes or subtle evasions. You speak your mind, and I'll speak mine, and we'll get along just fine. And if you're occasionally insensitive, I promise not to go all Lana Turner on you. I'm a lot less fragile than you apparently think I am."

McClaren was startled into a broad grin. "On, no, Stud. Whatever else I might think of you, I know you're not fragile. In fact, you're probably one of the toughest motherfuckers I've ever come across. So let's make a deal, shall we? Because of the circumstances, we both have to go through this charade. Play the game, so to speak. But between the two of us, truth. Just truth. Okay?"

"Truth," replied Brian, with a droll smirk, "or nothing at all."

McClaren laughed. "You always leave yourself an escape hatch, don't you?"

"Be grateful for what you got," Brian chuckled. "Now shut up and enjoy your vice, unless, of course, you think you could score something a little higher on the scale of intoxicants."

"I'm an FBI agent," McClaren retorted, as he blew out a series of smoke rings.

"Which means your sources are top of the line."

The agent snickered. "Yeah. They are."

"I'm going to pretend," said Detective Carl Horvath as he stepped through the doorway, "that I didn't hear that."

"But I'm not." Emmett's eyes were bright with laughter as he came forward and wrapped Brian up in a hug that was almost strong enough to make the patient flinch away from the grip. Almost.

"Welcome back to the real world, Baby," Emmett breathed as he dropped a kiss on the dark thatch of Brian's hair.

Despite the fact that he rather enjoyed Emmett's gentle touch, Brian looked up at him with wary eyes. "What are you doing here?" he asked, none too patiently.

The third member of the newly arrived group moved forward then, reaching out to just touch Brian's arm in a gesture that was half greeting, half comfort offered. "You brought him into this," said Lance Mathis, "by putting him in charge of Babylon. He's here because he needs to be kept in the loop, so he can take appropriate measures to protect your business, your patrons, and your friends."
Brian did not exactly roll his eyes, but he came very close. "Okay," he said finally, turning his head to look up at his chief interrogator, "let's get this over with. What exactly do you want?"

Carl moved around to take a seat on weathered wooden bench at the outer corner of the covered terrace, checking all around to make sure they would not be overheard by any eager eavesdropper. "I want," he said firmly, "to know anything you might have remembered since our last discussion."

Brian was silent for a moment as he watched how the group sorted itself for participation in this little contretémp. Horvath faced him squarely - of course - but both Emmett and Mathis chose to take places to his right, relatively close to him, as if to spring to his defense if necessary. Most interestingly of all, however, Chris McClaren remained standing at his back, his arms braced against the top of the wheelchair, with his hands only inches away from Brian's shoulders. For a brief moment, Brian actually turned to look up at him, as if to question what exactly he thought he was doing. But in the end, he chose to say nothing, feeling just slightly comforted by the warmth at his back, until he realized that it was inappropriate to take comfort from such an ambiguous detail, and decided, instead, to give in to his annoyance.

Thus, when he decided to answer Horvath's question, his tone was decidedly antagonistic. "What makes you think I've remembered anything more? I told you what I had to tell you."

Horvath remained placid and unperturbed. "I'm asking," he said quietly, "because this is not my first rodeo, Mr. Kinney." The form of address was deliberate, and Brian recognized it as such. This was not his best friend's pseudo-stepfather speaking to him, nor the soul mate of the woman who was - sometimes - his alternative mother. This was a well-trained, highly skilled detective with the Pittsburgh PD, and Brian understood that he needed to remember that. "I've dealt with this kind of assault before, and while there are instances when the memories are never recovered, that usually happens with people who . . ." He paused for a moment, and Brian noted the soft trace of sympathy that flared in the man's eyes. "People who are too frail or too frightened - or maybe just too young - to be able to deal with them." Then he smiled. "Granted, you're a lot of things, Friend, but frail or frightened just doesn't apply."

"You forgot young," Brian pointed out - deadpan.

Horvath grinned.

Brian took a moment to consider his response and take another deep drag from his cigarette. Then he nodded. "Okay. Yeah, I've remembered a little bit more. But it's all just bits and pieces. I can't make sense of it, can't quite connect the dots. Yet."

Horvath nodded and took a deep breath. "My better half suggested that I take cover before making this suggestion to you, and I'm pretty sure she's right. I should probably be wearing body armor."

"How is Debbie?" Brian asked quickly, wanting to know and, at the same time, dreading it.

"Concerned. Upset."

"Pissed off at me?" Though it was worded as a question, it was pretty obvious that Brian already knew the answer.

"You hurt him pretty badly, Brian. But then you already know that. Don't you?"

Brian chose not to answer.

Horvath's smile was weary. "You don't have to say anything. I already know."
It was Emmett that turned to stare at the detective then, green eyes alight with speculation. "Do you? Have you really figured it out? That's surprising, Carl. Some of us have been stumbling around in the dark for years, and still aren't sure we see the whole truth."

The detective glanced at Brian, noting the growing disquiet in dark, stormy eyes. "That's because some of you - most of you - are so caught up in how you feel about certain things, that you can't be objective. I don't have that problem."

Chris McClaren tried not to laugh, but was not entirely successful, so that he was forced to try to disguise his chortle as a wheezing cough. He thought he was moderately successful, except of course for the one person he most wanted to fool. Brian's eyes glinted ice cold as he turned and looked up at his FBI protector.

"So what 'suggestion' do you require protection for?" demanded Brian, once McClaren had been glared into silence.

"I realize," Horvath replied slowly, "that it's a matter of some pride to you that you've managed to handle almost everything in your life, without requiring any assistance from anyone. I even realize that you're probably infuriated that you have to allow people to look out for you now, and try to keep you safe from further harm. But that's just the way it has to be, and you're going to have to learn to live with it, for as long as it takes. But . . . you're never going to be able to get past this, to put your life back together and regain your ability to face whatever the world throws at you, until you let somebody help you."

"Such as?" The tone and the words were clipped and frozen and as rough as dirty ice.

Chris McClaren took a deep breath. "He's right, Brian. You can't do this alone."

"I've been doing it 'alone' my whole life." Brian's voice was very low, very steady.

"I know that." It was, somehow, suddenly as if only the two of them - protector and protected - were alone in the world as McClaren leaned forward to drape his arms around Brian's shoulders and speak directly into his ear, while the rest of the group suddenly seemed to take a metaphorical step back, to focus on fresh spates of rain blowing off the roof or the spiral of smoke from Brian's cigarette or the pattern of cracks in the concrete floor. Indeed, on anything but the two principles of the scene. "But you've never had to come back from something like this. Never."

"I'm a fag," Brian sneered, twisting to look up into brilliant blue eyes, and struggling to pull free of the arms that restrained him. "A queer. A cocksucker - and I've been hated for it my whole life. You think I'm going to let these . . . these fuckers break me? You think . . ."

McClaren held on, not tight enough to inflict pain or damage, but tight enough to prevent Brian from twisting free. "Yeah, I know. You've been hated, like every homosexual has been hated. But, until now, no one was ever bold enough to try to make you pay for it. No one ever hated enough to torture you, to try to destroy you. To make it personal, about you. And that kind of hatred - it's not something that you can choose to tolerate or understand. And it's not something you can just shrug off. You need help."

Brian pushed then, pushed hard in an attempt to free himself, but he had still not regained all his strength, and McClaren was a young man in his prime and well trained in the physical arts. "Stop it!" he snapped. "I'm not going to let you go. And I'm not going to let anybody hurt you - ever again."

But if he'd expected Brian to give in easily, he'd been very much mistaken. "I am not some pathetic little weakling who needs your protection." Brian was almost snarling and managed, finally, to push McClaren moved quickly to a position at Brian's feet and stared up at him, his eyes clear and filled with resolve. "Nobody is ever going to mistake you for a weakling, Brian. But all of us need help sometimes. Even you."

"And you?" Brian retorted. "If this is True Confessions, let's hear about your needs."

McClaren grinned. "OK. I'll show you mine if you'll show me yours. Only . . . can we delay the soul-baring for later? Right now, we need to concentrate on trying to catch the motherfuckers who did this to you. And, in order to do that, you're going to have to face your memories. All your memories."

Brian huffed an impatient sigh. "Look, I don't know anything. I haven't remembered anything new except for a few bits and pieces."

McClaren nodded. "But you will, because it's all there inside you. You just need a little help to grab it."

Brian looked up then and found himself the object of scrutiny of the entire group. "Fuck therapy!" he snapped. "I'm not talking to any shrink."

"Hey," said McClaren quickly. "There are shrinks, and then, there are shrinks. And I'm not talking about therapy. Not any kind that you'd recognize anyway. You just need to talk to the right person."

"What the fuck are you babbling about?" Brian's patience was obviously at an end.

"I'll tell you later."

Brian rolled his eyes. "Why don't you do something useful then, and give me another cigarette?"

McClaren hesitated for a moment, studying the shadows moving in hazel eyes, before nodding and pulling two fresh cigarettes out of the pack, somewhat surprised to realize that he and Kinney had reached a point where they were able to communicate without the actual need for words.

"What about your leads?" he asked Horvath as he returned to his place behind the wheelchair. "The pawn shop? The watch?"

Carl smiled. "Well, there's good news and not so good news. You'll be glad to know that we got your watch back, Kinney."

"Okay."

"Okay? That's all you have to say?"

"What did you expect me to say?"

"Oh, I don't know," said Lance Mathis. "Maybe, thanks for getting my $30,000.00 watch back."

"Fuck the watch! Did you get the guys who hocked it?"

"Bloodthirsty little shit, aren't you?" McClaren muttered.

Horvath struggled to suppress a smile, surprised to discover that he was enjoying the repartee between the two young men. "Actually, that's one reason I wanted to talk to you. I have some photos for you to look at, to see if you recognize anyone."
Brian sighed. "I'll take a look, but I don't know if it'll do any good. I didn't get a good look at all their faces, although I got to know their fists fairly up close and personal."

Horvath nodded, glad to see that the infamous Kinney sarcasm was still working at peak efficiency. "You needn't worry. We have plenty of forensic evidence to connect these punks to the crime, even if you can't identify them. They're going down for this. No doubt about that, but the problem is that these two were just hired muscle. It doesn't look as if they had any direct contact with the masterminds behind the whole thing, although it's still possible that they know more than they're saying. One thing's for sure though. They're scared shitless, which would seem to indicate that they know enough to figure that keeping their mouths shut is their safest bet."

"So they're a dead end?" Brian said slowly.

"Not necessarily," answered Lance Mathis. "They're in custody, and the cops are still working on them. Plus there's the fact that they were part of the mob that almost killed you, Brian, and it doesn't really matter why they did it. Whether or not they provide any more information, they're going to get what's coming to them."

Brian nodded. "Let me see the photos."

Horvath stood and extracted a sheaf of documents from a briefcase and handed them to Brian, who hesitated before accepting them. "And by the way," said the detective, "we do have some promising leads - things that have nothing to do with these two thugs. This investigation is far from over."

Brian sighed, and regarded the detective with a skeptical gaze. He did not actually state that he was very good at recognizing bullshit when he heard it, but it was in his eyes.

Then he looked down at the documents he held in his hand, scanning from one face to the next. Twelve individuals, two photos each. Mug shots, he supposed, since the shots featured full face and profile. Most of them were unfamiliar. Until he glanced at the first face on the bottom row of the second sheet.

Sharp, aquiline features, deep-set dark eyes, a nose that had been broken sometime in the not-too-distant past, and a spider tattoo just below the ear, a tattoo he had seen before, although he had not remembered it until this moment. Brian closed his eyes, and heard the echo of a voice as it snarled in his mind. "Somebody give me a knife and . . ."

"This one," he said, speaking clearly and refusing to allow any trace of a tremor in his voice. "I think I broke his nose."

"Excellent," answered Horvath, not even trying to hide the note of approval in his voice. "Anyone else?"

Brian shook his head. "Sorry. That's the only one I recognize."

A sudden gust of wind drove a spate of raindrops into the covered area, and Brian shivered, prompting McClaren to pull the wheelchair further back under shelter, allowing them all to pretend that the reaction had been due to the chill in the air, rather than the memories dredged up by the photograph. "Turning nasty out here," said the FBI agent. "Let's get you back inside."

But fate was not quite finished with young Mr. Kinney yet. As he was turned toward the building, a slender figure came through the door, so intent on lighting the cigarette dangling from perfectly molded lips that he did not see who was coming toward him until they were almost face to face or, more literally, knee to knee.
Everyone froze, as no one could figure out what to say to ease the awkwardness.

No one except Brian Kinney, who would probably have been just as speechless as everyone else if he'd only stopped to consider, but he didn't.

"You smoke too much," he said softly, going very still as he drank in the sight of the young blond who had frozen in place when he'd realized who was looking up at him. Huge blue eyes seemed even bluer than usual as they reflected the flame of the match he was still holding.

Justin did not bother to try to suppress the grin that touched his face. He could see nothing of Brian's expression, and there was no opportunity to evaluate body language as his former lover was completely swathed in clothing, bandages, and blankets, except for one tantalizing patch of bare skin just visible within the collar of the robe. But there was, nevertheless, no mistaking that sardonic wit, biting but contained perfectly within four precise words.

"I enjoy my addictions," Justin answered.

At that instant, the flame flared against his fingers and he dropped the match. "Shit!"

Brian chuckled, knowing he shouldn't but unable to restrain himself. "The obvious thing to say would include a reference to 'playing with fire', but I don't think I'll say it."

"Right. No one could ever accuse Brian Kinney of being obvious. You . . . all right?" Justin took a deep breath, unwilling to let the moment go.

"Yeah. You?"

The grin flashed again. "Better now."

Another pause - roughly nine months pregnant. "You shouldn't be here."

Justin shrugged. "Yes, I should."

Brian stiffened, already regretting his unguarded moment. "No, you . . ."

Leaning forward abruptly, Justin reached out and stroked his hand over that small patch of skin, ignoring Brian's slight recoil. "Save your breath," he whispered. "I'm not leaving."

Brian looked away quickly, but not quite quickly enough to prevent Justin from spotting the swift stirring of shadows in the depths of those incredible hazel eyes.

He wanted to speak out, wanted to fall to his knees and beg Brian to put an end to this charade and open his arms and heart to allow Justin to return to the place where he belonged - the place at Brian's side. But he was too slow and too uncertain and too afraid to risk inciting Brian's anger, so he said nothing, watching in silence as Brian left him there, alone against the backdrop of the growing storm with Ethan's taunts still echoing in his mind.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

"Your photographer is very good," said Rick Turnage as he inspected the array of photographs spread out over the polished fruitwood surface of Cynthia's desk.

She nodded. "Only the best for Kinnetic . . . and the model's not bad either."

The surgeon nodded his agreement. "He said that all this is just part of his business. Is that true?"
Cynthia's smile was of the Cheshire cat variety. "True enough," she explained. "But if you're asking if there's an element of narcissism in having that face immortalized in a series of Kodak moments . . ." She shrugged. "He's Brian Kinney, a man with his fair share of flaws, but false modesty isn't one of them."

"Well, in this case," Turnage replied slowly, as he selected three of the shots and tucked them carefully into his briefcase, "it's a stroke of luck that we have them. Reconstructing a face is always easier when there's a perfect image of what one is trying to achieve."

Cynthia sat back in her custom leather executive chair and regarded him with a pensive expression. "Can you really do that?" she asked finally. "Can you really restore him?"

"If I can't," the surgeon answered absently, once more caught up in studying one of the photos before him, "no one can."

Cynthia laughed. "You and he should get along just fine, provided you don't kill each other along the way."

"He could have been a model," Turnage observed.

"He was," she replied, opening a file drawer in the credenza behind her desk and extracting a slender folder. When she opened it and laid it before him, he saw a glossy magazine ad featuring a buff, beautiful young body on a surfboard, acres of golden skin gleaming under brilliant sunlight. It was not a close-up shot so the face was not distinct, but the figure was, nevertheless, unmistakable.

"The Freemont-Briggs people offered him a fabulous contract. Wanted to make him the poster boy for their BareBronze suntan oil. That one ad increased their sales by almost thirty percent."

"But he turned them down," he said quietly, not really asking.

She smiled. "And I'll bet you know why."

"Because the one in front of the camera is not the one calling the shots."

"Precisely. And I think Brian always knew he was meant for bigger things, from his perspective anyway. He was in college at the time, so he definitely enjoyed the money they paid him, but it was never more than a means to an end."

Turnage looked up then, his eyes taking in the elegance of the setting, and the woman at its center. "Can you handle all this? While he's gone, I mean."

She leaned back and regarded him coolly. "It's a lot to manage," she admitted, "but he seems to think I can. I've spent many years trusting his judgment, so it's a little late to start doubting him now. How long do you think he'll be gone?"

"That depends."

"On what?"

He took a deep breath. "On how successful my efforts are, how quickly he heals, and . . ."

"And?"

"On . . . when he considers himself ready to face the world again."

She smiled. "You almost said 'if', instead of when. Didn't you?"
Turnage frowned, obviously annoyed. "Do you second guess him too?"

"Every day," she laughed. "It irritates him too, but it allows us to work together almost seamlessly."

"He's asking a lot of you," he observed. "I hope you're well compensated for your efforts."

She paused for a moment before answering, and something in her tone suggested that he had struck a particular nerve. "In ways you could never imagine," she answered finally. "So, in Kinney vernacular, don't fuck this up, Doctor. Granted he has his share of enemies, but you'd be amazed by how many friends he has and how much he matters to them."

"Are you . . . threatening me?" he asked, amused by her temerity, almost in spite of himself.

"Of course not." Her tone said otherwise. "Just making sure you understand that this is a high stakes game you're getting into."

He took a deep breath, and told himself that he wasn't really intimidated by this blonde vixen and her not-so-veiled warnings. Nor was he going to allow himself to be distracted by subliminal stirrings.

"When are you leaving?" she asked, suddenly a bit uncomfortable under the scrutiny of eyes that seemed to grow bluer by the moment.

"Tomorrow, I think. Provided all the lab tests and x-rays show what I expect to find."

"And all the arrangements have been made? Living arrangements, nursing care and PT, serving staff? Everything?"

"My assistant is very efficient," he answered sharply. "I don't leave things to chance."

"And security?" There was no trace of softness or tolerance in her voice now. This was strictly business.

"That I'll leave to the FBI," he retorted. "It's not my area of expertise."

"Maybe not," she agreed, "but you might just make sure that your assistant - and your people, in general - understand the need for discretion here. I don't have first hand experience in such things either, but I trust the judgment of those who do, and the consensus of opinion seems to be that the people behind all this might not be content to just let it be."

"You really are trying to scare me, aren't you? I'm taking him away from the scene of the crime. He'll be 600 miles from here, and from anybody who might want to hurt him. Isn't that enough?"

She shook her head. "Is it? Money has very long arms, Doctor Turnage. I just want to make sure you know the score. You need to be aware of . . . ."

"The only thing I need to be aware of," he interrupted, "is my patient's medical condition and what I can do to fix it. The rest is not my concern."

To his surprise, she laughed. "You really are a single-minded bastard, aren't you?"

The physician smiled, and reached out to tap the photo of Brian Kinney that was closest to him - a profile shot in which the man was looking down at something, eyes obscured by a thick sweep of dark lashes. "I have a feeling that you have a particular fondness for single-minded bastards," he retorted, tongue tucked firmly in cheek.

Cynthia stared. Single-minded bastard or not, the surgeon was a spectacular treat for the eyes and the senses, and she was dismayed to note the heat of a flush touch her face. She quickly busied herself with gathering up the photos and returning them to the files.

"You know," said Turnage, a speculative gleam rising in his eyes, "it would be helpful to me - in deciding how to proceed with treatment - if I knew more about him. Habits, lifestyle, health history - that sort of thing. Maybe we could have dinner? To continue our . . . discussion."

Cynthia compressed her lips to suppress a smile. "I'm sure you already have his medical records. Isn't that sufficient?"

"Not really," he replied quickly. "The more I know about him, the better my chance to give him what he wants."

"Maybe you should talk to his friends. They might be able . . ."

"Maybe," he interrupted. "But somehow I doubt it. I think you know him, better than almost anybody."

She hesitated for a moment, lost in a memory of a slender blond teen-ager who had, somehow, always known Brian better than anybody else ever would - even when they'd only just met. "Maybe," she conceded finally. "Almost."

"Very well then." Turnage's smile had turned slightly smug. "Dinner?"

"Sorry," said a new voice from the doorway. "Wouldn't want to interrupt anything . . . important."

Lance Mathis' tone was flat, unemotional, but something in his dark eyes suggested a certain degree of satisfaction.

"Of course you wouldn't," replied Turnage, watching carefully to see if there was any unspoken emotional current between Brian Kinney's administrative assistant and his chief of security, but there was nothing to see. Or nothing, at least, that either was willing to display.

"You and I," continued Mathis, meeting Turnage's gaze, "need to have a discussion. About the arrangements you've made for Brian."

"The FBI is fully aware . . ."

Mathis' smile formed quickly, but it did not reach his eyes. "If the FBI screws up and something happens to Brian, they have to answer to Washington and their superiors. On the other hand, if I screw up and let him get hurt - again - you don't even want to know how many people I have to answer to, some of whom will have my balls on a barbeque pit before you can whisper the first of the many 'Mea culpas' you'll be saying before they - and I - are done with you. So, you let the FBI do their thing, while you provide the information I need to help me do mine. Understood?"

Turnage was outraged. Nobody had ever talked to him like that, and he wasn't about to stand for it. "Fuck off!" he snarled. "Who do you think you are?"

"I'll tell you exactly who I am," Mathis replied, glancing toward Cynthia and noting the tiny smile she was wearing. "For now, I'm prepared to be your best friend, your staunch companion. But if something happens to Brian Kinney because of information you withheld from me, I promise you that I will become the worst nightmare that you can imagine. But hey, cheer up. If it makes you feel any better, we can have our little talk over dinner. You were looking for a dining companion, weren't you?"
It had been a hell of a lot easier watching blond boy eye-candy fidget around at the airport (especially when said blond boy was Playgirl-centerfold material) than playing homeless vagrant on a cold Pittsburgh street, thought Jared Hilliard. Especially when the most eagerly anticipated feature of spring had yet to put in an appearance (in that the temperature still hovered around the freezing mark in the wee hours) while the most thoroughly dreaded feature was in full queen-out mode (in that the rain looked to be around for an indefinite stay).

Luckily, he wasn't quite as destitute as he appeared to be - appearances being everything in the world of clandestine surveillance. He was wrapped up tight in a huge plastic tarp, with tears and gashes artfully applied at strategic spots, and his face was obscured by the hood of a soiled and stained poncho, which looked more battered than it actually was, and an artfully applied layer of grime. He also looked decidedly bulkier than usual, due to the multi-layers of cold weather gear that were concealed beneath the plastic, including a ragged old army jacket, one shoulder showing through one of the strategically placed rips in the plastic, displaying a faded patch - the unmistakable image of the Screaming Eagle - the emblem of the 101st Airborne. Though the rest of his garb could be considered a disguise, the jacket was his own - a worn, but treasured remnant from his years of service.

The night was bitterly chill, but he did not feel it, having spent hours preparing himself for his little masquerade. In fact, he was almost too warm, and was beginning to regret the battery-powered socks that were making his feet sweat inside a pair of worn and run-down old regulation combat boots.

He had arranged his little tableau with precision, although it appeared to be completely haphazard. Tucked tight within his plastic shelter, he was wedged into a tiny V-shaped alcove, formed by the intersection of a graffiti-adorned brick wall and an oversized dumpster with its cover thrown back and leaning against the building. Thus it provided some small protection from the ceaseless rain, but - more importantly - it blocked the light from a flickering streetlamp at the corner, and provided a measure of privacy for Hilliard's more covert activities. He had scattered a couple of empty screw-top wine bottles around him, along with a few empty Vienna sausage cans and the de rigueur cigarette butts that were such an inescapable part of street life, even though such items were now - literally - worth their weight in gold. Then, he had insulated his attire with layers of crumpled up newspaper - a common ploy among street people to ward off the chill of the night, and he nestled now into his makeshift shelter, head down and shoulders scrunched against the weather, with a lopsided plastic storage box, protected by a black garbage bag, wrapped tight in his arms - the equivalent of a bag lady's shopping cart, thus completing the illusion of a homeless drifter, attempting to survive the elements.

Of course, if anyone had been able to see through the layers of plastic, they would have been shocked to discover a state-of-the-art laptop computer, which was part of a wireless network that included an incredible array of electronic devices, including bases at Kinnetic, at police headquarters, and at a temporary command post set up by an FBI team. In addition, it had access to the ultra-efficient surveillance system that had recently been installed on the nondescript-looking brick building on the opposite corner, at the intersection of Fuller and Tremont.

Hilliard tried to convince himself that it would be okay to just huddle in his makeshift shelter and concentrate on staying dry, but some niggling little thing in the back of his mind insisted otherwise. Thus it was that he divided his time equally between surreptitious checks of his laptop's display and regular sweeps of the area around him. In addition, he appeared to be muttering to himself almost constantly, when he was, in fact, wired for sound and communicating with other members of the security network that was in place for only one reason: to protect Brian Kinney and his domain.

It had been a relatively quiet night, but Hilliard was still on edge. He had no specific reason to be apprehensive, no explanation for why he was anxious. Yet there was no denying the gnawing sensation in the pit of his stomach. He drank endless cups of coffee from a thermos concealed alongside his laptop (which did absolutely nothing to soothe his gut, of course) and hunkered down under his cover, careful to reveal as little of his face as possible when pedestrians wandered by. Residents of this area - and those just passing through it - tended to ignore street people, unless something out of the ordinary caught their eye, and Hilliard's bright blue eyes tended to do that, being startling against dark bronze skin, so he was careful to avoid meeting the gaze of anyone who came too close.

He watched obliquely as a painfully thin old man shuffled by, a scruffy-looking hound at his side, both huddling under a length of plastic sheeting that the man wore like a shawl, and Hilliard hoped that the two were headed toward some kind of refuge for the night. There was, he knew, a homeless shelter a couple of blocks over that provided a dry place to sleep and breakfast to all comers - no questions asked - but he doubted that animals would be welcome there. The urge to leap up and offer assistance was almost impossible to resist, but resist he did. If he compromised his cover, the price to be paid might be much worse than a lonely, uncomfortable night for an old vagrant and his dog.

He did, however, indulge in a bit of mumbling, which would sound like nothing more than gibberish to any casual observer, but said plenty to his contacts - enough, at least, to motivate someone to emerge from concealment a couple of blocks away and intercept a weary old Vietnam veteran who suffered from a form of Alzheimers which reduced him to wandering around in a mental fog and living off the scanty and episodic generosity of strangers. It would not provide a permanent resolution for his problems, but it would assure that, for a few nights at least, he would find refuge that would allow him and his dog to be safe and warm and well fed, at least until he wandered off again and lost himself in the grayness of the city, in the grip of a renewed state of mental fugue.

Hilliard would have liked to believe that it was this particular encounter that he had been awaiting all evening, but, somehow, he knew better. He continued his clandestine surveillance and his masquerade, exchanging ribald remarks with a couple of prostitutes who had come up empty on this cold, clammy night and were making their way back home with empty pockets. Then came a carefully scripted confrontation with a patrol cop who gave him just enough grief to seem plausible but stopped short of actually rousting him out of his grubby little nest.

After that, the traffic grew thinner, as the clock on the old brewery warehouse down the street ticked past midnight. Within the next hour, lights began to go off in the various businesses situated nearby on Liberty Avenue that catered to evening clientele - coffee shops and video rental stores and neighborhood bars and a bowling alley, although the night was still in its infancy for places like Woody's and the Meat Hook and Babylon.

The rain continued to fall, neither waxing nor waning, and the temperature continued to drop, and Hilliard was no longer sorry for having worn the battery-powered socks. The wind, which had been gusty and capricious all day, had finally died down, and the area was now enveloped in a deep, abiding silence that was only emphasized by the muted roar of the rain. It should have been soothing, but - somehow - it wasn't. He shifted beneath his tawdry shelter, and winced as a cold rivulet found its way beneath his layers of polypropylene and traced a path down inside his collar, causing him to flex his shoulders and twist his head to the left as he rubbed a gloved hand across the nape of his neck. And that was when he saw it.

It wasn't really a body, so much as a shadow of a body. But it was enough, because it was definitely in a place where it was not supposed to be.

A quick glance up at the top floor of the building that was the focus of his surveillance recorded the extinguishing of one interior light and the igniting of another, all according to a random pattern determined by the computer-generated security system. All was exactly as it should be within Brian Kinney's loft, but the same might not be true of the area around it.

"Heads up!" Hilliard's muttered warning was little more than a whisper, but it was more than enough to gain the immediate attention of those at various locations on the other end of the connection. "At my ten o'clock," he continued. "Movement in the access area by the hardware store."

"Could be a dog," observed a voice in his ear.

Hilliard was very still, eyes locked on the thick darkness of the entrance to the tiny lane that provided access to the alley that ran behind the old hardware store and the other buildings along Tremont Avenue, including the one at the corner. It was pitch black there, and he could discern nothing at first - not even with the aid of the small but powerful binoculars he pulled from a pocket of his jacket. Nothing at all - until there was a quick flicker of flame, which burned for only a fraction of a second before being extinguished.

"Not unless Fido's taken up smoking," he said quickly.

"How many?"

"Two, I think, but there could be more."

"We're moving in," said another voice.

Hilliard took a moment to check out the display on his laptop, making sure that the feed from the concealed cameras that overlooked the alley behind Brian's loft was clear and unobstructed. The alley, of course, was pitch black, except for a few squares of light from windows in adjacent buildings, but the darkness was not an issue as the surveillance units were equipped for detection of infrared wavelengths.

"Hold on," he said quickly. "If we play this right, it might be our chance to get inside, with a little luck . . . and perfect timing."

"You think they'll try to break in?" A female voice - probably one of the FBI monitors.

"I doubt it," said someone else. "If they run true to form, they're only interested in causing as much damage as possible. Vandalism takes time, and they have to know there's an expensive alarm system in place. So they'll probably go for faster, easier ways."

"In that case," said Hilliard, getting to his feet and freeing himself from the constraints of his plastic protection, "I think this is my cue."

"Better be razor sharp, Friend." That was Mathis, undoubtedly monitoring everything from his office at Kinnetic. "If you fuck it up and something happens to his loft, he's going to have your balls."

"Is that supposed to be a threat?" Hilliard grinned when his response resulted in a long, uncertain beat of silence.

"Just . . . be careful." Mathis sounded as if he might be on the verge of laughter - or not.

"Yeah. Keep me in the loop, but wait for my signal before you spook 'em."

Hilliard stood and took a moment to adapt himself to the character he was portraying, adjusting body language and posture to reflect the appropriate street persona. Then he began to move down the sidewalk, using the shadows wherever possible to avoid drawing attention to himself, but being careful not to appear to be doing anything more than trying to walk down the street and shield himself from the nastiness of the night. No one watching would have clued in on the fact that his demeanor was assumed while his focus and determination were unswerving. Despite an apparently casual gait, he was moving very quickly.

"Camera four's got 'em," said Mathis very softly. "I only see two, but there could be a look-out still hiding in the passageway, so watch your step."

"Any clue what they're up to?"

The security chief's response was quick. "Well, one of them just busted out a pane of glass on the window at the bottom of the stairwell, and the other one just pulled something out of his coat that looks an awful lot like a Molotov cocktail, so better hurry, Hilliard, because there's not much time to lose."

"OK, I'm in position. You can . . ."

He never got a chance to finish the sentence as a remarkable number of things occurred at that exact moment. Bright halogen bulbs flared into blinding brilliance, bathing the entire alley in harsh, shadowless light, while a shrill alarm rose to a piercing shriek that threatened to shatter the eardrums of anyone who was too close to it. At the same time, one of the two would-be vandals hurled his home-crafted incendiary device into the building through the broken window, and Jared Hilliard came streaking around the corner so suddenly that the two hoodlums could only stand and stare at him, obviously not quite sure if he was real or some kind of demented apparition. At that moment, the fate of both young hoodlums was already sealed, as the surveillance cameras recorded clear and irrevocable evidence of their part in the crime.

But the play had only just begun.

"What the fuck are you doing?" yelled Hilliard, grabbing both teen-agers by the collar and pushing them ahead of him down the alley. "Are you crazy? Don't you know the fag that owns this place has got the God-damned cops in his pocket, and enough money to have a security system that makes Fort Knox look like a neighborhood pawn shop. Unless you want to spend the next twenty years getting fucked up the ass by some prison gang, you better fuckin' run."

"But . . ." One of them was stumbling, and struggling to catch his breath.

Shit! Hilliard barely managed not to roll his eyes. Just his luck, in trying to fake the perfect, skin-of-their-teeth escape, to get stuck with a fucking asthmatic juvenile delinquent.

"I said run, Boy!" he snarled, and the sheer volume of it was apparently enough to scare the kid right out of his short-windedness and into a full-fledged panic that motivated him to run like the wind, no longer worried about whether or not he could breathe. They sprinted into the night, the two youths being herded and guided by the big man who seemed to know, instinctively, how to avoid the paths that would have led to their immediate capture.

Jared Hilliard managed, by virtue of a mighty effort, not to smile.

Behind them, flames spread quickly around the base of the old staircase, as the alarm sirens continued to shatter the night.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

I'll Find You Again --- Jim Metcalf
* A Confederacy of Dunces --- John Kennedy Toole
* Starlight--- Jim Metcalf

---------------------------------*---

tbc
Chapter 25

The realization that it was long past time to go home struck Sharon Briggs when it occurred to her that she could not remember the silken touch of her damask-patterned 800 thread count sheets against her skin or the smell of the special blend of espresso that wafted from her sunny kitchen every morning or the sound of raindrops dappling the surface of her flagstone terrace or the taste of the Scarlet O'Hara cocktails that the bartender at her neighborhood bar always made special for her. Enough was enough, she reasoned, since she couldn't even remember - exactly - just how long she'd been locked up in this mental ward that managed - but only just - to masquerade as a trauma center.

This observation was prompted by the confrontation she'd just witnessed between a boisterous, emaciated crack addict and Nurse Mandy Fleming, who had just ejected him - physically - from the private room where his grandmother was recuperating from a stroke. Apparently, the young thug had decided that his beloved Nana would be happy to give him permission to rifle through her belongings and steal a wad of cash from her purse, if only she weren't still comatose.

Sharon had watched the occurrence while forcing down an almost irresistible urge to spring from her seat and handcuff the little bastard while shoving her Beretta 9MM up under his sternum. She didn't act on the impulse, leaving the hospital security staff to deal with the fracas, but she was sorely tempted.

Which was another reason to go home.

But she couldn't - not quite yet.

According to the information she'd been given, her release would come tomorrow, when Brian Kinney was finally to be allowed to take flight, to go forth and try to find his way into whatever future awaited him; logic suggested that a few more hours spent here, in this sterile, colorless, perpetually mind-numbing environment, where drama unfolded only on the other side of gray walls and security doors, would be as futile all the previous hours had been. Mostly.

Although she did have certain suspicions. But thus far, there was nothing that she could prove, so she acknowledged that she should just pack up and go home.

Only her suspicions were a little like an itch that needed scratching. She just had to figure out a way to reach the right spot.

She was still not entirely comfortable working under the supervision of the man who had borrowed her services from the Narcotics Division. Things were different among the narcs, by necessity. Regulations still had to be followed, of course, and policies observed, but there was more room for interpretation, more freedom to step outside the boundaries of convention in an environment peopled by drug dealers and their henchmen, and addicts and snitches and undercover cops representing a dozen different agencies - federal, state, and local. Still, she had to admit that Detective Horvath had surprised her by being a lot less rigid than she'd expected. He had allowed her to use her own judgment in a case that obviously had special significance for him, leading her to conclude that he had realized that his objectivity might be compromised if he refused to defer to those with more experience in undercover operations.

It took a pretty big man to cope with that kind of self-awareness.
Sharon, AKA Shoshona, had more than nine years of experience under her belt, years in which she had lived two completely separate lives. Two identities, two residences (although one of them barely even qualified as a squat) two personalities - two lives, each totally separate from the other. And Horvath had acknowledged her skill and expertise and refrained from throwing his considerable weight around. She respected him for that, but it didn't make her any less weary of the whole situation.

Was it any wonder that she sometimes had trouble remembering who she was supposed to be at any given time? But, for this moment at least, there was no confusion, as she had been in character far longer than usual during this little excursion, becoming more and more comfortable in her adopted skin, and thus - paradoxically - more and more prone to fatal error. Slipping so deeply into alternative reality sometimes degraded natural tendencies to paranoia, which could save a life - or cost one.

She thought longingly of her Jacuzzi tub and the pitcher of Margaritas she could prepare to enjoy during a long, luxurious soak, as she watched as a weary custodian pushed a dust mop across the floor, pausing along the way to watch David Letterman cracking wise with the latest blonde Madonna-wannabe.

Sharon sighed, and rose to walk to the window, pulling her shabby old parka more tightly around her slender form. She was not really cold, but the sterility and impersonal atmosphere of the hospital was beginning to wear on her, not to mention the fact that she had been 'in character' for such a long time now that she was losing touch with the person she really was - the stylish young woman whose closet was filled with Dolce and Gabbana clothing and Manolo Blahnik shoes and whose fashionable townhouse was furnished with Regency antiques and custom upholstered pieces and stunning impressionist artwork from a group of up-and-coming young artists who might very well turn out to be the Picassos of tomorrow.

Tomorrow. She had a ridiculous urge to break into song - a la Andrea McArdle - and go dancing down to the street and over into the parking garage where she could duck into her lovely little Mazda RX8 and step back into her genuine existence - simultaneously. Sharon had come from money - her father was the Briggs half of Freemont-Briggs Health & Beauty Products - and thus, was one of those rare individuals who did not depend on the earnings from her job to support her lifestyle. She was a cop - and a very good one - out of volition, not necessity, to the horror of her very traditional parents. And she had known Brian Kinney for a very long time, although he would most certainly not recognize her if he happened to catch a glimpse of her in her current guise.

She still got an occasional laugh from the memory of the look on her father's face when he'd been told the truth about his new face (yeah, right - like it was the 'face' that mattered) of BareBronze, who also happened to be the target of the old man's latest scheme to find a suitable mate for his hard-headed daughter.

She smiled, remembering how Brian had charmed her parents with his sardonic wit and sense of style. Then she recalled how he looked now, what had been done to him, and the smile faded. She turned away from the spectacle of the stormy night and looked across the bland, featureless waiting room toward the nurse's station . . . and went very still.

The itch was back and refusing to be ignored.

Perhaps the endless hours she had spent here, portraying a familial devotion to a comatose great aunt - the comatose patient was real enough, although the family connection wasn't - would not prove to be the complete waste of time she had feared, although she had, over time and with great reluctance, come to feel a certain connection to the old lady in Room 406, since it had become obvious that the elderly stroke victim - a retired school teacher - had no one else to care for her. How would it feel, she had come to wonder, to live through almost nine decades and find one's self completely alone and unattached to anyone after enduring so much of life? The answer, she thought, was something she preferred not to know. Thus, she had begun to talk to the old lady during her visits to the room, speaking in generalities, since she knew very little about the woman's past, but feeling compelled, somehow, to offer snippets of conversation and observations about life in general. She had no idea, of course, if the patient could hear her, or would care if she did, but she felt, somehow, that it was the right thing to do, especially since she was using the woman as an excuse for her continuing presence in the waiting room.

Nevertheless, professionally, it had not been a very productive period, but perhaps her luck was about to change, if she was very careful and very lucky . . . and very quiet.

Head Nurse Jessica Burnside had not had a very good night. She was obviously tired and frazzled and having a bad hair day, as she vacillated between hoping that everyone around her would fall into a deep, dreamless, bottomless sleep so she could just sit and vegetate for a while and - conversely - wanting some cocky little twerp to walk out of the elevator and give her a perfect opportunity to vent her not inconsiderable level of frustration. She almost envied Nurse Fleming's run-in with the crackhead. But for the moment, she would settle for a little peace and quiet to allow her to indulge her need for caffeine and to finish reviewing the physician's orders and medication instructions for the heart patient in 416, while awaiting the arrival of a new patient transferring in from the ICU.

Thus, when Viola Ritchie, an older LPN with a wide body and a cheerful disposition, and the freckle-faced nurse's aid who was her regular assistant departed for the night, the RN confined her farewell to a quick wave before returning to her task, her frown reflecting the degree of the headache pounding in her temples. So focused was she that she barely registered the passage of the respiratory technician who bustled down the hall to administer a breathing treatment to the pneumonia case in Room 411 and failed to even notice the arrival of the lab tech who took up a position at the counter, where he proceeded to affix labels to a group of test vials and check them against notes on his clipboard. Nor did she see when the man shifted his body, with exaggerated casualness, in such a way as to shield his movements from inquisitive eyes as he lifted one folder from the chart cabinet and flipped it open to scan its contents and capture a couple of photos with his cell phone before returning the file to its original position, all in less than thirty seconds with no one the wiser. Dark eyes swept his surroundings and saw exactly what they expected to see - nothing remarkable and no living being except for the nondescript young black woman who had been sitting there in the waiting room for so long now that she had become almost a fixture, barely worthy of notice, especially since she seemed to be fixated at that moment on the latest Brangelina scandal exposed on the pages of a battered copy of Us magazine.

The man smiled, confidant that he had found what he was looking for and gone unobserved in the process.

Sharon Briggs saw the smile and was careful to maintain her appearance of fascination with the ridiculous expose in the tabloid, while just glancing up at exactly the right moment to catch a glimpse of the man's employee ID tag.

Oh, yes. This night might just prove the old adage: good things come to those who wait.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Chris McClaren had been restless and apprehensive all evening, watching as the night moved toward its nadir and then progressed into the wee small hours of the morning. He had finally managed to doze off just when the buzz of his cell phone caused him to jerk awake, scrambling to silence the device before it could awaken the room's other occupant, who definitely needed his sleep. Brian had not had an easy day, and the FBI agent hurried out of the room before speaking.

"Yeah?" he answered, after glancing at the phone's ID screen to identify the caller and noting that it was just past three AM.

"Very professional response, Agent McClaren," said a contralto voice with sardonic overtones.

"Hello, Alex," he replied, massaging weary eyes with thumb and forefinger. "Still rubbing elbows with the rich and famous?"

Alexandra Corey blew a tiny little raspberry into her phone before replying. "Bite your tongue, Junior. It was Sen. Marbury's sub-committee. Would you willingly rub anything with that woman?"

"Point taken," he conceded. "So where are you?"

"In the Pitts, Hon. Literally. I've spent most of today getting to know your Mr. Kinney - a very interesting day, I must say."

McClaren chuckled. "He's definitely not your typical victim."

"Agreed. I'm really eager to meet him, to see for myself if he lives up to his press, but I think it's going to have to wait a bit longer. I still have more people to see, more details to nail down before I'm ready to hear his side of the story."

McClaren was silent for a few seconds, debating whether or not to say what was on his mind or simply trust her to figure things out for herself, as she always did. Then he smiled as he realized that, by his very silence, he had already said too much.

"Out with it," she demanded, as he heard the snick of her cigarette lighter and comforted himself with the realization that her latest attempt to give up cigarettes had been as futile as the thousand or so earlier attempts had been. He knew it was petty of him to be glad that there was a weakness that she could not overcome by dint of sheer will power, but he was glad nonetheless. Such a weakness proved that she was not - quite - perfect, and that was a comfort to seriously flawed beings, such as himself.

"Don't make the mistake," he said slowly, "of judging him by standards that might not apply."

Then it was her turn to pause. "Do I detect a tiny nuance of admiration, Agent McClaren?"

He smiled. "Let's just say I'm withholding judgment until all the facts are in."

"I've read his file, you know. And seen his photographs."

He took a deep breath, struggling for patience. "Have you ever known me to be distracted by a pretty face?"

"No," she admitted, "but he's hardly just a 'pretty face', is he?"

"No. He's not, which is reason enough to wait until all the facts are in before reaching any kind of conclusion."

"Good enough," she retorted, and he sensed, somehow, that she was pleased with him, which was reason enough for him to be moderately pleased with himself, as Alexandra Corey did not bestow approval without very good cause. "One thing is certain, however," she continued. "He apparently has an incredible gift for pissing people off. So much so that some of his biggest fans attempted to McClaren huffed a small sigh. He had not yet visited Kinney's home, but he'd heard about it from a variety of sources and found himself hoping that it had not been destroyed by the man's enemies. He wasn't sure why, but he was hungry to see the place for himself.

"And did they succeed?"

"Are you kidding?" she chuckled. "The White House should have such a security system. A little bit of smoke damage on the bottom floor, some scorched tiles in the back entrance. Nothing to worry about. Have you seen his place, by any chance?"

"No. I've been too busy standing guard over his ass to go sightseeing."

"From what I hear," she laughed, "that's not such a terrible assignment."

"The ass may be charming," he retorted, "but he's got a mouth on him that you wouldn't believe."

"Oh," she said softly. "You'd prefer Little Mary Sunshine, maybe?"

He grinned. She really did know him entirely too well.

"Okay," he conceded. "So what's his place really like?"

"From what I hear," she answered, "it's a lot like him. Elegant, classic, stylish, and very, very self-contained - unless you know what to look for."

He wondered what she meant by that, but quickly realized that pressing her for an explanation would be counter-productive.

"Have you turned up anything interesting?" he asked.

"Interesting doesn't even begin to cover it," she said with a soft sigh. "Given his background, I'd say that we're all very, very lucky that young Mr. Kinney didn't turn out to be a combination of Jeffrey Dahmer, the Zodiac killer, and Jack the Ripper."

"Son of Psycho?" he asked, wondering why he wasn't more surprised.

"At least."

"Alex," he said softly, "he's just begun to process everything, just begun to confront issues he never thought he'd have to endure. He's going to need help, but . . ."

"Let me guess," she interrupted. "He's not going to make it easy for anybody to help him."

"How'd you figure that?"

She sighed. "Strong, independent, self-motivated individuals are seldom willing to admit that they can't handle everything on their own. It's nothing I haven't seen before."

"With all due respect," he replied, "I can almost guarantee you've never met someone like him before. He's unique. And he resists any suggestions about counseling like it was a venereal disease. His entire philosophy can be summed up in two words: fuck therapy."

She laughed softly. "Oh, I am looking forward to this. You know how I enjoy a challenge."
McClaren grinned. "In that case, you better prepare yourself, because you're going to fall deeply, hopelessly, madly in love with this cocky, arrogant, sarcastic, completely uncontrollable little bastard."

"That's the second time you've called him 'little'," she observed, "which is unusual for you. He is a grown man, isn't he?"

"Mostly," the agent conceded. Then his grin grew wider. "But I'm taller and, believe me, when you're dealing with Brian Kinney, you need every bit of leverage you can get."

McClaren checked on Brian once he'd finished his conversation with his boss, and found him resting comfortably, which was a bit unusual. The Stud of Liberty Avenue - God, he really had to stop thinking of Kinney in those deliberately sardonic terms - seldom slept easily these days. He did not actually talk in his sleep, for the most part, but he was often restless, and his breathing was rarely regular and deep. McClaren was pretty sure he knew why, although the man was loathe to discuss it and, in fact, sharply denied any suggestion that his restlessness might be due to an endless succession of bad dreams.

Still, he was quiet for the moment, and the FBI agent thought he'd just grab a few moments of downtime and a cigarette. He summoned his back-up to take up a place by the door before striding down the hallway toward a small balcony area that overlooked a rear courtyard. It was not - officially - a designated smoking area, but, under the circumstances and given the lateness of the hour, it would do.

He should have been surprised, he thought, as he stood looking out into the night, and watching as pale glimmers of moonlight managed to punch through the cloud cover, while he filled his lungs with the welcome tang of nicotine poison. He should have been - but he wasn't.

"Have you given up sleeping for the duration?" he asked as Carl Horvath settled beside him at the railing.

Horvath grunted. "I hear that tomorrow marks the end . . . of the duration," he said as he accepted a cigarette from the agent. "And if my better half ever asks you, you've never seen me smoke."

"Hey, I'm not the PC police monitor, so your secret's safe with me. But seriously, what the fuck are you doing here at this hour?"

Horvath looked up and noted that the clouds seemed to be fleeing before the onslaught of fresh winds out of the south. "Just had a little confab with one of my undercover people. She thinks she might have a lead worth pursuing."

"Someone here?" McClaren knew better than to question too deeply. Undercover work was hazardous enough without complications, and he wasn't about to complicate anything. Still, he was curious.

Horvath nodded. "Probably nothing to do with the original perps, but a possible connection to all the information that's been leaked to the press and whoever else might be interested."

McClaren nodded. "Stands to reason that the movers and shakers that set all this in motion would want to keep tabs on his condition."

Horvath turned to study the FBI agent's expression. "You think there's still more to come."
"Don't you?"

The detective sighed. "I think they're bound to be getting nervous."

"Meaning?"

Horvath paused before answering, considering his words carefully. "This whole thing was orchestrated in such a way that they had complete control of everything. From the very beginning. They were on this huge power trip, that allowed them to believe that they could do anything they liked to him, and he'd have no recourse but to knuckle under, to crawl into a hole and hide from them and the world, and that they'd just be able to walk away from it free and clear. But things didn't quite go as they planned."

"I'm not sure what you mean," McClaren replied, "except that they didn't have time to finish it."

But Horvath was shaking his head. "But that's only part of it. Think it through. First of all, they must have been astonished - not to mention infuriated - when Brian didn't react the way they'd planned. He defied them, apparently to the bitter end. So if they were outraged to begin with, just imagine how they must have felt when their plans were thwarted. Then there was the fact that Mathis and his crew were smart enough, with a bit of a boost from the 'luck of the Irish', to figure out where to look for them and get there in time to prevent them from finishing him off according to plan. Not to mention sending them all scattering like roaches in a bright light, leaving a crime scene behind, along with a dead body. I'm sure you've realized that they never intended for anybody to recognize where this all happened. If they hadn't been interrupted, Brian would have been dumped somewhere out in BFE when they were done with him, with no way to connect him to that warehouse - or to them - and no evidence for our forensics people to process."

"So they're worried."

"Exactly. And now, they not only have to be concerned that someone might connect them - one way or another - to the crime scene or to the thugs they hired, they have to wonder if Brian might have seen something or noticed something or figured out something that they hadn't anticipated. In light of that, even though their original plans were for him to suffer a slow, agonizing, lonely death, they might be scared enough to stop worrying about extracting their version of divine justice and just want it done."

McClaren stubbed out his cigarette and dropped the butt into a trash barrel. "If you're trying to scare me, Detective, you're wasting your time. He already scares the shit out of me, with no help from you."

"What do you mean?" asked Horvath, obviously confused.

"He's going to make my job twice as hard as it has to be, because he's not going to be willing to keep his head down and his mouth shut. So . . ."

"So you've already figured out what you're up against." It was not a question.

McClaren's laugh was low-pitched and filled with irony. "I think it was Keller who mentioned that Kinney's only barely begun to confound us."

"Hard-headed little fucker is going to get himself killed," Horvath observed, taking a final drag on his cigarette.

"Not," said McClaren coldly, "on my watch."
Horvath just nodded.

"So," said the FBI agent, still staring out into the night, "this undercover cop of yours - how good is she?"

"As good as I've ever worked with. If she thinks she's found something, it bears checking out."

"So you'll keep me posted."

Horvath turned to go back into the building. "Don't worry about that, Mr. McClaren. If you fuck this up, it's your job that might be on the line. On the other hand, if I let anything happen to young Mr. Kinney, a certain loud-mouthed redhead will be grinding my balls into mincemeat and serving them up with marinara sauce, so it's definitely in my best interest to make sure you're well informed."

McClaren smiled. "It's funny, you know."

"What?"

"That so many people care so much about a man who does his best to portray himself as a complete shit."

Horvath's eyes were suddenly suspiciously bright. "Yeah. It's funny."

McClaren smiled as he watched the detective turn away and move off down the corridor. Did any of them really understand what Brian Kinney meant to them, he wondered. Then his smile faltered as he looked at the question from a different angle - a darker, sadder angle. Did Brian himself have any inkling of how important he was in their lives, and, even if he did finally figure it out, would he be able to believe it?

He thought not.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

There were voices all around him, but no faces. No solid forms. Everything - everyone remained in shadow, and every time he turned to try to determine who was speaking, the gloom seemed to thicken as the voices fell silent, only to be replaced by other voices, further away. All around him, there was only debris and smoke and ashes that hung motionless in the air, forming a curtain that felt tangible enough to resist his efforts to move forward, forcing him to push against the restraint. He didn't know why it was so important that he keep moving; standing still seemed a perfectly viable option, especially in light of the fact that the effort to move was painful, although he could not figure out exactly what was hurting him. The darkness was so thick and pervasive that he could not look down and see his own body, but the smell in the air was acrid with a coppery tang, and he was conscious of a slick wetness that seemed to envelope his lower torso. Was he bleeding? And why couldn't he remember what had happened - why didn't he know how he'd been injured, if he had, indeed, been injured, if it was not all just some weird illusion?

And why was it so important that he keep moving forward? What was waiting there ahead of him that he felt so compelled to pursue?

There were screams now, creating a shrill descant that rose and fell and sometimes obscured the softer moans and the sound of weeping that formed the baseline of a terrible symphony. Although they provided no real illumination, showers of sparks erupted above and behind him periodically, and there was the snap-crackle-buzz of electric wires swinging free and awaiting the random touch of careless hands. He was stumbling now, trying to feel his way around broken obstacles and through twisted rubble, while trying not to identify the charred lumps of flesh that were contorted into bizarre shapes along his path. He fell once, and cringed away from the gut-wrenching crispness of flame-broiled skin, blackened and bonded to scraps of melted polyester.

Death was everywhere around him, and he wondered why he didn't feel more afraid, and why he kept hearing Bob Dylan's famous line repeating in his mind. "He not busy being born is busy dying.”

He was not afraid for himself . . . but there were other considerations.

Memory stirred, shifted, and blended with dreamscape; he had been here before, but 'here' encompassed more than one memory, more than one place.

The stench was almost unbearable, and the air, almost unbreathable, until he looked up and saw . . . he thought he smiled as he realized that even this awful, pervasive darkness could not completely obscure the gleam of hair as blond as summer straw and eyes aglow with life, a sight just glimpsed until he stepped through the particulate curtain that surrounded the setting and saw something else. Somewhere else. Below him, at the center of a shadowed arena, in a distant circle of light, somehow pale and icy, he saw a slender figure, elegantly clad in tuxedo and silk scarf, dancing away into the night, while a second figure, similarly clad, followed, swinging a baseball bat like a club.

“Justin!” He knew the scream was useless, knew that it had come too late and would not carry far enough. But he could not resist it, could not contain it, as he found himself sprinting down into that huge arena, watching the swing of that bat and hearing the heart-stopping sound of the blow as it impacted bone and flesh. Not once, but over and over and over again. And then he was there and he saw the blood and the crumpled body lying in the dark pool, and he threw himself forward to shove the attacker away, grabbing for the bat and preparing to administer a rough form of justice.

Only he couldn't because . . .

"No." The denial was torn from him, leaving him fighting to breathe.

He could not - would not believe it, as the attacker turned to face him and favored him with that mega-watt smile that had given rise to his nickname.

"Sunshine, what are you . . ."

He recoiled from the deep, icy rage flaring in the depths of those incredibly blue eyes and fell to his knees to wrap his arms around the limp body at his feet, murmuring a litany of denial as he tried to wipe the blood away from that beloved face, gone white as fresh snow. "No, no, no, no, no . . . God, no!"

Then he looked up and saw the same face laughing down at him. "You should have left me to die, Brian," said a cold and detached version of Justin, smirking at the bloodied vision of his own body and watching tears overflow from the eyes of the man who had been his lover. "Now, you have to pay, for both of us. And learn the most important lesson of your life - the wages of sin.”

And he swung the bat, again and again, and Brian absorbed the force of the attack, trying to shield the body in his arms, feeling the blood flowing in rivers, feeling his skin split under the terrible power of the blows, until everything suddenly went silent, and the young man wielding the bat was no longer the attacker, but the attacked, as a group of ominous figures appeared around him, bearing chains and iron bars and bats of their own, and laughing as his eyes grew huge, as he recognized his danger, as he realized what was coming, as the cruel, vicious, empty-eyed doppelganger was transformed into the beautiful, vulnerable young man that Brian had always loved, even when he'd forced himself to deny it.
"Brian!" Justin cried, desperately seeking a savior. "Brian, don't let them . . ."

Brian knew he had little strength left, doubted that he could make a difference, felt himself edging toward darkness. But this was Justin. He could not just let himself go, could not simply release his hold on consciousness when it was Justin who needed help. The body he had held in his arms was gone now, and there was only the young man whom he held, instead, in his heart. Nothing else mattered; nothing else made sense if anything bound up in this kaleidoscope of nightmare could be said to make sense.

He managed to get to his feet and stepped forward to confront the savages he had confronted before, savages who had tried and failed to make him beg for his own life. But this time was different. This time it was Justin's life that hung in the balance.

"Please," he said softly, barely audible. "Please, don't hurt him."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

To his surprise, Chris McClaren had managed to achieve a deep, restful sleep after his return to Brian's room, even though it only lasted a couple of hours. He had not expected to catch more than a quick nap or two, as was his wont when he was on a mission, but he was finding his current duty a lot more taxing than he'd anticipated - so taxing that he must have been more tired than he'd realized.

He smirked into the darkness as he wakened, admitting to himself that it wasn't actually the duty that was trying his patience so severely; it was the subject of his scrutiny. Kinney was . . .

Sitting up in bed, arms uplifted as if in supplication, breathing labored and hoarse, as he repeated the same words over and over again.

"Please don't hurt him, please don't hurt him, please don't . . ."

It was barely even a whisper, but the lack of volume did not diminish the level of desperation; Kinney was terrified - frightened enough to resort to begging, something McClaren was willing to bet he'd never done before.

The agent did not stop to think, did not hesitate. He simply leapt to his feet and climbed up onto the bed, wrapping his arms around the trembling torso of the young man who was - much to his surprise and even more against his will - becoming so important to him.

"Hush now, it's okay," he murmured, shifting so that his back was against the headboard of the bed so that he could settle Brian's weight against his chest. "Nobody's going to hurt him; it's all over. It's all over. It's just a dream." As he offered his singsong litany, his hands moved in soothing strokes against the areas of silken skin not covered by bandages, as Brian's breathing slowly eased to a normal rhythm.

"Justin?" Lost and uncertain, sounding for all the world like a frightened child.

"Justin's fine, Brian. Everything's all right. So just . . ."

"Justin? Did they hurt you? Are you . . ."

"No, Brian. Listen to me. Justin's fine. I told you, it's just a bad dream. So . . ."

"I'm so sorry, so sorry." The tears were flowing freely now, and the words were halting, broken. "I'm sorry I couldn't . . ." Brian was shaking, racked by silent sobs.
"Hush now. It's okay. He's fine, Brian. He's . . ."

"Justin? Please, answer me. Please don't . . ."

Shit!

"Oh, God, please don't let him be . . ."

Double shit!

McClaren took a deep breath before touching his lips to the bare skin near Brian's ear. "It's all right, Brian. It's me. It's Justin. And I'm all right. You saved me. You . . ."

"No, I didn't."

The FBI agent sighed and wondered if anybody - anybody at all - had ever realized the depth of the despair with which Kinney lived, every day of his life.

"Yes, you did. You saved me."

Brian's eyes were still closed, and McClaren was certain now that he was still locked up tight in the realm of nightmare, even though he was responding, marginally, to what was being said to him. So he continued to run his hands down Brian's back and to murmur soft assurances into his ear, until the shuddering sobs began to subside. He sighed then, thinking that the patient had emerged from the depth of his dark dream and slipped back into deep, mindless sleep. But it turned out that he was only partly right.

One form of nightmare had ended, but another was ongoing, possibly perpetual.

He almost missed it, as it was only a whisper, and barely even that. More of a faint exhalation - words barely breathed. He almost didn't hear it at all, and was, somehow, grateful that he was lucky enough to catch it, because he would come to believe - later - that it explained so much.

"I didn't save you. I never saved . . . anybody."

McClaren lifted one hand and stroked it though spikes of thick, dark hair. "Yes, you did," he replied. "You . . ."

He was more than a bit startled when he couldn't complete the assurance because his lips were suddenly taken by a soft but relentless mouth, a very skilled mouth that refused his somewhat feeble attempts at evasion.

Shit!

"Should I leave you two alone?" The question and the tone were sardonic, but the look in Matt Keller's eyes as he switched on a bedside light was as sharp as a freshly-honed blade.

Double shit!

"Doesn't anybody around here ever sleep?" McClaren growled.

"Don't you?" came the retort. "It's funny, you know. I thought your purpose here was to protect him. Instead of . . ."

"Relax, Doc. He was having a nightmare, and . . ."
"And?" Keller was not even close to backing down.

"And he thought I was Taylor."

Keller was quiet for a moment, apparently absorbed in evaluating data from the plethora of medical monitors arranged beside the bed, and noting, with some measure of relief, that his patient had apparently shaken off any wisp of nightmare and settled back into dreamless slumber. Then he looked up, and his eyes were filled with far too much understanding for McClaren's liking.

"Convenient for you."

"Look, I didn't . . ."

"Just so you understand," Keller continued, determined to make his point, "the pain meds are still working on him. Makes it difficult for him to determine what's real and what's not. So his judgment is a little impaired right now. It would be a mistake to assume that he's aware of . . ."

"I don't assume anything." McClaren's response, though barely more than a whisper, was sharp, brittle with the level of his irritation, and he was immediately annoyed with himself for letting any nuance of his emotional reaction color his tone. He extracted himself from Brian's arms and stood, his gaze meeting the physician's with an almost measurable degree of defiance.

Keller proceeded with a quick examination of his patient, his demeanor completely professional as he recorded his findings in Brian's chart. Then he paused, and lifted his eyes to examine the expression of the FBI agent who was watching him like a hawk.

"Can I give you a piece of advice?" he said finally, choosing his words carefully and managing, with the aid of a deep, cleansing breath, to suppress the resentment that always flared within him momentarily whenever he witnessed the inevitable fascination that people developed for his old friend. He had absolutely no right to be jealous of anyone in Brian's life, and he knew it, but that didn't change the fact that he always was, just a little.

"Fire away," retorted McClaren, wary now, but willing to listen.

"I imagine that you must - as a matter of professional necessity - regard everyone with a certain level of suspicion. You could hardly do your job if you didn't. And I'm sure you've encountered some of the worst examples of scum and villainy that the human race has managed to produce in the course of your career - individuals that live in the heart of darkness, so to speak, who are a danger to anyone who comes in contact with them."

McClaren just nodded, understanding - somehow - that what the doctor was trying to say to him was important, not for the sake of his job, or his clients, or his employer - but for himself.

"So it stands to reason that you have to be able to recognize danger when you see it," Keller continued, his eyes very focused, very intense. "But sometimes, it can sneak up on you, come at you from an unexpected direction."

"What is it you're trying to tell me, Doc?" McClaren's patience - ordinarily almost inexhaustible - was wearing thin.

Keller smiled. "You obviously already know how to watch your back, but you might want to pay a little more attention to watching your heart."

McClaren managed to dredge up a quite convincing smirk. "So . . . what? You're warning me because you're concerned for my well-being? You think I'm cruising for a broken heart?"
"What I think," Keller replied, completely unperturbed, "is that you have no idea just how dangerous this man can be."

"The so-called Stud of Liberty Avenue?" McClaren's tone was thick with scorn.

Keller's gaze was steady. "If that's what you see when you look at him - if that's all you see - then forget I mentioned it. You have nothing to worry about."

McClaren frowned. "Meaning what exactly?"

It was Keller's turn to smile. "Stupid people are immune to the infection known as Brian Kinney syndrome. You'll never even register on his radar."

McClaren was still trying to come up with a suitably withering retort when the physician went strolling out of the room.

_{~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~}

Ben stood looking out the kitchen window, not quite sure that he believed what he was seeing. He almost couldn't remember how long it had been since their tiny back yard had been touched by real, honest-to-God, undiluted sunlight. The clouds and the frigid rains of winter's last gasp - despite the fact that the calendar claimed that spring had sprung - had dissipated overnight, leaving a huge sweep of brilliant blue sky to smile down on a city too long wrapped in deep chill.

He sipped at a much-needed cup of coffee and wondered, for a fleeting moment, if the change in the weather might be enough to spark a change in the mindset of his husband. Then he sighed, recognizing the futility of the thought.

Michael was not going to be cheered up by any of the lovely markers that announced the arrival of spring. The truth was that Michael was probably not going to be cheered up at all - not for a very long time. And Ben was struggling with himself over whether or not he should take steps to put an end to the depression that had gripped his young partner since his last encounter with the only other person in the world who held the power to inflict that kind of damage on him.

He sipped again, still undecided. He was almost certain that he had figured out what Brian was doing, and why. What he didn't know was whether or not he would be doing Michael a favor by making him see the truth, or exposing him to dangers that didn't bear thinking about, a consequence for which, he knew, Brian would never forgive him and would - in his own inimitable way - exact vengeance.

He still found it ironic that he, of all the people who were members of Michael's extended family, was the one who had finally, to some small degree, begun to unravel the snarled skeins of the enigma that was Brian Kinney, and he was pretty sure that it was only because he was slightly immune to the man's charm. Okay - that was a bit of an overstatement. In truth, no one was completely immune, not if Brian decided to exert himself enough to focus it on any one individual, but the truth was that Brian, for whatever reason, had never exerted that effort toward Ben. On the one hand, Ben half believed that it was because, as Brian himself had admitted following the debacle at the Babylon bombing vigil, Brian didn't like "Zen Ben" very much, but, on the other, he had a sneaking suspicion that Brian understood him perfectly well and even - maybe - respected him a little, even if he scoffed at most of the things Ben believed in.

There was, however, a 'third hand', so to speak - maybe the most important thing of all. Ben sometimes believed that Brian could forgive him anything, simply because he loved Michael, and that was reason enough.
At any rate, whatever the explanation, Brian had never been completely successful in convincing Ben to buy into the façade he maintained for the rest of the world, thus allowing Ben to recognize a basic truth.

Beneath the arrogance, beneath the hype, beneath the glitz and the glamour and the flagrant self-interest, Brian Kinney was the most honest, most generous man Ben had ever known. That was, of course, beside the fact that he was also a complete shit, when the mood took him.

None of which solved his current problem.

But, with a nod to the Zen teaching that even the longest journey begins with a single step, he turned away from the window to pour his husband, still snug in their marriage bed, a cup of dark, rich, aromatic coffee, in an attempt to entice him to rise. Shining, he would worry about later.

He was, however, a bit late with the effort as Michael came stumbling into the kitchen just as Ben was spooning sugar into the Rage mug that was Michael's favorite.

"Morning, Baby," Ben offered, careful not to inject too much cheer into the greeting, since Michael would undoubtedly bristle if he detected any false note of merriment.

"Mmmhmm." Which could mean absolutely anything or - more likely - nothing at all except, "Gimme the fucking coffee."

Ben set the mug down on the table as Michael dropped into a chair, one hand lazily scratching at his chest.

"You want some breakfast?"

"Mmmhmm."

Ben chose to interpret that as an affirmative.

"Waffles? Toast? Oatmeal?"

No response.

"Fine herbs omelette, with a serving of hemlock?"

Michael looked up from the night-black liquid in his cup to fix his husband with a fishy stare. "What the fuck are you talking about?"

"Just something to grab your attention. Michael, you need to . . ."

"Ben, just . . . stop. OK? I know what I need to . . ."

The knock at the door came at a very opportune moment, from Michael's perspective, since he really had no idea how he'd planned to end that sentence.

Although, when he saw who was standing on the porch, he was less certain he should be happy with the interruption. He had not seen either Monty or Eli since the ugly confrontation in Brian's hospital room, except for casual glimpses as the two couples came and went in the course of their days. And he wasn't sure he was ready to see them now, not quite able to put aside his memories of the things they'd said during that ugly little episode.

Still, he wasn't prepared to be rude, and he had to concede that they were certainly not alone in their willingness to judge Brian harshly. Half of gay Pittsburgh - the half that considered itself superior to the world that Brian occupied - would probably agree with them.

"Just thought we'd stop in to see how you guys are doing," gushed Eli, his manner indicating that there should be no cause for awkwardness in the moment. "We brought muffins."

Monty held up a bakery bag. "Michot's Bakery. Fresh out of the oven."

Michael's hesitation was brief, but not quite brief enough to be termed non-existent, and, when he stepped back and opened to door wide to admit them, the couple exchanged quick, knowing glances.

"We brought plenty," said Monty as they followed Michael into the kitchen. "In case Hunter or J.R. might be here."

"No," said Ben, quickly and correctly reading the uncertainty in Michael's expression. "Neither one is here, but judging by the smell from that bag, I'm sure we can do them justice."

Eli smiled, ignoring any potential awkwardness. "Only the best for our good neighbors. You can choose between banana-chocolate chip, cappuccino-chocolate, carrot-and-raisin, or nutty-mincemeat."

Ben nodded, fetching fresh mugs from the cupboard. "And the coffee's fresh brewed."

They all settled in to sample the baked goods, and even Michael was tempted enough to polish off a couple of the sweet morsels.

Then Ben made a bit of a production of looking up at the clock. "This was really nice of your guys, but, unfortunately, duty calls. I've got a class in less than an hour, and Michael . . ."

His husband shrugged. "That's the advantage of being your own boss. I get to come and go - or not come and go - as I choose."

"Michael . . ."

Eli held up a hand, signaling his intention to step into this particular breach. "Michael," he said, very reasonably he thought, "we've noticed that you've been a little out of things lately, and we're worried about you. Don't you think it would be better to get back on the horse, and . . ."

"With all due respect, Eli," Michael retorted, his tone not particularly respectful, "you have no idea what I've been dealing with, and I'm the one who'll decide when it's time to let it go. You just . . ."

"But surely, now," said Monty slowly, "you'll be able to put it all behind you. Since he'll be gone, and . . ."

Michael went very still. "What are you talking about? Who'll be gone?"

"Why, Brian Kinney, of course," Monty replied, with a small note of self-satisfaction in his tone, and a quick glance at his partner that conveyed the tiniest nuance of I-told-you-so. "After today, he'll be . . ."

"What. He'll be what?"

"Oh, no!" Eli managed to sound both confused and embarrassed, although Ben, silently observing the whole act, was almost certain that he was actually neither. "We didn't mean to intrude, Michael, but we were sure that you must know about it. Although, in truth, no one knows exactly where he's going. Only that he's leaving today. And it seems he'll be gone quite a long time. Rumor has it that he's going for treatment, but nobody is sure exactly what that means. Therapy, maybe, to help him deal with how he looks now. After all, it's a far cry from . . . from who he used to be, isn't it?"

Michael stood so quickly that his chair tipped over backwards and crashed to the floor. "I have to go," he said abruptly. "You'll excuse me."

"Oh, but Michael," Monty protested, "you know it's . . . it's almost impossible to get in to see him these days. Between the police and his security people and that guy who's always there with him, and Dr. Keller . . ." The last word was spoken with particular disdain.

Michael barely paused on his way toward the stairs to call out a response. "No. It might be impossible for you to see him, but he'll see me. One way or another."

Ben just happened to be looking at Monty, as the lab technician turned and exchanged quick, but loaded glances with his partner, and knew that something was definitely up, that something was more than it seemed, and abruptly realized that he had never really liked either of the two men very much, although he'd let himself be taken in by their domestic bliss routine during a time when he and Michael had been particularly needy and vulnerable.

But he had no time to pursue that thought for the moment. He had something more important to do, to help his husband prepare for the confrontation he was facing.

The time had come . . . for truth.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Brian sipped at his latte gratefully, favoring Matt Keller with a quick thumbs up while Rick Turnage made new, apparently extensive notes on his PDA, and Cynthia arranged a sheaf of documents that needed Brian's signature.

Completely out of character for her, Cynthia seemed nervous, the papers trembling in her hand as she tried to put them in order, and Brian noticed immediately, despite the fact that she was obviously trying to conceal her unease.

"Matt," Brian said softly, "could you take Pygmalion out of here for a minute? I need to have a brief business discussion with my junior partner."

Rick Turnage turned to stare directly into the eyes of his patient. "Pygmalion?"

Brian shrugged. "Sorry." But his tone made it plain that the apology was just a token.

Turnage was obviously not happy with the comment, but did not resist as Keller, wearing his customary smirk, led the plastic surgeon out into the corridor.

"Junior partner?" Cynthia managed a soft chuckle, still not completely herself, but sounding slightly calmer.

"Actually," Brian replied, reaching over and extracting a file from the nightstand, "yes. All signed, sealed, delivered - and completely legal."

Cynthia's eyes grew huge as she stared at the document he'd placed in her hand. "Brian," she whispered, "no. I can't accept this. I can't let you . . ."

She saw the smile in his eyes. "You can't stop me. It's done."
"But . . ."

"Cynthia," he said earnestly, "you need to understand this. No matter how much he insists otherwise, there's no guarantee that God-the-Surgeon's-Son out there is going to be able to do what he says he can. There's no guarantee that I will ever come back here. And, if that's how it all turns out, you're the person who'll have to run Kinnetic for me. For me, and for Gus. And for you . . . and Katy."

She took a deep, shaky breath. "For you," she whispered. "And for Gus and Katy. But only until you come home. I will not accept that you won't be coming back. You promise me, Brian, that you'll come back to us - no matter what. Do you really think I give a shit what you look like? Do you really think any of us care about that?"

He sighed. "Some will, and you know as well as I do that, in advertising, image is everything. Kinnetic needs a pretty face to present to the world. And now - that's you."

She nodded. "But only until it's you again."

He managed a small laugh. "Okay. If that's how you want to look at it."

She looked at the document again, which granted her a ten per cent interest in the company. "There are some people who are not going to be pleased with this," she said slowly.

He shrugged. "Fuck 'em all, Girl Friday."

She hesitated, then nodded. "Okay. Fuck 'em all. Now sign this shit for me so I can . . ."

"No need," he reminded her. "Your signature will work just as well."

"Maybe so, but I . . ."

She was interrupted by a commotion at the door and a cacophony of voices, as Chris McClaren left his post by the window, where he had been discreetly pretending not to hear the exchange between Brian and his assistant, and hurried to intercept whatever trouble might be trying to break in.

Trouble, as it turned out, was embodied in one dark-haired young man with determination in his belly and fire in his eye and his hunky partner-in-crime at his heels.

"Brian!" Michael's voice rang out like a rifle shot. "If you don't let me in, I'm going to tell my mother what really happened to her souvenir hurricane glass from Pat O'Brien's. I'm going to tell Horvath who really glued Judge Roy to the toilet seat. I'm going to . . ."

"Fuck!" said Brian, trying to concede defeat gracefully. "Let him in before he wakes the dead."

Michael didn't wait for a formal invitation, but forged inside, actually nudging Chris McClaren out of his way and leaving Ben to follow as best he could.

"Fuck you, Brian Kinney!" Michael snarled, stopping beside the bed and staring down at the man who had been his best friend since junior high school. "You're fuckin' pathetic, you know that?"

Brian simply blinked, and resorted to his coldest, most condescending manner. "What the fuck are you raving about?"

But Michael was not buying it. Instead, he simply leaned forward and kissed Brian - the kind of kiss that they only exchanged when their feelings were too profound for words. "Mikey . . ."
"Shut up, Brian!" Michael snapped. "And listen to me. Are you listening?"

Brian was not quite able to suppress a reluctant smile. "Yes. I'm listening."

Michael sat down on the edge of the bed, and stared daggers at Chris McClaren when it appeared that young man might step forward and try to pull him away. "Do you have any idea," he asked, returning his attention to his old friend, "how stupid I feel? That it took Ben to figure it out, and show me what you were up to? That I thought I knew you better than anybody, but never understood what you always tried to do?"

"Mikey . . ."

"I said, Shut - Up!" Michael retorted. "For once - just this once - you're going to listen to me. You're going to hear me. Understand?"

The smile was almost a grin now. "Yes, Boss."

"Sometimes, Ben understands me better than I understand myself. I know you probably think that's bullshit, considering your attitude about marriage and monogamy, but it's true anyway. He's the one who figured out how much I was hurting - inside - when I turned my back on you. And he's the one who reminded me that you've always protected me, even when I didn't understand that I needed protecting. And, finally, he's the one who's always known how much I loved you - how much I still love you. And I don't give a flying fuck whether you're still the beautiful Brian Kinney or you look like some ugly troll." His voice went soft then, as his eyes were suddenly filled with tears. "You're still my Brian, and you will always be young and beautiful to me, because I don't see you with my eyes. I see you . . . with my heart."

"Mikey . . ."

"Shut up. I'm not done."

"But . . ."

Ben was smiling. "I'd advise you to do as you're told, Mr. Kinney. He's in rare form today."

"Yeah," Brian muttered, "and it's all your fault."

"No more games, Brian," Michael said softly. "You've managed to fool just about everybody, for as long as I can remember, but you keep forgetting that I know you; I know what's under all the bullshit, and I'm not buying into the act any more. You're going away from us - today, if I heard right - but you're never going to be able to leave me behind. Because I'm always with you. And I always know what you are." He leaned forward and pressed a kiss to Brian's forehead. "You're my best friend, and I love you, and I know what you deserve out of life."

"Yeah?" There was only a faint tremor in Brian's voice, but it was definitely there. "And what's that?"

"The best." Michael was absolutely certain. "Because that's what you are - the best friend a man could ask for."

"Mikey?"

"Yeah?"

"You're pathetic."
"I know."

"And I'm no angel, you know. In fact, I'm still more sinning than sinned against."

Michael blinked. "Huh?"

Ben chuckled. "Only Brian Kinney can twist Shakespeare around to suit his own purposes."

But Michael was not - quite - done. He had come to get an answer - one particular answer - and he wasn't leaving without it.

He looked down at Brian's face and waited until his old friend met his gaze, his eyes steady and unshadowed. "Do you still love me?" He asked, his voice feather soft, his heart in his throat.

Brian knew he should deny it. Knew that it would be the smart thing to do, for everyone's sake, especially Michael's. And he had always had the ability to lie without reservation, without qualms, when the need was dire.

Only, for some ungodly reason, not this time.

"Always have," he answered finally, lifting his hand to touch Michael's face. "Always will."

Michael took a moment to close his eyes and revel in the gentle touch of the fingers against his face. "Me too," he murmured finally. "And when I call you, you better fucking answer your phone. Am I allowed to know where you're going?"

Brian looked up and saw the warning in Chris McClaren's eyes. "It's better that you don't," he answered. "Better for you, and better for me."

Michael nodded, reluctantly, and looked over at his partner only to see that Ben was studying Chris McClaren's expression with great interest. He'd have to make a mental note to question his partner about what he'd found so interesting.

"One more thing," said Brian, as Michael hugged him, albeit very gently. "The people who did this ..." He drew a deep shaky breath, "they weren't kidding, Mikey. They meant to do as much damage as they could, to me and to the people I care about. And that could include you. So you promise me that you'll be careful. Okay?"

"Okay."

"Promise."

"I promise."

"Swear it!"

Michael was, by this time, having trouble seeing through the tears clouding his eyes. "I swear it, if you'll swear that you'll come back to us." He paused for a moment to regain his composure. "Nothing would ever be the same, without you."

Good-byes followed - quick, brisk, tearless. Mostly. Until there were only the patient, his primary physician, and his FBI bodyguard/pseudo-lover left in the room.

"You okay, Brian?" Keller's tone was very gentle.

"Fabulous," came the cold, clipped answer. "Why wouldn't I be?"
Keller leaned forward, ostensibly to check the security of the patient's IV line, but managing, in the process, to lay a tender palm against a bare patch of skin. "No reason," he replied. But his touch said much more. "The chopper will be here soon, so they'll be moving you up to the roof in a few minutes."

He started to pull away, but Brian caught his hand and held him motionless for a moment. "Thanks, Matt. I won't forget everything you did for me."

Keller grinned. "Damned right you won't. I intend to hold it over your head, forever." Then he dropped a quick kiss on Brian's forehead, and he was gone.

Minutes later, so was Brian.

The half-played chess game lay on the table before them, mostly forgotten, as Justin's eyes wandered repeatedly to the brilliant morning light pouring through the windows. His companion took another sip from the super-sized cup of Starbuck's French roast, extra bold coffee, a treat his young friend had brought to him every morning since he'd discovered how much Cedric longed for the taste of the dark roast blend native to his hometown. This was not real Cajun coffee, but it would do in a pinch.

They had started their game early, as they did almost every morning, since neither ever managed to sleep late given the general clamor of the hospital setting. Cedric, of course, had a designated room as part of his rehab program, but Justin tended to roam the corridors of the facility, sleeping wherever the notion took him - waiting rooms, consulting rooms, even empty patients' beds, on occasion.

Many of the staff members knew, of course, but they also knew why he was here, since several of them were part of his information network, helping him to keep tabs on the condition of one Brian Kinney. Doing so was, of course, against any number of regulations - local, state, and federal - but somehow, none of those he had enlisted could quite find it in themselves to deny his request for help. They laughed at themselves when they realized that they were moved to help him for ridiculously romantic reasons, but there it was, and they did not shirk their duties to him. He was young; he was beautiful, and what had happened to the man he obviously loved so desperately was enough to motivate anyone to try to help him.

At any rate, they all turned a blind eye to his transgressions, and did their best to grant him whatever comfort he managed to take from his desperate situation.

He sighed as he looked once more out into the sunshine, and thought about simple things like walking in the park, and floating in a pool, and driving with the top down. With Brian, of course. Otherwise, it just didn't matter.

Then he looked back at his friend, and read sad comprehension in the old man's eyes. His throat felt dry, and a glance at his watch revealed that he had been talking for more than an hour. He hadn't realized it had been so long; also hadn't realized how much he'd wanted to have someone listen to his story - his whole story, stretching from that first moment under a streetlight on Liberty Avenue, through his misadventure in a parking garage, his dalliance with Ethan, Brian's cancer and the whole Stockwell debacle, his glamorous stint in Hollywood, the bombing at Babylon, the wedding that didn't happen, and all the long hours since that last moment he'd spent with the man who still owned - would always own - his heart.

Cedric had been extraordinarily attentive, asking questions when appropriate, but mostly just listening.
When Justin had finally fallen silent, after struggling through a rough but thorough description of what had been done to Brian, and how he'd behaved afterwards, Cedric had nodded, and taken a few minutes to consider what he'd heard.

Justin was still waiting to hear whatever wisdom Cedric might have to offer in response.

The first thing the elderly man said puzzled him.

"If I were to tell you that your entire story involved the regular repetition of three little words, what do you think I'd be talking about?"

Justin smiled. "Guess there's no denying that I love him."

Cedric nodded. "I know that you do, Justin, but those aren't the three words I'm talking about."

"They're not?" Justin was honestly confused.

"No. They're not. You tell your story beautifully, you know, and you make your feelings for him very clear. Not to mention painting him with words almost as beautifully as I'm sure you paint him in oils. But this, ultimately, was not the story of how much you love him. The three words that you repeated - not just once, but several times - are, 'I left him'. Does it really surprise you so much that he has begun to doubt your willingness to base your life on your feelings for him?"

"But . . ."

"Especially," continued the older man gently, "if he's one of those noble souls who tends to blame himself for all the sins of the world. As I suspect he is."

"Brian?" Justin laughed. "Brian never blames himself for anything. He thinks he's perfect - above reproach."

Cedric's smile was very gentle. "Does he now?"

"Yes, he . . ." Justin fell silent, struck by a series of memories. Brian's face when he was trying to help Justin regain his memory of his bashing - white, and still and clinched with pain. Brian's face whenever he had refused to bind Justin or Lindsey or Michael - or anyone at all - to him whenever they chose to escape his grasp; Brian, resisting help or sympathy when he was diagnosed with cancer and didn't wish to be a burden to anyone; Brian after the bombing, helpless and desperate to make up for something he had no part in, but . . .

Could it really be that simple?

Cedric smiled again. "Perhaps you need to rethink your conclusions."

"Yeah." Justin felt like a kid with a brand new toy, eager to explore whatever it offered. "Maybe I do."

"Justin!" It was Roy Guerrio, one of the housekeeping staff who regularly worked the wind where Brian's room was located. "I've been looking all over for you."

"Hey, Roy," he replied. "What's up?"

The big, black man rolled his eyes. "What's up, Blondie, is that there's a medical chopper coming in for a landing as we speak, and your boyfriend is going to be loaded onto it, heading for parts unknown. And if you're gonna catch him before he's gone, you better skedaddle right now."
"What? What the fuck? Why didn't anybody tell me?"

Justin was already on his feet, racing toward the elevators.

"Not that way," shouted the housekeeper. "Take the stairs to the roof. It'll be faster. As for why nobody told you, it was top secret, I guess. I don't think anybody knew."

But he was talking to thin air, as Justin had already slammed through the door to the stairwell.

Chris McClaren didn't like rooftops. They made him nervous - too exposed, too lonely, too open, too unprotected. But since one couldn't very well land a helicopter in a parking garage, he supposed he'd just have to deal with it.

He had posted look-outs, both police officers and Mathis' security guards, and the bureau was monitoring everything via satellite. But he still didn't like it.

The chopper was heading toward them from the South, and would arrive within two minutes, and then it would be a matter of moments to get Brian and the plastic surgeon aboard for a short hop to a small local airport where they would board a private jet to complete their journey to the coastal area of North Carolina where Turnage's ultra-upscale, ultra-private little clinic and the cottage that had been rented for Brian's use were located - places that would be considerably easier to secure than this giant, sprawling complex.

But first they had to get there.

Brian was seated in his wheelchair, with a nurse close at hand to monitor his condition and his vital signs, while Rick Turnage asked him a series of questions, referring to information in the voluminous chart he had extracted from his briefcase.

A clatter behind them caused McClaren to spin toward the disturbance, and he had almost drawn his sidearm before he realized who it was who was racing toward them across the flat surface of the roof. A quick hand signal alerted the security people that the threat was not a real threat, but he shuddered to think how easily the situation could have gotten out of hand if Taylor had not been so instantly recognizable.

"Brian!" The young man wasn't wasting any energy in trying to approach quietly. "Brian, wait!"

McClaren glanced down at Kinney, and saw the renewed surge of despair in his eyes.

Justin was just a few feet away before he seemed to realize that he might be crossing some line that he should not cross and slid to a halt. "Where," he asked, gasping to catch his breath, "are you going?"

Once more, Brian had cause to be grateful for the bandages obscuring his face. Even wearing the mask, he wasn't entirely sure that his hunger for his former lover might not be glowing in his eyes, so he was careful to keep his gaze turned toward the approaching helicopter.

"I don't see why you need to know that," he replied shortly.

"But why? How can you be sure you'll be safe out there, wherever you're going?"

Brian's snicker was particularly nasty. "Like I was safe here, you mean?"
"No, I . . ."

"I told you to go home," Brian continued sharply. "Why are you still here?"

If McClaren had foreseen it, or been quick enough, he would have stepped in to intercept the young man, but Justin was surprisingly quick, and was on his knees at Brian's feet before anyone had a chance to react.

"Because I love you. And because I know you still love me, no matter how much you claim otherwise."

Brian closed his eyes, and only McClaren was close enough to notice how much he was trembling as he fought to regain his emotional control. "If you really love me," he said finally, softly, "you'll do as I ask and let me go. I can't spend my life waiting for you to make up your mind, Justin. You wanted your freedom; now you have it. So go. Fly away."

Tears trembled on blond lashes, as a gentle hand reached up to touch Brian's face. He flinched away, but not quite quickly enough to prevent Justin from caressing his cheek, the gentleness of the touch feeling like a redhot brand against his skin.

"I can't fly without you, and I know you don't mean it. Please, Brian. Don't leave me."

"I have to," Brian whispered, suddenly weary of it all. "I'm tired, Justin. I can't do this any more. I need you . . . to let me go."

Justin studied his face, trying to see through the bandages, trying to read an expression he couldn't see, but all he could actually see were Brian's eyes, which seemed to be filled with an almost unbearable sadness.

"Is that what you really want?"

