Song Remains the Same

by River_Winters

Summary

For Alex Winchester, normal has never been in the equation. Mute since the nursery fire, she grew up on the road chasing ghosts with her brothers and father. When her voice is inexplicably restored and the angel Castiel appears claiming to be her guardian, both of their lives change forever in ways that Heaven and Earth never expected. Castiel/OFC - sisfic - S4-9.

Notes

Welcome and thanks for stopping by! My name is River. If you're like me you like to know what you're getting into (committing to, even) at the beginning of a fanfic (especially one that is two million words plus), so here we go with some info: Song Remains the Same begins right at the end of season three and stays fairly close to canon (at first) while including my AU addition of Alex Winchester—Dean and Sam's younger sister (Sam's twin) who has recently and inexplicably been cured from her lifelong condition of mutism.

Even though the story focuses on Alex as the protagonist and Castiel as the secondary protagonist, there is plenty of Sam/Dean/John stuff as well (in further chapters especially)
—I love Supernatural and all the characters and as such, this story is not 'just' a romance (but trust me, there's plenty of romance ahead!). I really enjoy the family drama/arc as well. The relationship between Cas and Alex is everything from painful to fluffy/sappy to angst-ridden to very dark at certain points of the story, and the Alex/brothers relationships are thoroughly explored as well. I don't like to skimp over important emotional content and I really like to explore the way emotions work in all kinds of relationships. The length of this story is definitely evidence of that. Speaking of which: this story may or may not have lethal amounts of feels (okay fine, it does have lethal amounts of feels). So strap in if you love angst and pain because it's about to get intense up in here. As this is an approximately 5,000 page, series-length fanfiction that spans a very long television show, you can expect many ups and downs for Calex and constant growth/development as they progress. You can also expect more and more AU storylines and material as the story gets to Season 7+. The ending is completely AU from the show.

If you dislike Mary Sues, you're in good company and won't find one here (though at first you may wonder, because there are a lot of unanswered questions about Alex but please rest assured... I reveal the answers gradually as I build the story and as more is explained about Alex's character, background, etc). She's what you'd expect out of a Winchester: tough as nails and a real fighter but with a million emotional issues under the surface and very real vulnerability hiding behind her jaded exterior.

I would say the story really gets off the ground and running around chapter four, takes off in ten, and gets insane around chapter twenty. A lot of new readers ask me when the romance begins. The slow build starts as soon as Cas and Alex meet a few chapters in. They're drawn together whether they like it or not. I do however take the time to build realistic emotional connection between them because I typically dislike when characters fall completely in love right off the bat (especially characters like Castiel, who is learning emotions and characters like Alex, who doesn't trust easily and has limited skills with interpersonal relationships).

Readers, I hope you enjoy the story that follows. Please read and feel free to review/PM/email me; I love hearing from you :-) This story has been an absolute labor of love to write and I've put my heart and soul into it. My thanks to the folks behind Supernatural for creating and producing such an amazing universe and story that has captured me so completely. SRS will always be a huge part of my life and so will SPN.

Now, go check out winchesteralex dot tumblr dot com and you can see pictures of Alex as I envision her (as played by actress Astrid Berges-Frisbey), manips, videos, questions & answers, Calex shipping mania, as well as other stuff from the fic. The tumblr blog does contain major spoilers for the story and the show though, so please be forewarned. Cheers & happy reading! #SPNSRS

A STATEMENT ABOUT TRIGGERS: This story is not lightweight. Read at your own risk. As a reminder, I do include trigger-warnings on a few chapters with especially sensitive content matter, but please know that this story is intended for adults and if you're sensitive about any of the above tags, please be careful!
Every story has a marked beginning. Mine begins thousands of years ago at the dawn of time itself. I was created, not born; put here to be a warrior and messenger of God. My task was to watch over God's children, to carry out the purposes of my father—a father I never knew but always believed in. I was obedient, I was faithful, I never questioned my role or my father. Not until them. A little broken family of three seemingly small and insignificant human beings: two brothers and their sister. This is where my story changes. For the better or worse, I'm not entirely sure. However, I suspect it's for the worse.

The Winchesters taught me about free will and choice, two things that were once foreign concepts to a being like me, an angel of the Lord. I was drawn to this idea of being free to make my own choices, of choosing my own fate—but now I realize freedom is a great and terrible burden. If I knew then what I know now, perhaps I would choose a different path. Perhaps I would take it all back. I don't know.

If you told me a few years ago that I would be in the dilemma I am in now, I doubt I would have believed you. At that time, I couldn't have fathomed that I would be capable of the things I so clearly feel today: remorse, agony, confusion, pain... love. It's difficult to reconcile who I was with who I've become. I'm not sure that I like who I am, honestly.

The centuries I lived through, the wars I saw waged, the rise and fall of kingdoms I've observed... none of it prepared me for being put into the body of a human man, for being thrust into the midst of emotions and feelings and the responsibility of being completely in charge of my own actions. Even after watching humans century after century, I had no idea how to be anything like one. Not at first.

I've tried to make the right choices. I've tried to protect these fleeting and fragile human beings who have become so important to me—especially her, always her—but perhaps I've failed. I think I have.

And of all the people I've failed... I've failed her the most.

- Four Years Ago -
Late April 2008
Just Outside of Erie, Pennsylvania

Alex slowly woke from another snatched few hours of sleep to the familiar growl of the Impala's engine. Van Halen was crackling on the radio. Groggily, not sure what time is was, she wondered why she'd let herself go to sleep at all—as usual, there had been the normal assortment of nightmares. Nothing about the sleep had been restful. She almost felt more tired now than she had before. Awkwardly crammed into the back seat with only her arm as a pillow, Alex stiffly sat up and grimaced as she tried to knead some soreness out of her stiff shoulder muscle. Ouch. Damnit. Between kicking ass, getting her ass kicked, sleeping on crappy motel mattresses or in the car, she couldn't remember ever not feeling sore. She gave up on the shoulder and instead squinted into the bright light streaming in through the car's windshield. The sun was low in the sky—sunrise?—and it shone directly into her heavy-lidded eyes. In the front seat with one hand on the wheel and dark shades on, her oldest brother Dean acknowledged her with a slight turn of the head.

"Mornin', sunshine." His familiar gravelly voice bordered on either sarcastic or good humored... Alex couldn't tell. Plus she was too tired to give much a fuck, using her focus instead to try and force herself into consciousness—it wasn't easy, as her body and mind were both desperate for more rest.

Being exhausted all the time kind of came with the job title of hunter and she knew that... but she didn't have to like it, did she? Maybe someday she would sleep more than three or four hours at a time, but right now was clearly not that time. Alex glanced over at her just-slightly-older twin brother Sam, who was at the moment snoring softly, his giant head lolling onto his shoulder in the front seat—the dude could sleep through a hurricane. Lucky.

The car slowed and pulled over, rolling to a stop at a dingy gas station. Dean punched his sleeping brother in the shoulder, who was startled from his sleep and said something like "huh, wha!?" to Dean's clear amusement.

"Enough with the shut eye, Sammy. Rise and shine!" Dean got out of the car and began fueling it up, leaving his two sleepy siblings to themselves.

Sam turned around, his slightly confused I-just-woke-up expression mirroring how Alex was feeling at the moment. "Hey," he mumbled, and looked at her for only two more seconds before asking, "nightmares again?" Her eyes flicked up to him. He saw through her like that sometimes—maybe it was part of being twins. Maybe it was because he had nightmares, too.

She almost forgot to reply, because being able to speak was still relatively new. And then she realized she was expected to, and went with a very eloquent, "nah." Her voice sounded weird, and she cleared her throat loudly, coughing a little and feeling self conscious. Sam looked like he didn't believe her. And he was right. It was a lie. Nightmares were pretty normal for her. Alex again tried to bring her focus to the present moment, and away from the dreams of yellow eyes, crunching bones, a dark world where she was stuck in chains as horrible clawed hands dragged Dean away to his death... she shivered a little, suddenly wide awake and somber, once again remembering the reality they'd been running from for the past eleven months. The reality of Dean's quickly closing in death.

Sam was watching her still. "You okay?" He asked, his eyes that filled with studious concern. Obviously, her face was giving her away, and she was too tired to do much else except shrug and manage a soft, "no." She gritted her teeth, looked down, trying not to sound as freaked out as she was. "It's... Dean's time is almost up, Sam," she said, barely above a whisper. Alex looked at her older brother, desperate for an answer to the question that harrowed her night and day. Desperate for someone, anyone, to give her reassurance. "What are we gonna do?"

Sam went blank at her words, then his jaw tensed and he was quiet for a couple heavy beats. "We... we still have some time," he muttered, distracted and upset. He turned away. "I, uh, I need some coffee." And just like that, he exited the car, heading in his trademark long stride toward the convenience store. Alex stared after him silently, not sure if she should be pissed or sad or what. After all, what could Sam have said to make it better? No words could change what was coming. Maybe he was just as scared about losing their big brother as she was.

Ever since Dean had made the crossroads deal to bring Sam back from the dead, they had lived it up wild and free, Dean-style—basically doing whatever the hell Dean wanted in between jobs. There had been a lot of booze, women, and bad burger joints in between the hunts they found. But the Winchesters had never really talked about the approaching day that they all knew was coming:
the day Dean would have to make good on his soul deal. Dean refused to talk about finding a way out of it, said that if he so much as tried to get out of the deal, Sam would die again. However, Sam and Alex? They'd been trying to figure out a way. However all of their research and inquiries had come up luckless. Sam was beginning to avoid the subject matter completely when Alex brought it up... like he had given up or something; like he couldn't face the subject at all, needed to ignore it.

Dean had avoiding reality down to a science by now... he'd always been like that though. He'd never been able to tolerate sitting around, instead he preferred to always be moving forward. Moving and doing gave him something to focus on besides the crazy crap the three of them lived through and called their life. Right now was actually a good example of Dean's penchant for not wanting to give a single thought to his future—they were on the way to investigate a possible zombie outbreak. And Dean was literally days away from being brutally murdered by Hellhounds. To Alex, it was really beginning to feel too late, and whenever she actually thought about it, she was overwhelmed with the worst fear and panic she'd ever known. So she tried not to think about it. They always found a way out, right? So maybe this time would be the same. Maybe something would come to them in the eleventh hour.

She glanced out at Dean who was bobbing his head along to the music playing in the car as he gassed up the Impala. He was off in his own little world, and she wondered how he could be so relaxed and fine about everything. She wanted so bad to just go out there and shake him and demand for him to do something please! about what was about to happen. But if you tried to talk to Dean about what was coming in just a handful of days—you'd better prepare to be bitch slapped verbally.

Alex slid out of the backseat and headed into the store, needing the bathroom, needing to get out of the damn backseat for a few minutes. It was cold outside even though it was April. Her breath made little puffs of water vapor as it hit the air, her worn out combat boots crunched against frost on the cracked pavement. She wrapped her arms around herself, deep in thought. She wondered about how other families might deal with what hers was having to face. How did normal people handle knowing that they were losing someone? What did functioning families do when a loved one had a certain amount of time to live? But of course, the Winchester family was anything but functional. They barely held it together as it was.

The gas station restroom was a dank little tiled room with a cracked toilet and a foggy, water damaged mirror. Seeing herself in that mirror for what might have been the first time in days, Alex was taken aback. She looked so tired and harrowed, old... beaten down. Her hair was completely bedraggled and her tank top had some kind of stain on it near her hip—did that happen when they tortured that demon last night for information? Alex yanked a few fingers through her hair, trying to tame the long brown mess—it didn't really work and she gave up. She had thought of cutting it all off before, but had never gone through with it. She glanced at her face again in the mirror, wondering if the dark circles were temporary or permanent—had they always been that dark and pronounced? She couldn't remember.

Alex pulled her army-green jacket around her closer to cover the stain on her shirt then shoved her hands into the pockets as she exited the restroom. Outside, through the glass door of the gas station, she saw Dean and Sam leaning against the Impala. She felt a stab of pain, unintentionally letting herself fear for and be in the day when Dean was no longer there. He'd always been there, always. How the hell was she supposed to live without him? An agonized feeling in her chest and throat came at the thought and she shut it down, refusing to grieve yet. Dean was still here, and they had work to do. They could save him somehow, she knew it. They had to. She walked out of the gas station, stone-faced, trying to look like she was okay. Sam smiled one of his half-smiles at her and held up a cup of coffee in her direction. Alex accepted it when she reached them, cupped it in her hands for warmth, giving it a sniff through the little hole where you were supposed to sip.
Gas station coffee was always so hit or miss. This particular brew had the aroma of burnt rubber. She wrinkled her nose. She'd drink it anyway.

The Winchesters hit the road again, Dean doling out the plan for the day—get a motel room, suit up as feds. The brothers would go to the morgue to see what they could find out while Alex went to the hospital and interviewed the victim of the strange ‘kidney-napping’ as Dean put it.

"Make sure you remember to find the nurses or doctors who treated the guy and ask them all about what they saw, if there was anything weird or—" Dean was saying to Alex, but she cut in.

"Dean, I've watched you do it a million times... I know what to do." She gave him a pointed look and her oldest brother conceded, if a little reluctantly and with a little attitude.

"Yeah, yeah," he muttered gruffly. "I know it's been a few months, but I can't get used to it. The whole you-having-a-voice-thing."

Alex's eyes snapped up to the rearview mirror, where Dean was looking at her with watchful, narrowed eyes. Almost like he was suspicious. She looked away. "Me either," Alex murmured, her mind turning to the many questions she had about that. She could feel Dean still watching her in the rearview, but she avoided looking back at him. Dean and Sam shared a significant glance. Dean frowned and shook his head. Unsolved mystery number one: how Alex had suddenly and inexplicably gotten her voice back after being silent since she was six months old.

Dean remembered Alex had been a normal baby until that night—the twins' six month birthday. Up until then, she'd cried, babbled, and screamed like all babies did. But after the fire, after Mom died... nothing. It was like her vocal chords had just quit working. Doctors couldn't make sense of it and after a few years, the Winchester family had just accepted the fact that little Alex would never speak.

The silent one, volume zero, freak. At every new school, she would earn cruel nickname after cruel nickname. Her inability to speak or make any sort of sound made her a target for bullying and estrangement by her peers. Sam agonized over it, Dad had blamed himself and been closed off about finding solutions, and Alex cried silent tears when she thought no one was looking—or broke things in rage/started fights at school when her famous temper got to her. And Dean—well Dean had always taken it hard. Real hard.

As they currently sped toward their destination, Dean's mind wandered into an old memory. Sam and Alex must have been about twelve at the time. He remembered it like it had been just a few days ago...

_Dean came in alone into the motel room with canned chicken and some instant noodles—the fixings for what would be their dinner for the night. Dad was not there, as per usual. Sam was sitting on the bed with Alex, his arm around her, his face twisted in concern. Sniffing and breathing heavily, Alex was in tears._

"What happened?" Dean demanded, throwing down the groceries on the motel table and going over to where his siblings sat.

"Kids at school making fun of her again," Sam said angrily, clearly frustrated that his twin was hurting and he couldn't do anything.

_Dean sat on the bed on the other side of Alex and put an arm around her. "Hey, chin up kiddo. Don't listen to those losers. They're stupid assholes, right?"_
Alex bent and scrawled in her little worn out notebook—she took one with her everywhere and wrote in it countless times a day to communicate. None of them knew much sign language—just some basics thrown in with some they’d made up themselves. Dad hadn’t wanted Alex to learn it because he was going to ‘fix her’ soon, just you wait and see. Well, Dean was tired of waiting. And he knew Alex was too.

they said i’m weird & a freak

Dean felt a familiar righteous anger thump in his heart as he looked down at his kid sister. If he could get his hands on those freakin’ bullies... but he needed to focus on calming Alex down now. He squeezed her shoulder gently and spoke to her firmly. "Well, you're not a freak or weird. You're awesome, okay? You could kick any of their asses from here to Tuesday. Do any of those punks know how to gank a ghost? Or hunt a werewolf? Have any of them ever helped their dad research how to finish off a wraith? They're cushy little brats, why would you care what these idiots think anyway?"

Alex shrugged miserably, sniffing as another fat tear rolled down her cheek. She quickly wrote something else, then stood up and threw the book on the floor, making Dean have to retrieve it to see what she’s said. He picked it up, and was confronted with a very hard line of text to read.

i'll never have friends :’("

Dean tried to keep his voice upbeat, even though the frowny face with multiple tear drops just about did him in. "Sure you will, baby girl," he soothed. Dad used to call the twins baby girl and baby boy. He didn't anymore. "And no matter if you have friends or not, you'll always have me and Sam, okay?" Dean patted her roughly on the back. "It's gonna be okay." Dean gave his sister a light and playful punch in the shoulder, as he cracked a no-nonsense grin. "Now. You and Sammy need to help me make dinner. No being down in the dumps allowed."

Alex nodded halfheartedly, giving a very unenthusiastic 'okay' hand symbol.

How many times had they had that same exact conversation? Dean wearily thought of how many hard, lonely nights he had helped his brother and sister through. Alex’s muteness had caused her to become an outcast, and Sam was picked on too for varying reasons—often for being the brother of the mute girl. Neither of the twins had made many friends, actually. Alex and Sam had been joined at the hip, pretty much, until the high school years, which is when things had gotten a little less cozy in the family. Sam had tried harder to be quote unquote ‘normal’ and Alex hadn’t been into that at all (or capable, really). And then when Sam decided to go off to college... she’d taken that really hard and personal. Things had never been the same between any of them since. The whole college thing, in Dean's opinion, had royally screwed the Winchester family. He was still pissed about it, honestly.

He’d always felt very protective over both of his siblings, but especially over Alex because he saw her as being really vulnerable. Yeah, she was a good hunter and Dad had raised her just like him and Sam: to be capable and resourceful, strong and smart—but up until her unexplained, ‘miraculous’ healing a few months ago, Dean hadn't ever wanted to let her out of his sight. Too much risk out there. He feared she would end up trapped somewhere or hurt badly—unable to even make a sound or call for help. Dean had always held out hope they would find some voodoo, some spell, some something to get Alex her voice back. She'd always been so unhappy, so lonely, so off to herself, so undeserving of the crap fate had dealt her. Sometimes her frustration and anger came out, mostly in her teen years, in random and unexpected bursts of violence or acts of aggression. She'd broken stuff in motel rooms, gotten in fights at school, had meltdowns where she'd kick anything in sight—Dean had caught her spray painting school property before and stealing random stuff from anywhere she felt like it. She didn't care too much about the 'regular' outside world, because they didn't care about her either.

Dean couldn't be too mad at her. He got it, he did. She felt weird and freakish and was mad at the world. But more than mad, she was alone and lonely. Even if she were in a room full of people, she was alone, off to herself, in the corner or sitting, watching, quiet whether she wanted to be or not. Dean had always felt responsible for trying to make her feel normal, at least a little bit. He wasn't sure it had ever worked though. Anyway, were any of the Winchester family normal? He really didn't think so.

Dean's mind again wandered into his memories, this time a more recent one...

It was 2004 and Dean and Alex had just reunited with Sam a couple weeks ago after Dad went missing. The sibling dynamic was off, period, maybe because they'd been apart for years, maybe because Sam was mourning the death of Jessica, maybe because Alex was kind of withdrawn and weird with her twin suddenly back in the picture. Either way, Dean was a little extra pissy because nothing was going according to plan and because Dad was proving impossible to find.

They'd stopped in Lake Manitoc, Wisconsin, to investigate a series of suspicious drownings. The deaths had been ruled accidental, but Dean hadn't been so sure. They'd found the wife and son of one of the most recent drowning victims. This boy named Lucas had seen his dad drown—and the poor kid had been stuck out there, floating in the cold water all alone for hours—he hadn't spoken a word since. The second Dean had learned that this kid had gone mute after watching a parent die, he'd been deeply affected and empathetic. After all, that's pretty much exactly what had happened to his little sister.

At a local park, Dean had tracked down Lucas's mom for the second time to talk to her. He wanted to talk to Lucas some more, see what the kid had seen when his dad drowned. Morbid stuff, but someone had to do it. Lucas was off by himself at the park, so Dean and Alex had gone over to try and see if they could get him to talk. Sam hung back with the mom. Lucas was sitting alone, bent over a park bench coloring. "Follow my lead," Dean said, maybe a little unnecessarily to Alex, who gave him a part-amused, part-judging look that clearly said I always do, don't I? Yeah. She did.

"How's it going?" Dean asked Lucas as they approached, then crouched down across from the kid. Alex knelt at the end of the bench, folded her arms over the wooden slats. The little boy didn't acknowledge either of them, just kept coloring. He had colored construction paper stacked next to him and some untouched plastic army men scattered across the bench, too. Dean and Alex exchanged a glance, Alex shrugged almost imperceptibly, and Dean picked up a toy soldier.

"Oh, I used to love these things," Dean said conversationally, and swung the little plastic piece around making cheesy gun and explosion sounds. Alex shook her head, hid a smile. Lucas kept coloring, ignoring them, and Dean tried again. "So crayons more your thing?" Dean asked, watching Lucas carefully. "That's cool. Chicks dig artists."

Alex had picked up the drawing on top of the little pile of drawings Lucas had next to himself. She looked at it thoughtfully—the drawing was of a big black swirl. Dean glanced between Alex and Lucas, struck by the fact that this kid Lucas reminded him painfully of his sister in a way that surprised him. Lucas had to be five or six, and Alex was twenty-two, but they had the exact same sad, alone, haunted eyes. They had the same lonely-in-a-world-full-of-people kind of slouch to their shoulders.

*Dean caught himself in his thoughts and refocused, soldiered on—this was no time to get all jacked up on sad feelings. He flipped through Lucas's drawings. "Hey, these are pretty good," he said, looking at the one of a red bicycle. He got an idea, glanced at Lucas. "You mind if I sit and draw with you for awhile?"

No response from Lucas. "I'm not so bad myself," Dean commented, going ahead and picking up the stack of paper and a crayon, standing up. Alex had her hands together and under her chin and she watched silently, mostly observing Lucas, but looking at Dean from time to time. Dean glanced at her briefly as he sat down on the empty end of the bench, then addressed Lucas again.

"You know Lucas, I'm thinking you can hear me, you just don't want to talk. I don't know exactly what happened to your dad, but I know it was something real bad." He glanced at Lucas, who was still unresponsive. "I think I know how you feel. When I was your age, I... I saw something." He paused, stopped drawing for a second, grew deeply thoughtful and pensive, thinking of what he remembered about that fateful night: flashes of fire down the hallway, Dad shouting, the roar of the flames, baby Sam wailing, Alex wide eyed and screaming and silent. Dean had run outside, stared up at the window of the nursery from outside as he clutched the twins just barely—they had been so heavy in his arms. He hadn't understood what was happening, not at first. Their nursery window was lit up soft orange by the fire—how could Dean have guessed that Mom was burning alive just beyond those panes of glass?

Sobering a good deal, Dean took a deep breath, glanced at Alex, who was watching Lucas draw. Sometimes Dean wondered if she remembered anything. She'd just been a baby, after all.

"Anyway," Dean looked at Lucas, gathering himself and forcing his mind out of the dark places. "My little sister Alex here? She doesn't talk cuz of what happened. Just like you. She saw something so bad that it just... made her voice go poof, I guess." Alex's jaw had tightened a little at the subject matter, but she just stared down at the bench neutrally. However, Lucas did stop drawing a second and glanced Alex's way in half-curiosity before returning to his scribbles.

"Listen," Dean said to the kid. "We understand and we wanna help." He returned to drawing as he talked. "Maybe you don't think anyone will listen to you, or, or believe you. I want you to know that I will. You don't even have to say anything." Alex peeked up at Dean from under her lashes and he attempted to give her a little smile. He was good at these one-sided conversations after a lifetime with her. And she knew it, too.

"You could draw me a picture about what you saw that day, with your dad, on the lake," Dean suggested, refocusing on Lucas. When he got no response, he nodded. It had been worth a shot. "Okay, no problem. This is for you." Dean held out the stick-figure drawing he'd done. "This is my family." He pointed to each stick figure individually. "That's my dad. That's my mom. That's my geek brother—" he smirked, glanced Sam's way, "my kid sister—and that's me." A pause, and Lucas still said nothing, just colored his little rocket ship drawing, off in his own little world. Dean gave up, but kept his voice friendly and calm. "All right, so I'm a sucky artist." He stood, put the drawing down where he'd been sitting. "I'll see you around, Lucas."

Dean started to walk off but when Alex stayed put, and he stopped, looked at her, waited—but she shook her head slightly, motioned for him to go on and go. He hung back, but watched, curious. Lucas came out of his fog, picked up the drawing Dean had left, stared at it curiously, then looked at Alex and then back to the picture, then back at her again. He was scrutinizing her kind of suspiciously. She smiled just a little—she had a way of smiling really hesitantly, sort of grimacing, holding her mouth in a stiff line and testing the waters before really smiling for real—but today she smiled for real and right away at the little kid as she tapped the stick figure on the sheet that symbolized her. She then tapped herself on the chest, close to her shoulder. Lucas looked at her a long time, trying to decide something maybe. Alex took a piece of paper, a crayon, wrote something down, held it out in front of herself for him to read. I see you.

Lucas tilted his head to the side just slightly, thoughtfully, then reached out and accepted it from her. Dean watched with increasing interest... usually Alex was a total disaster with kids—she just didn't know what to do with them and they didn't know what to do with her—kids liked loud people, entertaining people. Alex was easy to miss if you weren't looking for her. Maybe that's why Lucas seemed kind of fascinated by her, because he wasn't a typical kid. He had taken out his own blank piece of paper and was writing on it. Lucas handed it to her and Dean could just make out the words I see you too.

Alex read it, took it, raised her eyebrows and tilted her head, her eyes flickering over Lucas's face. She smiled a little then, and the kid's chin moved up, he looked at Alex thoroughly. Dean swore the two of them were having an entire conversation that only they could understand.

And then Lucas got out a new sheet of paper and began to draw a house—they didn't know it at the time, but that drawing would help them solve the case.

Dean remembered watching the two of them together, those silent kids with world-weary eyes and knowing there was hope for Lucas that he might speak again someday, but knowing deep down in his heart of hearts that Alex would remain silent forever. So imagine his surprise, shock, and disbelief when a few months ago, out of nowhere, Alex had stubbed her toe on something and yelped out loud in pain. All three of them had been totally shocked at the sound, the first sound out of her mouth since she'd been a baby. At first they had all been beside themselves with disbelief and overwhelming confused happiness—but then they had all stopped, suspicious, wondering how—why—and who? They still didn't know of these answers.

The first few days, Alex hadn't been able to speak too well, stuttering a lot and getting overwhelmed and frustrated with her newfound ability. But these days, you'd never know she'd ever been mute. She spoke easily, argued a lot, joked, laughed, snarked off as if she had always been able to—which was another mystery, something that bothered Dean deeply. She'd caught on fast. Too fast. It had to be supernatural, however she'd been fixed up and Dean knew that—but didn't have a clue how to find out who or what was responsible. He thought maybe, maybe Dad had done it somehow from beyond the grave, but he had no way of knowing that for sure. For a moment, Dean thought how much he would like—no, how much he needed—to stick around a few years more, if only to find out who had fixed her and why. But soon, the Hellhounds would come. Dean's expression darkened and he gripped the steering wheel tighter.

In the back seat and lost in her own thoughts, Alex was also thinking about her newfound voice as she absently bit at her nails. Being inexplicably healed of a life of silence, of the inability to make a single noise didn't sit well with her. The having a voice part was great, the not having a clue why was what ate away at her. In her experience, good things didn't just randomly happen to her. Ever. There was some catch to it... she just knew it.

For her entire life, Alex had lived in her own internal world, watching life happen and not feeling part of it in the way others were. She'd spent a lot of time imagining her responses to conversations she was never be a part of, giving grand monologues inside her head for hours at a time, wondering what would change if she could speak, respond, and participate like everyone else could.

If she tried to look at her muteness from a positive angle, all she could come up with was that she'd gotten really good at writing fast and clear since she usually used notepaper to communicate. Sometimes she'd used morse code, too, since Dad made them all learn the military-method of communication. She never learned sign language though... not much anyway. She knew a few basic signs and the alphabet but Dad had always insisted, sometimes really angrily, that she didn't need to learn 'that crap' and how he was going to find a way to fix her. Well, he never had. Throughout the years, some kindhearted teachers had insisted on sign language classes for her a few times but Alex had never really put any effort into learning it. She'd known her brothers and especially her dad wouldn't have the time to learn it, and they were the only ones she really cared about communicating with. That and as soon as she'd be enrolled in the class, it'd be time to change schools again, anyway. They traveled—a lot—and school had been a big, stupid blur. She hadn't been like Sam, good grades and Mr. Honor Roll. She'd been the F student who never tried at all.

It had always seemed like a cruel joke, that a girl like Alex—in a family that lived to hunt down and killed the undead—would have an extra thing holding her back. She was already in the minority, being a girl, being the smallest, being the youngest. So being mute was the cherry on top of the crappy ice cream sundae. She had overcompensated, trying to prove to Dad and herself that she wasn't weaker and that she wasn't any less of a person. She'd obsessively worked on her marksmanship until she was the best shot of either of her brothers, she'd studied Latin on her own instead of doing homework, she'd taught herself to look at something for just a few seconds and remember details, she'd tried and tried and tried. But still, she'd felt overlooked by Dad. After awhile, she gave up on pleasing him.

But for years, she tried and failed, and sadness from the disappointment of Dad never being proud of her still remained. Her brothers were her saving grace in all those hard moments of sadness and being let down by Dad, but especially Dean. Dean who had always gone out of his way to look out for her, comfort her, stick up for her, protect her. Dean who had seen the ways she worked hard to please Dad and patted her on the shoulder, told her good job when Dad had said nothing. Dean who had stuck by her side, even when Sam left the family, even when Dad disappeared for weeks and months on end. Dean who had never let her down, not even once. Dean who couldn't die, who couldn't leave her here alone. He was her best friend.

Alex felt desperation bubbling up inside her, and helplessness at the same time. You couldn't just break a soul contract. No one ever had, not that they knew of. She looked out the window, tears pricking her eyes.

Don't cry. Don't let them see you cry.

She steeled herself, breathed in deep, cracked her knuckles one by one and forcibly made herself think about anything other than the soul deal, but not before reflecting miserably that maybe she was more like her brothers than she thought: avoiding the reality that was staring her down the barrel.
Canned baked beans. Again. Alex shoveled the globby lukewarm lumps into her mouth and chased them with tap water, trying to get breakfast over as fast as possible. Meals around here tended to come from a can, and that wasn't going to change anytime soon. Moreover, she didn't honestly care. Food didn't really taste like anything to her anymore, she didn't want to eat it, no matter what it was. But she made herself, because if she didn't, Bobby would. Across from the kitchen table where she sat, Bobby Singer was in his study, poring over some books with his Jack Daniels close by. It was nine in the morning. Alex eyed the whiskey bottle a little wistfully. Maybe later. She started on her third cup of coffee instead. It seemed to have little to no effect in helping her feel alert or stay awake, but she was hoping maybe this cup would help jump start her.

She was tired to her bones. It wasn't that she didn't have time to sleep. She just wasn't ever able to sleep more than a few hours at a time. When she did manage to fall asleep after laying awake for what felt like hours, she didn't stay asleep long. There were nightmares. There was never a feeling of being calm due to the nonstop thoughts and losses racing around her head. There were tears that never stopped coming. She felt dissatisfied with everything, constantly vigilant, and incapable of relaxing.

Alex took a sip of the quite frankly terrible coffee and thought of how without Bobby's kindness, she probably would have either gotten killed or killed herself by now. She wasn't sure if she could go on living like this forever though. There was this huge void inside that ached day and night, made her existence miserable. She didn't want to live like this. And she'd thought life was lonely before Dean had died and Sam had left...

Sitting there at the familiar old kitchen table in the somewhat dilapidated house, Alex thought of how this place held so many of her childhood memories. She remembered playing hide-and-seek with Sam in the junkyard on their tenth birthday. She remembered one time the three of them had read some of Bobby's top shelf, forbidden-for-kids books secretly in the dead of the night... and then had scary dreams for the next week after that because of the freaky illustrations and stories inside of that book. She remembered finding Dean with some 'borrowed' whiskey when he was sixteen and him letting her try some too—she'd made the most sour pucker 'yuck' face in her life when she'd tasted the dark liquid for the first time. The memory brought a soft smile and then the familiar pain.

Alex got up, holding her coffee cup tightly, trying to not feel the loss, the gaping hole, the great sadness. She drifted into the study, old hardwood floor creaking under her feet. "Anything?" she asked Bobby, who glanced up at her from underneath his ball cap.

"Maybe," he replied, preoccupied, turning the page of his book. "Possible werewolf down in Virginia."

Yes! Anything to get the fuck out of this house. "Let's do it."

He didn't seem to share her enthusiasm, flicked another page in his book. "Rufus's already down that way, I'm gonna get him to handle it." He took a swig of his drink and grimaced as he set the bottle down on the table with a loud thud. "'Sides, we just got back from smokin' that nest of vamps—take a breather."

Alex's jaw tightened, she turned her mug of coffee in her hand, every muscle in her body tense. A breather was the last thing she wanted to take. Revenge was what she wanted. "Lilith is still out there."

Bobby looked at her fully this time, cautioningly, then deliberately sat back in his chair while holding her gaze. "Yeah. She is. But running ourselves ragged ain't gonna magically get us where we can kill her. These things take time—research—preparation. We need to know what we're up against." He softened a little. "I know it ain't easy waiting. But trust me. If it's the last thing we do, we'll get the bitch." He pushed the book back a little from himself, looking at her more closely. "You okay?"

She gave him a sullen look and shrugged. She didn't want to say 'yes' and be lying, and she didn't want to talk about her actual feelings either. He looked at her sadly, and she could tell that he knew she wasn't good at all. But he said nothing, thankfully.

Dean is dead.

No matter how hard she tried to forget it, push it aside, play it down... her big brother being gone forever was the cold reality. No amount of alcohol, hunting, reading, tv, coffee, daydreaming, wishing, whatever—could change that. She remembered his screams as he'd been ripped apart. She could still see that blank, lifeless stare in his eyes when it had all been over.

Alex felt tears coming on and quickly pressed her mouth into a flat line and managed a mumbled I'll be outside before she turned and hurried out into the salvage yard, allowing the tears to come as her knuckles turned white holding the forgotten coffee cup. Just when she thought she'd drained the last of her reserves, that she couldn't cry anymore—it would happen again, wracking her body with such intense grief that she felt like she would die. The loss, the desperation, the anger and bitterness crashed over her once again like the stormy ocean tide. She felt physically ill, mentally incapable, totally wrecked. She'd never known so much sorrow in her entire life. And that was saying something.

Why didn't you save him? Why didn't you think of something?

In a sudden burst of rage, Alex hurled the half-full mug of coffee blindly with an oddly choked scream. It crashed and shattered against an old, rusted Chevy—and Alex put her hands against her mouth to try and get herself to stop crying and breathe more normally, sinking down to her heels because standing was too much. She was suddenly remembering the time Dean flew off the handle about Dad dying, the time he'd trashed the Impala.

It was a memory that was still fresh, especially since it had been in this same exact salvage yard... Alex had been sitting there beside one of the other junkers.

Her red, watery eyes drifted over to the exact spot as she remembered. It had been really bright that day and she'd been sitting on the ground in the shade of a messed up semi truck. She'd been staring unseeingly at the laces of her faded Converse shoes, listening to Dean and Sam argue. Sam had wanted to know why Dean wasn't grieving Dad's death—Dean had given his brother some douchey, heartless response, Sam had gotten pissed and walked off. Alex remembered looking up at her oldest brother, who hadn't even remembered she was there. His shoulders had been tense, his breathing weird. He stared at his car a long moment, completely still, the crowbar he was holding hanging there limply at his side. And then in a fit of absolute helpless rage, he had reeled back and then smashed one of the windows in. That hadn't been enough for him—it seemed to set him off in fact—he'd started beating the trunk of the car, tearing apart what he'd rebuilt—and Alex, who had jumped up when he smashed the window, grabbed his shoulder, startling him—he'd looked absolutely wrecked with grief. She'd shaken her head 'no,' wishing so badly she could talk out loud, tell him it was going to be okay, that he shouldn't blame himself, that she couldn't let him do this…but all she could do back then was look at him in concern, try to reach out and pull him in for a hug—but he'd tried to push her away. She'd refused to be pushed, shaken her head 'no' again, sterner this time, daring her brother to keep up the stupid charade—she yanked the crowbar away from him angrily and threw it aside—and then his front had dissolved, he'd broken down and hugged her tightly, pressed his face into the top of her shoulder. He'd shaken with sobs, clung to her hard. "It's my fault," he had choked out over and over again. "It's my fault."

And it hadn't been, but that was Dean. He blamed himself for everything, always.

Alex looked over to her left—the exact spot in the salvage yard where all that had happened, and her grief was renewed a hundred times over. For her entire life, Dean was the one thing that had never changed. Sam had been come and go, hit or miss. Dad had been mostly absent and distant even when he was there, more of a drill sergeant than a father... he'd said he was proud of her like once her whole life. Once. Her life had been a shaky off-the-rails roller coaster. Nothing had ever been permanent, nothing had ever been constant or unchanging. Nothing except her oldest brother, who had been her absolute hero, her best friend.

She sniffed, wiped her cheeks off, growing stony and numb, feeling so hollow. As if she was cold, her arms circled around herself. For the past four and a half months she had been drowning in her grief alone. It was hard to face the facts, but her family was pretty much gone completely—only she and Sam had survived, and, hell, at the rate they were going, the two of them would probably be dead soon too. Sam might be dead already, she didn't know—they hadn't spoken in four months. Her stomach turned bitterly, guiltily. She stood slowly, zombie-like, then looked across the junk yard blankly, arms hanging at her sides. She should call him. She had this thought every single day, and every day she almost did—then stopped herself. She already knew how it would go. Badly. And her pride was at stake, too. She didn't want to cave.

Their fight had happened three days after Dean's funeral. It had cut her deep and it still hurt bad. She was still too angry to want to even see his face, and still too ashamed of some of the things she'd said to attempt to make any kind of peace. Things had been rocky in their brother-sister relationship, well, for a long time now, but especially since Sam had left for college when they had been eighteen. And after burying Dean, things went from bad to absolute worst...

Late into the night and the two surviving Winchesters were awake, sharing another bottle of whiskey in Bobby's study. A couple other discarded, emptied bottles laid nearby. The twins had been at it for several hours, drinking up to Dean's memory and getting more than a little wasted in the process. Alex had the bottle and was staring at it miserably. "I still think we need to go back, Sam. We should salt and burn his bones just to be safe. It's what Dean would want."

Sam ran a hand through his shaggy hair tiredly. "We've been over this—we need his body for when I bring him back. Gimme that."

Alex glared a warning at him, held the whiskey bottle to herself. "If you say that one more time..."

Sam looked at her with one of more stubborn, exasperated expressions. "He's our big brother, Alex. I'm finding a way." His tone was deadly serious and even acidic, and Alex scooted toward him from where she sat on the couch. He was eyeing the bottle in her hand, a growing ugly expression on his face.
"You're being stupid," she accused. "I want him back too, but there's literally not a way that won't fuck more shit up." Alex looked at him long and hard, he avoided her gaze, stayed silent, and Alex scowled drunkenly. She sounded incredibly bitter and horrible, even to herself.

Sam stood up, clearly agitated, throwing his arms wide dramatically. "Do you hear yourself?" The accusation in his voice, unspoken, was clear enough to Alex: she didn't care about their brother. Sam doubled down. "We can bring him back, I know it. There has to be a way."

Alex stood up at that point, set the whiskey bottle down. Even though she was five foot eight inches, he still towered over her. "Yeah, there're ways to bring people back—dark magic, sell your soul, demon deals..." Alex gave a disgusted snort. The alcohol was making it hard to think, and easy to make mistakes.

Sam was getting angry. "He's in hell, Alex. We can't leave him in there."

"Well what the hell can we actually do, Sam?!" Alex burst out, all of her frustrations and anger and grief making her feel powerless. "NOTHING!" That word felt final. Fatal. True. Of course she didn't want to leave Dean there, but she knew there was no way to bring her brother back that wasn't laced with dark, demonic consequences that would leave them all worse off. It was an impossible, heartbreaking situation. She wished in that moment that she knew nothing about the supernatural and paranormal. Maybe then she wouldn't be forever after tormented with thoughts of somehow saving her brother. If she weren't a hunter who had seen so many people come back from death, maybe she could just accept the fact that her brother was dead and move on.

A muscle jerked in Sam's cheek as he fixed her with narrowed eyes that seemed to suddenly despise her. "You really don't give two craps about him, do you? After all he did for you."

Her eyebrows shot up high as deeply offended feelings jolted her insides. "Excuse me?"

Sam gave a short, humorless laugh. "All I'm saying is if he could see you now, how you don't even want to try to bring him back or even try to—" Sam said. "When we both know he would do anything for either of us!"

"Oh you're one to talk about loyalty," Alex snapped. "You know what, fuck off. I never friggin' abandoned my family like you did! So don't lecture me when all you ever did for him or me was walk out!"

Her words were slurring worse and worse and her inhibitions didn't seem to exist anymore.

He seemed to think that was funny, pausing and scoffing, then laughing a short, biting laugh. "Are you really that jealous of me having a normal life?"

Exasperated and disgusted, Alex threw her hands in the air, like she couldn't believe he went there. "That's not what this is about!"

Sam's mouth was in a thin line, he was unconvinced. "Yeah, like hell it isn't. I know you're pissed at me for, I dunno, going off to college, living my own life, leaving you with Dean and Dad." His face twisted in an ugly expression. "You know what, just because you were disabled didn't mean I was obligated to waste the rest of my goddamn life babysitting you!"

Alex's face fell in wounded shock, and Sam immediately seemed to regret his choice of words, fumbling. "I-I'm sorry, I didn't mean..."

Crushed, Alex felt her eyes stinging with tears. She was angry. Hurt. And suddenly so enraged she couldn't see straight. She jumped across the space between them, grabbed him by the front of his shirt, and punched him for all she was worth in the face. It still sent them both falling over and crashing into furniture, where she socked him a few more times with angry shrieks as he flailed and put hands in front of his face. They both scrambled back up once he shoved her off, Sam holding his face where she’d hit him. Alex shook her head, breathing hard from emotions and adrenaline, not sure if she recognized the guy standing in front of her. She had half a mind to keep hitting him, but she decided words would hurt more. "You don't even deserve what Dean did, you fucking jerk," she spat scornfully, hiding her tears and hitting Sam where it hurt, both with words and a hard shove to his chest. "He should never have made that crossroads deal for you!" And then five words that came out of nowhere, screamed at the top of her lungs: "I wish YOU were dead!"

The words hit the air and there was suddenly dead, hurt silence. Alex immediately realized she had gone too far, but didn't know how to undo it. Sam's face went cold and dark, and he stared at her wordlessly for several seconds. Then he made a disgusted face, shook his head, over it. "You know what? I don't need this crap from you," he said bitterly, and without another word, he turned and stalked toward the door. For the briefest of seconds, she knew she needed to apologize, beg him to forgive her outburst—but pride wouldn't let her. She dug even deeper in out of anger, grief, and the clouded way her alcohol-addled brain was operating.

"Yeah, leave like you always do, fucking coward!" Alex screamed even as Sam slammed the door out hard enough to break something and send several items knocking to the ground. She almost went after him, suddenly panicking, taking two steps after him—and then she stopped. She was either too proud to follow and say she was sorry, or too afraid that he wouldn't care and leave anyway—and she just stood there, stupid and useless, not able to stand up completely steadily thanks to the booze. A couple seconds later, she could hear the Impala as it started up and tore out of the driveway.

She heard soft footsteps behind her. "Jesus, you two were about to bring the whole house down," Bobby commented uncomfortably.

Alex swallowed, pretended to be fine, even though she was mortified with herself and feeling sick inside. "He'll come back," she said tersely, then brushed past Bobby, refusing to speak any more that night.

But he didn't come back. He didn't call. Nothing. She had stewed for a week, waiting to hear from him, waiting for him to crawl back. And... nothing. But why would he after what she said?

Before she knew it, the week turned into two weeks. Then three. Now, almost four months later, she was at the point where she felt there was no returning—that it was too late to try and make amends. And honestly, maybe she didn't want to. She wasn't sure she could forgive him for what he'd said—and she sure as hell didn't want him to be in her life if he saw her as only a babysitting job. And what about what she had said to him? That had been even worse maybe, even more unforgivable than what he'd said to her. Dean would have been pissed as hell to see them not speaking. What a mess. What a horrible, stupid mess. It was fitting though, because that's what her life was, after all. A wreck. Sam's absence was just further confirmation that he didn't want to be part of the family and never had at all. He'd walked out, just like before when he turned eighteen. Sure, Dean had dragged him back into the life a few years ago and Sam had stuck around, hunted with them again, acted like he belonged in the life. But she should have known that it was just a matter of time before he left again. Apparently Dean had been the only thing keeping the family together. Apparently she wasn't someone worth sticking around for.

Alex realized how self-centered her thoughts were and got mad at herself all over again. She kicked a discarded beer can aimlessly, not even sure why she was bothering with life anymore. It felt pointless. Totally pointless. Empty. She had no one but Bobby, and he was great, really. But not the same as who she’d lost. Absently, she listened to the sound of Bobby's phone ringing inside the house for the second or third time and hoped it was another hunter with a job for them. She wanted to be hunting something. Anything. Killing something, slashing something, beating someone's face in. And more than that, she wanted to be hunting down Lilith. Maybe after a couple more months of getting her head right and hunting alongside Bobby, she'd go find Sam, try to apologize or something and they could work together on taking down that evil bitch together. It would be the least they could do in memory of their brother. Either way, Alex didn't want to lose the only living relative she had left. But maybe you already have, said a quiet, dark voice inside.

The sound of Bobby's heavy footsteps sounded behind and then beside her. "Hey, you all right?" he asked. He had his arms folded and he was looking at her sort of dubiously. She glanced at him sidelong, cursory and cautious. Bobby was about her height and built stockily. He was always wearing the same outfit: a flannel shirt with a puffy vest, a ballcap, and a disgruntled expression. He was bearded and to look at him without knowing him, you might judge him as being crotchety and country as hell. And he was both those things. But he was also cunning, intellectually brilliant, and a real softie deep down. Like right now, coming out here to ask if she was all right. But the narrowed-eye stare he was giving her was weird.

"Yeah, fine, why?" She asked.

He looked at her with a deepening frown. "You've been standin' out here for almost an hour."

Alex blinked in surprise. An hour? "I... I guess I lost track of time." She'd done that a lot lately. Attempting to look less unsettled than she was, Alex cleared her throat. "Who uh, who called?"

"Some jackass," Bobby said, seeming a little distracted. "It wasn't anything."

"Some jackass," Bobby said, seeming a little distracted. "It wasn't anything."

Alex looked at him carefully now. Something seemed off about him, catching her attention and suspicion. "You sure?"

His grizzled face gave nothing away except the fact that she better quit asking. "Yeah, I'm sure," he answered firmly. "Look, those salt rounds aren't gonna pack themselves," he said, jerking his thumb in the direction of the house.

"Oh, crap, yeah. Forgot. I'll go start."

Bobby gave her a crooked little smile and patted her a little awkwardly on the shoulder. 'I'm makin' more coffee. Lemme know when those rounds are packed." He turned to go inside and Alex made to follow, but a flash of light in her peripheral vision caused her to stop, turn, and squint —she could have sworn, for a millisecond, that someone had been standing there. But there was nothing there. She frowned at herself, retreating into the house with a few backward glances. She sometimes saw those flashes of light at the corners of her vision, but when she looked fully, there would be nothing there—she probably needed to go see an eye doctor or something. She saw these flashes more and more, especially since Dean died.

Alex followed Bobby into his house—it was a cluttered place that was tidy in an untidy way, if that made sense. The same stuff had been here since Alex could remember—same faded tartan couch, same rickety kitchen table, same solid oak study desk. She went downstairs into the ramshackle basement and began loading up salt rounds, packing shotgun shells full of rock salt. There was a therapeutic quality to doing this. Maybe because this was a task she had been assigned to since she could remember. Even though she was the baby of the family and the instant minority since she was the smallest and a girl, Dad had always taught her everything her brothers had learned about hunting and killing the undead. And this had always been her job, the thing she took care of for the family. Dad hadn't willingly taken her on many hunts, but he'd let her do this.

Methodically she filled shell after shell. The salty smell would stay on her fingers and on her skin for awhile. It was a familiar, comforting scent and took her away from her deeper, more painful thoughts. After awhile, she heard the shuffling of feet on the floor over her head—two pairs of feet. She hadn't known Bobby was expecting company. She kept on with the shells. She had probably filled a hundred now and her neck was tired, her fingers cramping. Just a few more and... up above her, she heard sounds like something had been knocked over, and then the sound of shouting and a chair scraping across the floor. Recognizing the sounds of a scuffle she reacted on instinct as her heart rate suddenly leapt into high gear. She bolted up the stairs without a second thought, a shotgun in hand. She shoved a spare round into it as she went, not sure what she was going to find.

Rounding the corner at the top of the steps, she froze at the sight before her with the shotgun pulled tight into her shoulder.

Bobby stood and stared as Dean, silver knife in hand stood stock still, blood dripping from his forearm. The two men looked from each other to her. When Dean saw her, an indescribable expression—something like disbelief and joy—passed over his features, and the knife lowered, he made to move toward her, but she was taking a step back, aiming the shotgun directly at his center and cocking it loudly. He froze. Completely shocked, she felt like she could puke or collapse.

"What is this Bobby? Who is that?!!" Alex demanded, almost shouting or crying, she wasn't sure which. She was shaking all over, wondering what kind of sick joke this was.

"Al, it's me," Dean implored. At the sound of the familiar gravelly voice, Alex froze too, confused and horrified and shocked. She realized she was breathing hard, her heart was hammering a million miles an hour. She looked at Bobby questioningly, who was reaching for her weapon.

"Gimme the gun, kiddo. I... I think it really is him," Bobby said, sounding a little dazed.

Alex jerked away from Bobby, refusing to give up her weapon, backing up even more. She held it with doubled aggression, staring at the guy who looked like her oldest brother. "No," she said through gritted teeth. "Not possible."

Dean was slowly laying his knife down, and then keeping his hands out, as if to show that he meant no harm. "It's really me, Al. You gotta believe me." He looked pleading and worried.

"No..." Alex shook her head, feeling sick with hope, but refusing to believe it. She fixed him with a hard expression, but felt her eyes filling with tears. "I watched you die. I saw you buried." She began to despair. "How could you be—" she paused, aghast, "here again?!"

Dean looked about as sure as she was. "I dunno how, but I'm here. And I'm me."

Alex's breathing was labored as she looked at the anxious face of her older brother. Every detail was the same as she remembered, and if this were a shifter or something... it was a damn good imitation. Whoever it was in front of her looked exactly like Dean Winchester: he was tall and broad-shouldered, built solidly, not overly muscular, just strong and brawny. His eyes were startlingly green and looking at her with a wounded and hopeful expression. He had the lightest smattering of freckles across the bridge of his nose and the planes of his cheeks. He looked like Dean, he sounded like Dean. He even stood like Dean. His legs were slightly bowed too, just like the real Dean, and Alex's heart twisted in her chest. It really did look like him. And she wanted it to be, oh god she wanted it to be but how was this possible?

She looked at him carefully, still holding the shotgun level at his chest as she struggled. Her, pointing the weapon at him seemed to be inspiring a great sadness in his eyes—like he was hoping to be recognized right off the bat. Is that really him? She looked down over him completely, looking for proof that it was him or wasn't him. Then she noticed how he nervously clenched and unclenched his fists at his sides. A subtle little motion, barely perceptible. Her grip on her weapon softened and her mouth opened slightly in surprise. She stared—he had always done that when he was uncomfortable or nervous. Clenched, unclenched, clenched, unclenched—driven her freaking nuts with that damn habit over the years. And that—the little nervous tic she had seen a thousand times during their shared lifetime—that was something a demon or shapeshifter would never be able to duplicate to perfection or think to implement. She looked him in the eye, her heart completely flooded with a surge of amazed, overjoyed disbelief. But she wanted to make extra sure.

"When's my birthday?" she asked in a whisper. A low ball, easy one.

"May second," came the immediate answer. Then added on after a one-second beat: "Nineteen eighty-three."

Her heart was picking up pace and the shotgun was lowering slowly. "What's my favorite cartoon?"

Dean's face softened with the beginnings of a smile. "Wile E. Coyote, duh."

Alex's eyes were brimming with tears, and she was beginning to smile too. "Pizza topping."

"Plain cheese, you freak." A constant accusation he always gave her throughout the years. At this point, he was smiling big, but through tears of his own too. "I could name your favorites all day, Al, but can I get a hug first? Just got back from being dead and shit."

"Y-you're really you," she said in a stunned daze, feeling herself moving forward toward him.

He nodded, smiling tightly as his eyes shone with tears and his features wavered. "Yeah kiddo."

A happy sob sounded as Alex crashed into her big brother, arms around his neck, shotgun still in her hand. She began to cry out of happiness. "Oh my god, oh my god," was all she could manage. Alex shook from sobs, and Dean buried his face in her shoulder, relieved, breaking down too, embracing her so tightly in his strong arms that she could barely breathe. For a moment they just gripped each other like that, then Alex pulled back to look at him again, just in time to see water splash across his face.

Deadpan, he blinked and spit, made a face. "Not a demon either, Bobby." The Winchesters looked in unison in Bobby, who shrugged sheepishly.

"Sorry. Can't be too careful."

Floating, in a gaze, Alex got a towel out of one of the kitchen drawers and laid down the shotgun as Bobby and Dean hugged tightly. Dean took the towel with a "thanks," and Alex stared, unable to believe this, still afraid to. This was surreal, and that was putting it lightly. "H-how the hell are you back, Dean?" she asked as they followed Bobby into the study. She couldn't stop looking at him—he being alive was too good to be true. Am I dreaming?

"Your guess is as good as mine," Dean replied. He sounded almost as dazed as she was.

Bobby crossed his arms and fixed Dean with a serious gaze. "Dean. Your chest was ribbons, your insides were slop. And you've been buried for four months. Even if you could slip out of hell and back into your meat suit—"
"I know, I should look like a Thriller video reject." The humorous comment fell flat. They all knew something was very off about this entire situation. Alex hovered close to her brother, kind of afraid, however illogically, that if she walked away, he'd disappear.

"What do you remember about what happened?" Bobby asked.

Dean shook his head. "Not much. I remember I was a Hellhound's chew toy, and then... lights out. Then I come to six feet under, that was it." He switched subjects. "Sam's number's not working."

He looked at Alex, suddenly seeming to have a horrible thought occur to him. "He's... he's not...?"

She looked away from Dean, ashamed and nervously, absentmindedly rubbing the back of her neck.

"Oh, he's alive," Bobby assured. "As far as we know."

"Good... wait, what do you mean, as far as you know?"

Bobby glanced at Alex uncomfortably and she took the cue to explain. "We, uh, haven't heard from Sam since a few days after you died."

In disbelief, Dean looked from Bobby to Alex. "You're kidding. You two just let him go off by himself?"

"He left, didn't really ask for permission," Alex said, her tone a little shorter than she had intended.

Dean was now frowning, his trademark big-brother lecture face and tone coming out. "You should've been looking after him."

"Yeah, maybe," she admitted, feeling bitter about the way things were with Sam but questioning herself about her decisions as usual. Her eyes scanned the floor in front of her, seeing the fight she'd had with her twin all over again. "Things fell apart pretty fast after you died."

Bobby was now sitting at his desk, drumming the surface thoughtfully with his fingers. "These last months haven't been exactly easy, y'know. For any of us. We had to bury you. Your brother and sister, they just couldn't hold it together. We all took it pretty hard."

Dean seemed moderately chastened, and let it go. "Why'd you bury me, anyway?"

Alex sat down in one of the chairs across from Bobby's desk and Dean followed suit.

"Alex and I wanted you salted and burned. Usual drill. But... Sam wouldn't have it."

"Well, I'm glad he won that one," Dean said wryly. Another attempt at a joke that got nothing but grim looks from Bobby and Alex.

Bobby shrugged ruefully. "He said you'd need a body when he got you back home somehow."

Dean grew suspicious. "He said that?" He looked at his sister, frowning deeply.

And then, there was a sinking feeling. Had Sam done this somehow? Alex tried to explain it as best she could briefly, even as new worries grew. "He told me a bunch of times he'd find a way to bring you back. I tried to talk some sense into him, Dean—but he wouldn't listen. Turned into a huge fight. And then... he left." She drew a heavy breath, feeling guilty. "I, uh, I didn't try to follow or find him. And I still haven't."

Dean's expression was strange—disillusioned, hurt. Disappointed. And that was incredibly hard to look at for Alex, so she looked away.
Bobby let out a heavy breath through his nostrils. "Well, I tried to find him, even though your sister wouldn't hear of helping me. Sam wouldn't return my calls, lost me pretty fast when I tried to track him down. He didn't want to be found."

"Dammit, Sammy." Dean shook his head and rubbed his face in his hands. "Whatever he did, it's some kind of bad mojo."

"Whaddayou mean?" Bobby asked.

"You shoulda seen the grave site," Dean said, sounding deeply apprehensive. "It was like a nuke went off. And then there was this... this force, this presence, I dunno, but it, it blew past me at a fill-up joint. And then this."

He stood up and yanked his jacket off, pulled up the sleeve of his shirt. There on his shoulder, in red scar tissue, a chillingly clear hand print. Bobby and Alex jumped to their feet in unison, staring at it in shock and mild fear. "It was like a demon just yanked me out," Dean said, then paused darkly. "Or rode me out."

Alex reached out and gingerly tested her fingertips across the raised scar tissue, then met Dean's gaze, deeply troubled. "To hold up their end of the bargain," she surmised.

"Looks that way," Dean replied grimly, and pulled the sleeve of his shirt down again.

"Krishna and Zeus," Bobby breathed. "There's no telling what we're up against here."

Dean was putting his jacket back on, his expression dark. "I'll tell you one thing. We need to find Sam, and quick."
Finding Sam was easy enough thanks to modern technology and Dean's quick detective work. Within an hour of Dean's arrival at Bobby's, the three hunters were already headed back Pontiac, Illinois—suspiciously enough, the place where Sam was staying was close to where Dean had been buried. It looked like Sam had succeeded in getting Dean back, but the question was, how? And why was he still acting like he didn't want to be found?

A couple hours into the drive, they pulled over at a gas station. Bobby was outside his Chevelle fueling up as Dean was digging into a fast food burger in the front seat.

"Oh my god," Dean was saying through a mouth full of grease, cheese, and meat. "This is amazing." He made a very appreciative mmm sound and grinned back at Alex, which was kind of disgusting with all the burger and mayonnaise in his teeth.

"You're gross," she said, the would-be-insult touched with a certain note of affection. He raised the burger her way in salute, chewing loudly. Alex grinned, feeling it in her soul itself. In this moment, it was like Dean had never left at all. She momentarily forgot the months of pain and confusion and wandering; the overwhelming loneliness and grief. She was in a car watching her dumb brother pigging out on junk food... and it was the best thing in the world. Well, almost. The only thing missing was Sam. Alex's smile faded as she thought about her other brother. She felt so many things toward him—anger, remorse, guilt, disappointment, heartbreak. She thought about the 'babysitting' comment and wondered for the millionth time if that's all she had ever been to Sam—a responsibility he hadn't wanted, a hindrance on his freedom. And maybe Sam wasn't the only one who thought that.

She glanced at her oldest brother, faltering before she went through with it. "Dean, can I ask you something?"

"Duh," Dean replied as he took another huge bite of his sandwich.

She fidgeted a little, suddenly interested in her bitten-short fingernails and not sure how to put her question into words, second guessing herself. She was about to sound so stupid... but if she didn't ask, she wouldn't know, and she had to know. Still, this was going to suck to come right out and ask. It was embarrassing, but she knew Dean would let her know the facts. She pushed forward even though she felt a little physically sick with nervousness. She tried to sound nonchalant. "I, uh, I was just wondering... and just tell me the truth, okay?" She went quiet, hesitated. "How bad of a downer was I on, you know, the family, while we were growing up?"

Attention piqued, the hamburger was temporarily forgotten and Dean looked at her intently, frowning. "The hell you talking about?" His eyes were narrowing.

Alex got more uncomfortable. She didn't want to explain it. She struggled a little on how to word it. "I mean, it was hard on Dad to have these three kids tagging along after him all that time, and then one of them was you know—special needs." She said 'special needs' with a certain type of disdain that her brother clearly didn't like.
Dean's face was hard and almost a little angry. "Hey. I told you a million times—you've never been disabled, okay? Nothing about being mute made you any less of a person. You were never any kind of burden on us." Alex met his eyes hesitantly, feeling younger and smaller than she was. She didn't believe him for a second.

"Then why'd Sam leave us when he was eighteen? And why'd he leave again?"

Dean looked confused and hurt at the same time. "You think that was your fault?"

Alex looked down at her hands angrily. "I know it was." Sam had always felt 'stuck' with her in high school years, she knew he had. Leaving the family meant being free of having to look after her and put up with her.

Dean seemed to soften, his eyes saddening. "Al... no." He sighed, a weary sound. "Dammit, you really are too much like me." He sounded guilty, but quickly covered it up with a try at reassurance. "Listen, I'm sure it's not as bad as you think. Sam's just being a jackass. Wouldn't be the first time."

Alex shook her head slowly. He didn't hear the fight they had. He didn't know how much they had hurt each other.

Across the parking lot, Bobby was coming out of the convenience store now and heading back toward the car. Dean saw that even though Alex was silent... well, that was what Dean was used to, actually. He could read his sister easily, he had years of experience figuring out her mood and thought process from a glance alone, and he saw right now how doubtful she was about a reconciliation. "Listen, whatever happened between you two... we'll stow it," he said. "We'll find Sam and put this damn family back together if it kills us." He paused, and then added as an afterthought, "Like it or not."

Alex said nothing. That sounded terrible, honestly. If Sam didn't want to be in this, why force it?

"Okay?" Dean prompted, a little forcefully.

Alex nodded automatically and gave him a "yeah," even though she wasn't sure how committed, if at all, she was to doing what Dean had planned. She felt queasy thinking of seeing Sam again, which was sad. She had idolized Sam and depended on him during her childhood. They had drifted apart as teens, broken apart completely when he went to Stanford... gotten close again a couple years ago. But she just really didn't know if it could be repaired again after that last fight. She'd said something unforgivable. Something she wouldn't blame Sam for hating her forever about.

"Hey, sleepyhead," Alex heard, and felt herself being shaken. "Wake up." She started awake, and found herself staring at Dean through bleary eyes.

"Where are we?" she asked, looking around groggily and sitting up from where she'd been slumped into the car door. When did I fall asleep?

"Some motel," Dean said, and that's when Alex saw a familiar, dark car parked a few rows over.
The Impala. Her stomach jumped. She was no longer sleepy at all. Sam was here. "Bobby went in to find out what room Sam's holed up in," Dean said, and got out of the car. Alex scrambled out after him, grabbing her jacket and yanking it on, suddenly filled with trepidation at the thought of seeing her twin again. Would he be happy to see them? Would he be happy to see her? What if he welcomed Dean back and told Alex to screw off? That last scenario seemed most likely to her.

The night air was chilly, and the motel sign flickered a couple times. Dean was off in brooding thoughts of his own, his expression tense—a muscle jerked in his cheek and his brow darkened as his eyes slid over his car.

Just then, Bobby appeared out of the check-in office and quickly made his way over to the Winchesters. "Wedge Antilles is in room two-oh-seven," he reported.

A smile fleetingly passed over Dean's face at the Star Wars reference. Dean chuckled softly. "That's my boy," he said. "Let's go."

And with that the three of them set off to finding the room, but not before Dean walked by the Impala. "Baby," Dean murmured affectionately, running a hand across the hood of his car. The inside of the motel was dim and run down—much like almost every other place they had ever stayed, Alex thought. At the end of the hall, Room 207 was marked by a cheesy red heart plaque.

"Here goes nothin'," Dean muttered, and knocked on the door.

A couple seconds passed then the door swung open, and the three of them couldn't hide their surprise—instead of Sam, a pretty, dark-haired young woman stood there, dressed in only underwear and a tank top. She looked at them expectantly. "So where is it?" she asked impatiently.

"Where's... what?" Dean asked, confused.

The girl copped an attitude. "The pizza... that takes three people to deliver?"

"Uh, I think we got the wrong room," Dean said.

And then, a tall, hulkingly familiar figure stepped into their line of sight from somewhere back in the room. "Hey is—" Sam stopped dead when he saw Dean, swallowing, his face the picture of shock. His eyes flickered between Dean and Alex, and he seemed completely caught off guard—almost panicked.

"Heya, Sammy," Dean said, and Alex could hear all of the deep, unspoken emotions in Dean's quiet greeting. He stepped into the room, moving toward Sam. Sam's eyes went cold, his body tensed, and Alex saw the violence flare in his eyes before Dean did.

"Wait, Dean!" Alex warned, moving forward and trying to stop her brother from going any closer, but it was too late. Sam whipped out a knife and with a roar, lunged at Dean. Dean blocked the knife slash just barely, even as Alex tackled Sam the only way she knew how, using her entire weight to slam her shoulder into his side, effectively knocking Sam to the side by a foot or two. The knife clattered to the floor even as the girl who had answered the door shrieked and jumped back. Bobby was just behind Alex and grabbed Sam, who was recovering from his sister's attack.

Alex stumbled back, a little jarred from the impact. Bobby was barely managing to hang on to Sam, who struggled violently, shouting at Dean, "Who are you?!"

Dean was flabbergasted. "Like you didn't do this?!"

"Do what?!" Sam roared, struggling against Bobby's grip.

"It's him, Sam! It's him! I've been through this already, it's really him!" Bobby managed through gritted teeth, fighting to hold Sam back.

Dean stared at Sam in floored disbelief at his crazy reaction. Sam was ceasing to fight as he stared at his older brother more closely. "What..." he stuttered, as the struggle left his body completely. He looked at Alex, searching for confirmation—and Alex was mystified at his behavior. Hadn't he brought Dean back? Why was he acting so shocked? Sam was now looking at Dean in complete disbelief.

"I know." Dean smiled a little, chancing humor. "I look fantastic, huh?"

Bobby cautiously let go of Sam, who was now on the verge of tears. He had eyes only for Dean, and pulled his brother into a crushing hug that Dean returned. The two of them gripped each other tightly for a long moment with teary eyes, then pulled back to look at each other.

"So are you two two like... together?" asked the girl, who everyone had forgotten was there until then. She was standing there watching the scene with a strange expression.

"What?" Sam seemed to have forgotten about her. "No. No," Sam almost chuckled. "He's my brother."

"Uh... got it. I... I guess. Look, I should probably go," she said, already turning to pick up a shirt off the floor.

"Yeah. Yeah, that's probably a good idea," Sam said, distracted and a little awkward. "Sorry."

She grabbed her jeans too and shimmied into them right there in front of them all. Alex saw Bobby, ever the gentleman, looking down and tugging the brim of his cap lower, clearly a little embarrassed. Dean however, watched openly, looking mildly approving. The girl grabbed her bag, and Sam walked her to the door. "So, call me," she said, looking up at Sam hopefully.

"Yeah, sure thing, Kathy."

She paused, disappointed. "Kristy."

"Uh, right," Sam said, and shut the door behind the girl. He came back into the room slowly, glancing around at everyone with a hooded expression.

Alex looked at Dean sidelong, questioning and dubious. He shrugged. He also seemed to have noticed how un-Sam-like that entire scene was. Alex stayed her distance, leaning up against the wall and crossing her arms as Sam sat on the bed, grabbing a button up shirt and shrugging it over his t-shirt. Sam hadn't really acknowledged her and now he was just ignoring everyone—seemed like guilty behavior to her. Dean was leaned against the wall across from Sam, his arms folded.

"So, what'd it cost?"

Sam had a little dark smile on his face as he buttoned the shirt. "The girl? I don't pay, Dean."

Dean was intense and serious. "That's not funny, Sam." He paused, hardened his voice. "To bring me back. What'd it cost? Was it just your soul, or was it something worse?"

Sam paused, looking at Dean with uncertainty. "You think I made a deal?" He asked. He sounded offended.

"We know you made a deal," Alex said coldly.

Her first words to Sam, who looked at Alex with an unpleasant expression. "I didn't." His words were sharp.

"Don't lie to us," Dean said, his tone darkening.

"I'm not lying," Sam insisted as slow anger built in his voice and face.
Dean only got angrier. "So what now, I'm off the hook and you're on, is that it?" He asked, standing and approaching Sam coolly. "You're some demon's bitch-boy? I didn't want to be saved like this!"

Sam seemed to reach the end of his patience and stood up in anger. "Look, Dean, I wish I had done it, all right?!

Dean escalated the situation, grabbing Sam hard by the front of his shirt. "There's no other way that this coulda gone down," he growled, then shouted: "Tell the truth!"

Sam broke his brother's grip wrathfully, his voice raising to a shout, too. "I am telling the truth, Dean! It wasn't me, dammit!"

Responding to the rising tensions, Alex had shot forward from where she'd lurked off to the side and she was throwing an angry hand out to her side. "Well who the hell else would it have been, Sam?!

"I don't know!" Sam insisted, appearing to feel attacked and outnumbered, glancing from Dean to Alex to Bobby cagily as his face reddened. "You!" he accused, getting a very interesting expression from his sister. "O-or Bobby!" He was agitated and animated with balefulness. "Listen, yes, I tried everything, that's the truth. I tried opening the Devil's Gate, hell, I tried to bargain, Dean, but no demon would deal, all right? You were rotting in Hell for months. For months, and I couldn't stop it. So I'm sorry it wasn't me, all right? Now would you all get off my back?"

The room went quiet as Bobby, Dean, and Alex processed what Sam had just told them. So he hadn't brought Dean back. Who... or what... had? Alex shook her head in faint horror at her brother's actions, realizing how close Sam had gone to the edge and thinking about how much he had risked. He could have gotten himself in serious trouble or even killed. Even though that should have made her soften towards him, she only felt more angry at him for his reckless stupidity and for the way he chose to leave her out of it completely. Dean however seemed to relent, patting Sam on the shoulder. "It's okay, Sammy. You don't have to apologize, I believe you." He chuckled dryly. "After all, you did try to kill me when you first saw me. Probably wouldn't have done that if you were expecting to see me."

Sam looked embarrassed. "Sorry about that," he said lamely. And the room fell into a brief silence. Next to each other, Sam and Dean's differences were startling to Alex in that moment. Sam was something like six-and-a-half feet tall and he towered over everyone in the room, including Dean. Her twin was built lean and muscular, he had a massive upper body and broad, tank-like shoulders. He made Dean look almost stocky in comparison. Sam had more narrow, sharp features than Dean did—piercing eyes, a sculpted jawline, high cheekbones, a straight, aquiline nose. His hair was longer than it had been last Alex had seen him—it touched the collar of his shirt in the back. He glanced at Alex with an unreadable and gruff expression and she set her jaw like stone, looked away from him.

"Well kids," Bobby said, "I'm happy as apple pie to witness this reunion, but this all raises a pretty sticky question." He looked at Dean meaningfully. "If Sam didn't pull you out... and if Alex and I didn't either..."

Dean nodded tensely and finished Bobby's thought for him. "Who—or what—did?" He let out an annoyed huff of breath, clearly fed up with the entire exchange. "I need a friggin' beer," he muttered.

"There's some in the fridge," Sam said offhandedly, distracted by other things.

Bobby muttered "thank God," and went to get some as Alex retreated back to skulking beside the "So what were you doing around here if you weren't digging me out of my grave?" Dean asked Sam, sitting down across from Sam on the other twin bed.

Bobby handed out beers to the boys and offered one in Alex's direction, but she shook her head no, intently listening to Sam, who held his beer without opening it. "Well, once I figured out I couldn't save you, I, uh, started hunting down Lilith, trying to get some payback." His eyes flickered over to Alex. She felt another stab of disappointment and anger at his confession—his actions were another clear and silent statement about how helpful he must believe her to be. He looked away.

"All by yourself!?" Bobby exclaimed, unhappy. "Who do you think you are, your old man?"

Dean got up, seeming to notice something on the floor a few feet away from him. "Uh, yeah, I'm sorry, Bobby. I should have called," Sam said. He glanced again at Alex, who was stone-faced. "I was pretty messed up."

Dean gave a short, humorless laugh as he bent and picked up a discarded pink, flowered bra from the floor. "Oh yeah. I really feel your pain."

Alex looked at Sam hard, trying to figure out what was going on with him. Something felt wrong, but she wasn't sure what. He began telling them details about how he'd been hunting demons in the area and then she sort of spaced out, the voices of Dean, Bobby and Sam becoming like distant hazy sounds as she got lost in her grim thoughts—just a few hours ago she had thought Dean was dead. Just a few hours ago she thought maybe she never would see Sam again. Seeing him again, hearing that he had been hunting Lilith on his own—she felt wounded, deeply. Confused. And guilty as fuck. Did he really despise her that much to go on hunting without her? This was her fault. She shouldn't have just let Sam go. She should have manned up and tried to be the bigger person, forgive and forget, and apologized for the shit she said to him. Oh well. Too late now.

His decision to hunt Lilith without her seemed to confirm that nagging suspicion that Sam viewed her as a burden and a responsibility rather than an equal. That stung bad. But worse than that, she realized she truly didn't trust him anymore, not after this—plus, being here with him in the same room, she could sense that he was holding something back. It was in the veiled glances and guilty way his shoulders slumped. But she thought it was just him not wanting her there. Funny thing was, she had been holding onto hope that maybe they would find Sam and things would be okay somehow. Hunky dory, even. You're so fucking stupid, Alex. What did she think would happen? They would both just see each other again and magically forget the separation and fight they'd had? Alex should have known better than to allow herself to even toy with the idea of a happy ending, because up to now life had just been one damn heartbreak after another. Alex glanced over at her twin, who was looking at her out of the corner of his eye, his expression unreadable. His eyes quickly darted away from hers.

"I know a psychic," Bobby was saying. "Few hours from here. Something this big, maybe she's heard the other side talking. Maybe we find out whodunit."

"Hell yeah, it's worth a shot," Dean said.

Bobby took his phone out of his pocket and headed toward the door. "I'll be right back."

Dean stood up as if to leave, and Sam followed suit. "Hey, wait Dean. What was it like?" There was a moment in which all three of the Winchesters were silent, but especially Alex, who hadn't gathered the courage to ask Dean that question yet.
"What, Hell?" Dean paused, his expression grew thoughtful, then he shrugged and became apathetic. "I dunno, I, I must have blacked it out. I don't remember a damn thing."

"Well, thank God for that," Sam said, giving Dean a smile tinged with sadness.

"Yeah. Uh, bathroom." And with that, Dean left the room. Sam shoved his hands into his pockets and finally looked at Alex, who still slouched with crossed arms at the window, wordlessly saying she wasn't happy about anything. Total silence spanned the space between the twins for several seconds, and Alex said nothing, just looked at Sam, who had his mouth drawn into a thin line.

"Hi Alex," he said finally, the words a little abrupt and cynical sounding, accompanied by a wan smile—but it looked more like a grimace.

"Sam," she said flatly, not bothering to hide her bad attitude.

He crossed his arms, came toward her a little, his eyebrows knitting together. "It's been four months. Don't you have anything else to say to me?" That was rich—he needed to have things to say to her first. She shrugged, staring at him in silent defiance then pointedly looking away. "Wow. Missed you too, sis," he said in words laced with sarcasm.

Alex let out a disgusted breath and uncrossed her arms, stepped to him, ready to kick Sam's ass verbally so that she didn't cry instead. "You know what..." she began, but then thought better of it and clamped her mouth shut, turning to walk past him. "I'll be outside with Bobby."

She let her shoulder knock into his arm as she brushed past and she thought she heard him mutter something like, "real fucking mature."

About an Hour Later

Alex was slouching in the front seat of Bobby's Chevelle as the car raced across the miles toward a physic who could hopefully show them who or what had taken Dean out of hell. Alex hadn't wanted to ride with her brothers. She needed some space away from Sam to calm down or she might say something she regretted. Bobby had said next to nothing to her for the drive, not until that moment.

He cleared his throat awkwardly. "So listen, I know it ain't none of my business—"

"So then don't go there," Alex said a little rudely, which she regretted immediately—geez Alex, what's your problem?

Bobby was not deterred, he just matched her sass with some of his own. "Well, I'm goin' there anyway, princess. You and Sam need to work out this little family drama hour if we're gonna have any luck taking down whatever baddie brought Dean back." He glanced at her sidelong. "Avoiding Sam's only gonna work for so long."

Alex chewed the inside of her mouth, a bad habit she had picked up in childhood. She knew Bobby was right. "Yeah, I know..." she muttered, reliving her resentments in her head. She just couldn't stand him right now. She was so angry at him for always abandoning ship. She stewed unhappily, sullen and staring out the window. "It's all kinds of screwed up."

"You ain't kiddin'," he agreed. "But it can be fixed. You know that. You two've fought before."

She looked at the dashboard with a tense face. "Not like this." Her jaw clenched as she faintly shook her head. "Don't get me wrong. He's my brother." She breathed hard out of her nose, a sound that seemed reluctant. "I love him or whatever but I also can't stand him." Bobby chuckled softly at her statement and Alex wished she could see some humor in the situation, too. To her, it was all misery. She stared unseeing in front of herself and said it so softly: "It was so much easier when I couldn't talk."

Bobby glanced at her in surprise. He took a couple beats before asking, "How d'ya mean?"

Alex took a long moment to try and think the right words to say. "Just... I don't have a filter anymore. I keep fucking stuff up. I get so pissed and now I can just say shit so much faster than before. The wrong stuff. It's weird. And hard." She heard herself screaming she wished Sam were dead in her mind, feeling more and more regretful every time she went through that terrible moment.

Bobby looked empathetic. "I'm know it's tough, sweetheart," he said, "but for what it's worth, you're doin' just fine. I'm proud of you." Words that were like water in the desert to her heart in that moment. They glanced at each other briefly and he gave her a kind, encouraging smile that was hard not to ruefully return. He patted her knee twice, a gesture that was affectionate and fatherly. Bobby refocused on the road. "Now why don't you try and get some shut-eye? You look tired."

Another little defeated smile. "I'm always tired," Alex leaned up against the cold glass of the window. A moment of silence passed. "Bobby?"

"Yeah?"

She hesitated. "Do you think I should have tried to get Dean back? Was it wrong to not even try?"

Bobby's answer was immediate. "We did the right thing. He was gone, and there was no wholesome way to bring him back. You know that."

She did know that. But it also worried her, because in the back of her mind, she now believed that whatever had pulled Dean out of hell might have sinister plans for him—and Alex refused to lose him again.

Cruising down the road to the familiar hum of the Impala engines with classic rock on the radio, Dean Winchester was glad to be alive, momentarily free from his normal barrage of troubled thoughts. Out of habit, he glanced into the rearview, where he could usually see half of Alex's face where she sat in the back seat. He was reminded that she wasn't there, and he glanced at Sam, who was silent and pensive. On the radio, Highway to Hell began playing. A little disconcerted, Dean switched the radio off. He didn't want to think about Hell right now. Unlike the lie he had told to Sam in the motel, he did remember it. All of it. Forcibly, he pushed all of that out of his mind.

He cleared his throat and glanced over at Sam, who hadn't said much for the whole drive. "So there's still one thing that's bothering me."

Sam acknowledged him with a flicking glance. "Yeah?"

"The night that I bit it. Or... got bit." Dean chuckled at his own joke, but Sam just gave him a shut up look, clearly not amused. Dean composed himself. "Uh, sorry. How'd you make it out? I thought Lilith was going to kill you and Al."

Sam shook his head. He seemed distracted. "Well, she tried. She couldn't."

"What do you mean, she couldn't?"
Sam paused. "She fired this, like, burning light at me, and... didn't leave a scratch. Like I was immune or something."

"Immune," Dean repeated as if he hadn't heard right.

Sam shrugged, frowning slightly. "Yeah. I don't know who was more surprised, her or me. She left pretty fast after that. Seemed kinda spooked. Didn't even try to burn Alex. Just disappeared."

Dean's jaw was working oddly as he thought through the entire situation—his baby brother and sister left alone and undefended in this crappy, crazy world—but if that weren't bad enough, they hadn't even stuck together. He glanced at Sam irritably. "You know, I wanna know what the hell were you thinking leaving Alex alone for all that time, Sammy. You were supposed to protect her."

Sam glanced over at Dean, looking like he'd been caught. "I didn't leave her alone—she was with Bobby." Sam sounded kind of quieter than he had before. Like he didn't believe his own words. "She was fine."

"You didn't know that for a fact," Dean retorted. "You promised me that you would take care of her when I was gone," he said, reminding his brother of a conversation they'd had privately a few weeks before Dean's death day. Sam said nothing, but his silence was distinctly guilty. "So I die and the family falls apart?" Dean asked a little gruffly.

"I guess," Sam said apathetically, refusing to look Dean's way.

"Well what the hell happened to make you break that promise to me, man?" Dean demanded.

Sam looked disturbed. "Does it really matter, Dean?" He shrugged, uncomfortable. "We... we fought and I—I just needed to leave, okay?" Dean looked at Sam oddly, who was staring unseeingly into the windshield. "And besides, it was pretty clear to me that she didn't want me around anymore."

"Come on, Sam. She just lost her oldest brother, don't you think she might say some crap she didn't mean?" Sam said nothing, just looked really unhappy. Dean shook his head, completely disappointed. "Come on, Sammy. I thought you two were closer than all this. I mean, you've fought before and didn't end up hating each other's guts then, right?"

"I mean, yeah, I guess," Sam muttered, reluctant. "You're right. We used to be close. But ever since I started hunting again after college, things've been different. And then with her whole voice thing..." he trailed off. "I dunno. I thought I knew her, but ever since she could talk again, it's like... she's not who I thought."

"Yeah, or maybe you liked her better when she couldn't call you on your crap or argue back," Dean accused. That comment seemed to trigger something in Sam, who exploded.

"Dean, the hell are you defending her?! Why am I getting all this crap from you? She's a grown woman for crying out loud and didn't need me chaperoning her when you were gone. I told you, she didn't want me there, okay? I don't appreciate you making this whole thing about me and my problems!"

"I'm not, I'm just saying—"

"Yes, you are." Sam insisted vehemently. "You're taking her side without even hearing about what went down!" Sam ran a hand through his shaggy hair, glaring at nothing in particular. "And you know what, when are we gonna talk about how weird it is that she got her voice back to begin with?" Sam was now talking with his hands, riled up. "And not just her voice Dean, but the ability..."
to speak. I mean do you know how how... not normal that is? Doesn't it freak you out?"

Dean glanced at Sam sidelong. Yeah, it did, but he wasn't about to admit to it. So he shrugged neutrally. "Guess after the life we've lived, I'll take whatever good I can get." Exasperated, Sam looked away. A few moments of silence passed and Dean attempted a new conversation. "So you've been using your, uh, freaky ESP stuff?"

He got a barely-suppressed dirty look from Sam. "No."

"You sure about that? Well, I mean, now that you've got... immunity, whatever the hell that is... just wondering what other kind of weirdo crap you've got going on."

Sam gave Dean a fully aggravated look, losing patience. "Nothing, Dean. Look, you didn't want me to go down that road, so I didn't go down that road."

"Well thanks for honoring that promise at least," Dean said sarcastically, and reached for the radio to turn the music back on.

Sam hunkered down in the seat silently, brooding.

They reached the psychic's home early the next morning. It was a normal looking house with potted flowers on the front porch. Dean and Sam got out of the Impala and approached the Chevelle where Alex stood and watching them. Bobby had intuitively walked ahead of them and was waiting at the foot of the porch, leaving the Winchesters to themselves for a minute.

Dean approached his sister with a reluctant Sam in tow. Alex waited silently, her arms crossed in a way that made her look very unapproachable. Dean was always struck by how for twins, the two of them looked pretty much nothing alike, at least not at first glance, and especially when it came to their builds. Sam towered over his younger twin. He had about eight inches of height on her at his height of six-foot-four, and he probably weighed about a hundred pounds more than she did—he was all muscle and brawn and was, in a word, huge. Alex was tall, too, probably five-foot-eight or so, but next to her giganic, freakishly tall twin, she looked short and small. She was built completely different than he was, too—she had one of those willowy figures that was boyish, straight, petite. She reminded Dean of a beanpole or a fencepost, and he'd teased her as such in the past. But she wasn't a waif. A lot of people glanced at her and didn't notice how strong she was, how she was basically all lean muscle from years of running, fighting, and training.

The twins had similar brown hair—Sam's shaggy and floppy, Alex's a little darker and wavy, messy, long—their eyes were the same hazel color and they both had ridiculous, sharp cheekbones. They made a lot of the same faces and expressions, but their faces weren't strikingly similar, especially considering that they were twins. Dean had decided awhile ago that Sam took more after their mom, and Alex took more after their dad. Sam had one of those faces that chicks dug—dimples, strong clefted chin, expressive, piercing eyes. Alex had a more youthful face than Sam—big doe eyes, square jaw, dark eyebrows. But, even if the twins weren't too similar physically, they were similar in personality.Stubborn, hard-nosed, headstrong, emotional. So that's why having to referee this fight they were having was a pain in Dean's ass.

He cleared his throat and looked between the twins, fixing them with his best I'm-upset-with-you glare. In moments like these, he felt more like their dad than their brother. "Okay, listen. You two are gonna stow your crap," he said with little fanfare, pointing at them in turn sternly. "Say you're sorry and agree to at least be civil to each other." Sam and Alex looked at each other grudgingly and Dean waited unhappily. "Today, guys!"
Alex gave in first. "Sorry, Sam." She clearly didn't really mean it.

"Yeah. Me too," Sam said, sounding as genuine as Alex did.

Dean was less than impressed. "Geez, making me weep here," he said sarcastically. They looked at him almost in unison, with identical, annoyed 'are you happy now?' bitchy expressions on their faces. Dean rolled his eyes at their refusal to really apologize. "How old are you guys, like five?!" He demanded, and with an exasperated huff he gave up and headed toward where Bobby was waiting near the house.
"Down in the atmosphere, garbage and city lights. You've gone to save your tired soul; you've gone to save their lives."
- Our Lady Peace

They were welcomed inside the house by Pamela—a strong looking woman with a ready smile. She had tanned skin and dark hair and a low rasping voice. Her little house was decorated with a few pagan artifacts and mystical imagery here and there, but otherwise looked like a normal home. She wasted no time flirting with Dean and Sam both—usually Alex wouldn't have cared, but Pamela was a little over the top in her no-nonsense style—her eyes ate the brothers alive shamelessly and Alex quickly began to feel a little uncomfortable at the innuendos.

Pamela set up a seance in between flirting and then called them all to a small table where six lit candles waited. She had darkened the room and even though it was just a dinky old kitchen, the room felt eerie to Alex because of what they were about to do.

"Right. Take each other's hands," Pamela instructed. Alex looked to her left where Sam sat. He held out his hand to her, a grudging peace offering. She took it reluctantly. Sitting across from them, Dean saw and smiled sort of smugly at the twins, who, not even meaning to, made the same exact face at their oldest brother—a half-eye rolling scoff.

"All right," Pamela purred. "I need to touch something our mystery monster touched." Her eyes darted to Dean coyly. He was sitting right beside her.

"Whoa. Well, he didn't touch me there," Dean said, jumping a little.

Pamela half-feigned ignorance with a chuckle. "My mistake."

Alex, Sam, and Bobby exchanged confused looks—had she just reach under the table and touched him...? She probably had. Sam made a face and Alex raised an eyebrow at Dean who was a little flustered. He cleared his throat and pulled up his sleeve, revealing the angry red hand print branded onto his shoulder. The humor of the moment was forgotten as Sam stared in shock and looked from Alex to Bobby who were somber again, remembering the reason why they had come to this psychic.

Pamela laid her hand on the scar. "Okay." She closed her eyes and everyone else followed suit. "I invoke, conjure, and command you, appear unto me before this circle," she said, then repeated it three more times. Her television flicked on, the sound of static filled the room. "I invoke, conjure, and command... Castiel? No. Sorry, Castiel, I don't scare easy."

"'Castiel'?" Dean asked.

Alex peeked up, a strange curiosity tugging at her, a feeling of déjà vu washing over her. What the hell is a Castiel?

"Its name," the psychic explained. "It's whispering to me, warning me to turn back," she said, then returned to chanting. "I conjure and command you, show me your face." She repeated this over and over, louder each time. The room began to shake and the static on the television grew louder.

Alex gripped Sam's hand tighter, opening her eyes just barely to watch as the table began to vibrate. A sense of dread was coming over her. This felt like it was gonna end badly. Bobby was also opening his eyes. "Maybe we should stop," he said loudly, raising his voice over the din.

"I almost got it," Pamela said, not about to back down. She was in the zone, eyes squeezed shut, expression fierce and intense. "I command you, show me your face!" She was shouting at that point. "Show me your face NOW!" At that moment the candles flared up into flames several feet high—Pamela screamed as her eyes flew open, filled with horrifying white-hot flame. Before any of them could even react, the flames went out and she collapsed, moaning in pain. The house became silent—the rattling, white noise, and flames stopping. "My eyes... my eyes!" Pamela was sobbing. Alex could see between her fingers that clutched at her face that they were burned out completely and deep reverent fear set in, even as somewhere nearby she heard, "Call 911! Call 911!"

A Few Hours Later

Bobby watched as Alex spoke to the on-call doctor inside Pamela's room. That was something to be proud of, wasn't it—in the past few months he had affectionately started calling Alex his 'little protegée' and had really seen the kid grow a lot in confidence and ability. Not only as a hunter but as a person. His eyes went to Pamela and the good feelings evaporated to be quickly replaced by guilt and regret. The psychic was resting in a hospital bed, her eyes covered with a sleeping mask. Bobby felt another overwhelming surge of guilt—he really should have insisted she stop when things got shaky.

After a few moments Alex nodded her thanks to the doctor and both she and the MD came out of the room. Alex was looking at Bobby in a way he didn't like—all sad and sensitive, like she was feeling sorry for him or trying to think of a way to make him feel better. It reminded him of Sam, actually.

"So, what's the scoop, Grasshopper?" Bobby asked her as the doctor retreated down the hallway and out of earshot.

"Well, the doctor says they're gonna keep her overnight for observation. Pamela's daughter is on the way."

"She be all right?" Bobby asked, looking into the room and feeling entirely powerless.

"Uh... she's blind, obviously—no eyeballs left—but other than that." Alex said then seemed to realize she'd put it kind of bluntly—made a mildly chagrined face like she wished she had thought it over better. "I guess."

"This is my fault," Bobby muttered, hating himself.

Alex shook her head, frowning to herself. "You're not the one who burned her eyes out, Bobby. It was that..." she tried to remember, "Castle creature."

"I shouldn't have gotten her involved in this mess to begin with," Bobby said, more to himself than anyone else.

Alex didn't disagree. "Well, she's alive though, right? That's something." Alive, but forever changed in such a negative way. She grabbed Bobby's shoulder briefly in an attempt to comfort him. "Couldn't have known what was gonna happen."

"Yeah, I guess," Bobby muttered.

Alex relented—she knew when to leave Bobby alone and now was one of those times. Just then her phone rang in her pocket and she pulled it out, squinting at the screen. She was pretty sure it was one of Sam's old numbers. "Hello?"

"It's me," Dean's voice said. "So some demons just tried to jump me and Sammy over here at this local mom 'n pop diner—"

Alarm shot through her veins. "What? You guys okay?"

"Yeah, yeah," he said, sounding more businesslike than anything else. "Come back to the motel pronto, okay? There's probably more demons in town and I don't want you on your own."

Psh. "That's sweet, Dean," she said sarcastically, but it's not with a bad attitude. "I'm fine. Besides, I'm with Bobby."

Dean gave an aggravated, impatient huff. "Come on, just get back to the motel, shortstop. It'll be dark soon and I don't want you out there at night. Oh, and bring pie."

"Fine, fine. On my way." And she hung up, snapping her phone closed. Always with the pie. Her heart clenched and she suddenly had so many feelings. She had missed him so much.

"What's up?" Bobby asked, forehead wrinkled in concern.

"No clue," she answered honestly. Dean would fill her in later on the details. "Something demonic, as usual. I'm heading back—you coming?"

"Think I'll stay with Pam a little longer. Just call if ya need me."

"Copy," Alex said, already heading for the door.

"And Alex—" She paused. Bobby looked at her meaningfully. "You be careful."

She made an overly innocent face. "Always am."

He gave her a look—they both knew that was total bullshit. Alex gave him a crooked grin, raised her eyebrows, and left.

Late That Night

The TV was still on and Alex was half-asleep on the couch, the remote still in her hand as Spongebob Squarepants played. A stupid show she always got a kick out of. Dean had been reading all evening and she had been flipping through the channels while Sam had remained in the background, doing something on his laptop for awhile until he announced he was going to bed. Alex was in that place of half-awake and half-asleep where she wanted to get up and turn the light and TV off, but she was also convinced she would tune both out in a second and fall asleep.

A soft and sudden click startled her into full wakefulness and her head shot up, she quickly glanced around to assess the room. Dean was half sitting on his bed with a huge book open in his lap as he slept soundly, head lolling on his shoulder. Sam's bed was empty and she didn't see him anywhere else. Alex got up, creeping toward the door and peeking out just in time to see Sam's unmistakable silhouette turn the corner down the hall. What the hell? Alex was struck with a million sudden suspicions and a general bad feeling. She glanced back at Dean, who was sleeping peacefully—his face completely relaxed for once. She decided not to wake him up. Sam might just be going to get something from the car, after all. She chided herself for assuming the worst about her twin. Maybe she should cut him a break. Still, she was going to follow and see what he was doing... just to be safe. She darted out of the room, following quickly and quietly down the hotel hallway. She peered around the corner Sam had just rounded. She could see out into the parking lot through the glass door. Sam was getting into the Impala, casting glances around—the picture of guilt. Not good. The car started and pulled out of the parking lot, leaving Alex with a sinking feeling. Nope. Something was just not right. She didn't like this. She turned around and promptly gasped—Bobby was standing right behind her.

"Shit, Bobby!" She swore, holding a hand over her heart.

"Sorry kiddo. Didn't mean to startle you. Was in my room and heard a noise. Was that Sam?"

"Yeah. H-he snuck out and—wait, what's that?" They both turned at the sound of shattering glass and then took off at a run down the hall toward where they could now hear Dean screaming, and then a high-pitched shrieking sound that was so intense their vision began to waver. Oh god. Alex was swept away in alarm at the sound of her brother in pain, maybe hurt or dying—Bobby broke down the door just barely as Alex stumbled behind, her hands over ears as her panicked heart lodged itself in her throat. Dean was on the floor in a pile of broken glass, his hands over his ears as he screamed against the deafening noise. It was the most intense sound that Alex had ever heard, it reverberated through her entire body, made it hard to see—almost made her feel like she could explode apart if the intensity increased at all. But she stumbled over to Dean with Bobby and they hauled him up and fled out of the room, down the hall, and out of the motel completely.

Bobby coaxed more speed out of the car as they sped down the road, not really heading anywhere, just driving fast. He glanced back a lot, looking to see if they'd been followed. Alex rubbed her ears with her palms. They still rang from that incredibly intense noise.

"Yeah, okay, catch you later," Dean said, snapping his cellphone closed and pocketing it, twisting around to look at Alex who was in the back seat. "Sam says he went to get a burger."

"Yeah, a burger," Alex muttered doubtfully. The way he had quietly snuck out—the way he'd been looking around like he was afraid he was being followed—she smelled a lie. But, they would have to figure that out later. "Why'd you lie to him about what we're doing?" she asked, because Dean hadn't told Sam about what they were about to do—he'd said they were just going to go to a different motel.

"Because he'd just try to stop us," Dean replied tersely.

"From what? What're we doing?" Bobby asked, glancing at them both in confusion as he drove.

Alex knew Dean well enough to already have guessed what her brother had in mind—it's what she wanted to do, anyway—and she replied before Dean had a chance. "We're going to summon Casteel and kill it."

"You two want to go after Castle after what he did to Pamela?!" Bobby exclaimed in disbelief.

"Castiel," Dean corrected passively.

Alex gave him a drab look. "Whatever his name is, he's dead."

"Yup," Dean confirmed. "We're gonna face this asshole head-on, Bobby."

There was a shocked pause. "You two can't be serious!" Bobby was dismayed.

"As a heart-attack," Dean confirmed.
"Bobby, think about it," Alex said, leaning forward in her seat. "This Castiel thing is hunting Dean. We take the offensive, we get out ahead."

"We've got the big-time magic knife, you've got an arsenal in the trunk..." Dean trailed off suggestively.

Bobby was shaking his head in extreme hesitation. "Now look, you two are assuming it's some kinda demon, but what if it's something else? We might be signing our own death certificates here. This is a bad idea."

"Bobby, whatever this is, whatever it wants, it's after me," Dean reasoned intently. "That much we know, right? I've got no place to hide. I can either get caught with my pants down again or we can make our stand."

More silence. "Doing it with or without you, Bobby," Alex said.

"You damn idjits," Bobby sighed heavily. "Well, don't you think we should at least tell Sam in case, you know, we don't come back?"

Dean was quiet for a minute. "No. We'll be back."

Bobby didn't look so sure.

Several hours later, Alex got up from where she had been crouched. She was finally done with the last of the warding symbols, and her hands were cramped, not to mention her back and knees. Bobby seemed to be finishing up, too. She looked around at their handiwork—the entire abandoned warehouse they had set up shop in was covered floor and ceiling in spray painted symbols and traps. Over at a makeshift table, Dean was chuckling at them. "That's a hell of an art project you've got going there."

"Call me Picasso," Alex returned, tossing an empty can of spray paint onto the table.

"Traps and talismans from every faith on the globe," Bobby said, and looked at Dean questioningly. "How you doin'?"

Dean looked over the contents of the table he'd set up. "Stakes, iron, silver, salt, knife. I mean, we're pretty much set to catch and kill anything I've ever heard of."

"What about what we haven't heard of?" Bobby asked, and shook his head. "Uh huh, this is definitely still a bad idea."

"I heard you the first ten times," Dean said, not about to change his mind. "Whaddya say we ring the dinner bell?"

Bobby nodded reluctantly. He went over to the other table and took a pinch of some powder from a bowl, and sprinkled it into a larger bowl, which started to smoke. He began chanting in Latin.

Dean and Alex looked at each other simultaneously. Alex felt the first prick of fear now. Up until this moment she'd just been pissed and ready to kick the ass of whatever hell creature was trying to hurt her brother—this Castiel monster. But now, Bobby's warnings and reluctance replayed in her head. Her older brother winked at her. "Showtime," he said, his mouth lifting up into a crooked smile.
Twenty Minutes Later

The shotguns which had been gripped tightly and vigilantly when Bobby first did the conjuring now laid beside the three hunters who were beginning to become listless. Alex yawned widely. Beside her, Dean looked at Bobby impatiently. "You sure you did the ritual right?" Bobby gave him a bitchy look. Dean snorted. "Sorry, touchy touchy, huh?"

As if on cue, a loud rattling shook the roof of the warehouse, and the building, which had seemed solid a second ago, now felt like it might collapse on top of their heads. Immediately on their feet, Dean, Bobby and Alex backed in together, shotguns held tightly as the building continued to tremble.

"Wishful thinking, but maybe it's just the wind?!" Dean shouted over the noise.

Alex didn't think that was the wind. No way. Maybe this hadn't been such a good idea... her stomach was sinking with dread. She clutched her shotgun tightly as she stared at the doors at the far end of the warehouse—they were quaking as if they were about to break in two underneath the weight of some invisible force even though they were bolted shut. The lights above began to flicker rapidly and then doors burst open with a whoosh, the bolt snapping loudly like it was a mere twig. The room was overcome with some invisible but palpable sense of blazing power even as the bursting lights overhead began to shower sparks across the entire warehouse. Through the chaos, Alex could see the distinct silhouette of a man standing in the doorway—was that Castiel? Her fingers tightened on her shotgun and she felt herself withering a little as the figure began to walk in toward them with slow and measured steps. Something about him inspired a sudden reverent fear in Alex and for a moment she forgot her shotgun, she forgot herself. She just stood there staring and terrified, already realizing this was no ordinary demon or monster. But what was he?

In between the flickering lights and raining sparks, she could see that he looked like just a man. A handsome, tall, average built man in his mid-thirties with dark and wild hair; he was dressed in a business suit, a blue tie, and a slightly over-sized tan trench coat. His expression was fierce and stony, and even though he looked very ordinary—not anything superhuman or monstrous—the entire room bore witness to the fact that he was something different and terrifying. He walked toward them in a stiff way, not blinking even once as lights snapped and exploded all around him, yielding to him, attesting to his strength and power.

Dean opened fire on him, and remembering themselves at the sound, Alex and Bobby followed suit, emptying their rounds—Dean had iron bullets, Bobby had salt rounds, and Alex had silver—the bullets all pummeled into Castiel like a sideways rain shower, but the creature didn't even stop to wince. He was completely unaffected by the assault, none of the traps seemed to have any effect on him, and he kept coming forward undaunted, his sights set on first Dean, and then Alex. His eyes flashed ominously in the flickering light and Alex was suddenly certain of one thing as she fired her last, completely useless bullet into his chest: today, I am going to die.

"Blade!" Dean demanded with a shout. Alex shakily tossed him the demon knife then shrank back behind her older brother. Castiel stopped in front of them, his blank face now calm and serene. The wind was gone, the sparks had stopped falling, the building was solid and still once again. Alex stared apprehensively at the man who had done all of that—his blue eyes were piercing and looking at her unabashedly. They flickered over her face—she could see him look at her lips, her hair, then they looked directly into her eyes—alarm and fear rippled throughout Alex's entire nervous system at the intensity there in the crystal depths. It was almost like he could see into her and she felt trapped underneath his gaze. He seemed curious as he looked at her and he took in the anxiety etched onto her features. The mildest confusion then showed on his face, as if he didn't
"Who are you?" Dean demanded gruffly. Alex could hear from his voice that he was shaken up just like her. She glanced down at the knife in his hand at his side—this was their last weapon against this guy. Please, please work.

There was a long pause and the creature's eyes finally left Alex. "I'm the one who gripped you tight and raised you from perdition," he replied. His shockingly deep, husky voice was filled with an authority that caught Alex off guard even further.

Alex felt Dean pause then hesitate. "Yeah... thanks for that," he said, and then without any further ado he reared back and plunged the knife into the creature's chest. And nothing happened. Looking down at the knife, Castiel considered it briefly then pulled it out, unconcerned, seeming to be a touch amused. Dumbfounded, Dean and Alex gaped.

Bobby, who had slunk back to the side was sneaking up, an iron crowbar raised high—but without even looking, Castiel grabbed the weapon mid-air effortlessly just as Bobby swung, effectively and easily blocking the strike with what appeared to be superhuman strength. Turning, the man touched a very surprised Bobby on the forehead with two fingertips. The Winchesters watched in shocked horror as Bobby's eyes rolled back into his head and he crumpled to the ground, lifeless. "Bobby!" Alex screamed, trying to rush forward. Dean swung an arm out to hold her back—he was terrified to let her near this powerful adversary.

Castiel looked at Alex with a slightly perplexed expression, eyes squinting up a bit, head tilting to the side just a little, as if he didn't understand her reaction. "He's fine," he said in a flat, non-emotional voice. Alex stared back, freaked, not sure about that. Bobby looked dead. The trench-coated stranger looked at her a little longer then turned his gaze to Dean again.

"We need to talk, Dean," the man said. His eyes went back to Alex meaningfully. "Alone." He made to move forward, his arm outstretched to touch her, and Dean all but shoved Alex behind himself as he stood at his full height and put himself between the man and his sister. Dean's expression was deadly.

"Touch my sister and you die, freak," Dean thundered. "Now what the hell did you do to Bobby?"

"Dean, you can't kill me. You just tried," the man replied in a reasonable and calm tone. He paused then withdrew slightly and seemed to become interested in one of Bobby's open books on the nearby table. "You don't need to worry; your friend is alive and I won't harm any of you."

"Damn straight you won't. Who are you?" Dean demanded.

Alex was glued to her brother in terror as she stared at this strange and powerful man who was currently flipping through Bobby's book nonchalantly. He seemed almost disinterested in Dean's question, paging through Bobby's book still. "Castiel." He spoke his name softly, firmly.

"Yeah, I figured that much, I mean what are you?" Dean demanded.

Castiel turned his attention to Dean and approached once again. Alex had a hand on Dean's back, grabbing at his jacket, and she could feel him tense as Castiel came nearer. And then, he said several words the Winchesters would never forget: "I'm an angel of the Lord."

Dean and Alex looked at each other, momentarily speechless. Alex wasn't sure if she heard right. She looked the guy up and down skeptically, and did not come up with angel in any sense—where were the flowing robes and the harp music and the puffy white wings? All she saw was a guy who didn't understand her expression.

"Who are you?" Dean demanded gruffly. Alex could hear from his voice that he was shaken up just like her. She glanced down at the knife in his hand at his side—this was their last weapon against this guy. Please, please work.
about six feet tall, in an un-tailored, slightly wrinkled trench coat. His blue tie was slightly askew, he had messy brown hair and a five o'clock shadow... it all made him look more like a tired fifth-grade teacher than anything else. "Angel?" she repeated. "You serious?" she asked, genuinely stumped.

"Yes, of course I'm serious," he replied, deadpan.

"You let me do the talking," Dean hissed at his sister and then quickly fixed Castiel with a dangerous glare. "You're not an angel. Get the hell outta here. There's no such thing," he spat.

Castiel observed Dean with little change in expression. "That is your problem, Dean," he said quietly. "You have no faith." Castiel drew in a deep breath and seemed to stand at his full height. And then lightning flashed inside the warehouse, and huge shadow wings were cast onto the wall behind Castiel in the flashes of light. The wings spanned perhaps twenty feet and the effect was dazzling—intimidating—mystifying. The lightning ceased and the shadowy wings disappeared. Stunned into momentary silence, the Winchesters again looked at each other, at a loss for the entire situation.

"The hell does that prove?" Alex whispered to Dean.

Dean shook his head ever so slightly, whispering back, "Fuck if I know." They were both completely weirded out. Dean especially was mistrustful and challenging; he turned his attention back to the so-called angel in front of them and crossed his arms, cleared his throat, raised his voice a little. "Nice trick. So riddle me this: what kind of angel burns out a poor woman's eyes?"

"I warned her not to spy on my true form," Castiel said. "It can be... overwhelming to humans, and so can my real voice. But you already knew that."

Alex frowned, not understanding, but Dean seemed to have figured it out. "You mean the gas station and the motel. That was you talking?" Castiel nodded, to which Dean set his mouth in a hard line. "Buddy, next time, lower the volume."

"That was my mistake," Castiel said woodenly. "Certain people, special people, can perceive my true visage. I thought you would be one of them. I was wrong."

"And what visage are you in now, huh?" Dean asked sarcastically, looked at the supposed angel with a flippant kind glance. "What, holy tax accountant?"

"This?" Castiel looked down at himself in seeming thoughtfulness, as if he hadn't even noticed what he looked like. "This is... a vessel."

"You're possessing some poor bastard?" Dean asked in disbelief even as Alex was shocked all over again. It made sense, she had to admit... demons used people to walk the earth—if angels were real, it made sense that they might do the same.

Castiel wasn't ruffled by Dean's aghast reaction. "He's a devout man," he said, referring to whoever it was who he was possessing currently. "He actually prayed for this."

_Some guy prayed for an angel to ride him like the rodeo?_

"Well, I'm not buying what you're selling, so who are you really?" Dean demanded angrily.

"I told you," Castiel said simply.

"Right. And why would an angel rescue me from Hell?"
"Good things do happen, Dean," Castiel said, although his tone lacked conviction.

"Not in my experience," Dean said. Alex heard the weight of his statement and it resonated with her.

"What's the matter?" Castiel's expression changed, as if he had figured it out. Understanding crossed his features. "You don't think you deserve to be saved."

Dean seemed shocked by Castiel's statement, his face going blank, and Alex's protective instincts raised up. "Hey," she snapped, stepping out from behind Dean defensively, her temper getting the better of her. "We're not interested in a therapy session."

Castiel looked at her, unfazed. His eyes were so very, very blue. "I'm simply stating the truth, Alex."

He knew her name, and hearing his deep, rumbling voice speak it aloud startled her. She felt scared all over again, freaked out under his intense stare. Why did he look at her like he knew her? Why did he assume to know Dean, too? Dean was pushing Alex back again, stepping forward to put himself between the supposed angel and his sister. He didn't seem to want to discuss whether or not he thought he deserved to be saved, instead he was getting to what everyone wanted to know.

"Why'd you pull me out?" Castiel was quiet for a moment, his eyes not even acknowledging Dean. He still stared at Alex deeply like he could see nothing else in all of existence.

"Hey, asshat, look at me!" Dean stepped into Castiel's line of sight, demanding the so-called angel's gaze. "Answer the question," he said gruffly. "Why'd you pull me out?"

Castiel remained unruffled. "Because God commanded it. Because we have work for you."

Dean's eyebrows raised and his bully demeanor fell slightly. "Work. God has work for me."

"Yes."

Dean barked out a short, biting laugh. "Oh interesting. How's the pay? Good benefits? I'm telling ya, the dental plan I have right now sucks."

Castiel frowned slightly. "This is no laughing matter, Dean. My Father has chosen you."

Dean couldn't seem to find any words, disgusted and dumbfounded by the entire exchange. "Chosen him for what?" Alex asked, her voice betraying the stark fear she was feeling.

Castiel looked at her briefly, frustrating her with his elusive answer. "It's complicated. It is not yet your time to know. It's God's will."

"This is freakin' rich," Dean muttered. "You really expect us to believe all this crap you're spewing?"

Castiel looked between the two of them, his face beginning to show what looked like annoyance. "Yes." He paused. "What reason do you have to doubt?"

Dean laughed in a hard brief bark, shook his head, at a loss but at least amused by it. Alex wasn't sure whether to laugh or get pissed. "Are we being punked right now?" she asked, looking around. "Are there cameras here?" Castiel looked at her with a questioning gaze. No cameras came out, he didn't start to laugh and say "gotcha." He seemed totally serious, which was all the more disconcerting. Alex's humor faded. "Dude, you're a whackjob."
His eyes gazed into hers unflinchingly and Alex lost some of her bravado, disliking how it felt like he could see through her. Something about him turned her stomach and sent a chill down her spine, made her regret her insolence. His expression cleared a little as if he thought of something. "You've learned to use your voice well, haven't you Alex?" he asked evenly, knowingly. Caught off guard, Alex stared, slack-jawed. Castiel almost smiled at her then, his dry lips curving upwards just slightly, and it felt ominous to her, him looking at her like that.

"Come again?" Dean asked roughly, his protective hackles raising.

Castiel looked at Dean, became stern once more as he refocused the conversation. "In time, I will be free to reveal more to you. For now, you have to have faith. Both of you." He seemed to hear a sound to his left, and with no grand fanfare, he announced, "I have to go." He looked at Dean, and then Alex, holding her gaze intensely. His voice seemed to get even deeper. "I'll see you again soon." And without any further delay he was gone completely, disappearing from in front of them with a sound like the wind rustling through fabric.

In silence, the siblings looked at each other with stunned expressions. "Dude. Did... did that really just happen?" Dean asked, his shocked exasperation mirroring how Alex felt.

She felt like the wind had been knocked out of her. She looked back at the spot where Castiel had been standing just a minute ago, her mind racing as she tried to put together the pieces. She was shaken up, mind and body both. "Angels." She muttered, frowning, considering the possibility that angels were actually real. "Angels...?!!"

"Oh come on," Dean said insolently, daring her to be stupid enough to believe it.

Alex was feeling doubtful, not convinced that he was an angel, but not convinced that he wasn't. She was crouching down by Bobby now, checking his pulse and breathing. Both were normal. "Most people think demons aren't real," she offered tentatively, not even sure how she could begin to consider this.

Dean didn't look amused. In fact, he rolled his eyes. "Oh geez. Yeah right. That wasn't an angel."

"I mean the guy had wings," Alex said, then squinted, thought hard as she looked up and around again, at the burst lights on the ceiling, at the cracked bolt on the door. The whole encounter had left her dazed. "I think."

The pair didn't have a chance to discuss it any further. Bobby began to stir, groaning. Alex began to help him up, then Dean came and got his other arm, hauling him to his feet.

"Unnhh," Bobby groaned, dazed. "What happened?"

"Well Bobby, looks like you were just touched by an angel," Dean joked flatly, his face stretched into a sardonic, wry smile.

Bobby stared. "Come again?"
Ghosts of the Past

"All the wounds that are ever gonna scar me, for all the ghosts that are never gonna catch me."
- My Chemical Romance

Sioux Falls, South Dakota

"So did he look like an angel?" Sam asked, hanging onto every word. Dean was standing, arms crossed, pacing slowly, grumpy. Alex and Sam were sitting at Bobby's kitchen table on opposite sides.

Dean shook his head darkly. "No fluffy wings, no halo, no harp music. Definitely strong though. Super powered."

"He just looked like some average guy," Alex added. She was avoiding looking her twin in the eyes. Instead she was acting very interested in the coffee mug she cradled in both hands.

"I still can't believe you guys didn't tell me what you were doing last night," Sam said, a note of accusatory bitterness in his voice.

Alex gave him a look. That was rich. "Well maybe if you hadn't snuck off in the middle of the night, we might've—"

"I didn't sneak off, I was trying not to wake you guys. Why do you always assume I'm the bad guy?" He demanded, his voice rising in defensiveness.

"Are you PMSing?" Alex rolled her eyes and set the mug down on the table with more gusto than was needed.

"Shut up you two morons," Dean said, rubbing his temples. "I'm trying to think. You're getting on my last damn nerve." He was on edge, more frustrated than he had been in awhile. "Maybe he's some kind of super demon or something."

Sam seemed skeptical. "A demon who's immune to salt rounds and devil's traps... and Ruby's knife? Dean, Lilith is scared of that thing."

Getting even more agitated, Dean huffed, picking up the speed of his angry pacing. "Well don't you think that if angels were real, that some hunter somewhere would have seen one... at some point... ever?"

"Yeah. You just did, Dean," said Sam.

"I mean, maybe angels haven't walked the earth since ancient Biblical times or maybe they erase memories of the people they encounter, or—" Alex started, only to be glared at by Dean.

"Really, you guys? Really? I'm not gonna believe that this thing is a freaking 'angel of the Lord' because it says so! It has to be something else, okay?"

"You chuckleheads wanna keep arguing religion, or do you want to come take a look at this?" Bobby cut in, and the three of them were slightly chastened—Bobby had been so quiet in his study that they had forgotten he was there. "I got stacks of lore—Biblical, pre-Biblical. Some of it's in damn cuneiform. It all says an angel can snatch a soul from the pit," Bobby said, tapping a page of one of his books emphatically.

That piece of information caused a brief, loaded silence in the room. Then Dean crossed his arms, unwilling to be convinced. "Okay, but what else could've done it?"

"Airlift your ass outta the hot box? Far as I can tell, nothing."

Beside Dean, Sam looked encouraged. "Guys, this is good news. For once, this isn't just another round of demon crap. I mean, maybe Dean was saved by one of the good guys, you know?"

Alex looked at her twin brother sidelong. After meeting Castiel, she wasn't sure if angels were the good guys. He had seemed dangerous, not holy or angelic. However, she kept that thought to herself.

"Okay. Say it's true. Say there are angels. Then what? There's a God?" Dean scoffed.

Another can of worms right there for sure. "Geez Dean, can we just figure out angels first, then God?" Alex asked. She was serious, but she said it cynically for humorous effect.

"Fine," Dean said grudgingly. "What do we know about angels?"

Bobby got a little smirk on his face. He picked up a tall pile of ancient books and set them down with a loud thunk on the desk in front of Dean. "Start readin'."

Dean looked at the pile with resentment, then turned to Sam and Alex, cranky. "One of you clowns is gonna get me some pie."

"I'll do it," Sam said, sighing and grabbing the car keys.

Dean took a book off the top of the pile and had cracked it open like he was angry with it. "Care to join, Alexander?" He asked peevishly. He liked to use stupid nicknames whenever he was grumpiest. Weirdo.

She wordlessly took a book and gave him a meaningful, if not a little sassy glance while she did it.

And with that, they began paging through the books Bobby had pulled off the shelves. Alex never minded the research part of things. She was good at taking in a lot of information and figuring out how to apply it. She'd always liked reading ever since she'd learned.

Maybe thirty minutes later, Bobby swore softly as he ended a call on his cell phone. "Damn, she still won't answer."

"Who?" Dean asked, ready to be distracted from his reading.

"Olivia. She's a hunter friend of mine one state over. I've been trying to get her since angel-boy made his grand entry—she might have some leads on angels. But now I'm plain worried. It's just not like her not to call me back."

Alex was now interested too, peering at Bobby over the top of her book. "Do you think she might be in trouble?"

"Yeah," Bobby said, thought a long couple seconds, then stood up restlessly. "I should go check on her."
Dean was already snapping his book shut and standing up, seeming to be happy to find an excuse to get his nose out of the books. "We'll come with."

Alex, looked at Dean with a frown. "But there's research to do." She pointed to the tall stack of books waiting to be combed through.

"We can do it later," Dean retorted. She looked at him for a second, then back at the books.

"Why don't you guys go and I'll stay and sort the stacks?" She suggested. Dean, as predicted, didn't like the idea.

"You think I'm gonna let you stay here all by yourself?" He crossed his arms, daring her to fight him on the issue.

Alex looked at him over the top of the book both amused and challenging. "Yes, that's exactly what you're going to do. I'm going to sit here and scour all these books for angel stuff and when you get back in a day or two, I'll be an expert."

"No, I don't want you alone," Dean said. "Sam could stay with you."

Alex raised her eyebrows, becoming extremely serious. "No."

"Oh come on, aren't you two over your little spat yet?" he asked flippantly. Alex felt a genuine pang of sadness, losing a little of her fire momentarily. She stared at the books pages unseeingly. It wasn't a little spat. It was... not speaking to each other for four months. Dean inhaled heavily, relenting slightly, not needing her to say anything because he saw his answer in her quietness. "Then I'll stay with you."

At this point Alex softened—he was just trying to look out for her. "Dean—I'll be fine. You've left me alone tons of times before. You and Bobby and Sam go investigate and I'll do the boring stuff." She jerked her thumb toward the books. He looked at the books with slight distaste, mulling it over.

"She'll be fine here, Dean," Bobby added. "In fact, she might be safer here than with us. This place's basically Fort Knox."

Reluctantly, Dean agreed. "Yeah. All right."

---

The Next Day

_In the AD 400's the Greek philosopher Dionysius the Areopagite described a hierarchy of angels. Based on his writings, angels are traditionally ranked in nine orders. The highest order of angels is the seraphim, followed by the cherubim, thrones, dominions, virtues, powers, principalities, archangels, and angels.

According to this system, the first circle of angels—the seraphim, cherubim, and thrones—devote their time to contemplating God. The second circle—the dominions, virtues, and powers—govern the universe. The third circle—principalities, archangels, and angels—carry out the orders of the superior angels._

Alex looked up from the book she had in front of her and blinked several times, tired and glazed over. She glanced at the clock and realized she had been doing this all day. Scrawled notes on scrap paper were strewn all over the desk, and several volumes were open. She rolled her shoulders, sore from hunching over and reading. Her head was now packed full of angel mythology.
and lore, but she couldn't be sure what parts were real or not. It was mostly speculation and hearsay, but if Alex had learned one thing being raised in the hunter life, it was that most myths and legends came from an element of truth; sometimes a large element of truth, sometimes small. She didn't feel like telling Dean, but she was beginning to believe that Castiel really was what he said. There didn't seem to be anything else he could be. However, it was disappointing as she had pictured angels to be... different. As glowy, poetic, gentle and soothing beings with fluffy white wings. Not as... a somewhat robotic invincible guy who showed up and knocked out your friends then told you God had work for you.

She briefly remembered Castiel's promise: "I'll see you again soon." In his deep voice and under his piercing gaze, the words had seemed almost like a threat. She wasn't sure how she felt about that.

She shook her head tiredly and decided it was time for more coffee. She got up and cranked up Bobby's ancient coffee maker in the kitchen, and that's when she thought of Dad's journal—maybe it had some kind of clue to angels. Maybe she could find something there. She left the coffee brewing and went into Bobby's guest room—her room for the past few months. The small room had a bed, a dresser, and an old mirrored bureau. Her oversized duffel bag was plunked onto the bureau. She had never been in the habit of unpacking clothes, ever, as almost every day they were leaving the place they had been the day before.

Alex dug through the beat up duffel in search of the journal. All of her worldly possessions were right here—old socks, torn jeans, and few faded t-shirts (some were Dean's old band shirts from middle school), the odd knick-knack or memento. The whistle on a silver chain that she used to wear around her neck (Dad insisted, so she could always whistle for help), an oversized manilla envelope of some of her old notebooks she had used to talk to people with (her one-sided conversation collection, she called it). Her fingers bumped up against a small square of paper in the bottom of the duffel bag, and momentarily forgetting her journal hunt, she pulled it out, turning over the yellowing envelope in her hands. Family Pictures was scrawled across the front in Dad's handwriting. There was only one photo inside.

It was a picture of Mom standing out in the yard, holding her baby twins, one in each arm on either hips. She was smiling broadly. The twin on the right was staring blankly into the camera, and the twin on the left was chewing on his or her hand—Alex wasn't sure which one was her. Little Dean was standing beside Mom, arms at his sides, squinting at the camera. Alex searched her mother's face in the photo, trying to remember her. But she didn't, not at all. She wondered who had taken the photo. It had probably been Dad, since he wasn't in the picture. Or, he might have been gone at the time... that would match up with the rest of her life.

Alex tucked the photo back into the envelope and pulled out the journal from where it was nestled in the bottom of her bag. The familiar shape and weight of it always brought bittersweet feelings to her. She had been writing down some of their latest travels and encounters for the past few years, ever since Dad disappeared and then died. Seeing the page where Dad's handwriting ended and hers began always brought a moment of somber reflection.

The sound of her phone ringing in the study shook her from her thoughts and she hurried to answer it, journal in hand.

"Hey Dean," she greeted.

"Alex," he said, and even from that single word, she knew something was wrong. "You okay?" he asked.

"Yeah, I'm fine. What is it?" She set the journal down on the study desk, listening intently.
"Something freaky," he said. "Some kind of vengeful spirit on steroids. A bunch of hunters this way are dead—I mean ripped apart dead. And Sammy just got attacked in the friggin' bathroom of this random gas station by the ghost of Henriksen."

"What?!" Alex's chest clenched in panic. "Oh my god—is he okay?"

"He's fine. No thanks to me. I should have called you sooner, but I had no idea these spirits were mobile."

Alex stopped, frowned, confused. "But... ghosts can't just show up where they want. How is that even possible for Henriksen's ghost to be at a random gas station?"

"That's what we're trying to figure out. Bobby should be back to you before we are, maybe a couple hours. We're a little further out. Get the salt, get the iron, blockade yourself in, you got it? I'm pretty sure all hunters are targets right now."

Alex pictured her brothers, far away from her and being hunted by vengeful ghosts, and her stomach turned in pain. "Damn. Okay, you guys be careful. I'll be fine."

She heard a heavy, gusty breath. "You better be." He sounded pissed at himself. "I knew I shouldn't have let you stay behind."

"Relax. I'm gonna go get the salt and iron now." Alex paused, thinking of Sam getting attacked. She swallowed, cleared her throat. "And, uh, tell Sam I, uh... love him."

Dean paused a little awkwardly. "Uh, okay. See you soon."

"And Dean?"

"Yeah?"

"I, uh, loveyoutoo." She hung up fast, not giving him a chance to reply. She wasn't super into expressing her feelings. It had felt necessary right then, but it still left her feeling highly awkward. She let out a breath and shook herself.

She began scrolling through her contacts to call Bobby and see how far away he was. Eyes glued to the phone, she turned around. But when she bumped up against a solid form, she shrieked, jumped back, and dropped the phone all at once, staring at the person in front of her in complete shock.

Unblinking, Castiel looked back at her, appearing just the same as he had the other night—trench coat, business suit, wild hair, blank expression. "You're not safe here," he announced, and reached out for her.

"Whoa don't touch me!" Alex warned, jumping back, her heart hammering from sudden adrenaline.

Her reaction caused him pause. "Do you assume... that I would hurt you?" he asked, seeming to be confused. She just stared at him then made a face—like, um, yeah I assume you might hurt me. I don't even know you. He looked slightly irked at her reaction. "Alex, if I wanted to hurt you, you wouldn't be able to stop me," he said.

Cocky son of a bitch, wasn't he. She raised her eyebrows. "Well that sure as hell wouldn't stop me from trying, angel wings."

His eyes narrowed just slightly, as if he didn't understand. "My name is Castiel, not 'angel wings."

She paused for a beat, thrown off. "Uh, yeah, I get that," she said tersely, "now go away."

He seemed mildly perplexed. "I don't have time for this. Take my hand." He held out his hand to her and she looked at it like it was diseased.

"Uh what?" Alex was growing more confused by the second. She edged away from him even more. "Shouldn't you be bugging Dean about becoming a servant of God? He's not even here."

Castiel ignored her attitude. "I know that. I've been ordered to protect you."

Alex could have done a double take at that admission. "...What? Why? Since when?"

"The reason why was not made known to me," he replied with no emotion. "Something about you makes you important to my Father."

Alex looked at him weirdly. Was he joking? She shook her head, feeling extremely suspicious. This just didn't feel right. First Dean, and now her? This was getting ridiculous.

He held out his hand again, but she stood her ground, silently refusing. A muscle jerked in his cheek—was that impatience? "I won't force you to come with me," he said. "But I highly advise you to. You're in grave danger."

"I'm _always_ in grave danger," she countered sarcastically, to which his frown deepened slightly. "I told you. I don't want your help—get lost. I'm not gonna say it again."

He stared at her for a couple seconds blankly, then clear annoyance showed. "Fine," he said, and in a blink of the eye, he was gone, leaving Alex in shocked silence. _What... the... hell. Weird._

Remembering Dean's phone call and her promise to arm herself, she turned to go downstairs where all the weapons were—and not only them, but the panic room she and Bobby had built two months ago—but before she could take a single step, the radio suddenly turned on, crackling on white noise. _Uh oh_. Alex slowly looked over at the radio, her blood beginning to pump through her veins quicker. The lights flickered on and off, once, then twice. And then, she felt it. The room had gone cold—ice cold. She exhaled, her breath a small cloud in front of her. "Ah crap," she whispered, cursing herself for not grabbing a weapon already. She could feel a strange presence behind her, and she swallowed nervously. The hairs on the back of her neck were standing straight up. Alex braced herself, turning around slowly, unsure of who would be standing there, just knowing she was in the presence of a ghost.

A small young woman with dark hair and delicate features gazed back at her. She was dressed modestly, her hair parted precisely and braided neatly to the side. A small silver cross hung around her neck. Recognition dawned on Alex. "N-Nancy?"

"Hello, Alex," said Nancy. She looked very pretty, even with the pale, cool cast that death had left on her ghost. Alex recalled with growing horror that Nancy had been one of Lilith's most recent victims—killed mercilessly after helping Alex and her brothers narrowly escape the clutch of death.

Alex swallowed. "You, uh... don't look so good," she said lamely.

"Yeah, well, death does strange things to a girl," Nancy replied, her voice too cheerful and too pleasant, resulting in a strange, sinister quality.

"I'm... sorry you died," Alex offered honestly, even as she was trying to think of what nearby would work as a weapon.
"Me too," Nancy said with dramatic sadness, and she sighed. "It was the worst pain I ever experienced." She became more somber, the air of theatre leaving her voice in favor of dark anger. "Lilith flayed my skin off me, bit by bit. It was agony—pure agony. Where were you? You should have saved me. I needed to be saved." Alex felt herself grimacing, knowing exactly where this was going. She was slowly, slowly edging sideways and backward, where she knew the iron fireplace tools rested. "I died a virgin, you know," Nancy said sadly. Her eyes seemed to darken, and a menacing little smile crept across her face, and her voice went soft and sing-song. "And so will you."

Alex's stomach lurched in total surprise and she froze. "How the hell do you know—" she stammered, and Nancy smirked, rolling her eyes. Alex was dumbfounded and mortified, set off balance by the knowledge that this random vengeful ghost knew her most humiliating secret.

"Oh, Alex, you're so precious. I know everything about you. How you feel so inadequate and long so badly for a chance to prove yourself to your brothers, and for a chance to be noticed by the big, beautiful world out there..." Nancy smirked, clearly enjoying Alex's horrified expression. "Poor little Alexandra, she never did have friends like the other little kids, did she? I mean, who wanted to be seen with the weird little silent girl? Every new school, same old story... how did it feel to be ignored and written off your whole childhood?" Nancy laughed. "And forget the possibility of a boyfriend... what did you have to offer?" She cocked her head to the side. "The same thing you have now. Nothing."

Alex's insides burned from anger and shame as Nancy continued on, throwing verbal barbs with obvious pleasure. "No one liked you then, because you were defective. And no one likes you now, either, because even though some power-that-be restored your voice, you're still the same. Broken. Weird. Freak." Out of the corner of Alex's eye, to her left just a bit more near the fireplace, was the fire poker and shovel. She wet her lips, wondering if she could make it. It was now or never. "You're a total freak," Nancy repeated, pleased with the verbal whipping she had just delivered.

"Look who's talking, bitch," Alex spat back. Nancy's expression turned to stone even as Alex grabbed the fire poker and wildly swung it like a baseball bat at the space that Nancy's apparition occupied. The ghost's image dissipated like smoke at the blow.

"Ouch," Nancy said, giggling, and Alex whirled to see Nancy standing behind her, looking smug. "You know, the night I died at the police station, I really appreciated you speaking up and offering yourself instead of me, Alex. Oh wait... that's right! You didn't," her expression became deadly for a moment, before she resumed speaking in her perky, enthusiastic tone. She advanced on Alex slowly. "I mean, two virgins in one place... what are the odds, right? You coward. You could have saved us all." The clock struck three in Bobby's study behind them and Nancy dipped her chin down, smiled broadly without showing teeth. "Well well well, look at the time. It's your turn to die."

Alex again swiped the poker wildly and Nancy's apparition melted into the air, but then reappeared behind Alex and slammed her across the room, smashing her face-first into the kitchen counter where she and a bunch of stuff from on the counter tumbled to the ground. Alex groaned, pain blossoming in her ribcage as she struggled to get up. Rolling to a stop near her foot was a large can of kosher salt. Alex snatched the can up despite the stabbing pain in her ribs. Nancy was approaching slowly, her expression enraged. Without even touching her, Nancy flipped Alex around wildly like a rag doll, and sent her slamming back to the floor, face down. There was a horrible cracking sound as her chin hit the floor, and Alex screamed in pain, only just managing to hold onto the can of salt.

Nancy began dragging Alex, who was opening the top of the salt in clumsy desperation, the blinding pain overwhelming her motor skills. She jerked the can hard over her shoulder, sending a huge spray of salt backwards at Nancy. Weakened, Nancy flickered out for a few seconds, giving Alex enough time to scramble to her feet and run staggeringly to the basement, down the stairs, and toward the iron panic room. All without sight or sound of Nancy—until Alex rounded the corner and saw Nancy standing in front of the door of the panic room, grinning wickedly. "Running from your problems is never a true solution, now is it?"

Again, she sent Alex flying backwards at full force. Alex crashed hard into the staircase, sideways —more pain exploded in her side and Alex heard screams of agony—then realized they were her own. She crumpled to the ground onto all fours, barely able to breathe from the shooting pain in his ribcage. She was still gripping the can of salt in one hand for dear life. She saw Nancy's feet in front of her, and then felt the ghost lifting her by two fistfuls of Alex's jacket. "You. Should. Have.
Saved. Me!" Nancy roared, all the former playfulness gone and replaced with sheer rage. Wheezing and gasping for air against the pain, Alex turned her hand and shook the entire remaining contents of the salt container onto Nancy's apparition, and she fell to the ground as the apparition dissolved, shrieking in anger. With a speed she hadn't know she possessed, Alex raced the final few steps, yanked the door of the panic room open, and slammed it behind her, shaking violently. Adrenaline fading, she collapsed into a sprawled sitting position on the floor, barely able to breathe—were her ribs broken? Were her lungs punctured? She could barely see from the pain. She wrapped her arms around herself, teeth gritted in torment. She could taste blood in her mouth and her chin and jaw feel broken, shooting pains were running through her entire face and neck.

"Oh Al-eeeex," came Nancy's sing song voice on the other side of the wall. "Don't mind me. I'll just wait out here for you. I have allllll day, Alex. And when your brothers get here to save you..." she trailed off and laughed, a soft, haunting sound full of foreboding.

Alex sobbed, gasping. It was like breathing through a straw. She wondered if she were dying—her chest felt strange and heavy, and the world was spinning oddly in front of her. She was going to pass out soon, she was pretty sure. She'd passed out enough times in her lifetime to recognize the horrible lead-up.

"I told you there was danger," came a deep voice, and Alex swore in surprise, flailing backwards up against the wall. She almost fell over as she looked up into the grim face of Castiel. He crouched down in front of her. "Hold still," he commanded, reaching for her.

"W-what are you going to—"

"Trust me, Alex." He looked into her eyes and she went still and stared at him, breathless and pained and unsure. His face had an actual expression on it. He seemed imploring, vaguely concerned. He held her gaze a moment longer, then his hand, warm and solid, came to rest over the area just above her stomach, and soothing white light came out of his hand, startling Alex.
Underneath his hand and inside her muscles, bones, skin, she could feel a strange and fiery sensation. Not unpleasant, but so foreign that she didn't know how to process it. She looked at his hand there on her ribs, the light glowing beneath it, then back at him—he was looking at his hand in intense concentration. When the light died away, Alex realized all the pain in her ribs was gone, that she could breathe fine.

Stunned, she looked at him in a new kind of awe, unable to hide her surprise. There, again, was that almost-smile he'd given her the other day. His hand came up to cup her chin, his thumb lightly resting on the center of it and she jumped slightly at the unexpected touch of his hand. Again, warm light, a fiery sensation, and his frowning stare was on her chin, not her eyes. She stared at his face as he healed her, because without his eyes studying her, it was safe to do such. He was handsome, more handsome than she remembered noticing before. He had a clefted chin and defined jaw; his nose was strong and pleasant, his brow fierce and broad. He had strange, wide lips that offset those brilliant blue eyes. Eyes that appeared to be both weary and curious all at once. Age lines scattered his face, but somehow he still seemed boyish and youthful to her. His eyes moved up and met hers right then, like he felt her gaze. Alex looked away quickly, realizing that her chin and jaw were normal, fine. Healed.

"T-thank you," she said softly, feeling very odd indeed... humbled by his help and a little stupid for not listening to him in the first place. She chanced a glance at him.

"You're welcome," he replied, his deep voice sending chills up her spine again. His hand then fell away, but his intense gaze did not. Alex suddenly felt that he was too close. Much, much too close. As if he read her mind, he stood up and offered her a hand. Usually she never would have accepted the help, but a little awed by and indebted to the man—no, angel—who had just saved her life, she took the hand and stood, feeling as though she were in the presence of a superhero or god, almost. However, she would immediately regret the trust she'd placed in him by giving him her hand.

Even before she had finished standing, she heard a strange, metallic clicking and felt something cold snap onto her wrist—handcuffs?! Castiel locked the other half onto the gun rack that was bolted into the wall with surprising speed. "Hey—what the hell?" Alex exclaimed in alarm. "What are you doing?! Take this off of me!"

"I just saved your life," he replied, as if commenting on the weather. "Twice." He held up a small silver key, showing it to her, and then placed it on the little desk at the other end of the room, far from her reach. "Do not leave this room. You'll be safe here."

"Hey!" But he was gone again, leaving Alex frantically tugging at the handcuffs.

"Castiel! CASTIEL!" she shouted as she rattled the cuffs in desperation—but he didn't reappear, and no answer came to her screams. She had no phone, was surrounded by ghosts, and was locked in the basement where Bobby couldn't hear. She was unable to warn anyone in any way. She yanked at her restraints again, howling in frustration. "Son of a bitch!"
After shouting herself hoarse and no sign of Castiel (or anyone, for that matter), Alex finally gave up and resorted to fuming about being handcuffed to the gun rack. She wanted to be thankful for being so miraculously healed—she was pretty sure she had been dying before Castiel had touched her—but knowing her brothers and Bobby would be walking into a death trap with no warning had left her in quite the state.

For awhile, she tried to get the handcuffs off, at first by grabbing a shotgun to maybe shoot the chain in half—but as her luck would have it, none of the guns in her reach were loaded and the ammo was on the other side of the room where she couldn't get to it. She tried awkwardly pounding at the chain of the cuffs with the butt of the gun, but that didn't work either. She pulled as hard as she could, trying to get the rack to separate from the wall where she could then drag herself over and get the key, which was maddeningly close but out of reach. Unfortunately no amount of tugging or twisting did anything to the chain or to the rack. She felt her head for bobby pins—she hadn't put one in for weeks, but she was desperate, thinking maybe there was one there, and if there were, maybe she could use it to pick the lock. No such luck. After awhile, she was forced to give up trying escape. Angry tears pricked her eyes as she realized she was completely helpless and stuck.

Habitually, she began to say a prayer for help—it was an impulse she had retained from childhood, Sam had sometimes prayed aloud for her. The second she started, Alex stopped short, appalled. It had been, after all, a supposed angel who had handcuffed her there and then left her without help. She wanted to scream—she had not imagined angels to be like this. Instead of screaming in frustration, she growled and muttered foul things aimed at Castiel, then became despondent and sullen. She resigned herself to the fact that she just had to wait and hope that Bobby and her brothers would be able to make it down to her before any more ghosts attacked. She focused on deep breathing and staying calm. Losing her shit wasn't going to help anyone.

She fiddled with the ring on her index finger in frustration—it was Dad's silver wedding band. Even though her mom had been dead for all but six months of Alex's life, she had never seen Dad without the ring. When he died, Sam and Dean gave it to her. After getting it resized, it had never left her hand. She wore it to remember him by, even though most of the memories were bitter and tainted and painful. He was still her father. And she had loved him very much, in between the more complicated feelings.

Dad had been many things. Negligent as a parent was one of them. He had been gone for a lot of long periods, missed important things and moments, placed Dean in the unfair position of parent to Sam and Alex, had constantly disappointed his children day in and day out. He'd saved their lives countless times—but had also endangered their lives countless times. But one thing he'd never done was step out on them forever. Over the years, Alex had come to view that as loyalty, more or less. Still, Alex had often wondered if she'd missed out on something—she'd seen a lot of kids as they passed through town after town, kids who had parents who seemed so involved in their children's lives, so caring and present. She had never and would never know what that was like. She had a lot of pain associated with the memory of her dad, a lot of confusion and deep, raw wounds. She left them alone, because ignoring them was easiest. Sometimes she wasn't sure why she still wore the wedding band, but taking it off didn't seem to make sense, either. There was love there yes, but there were many confused, hurt feelings there too.