Brian thought his heart might shatter in his chest as he recognized the defeat in Justin's weary voice.

"It is," he answered, forcing himself to allow nothing of his grief to color his tone.

"Then show me," Justin demanded. "Say good-bye, exactly the way you always have."

Brian didn't know if he could endure this, but he knew what he had to do. He leaned forward, and reached out to caress beautiful, pale, silken skin and hair shining like spun gold in the bright morning light. Then he touched his lips to the mouth that he would have gladly spent a lifetime devouring, if fate had only allowed it, and traced his tongue across its sensual curve.

"I did love you," he whispered, barely able to swallow the tears rising in his throat, "but it's time to let it go."

Justin simply nodded. Then he stood up and walked away. He never looked back as he heard the helicopter settle to the roof behind him, and was buffeted by the wild cyclonic swirl of its landing.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

tbc
The hook had been set by virtue of a lot of careful preparation - and a little bit of luck - but reeling in the catch, without allowing it to wriggle free, would require the touch of a master. Luckily, Jared Hilliard was a skilled angler, so to speak.

Fine-tuned orchestration of the events following the attempt to burn down Brian Kinney's residence had gotten exactly the results that Lance Mathis and his team had intended, but not without a concentrated effort. The police and security pursuit of the culprits had been an intense exercise requiring precision timing and just a tiny nuance of slight-of-hand - a deliberate choreography of glancing blows and near misses, culminating in Hilliard leading his two marks into the basement of an abandoned building with only seconds to spare as a group of pursuers rounded an adjacent corner to find themselves charging into a blind alley with no obvious means of escape.

The window through which the three had gained entrance to the old building was small and low to the ground, and almost invisible behind a couple of trash barrels, unless, of course, one knew where to look. It was the perfect hiding place, noted and prepared well in advance, and the two young targets had never thought to question Hilliard's knowledge of it. He was, after all, a street person - homeless, vagrant, and dependent on his familiarity with such places for his survival.

They had waited in dark, damp, almost breathless silence as the search had progressed, and Hilliard had been forced to hide a smile as the police personnel had played their parts admirably, two of them, at one point, even pausing just outside the window for a cigarette and a casual discussion about why they had to waste their time "protecting a little queer like Brian Kinney", all carefully scripted, of course, to encourage the targets of the sting to begin to develop a sense of security.

The two young hoodlums had been so terrified of being found out that they'd alternated between struggling to breathe and shaking so violently that the tympanic rhythm of their knees knocking together had almost certainly been audible to the search party lingering nearby, but, in the end, all necessary parts had been perfectly played, and Jared Hilliard, AKA Jed Harper, had ingratiated himself into the lives of his new buddies, having given them cause to be extremely grateful for his intervention. He had also realized, almost immediately, that these two were mere tools in the hands of the still unknown, faceless individuals who had been responsible for the original attack and everything since. Neither Buddy Charles nor Pete Ruiz, in spite of their superficial façade of street creds, were capable of conceiving or implementing any kind of plan for causing damage or pain for Brian Kinney; in fact, neither of them even knew who he was or why he had been targeted. Thus, they were useless in helping to understand the motivations or the goals of the powers behind the plot. But they did possess one bit of knowledge that might prove invaluable to the investigation. They didn't know the basic truths behind the attack, but they knew someone who did, or who, at least, could provide the next link the chain. Thus, they were worth cultivating as a source.

With a little luck and a judicious application of his own very specific brand of street smarts, he would be able to convert that asset into coin that would move the investigation closer to its desired conclusion - the identification and apprehension of the individuals who had fired the opening salvo in this little homophobic campaign that was threatening to develop into a full-fledged war of attrition.

But he needed to exercise extreme caution in taking the next move; the prey was still skittish, and his access to the lowest level of the conspiracy was no more than a toehold. He would need to be slow, methodical, and extremely wary in trying to expand it, but he already had an inkling of how to go about it, always providing that he could get help from his contacts or make that Kinney's contacts, within the ranks of Pittsburgh's finest. He had talked to Mathis about his idea, and found him receptive, but the next step meant discussing the scenario with Horvath, who might be less willing to take a chance.

Still, it was time to concentrate on doing his part - taking the next baby step - before worrying about calling in the cavalry.

His cover was still intact. To reinforce it, and prevent any trace of suspicion about a connection to the area around Kinney's loft, he had gone back earlier in the day to remove his makeshift shelter from its position across from the building that was Kinney's residence. He had been circumspect in his movements, careful to preserve the lackadaisical quality of his decision to move on so that any observer would conclude that he was simply wandering off in search of easier pickings. Meanwhile, the less-random-than-they-seemed patrols of the neighborhood would continue, and a new protocol had been established, involving 24-hour surveillance - four team members, in six-hour shifts, patrolling the interior perimeter of the building's ground floor, behind newly-installed window tinting which would prevent their presence from being detected, as they made their rounds and made use of the continuous electronic monitoring which Mathis had implemented immediately after Brian's rescue.

Thus, Hilliard did not feel as if he were deserting his post; instead, he was marginally convinced that he was making real progress toward finding answers.

When he arrived at the site of his new flop, he paused for a moment, looking out across the abandoned park that was his destination, to the spires of the old church which was even older than most of the buildings around it, and spent a few minutes trying to imagine what the area might have been like during its early years. Now it was a blight upon the face of the city, dark and stained and derelict, a slum in every sense of the word and a far cry from what it had once been.

Reilly Flats had once been a working class neighborhood, which had begun its life as a semi-rural hamlet clustered around a general store, a barbershop, a dilapidated old Esso station (long before the advent of the ubiquitous Exxon logo) and a tiny pub, all huddled close against the solid gothic walls (and the solid moral compass) of the Holy Name Catholic Church, located beyond the extreme outskirts of the city. It had flourished with a true village mentality only to eventually be engulfed by the urban sprawl of greater Pittsburgh. In the course of its evolution, it had spread out to become a vast area which - remarkably - managed to retain a small-town sense of neighborhood. It had been composed almost entirely of single family dwellings: small, one- or two-story clapboard houses with covered, hospitable front porches, narrow basements, and detached single-car garages, constructed on shallow lots and providing shelter for lower middle-class factory workers - employees of the steel industry and chemical plants and foundries, tool and die makers, canneries, trucking firms, paper mills, and bottling companies. Small, grassy back yards provided space for multiple strands of clothes lines and tiny concrete-block patios supporting barbeque pits made from 55-gallon drums, all built within walking distance of a city block-sized expanse, locally known as Darby's Field, with a tiny little pond at the northern end and a fenced-off baseball diamond at the other, a simple venue which was a combination playground, athletic field, and gathering place for use by the whole community.

During the middle years of the twentieth century, the Flats had been home to a predominantly white population, many of them second or third-generation descendents of Irish or German or Italian immigrants, hard-working and fiercely independent. Though never home to the social or cultural elite, or the wealthy or politically prominent, it had been a good place to live, the kind of grass roots, heartland community that contributed greatly to the world's idea of what comprised the American dream. Despite occasional hard economic times and cyclical troubles, it had been a product of American's Age of Innocence - a surprisingly safe refuge from the darker times looming on every horizon. Brian Kinney and Michael Novotny and the others who were part of their crowd would not understand how much it was missed by some of the people who had been a part of it, but Debbie Novotny understood it perfectly, having been born and raised within its borders; it had always bothered her that her son had never experienced that kind of social innocence - an urban world where children had been able to play safely in and around the streets without having parents driven instantly to a state of panic if their offspring were out of sight or out of mind for a few hours, and where terms like "child molester" and "pedophile" and "sexual predator" had not yet become a part of the lexicon of the streets.

Maybe, Debbie sometimes thought, it had not been Camelot or Xanadu or Shangri-La - exactly, but, in retrospect, it seemed to have come very close.

But time, economic fluctuations, and the eventual decline of the steel industry had caused elementary changes in the neighborhood. The old-timers who had built the area during the halcyon days of their youth, had died off, and the younger generation had migrated to the suburbs, while the infrastructure had deteriorated. Single-family dwellings had gone to ruin over the years as personal income had declined, and the erection of cheaply-built housing projects and multi-storied warrens masquerading as apartment houses had resulted in an influx of the poor, the unemployed, and the uneducated.

Nobody was ever exactly sure when the much-lamented community had disappeared, lost beneath the rise of the ghetto.

Darby Field, once the site of softball tournaments and 4th of July celebrations and block parties and impromptu hockey games and intense snowball fights during the long, dark winter months, was now little more than a trash-filled, overgrown vacant lot that provided a short cut from one crowded, dirty street to the next, with nothing more than a few cracked concrete slabs scattered here and there, the half-collapsed skeleton of a tin-roofed section of bleachers and one rusted basketball hoop dangling from a broken backboard to remind anyone of what it had once been.

Jared Hilliard chose his spot carefully, tucked away beneath the only remaining part of the bleachers that had not caved in upon itself. It was not, in truth, much of a shelter, but it was better than some other places he had used during his years as an undercover cop in his native city of Baltimore, when playing the role that allowed him to develop a rapport with the street people who often knew much more about truth and reality than the so-called respectable members of a given society might realize. His efforts had earned him a nickname within the department that he'd been rather fond of - the Chameleon. But these days, he didn't allow himself to spend much time thinking about those years, or the career that was irrevocably lost to him when a drugged-out prostitute had shot him in the back while he was defending her from the pimp who was trying to carve her into mincemeat. Sixteen months later, after multiple surgeries and intensive rehab, he had been informed by his oh-so-sympathetic superiors that the damage caused by his injury precluded his return to his previous job. Instead, he was offered a position overseeing the evidence locker at central headquarters - a position most frequently filled by beat cops no longer able to deal with the rigors of patrol and biding their time until they had sufficient tenure to retire.

He had considered the offer for exactly two minutes before surrendering his gun and his badge to the lieutenant who had been charged with breaking the news. Then he had walked out of the precinct office, never to return.

It had been the end of a dream he had pursued throughout his youth, beginning with his stint in the army which provided the funding to allow him to earn a criminal justice degree in order to qualify for a professional-level position with the police department where his two older brothers were both employed as patrolmen.

He had left Baltimore a week later, finding employment with a private security firm in Philadelphia, quickly establishing himself as an expert in undercover surveillance. A year later, the company had expanded and opened an office in Pittsburgh, and Hilliard had accepted an assignment there, only to find, to his complete astonishment, a home, like none he had ever known before.

He still didn't understand why the city had immediately felt so familiar to him, or why he had realized that it was the place he was meant to be, but he did not try to deny it. He had always been a big believer in taking life as it came to him, and Pittsburgh, for whatever reason, had come to him like a revelation. It was home, and it always would be, even though the job - and the people he worked for
- still left a great deal to be desired. A few months later, reacting to a vague sense of wanderlust, he had found himself strolling into a pool hall on Liberty Avenue and striking up a conversation with a friendly young executive-type named Lawrence Blanchard, who was, at that time, chief of security for Kinnetic Corp, the predecessor of Lance Mathis.

The rest, he thought, as he gazed out across a field of broken memories, was history.

Well - almost.

He had liked Lawrence Blanchard immediately, finding him approachable, hip, direct, and blessed with an understated, wickedly dry sense of humor that reminded Jared of his baby brother, David.
Jared's father, a deeply religious man with iron-clad protestant convictions, had always mourned his youngest son's sharp tongue and smart mouth, generally labeling his attitude and his commentary as blasphemous, but Jared had always preferred to describe young David's outlook on life as both remarkably accurate and extremely irreverent - a combination he enjoyed enormously. Blanchard and David would have gotten along beautifully, he thought, and when Blanchard offered him a job as assistant security director at Kinnetic, after having known him only a matter of hours, explaining that the position would entail being part of a team dedicated to protecting the interests of the Liberty Avenue version of Casanova, he had accepted without a second thought, thoroughly intrigued. Any man who could inspire such a sobriquet he knew he had to meet.

Later, he would come to speculate about how his younger sibling would have reacted to the colorful
- many would say flamboyant - individual who was both the source and the focus of his employment.
Conversely, he never had to wonder what his father would have thought of Brian Kinney. Jared had been present at Kinnetic - the very first shift of his very first day on the job - on the occasion of Brian's infamous shouting match with his mother, after his bout with cancer, and the security guard had known immediately how difficult it must have been for Brian to endure the condemnation that was written so large on his mother's face as she'd hastened out of her son's office; Jared had known because he had endured something very similar on the day his father had learned that his third child
- the fine, upstanding, police-officer son, who had always been his pride and joy - was not quite as much an adherent to the straight and narrow path as he'd always believed.

After Joan Kinney had made her escape from her son's presence and from his life, undoubtedly washing her hands of him and wiping the dust of the place from her feet in a manner befitting Biblical decree, Jared had stood in the lobby for a few minutes, remembering his own feelings following his father's rejection, which had come in the form of an eerily calm announcement of Hilliard Sr.'s certainty that no fornicating abomination could possibly be a son of his. That occasion had been followed by the same kind of stunned silence that followed Brian's mother's departure, as everyone else in the building had seemed frozen and uncertain of what - if anything - should be done, but Jared had acted instinctively, going to Brian's office and knocking on the door, not even sure what he meant to say, but knowing he had to say something.

He had been surprised to find Brian smiling when he'd stepped into the office, and he'd faltered then, suddenly wondering if his presence might be considered intrusive rather than supportive.

Brian had looked at him, interest flickering in beautiful hazel eyes, but with no real sense of recognition.

"What's up?" the heart and soul of Kinnetic had asked, his smile growing larger as he'd apparently found some cause for obscure amusement in his own words.

"Are you . . . all right, Mr. Kinney?"

Brian had frowned then. "And that would be your concern, how, exactly?"

Hilliard had offered a small shrug. "It's what I get paid to do."

"What? Sticking your nose in my business?"

Hilliard, with absolutely no indication of embarrassment or apology, had replied, "No. Protecting you."

Brian had paused, looking confused. "From my mother?" There'd been no mistaking the degree of his incredulity.

And Hilliard had laughed, recognizing the farcical nature of the moment, prompting Brian to laugh with him, while asking, "By the way, who the fuck are you?"

That had been their formal introduction, and they had shared a few laughs about it since then, mostly late at night when Brian was working after hours on some special project and had invited Jared in for brandy and cigars. Brian had, of course, given the comely security guard the de rigueur once over that was expected of him in any face-to-face encounter with an attractive man, and Hilliard had recognized, immediately, that the man did not believe in fouling his own nest - which, he occasionally admitted in the privacy of his own thoughts, was a real pity. However, as time had passed, Hilliard had discovered something about his employer that had surprised him, once he'd managed to get beyond the levels of attraction and desire that Kinney inspired in almost everyone. He had expected to lust after the man; he had definitely not expected to like or admire him.

In some ways, such feelings made his job easier. In others, much more complicated.

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

He unloaded his belongings from the shabby old wheelbarrow that served as his means of transport, and proceeded to erect his shelter, re-using plastic sheeting and cardboard and an assortment of items salvaged from trash barrels and dumpsters. He had been doing such tasks over such a long period of time that it had become routine, requiring little in the way of conscious thought, and allowing him to concentrate his attention elsewhere.

Thus, he was instantly aware of the approach of the two teen-agers who had urged him to take up residence here, within the area that they considered their own stomping ground, where - they had suggested - their extended families would welcome him to the neighborhood, which, of course, was exactly the kind of connection that Hilliard had been anticipating.

"Hey, Jed," said Buddy, as he knelt at the entrance to the newly constructed shelter, "why were you hanging out in Queerville? I mean, you're not . . . like that, are you?"

Hilliard fixed the teen-ager with a stern glare. "How is that any of your business, Punk? And what have you got against queers anyway?"

"They're queers," the boy answered, obviously feeling no need for any further explanation.
"Yeah, well, let me tell you something, Stud," Hilliard replied. "A little piece of wisdom, just in case you ever find yourself in dire need. The people who live there - in the area you call Queerville - are a hell of a lot more generous than your ordinary man on the street. Ask anyone who's ever been homeless, and they'll tell you that you've got a lot better shot at getting help from the fags on Liberty Avenue than the solid citizens of Shadyside or Squirrel Hill."

"Yeah," said Pete Ruiz doubtfully, "but they're queers."

Hilliard sighed. "Yeah. I believe that's already been established. So just so we're clear on it. Is that why you were trying to burn down Kinney's loft? Because he's a fag?"

Ruiz shrugged. "That's enough, ain't it?"

"Actually, it's not," Hilliard answered. "You took a really stupid risk. For what? So you'd get some kind of silly kick out of some secondhand account of the blaze? I mean, it's not like you were going to get the chance to stand around and watch it go up in smoke. And why that specific place, for fuck's sake? There are plenty of easier targets on Liberty Avenue. Like I told you, the guy that lives there has more money than God, and lots of friends, so, if you're not angling for a long stay at Frackville, you'll pick better targets for your petty vandalism."

"Look," said Ruiz, "it wasn't like that. We were just doing something for . . ."

"For kicks," Charles interrupted, an angry warning blazing in his eyes as he glared at his friend. "Look, Bro, we know we were stupid, and it could have gone bad for us if you hadn't stepped in. So we owe you one. And my mom - she wants you to come have supper with us. Tonight?"

Hilliard looked askance at the young black man whose skin was the color of dark honey and very beautiful. "Wait a minute. You told her? She knows what happened, what you did?"

The teen-ager grinned. "I may be young, but I'm not brainless. Of course, I didn't tell her the truth. She got a slightly edited version. She thinks you saved me and Pete from a bunch of North Charles Street Crips."

Hilliard drew a deep breath. "And now you expect me to what? Go along with your lies."

Charles shrugged. "All you have to do is nod and just agree with whatever she says. It'll be okay. And when's the last time you had a real home-cooked meal, Dude? She's a great cook. Even rich white dudes can't get enough of her cooking."

"Yeah?" Hilliard laughed. "And how many rich white dudes drop in for dinner at your house?"

The youth rolled his eyes. "Not at my house, Asshole. At her job. She cooks for this fancy rich man's club out in the north hills."

Hilliard frowned and looked out across the park toward the drab concrete façade of an apartment tower, knowing that he needed to shore up his image as a homeless veteran. "I don't do too well in social settings," he explained. "I'd probably make your mother uncomfortable."

Pete Ruiz leaned against an upright support beam and lit a cigarette. "No worries, Man. Buddy's dad was a Viet Nam vet, who came back home with lots of problems - physical and mental - so there's not much you could throw at Miss Rachel that she couldn't handle."

Hilliard's eyes were suddenly full of shadows. "You don't know what the fuck you're talking about."

Buddy Charles frowned. "Okay. You're right. I don't know. But it's just one meal, and my mom really wants to thank you for your help. One hot meal and a few hours inside, where it's warm. What have you got to lose?"

Hilliard managed - barely - not to smile, as he concluded that the important question was actually the reverse of the one the boy had posed. What, after all, did he have to gain?

Brian relaxed against the suede softness of the plush recliner, noting to himself that traveling via private jet was definitely the way to hop across the country, held tenderly in the lap of luxury. He tried not to fidget under the attentions of the nurse who was cutting away the last of his bandages. Ordinarily, he would not have resisted the gentle touch of a human hand - even of the female persuasion - but he was tired of having people treat him as he were made of fragile crystal, just one high C away from shattering.

Brian Kinney was nothing if not tough, despite the perfection of his face and form.

He frowned. Make that the former perfection of his face and form. How long would it be, he wondered, before the self image within his mind matched the reality of the vision he might glimpse in any mirror. And how long before he came to envy Count Dracula’s immunity to reflection?

He turned his head then, to glance out the window and spotted the distinctive sprawl of the nation's capital laid out beyond the port wing, the curve of the Potomac glittering in the brilliance of the afternoon sunlight. Chris McClaren was watching as well, sipping at a glass of very old, very expensive single malt whiskey which had been served up by the lone flight attendant who was still standing nearby, waiting to respond to the beck and call of any of the plane's passengers. Or the man who was, undoubtedly, her lord and master.

Rick Turnage was, of course, ignoring them all, giving his full attention to an image on his computer screen.

"Nice wheels, Doc," said Brian, his eyes taking in the details of the luxuriously furnished main cabin of the Lear Jet.

Turnage didn't even lift his eyes as he offered up a minimal response. "It serves the purpose."

"Please, Mr. Kinney," said Brenda Herring softly, as she attempted to wipe away the last of the adhesive residue from his face while maintaining a professional demeanor. "Just a few more moments and we'll be done here."

When Brian flinched away from her touch as she was forced to rub forcefully at a stubborn spot, she recoiled slightly. "I'm so sorry," she murmured. "Dr. Turnage needs to be able to examine you thoroughly, so we need to remove every trace of this adhesive, but I'm trying not to hurt you."

Brian looked up into gentle gray eyes, and frowned. "How did you," he asked in a tone that managed to combine tender regard with more than a touch of sarcasm, "wind up with him?"

Rick Turnage was still busy at a miniature version of the desk that occupied center stage in his office at home. "Brenda supplies what I can't," he volunteered, looking up quickly to confront his patient with cold blue eyes. "Coddling."

Brian surprised himself by responding with a bark of laughter. "I hope you pay her extremely well. Making up for your singular bedside manner must be a particularly demanding, almost full-time job."

Turnage frowned. "What I pay my assistant," he said slowly, "is none of your concern, Mr. Kinney.
But I'm curious about what you're expecting from me. If you want me to stroke your ego - which doesn't appear to need any stroking, from me or anyone else - then you're in the wrong place. I assure you, there are plenty of sycophants out there who'll be happy to hold your hand and moan and groan with you over the cruelty of fate and your terrible misfortune. If that's what you want."

Brian's smile was cold. "It's not. I don't need anyone to grieve on my behalf."

"Good, because that's something I can't give you, although I'm sure Brenda will be glad to manufacture tears for you, if it'll make you feel any better."

The nurse in question simply continued with her task of cleaning Brian's face, but her smile as she did so was very sweet, and her touch seemed to grow even more gentle, managing to convey her message without ever actually needing to speak.

"On the other hand," said Turnage, rising and moving to Brian's side with a small leather pouch in his hand, "if you want the damage that was done to you repaired, you're exactly where you need to be."

Brian took a moment to study the man's expression before choosing his response. "All right, Doc. It's time for truth - with all cards on the table. I understand that medicine is not really an exact science - that there are no iron-clad guarantees. But I want your best professional opinion. Do you really believe that you can fix this?" He lifted one hand in a gesture that managed to convey the full sweep of his injuries.

Turnage did not answer immediately, and Brian found that he was grateful for that. He did not want knee-jerk assurances and easy promises. He wanted the truth - or as much of it as the physician was capable of providing.

The doctor leaned forward, his eyes examining every detail of the patient's features, taking in the full extent of the damage; what would fade with time, what would heal without intervention, and, more importantly, what would not. He wanted to be glib in his response, cocksure and unapologetic and disdainful of any possibility of failure; it was an attitude he frequently assumed in such moments.

Only . . . Shit!

Instead of offering his customary arrogant assurances, he surprised himself by settling into the chair at Brian's side and choosing his words carefully. "You're right. As much as I might prefer to disagree, I cannot promise you - without reservation - that it will be possible to 'fix you', as you put it. But I will tell you this; if I can't do it, it can't be done. And I firmly believe that I can not only repair the damage . . ." He could not suppress the gleam of avarice that flared in his eyes, "I can improve on the original. You'll not only be the beautiful Brian Kinney again; you'll be better."

"No, I won't."

Turnage frowned. "Why not?"

Brian chose to favor Nurse Brenda with his most brilliant smile, which still managed - somehow - to be brilliant despite the terrible mutilation caused by his injuries. "Because you can't improve on perfection."

The nurse squeezed his hand, barely managing to swallow the little laugh that his insouciance had triggered. It was truly a marvel, she thought, that a man so severely damaged could still manage to touch the hearts of those around him. She also noted that Chris McLaren didn't even bother to try to suppress his snicker.
Turnage went back to his examination of Brian's injuries, his gloved hand exploring a particularly ugly scar just in front of the left ear that had damaged underlying muscle tissue, resulting in a distortion of the shape of the eye. "I could build up your chin, you know," he said, fingers probing and pulling as he ignored the patient's attempts to evade his touch. "It's not really proportional to the rest of your face, and it would be fairly easy to correct, so . . . oh, for God's sake, would you please be still!"

Brian shifted slightly and fixed the physician with a cold stare. "My chin was fine, just the way it was."

Turnage was abruptly, uncomfortably aware that Chris McClaren was standing close behind him. Too close, and it was vaguely alarming to realize that he had never even noticed when the FBI agent had approached, almost as if he had simply materialized, out of thin air.

"I believe Mr. Kinney is uncomfortable, Doctor," said McClaren softly, but there was an element of steel beneath the velvet tone. "Perhaps you could give him a little time to recover."

"Time is something we can't afford to waste," snapped Turnage. "I need to take some measurements of his bone structure, and diagram his injuries, and . . ."

"Dr. Turnage," said Brenda, "I'd be happy to do the measurements, while you record the damage." Her tone was very professional, but her smile was slightly diffident. "Surely, that would be the most efficient use of our time. Wouldn't it?"

Turnage could not quite conceal the grimace that touched his face, and Brian realized immediately that the man was being played, and knew it. Furthermore, it was pretty obvious that he did not like it, but Brenda Herring was, apparently, not quite such a helpless supplicant at the feet of the Great God Turnage as she'd first appeared, as the doctor elected to back down, rather than call her on her insolence.

Brian decided that he was coming to admire Nurse Herring more with every passing moment, and the expression on Chris McClaren's face suggested that he might agree, if, indeed, the tiny, barely-there smirk that had appeared so fleetingly on his features could be termed an expression at all.

The patient allowed the nurse to position him carefully, in preparation for using the instruments in the leather case to measure the dimensions of his bone structure. His eyes, however, remained restless, following Turnage's movements with more than a trace of skepticism. "Matt Keller told me that you do volunteer work on children from third world nations, with facial deformities."

"That's correct," Turnage replied absently as he adjusted the settings on his interactive pen display unit.

"Hard to believe," Brian observed.

"Why's that?"

"Because arrogance and charity don't usually co-exist very well." Brian grinned. "I should know."

At this point, Chris McClaren was forced to turn away, to avoid laughing in the face of both the physician and his patient, but Turnage, in characteristic narcissist mode, simply ignored the FBI agent and appeared to be considering his response carefully. "You think me incapable of charity?" he asked finally, apparently not even remotely insulated.

Brian smiled. "I think you unconcerned with compassion, and incapable of empathy."
To the surprise of everyone in the cabin - except Brian himself - Turnage nodded. "Very astute, Mr. Kinney. So why do you think I donate my time and efforts to repair those damaged children?"

Brian did not hesitate. "Two reasons. Because you learn from them - every attempt is an opportunity to get better - and because it strokes your ego to be acknowledged for your humanitarian efforts."

Turnage paused for a moment, resetting the definition on the screen of the pen device, suddenly caught up in the memory of the first of the children he had 'repaired' - a six-year-old girl from the Dominican Republic who'd been born with a horribly deformed cleft lip, among other things. Her name had been Paola, and fortune had been hideously unkind to her, in a multitude of ways. Though he had managed to reconstruct her face so that she had no longer been a creature of extraordinary ugliness, there had been little he could do to repair her body of the other birth defects which had left her twisted and paralyzed and almost certainly doomed to an early, meaningless death. Nevertheless, when she had been ready to depart, to go back to her bleak existence in the slums of Santo Domingo, she had smiled at him and thanked him for making her 'beautiful'. In truth, she had not really been beautiful; the extent of her deformities had precluded that possibility, but her comment had led him to understand that beauty and normalcy were all a matter of degree.

He had never told anyone about what he had felt when she'd expressed her gratitude or what he had learned from her example of courage and grace. And he wasn't about to do so now.

Humility was not a suit that he wore easily or often or well.

"Right," he retorted finally. "Now, can we stop philosophizing, and get on with the business at hand?"

The physician moved back to his desk to bring up a new file on his computer, and Chris McClaren dropped into the chair at Brian's side, a speculative look on his face.

"What?" asked Brian, slightly alarmed to realize that he had begun to read the FBI agent's expressions with a remarkable degree of accuracy.

"Did it every occur to you - considering that he's going to be standing over your unconscious body with a scalpel in his hand - that it might be a good idea to avoid pissing him off?"

Brian lay back against the pillows that Nurse Herring had arranged beneath him in order to brace his neck and shoulders, and regarded McClaren with a stony stare. "Don't see the point," he answered after a moment of consideration, "seeing as how he'd rather cut off his own thumbs than take a chance on fucking up the work he does on me and winding up looking like a first-class screw-up."

McClaren appeared to think it over. Then he smiled. "Unless you make him so furious that he decides it would be worth it, just to shut you up."

Brian confined his response to a wordless half-shrug which translated - in typical Brian jargon - to something akin to "So what?"

"I want to talk to my son," he announced suddenly to no one in particular. "Now."

Turnage didn't bother to try to camouflage a huff of impatience. "Look, Kinney, we really need to finish our preparations. My primary surgical team will be waiting for us when we land, and . . ."

"In that case," Brian interrupted, "it would be better if someone gets my son on the phone for me now, rather than later."

The nurse paused for a moment in the measurements she was taking to clean away a final spot of adhesive residue from an area under the patient's jaw and regarded him with steady, sympathetic gray eyes. "Mr. Kinney," she began, "don't you think . . ."

"I think," he replied firmly, "that I've made myself clear." Then he turned to look up directly into McClaren's eyes. "Would you get my son on the phone? Please."

McClaren paused briefly, returning Brian's gaze, not quite sure what it was he was hearing in the ad exec's voice. But then he realized that it wasn't important to understand why Brian wanted to talk to his young son at this particular point in time. It only mattered that he wanted it. So he nodded and retrieved the telephone handset from its cradle against the forward bulkhead, and put the call through without comment.

Brian lay quietly, allowing the nurse to proceed with the task she was performing, but his posture was becoming increasingly rigid as his breathing seemed to grow rougher and less regular, and McClaren watched him with growing concern. Thus, it was with a sense of relief that he moved forward to hand the telephone to Brian, as a small, shrill voice echoed through the cabin, a voice screaming, "Daaaddddeeee!" And immediately, Brian was relaxed again, his eyes bright with anticipation.

"Hey, Sonny Boy," he said softly, settling the handset against his shoulder. "How are you?"

And that, as usual, was all that was required to set Gus into full soliloquy-mode, cataloging every detail of his day and his thoughts and his enthusiasm and the thousand other aspects of who he was, while Brian simply smiled and listened, interjecting an occasional word of encouragement or request for enlightenment.

Chris McClaren returned to his post near the window, staring down at the eastern shoreline and the muddy gray sweep of the Atlantic beyond, and let his mind wander, while he monitored the conversation going on behind him with half an ear, just in case there might be some scrap of useful information in Brian's responses to his son's breathless monologue. It was truly amazing, he thought, how the attitude of one person could set the tone for everyone within the sound of that particular voice, even when the man in question was totally focused on a person and a place that was steadily falling farther and farther behind them.

Then he grinned as he wondered how traditional psychologists would categorize Brian Kinney.
Would they agree with his own assessment? Would they be able to overcome innate, hard-wired resistance to the idea that an out-and-proud, unapologetic, totally upfront homosexual could also be the alpha male of any given group? Or would they voice their disagreement loudly, scoffing at his conclusions?

In the end, it wouldn't matter; he needed no confirmation from anyone else.

He turned then to study Brian's face, and was marginally surprised to realize that he had learned to look beneath the horrible damage, below the injuries and the trauma, and see the man who still lived beneath the façade. That man was smiling now, obviously deeply, irrevocably in love with the child he claimed he'd never wanted, and not looking especially alpha in his father-guise.

But McClaren knew the truth. There was a deep, sensually-satisfying peace in the cabin at that moment, and it touched them all. And it emanated from the man at its center.

The alpha male.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
"Gone? What do you mean, gone?"

Cynthia sighed, noting that Ted's voice tended to climb into operatic octaves when he was distressed. Or angry.

"Sit down, Ted," she said softly, "and I'll . . ."

"I don't want to sit down, thank you very much," he retorted, standing very stiff and straight. "I want to know why Brian would just vanish like this. Where the fuck has he gone?"

She considered her response carefully before speaking, trying to find a way to defuse the situation and calm her associate's outrage. "He's being transported to a private clinic. For intense physical therapy. And surgical intervention."

Ted began to pace, his movements jerky and without grace. "And Kinnetic? What happens to this company - the one I've . . . " He paused, and had the grace to flush crimson beneath her speculative gaze,"we've all fought so hard to build?"

She smiled, but swallowed it quickly as she realized that he would interpret any such expression as patronizing and condescending. "Relax, Ted. It's not like he's traveling out into the depths of the Sahara, or to the ice ridges of Antarctica. He'll have access to telephones and computers, and he'll be checking in regularly. He's run the company in absentia before, so . . ."

"I know, but there are sensitive decisions to be made. Financial issues that need addressing, and clients to entertain and mollify, and new accounts that require . . ."

She held up a hand to put a stop to the tirade, and to prevent it from escalating into a full-fledged queen-out. "Ted, simply jot down any question you might have, and send them all to me via email - as needed - and I'll make sure he gets them."

Ted stopped pacing and fixed her with a cold stare. "Why should I send them to you? Why can't I go directly to him for answers? I have his email address, and his cell phone number so why . . ."

But Cynthia was shaking her head. "Ted, he's not . . . he needs time to come back from all this, which is why he's asked me to handle as much as I can of the day-to-day business of running Kinnetic. He needs to be able to concentrate on getting better, and he trusts me to . . ."

"Aha!" he replied sharply. "That's the real issue here, isn't it? He trusts you. He's put everything in your hands."

"Of course, he hasn't," she replied, refusing to allow her own anger to flare in the face of the accountant's hostility. "You, Ted Schmidt, are his CFO. For God's sake, man, you control the money. All of it. Do you really think he'd just walk away and leave you with that kind of power if he didn't trust you implicitly?"

For the first time since entering the office, Ted's resentment seemed to fade, and he allowed himself to settle into a chair. "No," he admitted. "He wouldn't. It's just . . ."

This time, Cynthia allowed herself the tiny smile. "We're all scared, Ted. No matter how successful the company is, or how efficiently it operates in his absence, without Brian, it's not . . . Kinnetic."

Ted sighed. "No, it's not. But I guess we're all going to have to step up, until . . . well, until we see what happens. Have you considered the possibility that he might . . ."

He fell silent then, and looked as if he wished he had not begun to express his darkest concerns.
"No," she said quickly. "And neither should you. He's Brian Kinney, and he will come back, one way or another."

But Ted thought about the images he'd seen in that awful tabloid - the damages that might be irreversible - and he wondered. If Brian could no longer be Brian, would he even want to come back? Or to face life at all? If one had been such a man - the object of desire and sexual fantasy for hundreds, even thousands of individuals, male and female - and was forced to conclude that such a thing would no longer be even remotely possible, would he find the courage to confront those who had resented him and envied him throughout his whole life?

Cynthia seemed to be positive that he would, but Teddy wasn't so sure.

"Okay," he said finally, rising and heading for the door. "Oh, and by the way, I think I've landed a new client for us. I've scheduled a meeting with some of the board members to explore . . ."

"Ted, wait," she said firmly. "We need to talk about our spheres of influence, for lack of a better term. As always, you have complete control over all matters financial and fiscal. But handling clients, overseeing campaigns, day-to-day operations - those fall under my jurisdiction. Including deciding which new clients we might take on."

He stopped and turned to stare at her. "But I've always had a say about things like that."

She nodded. "And you'll have a say now. But the final decision is mine. With Brian's oversight, of course."

Ted opened his mouth to protest, but decided against it when he saw the look of resolve in her eyes. Bitch!

He blinked, and chided himself for giving in to such a tawdry impulse. He and Cynthia had worked together for several years now, and he had always respected and admired her. But for Brian to choose to entrust her with control of the company . . . It just wasn't fair. It wasn't, after all, as if he hadn't known that Brian would be going away for a while, or even that Cynthia would be left in charge. But he had never dreamed that he - Ted Schmidt, CFO of Kinnetic and personal confidante of its owner - would be denied immediate and constant access to the man who was the heart and soul of the company. It was just unconscionable.

"Of course," he said aloud. "I'll reschedule the meeting, subject to your approval."

She nodded briskly. "Good. I know Brian will appreciate your cooperation."

_Of course he will. When everything he hears is filtered through you, you'll make sure that you come out looking like his champion, while the rest of us are just nameless, little drones._

He made his exit quickly, leaving her to pore over a graphic presentation of the new Dandy-Lube campaign, and hurried toward his office, careful to exhibit nothing of the renewed resentment that was rising within him, understanding that he needed to take refuge in a quiet, private place where he could sit and consider his best course of action.

Cynthia Whitney was about to find out - the hard way - that Ted Schmidt was nobody's fool. He was perfectly capable of recognizing a power play when he saw one, and he was definitely seeing one now. Brian was vulnerable, as he had never been before; that much was clear. Obviously, he wasn't thinking clearly, and might even be susceptible to manipulation by a scheming opportunist, and Cynthia was finally showing her true colors as a corporate predator, apparently eager to take advantage of her employer's temporarily inadequate defenses.
Ted took a deep breath as he moved toward his office, knowing that he needed to explore all the possibilities and take measures to protect himself, and to protect Brian from his own weakness.

He might even need legal advice. And he certainly knew where to go to get that.

Allegheny General Hospital wasn't a particularly splendid example of architectural elegance. It tended more to the utilitarian than the artistic. But it did have one feature that could - on rare occasions - render one speechless with appreciation, and Cedric Lasseigne was experiencing such a moment as he sat on an upholstered bench in a small alcove near the admitting desk and waited for his final discharge papers to be brought to him.

The front lobby featured a kind of glass-walled atrium that soared six stories into the air, projecting from the western face of the building like a rectangular shaft, and, on rare, cloudless afternoons - like this one - it became a kind of focusing crystal that bathed the interior with refracted sunlight, causing almost everyone who entered to pause for a moment of silent appreciation and - for some - a bit of introspection devoted to the concept of stopping to smell the roses, in whatever form they were offered up.

Lasseigne was a big believer in rose-sampling, and he smiled as he spied the young man hurrying toward him, the sunlight striking glints of pure gold from a mop of amber hair.

"Got 'em," called Justin, waving a small sheaf of documents as he came across the lobby. "You're officially a free man."

Cedric's smile was brilliant, if slightly weary. "I sometimes thought I'd never see the day," he admitted.

Justin regarded him with genuine affection, and Cedric reflected - certainly not for the first time - that the young man's remarkably blue eyes were completely incapable of concealing whatever emotion he might be experiencing at any given moment.

"Okay," said the blond, picking up the one, small duffle that contained virtually everything that the old Cajun owned. "Let's get you home."

But Cedric was not yet ready to concede defeat in his effort to convince Justin that he did not require further assistance. "Justin, wait," he said sternly. "I don't need your help. In the first place, a half-way house hardly qualifies as a 'home'. And, in the second, I have been navigating the dark and dreary streets of this city for a very long time, without requiring intervention from anyone." He smiled then. "Not even a - what is it that your Brian calls you when he wants to be particularly assinine? - a piece of blond boy ass? I am perfectly capable of making my own way."

"I don't doubt that," Justin replied, refusing to take the bait of the insult, "but why should you?"

He glanced toward the hospital's main entrance, and saw exactly what he expected to see. The dark sedan with the nondescript young driver was waiting at the front landing. He had finally, though reluctantly, given up his fruitless protests about the security people who shadowed his every move, and decided that he might as well take advantage of the opportunities they provided. Such as immediate, convenient transportation - for him and any companion - to wherever he wanted to go.

"Come on," he urged, taking the older man's arm in a casual grip that camouflaged the fact that Lasseigne was not entirely steady on his feet and required a bit of support.

They started forward, but Justin paused immediately as he spotted two figures coming through the crowd, and sighed, realizing that he wasn't sure he was prepared for the moment racing toward him at breakneck speed.

"Sunshine!" Justin winced, and wondered if Debbie had ever managed to shatter glass with the sheer volume of her voice. "What the fuck is this about Brian being gone? Gone where? And why? And without even telling me?"

"Or me?" said Lindsey, for once almost as loud and as outraged as her red-headed companion. "What was he thinking? And where the hell did he go?"

Justin settled Cedric back into his seat on the bench before turning to face his inquisitors.

He debated what he should say to them, but realized quickly that he could only tell the truth. "I don't know," he admitted. "He didn't tell me where he was going."

"What do you mean, he didn't tell you?" That was Debbie again, volume and pitch increasing. "Then who did he tell?"

Justin shrugged. "I'm sure Dr. Keller knows, but I doubt he's going to tell you anything. Doctor/patient privilege, you know."

Lindsey's eyes narrowed. "We'll just see about that. I'm the mother of his child, so . . ."

"Lindsey," Justin said suddenly, "does it occur to you that he would have told you himself, if he'd wanted you to know?"

"Yes, well, he doesn't always know what's good for him. You, of all people, should know that."

Cedric Lasseigne was observing the exchange between these people who obviously considered themselves proprietary friends of Brian Kinney with great interest, and wondered if any of them ever stopped to consider the deeper meanings concealed beneath their words. He rather doubted it.

"Besides," said Debbie, "why would he do this? Why would he leave behind the only people who care about him?"

Justin sighed. "I think he . . . he's going to try to figure out where he goes from here. What he really wants, and whether or not he can come back from this."

"What?" Debbie again, still angry, still loud. "Like whether or not they can fix his face? Or whether or not he can regain his title - be the Stud of Liberty Avenue again? Is that all he cares about?"

The redhead looked up then, and happened to catch the hard gleam that flared in Justin's eyes and found herself suddenly stricken speechless, realizing that she had never before seen the young man so completely overwhelmed with anger.

"Is that what you really think of him, Debbie? How can you have known him all his life, and still not have the first clue about who he really is?"

"Sunshine, I . . ."

"Don't call me that," he snapped, turning once more to help Cedric to his feet. But he hesitated as he started to lead the old man toward the front entrance, and turned back to face the two women, both of them still open-mouthed in shock. "That's Brian's name for me, and he's the only one that gets to use it."
Debbie closed her mouth abruptly, and it never even occurred to her to point out that she was, in fact, the one who had bestowed the nickname on the young blonde. Given the look on his face, she figured she was better off letting it go.

She was right.

The coffee shop wasn’t exactly upscale, but it was a big improvement over the hospital cafeteria, thought Sharon Briggs. And the Guess jeans and Tommy Hilfiger jacket she had donned, to replace the faded, drab K-Mart garments she had worn during her extended visit at Allegheny General, felt wonderful against her skin, by comparison. They might not be in the league of the Dolce and Gabanna and Prada designer wear that she preferred during those rare periods when she was able to exist within her real persona, but they were, nevertheless, a vast improvement and perfectly in character for a young professional just dropping in at Barney’s Coffeehouse for a mocha latte.

In addition, they had the advantage of rendering her completely unrecognizable to anyone who had noticed her as she hung around the hospital waiting rooms, waiting to learn the fate of her ‘aunt’.

Like the man who was seated in the booth directly behind her, ordering a double serving of cappuccino, and drumming his fingers against the formica tabletop. Obviously waiting for something or someone.

Sharon turned slightly in her seat, to glance out toward the street where the sunshine was almost blinding in its purity, which was a good thing for her. It allowed her to continue to wear the dark glasses that concealed the movement of her eyes, and the fact that she was constantly scanning the individuals who were moving along the sidewalk outside, waiting to identify the person who would be joining the subject of her surveillance.

She did not worry about being recognized, even though the man had been standing at the nurses’ desk - as he so often did - when the skinny, overworked young resident had come out of the ICU to inform Shoshona that her ‘aunt’ had finally succumbed and passed away. Peacefully.

Sharon had been glad that the old woman had not endured further suffering; she had also been grateful that the timing was perfect, from her perspective. The woman’s passing provided a timely excuse for her departure, just as the morning shift was ending, and many staffers were finishing their day. It was a perfect opportunity to pursue the lead she had developed.

Thus, here she sat. Sipping her latte, and waiting, confidant that her subject would not recognize her. It often amazed her how people always managed to see exactly what they expected to see and ignore anything that didn't fit their preconceptions. So the man would not connect this pretty, stylish young woman to the skanky little hooker he had observed earlier at the hospital, even if he were to stare straight at her. Which he wouldn’t. She was not his type.

The bell over the entrance jingled, and Sharon looked up and barely managed to suppress a smile.

Bingo.

She would not even need to utilize her fine-tuned powers of observation to help her learn the identity of the individual for whom her subject was waiting. She recognized him immediately, and knew that she had discovered a significant link in what might prove to be a very heavy, very long chain.

She sipped again, and listened while reaching up to activate the tiny tape recorder concealed beneath the leather collar of her jacket.
"You're late," said Monty Peabody.

But he didn't sound particularly annoyed. It wasn't every day, after all, that a simple lab tech was granted an exclusive one-on-one meeting with John Vincent Fincher, senior managing editor of the local Fox television news team and author of a recent bestseller called Self-Defense, a weighty volume which purported to justify the distorted interpretation of the American Constitution to enable authorities to ignore the constraints of long-established protocols like the Geneva Convention, in the name of 'national security'.

Sharon's father - ordinarily the most tolerant of men - had labeled it the most disturbing piece of Nazi-caliber rationalization he had ever read. Sharon agreed.

"Sorry, Monty," said the news man, seating himself across from the lab tech and taking a moment to smooth the immaculate sweep of perfectly barbered silver hair back from his forehead. "Traffic, you know."

He paused to order coffee - plain, black, dark roast - before continuing. "At any rate, I hope I haven't kept you from something important."

Sharon Briggs bit back a smile. How was it, she wondered, that she could hear the derision in that cultured voice so clearly - the assumption that a poor schmuck such as the lab tech could not possibly have anything more important in his life than being at the beck and call of a man of Fincher's standing - while Peabody couldn't hear it at all.

"No, no. I'm just a little nervous. This is a first for me."

"I know, and I want you to understand how much we appreciate your cooperation. You're doing us a huge favor. And, at the same time, you're supporting the people's right to know the truth. This Kinney person has been painted like some kind of hero by the liberal press, and I think we both know what a sham that is."

Monty nodded. "I know. It's deplorable. To take someone so common, and try to turn him into an innocent victim. It's disgusting. And people should know the truth. Know what he really is."

Fincher nodded and smiled. "It's always satisfying to be reminded that there are still good, decent, common people in this country who are motivated to do the right thing. To want to see justice done. So what do you have for me?"

"Well..." For the first time, the lab tech seemed to hesitate. "This is really dangerous for me, you know. I could lose my job if anybody finds out, and, well, you know..."

"I do indeed," Fincher replied, and reached into his pocket to extract a plain white envelope. "And I think you'll find this more than adequate to compensate you for the risk you're taking. And, of course, for the photographs. They were very useful to us, and, if there were any real justice, you'd be hailed as a hero for your actions."

Monty allowed himself a smug little smirk, and took a moment to open the envelope flap and stare at the check inside.

The smirk became a full-fledged grin as he read off the numbers on the check, then tucked the envelope into his own jacket, never noticing the quick but intense look of contempt that flickered across his co-conspirator's face.

The lab tech took a thumb drive from his shirt pocket and slid it across the table. "This includes copies of his medical records, chart notes, everything I could find. But there is a problem."
Fincher looked up then to meet the lab tech's eyes, and Monty almost flinched away from the glimmer of raw rage he thought he saw there. But the gleam was gone almost before it registered, and he was able to convince himself that he had been mistaken. He was, after all, a hero, according to the man to whom he had just sold his soul.

"What kind of problem?" Fincher asked, having regained his urbane composure after a momentary urge to throttle the black bastard who was daring to look him straight in the eye, as if he were entitled to do so.

"Kinney's gone. They moved him this morning, and, so far, I haven't managed to find out where they took him."

The newsman's eyes went dark and cold. "Moved him how?"

"I'm not sure. I was picking up some lab samples at Saint Clair Memorial, and when I got back, he was gone. It was all very hush-hush, you know. The police have been all over him, so I was lucky to be able to get what I got. I don't think . . ."

"Mr. Peabody," Fincher interrupted.

"Yes?"

Fincher leaned forward, and there was no mistaking the hard gleam of impatience and frustration in his eyes. "We just paid you a great deal of money for comprehensive information about Brian Kinney. Including what happens to him next, and where he's going to be. Are you now telling me that you are unable to provide the information you promised us?"

"No," replied Monty, his mouth suddenly dry, almost painful. "Not at all. I just don't have it . . . yet.
But I will. I promise you, I'll find out."

Fincher sat back, fixing the lab tech with a glare that stated - more clearly than any spoken word could have - that he had better be right, and it had better be soon.

"Very well then," he said, rising and pausing just long enough to adjust his Armani jacket so it showed his lean physique to best advantage. "I'll expect to hear from you. By Friday?"

Monty frowned. "That's only two days. It might take longer, if . . ."

Pincher smiled, but there was no trace of warmth in it. "For your sake," he said softly, "I hope not."

As he walked away, Sharon Briggs reached up to adjust the scarf around her neck, and turned off the tape recorder. But she did not leave. Not just yet. She was curious to see if her subject really was as dumb as he seemed to be, or if he would figure out that he had just been threatened with dire consequences should he fail to deliver what he had promised.

But Monty seemed content to sit there and enjoy his cappuccino, probably contemplating how he was going to spend the money that he had received for selling out his professional integrity. Sharon, on the other hand, wondered what price a corrupted soul was going for these days.

When the lab tech stood and sauntered out into the late afternoon sunshine, she followed at a discreet distance, noting that he seemed very pleased with himself as he turned toward his home.

Yep. Just as she'd thought. Dumb as dirt.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~
tbc
"Chapter 27"

Thy mind is ever moving,
In regions dark to thee;
Recall its useless roving,
Come back, and dwell with me.

I know my mountain breezes
Enchant and soothe thee still,
I know my sunshine pleases,
Despite thy wayward will.

- Shall Earth No More Inspire Thee -- Emily Brontë

Danny Boyle had decided that - all things being equal - he'd rather play chauffeur than street hustler or pool shark or vagrant. Only all things were not, exactly, equal.

Yes, when he was tasked with driving young Justin Taylor wherever he might want to go and making sure that he arrived safely at his destination, he was warm and dry and safe, relatively speaking. Insulated from the harshness of Pittsburgh's raw early spring and rarely having to leave the comfort of the dark green Buick Century assigned to him by Lance Mathis, he was able to fulfill his duties to watch over Kinney's blond boytoy with a minimum of effort and a maximum of efficiency. Since Taylor spent most of his time these days at Allegheny General - which was as secure as an FBI lockdown for the most part - it was rarely even necessary for him to brave the colorful environs of Pittsburgh's gay conclaves in order to do his job.

That was an advantage, sometimes. When it wasn't a pain in the ass.

It bothered him more than a little to realize that he was actually beginning to miss his regular interaction with the brash, lurid aspects of Liberty Avenue society and the loud, unapologetic people for whom it was the center of the world. He wasn't gay; didn't share most of the interests that drew the residents of the area together; couldn't even imagine having any desire to make out with a guy or touch another man's dick.

Mostly.

But his connection to the people who were an integral part of the world from which he had sprung had almost nothing to do with sex or lust or desire. Instead, it was about freedom and tolerance and the willingness to suspend judgment and understand the true natures of the individuals who existed beneath the superficial criteria of sexual preference, which, he knew perfectly well, was a semi-twisted version of an oxymoron. Homosexuality was not a preference; it was a physical characteristic, as genetic and unalterable as eye color or blood type. Danny wasn't sure how he knew that, but it was, nevertheless, something he had always known.

Being a part of the Liberty Avenue ambiance actually had nothing at all to do with what a man chose to do with his dick, or who he chose to do it with. It was about accepting people for what they were beneath the skin, and he was sometimes certain that - hetero or not - he would never really fit into the world beyond the boundaries of 'Queerville', as it had been christened by most of its residents. He would sigh sometimes, when he came face to face with that conclusion, but, in its most elementary form, it was the defining truism of his life.

He was, he thought, the pluperfect example of the proverbial square peg forcing himself into a round hole and being content with the rather odd fit. He tried to imagine how some of his straight buddies - and he had a number of them - would react to the circumstances of his life, and found that he could not quite picture it. What would they think - how would they handle being teased and publicly, frequently identified as the 'token hetero' in the crowd, or tagged with names like Fag Hag and Dyke's Beard and Dr. Straightlove? He could well imagine the horror writ large on their faces under such conditions. And why, he wondered, didn't such things bother him more? But he didn't waste much time on that kind of speculation, because he actually already knew the answer, which was ridiculously simple. Though the voices that called him such names and appeared to delight in pointing out his differences were almost always filled with a spicy tongue-in-cheek humor, there was almost never a single trace of hostility or true animosity contained within the taunts themselves.

Tolerance. It was the only requisite for acceptance in 'Queerville', the only coin of the realm, given freely and demanded in return. It defined the place he lived, and the people who were his neighbors and - yes, there was no denying it - his friends.

So he would enjoy the opportunity to stay warm and dry and mostly unthreatened, and to catch up on his favorite reading (while being very careful to wrap his current guilty pleasure within the camouflage of a copy of the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette as he indulged himself; it wouldn't do at all for a guy who presented himself as a 'street tough' to be caught reading The Thirteenth Tale or to be exposed as a devotee of British fiction) while he waited around for Justin Taylor to decide where he wanted to go next; he would treasure the moments as they happened. But he would comfort himself with the certainty that, when this assignment ended, he would go back to the turbulent, flamboyant, bright and bawdy streets that were his home, his family. Queer or not.

The quick staccato rhythm of a familiar voice, sharp and colored with vivid tints of irritation that Boyle was coming to recognize too frequently and too well, drew his attention to the front entrance of the hospital where a slender figure was erupting through the doors so quickly that he cleared the expanding opening of the automatic panels with only an inch to spare. Justin Taylor was in a hurry and, judging by the set of his face and the hard glitter in his eyes, he was pissed off in a big way.

Boyle felt a renewed sense of relief that he no longer had to maintain a pretense of disinterest or distance. Taylor, when determined to elude surveillance, had been a huge challenge for the individuals charged with protecting him, and Lance Mathis, in managing to convince the young man to accept the advantages of being monitored by security personnel, had done everyone a favor. Including Justin Taylor, who no longer concerned himself with who was watching or why. He simply did whatever he chose to do, and let others worry about the logistics of his safety.

It had come as a huge surprise - to both the watcher and the watched - that they had managed to form a fledgling friendship, which might expand and grow over a period of time, or might wither on the vine, depending on the circumstances. But, for the moment, it made life simpler.

Except when the blond half of the equation was on the verge of a major queen-out/meltdown. Like now.

Taylor was coming toward the car, a nondescript old duffle bag in one hand and the arm of an elderly man with a spike of silver hair gripped firmly in the other, with two women, voices shrill and full of protest, in pursuit. Having studied the file on Brian Kinney and his extended family closely, Boyle recognized both of the women, although he would have known Debbie Novotny anyway, as would any lifelong denizen of Liberty Avenue. He would even have known her if he'd been suddenly stricken blind, as her voice - currently in mid-screech - was even more recognizable than her colorful appearance.

"Justin, hold on there," she was shouting at the blond's rapidly retreating back. "What's all that supposed to mean? And where the fuck do you think you're going?"

Justin did not slow down as he called out his answer, never turning to look back. "I'm taking my friend, Cedric, to his new quarters, and, as to what I meant by what I said, I'm pretty sure you're both smart enough to figure it out."

Debbie actually stumbled, and was stricken, temporarily, speechless - but her companion appeared to be made of sterner stuff.

"Justin, please," said Lindsey Peterson. "Wait. Surely you understand that I'm . . . I only want to know . . ."

Justin paused as he reached the car, and smiled his thanks as Boyle stepped out of the Buick and opened the back door in order to admit Justin's elderly friend.

But finally, Justin turned to look back at the blonde woman who was by this time standing almost toe-to-toe with him. "Please," she repeated.

"Lindsey," he replied, taking a moment to draw a deep breath, and summon up patience already worn too thin, "it's his choice. And we have to honor it. If you love him at all, if you ever loved him . . ."

"How can you ask me that?" she demanded, forgetting her prior resolve to remain calm and use reason rather than emotion to plead her case. "Surely you, of all people . . ."

"Yes," he answered firmly. "Me. Of all people."

She went very still and was suddenly very cold. "Justin," she said slowly, "I'm so scared. What if he . . ."

He reached up and cupped her cheek with gentle fingers. "It has to be his choice, and we have to love him enough to abide by it."

She shook her head. "I don't know if I can."

He pulled her close and stroked her back with a gentle hand. "Yes, you can. Of us all, you're the one who can't really lose him. He'd never walk away from Gus. You know that."

But she was not so sure. "Yes, he would. If he thought he was a danger to his son, he would walk away and never come back. I can't . . ." Her voice dropped to a whisper. "I can't lose Brian."

Justin pulled back to stare deep into her eyes, and was somewhat surprised by what he saw there, and by the fact that she had allowed him to see it. "Does anybody know," he asked, "how much you really love him?"

Her smile was rueful and shaky. "No."

"Nobody?" He knew he should leave it alone, but he couldn't.

She couldn't - quite - meet his eyes. "Nobody . . . except him, of course. No matter how I tried to deny it, he always knew." Then she looked up and met his gaze squarely. "And I always suspected that you might have figured it out."

His smile was very gentle. "And Melanie?"

She sighed. "Why do you think she hates him so? She doesn't know all the details, of course. But she knows enough."

He nodded, and lifted her hand to touch it to his face. "Then you have to love him enough - we both do - to trust him to do what's right, for him."

"Can you do that?" she asked faintly. "Can you just let him go?"

He took a deep breath. "I can do whatever he needs me to do. He's the center of my life, but it's just not right to use that to hold him. Because that's what I've always done before, you know." His voice grew rougher, and his eyes were suddenly filled with sympathy, but he continued to speak, refusing to fall silent until he'd said everything that needed saying. "It's what we've all done - assuming that our needs were all that mattered, and we've used those needs to keep him where we want him, which is exactly what he's always refused to do to us in return. So it has to stop. Now."

Debbie Novotny had been listening, while trying to look as if she weren't. But this, apparently, was just too much for her to accept without dispute. Her snort was almost pig-like. "What a bunch of bullshit!" she snapped. "You make it sound like we all took advantage of him. Asked him to sacrifice for us - to take care of us - when the truth is that he's never cared about anybody but himself. The Stud of Liberty Avenue, whose only real interest is which mouth is going to be next to suck his dick. Brian Kinney, God's gift to the world, who's never been able to love anybody. Why would you . . ."

Justin turned to stare at her, his eyes suddenly filled with weary sadness. "Really, Deb? If that's true, then why do you care if he goes away and never comes back? To hear you tell it, he'd be doing you a favor, since he's never done anything for you. Or for Michael. Or for anybody, for that matter. You know, I've never really understood why so many people seem to enjoy it whenever things go badly for him, or why you seem to resent him so much, but, all things considered, you ought to be eager to see the last of . . ."

"Resent him?" Debbie retorted. "Why would I resent him? Except that he always gets away with everything, that he never has to pay for the damage he inflicts, that he never regrets what he does wrong?"

This time, it was Lindsey who posed the question. "And what, exactly, do you think he should apologize for?"

Debbie hmmphed. "For hurting people. For breaking hearts and never trying to make up for it."

Justin and Lindsey exchanged knowing glances, both understanding exactly what Debbie was saying without actually saying anything at all; both choosing to remain silent on the subject as there was, literally, nothing they could say that would make any difference at all in Debbie's opinion of Brian, since he would never be able to give her the one thing she really wanted, but would never admit. Brian loved Michael, uniquely, intensely, and without reservation, but he had never been, was not now, and never would be in love with Michael, and he would never pretend otherwise. Brian might, occasionally, lie about trifles, but never about things that mattered.

And it was for that deadly flaw that Debbie would never be able to forgive him.

"So," Justin said finally, attempting to end the conversation, "can we give you ladies a lift somewhere?"
Lindsey glanced back toward the hospital. "Are you sure they won't tell us where he went?"

Justin didn't bother to hide the eye-roll. "'If it'll make you feel any better, go ask. But you're wasting your time." He paused then and deliberately caught Lindsey's eye. "And you're failing to honor Brian's wishes."

"Well, what if something happens and we need . . ." That was Debbie, off on another tangent.

Justin allowed himself a deep, exaggerated sigh. "You both know him too well to think he left without making arrangements to handle anything that might come up." Then he couldn't resist a sardonic grin. "Besides, what could you possibly need from such a self-absorbed, thoughtless, unapologetic, narcissistic prick?"

Debbie felt a flush touch her face, but refused to address the challenge in the blond's eyes.

"So," Justin continued, "how about that lift?"

Throughout the conversation, Cedric had observed the exchanges without comment or expression, but when Debbie moved as if to climb into the back seat beside him, he was not quite able to suppress the look of sheer horror that flickered across his face. Justin snickered, but stepped up quickly to come to the old man's rescue by guiding Debbie to the passenger-side front seat, thus earning a quick glare from his bodyguard/chauffeur. But the blond figured - rightly - that Boyle was more capable of handling Pittsburgh's premier fag hag than an elderly Cajun gentleman, fresh out of rehab.

Thus, it was Justin and Lindsey who wound up flanking Cedric in the back seat, and a quick exchange between the old friends, regarding an upcoming exhibition of new artists' work at the Sidney Bloom Gallery, initiated a spirited discussion about the contributions of contemporary artists to the political and cultural landscape of the new century, before progressing to a comparison of favorites - Justin raving about the vivid style and lavish color used by Ksenia Milicevic while Lindsey waxed poetic over the work of Dominique Sanson and his Ibiza saga (wondering only briefly why the mention of the project made Justin smile) and the singular, eclectic quality of the work of Robert Rauschenberg. Both of them were enjoying the discussion thoroughly, and welcoming Cedric's surprisingly insightful comments and his suggestion that Sam Dillemans and José Beral were both worthy of inclusion in the ranks of prominent contemporaries, while Debbie looked on, trying to look as if she weren't completely out of her depth - which she was.

Until Cedric brought up another name - one that even Debbie recognized.

"Of course, my personal favorite has always been Sam Auerbach," said Cedric with a big smile. It wasn't often that he got the chance to talk art with people who actually knew the difference between the Bloomsbury Group and the Doonesbury cartoon, and he intended to enjoy it. "There's just something so flagrantly sexual about his work, don't you think? And, since he's a local boy, I assume you guys know him."

Justin carefully avoided looking into Lindsey's eyes. "Yeah. We know him. He's definitely one of a kind."

"You can say that again," Debbie muttered, while Lindsey was suddenly preoccupied with searching through her handbag for . . . something. Anything.

Justin was careful to avoid staring at her, and was pretty sure that she had never in her life been so glad to see the Liberty Diner appear on the corner of the next intersection.
"You sure you don't want us to drop you at the hotel?" he asked, thereby killing two proverbial birds with the one verbal gambit - changing the subject and offering Lindsey an alternative to having to listen to Debbie, just in case the redhead decided that this would be a great opportunity to allow her to assuage any lingering curiosity about the relationship between Lindsey and Pittsburgh's artistic rogue.

"No. Thanks," Lindsey replied with an appreciative smile. "Melanie should be here soon, if she's not already waiting for me. I expect we're going to have a serious discussion tonight."

"About?"

Lindsey's eyes flashed with a momentary impulse to suggest that he mind his own business, but it was gone almost before it formed. "She's been trying to convince me to go back to Toronto since the day we got here. Now, with Brian gone . . ."

Justin nodded, his eyes downcast as he considered what she'd said and how she'd said it. "Lindsey," he said softly - too softly for it to reach Debbie's ears, "is there a reason you don't want to go back? Is everything all right?"

She stepped out of the car before turning to look down at his face as he leaned toward her. "I'm just as all right . . . as you are." But there was no animosity or resentment in her tone. There was only a deep understanding of a life filled with regrets, with having been forced to learn how to cope with wanting what one could not have, and - perhaps - a glimmer of hope that he, at least, would learn how to mend what could not be endured.

She started to close the door then, but hesitated, once more meeting Justin's eyes, biting her lip slightly as she considered whether or not to speak her mind. But, in the end, she knew she had no choice; the question was begging to be asked.

"Justin?" Her tone was like a caress. "Did he go alone?"

The young man managed not to flinch away from the question, but only by the narrowest of margins. He closed his eyes then, and was immediately back on that roof, feeling the whirling blast of air from the helicopter's blades and fighting against the impulse to turn back, to take one more look, to see the man who was the center of his world just one last time. But he hadn't; he'd forced himself to be strong, to do what Brian had asked him to do - to let him go. But as he'd turned his head to the side, to shield his eyes from the swirl of grit particles in the cyclonic blast, his eye had been drawn to a reflection in the polished steel surface of the door - a reflection of a tall, muscular individual, the last to board the chopper, who stood for a moment, framed in the doorway and scanning the rooftop, as if to make certain that nothing was being left behind - nothing forgotten.

Chris McClaren, beautiful in the sunlight as the wind molded his leather jacket to his sculpted body, directing one last glance toward Justin as he stepped up and disappeared into the cabin, sure of himself and sure of his place at Brian's side.

Lindsey did not wait for an answer - did not need to - for it was written, clearly, painfully, and indelibly, on his face. Brian had gone away, leaving Justin behind and never once looking back. And he had not gone alone.

Babylon at three o-clock in the morning was a magical place, a gateway to a promised land where dreams were always waiting to be realized just around the next corner, where the most beautiful men in the world came to leave their inhibitions at the door and release their alter-egos to explore realms of possibility, where one lived in an infinite moment in which the next face one saw might be the face, the man who would fulfill every wish, unlock every door and guide one into a realm of endless, sexual bliss. It was a fantasy land, the air filled with the hard, visceral beat of the music, with glitter and the dazzle of strobe lights refracted in the spin of mirror balls, the taste of whiskey as smooth as honey, and the scent of men in heat. A sexual paradise, hardcore, driven, and without apology or excuse.

On the other hand, at three o'clock in the afternoon, it was just an empty shell, dark and dreary and haunted with wisps of memory, hollow and a little melancholy, especially so in the absence of the man who was its driving force, its heart and soul. Brian Kinney's sandbox was just a sandbox like any other, without Brian Kinney.

A few hours later, noise and lights and frenzied crowds and the smell of sex would transform it into a semblance of its characteristic glory (even without its lord and master in attendance) but for now, it was literally the last place on anyone's mind - which made it the perfect spot for a little confab of conspirators, safe from the prying eyes of any interested parties.

Carl Horvath had, of course, been here before, mostly in his professional capacity. One did not move up through the ranks of the Pittsburgh PD without developing at least a nodding acquaintance with the city's most notorious gay nightclub. However, he had also been present for the Stop Prop 14 benefit, not so much because he wanted to voice his support of the cause - he wasn't much on making political statements - but because his significant other, the notoriously loud-mouthed Debbie Novotny, would almost certainly have refused to speak to him ever again if he had not shown up to lend his presence to the cause, if not his voice.

But any recollection of the glitter and glamour of that occasion had been forever lost beneath memories of the blood-and-guts trauma - the flames and carnage and stench of the bombing that had ended it all, and the detective sometimes wondered how Kinney had found the courage and the resolve to rebuild it and defy those who had been so consumed with hatred and hypocrisy that they had felt justified in taking innocent lives. Of course, the ugly truth was that - from the perspective of the perpetrators - the lives taken were not innocent at all.

Because of who they loved.

Horvath allowed himself a soft sigh as he entered the building through the employee's entrance, noting with approval that Lance Mathis was not taking any chances. Two of his most physically imposing security guards were posted at the doorway, checking the credentials of everyone who came seeking admittance, without exception. One of them - a strapping young Latino named Miguel Guerrara - had known the detective since his days as a classmate of Horvath's daughter, but had not so much as flickered an eyelid when he'd asked for ID and badge.

Horvath approved. It was obvious that Mathis had decided that overkill was preferable to complacency and that he was almost certainly still blaming himself for his failure to protect the man who paid his salary and was his first priority. The detective considered it a sign of maturity that the security chief was able to deal with his guilt without letting it immobilize him. It was a characteristic that made for good cops and even better bodyguards.

Despite the fact that he was running a few minutes late for the meeting, Horvath lingered at the entrance, awaiting the arrival of the most clandestine member of his team, who would, almost certainly, not be carrying badge or credentials. Those who spent their lives walking the razor edge of undercover work did not risk being discovered by virtue of an unexpected random search.

Thus, it was no surprise when Mathis' guards moved to block the doorway when Sharon Briggs - in full Shoshona regalia, including thigh-high stiletto boots, a leather skirt barely long enough to cover the essentials, a flimsy black camisole fetchingly arranged to display maximum cleavage beneath an unbuttoned faux fur jacket, finished off with a cascading blonde wig and a double application of false eyelashes - came strolling down the alley, carrying a patchwork handbag big enough to be classified as a suitcase by any airline.

"It's okay, Boys," said Horvath, stepping in before the confrontation could get physical. Not that he was worried about Sharon; if she couldn't handle herself in such a situation, she wouldn't be worth her weight in rust flakes on the streets, but any kind of scuffle with Mathis' boys wonder might call attention to her and risk blowing her cover, and that he could not allow. She was much too valuable.
"She's with me."

Neither of the guards looked particularly convinced, but both stepped aside to allow her to enter when Horvath pursed his lips and leveled his best officer-in-charge gaze at them.

"Jesus, Briggs!" he muttered as they moved deeper into the shadows of the huge building. "You couldn't have toned it down a little?"

"What?" she retorted with a grin. "You don't dig my Lady Marmalade costume?"

He rolled his eyes. "It's not exactly the kind of thing you wear to blend in, now is it?"

"That," she answered, "depends entirely on where you're trying to blend. This . . ." She swept her arm around her in an all-inclusive gesture, "is Liberty Avenue, my friend. Now, which of us do you think stands out more here - you in your Brooks Brothers stand-up, or me, in Prostitute a la pseudo-Prada?"

He nodded and favored her with a small smile. "I see your point."

They moved forward then, toward a soft pool of light in an area beyond the main bar where a group was already assembled, awaiting their arrival.

Except for one individual who had not yet put in an appearance, but, since this person was the representative of the most powerful agency involved in the investigation, the tardiness would go unremarked.

Horvath made quick introductions as he took a seat at the table and accepted a cup of espresso from one of Mathis' assistants. Then he sat back and sampled his aromatic drink, before taking a moment to study the faces of the individuals seated around him. He, of course, knew them all, and was gratified to note that all seemed capable and dedicated to the task at hand.

As Kinney's chief of security, especially given the site of this assembly, Mathis could have used his position to leverage himself into the driver's seat of the conference, but he quickly demonstrated that he had no interest in playing games or establishing a pecking order, by gesturing for Horvath to take the lead, pending, of course, the arrival of the real powerbroker of the bunch.

"First of all," said the detective, "I want to be clear on one thing. Everything that is said here, whether fact or speculation, must remain strictly between us. Nothing leaves this room. Although I have authorization from Police Chief Mitchum to act on his behalf, and to commit the resources of the department to solving this case, it can't be stressed enough that there's no way of knowing where this threat originated or who might be involved - including some very powerful individuals and possibly even members of law enforcement or political circles."

He paused then, and cleared his throat, reluctant to say what had to be said. "Despite the fact that Kinney is almost an icon of the gay community . . ." He grinned and shook his head. "Okay, so there's no almost to it - he's the icon of the gay community - there's no denying that he's made a lot of enemies by being unwilling to go anywhere near the closet where the religious right and the homophobes think he belongs. Therefore, discretion has to be our first order of business. Are we all clear on that?"

The detective looked up then and surveyed the group around the table, careful to meet the eyes of everyone present, to make sure that they all understood the gravity of the situation.

Lance Mathis, of course, needed no reminder of what was at stake, and he had already made sure that his cousin, Drew Boyd, who had somehow taken on the duties of his second-in-command during this crisis, and Emmett, who was currently running Babylon in Brian Kinney's absence, understood as well. They had all, after all, been present to witness the original attack first hand and needed no convincing of the seriousness of the matter. Thus, all three nodded their agreement to Horvath's conditions, although Emmett looked as if it would take every ounce of self-control he could summon to suppress his natural urge to vent his outrage.

Sitting to Emmett's right was Clint Abshire, chosen by Mathis to oversee the security arrangements at the Kinnetik office building - a neatly dressed individual whose appearance was a model of reserve and restraint except for the shoulder-length chestnut locks that framed his face, a man who looked more like a college professor than a security specialist and who was regarding Horvath with calm resolve, obviously fully aware of the necessity for discretion. Flanking him was Jared Hilliard, followed by Angel Diablo, both still scruffy enough to maintain their undercover identities, but lacking the more flamboyant details that usually marked their appearances. Hilliard, for example, still wore his flight jacket, but had dispensed with the plastic layers that usually obscured his appearance, and Angel, though still sporting drooping jeans and nose ring, had left his hip-hop swagger at the door.

Which brought him, finally, past the empty chair nearest the bar, to Sharon Briggs, and he noted, again, that there was absolutely nothing left to the imagination in the image she projected. She had left not a single nuance of her persona at the door, or on the street, and he knew it was because the risks taken by her male counterparts as they played their parts paled in comparison to the ones she encountered every single day of her life. In presenting herself as a perpetual victim - a target for scorn and derision and a product of abuse and sexual predation - she invited more of the same from the people who occupied the darkness at the lowest levels of humanity; it was only her skill and her courage and her finely-honed survival instincts that enabled her to endure the ordeal and fulfill the functions she had set for herself. Though the identity she had fashioned was constant, the way she played it was not, depending on the circumstances. She was always Shoshona Jackson, penniless, uneducated, vulgar, friendless, living without hope, and she was always a prostitute, barely making ends meet, always hungry and desperate. But sometimes she was raucous and loud and brash; other times she allowed herself to seem withdrawn and damaged and destitute. She played to the crowd that she needed to target at any given moment, and the transition from one presentation to the other was so seamless that no one ever noticed where one stopped and the other started, or, if anyone did, they simply put it down to the schizophrenic nature of the individual.

He allowed his eyes to slip down and take in all the details of her appearance, and he wondered, just out of idle curiosity, where she had managed to secrete her weapon. He honestly could not imagine, but he knew, beyond all doubt, that she had found a way. Despite a necessary paranoia about being discovered, she was not - quite - crazy enough to risk going unarmed. Any trace of her true identity she would not carry, but it was as certain as sunrise that her gun was always within reach.

She lived in the middle of a perpetual balancing act requiring both formidable skill and unflinching courage to pull off, and she played it perfectly. Thus, she was enormously valuable to the Pittsburgh Police Department. Almost irreplaceable. Yet, by the very nature of her tasks, she spent her life almost entirely isolated and locked up within protective walls of her own devising, unable to let down her guard except on those rare occasions when she was able to return to her own identity and the bosom of her family, the only people who were ever allowed to know the woman who existed beneath the surface.

Horvath wondered how she stood it and then wondered, as he always did when his thoughts strayed in that direction, why anyone would choose such a life.

He was pretty sure he would never figure it out on his own, and she would never volunteer an explanation, but he was inordinately grateful for what she did just the same.

"Ready?" he asked.

"Except for one thing," replied Hilliard, incredibly blue eyes sweeping the room and obviously not finding what he was looking for. "Where's the brass?"

Horvath smiled, and noted that Briggs was chuckling softly, huge, dark eyes sparkling with amusement and appreciation as she allowed her gaze to explore the impressive physical attributes of her male counterpart's physique.

Once in a while in the course of her life - Brian Kinney being the original case in point - she'd been moved to regret her sexual orientation. What she saw when she looked at Jared Hilliard inspired her to another one of those moments.

_Oh, well!_

She shifted in her chair as a new voice - slightly hoarse and definitely edged with amusement - rose from the shadows behind her.

"Present, and apparently just in time."

Horvath looked up and watched in silence as a stocky figure emerged from the gloom and moved to the only remaining empty chair, where she deposited a slim briefcase on the table before taking a seat and adjusting the cuffs of a very subdued but ultra-expensive gray Armani jacket. Then she glanced briefly at each the faces of the individuals seated around the table before turning finally to look directly at the senior detective.

"I apologize for my tardiness, Detective Horvath," she said. "I don't ordinarily believe in being 'fashionably late', but, in this case, it was unavoidable. I'm Alexandra Corey."

Jared Hilliard grinned. "AKA, the brass."

If Hilliard had been one of his own people, Horvath would probably have given him a stern look to encourage him to mind his manners, but that would have been a complete waste of time for the kind of freelance employees that worked for Mathis, so he didn't bother. Instead, he chose to get down to business.

"Would you like to take the lead here, Agent Corey?" he asked. "I assume you want to brief everyone on whatever you've discovered."

"Please call me Alex," she replied, "and actually, I'd prefer to simply observe, for the time being. All of you have been on the scene from the beginning, so your observations should provide a great deal of insight into everything that happened, while my own findings are still strictly preliminary. Plus, I'd really like to hear any speculation or conjecture that any of you have to offer."
Lance Mathis turned and regarded the woman with a smile, noting the exquisitely cut cap of salt-and-pepper hair, the subtle, but skillfully applied make-up, the eyeglasses dangling from a gold chain around her neck, and - above all - the intense intelligence gleaming in dark eyes that were evaluating him just as thoroughly as he was evaluating her. "So no more 'Just the facts, please'?"

She smiled, and everyone at the table was abruptly aware of being in the presence of a very focused, very powerful individual. "The days of 'Dragnet' are far behind us, Mr. Mathis. And we've learned a lot since then. Such as how to take advantage of the instincts - the sixth senses, if you will - of people like yourselves. Profiling criminals now requires broader parameters."

Mathis nodded. "And victimology?"

Her smile grew wider as her eyes - a brown so dark it was almost black - flashed with approval. "Very good. Victimology can be just as vital to tracking down an unsub as forensic evidence. And that's my particular specialty."

"So you've been looking into Brian's history, right?" It was the first time Sharon Briggs had spoken since sitting down at the table, and Horvath turned to level a quizzical gaze at her, having heard something in her voice that he could not quite identify.

The FBI agent, however, was not even remotely surprised. "I have. To say that it's very colorful would be an understatement. Wouldn't it?"

Briggs grinned. "That it would. I take it that you've seen the BareBronze ads?"

Corey did not - quite - wink. "Indeed I have."

"Excuse me," said Emmett, not bothering to try to disguise the degree of his annoyance, "but what the fuck are we talking about here?"

He was not the only one who was slightly lost and disoriented and making a mental note to check out BareBronze and its ad history.

Alex Corey simply favored Emmett with a tolerant smile before gesturing for Horvath to continue with his agenda for the meeting.

It didn't take long for the detective to lay out the summary of what the police investigation had turned up.

The forensic evidence gathered from the scene of the crime, and the facts learned from the thugs who had been arrested after pawning Brian's watch, was minimal, at best. Although the CSI techs had gathered massive quantities of data from the warehouse, none of it had proved to be useful in trying to identify the individuals who had orchestrated and financed the crime. Several more members of the attack group had been identified, arrested, and interrogated, but none had known anything about the men who'd hired them. Or so they'd claimed. Horvath had found it unlikely that none of them had noticed even the smallest detail about the individuals who had been there to observe on the night of the attack, but he'd realized quickly that their silence spoke volumes about the power wielded by such men. All of the hired thugs had been recruited and paid - in cash - by Andrew O'Malley, who had also rented the van in which Brian had been captured, and he had turned out to be exactly what Horvath had expected - a vicious, creninous bigot with ties to the Aryan Brotherhood prison gang, who had obviously taken great delight in carrying out the job he'd been hired to do, but with no discernible connection to the men who'd targeted Brian Kinney specifically. O'Malley was, in more ways than one, literally a dead end.
The authorities had realized early on that they were dealing with powerful individuals who were experts in getting what they wanted while remaining completely enshrouded in mystery, preserving their anonymity with great skill and all the discretion that big money could buy, never getting their hands dirty or risking exposure.

"Beyond that, we've got very little," he concluded. "The only evidence that might prove useful - and that's a big stretch - is a tire track spotted in the side alley by the warehouse, which we wouldn't have gotten at all except that the exhaust from an idling vehicle melted a patch of snow, and the mud underneath picked up the track when the car sped off. Turns out it was a Bridgestone Potenza S-03, primarily found on Mercedes Benz E500 sedans."

"Well, that's significant, isn't it?" asked Emmett, obviously eager to find some scrap of hope to cling to. "I mean, there can't be that many cars like that in Pittsburgh, can there?"

Horvath sighed. "Actually, there can. Since we don't have a single detail to narrow down the field - no idea about year or model or color - there are literally hundreds of them registered in the city and hundreds more in the surrounding area."

"So you're telling me," Emmett continued, his voice heavy with frustration, "that you have no clues as to who could have done this? That they're going to get away with . . ." He fell silent then, unable to find the words to express his dismay.

"Now hold on," said Horvath. "I didn't say that. I only said that the forensic evidence hasn't given us anything conclusive. Yet. There's one more thing that might pay off eventually. Apparently, one of the observers had a cold or something. Anyway, the CSI techs found a discarded tissue on the platform where the Peanut Gallery, as Kinney called them, were standing, and . . ."

"DNA," gasped Emmett, clasping his hands together quickly, gleefully. "You got DNA."

Horvath nodded. "We did, but . . ." He held up a cautionary finger. "Don't get your hopes up, because we haven't been able to match it. There are no matches in any database we've been able to access."

"So what does that mean?" Emmett demanded. "How can that be possible?"

"Relax, Emmet," said Lance Mathis gently. "DNA databases are still in the developmental stage, so they're extremely limited."

Emmett was not in a mood to be mollified. "In that case, what good does it do to have it? If you can't use it to find . . ."

"The good it will do, Mr. Honeycutt," said Alex Corey, her voice soft with sympathy, "is that it will confirm the identity of the suspect once we do find him."

"And how exactly do you plan to do that?" Emmett had risen to his feet now, his chest heaving as he was close to hyper-ventilating. "It might be easy for all of you to sit here and speculate and talk about this case like it was some kind of strategy game, but . . . you weren't there. You didn't see what they did to him. Jesus Christ!" His voice dropped to a whisper. "You can't imagine. He was . . . my God! I've never in my life seen anyone who was as beautiful, as exquisite as Brian Kinney. He was like - I don't know - like Apollo made flesh. He would . . . he'd take your breath away, and for human beings to do this to someone like him - or to anyone for that matter, and then to just . . . walk away. And all because God made him a little bit different - a little too perfect for them to bear. For them to get away with it, it's . . . it's not right. It's not fair."
Drew Boyd was on his feet then, wrapping Emmett in arms like steel, and cradling him against a rock-hard body, while everyone else looked away, uncertain of what to do or say.

Everyone, that is, except Alexandra Corey, who stood up and moved around until she was standing directly beside the football player, reaching up to lay her hand on Emmett's shoulder. "Listen to me, Emmett," she whispered. Then she waited until he turned to look at her, tears still filling his eyes.

"Are you listening?" she asked, and had no idea why he was suddenly smiling down at her.

"Yes. I'm listening."

"We are not going to let that happen," she said firmly. "Do you understand me? They're not going to get away with this."

He stepped back then, while lifting one hand to stroke Drew's face in a wordless expression of gratitude. "How can you be so sure?" he asked, wanting to believe her, but unable to swallow his skepticism.

Her smile was gentle. "Because I'm like a fucking bulldog, my young friend. I never give up until I get what I'm after. And because I really do believe in the concept of karma. What goes around really does come around - sooner or later."

It didn't make any sense at all for him to believe her, to trust in her assurances, which were simplistic, at best. And yet - somehow - he did. Thus he leaned forward, and spoke softly, while wiping away the last of his tears. "Sooner... would be better." He chose to trust her, but not quite enough to convince him to relinquish his hold on Drew's hand as he sank back into his seat.

Carl Horvath took a moment to make sure that the young man who was still a resident of the Novotny/Horvath household had regained his composure before he resumed the briefing. "So - to address the question Emmett posed - how do we go about identifying these bastards. Obviously, we're going to have to approach this investigation from different angles, so let's see what you guys have managed to come up with."

He looked first to Sharon Briggs who quickly produced a digital audio device to play back the recording she'd made of the discussion between the lab tech, Monty Peabody, and John Vincent Finchon, senior editor to the local Fox News affiliate. Before hitting the play button, she announced the time, date, and location of the conversation, and the identities of the people involved.

By the time it was finished, Jared Hilliard was grinning at her. "Oh, you are good, Baby," he laughed, eliciting a huge grin in response.

"Jesus Christ!" said Drew Boyd. "John Vincent Pinchon? Are you kidding me? I mean, I know he's a right wing fanatic and a homophobic prick, but surely he wouldn't get involved in this kind of atrocity."

Though the remark was addressed to Briggs and Horvath, it was Alex Corey who responded. "I wouldn't be too sure about that."

Horvath turned to stare at her, suddenly sure that there was something - maybe many somethings - that she was not sharing with the group. "What makes you say that?" he asked.

She smiled, knowing exactly what he was thinking, but choosing to ignore the innuendo for the moment. "Think about it," she replied, by way of avoiding the question he had not asked. "If you were mixed up in this kind of horror, wouldn't you be eager to keep tabs on your victim? Especially if you were paranoid enough to let yourself wonder if you might have missed something in the measures you took to remain unidentified. Which, of course, doesn't prove that Finchon himself is directly involved, but he has very powerful friends who might have persuaded him to look into the matter on their behalf."

Horvath regarded her solemnly, before replying. "Uh, huh!" His tone was blatantly skeptical.

Then he turned back to Briggs. "So how should we pursue this?"

She smiled and looked toward Jared Hilliard. "I think I've exhausted my access," she answered, "since I'm not Peabody's type. But maybe I can think of someone else who is."

"It's funny," said Emmett, "how you just never know. Peabody is a neighbor of Ben and Michael, and he's supposed to be this pristine bastion of morality, not to mention completely committed to a monogamous relationship."

"Honey," retorted Briggs, "have you seen him? If he's monogamous, it's because no one else would even look twice. And I've seen his partner, who is also a bottom-feeder."

Emmett thought about it for a moment; then he grinned. "I do love a woman who tells it like it is."

Alex Corey was nodding her approval, with a speculative glance toward Hilliard to acknowledge that he was almost certainly attractive enough to pull off the necessary seduction.

"And," she added, "there are other avenues available, to keep tabs on Pinchon."

It was Mathis' turn to feign disbelief. "The FBI infiltrating the fourth estate? I'm shocked."

Horvath repeated his skeptical reaction. "Uh, huh!" Then he lifted an inquisitive eyebrow at the security chief. "You guys got anything?"

Mathis gestured toward Hilliard, and nodded for him to proceed.

"You wanted something from a different angle," said the undercover agent, "so here it is."

He talked for several minutes about the things he had learned and observed about Buddy Charles and Pete Ruiz and their families. Then he wrapped up his report with a bit of speculation. "These two boys didn't do this on their own, as some kind of prank. For one thing, although they spout the rhetoric, they're not really gay bashers. No real malice in them - just ignorance. But someone put them up to the attempt to burn down Kinney's building. They're covering for someone - someone who has some kind of power over them. And sooner or later, they're going to let something slip, although it may not be enough to advance us very far in our search."

"But I don't get it, Jared," said Abshire. "If I understand you correctly, these are slum kids. From the Flats. And every indication is that the people who were behind this attack are rich and powerful. So how do you explain a connection between the two extremes?"

Hilliard smiled. "Sometimes, connections are a little convoluted, but that doesn't mean they don't exist. You're right in thinking that neither of these little punks have any link to members of the upper crust. But sometimes there can be family ties that aren't obvious at first glance."

"How so?" asked Horvath.

The young, black man sighed. "Let me tell you about the dinner I was served last night, by Miss Rachel Charles - Buddy's mother. The ingredients were simple - cheap cuts of meat, canned vegetables, rice, evaporated milk - that kind of thing." He grinned. "Though I know I don't look like it, at the moment, I can tell you that I've dined in some of the world's greatest restaurants, enjoying elaborate meals prepared by some of the greatest chefs. In New York, Paris, Milan, Madrid, Monaco - literally all over the world. And in all that, I have never had a better meal than the one I ate last night in the kitchen of a run down little shotgun house in Reilly Flats."