When she was eighteen and Sam left for college, things had changed in the Winchester family. For the worse in some ways and the better in others—Dad seemed to have some kind of wake-up call, and for the next few years had finally included Alex in most of the jobs they did and finally treated her somewhat like an adult. She sometimes wondered if he had replaced Sam with her, but she'd never gotten up the courage to write him and ask about it—she had just been so glad to finally be doing something. Instead of being left behind in a motel or being the getaway driver or doing long-range surveillance, she was a full-fledged part of the family business and had finally seen her dad more than once every few weeks. She got to know Dad pretty well those last few years. They still hadn't been that close—it was hard to be close to a father who had hurt you and been absent for so much of your life—but they were making tiny little steps toward maybe, possibly undoing a lifetime of damage. Then, he had disappeared.

Alex wasn't sure how to describe the way she felt about Dad. She wished she had known him better. She hated many of the things he had done and not done. She desperately loved him and idolized him for other things. She wished he could have heard her speak. Just once. Never being able to actually speak with your father wasn't fair. But then again, none of her life had been. Losing him was one of the greatest pains in her life, and also one of her greatest reminders of why she chose to be a hunter. Because she refused to allow his life and legacy to be wasted. The world was in short supply of those willing to face and fight the undead.

She heard noise outside the door and tensed, ready for a fight, although it might not go so well. She swallowed, heart racing. If it were anyone besides her brothers or Bobby... but the door creaked open and Bobby was peering in, then upon seeing her, exclaiming, "The hell...?"

With Bobby were two familiar faces. "Oh my god—" Sam rushed to her, aghast. "What happened? Why are you—"

"Who did this?!" Dean thundered, looking for someone to rip the head off of.

"Are you guys okay?" Alex asked, yanking at her handcuffs and anxiously motioning to the table where the key was. "Get these off of me!" She commanded.

"Alex, who did this?" Sam repeated Dean's question, clearly pissed as hell. She shocked everyone when she told them, "Castiel." Dean fiddled with the lock and the tiny key as she tried to explain everything quickly to the very angry looking men. "He—I—he showed up and told me I was in danger, that God told him that he was supposed to protect me, I told him get lost, Nancy's total bitch of a ghost attacked me and almost killed me, I made it in here, Castiel magically healed me, and then he handcuffed me to the damn gun rack." The handcuffs fell off as Dean finally succeeded and Alex sighed in relief, rubbing her wrist thankfully. "Long story short, I'm annoyed but I'm fine. What about you guys?"

Sam had a gash above his eye, Bobby appeared shaken up, Dean looked more tense than usual. Dean ignored her question. "He told you he was assigned to protect you?" he asked suspiciously.

"And he healed you?" Sam repeated. Both of them sounded totally skeptical. Sam looked around as if noticing the room for the first time. "And Bobby... is this a panic room?!"

Bobby shrugged modestly and Dean glanced at him briefly. "Bobby. You're awesome." His gaze was back on Alex now, and he looked severe. He got very pissy when he felt uninformed. "But more to the point, you need to tell us exactly what happened here, Al. Now."
Alex explained in more detail as fast as she could everything that had happened—recounted Castiel's bizarre appearance and speech about protection, Nancy's attack (she left out the details of Nancy's exact words to her), Castiel's reappearance and how he had healed her with just two touches, and then the handcuffing. Needless to say, her brothers were not pleased about that. Dean was straight up pissed, while Sam tried to come up with some theories on the reasoning behind Castiel restraining Alex. Not wanting to dwell on it, Alex demanded they fill her in on their end of everything. Basically, after finding other hunters shredded by ghosts and then Sam's attack in the bathroom, the three men had realized something was after hunters in particular and hurried back. Bobby had made it first and been trapped by some angry little girl's spirits in the salvage yard until Sam had managed to get him free. Dean had been looking for Alex when he too was confronted by the spirit of Henriksen.

"When we first got here and couldn't find you anywhere... we thought maybe they got you," Sam said. His voice hitched slightly, and Alex finally met her twin's gaze for the first time in months without glaring or frowning. She was reminded of how much she really did love him and how guilty she felt about the crap status of their relationship lately. It didn't matter that they were at odds, fighting, and mad at each other. She would take a bullet for him, hands down, even now.

"I was just pretty freaked that I couldn't get out of here to warn you," she replied. She thought about losing one or both of her brothers again and couldn't bear it. "Really glad you're okay," Sam nodded, and they shared a truce of a smile in that moment.

"Well, we're all in one piece," Dean said. "But I think we're all lucky to still be breathing." It was what they were all thinking.

Bobby, who had settled at his little desk with a book, looked up at her. "Kids, can we continue this conversation over some arts 'n crafts? We need to get some salt and iron rounds ready. Can't stay in this little room forever."

The Winchesters set to work prepping the rounds quietly. Alex shared some of the highlights of her angel mythos research—angels appeared in most major mythologies and religions, angels always came with the assumption of a god in charge of them, they had powers of healing and were somewhere between corporeal and not. Dean listened with a sour expression on his face, and when she concluded, there was a long silence as everyone digested.

"So, if angels are real, then God is too. Right?" Dean muttered, seemingly to himself. Another long silence passed. "No. See, this is why I can't get behind God."

Sam gave his brother an odd look. "Huh?"

"If he doesn't exist, fine. Bad crap happens to good people. That's how it is. There's no rhyme or reason—just random, horrible, evil—I get it, okay. I can roll with that. But if he is out there, what's wrong with him?" Dean threw his arms wide. "Where the hell is he while all these decent people are getting torn to shreds? How's he live with himself? You know, why doesn't he help?"

Alex snorted. "That's what you and every other philosopher ever wants to know," she said with a cursory glance his way as she shoved more rock salt into the shell she was holding. Sam remained in silent discomfort, mulling over Dean's rant.

"Found it," Bobby said, breaking the silence.

"Found what?" Sam asked.

"The symbol you saw—the brand on the ghosts... it's the Mark of the Witness."
"What symbol?" Alex asked. Bobby held up the page and tapped a strange little symbol there.

"I saw it on Henriksen," Sam explained. "On his wrist. Did Nancy have one?"

Alex frowned. She hadn't seen it, but Nancy's skin had been covered up entirely except for her hands, part of her neck, and face. "She might've—I didn't notice it though."

"Well, it's the mark of the unnatural," Bobby explained. "None of them died what you'd call ordinary deaths. See, these ghosts—they were forced to rise. They woke up in agony. They were like rabid dogs. It ain't their fault. Someone rose them... on purpose."

An ominous assertion. "Who would do that?" Sam asked.

"Do I look like I know? But whoever it was used a spell so powerful it left a mark, a brand on their souls. Whoever did this had big plans. It's called 'the rising of the witnesses.' It figures into an ancient prophecy."

Intrigued, Alex stopped loading rounds.

"From where?" Dean asked, his tone decidedly suspicious.

"Well, the widely distributed version's just for tourists, you know. But long story short—the book of Revelations." The bible. Alex felt her face growing a little less enthused. "This is a sign, kids."

"A sign of what?" Sam and Dean chorused as their sister looked on in apprehension.

Bobby cleared his throat. "The apocalypse."

Silence. Everyone stared at Bobby, wondering if he were joking. Dean broke the silence. "Apocalypse? The apocalypse? The four horsemen, pestilence, five-dollar-a-gallon-gas apocalypse?"

"No, the other one," Bobby said sarcastically. "Yes, that one. The rise of the witnesses is a—I dunno, a mile marker."

Alex gaped, and Dean looked dubious.

"Okay... so what do we do?" Sam asked. He sounded dazed.

"Road trip. Grand Canyon, Star Trek Experience. Bunny Ranch." Dean said, getting a dirty look from Sam and an eye roll from Alex.

"First things first," Bobby said. "How about we survive our friends out there? This here's a spell," he indicated the paper in front of him, "to send the witnesses back to rest. Should work."

"Should. Great." Sam commented wryly.

"If I translate it correctly. I think I got everything we need here at the house."

"Any chance you got everything we need here in this room?" Dean asked a little hopefully.

"So, you thought our luck was gonna start now all of a sudden?" Bobby said. "Spell's gotta be cast over an open fire."

"The fireplace in the study?" Alex asked reluctantly.
"Bingo."

"That's just not as appealing as a, uh, ghost-proof panic room, you know?" Dean looked uncharacteristically nervous.

"Nope," Bobby said, and snapped the book shut and put it under his arm. "Everyone load up a shotgun."

They almost didn't succeed in casting the spell and sending the ghosts back. It was like the entire house had been possessed—angry spirits seemed to be around every corner—familiar faces of people who had died when the Winchesters had gotten involved in their lives. After fighting their way to the study and salt-circling themselves in, Bobby had sent Sam after a hex box upstairs and Dean into the kitchen for ingredients. Alex and Bobby could see Dean from where they were, but when the ghost attacks became more violent, Alex had raced up the stairs, afraid for Sam who was by himself.

She stopped short at the top of the stairs when she heard a female voice around the corner and down the hallway "...what you're doing with that demon, Ruby..." Alex's breath seemed to stop and she shrank back, confused. "How many innocent bodies has Ruby burned through for kicks?" the voice continued. A voice she recognized as the demon Meg. "How many girls just like me? And you don't send her back to Hell? You're a monster!" There was a pause, and then Alex jumped when a rifle blast sounded. Holy shit, was Sam fucking around with the demon Ruby? Alex turned and ran back down the stairs, shaken to the core. Downstairs, she found Henriksen's ghost attempting to rip Dean's heart out. She blasted through the ghost with her shotgun and dragged a rattled Dean back to the salt circle, where Sam had just returned. With all four of them together, the angry spirits were drawn like flies to honey.

They barely survived the following attack and just barely managed to cast the spell in time to save their own skin.

Now, the four hunters were exhausted, sore, and in shock after battling so many ghosts at once. Bobby had retired to his room to rest (one does tend to need a little time after a ghost attempts to rip out your internal organs) and Dean declared he was going to take a damn shower. This left the twins to themselves. Pretty much as soon as they were alone, Alex had demanded that Sam follow her outside.

She led him in stony silence to the junk yard, and turned on him, not bothering to hide her anger.

"What's up?" He asked in a guarded tone, looking at her cautiously. He was already on defensive, his hands shoved in his pockets.

"What's up?" She repeated incredulously. "Sam, why don't you tell me why Meg seemed to think you're still palling around with Ruby?" The two names she dropped made Sam's face falter in clear, caught out surprise. "You told Dean that Ruby was dead." Alex accused. Still, she tried to do the right thing and give him some small benefit of the doubt. "Is Ruby still alive, Sam?"

Sam swallowed, wet his lips, and it looked like he was attempting to come up with an answer. "You heard that," he said, then cleared his throat and shrugged his shoulders, trying nonchalance. "Well, uh, Meg's ghost lied. She was just making stuff up to try and get me mad."

Alex felt insulted—she was being lied to. Her voice took on a tight, growling quality as she tried her damndest to give him another chance to tell the truth. "Sam, Nancy knew everything about me. Everything. Why would Meg lie?"
Sam was getting irritated and his hands were out of his pockets so that he could talk with his hands by using abrupt, sharp gestures. "Well I don't know what to tell you, what Meg said isn't true."

"Stop lying!" Alex exploded, completely losing her cool at this point and using her hands, too, spreading them wide in an are you kidding me gesture. "How the hell can you lie to my face like that, huh? I know what I heard! What is with you, Sam?" She was so angry that she was shaking and she pointed an accusing finger at him, tried lowering her voice. "You've been acting all kinds of weird ever since Dean got back and sneaking off and I'm—"

Sam cut her off, short on patience. "Okay, Alex look, fine!" He let his hands go wide and slap against his sides as he admitted the truth. "Yeah, Ruby helped me out for awhile after I left you and Bobby." His face was twisting into an insolent look, like she was inconveniencing him at the moment. "What's the big freaking deal?"

"Helped you out?" Alex repeated.

"Yeah, like before. She helped me track stuff down and look for ways to bring Dean back. Uh, I lost touch with her like a month ago I guess." Sam sighed loudly, taking a minute and regulating. He was beginning to look genuinely sorry instead of just pissed. "Alex—just, just please try and understand... I was in a dark place. I lost my big brother. And I lost my little sister, too." He was trying to give her one of those sad puppy faces he did, but she crossed her arms and looked away. He couldn't undo the lies and hurt with a sad face aimed her way. "I did all kinds of crazy crap," Sam continued desperately, earnestly. "But Dean's back and I'm on the straight and narrow! Promise."

Alex looked at him again, in the eye. He looked hopeful and vulnerable, like he really meant what he'd said. Looking at her twin—a person she was supposed to be close to, to be able to trust—she felt her heart sinking. She really didn't know him anymore and Alex shook her head, overwhelmed and unsure how they had come to this. "I can't tell when you're telling the truth anymore." She spoke the words softly, but when she said them, he looked like he'd been hit by a ton of bricks. Maybe he realized what she just had.

He grew stoic, the hopefulness he'd had a moment before gone. When he spoke again, he avoided looking at her. "Look. Can you just not tell Dean about this? He's not too happy with me right now and this would just make it worse."

Alex chuckled sharply, bitterly. "No kidding."

Sam was beginning to beg now, his eyebrows drawing together intently. "Please, Alex. How many times have I covered for you in the past?" Alex darkened a little. She had to admit that was true. Sam's voice softened earnestly. "I'll tell him, soon. I promise."

Alex was disappointed, angry, heartbroken, and over the conversation. She grew gruff, refusing to show how sad she was. "Yeah, fine. You tell him. Cuz if you don't, I will." She had to fight not to cry at this point. "I'll tell him all about how you left your sister to work with some fucking demon instead." She turned around and began to stalk away, her world yet again shattered. She didn't look back. If she had, she would have seen that her brother was just as torn up and heartbroken about it as she was. Maybe even more.

Dean and Sam crashed in the living room late that night after going through Alex's notes on all the angelic crap she'd sifted through when they had been gone gone. Alex had shut herself in the guest room hours and hours ago, clearly not happy about something or another. Dean knew she'd come around. She always did.
He listened to the sound of Sam's deep, even breathing and smiled to himself despite everything. Down the hall, Alex was asleep in her room, safe and sound, and nearby, his goofy dork brother was snoring softly. Even though the twins were in rare form right now, having them close to him again was so much more comforting than he wanted to admit. When he had gotten out of the shower, he'd found Sam sulking in the study on his laptop, clearly wanting to be left alone... and Alex had been out in the junk yard nonchalantly smashing old car headlights with a hammer and drinking Jack. Funny how his siblings chose to deal with their latest near death experience. But, their prerogative.

Dean laid awake for a long time, trying to decide if he could believe in angels or not. He believed in demons, he knew those suckers were real... but he wasn't so sure about angels. Dean's mind turned to his years in Hell. To his brother and sister, it had been a little under five months. It had been so much longer there for him. He ground his teeth as he tried not to think of the pain, the torment, the utter hopelessness he had endured. The scorching heat, the screams, the never-ending pain and suffering. He suddenly woke, a little confused, not even realizing he had been asleep. Sam was still sleeping deeply on the couch, and silver slats of moonlight lined the floor. The house was silent.

Dean sat up, looking around, feeling like he was being watched. That's when he saw a familiar silhouette in the kitchen. Dean got up, on guard, and silently went into the kitchen, where Castiel leaned casually up again the kitchen counter. He looked exactly like he had before—stern, and maybe a little constipated, too. "Excellent job with the witnesses," Castiel said, not bothering with pleasantries.

"You knew about that?" Dean asked, a little taken aback. He shouldn't have been surprised, he guessed, and got gruff. "You know, a heads up would have been nice. Oh and thanks a whole lot for handcuffing my sister to the damn wall. What was that all about?"

"I saved her life," Castiel said without batting an eye.

"By trapping her in a panic room?" Dean was flabbergasted at the dude's nonchalance.

Castiel looked at him for several beats, his blue eyes narrowing just slightly. "If I hadn't made sure she stayed in that room, Nancy's spirit would have killed her easily when Alex left the room to assist you. And Alex would have left the panic room to do such. It was a certainty." Castiel's mouth twitched as if in impatience. "I didn't enjoy having to restrain your very stubborn sister. If she had just listened, it would have been much more pleasant." He looked at Dean almost contemptuously. "You're welcome."

Dean smirked slightly. That was Alex—stubborn as hell. And it was kind of funny to see the angel guy annoyed over it, too. But, Dean supposed he did have to give Castiel credit for one thing and his smirk fell. "Yeah, she, uh, told me about your magical healing powers. I guess I do owe you one." But, Dean wasn't going to let Castiel leave without finding out more about one very, very troublesome claim. "You wanna tell me exactly why you told her you were assigned to protect her?"

"Because it's the truth," was Castiel's plain, straightforward reply. "God commanded it."

Dean's big brother hackles were definitely raised. He didn't like the sound of this. "What could God possibly want her for?"

Castiel shook his head slightly, disinterested. "I wasn't given a reason, nor do I need one. I do what is commanded of me."
That was rich, and Dean was indignant. "So where the hell were you when she was getting kicked around by Nancy in the first place?!" He demanded. "And, hey, I could've used a hand myself—I almost got my heart ripped out of my chest!"

"But you didn't." Castiel's stoic attitude and expression were getting on Dean's last nerve and he was past the point of caring whether he offended the dude or not.

"I thought angels were supposed to be, I dunno... fluffy wings, halos," he retorted. "You know, Michael Landon. Not dicks."

Castiel was resolute and unruffled. "Read the Bible. Angels are warriors of God. I'm a soldier."

Dean laughed, in a short, incredulous huff of air. "A soldier? Then why didn't you fight? And where the hell is God, anyway, if he even exists? I'm not convinced. 'Cause if there's a God, what the hell is he waiting for, huh? Genocide? Monsters roaming the earth? The freaking apocalypse? At what point does he lift a damn finger and help the poor bastards that're stuck down here?"

Castiel's gaze faltered and he looked away. Almost reluctantly, he said, "The Lord works..."

"If you say 'mysterious ways,' so help me, I will kick your ass." Dean growled. "So, Bobby was right... about the witnesses. This is some kind of a... sign of the apocalypse."

"That's why we're here," Castiel said. "We. So there were more of these idiots. Just great. 'The rising of the witnesses is one of the sixty-six seals.'"

"Okay. I'm guessing that's not a show at Sea World." The joke was lost on Castiel, who didn't seem to understand the reference. In fact, his expression had gone from mostly blank to introspective.

"Those seals are being broken by Lilith. And even though you sent the witnesses back, the seal was broken."

"And that did what?" Dean asked.

Castiel's almost worried expression was disconcerting. "You think of the seals as locks on a door."

"Okay..." Dean prompted, not seeing where the dude was going with this. "Last one opens and..."

Castiel looked at him tensely. "Lucifer walks free."

Dean's eyebrows shot up. Okay, not what he had expected. "Lucifer?" He repeated. "But I thought Lucifer was just a story they told at demon Sunday school. There's no such thing."

"Three days ago, you thought there was no such thing as me," Castiel pointed out. "Why do you think we're here walking among you now for the first time in two thousand years?"

Dean looked at Castiel in reluctance, seeing where this was going. "To stop Lucifer."

"That's why we've arrived."

A little uncomfortable with all of this new information, Dean resorted to his favorite defense mechanism: sarcastic insults. "Well... bang-up job so far. Stellar work with the witnesses. Nice job letting my little sister get kicked around by a ghost. Two thumbs, way, way up."

Castiel seemed to be losing patience. "We tried. And there are other battles, other seals. Some we'll win, some we'll lose. This one we lost. Our numbers are not unlimited. Six of my brothers died on the battlefield this week." He looked at Dean with resentment. "You think the armies of Heaven should just follow you around? There's a bigger picture here." He was stepping closer, his voice even lower. Almost menacing. "You should show me some respect. I dragged you out of Hell. I can throw you back in."

Without giving him a chance to reply, the angel was gone, leaving Dean standing alone in the kitchen. A moment later, Dean was blinking back sunlight and laying on the floor where he had fallen asleep. For a second, he was confused and disoriented. Then he realized what had happened. I'll be damned. The angel had come to him in a dream.

Now if that wasn't Biblical…
She was all alone in a place where the darkness gnawed and devoured. Alex opened her mouth to call for help, but nothing came out—not a word, not a sound. Claws swiped at her, invisible and fiery. Somewhere far away, she heard her brothers calling for her, but she was drowning in the nothing and left without words. And then, she saw Dean—impossibly far away. He saw her somehow, and reached for her—then was violently dragged from her, screaming. She tried to reach out, but her limbs had turned into water. She tried to shout his name, she tried to shout for Sam, but Dean was gone. Overwhelming despair overcame her and she twisted, rolled, struggled against the dark creatures that tumbled around her. Boom, boom, boom. Sam was suddenly there within reach almost, but when he saw her, he just stared. Boom, boom, boom. Alex screamed out in silence, begging her brother to help her, save her. Boom, boom, boom.

She heard herself gasp and her eyes flew open to see daylight and the familiar ceiling of Bobby's guest room. She had been dreaming. Her heart rate was skyrocketed and her breathing was hard too. She began to calm when she realized it wasn't real.

Boom, boom, boom.

"Hey, I've been banging on this door for like five minutes!" Came a loud voice. "Are you asleep or what?!!" Dean demanded from outside the room and behind the door he was pounding on. Disoriented, Alex scrambled out of bed and pulled the door open, squinting at her oldest brother. "Yikes, ever heard of a hairbrush?" he quipped. His good humor faded when he took in her expression. "You okay?"

"Yeah. Fine. Bad dream." She rubbed her eye with the heel of her hand tiredly. That was the only problem with sleeping a whole night through. There were always nightmares.

Dean looked sympathetic and gave her arm a good, enthusiastic 'cheer up' whack. "Well, come on. Up and at 'em. We're hitting the road soon. Pack everything."

"Might take me awhile," Alex wisecracked, deadpan—yes, it was early, but never too early for sarcasm. She grabbed her duffel and slung it over her shoulder. She was already dressed except for shoes—she didn't own any pajamas. "Ready when you are."

"All girls should be like you," Dean said teasingly, and hooked his arm around her neck, giving the top of her head a hard scrubbing with his knuckles. Alex protested the noogie with a yelp and a kick in her brother's shin. In the living room, Sam watched, separate and silent.

They were piled into the Impala, on the road again. After a few minutes, Alex realized she was missing one vital piece of information. "Where are we going, anyway?"

"West," Dean said impassively. Allrighty then, Alex thought to herself. After another minute, he glanced back at her in the rearview. "So, uh, interesting thing, Al. Castiel came to me in a dream last night."

"TMI," Alex wisecracked, and in the front seat sullen Sam even had to smile momentarily.
"Ha ha," Dean retorted. "I'm serious."

"Yeah? So what did Mr. Handcuffs have to say?"

"A whole lot of self-righteous crap about how he's God's warrior. Oh yeah, and the apocalypse is nigh."

He suddenly had her full attention. "Huh?" she asked eloquently, mouth hanging open. She hadn't thought about the prophecy of the witnesses since yesterday—she had been too busy fuming about Sam.

"He said that Lilith's game is to break these seal things," Dean said.

Alex frowned. "Wait. The seals from Revelations?"

"Hell if I know," Dean said. "Why?"

"It's just, I read the sparks notes on Revelations while doing the angel research," Alex said, trying to remember exactly what she'd read. "There were these seals that were supposed to bring all this crazy hell on earth, Judgement Day crap if they got broken."

"Well, Cas said there are sixty-six seals," Dean said. "Those ghosts yesterday were one of these seals. And my favorite part—if they all get broken, Lucifer is coming to town."

Alex sat forward in the backseat so that her head was between the front seats. "Lucifer? Lucifer. The devil. Satan."

"That's the one," Dean confirmed.

From their grim expressions, Alex got the feeling her brothers were both already on board with the theory. Alex was a little blindsided. "And... you're just buying it?"

Dean's knuckles whitened on the steering wheel. "Yeah. Yeah, guess I am."

"Sam?" Alex asked.

He barely looked at her. "I mean, yeah, I believe it. It's too crazy not to be true."

Alex sank back into her seat, feeling unsettled and suddenly very overwhelmed. "But what are we supposed to do? Why did Castiel tell you all this, Dean?"

Dean let out a heavy breath. "Cas has a bad habit of disappearing before I can get a straight answer from him." Shaking his head, Dean avoided her pointed gaze in the rearview mirror. "He seems to want me for something. I just don't know if I can trust the guy."

Alex kept watching the side of Dean's thoughtful, brooding face. She didn't know if they could trust him either.

It was late at night at the Willow Tree Motel and Dean had fallen asleep a few hours ago. He had driven all day long, and the siblings had remained mostly silent, each lost in their own thoughts. Sam had mostly stared out the window and complained about Dean's music choices, Alex had added a little to Dad's journal—angels required a lengthy if unfinished, entry. There was still a lot they didn't know and might never know. Alex mulled over Castiel's brief appearances and stilted mannerisms, the flashing light and his dark shadowed wings—and, of course, the whole handcuffing thing. His words to Dean about the apocalypse were troubling. If it were true, this was bigger than anything they had faced before... and they were facing it as a family that had fallen apart. Was it true? Any of it? There were all these things that made zero sense to her: God wanting Dean for some kind of heavenly mission… God supposedly ordering protection over her of all people… and the impending apocalypse? Alex realized she was chewing the inside of her cheek and made herself stop. She watched the scenery outside fly by. She'd only gotten more and more troubled as the hours passed.

After arriving to the motel and settling in, Alex and Sam had exchanged short, necessary conversation here and there (stuff like "do you want to shower first?" and "which bed do you want?"). Dean had halfheartedly told them to "quit being bitches" and then turned in, either fed up or exhausted. Maybe both. Sam had hunched over his laptop at the table and ignored his sister completely. After moments of excruciating silence in which Alex only became more and more pissed thinking about her twin and yesterday's fight, she grabbed her jacket and left for a walk. She needed to be away from the forced silence, and she was tired of holding still. The night air was chilly, numbing her nose and cheeks. She walked next to the main road, where traffic was still pretty heavy. For awhile, she stood on the sidewalk and just watched cars pass. These normal people with normal lives and worries she'd never had. Like a 401k or planning a Christmas party or what new diet to try. She was worried about the freaking apocalypse. She was worried that one of her brothers would be taken by God, and that the other one would remain apathetic and refuse to have a real relationship with her—that he'd rather side with a demon than his own sister.

There was suddenly a strange feeling that she was being watched, and Alex looked around quickly, trying to locate a watcher. But there was no one nearby. Old paranoia, she reasoned, and brushed the feeling away.

After a while, Alex returned to find the motel room dark and Sam in bed, seemingly asleep. She crawled into her bed, too, not taking off her jacket or shoes and not using a blanket. She rarely did. She laid still, wide awake. She listened to Dean's deep wheezy sleep-breathing, which could almost be called snoring—it was a sound she had missed these past four months. An hour or more passed and Alex cursed herself for not being able to fall asleep yet again.

She heard the springs squeak on Sam's bed next to her, like he had gotten up. Alex tensed, her pulse speeding up a little bit. She pretended to be asleep—please, Sam, just be going to the bathroom—she waited with bated breath as his soft footsteps slowly went toward the door. With a sinking feeling in her stomach, she listened as the door opened softly and clicked shut. Opening one eye to confirm he really had left, Alex then jumped up and slipped over to the window to watch as he rounded the corner outside. Again, he kept throwing glances around like the last time he'd snuck out. Goddammit, Sam. Alex slipped out the door too, and keeping to the side of the building, she followed Sam at a distance to the back corner of the motel. He walked past the Impala without a second glance, further mystifying Alex. Where the hell was he going? She stayed behind the parked cars, crouched low, to avoid being seen. Sam neared the end of the building, where a car was parked and idling.

Alex hid behind a Mustang and peered over the hood. Sam got into the car—as it pulled away, Alex could see the driver in one flash of light from the motel sign and recognized the girl from the motel the day that Dean had come back. Confused, Alex watched the car pull into the main road and speed away. Who was that, and why was Sam sneaking out to go somewhere with her? And then, suddenly, in light of yesterday's confession from Sam, it made sense. Cold realization overcame Alex. Ruby. It had to be Ruby. Alex couldn't move for a few minutes, the reality of the betrayal and the lies sinking in. She was hurt, and deeply. What the hell was Sam doing? Had he been sneaking off to see her that other night, too? She shook herself off and hurried back to the room in a severely upset state of mind. She was going to wake Dean up and they would get to the bottom of this. Tonight. Alex burst back into the hotel room, expecting to find Dean still sleeping.
But instead, she found something very different. Dean was up, and Castiel was there.

The sight of the angel in the trench coat startled her, and immediately, she was on guard. The last time she'd seen him, he'd handcuffed her to a damn gun rack. She edged closer to her brother. Castiel looked at her as she did such, his expression almost wary. "Hello, Alex."

His husky voice was deeper than she remembered and she shrank to Dean's side even more. Alex looked at the angel carefully, doubtfully, unsure what to make of his unexpected presence there—and when she looked at Dean, she could see that he seemed positively shaken up. From the two men's expressions and tense body language, Alex realized she had walked in on something important. "W-what's going on?" She asked, her nerves fluttering with dread.

"Oh, he just popped in for a quick trip back to the future," Dean interjected sourly.

Alex glanced at her brother. "...what?"

"I'm here because of Sam," Castiel said to Alex grimly, looking her in the eyes, and her stomach dropped in foreboding. Castiel looked almost conflicted or sympathetic. He turned his attention back to Dean, seeming to pick up where he'd left off before Alex had interrupted. "We know what Azazel did to your brother..." at the mention of Yellow Eyes, Alex's blood went cold. "What we don't know is why—what his endgame is. He went to great lengths to cover that up."

"Wait... what did Azazel do?" Alex asked, looking between Castiel and her brother and feeling extremely out of the loop.

Dean looked at her and she could see how angry he was. "Demon blood. He dripped freakin' demon blood into Sam's mouth the night of the fire." Horrified, Alex looked at Castiel speechlessly, not understanding.

He met her gaze. "For unknown reasons, he did not do the same to you."

"No, he just took away her ability to speak," Dean said bitterly. Castiel's gaze faltered a little.

Alex's stomach jumped in surprise. That had always been the theory—but there had never been any reason or logic behind as to why Azazel would have done it. Yellow Eyes had not confirmed or denied it when Dean had demanded to know. He'd only laughed. After Dean had killed the demon, nothing had changed and she'd still been mute. Not that his death would have broken the curse or spell or whatever it was... but it had been months after he died that her voice had, out of nowhere, returned.

Dean was fired up and looking ready to kill someone. "Okay Cas, where's Sam?"

The sudden use of a nickname for Castiel caught Alex's attention. "He's headed to four-twenty-five Waterman," Castiel replied.

Alex swallowed, steeling herself for Dean's reaction, because she knew something Dean didn't. "And, uh, Dean—I'm pretty sure he's with Ruby."

Dean's expression was momentarily aghast and he looked at Alex like he didn't want to believe that. "But he said—"

"He lied, Dean," Alex said darkly. "It's what he does these days I guess."

Dean muttered something and grabbed his keys, heading for the door where Alex still stood.
Castiel remained stock still. "Your brother is headed down a dangerous road. Even we're not sure where it leads. So stop it." Castiel's eyes shifted to them, his gaze chilling. "Or we will." And then he was gone. Alex stared at the spot he'd been standing in, uneasy and a little sick.

"Come on," Dean said to Alex. There was murder in his voice. Even the way he walked was angry.

"Okay, what just happened back there while I was gone for all of two minutes?" Alex demanded, doubling her stride to keep up with her brother.

"Time travel," Dean said tersely as he unlocked his door.

Alex paused and looking at him across the top of the car like he was crazy. "Are... you on drugs?"

"Man, I wish I were."

The Impala flew down the road in the darkness of night as a stunned Alex took in everything Dean had just told her—Castiel's appearance, time travel back to 1973, meeting Mom and Dad... all under Castiel's command to 'stop it'—it being the nursery fire—only at the end to find that Dean couldn't have changed any of it at all.

Alex shook her head. "So he let you see all of that and try to stop it... and then said you couldn't have changed it anyway?"

"Yeah. Effed up, right?"

"Majorly." Alex was stumped, wracking her brain. "So why make you go through that at all? I don't get angel logic."

"Yeah, me either, but that's beside the point. You need to tell me how the hell Sam can be with Ruby? She died." Dean punched the gas of the car, running a red light haphazardly.

"Geez, Dean!" Alex was gripping her seat with both hands. She shook her head, flustered. "I don't know. It makes no sense. I overheard Meg's ghost yesterday talking to Sam about what he was 'doing with Ruby.' I confronted him later and he lied about everything. Everything. And then when I called him on his crap, he admitted that he'd been working with her until a month ago, trying to find a way to get you back." Her face twisted into a sour expression. "I should've known that was a lie, too."

Dean let out a very heavy breath through his nose, his hand gripping the steering wheel like a vice. "Wanna tell me why you didn't tell me about this?"

Alex didn't like being the target of her brother's anger and usually tried to avoid it, but right now she was overcome with a huge, unbearable amount of heartache, thinking of Sam. "He said he wanted to tell you. I know I should've told you... but I wanted to give him a chance." She barely kept her voice from cracking as she looked at Dean, wishing he could give her an answer. "Dean... what the hell happened to him?"

His jaw clenched and unclenched, and his voice was uncharacteristically broken. "I don't know if I wanna know." He cleared his throat, slowing down. "I think this is it."

An old processing plant was up ahead, by all appearances abandoned. Dean switched off the headlights, got a bit closer, then pulled over and popped the trunk. He took out the demon blade and looked at it with great intensity as Alex stood back grimly. Dean silently slid the knife into his pocket and jerked his head toward the building, indicating that he was ready.
425 Waterman was the kind of place they frequented—a decrepit old building in a rundown part of town. Under the cover of night, it was easy to slip up to the building undetected. Following the sound of voices—two unfamiliar and one familiar—Dean and Alex were able to make out three figures inside one of the rooms through a metal grate.

Sam towered over a man who was tied to a chair that was surrounded by a crude devil's trap painted on the floor. "Where's Lilith?" he demanded.

"Kiss my ass," the man replied. His eyes went black.

Sam sounded almost amused. "I'd watch myself if I were you."

"Why? Huh? Because you're Sam Winchester, Mr. Big Hero? And yet here you are, sluttin' around with some demon." The man grinned at the woman, who was watching with her arms crossed, leaned against the wall, giving the impression of casualness. "Real hero," the demon cackled, looking back at Sam.

"Shut your mouth," Sam said, trying to sound confident. Instead, he just sounded like he was about to lose it. Next to Alex, Dean looked like he was seeing red.

The demon smirked. "Tell me about those months without your brother or sister around to censor you or boss you around. Tell me about all the things you and this demon bitch do in the dark." He grinned wickedly, then his expression fell. Sam was raising his hand, slowly and steadily. The demon lost his bravado, beginning to cough, and suddenly thick black smoke began to pour out of his mouth.

Alex gaped, horrified and awed at the same time. She looked at Dean, who looked back at her in alarm. Their worst fears were true. The demon screamed, and then collapsed as the last of the black smoke disappeared, leaving the man groaning.

"You follow my lead, Alex, hear me?" Dean hissed, and gave her no time to reply. He was already on his way in, his face murderous.

Sam froze as Dean entered. "So... anything you wanna tell me, Sam?" Dean demanded. The question was laced with barely-contained anger. Alex hung back behind Dean a few steps, unsure what was about to happen.

"Okay guys, just hold on, okay? Just let me—" Sam began, but Dean cut him off.

"You gonna say, 'let me explain'? You're gonna explain this? Are you serious right now? You're here with Ruby, who you said was dead—doing what you told me you had stopped doing?! Yeah, explain that, please. To the whole class."

Sam didn't seem to know how to respond, but Ruby, smiling evenly at the newcomers, stepped forward. She looked different than she had in her last body—she was now a brunette with dark wide eyes and a face that looked pleasant and pretty. "It's good to see you two again," she said, and Alex wanted to punch her in the fucking face.

"Can't say the feeling's mutual, bitch," she replied acidly, coming to Dean's side.

She felt Dean tensing next to her. "That's really Ruby?" he demanded of Sam, who didn't respond. Ruby's smile was fading at the murderous look in the oldest Winchester's eyes. Dean lunged forward, shoving Ruby up against the wall, even as he whipped out the demon blade.

Sam grabbed his brother's wrist, shouting, "Don't!" The knife clattered to the floor and Dean used momentum to throw Sam up against a wall, letting Ruby go. Alex grabbed the knife off the floor and jumped Ruby. Both of the girls tumbled to the ground fighting viciously, Alex trying to bring the blade down on Ruby, Ruby just barely holding her off. Sam let go of Dean and lunged at Alex, pulling her off of Ruby and yanking her back, holding her tightly. The knife again went clattering to the ground.

"Let go of me!" Alex protested, struggling against Sam's iron grip. Ruby had crouched and taken the demon blade off the ground where it laid, and was eyeing Dean with a murderous expression.

"Drop the knife, Ruby," Sam said, still restraining Alex in a vice-like grip. Ruby looked back at him defiantly, making him wait. Then she did as he said and dropped the knife.

"Well, aren't you an obedient little bitch?" Dean asked mockingly. The demon glared daggers at Dean, clearly ready to fight again.

Sam finally let go of Alex, who angrily yanked away from him and met Dean's gaze. This hadn't turned out in their favor. Sam glanced at Alex apologetically, then turned his attention to Ruby, indicating the man who was possessed earlier. "Ruby, he's hurt. Go."

The demon gave Dean another look, and helped the dazed man up, hauling one of his arms over her shoulders, ready to take him out. "Where the hell do you think you're going?" Dean demanded.

"The emergency room," Ruby retorted. "Unless you want to go another round first." With that, she left, and Dean proceeded to give Sam a severely dirty look. Alex watched in confusion.

"What the actual hell is going on here?"

"You okay?" Dean asked Alex, who was picking up the demon blade. He didn't take his eyes off of Sam for a second.

Alex had the knife and was staring at Sam in a mixture of balefulness and mistrust. "Peachy."

"Let's get outta here," Dean said, and turned away, ignoring Sam's anxious, questioning look.

"Dean," Sam implored. Dean didn't stop, didn't turn back. He just walked out the way he'd come in. Sam's voice got more desperate as Alex neared the doorway. "Alex!"

She whirled, angry, knife still in her hand. "What?!"

"Look, if you'll just hear me out—" he started, coming a couple steps closer, imploring her.

Alex shook her head, not able to keep the tears from springing into her eyes. She couldn't summon any of the anger anymore. It was all heartbreak, and she pointed at him using the knife. "I thought I could trust you, Sam!" His face was twisted in remorse and shame and his eyes fell away from hers. Alex felt the hot tears roll down her cheeks. Tears because she felt she had lost Sam completely. He had clearly chosen where he wanted to be—with a demon. She was at a complete loss and she tried to cover her sadness with anger. "I don't know you at all anymore." He looked at her miserably, but said nothing.

And with nothing else left to say, Alex turned and followed her oldest brother.

After awhile of second guessing himself and trying to think of how to explain everything, Sam returned on foot to the motel room only to find it empty. He waited into the morning, at first upset to the point of feeling physically sick, then feeling angry and attacked, then guilt-riddled and confused. Finally, around nine o'clock, he heard the familiar grumble of the Impala. He swallowed... nervously. Time for round two of Dean and Alex's wrath.

Dean swept in alone, ignoring Sam completely. He began to stuff his shirts into his duffel wordlessly. Sam's stomach twisted. "Dean, what are you doing?" Dean didn't answer. Sam tried again. "Where's Alex?"

"I'm right here," she said, and he turned to see her standing in the doorway, arms crossed as she leaned into the door frame. She looked like she hadn't slept, and her expression was stony. Sam looked between his siblings, unsure of what was happening.

"What, are you, are you leaving?" Sam asked as Dean finished shoving things into his bag.

"You don't need us. You and Ruby go fight demons. Real fuckin' heroes." Dean churlishly grabbed the bag and started for the door, only to have Sam physically block his way.

"Hold on—Dean, come on, man!"

Without warning, Dean hauled off and socked Sam in the jaw, the force sending Sam whirling. Reeling temporarily from the blow, Sam turned back, wincing. "You satisfied?" In reply, Dean again punched him in the jaw, this time drawing blood. Sam panted, recovered, swallowed. "Guess not," Sam said, touching his split lip and looking at Alex, who was still at the door. "You gonna hit me, too?" She just looked away with a tight jaw.

Dean got in Sam's face, blocking his view of his sister. "Do you even know how far off the reservation you've gone? How far from normal? From human?"

Sam held his hands out defensively. "I'm just exorcising demons!"

"With your mind!" Dean yelled. He took a pause, trying to calm himself. "What else can you do?"

"I can send them back to hell! It only works with demons, and that's it."

Clearly not convinced and even more pissed off than before, Dean grabbed a hold of his brother and pushed him backwards violently. "What else can you do?!"

"I told you!" Sam protested emphatically. Dean looked like he might punch Sam again.

Alex had crossed into the room and was now gripping Dean's shoulder tightly, her expression fierce. "Hey—you need to cool it," she told him levelly. Dean jerked back from her hand, but seemed to take her suggestion to heart and he retreated slightly.

Sam looked at his twin reluctantly. She was looking at him distrustfully, arms crossed again. He remembered when they had been so close. He had told her everything. Now, she was looking at him like he was a stranger. Like she didn't know him. His gaze faltered. "Look, I should have said something," he said, feeling pathetic and low.

"Yeah, you think?" She replied.

"I'm sorry. I am," he said. "But try to see the other side here."

Dean, who had been standing with his back to them, turned around. "The other side?" He repeated incredulously.

"I'm pulling demons out of innocent people," Sam said, not sure why Dean couldn't see the staggering positivity of that fact.
"Use the knife!" Dean said, his voice yet again raised almost to a yell, exasperated.

"The knife kills the victim!" Sam protested, almost yelling now too. "What I do, most of them survive! Look, I've saved more people in the last five months than we save in a year."

"That what Ruby wants you to think?" Dean asked. "Huh? Kind of like the way she tricked you into using your powers?" He shook his head sadly. "This is a slippery slope, brother. Just wait and see. Because it's gonna get darker and darker, and God knows where it ends."

"I'm not gonna let it go too far," Sam insisted.

Dean chuckled humorlessly, and then without warning he flew into a fit of rage and hit the lamp on the nearby table, sending it crashing into the wall. The twins winced in unison as Dean took over the room like a raging storm. "It's already gone too far, Sam!" His next statement hit them all like a ton of bricks. "If I didn't know you... I would wanna hunt you!"

The room went dead silent when he said that. Sam's eyes shone with tears, and he nodded while looking down. Alex had shrank back slightly at Dean's outburst and felt tears in her eyes, too. The pain that had been deeply lodged inside her heart was suddenly taking over her entire body and it was awful. Horrible. How had they come to this crossroads?

Sam shook his head, looking at his big brother pleadingly. "W-what was I supposed to do?" He implored. "You were gone. I was here."

"I was here, too," Alex reminded him, her voice wavering with emotion as she tried so hard to be honest and let Sam know how hurt she was. "And you go and decide this was what you wanted? That you'd rather work with a demon than your own sister?" She hated how heartbroken she sounded, but it was reflective of the truth. She was completely devastated to learn about what he'd been doing.

"It wasn't like that, I just—you weren't going to try to bring Dean back and... that's all I could live for anymore." His hazel eyes flickered with guilt. "I knew you wouldn't approve." His face was a mask of pain that he fought off, trying to appeal to his brother and sister again. "But what I'm doing... it works."

Alex shook her head mournfully. "Not for me, it doesn't."

Dean, whose face was scrunched in an unreadable expression, approached Sam again. "Yeah and if it's so damn terrific... then why'd you lie about it to me? To Alex? Why'd you hide it all this time?"

"Cas said if we didn't stop you... he would."

"See, I take that as meaning that God doesn't want you doing this. So, are you just gonna stand there and tell me everything is all good?" He asked, and Sam, the picture of turmoil, looked between his brother and sister, torn.

"Sam, please. It's not too late. Is it? You can stop. Right?" Alex asked. Her twin looked at her long and hard, uncertain, surprising her with his silence. Her heart sank a little. Why did he look so resigned to a doomed fate?

Suddenly, Sam's phone rang. He scrambled to pull it out of his pocket, clearing his throat and answering, maybe glad for a distraction. "Hey, Travis. Yeah, hey." He pinched the bridge of his nose, trying to collect himself. "It's good to hear your voice, too, yeah. Um, look, it's not a really good time right now. It's-" he paused. "Yeah, okay. Uh, well, just give me the details, and, uh…" Sam walked over the the bedside table and grabbed a notepad, scrawling on it. Alex looked at Dean, whose expression was so many things—angry, hurt, sad. He saw her gaze and he looked away, shaking his head.

"Yeah, okay, thanks Travis. Bye." Sam put his phone down and looked at Dean, then Alex. "Travis has a lead in Missouri." He looked down, his jaw working oddly. "Listen, I know you guys have no reason to trust me or to let me come along, but—"

Dean grabbed his duffel off the floor, his face a mask. "Shut up and let's go."

They made good time to Carthage, Missouri—about eight hours of driving nonstop. Dean told Sam about Castiel taking him into the past, and for a few moments as Dean told them about how young and full of life their parents had been, there was peace. Of course, when Sam slipped up and mentioned Azazel dripping demon blood into his mouth without Dean or Alex mentioning it to him… yet another fight followed. Sam said he was sorry, and Dean had retorted that Sam had been saying that a lot lately, and more stony silence had settled over the car.

When they got to Carthage, they looked up Jack Montgomery, the lead Travis had told them about. The guy Jack had been eating raw ground beef out of his refrigerator when the Winchesters had checked in on him. After witnessing that, they met up with Travis, who was an old friend of Dad's. Alex remembered seeing him once or twice, but it had been a long time ago. Travis complimented the Winchesters, saying their dad would have been proud of them for sticking together, then he oohed and aahed over Alex's voice, and embarrassed her thoroughly with his amazement. He then sat the siblings down and told them that Jack Montgomery was a Rugaru—a monster that manifested in the subject's mid thirties and would wreak murderous havoc on everyone around him if and when he gave into the desire to eat humans. The Winchesters parted ways with Travis feeling less hungry than they had before.

"All right, so we're gonna go have a little chat with this guy, and see where he's at," Dean was saying as they drove down the road, heading back to Jack's home the next day. Dean looked at Sam pointedly. "But I just wanna make sure, if push comes, you're gonna shove."

"Meaning?"

"Well, odds are we're gonna have to burn this guy alive," Dean said, referring back to Travis's information. The only way to kill Rugaru was with fire.

"This guy has a name and a wife," Sam replied intensely, obviously disliking Dean's statement. Alex drew in a deep breath. She could already hear the fight coming on and didn't think she could take another one.

"Yeah, who we're probably gonna make a widow, okay? I mean, you heard Travis. He's gonna turn. They always turn."

"Well, maybe he won't. Maybe he can fight it off," Sam said.
"And maybe he can't, that's all I'm saying."

Sam was on edge. "All right, we'll just have to see then, okay?" He retorted, then made a face. "And why aren't you asking Alex if she's gonna shove?"

"Because I know what she'd do," Dean said bluntly with zero hesitation. He sent his brother a dark glance. "Come on, Sam. You're side-railing. You sure your emotions aren't getting in the way here?"

Sam was defensive. "What are you talking about?"

"You know, nice dude, but he's got something evil inside," Dean said. "Something in his blood. Maybe you can relate."

Even Alex had to look up at that comment. Ouch. Sam was silent, then with eerie calm he said, "Stop the car."

"What?" Dean asked.

"Stop the car or I will!" Sam repeated, forcefully this time. Dean scoffed and pulled over, but even before he had completely stopped, Sam was getting out, slamming his door with gusto. He took several steps away, clearly trying to calm down. Dean followed him after throwing the car into park, and Alex got out, too, but hung back near the car.

Sam whirled around to face Dean wrathfully. "You wanna know why I've been lying to you, Dean? Because of crap like this!"

"Like what?" Dean demanded, clearly fired up and ready to fight.

"The way you talk to me, the way you both look at me like I'm a freak!"

"I do not," Dean replied lamely.

"You know, or even worse, like I'm an idiot!" Sam pointed an accusing finger at Alex, his voice raising more and more. "Like I don't know the difference between right and wrong!"

"Well do you?" Alex asked, no longer leaning against the car. She was being drawn into the argument like a moth to a flame.

"You have no idea what I'm going through," Sam said darkly, looking at her bitterly. "None."

"Yeah, because you've been gone the past four months!" Alex accused, not bothering to regulate her anger anymore. "By your own choice! So don't lecture me about what you're going through, because you aren't the only one going through crap right now!"

Sam got a self-righteous, joyless smile on his face. "Oh please, Alex, don't act like the victim here."

"Really, Sam?" Alex asked, getting more pissed off by the second at his completely jackass behavior. "Because that's all you've done the past few days. Act like someone held a gun to your head and made you go screw around with psychic demon mind powers... sorry, but I'm not gonna cry a river for you."

Sam shook his head and scoffed in disgust, looked away from her pointedly. "And you wonder why I didn't want to be around you," he muttered, looking at her like she was detestable. "You don't even try to understand my point of view!"

"Oh, the one where it's okay to lie to your family and mess around with evil for kicks?" Alex retorted in a voice drenched with cynicism. Dean was watched everything unfold with a sickened expression on his face.

Sam huffed as his voice darkened dangerously. "You know what, Alex—"

"Sam don't," Dean interjected faintly.

Sam whipped his head to the side to look at Dean and bore down on him without warning, his temper getting the better of him. "Stop telling me what to do Dean!" He thundered, and by all appearances, it looked like Sam was about to hit his brother. Dean's expression darkened, and he got ready for a showdown.

And then Alex grabbed Sam by the sleeve of the jacket and yanked hard. "Stop it!" She wedged herself between her brothers, a palm hitting either of their chests to keep them apart. And they stopped when she did that—not because she was strong enough to literally hold them apart, but because of the look on her face and maybe the realization of what was happening. Still, they glared daggers at each other, breathing heavily, and Alex shoved both of them at once. "Just stop!" Her face was haggard with furious disbelief and after a couple seconds, both brothers backed off and Alex threw her hands out in absolute frustration as she ground her teeth together. "Are you kidding me?!" She looked like she was going to cry or scream or shoot someone, like she was about to flip out completely. "The three of us are the most—" she was holding her hands on either side of her head, "fucked up excuse for a family—I'm sick of it!" She was at the point of shouting now and looking at both of them now, not just Sam. "All we do is fight each other and lie to each other—I mean, we can't even stand to be around each other! Why are we even doing this? Huh?! Cuz Dad would have wanted it? He would be ashamed of us." She let silence span for a few beats, then looked at Sam and jabbed her pointer finger at him. "Sam if you don't want to be here, don't be here! It's that simple."

"Come on, Alex. We're family, like it or not. No one's leaving," Dean said, his tone commanding. Alex looked at him insolently. "I am not letting this family fall apart," he said fiercely.

"We already have, Dean," Sam said furiously. "And you know what, I'm tired of being the odd man out."

Dean looked like he had never heard anything more ridiculous. "What are you talking about?"

"You," Sam poked a finger at Dean, "have always taken her side, every time! You two want to act all high and mighty, like you've never messed up."

"Well I don't recall either of us ever, you know, using our freakin' minds to exorcise demons!" Dean snapped.

Sam shook his head, at a loss, taking a moment. "Why am I even here right now? I can tell when I'm not wanted."

Dean's eyes narrowed. "So now you're trying to make this look like we're ganging up on you?"

"You are! You've both made up your minds that I'm the bad guy without even having all the facts!"

"Which are?" Dean asked, arms crossed.
"I've got demon blood in me!" Sam shouted. "This disease is pumping through my veins, and I can't ever rip it out or scrub it clean! I'm a whole new level of freak! And I'm just trying to take this—this curse... and make something good out of it." He breathed deeply, taking a second to calm himself. "Because I have to."

His outburst hadn't fallen on deaf ears, and Alex could hear the fear he was holding onto. She appealed to him the only way she knew how, because she saw what he was saying, but she also saw a bigger problem. "Listen, Sam... yeah you've saved some people, but at what cost?" She studied him for a moment, filled with sudden worry. "We don't know what this is doing to you." She paused, growing dour. "Only what it's doing to this sorry excuse for a family."

Sam seemed to bristle at that statement. "Last time I checked it took more than one person to make a family work."

Alex stared at him stonily, then shook her head in frustration, gave up and turned away.

Dean threw his hands in the air, dumbstruck. "Okay—before I died, you guys fought... but this is a whole new level of screwed. You two want to tell me why you can't look at each other anymore? Why the kids who used to be inseparable are... this?" He indicated vaguely with his hands.

Alex looked at her twin sidelong and from underneath her lashes. There didn't seem to be any going back from the damage that had been done. She didn't know how to fix this. They were both wounded, and unlike Dean, they didn't seem able to just push those feelings aside. Sam shrugged grimly, speaking for them both. "Dunno what to tell you, Dean. Times change."

Dean looked less than pleased, his jaw clenching tightly. "Apparently." After a moment, he jerked his thumb at the Impala. "Look, let's just go talk to Jack."

Alex looked at Dean in semi-disbelief. Were they really going to just drop this whole thing? Sam seemed to be thinking the same thing, but after a moment of deliberation, gave a small, brusque nod. Alex wordlessly watched her brothers get in the car. Without a choice, she did too, but not happily.

They parked behind and beside the Montgomery residence, after the silent ten minute drive. "I'll do the talking," Dean said gruffly, looking back at Alex, who wasn't moving. "What, you're not coming?"

She shot him a sharp look. "No."

"Suit yourself," he muttered, and he and Sam got out of the car, slamming each door a little harder than necessary. Alex watched their retreating forms and sank down into the seats, glad to finally be by herself. The silence was better now. It wasn't so heavy and bated. She stewed for a few minutes, halfheartedly looking around at the neighborhood they were in. It was upper middle class... beautiful new homes with manicured lawns and pretty mailboxes and nice cars parked in the driveways. The definition of normal.

Across the street, a middle aged man was polishing his motorcycle in his garage, lovingly shining the chrome details. It was some kind of vintage Harley, with black trim. Alex gazed longingly at the bike. She could ride that thing forever, until the roads themselves ended. Away from the fighting, away from the apocalypse. Or at least away from the heavy anger that hung over this family. Maybe without her, Dean and Sam might get along. Maybe they wouldn't suffer from the third wheel vibe she brought to the mix. She leaned against the window, chin in her hand, staring at the motorcycle.
At that moment, a woman came to the garage door and beckoned the man inside. She was holding a pitcher of iced tea. The man wiped his forehead and went inside, leaving the bike unattended.

Alex’s heart rate picked up just slightly, the opportunity of the situation striking her. She looked back toward where her brothers had just gone. No. She couldn’t leave them—not right now. It was too selfish. But then she thought back to the last couple days. The angry words, the accusations, the oppressive environment. She just wanted some time to sort out her thoughts and figure this mess out and not feel like her life was a constant war zone. She looked back toward the garage where the motorcycle waited, beckoning to her. She swallowed, knowing she needed to decide, and now. She pressed her lips together, weighing her options. She was a textbook over-analyzer, but today, she decided she just needed to be impulsive. So without any further thought, she ripped a blank piece of paper out of one of the notebooks in her duffel.

About five minutes later, Dean and Sam returned to the empty Impala. On the middle seat, there was a sheet of paper bearing Alex’s neat, familiar handwriting.

Need some time to myself. Don't come after me. I'm already far away. I'll find you in a couple of weeks.
Abandon Ship

"Then I heard your heart beating, you were in the darkness too. So I stayed in the darkness with you."
- Florence and the Machine

Even as Alex sped down the road on the stolen bike, she almost turned around and went back, conflicted on the impulse decision and sort of terrified to follow through with it. But she kept going, driven by many emotions and thoughts she couldn't quite put into words. Mostly anger leftover from the fight she had just had with her brothers. She was tired of being angry and feeling kicked around and ignored.

Alex could picture what it would be like when they found the note she left—they would argue, predictably, about going after her. Dean would immediately want to drop everything to track her down. He'd be pissed off and worried and ready to go find her, come hell or high water. Sam would use the cover of brotherly sensitivity to urge Dean to respect her wishes and, besides, he would point out, they were in the middle of a job, Alex could take care of herself, etcetera, etcetera. Sam would soothe Dean by saying they'd track her down when they took care of the job at hand. Dean wouldn't like it, but then would agree, swearing right after the job, they'd follow her. But Alex didn't want to be found. Not right now. The apocalypse, angels, demons, ghosts and even her stupid brothers could all go screw themselves. She was too stressed out for this. She was going to get cigarettes, weed, booze, and space the hell out. God knows I fucking need it.

The miles continued to fly by as she headed North, coaxing more speed out of the stolen bike and not caring where she ended up, only wanting to be far away from everything her life was.

Nine Days Later
Kimball, Nebraska

Alex laid on her back on the floor of the abandoned cabin she had been squatting in for the past few days. She had one arm behind her head as she stared at the ceiling. It was sometime near sunset, and it was getting dark inside the small house. Beside her half-consumed bottle of whiskey sat, temporarily forgotten. She was idly smoking a cigarette, watching the haze of smoke dissipate above her head. She wasn't a straight up chain smoker, but she liked to here and there, especially in times of high stress or boredom. It had started as a teenage act of rebellion. She'd wanted to do something that would get her in trouble, if not with Dad (who was not around enough to pick up on the secret habit), then with Dean or even with Sam. Only, no one had noticed it. She had snuck off multiple times, but neither of her brothers picked up on her secret. So she started trying harder to get caught.

Finally, Dean had smelled it after she had snuck a smoke in his car—and he had immediately accused Sam of smoking and launched into a tirade about drugs, alcohol, and how Sam was a bad example and liar, headed for prison. It had been really harsh and somehow ironic coming from Dean, who had dropped out of school at seventeen and had experimented with recreational drugs and alcohol since age twelve. So, after Dean had finally finished the lecture, Sam had insisted he hadn't smoked anything, ever, and it must have been Alex. At that point, she'd felt too embarrassed to own up to it, and in cowardice hadn't done anything but shrug and shake her head no, lying. Dean hadn't even questioned it, and launched into another verbal beat down on Sam for lying. It was something Alex still regretted. When Sam had asked her about it later, she had written down:
Maybe it was Dad? Sam had looked at her and shaken his head, rolled his eyes. He knew, and she knew that he knew. But he never said anything about it again.

Alex blew another stream of smoke out, lazily watching it rise. Dean would kill her if he could see this. Well, he probably wanted to kill her period right now. She had done some crazy stuff throughout the years, but had never run away or disappeared before—she estimated she would be facing all new levels of Dean's fury when she returned. She felt bad, too, running off on him especially. He would worry his head off over her, like he always did. But she was tired of all of it. And the breathing room was keeping her sane right now.

After so many years of avoiding the cops, the FBI, not to mention monsters, hiding from her brothers had been easy. She knew the tricks—SIM card out of the phone, cash only instead of credit cards, switching the plates on the stolen motorcycle... she'd done it all by second nature and knew that even if her brothers had tried to find her, there was no way. She'd left no trace after Kansas City, where she'd gotten enough cash out of an ATM to last her for a few weeks.

Even though it had been easy to disappear, it was hard for her to be totally alone like she was, and after a few days, her initial anger had faded into sadness and depression. She'd been away from her brothers and out of contact for a little more than a week now, and it was, in one word, weird. She felt everything from guilty to lonely to empowered to still not even sure what she was doing or why she'd left—after all, Dean had just gotten back from the dead. And what had she done? Run off. That thought alone was enough to guilt-trip her into the next century. It was unbelievably strange to live this way—not hunting anything, not constantly in a fight with one or both of her brothers, not in mortal peril. Most people would have been positively thrilled to be away from those very situations, but Alex realized that she missed it.

Instead of the normal monster hunting and mortal danger, she'd been living off of peanut butter crackers, apples, beef jerky, and plenty of alcohol all while drifting around idly. She had taken to studying the book of Revelation the past couple days on the hunt for answers on angels or the apocalypse. And she'd been thinking—a lot. She'd thought things through until she was wide awake and exhausted mentally. As a result, she had some words for both of her brothers, and some apologies to make, too. She blinked heavily and put her cigarette out on the floor, halfway smoked. She felt sleepy, and a little drunk. She sat up a little awkwardly and listened to the sound of silence.

She hadn't spoken out loud in days, since there was no one around... so she hummed lowly, the tune of Crazy Train, just to make sure her voice was still there. She thought about how much she dreaded going back. Not the part about being back in the life she was used to, but the part where she'd have to face the wrath of Dean and the passive aggressive guilt-tripping of Sam. But, the longer she waited, the worse both would be.

Alex wandered outside aimlessly to the worn out porch, bible and whiskey in tow. The stars would be out soon.

---

Castiel watched in silence as Alex Winchester sat on the porch of the abandoned cabin she had been living in the past few days. He remained invisible to her and stood a few steps away. She was leaned against the splintered stair railing and staring up at the stars in the dark night sky. Open in her lap and currently forgotten was the bible, turned to the book of Revelation. He had seen her studying it for the past couple days, trying to decode some of the prophecies, he estimated. Her tenacity was admirable, if not in vain. Not even Castiel understood all of the things contained in Revelation. Alex had currently given up on the reading, her attention was turned to the sky, her expression was open and thoughtful, maybe a little conflicted. Her wide eyes and simple, open face made her look haunted, somehow. Hers was one of the most familiar human faces to him, but every time he was near her, he studied it closely, looking for things he hadn't noticed, taking in the intricacy of her expressions and features. What a marvel the human face was. Especially hers. He'd always thought so, even since the first day he'd beheld her.

In Alex's hand, a pen went back and forth, tap, tap, tapping against the open book that was balanced on her knees. She wore the same shoes he had always seen her wear—a scuffed pair of lace up boots in faded black. Her hair tumbled around her shoulders and down her back in untamed waves. A faded green cargo jacket was over a t-shirt that had a skull and crossbones with wings and a huge red proclamation of METALLICA on the front. Castiel wasn't sure what a metallica was supposed to be, but he assumed, judging from the shirt design, that it was a mythical beast humans had imagined by combining death and angelic fables. Interesting, but not accurate.

The shirt was not the greatest point of interest. Perhaps his favorite thing was the new silver chain she wore. Dangling from the end of it was a small, long, thin silver shape. It was a lock pick. Her outward response to his actions inspired a strange reaction in him—he wasn't sure, but it might have been amusement. He remembered the look of pure shock on her face when he had clicked the handcuffs down over her wrist—it wasn't that he had wanted to restrain her using the handcuffs. But the vengeful spirit of Nancy had been so bent on destruction and Alex's life had been on the line. He hadn't been able to stay by her side that day, as the war waged in heavenly planes that day had required all angels available. Lilith's war was troublingly successful so far. So, the handcuffs had been a creative solution to keep the youngest Winchester safe. He had a feeling she was still angry about it, though he didn't understand why. Didn't she understand that he had saved her life?

Every few days Castiel came close to Alex's physical presence, remaining invisible. Here he could assess her fate. Fates were tricky and always changing, but it was possible for a guardian angel to see into the future of their charge for a few linear days and into the events that surrounded a specific human. He was more in tune with her fate, as he had been given the task of watching over her. The orders to protect Alex Winchester had been in place since she had been born, but Castiel had only been assigned recently.

Before Castiel, up until about a year ago in earth time, the angel Nandriel had watched over Alex. But Nandriel had fallen away and been punished by Heaven for allowing herself to be corrupted by the world. Angels did not require human vessels, but Nandriel had petitioned Heaven to allow it, saying that in order to best protect her human charge, she needed a physical manifestation. But when Alex was about to turn twenty-four, it was discovered that Nandriel had increasingly neglected her duties in favor of pursuing her own gains and free will. Her punishment had been most severe, and she was locked in the celestial prison for the rest of eternity.

Castiel had watched Alex from transcendental heights at first and now from his vessel, all in all for nearly a year now. He had seen her grief when Dean died. He had seen and felt her pain when Sam left. Even though he had only spoken to her a few times, he knew her more than she could ever guess. He watched her now, wondered what she was reflecting on internally. She seemed to be searching for something out in the stars, her eyes darting back and forth across the starry expanse. Castiel turned and looked, too, but he saw nothing. Just many, many stars. Castiel looked harder, trying to fathom why she stared endlessly into the sky. Whenever he watched humans he felt a keen sense of disconnection. He didn't intuitively understand them like they understood each other. But sometimes, he thought he'd like to.

He looked at Alex again, who remained blissfully unaware of his presence. It was much easier this way. She and her brother Dean both became very riled and angry when he appeared to them, for reasons Castiel did not understand. All he knew was if he were to make himself visible to her, she would immediately become guarded and mistrustful, and even a little afraid. He didn't like to inspire that sensation in her, and he didn't understand why she would feel that way. It was much simpler to remain unseen.

Castiel could hear his brethren beckoning to him, the host of Heaven proclaiming tidings, calling angels to order. Many things were happening. He turned his attention to the voices, listened longer, hearing a message meant for him specifically. He was to meet with Uriel, and immediately. He frowned slightly. If Uriel were involved, that could only mean something drastic. Castiel was troubled at his very strong reaction of reluctance at this summoning. He didn't think it was appropriate for him to feel aversion to a call from above, or hesitancy to seeing one of his brothers. Being an angel whose standard was obedience, he pushed the thoughts aside and took himself from where Alex was and to Uriel.

Alex Winchester remained where she was, never even knowing she hadn't actually been alone.

"And the Lord God of the holy prophets sent His angel to show His servants the things which must shortly take place."

To her, it sounded spookily like Castiel's appearance to her and Dean, and that made her uneasy. She wasn't sure whether she should be happy that she finally found something that made sense, or terrified. The rest of Revelation was filled with violence, destruction, and wrath as seals were broken—was that really what the future held? She didn't want to believe it. She blinked, sleepy from all the reading, and leaned against the railing tiredly, again glancing at the stars. She remembered what Sam had said to her one time when they were young and spending a night alone in a motel room, wondering where Dean and Dad were. Her twin had put his arm around her and guided her to the window. "Mouse," he said, using his favorite nickname for her, "if you're ever scared and wondering where Dad or Dean is, just look up at the stars. We all see the same sky. And the stars are looking down on all of us, no matter where we are. So, we're together still, in a way, you know? Look. I bet they're looking, too." Oh Sam. Alex felt a ripple of sadness. She'd give anything to go back to the way they used to be. She shivered again, blinking her heavy eyes with less and less luck. So... tired...

Alex was suddenly aware that she was standing up, out in front of the cabin, in almost blindingly bright moonlight, and Castiel stood in front of her. "Alex." He said her name gruffly.

A little disconcerted, Alex looked around, trying to figure out how she had been sitting on a dim staircase one minute, then standing out in front of the cabin in almost blinding moonlight the next. Then, she noticed that the trees didn't move even though she felt breeze, and there were no sounds. Even though it looked real, it was lacking something. Even Castiel looked slightly wrong. His face was lit too well, like day, but it was night. He looked more handsome than she remembered, and it irked her.

"W-what are you doing here?" She asked, sounding dazed, backing up slightly. She then remembered Dean telling her about his Castiel dream and she frowned deeply. "Is this... a dream?"

"Yes, but this conversation is real," he said, coming closer.

"Okay..." Alex said, eyeing him suspiciously. She cracked a sloppy grin, trying to be disarming. "I'm not sure if I'm comfortable with you being... inside my head, Cas," she said, trying out his nickname for herself.

" Appearing to you in dreams is safer. Less eyes and ears," Castiel said, leaving Alex perplexed. He was now incredibly close and Alex almost had to lean back. He apparently didn't understand personal space, and she was surprised to find that she was a little intimidated—he was bigger than she remembered. He was oblivious to her discomfort, looking down at her unyieldingly.
"Something is about to happen to your brothers in Salt Lake City," he said in grave seriousness. "You need to get there, and quickly."

Her heart flip-flopped unpleasantly. "Something—what something? Are they all right? And can you back up a little? You're too close."

"Too close to what?" He asked, confused, those stern eyebrows gathering themselves closer together in a deep frown.

"To me," Alex told him, and his frown deepened even more. He seemed to understand she wanted him to step back, because he did, but he didn't look so sure of why the proximity had bothered her.

"My apologies," he said stiltedly. "Leave immediately and travel fast—Uriel must not know of this conversation we just had."

"Who's Uriel?" Alex asked, getting more confounded by the second. But Castiel was already gone.

She woke up then, leaned awkwardly against the rough wooden railing of the porch stairs, her body stiff and her throat sore. The light was dim, and there was thick morning fog. The dampness of dawn's chill seemed to have permeated all of her, and she shivered. Dammit. She'd fallen asleep on the porch. Classy. She stood up and groaned. Her head was pounding—another hangover, yay—but she had no time to think about it. Castiel's appearance had been so vivid, and had awakened a sense of urgency in her. She was racing down the road not even three minutes later.

Three Hours Later

Alex swung into a gas station, her head officially killing her. Her throat had gone from sore to total misery, and she was having trouble breathing out of her nose. She guessed a cold was what she got for falling asleep outside, but it didn't lessen the fact that it sucked. She glanced around as she swung off the motorcycle, always wary of police. She wasn't a criminal, not really. Yes, she stole things, committed identity theft and fraud… but the things she did do for society seemed to make up the balance between right and wrong. At least, that's what she told herself.

She grabbed some Tylenol from the shelf inside the convenience store and stood in line to pay for it, shuffling some cash out of her pocket. The line was a few people long, and the gas station employee didn't seem in a rush. The wall behind the employee was mirrored, and Alex caught a glimpse of herself in it, as well as the girl standing in line in front of her. The girl was a blonde in a pretty floral printed dress, with immaculate makeup and bright eyes. She reminded Alex of a cover of one of the glossy women's magazines that always lined gas station checkouts.

Alex, in contrast, had windblown, raggedy hair that had been thoughtlessly put in a ponytail... a rumpled outfit that hadn't been washed in two days, and a plain, tired looking face with eyes that looked hollow to her. She looked away from the mirror, downcast and feeling self-conscious as she rubbed the back of her neck and glanced around, wondering if anyone was looking at her and noticing how crappy she looked.

She guessed it was just another reminder that where she was headed was the right place. Here in the real world, she was a sad excuse for a person. She knew how to kill a ghost, but had never decorated a real Christmas tree. She had faced shape shifters and vampires, but had never lived in one place for more than a couple weeks. She knew how to send a demon back to hell, but had only one kiss to her name—and that was with a ten year old boy who had been dared to do it by friends.

She had woken up every day of her life not knowing where she would be twenty-four hours from then. She'd never owned a purse and hadn't graduated high school and wasn't entirely sure how to work an oven. She could pick just about any lock, hot wire a car, count cards, throw a knife with fatal accuracy—but she had no real life skills to speak of, no lasting relationships besides Dean and Sam and Bobby. And Dad. But he was gone, like most other people Alex had ever loved.

"Hey, you gonna pay for that?"

Alex started, looking up and realizing the line in front of her was gone and the gas station employee was looking at her like impatiently.

"Uh, yeah. Keep the change." She slammed a five dollar bill onto the counter, avoiding looking into the mirror again.

Five Hours Later
Salt Lake City

Feeling just as sick as before, Alex set to work tracking down her brothers. Thanks to the public library's free internet services, she logged onto the cell phone provider website that Dean used and then activated the GPS feature to see where Dean's phone had been in the past 24 hours. From there, she used Google maps, which showed her one of the locations had been the Moonlight Motel. Bingo.

She got to the motel and saw no Impala in the lot—they must be out right now. Popping the SIM card back into her phone, she called the front desk of the motel and complained that she was staying in room 200 and there was a horrible leak in the bathroom. She watched as the guy at the front desk hurried upstairs, and using the quick window of time, she quickly accessed the main computer, reading through the guest registry, looking for any classic rock star or obscure fandom names—ah ha… Bret Michaels was staying in room 126. She smiled, shaking her head at how predictable her brother was.

She made for the room, taking a credit card out of her wallet and jimmying the door open, while glancing around, trying to do it fast without being noticed. Hopefully her brothers would be back soon from wherever they were. Sure, she could have called them, but she didn't like being cussed out over the phone. In person was much better. She shut the door behind her and looked up only to promptly gasp and freeze. The room was not empty like she had thought it was.

"Hello, Alex," said Castiel. He stood up from where he had been sitting on the bed.

She didn't even have to act surprised—she was. She glanced at the other man, who stood casually off at the other end of the room, looking at her in a way she didn't like. He was an imposing bald man with dark skin and a certain hawkish look. "Ah, the littlest Winchester," said the man. He sounded decidedly unfriendly. Maybe that was the Uriel guy Castiel had mentioned.

"And... who are you?" she asked cautiously. She remained by the door.

"This is Uriel," Castiel said, confirming Alex's suspicions, and the look on his face intrigued her. Was he trying to give her a meaningful stare? Silently tell her, again, not to give away what he'd told her in the dream to Uriel? She thought so, and she was a little impressed.

"Okay... and what are you two doing here in my brothers' room, exactly?"
"Waiting for them," Castiel said, earning a baleful, if slightly amused, from Alex.

_Thank you, Captain Obvious._ She had guessed as much, but she was decidedly uneasy about the entire thing, and crossed her arms, coming to stand by one of the beds. "For what? What do you guys want with them?"

"It's none of your concern," Uriel replied in dismissal, coming closer and staring her down, his eyes unfriendly, almost hostile.

"Oh, I think it is," Alex said, matching his icy, confident tone. She looked at Castiel, whose face told her nothing. An awkward silence hung and Alex swore all that was needed was a cricket chirping. She pulled a wan face. "Okay… how about I come back later?" She arched a brow and made to leave, chuckling darkly. "I'll leave you two your... privacy." Neither of the angels seemed to get her entendre.

"You're not going anywhere," Uriel said, his deep voice foreboding. He had come closer still, probably attempting to make her back up or cower.

And even though Alex was kind of freaked, she stood her ground and didn't let it show. "Oh really," she replied evenly, staring him dead in the eyes, refusing to be intimidated. "And you're gonna stop me?"

He came closer still, his eyes glacial. "Sit down," Uriel commanded.

Alex yelped, her legs going out from under her as she plopped down onto the bed, eyes wide. "Hey!"

Castiel stepped forward, his brows knitted together as his voice raised. "Uriel, you shouldn't force her to—"

"I will do what is necessary to keep this sad sack of cells in check," Uriel said, then pointed at Alex. "Learn some respect, child."

She glared back at him, unable to move her legs. "You first, jackass," she muttered. What the hell was this guy's problem? "And Dean said you were a dick," she said bitterly to Castiel while looking at Uriel.

_Release her, Uriel,"_ Castiel said lowly, and Uriel did, but reluctantly. So, Castiel seemed to be in charge, at least right now. That was a plus. Maybe. Uriel went and stood by the window, hands clasped behind his back, proceeding to ignore Alex, who stood up cautiously. Castiel was looking at her, decidedly uncomfortable and apologetic. "Uriel is very particular. He can come across as rude."

"Wow, you don't say." Alex retorted. That was a very mild way of putting it.

Castiel's head tilted to the side slightly. He looked like he was trying to figure something out. "Why does your voice sound strange?"

"I have a cold," she explained. He didn't seem to immediately know what she meant by that and Alex tilted her head to the side, too. Did he really not know what that was? "You know... like, a virus? I'm sick?" Oddly enough, she was a little amused suddenly by his squinty expression. "It happens when you fall asleep outside and then ride a motorcycle across the country in cold, wet weather."

"I see. I'll heal you," Castiel said, and moved forward, hand outstretching toward her.
"No. No more unnecessary healings, Castiel," Uriel said forcefully, without turning around.

Castiel halted, as if caught. Alex looked at Uriel, disliking his implications. "I was drowning in my own lungs last time—it wasn't unnecessary."

"I wasn't speaking of that time," Uriel said brusquely, turning and fixing Castiel with a sharp look, and Castiel looked away, as if ashamed.

Who did Uriel mean? Maybe Cas was an angel who went around healing humans all the time? Alex looked back at Castiel, whose eyes were downcast. "I'm fine, dude," Alex told him, thinking it was kind of nice that he wanted to make her feel better. "Don't worry about it. I've had colds a bunch of times." He didn't look too comforted, and Alex looked at Uriel again, whose back faced her. Her tone took on a sharper edge. "Why would healing someone, if they needed it, be bad? I thought—"

"No one is interested to hear your puny thoughts, mud monkey," Uriel said, his voice taking over the room. Alex made a face at his comments. "Orders for healings should be received by revelation, not simply decided by the soldiers. Compassion is weakness. Making decisions is not our place. God's will must always be observed. We are not to do as we please."

It was as if he were lecturing Castiel, not answering Alex. Castiel looked chastised, his eyes downcast and jaw gritted tightly. Damn. Alex actually felt a bad for the guy. If Castiel had been the opposite of what she expected angels to be like, Uriel was even worse. Alex felt like her dreams of angels had officially been trampled with Uriel's comments and attitude.

Uriel had returned to staring out the window in silence, and Alex, feeling frustrated and sour, sat down on the bed, resigning herself to wait for her brothers. Her eyes darted to Castiel, who stood by the door. He was still looking at Uriel, almost like there were a bad taste in his mouth. After a few moments, Castiel surprised Alex by coming and sitting next to her rigidly.

She realized she could hear him breathing softly, evenly. Somehow, that surprised her, because breathing was so ordinary and human. She snuck a glance at his profile. He turned his head slightly, meeting her questioning gaze, and then his eyes dropped to stare blatantly at her chest. Caught off guard, Alex's eyebrows shot up. "What are you—" she fumbled.

He looked at her in the eyes again, looking troubled. "I've been meaning to ask you something. What is a metallica?"

Alex looked down at her shirt, confused—then she realized she was still wearing one of Dean's old Metallica shirts from when he was younger and three sizes smaller. Alex then looked back at Castiel, an incredulous expression on her face. He was awaiting her answer, looking incredibly serious. She laughed out loud, struck by the hilarity of the situation and the question. At her bright peal of sudden laughter, Cas's expression softened into something like surprise. "Uh... Metallica is a band," she managed after a minute. He blinked, frowned again, not understanding the word. Alex tried again. "A music group?"

He nodded, getting even more serious. "I see." But he was clearly still perplexed.

The momentary lightness faded as Alex refocused herself. She had things to ask this angel, her supposed protector. She cleared her throat, attempting to find her serious face again. "Okay, listen, I need to get this out of the way: if you ever handcuff me again, I'm gonna kill you."

He turned his head to look at her. "It is nearly impossible to kill an angel."

"Well, dammit, I'll find a way," she said grumpily. He seemed almost amused by that, his eyes softening, his dry lips curving up almost imperceptibly... and then it was over just as soon as it had begun, his expression dropping as if he had thought better of his show of emotion. He looked away again, stern once more. Alex, perplexed but not discouraged, moved on to her next question. "You two are here about the seals, aren't you?"

Castiel sighed tiredly. "Yes. Another is about to be broken if we don't act quickly."

"And me and my brothers can stop it?" She asked, her best guess.

There was a long pause. "I don't know."

Alex was getting frustrated. Castiel didn't like to give much information out. She tried again, with one of the most pressing questions she had. "So look, how long exactly have you been, uh, watching over me?"

He didn't look at her, still stared straight ahead. "About a year. Before that, Nandriel was your protector."

"Nandriel?"

"She watched over you since birth."

Alex's eyebrows shot up. "Since birth? No way." Forget the fact that she supposedly had a guardian angel right now—she'd always had one?

At the slang 'no way' Cas seemed unsure of how to respond. "Uh—yes, way, since birth."

Alex pressed an amused smile away at his attempt to use slang then took a couple seconds to try and process that, then looked at Cas intently. "Okay. Well, why the sudden shift in management last year?"

"Nandriel failed. She wanted to become a human and was punished by Heaven."

Alex was stunned. "Geez. You guys don't play around, huh?" She thought offhandedly of the chilling imagery in Revelation, of judgement and war. She shook her head, frowning. This disturbed her to the deepest parts. "I don't understand... why would God choose to protect me?" She paused, not sure if she believed it. "I'm no one. I'm just a random girl."

Cas's eyes squinted up just slightly as he stared into middle distance in front of himself. "The reason is unknown."

"That is extremely..." she searched for the right word, "creepy."

Castiel looked at her intensely, and underneath his gaze, she felt small. "Something about you is special to my Father. You are meant to complete some task, or have some impact simply by being alive. Your life is worth something." Alex scoffed at that, almost offended by the statement—he sounded like a damn self-help book. Her life was worth something? Yeah great, thanks Ghandi. What, she was supposed to do something that would alter fate? What a crock of shit. They must have had the wrong girl. Castiel's almost seemed taken aback at her reaction. "Why don't you believe me?" he asked.

Alex looked at him sidelong. His question left her feeling disconcerted and laid bare. She avoided it altogether. "That's a really personal thing to ask."

He took a moment to analyze her words, then nodded once and looked away. "I apologize."
Uriel snorted and muttered something about an angel apologizing to a fool ape. Alex clenched her jaw, forcing herself to stay seated. "Okay—what's his problem? Why does he hate humans?"

A muscle jerked in Castiel's cheek and he looked down, brows moving together slightly. "He doesn't hate humans. He's sworn to protect and serve them."

Alex looked at Uriel from underneath her lashes. "Could've fooled me," she muttered.
Alex and Castiel remained sitting on the bed in silence for all of three minutes, when Alex heard the familiar sound of the Impala, vaguely, outside. She suddenly felt a little sick, dreading what kind of state Dean would be in when he saw that she had crawled back. Beside her, Castiel looked at her appraisingly as she stood and faced the door, with her arms straight at her sides. She didn't have any more time to think about how she would react as the sound of the key sliding into the lock sounded. Geez, you'd think a bloodthirsty werewolf was coming in... it's just your freaking brothers. She swallowed as the door opened to reveal the familiar hulking form of Sam, whose face registered shock as he saw her. "Alex! Oh my god!" He came forward as if to embrace her, then noticed the other two men in the room and he reached for his gun at the hip, assuming the worst. His voice turned from relieved to demanding, he moved toward his sister protectively. "Who are these guys?"

Castiel had risen and was now coming toward Sam. "No, it's okay, it's okay," Alex said and shook her head, and motioned for Sam to leave the gun out of it. Behind Sam, the door darkened as Dean came in. His expression went from surprised to pissed in one second fast. Alex decided ignoring Dean would be best for now, and didn't look at him, instead motioned toward the angel who Sam was staring at questioningly. "Sam, this is Castiel—the angel." Sam's mouth dropped open slightly, and he suddenly seemed very flustered.

"Hello Sam," Castiel greeted.

"Oh my god!" Sam exclaimed, then his eyes went wide in embarrassment. "Er—uh—I didn't mean to—sorry. It's an honor, really, I—I've heard a lot about you." Sam held his hand out for a handshake, completely starstruck.

Castiel stared unmovingly at the outstretched hand in what Alex could only guess was confusion, and then he looked at Alex, as if for explanation. She stared back at him, bemused, before she spoke up. "Shake it. Shake his hand." She was trying really hard not to laugh at him at this point... it was sort of cute. "It's a greeting," she explained. Had he really never seen a handshake? Surely he had.

As if to illustrate the point, Sam shook his hand up and down in the air. Castiel seemed to understand, and put his hand into Sam's. "It is an honor to meet you, Sam Winchester," Castiel said. "The boy with the demon blood." Sam's face fell slightly and Alex looked at Cas sideways—awkward. "Glad to see you've ceased your extracurricular activities," Cas told him, and Sam gave Alex a glancing weird look, she shrugged slightly.

"Let's keep it that way," Uriel commented passively, still facing out of the window with his back turned to them.

Dean, who still hung back a little, an unhappy expression on his face, looked at Uriel, then at Castiel and Alex for an explanation. "And he is...?"

"Heaven's biggest douchebag," Alex answered before Castiel could.

Dean met her gaze, scowling. "Yeah okay, and by the way, wanna tell me where you've been this past week?"

She shook her head in dismissal, nodding her head slightly toward Castiel and Uriel. Not with them here. "I'll tell you later."

"Yeah you will," he shot back peevishly.

Castiel was approaching Dean, oblivious to the siblings' conversation, seeming focused on something else. "The raising of Samhain, have you stopped it?"

_Samhain. Why did that sound familiar?_ Dean looked from his sister to the angel testily. "Why?"

"Dean, have you located the witch?" Castiel asked, his patience clearly short.

"Yes, we've located the witch," Dean said. Alex particularly disliked witches and she wasn't thrilled to hear that's what her brothers were after right now.

"And is the witch dead?"

"No, but—" Sam started.

"We know who it is," Dean interrupted.

Castiel nodded slightly, and walked over to the bedside table, where a small hex bag sat. _Crap!_ Alex hadn't even noticed that. "Apparently the witch knows who you are, too." He picked it up and held it high. "This was inside the wall of your room. If we hadn't found it, surely one or even all of you would be dead." Alex and her brothers stared at the hex bag with distaste—being on a witch's bad side was one of the worst things, ever, period. "Do you know where the witch is now?" Castiel asked.

Sam and Dean exchanged a look, which Alex recognized with a twisting stomach. They weren't quite there yet. Dean confirmed her suspicions with his next comment. "We're, uh, working on it."

Castiel's jaw tightened. "That's unfortunate."

"What's it to you, anyway?" Dean asked.

"The raising of Samhain is one of the sixty-six seals."

"So this is about your buddy Lucifer."

"Lucifer is no friend of ours," Uriel again commented from his place near the window.

Dean looked his direction irritably. "It's just an expression."

"Lucifer cannot rise, the breaking of the seal must be prevented at all costs," Castiel said, which they all knew.

"Why don't you kill the witch then? You're super-powered angels, right?" Alex asked, pointing out what everyone else was thinking. Something here just didn't feel right.

"We cannot kill this witch," Castiel said with no further explanation.

"Okay, great," Dean said with no enthusiasm, "then why don't you tell us where the witch is, we'll gank her and everybody goes home."
"We're not omniscient," Castiel replied. "This witch is very powerful, she's cloaked even to our methods."

Alex felt a prick of interest there—there was a way to hide from angels? She was going to find out about that. Sam, ever the peacekeeper, spoke up. "Okay, well we already know who she is, so if we work together—"

Uriel cut him off. "Enough of this."

At this point, Dean lost patience and wheeled, staring Uriel down hostiley. "Okay, who are you and why should I care?"

Uriel simply turned and looked at Dean in silence, leaving Castiel to explain.

"This is Uriel, he's what you might call a… specialist."

Uriel finally approached them, his hands behind his back, the hints of a smug smile on his face.

"What kind of specialist?" Dean asked suspiciously. There was a long pause, and Dean's voice softened in suspicion. "What are you gonna do?"

Castiel's mouth was in a somber, thin line. "All three of you, you need to leave this town immediately."

Alex looked at him in surprise. "Why would we leave? Don't we need to stop this Samhain guy?"

After all, the angel had just told her, early that morning, to come to this town and quickly. She glanced at Uriel, then Castiel, remembering his mysterious warning not to tell Uriel about that.

Cas met her gaze dead on, and narrowed his eyes just slightly. "You have to leave because we're about to destroy this town," he said.

"What?" Sam exclaimed.

"You're gonna smite the whole friggin' town?" Dean asked, his disbelief palatable.

"Yes," was Castiel's emotionless answer.

Alex stared at the angel, completely disillusioned, any short-lived fondness she'd had for him suddenly evaporating into thin air. "You failed to mention that little detail, Castiel!" She exploded accusingly, to which he looked at her without any trace of uncertainty or remorse. Only grim certainty.

"We're simply out of time. This witch has to die. The seal must be saved."

"There are a thousand people here!" Sam protested.

"One thousand two hundred fourteen," Uriel corrected.

"And you're willing to kill them all?" Sam asked, his voice awash in disbelief.

"This isn't the first time I've… purified a city." Uriel almost smiled at his own comment. He seemed proud.

"Look, I understand this is regrettable," Castiel said, to all three of the Winchesters' dismay.

"Regrettable?" Dean repeated, totally disgusted.
"It's detestable!" Alex almost shouted. "What kind of game are you angels playing? You're out of your damn minds!"

"We have to hold the line; too many seals have broken already," Castiel said, and even he sounded like he was getting riled.

"But come on, these are people! Aren't you supposed to protect people? All people? Families? Kids?" Alex asked, growing more and more desperate to get even just a drop of empathy from either of the angels.

"You screw the pooch on some seals and this town—these people—have to pay the price?" Dean added angrily.

Castiel met Dean's gaze steadily. "It's the lives of one thousand against the lives of six billion, there's a bigger picture here." Castiel stepped closer, almost getting in Dean's face. "Lucifer cannot rise—he does and Hell rises with him. Is that something that you're willing to risk?"

"There has to be another way," Alex insisted.

Sam was right behind her. "We'll stop this witch before she summons anyone," he said. "Your seal won't be broken and no one has to die. We just have to find her. Just give us that chance, please!"

"We're wasting time with these mud monkeys," Uriel muttered to Castiel, as if the Winchester three weren't in the room.

Alex glared at Cas and jabbed an angry pointing finger Uriel's direction. "Cas, I have about had it with that dude."

"I'm sorry," Castiel said without feeling, turning away from the Winchesters, "but we have our orders."

"No, you can't do this, you're angels!" Sam protested, to which Uriel chuckled airily. Sam tried again. "I mean aren't you supposed to—you're supposed to show mercy!"

"Says who?" Uriel asked. He seemed amused. Sam looked like someone had killed his dog.

"We have no choice," Castiel repeated, to which Dean scoffed.

"Of course you have a choice, I mean, come on!" Dean glared at both of the angels in turn. "You've never questioned a crap order, huh? What are you both just a couple of hammers?"

Castiel sounded on edge when he replied. "Look, even if you can't understand it, have faith, the plan is just."

"Are you kidding me right now?" Alex asked. She was shaking at this point. Castiel looked back at her sharply as she continued. "Does it sound just? Killing a bunch of innocent clueless people because of the... the sin of one? How is that okay to you in any way?"

Castiel looked grudging. "It may not make sense to you, but it is what must happen. Because it comes from heaven, that makes it just."

"Oh, it must be nice, to be so sure of yourselves," Dean said sarcastically.

Castiel looked at Dean seriously. "Tell me something Dean, when your father gave you an order, didn't you obey?"
Dean's expression chilled. "Don't go there with me," he said lowly, then pressed his lips into a thin line. "Know what? You two halos might want to leave now. Plans have changed."

"You think you can stop us?" Uriel asked.

Dean began slowly walking toward Uriel, his face a mask. "Maybe not, but if you're gonna smite this whole town, then you're gonna have to smite us with it, because we're not leaving. See, you went to the trouble of busting me out of hell, I figure I'm worth something to the man upstairs. So you wanna waste me, go ahead, see how he digs that. Oh, and remember my baby sis over here? God wants her protected. That means undead. So destroying a city with her in it, not the best idea!"

"I will drag you both out of here myself," Uriel said lowly.

Alex, who had walked up to stand just behind Dean's shoulder, looked at him, unfazed. "I'd like to see you try, asshole."

"With pleasure," he replied, and made to move toward her. Dean and Castiel stepped in at the same time, blocking Uriel's intended path.

"Do not touch the girl," Castiel warned. That got an immediately pleased smile from Alex, directed to Uriel's general direction.

Dean pushed past Castiel, getting in Uriel's face. "Over my dead body you'll lay one finger on her. And if you want to drag me out of here, you'll have to kill me first." He turned and looked at Castiel. "We can do this, we will find that witch and we will stop the summoning. Just call off your attack dog."

Uriel apparently had reached the end of his patience. "Castiel! I will not let these peop-

"Enough!" Castiel commanded loudly, holding up a hand for silence. The room fell into quiet, and Castiel stared at Dean, then glanced at Alex, and then Sam. Alex felt her heart hammering. If Castiel said no, what next? She knew she couldn't stand by and let a whole town go up in smoke, but these were freaking angels... could she and her brothers really stand up to them if they were forced to? She wouldn't find out. It didn't come to that. Castiel relented, and with utmost grimness he looked at Dean. "I suggest you move quickly," he said.

"Yeah great. And I suggest you two get lost," Dean said bluntly. The angels looked at each other, and with the sound of wind against fabric, they disappeared from the room.

Sam appeared shellshocked, and looked at Alex in disappointed confusion. She could see that angels had not made the best first impression on her twin. She was totally blindsided and horrified about the plans to destroy the town and the angels seeming apathy toward human life. Dean, who had remained silently staring at the spot where Castiel had been, breathed in a deep, steadying breath then turned on his sister, his expression quite unpleasant. "Okay, that's out of the way. So. Explain yourself. Now."

Here we go. "Relax, Dean. Listen—"

"No, you listen. You think you can just up and run away in the middle of the freaking apocalypse? That you can just leave without a word to me? I never figured you for a deserter, Alex!" He was pacing in front of her, talking with his hands angrily. "Did you even think about how worried we'd be? My money's on no! What the hell were you thinking?" He was in her face now. "You could have gotten hurt! You might not have been able to find us again! You didn't even think about what this would do to the family!"
"Dean—" Alex tried, looking away from him in discomfort. It was about to get bad here.

"Oh, I'm not done," Dean said, cutting her off. "Of all the stupid crap you've pulled—"

Alex's voice rose as she cut her brother off. "Dean! Did you ever stop to think that maybe this is why I left?" She was trying hard to stay calm, to keep this from turning into another fight, but struggling. "You act like you run this family and the people in it!" He pursed his mouth, disliking her implications. Alex wet her lips, trying to word herself carefully, to speak more evenly. All of the speeches she had rehearsed in her mind were gone, and she found herself stumbling over words. "I just needed some—some room to breathe. Some quiet to work through my thoughts."

"What thoughts?" Dean scoffed. "We have one little fight over Sam's demon crap and you abandon ship?"

"No!" Alex protested, beginning to feel like she was losing. "It's not even that, it's… I just, I didn't know if I could stay and do this anymore. Not with our family in the worst shape I can ever remember it being in, you know? Every time I turn around, one of us is fighting the other about something."

"And?" Dean demanded, not impressed.

"And I can't take it!" Alex shot back.

"Tough crap, Sally Sue. This is our life and it's not all roses and throw pillows."

Alex crossed her arms sullenly. "Okay, now you're just being a dick because you're mad at me."

"You're friggin' right I'm mad!" Dean barked.

At that point Sam, who had quietly watched, piped up. "Dean, come on, take it easy on her."

Dean whirled on his brother. "Shut up Sam! This conversation doesn't involve you."

"Like hell it doesn't," Sam countered, physically approaching his older brother. "Do you honestly think Alex will stay if you talk to her like this?"

"I'll talk to either of you whatever way I like!" Dean retorted.

"Yeah, and look where that's gotten you," Sam said, drawing some serious attitude from Dean in return.

"Look, it's not my problem that you two girls can't handle someone being real with you," Dean said.

Alex sighed in frustration. "This is the problem, Dean. This is supposed to be a family, not a dictatorship. You don't run us."

"Oh, so now it's my fault!" Dean said, crossing his arms defensively. "Where the hell is this coming from? Both of you are free to leave, anytime! I'm not forcing you to stay and I sure as hell don't want you here if you're not committed."

"Dean, come on, man…" Sam was saying, trying to appeal to Dean. But it fell on deaf ears.

"No, she wants to be treated like an adult, Sammy! And adults have tough crap for life." Dean turned and left, slamming the door behind him.
Alex sank down onto the bed, putting her face in her hands and growling in frustration. Her head was killing her again, and her throat felt on fire. After a minute, she felt the bed sink a little lower as Sam sat beside her. His arm came around her and his hand squeezed her shoulder gently. "Hey," he said simply.

She looked up at him, and his sympathetic expression and offer of peace bridged the gap somewhere deep inside for her. "Hey," she replied softly, and they shared a small, hesitant smile. A truce. Sam pulled her a little closer to himself, and she put her head against his shoulder, squeezed him back—and just like that, all the months of being too angry to even speak to each other seemed to evaporate. "He just drives me crazy, Sam!" Alex complained.

"I know, me too." Sam said. "He'll cool off in a couple minutes. He's just been worried sick about you. We, uh, both have."

Alex drew back, looking her twin in the eyes. She felt guilt clenching her stomach again, and she couldn't remember, momentarily, what had possessed her to leave. "I shouldn't have left. I feel really stupid."

"Well, it happened, so, you know, we can get past it," Sam said, his voice full of comforting empathy that she didn't feel she deserved at all. He then laughed softly. "I mean, I kind of understand wanting to leave." He became serious once again. "I've run away before, too, you know." He looked at her remorsefully, just as she squinted and wrinkled her nose—she sneezed loudly, and sniffled.

"Hey, you don't sound too good," Sam said as she grabbed a tissue off of the bedside table.

"It's just a cold. I'll be fine," she mumbled. She blew her nose with noisy gusto, receiving a slightly grossed out look from her twin. She tossed the tissue and stared at her knees. It was time to face what was eating at her. The witch and the mission could wait for a few minutes. "I, uh, owe you an apology, Sammy."

He shook his head. "No, I'm the one who needs to apologize." He paused. "Ever since you left, I've been thinking about it. A lot, and I need to go first." He leaned forward a little, elbows on his knees. "I should have done a lot of things differently. Not lied to you and Dean for starters." He glanced at her briefly, his expression pained. "And not left you alone after Dean died. I was so angry and messed up. And I had myself convinced that you didn't want me there."

Alex shook her head, her eyes softening with regretful, self-loathing tears. "Well, I am the one who said I wished you were dead instead of Dean." She shook her head ruefully. "I wasted so much time blaming you, but... but I pushed you away and I'm really sorry." She looked at him morosely, and he nodded, taking it in stride.

"It's okay," he said tensely. "We both said things we didn't mean that night and I always knew that." He wet his lips, barreling on with more. "You know, I never got the guts to tell you but, ever since you got your voice back... I, I dunno, it was a big change for me. I was always your big brother who you needed, you know? I wasn't used to you being, I dunno, like so independent." He laughed softly, maybe a little embarrassed. "All I knew was for the first time in my life, you yelled at me. You ripped me a new one and... I guess it just really shook me. Mostly because I agreed with what you said about me. I did abandon the family." He looked troubled as he said that.

"I wish I could take it all back. All of it," Alex said softly, remembering her angry, hurtful rant with shame. "It's been hard, you know?" She sniffled a little, and not from her cold. "There's no time to think. I just... say things, before I even know what I'm doing." Sam had again put a reassuring arm around her shoulder and she looked at him through watery eyes. "Telling you that I wished you were dead instead of Dean was the most screwed up thing I could have said," she said, voice cracking. "I'm so sorry. I didn't mean it, not for a second."

Sam's face showed compassion and relief. "I know that. And you need to know—I did not leave the family when I was eighteen because of you, or Dean. I just wanted a normal life at that time. You know, college degree, white picket fence, wife and family... to get away from underneath Dad's thumb..." He trailed off and looked down. "But no matter what I've wanted, I always end up back here. Cuz it's where I belong, I guess." He sounded subdued, not entirely convinced. Alex looked at him sadly. She knew he was always going to long for those things, deep down, and probably never be able to have them.

"I'm just really glad you're here, Sam," she told him honestly. Dimly, she thought how kind of sappy and ridiculous this moment was, but also how glad she was that they'd talked about it.

He cracked a grin at her, his dimples cutting into his cheeks. "Me too," he said. Alex hugged her arms around him, finally feeling okay for the first time in a long time. Even if it were only for a couple seconds.

Dean burst back in just then, looking only a little calmer than when he had left. Seeing them sitting on the bed and embracing he gave them an annoyed look. "Ladies, this is so touching. My heart can't take it. But we have a witch to find and not much time to do it in." He waited expectantly, jerking his thumb toward where he'd come from.

"Yup," Sam said, standing up.

"Also, some jerkwad egged my friggin' car," Dean said, looking supremely aggravated. He looked at Alex and cleared his throat, his expression softening a little, but still remaining gruff. "Sorry about chewing your head off back there. You know how I get."

Alex stood, grabbing the hotel notepad and pen off the side table and coming to him. "Yeah, I do." Dean sighed heavily and held out his hand. "Truce?"

She shook it with her free hand and nodded. "Truce." And that was how Dean apologized.

"Glad you're back, Al," Dean told her, but in no uncertain terms fixed her with a warning look. "But if you leave like that again, I'll friggin' kill you."

"Yeah, yeah," she said, already heading out the door, scribbling on the notepad as she walked. This motorcycle was stolen and belongs to the man at the following address. She wrote down the address of the house where she had stolen the bike from—she'd committed it to memory before whizzing away—and tucked the note into a tight space near the speedometer. She'd call the hotel front desk again in a bit and alert them to the note. She patted the bike sadly. "Nice knowing you," she said before turning to look at Dean, who was laughing at her on the sidewalk.

"Such a do-gooder," he said, but even though he was poking fun at her, she could hear the hint of pride in his voice.

The three Winchesters got into the Impala (which was splattered in eggs, just like Dean had said), and Alex sank into the familiar back seat, breathed in the scent of old leather and familiarity. Up front, Dean was looking at Sam, who had fallen silent since exiting the hotel. "What's wrong, Sammy?"

"Nothing," he said, then sighed, relenting. "I just thought they'd be different."
"Angels?" Alex guessed.

"I just… I mean, I thought they'd be righteous."

"Well, they are righteous, I mean, that's kinda the problem," Dean said, turning on the windshield wipers. "Of course there's nothing more dangerous than some a-hole who thinks he's on a holy mission."

"But, I mean, this is God? And Heaven? This is what I've been praying to?"

"Sucks, doesn't it?" Alex asked, thinking back to all of her strange interactions with Castiel, and now Uriel.

"Yeah," Sam said.

"Look man, I know you're into the whole God thing, you know, Jesus on a tortilla and stuff like that," Dean said. "But just because there's a couple of bad apples doesn't mean the whole barrel's rotten. I mean, for all we know, God hates these jerks. Don't give up on this stuff is all I'm saying. Babe Ruth was a dick but baseball's still a beautiful game."

Sam still looked disappointed at Dean's analogy, but began going through the hex bag, picking out the contents. He pulled out a small, blackened shape that looked suspiciously like a bone. Dean chuckled as he cut off the windshield wipers. "Well, are you gonna figure out a way to find this witch, Sam, or are you just gonna sit there fingering your bone?"

"You think you're so funny," Alex snickered.

"You're laughing," he replied, looking pleased with himself. Alex rolled her eyes.

Sam missed the joke, intently staring at the bone. "You know how much heat it would take to char a bone like this guys?"

"A lot?" Alex asked glibly, getting an eye roll from Sam.

"No kidding, Sherlock," Sam replied. "But more than a regular fire or some kitchen oven."

"Okay Betty Crocker, what's that mean?" Dean asked.

"It means we make a stop," Sam said. "Back to the school."

Alex leaned forward in the seat as Dean started the car. "While we're on the way, can you guys please tell me what exactly the job is?"

"Not it," Dean said quickly.

Sam sighed. "Okay, so basically this witch is trying to raise Samhain, the demon who started the tradition of Halloween. Apparently, today is the day where the veil between the living and the dead is the thinnest."

"Oh. Awesome," Alex commented wryly.

"Yeah. If he rises, he can raise other things from Hell."

"But you guys know who the witch is?"

"Yup. It's this high schooler named Tracy. But we haven't been able to find her."
"Damn." Alex looked at the dashboard clock. It was getting close to six. "We don't have a whole lot of day left, guys."

"Which is why we gotta find her, and soon."

Castiel and Uriel were at the edge of a park, watching the humans who were playing, running, and enjoying the crisp fall weather. "I don't like this," Uriel was saying. He sat on a park bench, his expression terse.

"The decision's been made," Castiel replied from where he stood a few steps off.

Uriel laughed humorlessly. "By a mud monkey."

He received a sidelong glance from Castiel. "You shouldn't call them that."

Uriel chuckled. "Ah, it's what they are, savages, just plumbing on two legs."

Castiel looked at him sharply. "You're close to blasphemy."

Uriel just sighed at him, and Castiel tried to reason with his brother. "There's a reason we were sent to save him. He has potential, he may succeed here." Uriel said nothing, and Castiel sat down on the bench beside him. "And any rate, it's out of our hands."

"It doesn't have to be," Uriel said ambiguously.

Castiel looked at his brother sharply. "And what would you suggest?"

"That we drag Dean and Alex Winchester out of here and then we blow this insignificant pinprick off the map."

Castiel fixed his brother with a stern gaze. "You know our true orders. Are you prepared to disobey?"

Uriel smirked, looking out at the park. "Are you?" He looked back at Castiel, the smile almost mocking.

Castiel didn't understand. "What are you implying?"

"There is concern among our brethren that your judgement has become... impaired. I saw it myself. The way you spoke with those little flecks. Like they were your equals. As if you didn't have command or authority over them." Uriel sounded pious.

"Uriel, you know our duty to our father and his children," Castiel replied. "I'm only carrying out the tasks I've been given."

"No. We both know it has gone far past that. The way you treat them—especially the girl—" Uriel shook his head in judgement, trailing off. "Be careful, brother. Do not confuse humans for angels. And do not let this... fascination be your undoing."

Uriel stood and walked a few feet away, leaving Castiel to himself. And although Castiel did not move or change his expression, he felt a strange sensation somewhere in his stomach. Uneasiness.

After stopping by the high school and visiting the art department, Sam found a drawer where more human bones were stored. That, paired with the brother's realization that the hex bag had showed up in their motel room after they had spoken with the art teacher, helped them make quick work of accessing the school's teacher files and getting the address for a Don Harding. He was the art teacher and apparently had led Sam and Dean on a wild goose chase, tricking them into believing that a student named Tracy was the witch.

It was dark when they got out of the school and drove to Don's house, which was quiet and empty from the outside. But in the basement, they found the art teacher in the middle of sacrificing a small, blonde girl—Tracy. Sam, thinking he was saving the day, shot the man on the spot. When they helped the girl out of the ropes that had tied her up, she revealed herself as the witch and with only a word, sent all three Winchesters crashing to the floor, paralyzed with pain. She set to work completing the spell as the siblings writhed on the floor, helpless. Her chanting grew louder and louder, and the room began to shake with dark power as Samhain's spirit fell upon the room. While Tracy wasn't looking, Sam smeared blood from Don's gun wound onto his face, then Dean's and Alex's, whispering "trust me!"

Then they laid still, pretending to be dead—possibly the stupidest and craziest thing they had ever done—as they listened to Samhain, who now inhabited Don's body, kill Tracy. He then left without even a second glance at the Winchesters, much to their relief. They were quick to get up and try to follow, but Samhain had already disappeared. Sam suggested he would go to the cemetery, where he could raise spirits most easily, and with that as their only lead, the Winchesters found the town graveyard and grabbed their weapons bag.

The Winchesters heard the screams of many voices coming from the crypt in the center of the headstones as soon as they arrived at the graveyard. The three of them raced down the stairs to see that a bunch of teenagers, all in costumes, were locked inside the mausoleum behind a metal gate. Behind them, gravestones were cracking and crumbling. Not good.

"Where's Samhain?" Dean asked, frantically looking around for the demon.

Sam looked down a side tunnel, and then pointed to Dean and Alex. "He must've gone that way. You guys help them!"

"Dude, you're not going off alone!" Dean said, but Sam was already taking off down the hall, the demon blade in hand.

"Just do it!" Sam shouted over his shoulder.

"Dammit," Alex cursed to herself, even as Dean yelled at the teens to stand back, and shot the lock in half. "Go on, come on, get out, move!"

Even as the screaming teens streamed out, a door of a grave in the mausoleum room crashed to the ground, shattering. A once-human, now-zombie crawled out of it, and stood awkwardly even as another grave door crashed to the ground. Another mangled zombie began to crawl out.

"Stake, please," Alex said in a high-pitched, stressed out voice, holding an urgent open hand out to Dean.

He was already rummaging in his rucksack, and tossed her one then pulled out another, his sights set on zombie number one. "Bring it on, stinky!" He charged forward and plunged the stake into the zombie's chest even as Alex dropped the zombie that had only partially crawled out of the grave. Another door of another grave crashed down, then another and another.

"Dean, there's like twenty graves in here!" Alex shouted, lunging at the newest zombie to arrive.
The knife sunk into the rotting flesh with a sickening squelch and she kicked the zombie back, off the blade, her face twisted. Gross. Alex turned, startled, to see a pale woman standing beside her. Alex attempted to attack her with the silver blade, but the woman flickered out and she disappeared, only to reappear behind her. Crap, a ghost too?! Both of the Winchesters went crashing against one of the stone walls.

"Ouch," Alex groaned.

"Zombie ghost orgy huh?" Dean said, and Alex grimaced and made a complaining noise as she pushed herself up to her feet.

She looked at her brother hopefully. "You thinking what I'm thinking?" she asked.

"Yup. We're torching this whole place."

A couple minutes later, Dean and Alex were running down the hall the way Sam had gone, leaving a blazing inferno behind in the mausoleum.

They rounded a corner and froze at what they saw. Sam was standing at the end of the hallway, Samhain facing him. Sam's hand was extended, his face was screwed up in concentration and pain. He was doing exactly what Dean had begged him not to. "Oh my god," Alex breathed, and she looked at Dean in horror. "What do we do Dean?"

Dean's expression was shocked. "I—I don't..." he managed, and then nothing else. Alex turned back, unable to move. Blood was running down from Sam's nose, and he was moaning in pain. They could see black smoke coming out of Samhain as the demon stumbled forward, trying to reach Sam. But the the man fell over, as Sam's exorcism succeeded. Sam shuddered, looking like he might collapse. Breathing heavily, he looked up at his brother and sister, shamefaced. Alex couldn't just stand there—she darted forward and went to his side, trying to help him stand, asking if he was all right, wiping the blood from his face, shaking from adrenaline and shock and even a little fear. Sam was crying, maybe from shame, maybe from pain. It was hard to tell. Either way, he had saved them. But at what cost?

Dean was approaching slowly, his expression sad, and even a little afraid.

---------

The Next Day

Sam and Alex were alone in the motel room, packing up. It had been kind of a quiet morning. Dean had been pensive and troubled, Sam apologetic and conflicted, Alex just ready for it all to be over. She could accept that Sam's abilities had saved them, and that they might not have succeeded without them at all, actually. Yeah, it was eating at her. She didn't know if she should be afraid of Sam. It wasn't exactly a human ability to be able to exorcise demons with the mind alone. She wanted to go back to a time before the abilities, before all of the confusion and gray areas. For now, she decided to try and treat Sam normally. He felt like a freak, and she didn't want him to feel like that. She knew it was a horrible way to feel. She'd been much too harsh on him before.

She stooped to pick something off the floor and looked across the bed at her twin. "Don't forget your dirty socks," she said, and mischievously threw them at his face. He caught them with fractions of an inch to spare and threw them back at her, chuckling. "Hey!" she laughed, then suddenly, her expression fell as she stared at the newcomer on the couch behind Sam.

"Tomorrow," said a deep voice.
Sam whirled around to see Uriel, who was continuing without missing a beat. "November the second, it's an anniversary for you," the angel continued.

"What are you doing here?" Sam demanded, and Alex's eyes darted around.

"Where's Castiel?" she asked mistrustfully.

Uriel stood. "It's the day Azazel killed your mother. The day your voice was taken away," he glanced at Alex briefly before looking back at Sam. "And twenty-two years later your girlfriend's life taken too, Sam. It must be difficult to bear, yet you so brazenly use the power he gave you, Sam. His profane blood pumping through your veins."

Sam's eyebrows raised faintly. "Excuse me?"

"You were told not to use your abilities," Uriel said flatly.

"And what was I supposed to do? That demon would have killed me, and my brother and sister, and everyone."

"You were told not to."

"But if Samhain had gotten loose in this town—"

"You've been warned, twice now," Uriel said, not breaking eye contact with Sam.

Alex came to stand beside her brother defensively. "Sam did what he had to. While you and Cas screwed around and did, hmm, oh yeah… nothing."

"You test my patience, Sam," Uriel said, and finally looked at Alex. "And so do you, little speck."

"Hey," Sam growled, his tone taking on a decisively aggressive tone. "Watch the way you speak to my sister." He shook his head, with a short humorless smile. "You know? My brother was right about you, you are dicks."

Uriel ignored the insult. "The only reason you're still alive, Sam Winchester, is because you've been useful." His presence was threatening, and his gaze deadly. "But the moment that ceases to be true, the second you become more trouble than you're worth, one word. One, and I will turn you to dust."

Alex stepped into Uriel's space, her expression and voice deadly. "You need to back up. Right now." Uriel stared back at her unyieldingly. "You don't come in here and threaten my brother after he saves a whole town from certain death."

Uriel smiled softly, dark amusement playing on his voice. "I do as I like, child. Don't think just because Castiel guards your life that makes you safe." Alex stared, a bit thrown. Uriel finally stepped back a bit. "As for your brother Dean, tell him that maybe he should climb off that high horse of his."

"You know, I've had just about enough of your self-righteous advice," Sam said angrily.

"You should be grateful that I even grace you with my presence," Uriel hissed. He paused and looked at Alex, then Sam again. "Ask Dean what he remembers from Hell." Then, he was gone just as suddenly as he had come. Left behind were two shaken up siblings.

Alex's jaw was clenched. "Angels, man. They think they can just pop in and out whenever!" She was troubled. "What did he mean? About Dean?" She turned to her brother, who looked similarly perplexed and troubled.

"I asked Dean about it, remember? And he said he didn't remember anything from Hell." They looked at each other a long moment, uneasy. Because if Uriel was implying Dean remembered Hell... neither of them had picked up on it.

"I mean, he's seems... okay, right? Maybe a little easier to piss off than normal?" Alex asked slowly. "We would know. Wouldn't we? If something were wrong. We would be able to tell, right?"

Sam looked oddly conflicted. "Maybe not." Alex got quiet. Sam, however, was running a hand through his hair, huffing in agitation. "And what the hell did Uriel mean about you not being safe?" He folded his arms decisively, his jaw set angrily. "I don't like this."

Alex jogged across the street to the park where Dean sat on a bench alone, his back to her. She was fired up and ready to tell him about Uriel and ask him about Hell, but when she got to where he was, she could see that something was wrong from the look on her face. She sat beside him and looked at him intently, forgetting her original objective. "Hey. You okay?"

"Yeah," he said, looking down at the ground between his feet. "Cas just popped in for a quick chat."

Alex's frown deepened. So, he got a visit from an angel, too. "What did he want?"

Dean laughed a short, huffing laugh. "Would you believe he told me that his orders weren't to destroy the town? His orders were to go along with what I said."

Alex couldn't hide her surprise. "What? After that big 'but we have no other choice' speech?"

Dean spread his hands in a shrug. He wasn't angry. He seemed disturbed, which was worse. "But why?" Alex asked, confounded.

"He said it was a test."

"A test? Like, from God?"

Dean shrugged, preoccupied. "I guess."

"Okay... so did you pass?"

A muscle jerked in Dean's cheek. "Cas didn't know." Dean's shook his head, seemingly at a loss. "I mean, look at this. These people, this town. It could all be gone if I wasn't the stubborn asshole that I am." He breathed out heavily, watching a mother push her toddler, laughing, on a swing. "I could've sentenced these people to death without even knowing it. Why is this all on me? I really don't get it. And these so-called angels. Especially Cas." He paused. "I don't know what to make of the guy." The quiet way he said it, the anxious look on his face, the way he was absentely wringing his hands together... Alex was worried. She trusted Dean's judgement, but she felt the same about Castiel: she didn't know. And she was worried about what God wanted with Dean. And for that matter, with her.

She leaned forward, elbows on her knees, matching her brother's stance. "I was beginning to think he was an okay guy until he started talking about wiping out a town of people. But I mean, maybe he can't help it," she supposed with a sad shrug. "Angels don't have free will according to most mythology."

"Maybe not," Dean replied darkly. "I'm not convinced yet."

Alex looked at her brother hard and long. "What makes you say that?"

Dean wet his lips. "Just a feeling."

She thought momentarily about telling him that Castiel was the one who told her to hustle back to Dean and Sam... but then decided against it, for now. She wasn't sure why Castiel had done it, and she wanted to know that first. Especially since it had been kept a secret from Uriel. "Can we trust this guy?" She asked quietly.

There was a long pause. "Not sure yet."

She nodded solemnly. "You know, especially after yesterday, I'm not even convinced that angels are the good guys."

"Yeah. I definitely get that," Dean said, and managed a thin smile. "Life was a lot simpler when it was just demons, huh?"

"Well, whether or not Cas is trustworthy or a good guy or what... he gave me back my brother who I thought was gone forever." She looked at Dean openly, remembering just how glad she was to have him back. "And for that... I can't hate the guy." Dean looked at her from the corner of his eye. Alex continued. "Uriel, however, can go screw himself."

At that, he finally chuckled. "I'm with you on that one."

They sat in comfortable silence for a moment, until Alex decided to make a long overdue confession. "So, Dean, you remember that time Sammy smoked in the Impala?"

"Huh?" He asked. It had, after all, been years ago. "...Yeah, actually," he said, sounding distantly surprised. "I remember. Why?"

"Well, uh... cuz that wasn't Sam who smoked in there." Alex looked at him sheepishly with a please don't kill me expression. "It was me."

Dean looked at her incredulously, his eyebrows raising up high. "That was you?" A disbelieving smile came over his face and he shoved her shoulder playfully. "You little twerp." He thought a minute more then chuckled. "Whooa, I guess I owe Sam a big time apology, huh."

"Yeah, me too. Shouldn't have let him take the fall."

"Ah, he'd do anything for you, you know that. You're too cute to say no to." Alex wrinkled her nose at him and he pinched her cheek, making protest with a groan as she batted him away. He chuckled and then he slapped both of his hands down on his knees. "All right. Enough of all this Doctor Phil stuff. I want a corn dog."

Castiel watched, hidden from human sight, as Alex and Dean made their way back to the motel together. They had the same kind of confident, loping stride and they walked closely. They had clearly made amends, and he heard the rare sound of Alex laughing out loud as the two got further away. He liked that sound.

The little smile on his face faded as his thoughts turned. He was troubled. Telling Alex to come to this city had been his own idea. After he had learned about the plan to present Dean and Sam with the destruction of the city, and after being made aware that Uriel would be the one who accompanied him, Castiel had felt an inexplicable urge to take matters into his own hands and ensure the right outcome. He had known that all of the Winchesters would be against the idea of a whole town being wiped out. They were a family who had fought to save strangers for their entire lives, after all.

But Castiel, knowing Uriel's persuasions, had reasoned that Alex's presence would give Uriel less room to act since she was under angelic protection. And it had worked. Dean had used Alex and himself to derail Uriel, who had very much wanted to destroy the town. Castiel, who was against it from the beginning, had feared Uriel would somehow succeed, somehow destroy this town of humble, helpless humanity. Castiel watched people pass. Families, children, students. All unaware of how close they had all brushed with death.

He now wondered if he had gone too far. Had he manipulated the situation? Had he involved himself where he shouldn't have? How could he know if what he'd done was a violation of God's will or not? Just a few moments ago, he had confided in Dean something he had told no one else—ever. That he had doubts. That he didn't know wrong from right anymore. And he absolutely didn't.

The most unsettling part to Castiel was that no matter where he turned, he felt a disconnect. His angel brothers and sisters were scattered across heaven. The humans that Castiel knew couldn't even begin to understand him, and they certainly didn't trust him. Who could he go to for a glimpse into truth? Where could he find the answers he so desperately needed? He feared that Uriel was right, and that his relationships and with Dean and Alex—his growing fondness and concern for them—had clouded his judgement. There were times when he watched over Alex, in particular, where he became distracted, wondering what she was thinking and watching the things she did with utter fascination. Losing track of time and space as he did so.

He stood there a long time, watching humanity pass by, deeply troubled.
Tilt-A-Whirled

"He is walking in dreams, not knowing reality's name."
- Wuthering Heights

Alex found herself standing in the middle of a place she didn't recognize at first. Once-colorful now-dingy rides and booths were scattered across a flat pavement lot on a foggy day. The Tilt-A-Whirl, merry-go-round, ferris wheel, and rows of cheesy, cheap prizes surrounded her and a wave of reminiscence overcame her. I've been here before. She looked around a minute, trying to remember where she'd been before she was here, but she couldn't recall. This place was silent. No people. No movements of any kind. No smell of the animals at the petting zoo or grease from the funnel cake stand. The fog was thick and cool, and the way that it obscured the near distance made the setting feel a little surreal. This was a dream, she realized. A good dream. She relaxed.

To her right was the bottle toss booth, and Alex wandered over, drawn to it. Rows of old Coke bottles were crowded onto shelves and giant stuffed animal prizes lined the two walls on either side. Alex smiled slightly at the oversized green bear—that had been the one she wanted. At the front of the booth, bowls of beat up rings waited to be thrown onto the bottle necks. She reached for one, smiling, then stopped, suddenly aware of a change. The smile fell. She felt the distinct sensation of a presence behind her. She turned to see an increasingly familiar sight—a man with wild hair, a somber expression, and a beige trench coat. Immediately, she was on guard. Why was he here?

"Hello Alex," he said evenly.

"Cas..." she replied, cautious and mistrustful, watching him closely. "What're you doing here?" She paused, thinking hard, putting two and two together. Castiel had just waltzed into an actual dream of hers, a personal memory—without being invited. That seemed a little bold. She crossed her arms, not thrilled with him invading her private headspace like this.

He was looking around in an oblivious fashion, ignoring her question, seeming especially perplexed by the assortment of carnival rides around. "Where is this?" he asked. His question and his deep gravelly voice made her clench her jaw.

For a minute she thought she wouldn't tell him. Then for whatever reason, she did. "It's a memory. From when I was little." She was curt in her response.

He was looking around at everything with that familiar, stern frown. "This is a place for amusement?"

"What are you doing here?" Alex repeated her question, which was now a demand. He turned his gaze back to her, and inclined his head just slightly, his eyes boring into hers intensely.

The startling crisp blue made her pinched expression falter. "I know you're wondering why I asked you to return to your brothers when I did."

He said nothing else and Alex found her voice and answered very slowly. "Yeah, I am..." She felt dubious. What was the catch?

Castiel breathed in deeply, as if hesitant, and his eyes flickered away from hers. "Truthfully, I did it for selfish reasons." He seemed almost contrite.
"Meaning what?" she asked, equal parts curious and unsettled. She still didn't understand why he was here or telling her this for.

He was still looking down, his expression grim. "I wanted to influence the outcome of the situation. I wanted to make sure that the city would not be destroyed." It almost seemed like he was confessing sins, but weren't those good things he had done? He looked Alex in the eye again. "Your presence created even more reason for Uriel to be unable to destroy it."

Alex's eyes were narrowed as she studied Cas mistrustfully. "Okay... Wasn't Dean being there enough to stop Uriel from being a dick?"

"I... wasn't sure. Uriel can be very persuasive."

Alex tilted her head to the side. "Aren't you Uriel's boss?"

"Technically, yes."

"Then what was the problem?" Alex looked at Castiel long and hard, trying to figure out his angle in telling her all this. She felt her eyebrows raise slightly as realization hit her. "You don't trust Uriel."

"I didn't say that," he said, a little sharply. And to her, his reaction was all the proof she needed.

"You didn't have to," Alex countered, cool as breeze.

He seemed convicted by what she'd said, frowning deeply and looking down. "As I said, Uriel can be persuasive," Castiel said. "And unpredictable. He has a problem with my methods."

Alex grew uncomfortable. "He's not the only one," she muttered, thinking back to Pamela's eyes being burned out, Dean's deep cuts and scrapes from the shattered glass Castiel had rained down on him, the handcuffing, the dream-jacking, the time travel, the town-smiting. Straight up, she didn't think Castiel was trustworthy, let alone Uriel—but like she'd said to Dean... Castiel had brought her brother back from the grave. So, she couldn't exactly hate him. But right now, she wasn't sure why she should trust him. Life had taught her that almost everyone was plotting to screw you over in the end, and she wasn't sure if Castiel were here to help or harm her. She tried to take a deep breath and get a straight answer from him. "Since when do you care what mud monkeys think about or know?"

Alex asked, now deliberately attempting to draw out Castiel's true character.

He looked affronted at her question. "Those are Uriel's words, not mine," he said with deadly seriousness. "I would never call a human that."

"Uh huh." Alex nodded patronizingly, eyes narrowed watchfully. "You'd just level a whole town full of them if two little humans didn't stand in your way?"

Castiel's face was bordering on frustrated. "I carry out the commands of God, whatever they are."

Alex looked at him oddly, unsure how he could say that or be so blindly trusting. He must know God pretty well to have so much faith. "Whatever they are? But what if they're wrong?"

Castiel looked as if she had suggested that the earth revolved around the moon. "That's not possible. There is no fault in God. He is the definition of justice." He paused darkly. "And apart from that, it's not my place to decide right from wrong."

Alex looked at him a long moment, then scoffed and looked away. "Yeah, okay."
"What's wrong?" Castiel asked.

She snorted at his question. "What isn't wrong?" She laughed derisively. "I mean, forget about the whole God thing for a second and I still can't find one thing that's going right." She turned around and grabbed a handful of the rings and began tossing them with angry flair at the Coke bottles.

"You don't know why you're protecting me—" clunk "—you don't know what seals are going to be broken—" clunk "—you don't know if Dean passed the test—" clunk "—you show up and turn my whole friggin' life upside down with your—" clunk "—apocalypse crap, your guardian angel crap —" clunk "—and to top it all off, you're clueless." She looked at him sternly, forgetting the stupid bottle toss rings and approaching Castiel in a confrontational manner. "You have no idea what's going on. I take one look at you and all I see is confusion and ignorance. You'd kill a whole town of people without missing a beat, without even thinking, if you thought God said to do it. Castiel. That's detestable.

Castiel's expression had gone cold. His jaw was set firmly, his voice was lower than before, and his gaze bore into hers unfaltering. "I hold the power of Heaven in my right hand, and Hell itself could not hold a soul in my grip," he growled, stepping closer and invading her space, effectively staring down at her. "My knowledge is vast and unending. I am a soldier of the Lord, a warrior. I am your protector and guardian. I'm the one who brought your brother back from the gates of death itself. You should respect me."

Alex met his gaze challengingly and didn't back down, matched his tone with some fire of her own. "Please. If you think you're going to tell me what to do, you have another thing coming." She took the last ring she had and flicked it against his chest just to be an ass. His jaw tightened at her retort. Alex, however, wasn't done. "And if you have such unending knowledge, why don't you tell me why you're protecting me, or what work God has for Dean, or gee, I donno, how to stop the friggin' apocalypse!" Her voice had raised to a shout, but Castiel remained unblinkingly rigid in front of her.

"Some things are not meant for you to know," was his even-toned reply.

"Says who?" Alex demanded.

Castiel set his mouth and his eyes went down momentarily, as if he were gathering his thoughts or attempting patience. "Alex—have faith. God is in control."

Alex folded her arms, almost laughing. "Is he?"

He couldn't, or wouldn't, look at her when he replied. "Yes."

Alex had an incredulous grimace on her face. "You don't even believe that!" She accused.

His eyes came to her sharply, and he was once again defensive. "You don't know what I believe or don't believe."

Alex raised a challenging eyebrow. "So why can't you look me in the eye and say God is in control?" She unfolded her arms and raised them in a baffled, shrugging gesture. "You claim you're an all-powerful, wise angel but all I see is a confused guy with daddy issues in an ugly trench coat."

He looked down at himself, then back at her, unblinkingly. "I like this coat."

Taken aback, Alex felt a small, surprised smile on her face at the absurdity of him and his sudden comment. She didn't know how to respond. One moment, he was trying to convince her that he was a superhuman being worthy of honor and renown, the next he was affronted that she had insulted his outfit. She expected him to disappear now, but he just stood there, his arms hanging at his sides. He was studying her back, perhaps waiting for her to say something. His face was at the moment free of his constant frown, and it made him look younger, attractive. She heard herself think that single, dangerous thought and mentally slapped herself. No. Just no.

"Uh, so, we're good here, right?" She said, her voice sounding a little stilted. "You can leave anytime." She turned away and went back to the bottle toss booth, hoping he would leave her in peace.

She leaned against the surface of the tall tabletop there and stared at the bottles lining the wall across from her. She heard soft footsteps behind her and she huffed slowly in exasperation. She looked up and sideways, where he stood beside her, staring straight ahead with a face of stone. "Why are you still here?" she asked, momentarily out of back talk, and now just tired and wanting to be left alone.

He looked her way sidelong, his expression grim once again. "When you wake up, it will be November second," he said, and Alex's stomach turned, a million negative feelings going through her all at once as Castiel continued, "The day that—"

"I know what November second is, Castiel!" She cut him off loudly, angrily, standing at her full height. "How would I forget that? The date of my mom's death haunts my life and follows me everywhere. The fire, Sam's demon blood, my voice... I think I know what tomorrow is." She stopped, and breathed, unclenched her teeth, trying to regulate herself. He just stared at her. She pinched the bridge of her nose. "Sorry. It's not my favorite subject. First Uriel comes and rubs it in my face, now you."

Castiel's frown deepened. "What?"

"Yeah. He didn't tell you? You didn't know he came and paid me a visit?" She let out a disappointed puff of air. "Of course not," she muttered. "Well, no big deal. He just came and threatened Sam's life and told me I shouldn't feel safe just because I was under your protection."

Castiel's expression darkened, especially at the last part, but he said nothing.

Alex, however, was turning back to lean her elbows on the booth's tabletop edge, her hands clasped as she let out a slow, heavy breath, trying to collect herself and gather her thoughts. November second stirred great pain inside of her. After a moment, she looked up, shaking her head mournfully. "You know, I never understood how God, or whoever, could let that happen to my mom. To my family."

Castiel was quiet for a moment. "Bad things happen so that good can come out of it."

Alex chuckled bitterly. "Is that what you tell yourself so that you can sleep at night?"

"Angels do not require sleep," he replied matter-of-factly. "Alex half rolled her eyes. It's just a saying, Cas."

"Right. That's why you dudes love to crash human's dreams," Alex muttered.

At this point, he mimicked her posture, leaning his elbows onto the bar. She looked at him strangely, quieted. What was he doing that for? He looked reflective almost, thoughtful, and she couldn't look away from him. She glimpsed something there that she hadn't expected to see and didn't know how to name. "I do sometimes wonder what it would be like to dream," he said. There was a stark, honest sadness there in his quiet statement. For a moment, she was caught off guard.
Then, he turned his head slightly to look at her—his expression surprisingly unguarded and open—she looked away almost immediately, flustered.

She cleared her throat, attempting to be businesslike, attempted to regain control over herself. She didn't like how he did that to her sometimes. Made her uncomfortable and unsure of how to conduct herself. She grabbed a ring and tossed it, missed completely. Damnit. She glanced sidelong at Cas, who was throwing her groove off. He looked at the rings, very perplexed, then up at her from underneath his dark lashes. She edged away a little, gripping the counter tightly. "So, uh, listen," she said, cleared her throat again, trying to stay focused. "I-I gotta know. Was I supposed to have demon blood, too?"

Cas's eyes narrowed just slightly in thought and he straightened a little. "More than likely yes. Nandriel's presence and your mother's interruption prevented it,” he said. Alex's mouth opened slightly in surprise—she tried for a moment to imagine what could have changed if she had received demon blood like Sam had. Cas watched her face work for a moment.

Alex, brows knit together, wet her lips uncertainly. "Why my voice? Why did Azazel do that to me?"

Castiel's eyes narrowed with introspection, and he looked at some distant point in front of them. "My best guess is that when your mother interrupted his actions to Sam, Azazel took your voice as a cruelty. A reminder to you and your family that he had taken more than just your mother." He met her questioning gaze grimly. "An attempt to... break you, since he could not have you for his own." Alex looked at Cas in both dismay and surprise. She didn't miss the fact that Castiel had, in a surprising act of empathy, used the word break, instead of ruin. Because Alex felt like Azazel had taken her voice as a way to ruin her. To mentally break her down, to alienate her from her family and the world around her. And it had almost worked.

Alex felt predictable pain in her chest, but refused to let herself cry. Instead, she shook her head, at a loss. All her anger was used up, and she felt sad and lost. "But I don't understand," she managed softly. "Why did I have to live most of my life on mute? Didn't Nandriel or whoever see how hard it was? How much I had to say and couldn't? The struggles I went through? Why didn't anyone do anything for all those years?" She sounded so lost and unsure, and hated it.

Castiel said nothing for a long moment. He seemed disturbed by the question. "I'm not sure."

Alex's eyes stung with confused, hurt tears that she couldn't hold at bay. "I lived in so much pain, and no one cared. No one did anything."

"That's untrue," Castiel countered, almost defensively. "You were healed."

"Yeah..." Alex was disturbed by the reminder that she still had no idea what creature, spell, demon, or whatever had randomly decided to give her voice back. She was muttering to herself. "But by who, by what, you know? And why? It makes no sense." She looked at Cas glancingly, but something about Castiel's expression startled Alex and her mouth went slack. "Do you know?" she asked, and he looked guilty, or caught. He did know. "You do," Alex breathed, and she stared at him as her heart began to race. "You know who did it!" Castiel's eyes slid sidelong her way, his jaw tight. "Who, Castiel? Who? Please. Tell me. I have to know!"

He moved away and walked a few paces off, his back to her. She followed by a step and a half, breathless, confounded. She couldn't see his face—if she could have, she would have seen shut eyes, an oddly pained, vulnerable, conflicted expression. And then he turned around to face her and he said what she least expected to hear. He almost seemed embarrassed. "It was me."
Three words that made her go still and quiet. Surely he didn't mean what she thought he did. "What was you?" She heard herself ask faintly.

He swallowed, his eyes meeting hers faltering. "I am the one who restored what had been taken from you, Alex."

Utter silence. Alex stared agape at him, her heart stammering in her shocked chest. "What?" She managed softly. Was he serious? Normally, she would have never taken someone who she knew as little as she knew Cas at face value but... for some reason, she believed him immediately, and it seemed to sock all the air out of her windpipes completely. "You?" But why? She struggled for words and understanding even as her adrenaline turned to jello in her veins and her own heartbeat deafened her. "What, God commanded it, or something?"

Castiel's expression showed a strange mixture of what looked like guilt and distress and possibly even shame. His jaw tightened and he looked down. "No. It was not commanded."

Alex blinked rapidly, rendered dumb and wordless for a minute as her mind flew a million miles an hour, trying to understand why he would do that. Why on earth he would do that. She drifted just a little closer, trying to catch his downcast gaze. "Then... why?" His eyes darted back up to hers, but he remained silent. Alex swallowed, oddly vulnerable and depending on him to give her answers to the question that burned her alive. "Please, Cas. Tell me why." She was practically begging, pride gone out the window.

His eyes fell away from hers once again and scanned the ground between their feet. For a minute, Alex thought he wouldn't answer. And then he did. "I... watched you for a long time." His features worked strangely, as if not even he understood what he was saying. "I... felt your pain." He looked to her as if he wanted help understanding what he was saying, and it floored Alex. A muscle jerked in his cheek and he seemed totally unsure of himself, as though what he was telling her was something bad and wrong that he'd done. "I felt compassion for you. I... wanted... you to be able to speak. And that is why I healed you."

The world was heavy, breathing was impossible, and she felt like she'd been slammed with a brick wall epiphany. Suddenly, Uriel's lecture about unnecessary healings made sense, and at the same time, Alex remembered every insult and disrespect she had thrown Castiel's way. Mortified and shellshocked and afraid for some reason, she struggled how to even put her thoughts into words. She owed this strange angel everything and he'd given her a new chance at life because of the goodness of his own heart...? Her eyes glazed over even as she fumbled to understand, to thank him, to try and make up for how shitty she'd treated him thus far. "I... you... I don't know what to... I... Castiel... thank you." Her mouth worked oddly as she tried to keep her composure. He watched her with a grave studiousness and his gaze passed over the tears shining in her eyes. His eyebrows grew a little closer together. "Thank you," Alex repeated tightly. "I, I can never repay you." She wet her lips, trying to understand even as she fought to keep her face from crumpling. She suddenly felt like she owed everything to this angel. How he could have skipped telling her this until now. "Wh-why didn't you tell me this before?" She asked, waiting with baited breath.

Her question made him reluctant, and his body language was closed off, guarded. "I faced discipline. It was not ordained by God. I thought it best to not tell you."

What he told her struck her as terrifying, intense, utterly confounding. The grim look on his face and the rueful way his eyes dodged hers spoke silently of a huge, horrible truth. He'd been punished for helping her? She could read between the lines and heard what he said behind the carefully crafted words. And she wondered why all over again. Why would he have risked so much for a human who had so far trashed him and rolled her eyes at him and believed the worst of him.
It seemed too awful to believe, especially that Heaven would punish an act of compassion. "They... they hurt you for helping me?" She chanced softly, not wanting it to be true.

The tone of her voice seemed to puzzle him, intrigue him, and it was almost like he didn't even hear her question.

"You—you gave me back what was mine," Alex said, trying to tell him that he was a hero, not a sinner. "Nothing about that is wrong."

Did he believe her? His expression was unreadable, but open in a way that wasn't normal for him.

Alex was overcome as she thought about what he had done for her and she stumbled on words, trying to tell him everything, all at once. "I... you gave me what I always needed, and wanted..." she trailed off, chickening out of saying all her feelings and gratefulness. It was too much. Too personal. So she stopped. He held her gaze hesitantly, maybe uncomfortable with her attempts at thankfulness, maybe still unsure if he had done the right thing. Maybe something else. Alex didn't know, but she wanted him to know how much it meant that he'd done that for her.

She wished she could take back some of her more asshole behavior toward him. "Look. I'm sorry. If I had known—" Alex impulsively touched him, grasping him gently at the forearm to show her earnestness. He tensed at her touch, and frowned, looked at her hand oddly. Alex faltered, then realized he must not like to be touched. She let go, embarrassed at the fumble. She wasn't even sure why she'd done that. She attempted to finish speaking, even though she felt hot all over from the beginnings of mortification. "If I had known you were the one who did that for me..." she stopped, shaking her head and looking away for a moment, before looking back. "Thank you. Just, thank you." She felt incredibly repetitive and awkward, and suddenly didn't know what to do.

Castiel's eyes went down, slid over, then looked at the Tilt-A-Whirl, and then the bumper kart corral. "People ride these things?" He asked, effectively switching subjects, however unsubtle.

Alex studied him silently for a second, wondering why he was so eager to drop it. But she went along with it, even though she was thrown off.

She followed his gaze. "Uh, yeah," Alex answered eloquently. "People ride these things." She looked at him curiously for a moment, mystified all over again. "Haven't you been around since, uh, the dawn of time?"

"And before then, too," he answered, still looking around at the scenery in what might be called stern fascination. His previous more unassuming demeanor was gone, and he was the gruff angel she was more familiar with.

She felt herself smiling a little though, because if he'd been around that long, what had he been doing? Twiddling his thumbs as the world went on outside his window? "Okay, so why don't you know about, I don't know, handshakes and personal space and carnival rides?" Alex asked—and unlike her earlier questions to him, she wasn't being sarcastic or rude. She honestly wanted to know.

Cas smirked at that briefly, somehow finding humor in her question, and there were little smile lines crinkling the corners of his eyes. That was the first time she had seen him smile for real, lips turned upward, the expression reaching his eyes. It surprised her. And she liked it. "I suppose you could say..." he thought a moment, "I've missed a few of the details." He looked at her again and she felt small and easy to see through. "Until I obtained my vessel, I saw the world and humanity through a glass darkly."

Interesting. "And when you got your vessel...?" Alex prompted.
His expression softened, and his eyes seemed to see someplace far away as he reflected. "Every day has held uncountable wonders. It's so complex, the human mind. Creation. People. Life." He seemed genuine and truly reverent, and it made her feel similar things somehow.

For a moment, she envied Cas. "Must be nice," she said bleakly, then let a humorless little smile come over her lips. "To me it's all one damn crapfest after another."

Castiel looked at her closely. "I suppose that's understandable," he said, his voice low. "All your life, you've been fighting."

"Yeah," she agreed kind of heavily. "Doesn't look like that's set to end anytime soon." She paused. "Well. Unless we can stop the apocalypse." No big deal, right? It was just the end of the freaking world. She rubbed her forehead with the tips of her fingers tiredly, shook her head, glanced at Cas as she crossed her arms and shifted her weight. "Do you think we actually have a shot?"

Castiel took in a heavy breath and let it out, looking at her with grimness. "Times are dark. The future is very uncertain. Much will be lost."

Well _that_ was optimistic. Alex swallowed and her crossed arms fell, loosened. Would her worst fears would become a reality? Something in the pit of her stomach was filled with such profound foreboding and dread, and in her mind's eye, she saw two young men who she clung to, loved, and needed in her life. "Castiel," she almost pleaded, "I can't lose my brothers. I've watched Sam die. I've watched Dean die. I can't do it again."

He seemed almost empathetic, his expression soft as he approached her. He didn't speak for a long moment. "You need to prepare yourself for that possibility."

Her stomach twisted at his words and she shook her head in denial. "They're all I've got left," she said, as if that would change something.

"I know," he replied softly. Castiel came closer still, and reached out to her. She didn't shrink back, just watched him apprehensively. "It's time for you to wake up, Alex," he said, and two of his fingers came to softly touch her forehead.

Alex was abruptly waking up laying awkwardly in the back of the Impala. But she could somehow feel the warm buzz under her skin where Castiel's fingers had grazed. The dream and Castiel's words, face, presence all disoriented her and remained with her as she lay there for a long moment, trying to process everything that had just happened. She was filled with a deep sadness that seemed to transcend sleepiness or grogginess.

She realized that the car wasn't running. It was silent, and neither Sam or Dean were inside. She could see that the sky outside was still dim, like the sun hadn't come up yet. She sat up slowly, casting glances around until she saw the familiar figures of her brothers—Sam's tall, broad-shouldered one, Dean's shorter, more compact—they were standing about twenty feet off from the car at the edge of a huge, open field. Alex scooted out of the car and went to her brothers, shivering a little. It was cold and damp, a morning where fog laid low, like a blanket, across the land. The sun would be up soon—the sky was a pale violet color, and frost crunched under her boots.

Her brothers acknowledged her arrival with a glance (Dean), and a tight smile (Sam). "November second," Sam said softly, eyes fixed on the horizon.

"November second," Alex echoed quietly.

There was a long, heavy silence, all three of the Winchesters lost in their own thoughts and grief.
Alex wanted so badly to tell them about the dream... about Castiel... about the feeling she couldn't shake that something horrible was going to happen. But she remained silent. Sam, finally spoke up softly. "You know, when I think about everything we've lost... all the complete crap we've been through... all because of him." They knew who Sam was talking about. Azazel.

"Wish I could've stopped it," Dean said softly. "I tried. I tried like hell. I could've prevented you from being pumped full of demon blood, Sam. I could've saved you from spending your life mute, Alex. Mom could've even lived, maybe. Dad would still be here..." his voice was full of a pain and guilt he didn't deserve to carry, and Alex looked at him. It was hard to see very well in the dark, but he looked miserable.

"Hey." Alex demanded his gaze. "Dean. What Yellow Eyes did wasn't your fault, and it never will be. You took care of him—he got what was coming." She paused, reflecting somberly, staring down at the ground, her hands in her jacket pockets. "And this family, what's left of it, is stronger than what he threw at us. He tried to silence me, he tried to use Sam. He tried to rip us apart." She looked up at the brightening horizon. "Well. It didn't work."

"I'll drink to that," Dean said. He looked distracted, but gave her a half-smile. Sam put his arm around Alex, squeezing her shoulder tightly.

For another long moment, silence spanned the group. In the distance, a raven called. Sam wet his lips and then spoke to the air in front of him. "Mom. Wherever you are... I just hope we make you proud."

Alex stared out at the horizon, stone-faced. Castiel's words haunted her. Times are dark. The future is very uncertain. Much will be lost.

They drove the rest of that day, mostly in silence and reflection. Alex went back and forth mentally, trying to figure out how to bring up Cas's dream-visit to her brothers. She wasn't sure how exactly to explain it... "oh yeah, by the way, Cas came to me in another secret dream and told me he's the one who gave me my voice back"—would that suffice? She let it go awhile and just spaced out, staring at the ceiling as she picked apart the dream piece by piece in her mind. Wondered about Mom. Hoped Castiel was wrong about the apocalypse. And in the deepest places of her mind, she couldn't stop thinking of the way his face had looked when he'd told her he was the one who had healed her. Her guardian angel had decided all on his own to fix what was broken. It made her heart swell and emotions rise when she thought about it too much. He hadn't needed to, and no one had made him. He'd just done it for her because he'd seen her pain. Wow. What was she supposed to do with that information?

Finally, Dean declared that it was time to stop and eat. Dean picked a local bar and grill—the outside was decorated with a ridiculous dancing pineapple mascot. They were seated inside, where Dean hungrily scanned the menu, and Alex sat there silently, feeling queasy. She exchanged a glance with Sam, who she knew wanted to ask Dean about Hell. He hadn't found an opportunity yet, and neither had she.

A scrawny pale guy in a bright vest covered in shiny, multicolored pins arrived to their table, an order pad in hand. He had the most ridiculous smile on his face, and Alex was immediately annoyed. "Alllllright folks, how we doing? Great!" the waiter said, without giving them a chance to reply. "Start you guys off with a chili dog dipper to share? Or a delicious MexiNacho fiesta?"

"No, we—" Sam started, but the waiter didn't hear him. "Get you guys a nice cheddar roaster burger, huh? Or our jalapeño Frito pie—it's great on days like this!" Days where your mom died? Days where you are about to confront your brother on what Hell was like? Days where an angel basically implied you would lose both of your brothers in the coming days?
"I'll have the chef salad," Sam said, and handed his menu over cautiously, as if the waiter might be contagious.

Dean snapped his menu shut. "Burger. With bacon. And cheese. All the toppings, extra onions. Do not burn it. Fries on the side. And bring me some three wise men shots." Dean's favorite... a blend of several kinds of whiskey.

"Sure thing! How many, man?"

"I dunno, let's start with eight," Dean said nonchalantly, to which the waiter's eyes went a little wide for a minute. He peered at Dean over to top of his notepad, trying to figure out if Dean were serious. Even Sam and Alex looked at Dean a little oddly.

"Uh, okie doke!" the waiter said, resuming his inhumanly wide smile. He turned to Alex. "And what for the lovely lady?"

"Nothing, thanks," she said with dismissal apathy.

But the waiter's face went all sensitive, like she had just broken sad news to him. "Oh, come on now... how about our new smoky and sweet chicken-delishen sandwich? Super yummy!"

"No, I—"

"Or our in-house specialty, the firegrilled pineapple enchiladas? Yum-o!"

Alex gave him her best death glare. "I said nothing."

His smile faltered, then was back with a vengeance. "Okay, well just let me know if you change your—"

"Just go away man!" Alex said peevishly, not looking at him anymore.

"Uh yeah, right on," the waiter said, still managing to sound upbeat. He scurried away.

"Meow," Dean commented with a chuckle. He got a bitchy expression from his sister in response.

"You really should eat something, Alex," Sam said, his tone worried. "You've lost weight."

Alex ignored his comment, and cut to the chase, fiddling with her silverware nervously. "Castiel is the one who gave me my voice back."

"What?" both brothers chorused, staring in disbelief.

"Yup. He showed up again in a dream of mine last night and... it was him." She clanged her fork down onto the table and looked at both of them in turn. There was a shocked silence.

"Did he say why?" Sam asked, incredulously.

"Yeah," she said, shrugging, studying her fork closely. She didn't go into detail, because it felt sort of personal. "The goodness of his own heart."

Both of her brothers immediately looked very suspicious. "It wasn't a, you know, God thing?" Dean asked pointedly.

"Apparently not. He said he got in trouble for it."
"So he did it... on his own?" Dean surmised. He didn't look like he loved that sound of that at all.

"The plot thickens," Sam muttered, and Dean's face was working overtime, his expression confounded and then pissed and then doubtful.

For the next few minutes, they theorized back and forth halfheartedly, and Dean ended it with an exasperated "Freakin' angels. Who knows!"

The food arrived in a few minutes, and Alex waited as long as humanly possible to bring up the next subject to her oldest brother. After maybe his fifth huge bite of his burger, and a couple of his shots, she charged forward. "So, listen Dean. Uriel paid us a visit yesterday." Sam stopped mid-bite, glancing at Alex before looking at Dean intently.

"How nice," Dean said flatly, and downed his third shot of the night.

Alex leaned forward over her folded arms, trying to get his attention. "Which part? The one where he threatened to turn Sam to dust when he uses his powers again, or the part where he told us to ask you what you remember from Hell?"

Dean almost choked on his shot. "Come again?"

"You heard me."

Dean looked between his siblings, and then seemed to draw the conclusion that they were ambushing him. He shook his head and jabbed a finger in each of their directions. "Okay, first of all, I don't remember Hell, at all. And second, when were you gonna tell me a damn angel threatened your life, Sam?"

"Forget the threat, Dean. That's neither here nor there. Why would Uriel tell me you remembered Hell if you didn't?"

"Maybe because he's a dick," Dean retorted gruffly. "Might have something to do with it."

"What, he told us that just to screw with our heads? That makes sense." Alex retorted.

"Yeah, I dunno! I mean this is the angel who was ready to level an entire town. Look, I don't know what—"

"Radical!" The cheerful waiter from hell was back, and unaware of the argument he was interrupting. "What else can I get you guys?"

"Uh, I think we're fine," Sam said, trying to politely get rid of the waiter. It didn't work.

"Yeah? You guys don't wanna try a couple of fryer bombs? Or a chipotle chili changa?"

"Uh, no, thanks, we're good," Sam said, while Alex just gave the server an evil eye. This dude was too much, especially right now.

The waiter looked over at Alex, his smile faltering a little. "Okay, awesome!" He then said, and left.

Dean glanced at Alex. "Look, honestly, I have no idea why Uriel told you what he did, okay?" He smiled a very sarcastic, acrimonious smile and attempted to down another shot. Alex's hand darted out and grabbed the shot glass right out of his hand just before he had it at his lips. "Hey!" Dean exclaimed. She had leaned back in her chair, holding the shot out of his reach.
"You're lying." She accused.

"I am not! Give me my damn shot," Dean said, and swiped angrily at the shot glass. She did not comply, just stared at him, unamused.

"Okay, fine," Sam said, attempting to reason with Dean. "If you're not lying, you can look me in the eye and tell me you don't remember a thing from your time down under."

Sam waited expectantly, and Dean, rolling his eyes and sending an evil eye at Alex, looked Sam in the eye impatiently. "I don't remember a thing from my time down under. I don't remember, Sam!" Dean was agitated, and a couple people at a nearby table looked over curiously at the outburst.

"Look, Dean, we just wanna help," Sam said, trying to play the compassion card.

Dean shot him down. "You know everything I do. Okay? That's all there is!"

"Outstanding!" Said the cheerful waiter, who seemed to reappear out of thin air. At the sight of him, Alex took the shot she'd kidnapped and downed it, much to Dean's dismay. "Dessert time? Huh? Am I right?"

"Dude," Dean said, losing patience, with the waiter and with his siblings both.

"We don't want any," Alex said, her tone decidedly menacing.

Still, the waiter's plastered smile didn't waver and he launched into another attempt at upselling. He leaned down over the table as if sharing some great secret with them. "You have got to try our ice cream extreme. It's extreme."

Alex crossed her arms and leaned back in her chair. "Yeah, bring me some. I'll shove it right up—"

"Whoa, whoa. Just the check, man," Sam said, attempting a lighthearted chuckle to cover up his siblings rudeness.

"All right! Awesome!" The waiter whipped their bill out from behind his pin-studded vest and slapped it on the table before walking off, a ridiculous smile still on his face.

"Geez, Al, what's with bitch mode?" Dean asked, giving her a dirty look.

She returned the dirty look. "Give me another one of those." Before he could react, she had snatched another one of his shots.

"Hey!" he exclaimed, then "dammit, Alex," when she drank it.

Sam just sighed, flustered and a little embarrassed. People were staring. Dean, protectively guarding the last couple shots he had, looked to Sam. "All right, so, where do we go from here?"

"I'm not sure," Sam said, "Uh, looks like it's been pretty quiet lately. No signs of demon activity, no omens or portents I can see."

"That's good news for once," Dean said, and reached for his glass of beer.

Alex made a sound like "pssh" and when he looked at her sullenly, she gave him a pointed look. "It's too quiet. Remember the whole apocalypse thing?"

Dean's expression soured slightly. "Trying not to."
Sam, who had pulled his laptop out, handed it over to Dean. "Here, check this out. Uh... up in Concrete, Washington, eyewitness reports of a ghost that's been haunting the showers of a women's health facility," Dean choked on his beer. "The victim claims that the ghost threw her down a flight of stairs." Dean threw his napkin onto his plate and cramned a couple last french fries into his mouth. Sam chuckled. "I can see you're very interested."

Dean was slapping down cash onto the table, suddenly in a huge hurry. "Women, showers. We have got to save these people."

Even though she was pissed with him, Alex chuckled a little at typical Dean. "Oooof course we do," she said, to which he winked as he stood, already pushing the chair in and headed for the door.

"Why do we let him stay in charge, again?" Alex asked Sam, who just shrugged helplessly, laughing a little. He got a little more serious, and pulled her back for a second as Dean walked ahead.

"It'll come out, Alex" Sam told her quietly. "He'll tell us eventually. I know he will."

"Yeah..." Alex replied, but she wasn't sure. Dean had enough issues to fill the grand canyon, but almost always refused to face them. He was constantly on emotional lockdown... even to his family. Did he really remember the horrors of Hell? Why wouldn't he tell either her or Sam? Deeply troubled, Alex trailed her brothers out of the restaurant.

"Have a nice day! Come back and see us!" The waiter yelled after her, waving and smiling like he was saying goodbye to an old friend. It took all she had not to turn around and salute him with her middle finger.
Alex paced the front porch of Bobby's house with increasing agitation, trying to reconcile everything that had happened the past few days. She hadn't slept, showered, or eaten any real food for a couple days now, and currently couldn't find an end to the things that were pissing her off. The very fact that Ruby was here, at Bobby's house, was enough to send Alex through the roof, but oh no, there was more... earlier that week Sam came clean about his questionable relationship with the demon—with all the shocking, R-rated details—and it left Alex completely mystified and, to be frank, grossed out. Demons were the enemy, period. Sam should not have involved himself with Ruby, especially not that way—it made Alex's skin crawl to think about it. Ruby's smug smiles and superior attitude were the icing on the damn cake, and Alex was all but ready to knife the bitch... too bad the demon blade had been stolen the other day. Sam had been brainwashed, Alex was sure of it—and blamed Ruby entirely for it. She huffed loudly as she turned on her heel, pacing the length of the porch again in the bitter cold of night. Alex wanted to punch something, but just clenched her fists and muttered obscenities aimed at life in general under her breath.

Ruby's presence wasn't the only thing wrong in the world right now. There was also Anna, a girl who could hear angels. They'd picked her up a couple days ago (at Ruby's insistence), and her presence was causing major problems. Demons were after her, and so were angels... and they had already had confrontations with both sides. The demons had attacked them in a church, and the angels had found them at the hunting cabin. Wherever they went, angels appeared. Alex sighed tiredly, trying to remember a time in her life before the trouble that angels brought. Anna herself was a fallen angel, as they had found out earlier the same day. She'd discarded her "Grace"—the thing that made her an angel, in order to become human. It made little sense to Alex. But when Castiel and Uriel had showed up, insisting Anna needed to die, things had really gotten bad. In short, these angels were really starting to fuck shit up.

Alex she didn't understand Castiel's role in it all. She had thought, for a little while, that maybe he wasn't so bad. Especially when he said he gave her the ability to speak again—that had turned her world upside down. But after their last encounter, she wasn't sure who Castiel was. Cas seemed to be two different angels: the intriguing, curious one she glimpsed in small, private moments when it was the two of them, and the rude, fierce one who was frightening and robotic—she saw this one much more frequently.

"Cas, please—" Sam had said, trying to appeal to Castiel's sensibility. He was standing between Castiel and the door to the bathroom, where Anna hid. But without hesitation, Castiel touched a finger to Sam's head, and Sam crumpled to the ground, unconscious. Alex darted over to stand between between Cas and the door. She felt very small under his fierce gaze. He looked murderous, like he meant business. Not like the Cas who had come to her in a dream and been so gentle and reflective.

"Get out of the way, Alex," Castiel had said lowly, and stepped forward, but made no move to Alex had stared at him; confused, afraid, defiant. Was he really going to knock her out, too? "Or what?" she challenged, hedging her bets and taking her chances. He never had a chance to reply. The angels had both disappeared in an abrupt and blinding flash of light and a sound like mighty winds. A few minutes later, they learned that Anna did that, blew the angels away to the four corners of the earth—a warding trick that she'd remembered from her angel days.

The memory of that bothered her. Alex had actually begun to like Castiel and even trust him a little (just a little) after he admitted that he'd risked so much and done so much for her. Why would he be so kind to her and then be so merciless and careless towards others? Was he a mindless machine—a hammer, as Dean had put it, or not? Alex wouldn't admit it to anyone, but she'd found herself kind of hoping he was more than met the eye. But now she thought maybe he wasn't. It was frustrating and disheartening and it was taking up way too much brainpower and time.

Alex gave up on pacing and went inside to check and see what Sam had found—their current plan was to get Anna's Grace back. Once they could find it, she could have her powers back and be capable of protecting herself and them.

In Bobby's study the light was dim and Sam was at the desk, hunched over a bunch of books and his laptop. Ruby was hanging back a little, and eyed Alex with no enthusiasm as she entered. Ugh. Alex ignored her purposefully and leaned over the desk, peering down at the screen over her twin's massive shoulder. "Find anything?"

"Maybe..." Sam said, acknowledging her with a glance. "In March of eighty-five, a meteorite vanished in the night sky over northwestern Ohio. It was sighted nine months before Anna was born, and she was born in that part of Ohio."

"You're pretty buff for a nerd," Ruby commented, not hiding her flirty tone. Alex glanced her way, testily, and Ruby raised a single, insolent eyebrow.

Sam seemed to miss the exchange, pointing to another part of the map. "Look, I think it was Anna and here, same time—another meteor over Kentucky."

Alex looked away from Ruby, trying to focus on what Sam was saying. "So that could be her Grace...?" She guessed.

"Could be," Sam confirmed.

"All right. That just narrows it down to an entire state." Ruby said sarcastically, earning another dark glance.

"Look, it's a start," Sam said.

Ruby sighed softly, suddenly seeming to be introspective. "Guys, I'm sorry."

Alex looked her way suspiciously, coming out from behind the desk and crossing her arms. "For what?" Sam asked.

Ruby's face was apologetic, which Alex didn't buy for a second. "For bringing you this mess with Anna. If I had known, I would have kept my trap shut."

"Not all you should have kept shut," Alex muttered.

Ruby didn't miss the comment. Her eyes glittered darkly, and she folded her arms, gazing at Alex challengingly. "I screwed your brother and he liked it," she purred. "What're you gonna do about it?"

In a second, Alex had darted across the space separating them and shoved Ruby up against the wall with surprisingly violent force. "Shut your fucking mouth, bitch!" she snarled.

"Hey, get off her!" Sam had jumped up, attempting to pry Alex away, but Alex smacked him away brusquely, giving him a death glare, and he backed off, maybe stunned.

Alex had a fistful of Ruby's shirt in her hand as she pushed the demon against the wall. Ruby was just smiling, as if she were pleased with Alex's reaction. Alex stared her down unflinchingly, getting in her face. "Do you remember who you're talking to, Ruby? Unlike my brother here, I could care less if you live or die—and you need to remember, just because you've been useful, and just because the demon blade is missing, doesn't mean I won't exorcise your ass right here and now." Ruby's smile faded, as if she had forgotten what exactly Alex was capable of. "So watch your damn mouth with me," Alex finished, and she let Ruby go with a strong shove, stepping back and not taking her eyes off the demon for a second. Sam was gaping at Alex, a little horrified, and even Ruby seemed momentarily stunned.

"Hey, come on," Sam said, gathering himself and trying to play peacemaker. "T-there's more important stuff going on right now besides our personal lives. We have a crisis to get through."

Ruby looked at Sam and narrowed her eyes. "Uh, no. This is not something we just get through. You do not want to get between these two armies. Angels and demons, it's like Godzilla and Mothra. If one side doesn't get us, the other one will."

"What's the matter, sweetie pie—scared of the halos?" Alex said sarcastically.

Ruby rolled her eyes. "Forget the angels. It's Alastair I'm scared of."

"And who the hell is Alastair?" Alex demanded. She'd never heard the name before.

"You met him in the church?" Ruby prompted. "Practically the grand inquisitor downstairs. Picasso with a razor."

"And...?" Sam asked.

"And if you know what's good for you, you'd throw him back in the pit." Ruby looked at Sam meaningfully, as if she were trying to tell him something, and Sam immediately reacted by looking away from her, as if guilty.

Alex looked between the pair suspiciously. "Am I missing something?"

"No." Ruby glanced at Alex darkly. "You just better pray that Anna gets her groove back, or we're all dead."

Alex folded her arms again and pursed her lips. "We don't pray. We make things happen."

"Yeah, whatever," Ruby muttered with an eye roll, and walked out of the room with one backward glance at Sam. The outside door slammed behind her as she left the house.

Alex turned on her brother as soon as the demon was out of earshot. "Okay, remind me why we're keeping her around? You know how I feel about that fucking black-eyed bitch, Sam."

He looked less than amused. "Yeah, you don't exactly try hard to hide your feelings about her, do "You," he muttered.

"She's a demon," Alex said vehemently, and Sam almost rolled his eyes in protest. "Who has helped us countless times," he reminded her earnestly. "Saved our lives. She's different, Alex."

Alex stared at her twin in disgust. How he could actually believe that was beyond her. "Sam, she's not different. You're kidding yourself. I don't know what her game is in all of this, but she's not trustworthy." Sam opened his mouth to protest, but Alex held up a warning finger. "You would have a different opinion of her than me, Sam. After all, you screwed her." Sam's expression went all hurt and angry, and Alex regretted her choice of words. She wet her lips. "Sorry, I shouldn't have..." she let the sentence hang and huffed, a little embarrassed. "Look. End of story, I don't trust her. Never have, and never will."

Sam huffed in frustration, and his mouth worked oddly. He searched her eyes, his expression becoming pained. "Then trust me."

Alex looked at him silently for a long moment, wishing she could. Her eyes fell away. "After all the decisions you've made here lately?" Alex let out a heavy breath. "Sam. I don't know if I can do that."

The Next Day
Union, Kentucky

Alex stalked over to where Dean was pacing the length of the abandoned barn they were currently squatting in. After finding where Anna's Grace had touched down a couple hours ago, they had quickly realized it was gone. Taken. With only the angel hex bags Ruby had made shielding them from Castiel and Uriel's eyes, it felt too exposed and dangerous. The long drive (twelve long, long hours) to Union had been one of the worst Alex could remember. She'd been stuck in between Ruby and Anna in the backseat of the Impala, in uncomfortable silence or recipient of catty remarks back and forth. Not her favorite road trip ever.

"Okay, so what's the plan?" Alex demanded irritably of Dean, who stared back at her grouchily. They were all short on sleep, but she and Dean most of all. She hadn't slept in about three days now, and god she needed to. Part of the reason she couldn't do it was an odd paranoia that Castiel would plague her dreams again. Maybe that was stupid, but she really didn't want to have to look at him right now... or talk to him... or think about him. Especially if he was going to be an asshole instead of the nice Cas who had wondered what a Tilt-A-Whirl was.

"We still got the hex bags. I say we head back to the panic room," Dean was saying, and Ruby rolled her eyes.

"What, forever?" she asked, as if he were the dumbest person alive.

"I'm just thinking out loud!" Dean retorted.

"Oh, you call that thinking?" Ruby asked sarcastically.

"Will you shut up," Alex said, glaring at the demon sidelong. All day and night long, Ruby had been making sarcastic little comments and jabs, and each one wore away a little bit more of Alex's already-thin patience. She was ready to kill someone—anyone—and Ruby kept tempting her to follow through on the urge.
"You," Dean said accusingly as he pointed at Alex, "need to can the freakin' attitude."

"My attitude? What the fu—" Alex started, offended.

"Hey! Hey, hey, hey. Stop it. All of you." Sam said as he came into the barn. He and Anna were the only ones who hadn't blown a fuse in the past twenty four hours, but he seemed to be coming close after the constant bickering.

Ruby turned on Sam, her voice a little higher than normal, as if in fear. "Anna's Grace is gone. You understand? She can't angel up, she can't protect us. We can't fight Heaven and Hell. One side maybe, but not both—"

"Um... guys?" Anna said, interrupting. She was staring into space oddly. "The angels are talking again." She immediately had everyone's attention.

"What are they saying?" Sam asked intently.

"It's weird... like a recording... a loop," Anna said, frowning. "It says, 'Dean Winchester gives us Anna by midnight, or…'" she trailed off, her expression gone still.

"Or what?" Dean asked. Alex didn't miss the note of fear in his voice.

Anna looked at him squarely in the eye. "...or we hurl him back to damnation." Dean's face was shocked, and he looked at Alex, then Sam, speechless.

"Son of a bitch," Alex exclaimed softly, then looked at Anna. "They're bluffing. Right?" Anna was silent a long moment. "They're bluffing, aren't they?" Alex demanded louder, needing an answer now.

Anna looked at Alex grimly. "I doubt it." she said. Alex felt her blood go cold, and her head felt strange, light. She looked at Dean, who was staring at the floor, clearly alarmed and thinking quickly. No. Dean could not go back—not now, and not ever.

"Anna, do you know of any weapon that works on an angel?" Sam was asking Anna.

Surprised, Anna stared back at him. "To what? To kill them? Nothing we could get to... not right now."

Dean was shaking his head, trying to derail Sammy from the desperate idea. "Okay, wait, wait. I say we call Bobby. We get him back from hedonism."

Alex looked back at Dean sharply. "Dean he knows less than we do about angels! What the hell is Bobby going to do?"

"I don't know, but we gotta think of something!" Dean exclaimed, getting more riled.

"Yeah, like, do what the angels say and hand her over." Alex said, thinking this one was pretty obvious. They didn't have any part in this angel family drama, so why not just hand this girl over and be done with it?

Dean looked at her darkly. "No." He seemed mad at her. "Neither side is getting her, okay?"

It was the lack of sleep, the despair, and her inability to keep her mouth shut that inspired the next outburst: "Well then just kill her, and neither side gets her!" Alex snapped. Everyone in the room, even Ruby, looked at her in shock. Anna appeared crestfallen and hurt, maybe even embarrassed.
Alex set her face and tried to play it off.

"Whoa, whoa, no—Alex, hell no." Dean said, recovering from his momentary shock and becoming angry once again. "That is not an option. Why would you even suggest that?"

"Dean, I am not watching you die again because of some... some demon-angel drama we have nothing to do with!" She threw her arms out wide, exasperated.

"You don't get to decide that," Dean said, speaking with a rough finality that Alex didn't like. He shook his head, suddenly aghast, as if he couldn't believe what she had said. He was approaching her now. "We are not going to kill someone, Alex!"

"Fine, but why are we responsible?" Alex asked emphatically. "She got herself into this mess. Ripped out her Grace, fell from Heaven. Her choice! She had to know the angels would catch up to her eventually. So why are we on the hook to save her? We don't even know her!" She felt heartless saying it, because saving people was what they did—but she also meant what she said. This was a super-powered being, Anna shouldn't be involving humans like this.

"Guys—" Sam interjected.

Dean held a hand up in Sam's face, cutting him off as he stared his sister down, disappointed. "Really, Alex? Just let this girl face Heaven and Hell all by herself?"

Alex felt everyone's judging eyes on her, and she began to doubt her position. It reflected in her weakening voice. "Well the hell else are we supposed to do?"

"I don't know!" Dean shouted angrily, clearly at a loss and unhappy about it. He was now in her face. "But not hand her over, not kill her!"

"Then you'll die! Again!" Alex practically shouted, waiting for him to rethink, to remember, to come to his senses.

But he stepped back and shrugged. "Hey, it's just a risk we have to take."

His nonchalance about living or dying was like betrayal and Alex felt heartbroken. Didn't Dean know how much she needed him to stay alive and be her big brother? He seemed apathetic and Alex was incensed and hurt by it. "Come on, Dean! You cannot be serious!" She was shaking now. He was really willing to die again over this? Go back to Hell? She hated him in this moment for doing this to her.

Dean just looked at her darkly, shaking his head in what looked like disgusted annoyance. "Alex, you're really starting to piss me off," he muttered, and turned his back on her.

Alex stared at him in disbelief and hurt, then glanced at Sam for support, but he looked away, silently saying that he wanted no part of it. Anna nearby was looking down with a hard to read expression on her face. Alex's jaw clenched, and she realized she was all alone in this fight. She looked at Dean's back, angry. So, her concern for his life was starting to piss him off? She sneered in his direction, trying to hurt him like he hurt her. "Well the feeling's mutual, asshole."

And she stormed out.

Alex stalked out into where the woods began, a good twenty yards away from the barn, and there she promptly sank down into an awkward crouch, hugging her knees, burying her face there, and gritting her teeth tightly. She sobbed loudly, trying to cover up the sound, unable to control herself.
at all and hating herself for it. Dean didn't know. How bad it had hurt when he died. How bad it hurt that he didn't get how she couldn't go through it again. He was a jackass for not realizing how important it was to her that he stay alive. Because honestly, him dying had almost killed her, too...

"What are we supposed to do without you, Dean?" Sam had asked tearfully.

Dean had grown quiet, his emotions buried deep, but surfacing in his soft shaky voice. "Fight. Take care of my wheels. Remember what Dad taught you. Remember what I taught you. You two take care of each other, no matter what. I..." the clock striking midnight had cut him short. They had all known what the striking of the hour meant. Dean was a dead man.

The tear tracks on her cheeks were cold in the night air and Alex stood up and shoved her hands into her jacket pockets savagely, staring and seeing nothing but memories of that horrible night. Her worst nightmare, her most terrifying memory. It replayed in staccato scenes and sounds over her mind's eye, and she squeezed her eyes shut, tried to think about something else. But she couldn't think of anything except the horrors of May the second.

She remembered it all so clearly...

Dean's eyes, slowly traveling to his right as he heard the hound who had come to take him. Their frantic attempts to shut themselves into a dining room, to hold off the hellhound. Lilith revealing herself in Ruby's body and pinning Alex and Sam to the wall gleefully. The low throttling growl of the beast outside, waiting. Just waiting. Alex had been glued helplessly to the wall and she screamed as the doors flung open, and the invisible hound rushed in, like a gale of wind. Unable to do anything, Alex's ears were filled with her brother's screams of agony—the sound of his flesh being torn apart, the sight of his chest being ripped to shreds. How horrible, how utterly wretched, that she had been stuck and not able to help when he'd needed her the most.

She tried not to remember, but it all replayed over and over. Hot tears ran down her cheeks anew as the memories she had so carefully avoided for so long resurfaced. Lilith had tried to kill Sam as Dean lay dying, but somehow, it hadn't worked. Sam had almost killed the demon then and there, but she fled, a coward, just before he brought the blade down. Alex had dropped from where she had been pinned, free of the demon's grip. And then, the terrible silence.

There Dean laid, lifeless. Sam rushed to his brother immediately, the demon blade clattering uselessly to the floor, forgotten. But Alex just stood there, frozen, breathing oddly, something like gasps or sobs at the sight of Dean in a pool of his own blood—she almost fell backwards. Her muscles seemed to have lost all their strength, her blood felt like it was draining out of her, she wanted to be sick and she almost felt like she would die, too. She heard herself begging no no no as she fumbled forward and then collapsed to all fours, barely able to keep conscious against the dizzying grief and horror. The knees of her jeans were wet with Dean's still-warm blood as it pooled out onto the floor. Sam held Dean in his lap, as one might hold a child, tears running down his face as he cried high, terrified weeping sobs. Dean's eyes staring at nothing, his body was still, silent, lifeless. He was gone. Forever.

Alex remembered that at that point, her vision had gone half out, her muscles had turned to water, her stomach had twisted into a thousand sickened, putrid knots, and she couldn't stop shaking as she wept in every sense of the word. Mind, body, and soul, crying out in sorrow and horror and denial.

Alex huddled near Sam, clutching Dean's stiffening leg and sobbing out unintelligibly, her heart beat choking her. She just wanted to know that this wasn't real. That Dean would be okay. But it was real, and Dean was dead.
She remembered digging Dean's grave alongside Sam and Bobby in an empty lot of land, where there would be no marker to speak of. Just a shallow, nameless grave in the woods. They had done it in absolute silence. Alex remembered how heavy the dirt had felt; how hard it had been to dig the grave... but how much harder to put the dirt back after they had laid Dean down inside the grave. She'd almost collapsed several times from sorrow, burying her brother in the blazing, cruel sunlight.

They had taken his amulet off before they put him in the ground, and the ring he wore (Mom's wedding band). Alex had held them in the palm of her hand, and her heart had wanted to break in two. Surely this wasn't all that was left of him. After everything he'd done, the life he'd lived... why hadn't there been more?

Bobby said things about Dean after that. Things like 'good man' and 'irreplaceable' but Alex hadn't been listening. She'd been asking herself, why, why, why. That was Dean. Her Dean. The invincible big brother who was never supposed to have died. And yet there he was. In a pine box, buried six feet under. Gone forever.

...The sound of footsteps crunching the leaves on the ground behind her alerted Alex to a new presence, and she hurriedly dashed her hands across her cheeks, trying to wipe away the evidence of her tears. "Hey," Dean's gruff voice said beside her. "Wanna tell me what the hell is wrong with you?" He sounded pissed. Alex looked at him after a long moment, pained, her mind on memories of him, dead, shredded, six feet under. His hard expression softened and he sighed. He'd never been able to stand the sight of her crying. "What's wrong?" He asked. Gentler this time.

She shook her head, laughed softly, looking away, trying not to show him too much of her feelings. "Angels just threatened to send you back to... to Hell." She wiped her cheek one last time with her palm as Dean watched. "That's what's wrong."

"Hey, I get it," he said, trying to sound lighthearted. "You don't want me dead. It's nice, really."

Alex couldn't laugh at his attempt at playfulness. Her mind was in too dark a place. She shook her head vehemently and looked at him squarely. "I can't lose you again, Dean."

"You're not gonna," Dean said, his voice full of assurance.

"But you don't know that, not for sure," she protested. "We have no idea what the angels are gonna do, let alone the friggin' demons!"

He seemed to consider what she said, but shook his head. "Well, we have a plan," he said. "And if you'd stayed instead of storming out here like a three year old, maybe you would've heard it."

Alex pressed her mouth into a thin line and ignored the comment about her acting childish. "We've had plans before. And they don't always work, do they?"

"Yeah. Well." He put an arm around her, squeezing her arm reassuringly. A gesture of caring and concern. It was enough to set Alex in tears again. She looked down and away, taking a moment to control herself, hiding herself behind her hair.

"Dean... you didn't see me after you... after you were gone," she said in a moment, softly, not looking at him. "I tried to get by. I tried to live life like everything was okay. But it wasn't. You died, Sam left. Suddenly I'm all alone. I mean, yeah, Bobby was there. But I was still completely alone." She chanced a glance up at him. He was looking at her intently, and he looked upset. "I couldn't deal with the pain, Dean. I got so wasted, so many nights. Hunting was the only thing that kept me going. And the killing? I... I liked it, in a way I never had before." She was somber, remembering how the violence had soothed her. How the killing had comforted her. "I don't know who that was. It was me but... I dunno."

"Damn." Dean's expression was mournful, as if he hadn't truly thought of what kind of impact his absence would have made in her life, and that he was guilty for what he said next. "I thought you were okay." He cleared his throat loudly, covering up the sound of his voice breaking. When he spoke again, it was in the low, gruff voice he usually used. "You know, a lot of times I wish you didn't have to grow up in this damn stupid life. Hunting."

Alex looked at him sharply. "Why? It's what I do. It's what I was born to do."

He looked uncomfortable and unconvinced. "Is it?"

"Yeah, it is," she said, and she meant it. Alex knew Dean was yet again feeling guilty and responsible for her. But there was nothing for him to regret. She had chosen this life a long time ago. "I've never been normal, Dean." She smiled in chagrin briefly at that. Neither had he. "What the hell would I do with a normal life?" It's an absurd thought, honestly. They weren't raised or made for anything commonplace.

Dean looked down a little, shrugged his eyebrows up. "Yeah, I know. Still. Guess I always wanted you to get out of this whole thing, deep down." He sighed heavily. "I was always afraid you'd get hurt, or miss out on life." His arm that had been around her came away, and his hands went into his pockets. He was stone faced. Maybe he was realizing how deeply this life had affected her—formed her into someone willing to kill a fallen angel, or at least hand her over to protect their own asses.

Alex was quiet for a minute, the heaviness of his words sinking in. "I'm not missing out on life." She shrugged shallowly, thinking over the memories of the road and all the pain, struggles, hardships over the years. It had all been bearable for one reason. Her brothers. That was the truest, hardest thing to say to him, to let him know how badly his death ripped her apart. "But without you in my life... I didn't wanna live it to be honest." Dean's jaw clenched hard as he struggled to process those words. It was obvious he was really disturbed to hear that. Alex shook her head. "It's not your fault. It's not. Our life is constant dysfunction. I don't expect different." They shared a brief exchange of mournful glances. That dysfunction, like it or not, was home for them. "I just don't want—I can't—do all this without you here. Tried it. Hated it. Wouldn't recommend." She was trying for dark humor, but the wounds were still too raw to joke about it effectively.

Dean appeared torn between empathy and his previously held convictions. "I get it, Al. I do. As much as I can for not having been in that position. But end of the day... we protect people. Right? That's our job."

Alex gave him a look—she knew where he was going with that. "Yes, some people. But Anna's not a regular person. She's an angel. And come on Dean, the person who needs protection right now is you." He looked at her from the corner of his eye, sullenly. "If I have to protect you from your own dumb ass, Dean, I will."

He chuckled dryly, but seemed to have withdrawn a bit into his own thoughts. "Yeah, you're a real hardass, aren't you," he said, his tone somewhere between sarcastic and joking.

She pressed her lips into a thin line, then looked at Dean in all seriousness. "I'll kill her if it means you stay alive. I don't want to. But I will. So find a damn solution. Or I'll do what I have to." The deadly, soft seriousness in her voice must have thrown him off.

Instead of a sarcastic retort, Dean just looked at her, his expression unreadable. "Yeah," he said, and without anything else, he softly touched her on the shoulder then left without another word. Alex watched him leave, wondering if he were mad, proud, or disappointed in her. She didn't care, or really, she couldn't care. Regardless of what he felt, Alex would kill Anna before letting Dean die. Still... she hoped he wasn't judging her too bad. Surely he'd feel the same if their roles were reversed?

A few moments passed, and Alex searched the stars in solemn silence. It was cold outside, but right now Alex liked it. She wanted to feel numb. She blinked sleepily. She really needed to get some rest, and soon, before she keeled over from exhaustion.

A sudden voice to her left caused her to jump. "Hello, Alex." Standing there in calm and quiet composure was Anna, her red hair shining in the moonlight. Great.

"Anna," Alex greeted with no great enthusiasm. These damn angels and their penchants for sneaking up on people.

"Are you all right?" Anna asked, her tone sounding concerned. So, she wanted to try and earn a sympathy card from Alex. Well, that wasn't going to work.

Alex crossed her arms, determined not to like this girl. "Fine, thanks, how are you?" She answered sarcastically, and pointedly looked away, trying to send the message leave me alone.

Instead, Anna only came closer, and laid a soft, comforting hand on Alex's shoulder. "You're in so much pain."

Alex jerked away from the touch and glared at Anna. "You know what? I don't need you to come out here and try to make me like you. It's not going to happen."

Oddly enough, Anna smiled softly at that, as if what Alex said had pleased her. "This is why I love humanity. Such loyalty." She looked at Alex as if she could see through her every thought and motive. "Dean is lucky to have a sister who loves him so much." Anna's expression flickered, and she looked away. "This is actually a prime example of why I wanted to become a human."

Alex's forehead crinkled up in confusion at the wistful tone in Anna's voice. Why would she ever envy us? Why would she want to be a human? Humans were... a mess. No superhuman strength or telepathic powers. Just crap, pain, drama, and loss. And death. Always death. Alex looked away somberly. She thought of everything she had lived through and lost. "Being human sucks."

"Perhaps," Anna conceded, then looked at Alex directly. "But being an angel sucked more."

"How?" Alex asked, keeping her voice hard, even though she was curious.

Anna looked sad, as if remembering the pain of an old wound. She thought for a long moment, and then spoke as if thinking out loud. "So many reasons, but maybe the biggest one was that I constantly longed, deep inside, secretly... for more. I knew something was missing."

Alex felt herself becoming interested, despite herself. She tried to sound disinterested though. "Oh yeah? And did you find it here?"

Anna looked at Alex again. "Yes. I think so." She smiled, and it reached her eyes. Her expression softened, and again she touched Alex's shoulder. This time, Alex did not jerk away. "Alex. I know why you feel you should kill me, if it comes to that. I want you to know I understand. You love Dean very much. Of course you'd choose him over me."

Alex's eyebrows rose—was Anna for real? She cleared her throat, looked away, let out a heavy, conceding breath and met Anna's gaze sidelong. "Look," she said unhappily, because she was basically admitting that she wasn't as hardass as she was trying to act. "I hope we can find a solution, Anna. Really. I do. Ideally everyone walks away from this alive and well, okay?" But the fact still remained that Alex was going to kill her if she had to, to protect the family—and Anna probably knew that. Still, the ex-angel smiled softly and said nothing more. Alex shook her head tiredly and jerked her thumb in the direction of the barn, overwhelmed with reality. "Listen, I'm gonna head in. Need some sleep."

Anna nodded, graciously, her parting comment making the youngest Winchester feel even shittier. "Rest well, Alex."

Alex left the tree line and headed for the dark shape of the barn, trying very hard not to like Anna or feel bad about what she might have to do. Alex thought it would make everything a whole helluva lot easier if Anna were as horrible as Ruby. Alex rubbed her forehead tiredly, thinking to herself that she needed to find Sam before she collapsed. He'd be able to fill her in on whatever hare-brained plan they'd cooked up. Hopefully, whatever it was, wasn't too ornate, because her ability to focus was currently very threadbare. Alex was at the point where she was so sleepy that holding her eyelids felt like one hundred pound weights—she needed sleep more than anything right now, but dreaded what her dreams might bring. Hex bags couldn't protect your dreams, and Castiel seemed to think he could breeze in and out of her subconscious as he liked.

Alex looked up, suddenly aware of herself, and saw that she was standing in a grove of pine trees, in unnaturally bright moonlight. She knew it was a dream immediately. She whirled in anger, letting loose a, "Dammit, Castiel!" even before she saw him. And sure enough, there he was, standing there and staring at her. He set her on edge immediately. "You have got to stop hijacking my dreams!" Alex groaned. "I can't get a decent night of shut eye without you showing up!"

Maybe she was being overly dramatic, but it sure felt that way to her.

Castiel didn't look the same as he had in her last dream. He seemed tense and wooden, hollow. "There are more important things for you to think about at this time," he replied blankly. "I've come to ask you to make your brother Anna to us."

"Make him?" Alex gave him an incredulous look and approached him. "You don't think I tried that, Cas? Dean's the king of stubborn. He's made up his mind that he doesn't wanna be responsible for killing an innocent girl."

"And you? What is your stance on all of this?" Castiel asked. His mood was more direct, more businesslike than in her other dreams, and she suddenly felt leery. He felt untrustworthy to her.

"What's it to you?" she asked, eyes narrowed.

He seemed to be uncomfortable at that point, and looked away. "Alex, I do not want to kill Dean. In fact, I would very much dislike it. But if he will not relinquish Anna to us—" he looked at her with a mask of rigid earnestly, "—things will get ugly." He paused. "Do you take my meaning?"

Alex set her mouth in a thin line. "Yes, I take your meaning," she retorted sarcastically. She shook her head, in disgust, in disappointment, but mostly in increasing anger. "You know, Cas, I don't know why you keep doing this to me. Making me think you're an okay guy, then proving me wrong." On impulse, she angrily grabbed him with both of her hands by his coat lapels and shook him, earning an almost surprised frown from him. "This is my brother you're talking about sending back to Hell! He doesn't deserve that, and you know it!" She shouted, getting worked up because it made no sense that he could say he healed her out of kindness then be such a dick about everything else. "Why would you bring him out only to send him back, anyway? What is wrong with you?!!"
She demanded, shaking him accusingly, freaking out about life in general. "If you ever cared about me, you would care about him, too!"

He stared at her unblinkingly, his clear blue eyes boring into hers. "Let go of me, Alex."

She stared at him, jaw squared. His lack of reaction gave her pause. And then with a shove, she let go. He barely flinched. She took a deep, unhappy breath in through her nostrils. "You know what, Castiel? I appreciate what you did for me. I really do." She gritted her teeth, tried the less angry approach. She couldn't believe she was about to plead with this guy for mercy. She couldn't even look him in the eye when she did it. "And if... if there is any of the same compassion in you, that you felt for me once... please." She made herself look him in the eye, for Dean's sake. Saying the words was like pulling teeth. "I am begging you." Her inner sadness betrayed herself on her face. "Don't let anything happen to my brother." She hated it, but she forced herself to ask again: "Please." She thought all of her inner turmoil was on display for him to see and for once, she didn't try to hide it. For a minute, she tried appealing to him that way, by letting him see how scared she was to lose Dean. If he had responded to her pain before, supposedly, maybe he would do so again.

Castiel stared at her as if he'd been stung and he took a step back from her, as if he were repulsed. "Compassion," he spat, as if the word left a sour taste in his mouth, "is something I have no more of, for any of you." He stared at her a second longer, his expression unreadable, and then he was gone, leaving Alex in completely shocked silence. What the hell? When she woke up, she felt disillusioned and tricked. Betrayed somehow.

It was early in the morning and Ruby was gone to carry out her part of the plan. Sam was pacing the length of the barn, Anna was nervously standing around, and Dean, of course, was drinking. They were about to run the riskiest move of their life, so of course Dean needed some liquor. It didn't actually sound like the worst idea, Alex thought offhandedly. Tricking angels and demons into coming here was a long shot, but it was the only chance they had, she guessed. But, just in case it didn't work, she had one of Bobby's hunting knives holstered and hidden underneath the leg of her jeans. They had destroyed the angel hex bags a few minutes ago, and now were resigned to wait for the angels to arrive.

"Little early for that, isn't it?" Anna asked, watching Dean down the contents of his flask.

"It's never too early if your name is Dean Winchester," Alex said. Dean raised the flask to her, as if she had given him a great compliment. She contemplated asking for some too.

At that moment, the barn doors suddenly burst in, as if with a mighty blast of wind. Everyone leapt to their feet as Uriel and Castiel marched in, their presences blistering and powerful. Sam and Dean stood protectively in front of Anna, and Alex stood beside and behind Sam, his arm half-hiding her.

"Hello, Anna. It's good to see you," Castiel said. An odd greeting to give someone you were about to murder.

Sam was acting shocked. "How? How did you find us?" He paused and looked at his brother, as if at a loss. "Dean?"

"I'm sorry," Dean apologized, and sounded every bit the part. Alex was kind of impressed. She was trying to look confused, but wasn't sure if it was convincing or not.

"Why?" Sam asked, whisper soft.
"Because they gave him a choice," Anna said. "They either kill me... or kill you. I know how their minds work." Anna turned to Dean, and they kissed softly. Huh? Alex didn't have to act surprised at that... was that a part of the plan they had left out telling her last night? She looked at Cas and Uriel—Uriel looked smug, but Cas actually seemed surprised, too. Anna pulled back from Dean and spoke to him softly. "You did the best you could. I forgive you." She looked at the angels. "Okay. No more tricks. No more running. I'm ready."

Alex looked at Dean—where the hell was Ruby? Could they stall any longer?

"I'm sorry," Castiel said to Anna, his voice wooden. He didn't sound sorry.

"No. You're not. Not really. You don't know the feeling," Anna said. Alex glanced at her briefly, wishing Anna was wrong about that.

"Still, we have a history," Castiel said, as if he understood he was expected to care, but couldn't bring himself to. "It's just—"

"Orders are orders," Anna finished for him. "I know. Just make it quick."

Sam and Dean were looking at each other sidelong, and Alex could could tell they were getting ready to attack the angels. That probably wouldn't go too well. But it didn't get to that point.

"Don't you touch a hair on that poor girl's head!" Came a new voice behind them. They whirled to see Alastair, two demon henchmen, and with them, a bleeding, crippled Ruby. Alastair tossed her to the side and stared the angels down.

The Winchesters and Anna quickly moved aside, as Uriel advanced on the demon. "How dare you come in this room... you pussing sore..."

"Name-calling," Alastair tutted. "That hurt my feelings... you sanctimonious, fanatical prick."

"Turn around and walk away now," Castiel said, skipping the insults, his strong, deep voice filled with warning.

"Sure. Just give us the girl," Alastair said, smiling slyly. "We'll make sure she gets punished good and proper."

"You know who we are and what we will do." Castiel stepped forward, deadly intent in his steps and expression. He was terrifying in that moment. "I won't say it again. Leave now... or we lay you to waste."

"Think I'll take my chances," Alastair lisped, but there was no missing the hostile tone he had taken on. Alex grabbed Sam's arm. They were about to fight, just as predicted. It had sounded so good in theory, but now, Alex's stomach felt tight, and she looked at Castiel without a second thought, suddenly worried. What if—

She didn't have a chance to finish the thought. Uriel leapt forward and attacked one of Alastair's henchmen, and Castiel unleashed a series of unexpectedly quick and powerful uppercuts onto Alastair, stunning the demon momentarily. He placed his hand on Alastair's forehead, clearly about to exorcise him—but then, nothing happened. Confusion came across the angel's face, even as Alastair grinned.

"Sorry, kiddo. Why don't you go run to Daddy?" And Alastair knocked Castiel onto his back. The angel seemed stunned, momentarily unmoving. Alastair grabbed Cas by the lapels, and began shouting Latin. "Potestas inferna, me confirmas," Alastair proclaimed, choking Castiel ruthlessly.
Oh my god—was he exorcising an angel? Was that even possible?! For a second, Alex remained frozen—should she do something? She looked at Dean in horror. Castiel's face was contorted in pain. "Potestas inferna, me confirma," Alastair continued, and Dean grabbed a crowbar up off the floor. "Potestas inferna, me confirma!"

Dean swung the crowbar at Alastair with power, knocking the demon off his feet momentarily. Castiel forgotten, Alastair set his sights on Dean and Sam. "Dean, Dean, Dean... I am so disappointed." He was now shouting through clenched teeth. "You had such promise!" He stretched out a hand, and the brothers both sank to the ground, writhing in pain.

In the scuffle, Alex had somehow been forgotten—she didn't have time to reflect on why, only had time to act. Without a second thought, she grabbed the dropped crowbar and swung it at Alastair with all of her strength, striking him across the face. The demon reeled, staggering back a step or two and holding a hand to his jaw and cheek. Standing feebly between the demon and her brothers and Castiel, all of whom were on the ground and useless, Alex felt like a kitten facing down a lion. She shook from both fear and anger as she stared in the face of evil. Alastair chuckled strangely and licked his lips, recovering. She gripped the crowbar like a baseball bat, waiting for him to do something. "Alex, no!" Dean managed to shout through agony.

Alastair smiled at her, a creepy effect. "Ah yes, baby Winchester, can't forget about you!" He yanked the crowbar out of her hand telepathically, where it came to his hand. He tested the weight in his hand casually, as Alex backed up slowly. The back of her foot hit something—Castiel's leg. She wavered, almost falling down from the unexpected run in. Alastair examined the crowbar with apparent great interest, swaggering toward her casually. "My, I would love to have you come visit me, stay awhile... get to know the fam... because if you're anything like your brother..." he grinned wickedly, "You would be a true joy to have around." He winked at her, and gripped the crowbar tight. With relish, he drew back, and slammed the crowbar into her stomach with superhuman strength. Pain exploded, and she felt bones breaking as a scream ripped out of her mouth.

Alex felt herself flying backwards where her shoulder ruthlessly smashed into one of the barn support beams—she heard the popping crunch of her shoulder dislocating through ears that had gone fuzzy. She was all but screaming through gritted teeth in pain, mostly oblivious to what was happening. Sam was trying to crawl over to her, even as he writhed in pain. Somehow nearby, Alastair was laughing. Alex heard Uriel shout "No!" followed by Anna's frantic rising voice. "Shut your eyes. Shut your eyes! Shut your eyes!"

Shut my eyes? Alex, limp and dazed, couldn't move at all, her body was in shock. She was sprawled there on her back helplessly, propped on one elbow awkwardly. She felt a large, warm hand suddenly come up over her squinted eyes—and by instinct she squeezed her eyes shut as a light brighter than she could stand blazed. She felt herself being pulled close to someone solid, Dean? No... Dean didn't smell like that—like rain, or maybe that was cotton. Even with her eyes closed, even with the hand there, she felt blinded by the light that blazed and maybe trying to hang onto the world and not blow away, she grabbed for something, anything, and got a fistful of what felt like some kind of crisp shirt as she leaned into the person shielding her. There was a sound like an explosion, and then wind gusted over them, as if a tornado had torn through the place. The hand came away from her eyes, the hold on her loosened, and she was momentarily dazed, blinking against sunspots. She squinted, trying to see who had covered her eyes, who she was holding onto. Castiel was breathing hard and laying awkwardly beside her—his face close to hers as he looked at her in trepidation. Shocked that it was him, Alex let go of his shirt immediately, heart hammering. Had he crawled over to her...?

A sharp stab of pain interrupted her thoughts and she grimaced, gasped, struggling because she was at the point where she couldn't breathe. She heard Dean, somewhere nearby, bellowing. "Well, what are you guys waiting for? Go get Anna. Unless, of course, you're scared!"

Alex looked at Castiel again. His eyes met hers, and she heard a desperate, broken groan of pain come from deep inside of her throat. Cas looked almost alarmed at the sound. It was an expression that she had never seen on his face. He glanced at Uriel in hesitation, then back at her. She whimpered a little as she took a breath, grimacing painfully. Her ribs were killing her, and her shoulder holy shit! With abrupt decisiveness, Castiel reached out, his hand coming to rest on her rib cage, his eyes locking onto hers once again. She took in a sharp breath of air in relief or surprise or maybe both. A rush of comfort, warmth, and relief came over her, spreading out from beneath where his hand was against her. Something about the touch felt intimate and gentle, and she could only stare back at him, her heart beating faster than it had before. His face, handsome and grim, was close to her, his eyes searching hers, and she was caught there in his atmosphere, entranced. She felt confusion come over her—but then it was done, his hand was gone, and he had stood up to join Uriel, without a second glance back at her where she lay still on the floor.

"This isn't over," Uriel was saying, and Dean said something smart back. And then the angels and demons were all gone.

Sam rushed over to Alex and tried to help her up gently. "You're hurt—" he started, his expression concerned.

"No... no, I'm... fine." She held a hand against the part of her stomach and side that had hurt so badly just a moment before, in shock. "I'm... completely fine." She looked at her twin with a dumbfounded expression.

Sam swallowed, seeming to understand. "Cas?" he asked.

Alex nodded, dazed. "Yeah."

Dean shook his head tiredly, and looked at the spot where Anna had disappeared from. He seemed particularly affected by her disappearing act. But Alex was lost in her own thoughts.

Castiel's harsh words echoed in her mind. Compassion is something I have no more of, for any of you. She stared at where he'd been standing just a minute before. Then why, Cas—why do you keep fixing me, and giving me these little moments where I can't believe that?

One Hour Later

The Kentucky landscape whizzed by outside, and once again everything was as it should be. Just the three of them—no demons, no angels. They'd left Ruby behind, thankfully. Alex couldn't say the same for Anna… she felt odd remembering the angel. What had happened to her? Maybe they would never know. Right now, Alex was just looking forward to finding a diner, a motel, and a shower. And more goddamn sleep. Answers could come later. Without really thinking about it, she laid her hand over her ribs where the weight of Castiel's hand had rested earlier. Somehow she doubted she had seen the last of him. But owing him so much, and with the debt growing almost every time she met him, she felt uneasy. And she kept catching herself thinking about his hand on her, what that had felt like. It had felt so gentle and kind, so... nice. She thought of his eyes and that expression of alarm he'd gotten at her pain. How was she supposed to reconcile his kind actions with his more asshole ones? He was confusing. Or maybe he was confused. Well, she sure was confused. That much was for sure.

In the driver's seat, Dean gave a huge, tired sigh, interrupting her thoughts. "Ah, screw this, I need a beer," he said, and pulled into a gas station. About ten minutes later they were parked on a back road, cracking open their beers. Sam sat on the hood of the Impala with his bottle, and Dean leaned up next to him. Alex handed Dean his beer and sat beside him, just above the wheel.

"To surviving yet another impossible situation," Sam said lightly while raising his bottle up.

"Can't believe we made it out of there," Dean replied with, a soft, disbelieving laugh.

"Story of our lives," Alex muttered, raising her beer bottle too. Sam and Dean clinked theirs against hers, and it was bottoms up. After taking a big swallow, Alex wiped her mouth with the sleeve of her jacket. "So do you think we'll see her again?" she asked.

"Who, Anna?" Dean asked, then shrugged. "Probably. I mean, can't seem to keep these damn angels away."

Alex chuckled sardonically. She agreed with him more than he knew. Sam looked at Alex sidelong. He had a sly little smile on his face. "So exactly how many times has Cas saved your life now?" He grinned outright… he was teasing her.

Alex rolled her eyes and wrinkled her nose in quick succession. "I'm trying not to keep count." She grew a little more serious and was suddenly interested in peeling the label off her beer, hoping they didn't ask her anything else about him. She felt oddly put on the spot. Kind of vulnerable about the subject of Cas.

They were quiet a couple minutes, then Dean cleared his throat. "I know you heard him."

"Huh?" Sam asked.

"Alastair. What he said... about how I had promise," Dean said. Alex became very interested at this point, stopping mid-guzzle.

"Yeah..." Sam replied.

"You're not curious?" Dean asked.

"Dean, I'm damn curious. But you're not talking about Hell, and I'm not pushing."

Alex, however, swallowed her beer quickly and butted in. "Well, I'll bite. What'd he mean by that?" She peered up at Dean's profile, which was dark and thoughtful. "What happened to you down there?"

Dean swallowed, staring into the distance. He didn't speak for a long moment. "It wasn't four months, you know. It was four months and change up here, but down there... I don't know. Time's different. It was more like forty years."

Sam and Alex exchanged shocked glanced. "Forty years?" Alex breathed in disbelief. "How...?" she trailed off, speechless.

"My god..." Sam whispered.

Dean swallowed. "They, uh... they sliced and carved and tore at me in ways that you..." he took a deep breath. "Until there was nothing left. And then, suddenly... I would be whole again... like magic... just so they could start in all over. And Alastair... at the end of every day... every one... he would come and he would make me an offer. To take me off the rack... if I put souls on... if I started the torturing. And every day, I told him to stick it where the sun shines. For thirty years, I told him." Dean's voice wavered now. "But then I couldn't do it anymore, guys. I couldn't. And I got off that rack. "His voice became even more unsteady, broken and limping with deep pain. "God help me, I got right off it, and I started ripping them apart. I lost count of how many souls." A tear rolled down his cheek. "The—the things that I did to them."

He went silent, and Alex put a hand on his shoulder gingerly. "Don't think about it," Alex said, unsure what else to say.

"It's all I can think about," Dean said, choking.

"Dean... Dean, look, you held out for thirty years," Sam said gently. "That's longer than anyone would have."

Dean had a hand over his face, and his shoulders shook. "How I feel... this... inside me... I wish I couldn't feel anything. I wish I couldn't feel a damn thing." His voice broke in agony, and he didn't bother hiding his tears, his sobs.

Sam and Alex were speechless, truly speechless. Alex enveloped her big brother in a tight hug, and he crushed her in his arms, weeping openly, burying his face in her shoulder, for once letting himself be the one who got comforted. Sam hung back, his expression pained and afraid. Alex tried to make her voice sound stronger than she felt. "You're okay now. You're okay," she repeated over and over, softly, to keep from breaking down herself. When Dean cried, she wanted to also. "You're okay," she said again. But she knew he wasn't.

None of them were.
"Years have gone, I'm broken; I've left the past unspoken. Those years oh, they haunt me still."

- Alter Bridge

One Month and Two Weeks Later

"Nothing but Christmas crap on," Dean grumbled, and threw down the remote to the motel TV.

Alex walked by where he sat, her arms overloaded with their duffel bags, backpacks, and a sleeping bag. She dumped the stuff in the corner of the room as Sam entered their room with a couple plastic bags and a twelve pack of beer. He plopped the goods down on one of the twin beds and began pulling things out of the bags, naming them as he laid them down. "Beef jerky, granola bars, pop tarts, canned chicken, some cracker things, M&Ms, hot dogs with no buns, and the very last box of…" he grimaced, "Uh, sorta squished cupcakes."

Alex grabbed the box from him in excitement, examining the red-frosted, green-sprinkled cupcakes with a huge grin. Even though they had gotten a little smeared, they still looked perfect to her. Dean, however, looked heartbroken. "No pie?" he asked.

"Sorry Dean, this is pretty much all the gas station had," Sam apologized.

"I wanted pie," Dean muttered sulkily. He grabbed a beer instead with grumpy gusto, earning a sympathetic if amused smile from Sam.

"But why would you want soggy pastry filled with gooey fruit stuff when you could have these?" Alex asked, holding out the plastic container. "It's mini cakes. With frosting. And sprinkles!"

"Ehh," Dean grumbled, eyeing the cupcakes with disinterest. "It's not Christmas without pie."

"None of this stuff says Christmas, Dean," Sam replied, chuckling.

"Yeah well merry friggin' Christmas to us," Dean replied, and sat down on the bed with his beer, his expression foul. Sam and Alex exchanged a glance and simultaneous shrugs behind Dean's back. Alex set the cupcakes down, watching her oldest brother out of the corner of her eye.

Alex was pretty sure Dean was so grumpy for a few reasons… one, he was hungry. Two, he was tired. Three, he was Dean. But more than those reasons, she had a hunch that he was a little more sullen than usual because he had forgotten today was Christmas day—they all had forgotten, actually. The past month they had been hunting nonstop, too busy to even keep track of what day it was. So when they realized today was Christmas (they made the discovery while at a closed drive-thru), Dean had turned surly, probably beating himself up over it. Her oldest brother had never personally been too into stuff like holidays or birthdays but when it came to Alex and Sam, he had always tried to give them something normal, something dependable. He'd made a point to always at least remember their birthday, and he always tried to do something special for Christmas. Even Dad hadn't always managed that.

The sound of singing and shouting on TV caught Alex's attention, and she glanced at the black and white movie that was currently playing. "Look, Daddy! Teacher says, every time a bell rings an angel gets his wings!" A little girl shouted, and her father, grinning ear to ear, replied "That's right, that's right!" Alex frowned and picked up the remote from where Dean had tossed it and changed the channel. "Coming up next on Lifetime—it's Christmas Angel, the new Della Reese movie that's "I'm so thankful for the Salvation Army, those people are angels! Just angels! If they hadn't got my kids all these great gifts—" Alex switched off the TV entirely, a little perturbed at all the angel references. Dean and Sam had begun opening up the food, and hadn't noticed. Alex glanced back at the TV. Angels. She'd been trying not to think about them. Her eyes darted toward her duffel bag, where one of the angel hex bags Ruby had given them remained. Alex had kept it without telling either of her brothers, and wasn't sure what they'd think of that if they found out. She was in the process of figuring out how to make more of them… however, some of the elements were still a mystery to her, and she needed more time to research it.

The past month there had been no sign of angels. No dream appearances, nothing. No Castiel, no Uriel, no Anna. And while Alex thought this should make her feel better, the silence felt more eerie than anything else. Mostly because she had expected to see Castiel in her dreams. So far he'd proven to enjoy the hobby of dream-crashing, and seemed keen on interrupting hers. Every time before shutting her eyes to sleep one of her last thoughts had been will he show up tonight? But he hadn't. At first she'd been relieved, but now she was beginning to feel uneasy... worried. And unhappy that she was worried. She'd caught herself wondering if maybe he were injured after his fight with Alastair... or maybe he'd become angry that she was using hex bags to hide herself and her brothers from him... or maybe he didn't care either way and she was over thinking things. Maybe he got in trouble for healing her again. She hoped not. The amount of time she had spent wondering about him was embarrassing.

"Hey, space case," Dean's voice said, cutting through her thoughts. He seemed to have recovered from his sadness over pie, and was popping M&Ms into his mouth. "Wanna play poker? Loser has to sleep on the floor," he grinned and motioned toward the sleeping bag. Alex looked at the two beds in the motel room… they looked about as comfortable as the floor was, but Dean looked excited to play cards.

"Hope you like sleeping on the ground, buddy." She pointed at him threateningly, in jest.

One Week Later

"Thanks Bobby," Sam said, and snapped his phone shut. Alex looked up from the Dad's journal in her lap. Dean, at the wheel of the Impala, looked at Sam questioningly. "Do either of you guys remember Truman High?" Sam asked, receiving blank stares from his siblings. "We went there for, I dunno, maybe a month?"

Alex tried to remember, but after being to at least thirty different schools (none of which she had liked or cared about) over the course of her life, she couldn't remember the names.

"Home of the Bombers?" Dean asked, squinting in thought.

"That's the one," Sam confirmed.

"Ah," Dean said, and sounded a little put off. "I hated that place."

Alex chuckled in the back seat. "You hated all of them."

Dean glanced at her in the rear view mirror. "What and you loved them so much?" he prodded playfully. Touché.
Sam, in information-relay mode, sounded almost excited as he explained. "Bobby said some girl there murdered a classmate pretty brutally… but she's now saying that she had no control of herself when it happened. Like someone or something made her do it."

"So, vengeful spirit?" Dean asked. "Possession?"

"Only one way to be sure," Sam said.

Dean nodded in agreement. "We go interview the girl."

And just like that, it was settled. Alex absently flipped to a new page in the journal, then hissed in pain. "Ouch!" she exclaimed, and stuck her finger in her mouth. "Paper cut," she mumbled at the questioning look she got from Sam.

"Better call Cas," Dean joked, and grinned at Sam, who was chuckling at the comment. Alex rolled her eyes, trying to play it off, but it kind of rubbed her the wrong way. It was true… the last couple times she'd been injured Castiel had made it all better, but it made her look and feel weak, deep down. She didn't like having to be protected or watched after like a kid. Dean glanced at her in the rearview and upon seeing her sour expression he grinned even bigger.

"Meow," he said, his favorite comment to make when he thought she was being dramatic. Alex reached up and slapped the back of his head. "Ow!"

---

Sioux City, Indiana

The three Winchesters had just gotten into town, checked into a motel, and now were about to head right back out again. "All right, I'm going to the mental ward to talk to the girl," Sam said, and Dean nodded agreement.

"Yup. You go to the crazy bin, Alex and me will go see what we can dig up at the school."

Alex cleared her throat, setting down her duffel gently on one of the beds. "I'm not going," she said, not looking at either of them.

That got her quite the inquisitive look from her oldest brother. "Not going?" he echoed dumbly. "Why not?"

Sam, gentler, frowned slightly in concern. "Come on, we could use you on this one."

"You've both got this," Alex said, trying to sound like she was just disinterested and casual. "You don't need me." She faltered and pressed her mouth into a thin line for a minute at their scrutinizing gazes. "I just… really, really don't wanna go back there. To any school we used to go to." She looked at them meaningfully. "So unless it's life or death... leave me outta this one, cool?"

The brothers exchanged a glance, and from the way they looked at each other, Alex knew that they knew exactly why she was didn't want to, but Dean looked hesitant to agree.

Alex's tongue darted out to wet her lips. "I'll do laundry," she heard herself volunteer. The statement of a truly desperate woman. "For both of you. All of your dirty... disgusting laundry." She felt herself grimacing just thinking about all of the sweat-stained, musty damp clothes, the smelly socks that would be crammed up into weird little balls she'd have to unknot, and then there would be the underwear. Oh god, the underwear. She shivered in grossed-out anticipation.

Dean's face had lit up at the prospect of skipping the laundromat, and he put his arm around her, clapped her on the shoulder. "You had me at laundry, kid."

1997

Sam and Alex stood in a place they stood very often: in front of a new class in the middle of the school year and in the middle of the class period. They both wore jeans that didn't fit great, jackets that were worn out bad, and shirts that used to be Dean's. Sam stood half a head taller than Alex, who was still short for their age: fourteen.

A sea of unfamiliar faces stared back at them as the teacher made the awkward, necessary introductions.

"So! Is there anything you'd like to tell us about yourself?" the teacher, Mr. Wyatt, was asking pleasantly.

Sam shrugged. He didn't like this part. "Not really."

The teacher turned to Alex. "What about you, Alex?"

Alex just looked down, her ears burning because yes, she had lots she'd like to say but she wasn't able. How many times would she have to live this godawful moment? Sam stepped a little closer, protectively, and addressed the teacher and the class alike, his voice stronger when he spoke about his little sister. "She's mute," he explained, and Alex's ears burnt even hotter. "She can't talk. But she can hear fine and write good, and do everything else anyone else can." Little gasps sounded throughout the room, and Alex heard snickers following shortly after. When and if she looked up, she knew she'd see a mix of kids who were either laughing at her, or unsure what/how to respond at all except to avoid her completely.

This always happened, without fail. Dad was too busy to get any paperwork transferred over to let teachers or staff know about her condition. More than half the time when she started at a new school, Sam or Dean had to literally tell her teachers about her muteness. Sometimes teachers didn't believe them at first. And they were always so horrified that she didn't know sign language, too. Another embarrassment.

"Oh," said the teacher, sounding thoroughly surprised at Sam's admission. Mr. Wyatt's tone took on a kinder, gentler quality that Alex despised. As if she were to be pitied or babied. "Do you sign, Alex?"

Ashamed again and angry too, Alex shook her head, barely able to lift her eyes from the ground. Sam would usually explain that she had never really learned it, that they'd always been too busy and moved too much—tons of excuses and stories that left Alex in a cloud of mortification and self-hatred. You'd think she'd get used to it, but it was horrible each time. "Well, there's nothing to worry about, Alex," the teacher said. "This is an environment for learning. And I can tell you're a smart girl. You'll do fine."

Yeah, for the two weeks I'm here. If that, she thought. She looked at the teacher without any real expression, just ready to find her seat, to be out from in front of everyone. "You kids go ahead and grab a seat," Mr. Wyatt said, and Sam led the way. Alex tried not to look anyone in the eye, just kept her head down and followed her twin.

Sam took a seat at one of the empty desks, and Alex found one behind and to the side of him at a desk behind a kind of bigger kid. On either side of her, she could feel the gaping stares from the other students and she sent one of them a dark scowl. Her ears were burning again, and her cheeks felt hot too. She wished she never had to start at a new school ever again.

As the teacher began to talk, the kid in front of her began to flick the ear of the kid in front of him—a kind of small guy with dark hair and dorky glasses. Alex watched from underneath her eyelashes, feeling even more anger course through her veins. Bullies got to her faster than anything else. She hated them. Sam was giving the bully the evil eye, sidelong, across the aisle. "Leave him alone," Sam whispered, and the bully smirked back at him.

"Shh, I'm going for a record," the kid replied, flicking without stopping.

"I said, leave him alone." Sam's voice carried a certain dark quality that seemed to catch the guy's attention.

The bully thrust his chin out, a dare. "You wanna take his place, midget?"

Sam was glaring bullets. "Yeah. Sure."

Alex watched Sam switch seats with the kid who was being picked on. In about thirty seconds flat, the bully started to flick Sam's ear. Alex couldn't hear the teacher or pay attention to anything else than that. Anger boiled in her veins, and she clenched at her desk until her knuckles went white, but she forced herself to remain still. Dad had been pretty clear... no fighting in this school, period. She wasn't sure if she could stick to that though. Dad didn't get what it was like, anyway.

Still, when the bell rang and everyone got up, she had a small instance of vengeance that didn't require a sucker punch. She deftly snatched the bully's wallet out of his back pocket and smirked to herself, pocketing it and breezing out of the classroom, feeling superior for a small moment.

When she and Sam walked down the hall to the cafeteria for lunch, he looked at her with a grouchy expression. "What're you so happy about?" He asked peevishly.

She pulled the wallet out and wiggled her eyebrows at him, grinned. Sam's expression dropped and he snatched it from her. "Alex! Why do you always have to do that stuff?!" He asked, clearly disappointed with her.

Hurt at his reaction, Alex threw her hands out. What? She thought he would have shared in her glee. All she did was get back at a jerk who'd been picking on her brother and another helpless kid—what was with the evil eye? Sam shoved the wallet back at her roughly, making it smack into her chest. He stalked off ahead, leaving her to follow with dejected footsteps. He was such a prude sometimes. She hated it when he made her feel bad for doing what she was good at.

In the cafeteria Sam made a point of separating himself from her and all alone, not in the mood to get told off again, Alex got her lunch and looked around for Dean, felt her heart sinking when she didn't see him anywhere. Sam was sitting over with some kids from English and gave her a look that said don't sit with us.

Pissed, she rolled her eyes to cover up her hurt feelings and found an empty corner table and sat there, poked at the slice of pizza on her plate then rolled the whole apple around her plate and watched it thump around unevenly. She didn't feel hungry.

"Hey mute button!" Came a jeering voice. Alex looked up to see the bully from class earlier grinning at her. "Where's your big hero brother?" He taunted, then reached across the table, about to take her pizza off the plate. From behind Alex, a hand suddenly shot and caught the kid by the wrist.

"You mean me?" Dean's familiar voice asked, and the bully looked up, wide-eyed, to see a big seventeen year old holding his wrist in place. "I'm her big brother. You need something?"

"Uh... no. No. Sorry," the kid said, then yanked his wrist back and scurried off, throwing a backwards glance at them. Alex gave Dean a look. I had that handled! She said with her expression.

Dean was looking after the kid with an annoyed look on his face. "Punk." He pulled a chair up, his unaffected attitude returning. "Your first day as crappy as mine?" He asked, cracking a grin at her. Alex gave him a look that said yeah—tell me about it. Dean chuckled cynically. "Where's Sammy?"

Alex nodded over toward where their brother was. Dean followed her gaze and got a thoughtful, if somewhat pensive look on his face. He glanced at his sister and brightened for her benefit. "Hey you know what? I found a side exit where we can go sit outside and eat on the bleachers away from all these losers. You wanna?"

She nodded yes, excited by the idea of adventure, of being away from all these people she didn't know. They went outside and ate pizza slices and apples together. After, Alex used her lighter to melt the bully's school ID card and his library card. According to those, his name was Dirk. She hated Dirk.

Present Day

At the West Palm motel Alex eyed the pile of dirty laundry heaped up on one of the beds. The pile was a lot bigger than she had thought it'd be. Either way, the laundromat could wait. First, she was going to try to figure out the rest of the hex bag contents. She wanted to be able to make more of them, if she needed to. She heaved her duffel onto the bed, noticing the zipper was half open. Alex rifled through her duffel, looking for the hex bag... but couldn't seem to find it. Growing anxious, she dug through it again, and began tossing shirts aside. Shit. Shit! "Where the hell are you?" she demanded out loud in a mutter.

Castiel had become aware that he could sense Alex's location again perhaps ten minutes ago, and relieved to be able to carry out his protection duties once again, he went to where she was. He kept himself invisible to her—after all, he was only there to check on her and lay eyes on her. He looked around, seeing that she was in another unremarkable, run down motel room. She was leaned over one of the twin beds and somewhat frantically rummaging through a bag, grabbing articles of clothing and tossing them out carelessly, then lifting the bag up and shaking it, as if waiting for something to fall out. "Dammit," she swore, and then looked around the room frantically. She knelt and looked under the beds, then knocked a pile of dirty clothes over, rummaging through it, then stepped back, turned in a circle. She seemed to be looking for something and not finding it. She let a huge woosh of air out from her mouth, rolled her eyes, put her hands on her hips, and closed her eyes. She shook her head and muttered something about "paranoid" and "stupid" and began picking the clothes back up, tossing them into a bigger pile on the other bed.

Castiel watched her closely, wondering why she'd been hidden from himself and the heavenly host for more than a whole month now. It prevented him from attending to his calling to protect her, which mystified him. He didn't understand why, but she seemed to be distrustful of him overall, even though he'd helped her so many times. He'd thought of using a dream again and asking her why she was hiding, as well as commanding her to end it—but doing so seemed risky. After the ordeal with Anna, Castiel had been called to answer to Raphael, who had reprimanded Castiel for his increasingly close relationship to both Alex and Dean Winchester. He had been told not to contact them on his own unless under divine direction. Uriel and Raphael had not known of his visits to the two Winchesters in dreams, but if he were to chance it and be caught… it would more than likely be considered disobedience. Even the thought of the word disobedience set an uneasy feeling in the pit of the stomach of his vessel. To an angel, unquestioning, automatic obedience was of the highest value. Anything less was a sin.

Alex finished piling up the laundry with her back turned to Castiel. Without any warning whatsoever, she yanked her dark green tank top off and over her head, leaving herself completely naked from the waist up. Stunned into stillness, Castiel gaped at the sight of her bare back: the light olive skin, the strong shoulders and the dark tumbling hair scattered across them, the shallow dip of her spine running down the center, the distinctly womanly shape made by the gentle curve of her hips as they met the solid dark line of her jeans...

Alex threw the discarded shirt toward the pile of laundry, and turned to the side, reaching for a clean shirt. In a fumbling alarm he had never felt before, Castiel left before he could see more, the sense that he should not be there making him react faster than he had in a long time. He gave no thought to where he was going, only away.

The feet of his vessel met a new ground… stone… but he was too busy listening to the blood thunder in his ears to pay attention to where he was. His vessel felt very strange—the mouth felt dry, the heart rate was elevated, the breathing was faster than normal, and there was a completely alien sensation somewhere below the stomach. It wasn't unpleasant or painful, but not having felt it before left him slightly alarmed. He shook himself mentally. He had seen human nudity before, of course he had—he'd existed for thousands and thousands of years—but seeing it through the eyes of his vessel for the first time had left him feeling shaken up. It had only been a glance at a woman's back! Why was his vessel reacting so strangely? Perhaps the vessel was faulty. He was distracted by the nearby sound of a child shrieking with laughter.

He looked around, and saw he was standing in the middle of a tall stone path that was about twenty feet off the ground and bordered by stone walls. He looked to his left, and then his right, seeing that this wall continued into the distance both ways, past where he could even see. A group of people with strange little bags they wore around their waists passed by, one of the women chasing after a laughing toddler. The father, presumably, put a camera to his face and snapped a picture, then grinned at his family. "What do you think, kids?! Huh? The Great Wall of China! Pretty cool!"

Castiel stared in surprise. China? He felt acute embarrassment at the realization that he had lost complete control for a moment, not even knowing where he was going. That had never happened before. He hoped none of his angel brethren had witnessed his fumble.

---

A Few Hours Later

Alex slammed the door of the dryer shut, glad to have that over with, at least mostly. In her back pocket, her phone began to ring. Sam's number. "Hey," she answered, balancing the phone against her shoulder as she counted the quarters she had left in her hands.

"Hey," said Sam's voice. "So, we think we have this figured out. Do you happen to remember Barry?"

Alex frowned, stopping her quarter-counting momentarily. "The kid with the glasses? The one that guy Dirk was bothering constantly?"

"That's him," Sam confirmed. "We're on our way to go salt and burn him."
Alex felt a wave of sadness at that. "Poor Barry," she murmured.

"Yeah," Sam said, sounding similarly saddened. She could hear him take a deep breath, trying to push past it. "So, we'll be back soon. Maybe a couple hours."

"Okay. See you then," Alex said, and they hung up. She stared at her phone for a few seconds, the quarters in her right hand forgotten. Barry. Not only was the kid dead, but his ghost was killing people? It was easier to do this job when you didn't know the ghosts personally.

1997
A Couple Weeks Later

"Yo! Sammy! Alex!" Dean waved at his siblings, walking by with a blonde girl who was probably a cheerleader.

"That's your brother with Amanda Heckerling?" Barry asked, sounding very impressed. "He's cool."

"Yeah. He thinks so," said Sam, and glanced at Alex. They knew better, and grinned at each other. They were getting along that day. The moment was cut short by the arrival of Dirk… the guy who had been making life miserable for all three of them the past couple of weeks. Alex's good mood dissolved immediately.

"Hey, tough guy," he said to Sam, sneering. "I been looking for you and your freak sister. Still wanna take Barry's place? Or maybe your ugly sister would?" He snickered at Alex, whose blood was beginning to boil. Any day of the week, you stupid prick.

"Get outta here, Barry," Sam said in a low, threatening tone.

Barry was growing anxious and seemed to anticipate that help was needed. "I'll go get a teacher," he said, and scurried off.

"You wanna go?" Dirk asked, grinning sadistically at Sam. Alex was practically foaming at the mouth to 'go' as Dirk so eloquently put it.

"I'm not gonna fight you, Dirk," Sam said, which only made Dirk laugh.

"Why not? You chicken? Come on!"

"No." Sam said, and without a warning Dirk reeled back and punched Sam hard enough to knock him over.

The second she'd seen Dirk drawing his fist back, Alex had dropped her backpack and lunged forward, putting all of her strength into backhanding Dirk across the face. Stunned, he stumbled backwards and Alex followed through, slamming into him and tackling him to the ground. On top of him, she began pummeling his face with her fists, even as he screamed protests of "Get off, get off!" — but Alex was seeing red, remembering the cruel insults he had lobbed at her, the tripping in the hallways, the dropped school lunches, the way he had tried to make Sam look weak and stupid. She grabbed his hair and hit his head against the ground, thinking of all the ways she would cuss him out if she could.

"Stop that!" A teacher was suddenly yelling, and she was being pulled off Dirk even while kicking and punching the air. Another teacher was kneeling by Dirk, who was curled onto his side, moaning or crying, maybe both. Alex, breathing heavily, her face flushed, looked around, expecting to see amazed faces. Instead, she saw shock, fear, and disdain. All the kids were looking at her as if she were the freak. And then she saw Sam, who was still on the ground, looking at her as if he'd been betrayed.

"He needs his weirdo sister to fight for him?" She heard someone say. Her heart sank even as she was being steered away by the teacher.

"Young lady, come with me. You're going to see the principle," Mr. Wyatt said, sounding very flustered. The kids stepped aside as he steered her along, and Alex heard whispers and mutters about "crazy," "like a serial killer," "probably on drugs." She had to chew the inside of her mouth to bite back the tears. She wouldn't let them see her cry. Not now, not ever. So instead she made threatening faces at them and lunged a couple times, throwing the middle finger out to anyone she made eye contact with. If you don't like me, you can fear me. It always seemed to go like this.

"Young lady, this behavior is very worrisome. I'm going to call your parents right now," the principle was saying. Alex, slouched in the sticky pleather seat, just looked at him insolently. Good luck with that, she thought churlishly.

Dean burst into the principle's office without so much as knocking at that second. The principle stood, caught off guard by the sudden entrance. "And who, sir, are you?" he asked.

"That's my little sister you got there," Dean said, in regular form—foul-tempered and fired up.

The principle narrowed his eyes, taking in Dean warily. "I see. Well, she started a fight in the hall, and refuses to talk to me about why."

Dean's expression dropped momentarily, before becoming infuriated. "She's mute—she can't speak! What is wrong with you people?! How do you even—" he cut himself short, jaw clenched shut, eyes shut, maybe thinking better of what he was about to say.

"I wasn't made aware of—" the principle began, trying to maintain a neutral tone and professional posture.

"Well you're aware now!" Dean fired back, and gruffly grasped Alex's arm, pulling her to her feet. "Let's go, Al."

"You can't just leave!" The principle exclaimed, his voice raising an octave.

"Watch me!" Dean retorted, not even looking back, already halfway out the door with Alex in front of him. He marched her down the hall wordlessly, and Alex was suddenly worried that Dean was angry with her. That would just be the finishing touch on this bullshit day. Dean stopped eventually in the empty hallway and took Alex by both of her shoulders, forcing her to look at him. She did so reluctantly.

"Listen, Al. I heard what happened." At her baleful expression, he almost chuckled. "Word travels fast in high school—didn't I tell you? That's beside the point. Don't feel bad. I can tell you feel bad. Defending Sammy was the right thing to do, okay? Don't listen to these fucking dumbasses."

Alex grabbed the mini notepad and pen she always had jammed in her back pocket, and scribbled as Dean waited. Sam's mad me.

He looked at the words and then at her, frowning. "What the hell for? For sticking up for him?" She shrugged, as if to say 'I guess.' The bell rang, and classes began to change. Kids flooded out all around them, and Dean sighed. "Well, you know what? We won't be at this hellhole for much longer."

Alex nodded, and Dean let go, put his hands in his pockets, and held her gaze. He always did that when she was upset. Looked at her a long time, trying to gauge if she were better or not. Sometimes she liked it, and sometimes she hated it. Today, it just made her feel worse.

A boy from her English class walked by, and laughed. "Freak!" he said as he walked by, and held up his fists, imitating her.

Dean turned sharply, stepping toward the kid, physically blocking his path. "Did I hear you right, punk?"

The kid, who was quite a bit smaller than Dean, gaped, and he was suddenly Mr. There's-No-Problem-Here. "Whoa dude, chill. This isn't your problem."

"Like hell it isn't, you little asshole," Dean said, towering over the kid and staring down at him menacingly. The kid's face had quickly become twisted in fear, and he had backed up against a locker. Dean leaned in. "Mess with my little sister and I'm coming after you. No ifs, ands, or buts. Got it?"

"Uh yeah, yeah!" the kid said, his voice squeaking awkwardly. He backed up a few steps, glanced at Alex, and turned and hurried away.

"Come on, I'm walking you to class," Dean said, and motioned for her to come with him. Alex looked back at the kid who had called her a freak, and catching him looking at her over his shoulder, she threw up her middle finger at him before continuing on her way. Yeah, she made more enemies than friends these days, but at least there was one thing she could count on. Falling into stride with Dean and looking up at him as the walked, Alex felt momentarily safer. She wished she could tell him, right now, how kickass he was, and how much she wanted to be like him when she grew up.

Present The Next Day

Dean and Alex sat in the Impala, parked outside of the school. Sam was inside the school visiting an old teacher, and Alex was in Sam's usual seat. "I'm kind of glad it wasn't Barry," Alex was saying. "Sad that it was Dirk. Kind of makes sense though. Kid was an ass."

"Yeah," Dean said. "Sucks that we got it wrong at first, though."

Alex grimaced, hoping that somehow Barry's relatives wouldn't learn about the dug up grave, the burned bones… oops. She and Dean traded wan expressions, then Dean turned up the music a little—Aerosmith, Train Kept A Rollin'.

"Can you pop the trunk?" Alex asked after a minute. She hadn't thought of it until now, but that's probably where the hex bag had fallen out of her duffel. She hopped out and pulled the trunk up after Dean popped it. It was packed pretty tightly back in there—weapons, supplies, ammo, duffels, backpacks, a couple extra pairs of shoes, a cooler, some dry goods… Alex pawed through it all slowly, trying not to mess up the carefully crammed contents.

"Looking for this?" Dean asked, and Alex started. He was standing beside her, holding up the hex bag with a grim expression on his face.

She looked from it to him, caught. "Uh... maybe," she said feebly.
"Found it in the trunk when we took care of Barry," Dean said.

"Oh." Alex said.

"Yeah. Oh." He didn't look too happy. "Wanna tell me why didn't you tell me we still had this?"

Alex squirmed a little. "Don't get pissed… I just... I dunno. I thought maybe you would take it apart." He raised his eyebrows as if to say 'and?' Alex tried to explain herself, fumbling a little. "I just wanna know more about angels before we let them come around all the time, you know? This hex bag is the only thing we know of to keep angels away from us."

Dean smiled briefly, an expression laced with irony. "And I thought I was the paranoid one."

"Extra caution quite often saves our asses," Alex pointed out. "I don't like it, Dean. Maybe angels are okay dudes deep down, but whoever's giving orders… well, so far the orders have been a bunch of crap. Do we want to be running around in plain sight? We don't even know what we're up against."

"Maybe not, but that wasn't your call to make," Dean said tersely, then sighed heavily. "I'm not as ready to decide angels are the bag guys as you are. Not yet." He shook a few contents out of the hex bag, leaving some still inside. "Let's roll the dice and see where we land." He handed her the half-empty hex bag. "You keep this stuff, I'll keep the rest. If we need it, we'll use it. But not any sooner."

Alex wasn't exactly happy, but she accepted the bag. "I never said I thought angels were the bad guys," she said sullenly.

Dean just gave her a superior look.

Sam left Mr. Wyatt's classroom, glad he'd taken the time to visit his old teacher. The halls were deserted, and his footsteps echoed in the empty space. He rounded the corner, going back out the way he had come in. He looked up and did a double take, then stopped short. A tall, dark haired woman waited there, leaned up against the lockers just by the glass door he'd come in.

"Ruby! How the hell… what are you doing here?"

"Doesn't matter," she said, and folded her arms, coming to meet him. "Why are you avoiding me?"

Sam scoffed defensively. "I'm not avoiding you."

Ruby stepped closer, her voice lowering. "Have you thought about what I told you?"

Sam's tongue darted out between his lips nervously, and his voice lowered, too. "I'm not doing that any more."

Ruby's dark eyes held his and her lips curved upwards in a smile. "You keep telling yourself that, Sam." Her eyes went to his lips, and her expression took on a sultry quality. "I know you want to." She touched his arms gently, leaned in a little closer, her voice dropping to a whisper, her eyes capturing his. "It's all you think about, Sam. You can't wait to have another taste."

Sam pulled away, grimacing. His heart was hammering fast, from a mixture of fear, revulsion, and worst of all, desire. Ruby chuckled, as if his behavior were cute. "Stop fighting it Sam. It's not gonna go away." She again came close to him, pressing her body against his. He let her, even though he squeezed his eyes shut for a couple seconds. "When you're ready… you know where to find me."

She walked a few steps away, then paused, turning and looking back. She looked and sounded suddenly soft, sympathetic. "It must be so hard for you to be the odd one out."

Sam narrowed his eyes at her. "What are you talking about?"

Ruby came back a couple steps. "Your brother and sister... they see you as a freak. As an outsider. The one with the demon blood." She looked at him openly, with a soft smile. "I accept you, Sam. And soon you'll see that I really mean that."

Sam's jaw twitched. "My family is none of your business."

"Sure," Ruby said, her coy smile not faltering even for a second. "I'll be seeing you, Sammy."

And she turned and walked away. Sam watched her go, then looked through the glass door where he could make out the Impala, his siblings waiting for him inside of it. He listened to the sound of Ruby's footsteps fading out, realizing how true Ruby's words had rung for him. He was beginning to feel like he didn't belong where he currently was. He felt less and less able to be himself with Dean and Alex, and more and more desperate to do something about this disease inside himself. Every day, all day, he thought about demon blood and the abilities it gave him, the rush of pleasure and confidence. The purpose. Dean and Alex didn't appreciate the way it enabled him to save people, and it made him feel like he should be ashamed of himself. So for now he was pretending he wasn't wrestling day in and day out with the affliction he'd found himself with. The power. He was just trying to be business-as-usual even though it was anything but.

On the outside, he was Sam, but on the inside, he wasn't sure who he was anymore. He was stuck in the middle, unsure of where to turn.

But the call kept coming, coaxing him to follow this path wherever it would go. No matter how sinister, or unknown, or dangerous...

Sam clenched his jaw tighter, willing his thoughts to stop so that he could focus on the moment at hand.

And with a long stride and deep breath, he went back to his waiting brother and sister.
"Am I going insane? My blood is boiling inside of my veins. An evil feeling attacks; my body's shaking, there's no turning back."
- Bullet for My Valentine

A Week Later

It was late at night and Alex was feeling particularly emotionally drained. She stared out of the window of the Impala at nothing with a hard, thoughtful face. No music played—the car was silent except for the hum of the engines. The mood in the car was somber, as it should be. They had just been to Pamela Barnes' funeral. The psychic had died a couple days ago helping them save a seal from being broken, but it seemed so trivial. It seemed so pointless and stupid. The task of stopping these so-called seals was too big for them, and deep down, Alex was afraid they would fail before they even began. She tried not to think about the alarmingly fast rate that friends and fellow hunters were dying. These were dark, dark days.

Dean pulled into a motel, muttering something about needing some friggin' sleep and Sam silently went to go check them in. Dean and Alex said nothing as they waited, both lost in their own thoughts. Sam came back with their room key, and like usual, they all grabbed their stuff and went to find their room.

"Ah, home crappy home," Dean muttered, breaking the silence as they entered the dark room. Sam flipped on the lights, Alex close behind him. That was when they saw that they were not alone. The three of them stopped short at the sight of Castiel and Uriel in their motel room. Oh no, is all Alex could think.

"Ah. We've been waiting for you," Uriel said, stepping forward toward them. Alex looked from him to Castiel, who hung back. He was staring blankly ahead, unseeingly. He didn't meet her gaze, and immediately she felt that something was off. It had been a couple months, hadn't it, since she'd laid eyes on either angel...? Any time they showed up, there was trouble. But last time she'd seen him, he'd saved her life and stared at her like—well, she didn't know what like. Now he seemed subdued. Chastened maybe.

"Oh come on, guys!" Dean was protesting, dismayed to find his plans of sleeping might not reach fruition.

"You are needed," Uriel said, ignoring Dean's comment.

Dean's temper was shorter than normal. "Needed? We just got back from needed!"

One of Uriel's eyebrows twitched slightly. "Now you mind your tone with me."

"No, you mind your damn tone with us," Dean fired back hotly.

"We just got back from Pamela's funeral," Sam explained, as if that would change Uriel's approach. Uriel's face remained blank, and Castiel switched from staring into space to staring at the ground, unwilling to meet anyone's gaze.

"You know, psychic Pamela?" Dean said acridly, attempting to jog the angels' memories. "Cas, you remember her, right? You burned her eyes out. Remember that? Good times." No response from Cas. "Yeah, then she died saving one of your precious seals," Dean continued angrily, his voice growing in timbre by the second. "So maybe you can stop pushing us around like chess pieces for five freaking minutes!

There was a short silence, and Uriel stepped forward, his stance intended to be threatening. "We raised you out of hell for our purposes," he said, as if that solved everything.

"Yeah, what were those again? What, exactly, did you want from me?" Dean asked, his tone completely insolent. Alex looked at Cas again, who was still silent and stone-faced. He'd been looking at her from the corner of his eye, and when she caught him doing that, he quickly looked away.

Uriel stepped a little closer still, his voice lowering. Beside Alex, Sam tensed. Uriel spoke through his teeth. "Start with gratitude."

"Dean, we know this is difficult to understand," Cas said, breaking his silence and stepping forward, seemingly attempting to pacify the rising conflict between Dean and Uriel.

"And we—" Uriel gave Castiel a pointed look, stopping the other angel in his tracks, "—don't care." Chastised, Castiel again fell silent, not acknowledging Alex's questioning stare. Uriel continued to address Dean. "Now, seven angels have been murdered, all of them from our garrison. The last one was killed tonight."

"Angels can be killed?" Alex asked in surprise, attention piqued. "By what, by demons?"

"How are they doing it?" Dean asked, sounding similarly caught off guard.

Uriel let out a slow breath through his nostrils. "We don't know."

The Winchesters exchanged looks. "I'm sorry, but what do you want us to do about it?" Sam asked, voicing what they were all thinking. "I mean, a demon with the juice to ice angels has to be out of our league, right?"

"We can handle the demons, thank you very much," Uriel said icily, and drew back a bit.

"Once we find whoever it is," Castiel added.

"So what the hell is it you guys need?" Alex asked, exasperated, tired, and sick of running around in conversation circles.

"We have Alastair," Castiel said, yet again avoiding actually answering the question.

Dean smiled humorlessly. "How nice for you. He should be able to name your trigger man."

"He won't talk," Cas explained. "Alastair's will is very strong. We've arrived at an impasse." Alex still didn't see where the angels were going with this, and just shook her head in fatigue.

"Yeah, well, he's like a black belt in torture," Dean said, shrugging. "I mean, you guys are out of your league."

"That's why we've come to his student," Uriel said. "You happen to be the most qualified interrogator we've got."

"What?" Alex exclaimed, suddenly understanding and feeling as though they had been ambushed. Dean was slack jawed, unable to respond.

"Dean, you are our best hope," Castiel began.
Dean was shaking his head, his jaw clenched. "No. No way. You can't ask me to do this, Cas. Not this."

Uriel, who had retreated a few steps, was now walking toward Dean. "Who said anything about asking?" he asked. And without the slightest warning, Alex was suddenly standing in a dark and cold room. In alarm Alex looked to her right, where Dean thankfully stood, just as he had a second ago. But where was Sam? They both turned around, to see Castiel and Uriel standing a few feet off.

"Son of a bitch," Dean growled, and Alex shot him a look.

"I told you we should have kept that hex bag in one piece," she hissed, receiving an irritated glance from her brother.

He leveled Castiel with a glare. "Where are we?"

Alex looked up, noticing the numerous sharp hooks that hung from the ceiling. The room was cold and clammy, like a meat locker. Castiel ignored Dean's question and walked to them, then past them, to a solid metal door that had a small, hazy glass window in it. Dean followed the angel, and Alex slowly followed suit, on guard. Through the little window in the door they could see a tall, wiry man chained to a hexacle that was erected in the middle of a devil's trap. His head lolled onto his chest, and he seemed to be panting due to pain. Alastair. He was in a different vessel than the one he'd been in last time. Next to Alex, Dean's body had gone rigid.

"This devil's trap is old Enochian," Castiel said. "He's bound completely."

Dean looked through the glass, his expression unreadable, and Alex stared at him in alarm. "You're not actually thinking about doing this?" she asked in a tense whisper, which he only acknowledged with a glance.

"Fascinating, Cas," Dean commented to the angel who stood behind him. Dean grabbed Alex by the arm, steering her along with him toward the other end of the room. Castiel watched, frowning in lack of understanding.

"Where are you going?" Uriel, who had been silently observing stepped into the Winchester's path.

"You're out of your damn mind if you think we're staying here," Dean said. "Now get out of the way," Dean demanded, at which Uriel merely blinked.

"Angels are dying, boy."

"And why, exactly, do we care?" Alex asked contemptuously.

Uriel's gaze came to rest on her. He made no attempt to disguise his sneer. "Because I say it is, imp."

"You watch the way you talk to her, chuckles," Dean said acidly, letting go of Alex and stepping a little more into Uriel's space. "And I don't care if you're all-powerful. You can't make me do this. I'm not torturing anyone else. Ever." He looked back at Castiel, who still stood by the door to Alastair's torture chamber. Dean looked as if he expected the angel to back him up or be on his side, but Cas's expression was dour.

"This is too much to ask, Dean, I know." He came forward a little. "But we have to ask it."

Dean looked utterly confounded. "No—no! If you knew what it was like, you wouldn't ask me this. Any of you!"
The room went silent. Uriel was annoyed, Castiel was tense. Alex looked to him appealingly, trying to get him to listen to her. Maybe he would. "Can't you guys find someone else for this?" She asked. Castiel finally looked at her in the eye. "I mean, huge world out there, right? There has to be someone else who can do it."

Castiel was grim. "There is no one else who can do this for us," he said, leaving her to stare at him, confounded.

"Why the hell did you bring Alex along, anyway?" Dean demanded, looking at Cas first, and then Uriel. "To make her watch this twisted little show of yours? You are some sick sons of bitches, you know that?"

Uriel smiled at Dean, as if he were amused. "She's here as leverage."

Neither Winchester missed his meaning. "You said she was protected!" Dean exclaimed in dismay, and he looked at Castiel in confused agitation. Castiel looked almost mournful, but said nothing, only looked at Alex, then away.

"I received new revelation yesterday," Uriel said. "The guardianship of Alex Winchester has ended."

"How convenient," Alex commented acidly, glaring at Uriel in mistrust.

"It's most regrettable," Castiel said, and Alex looked back at him angrily. He almost did look sorry. Almost. She looked away.

Dean crossed his arms, staring at Uriel stonily. "I wanna talk to Cas. Alone."

"Fine," Uriel said, surprisingly compliant. "I'll go seek revelation. We might have some further orders."

"Well, get some donuts while you're out," Dean said, earning a chuckle from Uriel. It was a deep, rich sound.

"Ah, this one just won't quit, will he?" Uriel smirked. "I think I'm starting to see what Castiel likes about you, boy." And then he vanished, leaving Alex, Dean, and Castiel alone.

"You guys don't walk enough. You're gonna get flabby," Dean commented sarcastically to Cas, whose face only registered concentration. "You know, I'm starting to think junkless has a better sense of humor than you do," Dean said when he got no reaction.

Castiel's eyes narrowed. "Uriel's the funniest angel in the garrison. Ask anyone."

Dean and Alex exchanged a puzzled glance, as if they were both thinking should we be amused right now? Then Dean fixed Castiel with an intent gaze. "What's going on here, Cas? Since when does Uriel put a leash on you?"

"My superiors have begun to question my sympathies," he said vaguely.

"What's that supposed to mean?" Alex asked, and Castiel's expression flickered.

"I was getting too close to the humans in my charge." He looked at Dean. "You." And then at Alex, sidelong. "...and you." He seemed sheepish and looked down. "They feel I've begun to express emotions. The doorways to doubt. This can impair my judgment."
"Or... un-brainwash you?" Alex suggested. "Forget that. Cas, just get us out of here."

A muscle in his jaw jerked and he looked at her sternly. "I'm sorry. I don't have the authority or permission to release you."

"Yeah, great." Dean scoffed. "So they knock you down the ladder and put Uriel in charge?"

Cas's frown deepened slightly. "He is a proud and able instrument of God."

"The demotion... doesn't it get your loincloth in a twist?" Dean asked.

Cas looked away, as if in irritation. "It is what it is, to me." Alex looked at him intently—she thought, just for a moment, that she heard a touch of hurt in that deep, husky voice of his.

Dean took in a deep breath, letting it out heavily as he slowly went back to the door that Alastair was behind. "Well tell Uriel, or whoever..." He stared into the room for a moment. "You do not want me doing this, trust me."

"Want it, no. But I have been told we need it," Castiel said. "And if you refuse... Uriel has ordered me to... convince you."

Dean looked back at Cas with a murderous expression. "You mean... using her." Dean looked at Alex, who went slack jawed and looked at Castiel in something in the neighborhood of shocked outrage. The angel was looking at her with an unreadable expression and Alex looked at him in shocked betrayal—surely he was just bluffing...? Dean narrowed his eyes at Cas. "You wouldn't."

A muscle jerked in Castiel's cheek. "Dean, I have no desire to do this," he said, avoiding looking at Alex. "Comply and I won't be forced to hurt her." His words were stunning blows to Alex.

Dean shook his head, disgusted at Cas's response. "You son of a bitch." He turned back around, falling alarmingly quiet. There was a long, tense pause and Alex was speechless, not sure what to say or do.

"Please, Dean," Castiel said quietly, a touch of pleading to his usually apathetic voice. "Just... do as we ask." He glanced at Alex, his eyes hooded. She didn't know what to think. She wasn't sure about much, but Cas wouldn't hurt her, would he? It didn't seem possible after all the times he'd healed her and helped her, gone against orders to do so, even. But here he was, saying he would if he had to. It made no sense.

Dean's shoulders seemed slumped and heavy, and she could hear the pain in his voice when he spoke again. "Cas—if I open that door and walk through it, you will not like what walks back out."

Cas said nothing, and sensing that time and options were running out, Alex tried one last plea, her emotions high strung out of alarm. "Please, Cas. Listen to my brother. Don't make him do this. You can help us." She paused, trying a desperate, stupid appeal. "You like helping us. I know that about you!" Her voice had risen in something close to panic.

But Cas wouldn't look at her. He only stared ahead, his face like stone. He ignored her statement. "You both know what we're fighting for. What we're dying for. What Pamela died for. You know what will happen if we fail." There was a long silence, and Cas looked toward Dean. "For what it's worth, I would give anything not to have you do this."

Dean turned around, his features set like rock. "Yeah." He looked ill. "I'll do it."

"No! Dean—" Alex protested.
Dean shook his head, coming to her. "I have to."

Alex shook her head in feeble protest, Dean's horrifying words about his time in Hell resounding in her mind. "No you don't." She was consumed with fear for him, and was terrified that if he went in, he'd come back broken once and for all. "Don't go in there," she begged, her voice cracking from the onset of sudden, helpless emotion. She grabbed a hold of him, trying to hold him back, keep him safe. "Let them do whatever to me, I don't care!"

Dean's eyes were gentle and resigned—her protests were in vain, and she could tell. "Well I do care Al. And I've already made up my mind," he said softly, and gave her her best attempt at a smile. He grasped her shoulder reassuringly, then looked toward Castiel, his expression becoming intense once more. "Cas... you do not let her see what I'm going to do in there."

"Understood."

And wordlessly, Dean turned and went through the door. Alex stared after her brother, completely aghast. The door shut behind him with a resounding clang, and silence settled over the room. Alex stared at the door, a little breathless. Her heart was racing. "S-shouldn't someone be in there with him?"

"No," Cas said behind her, and she heard him coming to the spot beside her. "He must do this alone." Alex sidled away from him pointedly, angry that he was trying to act like her friend or something. A moment of silence passed, then Castiel tried to speak to her again. "Your empathy and compassion for your brother is commendable."

"It's natural," she retorted, not in the mood for bullshit. She looked at Castiel with an expression that seemed to ask how could you do this? "Do you know what Alastair put Dean through down there? And now you're doing the same thing. Forcing him to torture again, after all he's been through." She scoffed darkly. "An angel doing pretty much what that demon did. Pretty damn ironic, isn't it."

Cas looked like he was considering what she'd said, his ever-present frown momentarily replaced by an oddly pensive expression. "I understand that you're angry with me. But this must be taken care of. And Dean was our last hope. We exhausted all other avenues. Please, understand that."

Alex shook her head slowly, looking at him with an odd expression. "You should know better than this," she told him in a voice that was softer, almost wounded. "I don't even know you. But I know you should know better than this, Castiel." The angel's eyes flickered between hers as his dark brows drew together faintly. Did he agree? Was she way off base? It was her instinct that he really should know better. He seemed different than Uriel and even Anna, in a way she couldn't put her finger on. Maybe she was reaching. Maybe she was wrong in her gut feeling about him. After a minute or two of silence, Alex glanced at Cas. "So what's this crap about God's little protective orders on me going poof? You buy that?"

"Yes," Castiel replied. "I'm no longer your protector." Did Alex imagine the faintest hint of reluctance in his voice?

She wasn't sure, but she felt oddly let down by his response. "Just like that?"

He was looking into the space in front of him with furrowed eyebrows. "Yes. It's for the best, I think."

"The best? Why?" Alex asked.
Cas's expression was strange. "What I said before. My superiors saw that I was becoming too attached. Too emotional."

"You? Emotional?" Alex made a face. "That's fucking rich..." she muttered. Looking at him sidelong, she studied him darkly. "So if Dean had refused. Were you really prepared to, you know, torture me to get him to do what you wanted?"

"Dean didn't refuse," Castiel said, looking down at the floor, sidestepping the question entirely.

There was a disappointed silence on Alex's part. "So, basically, yes," she supposed out loud. He said nothing, only let his eyes flicker over to hers for a moment guiltily. She felt a cruel sense of betrayal, followed by discouragement that she had allowed herself to trust him, in however small a way. She looked away, confused at herself and her instincts that were proving wrong about him. "And here I was thinking you might be different. Better than that." Damn.

Castiel's jaw clenched and he looked up slightly. He didn't answer her. They heard a loud scream in the other room, and Alex's face fell into an apprehensive, wide-eyed stare as she looked at the shut door that her brother was behind. God she wished she and Dean were anywhere else but here. That he'd kept that damn hex bag intact. Another scream followed, and then another, and another. Alex looked at Cas, who finally met her gaze. She didn't bother to hide her hurt, betrayed, resentful expression. Don't let this happen, she wanted to beg him. He stared back, looking strangely affected by the way she was looking at him. Then he got up and walked a few steps away, his back to her, where she could only see his stern profile. Alex considered him for a moment, then the screams coming from the room beyond. Without warning, she broke into a dash for the door, no plan at all in her mind, just a need to rescue her brother somehow.

Before she even reached the door, Castiel suddenly appeared right in front of her, a wind blowing over her from the speed at which he moved. It startled her and she almost ran right into him but came up short, stopping just in time to hit the toe of her shoe up against one of his. He was only perhaps five inches taller than her, but he seemed like a solid, towering wall, blocking her way. His blue eyes were filled with soft, grudging warning. "Let me past," Alex said, and he said nothing and did nothing, only remained in her way. She made to brush past him and he suddenly seized her wrist and pulled her back, holding her there close to him in a strong grip. "Let go of me!" Alex protested, trying to get out of his impossible grip.

"This must happen, Alex," he told her somberly, and he almost seemed to be appealing to her, maybe she was imagining it, but he seemed a little urgent. "Please—don't make me restrain you. I know you don't like it."

His grip didn't hurt, but she pretended it did. "You're hurting me," she lied, putting a note of pain in her voice to sell it, even though she didn't think he'd care. But immediately, surprisingly, his face registered a reaction and he let go, stepped back, held a staying hand out, trying to keep her from continuing her efforts to get to Dean. Alex's surprise showed on her face as she stared at him. What the hell? He was threatening to torture her if Dean didn't comply but wouldn't even hold her tight by the wrist when she complained of discomfort? He looked conflicted, and she was mystified. Another scream sounded and Alex's jaw tightened, her anxiety soared... but she couldn't do anything. She recognized that she wasn't going to get past Castiel. Resigned, Alex retreated and sat leaningly against the empty metal table behind her. She folded her arms and slouched, uncomfortable and unsure, hating how she had to sit here and stand by while Dean was forced to do what haunted him. Cas's eyes remained on her, and she could feel them. She said nothing.

A few tense minutes passed, with Alastair's screams punctuating the silence, and sometimes Dean's shouts, indistinct, echoed in between. A sudden movement to her left caused Alex to look up. She was startled to see Anna there—young, slender, pale, red-headed Anna, who had last been seen in a blaze of Grace. Was she an angel again? She must have been—she'd appeared out of thin air.

"Anna," Castiel greeted dryly, coming closer—not toward Anna, but toward Alex, as if he were being protective.

"Hello, Castiel. Alex." Anna seemed different somehow—taller, fiercer.

"Anna..." Alex returned neutrally, looking at her apprehensively, suddenly suspicious that Anna had rejoined club angel and was backing Cas up on this. "You here to join the fun?"

Anna's expression was grim. "No. I'm here to end it." Her comment surprised and perplexed Alex.

"You shouldn't be here," Cas said, approaching Anna further now. "We still have orders to kill you."

"Somehow, I don't think you'll try," Anna said, and Alex was interested. Why? Because Anna was a great warrior who would kick Cas's ass? Or something else? Anna looked at Castiel intensely. "Why are you letting Dean do this?"

"He's doing God's work," Cas replied stoically. Another one of Alastair's screams rang out.

Anna's expression was pained. "Torturing? That's God's work? Stop him, Cas, please. Before you ruin the one real weapon you have." What weapon? Alex looked between the angels questioningly, but they weren't looking at her.

Cas shook his head. "Who are we to question the will of God?"

"Unless this isn't his will," Anna said. Alex watched the exchange with growing intrigue—Cas seemed to be listening, or at least considering what Anna was suggesting.

"If not God, then where do the orders come from?" he asked.

"I don't know. One of our superiors, maybe, but not him."

Another scream broke the silence, and Anna grew earnest, pleading. "The Father you love. You think he wants this? You think he'd ask this of you? You think this is righteous?" Castiel couldn't meet her questioning gaze. "What you're feeling right now? It's called doubt." She touched his hand, a subtle action Alex didn't miss. Cas looked at her hand in puzzlement. "These orders are wrong and you know it. But you can do the right thing. You're afraid, Cas. I was too. But together, we can still—"

"Together?" Castiel repeated, and yanked his hand away, his thoughtful expression turning hard and deadly. "I am nothing like you. You fell. Go."

"Cas..." Anna said, but Castiel's voice shook with murder.

"Go." He repeated himself darkly. Anna looked at him sadly, but then did as he said and disappeared. Cas looked shaken up and angry, which was interesting to see—genuine emotion, a real reaction? Anna's points seemed valid, too, and Alex wondered that was why Cas was upset. Because he thought so too, maybe. Or maybe that was Alex projecting, hoping.

"I thought you had orders to kill her," Alex said, testing him a little, wondering about him. Castiel looked at her almost balefully, as if he didn't want to be reminded of the fact. Alex copped a disarming, easygoing air that would have made Dean proud. "Death sentence or not, you were kinda harsh there at the end, buddy."

Castiel looked at her sharply. "She suggested blasphemy."

Alex stood up and threw her arms wide in a shrug and let her hands hit the sides of her legs with a loud slap. "She suggested using your freaking brain."

"It's not that simple," Cas replied, his voice decidedly agitated.

"Um, yes, it is," Alex said. "You need to wake up. Something's wrong here about this, can't you feel it?" She paused. He seemed to have no clue about what was going on, or was too stuck on following orders and being a good little boy to care. Why was she appealing to him like he'd actually see it like she did? She didn't know. Wishful thinking again. Alex decided to get snippy again, angry at herself for trying to get him to listen to reason when clearly, it wasn't going to happen. "You could take some lessons from Anna, you know that? She questions things and decides herself what's wrong or right. She isn't a blind follower like you are."

She seemed to have touched a nerve—Cas snapped, whirling on her. "I am not blind!" he thundered.

Alex looked at him in mild surprise, shrank back a little, because she suddenly remembered how strong he was, how powerful. Maybe pissing him off was a bad idea. Still, she found it in her ability to make a snide remark. "And that, my friend, is called denial," she remarked, even as she was wondering if maybe the angels were right. Maybe he was beginning to become emotional.

Cas's jaw worked oddly, and he looked at her contemptuously as if she'd insulted him somehow. "You speak as if you know everything. You know nothing." It was meant to be an insult and Alex took it as such, but she was honestly surprised at him for it. At that point he seemed to remember himself and swallowed, his expression falling away into an apologetic state. "It's—" he started, then frowning abruptly, looked toward the cell. "No."

"Cas?" Alex asked, looking around in confusion. He had disappeared. A sudden, terrifying thought came to her, and she dashed to the the door of the room where Alastair was, peering through the glass. What she saw sent horror reeling through her, and she yanked the door open, rushing in, only to be slammed against the wall, frozen in place.

"Stay back!" Castiel barked, and Alex had no choice but to comply.

On the floor at the edge of the devil's trap, Dean's body laid lifelessly, his face a mess of bruises and blood. Alex struggled desperately against the hold Castiel had put on her, but it held. Alastair, who had somehow been freed from the trap, was grinning wickedly, pulling Ruby's knife out of his chest, completely unharmed by Castiel's attack. He chortled eerily, and charged Castiel—Alex could only watch, ineffectively struggling, as the angel and the demon began trading devastating blows, destroying parts of the room as they threw each other around. It was only a matter of maybe ten seconds, but Alastair gained the upper hand, slammed Cas against one of the walls, holding him up by his neck. Blood ran down the side of the angel's face, and Alex felt the hold on her lessen as Alastair began exorcising Castiel, shouting Latin. Frozen in sudden terror, she watched as Cas's mouth and eyes began to glow in fierce blue light. She tumbled forward, free to move once again. Just there, a couple feet away, she saw a cinder block. Without a second thought, Alex grabbed it, heaved it up with both hands, and lifting it high, she crashed it down on Alastair's head, stunning the demon and freeing Castiel from the chokehold. Cas tumbled to the ground, momentarily dazed.

Alastair, recovered, strode toward Alex, who was backing up fast, but not fast enough. "Alex, "It's not us. We're not doing it!" Alex heard someone shouting, followed by bizarre sounds of someone screaming in pain.

She opened her eyes unevenly, and everything came rushing back as she blinked, her eyes refocusing awkwardly. She was staring at the ceiling, laying on her back, one of her legs tucked under her weirdly.

"I don't believe you," came a familiar voice. Sam? Alex struggled and rolled onto her side, supporting herself on an arm. Her head was pounding, and there was something wet on the side of her head. She touched her fingertips to it, and saw bright crimson there. Woozily, she looked up at the spot where she remembered Cas being. He wasn't there, but she saw that a pair of shoes were right in front of her face.

"Lilith is not behind this," Alastair said, his strangely nasal, lisping voice full of an ominous happiness. "She wouldn't kill seven angels. Oh, she'd kill a hundred, a thousand…"

Alex looked up foggily at the owner of the shoes in front of her face, to see Castiel reaching down for her. There was still blood running down the side of his face. He pulled her to her feet, and Alex clutched onto his arm for support, a little off kilter. She stared at him, a little groggy and muddled as she reached her full height. He was so handsome, she thought idly, that it was sad he had to be such an asshole. She lurched as her vision swam and she hung onto him tighter so that she didn't fall down.

"Go ahead. Send me back, if you can," Alastair taunted Sam, who smiled faintly.

"I'm stronger than that now," Sam said darkly. "Now I can kill." He held his hand out, and his expression became concentrated, aloof. Alastair's face fell and golden light flickered inside him, the outline of his skeleton pulsing through the skin. Adrenaline or fear seemed to overpower Alex's woozy state, and she stared in sudden breathless horror as Sam's outstretched hand slowly clenched into a fist. How was he doing that? Beside her, still supporting her, Castiel watched, his expression matching hers. Almost in unison, they clutched each other tighter as the demon began to scream, the pulsing golden light intensifying, then exploding inside of him. The host collapsed, dead. Sam looked pleased, a strange smile on his face that Alex would never, ever forget.

A soft groan from over by the devil's trap drew everyone's attention, and Alex jerked herself out of Castiel's grip, staggering over to Dean's crumpled body. She fell onto all fours and put her head to his chest, listening for his breath. Sam, seemingly back to being himself, was right behind her. Alex drew away. She was startled to see that she'd left a blood stain on Dean's shirt where she'd pressed her ear. She knew she had just cut herself and been given a solid knock on the head... but Dean was barely breathing. "We need to get him to a hospital," she said in urgent alarm.

Castiel came to them, his expression dogged. "Hold on."

Alex and Sam stayed by Dean's beside, hoping for a sign that Dean would regain consciousness. Castiel had taken them to the emergency room and then disappeared without even a word. It had been a couple hours, and Dean had been stabilized, but still remained unconscious. The doctor had wanted to treat Alex, too, who had refused. It was only a cut, and possibly a mild concussion. Baby stuff, as far as she was concerned. She'd stopped the bleeding—she was fine. She sat on the edge of Dean's bed, and gently ran her palm down the side of his still face. He looked free of worries, at least. A small mercy. But would he be okay? Sam, who was sitting in a chair next to her, suddenly shot up to his feet. Following his suddenly hostile gaze, Alex rose too. Castiel stood in the doorway, silent. He looked normal again, free of blood, no rips in his coat. Wordlessly, the angel turned and walked away. Exchanging a glance, Sam and Alex took after him, Sam leading the way. Alex hadn't confronted him on what he'd done to Alastair. Not yet.

"Sam—" Castiel started as he caught up to the angel in the hospital hallway.

Sam jabbed a finger back toward Dean's room. "Get in there and heal him. Miracle. Now."

"I can't," Cas said, eliciting incredulous expressions from the twins.

"What do you mean, you can't?!!" Alex demanded, incredulous and quickly getting pissed. "After all of the times you healed me, that's one hell of a lie, Cas!"

"I mean I can't," Castiel repeated firmly, but his expression wasn't the usual confident and stern frown. He looked upset. "I shouldn't even be here right now. I've been warned for the last time about healing."

Alex was beside herself. "But he needs it!"

Sam was similarly aghast. "You and Uriel put him in there—because you can't keep a simple devil's trap together!"

Cas looked between the two siblings, who had pretty much cornered him. "I don't know what happened. That trap... it shouldn't have broken. I am sorry."

"Oh. You're sorry?" Alex asked scornfully.

"This whole thing was pointless. You understand that?" Sam demanded. "The demons aren't doing the hits. Something else is killing your soldiers, and that's the truth. Hope you're happy." Fed up, Sam whirled and stalked back to Dean's room, leaving Castiel and Alex alone in the dim hallway.

"Perhaps Alastair was lying," Cas attempted, only to be quickly cut off by another angry retort from Alex.

"Yeah and perhaps the sky is purple! You're honestly going to stand here and not do anything—after Dean did everything you asked? You forced him to do the most inhuman and horrible thing, for what?!" She was infuriated. "So that you can leave him to rot in there?!"

"I don't know how that devil's trap could have failed—" Castiel tried again.

"It was sabotaged!" Alex exploded, "Or rigged! Maybe by you, Cas! Huh?" Clear incredulous shock rippled across his features as she looked at him while shaking her head in almost disgust. "I wouldn't put it past you at this point." She was bitter, blinded by betrayed anger and confusion. "I never should have trusted you, not even a little bit. Not for one second."

"How can you even say that?" he asked slowly. He sounded offended and wounded. "I've done nothing but stand at your side and give you assistance and guidance from Heaven."

"Yeah, thanks," Alex said, sounding anything but thankful. She looked at his stupid face that she currently hated more than anything; pissed at how clueless he looked. How could he not know how much he had risked by letting Dean torture Alastair? Or how twisted it was to force Dean to do what he did? Alex's rage was collecting inside of her blindingly, and she realized she needed to walk away before it made her do something she'd regret. She was losing her mind to her temper.

She turned to walk away, but he grasped her arm lightly, stopping her. "I'm only here to help." Castiel said, and Alex, infuriated, rounded on him.

"Don't touch me!" she snarled, hauling off and punching him squarely across the face... and immediately she hunched forward, cradling her fist in pain. "Son of a bitch!" She groaned. He was completely unaffected by her physical attack, which pissed her off even more.

He looked chagrined. "You can't hurt me, Alex," he said, sounding as if he felt sorry for her for thinking she could. He was silent for a beat, looking at her hand tensely. "Is your hand all right?"

"What do you care?!" Alex shot back, holding her hurt hand to herself pitiably, reeling from pain and trying not to show it.

Cas looked grumpy. "You shouldn't exert yourself. You've sustained a head injury."

"This 'head injury' isn't half as bad as the pain you've been in my ass!" She retorted, yanking her arm out of his grasp. Maybe she couldn't hurt him physically. But she had a hunch that she could hurt him another way, a childish way, and she didn't hesitate to try it. "I hate you, Castiel. Hate," she bit out acidly, feeling absolute sick triumph as his expression fell completely in response. And high on the bullying behavior, she let another cruel remark fly. "Go die," she snarled thoughtlessly, and she received exactly what she had been aiming for: his face registered absolute confusion, hurt. But instead of feeling better again, Alex felt a very strong pang of regret and contempt... for herself. Pride held her fast and she lifted her chin and stared at him, refusing to let him see through her, trying to let him think that's actually how she really felt. If for no other reason than to protect herself at this point.

He seemed at a loss, devastated by her words. "I… I don't understand. I risked everything out of compassion for you. To give you back your voice. Despite everything—I know I've made some errors—but despite everything, I am your friend."

Friend? Alex felt like she'd been socked in the gut when he said that. Did he really think that? He seemed so innocent and vulnerable right then, so full of earnestness. He seemed like the Castiel she kept catching glimpses of and liking. His eyes showed hurt and he gazed at her in confusion. "Why would you say this to me?" His wounded question hung in the air, and Alex couldn't deny the guilt that washed over her as he had said that, nor the knowledge that he was pretty much right.

Grudgingly, she looked away, not sure what to do now. "You know what, I appreciate what you've done. I do, Cas." More than anything, really. She shook her head, frustrated, feeling emotion brimming in her eyes. "But if you're my friend, then you'll help us. Please! Dean might die!"

Cas's face showed reluctance and as he spoke, there was an intensity there, as if he were trying to ask her to please understand. "Alex—I cannot help you. It's out of my hands. I've been ordered not to—" he stopped mid sentence, seeing the pained look on Alex's face. Surprisingly, Cas addressed exactly what Alex was worried about. "Dean won't die. He'll survive this, I promise you."

Alex just looked at him in hurt confusion. She felt let down and betrayed. "You can help us. And you won't. Why?" Cas's gaze faltered as if her words shamed him and Alex gritted her teeth together, realizing she had made a huge mistake. Trusting him in a small way, enough to hope that he would help them. Her voice got cold and trembled. "What you did today, what you let happen was wrong." She retreated back from him a step. "Just stay the hell away from my family, understand?" And without waiting for a reply, she turned and left him standing there.

She didn't look back to see if he stayed. She was too busy squeezing her eyes shut and trying to shove the shame and confusion away. She saw his face in her mind's eye, hurt and disillusioned at her verbal jabs. Why wouldn't he listen? Why wouldn't he wake up and get his mind out of the mindset of blindly following orders? He could help and he wouldn't. And the worst part was how Alex found herself believing Castiel should help, that it was within his character to help them. She scoffed at herself. She didn't know him. All she knew was that he was confused and confusing. She tried to push him out of her mind. She just wanted to be done with entire, messy ordeal. In vain, she rubbed her fist in her other hand, wincing. Punching him had been like punching a tree trunk. And the worst part was that he had turned his head with her fist when she hit him—she knew that if he hadn't done that, if he hadn't moved his face when her fist impacted him, she probably would have broken her hand all together. She thought bitterly that she didn't deserve that, for him to be looking out for her still, especially not now after she'd been such a total bitch.

She grimaced against the shooting pains in her knuckles as she re-entered Dean's room. Sam was sitting again at Dean's bedside, leaned over his knees as he watched their brother intently. Sam glanced up at her. "I've never seen him this bad."

Alex took her seat opposite of Sam, not able to hide her anxiety. Dean looked horrible and sallow, and she'd seen him this bad only once or twice in her whole life. She gritted her teeth together, breathed out heavily, weary and hopeless and worried beyond comprehending. "Sam—what are we gonna do?"

Sam's jaw clenched, he thought for a minute. "We're gonna lay low. We're gonna get him better. And then we're going to figure out a way to get these damn angels off our backs for good."

Alex shook her head hollowly. It would all be easier said than done. For a minute, they watched Dean silently, the beep, beep, beep of the heart rate monitor punctuating the silence.

A little nervously, Alex cleared her throat. She didn't want to have to ask what she was about to. "Listen, Sam. How were you able to kill Alastair like that?" She paused. "You were… full on telepathic." She was struggling not to sound repulsed or afraid. "Not even Ruby's knife did anything to him."

Sam was somber, his gaze stony. "Uh, yeah, I dunno. My abilities are just stronger."

Alex felt like she wasn't getting the full story, but was afraid to set Sam off. "I mean, do they get stronger every time you use them?" she asked, trying to pry something more out of him.

"Something like that," Sam said and sighed, looking away uncomfortably. "Sorry. I don't like to talk about it. I, you know, don't understand them myself."

Alex nodded, and let it go, even if she would retain her suspicions about it all for some time to come. "It's okay Sam. It's fine." But it wasn't fine. She looked at him from underneath her lashes across the bed. Even though he was within arms reach, he could have been a hundred miles away. That's how close she felt to him right now. Troubled, she remembered how he had barely been able to exorcise Samhain, some punk street demon, a couple months ago. So how was it that he so easily kill one of the most powerful demons in existence… with only his mind? Alex looked at her oldest brother, wishing she knew what to do. Wishing she didn't feel slightly afraid of him right now.

Castiel found Uriel sitting on a bench in the middle of a snowy glen. His brother had his eyes closed. "There you are," Uriel said, as if he'd been expecting him, and opened his eyes. His demeanor was agitated and distressed. "Castiel, I received revelation from our superiors. Our brothers and sisters are dying and they… they want us to stop hunting the demon responsible."

Castiel sat carefully beside Uriel, remaining silent, distracted. He couldn't stop remembering Alex's angry words and the way she'd attacked him like he was the enemy. Why didn't she understand he was here to protect and care for her? Why did she look at him so mistrustfully and like he was a stranger? Didn't she realize he was the one in the shadows and the still moments who made sure she would always be safe? Before this vessel, he hadn't dared to imagine that they would ever speak to each other, but if he had... he never would have imagined she could ever be so angry with him. Make him... hurt so much. How was it possible for mere words to sting him inside? He felt dejected and defeated, wishing he could change this somehow. How could he undo this damage?

Uriel sighed, ignorant to Castiel's inner struggles. "Something is wrong up there. I mean, can you feel it?" Uriel looked heavenward, greatly troubled.

Castiel glanced Uriel's way, torn out of his thoughts. He didn't want to address his growing doubt in the purity of Heaven's orders. "The murders," he said, distracted. "Maybe they aren't demonic. Sam Winchester said the demons had nothing to do with it."

"If not the demons, what could it be?" Uriel asked, sounding shocked at the idea.

"The will of Heaven," Castiel theorized. His shoulders were slumped at the reality. "We are failing, Uriel," he said heavily, distressed at the thought of how dire these times truly were. "We are losing the war, perhaps the garrison is being punished."

The suggestion seemed to bother Uriel. "You think our Father would—"

"I think maybe our Father isn't giving the orders anymore," Castiel said, emboldened, letting himself take Anna's stance, take Alex's stance. He thought about how Alex had insisted, repeatedly, that something was wrong with the scenario. Off. And Castiel decided that he, too, felt that way. "Maybe there is something wrong."

Uriel's brow furrowed. "Yes. I believe there is."

Castiel looked Uriel's way again. He was preparing to broach an uncomfortable subject. "Uriel. I asked around. No one else in Heaven received revelation about the end of Alex Winchester's guardianship."

Uriel turned slowly to look at Castiel. "Well I did," he said evenly.

"Did you?" Castiel challenged quietly.

Uriel's eyes narrowed. "What are you accusing me of?" he asked in a soft, dangerous tone.

Castiel returned Uriel's gaze unblinkingly, under the knowledge that there would be no going back from what he was about to say. As of late, Castiel had been under the influence of outsiders—namely Alex and Dean Winchester. In the privacy of his own mind, he wondered if they were the reason he had begun to suspect Uriel of lies and deceit. But no matter who or what had caused him to think these things, he thought them all the same. Castiel gathered his courage to reply to his brother. "Of manipulating the situation to your advantage."

Uriel scoffed, and shook his head. "Our superiors are right. You have begun to lose your mind." And without another word, Uriel disappeared, leaving Castiel even more lost than before.
Castiel heaved a tired sounding sigh and stood up. This was not supposed to happen. He was not supposed to be obliged to mistrust and second-guess his brethren. And still, he did. The growing sense of unease, of wrongness, was too strong to deny. Yet, he wanted to deny it. Heaven had been stable once. He had known his place and has carried out his duties without question. Things were different now. Castiel was considering very terrible and blasphemous things in the depths of his mind. Things like disobedience and defiance.

Absently, he wondered about Dean. His injuries were bad, but he would survive. Still, seeing him beaten and bruised and unresponsive had sparked a strange feeling in Castiel's spirit. It didn't have to be that way, yet Heaven said he was to do nothing about it… he was to stand idly by and allow the man to suffer. Why? What Alex had wanted to know, Castiel wanted to know, too. He then thought of her again. He could still see her hazel eyes flashing and her cheeks flushed red as she had hit him. He had felt nothing, at least physically, upon the impact of her fist. But internally, he'd been shocked and affronted by the action—she'd been trying to hurt him. To attack him. Again he remembered hearing her shout 'I hate you!' He didn't understand how such a simple declaration could have made him feel so bad or why it still bothered him so deeply. And above all, he knew that spending so much time thinking of her was not prudent or advisable. And still, he did.

Night came and Castiel finally stood. He needed help, and perhaps seized by madness for a moment, he asked for it from the strangest of places. He stood underneath a dim streetlight and called for her. "Anna!" A moment passed and she made no appearance. His voice softened as he searched the darkness for a sign. "Anna, please." The light above him flickered softly and Castiel looked up into it, then turned around.

Anna stood there—youthful and small, lithe. "Decided to kill me after all?" She glanced around, as if she thought other angels were hidden nearby.

"I'm alone," Castiel assured his sister plainly. His entire mind felt consumed with worry and fear, conflict.

She seemed a little surprised. "What do you want from me, Castiel?"

Castiel looked at his sister and confessed his greatest sin. "I'm considering disobedience," he told her heavily, barely able to withhold how fearful it made him to admit such.

The smallest smile came over Anna's face and she smiled. "Good."

"No," he insisted, "it isn't." Was this what panic felt like? Confusion? He tried to explain it to her. "For the first time, I feel…" he didn't know what else to say. "I feel." He knew no way of standing up underneath the metaphorical weight of the things he felt. The longer he was around the Winchesters, the more feelings came over him, and it was like a monsoon he couldn't control.

"That's good, Castiel," Anna repeated, coming a little closer, giving him a hopeful and reassuring smile. "I know it's intense and frightening and new, but it is good."

Castiel was perplexed. "How can it be good?" He questioned. "The things I'm feeling are corrupting my thoughts and actions." His voice softened because he felt ashamed of himself. His eyes flickered downward. "The things I feel… they tempt me."

"Tempt you how?" Anna asked, concern in her eyes.

"To choose my own actions," Castiel said. "To disregard orders in favor of what I deem appropriate."
"And why should that be wrong?" Anna asked, her concern melting away into a studious, earnest tone. "We were taught never to question anything, Castiel. Because they knew if we questioned, we would begin to see." She was deadly serious and quiet. "A war is coming. A different war than what we fight now. You can sense it, can't you? The future is dark and uncertain. Heaven's not what it used to be." Anna contemplated him with sadness in her eyes. "Do you even know who it is you serve anymore?"

Castiel's eyes went down slowly as he thought very hard and realized the answer was deeply horrifying. "No," he murmured. "I don't think that I do."

"You could be like me, Castiel," Anna appealed. "You could choose your own course of action. Use the power and ability our Father gave to you to help the humans you choose to help. The humans you care about. Her." Castiel's eyes snapped to Anna's at the nameless mention of Alex. Anna's eyes were soft and questioning, curious. "Tell me, Castiel. What things do you feel for her?"

Bristling, Castiel's face returned to a mask. "I am her Heaven-elect protector. Feelings are not part of the arrangement."

Anna gave the softest little laughing sound and she shook her head ruefully, seeming to see straight through Castiel's attempts. "You and I both know that's not true. Why do you think you got in trouble for restoring her voice, Castiel? You felt back then. She made you feel compassion. You were moved to action by her." Castiel was looking down, ashamed at himself for being disobedient. Anna saw his expression. "Would you take it back, if you were able?" She asked him intently.

Castiel raised his eyes to hers. His answer was immediate and strong. "Never." He didn't understand himself. But the shame he felt for disobeying was nothing compared to the deep feeling that he had done the right thing. He remembered hearing Alex laugh out loud for the first time. He would never choose to not give her that. It had made him... happy. That sound and what it meant. That she had been happy, too.

"Why are you fighting so hard?" Anna asked gently, peering at him in true confusion. "It's obvious to me that your time as a blind follower of Heaven is over."

The thought of the new and unknown—the thought of existing in a way where he was in charge of his every action—it was terrifying. Shouldn't he accept who he was? A 'hammer' as Dean had put it? Still—he had his doubts and questions. There was a war inside of him, and Castiel didn't know how to win. "I was created to follow," he said, trying to rationalize and use logic, attempting to remember himself. "I shouldn't presume myself the commander of my own destiny."

"But maybe you should. And maybe that's what God wants." Anna put her hand on Castiel's shoulder, trying to comfort him or sway him, he didn't know. He looked at her hand balefully and she dropped it away. Hurt crossed her face. "That's right. You're too good for my help. I'm just trash," she said in a sharpened voice, "a walking blasphemy." She turned to leave him.

"Anna, please—" Castiel said, voice rising a little bit in response to the turmoil he felt inside. "I don't know what to do. Please tell me what to do." He waited for her to say something, to continue telling him things that helped him feel as if perhaps his actions weren't wrong or sinful.

Anna turned halfway to look at him and there was a bittersweet smile on her face. "No, Castiel," she said softly. "I'm sorry. It's time to think for yourself."
Alex gave the corner vending machine a swift kick, cursing it under her breath. She grabbed it with both hands and shook, trying to get the freaking thing to dispense the pack of M&Ms. "Come on—you—jackass—son of a bitch—motherfucking jerkoff—" she grunted, rattling it with violent, exasperated force. Finally, the little packet tumbled loose, and she was able to fish it out of the machine. She clenched the little bag of candy tightly… it had proven to be very coy. So much so that she felt mad at it. She set off down the quiet, dark hallway of the hospital back to Dean's room, where her brother, awake and on the mend, was anxiously awaiting the delivery of his snack.

"Well, thanks to your little midnight craving—" she started as she opened the door, but then fell silent at the sight of him. Castiel stood up as she entered the dark room. He'd been seated beside Dean, in her seat. And then she saw Dean's face in the dim moonlight that came in through the window. He was stricken and distressed, his cheeks looked tear stained. "Dean! What's wrong?"

She asked in sudden alarm, then looked at Castiel accusingly as she went to Dean's side protectively. "What did you do to him?!"

A slab of moonlight fell diagonally across the angel's face, and she could see him looking at her with a strange expression. Discomfort. "I answered his questions. I told him the truth which I uncovered."

"Which is?" Alex asked, stepping closer to him with dread rising.

Castiel's gaze faltered. "I discovered that Uriel was the one who was killing angels. He wanted to raise Lucifer. He said other angels do, too." He paused, looking into her eyes.

"What?" Alex asked, her face going soft with surprise. "What happened when you found that out?"

A muscle in Cas's jaw jumped and he looked away. "He's dead." From the way he said it, Alex thought Cas was saying he killed him too.

Not what Alex had expected to hear—none of it. Castiel looked resigned and burdened—different somehow—and Alex could find no retort or jab to aim at him. Actually, she didn't want to. She simply looked at him, and realized how exhausted he looked. How overwhelmed. "There is a war in Heaven, and I must fight for righteousness," Castiel said. "You and Dean and Anna were right." He sounded so, so, tired. Alex just looked at him in stunned silence, not really sure what to say. He looked like he'd been to Hell and back emotionally, and Alex felt incredibly guilty and incredibly cruel. He was trying. To be their friend. Her friend. She looked away, but Cas didn't take his eyes off her. His gaze fell to her hand. "Is your hand all right?" he asked—again—catching her off guard completely. She looked at him incredulously, hearing the concern in his voice. After how awful she'd been to him, he was still wondering about her hand? He remembered that, was thinking about it, was concerned about it?