"So-o-o, what are you telling us?" asked Mathis. "That Buddy's mother is the Julia Child of the ghetto? So what?"

Hilliard clasped his hands before him on the table. "She learned it from her mother, who learned it from her mother, who learned it from her mother. Four generations of women who were taught that it was their purpose in life to become world-class cooks, to provide the very best service for their patrons."

"Their patrons?" It was almost a snarl from Sharon Briggs, and the disgust in her tone was a perfect reflection of his own reaction when he'd first heard Rachel Charles use those words to explain her relationship to her employers - the individuals who had employed her family for more than a century. "What the fuck does that mean?"

"What do you know," Hilliard asked coldly, "about a place called The Club?"

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

"It's a half-way house, Justin," observed Cedric Lasseigne, as he looked around the narrow, gloomy little room that was to be his home for the next few months. "What were you expecting - a suite at the Ritz?"

Justin stood in the doorway, looking into the tiny chamber which provided just enough space for a single bed, complete with lumpy mattress, foam-rubber pillow, and frayed, faded army blanket, one tiny chest of drawers and a very old wooden rocking chair. The rear wall - barely eight feet across - featured a small window with a spiderweb of cracks in the glass, and the floor was tiled with a dull, gray vinyl that was instantly recognizable as the kind that was used in every institutional establishment in the country.

"It's a closet, Frenchie," said Justin. "Which is appropriate since you don't have one."

"Don't need one," Cedric responded, "since I don't have anything to store in it."

Justin walked further into the room and plopped himself down in the rocking chair, which squeaked alarmingly under his weight, before tilting slightly to the left and settling into a new configuration. "Frenchie," he said tentatively, "you've never told me . . ."

The older man sat on the edge of the bed and spoke quickly, forestalling his companion's question. "I'm really hungry. You hungry?"

"Not really," said Justin, his nose twitching slightly at the lingering smell of liver and onions that permeated the entire house. "Maybe we could go down to the diner - get a pink plate special. If you think you can deal with more of Debbie's loud mouth, that is."

Lasseigne shuddered. He had known plenty of women like the notorious Debbie Novotny - women who meant well, but were never content unless they could delve into every nook and cranny of a person's life. And his nooks and crannies were not available for examination, to anyone.

Unconsciously, he moved his hand to rub at a spot on his left forearm, a spot that was safely concealed under the dark, faded plaid of his shirt sleeve.
"Why do you do that?" asked Justin idly.

"Do what?"

The younger man smiled. "Whenever you want to avoid answering a question, you rub your arm."

Lasseigne shrugged, and deliberately clasped his hands together. "Just a silly habit."

Justin studied the Cajun's face, bothered slightly by the undercurrent of some, strange, nameless emotion he heard in the man's voice. "Come on, Cedric. You don't . . ."

"Tell me something, Justin," Lasseigne interrupted. "Do all of your friends think of Brian the same way those two women do?"

The blonde shook his head. "Not really. Debbie has her own way of thinking, about everything. And Lindsey . . . she . . ."

"Loves him." It was not a guess.

"Yeah. I guess she does, but it's complicated."

Lasseigne allowed himself a tiny smile, pleased that he'd managed to divert Justin's attention to a new topic. "Would you mind if I offered you a different perspective? Conclusions drawn by someone who has no axe to grind, no ulterior motives, other than to help you sort out your thoughts?"

Justin, who was more perceptive than the older man realized and who knew he was being deliberately diverted, simply smiled.

"You've been a real blessing to me, cher. Over these last days, I've listened to your stories - about your life and your friends . . . and your Brian - and it's allowed me to step outside my own meager existence. To see things that may not be obvious to the people who are so intimately involved with him, and with you. You're a good man, Justin, and I think you're getting very close to making a huge mistake. One that I would not see you make, if I can do anything to help you avoid it."

"What kind of mistake?" Justin's voice was filled with youthful skepticism.

The elderly man's smile was gentle. "You're about to open your hand, and let go of the greatest treasure of your life. You're about to let go . . . of Brian."

Justin closed his eyes, and let the image form in his mind. The perfect image. The image of the man he loved with his whole heart. "It's what he wants."

Lasseigne leaned forward and laid his hand against the young man's shoulder. "Bullshit!"

Justin couldn't help but grin. "What?"

"How is it possible for you to love him so much, and know him so little?"

"More to the point," Justin retorted, "how is it possible for you to think you know him at all?"

Lasseigne sat back and regarded his young friend with a sympathetic smile "Because you've allowed me to see him through your eyes, but without the distortion of loving him. How many times has he pushed people away from him, Justin? You - and Lindsey - and Michael - and God only knows how many others. And every single time he's done it, what's been the motive behind it? How many times are you and your friends going to let him save you, by giving up his own dreams and needs? Are you really going to allow him to wind up alone - to give up everything he wants - in order to protect the people he cares about?"

"That's not what he does. He just doesn't want any . . . silly romantic attachments. He doesn't want me."

"You know," Lasseigne said with a sigh as he rose and moved to stand at the window, looking out into the blustery day, "you're not nearly as smart as you think you are. Or as I thought you were."

"What do you mean?"

The old man turned and stared down at his young friend's face, and Justin could not quite shrug off the expression of pity he read there, which sparked a surge of anger within him. Why on earth would this broken, pathetic old drunk think he had a right to pity Justin Taylor, up-and-coming darling of the art world, member of the social elite, artiste extraordinaire?

Lasseigne saw the flare of rage in Justin's eyes, and knew exactly what it meant, knew that he was probably wasting his time and that any persistent effort to force his young friend to open his mind to a truth he might not be ready to face would very likely put an end to their friendship, and that was a risk he preferred not to take. Thus he turned away, and went back to looking out the window. "Don't mind me. I'm just a tired, meddling old busybody. What do I know?"

Justin flushed. "I'm sorry, Frenchie. I didn't mean . . ."

"Of course, you did. You're young, beautiful, successful, talented - with your whole life ahead of you. Why should you listen to me, when I've made such a mess of my own?"

Justin stood and moved to touch the old man's shoulder. "Maybe because you're one of the smartest people I've ever met."

Lasseigne was rubbing his arm again. "Maybe I used to be," he said finally, his eyes soft with stirred memories. Then he turned back to regard his young friend with a tiny, enigmatic smile. "It's time for you to go, Justin. I need to get settled in here and figure out what I'm going to do next, and you . . . you need to think things through. I don't have any evidence to offer to convince you that I know what I'm talking about; that's a conclusion you'll have to draw on your own - or not. But I will say one more thing. If you let him go, you'll be making the biggest mistake of your life. After listening to everything you've told me about him, it seems to me that Brian has spent years pushing people away, because he thinks, at least in some small part, that he doesn't deserve to be happy. Because he blames himself for everything that's ever gone wrong in his life - for everything that he couldn't 'fix'. Because he truly believes that it would be best - for you - if he walked away. I know you don't believe that; I don't even know for sure why I believe it, but I do. If you let him go, you might eventually find a way to go on with your life; you might even manage to build a good, happy future for yourself, but it will never make up for what you've lost. Even if you don't ever understand that."

Justin's eyes were suddenly distant and unfocused and filled with shadows, as he considered what the man had said. He realized that he would like to believe that Cedric was right, but the simple truth was that the old Cajun didn't know Brian at all. If he had, he'd have realized that Brian - beautiful, arrogant, narcissistic Brian - did not deal in guilt or remorse. It simply didn't make sense, given the motto by which he lived - no regrets, no excuses, no apologies. Sorry, after all, was still bullshit, in the framework of Brian's life. And always would be.

"I wish I could be sure of that," Justin replied, "but I need to know . . ."

Lasseigne's smile was sympathetic. "You accuse me of being a smart man, Justin, but the simple truth is that I've led a foolish life - defying the odds, taking silly chances, never learning the things I needed to learn, until it was too late. So I can't claim to know much. But there are a couple of things that I have managed to learn along the way, in spite of my own deliberate ignorance. Two little bits of wisdom, which is not much, admittedly to show for a lifetime of experience, but I don't have anything else to offer you, so I hope you'll indulge a silly old man.

"The thing about real life, cher, is that you can't always know. Sometimes, living requires a leap of blind faith. So that's the first thing you have to decide - whether or not he's worth the risk. And the second thing is that you have to fight for the things you really want. Things worth having don't usually come easy. That's what you and all of your friends have never stopped to consider - never allowed yourself to know."

Justin shook his head. "I don't understand. What are you saying?"

The old man sighed. "Your Brian - your beautiful, arrogant, self-absorbed, narcissistic Brian - has spent his whole life fighting to protect and defend the people he cares about. But no one - no one - has ever fought for him."

Justin suddenly found it very hard to breathe.

Most nights, there were no stars visible over Babylon, but this night was different. Not that there were a lot of stars - no amazing sweep of galactic splendor - but there were a few, glittering in the spaces between layers of gray, moonlit clouds and plumes of the industrial smoke that almost always punctuated the Pittsburgh skyline. In addition, the air was clear, days of wind and rain having washed it clean of the metallic tang it usually carried.

Everything was beaded with water, and Justin's shoes - the disreputable old Reeboks that he usually wore when he decked himself out in 501s and ratty old t-shirt - were soaked through as he traipsed through puddles to reach his goal.

Near the left rear corner of the roof, there was a cozy little partially enclosed nook, semi-sheltered by a right angled joint of brick walls that formed stair-steps around the corner, leading to the entrance to the first drop of the northernmost fire escape. Within that space, a couple of sling-type lawn chairs had been arranged on either side of a plastic Parsons table and a small metal storage cabinet that housed a stack of pillows and waterproof cushions.

A quick inspection of the area confirmed that it had not been used in a very long time - the non-usage confirmed by the absence of cigarette butts and empty beer cans and used condoms. He had not expected to find evidence of recent use, since it was a place that very few people even knew about, but he was glad, nevertheless, to find his expectations fulfilled, especially since it was a part of the personal space designated primarily for the use of Babylon's owner.

Brian had not been up here recently. Unless, of course, someone had come in to clean up behind him, as was certainly possible. People were always cleaning up after Brian - both those who got paid (very well) to do so, and those who simply did it because it was just what they did.

Justin decided that he would stick to his first impression; he would believe that Brian had not come here without him, because it was easier to believe that than the alternative.

He would prefer to assume that the corner - AKA The Fuck Nest, in Kinney-speak - had gone unvisited since the last time he and Brian had come here together, even though he knew that was unlikely.
He stood beside one of the deck chairs and let his fingers drift across its frame as his mind drifted to other days, sweeter memories . . . one specific memory, vivid and unforgettable.

There had been stars that night too - and moonlight - and spotlights sweeping the sky, originating from some big to-do over at PNC Park, but it had not been raining or wet. There had been a definite chill in the air, as there almost always was except in the depths of summer, but it had not mattered.

Brian had seen to that.

It was early - early for Babylon, anyway - before midnight, when Justin overheard Michael complaining about 'Brian's disappearing act'. At the time, he had been dancing with a particularly toothsome stud - tall, auburn hair, intense green eyes, and a six-pack to die for - but his interest and his erection had waned immediately when he'd looked around and realized that Michael was right. Brian was nowhere to be found.

He was not on the dance floor, staking out his newest mark; he was not standing on one of the catwalks, watching the crowd in order to zero in on a new target; he was not leaning on the bar, allowing some hunky stud to whisper in his ear about all the things the stud might dream of doing with him and for him; he was not standing on the stairs, smirking at some lame, stale joke that Ted or Emmett had managed to mangle; he was not even in the back room, getting his cock worshipped by some newbie/hottie who was undoubtedly fooling himself into believing that this was the beginning of something beautiful and lasting.

He was simply not around, and Michael was doing what he did better than anyone else in the world: whining.

"Jesus! He was almost shouting from his vantage point on the stairs where he could look out across the dance floor and take in all the action. "What did he do? Triple the power of the amps? My fucking eardrums are bleeding, and . . ." He paused and glared at a tall, hunky young brunette who had taken advantage of an opportunity to brush up against him during his descent to the ground floor and then hesitated for a moment to favor him with a wink and a come-hither smile. "I'd forgotten how it feels to be treated like a piece of meat," he complained, deliberately turning his back on his admirer and moving into the circle of Ben's arms. "Nothing ever changes in here."

*Emmett - irrepressible as ever - grinned and directed a playful smile toward Michael's cruiser. "Not if we're lucky."

But Michael was not in the mood for banter that he now considered silly and beneath his dignity. "It all just seems so shallow, and juvenile." He glanced at Ben with a self-satisfied little smirk, using that comment as a segue into his next complaint. He did not actually say "and speaking of juvenile", but he might as well have done so, as everyone heard it anyway. "And where the fuck is Brian? He's the one that insisted we haul our asses down here, and then he pulls this vanishing act? What's up with that?"

Ted was nursing his tonic water and watching a couple of go-go boys perform a blatantly erotic dance as Bon Jovi's Wanted - Dead or Alive blasted from the speakers, and he continued to watch until the song was finished before turning to regard Michael with a puzzled gaze.

"Lighten up, Mikey, he suggested finally, with a slightly sardonic smile. "As I recall, you used to enjoy the quality of the single-minded repartee around here."

"*Yeah, but then I grew up. That's what most people do, you know. Unless you want to stay an over-the-hill club boy forever, like . . ."
He fell silent abruptly as he noticed that both Ted and Emmett were looking at him strangely, as if they weren't quite sure who was speaking to them. But that was okay with him, because he had recently come to believe that his old friends had changed with time, that he no longer knew them as well as he'd once believed, and that they no longer understood his attitudes about love and life and morality. And friendship. In addition, Justin was staring at him, obviously surprised and uneasy and uncertain how to react to his anger.

"Let's go, Ben," he said quickly. "If our host can't be bothered to stick around, I don't see why we should."

"Hang on, Michael," said Ted steadily, leaning close to speak directly into his old friend's ear. "I'm sure he'll be down shortly. Since he bought the place, he has responsibilities, so he's not always . . ."

"Responsibilities, my ass!" His laugh was sharp - almost caustic. "The day Brian Kinney is responsible for anything, except figuring out who to fuck next, there'll be snowballs in hell."

Emmett tilted his head and stared at Michael uncertainly. "Funny. I thought he was your best friend."

Michael took a deep breath, and his eyes were suddenly filled with bitterness. "Yeah. Once upon a time, so did I."

"Michael," said Ben gently, "if this is all about this mess with J. R. . . ."

"Yeah," Michael snapped. "A mess that never would have happened if Brian had kept his nose - and his money - out of our business."

"Michael," Ben went on, obviously trying to placate his partner, "he's Gus' father, and he's got a right . . .".

"Like he ever gave a shit, about Gus or anybody else. All he's ever cared about . . ."

"Right," Ted interrupted, surprised to realize that he was about to blurt out what he was thinking, even though he knew he should just shut up and mind his own business. But then again, he figured, in a way, it was his business; he felt suddenly a bit proprietary, in spite of the fact that he often took some guilty pleasure from applying the screws himself and making Brian squirm whenever he got the chance, but that was different. He might even say it was expected, since Brian always responded in kind. But this - this was just . . . wrong. "He really gives a whole new meaning to the term 'deadbeat dad', doesn't he? I mean I happen to know for a fact - since I am his accountant, you know - that there's never been a single time when Lindsey or Gus - or certain other people - needed something from him that he wasn't there to write the check, or hand over the car keys, or put in the right word, or risk everything to take on the crooked politician, or sign over his parental rights in order to do what was best for his son - and all without ever once expecting to be paid back. Or even acknowledged for his contributions."

"He's not a fucking hero!" Michael was almost snarling.

"No," Ted agreed, his eyes filled with ineffable sadness. "He's not. He's just a man. There was a time when that was enough for you, but I guess that time is gone."

When he fell silent and turned to walk away, it was uncertain who was more astonished by his outburst - him or his audience.

Justin did not wait around to gauge the response of the crowd. Instead, he simply stepped forward to lay a gentle hand on the accountant's shoulder, before pushing past everyone to make his way.
upstairs.

It was time to find Brian.

The search didn’t take long, as he had a pretty good idea of where to look once he’d made certain that the owner’s office was unoccupied. Brian had been brooding and uncharacteristically quiet for the last couple of days, as if he had something on his mind that he didn’t wish to discuss - a condition that seemed to be happening more and more frequently of late. Justin had questioned him once or twice, but realized quickly that he was wasting his breath. Brian would talk about it when he was ready or never talk about it at all, and nothing Justin could say or do would change that.

He pushed open the heavy metal door which lead to the roof and came to a sudden stop, more than willing to pause and suspend breathing in order to appreciate the vision before him.

Brian Kinney - dressed in black jeans and sleeveless black shirt, standing atop the ledge at the front of the roof, a joint in one hand and a glass of whiskey in the other, as he gazed up into the sky, with a full moon framing his perfect profile and emphasizing every sculpted line of his perfect body. The young artist realized, at that moment, that he felt a driving, almost irrational need to capture the image on canvas, to define the essence of the man and the world stretched out at his feet. He even knew what he would title it.

Solitude

He was momentarily surprised by that idea, until he thought about it, and came face-to-face with a truth that he had never let himself recognize before. Despite the fact that he was seldom physically alone, that he could have virtually anybody he wanted, that almost every man or woman within his sphere of influence would gladly kneel at his feet - Brian Kinney spent most of his life in solitude. Not physically, of course. Nobody who fucked as much and as often as he did could be termed ‘solitary’. But inside - where he really lived, where the real Brian Kinney resided - he was rarely touched by anyone.

Except . . .

Me? Has he really let me get close enough to touch him, to see who he really is?

He wasn’t sure why he found the notion so frightening.

Michael, of course, had been admitted to that very select club, once upon a time. Could it be that it was really over between the two who had been like brothers most of their lives? He closed his eyes and visualized the look on Michael’s face as he’d vented his anger at Brian, and he almost cringed as he recalled the deep, abiding resentment that he’d seen lurking beneath the petty malice.

Could Michael really have forgotten all that Brian had meant to him - all that he had done for him and for his family?

He thought then about Michael’s final, desperate snarl.

"He’s not a fucking hero."

And he stared once more at the lonely figure standing tall and unbroken in the liquid moonlight, and suddenly was almost certain that Michael was wrong in his assumption. Heroes, by their very definition, came in many different guises.

"Hey, Shepherd Boy. Looking for your lost sheep?"
Justin grinned. "Fuck the sheep. I'm looking for my big, studly stallion."

Brian turned to face him fully, and seemed unaware that he was standing just inches away from a fall that would almost certainly kill him. He was completely relaxed and unconcerned, except... oh, yes. There it was again - the whatever-it-was that had been bothering him lately was still there, buried deep beneath the easy smile, but still definitely there.

"What are you doing up here?" Justin asked, moving close and helping himself to a drag from Brian's toke.

"Meditating." There was no attempt to disguise the sarcasm in his tone, along with the faintest note of genuine anger.

"Brian," said Justin softly, taking his companion's hand and pulling him down off the ledge, "is something wrong?"

Brian shrugged. "What on earth could be wrong?"

"Isn't that what I just asked you?"

Again, Brian shrugged before moving off toward the nook at the rear of the building, tossing back the last of his drink. There was a fresh bottle of Beam on the table, and he quickly refilled his glass.

"Are you angry with me?" Justin asked, dropping into one of the sling chairs, as Brian moved to take a seat on one of the stair steps at the corner.

"Of course not. You're perfect. What on earth would I have to be angry about?"

It was Justin's turn to shrug. "You weren't too happy with the new Rage issue - the wedding, I mean."

"It's nothing to do with me." The answer was clipped, flat, unemotional. "Rage belongs to you and Father Michael, so you can do whatever you like with it."

Justin took a cigarette from the pack on the table and lit it. "I think he and Ben left. He's um... not too happy with you."

Again the shrug. "Me and Abe Lincoln have a lot in common."

"Huh?"

The smile was sardonic. "You can't please all of the people, all of the time."

"Maybe you should have stayed out of this whole J.R. situation."

Hazel eyes were suddenly filled with flecks of ice. "Yeah, maybe I should."

He stood then and started to walk away.

"Brian," Justin called, quickly tossing his cigarette over the edge of the roof. "Brian, wait. I didn't mean it. Michael and Melanie are both acting like complete jerks, and Lindsey's probably the only one of the three with any real concern about the baby. The other two only seem interested in getting their own way, no matter what J.R. might need."

Brian paused, but didn't turn back to face Justin. "Sometimes," he said, very softly, "you can't please anybody at all."
Justin stepped forward and molded himself against that beautifully sculpted back, wrapping his arms around his lover's waist and letting his palms settle against the bulge at Brian's crotch. "You can always please me," he replied, nuzzling against the golden skin of Brian's bicep where the soft fabric of his shirt had slipped up to expose hard muscle.

Brian didn't offer a response, but his eyes were extraordinarily dark, as if he were sifting through old memories . . . old, shadowed memories, like . . .

And suddenly Justin knew - knew what Brian was seeing, what had caused him to close himself off, to turn inward.

It was the painting - the new one that he'd just completed, the one that was filled with his own doubts and fears and uncertainties, comprised of vivid, angular coils and jagged swatches of ebony and crimson and acid green, and huge blocks of cobalt and charcoal that loomed like walls. Prison walls above cracked foundations. Most people - even people who claimed to understand his art - only saw reflections of themselves in his paintings; their own beliefs, their own hopes or desires, their own despair. But Brian had always had the ability to see and identify the emotions that Justin poured into his art, had always been able to discern Justin's truth.

He had only looked at the completed painting once, but once had been enough.

He knew. He knew that the light was waning; that the desperation was building. He had figured it out, and was stepping back. Just as he always had. Stepping back, and opening the door, to allow Justin to be free to make his own choices.

As he always did. The darkness present now in those beautiful hazel eyes was the specter of hope, relinquished.

But Justin could not just . . . walk away. He loved Brian, had always loved Brian. But how could he go on living with the emptiness, without the commitment that Brian would never give him?

He loved Brian, but he wanted more. He wanted all the things that Brian did not believe in, would never believe in. Even though he knew that Brian loved him - loved every bit as much as he was loved in turn.

But what kind of future could they have if Brian could never bring himself to admit it, to give of himself, to admit his need? If he could never believe in them?

And . . . would someone else ever step up to fulfill Justin's dreams as long as he was standing in Brian's shadow?

He looked up then, straight into Brian's eyes . . . and understood.

Not today. Maybe not tomorrow. But soon. Soon they would be saying good-bye. Soon, Brian would stand there, and watch him walk away.

But not, please God, not tonight.

He threw himself into Brian's arms and felt him falter, felt him start to pull away, but Justin was not going to allow him to step back. Not yet. Not tonight.

When he ripped off his shirt and shucked his jeans, Brian just stood there watching. But he was not retreating, not turning away, and Justin bit his lip to conceal a smile. There were few things in his life that he knew with certainty, but he knew Brian Kinney - knew that the man had never quite managed to figure out how to resist this particular seduction.
When he was completely bare, his skin touched only by the moonlight and the reflections from the skylights, he lifted himself up on his toes and slipped his arms around Brian's neck and fitted himself against that sleek, perfect body. "I need you to fuck me," he whispered, licking his way up through the stubble just forming on Brian's throat. "I need you to take that big, beautiful dick and shove it into my ass and fuck me so hard that I see stars. Brian, please, I need your cock. I need to feel you inside me, so deep that you're a part of me. Deeper than you've ever gone before. Deeper than anybody ever has, or ever will." Then he leaned back and looked up to see the desire smoldering in those night-dark eyes. "So deep that you mark me - inside - like no one else ever could."

Brian's hesitation lasted only a moment, but it felt infinite as Justin easily read the thoughts running through his lover's mind - the reluctance, the doubts, the certainty that tomorrow was almost upon them. But then Brian grabbed him - roughly, almost brutally - and shoved him forward until he was braced against the brick railing at the edge of the roof. Tearing off his own clothes and retrieving lube and a condom from the cabinet, it was a matter of seconds for Brian to ready himself and then plunge into the ripe, lush, pulsating darkness that was calling to him. His hands were gripping Justin's hips so firmly that they both knew there would be bruises tomorrow, and his mouth was devouring Justin, his teeth clamping into tender flesh as if he could consume him, but it didn't matter. In those incredible moments, nothing mattered except the power and the brutal joining, the compulsion to be one. When orgasm took them, simultaneously, it was an explosion of sensation, a white-out so intense that consciousness escaped them both, and they collapsed together into the corner.

It was not the last time they would fuck before the end, but it was farewell nonetheless.

Justin sat on the ledge, swinging his legs over and staring down at the street below, his cock twitching with the memory of that incredible night when they had fucked and fucked - and then fucked again.

But then, inevitably, his mind moved forward to remember the rest, to recall that it was just four days later when Brian had returned from a visit to the doctor to announce that he had syphilis, his statement triggering a completely ridiculous queen-out on Justin's part, when he had managed to forget how many random partners he had entertained during and since his time in L.A., and even the one time when he'd been bombed out of his skull on coke and wakened in the morning to find himself in bed with a strange, hot guy, his ass sore and wet, and no condom anywhere in sight.

He had been terrified on that occasion, and hurried off to the nearest clinic for testing. Waiting for the results had been the most horrible time of his life - a time he had never spoken of to anyone. Not even Brian. In fact, especially not Brian.

But he had managed to put all of that out of his mind when he'd gotten furious and lectured Brian about his promiscuous lifestyle and how "it was a miracle that it hadn't happened sooner".

God! He'd behaved like such an unbelievably hypocritical asshole - behavior which had always seemed to be the one of the favorite pastimes for their fucked-up little extended family.

And a week later, he was gone, and Brian was alone. Again. Like he'd always been.

He sighed as he remembered - again - how many times he'd left Brian, and then he thought about other times, when he'd refused to go, which reminded him about one of the things which Cedric Lasseigne had pointed out to him, something that - in retrospect - was so obvious that he couldn't believe he'd never thought of it himself.
He'd been waxing lyrical - almost boasting - about what he'd done when Brian had tried to push him away after his cancer surgery, about how he had stood his ground and refused to be banished from his place at Brian's side by pointing out that they had "a commitment", which he intended to honor.

Cedric had seemed skeptical. "And he was okay with that?" he'd asked, obviously doubtful.

Justin had allowed himself a smug smile. "Must have been. He accepted it."

"Did he? Or was he just too tired and too sick and too devastated by the treatments to continue to fight it?"

Justin had gone very still, realizing that he had never once considered that possibility.

Cedric's smile had been very gentle. "What do you suppose the word 'commitment' means to a man like your Brian? A romantic promise? A pledge of undying love? Or a locked door?"

Jesus! How could he have been so fucking blind?

He sat for a while, watching the patterns of the night, the stars shifting toward the horizon, the occasional passage of a jet overhead, reflecting in the puddles on the roof. He sat and remembered, and thought about Brian.

He thought about his life, about what lay ahead of him, of what his life would be without the man who was his center. And he wondered if he could endure it. For it was time for him to face the truth, exactly as Cedric Lasseigne had suggested.

He could live without Brian, if he had to. But his life would never be what it should have been. He would never reach the full, complete existence that the two of them were meant to share if he allowed Brian to walk away. In order to be complete, to be everything he was meant to be, he needed Brian at his side for the rest of his life. But that was only one half of the equation. The other half was equally important and must be addressed. Was he what Brian needed? Would both of them be happier together than apart, or would Brain ultimately be better off if Justin simply turned . . . and walked away?

He tried to look down through the years, to consider everything rationally, to figure out where his place was in Brian's life, and how he would endure the emptiness if the man whom he now recognized as his soul mate should never return to his side.

When he eventually decided that it was time to stop sitting here moping, he was still no closer to knowing what to do.

Tomorrow, he was to be interviewed by some hotshot super-sleuth from the FBI - some woman who was supposed to be able to put all the pieces of the puzzle together and fix everything that was broken.

As if that were even possible, for some things, he knew, could never be fixed, a thought which led him to remember Brian's face - to remember what had been done to him - and to face the possibility that no one would ever be able to make him right again.

Not that he would care how Brian looked. But Brian would care. Being Brian Kinney had, after all, been the focus of his whole life.

He closed his eyes and remembered the beauty, remembered the perfection, remembered how that face had taken his breath away the first time he'd ever seen it.
Brian Kinney - the face of God.

Tomorrow, he would manage to get through his interview, and then he would talk to Cynthia, who knew Brian better than almost anybody and who was straightforward enough to be truthful with him. As much as she might wish to spare Justin's feelings, her loyalty to Brian would not allow her to put anyone's needs above those of the man who was both her employer and her friend.

Tomorrow, he would decide. But for tonight - for tonight . . . he rose and stood at the edge of the roof, lost in the darkness and in the memories and knew only one thing: Brian was not here, not beside him, not close enough to touch, and all the logic in the world couldn't compensate for the fact that everything inside him was screaming that this was not the way things were supposed to be.

He had come home to Brian, but Brian had left him here - and taken 'home' with him when he'd gone, leaving Justin to realize that no place would ever be 'home' again, if Brian Kinney wasn't there.

He had always loved the darkness. Even when he hadn't needed it. But now he had good cause to love it more, since it had become his best, most intimate friend, since it allowed him to stare directly into the eyes of the world without worrying about what would be staring back.

The air was warm and perfect, touching his skin like a drift of silk that had been left lying in the sunlight, and the roar of the surf breaking on the beach below was the perfect accompaniment to the idle scroll of his thoughts.

He looked out toward the east and watched the progression of waves rolling toward the strip of sand, as moonlight silvered the froth that crowned the breakers. It was not peaceful - exactly; there was entirely too much chaos and tumult in the pounding of the water against the shoreline, but it was comforting nonetheless. Predictable chaos.

Unlike his life which had, somehow, plunged off the deep end of possibility into unknown realms, leaving him without an anchor to cling to or a lifeline to reach for.

Except for Justin, of course, who had tried to reach him. Tried to throw him a line. But that he could no longer allow.

He knew, beyond all doubt, that any hope for happiness he had ever known had left him on the day that Justin had walked out of his life, but he knew something else with even greater certainty. Rather than see Justin threatened - in any way - he would put a bullet through his own temple, without a second thought or moment of hesitation. He could contemplate spending the rest of his life alone and without solace, so long as he knew that Justin continued to exist . . . somewhere; that Justin could live a good, rich, full life, wherever he might be.

Brian had always expected to spend his life alone, so it was not such a great adjustment for him to make. His only real regret was that he had foolishly allowed himself to forget who he was - what he was - when he got caught up in a fantasy of joy and romantic attachment with a maddeningly persistant blond twink who simply refused to take no for an answer.

But that was the past. This . . . this was the future. Darkness welcomed, embraced - sanctuary.

It was lovely to feel free again, unfettered, even if it was all just an illusion. He was not really alone, sometimes wondered if he would ever be alone again. But Chris McClaren, thank God, was smart enough to have figured out that Brian did not like being crowded or watched. Even if the watching part was necessary to save his life.
Thus he was sitting here on the deck of the cottage that the FBI had found for him, basking in an illusion of privacy when the truth was that there were probably plenty of security people out there in the night, getting paid to make sure no one intruded on his solitude, except them. But at least, they'd been discreet, so far. And McClaren, who actually occupied the cottage with him, had departed several hours earlier, muttering something about an urgent errand. As far as Brian was concerned, the man could have excused himself by claiming that he had to catch a flight to Jupiter. It didn't matter why he'd left; it only mattered that he was gone.

Tomorrow, he knew, he would step back into the madhouse, as a car would arrive very early to transport him to Turnage's little castle by the sea - AKA The Turnage Clinic - where he would undergo the first of several surgical procedures. Where the good doctor would begin the process of fixing what was broken.

Brian wasn't sure he believed that it was possible to repair the damage, but he figured he had nothing to lose by trying. If the rest of his life was to be spent in scouting out ever new, ever younger and more beautiful tricks, it would definitely be to his advantage to avoid looking like a taller, skinnier version of Quasimoto.

Of course, if he could manage to continue to run Kinnetik - without scaring away his big clients - it probably wouldn't matter much anyway. Money, after all, could buy anything, including pretty young things who could pretend not to see ugliness and mutilation so long as they were sufficiently well compensated. But he was a little too fond of his own money to want to give it away if he didn't have to.

He closed his eyes for a moment, and the rhythm of the surf stirred a quick flash of memory - which he suppressed almost before it could form.

Almost.

Blond hair, beautiful creamy skin stroked by golden sunlight, slender body splayed against the softness of sand drifts, blue eyes filled with laughter - and lust. A business trip to Jacksonville, a conference that lasted two days, interspersed with incredible nights of bottomless passion and then a week-end, filled with hours and hours of mind-blowing pleasure as the two of them explored the beachfront property of the client who'd been so pleased with Brian's campaign suggestions that he'd urged them to take advantage of his hospitality while he headed to Dallas for more interminable business meetings.

They had not wasted a single moment of it.

Brian shifted on the chaise lounge, focusing on obliterating that memory from his mind, relieved to find that his body seemed to be healing quickly. Though still stiff, he was now able to move without great discomfort or having to ease into new positions by degree to avoid straining over-taxed muscles or damaged tissue.

He had learned a hard lesson of late; everything was a matter of degree.

The house behind him was dark, except for a single small lamp that would provide enough light for him to avoid smacking into the furniture when - and if - he should decide that it was time to seek out the narrow but comfortable bed that had been set up for him in a small chamber off the main room of the little, two-story house. Though there were two full bedrooms upstairs, he was not yet capable of navigating the stairs. Besides, it hardly mattered where he slept or how much room he might have since he was, inevitably, sleeping alone.

He did not waste any time lamenting his solitude.
No excuses. No regrets.

He looked up as an airliner appeared over a cloudbank low on the northern horizon and followed it until it disappeared into a pale mist rising over the water. Somewhere, a bell was ringing - a dull, lonely sound in the darkness.

He didn't want to think about lonely things.

A decanter of Jack Daniels Single Barrel whiskey sat on the table at his side, and he drained his glass before pouring himself a new serving. He knew it was probably not a good idea to be drinking; he was, after all, only a few hours away from going under the surgical knife, which would have happened two days earlier had he not developed a slight fever during the trip down from Pittsburgh.

But . . . what the hell? It wasn't as if he really cared that much anyway.

The booze was smooth and satiny going down, and he reminded himself to find out who had provided it, so he could offer his thanks for the thoughtfulness and for providing a new addition to his list of preferred libations.

There was a faint thump and then a soft rustle from somewhere behind him, and a slight stir in the air told him that he was no longer alone, and he wondered - idly - if he should be concerned enough to turn around to see who had chosen to disturb his lovely silence. But, in the end, he didn't. To reiterate his earlier observation, it wasn't as if he really cared that much anyway.

"If I were a serial killer - or a psychopath - you'd be a dead man," said Chris McClaren.

"Uh, huh." Brian didn't even bother opening his eyes.

"Did you eat?"

A semi-toast with the half-empty glass. "Uh, huh."

"Liquid diet, huh?"

"Finest kind."

McClaren grinned. It was always an unexpected pleasure to discover another Hawk-eye Pierce aficionado. "Not quite," he replied, as he moved forward and sprawled into the chair on Brian's right. "But it's early yet."

Something in his voice - something new that Brian realized he had not heard before - spurred sufficient interest to convince him to open his eyes just in time to see McClaren remove a small plastic container from his jacket pocket and set it on the table between them.

"What's that?"

"Your fondest wish."

Brian opened his mouth to dispute the claim, but the FBI agent beat him to it. "Except for that."

Brian grinned, as McClaren opened the container, and laid out the necessary accouterments. "All for me?"

"Fuck that. There's enough for two."

"Strictly for medicinal purposes, I suppose."

"Your boss is going to be so disappointed in you."

McClaren's grin was roguish. "Only if she finds out we didn't save her any."

Brian watched as the fed assembled a fat joint, before pulling a disposable lighter from his pocket and igniting the toke. The aroma was like an elixir as the first plume of smoke swirled around them.

"I could kiss you," said Brian, as McClaren handed him the joint.

"Maybe later," came the response.

Brian couldn't quite suppress the chuckle that escaped him. "Magritte's pipe, my ass!"

He inhaled deeply and felt the first tiny rush expand within his body. Then he took another hit before turning to study the profile of his companion who was staring up into the night.

"I'm never wrong, you know." It was a simple statement of fact, and it was obvious that McClaren required no clarification.

"No. I don't suppose you are."

The FBI agent pushed back into his chair, and then went very still as he noticed that the blanket spread across Brian's lower half was slipping, revealing . . . skin. Lots and lots of smooth, unbroken, golden skin.

Shit! The man was fresh out of the hospital from a beating that should have left him so badly marked that nothing about him would be able to stir sexual interest in even the horniest individual in the world. Shit!

"Shit!" he muttered. "Why the fuck are you sitting out here naked?"

Brain simply shrugged. "What difference does it make, way out here in the backside of nowhere? I don't think I'm offending anybody."

He then handed the joint back and lifted his eyes just in time to catch McClaren's gaze and interpret what he saw there.

Hazel eyes darkened as he carefully, deliberately, turned away while he tugged the blanket back into place, and his voice was rough, almost hoarse, when he continued. "On the other hand, maybe I am. It's all right. You don't have to explain anything."

It was McClaren's turn to laugh, but there was no real amusement in it. "You think you got me all figured out, don't you?"

"It's not exactly rocket science." The answer was straightforward, sharp, clipped.

McClaren sat up sharply and turned until he was leaning forward, almost - but not quite - invading Brian's space. "You think this matters to me?" he asked, one hand gesturing toward Brian's face. "You think I can't see what's beneath it. See the man you were before this happened, and the man you'll be again, when it's all over?" He took a deep drag before handing the joint back to Brian. "Then you're not nearly as smart as I thought you were."

But Brian was still gazing out into the night. "You could always just close your eyes."
"You stupid fucker!"

McClaren darted forward then and wrapped his arms around Brian's shoulders and pulled that supple, slender body against his chest until their lips were almost touching. "You stupid fucker!" he repeated, before claiming Brian's mouth in a steamy, hungry kiss that had nothing of tenderness or uncertainty about it, a kiss that left them both breathless and reeling and left Brian realizing that he had seldom been kissed so thoroughly - or so well.

Brian blinked. "What was . . ."

"That was the kind of kiss that one horny man gives to another. The kind of kiss that I'm pretty sure you're more accustomed to giving than getting. But you need to understand something."

Brian stared at McClaren's beautifully proportioned face for a moment. Then he took the joint from the agent's hand and deliberately inhaled deeply, waiting to hear the rest of the story.

"Yes, OK. You're right. I'm as queer as you are. And I want the same things you want. And right now, the thing I'd like most is to fuck your hot little ass into next year." He grinned when he saw the denial rising in hazel eyes. "Or vice versa. We could argue about that later. But, in another way, you're wrong. No matter how much I'd like to fuck you, if I did that, I couldn't do what I'm supposed to be doing. If I'm fucking you, or - God, I can't even believe I'm thinking about it - letting you fuck me, then I can't do the most important thing of all. I can't protect you.

"That's the only thing that really matters. And if you think about it, you'll begin to understand why. I don't want to have to deal with that amazing blond twink of yours, and you can't even imagine how weird it is that I could be alarmed at the idea of having to answer to him if anything should happen to you. Nor do I want to confront your Italian-drag queen best bud, or the mother of your child who's trying to make herself believe she'll ever love anybody else the way she loves you, or that crazy loud-mouthed redhead who manages to resent you and love you all at the same time, or that amazingly lovely nelly-bottom who would probably lay down his life for you, or your eminently fuckable head of security who isn't interested in either one of us but would gladly take on the Russian mob to defend you, or any of the other few thousand individuals who care about you way more than they should. Or, last but certainly not least, my boss, who will have my head on a plate if I let anybody get close enough to hurt you.

"So, as much as I might like the idea, it ain't happening. And, just to be sure we understand each other perfectly, I'm also unwilling to provide the body for you to use to pretend that the one you really want doesn't matter to you. If things were different, I might - and that's a big might - be willing to work out a fuck-buddy arrangement with your tight little ass, but I'm nobody's substitute twink. So . . . are we clear?"

Everything went strangely still for the space of a brace of heartbeats, and then - unbelievably - Brian Kinney laughed and took another deep drag of the joint.

"I knew it," he said as he settled back against his chair, letting the blanket fall as it would.

"Knew what?"

"It's a sixth sense."

McClaren was trying - without much success - to stifle a rising sense of resentment. "What is?"

Brian looked up, and once more enjoyed the touch of the warm breeze against his skin. "I always know," he replied, turning to regard McClaren with a smug smile, "when someone is ogling my ass."
McClaren blinked.

Shit!
Chapter 28

She had known it would turn out to be a mistake when she did it, but she'd managed to convince herself that it would be all right. That it would prove it was all just a figment of her imagination.

Only . . . it wasn't.

The pencil mark she'd made on the soffit of the vaulted porch roof had been intended to demonstrate that the stain which was bleeding through the cracked and faded mint green paint was not really expanding; that she was only imagining that it was bigger this week than last, and bigger then than the week before. Only now, with the mark a good two inches inside the leading edge of the dark, moldy smudge, there was no way she could refuse to see the truth of it.

She should never have made the fucking mark in the first place.

Claire Kinney-DeFatta sighed. So here it was - proof positive that she could no longer just ignore; the fucking roof was leaking; new evidence that the fucking townhouse was falling apart - a new item to add to a growing list of symptoms that included the buckled vinyl in the kitchen, the broken faucet in the laundry room, the warped flooring in the main hallway, the cracked windows by the front door, a cranky water heater that made a hot bath a crap shoot, at best, and crumbling grout around all the plumbing fixtures in bath and kitchen.

Falling apart. Just like her fucking life.

It just wasn't fair. But that shouldn't have surprised her at all. Nothing - not one single thing in her entire life - had ever been fair.

Not from day one, although she had come to believe, over the years, that it had been at least a little better, until roughly day 1100 - the day he had been born. The fact that she had absolutely no memory of those pre-Brian years did not in any way change her belief that she had been the apple of her parents' eyes, adored and indulged, until he'd shown up to ruin everything.

She glanced at the Timex she wore on her wrist, and then stepped forward to look down the street, in the hope (vain, she was almost certain) that she'd see the service truck from Bert's Garage coming toward her. But the street was empty, just as she'd expected, and it was time to face the facts. No way was she getting to work on time. Even if she left now and raced to the bus stop down at the end of the street, she would still be at least a half-hour late, much to the amusement of her fellow cashiers at the Dollar Emporium and the satisfaction of her sadistic, condescending supervisor, who lived to make an example of any employee who gave him the slightest excuse for a queen-out. Of course, Donald Prentiss, shift supervisor at the Morrison St. branch of the discount chain, was not gay - or so he claimed - so it was probably not entirely accurate to term his characteristic emotional hissy-fit a 'queen-out', but she thought that, in this instance, the shoe most definitely did fit.

Besides, she wasn't so sure about the 'not gay' thing. After all, she knew 'gay'; given the flaming, shameless lifestyle of her notorious brother, there weren't many people who could claim to know it any better. So even though Prentiss paraded himself around with a bleached blonde he introduced as his fiancé, and bragged about his history as a notorious womanizer, she wasn't so sure. In the final analysis, she knew about closets too, even though her brother had never spent much time in one - not nearly as much as he should have, anyway.
Shameless, indeed - and constantly flaunting himself in front of his betters.

It just wasn't fair.

She turned once more to glare at her dilapidated old Ford Escort, sitting more lopsided than usual due to its flat rear tire, and felt an almost overwhelming urge to pick up a brick and smash a window or two. But that would only mean another repair bill that she couldn't afford to pay, so she forced herself to turn and walk away, digging her cell phone out of her smock pocket to cancel the service call from Bert's.

She would just have to ride the city bus to and from work, and John would have to change the tire when he got home from school. He would not be happy about it, but what the fuck else was new? When was John ever happy with anything these days? She knew, of course, that it was almost a right of passage for sixteen-year-old boys to make asses of themselves and despise everything in which their parents believed, but she was almost at wits' end in trying to figure out how to handle him, and his father - tucked away in his idyllic little brownstone in Greenwich - was certainly not going to offer any help, considering that he could barely be bothered to send an occasional check to cover the pitiful pittance of the court-decreed child support that he was supposed to pay every month. Not that John would have listened to him any better than he listened to his mother, or his grandmother, on those increasingly rare occasions when the older woman was sober enough to deliver a summary of her religious platitudes. The kid seemed to hate everything and everyone lately, and the letter she'd received just last week concerning his behavior in school and his dismal grade levels was more than adequate proof of that.

And now he'd gone and done it again, apparently determined to confirm his growing reputation as a troublemaker. And a borderline delinquent.

Gay-bashing. That's what the assistant principal had called it, and when she'd spoken to him on the phone, his tone of voice had suggested that he was just as unhappy with the terminology as she was. Since when, she'd asked, was voicing an honest opinion about perverts and degenerates a punishable offense? Hedley Cooper had not - quite - snickered in response to her mini-tirade, but he had been quick to assure her that he would not be bothered to send an occasional check to cover the pitiful pittance of the court-decreed child support that he was supposed to pay every month. Not that John would have listened to him any better than he listened to his mother, or his grandmother, on those increasingly rare occasions when the older woman was sober enough to deliver a summary of her religious platitudes. The kid seemed to hate everything and everyone lately, and the letter she'd received just last week concerning his behavior in school and his dismal grade levels was more than adequate proof of that.

"No permanent damage done, thank God!" the assistant principle had said, "but the boy's mother is a bit over-protective and, well, very . . . liberal in her socio-political views."

"Uh, huh," Claire had responded. "Soooo - because this spineless, bleeding-heart parent doesn't have the gumption to teach her lily-livered son how to man up and walk the straight and narrow path, my son has to be held accountable for objecting to his perversions?"

Cooper had gone silent for a moment after that outburst, and when he had finally deigned to answer, she'd heard something in his voice that made her wonder if she might have been wrong about him, if she might have taken her protest a little bit too far.

At any rate, the bottom line was that John was now on probation, and any additional infraction - anything at all - would get him expelled for the remainder of the school term.

Meanwhile, there were other problems - of a completely different nature - with Peter, her youngest, who was turning out to be John's polar opposite. While John tended to hang out with a rough crowd, with boys who had a reputation for bullying and intimidating and throwing their weight around, Peter, it seemed, was turning out to be the kid that everybody wanted to pick on. He'd been beaten up twice since Christmas, and pushed down the stairs so violently on one occasion that he'd wound up with a cracked rib.

And each time such events had occurred, bystanders had been stricken with the kind of selective blindness that plagues so many urban school settings; to wit, no one had seen anything. Compounding the problem, Peter had been stubbornly mute when questioned - refusing to identify his attackers or even to admit that there'd been an attack at all, and Claire was pretty sure she knew why.

It was practically John's creed: a guy didn't rat out other guys. Not even when a guy was getting the shit kicked out of him on a regular basis. And Peter, despite the fact that he was nothing like John, would never do anything to displease or disappoint his big brother.

John, on the other hand, seemed to have no interest in returning the favor, and Claire had not yet determined why. In truth, she had not yet even asked, and she was careful not to examine her reasoning too closely, for, if she did, she would almost certainly have to face an uncomfortable fact - that there were some things a person simply did not want to know.

Claire increased her pace as she approached the corner of Milburn and Lounsberry Streets, spotting a couple of busses half-a-block away. If she was lucky - as she had not been yet today - one of them would be the express out to the Morrison district.

Her luck, however, was running true to form - all bad. She stood and watched as both of the diesel behemoths belched out clouds of dark, oily smoke and pulled out heading north, when she needed to go west.

She sat down on the bench at the corner, taking no notice of the heavy beads of rainwater that still clung to its surface and wincing as she felt the wetness soak through the seat of her pants.

Wonderful. Now she'd not only have to try to ignore the smug smiles of her co-workers as she arrived late, and the pissy attitude of her supervisor, she'd also have to endure stupid jokes from infantile stockboys about senile old women who wet themselves and should wear Depends or rubber pants.

Could this day get any worse?

Then she sighed. Of course, it could - and probably would.

The thought recalled a memory of Peter as he'd looked when she'd walked into his room the previous afternoon and found him there, bloodied and bruised and trying not to cry.

He had turned to look up at her, and she had been stricken speechless, as another image - an old, almost-forgotten image - had superimposed itself over his face, and - for a single instant - it was not Peter she was staring at in horror; it was her brother. It was Brian.

She had quickly put the thought away, shoving the spark of recognition back into the gloom of her sub-conscious mind, where it belonged. It did not matter, after all, that Peter looked nothing like her or his father or his brother. It did not matter that he was much more . . . no; she would not use that word - that word that should never be applied to boys, that should never have been used at all to . . .

She looked up the street, almost praying for the bus to materialize so she could make her escape, from the chill of the morning air, from the wetness of the bench . . . and from the cruel visions of sharp, clear, relentless memory.

She had been trying unsuccessfully to join the pep squad at Oliver High School for over a year, but... she had finally made it, when Brenda and Glenda Shepherd - twin members of the Oliver In-crowd - had moved away after their father had been transferred to a new job in Philadelphia. Even then, she knew, she would probably not have been accepted in the group if Marilyn McConnell had not been forced to give up her place in the club because of academic probation.

But ultimately, it didn't matter (or so she assured herself) why she had been made a member. It only mattered that she had finally been accepted into the organization, and - since this was her senior year - given a last chance to infiltrate the social layers of the club.

The previous eighteen months had been hard for Claire - hard for the whole family, in fact. They had been uprooted from their previous home when her father had lost his job at the shipyard in Brooklyn, and they had been forced to migrate to Pittsburgh so he could apply for work at one of the big steel mills. Luckily, his uncle was a shift manager there, who managed to pull a few strings to get him hired on, but it had been a big comedown from the position he'd held before. Though he'd never made it into a management position, he'd worked for the shipwrights for almost twenty years before an internal financial scandal had caused the operation to shut down. So there had been no fancy title or private office, but he'd earned fairly decent money in his union-protected job, and he'd long since realized that there was no point in dwelling on his lack of advancement within the company hierarchy. Though he'd spent most of his life cursing his bad luck and insisting that he'd been cut out for better things, the truth was that he'd been lucky to have a steady job, a secure place in the community, and certain personal perks that compensated for all the advantages he didn't have.

The move to Pittsburgh had changed everything, intensifying his feelings of resentment and bitterness and, although he managed, eventually, to find new compensations - new personal perks - he'd never even made an effort to forgive those he held responsible for his bad luck: his wife, who had spent years blaming him for her own coldness and disappointments and submerging herself in the empty rituals of her church, and his son - the child who should never have been born, who had been the reason he could never free himself from the chains that bound him to his miserable existence.

Thus, no member of the family had been happy about the move to Pittsburgh.

But Brian had, in his characteristic pragmatic fashion, found ways to deal with what could not be changed. Claire had never been so fortunate. Brian had always been the lucky one - the beautiful one - the bright one, the one for whom doors seemed to open, as if by magic.

It really wasn't fair, especially since, by that time, Claire had begun to realize what Brian was, although she'd been too ashamed to tell anyone of her suspicions. Except Brian, of course, who had not bothered to deny her conclusions, and his lack of concern had contributed to the growing rift between them. She couldn't quite figure out why she should be so ashamed that her baby brother was a fag, when he seemed to be completely without guilt or remorse. That, she'd believed, was just wrong, recognizing that she would be horribly embarrassed once the truth came to light, while he - the one who should be ashamed to be found out - would probably just shrug it off, as he did with most things.

And yet at that time in her life, she had not yet come to hate him or resent him, because the unavoidable truth was that he was the only reason that her life wasn't dreadfully, traumatically, horribly worse than it already was. It wasn't something they ever talked about; it wasn't even something she ever admitted to herself. But she knew it nonetheless; the only reason she and her mother weren't subjected to the violent physical abuse her father dished out regularly, whenever he drank too much or went into one of his periodic rages because of his resentment of his life, was that it was Brian who provided the outlet the old man needed; Brian who was the target.
Jack Kinney had never realized what his only son was growing up to be, but it hadn't really mattered anyway. Brian was the child he'd never wanted - the child he blamed for destroying any hope he might have had of ever getting away from his miserable life - and that was all that mattered.

And Joan, their mother . . . that was the part that Claire tried never to think about. For a while, when Brian had been very young, Joan had tried to step in, to protect Brian and persuade Jack to leave the boy alone, but that had only lasted as long as it took Jack to figure out that he had enough cruelty and hatred within him to spread around. Thus, when he'd begun to target his daughter and his wife, Joan had reconsidered her options, and made her choice. Brian was supposed to grow up to be a man, wasn't he? And men should be strong and resourceful and able to endure such abuse, so it hadn't taken long for her to figure out how to console herself and rationalize what Jack did to his son. She was a good Christian woman, and it was her duty to defend and protect her helpless daughter, and if her son had to learn to stand up and take a little physical hardship in the process, it would undoubtedly serve to make him a better man, in the end.

Jesus, after all, had been scourged and beaten, hadn't he?

It was convoluted logic, of course, but it worked perfectly well for someone desperate to find a way to bear an unbearable truth.

Joan was proof positive of the accuracy of the old adage: there are none so blind as those who will not see.

But Claire, despite having never been told, had always known the truth. She had seen the bruises and the blood and the broken bones and the black eyes. She knew what Brian endured, and she knew that it was done to him - at least in part - so it would not be done to her or her mother.

Thus, on that autumn day when she'd finally managed to overcome the obstacles of being the "new kid" in school and not being one of the so-called 'beautiful people', when she'd managed to convince herself that it was only a matter of time before popular girls like Lisa Van Horn - of the Twin Rivers Lincoln-Mercury Van Horns - and Allison Carlisle, principal's daughter, and Pam Sullivan, Beta club president, began to accept her, and that her senior year might not be a total loss after all, she still cared, at least a little bit, what happened to her baby brother, even if he was turning out to be a big queer.

That afternoon, it had only taken a few minutes for her to figure out that Pep Squad practice was nothing more than an excuse to get out of class early and spend a little time drinking Coca Cola, sneaking an occasional cigarette behind the bleachers, giggling with friends . . . and watching the boys practicing on the football field, which would be the biggest attraction of all, once the coach finished up the lecture he was giving in the locker room, releasing the team to come charging out through the end zone.

Meanwhile, the girls took advantage of the opportunity to arrange themselves to best advantage to be noticed when the boys arrived, and to gossip and giggle and chatter about the next Ghostbusters movie or the new Prince album or the real reason why Dianna Knox would not be back to school this year, or how the new girls' gym teacher, with her butch haircut and her plaid shirts, was probably a dyke who'd spend all her time hanging out in the shower trying to spy on all the pussy she could lay her eyes on.

Claire had taken special care in dressing for this occasion, having raided Brian's closet when he wasn't looking, and helped herself to one of his Polo shirts - this one a dark navy with scarlet trim - that she'd tucked into the Guess jeans her mother had bought for her birthday. Thus, she felt as if she really fit in perfectly when she took her seat in the stands, directly behind the trio of girls who were the elite members of the senior class, and watched while the cheerleaders on the field finished running through one of their standard routines.

Still, she thought, one could never be too careful, so she was taking a quick peek in her compact, checking to make sure the lipstick wasn’t smeared and the shag haircut was shaggy in all the right places, when she heard Lisa Van Horn - the blondest, richest, and prettiest of the group - take a quick, deep breath, that was almost a gasp.

"Oh, my God!" the girl cried, one hand knotted at her throat. "Who is that?"

"Who is what?" replied Allison Carlisle, she of the Miss Clairol super-bright auburn hair.

"That!" Lisa retorted. "Jesus! Are you blind?"

"What the . . . " That was Pam Sullivan, putting in her two cents.

"There, you twits. Right there. Look. Third on the left - front row."

A beat of silence, followed by Pam’s exaggerated exhalation. "Oh, for God's sake, Lisa. That's just the junior soccer team. Why would you . . ."

Lisa turned and fixed her companion with a cold glare, and the other girl went abruptly silent. Lisa was not one to accept fools - or dissent - gladly.

"Unless you have lost your fucking mind," said the blonde, "if you'll just open your eyes and actually look where I'm pointing, you'll see what I'm talking about. Now turn around . . . and look!"

By this time, Pam and Allison were not the only ones looking, since everybody in the stands - both those who were members of the "in" club and those who only aspired to be - pretty much took their cues from the golden trio. Thus, Claire joined the crowd in looking across the field, trying to see what had so inspired the blonde trend-setter.

But there was nothing there, except . . .

"Oh, shit!" said Pam. "How could we miss that?"

No. Claire was almost afraid to breathe. They couldn't possibly mean . . .

But they did. They must. What else was down there to rivet their attention? Over on the left side of the field, in a patch of chilly sunshine, the members of the junior varsity soccer team were stretching and loosening up, and right in front - where else - was a tall, beautifully-built individual, decked out in the soccer team's black and scarlet uniform, colors which, naturally, were among those which flattered him most, accenting long, well-muscled legs, perfect golden skin, broad shoulders and narrow waist, and - at that exact moment, with his legs spread wide as he bent forward - his perfect, beautiful butt displayed to wonderful advantage.

"Who is that?" asked Allison, her tone hushed, almost breathless.

"I don't know," answered Lisa, "but I sure as hell intend to find out."

"Ummm . . ." Claire took a deep breath, and leaned forward, attempting to affect a slightly bored demeanor, but not succeeding very well. "Don't waste your time. He's just a freshman."

Pam Sullivan sniffed loudly. "I don't give a shit if he's twelve. Holy shit, what a body!"

Claire forced herself to breathe again, wondering if - just maybe - this might prove to be her lucky day after all. "If you like," she said slowly, "I could introduce you. If you're really interested, I mean."

Three heads turned simultaneously, and three pairs of eyes gave her a swift, efficient, condescending once-over.

"You?" said Allison Carlisle, not exactly sneering - but close enough. "You know him?"

Claire was careful to toss her head in just the right way, exactly the way she'd seen her peers - or the people she hoped to adopt as her peers - do it before. "Know him? Of course, I know him. He's my brother."

Three pairs of eyes scanned her again, slightly colder than before, and one of them - she was never sure which - began to laugh.

"That," said Lisa with a venal grin, "is related to you? You can't really expect us to believe that . . . that beautiful creature is . . ." She was actually giggling now, her cheeks flushed bright red with the attempt to suppress whoops of laughter, "is your brother?"

It was Pam who spoke up then, to put the final dollop of icing on the cake. "He must be . . . so . . ." She didn't even bother to try to finish the sentence, as everyone in the stands was now laughing too, delighted to be included in a chance to enjoy the mortification of an intrusive outsider who would never fit in with the 'Beautiful people', no matter how hard or how long she tried.

Claire made a wild grab for her things, her face hot and glowing scarlet with embarrassment, and took off at a dead run, not caring in the least that she was dropping her belongings behind her as she raced away. She made her exit as fast as her legs would carry her, leaving behind the final shreds of her hopes for acceptance and belonging in a school society completely indifferent to her existence. And down on the field, where the soccer team continued to warm up and the sun was striking bright auburn glints in a mass of thick, dark hair and gilding a beautiful, perfect body, Brian went on with his stretching, never realizing that he had just lost the last vestige of his sister's loyalty.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

Thank God! The fucking bus was finally coming up the street, and Claire stood up and stepped forward, her face grim and set and determined.

No point in crying over old memories. Or new ones either. It had been silly of her to think that Peter looked anything like Brian. Even if there was some tiny, superficial physical similarity, there was also one major, elementary difference; Peter had looked embarrassed and scared, and Brian . . . Brian had never been scared of anything in his life. Defiant and cocksure - yes. Resentful and furious - yes. But never scared. And never embarrassed, even though he should have been. And above all, never, never, never sorry, never once showing an ounce of remorse over the fact that he was always the one that managed to be the center of attention in every situation; the one who unfailingly drew the eyes of family and friends and acquaintances and perfect strangers on the street; the one who always managed to land on his feet no matter how far he fell - or was thrown; the one to whom everything came easily - school, friends, scholarships, athletic ability, wit, charm, education, acclaim, admiration, desire . . . money.

It just wasn't fair.

The bus was crowded today, and she quickly made her way toward the back to take a seat, still not quite able to put Brian out of her thoughts, especially given her current circumstances, since it was, in a way, his fault that she was running so late this morning. If she hadn't had to take time out of her busy schedule - the appointment had almost made her miss the regular episode of Big Brother - to be interviewed by that FBI woman, she wouldn't have had to stay up so late to finish her nightly chores and thus, wouldn't have overslept this morning.

Yet, she couldn't very well have refused to speak to the woman. No matter what an embarrassment Brian had turned out to be, he was still blood, and of course she had to cooperate with the authorities in their attempts to apprehend the individuals responsible for his injuries. In addition, she had hoped that it might give her an opportunity to learn more about the circumstances of the crime and the damage done to her brother, but that hadn't exactly worked out as she'd wished.

Alexandra Corey, with her elegant Armani suit and her Jimmy Choo shoes and her expensive leather briefcase had not exactly lived up - or down - to Claire's expectations of how a civil servant should look or act. For one thing, she'd been very uncooperative in answering the questions Claire put to her while simultaneously insisting that Claire should reply to hers fully and comprehensibly.

Thus, in an attempt to take charge of the confrontation, Claire had confined her initial responses to mono-syllables - simple yes and no replies to not-so-simple questions - and Agent Corey had taken notes in a leather-bound journal, in a cryptic, indecipherable shorthand, her own contributions to the conversation limited to nods or non-committal hums. But as the minutes had passed, Claire had begun to grow impatient with the agent's silences, had grown increasingly determined to elicit some kind of genuine response. But nothing had worked. Even when she'd begun to elaborate on some of her answers, Corey had remained entirely unmoved and uninvolved.

Until, after a half hour of extremely minimalist give and take, the agent had crossed her legs and settled herself comfortably into her chair, regarding Brian's sister with a speculative glance before offering up a single, apparently idle question.

"Was your brother always so beautiful?"

It had been softly spoken, without a nuance of hidden meaning or malice, but it had struck Claire like a dagger through the heart, and she had suddenly felt the cold weight of years of misery and bitterness and jealousy settle upon her, a monstrous weight that succeeded in destroying all of her defensive walls and releasing a floodtide of pent-up rage and resentment, of disappointments and disillusionment and disgrace.

Of never being good enough. Of never being loved enough, for - even in that, even in that one final certainty she had trusted to provide the only solace she would ever know - even then, she had been wrong. In the end, despite every effort she had made, despite the fact that beautiful, perfect Brian had betrayed everything their father ever believed in - the father who should have loved her, who should have been proud of her, who should have been grateful for the love and affection she gave him - despite all that, at the very end, he had betrayed her, lying on his deathbed, gasping for his last breath, and, with it, whispering the last word he would ever speak.

Brian.

As life had drained from his body, it had been Brian who occupied his thoughts, Brian from whom he hungered for respect and forgiveness; Brian, who had been loved, almost as much as he'd been hated.

Claire had stared at the FBI agent, at the smirk on her face and the knowing gleam in her eyes, and been suddenly swept away in an overpowering urge to speak out, to scour away the dark stains of her miserable life in a blinding flash of truth.

She had ranted for almost an hour, her words tumbling and falling over each other, mixed with occasional sobs and desperate sighs, only realizing, as she came to the end of her diatribe, that her voice had risen to a shrill scream and that her youngest son had emerged from his room at some point to stand on the stairs and listen to everything she'd said, his eyes huge and dark with desperation. At that point, she'd discovered that she couldn't even remember most of what she'd said, and she'd fallen silent, her breathing harsh and uneven, as she'd felt a stir of panic in wondering if she'd gone too far - said too much. Then she'd turned to stare at the FBI agent, and study the shadows moving in the woman's dark eyes. Alexandra Corey had spent many years learning to conceal her emotions and mask her feelings, but, on this occasion, she hadn't been totally successful in suppressing her responses to everything Claire had said.

The woman had looked stunned, scandalized, subdued, obviously shocked at everything she had heard, and Claire was filled with a sense of satisfaction, in the belief that the truth had been revealed, that the FBI agent had been forced to reassess her opinions about the man she had previously characterized as a victim.

A victim!

Claire stared out through the dirty window of the bus, her eyes narrow and filled with malice.

A victim!

Brian Kinney had been many things to many people in his life, but the one thing he had never been was a victim - no matter what had been done to him. She had seen the photographs in the tabloids; she'd even kept one, locked away in a bureau drawer, a keepsake that she could take out, when life was too hard and too bitter to bear, a reminder that justice - harsh, brutal, relentless - would always be served, sooner or later.

Exactly as it should be. Exactly as she'd explained it to Agent Corey.

Even though she was here, on this miserable, dirty old bus in route to her bleak, thankless job, apparently destined to live in a ramschackle old townhouse that she could not afford to repair, with two boys who hardly ever saw their father and seemed to have no real connection with family members, while her brother - the pervert - was off somewhere, no doubt flaunting his glamorous lifestyle and enjoying all his considerable wealth while his incredibly elegant, beautifully decorated home lay empty and untouchable and off-limits to the people who should have mattered to him. His face, she was pretty sure, would never again be as perfect as it had been during all those years when people had fallen all over themselves to rave about his beauty, but it wouldn't matter in the end, since he had enough money to buy the kind of fawning behavior that he obviously craved. She sighed then, momentarily caught up in a memory of that face, of a time before she had learned to hate and resent him, when even she had been charmed and taken in by his wiles, but the memory was fleeting, quickly dismissed and replaced by other memories - sharper, colder, more painful. She had suffered at his hands, more than anyone would ever know, but at least, she had the satisfaction of knowing that she had never earned the kind of vicious hatred that would motivate unknown individuals - powerful, vengeful individuals - to try to destroy her or to find joy in mutilating her face and body. No one would ever have just cause to condemn her for perversion and debauchery.

At least, she had the moral high ground, and she had managed to force Alexandra Corey to see that, even if she had been reluctant to accept it. In the end, Claire had seen it there in the woman's eyes - the horror of truth dawning, of recognizing what Brian had done to the people around him and how he had earned his just desserts.

Ultimately, she was content with her performance, never once stopping to consider that the FBI agent's horror might not have been directed at Brian at all, but at a completely different target. Thus, when she had moved to shake the woman's hand at the end of their interview and Corey had turned away, apparently never noticing the hand that was extended to her, Claire had simply chalked it up to weariness after a long day and an emotional session. It had not occurred to her that the woman might have been repulsed by the idea of touching someone so consumed with malice.

Still, Claire was not completely satisfied with how the confrontation had gone; she had not learned very much about Brian's condition or his prognosis or his current location - all things that she and her mother had a right to know. They had managed to find out that he had left the hospital; Allegheny General had provided that information, at least. And a subsequent phone call to Kinnetik and a conversation with that blonde bitch/glorified typist who called herself Brian's assistant had confirmed it, but had ultimately only served to intensify their sense of frustration when Cynthia Whitney had refused to divulge anything about where he'd gone or why he'd gone there. She had been icily polite, but adamant.

Nasty little bitch. Claire and Joan had both speculated on whether or not Brian might have secured her loyalty by virtue of exercising his notorious seductive powers to lure her into his bed, but both had dismissed the idea quickly, realizing that Brian just didn't swing that way. Although there had been that ridiculous blonde when he was in college - the one who, according to rumor, had borne a child, claiming the Brian was the sperm donor. Which was, of course, also ridiculous. The idea of Brian Kinney as a father was just ludicrous.

Still, there was much they did not know, and there was too much at stake in all this to simply walk away. What if it turned out that her brother's injuries were more severe than anyone had admitted? What if he was never able to resume a normal life? What if he needed someone to look out for his best interests?

Perhaps it was time to mount a little investigation of her own in an effort to sniff out the weak links in the chains with which Brian had always surrounded himself. She was certain that there were plenty of shady characters who were a part of his life who would not hesitate to take advantage of his current circumstances to make sure that they could profit from his misfortune, which, of course, could not be allowed. If anybody deserved to benefit from his situation, it should be the people to whom he owed such a huge debt - the people he had hurt so badly throughout his life.

His innocent family.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Dr. Rick Turnage was trying to decide whether or not it would be completely beneath the dignity of an acclaimed surgeon to totally lose his temper and throw a chair through a plate glass window.

In the end, he concluded that it would be - but only just - and even then, if he could have been certain that the shattered glass would disintegrate in such a way as to make hamburger out of a certain arrogant, unapologetic FBI asshole, he thought that he probably would have proceeded, no matter how far beneath his dignity it might be.

How the hell was he supposed to do his best work when that bastard, McClaren, had made it impossible for him to function under optimum conditions?

"This is unacceptable!" he snapped, standing nose-to-nose with the agent. "You had no right . . ."

"On the contrary, Doctor, I had every right."

Turnage wasn't sure which infuriated him more - the flat refutation of his statement, or the agent's cool serenity in the face of his outrage.

"You . . . you . . ." Turnage paused to take a deep breath. Then he tried again. "You actually vetted my staff? You took it upon yourself to investigate my people, and to decide who . . ."

Chris McClaren held up one hand to end the incipient tirade, his expression giving away nothing except his determination. "Calm down, Doctor," he said smoothly. "If you'll pay attention, I'll explain it to you."

"But . . ."

This time, the agent raised only a single finger. "Your job, Dr. Turnage, is to restore your patient's physical well being. And his appearance. And that's a worthy endeavor. However, my job is to keep him alive. And I think you're smart enough to figure out which takes precedence. Now, I know you're not happy with having to operate without the services of your chief nurse/anesthetist, and, believe it or not, I sympathize with your difficulty, but . . ."

Turnage's mutinous expression suggested that he didn't believe a single word of the agent's assurances.

McClaren, however, continued without missing a beat. "However, you must also understand that this situation is unique in that Kinney's need for your services makes it impossible for us to protect him using ordinary measures. We can't simply make him disappear into Wit-Sec, as we would under normal circumstances. For one thing, you're too high-profile. For another, so is he. But at the same time, his life is on the line. So is mine, and it's not beyond the realm of plausibility that yours might be as well."

"Relax," McClaren said quickly. "As part of protecting him, I also have to protect you." His smile was slightly smug. "Look, Doc. This investigation is still in its infancy, but everything we've learned so far suggests that this wasn't just an example of random violence - a result of Kinney happening to be at the wrong place at the wrong time. All indicators are that it was well planned and deliberate, and that the people behind it are powerful, determined individuals. Which means that we have to scramble to make sure we stay one step ahead of them.

"And while I understand your objections to our methods, I can't allow a question of convenience, for lack of a better term, to impact my decision. The simple truth is that your anesthetist has strong family and personal attachments to a group of individuals in Pittsburgh who might - or might not - have some interest in this case. And while I agree that it's unlikely that there's any real connection at all, it's a risk I dare not allow. Thus, it's just easier to err on the side of caution and make sure that Nurse Connor is never tempted to betray his professional obligations and violate confidentiality regulations. Comprende?"

But Turnage was still not convinced, having grown more and more annoyed as the agent explained himself. "Group of individuals?" he quoted with a sneer. "You mean gang members. This is all because Darrell was in a gang when he was a kid. Christ, that was thirty years ago. What does he have to do to . . ."

McClaren's eyes were suddenly icy. "You may be right, Doctor. His ties to the Brighton Place Crips may be long forgotten. But his youngest nephew is still a member in good standing, and the unavoidable truth is that some of the thugs that served as hired muscle in the attack on Kinney were gang members. So this is the bottom line; you may be willing to risk your patient's health on your certainty that Connor's integrity is thicker than blood - so to speak - but I'm not. Especially when the fix was relatively simple. A couple of phone calls, a little finagling, and . . ."

"Simple? You think this is simple? You arrange for some pencil pusher at the nursing home where his eighty-year-old mother is confined to come up with some kind of bogus discrepancy in her financial arrangements, so he has to go flying out of here in a panic, and . . .

McClaren shrugged. "Don't sweat it, Doc. Everything will all be worked out in a few days, and the old lady will never know anything about it. At which time, a few other factors will come into play to make sure that Connor has to stay there for a few weeks, to take care of family business, so that, by the time, he's free to return, Kinney will be tucked up safe and sound in his cozy little cottage, with no further need to spend time here. Everybody wins."

"Very neat," retorted Turnage. "Except for the fact that I now have to perform an intricate, tremendously complex surgical procedure without one of my most trusted assistants. And there is absolutely no guarantee that there won't be many such procedures to be done in the future, before this patient is done with treatment here. So what happens if . . ."

McClaren's finger was up again. "One day at a time, Dr. Turnage. Let's try to concentrate on . . ."

"Oh, fuck off!"

McClaren grinned as he watched the tall, beautifully-built physician flounce off down the hall, observing that it was really a shame that the guy was straight. The task of taming such a shrew could have proved intensely challenging, not to mention extremely orgasmic.

Turnage was just blowing off steam - performing the primadonna-physician's version of a queen out - because, for once, his word was not law. Not even within the boundaries of his own clinic, where he was usually accorded the respect ordinarily reserved for heads of state - or gods. But the FBI had already done its homework and determined that Vera Holtz, Turnage's alternative to Darrell Connor, was every bit as skilled and capable as Connor, with none of the questionable family associations, and Turnage was just going to have to accept their judgment, whether he liked it or not. Which he obviously didn't.

The FBI agent walked down the hall and stepped out onto a small terrace to get a breath of fresh air and a cigarette. Kinney, it was obvious, was a terrible influence. McClaren had been trying to quit - had convinced himself that he was on the verge of quitting - until Kinney had favored him with that trademark sardonic grin, which saw too much and knew too much and never accepted a single ounce of bullshit as truth.

Shit!

He lit up and didn't even bother to try to conceal his pleasure in the taste that filled his lungs, as a fitful breeze swirled around him, prompting him to gaze out into the small bay that spread out below the promontory on which the clinic stood. A cold front had raced across the coastline during the early morning, and now the water was frosted with whitecaps as it raced toward a tumble of boulders that marked the edges of the narrow strip of sandy beach, pocked by tidal pools. The air was crisp, having shed most of its warmth in the wake of the north wind, and the light was hard-edged and sharp, glinting in the water like shards of broken glass, tinted by the ombre shading of the sea's jeweled layers, while a sleek sailboat tacked into the wind far out beyond the rocky peninsula that formed the southern arm of the bay.

Off to the north, near the edge of the property, a lone figure was silhouetted against the horizon - McClaren's back-up, who was walking the perimeter, eyes constantly in motion and body at the ready for anything unexpected that might turn up. Never let it be said that the FBI was not prepared for any eventuality.

It was bright, peaceful, breathtaking in its natural simplicity. It should have been beautiful - was beautiful. Except . . .

He dropped his cigarette into a sand-filled container and hurried inside, chiding himself for allowing a reaction to what was, obviously, a simple case of nerves.

Everything was fine. Kinney was fine.

He went striding into the room where the patient was currently being medicated prior to being wheeled into the sterile, pre-op area, and paused in the doorway to draw a deep breath. Given Kinney's sometimes uncanny ability to read body language, demeanors, and - might as well admit it - maybe even minds, it wouldn't do to approach him without double-checking to make sure one's mask of indifference was firmly in place.

Only, McClaren had failed to take into account the possibility that the reverse might not be true - that it would be Brian Kinney who was stripped of his customary façade. It was a mistake that would prove to be disturbing.

Brenda Herring, looking crisp and professional - and very pretty - in maroon scrubs, was just finishing the injection of a clear liquid into the patient's IV line, looking up as he approached and greeting him with a friendly smile. "He's doing fine, Agent McClaren. Everything as it should be. Only he's going to be drifting off very soon now, so I wouldn't put too much credence into anything he might say to you, at this point."

"How long will the procedure take?" he asked, stepping forward to look down into Brian's face and noting the distended pupils and the creamy pallor of the skin.

Her smile grew slightly sardonic. "That depends on God - and Rick Turnage. Best guess is three hours or so, but don't be alarmed if it runs longer. When the doctor gets into his groove - so to speak - he sometimes has to be reminded that Rome - and faces like this one - weren't built in a day."

When Brian spoke, both of them were slightly surprised that he sounded completely rational and aware of his surroundings. "So it's your job to make sure he doesn't get carried away?"

She nodded, and touched his arm with gentle fingers. "Among other things. You're in good hands, Mr. Kinney. I promise."

He managed to take her hand, although he had to grope a bit to find it. "I'll hold you to that. If I die on the table, I'm going to come back to haunt you."

She grinned. "Hmmm, let me think about it. My very own charming, witty, gorgeous ghost? I think I could learn to live with that."

Brian closed his eyes. "Two out of three, anyway."

But the nurse wasn't going to allow him to drift away on a sea of doubts. She leaned close and gently braced his face with both palms. "None of that now, Mister. You're going to be just as beautiful as you always were, and I'm going to make sure that your doctor doesn't take it upon himself to try to improve on perfection."

Unexpectedly, Brian grinned. "When all of this is over and done with, you could come to work for me, you know."

She lapsed into an exaggerated semi-frown. "Are you trying to bribe me?"

"Whatever works," he answered.
She laughed and moved away. "I'll be back to get you in a few minutes. Just relax and think pleasant thoughts, so you'll have sweet dreams during the procedure."

McClaren had backed away and stood silent throughout the exchange, but he stepped close again as he spotted the shadows rising in hazel eyes at the mention of dreams. "Easier said than done, huh?" he said softly and watched as Brian looked away, refusing to meet his eyes.

He sat then, pulling up a chair so that he was close enough to reach over and touch Brian's hand - should he feel the need to do so.

"You don't have to pretend otherwise with me, you know. After what you went through, it's only natural that . . ."

"Could we please talk about something else?" Brian interrupted, with ill-concealed impatience. "How about you tell me how you lost your virginity, or . . ."

"Or maybe," McClaren said quickly, "I can guess how you lost yours. Let's see now. Young, I bet. Thirteen, fourteen maybe. And no fumbling around with the teeny-boppers on the block for you, I'm thinking. So . . . an older man. Gorgeous and hip and not believing his luck when this drop-dead beautiful kid falls at his feet and . . ."

Brian laughed. "Okay. You've made your point."

He shifted his head then, and adjusted his shoulders against his pillow.

"You all right?" McClaren knew better than to come on as touchy-feely and hyper-concerned, but a tiny little show of empathy might go unrebuked.

"Yeah." Cut and dried, without a single trace of emotional excess. "I'm fine."

McClaren simply nodded, and distracted himself by browsing through an old edition of GQ with Johnny Knoxville on the cover, looking very cosmopolitan in a suit that even Brian Kinney might have deigned to wear, and when he looked up again, he found that Brian seemed to be dozing, one hand curled against his chest with the other - the one closest to McClaren - lying loose and relaxed against the side of the bed.

He was never entirely certain what moved him to lean forward and clasp that smooth, perfectly manicured hand with his own. But he did it anyway, only to be astonished when it closed on his fingers, and he felt himself jerked forward, until he was virtually nose-to-nose with a very wide-awake, very focused Brian Kinney.

"I need you to listen to me." Brian's voice, for all that it was no more than a whisper, was riveting, and McClaren knew that he could not have refused to hear what the man had to say, no matter how much he might have wished to. "Are you listening?"

"Thought you were sleeping," the agent replied, tempted to pull back and tempted, at the same time, to lean forward and claim that perfect, luscious mouth which had somehow escaped all the damage done to the rest of that once-perfect face as Brian adjusted his hold, moving from the agent's hand to his collar, and pulling him a bit closer.

He was obviously not about to allow any distraction. "Are - you - listening?"

McClaren took a deep breath and allowed himself to get caught up in what was gleaming in Brian's eyes. This was no casual exchange - no exercise in caustic wit. This was serious. "Yes, Brian. I'm listening."
Brian nodded, but he didn't release his hold on the agent's shirt. "Despite all the bullshit assurances," he began, his expression daring the agent to dispute what he was saying, "you and I both know that if someone wants a man dead badly enough - wants it so much that he's willing to do anything, pay anything, take any risk necessary to make it happen - chances are that the target is going to wind up dead. Guys like you who fool yourselves into thinking that you've got all the bases covered never seem to remember one thing. People who are that desperate to take somebody's life aren't bound by any moral consideration to spare innocent bystanders that might get in the way. You, on the other hand, have to consider everybody. You can't just shoot somebody because you think they might be a threat to me, while they . . . Shit, they can do whatever they like and never lose a minute's sleep over who else might get hurt. If they're determined enough, they'll probably find a way. They could drop a fucking bomb on this place before you could even draw your gun, or on any other place I might be, and wouldn't give a rat's ass how many people they'd have to kill to get the one they really want. Can we agree on that?"

McClaren really looked like he wanted to argue, but, in the end, he couldn't, because the man was right. Always accepting individuals like heads of state, who could usually be protected from anyone who might be after them - and even that was not always true - any man could be killed at any given moment. "You think you're that important to them?"

Brian took a deep breath. "I don't know, but it's possible. And that's why . . . that's why I need you to make me a promise."

"Can't we talk about this later, after your surgery, when . . ."

But Brian was shaking his head. "Can you be absolutely, 100% certain that nobody managed to get into this clinic and slip a little cyanide into the oxygen lines, or to infect a surgical instrument with a lethal dose of plague, or maybe they kidnapped the child of one of the surgical team and the only way to save its life is to kill me. All of those things are possible, along with a thousand other things they could have done to make sure I never wake up again?"

"Come on. You're being a little paranoid, aren't you? There's no way . . ."

"You don't know that."

And McClaren saw the truth of it in the other man's flat, forbidding gaze. Kinney was right. No matter how careful they were, no matter how many precautions they took, there was always the off chance that they might miss something. The chance might be miniscule, but it existed, nevertheless.

The FBI agent studied Brian's face, deliberately taking note of the damage done - the mutilated eye socket, the broken cheekbones, the torn and distorted muscles, the fractured jawline; he saw it all, but somehow, he could still see the beauty that was there beneath the damage, waiting to be restored.

"Brian," he said softly, "is there something . . . do you know something you haven't told us? Is there some reason they would want to be sure you never get a chance to tell the whole story? What do you . . ."

"I don't know." Flat and non-equivocal, but McClaren was quick to note that the man had not denied knowing something; he had only suggested that, if he did know something, it was something he had not yet managed to recall or relate. "Sometimes I think . . . sometimes there's something that I think I ought to know, but . . ." He shook his head then, obviously frustrated with his own inability to be precise. "I . . . can't."

McClaren nodded. "OK. What promise?"

Brian did not - quite - smile, but there was a warm, lovely flash of approval in his eyes, and the FBI agent was pleased to have put it there.

"I've told you before, and I meant it. There are only two people who matter to me. My son and . . ."

"Taylor."

Brian's hesitation was brief. "Right. Taylor. My son will be . . . all right, I think. His mother will take care of him, and she'll make sure that he stays far enough away from any memories of me to keep him safe. With any luck at all, he won't . . . he won't even remember me. And there'll be plenty of money to set him up for life. But Justin . . ."

McClaren sighed. "He's going to remember it all, isn't he?"

Brian closed his eyes. "He's going to blame himself. No matter what I do, no matter what measures I take to prevent it, it's not going to work."

"Why?"

"Because he's a stubborn little twat. Because he never listens to what I say. Because he believes he knows me . . ."

McClaren leaned forward and touched his lips against Brian's forehead. "Because he does know you. Brian, I can't . . ."

"Justin has got to get on with his life," Brian said firmly, pulling back and looking up into eyes gone dark with shadow. "And you have to promise me that you'll see that he does."

"And how - exactly - am I supposed to do that?"

Brian took a deep breath. "I don't know. I don't care. You just have to make sure that he doesn't waste his life mooning around over what might have been. He's got too much to live for, too much to give. Too many miles to go and too many people to love. You have to . . ."

"And what if you don't die?" McClaren said quickly. "What if we catch these bastards who did this - we are very good at that sort of thing, you know - and you come through all this with flying colors so that, in the end, you're the same beautiful, desirable glamorous, irresistible Brian Kinney you always were?"

Brian dredged up a smile, but there was no joy in his eyes. "I was all that before, and it wasn't . . . it was never enough. So why should it be enough now?"

McClaren hesitated, struggling to find words to offer comfort without resorting to empty platitudes. "So," he said finally, realizing that there was nothing he could say that would change the elemental truths, "you're willing to give him up - to let him go completely - in order to . . . what? Keep him safe?"

A quick inhalation - not quite a gasp. "To let him find his way, so he can be what he needs to be. As long as he's safe and happy, nothing else matters."

"You should tell him, you know." McClaren's voice was very soft, barely audible, but filled with conviction nonetheless. "He has a right to know how much you love him."

To the agent's astonishment, Brian huffed a small, sardonic laugh. "Now why would I do that? So that he feels obligated to stay with me? So I can use my feelings to bind him to me so tightly that he can never find a way to escape?"
His eyes were suddenly dark with a bleak certainty. "That's not love. That's possession."

Footsteps in the hallway announced the arrival of the staff members who would wheel the patient into the surgical suite, and McClaren rose to step aside and get out of the way. "We'll talk when . . ."

"Your word," said Brian, obviously struggling now against the effect of the drugs he'd been given, but still alert enough - determined enough - to regard the FBI agent with a steady gaze.

"Brian . . ."

"Your word." A demand, not a request.

And McClaren knew he had no choice. "You have it," he said finally. Then he smiled. "Are you going to come back to haunt me if I screw it up?"

Brian's response was just a sigh - a soft breath as he released his hold on consciousness. "Every fucking day."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The full-length mirror that hung in the corridor just outside the Club's main dining room was there for a reason. It would simply not do for any member of the serving staff to appear in the presence of the Club's patrons without making sure he or she was presentable, according to the establishment's impeccable standards. To appear within the elegant setting of the formal dining area in a rumpled uniform or a stained shirt or with unkempt hair would have been as unthinkable as setting a table with soiled linen or serving a perfectly prepared rare steak with a pedestrian bottle of sweet white wine. It was just not done.

Thus, when Rachel Charles was summoned into the presence of a group of the Club's charter members, she was careful to take a moment to check her appearance before proceeding. Salt-and-pepper hair coiled neatly in a bun at the nape of her neck (with her legally-required hairnet tucked safely into the pocket of the apron she'd removed and hung on a peg in the kitchen at the moment she'd received her summons); make-up freshened and discreet; well-cut black dress (no slacks allowed for those of the feminine persuasion) free of any food residue and adorned with only a simple silver/marcasite broach set with seed pearls; clean, dry hands with carefully manicured, unpolished nails; sturdy black shoes with moderate, stacked heels, and - perhaps most important of all - a demure, serene demeanor with appropriately downcast eyes.

She had worked for this establishment for almost three decades, so she knew exactly what was expected of her - and what wasn't - even though she could count on the fingers of one hand the number of times she'd ever been requested to appear within the inner sanctum. Thus, it was fairly easy to figure out that her experience during the next few moments could prove to be either very good - or very bad.

She squared her shoulders and prepared to step forward to learn which it was to be, but she was delayed briefly by the touch of a gentle hand on her shoulder, prompting her to turn to regard the young man who was standing at her side, favoring her with a lovely smile. "Not to worry, Miss Rachel," whispered Nicholas Avolar as he brushed a speck of dust from her sleeve. "They've been raving about your new entrée. The second stringers are so stuffed they can barely move, and Mr. Clayton has been practically orgasmic."

She was almost successful in suppressing the tiny smile that touched her lips, knowing that it was never a good idea to encourage the younger staff members to indulge their tendency to disrespect the powers-that-be, knowing that she should chide him for the term he'd used to describe the members of the Club who were considered to be the second tier of governing power in the organization. Nevertheless, Nicholas was an adorable young charmer who was very hard to resist, so she confined her response to a gentle frown and a headshake to remind him to guard his words carefully. He needed to keep in mind that a sharp tongue was not really an asset for anyone who aspired to become a permanent, valued employee of the Club.

"You hush now," she whispered, trying to administer an admonition but only managing to show concern for his well-being. "If your snide little remark falls on the wrong ear . . ."

"Yeah, yeah, yeah," he replied with a grin. "As if they even realize I can speak in complete sentences."

"Shhh!" she answered. "Please, don't . . ."

So," he interrupted, as he arranged dessert dishes on a silver serving tray, "how'd you come up with your newest gastronomical delight? With black truffles going at - what? Fifty bucks an ounce? Must be really hard to find a way to perfect a recipe. How do you come up with the ingredients so you can practice?"