She withered slightly underneath his questioning gaze. "Uh... y-yeah, it's fine." She swallowed oddly, looked away, feeling mortified.

Castiel was as tense as ever and looked to Dean. His frown deepened. "I'll leave now." But before he did, he looked at Alex once more, his expression unreadable. "I'm sorry, Alex." And he was gone, before she could ask what for. Although Alex couldn't know what he meant he was sorry for, Castiel had meant he was sorry for several things: hurting her hand. Making Dean torture Alastair. And letting her think that he would ever, for even a moment, willfully hurt her. Castiel had known, the entire time, that should the moment come, should Uriel have told him to hurt Alex to coerce Dean into action... Castiel wouldn't have been able to bring himself to that. And he was sorry that he'd had to let her think that he would.

But she didn't know what he meant, and Alex stared at the spot Castiel disappeared from, confused.
"Dammit," she muttered, unable to put her conflicting frustrations into coherent thoughts or words. Why did he always leave her in a jumble of confusion? She didn't roll like that. In this life, she made up her mind about things and stuck by her decisions. But with Cas, she kept going back and forth. She couldn't make up her mind about him, and it was infuriating.

A soft sniff tore her out of her thoughts and she turned her attention to Dean, who was struggling to control his face. He was clearly upset. "What is it?" Alex asked in dismay, sitting down on the bed and gently brushing his wet cheeks with the backs of her fingers. She always got extremely upset herself when Dean was upset, but his tears—those terrified her.

He caught her hands in his to stop her, and held them firmly, his eyes squeezed closed. "Cas said that I was the one who started the apocalypse." His eyes opened, his face contorted in guilt and pain and he looked at her with a horrible, pained expression. "Me. In Hell, I broke the first seal. I started it."

"What?" Alex whispered.

"When I tortured souls, it started this whole freakin' thing," Dean whispered tearfully.

Alex grasped at straws for the right words to say to comfort her miserable brother. "Well, you'll be the one to end it, right? You and me. And Sammy. We'll beat this. Dean... hey. Hey."

What little composure remained was fast crumbling, and Dean shook his head. His voice cracked with raw emotion—with a certain note of hopelessness. "I'm not strong enough, Al. I've carried too much for too long, and I can't do it. I just can't. I don't have the strength anymore." He shook from a sob that wracked his entire body, and Alex didn't know what else to do. She half crawled into the bed, embracing him tightly, even though she herself was beginning to feel as though she were falling apart, too. "You don't have to do it alone, Dean. I'm here."

He just wept, and she clutched him in total terror, glad he couldn't see her face right now. When Dean, her rock, fell apart, she didn't know how to be okay.
"You took away my world."
- Fastball

"I see your giant snickers bar and raise you a cup of room temperature hospital jello," Dean said, plunking the aforementioned item down on his bedside tray.

"Dangerous stakes, Winchester. You sure?" Alex asked, feigning deadly seriousness as she stared at him over her cards.

"Oh yeah," he replied in a low voice, matching her theatrics with a challenging eyebrow shrug. "I'm sure. Hit me."

She laid down her hand with a triumphant smirk and he grimaced as she announced, "Full house."

"Dammit," Dean sighed, throwing down his hand in disappointment. "Three of a kind. You win this round, Pipsqueak."

"Ah... victory..." Alex said with a note of comic uncertainty. She took the cup of Jello and squinted at the wiggly red substance—her hard earned prize—as Dean sighed restlessly and settled back against the pillows of his bed, half-sitting.

"I am so damn ready to get outta here," he said, sounding mostly exasperated but a little forlorn, too.

Alex glanced at him sympathetically. It had been about a week and a half that he'd been here at the hospital. "Well, the doc said if all the tests came back normal today we can leave tomorrow," she reminded him. He rolled his eyes. "One more day. We got this," she said, chuckling a little as she picked up the playing cards and began to shuffle them. "Another game?"

Dean shook his head. "Nah, I'm poker-ed out."

Alex stopped shuffling for a second. "Okay, who are you and what did you do with Dean?" She joked, receiving a glancing smile from her brother. Honestly, she was tired of poker too. There had been lots of poker, blackjack, and bad daytime TV the past week or so. But there'd been sleep which was nice. She'd been there almost every day and night—bringing in food from fast food places, fussing over him, and just keeping him company. She would leave when visiting hours were over, then sneak back in at night, sleeping in the chair beside him. After his breakdown the first night there, Alex had a deep instinct that he shouldn't be alone; that he needed her there, even if it was just her physical presence. That, and she didn't want to be alone, either. They'd always been close to each other like that their whole life, anyway. Sam too, once.

They hadn't brought up any of it again—not the apocalypse crap, not Alastair, not Castiel, not Dean's feelings. She knew, sooner or later, she'd have to tell him what really happened to Alastair. He wasn't going to like it. As if reading her mind, Dean cleared his throat. "So, heard from Sammy today?"

Alex pursed her lips to the side, her good mood fading. She stuck the shuffled cards back in their box roughly. "Called earlier and said he's on his way back." She felt sour recalling how their brother had left almost a week ago on a whim. Bobby had come to visit Dean, mentioned he was headed to Rapid City next to take care of a ghost, and Sam had all but jumped at the opportunity. In Alex's eyes, leaving when Dean needed him most. She still felt rubbed-wrong by it.

"Why didn't you go with him, again?" Dean asked. "I'm sure they could have used your help. And at least you wouldn't be stuck here."

"Those two didn't need help with one little vengeful spirit," Alex said, trying to sound lighter than she felt. She sounded false even to herself. "And I wasn't going to leave you to be bored all by yourself."

Dean just tilted his head to the side, scrutinizing her. "Okay, Al. What aren't you telling me?"

Dammit. He'd been off the pain killers for a couple days now and was getting his clarity back. She huffed and looked down, found out—she guessed it was time to come clean. She shrugged, reluctant. "Sam got mad at me because I wouldn't go with him. But, I wasn't gonna leave you, Dean. Not now. Not after…" she trailed off, thinking better of actually bringing it up. "And then he and I… we had another fight, he said I was being selfish, that you're my favorite, he couldn't be around me… blah, blah, blah, same old crap."

Dean gave her a disappointed look. "Fighting? Again? Why didn't you tell me that like six days ago when it happened?"

Alex shrugged again, guiltily. "Didn't wanna upset you while you were still recovering."

"Oh come on, I'm fine," he said, glaring at the insinuation that he was too weak to handle some bad news.

"Internal bleeding and severe head trauma aren't fine," Alex retorted, receiving a dirty look. She glanced at him, realizing now was the time. She swallowed apprehensively. "But, since you are mostly recovered… there is something else I need to tell you."

Dean got a suspicious look on his face at the tone of her voice, and Alex let out a big breath, wishing she could save Dean the oncoming confusion and pain. "So, Ruby's knife? It didn't work on Alastair. Didn't affect him at all."

Dean was puzzled, and Alex could see the wheels of his mind turning. He knew Alastair was dead, but they hadn't exactly told him the details. "Then how…" he trailed off, and then his expression went cold in understanding. "No. Not Sam...?" he asked softly.

"Yeah," Alex confirmed, her voice full of the sadness and confusion she felt.

"But—but he could barely exorcise Samhain a couple months ago," Dean protested, still confused.

"I know," Alex said, remembering the scene with distaste. "I don't know how he did it. All I know is I saw him do it. He did it so easily too, Dean. Like it was a walk in the freaking park. Like he's been… practicing, or… I dunno." She threw her hands up slightly in frustration.

"So, there's something he is not telling us," Dean surmised grimly.

"I get the feeling there's a lot of things he's not telling us," Alex replied. There was a sad, heavy silence, and Dean, suddenly looking tired and haggard, rubbed his forehead.

"You shouldn't have let him go by himself up there with Bobby. Dammit, Alex. He could have finished with the job days ago for all we know, and be with Ruby, or... who knows?" His sadness was escalating into anger. "Why didn't you tell me sooner?"

She raised her eyebrows at him. "Look at the heart rate monitor. Your blood pressure just went up like twenty points," she said, being totally reasonable, but still getting a look of annoyance from her brother. "I did call Bobby, after Sam called today. To make sure Sam was telling the truth. To make sure he'd actually been with Bobby the whole time," Alex said, getting Dean's attention. "Bobby confirmed."

Dean looked mildly corrected then shook his head vaguely. "Sad that we're at a place where we have to do that crap," Dean commented emptily, then glanced around the room unhappily. "When we get out of here... I'm halfway tempted to go to Timbuktu. Where Ruby can't get to Sam, where the damn angels can't get us. Surround us with hex bags, good beer, cheap burgers... watch the world go to shit and stop worrying about it being our fault." Alex said nothing, just watched her brother with complete understanding of what he was feeling.

"I'm tired of it," he said, growing quiet. "All of it. I just want..." he trailed off, his expression strange and lost. "I don't know what I want." He looked down into his lap, and Alex could see how burdened he felt. He shook his head. "Just not this."

Three Weeks Later

Alex Remington woke up to her cell phone alarm ringing as it usually did at six o'clock in the morning. She swung her feet over the edge of the bed and pushed off into another day of her life. She spent the first few minutes of her morning meditating and practicing Yoga, as she did every day. After showering and drying her hair, she paged through her closet, picking a pencil skirt, cherry red flats, and gray cardigan over a pressed white blouse. She applied her makeup—foundation, mascara, eye liner, gloss—then combed serum into her hair and straight ironed it, sweeping it into a low pony tail, completing the look with a thin headband. She looked herself over in the mirror—she looked polished and professional, as usual. Still, something looked off and she couldn't figure out what it was. She felt a faint sense of frustration and distaste, but couldn't figure out why. Chalking it up to fatigue, she went to the kitchenette of her apartment and made a cup of tea, had whole grain toast and an organic banana, did a little research for her paper that was due on Thursday, and then it was time to leave for work.

The office was only a few blocks from her apartment, so she walked, keeping a brisk pace in the early morning chill. She looked up at the towering structure of Sandover Bridge and Iron as she arrived. It was hard to believe she worked here now. She'd been hired three weeks ago, and before that had worked at a consulting firm, where work had been.... well, it was a blur now. She could barely remember what she did there, and she frowned. She made a mental note that she needed to start taking a multivitamin. A person her age shouldn't have so many problems with remembering things that happened three weeks ago, and it seemed like she was having problems remembering things a lot lately.

She rode the elevator up with a bunch of other business people, including one guy who was a little taller than her. He was dressed nicely, with short brown hair and handsome features, bright green eyes. For some reason, she instantly decided he was a douche bag. He smiled politely at her, and she returned it, even while mentally, she was telling him to screw off, and that his face was stupid. Men that good looking were always jerks in her experience. She hopped off on her floor—technical support, and entered the reception area. Her domain. She set her things down on her desk and took her seat, switching on her computer and getting her earpiece out of the drawer. Employees were filing in now, dressed in the pale yellow polo uniform shirts. She was glad she got to wear what she wanted—fashion was basically her life.

The computer chimed, finished turning on, and she smiled at the desktop picture of fluffy white kittens playing with each other. She loved cats. She looked at the picture a little longer, her smile fading, a weird sensation in the pit of her stomach. She loved cats... didn't she? Didn't she love cats?

"Good morning, Alex!" Came a familiar voice, and Alex looked up.

"Oh, hi Sam!" Alex greeted, smiling at the latest arrival. Sam Wesson, who had been hired at the same time as her. They'd hit it off in the two day training and had discovered they both loved the Red Hot Chili Peppers, hiking, and karaoke.

"How good was 24 last night?" Sam asked, and Alex's eyes went wide.

"So good, right?! Oh my god." Alex grinned at him. "Jack Bauer is the man."

Sam chuckled, and took one of the M&Ms she kept in a bowl, popped it into his mouth. "See you at lunch?" He asked.

Alex was putting on her earpiece and flashing him a smile. "I'll be there."

With another smile, Sam left, heading back to his cubicle. She watched him go and wondered again why she wasn't attracted to him. He was tall, built, handsome, and really nice. They got along famously, like they'd always known each other. But he just didn't do anything for her. It was more like a friend or a brother vibe. Weirdly enough, she was more interested in Miller, the weird boss, than Sam. Speaking of him, in he walked, dressed in his normal business suit. Over it, he wore a tan trench coat. Come to think of it, she'd never seen him out of it.

"Good morning Mr. Collins!" She greeted him cheerily, and he acknowledged her with a glance. He was an odd guy, really. He always had a look on his face like he was slightly pissed off about something. He arrived to work in the mornings and shut himself in his office all day, only coming out to leave. And he always watched her hawkishly, intently. Sometimes she felt like a tiny mouse under his stare. But she kind of liked that for some reason.

"Good morning, Alex," he replied in his deep voice, looking at her in that peevish way of his, and without further ado, he went into his office. Alex watched until the door was shut, her chin in a hand. So weird. She had no clue why she found him so intriguing. Or so attractive. Maybe because he was so mysterious. He never said more than a few words at a time, and the five o'clock shadow, the scowl, the intense stares, the bright blue eyes, the strangely boyish old man handsomeness... something about him was so—

The phone rang, rattling her out of her daydreams, and she glanced at the time on her computer screen. Eight o'clock already. And so the day began. She picked up the phone and answered in a cheery voice. "Good morning, Sandover Bridge and Iron, how may I assist you today?"

6:00am. Wake up, Yoga, shower, dress, breakfast, walk to work. Arrive, say hi to Sam, say hi to Mr. Collins. Answer phones, redirect calls. Print memos, order supplies, refill printer ink. Clean break room refrigerator. Answer more calls. And before Alex knew it, another day was drawing to a close.

It was time to go, but Alex planned on staying a little late. Mr. Collins came out of his office and stopped at her desk, looking at her through narrowed eyes. "You're still here."
She smiled up at him, hoping maybe he would smile back. "I just need to finish up a couple things... I won't be long."

His expression didn't waver in the slightest. "See you tomorrow."

He turned and left, leaving her slightly disappointed. Sighing, she opened up her purse and took out her jump drive where her paper draft would be. She was taking night classes at one of the local colleges, and this paper was due in a few hours. She didn't have the time to go home and then to campus, and would rather work here than in the creepy college library. She only had about two hours to get it done, so she set to work, hoping she wouldn't get in trouble for using company property for personal use. It was after hours, she figured, so it couldn't hurt. She noticed about twenty minutes later, when the sun set, that behind her, there was faint blue light coming from one cubicle. She wasn't the only one staying late.

She worked for about an hour more, polishing up the paper and hoping she never had to read or analyze Heart of Darkness ever again. It was a heavy read and she couldn't quite honestly see why the professor thought it was so life-changing. But, in her pursuit of a degree in English, she supposed she would have to write a lot of papers on books she didn't get. She paused for a moment, wondering how she had let herself wait until her mid-twenties to go to college. Why hadn't she started at eighteen? She couldn't recall a specific reason.

A strange sound interrupted her thoughts. Behind her, somewhere in the cubicles or maybe the break room, she heard a very strange sound, popping, like a muffled explosion, and then a man's scream. She stood in alarm, her heart beginning to hammer. "Hello?" she called, and no one answered. She entered the quiet darkness of the cubicles, and saw that halfway down the room, the light in the break room was on. She cautiously approached the slab of light on the dark carpeted floor, frowning as she got closer, the smell of something like burned meat hitting her nostrils. "Hello?" she called again, and peeked into the break room... only to see a man, clearly dead, hanging out of the microwave, head-first... blood and chunks of flesh spattered inside the microwave and on parts of the floor and ceiling. Alex tilted her head to the side, grimacing in disgust. "Ugh." Then she frowned at herself, not sure how she could react so casually to such a horrific sight. She needed to call the police—but as she stood there, she felt the temperature of the room drop, and as she breathed out, her breath made a little puff of vapor. And in the shiny glass of the coffeepot, she thought she saw a movement behind her, a hazy reflection of an old man. She whirled, but no one was there.

A little disconcerted, she hugged her arms to herself and looked around, beginning to feel legitimately spooked. "Okay, definitely time to call the cops."

Sam and Alex watched as the coroner team wheeled the body out. People from other floors were gathered in reception, watching in horrified curiosity. Beside Alex, Sam was shaking his head. "He really stuck his head in a microwave?" he was appalled.

"Yes, just like I told you. It was sick," Alex said, then shook her head sadly. "He was two weeks from retiring. I was helping to plan a little office party for him. He was excited about it... I don't get why he did this."

"Yeah it's all... very bizarre." Sam sounded as suspicious as she felt. Something about it wasn't normal, wasn't natural. Sam looked at her, concerned. "Sorry you had to see all of that, Alex."

"Ah. It wasn't so bad," Alex said, drawing a surprised look from her coworker.
"Wasn't so bad?" he repeated.

"Well I mean, it was horrible," she backpedaled, not wanting Sam to think she was a freak. "But I dunno, I'm fine. Not that shaken up." She frowned. "Maybe I should be worried that I feel fine." She thought about telling him about the chill in the room, the reflection she thought she saw, but wasn't sure if that would make her sound crazy or not.

"Hey!" Came a loud voice. It was the assistant floor manager, Dave. "Everyone needs to quit standing around and gawking, and get to your cubicles. Yes, it's sad, but we have work to do, people."

The employees all dissipated, and Alex gave Sam a wan smile. "See you at lunch?" He asked halfheartedly.

"I'll be there," she confirmed, and headed up towards reception. She ran into a rushed looking Ian—he was Sam's desk neighbor and today she almost didn't recognize him. He was actually in company dress policy, clean shaven, and hair neatly combed. Another bizarre thing to add to the growing list. "Morning, Ian," she greeted, looking at him curiously.

"I don't have time to talk, I need to get to work," he said replied, brushing past her and making a beeline for his cubicle. Alex frowned, unable to shake the growing feeling that something was off.

"My pleasure ma'am. Thank you for calling Sandover. Goodbye." Alex disconnected the phone call and yawned restlessly. It was around lunch time and Ian had gone up to HR about an hour ago. When he didn't come back, Sam went to go see what happened. She was feeling the mid day lull coming on, and was already thinking about how much she couldn't wait to get home and watch the Oprah show that would be waiting on her DVR. Just then, Sam came back in. From his expression, Alex could tell something was wrong, and stood up. "What happened? Where's Ian?"

Sam's face was blank. "Ian stabbed himself in the neck with a pencil in the HR bathroom."

Alex blinked. "What?"

"Yeah."

"What the hell?" Alex asked, then covered her mouth with her hand in embarrassment. "Sorry. I don't usually swear."

"I don't know," Sam said, ignoring her apology. "He was acting all weird this morning, like all... anal-retentive and worried about work. That's not like him."

"Yeah, he seemed off this morning." Alex dropped her voice, leaned in. "Do you think... something is going on? I mean, two extremely weird suicides in two days?"

"I'm not sure," Sam said, but from his troubled, thoughtful expression, she thought that was exactly what he was thinking.

Wake up, meditate, shower, dress, breakfast, walk to work. Arrive, say hi to Sam, say hi to Mr. Collins.

Alex found herself staring blankly at her computer for most of the day, taking calls and doing her tasks in a disconnected kind of way. She felt strange, and couldn't pinpoint why. Inside, she was beginning to fear that maybe she was going crazy, that she was seeing things or imagining things.
And last night, she had dreamed about a vintage black car, a man in a puffy vest and flannel calling her an 'idgit', and flickering neon motel signs. She wasn't sure why the dream had stuck with her, but it was eating away at her. In an attempt to distract herself, she smoothed her flowy blouse, readjusting the line where she had tucked it into the waist of her skirt. She stared down at her feet, which were shoved into black heels, and then looked at her manicured fingernails. Somehow, the sight of both seemed wrong. Maybe it was time to change her style.

"Alex!" Sam had appeared out of nowhere, and was intently leaning over her desk. "I just got a call from Dean Smith."

"Who's that?" Alex asked, frowning at his sudden arrival and urgent tone.

"A big time guy who works upstairs in HR. He wants to see us."

Surprised, Alex stood up. "Are we in trouble? Why both of us?" Alex asked, not understanding.

Sam lowered his voice, becoming furtive. "I think it has something to do with... with the deaths. He told me to 'bring the girl who saw the other guy's corpse.'"

At that, Alex felt a twinge of intrigue, and her sense of adventure sparking alive inside her. She felt herself smiling. "Okay. Well, what are we waiting for?"

In hushed excitement, the two of them ducked out of the office and onto the elevator up to the seventh floor, where they found Dean Smith's office. After Sam knocked and Dean called them in, Sam led the way into a spacious modern office. With a gray color palette and black and white photographs of famous cityscapes lining the wall, the office reeked of position and upper management. Standing behind the desk was the guy from the elevator—the yuppie douche bag guy. Alex felt a little disappointment.

"Come on in," he said, both hands on the back of his chair. "Shut the door." Dean paused a beat, and looked at Sam through narrowed eyes after they'd done what he said. "So wanna tell me who the hell you are?"

Sam looked a little surprised by the direct question, and Alex answered with uncharacteristic boldness when he said nothing. "This is Sam Wesson. I'm Alex Remington. And... you called us here. Shouldn't you know who we are?" She fixed him with an expectant look.

"I've seen you in the elevator before," Dean said flippantly, looking at her for the first time. "So you're the one who saw... the body?"

"Yup. And you're the one who saw... Ian die."

"Yup," he confirmed uncomfortably, and then cleared his throat. "Among other things. I, uh... so you two started working here three weeks ago, huh?"

Sam and Alex both nodded, not sure where their superior was going with this. "Yeah, me too," he said, walking over to one of his shelves. He grabbed a water bottle full of a dirty-looking liquid and unscrewed the cap. "It's, uh, the Master Cleanse. You tried it? Phenomenal. Detoxes you like nobody's business."

He took a swig and Alex scoffed. "It looks disgusting."

"Oh, it is," he said, grinning.

Sam, however, wasn't interested in their trivialities. He had fixed this Dean guy with an intent gaze, and stepped a little closer. "When you were in that bathroom with Ian... did you see something?"

Dean looked caught, his expression chilling in fear, then softening as he tried to laugh it off. "I don't know. I don't know what I saw. I was tripping."

Sam's frown deepened. "What did you see? You saw something... I can tell."

Dean looked uncomfortable and hesitant, and Alex's mouth hung open slightly. Somehow, she knew what he had seen. "You saw a ghost didn't you?"

At her direct question, Dean's expression showed stunned confirmation. Alex was nodding, suddenly excited, looking between Sam and Dean both, glad she could finally tell someone about what she saw. "I think I saw one too. When I found Paul—" her excitement faded, as she remembered the sad reality of Paul's demise. "When I found Paul, may he, uh, rest in peace—the room got cold, like, freezing cold. And I saw this blurry reflection in the coffee pot..." she had both of the guys' rapt attention. "I turned around... and no one was there." She waited to see if they would think she was crazy. "It was a ghost, wasn't it?" she asked, looking at Sam, and then Dean, hoping.

"Was it... an old white guy? Gray hair, wrinkly face?" Dean asked slowly, sounding like he was both dreading and eagerly awaiting her answer.

"Yeah!" Alex breathed, in disbelief that she wasn't crazy, and someone else had seen the same image.

"Guys—what if these suicides aren't actually suicides?" Sam asked breathlessly, emphatically. "I mean, what if they're something... not natural?"

"Something... paranormal? Like... ghost murders?" Alex asked, her voice lowering to a whisper at the last two words.

Dean was scoffing, trying to be reasonable. "Come on guys... that sounds kind of crazy... I mean, first thing first: ghosts are real? And not only that, but they're responsible for all the dead bodies around here?"

He sat down at his desk, and Sam and Alex grabbed seats across from him. "I know it sounds crazy," Sam said earnestly. "But guys... that has to be it!"

"What makes you so sure?" Dean asked, obviously not as on board with the idea as Sam was.

Sam took a minute, looking for an answer. "Instinct," he finally replied, and Alex felt a chill run up her spine. That was exactly what she had been thinking, too. She looked at Sam in amazement, and he looked back at her. It was like they were thinking the same thought.

Dean had a look on his face like reluctant agreement. "Yeah. I've, uh, got the same instinct."

"You do too, don't you Alex?" Sam asked, even though he sounded like he already knew her answer was yes.

"Yeah, I mean, it's crazy... but I don't see what else it could be," Alex said, meaning every word.

There was a short, pensive silence. "Dean, you know those dreams I was telling you about?" Sam asked. "I was dreaming about ghosts."

"Wait, what dreams?" Alex asked, puzzled, thinking of her strange dream last night.
"I dreamed that I fought ghosts, like, that it was my entire life," Sam explained.

"And that I was helping him do it," Dean added, sounding a little unenthused.

Sam got a little quiet, hesitant. "You weren't the only one, Dean… Alex, you were in the dreams too," Alex and Dean exchanged glances as Sam continued. "And then it turns out that there's a real ghost, and the three of us here, now..." he trailed off. "Coincidence?"

"So, what, your dreams are visions?" Dean asked, a little sarcastically. "You some kind of psychic?"

"No!" Sam exclaimed quickly. "I mean, that would be nuts."

"Why would that be nuts?" Alex cut in, amused. "Did you guys forget the subject matter? Ghost murders?"

Dean chuckled a little, as Sam continued. "I'm just saying something weird is definitely going on around here, right? So I've been digging around a little." Sam pulled some papers out of his bag, and handed half of them over to Dean, half to Alex.

"I think I found a connection between the two guys."

"You broke into their email accounts?" Dean asked, frowning, but before Sam could backpedal, Alex grinned at him over the printouts.

"Sam... that is so against company protocol… but… oh my God… so very cool!" She was almost starstruck.

Sam looked at Dean nervously, but Dean was busy trying to hide an impressed smile. He shrugged. "It is pretty badass, if I say so myself."

"Uh, thanks," Sam said meekly, and cleared his throat. "Yeah. Okay. So it turns out Ian and Paul both got this same email telling them to report to HR, room fourteen forty-four."

"But HR's here on seven," Alex said, and they all shared a significant glance. "This email has something to do with the murders," Alex surmised, getting more excited by the second. "Guys. We have got to check this out."

"Like right now?" Sam asked hesitantly.

"No. No, it's getting late," Dean said, although he didn't sound convinced.

Alex looked between the two of them. "Guys."

"I'm dying to check this out right now," Sam said, and Dean's expression showed that he was too.

"Right?" Dean asked, already getting to his feet.

The three of them hopped on the elevator up to the fourteenth floor, and searched down the room in question. "Fourteen thirty-eight, we're getting close," Sam said as they rounded a corner. And suddenly, they heard a man scream. Breaking into a run, they found the door to fourteen forty-four was locked. Sam wiggled the door handle, then without a word, drew back and kicked the door in, leaving Dean and Alex to stare in momentary awe, saying "whoa!" at the same time. Sam led the way, and they ran into the dark room, which looked like a computer storage unit. All the screens were on, gray static playing. The room was ice cold.
"Look!" Alex said, pointing to a man laying on the floor with a heavy shelf on top of him. Dean and Sam rushed to him and began to lift the shelf off. And then, flickering into existence behind Dean, the ghost appeared—the old man from the reflection. "Dean! Look out!" Alex shouted, her eyes wide as she saw the old man fling Dean against a wall and shove Sam over. She felt herself fly backwards without even being touched, and she collided with a pile of old computers. She rolled over easily as if by instinct, crouched on the ground, and stared as the old man reached for the tech support employee, his hand sparking with blue lightning.

She sprang up, rushing across the distance that separated her from the man who was about to be zapped, and with a strength she didn't know she had, she lifted the heavy metal shelf off the man—but not fast enough. The ghost's finger was a fraction of an inch from the man, who was screaming in horror. And then, just in the nick of time, Dean swung a wrench at the old man, who dissipated like a cloud of smoke. All the screens switched off, and the room went silent. The three of them stared at each other, agape. "How the hell did you lift that?" Dean asked Alex, incredulous.

"I guess I'm stronger than I thought?" Alex said, not entirely sure herself. "But never mind that, how did you know how to do that wrench thing?"

Dean shook his head, as puzzled as they were. "I have no idea."

About twenty minutes later, the three of them, were settling into Dean's apartment, still reeling from their ghost encounter. "Holy crap, dude," Dean said, pacing back and forth and guzzling his master cleanse liquid.

"Yeah. I could use a beer," Sam said, letting out a heavy breath.

"Oh, sorry, man. I'm on the Cleanse," Dean said, heading for his refrigerator. "I got rid of all the carbs in the house."

"You suck," Alex said, wishing she could get her hands on a Killian's Red or a Newcastle.

"So, how the hell did you know that ghosts are scared of wrenches?" Sam asked as Dean grabbed water bottles out of his refrigerator.

"Crazy, right?" Dean asked, handing a water bottle to Alex, and then Sam. "And nice job kicking that door too. That was very Jet Li. What are you, like a black belt or something?" He looked at Alex, his eyebrows raised."And you, Hulk Hogan. That shelf had to weigh more than a hundred pounds."

"Yeah, I had no idea my own strength," Alex said honestly, and flexed her arm muscle curiously, poking the defined bicep with her pointer finger, in a shocked kind of awe. "Whoa. They are kinda big. I've never noticed before. Do I work out? I don't think I work out…" she trailed off, frowning. Sam was in deep thought. "It's like...we've done this before."

"What do you mean, before?" Dean questioned.

"Like in a previous life?" Alex asked skeptically. "I don't know how I feel about reincarnation..."

"No," Sam said, shaking his head. "I—I just can't shake this feeling like I—like I don't belong here. You know? Like I should do something more than sit in a cubicle."

Dean chuckled. "I think most people who work in a cubicle feel that same way."
Alex, however, looked at Sam. "I think I know what you mean. I wake up in the morning and just... something's off. But I'm not sure. I feel really foggy sometimes, like I don't even like what I think I like." It sounded insanely stupid when she said it out loud, and she shrugged. "Not sure how to explain it, really."

"I know, right?" Sam seemed to agree with her. "I mean, I don't like my job. I don't like this town. I don't like my clothes. I don't like my own last name." Alex was nodding, hanging onto every word, feeling like he was talking for her. "I don't know how else to explain it, except that... it feels like I should be doing something else. There's just something in my blood. Like I was destined for something different. What about you? You ever feel that way?"

"You're starting to sound kind of Star Wars, there, Yoda," Alex joked. He'd lost her at the destiny stuff.

"I don't believe in destiny," Dean said, earning a look of respect from Alex. "I do believe in dealing with what's right in front of us, though."

"All right, so, what do we do now?" Sam asked.

Dean grinned. "We do what I do best, Sammy. Research."

"Okay. ...wait." Sam looked at Dean oddly. "Did you just call me Sammy?"

"Uh, did I?" Dean asked.

"I think you did. Yeah. Don't."

"Sorry," Dean said.

Alex chuckled. "Get a room, guys."

"Shut up," the two men said in unison.

"Here's the beers, Sam," Alex said, plopping down a six pack of Newcastle on the table. Both Dean and Sam had a laptop in front of them.

Sam cracked open a beer. "You're the best, Alex. Thanks for getting these."

She sat down between them, grabbing herself a beer. "What've you guys found?"

Dean was eyeing the beer a little wistfully from the corner of his eye. "Sure you don't want one?" Alex asked as she opened hers.

"I'm on the cleanse," he replied dutifully, tearing his eyes away from the bottle in her hand. "Anyway, I just found the best site ever. Real, actual ghost hunters."

Sam and Alex leaned their heads over, peering at Dean's screen. "These guys are genius," Dean said, a certain note of admiring in his voice. "Check it out."

An instructional video began playing, two guys who called themselves Ghostfacers. They watched the video, hovering close to the screen in rapt attention. When it was over, they sat back in unison, silently absorbing everything they had just heard. "Okay," Sam said slowly, "so we just need to research this ghost, figure out who he is, and then find his remains... or the haunted item."

"Sounds good," Dean said. Alex, however, was just sitting there, a huge grin on her face.
"Those guys were so cool," she breathed, glancing at Sam, then Dean. "This makes me wish I could be a ghost hunter. Wow."

"You seem easily impressed, kid," Dean said, giving her a superior smile like she were dumb.

She ignored the comment and just looked at him sidelong. "Have a beer already, will you?"

His jaw clenched. "The cleanse," he said, this time sounding blatantly depressed.

She smiled to herself and took a long swig of hers so he could watch jealously.

Wake up, meditate, shower, dress, breakfast, walk to work... Alex arrived at work like normal, wearing a shorter floral dress (Friday, casual day), cardigan, and heels. Behind her, she heard the low hum of the office—people taking calls on the phone, the printers going. But she was remembering last night, when she, Dean, and Sam had killed a ghost. It had been the most thrilling and life-altering thing she had ever done—after researching the Sandover building and its history, they had recognized the face of their ghost, and learned that there was an item of his still in the building—a single glove. Together, they had fought off the ghost, found and burned the glove. All with just fractions of seconds to spare. After they came within an inch of their lives, they had gone back to Dean's office, where Sam had proposed they quit their jobs and go hunt down ghosts. Alex had thought it was an exciting prospect, and even let herself dream about actually doing it for all of thirty seconds, until Dean had shot the idea down.

Alex was so lost in her thoughts there at her desk that she didn't even notice when Mr. Collins came in. If she had looked up, she might have seen his eyes traverse her bare legs, she might have seen him swallow strangely, she might have seen him go into his office faster than he usually did. But she was staring at her screen blankly, unsure. Just, unsure.

Sam had been disappointed after Dean had said no, and then he left without talking to Alex about it. She honestly would have dropped everything in that moment and left with him right then. Something about what happened last night felt right. But this morning, Sam had come in, with a face of stone, and he didn't even say hello. Alex sighed restlessly, staring at the kitten wallpaper of her computer. She could hear some kind of commotion going on in the cubicles behind her, but was unable to care or look away from the kittens... their soft white fluffy fur, their wide blue eyes, their wispy whiskers... she felt a growing sense of hatred the longer she stared at it, and suddenly a burst of pure, undiluted rage. "I hate cats!" She shouted, and taking hold of the computer with both hands, she stood up and ripped it from its chords, and threw it across the room, where it smashed against the wall. She stared at it, blinking in surprise, then realized someone was standing just off to her side.

Sam stood there, staring at her, a fire poker in his hand. He seemed a little out of breath. "I... just killed my phone," he explained, which explained nothing, but she nodded, feeling like she understood him perfectly.

"I hate cats. Like, literally despise them," she replied, and he, also, nodded, seeming to understand her somehow, too. She rounded her desk, coming to him and speaking in hushed, urgent tones. "Let's go. You and me. We'll go on the road, like you said. We can ask Dean again, but even if he doesn't want to... we can. We're supposed to. You know?"

"Yeah," Sam said, nodding and looking happier than she remembered him ever looking.

As if on cue, the door to the right of Alex's desk opened. Miller Collins peered out at then sullenly, then glanced at the smashed computer to his left. He then stepped aside, holding the door open
They shared a glance and obliged quietly, their momentary high fading into quiet dread.

"Look, sorry about the phone—" Sam started, but stopped talking when he saw Mr. Collins reaching out to touch him on the forehead. Alex watched, mystified, and then Mr. Collins touched her, too. And suddenly, she remembered everything—she was Alex Winchester, that was Sam, her brother, and... her jaw dropped and she looked down at herself then at Mr. Collins... a.k.a. Castiel.

"What the hell, Cas?" She asked, mouth agape.

"Explain. Now," Sam said angrily.

"Is this real?" Alex asked, looking around and down at herself again. She looked at Cas, barely able to process her thoughts.

He looked stoic, as usual. "Yes, this is real," he replied apathetically. "This was Zachariah's idea. It was to prove to the three of you that the life you live; hunting, is what you're meant to do. It's your destiny."

"Is this some kind of sick joke?" Sam asked, aghast. "You take three weeks of our lives for your own angel comedy hour?"

"And who the hell is Zachariah? Another one of your angel pals?" Alex felt herself shaking in outrage. In the tiny dress, with her legs bare, she felt naked and violated somehow. "You took all of our memories? You... turned me into... this?" A cat-loving, skirt-wearing freak?!

"It was not my idea," Castiel said simply, as if that would fix everything.

"No, you just played along, watched me live a life I don't belong in... sit here, answer phones, worry about my college career, and stare at my kitten screensaver...?" She was getting loud now. "I don't even like cats, Cas!"

"Yes, I heard you. You shouted it quite loudly," he said, looking at her sideways, looking mildly annoyed. "The point of all this is that you—the Winchester family—are supposed to hunt. It's in your very blood. But more than that, you're supposed to stick together." His eyebrows knit together as if in earnestness. "The past three weeks, the two of you have been closer than you have in the entire past year."

He had a point, but it wasn't one the twins were happy about. Sam and Alex glanced at each other. Unlike a few moments ago, when they had been Sam Wesson and Alex Remington, the glance was now tinged with bitterness. "Maybe that was because I couldn't remember anything about what he's done to screw up the family," Alex said.

Sam scoffed and chuckled humorlessly. "You sure do know how to hold a grudge, don't you Alex."

"It's not a grudge, it's me remembering the facts," she replied in a short tone of voice.

There was a silence, and Castiel looked down, seeming to be disappointed.

"Yeah. Well, Cas, you got us," Sam said brusquely. "Good job." Heated, he took a few steps back, running a hand through his hair, trying to calm down.

Alex just stared at Castiel with a frown. "I don't get it. What gives you angels the right to think you can screw with our heads like that. Huh?"
"Alex—" Castiel started, only to be cut off.

"No. You did something that violated us. Nothing you say can justify it, so don't even try." She crossed her arms angrily, beyond incredulous at the entire thing. "I'm so tired of your weird tests and stupid righteous attitude and how you come in and think you can just do whatever you want with my family!"

Castiel seemed to be trying to remain reasonable. "It's regrettable that you feel violated…"

"Yeah, regrettable!" Alex interrupted again, her voice dripping with sarcasm. "Thanks, Cas. This is my life, and I don't appreciate—"

"The life that I gave you!" Castiel thundered, and the room seemed to darken, his deep voice seemed to carry a power that it hadn't before. A little intimidated, Alex had taken a step back, in shock. Behind her, Sam was staring, slack jawed, at Cas.

The angel's expression was fiery—jaw clenched, brow furrowed, breathing harder than normal. He was angry, and it was all directed at Alex. "You know that before I touched the hand of healing upon you, your life was not what it is today. You were set free of the prison of your mind. By me." He had approached her, and was staring her down unflinchingly. The edge of his trench coat brushed against her bare knee. "But you've never once stopped to realize what I did for you. Have you truly never wondered why, after a lifetime of being mute, how you could suddenly speak? And not only speak, but speak perfectly, as if you had been speaking for your entire life? I didn't simply give you the ability to speak, I made you whole. It wasn't easy, Alex Winchester." His bright blue eyes seemed to hold some unspoken pain or secret. "It cost me more than you know." His voice softened, his anger faded, and he looked away. His next words were utterly convicting. "You make me regret the kindness I've shown you."

Alex stared at him, stunned and speechless, feeling very, very small and yes... ashamed.

Without warning, she and Sam were no longer at Sandover, but in a very dim motel room. Castiel was gone.

The twins were silent for a short moment as their eyes adjusted to the darkness. "We were staying here right after Dean got out of the hospital," Sam said, and Alex realized he was right—she saw their bags piled in the corner, just as they'd left them.

Exhausted in a way that wasn't physical, Alex sat on a bed, burying her face in her hands. She felt overwhelmed, tricked, but mostly humiliated, almost to the point of tears. You make me regret the kindness I've shown you. She heard Sam sit opposite of her, but she didn't look up. Just kept covering her burning face.

Suddenly, there was a sound to their right. "Whoa. Honey, I'm home." It was Dean, in a business suit, his hair slicked down. "Well would you look at us. It's like Halloween," he commented wryly, looking at his siblings who were still in their weird Sandover outfits.

"Dean!" Sam said in relief, standing. "So I'm guessing you met Zachariah."

Dean's brow furrowed slightly. "How'd you know?"

"Cas told us," Sam said, glancing at Alex, who still sat on the bed. She had her hand down over her mouth, was slouching with an elbow on her knee. "He was... our floor manager."

"Of course he was," Dean said. "Well, I, for one, am starting to get real tired of these angels yanking our chains around." He looked at Alex, who still wore the dress and heels. "You look "Yeah well at least I didn't just do the Master Cleanse," she muttered, which Dean made a face at.

"Well what did Zachariah say to you?" Sam asked, not interested in small talk. "Hopefully more than Cas did, because he barely explained anything. He just chewed Alex out."

"Yeah?" Dean asked, looking mildly interested.

"Did you really have to bring that up?" Alex asked Sam, giving him a somber look. He shrugged.

"Listen, before we get all heart to heart, I need food," Dean said. "Real food. And a beer. Lots and lots of beer. Bring on the carbs."

"Yeah. Okay," Sam agreed. They went and grabbed dinner at a local diner, dressed the way they were. Alex listened as her brothers did most of the talking, her mind far away. She faded in and out of paying attention.

"I mean, I was drinking rice milk," Dean said. "Rice milk. I had a gym membership, and ate salad."

He said salad like it was a dirty word.

"I went home every night and played XBOX. Like all night." Sam admitted sheepishly.

"The highlight of my day was Oprah," Alex said glumly.

"Wait, you don't really like Oprah?" Dean asked, grinning and plunking a fry into ketchup. "So, you ever gonna tell me what Cas had to say to you?" Dean asked as he chomped the fried potato.

Alex stared at her plate, her eyes seeing nothing, her mind going to a strange place. "Eh. Just bitching about random stuff, nothing major."

Dean clearly knew she was avoiding telling him everything but it didn't seem to matter as he munched on fries. Alex slunk down further into her seat, Cas's words still on the forefront of her mind. She felt bad. She felt like the world's biggest bitch. She was really starting to get the feeling that she'd misjudged Castiel completely. He clearly wasn't perfect but... he kept saying he chose to give her the ability to speak at a great cost to himself. She kept thinking on that for the rest of the day, wondering who he was. Who he really was. This being she kept getting glimpses of beyond his duties and loyalties.

Alex sat outside the motel on the edge of the sidewalk underneath a clear midnight sky. It was cold and she was listlessly watching highway traffic pass by, thinking. She was once again looking like herself—in her favorite pair of jeans, her well-loved boots, a tank top, and a warm cargo jacket. She'd showered off the makeup and hair products and was no longer a caricature of herself.

She thought back to the past three weeks, where she had been free of all the pains of the past. Instead of torturing herself over her brothers, the apocalypse, the endless list of hardships in her life, she had been content to fix her hair every day, watch mindless TV every night, and her biggest concern had been what outfit she would wear for work the next day. So now, she could say she knew what a 'normal life' was like—and it was pretty horrible overall. And lonely. Isolated.

She still didn't like the fact that the angels had duped them like that—stolen their memories, transplanted their lives—but she was admitting to herself that treating Cas the way she had probably hadn't been right. It hadn't been his idea, after all. He'd just been following orders. Ridiculous, stupid orders, but still. She thought of her attraction to him when she thought he was a man named Miller Collins, and felt intense embarrassment. The angels must have implanted that into her mind along with the other things, as some kind of joke, or test. Right? Well. She did think Cas was handsome, didn't she? Ugh.

All Alex knew is that when he stood up to her like that, told her off about her behavior... at first she'd been humiliated and pissed. Now, she realized she had to respect him for having the courage to tell her what he felt and thought. She thought of his face when he said he regretted the kindness he'd shown her. Inside, her heart broke a little, and she thought of how ungrateful and undeserving she was, how much she regretted her words and actions, how disappointed she was in her lack of self control. If Cas could have seen, before he healed her, how she would treat him, he probably never would have bothered at all. She owed him the apology of the century and felt so bad.

She drew in a deep breath and let it out, getting a little nervous about what she was about to do. This felt absolutely ridiculous and even if he did show, he'd probably just bitch at her some more, which she deserved but... eesh. He'd given her a new chance at life, like he said. And she had to do this. Gathering her courage, Alex screwed her eyes shut, and in a voice just above a whisper, she spoke. "Um. Castiel? Are you there?"

She opened her eyes, and flinched slightly. "Hello, Alex," he said, standing just in front of her. She stared up at him with a shocked expression, almost too caught off guard to speak. "Wow... just like that," she breathed out. "You come when I call?"

"Of course. I am your guardian angel," he replied, almost sounding like he was surprised she would ask that. He didn't look angry or disappointed as he had the last time she saw him.

Her brow furrowed in confusion. "You are?" she asked. Last time she'd heard, Uriel said those orders or whatever were no longer valid.

Cas looked down slightly. "Yes. I discovered that Uriel was lying about that."

"Oh." Alex nodded as she took that into her understanding. She'd suspected as much. She gave a tight smile and somewhat awkwardly patted the spot beside her, indicating that he should sit—no sense in standing there where she had to crane her head up to look at him. He didn't seem to understand for a couple seconds, then he joined her, sitting close enough that their elbows brushed against each other's. Since the curb was so low to the ground, his knees were level with his chest, but he didn't seem to have the poise Alex had (her arms were leaned onto her knees). He just sat there, arms at his sides, knees in his face, looking ridiculous. She couldn't hide the amused little smile that sprang to her face. She tried to fight it, tried to look serious, but it didn't work.

"I'm sorry, I can't... you need to put your arms on your knees... that just looks... wrong," she said through a mouth that was trying to smile. He frowned, not understanding. Uncertainly, he looked at her for reference but got it all wrong, placed a hand on each knee, his arms straight against his legs, increasing his awkward ridiculousness by about a hundred percent. Chuckling out loud now, Alex shook her head. "No, no, that's worse," she said, grinning, and grabbed his forearm, showed him what she meant, guiding him to a more casual, relaxed stance. He looked at her hand on his arm, then at her, his expression unreadable. Alex's smile faded, and she let go, remembering why she had called him. She wet her lips and mustered her courage, bracing herself.

"I, uh, needed to tell you something," she began, not entirely sure how she was going to work it all. She struggled for the words, her pride taking a hit as she forced herself to begin talking. Her skin burned a little from embarrassment. "I'm..." she forced the next word out, "sorry, Cas." He looked back at her, his expression stern as usual. "I've been... a total bitch to you," she mumbled, then quickly added on, "I mean, some times you did deserve it." She cleared her throat. "Uh, but... I told you that I hated you or whatever. You should die or something." Her ears were burning. "I was pissed, and the words just... like, came out. I was trying to hurt you. Because, um, you hurt me."

_Ugh, Doctor Phil, eat your heart out._ Alex wanted to die, talking about this Hallmark crap. But Castiel just listened. Didn't rub it in or make her feel worse.

Alex found the ability to continue as he waited, listening. She swallowed and sighed, shutting her eyes. "After all you've done for me... you didn't deserve the things I said." She opened her eyes again and forced herself to look him in the eye, which was hard. "What you did for me... you're right. You gave me so much." Her skin was on fire with uncomfortable feelings. Honestly, she could have thanked him for an eternity for what he had done and given her, but underneath his intense gaze and imposing presence, Alex was done, embarrassed completely. "I hate apologies, Cas. But, I hope you know I mean it. I'm sorry, okay?" She sighed heavily and shrugged, looked down between her knees, feeling supremely awkward. "Well—that's all I got." She threw her hands up a little, then let them go. Somehow, what she'd imagined as a grand and beautiful apology felt small and awkward and sappy.

Cas looked at her a moment longer, and his expression was surprisingly un-pinched. It made him look years younger and more open. "Yes. I do know that you are sincere," he said, making her stomach flip. "And I accept your apology." Just like that? Alex was floored by his ready forgiveness. Castiel looked out ahead of them, his expression growing softer. "I have thought about how difficult it would be to suddenly have memories back you didn't remember. You were disconcerted. And felt what was yours was taken away. In truth, it was. I've thought about many things you've told me I was wrong for doing." He drew in a deep breath through his nose, expelled it the same. "I appreciate your perspective, even if I don't always understand it."

Again, her stomach flip-flopped and Alex glanced his way sidelong, surprised at him. He always caught her off guard in the most unexpected of ways. Who _was_ this angel? Was he this softer, thoughtful, curious creature she saw glimpses of one-on-one? Or was he the fierce, staunch soldier of Heaven? She didn't know, but he intrigued her more and more. They sat in silence a moment longer, Alex trying to summon the courage to say what she did next. "You could've done nothing," Alex said, watching his expression. "I would've never known the difference.

He almost smiled when she said that—his lips turned up and his eyes crinkled slightly at the edges as he watched the traffic passing by. It was a bittersweet appearing expression. He turned his head toward her, his eyes meeting hers with a soulful intensity. "I was not willing to do nothing."

"Of course," he replied and Alex stood up. He followed suit. His voice stopped her a couple steps toward the door. "Goodnight, Alex."

She turned to look at him over her shoulder.

He had put his hands into his pockets—and that caught her attention. Standing there in the parking lot with neon signs behind him and light illuminating the side of his face, Alex felt like she was seeing him for the first time. He seemed very interesting to her in that moment, she wondered about him and why he looked at her like that. A little stricken by her thoughts, she felt a certain, mostly unfamiliar shy feeling overcome her.
She tucked her hair behind her ear, avoiding solidly meeting his eyes. She gave him a small, tight smile all the same. "'Night, Cas."

Alex Winchester turned and went into the motel as her guardian angel stayed and watched until she was safely inside.

Chapter End Notes

Inside joke: They all had the last name of gun brands. Smith & Wesson and Remington.
Metafiction

"Fate is knocking at the door, but I don't live there anymore."
- Sonic Syndicate

Four Days Later

Alex rolled over on the motel bed, flipping onto her stomach, thoroughly engrossed in the book she was reading—after all, reading about your own life through someone else's eyes was fascinating, if not a little awkward and horrifying, too. That morning the Winchesters had been blindsided by a strange discovery… a series of books, starring them.

On the other end of the room Dean and Sam were both on their laptops glued to their screens, the books in question littering the table around them. The books included specific and perfect detail all the things they had done for the past three or so years. Although they were dead set on finding out who this author Carver Edlund was and how he or she knew everything about the Winchesters' private lives, they'd gotten temporarily distracted after Sam had stumbled onto the Supernatural fandom online.

Dean was chuckling. "Whoa, check it out… these fans are not playing around. There are 'Sam girls' and 'Dean girls.'"

"Are you serious?" Alex looked up from the pages of Wendigo. She let loose an unladylike snorting "Ha!"

Dean looked at her over his shoulder. "Why's that funny?" he demanded.

"'Cuz what those fans don't know is that both of you suck," she replied, already looking back at the pages of her book. "I'm an Alex girl, personally," she quipped.

Dean rolled his eyes and turned back to his computer screen. "Hey, what's a 'slash fan'?” he asked.

Sam looked hesitant to answer, and Alex looked up in mild curiosity. "As in... Sam-slash-Dean," Sam said. "Together."

There was a short silence, where Dean and Alex were trying to figure out exactly what was being implied. "Like, together together?" Dean asked, his voice full of the beginnings of incredulous disbelief.

"Yeah," Sam confirmed, drawing disgusted expressions from both of his siblings.

"Bleurgh." Alex's face was twisted in repulsion.

"They do know we're brothers, right?” Dean asked, sounding hopeful that there had been some kind of misunderstanding.

However, Sam shrugged, his expression pretty disgusted. "Doesn't seem to matter. And there's also some… um… of all three of us. Together. And, there's also, uh... 'Twincest?'" He looked at Alex and and pulled a face.

Alex sat up, throwing the book down, her face stricken with shock. "Gross! What is wrong with these people? I'd rather rip out my own lungs!"
Sam's chuckled. "Well, looks like some people wish you would… I just found a post called 'Alex: Love her or hate her?' on one of the fan sites. Some fan named River Winters posted this on it: 'Hate her! The series is perfect except for the awkward addition of Alex, who I think undermines the entire story. Instead of being about men and brothers in arms, it's about these two brothers and their mostly useless, third-wheel sister—she's stubborn and hard headed and too talkative once she gets her voice back in the last few books. She's always crying and bitching. Alex Winchester ruins the entire series for me.'"

Alex made a face and shrugged defensively. "Geez, sorry for existing?"

"No, this one's better," Dean said, reading from his screen. He clearly thought the whole thing was funny. "LisaMack wrote 'Alex Winchester is a totally unbelievable and flat character, and her mysterious, unexplained recovery from the lifelong condition of mutism is just too far fetched for me. Wish she wasn't in the books; I also don't like how she gets so much time with my boys.'" Dean paused. "Her boys?" He scoffed. "What, we're personal property now?"

"I'm not believable?" Alex asked, frowning at the ridiculousness of it all. "LisaMack isn't believable." Both of her brothers tried to hide their chuckles at her indignant comment. "It's not funny! I mean, don't these people have anything better to do with their time than complain about me?"

"Haters gonna hate," Dean said with a good natured shrug. "There's nice ones too about you but why would I read you those? Hey!" He ducked a spare sock she threw at him and chuckled when she missed. He returned to reading out loud from his screen. "Hey guys, please read my brofic, in which Sam and Dean hunt on their own. No Alex in this alternate universe. Please don't hate, I know brofic isn't everyone's cup of tea."

Alex guffawed. "Like you two's life without me in it would be interesting at all," she joked.

Dean closed his laptop with a face. "Dude, this crap is just weird. Funny... but weird."

"Yeah," Sam agreed, closing his laptop too and leaning his elbows onto the table. "It's amusing, if not a little… uh, creepy, to say the least, but we really need to find out who wrote the series."

"Okay, so where do we start?" Alex asked, sliding off the bed and crossing the room to her brothers. "The name Carver Edlund turned up nothing on the databases or address searches."

"We go to the publisher," Sam said. "Carver Edlund is probably a pen name."

Dean was already standing up. "Well, what are we waiting for? Daylight's wasting."

"Dean, we just got here," Sam pointed out, sounding reluctant and weary. Alex couldn't say she was crazy about getting back into the Impala for another however-many hour drive either.

But Dean was grabbing his jacket. "And we're just leaving," he replied, his mind already made up.

The twins exchanged a mutually sympathetic glance, and with no choice, grudgingly got up and followed their brother. Yet again and as always, the Winchesters were on the move.

"Thanks for all your help!" Sam called as he sat back into the passenger side of the Impala. The publisher, Sera, waved from the front porch of her house, her expression a little starstruck.

"Did you guys really have to show her your tattoos? I think you turned her brain to complete mush," Alex said, still laughing at how the publisher had basically lost her crap when Sam and Dean showed her their anti-possession tattoos and subsequently shown off their bare chests.

"Hey, it worked, didn't it?" Dean asked, but by the grin she could hear in his voice, she knew he thought it was funny too. "We got Carver Edlund's real name and address. All thanks to these handsome faces, bulging muscles, and irresistible sex appeal."

Dean and Sam chuckled, and Alex leaned forward between their seats, grinning. "And long, flowing locks," she said, waving the title book, Supernatural at them—on which a shirtless Sam (who looked more like Fabio) had sandy hair to his shoulders blowing away from his face. The rest of the cover wasn't much better—Dean was in a sleeveless cutoff shirt and looked like a knock-off of a Street Fighter character—Alex was in the background, leaning seductively against the car, in a tiny strapless shirt that clung to her ridiculously disproportionate body (no one's waist was that tiny). And her hair was platinum blonde.

"Did the guy who illustrated this cover even read the book?" Sam asked as Dean pulled the Impala out into the road. The ridiculousness of the book cover had them all giggling as they set off for Kripke's Hollow, the town where Chuck Shurley, a.k.a. Carver Edlund lived.

---

The Next Day

Kripke's Hollow, Iowa

The Winchesters approached the ramshackle house with trepidation—the lawn was overgrown and unkempt and an old motorcycle with a busted axel leaned against crooked, peeling porch railing. This was the place where the author lived. What would they find inside? Why were their lives someone's entertainment hour? And how did Chuck Shurley seem to know everything about their life and times?

Dean led the way up the stairs and at the door, the three of them paused, trading apprehensive looks. Alex shifted the gun in her waistband so that it wasn't visible. Sam had the demon knife and nodded to Dean, who shrugged his eyebrows up. The sentiment was clear: Here goes nothin'. He pressed the doorbell and they waited.

The door creaked open to reveal a thirty-something man who squinted in the light of day—it wasn't early by any means, but he was still in slippers, boxers, a stained off-white tank top, and a ratty old robe. He looked disheveled and disgruntled, his wavy brown hair unstyled and poking up in weird places like he'd rolled out of bed that way. "...You Chuck Shurley?" Dean asked doubtfully.

"The Chuck Shurley who wrote the Supernatural books?" Sam quickly added.

"Maybe..." the man answered, his eyes sliding across the three of them guardedly. "Why?"

Dean was quick and to the point. "I'm Dean. This is Sam. That's Alex." He paused for effect, even as Chuck quickly got weirded out. "The Dean, Sam and Alex you've been writing about."

Chuck made to close the door—but Alex reached out and smacked her palm into the front of it even as she kicked the toe of her shoe out, stopping him from shutting them out. He was startled by the action and she gave him a facetious little smile. "Rude."

"Look, uh... I appreciate your enthusiasm," he said. "Really, I do. It's, uh, it's always nice to hear from the fans. But, uh, for your own good, I strongly suggest you get a life."

Again, he tried to shut the door, but Alex's foot was still in the way and Chuck looked mightily annoyed at it, too. "See, here's the thing," Dean said, drifting forward a little. "We have a life.
You've been using it to write your books." Dean walked straight into the house, forcing Chuck to back up into the dim interior of the house.

"Now, wait a minute. Now, this isn't funny!" Chuck protested, getting freaked out as the Winchesters crowded him and forced him back into his disgustingly messy living room.

Dean had his most intimidating expression and tone out. "Damn straight it's not funny."

"Look, we just want to know how you're doing it," Sam reasoned, more quiet and reasonable sounding than Dean even though he was on edge, too.

"I'm not doing anything!" Chuck protested.

"Are you a hunter?" Dean asked.

"What?" Chuck looked like he'd never heard anything more ridiculous. "No. I'm a writer."

"Then how do you know so much about demons?" Dean advanced on Chuck, whose face fell in fear—he backed up and fell down onto his couch as Dean continued demanding answers. "And Tulpas, and changelings?"

Cowering on the couch in just his underwear and a ratty tank top (his robe wasn't hanging around him as he laid there), the author looked pretty pathetic. "Is this some kind of 'Misery' thing?" He asked, paranoia coloring his features. "Ah, it is, isn't it? It's a 'Misery' thing! You're gonna make me rewrite everything then murder me!"

"Come on man, have some self-respect," Dean muttered at the sight of a grown man in his underwear close to blubbering. "Believe me, we're not fans!"

"Well, then, what do you want?!" Chuck demanded, refusing to move from his station on the couch.

Sam was getting pissy. "I'm Sam. And that's Dean. She's Alex."

Chuck only got more flabbergasted, looking at them like they were the crazy ones. "Sam and Dean and Alex are fictional characters. I made them up! They're not real!"

The Winchesters looked at each other for a minute, frustrated. Alex shook her head and went over to Chuck, grabbing him and manhandling him up. "Get up, you look like an idiot."

Chuck looked at her in awe. "Whoa, you're pretty strong for a chick," he said, suddenly seeming to see her in new light and seeming fascinated. "You work out? Lift weights? Pilates?" Alex gave him a weird, amused look.

"All right chuckles, enough," Dean said, grabbing Chuck by the arm. "Got something to show you."

Chuck protested vehemently, but Sam and Dean escorted him to the Impala, where Dean opened the trunk and began to show Chuck evidence of who they were.

Chuck stared down at the arsenal with wide eyes. "Are... those real guns?"

"Yup. This is real rock salt, these are real fake IDs," Dean showed him both things then let them fall back into the trunk and he crossed his arms as Alex picked up a couple things too and waved them at Chuck.
"Dad's journal," she said, then pulled out a dog-eared notebook that had been well-worn. "Some of my notebooks from when I couldn't talk."

Chuck was both impressed and flabbergasted. "Well, I, I gotta hand it to you guys. You really are my number one fans." He stared down at the guns again, his nervousness showing through. "That's, that's awesome, s-so..." he mumbled breathily, cleared his throat, and started backing up, jerking a thumb toward his house. "I-I think I've got some posters in the house, yeah, I... uh..." he began to scurry back up the way they'd come out.

"Chuck, stop!" Dean thundered, already following him.

Chuck turned and held his hands out in weak defense, panicking at the three Winchester's taller forms and imposing presences. "Please. Wait. Please, don't hurt me!"

Alex was exasperated. "We won't hurt you Chuck, so stop being such a little pansy." Clearly affronted by her words, Chuck went silent.

"How much do you know?" Sam asked intently. "Do you know about the angels? Or Lilith breaking the seals?"

The author's face showed confounded surprise. "Wait a minute. How do you know about that?" He asked.

"How do you?" Alex challenged.

Chuck paused, baffled. "Because I wrote it?"

"You kept writing?" Sam asked, his eyes narrowing.

The author's confusion was growing by leaps and bounds. "Yeah, even after the publisher went bankrupt, but those books never came out." Suddenly, Chuck grinned, laughed, crossed his arms and visibly relaxed. "Okay, wait a minute. This is some kind of joke, right? Did that—did Phil put you up to this?"

Dean, Sam, and Alex shared brief glances, then Dean cracked a cynical, tight smile. "Well, nice to meet you. I'm Dean Winchester, and this is my brother, Sam, our sister Alex."

Chuck's smile faded. "The last names were never in the books. I never told anybody about that. I never even wrote that down." He was overcome by shock. "You're real? The three of you are... are real?"

"In the flesh," Dean quipped humorlessly.

Chuck swallowed. "I... I need a drink."

Sam bracingly leaned down onto the kitchen chair back, staring at Chuck, who was gulping down a huge glass of whiskey, his back turned to the Winchesters. Dean was pacing slightly behind Sam, and Alex was further back in the room, frowning at the discovery of a shirt wadded up and shoved in between some books on a shelf. There was an old pizza crust near it that looked hard as a rock. The guy's house was packrat heaven.

Chuck turned around and groaned at the sight of the Winchesters in his living room kitchen area. "Ah! You're still there."
Dean nodded once. "Yup."

"You're not a hallucination."

Dean shook his head once. "Nope."

A silence stretched out as Chuck stared at them with a slackened jaw. "Well, there's only one explanation. Obviously... I'm a god."

Alex shot him a humored, thoughtful look. That was quite the leap.

Sam laughed softly. "You're not a god."

"How else do you explain it? I write things and then they come to life." He sighed gustily. "Yeah, no, I'm definitely a god," he said. His face twisted into confused self-loathing. "A cruel, cruel, capricious god." He looked at them all in turn as if he were horrified at himself. "The things I put you through! The physical beatings alone..."

"Yeah, we're still in one piece," Dean muttered, obviously internally rolling his eyes at Chuck's dramatics.

"I made you mute, Alex!" He said, appealing to her with his gaze. "I put you through terrible things—loneliness, a crazy dad, a twin who abandoned you?! A brother-sister relationship with Dean that most readers thought was incestual?!"

Alex felt put on the spot as she and Dean exchanged a very odd look indeed. "Uh…"

Chuck was looking at Dean, then Sam. "I killed your father. I burned your mother alive. And then you had to go through the whole horrific deal again with Jessica..."

"Chuck…" Sam cut him off, but Chuck kept going.

"All for what? All for the sake of literary symmetry. I toyed with your lives, your emotions, for... entertainment."

"You didn't toy with us, Chuck, okay?" Dean asked impatiently, moving forward a little bit. "You didn't create us."

Alex was now beside Sam, and all three of the Winchesters watched as Chuck crossed his arms and stared at them in worried interest. "Did you really have to live through the bugs?" He asked.

"Don't remind me," Alex commented in a mutter.

"What about the ghost ship?"

"Yes, that too," Dean answered brusquely.

"I am... so sorry," Chuck apologized. "I mean, horror is one thing, but to be forced to live bad writing... if I would have known it was real, I would have done another pass, a few more drafts, maybe tried to—"

"Chuck, you're not a god!" Dean insisted a little loudly.

"We think you're probably just psychic," Sam explained, standing to his full height.

Chuck made a face. "No. If I were psychic, you think I'd be writing?" He made a pained face.
"Writing is hard."

Sam and Dean exchanged a yeah right glance.

"Well for whatever reason, your psychic mumbo jumbo is... focused on our lives," Alex reasoned.

"Yeah, like laser-focused," Dean put in. "Are you working on anything right now?"

Realization came over Chuck's face. "Ho-ooly crap," he breathed.

"What?" Dean asked cautiously.

Chuck picked up a draft printout that was laying on the kitchen table next to his computer. "The, uh, latest book?" He paused, tried to be casual. "It's, uh, it's kind of weird."

"Weird how?" Sam asked.

Chuck stared at the page blankly and took too long to answer.

"Weird how, Chuck," Alex asked in a louder, less patient voice than her twin had used.

Chuck winced. "It's very... Vonnegut?"

Dean studied Chuck intently. "'Slaughterhouse Five' Vonnegut or 'Cat's Cradle' Vonnegut?"

"What?" Sam asked in a startled, high-pitched voice—he was obviously shocked that Dean even know who Vonnegut was.

Dean looked at his brother defensively. "What?"

"It's, uh, 'Kilgore Trout' Vonnegut," Chuck said grimly. "I wrote myself into it. I wrote myself, at my house... confronted by my characters."

"Well, that was interesting," Dean commented wryly as they sped away from Chuck's dilapidated house. Sam chuckled and said something back, but Alex wasn't paying attention. In the back seat with a hefty manuscript draft, she was busy skimming the text with increasing attentiveness. There was so much detail, and it described the past three days of their life perfectly... the way they had gotten zapped back to the motel, her apology to Cas, the burnt pancakes they had for breakfast, the long drive, the encounter in the comic book shop, the friendly spat Dean and Sam had gotten into over the music on the radio... how did Chuck know all of this?

Not even he knew. Shaken up and unable to provide them with anymore solid answers, Chuck had sent them away with the newest manuscript he'd been working on, telling them that he had no idea how he knew everything he did about them. Only that he had 'visions' and wrote what he saw.

The Winchesters were headed to find a laundromat until they could come up with something, or figure out how exactly this Chuck guy was doing what he was doing. Alex flipped to a few pages further. This page took place earlier that morning, when they had been on the road to Chuck's house. Her eyes got big as she read further.

SUPERNATURAL, The Monster at the End of this Book (working title), Page 14.

Alex leaned tiredly against the window of the car, yet again letting her mind wander to a place she would never admit to anyone that it went. Castiel. Ever since she had apologized to him, she hadn't seen him. Not that she wanted to, she told herself. Even though she did. To Alex, Castiel was... someone she was beginning to dare to trust. She wasn't sure if she would ever understand him very well, but after all he had done for her, she was beginning to think, maybe, he wasn't as bad as she'd originally thought. Maybe there was hope for him yet. And it didn't hurt that he was attractive, either... uncomfortable with the direction her thoughts were taking, Alex forced herself to sit up, trying to banish the thoughts from her mind.

_What the hell?_ Alex glanced up from the draft, first at Dean, then at Sam, and stealthily took that page of the manuscript and cleared her throat, shoving the page into the pocket of her jacket. That was the last thing she needed—Dean and Sam knowing she found Castiel physically attractive. Which, she _didn't!_ Or at least, she didn't want to, and didn't think she _should._ He wasn't... a human. There was no reason for her to be attracted to him. But she thought of the tousled wild hair, the eyes that could stare into her soul, the stern line of his mouth. The subtle ways his expressions shifted. The crinkles around his eyes when a smile crossed his face. The constant five o'clock shadow. The way her name sounded when he spoke it. The power and authority he wielded... _Oh my god,_ Alex thought miserably as she finally gave up on trying to convince herself out of it. _I'm the world's biggest idiot. Why couldn't I pick someone to like who I would actually have a chance with? I'm hopeless._

Dean pulled into the laundromat parking lot, the car bumping over the uneven pavement. A sudden, terrible thought came to Alex, and she hurriedly paged through the manuscript. The drive to Chuck's, the visit with Chuck—and there, staring back at her: _Alex glanced up from the draft, first at Dean, then at Sam, and stealthily took that page of the manuscript and cleared her throat, shoving the page into the pocket of her jacket. That was the last thing she needed—Dean and Sam knowing she found Castiel physically attractive._

_Agape,_ Alex took that page too, shoving it into her pocket with the other page, mortified. How had Chuck done that?! The second Dean stopped the car, she hopped out anxiously, hugging the draft to herself. This was weird, weird, _weird!_ And she didn't want anyone, especially not her brothers, to know about her love life. Or, her embarrassing _lack_ of one. Or her entirely unrealistic and irrational little crush. Alex thought in another moment she might have laughed at herself—a capable hunter who wasn't scared to face any kind of paranormal enemy, but turned into a dramatic thirteen-year-old girl when she thought her brothers might read her diary.

"The hell is wrong with you?" Dean asked as he got out of the car, giving her one of his suspicious, narrowed-eyed stares.

"Just, uh, really stoked to do laundry!" Alex said, realizing that she overdid it, not quite managing to sound normal.

"Yeah, whatever, lemme see that," he said, motioning for the manuscript. She handed him the manuscript right away, trying not to let her reluctance show through. "Weirdo," Dean muttered, and turned to go into the laundromat. Sam was grabbing all the bags out of the trunk, and Alex told herself to stop thinking, and just start helping with laundry.

Dean settled down onto one of the counters, intently paging through the manuscript. The twins began working on the laundry, dumping everything out and sorting it into piles. Alex glanced at Dean every few seconds nervously. She wasn't sure why she was so freaked out about it. Maybe because being teased about that would hurt too much. She wished, so badly, that she wasn't the way she was... that is, headed for spinster life. But past a certain age, she guessed it was hopeless. She was pretty much a freak, and needed to just accept it. Her lifestyle didn't exactly leave her much in the way of meeting men or having a relationship. Also, she wasn't a normal girl at all—what kind of man would go for the likes of _her?_ No wonder she was getting so desperate as to be attracted to an angel. _No, stop thinking about him,_ she told herself, and glanced up at Dean again.
"I'm sitting in a laundromat, reading about myself sitting in a laundromat reading about myself. My head hurts," Dean complained.

"There's gotta be something this guy's not telling us, right?" Sam asked, gathering all of his darks into a huge pile.

"He's psychic," Alex said, throwing all the lights into one of the laundromat carts. "Has to be. Can you think of another explanation?"

"Well, no, but that doesn't mean there isn't one," Sam said. He turned and tossed his darks into one of the machines.

Dean began to read from the manuscript. "Sam tossed his gigantic darks into the machine. He was starting to have doubts about Chuck, about whether he was telling the whole truth. Alex glanced at Dean, scowling."

Alex's scowl dropped in surprise. "Alex's scowl dropped in surprise," Dean read, chuckling a little now.

"Stop it, Dean," Sam said.

"'Stop it, Dean,' Sam said," Dean read, thoroughly enjoying himself. "'Guess what you do next, Sam.' Sam just turned around, his expression unpleasant.

"'Sam turned his back on Dean, his face brooding and pensive.' I mean, I don't know how he's doing it, but this guy is doing it. I can't see your face, but those are definitely your 'brooding and pensive' shoulders."

Sam scoffed over his shoulder at Dean. "Ah, and you just thought I was a dick," Dean said, reading from the manuscript again.

Sam turned around, looking impressed. "The guy's good."

"Good? He's scary," Alex said. "He's inside our heads."

"'He's inside our heads,' Alex said with her trademark sarcastic flair." Dean all but giggled. "Trademark sarcastic flair, I like that, Al. Sassy."

"Give me that," Alex said, grabbing the stack of paper from him and whacking him over the head. He threw up his hands in pitiful protest, still giggling.

---

The Next Day

Chuck's House

"This was all so much easier before you were real," Chuck said, pacing in front of them. His house was still dark and messy, littered with papers and empty bottles, dirty laundry, old pizza boxes.

"We can take it; just spit it out," Dean said impatiently. "What does the new chapter you wrote say is gonna happen next?"

Chuck looked between all three of the Winchesters hesitantly. "It's Lilith. She's coming for Sam."

"What do you mean?" Dean demanded, stepping closer to Chuck, whose eyes widened slightly. He was clearly intimidated by Dean. "Coming to kill him? When?"
"Tonight," Chuck said.

"Where?" Alex asked intently.

Chuck looked at her and nodded, muttered something, sat on his couch, and put on reading glasses. "Uh... let's see, uh... 'Lilith patted the bed seductively. Unable to deny his desire, Sam succumbed, and they sank into the throes of fiery demonic passion.'"

"Whoa," Alex said, and Dean's expression matched hers: total wide-eyed disbelief and disgust. Sam, however, was laughing. "You're kidding me, right?"

"Why are you laughing?" Alex demanded, not seeing the humor in the situation.

"Why aren't you?" Sam asked, and then seeing Dean's disapproving glare, his smile faded a little. "I mean, come on. 'Fiery demonic passion'?"

"It's just a first draft," Chuck said defensively.

"Wait, wait, wait, wait," Dean said, suddenly thinking of something. "Lilith is a little girl."

Oh yeah. All three Winchesters looked at Chuck, waiting for him to explain. "Oh, no, uh, this time she's a 'comely dental hygienist from Bloomington, Indiana.'"

"Well that makes it all better," Alex said with her trademark sarcastic flair. "You need to give us some context, here, Chuck. What happens before the… demonic passion?"

"Well, I don't really… I only got the… fiery part… I mean, I can let you guys read it, but it's really random. Just, basically, what you guys do all day after you leave here."

"Great. Perfect," Dean said wryly. "So then what happens after the fiery whatever?"

"I don't know, it hasn't come to me yet," Chuck said, shrugging shallowly.

"Geez, what good are you for?" Alex commented a little rudely.

But Chuck just looked at her, a little smile on his face, like he was fond of her. His eyes searched her face in an odd way. "You know, you're exactly how I imagined you. Even better, in fact."

Both of the brothers looked at Chuck strangely, and Dean grabbed Chuck by the shoulder, startling the writer. "Hey—keep the creepy flirty crap outta the equation. Got it?"

"Uh, yeah Dean," Chuck said, trying to act cool, but failing completely.

"Now, about this whole love scene between Sam and Lilith—" Dean started.

Sam didn't let him finish. "Dean, look, there's nothing to worry about. Lilith and me? In bed?"

Alex looked at him sidelong, saying what everyone else in the room was thinking. "What's so crazy about that?"

"The name Ruby ring any bells, Sam?" Dean added, driving in the nail.

Sam's expression fell into something like chagrin or frustration and he looked down, saying nothing.
A Few Hours Later

"What color you want, honey?" the woman asked Alex, who looked up from her hands, which laid flat on the table.

"I don't know. Red. Whatever color other girls get," she said impatiently.

The woman tilted her head to the side, perplexed. "Lots of colors, honey. You pick one."

"Red," Alex repeated, quickly losing her patience. "Just pick a damn red bottle and paint my friggin' nails, lady!"

"Okay, okay," the lady said, looking offended, but quickly complying.

Alex didn't know how any woman could subject herself to this, but this is what Dean had ordered her to do. Sit in a frigging nail shop. It seemed like one of the more ludicrous plans he'd ever had. After leaving Chuck's, Dean had immediately said they were leaving town. As luck would have it, the only way out of town, a bridge, was flooded. So, back to the drawing board, they had read the chapter Chuck had written, and Dean had the harebrained idea to do everything opposite of what they usually did in an attempt to avoid what was supposed to happen with Lilith that night.

That was why he sent Alex off, alone, and told her to do everything she normally wouldn't have —"you know, girl stuff… go get your nails done, I don't know!" Because if she could have chosen what to do with her free time, she would have wanted to go to a gun range and target practice or read a book in bed or lift weights, maybe sharpen her knives. She was pissed off that she was being subjected to this waste of time instead of doing something to prepare or stop Lilith's approach. Honestly, she thought she should have stayed with Sam. But Dean had insisted this was the only way to avoid the outcome they didn't want. To separate from each other.

"You want design on here?" the nail lady asked, and Alex opened her mouth to say no, then remembered what Dean had said. Do the opposite of what you normally would.

"Yeah," she said, and the lady handed her a menu of options. Alex looked at the options, searching for the one she hated the most.

Alex returned to the motel room at dusk and entered sullenly. Sam looked up as she entered, then his face scrunched up. "Whoa… you look… weird."

Alex just crossed her arms. "I got my nails done. I got my hair done. I went window shopping at the mall, and then I let some old lady do a makeover on me. I'm exhausted, and I have literally done nothing."

"I mean, you look…"

"Ridiculous?" She asked, looking down at herself. She'd done her best to do everything opposite, outfit included. She was wearing a short jean skirt, knee-high black boots, a dark red top, and a pleather crop jacket over it. Her hair had been curled and glossed, her nails were shiny red with ridiculous cherries on them. And the makeup—dark eyeshadow, dark liner. If this wasn't the opposite of what she'd normally do, nothing would be. She felt like a moron.

At that moment, Dean burst in, and headed straight for his bag. "Come on. We're getting out of here."

"What? Where?" Sam asked, standing in surprise.
"How? I thought the bridge—" Alex asked, and Dean suddenly noticed her appearance and did a double take.

"The hell are you wearing?" He asked, seeming to be totally startled by the very un-Alex outfit. "Never mind. We are leaving this motel, this town. I don't care if we gotta swim, we are getting out. I tried doing everything backwards, but it still happened, just like Chuck said." He looked around, confused. "Dude, where are all the hex bags?"

Alex followed his gaze, realizing she hadn't noticed their absence.

"I burned them," Sam said.

"You what?" Dean asked dangerously.

"Sam!" Alex exclaimed, stunned.

Her twin was attempting to explain, his expression earnest if not defensive. "Look, if Lilith is coming, which is a big 'if'—"

"No, no, no," Dean growled. "It's more than an 'if.' Chuck is not a psychic. He's a prophet."

"Wait, a what?" Alex asked, looking at Dean in complete confusion.

Dean let out a short, frustrated breath, impatient, shoving stuff into his bag. "Cas showed up, and apparently Chuck is writing the gospel of us."

At the mention of Castiel, Alex's stomach dropped a little. "Cas showed up?"

"Never mind that, let's get the hell out of here," Dean said, and headed back to his bags.

Sam shut his eyes and wet his lips. "No."

Getting agitated, Dean threw down his bag. "Sam, Lilith is gonna slaughter you."

"Maybe she will, maybe she won't," Sam said evenly, trying to be calm and reasonable. "Only one way to find out, Dean, and I say bring her on."

"That does not sound like a good idea, Sam..." Alex said, her voice full of caution.

"You both think I'll do it, don't you?" Sam asked dispiritedly. "You think I'll go dark side."

"Yes!" Dean barked out. "Okay? Yes. The way you've been acting lately? The things you've been doing?"

Sam looked startled, and Dean nodded grimly. "Oh, I know. How you ripped Alastair apart like it was nothing. How you killed him without batting an eye." Sam looked at Alex, hurt and betrayed. She just stared back without remorse as Dean continued. She had nothing to be sorry about—she'd told Dean the truth. "I know that you've been using your psychic crap, and you've been getting stronger. We just don't know why, and we don't know how."

"It's not what you think," Sam said, fumbling for words.

"Then what is it, Sam? 'Cause I'm at a total loss. Come on Alex, now." Dean grabbed his bag roughly off the bed and headed for the door. He turned back to Sam and Alex. "Are you coming or not?"
Sam didn't move. "No."

Dean's jaw clenched, and he just stared at Sam unhappily for a couple beats, then threw his bag down and left, slamming the door behind him. The silence resounded for a couple seconds, and then Sam turned to look at Alex, his expression harsh. "Your favorite brother just left," Sam said. "Aren't you gonna follow him like you always do?"

Alex forced herself to ignore the jab. "Sam, just listen to reason," she said, receiving a soft, bitter laugh from him. Still, she forged ahead, trying to be gentle and reasonable. For his sake, not hers. "Confronting Lilith while knowing what Chuck said is going to happen—it's a bad idea. You know that. Let's dodge this bullet. Let's go while we still can."

"I'm not running away, for once, Alex. I'm gonna face this. With or without you and Dean."

Alex wished she knew how to tell her brother how much she was worried, how scared she was for him. "It doesn't have to be you against the world, Sam," she said, coming closer to him, trying to get through to him. "Why can't we be on the same side?"

He shot her a dark look. "You're one to talk… I'm not the one who told Dean about Alastair."

Alex felt her expression sour. So, it was going to be like this. "No. You're not. And you should have been. But I knew you weren't going to tell him." She felt a bitter smile on her face. "In fact, you hoped I was too out of it to see what you did to Alastair. But I saw." She felt her smile fade. "I saw." Sam's expression was dark. Alex swallowed, suddenly feeling overwhelmed by sadness. She didn't have any ammo left, and she had no idea how to get her brother to listen to reason or come with her. "Sam… can't we just back off this Lilith thing and figure out what's going on with you first? Please. I want you to be okay."

"I am okay," he replied acidly. His expression was unflinching. "And this time, I'm doing things my way. For once in my life, you and Dean can't do anything to stop me." His jaw was set. "The door's right there. Now leave me alone." He turned away, effectively ending the conversation.

Alex stared at his back, hurt, yeah, but mostly frustrated. She gave up, leaving the motel room and exiting into the chill of night. She looked to her left, where she could see Dean, his familiar silhouette lit by the blue glow of the soda machine… he was brushing past another figure angrily. Was that…?

Alex approached. It was. It was Castiel. "You must understand why I can't intercede," he was saying to Dean intently. "Prophets are very special. They're protected." Castiel looked at her in acknowledgement as she came to Dean's side. "Hello, Alex." He took in her appearance, and she could see that he was mildly perplexed by it.

She didn't give him time to comment. "Cas. What's going on guys?"

"Well our good buddy Cas here was just telling me why he can't interfere with the prophesy… or basically lift a damn finger to help us," Dean said angrily, staring down the angel wrathfully.

Alex shut her eyes for a couple seconds tiredly. Sounded familiar. "Okay. Well… what options does that leave us?"

"The hell if I know!" Dean exclaimed irately. "I'm about to go in there and knock Sam unconscious and tie him down if we don't come up with something." He huffed a heavy breath out, sounding tired. "Come on, halo over here is fresh outta helpfulness," Dean said, shooting Castiel a glare and grabbing Alex by the arm, about to turn her away with him.
But Castiel spoke before he could. "You should both know… if anything threatens a prophet... anything at all… an archangel will appear to destroy that threat. Archangels are fierce. They're absolute." He lowered his chin, narrowed his eyes. "They're Heaven's most terrifying weapon."

Dean's head tilted slightly to the side. "And these archangels, they're tied to prophets?"

"Yes," Castiel confirmed.

"So if a prophet was in the same room as a demon..." Dean prompted.

There was an oddly sly, conspiratorial smile on Cas's face. "Then the most fearsome wrath of Heaven would rain down on that demon." The smile was still there. "Just so you understand... why I can't help." He looked at Dean and then Alex significantly. Alex felt a smile spreading over her face. Was Castiel being tricky and clever? He was, and he knew it, too.

Dean was nodding, also understanding. "Thanks, Cas."

"Good luck."

Castiel's gaze left Dean and met Alex's. If Dean had noticed, he might have been puzzled at the intense nature of it, the way they silently seemed to be saying something to each other. But he was already heading for the car. "Come on Alex." She turned to look at Dean, then back at Cas—but he was gone.

Disconcerted, she jogged to catch up with Dean. "But shouldn't I stay with Sam?"

"No. I don't want you alone with him," Dean said, and looked at her over the top of the car, sadly. "We'll be back in time to save him."

They swung into the car, and the engine roared to life. Dean tore out of the parking lot, and for a few minutes, the car was silent. Then, Alex turned slightly. "Dean, why did Cas help us like that?"

Dean didn't answer for a few seconds, and she could see that he was in deep thought. "Dunno. At first I thought he was... I dunno, a self-righteous asshole with wings." Dean chuckled, then grew pensive. "I owe the guy a whole hell of a lot. My life, your voice... this." Dean shifted his hand on the wheel, turned a shade more darkly thoughtful. "Maybe he wants something."

Alex glanced at him sidelong. In her experience, everyone had an ulterior motive. Still, she shook her head slowly. "I don't think so."

"Why not?" Dean asked, sending a cursory glance her way.

"He's a freakin' angel," Alex said. "What the hell could he want from us? Flannel shirts? Rock salt?" She gave a short little laugh. "I mean, what do we have that anyone in their right mind would want?"

Dean chuckled. "Good point."

Alex thought about how Anna had wanted to be a human to experience love. How Cas had said he was her friend, back at the hospital. She grew reflective, wondering about the motivations of angels. "Maybe he just wants friendship."

Dean made a face like he thought the idea was doubtful, but possible. "Interesting theory." He squealed to a halt on the sidewalk in front of Chuck's house. "We'll have to think about that later. Let's get this jackass and hightail it back to Sammy."
Dean hurried inside, Alex close behind. They found Chuck sprawled on his couch, wrapping up in a blanket and drinking. He sat up in surprise upon seeing them. "What are you doing here? I didn't write this. Hey!"

Dean was yanking him to his feet roughly. "Come on. I need you to come with us."

"What? Where?" Chuck protested.

"To the motel where Sam is," Alex said.

"But that's where Lilith is!" Chuck protested.

"Yeah, exactly," Dean said. "I need you to stop her."

"Are you insane?" Chuck demanded, yanking out of Dean's grip. "Lilith? I know what she's capable of, Dean! I wrote her!"

Impatiently, Dean seemed to realize he needed to stop and explain. "All right, listen to me. You have an archangel tethered to you, okay? All you got to do is show up and boom! Lilith gets smoked."

"But I-I haven't seen that yet. Th-the story—" Chuck fumbled.

Alex smacked him in the back of the head. "Shut up, Chuck! Get yourself together!"

"Ow." He cowered away, holding his head. "B-but... I'm just a writer, I... I can't do anything!"

Dean grabbed him again. "This isn't a story anymore, man. This is real! And you're in it! Now, I need you to get off your ass and fight."

Chuck drew in a deep breath, and for a second looked like he was bracing himself to do just that. And then he shook his head. "No friggin' way."

Dean sighed, blinking a few times. "Okay, well, then, how about this—I've got a gun in my pocket, and if you don't come with me, I'll blow your brains out."

Chuck looked at Dean, slack jawed. "I thought you said I was protected by an archangel," he said timidly.

"Well, interesting exercise," Dean said, his voice lower. He had stepped a little closer to Chuck, who shrank back. "Let's see who the quicker draw is."

"You guys wouldn't shoot me..." Chuck said, trying to call a bluff.

At this point, Alex grabbed a fistful of his shirt and shoved him back a couple steps. "Chuck. Enough with the bullshit." He stared at her in a mix of awe and fear. "You know how Dean and I feel about Sam. We may fight each other ninety percent of the time, but I don't care about cutting you up a little to get you to do what I want... which is for you to help save my brother." She showed him the knife she had pulled out of her belt loop and his eyes widened. "Now, move."

"Okay, yeah, okay." He was smiling now, a breathy laugh escaping his mouth. "Wow, that was kinda hot."

"Shut up," Dean said, smacking him in the back of the head.
Chuck cowered slightly, grabbing his head with both hands. "Ow! Would you guys stop doing that?!"

The unlikely three got into the Impala and Dean raced them back toward Sammy. Just as they entered the tiny downtown area, the engine puttered and choked. "Damnit!" Dean shouted, hitting the steering wheel in frustration. "Out of gas. I knew I was forgetting something!" Luckily they were close to a gas station, and Dean coasted in, making it to the pump on gas fumes. He jumped out of the Impala and pointed a threatening finger at Chuck, who sat in the back seat with Alex. "Don't go anywhere."

"Wouldn't dream of it," Chuck said, smiling nervously then seeming to think better of it. He grimaced at himself and looked at his lap.

Alex looked at him out of the corner of her eye, then cleared her throat, spoke furtively. "So. Chuck. You seen any visions of me and… anyone? In the future?"

"That's a really open-ended question, Alex," Chuck said, looking at her mistrustfully.

Alex sighed and rolled her eyes. She would have to spell it out, then. "Me and Cas, okay? The way you were writing some of the last chapter was like… a lead up to a romance."

At that comment, the author smiled coyly, looked at her sidelong. "Read a lot of romance novels, huh?" He asked, laughing nervously, then becoming quiet. "That was a rhetorical question. I know you read them."

Alex gave him a surprised look which quickly became an evil eye. "Don't tell."

"Uh, well, it's mentioned in the books," Chuck said, flinching a little in anticipation of her reaction.

"Aw shit Chuck," Alex muttered, bringing her face into her palm. Her brothers knew, of course, but… she didn't want anyone else to know about her sappier side.

"I'm sorry," Chuck apologized, leaning away a little, as if anticipating an attack. "Please don't cut me."

"Come on dude," Alex said, rolling her eyes and crossing her arms while letting out a huff. "I wouldn't cut you unless I absolutely had to."

"That's… that's comforting," Chuck said. He frowned in thought, growing pensive. "To, uh, answer your question, no, I haven't seen anything about you and Castiel. But, I do know that he likes you. More than anyone else, I think. That has to count for something, right?"

Alex looked at him sidelong again, not letting her real reaction show. "Hell if I know."

"And you… you like him, too, don't you," Chuck supposed softly. He suddenly seemed very wise and thoughtful, knowing. Alex withered underneath his gaze. "Only, you're trying to run from what you feel. Because you don't know where it would lead."

She looked at him sharply, getting defensive and loud because of how right he was. "Nowhere. It would lead nowhere."

Chuck drew in a deep breath, still looking at her with that terrifyingly knowing look. "I'm not so sure."

Alex fell silent and looked the opposite direction, wishing she hadn't broached the subject at all.
Chuck was giving her false hope, which she didn't need or want. It had been a stupid question to ask—what had she wanted Chuck to say? Yes, Castiel has been in love with you for a long time and you're going to have the romance of a lifetime that defies the odds—cuz face it baby, you're a human and he's an angel and, oh wait, you're delusional. Jesus Christ it showed how many romance novels she read.

Alex kicked herself inside. It was a fantasy, and she knew it. It was just because Castiel was one of the only men besides her father or brothers or Bobby who had said more than ten things to her. It was only because he had showed her a kindness by healing her voice. It was only because he was handsome and interesting and had eyes that carried heaviness that she recognized in herself. It was only because she was confused and sometimes he looked at her like he was interested in her but she was a clueless relationship virgin (and otherwise-virgin too) and any look from a man not related to her seemed to mean something it probably didn't.

Dean yanked the driver's door open and slid back into his seat, slamming the door behind him. He startled her out of her thoughts.

"Okay, let's go cut this fiery demonic passion short," he said, and they burned rubber out of there.

---

Later That Night

They rode away from the Red Motel under the cover of night, Sam in the back seat, Alex in the front, Dean driving. "So lemme get this straight, you didn't think once about taking it?" Dean asked incredulously.

"You kidding me? Dude, you spent all day trying to talk me off the Lilith track," Sam said.

"I'm just saying… a deal to call off the whole thing… angels, seals, Lucifer rising, the whole nine?" Dean glanced at Sam in the rearview.

" Doesn't sound legit," Alex muttered. She heard Sam shift a little in the back seat.

"Yeah. And even if it were she would have found some way to weasel out of it. And all it would have cost us was our lives. Anyway, that's not the point."

"What's the point?" Dean asked.

"The point is, she's scared," Sam said. "I could see it. Lilith is running."

"What would hell's most terrifying bitch be running from?" Alex asked, completely disbelieving. "The archangel we brought over for a visit?"

"No. Something else. But she was telling the truth about one thing."

"Which was?" Alex prompted.

"She's not gonna survive the apocalypse. I'll make sure of that."

"We'll make sure of it," Dean corrected. "Together."

"Yeah, that's what I meant," Sam said, and grew quiet.

Dean cleared his throat and cranked up the volume on the radio, covering over the silence. It was a familiar, upbeat classic rock song with a yowling guitar rift to die for.
"I've got a tombstone hand and a graveyard mind, I'm just twenty-two and I don't mind dying. Who do you love? Who do you love. I said-a who do you lo-ooove?"

Dean piped up, sang along suddenly, trying to make the mood in the car light after everything they'd been through that day. "Who do you loooove?"

"Stop before you break the windows," Alex joked, making a face.

"You love when I sing," he teased.

"I love when you stop singing," she retorted playfully.

In the back seat and unnoticed by his siblings, Sam sank down a little in his seat, shame rolling over him like the incoming tide. If they only knew the things he was doing in the dark these days… Dean wouldn't say that he wanted to do anything together. And Alex would never give him a second chance ever again.

Oblivious, in the front seat, Alex smiled a little in Dean's direction and grabbed her book from the floor of the car. She flipped open Wendigo, starting where she'd left off, reading in the dim light of passing street lamps.

Dean looked back over his shoulder, checking to see that his sister was still there—in the back of his mind, he always feared he'd look and Alex would be gone without a sound. He could never forgive himself if that happened. But she was there, in her worn out cargo jacket and with the predictable messy hair, holding herself firmly, calmly, her expression leveled in attentive focus. Unlike almost everyone else there, she was not freaking out, not getting crazy, not drowning in fear. She just looked ready and determined. Focused. He almost smiled to himself, realizing how proud he was of his kid sister, who had something that could potentially hold her back in life—but she didn't let it. That was her, wasn't it? Strong despite having what others would label a weakness. Resourceful, clever, and always doing her best, never complaining. She carried a lot of sadness with her, but faced every day just like he did: ready to kick its ass.

Alex looked up from the pages, a little smile on her face. She glanced at Dean sidelong, smiling. He caught her glance. "What?"

"It's just a pretty good book," she said, smiling to herself. She glanced at Sam in the rearview. He looked distracted, off in another world, and troubled. Her smile faded, and she remembered the harsh words traded earlier. She wondered how many more wounds their relationship could sustain before dying completely. She wondered how someone who she had once been so close to could be so far away. Lately, the moments where they were okay, where they weren't at odds were less and less. Once again troubled, Alex put the book down, lost in the dark places of her mind.
The Becoming

"Everybody says time heals everything. But what of the wretched hollow? The endless in between?"
- Imogen Heap

A Week Later

Alex stared stonily into the flames where the body of her half-brother Adam burned—she'd only learned of his existence a few days ago.

Just when she thought nothing else could ever surprise her ever again...

Life had been turned upside down for the Winchesters. Alex thought she should probably be sad that she never got a chance to meet the real Adam, sad that she hadn't known of his existence until a few days ago, sad that he died a slow and painful death at the hands of vengeful ghouls… but her dominant emotion was was a sense of betrayal and pained confusion. And extremely disoriented wooziness. But that probably had something to do with the alcohol.

She turned away from her brothers and loped off into the woods, her flask of absinthe clutched tightly. Her brothers watched her go and exchanged a glance, then turned back to the fire, giving her space, and it was a good thing, too. Sam and Dean would probably have taken the flask from her right then and there if they knew what was in there. A few years ago they had banned her from drinking absinthe entirely… it made her turn a little psycho... but she still snuck some at times. And today, of all days, she needed it.

Adam… did Dad name you? Is his name similar to mine on purpose? Starts with A, four letters…

Alex mourned for someone she didn't even know. Her breath made little puffs in the winter air, and her boots crunched against the frosty ground. She was at the point where she was all out of anger and instead full of pained questions that she didn't want to have to ask. She thought she knew Dad. She thought she knew him. How could he have another kid out there they had never known about? Why would he never tell them about Adam? Why'd they have to find out like this?

The thought of John Winchester soured Alex's mood and she bitterly swigged down more burning absinthe to numb the feelings. She stumbled a little, toe catching on a tree root. Maybe I shouldn't be standing right now. Plunking down unevenly to lean against a large tree trunk, she worked on nursing the booze. It burned like a bitch, but was doing the job of medicating her, numbing her, making everything seem funny and ridiculous instead of painful and raw. She sighed really loudly and shut her eyes, turning the flask up. She was beginning to feel good, loopy, like nothing mattered. Also, the world was spinning.

Alex took another huge gulp and when she opened her eyes, almost choked—standing in front of her was Cas, arms at his sides. Startled, she dropped the flask, the contents clumsily sloshing around. She grabbed it up and hugged it to herself, frowning up at Cas. He was difficult to see in the dim light but the mere sight of him made her feel odd, and she got mad about it. "What're you doing here?"

He stepped a little closer, and she could see his face a little better in the light from the fire that was twenty feet off. He was looking down at her intently... and was that concern on his features, or judgement? "I sensed your sorrow from Heaven," he said, his deep voice steady. "I thought I should see if you were…" he looked at the container she was clinging to—his expression wavered a little. "All right."

She giggled throatily—he was cute, he was funny—she tilted the flask toward him, as if in salute. "Good for you, Cas," she said, saying his name slowly and deeply. It sounded so hilarious to her, and she was giggling again before she got peevish again. "Now... unless you've got vodka or tequila with you, go away."

"I... have neither," he stated, his eyebrows furrowing slightly.

"Then get lost... I have things to do," she said. The only person she wanted to spend time with right now was this flask.

Cas crouched down in front of her, searching her face sternly and she was a little caught of guard by his closeness and how deep his eyes looked, how vast the brilliant blue spheres looked in the darkness. "Things to do?" He asked her. "Such as sitting here in the dark and consuming potentially lethal amounts of alcohol?"

She turned her head sideways, momentarily intrigued. "Was that you being funny?" She asked and pointed a finger at him then shook it like she was chiding him. Her face was flushed with drunkenness. "I like you, angel man," she slurred, then giggled again and accidentally hit herself in the teeth with the metallic rim of the flask. "Ouch, son of a bitch," she mumbled, clapping a hand to her hurt teeth awkwardly.

Cas tilted his head slightly, not understanding, but obviously trying to. His eyes flickered over her face, he was frowning intently, trying to comprehend her actions. "Why are you doing this, Alex?"

"Doing what?" She asked, her good humor slipping. Something about his tone didn't sit well with her. He looked at her a minute longer, as he weren't finished deciding what he thought. Feeling like she was being judged, she glared. "I can do what I want," she said acidly, no longer in a good mood—at all. She stared at him and decided in misery that she hated everything about that handsome face and brilliant blue eyes that were staring into hers. Getting angry that she wasn't blasted to the point of not caring, she crossed her arms over her chest and the flask alike. "You wouldn't get what I'm going through. Why this hurts so frickin' bad." She snorted. "And I doubt you'd want to know, either..."

She was growing agonized, sadness running her over like a train. "Why'd he do it, Cas? Why? Why'd he take Adam to baseball games, and teach him to drive and visit him for his birthday?" She stared off unseeingly into Castiel's right shoulder, breathing heavily through her nose, glazing over. "He forgot mine and Sam's birthday all the time and left me behind on half the hunts and made us do stupid training drills aaaaaalllllll day..." she chuckled darkly, a sound that was blurred by the alcohol. "You wanna know my favorite part? He refused to learn sign language, said I didn't need to, said he was gonna find a way to fix me, said it was a waste of time, oh, and that he didn't have the time, blah, blah, blah... ah, bastard. That son of a bitch." She was laughing now, her head lolling back and forth unsteadily.

"He thought he knew best, and the sad part is I thought he did too. Well, I know now whyyyyy."

She drew the word 'why' out for several seconds, pointing her finger at nothing in emphasis. "Cuz he thought I was a second best daughter." She laughed again, but the sound came out wrong, like she'd been punched in the gut. "Cuz he had a normal son Adan he rathered spend time with..." she made a face, hearing herself beginning to lose her grasp of the english language. "He didn't want the world to know about his weird daughter Alex who couldn't talk or his son Dean who was never good enough, or Sam who hated the family business." She got quiet, stared a minute, then looked at Cas sullenly. He shocked her when he put a hand onto her arm, just above her wrist. The touch was hesitant and uncertain and for a minute, behind the haze of drunkenness, Alex felt shocked at the gentle touch, the worried way he was looking at her. What is he doing? Why is he looking at me like that? For a minute, she was scared and confused for reasons she didn't know. She yanked her hand away from his at to herself, looking at him mistrustfully, trying to figure out what would make him do that, what his motive was. "You need to stop asking me all these questions," she said really loudly, trying to defend herself against how he was making her feel. Then she frowned to herself, not sure if she remembered him asking anything at all. Cas seemed chastened when she pulled her hand away, slightly rueful, like he had done the wrong thing and felt... embarrassed? Getting agitated again—with everything, herself, him, the warm feeling crawling all over her skin, Alex jerked back, standing up and almost falling sideways. Cas stood too, clearly ready to catch her if she fell over. "Well, screw my dad, and screw this, and screw—uh, screw the… um, uh the…” she forgot what she was going to say and swore in aggravation, went to take another swig of the alcohol... but Castiel silently took the flask from her.

"Hey! Give me that!" she shouted, and tried grabbing it, only to pitch forward unsteadily. Dropping the flask unceremoniously, Cas caught her, bracing her with strong hands, and she stared into his eyes, startled. His serious, apprehensive face was only inches from hers. She looked at his weird, flat lips and her stomach flopped, a strange sensation pitted in the bottom of it. She looked up at his eyes, thought she imagined it maybe, but saw his eyes flicker upward, like he'd been looking at her lips, too. His eyebrows were pressed together closely, turning upwards in a strange expression. She swallowed deeply, began to breathe heavily, getting really annoyed with Castiel, or maybe it was with herself. "Stop doing that," she growled, and tried pushing him, but he wouldn't budge. He looked her in the eye, vastly confused.

"Doing what?" he asked, sounding slightly frustrated with her.

"The…” she stared into his eyes dumbly, forgetting words—so, so blue. Was that even possible for them to be so blue? He was waiting for her to reply and she got flustered. "Uh," she blinked a couple times. "I don’t… know?" she answered honestly. She couldn't remember what she meant or what she was mad about, and the world was beginning to turn all kinds of strange angles and directions and her stomach was beginning to feel queasy. I overdid it. She couldn't quite manage to keep her head in one place, and felt like she might float apart into a bunch of pieces. She moaned in annoyance and flopped her head forward, knocking it against Cas's chest. With her wrists each gripped tightly by his hands, she was hopelessly stuck.

"Hey, what's going on?" Dean's gruff voice came, along with the sound of his boots against leaves. He stopped short, seeing Alex in Castiel's grip. "Cas? What are you doing?"

"Yes. Hello Dean. Sam." Castiel was distracted and seemed mildly exasperated as Sam came up behind Dean. He looked down at the back of Alex's head in something like chagrin. "Your sister is very intoxicated."

"No inn not," Alex insisted matter-of-factly, her head shooting up. She swayed a little in Cas's grip.

"Geez," Sam commented, and the brothers looked at each other in a mixture of annoyance and exasperation. "Sorry Cas, she's a sloppy drunk," Sam said apologetically, grabbing the forgotten flask up from where it had fallen and sniffing it, then immediately grimaced. "Uh—absinthe."

Dean threw his hands up. "What the hell, Alex?" he demanded. "You know how that crap makes you!"

"And she drank like half of it," Sam said, shaking his head.

Dean was aghast and chagrined. "I turn my back on you for two seconds and… look at you—you're completely shitface hammered!"
"No-o-oo—I'm—no-oot—!" Alex shouted in a weird cadence.

"Sure you're not," Dean said flatly, grabbing her from Cas by both arms.

She was further agitated by that and squirmed. "Lemme go!"

"Come on, Al, don't be like that," Dean tried, but she had pretty much lost any clarity she had.

"You're ugly and your voice is stupid dumb stupid!" she yelled, receiving an annoyed eye roll from Dean. She probably thought she was being really clever. Absinthe turned her into a raving lunatic.

"Ahh geez. It's been awhile since you've been this trashed," Dean commented wryly as her hand found its way into his face—she was trying to push him away ineffectively and Dean had to lean away before she poked his eye out or accidentally stuck a finger up his nose in her clumsy attempt. "Hey—uff—watch it!" he protested, struggling to subdue her.

"Get off me, because, I'm going to kill myself," she declared, squirming without stopping. "Kiiiiiiill myself!"

Castiel's expression went dark. "Alex, I can't allow you to do that."

"Oh my god," Sam was laughing now, maybe because that was all there was left to do. "Don't worry Cas," he said evenly, chagrinned amusement playing on his features. "Anything she says right now… just don't take it seriously."

"I'll do it, I will!" Alex was losing it, and fast. "And you'll be sorry, sorry, srrrrry..." she suddenly stopped and made a strange face. "I think I'm going to be sick, uuugh..." Dean let her go, and she stumbled a few steps and then fell forward, collapsing into a heap. She made more strange groans and then sobbed a couple times, declaring that everyone in the world hated her.

"Should we… help her somehow?" Cas asked as he looked down at her with a face screwed up in confusion and worry.

"How?" Dean asked, staring at his sister in almost embarrassment.

On the ground, Alex was trying to stand up, but rolled over onto her side, mumbling incoherently, then asking, "where are we?"

Dean covered half his face with a hand and shut his eyes, heaving a deep breath.

"This would be funny if it wasn't so pathetic," Sam said, looking at Dean for agreement. Dean just made a face.

Alex was groaning loudly, mumbling. "I wanna drive the empanda, no one ever lets me drive the impalana… ah…?"

Dean got an idea and turned to Castiel. "Cas buddy, I think I know how you can help."

That got the angel's attention. "How?" Cas asked, his frown deepening intently, like he was anxious to do so.

"Lay your hands on," Dean said. "Send her to la la land."

Cas didn't understand the reference. "Send her… where?"

"Cas, just lay her out!" Dean said, getting impatient. "Do your angel mumbo jumbo and put her to sleep so I don't have to put up with this crap! Cuz trust me, it'll go on all night."

"I'm not sure—" Cas started.

Dean was hauling Alex to her feet. "Lemme go lemme go, I'm dot nrunk," Alex slurred, pitching wildly in Dean's arms. Again, she tried to put her hands in his face.

"Mffbbhhhh!" Dean leaned his head back and manhandled his sister in his arms, trying to get her away from his face, turning her outward to face Cas. "Anytime now, Cas! Just do it!" Castiel hesitated, then complied and touched two fingers to her forehead. She went slack in Dean's arms.

"Thank you," Dean said, very relieved, to which Cas just gave him a grudging look.

"We'll hear about this in the morning," Sam said, sounding like he was already dreading it.

"If she can remember a damn thing," Dean pointed out.

"...True," Sam said, seeming to be encouraged by the idea.

Heaving a huge sigh, Dean nodded toward the Impala, which was parked back near the fire that was now dying down. "Help me shove her into the back seat."

Dean hooked his arms under Alex's armpits, and Sam got her feet. "Hey, Cas—" Dean turned to his left, where Castiel had been, but saw that the angel was gone. He looked around and saw him nowhere, frowned. "What the hell, man? Where'd he go?"

"Who knows," Sam said as they started toward the car.

"Great," Dean muttered sarcastically.

"You know, last time she got this wasted was when you died, Dean," Sam said, walking backwards and watching over his shoulder as they carried Alex's unconscious form.

"Yeah, well, I get why she's upset," Dean said. "But, I mean, really? Absinthe? I thought we all agreed she never needed to drink that crap again." He shook his head, aggravated. "That's just what I needed to end today with… Alex making this whole thing about herself."

They reached the car, Sam balancing Alex's feet awkwardly on his knee with one hand as he pried the car door open. He threw her legs onto the seat. "I don't think that's fair, Dean. I mean, we're all pretty upset about Adam, Dad… the whole nine."

Dean shoved the rest of her awkwardly into the back as Sam helped. "My point exactly. Why does she get to freak out about it on such a spectacularly insane level?"

They stood back. "Because, I dunno. Like you said to me earlier… I'm a lot like Dad, which is why we butted heads so much. You wanted to be like Dad, and Alex… she went back and forth, but mostly set herself up for disappointment with Dad. And Dad knew it." Sam looked pensive. "He knew how he let her down, how much he broke her heart. And he just held her further away for it so he didn't have to try." Sam had Dean's attention. "So this, about Adam, Dad's secret life… I know it's eating at her. Maybe more than it is us."

Dean looked mildly chastened, and covered it up with an impatient nod. "Yeah, well. Me too, Sammy." Dean held out his hand and made a 'give it here' motion. "Now gimme that flask."

Sam looked at Dean with mild suspicion. "To dump it out, right?"
Dean gave him a wan, deadpan look. "Don't be an idiot," he said, then when Sam gave him a look, he threw his hands up in the air. "Yes, to dump it out!"

Sam handed it over, and Dean turned it upside down, the green liquid pouring out onto the cold ground. Sam turned around to look down at his twin sister, who looked kind of like a rag doll, the way she had been haphazardly shoved into the back seat. Her dark hair was strewn across her face, some of it stuck in her half-open mouth.

Without thinking, Sam leaned down a little and brushed Alex's crazy, tangled hair back from her face, smiling down at her with fondness. Despite everything that had happened the past year, that was his twin sister Alex and there was no one else in the world who could replace her. Nothing could change the fact that he loved her, would die for her. Hell, he felt the same about Dean. Sam's hand hovered near her face and his smile faded. He pulled his hand away, troubled.

The past few days with Adam had been particularly hard on his brother and sister. Unlike Dean and Alex, Sam had never idolized Dad like that. He'd never invested all his hopes and dreams in the man or even really respected him that much. Maybe that's why he wasn't shocked to discover that Dad had been less than a saint. He didn't feel as torn up inside as Alex and Dean obviously did, he didn't feel blindsided or betrayed like they did. He closed the door of the Impala firmly then shoved his hands into his pockets and walked around the car to the passenger side. He only wished he knew how to tell his brother and sister about the demon blood. Even if he knew how to tell them, he was reminded that they would never understand or accept it. That was too much to hope for. And there were darker things too, inside. Things he would never tell anyone.

He checked his phone furtively before getting into the car. No missed calls, no texts. He was beginning to feel desperate. He needed more demon blood, and he knew it. Knew it, and hated it. He was starting to feel sick and shaky, short-tempered and unfocused. Where the hell was Ruby and why wouldn't she answer his calls?

Alex woke up and the instant her eyes cracked opened, she squeezed them shut again, groaning miserably. She was laid out on a bed in what she assumed was a motel room. Even though the room was dark and it was clearly still nighttime, the light coming from the bathroom was blinding. Her head was killing her. Her stomach was churning with nausea. Her mouth was dry, her vision was weird. She opened her eyes again slowly, sore all over and feeling intoxicated still. Dizzy. Gross. She looked down, peering at her feet. Her shoes were still on and everything. She tried to remember what happened last night—or was it tonight, still? Must still be tonight. She groggily swung her legs over the side of the bed and with some effort, got up and shuffled toward the light of the motel bathroom, her stomach pitching, threatening to empty itself any second. Sam stood there, clutching the sink rigidly with both hands, his head down like he was fighting sickness. She momentarily forgot herself and her illness ebbed away into concern.

"Sam? You okay?" Alex asked, and he shot up, turned around, his expression strange and startled. He looked sleep-deprived and wan, a little sallow. Was he ill?

Her twin attempted a smile to cover up his ill appearance and the slight scare she'd given him. "Yeah, yeah, just, uh, feeling kinda sick I guess. Headache. Stomach. No big deal." He looked at her with a studious frown. "What are you doing up, anyway? It's like three in the morning. I thought you'd be passed out for a couple weeks at least."

Alex tried to chuckle at Sam's little joke but grunted with a wince instead. "How much did I drink?"

Sam's face softened with a crooked smile as he chuckled. "I don't know if it was how much or if it Alex folded her hands over her stomach, queasy. Absinthe... the thorn in her side. "Never again," she vowed flatly.

"Do you remember anything?" Sam asked. There was the slightest little smile on his face.

Alex's eyes went off to the side and she thought hard, squinting again her pounding headache. She came up with nothing and shook her head. "That would be a negative."

Sam was hiding amusement. "Not even Cas holding your drunk ass up?"

Alex's eyes went wide. "What?"

Sam chuckled and teased her, his amused expression making Alex feel like she'd done some really embarrassing stuff. "Oh yeah," he said, enjoying the good-natured ribbing. "It was pretty great. He didn't know what to make of you like that."

Alex groaned and shut her eyes in mortification, put her face in her hand. "Sam—"

"Don't shoot the messenger," he told her with mild playfulness.

She gave him an unamused, sullen look. Hadn't she made an idiot of herself in front of Cas enough? She could only imagine what she'd done or said and was humiliated... even though she guessed if he'd watched over her as her guardian angel or whatever he'd seen her shitfaced before. But still.

Back in the dark motel room, bedsprings squeaked as Dean suddenly rolled over and sat up. "Hey, Thing One and Thing Two," he said, his voice scratchy from just waking up. "Cas just came for a visit. We gotta go." He flicked on the bedside table lamp and Alex squinted in response, held a hand up in front of her face.

"Wait, what? Cas came for a—what are you talking about?" Sam asked, watching as Dean grabbed up his keys from the bedside table.

"I dunno, man, all I know's he shows up in one of my dreams and said it was important and to hurry," Dean replied, shoving his feet into his shoes. "He wouldn't say what, just gave me an address. It's not far."

Alex was pitiful. "I'm still drunk and my head hurts."

Dean looked at her like he was ruefully thinking told you so. "Not my fault now is it, princess?" He asked, shrugging on his jacket and giving her a pointed look. "We'll get some aspirin into you and you'll be good as new. Now, come on." He paused, frowned. "I think Cas might be in trouble."

Underneath flickering lights in an old manufacturing plant, the Winchesters swept the darkness ahead with flashlights. The only sound was of buzzing, dying lights and the hunters' echoing footsteps. "You sure this is the place?" Sam asked, his voice a hushed whisper. Alex turned her head over her shoulder to briefly look behind them into the tunneling darkness.

Dean sounded terse. "Yeah. I'm sure."

"So where's Cas?" Sam asked, asking what they all wanted to know. Alex shined her flashlight to the side of the dim hallway they were following. A huge portion of the wall had crumbled away, like something big had hit it. Her stomach clenched with a strange feeling of dread. She vaguely remembered his face, lit softly by the glow of firelight as he crouched in front of her earlier that night. Hadn't he touched her arm? She thought he had.

"Here," Dean said, turning and leading them up a set of metal stairs, into more darkness. As they came to the a large, open area of the plant, all three of them were taken aback at what they found. "What the hell?" Dean muttered, throwing the beam of his flashlight across total wreckage—metal scaffolding had been torn asunder and was piled up like ribbons—torn electrical wires overhead and within snapped and popped, showering sparks down over the destruction at an uneven cadence.

"It looks like a bomb went off," Sam commented softly as they stole into the foreboding space and continued to look around, flashlights held high.

Obviously there had been some kind of knock-down drag-out fight here between really powerful beings but it was silent now and ominously so. Alex's heart and blood pressure were both elevating. Where was Cas? Had he done this? Or had it been done to him? Could angels be hurt or killed by each other? She was pretty sure the answer to that was yes. There was a small explosion as another wire burst and fizzled somewhere close to Alex, and she jumped away with a hand against her ear, startled by the abruptly loud sound. She steadied herself and skirted the edge of the twisted metal pileup, trying to see anyone or anything in it or near it. Her head was still killing.

Dean noticed something as he continued to sweep the darkness with his flashlight. "Check it out," he said, drifting toward a far concrete wall. On it, drawn in bright red blood that was still shining and wet: an angelic symbol like the one Anna had made to send Cas and Uriel away. "Look familiar?" he asked grimly.

Sam was behind him and came to his side, frowning deeply while Alex gave it a cursory glance from where she was. "So, what's that mean?" Sam asked. "Cas was fighting other angels?" He turned and looked around the wreckage again. "That doesn't make sense."

Alex's flashlight caught a glimpse of something that looked like beige clothing and her heart jumped in shocked recognition. "Guys!" She called her brothers, even as she stumbled over a twisted beam, ducked underneath another, then crouched down over Cas—he was laying on his back and a small metal pipe laid across his body. He looked unconscious, which was terrifying. Did angels even go unconscious? Alex didn't know. She was yanking the metal pipe off of him and smacking him lightly on the side of the face a couple times. "Cas?" She asked. No response. She heard her brothers coming up behind her. "Hey, Cas!" She smacked a little harder—and then Castiel's eyes flew open in an expression of sheer panic and he bolted upright to shove her away as if he didn't know her—startled, Alex fell back into Sam's legs and her twin reacted fast, caught her underneath the arms to keep her from falling back completely.

Cas recoiled—he'd backpedaled away from Alex and was half-laying half-sitting, looking at the three of them in shock. He seemed disoriented. "What's, what's going on?" He asked in a breathless, high voice. Overhead, more wires suddenly sent a snap of sparks raining down and in a strangely alien way Cas cringed and jumped as if he were scared. Alex, standing as Sam hauled her up, stared through wide eyes. What was wrong with him? He was sitting up and clutching at his chest, looking around in dismay and he didn't look anything like himself. "No, no…" he moaned, eyes huge and terrified, darting around as if in paranoia. Dean offered him a hand and Cas refused, stood up clumsily, backing away from them.

"Cas, you okay?" Sam asked urgently, and all three of the Winchesters stared as he stood and panted, obviously in severe distress.

"Castiel," he said, his voice high and hollow as he looked down at himself in sheer disbelief. "I'm not Castiel." He looked at them again, face slack. "It's me."
There was a stunned silence at his unexpected assertion. "Who's 'me'?!" Sam asked in a loud voice.

"Jimmy," he answered tightly, and when he said that, he seemed to calm a little. He swallowed and then spoke in a more even voice, as if the name gave him confidence. "My name's Jimmy. Jimmy Novak. I'm... I'm from Illinois. I have a wife, a daughter. I'm not who you're looking for."

It was like being hit with a ton of bricks. This was the man Castiel had been possessing. Jimmy. Alex could find no words at all.

"Where the hell is Castiel?" Dean asked suspiciously.

Jimmy shook his head, seeming to be at a loss but certain. "He's gone."

"Gone where?" Alex asked.

Jimmy shut his mouth and looked at her with a grim expression. "I dunno. Just gone."

"Okay... 'Jimmy.'" Dean paused. "Do you know who we are?"

The man who looked like Castiel but otherwise was obviously nothing like him at all nodded, his face expressive and drawn. "Yeah. Dean, Sam, Alex. I know who all of you are and—" he suddenly swayed sideways, almost fell down—Sam reacted fast and helped him stand. Jimmy grimaced, a hand against his stomach—which suddenly gave one of the loudest growls Alex had ever heard. The man looked close to passing out suddenly and he gave a soft moan of pain. "Uh. I need food. Bad."

---

Last Year

Jimmy Novak—taxpayer, always on time, faithful church tither—kept a quiet, proper life. He married his high school sweetheart Amelia when they were both eighteen. He believed in traditional family values. He didn't use profanity or drink in excess or gamble. He'd dedicated himself to a lifetime of faith in God. He lived humbly and devoutly. However, even though he had always followed the bible and done everything a good Christian should, there had always been a nagging feeling that there must be more for him, that God was calling him to deeper things.

Ask and it will be given to you; seek and you will find; knock and the door will be opened. Words from the book of Matthew that Jimmy clung to and kept in mind as he prayed for years that the Lord would use him for something truly meaningful. Maybe his prayers implied that Jimmy thought his life as a father and husband wasn't enough. But he loved his wife and daughter very much—more than anyone. Still, he was never able to shake the longing for greater things and always felt there should be more for him somehow—some grand calling or adventure. A grand purpose.

After over fifteen years of marriage, Jimmy's life was predictable and had a feeling of routine to it. The greater things he longed for never came. Only more of the same... a slow downward spiral into monotony and habit and routine. He was in a marriage that didn't inspire or fulfill him anymore, he worked a job that left him wanting. His daughter was the best thing in his life—his little girl, who wasn't so little anymore. She was approaching womanhood and in a few short years would leave for college. Jimmy wondered what would become of himself and Amelia when that happened. They'd been unable to conceive more children and Claire was the thing that held them together. Jimmy didn't believe in divorce and loved his wife deeply, but the spark was gone. It wasn't like they were miserable—they were friends and companions and were content enough, accepting of the way their relationship was quiet, dying embers instead of roaring flame like it used to be. They didn't fight much. Sometimes, Jimmy wished they would fight. It would mean the relationship was more alive if they'd fought.

On one night that was like all the others, Jimmy had fallen asleep in front of the television. His life changed forever when he was roused by a warm, whispering voice from Heaven. Castiel came to him the first time that evening, reaching across the divide of the corporeal and incorporeal, speaking to him in a voice that was so deafening and magnificent that Jimmy had been physically wounded. He didn't even remember the seizure, only his Amelia's frantic face above his when he regained consciousness. But Jimmy hadn't been panicked at all. He had smiled at Amelia and said he was all right. He'd felt such a peace and sense of purpose.

The angel spoke to him in dreams and in whispers as the months went on. He told Jimmy of great plans concerning God's will and purpose. Castiel told Jimmy that he was a servant of Heaven, that he wanted Jimmy to give himself over to divinity and answer the call, to let himself be used as a vessel of righteousness when the time came. And Jimmy had been eager, willing. So unaware of what it would actually be like.

On an unremarkable weeknight evening, Jimmy was preparing dinner unassumingly when Castiel's whispers lit up the quietness. The angel spoke to him and asked him to prove his faith. Wonderstruck, Jimmy did as the angel asked unquestioningly. Amelia walked in and dropped the bag she'd been carrying. Jimmy had his hand stuck down into the pot of boiling water on the stove and was staring at it, entranced.

"What the hell are you doing?!" Amelia had gasped, rushing over.

Jimmy held a hand out, smiling and trying to calm her down. "It's okay. I'm okay—look!" He drew his hand out of the raging hot water. He was unharmed and fine in every way. Unburned, untouched by harm.

Amelia hadn't looked amazed. Instead, she'd looked absolutely terrified. "W-what's wrong with you?"

Jimmy, unruffled, was still smiling, overwhelmed with amazement. "Nothing's wrong. He asked me to do it."

"Who asked you to do it?" Amelia asked, looking at the pot of boiling water with wild, scared eyes.

Euphoric, Jimmy stared at his hand, not noticing his wife's utter distress. "Castiel, to prove my faith. Look—I'm fine." He showed her his hand again, astounded at the smooth, unburned skin there.

"Who's Castiel?!" Amelia asked, growing more and more afraid by the second.

Jimmy smiled again, feeling lighter and more wonderful than he had in years. He had thought Amelia would share his wonder when he told her: "An angel."

"An angel?" She repeated. Her fear grew quieter and more deep.

Jimmy could barely notice. He was so amazed. Grinning, he swept her into his arms, elated and high on thoughts of restoration and repair within his life. He imagined everything as golden and bright and made of the things of Heaven. "It's a miracle, Amelia! A miracle!"

She stared back at him with eyes that were not overjoyed. Only petrified. And when Jimmy realized she was afraid of him and what he was saying, his tight hug loosened and faltered. His wife pushed him away as she stepped back. She was looking at him like she didn't know him. "No, it's not a miracle—" her voice trembled. She shook her head and swallowed, looking at the boiling water again. "I don't know how you did that b-but… this isn't normal."

Present Day

"This isn't normal," Dean Winchester said, staring at Jimmy in something like disgusted awe. "How many burgers are you gonna eat?"

Jimmy shamelessly shoved another burger into his mouth, ravenous. "I dunno." He didn't bother waiting until he'd stopped chewing to talk.

After going through a twenty-four-hour drive-thru and getting Jimmy a bag full of burgers after he insisted he could eat them all, the Winchesters had brought him back to their motel. It was still dark out, the middle of the night, and Jimmy was on his third burger with no signs of stopping. The three Winchesters were watching him with odd expressions. "When's the last time you ate?" Dean asked, flabbergasted by Jimmy's appetite.

Jimmy shook his head. "I don't know. Months." He took another huge bite and made appreciative sounds, thoroughly enjoying the fast food and not bothering to hide how into it he was. He took a noisy sip out of the straw in his cup and returned to his burger.

"All right, so what the hell happened back there?" Sam asked, interrupting Jimmy's concentration. "It looked like an angel battle royale."

Jimmy shook his head and shrugged. "All I remember is a flash of light and I, uh... I woke up and I was just, you know, like, me again."

"So, what?" Dean looked at him closely. "Cas just ditched out of your meat suit?"

Sitting across from him, arms crossed and feet propped straight out, Alex looked at him intently. "Do you remember anything about when he was possessing you?"

Jimmy looked at her with Castiel's eyes. He no longer wore the trench coat—just the suit and tie. "Yeah, bits and pieces," he answered cryptically. He watched her out of the corner of his eye for a minute as he chewed thoughtfully, and Alex fell silent, didn't ask anything else. She felt let down somehow… and worried. Where had Cas gone? Why would he just abandon ship out of nowhere? Did he not need his vessel anymore? If not, why? So many questions. Her head was pounding still and she felt sluggish from her fading state of drunkenness.

"I mean, having an angel inside you's like being chained to a comet," Jimmy said conversationally, working his jaw in between sentences. He was reflecting now and seemed a little uncomfortable at the memories. "I couldn't keep up."

Dean's eyebrows raised. "Sounds like fun."

Jimmy pulled a face, and even though he looked exactly like Cas, he managed to look like a completely different person in that moment. "Understatement." He took another huge bite.

"Cas said he wanted to tell us something," Sam said. "Please tell me you remember what it was."

Jimmy looked down, mild ruefulness playing on his face. He shook his head. "No, sorry."
"Well what do you know?" Dean asked.

Jimmy stopped eating, given pause by Dean's question. "I know who I am. Jimmy Novak. I'm from Pontiac Illinois." His face softened with something like pain. "I have a family." He was suddenly stricken and sitting back from the table, seeming stunned. "I need to see my family."

Dean stood up, his expression hard and thoughtful. "Hold that thought. Finish eating, okay?" He looked at Sam meaningfully, then jerked his head toward the door, indicating he wanted a word alone. "Sam, I need to talk to you."

Alex watched her brothers go and didn't move to follow. Other times she might have gotten up and trotted after, but that day she was too physically exhausted and mentally messed up. Anyway, she got the silent implication… stay and watch Jimmy. He didn't look like he was gonna bolt though. He had bucked up and was attacking a burger again hungrily, glancing at her a couple times without saying a thing. Alex sighed heavily and rubbed her forehead with a grimace. I hate absinthe. She remembered details from earlier now, a little bit anyway. Enough to make her want to kick herself in the ass. Alex settled back into her chair, resigned, and grabbed a bottle of pain killers out of the bag that was hanging off her chair. She took several and then fixed her eyes on Jimmy studiously. "So. You really don't remember anything?" She asked.

He looked at her over his burger, took a long beat to answer—long enough that it seemed like he was maybe trying to hide something. "Not really. Like I said, bits and pieces, weird snippets and stuff."

Alex nodded slowly, not convinced. "Right." Jimmy's gaze flickered away. He didn't look at her like Cas did, but it was every bit as disconcerting. "Why do you think he did that?" She asked. "Left all the sudden?"

Jimmy's chewing slowed and he stared down at the top of his burger bun, frowning a little. "You know, I gotta say, from what I remember, the guy's mind was, like, a constant tug of war. Back and forth, back and forth." He hesitated, thinking hard, clearly taxing himself mentally. "I can't remember why he left. I don't remember anything from today."

"But you remember stuff from other days?" Alex pressed.

His eyes darted up to hers. He seemed guarded. "Yeah, I mean… it's all a blur, okay? I'm exhausted." He drew in a breath, expelled it, cracked a tired grin. "It's just good to be by myself in here again. I was about to go insane." He grinned at her more widely and reached for his cup without looking and misjudged, knocked it over. It spilled and soda flooded the table. They both jumped up from their seats, trying to avoid getting wet.

"Aw crap," Jimmy muttered, brushing himself off then yanking his tie off and jacket, too, already unbuttoning his soda-stained shirt. "Can I borrow one of your brother's shirts?" he asked, pulling off his shirt completely. Alex was staring and didn't answer right away. Underneath the frumpy suit and trench coat, Castiel—no, Jimmy—was extremely and surprisingly toned—Alex was shocked, because the shapeless outfit he wore had hidden it well… the strong arms and shoulders, the smooth strong planes of his chest, the flat abs… the very alluring taper to his hip bones which disappeared beneath the belted slacks he wore. Alex swallowed. The room seemed extremely hot all of the sudden and she was uncomfortable.

He'd asked to borrow a shirt. She tore her eyes away from him, flustered. "Yeah, uh, there… bag's Dean. Uh, er, Dean's bag. Take whatever you want."

If he noticed her fumble, he didn't acknowledge it. Jimmy went to the bed where Dean's duffel sat, and dug through. He was oblivious to her stare. Alex watched him out of the corner of her eye, unable to help herself. His back was strong and defined, his shoulders broad. The dim light in the room created soft, dark shadows in all the dips and curves of his muscles. On his right shoulder blade, there was a large tattoo of a simple, stylized cross. She was surprised to see that there. She hadn't pictured him as the type for ink. As he turned around he caught her eye he seemed to know she'd been eyeing it. "Got it when I was nineteen," he explained with slight chagrin, pulling a new shirt on and buttoning it up. "Regretted getting it ever since. Craziest thing I ever did."

"A tattoo?" Alex asked, cracking a grin. No way was that true. "A tattoo was the craziest thing you ever did?"

Jimmy shrugged modestly. "Yeah. I'm a straight and narrow kinda guy, I guess." There was a twinge of something in his voice that made intrigue come over Alex.

"Nothing wrong with the pious life, if it's your thing," she said, examining him for a reaction. When she couldn't tell, she prompted him. "Is it?"

Jimmy finished buttoning his shirt and took a moment, thinking, then shook his head uncertainty. "I don't know anymore. All I know is… I've been gone from my family for almost a year." His regretful tone gave Alex somber pause.

She tried not to encourage an angsty environment and grabbed some napkins from out of the bag of burgers and started to sop up the soda from off the table as she watched Jimmy pick his tie back up and put it back on. She glanced at him as she cleaned. "Did your family know? About you and Cas's… living arrangement?"

Jimmy went still. "No. To them I'm sure I just disappeared one night." He looked conflicted and slightly afraid and said nothing more. There was a deep guilt to his words and posture, and fear. A lot of fear. He returned to slowly buttoning his shirt up, but his mind seemed a thousand miles away.

Alex understood why he was worried and freaked. What if he went back and then his family was gone or had moved on? She hadn't really thought about it much before, how the body Castiel had used was a real person with a real life, a man named Jimmy Novak. Maybe she hadn't wanted to think about it either. But now she was being forced to think about it and face it. Honestly she was a little ashamed of herself for forgetting. Castiel wasn't human like her. Jimmy was. And Jimmy wasn't Cas.

"Lemme help. I'm sorry. I'm clumsy." Jimmy had shrugged his jacket back on and started helping get the puddle of soda off the table without being asked. Alex watched Jimmy in a tense sadness. He crouched and dabbed at the spot on the floor where soda had drizzled, oblivious to her strange gaze. Alex wasn't sure what to think. He looked just like Cas, but it wasn't him. His mannerisms, his voice, the way he stood, the way he walked… everything was different. It forced Alex to confront reality: Cas had hijacked some guy's body, used it to walk the earth. Those blue eyes that had sent her stomach flip-flopping around when they'd looked at her with such intense curiosity? Jimmy's. The clothing she'd come to identify as Castiel? Jimmy's. The voice Castiel had used to speak to her with? Jimmy's. She understood all of that but she couldn't quite separate the angel from the man in her mind completely.

Even so, staring at Jimmy as he dabbed napkins at the soda-splattered carpet… she almost felt like she'd lost something. Someone. Alex got angry with herself pretty quickly. She had no right to feel that way. She headed to the trash can beside the door with her dripping napkins and threw them in hard. Right after she did that, the door swung open and Dean and Sam came back in.
"All right Jimbo," Dean said, crossing his arms. "So jury's in. You can't go home."

Jimmy stood up, shock on his face. "What?" He quickly became indignant as he set the wet napkins down. He walked straight up to Dean. "The hell're you talking about, I can't go home?"

Dean shrugged as Sam took a seat at the kitchen table and watched quietly. "There's a good chance you have a bullseye on your back," Dean said. Alex looked at Sam for explanation and her twin just shrugged slightly. Tell you later, he seemed to silently communicate to her.

"What?" Jimmy looked and sounded like he'd never heard anything crazier in his life. "From who?"

Dean's mouth hardened a little. "Demons."

"Come on, that's crazy," Jimmy said, almost rolling his eyes. "What do they want with me?"

Dean shook his head. "I don't know, information, maybe?"

Jimmy was obstinate and expressive. His voice rose in pitch. "I don't know anything!"

Dean visibly forced himself not to lose his temper but raised his voice a little too. "I know, but—"

"Look, I'm done, okay?" Jimmy was quickly getting agitated. "With demons, angels, Castiel's friggin' endless angst and confusion—all of it! I just wanna go home."

"We understand," Dean started, but was once again cut off.

"I don't think that you do understand!" Jimmy's voice was quickening with impassioned certainty. "I've been shot and stabbed and healed; my body's been dragged all over the earth. He used me and took me away from my life, my family. I thought I wanted this but I don't. By some miracle I'm out… and I am done. I've given enough, okay?"

Sam stood up and kept his voice firm and commanding. "Look, all we're saying is that until we figure this out, the safest place is with us."

Jimmy's jaw worked tensely and he cast a glance beside himself as a muscle jerked in his cheek. He was considering it. "How long?" He asked brusquely, glaring at Sam.

Sam hesitated. "We'll cross that bridge when we get to it."

Before Sam had even finished speaking, Jimmy shook his head hard, obviously not going for that. He brushed past Dean, heading for the door with fast steps. Sam moved to stop him, blocking his path. "Where you think you're going?" Dean asked mildly, turning around casually, arms crossed.

Jimmy whirled indignantly. "To see my wife and daughter, okay?" He turned and tried to get past Sam, who held him by an arm, forcing him to stay.

"No, you're not." Sam wasn't rough by any means, but there was a warning nature to his stance and tone. "You're just going to put those people in danger."

Jimmy stared at Sam incredulously, then glanced briefly at Alex as if he couldn't believe this. "So, what, now I'm a prisoner?"

Sam was rueful but assertive. "Harsh way to put it."

"How about guest of honor?" Dean quipped from further back in the room where he stood with crossed arms. He cracked a wiseass little smile. "Just can't stand to see you go."

Jimmy looked at him balefully. "You have no right to keep me here."

Dean chuckled and sauntered forward. "When have rights stopped me? You're staying."

Jimmy looked around, realizing he was outnumbered and outmuscled. As if in a desperate last attempt, he looked at Alex, who had been silently observing from beside the door. "Alex? You're gonna go along with this? It's kidnapping."

That earned a self-deprecating smile from her. "Jimmy… you know who you're talking to, right? We break like ten laws per hour on a good day." Jimmy didn't appreciate her attempt at humor and Alex softened, sympathizing with him. "Call it what you will but they're right." She came to stand beside her twin. "I mean, think about it. You were a vessel for an angel. Is it really so crazy to think demons might wanna get their claws in you or your family?"

Jimmy was highly unhappy and let them all know with the dark look he gave them. "This is jacked up," he said with something close to a scowl as he crossed his arms and pressed his lips down into a hard line. Full of bad attitude, he looked at Dean contemptuously. "Can I at least get some air?"

Dean gave a single little heh sound, obviously thinking it was funny that Jimmy thought they would go for that. "I don't think so," he said, further infuriating Jimmy. "Look, come morning, we'll figure something out. For now… no one leaves this room." Dean swept the room's occupants with a commanding gaze, daring any of them to go against what he said. Satisfied, Dean nodded. "Now. I'm gonna take a shower."

He grabbed his things and shut himself into the bathroom without any further delay.

Jimmy shook his head, surly and bad-tempered as he backed away from Sam, who still blocked the way out. "I need to see them," he said, pacing the room restlessly. "They probably think I'm dead."

He talked using his hands, gesturing erratically and then jamming fingers through his dark hair. "Not yet, Jimmy," Sam said. His tone wasn't exactly rude, but it wasn't the kindest voice he used, either. He sounded sort of inconvenienced. "Just don't think about it."

Jimmy looked like he'd been slapped in the face and he suddenly confronted Sam physically. "Don't think about it?!"

"Hey you two." Alex, over by the table now, gave them both pointed looks, silently telling them to cut it out fast. "Come on." Jimmy took a beat, then stepped away from Sam, looking mad enough to piss. Alex picked up the bag of burgers, trying to distract him maybe. "Want any more of these?"

"No." Jimmy shot her a dark look. "I lost my appetite."

Sam scoffed loudly and rolled his eyes insensitively. Alex gave him a weird look. His temper seemed short for some reason—maybe because he still felt sick?—either way, he really wasn't helping. At all. Jimmy sent Sam an evil eye and Alex attempted to diffuse the situation with humor. She cracked a disarming grin and pulled a face. "Hey, don't pay Samantha any attention. It's his time of the month."

Unexpectedly, Jimmy smiled just slightly at the dig aimed at Sam. He saw the way Alex's face changed when he smiled like that. His expression faded. "What?" He asked, frowning a little.

Alex shook her head, shrugged, hid her true feelings. "Nothing." What was she really thinking? That this man in front of her wasn't Castiel in any way. That she wanted to know where her guardian angel had gone. That she needed to know why she almost seemed to miss him. It didn't seem fair. They'd just become friends after a rocky start. He was a mystery and he intrigued her, this angel who had given her voice back to her out of compassion. Was it over? Was Cas gone for good? It was weird, too, because even though this was the exact same body Cas had used, she couldn't imagine kissing him. She'd pictured kissing Cas one night, out of nowhere. And she couldn't picture kissing Jimmy.

"So which bed?" Jimmy asked.

"What?" Alex asked, confused as she came out of her far-away thoughts.

"Which bed should I sleep in?"

Oh. Alex looked at the beds—two doubles—and shrugged. "Uh… take your pick," she said, her mind on other things. " Doesn't matter to me."

Jimmy chose randomly, walked over to one of the beds and sat down on it, looked up at Alex and then Sam sadly. "I wish you people would just let me go," he said brokenly. "I need to see them." He looked so stricken and heartbroken that Alex had to look down, guilty for her part in it. She looked to Sam, who usually consoled the Sad People they ran into. But Sam just glanced back at her with a look like what? on his face. He looked like he had a headache or something. Maybe he was just tired. It was the middle of the night.

Either way, she was gonna have to do it. And by it, she meant talking to a Sad Person. Alex cleared her throat and fixed Jimmy with a caring look she'd seen Sam give others. " You need to keep them safe." She paused. " That's what you're doing by staying away, all right?" She stuck her tongue out just a little to wet her lips. Saying the facts had been easy. Now what? How could she get him to lighten up? She decided, a little selfishly, to do a bit of fact-finding. Maybe he would feel better if he went down memory lane, anyway. "Why don't you tell us a little about them?" She asked, hoping it was the right thing to say to him in that moment. " What's your wife's name? Your daughter?"

Jimmy's face changed and he went somewhere very far away in his mind. " Amelia," he said softly. " Amelia's my wife. Claire's my daughter. She'll be twelve now. I missed her birthday."

There was a hollowness to his voice, like he didn't know what to think about himself. He looked down and clasped his hands together between his knees, deeply pensive. " I can't believe I left. I thought… I thought I was doing the right thing, you know?" He laughed softly, a sound without any lightness. " I was no one before this. I… sold ad time on A.M. radio. Married my high school sweetheart. Got a house, a mortgage. Went to church every Sunday. I've never been anything but painfully normal and it used to be okay with me. But the last few years… " he shook his head dejectedly. " Life felt stale, I dunno. I just was at my wit's end when Cas came to me. " His eyes dodged looking at either Sam or Alex. " I guess maybe I wanted to be special like Cas said I could be. But man. It's… special's overrated. I think I ruined my life." He heaved a tired expulsion of breath and put a hand on his face. He looked like he hadn't slept in years.

Alex realized that maybe talking was only going to make things worse and tried a different tactic. " Hey, come on. You need some rest I think." She smiled slightly, feeling how exhausted and hungover she was. " I know I do. Everything'll look better in the morning."

A bittersweet expression crossed Jimmy's face and it looked like he were almost trying to hold back tears. " My wife used to say that. " With that, Jimmy crawled into the bed, shoes and all, and pulled the covers up to his neck, rolled over and went quiet.

Sam came up to stand beside Alex, who silently watched the Jimmy-shaped lump. Her twin looked over and down at her then motioned to the other bed. "Go ahead. Get some shut eye. Sleep off the green fairy." His crack about absinthe got a pointed look from her. He aimed a half-hearted little grim at her.

Alex peered up at her twin, really studying him. He looked paler than normal. His lips weren't their normal rosy hue. "You sure you're all right, Sam? You look sick."

He dodged her concerned gaze. "Fine." Sam said shortly, seeming faintly annoyed. He motioned at the bed again. "Go on. Crash. I've got this."

"I need something out of the car," Alex lied decisively, then grabbed her jacket, yanked it on then headed out into the night as she pulled the jacket around her tightly.

Out in the parking lot she looked around into the surrounding darkness then, with arms around herself to keep warm, she looked upwards to the stars. "Hey, Cas?" She kept her voice just above a whisper, and her breath made little white clouds in the cold, sharp air. Underneath the canopy of night, she was aware of how small she was and how vast the universe. "Where'd you go?" No reply came and Alex's eyes flickered back and forth over the pinpricks of distant galaxies and stars. She tried to think of what to say. Could Castiel even hear her wherever he'd gone? It would just be nice to know why he left and if he was okay. She thought out loud. "I... just don't know why you'd disappear like that. We're worried." She paused. Were Sam and Dean worried? She corrected herself: "I'm worried." Hearing how vulnerable she sounded, she toughened her tone and put on a harder face. "So if you could get your ass back here somehow... that'd be great." She waited a wasn't the way to end a prayer. A little sullen she tried, "Amen." She didn't like that either and gave a huffing sigh at herself. "Over and out." She rolled her eyes at herself then slunk back toward the motel.

When she went back into the warmth of the room, Sam looked at her, observing how she had nothing with her—his eyes narrowed slightly. "Find what you were looking for?"

Alex was on her way to the empty bed and not in the mood for any more conversation. "No. I didn't."

She fell into bed without removing her shoes or jacket and turned her face away from Sam. Even though her mind was spinning with confusion and too many thoughts to number, she quickly dropped off into an exhausted sleep. She didn't feel when Dean flopped down beside her. Didn't hear when he started to snore. Didn't wake when Sam slipped out of the room. Didn't hear when Jimmy snuck out and made his escape, either.

---

Last Year

"Take the pills." Amelia stood in front of Jimmy in their living room and extended the orange prescription bottle out to him. It was nearing ten at night.

In a shirt and pajama bottoms, Jimmy sat on the couch, which had become his bed in more recent times. "I'm not sick."

Amelia thrust the bottle out, spoke a little more intensely. Tears rolled out of her eyes and she struggled to maintain composure. "Jimmy, take the pills."

"I don't need them, Amelia." He paused and then spoke softly, certainly, holding her gaze the whole time. "I know that this is hard to understand, but he chose me. I'm not crazy."
Amelia hid her reaction, but not well enough that Jimmy missed it. He saw how she doubted. How she believed he was losing his mind. "Who, Castiel, the angel?" She asked softly. When Jimmy nodded shallowly, his wife's outward calm began to crumble. "Jimmy—he's not real. How many times do we have to go over this? Now just take the pills, please."

Jimmy looked at her sadly. "He's spoken to me now, Ames, a dozen times. Shown me miracles." Amelia struggled, looked upward and dashed her hand across her tear-stained cheek. Jimmy leaned forward a little. "Hey, you believe in God, don't you?"

"What kind of question is that?" She tried smiling through her upset. "Of course, but—"

"And angels?"

"Yes, Jimmy, but I—"

"So, why is it then so hard for you to believe that they're talking to me?" He asked, truly wishing she would have faith in this with him.

Amelia began to pace, using the pill bottle to gesture erratically. Jimmy could see how she was fighting not to lose her temper with him. "B-because… okay, maybe angels are real, but what would they want you for?" The anger came out, as it always did. "Jimmy, you sell ad time for the radio! You can barely keep up with taking care of the house and helping me with Claire, what would angels need you for?"

Her words stung him. "He said that I'm special. It's in my blood."

Wordless for a second, Amelia laughed in a huff of air, her face working oddly. "What does that mean, it's in your blood? Jimmy… do you hear what you're saying to me? Just admit you're having a mid-life crisis and take the damn pills."

He was getting shorter on patience and looked at the pill bottle with contempt. "I don't need pills," he said flatly, trying to make her understand. He looked at her appealingly. "Castiel said that God has chosen me for a higher purpose."

Amelia's voice was strained and her face twisted into an expression of near-disgust. "To do what?"

Jimmy smiled faintly, a slight instance of pride and excitement running over him. "God's will. Not really my place to question it." His wife's face looked sad and empty and Jimmy sighed, scooting back to make a place for her to sit beside him. "Hey, come here," he urged gently, and she did as he asked, sitting beside him and turning a little to face him. He took the pills out of her hands and set them aside so that he could hold her hands gently. "This is a blessing," he told her. "This is the most important thing that ever happened to me."

Amelia's face was unreadable and slack, like she had turned off her emotions. "I thought we were the most important things to ever happen to you." Her soft words struck Jimmy hard and he was momentarily silent. Amelia shook her head and looked around their living room vapidly, her expression strange. "Jimmy, this marriage isn't working anymore," she said faintly, and again, he was hit hard by what he knew they both realized but had never acknowledged. Amelia looked at him with pained eyes. "We barely talk except in passing, we never spend time together anymore." She looked at him with veiled bitterness, her voice lowering into a whisper, in case Claire was in earshot. "And I mean, we haven't had sex in months. Months. I know things have been stale between us for awhile and I know we said we'd try but… is this angel stuff you trying to be the man I've been asking you to be? This isn't what I had in mind."
Her words hurt him deeply. Had she said them to him before Castiel, Jimmy would have been devastated completely. But he had hope because of the angel. "Amelia." He said her name sadly. "Have faith. I know things have been hard for us since you lost the baby last year, but... God works all things to the good of those who love him. I'm not depressed like I was. Castiel is giving me faith." He grasped her hands with renewed fervor, trying to show her how eager he was to see God work in their life. He felt that their marriage, home and faith would be restored. "Our lives will change because of him, Amelia! We can still make this work."

Amelia's hands were slack in his. Unenthusiastic. "I'm just... wondering if I even want to make it work," she admitted quietly.

Jimmy's grip loosened in utter shock as he stared at her in completely caught of guard surprise. "Amelia—we don't believe in divorce," he protested, hurt by her implication and aghast because he would never have imagined she would even imply that she would leave him. Their marriage vows had been forever.

Amelia shook her head, ashamed tears glittering in her eyes. "I know, but... but Jimmy." Her voice dropped to a weak whisper. "You're scaring me. You're scaring your daughter. You are not the man I married."

"Maybe not." Jimmy kept himself gentle and tender with her, clinging to Castiel's promises. All was not lost. "Maybe I'm better than the man you married, or about to be. Don't you see, Amelia? I've been chosen to do God's work! And you're part of it!"

"How?" she asked. She was pulling away from him more and more.

Jimmy thought, and then summoned the first bible verse that he thought would convey himself best to Amelia. A verse that he felt said a wife should trust her husband. "Titus two verse five. 'Wives should submit to their husbands, that the Lord may be honored.'"

Amelia—who had led bible studies and stood by his side in church every Sunday, became cold. She looked at him with dire meaningfulness. "If you won't take your pills and if you won't get help..." she trailed off, swallowing with a dread-filled expression. "Then I'm going to take Claire to my mother's in the morning. Don't quote the bible at me, Jimmy. You're taking this too far. I can't be married to someone who's living in a fantasy world. Please. Just take—the—pills."

She abruptly got up and walked away from him more and more.

Jimmy thought, and then summoned the first bible verse that he thought would convey himself best to Amelia. A verse that he felt said a wife should trust her husband. "Titus two verse five. 'Wives should submit to their husbands, that the Lord may be honored.'"

Amelia—who had led bible studies and stood by his side in church every Sunday, became cold. She looked at him with dire meaningfulness. "If you won't take your pills and if you won't get help..." she trailed off, swallowing with a dread-filled expression. "Then I'm going to take Claire to my mother's in the morning. Don't quote the bible at me, Jimmy. You're taking this too far. I can't be married to someone who's living in a fantasy world. Please. Just take—the—pills."

She abruptly got up and walked away from him, going upstairs and leaving Jimmy alone with his thoughts and confusion. Would she really leave him? Would she truly take his daughter away over this? Why wouldn't she believe? He would have to help her believe. Jimmy decided that night it was time to take action. He dressed slowly and methodically in what he always wore to work. Black slacks, a white dress shirt. He picked out a blue tie. The one Claire bought for him for Father's Day, the one she loved to see him wear. He shrugged on a black suit jacket, then over that, he swept on his beige trench coat. It would be cold outside. He gave himself a final look over in the mirror, not knowing how much his life was about to change. And then into the cold winter night he went.

He stood there in front of his house and looked up to the sky, called out to Castiel for help. His breath made vapor in the icy air, and for a moment, there was no reply. And then gentle, warm light shone down on him from up above and Jimmy looked up into it, hearing the rich, melodious voice of the angel Castiel. It was calming, this angel's presence.

Castiel told Jimmy many things. That God would be pleased with his servitude, that Jimmy would be revered among men. That the Novak family would be kept safe and be given rest in paradise when their long lives were finished. But Castiel also said that Jimmy would need to give much and for a time would be taken from his life. Jimmy didn't understand how long that would be—and he was so enraptured with the thought of serving God in such an important mission that he accepted. Said the word that promised his end. "Yes."

Present Day

Jimmy stared out of the bus window broodingly as the miles passed. He'd escaped from the Winchesters hours and hours ago and now he was just a couple hours away from being home. If Amelia even lived there anymore. What would he find? His stomach twisted itself into sickened knots over and over again. Would Amelia forgive him? How could he even begin to explain it to her… or Claire, for that matter? How was it that his relentless faith had left his life a shattered wreck? He had always thought that God would reward him with good things for his faithfulness. Not… not this.

Seated next to him a small, elderly woman was clasping a rosary and praying quietly. Jimmy looked at her sidelong, pitying her and fearing for her all at once. Which was worse…? An unanswered prayer or an answered one? He didn't know.

He returned his gaze to the window just in time to see a passing church sign that said Seven Days Without Prayer Makes One Weak. Disillusion settled over Jimmy with finality. After the past year, he didn't know who he was anymore. He believed in God and angels but wanted to be very far away from both right now. He had thought it would be different, being the vessel for an angel. He should have known better maybe… after all, he knew the bible and knew how brutal angels were in some passages. Still he'd believed, maybe because of modern myth and art, that angels were creatures of beatitude and kindness, gentleness. And while Jimmy knew from personal experience that Castiel had an inherently gentle and curious spirit, he also had a fierce and vengeful side—the angel was a magnificent blazing light made of ancient things beyond human comprehension. That's why Jimmy was running. It was too much, too much. Oddly enough, all he could think about was the mundane life he'd been so dissatisfied with before.

Jimmy reflected on the moment that Castiel had taken over his body, mind, and soul that winter night a year ago. It came over him like a downpour. The light had blinded Jimmy, and when it was gone, he wasn't himself anymore. His body had been filled with impossible wonder and glory, celestial power and divine purpose. Castiel had looked down and flexed his hand, gazed at it in wonder as he took in the feeling of being in a human body. Jimmy, slowly sinking down into a docile and quiet place somewhere deep inside, had heard a name—the first audible thought he heard from Castiel. Alex. Oh how familiar he would grow with this name and the face that went with it. Jimmy's mind conjured images of bright hazel eyes and the half-hidden smile she so often gave. Castiel had been very curious about her. Was curious the right word?

Alex Winchester… a twenty-something woman with dark hair, youthful features, and eyes that carried a strikingly pensive weight to them. Memories and images of her were what stuck out in Jimmy's mind the most about his time hosting Castiel—perhaps because watching her was what Castiel had done with every moment not dedicated to battle or Heaven. That, and Castiel's guard hadn't been raised as high when he watched her—and this, therefore, allowed Jimmy to see it better.

Castiel had observed this girl in every sense of the word, but he'd done so with a notably childlike innocence and naivety as he endeavored to understand her and the things she did. Things like laundry, cleaning guns, sharpening knives, sitting around doing nothing, arguing with her brothers. Writing in her father's old journal. Absently rubbing the ends of her hair between her fingers. Picking the meatballs out of her spaghetti and the pepperoni off her pizza. Chewing on the inside of her mouth and wiggling her jaw back and forth without realizing it when she was in deep thought. She was very often in deep thought.

Jimmy was a little uncomfortable thinking about these things because they seemed personal or intimate almost. Not the memories so much—they were nothing scandalous or remarkable—it was the way Castiel felt about the memories and about her. The angel was endeared to the youngest Winchester in a way Jimmy didn't quite know how to explain. He'd never felt the way Castiel felt about Alex toward anyone in his life. It was strong, whatever it was.

Jimmy's eyes flickered upward to the blue mid-day sky. Castiel was out there, somewhere. Gone for reasons unknown. Why? Would he come back, asking Jimmy for more? If he did, the answer would be no.

Jimmy Novak had given enough.

The Winchesters were headed to Illinois, hopefully right on Jimmy's heels—after Sam had 'gone out for a Coke' in the middle of the night and given Jimmy a chance to run, they'd been left little choice but to try and follow him. It wasn't safe for him to go back to his family, which was exactly where he'd go.

In the back seat as usual, Alex was slumped against the window, her cheek pressed against the chilled glass as she stared unseeingly, tiredly, out the window. She was hungover as hell and the aspirin and coffee still wasn't helping. In the front, Dean was quiet and focused, Sam was silent and decidedly bitchy. He still looked sickish but refused medicine and insisted he was fine. Alex pulled the top off her coffee cup to blow on the hot liquid it a little.

Out of thin air, someone abruptly appeared right next to her. "Hey, guys."

At the same time, several things happened. Dean let out an explanation of "Aah jeez!" and swerved the car into the other lane. Sam jerked in the front seat and let out a little sound of surprise. Alex jumped away and coffee flew out all over Anna, who blinked and spit a little of the hot brown liquid out without missing a beat.

"Smooth, guys," she commented wryly, even as a car whizzed by and honked at them.

"You ever try calling ahead?" Dean asked gruffly, gripping the wheel tight and glaring slightly back at her in the rear view.

"I like the element of surprise," the red-headed angel wisecracked. The coffee that had spilled on her was magically gone.

"Surprise?" Alex asked, sticking the lid back on her coffee and thanking her lucky stars that none of it got onto the Impala's upholstery. "You almost gave me a heart attack!"

Anna seemed to have more pressing matters on her mind. "You let Jimmy get away?" She was looking at Dean.

"Talk to ginormo here," Dean said, nodding toward Sam.

Anna leaned forward a little and her expression shifted slightly. "Sam. You seem... different."

Alex's interest was heightened, especially when Sam acted a little too unassuming. "Me? I don't know." He flashed an attempt at an everything's fine smile. "A haircut?"
Anna's expression was unreadable. "That's not what I'm talking about." She let her gaze go to Dean. "So, what'd Jimmy tell you? He remember anything?"

"Why? What's going on?"

"It's Cas," Anna said. "He got sent back home. Well, more like dragged back."

"Dragged?" Alex asked, feeling worried at that word choice of Anna's. "That doesn't sound good."

"It's not," Anna said, looking at Alex with a very tense, meaningful expression. "It's a very bad thing. Painfully, awfully bad. He must have seriously pissed someone off."

"What?" Alex asked, eyes going a little wider. Cas? He pissed someone off and got in trouble? "How?"

Anna's mouth drew into a thin line. "I don't know. The last time I spoke with him, he was struggling badly."

The more Anna said, the lower and lower Alex's stomach sank. "Struggling with what?"

Anna's eyes locked onto Alex's. "Everything."

It was strange… Alex felt her head shaking no hollowly without even realizing she was doing it. He was struggling? Empathy and concern had risen in her like rockets, shooting off silently. She remembered the last time she'd seen Cas he'd been trying to help her (she thought—the details were still a little blurry because of the absinthe). The worst thought that suddenly came to her was what if she had something to do with him being in trouble?

"Listen, Cas said he had something to tell me," Dean said in the front seat, drawing Anna's attention even as Alex stared at the back of Sam's seat unseeingly. "Something important. Jimmy said he didn't know what it was, and Cas never got the chance to tell me before he left."

"Well whatever it is, it's huge," Anna said, her voice commanding and authoritative. "You gotta find out for sure. You shouldn't have let Jimmy go in the first place." She set her face grimly. "He's probably dead already."

"What about Cas?" Alex asked, trying to curb the anxiety out of her voice. "Do you know if he's okay? Will he come back?"

Anna thought deeply for a beat, shaking her head a little, like she didn't know. "Hard to say." She looked up suddenly and without ceremony announced, "I gotta go." And just like she'd appeared, she was gone.

The car fell into silence again. Coffee forgotten, Alex's eyes shot to the back of her oldest brother's head. Her voice was low and soft but urgent. "Drive faster, Dean."

Amelia Novak's life had always been stable and comfortable, predictable. The daughter of a husband-wife dentist team, Amelia been raised as an only child in a traditional household that valued church, family, and helping others. She'd always been reserved and modest, a little on the shy side. Jimmy, the class clown and nice-guy had caught her eye in middle school. He'd been her first love. Her first everything. Her parents hadn't been thrilled when Amelia and Jimmy announced they were going to get married straight out of high school, but at the time the two of them had been in love and too eager for the future to listen to anyone who had anything negative to say.
People whispered that they wouldn’t make it, but nearly fifteen years of marriage proved the naysayers wrong. Until what happened last year. Sure, Amelia had noticed their relationship growing staler and less exciting than it had been. All marriages ended up like that, she’d thought. Jimmy loved her even if they weren’t passionate and close anymore, and she’d been all right with that. He was a good father over all else, and Amelia valued that highly. But then when he’d started showing signs of depression and withdrawal, things had changed. He’d started imagining things—that angels were talking to him, that God wanted him for some kind of work. Amelia had been so scared to see her normally docile and totally predictable husband begin to get zany, believing the delusions he kept spouting. And then came the night when Jimmy disappeared. After searching for him for weeks and realizing he wasn’t coming back, police closed the case and Amelia was forced to go back to work as an office manager. No longer a stay-at-home mom, Amelia had truly been tested by fire—juggling bills, motherhood, taking care of the house and trying to understand what had happened.

And Claire had struggled, too. Began to do things that frightened Amelia. Claire claimed to have seen her father disappear into thin air, claimed she’d seen a bright light over him and how he’d said he wasn’t her father. Sometimes Amelia found drawings Claire made of Jimmy, in a trench coat, glowing with yellow light. Counseling, therapy, medicine… Amelia had made sure Claire got all of it. It had been an impossible year. Night after night Amelia had cried herself to sleep, terrified of the bill coming due the next day, half-crazed from the despair of such a suddenly turbulent life. Her parents had been lifesavers… lending money and time, helping Amelia keep the house and her mind both.

Things were finally beginning to normalize. Amelia was getting a grip on the new normal, and Claire was finally getting good grades again at school. It was beginning to feel do-able. She accepted this new life as a single mother and widower. And then one day, out of nowhere, the doorbell rang. And the person who she opened the door to was a man who, for a moment, she thought was a ghost. On his face, wretched emotions and terrified hope. Amelia had almost passed out to see the husband she thought she’d never see again within arm’s reach. The next few minutes… a total blur.

When Claire came downstairs and peeked around the staircase banister railing, curious to see who that was in the living room with her mother… Amelia regained some clarity. Before the twelve-year-old girl could see that the man her mother was speaking to was her father, Amelia dismissed her with a voice full of motherly command. "Claire. Room. Now."

Jimmy turned his head to see just the back of his daughter's blonde head as she obeyed and went back up the stairs. "Can I see her?" Jimmy asked softly, heartbreak filling his voice. He implored Amelia with his eyes—eyes that shone with tears.

With a tear streaked face, Amelia shook her head. "No. No." She looked down, feeling out of answers. "I don't know yet." They sat in separate chairs. Jimmy was leaned down over his knees with slumped shoulders and tensely clasped hands. The silence was deafening. What was Amelia supposed to even say? "It's been a year, Jimmy."

He nodded, staring at the ground. "I know, I know."

"Where'd you go?" Amelia asked softly, her voice betraying her confused and painful feelings. "I told her you were dead. She thinks you're dead somewhere. She's just now getting back to herself again." There was anger in her voice. Anger that she reigned in and softened. "Don't you think your daughter would have wanted to know you were okay?"

Jimmy looked at her with a strained expression. "I was… I was in a psych clinic. I just wanted to get myself straight before seeing you."

Bitterness played on Amelia's voice. "And no telephones, or—"

Her husband's face contorted. "No, I know. You're right. I'm—" he drew in a deep breath, let it out heavily, pain making his voice tight and quiet. "I'm so sorry." His apologies couldn't take away the sleepless nights or the things Claire had gone through or the pain and confusion Amelia had lived with the past year. Still, he tried to act like it was going to be all right. Like him being back was the answer. "But it's all—it's all over now. I mean, I'm—I'm really okay."

Really okay? She wasn't sure if she believed him. Not after how he'd acted there near the end. The angel stuff, the sticking his hand in boiling water and open flame, the standing on the edge of their roof and saying he couldn't be hurt... and maybe he was okay now, but she wasn't, and neither was their daughter. "Well that must be nice for you," she said coldly, hating him for not even calling once to let her know he was alive. "You don't know how hard this past year's been. You should have told me where you went. How could you let me think you were dead all this time?"

Jimmy stared back at her, seeming to realize in some small way the damage he'd done. Guilt and shame washed his haggard features. "I was—I was confused, Amelia. I was completely delusional." He seemed at the point of tears and his eyes refused to meet hers. "And I thought—I thought God was calling me to something and I thought that it was important, and I was wrong, I was such an idiot. Heaven, hell... none of that matters." He looked at her then, and Amelia felt her eyes spilling tears again. She wanted to believe him so badly. She wanted the life they'd had before—comfortable, safe, normal. "The only thing that's important to me is you and Claire. And I—I can't undo what I've done." His chin quivered and he looked down, breaking her heart all over again with his sadness. "But I just wanna come home again."

Amelia shut her eyes against tears and struggled not to break down. She opened her eyes again and kept her voice calm, even though she wanted to weep from every raw emotion pummeling her heart at the moment. "I don't know if I can do that," she said quietly. "Not yet. Jimmy, you walked out on us." Her face wavered. "You abandoned us. Hurt isn't even close to what you've done to Claire and I."

Jimmy looked down again, his forehead rigid with stressed lines. "I know. I know." He put his hand on his face in shame. "I'm so sorry. I can never tell you how sorry. All that matters to me is this family."

Cynical and grieved, Amelia shook her head. "I just... I kind of have a hard time believing that."

The words hurt him, like she'd wanted. "Please," Jimmy said. "For Claire. I know you and I might never..." he trailed off and they exchanged a meaningful look, both understanding that their relationship was probably broken beyond repair. "But I'm her father," Jimmy said, his voice growing a little stronger. "She needs me. She needs both of us. And I wanna make it up to her." He tried to reach out to her then, to take hold of her hand. Amelia moved away, not allowing it. Jimmy was wounded, but accepted it and sat there silently for a minute. "Things are gonna be different from now on," he told her faintly, trying to convince her.

"I can't see you break her heart again," Amelia said. Against her better judgement, she was considering it—letting Jimmy back in, even after what he'd done. She believed in forgiveness and second chances, but it had been easier to believe in both before she'd had to be the one giving them.

Jimmy heard it in her voice and small hope showed in his eyes and posture. "I won't. I promise," he said, leaning forward intently, eager to prove himself and meet her demands, do whatever she asked. "We can start small. I mean, whatever you're comfortable with."
Amelia searched his eyes cautiously. "Like what?"

"I don't know." Jimmy chanced an attempt at a smile through the tears in his eyes. "Dinner?"

A considerable silence hung between them. Jimmy looked at Amelia with wretched hope and Amelia felt herself caving, hoping she wasn't making the wrong choice—she wasn't sure if she knew her husband anymore but needed to give him a chance. Mostly for their daughter's sake. "Okay. Dinner," she agreed, then quickly became deadly serious. "But Jimmy… nothing about where you really were. I have to think about what to tell her. How to explain."

Jimmy agreed readily and Amelia went upstairs alone to tell Claire the news. With every step she took, Amelia harrowed her mind for how to say it. How were you supposed to tell your daughter that the dad she thought was gone forever was downstairs waiting to see you again? What reason could she give for why he left? Could Amelia explain that he might not be staying with them forever if things didn't work out? That he might leave again if he wasn't better like he said? Amelia had to stop in the hallway and let herself cry for a moment. Claire was too young for this confusion and heartache… and Amelia had never wanted this for any of them.

Thirty Minutes Later

"There, there," Sam said urgently, tapping on the window of the Impala. Dean slowed the car down and parked in front of the house. They all peered up at the house as the engine cut off. "This is the place, unless the yellow pages are wrong," Sam said, exchanging a tense glance with his brother.

The three Winchesters got out, scoping out the dark, middle-class neighborhood sidewalks as they did. All was calm, quiet. The Novak house was standard and predictable, a two-story family home. The windows were aglow from the lights inside—the place looked homey and warm.

"Bets on how happy Jim-boy's gonna be to see us?" Dean wisecracked, stuffing Ruby's knife into his jacket as they approached the house. Probably not very. As they ascended the front steps quietly, watchful for signs of anything off, they heard the dead giveaway. Inside the house, the sounds of a scuffle—something falling over, a man yelling, then glass shattering.

Sam and Dean looked at each other then wordlessly, Dean kicked the door in as Alex whipped out the florescent green gun she'd prepped during the car ride. The three of them burst into the Novak home and into a chaotic scene. On the floor of the living room, Jimmy was being brutally beaten by a female demon—he was fighting back weakly. Crumpled nearby and stunned was a small woman with strawberry blonde hair. Amelia. She was groaning and whimpering, staring in horror at the other demon—a large male with black eyes who was holding a blonde pre-teen girl at knifepoint. Claire.

The Winchesters skidded to a stop when they saw the hostage situation. "Hey!" Alex thundered, not really thinking it through, just acting. She was pointing her kiddie squirt gun at the demon holding Claire.

The demon turned, tightened his grip on the girl… then took in the sight of Alex and the obviously harmless toy. He relaxed slightly, a wicked smile spreading over his face. On the floor, the demon beating Jimmy stopped, too, and chortled at the sight. A slow, lazy laugh came out of the male demon's mouth. "Nice gun, sweet cheeks."

Next to her, Dean was tensed and ready—he already knew the plan, because it went without saying. Alex smiled facetiously at the demon and then squirted the gun three times. Holy water sprayed out and sizzled on the demon's face on contact, catching him off guard. He let go of Claire, clawing at his own face and screaming as skin melted off. Dean rushed in and finished him with the knife, plunging the knife into the demon's chest. A shocked look was left on the the dead demon's face. Alex shrugged humbly, twirled the gun for effect. "I know."

Claire was wide-eyed and frozen in shock, staring in both awe and terror as Alex set her sights on the other demon—then was suddenly sent backwards to fly into a glass shelf that shattered on impact. Ughhh—Alex blinked, pushing herself up even as Dean went flying sideways to crash into the television set. Ruby's knife clattered to the floor.

Sam held a hand out and the female demon lurched, stumbled underneath the power he was projecting onto her… then nothing. The demon was smiling slowly, unaffected for the most part. Sam's expression became vastly pained and he groaned loudly in agony, holding his other hand to his head, like he was about to pass out. He re-doubled his efforts and the demon chuckled, began to advance.

Jimmy pushed himself up off the floor and rushed to his daughter, taking hold of her even as Alex was standing up shakily. "Go!" Sam shouted to her. "Get them outta here!"

Alex saw how Dean was recovering, reaching for the knife. So she did what Sam said and darted over to Jimmy and Claire, pushing them along. "Come on, come on!" She roughly maneuvered them out of the house and down into the bitter coldness of the night.

They stopped at the Impala, breathless. "My wife—" Jimmy protested as Claire clutched him tightly. He stared back at his house anxiously.

"Don't worry, Sam and Dean have it handled," Alex said, holding a hand out when he moved forward a little, like he was going to go back in.

"I should have listened to you," Jimmy bemoaned, looking at the house anxiously.

"Yeah, well." Alex spit out some blood, realizing that she'd bitten the inside of her mouth when she fell. Her hands were scraped up from broken glass, too.

"A-are you okay?" Claire asked, noticing even as Alex did. Her big girlish eyes stared at Alex with stark fear, and from her pale color, it suddenly became obvious that the little girl might be going into shock.

"Me?" Alex smiled broadly, acted like it was no big deal. "Oh, I'm good. It's just a couple cuts and scrapes." She set Claire with a kind look, trying to calm her down and keep her from a breakdown or panic attack. "Claire, right? I'm Alex. Those are my brothers Sam and Dean in the house. You don't have to worry. We're gonna keep you safe." Jimmy's arms tightened around his daughter, who nodded, sniffed, whimpered. Alex opened the back door of the Impala, looking back at the house tensely. Any second she expected Sam and Dean to high-tail it out of there. "Let's get in the car, okay?" She asked, smiling tightly at Jimmy and Claire. Even as they did as she suggested, Amelia came running out of a side door of the house with coats clutched to her chest.

Sam and Dean burst out of the front door and Dean gestured urgently as they sprinted across the yard to the car. "Let's go, let's go!"

In an echoing parking deck that was mostly empty, Sam's harsh tone resounded strongly. "I'm gonna tell you once again, you're putting your family in danger," he said to Jimmy. "You have to come with us."
Chastened and convicted, Jimmy looked back at the Impala. The backs of Amelia and Claire's heads were visible through the rear window, and mother was embracing sleeping daughter. Jimmy turned back to the Winchesters and he was conflicted. "How long? And don't give me that 'cross that bridge when we get to it' crap."

Sam's face twisted. "Don't you get it? Forever. The demons will never stop. You can't outrun them, you can't hide, not on your own. You can never be with your family. So you either get as far away from them as possible or you put a bullet in your head." That brusque comment got two surprised looks from his siblings. "And that's how you keep your family safe. But there's no getting out and there's no going home."

"Well, don't sugarcoat it, Sam," Dean said wryly.

Sam shot him a dirty look and his voice stayed just as angry as it had been before. "I'm just telling him the truth, Dean. Someone has to."

Alex gave her twin a lecturing glance. "Well can you at least dial down the douchebag a little bit, or…?"

Sam's expression turned bitchy and he shot his sister a look before setting his jaw grimly and looking at Jimmy intensely, commandingly. His anger was still palatable. "Go tell them Jimmy," he said forcefully. "Tell them goodbye."

Jimmy nodded meekly, seeming shellshocked. He headed for the Impala even as Sam got two very questioning looks from his brother and sister. Alex again tried to offer him help. "Sam, do you need some headache medicine or something—"

"For the last goddamn time, Alex, I'm fine!" He exploded. "Stop asking!" A shocked silence followed and Sam blinked oddly, like he was clearing his vision. "Sorry." He cleared his throat and wet his lips and dodged his brother's expression of confounded disapproval and his sister's wounded what-did-I-do gaze. "Sorry. I'm gonna go find them a car." He brushed past them and headed off into the parking deck to jack a car.

Alex shook her head, watching him go. "Something is wrong with him," she muttered.

A few feet away, Jimmy opened the back door of the Impala and crouched down—Claire was asleep, his trench coat wrapped around her. "Hey," Amelia whispered, trying a smile through her traumatized expression. "So I guess I pretty much owe you the biggest apology ever." She reached out and hesitantly took hold of his hand. He realized that she no longer wore her wedding band or engagement ring.

Jimmy's heart hurt. "No you don't."

Her hand tightened on his a little. "Yes, I do. I'm so sorry, Jimmy. And I will never, ever forgive myself for not believing you. For thinking you were…" her voice dropped to an ashamed whisper, "were crazy."

A sad little smile crossed Jimmy's face and he squeezed her hand. "You did what any rational person would have done. I mean, hell, I thought I was crazy half the time."

Amelia smiled a little, wiped her cheeks with her free hand, glanced sideways at Dean and Alex, who were speaking intensely nearby. "How do you know these people?"

"They knew me when I was him. Castiel."
Amelia was looking at Alex closely. "Her too?" She looked back at her husband. "She's pretty."

Jimmy's hand loosened, then let go of hers completely. "Amelia..." he said her name with a note of hurt and disappointment. He always hated it when she accused him of having a wandering eye. He never had. Ever.

Amelia seemed to feel guilty about her passive-aggressive statement and she dropped the subject, clasping her hands together. "How can all of this be real?" She asked, almost smiling at the lunacy of it. "Angels, demons... I thought I believed before but I don't think I did. Now I do and... and... I'm scared."

"I know." Jimmy contemplated his wife with a pained expression. She had survived without him for a year. She would have to survive without him some more. Maybe even forever.

"Can we...? Can we even go home, or...?" She looked to him for guidance. "What are we gonna do?"

Jimmy's face fell a little. This was the goodbye, and she wasn't going to like it. "They're gonna get you a car, don't ask me how, and you're gonna take Claire to Carl and Sally's as fast as you can."

Amelia faltered, realizing what he meant. "Wait. What about you?" She shook her head. "...No, I'm not going anywhere without you, Jimmy."

"Listen to me. Every moment that I'm with you, you and Claire are in danger."

"I don't care!" She kept her voice to a whisper to keep from waking Claire, but her voice was very forceful. "We are not splitting up again."

Jimmy looked at his wife sadly. "We don't have a choice."

Amelia contemplated him in confusion and frustration and reluctance. "For how long?"

He shook his head, realizing the bitter irony of what he was about to say. "We'll cross that bridge when we get to it."

Amelia pressed her lips together to keep from crying, then looked at their daughter, who was innocent and asleep. She turned back to Jimmy and took in a shaking breath, her eyes filling with tears. "We're a family," she protested softly.

It was all he could do not to fall apart. "They will kill you, Amelia, and they'll kill Claire. You just have to get as far away from me as you can. Keep our daughter safe."

Amelia looked quietly terrified. "W-what are you saying to me, Jimmy?" She asked.

"Sometimes I think I might have opened a door I can never close, Amelia," Jimmy confessed brokenly. He'd promised her that things were going to be different and now he had to run to protect them. Wasn't a man's place with his family? And yet here he was, intending to get as far away from them as possible, stay with the Winchesters. With Alex and with all those thoughts of Castiel's that still filled his head, confusing him. Jimmy vowed to make it through this somehow, starting with this moment right here. He had to tell Amelia goodbye. Quite possibly forever. "I'm sorry," he whispered, begging her to believe him. "I'd do things differently if I could."

His wife's eyes were flooding with unshed tears. "Promise me this won't be the last time I see you, Jimmy," she whispered pleadingly. "Promise me."
Jimmy just shook his head. "I… I don't want to promise you something I can't guarantee," he said, and he was surprised when a warm tear spilled onto his cheek. He was crying too. Amelia sobbed softly and leaned to him, embracing him tightly.

Alex and Dean both watched from nearby, somber, unsettled and sad. They both knew that once you were in this life, you were stuck. Jimmy Novak would never be able to go back to a normal apple-pie life. Maybe his girls could, but him? He might as well have been cursed the day that he let Castiel have him.

"He's a devout man. He actually prayed for this."

Alex remembered those words Cas had uttered and she turned away, unable to watch Amelia weeping on her husband or Claire waking up and asking "What's wrong, Daddy?"

Castiel was wrong. No man would pray for this.

The car was silent and the mood was tense as Jimmy and the Winchesters drove away from Amelia and Claire.

Ten miles passed, then Dean pulled over to refuel. As he waited, leaned against the car, Sam got out and walked off about fifty feet to make a phone call. He was distinctly agitated and pissed. What was going on with him? Alex hissed a little as she finished disinfecting the scrapes all over her hands from the broken glass. Glancing sidelong, she took in Jimmy's tense, drawn profile. "You okay over there?" she asked softly. They were in the back seat together and he hadn't said a word since they'd left the parking deck.

His eyes flickered downward, his jaw worked just a little. "Not really."

Of course not. He wouldn't be. Alex sympathized completely. She saw a stark gash on his cheek. "Hey, you have a bad cut. Lemme see."

Grudgingly, Jimmy let her dab an alcohol pad against the cut on his cheek. He kept his eyes down as she did so. Alex turned and as she dug around in the first aid kit for some medical tape to protect the cut, she asked softly. "I never imagined my life would end up this way," she confessed quietly. His voice gave her pause. "Maybe it won't. Maybe we can find some way to…" she trailed off, not even sure what she was going to say.

Jimmy smiled a little cynically, understanding that she, too, saw no way out for him. "I never thought an angel would destroy my life, you know?" He shook his head ruefully even as Alex ripped off a little medical tape and patted it down onto his cheek carefully, using her fingertips and taking care.

She made no comment, because she could think of nothing to say. Did Cas know or understand how he'd all but ruined this man's life? And not just his life, but his wife and daughter's too? She didn't know. Was it the same with the other angels who had vessels, too? Jimmy barely seemed to notice what she was doing. He was staring ahead of himself unseeingly. "I was dead the day I said yes to him."

His words were dour and startling, defeating.

Sam yanked his door open and sat heavily in his seat, cutting off any reply Alex could have made to Jimmy. He withdrew and leaned against the window and when Dean got back into the car and they hit the highway again, Jimmy appeared to be sleeping. When Sam's phone rang a few moments later and it was Amelia's voice on the other end, a very grim discovery was made: one of the demons that had attacked the Novaks in their home had possessed Amelia and was holding Claire hostage. The Impala made a sharp U-turn and gunned it back the way they'd come.

"They were supposed to be safe because I left them!" Jimmy raged in the back seat.

Dean glanced at him in the rear view mirror as he slowed the car down. "Calm down, Jimbo—you're no use to anyone if you can't keep a handle on yourself."

Jimmy put his head in his hands and breathed in and out loudly. "That demon is gonna kill my daughter."

"No one's killing no one," Dean retorted. "Just stay calm."

Exasperated, Jimmy straightened and looked out the window with an apprehensive expression as Dean parked the car. "This the place?" A decrepit old warehouse was slouched across an expanse of concrete that was littered with trash and rubble. The place was the picture of abandoned Americana—complete with broken windows, gaping holes in the sides of the tin walls, and rusted metal beams that sagged underneath the weight of what they held up.

Dean shrugged. "It's the address that demon bitch gave us, so… yeah." They all got out of the car and Dean tossed Sam Ruby's knife even as Alex dug in the trunk and realized they were all out of squirt guns—she'd dropped the last one back at the Novak house. She tucked a flask of holy water into her belt instead, figuring it wouldn't hurt to have just in case.

"Alright, they're expecting you to come alone," Dean was telling Jimmy, who shrugged on his trench coat. "That's exactly what you're gonna do."

"What?" Jimmy asked, his expression wide-eyed and fearful. "Go in there alone?"

"We'll work our way through the catwalks," Sam explained. "We'll be right behind you."

"All you gotta do is stay calm and stall," Dean added. "Let us do our job."

"How can you ask me to be calm?" Jimmy asked insolently. "This is my family we're talking about!"

Dean pointed a finger at him. "Listen to me, this will work. You understand? Nobody's gonna get hurt."

Jimmy didn't seem convinced. "Yeah, whatever. Gimme a minute, okay?" He sullenly walked off to disappear around the far corner of the warehouse.

Sam, paler than ever and a little clammy—Alex was convinced he had a fever—looked at Dean with an ill expression. "There's no way they're expecting him to come alone. You know this is probably a trap."

"So we do what we always do," Alex interjected.

"What, get our asses handed to us?" Sam asked with a weak little laugh.

Alex just smiled back at him a little and arched an eyebrow. "Spring the trap."

"Castiel, you son of a bitch!" Jimmy shouted at the sky. He'd walked a fair distance from the Winchesters and was letting loose on every angry, confused feeling he was holding inside. "You promised me my family would be okay! You promised you were gonna take care of them! I gave you everything you asked me to give, I gave you more! This is the thanks I get? This is what you do? This is your heaven?!" He stopped to catch his breath and the indignant fire faded into despair. "Help me, please. You promised, Cas. Just help me." The night was silent and the stars above twinkled, seeming to mock him. Again, Jimmy flew off the handle, "Where are you?!" He shouted with renewed fury. And when there was no response, he shook his head bitterly. "Typical," he muttered.

"Jimmy." He turned, startled. Alex Winchester stood there smiling wincingly with her arms crossed. "Maybe you shouldn't be shouting when we're about to try and sneak in there?"

He swallowed, suddenly a little self-conscious. "You followed me."

"Just wanted to make sure you were okay," she told him, coming forward. It was strange, her looking at him, not Cas. The bright hazel eyes that Castiel had been so fascinated by flickered over him with hooded concern.

"Yeah. I just… I was trying to get Cas," Jimmy explained weakly, out of options. "You wanna try calling him?"

Alex seemed surprised. "Me?"

"Maybe he'll listen to you," Jimmy suggested. "You are his favorite."

Her surprise changed to stark confusion. "His favorite what?"

Was she stupid or did she really not know? Jimmy didn't have time to wonder. "Just try calling him, okay?"

"Uh. Okay. I already did but… all right." She cleared her throat and glanced at Jimmy like she was self-conscious at his gaze. She looked skyward and hesitated. "Uh… Cas? Hello? It's… me, Alex. Winchester. Again. Do you ten-four up there?" They both waited, but nothing happened. Alex stuck her tongue out just a little to wet her lips, and shook her head, looked down, glancing at Jimmy again abashedly. "No one's listening."

"Oh he's listening. He's just not answering." Jimmy shook his head, at a loss. "I don't get it." His voice softened with deep thought. "I thought for sure he'd come for you." He looked at her and saw how surprised she was, how questions filled her eyes at his statement. Amelia was right, he thought faintly. Alex was pretty. She was youthful with old soul eyes, she was willowy and delicate looking but Jimmy knew firsthand that she wasn't someone to mess around with or make assumptions about. She was pretty damn tough and resourceful. Still, there was a vulnerability to her. A quietness. A loneliness.

"What?" She asked at his long gaze.

He tore his gaze away. "Nothing. I just…" He frowned, in thought someplace far away, murmuring almost to himself. "I wonder… if something happened to him." Because it made no sense. He knew full well how obsessed Castiel was with Alex's safety. For a minute, Jimmy worried about Castiel. He didn't hate the guy. He just wished Castiel had picked someone else.

"Hey, let's go save your girls, all right?" Alex asked, nodding toward the doorway into the warehouse nearby.

Jimmy looked at the doorway and panic rose. His heart jumped into his throat and all he could think of was I am going to get them killed. "I can't," he said, voice rising in choked panic. "I can't. I'm not the kind of man who knows how to do this."

Humiliating tears stung his eyes even as Alex looked at him with an intense, peering frown. "What do you mean?"

"I, I don't know how to fight, or, or, negotiate," he stuttered, getting more and more panicked by the second. "I sell ad time! I'm nothing, I'm no one; I'm not brave or strong—If I go in there and make a wrong move and they die—"

Alex's hands gripped him firm just above his elbows and she made him look at her. "Jimmy. You're not nothing. You're not no one. Keep yourself together, all right? Cas picked you for a reason. Listen, take it from me. Being brave isn't a feeling. It's doing the right thing even when you're scared shitless." Her words encouraged him, calmed him. "You are gonna get through this," she insisted without doubt. "You're not alone. I'll be right behind you, and Sam and Dean will be right there, too. Okay?" She seemed so sure and positive, so strong and dependable to him in that moment. Her words had him nodding, seeing hope.

"Okay," he said, nodding more and more, feeling deeply relieved. "Thank you." Impulsively, he reached for her and hugged her as he let out a tensely held breath. He could tell that his sudden move made her feel awkward. Her hand patted his back hesitantly and she was stiff against him. "Thank you," he repeated softer, shutting his eyes for a second and calming himself, pushing his fears away. Her hair smelled like motel shampoo and after a second, she stopped patting him. Just held still, her arms circled around him loosely. A feeling like comfort washed over Jimmy. For a moment, he trusted that everything was going to be all right.

When he pulled away, the two of them looked at each other wordlessly, neither one seeming too sure about what had just happened or why. Their hands were still on each others arms. When they both realized it simultaneously, they stepped back. Alex seemed especially puzzled and flustered. "We should..." she gestured toward the warehouse.

Jimmy nodded, following her gaze. Everything came back to him and his resolve grew. He drew himself up a little bit. "Yeah." He was scared shitless. But he started walking, and Alex stayed in stride with him. When they reached the door, he reached out and took hold of the handle, then tightened his grip on it, but didn't pull.

"Right behind you," Alex reminded him gently, as if he were a child. Jimmy looked at her one more time then gathered his courage and pulled the door open, stepped into the darkness beyond.

It was difficult to see. His footsteps were loud on the metal floor and he followed a hallway down into a bigger, open area where overhead, metal catwalks cross-crossed. He saw no one. He continued inward. And then he saw Claire, sitting tied to a chair. He ran to his little girl, dropped to his knees in front of her, shook her gently. "Claire? Sweetie? It's me, it's Daddy!"

Behind him came Amelia's voice, low and cruel. "Oh hi, honey. You're home." Jimmy shot up and whirled, standing in front of his daughter protectively. Amelia smiled wickedly. "And you brought your little whore friend, too." She held her hand up and made a yanking motion. Alex was suddenly pulled out of the darkness she'd been concealed in and flung sidelong into a tin wall, hard. She fell down to the floor with a sickening thud and let out a horrible low groan of pain.

Jimmy held a hand out, panicking. "Wait—wait. Listen, I'm—I'm begging you here! You do whatever you want with me, but my wife and daughter and Alex, they're just—they're not a part of this."
"Not a part of this? Sweetie." She tutted scoldingly. "They're all a part of it." Amelia suddenly laughed in the face of Jimmy's horror. "You know, it's funny. I never imagined how lucky I'd get today… not just an empty vessel but the Winchester bunch too?"

On the ground, Alex was pushing herself up onto all fours—her mouth was bloody and her expression seemed to say she was done with the bullshit. "Joke's on you, bitch," she spat, "I'm the only one here."

Amelia smiled, narrowed her eyes. "Mm. There it is. The default Winchester mode: lies." She cocked her head to the side, listening. "There are the other two right now."

Two demons dragged Sam and Dean in as if on cue. "Hiya, Mom," Dean greeted the demon possessing Amelia.

She ignored him, spoke to her henchmen. "Got the knife?" One of the demons, a blonde female, held up Ruby's knife.

Alex, standing off to herself gave Amelia a churlish look. "It's not nice to steal."

"Listen, you got us, okay?" Sam asked loudly. "Let these people go."

"I have a better idea." Amelia pulled a gun out of her waistband and turned, shot Jimmy in the stomach. Pain exploded and Jimmy cried out, fell over, shocked. Even moreso when the demon made Amelia hold the gun to her own stomach and shot herself, too. She began to laugh, unaffected by the wound. It wouldn't kill the demon, but it would kill Amelia when she dispossessed her. "Goodbye, Novak family!" Amelia's voice trilled.

Then she turned and set her sights on Claire, began to saunter toward her slowly, leisurely checking her gun, even as Sam and Dean struggled against the grips the demons held them in. Amelia suddenly went flying sideways as Alex tackled her. The gun went off loudly.

On the floor, Jimmy was writhing in pain, a hand pressed to the seeping bullet wound in his stomach. He could hear Alex and Amelia fighting, hear Sam and Dean shouting. But it was all a distant buzzing blur. He stared at the ceiling, at the beautiful, strange pattern of rusty catwalks above. He was dying. This was the end. He blinked a few times, struggling to breathe.

Jimmy.

Castiel?

Jimmy, you're dying. Your wife is dying. Your daughter is about to die. I can help you.

No… Castiel… I know what that means. I can't. Not again. Isn't there another way?

I'm sorry Jimmy. There isn't, unless you'd have me to possess your daughter or your father.

What? No! Not them! If I say yes again, how long will you take me away this time?

Forever, Jimmy.

Forever? So, either way I die. I say yes to you and I die because you take me over. I say no and I bleed out on the floor here.

Agree to this and your wife and daughter will both survive. We can save them. The three of you can die today or the two of them can be healed and live long, good lives.
They need me, Cas. I can't just leave again, they won't understand.

I leave the choice to you, Jimmy.

There were tears of pain and fear in Jimmy's eyes and he squeezed his eyes shut, gritted his teeth against horrible pain. A memory came to him out of nowhere. Eight years old and wearing a cape he'd made out of a pillowcase, he'd raced through a grassy field with his favorite toy airplane, making engine sounds. Lost in jubilation, he stopped to spin a circle, delighting in the plane's imagined flight. "I'm gonna fly when I grow up! Planes, helicopters, fighter jets! I'm gonna flyyyyy!"

Jimmy opened his eyes and a tear rolled out the edge of his eye down the side of his face and into his hair. He saw Amelia walking to him on their wedding day, he remembered carrying her across the threshold of their home when love had been bright and hopeful. He saw her in the kitchen, a hand on her growing pregnant belly. He saw Claire when she was a squalling newborn, he felt how his heart had burst inside of him to first hold such a precious gift in his arms. He remembered her first steps and first words. He remembered a good life. And Jimmy let go of it all to save them.

"Yes," he whispered into the echoing space.

A word no one but Castiel heard. A word Jimmy recognized as his last. He turned a little, craning his neck upwards, trying to see Claire one last time before the angel blinded and overpowered him. But his vision was burning white hot as Castiel took over, and he saw nothing and no one.

Alex barreled into the demon possessing Amelia and the gun went off loudly as it clattered onto the floor. Wham! The demon's fist connected brutally with Alex's jaw, sending her stumbling back. Sam and Dean were shouting, and it sounded like they were doing the same thing she was. Kicking ass. Or getting their asses kicked. She wasn't sure which.

Amelia grabbed her by the shoulders and Alex hung on tight, using her weight to throw them both sideways where they fell and rolled around on the hard ground, blindly punching each other's faces and grappling roughly. Alex got a foot up between them and kicked Amelia hard in the stomach where the bullet wound gaped. Amelia rolled away from the force of the kick.

"Sam, no, stop! What are you doing?!" Dean's shout echoed across the warehouse.

Alex looked up, panting raggedly, on her stomach on the ground. What she saw seemed to stop her heart. Sam was crouched over the blonde demon and he withdrew his mouth from her neck. His lips, teeth, and lower face were covered in bright red. He didn't look recognizable, just ruthless and crazed. His eyes were wild and he stared at Dean silently. He seemed to remember himself—he turned around and stabbed Ruby's knife into the demon he'd just drank from. Blood dripped off his chin to the ground as he stood up. He looked like a monster.

Alex suddenly felt herself get grabbed by the back of her hair and to be lifted up with super strength—the cold barrel of a gun was at the side of her neck. She heard the gun cock.

"Hey!" Sam roared. His hand reached his hand toward her and his expression was terrifyingly murderous. Alex flinched, then realized. He was exorcising Amelia's demon. The grip slackened then ended. Alex stumbled away from Amelia and stared as black smoke billowed out of her mouth, dissipating as she coughed. Sam looked strong, able, confident, his powers fully working as demon blood dripped out of his mouth and down his chin and neck. Dean and Alex looked at each other in horrified realization.
The last of the black smoke left Amelia, whose face suddenly showed agony and fear as she became herself again. She clutched at her stomach where blood soaked her shirt. "Oh God!" She gasped, falling to her knees, then onto her side. "Aaahh..." she hissed and moaned and whimpered. Jimmy suddenly stood up and went to her, crouched down beside her, touched her stomach.

"Jimmy?" Amelia asked weakly.

"No." His voice was deep and husky, rough. "I am not Jimmy."

Thunderstruck, Alex's mouth dropped open as Castiel healed Amelia's wound. Amelia looked down at his hand on her stomach, eyes wide and afraid with realization. "C-Castiel?!" His eyes met hers. "Where's Jimmy? Where's my husband? What did you do with him?!"

Castiel stood slowly, looked down at Amelia, who was shocked and still half-laying on the floor. "I'm sorry Amelia Novak. Your husband is gone. He exchanged his life for yours, and that of your daughter's."

Amelia's face registered alarmed confusion. "What?"

Everyone looked at Claire at that moment, and noticed what they hadn't. The stray bullet the gun had fired a minute ago had hit Claire in the chest. Ribbons of blood trailed down her chest and she was, by all appearances, dead. Amelia sprang up, screaming her daughter's name. Her hands fluttered in a panic, trying to untie her daughter from the chair she was restrained to even as Castiel came up beside her and touched the ropes—singed to ash, they fell away.

Amelia took her daughter into her arms, crying and wailing, on her knees, rocking Claire's limp form. Castiel crouched beside her. "Amelia." Castiel's voice was rich and low. "Have faith. Your daughter will live."

Castiel placed a hand onto Claire's back and Amelia stared, tears forgotten as Claire stirred, frowned, and looked around. "What happened Mommy?" Claire saw Castiel and smiled in relief. "Daddy!" She threw her arms around his neck. "I thought you left!"

Castiel was frowning sternly and Amelia looked sick. Claire seemed to realize something was wrong and drew back slowly, looking at Castiel closely. Her voice lowered to a whisper. "You're... you're not my daddy."

Castiel stood up. "No. I am not." Claire and Amelia clung to each other and watched with disbelief as the man who had been Jimmy Novak walked away from them.

Beside Dean, Alex stared at Cas, who was approaching them. He didn't look at either of them even once. "Cas, where are you going?" Alex asked as Castiel walked past Dean without a glance.

The angel rounded on them slowly, his expression more emotionless than she could ever remember seeing it. He didn't reply.

"And what were you gonna tell me?" Dean prompted, earning a glance from Cas.

"I learned my lesson while I was away, Dean," he said and the sound of his voice seemed to still the room itself. "I serve Heaven, I don't serve man, and I certainly don't serve you." His eyes darted to Alex and his jaw clenched. She saw how he took in her bloody face and injuries. His voice lowered even more as his expression flickered. "Any of you."

And he turned and walked away, leaving a shellshocked bunch of people behind. Claire's quiet sobs echoed in the large expanse of the warehouse, and Alex turned back, reeling from what had just happened. Nearby, Sam was wiping the blood off his face with the sleeve of his jacket and Alex looked at Dean questioningly, who shook his head just slightly, as if to tell her 'not now.' Sam went to Amelia and Claire, by all appearances he was his normal kind, caring self again.

"He'll never be back, will he?" Amelia asked Sam, her voice shaking. Her arm was around Claire, who was crying quietly.

"Didn't sound like it," Sam said honestly, sadly. "Let's just get out of here, huh?"

Sam ended up carrying Claire, who was so traumatized that walking was difficult for her. Amelia walked beside them, holding her daughter's hand, seeming too shocked to know what to do.

Dean and Alex followed, but slowed down letting Sam and the girls get out of earshot. Alex looked at her brother and waited—she could tell by instinct that he was far, far more shaken up than he was letting on. She had never seen his expression so deadly, so horrified. And truthfully, that's how she felt, too. "I'm stopping us at a gas station after we leave here," he said in hushed and hurried tones. "You go to the bathroom, call Bobby. Tell him to call us and tell us to come there, to make up some reason—I don't care what—for us to hightail it over. And we'll put Sam in the panic room until we figure out what the hell is going on with him."

Alex nodded, feeling ill. "Okay."

"Do not let Sam know anything is up. We can't let him get away. He has to suspect nothing. You got it?"

It was with a sadness her heart had never felt before that she nodded her understanding. She felt her eyes sting with tears, and Dean held up a commanding, angry finger. "No, Alex, no. Later. Later, you and I will do that crap. Right now, everything's normal, you understand?"

Alex cleared her throat and forced herself to go blank. "Yeah. Got it."

They drove through a rainstorm in silence. In the back seat, Alex could feel the tension building, but refused to be the one to break the silence, to broach the subject. When she'd gone into the gas station bathroom to call Bobby, she had almost lost it completely. She wasn't sure if she could actually keep it together when the time came.

And there wasn't just Sam drinking the demon's blood. She again replayed the moment in her mind. Where Cas had turned and looked at them with such heartlessness. With such utter lack of anything. She didn't understand. What happened? And Amelia, Claire. Would they be all right? And what about Jimmy? It was awful, the things Alex was thinking about.

In the front seat, Sam drew in a deep breath and cleared his throat. "All right, let's hear it," Sam said, and Alex glanced up.

"Hear what?" Dean asked, sounding completely normal.

"Drop the bomb, man," Sam said. "You saw what I did. Come on, stop the car, take a swing."

"I'm not gonna take a swing," Dean replied evenly.

Alex could see Sam's expression scrunch in puzzled suspicion, then he turned and looked at her. "Alex? You don't wanna scream my head off? Rip me a new one?"

Under his questioning gaze, she wanted to squirm. But she shrugged. Dean said Sam couldn't suspect anything. So she played it cool. "What can I say, Sam." She flicked a fuzzball off her jacket sleeve as if in boredom. "It explains a hell of a lot."

Sam scoffed, looking at Dean again, then Alex, then Dean, totally aghast. "Come on! You guys aren't gonna give me hell about this?"

"I think we're both too tired, Sam," Alex said, which was true. "Too tired and too sad to be angry."

"Okay, well, at least let me explain myself," Sam said.

Dean shook his head. "Don't. I don't care."

"You don't care?" Sam echoed in disbelief.

"What do you want me to say, that I'm disappointed? Yeah, I am. But, mostly, I'm just tired, man. I'm done. I am just done." Alex heard his voice waver just slightly.

In total disbelief, Sam just stared at Dean. Then his cell phone rang. Alex's eyes jumped up, her pulse picked up. "Hey, Bobby," Sam said.

Alex shut her eyes in emotional pain. And so, the trap would be set. She never thought, in a thousand years, that they would be luring her big brother like an animal. Like a monster.

Later That Night
Sioux Falls, South Dakota

"Well, thanks for shaking a tail," Bobby said, leading the Winchesters toward the panic room.

"You got it," Dean said. He still sounded normal. Alex was saying as little as possible.

"Go on inside," Bobby said, motioning for them to go inside, letting Sam take the lead. "I wanna show you something."

Alex's blood thudded in her ears as Sam, without any hesitation or suspicion, stepped inside. Clueless. "So, what's the big demon problem?" he turned to them. His expression was too pleasant, too trusting.

Alex thought she felt her heart literally break as Bobby replied, "You are."

Sam's expression wavered. "This is for your own good," Bobby said, and shut the door with a loud bang.

"Guys? Hey, hey. What's... what are you doing?" his voice was quickly becoming panicked. Bobby closed and latched the window. "This isn't funny. Guys! Hey! GUYS!"

The second the door shut and latched closed, Alex's careful guise of calm indifference was gone, and she leaned against the wall of the panic room, one hand on either side of her head, painful tears falling silently as her shoulders shook. Sam's shouts echoed loudly on the other side of the wall. She felt Dean pull her away and into his arms, tightly. "Come on kids," Bobby said gently. "It's best if we put some space between us and him for right now."

They went upstairs, Dean pulling Alex along by her forearm. She could barely walk. At the top of the stairs, Alex turned to Dean, stricken, while Bobby, ever the intuitive, left them alone. "How did this happen?" Alex asked through tears. "How did we let this happen? Who is that in there? What happened to Sam?"

Dean's expression was pained, guilty. He didn't know anything more than she did. "I... I don't know."

"How didn't we see this, Dean?" Alex asked, looking for him to answers, desperate for him to set her at ease in any small way.

He was barely able to look at her. His voice was soft and confused. "What, that he was sucking demon blood? I mean, call me crazy but that's not the first conclusion you'd logically jump to." He looked down, putting his face in his hand. "Dammit. I didn't see this coming. I didn't see this coming."

Alex looked down the stairs, into the darkness. Sam's shouts were echoing loudly, and full of panic and confusion. "Dean. He'll never forgive us for this."

Dean looked at her, his expression unreadable. "I don't know if I can ever forgive him."

Thunk. Thunk. Thunk. Alex threw one last knife, using all the pent up anger and frustration she was holding inside. Thunk. It pummeled into the side of the car easily, and she went and yanked all the knives she'd thrown out, the sound of scraping hurting her ears. She hadn't even thought to see if the car were a junker or not, and had left about twenty holes in it in the past ten minutes. She'd just seen something to throw knives at in the salvage yard, and started throwing. Hopefully Bobby wouldn't be too pissed.

Now she was out of steam and clunked the knives down on the roof of the car, closing her eyes tiredly. Sam was still shouting himself hoarse a couple hours after being locked in, and she couldn't be in the house. She didn't know what to do, what to think.

And then there was Cas. The way he had looked at her so rigidly when he left. The cruel, thoughtless words he had lobbed at them. She remembered the other night, when she swore he was a different person altogether, listening to her drunken rants... touching her hand as if to comfort her. What had happened? Why was he suddenly a stranger again? How could he just take Jimmy's life like that? How did he just walk away from Amelia and Claire without any visible emotion whatsoever? She didn't believe that Cas was really like that. Maybe it was just denial.

She looked up into the night sky, breathing out and watching her breath dissipate in a little cloud. She waited a very long moment, not sure if she wanted to do this or not. In the end, she decided she did. "Cas? Are you there?"

There was a soft sound behind her, and she turned. There he stood, looking at her with a rigid and blank expression. It was startling, how fast he arrived. "What is it, Alex?" He looked to his left and right, assessing the location. "What do you need?"

"To talk to you," she said, coming closer to him and seeing Jimmy Novak all over again. And yet, not a trace of Jimmy seemed to remain. Identical face, totally different person.

Cas remained distant and stony. "If you're not in danger and need nothing substantial from me, I have no business being here."

He turned, as if to walk away. "Wait! Cas!" Alex darted forward and caught him by the shoulder. Even though he had the strength to rip her in half, he stayed and turned a little, meeting her gaze grudgingly after glancing at her hand almost contemptuously.
She let go, confused. "Where'd you go? Why'd you just leave? What happened?"

His jaw tightened with what appeared to be impatience. "It's none of your concern."

"None of my concern?" She repeated. "Fine. Don't tell me what happened. Why you got dragged back to Heaven." Looking at him was pissing her off, because all she could see, still, was Jimmy. "You ruined a man's life," she accused out of the blue, trying to see some kind of empathy in him. "How are you all right with that?"

Castiel's face was terse. "Alex Winchester, I am not afforded the luxury of having an emotional reaction to that."

Her face was slack in surprise at his words and attitude. "You kidding me?"

"He agreed to this. He knew the stakes. It was necessary." His answers were short, precise, and apathetic.

"Necessary my ass!" Alex retorted angrily.

Castiel's eyes held hers unflinchingly. He seemed so cold. "Child, you presume to know the workings of Heaven and righteousness but you are wholly ignorant."

His words, demeanor, and stance—all of it—shocked her. "Wha—?" She narrowed her eyes in a concerned frown, not even offended. He didn't sound like himself, and she was beginning to suspect that something had happened to him. "What did they do to you up there?" She asked intently.

His expression flickered, then became hard and dark again. "I already told you. None of that is any of your concern."

"It is," Alex insisted stubbornly, boldly.

"Why?" he challenged, and there was a short, startled silence.

"Because..." she trailed off, realizing why. "I thought we were... friends." He'd said as much and shit, she'd believed him without even realizing it. And she didn't think he was lying, either. He'd meant it. He'd said that to her after she'd punched him in the face and said awful things to him. Her eyes stung with surprising emotion and her voice softened to accommodate it. "Why are you being like this?"

He saw her shining eyes and Castiel's jaw clenched, his eyes went down, he spoke gruffly. "I have no need of friendship. Not yours, not Dean's, not anyone's."

"But you said..." Alex was unable to hide her wounded expression. She gave a cynical little laugh. "A lot of bullshit, I guess."

"I spoke out of turn to you previously," Castiel said in a low voice. "Now if you need nothing further—"

She grabbed him by the arm, anticipating him trying to run away again. "No. Don't walk away from me."

Their eyes met and his expression was unreadable. "Let go of me, Alex."

Alex scowled at him, losing her temper and getting combative. "Or what? You gonna throw me across the yard? Knock me out? Handcuff me to a wall?" He stared at her unflinchingly for a long few seconds, and Alex just stared him down, unruffled, demanding of an explanation. "I don't believe that this is you, the way you're acting right now."

"You—do not—know me," he growled. He took his hand and brushed her aside easily, walking a few paces. He stopped and turning his head just slightly so that she could see his profile. "The relationship you and I had is over. I'm not your friend. I am your protector. That's all." He sounded so insistent and harsh.

Silence. Confused, hurt, unsure silence.

Alex stared at his profile tensely. It didn't make sense. She shook her head, at a loss. "I don't understand," she said softly. "I thought..." she trailed off, unable to finish her sentence.

If she could have seen his face, she would have seen him close his eyes wearily, a severely pained expression on his face. He could barely conceal his inner feelings, the feelings that had contributed to the removal from his vessel and subsequent punishment. He couldn't let her hear how much he cared, and he couldn't allow Heaven to see, either. It was lying. He was a liar. Still, he knew what had to be done. He opened his eyes, steeling himself and wiping all emotion from his face and voice. "You thought wrong," he told her without any empathy. And then he was gone.

Alex stared at the spot where he had been, deeply wounded and sorry she had even called him there at all. Sorry that she had thought he would listen to her or share his situation with her. She was once again reminded why she didn't allow people into her life. Because in the end, they all disappointed her, hurt her, or left her. Sometimes, all three. She wanted to be angry and bitter about Castiel, but instead all she could feel was hurt. Deeply, painfully, hurt. She had trusted him and let him in. More than she should have. And this was what she had to show for it. Absolutely nothing. The same as poor, wretched Jimmy Novak.

Maybe it was because of the highly exhausting day she'd had or the emotional roller coaster. She didn't know. But tears filled her eyes and spilled out to roll down her cheeks. Tears about Sam, about Jimmy, about Amelia and Claire, about Castiel. Especially about Castiel.

Castiel stood on a boat loading dock somewhere in New Jersey, leaned over the railing, staring down into the water tensely. He was trying not to reflect on the conversation he'd just had. He was trying to ignore the way his pulse had picked up, the uneasy, upset feeling that had been left in his stomach at her sadness and pleading. There had been tears gathering in her eyes. Were those tears because of him? How could he inspire those in her? He thought of her face, so beaten up by the demon—she'd had a split lip, a bruised cheek and jaw, a black eye, painful-looking cuts on her hands.

He was forbidden to heal her unless it was a fatal wound. It seemed so hypocritical. She was the only one he wasn't allowed to assist in that way. It was a test, and he knew it.

His brethren in Heaven—Raphael and Michael—had given him a final warning. His affections and unnecessary involvement with the Winchesters had to end, or he would be punished severely. They told him he was choosing sides. They told him he was failing. They told him he was becoming weak and faithless. They told him this was his final chance. And Castiel had no choice but to obey. He wanted to obey. He wanted to be a faithful servant of the Lord. But he also wanted to heal Alex, wanted to be her friend.

Why did he have doubt after doubt? And why, when he saw the hurt in Alex's eyes—hurt caused by him—why did he feel so sick inside? It had been difficult to look at her in the eye and be rough and callous to her. Still, he had done it, knowing he was protecting them both from Heavenly consequences. And she had looked right back at him and in the face of his purposeful insults had expressed concern for him. How had she known that something happened to him? It unsettled him and surprised him that she saw past his front.

He shouldn't think of her. Not the soft way she sighed, not the way her brow furrowed in thought, not the way her eyelashes fanned out darkly when she looked down. He shouldn't think of the fiery glares she'd shot at him in anger or the eye rolls or the crossed arms, the times she'd challenged him and been kind to him alike. He shouldn't dwell on the sound of her laugh, which he hadn't heard enough times.

Castiel shook himself. He knew the right thing to do was to cut ties with her and her brothers. He could forsake his position as Alex's guardian and allow another angel to do the job. As soon as he thought that, he rejected the idea. No. He didn't want that.

Want. The word was a bitter thing lodged in him. Inescapable. Castiel knew that he'd been walking a dangerous line for some time now and was letting his feelings and newfound emotions sway him. The word 'want' had never applied to him before. He had never used it or felt it before her.

He looked over the dark, shimmering water that laid before him lit by moonlight. He didn't know how to stop caring. And he wasn't sure if he truly wanted to.

Her face came to mind again, so hurt by what he'd said to her tonight.

He bowed his head deeply, recognizing that what he was feeling in that moment was sadness.
Two Roads Diverged

"So light the fire, walk away. There's nothing left to say."
- Bullet for My Valentine

Sam stared up at the ceiling fan that was surrounded by the familiar design of a devil's trap. The blades went around and around in a slow, heavy rhythm that lulled him to a sick, docile place for now.

He had lost track of the hours and days. No one answered when he called.

He was settling into a crazy routine where first he paced the room and banged on the walls. Then he gave up and sat in the corner and wept with shame then he'd grow angry and would hurl himself against the walls, trying to hurt himself. He'd then collapse down and get depressed, then start the process all over again with renewed fervor.

Sam knew he was in bad shape in the moments of clarity he had between blackouts of insanity. He was beginning to see things and people. Alastair, his mom, himself when he was fourteen. He was so confused and tired, and all he could think about was getting some demon blood, quenching the maddening thirst that pervasively controlled his entire body and mind. He needed to free himself from this hell he'd built in himself, he needed them to understand that he had only drank demon blood to get strong enough to kill Lilith.

He heard a soft sound beside him and sat up quickly from where he'd been laying on the cot. His twin sister stood there in the shadows at the edge of the room.

"Alex! How did you get in here?!!"

Her face was obscured by strange shadows and her arms were crossed. He could literally feel the disdain emanating off of her. She ignored his question. "Unbelievable. Look at you, Sam. So far from what you're supposed to be." She came closer, sneering at him in disgust. "Not even human anymore, are you?"

"I'm… I'm still human…" he protested weakly, tiredly. "I'm still me. Please, believe me. You've got to help me."

She just smirked and started to circle him, watching him hawkishly. "You know, I think you're past help. You disgust me, the dark things that crawl around inside you... the things you keep secret from me..." Sam flinched away from her, horrified. "But, it's okay, Sammy. Me and Dean? We've got this. We don't need you, especially not now." She stopped and leaned forward, gripping him by his shoulders with crushing force. Her fingernails were like spikes, digging in painfully and he flinched, whimpered, cowered. "You're the family curse, Sam," she hissed. "It's been you all along, dragging us down, polluting the air we breathed..." her head tilted to the side, and a strange, condescending smile was on her lips. "You're just some unholy, blood sucking, demon screwing little bastard."

Sam felt like he had been struck. "No, Alex," he protested, tears in his eyes. "It wasn't like that, I just, I needed—" she slapped him across the face, her expression like stone. It stung so badly.

"Shut up. I'm tired of listening to your shit," she said and walked off.

He closed his eyes, miserably listened to the sound of her footsteps echoing. And when he opened his eyes back up, he saw that someone else was there now. A girl, around age twelve. She had a plain, open face, wide eyes, full lips. Two messy braids and an old jean jacket... "Alex..." he said, recognizing her. His twin sister, when she was a kid. She just stared at him, her huge eyes full of hurt, betrayal, disappointment. The other Alex, the older one, came to the younger one, put her arm around the girl protectively. "Don't. You hurt her. You disappointed her. You let her down. She doesn't want you to talk to her." Alex's voice lowered a little bit. "She knows how dark you are inside. How dark you've always been."

Sam choked on his words, standing up, desperate for his twelve-year-old sister to stop looking at him like that. She only turned away, hid her face from him. Older Alex just looked at Sam with a superior expression, as if to say, 'see?'

Sam was getting desperate, breathless, riled up. "Alex, please! Help me! Stop just looking at me like I'm a freak show and do something!" He was grasping at straws. "If you can just, just convince Dean... I just need some time, some help... if you guys... can just help me! Why won't you help me?!"

Alex laughed a little, put a hand on her hip and leaned forward as she smirked patronizingly. "You know what, Sammy? It's kinda cute. You think we actually still love you. Think we actually want to save you. Ah Sam. You sick, crawling little excuse for a man. You're not a man." Sam's sadness retreated like a wave on the beach as she kept laying on insult after insult. She came forward, her face inches from his. Her voice lowered into a harsh whisper. "You're a monster." The words were like another slap to the face and were making his blood boil like acid. "A monster."

"No!" He shouted in rage, lunging for her. "I am not a MONSTER!" With an unintelligible bellow, he lunged for his sister, angry enough to kill.

Outside the panic room, peeking in through the latch, the real Alex couldn't watch any more when Sam ran into the wall, his arms and hands swinging around wildly, as if he were fighting and grappling with someone. He had totally lost it.

She shut the latch quietly and shuffled through the basement, too numb to know how she should react. She felt like she'd failed Sam somehow. It never should have gotten to this point. She should have seen this somehow, recognized that something was wrong, helped her brother. Now it might be too late.

Upstairs in the study, Dean was absentely whittling a piece of wood with a hunting knife, his expression rocky and absent. Bobby was nowhere to be seen. "Same?" Dean asked her tersely, not looking at her as she leaned against the door frame beside him, arms crossed.

"Worse." She admitted then let out a heavy breath, shut her eyes for a second. When she opened her eyes again, Dean had stopped whittling and was staring ahead of himself unseeingly. "What are we gonna do, Dean?" Alex asked. Dean always knew what to do. When he said nothing, she shook her head ruefully, looking down at the floor unseeingly. "This is happening at the worst time possible."

A humorless smile turned her brother's mouth upward as he returned his attention to his knife and shaved more wood off the block in his hand. "Yeah. You said it."

Alex tried not to get angry at his nonchalance, but she was. She was angry and she was scared. She came to stand in front of him, demanding his attention. "He might not live through this, Dean. You get that, right?"

He met her eyes with a little hostility. "Yeah. I get that." He returned to the work of his hands, ignoring her.

Not exactly thrilled with his attitude, Alex took a second, wetting her lips briefly. Nervously. "Listen. I've been thinking," He wasn't gonna like this. "Maybe I should go get some demon blood."

Dean looked at her sharply, stilled. "What the hell for?"

"You know what for," she said. "Cold turkey is making Sam nuts. I mean, with some drugs, if you stop using, you die from withdrawal, and... and what if that happens here?" Alex used her hands weakly, gesturing emptily. "I just think, maybe, we can just give him some, work him off of it slowly—"

Dean stood up, tossed the wood and knife aside. He was clearly enraged she would even think of what she was suggesting. "No. You hear me? No! Alex!"

"I want him to live!" Alex protested, almost in a shout, then let the silence hang in disbelief. "And so should you," she accused, her voice cracking with disbelief. "So why the hell do you have a problem with that?"

"You want him to live? The way he is now?" Dean looked beside himself. "Drinking demon blood, palling around with demons, exorcising all that is unholy with his freaky mind powers?"

The reminders quieted her. "Well, no, not like that, but..." she trailed off, realizing what Dean was saying, but she didn't want to believe it. Her head shook vapidly, a silent no. "You're prepared to let him die?" She asked, hardly able to believe she even had to ask.

"Yeah, I am, okay?" Dean replied gruffly, his voice rising in defensive anger, in hopelessness. "At least he would die a human!"

Alex was shocked into momentary silence. She was at a complete loss, and her voice betrayed her inner turmoil when she spoke in a soft, stunned tone. "I can't believe you. This is our brother. Your brother. This is Sam."

A muscle jumped in her brother's jaw. He didn't yell, he didn't rage, he didn't melt down. He shut his eyes for a second, his expression twisted in pain. He couldn't look at her when he opened his eyes. "I can't let him live like that, Al. I just can't. Like a... like..."

"A monster?" she asked faintly. He just met her gaze, expression unreadable. Alex looked down. She couldn't believe it had come to this. That Sam had done this to himself. That right now, Dean was prepared to let Sam die.

There was a tense silence, then Dean set his mouth in a thin line, looking grim. "There might be one other option."

"What?" she asked, desperate for a way out, an escape from this mess. But the answer was not what she wanted to hear.

"The angels." Alex felt her expression drop, and Dean let our a frustrated huff, getting physically agitated. "Well what else can I do?" He demanded, seeming to already know that she wouldn't agree with his idea. He paced a few steps in front of her. "I'm backed into a friggin' corner here! What the hell else is left?!"

"I don't know!" she replied, exasperated, matching his elevated volume and emotion. "But we can't trust the angels, you know that!" She thought of Castiel and was filled with bitterness. It showed on
"I don't like it anymore than you do," Dean said bluntly, "but I'm kind of out of options, in case you hadn't noticed." He looked at her intently, his eyes narrowing as if he'd just seen something. "What aren't you telling me?" He'd noticed how she was thinking of Cas.

"Nothing." Alex looked at him guardedly. "Just, if you're thinking Cas will help... he won't. Not like he used to." She thought back to the other night, the way he had been so clearly done with her. She felt a pang of despair and her gaze faltered downward. "He's changed."

"Everyone's changing around here, for the worst," Dean muttered. He rubbed the palm of his hand down across his mouth and chin, by all appearances scraping the bottom of his emotional and mental barrel. Nothing else was said.

They could hear Sam shouting again, a muffled, panicked sound down in the basement.

Alex became more upset by the second at the thought of Sam down there, sick and possibly dying, and Dean up here just letting it happen. She brushed past Dean, throwing an "I'll be outside," over her shoulder.

---

That Night

How was it that this was the work of angels?

Castiel stood in the shadows of Bobby Singer's basement, his hand outstretched, freeing Sam Winchester step by step from the panic room. Just as he'd been commanded.

The angel ignored his instincts, reminding himself of what had been drilled into him: obedience is what is valued. Not feelings, not emotions. His job was not to contemplate outcomes or to give credence to the doubt he felt. It was to obey. So he obeyed, but not without the growing feeling of self-awareness, of self-loathing. Obeying used to give him assurance and certainty. But today, obeying these orders—it gave him nothing but a store of dread and the feeling that he was doing the wrong thing. But how could it be wrong if it were the Will of Heaven? A troubling thought that wouldn't leave his mind.

Castiel broke Sam's bonds, but his stomach clenched. He unlocked the door of the panic room, but he swallowed deeply with a feeling of anxiety. Giving Sam this freedom would allow the final seal to be broken and then Lucifer would walk free, just as Heaven and the archangels wanted. Castiel felt dizzying amounts of negative emotion and conviction flood him; spirit, mind, and body. Was this right? Sam would probably die in this process, and not just Sam. Millions of people in the apocalypse that would follow with Lucifer's return to earth. And yet Castiel had been told this was necessary. Right. Still, a single question kept thumping through his veins to the rhythm of his sickened heartbeat: Was it right? Was it?

Sam came out of the panic room just as predicted. He looked physically drained, sweaty, and sallow, jumpy. He stole up the stairs quietly, his expression showing that he barely believed what was happening, that he couldn't believe his luck. Castiel, invisible and silent, followed without moving, watching Sam sneak through the dark house. It was his job to ensure that Sam Winchester escaped, as ludicrous as it seemed.

Sam passed through the study, pausing to look at Bobby, who was asleep with his head on the desk. Nearby, Dean and Alex were deeply asleep on the small couch there. Dean had fallen asleep sitting up and an ancient looking book was opened and propped, forgotten, on one of his upper legs. His head lolled down onto his shoulder, his arm stretched across the top of the couch lazily. Alex was tucked beside her brother, a book under her head as a pillow. Her feet were tucked underneath her brother’s leg. They had clearly fallen asleep trying to research something. Probably something to do with Sam, who continued out of the house after looking at his family with a somber gaze. The front door clicked closed softly as Sam made his escape without raising a single alert.

Castiel remained, having done his job. Now he was left to look at the two Winchesters who he had tried so hard in particular not to want to help, not to like. Dean let out a soft snore. Alex shifted a little, let out a soft sleeping sigh, her mouth open slightly. Bruises and cuts remained, marring her face and attesting to physical pain and violence. Bruises and cuts he was forbidden to touch a hand of healing to. An increasingly familiar feeling of guilt came over Castiel.

Castiel felt as though he had betrayed them somehow. Had he? He thought if Alex knew what he was doing, she would say what she had said to him several times now. You know better than this. Something’s wrong. This isn’t you.

She was wrong. This was him. He was nothing and no one, just another in a number of the Holy Host; a creation of God purposed to carry out his will and plans. He wasn't who Alex Winchester imagined him to be, unfortunately. But one thing was certain: walking the earth in the body of a man was slowly tempting Castiel away from everything he'd held fast to before. He thought of what Anna had said to him, about how he could choose free will. The thought terrified Castiel, who had made his own decisions a few times recently and had been punished because of them.

Still… could he stand by and allow this to happen?

He shouldn't even be asking that question.

But the small and nagging voice in the back of his mind wouldn't leave him alone, wouldn't stop whispering to him. This is wrong, it said. This is wrong, and you know it. An even stranger thought came to Castiel and struck him with quiet terror. Perhaps this wasn't him—perhaps he did know better. Perhaps this was wrong. But if those things were true, he truly didn't know who he was anymore—or what Heaven had become, either.

Full of denial on both counts, Castiel took leave of Bobby Singer's home. Even though his physical location changed, his questions and doubts followed him, hounded him… threatening to remain with him to the ends of the earth itself.

Almost Two Days Later

The Impala pulled up to the Saint Regis hotel, a swanky looking high rise hotel. Not the kind of place the Winchesters stayed… ever.

"There it is," Dean said, nodding toward the white Escalade with huge rims parked nearby. "Yup. Just like I said. He's here. Little bitch thought he could throw me off his trail. Well, I know him better than he thinks." Dean was unbuckling. "I'm gonna go in there and talk some sense into him. I bet you a million bucks Ruby's in there, too. And I'm ganking her once and for all."

Alex unbuckled too, reached for the door handle.

"No."

Alex froze, confused, looking at her brother with a hard frown. "No what?"
"You wait here," he said, leaving no room for disagreement. "If I'm not back in ten… then you come in." She opened her mouth to argue, not sure why he was being like that, but he held up a hand, seeming to be too done to even hear her out. "Just, shut it. Okay? This is something I have to do." He stared out the car windshield with a stony face. "Trust me. Stay here." He hefted the demon blade in his hand, and grimly exited the car with just a brief glance at her.

Unhappy, Alex complied and slumped down into her seat churlishly. She kept a watchful if sullen eye on Dean as he entered the hotel through the grand entrance—a large glass revolving door. When Dean got all my car my rules on her, she was never too thrilled. And why the hell would he go in alone to confront Sam? What if he needed backup? A few minutes passed, in which Alex became increasingly nerve-wracked, staring at the hotel. It had been almost ten minutes, hadn't it? She couldn't wait much longer. This was insane, him going in there by himself—prick.

A flash of movement at one of the smaller, side doors caught her attention. Alex started, sat up straight when she saw a familiar figure dart out. Ruby ducked around the corner of the building after throwing a suspicious backward glance out over her shoulder. She disappeared from sight there, but Alex was already getting out of the car.

Sprinting toward the corner Ruby had disappeared behind, Alex reached it and edged up the building to peek around the corner cautiously. Ruby was walking fast toward the back of the hotel, as if she were making a quiet escape. No Dean or Sam followed after Ruby, but Alex wasn't pausing to consider why. She was seeing red, and pure, enraged murder was coursing through her veins. That unholy bitch was the one who had done this to Sam and she was as good as dead.

Alex dashed across the maybe thirty feet between her and the unaware demon, her pulse pounding. As she closed in, Ruby heard her and turned halfway, but not in time. Alex was already there, ruthlessly grabbing Ruby by the hair and smashing her head with brutal force into the brick wall of the hotel, bruising and scraping her own knuckles in the assault. The demon was caught off guard, but not for long at all. Grunting, Ruby grabbed onto Alex. Her grip was like a vice, and she pushed, smashing Alex shoulder-first into the wall before backhanding Alex across the face. Too high on adrenaline to feel the pain yet Alex was already reeling her fist back, returning the favor and punching Ruby in the throat, hard. The demon stumbled back a little, dazed, and using the temporary lull Alex snatched up a loose, fist-sized piece of brick in her hand. She practically roared as she struck Ruby across the face with it, once, twice, three times.

Grabbing blindly, Ruby managed to get two fistfuls of Alex's shirt and then threw her down onto the pavement, but Alex hung onto Ruby, dragging her down too. There was a loud thud as the girls hit the ground, rolling. Alex still had the brick, and smashed Ruby in the side of the head with it, using the momentum of the scuffle to dominate Ruby and gain the upper hand. Alex straddled her, stared down, out of breath, murder in her eyes. Ruby laughed, showing the blood in her teeth. One of her eyes was already swelling up. "You don't have the knife, dumbass," Ruby taunted. "What are you gonna do, beat my face in all day?"

"I don't need a knife, you bitch." Alex snarled, dropping the brick and yanking Ruby forward by her shirt she began to shout an exorcism. "Exorcizamus te omnis—" Ruby's eyes went wide, and her hands shot up, yanking Alex down by the back of her neck, clapping the other hand across her mouth, trying to silence her, yanking her along into another roll, so that Alex was now the one on the ground with Ruby on top. Alex bit down on one of Ruby's fingers hard, drawing blood and Ruby yowled, letting go for a second. "Immundus spiritus; omnis satanica—" Alex continued, and Ruby, eyes going even wider in genuine fear, clamped both of her hands down on Alex's throat with devastating, crushing force, making it impossible for Alex to speak, breathe, or make a sound. Struggling for air, Alex weakly grabbed her knife—a regular hunting knife—out of her belt loop, and with desperate, last-ditch effort she stabbed it into the side of Ruby's neck and yanked the blade forward, leaving a gaping wound in Ruby's throat.

Bleeding profusely out of the huge gash in her neck, Ruby stumbled back and stood shakily, her expression horrified, her hand on her neck. "You crazy bitch!" she shrieked. Alex opened her mouth to continue the incantation, but nothing came out. Her throat was killing her and her voice was only a whisper. She stood up, panting, Ruby's blood dripping down her jaw, her neck. With her clothes ripped, her face and hands scraped up and bruised, her dagger glare, her iron-like grip on her knife, she must have looked truly fearful—Ruby was withering under Alex's stare, stepping back a little. The demon bled heavily from her neck, even though she held a hand against it. There was a gash in her cheek, her eye was swelling, and she had a huge scrape down the other side of her face too. She was barely recognizable, and no longer looked sure, in fact, she looked afraid. Alex took a single step toward her… and Ruby turned around and fled, leaving Alex standing there.

Alex thought about giving chase. But without the demon blade and without a voice to exorcise, it was a bad idea. Dammit. She stumbled into the hotel through a side service entrance, dodging curious eyes as she searched for the honeymoon suite where Dean had said Sam would be. She found the room quickly, a little lightheaded and feeling woozy, but pushing past it out of terror that Ruby had done something to Sam and Dean both.

The door of the honeymoon suite was half open and there was shattered glass on the floor, the room partition had been ripped in half, various other smashed and broken stuff littered the place. And there, on the floor by the bed, a sight that would never leave Alex's memories. Dean was on the ground, turning blue with Sam over him, his hands crushed down on Dean's neck. "Sam, stop!" Alex rasped in total horrified shock, and what would have been a shout was a sand-papery whisper. She ran over and tried to pull Sam off of Dean, grabbing his shoulder and pulling hard. He was too big, and too heavy. When she grabbed at him, he shoved her away, carelessly. She staggered backwards, but was already fumbling back forward, grabbing the first thing she could—a fancy blown glass lamp—and smashing it over her twin's head, one thing in mind: save Dean's life. The shattered glass went flying in all directions and Sam was standing up, staring her down with absolute hatred. He seemed so much taller than she ever remembered him being, so powerful and dark and his eyes flashed at her menacingly. She almost didn't recognize him and she shrank away, abruptly stricken with fear. On the floor, Dean was groaning and wheezing, clutching his neck and gasping for air as he recovered.

"You shouldn't have done that, Alex," Sam said, his voice filled with disdain as he bore down on her fast and hard, shocking her completely. It happened so fast. He grabbed her by the shoulder and backhanded her ruthlessly across the face then threw her down onto the ground with no remorse. She fell face first, her chin colliding with the hard floor with a painful crack, her hands not fast enough to break the crashing fall she took. She was stunned, tasting her own blood as her face stung from his assault. With her hands flat against the floor, she could only turn and stare up at Sam in shocked terror, disbelief, breathless pain. Sam's expression changed. He was breathing hard as he looked down at her, hands limp at his sides. Horror flashed over his features, as if he hadn't known what he'd done, and he took a single, stumbling step back from her.

"Sam! Wh—what have you done?!" Dean asked, his voice broken and high with disbelief. He'd rolled over onto his side, supporting himself on an arm. He was staring at Sam in gaping shock, with horrified wide eyes.

Sam looked back at Dean, and for a moment, his expression was pained, confused, lost. And then, it changed, grew cold and dark. "You don't know me. You never did. And you never will." Sam looked at Alex, his expression chilling over, his eyes dark, cruel, cold again. She stared up at him in terror as he stood over her, and for a minute she wondered if he was going to try and kill her, too.
And then wordlessly, he turned, heading for the door.

Dean's voice, shaking, stopped him. "You walk out that door, don't you ever come back. You hear me?"

Sam paused, his back to them. "Yeah," he said cynically. Without looking back at them he left; the sound of his heavy footsteps against the carpeted hallway fading out.

Alex stared after her twin with blurry vision. What had just happened? Sam—how could you? She heard Dean crawling over to her. He was wincing and his face was scraped up bad, bleeding in places. But he was just looking at her, stricken with worry. "Lemme see, sweetheart," he said gently, and she almost lost it then, at the gentle way he touched her chin, her jawline. She couldn't look at him as he examined her face. "You okay?" he asked, and he sounded close to a breakdown.

She groaned against the pain and bitterly spat out a mouthful blood. Her heart was so very heavy. She was losing her composure fast. "No. No, I'm not." she rasped out. Her oldest brother pulled her into a tight hug and she clutched him with every ounce of strength she had left as she lost her emotional strength. She began to weep like she'd lost a brother, because she was pretty sure she just had. Dean tried to comfort her, but he was every bit as ruined by grief in that moment, too.

Invisible to the stunned and wounded siblings, two angels watched. Zachariah still had an arm out in front of Castiel who had been about to intervene, about to stop Sam from hitting his sister. His hands were clenched at his sides and his face showed an expression of conflict and disapproval and clear upset.

"This has gone too far," Castiel said lowly, watching as brother and sister embraced in mutual misery—both of them cried. Her loud and hiccuping. Him all but silent.

Zachariah clapped his hand onto Cas's shoulder, not concerned at all. "Let it ride, Castiel," he said breezily, giving Castiel a playfully pointed look. "This thing just has to run its course."

Castiel only glanced balefully at his brother. He was truly beginning to disagree.

The more that happened, the closer Sam got to doing his part to raise Lucifer… the more Castiel despaired.

This wasn't right. None of it.

The Next Day

Alex laid still in the bedroom, the one she'd stayed in last year when she'd lived here with Bobby. She could hear Bobby and Dean arguing. Again. Bobby was insisting that they needed to go after Sam, talk him down. But Bobby hadn't seen what Sam did, he hadn't seen. The look in Sam's eye, the merciless, monstrous way he'd attacked his own blood. Alex hadn't slept at all last night after all that. Instead she'd walked miles and miles down the road in pitch darkness, not even going anywhere, just needing to move, to try and leave some pain behind. She'd smoked cigarette after cigarette as she tried to understand what had happened. When Dean had realized she was missing and called her phone in a panic, he'd torn down the road in his car to come get her. But once he'd found her (eleven miles from Bobby's house), they'd sat on the hood together and said next to nothing. Just watched the sunrise on the side of the road somewhere, maybe trying to act like it was a normal day for them, like their brother wasn't a homicidal demon-blood addicted psychopath.

They were back at the Singer residence now and the reality remained. Sam was gone and she and Alex sat up, caught sight of herself in the mirror of the bureau and was given somber pause. With a puffy eye, a scraped, violet-bruised chin, a split lip, she looked like a battered woman, like a punching bag. A dark bruise discolored her cheek—the place where Sam had hit her. The memory of it replayed and her throat closed up in sadness. Her chin was a scabbing mess from where he'd thrown her down and Alex ran fingers across the wound, wincing. It was still killing her, and her entire jaw ached. Whatever. Pain was nothing new. It would all heal eventually. Her eyes lowered to traverse the dark bruises all along her neck and throat from where Ruby had tried to choke her to death. Alex's voice was still barely there, a sad whispery rasping sound. Maybe in a few days when her windpipe healed a little better she'd regain her voice's strength. For now, she sounded like she had laryngitis.

Overall, she found her appearance to be depressing. She looked hopeless and defeated. She felt those things, too, and bowed her head down, swung her legs over the side of the bed, not wanting to see herself anymore. How could they ever come back from this? Honestly, she felt that this was the end. The end of her, Sam, and Dean. Maybe the end of everything. It was hard to see the light at the end of the tunnel on this one.

Alex looked down at her feet, sighed hollowly through her nose, feeling tired and sick to her bones. And then without warning her feet were no longer on the wood flooring of Bobby's house, but on a shining marble floor. She jumped up in shock and realized she'd just jumped out of a chair, not her bed. Looking around she quickly became totally confused. She was in a lavishly decorated room that was trimmed with gold. The walls were accented with austere paintings, marble statues, crown moulding, expensive and ornate solid oak furniture.

Dean was suddenly there, too, appearing in front of her without warning. His mouth dropped open in confusion.

"Hello, Dean. Hello, Alex." In unison, the disoriented Winchesters whirled to see Castiel standing at the other end of the room. "It's almost time," he announced.

"Time for what?" Dean asked. But Castiel disappeared without another word. Dean let out a low growl of frustration and marched toward the door, tried to open it—but it wouldn't budge. Great, they were locked in. Prisoners, then? That didn't make sense.

Alex looked around sharply, assessing the room. "What did he mean, 'it's time'? And where the hell are we?" Her voice rasped weakly. Her veins were racing with adrenaline at the sudden change in location.

Dean stopped rattling the door and turned around, looked remorseful, contrite. He lost his fire and seemed to understand. "What?" Alex asked, feeling mildly panicked at the look on his face.

"I gave myself to the angels, okay?" He looked at her with a hard, defensive expression as she stared at him speechlessly, eyes gone wide. "I thought..." he trailed off pitifully and pinched the bridge of his nose briefly. 'I dunno what I thought."

Alex leveled Dean with an expression that was baleful. "What, you don't ask me for advice anymore? Dean—! This is serious shit you're in to!" More than angry, she was freaked out.

"I know, I know," he muttered, dodging her incensed stare.

"What does that even mean, you 'gave yourself to the angels'?” She demanded, her strained voice cracking. "What are they gonna do with you?!"
"I dunno. Apparently not HELP US!" He shouted the words 'help us' at the ceiling balefully, but no angels showed up.

Alex clenched her jaw tightly and looked up. She wasn't going to sit around and wait. "Castiel, get your little winged ass back in here right now," she all but growled. Not the most polite way of asking him to come back, but she didn't care about being polite to him anymore. Not after he'd been such an asshole after the Jimmy incident. Two could play at that game.

Castiel appeared behind them, alerting them to his presence with a question. "What is it?"

Alex turned around and marched right over to him. His face was stoic and rigid, set hard and seemingly apathetic. "Let us outta here," she demanded evenly, keeping her anger on the down low.

"I'm afraid I can't do that," he replied robotically.

Alex's eyebrows rose up challengingly. "Can't or won't?" He made no answer and Alex wet her lips, getting ready to hand his ass to him verbally. She raised a lecturing finger at him. "Listen here you—" he disappeared rudely and Alex stopped speaking mid-sentence and stared at the empty space in front of herself.

"Good job," Dean commented sarcastically. "You really told him how it is."

Alex shot her brother a dark look. "Bite me." She looked at the painting next to her—it was huge and depicted an angel in flowing robes, extending a benevolent hand out over a child. What a crock of shit. She picked up a fancy blown glass vase that was on the table next to her and she threw it at the painting, hitting the angel right in the face. Glass flew everywhere and the angel in the painting remained smiling, peaceful.

Dean was mildly amused at her useless action. "That helped."

"Fuck off." Alex plopped down into a plush chair and put her head in her hands, groaned. This was a nightmare. A nightmare. She rubbed her forehead, trying to make the headache go away.

"Hello, Dean, you're looking fit!"

Alex shot back up to her feet at the new voice. A tall, balding man with an oddly perky smile was standing there. He was dressed in a suit. Behind him, Castiel stood with a blank face. Dean came forward quickly to stand near his sister—as if his physical presence could protect her against an angel.

The balding man looked from Dean to Alex. "And, Alexandra, is it? So nice to finally put a face with the name!" He chuckled, by all appearances friendly and pleasant. Too friendly, too pleasant. "I, am Zachariah," he said, indicating himself with a flourish. "You might have heard of me?"

Yes. She had, and she immediately felt apprehension. "Pleasure, I'm sure," she rasped flatly. Next to her, Dean tensed. Something was going down, but what was it? Behind Zachariah, Castiel came forward to Alex and then lightly gripped her by the arm.

"Hey! What—" she protested, even as Dean stepped forward, as if to yank Castiel off of her.

But then she and Cas were suddenly in a different room, completely alone. This one was a soft mauve color, with black gilded furniture and amber accents. It was dimmer in this room. "What the hell, Cas?" Alex demanded in her strained voice, freaking out at the abrupt separation from her brother. "What's going on? Is Dean in danger?"
Cas had let go of her and was standing in front of her, his eyebrows knit together. "No. Of course not. Zachariah merely wants to discuss things with your brother. Private things."

Alex glared at him for a second, then looked around the room again. There were no doors and she didn't like it. "Where are we?" She demanded. This was insane. "Why are Dean and I here?"

"For your safety," he said, and looked down purposefully, as if trying to hide something. "The final seal will be broken soon."

Alex's pulse rocketed upwards in alarm. "Then what the hell are we doing here?! We need to stop it!"

"No," Castiel said, shocking her. He sounded conflicted and looked down again. "We will not stop it."

Alex looked at him in incredulous confusion. "Why?"

She didn't miss the flicker of doubt there in his expression, the way his eyes took in her bruised and battered face, but his voice held steady. He delivered his statement blankly, forcefully. "It has been commanded," he replied. "Lucifer will rise."

For a minute she thought he was going to have a good explanation, but when he said that, she felt like she'd been hit by a ton of bricks. "Son of bitch," she breathed, feeling herself go slack-jawed as she realized what was happening. She wasn't sure whether to be pissed off or terrified. "All this time you've been telling us how much we don't want Lucifer to come to town and now…?" She searched for words as she quickly got riled up. "Now you're making sure he does?!!" Castiel said nothing. Alex looked at him like he was stark raving mad. "You're insane. Insane, all of you, you winged freaks!"

She turned away from him and took a couple stunned steps, lost in abject disbelief, mind racing to put the pieces together. It felt like the rug had been yanked out from underneath her feet. "I'm sorry that you're upset," Castiel's deep voice said from somewhere behind her.

She whirled, disgusted with his act. "Right. You care so much don't you?" She snapped, then started in on him, letting her righteous anger propel her forward to him. "You know, I don't know what your deal is, but I mean, really? Pretending to be my friend? Pretending to care? Getting me to trust you? You're such a fucking liar!" She tried to shove him, but he was immovable. Her anger was making her emotional, and tears of frustration sprang to her eyes. She hated herself for believing him and thought all his talk of compassion was an act—had the angels assigned Cas to her and told him to earn her trust, get her to fall for him, believe he was a nice guy? Was him healing her voice a way to do that? She was crushed thinking these things. "Have you ever said anything true to me, ever?" She asked, trying to remain hard and angry, not bitter and tearful. But she sounded hurt and vulnerable.

Castiel's expression changed at her question, showed stunned disbelief. "Yes, of course I have," he said, and was that offended hurt resting in his eyes? Was that soft vulnerability lilting in his voice?

Alex was shocked at his display of emotion but toughened herself. "I'm having a hard time believing that."

Again his features were swept by disbelief and confusion, as if he couldn't believe that she would accuse him of lying to her. His eyes went down and moved back and forth quickly in distressed thought. And then what he said next floored her. "I… I was going to tell Dean about the angel's plans to bring forth Satan." He looked at her directly. "It's why I was torn out of Jimmy Novak."
"What?" She asked softly, because if that were true, her negative assumptions about Cas were wrong, at least partially.

"It seemed wrong to me, the plan to allow Lucifer to rise. At the time I was... I was confused." He was still confused, and it showed. Confused and contrite. The way he was looking at her seemed pleading. "I never wanted to misguide you. I never wanted..." he trailed off and his face showed apprehensiveness and conflict. He glanced around the room, as if for eavesdroppers or onlookers. He set his jaw, seeming to revert to the harder exterior he preferred to display. "I shouldn't even be telling you this."

She could see it—just faintly—how Castiel wanted to help, was willing in some deep part of himself, but couldn't quite get there. The smallest instance of hope took hold of Alex, who stepped forward to him and spoke in intense, hushed tones, urging him to action. "Cas, if you knew this was wrong back then—if you were gonna tell Dean about it—why don't you do something now?! It's not right. We both know that!"

He shook his head no gravely, clinging onto whatever had been indoctrinated into him. "Try to understand," he said, but his voice lacked the conviction that had been there just a moment ago. "There's a bigger picture here."

"Is that what they're telling you?" Alex asked, and grabbed him gently by the arms, imploring him, trying to get him to really look at her. "Cas, the apocalypse—it'll kill so many people. Aren't you supposed to protect people?"

Her words made him hesitate. "I'm supposed to carry out God's will," he said. But it looked like he was questioning himself internally.

"How can this be his will?" Alex asked. "Have you stood in front of him and heard him say with his own voice that this is what he wants?" Cas said nothing, just met her waiting gaze with eyes that were intensely uncertain. Alex wanted to shake sense into him—why wouldn't he listen to reason? "You know this is wrong, I know you do!" She exclaimed, getting frustrated to the point of wanting to punch a wall. "I can see it when I look at your stupid face!" She let go of him, shoving again to no effect.

Castiel stood therein wretched silence, his arms hanging at his sides uselessly. "What I feel is not important," he said hollowly, eyes low and glazed over in dejection.

Losing her fire, Alex went quiet and still, felt her shoulders slump in fatigued defeat. Maybe Cas wanted to help somewhere deep inside, but he apparently couldn't get there. He was too brainwashed, too afraid. And Alex shook her head, set her mouth in a thin line to keep from losing composure. "You know what... I just wanna leave," she said, needing to see her oldest brother, be within the safety and familiarity of his presence. "Take me back to Dean."

Castiel was reluctant to answer her. "Not yet."

She crossed her arms, looked at him with a faintly challenging expression. "What, are you holding me hostage or something?"

His ever-constant frown deepened. "No, of course not."

"Then let me leave." Her weak, sandpapery voice trembled with a fearful and demanding quality.

"I can't," he told her softly, and he had the audacity to look sad about it. She saw how he looked over her beat-up face again—saw his eyes sweep over the bruises, the swollen eye, the scraped up
"Are you in very much pain?" He asked quietly, startling her because of the tone in his voice. Alex tried to look stony in response to his caring question. "Don't try and change the subject."

Castiel seemed to be vexed, puzzled, and empathetic all at once as his eyes continued to study her beaten appearance. "Sam shouldn't have done this to you," he said in surprisingly softness, and his deeply husky voice was filled a sadness that Alex found offensive. "I am... truly sorry," he said, sounding as though he were admitting some big secret.

"Sorry for what?" She asked, pissed off at everything and not liking how he was looking at her or making her feel.

A muscle jerked in his cheek. "I could have stopped it."

His words paused her. "...So why didn't you?"

He thought about it for a moment as his face tilted down in somberness. He sounded ashamed of himself. "They told me not to."

What a damn pushover. Alex reacted by scoffing and rolling her eyes at him. "Aren't you supposed to be my guardian angel?" She asked rudely, giving him an ugly look. "Great job." Her words appeared to hit him hard, and chastened and ashamed of himself, Castiel looked down in contrition. It would have been better if he'd gotten angry at her—that's what she'd expected and wanted. His downcast eyes made her feel badly and she softened a great deal helplessly. "I didn't mean..." she trailed off, not sure what to say. How did he keep having this effect on her? She wanted to be furious with him for being so obstinate and stuck in his beliefs... but all she felt was the urge to help him and to see him act like an individual, use his mind, do the right thing. So she tried again.

"Look. Anna said you've been struggling." She abruptly gave a little laugh that was equal parts helpless and cynical. "And I think it's because Heaven is full of shit and you know it!" Castiel didn't join her in finding the statement amusing in the least and her tense little smile faded into a pleading expression. It was a hard hit to her pride, but she chanced it anyway, believing maybe he would listen to her. "You could help us Cas. It's not too late. Are you just gonna take orders even when you know they're wrong?" He said nothing, but he was thinking about what she was saying. She pressed. "Are you just gonna stand by when you could do something?"

His eyebrows were drawn closely together and he shook his head slowly, his face working hard as he struggled to answer her. "It's not my place t—"

"It is your place," she cut him off vehemently. "You have a mind, so use it!"

His bright blue eyes met hers wretchedly and she saw how he was so resistant to what she was saying, how torn up he was inside. "I am an angel. I'm not allowed free will. I'm not like you."

He frustrated her to the core and she wanted to give up. "God you're a coward," she muttered angrily, then threw a hand out and let her voice get loud again—it rasped pathetically, screeching almost. "So what if it's not allowed?! If it's the right thing to do, you should do it!"

Cas was quiet for a moment, considering her words with a physically ill expression. "You make it sound simple."

"It is simple," she retorted in vast frustration then promptly sat down onto the nearby velvet chaise in exhausted defeat. She was done with this pointless conversation. She could tell that he wanted, in some tiny place inside, to be on her side and to help. But apparently his angel-nature was too ingrained and he couldn't overcome it. Maybe it was wrong of her to ask him to risk everything for her and her family, but that didn't stop her—she decided to try one last time. Clasping her hands between her knees and running her eyes over the scrapes there, she shook her head and swallowed thickly.

"Listen. Sam is my brother." Her cracked voice was just a whisper. She had lost her anger, and in its place was a sort of hopeless despair. "I love him. No matter what. And I wanna save him—more than anything. You can't understand that. You can't. Because if you did... you'd let Dean and I go save him from Lilith. You'd give us that chance. You'd help us." Dejected, she balanced an elbow on her knee and bowed her face into her hand. The tender, bruised skin made her wince and then make the softest little sound of pained protest. Son of a bitch her whole face was like a war zone. It hurt so bad. Honestly, she wanted to cry from hopeless frustration and the physical pain too. But she held it in, refusing to succumb.

Cas came and stood in front of her, shocking her when he knelt down in front of her, right in front of her. Hand falling away from her face, senses suddenly shocked into overdrive—what is he doing?—she stared at him even as he looked up into her eyes with a soft, vulnerable expression. He was so close, definitely in her personal space, and she felt backed into a corner, susceptible to him. It shocked her further when his hand came to the side of her face, an entirely unexpected action that Alex briefly misinterpreted as affection. She flinched, confused—then realized he was healing her.

The familiar bright warm light reached from his large hand to inside of her, under her skin, leaving her feeling warm, comforted. His eyes held hers the entire time and Alex felt her face twisting into a questioning, almost fearful expression. Why was he doing this? His physical closeness left her nerve-wracked. No one in the world had ever looked at her as intensely as he did, like his gaze pierced into her soul itself, like he saw all of who she was. Her body was stiff as a board of wood all over and she realized she was holding her breath as she thought about how powerful and capable he was. He seemed so lost and unsure of himself sometimes that she just forgot. But right then, at that moment, she knew how magnificent and strong he was and she was awed by him all over again. His hand came away from her face—which no longer hurt, and in a daze she touched her cheek then her chin, finding smooth skin there.

Disconcerted, Alex gazed at Cas guardedly. His expression was pensive almost and drew her in, made her wonder about him. He confused her completely. Was he trying to get her to stop bitching at him right now? Was he trying to help? Why the hell did he keep looking at her like that? "I... I thought you weren't supposed to do that," she said softly. Her voice had returned to normal and was no longer rasping or broken.

Her words broke the moment and his expression grew a little more grim. "I'm not." His jaw clenched, barely perceptibly, and then he was abruptly just gone with a burst of wind, shocking her all over again.

She stood, looking around with a slack jaw. "Cas?" She waited a second. "Cas."

He didn't return.

Alex was left to wonder and worry about what the hell was happening. She was left with questions and confusion, as usual.
some higher power was looking out for her and her family. However, that bigger power had a name (Castiel) and a face (that she hated), and was an asshole. Maybe. She sighed and put a hand over her face. Maybe not.

What was he? Really? She thought of the first time she saw him. She'd been terrified of this new, powerful creature who looked like an average man. Then as time had crept onward, she'd learned that he was a stern and dedicated angel, a soldier come to earth from Heaven. At first she'd thought him emotionless and weird and more than a little annoying. He hadn't been someone to trust. But glimpses of an entirely different Castiel had peeked through. A Castiel who was gentler and curious, compassionate. A Castiel who wanted to do the right thing and wanted the best for humanity. A Castiel who had wanted her friendship. That's why right now she was so puzzled. Could he really stand by and let Lucifer rise? Let the apocalypse happen? If he cared, shouldn't that move him to action?

She thought about how he'd said he was about to tell Dean about the Lucifer situation and how he'd been ripped out of his vessel to prevent that. That was a pretty big move, wasn't it? She remembered the ripped up manufacturing plant they'd found Jimmy in, the place from which Cas had been forcibly, violently dragged back to Heaven. The more she thought about it, it was a wonder they hadn't killed or imprisoned Castiel forever for planning to tell them everything—wasn't that treason, basically? To go against Heaven and the angels or whatever like that? He'd come back from Heaven even more robotic than she ever remembered him being… he'd acted cold and brushed her off, by all appearances done being her friend and helper. And yet here she sat today, healed by his hand even though she'd heard Uriel tell him, point-blank, he wasn't allowed to.

He cared. All of it pointed her to that thought over and over again.

Suddenly, as if knowing she were thinking of him, Castiel appeared to stand a few paces in front of her. Startled, she stood up, her guard coming up immediately. He was reaching out to her. "It's time to return to Dean," he said, not explaining why he'd been gone or what was happening. Only holding his hand out, indicating that she take it. She hesitated, then did as he said. The instant her hand slipped into his, she felt them moving. But she was looking at their hands, noticing how much smaller her hand seemed in his bigger one.

When she looked up, they were standing in the beautiful room that Dean was in. With his back to them, Alex's brother was holding his phone in the air, as if he were trying to get a signal. The angel and the hunter let go of each other's hands at the same instant.

"You can't reach him, Dean," Castiel said, announcing their presence. "You're outside your coverage zone." Alex looked at the angel oddly, given pause. Was that... a joke?

Dean turned, and upon seeing Alex, relief washed over his features. Then, a perplexed frown. "You're... all better." His eyes went to Cas, appraisingly, then back to Alex, who was coming to him. "You okay?" he asked intensely, grabbing her by both shoulders, forcing her to look at him as he inspected her.

"Yeah, fine," she replied in a short tone. Satisfied, Dean let her go and proceeded to stare down Castiel. He was mad, that much was clear. He started in on the angel, sauntering slowly, a dangerous glint in his eyes.

"Okay, first of all? Take her from me again and I'll kill you," Dean threatened casually. He gave a short little derisive chuckle. "You halos are really starting to piss me off," he said. "Zachariah's been in here talking my ear off about your big plans for good old Lucifer... am I right to assume you knew about all that this whole time?"
Castiel said nothing, but Dean seemed to get confirmation from the expression on the angel's face. Alex frowned a little. Why didn't Cas tell Dean about how he'd been about to tell them? He remained silent. "Yeah, good, right," Dean said, scoffing. "That's just great. Wonderful. So, what are you gonna do to Sam?"

Meeting his gaze, Cas lifted his chin slightly, appearing almost sad about what he was about to say. "Nothing. He's going to do it to himself."

"What's that supposed to mean?" Dean asked, and Castiel just looked away, silent. "Oh, right, right," Dean said scornfully. "Got to toe the company line." He chuckled, a humorless sound, then let the smile fall away. He stared at the angel balefully, lowering his voice to a soft, baleful tone. "Why are you here Cas?"

Cas looked at Alex, then Dean, his expression drawn with a sense of finality. "We've been through much together, haven't we?" His words, said with a wistfulness that spoke of a goodbye, stilled both Dean and Alex. Castiel held Dean's gaze pensively. "I consider having known you as a privilege." He looked at Alex more hesitantly. "An honor. And before I leave, I just wanted to say that I'm sorry it ended like this."

So he was really going to go through with it. Screw them over then ditch out and leave them in the wind, without help. Alex shook her head, silently and helplessly cursing him, this room, her entire life.

Dean wasn't silent like she was. "Sorry?" He asked quietly as anger flashed in his eyes. Without warning, he drew back and punched Castiel in the face... who wasn't affected in the least.

Dean stifled a groan as he cradled his hand to himself. Alex gave her brother a look. "Yeah. Hurts like a bitch, doesn't it?" She muttered, letting a dark glance go Cas's way.

"You screwed us over, Cas," Dean said loudly. "You need need a bigger word than sorry!"

Castiel's voice rose too, and his features worked emphatically. "Try to understand—this is long foretold," he said, using his hands in emphasis like a human would. "This is your—"

"Destiny?" Dean interrupted. His anger wasn't his normal anger. It was desperate and scared and shaken. "Don't give me that 'holy' crap! Destiny, God's plan... it's all a bunch of lies, you poor, stupid son of a bitch! It's just a way for your bosses to keep me and keep you in line!" Castiel's expression was unreadable, but Alex almost thought he looked offended. "You know what's real?"

Dean was becoming almost emotional now. "People. Families—that's real. And you're gonna watch them all burn?" Dean swept his arm out, suddenly indicating Alex, who stood by the table in the middle of the room. "You're gonna let her burn?" He jabbed a finger to his own chest. "Me burn? After you saved us both?"

Dean had touched a nerve and Castiel looked startled, unsure of how to respond, completely rattled. "I—I'm trying to tell you," he said, fumbling a little, like he was trying to call to mind what he was supposed to say—not what he wanted to say. "Much must be lost so that there may be everlasting peace for us all."

"That what they drill into you at bible camp?" Dean retorted sharply. Castiel's gaze faltered away tellingly. "Yeah, you can take your peace..." Dean growled, "and shove it up your lily-white ass!" Cas's eyes narrowed in confusion as he looked at Dean once again. "'Cause I'll take this miserable existence called life—with all its craziness and pain and guilt and drama; I'll even take Sam as is! It's a lot better than being some Stepford bitch in paradise."
Dean's voice raised to a gravelly shout. "This is simple, Cas!" At this point, Castiel turned away, fed up or maybe unable to take it. But Dean didn't stop, continued to berate the back of Cas's head. "No more crap about being a good soldier. There is a right and there is a wrong here, and you know it." From where Alex stood, she could see the side of Cas's face. He looked conflicted and at that moment he glanced at her, maybe thinking about how she'd told him pretty much the same. That he knew better.

"Look at me!" Dean demanded as he grabbed the angel's shoulder roughly, turning Cas back to him. "You were gonna help me once, weren't you?" At that question, Cas looked away from Dean quickly. "You were gonna warn us about all this, before they dragged you back to bible land." Dean swallowed, his tone becoming pleading and desperate. "So… help me—now. Please. Help us."

Castiel's shoulders were stiff and his face was pinched. He looked at Alex for a long beat, considering. And then he looked at Dean. "What would you have me do?"

"Take us to Sam!" Dean exclaimed urgently. "We can stop this before it's too late!"

The angel's voice grew more urgent, too. "I do that, we will all be hunted—we'll all be killed." He looked at Alex meaningfully, maybe in an attempt to appeal to Dean's protective nature. Alex was drifting closer, drawn in by the rising tensions and how clear it was that Cas was really, really thinking about helping them.

Dean shook his head earnestly. "If there is anything worth dying for… this is it."

Slowly, Castiel began to shake his head no, hesitating. And hope was crushed for Alex and Dean in that moment as Cas lost his courage and looked down in denial. "I can't," he said gravelly.

Dean's face went cold in anger. "You… spineless… soulless son of a bitch." He walked a few steps off toward Alex, then past her. She could tell he was at the point where he was seeing red. "What do you care about dying, anyway?" Dean muttered. "You're already dead."

"Dean—" Cas appealed.

Dean just barked "I'm done!" and kept his back to the angel.

Castiel was now looking at Alex in a mixture of hopefulness and fear. As if he wanted forgiveness, as if he wanted one of them to pat him on the back. He approached her, his expression intense. "You must understand. I cannot assist you. I must obey."

She shrugged, over trying to convince him. "Yeah. Whatever. That's your decision to make," she replied cynically.

"Again?" Alex looked at him for a few seconds and she was sad, didn't bother to hide it. "I already did. Or do you not remember?" She threw an errant hand out, let it slap down against her leg. "You shouldn't need to be convinced, Cas. You should look at this situation and know, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that you're playing on the wrong team. That you're not serving God, you're serving some power-tripped out angels who have their own sick agenda. It's a mess." She used a hand as emphasis. "It's a mess. Hope you're happy." He looked almost disillusioned, like he expected her to go crazy, shout, cuss him out. But she was too tired for all that, and didn't want to waste the energy. "Cas, I won't stand here and beg you." She gave him a pointed look and folded her arms defensively. "I know how that ends." She was bitter and let her face twist up into a mean. expression. "So… have a nice day. It's been real. Thanks for fucking up our lives."

His mouth was open softly, his eyebrows knit closely together. He had some nerve looking so hurt, trying to play the victim. "Alex—"

"No." She gritted her teeth and looked away from him and at a random spot on the wall beside her. He wasn't going to make her feel bad for him again—she wouldn't allow it. "If you're not gonna help us… just go away. Leave us alone."

Castiel looked at Dean, whose back was still turned to him, then at Alex, who wouldn't look at him. And without another choice, he left with the softest sound of wings against air. Alex's eyes shifted to the spot he'd been and her hard expression fell. She shut her eyes bitterly as her tightly-held shoulders slumped down. "He's gone," she told her brother softly.

Dean turned around, expression rigid. "There's no way out of here. I tried."

"Yeah, I know," she said, having tried in the other room she'd been stuck in. "This is bullshit." All but defeated, Alex sank down onto the love seat, leaning over her knees, exhausted from emotional duress. "So. What now?"

Dean was pacing in front of her. But unlike a minute ago, there wasn't angry fire in his steps. "The apocalypse. The end of the world, I guess." He paused, his eyes downcast. He looked as done as she was with the whole thing. Just, tired, exhausted, over it. Like her.

Alex let out a heavy, bated sigh. "We tried, Dean."

He sat beside her. "Not hard enough," he said softly. In that moment, he looked so much older than he was.

Alex looked at him, attempting a small, pained smile. "At least we're together?" He looked at her, his attempt at a smile as pained as hers was. He put his arm around her, she leaned her head down onto his shoulder, and they stayed like that for a long time, mourning the loss of Sam in silence.

Dean paced the length of the room yet again, having become a nervous wreck of angry energy. Alex didn't miss the fact that he was eyeing the burgers on the table as he passed by it over and over again. He paused suddenly, reached for one. Alex sat up straighter. "Hey. Don't eat that."

He turned and looked back at her grumpily. "I'm starving," he protested. "We've been here for hours."

"Just don't," she said. He threw the burger down angrily.

Suddenly Castiel appeared behind Dean, grabbed him by the shoulder, and shoved him up against the wall, pressing a hand against his mouth. Alex jumped to her feet in alarm at the sudden appearance and action. "What are you doing?!"

Castiel looked at her, his expression deer-in-the-headlights but determined. "The right thing."

_Oh my god_-her heart burst in amazed hope as she realized he was going to help them. Stunned, Alex watched as he drew Ruby's knife out of his coat. He looked back at Dean, who nodded. Castiel let go of him and slashed his own arm open with the knife. Blood flowed out, and Castiel began smearing it onto the wall. Alex, who had come to stand beside Dean, watched in a mixture of rising hope…and also fear. Castiel was working fast, and he looked afraid. And when an all-powerful angel was afraid, it didn't seem right to not feel a little scared, too.
"Castiel!" Came a loud shout. It was Zachariah, and he barreled across the room at them, livid. "Would you mind explaining just what the hell you're doing?"

Castiel made a final stroke onto the sigil he had drawn and slammed his hand into the center of it. In a violent, blinding flash of white light, Zachariah vanished, leaving the Winchesters stunned. "He won't be gone long." Castiel said, his voice tinged with urgency. "We have to find Sam now."

"Where is he?" Dean asked.

"I don't know—but I know who does. We have to stop him, Dean, from killing Lilith."

At that, the Winchesters both glanced at each other in confusion. "But Lilith's gonna break the final seal," Dean protested, his tone accusing.

"Lilith is the final seal!" Castiel exclaimed, blowing their minds. "She dies, the end begins."

Dean and Alex stared at him in horror, trying to process the information as he grabbed each of them around the wrist. "Now, hold on."

Instead of the beautiful room, the three of them were now in the dim interior of an untidy house. Alex recognized the disorderly home as her eyes adjusted to the darkness, even before she saw Chuck, who was on the phone and oblivious to their arrival.

"Okay, well I'll take twenty girls for the whole night," the author said, pacing away from them. There was a pause and he chuckled. "Lady, sometimes you got to live like there's no tomorrow—" he turned around and saw that he wasn't alone. His cheeky grin fell into a shocked expression. "Whoa whoa!" He protested, looking at the three of them with wide eyes as the phone drifted down away from his ear. "Wait. T-this isn't supposed to happen!" He lifted the phone back to his ear, speaking in to it again. "No, lady, this is definitely supposed to happen, but I…" he gulped, looking at the new arrivals awkwardly. "I just gotta call you back."

Chuck ended the call and smiled sheepishly at Alex, Dean, and Castiel. "I… he started, even as Alex swooped in and snatched the phone from him, tossed it away.

"The world's ending and you're ordering hookers, Chuck?" She asked.

Chuck shrank underneath her gaze. "I uh—look, t-that's not important," he said, chuckling self-consciously and dodging the question. "What are you guys doing here? You're not supposed—"

"Where is Sam right now, Chuck?" Dean asked, crowding Chuck.

Chuck was nervous at Dean's physical intimidation and began to back up toward the kitchen. "Well, he's uh, he's—"

"Where Chuck?!" Dean demanded impatiently, grabbing Chuck by the front of his bathrobe roughly, forcing him to stay put.

"Saint Mary's, Saint Mary's, Jesus Christ Dean!" Chuck exclaimed, then looked at Cas with a worried expression. "N-no offense, Cas."

A sternly confused look was on the angel's face, who had followed Alex and Dean in backing Chuck up into his own kitchen. "None… taken."

"Saint Mary's? What is that, a convent?" Dean asked urgently. Every spare second could stand between them saving Sam and being too late altogether.

"Yeah, it's a convent, but you guys aren't supposed to be there," Chuck insisted. "You're not in this story."

"Yeah, well..." Castiel stood a little taller, even though his expression showed trepidation. "We're making it up as we go."

Both Dean and Alex looked at him in surprise when he said that, but for Alex, she wasn't just looking at Castiel. She was seeing him in new light—really seeing him and feeling a sense of pride and amazement. He felt her gaze and he turned his head to look at her as she stood beside him. Who are you? Alex wondered, more intrigued than ever as she studied this angel who walked the earth in the body of a man... this angel who had just gone against all of Heaven for her family. This angel who had just proved that he was more than she'd dared to hope—braver, kinder, more selfless. He was jumping ship to risk everything with them. He'd said that he was her friend once. She believed him now, and she was his friend, too. Wordlessly, she patted him twice on the back of the arm, approving of him, telling him silently that he was okay with her.

And that was when they heard a strange rumbling. Outside the dark window, a light suddenly beamed, bright as the sun, even as a ringing sound that could shatter glass began to pierce the air. Alex clapped hands over both of her ears in response to the deafening sound, made a sound of pained protest as the sound only got louder and louder. The ground began to tremble violently and the entire house began to vibrate like it was about to come down completely. The kitchen cabinets fell open and plates and mugs began to tumble out, shattering on the floor that was increasingly hard to stand on. Chuck was holding onto the kitchen counter, Dean took a huge stumble backward. Alex lurched sideways and felt Cas grab her by the arm, steadying her, keeping her from falling. "It's the archangel!" He roared.

Dean stumbled toward Cas, confusion and fear filling his face, and Alex grabbed for her brother, helping him stand, even as Cas held her in place too. "I'll hold him off!" Castiel shouted over the crashing dinnerware. "I'll hold them all off! Just stop Sam!" He abruptly clapped a hand on Dean's forehead and shoved, then Dean disappeared completely from in front of Alex's eyes.

Shocked, she looked up at Cas, who was the only anchor keeping her from falling over as the house shook. The light was growing even brighter and the sound was absolutely deafening—Chuck was freaking out somewhere behind Alex even as Cas let go of her arm. His eyes met hers for just a second, and it was like he already knew he was dead, the way he looked at her—and even as the word wait tried to form in her mouth, he hit two fingers to her forehead, sending her away to join Dean.
Speak of the Devil

"It's almost like your heaven's trying everything to break me down."
- Five Finger Death Punch

The Next Day

Alex took another drag from her cigarette and blew, watching the smoke flutter off into the cold midday air. It was a quiet, overcast day, which didn't seem fitting. Where was the smoke, the fire, the devil and his forked tongue, his horns and tail? Sitting there on top of the motel roof, she watched the city below. None of those people had any idea about what a complete and utter shit storm was headed their way. Must be nice. Her feet dangled off the edge of the building—about an eight story drop. She took another drag on her cigarette. She was exhausted, feeling queasy from low blood sugar. She hadn't eaten since yesterday at least, if not longer. She honestly couldn't remember. It was hard to want to eat when you had failed to stop the devil from rising.

When she and Dean had arrived at the convent, they had been too late to stop Sam. It was almost laughable how they had walked into the whole thing, how Ruby had used and tricked Sam—he had realized, but it was too late. Alex remembered that final scuffle—she and Dean had bursting into the room to see Sam and Ruby struggling, Lilith dead, her blood running down onto the floor, spiraling in a circle in toward itself. Dean and Sam had killed Ruby as Alex had dived to the ground, in a desperate last-ditch effort to stop the blood from touching in the centermost point with her bare hands. But it was too late. With no choice to run, they tried to escape, only to become trapped in the convent, in the room where Lucifer's white hot, burning presence began to seep out of the hole opening up in the floor. The three Winchesters had clutched each other in terror, the brothers sandwiching their sister completely, maybe trying to shield her from what was about to happen. It was the end, and they all knew it.

And then, suddenly, it wasn't. Without explanation they were safely in an airplane over the city, alive, well, and confused. Add that little miracle to the list of unexplained phenomenon that dominated her whole life.

And Cas. Alex stilled, her hand in midair, cigarette forgotten. When Chuck told them that the angel was dead… there had been this feeling, this sensation like being hit in the gut with a hammer. All Alex could think was no, with every part of who she was. Not Cas. He was supposed to survive. He was supposed to be invincible. He wasn't supposed to die for them. For me. She thought of the angel who had showed up out of nowhere, screwed her life up completely. The guy that never made any sense, the one who made her mad as hell.

A silent tear spilled onto her cheek and slid down her face and she wiped it away angrily with the palm of her hand. Stupid, stupid Castiel, giving in and helping them… Lucifer had still risen despite their attempts to stop him, and now they'd lost Cas in the crossfire and it was her fault. She and Dean had guilt-tripped the poor bastard into helping them, and what did they have to show for it? Failure—absolute, complete failure. He died in vain, and she would carry that with her for the rest of her life, add him to the forever-lengthening list of people who she'd cared about and lost.

She thought of Cas as she remembered him best—the wild hair and clear blue eyes, the odd expressiveness his face had taken on in some moments, giving her glimpses of his truest self. She thought of how he was the one who gave her the ability to speak again and her sorrow increased tenfold. There was so much more to him than she'd seen and she wished she could have known him better, protected him better somehow. He was so much braver than she had given him credit for, so much more selfless. She thought about how he had always healed her—that last time, especially, knelt down in front of her and touching her in a way that seemed almost tender.

For the millionth time she thought of his response to Chuck, when the writer had protested "but you're not part of this story!" For a minute there, when Castiel had told Chuck, "we're making it up as we go," Alex had looked at him and felt so much that she wanted to burst. In that moment, she'd seen a bravery and courage in him that left her speechless. There, beside her, an angel who was willing to defy Heaven, to disobey everything he knew... all to try and do, as he said, "the right thing." He'd made a choice and committed to it with his life on the line as collateral. And now he was gone. Just gone. Alex flicked her cigarette off the roof and onto the street below and again wiped her cheeks.

Add to the loss of their only ally in Heaven the sad state of the Winchester family... Sam wallowing in guilt, shame, and hopelessness, Dean too fed up to deal with any of it, Alex stuck in the middle and mourning her guardian angel. The pain, the fear, the unknown future all bore down on her relentlessly and Alex thought about what it would be like to be someone else. Just a regular Joe who had no idea about this supernatural Heaven and Hell crap. Every day the burden got heavier on the shoulders of the family, and their backs were threatening to break. Every time she thought she knew how bad it could be, it got worse.

She looked up at the heavy gray sky above and said a silent I'm sorry to Castiel, who shouldn't have died like he did. Who shouldn't have died at all.

"Sad we need these, man," Dean said, eyeing the hex bag in his hand. "Who would ever have thought we'd wanna hide from angels, huh? They were supposed to be the good guys."

"Yeah," Sam agreed half-heartedly, and put the other hex bag at the opposite end of the motel room.

Dean watched his younger brother unenthusiastically, then took the hex bag in his hand and stuck it on top of the TV. He paused to consider the irony of what he was doing. This was really a whole new brand of crazy. Angels had allowed the apocalypse to take place just so that they could get their rocks off killing Lucifer themselves? They didn't get how insane they were. Or how stupid they were for thinking he was on their side. Zachariah's words to him earlier bothered him—the douchebag actually had the nerve to tell him that he needed their help to defeat Lucifer. No thanks. Angels weren't invincible, and they could be killed. Dean already knew that much.

However, he wasn't sure how of how to go about it. How exactly do you hunt down a fallen angel; and more importantly than that, where could they get their hands on an angel blade? And would that work on Lucifer? Even if they figured all those little details out, Dean knew it wouldn't work if he and his siblings couldn't hold it together. His family was ripping at the seams. There was Sam, messed up on demon blood and acting like a simpering, guilty idiot. There was Alex, depressed and withdrawn as hell for reasons Dean wasn't sure of, but he had a few guesses—an apocalypse both your brothers started probably didn't exactly leave her jumping for joy.

Dean could feel Sam staring at the back of his head. Annoyed, he turned around and looked at Sam, gauging his brother carefully. Sam looked relatively normal, which was what didn't make sense. Unlike when he'd been locked up in the panic room, Sam was now completely lucid, alert, and sober. Dean had to tell himself to cool down. He was still mad as hell about everything that had happened—Ruby, the demon blood, Sam trying to choke him to death... and who could forget Sam hitting and throwing Alex across a room? That's what bothered him the most. He remembered the tenderness and fierce devotion that the twins had for each other in childhood. The way they defended each other to no end, stuck up for each other even when the other was definitely wrong, cried when the other one was upset. Fast forward about fifteen years and Sam had done the unthinkable, had done something he couldn't come back from. Dean told himself to calm down. He could feel himself getting pissed. Sam was still staring at him ruefully.

Dean cleared his throat, attempting a conversational tone. "So, uh, how you doing? You jonesing for another hit of bitch blood or what?"

Sam shook his head, his expression earnest and expressive. "I-It's weird. Uh, tell you the truth, I'm fine. No shakes, no fever. It's like whoever… put me on that plane cleaned me right up."

Dean wasn't sure what to make of that, but was careful to respond neutrally. "So, supernatural methadone."

"Yeah, I guess." Sam tried a smile, paused, growing slightly trepidatious. "Dean—"

"Sam." Dean cut him off, and fast, turning around and walking back to the motel table, avoiding looking at his brother. "It's okay, you don't have to say anything."

"Well, that's good," Sam said softly. "Because what can I even say? 'I'm sorry'? 'I screwed up'?' He laughed softly, awkwardly which only made Dean's blood boil further. "Doesn't really do it justice, you know?" Sam asked. "Look, there's nothing I can do or say that will ever make this right—"

Dean was unable to hold it in any longer. "So then why do you keep bringing it up?!" he snapped, his careful facade of indifference gone. He leveled Sam with a deadly gaze, breathing heavily, walking forward a few steps and pointing a threatening finger. "Look, all I got to say to you right now is if you ever—ever hurt our sister like that again… you're done, man. You touch her, you even threaten her—we are gone, and you are dead to me." Sam looked stunned as Dean continued, his voice a low, angry rumble. "I'm serious, Sam. You crossed a line. After everything you've done… I don't know why I even let you come here with us!"

Sam's jaw clenched, he looked down, clearly emotional. "Yeah, no. I get that." When he looked back up again, he could barely met Dean's eyes. "Trust me. It won't ever happen again, Dean. It... it shouldn't have happened at all." Sam breathed in shakily, shutting his eyes for a second, as if in pain. "I... hate myself for what I did." His eyes opened again, beseeching Dean. "To both of you, and with Ruby, and… everything. It scares me, Dean..."

Dean turned around. "Yeah, well, me too."

"I didn't know what I was doing at the time," Sam said. He sounded like he was making a plea for his case.

Dean turned back around challengingly. "And that makes it okay?"

Fumbling, Sam wet his lips. "No, of course it doesn't, but—"

Dean held up a hand for silence, reaching the end of his anger. "Look, all I'm saying is, why do we have to put this under a microscope?" Dean asked. "Let's just move on. I said my peace, you said yours, now let it go. I can't talk about this anymore."

Sam took a beat and then nodded. Dean could tell that his little brother had a lot more to say… but Dean didn't care right now. He was too pissed, too tired, too messed up to even think about all this crap at the moment. He sat back down at the flimsy motel table and resumed cleaning his gun sullenly.

"So uh, where is Alex, anyway?" Sam asked hesitantly.
"Said she needed some air." Dean paused and looked up at Sam. "I wouldn't get your hopes up, Sam."

"About what?" Sam asked, perplexed.

"What do you think?" Dean asked, meeting Sam's gaze evenly. "I doubt she'll ever be able to trust you after that. I'm sure as hell not sure if I can." He looked away and back to the chamber of the gun, shoving the cloth down in there to get the residue out.

Sam shifted slightly at the edge of Dean's vision. Dean didn't even have to look. He could hear the heartbreak in Sam's tone. "Right."

"We have more important things to worry about right now anyway," Dean said, ignoring Sam's emotional distress. "Like hunting down the friggin' devil."

Sam took in a deep breath and nodded, clearly forcing himself to push aside his feelings. "Yeah. Okay." He came closer and sat down at the table. "So where do we start?"

Dean paused. "Yeah… uh… about that. I'm not entirely sure."

When it started drizzling, Alex finally left her spot on the roof and made her way back to the room, hugging her jacket around herself tightly against the dropping temperature. She reached the room and opened the door to a very unexpected sight. Her brothers were both standing in the middle of the room with a sort of small, mousy woman. She was touching Sam's chest, practically nestling there. Alex froze in the door frame, not sure what was happening. "What's... going on?"

Dean gave her a look, and Sam attempted a smile in the woman's direction—it looked more like a grimace. "Can you, uh, stop touching me Becky?" Sam asked, apparently too polite to physically step back.

"No..." the girl, apparently named Becky whimpered, and leaned closer, her hand rubbing over Sam's pectorals.

Alex looked at Dean in lost confusion. "Who the hell is this chick?" Then her expression changed to disbelief. "Dean! You promised no more hookers!"

At that, Alex finally had Becky's attention. The woman's jaw was practically on the floor, and she'd frozen completely, offended. Sam took the opportunity to back up from her. "I'm not a hooker—I'm... Becky. Mr. Edlund—Chuck—sent me, to deliver a message. To Sam and Dean." At the mention of them, she forgot her offense and smiled breathlessly up at Sam, who looked highly uncomfortable.

Becky seemed to think of something and looked at Alex again. "Ohhh..." she nodded slowly, eyes narrowing in understanding. "So you must be Alex. Huh." She looked Alex up and down appraisingly. She didn't seem to know what to think. She looked mildly disappointed or disapproving. It was hard to tell which. Alex, completely puzzled, looked to her brothers for an explanation.

"Becky, uh, read the books about us," Sam said, to which Becky turned and beamed up at him.

"Every single one," she all but gushed.

"Great. Good for you...?" Alex said, not impressed. She glanced at Dean, who rolled his eyes, exasperated. She looked back at Becky, who was now staring at Sam's chest, entranced. This was bizarre, so bizarre it was beginning to get funny. Alex tilted her head to the side, totally mystified by Becky's strange behavior.

Sam looked like he was screaming internally for assistance, and glanced at Dean, then Alex, his eyes saying 'help me!' but when his two baffled siblings did nothing, he was forced to take matters into his own hands. "Uh, listen, Becky. Thanks for the message. But, we gotta, uh, get back to…” he went blank for a second. "Uh, hunter stuff."

"Oh wow!" Becky squealed, sounding completely starstruck… but she didn't take the hint, just stood there and smiled widely, breathing through her mouth, gazing at Sam like he were the most amazing thing she'd ever seen.

Alex cleared her throat and put a firm hand on Becky's shoulder, used her other hand to jerk a thumb at the door. "In other words, you gotta leave."

"Oh Oh." Becky's face got kind of sad. "Okay, yeah. Sam… so good to meet you." Becky walked sideways out of the door, her eyes never leaving Sam (who was clearly scared out of his mind behind his attempt at a polite smile). Alex shut the door on Becky without ceremony and turned around, then clasped her hands together and leveled Sam with dramatic goo goo eyes.

"Oh Saaaaam," she mocked, earning a soft, embarrassed laugh from Sam.

Dean grinned. "You're so fiiiiiirm," he purred dramatically, his expression an hilarious mix of flirtatious suggestiveness and slightly sinister intent.

That did it. All three of them burst into laughter, and for a minute, they forgot. They forgot the stigma and the tension, they forgot they were angry with each other, that the world was falling apart, that nothing was okay. They just giggled at each other and at Becky's antics. And then, even before it began, it was over. Sam's smile faded into a conflicted expression, and with the loss of his smile, Dean and Alex's faded too as they remembered everything they had briefly forgotten. There was a slight hesitation.