She offered a quick little scapegrace smile and a tiny shrug. "Here at the 'royal court', it's beef Wellington with winter truffle sauce. At my house, it's pot roast and mushrooms." She leaned forward then and adjusted his tie. "As you get older, you're going to learn that everything - all things - are a matter of degree."

"You better move along," said Nicholas with a cheeky grin, "and you do know that they don't like it when the great unwashed call this place the 'royal court', don't you? Just as you know that they don't like to be kept waiting."

She didn't argue. Mostly because he was right.

On this night, the dinner crowd was small, and the atmosphere in the dining room was almost intimate, under soft indirect lighting and the flicker of the flames in the fireplace. There were only six individuals gathered around the main table, and they were awaiting the arrival of their desserts when Rachel made her entrance and came to stand beside the man at the head of the table - the man who was always seated at the head of the table whenever he was in residence for a meal.

"You wanted to see me, Mr. Clayton?"

"I did indeed, Rachel," said the elderly individual, his smile emphasizing the network of wrinkles that riddled his face. "I wanted to tell you that you have absolutely surpassed yourself with this new creation of yours. It's extraordinary. A true culinary masterpiece."

She smiled and lifted her eyes to meet his gaze, but only briefly. She had never actually been told that the upper echelon of the Club preferred downcast eyes from the hired help, but she knew it nonetheless. And she was glad to note that Nicholas seemed to be minding his manners as well, as he served dessert. "Thank you, Sir. I'm so pleased that you enjoyed it."

"Enjoyed is hardly the word," said the younger man sitting to the right of the head of the table. "We're all speechless with delight."

"That's quite a compliment, Chief Stockwell," she answered. "Coming from a politician, I mean."

The former head of the Pittsburgh police department looked up sharply to study the look on the black woman's face, not entirely sure he liked her tone of voice. Unlike most of the other Club members, he had not been born to the rarefied atmosphere of the organization. Instead, he was a first generation member, drafted into membership because of his successful political career and the power he'd commanded as chief of police. Not to mention the money he'd made for his powerful backers, several of whom were seated at the table with him. Thus, still being a bit of a novice to the hierarchy, he was not quite as sanguine as the others in his assumptions about the loyalty of the hired help, so his suspicions were more easily aroused. Still, a quick but thorough survey of Rachel's expression, which fairly radiated humility, convinced him that he'd only imagined a cold reserve in her response, so that he was comfortable enough to continue. "Perhaps you'd be good enough to share your recipe with my wife. She'd be the envy of the Ladies' Auxiliary."

"Of course," she replied, clamping down hard on an impulse to tell him to piss off and take his spoiled, trophy wife with him; it was at that point that she experienced a sudden mental epiphany and was astonished by the anger and resentment in her own thoughts. What in the world was wrong with her? She had never before allowed herself to resent the presumptions of the people who paid her salary, even though she had always realized that they frequently took advantage of those whose lives they controlled. Still, that was the nature of the game, wasn't it? The way it had always been played, and always would, so why should it bother her now?

She closed her eyes briefly, and recalled the image of a dark, handsome face favoring her with a smart-ass smile while she remembered a conversation they'd had in which she'd described her job and the conditions under which she worked. His response to her comments about how she was treated by her employers had, at first, shocked her; then, after a moment of reflection, it had made her smile - reluctantly. Now, she was hearing it again, sharp and clear and unequivocal. "You should tell them to piss off."

His name was Jed Harper, or so he'd claimed, and she had no idea why she doubted the truth of his claim, but doubt it, she did. She also had no idea why the thought of that young man with his outrageously, unbelievably blue eyes should be intruding on her thoughts at this moment, when she should be concentrating on showing appropriate humility and gratitude for her employers' willingness to take the time to express their appreciation for her accomplishment. It was, after all, only coincidental that this self-same individual had served as her guinea pig for testing the down-to-earth version of the entrée which was currently winning her such lovely acclaim.

This was a rare and singular occasion, and it might even mean a little something extra in her paycheck. She should be jubilant. So why did she feel like shit? And why was she suddenly unable to resist the temptation to phrase everything in language she had always resisted as tasteless and coarse and unsuitable?

Bad company. But the thought didn't really excuse her attitude. Instead, it made her want to smile.

"My congratulations too, Rachel," said the tall, slender individual seated on the other side of the table, looking for all the world like a college professor in his tweed jacket and argyle sweater vest. "Although in truth, I don't know which I appreciate more - the main course, or this wonderful dessert. I'm going to have to spend an extra hour in the pool to work all this off." So saying, Randolph Hobbs, father of Randolph Jr. and grandfather of Christopher, loaded a fork with a huge bite of Rachel's trademark dessert dish - a towering praline meringue - and assumed an expression of pure bliss as he devoured it.

She inclined her head. "Thank you, Sir. You're too kind."

She then bowed slightly and waited for a moment to be sure that she had been dismissed before retreating toward the service entrance, not really breathing easily until she was back in the corridor.
Still, she did overhear a few words as the conversation at the main table resumed while she was making her escape.

"So," said the silver-haired individual at the head of the table, "am I right in assuming that everything is ready?"

It was Hobbs who replied. "It is. Assuming, that is, that everyone here has completed their arrangements."

There was a general nodding of heads around the table.

"And there's no way that this can be traced back to us. Correct?"

Hobbs laughed. "Trust me. When this thing explodes, there's going to be so much mass confusion, no one's going to even think to try."

"And you're sure that the contact within Kinney's firm is going to be able to deliver?"

This time it was Stockwell who laughed. "Not only is he going to be able to do what's required, he's going to be overjoyed at the prospect. He won't know, until it's much too late, that he's provided the means to bring the whole enterprise down around Kinney's ears."

"And Craig?" said Hobbs. "He's on board as well?"

Stockwell nodded. "And thrilled with the prospect of finally getting a bit of payback."

It was at this point that Rachel reached the doorway, where she came face-to-face with Nicholas Avolar, just in time to surprise a strange, enigmatic shadow in his eyes. But neither of them spoke, choosing instead to make their exit together.

Behind them, the distinguished individual at the head of the table folded his hands and turned to look out into the darkness beyond the French doors, gray eyes narrowed and unfocused as he considered whether or not to say more. Then he leaned to his right and spoke very softly, for Stockwell's hearing only. "And the other issue?"

"Still in the works. Nothing definitive yet, but it looks promising." The politician frowned, and looked as if he wanted to say more, but, in the end, he didn't, something in his expression suggesting that he knew it was much too late for any second thoughts he might be entertaining.

"You do realize," said the other, "that timing could be critical?"

"Of course I do." For a moment, there was an element of impatience, almost anger, in Stockwell's tone, before he recalled who he was speaking to and managed to swallow it before it grew too strong to control. Instead, he gestured for the waiter to bring coffee, and then grumbled because the young man was nowhere in sight and took a full ten seconds to respond to the summons.

Young Nicholas reacted, of course, exactly as he'd been trained to do. With a smile and an apology - as required - and any private thoughts he might have had remained precisely that: private.

The room was exactly as he remembered it: stylish, welcoming, and elegantly simple. Exactly like its owner. Or not, since Brian was not, always, really welcoming. It depended entirely on his mood.

But the room still resonated with his presence, even if he was no longer physically present. Even if Justin was pretty sure that Cynthia was responsible for maintaining that ambiance. The office was never used by anyone but Brian; that was a given. And yet, despite being sequestered and off-limits to almost everyone, it still gave the impression that its owner might walk in at any moment and find it exactly as he'd left it, with a pitcher of cold water available near the desk, with a bowl of fruit - perfectly arranged - at hand on a conference table, with sleek, modernistic lamps pouring pools of light at various spots around the room, and with a selection of the latest mock-up boards arranged atop a low shelf - colorful, vivid, inspired or not - but always engaging the eye and inviting speculation and interpretation.

Like Brian.

Justin walked around the desk, and sank into the custom-built chair - something he'd only done a couple of times in the past - and tried to allow himself to sink into the personality that had created the ambiance of this world.

But he couldn't quite grasp it. Because he wasn't Brian, and there was no "quite" to it. He wasn't Brian, but the problem wouldn't stop there. The real question was, was Brian still Brian? And the second question, possibly just as important, but in a different way, was what would Brian - whoever he might turn out to be - need from Justin, in order to be able to rebuild his life?

He spent a moment staring at the photograph - the only extraneous object on the surface of Brian's desk; Brian half asleep with baby Gus braced against his chest. It had always been Justin's favorite picture, so beloved that he had completed a half-dozen different paintings as variations of the same image.

One of them was hanging on the wall beside the desk; until he had walked into the office this morning, he had not known that Brian was the buyer who had purchased it anonymously.

He looked over at the liquor cabinet and knew that it would be fully stocked with plenty of liquid anesthesia to help get him through the day. But it was barely ten A.M., and he knew that if he started stocking up on liquid courage at this juncture, it would only get worse as the days progressed. Instead, he went looking for coffee and found it in the employees' lounge area - and Cynthia with it.

He squared his shoulders, poured himself a generous cup, and followed her into her office, closing the door behind him.

He wasn't sure she could help him understand what he needed to do, but he was virtually certain that, if she couldn't, no one could.

If he'd been hoping that she would take control of the conversation and simply tell him what he should do, he figured out PDQ that he was in for a big disappointment, as she seemed perfectly content to sip her coffee, bide her time, and wait for him to begin.

"You know why I'm here?" he asked finally, suddenly a bit uncomfortable under her scrutiny. He chose not to meet her eyes, concentrating instead on the flow of images on her computer screensaver - images of a beautiful little girl with flaxen hair and a lovely, natural smile.

Cynthia smiled. "Have you come looking for enlightenment, Grasshopper?"

He gave her an exaggerated eye-roll. "You've been spending entirely too much time with your boss."

But Cynthia was not about to allow him to sidetrack the conversation. "In point of fact," she replied, "I haven't. And neither have you. And I assume that's why you're sitting here at what is probably -" for you - an ungodly hour and looking at me as if you think I hold the keys to the universe."

He lifted one eyebrow, obviously puzzled by her choice of words. "Ungodly?"

The smile became a grin. "Brian used to say that you were the only person in the world who was less of a morning person than him."

He looked, for a moment, as if he might dispute the assumption, but then he realized that he had no grounds to do so and shrugged instead. "One of the advantages of being a freelance artist," he admitted. "Working at midnight or sleeping til noon. Whatever works."

She nodded. "But here you are." Now it was her turn to employ a quizzical eyebrow.

"Yeah. Here I am." He stood up and walked to the window to stare out at a view that could be described, at best, as uninspiring.

Cynthia sighed, resisting an urge to rub her temples to dispel a burgeoning headache. "Justin, what . . . ."

"I don't know what to do," he said softly. So softly that she wasn't sure she'd heard him correctly.

"I'm sorry?" she replied, uncertain of how to respond to the aching emptiness in his voice. "What do you . . . ."

"I want you to tell me what to do," he said finally, in a rush, as if afraid that if he didn't just spit it out, he'd never manage to say it at all.

She sat back in her chair and regarded him as if he'd just sprouted wings, or a second head. "Oh. Is that all?"

"You think I've lost my mind, don't you?" He moved back to his seat and sat, once more concentrating on the photo display on her computer screen.

"I think," she replied slowly, "that there are a lot of people much better qualified to advise you on this. Your mother, your best friends, your boyfriend, your . . . ."

"The only boyfriend I have," he snapped, "just flew off into the sunset - metaphorically speaking - so that I don't even know where he is. As for the others . . . ." He looked up then, and she almost flinched away from the raw determination she read in his eyes. "Maybe they know me better than you do, but, right now, I don't need someone who knows me. I need someone who knows Brian. And I've begun to think that almost none of us really know him as well as we think we do. Except - maybe - you."

She suddenly realized that this was a conversation she didn't really want to have. Only there was no way of avoiding it. But she could perhaps, delay the inevitable. For a few minutes, anyway. "Why do you say that?" she asked finally, genuinely curious about what was going through his mind.

"I think he talks to you," he said, after pausing to consider how to respond. "I think we - all of us for whom he's the center of our world - tend to think of him as this Mount Everest of a man, who never needs anyone to lean on, to trust. Who can take whatever we dish out, and stand alone to endure it. But nobody can really do that. Not all the time, anyway. Everybody needs somebody to listen, somebody to be there, to understand. Somebody who won't condemn or judge or make demands. I think - for Brian - that person is you. I think he trusts you enough . . . . to let you see him cry."

She very deliberately did not meet his gaze as she took a sip of her coffee, and when she spoke, she did not confirm his speculation. But neither did she deny it. "What do you want me to tell you, Justin?"

"I want the truth," he replied flatly. "The gospel, according to Brian Kinney - minus the bullshit and the trimmings."

"Regarding?"

He took a deep breath. "Me. I need to know what he needs . . . from me."

"But surely you don't . . ."

"He says that he can't spend the rest of his life waiting for me to decide that he's what I want. That he got tired of me walking away - of me choosing to leave him behind so I could go off on to explore my brave new worlds - Hollywood, New York, my dreams of monogamy, of artistic excellence." He sighed, and his voice dropped to a whisper. "Ethan Gold. And I . . . I can't even believe how blind I was. How I never let myself consider how it all must have looked from his perspective."

Her eyes shifted to the view outside the window as she considered his words, and he was grateful that she wasn't just offering him kneejerk responses. "You do realize that he could have stopped you. If he'd really put his mind to it, he could have . . ."

"But he wouldn't," he said quickly. "And that's really the point, isn't it? Brian doesn't believe in chains, doesn't believe in holding on to something - or someone - who doesn't want to be held. Not even when that someone is too stupid to understand that being held is what they should want. What they need. Why - why does he do that, Cynthia? Why doesn't he do what everybody else does? Why doesn't he hold on to what he wants most?"

She sighed. "You just answered your own question. He doesn't believe in chains."

"But . . ."

"Justin, I don't know what to tell you. I don't even know what you're asking."

He leaned forward to brace his elbows against the top of her desk and clasped his hands against his face. "I've made so many mistakes," he said softly. "I bought into so much bullshit and allowed myself to believe that I needed so many things so I could consider myself a big, fat, fucking success. But I've finally realized that it's all just sound and fury, just background noise - without Brian. He's . . . he's my world, Cynthia. But I don't know if I'm still his world, and I won't use chains on a man who doesn't believe in chains. He says we're over, that he's done with me. He says he doesn't want me or need me any more. And I need to know if that's true."

Cynthia closed her eyes, and knew that she'd been right before. This was a conversation she really, really didn't want to have.

"If he told you all this himself," she said slowly, "why are you asking me this? Why don't you believe him?"

He favored her with a lop-sided smile. "Because I'm a stubborn twat. Because I don't want to believe it?" Then he sighed, and the smile vanished. "Because I have this friend - this new friend who doesn't know Brian at all, but who seems, somehow, to have figured out a lot of shit I never even thought about before - who's made me look at things from a new perspective. Who suggests that maybe - just maybe - all of us who think we know Brian so well have never really looked under that façade that he's built around himself to see the man he really is. I mean, it's practically gospel among our fucked-up extended family: Brian Kinney doesn't do sacrifice, does he? Doesn't feel guilt or obligation or remorse. Doesn't allow himself to need anyone."

He looked up then and met her gaze directly. "Doesn't believe in love."

Cynthia looked away, unable to endure the fear rising in his eyes, and spent a moment reflecting on how easily people could fuck up their lives. Even the great god, Kinney. She thought about all the time she'd caught glimpses of the Brian Kinney that almost no one was ever allowed to see - the man who loved his baby son so much that he'd been willing to give him up rather than see him grow up in a broken home; the man who loved his best friend so much that he'd been willing to endure the loss of a lifetime of that friendship in order to give Michael a chance to grab a romantic brass ring; the man who loved his friends so much that he'd moved mountains on their behalf, and never let anyone know about what he'd done or why he'd don't it, and - above all - the man who'd loved Justin - still loved Justin and always would - who'd believed that he could never give his young lover what he needed to make him truly happy, so he'd simply stood and watched as Justin walked away - over and over and over again.

Was it any wonder that he'd finally reached a point where he could not endure it any longer?

She knew what she had to do. Protecting Brian was no longer just her job; secondary only to one other thing, it had become her purpose in life. She knew that he still loved Justin; that had never been in doubt. But she also knew that Brian had come to a critical crossroads in his life; that he'd already endured too much, faced too many consequences.

He wanted to cut his losses, and it was her responsibility to help him do so.

Wasn't it? Wasn't an empty life, filled with empty days and vague longings, better than an existence filled with relentless pain? Wasn't it better to be lonely than to be hurt?

"Justin, I . . ." She paused, and made the mistake of looking directly into his eyes, to see what was staring back at her. She knew what she should do - where her loyalties should lie. It shouldn't matter that she was on the verge of demolishing the dreams of a young man she had always admired and liked. She had to protect Brian; nothing else mattered. She owed him too much and, in her own way, loved him too much. But what if . . . what if she took a chance? What if, for once in his life, Brian needed something he didn't know he needed? What if it was time to roll the dice, and hope for a bit of divine intervention?

What if he realized what she'd done and never forgave her? Did she love him enough to be able to endure that?

She took a deep breath and felt the answer rise in her mind. She did.

"Justin, I need you to do me a favor," she said quickly, not allowing herself time for doubts to resurge. She opened her desk drawer and pulled out a key ring which she handed to him, along with a plastic card embossed with a series of numbers.

She was willing to take this risk, but she would not try to tilt the odds, one way or another; it was time to trust in fate. "Those are the keys to the loft, and the codes to disarm the alarm system. I need you to go over there and bring me Brian's back-up laptop. It should be on his desk in the office area. There are some files on it that I need in order to complete a presentation for Brown Athletics' new NFL sportswear line, and I don't have the time to go get it. Can you do that for me?"

Justin looked confused. "You want me . . . to run an errand for you? To go to the loft to fetch . . ."

"You know as well as I do how paranoid he is about allowing strangers into the loft." She grinned then. "Unless, or course, he's planning to fuck them. And I really need those files."

Justin simply stared at her, obviously dumbfounded. "But . . ."

"Please," she said quickly. "If you'll just do this one thing for me, then . . ." She hesitated, biting her lip for a moment before deciding how to continue. "When you get back, I promise I'll answer any questions you have."

"But . . ."

"I promise."

He heard something in her voice then - something that suggested that this errand was much more than what it seemed. That it was something he needed to do, and, perhaps, there was something he needed to learn. Something that he would find at the loft.

Still he hesitated. "You promise?" he asked finally, getting to his feet.

She met his gaze squarely and nodded her agreement.

"In that case," he said quickly, zipping up his jacket, "I'll be right back."

Her smile was diffident, hard to analyze. "Take your time. It's always best to stop - and smell the roses."

When he was gone, she sat for a while, spellbound by the progression of images on her screensaver. Images of her world, of the only things that really mattered - except one.

She sighed, and put her head down, wondering. What - exactly - had she done?

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

tbc
"Does that itch?" One hand gestured toward the fake facial hair - mustache and trim goatee and the voluminous wig that accompanied it.

"Like a son of a bitch," came the curt answer, emphasized by a quick smoothing of an equally fake heavy eyebrow, to make sure everything was still exactly where it should be. "You sure you're ready for this?"

A snicker of a laugh. "It's not exactly brain surgery, now is it?"

"All right." There wasn't even a trace of a smile on the handsome, ordinarily clean-shaven face, but it was there in the voice nevertheless. "I assume you don't need any instruction on how to behave like an asshole."

"It goes with the territory."

"OK then. Break a leg."

The reply was only a whisper, although there was no doubt that it was intended to be heard. "Smart-ass!"

A pause, and a murmured assurance. "Get it right, and I'll owe you a drink."

"Just one?"

Another pause, preceding a barely audible invitation. "Woody's? Tonight?"

"OK. But lose the stubble"

A brief flicker of a grin, impossible to squelch. "I promise I'll be gentle."

A soft chuckle and a quick thumbs up. "Showtime."

"Excuse me," called a rich, pleasant, baritone voice from the corridor, just as the elevator doors began to close. "Could you hold the elevator please?"

Monty Peabody had to clamp down hard on an impulse to roll his eyes, but did, nevertheless, press the button to stop the doors from closing. Even though he was in a tearing hurry, it would be extremely rude to ignore the request, and rudeness by an employee at Allegheny General Hospital was always a risky business. Unless one was a doctor, of course, in which case rudeness - to the nth degree - was simply business as usual Literally.

"Thanks, Friend."

Monty looked up and was instantly mesmerized by eyes as blue as any he'd ever seen, remarkable enough in any face, but particularly so in that of a black man, who could best be described as... the only word that came to mind was 'exquisite'. Nothing else even came close to being adequate to describe the composition of perfect face and perfect form, filling out crisp navy blue scrubs. The lab tech couldn't seem to tear his eyes away from the new arrival, although he wasn't ordinarily a fan of facial hair or ponytails on men, but, in this case, he was willing to make an exception.

"You're wel . . ."

"Hold that God-damned elevator!" This voice was just as rich and just as baritone, but nowhere near as pleasant.

Peabody would have liked to ignore it; he knew that voice and knew that obeying the command would not bode well for anybody. But he also knew that ignoring it would be tantamount to courting disaster, so he dutifully kept his finger on the button to prevent the doors from closing, while offering an apologetic little smile to the man who had just entered and stood now at his side, awaiting the arrival of the most obnoxious member of the pantheon of physician/deities who demanded - and got - abject, fawning, limitless, sycophantic obedience from the hospital staff.

Matthew Keller, eyes glued to his PDA, strode through the doors and issued orders, never bothering to look up to see who was there to receive them. "ICU," he said curtly. "Now."

"Dr. Keller," said Peabody, gritting his teeth but being extra careful to project an attitude of deferecence, "this elevator is going down. ICU is up."

The surgeon continued to gaze at the miniature screen in his hand. "I said, 'ICU, now'."

"But . . ."

Intense green eyes, flecked with ice crystals, looked up then and examined Peabody in much the same way an entomologist might study a cockroach. "I assume," he said coldly, without so much as a glance toward the elevator's other occupant, "that you've been working here long enough to know what that means."

The 'that' to which the good doctor was referring, was the regular, actinic flashing of a blue light in an electronic panel near the ceiling, its rhythmic pulsing synchronous to the soft but insistent beeping of the audio-alarm system, which was, in turn, underscored by the steady repetition of the announcement coming through the PA speakers.

"Yes, sir, but . . ."

"Am I to understand," Keller continued, "that you're planning to ignore a Code Blue alert, so that you're not late for your . . ." He glanced at the Rolex on his wrist, "lunch break?"

"Of course not, Dr. Keller, but . . ."

"But what?"

"There are other elevators." Peabody's tone had grown slightly sullen, almost petulant, as he avoided raising his eyes to meet Keller's gaze. Instead, he focused on a part of the physician's anatomy which was considerably lower than his face, but that was a mistake too, as there was no way to avoid noticing that the jeans the surgeon was wearing - in violation of the hospital preference for scrubs for on-call physicians - were somewhat form-fitting and did absolutely nothing to conceal the size of the bulge at the man's crotch.

"Indeed there are," the physician responded, "but I'm not in any of them, am I? Now, either you stop leering at my package and hit the over-ride to send this car to the ICU level, or you get out and walk, and I'll do it myself, in which case you can be sure my next stop - after handling the patient's medical crisis - will be in HR. Would you like to guess why I'd be going there?"

Monty managed to assume an air of outrage. "I wasn't . . ."

"No, Doctor." Peabody hit the appropriate button, and carefully avoided looking into the face of the stunning stranger who had witnessed his humiliation, and wondered - not for the first time - why the most beautiful men were always the biggest assholes. Rumor had it that this latter-day version of Dr. Mengele was bosom buddies with the king of the Liberty Avenue perverts, Brian Kinney.

Very appropriate, thought Peabody, even as he struggled to avoid visualizing the two of them together - bare and buff and succ . . . He shook himself and deliberately focused on a saccharine-sweet public service/organ donor poster on the elevator wall, momentarily grateful that there were few things more effective in eliminating erotic thoughts than the image of a bloody liver packed in an ice chest and ready for transport.

For his part, Jared Hilliard was careful to maintain a stoic demeanor, refusing to exchange so much as a glance with the surgeon, who had played his role perfectly. The Code Blue had not been a part of their plan; it was just a fortuitous circumstance, but the physician had incorporated it perfectly into their scheme to enhance his portrayal of an arrogant, pompous, overbearing ass.

But the act was not quite done yet. Keller glanced at the floor indicator, and realized that there was just enough time to implement the little scenario which they'd originally planned to enact, to snare Peabody's attention and co-operation.

"Holloway," he snapped, turning to regard Hilliard with a sneer, "didn't I send you downstairs to check on the blood gas analysis for Mr. Ramsey?"

"Yes, Dr. Keller," Hilliard answered, biting his lip to contain the urge to grin. "I was just on my way when . . ."

Keller lifted one hand to forestall the explanation. "Yes, I'm sure you were. But now, instead of following my instructions, you're wasting time riding around in the elevator. Why didn't you take the stairs?"

"I thought the elevator would be faster, Sir."

"Yes, well, that was your first mistake, wasn't it?"

Hilliard looked genuinely puzzled. "What was?"

"Thinking. From now on, just do as you're told."

Hilliard nodded, and kept his gaze glued to the floor, knowing that if he looked up and surprised a glint of amusement in those green eyes, he might not be able to resist an urge to take a swing at the smart-ass bastard.

At this point, the elevator arrived at its destination, and Keller went charging out into the corridor. However, though obviously in full emergency mode, he paused for a single moment and turned back to eye the young man who was currently wearing a temporary employee badge which identified him as Jack Holloway. "Well?" said the physician, obviously on the verge of losing the last of his miniscule supply of patience.
Hilliard opted for a slightly confused expression, and the lift of one quizzical eyebrow.

"Stairs," snapped Keller, spinning and racing toward the ICU, yelling back over his shoulder. "It'll be faster."

Hilliard/Holloway opened his mouth to dispute the claim, but, in the end, he didn't. Especially since the errand on which Keller had supposedly dispatched him was entirely fictitious, and this was just another ploy to foster commiseration between two individuals who might consider themselves co-victims of the notorious Dr. Keller.

"Asshole!" Hilliard muttered as the physician raced into the ICU, immediately dismissing any thought of the two men who were watching him go.

"Amen to that!"

Hilliard smiled. "Yeah. Now I better get downstairs, or he'll have my balls - and not in a positive, life-affirming way."

He almost faltered then, almost lost his place on the page, so to speak, as he realized that he'd just quoted Brian Kinney as if he'd expected Peabody to recognize the source. Which, of course, he didn't. There might be a few individuals with whom Kinney would have less in common than with this smarmy little troll, but Hilliard couldn't really imagine who they might be.

"Pardon?" The lab tech simply looked confused.

"Never mind." Hilliard put on his most beguiling smile. "I'd better get going."

"If you don't mind a little advice," said Peabody quickly, "I can save you a trip. Assuming you're on your way to Dr. Castille's lab, you'll just be wasting your time. Our lab director is the only person who hates Keller more than the rank and file, and nothing you can do is going to make a spot of difference in how fast he produces the data that Keller wants. In fact, if you piss him off, it's going to take twice as long as it should."

Hilliard paused, looking perplexed. "So what should I . . ."

Peabody glanced at the name tag the young man was wearing, managing to get an eyeful of a lovely well-muscled chest at the same time. "Do yourself a favor, Jack. Learn to choose your battles. This is one you can't win. Might as well go find yourself some lunch."

"But what if Keller calls down there to . . ."

"He won't. They don't speak to each other. So just count your blessings and grab a bite while you've got the chance. Keller's not famous for giving his assistants the time to take care of their personal needs."

Hilliard grinned. "OK. You convinced me. But hey, I'm new here. Any suggestions about a good place to eat?"

"Well, if you're looking for haute cuisine, you're out of luck."

"Nah. Just some good, cheap home-style cooking."

Peabody hesitated. Under the circumstances, this was certainly not the best of times to cultivate a new acquaintance, since he really needed to concentrate on the task at hand. He was growing ever more nervous about the deadline he'd been given by his clandestine friends - a deadline which had already been extended once. And his luncheon date, while nowhere near being a sure thing, was undoubtedly his best chance to score the information he desperately needed. Keeping that in mind, he should probably just concentrate on what he needed to do and wish this lovely creature a pleasant meal and a nice day.

Only . . . for a split second, an image of his life partner rose in his mind. They shared so many things, he and Eli - hopes for the future, plans for their children, principles, vision, a conservative philosophy/morality, a fundamental awareness of the way things ought to be . . . monogamy. Only . . . he looked up once more and was immediately transfixed by the perfection of those incredible blue eyes.

Surely, it wouldn't hurt just to spend a little time basking in idyllic fantasy - just looking. After all, he almost never indulged himself in such a harmless pastime, mostly because . . . He took a deep breath, not really wanting to complete the thought. Not really wanting to admit that the main reason he seldom looked was because no one ever looked back.

On the other hand, it might - just might - serve an additional purpose. It might give him a little edge in finding a way to complete his mission, while there was still time. Since he had pretty much exhausted every other possibility.

The hospital, despite his best efforts, had proved to be a dead end. Impossible as it seemed, the medical records that he needed to access, in order to find a way to fulfill the promises he'd made, had just vanished into thin air.

It boggled the mind. How could medical records just disappear? And not just the hard copies - the physical files - but the computer information too, and all peripheral data - lab results, x-rays, c-t scans, everything. All gone, deleted as if it had never existed in the first place. How could such a thing happen?

And the answer was both obvious and a bit frightening. There were only a few entities - corporate, government, or otherwise - capable of wielding sufficient power to make such a thing happen, and those were entities that a man like Monty would not ordinarily choose to defy.

Only there was all that lovely money, much of which he'd already spent. And there was also the idea that he was providing a vital service for powerful people - people who would value his contribution to their efforts, who would owe him their respect and their regard in the future if he managed to come through for them now.

He had never done such a thing before, of course, and promised himself that he never would again; it would only happen one time. He comforted himself with the certainty that he would never have stooped to such an action at all if it weren't for the identity of the victim.

Brian Kinney. God, if anybody had ever deserved a quadruple dose of negative karma, it was . . .

Another image formed in his mind: Kinney before . . . Jesus! It was just wrong for anybody to look like that, especially when the darkness that lived inside the man was so well concealed by the beauty on the outside. So, he occasionally pondered the images - Kinney before, and then - Kinney after.

Surely divine retribution in its purest form.

And now, if he didn't figure out a way to stack the deck in his own favor, the Kinneys of the world would triumph again.
It was just completely unacceptable.

So maybe it wasn't such a bad idea to accept a little help from an unexpected direction. Young Holloway might provide a perfect distraction for the individuals who needed to be persuaded to share what they knew - what he was certain that they must know. An egocentric prick like Brian Kinney would never ride off into the sunset without making arrangements to retain the loyalty and focus of his little group of cheerleaders.

"So," he said, finally coming to a conclusion, "how did you happen to wind up assisting Allegheny General's version of the Grinch?"

Hilliard was very careful to conceal a slightly smug smile as he realized that his ruse had worked perfectly.

"That's a long story," he said instead.

"No problem," Monty replied, taking his new friend by the arm and heading down the stairs. "We've got plenty of time. And if you come with me, I'll show you a perfect place to have lunch while you tell me all about it. You might even make some new friends while you're at it."

Hilliard nodded, and gave himself a mental tug to make sure his disguise was fully in place. Like all good undercover operatives, he knew that people usually only see what they expect to see, and rarely look beneath the surface unless some small unexplainable detail triggers an unexpected response. His only concern had to be to make sure that no such detail was left to chance. He thought he would be fine, as long as Peabody's choice of venue was anything other than the Liberty Diner, since there was almost no disguise sufficient to fool the eye of the hyper-aware, uber-suspicious Debbie Novotny. But he was pretty sure that he was safe, since the hospital was a dozen blocks away from the flagship/luncheonette of Liberty Avenue. On the other hand, if he was wrong, he'd have to improvise - in a hurry - but he wasn't really concerned. Of necessity, improvisation was the first order of business in all undercover operations, and he would adapt, as needed.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It was amazing that it still appeared so fresh, so current, so enticing.

It looked as if it might have been done yesterday, except . . . the only thing about it that was even slightly dated was the fact that it did not - quite - reach the pinnacle of upfront, in-your-face, avant garde sexuality that typified virtually all advertising in the 21st century. Other than that, it was perfect: the strong, elegant, golden body; the beautiful, classic profile that served to emphasize the knowing smile; the vivid colors of sunlight and ocean and primal, elemental, stunning male - brilliant turquoise sea, bronze skin, sunlight striking auburn glints in dark hair, and the perfect curves of the sculpted ass framed in a bright coral Speedo - the only detail that might have been done differently in 2006 than in 1991. Today, any professional photographer worth his salt would have posed that perfect model on his sleek surfboard, with his body arranged to display the huge, beautiful bulge at his crotch to maximum advantage while that exquisite face was laughing into the camera.

Brian Kinney. Alpha, alpha, alpha male.

Had he pursued the opportunity offered to him at that time, his face - and body - would have become instantly recognizable, all over the world. As it was, the campaign, though limited in scope, had netted him a comfortable little nest egg, not to mention reaping a small bonanza for Marty Ryder, who had come up with the original concept. In turn, that one contact with the advertising industry had opened the door for everything that had come afterwards, giving Brian his access to the agency that would launch his career.
Cynthia sat back in her chair, and studied the face in the picture - and wondered. She had retrieved the full-size ad from the files in order to show it to one of the individuals who were due in her office shortly, but she had forgotten the intense reactions generated by the images at first sight. She had forgotten how beautiful he'd been, how he somehow managed to dominate everything around him even then, with nothing more than a smile and a quirked eyebrow.

What had she done?

There weren't enough words in the English language to explain what she owed to Brian, or what she would have done for him. So why had she done the one thing - perhaps the only thing - that he might never manage to forgive her for?

When the answer occurred to her, she had to smile at the simplicity of the notion: someone had to step up and be Brian Kinney - for Brian Kinney.

Somebody had to be the person who always knew the right thing to do, and always had the balls to do it, no matter how much it cost him. Only that wasn't quite true either. Brian didn't always really know; he had doubts, just like everybody else. Only he never let anyone else see them or know of their existence, and he never allowed himself to be paralyzed by the fear of being wrong.

That was the true difference between him and everybody else - that he was always the one who could summon up the guts to roll the dice and live with the consequences. And that's what she would have to do now. Brian had always been prepared to sacrifice everything to protect the people he loved, to give up every hope he had ever had of realizing his dreams so that Justin and Gus - along with everyone else he cared about - could live full, rich, unrestricted lives. He had always been willing to do whatever it took to save them.

But not this time. This time, someone had to step up to save Brian Kinney, whether he approved - or not.

She glanced at the French provincial grandfather clock behind her desk, and noted that her next appointment was already slightly overdue. It surprised her a bit that she had not yet received the call that she'd been expecting ever since she'd sent Justin strolling out to meet his fate, but she couldn't put everything else on hold to wait for it. It would come soon enough, and there was no point in trying to predict the outcome of what had amounted to a shot in the dark.

A gambit truly worthy of the Master.

At that moment, Garrett Delaney knocked and opened her door, giving her renewed cause to be grateful for Brian's excellent taste in men. Looking at that caliber of eye candy was always a good way to put aside somber thoughts.

"Two of your lunch guests are here," he announced, before stepping aside to admit the women in his wake.

"Thank you, Garrett," she answered, rising to greet the new arrivals. "Is everything ready in the board room?"

His grin was infectious. "Not quite. Emmett is not happy with the first course. Apparently, somebody had the unmitigated gall to substitute almonds for the pecans he ordered in the strawberry/romaine salad."

Cynthia nodded. "Minor contretemps or major queen-out?"

The grin grew wider. "Actually, he's demonstrating the true meaning of grace under pressure."
"Anything else?" she asked, noting that the young man was fidgeting a bit - something completely out of character for him.

"Uh, yeah," he said with a little sigh. "Ted wanted me to tell you that he's - uh - he'll be out for a while. He's got a lunch date and then a meeting with some hedge fund people. Wasn't sure when he'd be back."

Cynthia considered the troubled look on Garrett's face, and figured - rightly - that the CFO had said a great deal more than the receptionist was reporting; the accountant had made no secret of the fact that he didn't find it acceptable to be 'excluded' from Cynthia's little "cloak-and-dagger" session, but she had really had no other options. The person who had arranged this meeting had stipulated the terms, including who could be present and what was to be discussed.

"Thank you, Garrett," said Kinnetic's acting CEO. "Let me know when everything's ready, and when my other guest arrives, send her right in."

The receptionist nodded and closed the door.

"Ms. Whitney," said the older of the new arrivals, "I've heard a lot about you. I'm . . ."

"Alexandra Corey," Cynthia interrupted, not quite smiling. "Your reputation precedes you." The FBI profiler simply nodded, apparently unperturbed by the slight suggestion of antipathy she noted in Cynthia's tone. She was accustomed to being treated with suspicion and understood the reasons perfectly, conceding that, if the situation were reversed, she would probably react the same way. Profiling victims was sometimes a painful process.

None of this was openly expressed in the Cynthia's face, but something in her eyes suggested that she knew it anyway.

But there was no doubt about the warmth of her smile when she turned to greet the second of her guests.

"Long time, no see, Ice Queen."

Corey's expression became quizzical. "Figure skater?"

"Hockey." The answer was softly spoken, almost absent-minded. "Right winger."

The FBI agent nodded, slightly humbled - and amused - to be reminded so graphically that stereotyping was always a risky business. Sharon Briggs - wearing her own skin rather than that of her undercover alter-ego - might look like a beauty queen, but was, in fact, something else entirely.

And, despite having offered the clarification, she appeared not to be paying attention at all; she was much too busy losing herself in the vision looking up at her from the desk. When she finally managed to tear her eyes away from the bright image, she found both Cynthia and Agent Corey staring at her, obviously understanding her fascination perfectly.

"Jesus!" she said with a tiny smile. "How is it that you never quite remember how gorgeous he is until it catches you by surprise all over again?"

Then she grinned. "Hello, Tink. How are you?"

Cynthia laughed. "Old enough to regret I ever let him saddle me with that nickname."

But Sharon's eyes were soft with reclaimed memories. "Why? Obviously, he's still Peter."
The two old friends stared at each other, blue eyes locked with brown, and Sharon managed not to flinch away from the regret she saw in Cynthia's expression. "He was," said Brian Kinney's ultimate defender. "Until this happened. Now . . ."

Sharon Briggs leaned forward and placed her hand on Cynthia's shoulder; one quick touch, a tiny squeeze, and it was over, but Cynthia was surprised to find herself comforted by the gesture. "He's still Brian Kinney." Obviously, the undercover cop felt no need to say more.

Cynthia tried to ignore the images rising in her mind of Brian as she'd seen him last - tried and failed - but only for a moment.

"I take it," said Agent Corey, as she took a seat in one of the antique wing chairs that fronted Cynthia's desk, "that you two are old friends."

"More like old competitors," laughed Sharon. "From back in the day."

"Oh, please," retorted Cynthia with an eye-roll. "I was never really in the same league. Not like you and Lindsey."

But Sharon was shaking her head, her laughter fading into a gentle smile. "In the end, we were all just part of the pep squad - the satellites of Brian Kinney."

"Sounds like a fan club," observed Alexandra Corey.

Cynthia nodded. "In a way, that's exactly what it was. We were all in college together. But I was lucky enough . . ."

When she fell silent, Corey - who was exceptionally good at her job and exceptionally perceptive - did not do what most people would have done. She did not just ignore the lapse. "Lucky enough to what?" she asked, sympathetic but firm.

Cynthia circled her desk and settled into her chair before answering. "Lucky enough to never fall in love with him," she said finally. "And you have no idea how rare that was. He was . . ." Again she fell silent, her eyes dropping to the colorful image still displayed on her desk.

"Yes," replied Corey, with only a bit of twinkle in her eye. "I'd have to be deaf, dumb, and blind not to see exactly what he was. And how fortunate that you never loved him."

Cynthia looked up, and Corey was momentarily stunned by the flash of anger in eyes gone slightly gray, like storm clouds gathering on a blue horizon. "That's not - exactly - what I said."

"Easy, my friend," replied the profiler. "I understand the distinction, so let me qualify my response. How fortunate - for both of you - that you never fell in love with him."

Cynthia confined her response to a quick nod.

Corey then turned to regard Sharon Briggs with speculative eyes. The FBI and the Pittsburgh PD were hoping to use this young woman's considerable skills in undercover work to forward this investigation, but no one, it seemed, had delved very deeply into her history with the victim - a history that might have generated some heavy baggage, in the form of an emotional entanglement that could compromise the woman's professionalism and objectivity. Time, perhaps, to dispense with some assumptions that might prove problematic if not addressed decisively.

"Is there anything you want to tell me," she asked finally, "before we get to a point where old bridges - never crossed or crossed too often - come back to confound us?"
Briggs' smile became enigmatic. "You haven't met him yet, have you?"

Ciorey shrugged. "No. I try to get all my chess pieces in place before confronting the knight, in all his glory."

"Nice analogy," Briggs retorted. "But it does leave you with a potential blind spot."

Corey blinked. No one had ever suggested such a potential problem. Not, at any rate, to her face. "Such as?"

"You can't possibly understand the impact of coming face-to-face with Brian Kinney, until you experience it for yourself."

Cynthia Whitney could not - quite - contain a tiny snicker.

"Which doesn't exactly answer my question," Corey replied, still completely impersonal. Almost.

"Relax, Agent Corey," Briggs said with a small, Cheshire-cat grin. "I'm a dyke. Always was and always will be. But if you think that's enough to make a woman Kinney-proof, let me just disabuse you of that notion. For most lesbians, the fact that he sports a remarkably generous package - equipment-wise - would be enough to render him completely uninteresting, not to mention the fact that he's an arrogant, narcissistic, self-serving bastard. But he's Brian Kinney, and that puts him in a league all by himself."

"How so?" Corey asked, fascinated in spite of herself. "Why would he ..."

It was Cynthia who stepped in to attempt an explanation, knowing full well that she was doomed to failure from the first word. "How about the fact that he never lies - not, at least, about anything that matters? Or that he never pretends to be anything other than what he is? Or that he never buys into anybody's bullshit, or lets anyone else around him buy into it either? Never believes that an apology makes up for whatever the original mistake might have been, and never accepts anything less than the best effort a person has to give, or demands more than a person is capable of, and always seems to know the difference, while the rest of us are standing around looking bewildered." Then she smiled. "And that barely scratches the surface. You could spend a lifetime trying to get to know the man beneath the image, Agent Corey, and I doubt you'd ever succeed."

The profiler was silent for a moment, considering what she'd heard. Then she looked up, a new resolve written in her eyes, and regarded Sharon Briggs with calm determination. "Did you love him?" she asked, going right to the heart of the matter.

"Of course, I did," came the response, equally cut and dried. "And so will you. Always providing you don't hate him. You're going to discover that Brian Kinney inspires many things, but indifference isn't one of them."

A brief pause. "OK, then," said Corey slowly. "Rephrasing the question. Will your feelings for him make it impossible for you to function in this new role we're asking you to take on?"

"No."

"How can you be so certain?"

Briggs took a moment to choose the right words, to make her meaning clear. "Brian Kinney," she said finally, "is the person who helped me to see that the closet was a place where I didn't want to live, the person who refused to play the game I'd set up for myself and, by extension, for him. He was the beard I wanted to wear, who refused to be worn." Then she grinned. "He was the son-in-law my father was so eager to bag that he practically had St. Paul's Cathedral on standby for booking the wedding." She paused then, growing pensive and introspective. "Brian was the man who finally convinced me that I was doing everyone a disservice - myself most of all - by pretending to be something I wasn't."

Unexpectedly, Corey laughed. "So - instead - you made a career out of pretending to be something you're not."

Briggs gave a little 'touche' shrug, as her smile grew wistful. "After the dust settled, my father hated him for a while. Until he came to understand what a favor Brian had done him, by insisting that I give him the chance to know the woman his daughter really was."

Corey frowned and asked the question, obviously regretting the necessity. "Should I add your father to my growing list? Of persons of interest, I mean?"

She was grateful when Briggs laughed. "My father? The ultimate flower child? No, Agent Corey. My father is completely incapable of violence, and he did - finally - come to appreciate Brian, although it took a while. Today, they're very good friends, although he still, occasionally, gets a little misty-eyed over the idyll he'd constructed for himself. You know - the society wedding, the big house in the suburbs, grandchildren . . ."

"Fathers are like that," said a wry voice from the doorway.

Sharon Briggs smiled, without bothering to look around to identify the new arrival. "Hello, Peterson."

Lindsey laughed. "Hey, Briggs."

"Let me guess," observed Corey. "Sorority sisters?"

"Good old Alphi Phi," replied Lindsey with a pained smile. "Pretty much the only thing Briggs and I ever had in common."

"Except one," Briggs pointed out.

"Yes." Lindsey closed her eyes, reflecting that she had spent too much time of late, lost in memories. "Except one."

"How's bitch-Marcus?" The words were harsh, but there was no real animosity in Brigg's inquiry.

"Just as you remember," Lindsey answered, moving into the office and taking a seat beside Agent Corey. "Bitchy as ever."

"Sorry," Briggs said with a grin, obviously not sorry in the least.

She and Cynthia exchanged quick glances and even quicker notes of understanding; neither of them had ever managed to develop any kind of rapport with Lindsey's significant other, but it had never really mattered much. Brian was the nuclear glue that bound them all together; Melanie Marcus was just a rogue particle, insignificant in the grander scheme of things, although not, of course, to Lindsey.

"So," said Agent Corey, "are we ready to proceed?"

Cynthia sighed. "Yes . . . and no. Lunch, courtesy of Auntie Em's catering, will undoubtedly be delightful, and all of us - including Emmett - are ready to answer your questions, Agent Corey."
Although I have no idea what we can say that we haven't said to a dozen different people already. But . . . " She favored Briggs with an apologetic little smile. "Hilliard isn't here. I was informed - rather brusquely, I thought - by Kinnetik's chief of security that wherever he is, is need-to-know only, and apparently, I don't qualify." She looked slightly disgruntled. "I'd love to see them try that shit on Brian Kinney, who would eat them all for lunch in a New York minute, but I don't seem to be quite as intimidating, so no luck. He did, however, leave a thumb drive for you, Sharon, which should contain all the data you'll need."

Sharon nodded and they all rose to make their way to the conference room, with Cynthia bringing up the rear.

"Let Mathis know he can join us when he's ready," said Cynthia, as they passed the receptionist's desk.

"Agent Corey," said Lindsey, as they moved into the sanctuary of Brian's office - a place that almost seemed to breathe his scent, which was somehow both comforting and disconcerting. "I'm not quite sure what you're looking for, from us. Surely you've already got all the facts and . . ."

"Indeed, I do," replied the FBI agent. "I've got every imaginable kind of record concerning Brian Kinney's life - school records, medical records, tax records, business records, family history . . . you name it."

"So what can you possibly hope to learn from us?"

Corey smiled. "I know all I need to know about the facts of his life. Facts - but not truths. They're not the same, you know."

"But what . . ."

"I know the record. I've seen the files. But that's not what I need. What I need is to see the man. Not through my eyes, but through yours."

Lindsey went very still, eyes growing wide and dark, and, when she spoke, her voice was faint, barely audible. "I'm not sure . . ."

"Oh, don't worry about it," Corey said quickly, offering reassurance. "It's a piece of cake. You can do it."

But Lindsey was shaking her head, and she and Sharon Briggs were staring at each other, exchanging thoughts without actually exchanging a word.

"You don't understand, Alex," said Briggs finally, almost unwillingly. "It's not that we can't do what you're asking. It's that we're not sure we want to."

Cynthia Whitney was nodding her head, obviously in complete agreement with the other members of this volunteer brigade of Kinney supporters.

Alexandra Corey studied all three of them, suddenly at a loss for words, not sure now if she knew how to convince them to speak what was in their hearts, what she needed to learn from them in order to get to know this man, in the way that they knew him.

And wondering, on the breath of an impulse that came to her from some remote place previously unsuspected and unencountered, if she really wanted to know him at all.

She felt a tiny smile touch her lips, as she speculated on how her boss - and her partner of many,
Alexandra Corey was relentless, indomitable, unflappable, and had never in her life been intimidated by anyone.

Until now.

Brian Kinney, who appeared to be a man who wore so many hats that no one could keep track of them all; who had, thus far, proved impossible to categorize or limit to a specific identity; who had intrigued her more than anyone she had never - yet - met.

And who, if she were to be totally honest with herself, possessed one other attribute that distinguished him from every other subject she'd ever studied.

She looked up then and saw a photograph on the rear wall of the reception area - a huge, colorful candid shot, obviously taken at a party celebrating the grand opening of the business - and the man at its heart: beautiful, urbane, glamorous, blazing-bright Brian Kinney, who just might turn out to be the most frightening man she'd ever need to know.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

First of all, he didn't know why he didn't feel comfortable going up to the loft alone. Then he didn't know why he didn't want to take the elevator to the top floor. And finally, he wasn't sure what it was that almost drove him to turn away from that huge, dented sliding door and run screaming from the building, refusing to go in at all.

So here he stood, hesitating - staring at the scarred metal surface of the door as if it held a fucking Rosetta Stone that would unlock the secrets of the universe. Or the secrets of Brian Kinney, which would probably be at least as complex and convoluted and, ultimately, totally fucked up.

Danny Boyle was standing behind him, trying not to goggle but not succeeding very well. Brian's loft was legendary. There was no other word for it. And while the individuals who had been privileged to visit it - once - were many, the ones who'd ever gotten more than a glance of anything except the bedroom ceiling were few indeed. They might have been lucky enough to gather a general impression - sleek, modern, elegance in its purest form, providing the perfect setting for the jewel at its center, but it was astonishing that the man who occupied the place - and the center spot in so many lives - remained mostly an enigma to the many who thought they knew him, as well as to the few, who knew better.

In the end, Justin thought, there were only two or three who had ever managed to find their way into the labyrinthine passages that might - with time and patience and an extraordinary amount of luck - lead to the core of the man. And even then, that was assuming that Brian would allow it, which was problematic at best.

Once, not so long ago, he had believed that he had achieved that goal, that he knew Brian, as no one else ever would or could. More than anything in life, he still wanted to believe that. But . . .

Boyle shifted slightly and cleared his throat, trying to observe the expressions on Justin's face without actually appearing to be watching - a no-win situation in either case. "Hey, Dude," he said finally. "We goin' in, or what?"

With a funny little half-shrug - a gesture that would have been immediately familiar to Brian Kinney, but probably not to anyone else - Justin put aside his misgivings, squared his shoulders, and unlocked the door in one not-quite-fluid series of movements.

It was time to stop dithering; time to grow a pair, in Kinney-speak; time to . . . He shoved the door open and walked . . . into yesterday. To all his yesterdays that had ever mattered - the ones he'd turned his back on when he'd left Brian behind to run away to New York, and an art world that - in retrospect - meant nothing, comparatively speaking.

Dear God in Heaven! What had he done?

It was almost too much to bear, and even Danny Boyle - who would never be mistaken for a particularly empathetic, perceptive individual - sensed enough to remain by the door and say nothing while his eyes swept the scene before him, taking it all in, memorizing something he knew he might never see again while Justin keyed in the code that would disarm the security system.

Boyle continued to watch, noting everything, including the look on the face of the blond at its center who had moved into the heart of the room and was gazing around, saying nothing, but - obviously - completely wrapped up in memory.

Brian Kinney, in all his radiance.

Arms spread wide, beautiful, bronzed body still showing the traces of a bottle of water poured over an upturned face, mouth wearing a seductive little smile.

"So . . . are you coming or going? Or coming, and then going? Or coming . . . and staying?"

Such a simple beginning to evolve into something so complex and multi-dimensional that it defied defining.

Because they defied defining.

Justin went very still, struck by the elegant simplicity of the thought and frozen into a dark silhouette against the bright luminosity of floor-to-ceiling glass.

Could it possibly be as simple as that?

Not buddies, not tricks, not boyfriends, not lovers, not partners, not husband-and-husband, not soul-mates - none of those things, and all of those things, at the same time.

Had he wasted years trying to force the freeform shape of what he shared with Brian into the stereotypical round hole of convention? And, if he had, could he now step outside the parameters of expectation imposed by society and family and culture and learn to do the only thing that Brian had ever really asked of him; to accept what they were together for the unique, unconstricted, elementary force that it was? And, even if he could learn to do that, was it already too late?

Was Brian already gone?

The silence was becoming uncomfortable, and Danny Boyle moved into the kitchen, running his hand across the sleekness of the granite countertop. "Hell of a place!" he observed, careful to keep his tone light. He didn't know any of the particulars about the Kinney/Taylor relationship, but one didn't live anywhere in the neighborhood without having gotten an occasional earful of the rumors, so he thought it best to avoid imposing on what was probably very private territory. "Want something to drink?"

"Uhh, no. Thanks," Justin replied absently. "But there's always beer in the fridge - probably Samuel Adams brown ale - so help yourself."
Boyle opened the stainless refrigerator and spotted the familiar six-pack of brown bottles on an upper shelf. "The man's got taste," he remarked, helping himself.

Justin smiled. "You have no idea," he whispered, his eyes moving from object to object around the apartment, noting what had changed and what had not: new plasma tv with a Blu-Ray player, new treadmill, new rug - ivory banded in almond - under the dining table, new free-form sculpture on a low display table in the living area, flanked by a new Barcelona chair. Other things were unchanged: sleek, glove-soft Italian furniture, the gleam of perfectly finished hardwood floors, the stairs to the bedroom and the plushness of the duvet that was just visible through the partially-open door; the stylized crystal ashtray that was the only item on the Mies Van Der Rohe coffee table; the Fender guitar case propped near the sofa, indicating that somebody had been fooling around, probably bare-footed and bare-chested, in a bout of reminiscence concerning old, almost forgotten dreams.

And then, of course, there were the things that were no longer where they had been: a large, smoky quartz, handblown vase that had probably finally succumbed, after surviving too many close calls, to one of Brian's cartwheel/juggling/handstand sessions; a deep green cashmere throw, which had figured in a thousand different configurations of sexual hi-jinx, now nowhere to be found; and, of course, the artworks: the one that hung now on the wall in the Kinnetik reception area, and others which were simply gone. Charcoal sketches, bright acrylics, oils, a couple of minimalist studies of two bodies entwined, expressing both lust and need, and various studies of Brian's face, caught in moments of reflection, of speculation, of tenderness, of loneliness, which Brian had never admitted, of course, but Justin had known anyway.

Justin allowed his eyes to drift around the loft - once. After that, he concentrated on finding what he'd been sent to fetch.

He went to the desk, noting as he approached that some things were truly immutable, changeless - such as Brian's work habits: clear, spare, direct, streamlined, without wasted effort or motion. Files there were, neatly placed and labeled, slides and sketches and CD-roms, also labeled, but no laptop. Brian's camera bag, complete with his state-of-the-art Canon EOS Rebel, but no laptop. He turned and once more looked around the room, knowing what had to come next, no matter how much he didn't want to know it.

No laptop.

All right then. Boyle was enjoying his beer when Justin stalked across the room and climbed the steps to the bedroom. He'd been slightly concerned that he might be forced to confront Brian's unmade bed or discarded clothing, but that, of course, was not the case. Mrs. Oliver, Brian's cleaning lady, was every bit as efficient and perfectionist as everyone else who worked for him, and would rather have left dog poop on the bathroom floor than leave his undies tossed in a corner.

Immaculate, as always. Bed made, pillows fluffed, duvet perfectly draped, wood surfaces gleaming and dust-free, closet neat and perfectly organized, including what appeared to be a brand new dark charcoal Armani suit, obviously meant to be paired with the French-cuffed black Gucci dress shirt hanging beside it, while a quick look inside a small, discreet, elegantly understated leather valet on a high shelf revealed a new pair of Tiffany cufflinks, a yin/yang design in black pearl and platinum - having absolutely nothing to do with Zen spirituality, if Justin knew his Brian Kinney, which he certainly did, but everything to do with the fact that the man had always been fond of the symmetry of the pattern. Justin sighed, spotting a very similar ensemble hanging further back in the closet and pondering the reason for the upgrade. A shift in the acceptable size of lapels, perhaps, or a variation in the cut of the slacks. If Brian Kinney ever stopped being a label queen . . . Justin very carefully backed away from completing that thought, and looked around once more.
No laptop.

Shit!

Now what? There was no place else, except . . .

He smiled. Of course. It had been weeks since Brian had been here, and while the Master himself would never have shoved his precious computer - almost as irreplaceable to him as his right arm - or his dick - into a narrow little cupboard to get it out of sight, his cleaning lady, a neat freak of the first order, might very well have cleared a spot for it in the tiny storage closet tucked away in the alcove beyond the entertainment area.

Convinced that he'd guessed correctly at last, Justin traversed the width of the apartment, crossed the television viewing area, and pulled open the double louvered door that ordinarily concealed the storage space for DVD's like East of Eden and Giant, On the Waterfront, and One-Eyed Jacks. But then he froze, confronted not by shelves of movie disks or VCR tapes, but by a gaping darkness instead, a shallow, shadowed passageway into . . . something else. Some place else.

Shocked and a bit disoriented, the blonde made a quick, gasping sound, as if something had knocked the breath out of him, and Danny Boyle jumped up and started forward, slightly alarmed by both Justin's pallor and the expression of dismay on his face.

"What is it?" he demanded. "What's wrong?"

For a few moments, Justin made no attempt to answer, having no real idea what it was that had disturbed him so. There was nothing, after all, to be afraid of. Nothing to fear. It was just a room, but it was a room where no room was supposed to be. Where no room had been before and where not a single sliver of light penetrated, beyond the gleam of a swath of warm wood reflected at the base of the doorway. "Nothing," he said finally. "It's just . . ."

"Just?" Boyle was sounding even more perturbed now, stepping forward and reaching out and . . .

"No!" The blonde's voice was sharp, almost gasping. "No." Softer now, falling into a murmur. "It's nothing. It's just . . . stand back. Just stay there."

Then he took a slow, deep breath, squared his shoulders, and stepped forward into the darkness, pulling the door closed behind him, before reaching out and realizing that he was standing in some kind of vestibule, that his way was blocked by a second door, a heavy wooden barrier on which an electronic keypad had been mounted at eye level, a keypad which emitted a faint, bluish glow just bright enough to render the digits and symbols adorning the keypad visible.

He paused, and ran his hand down the velvety smoothness of the woodwork to his left, his fingertips caressing a faint depression on a sleek switchplate, resulting in a soft click, and a pale amber glow rose from beneath him - not really bright enough to reveal anything except a crisper image of the doors which formed the boundaries of the tiny vestibule in which he found himself.

"Justin?" Danny Boyle's voice was just a half-step away from full-fledged panic mode.

"It's all right," he said quickly. "It's just a storage compartment. I'd forgotten about it, but it's nothing to worry about."

"Bullshit! You never saw it before."

Justin smiled. "Okay. I never saw it before. But it's nothing to get alarmed over."
"How do you know?"

The smile grew wider, softer. "Because I recognize the fingerprints."

"Say what?" Boyle didn't even try to conceal the level of his annoyance.

Justin reached out and drew his fingers down the incredible silkiness of the hand-rubbed oak veneer, reflecting that he couldn't think of anybody else in the world who would go to such extreme measures to render the surface of a door so sensually pleasing. His smile stuttered and morphed into pure indulgence as he remembered how often he'd accused Brian of being the ultimate hedonist - and how right he'd been.

Shit!

He reached into his shirt pocket to retrieve the datacard which Cynthia had thrust at him when she'd sent him on his errand, and noted, for the first time, that there were actually two strings of symbols embossed on its surface - the sequence he'd already used to disarm the primary alarm system, and now, a second sequence, composed of prime numbers and simple glyphs, which would, he hoped, serve as the "Open, Sesame" for the new barrier looming before him now.

He took a moment to draw a deep breath, bracing himself - he wasn't sure why - before tapping in the appropriate sequence and calling out to his nervous companion. "Just relax and drink your beer, Danny. I'll be right out."

For a space of seconds, nothing happened; then there was a silken shimmer of sound and motion, as the door in front of him slid aside on a soft susurrations of air and he was aware of gentle illumination swelling from the base of walls that appeared to be extending before him, stretching perhaps eight meters ahead and three on either side of him.

He moved forward slowly into . . . a different place - a place that he recognized, even though he'd never seen it before. A place to which he was drawn, to which he was meant to return - to which he belonged.

A place built for him by Brian Kinney. He didn't know how he could be so sure of that, and he couldn't conceive of how such a thing was even remotely possible since it was logical to assume that Brian knew as much about carpentry or construction as he might know about brain surgery or quantum physics. But he was certain of it nevertheless.

He sank into a drift of softness - a combination sofa and bed and chaise and console, and felt it conform around him, as if custom designed for his comfort. His fingers fell naturally to a series of controls arranged along the edge of the seating unit, something he did not need to see in order to activate, and, with the first touch of his hand, the display began seamlessly, with no period of adjustment from one phase to the next. It began with a pale spear of light drawing the eye up toward the ceiling, before expanding into a deliberate, perfectly timed progression of a series of images, illuminated one at a time, each unique, each perfectly positioned to be studied and examined and explored in intimate detail, and it was so perfectly, subtly done that it took a few minutes for him to realize that it was his body and the platform on which he rested that were shifting to allow a new perspective of each item displayed. The works of art were stationary; the illumination and the eyes that followed it were not.

It was a retrospective of the art of Justin Taylor - twenty-eight different pieces, ranging through a full gamut of mediums, from vibrant graphic works to subtle sketches to intricate studies of exquisite detail - portraits, abstracts, still lifes; some he'd done many years before and others that were more recent, including six from his last show - the six he would have chosen to keep, if he'd indulged his own desires; the six he'd resigned himself to never seeing again - like most of the others he was seeing now, for the first time in a very long time. He'd never imagined that Brian had been buying his work over the years. The first displayed was the oldest of the lot, dating back to his earliest encounters with the tour de force that would alter his life. It was the first sketch he'd ever done of Brian Kinney - Brian sleeping and naked and beautiful. Perfectly Brian.

Other pieces were a complete surprise. A storyboard from his sojourn in the rarefied atmosphere of filmdom; a sketch of his sister, rendered in pastels, that he didn't even remember doing; a watercolor featuring a group of laughing faces - the extended family who'd adopted him when his own father had thrown him out. Throw-away stuff - or so he'd believed at the time. Obviously, someone had disagreed.

And then . . . oh, no. How could this possibly be here? How could Brian have dealt with this? Brought this darkness into his home? It was a heavy, brooding piece, although it had not been intended as such originally. A gloom-shrouded, slender figure, back-lit, done almost entirely in black and white and shades of gray, standing at the edge of a stage and looking out over a sea of dim faces, one hand dangling a violin as the other was lifted in greeting. The face, barely visible in shadow, was not smiling.

It had been intended as a paean, in praise of the passion of his new lover, the individual he'd allowed himself to trust to give him everything that Brian couldn't - wouldn't. But he had never titled the painting. Not then. Not until much later, when he'd glanced at it one day and seen the truth - a truth that had always been there, but that he had never been willing to see.

He'd called it Consolation, only realizing the truth of it when the word had popped into his mind on the occasion of revisiting the painting. It represented hope relinquished - settling for second-best - or worse.

Why on earth would Brian have wanted it? Why would he . . .

But the next item presented for his contemplation provided the immediate answer. Brian had wanted the murky, brooding portrait of Ethan for the contrast it provided. For the next work expressed everything that the dark, haunted likeness did not. It was the explosive surrealistic piece Justin had painted on the day Brian had given in to his relentless pursuit and taken him back, the day they'd reclaimed their ties to each other, the day of reunification.

It was light and joy and hope and promise; it was the thing that existed between them, that would never exist with any other, incorporating every feeling, every surge, every nuance of lust and belonging. It was the two of them together, the lifeforce that bound them, expressed through music and motion and the burst of energy and the voiceless tide of fulfillment.

He had titled it The Hallelujah Chorus.

It had been one of the first pieces he'd sold after going to New York, not because he'd wanted to let it go, but because it had simply been too painful for him to keep.

He was aware of music playing - somewhere, pale and gentle and beneath the level of conscious hearing, lovely classical work - without a single violin in evidence anywhere - but stroking his consciousness, perfect for the setting, soothing and leading him through transitions from one moment to the next, exactly as it was meant to do.

The images were elemental and filled with light, crisp and perfect and beautiful. And Justin inhabited every one of them; Justin, complete; Justin, best and worst, most and least, beginning and ending and every nuance in between; Justin in all his radiance, reflected completely in the luminous eyes of the man who loved him best.

Until this very moment, he had never really understood how much.

The retrospective light show ran for eighteen minutes, each new image touching him deeply, calling up a series of vital memories, each more precious than the last, and ending as softly, as perfectly, as it had begun, with the final image lingering within the intimate shadows around him - the most precious image of them all, and his eyes fell to the small, engraved plate affixed to the bottom of the painting - the title. Even now, after all this time, he was still not sure he'd done the right thing, but it still felt right, and it was far too late to rethink it now.

The print was small, and he doubted he would have been able to read the words if he hadn't already known what they said.

But, from his perspective, it still rolled perfectly off the tongue, as appropriate now as on the day of its christening: I Don't Want to Miss a Thing.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*~

The vestibule of the popular luncheonette was dominated by a huge, colorful poster, and Ted Schmidt seemed uncomfortable under the gaze of the individuals depicted on it.

"Do you ever get the feeling that Big Brother is watching you?" he asked as he and his companions waited for a table to come available. The poster, despite its age, was still as bright and eye-catching as it had been when it had first been hung all those years ago - a poster that featured the smiling faces of a group of sweaty, young athletes enjoying a moment of sweet victory on a Penn State soccer field, at the conclusion of a regional play-off game in the halcyon days of 1994. In the center of the group, striker/stopper Brian Kinney and goaltender Johnny Burnside - the son of Brenda Jo Burnside, proprietor and namesake of the Dixie Belle Café - were laughing together, arms wrapped tight around taut, muscular torsos.

Brenda Jo was the southern belle equivalent of Debbie Novotny, but without the interpersonal hang-ups. Unlike Debbie's son, Johnny had never been entangled in any kind of love-hate-more love-more hate relationship with Brian; they had simply been good friends and athletic team-mates, and Brenda Jo had accepted young Brian for exactly what he was - a friend of her son's who happened to be gay. She had never understood why people felt compelled to make a big deal out of what she considered a simple fact of life.

The café was a prosperous, well-run business, popular with young professionals and blue collar workers alike. Thus, it was almost always busy, because it was bright and warm and friendly, and because the food was exceptionally good, featuring a variety of southern specialties, like chicken and dumplings, red beans and rice, corn maque choux, and hush puppies, and a wide selection of luscious baked goods, like Niemen Marcus cake and New Orleans bread pudding. Usually, the only way to be sure to get a table was to arrive early and be prepared to wait. Unless, of course, one's name was included on a very short list of preferred customers. Like Brian Kinney.

But Brian was not around these days, and precious few of his associates qualified for that very select list. But Michael - by association - was usually lucky enough to snag a table. Because he was one of Brian's best friends, and because his comic book store was located just a half block down the street from the cafe, so that he usually arrived early.

But he still had to wait, like everybody else, so he had the time to turn to study Teddy's face, not quite sure what to make of the sour note he thought he'd heard in the man's tone.
"Who pissed in your Cheerios?" he asked finally, not reassured by the hard glitter he spotted in the accountant's eyes.

"Why?" Ted snapped. "Just because I don't buy into the whole St. Brian charade?"

"No," Michael retorted. "Maybe because you might want to think twice about everything he's done for you?"

Ted's eyes were hard and cold. "Brian only does what's good for Brian. If the rest of us benefit from it, we're just lucky to be in the right place at the right time."

"Really?" That was Ben, turning to examine Ted's face with a speculative gaze. "Soooo, it's all just coincidence that you're living the good life again, with all your troubles behind you, and . . ."

"Anything I have," Ted retorted, "I've earned - and more. And I'd have earned it with - or without - Mr. Kinney's help. All things considered, I'm pretty sure he ought to be thanking me."

A new arrival stepped up at that moment, and Ted looked around to find Monty Peabody looking at him with a smile of approval. "How quickly they forget, hmmm?" said the newcomer. "What has Brian Kinney ever really done for anyone - except himself?"

"Amen," agreed Ted, greeting Monty with a warm smile, and allowing his eyes to drift - with a stir of avid appreciation - to the tall, well-muscled individual at the lab tech's side.

"Hey, Guys, this is Jack Holloway. He's new around here.

"And a welcome addition to the group," said Ted, eyes bright with interest. As he reached out to shake the newcomer's hand, he dismissed a faint mental impression that he'd met the man somewhere before.

For his part, Hilliard spotted the tell-tale nuance in the accountant's expression and refused to react to it, knowing that it would pass quickly unless he reinforced it with flag-raising behavior.

And it did.

Michael, meanwhile, had turned to meet Ben's eyes. He was sometimes amazed - not to mention appalled - to remember how easily they had allowed themselves to buy into the whole range of Monty/Eli pseudo-intellectual, holier-than-thou pretensions, and both of them were sometimes painfully reminded of all the times they'd remained silent and allowed these so-called friends to pass judgment on a man who had done nothing to deserve their contempt - a man whose primary flaw, aside from an outrageous vanity that no one would even try to deny, was a complete unwillingness to tolerate hypocrisy; a man who had, indeed, stepped up on countless occasions to save those who were too weak or too fragile or too frightened to defend themselves.

"Besides," said Ted, "surely we can find better things to talk about than the no-longer-reigning king of Liberty Avenue."

"That's an interesting attitude," said Ben, deliberately standing tall so he could look down into Ted's eyes, "toward a man who's still signing your paychecks."

"And we'll just see how long that lasts, won't we?" Ted observed cryptically.

Michael, on the other hand, had turned to confront Monty, and was making no effort to hide the fact that he was enjoying the view of the tall stranger at his side. "Hey, Monty," he said, flashing the newcomer a friendly smile. "Where's Eli?"
"Job interview," Monty replied sharply.

"Umm, no," Monty replied slowly. "Actually, he's got an appointment with the manager of the Tyler Lane Big Q."

"Oh," said Michael, with a frown. "My condolences."

"And what, exactly, is that supposed to mean?" The lab tech's voice had taken on a decidedly testy edge.

Michael smiled. "Only that I've worked with Andrew before, and I don't envy anyone the experience."

"Yes, well, unfortunately, some of us don't rate the kind of support and perpetual forgiveness and approval that are accorded to . . ." He glanced up toward the portrait of Brian and couldn't quite conceal a quick satisfied smirk, "the Chosen Few of Pittsburgh's elite gay community."

Ted grinned. "I couldn't have said it better myself."

Michael blinked, as he turned to meet Ben's gaze, and knew that they were having one of those intuitive moments in which two minds shared a single thought. "You know who you sound like, Teddie?" he asked, with a tiny, rueful smile.

"No. Who?"

"Me." The single syllable conveyed volumes of shame. "At the height of my Stepford-fag pretentiousness. God, I don't know how he resisted an urge to deck me."

Ted flushed an ugly, splotchy red. "Don't be ridiculous, Michael. Just because someone kicked the shit out of him does not make him a hero."

"Y'er right," said a new voice - rough and twangy with an accent that fell heavily on Midwestern ears and dredged up thoughts of long, hot summers in the wooded hills of the Carolinas. "There was plenty of other things that took care a that a long time ago." Brenda Jo Burnside's eyes were very dark - as close to true black as human eyes could get - and almost feral in the degree of anger they expressed.

Ted flinched, and then took a deep breath, telling himself that he was only imagining the looks of concerned sympathy from his companions. Surely, they couldn't believe that he was actually afraid of this coarse, uneducated country bumpkin, even if there were rumors that the bumpkin in question kept a loaded shotgun stashed behind the cash register - a weapon, it was reported, that she was not loathe to use when the situation called for action. Further, rumor had it that she was a crack shot.

"Table for two, Michael?" said the bumpkin with a steely smile.

"Actually," Michael replied, giving her his best, brightest Pollyanna grin, "make that four."

The steely smile did not waver.

"Five," said Monty quickly.

"Four." Jared Hilliard deliberately removed himself from the equation, thus claiming a measure of approval from the woman of the moment - the one with the power to seat him where, when, and if she chose. "I hate a crowded booth," he explained in response to Monty's lifted brow.

Brenda Jo's twitch of a smile said that she knew full well what he really hated.

For a moment, both Ted and Monty were treated to a shrewd, semi-hostile inspection from night-dark eyes, and the expression on her face made it clear that the discreet sign posted in the front window was not just for show. In this establishment, the management truly did reserve the right to refuse service to anyone, for any reason - or no reason at all. It was all according to the will or whim of Brenda Jo.

"Suit yourself," she said finally, gesturing toward a corner booth and nodding for Hilliard to take a seat at the counter, close enough to the booth in question to include himself in the conversation should he choose to do so, and to overhear anything that might be said there.

The proprietor took a moment to study the newcomer's face, with eyes that saw a great deal more than most people would have credited. Then she smiled and leaned forward, thrusting a menu into his hands and catching his eye just enough to give him a quick, discreet wink.

Hilliard managed - barely - not to grin. So much for fooling all the people, all the time, he thought. But a glance toward the booth where Kinney's friends and acquaintances were being seated confirmed that the necessary façade was still intact, and there was no question that Brenda Jo would help preserve his cover, should the need arise.

Nevertheless, when she walked away to seat another group of new arrivals, Hilliard flinched slightly when he heard Ted mutter a quick, nasty comment to his companions - a sarcastic slur about having to put up with "hillbilly trash". A quick glance over his shoulder confirmed that both Novotny and Bruckner appeared shocked by the ugly nature of the remark, but Peabody seemed unperturbed. Even bigotry, it seemed, was acceptable - under certain circumstances.

The group spent a few minutes catching up on local gossip: Chanda Leer's new gig at the Cabaret du Monde; the recently scheduled revival of West Side Story that was coming to the civic center; the next fundraiser for Angels over Pittsburgh; Ben's new class featuring the works of Oscar Wilde, and Hunter's role in the upcoming production of The Glass Menagerie; a change in the management team at Woody's. But eventually, inevitably, the discussion turned to the individual most central to the entire group. Brian Kinney.

"So," said Monty, digging into a steaming helping of shepherd's pie with gusto, "have you guys heard anything from Pittsburgh's gay Casanova? About how he's going to handle the loss of his status?"

Michael sipped at his iced tea. "You almost sound like you're looking forward to watching him cope with the damage," he said quietly.

"No," said Monty sharply. "Why would you think that?"

"Because there are a lot of people who seemed to feel that Brian deserved what happened to him," said Ben, his eyes meeting those of his husband, and reading the sadness reflected there.

"Not deserved," said Ted. "Nobody could have deserved . . . that. But he didn't exactly go out of his way to win friends and influence people before it happened, now did he?"

"Is that how you really see things, Ted?" asked Ben. "Because I suggest that there are plenty of people who'd argue that he did exactly that. Despite his rather in-your-face style, Brian has a lot of friends. Even a lot of very influential friends. That might come as a surprise to some, but there are plenty of people who appreciate the man's honesty and his total lack of pretension. Not to mention the fact that he's shown himself to be willing to step up and fight for the things he believes in and the people he cares about."

Michael was looking directly at his old friend at that moment and recognized the resentment that flared in Ted's eyes even before the man had a chance to respond.

"Let's go," said Michael quickly, dropping his fork into his barely touched plate of beef stew.

"But," Ted sputtered, "you said you were starving, and you haven't eaten a thing."

"Lost my appetite." The explanation was terse and sharp and not at all in keeping with Michael's usual diffident nature.

"Oh. I see," Ted said with a frown. "So is this how it's going to be from now on? Nobody's going to be allowed to criticize St. Brian, without incurring the wrath of his ardent defenders? He runs afoul of a group of homophobic assholes, and suddenly he's everybody's hero?"

Much to Ben's surprise, Michael did not leap to his feet. Instead, he calmly folded his napkin and laid it beside his plate, and slid out of the booth where he took a moment to collect his thoughts before looking down to meet the eyes of the man who had been a close friend for many years - a man who suddenly seemed to be wearing the face of a stranger.

"You just don't get it, do you, Teddy?" he said softly. "This isn't about whether or not Brian is a hero. Or whether you agree or disagree with his lifestyle or his beliefs or his choices. This is about the fact that we almost lost him. He could have died, because there are people out there, right here in our world, who hated him enough to want to kill him. Not because he's a cruel, vicious, vindictive monster, or because he's gone out of his way to destroy lives. Not even because he's a huge fucking success who gets his kicks by rubbing people's noses in it. But just because he's different. He doesn't love the way the great moral majority thinks he should." He paused then, and Ben was frightened by the terrible depth of pain he read in his husband's eyes. "And maybe, from the way you're talking, he doesn't love the way you think he should either. Maybe he hasn't been sufficiently grateful for all the wonders you've performed on his behalf. But you know what?" The sadness gave way before an upsurge or rage, barely contained. "You seem to have managed to forget a few miracles he pulled off for you, and for the rest of us."

He backed up then, and there was no mistaking the swell of contempt in his eyes. "Good for you, Teddy. Makes life so much simpler, doesn't it?"

"Wait, Michael," Ted said quickly, scrambling to his feet. But it was too late. Michael was gone, and Ben was regarding Ted with the same degree of revulsion he would have accorded a cockroach.

"I didn't mean . . ." Ted started to explain.

But Ben was not buying it. "Yes. You did. And you're certainly entitled to your opinion, Ted. But there is a bottom line in this that you might want to consider. The relationship between Brian and Michael has endured a lot of trauma in the last few years. Between the two of them, they almost managed to destroy it. But, in the end, they didn't. In the end, it proved to be stronger than either one of them expected." He leaned forward then, and fixed Ted with a stern gaze that carried more than a hint of warning. "It's going to take a lot more than a queen-out demonstration of spite and petty jealousy to change it, and if you insist on going on with this, it's not going to be Michael's feelings for Brian that are going to change."

Then he smiled, but there was no warmth in the expression. "It's your choice."
He turned away then, leaving Ted open-mouthed and at a loss for words, and moved to the register to pay the tab, only to find that Brenda Jo had already managed to retrieve their virtually untouched lunches and transfer them into take-out boxes. He also found that she was refusing to take his money.

When he tried to argue, he discovered that it was futile to dispute the final decision of a stubborn southern belle. Her smile was broad and filled with warmth. "Call it a reward," she explained, "for a job well done." Then she leaned forward, managing to catch Jared Hilliard's eye in the process, as she whispered in Ben's ear. "But it does make me wish I'd taken advantage of the opportunity to spit in the fucker's water glass."

Ben nodded and whispered back, "Next time, you'll know."

Jared Hilliard was suddenly fascinated by the texture of his BLT club sandwich, which allowed him to concentrate completely and resist an almost overwhelming urge to laugh.

In the corner booth, Ted and Monty exchanged uneasy glances, and the silence between them was awkward as Ben disappeared through the front door and Brenda Jo turned to regard them with a look of disdain she didn't even try to conceal.

Ted finally took a deep breath. "St. Brian strikes again," he observed, but he was careful to keep his voice down.

Monty nodded and took a big gulp of his Pepsi. "Well, at least this makes it a bit easier on me," he said. "When Michael and Ben ask me about what's going on with Kinney's medical treatment, it's tough to have to keep my mouth shut. Professionally speaking, of course. I really do hate it when they try to pump me for details about what's going on with him, and I can't give them the answers they want." He carefully avoided meeting Ted's eyes, concentrating instead on loading his fork with a generous dollop of meat and potatoes. "Of course, I'm sure you don't need any details from me - being his financial guru and his professional associate."

Ted made a snorting noise deep in his throat. "Brian can't be bothered to confide in a poor schmuck like me these days. He's got dear Cynthia for that. The only reason I know anything about it all is because I get to take care of piddling little details. Like filing his fucking insurance claims. And the only thing I have to say about that is that I hope this fucking Dr. Turnage with his fancy, la-di-da private clinic is all he's cracked up to be, because his charges are outrageous."

Monty Peabody managed - barely - not to mutter a prayer of gratitude.

And Jared Hilliard could not quite swallow the bitter taste of dismay that rose in his throat as he realized that Peabody had scored exactly the information he'd been seeking. The only positive aspect of the whole thing was that he hadn't scored it under the cover of darkness.

Things were about to get very complicated.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

tbc
The delicate, filigreed glaze of Emmett's crème brûlée clung to Cynthia's spoon as she tried to resist the urge to clean her plate like a three-year-old angling for a reward, but, in the end, no resistance was possible. So she scraped up the last of the silky cream, made sure to get every particle of the caramelized sugar, swirled it around the last of the perfect, ultra-plump blackberries which were an integral factor of the signature dessert, and savored her final bite.

Then she sat back, ridiculously sated, and gazed at the individuals seated around the table, reading identical expressions on all their faces - sensual overload.

Except Emmett's, of course, who - even though he truly enjoyed his own creations - always maintained a tiny nuance of professional demeanor, so he could gauge the reactions of his patrons.

Sharon Briggs said it most succinctly. "Oh - my - God!"

Emmett did not exactly preen. "I do hope you were pleased," he said, cocking his head in a typically flamboyant Emmett posture.

"Pleased!" echoed Briggs. "Pleased doesn't even begin to cover it. God, Emmett! I've always considered myself a pretty fair cook, but this . . . this isn't cooking. This is art, Picasso-level. Honest to God, I'd get on my knees and beg for recipes if I didn't think it would be like asking Da Vinci to give us a paint-by-number version of the Mona Lisa."

"Oh, stop," Emmett replied with a blush. "I'm no artist. I just enjoy a good meal now and then, and find it easier to make one than to find one. Usually."

Alexandra Corey sighed, and didn't even try to conceal the fact that she was unbuttoning her jacket to ease the pressure. "'Well, let me just assure you," she said firmly, "if you ever grow weary of feeding your friends here in Pittsburgh, I have some acquaintances in D.C. - at a rather well-known address - who would welcome you with open arms, and I'd be only too happy to put in a good word for you."

Emmett's response was an exaggerated eye-roll. "You don't really expect me to feed Republicans, do you? I'd rather cater the 700 Club."

Corey laughed. "Maybe I should hold off until the next administration comes in."

"Thank you, Agent Corey," he replied with a winsome smile, "but if you really want to make me happy, just make sure that the people who tried to kill my friend don't get a second shot at finishing the job."

Corey sat back in her chair, and studied his expression for a moment as she straightened the notes she'd taken during the course of their meal. "I have to admit, Emmett," she said finally, "that you surprise me. You just don't strike me as the kind of person to be a member of the Kinney fan club."

Emmett was silent for a moment, considering his answer. "And you'd have been right - until recently. Brian and I . . . we have almost nothing in common. In the vernacular of our culture, I'm the ultimate Nelly-bottom, and Brian is everything that I'm not. Brash, confrontational, arrogant, super-confidant, full of himself. But . . ."

"But what?"

"It took me years - literally - to learn to see through the façade of Brian Kinney, to see what exists under the surface. Sometimes I'm still pretty sure that I only catch occasional glimpses, at those odd moments when he lets his guard down a little. And now, I'm ashamed to admit how often I looked at him, and just saw what was easiest for me to see. I saw what I wanted to see, so I never had to think about what he endured, what he lived through while the rest of us just ignored what we didn't want to know."

"And why do you think that?"

Emmett looked away then, his eyes focusing on a bleak empty spot beyond the window and suddenly filled with shadow. "When Justin got attacked - at his prom - and Brian cut himself off from everyone and built huge, thick walls around himself, we all let ourselves believe that it was because he didn't care. That he was operating in typical Kinney mode, as in 'If your boytoy gets broken, get yourself a new toy'." He sighed and scrubbed at his eyes with his fingers. "God! I actually said that once, congratulating myself on being so clever and hip. We all wanted to believe that, because it was easier than having to find a way to get through those walls and help him to overcome a guilt he never should have been expected to bear. But we did expect it. All of us. Because as much as we were full of all our noble, brave assurances - the ones that declared that Justin had every right to go to his prom and celebrate his 'right of passage' - to be out and proud and not shrink from anybody - the simple truth was that we blamed Brian for showing up there, for flaunting who he was and for encouraging Justin to flaunt himself as well. And while we were all busy condemning him and patting ourselves on the back for our smug, supercilious, liberal superiority, he was dealing with his guilt and his pain completely alone. Going to that hospital every damned night and watching over Justin, and never once letting any of us know what he was doing. In point of fact, if it hadn't been for a compassionate nurse who saw what was happening and was so convinced that Justin had a right to know about it that she disregarded Brian's wishes and spoke out, none of us would ever have known. Truth to tell, I'm not entirely sure that Justin ever did find out, because the nurse didn't go to him directly. Instead, she went to his mother, and Jennifer was so wrapped up in her own rage - her own belief that it was all Brian's fault that Justin got hurt - that she decided to keep that information to herself. It was only later - years later - that she let it slip out one day. To Debbie Novotny, of all people, and that, of course, was like taking out a full-page ad in the Times. So that's when we learned how wrong we'd been. I can't speak for everyone else, of course, but I can tell you that it hit me right in the gut - made me stop and think, and wonder how many other times we'd all just assumed that we knew what Brian thought or felt or why he did the things he did, when the truth was that we didn't have the first fucking clue."

The FBI agent stirred a dollop of real cream into a cup of dark-roast coffee and took a moment to inhale the rich, invigorating aroma. "God, this is good! The bureau should recruit you as a secret weapon." She sipped and closed her eyes to savor the taste. But when she opened them, her gaze was sharp and direct. "You're not dense enough to have allowed yourself to be duped so easily, Emmett. Surely you've figured out why you all jumped to those conclusions."

He allowed himself a quick chuckle. "Because that was exactly what he wanted us to do. Because Brian never wanted anyone to feel obligated to look deeper, or see more. Or feel a single nuance of sympathy for him."

She nodded, and simply repeated her question. "And why do you think that?"

He paused for a moment, lost in thought, and when he did speak, his voice was barely above a "Because he knows more about dealing with hurt and loneliness and emptiness than any of us. And because he'd move heaven and earth to keep any of us from sharing in that, or ever having to deal with it."

Corey smiled, and her eyes were full of sympathy. But not full enough to make her drop the subject. "Because?"

But Emmett was not going to say another word. So she said it for him, but only by leaning forward and whispering in his ear. "Because he thinks he deserves it. You couldn't possibly have blamed him, more than he blamed himself."

Emmett didn't give any indication of agreement, but he didn't argue either.

"The human spirit is an incredible thing," she said softly. "Especially in its infinite capacity to find ways of dealing with pain."

His smile was bittersweet. "There are plenty of people who would wager their last dime that Brian Kinney has never known a moment of pain in his entire life."

She grinned. "That's the other amazing thing about the human spirit - its infinite capacity for stupidity."

Emmett laughed, and Cynthia exchanged a quick, knowing glance with Lindsey, both relieved that Corey seemed to understand things intuitively, without requiring a lot of explanations or analyses. Brian, after all, was a perpetual enigma, impossible to diagram.

Lance Mathis, who had spent the entire meal trying - without notable success - to push away from the table without over-indulging, was talking quietly with Sharon Briggs, sharing specific points of interest in the information he had received from Jared Hilliard and making subtle suggestions on where to concentrate her efforts in setting up the next phase of the undercover operation - the part that she would need to handle personally, which might require some local support, from Mathis' people and the Pittsburgh PD, while Cynthia listened in, not interjecting herself into the conversation but ready to lend her support - and that of Kinnetik Corp - if necessary. Luckily, they would not have to deal with laying out the preliminary background for the sting. That part was already in progress, under the mighty auspices of Alexandra Corey and the FBI, and for that, both Mathis and Briggs were grateful.

Everyone around the table seemed well satisfied with the progress of the meeting - Alexandra Corey, in particular - and there was a general rustling as they all prepared to rise and go about their business. But Lindsey had a different idea, sitting exceptionally still as everyone else got ready to depart.

"Hold it!" she said sharply, laying her hands flat on the table as if bracing for something that might not be pleasant. When she looked up directly into the FBI agent's face, there were shards of ice in her eyes.