"So," Dean said, clearing his throat and looking at Alex. "Sam's number one fan had a message from Chuck. 'The Michael sword is on earth. The angels lost it.'"

"The what sword?" Alex asked.

"No clue. That's why I'm calling Bobby. I'll be back." Dean stepped out, leaving the twins in the silent motel room.

Alex looked at Sam sidelong, considering trying to talk to him. But she wasn't sure how to. He was looking at her in the same way, like he wanted to say something but couldn't. He took a deep breath, hesitated, opened his mouth, shut it again, cleared his throat, then left in a rush, muttering something about "back later" before the door shut.

Alex watched him go, disappointed, the familiar sadness returning. She curled up in one of the beds, shoes and all, and stared at the wall. The silence in the room was deafening.

Dean shook Alex awake when Bobby showed up, which must have been several hours later. She should have felt rested from the nap she didn't even mean to take, but she only felt more tired, and with a killer headache to boot. Bobby shared with them some findings on Michael's sword as Alex hung back, tuned out, sitting cross-legged on one of the beds. She picked at the chipped red nail polish that was still on her fingernails. She was really getting frustrated.
"Sam, stop it," Dean thundered, and Alex looked up, confused—what had she missed? Bobby was staring at Sam angrily.

"No, Dean. Bobby, it was me who broke the final seal," Sam said, his voice unsteady and full of pained remorse. "I killed Lilith, and I set Lucifer free."

"You what?" Bobby asked in disbelief.

"You guys warned me about Ruby, the demon blood, but I didn't listen. I brought this on." Sam might as well have been in front of a firing squad.

Bobby stood up, his expression so full of fury that he was barely recognizable. "You're damn right you didn't listen. You were reckless and selfish and arrogant!"

Sam shook his head hollowly. "I'm sorry."

"Oh, yeah? You're sorry you started armageddon?" Bobby was practically snarling now. "This kind of thing don't get forgiven, boy. If, by some miracle, we pull this off… I want you to lose my number. You understand me?"

Sam, heartbroken, nodded, even as Alex's mouth hung open. "Bobby!" She exclaimed, her tone decidedly admonishing—that wasn't like him to be so harsh. She received a wrathful glare from Bobby. Confused, Alex looked at Dean, who didn't say a damn thing in Sam's defense. Yeah, the guy had messed up, but this was just cruel, wasn't it?

Sam swallowed, struggling, his eyes downcast. "There's… there's an old church nearby. Maybe I'll go read some of the lore books there."

"Yeah," Bobby retorted sharply. "You do that."

Sam was no longer able to maintain any eye contact at all, and still nodding, as if in shock or a daze, turned and left, shutting the door softly behind him. About two seconds of stunned silence on Alex's part passed and then she hopped off the bed, grabbing her jacket from where she had tossed it earlier. "Where the hell are you going?" Dean asked, frowning.

At the door, with her hand on the knob, Alex turned and looked at him unflinchingly. "With Sam."

Bobby's face scrunched in something like disgust. "With Sam? He jump started the end of the world, and you wanna hold his hand?"

Alex scoffed. "Bobby, what the hell has gotten into you?" She glanced at Dean. "Both of you." She turned and walked out, slamming the door behind her.

Sam walked down the sidewalk with his hands in his pockets, eyes on the ground in front of him. He had really, really messed up this time. Everything they had said about him was true. Every dark suspicion he'd had about himself was true: he was a monster inside. He had been blinded and controlled by his addictions, his fears, his insecurities. He couldn't do anything right—that had been his worst fear growing up, and yesterday, that fear had been confirmed once and for all. The faces of the people he'd let down flooded his mind. Dean, superior, disappointed, unforgiving. Bobby, enraged and hateful. Alex, hurt and distant. Dad, always disappointed, always unsatisfied. Jess, who never had a chance. Not with him in her life. Maybe he was poison. Maybe everything and everyone he touched was doomed to be destroyed and messed up by him. He looked up, sniffed loudly, trying to ignore the pain. He blinked fast, because his eyes were threatening to flood.
A shout behind him startled him out of his thoughts. "Sam, wait up!" He turned to see that Alex was jogging to catch up to him. He stopped walking, his heart clenching in pain at the sight of her. Had he forgotten something, or was she about to chew him out, finally, too?

"What is it?" he asked cautiously, preparing himself to be attacked again.

She had reached him now, and looked up at him with an open expression. With a light shrug she stuck her hands into her jacket pockets. "I'm coming with."

"What, they sent you to babysit me?" he asked, defeated.

"Uh, no," she said, her tone him suggesting that was ridiculous, but funny. She smiled at him—and in that moment, after everything that had happened the past twenty-four hours, that simple act meant everything to him. She nodded her head in the direction of the church and bumped him in the arm with her elbow. "Come on, this lore isn't gonna read itself."

"Got anything?" Sam asked.

Alex looked up at her twin from the huge book she'd been leafing through for the past hour. "Nothing about the Michael sword being an actual physical object, if that's what you mean."

"Me either." Sam let out a very tired, very frustrated sigh.

They were sitting across from each other in the church study. It was a pretty fancy room, with a few religious paintings on the walls and many thick books lining the shelves. Above Sam's head and on the wall behind him, there was a huge watercolor of an angel holding a scroll. Every time Alex looked up, she stared at it. The angel was barefoot, wearing flowing robes and had fluffy white wings and a dreamy expression. Every time Alex looked at it, she got a little more perturbed. Angels did not look like that. They looked like handsome businessmen with confused, stern scowls forever etched onto their features. She looked away from the painting, and at Sam.

With his hands resting on either side of the book and his eyes not seeing the space in front of him he looked totally lost and alone. His jaw was working weirdly, the muscles flexing and clenching, as if he were at war within himself. Without any warning, he looked up, his expression agonized and vulnerable. "I just want you to know I'm sorry. So, so sorry. If you never forgive me, I'll understand."

A little surprised at his sudden, out of place confession, Alex opened her mouth to reply, but he was already talking again. "How can you even look at me? After what—what I've done?" He had brought one of his hands to cover his face, his voice beginning to rise and speed up. "God, I just... what happened? These things inside me Alex, I thought I could outrun them—but—but..." his face twisted up in pain, "I don't belong anywhere near you, near anyone I love."

"I'm cursed!" he was getting out of breath in his earnest, emotional rant and Alex was getting freaked. "Stop. Just stop. That's not true, everything you just said..." she looked at him intently. "Stop. Just stop. That's not true, everything you just said..." she looked at him hesitantly, putting herself out there vulnerably, trying to soothe him. "Look, I love you, okay?" She didn't say those words ever, basically, and it was hard to say them, even if she felt them. He seemed stunned to hear them, too. "You're not cursed. You're—you're gonna be all right."
His expression showed stunned disbelief. "You... don't wanna lose my number?"

Alex's heart hurt at that question. "No." She tightened her grip on his hand, so sad to see how torn up he was. "I get it. You're upset about what Bobby said. But he didn't mean it, I know he didn't. It's not like him to say that kind of stuff."

Her brother looked like he could barely believe what she was saying, but was dying to accept it as truth. He looked at her hand there on his and frowned, took his hand away, looking disturbed and distracted. His voice dropped in volume, he swallowed, his eyebrows seemed to wobble towards each other. "You—you don't think I deserved that?"

Alex shook her head earnestly. "No."

Sam's expression broke as his composure cracked. "I'm sorry," he confessed through a sudden onslaught of pained tears. "So, so sorry."

Alex was already knocking her chair back and halfway around the table, wrapping her arms around Sam's massive shoulders, hugging him tight.

He tensed for a minute, not accepting the embrace at first—then his arms gingerly circled her as she rested her chin on the top of his head. He wept bitterly but quietly, his body shaking violently. Alex just stayed there with him, swallowing tears herself. She really couldn't stand to see him in so much pain, so much internal agony. She thought of how brutally he had hit her, but told herself... that wasn't Sammy. That was the demon blood. She decided right then and there to forgive and forget it this one time. If it happened again, by God, there would be hell to pay. But today, she was putting it in the past.

After a minute, Sam let out a few shaky breaths and drew back, pulling himself together. He looked up at her, kind of embarrassed, awkward. Alex's mouth quirked up on one side in a crooked smile, and she tapped him affectionately under his chin with her index finger—something she'd done since she could remember; since they were pre-schoolers. At that familiar, fond gesture—one that hadn't been shown in what felt like forever—a small, real smile pulled Sam's lips upward. His face relaxed. The smile reached his eyes.

"Let's get outta here, Moose," Alex suggested, using one of Dean's favorite nicknames for their brother. She was already reaching for her jacket. "I don't think we're gonna find anything here."

Sam stood up, towering over her, looking more himself—clear-headed and calm, if a little red-faced from the tears. He ruffled her hair affectionately, earning a good-natured protest of "heeeey!" from Alex, who ducked away, laughing, really laughing and surprised at herself. He hadn't done that in forever.

They were okay the whole walk back, talking about things that didn't matter: why gas station sandwiches were literally the worst things in the world, their conflicting opinions on which character on 21 Jumpstreet was the best, and how they would kill for another chance to taste Crystal Pepsi. Maybe it was a truce or just them trying really hard to gloss over what happened two days ago, but it felt good. It felt nice.

As with their life, the temporary happiness, the lull in tragedy, was doomed to be short-lived. Sam and Alex got back to the motel and found Bobby, stabbed and dying on the floor, Meg the demon trying to kill Dean. Naturally, they'd taken care of the demons pretty quickly, but Meg had escaped. Another demon bitch they'd have to kill another day.
As they raced a dying, bleeding Bobby to the emergency room, Dean told them Bobby had been possessed the whole time, the demon inside him trying to find the Michael sword before they did. He insisted that they had to go to some place in upstate New York, a place called Castle Storage, where the sword was packed away, and now. They had to leave Bobby behind to undergo emergency surgery while they made a frenzied five hour car drive in a desperate bid to beat the demons. The entire way was tense. They were all worried about Bobby, all wondering what this sword of Michael would do in the wrong hands.

It was a few hours before sunrise when they pulled into the empty parking lot of Castle Storage. Dean jerked the car into a parking space and they were out of the car, grabbing their weapons out of the trunk. "Looks like we beat 'em," Dean said, casting glances around—the place was quiet and still. Alex cocked her shotgun with a satisfying click-click.

"Stay close together, just in case," Dean said and led the way to the storage unit. They entered, shotguns held to their shoulders… and then… stopped, mystified. Dead bodies littered the floor. Demons.

"What the…” Sam trailed off.

"I see you told the demons where the sword is," came a voice from behind them. The Winchesters whirled around to see Zachariah, smiling patronizingly at them, two other angels with him.

"Oh, thank god," Dean said sarcastically, recovering from the surprise. "The angels are here."

"And to think… they could have grabbed the sword any time they wanted." Zachariah raised one of his hands, and the metal door slammed closed, trapping them inside the small storage unite. Sam inched a little closer to Alex, protectively. "It was right in front of them all along." Zachariah shook his head, chuckling.

"What do you mean?" Dean demanded, eyes narrowed dangerously.

"Well, while we may have planted that particular piece of prophecy inside Chuck's skull, but it happened to be true. We did lose the Michael sword. We truly couldn't find it. Until now. You've just hand-delivered it to us."

"We don't have anything," Dean said coolly.

Zachariah blinked a couple times, almost rolled his eyes. "It's you, chucklehead. You're the Michael sword."

There was a confused silence. "Come again?" Dean asked.

"Yup, interesting, huh?" Zachariah asked, his voice exceedingly bright and bubbly. "What, you thought you could actually kill Lucifer? You simpering wad of insecurity and self-loathing." At the insults, Alex made a face. It made sense now. That's where Uriel had gotten his people skills from, apparently. Zachariah came closer to them, a superior smile on his face. "You're just a human—Dean. And not much of one."

"Hey," Sam shot darkly, earning a cursory glance from Zachariah.

"What do you mean, I'm the sword?" Dean asked, ignoring the insult.

Zachariah smiled, as if in excitement. "You're Michael's vessel."

Dean shook his head, as if there had clearly been a mistake. "What? No… why—why me?"
"Because you're chosen! It's a great honor, Dean."

"Oh, yeah," Dean said, his tone full of sardonic enthusiasm. "Yeah, life as an angel condom. That's real fun. I think I'll pass, thanks."

Zachariah shook his head, his expression disappointed and a little offended. "Joking. Always joking. Well... no more jokes." He raised his hand, his fingers like a gun, and pointed at Dean—then shifted and pointed at Sam. "Bang."

There was an audible crunch, and Sam fell, a sound of agony ripping from his throat. Even before Sam had hit the ground, Zachariah pointed to Alex, and repeated, "Bang."

Alex's knees both exploded in pain, and she screamed, collapsing, the pain blinding. "You son of a bitch!" Dean shouted, and Zachariah leveled him with a grim stare.

"Keep mouthing off, I'll break more than their legs. I am completely and utterly through screwing around. The war has begun. We don't have our general. That's bad. Now, Michael is going to take his vessel and lead the final charge against the adversary. You understand me?"

On the ground behind Dean, Sam and Alex were both writhing in agony. He was shaking at this point. "Yeah? And how many humans die in the crossfire, huh? A million? Five, ten?"

"Probably more. If Lucifer goes unchecked, you know how many die? All of them. He'll roast the planet alive."

Dean paused, thinking fast. "There's a reason you're telling me this instead of just nabbing me. You need my consent. Michael needs my say-so to ride around in my skin."

"Unfortunately, yes. There is no other way. There must be a battle. Michael must defeat the serpent. It is written."

"Yeah, maybe," Dean said, almost sounding like he was considering it. "But, on the other hand... eat me." Zachariah's face fell as Dean raised an eyebrow. "The answer's no."

"Okay. How about this? Your friend Bobby—we know he's gravely injured. Say yes, and we'll heal him. Say no... he'll never walk again."

Sam and Alex looked up at Dean, whose expression was resolute and unyielding. They looked at each other. There was no way he was going to say yes, and they both knew it.

"No," Dean repeated through gritted teeth.

Zachariah nodded, then countered again. "Then how about we heal you from... hmm... stage four stomach cancer?"

Dean frowned, then suddenly doubled over, coughing and gagging, falling over onto all fours. He spit blood into his palm, then looked up at Zachariah defiantly. "No."

"Boy. You sure drive a hard bargain!" Zachariah commented with false enthusiasm. "Let's get really creative. Uh, let's see how... Sam does without his lungs."

Sam suddenly went silent, his mouth open and closing as if he were gasping for air.

"Are we having fun yet?" He looked at Alex and made a face like he'd just noticed something. "Oh and look, Alex is suffering from stage four throat cancer. Tragic."
Alex, who was holding onto her dying twin tight, felt her entire body convulse, and she coughed up blood in a sudden, violent fit, her breathing ragged and shallow. Dean looked between his siblings in alarm, and Zachariah came to him, grabbed his chin, forced him to look him in the eye. "You're going to say yes, Dean," Zachariah said balefully.

"Just kill us," Dean fired back.

"Kill you?" Zachariah stood up and let go of Dean. "Oh, no. I'm just getting started."

Alex gagged again, choking on huge chunks of blood in her throat. Beside her, Sam was bucking, gasping for air. She could barely concentrate, barely breathe, barely move from the pain that seized her body. And then, a bright light and fierce wind filled the room. Zachariah turned, Alex squinted and looked away. Her eyes couldn't take the unyielding, blinding light. The light faded and she looked up again, groaning against the pain—and she almost fell over when she realized what she was seeing.

Castiel stabbed one of Zachariah's henchmen in the neck and threw the angel to the ground, his trench coat whirling around him as he turned and slammed his fist into the other angel's stomach, raising the knife high. The other angel struggled, holding Cas off for only a second. The angel blade flashed in the light, and the two of them smashed into a pile of boxes, sending everything flying.

Beside Alex, Sam quaked and Alex grabbed his shoulders. "Hang on, just hang on Sammy!" she begged, gagging on more blood, almost drowning inside of herself. Nearby, Dean was on the ground, groaning and coughing.

With brutal finality Cas slammed his opponent face-first up against a wall and stabbed him with the blade, then let the body fall lifeless to the ground. He drew back, at his full height, his face radiant with energy, with power, with confidence. He stared down at Zachariah, his face furious, intense, fiery.

Beneath Alex's hands, Sam had stopped moving. She stared down at him, alarmed and choking on her own blood. Oh god, Sammy!

"How are you…?" Zachariah asked, clearly in shock.

"Alive?" Cas replied in his deep, familiar voice. "That's a good question. How did these three end up on that airplane?" He motioned at the Winchesters, his eyes briefly meeting Alex's before returning to Zachariah—he saw her physical anguish and his voice picked up speed and became harder, more assertive. "Another good question. Because the angels didn't do it. I think we both know the answer, don't we?"

"No," Zachariah said softly, hollowly. "That's not possible."

"It scares you as well it should." Castiel's voice darkened with a threatening, commanding quality. "Now, put these boys and their sister back together and go." His face was almost a snarl. "I won't ask twice."

Zachariah disappeared, and Alex jumped, startled, when Sam suddenly shot up, looking around in alarm and confusion, breathing heavily. Confused, Alex suddenly realized her knees were fine, her throat was fine. She wiped blood away from the edges of her mouth as Sam stood and pulled her to her feet, too. She was shaken up—had Sam just died, or what? And Cas standing there, alive and well—had she hit her head? Was this real? "You three need to be more careful," Castiel said, approaching them as his gaze skimmed over them, checking their conditions.
"Yeah, I'm starting to get that," Dean said as he stood back up and dusted his hands off on his upper legs. "Your frat brothers are bigger dicks than I thought."

"I don't mean the angels," Castiel said impatiently. "Lucifer is circling his vessel. And once he takes it, those hex bags won't be enough to protect you." He came even closer, and raised both hands, roughly putting one on each of Sam and Dean's chests. Alex, who was standing behind them and between them, jumped a little as her brothers both jolted and gasped.

"What the hell was that?" Dean asked, a hand on his chest as he flinched back.

"An Enochian sigil," Castiel said. "It'll hide you from every angel in creation, including Lucifer."

"What, did you just brand us with it?" Dean asked.

"No. I carved it into your ribs," Cas said, as if, naturally, they should have known that. He looked directly at Alex and lowered his chin slightly, made a 'come here' motion with his hand, indicating that it was her turn. "Alex."

Dean and Sam stepped aside so that she could move forward, which she did, a little apprehensively, still not entirely sure she could believe he was actually alive. But, there was was, flesh and blood, right in front of her, his eyes locked onto hers. "Hi, Cas," she said in a breathless and quiet voice. She was in a little bit of a dazed trance after everything that had just happened.

His rigid expression softened a shade at her greeting. "Hello, Alex." His hand, warm and a little rough came to rest against the bare skin of her chest, right below and to the side of the dip of her collarbone, the bottom of his palm brushing up against he edge of where the low scoop of her tank top started. The sensation of the touch startled her into stillness. She didn't have time to think about it any more, as suddenly there was a scraping, burning sensation all over the inside of her torso. It wasn't pleasant. Before she could fully process the strange feeling, it was gone altogether.

Castiel stepped back with a hooded glance at Alex, and then looked over the Winchesters again, apparently satisfied with his handiwork. "H-how are you alive, Cas?" Alex asked, asking what they all wanted to know.

He looked at her with a strange expression. "That remains to be seen," he said cryptically and then disappeared without a word, leaving three very confused Winchesters behind.

Dean gave a huge sigh. "Dammit. Same old Cas." He sounded kind of fond though and smiled lightly, clearly relieved that they were all in one piece and alive. He went to the door and yanked it up and open. "Well, this has been a fun night."

"Fun?" Sam repeated as he pushed the door up far enough where he could walk under. "Yeah, being lungless is a blast, Dean."

"Hey, I'll try anything once," Dean quipped, in amazing spirits for having just been dying on the floor a minute ago. Sam rolled his eyes and mumbled something like yeah right.

Alex paused before she followed her brothers back to the car. She was frowning deeply, staring back at where Cas had been standing a minute ago. How was he just alive again? And why the quick exit? She breathed in deeply, then out again, mind spinning. She had a thousand questions but he was alive... and that, for now, would have to be enough.

---

Three Days Later
Alex sat across from Bobby, who was in his wheelchair, staring out the window listlessly, just as he had been for the last few days. "Bobby." He didn't acknowledge her at all, and she tried moving her face closer into his line of sight. "Bobby." No reply. "Three days of nothing from you… come on. Gimme something to work with here."

He only glanced at her out of the corner of his eye, then looked back out the window. He was upset, and understandably so. His knife wound hadn't killed him—however it had paralyzed his legs. He wouldn't say a word to any of them. Not even her. But that didn't stop her from trying to get a reaction. Alex pulled one of her knees into her chest, the other leg dangling. "This reminds me of the time Dad was so mad at me that he gave me the silent treatment for a week." Bobby looked at her, his expression fuzzy, like he didn't know what she was talking about. She shrugged humbly, an impish sort of smile on her face as she attempted to jog his memory. "When I dropped out of high school by forging his signature on all the paperwork? Don't tell me you forgot about that."

Bobby, remembering, smiled slightly, but quickly scoffed, covering it up with a frown, and he looked away, still refusing to reply. Alex rolled her eyes and sighed fondly. He was pouting and silent, kind of like a mad five-year-old. He crossed his arms, only serving to make him look even more like a sassy, petulant child. Alex shook her head good naturedly and looked up, hearing Dean's voice.

"Since when do angels need a cell phone to reach out and touch someone?" He asked, coming into view. With him—Sam and Castiel. Alex stood in surprise at the unexpected appearance of the angel.

"You're hidden from angels now—all angels," he said. "I won't be able to simply—"

Beside Alex, the sound of Bobby's gruff voice startled her. "Enough foreplay." The guys all looked their way. "Get over here and lay your damn hands on."

Castiel's lips thinned into a line. "I can't."

Bobby turned his chair on Cas, his expression deadly cold. "Say again?"

"I'm cut off from Heaven and much of Heaven's power," Castiel explained, walking into the room. Alex watched him in somewhat stunned silence—his unexpected appearances should be common place by now, shouldn't they? She should be used to him popping up with warning. "Certain things I can do," Cas was saying. He acknowledged Alex with a brief glance. "Certain things I can't."

"You're tellin' me you lost your mojo just in time to get me stuck in this trap the rest of my life?" Bobby asked, his voice rising, especially toward the end.

"I'm sorry," Castiel said.

In reply, Bobby glared and turned his chair back ground. "Shove it up your ass."

"At least he's talking now," Dean muttered.

"I heard that," Bobby grumbled.

Cas turned away, expression hard to read. "I don't have much time," he said, speaking in hushed tones, forcing the Winchesters to come closer to hear. "We need to talk. About your plan to kill Lucifer."

"Yeah?" Dean asked, looking mildly enthused. "You wanna to help?"
"No," Cas replied without missing a beat. "It's foolish. It can't be done."

Sam and Alex exchanged puzzled frowns. "Oh, well thanks for the support," Dean said with a disingenuous smile.

"Why not?" Alex asked. "Isn't Lucifer just another angel with some, you know, special features and bonus material?"

Cas shook his head no shallowly. "No. He's more powerful than any angel or any demon. He cannot be killed." He looked at Dean, then Sam. "But I believe I have the solution. There is someone besides Michael strong enough to take on Lucifer. Strong enough to stop the apocalypse."

"Who's that?" Sam asked.

"The one who resurrected me and put you on that airplane," Castiel said, and from the way he was speaking—a little faster than usual, a little more emphatic—it was easy to tell he really believed in whatever plan he was brewing. "The one who began everything. God." There was a short, startled silence. The Winchesters exchanged a long, skeptical glance. Castiel was breathing in deeply, looking resolute. "I'm gonna find God."

At that, Dean turned and closed the door of the room and repeated "God?"

"Yes," Castiel replied simply.

Dean made a face. "God."

"Yes!" Cas replied, getting exasperated. "He isn't in Heaven. He has to be somewhere."

"Try New Mexico," Dean said, a little smirk playing on his lips. "I hear he's on a tortilla."

Castiel's expression showed zero understanding of the joke. He shook his head, befuddled, taking Dean literally. "No... he's not on any flatbread."

Sam paced in the corner near Bobby, and Alex had taken a seat on the bed. At the flatbread comment, she gave Cas a weird, amused look.

"Listen, Chuckles," Dean talked down to Cas, "even if there is a God, he's either dead—and that's the generous theory—"

"He is out there, Dean," Castiel insisted, his tone taking a decidedly aggressive edge.

"Oh come on! Look around you, man," Dean ranted, throwing his hands in the air. "The world's in the toilet. We're literally at the end of days here and he's off somewhere drinking booze out of a coconut all right?"

"Enough," Castiel said, glaring. "This is not a theological issue. It's strategic." He came closer to Dean, his expression fierce. "With God's help, we can win."

"It's a pipe dream, Cas," Dean said in dismissal. That seemed to touch a nerve.

"I killed two angels this week," Castiel breathed, his expression twisted in genuine anger. "My brothers. I'm hunted. I rebelled. And I did it, all of it, for you, and you failed. You, your sister, your brother destroyed the world—" Sam looked down, Alex's head swiveled to the side in an indignant, open-mouthed look as Cas continued, "—and I lost everything, for nothing. So keep your opinions to yourself."
Dean made no reply, clearly stunned into guilty silence, but Alex stood up, eyes narrowed, arms crossing, her mouth opening to correct him. "We destroyed the world? Are you serious right now?" Everyone in the room looked at her, but she was only looking at Cas, who was scowling at her, daring her to continue. She smiled facetiously, tightly, not sure what he was smoking or what was wrong with him, but she was about to set his ass straight. "Okay. Yes, Castiel, Dean and I did fail to stop Sam. And yeah, Sam made the biggest mistake of his life and played a role starting the apocalypse… but don't you dare imply that this is entirely our fault. That you're some kind of victim here." She shook her head in disgusted disbelief. "I mean, do you have amnesia? You told us that the angels were trying to save the world… and the whole time you and those two-faced sons of bitches were planning to let it all happen, to set Lucifer free, to make sure the apocalypse would happen—you lied to our faces. Did you forget that little detail? Cuz to be honest, I'm kinda stuck on it!" She was in his face now, her voice low. "Don't think your last minute change of heart and a few sacrifices makes you the hero in all of this and us the bad guys," she ranted. "My family is not responsible for the apocalypse and you know it, so cut the shit and sack up." His mouth was open slightly, but she wasn't done. She gave him one, final, sarcastic face. "You keep your self-righteous hypocrisy to yourself." The room went silent, tense.

Castiel blinked three times, apparently speechless.

"Damn." Dean commented, saying what everyone else in the room was thinking.

Alex, suddenly unable to handle all the stares and Castiel's stunned, hurt expression, left the room, blood boiling and heart racing, briefly wondering how she could be mourning Cas one day and then wanting to bash his head in the next. All of the men watched her go—Dean, Sam, and Bobby, impressed—Castiel looking more like he had been run over by a train.

That night, Alex stood on the roof of the hospital and tried to relieve some stress by smoking a cigarette in secret. The air was chilly and the stars overhead were plenty, beautiful, and calming. Standing at the edge of the building, she had an elbow on the stone half-wall there and alternated between watching traffic idly and stargazing as she smoked lazily.

Bobby was going to be discharged in the morning which was good news, but Alex was dwelling on the whole Castiel thing and left unsettled by it. Was she too hard on him? His whole I'm-the-victim-here mindset had been ludicrous and she'd let her temper dictate her response to him. But the more she thought about it, she thought maybe he was just freaking out because he was suddenly on his own and banking everything on finding God… and maybe she shouldn't have been so bitchy in the way she'd gone about setting him straight. Maybe God had brought him back—who else could have? Wait. Did she even believe in God? She didn't know, but she hadn't believed in angels until recently...

Behind her, she heard footsteps approaching, and she recognized Dean's gait—and subsequently went into high alert. Oh shit. Busted. She threw her cigarette down and tried to crush and hide it underneath the heel of her shoe quickly, like a teenage kid afraid of the wrath of their father.

"Dean, look, before y—" she said as she turned around. She stopped mid-sentence, surprise overtaking her face. "Oh."

Castiel stood there, not Dean. "Hello Alex."

She swallowed, abruptly nervous from being so caught off guard. "Hi." What was he doing here? An uncomfortable smile came over her lips—her way of trying not to acknowledge how confrontational she'd been earlier. "Taking a break from finding God?" She asked conversationally, trying to look casual and unsurprised. "It's been, what…" she glanced at her watch briefly. "Six hours. Don't tell me you found him already."

"No," Cas said in a low, somber voice. "I haven't."

He said nothing else, and it made for an extremely awkward silence. Alex waited, looked at him expectantly, then prompted him when he still said nothing else. "Okay. So-ooo…" she looked at him with even more expectancy and he frowned, not seeming to get it. "Any specific reason you're up here, or…?"

There it was. Understanding came over his features. "What you said to me earlier," he explained, deeply thoughtful. "I haven't been able to stop thinking of it." Alex's stomach flip-flopped slightly. "I accept that we all have some fault in what happened. But I think you're correct. I… stood by idly and allowed your family to be manipulated. I see now how wrong it was of me to say what I said. To imply what happened was your family's fault."

Eyebrows up high and mouth open slightly, Alex faltered. "Is this… an apology?"

"Yes," he answered plainly. He looked overly-guilty and he didn't need to be.

Alex's face relaxed into a soft little smile. "Well, for what it's worth... I think you did the right thing, even if it took you awhile."

Her words seemed to surprise him and humble him. "Thank you."

"I... should probably say sorry, too," Alex admitted, fidgeting a little and not fully able to look at him. "Kinda lost my temper on you back there." She cleared her throat and ran a hand through her hair self-consciously before crossing her arms and putting on an inscrutable expression. "I was a little harsher than I should have been."

Castiel again seemed surprised and even a little touched by her words. "It's forgotten," he said, and his face was so soft that he might have been smiling, almost.

Alex smiled crookedly at him, stuck her hand out for a handshake. "Truce?"

His eyes lowered to her hand and he looked at her questioningly, then slowly put his hand into hers, obviously unsure if he were doing it right. Alex tightened her grip and gave him a firm handshake. She was about to let go, then her inner prankster suddenly had an idea. And without changing her face at all, she just kept shaking his hand, waiting to see if he'd realize the handshake was going on too long. After about ten seconds, Castiel's eyes narrowed to little squinting slits but he said nothing, just let her keep shaking and shaking—but he definitely looked suspicious. Twenty seconds later and the lunacy of it was threatening to send Alex into a fit of laughter but she managed to keep a straight face for about three seconds more. And then she couldn't do it anymore. She snorted and then a huge peal of laughter burst out of her as she doubled over, laughing hard, hands braced against her thighs.

"Is… everything all right?" Cas asked, vastly confused, his head tilted to the side as he hunched over slightly, peering at her face.

Recovering, Alex straightened up, realizing how insane she probably looked to him. "Yeah," she said, face soft from laughter, a breathy grin still on her face. His worried expression was so damn cute. "I think it is." She pulled a face. "I mean, there's the whole Lucifer thing, but…" she sobered a little, remembering reality.

Cas however was apparently trying to solve another problem. "I don't understand what you found to be amusing just then," he said, clearly trying hard to figure it out. And that made Alex smile again.
"Nothing. It was dumb." She shrugged, shook her head, let her gaze linger on him. "Hey. I'm glad you're okay, Cas," she said, speaking earnestly, thinking about everything he'd done for them. Was he perfect? No. Was he doing the best he could? Yes. She thought so. She thumped him twice on the side of the shoulder encouragingly. "You're a good friend for helping us."

His eyes slid to his shoulder questioningly. "Thank you." His gaze traveled back to her eyes and a short silence spanned between didn't think he missed that she'd referred to him as her friend in earnest. "I... should return to my work," he said, sounding mildly reluctant. "I'll be in touch."

Alex nodded once. "Be careful out there."

Cas's eyes went down to the ground, looking directly at the cigarette she'd stomped on a few minutes ago. His eyes came to hers meaningfully. "You should know… smoking cigarettes is a bad habit."

Alex's eyebrows raised as a surprised smile came over her face. "So is telling me what to do."

Oddly enough, her playful comment seemed to almost amuse him. "So I've gathered." He paused, then mimicked what she'd done a moment ago—thumped her on the shoulder twice—but awkwardly, and after he did it, he gave her a silent look that seemed to ask did I do that correctly?

Thoroughly amused at him, Alex shook her head, eyebrows pulled together even as she smiled, trying to figure him out. "You are something else, Castiel," she remarked slowly, head still shaking, smile still holding.

His eyes crimped suspiciously. "Something other than what?"

The question had her laughing again—and his confusion tripled. Alex made herself chill on the laughter, explain to him. "It's, it's a saying," she said, a stupid grin on her face. It started to fade as she explained. "Means... you're something special. Something different than everything else." He was doing it again—looking at her so intensely that she felt cornered and suddenly nervous, sort of vulnerable. She tried not to feel those things and thrust her chin out once, nodding off to the side, trying to look okay and unruffled. "Now enough with the twenty questions. Go find God."

Did he see how saying he was special had made her feel weird? His eyes scrutinized her closely for a minute more, then nodded, said he'd be in touch, and disappeared, leaving her alone under the stars once again.
Daddy Issues

"And I hate myself for being human. What good are hearts if you can't use them?"
- God or Julie

Two Weeks Later

Alex and Dean entered their motel room and threw their stuff down, exhausted and covered in vampire blood. Alex plopped down onto one of the beds, yanking off her boots one by one which stuck damply to her feet.

A week ago, Sam left. Hitched a ride to wherever, just like that. It happened after the three of them had worked a job in Colorado—they'd caught up with a few old hunting buddies: Rufus, Jo, Ellen. The town had been a disaster. A newcomer on the scene, War, as mentioned in Revelation, had turned the entire town against one another. After they cut War's ring of influence from his hand, Sam had split, saying he needed a break and that he didn't trust himself.

Dean hadn't stopped their brother or even tried to talk to him about it. He'd been disturbingly okay with it. Practically sent their brother off with a shove as he walked out the door. Alex had begged Sam to change his mind, to just give it some time, but he'd left anyway. Dean had been avoiding the subject ever since. The past few days he'd put everything into finding a job and had ignoring her down to a fine art. But now that the job they'd found was taken care of, Alex wasn't going to stay quiet any longer. She looked up at her brother from where she was been sitting and decided now was as good a time as any. "Hey. We gotta talk."

He turned around and from the look he gave her, she could tell he had been expecting this. He had an unfriendly, sarcastic kind of smile on his face. "Look, I already know you've just been waiting wanna bitch me out about Sam," he said rudely, "so go ahead. I'm all ears."

Typical Dean. It pissed her off. "Why do you have to be like that?" Alex asked irritably. "You don't even know what I was gonna say."

He took a couple ambling steps toward her, giving off the air of superiority. "Lemme guess: you were gonna say that we shouldn't have split up, I should have made him to stay, he shouldn't be alone right now, some kind crap like that."

Alex's mouth went into a thin line, irritated that he got it right, and even more irritated that he didn't see the problem. "Well… yeah?" Dean almost rolled his eyes and Alex looked similar to an angered bull. "Don't you think should be helping him through it, not putting more miles between us?" she demanded indignantly. "He's our brother."

"Yeah, our brother who likes demon juice." Dean swaggered over, jabbing his finger at the ground. "This right here? The family business? We got no room for that bleeding heart, wishy washy crap. We don't have time for issues, we just gotta kill or be killed."

Alex pulled a face. "Right, because you don't have any issues."

"Oh, and you're just Miss America, aren't you?" he retorted.

She felt so flustered by his attitude that she couldn't think of any of the things she'd thought of or rehearsed internally. Flabbergasted, she felt herself turning red. "Why can't you just admit you're wrong about this?!” she demanded, wishing just once he'd drop the know-it-all, asshole attitude.
"Because I'm not wrong," Dean said forcefully, and he obviously believed his own delusion. "I didn't make Sam leave. He wanted out—end of story, Alex!" His volume was nearing a shout now. "I don't have time for this today! I'm the oldest and it's my car, my house, my rules, so if you don't like it, feel free to shove off like you did before!" Ouch. Alex was stung. Dean paused, taking a deep breath and visibly cooling off a little as guilt flashed across his face. "I didn't mean that," he muttered, then his expression became pissy again. "But if you wanna be with Sammy so bad, the door's right there. I'm sure as hell not keeping you here."

"Stop putting me in the middle!" Alex exclaimed, throwing her hands up in frustration. "I shouldn't have to choose a side! You're acting like an asshole!"

Dean took in a tired, aggravated breath, looked at his angry sister for a long moment. "Come on, Al, we've done this before. Sam was gone for four friggin' years and you didn't care then, so what's different this time?"

That simple comment hurt the worst out of all of them. She really hated Dean sometimes and his stupid, selfish, judgmental attitude. She turned away, yanked her hair out of the ponytail it'd been in. "Whatever Dean, nevermind," she muttered sullenly. "I need to get this damn blood off of me."

Alex disappeared with a hearty door slam into the bathroom, leaving Dean to roll his eyes and begin cleaning the blood off his jacket. This motel had a sink and mirror in the main room, while the shower and toilet were in a separate bathroom across the room. He heard the water start in the bathroom and grumbled to himself for a few minutes, then began to wash up in the sink out here. His headstrong, opinionated sister wasn't right, about any of it. At least, that's what he told himself. It had been Sam's choice, and it had been the right thing for the family. Sam's demon blood issue was just too much. Too much. He glanced up in the mirror, and jumped at what he saw in the reflection. Castiel was standing right behind him, staring silently—and creepily. "Oh my god." Dean thumped the sink to channel the shock that had jolted through his heart. "Don't do that!"

"Hello, Dean," Cas greeted plainly.

Dean turned around, finding Castiel in his face, only inches away. He sighed and gave the angel a damning look. "Cas, we've talked about this. Personal space?"

Brief understanding flickered across Cas's face. "My apologies." Cas stepped back, and Dean set him with a questioning, probing frown.

"How'd you find me? I thought I was flying below the angel radar."

"You are," Cas replied. "Bobby told me where you were." He looked around, eyes squinting further. "Where's Sam?"

Dean smiled thinly. "Me and Sam are taking separate vacations for a while."

There was a short pause and then Cas's unspeakably intense gaze came back to Dean. "And Alex?" the angel asked. His tone was a little different when he asked about her. But Dean was too annoyed to analyze it much.

"What's with the twenty questions? In the shower, man," Dean replied impatiently. "You find God yet? More importantly, can I have my damn necklace back, please?"

Cas's expression was unhappy. "No, I haven't found him. That's why I'm here. I need your help."

Castiel opened his mouth to reply, but a blood-curdling scream and loud crash cut him off. It was hard to tell who was moving first, Dean or Cas. Without even pausing to see if the door were locked or not, Dean broke the bathroom door down, barging in, ready to murder someone. "What is it?!" he demanded, the demon blade in his hand, his body tense, poised to attack, Cas right behind him, arms at his sides, an intense frown on his face. Alex was backed up against the far wall of the tiny bathroom, staring at the shower with huge eyes, clutching a motel towel to her dripping wet body. She looked terrified. "What, Alex? Where?!!" Dean demanded, looking all around and not seeing anything. He was getting rattled, fast.

"A spider! A huge, fucking, spider!" she screeched, looking at her brother with wide, crazed eyes.

Dean's alarm immediately lapsed into disbelieving annoyance, and the blade, which had been raised high, thumped to his side as he threw his other arm out in disbelief. "Oh my God, Al, really?" He looked entirely pissed, staring down his frightened sister. "Dammit! Seriously? Again? You're killin' me."

Castiel, puzzled, looked from Dean to Alex, trying to understand.

"It crawled on me!" Alex protested emphatically, as if such horrors had never fallen anyone else in the world. She looked at Dean, frozen in fear, clearly waiting for him to make a move, begging him with her eyes. "Dean! Kill it!"

Dean chuckled airily, shook his head, gave her a 'sorry, not sorry' kind of expression. "You know what? I'm done killing spiders and roaches for you. You can gank a vamp, a zombie, a demon… you can definitely handle a little spider. Man up, Al. Grow some balls and squish that tiny little arachnid."

Alex's expression stilled in complete and utter betrayal—as if he had just signed her death warrant. Then she put on her best pleading doe-eyes. "Dean..." she pleaded whiningly, but he just shook his head and crossed his arms, giving her a challenging look.

Alex looked to Cas, who of course she had noticed but hadn't really acknowledged yet—and frowned—Cas was… what was he staring at? His eyes jumped up from—what had he been looking at? Her legs? He met her gaze his face set like stone, his chin raised. He looked intense. "Where is this spider? I will destroy it."

"T-the shower," she replied feebly, and he stepped forward, his hand raised, his face deadly.

There was a sickening squelch sound somewhere inside the shower and Dean, grimacing, peeked his head over into the stall. "Eugh. You're a real hero, Cas," he commented even as he smirked at Alex. "Dude that thing was big," he added in with an impressed face. She gave him a baleful look.

Cas, however, had straightened, turned, and was looking at her in honest confusion. "Why does an arachnid strike such fear into you?"

Dean gave a short little laugh at the angel's question. "Because she's the biggest damn baby on earth when it comes to spiders, man. No reason why. Drives me crazy." He suddenly, finally seemed to realize the extent of Alex's undress and an awkward expression passed over his face. He grabbed Cas by his shoulders, pushing him out. "Move along, Cas, nothing to see here." He then chuckled, as if he'd said something extremely funny—apparently the joke was either that his sister was not appealing enough to warrant attention, or that Cas was asexual. Either way, Alex wasn't laughing, she was just scowling.

Cas, perplexed as usual, was looking at Alex over his shoulder as Dean pushed him out of the bathroom and past the door that was barely hanging onto the frame by its cracked hinge. Alex timidly dared a peek into the shower, where she saw the dark splat on the tiled wall. Her face wrinkled up into a disgusted expression. Ugh. Spiders.

Dressed and decent, Alex joined Cas and Dean in the main room. Her hair was quickly air-drying into its normal state of unkempt, wavy disarray. Cas and Dean looked like they were ready to go somewhere, like they had been waiting around for her. "What's going on?" she asked, adjusting her tank top a little bit, not entirely sure where Cas had come from this time or what he wanted. His presence, as normal, set her on a bit of an edge she didn't really recognize.

Dean had a smug little smile on his face. "Cas here says Raphael can help us find God."

Uh... okay. Alex looked at the angel for explanation. "And... who's Raphael? A ninja turtle?"

Castiel looked completely baffled. "A... what?" he glanced at Dean who was, of course, not going to help him out in the least. "No, he's not some kind of... warrior turtle. He's the archangel who killed me."

Alex's eyebrows shot up. "Whoa, and you wanna go... find him?" She made puzzled a face, worry pitting in her stomach. "Don't you, y'know..." she gave a nervous stupid little laugh, "like being alive?"

He didn't answer her question. "We need information, which Raphael possesses," he said intensely, not responding to her humorous tone. "We will trap and interrogate him, and he will tell us where God is."

Okaaay... that sounded crazy. Alex rubbed her forehead briefly. "Okay, aside from the fact that that's a long shot..." she turned and looked at her brother, "Dean, you're actually down for this suicide mission?"

"Yeah, why not," he said, grinning with that ever-present sarcastic attitude. "Sounds like a good time." At her bitchy expression, he grudgingly dropped the act. "Look, it can't hurt to see if this guy knows something—anything—about all this Michael's vessel, God crap."

Point taken. But there was something else Alex didn't understand. She turned back to Cas. "Okay, but why do you need us for this, Cas?"

"To find Raphael..." he said slowly, grimly, as if preparing to reveal some dark truth, "I'll have to... talk. To people."

Alex's head tilted to the side, a hesitant little smile on her face as her eyebrows rose slowly—she hadn't expected him to say that. It was almost cute, the obvious dread and anxiety the angel was feeling. This was the guy who had shattered all the lights in a room when she saw him the first time. The one who could smite demons with a single touch, the one who dragged her brother out of the mouth of Hell, the one who had given her a voice, the ability to speak. Basically, one of the most powerful beings she could think of. And yet, there he stood, basically implying that talking to people was the most unthinkably difficult thing in the world. She remembered their conversation on the hospital roof—how he'd kind of struggled to keep up with the ebb and flow of things. It made her feel a little more fond about him immediately to know he was nervous about conversations with people. It made him feel more human, more relatable.

Dean was chuckling and opening the door to the motel. "Come on, kids. Let's blow this popsicle stand," he said, his keys jingling.
Alex paused, glanced at Cas. "What, aren't we gonna take the angel railway?" It'd be faster...

"Dean refuses. He cited chronic constipation," Castiel replied in monotone.

Alex blinked twice. "Wha…?" she asked, looking at her brother weirdly. What did that even mean?

"Last time he zapped me somewhere, I didn't poop for a week!" Dean grumbled. Alex had to work hard not to laugh out loud at his misfortune.

They walked out to the car together, Cas drifting after the Winchesters somewhat uncertainly. Dean tossed the keys at his sister without warning, and unprepared, she barely stopped them from hitting her in the face. "Listen, I'm tired as crap," he said. "Alex, you're driving."

She tried to remember the last time she had driven the Impala and looked at Dean in disbelief. "Serious?"

Annoyed by her, he yanked open the back door and sent her a brief little grumpy glare. "I need a friggin' nap, okay?"

"Uh, yeah. Okay." She paused at the driver's side. Cas stared at her with his usual, stern expression over the top of the car. Her heart caught and fluttered and she looked away fast, uncomfortable and really needing to fill the suddenly embarrassing silence. "Um, so, w... where are we going, anyway?" she asked, trying to look really certain and at ease.

His eyes were so blue—she was staring into them again. "Waterville, Maine," Castiel said, never looking out of her gaze. "Where a deputy officer laid eyes on the archangel."

The car ride was quiet in the beginning. Music played on the radio, Alex mostly kept her eyes on the road, driving with one hand... but she glanced at Castiel every minute or so. The windows were cracked slightly, ruffling her loose hair a little in the breeze. Dean snored lightly, sprawled awkwardly across the back seat with an arm over his eyes to keep out the sunlight.

Castiel found it difficult to believe this monotonous mode of transportation was how the Winchester family always traveled. It was taking far too long, and they had only been traveling for about an hour. But Dean had insisted. And Castiel had thought better of trying to talk the fiercely headstrong man out of it.

On the radio, a man was singing, or at least, that's what Castiel knew that was what the sound was supposed to be. However, it was more like a shouting, grunting shriek combined with growling. Finished with my woman 'cause she couldn't help me with my mind, people think I'm insane because I am frowning all the time! Castiel was perplexed, not able to follow the message of the words. The loud, repeating sound of a gritty, distorted instrument combined with the man's screeching voice was not pleasant. In fact, it was beginning to grate on his nerves. As if reading his mind, Alex reached for a knob on the dashboard and turned the music down almost all the way.

"You all right over there, space case?" she asked, her voice breaking the long silence. Castiel turned his head toward her slightly, appraisingly. He forgot to answer her question in favor of just looking at her. She grew uncertain. "Uh... you look kinda… glazed over," she said hesitantly. "You tired or something?"

Staring was considered rude in Western culture. Castiel peeled his gaze away, trying to be polite and acceptable. It was all so much to think about and remember. "I don't get tired," he told her factually. "I... found the sound of that music grating."
She smiled when he said that. "Come on Cas, don't knock Black Sabbath," she said in a tone he thought was supposed to be teasing. He didn't understand what she was saying to him—'knock black sabbath'? What was the meaning of that phrase? He repeated the words in his mind, trying to understand, but he found no comprehension. She and Dean had very strange ways of speaking. She was chuckling. "I bet you're a Beethoven kind of guy, huh."

At the mention of the famous composer, Castiel smiled very softly, surprising himself as he remembered a dark echoing hall and beautiful piano music that filled it, the man who'd been deaf and unable to hear music and had felt it instead. "I watched him compose Moonlight Sonata."

A stunned, shocked silence followed. "...You watched Beethoven compose Moonlight Sonata?" Alex appeared to be starstruck and impressed. "Wow. That's… that's friggin' awesome!" She was grinning, suddenly very animated and eager. Cas was caught off guard by her enthusiastic reaction but intrigued. She seemed to like this information. So, he shared more.

"He had insomnia when he wrote it," Castiel recalled, and he could hear the piano movement in his mind, the somber and beautiful striking of the piano keys as Beethoven had written the song. Ludwig von Beethoven had been a gentle, simple man. A fascinating one.

Castiel's simple recollection seemed to completely entrance Alex—perhaps she hadn't realized how Cas had been in existence for so long, watching humanity. But she knew now, and was biting her lip in thought as she contemplated the road ahead. "Okay," she said in a voice that was bordering on excited, "so—I gotta know. In everything you've ever seen… what's your favorite moment in history? The first pyramid? Noah's ark?"

He hesitated abruptly at her question, looked away, a slight shiver of nervousness overtaking him. "It... would be difficult to pick," he said, dodging. His instincts told him that the truth was far too revealing of himself. The best thing he had ever seen? His favorite moment? The first time the one he was sitting next to right now had laughed out loud with the voice he'd given to her…

Unaware of his thoughts, Alex just looked at him sidelong, a quieting, contemplative look on her face. She recognized that he was hedging, he realized. But she didn't press him. Just let it go, and continued to drive, her expression becoming thoughtful and far away. He studied her profile for a moment, wondering what was to become of himself. So much had changed for him in recent times. He was now on a path with an unforeseeable destination. All he could do was hope that he was doing the right thing. But with these people at his side… Alex and Dean… he felt optimistic. He was glad they were assisting him right now.

Cas looked straight ahead of himself again, going deep into his own mind, thinking hard. He truly believed that Heaven was misled by the angels who had lost sight of the way. Castiel had to make everything right again and hope his actions would prove to be right in the end. He had resolved to find God, who could cleanse the heavens of the unfaithful angels who would seek their own gain. And then he would finally be rewarded for his long-suffering faith and devotion, for his loyalty despite the turmoil engulfing Heaven. He would see and be seen, he would stand in the presence of his divine Father's love that he longed so completely for. And then he would hear, from the mouth of God himself: Well done, Good and Faithful servant. Then, and only then, would he be free from the transgressions he had committed.

He'd lost sight of his role and purpose in recent times, and as a result he felt unsure of himself, as if he were standing on shaking ground. Still, he realized that while all of Heaven was after him for treason, he wasn't completely alone or on his own. He had these people. The Winchesters. Alex had even called him her friend. He recalled that night, two weeks ago, when she'd spoken to him with kindness, apologizing for her harsh words to him. She surprised him, constantly.
Castiel remembered the night Alex had been intoxicated as her half-brother Adam had burned nearby—that had been the tipping point for him. She had voluntarily spilled out her private thoughts and pains to him, he had listened, not entirely understanding why she was trying to hurt herself further, only understanding that the things she told him were somehow connected to why she was trying to drink herself to death. He had intervened, taking the alcohol from her, a snap decision. He hadn't even thought, he had just reacted out of a feeling of concern. He'd resolved shortly thereafter to tell the Winchesters of the angels' plans to allow Lucifer to rise, after realizing he did not like the idea of Alex dying or being harmed—two things an apocalypse guaranteed.

Castiel had tangibly felt Heaven closing in on him in those moments leading up to when he would be taken from his vessel. Feeling cornered, convinced, even a little desperate… he tried to warn Dean before it was too late. To tell him and his family about the angels' plans to bring on the apocalypse. Because above all else, Castiel felt that was wrong, this plan to allow the apocalypse to take place. Maybe it wasn't his place to question it, but he hadn't been able not to question it. But before he could warn the Winchesters, he was yanked out of his vessel, punished painfully, warned severely. They said they knew how he had continually gone to Alex for no specific reasons given of Heaven, for reasons serving his own purposes—and that was unacceptable, dangerous, forbidden.

They wouldn't warn him again, they said—they would kill him next time. So Castiel accepted the lies they told him despite his intuitions and his doubts that said otherwise. He hadn't known what else to do. There was nothing else for him except his existence as an angel. What other choice did he have? Well… he could have abandoned Heaven right then and there, rebelled before it had been too late. But like a coward, he had clung onto what he was familiar with, knowing it was wrong even as he did so. Like a fool he'd fought doing the right thing. Fear had held him back and dictated his actions until it had nearly been too late.

Even though he had taken action in the end, maybe it had been too late, Lucifer had risen. That was why Castiel was now so eager to find God and have him correct this situation, undo the damage caused. Castiel now realized that Heaven was in shambles, no longer governed by God, but by angels. Mere angels. Castiel had been so blind and lost, for so long, so desperate to believe that God was truly in control. And that had been another lie on an ever-lengthening list.

These thoughts left him disconsolate and quiet in a way that transcended everything.

"Hey, Cas?" Alex asked, drawing Cas out of the thoughts he was so bogged down in. She was glancing between him and the road repeatedly. "You okay over there?"

Cas looked down at his knees, vexed at her concern. He didn't want to burden her with his thoughts or turmoils. "Fine, thank you."

Alex didn't look fully convinced, but accepted his answer, let another short silence hang before she chanced another question. "Listen… I've been wondering. Is he still… you know… still in there somewhere?" She paused, then clarified. "Jimmy, I mean."

A defensive feeling arose. Jimmy. Naming the man who Castiel was using brought a strange sensation to him. The slightest instance of guilt. He knew full well that the body he inhabited wasn't truly his and that in order to possess Jimmy Novak he was essentially cutting the man off from his life. From any life. But this was the only way, and as unfortunate as it may have been… it was necessary.

There were problems with Jimmy's vessel though, and Castiel was suddenly thinking of earlier that day when he'd noticed malfunctions and strange sensations. He remembered the sight of Alex, wrapped only in a small towel. It had made the vessel behave oddly to see her like that: dark hair dripping wet, beads of water flecked all over her bare arms, legs, neck. He remembered a few little rivulets of water running down the space between the hollow dip of her collarbone and the soft, shadowed space made where her breasts met and pressed softly together... Cas swallowed hard, suddenly aware that his body—his vessel—was malfunctioning again. He looked down at his lap, slightly worried, not sure what was happening to him.

He realized and remembered how Alex had asked him if Jimmy was still in him somewhere and the long, questioning silence suddenly made him flustered. "Why is that a concern of yours?" He asked her a little louder than necessary, trying to act as though everything were fine, like nothing strange was happening to him. He had an instinct he didn't understand that urged him not to let her see what was happening to him.

Alex glanced at him with a skeptical, no-nonsense expression on her face. "You know why."

Yes, he supposed he did. Castiel's worries about the vessel faded. His mind turned to that night when Jimmy had given himself over to Castiel for what would be the final time. He remembered Alex calling him afterward. She'd been angry with him and he'd been cold and distant purposefully, trying to dissuade him from himself, trying to protect both her and himself from the consequences. She'd accused him of ruining Jimmy Novak's life. And he supposed he truly had, hadn't he?

"He seemed like a pretty nice guy, you know?" Alex asked after Cas made no reply. "He loved his wife and kid, just wanted to go back to his normal life..." she sounded pensive, mournful, confused. Sad for Jimmy and his loss. "I liked him. It's... sad what happened."

Castiel did understand what she meant, knew that what she was saying was true. "I suppose it is regrettable," he admitted reluctantly, wearily. And it was regrettable, especially now that Jimmy was the vessel for a fallen angel who had been cut off from Heaven. "But Jimmy's sacrifice will not be unrewarded."

Alex shrugged a shoulder up slightly, her thoughtful eyes out on the road ahead. "Maybe not, but there's a woman and a kid out there who lost a husband and dad," she said quietly, her eyes sliding to him sidelong. "And you're him. Kinda."

Castiel heard what she was saying. He had taken a man from his family. Cas shook his head slowly, not sure how to respond. "No. I'm not him. I only look like him." Jimmy was gone, essentially. Because of him. Alex looked at him again briefly, her expression tense and unsure. A silence spanned and Castiel thought, trying to give her a more definitive answer, trying to explain what had happened to the man in question. "There is a small part of this vessel that retains what made Jimmy Novak, Jimmy Novak. Memories. Opinions. Experiences. I can see everything he was. But all of those things are overpowered and dwarfed by the sheer, uninhibited power of my magnificent celestial presence inside this vessel."

She made a face that conveyed both confusion and chagrinned amusement. "Okay. Magnificent celestial presence." She chuckled slightly, rueful.

Castiel didn't understand. "Why does that amuse you?"

She grinned helplessly, kind of lopsidedly. How could a smile be sad and happy at the same time? He didn't know, but that was the kind of smile on her face right then. She shrugged, and he watched the way her shoulders moved. "Just... the way you say things sometimes."

She found him to be less than satisfactory, he decided. "I often don't understand social contexts." Castiel offered plainly, understanding that she was telling him that she found his confusion on the matter to be amusing.
"Really?" Alex asked, the tone of her voice different than it had been before.

"Yes, re—" he paused, then stopped. Wait. He shut his mouth then looked out at the road again, the smallest smile on his lips as he realized that he understood what she had just done. "That was sarcasm."

She looked sidelong at him, mildly impressed. "Not bad, Cas." She smiled a little as she watched the road ahead. "But, listen," she said abruptly, smile giving way to a studious frown. "About Jimmy. Will you ever... leave again? Is he gonna come back? Is that possible?" He heard worry in her voice.

"You're worried about his wife and daughter," Castiel said softly. Her empathy was commendable and appealing, but sadly, Castiel had to tell her the heavy truth. "Unfortunately, Jimmy Novak is not going to return. If I ever leave this vessel again... I think he would be burned from the inside out. I think he would be brain-dead or worse." A heavy, shocked silence followed his words.

"Magnificent celestial presence," Alex murmured, understanding. This time she didn't sound amused.

"Yes," Castiel replied heavily. He was quiet for a moment. Again, he tried to make her understand what even he had a difficult time with. "Without Jimmy, I couldn't be here with you right now."

Her words seemed to surprise her, then make her uncomfortable. She was left quiet for a long pause as she avoided looking at him. "I know," she said in a soft, low voice. The tone in her voice was indescribable and vulnerable sounding and made him feel... somehow protective. Fiercely so. Why? She shook her head and shrugged again—she seemed to do that when she was having a hard time knowing what to say or do. "Hey, can't always have your cake and eat it too, can you?" she asked in a louder, surer voice. She sounded both resigned and bittersweet at the same moment.

Cas, however, wasn't sure what baked goods had to do with anything. "...Cake?"

With that single word, he somehow managed to inspire Alex to give a sudden snort of repressed laughter and a grin, a noisy sigh. "Oh Cas," she commented and he felt that fierce feeling again. He thought she said his name with fondness, and whatever funny thing he'd said, he was glad he'd said it and was interested in the effect it'd had on her. She looked at him sidelong with a little smile that rested both on her lips and in her eyes, a smile that seemed to say she found him agreeable.

He'd seen her smile, but never so completely at him. It startled him, then quickly made him uncomfortable and nervous and he looked away, uncertain if he was overstepping bounds in pursuing a friendship with her. It wasn't wrong, he didn't think, even though Heaven had said it was. He didn't think the Winchesters had corrupted him. In fact, he thought perhaps they had moved him toward greatness. Or at least toward self-awareness. And even though it was a strange new place for him... he found himself liking it cautiously. He wanted to look at her again, but he made himself not.

Another moment of silence passed before Alex spoke again. "So, if this Raphael guy we're looking for's an archangel, what kind are you?" she asked, then paused. "If that's not too personal."

Castiel glanced at her sidelong, her question startling him, her implication of curiosity about him somehow pleasing and stressful at the same time. She waited for an answer, and he frowned slightly, considering his answer. "Well... in the beginning, when I was first established, I was a Seraph. A Watcher. I was tasked with the honor of bearing witness to the events which unfolded in this universe." He remembered those years with a burst of pride, of fondness. He had known his role, and he had carried it out. It was simple; it was pure, he had never faltered or failed. The good feelings faded as he remembered how everything changed and fell apart. It had all started with her, too. That fateful day when he'd been tasked as guardian angel over one Alex Winchester. He looked down. "More recently..." he trailed off, realizing it was true, what he was about to say. "I don't know what I am."

"Huh," she commented softly, noticing how heavily he spoke, how conflicted he sounded. "Well I don't think you're so bad, whatever you are." She smiled at him a little again before returning her eyes to the road.

Castiel looked at her profile for a few seconds, then shifted in his seat, looked away, processing her words, feeling a warmth in his chest at her encouraging comment and tone. His lips were upturning a little in a smile. "Thank you." It was humbling how she was slowly softening toward him, extending acts of friendship and good will toward him. For a time, he had considered that she would possibly always mistrust and suspect him. More silence passed, and after a minute, Castiel sighed through his nose, restless again. "Traveling this way is truly cumbersome."

Alex gave him an unsympathetic glance. "Try almost thirty years of it, then complain to me about it." She glanced down at the car display in front of the steering wheel and muttered something about needing gas. The car pulled into a station called Gas-n-Sip and Alex got out and began filling the vehicle's tank, leaving Castiel to wait. Dean was still knocked out in the back, his wheezing snore a steadfast rhythm that was becoming irksome and unbearable. Cas reached for the knob he'd seen Alex use to control the volume of the radio and he carefully twisted it, trying to bring the music back to cover the sound of snoring. He heard no sounds and twisted more and more, then reached the end where the knob wouldn't go any further. Perhaps the music playback device was broken. He gave up and resigned himself to listening to Dean's grating snores.

Alex finished putting gas into the tank and loped across the pavement and into the convenience store, casually glancing left and right as she went, taking in her surroundings. Castiel watched out of the corner of his eye. She had this certain way about the way she walked that he found intriguing. He had noticed it before, and studied it yet again. It was a long stride, confident but unaware, like she knew where she was going and had a purpose or a goal but wasn't over thinking her movements. Other women didn't walk that way. Other women pranced, they ambled, they strutted, they flounced. Alex had her own way, and Castiel liked it.

A minute later she appeared again with some brightly colored packets in hand. She squinted against the noonday sun as she came out of the store and when she got back into the car, she offered him one of the packets she was carrying. It read Hostess CupCakes. "Want one? These are my favorite." She tossed a pack of them back at Dean without looking, where it hit her sleeping brother in the chin. He started, made a sound of protest, then settled back down.

Cas shook his head no. "I do not require sustenance."

"You don't even wanna try it?" she asked, giving him a look as she ripped hers open.

"No." As an afterthought, he added, "thank you, though."

She was already chomping into her cupcake without ceremony as they sat there in the unmoving car. He intently watched the way she chewed, licked some icing off her finger, looking at each movement closely, with great interest. She looked at him oddly, opened her mouth to say something, and then accidentally dropped the cupcake where it splatted down onto the seat right beside her thigh.

"Oh shit," she hissed and grabbed the cupcake up. Quickly, she looked back at Dean, her expression fearful. When she saw that he was still sleeping, she tossed the smushed cupcake out the window and reached into the glove compartment, her arm brushing against Castiel's upper thigh as she dug for something. There again, his vessel reacted immediately, with the same horrifying, dizzying, unexplained sensation it had felt earlier, and the angel went tense, not sure what to do. Before he had time to panic, she had already grabbed a few napkins out of the compartment and was scrubbing at the seat, repeating the word "shit" over and over again, panicked. Castiel watched, intrigued, forgetting his momentary panic. After a few more swipes of the napkin, she seemed to be satisfied and sighed, sounding relieved. "Dean would kill me if he saw that just happened," she muttered, seeing Cas's perplexed expression. "Do me a favor and don't tell Dean?"

Castiel tilted his head to the side, trying to make sure he understood right. "You want me to lie?"

She held out her pinky, eyebrows raised, her gaze seeming to be telling him to do something. "Just pinky promise. That you won't tell him."

He looked at her blankly. "What is a... pinky promise?"

She held out her pinky and wiggled it, nodding at him as if to say 'now you.' He held his out in similar fashion and she hooked hers through, pulling their fingers against each other's tightly. She spoke in a low, serious voice, and her expression became intense. "It's an unflinching bond agreement between two beings. Forever binding. You break a pinky promise, the wrath of the universe will reign down on your poor, lost soul." Castiel felt his mouth open slightly—why had he never heard of this all-powerful binding 'pinky promise'? Alex's grim expression suddenly dissolved into chuckles and a laugh, and Castiel narrowed his eyes, not sure what—and then, suddenly, he understood, and was surprised that he understood.

A pleased little expression came over his face. "You were joking just now," he surmised. "About the wrath of the universe."

She smiled again, and again, the corners of her eyes wrinkled. "Yup. But seriously... don't tell Dean."

Castiel just smiled slightly, a little impressed with himself. Alex started the car and suddenly music blared so loudly that it seemed like the speakers were going to blow out—Alex shouted something like, "Whoaaaaa!" and very very quickly reached for the knob and turned it way down, seeming a little out of breath from how startled it had left her. Once the ear-assault was over, she looked at Cas, flabbergasted. "Did you do that?!"

Cas was surprised, too. "I... didn't realize that would happen," he said, feeling embarrassed. To his surprise, she started laughing.

"What the crap are you two morons doing up there?!!" Dean complained, sitting up halfway and scowling at them with a grumpy, sleepy face.

"Just uh, making sure the volume knob still works!" she exclaimed. Dean mumbled complaints even as he shifted and flopped facedown to return to his nap. Alex was still laughing softly while shaking her head and glancing at Cas again. He was unsure what to do—why was that funny? Either way, she seemed to have thought it was extremely funny. She grabbed the gear shift and put the car into motion, turned her attention to driving then gently fiddled with the volume knob and found a station of classical music then looked at Cas with a knowing smile.

Surprised and touched at the gesture, Castiel felt himself smiling back without a second thought.
Late That Night

Alex kicked over a broken chair in the abandoned house they were squatting in. Dean was downing beers and pacing around, bored like his sister.

They had visited the Waterville Police Department earlier and found out with some digging that Raphael's vessel was a man who was committed. Taking Cas along as a third FBI agent had been a disastrous idea—the guy was seriously a trip and had almost given them away like ten times. However, it made for some funny memories at least. Alex shook her head as she remembered Cas holding his FBI identification upside down. He was so clueless. After finding out who Raphael's vessel was and where the man lived, they had gone to the psychiatric ward where he resided. They found the man, empty and glazed over with Raphael no longer possessing him. But Cas had insisted he knew how to conjure Raphael and had done some strange Enochian chant, then said tomorrow, the ritual would play out. After that, he disappeared without explanation and been gone for hours now. Long enough that Alex was just a little worried.

Sighing, she stopped pacing, picked up a beer and cracked it open on the side of the table. "I mean, couldn't we stay at a motel?" she asked out of nowhere. "This place is a freakshow."

Castiel suddenly appeared in the room, holding an ancient looking clay jar, surprising the siblings in tandem.

"Where've you been?" Dean asked.

"Jerusalem," the angel replied simply.

Whoa. Impressive. "What's in that?" Alex asked as he set the jar on the rickety old table that remained in the house.

Cas seemed distracted. "It's oil. It's very special. Very rare."

Dean smirked. "Okay... so we trap Raphael with a nice vinaigrette?"

Alex snorted at her brother's comment then took a swig of beer even as Castiel sat down in a chair and gave him a short look. "No."

"Tell me something," Dean said, sauntering over with his beer in hand. "You keep saying we're gonna trap this guy. Isn't that kinda like trapping a hurricane with a butterfly net?"

"No." Cas paused, narrowed his eyes. "It's harder."

Alex paused, beer suddenly forgotten. Dean looked a little put off. "Do we really have any chance of surviving this?"

Cas finally looked up fully, his expression neutral. "You two do. An archangel will not touch Michael's vessel, nor a child of God under divine protection."

"So... are you saying that you're dead meat?" Alex asked, not liking the implication at all.

"In all likelihood, yes," he said apathetically, looking into middle distance in front of himself.

She looked at him seriously. "Cas... I don't know if I'm okay with that."

He was avoiding looking at either of them again. "There is nothing to be 'okay' about. It must be done. I have to do it. I have to take responsibility."
"But..." Alex trailed off and he finally looked up at her with a veiled expression. She couldn't find anything else to say and they just looked at each other with silent, tense eyes. He had just accepted his death? Relegated himself to dying tomorrow? No way—there had to be another way.

"Well. Last night on earth!" Dean said, trying to break the tension by being a smartass. "What are your plans?"

There was another pause, as if Cas hadn't thought that far ahead. "I just thought I'd sit here quietly." Something about that comment touched Alex, made her feel sympathetic and endeared to him. She was kind of a homebody, too. Even though she didn't really have a home. She took a sip of beer, deep in distressing thought about what would happen tomorrow.

Dean apparently thought Castiel's answer was lame. "Come on—last night on earth!" he repeated more emphatically. "Anything? Booze?" He paused, his tone lowered, a shit-eating grin on his face and voice. "Women?" Alex almost choked on her beer at that question and her wide eyes went straight to Cas to see his response.

Castiel was suddenly very visibly uncomfortable and faltered, said nothing, looked at Alex, faltered even further, said nothing. Dean looked shocked. "You have been with women before... right? Or an angel, at least?" Cas, said nothing, only looked even more distressed. A silent no. Dean didn't stop. "You mean to tell me you've never been up there doing a little cloud-seeding?" he asked in amused disbelief and Alex literally sputtered at her brother's words and decided to stop trying to drink the beer altogether for fear of choking herself on it. Holy shit this was the most awkward moment ever.

Cas seemed almost riled by the line of questioning. "I've never had occasion, okay?" he asked defensively, and Alex thought she recognized that look on his face. Embarrassment, just wanting to disappear, not wanting anyone to bother him about it or imply that it was weird or freakish.

"Dean... leave him alone," Alex said, setting down her beer hard on the table. She felt sort of protective, if also very flustered.

Dean only shook his head, looking determined. "No way, Al. This is too good." He looked at Cas pointedly. "Lemme tell you something. There are two things I know for certain. One, Bert and Ernie are gay. Two, you are not gonna die a virgin. Not on my watch."

Cas looked positively scared and Alex looked at her brother like he'd sprouted horns. "Oh my god, really, Dean?" She looked at him pointedly. "You're gonna try and get an angel laid?!!"

Dean feigned great thoughtfulness. "Mmm..." he pretended to think really hard then grinned. "Yeah."

Uncomfortable and mad for reasons she didn't totally get, Alex gave her brother an evil eye. She felt so put on the spot and mad and also incredibly embarrassed, like everyone could see straight through her. Hot-blooded and shaking slightly, she thinned her mouth briefly. "You're an idiot," she declared, then stalked out of the house, needing a damn cigarette.

Cas stood as Alex left, his expression strange, almost afraid. "Dean, I don't think that—"

"I don't care what you think, bud," Dean said, grabbing his jacket. "You need to get laid, and pronto."

"But why?" Castiel asked, confused.
"Because you're a virgin!" Dean exclaimed, as if being a virgin were a horrible disease. "You gotta take care of that, pronto."

Castiel's eyes narrowed as the wheels in his head turned. "Dean, I don't understand why you are so adamant about this. Why haven't you shown the same concern for Alex's virginity?"

Dean did a double take, sputtered. "What?!" He fumbled a minute. "A vi—how the hell do you know that about her?!"

Castiel just raised his chin a little bit. "I know everything about her body. And yours. And any other body I encounter. You had your tonsils removed at age fifteen, and—"

"Okay, okay, I get it. Wow," Dean said, rolling his eyes, then reflected briefly, kind of stunned by this revelation. "Well, I was pretty sure she was, you know, a, a virgin—I mean she's never even had a boyfriend and I've been with her like every freaking moment of every freaking day for the most part, but… I wasn't totally sure… well, that's a relief."

"A relief?" Cas asked, becoming more puzzled by the second by the double standards. "You're not anxious to… 'get her laid'?"

The hunter's face dropped. "Hey! Don't talk that way about my sister!" Dean snapped, approaching the angel, suddenly angry.

Cas's eyes narrowed, his head tilted to the side, he frowned. "But if virginity is such a stigma, and both she and I are virgins, then surely the two of us cou—"

Dean's jaw almost hit the floor as his eyes went as wide as they could. "No. No, no, NO. Lemme stop you right there, 'cause I don't like where you're going with that line of logic… Cas! No! You hear me? No, don't even imply that. Oh my god!" He was reeling in a fit of protective, brotherly rage, bearing down on Cas with a vengeance. "No one, I mean no one, is ever going to have sex with her. Not until she's like at least forty. You hear me?"

"Yes, of course I hear you. My ears function perfectly. But I don't understand…"

"Understand this," Dean growled. "Any pervy, asshole guy who so much as thinks about touching my little sister is dead. Six feet under, dead."

Perplexed and not understanding the outburst, Castiel carefully explored Dean's logic. "But what if she marries someone?"

That question stilled Dean and caused a look of shock and then chagrin to come over the man's face. His fire was replaced by a certain kind of stunned sadness. "Uh—Cas. No. That'll never happen."

Dean's quiet statement gave Castiel a pause. "Why?"

There was a strained pause. "I mean, like I said, she's… she's never even had a boyfriend, okay?" Dean gave a soft little airy laugh that seemed to be a coverup for some other, sadder emotion and suddenly his eyebrows were pressing in together as he looked down. "She's not really uh… she's not normal, Cas. None of us are, but… she's… how's she gonna find a good guy in this life? How's some moron guy ever gonna get who she is and what she's been through? Me and Sam are the only two people in her life who haven't either died or left, so…" he trailed off and his face worked oddly, he clapped a hand onto Cas's shoulder and looked at him pointedly, leaving the talk of Alex behind. "This doesn't matter, all right? We're not talking about her problems. We're talking about yours. Now, let's go find you a woman to make you into a real man."
Dean steered Castiel toward the door of the house and out into the night. They found Alex huffing on a cigarette and pacing the yard. Dean stalked up to her and snatched the cigarette out of her mouth without ceremony and threw it to the ground, stamping on it with his foot. "Hey!" she protested, even as he shoved his hand into her jacket pocket, pulling out a pack of cigarettes. He wagged it at her angrily.

"I thought I told you to stop this crap two days ago!" He drew back his arm and flung it as far as he could into the dark night.

"Hey!" she protested again, looking angry.

Dean was even more angry than she was and pointed a warning finger at her. "You stop this crap, okay? Dad would kill you if he saw you smoking! It's a friggin' horrible habit!"

"Thanks for the morality lecture, Mr. Family Values," Alex spat back.

Her brother made no comment, just gave her a wan look and then turned toward the Impala. "We'll be back."

"What?" Her expression fell and she looked at Cas briefly for explanation. Her bravado was gone in favor of vast uncertainty. "W-where are you going?"

Dean looked at her with a half-smirk. "You know where."

Alex gaped at him, then quickly looked at the angel. "Cas?" she asked, sounding surprised at him. "You really wanna do this?"

Uncertain of what he wanted, Castiel answered indirectly. "I'm told it's necessary."

"Quit being a cockblock," Dean said in a dismissing tone to his sister.

If looks could kill, Dean would have been dead underneath the glower Alex was giving him. "Yeah fine," she retorted, "but you gotta be crazy if you think I'm staying at this creepy ass house all by myself." She looked at Cas who was standing there as a feeling of alarm grew inside. His arms hung at his sides uselessly, but he was aware of how strange he felt in his body right then. Alex studied him with an odd expression then looked back at her brother again. "Plus, you know, uh... moral support?"

"Yeah, fine, whatever," Dean said, and got into the car with a slam of the door. Alex and Cas didn't move—they stood there just looked at each other for a short, strange moment in which Cas felt his heart rate picking up in distress. Cas almost asked her Alex somehow get him out of this insane idea, this plan of sexual intercourse. He didn't want it, honestly—the idea of it seemed bizarre and disturbing, undignified, and inappropriate for him. But then Dean hollered an impatient, "move your asses!" and when Alex got into the car, Cas said nothing and got into the car, too.

Low, thumping music pulsed through the "strip club" that was clearly a lot more than that. Seated at a flimsy table near the stage where strippers swayed and sashayed, Dean leaned over the table and fixed Castiel with a commanding stare. "Hey. Relax."

"This is a den of iniquity," Castiel said nervously, eyes darting around like a frightened animal. "I should not be here."

"Dude, you full on rebelled against Heaven," Dean said, brushing Cas's concerns aside. "Iniquity is one of the perks."
Nearby, one of the women had set her sights on them. With an enormous amount of grace and poise, Dean pointed at Cas animatedly, and waved the hooker over like he was hitching a ride on the highway. "Showtime," he said, grinning.

Cas seemed to shrink a little into his chair and he briefly caught Alex's gaze—they sat directly across from each other. Help me, she imagined he was thinking. But that had to be wishful thinking, right? She just pulled her huge mug of beer close in both hands, lips on the rim, trying to disappear. Why had she come along for this?! Bad idea. Stupid idea.

The scantily clad woman arrived at their table and Alex stared openly. The stripper was super close and smelled of strong, pungent perfume. She was wearing almost nothing—just a sheer, gauzy white lingerie thing. Her huge, fake breasts were pushed up oddly, squished together with a huge, garish bow in the center where the cleavage dipped low. She had unnaturally blonde hair and eyes lined heavily in black, her eyebrows looked painted on, her skin was an orange kind of color. She didn't look real at all or like she had much going on in the general area of her brain, but somehow, Alex was still intimidated.

"Hi," the woman said softly, flirtatiously, looking at Cas with suggestive eyes. "What's your name?"

Castiel tried not to look at her. In fact, it almost looked like he was going to be sick, and Alex put her beer down, holding it with tight fingers. If Cas didn't want to do this, he shouldn't let Dean pressure him into it. "Cas," Dean put in for the silent angel. "His name is Cas." He leaned forward, a playful, coy smile on his face as he flirted with the stripper. "What's your name?"

"Chastity," she purred.

Alex snorted at the irony. "That's friggin' rich." Castiel shakily lifted his mug of beer and gulped it down fast. The hooker's boobs were close enough to Alex that she couldn't resist. She reached out and poked an index finger into one rudely. "How much did these things cost?" she asked in an ugly tone, and Chastity gaped, stepped back, a hand covering the breast that Alex had just poked.

"Excuse me?" She asked, offended, and Alex just smiled at her falsely.

"Hey, hey, whoa whoa whoa, don't pay attention to her," Dean said, sending Alex a meaningful scowl and then grinning at Chastity, trying to appease her. He gestured at Cas and wiggled his eyebrows. "He likes you, you like him, so—" he spread his hands out and sat back, the picture of self-content. "Dayenu!"

"No, I don—" Cas started.

Chastity was already tugging Cas up by the hand. "Come on, baby."

Cas looked back at Alex, full of alarm, and as a result, she began to feel the same way—freaked the hell out. Alex thought her tight grip on her mug of beer might shatter the glass and she suddenly stood up, drawing a questioning gaze from Dean and Chastity. She was flaming hot from embarrassment but she just looked at Cas, trying to back him up and stand up for him somehow. She struggled with words for a second. "You... you don't have to, Cas, if you don't want to," she squeaked out in the most mortifying tone she'd ever heard herself speak in.

Dean got up too, his chair scraping the floor loudly as he rolled his eyes. He smacked a bunch of bills into Cas's chest after giving Alex an impatient glance. "Hey, listen. Take this. If she asks for a credit card, say no. Now just stick to the basics, okay? Do not order off the menu. Go get her, tiger."
Cas took the money awkwardly, seeming very unsure about what was about to happen. Alex looked at him wordlessly, trying to let him know, silently, if he had said the word, she would have laid that skank out right then and there. But Dean stepped forward a little, blocking their view of each other. "Come on, Cas! Don't make me push you." Dean said, then did just that: physically pushed Cas backward a little bit. "I know you want to, now go! Make me proud!"

Chastity was pulling on Cas and without a word, Cas went along with it, allowed the blonde to lead him away by the hand toward the back of the club. Alex watched, slack-jawed and almost angry, especially when Chastity smiled back at Cas alluringly.

"Hey, what have I told you about being rude to strippers?" Dean asked, demanding her gaze.

Indignant, Alex whirled on him. "And what have I told you about hookers?!"

He was pleased with himself and it showed. "I forget. Heh." He took his seat again, glancing up at a nearby dancing girl.

"Moron," Alex muttered, basically seething.

"Ah, come on," he said, verbally swatting her away, taking a sip of his beer. "Lighten up. Even angels need to get some."

She wanted to hit him, honestly. "Shut your face," she retorted, and stared at the door where Cas and Chastity had gone through. She pictured herself striding through that door, ripping that bimbo off of Cas's half-naked body and throwing her across the room. What the hell! Get a grip, Alex. No one forced Cas to go in there. He went of his own free will. Still... clenching her jaw, Alex she shook her head at herself and in frustration she knocked a chair over, grabbed her beer, and went to the opposite end of the club, ignoring Dean and sliding into a quiet, dark corner booth. There she proceeded to stew over her beer while trying to decide if she should go in after Castiel or not.

It was literally ten seconds after she’d sat down that a crusty redneck trucker-looking guy in his forties sidled up to her. "Hey sweetheart. You here to watch the show? That's kinda hot."

Alex gave him a harsh look, not in the mood to deal with assholes. "Screw off."

Instead, he sat down there at the booth with her, grinning, looking her up and down appraisingly. "I mean, if you're looking for a good time, I uh, would love to get to know you."

Getting real agitated real quick, Alex refused to look at the guy, just stared away pointedly, trying to control herself. "Listen, asshole. I'm not interested. Not now, not ever, so get lost."

He scooted a little closer, trying to wrap his arm around her. "Come on baby, just lemme buy you a drink, that's all."

She shot him a dangerous glare, shoved his arm away hard. Do not fuck with me. The guy seemed to be amused by her agitation, like he found it cute. She raised a single eyebrow, gave him one last warning, her expression deadly. Below the table, her hand was sliding down to the back of her jeans, where her knife was tucked into its sheath. Her fingers wrapped around the handle. "I said, leave—me—alone," she growled.

"Don't be like that, sweetie—" the guy said, but never finished his sentence. In a blur of motion, Alex stabbed her hunting knife down into the table, right between his fingers with a sickening thwack, missing cutting off his middle finger by millimeters.

The guy yanked his hand away, flailed backwards, stared at her in total shock. She was still gripping the hilt of the knife and leaned forward a little bit, into his face. Her voice dripped with sarcasm. "Unless you wanna lose a limb, baby… back… off." She yanked the knife out of the table even as he stumbled out of the booth, shaken and terrified.

"You crazy bitch!" he said, even as he practically ran the opposite direction.

She chuckled at that, put her knife back in its sheath. "Like I haven't gotten that one before," she commented wryly to herself, and then returned to her beer… and at that point noticed Dean had disappeared. Where the hell was he? Probably in the back… ugh. Even if that asshole trucker guy had been barking up the wrong tree, at least he'd distracted her for a second from all the Castiel crap. Alex tried not to think of what that hooker chick would be doing to Cas right about now—or oh my god, what would he be doing? She stared at the mug of beer in front of her, her stomach churning. This sucked. Why did she come along for this? What the hell was she thinking? That Cas was gonna change his mind and then want to hang out with her or something? Oh my god you're pathetic. Alex couldn't stand it anymore and she stood up, threw her beer glass at the wall. It shattered and she stalked out of the club under the questioning, startled gazes of patrons and strippers alike. She didn't take much notice.

She was too busy imagining Cas and that stupid, plastic woman all over him, pulling off his clothes. At first, she pictured him terrified, laying there, afraid for his life, cowering, wide-eyed as that bitch crawled onto him like a bug. That was a bad mental image, but the next one was far worse, and on the opposite end of the spectrum. She pictured Castiel hungrily sweeping Chastity up into his strong arms, throwing her down on the bed roughly, ripping her lingerie off, taking her passionately like the characters in the romance novels she read sometimes. Both images made her want to rip someone's eyes out.

She ran a hand through her hair in agitation, reaching the end of the building where the alleyway started.

"Come on baby, let's get you more comfortable," Chastity said, walking Cas forward, her chest pressing into his as she tugged on his tie. They were in a darkened room that was small and had a large bed in it and she wouldn't stop touching him, leaning into him.

"I, I assure you, I'm perfectly comfortable—" he lied, trying not to be rude, holding his hands out, trying to keep her at a respectable distance from himself. She smelled very strangely and was looking at him in a way he found disturbing—he suddenly found the backs of his lower legs had hit against the bed and he fell slightly to sit down there. Chastity was already climbing on top of him, her legs straddling his. She was making soft little mmm sounds that perplexed Castiel completely, made him feel afraid, alarmed. Her hands ran up his chest through his shirt and pushed at his coat a little. She was trying to undress him. He tensed, trying to stop her from what she was doing. "Y-you're making me less comfortable," he said, and then she nipped at his neck with her mouth—was she trying to taste him? Cas felt frozen in the worst way possible and unsure of how to escape. Chastity ran her tongue along the place just below his ear even as she stuck her hands down low between their bodies and began to undo his belt. Castiel was no longer able to be polite as his mind clanged with the word no over and over. You don't have to Cas, if you don't want to. Alex's words, words that he decided to get behind. He grabbed Chastity by the upper arms and pushed her away.

She reacted immediately. "What the hell is your problem?" she asked, face conveying her aghast, angry emotions. "Don't push me. Straight up stuff only. No roughhousing." As quickly as her anger had shown itself, her face suddenly transformed into the coy, flirtatious mask it had been before and she approached him again, tried to touch him—but Castiel held her back, looked at her in the eyes, deeply.
Usually he would ask permission before reading a mind, but today, he didn't. He was desperate for some way to get her mind off of touching him. He didn't like her touching him. "I see pain in you, Chastity," he said, seeing everything about her in a small second. "It's not your fault that your father Gene ran away. It was because he hated his job at the post office. You work this job because you have no self esteem and want to be loved as you never were as a child."

Chastity's expression went cold with shock, then dark with anger. And then without warning she drew back and slapped him in the face, began screaming insults and telling him to get out... then thankfully began to push him away.

Alex paced the alleyway with short patience. She heard footsteps right behind her and turned to see the guy who had bothered her in the club and another guy. Oh shit—she recognized that angry, vengeful glint in his eye, and turned to make a run for it, but he was already too close and caught her by the wrist, then shoved her up against the wall in the dark alleyway. "You crazy, dumb bitch! No one tries to cut my fingers off!"

He had yellow teeth and red ruddy skin from drinking too much. He was slow and stupid and drunk as hell at the current moment. "Oh, is that right, Billy Joe Bob?" Alex asked coolly. He seemed momentarily confused by her calm, nonchalant demeanor. And then, he was doubled over after she violently kneed him in the balls and smashed him in the top of the head with her elbow. She broke out of his grip only to get grabbed by the second guy, who bear-hugged her, pretty much disabling her completely. He wasn't as drunk or stupid as his friend. "Hey!" she shouted, wiggling hard and trying to get free. The first guy had already recovered from her assault, and helped his buddy slam her back against the wall. Both of the men held her there against the wall, not just her arms, but her legs. Pissed more than anything else, Alex thrashed violently, seething.

"Hey!" came a thundering shout—Dean?

Then a low, threatening voice—Castiel. "Get away from her. Now."

Her attackers turned to look, and Alex could see her brother, murderous, and Castiel, devastating. They were coming closer, and fast.

"Why, what are you gonna do?" The first guy sneered, but even before he finished asking, Cas had reached out and practically ripped him off of Alex; threw him across the alley with brutal force where he smashed into some dumpsters and ceased to move. Dean had simultaneously grabbed the second guy and bashed him in the face with his fist, knocking him out cold in one violent, enraged punch. In all, the boys made quick work of the guys in all of five seconds, if that.

Alex couldn't help it. She was impressed at the show of strength and looked at Cas in a mixture of appreciation and then... dread. She took in his loose tie, the trench coat all askew, his partially unbuckled belt. She swallowed, suddenly feeling a little queasy. Had he...? Did they...? He was oblivious to her wandering, questioning gaze and had grasped her just above the elbow, looking at her sternly, leaning in, his eyes demanding a quick answer to his questions. His touch sort of startled her. "Are you injured?" he asked, his voice low and deadly. "Did these men hurt you?"

His closeness also caught her off guard. "N-no, I—"

Dean pushed Cas aside, looking at Alex with a horrified, savage expression. "You okay? What were they—"

Crowded, Alex held her hands up, palms facing them, as if to tell them to back up. 'I'm fine. I'm fine. I totally had that." She straightened a little, gave Cas a questioning look. "So um that... didn't
He remained silent, obviously not understanding the implication. Dean chuckled ruefully. "Yeah, so, Cas scared off the girl with all his angel ESP stuff. Messed the whole thing up."

"Oh," Alex said, trying not to sound as relieved as she felt. "So no…" she shook her head, trying to appear like she was searching for the words, trying to appear like it didn't matter either way. "No, consummation, or..."

No. No consummation. Cas's expression confirmed that he was still a virgin.

"Wow, come to the current century, Chaucer," Dean commented and Alex rolled her eyes at her brother, then brushed past them and went over to the unconscious form of one of the guys who had attacked her. She yanked him over onto his stomach, sticking her hand in his back pocket as she told herself to get a grip. Cas's sex life wasn't any of her business, anyway.

Cas looked stunned. "...What are you doing?" he asked her.

Pulling out the guy's wallet, she wagged it at him. "Hey, the guy needs to make the pain in my ass he's been worth my while." She pulled out several hundred dollar bills, impressed with the find. "Not bad."

Dean was going through the other guy's wallet and Castiel came to Alex, who was counting bills. He fixed her with a stern expression. "They had foul intentions for you," he insisted. "You shouldn't be so nonchalant."

" Relax, Cas. Everything's fine," she said, avoiding looking at him in the current moment.

His intensity didn't waver. "No, I shouldn't have allowed Dean to distract me." His expression changed, slightly, and she didn't know how to interpret it. "My duty is to protect you." It was said so vehemently, and combined with his gaze, Alex was temporarily stilled.

Geez. His eyes made it hard for her to find words. Flustered, she got outwardly pissy. "...I'm fine," she told him, then had to brush past him to avoid looking at him. She hardened her voice. "I protect myself, okay?"

"Like you just did a minute ago?" He challenged.

Alex stopped and turned, head tilted to the side. She was pleasantly surprised. "Cas… was that... sarcasm?" She cracked a grin at him. "Very good, young grasshopper."

He just frowned. "I'm not an insect."

God, Cas. He didn't know how cute he was. "I know you're not," she said, her tone decidedly fond. She smiled again, a crooked little quirked smile, and on a whim she reached out and fixed his messed up tie, carefully sliding the knot back up to its rightful place. Her thumb just barely brushed against the skin of his neck, and somehow, that simple, mistaken touch against the warmth of his skin made her smile fade. And then she made the mistake of looking him in the eyes again. His gaze was locked on hers, and it suddenly felt incredibly awkward, intense. Why did he look like he was asking her a question with that smoldering gaze of his? And what was the question? Alex's expression fell completely and she pulled away from him, unsure of how to react... and if she was reading into things wrong.

"Dude, this guy has a bunch of church business cards in his wallet," Dean said, clearly amused at his findings in the guy's wallet, oblivious to Cas and Alex. Alex, a little shaken—not by the attack, but by Cas—turned away silently and began leading the way to the Impala, her hands in her pockets, leaving the guys to lag behind a little bit.

"Man, I mean, I still think we should try again," Dean said to Cas, pocketing the cash he'd taken from the guy's wallet. "There's more clubs around here, and—"

"No, Dean," Castiel said almost wearily as they began walking to the car.

"Aw don't be like that, Cas," Dean said. "I still don't get why you didn't make it with Chastity. I mean, dude, she was beautiful!"

"No, she was not," Cas corrected.

"Oh, come on, you got nothing to judge her against," Dean scoffed as they came to a stop at the car. Alex was already in the back seat, shutting the door behind herself. Dean looked at Cas over the top of the car. "I mean, how many women have you even seen in your lifetime, like five?"

Cas's head tilted to the side just slightly, as if what Dean had suggested was ridiculous. "All of them."

Dean looked a little put off. "Well. Uh. Touché. Well, maybe your thing isn't blondes, huh?" He chuckled. "Brunettes!" Cas's gaze faltered, his eyes sliding over to Alex. Dean, too busy laughing as he got into the car, didn't notice.

---

Later That Night

Alex sat out on the crappy, dilapidated porch of the abandoned house, not really doing anything, just staring, just awake. A few empty beer bottles were beside her, a twelve-pack she was working on. She was definitely a little buzzed. She heard the front door open behind her and she listened. Heavy footsteps were coming close to her. Dean came down one step below her, his familiar shape and size sort of comforting and annoying at the same time. "Whatcha doing?"

"Nothing," she replied honestly, carelessly, glancing sidelong at him tersely.

He looked at her a couple beats. "You should get some rest. Big day tomorrow."

"Not tired yet," she said with a weak shrug.

There was a short silent. "You're still mad about your smokes," he assumed. Alex made a face. Not really, but if he thought that, fine. He sat beside her, let out a 'whoosh' of air, cleared his throat. "Right. So... uh, awkward subject." Alex's head turned slowly, her expression quickly becoming suspicious. Dean looked highly uncomfortable. This couldn't be good. He searched the sky, not looking at her. "Cas told me you're a... you know... a... uh... virgin."

Alex's face went completely blank, her mouth dropping open from the punch of shock to her stomach. "What? How did he—" she stopped, seeming to remember, oh yeah, he always friggin' knows everything. She rubbed the back of her neck self consciously. She didn't want to have this conversation. She tried to play it cool, tried to laugh lightly. "Yeah, fine, maybe I am." She shrugged, trying not to sound the way she felt. "Whatever. Don't talk to me about that."

Dean, more awkward than she had ever seen him, clasped his hands together as he leaned over his knees. "Alex, uh... abstinence is—"

"Oh my god!" She looked at him in horror—he was not about to have the talk with her. "Stop, are you serious? Abstinence? You think I'm choosing to be the way I am? Uh, no. It just... turned out that way." She let out a laugh of dry, humorless air. "Yeah, okay? I'm twenty-six. And I'm..." she couldn't say the word. She gave him a tight little expression. "Happy?" she asked cynically.

He cleared his throat. "Well yeah, honestly, I kinda am."

She looked at him sharply, immediately offended. "What? Why?"

Dean looked very convicted and sure. "Because you don't need to let any guy touch you. Ever," he replied, as if that settled it.

What kind of moron was he? Was he really that unrealistic and even cruel? "Ever?" she asked, sinking inside and feeling worthless. "Wow Dean," she commented, staring off into the night and feeling more miserable than she had in awhile. "That's so fucking hypocritical."

He just shrugged, kind of accepting the accusation. "I mean, I just... maybe not ever, okay? But I.... I can't see you hurt, Al. And most guys out there... trust me, all they want is sex. Not love, not a relationship. They just want a good time. I can't see you used like that."

She looked at him sidelong. She knew he meant well. He was just an idiot in the way he went about it. "Well, I wouldn't worry yourself, Dean," she said sarcastically. "I don't see much chance of me ever being even in a relationship, let alone..." she trailed off, embarrassed at this entire situation. They had never really talked about anything like this before. "I mean, I have no experience, nothing to offer. I don't even know how to put on makeup—or how to talk to a guy without offending him or making him feel stupid—I don't know how to be the kind of girl any guy, ever, would even like. I'm a fucking disaster." Beside her, Dean looked kind of taken aback, like he hadn't thought of all the things that Alex carried silently. She wasn't done yet though. She stared at the dark brown beer bottle in her hand. "I mean, come on. What man would want all of this baggage I have? All my problems and weirdness? I'm not normal. I've never been normal. I'm a freak. A total freak."

"T-that's not true," Dean protested feebly, even though they both knew it was.

Alex just laughed at him, took a swig of beer. "It is," she said, cold to herself in that moment. "You know it is. Do you know, I've had one kiss my whole life? And it was a damn prank."

"What?" he asked softly.

She was smirking, as if it were a joke to her. "Yeah. I never told anyone. Too embarrassed I guess." She picked at a splinter next to herself.

"Tell me," he commanded. "Now."

Her smile faded. A long silence passed, and she wasn't sure she would tell him at all. But she ended up taking in a deep breath and barreling forward. "Fifth grade. Kevin Dukes. Passed me notes in class... said he liked me. That I was pretty. I couldn't believe it." She looked down, breathed out heavily. "And, turns out I shouldn't have." Dean was listening in something like dread-filled anticipation. "He took me to a classroom that I thought was empty, and kissed me... then a bunch of the kids came out from where they were hiding and watching, and then they all started to laugh at me and say... the most horrible things." She went quiet. Those memories still hurt as bad as they had the day they happened. How could kids be so mean? She still remembered one girl jeering at her. 'No one would wanna kiss the girl who can't talk! You're such a waste of space!' The laughter still sounded so crystal clear in her mind. Alex was ashamed all over again.
"Son of a bitch," Dean growled, visibly pissed. "You shoulda told me. I woulda kicked his ass all the way to China—all their asses."

Alex looked at him directly. "Why do you think I dropped out of school, Dean? Stuff like that happened, too many times. There was nothing for me there. At any school. I had to protect myself from it."

He knew that of course. He'd seen her and Sam get picked on and isolated from groups of kids a lot of times. "But you had me to do keep you safe," he protested softly, hollowly.

"Maybe," she said. "But some things, I just was too afraid to let anyone know about." She scoffed. "Kevin Dukes—some skinny little ten year old with a bowl cut—was basically the only guy who ever really showed an interest in me. And that interest wasn't real. Kind of gets under your skin. Makes you feel..." she trailed off, her expression pained. She couldn't seem to say anything else. Dean scooted a little closer, put a caring hand on her shoulder.

"Hey, no, don't do that," he said, voice filled with brotherly care and affection—the kind he'd always used when she'd been upset as a child. She leaned into him a little and felt more and more like crying. But she wouldn't let herself. Dean was quiet and thoughtful, more sensitive to her than before. "You know, I want you to find a guy someday who will... will take care of you and treat you good and marry you," he said, and it sounded like he was having to pull this stuff out of his ass. "I can see you, a couple scrappy kids, some kinda lumberjack, outdoorsy guy maybe..." he said, trying to sound optimistic. It was sweet—he was trying to cheer her up, say things that he thought all women wanted, but Alex just felt aversion. None of that sounded quite right to her.

She shook her head, correcting him. "Yeah, I don't think I want that stuff though... I mean I'm not sure what I want but... not that stuff." She tried to picture herself being a wife or a mom. It was totally foreign and not fitting. She was a hunter, and always would be. That's what was right—and if she had to do it alone, okay. Honestly, she'd decided awhile ago that she was pretty much going to be alone forever anyway.

Dean was looking at her intently. "Come on, you don't ever, you know, wanna... meet a guy... see where it goes...?" He was trying, but it was making her feel worse, because she was twenty-six and hadn't ever 'met a guy' so why would she now?

She chuckled humorlessly, because otherwise she'd start to cry. "Dean... I think the possibility of God being real is more plausible than me ever finding a guy who would wanna be with me."

"But even if—" he started.

"Dean," she said loudly as she gave him an open, pleading look. "I don't want to talk about this with you. Not now. Probably not ever again, okay? Please. It hurts too much, damn." He withdrew a little, as if stung, but she was too humiliated to care. "Can you just... just leave me alone? You don't have to worry about me being a virgin or not. I'm pretty sure I'm always gonna be one, so congrats." She gave him a thin, sarcastic smile to cover up her true feelings.

Dean considered her sadly for a couple seconds then nodded and got up, looking remorseful. She knew he was thinking he never should have brought up the topic. He almost seemed embarrassed. That didn't happen a lot. "Yeah," he said, nodding shallowly. "Yeah. I'll uh, be inside if you need anything."

"Yeah, great," she mumbled, and didn't watch as he retreated. The door shut behind him, and she was alone again. She took in a deep breath, shut her eyes, and then looked back up at the stars. And then frowned when she heard the door opening again. Aggravated, she rolled her eyes. "Dean, come on, I said—" she looked up and went silent. It was Cas. A little surprised, she blinked a couple times. "Oh. It's you." He made her immediately a little nervous.

"Hello Alex." He came down to her stair and sat down—and she could see that he remembered his lesson from the last time he sat next to her. He leaned his arms over his legs, casually, just like she'd shown him.

That brought a little smile to her face, and she reached for the twelve-pack near her foot, forgetting her angst momentarily. "Here. Have a beer." She cracked it open on the edge of the porch for him and handed it over, noticing his fingers and the way they felt when he reached out and took the beer, surprising her.

He sampled it slowly. It was a darker beer than the one he'd had at the strip club. He took a huge gulp and a frown creased his face as he stared at the beer sourly. "This tastes disgusting."

She looked at him sidelong. He really was so endearing in the weirdest, sweetest way. "You get used to it."

His expression got thoughtful, stone-like, and he set the bottle down. There was a long, long silence. So long that Alex gave up on a conversation and thought while staring off into the stars. And then Cas's voice cut through her thoughts, startling her.

"I should have been there to protect you tonight."

His concern was nice, but Alex heaved a rueful sigh. She should have known he wouldn't let that go. "Cas. I told you already. I've got my own back," she said, gesturing errantly with her beer bottle. "Don't guilt trip yourself. So I get beat up sometimes, no big deal."

He looked at her sharply at that comment, but said nothing else for a long moment. He grew pensive and stared broodingly out into the dark, overgrown yard for a long moment. Then suddenly he spoke again. "Count your scars."

Alex felt her eyebrows pressing in together as she looked at him for explanation. "What?"

His eyes came to hers, and even in the dark, the hue was brilliant and startling. He looked pained. "That's how many times you needed me and I wasn't there."

The words were a shock and a thrill all at once and felt distinctly truthful and almost romantic which no way they could be romantic. Right? Alex gave him an odd look, a little lost for words, a little more than unsure how to respond. She felt nervous again. She settled on deflection, decided to imply he was being flowery and cheesy while she laughed it off. "Have uh, have you been reading romance novels, Cas?"

He got one of those tiny, knowing smiles on his face as his eyes traveled her face. "Have you?"

That question, combined with the look on his face, almost made her jaw drop. Busted. "Uh…" what was the point of lying? She grimaced, made a face, flustered at his playfulness. When had he picked that up? "Yes…?" She smiled sheepishly but he was smiling, too. Just the corners of his mouth upturned, the edges of his eyes wrinkled a little. And feeling like they shared an inside joke or something, Alex playfully nudged her shoulder against his before she could think it through. Then she regretted it and cursed herself for being tipsy. She let out a long sigh as her smile faded slowly into a confused expression. She didn't know how to act around him sometimes.

Cas didn't seem bothered. He peered at her a moment, concern covering his face after a moment of softness had rendered his face younger. "To be honest, Alex, I regret not acting sooner," Castiel said quietly, still thinking about his statement about her scars, apparently. The grave tone of his voice transfixed her. "Letting Sam hit you. Letting harm befall you at all. I hated seeing that. I didn't want it to happen." He sounded so very vexed about it.

Cautious, Alex let her eyes search his for a moment, her somber expression mirroring his. "I'm okay, Cas." And she was. She broke the grim atmosphere with a playful expression. "Not to brag, but… I'm a pretty tough bird. I can take the hits."

Without missing a beat, he replied. "You shouldn't have to."

Her playful expression fell. Awkward again—everything was awkward again. "Yeah, well," she replied uncertainly, hesitantly. He had this way of always knocking her off her feet and it mystified her. Anyone else saying she shouldn't have to go through pain or be hurt and she would have been offended, thought they were saying it because they saw her as weak—that they felt sorry for her. But Cas… when he said stuff like that, it didn't seem that way. How did it seem? She couldn't quite put her finger on it. So without knowing how to reply to him, she moved on, changed the subject. "So," she cleared her throat, leaned heavily over her wide knees, fixed him with an appraising look. "You okay after today? The whole… Chastity thing?" She tried not to sound overly curious.

"Yes." He leaned a little over his knees too, looking at the way she did it. "It was a very... strange experience."

Well that was cryptic. Alex wet her lips, took another swig of beer to just fill in the silence, trying to decide if she should ask what she wanted to know or not. Apparently there'd been no sex but… what had there been? Feigning great casual half-interest, she cleared her throat, pretended to be studying and squinting at a distant star. "So did she… did she, uh, kiss you?"

"Yes," he replied. Alex's eyes widened a little and darted to him, even as he placed a finger against his neck. "Here." She couldn't stifle her feeling of relief to hear that. Was that messed up of her to be relieved?

"Oh," she said softly. "So not a real kiss."

Her words caused him great intrigue and he tilted his head to the side. "And what makes a kiss real?"

A little unprepared to answer that, Alex fumbled. She was imagining herself kissing him without even meaning to. "Wha—well, I guess… on the mouth," she said, flustered, still seeing them kissing in her mind's eye. She straightened, tried to explain her entire line of questioning, tried to get herself out of the hole she was digging. Tried to stop envisioning what she was envisioning. "I was just um, you know, asking because I thought it would be kind of sad if an angel had his first kiss with a... a hooker." Honestly, the thought of him kissing any woman seemed offensive and wrong to her.

"The term 'irony' comes to mind," Castiel commented, surprising her yet again. Sometimes he seemed so shrewd to her, so knowing. Other times he was as clueless as they came. He was fascinating… and impossible for her to figure out.

"Yeah. Irony," she agreed, sending another little smile his way before she took another sip of her beer and then leaned her elbows on the stair one level up. "So, Cas," she said conversationally, teasingly. She had to be cool and act outwardly chill, like she wasn't sort of crushing on him and finding herself liking him secretly. "You're still a virgin. Dean's heartbroken."

"I'm not heartbroken," he replied, then seemed to consider. "Then again, I have no heart."
Metaphorically speaking, of course."

That comment caused her pause. "I'm not so sure," she said, and he met her gaze, looking oddly conflicted. She sat up, mimicking him, leaning over her knees again, looking at no particular point in the distance in front of her. The seriousness of what she was thinking about took away her more girlish feelings. "What you did for us… disobeying Heaven and risking everything…. dying?" She paused, affected, remembering. She shook her head. "I don't think you can say you're heartless." She looked back at him and slowly sat up straight underneath his gaze. There it was again. That intense, consuming feeling brought on by the way he looked at her. In the dark, his eyes seemed so full of so much, and it was suddenly too much. Her emotions suddenly surged at strengths she didn't know possible and she fought to get her question out. "Are… are you really gonna die tomorrow, Cas?" she asked softly, eyes abruptly brimming with tears.

He saw her tears and grew greatly concerned. "Why are you crying?" he asked softly, seeming stunned at the sight of her face contorting. She said nothing, just let her expression silently plead with him: don't make me say. Part of her was compelled to suddenly take hold of him and kiss him and let that be her answer. But she was too afraid and didn't know how to just kiss a man out of the blue—it was too scary and too risky, the chance of being rejected. All she knew was that Castiel dying was something she did not want. A tear rolled down her cheek and she saw how his eyes followed the trail of grief as it streaked her cheek. Alex was humiliated to let him see her like that and suddenly became panicked when she felt even more tears coming, more emotion rising. With startling abruptness she stood up and fled into the house, trying to escape everything he was making her feel, trying to escape the hold of his soulful gaze.

The intensity of her confusing feelings was terrifying to her.
"And I'm finding in myself the things that chase me to the corners: in the dark, far from home, the sins of longing for you."
- The Crash Years

Two Days Later

"Dean. We have got to stop driving," Alex was cramped, uncomfortable, and going crazy in the passenger side seat. None of all that was unusual per se, but after sixteen friggin' hours of it with only three or four short stops, she really was beginning to feel like she might murder someone if they didn't pull over soon.

Dean was ignoring her at the moment, just like he had been all day. She waited a few more seconds and then tried again, her tone bordering on pushy. "You've been driving for a million hours straight and you haven't slept in like three days. Can we please stop?"

He acknowledged her with a half eye roll, said nothing. She could tell he was tired as hell, but trying to fight it. He had a lot on his mind—guess you would after trapping an archangel and nearly being fried by his wacky lightning powers. Alex thought back to Raphael's grand speech about God being dead, the angels who would bring the end of the world and "paradise" with it. Raphael had then suggested that they should consider that Lucifer was the one who had raised Castiel—something that had startled all three of them. That suggestion was still eating at Alex, honestly. And she could tell it had shaken Cas, too. After leaving Raphael trapped in a ring of holy fire, they'd gotten out of there, thankfully. Cas, clearly disappointed and troubled by the encounter, had disappeared shortly after without saying much of anything. But at least he'd survived the encounter. That was a definite plus.

"Dean," Alex prompted again.

A muscle jerked in his cheek. "What."

Getting annoyed now too, Alex huffed, stared at him. "What's your problem?"

"I'm tired and I've been driving all day!" He retorted.

Alex gave him a wan look. "How many times did I offer to drive?" She reminded him flatly. He just ignored her and huffed loudly. Alex took a deep, tired breath and watched the buildings pass by outside. "So," she said, trying to be tolerant. "Do you think God's dead like Raphael claimed?"

He chuckled sardonically. "Alex, I don't even think God is real."

"Then where did angels come from?" She asked.

"Planet Voltron," Dean wisecracked.

Alex patiently refrained from jabbing him in the side and thought a minute instead. "Maybe God got lost out there," she suggested. "It's a pretty big universe. Or maybe someone trapped him somewhere to get him out of the picture."

He gave her an unamused expression. "Or maybe it's all friggin' nuts and you're starting to sound looney tunes."
"Love you too," she retorted, giving him a playful look despite his grumpy antics.

She pulled out her phone to check it for messages—usually she forgot that she even had a phone unless it rang, but after getting a text earlier that day from Cas, she was curious if she'd hear from him again. He had written Does this message appear on your device? After laughing about how awkwardly he had phrased himself, she had texted back, No. And about two minutes later, he had texted back, What about this one? And she and Dean had giggled uncontrollably, Dean commenting that he forgot how much fun gullible people were.

Cas kept unintentionally throwing these funny, ironic, surprising moments into their lives that somehow made the horrible dark mess a little brighter. She almost didn't want to admit that to herself, because it was almost like they had replaced Sam with Cas there for those two days when they were tracking Raphael, anyway. And that made her feel guilty. She thought about being with him on that porch under the stars and how scared she'd been at the thought of him dying. Her face hardened a little in deep thought as she stared out the window but no longer saw what passed outside.

After about twenty more minutes, Dean finally gave in and pulled them over onto the side of the street in front of a motel in the heart of Kansas City—Alex left all of her stuff in the Impala, Dean grabbed his backpack, and then they headed inside, but not before being accosted by some religious pamphlet-passing guy asking them if they had thought about God's plan for them. If only that guy knew.

Even as they got into the room, Dean's phone rang. "Oh look, angel calling," he said sarcastically and answered.

Alex half listened, catching snippets of Dean's side of the conversation as she crammed the contents of a pack of crackers into her mouth for her dinner… at one point, Dean covered the mouthpiece and, amused, told her, "He says the voice told him he's almost out of minutes." Oh, Cas. She finished the crackers with a grin and tossed the wrapper as Dean continued walking the length of room, still on the phone. "Yeah, uh, in Kansas City. Century Hotel, room one-thirteen. No, whoa, whoa, not now. There's stuff we gotta do. Like what? Like sleep! Just pop in first thing tomorrow morning." He hung up and tossed his phone onto one of the beds.

"What'd Cas want?" Alex asked, looking at Dean sidelong.

Dean was taking his jacket off. "He says the Colt is still around… the demons have it… and he thinks that's what can kill the devil. We just gotta track it down."

"I thought no one could kill that guy," Alex said with a frown. Cas had said as much.

Dean shrugged. "Well if we can, I'm two thumbs way, way up. Colt, here we come."

Alex scratched her head, squinting. "Okay yeah but we track it down how?"

Dean groaned, scrubbing his face with his hands, clearly over her questions. "Lemme think about that in the morning." He all but crashed into one of the beds, hugged a pillow into his face, and ceased to move. Poor guy was exhausted.

Alex thought a moment then pulled out her phone, composing a new text message, addressing it to Sam. She glanced Dean's way, feeling like she was doing something wrong. She returned her attention to the phone keyboard, poised to type—and then, nothing. She didn't know what to say. How are you? No, that wasn't enough. Just took Cas to a brothel few days ago and almost chopped a guy's hand off, how are things your way? Or, maybe, Dean is being an asshole (what else is new) and oh btw God is dead. How's the whole demon blood problem? She sucked in her cheeks thoughtfully, then put the phone down softly without sending anything.

She had no idea how to reach out to Sam, and she had this growing, ugly suspicion that he didn't want to be reached out to at all. It wouldn't be the first time. She didn't really want to believe that Sam was rejecting the family, but it had been true before, hadn't it? She pulled her jacket off and glanced at Dean—he was already snoring. She figured some sleep herself wouldn't hurt, but before she crawled into bed, she took off Dean's smelly shoes for him, grimacing against the familiar, sweaty odor. Gross. She tossed the shoes onto the floor then went to her own bed, switched off the light, fell asleep pretty fast. She dreamed that she heard Dean talking on the phone, but couldn't remember what about, or who to.

Alex opened her eyes to the morning light and immediately knew something was different—wrong. Below her, the bed was hard and poking into her in odd places—and when she looked, she realized why. She was laying on bed springs. What the—she looked around and became even more alarmed—the room was the same room, but looked like it had been through hell and back. There was ripped, disintegrating wallpaper, debris all over the floor, cobwebs in the corners, rusted, broken lamps on the cracked bedside tables. Freaking out, Alex jumped up, shook Dean. "Dean! Wake up!" She whispered urgently, feeling as if she needed to be on guard, like something horrible was about to happen. He was groggily blinking, then realizing what he was laying on, and he shot up. "Something's wrong," Alex said, looking around in confusion. "I mean like, wrong wrong."

Dean got up, looking as confused as she was. He went to the window, and she heard him murmur a soft "what the hell?" She joined him there and saw the street they had parked on last night—her mouth dropped open. As far as they could see, the entire city was in shambles and ruin, like there had been riots, fires, and all-out destruction. Wrecked, hollow, burned out cars, trash everywhere, graffiti all over everything, broken store windows. And not a person in sight.

"What the hell happened last night?" she asked, stunned. Did we sleep through a nuclear bomb or something?

"I don't know, but we're getting the hell outta here." Harrowed, Dean grabbed her arm, pushed her toward the door. When they got to the ground level, realized the Impala was gone, Dean's quiet panic went up two notches—Alex could tell by the way his jaw clenched and his nostrils flared that he was more freaked out than he was pissed. And that, in turn, freaked her out. The car being gone meant that they only had the things on them they'd taken with them into the motel room—which was only Dean's bag, as Alex had left hers in the car. So, no weapons, no car—and no clue what was going on.

Dean wandered down the street tensely, looking at everything in shocked silence. "We shouldn't be in the street," Alex whispered, trying to walk quietly as she trailed close behind. Her boots kept crunching on broken glass.

Dean turned suddenly, going stock still. "Did you hear that?" he cautiously headed down a wide alley way, and Alex, looking behind and around, followed. A small, skinny little girl was huddled over some broken glass on the ground. Her hair was matted, her skin was filthy. Dean approached her. "Hey, kid—are you okay?"

Alex looked at the little girl, then her eyes went up to the graffiti leering at them from the end of the alleyway. She froze, her heart seeming to stop. Spray painted in blood-red letters: CROATOAN.

Alex looked back at the little girl, at Dean leaning down to touch her shoulder—and made a horrible realization. "Dean, no!" she warned in a shout, yanking him aside even as the girl looked up and lunged forward, a piece of jagged glass in her hand. Dean and Alex jumped backward in tandem, barely missing being cut. The slash had been so violent that the kid almost pitched herself off her feet—and taking the only chance he might get, Dean kicked the kid in the face. She fell over, going still. Dean was breathing heavy, mostly from surprise and adrenaline.

They glanced at each other. "That was just wrong," he commented grimly. No time for sympathy, Alex nodded her head toward the ominous graffiti, and he saw it then muttered, "aw crap."

Just then a bunch of disheveled, agitated adults, maybe twenty of them, rounded the corner—Alex's blood chilled—Croatoans. Dean grabbed onto Alex, already backing up. "This is the part where we run!" he yelled, and run they did, ran for their very lives, not even sure where they were going. They rounded corner after corner, trying to lose the rapidly gaining Croatoans in the destroyed city streets. And suddenly, they rounded another corner, and ran right into a high, chain link fence that shuddered on impact. Dean and Alex whirled, realizing they were cornered, weaponless, and probably as good as dead.

And then without any warning, the sound of semi-automatic gunfire rang out, and several of the Croatoans in front of them jerked and dropped as bullets pelted the crowd. Dean and Alex grabbed at each other and fell to the ground for cover, half-crawling half-scrambling toward another nearby alley way. Dean pushed Alex ahead of himself. "Shit!" Dean swore, panting as they narrowly dodged several bullets and found cover in the narrow, stinking alley.

Alex was shaking and panting, pressed up against the wall beside her brother. "What the hell?!" she asked in a gaunt, breathless whisper over the sound of continuing gunfire as she gulped air down. "Kansas City got infected and destroyed overnight by the Croatoan virus?!

"Not possible," Dean said, shaking his head in a sort of stunned way. "N-no way." But he didn't sound so sure. The sound of gunfire died out.

Dean craned his neck, peering in the direction from where they had just come. Alex recognized the look on his face—he was trying to figure out what to do.

After a couple seconds, he looked back at her. "We'll wait until dark and hop the fence. Stay sharp. You got your knife?"

She gave him a look—duh.

"I don't get it," Dean said, holding his phone up in the air. "No service. The hell is going on?"

Alex fiddled with the car's radio, but there was only static on every channel. They were driving down an entirely still highway in the dark of night. Every now and then they passed wrecks, abandoned cars, or fires, but they saw no people. It was eerie and disconcerting. After they had found a way out of the city, they had seen a sign posted on the outside of the fence that said the city was a "Croatoan Hot Zone." The sign had been dated August, 2014—a date that was years into the future. So, there was that. Alex glanced at Dean whose expression was rigid as he drove.

"You really think Bobby will he able to help us?" Alex asked.

"Well who the hell else could?" Dean retorted.

"He might not even live in the same place in 2014," Alex pointed out. She hoped she was wrong.

"Or he could be dead," Dean said bluntly. Alex looked at him in surprise. She hadn't even considered that. And now she was. Her stomach twisted sickly.

"Croatoan pandemic reaches Australia." The Winchesters both jumped at the sound of a new voice behind them, turning fast to see Zachariah sitting in the back seat reading a newspaper leisurely. And suddenly, this entire thing made perfect sense.

"I thought I smelled your stink on this Back to the Future crap," Dean growled.

"President Palin defends bombing of Houston," Zachariah continued, casually reading from the paper, then looked up, smiled at Alex. "Certainly a buyer's market in real estate. Let's see what's happening in sports. Oh… that's right—no more sports. Congress revoked the right to group assembly. What's left of Congress, that is. Hardly a quorum, if you ask me."

Dean's knuckles were white on the steering wheel. "You are not funny, man, so stop trying."

"How'd you find us?" Alex demanded.

Zachariah smiled, speaking in a pleasant conversational tone. "Afraid we had to tap some unorthodox resources of late—human informants. We've been making inspirational visits to the fringier Christian groups. They've been given your image, told to keep an eye out."

"The Bible guy outside the motel—" Dean surmised. '"He, what, dropped a dime on us?"

"Onward, Christian soldiers."

"Very funny... now send us back, you jackass," Alex said acidly.

"Oh, you'll get back—all in good time," Zachariah said with a friendly smile. "We just want you two to... marinate a bit." His friendly persona seemed to fade a little, and he leaned forward, looked at Dean, talked with a soft, dangerous tone. "Three days, Dean. Three days to see where this course of action takes you..." he then looked at Alex meaningfully. "And your family."

"What's that supposed to mean?" Alex asked, not sure what the angel was getting at, but disliking his tone.

"It means that your brother's choices have consequences," Zachariah said. "This is what happens to the world and your little family pack if Dean continues to say 'no' to Michael. Have a little look-see." And then he disappeared, leaving two very frustrated Winchesters.

"Son of a bitch," Dean muttered. "Three days. Fine. Great. Friggin' great. I already don't like this."

"I sure as hell hope Bobby can give us some damn answers," Alex muttered grimly.

But trying to contact Bobby would prove to be a dead end. They found his house in a state of abandonment, his wheelchair rusted and bent and turned over in his living room. Bobby was nowhere to be found.

They did find one lead—a black and white photograph of some gun-toting guys they didn't recognize. Bobby was in the front of them, sitting in his wheelchair, holding a gun too. Beside him, there was a guy who looked kind of like Cas. They were all standing in front of a sign that read Camp Chitaqua.

After doing some fast old fashioned research with some local maps and directories, Dean and Alex located the camp. It was only a couple hours from Bobby's, and they raced there in breakneck speed. Dean was convinced they would find Bobby there. Alex wasn't so sure.
The camp was surrounded by chain link fence, and had armed patrols—Alex argued in whispers with Dean, said they should wait for daybreak instead of just sneaking in and risk being shot in the middle of the night—and he almost listened to her. Almost. But then he saw the Impala sitting off in some overgrown weeds, broken down and rusted out. He had muttered, "Oh, baby, no…" and climbed the fence. Alex had followed him, pissed but unwilling to be separated. She did hang back by the fence when he crept over to the car. It was out in the open, and she had a bad feeling about it.

"Dean—" she protested in a hissed whisper.

"Oh my God…" Dean said, touching his car frantically, not paying attention to his sister. "Baby, what'd they do to you?"

Alex saw the shadowy figure too late—wasn't able to warn Dean before he was hit over the head. Alex ran out of where she had been hiding, ready to deck this guy who had just knocked out her brother. "Hey!"

The man whirled, and when their eyes met, both of them froze momentarily in complete astonishment. "What—" Alex managed, staring into the assailant's face, her mouth hanging open. In that brief pause, his face changed from shock to aggression, and there was suddenly a fist flying towards her face and the whole work went dark.

"Look, man—I'm not a shapeshifter or demon or anything, okay?" she heard Dean say.

Alex groaned, grimaced, and opened her eyes, blinking against double vision. She was awkwardly sitting on some dark wood flooring, and her wrist seemed to be tethered to something when she weakly pulled at it. "Yeah, I know," Dean's voice replied, as if he were talking to himself.

Alex looked up, confused momentarily, and saw that she was handcuffed to a metal ladder and that Dean was beside her... and that Dean was also in front of her. She suddenly remembered everything—Dean getting knocked out, her rushing in, then seeing Dean was the one who had knocked Dean out. She was so, very confused. She looked back and forth at the two of them, stumped. "There's two of you," she muttered while wondering if she was high. "Why are there two of you?"

"That's what I'm trying to figure out… 'Alex,'" said the Dean who was holding them hostage. He said her name as if he didn't believe that was her. He looked back at her Dean. "I did the drill while you were out. Silver, salt, holy water—nothing, both of you. But you know what was funny, 'Dean'? Was that you had every hidden lock pick, box cutter, and switchblade that I carry. Now, you want to explain that? Oh, and the, uh, resemblance, while you're at it?"

"Zachariah." Dean said simply.

"Come again?" the other one asked.

Dean fixed the other Dean with a contemptuous look. "Zach plucked us from our beds in two thousand nine and threw us five years into the future."

This apparent future version of Dean's eyes narrowed. "Where is he? I want to talk to him."

"We don't know," Alex told him, catty.

"Oh, you don't know," he retorted doubtfully, matching her tone.
She raised her eyebrows slightly. "He's not exactly on our speed dial."

Her Dean was watching the exchange with an odd expression, like maybe he was realizing what it looked like to see himself argue with his sister. He then cut in, drawing the future version of himself's attention. "Look, I just want to get us back to our own friggin' year, okay?"

Future Dean stood up from where he had been leaning against a table. "Okay. If you're me, then tell me something only I would know."

Beside her, Dean went into deep thought, glanced at her, sighed defeat, then looked at the other version of himself. "Rhonda Hurley. We were, uh, nineteen." He glanced sidelong at Alex, cleared his throat. "She, uh, made us try on her panties. They were pink. And satiny." Alex was now looking at him with an open mouth. Dean awkwardly rubbed his neck, avoiding her gaze. "And, uh, we kind of liked it."

The other Dean looked impressed. "Touché."

Alex, however, was trying not to dissolve into laughter. "Wo-ow. Did you feel really pretty, Dean?"

Dean finally turned to her, looking very serious. "I swear you to secrecy, right here and now."

Alex leaned forward conspiratorially. "Fine... but just remember: I know your satiny little secret." That would make for excellent blackmail if she ever needed it. Dean looked deadpan and unamused.

The 2014 Dean just watched, a strange expression on his face. Something like sadness. He wiped it away. "So, what, Zach zapped you two up here to see how bad it gets?"

"I guess," Dean said. "Croatoan virus, right? That's their endgame?"

The other Dean nodded. He looked really tired. "It's efficient, it's incurable, and it's scary as hell. Turns people into monsters. Started hitting the major cities about two years ago. World really went in the crapper after that."

This was a lot of heavy information. Alex's Dean took a pause, then looked up again, suddenly thinking of something. "What about Sam?"

2014 Dean went still, got a little quiet. "Heavyweight showdown in Detroit. From what I understand... Sam didn't make it."

Alex literally felt her heart drop. No. How? "We weren't with him?" She asked in soft disbelief.

A long, somber pause. "No." 2014 Dean looked down, withering slightly under his sister's wounded, questioning gaze. "No, me and Sam, we haven't talked in—hell, five years."

"What, we never tried to find him?" Dean asked, shellshocked at the information.

There was a jaded, if guilty, scoff. "We had other people to worry about."

"Like who?" Alex asked, a little angrily—because, why would any version of Dean let the family fall apart like that? She suddenly realized she didn't know where future her was. "What about me?" She asked. "Where the hell am I in all this mess?"

Dean nodded, looked down, like he'd just been waiting to be asked that. "Not here."
"Okay... so where am I?" Alex asked, getting fed up.

Dean stood up, took a couple steps toward the door, looked back at them with a strange expression, and his jaw clenched, unclenched. "Alex Winchester... is dead and gone."

"What?" She asked, to which Dean just scoffed.

"Yeah. Dark times, what can I say?" He turned to leave. Beside Alex, her Dean was positively speechless and horrified.

"What do you mean, what can you say?" Alex repeated, not really sure she believed what he'd told them. "I'm dead? You're joking, right?"

"No, I'm not joking." He looked slightly sickened. "You died eight months ago, okay?"

Alex felt stung. This was a surreal conversation. Her curiosity, as morbid as it was, got the best of her. "How?"

He let out a soft air-laugh, a sound that had no happiness in it at all. He looked bitter. "I don't think its best for you to know that little detail." He turned to leave, and the other Dean strained against his handcuffs in disbelief.

"Where're you going? You're just gonna tell us that crap and leave us here?"

2014 Dean turned and looked at them, irritated. "Yes. I got a camp full of twitchy trauma survivors out there with an apocalypse hanging over their head. The last thing they need to see is a version of The Parent Trap, and Alex back from the friggin' grave. So, yeah, you stay locked down." He left, slamming the door behind him, his retreating footsteps the only sound.

"... dick!" Dean exclaimed, earning a funny look from his sister. They were silent and still for a few seconds, trying to process all of it.

"Okay." Alex looked at her brother. "So have we decided if this real or not?"

Grudging, Dean looked her direction. "For all our sakes... I hope not. But I don't wanna wait around to find out." He looked down and began digging at a nail in the floor with his fingernails.

Alex waited a couple seconds, then cleared her throat. "What're you doing?"

He shot her a look. "How else are we gonna pick these handcuff locks, genius? I'm not sitting here cuffed all day until I come back."

Alex just smiled and calmly pulled the lock pick out from underneath her shirt where it hung on its silver chain. She dangled it in midair and then pointed at it. Dean stopped his floorboard digging and looked at her in a mixture of confusion and pleasant surprise. "When did you start wearing that?"

"You're too observant for your own good," she said sarcastically, fiddling with her handcuffs and the lock pick. "Remember that time I got locked in the panic room? I didn't like that very much, so..." she trailed off. Her cuffs snapped off, and she began working on his. "Good thing I never mentioned it to you, or you—the 2014 you—might have known about it and taken it." She thought a second, frowned. "Wait. But if this is real... the real future... then why doesn't twenty fourteen you remember this? Wouldn't the you here in front of me be the same one later? So, the guy who just left, would be you, but later—and would remember doing this. Right?"
Dean gave her the weirdest, most confused face ever. "Huh!?"

"Never mind," she said, feeling a little confused herself. "It made sense in my head." His cuffs fell off with one last turn of the lock pick. Now both free, the siblings stood up.

Dean turned on Alex, his face stern. "Okay, I'm gonna go find Cas. You stay here."

"Stay here?" Alex asked in protest, unable to believe he would ask that of her, especially in this crazy place.

Dean gave her a deadly serious look. "Yes. You heard him—uh, me. You're not alive anymore in this version of the future. These people see you, recognize you, they will shoot you on sight. Think you're a Croatoan or a zombie, I dunno. So, yeah. Stay here."

Not at all happy about it but conceding to the point, Alex complied, sitting down in one of the kitchen table chairs sullenly as Dean left the cabin. She folded her arms, frustrated. Too much of her life had been spent sitting and waiting around. All of five minutes passed before she stood, shaking her head, and left out the back door, stealing through the thick brush and skirting around the back of the cabins. Dean was always leaving her behind and making her stay behin—ouch!—she walked right into a bunch of briers and hear a huge ripping sound, looked down, and swore softly—her shirt, Dean's old Metallica shirt—now had an impressive tear right up the center. She pulled the brambles away with just the tips of her fingers, wincing against the sharp pricks. She needed to pay closer attention to her surroundings. She could see Dean going up into a cabin near the edge of the camp. She didn't see anyone else around and stole closer, then ducked down and froze as a handful of women came out of the cabin, talking and laughing. She waited until they had all walked away to steal a little closer.

She crept around the side of the cabin, and could hear two voices inside, indistinct, but both male. One was definitely Dean. She waited there at the corner of the cabin, peeked around, looking to see if the coast were clear. One woman was still visible, but heading up into another cabin. Alex could hear her brother's voice. "Dude, what happened to you?"

"Life," was the strangely nonchalant reply in a voice that was very familiar—Cas? There was an odd laugh. "I recognize that look Dean. I'm past help, but thanks for your concern." That definitely sounded like Cas, but something was off. She glanced around—the coast was clear. She dashed up the stairs and through the beaded doorway. It was dim inside, but she recognized Cas immediately, even if he didn't look like himself at all.

There was a strange, goofy smile on Cas's face—he was sitting on a wooden chest and looking up at Dean—but when Cas glanced at her, the smile fell, was replaced with incredible shock. He shot up to his feet, his mouth open, his eyes wide, expression almost horrified. He looked like he had seen a ghost—which, she supposed, he kind of had, if she were really dead in this future.

"Hi, Cas," she greeted, kind of cautiously. "You look..." She trailed off, taking him in, not sure how to react. "Different."

Truthfully, he was barely recognizable and it shocked her, caught her unawares. Cas looked incredibly rugged yet worn down in a way Alex couldn't describe. He had a scuffy beard and his hair was longer, tousled and unstyled. He had dark circles under his eyes. His outfit was the strangest part: He wore a loose, long-sleeved tunic, some kind of stretchy pants, and of all things, beaded sandals. He even stood differently, and the expression on his face was so unlike anything she'd ever seen on his face before. It scared her for a second, honestly, that gaze in his eyes.

He didn't appear to have heard a word of what she had just said. He was just staring, swallowing, looking horrified. The blood had drained out of his face and he seemed to be at a complete loss for words. His expression wobbled, he looked down, and when he spoke, it was almost like he was talking to himself. "Yes, of course. You're... you're here. Why didn't I realize?" His eyes were doing weird things as he looked at the floor. Widening, then squinting. "Dean from two thousand nine, Alex from two thousand nine..." His voice was weird, he moved strangely. "Makes sense," he mumbled, a hand on his head now. "Makes sense."

Alex frowned, looked at Dean, sniffed the air slightly. Was that weed? Alex was quickly getting more and more confused. "Is he stoned?"

"Among other things," Dean said, and gave her an unhappy look. "You weren't supposed to come out of there until I came and got you."

Alex shrugged innocently. He gave her a scowl. "Relax." She was distracted by Cas as she spoke to Dean. "No one saw me."

Dean just sighed in aggravation. "Fine. Well look, halo over there can't take us back to our year, says he's got no angel power left." Cas looked up from the floor at them, his face blank. He kept looking at Alex and he appeared mildly physically ill. "So basically," Dean continued, "we're stuck. With this weirdass version of Cas."

Alex and Cas's eyes met and she felt her eyebrows moving in together as she studied his strange expression and old, weary eyes. What happened to you? An instance of worry rippled through her darkly.

The sound of the beaded doorway opening caused the three of them to turn and look. A tan woman with blonde hair peeked in, smiling at Cas. There was an oddly suggestive kind of quality to the smile. "Cas, we're ready for you in my cabin."

He glanced her way clearly irritated, not really even looking at her. "Not now, Tiffany," he said, gruff and impatient and maybe a little embarrassed. He waved a hand, trying to tell her to go.

She looked immensely confused. "But—"

Cas flew off the handle. "I said not now!" he practically shouted, trembling, his eyes wide and expression disconcerting. "Get out!"

Dean and Alex glanced at each other—more than a little surprised by the outburst. The girl left, looking pretty offended. Cas began to pace the floor. "What, changed your mind about the orgy?" Dean asked sarcastically, and Cas shot him an angry, frazzled look. Alex looked at Dean and balked. Orgy? Last time she'd seen Cas, he was a stuttering, fumbling, frightened virgin—had never even been kissed. Cas said nothing in reply, just looked sick and ashamed and wouldn't look at either Dean or Alex.

Dean rolled his eyes. "Whatever, there a bathroom here?" Dean asked.

"In there." Cas replied distractedly, gesturing vaguely.

Dean left the two of them alone, and Alex just looked at Cas, not understanding. He wouldn't look at her, only ran a hand through his hair, made a weird grimacing face. "What's happened to you?" Alex asked softly, looking around the cabin. "Incense... candles... weed?" She paused. "Orgies?" She couldn't quite believe that part.

His expression worked so oddly that for a moment, she thought he was going to cry. "Just... ways to pass the time," he said in a strained voice. He was still looking down. He was frowning too, but not like he did in 2009. In that time, he frowned because he didn't understand. Now, it looked like he were upset about something, really bothered. Alex was entirely caught off guard by this entire scenario. She had pictured the same Cas she remembered—wearing his trench coat, operating in a stoic, calm, awkward way. But this guy in front of her—was shocking. Saddening. Confusing.

"Ways to pass the time," she echoed faintly. There was a sadness in that phrase that she felt somewhere deep down. She peered at him with sudden intent studiousness. "You okay?" She asked, sounding almost suspicious. "What's…" she looked around the cabin again, confused. "What's going on with you?"

His eyes came to hers and he seemed so wretched. His eyes were shining and his face was filled with a grave, desolate quality that was terrifying to look at. "I've… lost a lot," he said gruffly, then turned, began to straighten the things on top of the dresser behind himself with shaking hands, ignoring her.

What could he have lost? Besides apparently his mind? He continued to needlessly busy himself with needlessly tidying the top of his dresser—a little mirror, a photo frame with a pressed flower in it, a comb, an empty bottle of perfume, an incense burner. She was sorry that he was sad and upset at her appearance, but she had questions to ask and couldn't hold them in. She cleared her throat, stepped a little closer, trying to ask politely for him to humor her. Maybe he could clear up a couple things for her and and then she could leave him to get high in peace. "Hey, uh, Cas, is it true?"

"Yes."

Her stomach flip-flopped with a weird, sick feeling. "How?" she asked intently, taking another step toward him and craning her neck around, trying to see him better. His profile was gaunt and rigid. Pained.

Slowly, he turned his head to look at her with eyes that seemed wounded. "A mistake." His voice wavered and he looked away again, back at the dresser in front of him. "It was a mistake."

Alex waited for him to say more, but he didn't. "What kind of mistake? Like, an accident, or—"

Cas suddenly whipped to face her, almost confrontationally—his expression was fierce and angry and unstable. "I can't talk about this to you, okay?" He all but snapped, startling Alex with his loud, rough voice. The look on her face must have made him feel bad. He paused, calmed a little, looked contrite. "It's—it's... I just can't talk about it." He gave her no further explanation, but he'd clearly been set off by talking about her death.

"O-okay. I'm sorry. I didn't mean—I didn't realize." Alex was a little embarrassed. Cas obviously felt the same.

"It's all right," he said faintly, and yet again, he wouldn't look at her. Alex however, studied him closely, trying to figure this strange future version of Castiel out. Why was he so emotional? Why did he look the way he did? What happened to him?

As her eyes traversed his worn features and age-lined face, then down his scruffy neck and smooth chest the tunic revealed, she noticed a silver chain hanging around his neck. Whatever was on the end caught the light, and she could see a flash of silver shapes there in the V of the unbuttoned tunic. Wait a minute—! Without a second thought she reached out and grabbed the necklace, consequently pulling him a little closer as she examined the two shining objects on the end of the necklace with wide-eyed, slack-jawed confusion—her old silver whistle, the one she'd had worn as a kid and teen—and her dad's wedding band, the one she wore all the time? Stunned beyond words, she looked at Cas, then back to the items, then at him again. "Why do you have these?" she demanded, feeling stranger by the second.

Cas was just staring at her, the oddest look on his face at her proximity and question. He closed his hand on the items and pulled the chain back gently, tucked it back into his shirt, backed up a little bit. His body language was guarded. "You gave them to me."

Alex tilted her head to the side, her eyebrows knit together. "I gave them to you," she repeated in disbelief. Her suspicions were raising. "And why the hell would I do that?"

Cas seemed unwilling to tell her, just looked away, shook his head. "Just… good luck charms. It's not important."

Alex gave him an exasperated look, frustrated by the situation in general. "Still allergic to straight answers, huh? Fine; listen, have you got anything I can wear? This shirt got ripped on my way in."

She pointed to the giant tear on her shirt, and he seemed to notice it for the first time. His eyes raised from the tear to hers and he seemed way too conflicted about her question. With a great deal of reluctance, he nodded toward the dresser. "Bottom drawer."

He was acting so strange. She opened up the drawer and froze. She recognized most of the clothing there—her green and gray flannel button up, her Guns N' Roses tank top, her light green t-shirt with the smudge of vamp blood on the hemline that she'd never been able to get out. What the hell? She was beginning to feel afraid, almost. She turned and looked at him for an explanation. "What are you doing with these…?" she asked shakily.

"Roommates." Alex turned very slowly, looked at the one bed… then back at Cas questioningly.

"Yes, roommates," he repeated blankly, and began to walk out. "I need some air."

"What, I slept on the floor?" Alex called after him, but he had already left. No. Something about this was majorly off. He was lying, or leaving something out. One little voice whispered that maybe they'd been… together. A couple. But she quickly shut that thought down. That couldn't be possibly true, could it? She was left to look around, puzzled, wondering if this were a huge joke. Roommates with Cas. That sounded like a sitcom or something. Dean came out of the bathroom at that moment, and Alex pointed a finger at him. "This future is fucking bananas."

"You're just now figuring that out?" he asked sarcastically.

Alex changed into one of the tank tops in the drawer, one she didn't recognize—it was too weird to wear one she already owned—and about five minutes later, they could hear the sound of cars rolling in on the gravel. "Oh look, I'm back. That didn't take long," Dean said, and went outside. Alex stayed on the porch of the cabin, watching from a distance, and Cas stood a few feet off from the porch as Dean ambled toward the new arrivals. They were all were opening beers and drinking at the Jeep they had driven in. And then without any warning, 2014 Dean drew his gun and pointed it at one of the men's backs. "Hey. Hey! Watch out!" 2009 Dean shouted, even as a single shot rang out. The other two guys looked up and saw the two Deans standing ten feet apart.

"Dammit," 2014 Dean said, and then glared at his confused soldiers, taking a couple seconds, obviously trying to think of a way to remedy the weird situation. "I'm not gonna lie to you! Me and him—it's a pretty messed-up situation we got going. But believe me, when you need to know something, you will know it. Until then, we all have work to do." He pointed an angry finger at Dean and said, "My cabin, now."

Alex came down from the porch, rushing to Cas's side, watching future Dean roughly manhandle her Dean into the cabin.

"What's he doing with him?" Alex demanded.

"Bitching him out, probably," Cas said idly, and Alex looked at him oddly.

One of the soldiers stepped closer to them, looking at Alex with narrowed eyes, with recognition. "Wait—she died. I remember her. She was here when I first got here… then died. How can you still be alive?" His hand was crossing his body to the pistol on his hip.

Even as Alex was recoiling, her reflexes kicking in, someone flashed past her. Cas lunged forward with blazing speed, socking the other guy in the jaw with everything he had, a certain wild and sloppy but brutal energy to it, unlike the other times she'd seen him kick ass—but the guy went down onto his back from the force of the impact, and Cas stood over him, grabbing him by his jacket viciously. "Don't touch her, Adam, not you, not anyone! She's fine. Not a Croat, not anything! And keep your mouth shut about this, or you'll have to deal with me." He shoved the guy back, and took a couple backward steps toward Alex, keeping his body between her and the guys.

"What, the camp drunk?" Adam retorted, wiping blood from his lip and getting up slowly. "That's real scary."

Cas's voice lowered, and he sounded something like she remembered. "Don't make me tell you twice."

Adam seemed to think about it, then rolled his eyes, acting unaffected. "Whatever, man." Adam looked at Alex suspiciously, but they left.

Cas turned to her, his expression more familiar to her—grim, dangerous. "Go back inside my cabin."

"But—"

"Just go!" He snapped.

Alex looked at him indignantly. "Look, I don't know why you're acting so weird, but—"

He took her by both arms suddenly, startling her, staring at her in the eyes, and his eyes were desperate, he seemed on edge and like he was close to losing his mind. But he spoke carefully, clearly forcing himself to calm down and reign in whatever emotional breakdown he was close to having. "Alex, please just do what I say, go back into the cabin. Please." He seemed almost at the point of agony, and he looked down at her briefly, at his hands on her arms and seemed to have a slightly epiphany. He let go and looked down, thinking hard, somewhere far away mentally.

Blinking a couple times in surprise, Alex shut her mouth, frowned, and muttered, "Fine."

Alex went back inside and crossed her arms, watching Cas through the window. He was standing in front of the cabin, running a hand through his hair. He almost looked like he was going to be sick. He slowly came to the porch and sat on the steps, putting his shaggy head in his hands. Alex's anger died down in a sudden wash of empathy, of sadness. She wondered how that could be Castiel. He looked like Cas, but what had happened? Was this really his future? It made no sense—none. He was nothing like he used to be.

Alex looked around the cabin, giving it a better once-over. Candles, a Buddha statue, an exotic looking rug. The single, big bed. There was a dresser, a chest, a couple chairs and a small table. She glanced back outside, where Cas remained unmoving, and she turned back around, eying the wooden chest curiously. She went to it and cracked it open as quietly as possible—then went still. His trench coat was neatly folded up there, and the sight of that triggered some kind of deep, surprised sadness in her. She touched it gently, with just the tips of her fingers, and she remembered him in it, just a couple days ago, as they traveled across the country in the Impala.

She shut the chest softly, slowly, momentarily too disconsolate to really do anything but stare around, puzzled. Shaking herself, she went to the closet, opened it curiously, then eyebrows went up as she saw what the shelves were lined with—hard liquor, and lots of it. She picked one bottle up, recognizing the green liquid as absinthe. Damn, Cas. To the left of the shelves were some of his clothes on hangars, and behind that, she recognized the sleeve of one of her oldest, most worn out cargo jackets. Seeing their clothes hanging together was odd. A morbid reminder that she had been here, but now was gone. Below the clothes, there were some boxes piled in disarray, and she frowned, peering at the one on top.

The contents of the box were jumbled—a bunch of pill bottles. She raked through them, realizing what they were with another pang of shocked sadness. Opioids and amphetamines—illegal, highly addictive drugs. Some of them looked like they had been half used up, most were nearly empty. She held a bottle of Oxy in her hand, suddenly so very sad, not sure what to think of this discovery. Oh, Cas. What happened to you? And more than that... why? Her heart hurt inexplicably for him. She carried the bottle with her and went to the window where she could see him.

He hadn't moved. Shoulders slumped forward, shaggy head of dark hair in his hands. Who was that guy, and what had happened to the Cas she knew? Moreover, what happened to the Dean she knew? He'd just shot a guy in the back, told her she died without so much as blinking, said he hadn't talked to Sam in five years—this really couldn't be the future. It just couldn't. She didn't believe this.

Cas came back in after a couple more minutes, avoiding looking at her. She, however, was watching him closely, concealing the bottle she still held from his sight. She had a theory, and had to know if it were right. "You're not an angel at all anymore, are you?"

He let out a soft, grudging sigh. "What gave me away?" Alex just gave him a look. What didn't give him away? He smiled cynically. His eyes were unaffected and dead. "Yeah. I'm not like I used to be," he said, and the amount of self-loathing in his voice was staggering.

Yeah no shit. She held the bottle of pills up to see how he'd react. His face went cold when he realized that she knew his secret. She was perplexed. "You know this shit could kill you, right?"

His eyes raised to hers and there was an emptiness there that was devastating. "Kinda the point."

He expressed a soft, grudging sigh. "Life's just not working out for me these days," he said with a surprising amount of sarcasm and he snatched the bottle from her unceremoniously. Too stunned at his behavior and changed personality to do much of anything, Alex just gaped, watching as Cas walked the length of the room and tossed the bottle into the trash can there. He ran a hand through his dark, unkempt hair and then composed himself, cleared his "Yeah. So, what part of two-thousand nine are you from?" He asked, apparently not wanting to talk his drug habit anymore.

Alex looked at him cautiously. "Early spring. We just hunted down Raphael and got jack squat from him."

"Yeah," Cas said, thinking. He chuckled to himself, a bittersweet and short sound. "That time we sat on the porch and you told me what a real kiss was." Her surprise at his comment showed and Cas's eyes fell away from hers. "It stuck with me," he explained heavily, and brushed past her, went over towards his closet, pulling his tunic off and over his head as he went.

The sudden half-nakedness startled Alex all over again, but Cas seemed to think nothing of it and didn't notice how Alex stared at his bare back, and as he turned around, his broad chest and shoulders. It was shocking because he had scars. On his strong, tanned arms he had a few white lines like scratches, there was a blotchy raised pink spot on one of his biceps—a bullet wound? Smaller, dark long shapes—a few on his shoulders, a couple across his ribcage. Those looked like a knife had left them. It almost looked like he had seen as many fights, if not more, than she had. For a second, she let her eyes wander down his torso, to the flat stomach and tapered hips. He turned around again, his back to her again. His very strong, defined back. Alex touched her neck, cleared her throat. It was a little warm in here.

Cas got another shirt out of his closet and shrugged it on, buttoned it up. The things of hers he wore around his neck glinted in the light as his fingers went up, button after button and Alex eyed the ring and whistle sidelong, not sure if she believed him. She'd given those to him as 'good luck charms'? She looked at the bed again, could see some of her stuff hanging in the closet, thought about her shirts in a drawer below where his shirts were.

She mulled it all over with increasing suspicion. Roommates. Considering Cas again, she didn't believe that for a second, but the other option she was thinking of seemed just as ludicrous. Could they have actually been... involved? Like, romantically? Or was that a crazy thing to think? Because really, in what version of reality would she go for an alcoholic drug addict who apparently loved orgies? And in what version of reality would Cas decide Alex was what he wanted? In what version of reality would Cas even have the ability to have a romantic side? She rolled her eyes at herself briefly, sat down on the edge of the bed and heaved a frustrated sigh, didn't ask him if they'd been more than roommates. Some things just didn't need to be explained, she guessed.

When Alex plopped down onto the end of the bed and began to fiddle with a shoelace, Cas froze. She missed the way his face tightened in pain simply from seeing her sit on the bed. His voice grew strained and he doubled its gruffness to hide the emotions. "Come on, I need to take you to Dean's cabin," he said, pointing sharply at the door and hiding everything underneath a sour expression.

Alex looked up at him with curiosity, slowly standing, seeming to understand something was off. "Why?"

"You just... can't stay here," he said darkly, stone-faced, and was already heading out the door, throwing a "follow me" over his shoulder.

Cas took her to Dean's cabin like he said, then made himself scarce for the rest of the day, unable to face Alex for even a second longer. He would go back to his cabin and pour himself the strongest fucking drink he could find, anything to cover up the shame that was burning him alive inside. He would contemplate the alcohol, battling himself as he filled with self-hatred so strong that it sent him into rage. He'd then throw his glass against a wall and sink down to sit, miserable, with his face in his hands as he cried bitterly, like a broken, hopeless man.
What had he done? How had he let himself become this? He was appalling and disgusting to himself, a shell of who he'd been, a sick and low excuse for a man. He'd been able to forget reality in recent times with the drugs, the booze, the women he'd filled his hollow existence with to feel something (anything) save the pain of her loss. But today, looking into her eyes again… he was convicted completely and miserable with himself for how deeply he'd betrayed her and her memory.

This wasn't just his cabin. It had been theirs.

In Dean's dark cabin just after sunset, Alex lurked in the with her brother and watched as the other Dean and a woman named Risa leaned over a map. Cas was sitting at the table in a lazy, casual stance—his ankles crossed and propped onto the table. His gaze was on the unseeing side though.

Why the gathering? Well, it had become abundantly clear to Alex, for one, why Zachariah had sent them here, to this specific date. 2014 Dean had finally tracked down the Colt—the same one Cas had mentioned to them in 2009—and with it, he planned to kill the devil. Not next week, not next month. Tonight.

"Lucifer is here," Dean said, jabbing his finger into a circled portion of the map. "Now. I know the block and I know the building—"

"Oh good," Cas wisecracked, cutting Dean off. "It's right in the middle of a hot zone."

Dean gave him a cursory, challenging glance. "Crawling with Croats, yeah. You saying my plan is reckless?"

"If you don't like reckless, what about insouciant?" Cas retorted without missing a beat. Dean made a face, clearly not appreciating the attitude. "Are you saying we, uh, walk in straight up the driveway, past all the demons and the Croats, and we shoot the devil?" Cas continued, his sarcastic tone and matching facial expressions causing Alex to stare. He hadn't looked at her even once since he'd shown up again.

Dean just narrowed his eyes at Cas. "Yes."

Cas leaned further back in his chair, giving Dean an unamused look.

"Yeah, well, no one's forcing you to come, Cas," Dean growled, to which Cas sighed, relented.

"I'm going. Of course I'm going." Cas looked at the 2009 Dean. "But why is he? I mean, he's you five years ago. If something happens to him, you're gone, right?"

"He's coming," Dean said authoritatively. "Alex too… we could use the extra gun. She's a damn good shot."

At that, Cas's feet came off the table, his expression changed as he sat up straight. "What? It's too dangerous to take her there, let alone Dean!"

2014 Dean tilted his head to the side at the outburst, frowning, looking at Cas with a suddenly intent gaze. "Cas… are you sober?"

Cas looked caught, as if that were an accusation he resented.

2014 Dean was clearly genuinely surprised. "Last time you were straight was…" he looked at Alex and his tongue nervously darted out, his eyebrows shrugged upwards. "Awhile ago."
Cas ignored the comment, getting physically agitated, and he leaned over the table. "They shouldn't go, Dean, and you know it."

"Hey, we're right here, you know," 2009 Dean said. "And we wanna go. So, end of discussion."

Cas turned on him, angry, using his hands as he talked. "Aren't you listening to me? It's much, much too dangerous for either of you!" He looked between both Deans, as if looking for back up. When he got nothing, he seemed to grow resolute, hostile. "Fine," he snapped, and then pointed a finger at Alex while he looked at 2014 Dean. "But Dean, she's not going. I won't let her."

That comment definitely caught Alex's attention. "You won't let me go?" She asked incredulously even as she stood up, becoming defensive. "That's not your decision."

Cas's eyes darted to her and he was deeply affected, regretful, upset. He looked away, his jaw tight. "You don't understand."

"I don't think you do," Alex challenged, to which Cas said nothing, only clenched his jaw even tighter.

2014 Dean gave Cas a dirty look, shook his head and stood up, map in hand. "We're locked and loaded and on the road by midnight. One of you take Alex and get her a weapon, one of you start getting the grunts moving." Dean looked at the other Dean. "I need some time alone with... myself." That would have been funny in different circumstances. In these, it was just adding to the feeling of a bizarro world.

"I'll get everyone rallied," Risa said, already brushing past Dean and heading out of the cabin.

"I guess that means you're with me," Cas said to Alex, sounding positively thrilled about it. What was his problem? She didn't like that, him telling her she couldn't go along on the assault. He was starting to sound like Dean for god's sake. Alex couldn't handle all these fucking men trying to tell her what she could and couldn't do. Either way, she shouldered that and followed him out of Dean's cabin and to one of the rusted tin sheds that offset the camp's mess hall.

After he had basically kicked her out of his cabin that morning, she hadn't seen him again all day and he was currently acting just as oddly as before. He was dressed differently, though. Not like a damn hippie. He had on faded jeans, military style boots, a button up, a rugged cargo jacket. He looked rakish and handsome, but his face, his eyes—they were still hollow and avoided looking at hers.

The storage shed he took her into was about ten feet long and ten feet wide and the walls were lined with gun racks and those racks were brimming with semi-automatic weapons. Cas went to the back of the shed and pulled one off the rack, brought it back to her. "Here ya go," he said apathetically, holding it out to her. "AR-15 rifle. Your favorite."

Alex looked at him a little uncertainly, not taking the gun. She had never used one of those before in her entire life—shotguns and pistols and rifles, yes, but machine guns, assault rifles? "I've never used one of these."

He thought a minute, then seemed to realize something. His tone remained businesslike, forced. "Well, you will. And, I assure you, it'll become your favorite."

He held out the gun to her, and her hands brushed over his as she gave in and took it. His expression went cold. Alex froze, thinking she had done something. "What is it?"

He shook his head, suddenly kind of laughing and smiling, as if what she said was funny, but there was no light in his eyes. He threw a hand up briefly. "Look around us! Everything's wrong." The smile was fading into a dark expression and he obviously regretted his little outburst. He pinched the bridge of his nose and muttered a curse word in frustration, trying to compose himself.

Alex watched him, not sure what to say or how to react to his behavior. Sadness filled her to see him like this and she once again didn't understand how he had become this way in five years. She turned her attention to inspecting the gun, tested the feel of it in her hands, trying to sidestep his confession of pain, trying to get the atmosphere to be less awkward. "This has a good weight to it." She looked down the sights. "Not bad. I can see why I like it."

Cas said nothing—he turned so that he wasn't facing her. He began poking around on a shelf that had ammo boxes stored in disarray. Alex set her gun aside for a second, studying him. She had to try again—had to. She was sorry he had a hard time with it, but she needed to know. "How did I die, Cas? Come on. Please, tell me. It's important." She gently grasped one of his arms, trying to appeal to him, trying to get him to look at her.

He looked at her like she revolted him, and he stepped back, refusing to look at her, looking at the guns beside him instead. "It's—it's best if you don't know."

"Why?" She demanded, not letting up. "I mean, it's my future, right? I deserve to know. That's the whole point of Zachariah sending me and Dean here."

"No, I don't talk about it anymore," he said lowly, refocusing on the ammo boxes and starting to sort them for no reason.

Alex stood right beside him, getting in his space. "Cas—" she started.

He abruptly snapped, lost his composure completely. "I said I don't talk about it anymore goddammit!" He shouted, trembling with what looked like terror. Startled and even a little spooked, Alex stepped back from him and his features went from furious to stunned and hollow. "No, don't—don't be afraid of me, please," he begged, and his voice grew tight with grief. "I'm sorry. I don't... I don't like to talk about what happened that day."

Newly cautious with him, Alex felt her eyes narrowing. "Did you see what happened to me?" She asked carefully, going out on a limb, not sure in the least of how he would react to her question.

He didn't fly into a fit of rage. Instead, his eyes clouded with a sheen of tears and he let out a miserable, pained breath and looked down, put his face into his hand, let his shoulders slump. "I was with you when it happened," he confessed quietly, then let his hand fall and with a sick expression, he looked at her, not bothering to hide his distress. "I could have saved you. If I'd been just a little faster. Just a little faster." His eyes were glazed over and stared into middle distance unseeingly now. "Alex... I let you die." Again, his face crumpled and he ducked his head away, hiding his face behind a hand as a miserable choking sound came out of the base of his throat.

"Hey, hey... it's okay," Alex said, trying to calm him down. She put a hand onto his shoulder, trying to relay some reassurance to him. Her touch startled him and his hand dropped away from his face. He looked at her with the strangest expression and seemed unable to help himself. He reached out and let his hand cradle the side of her head, his thumb stroking downward over her hair with great bittersweet affection. Stock still, Alex stared at him, her hand pulling back from his shoulder. "W-what are you doing?" She asked, finding her breath short.

His heart was in his eyes as he studied her. "Have you really not figured it out yet?" He asked softly, sadly, fondly, then stroked his hand against the hair against the side of her head carefully, conveying great tenderness in the touch. Taking his hand away and becoming more conflicted, he wet his chapped lips, waited anxiously for her reply.

Her loud pulse filled her ears and shock flooded her veins with a shaky, lost feeling. So it was true then. "...We weren't just roommates."

"No," he confirmed, just a murmur. His eyes held hers apprehensively. "We weren't just roommates."

Alex was shaking her head kind of hollowly, and was abruptly wondering where the hidden cameras were. "No," she said, doubting so hard all the sudden, getting freaked out. "No. That's crazy. You're not serious." His expression flickered just slightly, as if he were offended by that assumption. Alex struggled with what that meant, them not being just roommates. "I mean... you and I... we lived together?" Her voice dropped to a whisper. "We... we slept together?"

Cas didn't say yes or no, but come on Alex, of course you would have if you lived together. But she was so emotionally young when it came to relationships and romance, having never even kissed a man, that the idea of sex and living with someone—let alone the rugged, jaded man in front of her —had her dizzy and freaked.

Cas saw that and was gentle. "I understand this is probably a lot for you to process," he said somberly, his eyebrows pressing in a little further. "I... I wasn't going to tell you at all... but I thought it had to be obvious by now."

Alex did a mental double take, distracted by the thoughts of sex. Her eyes went wide. "Oh my god, wait—did I do orgies too?" She asked, hating that idea completely. Had she been on drugs, too? Into all kinds of weird stuff she'd never imagined herself capable of?

"Wh—" Cas's face went both embarrassed and insistent. "No, never," he said, then paused, his humiliation etched onto his face. "I uh... I was never with anyone but you. Ever. Until after you died." Another punch of shock to her stomach at his words and the love and commitment it seemed to imply. His shame at what he'd done since her death was tangible. "I'm so sorry," he whispered as his eyes fell. He was apologizing to the Alex she hadn't become yet but it hit her hard, made her feel strange. Hurt.

"I... don't understand any of this," Alex said, barely able to find the words. The painful mood of the conversation was hard and unexpected, and the way he looked so defeated and hurt was difficult to watch. His sadness kept radiating off of him and sinking into her, so she tried for half-hearted humor to clear the air and cover over her own emotional distress. "I mean aren't you, I dunno... like several thousand years too old for me?"

He chuckled, a surprisingly fond smile coming over his face, softening his features, making the pain ebb away. "That's not the first time you've asked me that," he said affectionately. Alex went blank again. It was a totally disconcerting thing to hear from his mouth—it was so knowing and fondly said. Cas swallowed, looking genuinely apologetic at her expression. "I'm sorry. I've made you uncomfortable."

"Uncomfortable?" She shot back. "I feel like I'm tripping balls right now Cas!"

"So to the point. I always lo—" he caught himself, his expression going rigid, "...enjoyed that about you."

"How?" Alex didn't miss what he was about to say, and she blinked a couple times as her heart turned a flip of shock and awe. She just couldn't believe this. Her and Cas? Sure, she had definitely admitted to herself that she found him incredibly attractive and interesting and she enjoyed being around him recently... and yes, she'd pondered it, a couple times in her mind, what he might be like to kiss or hold, but she blamed the romance novels and her idealistic, virgin mindset for those thoughts. Their chances at ever really being together... she hadn't even given those any real thought, because she had been pretty sure those chances didn't even exist, and what would anyone, an angel most of all, see in her?

Alex shook her head no slowly. If this were some kind of cruel trick, she didn't want to fall victim to it. She almost didn't want to believe it at all. It was too sad, too complicated, too unthinkable.
Too far removed from what she knew now.

Castiel saddened in front of her, somehow seeming to be aware of what she was thinking without er even saying anything. Maybe on an impulse, he touched her arm with his hand, resting it there just above her elbow, bare skin to bare skin, his thumb tracing down slowly. The touch startled her, warmed her. Made her feel. He sought her gaze, his brow wrinkled. She stared up at him, feeling incredibly short of breath all the sudden. The way he touched her was just so unlike what she had expected, and there was a familiarity to his touch that was stunning. He stared back into her gaze, expression intense and unreadable, his eyes flicking from her eyes to her mouth, then back. He looked at her like he knew her—intimately. Alex pulled back from him, flustered. Cas looked almost rejected by the way she had pulled away, and then seemed to shake himself, pull himself together. He thrust a box of bullets at her, all business once again. "Sorry. Here. Should be enough ammo."

He looked at her a second longer, seemed to be struggling internally and then abruptly brushed past her, making a quick exit out of the shed, leaving Alex by herself with many confusing thoughts to ponder. The place where he had touched so slightly and softly still tingled, and she couldn't stop thinking about it.

It was midnight and there was a full, bright silver moon directly overhead in the sky. Alex headed toward where all the vehicles were starting up, her weapon slung over her back, her jacket hung over her arm. She paused when something caught her eye she hadn't noticed before.

Over past where the cabins ended and the woods began, in an overgrown patch of land, there were maybe twenty wooden crosses sticking up out of the ground. In something like morbid curiosity, she wandered over. Some of them were fresh. One of the graves, grass already grown over it, was crudely engraved with the initials A.E.W. She went still—Alexandra Elizabeth Winchester? Was this...? Someone was coming up behind her. She turned to see Chuck, who she had seen earlier that day while she and Dean were waiting around. He gave her a tight smile, hands shoved in his pockets. "Hey, Alex."

She looked back at the grave with her initials on it, ignoring his greeting. "Chuck, is this—?" she looked at him for confirmation.

"Yeah," he confirmed, kind of grimly. "That's your grave."

She could think of nothing to say, only tilted her head to the side, looking at the little bunch of yellow wildflowers there at the base of the cross. She wondered if Dean did that. "Someone put flowers on it."

"Yup," Chuck said. "Cas does." This statement drew a stunned looked from Alex. Chuck was oblivious, looking at the cross as he continued. "He always does. It's the only thing he does consistently around here. Well, besides drink and cause problems."

Someone hollered Chuck's name, and the prophet threw a "gotta go" at Alex as he hurried off. Alex watched him leave, speechless, then looked over where Cas was loading up some weapons into an SUV with Risa. He had a rifle slung across his back and looked so manly to her in that moment—a shiver ran up her spine when she thought of his thumb rubbing against her arm. She thought about his eyes full of sadness because he'd cared about her deeply. Loved. He'd been about to say he'd loved her, back in the shed. Her throat felt tight with tears and Alex turned her attention back to the grave, the flowers. They were fresh like they'd been put out recently, so carefully arranged, tied with a tiny little strand of twine in a very uneven bunched up shape, like he'd try to tie a bow and not been able to quite pull it off. She smiled a little through her pain and confusion. That was more like the Cas she remembered—kind of clueless on how to do everyday things. Like tying bows.

How strange to stand at her own grave. Somehow, even though it was more than just a little macabre, she thought how nice it was to know, even though she was six-feet-under dead in this future that someone still looked after her and still remembered her—and that someone just happened to be her guardian angel. She wasn't sure if that were ironic or kind of beautiful. On impulse, she crouched down and pulled a single yellow flower out of the gathered bunch, then slipped it into her jacket pocket discreetly.

Cas shut the tailgate of his SUV and rounded the corner of the vehicle, only to be confronted by present-day Dean, who was glaring at him. "Okay, you wanna tell me what the hell that was that back there?"

"What do you mean?" Cas asked, to which Dean gave him an unamused look. Cas could tell from the look on Dean's face that he was about to get chewed out.

"The way you got all bent out shape about taking me and Alex on our little field trip? Don't ever challenge me like that again."

Cas looked away, agitated. Dean stepped closer, his voice lowering gruffly. "You know, as much as I despised you and my sister together, I need you to get your crap handled, and pronto. If Alex, the one from our time, could see what the way you roll these days… the women, the drugs, the days on end you stay wasted with chicks you won't even remember the name of the next day… what do you think she'd say, man?" Cas couldn't look at Dean in the eye. Dean sounded disgusted, and Cas felt disgusting. He knew he was so lost and far away from what he should be. Dean wasn't done. He was bearing down physically on Cas, getting angrier and angrier.

"You think you're honoring her memory with this crap?" Dean continued, and Cas felt like he'd been punched in the stomach. "You're really over her that easy, Cas?"

That final comment made something snap inside Cas, and he looked sharply at Dean, struggling to control himself. "I will never be over her, Dean."

Without any warning, Dean shoved him back against the truck violently, his voice a harsh growl. "Well if that's true, you sure as hell have a funny way of showing it!"

Cas grabbed Dean roughly and shoved him back, all of his pent up anger and sorrow boiling over into outrage. "I loved her, Dean!" Both men were frozen like that for a moment, fistfuls of the other's jacket in their hands. Breathing heavily, shaking, Cas struggled to maintain a straight, calm face. "You know I loved her. More than anything!" His voice was bordering on desperate. "But I don't know how to do this anymore!"

Dean shoved him and let go, bitter. "It's a damn shame what you've become, Cas."

Cas only glowered, struck by the irony of it. "I could say the same for you, Dean."
There was a brief silence and Dean let the comment go, looked Cas up and down judgmentally. "I can see you're shaking, man. What kind of crap are you on now?"

"Nothing," Cas admitted, looking away. "Which is the problem."

Dean scoffed at him, disgusted. "You picked a hell of a time to start rehab, Cas."

"Dean—"

"No—shut up. I don't wanna hear your lame excuses anymore. Nothing you ever say can make this—" he vaguely gestured at Cas, "okay with me. Just hold it together a little longer. We need to do this right, and kill the devil. You with me?"

Cas's jaw clenched. "Yeah, I'm with you," he replied caustically. He looked at the man who he used to call his good friend, and felt nothing but bitterness and shame and regret. Dean was looking at him as though Cas were the biggest disappointment and failure he had ever seen.

The sound of approaching footsteps on the crunching gravel alerted them that they were no longer alone. "Everything okay here, guys?" Dean from 2009 asked. Alex was behind him, totally unaware of what had just happened, hefting her gun.

"Yeah, everything's just peachy," 2014 Dean said, and brushed past them roughly.

"God, that guy is a douche," the other Dean said, watching him go.

Alex chuckled at that. Cas looked at her out of the corner of his eye, the sight of that little smile of hers making his heart twist in ways he couldn't bear. He motioned to his SUV, turning away before either of them could see his face. "Let's go. We're about to move out."

The car bumped down the back road they had turned off onto, and Cas glanced to his side. Dean was still awake, but Alex had fallen asleep about thirty minutes into the drive. Her head lolled on Dean's shoulder, and he stared out the window tersely. Cas returned his gaze to the dark road ahead. This was so risky, and he couldn't believe he was actually driving these two to the place where they should be the furthest from. He blinked a few times, trying to stay awake, trying to stay alert. He felt horrible physically, suffering from sobriety. He hadn't been this clear in awhile, and he remembered why. Everything hurt, and he couldn't stop his mind from going to all the dark places he so desperately wanted to pretend didn't exist.

Dean was digging through the glove compartment. "You got anything for a headache?" he pulled out an orange medicine bottle and squinted at it. "What the hell are these? Amphetamines?"

Cas snatched the bottle from him. "Give those to me."

"What the hell are you doing with those?" Dean asked, sounding genuinely shocked and even a little offended. It was almost as bad as when Alex had discovered his habit. Almost.

Cas shook his head, shamefaced, but trying hard to just stay aloof, calm. It was easier to be less emotional with Dean. "Nothing, today."

Dean sounded hesitant. "Uh, right... don't get me wrong, Cas. I, uh. I'm happy that the stick is out of your ass, but—what's going on—w-with the drugs and the orgies and the love-guru crap?"

Cas gave him a sidelong glance. "I'm not an angel anymore." Dean's eyebrows shot up. "Yeah, I went mortal," Cas said, with distasteful emphasis on the last word.
"What do you mean? How?"

He thought a minute about how to answer, shook his head tiredly. "It wasn't by choice, if that's what you're asking. I think it had something to do with the other angels leaving. But when they bailed, my mojo just kind of—psshhew!—drained away. And now, you know, I'm practically human. I'm all but useless, Dean. Last year, broke my foot, laid up for two months." Without warning, he remembered Alex bringing things to him when he had been stuck in their cabin—he remembered her doodling on his cast a few times (a few appropriate things, and a few maybe not so much)—dropping a kiss on the top of his head when he had been complaining about how much he hated sitting for so long. His chest tightened at the memories. He'd loved her beyond anything and everything and her loss had destroyed him.

"So, you're human," Dean was saying. "Well, welcome to the club, I guess."

Cas just shook his head sadly. "I used to belong to a much better club. Look at me. I'm powerless. I'm alone, I'm drowning. Not even sure why I even bother getting out of bed most days."

Dean looked at him strangely. "Geez. So… the drugs? The women?"

Cas sucked his cheeks in, stared at the road ahead, loathing himself. "I guess that's just how I roll."

Dean looked deeply bothered. "Right. Yeah."

Cas fell silent, his grip tight on the steering wheel, his stare blank and straight ahead of himself.

His mind was full of noise and confusion, of memories of his downward spiral into who he'd become now. He hadn't meant to fall apart like this, and if he'd known what would happen, he would have found a way to make sure it never came to pass.

At first it had just been alcohol abuse to deal with her death. Being drunk had soothed the void in his life and helped numb the excruciating pain from losing the only one he'd ever loved—the only one who'd ever truly loved him. He'd drank more and more and more, testing his limits, trying to kill the pain and loneliness and despair that hounded him and made life a miserable affair. It had worked well enough.

And then one night, around a campfire with a bunch of newly-rescued people fleeing the Croatoan virus, the unthinkable had happened. Drunk out of his mind, Cas had stumbled off from the group and one of the girls had followed him into the woods, giggled, pulling at his jeans as he fell back against a tree, unable to even stand. She'd had hair the color of Alex's and confused, completely out of it, Cas hadn't even known who she was, had just seen the top of a brown head of hair bent low over him and he'd thought it was her, his Alex, doing that to him.

When she looked up at him after blowing him, Cas had seen her face and almost passed out in horror at the realization of what had just happened—he'd pushed her away and run stumblingly back to his cabin, retched violently off the porch and nearly fallen off of it, weeping loudly for what he'd just done. It felt like treason and betrayal and he cursed himself for it, for dashing Alex's memory onto the rocks so readily. But it would get much worse. A month or so later he woke up after a night of being high off his ass and drunk to the point of passing out. A woman he didn't know had been naked in bed beside him, in Alex's place. Dismay and panic had set in over Cas, then fury—no one else belonged there, ever. Only Alex. He'd gone a little crazy and immediately kicked the girl out, not even dressed. He'd been so shaken up at her presence and what had clearly happened between them that he'd thrown a sheet at her and tossed her clothes after her, slammed the door in her face uncaringly and reached for more booze immediately, almost having a full on panic attack in the process.
He hadn't been sober once since then. Not until today.

He could barely stand to face himself. The things he'd done. The ways he'd tried to escape the pain, the high he'd been chasing every single day to keep his pain at bay. It was a wonder he wasn't dead yet. It wasn't like he hadn't tried a few times. But somehow… he was still here.

And now the worst part was that so was she. She saw what had become of him, understood in some small way how he'd betrayed her and spit in the face of their love. A love she didn't even really understand yet, but would soon. If she could see him now, if she knew what he'd done… she would hate and despise him. Just as she should.

They arrived to the outskirts of the city just before sunrise and the convoy stopped to regroup.

Cas put his truck into park and then looked down at Alex, whose head lolled awkwardly on his shoulder—he'd taken a sharp curve a few minutes ago, and she'd just kind of fallen into him. Dean was already getting out, slamming the door behind himself. Cas looked down at Alex's sleeping face, so familiar and so missed. Hesitantly, he gently brushed a few strands of her hair away from her face. Her skin was so soft under his fingertips. Her quiet breathing and just barely parted lips were the most beautiful thing he could ever remember seeing. As his eyes flickered over her face, all he could think was I miss you so much. There was so much pain in his chest. His throat closed up in grief and his eyes ached as tears threatened to come. How had he let her loss become his undoing? How had he sunk so low? He was tortured, knowing what he'd done.

Cas pulled away, shaking, trying to get himself together. His entire nervous system was shot to hell. Could he do this? He needed a hit of something, or a strong drink. It was all too much to handle for him. He glanced at the floorboard, where he'd stuck the bottle of amphetamines. But then, beside him, Alex stirred, sitting up slowly, squinting a little. "I fell asleep?" she asked groggily.

"Yeah," he confirmed, trying to control himself and sound unaffected. "We're here. Just waiting for a few others to arrive, I think."

She sighed and stretched a little, oblivious to the way he watched her. "Okay. So, let's go kick Lucy's ass, huh?" She gave him a playful but helpless little smile. And his heart broke a little more even as it healed a little, too.

Alex got out of the SUV, shutting the door behind her. The sun was just coming up, and it looked like it would be a dim, overcast day. It was already warm out. She went to the back of Cas's SUV, where the tailgate was down. Dean was already with the others, who were congregated around Risa's SUV, maybe about forty feet away—why had Cas parked so far off? Alex peeked around the edge of the vehicle, up toward where Cas was. He was just standing there, staring at nothing, in front of the driver's side door.

Momentarily forgetting her gun, Alex went over to him. "Hey—you okay?"

He took a step away, his back to her and the car. Then turned around, looked at her plainly, his featured etched with a haunted expression. "No. I am not okay." Hesitating, Alex went to him, put a hand on his shoulder gingerly. Wished she knew what to do or say. Wished she knew what had happened to him to break him this way. At her touch, he visibly became emotional—and Alex pulled her hand back, like she'd done something wrong. She backed up a little, but his hand shot out to grab her arm. "Wait."

"What?" She asked. He looked strange, and just stared at her, looking like he had something to say, but couldn't get it out. "What Cas?" she asked, more urgently this time.

He shook his head, his eyes staring down at the ground, then someplace off beside him before coming to rest on hers. His expression was full of a pain she didn't understand. "Some mornings I'll wake up, and for just an instant, I—I forget. I forget you're gone. And I turn over and see you're not there and..." he was barely holding tears back. "You were the one bright spot left in this world for me," Cas continued shakily. "All the shit I've done to myself these past few months... it's all to forget the pain. I've made so many mistakes and I can't take any of it back but..." He inched just a little closer, making her breathless. "Alex..." he trailed off, his expression desperate, intense. "Please... I..."

Alex waited, frightened because his intensity was palatable and he looked half-sick. He looked like he was about to ask for something impossible, or something uncomfortable. Her heart began to beat faster in dread and anticipation. "What?" She prompted, searching his gaze anxiously. Her voice was barely audible.

Cas's expression worked oddly and his eyes fell away from hers. "I know I shouldn't even ask but... I want..." he squeezed his eyes shut, rubbed his forehead with his fingertips, refocused. "I need—" he got frustrated again, and Alex waited, then jutted her face forward, raised her eyebrows. His expression was strange and hesitant. Finally, he swallowed, and his voice was just above a whisper. His eyes clung to hers. "Kiss me."

Her stomach dropped and her face went blank. "...W-what?" she asked faintly.

"Please," he said, his voice just a broken whisper. "I just... I can go in there and face the devil, face death, the whole nine. If you kiss me." He wet his lips nervously. "One last time," he paused, thinking of something, and frowned, then smiled in the softest, saddest way. "Or... first, I guess. For you."

Alex's mouth hung open slightly. "I... uh..." she had quickly become flustered, breathless. His expression was so pleading, and then he gently caught her hands in his.

At the touch of his warm, dry skin against hers, she felt her entire body flush over in unexpected heat. "A dying man's wish," he said softly.

"But... you don't know you're dying," she protested weakly.

A muscle in his cheek jerked, and his gaze faltered, the softest self-deprecating smile on his lips. "I have been for awhile now."

Alex looking up at him hesitantly, her heart hammering faster than she could ever remember. She couldn't find the strength to say no—and besides that she thought in the most secret place of her mind that this was an opportunity she might never get again—because she had fantasized and wondered about this. She had. But now, with him actually in front of her, actually asking for a kiss—she felt more afraid than she ever remembered. She'd never kissed anyone—that kid at school didn't count—which maybe was another reason that compelled her forward—she needed to get kissed dammit, she was twenty-six fucking years old and it was ridiculous not to have even kissed anyone. But she was still petrified at the idea. What if she couldn't do it right? What if he kissed her, and it wasn't what he was expecting? Or she was bad at it? But she pushed the fear aside and took the plunge, telling him yes silently with a nod.

His expression changed to something else altogether, and she thought she saw his breathing hitch. Hers did too. The intent and the earnestness and the trepidation in his eyes made her dizzy. His chest touched hers as he closed the distance between them, one of his hands came to the side of her neck, the pad of his thumb tracing her jaw. She could smell him and it was so heady—linseed oil, firewood, incense. Everything felt too intense to even process—her veins sang with anticipation, terror, curiosity, excitement as he came closer and closer. Cas leaned down, the side of his nose brushing against the side of hers as he softly pressed his lips down onto hers, giving her a careful, measured, chaste kiss... and the soft touch sent a zing! of thrilling feelings shooting throughout her entire body. She softened toward him a little without even realizing. Her eyes fell closed and her heart shot through her chest even as he drew back, just a little and just for a second, his lips soft and open, just centimeters from hers—she could feel him breathing against the skin of her lips. Oh god—her body was in overdrive, going crazy. His hand, now at the back of her neck, gently pulled her to him again, guiding her as he kissed her again, a soft, aching little touch that was maddening, that was infuriating. Instinctively, Alex could tell he was holding himself back for her benefit... but she surprised even herself when instead of letting the kiss end there, she escalated it out of a sudden, insane need for him and this and more.

With a boldness she didn't quite recognize in herself, Alex threw caution to the wind and pressed into him hard as she tilted her chin up further, grabbing a fistful of his shirt as she kissed him fully, openly, in a desperate way she hadn't predicted. Her other arm reached up and and circled around his neck to pull him closer possessively. Her sudden actions seemed to unleash something in him—there was a low sort of broken down moan from someplace deep in his throat, and she felt one of his hands crush against the small of her back, pulling her firmly against him. His other hand was tangling in the hair on the side of her head. She could feel his heartbeat thundering against her chest, fast. His mouth moved with hers now boldly, openly, taking her into a deeper kiss, showing her how, and Alex felt like her body literally had been lit on the sweetest, most heavenly fire. She couldn't concentrate on one thing—it was all so much—the way their mouths were entangled, the sound and feel of his labored breathing, the warmth and solidness of him everywhere against her, so indescribable, so beyond stunning, so unlike what she had imagined.

Their breathing was becoming heavy and noisy in each other's mouths, and the way he pulled at her, his hands on her back, then her waist, then her hips, was becoming more and more frantic. Alex heard a strangled sort of moaning gasp escape her mouth and into his as her back hit against the side of the SUV. She might have imagined it, but she swore he whimpered as his hands skinned down to her hips and grabbing roughly, lifting her up easily, pinning her against the truck almost harshly. His body pressed hard against hers, maybe he didn't remember who she was. But she didn't care. She didn't even consciously realize that she wrapped her legs around his waist or locked her arms around his neck, hands gripping his head tightly—she was completely and totally caught up in the way he kissed her: wild and free, desperate and hungry, with his whole body, with his heart and soul. It felt like she was the only thing he wanted in the world, like she was something that he adored. As he held her like that and kissed her so furiously, so passionately, she couldn't deny it: she wanted him so, very, badly.

The sounds of more cars pulling in nearby cut the moment short and they broke apart, breathing heavily, stunned. Cas gazed at her with eyes full of raw emotion as he still held her. She could only stare back—reeling, aching, confused, entranced. Her heart was racing and her breath was short and she was stunned at herself, at him.

Cas hesitated... and then gently pushed a strand of hair back from the side of her face, never looking away from her, his eyes full of memories, of unspoken things. His hand stayed there at the side of her face, tender and sweet, he looked heartbroken and in love at the same time... and Alex knew he was remembering moments she hadn't even lived yet. And she might not have known much, but after that kiss especially, she knew one thing for sure. This man, this version of Castiel, had loved her. Loved. The proof was in the way he was looking at her, the way he had kissed her. The flowers at her grave. The clothes still neatly folded in her drawer. The things he carried of hers. Her chest was tight and there was a lump in her throat that wouldn't go away. So overwhelmed by him that she touched the side of his face, too, with a tenderness she hadn't even known she felt, letting her thumb brush against his cheek. His vivid blue eyes seemed so full as they searched hers and he leaned into her touch. The moment felt indescribably intimate on a level she had never experienced.

It was suddenly too much and Alex pushed away, slid down. She walked a few steps off, her back to him, overcome with emotion she wasn't sure what to do with. She didn't want him to see her face or how much she was feeling at the moment. She took a few shaky breaths, trying to gather her thoughts, trying not to freak out completely. After a few beats he came up behind her, and there was a long, strained pause.

"You asked me how you die."

She turned around slowly at his soft words—was he going to finally tell her? He was pensive, grim, and looking somewhere off to his left, remembering. "You and I went on what was supposed to be a simple mission. Recon, far outside the city. But we got cut off, and there were Croats, too many of them. And, by the time we took them all out..." his voice softened, his eyes shut. "You were infected with the virus. You begged me to kill you before... before the change." He opened his eyes again, and she saw that they were shining with tears. "I said I couldn't, not with... not because of..." he swallowed, blinked, tried to stay composed. "But it didn't matter. I had to." He looked right at her. The raw pain on his face suddenly made sense. "And I did. I shot you and then watched you die." Again, his eyes began to shine with grief.

Alex shook her head, wordless, realizing in faint horror why he felt so responsible and traumatized.

Cas looked down. "I was supposed to be your protector. Forever. And I failed, miserably. I hate being just a man." He took a deep breath, cleared his throat, forcing himself to recover a little. "The point of me telling you this is... you and Dean have to change it. Have to. Because this — " he looked around, gestured at nothing in particular, then back at her, "isn't how it's supposed to be."

"Cas, I—" she started, but was cut off by a familiar, gravelly shout over somewhere behind the other cars.

"Hey! You two clowns comin'?" One of the Deans yelled. The other one bellowed, "We don't got all day!"

Cas and Alex looked at each other a moment longer. There was so much more to say. But it would have to wait. Or never be said at all.

"Coming, Deans," Alex called back, then turned her gaze back to Cas. "Cas..." she started, but she was cut off when he unexpectedly drew her into a tight, impulsive, earnest hug. His arms felt strong around her and his hand cradled the back of her head. His face was buried in the side of her hair. He trembled and Alex was taken aback at him yet again. He was so human. She slowly put her arms around him too, noticing how their bodies fit so well. How safe his arms felt. Her emotions were going haywire, her throat felt tight. She shut her eyes tight, trying to steady her breathing.

When he drew back, just a little, there were tears swimming in his eyes. "Thank you," he said softly and stroked his hand down the side of her head, his fingers in her hair, his eyes holding hers. He leaned in again and kissed her cheek softly, slowly, and his eyebrows drew together deeply, making him look grieving as he did it. She leaned into his touch helplessly, softened into the warm press of his lips, inhaling his woodsy scent. Alex was left to wonder who it was he was kissing. Her, or the Alex from his time? Either way, she felt deeply touched and confused all at once. She felt love in his touch and it almost broke her. A tear slid down Cas's cheek and his hand tightened on the back of her head, like he was trying to hold onto something he knew was already lost.

"Alex! Double time!" One of the Deans was calling, and the moment was interrupted.

Cas pulled back, let go of her and with surprising deftness he composed himself, flashed her a crooked, disarming grin despite his inner turmoil. "Wanna go kill the devil?"

Alex's eyes rested on his face and a soft, sad smile spread across her lips. He intrigued her, burdened her, and made her ache, this Castiel. He hid his pain so well. But not so well that she couldn't see it. "Sounds good," she answered, trying to match his tone of voice. But she sounded soft and sad, like she felt.

Cas gave her an understanding, bittersweet smile, then headed toward the back of his truck and pulled out their guns as Alex smoothed her hair, straightened her tank top… both of which had gotten a little askew and disheveled during the kiss. Cas saw her straighten herself, and gave her the smallest little coy smile at that—like they shared a fun little secret—and he looked so boyish, so much younger in that moment. She smiled back, suddenly feeling shy—she tucked some hair behind her ear. He hoisted his gun, and then tossed her hers. For a moment, Alex didn't ever want to leave 2014.

Dean and Dean headed up the group, taking the lead about ten paces in front of everyone. 2014 Dean glanced back at Cas, Risa, and Alex, noticing that Cas and Alex were close to each other, that Cas kept looking at Alex every few seconds. Dean gritted his teeth, stepped a little closer to himself. If this guy really was him in 2009, which he was pretty sure he was, then he deserved a warning.

"Hey, word to the wise," he said, garnering a cursory sidelong glance from himself. "Keep Cas and Alex away from each other, you hear me? If it weren't for him, she'd still be alive."

"Huh?" Dean asked, clearly not following.

"Just do what I said," Dean insisted in a harsh, low voice. "Put a damn end to it. Don't let them be together."

"Cas and Alex?" Dean asked in a low, disbelieving voice. "Like, as in, together?" He suddenly seemed to think it was a joke, and chuckled. "Come on, man. What're you smoking?"

"Just shut up," Dean snapped, exceedingly annoyed with himself. "Trust me. He is her death sentence." He grabbed his other self by the shirt, demanding the other one's gaze. "She dies, dude, you get that? And that's on him. I didn't know, I didn't have a chance of stopping it. Now you do." He shoved him away. "So I hope to god you do something about it, man." He clenched his jaw, then stalked away.

Dean sobered, looked back behind them at where Alex and Cas followed. The way future-Dean had said that didn't sound like he was lying.

Just outside the Jackson County Sanitarium, Alex glanced again in the direction that both Deans had gone about five minutes ago. They only had a couple more minutes until they stormed the building ahead of them where Lucifer was.

After her Dean had asked for 'a word with himself,' the two Deans had disappeared behind a building. She didn't think she could wait any longer, and turned to Cas, who was beside her. "I'm gonna go find the Deans."
"I'll come with you," he said, but she shook her head, standing up.

"No. I'll be right back."

He stood up too, looking terrified. "No, Alex, I can't let you go alone."

She stopped, looking at him plainly, warningly. The small group didn't need to be any more disbanded than it already was, and the Deans were just around the other side of a building within earshot. "Stay here," she repeated. "I'll be back." She paused, looked at him and gave him the smallest, saddest smile. He stood tall and brave, a gun slung across his body and 'fighter' written across everything about him. And at her command he looked conflicted but he stepped back, silently agreeing to stay behind.

Castiel watched as she left—and even though that wasn't his Alex—not completely—it was still Alex. And he would always love any version of her. From any time or dimension, she was the one his heart had decided to love.

Alex hurried off, not knowing that was the last time she would see that version of Cas. If she had known, she would have looked back at him again. But she hadn't known. And she didn't look back.

She darted over to the building she'd seen the Deans go behind, and when she rounded the corner, she stopped short—one Dean was standing over the unconscious form of the other. "Son of a bitch," she muttered, cautiously approaching Dean. It wasn't her Dean. Her Dean was the one laying on the ground. "Care to explain?" she demanded suspiciously, very aware of where her weapon was and contemplating using it.

"Just a little... disagreement," he said, eyeing her with a look she didn't like.

"A little disagreement that ended with you knocking my Dean out? My ass. You liar."

He shook his head, laughed a little—a sound tinged by sadness. "Goddamit kid I've missed you." The smile faded. "Forgot how sassy you are." He looked oddly stricken, but only for a second. He lunged and reached out and grabbed her hard by the arm. "Sorry, Al. I recognize that look. You were about to run. Well, I can't let you do that. See, Dean here was gonna warn everyone that I'm going in the back while they go in the front."

Alex didn't pull away. She was too shocked at what this meant. "You're using those people as a diversion? Even Cas?"

Dean yanked her closer. "I have to!" He was breathing hard, and his eyes were crazed, wild. "I got to kill Lucifer, and I've run out of damn options—what the hell else am I supposed to do?"

Alex opened her mouth to argue with him, but he cut her off. "Listen to me, Alex. Do not get involved with Cas. I'm begging you." He paused, his face full of a pain she hadn't seen there before. "He's the signature on your death certificate."

"What do you mean?" She asked, not sure if he were insane or delusional or what.

He just shook his head, looked at her sadly. "I'm sorry about this. I am." Without hesitation, he drew back and punched her, hard, and she fell to the ground unconscious. Dean Winchester stood over his baby sister, breathing hard, unable to believe himself on the one hand, but also to the point where he couldn't afford to care anymore. He had one thing left to do. One thing. Kill the devil. And he wasn't going to let his sister or himself stand in the way.

Dean dragged Alex about fifty feet off, down an alleyway. He crammed her between a dumpster and a trashcan, figuring that when the 2009 Dean woke up, if he couldn't find Alex, that would stall him a little. Dean looked at his unconscious sister, and allowed himself a final moment of gentleness. He knelt down and moved her hair off of her face. She really was so beautiful. She had been so full of life. Bitterness swelled in his heart as he remembered the day she died in 2013. It wasn't right, and it wasn't fair—everyone he loved had died. He stood up, Colt in hand. Well, now it was the devil's turn.

When Alex came to, she sat up, breathless, panicked, and beside a smelly dumpster. Shit! How long had she been out? She scrambled to her feet and ran, trying to find her bearings. There was wind and lightning, but no other sounds—no gunfire, no shouting. She rounded a corner, and halted almost in mid-step—in front of her, Dean and—"Sam?"

He was wearing a white suit, and looked at her with an odd, lifeless smile. "Hello, Alexandra."
Beside her, Dean was shaking his head. "That's not Sam, Alex. That's Lucifer."

"What?" Alex breathed, suddenly understanding why Zachariah had told made them come here, had insisted they needed to see. "No..."

Lucifer laughed a little at her protest. "Oh, yes, Alexandra. Yes." Absolute horror overcame Alex.

Lucifer then looked at Dean, a patronizing smile on his face. "While this little family reunion of ours has been sweet, honestly, I have things to do." He looked at both in turn. "Goodbye. We'll meet again soon." He turned to go.

"You better kill us now!" Dean shouted.

Lucifer turned back around. "Pardon?"

"You better kill me now. Or I swear, I will find a way to kill you. And if I don't find a way, she will. One of us will be the end of you, I swear to you."

"Fascinating. Well, I swear this to you. You won't say yes to Michael. You won't kill Sam, you won't be able to save Alex from her own foolish choices..." He shrugged almost modestly.
"Whatever you do, you will always end up here. Sam will die, Alex will die. Nothing you can do will change that. Whatever choices you make, whatever details you alter, we will always end up—here. I win."

Dean shook his head, his expression completely tortured. "You're wrong."

Lucifer just smiled. "See you in five years, Dean."

There was a ground-shaking roll of thunder, and lightning seemed to crack the sky in two. And Lucifer was gone. Alex and Dean looked at each other, aghast. Then Dean grabbed at Alex, catching sight of something behind them—Zachariah, and he was reaching for them.

Suddenly, they were in the quiet motel room in Kansas City. Alex almost fell over, dizzy from the sudden change.

"So, Winchesters." The two of them turned to see Zachariah behind them, smiling.

"Oh, well, if it isn't the ghost of Christmas screw you," Dean growled.

The angel ignored the comment, looking between both of them animatedly. "You saw it, right?
Both of you! You saw what happens. Dean, you're the only person who can prove the devil wrong.
Alex, you're reasonable… tell your brother here—just say yes. Avoid all that pain, all the sad outcomes, all the death and guilt." He raised his eyebrows, smiled a little bigger. "Huh, Dean? What do you say?"

Alex looked at Dean, and for a moment, she had no idea what he would say, what he would do—they had just been to a future where Sam's body was Lucifer's vessel, where Alex was dead, where Dean was a shell of himself.

Dean turned away from Zachariah. "I say… nah."

"'Nah?'" Zachariah's smile was gone. "You telling me you haven't learned your lesson?"

Dean turned back around. "Oh, I've learned a lesson, all right. Just not the one you wanted to teach." He stood in front of Alex protectively, but she wasn't sure what good that would do. Zachariah could probably rip them to shreds with a single thought. Still, she inched a little closer to her big brother.

"Well, I'll just have to teach it again!" Zachariah said, his expression murderous. "Because I got you now, boy, and I'm never letting you—"

And suddenly, they were somewhere else entirely, standing beside a road, under the light of a street lamp. And there, between them, holding them each at the arm above the elbow, was Castiel. He gave them a little smile as he let go.

"That's pretty nice timing, Cas," Dean commented, looking at Cas with a lot of relief. Alex was doing the same—seeing Cas as he was supposed to be—trench coat, clean-shaven, looking in his right mind—almost counteracted all the heaviness of the past three days spent in 2014. Almost.

"We had an appointment," Cas was replying to Dean, the ghost of a smile touching his lips.

Dean put a hand on his shoulder. "Cas… don't ever change." Cas smiled a little more at Dean, then looked at Alex. His expression flickered, as if he were noticing something off. She looked away, her pulse a little faster than normal. He contemplated her a moment longer, then turned his gaze to her brother.

"How did Zachariah find you?" he asked Dean.

"Long story. Let's just stay away from Jehovah's Witnesses from now on, okay?" Dean pulled out his phone.

"What're you doing?" Cas asked. Dean glanced at him as he scrolled through his contacts.

"Something I should have done in the first place. Calling Sam." He walked a couple steps off, phone to his ear.

Thank God, Alex thought. At least one good thing would come out of that crazy trip to the future. She glanced up again. Cas was watching her intently and she couldn't help it… she looked at him strangely, seeing the Cas she'd met in 2014. "Alex. What happened? What did Zachariah do?"

She still couldn't quite look him in the eyes. "He, uh, sent us to twenty-fourteen. To see the future. What he said would happen, if… if we don't stop it. If Dean doesn't say yes to Michael." She trailed off, finally looked at him from under her lashes, her chest aching with sadness. "It was, uh, pretty… crazy."

He was frowning intently. "In what way?"
"Um." She was having trouble forming sentences. "Try every way." She looked at him kind of sidelong, trying to reconcile the Cas of 2014 with this one. They didn't even seem like the same person—and she couldn't help but remember, in torturous detail, what she and the Cas from 2014 had done beside a beat up old truck, how he'd hugged her and held her and kissed her cheek and the life they'd apparently shared in a cabin, together. She almost felt ashamed, like she had done something behind this Cas's back—but it had been with him, only, a later version of him, right? Alex tried to keep eye contact, tried to appear fine and normal.

Castiel frowned slightly, his eyes narrowed in confusion as he looked at her. "What is it?"

"What? Nothing..." she said, looking at him and shaking her head, trying hard to appear normal. But he didn't seem to be buying it.

His head was tilted to the side. "You've never looked at me like that before." Castiel said. His words made her wither and Alex felt entirely vulnerable, as if she had been found out. "What is it?" He asked. He sounded distinctly suspicious, or maybe it was her guilty, confused conscience. He had stepped closer, and she was looking up at him, similarly to the last time she had, right before they had kissed. She couldn't control herself. She was breathing faster, remembering every little detail of those lips, that mouth—oh god. It all flooded her mind at once. The cabin, Cas's drug addiction, the sight of tears in his eyes, the feeling of his arms hugging her so tightly. His almost-confession of love. She swallowed, shook her head, tried to brush off his question. "Something's wrong," he insisted levelly, searching her eyes.

She shook her head, trying to think of anything but this man in front of her. "No. I'm fine. I'm... totally fine. It was just, a really dark future and uh, I had a hard time with it." Well, that was true enough, wasn't it. "And I feel really, really run over by it, really overwhelmed and not sure of, stuff, and uh emotional things, that's all." She wanted to die. She sounded like a stuttering, fumbling mess.

Cas seemed to let it go. But he was still looking at her suspiciously. Dean was coming back, putting his phone in his pocket. His intrusion was a blessed relief. "So, Sam's gonna meet us halfway."

Speaking of Sam... Alex looked at Dean closely, suddenly anxious for another reason entirely. "Dean, did you know? About Sam being Lucifer's vessel?"

At that, Cas looked distinctly surprised, but stayed silent, just listening as Dean replied.

"Yeah. The other me told me. And, actually, Sam told me. Last night, here in two-thousand nine, when he called in the middle of the night."

Alex was hurt, immediately. He had never once mentioned anything to her about it, and it wasn't because he'd lacked opportunity. "Why didn't you tell me?"

Her brother gave her a hooded glance. "Dunno. Guess I hoped it wasn't true," Dean said. "I didn't want you to be worried if you didn't have to be." He shook his head, looked at Cas, who had been listening silently. "Cas, I begged myself to say yes to the angels."

Cas squinted. "I don't fully understand that sentence."

Dean paused. "Right. It's kinda trippy. Long story, actually. Listen, can we just fill you in later? I'm tired as hell and me and Al need to hit the road if we're gonna meet Sammy in the morning."

Cas nodded. "Of course. You have my number."
Dean held up a finger. "Can you bring the Impala here, or…?"

"Oh. Of course." Cas disappeared for all of three seconds, and suddenly, the Impala was right there in front of them, sitting on the side of the street, and Cas was where he had been three seconds ago.

Beaming, Dean clapped Cas on the shoulder. "You are one handy guy to have around, Cas," he said, fully pleased.

"Thank you. Call me when you are ready to discuss the events of this journey to two thousand and fourteen," Cas said.

"We will," Dean said.

Cas glanced at Alex, who had already been looking at him. And then he was gone.

Life was back to normal again. Dean driving the Impala, Alex in the passenger seat. Except she felt like everything had changed. Seeing a future where you died, your family shattered to pieces, your angel fell apart at the seams… it left her feeling tired, heavy, afraid. "You're awful quiet," Dean commented, as if reading her mind.

"A lot on my mind," she replied vaguely.

"Me too. Glad we got outta there," He chuckled. "I was such a friggin' jerk, huh?"

She shrugged. She didn't feel in the mood for joking. She could feel Dean looking at her sidelong. "Listen," he said. "I know this much for a fact. You're not dying in twenty-thirteen. Sam is not gonna be Lucy's chew toy. And, hell. Cas isn't gonna end up a mystic stoner guy. Not if I have anything to do with it. That version of the future will not happen."

Alex looked out her window, troubled. "But what if it does? Lucifer said—"

"Aw come on, you're gonna listen to that twerp?" Alex gave him a weird look—he had just called Satan a twerp. Only Dean. "Nope," he said authoritatively. "I'm changing the damn story. Screw fate. Calling Sam, getting him here back with us—that changes everything." Alex looked down at her lap. She hoped that was true. Dean cleared his throat. "Listen, I told myself… er, the twenty-fourteen me told me to watch out for something. For you and Cas. As in, together."

Oh shit. Alex scowled, immediately feeling like she had been discovered. She immediately scoffed. "Don't be ridiculous."

"Don't be ridiculous."

Dean looked at her intently between glances at the road. "You're not, I dunno, into him, or…?"

"Dean!" Alex exclaimed, hurriedly trying to get him off this awkward train track. "Cas isn't even a human being. Do you hear what you're asking me? Come on. The guy is practically asexual." She went silent. She had actually kind of believed that herself, until the whole brothel thing. Now, with that and a full blown make-out session with future-him under her belt, she wasn't so sure. However, she was still talking, trying to convince him otherwise and get him to stop asking. "Twenty-fourteen Dean had it all wrong. The guy was a nutcase. No offense. Now shut up, you're giving me a headache."

"Fine, whatever. All I know is I'm not letting Lucifer get Sam. I don't care whatever else happens. Not my family."

Alex stared out of the window if the Impala, not even fully hearing Dean. She was replaying the memories of 2014 over and over, unable to stop herself. She almost wished she hadn't kissed that future version of Cas, because now, she would never be able to look at the current version of Cas without remembering, without wanting more of the same. Her body could still remember how his hands, his hips, his arms, his mouth had all felt in excruciating detail. She shivered a little, but not from the cold. Maybe the most torturous part of the memory was the way he'd held her and kissed her cheek. She'd felt the way he loved her in that embrace and touch. Felt it in every part of herself.

She reached into her pocket, fingers touching the very real little yellow flower she had taken off of her grave. The flower he'd put there. She pulled it out gently and looked at it, twirling it somberly between her thumb and forefinger. The future looming ahead was deeply concerning. Terrifying even. But with each passing second, they were steadily moving toward it, no way of stopping the hands of time.

2014

Cas held himself up at the window just barely, watching as Alex and Dean confronted Lucifer, then disappeared when Zachariah touched them. And with the knowledge that they survived, that they had gone back to their own time, Cas let go, too weak to support himself. He fell over and rolled over onto his back, his own blood pooling all around him from several gunshot wounds he'd sustained. When Dean had returned with no 2009 Dean or Alex, Cas had almost lost his mind with worry, had almost decked Dean right then and there, accusing him of being an idiot, of risking their lives. Dean had commanded him to "calm the hell down, chill out Cas, they went inside ahead of us, okay?!" And sickened because he had known he shouldn't have let her out of his sight, Cas had stormed the compound, so afraid that she would die again and he would stand by again and let it happen again.

He groaned painfully, coughing and shaking. But at least he knew Zachariah had spirited them away, back to the year they had come from. A small assurance as he laid dying.

He stared at the ceiling in agony, trying with the last of his strength to pull out the photo in his pocket, the one he always carried. His hand shook violently as he brought the wrinkled photo close to his face. Even through his pain, his face relaxed briefly as he gazed at the picture—in it, he and Alex stood proudly wielding guns and confident smirks. They stood shoulder to shoulder. Partners. In life together, no matter what. He remembered how happy they were then, despite the shape of the world around them.

His eyes went to her torso, and he felt his throat clench as his thumb traced across her stomach on the photograph. She hadn't been that far along. Tears sprang into his eyes as he looked at the woman he loved, carrying his unborn child, the child who never had a chance, the child only he and she had known about and had been very surprised by—a blessed secret they had treasured together in the private, quiet, space of their relationship. Cas felt the tears running down his face now. The photograph had been taken just a week before they both died. One week after this photo was taken, he would be forced to kill both the woman he loved and the child she carried.

He remembered how she had begged him through tears, screaming for him to shoot her before the change, before she could turn on him. He had in turn begged her not to make him, said he couldn't, couldn't—she had grabbed his gun, pulled the barrel into her stomach, told him he had to. He knew she was right, but God. It had taken everything, everything to pull the trigger.

The sound of the gunshot still haunted his every waking moment, his every sleepless night.

He remembered her shallow breaths, her blood all over his shirt, his trembling hands. And then, as only she could, she smiled at him through her pain, touched the side of his face, whispered something only for them to know. And they had shared one last, tender, goodbye kiss. Tasted each other's tears. She'd held his gaze, and she'd been afraid. She'd clutched one of his hands, trying not to be. He remembered thinking, how did this happen? How did I let this happen to her? He held himself together, just a little longer so that the last thing she saw wasn't him falling apart at the seams. She would want him to carry on and be strong. And even though he had known that he couldn't carry on without her, he wanted her to think he would. He remembered his choked sobs as she died—her warm body going slack in his arms, her head falling to the side, the life leaving her. That day, he had learned what it meant to weep, to hope beyond any logical method that a moment wasn't real, to beg a god who wasn't even there to please fucking change this! To Castiel, that moment was like dying, but the worst part was that he had to go on living.

In all the thousands and thousands of years he'd existed, he hadn't lived until he had met her. And that day, when she died, it was like he had died, too.

Cas clenched the photo tightly, his vision wavering, his breathing labored. He blinked rapidly, his vision going dark. This was the end, but he suddenly didn't feel ready. He began begging whatever God or power out there to save the one he loved from this outcome, this reality.

This time, let the ending be different. Please, please, please... give us one more try, a chance to live. And if not me, then at least for her.

He blinked unevenly, as if sleepy.

And unable to hold onto life any longer, Castiel let out his last shuddering breath and closed his eyes for the very last time.
"And every silence all around me is screaming through the walls."
- Copeland

Tore Me Down

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Later That Day

Dean and Alex got out of the Impala at the same time, slamming their doors in unplanned unison. Their hands went into their jacket pockets as they leaned back on opposite sides of the car, facing different directions—Sam would meet them here soon, just as agreed—and Alex was anxious for him to get there so she could maybe be distracted from herself. The late afternoon was cool and gloomy, a misty fog blanketing the landscape. There was the harsh cackling call of a crow somewhere nearby, and the muted whooshes of cars passing by on the highway.

"You okay, Alex?" From the sound of his voice, she could tell her brother had turned his head slightly toward her.

Was she okay. That question was seriously laughable. Inside her jacket pocket, her fingers moved against the wilting yellow flower there. All she could do was shrug a little, her back still to him. "I guess."

There was a short silence, then a soft attempt at a chuckle. "Yeah, me neither."

She heard him shift, breathe deeply, and let it out a troubled sigh. She knew he was thinking about everything they had seen in 2014. A world gone to complete and utter hell. Horrifying. Haunting. She hadn't slept since, actually, even though she was exhausted and needed rest badly. All she could do was remember, remember. In graphic detail, and each time she remembered, it horrified her even more. Lucifer, in Sam's body—no light or life in his eyes, only chilling malice—Dean, a broken, harsh shell of a man who had lost his way—and… Cas. Alex shut her eyes at the thought of him, pained to the point that she felt she might lose control.

Castiel. Never in a hundred years would she have guessed he could ever turn out like that—fallen from grace and a messed up human just like the rest of them. Beaten, broken, scarred, destroyed in ways she didn't even really understand. And in love with her…

How do you come back from that? From going to the future and finding out the angel who saved your life, your brother's life, restored your voice, defied Heaven to help your family… that all he wanted before going to his death was a kiss to remember you by? And then, how did you deal with the fact that in that man's arms, under the spell of his kiss was the most alive you had ever felt? And how did you even begin to confront the floodgate of intense feelings it all set free inside—feelings you hadn't even known existed at all? Or maybe you had known they existed somewhere deep down… but had tried your damnedest to ignore them and push them away.

Alex didn't know how to process any of it, and felt like she was suffocating inside. If in the moment when it had happened she had felt overwhelmed, she now felt crazy. There were so many thoughts zipping through her mind, and all conflicting, jumbled, confused. She felt almost guilty, like the Castiel she knew now would be shocked to find out, or that he would be offended or hurt.
Maybe he wouldn't though, how could she know? Would he even care one way or another? Would he understand any of it? She sure as hell didn't. It was literally making her head hurt.

She knew one thing: she hadn't been able to stop thinking of him, both of him. She was trying to figure out when the one she knew now in this present time became that Cas, the one who had so obviously loved her. Was it after the angels left and he became human? Had it happened before then? Moreover, when had she begun to feel that way about him? Although, if she were honest with herself… hadn't she already started, a little bit? ...More than a little bit? She knew the answer was yes, even though she didn't want to admit it to herself. It was terrifying to her.

Cas had blown through her life like a tornado, and in his wake left so many moments that alone might not have meant much—but piled on top of each other, they now seemed to take up her entire heart. She remembered at first not trusting him and wishing he would screw off and stop messing up her life. Those feelings had changed very quickly into grudging, reluctant tolerance. Then she had unconsciously come to some kind of appreciative, curious interest in him, in who this angel was. When he'd told her he was the one who'd given her a voice again... she'd looked at him in whole new light. And now? She didn't want to think about it. But if he disappeared tomorrow and never reappeared, she would not be okay.

Dammit. She closed her eyes, remembering a clutter of moments and sensations in rapid succession. Every time he'd healed her—the touch of his hand, the blazing intensity in his eyes. How he hadn't understood her anger at him about his blind allegiance and unquestioning obedience to Heaven—the look on his face any number of times she'd bitched him out. That look on his face any time she'd been hurt, even just a little bit. When he had healed her injuries with Uriel in the same damn room even after he'd been told to stop. Him healing her voice. Him healing her voice.
She still wasn't over that one. And other moments stuck out in her mind, odder moments. That little sassy question he'd posed to her about romance novels, in the dark, on a porch under the stars. How easily she had tricked him into thinking a pinky promise was a deadly-serious binding agreement, but then when he understood, when he got it… how proud he'd looked. She opened her eyes again, but the memories kept coming.

She thought about his disobedience to Heaven for the sole purpose of giving her and Dean a chance to stop Sam, to stop Lucifer—when Chuck told them Cas was dead, her stomach had dropped and her body had seized up. She had cared, she had been affected, she had been distraught inside.

She thought about how he wouldn't drop it, earlier that very day, when he asked what was wrong, she'd lied to his face and said nothing. And he hadn't believed her. Her breathing hitched slightly, as she realized that she was pretty sure Cas wouldn't have even known or picked up on that a few months ago. He was learning her. She wasn't sure if that made her feel afraid or something else entirely…

Again she thought of what he'd given her. Her voice—the gift of speech. When she really thought about it, her body threatened to break down into tears. How could someone do such a beautiful thing for her? How had she ever deserved that kindness? When he said it cost him a lot, she believed that. She was afraid to find out what it had cost him.

All these moments and more had collected inside of her and she didn't know how to undo what they had done to her. Cas had gotten under her skin without her even realizing. He was so unassuming in that way. She hadn't guarded herself well enough, because she hadn't expected it. Not only because she never really anticipated having any kind of real relationship with a man—but because he wasn't a man. He was an angel. The body he inhabited wasn't even his—that was a man named Jimmy Novak. She forgot sometimes that Castiel was that blinding light that had glowe underneath his skin when he healed, when he exorcised. That the physical appearance of Jimmy Novak wasn't Cas at all. That Castiel was some kind of heavenly, celestial spirit who had traversed the universe for a thousands—hundreds of thousands?—of years. But even when she thought about this massive, baffling reality… it changed nothing about the way she felt.

It was stupid to feel that way about someone you would never even have a chance with. It was like high school all over again, the one time she'd had a crush on that artist guy in ninth grade. He'd never noticed her, even though she'd tried so hard to get his attention. It had broken her heart. This was that, all over again, but with a weird twist in fate where she'd traveled ahead in time (to a future that she had to ensure would never happen) where she did get the guy. It was like fate got off on torturing her. And damn, did it know how. That kiss, his embrace and words, the look in Cas's eyes had unlocked things inside her. Things she wanted now to forget. Because it would be easier not to remember that moment—the way he held her with such a tender longing, reverence, desire. She could still remember the way every part of him felt against her in the kiss that they had drowned each other in. She remembered how he'd held her and trembled, his hand against the back of her head. Was that what it felt like to be loved?

Her thoughts made her breathing a little shorter. It made her feel a little ill. How the hell was she supposed to deal with this? The more she thought about it, the sicker and more confused she felt. She didn't understand, and she wasn't sure if it were real at all. Maybe it was an elaborate prank by Zachariah designed to get to her, to mess with her head. Well, it had worked. Whatever confused feelings she had about Cas before were even worse. No, not worse, well yes, worse. And stronger. She didn't want to have them at all, because it was too much. She allowed herself to wonder if Cas, the one in her time here in 2009, if he cared about her in that way at all. She wanted to laugh at this point. She just couldn't imagine him choosing her in any version of reality. It just made no sense—she was the most abysmal excuse for a person, let alone a woman… it had to be a cruel joke.

"There he is," Dean said, and Alex started, remembering where she was. She looked up, momentarily distracted, thankfully, from her chaotic, spilling thoughts. She could see a dark car rolling toward them up the dirt road out of the fog, and she stood straight, no longer leaning against the Impala. The car pulled to a stop.

Sam's familiar, hulking figure got out of the car, and Alex went to him, almost running the last two steps. For a moment, she was just so glad to see her brother again, in one piece and not possessed by the devil. She momentarily didn't care about all the crap between them, all the water under the bridge—she was just relieved, so, so relieved. They hugged tightly for a minute. Alex looked up at him tensely. "You okay?" she asked, searching his face.

"Yeah," he said. He looked strained and nervous, but happy to see her, too. "It's really good to see you. I've missed you guys."

Dean, who had sauntered up slowly, was more reserved. "Sam."

Sam's expression fell a little bit. And then Dean pulled out Ruby's knife. For a second, Sam and Alex both stared at it nervously, but then Dean held it out to Sam, handle first. "If you're serious and you want back in… you should hang onto this. I'm sure you're rusty." Sam accepted the blade with hesitation, and Dean sighed, getting ready to apologize. "Look, man, I'm sorry. I don't know. But I was, uh—wrong."

Sam looked at Alex, then back at Dean. "What made you change your mind?"

Dean and Alex looked at each other very briefly. "Long story," Dean said. "The point is… maybe we are each other's Achilles heel. Maybe they'll always find a way to use the two of us or the three of us against each other, I don't know. I just know we're all we've got. More than that—we keep each other human. We keep each other alive."

Sam looked touched by the words. "Thank you. Really. Thank you. I won't let you down." He looked at Alex. "Either of you." She gave him an attempt at a smile. Sam took a deep breath, fixed Dean with an intent gaze. "So, what now?"

"We make our own future," Dean said, shrugging, trying to seem confident and unaffected. But Alex noticed how tensely he held himself.

Sam considered then nodded at Dean's statement, sort of hesitant and earnest at the same time. "Okay. Yeah. Sounds good."

Dean turned and headed back to the Impala, obviously waiting for his siblings to follow, but Sam had fixed Alex with this inquisitive, close look. "Alex, you okay?"

She wasn't really able to maintain steady eye contact at his question, tone, and stare. She tried to sound convincing. "Uh, yeah, Sam. I'm fine." She gave him a thin-lipped smile, which she could tell he didn't buy—but after a lifetime of "I'm fines" on all three sides, maybe they had learned that fine wasn't a thing they would ever be again. He didn't say anything else.

She stared at the ground as she walked. No. She definitely wasn't fine.

---

That Night

Dean looked closely at Alex to make sure she was really asleep. She was breathing deeply, evenly, her mouth open a little bit. She was exhausted (hell, he was too)—but she hadn't slept at all in the three days they visited 2014 except in Cas's truck for maybe an hour. So, she was pretty conked out now. She slept with her arms crossed, on her side, head kind of turned into the pillow, hair all over her face, her breathing wheezy and deep. Yup, definitely asleep. She always looked so ridiculous asleep, and a little smirk tugged at Dean's mouth. He turned, beer in hand, and sat across from Sam in the dim motel room, focusing on his brother now, his momentary amusement at Alex fading. He really didn't want to have this conversation, but he knew he'd been putting it off for far too long now. With Sam back, with everything he'd seen, it was time. He'd already told Sam briefly about 2014 on the car ride that day, but there was something else, something that felt even bigger and darker eating at him.

He waited a couple seconds, getting up the nerve, while Sam typed away on the laptop, not paying attention. He cleared his throat gruffly. "Okay, look, Sam. We gotta talk."

Sam glanced up curiously, ceasing to type. "About?"

Dean had his hands clasped on the table, and a tense jaw, his beer now sitting to the side, forgotten. "You're not gonna like it."

Sam hesitantly nodded, as if he understood. He shut his laptop, picking up on the fact that this was going to warrant his full attention. "The demon blood? Yeah, I kinda figured you'd want to talk about it. We haven't yet, I mean, not in depth." He paused, looking down, an exasperated little smile on his face, his eyebrows shooting up. "You kinda didn't let me before."

Dean ignored Sam's passive aggressive comment, cutting to the chase—it wasn't demon blood he wanted to talk about, not really. There was something almost worse. "I, uh, I know I promised you a few years ago we wouldn't talk about this, uh, particular incident again, but after everything that's happened… I think we gotta." He looked at Sam meaningfully, and for a second, his brother stared, confused. And then chilled understanding washed over Sam's face, and he went totally still and silent. He looked at Dean with a questioning, dread-filled gaze. Dean forced himself to maintain eye contact. "Come on, Sam—I just came back from five years in the future where you said yes to Lucifer and the world went to hell because of it. I need to make sure that's not gonna happen."

Sam's chin was low, his eyes staring at Dean balefully, nostrils flared. "It won't."

"How do you know that, huh?" Dean challenged. "I've been thinking about it, and hard too. All the things you've done up to now." He paused weightily. "And not just recently."

Sam looked cornered and pissed. "Dean, you promised we wouldn't talk about that again."

"Yeah well that was before I knew you were Lucifer's friggin' vessel," Dean retorted, a little loudly. Sam's eyes fell away from his.

Dean's jaw worked, clenching and unclenching. He wanted to get up and walk away, but he needed to keep going. He stared Sam down. "Look, all I know is that I got to keep this family safe. And lately I've been thinking, do I have to keep this family safe from you?" Sam's eyes snapped up to his. "I need you to be straight with me. If we're gonna hunt together, if you're gonna sleep in the same room as Alex, you need to tell me you're not gonna go down that road. I need to know you are not going to say yes to Lucifer, no matter what."

Sam just looked at him, sullen and tense. "I told you. I'm not."

Dean sat back in his chair, at a bit of a loss at Sam's short answers, and getting mad. "You're gonna have to do a little bit better than that, Sam. I mean I hate to say it, but it makes sense now. Lucifer, wanting you."

Sam was glaring at the table, his cheeks hollow from his clenched jaw. "Because of the things I did as a kid."

Dean's eyes dropped, staring unseeingly into his lap. "Yeah."

Their eyes met at the same instant, guarded and mistrustful. Sam wet his lips, obviously trying to stay collected. "Look, I haven't done any of that stuff in like fifteen years, maybe more." He paused. "I promise." He looked earnest and hurt, which only further pissed Dean off.

Dean leaned in, voice a little lower. "Yeah, you're a real nice guy aren't you. You think I buy that sensitive, understanding crap you peddle? I've known you your whole life, Sam. And I know you're not really that guy."

Sam looked stung and fearful, and Dean just looked at him, grim. "I remember, Sam. You probably think I forgot, right?"

"What, Dean?" Sam muttered, looking like he was trying to brush it off, "It was just angsty kid stuff, like me trying to deal with being angry about everything. So what, I started a few fires at a couple schools, stole some stuff? No one was hurt, no one found out it was me."

"I found out. I did," Dean said gruffly, and paused, feeling physically sick as he thought about it, barely able to look at Sam now. "You're lucky I never told Dad about any of that shit you pulled. But you know the fires and stealing weren't even what I was talking about."

Sam's eyes locked onto Dean's face, and he looked caught, guilty, afraid. There was a very long pause, where he struggled for words. "I—I don't know why I did that. I still don't know why, Dean."
"I do," Dean said grimly. "It was Azazel, Sam. That blood he dripped into your mouth? It pumped through you then when you were a kid. Just like it's pumping through you now."

Sam could say nothing, just looked down, agonized. He was shaking his head in absolute horror. "What I did... it wasn't me."

Dean met his brother's agonized gaze, and he almost choked on the lump in his throat. "Sam... it was you."

It had been a cold fall day. Frost on the ground, dead leaves falling off the trees. Dean and Alex had been playing hide and seek around one of the motels. Dad was gone, as usual. Sam had gone off on his own, probably to the gas station down the street. Maybe Alex was hiding behind the motel? Dean really didn't like it when she decided to get creative about her hiding spots. He always got worried if he couldn't find her right away. He told her a million times not to hide outside of the motels, but sometimes she did anyway, always so amused by his angry rants.

He had looked all over their room—no Alex—he had checked the lobby of the motel—no Alex. So he went around the back of the motel, heard a strange sound, like a cat crying. And rounding the dumpster, he froze at what he saw. Sam sat there in the corner made by the dumpster and the painted brick wall, and for just a couple seconds, he didn't notice Dean—and Dean saw it all. Sam was holding a mewing kitten in his hands. Scattered around Sam were dark furry, bloody lumps—Dean realized with horror that they were dead kittens that had literally pulled to pieces. The word horror was not strong enough for what Dean had felt seeing that.

Sam had seen him, started, face suddenly blank. For a minute, Dean had thought Sam was possessed, had grabbed him up and shoved him against the wall and shouted the exorcism chant—and nothing happened. And that meant the dead kittens, the blood splattered on the ground and on Sam's hands—that meant it was Sam who had done that. Sam. And with fear and shame and horror, Sam had broken down, claimed he didn't know why he did that, that he hadn't known what he was doing, please don't tell Dad, please don't tell Alex, I'm so scared, help me Dean, please help me. Dean had, in stony, scared shitless silence helped Sam get rid of the little kittens torn up bodies, wash the blood off his hands using a hose hookup on the side of the building. And after that, they wouldn't talk about it for years, didn't even acknowledge it had happened. Dean had never quite looked at Sam the same way, and Sam had never quite been able to look at Dean without shame touching the edges of his eyes. They both wanted to pretend it had never happened. But they both knew it had.

Even to this day, any time Dean saw Sam with an animal, he wondered if those kittens had been the first. Or the last. He wanted to believe it had been a crazy, one-off circumstance, but maybe that was denial. Sam had also started fires at school, in gas stations, and had stolen frequently. Dean had covered for him or ignored that stuff completely, figuring it was because they had such a hard childhood, because Sam was trying to express his frustration at the crap life they shared. That Sam just needed an outlet for his anger and disappointment. But... now Dean wished he had seen those signs for what they really were. That Sam was dark inside, and not because of anything he or Dad had done or not done. Because now, after all Sam's betrayals—the demon blood, beating Dean to a pulp, consorting with Ruby, lying constantly—Dean saw that his biggest mistake was blind denial. But he really wanted to believe Sam could conquer this.

Maybe the worst part of what Sam had done was when he ruthlessly attacked Alex. When Dean had watched him standing over her like that, there was a horrible few seconds where Dean thought he is going to kill her. How could he risk that happening again? Because Dean knew, he knew that Sam was still struggling with this problem, this addiction. But there was this desperation to believe that Sam could change, could control himself, could fight the disease inside.
"Dean." Looking up, startled out of his gruesome thoughts, Dean realized Sam was staring at him, a little accusingly. "Listen, you said you'd stop holding that stuff over my head. So are you going to let it go, or aren't you?" Dean said nothing, and Sam's eyebrows knit together. "I would do anything to take it all back."

"Yeah, you've said that before," Dean said dully.

"Because I mean it," Sam insisted, angry again.

Dean looked at him long and hard, then took another swig of his beer, not really even tasting the now lukewarm liquid. He set the bottle down, turned it in his hand, staring at it. "Yeah, I said I'd let that stuff stay in the past. But you said you were okay and then I find out a few weeks ago that you're sneaking around behind my back, drinking demon blood, lying to your family through your teeth. You chose a demon over your own family. You literally attacked our little sister as I watched. And you damn near killed me!" Sam looked at Dean resentfully, and Dean just stared back at him. "So, yeah. I got every reason to bring up the past. Because you're not okay."

"Really, Dean? I mean, are any of us okay?" Sam asked with one of those little nervous laughs of his. Dean fell silent and Sam leaned forward intently. "Have you taken a good look at Alex lately?"

"Of course I have dude, I'm the one that's been with her this whole time!" Dean fired back, pissed at Sam's self-righteous attitude and tone. He poked his index finger down hard onto the tabletop for emphasis. "All the years and times you've disappeared, it's been me and her. Dad, not always, you, not so much, but me and her, yeah. Always. So don't you try to tell me I don't know when something is wrong with her. She's fine."

Sam sat back in his seat with his arms crossed, looking at Dean with an air of superior annoyance. "Don't kid yourself, Dean. Something's really eating at her."

"Maybe it's you, Sam!" Dean exploded, shooting up to his feet. "Did you think of that?"

"Why is it always me, Dean?" Sam fired back, on his feet now too. The brothers were now practically shouting, not even remembering it was the dead of night and they weren't alone in the room. "There's a lot more to this than what I did!" Sam roared, getting in Dean's face. "What about what you've done?"

A small, grumpy voice made them both turn. "Guys… it's the middle of the night. What the hell are you yelling about?" Alex was kind of sitting up halfway, looking groggy and annoyed, her hair sticking out to the side.

"Nothing," Dean said, glancing tersely at Sam. "Go back to sleep."

She mumbled something that sounded like 'bite me,' groaned and flopped back down, rolled over and tossed her arm over her head.

Their conversation cut short, the brothers just kind of glared at each other, then Sam sat back down, re-opened his laptop and scowled at the screen, clicking the scroll pad harder than necessary. Dean swiped his beer bottle off the table angrily and paced for a minute, pissed off. It had been a lot easier with Sam gone. A hell of a lot easier.

Whenever Sam was gone, Dean had this tendency to believe they could work through their issues and not fight. And it never went that way, ever. Maybe it was because fate had been building them towards this divide since they had been born; this showdown that was supposed to go down between Michael and Lucifer. Dean scoffed at himself. He didn't even believe in fate—but with a sinking feeling in his stomach, he wondered if he should, if he were being a moron.

Dean glanced at his sleeping sister's form, then at Sam, hunched over the laptop. All Dean could think is that he hoped he wasn't making the biggest mistake of his life. Sam was a good hunter, a decent human being most of the time, and his brother who he loved deeply. But could he be trusted? All he knew is after what Sam had done, this was pretty much the last chance Dean could afford to give. And that thought in itself was heavy enough to break Dean's heart in two. He didn't want to think about it.

So he just sat down on one of the beds and crossed his arms. He wasn't going to sleep until Sam did.

---

One Month Later

Alex smoothed another page of Dad's journal down as she slowly flipped through the pages. She was careful not to wrinkle the pages or leave dog ears. She ran her fingers over words in Dad's bold penmanship. Usually she looked through the journal for the purpose of research. But today she just was missing the way things used to be. When they were younger. Even though it had been shitty, it hadn't been this shitty. She didn't miss Dad as much as she just missed a time when her brothers weren't walking on eggshells around each other and putting her in the middle of it. In fact, she didn't miss Dad much at all. Even thinking that made her feel guilty. But he hadn't been around enough to miss, and when he was around, she never felt like she lived up to his expectations—that, and he'd always been so angry, so volatile. She'd never been able to just be herself around him. It had always felt hopeless and impossible, but she had still tried so hard for so many years to be the kind of daughter he'd be proud of. Alex took her fingers off the page, thinking offhandedly about a nap. Right now, she just wanted to sleep and be dead to the world. She was tired to her bones. Tired, and lonely. She'd been keeping Sam and Dean at arms length because she didn't want them to see how messed up, how afraid, how freaked out she was.

The last month had been silent. No Cas. No angels. No demons. Just monsters of the week. Currently she and her brothers were in Nebraska in a town where people were being killed off by practical jokes—a girl had scratched her brains out after the kid she was babysitting had put itch powder in her brush. She and her brothers had traced the murders back to a boy named Jesse. Somehow—they weren't sure how yet, they had just met him earlier that day—his irrational fears were killing the townspeople.

Alex would have been really fascinated by the case in times past as it was so out there and unusual, even for them... but right now, she didn't even know why they were bothering. Wasn't the world about to end? And here they were doing grocery runs.

She was, in one word, tired. She hadn't slept well in forever, well—her whole life, but it had been worse lately. Lots of nightmares. More than usual. A lot of them involving Cas, the one from 2014. She kept dreaming about him dying alone, laying on the ground and choking on his own blood, afraid and alone. She would wake up sweating, panicked, sometimes even tearful. The weirdest and saddest thing was, if she and her brothers changed fate, she was mourning a person who would never really exist. But he had burned himself onto her heart. She could never forget. She would never forget. She was kind of dreading seeing him again here in 2009, because she didn't know how she could look at him in the eyes without falling apart. But she was also longing for the moment he'd suddenly appear again, too.

The door of the motel opened. It was Dean, by himself, keys jingling as he tossed them down. "Hey," she greeted, glancing up at him momentarily from the journal, trying to appear like she was okay. "Where's Sam?"

"Still out, digging up stuff on the kid," Dean said, and stopped in the middle of the room, looking at her tersely. "You okay?"

She didn't miss the confrontational frown on his face, but instead flipped another page of Dad's journal, not looking at him. "Yeah, fine."

"Uh huh."
He let out a grumpy sounding sigh and came and sat beside her. Alex glanced up at him hostilley, silently warning Dean to back off while he still could, but he just stared back, unimpressed, and then asked, "Okay. So who pissed in your Cheerios today?" Alex gave him a sullen glare. He tried a half-way concerned expression. "Come on Al, level with me. You've seemed… I dunno, kind of out of it for the past few weeks."

Alex looked away silently. She had been expecting this, but still, she didn't want to deal with it. Both Dean and Sam had been giving her looks the past few weeks, trying to see what was wrong with her, why she had been so quiet. She'd been purposefully avoiding them. Making excuses and not talking much.

"Tell me," Dean prompted, and wouldn't look away. It wasn't a threat, but it almost sounded like he was warning her that she'd better or else.

"I don't know," Alex muttered, evasively, defensively. "Nothing."

Dean gave her an annoyed look, crossed his arms. "Bullshit. Total, complete bullshit."

Alex's eyes flicked up to his. "Fine. You wanna know what's wrong? How about every single damn thing, Dean?" She set Dad's journal down, crossed her arms, pissed off. "I used to think this life sucked and that was before the whole apocalypse, Lucifer, Michael thing. So if it didn't suck before, it fucking blows now." She almost laughed. "You wanna know why I'm acting weird? Because I don't think we can win this. I don't."

Silence. Dean seemed surprised by her outburst, confused, as if it didn't make sense to him. "I'm not letting Sam say yes," Dean finally said, as if reminding her of something she should already know, and as if it would fix everything.

Both of her eyebrows shot up. "Letting?" He was serious, and Alex felt herself go cold. "Don't kid yourself. Sam's gonna do what Sam wants to do. He may be trying to play nice right now to earn your good graces back Dean, but seriously. Are you that dumb? Sam's got enough pride to match yours, and then some."

Dean's scowl deepened, he held up his hands defensively. "Whoa, why are you getting on my case?"

"Well someone needs to," Alex snapped. "You're being stubborn and stupid about this. How many times has this exact issue gotten us an inch from losing our lives? Your pride and shortsightedness."

Dean looked stung, but more than that, he looked like he couldn't believe what he was hearing. His scowl had fallen. "You think I'm gonna say yes to Michael."

Alex almost wished she hadn't said anything at this point, because of the look on his face. She was suddenly grasping for a gentle way to be honest, and regretting her rude approach. She looked down, staring absenty at a loose thread on the blanket. "I think they'll find a way to convince you. Whether it's using me or Sam or something else." She looked at him. "Yeah. I do."
His expression was sad. Hurt. "You should trust me more than that. After all we've been through?"

Alex bit the insides of her cheeks. Her voice was unsteady, but she looked at him squarely. She couldn't stop now. "It's because of all we've been through. I know you, Dean. Better than anyone else. They'll figure out a way."

His jaw clenched oddly, he looked down. For a minute, she thought he was going to concede that she was right. Then he shook his head, frowning deeply, and stood up, walked away. "No. You're wrong. I am not gonna say yes. I don't care what those sons of bitches threaten, what future they show me…" He turned back around, and he had this look on his face like complete conviction. "We're gonna find a way to avoid all of this. Fate and destiny and all that crap? I'm not letting it dictate my life." He looked like he was over it, done. "And by the way, do me a favor and stop feeling sorry for yourself all the damn time."

"That's not fair!" Alex protested, standing up, almost shaking at his left-field, blase assumption. She was fighting tears all the sudden, tears that had come out of nowhere. "I'm not… feeling sorry for myself." She stared at him a second fearfully. "I'm scared, Dean."

Her brother looked a little taken aback, like he hadn't even considered that. Alex looked down, just kind of sad and quiet as she continued talking. "I don't wanna be afraid anymore." She looked at her brother pleadingly. "But have you looked at our family lately? We're torn apart. It's been nothing but fights and tension and us barely able to hold it together. I can't concentrate, I can't think straight. I can't sleep at night. I'm never hungry. All I can think about is what the future is gonna look like for us. Because if we're not together in this—the three of us, I don't think we stand one damn chance. Not one."

Dean seemed to be reeling, and opened his mouth to say something.

At that exact moment, the motel room door opened, and Sam walked in, a stack of papers in his hand. "So, I found out some stuff about Jesse," he said, then looked up, took in their expressions, the way they were standing. He frowned slightly. His timing was absolutely awful. "Everything okay? What's going on?"

Dean glanced at Alex, who was sitting back down on the bed, expression hard to read. "Uh, nothing. Everything's fine. What'd you find out about Jesse?"

Sam clearly didn't believe it, but with one last questioning glance, dropped the subject.

And just like that, they all proceeded to artfully avoided the elephant in the room—just like they had for the rest of their damn lives.

????????

Alex sat up, suddenly awake and very befuddled. She was in a bed with white sheets and a fluffy comforter, and the bed was in a nice, clean, bright carpeted bedroom. The walls were a soft beige color, the air smelled like clean towels or fresh laundry. Photos of children's faces dotted the walls. Sheer panicked confusion overcame Alex. What the…? Above what was probably the closet door, there were wrought iron words that said "Live - Laugh - Love" in curly black script. Alex tilted her head to the side, puzzled. That was the stupidest thing she'd ever heard. There was a porch to her left with big sliding glass doors that were currently open, letting in the sound of happy birds singing. She could see a manicured green yard through the railing of the porch, and was that a Buick in the driveway? She stared around the room some more. This definitely wasn't a motel and she couldn't remember what had happened yesterday—where had she been before this? She couldn't remember anything recent, her brain felt like total mush. She suddenly heard water running behind the closed door of what must be the bathroom. Immediately, she jumped out of the bed, tense, and backed up against one of the walls. "Sam!" She hissed, kind of awkwardly poised to fight or run, she wasn't sure which. "Dean?"

She nearly jumped out of her skin when the bathroom door opened beside her head. "Sweetie, you gonna get up anytime soon? It's almost seven o'clock."

She almost fell over, recognizing the voice before he walked through the door—it was Cas, but—what was he wearing? And what happened to his hair? And why had he just called her sweetie? He was wearing a pair of tailored light-colored dress pants, a crisp, well-fitting white button up. His dark hair was slicked down and parted neatly on the side. He was slinging a red tie around his collar and using the mirror beside the bathroom door to watch himself do it.

Even though that looked like Cas, she was almost a hundred percent sure it wasn't. Was she dreaming? This didn't feel like a dream. Alex tilted her head to the side, freaked out, not sure at all what was happening right now. "Uh… Cas?"

"That's my name, don't wear it out," he said with an air of distracted annoyance, concentrating on his image in the mirror. He glanced at her, almost judgmentally. "You getting dressed or what?"

She hadn't even realized she wasn't in her regular clothes. She looked down, realizing she was in some kind of fuzzy bathrobe and pajama bottoms. What the hell was happening? She tried harder to remember where she had been before here, but everything was a jumble, her mind felt completely and utterly muddled, she couldn't think.

"I picked out an outfit for you," Cas said, nodding toward the closet door, and she followed his eye line, saw what he meant—a little red dress hanging on the closet door knob.

She looked at it, looked back at him, incredulous. "Um right. I would never wear that."

He just glanced at her, amused. "Oh, really?" He snapped his fingers. And suddenly, she was wearing it. She gaped at herself—it was skintight and short with a plunging neckline and no sleeves. She glowered up at him. He was just grinning, which looked strange on Cas's face. Almost creepy, in fact. "Looking good, hon!" He sauntered up, his half-done tie forgotten. He put his hands on her hips, started to pull her to him.

"Hey!" she said, stepped back, shoving him. The back of her legs hit the bed. "Keep your damn hands off me!"

He pulled her to him despite the protest, a disturbing little smile on his face, and she couldn't break his strong, vice-like grip. "Hands off?" He laughed, patronizingly, put a hand on the side of her head, stroking her hair, petting her. "Oh Alex, sweetie, I can touch you however much I like. We're married."

Alex stared. "Married?"

"Um, ye-es," he said in a bizarre sing-song voice, and pulled her right hand up, where a huge glittering diamond sat on a silver band. It was gaudy as hell, and Alex almost recoiled at the sight of it. Suddenly, somehow, Alex remembered. She remembered that she and her brothers had been investigating some bizarre, cartoony deaths and Dean had theorized a trickster was involved. Holy shit. And if she were right, it wasn't just any trickster. This had to be the Trickster. Oh my god. Okay. Now it made sense. Okay. She stared into the face of 'Cas' and almost called the Trickster out right then and there, but then shut her mouth, realizing she had a chance here. She would pretend she hadn't figured it out and take him out when he didn't expect it.

Cas, fake Cas, had let go of her and was examining himself in the mirror, adjusting his perfectly knotted tie and straightening his cufflinks then grabbed a piece of candy out of the bowl on top of the dresser, popped it in his mouth. Alex watched him from the corner of her eye, suspicion confirmed. "The kids are probably hungry," he said through the candy. "You should get a move on."

"The kids..." Alex repeated, suddenly feeling very afraid. None of this is real, she reminded herself. And in the kitchen, she could probably find some kind of weapon—tricksters had to be stabbed with a wooden stake dipped in the blood of their victim. Wouldn't the victim be her in this situation? So all she needed was a stake. Surely she could find some piece of wooden furniture or something to use as a stake.

Cas was heading out of the bedroom door, looking at her expectantly, like he was impatient. Alex resisted the urge to shove him through the wall, and instead followed him downstairs, trying to appear as though she didn't know what was going on now. She didn't have to pretend for very long. They went down a massive staircase and through a lavish household that was a complete zoo. There were children... everywhere. All of them had dark brown hair.

There was a shrieking screaming wail—a crash—a dog barking—screams of delight—and screams that were just screams—three kids ran past, rolls of half-unrolled toilet paper in their hands (...why?), she saw a couple more kids jumping on the couches, one standing on the table and practicing ballet with a bucket on her head, another one doing karate moves on another who was crying and screaming in protest—still more were throwing cereal at each other—one boy off by himself was walking on his hands and then fell backwards into a pile of toys—Alex felt completely overwhelmed, unable to set her eyes on how many there were. "Holy shit. How many damn kids do we have?"

"I lost count awhile ago," Cas said, shrugging, then gave her a disapproving look. "Also, language, hon."

They passed a little girl who was drawing stick figures on the wall with dark red lipstick—her hair was smeared completely in what appeared to be vaseline. "Jess, no sweetiekins," Cas said as he passed, and scooped the kid up, slung her over his shoulder like a sack of flour.

Alex didn't even have time to react, as two more of the kids appeared out of nowhere and started yanking at her skirt, shouting "Mommy! Mama!" and one of them was saying "I want cereal, I want cereal!" The other kid seemed outraged by the suggestion and tackled the first one. "No, pancakes!"

There was a huge crash behind her and she whirled to see a huge flat screen TV had toppled to the ground in the middle of the living room. Cas gave the little girl wailing on the floor a withering look. "That's why Daddy said not to use the TV as a balance beam, Jillian." He looked at Alex pointedly. "Alex—what are you doing? Take care of this."

"I don't—" she started.

Another kid ran up to her, an upside down squeeze bottle of jelly in hand, leaving globs of it all over the wooden floor. He had sticky purple jam all over his face. "I'm making jelly on poptarts, look Mommy! Yay!"

Something crashed into her leg—a little boy with shaggy brown hair, being tackled by another little boy with short hair. "Joey won't give me my monster truck!" One of them screeched. There was an enraged scream, and the other one grabbed the other by the hair. "Jared, it's mine!" They began rolling around on the floor, hitting each other.

Alex felt dizzy, turning around and seeing nothing but endless amounts of children doing insane things—she stumbled toward the kitchen, desperate to find a way to end this bizarre thing. "Johnny is eating my deodorant again!" someone said to her right, but she just kept walking toward the kitchen until she slipped on something wet—there was a bucket of mopping solution there beside her foot, a lot of it spilled onto the floor—one of the kids had his head dunked into it. Alex wasn't even sure what compelled her, but she stopped and plucked him out, holding him at arms length as sudsy PineSol dripped from his wet head. The kid screamed bloody murder and kicked like a madman, spilling the rest of the bucket everywhere. Alex backed away, stressed out and scared, despite herself—this is why she didn't like kids. They were like insane asylums on wheels!

"JENNA! GIVE THAT BACK!" and "Jamie! JAMIE! STOP JAMIE!" and "Jackson won't give me the markers, I WANT THE MA-aAaAa-RKERS!" Alex gaped, despite herself. All their names started with J. Who the hell would do that?

Cas was sitting at the kitchen table as kids, crazed like animals, bounced around him throwing things and fighting with each other. He opened a newspaper pleasantly, looked at her. "Coffee, please, hon," he said, and returned to his paper. "And make it snappy. I don't wanna be late to work." Thoroughly pissed off, but resigned to not fly off the handle, Alex turned around and went into the kitchen. She didn't miss the fact that as they had walked through the house, she had seen no doors. This wasn't a real house. There was little point trying to get out, she was pretty sure. So instead, she swept the kitchen with her eyes, trying to devise a plan.

She saw a bunch of stuff she wasn't sure of—pretty sure that was a blender, and that was some kind of toast-maker—ah ha, a knife block. And beside it, a bunch of spatulas and mixing spoons in a container. She saw a wooden mixing spoon there. Well, beggars couldn't be choosers. She took it out and cracked it in half over her knee with a loud cough then looked over her shoulder. The Trickster was still reading, not paying attention. She then grabbed a knife from the block and steeled herself, already grimacing before she even cut. She opened her palm up, held it flat, sliced into the skin. Shit, it never got easier, cutting yourself. Bright red blood flooded out from the cut across her palm and she stuck the splintered end of the wooden spoon against it, rolled it around in her blood. This better work. She glanced at the Trickster again, and for a second, felt her stomach lurch. Why did he have to look like Cas? It wasn't going to make this any easier. She grabbed the coffee pot in her other hand, held the wooden spoon behind her back with her bleeding hand, approached him slowly.

He glanced at her, cursory. Alex stood there for a second, staring at him. He really did look like Cas, not exactly, but his face… he looked at her again, this time clearly annoyed. "Are you gonna pour it or not?" he asked, nodding toward his empty coffee cup, his face and tone completely douchey. That was all the reminding Alex needed that it wasn't really Cas, and she whipped out her makeshift weapon and leapt forward, stabbing the splintered, bloody end of the spoon into his chest, purposefully not looking at his face—she couldn't. But she did hear him scream out in pain. She stumbled back, temporarily horrified. All the kids had stopped and were staring at her, and Cas was slumped in the chair, the spoon sticking out of his chest at a weird angle, his eyes staring unseeingly off into space. Alex was breathing hard, staring around in a panic, waiting for the illusion to disappear as her expression quickly became more and more upset. But nothing changed.

"Really, sweets, pro-obably shouldn't kill me in front of the kids. It's not the best example to set." She whirled. Another Cas! He looked exactly the same as the one in the chair—same outfit, same creepy smile. He stepped toward her, and without a second thought, she raced back the way they had come, upstairs, kids clambering after her. She slammed the bedroom door behind her and locked it, panicking. Why hadn't that worked? And now she was feeling a little dizzy from blood loss. She looked at the gash in her hand—and squeezed her hand into a fist, trying to stop the bleeding. She had cut herself a little deeper than she meant to.

"A-hem."

Alex turned around fast. There was Cas, just looking at her with his hands on his hips, a little smile on his face, as if to say 'did you really think you could lock me out?' He stood in front of the open doors to the balcony, looking pleased with himself.

"Okay, Trickster, good one. Very funny." Alex was practically giving off steam at this point, looking at the impostor glaringly. "This is hilarious."

He ignored her, continued the charade. "You know, I don't want to be critical, but I've noticed you can't keep it together here lately. Ever since the kids… and your weight gain… I just… you don't try. It's not hard to do your job—cook, clean, take care of the kids…" he bit his lip, looked up and down her body slowly with hungry eyes, "please me sexually…"

That was the last damn straw. Alex walked right up to him and shoved him off the edge of the balcony, over the railing where he fell a story down with a huge crash on top of a plastic playground. "I know that's you, Trickster, now cut the bullshit!" She shouted.

He grinned up at her. "Ouch."

There was a sound behind her, like fabric flapping in the wind, and Alex turned around then almost fell over—standing a few feet in front of her—"Cas?" She had gone totally still, daring to hope, but not sure if it could really be him—she wasn't sure if it would be possible to duplicate all those things she recognized about him—the crooked tie, wrinkled, oversized clothes, slightly hunched way he stood, the stern, puzzled, pissy look on his face. He took in her outfit, then the room, an odd expression on his face. Still, she remained frozen, afraid it was another trick, that this wasn't really him. "Is that really you?" She asked.

"Yes, of course it's me," he replied, sounding urgent, which only further alarmed her. "I've been looking for you and your brothers for days—you've been missing."

"What?" He met her wide eyes and then looked off at the space behind her, his frown deepening.

Alex turned to see the Trickster, still in Cas's form, standing behind her, giving her a chastising look. "Now, honey, pushing your husband out of a window is not a very nice thing to do."

"Husband?" Cas repeated with narrowed eyes, and stepped forward putting himself between Alex and, well, himself... looking at the impostor with a deep frown, his physical stance intimidating. "Who are you? Why have you trapped her here?"

"Wouldn't you like to know?" The Trickster giggled.

Cas's frown deepened further, and he paused. "Yes. That's why I asked."

There was a sigh, a roll of the eyes. "Oh, Castiel, you always were so awkward," Trickster said, and Alex looked at him sharply—not missing the inference that he knew Cas.

At this point, Cas seemed to decide he was done talking to the Trickster, and turned around, reached for Alex purposefully, said "Let's go." But even before he'd finished speaking, before he could reach her, Cas went flying backwards, yanked roughly into the thin air like a rag doll, slamming into the solid wood dresser behind him. It cracked in half at the impact, and Cas's body was immediately yanked forward again, where he flew headfirst into the opposite end of the room. Bits of plaster went flying everywhere as he collided with a wall and cracked it, left a huge gaping hole. Alex stared in horror, unable to physically move. Stumbling to his feet, Cas stared at the Trickster, seeming to be confused, almost alarmed. He had a bloody nose. "How—?" he started, but the Trickster cut him off.

"Sorry, bored! Bye bye!" He snapped his fingers, and Cas disappeared. The Trickster turned to Alex, gave her a smile. "He's just precious, isn't he?" Alex just stared back, terrified. How the hell was a trickster doing this? How was he yanking around an all-powerful angel without even breaking a sweat?

"What did you do to him?!" Alex demanded angrily, grabbing the trickster by two fistfuls of shirt. "If you hurt him, I'll rip your head off!"

He looked at her hands, clearly amused. "Aww, are you worried about him? How sweet." Suddenly, he morphed into the familiar face of the Trickster—he was a small guy with big brown eyes, an expressive face—and she hated him.

Alex leveled him with a death glare then let go and backed up. "There you are."

He spread his arms wide, looking pleased with himself. "Here I am!"

Alex could barely contain her rage at this stupid, weird game he was playing. "What the hell is going on here? What did you just do to Cas? And what have you done with my brothers?"

"Ah, relax," he said, waving a hand in dismissal. "Castiel will be fine." He made a face. "Maybe." He grinned, his eyes bright. "And your loser brothers? They're stuck in TV land." He almost giggled at her confused expression. "While I wait for them to do what I want, I figured, hey, why not a little side entertainment, huh?" He paused, pretending to think of something, pretending to be very thoughtful. "Plus, I kinda let them know I had you here to convince them to hurry up the decision."

"What decision?"

His humor, his lightness, was suddenly gone, replaced by chilling resolve. "I want them to stop messing around and say yes."

Alex felt chilled. Surely he didn't mean... "Say yes?" She repeated.

Annoyance came over his features and he rolled his eyes. "Duh, Alex, get with the program! To Michael, to Lucifer. I want your brothers need to quit dragging their feet and play their damn roles already." He made an annoyed, bored face. "It's getting real old."

Alex shook her head, looking at him coldly. "Look, I don't know what weird angle you're trying to play, but they won't do it."

He laughed with great enthusiasm, his eyes crinkling up and sparkling. He shook his head as the laugh faded. "Not even you believe that, babe."

Alex glared, tried to think of something to say. But he was right. And it pissed her off that he had called that bluff. "Why do you care about it? Don't you realize the whole friggin' world will burn if Michael and Lucifer have their little class reunion?"

"Yeah, I know all of that. I just need it to happen so I can get on with my life," Trickster said, further mystifying Alex. "And you need it to happen, too, Al." His use of Dean's nickname for her made her skin crawl. "You know why? Because you're tired of the whole damn thing. You know just as much as I do." He shrugged, trying to be cute. "One of them has to die. It's that simple."

"Neither of them has to die you dick," Alex growled.

He just smiled softly, crookedly. "Keep telling yourself that. You can't change it. Can't do a damn thing." He raised his eyebrows, looking almost sympathetic. "Is it getting to you? Do you realize?" He was mocking her now. "You don't matter. Sucks, doesn't it? Sam and Dean, they're the ones God and the Devil have grand purposes for. They're Cain and Abel all over again, Thor and Loki. And you? No one cares." He shrugged, feigning concern. "You're just the pretty one. Except..." he gave her a patronizing, wincing smile, "you're really not that pretty."

She just looked away, squeezing her fist, feeling the blood wet in her palm. "Screw you."

He tilted his head to the side, looked at her almost fondly, but the expression was tempered by an underlying amusement at her pain. "You know, I can see why he likes you. Castiel. You've got this vulnerable, not vulnerable, jaded-by-the-world yet innocent-little-flower vibe going. It's cute, it's really adorable." She just glared at him from the corner of her eye, and he stepped a little closer, pleased with himself. "It's funny, Al. You and I are a lot more alike than you think."

Alex didn't bother hiding her disgust at what he'd just said. "I am nothing like you."

He feigned surprised. "What—you don't feel tired of your family bossing you around? Trying to control who you are and fighting over you? Telling you who you're supposed to be? See, I have older brothers, too." His expression darkened a little with a sudden, quiet anger. "And just like you, I'm the third wheel. The black sheep. Difference is, I grew some balls and left because I knew if I stayed I'd forever be the monkey in the middle. Well." He spread his arms wide, grinned. "Baby, look how far I've come! Free to be me!"

Alex rolled her eyes, seriously aggravated with his grand sweeping statements and implications.

"Gosh, would ya look at the time." He put his hands on his hips, acting overly cheery. "I could stand here all day and chat, but... I have other stuff to do." He wiggled his eyebrows meaningfully. "So, here's the deal. While those two loser brothers of yours play my game, you're gonna survive. We're gonna get you in good fighting shape. So, I took care of that for you!" He grinned at her, like he had done her a big favor. "I decided to open the show with a little bit of comedy. Gotta hand it to me, right? It was funny. You, married, with kids. Like that'd ever happen." He smiled as Alex just glowered. "I picked the angel because I've seen inside your mind... saw that little crush of yours. So, so sweet." He looked around the room. "You two have a lovely home here."

Alex lost what little patience she'd had. "You really like the sound of your own voice, don't you?!"

His eyebrows knit together in an overly earnest expression. "In a little while, you'll be wishing I was still here yakking your ear off." There was an ominous quality there that made Alex stop short. Then, he grinned ear to ear, his perky tone back. "So. Survive. I'll be watching! And, hey... I might even make a few guest appearances." He winked.

"What—" Alex asked, then suddenly fell over, onto the cold ground. Wait, cold hard ground—where had the carpet gone?

Disoriented, she looked around. She was in a dark building—a warehouse? An old factory? She pushed herself up off the dusty floor, looking around, feeling sick and woozy, possibly because of her palm, which was still bleeding. Shit, she really needed to stop the blood loss. She realized she was now wearing fatigue type pants, a tank top, and combat boots—was she back in the real world? She checked her back belt loop for her knife, but nothing was there.

She heard a soft sound somewhere nearby—a footstep? She froze, remembering what Trickster had said. Survive. Shit. She saw that there was a door just to her left labeled control room. She slipped into it, shut the door quietly, turned around—and started. She wasn't even in the warehouse anymore—she was in a dim, dingy old motel room. She could even smell the musty, cigarette-smoke smell. And there, sitting on top of the cheap air conditioning vent that ran the length of the window, a little girl sat. Oh my God. That was her. Maybe seven years old? A couple of Barbie dolls sat nearby, untouched and forgotten. Little Alex just stared out the window silently, her feet, in beat up sneakers, tucked under her. Her dark brown hair was an unbrushed mess, and she sat as still as a photograph. Her expression was so haunted, so sad. Alex watched herself, frozen, remembering how she felt that day. Alone and secluded. Kind of like every other day. Outside, Dean and Sam were playing catch without her, and she remembered that all she wanted to do was go out there and play, too. She tried to walk forward toward herself, but suddenly felt her feet stuck, and looked down. Mud?

She realized that she couldn't move and was sinking down. She struggled, and tried to get free, but to no avail. She looked up, panicking, and saw nothing but marshy swamp and tangles of reeds in all directions. Oh God, she remembered this night. They had been in the swamps hunting a vengeful spirit and she'd gotten separated from her brothers, taken a wrong step, gotten stuck. The whistle around her neck, she needed to blow it. She fumbled for it, clutching with trembling hands, and tried to blow, but she couldn't blow, couldn't breathe right. Help, she wanted to shout, but she couldn't. She blew again, and a weak little sighing whistle sounded. Fear clenched her heart in a fist. She felt herself collapsing backwards, the world spiraling around her, and she couldn't grasp onto anything solid.

Alex fell sideways, the ground giving way into nothing, and then suddenly she was sprawled on short, clipped grass. She tried to stand, managing clumsily. She was in a wide open park. She saw Sam just a few feet away, maybe twelve years old. He was with a bunch of kids around their age, Dean had gone off somewhere with his girlfriend of the week, probably making out behind a tree or something—Alex vaguely remembered this day. She had wanted to play football with the other kids, but they hadn't let her, if she were remembering right.

She watched young Sam, laughing and tossing the football back to another kid. "So, touch football, two taps for tackle," one of the boys said, and then nudged Sam, pointed at Alex, who was kind of lurking at the edge of the park near the swings, out of earshot. "Hey, isn't that your sister?"

"Yeah," Sam said, not sounding very keen.

"Go get her, she can play too," the boy said.

Sam seemed reluctant, then surprised Alex with what he said next. "Nah. She's got problems. She can't play."

"Why not?"

"She just can't, okay? Super disabled, asthma, bad leg." Sam said, lie after lie pouring out to Alex's complete shock. "Be right back," Sam told the other kid.

Sam jogged over to Alex's younger self, and when he got to her, he shrugged. "They said they don't want you to play." Alex's mouth fell open at the complete and total lie—Little Alex tried to hide her disappointment, but didn't do such a good job. And then Sam had the nerve to pretend to comfort her, put a hand on her shoulder, as if he felt bad for her. She had her notepad out, and scribbled: You go play, I can watch.

"You sure?" Sam asked. And his face looked so concerned. Little Alex just nodded, putting on a brave, I'm okay face. But Alex remembered how she'd felt. Heartbroken. Left out—as usual. Sam left and jogged back to the kids who were waiting for him. Alex watched this scene with totally new eyes. Anger—so much anger. Why? Why would Sam do that? What the fuck was that? How many other times had he lied to her like that? Her whole childhood she thought Sam had been on her side. That he'd protected her from cruel kids and tough moments and bullies. But after seeing that, she had this horrifying suspicion that he been part of the reason she'd thought all of that. Had he manipulated other situations, too? Why? She felt like her heart was breaking in half, and all the trust and love she had left for Sam threatened to shatter completely. On cue, the park seemed to melt away, and she was spinning around, unable to see anything, only feel the sensation of rushing headlong through nothing.

"Come on, can't we just leave her for once? I can help on this hunt, Dad, you know I can—you need me on this one." Alex looked around, confused, recognizing Dean's voice. She was outside a motel room, in the soft haze of twilight, watching a scene she didn't recognize. Dad and Dean were talking there, standing in a mostly empty parking lot. "Having her along will just slow us down, you know it will," Dean was protesting, and Alex felt a cruel sense of betrayal slap her at what he'd just said—was he talking about her? "So why can't we just leave her here? She'll be fine." Dad looked at Dean angrily. A look he had given his children so many times, when they challenged his authority or said the wrong thing in the wrong moment. "Just do what I say, Dean," he said, his expression and tone domineering. "Stay here with your sister. Just watch your damn sister. I'll be back."

As if on cue, a few-years-younger Alex poked her head out of a motel room door, her expression curious as she looked at her dad and brother. And then, with horror, Alex realized she did know what day this was. This was right before Dad had disappeared. A few weeks later, she and Dean would go find Sam and life would fall apart all over again. Alex stared at Dean, who was looking at the other Alex with what she thought was reluctance, even a touch of resentment. Somehow, that hurt worse than anything had hurt her in a long time. She felt tears gathering in her eyes. Tears of pain. She shut her eyes, tried to remove herself from the memory, then heard the sound of screams, shouting. Her eyes popped open, and she was no longer in a parking lot with Dean and Dad.

She was now in an alley way, behind a building. She heard someone shouting an exorcism chant. She didn't remember this—she followed the voice and found Dean, maybe eleven or twelve, holding a young Sam against the wall of the building. Sam looked terrified, and he was covered in blood—his hands, his shirt. Alex was confused—then she looked down. There were these strange furry, bloody shapes littering the ground at their feet. Alex froze, shocked. What was this? What was happening?

"You're not possessed?" Dean asked Sam, sounding beyond horrified, beyond stunned.

Sam was sobbing. "I d-don't know why I did it, Dean!"

Alex stumbled backwards, almost unable to breathe—no, that couldn't be real. That couldn't have happened! Suddenly, everything went dark, and she bumped into something, maybe a table. The lights came on and she squinted, shielding her eyes with a hand. "You can't be serious, John," she heard Bobby say, and she blinked a few times, her eyes adjusting. She was in Bobby's study, and Dad and Bobby were standing in there, alone, facing each other, as if they were in the middle of an intense conversation. She frowned. This wasn't a memory of hers. Bobby and Dad looked a lot younger than she'd ever remembered seeing them look.

Dad looked upset. "Bobby, come on. Try to understand. This isn't the life for her."

Bobby didn't look upset—he looked downright pissed. "John, if it's that important for you to protect her from the life, then quit the life."

Dad made a face she had seen him make a lot of times. Unwillingness mixed with hesitation. "You know I can't do that."

"Can't, or won't?" Bobby asked, and he didn't sound like this very often—Alex could tell he was very, very angry. "John... I can't believe you're even considering this."

"It would keep her safe, Bobby, and you know it," Dad protested, but Bobby flew off the handle. "She's your daughter, ya damn fool!" Bobby shouted. "You keep her safe! You!" The men looked at each other angrily, shaken. Bobby looked like he was trying to calm down, but was still glaring at the other man. "You're tryin' to duck outta your responsibility."

Dad threw his hands up. "She makes everything harder, Bobby!"

"That's what kids do!" Bobby shouted again, and got in John's face. Alex didn't understand. What was happening? "You really just want to give her up? Abandon her, sign her into foster care and then be done with her? She's not a pet for cryin' out loud. She's your six-year-old daughter. She needs her family. Maybe more than other kids do!"

And suddenly as it had started, the memory faded out completely. Alex was suddenly back in the warehouse, breathless, tears in her eyes. Her pulse was pounding from dizzy adrenaline and fear and grief. Suddenly, all made perfect, heartbreaking sense. The way Dad kind of passed her off to Dean. The way he always had this hesitation when he looked at her. Like he was disappointed in her, or disappointed in himself. Or just disappointed, period. The way he hadn't really given her any credit until her later teenage years. She had tried so hard to just get his attention, but she had always felt forgotten and overlooked. She remembered him telling her he loved her maybe twice her whole life. But maybe that had been a lie like everything else. He hadn't wanted her. He hadn't wanted her. The pain of the rejection was almost physical at this point, and she leaned against the wall, almost feeling like she might be sick. More than anything she just wanted to break down. The pain was literally almost unbearable, her chest hurt.

Sam, ripping apart little baby cats, Dean telling Dad she was only slowing them down, Sam lying and manipulating her emotions and for what?! Was everything she ever thought and believed in a total lie? She sobbed, unable to hold the sound back. And beside her, the doorknob turned.

Alex jumped back, panicking, mad at herself for not finding a weapon, remembering everything she had temporarily forgotten in the wake of emotional distress. She had maybe one second to try and clear herself mentally, remind herself that she had to survive. She stood back tensely, behind the door. A dark head poked in, and she brutally shoved the person head first into the wall, a desperate and stupid move. The owner of the dark head of hair seemed to have expected that, and grabbed her even as she pushed him. He whirled her strongly, shoved her against the wall.

Alex's entire body went limp, she couldn't breathe. Horror and shock came over her features. "D-Dad?!" She gasped out, looking into the face of her father.

"Hi, baby." The sound of his voice—which she hadn't heard in years—sent a chill down her spine.
It's not really him, it's not really him. But it looked just like him, the white hairs in his beard, the dark eyes, the tired wrinkles around his eyes, the crooked smile so much like Dean's. But his expression was chilling, filled with malice. He was roughly pushing her against the wall. His elbow bone was digging into her shoulder painfully and she was grimacing, trying to wiggle free. "You been a good girl for Dean?" He asked casually. Alex was literally shaking, no physical strength left in her body, fidgeting in a panicked, uncoordinated mess. He chuckled, smiling at her fondly. "You thought you got rid of Dad a long time ago, huh?" She looked at him in a mixture of confusion and pain, and he just smiled more. "Oh yes. I know. I know you were relieved when Daddy dearest died."

She tried shaking her head, choking back tears. Wanting to believe that it wasn't true. "No, no I wasn't," she protested Shakily.

"Aw, that's my girl. Living in denial." He smiled, as if proud. He touched the side of her face with the backs of his fingers, and she winced against the seemingly tender touch, tried to pull away.

"Get away from me," Alex protested weakly, and blinked a few times. Her vision was beginning to get foggy.

"You hurt, baby?" he asked, his expression filled with concern. He grabbed her hand, looked at the cut… then ground his thumb into the wound. She screamed, as he got in her face, suddenly terrifyingly angry. "Pain is part of life, Alexandra, now stop being so damn weak! You have been nothing but one let down after another to this family, nothing, you hear me?"

Alex thrashed, trying to get away from his grip and from his words, and he just laughed, let go of her hand, looked at her for a minute, as if trying to figure something out. "So, I guess the question I have for you is… can you find it inside yourself to kill me?"

"Kill you?" Alex repeated, going still in terror.

He chuckled a little. "It's a dog eat dog world, sweetheart," he said, sighing as if tired. "Kill or be killed." His hands were both gently coming against her throat, and then suddenly pressing against her with brutal crushing force. He smiled pleasantly as he choked her.

Alex struggled intensely against the vice-like grip on her throat, but couldn't get her legs to work, as they weren't even touching the ground anymore. Desperate and sloppy, she drew her palm back and smashed it full-force up and against Dad's nose, stunning him—and he stumbled back, she fell down breathing in panicked little gasps. She scrambled to her feet, ran the opposite direction, out the door and down a flickering hallway littered with old wires and trash.

She could hear him following, and she was consumed in all-out terror. She knew, even as she rounded a corner and came into a wide, open, echoing room, that she needed to keep her head, or she wouldn't survive this. She went slack against the wall, struggling to breathe. Beside her foot, a rusty old shovel sat. The second she saw it, she grabbed it up and began wielding it like a staff, wincing against the roughness of it in her cut-up palm. She could hear heavy, running booted footsteps coming closer. She swung madly as he rounded the corner, hitting him in the face with the shovel with enough force to send him flying backwards. He must have had his hunting knife out, because it went skittering across the floor, and Alex dove for it without thinking. Even as her fingers closed around the hilt, she felt herself knocked sideways, and Dad was over her, pinning her down by the wrists. But she'd held on tight to the knife, refusing to let go.

"Now, Alexandra, put the knife down," he coaxed, grinning maniacally. "You wouldn't want to hurt your dad."
"You are not my dad," Alex spat, and with a surge of adrenaline, she brutally drove her knee up into his stomach, and violently yanked her wrists forward and down, breaking his grip long enough, just long enough, to push him over, to kind of pull back, sideways. Even as he was rolling off of her, she was drawing back, without hesitation, still halfway on the ground. She plunged the knife into his chest with a scream. His face showed shock, horror, pain, and Alex just kind of pulled back, stunned, taking the knife with her. She was half sitting, agonized, shaking, watching him fall to the ground, dead. Oh God, oh God, she couldn't breathe—she knew that wasn't Dad, but it looked like him, it sounded like him, and she wanted to vomit everywhere. She looked at the knife in her hand, covered in bright red blood.

She almost dropped it in horror—but then she heard "Oh, A-lex..." in a soft, sing song voice.

She looked behind her, recognizing the voice with dread. Sam. He stood there, completely still as she managed to stand up shakily. He had a soft, chilling smile on his face—it reminded her of Lucifer, and she stumbled back a little, barely able to stand up anymore. Something snapped in her —instinct took over. She knew if she didn't take her chance and attack now, she'd probably die.

Sam opened his mouth to say something, but before he had even drawn a breath, she flipped Dad's knife deftly in her hand, focused, twirling it so that instead of hilt she grasped the blade. She drew back and threw it with a pained grimace and the last of her strength. It sank with a horrible squelching sound into his chest. He looked at the knife, then at her, shocked. Then fell forward onto the ground. She looked at his still body in alarm—she couldn't believe herself. That's not really Sam. You didn't just kill Sam. But that look on his face when he'd looked at her, the knife in his chest—

Alex suddenly jumped back as shotgun blasts kicked cement up just a few inches in front of her feet. Dean was in front of her smiling, slinging a shotgun over his shoulder casually, grinning at her as he loped forward out of the shadows. "Hiya, sis! Now what'd you do that for?"

No, not Dean. Not Dean now. He looked at Sam, perplexed, then kicked his brother's lifeless body over and yanked the knife out of Sam's chest. He looked at her, gave her a 'someone's been a bad girl' look. He dropped the shotgun, and knife in hand, sauntered over.

Alex backed up, hit the wall behind her, momentarily unable to do anything—this was Dean—no, it wasn't! She had waited too long to run away, and he was suddenly right there, and her chance at escape was gone. He pinned her against the wall, smirked, brought the knife up to trace a soft line against the skin of her neck. She could feel the blood on the knife from Sam leaving a wet line on her skin. She stared, horrified and frozen, watching Dean, trying to find it within herself to fight him off. She couldn't. She had nothing left in her. He smiled at her sweetly. "Hmm. Just like I thought. Dean's your Achilles heel, isn't he? It's kind of sweet how much you love this dumb jock."

His chin lowered, his eyes stared at her with malice, and the knife went lower, then he held the point there against her chest, twisted a little, and she sobbed as it broke the skin. Maybe she deserved this. All she knew was she was too weak, there was nothing left. She just looked away, defeated, crying softly, ashamed and in pain. The knife dug a little deeper and she cried out again, like a child, like a coward. And then, behind Dean, Cas appeared—a furious expression on his face like Alex had never seen—Alex started, mouth falling open as he grabbed Dean by the shoulder with crushingly ruthless force, ripping him off of her, appearing enraged. Dean attempted to stab Cas, but the angel grabbed Dean's wrist and bent it down, his grip unyielding, his eyes blazing. With absolute and ferocious power Castiel hit Dean across the face, and Dean went flying across the warehouse and went still.

Alex had fallen down, and was slumped against the wall, dazed, watching Cas in a mixture of disbelief, admiration, breathlessness. He looked back at her, more alarmed than Alex ever remembered him being. He was already walking back toward her, an urgent pace to his step. "I don't know how he's doing this," he said, talking very fast. "I tried getting your brothers, but—" suddenly he fizzled out again, disappearing completely, just as he had been about to get her. Alex's temporary relief was gone, replaced with despair and anger—she wanted to scream. Suddenly, the Trickster stood in front of her, smirking.

"Damn! I knew this would be entertaining, but really? Killing your own Dad? And Sam? I am impressed, Alex!"

"You son of a bitch," she muttered, trying to summon some fire, but only sounding broken. "Why are you doing this to me?"

He snapped his fingers and she was yanked to her feet, at if held by invisible hands. He looked angry. "Because you need to grow up, Alex! Stop depending on your stupid, selfish brothers who are only going to let you down and tear your family apart! Face it, your family is a sham and you've been falling victim to their lies your whole life!"

"How is any of that your damn business?" Alex asked acidly, summoning what strength she had left to glare at him even through her pain and weakness. She hated him for everything he had shown her. Everything he'd put her through.

He seemed momentarily incredulous. "Did you even see what I showed you? All real. One hundred percent. They didn't love you. They don't care about you! You should be thanking me. They act like you belong to them, like they own you. You let your brothers boss you around, control you, tell you who you are. It's sad, Alex! You're sad."

Alex tilted her head to the side, breathing a little labored, suddenly wondering something, suddenly suspicious. "Is this even about me? I'm starting to think not."

He rolled his eyes, as if he had been waiting for her to say that. "You got me," he said, and sighed dramatically as if he were relieved. "I guess you could say I'm pretty much the Alex of my family. No one thought I'd ever measure up or be anything." He smiled, an oddly cold, ominous quality to the expression. "So, hell, I decided I didn't need 'em. Let them tear each other apart, I don't care."

He huffed, chuckled. "Look how many fucks I give." He paused, then furious anger overcame his voice and face. "Zero! ZERO! I give zero fucks!" He looked at her, glaring. "And neither should you—you sorry, stupid child."

Alex looked at him oddly, not sure what to say. None of the things he was saying were really affecting her, only baffling her. She shook her head, almost feeling sorry for him. Even after all the crap she'd just been through. "You said we were alike, earlier… and you couldn't be more wrong. Because I'm not jumping ship the second things start to go to crap and I'm not walking away, even if everything you showed me was real. If they go down, I'm going down with them. I don't care if we're the biggest walking disaster on earth. We're still family."

Trickster rolled his eyes, groaned loudly. "Oh please, you're pathetic, Alex! Even after everything I just showed you? Really? Damn. I don't know if you're incredibly loyal or just stupid as a rock."

"Put me down as stupid as a rock," Alex said, laughing slowly, darkly. She felt so physically weak, but still managed to raise her hand, point at him knowingly. "You know what I figured out, Trickster? You're not a trickster. There's just no way. Not the way you slammed around my angel like it was no big deal, the way you refuse to die when killed. You're something else. I got no clue what, but I'm gonna find out what. My family, and all those innocent people you've killed? I'm gonna make sure you rot in hell for all the jacked up shit you've done to us."

He tilted his head to the side, his eyes narrowed, either amused or indignant, she couldn't tell which. "You really think you're in a position to be threatening me?"

Alex just stared at him coolly. "Oh look, I made him mad. Poor baby."

That comment wiped his expression off his face, and he matched her stare for a moment, then raised his chin, a slight smile returning to his face. "Well. I've figured it out, Alex."

She frowned. "Figured what out."

His smile got a little bigger. "Your worst nightmare, of course." He was wagging a finger now, pacing the floor in front of her. "It's not fighting, it's not killing, it's not a normal life, it's not your past…" he paused, looked at her, that soft little smile on his face. "It's your future."

He snapped his fingers, and the dark warehouse was replaced by something else entirely. Under a flat gray sky, she and the Trickster stood in a circle of overgrown grass. Weathered gray stone headstones fanned out in all directions—stretching out in all directions as far as Alex could see on all sides. She looked at the Trickster, who was smiling softly. "Your worst fear. It's being completely, and totally alone." He gave her a knowing smile, pleased with himself. "Oh, I'm good. Now." He gave her a faux-stern frown. "You sit here and think about what you've done. Oh, and try not to bleed to death." He rolled his eyes and disappeared.

Alex looked at the gravestones that surrounded her with increasing alarm, turning in a slow circle, reading the engraved names with panic. John Winchester. Mary Winchester. Dean Winchester. Sam Winchester. Bobby Singer. The gravestones stretched miles in all directions, all littered with names of people she had known or failed to save. Anywhere she looked, she saw a name she recognized.

And then, she saw it, behind her family's gravestones. An obviously shallow grave, marked only with a simple wooden cross. On it hung a silver chain, with her dad's wedding band and her old silver whistle. And she knew, immediately, who it belonged to. Cas, dead and gone in 2014. Forgotten, anonymous. No name on the cross, just something of hers that he had obviously clung to in those last months of his life.

Dead. They were all dead! She stumbled backward, overcome with horror, panic, grief. The world seemed to be spinning and dissolving around her, and the feeling of death and dying and being alone forever punched into her like a nail. She fell onto all fours, suddenly sobbing out in fear—and she thought about the future, about losing her brothers, her anchors—she thought about Cas in 2014 and she thought about everything the Trickster had shown her and she was petrified, scared out of her mind, overcome with unmanageable amounts of panic. Her chest felt tight, too tight to breathe, and her heart raced so fast that she almost passed out. Her vision began to swim as her head became light and the full-blown panic attack shook her to the core. In her hands, she clenched onto the grass as hard as she could, afraid she'd fall off the face of the earth if she didn't. She tried shutting her eyes. It's not real, it's not real. But it was real. Everyone was dead and she was dying too and she sobbed out again. Someone help me!

She heard a soft sound in front of her and heard him speak her name in a soft, worried voice. Heard footsteps coming toward her, felt herself being drawn up by the arms. Her heart seemed to spasm in her chest out of relief when eyes bluer as the sky stared at her in dismayed concern. She didn't even think about it, she just sobbed his name and crashed into him, crying and humiliated but unable to do anything but hug him, hold onto him. And with her arms circled as tight as she could manage around his middle inside the trench coat, she felt how warm and solid and real he was. Her chest loosened, her breathing calmed, and she shut her eyes, pressed her cheek against the front of his shoulder, feeling her dizziness fade. She tightened her arms even more, until it hurt her arm muscles, because she was terrified that he'd disappear again.

For a couple seconds, Cas remained sort of frozen, not sure what was happening. Alex was just crushing him (not literally, of course, that would be impossible) with her arms. She was shaking with tears, sobbing sounds wracking her entire body. He did not like this sound, or this sensation. In fact, he quickly realized that he detested it. It made him anxious and tense to see her this way.

He looked down at her, the way she had circled her arms around him. He had seen humans do this before, and knew it was a hug. He carefully, calculatingly brought his arms around her, gently, then a little tighter, matching it to the way she was holding onto him, only not as hard—he felt the need to be gentle. He paused, wondering if he were doing it right even as he noticed how it felt, her smaller form there against his. He could hear and feel her breathing like this. Even through the layers of clothing, there was a steady little thumping rhythm against his chest, her heart beating. It was a fierce little beat. Cas noticed the way her hands felt there against his back, the fingers taut, digging in, and he wondered why she held on so tightly. Did she assume he would disappear again? The longer they stayed like that, in the circle of each other's arms, the calmer she became, and Cas felt himself relaxing a little as she became quieter, less panicked. The top of her head was right there, in front of his face, and without entirely meaning to, he leaned down, just a little. His nose brushed her hair. He could faintly smell shampoo, some kind of soap. She shivered in his arms, sniffed. There, enveloped in his arms, she felt so small, smaller than she looked.

Her head was shifting onto his shoulder now, and the tip of her nose brushed against his neck. The little grazing touch startled him. He could feel her uneven breathing hitting the skin of his neck. A sensation that once he felt, he couldn't stop focusing on. His vessel flushed with warmth, and a surge of protectiveness overcame him. His arms tightened around her on instinct. Not because of calculation—but because he responded on some raw, human level that was still buried deep inside of the vessel, he guessed. Or was it something else?

Somewhere in the back of his thoughts, he was fighting to remember who he was—an angel of the Lord, holding a human girl in his arms. But he didn't let go, even though he knew he should. At the current moment he was somehow giving her comfort and he wouldn't refuse her that or take it away. He couldn't. And so he did not let go, despite knowing better. He thought about how he had watched Alex for more than a year, had seen her sorrows, had seen her crying. He knew the sadness she hid from others. She almost always cried alone, when she thought no one else could see. The sight of her crying had always unsettled Castiel in the past, had bothered him, even when he'd been in his true form. But her grief had never affected him as deeply as it did today. He felt angry that she had been made to feel this way, and angry because he didn't know how to fix it... and helpless, because he wasn't sure if it could be fixed. She was so much more torn apart than he had ever seen her.

After a few moments Alex, quieted, pulled back a little bit, slowly, hesitant to look at him. Her expression was ashamed and so very grieved. He hadn't even noticed how it happened, but now both of his hands gripped her right above the elbows, and hers mirrored his, resting lighting in the crooks of his elbows.

Her face was streaked with tears, completely covered, and her eyes were reddened. He had been experiencing intense helplessness for the past few days, trapped in the Trickster's world, but this sight made him feel utterly powerless. It was as if her sadness seeped out of her, and into him. How could that be?

With the pad of his thumb, Cas wiped her right cheek, removing the tearstains there, his touch whisper-soft and hesitant. She seemed to stop breathing for a second, looking at him in what appeared to be something like fear. He stilled—had he done something wrong? Then her head tilted just to the side, a little bit, almost as if she were leaning her face into his hand. His vessel felt a strange reaction in the vicinity of his chest at her actions and Cas withdrew his hand, not understanding. He was a little suddenly apprehensive, suspecting himself of something, but he didn't know what. Alex looked up at him somberly. Her eyes were so dark and big and filled with an emotion he didn't recognize.

His eyes traveled her entire face, the face he knew so well now. His eyes stopped, resting a beat on her soft, parted lips. And for a moment, he imagined himself leaning down and touching his lips to hers, conveying the gentle and paradoxically strong things he felt for her with his mouth. He wondered how the touch of her skin against his would feel. The thought shocked him as soon as he had it. He realized the pulse in his body had picked up, his breathing was shorter, his nervous system felt jittery. Panicking slightly, he let go of her completely. What was happening to him?

She looked down, seeming disappointed, or conflicted, like she were gathering herself mentally. Her eyelashes were darker than usual, wet with tears. She looked back at him pleadingly. "Cas, please say you can get us out of here. Please."

An odd lurch in his vessel's stomach. "No. I don't know the way out. This trickster is very powerful." He looked down, then noticed the palm of her hand—bloody and raw. More than just a little scrape. "You're bleeding," he said, stunned that he hadn't noticed sooner.