"We've given you everything you asked for," she said slowly. "Provided all the information we could, some of it so personal that it felt like it should fall in the category of 'none of your business'. But we answered anyway. For Brian, to help you do whatever you have to do in order to make sure this never happens again. But now, I think it's time you repay the courtesy."

Corey squared her shoulders. "Ms. Peterson, surely you know that I can't divulge . . ."

"Ms. Peterson, surely you know that I can't divulge . . ."
and your policies and procedures, and your cute little protocols. We just spilled our guts for you. Dotted every 'i' and crossed every 't', so you can put the finishing touches on your pretty little report. I've told you things about my relationship to the man who's the father of my son that I've never told anyone before. By this time, you know almost everything there is to know about him. And in return, all we get is platitudes and vague reassurances about how the bureau is doing everything it can, and we have to trust you to see that he's protected. Well, let me tell you something, Ms. Corey. Your assurances suck, and I'm not interested in platitudes, and, where he's concerned, I don't trust anybody. So far, I haven't seen much reason for giving you my trust, and before I can even consider doing so, I want to know how your investigation is going. I want to know that you've got some real evidence that's going to let you identify these bastards." She paused, and drew a deep breath. "I want you to promise me that he's going to be all right. I want your word, and I want more than the law-enforcement equivalent of 'the patient is doing as well as can be expected.' That's just not good enough."

"You know I can't give you specific answers to your questions," Corey said firmly. "It would . . ."

"Do you know," Lindsey interrupted coldly, "who did this to him?"

"We're pursuing . . ."

Lance Mathis stirred uneasily as Lindsey lifted one pale hand to interrupt the standard press conference response. "Do - you - know?"

Corey paused to take a deep breath. "We think so."

Ordinarily, such a response from a ranking FBI official would have proved sufficient to silence most interrogators, but Lindsey Peterson was not a run-of-the-mill paparazzi, out for a juicy tidbit of gossip. She was, instead, a woman on a mission, and she knew exactly how to pursue it; as she'd observed previously, under different circumstances on other occasions, she'd learned from the master. In point of fact, she'd learned from a couple of them. "Based on what? A hunch? Intuition? A gut feeling? Tea leaves or shadows in the crystal ball or some other bit of Harry Potter nonsense? Do you really know something, or is this all just speculation? Or just an act to keep the crowd from getting too restless?"

Agent Corey resumed her seat, and clasped her hands in front of her. "What is it that you want to know, Ms. Peterson?"

Lindsey took some time to compose her answer as all the lunch guests settled back into their chairs, each of them caught between wanting to hear whatever Alexandra Corey could tell them - and not wanting to hear anything at all. Except for Sharon Briggs and Lance Mathis, of course, who were both privy to a great deal of confidential information from the investigation.

"I want to understand," said Lindsey finally, very softly. "I want to know who would do such a thing, and why anyone would feel justified in trying to destroy him. I want to be able to look these people in the eye and try to figure out how they can walk around among ordinary people and not stand out as the monsters they are. I want to know why we didn't see it, why no one realized what they were capable of, before it was too late." She closed her eyes then, and didn't notice when a tear traced a path down her cheek. "And I want them to pay for what they did. I've spent my whole life supporting liberal causes and defending victims of injustice and fighting for the underdog. But now . . . I'm not sure it's just justice I want. Maybe it's vengeance. Maybe I want them to endure what he endured, suffer what he suffered. But above all, I want to know that they're not going to be able to just walk away from it. I want them to pay."

Corey nodded. "Good. So do I."
Lindsey could not quite suppress a grin. "You do?"

"What?" retorted the FBI agent. "You think all us high-ranking FBI types adhere to some superior moral standard, so that we can divorce ourselves from the human part of this equation? That we don't sympathize with the part of you that wants payback?" Her smile was slightly weary. "In the end, I'm bound by the law, in what I'm allowed to do, and in what I can allow others to do. But I can assure you, Ms. Peterson, that there is a part of me - a rather large part, in fact - that would love to be able to put a red hot piece of angle iron in your Brian's hands and let him administer his own brand of justice to the cretins who did this to him. I can't actually do that, of course, but that doesn't mean I don't fantasize about it. Or look forward to nailing these bastards so that the criminal justice system can exact its own version of a pound of flesh."

Lindsey smiled. "So you really do have credible information? Genuine leads that . . ."

"Oh, yes," Corey replied. "We've been very busy, and we've received an enormous amount of support from . . ." She looked up and favored both Mathis and Briggs with a smile, "local resources. We don't have names yet, but we're getting closer. We've narrowed the field now, so we can concentrate our efforts where they'll do the most good. We will find them, Lindsey. I promise you, we will."

"And when you do?"

Corey frowned. 'I'm sorry. I'm not sure . . ."

"In some parts of the world - even in some parts of this country - gay-bashing is almost a spectator sport, and plenty of bashers have just walked away, with nothing more than a slap on the wrist." She sighed. "Everyone here has been witness to that. The young man that Brian . . ." She faltered then, and needed a moment to regain her composure. "Chris Hobbs almost killed Justin Taylor, and, if he had, I'm not entirely sure that two young men wouldn't have died that night. And that fucker walked away without getting so much as a scratch on his pretty little preppy face. Is that what we can expect, for the people who did this to Brian?"

"No." There was not an ounce of equivocation in Corey's tone.

But Lindsey was not going to be easily persuaded. "How can you know that? Hobbs was caught red-handed and lived to walk away from it. You don't even know who . . ."

Alexandra Corey rose and moved around the table to stand at Lindsey's side, where she could reach out and take the younger woman's hand. "But I will," she whispered. "I swear to you. I will find them, and they will pay for what they did to him." Then she paused, and favored Lindsey with a smile that was just slightly venal.

"These bastards planned this all very carefully, and they're obviously accustomed to having things their own way. But they made one really critical mistake." Her smile grew wider. "They chose the wrong victim. The things that made them want to destroy him in the first place - his boldness, his refusal to stand in the shadows, his in-your-face attitude - are the very things that should have sent them running like cockroaches in the light when he got anywhere near them. Your Mr. Kinney is not some sweet, innocent little high school student, without a voice to speak on his behalf, or with parents too gutless to stand up for him. He's brash and brilliant and vain and apparently not afraid of anybody. Add to that the fact that he's got plenty of friends, some of whom are quite powerful, who don't seem to give a fig who he chooses to fuck. As he himself would undoubtedly tell you, we live in a country where money talks. And big money talks bigger. Brian Kinney has both money and power, and the balls to use them."
She leaned forward then and stared directly into Lindsey's eyes. "That's what you've all been telling me, isn't it? Are you going to doubt him now?"

It was Sharon Briggs who answered. "It's not him we're doubting," she laughed. "It's you."

Agent Corey's eyes widened as she turned to stare at the undercover cop. Then she started to laugh, a deep, from-the-belly rumble that was infectious in its irrepressible spontaneity. "Fair enough," she finally managed to say, as she dabbed at her eyes with a tissue, to wipe away tears of laughter and smears of mascara. "It's up to me then, to prove to all of you - and to him in particular - that he's truly met his match."

Emmett's grin was brilliant. "Now that I want to be around to see. Brian Kinney, meeting his match. A truly historic occasion."

A discreet knock at the door announced the intrusion of Garrett Delaney who flashed an apologetic smile toward Cynthia as he leaned in. "Sorry to interrupt, but Jared Hilliard is on line three for Mr. Mathis, and he's insisting that it can't wait."

Cynthia's grin was sympathetic. "Threatening your life, is he?"

"Among other things," he replied ruefully.

Mathis went to Brian's desk to take the call, but both Corey and Cynthia noted - with approval - that he did not settle into Brian's chair.

He listened for a moment, before summoning the FBI agent to join him for a quick, soft-voiced consultation. Then it was Corey who was taking out her cell phone and making a quick, urgent call, at which point Sharon Briggs wasted no time in injecting herself into the conversation.

"What's going on?" demanded Cynthia, noting the none-too-subtle looks of excitement on their faces.

"We need to give Hilliard a raise," Mathis replied, an odd gleam in his eyes emphasizing the grimness of his expression, but that was apparently all he was prepared to say, for the moment, and Cynthia gathered that things were developing in the investigation that the principals were not yet ready to discuss. She was not exactly pleased with his reticence, but she knew that there were some things she was probably better off not knowing. At least, not yet.

It was at that point that a clamorous disturbance erupted from the front of the building, with a cacophony of raised voices and a sharp clatter, followed by a series of wall-shaking thumps.

"What the hell?" she demanded, as she went racing out of Brian's office, only to come to a screeching halt at the sight that greeted her in the lobby.

Danny Boyle was the first person she saw, standing off to the side of the reception area, heavy-laden with a deep-pocketed leather carry-all strapped across one shoulder, bulging with whatever was concealed inside it; a large stretched canvas, heavily daubed with bright paint, dangling from his left hand; an easel held at an awkward angle in the other hand, and a sizeable Fender guitar case wedged under one arm. He was braced against the door frame of the small coffee alcove, barely managing to retain control of the assortment of articles, all limbs engaged, and his disheveled appearance was compounded by a big splotch of cerulean paint smeared across the front of his shirt, down one leg of his jeans, and ending in a spray of droplets that dappled one boot.

Still, to the astonishment of the group of spectators who had come hurrying out of Brian's office, he was smiling, his eyes, bright with amusement, focused on his companion.
And if Boyle, in this configuration, was a surprise, his companion was a revelation.

Cynthia turned to stare at Justin Taylor and discovered that, for perhaps the first time in her life, she couldn't think of a single thing to say.

Clad only in jeans and sneakers and a suspiciously familiar-looking Boss leather jacket that hung open to reveal that the torso beneath it was shirtless and smeared with a motley hodgepodge of vivid smears of paint, Justin was balanced in a classically perfect gymnast's handstand atop Garrett's desk, feet pointed and together, back gracefully arched, head back with golden blonde hair falling in a gleaming cap around his face - a face beaming with a bright, exuberant grin.

The spectators, as a group, seemed dumbfounded, until Emmett found his voice. "Justin? Honey? What . . ."

"If I could sing," answered the blond, wavering just slightly, "I'd be warbling something ridiculously rapturous, like . . . I don't know, like The Age of Aquarius or Pour Some Sugar on Me or Footloose or something equally euphoric - but I can't. Sing, that is. So I have to find another way. This is our way. This is the Taylor-Kinney way - or the Kinney-Taylor way, if you prefer."

"Way to what?" asked Emmett, still not entirely sure they weren't dealing with a case of early-onset dementia.

"To celebrate, of course." Justin's tone said that he found it ridiculous that anyone would even need to ask. "To express joy and wonder and a full heart. Streisand sings; Baryshnikov dances; Julia Child cooks; Tiger golfs. But the Taylor-Kinneys - they do handstands, and cartwheels. And paint, of course, but that's for later. Right now, they do this." So saying he gave a mighty push with his arms and twisted in mid-air to land on his feet, only to launch into a series of cartwheels across the lobby, while bellowing at the top of his lungs in a voice that was so off-key it was almost physically painful. "Do a little dance; make a little love; get down tonight; get down tonight."

* In the process, he managed to avoid doing any real damage, except for toppling one floor lamp, and came to a stop finally at the edge of a small seating area, where he appropriated a double handful of apples from a wooden bowl and began to toss them in the air.

"And juggle," he added. "That's what Taylor-Kinneys do." Then his smile blossomed into a huge grin. "I did warn you that I couldn't sing."

"Taylor . . . Kinneys?" Emmett was still dumbfounded, but at least, he was asking questions. Everybody else was still speechless. He turned to exchange puzzled looks with Lindsey, and silently mouthed the question again. "Taylor-Kinneys?"

But Lindsey had no answer to offer, being just as confused and disconcerted as everyone else.

Justin's grin grew wider still as he succeeded - for a short while - in keeping four apples in motion in the air. Then he looked over toward the small crowd that was still standing near the entrance to Brian's office, and spotted Cynthia in the middle of the group, and immediately understood the meaning of the strange, diffident smile that she was wearing. The apples fell to the floor, forgotten.

"I saw it," he said softly. "I saw what he did for me. And I know - I know - that he was the one who did it. Wasn't he?"

With a quick flick of her hand, Brian's assistant - and friend - managed to wipe away every trace of the tears that were welling from her eyes. "You do realize," she said, by way of an answer that was not - quite - an answer, "that we're talking about a man who wouldn't know the difference between a ball-peen hammer and a ballpoint pen?"
The sunshine smile grew brighter. "I don't care. I know he did it. Didn't he?"

She hesitated briefly, knowing full well that she was treading on dangerous ground. Then she nodded. "As much as possible - and in a manner of speaking - he did. He designed it, contracted the various stages of construction, even got some instruction to learn how to do some of the hands-on stuff himself. Then he furnished it - the seating unit is custom-made, according to his design - and arranged it all. It's completely private, Justin. So private that, as of now, there are only three people who've ever seen it completed, and one of them only because somebody had to go in to finish hanging the exhibits, after . . . well. Just after."

Justin walked forward, and clasped her hands with his own, pulling her close enough to drop a kiss on her forehead. "He really does, doesn't he?"

She studied his expression, and wondered if anyone among the individuals standing around them would understand what a breakthrough this moment represented. "You really didn't know?" It was a question, but only barely.

He closed his eyes briefly. "I was never sure if it was real, or if it was just that I wanted to believe it so badly that I convinced myself."

She nodded then. "Brian Kinney doesn't do anything by halves, Justin. Including giving his heart."

"So," he said softly, "how do I win him back?"

Her smile was gentle. "You never lost him. And, in one sense, you never will. But whether or not he'll ever again allow you to be a part of his life . . . that I don't know. As long as he believes that you're better off - not to mention safer - without him . . ."

He bit his lip then, and she could see the fear rising like storm clouds in his eyes. "How do I make him understand? How do I make him see that life without him is no life at all? Is not worth living."

She touched his face with her hand, and it was suddenly as if there were only the two of them in the room, as everyone else - everything else - faded into obscurity. "You take a page from the Kinney Operating Manual," she answered softly. "You refuse to take no for an answer."

He mustered up a rueful grin. "And he will say, 'No', won't he?"

She laughed. "I think you can count on that. Repeatedly, angrily, loudly, but . . ."

"But?"

"In the end, it'll all come down to one question. Do you love him enough to see it through? Because, when you get to the bottom line, he's not going to be able to walk away from you. Not if you're prepared to let him know that he's your life. That he's the only thing that keeps you breathing and waking up each day. But there's no way to fake that, Justin. Not with Brian. Because he may be an arrogant, narcissistic, self-absorbed bastard, but he knows you. Like no one else ever will, so you're never going to get away with lying to him."

"But he lies to me," he protested.

"Only when he believes that he has no choice, that he has to lie to protect you. You know that."

He nodded. But he was still worried, and Cynthia suppressed a sympathetic smile, reflecting that they all sometimes tended to forget just how young Justin still was, and just how much he still had to learn about the ways of the world - and the heart. "But in the end," he said, with a sigh, "there's no
"That's true," she admitted. "It really all comes down to how much you want him. You have to fight harder to keep him, than he fights to push you away. And you do know, I'm sure, that he sometimes fights dirty."

"Yeah. I know. That's the reason Chris McClaren is around, isn't it? He's part of Brian's dirty tricks campaign."

She sighed and looked away. "I think I've already said more than I should."

He went very still then, his eyes suddenly bright with understanding. "You weren't supposed to let me see it," he said softly. "I was never supposed to know."

Her smile was slightly rueful. "What do you think?"

He shook his head, unable to find the words to express his gratitude. "I can't believe what you did for me. What if he . . . can't . . ."

"If he can't - or won't - forgive me," she said firmly, "then I'll deal with it." Then her expression softened, and she smiled again. "But don't fool yourself, Honey. You're a lovely, sweet young man, but I didn't do it for you."

And that, he knew, was the truth. She had always been good to him; had always helped him when she could and sometimes gone out of her way to intervene on his behalf when Brian was channeling his diva/bastard persona. But the fundamental truth was irrevocable.

Cynthia's first and only true loyalty was to Brian Kinney. And that would never change, a fact she had just managed to prove, by risking everything to give him what she believed he really needed.

Justin would never forget it and would move heaven and earth to make sure that she did not pay too high a price for her actions, but the final decision, he knew, would not be his to make.

It would be Brian's choice.

It was at this point that the two of them suddenly remembered that they were not alone, and realized that they were being watched with fierce intensity. Emmett, of course, with Lindsey right beside him, was almost stomping his feet with impatience, champing at the bit to know what - exactly - these co-conspirators were discussing. But he - they - were going to have to accept that their curiosity would remain unsatisfied. For now, at least.

Brian's secret - his big, beautiful, fantastic, ridiculously romantic secret - would remain unshared among those who had no need to know, no matter how vehemently they might disagree.

For three members of the group, however, the conversation between Justin and Cynthia - intriguing as it was - was a secondary consideration. Though Mathis, Briggs, and Corey were curious, they were also distracted; they had more immediate concerns, and they maintained enough distance from the rest of the group to allow them to speak privately.

Corey received two brief phone calls during the lobby episode, and favored Mathis with a nod when the second one was completed.

"All set?" he asked.
Corey nodded. "Our Deep Throat is in place and eager to proceed."

"Not too eager, I hope," observed Sharon Briggs. "Hilliard gave you good intel, but operating in that kind of setting requires major skills, not to mention balls as big as melons."

Corey laughed. "Not to worry. We're covered - on both scores."

She closed her eyes for a moment, visualizing the 'Deep Throat' under discussion, and barely managed to suppress a smile. She would have to remember to tell Priscilla Young - AKA Prissy, AKA Deep Throat - about this conversation, particularly in regard to the size of her 'balls'.

"And the warrants?"

"Signed, sealed, delivered, and activated," Corey answered, eliciting a quick grin from the security chief, who knew just how difficult it was to get wiretap warrants from federal judges, especially when issues of journalistic confidentiality were involved.

"However, we have a more immediate concern," said the FBI agent, turning to regard Mathis with lifted eyebrow. "You have an in-house breach, Lance. What do you think we should do about it?"

Unlike many people, Mathis was not one to avoid responsibility or evade hard choices. Still, he knew this was a delicate area, involving old loyalties and elements of friendship. "I don't believe it was done with malice or deliberate intent."

"Well, that's comforting," snapped Briggs. "When we have to step up and confess that Kinney died on our watch, we'll be able to excuse our mistake by saying that the slip-up was just an accident. Without malice."

Corey ducked her head, refusing to grin at Briggs' snarky comment. But she didn't bother to suppress an eye-roll. "No deliberate intent, huh? So . . . what? Blatant stupidity at work?"

He shook his head. "I don't think so. Just thoughtlessness. Just a poor schmuck who doesn't have a clue what it is to be targeted, because he's spent his entire life hiding under the radar. Never deliberately provoking anybody. Never standing out."

"Granted," said Briggs, but there was a sharpness in her tone that suggested she was still struggling to contain an acid bath of anger. "But if this had gone unnoticed, we might very well have found ourselves with a dead victim and no idea where we screwed up. We were lucky, and I don't know about you guys, but I'm not at all comfortable with trusting in continued good fortune. So the question remains. How do we handle Schmidt?"

"Everybody was cautioned about talking out of turn," Corey pointed out. "So he can't claim that he didn't know better. This is certainly grounds for dismissal."

Mathis sighed. "Anywhere else, it probably would be. But the circumstances are a little bizarre. From what Hilliard told me, it's obvious that Peabody succeeded in making Ted believe that he already knew where Brian was."

Briggs frowned. "Can we at least manage to get that slime-ball fired for this?"

Corey smiled. "In good time, my friend. But we have to be careful. It wouldn't do to reveal that we're on to them. But Peabody will pay for his actions. I promise you that."

Briggs nodded, and contented herself with visualizing Monty Peabody's face when he found out that he was not only going to lose his job over his violation of confidentiality regulations, but that he might also face criminal charges for his part in the conspiracy. In this case, she thought she could agree with that old, oft-quoted Klingon proverb: revenge really was a dish best served cold.

"And Schmidt?" she asked finally. She was slightly astonished to realize that she felt some nuance of sympathy for the accountant, who had obviously been played. But the nuance was small in comparison to her resentment that the man had put Brian at risk by ignoring the protocols that had been established for his protection.

"I'll speak to him," said Mathis. "But I'm assuming that we still don't want anybody to know about our arrangements, so I'll have to approach him with discretion. I don't think it's a good idea to let him know that he was being watched." He fell silent for a moment, obviously weighing his options. "I'll handle it,"

Corey nodded. "See that you do, because . . ." She paused, and there was no misinterpreting the hard glitter in her eyes when she resumed speaking. "If it happens again, I'll take whatever actions I deem necessary to safeguard Mr. Kinney and the integrity of our investigation."

"Got a dungeon booked on standby?" asked Briggs. "Just in case."

Corey smiled. "We have our resources."

Mathis glanced from one smiling face to the other. "Remind me," he said softly, "never to piss the two of you off. I don't even want to imagine what kind of payback you could come up with if you put your heads together."

Corey's smile grew wider. "Just keep an eye on him. Maybe you're right to trust him, but I'm not so sure. So do yourself - and your boss - a favor, and hedge your bets."

Mathis frowned, an odd expression touching his face, before he nodded and excused himself, apparently intent on following through with whatever had just occurred to him.

Cynthia, having completed her discussion with Justin, chose that moment to approach, the expression on her face indicating that she had figured out that something was definitely up, although she obviously did not expect to be briefed on the matter. Instead, she confined her interest to a general request for reassurance. "Everything all right?"

Corey smiled, knowing that the woman certainly knew better, but also knew when to allow professionals the opportunity and the space to do what needed doing.

"Everything's fine," she replied.

The acting CEO of Kinnetik didn't even bother to try to hide her skepticism as she regarded the group with a venal little smile, but she elected to keep any additional comments to herself. For the moment.

"And now," said the FBI agent to the group at large, "if you'll all excuse me, I have a plane to catch. And again, I want to thank you for your cooperation. You have no idea how valuable your information could prove to be."

Cynthia smiled. "So, is the moment at hand?"

"It is." Corey took a deep breath. "And I confess that I don't know if I should be breathless with excitement, or quaking with fear."

It was Emmett who came up with the perfect response. "Actually, I'd recommend a little bit of both.
That way, you're prepared for whichever version of Brian Kinney he decides to let you see.”

The FBI agent couldn't quite decide whether to be amused or concerned, and it was perfectly obvious that everyone in the group understood exactly how she felt.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

The hotel suite was the epitome of elegant luxury, featuring period furniture and twelve-foot walls lined with raw silk the color of aged cognac, an Aubusson rug underfoot, twin Louis XVI giltwood settees with fawn-colored suede upholstery, and a fine-wrought silver tea service on the seasoned mahogany coffee table with its olive wood inlay design. On a crystal platter, an assortment of miniature beef Wellington

* hors d'oeuvres, tiny ramekins of escargots in garlic sauce, caviar canapés, and lobster scampi puffs was arranged to tempt the eye and the palate, while a sterling ice bucket offered a bottle of Krug Grande Cuvee.

Ted Schmidt was suitably impressed. He had always known that Marshall Hargrave, his old classmate from Wharton, would go far; even in his youth, the man had always had a singular, relentless drive to succeed, not to mention a blade-sharp intelligence, but it was doubtful that anyone could have predicted what a financial phenomenon he would prove to be. The Hargrave/Kraiden Fund had been the brightest star of international financial markets for the past six years, and entry into the stratospheric levels of its investment opportunities was by invitation only, and impossible to finagle. One was either asked to join, or one wasn't; there was no gray area in between.

Ted had, on occasion, fantasized about being invited into the fold, but he'd always known that it was unlikely. He really had never had the kind of money that would interest those who moved in Marshall's financial and social circles, or enjoyed his political connections.

On the other hand, Brian Kinney, riding the crest of his Kinnetik success, did have that kind of money, along with a growing reputation for influence, but, again, participation in this particular fund was not something one aspired to. One had to be asked.

He helped himself to a scrumptious bit of lobster scampi and barely managed to suppress a sigh of contentment. When Marshall had called to invite him to this little tête à tête, to discuss the possibility of offering Kinnetik an opportunity to participate in a new expansion within the Fund, Ted had almost refused the invitation, not entirely certain that he wasn't the butt of someone's malicious prank. He had seen his old acquaintance from time to time through the years, once at a class reunion, occasionally at alumni functions, and once at a dinner to honor a retiring professor emeritus who had been a faculty adviser to both of them during their senior year, but their conversations had always been confined to polite, impersonal exchanges with no real connection. Or so he'd always believed.

But apparently, Marshall had been paying closer attention than he'd let on. Apparently he'd noticed that Ted had been very clever and successful in handling his stewardship of Brian's money; clever enough, at any rate, to warrant this invitation and to merit an opportunity to win himself a place among the pantheon of the rich and famous. For Brian, of course. He needed to remember that, while it might be his expertise that had earned the notice of his sophisticated associates, it was Brian's money that would pay the tab.

Still, this was a moment to savor - an acknowledgement of his skill and his expertise, an accolade from his peers.

He glanced at the antique ormolu clock on the mantle and noted that he'd been waiting more than thirty minutes for his meeting, even though he'd been careful to arrive precisely on time for his appointment. But busy successful people didn't exactly punch time clocks; he knew that. God knows, the mighty Kinney had kept him waiting often enough, and usually for no reason except that he'd gotten distracted, by an idea, or a phone call - or a hot piece of ass (all too frequently). So he'd smiled when Marshall's lovely, Prada-clad secretary had shown him into the suite's parlor, and indicated that he should help himself to refreshment until Mr. Hargrave, who was currently in conference with another client, managed to join him.

If the thought occurred to him that it was really quite rude to schedule a meeting and then leave one's invited guest to cool his heels for an indeterminate period of time, he chose not to dwell on it.

It was another ten minutes before there was a murmur of voices beyond the set of double doors at the rear of the sitting room, and two individuals emerged, still deep in discussion about an upcoming performance at the local concert hall.

Marshall Hargrave was escorting an elegantly-attired older woman who was wearing a saucer-sized emerald broach on the shoulder of her classic Chanel jacket. "I don't care where you're supposed to be in September, Marshall. You cannot miss this," she was saying. "The young woman singing Mimi was an understudy of Angela Gheorghiu in London. Claudia Moreno is her name, and she's quite spectacularly wonderful."

"Ah," said Ted, rising to his feet. "The new performance of La Bohème. I can hardly wait."

Virginia Hammond paused and regarded the accountant with cold, narrowed eyes. "And you are?"

"Ted!" exclaimed Hargrave, as he came forward with right hand extended. "How wonderful to see you! Virginia, Darling, this is Ted Schmidt, an old friend of mine. We went to Wharton together."

Ms. Hammond - former wife of deceased pickle baron, George Schickel - inclined her head slightly, in a manner not unlike one that Queen Victoria might have affected. "You're an opera afficionado, Mr. Schmidt?" she asked, obviously just making small talk.

"Oh, indeed I am," he answered. "In fact, you and I met several years ago, at a presentation of Aïda, if I recall correctly. That was before your husband passed away, I believe."

"How lovely!" she replied, with undisguised condescension.

"Yes, Virginia," Hargrave interjected. "Ted is here to discuss becoming a member of our little financial empire. On behalf of his employer, of course."

"And who would that be?"

Ted took a deep breath, sensing that this would be a potential moment of truth. "Brian Kinney. Owner of Kinnetik Corporation."

Virginia was a real pro; he'd give her that. The only thing that betrayed her was a tiny twitch of her left eyebrow. Otherwise, she gave no indication that she recognized the name. "And what - exactly - is Kinnetik Corporation?"

"Why, where have you been keeping yourself, Dear Girl?" asked Hargrave. "It's only the fastest growing, most fabulously successful advertising agency in Pittsburgh. Simply everyone is talking about it."

Virginia turned to stare at Hargrave for a moment, obviously picking up on something in his tone that gave her pause. "Really?" she said finally, before turning back to Ted. "I wonder . . . this might be a very fortuitous coincidence, Mr. Schmidt. You're obviously aware of my association with Schickel Hall, and it just happens that we're currently looking for a new agency to promote our next series of productions. The firm that's worked for us in the past has been, shall we say, less than impressive."
We're going to be presenting a series of four Puccini works, starting in late summer.

"Beginning with La Boheme, I take it," replied Ted, getting excited in spite of his determination to remain unimpressed. "I saw Claudia Morreno in La Traviata in Philadelphia last year. She's unbelievably talented."

"Yes," agreed Ms. Hammond. "She certainly is. So, can I assume that your agency would be interested in taking on this promotion? Would you like to make an appointment with our chief administrator, to submit a proposal?"

More than anything he'd ever wanted in his life, Ted wanted to respond, to agree immediately and enthusiastically to her suggestion, but he couldn't quite bring himself to ignore the warning voice that was screaming in his mind, the one that reminded him that he would have to check with Cynthia before making any commitments - that he was hamstrung by the limitations Brian had imposed on him and the necessity to function under her oversight. "Uhhh, can I get back to you on that?" he asked finally. "I'll need to check our schedule with our art director, to make sure we can give your project the attention it deserves."

"Oh," she said coldly. "I see. Well, I had assumed that you'd have the authority to make a commitment. But if you can't . . ."

"Of course, I can," he said sharply. "I just find it simplifies the management process when one employs discretion in handling human resources. It pays to keep the support staff in the loop, especially in dealing with artistic types, if you know what I mean."

This time, the woman's smile actually contained a trace of warmth, as Hargrave retrieved her mink wrap from a small entry closet. "Yes indeed. One must avoid bruising those fragile egos. Correct?"

Ted nodded, beaming his agreement. "I'll just double-check our schedule, and give you a call, shall I?"

"Oh, not me, Dear," she answered, turning to allow Marshall Hargrave to drape her fur around her shoulders. "I only deal with the artistic and social aspects of our little venue. I leave the commercial end of things to those better suited to it. You may call the theater office number any time, and ask for Jonathon Croft. And I'll just let him know to expect your call, shall I?"

Hargrave favored her with a brilliant smile. "Wonderful, Virginia. And I'm delighted that you're pleased with our final arrangements."

"Oh, yes, Marshall," she replied. "Making money always pleases me, although I do dislike having to deal with the unpleasant details. I trust we're done here?"

"Completely. And let me just say that it's always a pleasure doing business with you."

The slim, stylish secretary appeared then, apparently having been loitering in the hallway, awaiting the right moment to make her entrance and escort Ms. Hammond down to the reserved area where her car and driver were waiting.

In the wake of her departure, Marshall Hargrave favored Ted with a wink and a broad smile. "Another satisfied customer," he observed, before gesturing for Ted to resume his seat. "Champagne?" he asked, seating himself and taking the napkin-wrapped bottle of Krug from its icy niche.

Ted hesitated. He had not touched a drop of alcohol since his emergence from rehab and knew that he should decline without a second thought. But how, he wondered, did one graciously reject a serving of a vintage that probably cost $300.00 a bottle. "I really shouldn't," he said finally.

"Oh, don't be silly. Of course you should. What better reason to indulge a bit, than two old friends embarking on a new venture together?" The broker's smile was brilliant, and Ted suddenly felt a bit uneasy, wondering why the expression reminded him just slightly of the predatory grin of a PR professional closing in on a vulnerable target.

He shook off the feeling, chiding himself for an overactive imagination, and, assuring himself that he would take one glass, and only one glass, he accepted the crystal flute that the broker handed him, and raised it in a little off-hand tribute. "To new ventures," he said with a diffident smile.

Hargrave mirrored the gesture. "So, Teddie," he said slowly, after taking a long swallow of the lovely amber wine, "are you ready to play in the big leagues? And, coincidentally, to become a very rich man in the process?"

Ted hesitated. He could not deny that the idea of making a great deal of money, of becoming rich in his own right, was enormously appealing. In the checkered course of his past, he had been quite rich at one time; he'd also been dead broke, and, in the final analysis, he could only agree - wholeheartedly - with Mae West. Rich was better. And this would be a golden opportunity for him, for although the bulk of the investment he would be making would be Kinnetik money - Brian Kinney's money - he would also tack on every dime he could scrape together from his own personal funds. So yes, he could wind up a very rich man, indeed. But he realized, to his surprise, that getting rich - pleasant as the prospect might be - was not the real objective here. He wanted to make Brian rich; well, rich-er anyway; but, above all, he wanted Brian to know, to understand, that it was him - Theodore Schmidt, AKA the schmuck - who had come through for him, in a way no one else ever had.

He wanted Brian to acknowledge him as a savior, a hero, a valued associate - a best friend.

But he also knew that he had to be careful for, as grateful and appreciative as Brian would be if Ted succeeded, the intensity of his approval would probably not hold a candle to the degree of Brian's fury and thirst for revenge should he fail.

"Marshall," he said slowly, "I can't tell you how grateful I am for this opportunity. But you must understand that I have to be very cautious here. You don't know Brian Kinney at all - a fact for which you should probably be grateful - but let me assure you that he does not suffer fools gladly. This is a huge step for me, and I dare not take big risks with his investments. One of the primary factors in managing his portfolio has always been maintaining diversity, and making sure that he's not over-exposed in any one area. If I risk . . ."

"Teddie," Marshall interrupted, sitting back and regarding his old acquaintance with a level look, "I truly understand your concerns. And I certainly recognize the wisdom of your financial oversight. But I know you well enough to be certain that you didn't come here unprepared. You've looked into our history, investigated our market performance. Surely you realize that, for almost seven years, we've outperformed almost every other investment fund in the world. Consistent double-digit gains, year after year. Even, in some cases, month after month. What could you possibly have to worry about?"

Ted shrugged slightly. "Your minimum investment requirement is pretty steep."

The broker frowned. "Does that mean that I've been misinformed? Can your Mr. Kinney not come up with the necessary funds?"

Ted grinned. "He's not my Mr. Kinney."
"Really?" Hargrave took a sip of champagne. "Forgive me, but I thought . . . you are still . . ."

"Gay?" Ted's voice was surprisingly sharp. "Yes, Marshall. I'm still a cocksucker. Is that . . ."

Hargrave raised his hands. "Ted, please," he said dismissively. "There's no need to get defensive. I don't give a rat's ass what - or who - you suck, although I'd have to have been dead or comatose not to have heard about the notorious Brian Kinney. I'm sorry that I jumped to conclusions. But it's really immaterial. If I was misinformed, and he can't come up with the minimal investment, then . . ."

"I didn't say that," Ted interrupted, helping himself to a bite of beef Wellington to buy a little time. But only a little. "I'd need to rearrange some accounts, but the cash is available. Still, $2,000,000 upfront is a pretty sizeable investment, so I just . . . I think I need a little time to think this through. To make sure . . ."

"I understand completely." The PR smile was back in place, as Hargrave popped a canapé into his mouth. "But you must keep in mind that this is an opportunity that won't be available for long. We've only just decided to expand our operation into this new market, and the number of new investors we're prepared to take on is limited. It was only due to our longstanding friendship that I wanted to let you in on the ground floor, so to speak. So I'd advise you not to think for too long, because, once the word is out, we're probably going to be inundated with more clients than we can handle. I'd hate to see you - and Kinney - miss out on a golden opportunity because of being overly cautious."

Ted blinked, and was suddenly swept up in a very old fragment of memory - a recollection of a conversation overheard between Marshall Hargrave and one of his frat-boy bosom buddies back in college, a conversation that Ted had not been meant to hear, when Marshall had described Ted and his friend, Glenn Parrish, as being "as timid as field mice". He didn't remember the circumstances that had prompted the conversation, but he did remember feeling hurt and diminished for a long time before he'd finally managed to put the incident out of his mind. He wondered briefly why he was remembering it now.

As timid as field mice. Or, in other words, overly cautious.

He rose abruptly, a spark of new resolve gleaming in his eyes. "I need to make some phone calls," he said firmly, "but I should have final confirmation for you tomorrow. Soon enough?"

Hargrave's grin barely avoided smugness, and Ted felt a rush of satisfaction. When all was said and done, he would prove himself to be a man of bold action, the antithesis of that stereotypical timid little mouse; at the same time, he would prove the validity of another old adage - the one concerning he who laughs last.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Sunlight is dangerous. It causes skin cancer. You should really haul your ass inside, and . . .

Brian grinned beneath the shelter of the sunhat that shaded his face as he stretched out against the deep cushions of the lounge chair at the edge of the deck. He knew that his thoughts were unarguably true. But he also knew that his skin was particularly beautiful when it was sun-kissed. Someone - he didn't really want to remember who - had once called him a bronze Adonis when he was wearing the kind of perfect golden glow that was unspoiled by tan lines.

Like the one he was cultivating now. Except for his face, of course, and the areas of his body that were concealed under swaths of snowy bandages.

Bronze Adonis - with splotches.
He found he didn't care much for that imagery.

"You're going to burn," said a disinterested voice.

"I never burn."

"Maybe not in Pittsburgh, with its watered-down version of sunshine," came the response, threaded with a soft whicker of laughter. "But this is not Pittsburgh. This is the South, and the sun here will fry your pretty little ass before you can whistle Dixie."

Brian grinned again. "Glad you noticed."

McClaren snorted. "I'm in survival-mode - not blind."

Brian opened his eyes, and lifted his hat in order to look up and meet the FBI agent's gaze - a look filled with equal parts resistance and desire - and he didn't turn away when McClaren leaned forward to claim his lips in a bruising kiss. No one else, except the medical team who was treating him, had been allowed to see his face without the concealment of bandages; no one else had been privileged to examine the extent of the damage done to him. Only McClaren. Brian still didn't know why he'd decided to allow the FBI agent full access. He also didn't know why McClaren did not seem to be disturbed by the mutilation.

It had bothered Brian at first; still did, sometimes, that he'd decided to suspend his moratorium - mostly self-imposed - on mouth-kissing, with McClaren, of all people. (And Michael, of course, to whom it had never really applied.) It was especially worrisome in that it had lead to nothing more than a couple of frustrating make-out sessions. Sexually frustrating, for both of them, as neither had succeeded in pretending that there was no interest in taking their physical interaction to the next level.

There was plenty of interest, but neither could overcome a growing certainty that physical intimacy between them would carry deadly risks - that it was entirely possible that neither would survive the experience unscathed.

Still, the kissing was addictive. Almost irresistible.

"You're the biggest fucking tease I've ever had the misfortune to meet," McClaren observed, his eyes sweeping down Brian's sculpted body to linger on the strong swell of a perfect cock, currently at half-mast and rising.

"Au contraire, mon amis," Brian retorted. "What you see is what you get. You just have to have the balls to reach out and grab it."

With a sigh, McClaren retrieved a towel from a nearby chair and dropped it across the beautiful temptation of Brian's crotch. "Your physical therapist should be here any minute. I assume you don't want to give the woman a heart attack her first day on the job."

"Why do I get a 'her'? Why not a 'him', with beautiful pecs and perfect abs and . . ."

"Because that's not the kind of physical therapy you need right now."

McClaren's grin was more than a little venal.

"Bullshit!" Brian's expression was mocking, as he reached up and wrapped his fingers in the collar of the FBI agent's denim shirt and pulled just hard enough to bring that exquisite face down to a spot just inches away. "I think a good blow-job would really take the edge off. Make me eager to please."

McClaren chuckled. "You've never been 'eager to please' in your entire fucking life. In fact, you don't give a shit if you please - or not." He paused then, his eyes moving inch by inch over the surface of Brian's face, and, obviously hesitant, he lifted his hand and traced his fingers down across patches of flawless skin between areas still bruised and swollen and distorted with stitches. "It's extraordinary, you know," he said after a while, as Brian went very still under the exploration of gentle fingers. "I think you better pledge your firstborn . . . okay, okay, your second . . . to Turnage, or make him your primary heir or something, because the man is a fucking miracle worker. I hate to admit it, but I would have bet my pension that no one would ever be able to patch you up like this. It's amazing what he's done in such a short time." He sighed, then smiled. "The scars and bruises are fading, the muscles are healing, and you're going to break hearts again, Brian. By the time Turnage is done with you, you're going to be more beautiful than ever."

Then he looked down and stared at the narrow stripe of blistered, discolored skin that stretched across the area below Brian's rib cage. "Except for that. Are you really not going to . . ."

"Yeah. I'm really not going to."

"But why? You know you're pissing him off, that he says he can fix it so . . ."

"I know what he said, and I know what he can do."

"Then why?"

This time the smile was diffident, almost bittersweet. "Because sometimes a man needs a souvenir, a reminder of how things came to be."

"Don't you think you'd be better off putting it behind you? Forgetting it?"

"Been there, done that," Brian replied. "That's how I lived my life, for a long time. In the end, it didn't work very well, did it? The past is always with you, whether you choose to think about it or not."

McClaren straightened up and spent another moment staring down into a face that was well on its way to being as perfect, as breathtaking as it had been before the attack. Almost. One more procedure, according to Dr. Turnage, and there would be only faint, almost invisible traces to indicate the extent of the original damage. Physically, anyway. McClaren wasn't so sure that the mental and emotional scars would be so easy to erase, but Kinney, typically, was not going to allow anyone to get inside his defenses in order to explore such potential weaknesses. Not without extraordinary efforts, anyway.

The FBI agent helped himself to a Marlboro from the open pack on a nearby table and continued his visual exploration of Brian's body. Bandages still obscured an area low on his torso, extending around to the top of his hip, and there was still work to be done on the extremities - a plate in the left hand to be surgically removed once the physical healing was complete, and therapy to regain full motion and strength in the right leg which was still encased in a walking cast. Plus a course of moderate traction to eliminate potential spinal problems would still be necessary, but, all in all, it appeared that Brian would eventually be fully restored.

Physically.

He wished he could stop qualifying his observations about the man's recovery. He wished he could believe that there would be no residual effects.

Above all, he wished he didn't care, one way or another.

"I'm going to check with Randy at the gate," he said, enjoying the bitter tang of the smoke in his throat as he turned to gaze out across the bay to watch a flock of sea birds wheeling and twisting in the ocean breeze. "I'll make sure he knows he's supposed to let your therapist in. Then I'm going to walk the perimeter. Maybe I'll go out to the lighthouse, and spy on you with a telescope."

Brian laughed. "How ridiculously romantic!"

"Roll over on your stomach, and I'll oil your back."

Brian did as he was told, although his movements were still awkward and without his customary grace, impeded by the stiffness of injuries not fully healed. Yet he knew, once he was positioned flat on his belly that he presented a fetching view for his observer, and couldn't suppress the urge to offer a taunting remark. "You just can't resist any opportunity to get your hands on my ass."

With an answering smirk, McClaren straddled Brian's thighs, careful to avoid settling his weight against the body beneath him, but not bothering to avoid the sweet sensation of skin to skin contact.

Brian laughed, and the FBI agent pretended that he didn't feel the urge to do the same.

Kinney was a bastard, and the most intriguing, addictive, captivating individual McClaren had ever known. And trouble, of course. That was a given.

McClaren poured out a generous portion of tanning oil in the hollow at the small of Brian's back and proceeded to massage it into golden skin, noting as his hands moved that the muscles under his fingers were more relaxed than they'd been in days past. Initially, Brian had shown some measure of resistance to the FBI agent's touch, a tension that almost certainly indicated an unavoidable lack of trust and an innate inability to relax, but that resistance seemed to be dissolving, and McClaren wasn't entirely sure that was a good thing - for either of them.

He knew - and he was pretty sure Brian knew as well. Any prolonged contact between them - especially involving any kind of emotional intimacy - might very well be toxic.

He leaned forward then, dropped an open-mouthed kiss at the tender spot where long, slender neck joined broad shoulder, and managed a quick slap to that exquisite ass as he rose. "Back later," he muttered, and made his departure, deliberately ignoring an urge to spend a few breathless moments gazing at the feast laid out before him. It simply wouldn't do to allow himself to dwell on what he'd like to do to that luscious skin, that supple body, that perfect mouth.

For his part, Brian simply nestled more comfortably into the cushions beneath him, cradling his face against his folded arms, and enjoyed the sensation of the sun's warmth against his body - and refused to think about what else he'd have liked to feel against his body.

He lay still, listening to the distant cry of shore birds and let himself drift, caressed by the gentle strokes of warm spring air and serenaded by the seductive rhythm of the surf breaking against the shoreline. He knew that he should be wary, that McClaren's observation about the quality of southern sunlight was almost certainly true and that he would suffer an uncomfortable sunburn if he lingered too long here. But it was still spring, and the warmth of the light on his back - so radically different from what he would have encountered on his own rooftop terrace in the Pitts - felt wonderful enough for him to take the risk of lingering just a bit longer.

So he nestled down more deeply against his cushions and took a deep cleansing breath and concentrated on not thinking of anything beyond the sensation, the pleasant drift of this moment and the gentle ambiance of the music rising from the IPod on a nearby table.

"All my thoughts just seem to settle on the breeze,
When I'm lying wrapped up in your arms;
The whole world just fades away.
The only thing I hear is the beating of your heart.
'Cause I can feel you breathe; it's washing over me.
Suddenly I'm melting into you." **

Until . . .

"So . . . how good is he?"

Fuck!

"You can lie there with your head up your ass - or not - but it won't change anything. So why don't you turn over and face me. And answer my question. Is he as good as me?"

Brian, stubbornly, refused to open his eyes. "I only do upgrades. You should know that by now." If he didn't look, didn't see, maybe he'd be able to get through whatever was at hand without giving in to any ridiculous lesbianic urges.

"Uh, huh! So he's that good? The performance lives up to the package."

"I think I just answered that. What are you doing here?"

"Waiting to see if you have the guts to face me."

Brian swallowed the sigh that rose in his throat, and pushed himself up and around into a semi-recumbent position to stare up at the slender figure standing between him and the flaming globe of the setting sun. "Okay. I'm facing you. Now, what do you want?"

Except that he wasn't - exactly - facing his visitor. He had deliberately shaded his eyes and kept them focused at about knee-level, noting that the jeans that filled his vision were familiar, easily identified by a rip at mid-shin on the left side, and a string of paint dots - Alizarin crimson, he was pretty sure - on the right.

"I want," said that voice - that completely unforgettable voice - as the visitor moved closer, "you to put your hand down, and look at me. Let me see your eyes - your face."

But Brian was shaking his head. "Nothing here that you want to see. Trust me."

"Why?" The calm tone of the voice was trembling now, receding before an onrush of impatience, of anger. "Because it's not the same face it used to be? Because you think I can't handle the idea of an imperfect Brian Kinney? Let me tell you something, Mr. Kinney. You were never . . ."

"I know." And the voice was cold and sharp and without a nuance of tenderness or remorse. "I've heard it before, you know. But the last time you said that to me, I was too weak and too tired and too damaged to stand up and fight back. Now . . . I'm not."

Two quick steps, and refusing to look into the beloved face framed by that mop of blond hair was no longer an option, as Justin flopped down on the cushion at Brian's side, his hip pushing against Brian's thigh with no wiggle-room between them. "I'm gonna kill Cynthia," Brian murmured.

"No, you're not. Because she didn't tell me where to find you. She didn't have to."

Brian's eyes felt scalded, almost blistered by the intense liquid glow of the late afternoon sun. "Meaning what exactly?"
"Meaning I will always find you. You'll never manage to hide from me."

"I'm not hiding."

A pale hand, fine, transparent hairs standing on end under the coolness of a breath of wind, lifted and traced the line of Brian's jaw, as blue eyes examined every square inch of exposed skin. "Yes, you are, but it won't do any good. Not with me."

Brian jerked his head back and regarded Justin with cold eyes. "Not with you? Who the fuck do you think you are anyway? Why would you . . ." Quickly, the fingers moved and clasped themselves against Brian's mouth, stifling his words in mid-protest.

"I'm the one," said Justin, leaning close to whisper in Brian's ear, "who knows your secret identity."

Fuck! The little twat was even resorting to that lowest of all low tricks - stealing Brian's own best lines.

Then Justin moved to replace his hand with his lips and claim the mouth that was still clinched tight, resisting every urge to let go, to open to that insistent tongue thrusting and demanding entry, to allow itself to be claimed.

Brian would not - could not - simply give in and allow Justin to slip back into his life, back into his arms, back into the place that would put him in a position where people would want to kill him, where the simple fact of being a part of Brian's existence could cost him his life. So he pushed back violently, and closed his eyes, pouring all his grief, all his frustrations, all his pain into one snarled response. "I - don't - want - you - here. Get away from me, you little shit!"

He went silent then, as he felt the body beside him shift and pull away, but he was careful to keep his eyes closed. He had watched Justin walk away from him a lot of times in the course of his life; he didn't know if he had it in him to watch it again, even though he knew it was absolutely the right thing - the vitally necessary thing - for the young man to do.

He waited for a moment, hearing nothing but silence, and actually dared to think that he might be safe.

Until he felt a softness against the side of his throat, a warm breath, a single word.

"No."

He found that he was struggling to breathe then, to form the words he knew he had to say. "I don't want you." It was barely a whisper.

He clasped his hands in front of his face and fought against an almost irresistible compulsion to look up, to see that beautiful, beloved face one last time.

When he heard it, he thought, at first, that he must be imagining it, that it could not possibly be real. It was very faint, barely there, almost beyond hearing, but it was unmistakable nonetheless. Justin was laughing at him. "Yes," said that voice, filled with certainty and - unbelievably - with joy. "You do."

It was finally too much, so he leapt to his feet and moved swiftly toward the steps that would lead him down to the sand, to escape, to freedom. But then he realized . . .
He looked down and noted that his body was whole, unblemished, unbandaged, undamaged, unscarred, and that he was moving with an ease and strength that he had not felt in a very long time. Then he turned and looked back, to the spot where a slender, exquisitely beautiful body should have been standing, only to find a faint shimmer, as of a vision fading into nothingness, a pale shadow of a memory.

Fuck!

And he felt a sudden ridiculous urge to shout out his anger and his frustration, because he had been forced to confront what he did not want to see, and because now, he could see it no longer.

"Well," said a strange voice, almost droll, almost laughing, "they told me you were unconventional, but I had no idea I should take the warning so literally."

Brian stiffened and opened his eyes to find that he was still lying on his belly, with his face braced against his arms and his bare ass enjoying the sensual warmth of the sunlight, transitioning now to a very slight sting, thus fulfilling McClaren's snarky prophecy.

"You're late," he said to the not-so-young lady therapist in her smart suit and her sensible shoes, with a chic coif of salt and pepper hair and night-dark eyes. He gleaned all that in a quick glimpse, as he was not really interested enough to expend much energy in an evaluation of her appearance; she was, after all, not his type. He was also no more concerned with concealing his shitty attitude than hiding the perfect globes of his butt, although, if pressed, he would have been hard put to determine if he was angry because the woman had been late enough to allow him to fall asleep and drift into the dream he had not wanted to have, or if he was merely irritated that she had shown up when she did, interrupting his reluctant fantasy.

"Sorry," said the woman in a tone that held not a nuance of apology. "I didn't realize that I was expected."

"Well, you were." He saw no reason to try to fake an amiable attitude. "So, if it's not too much trouble, could you hand me my cane so I can get my sunburned ass out of harm's way?"

He twisted then and attempted to swing himself up, to get to his feet, but a sudden, piercing pain in his lower back caught him by surprise and forced him to give up the attempt and sink back against the chair cushions, as he bit his lip to control an urge to groan and indulge in a recitation of his extensive stock of colorful expletives. He put his head down and closed his eyes against the rise of tears, knowing, from past experience, that his only option was to ride it out, to wait for it to pass and . . .

The strong, capable hands that slid into place and gripped his lower back surprised him as did the immediate relief he felt when pressure was applied in exactly the right spot to ease his discomfort. Although he hadn't spared much attention to the woman who had interrupted his dream, she had not struck him as a particularly strong or resourceful individual, but he was glad to be proven wrong.

"Let's get you inside," she said, retrieving his cane and using her own body to leverage him up until he was able to stand, "and into some pants."

Despite his discomfort, he dredged up a grin. "Now that's a request I don't hear very often."

She let her eyes drift down his body, savoring the sight for just a moment, before flashing him a roguish smile. "I'm sure you don't, Honey, but I'm betting that you might be ready for a little pain management"
She nodded toward the small box on the table by the door as they moved into the house. "Probably best to cover the family jewels before you light up."

He allowed her to help him to a seat on a sturdy massage table that McClaren had set up in the den during their first days in the beach house, and favored her with a smile that did not quite manage to disguise the degree of his discomfort.

"You don't have to pretend with me," she said firmly. "I know pain when I see it. Stretch out on that table and let's see if we can't fix you up."

"I thought you wanted me to put my pants on," he mumbled, holding his breath against the relentless throbbing in his back.

"I think I can restrain myself."

If he hadn't been so focused on riding out the waves of agony, he thought as he stretched out on his belly, he would probably have laughed at the wry quality of her comment.

But right now, he was too busy trying not to notice how much his frigging back was hurting. He shifted to arrange his limbs to ease the pressure on his spine but without much luck, and he was on the verge of voicing his impatience with her failure to step up and do something to alleviate the problem when he noticed a familiar and very welcome aroma in the air.

"Here you go," she said as she handed him the smoldering joint, tightly and expertly rolled.

He was quick to accept it and indulge himself in a long, deep inhalation, telling himself that it was ridiculous to think that his pain was easing up even as he exhaled, but that's how it felt, nonetheless.

"I thought you clinical types didn't appreciate the merits of a good toque," he said, reveling in the first warm surge of the forthcoming rush.

"I'm not - exactly - a clinical type," she volunteered in a tone that piqued his curiosity, but not enough to inspire him to question further, as she placed her hands against his shoulders and began a deep, penetrating massage to which he responded with an almost feline grace, like the luxuriation of a tabby under the strokes of a master's hand. He was, in fact, close to purring. In a matter of seconds, between the euphoria inspired by the excellent weed and the expertise of the hands working the kinks out of his muscles, he was virtually boneless with a pleasure so profound it was almost as satisfying as good sex.

Almost.

"Good stuff, huh?" she asked, as she noted how his body was relaxing under her efforts.

He sighed. "My source is very well connected."

"Medical supplier?"

"No. Law enforcement."

He did not notice that the woman made a funny little huffing sound as she continued to work on his back.

"They really did a number on you, didn't they?" she said after a while. "Why would anybody . . ."

"I'm a fag," he snapped. "For some people, that's enough."
She was slow to answer, as if thinking it over. "Did you just come out or something?" she asked finally. "I mean . . . why now? You go out of your way to piss somebody off?"

This time it was his turn to take his time in answering. "Maybe."

More silence as she continued to work on his back, and he continued to grow more and more relaxed. "It almost sounds as if you think you had it coming."

She expected him to deny it, to argue. But he didn't. He simply finished his joint, and concentrated on breathing through the last remnants of his pain.

Neither of them spoke for a while, until he turned his head and took a good look, for the first time, at the cut of the raw silk jacket she was wearing - pretty expensive threads for a physical therapist. If there was one thing Brian Kinney knew - aside from how to give and receive mind-blowing sex - it was labels. And he could smell Armani a mile away.

"Nice jacket," he said softly.

There was only the faintest beat of hesitation in her movements, but it was enough. For a man so recently and severely injured, he demonstrated remarkable prowess when he swung away from her touch and managed to get to his feet and put the massage table and several yards of space between them.

"Who the fuck are you?" he demanded.

She smiled. "Well, finally. I was beginning to wonder if you possessed even a smidgen of survival instinct. You know, if I'd been an assassin - or just a thug bent on burglarizing your house and stealing whatever I could get my hands on - you'd probably be dead by now."

"No. He wouldn't."

Alexandra Corey spun around, her hand automatically reaching for the automatic weapon concealed in a shoulder holster under her jacket, only to find that she was already out-gunned, as she came face-to-face with Chris McClaren and his Beretta 92FS.

"Jesus, Chris!" she snapped. "You're lucky I didn't blow your head off."

He grinned. "You wouldn't do that. You've got way too much class to shoot first and ask questions later."

"So how long . . ."

"I saw you arrive," he interrupted, "so I circled around and came in the back. Didn't want to interrupt your cozy little assignation."

Her frown was almost stern enough to compensate for the faint twinkle in her eyes. "You do realize that, for some of our colleagues, the act of drawing a gun on me would be considered grounds for termination."

He grinned and spun the gun around to display the fact that the safety was still engaged and that the clip was missing, resting in his other hand. "Just pointing out that Brian wasn't the only one who wasn't paying attention."

She was not quite quick enough to cover up a tiny gasp of astonishment as she realized that he was right.
During this exchange, Brian was staring back and forth between the two agents, and neither of them had noticed, until the moment when they turned around to look at him when he took a step toward the door, that he was, by that time, engulfed in an almost visible aura of pure, unadulterated rage.

"Brian, what . . ."

"Shut the fuck up," snapped the man who was their sole reason for being here in the first place. "But first, you tell me who the fuck this is."

"Calm down," said McClaren. "This is my boss, the one I told you about. Alexandra Corey, meet . . . ."

"Very funny. You guys are a real riot. Thanks so much for making me the butt of your joke."

So saying, Brian spun, grabbed a pair of sweat pants from a corner and struggled into them, before heading toward the door, moving much more quickly than either of his observers might have expected.

"Brian, wait. Let me . . ."

"Let you what?" Brian did not turn back to face them, but McClaren didn't have to see his expression to recognize the fury that filled his voice with shards of ice. "Help me? I think you've already helped plenty."

"Brian, I . . ."

"I thought I could trust you." He paused for a fraction of a second at the door, the muscles in his back knotted with tension. "Thanks for reminding me of what I let myself forget."

And he was gone, through the door and out into the twilight that was now rapidly settling toward true darkness.

"Oh, shit!" McClaren lifted a trembling hand to rub the back of his neck. "Oh, shit!"

"Bit of a diva, isn't he?" asked Corey. "Maybe you should . . . ."

"What I should have done," he snapped, "was remembered what I'm supposed to be doing here, and how hard it was to get him to trust me in the first place. Jesus, Alex, you have no idea what he's been through, what he's still going through. You think he's a diva? Shit! I think he's the bravest man I've ever known, and I don't think I could blame him if he never trusted me again. So don't assume you have the right . . . ."

She lifted her hands to forestall the diatribe, and simply regarded him with thoughtful eyes. "In that case, why are you still standing here?"

He knew he could not expect to remain hidden for long. The moon was almost full, and it was a clear night, and the sand in which he sat was too white and sugary to provide much concealment. Still, he had settled in between a couple of small dunes, laced with tufts of sea grass, as much to achieve some measure of shelter from the night wind that was gusting in off the water as to obscure his presence.

For a little while, he had debated just walking away, just going on and on until he came to a place where he could lose himself in some coastal village or among groups of beachcombers. But that wouldn't really do him any good. Unless he wanted to risk exposure, being found.

He wasn't sure that wasn't exactly what he wanted.

But he also wasn't sure that it was.

He quickly rolled a new joint, glad that he had managed to snag both his stash and his IPOD as he'd raced out of the beach house. The warmth of the afternoon was slowly bleeding away into the darkness as he nestled more deeply into the sand, grateful for the residual heat it retained, and cupped his hands around the glow of the joint to take advantage of its tiny flare of light and heat.

Soon it would be too cold to stay here, but he didn't know if he could stand to go back to the house.

He felt like a fool. It was incongruous that Brian Kinney, the man who'd hardly ever granted his trust to anybody, had been so easily duped. By a handsome face, a sculptured body, and a fine, shapely ass.

Fuck!

It just didn't bear thinking about, so he didn't. He simply settled more deeply into his sandy niche and let himself float on the sweet alternative version of Coltrane's super mellow I'll Wait and Pray.

He didn't bother to look at his watch, but, by his estimation, it took about twenty minutes before he became aware of a dark, slender figure standing atop a shallow dune at his back.

Neither of them spoke for quite a while, and Brian didn't even bother to turn around and acknowledge the presence of the new arrival. But there was communication between them, nonetheless, as McClaren was obviously watching closely enough to notice when Brian began to shiver. He still didn't say anything, but he did move off into the darkness, returning a few minutes later carrying an armload of driftwood which he arranged in a shallow depression in the sand and managed to ignite using a handful of dry sea grass as kindling. Then he simply settled by the fire and turned to look at Brian. Just waiting.

Brian wanted to ignore him, to spurn his attention. But it was getting colder by the minute.

Finally, reluctantly, he scooted forward, getting just close enough to be able to appreciate the first faint flush of warmth.

They sat in silence again then, until it was painfully obvious that Brian was not going to speak. Not unless provoked sufficiently to make him do so.

"That was quite a little show," said McClaren finally. "She thinks you're a regular diva now."

Brian lit another toque - and said nothing. And offered nothing.

"She didn't set out to deceive you, you know."

Dark eyes narrowed then, and there was a spark of rage within them. "But you did."

"No, I . . ."

Brian shifted quickly, as if he meant to rise.

"Okay. Okay. I guess I . . . did. In a way."

Another deep inhalation, but the expression on that classically chiseled face did not seem to indicate any enjoyment of the sensations the smoke was providing.

"Can we have a little truce between us? I'm sorry, Bri . . ."

"Sorry's bullshit. Sorry's what liars and losers offer up when their little schemes and tricks go sour."

McClaren paused to consider his answer, apparently really thinking about what Brian had said. "Mostly, I guess you're right. Sorry comes way too easily to the tongue, and maybe not at all to the heart."

Brian blinked, and the FBI agent felt a twinge of hope rise within him as he wondered if he'd actually glimpsed a quick, trace of a smile on those perfect lips - or if he'd just imagined it as a result of wishful thinking.

"That's very poetic. But it's still bullshit."

McClaren was careful to swallow his own quick smile. "So are we going to . . ."

"Why is she here?"

The FBI agent was once again slow to answer, understanding that a lot was riding on how Brian reacted to what he had to say. "She needs to talk to you, to get your side of the story. To go over all the information she's gathered with you. And don't be fooled by that sweet, almost grandmotherly demeanor. She's tough and she's smart and she's intuitive. Not to mention she's the best profiler I've ever worked with. You'll like her, I think. Once you get beyond the suspicions."

This time, the response came quickly. "Bullshit!"

"What do you . . ."

Dark eyes glinted in the firelight, displaying amusement and a remarkable degree of awareness. "She's not here to profile the unsubs." His lopsided smile conceded that the jargon felt strange on his lips. "She's here to profile me. I can read, you know, and I made a point of finding out about the so-called science of 'victimology'. Only . . ."

"Only what?"

"I don't much like the idea of being a case study. Not any more than I already am. You've already profiled me. I've seen your notes, so why . . ."

"You've seen my notes?"

Another slow blink. "Of course I have. What? You thought I wouldn't look, when you left them lying around? It doesn't take a rocket scientist to figure out how to access a PDA, you know"

"You really are an asshole." McClaren was suddenly on his feet, his fists clinched and his eyes a hard, frigid, glacial blue.

"Yeah. I am."

And just like that, the anger was gone as quickly as it had come, and the FBI agent dropped to his knees again and simply stared into his companion's eyes. For his part, Brian said nothing, but he did, after a long pause, lean forward and hand McClaren the stub of the still-smoking joint.

The FBI agent, acknowledging to himself that it was probably not a good idea, at this point, to risk a blurring of his mental processes, paused briefly before taking a deep drag and savoring the sweetness of the sensation as he stubbed the butt out in the sand. The silence stretched for a while before he decided to speak again. "I really am . . ."

"Yeah. You already said that. So what am I supposed to say? That it's all right? That I understand?"
Hazel eyes met blue for the space of a heartbeat before turning to gaze out to sea. "Okay. It's all right. You were just doing your job."

If he'd been on his feet, McClaren was certain that he would have staggered - maybe even gone down - under the horrible weight of guilt and remorse that suddenly swept over him, as he was crushed under the epiphany of understanding what Brian was feeling.

"Jesus!" he whispered. "Is that what you really think? You think you're just a job for me? Just an assignment? Just someone I get paid to watch over?"

Brian did not flinch - not even with the slow blink that sometimes gave him away. "What else am I supposed to think?"

In an explosion of motion, McClaren scurried forward across the sand until he was able to wrap his limbs around Brian, until they were skin-to-skin and sharing breath. "You really want to know what you should think?" he almost snarled. "Okay, then. How about this? How about the fact that I know that this whole strong-silent-type act is bullshit; that I know it's ripping you to pieces to turn your back on what you love the most? How about the fact that I understand what it takes for you to face each day, to take steps to make sure that the rest of your life is spent without the things - without the one thing - that means the most to you? How about the fact that I know how strong you are, and how brave you are? And above all, how about the fact that I understand that you know more about loving someone than any man I've ever met, and that you're willing to give up everything that you care about just to keep him safe?"

This time, Brian blinked.

"And finally, how about the fact that I spend every hour of every day knowing that if I slip up, if I let myself get too close, too caught up in the enigma that's Brian Kinney, that I'll never be the same again? That I'll never be completely free of you. That I'll never find anything that could make me forget . . . this."

The kiss was, at first, so gentle, so tender, so intimate that it was barely felt. No more than a wisp of air, a whisper of sound, a breath.

It was his way of telling Brian that he could back away if he liked. That it might even be better if he did.

But it was already much too late, and Brian had been alone and hurt and lost for too long.

The kiss deepened, and soon it was a question of who was devouring whom, as mouths twisted against each other and tongues explored and bodies came together.

Nevertheless, for a moment, Brian was able to pull back, to stare deeply into eyes that were amazingly blue, although not the perfect crystal blue of memory. "Are you sure about this?" he asked, freshly-bruised lips twisting into a roguish smile. "Because if you're not, this would be the time to say so. Because it's going to be too damned late if you wait."

McClaren shifted and allowed his actions to answer for him as he shucked off his clothes and then carefully removed Brian's sweatpants before sitting back to enjoy the vision before him, a vision somehow enhanced by the traces of the damages inflicted on that perfect body, which would soon be perfect again. It somehow felt like a privilege to be allowed to see it, to taste it, to sample it now, before the healing was complete.

Then Brian smiled. "Fuck it. It was already too damned late the first time I saw you."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Get Down Tonight - Harry Wayne Casey/Richard Raymond Finch

Breathe - Stephanie Bentley

tbc
Chapter 31

Chapter Notes

Just a heads up: we are at the half-way point - chapter-wise. But those who know my work will realize that the deeper I get into a story, the more I find to say, demonstrating, once again, that I really never know when to shut up. Anyway, just so you know, there are a total of 61 chapters in this massive work, totaling more than 800,000 words, but that the chapters offered up so far are composed of only about 300,000 of those words, so we've still got a l-o-o-o-o-o-long way to go.

Fair warning, I hope.

Chapter 31

Since he'd been a night-person throughout his whole life, it surprised him enormously to find that he actually enjoyed the sensations of morning in the South - the silken caress against his bare skin of warm air flowing in from the open window; the salt scent on the breath of the morning wind blending with the aroma of espresso rising from the automatic Mr. Coffee machine in the kitchen and wafting up the spiral staircase; the satiny drift of 1200 thread-count sheets against his body - the ones he'd sent McLaren to buy on their first day in the cottage when he'd taken one horrified look at the muslin monstrosities that the absentee landlord had left behind for their use. Only - for some reason - this morning, the Egyptian cotton felt slightly roughened, a bit gritty, and it took him a few moments to figure out why.

Sand, he remembered suddenly. Sand that had clung to his skin as he'd half-walked and been half-carried from the beach to the house, up the stairs and finally to the big four-poster bed, so totally engrossed in the figure pressed against him and around him and under and over him that they had moved as seamlessly as one body. If not exactly as one mind.

He opened his eyes after lying there for a while, luxuriating in the softness of scents and sounds and sensations . . . and remembered.

"And finally, how about the fact that I spend every hour of every day knowing that if I slip up, if I let myself get too close, too caught up in the enigma that's Brian Kinney, that I'll never be the same again? That I'll never be completely free of you. That I'll never find anything that could make me forget . . . this."

He closed his eyes then, and let himself be swept into vivid, almost tactile memory - the vision of a beautiful, taut body hovering above him and slowly lowering itself, the exquisite sensation of being engulfed in tight, wet, incredible heat as his cock was swallowed by that hungry darkness, even as his mouth was being claimed and explored; the slick slide of skin on skin and the rapturous growth of pressure in his balls as he pushed higher and higher into ecstasy, the two of them moving as one, forgetting everything beyond the sweet thrill of joining until, at the very last moment, with sanity teetering on the edge of annihilation, he felt himself explode into a burst of white-hot brilliance and fall into oblivion.

Shit! When had his life - his former perfectly simple life - become so fucking complicated?
He was still lying there, staring out into the morning's liquid sunlight toward the surf breaking against the rocks at the base of the headland, when a warm body slid into the bed behind him, and he was momentarily dizzied by the rich, mouth-watering fragrance of his regular morning addiction.

"You're not asleep, so stop pretending." McClaren's voice was always slightly rough in the early morning, a fact he blamed primarily on Brian, for encouraging his renewed interest in cigarettes. "Here's your customary fix, to fend off the ravages of caffeine withdrawal, and you're due at the clinic in an hour. Better drink up and get your ass in gear."

Brian shifted onto his back, and stared up into an almost expressionless face with veiled blue eyes - veiled in an obvious attempt to re-establish and maintain a cool distance. The attempt would have been extremely effective, except for the bruised swelling of those perfect lips and the livid bite mark under the jaw-line. And the fact that the eyes, for all their coolness, were irresistibly drawn to the mouth just inches away, with lips that were equally swollen and open just enough to allow a glimpse of a wet, pink tongue.

"Where's your boss, McFed?" Brian asked, seeing no point in avoiding the subject that was hanging over their heads like an albatross.

"Downstairs, mainlining her own particular brand of caffeine addiction, and don't call me that."

Hazel eyes closed briefly, before opening again to focus on hard, steady blue. "You tell her we fucked?"

The ghost of a smile, suppressed almost quickly enough to avoid notice. Almost. "She spent the night in the guestroom." The reply was flagrantly tongue-in-cheek as a glance swept around the bedroom, noting a broken lamp and a clutter of articles strewn across the gleaming hardwood floor - a half-empty bottle of Beam, a lube container, an IPOD, a crystal paperweight, an alarm clock, a couple of hardcover books. "I'm pretty sure she was able to figure it out on her own."

There was no way to ignore the gleam of satisfaction that flared in those changeable eyes. "Sorry."

For a moment, there was a heavy silence between them. Then it was swept away before a burst of easy laughter. "No, you're not. You're just hoping she was embarrassed by having to listen to the performance."

Brian grinned. "And was she?"

"She didn't say. But I doubt it. She doesn't embarrass easily."

Brian pushed up to a sitting position and helped himself to a big gulp of the steaming latté that McClaren had learned - acting out of sheer desperation - to prepare so perfectly, in order to silence Brian's constant grumbling.

"Do you?" Brian asked finally, looking up to meet McClaren's gaze.

"No."

"You sure? It doesn't bother you that your boss was front-row center for our little fuck-fest?"

Blue eyes sparked with warmth. "I wouldn't exactly call it 'little', and I've never tried to hide the fact that I'm queer, Brian," he said easily. "She knew it from the get-go."

"And she accepted it? Never tried to . . . convert you?"
The agent stood up abruptly. "You know better than that. There's no way to convert a . . ."

"Yeah. I know that. But does she?"

"Why? Why does it matter if she understands the true nature of fags everywhere?" The smile was back in his voice, even if it never touched his mouth or his eyes.

Brian's gaze was steady as he regarded his most recent trick - choosing that term deliberately, in order to keep everything in its proper perspective - with raised eyebrows. "You call it 'victimology'," he replied with a hard gleam in his eyes. "I call it something else. I call it 'psycho-babble' - and intrusive. And I've never had much time or patience for it, so, before I allow this woman to go digging around in my head, I mean to know who I'm dealing with. Got it?"

McClaren sat back down on the bed and regarded Brian in silence, his eyes exploring every inch of his companion's face. "What do you think happened last night, Brian?" He asked finally. "Do you think the fact that we fucked is going to change how I see you, how I treat you? The fact that I let you fuck me . . ." He paused then and couldn't quite contain a bittersweet smile, "three times and then some - or anything else we did to or for each other - doesn't change who I am, or who you are, or how I look at you. I'm here with you for one reason - to keep you safe. To make sure that the motherfuckers who did this to you don't get another shot at completing the job, and to stand between you and anyone who might try to harm you. And that, believe it or not, includes the person who has the legal right to order me around. I'm professionally obligated to do whatever she tells me to do. And I will. Unless I think that it wouldn't be in your best interest. If that happens, then I'll do what my conscience dictates. I'm supposed to protect you, and that's what I'm going to do, no matter what anybody says or thinks."

It was Brian's turn to study the eyes that were staring at him and try to read what was reflected in them. "So what are you saying? You're not swearing undying love and fealty and all that shit are you?"

McClaren grinned. "I can't think of a better way to send you streaking out into the wilderness with your Calvins flapping around your knees than to declare 'undying love and fealty'. You think I haven't figured out that Brian Kinney doesn't do 'love' or 'boyfriends' or 'happily ever after'?' Then something in his eyes shifted, and the grin settled into a rueful little smile. "With one exception, of course."

Brian stirred then, his expression hardening as he shifted to turn away.

"Don't get your thong in a twist," the FBI agent continued. "Your secret's safe with me."

"You think you know me, but you don't." It was clipped and hard and brutal and unequivocal.

McClaren's smile did not waver. "Okay." But the look in his eyes said otherwise.

He turned and moved toward the door to leave Brian to his morning ablutions, including a shower that the FBI agent would have enjoyed sharing, but he was pretty sure that Alexandra Corey's liberal mindset - or patience - would not extend to waiting for the two of them to take care of twin morning erections, with emphatic vocal accompaniment, under a cascade of hot water.

"Hey, McFed," Brian called, in a casual tone that made his question sound like an afterthought. "We gonna fuck again?"

McClaren went very still for the space of a heartbeat. Then he turned and moved back to the bedside where he stood for a second staring down into Brian's eyes, before leaning forward to claim that perfect mouth in a searing kiss. "What do you think?" he whispered.

Brian smiled. "I think," he murmured, "that your original plan was to stay the hell away from me - to avoid complications."

McClaren regarded him for a silent, almost awkward moment, before he broke into soft laughter. "You're so full of shit," he said finally. Then he sat down again, and took his time to consider his choice of words. "Think of it this way. Suppose you were on death row, scheduled to face a firing squad at dawn. And you had your choice of spending your last night on earth on your knees, praying for forgiveness for your sins and making your peace with God. Or . . ."

Intrigued despite himself, Brian prompted, "Or?"

"Or you could spend those same hours fucking the hottest guy in the world. Which would you choose?"

It was Brian's turn to laugh. "You're asking me that question? You really don't know me at all, do you?"

McClaren shrugged. "Even though you knew it would be your last chance to save your soul from eternal damnation?"

The laughter was still there in hazel eyes. "Even though."

The kiss this time was quick and hard and over too soon. "Exactly," McClaren whispered as he pulled away and made his exit, leaving Brian to ponder whether or not he should be pleased at being compared to "the hottest guy in the world" or insulted to be equated with "eternal damnation".

There was something decadent about southern coffee, thought Alexandra Corey, as she settled into a plushly-cushioned wicker chair on the shaded section of the deck. Something intoxicating enough to make a grown woman feel like curling up in a spot of sunshine and purring like a Cheshire cat.

Though what was in her cup was espresso rather than more pedestrian coffee, the effect was the same. It reminded her of the dark roast, honey-rich liquid ambrosia that Emmett Honeycutt had served her at the end of that sublime meal in Brian Kinney's office. She closed her eyes for a moment, fantasizing about the culinary masterpieces she had enjoyed that day and realizing that she really hadn't enjoyed a good meal since.

Her stay in Washington had been a bitch, in spite of giving her the rare opportunity to spend a few nights (very short nights) in the luxury of her own home. Unexpected difficulties arising from her previous case had necessitated her extended stay in the capital, and she had had no choice but to await the final outcome of the trial as she had been called to appear for re-questioning by both the prosecutor and a judiciary panel.

The only positive aspect of the interim was that it had all ended well, with the criminal convicted and sentenced to a lengthy stay in federal prison - the perfect culmination of a long, grueling investigation.

It had been a difficult, terribly busy couple of weeks, and she spent a few more minutes gazing out into the almost painful clarity of the morning and regretting the fact that she had not been able to get here sooner, as she'd intended. But there was, ultimately, no point in indulging regrets, for all the delays had proved worthwhile in the end, even if she had not been able to conclude her study of Brian Kinney as quickly as she'd hoped, and thus had made no headway in understanding the motivation of the individuals who were behind his attack - beyond the obvious, of course. As she knew perfectly well, the clues for divining and defining the deep, intrinsic motives for crimes of this nature were almost always found in the character or philosophy of the victim, rather than in the profiles of the criminals themselves. Nevertheless, the investigation was proceeding at a good pace. They were not yet coming to the end of the tunnel, but there was, finally, light ahead.

She was pretty sure that Kinney would provide the final impetus needed to find their way completely out of the darkness.

The profiler sat back, savoring another sip of near-perfect caffeine, and took advantage of the unexpected moments of peace and quiet - interrupted only by the murmur of voices and occasional footsteps upstairs - to go through her notes; real notes - the kind one recorded with a ballpoint pen on a steno pad; the kind that would not be lost forever into the cybernetic ether of nothingness in the event of an electronic failure of whatever device one trusted to preserve such information.

She smiled. Yes, she did have a laptop, which was sitting now in its pristine leather case on a lovely wicker table in her bedroom. She also had a PDA, which was - she thought - still tucked away in the pocket of her Armani jacket. And all the information that was recorded in this stack of note-filled tablets was also stored in those electronic files, archived and tabbed and organized in such a way to enable instant linking to any database she might need, and to provide for the instant transfer of information, with the push of a single button. But, to enhance her own mental processes, she preferred documents that she could pick up and examine and doodle on or highlight or underscore or illustrate to her heart’s content - documentation that she could hold in her hand and peruse at her leisure.

She knew it pretty much marked her as a dinosaur, but it was a method that had worked for her for decades, and she saw no logic in trying to change it now.

For example, at this particular moment she was studying the report submitted by her journalistic undercover operative - a gifted young woman who had been a member of her team for almost twelve years, but who still managed - with only a little cosmetic enhancement - to look like a college student, a feature that opened a lot of doors for her and allowed her to infiltrate in a wide variety of settings that might have proven impenetrable for other agents. For example, with a bit of FBI background prep, Priscilla Young had been easily, almost instantly, transformed into Paula Harte, a journalism major at Duquesne University, interning at a major television studio as part of her graduate degree program. The young woman was so accomplished in her ability to blend in and carve out a comfortable niche for herself that she had become an invaluable part of Corey’s team over the years. It was, in fact, just this type of assignment - when she could put on the persona of an up-and-coming young professional - that she enjoyed most. And, in this case, when she had been briefed on the details of the crime and - even more pertinently - on the identity and character of the victim, she was really in her element.

The report was detailed and very interesting.

Alex knew - as did every member of her team - that it was almost always a mistake to sort individuals into categories, and to pre-assign personalities to them, based on biased expectations. Such a practice was the mark of a rank amateur. And yet - sometimes it was almost unavoidable, taking preliminary information and circumstances into account. Times - like now. In looking over the notes jotted down by Paula/Priscilla, Corey decided that John Vincent Pinchon was turning out to be exactly what she and most of her team had expected - a pompous, unprincipled ass.

Alex had been something of a fixture in the FBI hierarchy for many years, and, as such, she had been in position to enjoy a nodding acquaintance with a number of members of the White House Press Corps, including prizewinners like Michael Abramowitz of the Washington Post and Doug Mills of the New York Times, and had once spent an entire evening sharing a few pitchers of Margaritas and some sharp political repartee with Ann Compton, Martha Raddatz, Jake Tapper, and Charles Gibson, all members of the ABC staff. She had even, on one occasion, been privileged to meet and share a few moments conversing with Walter Kronkite. So Alex Corey knew a thing or two about recognizing the crème de la crème of the fourth estate. Which meant that she was equally capable of recognizing the dregs at the bottom of the barrel.

John Vincent Pinchon, she thought, was just about as far removed from the elite of journalism's upper echelon as it was possible to be. Instead of the acumen, perseverance, and unwavering honesty that were necessary to the practice of journalistic integrity, Pinchon had ridden a combination of family money, surgically enhanced good looks, and rampant opportunism to a position of power within the Pittsburgh press pantheon - a position he had used to aid in his mission to co-opt traditional conservatism and pervert it to defend and promote his own personal crusade of homophobia and elitism.

He was currently involved in efforts to revive Proposition 14 and expose the infamous but always ephemeral, never fully defined "Homosexual Agenda".

And, as an egotist of the first order, there was nothing the man enjoyed more than the attention - the more fawning, the better - of a bright, pretty, talented young woman. Like Paula Harte, who knew exactly how to play the role that would encourage him to take her into his confidence.

It had taken the undercover agent less than a week to find out what Pinchon knew and where he was sending the information he had gathered, and Corey smiled as she recalled the young woman's remark that it was always nice to be lucky enough to be eavesdropping at exactly the right moment so that ass-kissing could be kept to a minimum - especially in the case of such a vile, depraved, repulsive ass. Being completely familiar with Priscilla's skills, Corey doubted that luck had anything to do with it, but she completely understood the sentiment.

The wiretap on his private line - and a bit of discreet surveillance to monitor the transfer of the confidential files he had obtained from Peabody and identify the recipient - had done the rest.

In the end, it had been determined that he was only a minor player in the overall scheme of things, no more than an avid fan of any kind of gay-bashing, eager to show off his network of contacts to his equally bigoted friends and associates, but, in the final analysis, completely ignorant of any deeper purpose for the data he was passing on - a fool and a homophobe, but a fool who was all mouth and no action. Of course, it was probable that he wouldn't have cared, even if he'd figured out that the people who were milking him for information had darker purposes than he'd originally believed, but bigotry and Nazi beliefs, no matter how heinous, were not grounds for indictment.

He would, however, be complicit enough in the plot against Kinney to be threatened with accessory charges and forced to provide information and testimony about his co-conspirators, when the time was right. Corey found that thought extremely comforting. Exposing hypocrisy at its highest levels was one of the incidental perks of the job.

On the other hand, one of the hardest parts of any in-depth investigation was the waiting - the necessary time that had to be spent in setting up precise operations and following the leads they generated and gathering the proof required in order to proceed. That was the stage at which the Kinney case stood now, and there was little she could do to hurry things along. In point of fact, hurrying was almost always a huge mistake in such a delicate operation.

Right now, she could only wait and allow her gifted, dedicated colleagues to do what they did best: find the evidence needed to pursue justice for those responsible for such a horrible crime.
She shuffled through a few more files, organizing her thoughts and jotting down pertinent data. Getting ready for what she had come to think of as "The Confrontation" - capitalization intended. Sub-titled "Facing Brian Kinney". She did not expect it to be easy, and she knew she had best be thoroughly grounded, for Kinney would undoubtedly prove to be as difficult and demanding as she'd been led to expect.

And rightfully so. It rather surprised her that she was ready to concede that notion, but it was unavoidably true that he had every right to demand that she be as open and frank and forthcoming with him as she was asking him to be with her. That was true with almost every victim of a crime like this one, but it was equally true that most victims were too confused or too frightened or too intimidated to stand up and demand a quid pro quo. It was dead certain, however, that such would not be the case with Brian Kinney. If he chose to cooperate at all, it would be under his own terms.

She knew she needed to be well prepared, well rested, and very, very calm when it was time to face him, and she also knew that she would give him the information he required - rules or no rules.

He had a right to know the truth so that he could decide what steps needed to be taken to enable him to get on with his life; he also had a right to know about all the threads of this investigation which appeared to be converging on one particular focus - a posh, highbrow, elite establishment known only as The Club.

And finally, he had a right to know the names of the individuals who were members of that elite fraternity, although she was pretty sure that the identities would come as no surprise to him. She thought it was safe to assume that there weren't many things that surprised Kinney.

It was, of course, completely against agency regulations for her to allow him to see the evidence that had been gathered so far, or to share her conclusions with him, but she had broken rules before, when she'd believed it was the right thing to do. And this time, it was definitely the right thing. Besides, she also believed there was an excellent chance that his insights would be helpful in determining how to bring the case to a successful conclusion.

She had come to realize, in the course of her investigation, that the man was brilliant.

She sighed and sipped and spent a moment studying the portrait of Brian Kinney that was a part of her basic file on the man - Kinney before the attack. Kinney - wearing a sardonic smile that was reflected perfectly in night-dark eyes.

He was also incredibly beautiful.

"Shit!"

"Ah-ha!" said a warm voice from behind her. "I thought you were above such prurience, Fearless Leader."

Chris McClaren flopped down into the lounge chair beside her and grinned. "Good to know that you're still human enough to appreciate the view."

She stared at him with narrowed eyes. "That particular view could probably re-animate a recently-deceased corpse. As you know very well."

The faintest blush touched his cheeks. "Yeah. Well . . ."

She lifted one hand and favored him with a small smile. "I wasn't asking for a confirmation or an explanation."
"Good," he replied, "because I wasn't going to give you one."

She nodded, and the subject was dropped, except for a tiny twinkle in her eyes that let him realize that she was not - quite - as disinterested as she pretended, and that she would have been delighted to hear all the lovely details. But she would not ask for them. Instead, she would simply use her imagination.

She reached out and laid her hand on the thick file that contained all the information from the investigation. "How much have you told him?" she asked.

He did not look at her, choosing instead to allow his eyes to sweep the beach for any signs of intrusion. "Only what he needed to hear, to make sure he understood that this wasn't random. That he was a specific target. He didn't take much convincing."

She nodded. "He knew it before you told him."

"Yes."

"And have you reviewed all the latest data?"

"Yes."

She paused then, and sighed as she looked up to follow the flight of a tern as it swooped down toward a rough patch of sea grass. "How do you think he'll take it when he finds out the identities of the club members?"

He turned to look at her, and there was no mistaking the hard gleam of anger in his eyes. "I think he'll be surprised that it took us so long to figure it out."

She smiled. "Only - it didn't, did it? Not really."

"No," he admitted, "but I couldn't very well tell him that, now could I? But I'm pretty sure he knew anyway. You're going to find out PDQ that it's really hard to slip something by him. He's very perceptive."

Her smile became a grin. "A smart little fucker, then?"

"Oh, yeah." A gentle huff of laughter.

Corey turned then to study his face, not quite comfortable with something she wasn't sure she was hearing. "Have I made a huge mistake here?" she asked finally. "Are you . . ."

"No."

"Then how do you know what I was . . ."

"Drop it!" No uncertainty in his voice now, and no regrets either. "Whatever happens, this is where I should be, doing something I was meant to do."

She considered her response for a moment, before offering him a bright smile. "Not going all mystic on me, are you?"

To her surprise, he did not smile in return. Instead, there was something troubling in his eyes, something that reinforced her own uncertainties. "I don't know if I can make you understand it," he said slowly. "It's hard to grasp, even for me. For someone who's never experienced any of the things he's endured, I'm not sure it's possible."
"Try me," she said softly. "Maybe I'll surprise you."

He took a moment to compose his thoughts. "Brian Kinney," he said finally, "has never let himself need anyone. Never. Can you imagine how much strength that took? Even when he was a kid, he only relied on himself. You can probably figure out how that can happen to a kid - what kind of family he must have had, and what he must have endured at their hands. But in the end, he survived it, because he was stronger than they were. Because he refused to let anyone destroy him or force him to pretend to be something he's not. But because of that - and everything that came after - he's never been able or willing to let down his guard and let anyone in. He's never been able to give his trust completely."

She thought about the things she'd learned during her interview with Brian's sister, and knew that McClaren's assessment was perfectly accurate.

He smiled when he saw the look of understanding in her eyes. "Except once, but that's not something that's mine to talk about. That's his very personal business and not a subject we should discuss. But the thing is . . . right now, he needs someone, and he doesn't know how to let himself need someone. Because he's never been there before. He needs someone who can stand at his side, can understand all the things he won't let himself say, can see him as he really is and not as some romantic fantasy figure, and still step up to watch his back if the need arises. That's what he needs, and that's what he doesn't know how to accept and can't ask for. He needs someone who can do that for him - be there for him, to laugh with and fight with and fuck with - to do whatever he needs, and not require him to define it or spell it out or even mention it."

He paused to light a cigarette, giving up on his earlier resolution to wait for a mid-morning break. "And that's what nobody else can give him. That's why I'm here."

"And when it's over?" she asked. "When it's time to walk away?"

He shrugged and blew out a perfect smoke-ring. "Then we walk away. Both a little older and a little wiser, maybe, but unbroken."

She looked for a moment as if she wanted to argue, but she didn't. "And the other things?" she asked. "How will he respond to the problems in his own house?"

"I don't know," he admitted. "He's spent his whole life dealing with homophobic pricks who hate him for what he is, and he's done what needed doing and defied them all. But the possibility of being betrayed, by someone close to him . . . I don't know what that might do to him."

"So you haven't told him that?"

"No. Because I'm not sure how he'll take it, and because our information is still sketchy. We could be wrong. It might just be a stupid fuck-up."

She nodded. "It might. But what if it's not?"

He took a deep breath. "Then somebody is a dead man walking, figuratively speaking. Brian doesn't deal well with betrayal, and he's not much into forgiveness."

"Not very Christian then."

McClaren burst out laughing. "I keep forgetting that you haven't really had a chance to get to know him yet."

She patted the file again. "But I know . . ."
"No. You don't. You may know the facts and the history and all the trivial details, but you don't know Brian Kinney. Not yet. And when you do, you'll understand exactly what I mean."

Again, she looked like she wanted to argue, but she didn't. She trusted McClaren, as she'd trusted only a very few young associates in her time, and if he thought she still had much to learn about the enigmatic Brian Kinney, he was probably right.

"Sooo," she said softly, drawing the word out to give her a chance to choose her words carefully, "how would you estimate my chances of convincing him to submit to hypnosis?"

He, on the other hand, required no time at all to come up with an answer. "Slim to none," he laughed, "and that's probably too generous by half."

"Chris, he really needs . . ."

His lifted hand was enough to convince her not to waste her breath. "Hey, it's not me that needs convincing. It's him, and I gotta tell you that I can't think of a single reason why he'd agree to let you do this."

Her eyes were suddenly narrow and hard. "Doesn't he have any interest in catching whoever did this to him?"

He flexed his shoulders, in an attempt to work out a bit of soreness that probably had more to do with the previous night's extracurricular activities than any job-related muscle strain. "Tell you what, Alex. When all this is over, I'd be willing to bet the farm that he will find out who's responsible, whether we succeed in our efforts or not, although I don't think he gives a shit about proof that might stand up in a court of law. One way or another, the people who did this are going to be held accountable. But let's face it; law and order types haven't exactly distinguished themselves in standing up against homophobia, and he doesn't know you, meaning that he has no good reason to trust you, so do you really expect him to just give you carte blanch to go poking around in his head?"

She considered his words for a moment, before offering up a little smile that conceded his point. "Still, there are things that he needs to know - that he has a right to know - but I'm loathe to lay it all out for him until I've had a chance to try to jog his memory. And putting him under is the surest way to do that. If we provide the details now, before I can probe his memory, there's a chance of contaminating his recollections with bits and pieces of what we tell him, and that could compromise everything."

"So what's your point?" he asked, his tone suggesting that he was still not sure he agreed with her, but that he was willing to go along - for a while.

"Just be careful how much you tell him concerning the primary investigation," she said finally, "although I have an idea that you should clue him in on our suspicions of what's going on - in-house, so to speak - because he's probably going to find out sooner rather than later anyway. Because of the circumstances, we felt that we had to tell Mathis, who, in turn, felt compelled to tell Whitney, who . . ."

"Is not going to hesitate to tell Brian. When?"

"Probably some time this morning. Mathis was just waiting for the final confirmation from our SEC sources before he takes the whole thing to Ms. Whitney. I don't know exactly how she'll react but . . ."

"She'll react like the pit bull she is. Cynthia has one fundamental loyalty, and that's her only concern.
Nothing is going to persuade her to hide this from him."

"In that case, you'd better . . ."

But he was already getting to his feet. "You're right. I've got to drive him to the clinic anyway, so we'll have some uninterrupted time for me to tell him, in a semi-controlled environment where he won't be able to mount a classic Kinney queen-out and break whatever he can lay his hands on."

"Except you," she hastened to point out.

"Except me," he agreed with a grin, "but I'm tougher than I look."

He turned to go into the house then, before pausing and looking back over his shoulder. "Trina will be here soon. She's our in-house version of Paula Deen, and - just in case he's not in the mood to be coddled or mollified or coaxed out of his snit - ask her to make his favorites. She'll know what they are. Just in case."

Corey smiled. The idea that big, brawny, buff and beautiful bad-ass Chris McClaren might be just a tiny bit intimidated by the idea of dealing with an irate, stone-cold furious Brian Kinney was food for thought and amusement - and, just maybe, a nuance of alarm.

Exactly who - and what - were they all dealing with?

She was not the least bit frightened. She had never been frightened of a crime victim in her life, and she wasn't about to start now.

She frowned, and stared out to sea with a steely glare, determined to maintain her aplomb. She wasn't intimidated. She wasn't worried. She wasn't the least bit nervous.

She absolutely wasn't. And the tiny little fluttering in her stomach was undoubtedly due to a bit of left-over jet lag or the fact that she hadn't been eating well of late. It couldn't possibly have anything to do with apprehension over her upcoming interview.

It couldn't.

Could it?

Ted had been working with computers since early childhood. He'd learned how to navigate a Lotus spreadsheet and edit a WordPerfect document before he'd learned to ride a bicycle, and manipulating financial data, via his new MacBook Pro, which had replaced his PowerBook G4, was so second-nature to him by this time that it was almost intuitive. He didn't even have to think about how to do what needed doing; he just did it.

And yet he sometimes thought that he might have been an accountant - or a scribe perhaps - in some past life. If, of course, he believed in past lives, which he didn't. Only . . . he could not deny that there was some tiny part of him that had a weakness for the crispness, the visceral experience of words and numbers written on a page, columns of figures entered into a ledger. It was not efficient; it was not a productive use of one's time. It was just satisfying.

Thus, once he had completed all his data entry, accessing the accounts and initiating the actions necessary to implement the decisions he'd made in exercising his management of Brian's liquid assets, he removed his Montblanc ballpoint pen - a Christmas gift from his boss - from its special niche in his desk drawer and opened the ledger that he'd retrieved earlier from the safe in Brian's office. Brian, of course, did not share Ted's appreciation for these artifacts from a simpler, more refined era; he had observed, on more than one occasion, that it was nothing more than a petty conceit, not to mention a waste of time, to duplicate manually what had already been done via computer.

But he didn't actually interfere, and Ted thought, sometimes, that the man who signed his paycheck might understand more than he let on; he did, after all, have a rather profound appreciation for elegance and artistic concepts.

And this, thought the accountant, as he opened the ledger, his hand smoothing over the dark crimson leather of its cover, was art - in its own way.

The book opened easily under his fingers, and he stared down at the column of figures with a certain degree of smug satisfaction, knowing that this, too, was art, in another way. He had done very well for Brian, overseeing his investments with all his considerable knowledge of market trends and fiscal protocols. In the years since he'd taken over the supervision of Brian's wealth, he had experienced occasional setbacks when he'd been forced to record small losses, but recovery had always been swift and decisive, and he had never had to explain or justify a single losing quarter.

And now . . .

He carefully took pen in hand to record his latest transactions, the transfer of a substantial percentage of the funds previously invested in various venues into one holding account from which a final transfer was even now in process; a stroke of genius that would transform Brian Kinney from a moderately wealthy investor to a very rich man - a distinction which Brian would surely appreciate and reward, once he had a chance to come to his senses and figure out where his true loyalties should lie.

Ted did not hesitate as he made the entries, even feeling a small rush as he entered the last of them.

Two million dollars, plus.

The actual final figure would be close to two and a quarter million, factoring in the amount which Ted had managed to pull together for himself and a friend. That thought did give him a bit of pause. Not that he was worried about any possibility of not being able to retrieve his or his friend's share of the investment. For the most part, Brian never even looked at the details of his financial portfolio, except for rare, seemingly random moments when he'd decide to delve into it, just to check on what was going on. But he rarely looked, almost never questioned, and seemed content to allow Ted to do what Ted did best.

Handle the money.

Although - he paused briefly as his mind sifted through random memories - there had been times when Brian had posed some questions that seemed to indicate a greater awareness of financial market conditions than one might have expected him to possess, and Ted was reminded that it was almost always a mistake to assume that Brian was ignorant about things. Brian might not be current about the latest events in the world of finance, but he was seldom ignorant - about anything - and assuming otherwise would be a foolish risk.

When Brian asked questions, a smart individual made sure to be able to provide pertinent answers.

But this - he paused and sat back in his chair, his eyes drifting out toward the parking lot where a fitful wind was creating a miniature maelstrom of dead leaves and debris - this was different from anything he'd ever done. This would mark his greatest achievement in the field of fiscal management and should buy him a place in the forefront of the elite group of Brian Kinney's friends. And if it also made him - and his friend - rich in the process, he was sure Brian wouldn't mind.

Except, of course, that the 'friend' in question was Melanie Marcus, and he had to admit that he wasn't entirely sure how Brian would handle that bit of information. But Ted was nothing if not gifted in rationalization. Melanie might not be Brian's favorite person, but she was a parent figure to Gus, so he should ultimately be glad that Ted had allowed her to become a part of their little investment clique.

Of course, she had only managed to come up with $40,000.00, but that sum - doubled or tripled or whatever the ultimate pay-off might turn out to be - would benefit her little family unit, including Brian's son, so he should be pleased with the end result.

But none of that was critical to this moment. He would handle Brian when the time came, and trust that the man's delight in the huge profits he would rake in would compensate for any annoyance over being kept out of the loop. Besides, it was undeniably true that he was being kept in the dark through his own fault; Ted obviously could not tell him about what he was doing when he was not allowed any contact with his employer, except as filtered through Cynthia Whitney.

Ted very carefully ignored the fact that he could have easily mentioned it to Cynthia, and asked her to obtain Brian's agreement to his arrangements. But he couldn't do that, because, if he did, he would have to reveal the details of his plan, a disclosure he was not yet willing to make. He wanted this to happen discreetly, under the auspices of his oversight, so that he would be able to present it to Brian as a fait accompli - a master stroke accomplished through his own financial genius.

To make absolutely sure that Brian Kinney would never undervalue him again.

He smiled as he remembered his last conversation with Marshall Hargrave. It had been brief, as the Wall Street baron had been on his way to catch a plane to Singapore, for a broker's conference, but there had been no denying that the man had been delighted with Ted's news.

"I knew you were too smart to pass up an opportunity like this," Hargrave had observed. "Look, just give me your email and I'll have my secretary send you the routing information for the funds transfer. And . . ." he paused for a fraction of a second, and Ted thought he heard a quiver in his voice when he resumed speaking. But on later reflection, he was sure he'd been mistaken. Probably just a rough spot in the road as the limo sped toward the airport. "And congratulations, Ted. This will be a day you'll never forget, when you took your first steps into the stratospheric level of high finance."

They had chatted for a few more minutes then, and Hargrave had invited him to bring a friend and come up to the financier's home in the Hamptons for Memorial Day week-end or to drop in for a visit at his Park Avenue penthouse the next time he was in New York, before ending the call by reminding Ted that time was critical so he should not dawdle in taking care of the details.

He had not dawdled, and now he was just one confirmation away from completing the most profitable and daring and amazing venture of his life.

With Brian's money, of course, which meant, he conceded, that it wasn't really his venture, but he consoled himself by remembering that it was his hand on the wheel, his expertise that had gained access to the opportunity, and his actions that would see it through to the finish.

And Brian would, from this day forward, owe him a debt he could probably never hope to repay.

The stratospheric level of high finance.
He was pretty sure he could get used to living in such rarefied atmosphere.

A quick, perfunctory knock at the door announced the arrival of his lunch date, and he greeted Melanie with a raised eyebrow and a smile that barely avoided haughtiness. They had decided to treat themselves to Monterey Bay Fish Grotto for lunch as a private celebration of their confidential joint venture - an expensive indulgence, no doubt, but befitting the auspicious nature of the occasion. Melanie's expression mirrored his own, with just a slightly elevated degree of smugness.

While it was undeniably true that Brian had succeeded in cutting them out of his life, for the present, this action would firmly and permanently re-establish their right to expect a place of honor at his table.

Not that Melanie really wanted a place at his table - honored or otherwise; Ted was pretty sure she actually wanted nothing more than to be as far away from Brian Kinney as possible. But she could hardly deny herself the satisfaction of knowing that he would be forced to acknowledge her right to be included in his inner circle, even when she chose to reject it.

Walking away from him - and forcing Lindsey to choose to do the same - would bring her as much satisfaction as any financial benefits she might gain from their little arrangement.

It was all there in her eyes as she took a seat in front of his desk. "So," she said brightly, "are we all set?"

"Absolutely. The final transaction will be completed tomorrow, when the transfer is confirmed from Brian's primary account. And the rest, as they say, will be history."

"And how long," she asked, "before we see results?"

Again, the smug smile. "Probably not long at all. Possibly a few days. At most, a matter of weeks, although you need to remember - like I told you before - although the indicators may waver a bit from time to time, the overall trend will certainly be positive. But it may take a few months to see anything substantial. Dealing in blue chip investments and preferred stocks requires a certain level of patience."

"I know," she replied with a sigh. "It's just that I can't wait to show Lindsey what we've achieved. She's always believed that it's Brian who is . . ."

"The genius?" he offered, when she couldn't quite find the right words. "The boy wonder? The Sugar Daddy with bottomless pockets?"

She nodded and tried, without a lot of success, to suppress a venal note of satisfaction in her voice. "All of the above. I mean . . . I know he's supposed to be your friend, Teddie, although I choose to reserve judgment on that, but you have no idea how hard it is to live with someone who's supposed to love you and believe in you but spends all her time raving to our son about how wonderful and what a huge success and how talented his daddy is. Sometimes, I think that I'll go ballistic and slap the shit out of her if she ever says his name again."

Ted's eyes were suddenly very wide, and there was no concealing that he was shocked by the degree of venom in her voice. "Not that I'd ever really do that," she hastened to add, apparently realizing that she'd said more than she'd intended.

Quickly, she stood and moved to a group of display boards that were arranged on a ledge in front of the office's single window - bright, vivid drawings etched in almost-neon hues against a glossy black
"What are these?" she asked, not really caring, but looking for a means to change the subject. "They're very eye-catching."

Ted grinned. "Glad you think so. I had Gabriel - our new intern in the art department - draw them up, according to my specifications, as part of a proposal for a new promotion for the Schickel concert hall. Of course, I'm no ad man - like Brian - but I think they're very stylish and seductive. Just the kind of thing that would entice an opera-lover to buy season's tickets."

Melanie smiled. She was always in favor of anything that would undercut the mighty Kinney, and prove to the world that his success and accomplishments were just a fluke, a matter of blind luck, having nothing to do with skill or talent or intellect.

"Very good, Teddie. You doing the presentation yourself?"

He nodded, and a certain furtiveness in his eyes told her that there was more to this story than he was telling, but she didn't press the issue. Mostly because she didn't really care.

He took a deep breath, still slightly bothered by her comments about Lindsey, but he decided to let it go, assuming that he'd simply misunderstood her meaning. "Okay," he said, closing the ledger before him and getting to his feet. "Let's just put this away in Brian's safe, and we'll go enjoy our little celebration."

He did not notice at first that Melanie had gone very still, hardly even daring to breathe. "Brian's safe?"

"Yeah." Still oblivious, he moved toward the door. "It's in his office. Come on, and . . ."

It was then that he noticed the predatory gleam in her eyes, and understood what it meant and knew what he had to do. "Mel," he said softly, "I don't know what you're thinking, but there's no way I can give you access to . . ."

"But, Ted," she said, suddenly very calm and reasonable and infused with wide-eyed innocence, "what he chooses to conceal there - in his private safe - might have a major impact on my son's well-being. Surely, you can see . . ."

"But I . . ."

She smiled then and tucked her arm through his. "Maybe," she suggested, "we go in to put this ledger away, and you get distracted. Maybe you remember a phone call you need to make, or you feel a sudden call of nature, or . . ."

Her little litany continued - soft and persuasive - as they walked out of the room.

She was still talking when they walked through the door into Brian's office, but fell silent quickly when they discovered that it was not as unoccupied as they'd expected.

It had been weeks now since Brian had actually been in his office, and the suite had been maintained immaculately in the interim, so it should have been impossible to detect even the faintest trace of his aftershave lingering in the air. But there was no denying that the fragrance was there - a soft nuance of Chanel Allure, as elegant and distinctive as the man who frequently wore it.

It was very subtle, barely detectable, but it always hit Ted like a gut punch, forcing him to pause to catch his breath as he stepped over the threshold.
As it happened on this particular occasion, he realized immediately that he should not have been able to smell it at all, since it was almost lost beneath another distinctive aroma - cinnamon and brown sugar and apple butter. Mouth-watering. Irresistible.

Auntie Em's caramel-apple kolaches. The fragrance was unmistakable, as was the individual who was arranging them on a silver tray while deep in conversation with other occupants of the room. Emmett, decked out head-to-toe in coppery silk and suede, did not notice the new arrivals as he chatted on about a new recipe for puff pastry with brie and lobster cream he had developed for the reception he was planning for Sidney Bloom's new abstract exhibition.

Across the room, Danny Boyle was dressed in blue jeans and black leather, carefully arranged with one hip hiked up on a ledge against the big rear window, a gleaming, cobalt blue Fender guitar braced against his chest, with the placement of his hands suggesting that he was picking out a tune on the instrument, and his head cocked as if listening for the perfect pitch, eyes squinted against the spiral of smoke drifting up from a cigarette burning in a nearby ashtray. He appeared to be listening to Emmett's rambling, although his responses were limited to occasional grins and soft laughter, as he snuck an occasional bite of one of Emmett's delectable pastries.

A few feet away, Justin Taylor was standing at an easel, licking a drip of apple butter from his lip as his gaze flicked between the canvas he was working on and the young bodyguard with guitar in hand. He was wearing a faded gray sweatshirt that had seen far better days, which was now even worse for wear due to a big swath of burnt umber oil paint smeared across one shoulder and down one threadbare sleeve. There was also a streak of Prussian blue smudged on his temple, blending into the hair falling over his left ear as he leaned forward to stroke a brush dripping with a blend of burnt sienna and cadmium yellow across the canvas.

Justin was talking too, but not to either Boyle or Emmett. Instead, he was speaking to a fourth man - someone that Ted did not recognize. An elderly man with a shock of white hair, nibbling delicately at his own kolache, and standing behind the artist, looking over his shoulder with his eyebrows raised in a quizzical stare.

Justin was grinning. "What's the matter, mon amis? You look puzzled."

The older man gave a little half-shrug, half-nod - a gesture that was curiously gaelic. "I recognize the guitar, cher," he replied, "and the jacket and the jeans, but the face . . . the face is . . ."

"Not here," Justin volunteered. "Danny is just providing the lines of light and shadow against the fabrics and the general configuration. But he's not the subject. Not really."

"Ahhh, I see," said Cedric Lasseigne. "So this is how I'll get my first look at the infamous Brian Kinney."

Justin grinned, but it was Emmett who answered. "Infamous, huh? A perfect description for the man who lives by my motto even better than I do. Even if it did take me a lifetime to figure it out."

Lasseigne turned to regard Emmett with a sardonic smile that confirmed how much he liked Justin's nelly-bottom friend. "And what would that motto be?"

Emmett's laughter was warm and infectious. "Fuck 'em all! I've spent my whole life trying to live it, but I don't think anybody ever did it quite as well - or as stylishly - as Brian."

Ted and Melanie exchanged confused glances.

"What's going on in here?" Ted demanded sharply, as he moved to Brian's desk, to access the sensor which would deactivate the security lock of the wall safe. Until the attack, only Brian himself and Cynthia had been programmed into the system to be allowed to open the safe, but common sense had dictated that someone else should be added to the protocols when Brian had been hospitalized. It had only made sense, thought Ted, that he be added to that elite list since he was the person who controlled the company's finances. In point of fact, he'd thought - although he'd refrained from saying it - he should have been on the list from the beginning. Instead of Cynthia.

"Justin," he continued, moving toward the door to Brian's private bathroom in order to be able to access the safe securely - away from prying eyes, "you of all people should know how Brian feels about his office. He wouldn't like you using it like this. He wouldn't approve."

Once more, it was Emmett who was first to respond. "Wouldn't approve of what, Teddie?" he asked, obviously confused. "Of Justin using his office? Justin?" His tone as he finished speaking suggested that he doubted Ted's sanity.

"If I recall correctly," Ted called out, as he placed the ledger into the safe, "and I can assure you that I do, Brian was pretty specific in his wishes about Justin getting out of his life. And I'm pretty sure that would include his office."

But if Ted was expecting wounded silence or petulance from Justin, he was in for a big surprise. The blonde grinned as Ted stepped back through the doorway. "Yep. That just about sums it up perfectly."

"Look, Justin," said Melanie, obviously trying to summon up a sympathetic expression. "It's no secret that I'm not a big Brian Kinney fan, but if he did say he didn't want you here . . ."

The grin grew wider. "That's pretty much exactly what he said."

She made no attempt to conceal the confusion flaring in her eyes. "Then what . . . why . . . what are you . . ."

"Ever articulate, Mellie," observed Emmett, "but I should think it would be pretty obvious. We're ignoring his wishes." Then he paused, and the smile that touched his lips was winsome, and impossible to interpret. "Or, to be totally precise, we're ignoring what he said he wanted."

Ted moved closer to Justin - close enough to be able to study the canvas he was working on, and recognize the subject. "I don't get it," he said. "Why on earth would you want to paint here? It's an office - not a studio."

Justin continued to work on capturing the image of a distinctive, cowry-shell bracelet on a strong bare arm. "Because it has perfect light. Because it feels right, and because it's easier to feel close to him, like he left something of himself here."

The accountant smirked. "If you want to find someplace where he left something of himself, you should go to Babylon's back room."

The silence that fell over the group at that moment was heavy and thick with words unspoken, as everyone turned to stare at the accountant, all of them wondering why on earth he would have offered such a petty, vindictive comment. Even Melanie looked slightly taken aback, and Emmett appeared momentarily devastated, so devastated that he could not - quite - manage to keep his opinion to himself.

"Jesus!" It was just a whisper, but it conveyed volumes of distress and contempt.

"Does Cynthia know about this?" Ted's dark eyes were now hard and gleaming with anger, as he managed to ignore the look on Emmett's face.

"Of course, she does," said Justin, deliberately avoiding meeting the accountant's gaze, because he was pretty sure that, if he did, he'd be unable to resist an urge to spit in the man's face. "How do you think we got in here?"

Ted stood by the desk and let his gaze sweep around the elegant room, noting all the classic little touches that marked it as Brian's private domain, a place which should be sacrosanct, a place, said a little voice in side him, where - no matter what - he would never be welcome to trespass.

"So this is how she looks after his interests?" he said slowly. "By disobeying his orders, and doing exactly as she pleases."

Justin took a deep breath then, as the distress caused by Ted's malicious words gave way before a primal urge to protect the woman who was Brian's primary defender. "Come on, Ted," he said, barely managing to remain calm. "You can't possibly think that she would abuse her privileges, that she would take advantage of Brian's trust and . . ."

"It appears to me," said the accountant in a clipped, bitter tone, "that she's doing exactly that. He made his wishes clear, and it's not up to her to pick and choose which she can obey and which she can ignore, and I'm going to make sure she knows it, and - when the time comes - that he knows it as well."

Emmett, abruptly, had had enough and was quick to step in. "Teddie, what the fuck are you doing? You can't possibly be sug . . ."

But Kinnetik's CFO was far beyond any willingness to listen. "We'll just see about this," he snapped.

When Ted and Melanie had stormed out of the room, the silence they left behind them was thick and awkward - the kind of awkwardness that results when no one can figure out what to say - until Cedric Lasseigne cleared his throat, and regarded Justin with a lopsided smile.

"What was that?" he asked, deliberately exaggerating the sweet honeyed richness of his southern drawl. "Seussical the Musical, starring Diva 1 and Diva 2?"

Justin smiled, grateful for the older man's attempt to ease the tension that lingered in the wake of Ted's little queen-out, but the smile did not quite reach his eyes. Until Emmett stepped up and wrapped his arm around Justin's waist and murmured something in his ear. Then he grabbed the paintbrush from Justin's hand and daubed a big spot on the artist's chin, provoking the laughter he was looking for.

But there was no denying that the easy camaraderie that had existed in the office just moments earlier was no longer quite so easy or effortless, and Justin's motions were no longer quite so fluid, just as his eyes were no longer quite so bright.

Cedric Lasseigne watched his younger companions as they tried to shake off the effects of the accountant's toxic words, and made himself a little promise.

He didn't know what Ted Schmidt's problem was, yet. But, sooner or later, he would find out, and one day, when the moment was right, he would see that the man paid for his thoughtlessness and his deliberate, petty malice.

Cedric was not the kind of person who believed in or sought vengeance. But he did believe - passionately - in justice, and, somewhere along the way, in the days since he'd gotten to know young Justin, he had come to suspect that Brian Kinney shared that passion.
He didn't know why he believed that, but he really hoped he was right, because he was almost certain that the infamous Mr. Kinney would be a world-class champion in making sure that guilty parties always had to accept the consequences of their actions.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

It should be warmer by now, she thought. Winter should have released its death-grip on the city, and things should be greening up.

And, in truth, that was probably the case in outlying areas and inside city parks and residential neighborhoods and down by the river, but here, on Liberty Avenue, it was still pretty bleak, and the sound of the wind whistling around the corners of the building still raised goosebumps on her arms, as she stared out into a blustery morning where the sunlight seemed to be filtered through multiple layers of water vapor.

Or maybe it was what she'd just been told that was responsible for her shivering.

"How could he do this?" she asked finally, her voice trembling, almost breaking. "How could he?"

Lance Mathis sat stiffly erect, his hands clasped tight against the arms of his chair, and the look on his face seemed to vacillate between his desire to stand up and go to her to offer some kind of comfort, and the urge to strike out, to hit something in order to release an almost overwhelming surge of rage. In the end, though, he did neither. He simply attempted to provide an answer for her question.

"In all fairness, Cynthia, I believe he was manipulated into it - that he really thought he was doing a good thing, the right thing. And I'm told, by my sources, that it would have been very difficult for him to figure out what was going on, under the surface."

"Difficult," she echoed, turned quickly to study his face, "but not impossible."

"No," he admitted, "but he was . . ."

"Manipulated," she interrupted. "You already said that."

He nodded. "It's understandable," he observed, "when you're victimized by people who've made it their business to learn all your weaknesses, and to play on old acquaintances."

She walked back around her desk and sat down, clasping her hands in front of her. "And I'm supposed to . . . what? Just give him a pass? Accept that . . ."

"No. Of course not." He was quiet for a moment, noting the icy glint in her eyes. "Just to satisfy my curiosity, what do you want to do to him?"

She did not hesitate. "I want to castrate him and carve him into mincemeat."

Mathis sighed. "Somehow, I thought that you liked Ted."

She closed her eyes briefly, and took a deep breath. "So did I. But there's no excuse for this. And I want to make him pay, for what he's done to Brian. For betraying his trust and . . ."

Mathis raised his hands in a placating gesture. "But that's the one thing that you absolutely can't do. At least, not yet."

"But why? Why should we . . ."
"If you let him know that we're on to him, it could tip off the ones who set this in motion. And we can't afford to let that happen. Not yet. And besides, what's done is done. He's already made his move, so he can't do any more damage. We'll make sure of that."

"Jesus Christ!" she sighed. "Two million dollars. Jesus Christ!"

"I know," he said softly. "Not exactly chump change, is it?"

"He had to know what kind of damage this could do to Brian," she observed, still staring out into the morning, looking, perhaps, for some bright spot on which to focus. "He had to realize that losing that kind of money might ruin him. That he might never be able to recover from it. Especially . . ."

"Especially what?"

When she moved back to her desk to take her seat, he was stunned by the cold determination in her eyes. "Especially if there's more to it. This little scheme was directed at Brian - personally - but it wouldn't be enough, by itself, to put him down and keep him down. Let's face it; he's got a bit of Phoenix in him. He's proved it more than once. So there had to be more. Right?"

Lance Mathis didn't really want to smile; he was a little afraid of how she would react if he did. But he couldn't - quite - suppress it.

"What?" she snapped.

The smile stretched to a grin. "The longer I know him, the smarter he gets."

The raw anger in deep blue eyes was suddenly swept away before shadows of confusion. "Who? And what are you . . ."

"Kinney. And the reason is simple. Because he knew exactly who to put in charge while he's out of action."

Big, blue eyes got bigger for a moment; then she smiled. "Trying to score brownie points, Mr. Mathis?" she asked finally.

"No. Just trying to get you to smile. It's all going to be OK in the end. It really is."

She looked once more at the printed document he had handed her when he'd first entered her office. "How?" she said softly. "How will he ever . . ."

He leaned forward and grasped her hands tightly. "He's Brian-Fucking-Kinney. That's how."

She took a deep breath, squared her shoulders, and extracted her hands from his, but gently, with a tender smile that expressed her gratitude for his concern. "All right then. Tell me about the rest."

He nodded. "I'll give you our best guess, but we don't really have anything definite to go on. The only thing out of the ordinary - operationally speaking - is that Schmidt pulled one of the new interns and had him prepare some very colorful, semi-theatrical posters - very derivative stuff, according to the kid. He called it 'Toulouse-Lautrec lite' - whatever the fuck that means. But it was something that no one else seemed to know anything about, and, when he asked Ted if he should run it by Marcus or Andrew, the answer was a fast and resounding 'no'. Along with a look that could have killed, again according to the kid."

She sat back and steepled her hands in front of her face. "A new campaign then. Something that he wants to keep to himself."
He frowned. "You want to know what I think is going on?" he asked after a moment of silence. "What I think he's really doing?"

"By all means."

He took a deep breath. "I think it's all part of the personality disorder that he's had to deal with all his life, and this . . . this is just the last straw. This is ultimately too much for him to cope with."

"Go on," she said, her tone indicating that she was willing to listen, even if the hard gleam in her eyes was saying something else.

"Ted has spent his whole life being the guy left sitting on the bench, when everyone else has been chosen to play on a team. He's the perpetual water boy, or bat boy, or score keeper, or equipment manager. The guy who is never going to score the winning goal or throw the winning touchdown. And he knows it. But something inside him can't quite accept it. So he tells himself that it's all just a matter of bad luck - that if he just had the breaks - if he just had Brian's looks or intelligence or grace, or Justin's talent, or Emmett's self-confidence, or your skills . . . and cojones - that it would all work for him. So what does he do? He bides his time and waits for his chance, his one big break. His opportunity of a lifetime, to be the big hero."

He paused then and reached out to tap his finger on the document that disclosed how Ted had maneuvered Brian's funds. "That's what this is. His run for the gold. His only chance to show that he's a star - that he's a hero too. That he's worthy of Brian's trust, and more than that. That Brian should treasure him, appreciate him. Be grateful to him."

She looked up then, hearing a strange note in his voice that gave rise to a bizarre question. "Love him?"

"In a way," he answered. "Although not as in romantic, happily-ever-after love. Not that he wouldn't accept it if it was offered, but I'm pretty sure he's not quite that delusional. But in a 'he ain't heavy, he's my brother' kind of way . . . Maybe."

She frowned, and lowered her chin to brace against her clasped hands. Then she sighed. "That's really sad," she said finally. "And desperate."

"Especially when you realize that he's probably done the one thing that will make sure Brian never trusts him again."

She nodded. "At any rate, we have to make sure that he doesn't commit Kinnetik to anything. Since he's already shown himself to be the weak link in the company, they'll almost certainly target him again. Whatever this secret new campaign might be, we've got to suss it out and shut it down. And make absolutely sure that no contracts are signed or negotiated. Although - if push comes to shove - Ted doesn't have the authority to enter into contracts on behalf of the company."

"Who does?" Mathis asked quickly.

"You're looking at her," she answered. "Under ordinary circumstances, Brian is the only one, but, for the moment, it's me. So . . ."

He nodded and got to his feet and was in the process of reaching for the document on the desk when the door banged open and Ted Schmidt came rushing into the room.

Mathis opened his mouth to demand an explanation for the intrusion, but subsided without speaking when he noticed Cynthia, with a masterful bit of deliberately casual slight-of-hand, slipping the tell-tale print-out into her desk drawer.
"Cynthia, what were you thinking?" demanded the accountant. "Brian is not going to be pleased with having his orders ignored. And, on top of everything else, I need to be able to reach him. It makes no sense that you can reach him, and I can't."

Cynthia blinked. Slowly. Apparently debating which comment to address, and settling finally on a generic response. "Why?"

"Why?" Ted was almost sputtering, as Melanie followed him in and settled against the door-frame, her smile just slightly reminiscent of a Cheshire cat. "Do you realize that Justin is using Brian's office - to paint?"

"Yes. I do."

It was Ted's turn to stop and blink. "You do."

"I do," she repeated. "I take it that you object?"

His eyes were suddenly very dark and narrowed. "The point is certainly not whether or not I object. It's not my office. But neither is it yours, and you have an obligation to run this company and take care of this business in a way that Brian would approve, so . . ."

"And that," she said slowly, rising to her feet in one graceful surge, "is exactly what I'm doing. You, of course, are free to disagree or disapprove. But, since I'm the only one who is authorized to speak for Brian - or to him - you're just going to have to accept my judgment. Until he returns, of course. When you'll be free to lodge whatever complaints you choose."

Mathis noted the throbbing of a vein in Ted's throat as his face flushed an ugly, deep red. The accountant remained silent for several moments, and the security chief was pretty sure it was because he couldn't summon up either the breath - or the courage - to express what he wanted to say.

Finally, he turned away, and started to walk out of the office.

"There is, however, one more thing," said Cynthia, her voice both deadly soft and icily polite. "Listen to me, Ted. Are you listening?"

He went very still, and it was obvious that he realized that she was deliberately invoking a tactic created - almost patented - by Brian Kinney.

"I'm listening," he managed to reply - barely.

"If you ever come bursting into my office and speak to me in this fashion again," she said very deliberately, "then Brian is going to hear about it, and we'll let him decide which of us he chooses to listen to. Are we clear on that?"

He hesitated before nodding, and the succession of expressions that crossed his face said that he wanted to argue, wanted to defy her and throw her challenge back in her face. But ultimately, he couldn't, because he wasn't - quite - sure enough to take that chance.

But it was immediately obvious that Cynthia had no such reservations, and that she would not be content with a non-verbal response.

She moved around the desk quickly, stepping directly into Ted's space, and Mathis was forced to look away from the confrontation for fear that he would burst into laughter at the sight of this man, who - though not particularly large - was still much too robust to qualify for twink-status, fighting off an urge to cringe away from the petite blonde. "I repeat," she said softly, each word spoken with the clarity of a razor-sharp blade. "Are - we - clear?"

He licked his lips, and it was obvious that his mouth had gone painfully dry. "Crystal," he finally managed to whisper.

For a moment, he thought she might demand something louder and more emphatic, but she finally nodded and stepped back.

He turned away then and saw that Melanie had been watching the entire exchange, and, although it was gone almost before it registered, he instantly recognized the bright gleam of speculation in her eyes. He made a conscious choice to interpret it as speculation, although a tiny little voice deep in his mind suggested that it looked more like contempt.

He turned his gaze toward the window, and spent a moment fighting to regain his composure.

He would not forget this day; he made that promise to himself. Somebody was going to pay for treating him like some insignificant little pisser. He would make sure of that, no matter how long it took.

When he hurried out of the office, his pace increasing with every step, and then out of the building, with Melanie at his heels, it was obvious that he couldn't get away fast enough.

Lance Mathis, after watching the rapid retreat, turned back to study Cynthia's face and immediately recognized a tiny spark of triumph in her eyes.

"That was probably a mistake," he observed.

"I know." She didn't seem to have any interest in defending her actions.

"He could make trouble."

"Undoubtedly."

Then he grinned. "Felt good though, didn't it?"

"Not good enough."

"You probably should have tried to resist the urge?"

Her face was suddenly very cold. "Little fucker got off easy. I'd like to throw him into a wood chipper. But if you think I was tough, wait til Brian gets through with him."

The clinic visit had not gone well.

Turnage, as usual, had been high-handed and arrogant, and Brian, as usual, had responded to the surgeon's hubris with sarcasm and disdain, and they had wound up in a snipefest of olympic proportions. Then, after learning that the physical therapist who had originally been scheduled to handle his treatment had been sidelined by a freak hit-and-run accident, Brian had been forced to submit to the ministrations of the clinic's staff therapist, one Dulcinea (and yes, that really was her name) McCoy, a native Australian with a demeanor like a storm trooper whom Brian had christened 'Matilda the Hun'. The woman was (probably) very proficient in her professional duties, but her people skills were virtually non-existent, and, by the end of the session, it was painfully obvious that this particular therapist and this particular patient were as incompatible as it was possible for two human beings to be.

Thus, by the time McClaren followed Brian back to their car, walking his accustomed fine line of trying to watch over the man without actually appearing to watch over him, it was uncertain who was more relieved that the visit was over - the FBI agent, the patient, or the clinic staff.

McClaren would later figure out that he should have expected things to go from bad to worse as he related the information he'd been given concerning the actions and adventures of Kinnetik's CFO.

When he'd finished the recitation, he realized that he hadn't been sure what to expect, but he was sure that this wasn't it.

Brian's eyes had gone as dark as burnt coffee. Darker. Filled with thick, almost black shadows. And his jaw was clinched tight, so tight that it looked painful.

But, so far, he had said nothing.

"Brian?"

McClaren's eyes darted from the road ahead - the narrow curving road which had to be navigated with great care if he wanted to avoid sending the BMW plowing into a dune or a patch of sea grass or a sandy crevasse - to the man at his side.

Brian had studied his face with a degree of skepticism as he'd recited the tale of Ted Schmidt's financial exploits. He'd even laughed once or twice.

Until the FBI agent had said the magic words.

Two - million - dollars.

That seemed to have done it - gotten through the façade of nonchalance and pierced the armor of invincibility.

He had expected anger, and in that, he'd not been disappointed. There was definitely anger flashing in the depths of those hazel eyes, anger that was well on its way to becoming a towering, relentless rage.

That thought might have induced a smile, when he remembered that Brian had actually been the inspiration for a comic book hero bearing that very name. Only . . . the anger, as intense as it was, seemed to be on the verge of being submerged beneath another feeling - a feeling that McClaren found himself curiously reluctant to identify.

Brian Kinney was furious, but he was also deeply, terribly hurt - and determined to keep it to himself. He was relishing the anger, trying to encourage it, to let it leap and flourish and engulf him, so that he wouldn't have to acknowledge the other feeling, the one he didn't know how to handle.

"Brian, I . . ."

"Stop the car!"

"What? Why?" McClaren heard the note of desperation in his companion's voice, and wondered if he was feeling ill, or if he was in pain, or if . . . whatever.

"Just . . . stop!" It was spoken in a tone of voice that brooked no argument.

McClaren pulled over, and the sedan had barely come to a halt when Brian opened the door and almost leapt out onto the sandy roadside, managing - somehow - to extract the single crutch from its place beside his seat and propel himself away from the car, all in one semi-fluid motion. Quite an accomplishment, thought McClaren as he hastened to follow, for a man whose motor capabilities were, for the moment, extremely compromised.

Driven more by a burst of conflicted emotions than by physical energy, Brian managed to navigate through a narrow succession of dunes and depressions, emerging at last on a crescent-shaped stretch of beach that was pocked with tidal pools and bordered by a jumble of dark stone.

McClaren had caught up with his charge quickly enough, but the look he got when he reached out a hand to offer support and assistance was enough to make him back off - fast. Despite the fact that he was in obvious pain and struggling for balance, Brian was in no mood to accept any help.

When he reached the dark, jagged wall of stone that ran perpendicular to the water's edge, he flopped down on its surface with no nuance of his usual grace, neither knowing nor caring that one sharp edge had ripped a four-inch hole in the knee of his $300.00 designer jeans - and a gash in the skin beneath it. It was left to McClaren to notice and, swearing under his breath, pull a handkerchief from his pocket to clean the wound and staunch the blood-flow.

"Goddammit, Brian!" he muttered, as he tried to wipe away the dark sediment left by the scum on the stone's surface. "If you get fucking gangrene, I'm the one that's gonna have to explain to Turnage and my boss. Just . . ."

"Shut up." It was barely a whisper.

"Don't tell me . . ."

"Just . . . shut up, and leave me alone."

McClaren opened his mouth, ready to indulge a little emotional venting of his own, when he looked up from his task, and saw . . .

He looked away quickly, drawing a deep shaky breath, and electing to believe that he had been mistaken. There had been no tears in those hazel eyes, certainly not over something as mundane as money. Although, he had to admit, two million dollars was, perhaps, beyond the limits of "mundane".

"Brian," he said softly, after several moments of silence, "what can I . . ."

"It must be hard for you," said Brian, his eyes trained on a scrap of sail, tacking against the wind, just skimming the horizon. "With everything you see, in the course of doing your job, it must be hard."

McClaren dabbed once more at the cut on Brian's knee, before shifting to find a seat nearby. "What? What must be hard?"

"Trusting people."

The FBI agent picked up a splinter of driftwood and began to doodle in the wet sand - a quarter moon, a shamrock, a leaf. "Sometimes," he answered finally, "Depends on the person and the circumstances." He raised his head then, to peer deeply into Brian's eyes, but, if he was hoping for a flash of insight, he was disappointed. The hazel depths had gone opaque again, obscured with shadow.

"What about you?" he asked, sensing that Brian might, if he was very lucky and very careful - and held his mouth in just the right way - reveal a tiny fragment of elementary truth.
But not yet. "I don’t."

"You don’t what?"

"Trust people."

McClaren thought about that for a moment before voicing another question.

"Never?"

A pause - brief but telling. "Almost."

"But... once in a while."

A soft sound - almost a sigh. "Almost never."

"Because?"

For a while, he thought Brian would not answer at all, and when he did, it still wasn’t much of an answer. "Too much risk."

McClaren nodded. "If you say something like that, it usually means that you have trusted somebody, and you got burned."

Brian said nothing, shifting his attention to the sudden, graceful leap of a dolphin out beyond the breakers - a thing of beauty and grace, the complete antithesis of the darkness that seemed to surround him now. And once more, his eyes were suspiciously bright.

"Brian," McClaren tried again, "I know it's a shitload of money, but..."

Those perfect lips curved into a slightly mocking smile. "You think it's about the money, McFed?"

He reached into his shirt pocket then, and pulled out a pair of Serengeti sunglasses, elegant and sleek and almost as perfect as the perfect face they fit on. "Haven't you figured it out yet? I can always make more money."

At that point, McClaren tried to meet his gaze, and realized that the donning of the sunglasses had been deliberate - to render those perfectly beautiful eyes unreachable.

"Who?" he asked. "You're not just talking about some weasel of an accountant who screwed you over. That's obvious. So who did you trust that..."

Brian managed to get to his feet with some degree of agility, using the crutch to brace himself. Then he started back toward the car.

"Who?" McClaren called after him, suddenly realizing that it was not just an idle question, that he really wanted to know the answer.

"Nobody," came the answer. "Not any more. And not ever again."

The storm had been raging for more than an hour, and there was still no sign that it would abate any time soon. Lightning sizzled and trailed brilliant fingertips across the night sky as the wind howled and huffed like a wild thing, and the roar of thunder shook the foundations of the cottage, although the sound was almost lost beneath the relentless growl of the surf.
And through it all, Brian Kinney had remained almost motionless, stretched out on a deck chair beneath the shelter of the covered deck, an acoustic guitar braced against his body as his hands flexed over frets and strings. The deliberate movements of his fingers indicated that he was playing a specific melody, but the sound was so soft that it was lost beneath the howl of the storm.

On the third day of their stay, exercising a compulsion to know everything there was to know about the place they were staying, McClaren had unearthed the guitar, old-fashioned and faded, shoved deep into a high shelf in a utility closet, its case thick with spider webs, but the instrument inside mostly intact, except for a couple of broken strings, easily replaced. Brian had been instantly intrigued.

He continued his deliberate stroking of the guitar, but his eyes remained riveted on the pyrotechnics exploding across the canvas of the night.

It was a continuation of the silence which had enveloped him through most of the day, and Chris McClaren had become more and more uneasy as the hours had gone by.

Cynthia had called, as expected, just as they'd arrived back from their trip to the clinic, and Brian had spent almost an hour sequestered in his room, listening to what she had to tell him and sharing his thoughts with her. The FBI agent had no doubt that the two of them had been considering how to respond to Ted Schmidt's treachery, and, perhaps, trying to understand the motives behind it, but he had no idea what they might have decided. Brian had been stone-faced and mute when he'd emerged from the room, but McClaren was dead certain of one thing: he would not want to be in the accountant's shoes when all this was over.

When. He found himself reluctantly considering whether or not he should use a different word. Not 'when', but 'if'. But no, he would not let himself believe that the monsters who'd done this to Kinney could triumph in the end. The investigation was in progress, and the individuals who were currently in position to administer the coup de grace - the final stroke to complete the process - were highly skilled and well trained, and once they had completed their mission, there would be only one final component needed to achieve the goal everyone desired.

Justice.

Only he wasn't entirely sure that the one piece of the puzzle that would complete the picture would ever fall into place.

In the end, it would almost certainly come down to Brian Kinney and his willingness - or lack thereof - to confront his demons.

The man was as fearless as a lion; McClaren had no doubt about that. He had seen it proved time after time, even though he'd only known Kinney for a short time. But it was one thing to face the world and defy the odds and refuse to stand down; it was something else entirely to be able to turn inward and confront the dark places in one's own soul, places that would automatically shy away from the light of discovery, in the exercise of a primal instinct for survival.

Even the bravest man would think twice about volunteering for such an ordeal.

Alexandra Corey had attempted, several times during this very long day, to approach Brian, to explain what she was proposing to do and why it had to be done - to appeal to his thirst for retribution and his sense of outrage and his desire for justice.
He'd just looked at her with dark, expressionless eyes.

At that point, she'd tried a change in tactics - attempting to provoke an angry response, to make him mad enough to engage in a shouting match in which he might reveal more than he intended.

The eyes had remained dark and expressionless - almost - although there had been a tiny little spark of amusement in those inky depths, which was just enough to tell her that he knew exactly what she was doing.

Score: Kinney, two; the long arm of the law, zero.

Another change of tactic, utilizing the oblique approach: trying to charm him into lowering his guard and allowing her to encroach on his personal space as she led him through a series of innocuous questions.

He had remained uncharmed.

McClaren stood now in the dark entryway, aware that Corey was still sitting at the kitchen table, lingering over a slice of Trina’s addictive key-lime pie and another cup of coffee in a day that had already spawned a need for far too many such shots of caffeine.

He wondered if any of them would sleep tonight. Then he wondered if he would sleep tonight, and - if so - where.

He knew better than to assume anything, but this, he decided abruptly, had gone on for far too long already.

With a deep breath, he moved to the steamer trunk-style bar cabinet in the corner of the sitting room and retrieved a half-full fifth of JB and a couple of shot glasses, allowing himself a small smile when he recalled how appalled he'd been when he'd first realized that Brian had no qualms about mixing painkillers and whiskey. He had protested; Brian had laughed at him. And that had been that. He had worried a bit, figuring that he would be held accountable if the man he was charged to protect managed to overdose and kill himself in the process, but then he'd realized that Brian Kinney was not a child and did not require a nanny to protect him from himself.

If nothing else, this entire debacle had proven that Kinney was a survivor; if determined homophobes with knives and iron bars couldn't destroy him, it was unlikely that a little mingling of Vicodin and bourbon could pull it off.

He went out onto the deck, closing the French doors behind him, and noting that the floor was slick and wet as the wind was driving occasional spates of rain into the sheltered area, but the space further back, where Brian was sprawled, was cozy enough, and McClaren proceeded to move deeper into the shadows, reflecting as he drew nearer that it should be illegal for anyone to look so hot in simple jeans and wifebeater. There was, however, ultimately no denying the delectable quality of the image; the golden skin contrasted beautifully with the black shirt, and the jeans were tight enough to emphasize the generous package to perfection.

Brian did not acknowledge McClaren's arrival as he dropped into an adjacent deck chair, but hazel eyes did shift toward the clink of glassware, and there might - if the agent used a bit of imagination to embroider something he wasn't sure he'd seen at all - have been a flash of appreciation in the depths of those eyes as he tilted the bottle of Beam and began to pour.

Now that he was close enough, he realized that Brian was not quite as totally focused on the storm as he'd seemed, since there was music rising from the IPOD that was braced against his shoulder, and that the sound coming from the guitar harmonized perfectly with an instantly-recognizable blues classic.

Crossroads.

Of course. If Brian Kinney was going to play guitar, he was going to do it in sync with the very best.

McClaren listened for a moment before reaching out to set a half-full tumbler within Brian's reach. "You do that well," he said, nodding toward the guitar.

The grin was sardonic to the nth degree, but at least it was a grin rather than the scowl that perfect face had worn all day. "I do most things well," came the response, "or I don't do them at all."

McClaren laughed, relieved to see some spark of that insouciant self-confidence showing itself in the face of everything else that had happened during this very long day.

Clapton was coming to the end of the song, and Brian played and joined in singing the final line. "And I'm standing at the crossroads. Believe I'm sinking down."

He set the guitar aside and reached for his glass. "This the best you can do?" he asked.

McClaren knew exactly what he was being asked. "My boss - FBI honcho extraordinaire - is sitting at the kitchen table. Sometimes I might be reckless," he explained, "but I'm not suicidal."

Brian's smile was weary but willing. "Pussy boy." He lifted his glass in a mock-toast and drank.

"You didn't eat," McClaren pointed out. "If you like, I'll raid the fridge for you."

"No."

"Brian, you . . ."

"I said no."

"But . . ."

Hazel eyes glinted with impatience. "You can either be a trick or a nursemaid. Not both. So . . . choose."

McClaren moved quickly, so quickly that Brian had no chance to prepare a defense and wound up with a lapful of warm, firm body.

"Easiest choice I ever made."

Brian smirked. "Your 'honcho extraordinaire' is going to freak out if she comes strolling through that door."

"She won't. But if she did, she might want to watch."

"And she's not even a loud-mouthed redhead," Brian retorted with a little laugh, and ignored the puzzled look that formed on McClaren's face.

He looked up then into warm blue eyes, and his companion quickly claimed his mouth, making no attempt to resist the temptation. They spent a few minutes sampling and tasting, leaving both slightly breathless, and McClaren sat back and took advantage of the continuing flashes of the storm to study the face looking up at him.
"Cynthia okay?" he asked gently.

Quicksilver smile. "Define 'okay'."

The FBI agent thought for a minute. "Maintaining her cool?"

The smile became a chuckle. "If threatening to remove Theodore's balls with a rusty hacksaw counts as cool, then yeah. She's okay."

McClaren stared into eyes too dark to read. "You lied, you know," he said softly.

"About what?"

"About not trusting anyone. You trust Cynthia."

A slow blink said that he wanted to deny it, but couldn't. "She's earned it," he admitted finally.

"And Taylor?" McClaren knew that he was fighting dirty, but also knew that desperate times called for desperate measures, and the necessity was at hand. "You trusted Taylor."

"Yeah." The laugh this time was bitter. "And look where that got me."

Then it was McClaren taking a moment for a deep breath. "And me. You trust me."

"No, I don't."

"Yes. You do."

Brian looked out into the storm, as if he was looking for answers, for refuge. "No, I . . ."

"Yes. You do."

Hazel eyes turned then and looked directly up into deep shadowy blue. "Okay. I do. You want to know why?"

"Yeah."

"Because it's what you get paid to do. Because it's got nothing to do with your feelings or your heart or any shitty notions about nobility or caring or honor. Because it's your fucking job."

McClaren went very still, and prayed that nothing of what he was feeling would find its way into his eyes, for he was absolutely certain that he had never in his life heard anything more tragic, more heartbreaking. "Okay," he said finally. "I'll accept that. But now I need you to accept something for me. To trust me just that much further."

"And what would that be?"

The FBI agent considered his words carefully. "Do you know why I'm here, Brian? Why I've been assigned to protect you? It's not because of what already happened to you. They came after you and took their best shot, and you survived. And yes, it was certainly because they hated you. Not some generic, nameless, any-queer-will-do fag, but you - specifically. But for that very reason, because it was obvious that you were the specific target, it would be logical to assume that they'd know better than to try it again. That they'd realize that it would be a huge risk - that forewarned is forearmed - unless there's some mitigating factor that makes the risk worth taking."

The smirk was back. "Mitigating factor? Since when do you like big words, McFed?"
"Will you shut the fuck up and listen to me? I'm trying to make you understand why you're still in danger, and you just . . ."

Brian huffed an impatient sigh. "How fucking stupid do you think I am? I'm still a target because they're afraid I might be able to identify the big boys. Because they can't be sure I didn't notice something, see something that would put names to those shadowy faces." He paused then, and regarded the FBI agent with a smug grin. "How'd I do?"

McClaren rolled his eyes. "You're the most aggravating asshole I've ever known. And you're also exactly right. And that's why . . ."

A bigger sigh. "That's why I have to let your distaff Svengali go scrambling around in my sub-conscious memory."

The FBI agent frowned, trying to decipher what it was that he was not - quite - hearing in the man's voice. "Are they right, Brian? Did you see something - notice something - that . . ."

Brian shook his head slightly, as if to shy away from a thought he did not wish to have. "I don't know," he admitted faintly. "Sometimes I think . . . but I really don't know."

McClaren studied his expression, looking for - and finding, for just a moment - a trace of vulnerability. "Okay then," he said finally. "Let's go in and . . ."

"Tomorrow," Brian said quickly. "Sufficient unto this day . . . well, let's just say that I've had enough, for today."

"I thought Brian Kinney never got enough." The comment was accompanied by a quick roguish grin.

Brian smiled and shifted so that his lips were just brushing against the soft skin under McClaren's jaw-line - the perfect angle for nuzzling and licking and sucking and nibbling. "We've got all night to find out."

The FBI agent was immediately aware of the tightening in his groin, and one shift of the leg that was braced against his companion's abdomen confirmed that the very same thing was happening to Brian, causing his jeans to become incredibly full and tight.

He should object. He should insist that the session with Corey take precedence, that it was too important to delay. He should concentrate on his professional responsibilities.

Brian's smile was transformed into soft, sultry laughter, as if he could read every thought, interpret every nuance of reluctance, trace every pulse of desire.

McClaren frowned, not quite able to swallow a quick surge of resentment. He should refuse to be sidetracked. He really should.

But those lips were so tempting and moist, and that skin was so warm and perfect, and the scent of the man was so seductive and intoxicating, and that bulge was so thick and throbbing so intensely, and . . .

Fuck!

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

Crossroads - Robert Johnson
tbc
Chapter 32

Chapter 32

There might, she thought, be a more beautiful sweet young thing than Nicholas Avolar in Pittsburgh, but she doubted it. Not, at least, any more.

Brian Kinney, during his days of glory on the soccer field - and in his equally glorious early ventures into the flaming bright world of Liberty Avenue - would have qualified, but he was no longer eligible to be classified as either particularly sweet or particularly young. Not any more. Especially in light of recent events.

She took a deep, satisfying drag of cigarette smoke and wondered if he would ever feel young - or sweet - again.

Sharon Briggs had not been a regular smoker since her college days when she'd picked up the habit from the self-same 'sweet, young thing' she was now lamenting the loss of. But she still used the activity as a smoke-screen - pun intended - to provide her with common ground for establishing a rapport with co-workers and acquaintances in the process of fleshing out her undercover identities.

Like this one.

But back to her not exactly unpleasant observations about young Avolar.

Justin Taylor had been almost as beautiful, from Sharon's perspective. Except that she wasn't all that fond of blonds, although she had been reconsidering that preference of late, in light of her re-acquaintance with . . . but that was not germane to this particular moment. Nicholas was a rare combination of two worlds: black mother - a woman who had been in the employ of The Club since well before she was legally old enough to hold a job and who was, herself, quite lovely; and Hispanic father - a descendant, although on the wrong side of the blanket, of Spanish aristocracy, who had inherited none of the wealth but all of the patrician good looks of his noble ancestors.

Hector Avolar had not lived long enough to welcome his son into the world, falling to his death from the 28th floor of a skyscraper he was helping to construct in his job as a commercial welder, just two weeks prior to his child's birth, but his life had had a major impact on the boy's future nevertheless. The manner of his passing had closed certain doors to young Nicholas, and served to guide his path firmly away from the harsher environments of industrial labor.

Nicholas' mother - Millie - had made it her primary purpose in life to assure that Nicholas would never venture into the world his father had inhabited; he would not explore opportunities to develop potential skills in welding, or construction, or carpentry, or any of the other manual professions for which he might have been well suited.

Instead, Nicholas would learn about the service industry, which provided Millie's livelihood - such as it was.

Barring the unforeseen - or the virtually impossible - he would never be rich; she knew and accepted that. He would struggle, financially, throughout his life. But at least, he would not die as the result of a random industrial accident or a gust of wind pushing him in the wrong direction at the wrong time, or a careless misstep in overreaching for a tool.

It never occurred to the woman that there were other means in which a young man could lose his way - or his life - and, unless Sharon was grossly mistaken, the boy was currently trying to figure out how to navigate safe passage through some shark-infested waters, right at this very moment.

Nicholas Avolar had several problems. Some, she thought she might be able to help him with, but others . . . for those he needed assistance that she probably could not provide. For those, he needed someone he could relate to more directly.

She concealed a smile behind her hand.

He needed his own version of Brian Kinney. Or so she thought. But she couldn't really be sure. The simple fact that he showed virtually no interest in her - had never so much as followed her with his eyes or noticed when her skirt was hiked up to reveal a shapely leg - might mean nothing more than an under-active libido or excessive shyness. She couldn't be 100% certain, of course, since she didn't have eyes in the back of her head, but a woman tended to know these things, instinctively. Still, it was debatable. While her gay-dar worked perfectly well on other lesbians, it left something to be desired in identifying the male members of the gay culture.

Brian would know; no doubt about that. But meanwhile . . . she thought she might ask for a judgment call by her current partner in crime who, according to the back story concocted for her newest persona, was both a homeless veteran currently living on the streets of Pittsburgh and her brother. The cover story was a little awkward; it did not flow as easily as other cover stories devised for her over the years, but the connection had been necessary, to gain entrée for her into the rarefied atmosphere of The Club.

It had been Jared Hilliard who had first connected with the Charles family in general, and Rachel Charles, cook extraordinaire in particular. Despite the degree of her talent - which was almost immeasurable - Miss Rachel, as she was always addressed in the ultra-formal environment of The Club, refused to identify herself as a chef, but she was instrumental in providing the opportunity for Sharon - currently masquerading as Shirley Harper - to apply for and land a position as the establishment's new assistant chef.

Sharon/Shirley sat now on the small concrete terrace designated as a smoking area for the staff, and watched as a 747 banked south for a landing at Pittsburgh International Airport. Off to the West, the sun was an arc of molten copper, a bulbous extrusion above the horizon, the framework of a new skyscraper painting stark vertical bars and ladders across its face. The building represented a real sore spot for the members of The Club since it interfered with the pristine nature of their view. They had mounted a concerted effort to block the construction, but, in this instance, their attempts had been thwarted. It wasn't often that they came up against someone with more money, more willingness to spend it, and more political clout than their own, but it still happened on occasion.

The members of the board - all of whom performed their duties in complete privacy since the identity of the board members was known only to Club members - had not been pleased with the City Planning Commission in this circumstance, but, ultimately, they had been forced to accept what they could not change. It would, however, grant them some future advantages; the next time they required a favor from the commission, their cooperation in this little venue would be remembered - and repaid.

It was politics as usual.

And all of The Club's employees were well aware of how the arrangement worked. Few places in the world were more grounded in the old, familiar principle: rank did, indeed, have its privileges.

The Club's membership would have been astonished to learn how much Sharon Briggs knew - firsthand - about such elitest privileges, as there was absolutely nothing in her demeanor or her superficial attitude to indicate even the slightest familiarity with the advantages of class and wealth. She had actually had some training in gourmet cooking - as in desultory French culinary classes for
The idle rich - which accounted for her familiarity with professional terminology, and thus she was able to excel in her new profession, thanks in part to her own affinity for cooking and, in no small part, to the natural skills and ingenuity of one Emmett Honeycutt, not to mention his willingness to share his expertise, for a good cause. Emmett had quickly agreed to provide tips for the undercover cop, finding it very amusing that he was instrumental in assisting in the scamming of such an establishment, in the certainty that any attempt on his part to set foot inside the hallowed walls of The Club would have undoubtedly set off proximity alarms. Or, as he termed them, "fag alerts".

On this particular night, for example, Sharon/Shirley had prepared a classic herb-crusted rack of lamb with rosemary potatoes, and Vietnamese caramel shrimp with coconut jasmine rice - both recipes newly developed by the flamboyant, mega-talented Auntie Em. The Club staff had been raving about the aromas wafting through the kitchen all afternoon and stealing little nibbles whenever an opportunity presented itself.

Now, her primary tasks were done, allowing her to take a breather while Rachel was putting the finishing touches on a variety of fruit parfaits for dessert. Time, perhaps, to exercise her other skills, the ones that made her uniquely qualified for her particular brand of police work.

"Come here, Nicholas," she said quietly, as she stubbed out her cigarette. "You've got a bit of a stain on your jacket." Her smile was slightly sardonic. "Wouldn't want to offend the Masters, now would we?"

"Christ! I hate that term," answered the young man, his frown reflecting more of whatever it was he was thinking than anything she might have said. But he came forward, nonetheless, knowing that she was right, whether he liked the terminology or not.

She took a dish towel from her apron and began dabbing at the tiny spot that marred the starched pristine whiteness of his sleeve. "Why? It doesn't really matter what they call themselves, does it? Especially when you know it's just more of their pretentious crap."

He had a nice laugh, she thought, as he chuckled softly. "Care to go upstairs and say that out loud?" he asked.

She favored him with a look of mock horror. "What? And get burned at the stake for spouting heresy? No, thanks, since we all know that paying homage to the idyllic little fantasy they've got going here is just part of the job description."

He looked up then, spotting a flicker of lightning in clouds off to the North. "Fantasy, huh? You make it sound like some kind of innocent little game. Like they're just pretending to live in a world that doesn't exist any more."

She nodded. "Isn't that about the size of it? I mean, no matter how much insulation from reality their money can buy, there's still a world out there beyond the gates of this place. It might never get close enough to touch them, but they have to know it's there, even if they don't want to recognize it. Bottom line is that they can't stop the march of time - not even with all their money and power."

His eyes were suddenly very dark. "Can't they? They do a pretty fair job of stopping it - here, in their own little corner of the world. And sometimes, it feels more real than what's outside, like we're all caught up in it. Like we wouldn't exist without it, you know? Sometimes..."

She waited a bit, before prompting him, hoping he'd continue on his own. But he didn't, suddenly looking as if he'd frightened himself with his careless words. "Sometimes?" she repeated.

His voice went very soft, barely rising above a whisper. "Sometimes it's like they forget I'm a real person at all. Like I'm just some kind of cardboard cut-out or something. Just an object, who can't hear what they're saying and wouldn't care if it did."

She cocked her head, as if pondering his words. "I don't know how you keep your cool. To have to stand there and anticipate their every need, and pretend not to hear the kind of holier-than-thou, fundamentalist, pseudo-Christian crap that they use to justify themselves and their view of the world. I bet you hear some major bullshit, don't you?"

Abruptly, he pulled away from her. "That's good enough," he said sharply. "I'm just 'young Nicholas', you know. They probably wouldn't notice if I served them wearing nothing but a wifebeater and a jock strap."

She allowed a glint of predatory interest to flare in her eyes. "Oh, I doubt that, Honey. You're young and beautiful, and they may be old as sin, but they're not dead."

In spite of himself, he huffed a small laugh. "Now that's the kind of remark that could really get you burned at the stake. Ain't no sissy-boys in these hallowed halls."

Her smile was slightly arch. "Really?"

The tell-tale flash in his beautiful eyes was barely there, but it was enough.

Bingo!

He started to walk away, but she stopped him with a gentle hand on his forearm. "Hey," she said softly, "I know it must be really hard to put up with everything you deal with in there, but if you ever need to vent, well . . . I'm a really good listener. You know, I'm staying with Rachel, for now. Until I can find a place of my own, and she has a little open-house thing every Sunday afternoon. For anybody who wants to hang out, or sample some of her new dishes. Or whatever. Why don't you drop by? I know she'd . . ."

But he was shaking his head, preparing to raise the objections she'd expected. She had already plumbed Rachel's observations about Nicholas, and anticipated that this problem would come up. "Her son and I . . . we don't get along too well."

Remembering Hilliard's remarks about the younger Charles and his parroted comments about Brian Kinney and his "kind", she was pretty sure she understood why Nicholas and Buddy would not be friendly, but she knew that getting this young man into a more casual, less confined setting could be the key to unlocking the store of information she needed.

Information that he had. Of that she was all but certain, in that her instincts were insisting that he was the source she'd been seeking. There were others - including Rachel herself - who had provided interesting tidbits and small clues. But this young man . . . he was the answer to her prayers. Now all she had to do was convince him to talk.

Easier said than done.

Her smile grew warmer. "In case you haven't noticed, Rachel is not all that enamored with the little bastard herself these days. In fact, if it hadn't been for my brother and his - well, let's call it a timely intervention - young Buddy would probably be sitting in a jail cell these days. So look, I know Rachel likes you. She's always talking about how hard it must be for you to endure all the crap you have to take. So why not drop by? I hear she's experimenting with new cheesecake recipes this week. So how the hell can you resist that?"

He grinned abruptly, and her breath almost caught in her throat as she realized how young he really was, and she felt a twinge of remorse that she'd been forced to manufacture a lie in order to draw him in. Rachel, in fact, had never expressed much sympathy for the boy - not because she disliked him, but simply because it never occurred to her to feel sorry for his circumstances. All of the employees of The Club inhabited the same, semi-twisted world, in which tolerating the condescension and arrogance of the patrons of the establishment was necessary to survival. It all came under the heading of accepting the status quo and living with it, in order to hold on to a job that offered security, semi-decent benefits, and a living wage. It was almost a feudal culture - a reality only found in narrow little sub-sections of a society that depended on the preservation of a long-standing arrangement between the 'haves' and the 'have-nots', and it only survived if all concerned parties profited from its survival.

A grim parody, in a way, of government that existed only by the consent of the governed.

Sharon noted again how innocent the boy was - almost childlike - and that brought on another tiny pang of guilt, but she dismissed it quickly. Undercover cops couldn't afford the luxury of regrets.

"I do love cheesecake," he admitted finally.

She deliberately swallowed her misgivings and flashed him a brilliant smile. "The newest great American pastime - loving cheesecake. So you'll come?"

"You sure I'd be welcome?" he asked. "I mean, I always liked Miss Rachel, but . . ."

"I'm sure," she replied, ignoring a nagging memory of Buddy doing a mocking imitation of Nicholas offering up a serving of 'coffee, tea, or me'. If necessary, she would handle young Charles; doing so might even provide the perfect opportunity for her to vent some of the frustration inherent in practicing the patience necessary for doing her job. And she'd caution Rachel as well, who, although having nothing against Nicholas, had mentioned on occasion that his mother, Millie, was a 'flighty bit of fluff'.

It was time to encourage the building of alliances, which might, in the long run, prove beneficial to all parties involved. Even if the original purpose for the encouragement would be deemed nefarious, provided the parties ever found out about that purpose.

Nicholas was still hesitant, but finally, with a winsome smile, he nodded his agreement before straightening his once more immaculate jacket and heading inside to attend to the 'Masters' who were always assigned to his table. She watched him go, wondering if he really had no idea why he was so perpetually in demand. The quality of service he provided was excellent, of course, but no more so than any of the rest of the servers who catered to the needs of the exclusive members. He was attentive and conscientious and unfailingly polite and amiable, but so were the others.

There was really only one substantial difference between Nicholas and the five others who saw to the needs of the dinner crowd on a regular night. Nicholas was prettier; she knew that sounded slightly patronizing, even slightly sexist - in a backhanded kind of way. But it was also true, and it surprised her that the members seemed to be completely unaware that they were responding to the boy's lovely physical qualities without ever once realizing the slightly effeminate nature of his charms.

She thought it would have been hilarious, if it weren't so tragic. One day they would notice, when Nicholas was no longer such a sweet, young thing, and when they did, it would be the boy who paid the price for sins he didn't even know he was committing.

Sharon/Shirley glanced at her Timex - deliberately squelching an urge to lament the absence of her customary elegant watch - and noted that she really should be getting back to work. The 'Masters' would undoubtedly be calling for her soon, to comment on the quality of her latest offerings. They were always incredibly polite, even if their manner was infuriatingly condescending. Of course, they would have ulterior motives too, in wanting to wheedle the recipes out of her, to present to their private chefs at home, in order to please their various trophy wives. She should go in soon, and she would . . . soon. Just as soon, she thought as she fished another cigarette out of her pack, as she paid another little homage to the man who was responsible for so many things in her life, including her presence here. The first drag was, as always, the most satisfying, and she gave a small nod to the image that occupied her thoughts so frequently these days.

Here's to you, Master Kinney - wherever you are.

It would have been easy, of course, for her to learn exactly where he was, but she'd chosen not to find out, in the theory that the fewer people who knew, the better. For Brian, safety now depended on anonymity, and it pleased her to remember that she could not divulge - accidentally or otherwise
- what she did not know.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~*

Lindsey relaxed into the exquisite softness of the leather sofa in Brian's office, and allowed herself a little sigh of relief.

It had been a long day, and she had Cynthia to thank for organizing everything and taking care of the details so that Lindsey had nothing to do but go along for the ride. But she was still tired; everything seemed to make her tired these days, and she almost slipped into a mindset which would allow her to wonder why. Almost - but not quite; she caught herself just in time in order to avoid issues she was not yet ready to face.

Cynthia, who was perched on a chair at the conference table, reading over a new contract agreement with Brown Athletics, before affixing her signature to approve the terms, should - logically - have been sitting at Brian's stylish desk; she was, after all, acting on his behalf. But she had never even moved toward it when she'd led Lindsey into the room so she could get a look at Justin's latest workin-progress. Instead, she had maintained a deliberate distance as if someone was already sitting there.
Brian's desk was . . . Brian's, and she almost never allowed herself to sit there.

Lindsey was pretty sure it was because Brian's assistant had some kind of superstitious misgivings about standing too long in his space, usurping his position.

It was silly, of course, but Lindsey understood it perfectly. She understood because she felt the same way and knew how far she would go to assure that Brian could eventually come back to them and resume his life, and if it involved silly little rituals and superstitions, then so be it. She would do anything. Almost, including . . .

But she wasn't in the mood to delve too deeply into those possibilities either. Not yet anyway.

She sighed and closed her eyes. She'd been in Pittsburgh too long, as her partner kept telling her, and she should go home. To Toronto. Only . . .

"Shit!"

She opened her eyes to see that Justin was massaging the fingers of what he always referred to as his
'gimp' hand, as he stood before the canvas he'd been working on for the last few days.

The painting was almost finished now, and it was . . . Lindsey sighed, thinking that she didn't even have the words to describe it. She loved Justin; she really did. But she was also intensely jealous of his prodigious talent, an ability she recognized as immeasurably beyond her own puny skills.

"You okay, Honey?" she asked, swallowing her tiny little surge of resentment. She would have given anything - almost - to be able to capture an image like that. To be able to capture Brian like that. The portrait was a masterpiece, truly worthy of its subject, and every stroke, every shade, every line of it shouted out the love of the artist for his model.

Brian needed to come home, to see this - to allow himself to understand it.

Lindsey took a deep breath, knowing that she had finally come full circle; that she had finally reached a point at which she could understand that her conflicted, complex motives in trying to persuade Justin to immigrate to the artistic mecca of New York City had been instrumental in generating something that might very well have destroyed the man she would always love, even though she had never wanted to love him. And the young artist, as well.

The bottom line was hard for her to accept, but it was unavoidable. Justin's talent, his genius, his ability - none of that mattered - if he didn't have Brian.

It had taken much time and more effort for her to accept it. Even harder was the realization that the reverse was also true. No one else would ever be to Brian what Justin was. No one would ever mean as much, and no one would ever replace Justin in Brian's heart, no matter how stridently Brian might claim otherwise.

"Fucking Chris Hobbs," Justin was muttering, motioning for his bodyguard to remain where he was, sprawled in an easy chair and paging through the latest edition of GQ. There was nothing that Boyle could do to remedy this particular problem.

Lindsey rose then and went to stand before the portrait, her face expressing equal parts envy and appreciation, taking in every exquisite detail.

"It's brilliant, Justin," she said finally. Then she turned to look directly into eyes so intensely blue that her own felt faded and washed out by comparison. "You're brilliant, but you're only at your best when you're with him."

Justin's smile was slightly lopsided. "So you've finally seen the light," he observed.

She nodded. "And I'm sorry. I'm so, so sorry."

He sighed. "Don't apologize. You might have suggested it, but nobody twisted my arm to make me listen. Except . . ."

"Brian," she provided the name, without any nuance of doubt.

"Brian," he confirmed.

She folded her arms, and looked up to meet the gaze of the beautiful hazel eyes in the portrait. "Then we just have to be prepared to do a little arm-twisting of our own."

His laugh was filled with skepticism. "Twist Brian Kinney's arm? You're joking, right?"

But she knew what had to be done. "No."

"But . . ."

His rebuttal was interrupted by the rhythmic buzzing of the phone on Brian's desk.
Cynthia took a quick glance at the caller ID, which revealed the identity of the person on the other end of the line, and she raised her hand to signal everyone to be silent. She didn't give herself time to consider whether or not this was the right thing to do; she was just acting on instinct as she pressed the button to put the call on speaker.

"Mr. Kinney's office," she answered.

"Cynthia!" The name was a staccato bark expressing intense aggravation.

She smiled at Justin before responding. "You bellowed, Master?"

"What the fuck is going on?"

"I'm afraid you'll have to be a little more specific, Boss. I can't - quite - read your mind."

"You, Lindsey, Theodore, Honeycutt - none of you are answering your cell phones, and nobody's answering at the safe house where Gus is, and all I get is Mathis' voice mail. Where the fuck are you, and, most important of all, where the hell is my son?"

Cynthia closed her eyes, lifting one hand to touch fingertips to temple to ease an incipient headache. "Brian, I'm so sorry. Haven't you looked at your email? Everything is . . ."

"My laptop is . . . out of reach at the moment," he explained, leaving everyone to wonder what he might mean by that, and imagine the worst - or the best, depending on one's point of view. If he'd simply explained that he was sunning on the deck while his Apple was upstairs in the bedroom, they'd all have been relieved.

"I'm right here, Brian," called Lindsey.

"Got you on speaker, Boss," said Cynthia, not wanting him to feel ambushed by unexpected listeners. Only . . . she looked at Justin, and her concerns were plain in the frown lines on her forehead. On the other hand, the glow in Justin's eyes spoke volumes about how contented he was just to hear that voice.

"What are you doing there, Lindsey?" Brian demanded.

"Cynthia was kind enough to have some of your security people drive us to the airport, to put Gus and my father on a plane to Orlando. They'll be arriving at Disney World in a couple of hours, where they'll spend a few days and . . ."

"Are you sure that's a good idea," Brian broke in. "What if . . ."

"It's all arranged, Brian," said Lance Mathis, who was just walking in after a private discussion with Carl Horvath. "All reservations made under assumed names, the plane was a private charter - no names necessary - and a two-man security team is watching out for them every step of the way. Trust me, they'll be . . ."

"When it comes to my son's safety, I don't trust anybody."

"Brian," said Lindsey firmly, "it's all right. Everyone put their heads together and decided that he's better off down there, hobnobbing with Mickey and Minnie, than up here. Plus he was getting a little antzy. He . . ."

"What? He what?"
She took a deep breath. "He's his father's son, I'm afraid. Too smart by half, so he's figured out that things are not as they should be. And he misses you. We needed to distract him. The Magic Kingdom seemed the best way to do that."

"Shit?" It barely registered as a whisper.

"What?" asked Cynthia quickly.

"Nothing. It's just that I wanted to be the one to . . . " He paused for a moment. "It doesn't matter. Just so he's okay."

"He's better than okay," said Cynthia. "He seems to be developing a lovely friendship with his grandfather, and . . . after a visit to Mickey, he's coming to see his dad."

"He's what? Wait a minute now. I didn't agree to . . ."

"It's okay, Brian," said Mathis. "The FBI will be in charge, every step of the way. He'll be perfectly safe."

Brian paused, obviously thinking hard. Obviously wanting to believe, but still afraid. "Are you sure enough to bet your life on it?" he asked finally.

Mathis blinked - once. "I am."

"You better be." He didn't actually voice the threat his words implied, but then again, he didn't have to.

"Brian?" That was Lindsey, doing a little blinking of her own. "How . . . how are you?"

The pause this time was brief. "Right as rain, Wendy. How are you?"

Justin could not - quite - contain a snicker, and there was another pause, longer - and more loaded.

"Asshole," muttered Lindsey, hoping to cover the awkward moment, but then, with his next words, she realized she should have known better.

"Since when," he asked, "has my office become a social center . . . for misfits?"

"Hey, Brian." Justin was still smiling.

Slighter pause, but just as pregnant. "What are you doing there?"

"Actually, I'm painting."

"My walls don't need a fresh coat."

"Very funny."

If he'd been hoping to embarrass Justin, it was obvious that it wasn't working. Another pause, followed by an audible deep breath. "What - exactly - are you painting?"

"You."

"Me? Why would you . . ."

"You should hurry home, Brian," said Cynthia. "To see it. It's incredible."
Another pause, punctuated by a faint roar that might have been waves breaking on a shore. "Funny. I thought you had to be in New York to do that."

Justin's smile went wistful. "Yeah. How stupid is that, huh?"

But Brian was not even close to backing down or backing off. "Makes perfect sense to me. Now, where's Theodore?"

Cynthia looked at Mathis for an answer, but he could only shrug. "I don't exactly know," she admitted. "He's been really busy."

"Yeah. I'll bet." Lindsey and Justin exchanged puzzled looks when they picked up on a strange note in Brian's voice.

"Brian?" Justin's tone was soft, almost wistful.

A brief hesitation. "Yes?"

"Are you really . . . all right?"

"More than all right. I'm fabulous. You didn't really expect anything less, did you? I'm Brian Kinney, for fuck's sake. Remember? So you don't have to feel obligated to hang around, waiting to do your duty because of some ridiculous ideas about 'commitments'. You're free to move along. To get on with your life, you know?"

Cynthia and Lindsey both winced slightly, glancing toward the young artist while trying not to be too obvious about it. But, to the surprise of both of them, Justin did not appear to be particularly perturbed by Brian's blunt assumptions. "Yeah," he said, still speaking softly. "I know."

"Cynthia," said Brian, his voice gone very self-assured - almost purring - and very dangerous. "You and I need to have a little talk - privately."

She bit her lip and squared her shoulders. "Whatever you say, Fearless Leader." Her voice was steady, resolved, without a trace of a tremor, and everybody in the room wondered how she managed it when it was obvious that Brian was very, very angry.

"Brian," said Justin, having figured out that his presence was the flashpoint for the man's resentment, "don't . . . "

"Don't," Brian interrupted, "tell me what to do. You don't have that right - any more."

"I don't?" Justin replied, his voice almost without inflection. "Okay then. What right do I have? The right to care about you - to want you safe." He paused then, and his voice fell to a near whisper. "The right to need you to come home?"

There was a sudden thumping, as if Brian had dropped his phone, and a pause before he started speaking again. "Cynthia, pick up the phone."

"Brian . . ." Justin tried again.

"Now." There was no arguing with the sharp, direct clarity of the command.

Cynthia took the time to favor Justin with a sympathetic smile before following her orders, retrieving the mobile handset from its cradle.

"Hold on," she said crisply, "while I put on my armor."
"Why?"

She'd expected his manner and his voice to be hard and harsh and strident. Instead, it was very soft. Too soft.

She deliberately turned and walked out into the lobby and into her own office, where she could speak privately. "You want the truth," she answered, "or a comfortable lie?"

"You even have to ask?"

She felt her cheeks flush crimson, realizing that she had crossed a line. Whatever else he might have asked her to do for him over the years - and there was plenty that he couldn't very well brag about - he had never once asked her to lie to him, or protect him from truth, no matter how unpleasant it might be.

She took a deep breath. "All right then. Here's the truth, as I see it, and you don't have to tell me that you don't like what I'm going to say. I already know that. But it needs saying, Brian, and you need to hear it, from someone who won't lie to you. You know that about me, if you don't know anything else. I'll probably do plenty of things in my life that I won't be proud of, but I will never, never, lie to you, because . . . Well, you know why. So here it is: you're wrong, Brian - wrong to turn your back on him. Wrong to try to push him away. Wrong to think that he's better off without you. You can't see this particular truth, because you're too busy believing that he's going to get hurt because of you.

"But here's the thing. There is nothing - nothing - that's ever going to hurt him as much as losing you." She paused then, drawing another deep breath. "You're his life, Brian. Just like he's yours. And if you refuse to accept that - refuse to recognize that you're nothing without each other - you might as well just kill yourself now, and him with you."

"You finished?" he asked finally, after a long, breathless pause.

"Depends," she answered, "on whether or not you listened. Did you?"

"Oh, I listened. I heard you loud and clear, but now you need to hear me. What difference does it make that he needs his soul-mate in order to live life to its fullest, if he's dead? That's what none of you seem to understand. The people who did this to me - you think they're just going to be content to crawl away to hide under a rock and lick their wounds and accept the fact that they didn't get what they wanted?" He paused again, and she heard the hoarse intake of a breath drawn through a throat tight with fear. "You weren't there, Cynthia. None of you were there, to feel what was in that room that night. There's no way for you to understand that kind of hatred; you have to experience it to know what it's like. I don't know how to explain it. They wanted to kill me, but . . . but it was so much more than that. I was ready to die, if that was the way it had to be, but when they told me that . . . he would be next . . ." Silence once more, heavy with words unspoken.

"I - will - not - risk - that. Better he lives a long, dull life - never realizing his dream of a glorious romance - than be slaughtered by those monsters, without ever even getting a chance to spread his wings. Do you understand me?"

"And you?" she retorted. "What happens to you?"

She heard his sigh clearly. "Nothing. Nothing happens to me."

But she understood it then, as clearly as if he'd explained it to her. Nothing would happen to him, because there was nothing left that mattered. "Because you're already dead," she whispered. "That's it, isn't it? Without him, you're . . ."
"Late," he interrupted. "That's what I am. Late for an appointment with my Panzer-division physical therapist. So . . . One more thing, Tink. Keep an eye on Theodore."

"You think he's got something else up his sleeve?" she asked, reluctant to allow the change of subject but knowing that Brian had already closed and locked the door on something he did not want to explore further.

"Not sure," he answered, "but you know how it is: getting screwed once tends to encourage faggots like me to engage the rear guard. I am not gonna get fucked again."

"That sounds an awful lot like a thirst for revenge," she pointed out, without bothering to add that he wasn't usually so bloodthirsty. "A nasty thing to hang your hopes on."

The little laugh he offered was more bitter than sweet. "Maybe, but it'll do - when it's what you've got left."

When she walked back into Brian's office, everyone was waiting for her, waiting to hear what she would tell them - Justin most of all.

"You appear to be all in one piece," he observed, the smile on his lips not reflected in the shadows of his eyes.

"Battered," she replied, "but unbroken."

Justin nodded, and applied one more stroke of dark paint to a lock of hair just skimming Brian's temple in the portrait. Then he laid the brush aside and moved to the sofa where he collapsed into a boneless heap and covered his eyes with paint-stained hands.

"I've lost him," he said slowly. "Haven't I? He's never going to let me get close to him again."

"Justin, he . . ."

But he was shaking his head. "You don't have to explain it. I know what he's doing, and why he's doing it. It's not like it's the first time, although I guess it is the first time I ever recognized it for what it is, before making a complete ass of myself. But it won't make any difference, will it? Whether he's doing it because he's a hard-hearted shit who doesn't care about anybody but himself . . . " He paused then, and had to fight to regain his crumbling composure before he could continue, "like he's always done his best to make us believe, or because he can't stand to take the chance that I might get hurt, because of him. Either way, the result is the same. He'll never let me get close. Will he?"

Cynthia was standing staring out the window, listening to what Justin was saying and then to the soothing words that Lindsey offered in an attempt to comfort him, but she was also listening to something else. To her own voices, her own memories - her own conscience.

"You're right," she said suddenly. "He won't. Unless somebody refuses to take 'no' for an answer."

Lindsey frowned. "So, what . . . you're planning to back Brian Kinney into a corner? With what - a whip and a chair?"

"With whatever it takes," Cynthia replied, walking toward the boss's desk, her movements brisk and decisive. "But it's something that only Justin can do. The rest of us can offer moral support, but . . ." She turned to him with a winsome smile, "in the end, it's going to be up to you."

But he was shaking his head. "And how - exactly - do I do that?"
Her smile grew wider as she picked up the phone. "One on one, and face to face, Baby boy. Face to face. This is something you can't handle by long distance, and something no one else can do for you. Now gather all your stuff together, Picasso, and get out of here."

"What?" His eyes were suddenly huge and filled with confusion. "Why? You're kicking me out? But . . ."

Cynthia gave an exaggerated eye-roll. "Jesus! You're an even bigger drama queen than he always claimed. I'm not throwing you out. I'm sending you home to pack."

"But . . ."

The eye-roll became a gentle smile. "You have a plane to catch."

His smile was bigger, brighter, more dazzling than hers as he secured his masterpiece and went racing out the door, with his bodyguard running at full speed, trying - vainly - to keep up.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

If anyone walked into the house, she knew she'd be busted. There was no one in her extended family who didn't know that she only dusted the tchotchkes when she was upset - or worried - or trying to make up her mind about something.

Like now.

She put down her dust cloth and moved to a low cabinet from which she removed an old bulging scrapbook. She set it carefully on the kitchen table and lowered herself into a chair, noting as she did so that the catch in her back was acting up badly today. Usually, she could ignore it, or just pretend it wasn't there, but it always seemed to get worse when she had something heavy on her mind.

Like now.

She opened the cracked cover and allowed the book to fall open where it would, and realized, that she had known instinctively what it would show her.

Michael and Brian. Fifteen years old, laughing together, mischief glowing in dark eyes, arms wrapped around each other's shoulders. Best friends, boys on the verge of becoming young men - happy together. At that moment.

But it had been fleeting happiness for one of them. She knew that. She'd always known that.

And that was part of what was troubling her now.

She had watched Brian endure the torment of his life with Jack and Joan Kinney, and, although she'd tried not to know too much - see too much - in the end, she'd known more than she wanted to. While she and her brother had worked together, day and night when necessary, to care for Michael, to make him feel loved and cherished and adored and to give him every advantage that they could, they had also tried to extend the warmth and joy of their household to provide a home for Brian as well, to give him what his parents could not, or would not. But they had never quite reached their goal. How, after all, did one compensate for parents who seemed to have no love in their hearts for their own son?

Brian had found a way, somehow, to accept that ugly truth at an early age, but Debbie had never quite managed to do so.
A child should be loved by his mother. More than that - a child had to be loved by his mother, and if Joan Kinney had not been able to demonstrate that love or assure Brian of its existence, then there had to be some terrible reason for her silence, something that held her back, kept her from speaking out - something like the brutal bastard she'd been married to. Debbie didn't know much about fathers, since her own had died when she herself was just a child and Michael's, of course, had never been a real part of their lives. But she remembered Jack Kinney, or - more accurately - she remembered the damage he had done to his son - the bruises and the blood and the broken bones and the look in those gorgeous hazel eyes when the young man would appear at her door in the middle of the night looking for help and refuge - and someone to stop the bleeding.

If Joan Kinney had never shown Brian that he was loved, it had to have been because she was too afraid of her abusive husband, and, by the time the old monster was dead and buried, too much damage had been done for her to be able to figure out how to fix things.

Yes, that had to be the way of it, because a child had to be loved by his mother. Debbie believed it still, and something inside her just could not give up hope that a way could be found to make it right. It was that very same belief that had driven such a wedge between her and Michael during the entire J.R. custody debacle - a nasty little period in their family history that she would have preferred to forget - if she could. That had all worked out in the end, thanks to . . . Well, never mind the how and why. It had worked out, and nothing about it had disproved her original conviction.

A child still belonged with his mother - even if that child was no longer a child. And especially if that child had been beaten and traumatized and targeted for destruction.

Debbie sighed. Who would ever have believed it? Who would ever have identified Brian Kinney as a victim? And finally, who could have foreseen that he would ultimately remove himself from the family that had been there for him all these years and push away the only people who had ever really loved him, even if they didn't always show it?

There had to be a way to make things right between mother and son, and among the extended family as well, and maybe - with a little luck and a bit of divine intervention - just maybe she could be the one to achieve it, to fix what should never have been broken in the first place.

But first, if some of the concerns which had recently been brought to her attention proved to be accurate, it seemed that a way had to be found to get around people who were determined to block any path to reconnection - people who might be honest enough in their desire to help and protect him, but who were not, ultimately, family, and thus, were undeserving of the kind of trust Brian had granted them.

Debbie didn't know Cynthia Whitney at all well; she only knew that Brian trusted her implicitly, and that he was usually a very good judge of character - when he wasn't thinking with his dick instead of his head, anyway. But this had been a strange period of transition for Brian, a time when he might have been too confused or disillusioned or vulnerable to manipulation to be as careful as he should have been. And Debbie had not cared for the things that Cynthia had said to her little extended family while Brian was still lying comatose in his hospital bed. The woman had skated very close to some old, thin-ice issues - speaking of private things that she had no right to bring up at all, and Debbie was not inclined to forgive or overlook what she considered to be a kind of emotional trespassing, in areas that should have been private and not subject to exploration by outsiders.

And that was the bottom line, wasn't it? Cynthia, though she might mean well enough, was still an outsider. Not entitled to claim membership in the extended family, no matter that Brian might disagree.

A shrill chiming sounded from the oven timer, and Debbie rose quickly to remove her pineapple upside-down cake from the oven, before her token 'bread-for-breaking' could become a burnt offering. The aroma that filled the kitchen - rich with brown sugar and cinnamon - stirred memories of Sunday afternoons during Michael's adolescence, memories that led to other memories - specific memories, some of which she needed to suppress in order to get through the next few hours.

She poured herself a cup of coffee, and sank back down into her chair, her eyes once more drawn to the lines and angles of that exquisite face looking up at her, drawing her in, forcing her to remember things that she ordinarily refused to acknowledge.

The face that should have been that of her son's lover and partner.

And that, of course, was the one truth that she had never allowed herself to explore too deeply, the manifestation of the one sin she had never been completely able to forgive.

Brian had always loved Michael; no one could argue with that; loved him so much, so completely, that he had protected him, sheltered him, fought for him, defended him; been there for him whenever he was needed. Always. Only - for all the love and devotion, there was also one simple, unavoidable truth; as much as Brian had loved Michael, he had never once been in love with him. Sadly, tragically, the reverse had not been true, for Michael, though he'd never once admitted it, had always been in love with Brian. He'd just been smart enough to figure out that admitting that, or acting on it, would have been the one sure way to force Brian out of his life. Not, of course, that Brian didn't know it. Debbie was pretty sure that he'd always known it. But he'd still loved Michael enough - like the brother neither of them had ever had - to allow Michael to work out a way to deal with it. And deal with it, he had, in the only way he could. By swallowing that feeling, and accepting the only love that Brian was able to give him.

Michael had managed to live with it, and Debbie occasionally contemplated the strange fact that she had been the one who couldn't - quite - accept it. For all her brusque manner, for all her acrid observations about Brian and his narcissism and his vanity - which he never bothered to dispute or deny - the truth that she had never admitted to anyone was that her only real resentment of beautiful Brian was that he had never even considered assuming the role she thought he should have played - the one which would have identified him as Michael's partner and her son-in-law, and if there was some tiny little element of entitlement in her attitude, of feeling like he owed a debt to the family that could only be repaid by accepting the role for which they'd primed him - well, that was nobody's business but hers.

Bright, beautiful, intellectually gifted, successful - what mother would not have wanted him as a mate for her child? Especially when that child - deep in his heart - would never find a way to love anyone quite as much as he loved Brian Kinney.

She'd tried very hard never to let anyone see the anger within her - the natural resentment of a mother who only wanted her son to be happy, and also wanted - just a little - to have the right to brag about a rich, beautiful, successful son-in-law.

She loved Ben, and she was grateful that Michael seemed to be very happy with his choices. She had been ready to love David, too; had enjoyed fantasizing about being able to introduce him as "My son-in-law, the doctor", even though she had eventually come to see him as the smug, shallow, self-absorbed snob he'd proven to be. But, at odd moments like this when she allowed herself to explore her true feelings, she knew that no one else would ever quite fill the shoes of the person she had always visualized as the perfect mate for her son.

It was, of course, never going to happen now - had, in fact, never been a possibility in the first place, although accepting that truth had been a really bitter pill to swallow.
She loved Brian; she really did. But she had also resented him, for not being the person her son had needed him to be. Resented him so much that, when a young, blond twink had come along and managed to work his way inside the armored shell that Brian had worn for so long, in spite of his best efforts to push the kid away, she had felt some small thrill of satisfaction, and done everything she could to help the kid find his way through. And when the boy had managed, against all odds, to hurt the mighty, invincible Kinney, by running off with his pretentious little fiddler, she had been unable to resist a feeling of vindication, even of triumph, in realizing that Brian was as vulnerable, in the end, as any of the rest of them, even though a small, guilty voice deep in her mind insisted that she, of all people, should have known that all along, since she had been there from the start, to watch him grow into the man he'd been forced to become in order to survive.

Later, after everything that happened to the two of them, and all the hurt they both endured, she would feel ashamed of that pettiness, but there was no denying that some small part of her would forever resent the powerful passion that drew Brian and Justin together, forever lament that it was not her beloved Michael who was able to inspire that passion in Brian's heart.

It had taken her a very long time to relinquish that dream. And now, there was only the reality of the moment to deal with. But there were still things to preserve - worthy things, valuable things, things that would serve to build a bridge from the comforts of the past to the unknown landscape of the future. Only somebody had to make sure that everything that mattered, everything that had created those valuable things, did not get broken and discarded in the rush toward tomorrow.

Brian was gone, but he would not be gone forever. Would he?

She took a deep breath, as she realized that this was the question that had to be asked and answered; that it was the reason she was sitting here on her day off, awaiting the arrival of a group of individuals that would certainly qualify as 'strange bedfellows', all of them connected only by a single thread - Brian Kinney. And all of them waiting, in one way or another, for him to reach decisions that would impact their lives.

A glance at the clock over the stove revealed that she had been sitting here brooding for too long. Time to get ready to greet her guests.

She moved quickly to check her face in the mirror, to tuck a coppery curl behind her ear and make sure her lipstick was still red enough and her mascara still where it belonged instead of smeared under her eyes. One tug at her t-shirt, which bore the saying, "Let's Get One Thing Straight - Bush Knows Dick", scrawled under a cartoonish sketch of the president wearing a shit-eating grin. It was her current favorite, and she had donned it in the certainty that it would not please some of her guests, but they would just have to deal with it. She was who she was, and she would not pretend otherwise - not for anyone.

The buzz of the doorbell came exactly on time, and she hurried to answer it, taking a deep breath when she realized who were the first to arrive of her expected guests. It wasn't quite a miracle, she guessed, but it was close. Who would have dreamed that Joan Kinney and her daughter would ever have come calling on Liberty Avenue?

Michael alternated between staring into his coffee cup and glancing up at the faces of the people around him, and he didn't bother to try to conceal a small degree of incredulity - something that he saw reflected in his husband's eyes when they exchanged glances. This was one of those moments which proved the old adage that truth could be stranger than fiction.

The group assembled around the Novotny kitchen table was a motley assortment of individuals, most having virtually nothing in common, with only one tie binding them together.

Brian Kinney.

Best friend of Michael, pseudo-foster son of Debbie, friend (sometimes) of Ben, employer of Ted and Emmett, acquaintance and one-time agent of Drew Boyd, son of Joan Kinney and brother of Claire DeFatta, perpetual rival of Melanie Marcus, and co-parent/adolescent semi-sweetheart of Lindsey Peterson, who was the only person present who looked even more confused than Michael and Ben.

Debbie had served her cake and poured coffee for everyone before they'd all settled into their places and waited for what would come next.

Since it was her home and - in some small way - her idea to call this meeting, although hindsight would later convince her that she had been neatly manipulated into it, Debbie felt it was right for her to speak first, although she couldn't quite settle the squeamishness in the pit of her stomach, as she realized something. Neither Michael nor Lindsey was going to like this, and - if Michael and Lindsey didn't like it, chances were that Brian - should he ever find out about it - was going to like it even less. But if she didn't do something, if someone didn't take action to make sure that all was not lost, then . . .

"I guess there's not much need to mince words here," she said firmly, clasping her hands tightly on the table in front of her and noting that she had a broken nail that needed attention. "We're here about Brian. Obviously. Now it's pretty clear that a lot of what has happened is out of our control. Not that we don't care, but there's nothing we can do that's going to make any difference. But . . ."

"But what?" Michael asked abruptly, not at all happy with the tone of his mother's voice. "What is it that you're getting at, Ma? Why did you call us here?"

Debbie took a deep breath. "This should be a family matter, and it's just not right for outsiders to assume that they have the right to interfere in family matters. Joan called me yesterday . . ." She pretended not to see the bright glint of anger in Michael's eyes. "I think you all know how I feel about mothers and children." This time, she turned deliberately to single Michael out to offer him a semi-apologetic smile. "And it hasn't always made things easy for any of us. I know that. But . . . a mother shouldn't be cut out of her son's life, especially when that son is in danger. Joan is going out of her mind with worry, and any mother would understand that." She looked up then to meet Lindsey's eyes. "Wouldn't she?"

Lindsey looked away, feeling the weight of Joan Kinney's gaze as she did so. Lindsey knew things about Joan, things that Debbie, apparently, did not know. And yet . . . she thought about Gus, and how much like his father he was turning out to be. And then she thought about how she would feel, if she were in Joan's shoes now. The woman had made terrible mistakes, had rejected Brian and everything he believed in, had caused him terrible anguish and pain during the early years of his life, before he developed that emotional armor that finally allowed him to survive her cruelty, and even more of the same when she'd found out who he really was. And yet . . .

She turned then and looked directly into Brian's mother's eyes. Could it be that this tragedy might turn out to have at least one positive consequence? Might it have taught this woman what a treasure her son had turned out to be, in spite of his parents' horrible mistakes?

At Lindsey's side, Melanie was very careful to keep her eyes down, her attention focused on the hands that were clasped tight in her lap. The last thing she wanted to do was give any indication of what she was really thinking, of her realization of what an opportunity this whole thing might prove to be for anyone sharp enough to bide her time and wait for the right moment.
"And then," continued Debbie, "I spoke to Teddie, and . . . well, he's concerned about how things are going at Brian's company. About how his wishes are being ignored or twisted around to allow certain people to take advantage of his absence."

And that was as far as some of the individuals sitting at the table were prepared to go.

"You're talking about Cynthia," said Lindsey coldly, "and that, frankly, is none of our business. We have no right to interfere with the arrangements that Brian made. Including leaving her in charge."

Melanie reached out to grasp her partner's arm, suddenly realizing that she'd assumed too much, counted her chickens too quickly. "Linz, wait," she urged. "You haven't heard it all yet. I know you want to trust her, to believe that Brian knew best, but what if you're wrong? There's a lot at stake here, and . . . ."

"No," said Ted sharply. "It's not about money. Or not only about money anyway. It's about following Brian's lead, and protecting his back."

"Look," said Melanie quickly, jumping in to reinforce Ted's contentions and to deflect any attempt to make this a discussion about attacking or defending Brian's choices. "I know you all want to believe that Brian thought this through carefully, and maybe he did, but how can we be sure of that? It wasn't like he had a whole lot of time to prepare for all this, and how are you going to feel if you just assume that everything is all right, and then find out that you were wrong? Lindsey," she turned to her partner to offer a plea for understanding, "I'm not about to try to pretend that Brian and I have managed to work out all our problems. We haven't and probably never will. But even I can't deny that the man has worked his ass off to make a success of his business. And, despite our differences, I also have to admit that he loves his son, and what happens now could have a direct impact on Gus's future. If you take all of that into account, don't we have an obligation to make sure that Brian's interests are protected?"

She leaned forward then to take Lindsey's hand and press it to her lips, while Lindsey made a concerted effort to ignore a niggling suspicion that the whole speech had been carefully planned and rehearsed for maximum effect. Then Melanie offered up an enigmatic little smile, before turning to Ted who nodded to signal his gratitude for her support.

The accountant took a deep breath, and chose his words carefully, knowing that he was venturing onto treacherous ground. "Look, I know this is difficult. That's why I hesitated to bring it up at all. But I feel like it's part of my job - not to mention my duty as a friend - to try to make sure that his trust is not misplaced. That no one takes advantage of the situation, and that he doesn't get hurt any more. Isn't that what friends are supposed to do?"

But Michael was still unconvinced, his eyes filled with apprehension as he and Lindsey exchanged speculative glances. "What are you talking about, Ted? What makes you think Cynthia is ignoring his wishes?"

Ted squared his shoulders and took another deep breath, buying time to gather his thoughts. "Do you know where Justin is, right this minute, hmm? Do you know what she did, where she sent . . . ."

"As a matter of fact," said Lindsey, as Emmett rose and moved to stand behind her, "I do know. So do Emmett and Michael. Not the specific location, of course. The FBI has been pretty insistent about keeping that secret. But we know where he's going, and who sent him."
"Well, I don't," said Debbie, obviously irritated with the hidden currents that were racing around under the surface of the discussion. "And it's really rude to talk in circles like this and keep the rest of us out of the loop. So what exactly . . ."

"Justin is on a plane, Ma," said Michael. "He's on his way to the place where Brian is staying."

"Which is . . . where?" Debbie replied.

"Which is classified as need to know only," Lindsey said, "and none of us qualify."

"You know, don't you?" drawled Emmett, staring at Ted with speculative eyes. "Not because they told you, but because you figured it out. What was it? Did you follow the money? Is that how you know?"

Ted frowned, helping himself to a big bite of cake and wondering why it was suddenly so difficult to swallow. "It doesn't matter how I know. It wasn't all that hard to solve their big mystery. In point of fact, I actually know more than Cynthia does, but she's the only one who's authorized to contact him. How is that logical or fair?"

Emmett shrugged. "Maybe it's not, but then again, it's not really true either. She's not the only one who can call him. I can, if I need to."

"What?" Ted's eyes were suddenly huge. "What do you mean?"

"I mean that he called and gave me a number. In case of emergency. I can reach him, if . . . ."

"You?" Ted's face had gone very still and very red. "Why would he give you a way to reach him?"

Emmett responded with a very characteristic eye-roll. "He didn't bother to explain, but I assumed it was because he left me in charge of running Babylon for him. But you know Brian. He's not big on explanations."

Ted turned then to stare at Lindsey. "And I suppose he called you too?"

She nodded. "I am the mother of his only child."

Ted didn't look as if he found that explanation particularly relevant.

"Who - exactly - is this Justin?" asked Brian's sister suddenly, obviously growing weary of the endless bickering. "My brother's what? Boyfriend? Lover? Or - what's the term that you guys are so fond of - his trick?" There was no mistaking the contempt in her voice. "Did Brian want to see him?"

"No," answered Ted. "He didn't. And that's my point. This was not according to Brian's wishes. His precise instructions were exactly the opposite of what Cynthia has done, and not just in this particular case. In so many other things as well. She's betrayed him, by doing what he specifically forbade her to do. She's . . . ."

"What are you doing, Teddie?" Michael's voice was soft, but surprisingly cold. "How can you accuse her like this, when you have to know that she's risking everything, in order to try to keep him from making the biggest mistake of his life? How can you . . . ."

"But it's not her decision to make. He should never have trusted her," Ted observed, his dark eyes glinting with anger. "Why would he trust her like this? What's she ever done to earn it?"
Not quite able to resist temptation, Melanie sat back from the table, releasing her partner's hand as she did so, and responded with a cold little snicker, barely above a whisper. "You mean besides kissing his ass?"

The room was suddenly very still, as Michael and Emmett exchanged knowing glances, both struggling to ignore the nasty little remark as if the woman had never spoken at all. "I don't know, Teddie," said Michael finally, sounding unutterably weary. "What have you?"

Ted spun to express his outrage at Michael's presumption, but found that he was not only facing the young man who had been his secret love for so many years; in addition, Emmett and Ben and Drew Boyd were all gathered around Michael, obviously ready to support and defend him, and none of them looked like they were in a mood to tolerate Ted's denunciation or the queen-out he was contemplating as his next course of action.

"Please," said Joan Kinney suddenly, looking up from the plate which held her piece of cake - untouched, "I don't know what any of this has to do with what's happened to my son. I just want to know . . . that he's all right. And that someone is looking out for his interests so that he doesn't come back to find that he's lost everything that he cares about. His business - his success - has always been what he treasures most, so . . ."

Michael turned to stare at her then, and there was no mistaking the blaze of bitter resentment in his dark eyes. "That you could say something like that," he said coldly, "just proves one thing. You've never known him at all."

"Michael!" Debbie barked, folding her arms and fixing him with an angry stare. "She's still his mother. She's entitled . . ."

"No," Michael replied, pushing back from the table and closing his eyes briefly, experiencing a rush of warmth as Ben wrapped an arm around his shoulders. "She's entitled to nothing. You might have forgotten, Ma, because it's easier not to remember everything they did to him, everything he went through. But I'm not ever going to forget it. Or forgive it."

"Look," said Debbie, giving up on any hope she might have had for conducting a friendly little chat over cake and coffee, "I'm not trying to make excuses for anybody. But can we really be sure that this Cynthia isn't taking advantage of the situation? You heard the things she said to us in that hospital room. Things she had no right to say, so how do we know . . ."

But Lindsey - like Michael and Emmett - had heard enough, and raised her eyes from her untouched cake to regard her companions with barely controlled disbelief. "Because everything she said that day was absolutely true. We've all spent years taking advantage of Brian - using him, abusing him, depending on him to pick up the pieces - and the tab whenever we needed him. As of right now, Cynthia is the only one who's consistently stood up for him, calling us out to answer for all the bullshit we've used to defend ourselves - to excuse our own behavior."

"You can't be serious," snapped Melanie, dark eyes suddenly aflame, as she surged to her feet, fists knotted, realizing that she could no longer swallow the outrage rising within her. "How delusional can you be? What is this - some kind of sick movement to nominate that narcissistic little shit for sainthood? He's spent his whole life using people and taking advantage of everybody around him and being a heartless bastard, and you're all so fucking besotted with him that you're willing to believe anything to keep from having to face the truth. Jesus, is he ever going to have to pay for the damage he's caused and the harm he's done?"

"Correct me if I'm wrong," said Emmett into the deep, shocked silence that followed her outburst, "but isn't that pretty much what the homophobic motherfuckers said after they almost succeeded in killing him?"

He took a moment to look around and meet the eyes of everyone in the room, before turning and walking to the door, with his brawny lover at his side. For his part, Boyd looked as if he could not quite believe what he'd heard - and as if he'd be only too happy to never hear it again.

"I have no idea what you're planning to do," said Emmett softly, pausing in the doorway and looking back over his shoulder. "And, in truth, I don't care. You can do your damnedest to interfere, to force Brian to do what you want, or to make Cynthia answer to you. Whatever. But I'm pretty sure that I'm right about this: you're wasting your fucking time, because she's a hell of a lot smarter and tougher than you think she is, and, when all is said and done, Brian is going to know who his real friends are. Just like he always does. But as for me, I refuse to have any part of it."

"Emmett, wait," said Ted, striving for calm. "Where are you going? Don't you see that we're just trying to protect him?"

"What I see," Emmett replied sadly, "is a pathetic little game that's all about some kind of stupid pecking order, and who gets to be first in line to demand Brian's gratitude."

"How can you even think something like that? Haven't we always been there for him? Why shouldn't we have the right . . ."

"Right." Emmett's voice was barely audible now. "That's really what it's all about, isn't it? Rights. Your right to expect things from him. Your right to demand your 'rightful' place in his life. Your right to judge whether or not he deserves your loyalty, while you never seem to stop to ask yourselves whether or not you deserve his." He paused then, and looked once more around the room, his eyes coming to rest finally on Debbie, and there was no mistaking the deep, abiding sadness that touched his face as he stared at her.

"Shame on you," he said very softly. "Shame on you all."

Then he was gone, and Drew Boyd lingered in the doorway just long enough for his face to express what he couldn't say - a deep, profound and bottomless disappointment he dared not voice, for fear that it might expand and sweep him up into an irrepressible rage.

On the porch, Emmett was waiting for him, his green eyes filled with shadows, but he managed to dredge up a winsome little smile for the man who was proving to be the greatest - and, hopefully, the final - love of his life. "I'm reminded of something Brian once said," he offered as he snuggled into the arm that Drew wrapped around him, "although in a completely different context."

"Yeah? And what would that be?"

The smile grew slightly warmer. "That fags and dykes can fuck up their lives too, just like straight people. I might be wrong, of course, but I think that some of the people in that room are just about to find out how true that is."

~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~*_~_~

The sound of footsteps faded quickly as Emmett and Drew hurried away from the house, and it seemed, for a while, that nobody could figure out exactly how to break the silence. Until Joan Kinney got to her feet, and regarded her hostess expectantly.

"If everyone here feels that way, then I suppose this was a waste of time," she said coldly. "I probably should have known better than to expect understanding or help from . . ." But she could not quite bring herself to finish the sentence, leading Lindsey to wonder, once again, whether or not the woman might have actually learned some kind of lesson.

"A complete waste of time," muttered Claire, picking up her purse and shrugging into a faded denim jacket.

"Now wait a minute," said Debbie sharply. "Emmett . . . he's just very emotional lately. He was there, you see. When Brian got hurt. He saw it all, and he's been . . ."

"Having a hard time with it," said Lindsey, her eyes daring anyone to dispute the truth of it. "Like anyone would." She and Michael exchanged understanding glances. "I think he's grown a lot closer to Brian since it happened - that they're a lot closer to each other now. And I don't really think he's wrong to question what happens next. So . . . what does happen next? Teddie? Debbie? Mrs. Kinney? What exactly are you planning to do?"

"Somebody has to stand up for Brian," Ted replied. "To make sure that Cynthia sticks to his plan, does what he wants, instead of running things to suit herself - and running his business into the ground. She may enjoy pretending that she's as capable and as smart as Brian Kinney, but she's not. You have no idea what kind of damage she could do to him, and it's up to us - his friends and his family - to watch his back and protect his interests."

"How?" said Michael. "You can talk plainer than that, Teddie. What are you planning?"

"We need to go in and talk to her, face to face," Ted answered firmly. "Present a united front so she knows that we're all together on this, that we're only concerned with making sure Brian's orders are followed."

Michael and Lindsey looked at each other, and then Michael turned to study the look on Ben's face. To everyone's surprise, it was the professor who spoke up then, resolving the issue swiftly and solemnly.

"I see no harm in us going, as a group, to speak to Cynthia, in order to express any concerns about how she's operating the business, according to Brian's plans and policies. Although it does seem a little weird to me that we should feel competent to face off against this young woman, when most of us don't know a thing about the advertising business. Also, we'd probably do well to remember that any attempt to come on too strong could look like ganging up on her, which might not sit too well with Brian, if he were to find out. But there's a bottom line here, a basic truth that everyone needs to understand very clearly." His eyes were suddenly hard and unflinching. "This is about Brian, and what he wants. And it doesn't matter in the least if any of us like or approve of his choices."

He looked directly at Melanie then, daring her to dispute his contention, and it was obvious that she wanted to do so. But she didn't quite dare, choosing instead to bide her time and rein in her blatant resentment of the man who was the biological father of her son - a fact that she would never quite be able to forget - or forgive.

Melanie had become a master at picking her battles.

"Because, in the end," Ben concluded, "it's really none of our fucking business."

Ted swallowed hard, wanting to argue, but managing, by virtue of a valiant effort, to keep his mouth shut, as Lindsey nodded and regarded the professor with an approving smile. As for Michael, his face morphed into a wide grin, and he demonstrated his delight with Ben's little speech by leaning over to give his husband a deep, passionate kiss, involving heavy tongue-action, leaving Joan Kinney and her daughter to figure out where to look to avoid having to witness such a disgustingly public display of affection.
Debbie looked around her kitchen, at empty coffee cups, and slabs of pineapple cake - mostly untouched - and tried to swallow her own misgivings around a huge knot in her throat.

She had allowed herself to be convinced that they were doing the right thing - something that needed to be done, and she held tight to that belief as she escorted the Kinney women to the door with a promise to advise both mother and daughter when the time for the proposed meeting was set.

But she kept seeing the look in Emmett's eyes, and hearing his voice as he'd walked away from them all, and she couldn't help but wonder. Were they really doing this for Brian, or were they just deluding themselves - and, if they were, were they about to incur the wrath of the mighty Kinney?

It was a thought she quickly pushed away, deciding that there were some things a person was better off not knowing.

Brian sat at the bar in the sunlit kitchen of the beach cottage, and pushed his plate away, resisting an urge to grab his fork and scoop up the remaining bites of the scrumptious shrimp salad and the last piece of bruschetta that Trina Thomas had prepared for him.

Brian Kinney did not do clean plates, and Trina was looking at him as if she knew it perfectly well and was planning to make it her life's work to change that strange little personality quirk.

"Dessert?" she asked, managing somehow to wrap those two syllables in multiple layers of her lovely, semi-musical Jamaican accent - something he doubted anyone else could have accomplished.

He lifted one eyebrow in response, as he sucked on the straw of his pina colada. "I thought that's what I was drinking," he retorted.

Her smile was complacent, even slightly self-satisfied, to celebrate the victory it had taken almost two weeks to achieve. For each of the first twelve days after Brian's arrival in the house, Trina had prepared her unique, special version of her family's traditional pina colada recipe - an original creation that was almost patent-worthy - served it up in a crystal goblet, presented it with a proud flourish, and insisted that he taste it. And on each of those days, she had been forced to either pour the lovely, rich cocktail down the drain - or drink it herself, which was definitely not a hardship. On day thirteen, she had finally worn him down and he had capitulated and agreed to taste the tropical concoction, but only if she swore on the lives of her children that she would never talk about his lesbianic lapse to anyone.

On that occasion, he had refused to comment on the quality of the drink, but by the time he'd risen to walk away from the bar, his glass had been empty.

Since that day, he'd accepted one - and only one - of her signature cocktails each day at lunch, never offering a definitive response except on the one occasion when she had presented it to him enhanced with a bright pink umbrella, a dollop of whipped cream, and cherries on a toothpick. He had simply raised one eyebrow, folded his lips into his mouth, and waited.

Umbrella and cream and cherries had vanished, as if by magic.

"It's too late, you know," she said with a happy smile. "You're ruint, fer sure."

That trademark eyebrow climbed toward his hairline, and his lips curled into a quick smile. "Ruint?"

"Um, hmmm. Next thing you know, you'll be guzzling frozen daiquiris and sharing chocolate-covered strawberries with your sweetie."
In spite of himself, Brian burst out laughing.

"Now that's a nice sound," she observed. "One I haven't heard from you lately."

He shook his head. "If ever."

She heaved a deep breath, and Brian studied the way the sunlight glinted against the deep bronze skin of her face. Trina Thomas was middle-aged, obese, with wiry salt-and-pepper hair, deep-set eyes, broad, blunt features, and a terrible overbite; yet she was possessed of a strange, rare, natural beauty, which had more to do with the person inside than what was on the surface of the body. Brian was slightly surprised to find that he was able to discern that beauty. He was pretty sure that, at one time - not so long ago - he would have missed it entirely.

"You've got another session scheduled with Madame Fuehrer, right?"

Brian took another slurp of his drink, and wondered how he would manage to talk her out of her recipe for this little concoction when he was ready to go back to Pittsburgh, and how he'd manage to prepare and drink it without anybody knowing about his new addiction. Or maybe the best thing to do would be to just take her back with him.

"How'd you guess?"

"You got that look on your face, Sugar. Like the little voice in your head is screaming, 'How the shit did I git myself into this mess?'"

Brian slurped again, and smiled. Then he looked up and met her gaze directly. "You still disapprove of me, Trina?"

She moved a little farther away from him, concentrating on her task of wiping down the ceramic tile of the countertop. "It's not that - exactly."

But Brian's smile did not waver. "Really?"

She sighed then and met his gaze squarely. He admired that in her, that she didn't try to hide from him, or shrug off his questions. "Just look at you," she said softly. "Sweet Jesus, young Brian, there ain't a woman anywhere in the world that wouldn't fall on her knees in gratitude for a chance to belong to you. You're just everything any woman could want. You're bright and smart and funny - and rich, unless I miss my guess - and not too fucking hard on the eyes either. You could have a perfect family, beautiful wife, lovely children, and with all that, what do you choose to do? I just don't understand it, that's all."

His smile was surprisingly gentle. "And that's where you're making your mistake, Friend. It's not a choice. It's who I am. And, if you're right - according to my sainted mother - I'm going to burn in hell for it. Do you think I should?"

This time she was the one with the gentle smile. "Don't go there, Kiddo. Yes, I was raised as a southern Baptist - God help me. And yes again, you are deep in the heart of a part of the country that has more than a blush of redneck to it, but I don't presume to judge whether or not folks ought to burn in hell. I got enough trouble dealing with my own sins to worry about yours. Only . . ."

"Only what?"

She leaned forward quickly and cupped his face with her huge hand. "What a waste!"

He laughed again, and knew that her remarks shouldn't make him feel better. She was straight - completely, irrevocably - and not even remotely gay-friendly. Yet, she made him laugh, and he found that he was glad he could talk to her and listen to her comments without resenting her attitude. Straight and misguided, maybe, but not the least bit homophobic.

He could live with that, and he was slightly surprised to realize it. Shit! Could it be that he was really growing up - that he was leaving behind his Peter Pan fixation and moving on? Shit! He looked up again and surprised a fond smile on the broad face of the woman who was enjoying the view of him sitting there in the sunshine, and that led him to think about the people in his life whom he had decided to trust. The group was very restricted - as always - but it had recently expanded a bit in some ways and contracted a bit, in others, and some of the names on that list caused him to blink and come to a reluctant conclusion.

He thought about Debbie Novotny and Carl Horvath, about Lance Mathis and Trina Thomas. And most of all, he thought about Cynthia . . . and Ted Schmidt, and was abruptly reminded of the lyrics of an old song: The order is rapidly fadin', And the first one now will later be last, for the times they are a-changin'.

Shit!

He allowed himself a tiny, reluctant, almost embarrassed smile. It appeared that, in his own way, he was just as resistant to change as some of his less sophisticated friends.

And that was how Chris McClaren found him, sitting shirtless and shorts-clad in a pool of sunlight, finishing the last of his girly-drink, and wearing a perfect, enigmatic smile. The agent paused momentarily in the doorway, and took a moment to admit - though only to himself - that he would almost certainly never see anything more beautiful in his life, even though Brian's injuries were still not completely healed. It didn't make much sense, but it appeared that the flaws only served to emphasize the fundamental perfection.

He looked up then to meet the eyes of their Jamaican-born cook, and flushed slightly when he saw that she had read his mind easily. He knew that Trina didn't - exactly - approve of Brian or of him, or of what they got up to together, but he refused to be embarrassed by her regard. With a quick grin, he moved forward and braced his hands against Brian's shoulders, thinking to ease any tension he might find in those beautifully sculpted muscles. But one touch reassured him. There was never any way of being sure he was gauging Brian's moods or thoughts correctly; the man was a walking enigma. But his demeanor and his posture and the easy strength of his body at this particular moment made it very clear that, whatever else he might be feeling, he wasn't tense.

Thus it was McClaren's turn to offer up a lopsided smile.

Alex Corey was waiting in the little room off the front entrance of the cottage that she had commandeered for her office, eager to continue her interview with the infamous Brian Kinney. Well, maybe "eager" was a bit of an exaggeration, since the previous two sessions hadn't gone exactly according to plan. In fact, McClaren was pretty sure that his boss - the world-famous profiler - had been taken completely unaware by the young man who had become the concerted focus of her interest since his head-first collision with destiny in that abandoned warehouse in Pittsburgh.

The simple truth was that Ms. Corey had dealt with virtually every variety of emotional condition during her years with the Bureau - everything from anger to fear, resentment to paranoia, defeatism to over-confidence, a desire to crawl into a hole and die as opposed to a bottomless thirst for vengeance - everything. But it seemed she had never before come up against anyone who was so keenly observant, so sardonically uninvolved, so effortlessly laid-back, and so capable of seeing the satirical humor in even the blackest circumstance that he had actually laughed at her. Well, not laughed exactly. More like smirked, but the result had been the same.

Alexander Corey was unaccustomed to being laughed at.

"You ready to face the music?" the FBI agent asked, leaning forward and sliding his hands down the silken expanse of bare chest while nuzzling against the side of Brian's throat, just missing a small scar that was gradually fading into oblivion.

Brian took a deep breath. "Zero hour approaching, huh?"

McClaren nodded. "It is, if you want to hear all the nasty little details that you've been demanding to know. I assume you've finally realized that she's not going to change her mind on this. In order to get the full story, you're going to have to allow her to attempt to hypnotize you. I know you think it's bullshit, but I happen to agree with her. If we let you in on all the details first, it might contaminate your legitimate memories."

Brian pushed himself up, ignoring the cane that was lodged against his bar stool. In typical Kinney fashion, he had begun to fight to wean himself of the need for any kind of crutch. "You're lecturing again," he retorted as he grinned and winked at Trina, who was busily trying not to ogle the irresistibly delectable sight of two beautiful young men sharing an intimate moment. "And we could, if you'd only loosen up a bit, put our time to much better use than letting your Gestapo drill sergeant ramble around in my head. If you, for example, were to cast off the chains of servitude and tell me what I need to know . . ." The smile he then turned on his prime babysitter was so explicit and so seductive that McClaren wondered if St. Peter himself would have been able to resist it.

"Fuck off, Brian," he snapped.

But the smile remained in place, along with irrepressible glow in those spellbinding eyes. "That's exactly what I had in mind, McFed."

"She's waiting," said McClaren with an eye-roll, having long since realized that the surest way to perpetuate the nickname he really hated was to protest its use.

"What? Superwoman doesn't need food to prepare herself to inflict torture? Oh, wait, let me guess. She gets her energy directly from our solar system's yellow sun."

Another eye-roll - this one accompanied by a reluctant smile. "She ate at her desk."

Brian sighed loudly. "You could at least make some small attempt to get me drunk, before turning me over to get fucked."

It was said lightly, accompanied by a typically sardonic grin, but was there some little nuance of unspoken dread in that scornful tone of voice - something that revealed that it was not quite the smart-ass non-sequitur he had intended it to appear.

He did not speak again, before turning to walk to the front of the house, as McClaren and Trina watched him go.

The FBI agent deliberately turned away, looking out through the big window over the sink, to note that another storm was brewing out to sea, moving swiftly toward the shore.

"Storm's comin'," he observed softly, taking the seat that Brian had vacated, and reaching for the plate that Trina had prepared for him.

Thus, he was marginally astonished when she jerked it away from him, and leaned forward against the counter until her face was only inches from his own. "Not nearly as big as the one that's going to happen in here if you don't get off your ass and go after him."

The man's lovely blue eyes were suddenly awash with shadows. "What? What the fuck are you . . ."

"You know something?" she interrupted, her tone harsh and unforgiving. "You FBI types are supposed to be so smart, so intuitive, so skilled at your 'profiling', but the simple truth is that you don't know jack-shit when it comes to what makes a man like Brian Kinney tick. He's so busy proving that he's big and bad and balls-to-the-wall brave, and all of you just buy into it, when the simple truth is that he's scared, and he's trying to find a way to face a truth he doesn't know how to handle."

She paused then, and her voice dropped to a barely audible whisper, but it still carried the depth of her compassion and the degree of her sorrow. "He's trying to find a way to survive something that he thinks might destroy him."

He hunched forward, picking up Brian's glass and draining the last drops of his drink. "That's how he wants it, isn't it?"

"Humph!" She glared at him and there was no ignoring the contempt in her eyes. "And here you sit."

"And what should I do?" he demanded hotly, unable - for a fraction of a second - to completely suppress his own sense of helplessness and rage. "I can't fix this."

Her expression softened then, as if she'd found what she was looking for, as if he had confirmed what her intuition was telling her. "Just hold his hand," she said finally, reaching out to wrap her own fingers around his. "Just be there."

He looked into her eyes then, and saw that she totally believed what she was saying, but he wasn't so sure that she was right. He wasn't so sure that any effort he might make to offer support or sympathy might not make things worse. "I'm supposed to go relieve Toby at the gate," he said, sidestepping the issue neatly.

"Where's Sonny?" she asked with narrowed eyes. Any change in the routine of the security arrangements was cause for speculation.

"Alex sent him on an errand, and you know how Toby gets when he doesn't get his lunch on time." She nodded. "You don't worry about that," turning away just to be sure that McClaren - who was a whole lot smarter than she usually admitted - would not notice the speculative gleam in her eye. "You see to Brian, and I'll go feed Toby" and find out exactly what's going on. She smiled to herself as the FBI agent paused for a moment, obviously thinking it over, before nodding and following Brian out of the room.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

* The Times They Are A-Changin' - Bob Dylan

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

tbc
Chapter 33

What lies behind you and what lies in front of you, pales in comparison to what lies inside of you. -- Ralph Waldo Emerson

"This is as much for your benefit as ours." Alexandra Corey spoke with the kind of conviction that most people would have accepted without question.

Unfortunately - from her perspective - Brian Kinney was not most people.

He compressed his lips, not quite managing to suppress an impertinent smile. "How the hell do you figure that?"

She surprised him by offering a genuine grin - the kind that she very seldom allowed herself. "Because you're not content to be a victim," she answered, "and you know as well as I do that there's more there - locked up in your memories - than you've been able to access. It's not going to let you rest, until you know it all."

He was standing in front of the big bay window that looked out to the South, to where a series of dunes marched in haphazard order roughly parallel to the margins of the water until cutting sharply seaward to form a barrier and forcing the beach to take a jagged step back away from the open ocean, curving sharply into a sheltered inlet that just kissed a strip of dark, broken pebbles at the foot of a sheer headland. The wind was already rising, picking up droplets from the tumult of incoming breakers and dappling patterns of coins across the sculptured ripples of drifted sand that formed the crescent of beach at the leading edge of the water. The surf was mostly invisible from this angle, except where it crashed hard through the cove's opening and slammed against the slabs of stone at the base of the headland. It was not a particularly impressive visual display, except for those strange, almost timeless moments when the froth of the waves was caught by the oblique rays of sunlight and transformed into diamond brilliance that seemed to hover motionless on the threshold of perception, for the space of a heartbeat. Such moments, though stunning to the senses, were fleeting, but the sound of the waves hurling themselves against the stone was a deep-throated, perpetual rumble which provided an undercurrent for the occasional deeper roar of thunder rolling in from the open sea.

At this moment, the afternoon sunlight was still dominating the landscape, slanting in at oblique angles, but, in the vanguard of the approaching storm, it had taken on a hue like beaten gold, pouring down from a hard blue sky on the verge of receding before the towering thunderheads.

Brian had a momentary vision of how the landscape would look if captured on canvas - captured exquisitely by quick, decisive strokes - but he quickly dismissed the thought, before turning back to face his interrogator. "You want to see what's in here," he said firmly, lifting his hand to touch his temple with an index finger. "And I want to see . . . what's in there." His nod indicated the thick case file that was open on her desk. "All of it."

The FBI profiler sighed. "Brian, surely you don't expect me to . . ."

"Yes. I do."

She sat back in her chair and glared at him. "You have to know that there are rules about this sort of thing - rules that forbid allowing just anyone to . . . "

"But I'm not 'just anyone', am I?"

His smile was so completely self-satisfied that she had a momentary urge to stand up and slap him. But she didn't, because, no matter how much she might want to argue his contention, she knew that he was right. And she knew something else, as well - something that she was not yet ready to reveal. The truth was that the investigation still ongoing in Pittsburgh was turning up plenty of forensic and circumstantial evidence which would probably provide sufficient proof to indict and convict the thugs who had inflicted the horrible damage on Brian's body, but it was almost certain that the hired muscle would have little or no information about the identities of the movers and shakers who had started it all. Thus, it was uncertain if enough evidence could be amassed to assure that the men behind the attack - the power brokers who had planned and paid for it - could be brought to justice. It was still a big question mark, and, in the final analysis, it might turn out that only Brian himself could provide the proof necessary to see that justice was served. Forensic evidence might be damning, but, without his corroboration, it might not be enough, since only he had been there, on the scene, from the beginning, and only he might be the key to unlocking the whole story.

"The only way you're going to get full access," he continued, "is to grant it."

Alexandra took several moments to compose her answer, using the time to study the look in his eyes, trying to read something that she couldn't quite identify. "You really don't want to do this, do you?" she asked finally.

It was debatable which of them was more surprised when he responded with quick laughter. "What was your first clue?"

She shook her head. "I don't understand you, Brian."

"Join the crowd."

She leaned forward and clasped her hands tightly, and he immediately understood that it was an effort to suppress an impulse to reach out and shake him. "Why?" she demanded. "What's so objectionable about something that's only meant to help you?"

"According to you," he snapped. "But you hardly know me at all, Agent Corey. And you don't have the first clue what I need - what would really help me. What qualifies you to decide what I need?"

She pursed her lips and adjusted her reading glasses so that she could look over them to study his face. "You really think I don't know you, Brian? That I would come into this without learning who you are, and what your life has been like?"

"I'm sure you've checked out my files, but that doesn't mean you know . . ."

She lifted one hand, took a deep breath, and began to speak, never once looking down at the file sitting in the center of her desk. "Born in Brooklyn, the younger of two children. Baptized Catholic, and took First Communion at St. Francis Cabrini at age eight, but were never confirmed. You were a premature baby and spent the first two weeks of your life in an incubator, but after that, you were remarkably healthy. Until you were five years old, when you contracted a severe case of pertussis and almost died of anaphylactic shock when they gave you erythromycin. You're also allergic to sulfa drugs and peanuts. At seven, you came down with scarlet fever which developed into pneumonia and landed you in the hospital for a week. You were small for your age until you hit a growth spurt at age nine, but you were always athletically gifted, especially in soccer and tennis. It was your love for soccer - and your skill - that got you a full scholarship at Penn, where you were MVP of the league in your junior and senior years, and second string All-American. You got excellent grades in high school, aced your SATs, and tested with an IQ of 148 during your sophomore year." She paused to smile up at him. "That's probably declined a bit over the years, but you're obviously a pretty smart cookie, although you certainly got in your share of trouble. Suspended twice in high school - once for breaking the hand of a jock/football player (in self-defense, or so you claimed) and once for getting into a brawl with two older students, during which you managed to break the nose of one of them, and black the other's eyes. Both of them. No excuses offered that time, but a little digging revealed that it happened just a couple of days after someone - never formally identified - put your best friend, Michael Novotny, in the hospital with a broken jaw. You were voted Most Handsome and Most Likely to Succeed in your senior year. Sexually active from age fourteen, and openly homosexual from about the same time, you had your first STD at age sixteen. Through the years, you had more than your share of 'accidents'. Broken clavicle - twice. Broken ribs, three times. Broken wrist, a couple of concussions, too many lacerations requiring stitches to count. The ER nurses got to know you pretty well, although they never did see much of your parents. You've been working pretty much non-stop since you were eight - first job at a neighborhood bowling alley. When you were nineteen, you got an offer for a modeling contract with the Bellinger Agency in New York, but you turned it down." She smiled again. "Probably because you preferred a career where you might actually have a shot at becoming the boss one day, rather than spend your life working for someone else. You speak fluent French, a smattering of Spanish and Italian, still play a mean game of tennis, and developed an intense interest in Oscar Wilde during your junior year - an interest that continues today, if the books on your shelves are any indication. You graduated cum laude, celebrated with a trip to Monte Carlo where you won over $12,000.00 at the craps table, in spite of the fact that you were actually too young to be in the casino legally, and spent a week-end locked up in a love-nest with a famous European film star. When you got back, you went to work for Ryder, after negotiating a salary package that was extraordinarily generous for a brand new college grad."

She paused and regarded him with raised eyebrows. "Is that detailed enough for you, or should I expand and discuss what I know about your work history, sexual partners, professional achievements, financial holdings, favorite music and literature, your mother, your father, your sister, your internet preferences, political affiliations, client list, preferred porn sites . . . "

Brian folded his lips into his mouth to suppress a smile. "Well, you certainly collected plenty of facts, but that doesn't mean that . . . ."

"I'm a trained psychologist, Brian. The facts provide the foundation, but the rest . . . well, it's what I do."

"And I," he retorted, "have spent my whole life avoiding letting shrinks dig around in my head. It's one of the secrets of my success in life."

"Afraid of what I'll find?"

He grinned. "If I'm afraid of anything, it's that you'll manage to fuck up something that's worked perfectly well for me so far. I just don't see the need."

"Yes, you do."

"What? No, I . . . ."

"Look, you arrogant, stubborn little prick! You think I don't understand what you've had to deal with all your life? You think I haven't done my homework? I've checked you out completely, Brian. Talked to everyone who ever had a major impact on you. Well, almost everyone. I deliberately avoided a couple of individuals because their views of you are so skewed by their feelings that I felt it best to wait til later to speak to them. But I know about your family, your circumstances, your history. From everything I've managed to put together, I know that your methods for handling all the shitty things that have been a part of your life have been remarkably successful. The fact that you survived it and managed to flourish in spite of it is astonishing. I'd give you a standing O - except for one thing. Whatever else your methods might have accomplished, they did not prepare you for this. Dear God, there is nothing that could have prepared you for something like this! Not even for the mighty, invincible Brian Kinney."

She stood up then, so that they were on the same level, so that they were eye to eye. "You need help now, Brian, to find your way through this, and I can give you what you need. If you don't allow yourself to be helped . . ." She paused then, spotting a fleeting uncertainty flaring in his eyes. "Do you realize that you flinch away from human contact now? That the only people who are allowed to get close to you - physically - are the people in this house? You even flinch away from Dr. Turnage, when he tries to check out how well you're healing. Oh, you're able to force yourself to allow him to do what he must, but your body goes completely rigid under his touch, and you almost stop breathing."

She sat back down then, and smiled up at him - a wistful, sad smile. "Is that how the Stud of Liberty Avenue intends to live out the rest of his life? Unable to allow anyone to get close enough to touch him?"

Brian's face had gone very still, his jaw-line rigid, as if set in stone. "You're wrong."

"No," said a voice from the doorway. "She's not."

Brian twisted quickly - so quickly that he almost lost his balance - and Chris McClaren leapt forward to lend a supporting hand. "You don't even know you're doing it," he said firmly, "but you do. We've all seen it."

Brian stiffened within the arms that were helping to hold him upright. "It's just that I don't particularly enjoy pain," he almost growled, before dredging up a smart-ass smirk. "S&M isn't my thing, and I get tired of being poked and prodded."

McClaren pulled back slightly to gaze into shadowed hazel eyes. "When we go to bed, you fall asleep in my arms," he whispered, "but then, during the night, you shrink away from me, and, if I attempt to pull you back, it's almost like you panic, like you're locked up in some kind of fight-or-flight reflex. And if I get too close, you . . . sometimes, you talk in your sleep."

What he did not say - and never would - was that it wasn't actually talking. It was more like a breathless cry for help, as if Brian was almost able to do in dreams what he had never learned how to do in reality - ask for mercy.

"I do not."

"Yes. You do."

Brian looked, for a moment, as if he might demand further clarification, but he didn't. Then he looked as if he wanted to argue - almost certainly would have argued with anyone else. But there was an elemental truth here that he could not afford to ignore. Whether he was happy about it or not, he truly had come to trust McClaren, and he couldn't afford to doubt him now. Unless he wanted to find himself finally, utterly, completely alone, he was running out of options.

"Shit!"
The two men stared at each other, and Alexandra Corey experienced the uncomfortable sensation of being completely invisible - and unnecessary.

"You need to do this, Brian," said McClaren, lifting one hand to caress a pale scar on Brian's forehead. "The simple truth is that nobody could endure what you have without carrying some kind of scars from it. And the only way to heal from it is to let someone help you." Then he smiled - a gentle, self-deprecating smile. "You and I - we've worked out some of it together. Our fucking has been as much about therapy as physical need. But it can only take you so far. You need to be able to process it all - get it out of the shadows of your mind and into the open. For that, you need someone like Alex."

Brian huffed a little sigh. "Couldn't I just fuck your brains out?"

McClaren grinned. "Maybe later."

Alexandra Corey cleared her throat. "Would it be easier for you," she asked, "if Chris remained with you while we do this?"

Brian looked up to examine the expression on the face of the man who was currently warming his bed at night and guarding his back by day. "Only if he wants to."

It was as close as he could come to an admission of need.

McClaren frowned, but his eyes were twinkling. "I don't know . . . it would mean giving up my chance to watch Oprah and guzzle Margaritas. But I guess I can spare a few minutes, to help out a friend."

Brian smirked. "When did we get to be friends?"

"We've always been friends," McClaren whispered, softly enough so that only Brain could hear.

Something glinted then, deep in Brian's eyes - like light reflecting in the heart of an emerald - and McClaren was sure he was going to be ridiculed for a silly romantic notion. But in the end, Brian said nothing, letting a tiny, lopsided smile speak for him.

"Very well then," said Alexandra Corey firmly. Then she fixed McClaren with a solemn glare. "Just remember that you're only here to lend moral support. Silently."

Neither he nor Brian could completely suppress an urge to grin, but they managed to keep any smart comments to themselves.

"Sit down," she continued, gesturing toward the disreputable leather sofa, which was shabby and badly worn in spots, but still surprisingly comfortable.

"I'm not lying down on your couch," said Brian, not quite pouting - but close.

"As you wish," she replied absently, obviously considering how to proceed. "I don't think it will make any difference."

"Meaning?"

She smiled. "Meaning that this whole thing might be a big waste of time. Either way, I don't think it's going to be easy."

"Meaning?" His voice was just slightly colored with growing impatience.
"Meaning that people respond to hypnotic induction methods in lots of different ways. Some succumb quite easily. Others . . ."

"Never succumb at all," he interrupted, a tiny smile touching his lips. "Care to speculate on which I might be?"

"I'd rather not," she answered. "If it works, it works, and if it doesn't, there's no point in wasting time on speculating. Now I just want you to . . ."

But he was lifting his hand to silence her, taking a quick glance at McClaren before speaking again. "Before we do this, I want to know what - exactly - to expect."

She drew a deep breath. She had rather hoped to avoid that particular question, but realized that she should have known better. Brian Kinney was many, many things, but clueless wasn't among them. "I'm pretty sure you already know the answer to that," she said gently. "The only way to get to the truth - the whole truth - is to take you back to the scene of the crime. To make you remember it, exactly as it happened."

"I was afraid you were going to say that."

She smiled. "No. You knew I was going to say that. Now, I'm not about to lie to you and tell you this isn't going to be a horrible experience. It is. You're going to re-see it - re-live it all. Except that you're not going to re-experience the physical pain. That we can avoid, but . . ."

He looked down at his clasped hands. "There are more kinds of pain than just the physical," he observed.

"Yes," she admitted. "There are. And that . . . I wish I could spare you that too. But I don't think it's possible, and, even if I could, I'm pretty sure it wouldn't resolve your problem. To bring it all out into the light - and put it behind you - you're going to have to open yourself up and let it surround you again."

When he didn't respond, except for drawing a deep, hoarse breath, she continued. "I'm sorry, Brian, but I don't think there's any other way. And, until you are able to pull it up and see it all, I don't think you'll be able to expel it from your mind or your life."

He confined his response to a sharp nod, and she pretended not to see the gleam of apprehension in his eyes. Instead she took a moment to activate the video recorder set up on her desk. "Okay, now," she said when she had adjusted its settings, "I need you to relax."

And it was at that moment that he erupted into bright, ringing, beautiful laughter - the infectious kind that inspired and invited and compelled others to join in, and McClaren was quick to respond. Even Corey had to smile.

It didn't last long, but it did serve to ease some of the tension in the room.

"Maybe we need something to focus on," said Corey. She turned to the credenza behind her desk and retrieved a plain white, fat, unscented candle which she then ignited and set on the table in front of Brian.

He cocked one eyebrow. "You realize, of course, that you're indulging in the worst kind of cliché."

"Just stare into the flame," she replied, ignoring the sarcasm, "and let your mind drift."

Brian spent a moment thinking about where his mind would drift - if he let it. Then he decided that he should try to focus, and maybe - with a little luck - he would manage to live through what was ahead. He started slightly when he felt his right hand clasped by gentle fingers, and the ghosting of velvety lips against his palm, and realized that it had become a bit easier to relax, to let go of the apprehension . . . to breathe.

"That's very good," said Corey softly, as she rose and quietly closed the shutters that would effectively block out most of the exterior light from the room. "Now I want you to study the flame. Watch how it flickers as the air moves around it. Let go of everything else. Imagine that everything that might distract you is burning away, turning to ash. Just let it all go."

Brian sighed, and felt a slight shifting in his consciousness, a tugging that seemed to signify that he might be needed . . . elsewhere.

But of course, it would not be that easy.

An hour later, all three of the individuals sitting in the room were beginning to chafe at the bit and to wonder if this whole thing had been an exercise in futility. Brian, of course, most of all.

"I am trying," he almost snarled, as Alexandra Corey leveled a cold gaze at him. "Did it ever occur to you that the problem might not be me? Maybe it's your technique that's not quite up to snuff."

Corey closed her eyes briefly, and Brian could see that her lips were moving, but she made no sound. It was the first time he'd ever wished he could read lips, but then again, he was probably better off not knowing what she was deliberately keeping to herself, especially since she was scheduled to go picking through his brain. If only they could find a way around whatever was blocking the process.

Corey sighed, and took a moment to reconsider their options. Then she looked up and studied the physical dynamic between her subject and his defender. "Okay," she said after a while, "let's try a different approach."

She stood up and moved to a cabinet in the corner of the room. When she returned, she set two highball glasses and a bottle of Jack Daniel's Single Barrel whiskey on the table in front of Brian, who responded with a characteristic smirk. "See?" he said to McClaren. "I told you it'd be better to get me drunk before the fucking. Although . . ." The lifted eyebrow came into play again. "I can think of a faster, easier way to achieve . . ."

"Don't push your luck," Corey replied. Although she had shown herself willing to overlook certain minor illegalities that might go on when her back was turned - figuratively speaking - she was not prepared to grant further official sanction for them.

McClaren looked at the glasses; then he looked at her. "Two? Why two?"

"He needs to relax," she explained, "and he's used to drinking with you."

Brian's smirk had morphed into a grin. "Is this standard procedure?" he asked, reaching out to accept the drink she had poured for him.

"Nothing about you is standard," she answered, not quite muttering, forcing McClaren to turn away quickly to conceal the smile he could not quite suppress, as Brian tossed back the shot of rich, dark whiskey in one swallow.

She folded her hands again, and looked directly into Brian's eyes. "You've spent your whole life building walls around yourself. It's your defense mechanism, and it's allowed you to survive all the crap you've had to live through, but it makes it almost impossible for anyone else to get inside. Which is what we have to do, if this is going to work. At this point, I'm willing to try almost anything, short of dosing you up with LSD. Now, pour yourself another."

Thus, for the next half hour, the two men drank steadily, barely speaking at all in the beginning, as they were both painfully aware of being observed, although Corey did make some small attempt to leave them to their own devices by pushing away from her desk and retreating into a shadowed corner. Initially, it was an awkward situation, but gradually, as the alcohol started to take effect, they relaxed and began to feel more at ease and natural, and less like subjects under a microscope. At that point, stiff desultory remarks shifted into good-natured bickering which grew into easy conversation, resulting finally in a warm, comfortable blend of laughter, gentle irony, and sexual innuendo - the normal camaraderie that existed between them. They had begun their little mini-binge by sitting stiffly side by side, with no physical contact, but that had changed as the level of whiskey in the bottle declined, so that, fortified by a bit of liquid courage, they ultimately wound up sprawled back against the leather of the old sofa, with legs and bodies entwined, heads braced against the sofa's cushions and sometimes against each other. Corey, meanwhile, was content to watch, feeling only a bit guilty over indulging her curiosity about the dynamic that had managed to turn relative strangers into comfortable companions in a remarkably short period of time.

It astonished her to realize that they were, in some ways, perfectly matched, although she wasn't quite sure why she found it hard to believe - and even harder to accept. Some part of her insisted that they should have been polar opposites, with no common ground on which to meet, and yet there was no denying that the bond that connected them - though oddly constructed and slightly distorted - was solid and strong and filled with riffs of laughter, and that the camaraderie between them was lovely enough to inspire any casual observer to indulgent smiles and, just maybe, some small stir of jealousy.

When Brian reacted to a ribald remark from his companion with a sharp bark of laughter, and reached out with a tender hand to wipe away a drop of whiskey that had spilled from the corner of the FBI agent's mouth, there was a rumble of thunder out over the water followed by the sound of raindrops rattling against the window, a sound which created an illusion of privacy, of being secluded and sheltered from the rest of the world and its prying eyes. McClaren smiled, having by this time completely forgotten the shadowy presence of his boss and her place in the corner, and leaned forward to taste sculpted lips and savor the shared sweetness of the fine vintage whiskey, and Brian, never one to be bothered by an audience, lifted his hands to card through thick, auburn-tinted hair and tilted his head to deepen the kiss, to allow the exploration of his mouth by a talented, invasive tongue, while a gentle thumb traced the soft skin under his jaw-line.

Alexander Corey watched, and knew that she should be ashamed of indulging her inner voyeur; knew that she should stop this now, but it was unexpectedly difficult because she was suddenly, absolutely, completely certain that she had never witnessed anything quite so beautiful or so erotic in her entire life. So she waited, just one moment more. And then one more, but finally knew that she had put it off as long as she could, that the time was at hand. She did however allow herself a tiny smile, understanding that she should feel privileged to have been allowed to witness such a lovely moment.

"Brian," she said softly, her voice barely audible against the tympanic rhythm of the rain, "it's time to look into the candle flame now. Look into it, and feel the warmth around you. Feel the softness of the arms that hold you; feel the safety of this place, and know that you will always be safe here. Feel the tenderness that surrounds you like a blanket, and take it with you as you move closer to the flame."
For a split second, Brian wanted to resist, to protest, to throw her words back at her - to tell her how ridiculous she was. But then he did feel the warm arms that held him and the warm heart that beat so close to his own, and he did know, somehow, that this man would keep him safe - would go to the ends of the earth to do so, if necessary - and that it was all right to let himself slip easily into the shadows that were surrounding him - still dark, still filled with pale specters he did not really want to see, but not, perhaps, quite so ominous or intimidating as they had been before.

He felt the lovely curves of the lips that touched his throat, clinched his fingers around the hands that held him steady, took a deep breath, and looked into the flame that flickered in the wind . . . a soft warm wind, like the breath on his bare skin. Soft, gentle . . . cooling, growing stronger and brighter, touching him . . . drawing him in as his hands flexed and touched . . .

The voice seemed to emerge from the shadows around him, sound without body, so soft that he had to concentrate to hear . . . to obey. "You're stepping closer now, into the light of the flame, but it doesn't burn. And as you move into that light, you also move back in time. Back to that night. Back to the moments before the attack. You're going to hear my voice, and respond to it, no matter what else is happening, and when I call your name, you'll answer any question I ask. You will remember everything, every detail, but you will feel no pain. And when the memory is done, I will call you back, and you will return to this moment, this room."

Brian trembled briefly, and looked as if he might argue with her, but, in the end, he didn't, choosing instead to settle more comfortably within the circle of McClaren's arms.

Corey resumed speaking, her voice softening until it was almost lyrical, as if reciting the words of a lullaby. "You're moving more quickly now, away from the now and into what happened then. You remember the feel of the night air on your skin, the wind against your face as you race through dark city streets. Now . . . where are you?"

_The powerful thrum of the big bike was a raw vibration between his legs - a reminder of the other kind of power that resided there - and he felt the frigid fingers of the night fighting to penetrate the supple leather of his jacket and the sturdy softness of his 501s. His hands gripped the handlebars of the Harley firmly, and he had a moment of confusion as he tried to reconcile the tactile memory of soft skin under his fingers and the warm cushion of his sturdy gloves. Something was not quite . . . Ahead of him - or above him, perhaps - a shadow seemed to loom, and he resisted an urge to swing away from . . . whatever it was that was waiting just beyond his range of vision. Just beyond . . ._

_The sensation was like flying . . . flying with . . . Hurry. The voice in his head rose from a low muttering to a primal scream - hurry, hurry, hurry, hurryhurryhurryhurry . . ._

_The darkness surged, and he understood that he had not - quite - hurried enough. Jumbled images, a kaleidoscope of sound and sensation, hands covering him - pulling, prodding, pummeling . . . voices rough and sharp . . . "and a pretty one too."_

"Brian, where . . ."

Brian shifted abruptly, his body going stiff and jerking away from McClaren's touch, but his verbal response was no more than a breath, barely above a whisper. "Fighting . . . for my life."

The FBI agent opened his mouth, but was silenced by a quick look from his boss; still, he knew that his purpose for being in the room at all was to do what he'd been doing for weeks - to watch Brian's back, so he gave as good as he got and glared at her in return, willing her to understand his concerns.

It only took a moment for her to remind him of how good she was at her job as she picked up on the same details which had caused his alarm in the first place. "Take a deep breath, Brian," she said gently. "Breathe deep and easy. You will see it all, hear it all, and remember everything, but you are in no danger. You're perfectly safe, and you will feel no pain. Understand?"

He did not offer a verbal response, but he did draw a deep ragged breath, and the lines of his body relaxed slowly, allowing him to lean once more into McClaren's embrace.

... so many bodies, so much weight. Bearing him down, making it almost impossible to breathe.
Heavy darkness, metallic odors, shifting shadows ... "a night you'll never forget." Voices murmuring, laughing ... "Goodbye, Sunshine ..." Being lifted and turned and slammed back against a hard surface. Fists and booted feet coming at him. Feeling the skin beneath his eye split and the warm gush of blood that erupted and ran down his face and flooded his mouth with its bitter copper taste. Strange - to see it, taste it, smell it - even feel it, but without the pain. What the fuck?

Shadows turning, coming at him, spittle in his face, the stench of bad breath, bits and pieces of words snarled ... "not so pretty now" ... "little fucker's got some pecs" ... "more targets last time, but better like this" ... "see the damage, up close and personal" ... "want to eat my cock, pussy boy" ... and the laughter, of course.

"They're laughing," he said in a strange, flat voice. "How does a man do something like this, and laugh about it?"

McClaren closed his eyes, barely able to process the depth of despair contained in those few words.
Corey, more accustomed to dealing with such raw emotion - or just better at concealing her reaction to it - responded in a soothing monotone. "It's all right, Brain. When you're done here, you'll never have to deal with it again."

The time in the van - minutes, days, decades, no knowing which - had been a blur when it happened, but not this time. This time, he saw it all, experienced it all, and managed, after a time, to process it, understanding that it was all perfectly real, but that he, himself, was both there - and not there. He was a witness, sitting on his own shoulder - experiencing it, reliving it, but insulated from the agony of it. Only that, of course, was not quite true. He did not feel the physical pain, but nothing could protect him from feeling the despair, the fear ... and the anger. Most of all.

Being dragged from the van, the rage within him almost strong enough to allow him to break free.
Almost - but not quite - causing the anger to grow more profound, more intense, more determined.

Four figures - cloaked in deep shadow.

"Cowards!" He wanted to shout it out, to say it aloud, to express his contempt, but he couldn't, of course. Because he hadn't then. He felt a moment of regret for having missed out on the opportunity.

"Brian, tell me where you are, and what you see."

"I'm in the warehouse," he replied, his breath labored and harsh. "They're tying me to the iron gate."

"How many are there?"

"Five around me. Four in the shadows. Two more near the doors, and maybe more outside."

"Can you see ...?"

"You jealous because I wouldn't suck your dick?" A surge of satisfaction, despite the staggering amount of damage to his body. The strange sensation of the big thug breaking his fingers, with no residual surge of pain.

"... you're still gonna scream before we're done."

More taunts, more punches, and a new voice, rising from the shadows. "... flaunting yourself ... depraved lifestyle ... decent people ..." Something odd in that voice, something in the rhythm and pace of the diction that was almost ... familiar.

"You need to tell us what you're seeing, Brian. Take us through what's happening, so we can ..."

"They're getting ready to beat the shit out of me," he answered simply. "And they're telling me why I deserve it.

"One of the big bosses is talking now. He's ... different from the others, somehow. More powerful, maybe. Or more angry."

"Can you describe him?"

A pause and then, "No. He's just a shadow - tall, skinny, but his voice is ... colder than the others. More filled with hatred."

"Do you know him?"

McClaren had to fight to keep his breathing easy and silent, as he realized that this was a crucial question.

"No."

"Are you sure?"

A pause, and then, "Yes. I'm sure."

The worst, of course, was yet to come, following ... "no one's ever going to think you're beautiful again." He would deal with it - had always somehow known he might have to deal with such a thing. The true beating began - chains and cables and straps - ribs breaking, knee smashed, blood pouring - all without a single nuance of physical pain. But, as he'd reminded someone - somewhere, there were other kinds of pain.

In spite of the fact that all he really wanted to do was close his eyes and shut it all out, he tried to take it all in - to see every detail, hear every word, even among the shadows who were so careful to reveal nothing of their faces. He had, after all, promised ... somebody that he would do this. Although, if he ever remembered who it was, he thought he'd probably welcome the opportunity to beat the shit out of them.

More blows, more blood, more raucous laughter - and a murmur of words, faint, barely audible, coming from the shadows, accompanied by a sly chortle. "... hear that women fall all over themselves for him. Can you believe ..." and "... more personal, isn't it? More immediately satisfying. Too bad we couldn't get close enough to watch them bleeding and dying last year. Except for Brad ... ourse - lucky little shit. This makes up for it - a little."

But the rest of the conversation was lost beneath the curses of his attackers and the sounds of the impacts against his body.

He was flinching now within the circle of McClaren's arms, trying to twist away from the staggering power of assault after assault, and not quite successful at suppressing the moans and whimpers that rose in his throat, and McClaren, helpless to prevent anything or to protect his charge in any way, could not quite help feeling a surge of anger toward his boss, as she allowed this horror to continue.

". . . Want to kiss my ass . . ."

"Fuck . . . you!" He was pretty sure that, in spite of the agony that he remembered, even if he couldn't actually feel it now, and the growing conclusion that his attackers were going to fall short in their attempt to spare his life in order to destroy it, nothing had ever felt quite so good as spitting out those two words.

Then came the blade, and he had to watch his skin split and peel back around it as the motherfucker carved shapes into his flesh, and the fact that he could not feel the pain did not, in any way, temper the instinctive need to pull free and run, to deny what his eyes were telling him.

Soft voice then, filled equally with vitriol . . . and satisfaction, just tinged with a trace of concern. "He needs to live . . . to suffer - to pay for his sins."

McClaren moved forward, wrapping his arms more securely around Brian as he noted that the man had gone stiff again, and begun to tremble. A glance at Corey told him that she had noticed as well, and that she was, perhaps, not quite so insulated from the man's ordeal as she'd tried to seem. Nevertheless, her eyes dared her subordinate to interfere.

"Go on, Brian," she said, without a trace of emotion. "Finish it."

"Time's up, Pretty Boy." The molten tip of the metal bar was close now, so close that he saw his skin begin to blister from the heat, close enough that he knew he might not be able to survive this ordeal - an ordeal like no other, in which an individual would come face-to-face with the deepest level of human depravity and know himself as its ultimate target, until . . . "your pretty little boytoy. You didn't really think we'd forget about him . . ."

And that was when Brian began to weep, tears pouring from his eyes although he didn't make a single sound as he was forced to confront the ultimate despair. It wasn't the physical pain that was beyond enduring; it was something much more intimate, a pain in the core of his being that nothing would ever be able to extinguish.

"Wake him up," McClaren demanded, barely able to keep his voice to a whisper. "He can't take . . ."

"He's stronger than you can imagine" Corey replied, never raising her voice, "and if he doesn't get through this now, he never will."

". . . the wages of sin." Laughter punctuated by the screams he could no longer resist.

A shout then, and figures racing through a doorway.

"Son of a bitch!"

And the red-hot iron bar was swinging toward his face, while everything else around him seemed to freeze for a split-second, as his eyes, barely able to see at all through the blood pooling around them, turned toward the shadow figures - the ones who had sat in their plush, Ivory tower-style offices or gathered together in their exclusive little private clubs and planned this atrocity down to the last vicious detail, comfortable in their assumption that God and public opinion were on their side, and hired willing participants to put it into motion. And, at the last possible instant, just as they were turning to make good their escape, hurrying back to their lives of privilege and immunity to the plight of the common man, a quick flicker of light touched them, and . . . he saw. Just before he could no longer see anything at all.
For a full minute, there was only silence, as neither Corey nor McClaren could figure out what to say or do.

"My fault." It was barely a whisper at first, but then Brian's voice strengthened, and he was repeating it, like some kind of mantra. "My fault, my fault, my fault, my fault...

"What, Brian?" asked Corey, her eyes once more daring McClaren to intervene. "What's your fault?"

"Everything that's happened to him. Everything. It's always been my fault, because I was too fucking weak to let him go. Too fucking weak to stay away from him. It's always been my fault."

Corey had to take a minute to fight for her own composure, and resist an urge to stop this now. But she knew that this was important - not for the investigation, not for learning new facts that might lead to indictments and convictions. No. This was important, for Brian. "Go on."

The tears were still flowing, but Brian seemed to have shifted his focus, seemed to be looking inward, talking only to himself. "Do you know what it's like to watch helplessly... as someone tries to destroy the only person you've ever loved, knowing that you can't prevent it, and that it's all because of you? To sit there and feel his lifeblood draining out of his body, pouring over your hands? Can you imagine... what that's like?"

"Brian, what are you talking about? Justin's bashing? That wasn't your fault."

"Yes, it was. It was because of me that he got hurt. That Chris Hobbs bashed his skull. That he lost his chance at the kind of life he always wanted. That he almost got killed by a fucking bomb. That they want to hurt him now. All of it... has always been... my fault."

"Why would you think that?"

His voice broke then, as the anger and the bitterness drained away, leaving him empty and filled with the only emotion left to him - a deep, bottomless despair. "Because I always had to have it my way, and couldn't see that I was putting him at risk. Because I've never been good enough for him. He deserves so much more than I could ever give him. It's always been... my fault."

Corey took a deep breath, even as McClaren realized that he himself seemed to have forgotten to do so as he'd listened to Brian's broken confession. "Brian, surely you don't really believe that. It doesn't even make sense. Why..."

And to the astonishment of his audience, Brian summoned up a pale replica of his trademark sardonic smile. "Story of my life, isn't it?"

The smile disappeared quickly, as if it had never existed, and his eyes were suddenly dark with dread. "I can't... do that again."

Moving quickly, McClaren grabbed a note pad and ballpoint off Corey's desk and scribbled a note on it, which he then tossed to his boss. She read the words he'd written, and then favored him with a quizzical look, obviously debating whether or not to proceed as he'd asked. But in the end, she proved that she trusted his judgment.

"When Agent McClaren observed that you trusted Justin Taylor, your response was, 'Yeah. And look where that got me.' What did you mean by that?"

Brian did not answer quickly or easily, and McClaren, understanding that this might be the hardest question of all, moved closer and renewed the gentleness of his embrace. "He deserved my trust - all of it - and I gave it to him, but..."
"But?"

The reply was barely a whisper. "But what it got me was having to stand still and watch him walk away. Knowing that it was the right thing for him to do, the thing I had to let him do."

Corey closed her eyes, once more struggling for composure. "You really believe that?"

"I more than believe it. I know it."

"Even though he loves you - with his whole heart."

Another pause, and a deep, shaky breath. "You can't love what you don't know."

Chris McClaren was suddenly unable to draw breath, unable to bear another moment of the icy cold that gripped him. "That's enough," he said firmly, no longer concerned with whether or not his boss would approve of his actions, or what might happen to the investigation - concerned only with his primary purpose, the job he was charged to do. This was about protecting Brian Kinney, and he would risk everything to live up to that responsibility. "Wake him up."

"But . . ."

"Wake - him - up!"

Corey's eyes were suddenly huge, and filled with bright glints of anger. But she realized, as she met McClaren's dark gaze, that he was not going to back down, or allow his conclusion to be overridden. "You and I," she said coldly, "are going to have a talk - later."

"Fine, but now - you wake him up."

Her entire body was trembling as she turned away from his glare and looked once more at her subject, and . . . she faltered briefly, not quite able to ignore the deep, unmistakable look of sorrow on his face. "Brian," she said softly, "I'm going to count to three now, and you're going to awaken. You'll feel refreshed and renewed, as if you're just waking from a good night's sleep. You're going to recall everything that we've discussed, and all the details that you remembered, but experience no pain from any of it. Are you ready?"

"Yes." Barely a whisper.

"One - two . . . three."

Brian shifted roughly and opened his eyes to find McClaren's face just inches away, and the FBI agent saw a dark shimmer of emotion form deep in those hazel depths, but it was gone before he could even begin to identify it, and Brian was moving away from him, using his thumbs to wipe telltale droplets from his eyes, sitting up and watching Alexandra Corey move to open the shutters and reveal the storm that was raging beyond the window.

"Brian, are you . . ."

"Stockwell," he said firmly. "He was there. And Craig Taylor."

"Are you sure?" asked Corey, sinking back into her chair and regarding him with some small degree of skepticism.

He laughed, but it was shaky. "This was your idea. Are you going to doubt me now?"

"You didn't remember before," she pointed out.
"That's because I was too busy fighting to get away from a redhot iron bar," he retorted, "to pay attention. But I caught a glimpse of Stockwell, at the very end, as he was turning to run. I recognized his profile, and how he moved, and I recognized Taylor's voice - something he said while they were gloating over what was about to happen to me. I just never realized that the reason it sounded familiar was because the inflection, the timber of it, was almost like Justin's voice."

She nodded, and made some notes in her file. "Anything else?"

"I got a glimpse of another one of them - the one who talked the most - but I didn't recognize him. All I got was a quick look at his profile and a glimpse of silver hair."

"Would you know him if you saw him again?"

"Not sure," he admitted. "His face was still in shadow. Maybe."

"Okay," she said. "Is there . . ."

"One more thing," he said very softly. "A couple of random comments that might have been about the bombing at Babylon. Nothing definite, but . . . possible. And a name. Brad, I think. Or Bradley, maybe. Something like that."

"Just Brad?" asked McClaren. "Was that a first name, last name . . . what?"

But Brian was shaking his head. "I don't know, except that, whoever he is, he might have been around to get a close look at the bomb victims. Maybe. I don't know exactly what that meant."

"And the fourth man?"

"Nothing. Just a general impression that he was smaller than the others. That's all."

Then he stood up, swaying only a bit, before starting toward the door.

"Brian," called McClaren, "are you all right?"

The sardonic smile came easily this time, but it was not reflected in dark, opaque eyes. "Why don't you tell me? The two of you have managed to expose my secret identity, so I should be an open book to you now. Right?"

Then he walked out of the room, and McClaren and Corey exchanged uneasy glances; it was left to the junior agent to voice what both were thinking.

"I think," he said slowly, "we just made the biggest fucking mistake of our lives."

"Chris," she answered, reverting to a professional demeanor, "no matter how difficult it was, he needed to do that - to face his demons."

McClaren's expression clearly reflected the degree of his disbelief. "His demons? Do you really believe he hasn't spent every day of his fucking life confronting those demons? You don't understand what just happened, Alex. Do you realize that he has never - never - spoken of those feelings of guilt before? To anyone. And now, he not only has to deal with an admission he never wanted to make, but he has to do so knowing that you and I were there to hear it. That the most private thing in his life is now out there, under someone else's control. How does he know that we'll honor his wishes, preserve his privacy? We've made him vulnerable, and that's not something he knows how to deal with."
She looked bewildered. "But we wouldn't . . ."

"Right," he snapped. "And his history - with all the people in his life that he should have been able to trust - that's going to convince him that he has nothing to worry about. Right?"

Alexandra Corey sighed. "Damn it!"

McClaren nodded. "Precisely."

She offered him a weary smile. "He really does trust you, you know, so . . ."

But he was shaking his head. "Wrong tense, maybe. He really did trust me. Now I'm not so sure."

She turned to gaze out into the storm, which was still doing its worst. "If I'm right, he doesn't give his trust easily. And I doubt he takes it back quite so quickly either. Go talk to him."

He sighed. "Un-fucking-believable, isn't it? That a man like that - Jesus! - can believe that he's not good enough."

"Just proves that we're all vulnerable inside," she answered. "And you need to get to him quickly, before he sinks deeper into depression and decides that it's all your fault."

Her smile was only slightly venal, as they both knew who Brian would hold responsible, once he had time to think about it.

He lifted his hands to scrub at his face, already trying to figure out what to say in order to make Brian see reason. "That's not the only issue," he explained. "In a couple of hours, it's very possible that this whole shit is going to blow up in our faces. I know that you felt you were doing the right thing, agreeing to Ms. Whitney's request, but . . ."

Corey shrugged. "I thought he'd endured enough - paid enough. You don't agree?"

"You saw him," he retorted. "You saw what it means to him. I think it was presumptuous to make the decision for him, that he's the only one who has the right to decide what he wants to do. And if I lose his trust now - really lose it - there'll be no getting it back. He'll never let me get close to him again."

"You're not afraid of him. Are you? You're an FBI agent, for Christ's sake."

He rolled his eyes. "And he's Brian Kinney, and if you think that's not enough to intimidate anybody - even an FBI agent - then excuse me, Ms. Corey, but you don't know shit."

He left her there then, with her mouth hanging open, wondering if any subordinate had ever spoken to her in such terms. She didn't wonder for long, for the answer was obvious.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"This okay? For you, I mean?" Matthew Keller was not accustomed to being out of his depth, but he had no experience in the protocols required for dealing with the preservation of undercover identities. For all he knew, sitting here at Woody's with the man who changed faces and names as easily as most people changed shirts was equivalent to playing with fire while sitting on a powder keg.

Jared Hilliard smiled. "It's fine," he replied. "Let me tell you a little secret. In regular undercover work - always barring shit like top secret, clandestine, CIA-type crap - the most important thing to remember is that people generally only see what they expect to see. And, for the most part, no one here at Woody's is going to be looking for a down-and-out homeless vet, so . . ."

"And Schmidt? Didn't he see you keeping company with that lab slimeball? Pisspotty - Peehole? Whatever the fuck his name is?"

The smile morphed into a grin. "Schmidt is so focused on Schmidt, and on his little Machiavellian manipulations, that he wouldn't notice if Johnny Depp walked in and performed a pole dance for him."

Keller blinked. "That's pretty focused," he remarked, not quite able to resist the visualization of that scene in his mind.

Hilliard nodded, and raised his beer glass. "To distraction - the undercover cop's best friend."

"That's very revealing," replied Keller. "That you still think of yourself as a cop, I mean."

A quick flicker of sadness in Hilliard's eyes was gone so quickly it was almost unnoticeable. Almost.

Keller lifted his hand and touched his companion's shoulder very gently, hoping that one day - sooner rather than later - he'd be privileged to hear the whole story. Then he smiled and drank. "I was beginning to think we were never going to get here," he observed, enjoying the view as Hilliard leaned forward and braced muscular arms on the table between them.

"You've been a busy boy."

Keller laughed. "Just your run-of-the-mill life and death emergencies." He took another sip of his beer before continuing. "I treated him once, you know."

"Who, Schmidt?" Hilliard asked, slightly confused by the change of subject.

"No. Johnny Depp."

It was Hilliard's turn to blink. "You're shitting me."

"Nope."

"So - how did that happen?"

"Film company was shooting in the area, and he took a spill on his bike. Scraped up one arm and shoulder - enough to need a few stitches. It was during my residency, and I was just finishing up an 18-hour shift when he walked in." His smile was semi-rueful. "First, I was sure I was hallucinating; then, I was sure that at the very least, he'd insist on having the medical chief of staff attend him. But he didn't. He just hopped up on the exam table and sat there, waiting for me to take care of his injury. Just like any Tom, Dick, or Harry off the street."

Blue eyes were suddenly bright with speculation. "Jesus! What was he like?"

The doctor thought for a moment. "Like sex in blue jeans. What do you think? I had a fucking boner for a week."

"Did he notice?"

Keller's eye-roll was a classic. "Have you ever tried to hide an erection in scrub pants? It can't be done. Of course, he noticed."

"And?"
"And he just smiled and sat there and let me stitch up the laceration on his arm. But when I was done, and he was leaving, he stopped, looked me straight in the eye, and kissed me. One quick kiss-gone almost before I had time to notice it. He tasted like spiced honey."

"No way."

"Yes, way." The surgeon grinned. "I was so stunned I almost walked into a wall, and the nurse that was assisting me was so intent on sneaking the suture needle that I used on him into her pocket and on not missing a second of watching him walk away that she knocked over a whole tray of sterilized instruments and managed to impale herself with a stainless steel Haris scalpel." The grin became a laugh. "It was pandemonium. When Brian heard about it, he didn't speak to me for a week."

Hilliard chuckled. "Let me guess. He wanted to meet Hollywood's bad boy."

"Meet him? Surely you know him better than that."

"But Depp's not gay - right?"

Keller lowered his head and looked up at his companion through thick, dark lashes. "When it comes to Brian Kinney, I'm not entirely sure that anybody is one hundred per cent 'not gay'. At least, not then. Now . . . who really knows?"

"You really think he won't be . . ." He made quotation marks with his fingers, "the real 'Brian Kinney' again?"

" Doesn't matter what I think. It's what he thinks that will decide where he goes from here."

"Have you talked to him?"

Keller nodded. "Briefly. He didn't have much to say, except to tell me that I should quit worrying.
But Turnage - Turnage is determined to live up to his reputation as a miracle worker. He assures me that Brian is going to be as good as new. Or better . . . except . . ."

"Except what?"

The doctor took another sip of beer. "Apparently, he's got it in his head that he wants to keep . . . a souvenir of what happened. A reminder of what vicious, cruel homophobes - people who hate him just because he's not like them - are capable of, so he never lets himself be vulnerable again."

"And you think that's what? Not healthy?"

Keller shrugged. "I just think it's a goddamned shame that those bastards are going to succeed in leaving their mark on a walking work of art. That's all."

Hilliard leaned forward, and traced a gentle fingertip across the doctor's jaw-line. "That's not all. You love him."

Green eyes were suddenly awash with shadows. "Hundreds - maybe even thousands - of people believe that they have Brian Kinney all figured out - that he's all about lust and fucking and getting his needs met and making people want him and laughing at the idea that he could ever need anyone, or love anyone. And the bottom line is that they don't know shit. In the whole world, there aren't a half-dozen people who really see the man that he is, beneath the façade. He's . . . he deserves so much more than he'll ever allow himself to have. And this - this is just going to confirm what he already believes. If somebody doesn't step in and stop him, he's going to just open his hand and let go. Walk away from everything he's ever wanted."
"Because?"

The doctor sighed, and looked up to meet eyes that were perfectly, beautifully, impossibly blue. "Because he's convinced that he's poison - that he destroys everything he touches - everything he loves. It's what he's always believed, although you'd never get most of the people who think they know him to understand that. And I don't know if there's anyone who can get through to him, make him see how wrong he is."

"Not even you?"

Keller laughed, but there was no joy in it. "Especially not me. He knows all too well that I can't possibly be objective. I love him too much."

Hilliard sipped at his beer, obviously considering options. "Then maybe," he said slowly, "he needs to hear it from someone who has no stake in him. Someone who doesn't love him at all."

But Keller was shaking his head. "No. I don't think so. If he's ever going to be able to accept it, I think it's going to have to come from the one person he can't completely reject. The person who owns his heart."

"Taylor?"

"Taylor," the doctor confirmed. Then he dredged up a tiny, lopsided smile. "Always assuming they don't kill each other first."

Hilliard did not offer an immediate, knee-jerk response, but appeared to be considering what Keller had said before speaking his mind, and the doctor was impressed by the man's obvious desire to understand the dynamic between Brian and his blond. He was less impressed, however, when Hilliard pulled out a pack of Marlboros and a lighter.

"Damn," he said softly, with a gesture toward the cigarette, "I thought you were smarter than the rest of us."

Hilliard grinned as he lit up and watched as Keller did the same. "Mr. Kinney and I often shared a smoke break, when he'd work late."

"Yeah, well, Mr. Kinney has this bizarre idea that he's immortal." Then he realized what he'd said, and his voice dropped to a near whisper. "At least, he used to." He took a deep shaky breath and managed to dredge up a smile. "I once dragged him to an autopsy of a man who died of lung cancer."

"And how did he react?"

"Took one look, and excused himself to go have a cigarette. And I went with him. Little fucker was always . . . irresistible."

Hilliard leaned forward and laid his hand on the doctor's shoulder, sensing that the man was having a rough moment. "And invincible, huh?"

"Or so he believed. God!" Keller closed his eyes and rubbed the bridge of his nose with thumb and forefinger. "More than anything, I want to believe that he'll regain that confidence." He smiled then, obviously embarrassed by his own vulnerability. "There was never anything quite as beautiful as a cocky, confidant, completely unintimidated Brian Kinney."

Hilliard nodded. "I may not have known him as long as you, or as well, but I do know that much."
They sat in silence for a while, sipping at their beers, and enjoying a strange, easy camaraderie, which neither could easily explain but both found comforting - and worthy of further exploration. When Hilliard's cell phone rang, and his boss's name appeared on its display, he was surprisingly reluctant to allow the interruption of something that he could not quite define. But he was too well-trained and too professional to ignore the call.

Keller went to fetch another round of beers as his companion listened to Mathis's summation of the latest report from the authorities and from Brian's caretakers.

"Sure," he replied, when Mathis was done, "I'll check around. But it's a common name."

"What's up?" asked Keller as Hilliard disconnected.

The undercover operative hesitated for a moment, not completely certain of whether or not he could reveal what he'd heard. But then he realized - and rationalized - that there was virtually nothing about Brian Kinney that this man didn't already know, or couldn't find out with a simple phone call. "Brian's memories are coming back."

Keller took a deep breath. "You mean somebody convinced him that he needed to relive it - to force him to remember it all."

"Yeah. That's about the size of it."

"Shit!"

"Yeah. It sucks."

"All in the name of 'justice', no doubt. Or truth."

Hilliard couldn't bring himself to argue, although he did feel compelled to posit an alternative. "Or maybe - just to help him put it in the past, where it belongs."

Keller's eyes were suddenly bright with speculation. "Uh, huh. And tell me - did this little excursion down Memory Lane produce some concrete results?"

Hilliard couldn't quite swallow a scapegrace smile. "Yeah. It did. He remembered two of the people who were there that night. And a couple of details that might - with a little luck - help us learn more. About the attack on him, and maybe even what happened at Babylon."

The physician took a big swallow of his beer. "Let me guess. You're going to go all professional on me now, and say that you can't reveal any more than that. That I'll just have to wait until everything becomes public."

"That's exactly what I should do."

Keller sat back and stretched his long, jeans-clad legs out in front of him, just brushing against Hilliard's ankle in the process, and offering a lazy, speculative smile. "And do you always do what you should?"

Hilliard laughed, a low, textured rumble. "I can see why you and Kinney never hooked up. You're too much alike."

Green eyes glinted with humor and something else. "What makes you think we never hooked up?"

Hilliard didn't so much as blink. "Because the Apocalypse hasn't happened yet."
The doctor erupted in bright laughter. "No, but it was close."

"So you two . . . did . . ."

"Do you really think I'm going to answer that?"

Hilliard took a long pull at his beer, and decided that, in spite of an incredibly intense spurt of curiosity, he was truly better off not knowing. So he ignored the question and returned to the previous subject. "Can you think of anyone named Brad, or Bradley maybe, who might have had access to the Babylon bomb victims? Up close and personal access?"

Keller smiled. "I think this comes under the heading of one hand washing the other."

"Meaning?"

The physician was quiet for a while, watching bubbles rise in his beer, but it was obvious that he was seeing something else entirely. "I saved his life, you know. Literally. Cut him open and stuck my hands into his body, in order to fix what was broken. And I have to admit that it felt fucking fabulous. To know that I was able to do that for him. For Brian, because . . ." He looked up and gazed straight into Hilliard's eyes, deliberately allowing the man to recognize the depth of his passion. "There's no way that I can explain what he means to me, or what we mean to each other. But I find now that I want to do more. It's not enough to be part of putting him back together."

"I'm not sure what . . ."

"I want to make sure that the motherfuckers who did this understand that they don't get to just walk away from it - that they know there are always consequences. I want to do something to make sure that it doesn't happen again, to anybody." His smile was slightly lopsided. "If this is the first volley in a war, and Brian was supposed to be the first casualty, then we all need to step up. To challenge the status quo and change things that have gone unchallenged for too fucking long. To demand justice."

Hilliard grinned, and took a moment to light another cigarette. "So you want to play soldier."

But the physician did not smile in return. "I'm not playing. I want in - on whatever it is you're doing. I want . . . no, I need to do this. I think maybe we all need to do this. Because people like Brian have fought this battle alone for too damned long, not because they set out to make a big issue of it, but because they refuse to step aside, to hide themselves and apologize for being who they are. It's time the rest of us step up, and shoulder our share of the load. So I'm asking you to let me in."

Hilliard took his time to find the right words to offer in response. "I'm not exactly a free agent, you know. I take orders, so I can't promise anything specific. But I'll do what I can. Soooo . . . Brad?"

"You are kidding. Right?" Keller was shaking his head. "I can think of three Brads, a Bradley, and two Bradfords who work the nightshift at the hospital. And that's just off the cuff. No telling how many others might turn up. It's a common name."

A commotion at the door drew their attention then, and Keller didn't bother to try to suppress a smile. "I think your theory is about to be tested."

Hilliard shrugged, as he watched Melanie Marcus, Ted Schmidt and his live-in lover, Blake Wyzecki, hurry through the entrance and make their way to an adjacent table. "No worries, Mate, although, if you're really concerned, we could continue this someplace more private."
Green eyes locked with blue, and there was no denying that both understood exactly what the undercover agent was suggesting.

Keller's hesitation was brief, but long enough for Hilliard to take notice. "Never mind," he said softly. "It was just a suggestion. Don't . . ."

"Your place, or mine?" asked Keller quickly, swallowing the last of his misgivings. It had been a long time, he realized. Long enough.

"You sure?" Hilliard replied, not wanting to take advantage of a momentary weakness, and be wretchedly disappointed later.

Keller finished his beer, took a moment to peer into the depths of those incredible, cerulean eyes before leaning forward and claiming beautiful sculpted lips with a hungry kiss that allowed him to fully explore the mouth that opened to him.

The clamor and clatter that was as constant at Woody's as the smell of beer continued around them, but more than one pair of eyes paused in sweeping the room to take note of a sight that was not the least bit out of the ordinary at the most infamous gay bar in Pittsburgh; two guys kissing was simply di rigueur in this setting, but two guys like this - each defining hotness in his own particular way - that was worthy of notice, even here. Some eyes even seemed to mist over, filled with traces of nostalgia, with a haunting awareness of what had been so sadly lacking of late.

Brian Kinney, after all, had been missing from the scene for a very long time.

"Drinks are on me," Ted announced, taking a deep breath and making a deliberate decision to concentrate on the positive aspects of his life and ignore the less pleasant events of what had been a very long day.

"Are we celebrating?"

The accountant grinned. "It might be a little premature to say that, but, hey! I made it through another day of dealing with the Blonde Bimbo without resorting to driving a stake through her heart, so I'm thinking that's a good enough reason."

Blake could not quite suppress a tiny sigh. "Teddie, I know that you feel that Cynthia is deliberately trying to drive a wedge between you and Brian, but maybe she's just a little overwhelmed with everything that's happened, you know. Maybe she's just . . ."

He fell silent abruptly when he saw the shimmer of resentment rise in Ted's dark eyes. "I think I'm in a better position than you to know what she's up to. You don't even know her."

"That's true, but you have to admit that she must be under a lot of pressure, to step up and try to fill in for a man like Brian Kinney."

Ted's frown was almost a snarl. "As if she could or should. And tomorrow, she's going to realize that she hasn't succeeded in fooling anyone, that we all see through her. I hope you're planning to come to the meeting, to lend your support. I know that you always want to see the best in people, Blake."

There was just the faintest hint of condescension in that observation, but Blake managed - almost - to let it go unnoticed. "But take it from me when I tell you that you really don't know her.

"I don't pretend to know her," Blake said quietly, "but Brian does, and he must have had a reason for choosing her to . . ."
“Yes, and he's going to learn PDQ that he should have made better choices.” The accountant sat back and watched droplets of condensation trickle down his bottle of tonic water and allowed himself just a moment to contemplate how it would feel when his moment of triumph was at hand, when he was able to lay it all out for Brian, to expose the degree of Cynthia's treachery, as well as the depth of his own brilliance in making Kinnetic - and its president - the most successful PR firm in the Midwest. Maybe even in the entire country. And all as a result of taking advantage of opportunities provided by knowing the right people and choosing the right moment to venture out into previously uncharted waters in order to seize the day.

Judging from what he'd seen and heard, he was relatively certain that his employer would never again be the old, flamboyantly beautiful Brian Kinney, the man that every gay boy wanted to grow up to be. He wasn't entirely sure how he felt about that, and he was very careful to avoid analyzing his own emotional response to that assumption. Nevertheless, with the help of his devoted friend and financial advisor, Brian would be able to trade his prior stud status for something equally impressive. No, not equally. Actually more impressive, in that he would become a star in a different venue - a supernova in the world of finance - and Ted Schmidt would be able to assume a role for which he knew himself to be uniquely qualified: starmaker. He might not have the 'royal blood' or the resources to ever assume the throne himself, but he could be something just as majestic: the power behind it.

Brian would, of course, be eternally, deeply grateful, and Ted would gain the one thing for which he'd always hungered - the bottomless respect of friends, colleagues, and the Brian Kinneys of the world.

"Earth to Ted," said Melanie with a conspiratorial grin. "Weren't you the one that cautioned me about counting chickens?"

The accountant flashed her an embarrassed smile. "Sorry."

He looked up then, and was confronted with a sight that was stunning enough, and erotic enough, to cause him to lose his train of thought and feel a tightening in his groin. "Holy shit!" he said softly. "Get a load of that."

Blake, somewhat relieved at the prospect of a change of subject, turned to follow the direction of his gaze and uttered a soft, approving laugh. "Now there's a sight to lift the spirits," he observed.

"Hey," said Melanie, "isn't that Keller? Brian's best bud?"

Ted sniffed. "For now, maybe." Then his eyes narrowed as he identified the individual who was locked in a clinch with the physician. "That's Hilliard with him, one of our security people. I doubt Mathis - or Brian either - would be very happy with him putting on such a display."

It was Blake's turn to blink. "You think that Brian Kinney is going to be upset about a little PDA?"

Ted rolled his eyes. "Everybody knows that the rules are different when you're at the top of the peck . . ."

He fell silent as he felt the vibration of his cell phone in his pocket, and although he was initially annoyed by the interruption, he quickly changed his mind when he recognized the name of the caller.

"Marshall," he greeted, making sure to speak loudly enough for his companions to realize the identity - and importance - of his caller, "how's sunny . . . wherever-the-hell you are?"

"It's lovely, Ted," came the response, only slightly less than land-line perfect. "I actually decided to cut out early from the brokers' conference, and I'm en route to a private island in the South Pacific. Owned by one of our investors. A perfect place to get away from it all. I'm sure you know how exhausting it is when you're juggling funds and manipulating investment strategies in major financial markets."

"Well," Ted replied, flashing a modest smile for his friends, "not yet really. But I'm looking forward to wearing myself out - in pursuit of newer and ever greater profits."

"Of course, and well said." There was a beat of background noise then, and an indistinct murmur, leading Ted to realize that the financier was not alone - that someone else was listening in. "And speaking of investments, Teddie, I just got an email from our bank in the Caymans, to confirm receipt of your transfer. But there seems to be a problem. Perhaps I didn't make myself clear, or perhaps it's a simple clerical error, but I thought you understood that the absolute minimum dollar amount required to take advantage of this opportunity is two million. The transfer, however, was for only $240,000. Now - because it's you, and because you're one of my oldest friends and I trust you implicitly - I went ahead and approved accepting the funds, on the assumption that the full amount is en route, but I must point out that you're running out of time."

"Wait a minute!" Ted sat up straight so abruptly that he knocked his water bottle to the floor. "What are you talking about? The total transfer was for $2,240,000.00. I checked on it myself just this morning."

Marshall Hargrave did not reply for several seconds, and once more, Ted could almost hear the voice that was speaking to the man at the other end of the wireless connection. Almost - but not quite. When Hargrave did resume speaking, he sounded amused. "Then I'm sure it must be a clerical error. Probably some pretty little clerk that isn't accustomed to dealing with major transactions of this nature. Still, in order to keep everything moving smoothly, we had to set a deadline on accepting these transfers, and there are only two days left before access is closed down. So it's too late there to do anything about it today, but I strongly advise that you take immediate action in the morning to make sure you don't get locked out of the chance of a lifetime."

"I most certainly will," Ted replied firmly. "And thanks for letting me know. I guarantee that the balance of the funds will be in your hands tomorrow, well before your deadline, and whoever is responsible for this fuck-up will pay for their mistake, I promise you that."

Almost ten thousand miles away, aboard a 280-foot luxury yacht owned by a founding father of a major European crime syndicate and staffed by a crew of 30, Marshall Hargrave smiled up at his companion - a man who had been his partner in his financial intrigues and machinations for as long as he had been in business - and spoke into his sat-phone. "Oh, that's wonderful, Teddie. I knew I could count on you, and I'm absolutely certain that you will be instrumental in seeing that justice is served."

He hung up then, and flashed a thumbs-up to the group of men gathered in the yacht's exquisite dining salon, while glancing out toward the sun deck where a bevy of beautiful, world-famous, bikini-clad models were drinking Cosmos and awaiting the attention of their rich, powerful patrons. "And that," he said, lifting his glass of Dom Perignon, "should be that. The final two million, and may I just say that it couldn't have come from a more deserving investor."

The ugly laughter that erupted around the table was thick with contempt, saturated with malice, and filled with anticipation.

In Pittsburgh, Ted was trying - without much success - to control a rising surge of anger and planning ugly vengeance on whoever was responsible for the error in the funds transfer. Melanie, meanwhile, was enjoying her martini while indulging in a few moments of fantasy, visualizing her wife's gratitude and appreciation of the profits this little endeavor would generate.

But Blake . . . Blake was looking a bit uncertain, having picked up on something during the conversation - something odd.

"Teddie," he said softly, knowing that he was about to step on a potential land mine, but compelled to speak anyway, "isn't this all just a little too . . . cloak and dagger, a little melodramatic? I mean I understand that you want to do this for Brian - to give him this incredible gift - but . . ."

"But what?" Ted was still simmering with irritation over the failed transfer of funds.

"But what if you're wrong? Wouldn't it be prudent to simply check with Brian, before you go through with this?"

Ted's eyes were suddenly filled with a hard, icy glint. "Prudent? Is that what I should be? Let me tell you something, Blake. I've spent my whole fucking life being prudent, and being ridiculed for it by men like Brian Kinney who don't even know the meaning of the word. Never once did I leap without looking a dozen times; never once taking even the slightest risk. And you know what it got me? Zilch. Zippo. A big fat zero. That's what my life has amounted to. Noth-ing! Well, not any more. This is my big chance - the opportunity to take my rightful place among the individuals who rule the financial world. To become a mover and shaker. And I deserve it; I always deserved it. But I was just never in the right place at the right time, with the right resources. Until now. This is my bonanza. My brass ring. My moment in the spotlight. Don't you understand? I don't want to be prudent, any more."

Blake had actually opened his mouth to point out that a note of caution might still be in order, but closed it immediately when he noted that Ted's jaw was clenched with stony resolve. At this point, he concluded - rightfully - that any further protest would be futile. Thus, he was looking for another subject to broach, a diversion to redirect the conversation toward greener pastures, when he looked up and saw that Matt Keller and Jared Hilliard had finally pulled away from each other and risen to make their way out of the bar. On the way, they passed directly behind Ted, and it was just a matter of luck - whether good or bad yet to be determined - that Blake happened to be looking straight at Hilliard's face as the security officer glanced down at his fellow Kinnetic employee.

It was no secret that Hilliard's eyes were truly remarkable, due to the contrast of the brilliant blue against the dark bronze of his skin, but they were also remarkable for another reason; despite the man's ability to blend into the landscape around him - a much desired quality in his chosen profession - his eyes were exquisitely expressive, revealing thoughts and feelings with astonishing clarity at moments when he thought no one was looking or when he had no reason for shielding.

With that seemingly random observation, Blake was suddenly compelled to drop his gaze, wishing that he had not looked up to study the man's beautiful features and thus would have been spared noticing the shadows in those dramatic, jewel-toned eyes as the two maneuvered around the table. If he had not looked, he would not have zeroed in on the icy glints that sparked within that deep blue. But it was too late for that - too late to unsee what he had seen or to pretend to be uncertain of what it signified, for there was absolutely no doubt about the emotion glittering there.

Jared Hilliard was angry - coldly, bitterly angry - and something more. Angry - and scornful, perhaps. Yes. There was scorn in his eyes, but there was also an element of indelible sadness and disappointment.

Blake felt his throat go very dry, and gripped his glass of iced tea with hands that were suddenly damp and shaky as the two men made their exit.
What could have caused that deep resentment that Hilliard had not quite been able to conceal? What had gone through his mind as he'd looked down at Ted?

And why was Blake suddenly convinced that something was very, very wrong, and that there was absolutely nothing he could do about it?

The rain had stopped as the sun dipped toward the horizon, and the sky was streaked with russet and crimson that reflected in the surf, turning whitecaps into a coral froth. At the edge of the deck, Chris McClaren stood and looked out across the rippled sand to where Brian was seated at the base of a low dune, staring out toward the sea where the first stars were etched against deep purple sky. He squinted a bit, trying to make out Brian’s features and thinking to himself that the man's profile would be particularly beautiful washed with that rosy radiance. But there was actually nothing to see, as face and body remained swathed in shadow, shadow made even more impenetrable by the billow of smoke from the joint that Brian had just lit. His second of the night, or maybe his third. Nobody was really counting.

The FBI agent had tried to talk to Brian twice since the unsettling hypnosis session, but without success. Both times, he had approached the man with a soft voice and a gentle touch, only to be rejected by a cold stare and actual physical resistance. Both times, Brian had simply turned and walked away, without a word.

McClaren sighed, and turned to look back toward the cottage where Trina was finishing up dinner preparations, and Alexandra Corey was seated at the bar, working on something in a file and pretending that she was not really watching the clock.

They both knew that time was running out. They had been granted a bit of a reprieve when Toby had called and informed them that he had been unable to complete his errand, because of an unscheduled delay at the airport. But that reprieve was almost over at this hour, and McClaren took a deep breath, realizing that it truly was now - or not at all.

Squaring his shoulders, he walked down the steps and across the sand to kneel beside the silent young man who didn't even both to look up at his approach.

"Brian, I know . . ."

"Stop!"

McClaren blinked. Since Brian had not said a single word to him during his previous attempts to communicate, he supposed that this could be considered progress, except that he didn't have time to stop.

"I know you don't . . .'

Brian's exhalation was more an expression of impatience than a sigh of regret. "No. You don't know. And if you insist on talking to me like I was teetering on the edge of a mental breakdown or as fragile as blown glass, then we have nothing to say to each other." He turned then, and allowed the FBI agent to read what was in his eyes, and to be surprised that it was not at all what he'd expected. "I don't do fragile. Don't you know that by now? And you two 'experts' have apparently put your heads together and decided that I suffered some kind of epiphany during that pathetic little fuck-fest this afternoon." Then he looked back toward the sea and took another drag from his toke. "That's the most ridiculous crap I've ever heard."
He sat up then, bracing his arms across his knees, and stared at McClaren with a sardonic grin. "What? You think I learned something that I didn't already know?"

McClaren shrugged, settling in closer to Brian and welcoming the contact of bare skin to skin - a contact he had not been entirely sure he would ever be allowed to experience again. "You remembered things about the night of the attack. Things that you'd forgotten."

Brian's eyes were suddenly darker, thick of memory. "Remembering isn't learning."

"But . . ."

Brian leaned forward then, and stilled McClaren's lips in the most direct, effective way. Then he pulled back and regarded the agent's face with a smile, obviously enjoying the view.

"Don't make the mistake of thinking that never speaking of something is the same as not knowing it." He took a deep breath. "I've always known the truth."

"You're talking about Justin," said McClaren, not yet willing to let go of his argument. "But you can't really . . . ."

"Yes. I can. Really." Brian's voice had gone cold and sharp, and contained more than a hint of a warning. "And it's not anything I want to discuss with you."

"Okay, then. If you want to put it behind us, so that we never bring it up again, make me understand it. Make me see why you feel responsible for everything that happened to him."

"I've got a better idea. Why don't we just fuck, and forget everything else?"

"If it doesn't bother you, why are you dodging the question?"

Brian gave a classic eye-roll. "What part of 'I don't want to talk to you about this', do you not understand?"

"Brian, I know that you think the world revolves around you. But not even you can be so egocentric that you think you caused the things that happened to Justin."

Brian huffed an impatient sigh, and fell silent for a moment, once more staring out to sea. But he finally began to speak, and McClaren was forced to listen very carefully since his voice was very soft. "You're a big, strong guy. Able to defend yourself. Probably a good fighter. Right?"

McClaren, completely bewildered by the comments, could only nod, and watch the shadows move deep in Brian's eyes as he turned back to study the FBI agent's expression. "Given all that, I should probably be afraid of you. Do you think I am?"

"Of course not."

"Why not?"

"Because you know me. You know that I wouldn't . . . ."

"That may be true, but it's not why I'm not afraid of you."

McClaren frowned, struggling to follow Brian's reasoning but only getting more confused. "Then why?"

"Because I'm not afraid of anybody. It's how I learned to deal with the shit in my life. I trained myself to be strong enough, angry enough - defiant enough - to face up to anything, anybody. I even learned how to fight, to defend myself by whatever means were necessary. Even if it meant fighting dirty, and I do. Fight dirty, I mean. When I have to. I was very young when I decided that I'd had enough of being victimized, and I set out to make myself invincible."

"Nobody's invincible, Brian."

Brian shrugged. "Maybe, but it's the image that counts. Just like in everything else, I learned to wear the attitude - to walk the walk, as they say, so nobody would have the balls to take me on. And while it's true that I go to the gym regularly because I'm a fag who wants to look good, I also go for another reason." His smile took on an almost sinister quality. "I'm a lot stronger than you'd imagine, and I know how to take care of myself." An odd flicker of emotion crossed his face then, and he folded his lips into his mouth to cover a trace of embarrassment. "Except for those rare, inconvenient moments when I get jumped by a dozen Neanderthals with blades and guns and iron bars."

McClaren settled back against the dune, leaning slightly so that his shoulder was braced against Brian's side, and helped himself to a deep drag from Brian's joint. "Okay," he said finally. "So you're a tough, cocky, scrappy fag. How does that make you responsible for what happened to Justin?"

Hazel eyes were suddenly midnight dark, almost opaque. "I let myself forget that it was just an image. I let myself buy into my own bullshit, and believe that I could protect myself and everybody else that I cared about. And worse than that, I made him believe it too. And then, I - I guess I lost my mind or something, and let myself get sucked into his romantic little fantasy, with some kind of notion that we could spit in the faces of the fuckers that tried to convince him that he was a hopeless pervert just because he . . .'

"Ahhhh," sighed McClaren. "And that's the bottom line, isn't it? They despised him and condemned him, because he loved you."

Brian shifted away and refused to meet the FBI agent's gaze. "He doesn't love me. Why the fuck would he love me, when every bad thing that's happened to him has been because of me? He almost died because . . ."

"He would have," McClaren interrupted. "If not for you, he would have died there in that parking garage. You do know that, don't you? Along with all this other bullshit that you've adopted as gospel, you have surely realized that Dobbs, or Hobbs, or who-the-fuck-ever - would not have walked away and left him alive to identify his attacker. I've read the police reports, Brian, and there's no doubt that if you hadn't been there, that motherfucker would have finished what he started, and Justin would have died."

Brian managed to get to his feet without resorting to using his cane to push himself up. "And if I hadn't been there in the first place, it would never have happened at all."

Acting on nothing but pure instinct, McClaren reached up and grabbed Brian's arm and jerked him back down beside him, neither one of them sparing a thought to how such a maneuver might affect his injuries. Later, the FBI agent would be grateful that the only sign of physical discomfort Brian allowed himself was a soft "Oof!" as he landed.

"What? You're God now? The All-powerful Kinney is able to look into the hearts and minds of lesser mortals? I told you that I read the police reports, but now I have to wonder . . . did you read them? Especially the part about Justin giving the little fucker a handjob after school one day. Did you read that? And surely someone as smart - as brilliant as you - the Mighty Kinney - knows that there's nothing that terrifies a homophobic prick more than any tiny little notion that maybe - just maybe - he's not quite as hetero as he wants everyone to believe."
Very deliberately, McClaren reached out and braced his hands on either side of Brian's face, forcing him to turn and meet his eyes. "He didn't attack Justin because of what you did. He attacked him because of what Justin did - and because he realized that Justin saw that the big, bad, hetero jock had loved having his willie whacked by a piece of blond boy-ass."

For a moment, the two men simply stared at each other, and McClaren sensed that this was a pivotal moment - that Brian's reaction here would set the tone for everything that came later. They would be friends - or they would not - depending on what happened how.

"You do realize," said Brian slowly, "that the only reason you're making perfect sense is because I'm stoned to the gills."

McClaren laughed, helped himself to another deep drag, before claiming that luscious mouth and sharing the hit.

Brian drew back, and smiled, but there was no amusement in his eyes. "We're done with this. Okay?"

The FBI agent sighed. "We are, only . . ." He debated just spitting it all out - dropping the other shoe - but ultimately decided against it. Still, he felt compelled to reinforce what he'd been trying to say. "Just remember, while it's true that you and I would never have met if this weren't my job, and might never have been friends, even if we had met, I think we are friends now. And friends - sometimes they screw up and make bad choices, but generally they mean well. I have your back, Brian. Even when you're mad enough to spit nails at me - or vice versa. I hope you'll keep that in mind."

Brian bit his lip, studying his companion's face and trying to figure out what it was that insisted on raising a red flag in his mind. "That sounds suspiciously like a preface to an apology," he remarked. "Is there something you want to tell me?"

The hesitation this time was very brief, but still noticeable for a man as perceptive as Brian Kinney. Nevertheless, when McClaren replied with a simple headshake, emphasized by eyes that quickly looked away, Brian decided to allow the evasion - for now.

"Okay, you two," called Trina Thomas as she finished setting the patio table for dinner for four. "Time to decide if you're going to make a meal of each other - in which case, give me a minute to fetch a chair so I can make myself comfortable for the show - or you're going to be blown away with my most famous culinary masterpiece, which poor clueless, unsophisticated souls might classify with a plebian name like Crabmeat Remoulade, never knowing that they're discussing something so extraordinary that it should be identified as food for the gods."

"Modest," remarked Brian drily, "isn't she?"

But, as it turned out, he was forced to eat his words, and admit that Trina was, indeed, modest, as the crab cakes, dripping with an incredibly rich and delectable cream sauce with a unique taste that not even Alexandra Corey - who had dined in some of the most elegant locations in the world - could identify, proved to be every bit as spectacular as she'd claimed.

And, exactly as she'd intended, Trina's beautifully prepared meal had served to further defuse the tension that had been crackling around the cottage's three primary residents all day, so that when Brian looked up from his empty plate, and favored her with a scapegrace smile, she felt an unexpected stir of warmth in her heart.

"Ruint, huh?" he asked, eyes glinting topaz in the flicker of the flames of the hurricane candles on the table.
"Ruint," she answered, raising her wineglass to him.

"How about you come back to Pittsburgh with me?" he asked, surprising himself by making an offer he hadn't really intended to make.

Trina laughed - a rich, infectious rumble. "Are you proposing to me, young Mr. Kinney?"

And Brian laughed too - an easy, comfortable sound that caused the two FBI agents to exchange soft, wistful smiles. Both realized that it was a sound they hadn't heard often, and would like to hear more frequently.

"Hey," said Brian, retrieving his iPod from a nearby shelf where it had been providing a selection of soft classic rock as a perfect background for their meal. "I think I've got the perfect thing for . . ." He spent a moment scanning through the menu, looking for what he wanted. Then he smiled.

"Yeah, perfect," he said with a grin, and watched as Trina's face reflected his own smug satisfaction as the first notes of the song sounded.

Brian stood up, and both Corey and McClaren noticed that he was becoming less dependent on his cane with every passing hour, as he stepped forward and took Trina's hand. "May I have this dance?" he laughed.

Trina Thomas was a big woman. Kind-hearted individuals would have described her as buxom, or statuesque, perhaps. The less tactful would simply have called her fat. But for all that, she was surprisingly graceful and light on her feet, and she accepted Brian's invitation with a bright grin. Still, given his recent injuries, his ability to maneuver her form to the rhythm of the music should have been compromised, at least, but somehow, it wasn't. They moved easily together, laughing over some shared, private comment.

McClaren was thoroughly enjoying the view, noting how the warm light reflected from the lamps inside the house picked up the bright hues of the tropical beach dress that was her trademark fashion, and highlighted the beautiful lines of Brian's face and body while obscuring the scars he still bore. He glanced over at Alexandra Corey and suspected that she was thinking the same thing, as the music played on.

Red, red wine,
It's up to you . . .*

The music and the dance went on, but the two FBI agents suddenly went very still, barely breathing, as both heard the sound of a car pulling up out front, and the slam of its doors.

Brian, meanwhile, managed to spin Trina under his lifted arm, only staggering a little, apparently oblivious of the eyes that followed him so eagerly. Although, thought McClaren, that was probably just an illusion; he was pretty sure that Brian Kinney always knew when he was being watched and enjoyed the effect he had on the watchers.

Only this time . . .

Brian spun his partner again, but a flicker of light from the candles caught a peculiar expression on his face, as the lyrics reached a particularly poignant moment.

I was wrong,
And I find
Just one thing makes me forget . . ."
A faint shuffle of sound, footsteps on sand, and then a voice - deadpan, determined not to laugh, but filled with such joy that it was almost overwhelming. "Well, I see some things never change. You still can't dance for shit."

And for one single moment, the entire world seemed to pause in its spin as time ceased to exist.

Brian turned, very slowly, and Chris McClaren made certain to stay focused on that exquisite face. He didn't need to look at Justin Taylor to know that the smile the young man wore was almost incandescent, spoke of love that could never be denied, of a heart reaching out, filled with the purest, most undeniable happiness imaginable. That went without saying.

But it was Brian's expression he had to see - Brian's reaction to what he could not have anticipated.

And he saw it.

Only for a moment, gone almost before it could register: Brian Kinney - open, naked, exposed, and unshielded.

And he felt something that he had never realized he would feel. In that fleeting second, he knew what it was to be heartbroken, to yearn for something he would never have.

For that one tiny frozen moment in time, it was pure, undiluted love that he saw in Brian's eyes - the kind of love that only the rare few are ever privileged to feel, and even fewer privileged to be the focus of.

He had never realized that he hungered for such a thing, and he understood immediately that he would have been better off never knowing.

Brian Kinney would only and ever love one man like that. It was in his eyes, written on his face, etched into every line of his body, and wrapped all around him like a cloak he would never succeed in shedding.

It was there . . . and it was gone, and in its place loomed a towering, frightening surge of pure rage.

And through it all, incredibly, Justin Taylor kept smiling.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

* Red, Red Wine - Neil Diamond

tbc
"We give hostages to fortune when we love."

"How the fuck did you get here?"

Chris McClaren had to concentrate to suppress an urge to flinch away from the white hot fury contained in those few words - a heat so extreme that the idea of spontaneous human combustion was suddenly not so far-fetched as it might have seemed only moments ago.

He found that he really wanted to look away, to not see that hard, scintillant brilliance sparking deep in eyes gone a sharp, bitter green, but he couldn't.

Then those eyes shifted toward him, and he realized that his first instinct had been correct. He should have looked away. Then he would not have seen that first, fleeting flash of bottomless love - which he had not wanted to see anyway - but, more importantly, he would not have been forced to watch that steaming, volcanic anger morph into bitter, frozen resentment, fueled by an infinite sense of betrayal.

The voice was softer now, and almost entirely without inflection. "Never mind. I'm not usually so slow to grasp the obvious. My congratulations on a perfect ambush."

"Brian," said the FBI agent, stepping forward and raising a hand.

But whatever he meant to say was left unsaid as Brian simply turned and walked off into the night, never looking toward any of them, but managing, in the process, to maintain as much distance as possible between himself and the new arrival.

McClaren glanced at young Taylor, and could not help but sigh as the mega-watt smile faltered. It was almost painful - probably would have been painful - if he'd not had more important things to worry about.

"Brian!" Justin's call was barely audible under a sudden gust of wind, giving Brian the opportunity to pretend not to hear, but McClaren was almost certain that the departing figure hesitated - for a fraction of a second - before resuming his determined plunge toward freedom.

Huge blue eyes - exquisitely expressive and filled with pain - turned to stare at the individuals still gathered on the deck. "You didn't tell him?" It was amazing, thought more than one of the observers of this drama, that a face so young and pretty could project such scathing contempt. "Dear God, you didn't tell him I was coming? Do you have any idea what you've done? Hasn't he had enough shit to deal with, without you betraying his trust?"

Chris McClaren's mouth fell open. Literally. Could it really be that this . . . this - what had Brian called the kid, on more than one occasion - this twat was actually sneering at them and looking as if he was both strong enough and angry enough to swat each of them like some kind of bug.

"You just stay here," the FBI agent snapped finally, biting back the rest of the scathing retort he wanted to shout.
"The hell with that!" Taylor was walking out toward the beach, completely disregarding the voices raised at his back.

Both Alexandra Corey and Trina Thomas started after him, but neither of them could actually be considered to be in prime physical condition, so it was McClaren who was the only one of the three who was able to overtake the young blonde and spin him around with a semi-violent tug on his arm.

But Justin Taylor - though he might still resemble a twink of the first order - had learned many lessons in the years since he'd been victimized the first time around, many of them - even most of them - under the tutelage of the man who'd just walked away from all of them, and he stood his ground, body tense and hands up in a defensive posture as McClaren got right in his face and prepared to cut the kid down to size. Only there, as it happened, was the rub. Justin Taylor was not about to allow anyone to send him back to victim-hood or reduce him to something less than he deserved to be.

The kid (and yes, he did know he shouldn't call him that, but . . . what the hell!) eyed McClaren with undisguised impatience, blended with a trace of . . . satisfaction? Could that actually be what the agent was sensing in that sapphire gaze? "You're not his boyfriend." There was no doubt in the timber of the voice, only undiluted conviction. "You're FBI."

McClaren knew that there was no time to lose, that Brian was getting farther away with every passing moment. Nevertheless, he couldn't quite resist an urge to puncture that bubble of smugness. "Yeah? Well, maybe you need to rethink your assumptions, little twat. Where's it written that I can't be both?"

Surprisingly strong hands gripped the FBI agent's forearms, as the young man's voice dropped to an icy whisper. "You don't get to call me that. Only one person . . . ever . . . gets to call me that."

McClaren huffed a sigh of patience almost exhausted. "Look, little shit, I don't give a damn what you call yourself. You can be the fucking Terminator if you like, but I need to go get him - to stop him . . . ."

"Why you?" Justin demanded. "Why should it be . . ."

"Because he trusts me." The words were sharp and clipped, almost snarled, but the FBI agent, despite the fact that he was speaking absolute truth as he knew it, felt a pang of regret as he saw shadows of uncertainty rise in those incredibly expressive eyes. He paused then, feeling a compelling urge to offer a scrap of comfort but knowing he couldn't afford the sentiment. "Because he knows he can trust me. Can you say the same?"

That was a low blow, the FBI agent thought as the young man flinched. But true nonetheless. "Justin," he said, reining in his impatience and trying to offer a voice of reason, "he just needs, right now. And he doesn't always know what it is that he needs. So, I need to go after him."

But Justin was not going to accept defeat easily. "I followed him across the country, after coming half-way around the world for him. And you let me come here, knowing that he would feel betrayed by your silence, so don't bother telling me that he trusts you. You'll be lucky if he doesn't tear you a new asshole. But . . . I know he needs some time to process everything and to think. So you've got ten minutes, because I'm not going to let him push me away again. So go, but hurry."

McClaren lifted one quizzical eyebrow, and then realized that there was no way he was going to succeed in changing the younger man's mind. So . . . he went - and hurried, as Trina Thomas came forward to introduce herself and to overcome Justin's assertions that he couldn't possibly eat a bite.
Thus McClaren would have fifteen minutes, instead of the ten he expected.

As it turned out, he would not have good reason to appreciate the extra time.

He was pretty sure he knew where he would find Brian, and he was right . . . almost.

North of the cottage, past a pristine stretch of sculpted sand and beyond a low march of dunes that built toward a rough headland, lay the skeletal framework of an old pier, almost obscured by thick clumps of sea grass. The structure itself was long since gone, eroded away by time and tide, but dark, weathered remnants of the foundation remained, and Brian had discovered early on that it was a good place to rest and catch his breath when he'd started taking regular walks as part of his daily regimen to help him regain his strength.

And that's where McClaren figured he would find his wayward and extremely pissed-off charge. He was not, however, exactly correct. Ordinarily, when resting or breath-catching or working his way through a problem or brooding or thinking deep thoughts or simply daydreaming, Brian would hoist himself up on one of the heavy old support beams wedged deep into the ground just above the delineation in the sand that marked high tide.

But not tonight. He was in the general location all right, but he was not sitting. And he was not actually on the beach. Instead, he was standing out in the middle of the breaking surf, with water rolling around his thighs, and he was soaked through. The pockets of his cut-off jeans were bulging with stones he had apparently gathered as he'd walked down the beach, and he was hurling them, one by one, out toward the open ocean, as his eyes sought the farthest line of the horizon.

"Jesus!" whispered McClaren, spying shirt, shoes, ankle brace, and cigarette pack dropped on the beach, and remembering, with rising alarm, that there were still some unhealed wounds at various sites on Brian's body - wounds that should never have been exposed to raw salt water. Further, it was obvious from the way that buff, once perfect body was twisting and jerking around its center that the man was probably already in considerable pain which would only get worse as he continued venting his frustration by abusing his body.

"Jesus!" the agent repeated, wondering how he was going to convince the man to come in from the surf.

And the answer, of course, was that he wasn't. Not from here anyway. Not until he was willing to stride out through that rolling tumult and confront the individual who almost certainly - at this very moment - would have gladly stood by and watched him disemboweled, without offering a single world of protest.

He knew he should move quickly to minimize the damage and the risk to Brian, but he also knew that the evening was upon them, carrying the chill of a gusting wind out of the East, and that Brian would need warmth as well as refuge from the cold wet grasp of the sea once he could be convinced to come out of the water. So McClaren hurried to the area behind the old pier where driftwood tended to accumulate, and, taking advantage of the shelter provided by a low dune, managed to put together a small campfire which he stoked and banked carefully to make sure it would continue to burn until it was needed.

Then he allowed himself one moment more, to take a deep breath and gird his loins, so to speak.

He walked out into the surf, lighting a cigarette as he went, and didn't stop until he was close enough to reach out and touch the man who was the center of his focus. Close enough, but he made no attempt to complete the physical connection. That, he knew, was not his place; not now.
Brian continued throwing rocks, and a quick hitch in his breathing as he completed the next throw announced that the motion was causing extreme discomfort. Then McClaren looked closer and saw a smear of bright red low down on the left side of that sculpted chest.

Shit.

"If you get gangrene - or some kind of fucking fungus from schmucking around in this toxic shit - I'm gonna have to deal with both Turnage and Keller, not to mention your entire cock-eyed extended family, so why don't you . . ."

"No." More bark than answer. "Why don't you?"

"What . . ."

The voice was nothing like the rich, honeyed tones of Brian Kinney in seduction mode. It was flat and cold and hard. "Why don't you explain to me - give me one single reason - why I should ever believe a thing you say to me, from this day forward." He turned then, and stepped into McLaren's space. "When you had to know that seeing him, dealing with him, is something I don't want to do. Why would you . . ."

"It wasn't just me."

Brian nodded. "I figured as much."

"Yeah? You figured out why she did it - as long as you're figuring?"

Brian shook his head and huffed a small, impatient sigh. "She thinks she owes me."

McClaren's favored him with a complacent smile. "I think she thinks she loves you."

Brian went very still then before deliberately turning away, but just a fraction of a second too late to prevent McClaren from seeing - and recognizing - a growing sense of betrayal. "In that case, she thinks too much. So you guys just put your pointed little heads together and decided that poor, deluded, dysfunctional Brian couldn't be trusted to figure out what he really needed. Why would . . ."

"Because it's not always easy to know what's best, even for yourself." The FBI agent knew it sounded lame, even as he said it, but he also knew it was true.

"I've been taking care of myself since I was eight years old, without interference or assistance from anybody. But, somehow, you guys think that you have a right to interfere, to tell me what I need? You've known me a few weeks, and you already think . . ."

McClaren reached out quickly and grabbed Brian's biceps, closing his fingers to a tight grip and giving a little shake for good measure. "You really want to know what I think? I think that people are so fucking intimidated by you and so bowled over by that icy stare and that arrogant sneer that declare that you don't need anybody - that they're afraid to tell you the truth. That they say what they think you want them to say. Or else they just prattle along and don't say anything at all. And in the end, I think it took someone who loved you enough to step outside the box, to understand that a person who hasn't spent a lifetime being dominated and controlled by you would see more clearly, speak more honestly . . ." His voice dropped to a gentle whisper as he leaned in and nuzzled against the velvety skin beneath Brian's ear. "Someone who would care enough to risk incurring your anger in order to tell you the truth."

Brian pulled back, and there was no mistaking the sarcastic gleam in topaz eyes. "And what truth would that be?"

"The one that's the complete opposite of what you tell yourself. You're not pushing Justin away because he doesn't know you." McClaren took a deep breath and braced himself. "You're pushing him away because he does."

Later, he would admit that he should have known - should have seen it coming. After all the silent, unacknowledged anger, the bitter frustrations, the endless disappointments, the bottomless pain that he kept locked within him, the despair of dreams shattered and ground into dust, and the all-consuming fear of being helpless to protect the things that mattered most - it was inevitable that Brian Kinney would finally lose the iron grip he'd been exerting over his thoughts and reactions, and strike out, targeting the person who happened to be closest at hand at the critical moment. The only truly surprising thing was that it hadn't happened sooner.

Brian jerked himself free of the hands that sought to restrain him, pulled away just far enough to reposition his body and channel all his power, all his energy, and - most importantly - all his rage into the fist that he drove into McClaren's midriff, and the uppercut that followed it, immediately splitting the flesh above the agent's left eye.

It probably would have gone further and grown uglier except that the FBI agent simply fell back before the assault, never so much as raising a hand to defend himself - something that Brian noticed immediately, something that seemed to enrage him even more.

"Get up, Shithead!" he snarled, standing there in the surf with his hands clinched at his sides, head up, shoulders back, with moonlight just kissing that classic profile, as he shifted again, determined to stand firm, and looking absolutely fucking beautiful. So incredibly beautiful, no matter how battered. And so lost. Shit!

"Get up, and show me what the big, bad FBI agent can do to a poor, helpless, little schmuck like me."

McClaren picked himself up but simply stood there, loose-limbed and easy. "You've never been a helpless little anything, Brian, and I'm not planning to stand here and play punching bag, so you can work out all your frustrations."

"Then fight back!" The voice was still hard, filled with ice.

"No."

Brian stepped closer, braced his hands against McClaren's chest, and shoved. "Fight back, Fucker!"

"No." The FBI agent managed to retain his footing, but only barely, and he was hard put to suppress the smile that acknowledged that Kinney was stronger and tougher than any of his friends or acquaintances might have guessed. He turned then and looked directly into those changeable eyes, and saw that they'd gone stormy gray in the gloom of the evening, flecked with ice crystals. He wondered then if he was the only person who had ever cared to look deep enough, to push hard enough to force his way through the camouflage and see what was really there beneath that steely surface; the colder the voice, the purer the rage . . . the greater the pain the man was trying to mask.

"Shit!"

McClaren knew it was a near thing. Brian wanted to hit him again - and again - and yet again; wanted to beat the shit out of somebody. Anybody. But couldn't quite bring himself to bludgeon a man who refused to fight back.
"Come on," said the FBI agent softly, extending his hands once more to grip shoulders that were, by this time, trembling under the combined chill of the ocean spray and the night air. "You're freezing out here, and . . ."

"I don't need a fucking nursemaid."

McClaren nodded, and lifted one hand to wipe away a trickle of blood that was dripping past the corner of his eye. "Good for you, Champ, but maybe I do."

"Shit! You're bleeding." The voice had grown small now, and the anger and bitterness in hazel eyes were obliterated beneath thick rising shadows of shame.

Another first, thought McClaren, who was pretty sure that Brian Kinney didn't ordinarily do shame, or - more accurately - would never show it even if he did feel it.

"I'll live."

"Unless I decide to kill you in your sleep."

McClaren went very still, feeling something unexpected stir in his chest, something he had not anticipated. It should not have mattered, he knew. It wasn't as if he hadn't known the truth all along. And yet . . . He sighed, and dismissed the faint ache rising in his chest, as he realized that he was not going to get a better opportunity than this one to speak his mind. "Somehow," he said quietly, "I was pretty sure that I wouldn't be around you any more. When I'm sleeping, I mean."

The shame was immediately obliterated by another spike of rage. "What? You got this all planned out? The romantic reunion between the stud and the twink? Rose petals on silk sheets and champagne in crystal snifters and long walks on the beach with Barry Manilow playing on the iPod?"

"Why not?" The FBI agent was very careful to allow no trace of a smile to touch his lips, no matter what he was feeling inside.

Brian allowed himself to be pulled out of the shallow water, and seated near the campfire which was, by now, burning merrily and sending showers of bright firefly sparks up into the darkness. "If you have to ask," he said finally, "then you're just proving my point. That . . . those fairy-tale/prince-charming gestures . . . they're bullshit. They're not me."

"But they could be," McClaren pointed out, as he retrieved Brian's shirt from the sand and dropped to his knees to drape it around acres of bare, golden skin. He elected to say nothing further as he quickly inspected the bloody spot on Brian's torso, and gave a little sigh of relief to note that it appeared to be nothing more than a random scratch.

When Brian didn't answer immediately, the agent assumed that he was just being Brian Kinney, ignoring a comment he considered too ridiculous to deserve a response. Thus, when he did speak, his words were something of a surprise - possibly to them both. "If I could have given him what he wanted - what he dreamed of - don't you think I would have done it a long time ago?"

McClaren leaned forward so he could look up into night-dark eyes. "A few rose petals. A couple of walks on the beach? What the fuck is the big deal?"

Brian shrugged, and his companion noticed the quick grimace of pain that touched that perfect face. Tomorrow would probably not be a good day, in more ways than one.

"It's not who I am," he said slowly. "In order to give him the life he wanted, I had to become someone I'm not." Then he smiled, and McClaren thought he had never seen anything quite so sad as that fleeting admission of hope lost. "I even tried it, for a while, but it didn't work. It was one of those 'damned if you do and damned if you don't' situations. We both tried to change and found that neither one of us liked what we were becoming. Besides, I know myself too well. No matter how much I might try to give him what he needs, in the end . . . I'd still be me. And that's not good enough." He looked up then, once more gazing out across the tumble of breakers rolling toward the shore. "Not for Justin."

"Shouldn't that be my choice to make?" It was softly spoken, barely audible above the roar of the surf, but very firm nonetheless. Very sure.

Brian didn't turn around to watch the young man walk into the circle of firelight. He simply continued to gaze out to sea, and spoke very evenly, almost without inflection. "It should, and it was, as I recall. Unless someone was holding a gun to your head to force you to go to New York, to 'find yourself'. That was you, right? Your decision."

"It was, but I didn't know . . ." Justin settled to his knees on the other side of the campfire and just stared at the man who had become his world, his life, his everything.

Brian sighed and clasped his arms tight against his chest as another tremor surged through his body, and McClaren, carefully avoiding looking at Taylor at all, moved up behind him, nudging him closer to the fire, "What didn't you know, Sunshine?" Brian sounded exhausted and didn't look up. He was determined not to notice how the reflection of the flames gilded perfect white skin and painted beautiful plays of light and shadow on that exquisite face. "That there's always a price to pay for having dreams come true? What did you really think was going to happen? That you were going to become the new Cezanne, and I was going to languish away in my lonely loft, pining for what could never be and wasting away like some faggot version of Camille? Is that really what you expected?"

"You said you loved me," retorted the blonde. "I expected you to show it."

The sad, twisted little smile put in another appearance, but only for a moment. "I thought I did."

"How? By turning your back? By walking away? How does that show anything, except that you're unwilling to give of yourself - to anybody?"

Brian was silent for a moment; then he managed to push away from McClaren and struggle to his feet. "You're right," he said firmly. "That's exactly what it shows." He turned away then and started walking back toward the house, one arm braced against his side in a manner that told McClaren that he was in a lot more pain than he was prepared to acknowledge.

Justin, however, had not been around this new, physically damaged version of Brian Kinney long enough to pick up on the clues.

"Why?" Justin shouted, leaping up and following. "Why does it always have to be your way, or no way at all? Why does Brian Kinney always have to call the shots? What about our . . ."

Brian stopped so abruptly that Justin only barely avoided crashing into his back. "I swear," he said coldly, "if you use the word 'commitment', I'm going to deck you."

Justin took a deep breath, and planted his feet. "Commitment," he said, almost shouting. "Commitment, commitment, commitment. What's so fucking awful about that one little word?"

Chris McClaren watched the play of emotions that flared in Brian's eyes and debated whether or not he should interfere. It would be very bad for an FBI agent to simply stand by and watch as one queer strangled another, but he conceded that this confrontation was long overdue, and that it was something that both men needed.

"It's a word that doesn't apply to me." Brian's response was very logical and very cold.

Justin's, on the other hand, was white-hot with rage. "Oh, that's right. The great and mighty Kinney doesn't do commitment. Or love or loyalty or romance. He's too fucking busy running away."

Brian simply turned around and looked into blue eyes ablaze with passion, and the contrast between the one face, filled with anger and need and desperation, and the other, almost completely empty of expression, was almost painful.

"That's what you do, you know. It's what you've always done. Your family treated you like a piece of shit, and you just took it. They used you, and they blamed you, and you never once stood up for yourself. And when your friends try to become a real part of your life, you pull back and you hide. You pull your strings and work your magic behind closed doors, so you never have to admit that you care about anything. When your own son needs his daddy, who does he look to? Not you, for sure. You've turned your back on him too. Big, bad, brave Brian Kinney doesn't exist. He's just . . . an ad campaign who spends his life promoting something he doesn't even believe in. You've never really been there, for anybody."

McClaren would have given the young man credit for flair and innovation, but he was too busy studying Brian's face, looking for some kind of emotional response. He was amazed when he didn't find it.

Brian just nodded. "Right, as usual."

Justin flushed. It was all bullshit, of course, and he knew it. But he needed something - anything - to pierce that protective armor that Brian was so determined to wear.

"Do you still love me?" he asked finally, allowing the first real glimmer of what he was feeling to flare in his eyes. "Or should I phrase it differently? Should I ask if you ever really did?"

Brian turned away, to gaze once more out into the ocean, which seemed to offer him some measure of comfort. "I . . . did."

"Then why didn't you fight for me, motherfucker?" Justin was not - quite - allowing himself to indulge in tears of rage, but it was close.

Brian hesitated for a split second, something very old and weary moving in his eyes, before he managed to dredge up a patent-worthy Kinney smirk, and Justin felt a cold stab of fear in his gut, as the specter of doubt stirred in his mind. "Why didn't you?"

Abruptly, without allowing himself time to consider the wisdom of his actions, Justin stepped forward and wrapped his arms around Brian's still shivering torso. "Do you know," he whispered, "what it did to me? To find out what they did to you? To understand that you could have died there in that hellhole, that I could have lost you forever?"

Brian stood up very straight, refusing to react to the touch of those arms around his body, those hands stroking his back as he tried to block out the ugly, dark images that flared in his memories. "As a matter of fact," he answered flatly, "I do."

The two remained unmoving for a moment, frozen in time.

Then Justin stepped back, and drew a deep breath, and Brian . . . Brian seemed to stand taller, to square himself for what would come next. Justin would pull out the big guns now; the twat would never give up without using all the weapons in his arsenal.

"Is that what you want . . . for me?"

"What I want for you has nothing to do with what you do with your life," Brian replied firmly. "It's your life. Your choice."

"Like it was yours?"

"Yes." No hesitation. No margin for doubt.

"Bullshit! You think I don't know what drives you? What's always driven you. You might have managed to hide it from everybody else, but you can't hide from me, Brian. I know you entirely too well."

"What?" Brian asked quickly, smirk firmly in place. "If you're going to channel Debbie, you need to get it right. The line is 'I've known you too long, and - regrettably - too well.' And it means as much from you as it meant from her. You two should get together, and discuss all your incredible insights into what makes Brian run."

Justin couldn't quite swallow the smile that trembled on his lips. "You know what? Debbie doesn't know shit. She only sees what you decided to let her see, and she spins it according to what she wants to believe. Because the truth would hurt too much. You really think she could deal with knowing how often she misjudged you, just because it was easier than facing the truth?"

"That's very profound, Professor." Smirk still there - deeper now. "You should get another degree, in psychology this time. Oh, but wait - you never got the first one, did you? Another example of giving up. Letting other people dictate your life. You're pathetic."

"And you're doing what you always do. Deflecting the question. Next thing you'll be quoting James Joyce - or Lewis Carroll."

The smirk twitched, and became a grin. "And cannot friends be firm and fast and yet bear parting?"

"Fuck you, Brian. I'm not your friend."

"At last. Something we can agree on."

Justin stepped in again, lifted up and claimed the mouth that dominated his dreams, waking and sleeping, and McClaren wondered if either of them knew what a perfect, erotic vision they created together. Then he smiled and came to his senses. Of course, they knew.

Then Justin stepped back. "That wasn't a kiss . . . between friends."

"Whatever. Just . . ."

Justin lifted one hand and laid his fingers across Brian's mouth. "You're not going to make it easy, are you?"

The only answer was lifted eyebrows and the sardonic gleam in dark eyes aswarm with shadows, as Justin settled to his knees in the sand and pulled Brian down beside him.

"It's always been about you. Everything - every fucking thing - has always been your burden to bear."
When you were a kid, your parents looked at you, and saw nothing but wasted chances, lost freedom. And parents aren't supposed to feel that way, are they? So - if they did feel that way - then there's only one logical conclusion." He paused and moved in closer, deliberately invading Brian's space. "There had to be something wrong with you. Right? Something deep inside you, since it was pretty obvious right from the start that what was on the surface was okay. Better than okay. You were bright and beautiful and talented, so if they couldn't find it in themselves to love you, it had to be because they saw something in you that wasn't worthy of their love. Right? So when your father beat the shit out of you and broke your bones and told the world what a useless shit you were, and when your mother spent all her days getting drunk off her ass so she wouldn't have to think about her miserable life and her miserable family and her hard, cold, heart, it was because you deserved it, right? And when your sweet little cunt-sister took advantage of every chance they gave her to blame you for everything wrong in her miserable life, and that was just the beginning, wasn't it? It was always your fault. Just like it was when Chris Hobbs went after me."

Brian had been as still as carved stone during Justin's recitation, which had grown in intensity even as it sank in volume, but he stirred now, twisting as if to move away but not quite violently enough to dislodge the hands that held him. "You've spent all these years believing that I was bashed because you had the audacity to show up at my prom, and dance with me and flaunt yourself in front of that bunch of bastards. Do you even remember how it really happened?"

Brian did flinch then, and the smile that touched his face was bittersweet at best. "Do you?"

Justin shrugged. "No. But I have Daphne's version to call on, to let me see it in my mind's eye, and I can assure you of this: I'd give anything to be able to remember it, because what came after is not the important part. Daphne said . . ." He faltered slightly then, and had to swallow around the lump in his throat in order to continue. "She said that it was the most beautiful thing she'd ever seen - that you looked at me that night as if I was the center of your world, the light of your life. And let's be honest here, Brian. That hasn't happened very often. So there was this magical, perfect moment in our lives, and then Hobbs stepped in, and took it away from us. From both of us. You think I don't know how much that affected you? You think I don't know that you spent weeks, months - years, maybe - wishing it had been you instead of me? You think I don't know why you came to that hospital every fucking night, to stand guard? To make sure to protect me when I couldn't protect myself? And then my mother had to stick her two cents in, compounding the guilt you were already feeling. Jesus, Brian!" Another pregnant pause, and his voice became a whisper. "It was killing you. It was like you were filled up with broken glass, and it was cutting you to pieces from the inside. And through it all, nobody even noticed what was happening to you. The same way nobody ever bothered to tell you the rest of it, did they? Neither my mom, nor Debbie, nor anybody else. About how I'd originally planned to skip prom, maybe spend the night at Babylon - with you - getting rightly and royally fucked - but they all kept insisting that it wouldn't be right for me to pass up that 'right of passage'. That I owed it to myself to go and take a stand for queers everywhere. They never bothered to share that little fact with you, did they?"

Brian simply blinked. "What difference would it have made?"

Justin nodded. "None at all, of course. Because it wouldn't have fit the pattern of your life, would it? Never mind what anybody else did or how anybody else might have contributed to what happened to me, because ultimately, it had to be your fault. Just like the bomb that brought Babylon down and killed all those people, and almost killed Michael. You think I don't know you well enough by now to put it all together. Okay, let's see - I'm thinking it goes something like this: Babylon was history - was gone - until Brian Kinney decided to stick his nose in where it had no business, to revive the heart of Gay Pittsburgh and reopen the club which would ultimately be the target for the kind of vicious hatred that kills and maims innocent people. So if Kinney had just minded his own business and let the fucking place shut down and die a natural death, then all those people would still be alive today."

He shifted closer and nuzzled for a moment against the soft skin under Brian's ear. "How'm I doing so far?"

"War and Peace was shorter," came the annoyed response, "and less complicated."

"Uh, huh. And now we come to the latest debacle - the attack on the Mighty Kinney himself, who must accept responsibility for his own bashing, because he doesn't have the common sense or the survival instincts or the simple discretion to keep his head down and avoid irritating those members of high society who have adopted the fundamentalist right-wing religious bullshit which decrees that queers need to be neither seen nor heard, but confine themselves to the dark at the back of the closet and allow 'decent, God-fearing Christians' to live their lives without ever being exposed to the depravity of same-sex relationships or - God help them - the 'Homosexual Agenda'."

Brian took a deep breath, his face curiously frozen. "Are you done?"

"Almost. As soon as I tell you that it's all bullshit. All this crap, this compulsion to 'protect' everybody, is just an act. Just an excuse, so that you can run away, and never face the real issues. So the perfect Brian Kinney can stay perfect, and nobody can ever see the failure inside you. You won't face your own weaknesses, but you'll let me face them for you. Or Michael, maybe, or Lindsey. Maybe Gus. Maybe he can manage to undo all the harm you've done, if he can just figure out that it's not really his fault that Daddy doesn't love him. Maybe he can find a way to do what his asshole father never could. Maybe he'll figure out how to believe in himself - in spite of you."

It was at that moment that everything around them and between them went completely silent. As if even the nightwind knew better than to intrude; even the surf seemed to recede into dark silence, and Brian, with surprisingly fluid grace, rose to his feet, hauled Justin up with him, and shoved the blonde so violently that he went sprawling backwards into the sand.

"Fuck . . . you!" It was more of a snarl than an epithet, and Brian was already moving away quickly, when Justin sprang up and lunged forward, putting all of his weight - such as it was - behind the punch that caught Brian under his chin and sent him crashing to his knees, at which point he fell slowly forward to bury his face against his arms and curl himself around his center, as he drew a deep, gasping breath.

"Shit!" McClaren knew immediately that he'd waited too long, but he'd deliberately avoided interfering in the exchange, once the two adversaries had managed to forget about his presence. He'd thought the confrontation would prove beneficial for them both, but he'd never dreamed it would come to this. "What the fuck do you think you're doing?" he shouted at Justin, as the younger man simply stood there, the anger that had blazed in his eyes immediately giving away before a flash of pure horror.

McClaren got to Brian first, and was appalled to find him curled around his own mid-section, shaking with emotion that he was obviously struggling to suppress.

"Brian?" The FBI agent wrapped his hands around trembling shoulders and tried to encourage Brian to shift onto his back, so that he could check face and body for damage. In truth, he doubted that Justin's blow had been powerful enough to inflict any real injury, under ordinary circumstances. But there was nothing ordinary about this moment, and he knew better than to assume anything. Still, he had expected Brian to simply yield and roll over under the pull of his hands, but it was not nearly as simple as he'd thought it would be, as Brian only curled tighter and shook harder and ignored his efforts.

"Jesus, Brian . . ." McClaren then slid his fingers through strands of damp hair that clung to the nape of Brian's neck, to insert his hand into the soft skin beneath the jaw-line, checking for damage or, perhaps, trying to offer some kind of comfort, and feeling something hot and wet and . . .

Oh, shit! Was he bleeding or . . . could it be that he was . . . No. That was just not possible. He wasn't crying . . . was he?

He couldn't be . . . Then Brian abruptly rolled over and stretched out on the sand, and McClaren had to squelch a sudden, almost irresistible urge to take a swing of his own, burying his fist into an unprotected abdomen, because the bastard wasn't crying. He was laughing - a bone-deep, from-the-gut, steadily growing roar of a laugh - and the only tears being shed were tears of laughter.

The two men who stood looking down at him were hopelessly confused, and turned to stare at each other, neither having a clue of what to do or what to say or . . .

In the end, they could only wait until Brian recovered from his bout of hysteria, and chose to explain himself. And the look in Justin's eyes said that the explanation better be world-class.

Brian lay there on the sand, gazing up into the star patterns overhead, and felt something ease inside him - something that had been hard and painful and infinitely, intimately a part of him since the first moment of the attack that had almost killed him. He had begun to believe it would never leave him; he had begun to accept it as the cost of not dying.

He laughed harder as he felt it simply . . . slip away. Then he fell silent, and spent yet another moment just breathing, just enjoying its absence.

"Do you have any idea," he said finally, "how long I've waited for that? For somebody to call me on the bullshit and treat me like a man again, instead of a fucking martyr or a helpless victim? Or some fragile little china doll."

Chris McClaren sank to the sand and spent a moment studying that no-longer-entirely-perfect face. "What?" he said finally. "I should have punched you out the first time you ever made me mad enough to spit?"

Brian shrugged. "It would have been a lot more honest - and convincing - than all that projected compassion and politically correct bullshit." Then he looked up at Justin, who was still standing motionless, his skin a whiter shade of pale than ever before. "Thanks for the brutal candor, Sunshine. You made my day. And now - now I'm all invigorated and motivated to get back on my feet, and show the fuckers that they can't keep a good faggot down." He did not even attempt to disguise the bitter sarcasm contained in those words. "So you can go toddling back to Fantasy Island or wherever the fuck you were, and . . ."

But Justin, despite being emotionally staggered without having been the target of a single direct blow, was not ready to concede defeat yet. He dropped to his knees, and opened himself up to the gaze that examined him. And Brian wanted to look away, wanted to refuse to see what he was being shown. Wanted . . . not to know.

"Good," said the blond. "I was beginning to wonder if I was ever going to be able to break through - to get your attention."
Brian laughed again, but this one was not quite natural. Not quite convincing. "Yeah, right. It was all just a big act, to get me to . . ."

"Do you want me to become the newer, hipper version . . . of you?" The tone was hard and demanding and very cold.

Justin simply ignored the non sequitur. "Brian, listen to me. Are you listening?"

An eye-roll and a nod was the only answer he was likely to get. "Okay, so I was baiting you. Trying to get a real response out of you, instead of the bullshit you've been spouting since the attack. But that doesn't mean that some of it - a lot of it - wasn't true. I know you, Brian. Like nobody else ever has, I think, because you've always managed to keep some distance between you and anyone else who might have tried to get inside the walls you build around you. I don't blame you for that. Shit, I love those fucking walls, because they're what let you become the person you are. The man I love."

He found himself fixated on the small scar at Brian's temple, which was fading now, but still noticeable, and he was reminded of something he'd once heard attributed to Elizabeth Taylor. When asked why she never had the mole on her face removed, she'd laughed and said that one tiny little flaw only served to emphasize the perfection of the rest of the face. OK, so that was probably more urban legend than truth. Nevertheless, he was pretty sure that this scar proved that observation to be completely valid. Thus, he liked the scar, but he was less fond of the skepticism and cynicism currently rising in those chameleon eyes. "I know you blame yourself, for every fucking bad thing that happens to anyone you love. To Michael, to Lindsey, to Gus. To me. Me, maybe most of all. But do you really want me to have to live with that kind of guilt and pain? Because I will, you know. If you insist on going on with this fucking act, with pushing me away because the great, all-powerful Brian Kinney knows what's best and has to sacrifice himself to protect Poor, Helpless, Little Justin . . . then I'm going to be the one who spends his life knowing that he destroyed the man he loves and the only home he ever knew, because that's what you are to me. And knowing that, no matter where I go or what kind of success I have in my life, it's never going to compare to what it should have been. Because I'm never going to have the only thing that matters - the only thing I want." He paused then, and reached out to thread his fingers through Brian's. "I don't care if you think I'm a complete pussy, or a wimp, or the wuss to end all wusses. I don't want to be the best homosexual I can be, if it means I can't have you." He leaned close then, and rested his forehead against Brian's shoulder. "I can't find myself without you. It's all just going through the motions. I don't feel things any more. That's my life without you, Brian - no matter how much money or success or stardom in the art world I manage to accumulate. Without you, nothing makes me laugh."

Memory stirred then in Brian's mind, a cascade of images of Justin laughing - dancing, fucking, joking, sniping at his baby sister, ridiculing Michael and his whining, or Ted and his ridiculous conservative values, stuffing his face with Deb's ziti or his mother's jambalaya, or making fun of the latest trick who thought he could capture the heart of Brian Kinney; Justin at his beautiful best. Brian deliberately looked away then, no longer able to endure the pain he easily discerned in the unshielded eyes that were devouring him. He pulled his lips into his mouth, desperately looking for something to say, something to cling to, as older, more vivid images - unfaded by time - flashed before his eyes. Justin, bloody and broken and silent . . . and dying in his arms. "Justin, I . . ."

"I'm dead inside . . . without you." It was just a whisper, as those perfect, irresistible lips nuzzled up beneath his jaw. "Is that what you really want for me?"

"You're stronger than that." It was firmly spoken, but clipped off quickly, to avoid a break in the voice that spoke it.
Blue eyes filled with shifting shadow. "If I'm strong, it's because you made me strong. If I lose you, I don't want to be strong. I don't want to paint or endure or cope or . . . live. I want to be half of Brian and Justin, or I don't want to be anything at all. Do you understand me?"

Brian was suddenly very still, hunched over and staring down into nothingness. "If I lost you . . ." he whispered, and it was obvious that he had not planned to speak at all.

"You can't lose something that's a part of you. And that's what I am, you know. You can deny it all you like, but it's true just the same. We're only complete, when we're together, and if you're really determined that I should always have a choice, then you have to allow me to choose. And I choose you."

"Justin . . ."

"Just stop, Brian. Stop hurting yourself. Stop hurting me. Stop trying to destroy us. Because there's either us - together - or there's nothing at all."

Brian pulled away then, and Justin almost gasped when he spotted the twinkle rising in eyes previously filled only with clouds of dread and doubt, and he was immediately glad that he was already on his knees as he was certain that his legs would not have supported him before the sheer power of the joy that tore through him. "You do realize that's the most ridiculously romantic thing that anybody has ever said," Brian observed with a patent-worthy Kinney smirk.

Justin smiled and collapsed into arms that were suddenly there to catch him. That would, he hoped, always be there to catch him.

And Chris McClaren stood for a moment, transfixed by the beauty of the tableau before him, and stricken with something he had never expected to feel. For the space of a heartbeat, he found that he hated Justin Taylor, that he wanted nothing more than to obliterate the young blond and assume his place, secure within the arms of Brian Kinney.

Then he noticed that Brian was looking at him, and he was pretty sure that his moment of bitter jealousy and hatred had been noted and understood. So he smiled, took another moment to memorize the quick tenderness he read in those dark eyes, and turned around to walk away, knowing that some things should remain forever private. That some things were now and always would be beyond his reach.

The beach seemed suddenly very empty.

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"I don't believe it." It was more gasped than spoken, and the voice was filled with despair.

"Yes, you do, Baby." Drew Boyd found that he was barely able to speak at all, and he wished, for the thousandth time, that someone else could have handled this task. Only, if someone else had, it would have been even harder on Emmett. So he drew a deep breath, swallowed his own regrets, and clasped his arms more tightly around the young man who had - against all rhyme or reason - become the center of his world. "And you have to know that I would have spared you this, if I could."

"But you have the right to know." That was Cynthia, speaking up for the first time, and trying, without a great deal of success, to spare Boyd any further discomfort. "Because you have a responsibility to Brian. And most of all, because you've already guessed some of it." Her smile was gentle as she leaned forward into the cone of light falling from the lamp on the desk that was now Emmett's, pending the return of Brian Kinney, of course.
Beyond the soundproof walls of the office, the thumpa-thumpa proceeded unabated. Although there were some who claimed that it was not quite as enthusiastic or as energetic as it would have been in the presence of the man who was, somehow, its driving force.

"No, I didn't know . . ." Emmett's protest was quick, but died on his lips as second thoughts surged into his mind.

"Not the specifics, maybe," said Lance Mathis, "but you picked up plenty of clues that didn't quite fit into your preconceived notions of how things should go among members of the Kinney Fan Club. And now . . . now you're going to have to look at all the facts and decide where your loyalties lie. I'm sorry, Emmett. I really am. If we could have, we'd have left you out of this entirely. But you're in a position to be targeted, to be used in an attempt to get to Brian, and that's a risk we can't afford to take. It's already been done, using others, so . . ."

But Emmett was still shaking his head. "But you're talking about Teddie. Teddie, who has every motive in the world to be grateful to Brian for everything good in his life. It was Brian who rescued him, who dragged him out of the gutter and back into respectability, who gave him a whole new life . . ."

"All true," admitted Mathis. "But it was also Brian who failed to take Ted's ultra-fragile ego into account when he made arrangements for handling his affairs during his absence. In the end, it all came down . . ."

"To jealousy." Emmett provided the answer himself, knowing that he was right - hating that he was right.

Cynthia confirmed with a nod. "And we have the FBI . . ." She spared a wink for Kinnetik's security chief," and Brian's instincts for hiring the right man at exactly the right time to thank for the fact that protective measures were already in place before major, irreparable damage could be done."

Emmett clasped his hands in front of him so tightly that his knuckles were white and bloodless and closed his eyes for a moment as he felt strong, firm, massive hands close on his shoulders and try to knead away the tension there. "What - exactly - did he do?"

"Putting the best possible spin on it," answered Mathis, "he tried to make Brian a very rich man."

"Brian's already a rich man, by almost anybody's standards."

Cynthia nodded. "True, but not by the standards of the people that Ted has spent his whole life looking up to."

Emmett's smile was lopsided. "And by 'looking up to', I assume you mean envying. Being jealous of. And being snubbed by."

Mathis nodded, very careful to avoid studying Emmett's face, knowing how hard this was for the man who had once played the role of Theodore Schmidt's one and only love. "You do know him well," he observed.

Emmett sighed. "Sometimes I wish I didn't. I still remember - in vivid detail - that whole debacle with Garth Racine and how fascinated Teddie was with his lifestyle and his friends and his money, and how outraged he was when Brian wasn't the least bit impressed with his Garth-connection. And how devastated he was when the man showed his true colors. But I thought - I hoped he'd finally managed to put all that behind him."

Cynthia leaned back in her chair and drew a deep breath. "Maybe he had. Maybe this is all because I
... I should have just stepped aside and let him micro-manage everything. I never dreamed he would resent my efforts, or interpret the whole situation as an insult to him. Especially since I'm not really qualified to oversee the financial aspects of Brian's business. Brian needed Ted - still needs Ted - to safeguard everything he's worked for, so why would he jeopardize everything? I just don't get it."

Emmett rose then and walked to the elaborate bar in the corner of the room where he poured out generous portions of Johnnie Walker Red for them all. "Why don't you tell me exactly what he's done," he said as he served the drinks. "And maybe we can figure out the why of it together. Although I am absolutely certain about one thing." He paused to meet Cynthia's gaze as he handed over her glass, and recalled the look on Ted's face as he'd delivered his little speech to the extended family members gathered around the Novotny family table. "You," he said softly, with deliberate emphasis, "have nothing to apologize for."

And he was gratified to notice that Lance Mathis leaned forward to lay his hand on Cynthia's shoulder, offering tacit agreement of his own.

Or, perhaps, not so tacit, as it was Mathis who proceeded to offer up a thorough, perfectly organized listing of the evidence documenting Ted's actions and shortcomings since the uproar necessitating the transfer of power in the Kinney empire. OK - so it wasn't technically an empire; not yet. It was still in its infancy, in empirical terms. But from the unique perspectives of the individuals who were the satellites circling the prime gravitational power that was Brian Kinney, it was the dawning of a new era and a major force in their lives. Embryonic maybe, or primal. But real enough, and beginning to grow and multiply, and poised now at a critical stage when making the right decision about which way to step next was crucial.

And Brian had chosen to entrust it all to Cynthia, while Ted had been relegated to the status of a Big Q register clerk. Or so he had chosen to interpret his employer's decision.

Emmett had listened carefully to every fact that Mathis had presented to him. He had examined the documents that Cynthia presented to support the security chief's claims - had flinched away from the columns of numbers and the records of financial transfers, had sighed over the disclosure of privileged information and the nasty comments overheard by unbiased observant interested parties.

"How much damage has he done?" he asked finally.

Cynthia heaved a deep sigh. "Not as much as he might have. Preventive measures, by law enforcement and by our own security people, averted the worst of it. But there's no way of knowing how far these monsters are prepared to go to destroy Brian, or, at the least, to silence him. And Ted - Ted is still a weak link for us. And, possibly, for you."

"What do you mean?"

"Meaning that there are still threats to Brian and to his company. We have reason to believe that certain interested parties are still targeting Kinnetik, and that they're trying to use Ted to accomplish their goals. There have been indications that he's been approached to handle campaigns for some new clients. Clients who have never shown any interest in associating with Kinnetik before, but for whom Ted would have a special affinity."

"Such as?"

"The Schickel Foundation." It was Drew Boyd who answered, speaking very gently, as if he knew that the words would be painful for Emmett.

"Schickel?" Emmett repeated, very slowly. "As in George Schickel. As in the Schickel Foundation currently controlled by Virginia Hammond-Schickel, her bitch-daughter, Frankie, and her sycophantic board of directors?"

"One and the same," said Lance Mathis.

Emmett sighed, and closed his eyes for a moment, to gather his thoughts. When he opened them again and started to speak, Drew Boyd almost recoiled, knowing with absolute certainty that the love of his life had never before spoken so coldly. "I can't claim to know many things in life, but I do know this much: Virginia Hammond-Schickel, who only lowered herself to take on the surname of her late, faggot husband once he was too dead to embarrass her with his homosexual depravity, would cut off her tits and douche with sulfuric acid before she would associate herself - or her precious foundation - with anything remotely connected to Brian Kinney or his kind."

"That's pretty much my take on it too," replied the security chief. "Ms. Hammond was a major supporter of Prop 14."

"Mind if I ask how you figured all this out?"

Mathis and Cynthia exchanged quick glances. "No big secret, Em," answered the acting CEO of Pittsburgh's most successful ad agency. "No warrants necessary for a wire tap when the company's owner gives his consent."

"So you're monitoring his calls?"

Mathis nodded. "Only on his office lines. Brian wasn't comfortable with anything beyond that, although I can't really speak for the FBI. Who knows what they're listening to or looking for?"

"And you guys don't talk to each other?"

Mathis grinned. "They only share what they feel like sharing."

Emmett nodded. "So what makes you think I need to be aware of what's going on?"

Mathis took another sip from his bourbon. "Originally, Ted had one of the new interns prepare a series of promotional posters for some kind of theatrical campaign. All on the QT. But the intern talked a little more than he should have, so we figured that something was going on, but no one had any idea what he was really up to, until we intercepted a call from one of the Shickel Foundation board members, informing him that, to their great embarrassment, a preliminary contract had already been proposed by the Vanguard agency for the fall/winter opera series. Bottom line was that Mr. . . . Wylie - wasn't it, Cyn?"

The blonde nodded, and Mathis continued. "Mr. Wylie told Ted that several of the foundation members had been impressed with the artwork he'd submitted, but that their previous working relationship with Vanguard made it difficult to make a switch. Unless, of course, he could provide some additional incentive."

"Such as?"

"We aren't sure yet. There was some talk about a face-to-face meeting to discuss possibilities, but nothing specific was said, except a quick reference to some kind of charity drive - a pet project of one of Wylie's associates that involved some kind of relief program in third world countries. That's all we know so far, but it seems likely that he might try to get friends and acquaintances involved. It might, of course, be entirely legitimate, but it might not."

Emmett sighed. "So what would you like me to do?"
"Mostly, just keep your eyes open, and be cautious. Since you're overseeing Babylon in Brian's absence, it's possible you might be approached about some kind of benefit, and that could be very problematic"

But Emmett was shaking his head. "I don't see how. What harm would it do for Babylon - and Brian, by extension - to be associated with a charitable cause?"

"None," said Cynthia, who had been unusually silent during their discussion, "if it's legitimate. But what if it's not? Do you remember how close Vanguard came to being wiped out because of its association with the Stockwell campaign when the public discovered the truth about his complicity in the murder of Jason Kemp? Then just imagine if an advertising firm was found to be guilty of bilking the public out of money for a major charitable scam. That's a chance that we absolutely cannot take."

"But Teddie wouldn't be a part of something like that. He just wouldn't."

"Not knowingly," agreed Cynthia. "But Emmett, you know Teddie. Better than almost anyone. What does your gut tell you about all this? What do you believe?"

Emmett was quiet for several minutes, spinning in his chair to examine the images on his security monitors, even allowing himself a span of seconds to enjoy the performance of a couple of go-go boys in the cage above the main bar, engaged in a very seductive, very convincing simulation of a sexual encounter. Then he took a deep breath. "I believe that he's spent his entire life trying to reconcile who he really is with who he wants to be. He tries to present himself as being above the promiscuity and materialism of people like Brian Kinney, and wraps himself in conservative values, like wearing an Armani suit, but, in his heart, he wants to be the people that he pretends to hold in contempt. He wants people like Brian, like Garth Racine, like the financial movers and shakers that he admires so much, to envy him, to want him, to want to be him, but he knows that's never going to happen. So he pretends that he doesn't care, that it doesn't matter. But, in the end, if he thought he'd found some way to make it happen, to force those same people to see him as he wants to be seen . . . I don't think there's much that he wouldn't do. Except deliberately betray the people who trust him. I could never believe that he'd do that, but he'd be a pretty easy mark for anybody eager to exploit his weakness."

Then he turned to stare directly at Cynthia. "And I think he's always found it easier to blame other people for his trouble than to look within himself. He resents you, Cyn, and I'm pretty sure he plans to confront you about it sometime soon. And he won't be alone when he does."

But Cynthia was neither surprised nor particularly disconcerted. "If you're thinking I'm going to be shocked - or panicked - think again. I can handle Ted and company. Although . . ." She went silent for a moment, eyes bright with speculation, "maybe I should return to the office for a little while tonight, considering that I have this impromptu meeting scheduled tomorrow afternoon, with Ted and . . . others he chose not to identify. Maybe I need to spend a little time preparing for whatever might come up." She had not quite said "battle", but everyone in the room had heard it anyway.

Mathis leaned toward her with a smile. "I'll go with you."

And Emmett turned quickly to look up into the face of his lover, wondering if he was imagining things, or if he'd actually heard something interesting beneath the surface of that innocuous exchange. Boyd's smile seemed to underscore his suspicions, and Emmett felt a tiny stir of warmth touch his heart. Maybe this wouldn't turn out to be such a monstrously bad day after all.

He then turned then to study Lance Mathis' face. "I don't get it. If you think he's betrayed Brian, or you're worried that he will, why don't you just get rid of him?" And never mind that he could hardly bear to think of such a horrible end to Ted's relationship with the man who had almost single-handedly hauled him out of the gutter into which he'd almost disappeared.

Mathis offered up a lopsided smile. "Two reasons. First, we don't want to tip our hand while the investigation is ongoing. There's still plenty of undercover work in progress, so it's probably better to just preserve the status quo. And second . . . Brian Kinney. He's still my boss - and Cynthia's - and when he says, 'No', we have to listen. And right now, he's still saying, 'No'."

Emmett grinned. "Still a stubborn little shit, isn't he?"

Cynthia actually laughed. "You have no idea."

Emmett sat quietly for a while, eyes gone soft with a series of memories, before he turned to look up into Drew's face. "Yes," he whispered gently, "I do."

~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~~

"You fucked him."

It was not a question, nor even an accusation. It was just a fact.

"Your point?" Brian settled against the sculpture of the soft dune at his back and enjoyed the view. There were, after all, few things in life more beautiful that the pale, alabaster skin of Justin Taylor as gilded by the flicker of firelight.

"Was he as good as he looks?"

"Better."

Justin shifted closer so he could study the look in dark eyes rendered opaque by the reflection of flames. "What did he mean to you?"

And there it was - the tell-tale flicker that revealed that Chris McClaren was not the casual fuck/faceless trick he might have seemed.

"What difference does it make?"

"It matters."

"Why?"

Justin took a deep breath. "Because I couldn't be here, and it doesn't matter that the reason was that you wouldn't allow it. The only thing that matters is that you needed someone you could trust, and I want to know if he gave you what you needed."

"No more games, Justin." Even to himself, Brian sounded unutterably weary, like a man no longer willing to . . . He couldn't quite bring himself to think it, but it was there in his eyes for anyone who might bother to look for it. "I'm tired of games."

"No games. I swear it."

Brian leaned up to stare into the eyes that were focused on him so intently. "Then why did you come back, Sunshine? To lock the doors you left open?"

"No, I . . ."
"Because if that's why you're here, you better leave now. I don't . . ."

"Believe in locking doors. You think I haven't figured that out by now?"

"How the fuck am I supposed to know what you've fig . . ."

"As usual," said Justin quickly, a smirk curling his lips, "you weren't listening. So I want you to listen now. Carefully, because this is all that matters. I think it's all that ever did, but you have to be willing to hear it, just like I have to be willing to say it."

Brian did not - quite - resort to his customary eye-roll.

"Are you listening?"

"Raptly. Intensely. Breathlessly." There was no way to ignore the sarcasm spilling over from those words, but beneath the irony, something else was lurking. Something silent - suspended - waiting.

"Fucker!"

This time, the eye-roll was unavoidable, as was the exaggerated sigh. "Okay. Yes, I'm listening."

"I choose you."

"What the . . ."

"Don't even pretend that you don't understand me. You know what I mean: open door, locked door. Monogamy, commitment, happily ever after . . . I don't have a clue. And it doesn't matter anyway. Because that's what you always tried to make me see, and what I was always too obtuse to realize. All I ever had to do was choose, from the heart."

Brian blinked, and Justin giggled. Brian blinked again; the little shit actually giggled.

"That's all you ever asked me to do, isn't it?"

Brian was very still, his eyes gone even darker as he contemplated the slender figure before him, as Justin crept closer, settling finally across his former lover's lap. Could it be, wondered the brunette, that the twink had really, finally, seen the light - understood the fundamental truth? Could it be? He was prepared to contemplate the possibility, but not to believe. Not yet.

"Isn't it?"

"The choice was always yours to make."

Justin nodded. "But it had to be about what I wanted, what would make me happy. Not about duty, or about debts owed, or about obligations for the things you did for me. It always had to be because it was the only thing that would make my life complete."

"And?"

"Not because I believed that you couldn't live without me, but because I knew that I couldn't live without you."

"And if you change your mind tomorrow?"

Blue eyes were suddenly alight with hope. "Then I unchoose."
Brian folded his lips into his mouth, a sure sign that he was swallowing a smile. "And you think I'm going to be OK with that?"

Justin moved closer, deliberately swinging his leg over so that he was straddling Brian's hips, and that they were positioned crotch to crotch - almost. "Did he fuck you?"

Brian shifted then, pushing up slightly, to allow the hardness at his groin to rub against the answering hardness that strained against Justin's jeans. "No."

"Good."

"Why?"

Lips drew closer, sharing breath. "Because that is what you choose. Yes?"

Breath caught and held, and then . . . "Yes."

Neither was ever sure which of them actually moved so that lips met and clung and then melded together as time stretched and folded in upon itself before finally just standing still.

Justin pulled back slightly, just enough to speak. "Mine," he breathed, with absolute certainty. "Yes?"

The smile was breathtaking. "Yes."

And Justin felt the truth of it. It was not now and never would be about possession or endless fidelity or monogamy. It had always been about two hearts that could reach out and touch each other, against all odds. Not because of promises or pledges or commitments or intentions, but because of the purest, most elemental, most fundamental of reasons. Because of love without limits, without reservations, without boundaries. Without locks.

"You love me," whispered Justin.

"Yes."

"Enough to let me go."

"Yes."

"And enough to keep me close, if that's what it takes to make me happy."

"Yes."

"Brian?"

"Yes?"

"I want you inside me. I want to spend the rest of my life feeling you inside me, even when I'm not with you. I always want to feel you inside me. Yes?"

Justin looked up then, directly into night-dark eyes and saw the flare of something bright and warm and brilliant, as that beautiful mouth curled into a genuine smile. Not a smirk; not a snicker. A real smile. "Yes."

Brian lifted his hands and spread his fingers to push them through the silken blonde strands of Justin's hair, but then he laced them together to brace Justin's neck and leaned back to stare into eyes gone wide and vulnerable. "You have to promise me," he said sternly, without a trace of desire or lust or anything but bald, unavoidable honesty. "You have to do whatever it takes to keep you safe, because I couldn't live with myself if something happened to you. You have to give me your word."

They both understood, on a primitive, no-bullshit level, that there was only room for absolute truth here. No covering up, no pretensions, no defensive walls.

Justin closed his eyes briefly, but not quickly enough to prevent Brian from recognizing the pain and the tenderness flooding through them. "I promise, but you have to do the same. Promise me . . . you won't leave me again."

Brian waited until those blue eyes lifted to meet his gaze, until there was understanding and comprehension there. "I promise not to leave you, for as long as you want me."

Justin smiled, understanding exactly what was being pledged. "Or as long as you want me," he repeated.

It had taken him too many years - too many wasted years - to realize that this was all he'd ever wanted, all he would ever need, and all that anyone could honestly promise him.

Moving slowly, deliberately, Justin pushed aside the shirt that McClaren had draped over Brian's shoulders and began to work his way down that sculpted torso. "I want to see you," he whispered. "I want to see all of you."

"Justin," Brian replied, with a strange note of uncertainty threaded through his voice - a note so uncharacteristic that Justin paused to look up and try to discern what was written in the shadows of those incredibly beautiful eyes, "I'm not the same man I was before."

Justin's smile was brilliant. "Yes," he answered without a trace of doubt, "you are."

"No, I . . ."

"You don't really think that I give a royal fuck if they left marks on your skin, do you? They couldn't touch what's inside. Nobody gets to touch that but me."

The lips were pulled once more into the mouth, a dead give-away that what he was about to say would not be easy to hear. "I just don't want you to be disappointed in what you find."

The smile was gentler this time and truer. "You could never disappoint me."

The fleeting shift of shadows in hazel eyes indicated that Brian thought otherwise. "You should know me better than that." Tongue once more firmly in cheek.

"I do." The twink was not buying it, not for a millisecond.

Nevertheless, he pushed back slightly, to allow his eyes to drift up and then back down the body laid out beneath him, before he shifted upwards to start at the top, to bury his nose first in drifts of dark hair, still uneven from having to be cut away from the site of inflicted wounds. So he kissed the stubbly area first, careful to avoid putting pressure on the skin beneath the spiky hair, which was still mottled and discolored. "Your haircut's sexy," he breathed, carefully duplicating the tone and inflection of the same remark once offered to him under completely different circumstances, before nuzzling into the longer locks surrounding the short patch.

Then he moved down to the tiny scar he'd noticed earlier. "I'm going to make a point of remembering this one. I'm even going to name it. This is Liz - the flaw that proves the perfection of Brian drew back just enough to allow Justin to read the look in his eyes - the one that questioned the younger man's sanity, but it was accompanied by a tiny, irrepressible smile that said so much more.

But Justin was busy continuing his exploration, examining the small discoloration at the corner of the eye which would be gone in a few days, but was still worthy of a tender kiss and the caress of gentle fingers.

Next came the still swollen, still healing area over and just beneath the jaw-line - the mark of a major injury where Rick Turnage had done masterful work to restore the bone structure and graft new skin to replace what could not be repaired. Justin lingered there for a while, carefully using his tongue and his lips to trace the joining of throat and jaw, and inhaling deeply to fill his lungs with the scent that was indelibly Brian. "For the rest of my life," he murmured, "this spot, right here, is going to be the place where I come to remember how I almost lost you, what those bastards almost took from me, and how much I have to be grateful for. You are so beautiful; you will always be so beautiful."

"Justin, don't . . ."

Blue eyes sparked then, and glistened with love and laughter - and lust. "Shut - the - fuck - up. This is my journey of exploration."

"Awww, my very own little Marco Polo," Brian drawled.

Justin lifted up suddenly, just enough to be able to shuck out of his shirt and jeans, but taking time to retrieve lube and condoms from his pocket, with a wink that generated a quick chuckle from his companion. "Not so little," he smirked, taking a moment to adjust his cock - glistening hard and already leaking - so that it rested firmly against Brian's crotch. "And you're overdressed." He proceeded, with infinite gentleness, to unzip and remove the cut-off jeans that were keeping him from the most intimate object of his exploration.

Then he simply sat back and stared, allowing his eyes to take in everything that had been hidden from him until now, and Brian couldn't quite suppress a tiny, smug smile as he noticed that the blonde's nipples were already hard and budding, as his breathing grew hoarse and erratic and his dick twitched and seemed to grow even harder. But the smile was short-lived. The fact that Justin was easily aroused was not news; the kid had always been eager for the touch of Brian's hands and body; this might be nothing more than reflex - a conditioned response, since he had not yet had time to come to terms with the scope of the damage. Brian went very still, trying to brace himself for whatever might come next, and was dismayed to find it hard to draw a deep breath. It shouldn't matter so much - but it did.

"Oh, Brian," Justin sighed finally, and there was no way to conceal the tremor in his voice as he took in the full extent of the damage, the physical proof of the intensity of a malice so obscene, so bitter, that it could inflict such harm on a fellow human being, any human being. The only thing he was sure of at that instant was that those who could do such a thing should have no claim to humanity themselves.