He looked down at himself, looking for something, then pulled some of his shirt out of the waistband of his pants, and ripped the fabric. He held her bleeding hand in his larger one, wrapped the strip of white fabric there with his other hand. She winced a little as the cotton touched the open cut skin there then looked at him uncertainly, watched him as he concentrated. He met her eyes, just for a second, then looked back down, tying a clumsy knot. He looked pained, and Alex remembered, offhandedly, when he had told her to count her scars. He was still looking at her hand, still holding it in both of his hands. And then, she almost thought she had imagined it, he brushed the exposed skin where her fingers met her hand. A completely unnecessary action. She looked at him, unsure. He was now staring at the spot on her chest where fake-Dean had dug the knife into, just above where her heart was. His fingers brushed against it, his eyebrows knit together further. He breathed out, dropped his hand away, looked at the graves and let go of her hand. He looked like he were in deep, serious thought. After a moment, he looked back at her, grim.

"I saw the things he showed you. He tried to keep me out completely, but he couldn't stop me from watching. I saw everything. What Sam did. What your father did. Everything."

Alex looked away, ashamed, hugging her arms around herself even though it wasn't cold. She sniffed a little, looking down, feeling like a lost little girl. She was feeling sick again, weak, but she refused to sit down or admit how near to passing out she was. She looked back at him, not even sure why, but suddenly spilling everything in a self-loathing monologue, sorry for herself—just like Dean said. She just needed to say it all, to try and get rid of all the crap she was trying to deny. "All my life I've been trying to survive. And I have survived. But why? So I get to see this? Everyone I ever loved or cared about, dead?" She felt manic suddenly, enraged. "Why did the Trickster do this to me? I don't understand. I mean yeah me and Dean and Sam tried to kill him a couple years ago after he jacked us up, big friggin' deal. So this is his idea of revenge?" She looked around, suddenly breathless and pained. "I would have preferred he just kill me and gotten it over with instead of dragging me through this shit."

"No," Cas said intensely, but she was continuing, not really seeing him, not listening.
"And now I find out Dad didn't even want me, that I was nothing to him?" She swallowed painfully. "And maybe I already suspected that." She shook her head slowly, sad because that was true, and it hurt to admit out loud. "But Dean—thinking I was a burden. Sam, lying to me, manipulating me, making me think he was looking out for me—ripping up little kittens in an alley for kicks..." she was getting pissed again, and dizzy too. "I lived my life blind, not just mute. How did I not know all these things? They were staring me in the face and I didn't see."

She kind of staggered sideways, and would have fallen down, but Cas reached out, grabbed her, a somewhat forceful, emphatic expression on his face. "Stop. This is exactly what the Trickster intended."

She looked at him, really looked at him, for a moment normal, not crazed or manic. "You're gonna die in twenty-fourteen, Cas, a horrible, stupid death. And what's worse..." her eyebrows were slamming together, "I think you wanted to die. You wanted it." She paused, went quiet.

Cas frowned, opened his mouth. "I don't—"

Alex laughed, an airy sound, turning loopy once again. "My god, I'm convinced now, Cas. Zachariah's right," she laughed hollowly, went limp, almost falling down, but Cas held her up. She looked at him in fear, sort of falling apart, unable to stop herself from giving all of her fears a voice. "Sam will say yes, because he's dark inside, he'll say yes, and the world will burn, and Dean will try and stop it and he can't, and I can't do anything about it, obviously—my brothers are tearing the world apart, and God, what am I supposed to do, or can I do anything, ha, I can't, cuz I'm nothing—"

"Alex—" Cas tried to cut her off sternly, but she was just laughing at herself, a drunken kind of sound.

"It's so funny. Me thinking my life mattered, and you saying God had some purpose for me, it's a joke Cas, all lies—"

"Alex, stop!—look at me!" He almost shook her, his face furious, confused, alarmed at the way she was behaving. "Look at me!"

She did, she did looked at him, suddenly vulnerable and clear eyed, her breakdown cut short. He didn't seem to know what to say, and she looked at him desperately, like she was waiting for him to relieve her fears, to tell her everything was going to be okay.

And suddenly, they were not there anymore.

Dean and Sam stood with the "Trickster" in front of them—encased in a ring of burning holy oil; because they had realized after he dragged them through an odd TV reality, slung Cas around like a rag doll, refused to die, that he was something else entirely—an angel, and probably a pretty powerful one. Their hunch paid off. In the just-lit circle of fire, the Trickster clapped slowly, his bluff called. "Well played, boys. Well played. Where'd I screw up? How'd you know?"

Sam answered. "Nobody gets the jump on Cas like you did. Only another angel could slam him around like that."

Dean leveled the Trickster with a superior little smirk. "Mostly it was the way you talked about armageddon."

"Meaning?" Trickster asked, not following.
Dean shrugged. "Well, call it personal experience, but nobody gets that angry unless they're talking about their own family."

Trickster seemed mildly irritated by that statement. "So which one are you?" Sam asked. "Grumpy, Sneezy, or Douchey?"

Rolling his eyes at the terrible joke, the Trickster sighed. "Gabriel, okay? They call me Gabriel."

Sam's forehead wrinkled. "Gabriel? The Archangel?"

"Guilty."

Dean sauntered forward a couple of steps. "Okay, Gabriel. First things first. You are gonna bring Cas and Alex back here from whatever hell you stashed them in."

"Oh am I?" Gabriel asked, smiling coolly.

"Yeah. You are," Dean said calmly. "Or we're going to dunk you in some holy oil and deep-fry ourselves an archangel." Gabriel's smile faded. He waited a couple seconds, and then, clearly pissed, he raised his hand and snapped his fingers.

Dean looked behind himself to see a slumped, bleeding, half-conscious Alex being held up by Cas, who was breathing heavily, blood running down his nose and the side of his face. His hands on Alex's arms seemed to be the only thing holding her up. "Alex! What happened?" Sam asked, rushing to them as Dean rounded on Gabriel. Angry was putting Dean's disposition lightly.

"Gabriel, what the hell did you do to her?!

The archangel just smiled, shrugged innocently. Cas was glaring daggers at Gabriel. "He put her through a series of hells for his own personal amusement."

Dean's expression was murderous as Gabriel smiled nonchalantly. "What can I say, she delivered—I laughed, I cried, I learned new things about myself."

"You son of a bitch!" Dean shouted.

"I should have known this was you, Gabriel," Cas said with no shortage of gravelly disgust.

Gabriel held up his hands in defense, acting like he didn't know what the issue was. "Hey, before you deep fry me, consider this. I didn't really do anything to her. It was all inside her already, I just... nudged a few feelings around. Brought a few things to the surface." He looked at all three of the men in turn. "You're the ones who did this to her. You."

Dean stepped closer, his expression dangerous. "Why?"

Gabriel rolled his eyes. "Why not? She and I are practically the same person, and I'm tired of her blind loyalty to your dumb, sorry asses. All the two of you do to her... all my family has done to me... is tear apart everything worth loving. You wondering why I became the trickster? My own private witness protection. I skipped out of Heaven, had a face transplant, carved out my own little corner of the world so I didn't have to deal with the shit my family surrounded me with." He wagged his eyebrows. "Sound familiar? Remember when Alex ran away, Dean? Too bad she crawled back."

"Of course she came back, this is her family," Sam said, almost snarling as he took a step toward Gabriel from where he'd been standing beside Cas.
"What family?" Gabriel asked in humored disbelief. "Turned against each other, tearing at each other's throats? Why the hell do you think I brought you here and did this to you and am trying to get you to play your roles? Because I am tired of my family tearing itself to shreds." His good mood was gone. He was suddenly, intensely angry. "I need it to be over!"

Dean shook his head, lips in a thin line. "You are something else. You got some nerve, involving my brother and sister in your douche-nozzle family drama. You're all a bunch of assholes." He glanced over his shoulder, thinking of something. "Uh, no offense, Cas."

"None taken," Cas said darkly.

Gabriel looked positively ruffled at Dean's comment about his family. "Shut your cake hole. You don't know anything about my family. I love my father, my brothers. Love them. But watching them betray each other, slowly kill each other? I couldn't stand it! Okay? So I left. And now it's happening all over again."

"Then help us stop it," Sam said, trying to appeal to reason.

Gabriel scoffed. "It can't be stopped. This has to happen."

"You wanna see the world end?" Dean asked in angered disbelief.

"Haven't you been listening?" Gabriel shouted. "I have to sit back and watch my own brothers kill each other thanks to you two! Heaven? Hell? I don't care who wins, I just want it to be over!"

Sam shook his head, desperate. "It doesn't have to be like that. There has to be some way to, to pull the plug."

Gabriel looked at Sam patronizingly. "You do not know my family. What you guys call the apocalypse, I used to call Sunday dinner. That's why there's no stopping this, because this isn't about a war. It's about two brothers that loved each other and betrayed each other—and guess what, there was nothing anyone could do about it. Not me. Not your sister."

"What are you talking about?" Sam demanded.

Gabriel's expression fell. He shook his head blankly. "You sorry sons of bitches. Why do you think you two are the vessels? Think about it. Michael, the big brother, loyal to an absent father, and Lucifer, the little brother, rebellious of Daddy's plan. Their younger sibling they fight over and don't even realize they're driving away or damaging in the process. That was me. That's her."

Dean and Sam both looked at Alex, who was apparently a little lucid again. She was staring back at them, her expression pained and tired, clutching onto Cas weakly. Gabriel wasn't done. "You were born to this, boys. It's your destiny! It was always you! As it is in Heaven, so it must be on earth. One brother has to kill the other, and it's to the point where I don't care who dies. Can't say the same for her, though." He looked at Sam, smiling a little. "Somehow, Sam... I think you already know that."

"What the hell are you saying?" Sam demanded, getting more aggravated by the second.

"Why do you think I've always taken such an interest in you boys? Because from the moment Dad flipped on the lights around here, we knew it was all gonna end with you. Always. This is real, and it's gonna end bloody for all of us. That's just how it's gotta be. Accept it."

Dean came close to the edge of the ring of fire, his glare unrelenting. The flames reflected in his dark eyes, a menacing effect. "No. I won't accept it. And you know what? We're out of here."
Dean turned and walked away, over to Cas, reaching for Alex. "I got her," Dean said tersely, giving Cas a look. Cas let go.

"Uh. Okay. Guys? You're just gonna, you're gonna leave me here forever?" Gabriel asked, stock still, stuck inside the ring.

Dean turned, and Sam took Alex from him, helped her out through the door as Dean hung back. "No. We're not, 'cause we don't screw with people the way you do. And for the record? This isn't about some prize fight between your brothers or some destiny that can't be stopped. This is about you being too afraid to stand up to your family!" Dean pulled the fire alarm roughly, and the sprinklers and alarm went off. "Don't say I never did anything for you," Dean shouted over the noise, and Gabriel glared angrily, the water raining down over his head. Dean left and didn't look back.

Sam had Alex sitting on the trunk of the Impala, and he was checking her for injuries as she kind of swayed unevenly, stared at nothing. "Cas, what the hell happened?" Dean demanded.

Cas ignored the question—he was looking at Alex intently. "She really needs to be taken to the hospital. Her physical injuries are worse than I thought. Meet me there."

He reached out and touched Alex's shoulder, even as Sam protested, "Wait—"

But the angel and their sister disappeared, and Dean swore violently, gave Sam, who shrugged as if to say 'not my fault' a dagger glare. "Are you kidding me?!" Dean bitched, and slammed his hand on top of the car in frustration.

Alex stared at the shiny hospital floor, hearing the nurse ask Cas, "Okay, and are you her husband?"

He had an arm around her waist, holding her steady, his other hand was grasping her forearm. "N —" Cas began.

Alex cut him off, her speech a little slurred. "Yes." She wasn't even looking, but she guessed he was looking at her like she had three heads at that point. But she knew the hospital rules about family, and she didn't want to be alone. She would explain to him later, if she could remember… oh, look, that person was wearing crocs. The stupidest shoe in the world...

"All right, follow me," the nurse's voice said. "What happened to her?"

Cas's low voice rumbled through her, since she was practically attached to him at the moment. "She was dragged into an alternate dimension created by an archangel and subsequently forced to relive painful memories and face inner turmoil."

Alex looked up, pitched forward a little. Cas's grip tightened on her. Just as Alex predicted, the nurse was frozen, looking at them oddly. "I tried to commit suicide," Alex lied, weakly flopping her bloody hand out. It was the best lie she could come up with at a moment's notice. "Uh, okay," the nurse said, looking at Cas oddly, who was looking at Alex, frowning. She just looked down again, so dizzy and sick. She heard someone say, "We'll take her from here."

Immediately, she felt Cas's fingers tighten against her waist, her arm. "No, I will not leave her side."

Oh, that's nice, she thought dreamily, floating forward. She spaced out again, not really sure what was happening or how much time had passed or which direction was up or down. Eventually, she realized she was laying in a hospital bed, and being hooked up to things, poked, prodded. Cas stood beside the bed, watching her with a grim expression. She felt lucid again, at least for right then, as his eyes met hers. "I should have known when I couldn't get to you," he said. "That he wasn't simply a trickster."

Alex sighed a very long sigh. Her head felt like it was three feet outside of her skull. "He's called the trickster for a reason. He fools everyone." Cas didn't look reassured at her statement. In fact, he looked even more depleted. "I'll be fine, Cas," Alex said weakly, because she knew she would be. "I get knocked down a lot, yeah. But I always get back up." She paused, her face blank, her mind ghosting over the new wounds that were fresh in her mind from the scenes Gabriel had showed her from her younger years. "I always survive," she murmured, half to herself, then glanced at Cas. She remembered how she had broken down with him earlier, unleashed the floodgates on him. She suddenly felt very stupid and weak, and unable to look at him.

He, however, wouldn't stop looking at her, that frown of his deepening. But instead of stern, he looked bothered. "I'm supposed to be your protector," he said. He sounded disillusioned.

She looked up at him appraisingly, her vision going double for a second. "Even after you're cut off from Heaven and kicked out of the angel points club?"

He looked at her, his eyebrows moving down just slightly. "Yes. Still."

Something about the way he said that made her want to jump out of her skin, made her feel like—ouch! She winced as one of the nurses stuck another IV needle in her arm. A muscle jerked in Cas's jaw. She watched them hang a bag of saline solution and hook it up to the newest needle in her arm. She then glanced at Cas, suddenly worried. "You're not gonna just disappear or leave, are you?" Her gaze faltered—she had sounded way, way too desperate just then. "I just—I don't wanna be alone." But after the graveyard… he knew that, didn't he?

His eyebrows moved just a little closer together. "I will not leave your side," he said. And that small statement made her feel so much better.

She almost smiled. "Thanks, Cas." She watched as he pulled up a chair beside her and sat there with his hands clasped in his lap.

Growing somber, she remembered everything that had happened in the graveyard and looked away, into her lap. She had thought, just for a moment, when he had touched her face, wiped her tears away, his eyes meeting hers so soulfully that maybe, maybe there was something there. That maybe the way he had felt about her in 2014 was already there, or someday would be there, below the surface. The way his arms had wrapped around her, then tightened… had she imagined that? She'd been so distraught that maybe she'd imagined it. Sidelong, her eyes swept over his face that was becoming so familiar. He had such a simple, open face, yet something about it stuck with her, etched itself inside her mind.

His face wasn't the only thing etched in her mind. She couldn't even begin to think about the memories she'd been shown about Dean, Sam, and Dad. She refused. Not now. It was too much and she just couldn't. Instead, she focused on her hospital wristband. And without even wanting to, thought of kissing Cas again. The heart rate monitor suddenly sped up a few beats, and Cas looked at it, frowning in concern, then looking at her. Alex kind of shrank back into her pillows, knowing her face was giving away everything—he just didn't know what that everything was.

She had to let that kiss go and just focus on the present moment, stop over-thinking everything and tricking herself into hoping that could happen again. Offhandedly, she thought of the weird reality where the Trickster… or, Gabriel, she guessed, had made her think for a split second she was married to Cas. She felt a little embarrassed, wondered if Cas realized the significance of that or… she glanced at him. He was leaning forward over his knees now, his fingers laced through and face intense.

She cleared her throat, a little timid. "Cas, can you do me a favor? Don't, just don't tell my brothers. About the husband-Cas thing with the Trickster. They'd never let me hear the end of it, and I just… it's weird. Please." She hoped she didn't have to say more, or explain further.

He looked at her a moment. "Of course." He paused, then seemed to have an idea, the smallest little smile coming over his face. He held out his hand, the pinky extended. For a split second, Alex looked at his hand, confused. Then, she realized what he was doing with a surprised little smile. She followed suit, held out her pinky and they wrapped their smallest fingers around each other's. "I am forever bound," he said, clearly pleased that he had remembered this and applied it in the proper social context. Oh my god, it was too cute and funny, the way he looked so proud of himself for making a joke and remembering a gesture she'd taught him. Alex couldn't help it. Even after everything today—all the pain, all the horrible pain—that sight of him smiling, his eyes bright with a pleased, boyish twinkle warranted no other reaction from her—she smiled too and the smile reached her eyes.

Dean and Sam rushed into the hospital room to find Cas, sitting beside Alex's bedside, watching her. "Oh my god," Sam breathed. Dean, a fist to his mouth, stood still, physically trying to contain himself at the sight of Alex in the hospital bed, eyes closed, hooked up to all the monitors and IV drips.

"She's sleeping," Cas explained, standing when he saw them. He came and joined them at the foot of the bed.

"Son of a bitch," Dean managed, his expression almost terrified, although a little less than before Cas had said the part about her only being asleep. "Will she be all right?"

Cas's frown deepened, his eyes went to Alex's sleeping form. "Physically, yes."

"And… not physically?" Dean prompted.

Cas's eyes slid to Dean's. "I don't know." They all looked at her small, sleeping shape there on the hospital bed. Cas's expression was unreadable. "Something is wrong with Alex."

"No shit, Sherlock—she just got torn to shreds in Gabriel's little house of horrors!" Dean almost shouted.

Cas glanced at him, perturbed. "No. I—" he paused, searching for words. "It's not that. It's something else."

"What do you mean?" Dean demanded, getting even more agitated.

Cas seemed frustrated, and answered Dean with an air of aggravated shortness, staring at him cynically. "I'm not sure, Dean."

Dean made a face and rolled his eyes, then huffed, letting it go, but mad about something else, of course. "Fine, oh and by the way, next time maybe let us know which hospital you decide to beam up to, Scotty. We went to three other ones before finding you here." He brushed past Cas, went to Alex's side, put his hand on the side of her head, looked down at her and stroked his thumb across her hair, a pained expression on his face that Sam and Cas couldn't see.
"Okay, well can you tell us the details of what happened to her?" Sam was asking Cas, oblivious to what Dean was doing.

Sam got a sidelong glance from Cas, who seemed to be thinking deeply. "Yes," the angel said momentarily. "Gabriel showed her memories that were intentionally chosen to make old pains resurface. And he made her kill your father—at least, someone who looked like him. And then you, Sam, as well. And he tried to make her kill Dean. If I hadn't been able to get there... I believe she would be dead right now." Both the brothers looked at him, understanding perfectly, horrified. Cas's expression, too, was unusually terse.

"Son of a bitch. I should never have let that asshole go," Dean said, glaring daggers at the space in front of him.

Sam, however, was tilting his head to the side, eyes narrowed. "So she killed someone who looked like Dad? And me? But... not Dean?" he asked. He got a little smile on his face. The kind he got when he was pissed about something.

"Why do you sound so surprised?" Cas asked, drawing a startled look from both of the Winchester boys. Cas looked at Sam with what could only be called a glare. "I saw her memories, Sam. What you've done." Sam's face went blank, and then Cas stepped a little closer. "And I know what you did to her recently."

There was a darkness to Cas's voice that was making Sam look nervous. "Uh—yeah, I—"

Cas stepped a little closer, pivoting his chin down, staring at Sam unflinchingly, levelly. "Do not ever make the same mistake. Do you understand?"

Sam was frozen, staring, mouth half-open. Dean, however, was looking at Cas incredulously. "Whoa, dude—are you seriously threatening my brother right now?" He approached Cas with a glaring frown. "Is that any of your business?"

Cas turned, looked Dean straight in the eyes. "Yes. As a matter of fact, it is."

Dean's eyebrows shot up. "Oh, really?" He was beside himself, indignant. "Last time I checked, this was my family, not yours. Did you forget to take your Prozac today or something Cas?"

Cas's eyes narrowed. "I don't know what Prozac is. I only want to be clear with Sam that I will not allow him to physically harm Alex like that again."

Sam looked reluctant, guilty. "Well, I won't. Trust me."

Just then, a nurse came to the door and looked directly at Cas, tapping lightly on the doorframe with her knuckles, a chart in her other hand. "Excuse me, sir, we have the pathology on your wife."

"Your wife?!" Dean asked, his face twisting in disbelief and offense. Sam's eyebrows had shot up high.

"Your wife?!" Dean asked, his face twisting in disbelief and offense. Sam's eyebrows had shot up high.

Cas merely glanced at the brothers, then looked back at the nurse, who was looking between the two of them uncertainly. "Go ahead."

"Well, she's severely dehydrated and it kind of looks like sunstroke, or heat exhaustion. But, all of her labs are fine. She just needs some rest and fluids. We already got the stitches in her palm wound, so basically, we'll discharge her in a couple days, once we make sure she's shipshape. Nothing to worry about. Your wife is going to be fine."
She smiled pleasantly at Cas, who nodded. "Thank you."

The nurse left. Dean was practically fuming, but Cas turned and spoke to him before he could sound off. "Alex lied to the staff so that I could stay with her. It's the hospital rules," he added, as if they wouldn't have known that.

"What, you couldn't have been her cousin or uncle?" Dean asked hostilely, and Cas frowned, not seeming to understand.

Even Sam looked at Dean oddly, maybe embarrassed or annoyed with his brother's seemingly erratic behavior. "Calm down Dean... maybe you're the one who needs some Prozac." Dean just glared at Sam, who gave him a weird look and tried reasoning with him. "You heard the nurse. Alex is gonna be fine. Just relax." Dean almost rolled his eyes at the suggestion.

Cas looked at Dean. "Never mind, look, the reason I was trying to find you and realized you three were missing is because I had news to share. I have it on good authority that a demon named Crowley has the Colt." At this piece of news, both Winchesters looked surprised, intrigued. Cas continued. "I've gotten close to finding him. I think I've almost... 'got' him."

Dean nodded gruffly. "Good. Good. Okay. Well, let's get Alex rested and okay and back to Bobby's. Then, we find this Crowley dude, get the Colt, kill the devil. Sound like a plan?" He was being a little facetious, obviously still mad.

Sam rolled his eyes, but Cas was stoic. "Agreed. You two go rest. I'll watch over Alex tonight."

Dean got a crazy look on his face. "Oh no. I am not leaving this hospital, and I am not leaving you alone with her." Cas frowned, not understanding as Dean continued angrily. "That chair over has my name on it. And Sam, you're not going anywhere either. I want you all where I can see you."

Sam rolled his eyes, his jaw clenched, but he said nothing. Even Cas looked annoyed at Dean's domineering attitude.

Ignoring them, Dean sat down in the chair beside Alex's bed and slouched down into the seat, kind of sullen and pissy. No one said anything else.

Eventually, the brothers fell asleep, leaving Castiel as the only one awake. The hours ticked by, but he stayed there at Alex's bedside, unmoving, listening to the "beep-beep-beep" of the heart rate monitor. Watching the night shadows shift and move across Alex's sleeping form. The blinds on the window filled the room with stripes of darkness and soft slats of moonlight.

After staring at it for hours, around four in the morning, finally, he reached out and brushed the strand of hair that lay across her forehead away with his fingertips. She looked so peaceful as she slept.

Chapter End Notes

I wanted to develop the idea of Sam having a darker side. I've always felt his backstory was lacking something, so I took matters into my own hands... PLEASE GUYS DON'T FREAK OUT I AM NOT CHANGING SAM TRUST ME PLEASE I KNOW WHERE I'M GOING WITH THIS-keep in mind, things may not be what they seem... I pinky promise you it will all be okay and be explained further.
The Next Morning

Beep, beep, beep… the sound faded in as Alex slowly came out of a deep and dreamless sleep. She groggily opened her eyes half way, for a second not remembering where she was or what had happened—and then she saw the hospital room ceiling above her, felt the uncomfortable pressure where IV needles were shoved into her arms, was aware of a dull throbbing pain in the palm of her hand where stitches criss-crossed her flesh. And with these physical pains as a reminder, she recalled yesterday. And the days before it. And whatever peace she’d had while asleep was immediately gone.

"Good morning, Alex," came a deep, husky voice above and beside her. Startled, Alex snapped awake, sitting up halfway then cringing, sore everywhere, but looking to where the voice had come from. Castiel's familiar countenance stared down at her from where he stood beside the hospital bed—but his ever-present frown softened as their eyes locked.

"You're... still here," she said clumsily, both a question and a somewhat stunned comment. She vaguely remembered falling asleep last night, totally exhausted but feeling at least a little okay because Cas was there and hadn't left her alone. But she remembered even as she drifted off just knowing Cas would be gone in the morning—he always disappeared, after all—so seeing him still there made her stomach feel odd. Alex heard a soft, familiar snore at that moment and looked around the room, realizing that her brothers were there. Sam was in one of the corners, his giant body crammed into a hospital chair, an elbow on his knee and his face propped awkwardly on his hand as he leaned into the wall. And there on the other side of the room, Dean was slumped down uncomfortably in another chair, head awkwardly lolling back, mouth gaping widely.

Cas must have seen her looking at Dean, because he spoke up. "I don't think he meant to fall asleep. He was very irritable last night."

Of course he was. Alex glanced at Cas, feeling bad—there was no telling what Dean had said or done last night. She could only imagine. Lately it had been nothing but mood swings and authoritarian rampages from her oldest brother, who was under daily-increasing levels of stress and didn't seem to know how to handle it any other way but to rip into his siblings and anyone else who dared get in his way. That, combined with his general weird attitude toward Cas more recently—well, it had all probably come to a bit of a head yesterday. And sure, it didn't help that Castiel had just spirited her away to a hospital without a second word to Dean, but for God's sake, her brother was really being a nightmare lately. She actually kind of wondered how exhausted Dean had to have been to fall asleep with Cas standing there—or maybe Cas had left and just returned a few minutes ago… she frowned a little and kind of cocked her head to the side, looking at Cas intently. "Have you... just been standing there all night?"

His answer was simple and immediate. "Yes. I watched over you."

The second the words left his lips, Alex's mouth dropped open slightly in surprise; she was more than a little flustered at the thought of him standing there just watching her sleep all night—that plus his earnest expression and the simple, open way he'd said the words blindsided her, made her feel oddly bare and exposed. And the silence that hung there after it seemed to demand she say something, anything. But she literally felt that she'd forgotten the entire English language. Couldn't think of a single damn thing to say. An eloquent "uhh..." escaped her, and Castiel just continued to look down at her, his expression concerned again. Then he surprised her again by drawing in a deep breath, simultaneously sitting on the edge of the bed as his eyebrows knit together in a thoughtful, troubled expression. Alex was frozen, noticing helplessly how close he was at that moment sitting against the side of her hip. The end of his trench coat bunched up over the top of her thigh.

Pensive, he looked at her intently, oblivious to her sudden inability to breathe deeply. Alex was abruptly and intensely anxious not only because of his close proximity, but also because something about that look on his face. He took a long time to speak, clearly struggling. His troubled eyes searched hers in silence, then fell away. "Seeing you in torment was..." his eyes flicked back to hers, "unbearable to me."

Her chest tightened. Their eyes remained locked and the air in the room seeming to be thin, hard to breathe. Cas's forehead was wrinkled deeply and he looked like he was waiting for her to say something... but she was completely speechless, so much more than before. It was because she knew that he meant what he'd said, and what's more, that he didn't know what to do with it. He had said it almost as if he were asking her what to do about it, how to react. And it was clear that he had been thinking about it, long and hard—waiting all night to tell her after maybe gathering the courage, or trying to decide how to say it. Alex swallowed. He had essentially confessed that her pain affected him on a level that frightened him. And that, in turn, scared her—because... what the hell did that mean for them, exactly? He looked down, just for a second, at her hand where it rested palm down beside her on the bed—his hand moved slightly where it rested on his knee—was he thinking about touching her hand?—and then his eyes jumped back to hers again, waiting, anxious. His vivid blue eyes held so much honesty and pain and confusion.

He'd seen her come apart completely—in a way that felt shameful for her. He'd seen Gabriel fling painful memory after painful memory at her, tear her down piece by piece and leave her a lost, crying, slobbering mess on all-fours. Somehow Cas had broken the divide and come to her in one of her darkest, most terrifying moments. And without a second thought, she had reached for him and he hadn't turned her away. He'd quietly held her and unknowingly anchored her in the middle of the storm of pain. As she looked at him right now, she didn't know how to tell him what that had meant for her. And actually, she felt like she shouldn't confess it at all. It was too revealing of her innermost conflicted feelings—feelings that instinctively she believed must be wrong to have. The things she thought of him, the way he'd gotten so close, so far under her skin—it alarmed her. She had never felt these things about anyone else.

Her thoughts achingly went back to how Castiel had held her like no one else ever had. Right now as they looked at each other wordlessly with bated breath, she wanted it again so badly. Just to be inside the warmth of his arms, to be close and feel his heart beating, hear him breathing steadily next to her. Feel the gentle pull of his fingers against her back like yesterday, when he'd experimentally and hesitantly pulled her close. The way that he'd held her had momentarily banished her fears and pains. It had just been for a moment. But the moment had been long enough. Long enough to pull her back from the edge of obliterating, mind-numbing pain that threatened to shatter her apart.

She remembered being struck oddly as she cried into his shoulder that he smelled faintly like fabric softener. She'd been mystified as to why he smelled that way. Been comforted by it too because it seemed so common... so everyday. She hadn't expected it. He'd wiped tears from her face, the gentle and seemingly tender touch of his fingertips scarred into her memory forever. Cas had done so much for her—too much for her, not only yesterday. It all seemed to suggest one thing, that she had known all along, but not really fully believed. He cared. Much more than she had imagined or understood. Was 'cared' the right word?

Beside her, his hand again moved and left his knee to rest palm down on the bed, fingertips pointing toward hers, and his hand inched forward just slightly toward her hand. Was that... was he doing that on purpose? All that Alex could think, desperate and afraid and so confused was why would this angel care about me like this, let alone at all? If it was because he had some kind of feelings for her, that was the most frightening thought of all to Alex. Not just because of everything that might happen in 2014. Because it was scary as hell to think of him seeing her in that way. It intimidated her to wonder, was he in a place where he cared about her past the point of friendship? Because when he looked at her in this way, holding her locked in a gaze, searching her eyes, his hand inching toward hers, everything inside of Alex seemed to scream at her that he must, he must—his fingertips gently hit up against hers on the surface of the bed, the faintest touch. Alex's eyes were big and staring into Cas's in breathless uncertainty. What are you doing, Castiel?

There was the sound of stirring to their left and the moment was suddenly over, their gaze breaking and hands jumping apart, but not before they realized Dean was awake, looking at them. He seemed cranky, groggy, but was quickly becoming alert. "The hell... what time is it?" he managed, voice gravelly and a little disoriented. Cas stood up from where he sat, and even as Dean got out of his chair, there was a glare on his face aimed at the angel. "You're still here?" The question was accusing and hostile, and Alex was surprised at how Dean just automatically went there—didn't even bother with unpleasant or cranky, just went full speed ahead to asshole.

Cas, however, didn't even blink, just met Dean's eyes evenly. "Yes."

Dean stared pointedly for a second, then gestured at the door to the room, rudely demanded, "you wanna give us a minute?"

Cas looked at Alex briefly, then to Dean, frowning a little, then, under Dean's scowl, seeming to understand the implication. He somewhat grudgingly stepped out into the hallway, closing the door behind him.

Alex looked at Dean, upset. "What's your problem?"

"Was he here all night?" Dean demanded, ignoring her question, his eyes narrowed as he pointed an errant finger in the general direction Cas had just gone.

"I don't know," Alex lied, immediately, automatically; feeling a twinge of guilt the second she said it.

Dean was looking at her in a very intent, judgmental way she didn't like, and she scowled back at him, sidelong, a lot more pissed off than she was letting on. He came a little closer, towering over her, arms crossed. "So you wanna tell me what went down in Trickster Land?" he asked.

She gave him a full on glare, tired of his crap and enraged that he was acting this way after everything she'd been through yesterday. "No. Screw off."

"Excuse me?" he asked, incredulous, as if he couldn't believe his ears.

She grabbed the TV remote and switched it on, not looking at him purposefully. "You heard me."

Dean stood there a second, completely ready fight with her. A million sarcastic comments and retorts ran across his mind, all perfect for pissing her off and hurting her feelings and putting her in her place. But even as he thought that, he kind of did a mental double take, realizing that geez, she was in the hospital and had been put through hell yesterday—he wasn't even really sure about what exactly had gone down, all he had to go on were some vague details that Cas had mentioned. Dean stayed silent, stewing even as he realized that he was being an absolute douchebag.

But speaking of douchebags, Dean's mind turned to someone he didn't mind picking a fight with. The guy who had taken Alex, zapped off with her and not even let Dean know where to. The guy who saw no problem posing as Alex's husband, who had spent all friggin' night there in the same room with her, and was even sitting on Alex's bed staring at her intensely when Dean had woken up. The warning he had given himself in 2014 seemed to be screaming through his mind anew like a blaring alarm, danger, danger!

Dean left Alex's room and barged out into the hallway, looking both ways for the angel in question. Cas was a few doors down, looking into a patient's room through the open door, staring curiously at the flowers at the patient's bedside. Dean marched toward him, every freaked out, scared shitless thought compelling him forward.

He hadn't thought much of the warning he'd given himself in 2014, not after asking Alex about it a month ago—it had sounded absolutely ridiculous—junkless dweeby Cas and emo awkward Alex, a couple? He would find it funny if it wasn't starting to legitimately worry him. When he asked her about it when they got back, she'd smacked down the idea immediately, which had settled him, assured him, effectively sent the worry packing in Dean's mind. Until yesterday.

The image of Cas holding a woozy Alex up fleetingly passed over his mind's eye—the sight had freaked him the hell out; both of them bleeding and battered and clinging to each other in a way that seemed too close, too personal. He'd remembered his words to himself in 2014, when he'd warned about Cas being Alex's death sentence.

He thought again about how Cas held his sister, protective and invested, not stoic, not blasé. Cas held Alex like he meant it—there was no other way to describe it—like a man held a woman. And Dean remembered how Alex was clutching to the angel by handfuls of shirt for dear life, as if she were depending on him completely. It had unsettled Dean in the deepest way possible, but he'd tried to tell himself it was nothing, tried to believe the best of both his friend and his sister, but was still left wondering when the hell this had happened. Last time he checked Alex was annoyed by Cas, didn't trust him much. Maybe he should have paid closer attention, because now he was beginning to suspect the worst.

The scene he'd witnessed when he'd woken just a few minutes ago flashed across his mind again: his sister, propped up in her bed, Cas sitting on the bed, entirely too close to her as they gazed at each other, their expressions so intense and disappearing the second they realized Dean was awake. Cas, standing up, as if trying to hide something from him. And all of it was setting something off inside Dean, some raging fear that everything he'd warned himself about was true, was possible, and maybe already happening.

Dean had reached Cas in all of ten seconds, his jumbled, chaotic thoughts making him physically shaky. He roughly grabbed the angel by the shoulder, demanding his attention angrily. "Okay, Cas, you tell me right now—what the hell is going on with you and my sister?"

Cas seemed perplexed by the sudden assault, looking at Dean's hand with a disapproving frown, then at Dean with narrowed eyes. "I'm her protector."

"Yeah? What, you don't have a thing for her?" Dean pressed angrily, not letting go of Cas, instead grabbing a fistful of the trench coat covering Cas's shoulder.

The angel's head tilted slightly to the side in perplexed bewilderment and he ignored Dean's physical escalation. "What kind of... thing?"
Dean was disgusted, impatient with Cas's stupidity. "You are such a pain in my ass," he griped through tightly clenched teeth, and then his voice raised into a near shout, and he shoved Cas slightly with the hand that gripped his shoulder. "Like, a romantic thing!"

At that, Cas's expression darkened, and he stepped further into Dean's space, voice lowered, as he grabbed Dean's hand off of his shoulder and pushed it back to Dean's side, his superhuman strength overpowering Dean's attempt at resistance easily. "You should watch your tone with me," Castiel almost growled. "I have tolerated your disrespect toward me for a very long time, Dean." The angel was clearly angry. "I have proved myself again and again to you. Why are you angry with me?"

"Because in twenty-fourteen, I found out you're the one who gets Alex killed, okay?" Dean spat out, and there it was, out in the open.

Cas looked as all the air had left his lungs. He went completely still, his face screwing up in disbelief. "What?"

"Yeah, apparently," Dean said sarcastically. There was general horror on Castiel's face, an expression Dean hadn't seen there before.

"Why didn't you mention that when you told me everything?" Cas asked, sounding genuinely upset, almost angry. Dean met his demanding gaze haltingly. He'd taken the angel aside when Cas had checked in a couple weeks ago and told him, in general terms, about 2014, but he hadn't exactly known how to bring up that little part about Alex. He also hadn't really seen the point, because he had honestly believed it was a bunch of weirdo crap, mostly, until yesterday and today. At Dean's silence, Cas relented, his face softening. He touched Dean's shoulder gently, imploringly—the same shoulder that held the angry red hand print Cas had burned onto him in Hell. Dean looked at him harshly as Cas spoke. "It can't be true, Dean. You know that I would never let her die," Cas reasoned, but he sounded disturbed, unsure, as if he didn't know what to believe. He took his hand off of Dean's shoulder.

"Well it wasn't exactly in your control anymore, was it, Cas?" Dean asked him bitterly. "You weren't an angel anymore, remember? You were a friggin' human, and twenty-fourteen me warned me to keep you two apart."

Cas shook his head, either not understanding, or flat out refusing. "We can't be apart, I'm her guardian angel." Dean's expression darkened as Cas continued. "I've been charged to watch over her for her lifetime."

Dean laughed humorlessly, seeing the irony right away. "If memory serves, you were also charged with being obedient to Heaven, and I don't see you following that little rule anymore."

Visibly caught off guard by that statement, Cas was momentarily silent, almost guiltily so, and Dean looked at him in superiority. Then, Cas raised his chin, face neutral again. "Dean, I promise you. I will never let harm come to her."

"Then why is she in a hospital bed right now, huh Cas?" Dean raged. "Cuz you did such a damn great job protecting her yesterday!"

Hurt shimmered across Cas's face before his eyes lowered in shame. Dean regretted his words, just a little bit. But then even more when Cas spoke, not looking at Dean. "I suppose I did fail her. And you. I couldn't rescue any of you from Gabriel. He was too powerful for me. Especially now." His eyes flicked up, pained, and Dean knew he meant now that he was cut off from Heaven. "I'm deeply sorry, Dean."
Dean had to clench his jaw to hold back his annoyance that Cas had just made it so much harder to be angry with him. He relented, remembering everything Cas had ever done for him, how much he owed the guy. And truth be told, Dean was tired of being angry at everyone. In fact, he was beginning to feel kind of desperate. But he couldn't admit to that. He took a deep breath, trying to reconcile his anger and suspicion to how much he liked and wanted to trust the angel. "Listen, Cas, buddy. I appreciate everything you've done for us. I do. I'm just—up against a whole hell of a lot, you know?"

"Yes. I do know," Cas replied, surprising Dean. "That's why I'm trying to help you." He looked at Dean meaningfully, the expression tinged with guilt. "It's the least I can do. After all we've been through together."

Dean couldn't hold his gaze, and let out a heavy, guilty, ashamed huff of air. Why was every damn relationship in his life like this? Full of angry fights and guilt that never let go. It was exhausting. It felt terrible. Cas was right—they had been through a lot together. Cas had done more for him than most ever would have. It was easy to forget that when angry. This angel had raised him from Hell. Restored Alex's voice. Saved their asses multiple times. Defied Heaven and died for them. Dean really did have no right to fly off the handle this way at Castiel. And he knew it. Dean looked at Cas grudgingly, feeling like an ass.

Maybe he was reading into a situation that wasn't even there at all. Cas hadn't answered him, exactly, about Alex. But was it because Cas didn't even understand that possibility? Didn't understand the question because it was so unfathomable to him? Maybe the things Dean had been upset by—the way Cas had held Alex, the way he'd been gazing at her in the bed—maybe he was overreacting and just misinterpreting it. Cas was a pretty intense, unaware, awkward guy, right? And hell, to a passerby, the way Cas had touched Dean's shoulder a minute ago could have been misinterpreted. Dean really wanted to believe it was as simple as that. But after the warning he'd given himself... after everything... he would never be able to let it go completely, and he knew that. But today, he needed to just drop it instead of allowing this wavering friendship to break apart. Cas was waiting patiently for Dean to speak again, watching him silently, somberly.

Dean shook his head and shrugged mildly, spreading his hands. "I'm sorry man. It's just, you told me, once upon a time, that all roads lead to the same destination, that destiny can't be changed." He felt at a loss. "So, I mean, what the hell am I supposed to do? Just let you and Alex pal around, become best buds and then whatever else? That's me signing her death certificate, if twenty-fourteen me was telling the truth. Can I take that chance?" Cas's eyebrows moved together just slightly.

Dean was swallowing, staring at some unfocused point. "I can't let her die. Not her, ever. And not Sam, not again. They're all I've got left, and I can't lose them, Cas, not after everyone else. And basically, I've seen the future where they both die. So the only option I got left is to fight like hell to make sure that doesn't happen." He looked at Cas openly, not sure what else to say.

Cas looked empathetic, once again surprising Dean. "I understand."

Dean looked at Cas fully, letting himself be real for a just a moment. To sound the way he felt. Broken and scared and desperate. "Do you still believe it, Cas? That fate, destiny, whatever, can't be changed?"

Cas met his eyes with a grim hesitance, a muscle in his cheek jumping, his brows furrowing. "Truthfully... I'm not sure anymore."

Dean went still, looking at Cas intently, unsure why the answer struck him as oddly ominous. Maybe it was because for a flicker of a second, he wasn't sure if Cas were telling the truth or not.
Later That Day

The TV had been off for awhile now. Silence just sounded better. Alex stared out the hospital window from where she sat in the bed. She couldn't really see anything out the window except some tree branches. Sometimes, squirrels ran along the limbs, stopped, beat their tails in the air, then darted onwards. She watched idly, disinterested, not really seeing with her eyes, just thinking.

Dean had come back in a few minutes after he'd disappeared. He'd ignored Alex and shaken Sam awake. He'd been sort of quiet and grumpy, but at least not a total douche like before. He'd apparently run Cas off, too, because the angel never reappeared. Maybe that was for the best, but it made Alex feel a little sad at the same time, too. She had wanted him to stay. However, the intense thoughts his presence had put her through were still there, in the back of her mind bothering her, confusing her, which is why it was probably best for him to be gone. He'd probably show up again in a week or two, like he always did. In the mean time, she'd be left to her own devices... second-guessing everything, as usual. Wondering if she were crazy and imagining things. But the thing was, she really didn't think she was. She thought about Cas reaching out to touch her hand. Thought of it over and over again.

Sam and Dean had stayed with her for awhile, but it hadn't exactly been the Brady Bunch. They'd sat around in tense silence, watching TV halfway, ignoring the elephant in the room. Sam tried asking her at one point if she were okay, implying he wanted to know what had happened—but she had told them she didn't want to talk about it, more or less. And after that, they left, saying they were going on a supply run, and then Sam texted to let her know they were grabbing lunch, too, and did she want anything. No. She hadn't.

Alex was using the opportunity of solitude to mull over everything that Gabriel had put her through. In truth it all seemed kind of like one of her bad dreams. Like it couldn't have actually happened, that it was all in her mind. And well, she needed to remind herself that it hadn't happened, not really, and it hadn't been real, not actually. But her pain? That had been real. And Cas, he had been real. The way he'd held her... that had been real. That had been real.

More disturbingly, the memories of her family... those had been real. She wished they weren't. She'd pushed the ones she remembered away on purpose. And the ones she'd never seen before, well. They hurt on an entirely new level. They scared her—made her want to be far away from her brothers—made her feel like she literally couldn't trust anyone ever again. But underneath the negative feelings and the strong desire to bash their heads into a wall and leave, never come back... she refused to let herself think like that. Because she was deeply suspicious, after some thought, that maybe Gabriel was playing an angle where he wanted her to fall to pieces and break the brothers apart so they would 'play their roles.' He had said he did all that crap to her because she was like him and she needed to see the truth. But she really didn't buy that crap. She refused to be tricked. And he did call himself the Trickster, after all. But that didn't make sticking with her brothers any easier after feeling betrayed, rejected, and lied to by them.

She heard an increasingly familiar sound—Cas arriving, and she looked away from the window, startled out of her thoughts. Castiel stood there at the foot of her bed, his hands clasped behind his back. That was new. "Hello, Alex."

"Hi Cas," she said, glad to see him back (surprised, too). He looked handsome as always, solid and comforting. There was a noticeable spike in her anxiety level at his arrival. After a second of silence where he didn't say anything further, she cleared her throat softly, feeling awkward. "What are you doing here?"
"I came to check on you," he said, as if that should have been obvious. He glanced around the room. "Where are your brothers?"

"Went to go get food. They, uh, hate hospital food." She glanced at the tray of untouched food beside her. And so did she.

Cas didn't notice the tray, he was looking at her with an expression that was something like hopeful or uncertain, but also nearly excited. "I… have something for you." He came to the side of the bed, and his expression reminded her of when he'd been so proud of himself for remembering the pinky promise. "I noticed other patients, in other rooms, had flowers…" from behind his back, he produced a little bundle of yellow wildflowers. He held them out to her and she felt her face go slack when she saw a crappy little twine knot held them together. She stared, suddenly incredibly upset. Cas was saying, "I found them in a meadow right in the middle of a highway—"

Alex couldn't look at him—oh my god. Yellow wildflowers, tied in a shitty knot, just like Cas had left on her grave in 2014. Cas had stopped mid sentence, confused, taking in her sudden crumpled face. "What's wrong?" He looked at the flowers, still in his hand, confounded, almost alarmed. "Are they the wrong kind? Is this an inappropriate gesture?"

Alex tried to compose herself, but it didn't really work. "No… they're, they're, very nice, t-thank you."

She couldn't stop staring at the flowers, realizing that all the times she'd been in the hospital, she'd never been given flowers. Now, she felt emotional for different reasons. She was genuinely touched that Cas saw other patients with flowers, thought of her sitting in a room without any, decided she should have some, went out into a highway median and picked her some damn wildflowers. Gathered them into a bunch, tied them together with twine he got who knows where. Knotted them together in a horrible excuse for a bow, like a little kid might. She must have seemed entirely depressed as she stared at them, because Cas looked positively devastated as his eyes went from her face to the flowers uncertainly.

"I... don't understand—I thought you'd find them pleasing," Cas said, fumbling, and growing more confused by the second. His distress made Alex feel even worse. "Are they... the wrong color?"

"No," she said, half to herself, looking at them, almost physically pained at the memories they stirred inside. She saw a wooden cross etched in her initials, flowers just like these sitting there at the base. "They're... the right color." She reached out, took them, feeling horrible, not wanting him to think she was crazy or ungrateful. She knew she couldn't make him understand why—she refused to tell him about all of that. It was too painful, and he wouldn't know how to handle it.

He was mystified at her comment that they were the right color, but the moment was interrupted as Dean and Sam walked through the door. "What're you doing here?" Dean asked, not exactly friendly, but not as rude as earlier, either. Alex had quickly dashed away the expression on her face. Dean hadn't noticed, too busy giving Cas the evil eye. But Sam was looking at his sister intently, his eyebrows furrowed.

Cas seemed to take Dean's question as a 'get lost' because he straightened and told Dean, "I was just leaving. I still have much work to do tracking down this demon Crowley." He glanced at Alex, then back at Dean. "I'll be in touch." And he disappeared.

Dean looked at Alex, eyebrows raised, not exactly short on attitude. "Nice flowers."

"Why are you being such an asshole?" Alex asked pointedly.
"Because it's a Monday," Sam joked, attempting to lighten the mood. He got a sharp glare from Dean and a little, forced smile from his twin, who just couldn't summon a real one.

"I'm not being an asshole, I'm looking out for you," Dean said, addressing Alex gruffly. "Future me told me Cas is the reason you died, remember?" He made a face and threw his hands up. "Sorry for caring."

"They're just flowers," she grumbled.

Sam looked at his brother sidelong. "Dean, to be fair, do you really think that was a real future Zachariah showed you two? I mean—"

"I'm not taking that chance," Dean said, cutting him off sternly. "On either of your lives. Okay? So call me an asshole, I don't care." His pissy expression and general attitude didn't really convince the twins, who looked at each other at the same time, as if to say 'yeah, sure.'

Sam, a little uncomfortable, visibly pushed aside the retort he was holding inside and looked at Alex, cleared his throat. "Uh, so listen, we stopped and talked to the doc. They wanna do your psych evaluation in a few minutes."

Alex's eyebrows shot up high, and then she began sitting up in the bed. "Oh, forget that." She ripped the IVs out of her arms even as both of her brothers gaped in horror, Sam kind of springing forward, arms outstretched, trying to stop her, but it was already too late.

"What the hell are you doing?" Dean demanded, totally aghast, like she'd lost her mind.

"I don't need a shrink asking me twenty questions about my life and my brain, okay? It wasn't a suicide attempt and I don't care if it's standard procedure, I'm ready to get out of here anyway."

She shoved her shoes onto her feet unceremoniously, and Sam's plea of "Stop, Alex—" fell on deaf ears.

"No. I'm fine," she pretty much spat out, ignoring the stabbing pain in her side and the lightness in her head. "Let's go. Before they figure out the health insurance stuff they got from me this morning was fake."

Dean and Sam looked at each other, kind of grudging to admit that she did kind of have a point… and besides, Alex was already at the door. She looked back at where the wildflowers Cas had brought her had been forgotten on the bed. She glanced at Dean, who was watching her closely. And without much other choice, she turned, walked out, leaving the flowers there, because taking them felt like a loud exclamation of how much she was beginning to feel for Cas. And she didn't want anyone to know.

Twenty Minutes Later Mama Q's Diner

Dean shoved the plate of pancakes and sausage at Alex, who was practically glaring at him across the table. "Eat it."

"I'm not hungry, Dean, I told you," she said.

She didn't appreciate this—she didn't want to eat, but Dean had insisted they stop to get her something. And then she had insisted that she didn't want anything, and besides, Dean and Sam had already eaten, so it was pointless to go if she wasn't going to eat either. But Dean was set on her eating something, and had ordered her a huge breakfast plate and kept pressing, like right now.
"Just eat it, will you?" He barked, losing whatever patience he'd had. "You need your strength!"

She was getting more angry by the second, and she kind of lost it at this point. "Stop telling me what to do!" She shot back heatedly, and they glared at each other. At this point, she wouldn't eat even if she were hungry, just to spite him. Sam glanced between them, uncomfortable, as Alex pushed the plate back to Dean slowly, purposefully, speaking slowly, her voice dripping with attitude. "I'm fine. Just stop it, Dean. Everyone, but especially you, need to stop acting like I'm about to break in half or like you can boss me around all day long."

At that, Dean smiled in superiority, leaning back in the booth casually, knowing exactly how much that would piss her off. "So, Gabe really got to you, huh?"

He wouldn't have that stupid, smug smile on his face if he knew exactly what that all entailed. "Yeah, he did, okay Dean?" Alex replied angrily, and his smile disappeared at her brash tone. She scowled at her brothers across the table. One was giving her the 'I don't understand' puppy dog eyes. The other was giving her the threatening 'make me understand' glare. And Alex was outraged, her anger driven by the things Gabriel had showed her about them yesterday. "Gabriel, Trickster, whoever he is, showed me some messed up stuff. Made me do some pretty messed up stuff."

"Yeah, Cas gave us the Spark's Notes last night," Dean said, and his word choice and asshole tone got an even more agitated glare from Alex.

"Well thanks for your concern," she said snidely, to which Dean just rolled his eyes. Alex could have punched him in the frigging mouth. He was the worst. He was so heartfelt and caring with her usually, but if you didn't give him what he wanted, he threw temper tantrums better than any four year old ever could.

Sam leaned across the table, intent, concerned, and focused on Alex—polar opposite of Dean right now. "What happened, Alex?" He asked gently. "What'd he show you?"

Alex glanced at him fleetingly, kind of dodging his inquisitive, caring stare, her rage ebbing off a little. She felt exposed and sad suddenly instead of pissed, not sure how Sam could always be so calm and placating even when she was being purposefully bitchy. "You don't wanna know," she answered quietly, looking down at her lap.

"Oh, we don't?" Dean asked rudely.

"Dean—" Sam said, giving his brother an exasperated, pointed look.

"Shut up Sam!" Dean retorted.

Alex's furrowed brow returned as she leveled Dean with an angry stare, her hackles raising. "Don't talk to him like that, Dean!" He seemed surprised she was standing up to him again, but Alex had just had it with the shitty attitude, the domineering crap, and the bullying. "God—what is your problem?" she asked, disgusted.

She looked Dean dead in the eyes, coldly. She wanted to get back at Dean, make him feel as crappy as he'd made her feel, and she knew exactly how. She was already talking before she could really stop herself. "You wanna know so bad about the absolute hell I went through? Which part, Dean, just had it with the shitty attitude, the domineering crap, and the bullying. "God—what is your problem?" she asked, disgusted.

She looked Dean dead in the eyes, coldly. She wanted to get back at Dean, make him feel as crappy as he'd made her feel, and she knew exactly how. She was already talking before she could really stop herself. "You wanna know so bad about the absolute hell I went through? Which part, Dean, just had it with the shitty attitude, the domineering crap, and the bullying. "God—what is your problem?" she asked, disgusted.

She pointed at the place where gauze was taped to her chest, and Dean looked stunned. "Or maybe you want to know about the shitty memories Gabriel made me go through again. Or the crappy things things you two did and thought I'd never find out about." Sam looked especially nervous at that statement, but Dean looked unsure, like he couldn't imagine what she was talking about.

Alex was like a train going full steam at this point, no possibility of stopping. "I saw you Dean, telling Dad I was only gonna get in the way of that last hunt he went on. You begged him to leave me behind because I was gonna hold you back." Dean looked startled, and Alex gave him a facetious little smile. "Real heartwarming memory, right? I thought so."

She turned her attention to Sam, who looked pained by association, and a little nervous, because he knew he was next. She couldn't muster the same fiery, lecturing tone. When she spoke to him, she sounded more heartbroken and confused than anything else. "And Sam. Like, twelve years old and straight up lying to some kids and telling them I was disabled and asthmatic and that I wouldn't want to play football with them… then coming over to me and then lying to me, saying the kids didn't want me to play. I mean, what the hell? Why?"

Sam looked positively shocked, and in quick succession, guilty. Dean, highly uncomfortable, was looking at Sam oddly. Alex chuckled sardonically, momentarily getting small, dark satisfaction out of seeing them squirm, out of seeing their guilt. "But guys, that's not even the best one. Picture this, right? Sam, like, killed some kittens in an alley—ripped them to friggin' shreds, and Dean was there too, you guys wanna explain what the hell that was?"

"That—" Sam stumbled verbally, horrified. "I—you have to believe me. I don't understand how it happened, or why. It was almost like I was possessed."

"But you weren't," Dean said, giving Sam a harsh look. "I checked." Sam looked chastised and repelled.

Alex looked at Dean piercingly. "Dean, you knew about that all these years and never told me. Why?" she asked, to which Dean gave her a disbelieving look, like she was crazy to even suggest that.

"Because you were a damn kid, and a pretty friggin' fragile one at that, don't you think it would have, uh, like freaked you the hell out to learn your brother was like doing serial killer crap behind motels?" He almost seemed to think it was funny at this point. "Why would I ever tell you, huh? At any point?"

"That makes sense," Alex said, believing it herself, getting intense. "Think about it. Maybe it's the angels trying to screw with us, or demons, even. Trying to turn us against each other. It wouldn't be the first time they've messed with our heads."
Dean snorted, his momentary intrigue gone. "Come on, Al. That'd be nice to believe it didn't happen, but from where I'm sitting, it sure as hell did. I was there. It's not like the glove doesn't fit—Sam's got a dark side, and we all know it." Sam's jaw tightened at that thoughtless comment, but he said nothing, letting Dean continue on his tirade. "Sam's the demon blood junkie. The one who set freakin' fires for kicks."

At that comment, the twins exchanged a terse look and then Alex looked at Dean long and hard. Sam's gaze dropped into his lap and he remained silent. Alex wet her lips and clasped her hands on the table, looking Dean dead in the eyes reluctantly, jaw clenched tightly as she hesitated. She should have known this day would come when she'd say these words aloud. "Sam wasn't the one who started fires, Dean. That was me."

Dean stared at her, completely blindsided. "What?"

"Yeah," was all Alex said, looking away, uncomfortable. This was something she wasn't proud of. And had tried to forget. And succeeded, too, until a few minutes ago.

Dean wheeled on Sam, turning himself physically to stare at his brother. "You covered for her?"

Sam returned his brother's stare, not backing down. "Yeah Dean, I did."

Dean looked confused. He was looking back at his sister, still too shocked to be pissed off yet. "You wanna tell me why you would do that crap, Alex?"

Alex wasn't really sure, and had to think about it a minute. She remembered the thrill of watching flames lick, devour, and destroy objects. It had started with balls of paper and scraps of cloth. And then, daring herself one time, she set a library book on fire, just sat and watched it burn. Wondered if everyone would think she were a hero and an amazing person if she secretly started a fire, let others see it, then put it out herself, made it seem like she saved everyone. She liked that idea a lot. She'd started fires in school bathrooms and libraries and one time, even the cafeteria, but always alone, not brave enough to really burn anything big or that could get out of hand. She remembered Sam, finding her several times and freaking out and then making her hide when Dean showed up. Telling Dean he'd done it. Sam had never told anyone the truth—ever.

Dean was currently staring at her, waiting for an explanation. She shrugged briefly, embarrassed. "I guess, I dunno." She paused, realizing the irony of all of this, realizing the possibility. "Maybe I'm dark inside, too," she murmured, a little frightened at the thought, but also really, really sure it was a good theory. She thought of their whole lives. The monsters they had faced, the things they had done in dark places, things they wanted to forget. She glanced at Dean, the man who had tortured souls in hell and confessed he'd enjoyed it. "I think maybe we all are," she said cynically, and for a moment, the table was silent and somber.

Out of nowhere, their washed out, forty-something waitress reappeared in her cherry-red apron. "All right, folks, how ya'll doin'?" She asked, grinning at them as she chomped and smacked loudly on some gum. "Get ya anything else?"

"No. We're good," Sam said hollowly, and the irony of his words wasn't lost on Alex.

The waitress's her smile fell as she took in the dejected occupants of her table. She seemed to realize she'd had some poor timing. "Uh, okay, well just holler if ya need anything," she said, and attempted a cheerful smile. But no one was looking at her.

After the waitress walked off, Alex looked up, caught her twin's eye. "Sam, you covering for me like that was one of the best and bravest things you've ever done for me. I knew it then, and I know it now." There was a temporary lull, in which the twins looked at each other anxiously, all their colorhood closeness remembered mutually. And then Alex continued. "But… we gotta talk about that lying, manipulating crap. You made it seem like those kids didn't want me to play… you lied straight to my face. And I get the feeling that wasn't the only time. Cuz I remember you telling me stuff like that a lot. That the other kids didn't want me around or didn't want to play with me." She almost didn't want to know the answer to her next question. "How often did you do stuff like that?"

"More than I should have," Sam admitted, agonized.

Alex shook her head slowly, despondent, not understanding. "But why?"

Her twin almost looked at the point of tears now, shaking his head and barely able to look her in the eye. Even Dean looked openly affected, like he was dreading the answer, too. Sam struggled.
"It's not that I didn't want you to have fun—I just thought—in a weird way, that I was keeping you safe, because I mean, kids did make fun of you. They called you horrible stuff, and maybe some of them might not have, if I gave them the chance to let you into their circles, but—I hated to see you hurt. I still do." Sam drew a deep breath. "And, also, I just—I just wanted you to look up to me."
His jaw tightened. He was clearly ashamed. "I wanted you to love me like you loved Dean. And you loved Dean because he did protect you, and he made you feel safe, and he comforted you when you were sad." At Alex's confused, almost hurt expression, Sam shook his head, humiliated.
Dean had put an elbow on the table, and was scrubbing his face with the palm of his hand—his guilt and frustration and disbelief was almost palpable.

But Sam wasn't done, even though he was clearly upset. "And it's so stupid. I don't know, it's like I just figured out a way to make you like me more, depend on me more, and I did it. It was pathetic, it was crazy." He put his head in his hands and stared at the tabletop. "God, I really am a psychopath."

"No, you're not," Alex said immediately, passionately, because she knew exactly what he meant—how freakish and stupid he felt for his mistakes, same as her. She huffed a frustrated breath. "I mean, well, we're all messed up, there's really no getting around that, right? But I mean, how could we even hope to be normal, especially when we were kids and teens? We barely had a parent. Dad was gone, constantly. We moved, constantly. Everything changed except the three of us. It was always us three. And maybe we were a lot more dysfunctional than we thought, and I mean, we already knew we were dysfunctional, but..." she trailed off, looking at Sam, who looked like he was waiting for her to tear into him. "Sam… you didn't have to do all that stuff to get me to love you. I mean, me loving you was… always just a given."

Sam could say nothing. He looked so deeply regretful. Silence stretched out between them. "God, Sam," Dean said finally, sounding tired, empty, and maybe a little disappointed, too.

Sam looked at his older brother in earnest, broken sadness. "I know. It was stupid and pitiful of me.
I know. But I lived my whole life in your shadow, Dean. I mean, Dad loved you the most, because you were the most like him, and I always felt second or third best."

Dean's eyebrows shot up in genuine wounded surprise. "Are you kidding me? You were Dad's favorite, Sammy. You were the most normal one of us, like with good grades and a nice little future—no matter what I did, Dad just..." he trailed off, his eyes ghosting over years of pain. "I always disappointed him." Dean looked directly at Sam, pushing past his inner demons. "He didn't see you as a failure, okay?" There was a self-deprecating smile playing on Dean's mouth. "That was me."

"Dean," Sam appealed, "Dad might have been hard on you, but he loved you, and you know he did.
I was the odd one out, or, at least, that's how I felt." He looked miserable. "I was jealous of you Alex looked at him like he had two heads. "Wait… I get why you might be jealous of Dean, but me, too? Me?"

Sam didn't meet her gaze. "I was jealous because I just never felt like part of the family—you and Dean were close, it's like I was an outsider in my own family. I felt like a freak no matter where I went."

Dean irritably crossed his arms, half rolling his eyes. "Oh my god. Well boo hoo. We're all pretty much freaks at this point, why do you get to bitch and moan about it?"

Sam looked at Dean hostilely, but waited a second before replying, clearly keeping himself calm. "I just know I wanted a life outside of hunting and paranormal crap and you all gave me hell for it." He looked stone-faced. "It was like I was damned if I did, damned if I didn't. Sometimes still feels that way."

"So why are you here now?" Alex asked softly, sort of dreading the answer.

Sam did one of those little airy laughs, trying to cover up his real feelings. "Well, what else is there for me? Every time I try to have a normal life, it falls apart. It doesn't work. I guess I'm meant to do this. Even if I don't really want to all the time." Dean looked at Sam, having the audacity to look somewhat hurt. Sam backpedaled a little. "Don't get me wrong. I know it's important. I know that."

Dean huffed at Sam, his angry fire gone, replaced by darkness. "But if your heart's not in it… why bother?"

"Because you guys are in it," Sam said earnestly. "Yeah, I spend half the time being annoyed and pissed off with both of you, but at the end of the day… even though I'm not so sure about the rest of everything else in life… I'm here for you guys. You're my family." He shrugged a little, grimly. "Also, I kinda raised Lucifer. I need to put him back down."

"We," Dean corrected tersely. "We are gonna put him down. Family affair."

"But—" Sam started.

"You know the drill, Sam," Dean cut him off. "We stick together. Even if everything in the damn universe is trying to tear us apart. We've tried to do it separately, and it never works." The brothers fell silent. It wasn't a comfortable, amicable silence.

Alex had felt hopeful, a minute ago, that they were going to reconcile something here. But of course not. She wanted to kick something. She looked at the two of her idiot brothers, and hard. "You know, it's like every damn thing in our lives—angels, demons, even the three of us—are working together without even realizing it to tear us apart and turn us against each other so that the showdown between Michael and Lucifer is a shoo-in." Dean's expression was snide and Alex looked at him dangerously, daring him to say something. "Gabriel was trying to tell me that I should just give up and let the whole thing play out however it will, walk away from you guys. Kept going on about how I didn't have a part to play… but, you know what?" She paused, then spat out, "I don't accept that. He gave up on his family, decided he would let fate do whatever it wanted with his brothers. Well, that's his problem. I'm not about to make the same stupid choice he did. I'm not walking out or disappearing on you two jerks."

Dean and Sam looked at her silently as she continued, her voice rising a little in impassioned conviction. "Who cares if fate wanted to have it be Sam and Dean in the end, battling it out as..."
Mike and Lucy? Fate, prophecies, screw it. They forgot about me. I'm not just a bystander. I refuse to be. This is my family, too. And I'll be damned if I let you two kill each other, now or ever. We are gonna stick together, stop fighting each other and start fighting the devil." She grabbed the untouched plate of now-cold pancakes and sausage, yanked it to herself. "And when we hand fate its own ass on a silver platter, let's see who's laughing then." She stabbed into a sausage link with her fork, leaving her brothers in pensive silence.

And that was the Winchesters in a nutshell. Always fighting, always at odds. But when it came down to it, willing to lay aside their differences for the greater good. Never willing, not completely, to walk away from each other. Still, Alex felt like she'd been run over by an emotional stream roller, and sullenly chomped the tasteless bite in her mouth. She felt riled up and shaken.

With an exasperated huff, Dean got up and left, presumably headed to the bathroom. Sam watched him go, appraisingly, then looked at Alex, watched her silently for a minute.

"Hey, so..." he began. She chewed her sausage, looking at him guardedly. He pulled out a bent out of shape bundle of yellow wildflowers from his jacket pocket, and she stopped, mid-chew. "You, uh, forgot something." Alex stared blankly at the flowers, then at Sam, who shrugged. "Got the feeling you didn't want them left behind," he said. He didn't say anything except that. But there was genuine care and maybe even understanding there.

She took the flowers from him slowly, looked at him fully—she was touched deeply by the kind, thoughtful gesture. A soft, hesitant, surprised smile was on her face. "Thanks, Sammy."

He returned the smile, but a guarded sadness remained. Alex looked at the wildflowers pensively, and put them in her jacket pocket before Dean came back. She looked at her twin closely, wondered if he had any clue what those flowers meant to her.

---

One Month Later
Bobby's House

"We're about to go in now. If you don't hear from us in the next couple hours, then you come," Dean's voice said in Alex's ear.

"I should be there with you guys right now," she replied into the phone sullenly.

"Well, just didn't work out that way, did it?" Dean asked, then didn't give her a chance to reply. "I'll talk to you soon," he said, and she rolled her eyes.

"Yeah, fine."

They hung up.

This was a crazy idea—stealing the Colt from some kind of super crossroads demon, this Crowley guy. And crazier still that Alex wasn't there with them. It almost seemed too convenient how Dean and Sam had gotten the heads up on Crowley's location and how Alex had gotten left behind. And maybe what was harder is that Jo was there in her place. Ellen and Jo Harvelle had joined them at Bobby's a couple days ago, ready to help take down Lucifer, and they had been happy to have them. It was obvious to Alex that Dean liked Jo a lot, but really, did he have to take Jo in what felt like Alex's place? After the whole memory about Dean telling Dad Alex would just slow them down, it added insult to injury to feel replaced, even if it were just for one day.

Dean had just been acting weirder and weirder ever since Alex got out of the hospital, freaking out over her safety, trying to get her to eat more, losing his temper more and more frequently and with less provocation. He hadn't really been doing the same to Sam, which irritated Alex and made Sam kind of uncomfortable. Sam had even said something to Dean about it in Alex's defense, then gotten verbally bitch slapped.

The thing about it all was they had known the location on Crowley was coming at any time—Cas had been tracking the demon for the past two weeks. Earlier that very day, Alex and Bobby had gone into town on a supply run, leaving Sam, Dean, Jo, and Ellen behind. When they got back, just Ellen had remained. And then Alex got a call from Dean, saying they were an hour away, that Cas had called with the location of Crowley, that they had been out checking out a lead when they got the call, that they were just going to go ahead and go, they didn't need to drive the hour back. They were just going to go. Without her. Naturally, she'd loved that. It smelled like a setup to her, which is why she was feeling so crappy right now.

She'd been stuck here all day, useless as Ellen and Bobby spent time shooting the shit as they laughed about days gone by—which kind of upset Alex, who was worrying about demons, angels and her brothers, who were probably going to get themselves killed trying to get the damn Colt. She'd skulked around the house all day, trying to busy herself—fiddling with her shotgun (cleaning it three times), sweeping the kitchen and taking an hour to do it, having spur-of-the-moment target practice with some especially loud crows in the salvage yard, switching on the TV (hating everything on there), trying to reorganize Bobby's pantry. She gave up on that after awhile. Basically, she wasted time all day, her anxiety level creeping up as time went by. Around sunset, she'd gotten the second call from Dean, the 'we're going in,' call—that had been about forty minutes ago. So now, more waiting. Alex felt like a caged animal, restless and pissed off. She was pacing the study now, listening idly to Ellen and Bobby in the other room. An abandoned whiskey bottle and a couple of shot glasses were on the desk where she'd left them.

She turned, paced the short length of the study again. If Dean had done this, left her behind on purpose, she was seriously going to strangle—she bumped into someone and she never finished the thought.

Cas's familiar face was in front of her. Her eyes widened in surprise. "Cas!" She hadn't seen him in two weeks. As usual, his sudden appearance caught her off guard.

"Hello Alex," he greeted neutrally, all business. "Your brothers have the Colt and are on their way here. They should be here in about twenty minutes."

"They got it?" Alex asked, relieved but also a little surprised.

"Yes. Apparently Crowley just... gave it to them," Cas said. "And told them where Lucifer will be tomorrow. It's not far from here." And that's when she saw the signs of suspicion and apprehension on his face, which counteracted the relief she'd felt a second ago. He sounded very, very grave. She opened her mouth to ask what was wrong, but behind her, she heard a voice.

"Who's your friend, Alex?" Ellen was leaned against the door frame, smiling, a beer in hand.

Ellen probably already knew who it was, but Alex humored her, a little impatiently. "Ellen, this is Cas."

"Ah, the angel—heard a lot about you." Ellen sauntered forward, stuck her hand out for a handshake. Cas complied, remembering. Alex smiled a little, watching him. "You must've seen my daughter Jo if you were just with Sam and Dean," Ellen said conversationally.

Cas looked distracted. "Yes, the blonde one," he said dismissively.
Ellen kind of chuckled at that comment, and Alex could tell she liked him, was fascinated.

"Ellen, get your ass in here! I can't reach the damn top shelf," Bobby complained from the kitchen, and Ellen rolled her eyes in good humor.

"I'm comin', old man." She left.

Alex plopped down into one of the chairs at the study desk, motioned for Cas to take a seat opposite her. She leaned forward over an arm, speaking lowly, her face serious. "Okay, Cas, so why would Crowley just give them the gun? And tell them where the devil is gonna be tomorrow?"

He sat opposite of her, still distracted. "Apparently he wants the devil dead as much as we do," Cas said. "Dean said Crowley claims that if Lucifer succeeds, he will obliterate demons." He paused, dismal. "Well, after he annihilates the human race first, of course."

Alex blinked. "Well." What did you say to that? "Uh, can't let that happen."

He glanced at her, sort of grudgingly. She could tell he was thinking, and hard. He seemed so much sadder and heavier than she remembered him ever being before. She didn't like it, and wondered why he seemed so distant, so closed off. Maybe she'd hurt his feelings with the whole being upset when he'd presented her with flowers thing. She swallowed, remembering how awkward that had been. The whiskey bottle in front of her was looking better and better. Alex grabbed the bottle decisively.

"You know what? I think we could both use a drink," she said, pouring whiskey into the two shot glasses. Cas looked at her appraisingly as she pushed a full shot toward him with the tips of her fingers. "It's time for you to try some of the good stuff," she told him, and held her shot glass up in the air. He hesitated, then took the shot glass, did the same, frowning, watching her. She clinked her glass up against his, then demonstrated by lifting it to her lips, throwing her head back, and then slamming it down on the desk. She grimaced as it burned sweetly and made her muscles feel softer and more relaxed. She motioned to him. "Now you."

Cas didn't look enthused, but he raised the shot glass to his lips and just like she had, threw his head back, downing the amber liquid. He hesitated, then took the shot glass, did the same, frowning, watching her. She clinked her glass up against his, then demonstrated by lifting it to her lips, throwing her head back, and then slamming it down on the desk. She grimaced as it burned sweetly and made her muscles feel softer and more relaxed. She motioned to him. "Now you."

"You know what? I think we could both use a drink," she said, pouring whiskey into the two shot glasses. Cas looked at her appraisingly as she pushed a full shot toward him with the tips of her fingers. "It's time for you to try some of the good stuff," she told him, and held her shot glass up in the air. He hesitated, then took the shot glass, did the same, frowning, watching her. She clinked her glass up against his, then demonstrated by lifting it to her lips, throwing her head back, and then slamming it down on the desk. She grimaced as it burned sweetly and made her muscles feel softer and more relaxed. She motioned to him. "Now you."

"Feel better than what?" he asked, and her amusement, her lightness faded.

She looked at him fleetingly. "Than normal. I guess." She raised her shot glass, suddenly feeling a lot less amused than she had a moment ago. "Bottoms up."

He took his shot up in his hand grudgingly, and they downed the shots at the same time. Alex thunked her glass down onto the desk and hissed—it burned really good, and was starting to take effect. Damn, she loved whiskey. "Feel anything?" she asked Cas, who paused, then shook his head. What a shame. Maybe he just had a super high tolerance—she looked at the whiskey bottle almost lovingly, then at Cas, wondering something. "Hey, they have whiskey in Heaven? Cuz if they don't, I'm not going." She grinned—that was funny. But he took her question seriously, pondering, eyes narrowed. He'd gently set his shot glass down even as she poured and took another shot.
"It would depend on the soul. Heaven isn't how the human mind traditionally imagines it. It's not one place. I suppose you could explain it as being a series of heavens. Each soul has its own heaven, a heaven that reflects that person's spirit."

"So Heaven's not like some shiny mansion in the clouds?" Alex asked, tilting her head to the side.

He seemed faintly offended or perturbed by her question. "No."

"Everyone gets their own?" She surmised, grabbing the bottle of whiskey.

"Yes." He paused, looking at her oddly as she drank straight out of the bottle. "Well. Some souls share a heaven, but that's extremely rare."

She felt her eyebrows raising and paused, bottle hovering near her mouth. "What, like soul mates?"

He glanced at her. "Yes."

She set the bottle down, smiling to herself. "I like that. Always wanted to believe in soul mates."

She didn't mean to, but let out an embarrassing little laugh. She realized she was starting to feel a little more tipsy than was probably okay—she'd been drinking an hour ago and it would probably be pretty easy to get drunk right now. Her telltale sign had always been feeling really happy and relaxed, silly. Which is how she was starting to feel now. She shook her head a little, attempting to clear herself and be more serious. Cas was looking at her with a veiled expression as she continued asking her questions. "So if Heaven is like, a celestial melting pot of tiny heavens… where do you guys hang out? Do you guys get heavens of your own, too?"

His eyes darted to hers, then fell away. "Angels aren't privileged to have personal heavens. We share a communal space, I guess you could say."

Alex felt a prick of interest. Somehow, he sounded like he were talking about an office, not like, a home. Did he think of Heaven in that way? "But Heaven's home to you, right?"

"Home," he repeated, testing out the word. "I don't think so."

Alex sat back, mildly surprised. "Then where were you before you were here? Before you were in your vessel?"

His eyes crimped slightly. "Why are you asking me so many questions?"

Alex blinked at him a couple times, looking off and thinking about it. She looked back to him and threw her hands in the air. "Because... I wanna know?" She asked and pulled an innocent, puppy-dog face. "You know everything about me, right? And I know jack squat about you. Come on, Cas, just answer the damn question, pleeease." She heard herself say that and made a face—shit that whiskey had really taken effect fast.

His frown just deepened a little, then he shrugged lightly, looked away. "It's difficult to explain where I existed before I was in this vessel. Your human mind is too small to grasp these things."

Alex chuckled throatily at that—the would-be insult that she was pretty sure was just him being factual. Well, maybe he was trying to insult her. Or dodge the question. Either way, her reply was, "try me."

He took a deep breath. He seemed reluctant. "I existed in a transcendent form. Able to traverse time, space. I wasn't really in one place. I was in millions of places. I saw everything."
"Because you were a watcher," Alex said, remembering what he'd told her before.

"Yes," he confirmed.

"For, what… like since the beginning of the world? However many thousand years?" she asked.

His eyes again slid to hers briefly. "More or less."

"That's a really long time," she said. Thank you Captain Obvious, she thought, struck by how she was sounding stupider and stupider. And then, another thought struck her, and she got quiet a minute. Looked at Cas thoroughly. "Do you miss it? The existence you had before, all those years."

He was silent, but he looked startled by her words. "I think about it sometimes," Alex said. "Well, actually, a lot. How you lost everything you ever knew. For this." She spread her hands out a little. Whiskey made it really easy to talk and to say whatever the hell was on her mind. "You get cut off from Heaven… have to search for God all on your own… you must feel pretty crappy. Alone." He said nothing, just looked back at her, expression unreadable. Alex searched his face, growing somber. "You look sad sometimes. I think maybe that's why." She laughed a little, trying to cover up her grim feelings. "And it's all for some lame excuses for humans who have, so far, kind of treated you like crap. Thought the worst of you. Accused you of all kinds of shit." She couldn't keep the laugh up, and her smile faded. "It's you against heaven, hell, and earth. With a little handful of us puny humans on your side." She stopped talking, feeling self-conscious, and pressed her lips together so much that they disappeared. "Sorry, it's the alcohol. Makes me chatty."

At that comment, she saw him hide a smile. Pleased with herself, she poured him more whiskey, but none for herself. "Drink up."

He did, and Alex looked at him hopefully. "Feel anything?"

He shook his head, maybe disappointed. "Nothing."

Alex's stomach suddenly took a dip toward nauseated and she leaned forward, grimacing. Cas's frown was wiped off of his face, and he leaned toward her, concerned. Alex moaned, humiliated, because her stomach was all-the-sudden not having it. "Uh. Well, suddenly I'm feeling a little too much," she said, standing up, clutching the desk for support. Cas stood up in tandem with her, one of his hands hovering near her arm, as if he expected her to fall down. Alex looked at him, recognizing this expression—the worry. It was the hospital all over again, and she suddenly felt so—oh god, her stomach. She stood and brushed past him, throwing a, "gimme a second," back his way.

She practically burst out onto the porch, feeling like she was about to be sick. Shouldn't have mixed beers and whiskey or something like that, right? But she was fine after a minute. She felt a little ill and a little lightheaded, but okay. If she'd looked behind her, she might have seen Cas, through the window, go to Bobby, and point toward the porch.

A minute later, the door opened behind Alex. Bobby, in his wheelchair, rolled out. "You okay, kiddo?"

Embarrassed, she grimaced, looking at him reluctantly. "Guess I can't hold my liquor like I used to."

"Might be cuz you're skinny as a rail and never eat anything but damn crackers," he said irritably. There was a fondness there, but also disapproval. He looked at her carefully from under the brim of his hat. "S'going on with you?"
She leaned onto the railing, feeling suddenly glum. "End of the world blues, I guess."

"Yeah, that'll do it to ya," Bobby commented, a rueful little smile hidden under his beard.

Alex glanced at him sidelong, unable to feel anything but good things when she looked at him. This man, her quote unquote uncle—more like the dad she'd never had—meant so much to her. Especially now that she'd seen him stand up for her in that memory Gabriel showed her. It proved that he cared about her, that he really, really loved her. And she would never, ever doubt that. Maybe she would doubt everyone else in the world, but not Bobby Singer. She remembered their months together when Dean died. Yeah, they'd had their little spats and hadn't exactly gelled immediately—different hunting styles and all that—but he had been there for her completely. Let her live with him, hunt with him. He'd let her lean on him when there was no one else in the world left to depend on. He'd bought those crappy little Hostess Cupcakes for her when she'd been sick with a cold. Handed them to her and muttered "I know ya like these, so, uh, here." It made her smile even now to think about.

He'd been there for her when she was a kid, too, more than he really realized. Some of her best memories were with him. Maybe it was because he'd always taken genuine interest in her. When she'd been with him she'd felt like she mattered to him. And that feeling was irreplaceable. She smiled, thinking of her favorite memory. "Do you remember..." she asked aloud, reminiscent, "that time you took me to some kind of stupid princess puppet thing at the library... and we both hated it so much that we left half way through?"

He chuckled, a little embarrassed. "Yeah, I remember. Then you asked to go to the shooting range instead." He had this little smile, just for her, as he said, proudly, "that's my girl."

Alex literally could feel her heart swell in her chest at that. She breathed deeply, maintaining her composure. And after a minute, she looked at him again. She had to let him know—she might never have the chance again. "Uncle Bobby... I've really never told you, but... um... I just..." she didn't know how to word it without sounding sappy. It was just gonna have to sound sappy. "Having you in my life has meant a lot. Some of my favorite memories are right here, in this old house. With you."

He looked at her fully, obviously deeply touched. Then, he shook his head and he became warning toward her. "Now don't you do that. Don't do this last night on earth speech crap to me, Alex Winchester."

Alex's mouth curved into a lopsided smile as she looked down at him. "Loud and clear, boss."

Bobby sighed out long and hard, as if in defeat. "Ya'll are like the kids I never had." He reached over and put his hand on her back. "Always did want a daughter." His eyes were soft and kind and Alex felt her heart grow a size. A familiar sound met their ears, and they turned to see the Impala's headlights cutting through the dark, further down the driveway. "Good," Bobby said, turning to business mode again, "those idjits are finally back."

Alex watched the car approach, her feelings turning to worry and dread again. "Do we actually have a chance at this, Bobby?"
"Looks like," he said, but he sounded about as uncertain as she felt.

Sam, Dean, and Jo got out of the car. Jo had been sitting in Alex's seat. Jo grinned at them as she loped up. "We got it," she announced, glancing from Bobby to Alex, looking like she'd won the Olympics.

"I heard," Alex replied, looking past her and at Dean, who was purposefully ignoring her gaze.

Bobby was wheeling himself back inside the house, and Jo held the door for him, then went in after. Dean followed them inside, glancing tersely at Alex for the briefest of seconds, but basically ignoring her otherwise. Sam brought up the rear. The door slammed behind Dean and Sam stopped, looked at Alex. "Hey," he said. "Sorry you got left behind. It really wasn't intentional."

She looked at him crankily. "How'd you know I'd think that?"

He grinned crookedly at her and pointed at himself. "Come on. Your twin?" He put an arm around her and guided her inside, told her to stop being such a loner. It reminded her of when they were teenagers, and lifted her mood a little.

Inside, Ellen had latched onto Cas in the dining room, and had set up rows of double-shot shot glasses on the table. At Alex and Sam's arrival, Cas looked up at them. "We're playing a drinking game," he told them.

"Ellen, I don't think you're gonna win this one," Alex said. Cas looked at her carefully, which she didn't see, because she was too busy grinning at Ellen.

From the study, Dean's voice bellowed. "Sammy!" Sam frowned a little, let go of Alex, who took a seat next to Ellen. Jo sauntered over to them from the kitchen, a bottle of beer in hand.

Ellen picked up a shot glass that was in front of her and drained it, then put it down, upside down, next to four other empty ones. She looked at Cas challengingly, a smile playing on her lips. "All right, big boy," she said.

Cas looked at the woman and then reached for the first shot glass—downed it, set it down, upside down, just like she had—then did the same for the other four in rapid succession. Ellen and Jo looked highly impressed as he did so, and Alex, sitting back, arms crossed, had a crooked little smile on her lips as she watched him with those dark eyes.

He set down the fifth shot glass, and paused, trying to ascertain his level of sobriety. There was a slight tingling sensation in the fingertips of his vessel. "I think I'm starting to feel something," he said, strangely almost excited.

Ellen gawked, then grinned at him. Alex was smiling at him in that way she had where she was pressing her lips closed to keep from grinning. Beside Alex, Jo was pouring a shot and then put it in front of Alex, who shook her head. "Uh, yeah, no more for me. I'm definitely feeling something," she said. She pushed her shot glass at Cas, indicating he drink it, too. He took it, downed it, waited, then shook his head.

Alex kind of chuckled. "You'd probably have to drink a whole store I guess."

"Sounds ill-advised," he said. And then he realized she was joking and allowing a smile to cross his face.

"Yeah, a trashed angel is all the world needs right now," Jo said, grinning at him widely. "But hey, why not?" She was pouring him more whiskey. Cas looked at Alex, who silently gazed back at him across the table. He had been away from her, from the Winchesters, for almost two weeks, and at first when he saw her again, he had been guarded. He still didn't understand what was happening, at all, with her and with him. The way he always felt so much when they occupied the same space together. It worried him.

Jo set the shot in front of him, said something—he wasn't listening—then walked off. He was still looking at Alex, whose gaze followed Jo in half-interest. Dean had come out of the study and followed Jo into the kitchen. Cas watched as Alex looked at them. She was frowning a little, then seemed to drop it mentally, and looked back at him.

She seemed to be all right again, after everything that happened with Gabriel. He had noticed that she had a scar on the palm of her hand where the stitches had healed. A reminder of how powerless he'd been to save her, to protect her. Maybe she was angry about that. There was an odd, niggling sense that he couldn't seem to put his finger on that she was acting differently. Something to do with the flowers he thought, but what? He didn't understand and couldn't identify what had changed, or what he had done. She seemed to grow a little fidgety under his gaze, and she looked away, her expression gone blank, or perhaps tense. In the past month, he'd seen her twice, glancingly. And she'd looked at him with these strange expressions he couldn't quite decipher. They were indescribably uncomfortable, or tense, or pained. Afraid? He wasn't sure. Human expressions were so very subtle and shifting. He had a difficult time piecing together what they meant.

Truthfully, Alex had been on his mind more, and more, and more in the recent months. But especially this past month. Especially since everything that happened with Gabriel. And the fact that she remained in his thoughts was something he thought about, too. Grappled with. In human terms, agonized over. The more time he spent in his vessel and on earth, the more he felt. The less he could clearly remember how it was to be what he had been for the thousands of years before.

"Right Cas?" Ellen said, laughing.

"I'm sorry, what?" he said, looking at her and frowning. She didn't say, just kind of got a strange smile on her face, looked at him oddly.

Jo came back, pulled up a chair, leaned on the table and leaned toward Alex. "Your brother is such a loser."

"Which one?" Alex asked, because she honestly felt like it could go either way.

"Dean, duh," Jo said, grinning.

"You just realized this?" Alex asked playfully.

Jo started pouring more shots, handed one to Alex. "Have some more," she coaxed.

"Nah. I've had enough," Alex said. "I'd rather not be hung over on the day we kill the devil."

"Lightweight," Jo teased. Alex looked at her sideways, but said nothing.

"Everybody get in here!" Bobby called from inside the study. "It's time for the lineup. Usual suspects in the corner."

Ellen led the way into the study as everyone else shuffled in. "Oh come on, Bobby. Nobody wants their picture taken."

"Hear, hear," Sam agreed.
Bobby was fiddling with an old camera that was set on a tripod. "Shut up," he said. "You're drinking my beer." He rolled his wheelchair back, where everyone was piling in for the photo. "Anyway, I'm gonna need something to remember your sorry asses by."

Alex stood in front of Sam—Ellen on her left. Cas came and stood to her right. Their shoulders just touched.

"Ha!" Ellen guffawed at Bobby's snark. "Always good to have an optimist around."

Beside Alex, Castiel straightened, deadly serious. "Bobby's right. Tomorrow we hunt the devil. This is our last night on earth." Alex made a slight face. The camera flashed.

"Well. That's a happy memory," Ellen said sarcastically, and headed back to the dining room where the alcohol was.

Alex was looking up at Cas in trepidation, but could find nothing to say, feeling entirely overwhelmed. She went back outside onto the porch. What, he really believed that? Last night on earth?

She heard the door open and close behind her. "Whatcha doing out here all alone?" Ellen another beer in hand. "Still a loner?" she asked fondly.

"Yeah, guess I am," Alex said, to which Ellen shook her head, leaned against the porch railing, thoughtful.

"Just don't know when you grew up, kiddo. You and Jo both. Happens too damn fast, and here I am just realizing how short life is." She sighed. "Specially when I think about tomorrow."

"Yeah. This may be the stupidest thing we've ever done, huh?" Alex commented heavily. She hadn't meant it to sound so pessimistic.

Ellen nodded slowly, thoughtfully, speaking like she was talking to herself. "Might be. Might not. That's the beauty of the gamble." She looked at Alex appraisingly, a little smile crossing her lips. "So that angel buddy of yours. What about him?"

Alex looked at Ellen uncertainty, frowning slightly. "What do you mean?"

"Come on," Ellen nudged, looking slyer by the second. "Don't be coy with me. I saw the way you look at him. And, hell, the way he looks at you."

Alex was shocked and couldn't believe the words that had just come out of the older woman's mouth. "Uh—I don't know what you're—" Alex began, but Ellen was already giving her the 'don't even try lying to me' look, and Alex stopped. Closed her mouth. Gave up, looked down. Not sure how to answer, really. "I dunno. It's... complicated?" Now if that didn't sound high school. She fumbled a little, not sure how to explain it. "I didn't even like him at first, at all. I actually kind of hated him. But... I dunno. He's done so much for my family. For me. And I don't know. He's... he's different. It's stupid."

Ellen chuckled, took a swig of beer. "You got it bad, girl."

"I do not," Alex said weakly. Even she didn't know why she was denying it right now.

Ellen looked at her meaningfully. "Trust me. I recognize the look."

Alex shifted, feeling put on the spot. "And so what if I did? It would never go anywhere."
"And you know that how?" Ellen asked, a little on the sarcastic side. "You've decided you already know, when you really have no way of telling. Hell, it's our last night on earth, apparently. No time like the present."

"What are you suggesting?" Alex asked.

"Ask him! Or make a move, hell, see what happens." Ellen said simply, then shrugged. "And then, you'll know." Her expression shifted, suddenly suspicious. "Unless you don't want to." She looked at Alex piercingly, her beer forgotten. She seemed to be able to see right through Alex. "You don't think he'd be interested in you?"

Alex dodged the question. "He's an angel."

"So what? Do you really think that little of yourself, Alex?" Ellen sounded almost disheartened.
"You're a very beautiful girl."

Alex was shocked to hear that. Literally shocked. And Ellen frowned, looking at her intently.
"Doesn't anyone ever tell you that?"

Alex shook her head, shrugged just barely, feeling awkward. "No."

Ellen sat her beer down and took Alex by the arms, her expression concerned. "Honey. You are.
You hear me? And not only are you beautiful, you're smart as a whip—clever as hell—tougher than most people I've met—been through more than most people have in their lifetime. You're a damn good hunter and a damn good person. I don't think it's stupid to think an angel could be interested in you. Cuz trust me, that one is."

Alex looked away, trying to cover up her increasing emotions with a soft laugh. Because everything Ellen was saying was appealing to the worst thing she held inside: hope. Alex pulled herself out of Ellen's grasp, looking at the woman pointedly. "You're drunk, Ellen."

"After all those shots, I better be," Ellen said, grinning lopsidedly.

Jo suddenly appeared, a huge new bottle of whiskey in her hand. "Mom! I need your help."

Ellen looked at her, eyebrows high. "With?"

"Opening this stupid bottle."

"After all those shots, I better be," Ellen said, grinning lopsidedly.

Jo suddenly appeared, a huge new bottle of whiskey in her hand. "Mom! I need your help."

Ellen looked at her, eyebrows high. "With?"

"Opening this stupid bottle."

"You serious, Joanna?" Ellen chuckled, and looked at Alex. "We'll talk later," Ellen said, and gave Alex a motherly squeeze on the shoulder. Alex was left alone again, in what should have felt like peaceful solitude. But she just felt more anxious than before, and a little sick. Ellen's words had given her a momentary surge of hope. But it was ridiculous to think what she'd suggested was true, wasn't it? But if this were her last night alive… maybe she should at least consider…

Suddenly, she sensed someone next to her. Cas. His face was relaxed, he wasn't looking at her. He didn't say his usual "Hello, Alex." Instead he said, "here you are." He looked at her at that point, looking perplexed. "Ellen just told me she would snap my wings in half if I ever hurt you." Alex felt like she might die as Cas continued. "I think she was attempting humor. But such a feat is literally impossible, as my true form is incorporeal." He thought a moment. "I think she has imbibed too much alcohol."

"You say things funny," Alex said, then promptly looked away, mouthed 'wow' to herself—did she really just say that? She chanced a glance back at him—he was now looking out at the junkyard with mild interest. "So, uh, you really think this is our last night on earth?" Alex asked.
He turned his head slightly and looked at her. God almighty in Heaven, he is absolutely gorgeous, she thought despondently. "Yes. Killing the devil is an insane plan." He was looking away again.

"Way to be an optimist, Cas," Alex said, attempting to be light. She was studying his profile longingly.

But his frown just deepened. "There's not much to be optimistic about. Tomorrow is the end."

_Geez. "So, what are you planning to do with this last night of yours?" She had a sudden, funny thought. "You just gonna sit here quietly?"

She tried to bite back her grin. He looked at her at this point, tilted his head to the side slightly. "You're referring to the last time I thought I was going to die." He didn't seem to share her amusement. "This time is different." A muscle jerked in his jaw, and he looked down, put his hands on the railing of the porch, very serious. "I don't want you to go. It's going to be too dangerous."

Alex's smile had faded and she looked at him unhappily. "Are Dean and Sam going?" she asked bluntly.

He looked her way. "Yes—"

"Then I'm going," she said, leaving no room for argument, shrugging as if to say 'too bad.'

He didn't look thrilled, in fact, he heaved a little dark sigh. "You are..." he looked away, "very stubborn."

"Yeah, and it's one of the reasons you like me," she said, joking, but then wishing she hadn't said it at all, because he looked at her squarely at that point, finally. Even in the dark, his expression made her go still. Maybe it was the alcohol, or the thought that this might be her last night alive. But it emboldened her a little, and she thought about how he'd touched her fingertips to hers in the hospital. She glanced down at where his hand rested on the porch railing. Alex hesitated and her heart slammed to the top of her throat. But bravely she reached out, lowered her hand, laid it over Cas's. He looked at their hands, then back at her, and she inched a little closer, curled her fingers around his, her heart beating wildly in her chest. He didn't pull his hand away, he didn't pull _himself_ away, but his eyebrows moved together just slightly. It was now or never—

The door swung open behind them. "Hey Alex, have you seen my—" Sam paused, stopped, looking at them oddly.

Alex had literally jumped away from Cas at the sound of the door. "Your what, Sam?!!" she demanded too loudly.

"My, uh, laptop," he said, eyes narrowed, looking first at her, and then Cas.

"Geez, Sam how would I know that?! What am I, your laptop babysitter?" she exclaimed, and brushed past him, completely mortified.

In all fullness of the word, she fled the scene, dashing into the house and down the hallway without looking at anyone. _God, what had she been thinking?_ She wanted to disappear completely—hide away—so she went the only place she could think of. Downstairs, into the basement, into the panic room. She couldn't believe herself. For a second, she had intended to kiss Cas. _Kiss_ him. God, Sam interrupting it was the worst thing ever—had he seen her hand on his? The desperation on her face as she leaned close uncertainly? Maybe Sam interrupting was a blessing in disguise, though, because now that she thought about it (the surge of adrenaline and shame had sobered her up, and fast), she was letting herself live in a fantasy world to believe Cas thought that way about her.

Alex paced the dim panic room, rubbing the back of her neck in agitation. She wished she hadn't even tried making a move on Cas, but she also kind of wished she had just gone for the kiss, too. He probably would have gone all stiff, stared at her like she were Satan incarnate. Or maybe he would have melted against her, wrapped his arms around her…

She heard a soft sound behind her and turned to see Cas standing there in the doorway of the panic room, an odd expression on his face, arms hanging at his sides. Her heart rocketed into her throat. She went completely still, and realized she was completely cornered—no running away. Cas almost looked like he were breathing heavier than normal, and his head was tilted to the side. The he asked what was possibly the most awkward, mortifying question in the world. "Why did you touch me like that?" he asked.

Alex swallowed. And then lied. "I don't know."

He stepped closer, seeing right through her. "That's not the truth."

"Romantic feelings," she asked, as if he didn't understand the implication.

Oh god. He was making her spell it out. She looked at him, like, give me a friggin' break!

"Holy shit. His confession froze everything. Her lungs suddenly felt incapable of functioning and she felt her mouth drop open in complete, stunned astonishment as her heart slammed up against her ribcage. She breathed it out before she could stop herself. "Me too."

At those two words, she saw his eyes flicker up to hers. He looked pained, almost. He closed his eyes for a second, then reopened them. "We can't."

Alex was speechless, because it had suddenly all gotten so real, and everything she thought she was kidding herself about, well, it might be true after all... and 'we can't'? Had he thought about this? Was he saying he'd considered... them? Together? Like she had? Alex felt dizzy with surprise, relief, apprehension, and frantic desire to know more. Cas turned and walked away a few feet. For a minute, she thought he was going to walk out, and she panicked. "Why?" she asked, desperate for him to stop.

He stopped, turned slightly. "It's too dangerous. For both of us. But... especially you."

"I don't understand," she protested softly. Dangerous?

Regretfully, he turned around to face her fully, his whole face tense. He didn't really look at her. "Angels are forbidden to have romantic relationships. Our devotion is solitary. To God alone. And when an angel devotes themselves to anything or anyone other than God..." he trailed off, his frown deepening, his gaze far away. "Horrible things happen." Alex was shocked. Cas looked grim. "I have to protect you, Alex... even if it's from me."

"Protect me from you?" She asked automatically, because it sounded so bizarre.

He looked back at her, halfway, seeing her speechless confusion. Then he began to tell her a story, the reason why he claimed he had to protect her from himself. "Almost two thousand years ago, an angel named Mariel walked the earth. He fell in love with a human woman named Helen. But Helen rejected Mariel when she saw his true form and nature. He became... unstable. Possessive. Volatile. And in his anger, he destroyed the entire vicinity of Pompeii. The place where Helen lived."

He stopped at that point, and seemed to somehow think that neatly wrapped up everything, explained it all, when all it did was further confuse Alex, who didn't really care about some human however many thousand years ago and an angel she'd never heard of before. She cared about Cas and herself. Cas however, was looking reluctant and he turned as if to leave. Seeing that, Alex desperately spoke up, because this was not over for her. "Cas, please—you can't just say all that and leave!" She caught him by the shoulder, turned him around to face her, said, "don't walk away!"

His expression, which had been so blank a moment before, was wretched and startling. "I have to, Alex!" His voice was loud and shaking, and it stunned her, scared her just a little. She froze, wide-eyed. He looked at her, seeming taken aback at himself, then shook his head, grew quiet and reserved again. "I've—I've said too much already."

"No you haven't!" Alex protested, shaking her head. He hadn't said enough—she didn't understand at all, and wasn't sure if he meant that he could—that he felt—dammit! He was being so vague and she couldn't take it.

Cas looked apologetic. And then, almost as if he were talking to himself, he let out a soft breath of air. "This was better when you were afraid of me. When you didn't trust me."

"What are you talking about?"

His eyes snapped back up to hers, no longer soft and yielding, but harsh, and she froze all over again. "I am not the gentle being you believe me to be." He stepped close, intimidatingly, his gaze reminding her of the ones he'd given her when they first met. His voice lowering dangerously until he was almost snarling. "I could end you, right now, in the blink of an eye," he growled. "Turn you to dust with a mere thought."

Alex shook her head just slightly, but couldn't hide her trepidation. Still, she just raised her chin a little, an action meant to be defiant, tell him she didn't buy it. "You would never do that."

He looked at her pointedly, hard, eyes narrowing, and then with a sudden surge of speed and shocking power, he grabbed her by the back of the neck, fingers gripping hard against her scalp, literally holding her there and as he breathed down on her menacingly. "What makes you so sure of that?" he asked dangerously, his eyes narrowed and intimidating.

And for a brief second, she almost was afraid, not just startled. But as she stared up at him, wide-eyed, she couldn't be afraid. Not afraid that he would hurt her. Because she remembered everything he had ever done for her, and she knew he would never. Never. And expression softening, she looked at him unflinchingly. "Because I know you never would," she replied, softly. His expression changed, stilling, and his eyes flickered down to her lips, then back to her eyes. He was breathing harder—he was so close she could feel the warm breath from his mouth hitting her lips. The way he stared into her eyes was unrelenting. Like he was waiting for her to get scared, or pull away. But she didn't. She refused, and that forceful look in his eyes was fading into questioning curiosity. And god, if this wasn't him threatening her, it could have been the lead in to a kiss, she thought torturously, suddenly filled with overwhelming desire for him, for the touch of his lips on hers.

Castiel stared at Alex, who remained unmoving in his grip. A moment ago, he had been the one in control, using his command, his strength, his words to intimidate and threaten her. But whatever influence he'd had was completely gone. Instead, he felt entirely affected and overwhelmed. He couldn't stop himself from noticing how her hair felt under his fingertips, the sensation of the warm skin of her neck as he grasped it, how her chest rose and fell faster than usual, brushing against the front of him so lightly. Her soft, parted lips were so very close to his. What would it be like to touch his mouth to hers, to let his lips speak wordlessly and impress upon her what he felt for her? Her wide, dark eyes were looking at him without fear. Just… desire. He felt his expression fade as he realized. Desire.

Castiel swallowed, his grip loosening slightly as he tried desperately to ignore the way every cell in his vessel and his mind seemed to be screaming, begging for him to tilt his head down and put his lips against hers. It was wrong, and he knew it was wrong; his inner dialogue was deafening, shouting you can't do this, this can't happen, it's abominable under Heaven! If he knew nothing else in that moment, he knew that every law in the universe forbade this and that he should go—run—get as far from right here as physically possible. But it was too late. With every breath he took he could feel the distance between them closing, could see her eyes widening as they searched his. He could hear her heartbeat quickening, and with it felt himself losing ground, this deafening desire was overriding every fail-safe he'd ever had, and in a moment of clarity—or maybe it was a moment of weakness—he gave in, no longer able to deny his urges. He closed the distance between them, brushing his mouth loosely against hers, unsure of how exactly to give a kiss.

She showed him—pressing and pursing her lips to his with softness and care that floored him completely. Oh. His stomach turned over inside of himself at the feeling and he mimicked her, pushing his lips against hers tentatively, kissing her. Even as a surge of pleasure and shock and wonder came over him, the lights above their heads burst, showering them in sparks like flecks of lightning, and Alex's arms were wrapping around his neck, he felt her hands going into his hair, fingers curled tightly, sending little zinging sensations all over his vessel—why did she do that? He wasn't sure, but it felt good—she led him into the kiss, guided him into it more fully, and he followed her example. He wondered: were the two of them melting into each other? Castiel was overcome. Of their own accord, his eyes fell closed, his senses were all tuned in to this moment, these newfound sensations. Her body was pressed against his, warm and soft, impossibly overwhelming in the way it made him feel. His hand that had gripped the back of her neck threateningly now grasped tenderly, pulling her to him, his other hand rested against her waist, holding her carefully. Alex was clinging to him like he was a strong tower, like he was something she held in esteem. Her mouth pressed against his all over again and he felt as though he'd had some kind of everlasting epiphany in this moment, here with her. He began to kiss back the way she was kissing him, trying this soft pressing and drawing away, this hesitant, soft-mouthed exploration.

What a wonder it was to kiss her—he'd seen humans kiss and it had looked uncomfortable and strange. But now, to actually partake in the activity... Castiel's opinion was changed. He felt the kiss in every atom of his body—every cell and fiber was under her spell. It seemed as though they were communicating without words, it felt like they were breathing each other in, and her mouth, her mouth... it was like the choicest wine. He was sure that this was what it was like to be drunk: hazy, swept away, in a world of warmth and good feelings. He never wanted it to end... this touching and feeling and intimate, wordless language of their mouths. Lost in her, Castiel couldn't find an end to things to focus on. His nose was pressed into her cheek and he felt how her hands were touching him softly, how her breaths were noisy and close to him, inside of him sometimes, how her body seemed to fit against his. Was he imagining things? It seemed like she needed him, like she wanted him in a way he could not name. The feeling was so resplendent and good, so overwhelming, that he wondered, briefly, how he'd ever thought it could be wrong for them to be together, not if it were like this. But, in the furthest reaches of his mind, he knew why, remembered. And suddenly, he stopped, pulled away, realizing himself and his actions—the absolute danger in doing this with her and going down this path—he looked at Alex in the beginnings of fear.

But then he saw how she looked stunned and close and breathless and beautiful and he again felt helpless, unable to deny what his body and mind wanted—and with even greater urgency than before, he pulled her back to him, kissing her again with passion, like he'd seen so many humans do. It wasn't just imitation, though. He felt the passion flooding his body and mind, passion that was created by everything he thought of her and had felt for her for so long now. Castiel was internally shocked in the background of his mind at his own behavior and the ease with which this came to him, but it came to him all the same. He was desperate for more of this and more of her; he was unable to reconcile Heaven's laws with his feelings, these sensations, the knowledge that he was in the arms of Alex Winchester, the human being who had somehow become the pinnacle of his thoughts, motivations, and desires. He was stunned all over again when something soft nudged his mouth—her tongue? His vessel seemed to love the sensation and warmth spread over him with dizzying speed even as a soft little helpless sound came out of Alex's mouth. Startled at the little whimper, Cas pulled back, a little short of breath.

It hit him all over again. You shouldn't be doing this, Castiel. It rang in his mind over and over again like a bell, like a quickly-rising alarm. You shouldn't be doing this, Castiel!

Horror quickly fell over him as they stared at each other breathlessly. What right did he have to do this? What sort of hellish audacity had gripped him to selfishly do what he had? Cas pulled out of her arms, anguished, guilty. He almost stumbled as he took two steps backwards, horrified at himself, confused, still in the throes of the physical effect she'd had on him. She stood there where he'd left her, looking small, alone, questioning. Hurt. "I... I shouldn't have done that," Castiel said, finding it difficult to speak. What kind of miserable hypocrite was he? A minute ago, he had told her that they couldn't be involved romantically and why. And then he had kissed her. What sense was there in it? None! He remembered what Dean had said, the warning about how his closeness to Alex would be her undoing. Terror shimmered through him, body and mind. What had he done?

Alex tried haltingly to move closer to him, but he stepped back, not allowing her to be close—it was too much for him. "That was a mistake," Cas said forcefully. Rejected, Alex stopped. He looked at her, and they were both pained—had he done that? Caused the grief on her face? He had. He struggled, realized how ashamed he was. "I'm sorry," he said slowly, agonized. "I've hurt you."

Her face crumpled, she looked away. And with sudden, intense abhorrence for himself, Cas realized that she was in even more pain than she had been when he'd found her in Gabriel's final hell—and that this time he was the cause. How could he have done that to her? If he'd known, he wouldn't have done what he did. How would this affect things between them now? Would she always be hurt and reminded of this when she look upon him in the future? Had he broken some sacred trust? He had certainty overstepped his bounds. If only he'd had the strength to resist kissing her, if only he hadn't given in. He looked down, thinking how if he could take it back, he would—his eyes flicked back up as he realized. He could. He could take it back. This whole mess he'd created. The pain on her face. He didn't know what other choice he had. It was the right thing to do. He would remove this memory, make it all fade away for her. She never had to know the mistake he'd made, the kiss he'd stolen.

He stepped forward, hand outstretched for her forehead, and she stepped back, eyes going wider. "W-what are you doing?"

"Making this right," he said, grasping her by the shoulder.

She already seemed to know where he was going with this and tried to pull away, her face crumpling even more. "Cas, no, what are you—"

"I have to," he said, holding her easily. She struggled against him, and he looked at her, sadly. "I am much stronger than you, Alex."

She fought harder, trying to get away from him, and tears of panic made her eyes shine. "Please, no, Cas, don't do this!" She begged, and he couldn't bear to look at her.

"I'm sorry," he said, and he was. He touched his fingers to her head.

Her expression went blank, eyes glassy, and she looked at him oddly. "I'm—wait, what was I saying?" she asked, woozy, then went limp, still, silent. Cas gently lowered her to the floor—she would be unconscious all night, he'd made sure of it. A twinge of guilt and darkness ran across his mind—surely this wasn't the best way. Her face was peaceful, smooth. He touched the side of it with the palm of his hand, for a minute, just looking at her. Then he pulled his hand away, as if bitten. He couldn't. If he was going to keep her safe—even from himself—he couldn't allow himself to think of her in that way. Ever. At all.

And yet… he didn't know if he could stop.

He stood up, with every intention of leaving her there in the panic room. The others would assume it was from the drinking, no one would ask questions, really... but Cas stood there, unmoving, unable to walk away. She was crumpled and alone, on the cold hard floor, and Castiel realized that he couldn't bring himself to leave her like that. It wasn't right. He crouched again, gathered her slack form up into his arms and carried her upstairs. Every step he took seemed heavy and guilt-ridden and he questioned himself over and over. Looked into her peaceful, unaware face and cursed himself for being such a fool.

Dean looked up from his laptop to see Alex's limp form being carried by Castiel. Her eyes were closed and she wasn't moving, one of her arms dangled slackly. He almost shoved the laptop onto the floor, he stood up so fast. "Oh my god, what happened?" he demanded, panicked, rushing over—did she fall down? A demon? Some kind of monster?
"She, uh, passed out," Castiel said. "From alcohol."

Dean froze, suddenly embarrassed. "Oh." He was kind of glad everyone else had gone to sleep so they hadn't seen that display.

Cas was looking at Dean grimly. "Where, uh, should I put her?"

Really? "How about a bed, genius?" Dean asked—not sure if Cas was hilarious or brain dead.

"A bed. Yes, of course."

Dean stepped into the hallway, adjacent, opened the guest room door, yanked back the blanket on the bed and Castiel, with surprising gentleness, laid Alex down, settled her into the bed. Dean watched hawkishly as a little stiffly, Cas pulled the blanket back up over her and then stood back. "Is that sufficient?" he asked. He sounded almost worried.

Dean looked at Cas sidelong. "That girl could sleep standing up. Don't worry about it." He turned to leave, got to the door, glanced back, and huffed. Castiel just stood there like a dumbass, looking at Alex's sleeping form. Dean looked at him, waited a second. Then cleared his throat. "This is the part where we leave, Cas."

"Oh. Yes," Cas said. "Of course."

They left the room and Dean shut the door quietly behind them, then turned to Cas, looking at him hard—the angel was acting extremely weird. "You sure there's nothing going on you want to tell me about?"

Cas looked at him sharply, eyes narrowed. "What would be going on?"

Dean gave him a pointed look. Cas might be thick, but was he really that clueless? "I mean, a friggin' angel takes special interest in my little sister—you better believe I'm gonna make sure it's nothing…" he searched for a word, "inappropriate." Cas's confused expression made Dean roll his eyes, and clarify awkwardly. "Meaning romantic, Cas!"

There was a pause, and Dean saw a muscle jump in Cas's cheek. "I don't possess the ability to be involved in that kind of situation," the angel said vaguely, not looking at Dean anymore.

"Meaning what?" Dean demanded, receiving another glare from Cas.

"Meaning stop accusing me of it," Cas said darkly, and brushed past Dean, clearly over the exchange.

Dean watched him go, annoyed. "Dick."

---

The Next Day

In the backseat of Ellen's Wagoneer, Alex sat in silence. She glanced at Cas, who was still avoiding her gaze. They had just passed the sign that said Welcome to Carthage. They were almost there.

They had been driving most of the day and it was nearing sundown. Most of the way there, Jo had been talking about hunting—the hunts she'd been on, the hunts she'd heard about. Alex had tuned it out mostly, trying to figure out why she felt so friggin' weird. She felt really out of it, like hung over, except she was pretty sure she shouldn't be. She hadn't had that much to drink. She couldn't remember, and the details of last night were really fuzzy. She wasn't sure why. There was an uneasy feeling in the pit of her stomach that stuck like glue.

She thought maybe for a minute she felt off because of the fight she'd had with Dean. They had basically yelled at each other in front of everyone when they left from Bobby's—she'd made to get in the car with Ellen, Dean had pitched a fit about her riding with him and Sam, she'd told him to cram it—so there was that. But that was everyday stuff. Not enough to make her feel so strange.

Ellen glanced back at her in the rearview. "You okay, honey?"

"Fine," Alex said offhandedly. "Just feeling a little off."

Beside her, Cas looked at her sidelong, and she gave him a thin little smile. He looked away, frowning. She felt her smile fade. She did remember trying to make a move on him before everything got hazy... so, was he angry? Had she upset him? It would seem so. Everything about his body language and expression seemed tense and disturbed and repelled by her. Alex was disappointed in herself. She couldn't do anything right—first she'd pissed him off with the flowers, then she'd gone and effed everything up yesterday. She looked out the window blankly as they entered the town. Carthage was empty.

"Where is everyone?" Jo asked.

"At least we know we're in the right place," Alex muttered. It was nice and spooky. Her stomach twisted as she hoped against hope that this would work, that it wasn't some kind of horrible trap.

Dean and Sam pulled up alongside them, and Ellen rolled down her window to talk to Dean. "Place seem a little empty to you?"

"Yeah. We're gonna go check out the PD," Dean said. "You guys stay here, see if you can find anybody."

"Okay," Ellen confirmed, and the boys drove off as Ellen parked the car. They all got out, except Cas.

Jo tapped on Cas's window. "Hey! Ever heard of a door handle?"

Suddenly, Cas was standing outside, beside her. "Of course I have," he said, blasé. He was looking around, an intense look on his face.

"What is it, Cas?" Ellen asked, watching him attentively.

"This town's not empty," he said, his tone foreboding.

Alex tried looking where he was looking, but saw nothing. "What do you see?" she asked.

"Reapers," he said.

"Reapers?" Ellen repeated. "As in more than one?"

"They only gather like this at times of great catastrophe. Chicago Fire, San Francisco Quake." He paused, frown deepening. "Pompeii." He glanced at Alex, then stepped forward. "Excuse me, I need to find out why they're here." He paused, looked back. Ellen and Jo were looking around, but Alex still stared after him, frowning a little. "Stay together," he said to her. "I'll be back."

And he turned and walked away, weaving through the countless reapers. None of them acknowledged him, they were all standing and facing toward a single point—which was exactly where he headed. They were all gazing up toward a single point on an apartment, or motel building—in the window, a reaper with cloudy white eyes stared back at him… then turned and disappeared.

Castiel followed him, slipping through the distance and up into the building in an instant. He was in a dark hallway, and he could see the reaper at the end of it. He followed him, entering a dark room, intent on finding out why the reapers were here. Then, beside him, he heard a soft voice. "Hello, brother."

The dark room was suddenly lit up in a blaze of light, and Castiel looked down—saw that he stood in a ring of fire. A trap. He had been trapped. He looked up, seeing the other person in the room. "Lucifer," Cas said.

Obscured by shadows, Lucifer walked slowly toward him. "So I take it you're here with the Winchesters."

Castiel felt something jump inside him. He clenched his jaw. "I came alone."

"Loyalty," Lucifer commented mildly. "Such a nice quality to see in this day and age. Castiel, right? Yes, Castiel. I'm told you came here in an automobile."

A little caught off guard by the comment, Castiel narrowed his eyes. "Yes."

"What was that like?" Lucifer asked, further confounding Castiel.

"Um. Slow. Confining."

Lucifer finally came close enough that Castiel could see him. "What a peculiar thing you are," he said, looking at Cas with interest.

Castiel, however, was looking at Lucifer's face—there were peeling burns dotting the man's fair face. "What's wrong with your vessel?" Cas asked suspiciously.

"Ah, yes," Lucifer said, chuckling softly. "Um. Nick is wearing a bit thin, I'm afraid. He can't contain me forever, so—" he looked at Castiel meaningfully.

"You—" Castiel started, stepping forward, then stopping as he reached the edge of the fire. He was breathing heavily, enraged at what Lucifer was implying. "You will not take Sam Winchester. I won't let you."

Lucifer seemed mildly perplexed. "Castiel. I don't understand why you're fighting me, of all the angels."

Castiel looked at him, glared. "You really have to ask?"

Lucifer looked at him openly, appraisingly. "I rebelled, I was cast out. You rebelled, you were cast out. Almost all of Heaven wants to see me dead, and if they succeed, guess what? You're their new public enemy number one."

Lucifer seemed almost amused by that suggestion. "And why should you need to die?" he asked softly. "Wouldn't it be much more poetic... if it were someone else's life on the line? Someone you cared for more than yourself?"

Castiel felt something in him jump again. Fear. "What—"

Lucifer raised his hand into the air, snapped his fingers once, and Alex was suddenly there, inexplicably. She looked confused, out of breath, and there was blood on her—she caught sight of him even as he realized it was someone else's blood.

Castiel strained at the edge of the fire in alarm, as Lucifer smiled at Alex calmly. "Hello, Alexandra."

"How did you bring her here, Lucifer?" Cas demanded lowly, dangerously, his vessel trembling wrathfully. Lucifer smiled ever so slightly as Castiel's voice raised. "How did you know where she was?"

Lucifer looked at him, smiling chillingly. "You give me so little credit, Castiel." He circled Alex, who looked so small and vulnerable next to Lucifer. "So, Alexandra, we were just talking about you," the devil said to her. "And forgive me for the thuggish tactics, but—" he produced a pair of handcuffs from behind himself— "I just don't want you to leave quite yet."

Cas's fists clenched and his breath caught as Lucifer grabbed Alex, snapped one end of the cuffs onto her left wrist, threaded the cuff chain around one of the smaller pipes on the wall then snapped the second cuff onto her right wrist, effectively trapping her there. Lucifer gently traced his fingers down Alex's neck—she squirmed, repulsed and scared—the room shook slightly as Castiel stood there in helpless rage. Lucifer's fingers went lower, lower, then grabbed at the sliver of chain there, yanked her lock pick necklace off her neck. She looked shocked that he had known about it—he just smiled, his eyes twinkling as they caught the glow of the holy fire.

"Leave her out of this," Castiel demanded, catching Lucifer's attention once more. "I'm warning you."

Lucifer ignored the idle threat, walked the edge of the ring of fire with a slow, measured gait. "Do you know, Castiel, that in order for me to summon Death tonight... as part of the ritual... I have to kill all the women in town? And, well, I've killed all of them already. All except three. Jo. Ellen."
He paused, looking at Alex. "And this one." He smiled sympathetically even as Castiel glared, angered, realizing what was happening. Lucifer shrugged mildly. "I'm sad to say, Jo and Ellen will be dead within the hour. However... I can spare Alex. For you, brother. If you agree to help me."

Castiel glowered, his jaw clenched tightly. Across from him, Alex was shaking her head, resigned.
"Don't do anything he says, Cas, don't."

He looked at her, pained, and Lucifer went to her, put a hand on her shoulder, his thumb stroking over it slowly. She shuddered in revulsion and Castiel swore that if this fire didn't separate him from her...!

Lucifer smiled at Alex, then touched the side of her face in something like tenderness. He forced her to look at him. She looked like she wanted to spit in his face. "We'll give him some time to think it over, Alex, what do you say?" He let go, nodded toward the doorway. "But, Castiel... look."

Cas followed Lucifer's eye line and his expression went cold.

Alex saw nothing there. "What is it?"
His chin jutted slightly forward in anger. "A reaper."

"Waiting," Lucifer said, and tapped Alex under the chin. "For you." He looked back at Cas. "Midnight," Lucifer said calmly. "Castiel. Make a wise choice. She doesn't need to die."

Castiel glared at him. "You're trying to manipulate me by threatening to murder her if I don't comply."

Lucifer put a hand over his heart, as if he were hurt. "I'm being reasonable, Castiel. Offering you a kindness."

"It's not kindness," Castiel bit back. "You want to burn the world and everyone in it."

"You make me sound so very dreadful," Lucifer said, shaking his head. "You and I? We're on the same side."

"I am not on your side," Castiel growled, and Lucifer shrugged, almost rolled his eyes.

"That's your choice. You see, unlike God, I don't see the point in forcing anyone to do anything against their will."

He seemed to tire of Castiel, and turned back to Alex, who immediately shrank back. "Alexandra. Why are you looking at me like that? We're going to be friends, you and I. You don't need to be afraid of me."

"Oh, okay then," she said acidly. Even though she didn't look it, Cas could tell she was afraid—very afraid.

Lucifer chuckled a little, like she was cute. "So much like your brother Dean. And more like Sam than you think." He sighed, a long, high sound. "Well. That's neither here nor there. Castiel holds your life in his hands right now, and I honestly do hope he chooses to save you."

"You're full of shit," Alex spat, and suddenly, Lucifer grabbed her tightly, shoved her against the wall with a loud thud—she cried out in surprise or maybe in pain. Castiel was furious at the scene.

"And you're far too confident," Lucifer told her while smiling. He looked back to see Castiel practically fuming at the edge of the ring. "Look. How protective he is of you," the devil said softly. His eyes were catching the flickering flames. He looked so pleased as his sinister gaze took the other angel in. "You've fallen so much further than you're willing to admit, Castiel."

It was almost midnight, and nothing had happened or changed—Alex was getting frantic. When she'd been separated from Dean, Sam, Ellen and Jo, there were hellhounds after them, and Jo had gotten hurt, pretty bad too, she thought. God almighty, what if they had all been killed by those things?

As if on cue, Meg walked in, and Alex's hatred could have almost blinded her. "I got the Winchesters pinned down," Meg said to Lucifer, pleased with herself. "For now, at least. What should I do with them?"

Lucifer paused. "Leave them alone."

Everyone in the room, even Meg, looked at Lucifer in confusion. "I—I'm sorry, but are you sure? Shouldn't we—" Meg started, but Lucifer just shook his head.

"Trust me, child. Everything happens for a reason." He stroked Meg's face, and the demon smiled, leaned into his hand.

"Well, Castiel," Lucifer said. "You have some time. Not much. But a little. Time to change your mind?" He waited. Castiel said nothing, just glared. Lucifer sighed, and made to leave the room.

"Where are you going?" Alex demanded.

Lucifer shrugged. "Things to do. Don't worry...I'll see you again." She was chilled by that statement. Lucifer turned and looked at Cas, spoke softly. "Time's running out, Castiel." He left, and Meg looked at Castiel and then Alex, frowning.

"What, is this some kinda trade? Sam for Alex?" She smiled. "Gotta say, I always liked Sam better. Then again, I was inside him."

Alex struggled against the handcuffs. "Screw you."

Meg giggled, looked at Alex suggestively, a single eyebrow arching up. "Anytime, sweet cheeks." She turned her attention to Cas, looked at him with a coy little smile. "I don't believe we've had the pleasure."

"That's not the word I'd use for it," he said, and her face broke into a smile. She laughed heartily.

"Oh, I like you," she said. "But, I gotta ask—you're honestly going to sacrifice yourself for the Winchesters?" She gave him a pouty face. "Come on, Clarence. It would be no fun if you missed our party. You're getting a VIP invitation and you're gonna say no?" She turned to Alex. "I mean, isn't that a crazy thing to turn down? My feelings are hurt." She swaggered a little closer to Alex, barely able to hold back a grin. "How's the fam doing? Dean looked so surprised to see my hellhounds, didn't he?"

"You bitch," Alex growled, so angry she was shaking.

Meg rolled her eyes, that stupid smile never leaving her face. "You know, normally I might resent your tone," she drawled. "But today, I'm in a good mood. I'll let it slide."

Alex stared back unblinkingly. "Oh boy. Gee whiz. Thanks."

Enjoying the control, Meg laughed, threw her head back a little, flexed her neck, then fanned herself with her hand. "Mmmm. Is it me, or is it kind of hot in here?" She laughed at herself, and Alex looked at Cas dismally.

He was looking at her intently, eyes flickering down, then up, down, then up. She realized that he was trying to tell her something. Giving the impression that she wasn't looking at anything at all, Alex let her gaze drop a little. She saw the pipe that her handcuffs were attached to. The screw was moving, slowly untwisting. Her eyes flashed back to him, and she saw his hand moving, just slightly. She saw exactly what he was doing and then knew what she had to do. She looked back at Meg, who was still laughing.

Alex demanded her attention, baited her. She needed Meg to be close for this. "Hey ugly, what's so hilarious?"

"We're gonna win. Can you feel it? These cloud-hopping pansies lost the whole damn universe. Lucifer's gonna take over heaven." She grinned at Cas now. "We're going to Heaven, Clarence."

"Strange, because I heard a different theory from a demon named Crowley," Castiel said.
Meg stopped, eyes narrowed. "You don't know Crowley."

"He believes Lucifer is just using demons to achieve an end, and that, once he does, he'll destroy you all."

Meg's smile was gone. Alex egged her on again. "You're cute when you're delusional, Meg."

"Me? Delusional?" she looked at Alex, came a little closer. "I'm not the one with a crush on an angel, sweetheart."

"No, you're the one who thinks the devil's gonna let you live to see daylight once he's used your pathetic skank ass up."

Meg came a little closer still, smiling again, so confident and egomaniacal. "You're wrong. Lucifer is the father of my race. My creator." She jerked her head at Cas. "His god is a deadbeat, but mine walks the earth."

"Not for long, bitch," Alex said, matching Meg's narcissistic expression, clearly pissing the demon off with that last comment.

Alex heard the screw drop to the floor, a little metallic ping even as Meg was getting in her face, saying, "you arrogant, ugly piece of—" Meg would never finish that sentence. Alex reeled back and knocked Meg in the forehead with hers, grabbing the pipe with both hands as she kicked Meg in the stomach—she yanked the loose pipe off the wall in both hands and using it to club the stumbling-backwards Meg across the face. The barrage of unexpected hits knocked the demon back into the ring of fire, and Cas caught Meg roughly, slammed his hand to her forehead—and… nothing. Meg gasped, panting, and then, realized nothing had happened. She laughed. "You can't gank demons, can you? You're cut off from the home office and you ain't got the juice. So what can you do, you impotent sap?"

"I can do this," he said, and threw her down across the fire, strode out over her as she screamed. Cas reached for Alex, his hand grabbing her by the wrist. And they were suddenly outside, in the dark, on a road. Next to them, the sign that said Welcome to Carthage.

Alex looked at Cas in alarm—he was looking at her breathlessly, demanding her attention. He grabbed the handcuffs, and easily ripped them off—she wasn't sure exactly how—she looked down, surprised to see the twisted metal laying on the ground—he'd done that with his bare hands. He was gripping her by both arms.

"Are you all right?" he asked in such distress that she was frightened.

"I'm... fine—" she stuttered. He seemed to be only mildly placated.

"Do not move—" he said intensely. "I'll be right back." And he disappeared again, leaving Alex blinking, shocked, without anything to do but wait. About a minute passed, where Alex kind of stood there, in shock, in fear. What would Cas find? What if Lucifer found him or hurt him?

She didn't have to wonder for long—Cas was back, Dean and Sam on either side of him. Dean and Sam only. Alex looked at them, shaking her head in dread. "...Ellen and Jo?" she asked. Sam shook his head, looking away, and Dean looked positively wrathful. Alex stared, in shock. "And… the devil?"

Beside herself, Alex looked at her brother. "Are you sure that you—"
"Yes, I'm damn sure!" he shouted. "It didn't work, and he raised Death, and now we're all new levels of screwed!"

Sam looked at Castiel, whose face gave away nothing. "Cas? What do we do?"

"What do we do?" He repeated, as if that were a ridiculous question. "What can we do?" he asked bitterly. "It would seem nothing. Destiny is unwavering," he said, his voice becoming acidic. "Michael and Lucifer will fight. It's just a matter of when."

"They can't fight if neither of us says yes," Sam argued.

Cas looked at him sharply, anger like Alex had never seen on his face. "You will. Both of you. It's inevitable. Destiny cannot be changed, and we shouldn't try to go against it. It will always end in death and destruction." He looked between the three Winchesters, his face etched in harsh lines. "Tonight should prove that to you."

"It proves nothing except we can't kill the devil with the Colt," Dean retorted. "So we find another friggin' way!"

"There is no other way, Dean," Cas said furiously. "You should accept it." Castiel looked at Dean as if in disgust. "Why do you insist on being so shortsighted and stubborn?"

"Because this is my family we're talking about!" Dean shouted. "I am not saying yes, because I refuse to kill Sam or leave Alex behind. You hear me, Cas?" Dean looked at them all, waving an angry arm. "We have lost too many damn people to walk away from this now. I am ending what I started, you all got that?" He looked like he wanted to murder someone. "I gotta go get the car. Stay here, all of you," he said, and turned, began to march down the road, back toward town.

Cas, Sam, and Alex watched him go silently. "He's not even the one who started it all," Sam said after a moment, sounding defeated. "I mean, maybe he broke the first seal. But I'm the one who set Lucifer free."

Castiel's jaw worked oddly, the heated anger fading away into an implacable expression. "And I'm the one who didn't warn you when I could have. I could have stopped it all." Alex tried to search out his gaze, but he wouldn't look at her.

"Are you all right, Cas?" Alex asked, trying to see into him, past his defenses and anger.

He glanced at her. "No. Lucifer shouldn't have been able to summon you like that. This requires investigation." She opened her mouth to say something else, but without any warning, he was suddenly gone.

Sam let out an exasperated puff of air. "Why does he always do that?"

She didn't know.

All around them, crickets chirped, as if it were a normal, peaceful night.

They rode back to Bobby's in complete, dead silence. Depressed, sad, reflecting. Each on their own private hells and torment. All thinking about the loss of Ellen and Jo. Before Dean had come back with the Impala, Sam told Alex about what the women had done, how they had sacrificed themselves for Sam and Dean. She cried then, wept because they had died for nothing—Lucifer was still alive, and the Colt, their only hope, hadn't worked. Sam had held her tight and she'd cried all the tears she had left. And now, she was silent. She felt like if she cried in front of Dean, it would set him off, too. She could tell from looking at him how hard he was taking it. How much he didn't want to face it. And it was heartwrenching.

When they got back to Bobby's, Dean got out of the car wordlessly and walked off a ways, into the salvage yard. Sam hung back, then shook his head, went inside, probably to tell Bobby the news. Alex hesitated, then followed Dean, not sure if she should or not, if he needed to be alone or what.

He had his hands in his jacket pockets, facing away from her. She came to his side slowly. "You okay?" It was a stupid, ridiculous question.

Dean overlooked that though, just looked down, his face etched in sadness. "All these people we love keep dying, Alex, and I keep thinking… is it my fault? Did I cause this somehow?" He looked at her then, grimacing, and then looked straight ahead. "I'm a joke, Alex. I can't protect anyone. I always think I can." He seemed so hollow as he repeated himself. "I always think I can."

He was tiredly rubbing his forehead with the palm of his hand now as his voice wavered with emotion and a broken quality. "I couldn't keep the two of them alive—I couldn't keep Lucifer from digging his talons into you—I don't think I can protect Sam from his future. From Detroit. I'm losing everyone and I'm starting to get that I can't do a damn thing about any of it." He dropped his hand, expression blank. "Maybe I should stop trying."

Alex crossed her arms, rounded on him, putting herself in front of him. "Dean Winchester. Look at me and shut up." He did. His eyes shone with tears. "Don't you dare give up on this," Alex said fiercely. "You can keep blaming yourself, or you can accept that you don't control life. You don't. And I know it hurts like hell. But don't you dare let their deaths be in vain. We are not giving up on this. We are not letting Lucifer get what he wants."

He looked down, his voice passionless. "I'm tired, Al. I'm tired."

"We all are," she said softly, not really knowing what else to say.

He wet his lips, a self-deprecating smile on his face, that faded into grief once more. He struggled a minute, vulnerable. "And, the crazy things is… I thought… in the back of my mind… Jo and me, someday… maybe…” he trailed off. There was very rare, real emotion in his voice, and she saw a tear run down his cheek, the moonlight glinting off of the streak left behind. It completely broke her already aching heart.

Alex slid her arms through his, thinking of an angel who she felt the very same way about: someday… maybe… but probably not. She understood it so well. Dean kept his hands in his pockets, not really accepting her gesture of affection in any way except leaning his head sideways slightly against hers. He was trying to hold himself together—she could feel him struggling to breathe normally, against the threat of tears. They just stayed there like that awhile, silent, each unwilling to break down.

Dean pulled away finally, muttered something about going inside, avoiding her gaze as he did so. Alex was left alone to watch her big brother walk away. She suddenly thought how cold it was that night, and how she hadn't noticed until right then.

Later That Night

Alex walked by moonlight down the main road, watching the yellow lines under her feet as she went. It was late enough that she didn't even have to worry about traffic. Not a single car had passed so far, and she'd been walking for awhile, maybe thirty minutes. She was lost in her thoughts and trying to forget everything, trying to clear her mind. After following Dean inside of Bobby's house, she'd quickly realized she just couldn't be there, not right then; that that she needed to get out of there. She was probably a mile from Bobby's by now, but she kept walking, one foot in front of the other. Staying in motion helped her forget, just a little bit.

But she couldn't run from what was inside. She was conflicted, grieved, and hollow. She stopped and listened to the sound of silence. Everything that had happened tonight discouraged and wrecked her. The Colt failing to kill Lucifer had been like a punch in the gut. That had been their single hope. If it couldn't kill him, what, if anything besides Michael, could?

Her mind turned to Ellen and Jo, and Alex closed her eyes tightly for a second. Alex had lost count of how many friends had died in her lifetime, but she had never imagined having to add the Harvelles to that tally. It was another reminder that hunters pretty much always met bloody ends, violent deaths. And if she were honest, she felt her end approaching, too. That was the one certainty of this life—that death could come any day, and probably would.

There was a soft sound to her right.

"Miss Winchester," came a pleasant, accented voice. Alex whirled, startled and on guard, to see a dark-haired man in an all-black suit. He was sauntering toward her slowly, smiling pleasantly. "Out for a walk awful late aren't you, love?" He stopped a couple steps away, looked at her meaningfully. "Could be dangerous for a young lady to be traipsing about after dark, don't you think?"

"And who the hell are you supposed to be?" Alex demanded, looking him up and down, her hand hovering over her back pocket where her hunting knife was sheathed.

"Name's Crowley," the man said silkily. Alex's face dropped, and he nodded, as if he weren't surprised. "Right-o. I see you've heard of me." He lowered his chin, looking at her slyly. "Have to say I was disappointed when you didn't come along for the meet n' greet with your brothers."

Great, this was just awesome—a mile from Bobby's, no weapon to use against a demon, no one nearby to help—still, none of it stopped her from mouthing off. "Screw off or I'll kill you."

He sighed, seeming disappointed with her. "You lot are so predictable." He took in her expression and his face screwed up. "Oh stop looking at me like that, would you? I'm not the enemy here, Alex."

At that comment, she raised her eyebrows, matching his attitude blow for blow. "Uh, you know who I am, right? I'm a Winchester. The simple fact that you're a demon makes you my enemy."

He rolled his eyes. "Right. Well. The enemy of my enemy is my friend. Or some tripe like that."

Alex crossed her arms, not taking her mistrustful eyes off of him for a second. "Yeah, my brothers told me all about how you want Lucifer dead. But that doesn't exactly make us buddies."

"No, I suppose it doesn't," he said, chuckling softly, then without any notice, he flew into a fit of rage. "Especially since they couldn't hold up their end of my friggin' deal!" Alex kind of leaned back when he blasted off, and he stopped, pressed his mouth closed, and when he spoke again, it was calm, pleasant. "I gave them the Colt to kill the devil. Look where that's gotten me."

"News travels fast," Alex commented suspiciously, not sure how he could know that so soon.

"Indeed. And since your blithering idiot brothers couldn't kill the devil today… I'm forced to get desperate."
"I'm waiting for the punch line," Alex said mistrustfully.

Crowley chuckled, looked down at the ground briefly, then back at her. "You are a pet, aren't you?" His amusement faded into semi-seriousness. "The punch line. Well. There are rumors." His eyebrows raised briefly. "That you, my dear, have a part to play in this thing."

Her eyes narrowed. "What the hell do you mean?"

He sauntered a little closer. "Word on the grapevine is that you're the one who'll kill Lucy."

The air left Alex's lungs. "What?"

"Yes, I know," Crowley said dramatically. "Didn't believe it at first myself, thought it was absolute bollocks, but now that your oaf brothers have gone and mucked it all up—well, I'm starting to consider the validity of what I've heard."

"Dean is Michael's vessel," Alex said emphatically, her mind spinning. "Not me."

"Never said anything about Michael though, did I?" Crowley asked, smiling mysteriously. "Think about it a tic, darling. You're a Winchester. Your blood line ties you to this whole situation by association. How remains to be seen. But I'm going to find out."

"Because I know you want Lucifer dead just as much as I do."

She stared at him, hard, pretty freaked out overall, not sure if he were trying to screw with her or what. He seemed entirely amused by her confusion, his eyes crinkling up in another smile. "Ah, me, look at the time," he said. "Things to do. Places to be. Hell to raise." But then, his eyes narrowing a little. "Hmm. Interesting."

"What?" Alex asked suspiciously, not liking the look on his face.

The smile was back, sly this time, knowing. "That angel on your shoulder? He's a tricky little devil..." he chuckled lowly, looking at her as he knew something she didn't. Then with no fanfare, he raised his hand up beside his head and moved his fingers up and down twice, waving. "Laters."

In a single blink, Crowley was gone, leaving her absolutely reeling from the exchange. Unsure what to think, or if he were really gone. For a second, she wanted to open her mouth and call Cas. She almost did. And then she shut her mouth, decided not to.

Because something deep inside was telling her she shouldn't share what Crowley told her. With anyone. Not yet, anyway.
In every direction the arctic tundra stretched pristine and untouched. Snowy white mountains marched along the horizon, rising up from icy plateaus, the frozen oceans that stretched into what looked like infinity beyond. The sun shone down from a crystal blue sky onto a solitary figure wearing a trench coat.

Castiel breathed in the sharp and icy air, his eyes scanning the distance. It had been two days since everything happened at Carthage.

There was no logical reason for him to be here. And yet there he stood in a vast, empty wilderness of ice and snow, removed from anytrace of humanity. Currently, he couldn't bear the sight of people. They all reminded him of her. Of what he had done.

Never before had his mind been such a disaster of overwhelming, chaotic thoughts. There was regret—confusion—guilt. And there was a deep seated fear because of what Lucifer had been able to do with Alex; how helpless Castiel had been to defend her—how weak and ineffective and unprepared he had been for what had happened. Had Azazel done something to Alex that night in the nursery? Had Castiel overlooked some mark, some sort of tracking charm or blood spell? Or was Lucifer far more powerful than he’d thought? How had the devil known what Alex meant to Castiel? He could still see Lucifer's hand touching Alex's face as if in tenderness. The memory still inspired rage inside of him.

It was easier to face the rage than the other things: the shame and horror, the creeping suspicion that he had done the wrong thing. The self-hatred for his momentary lapse in control.

A simple touch of her hand on his had set in motion a series of actions that Castiel couldn't quite explain. It had only been her hand gently resting on top of his. Anna had touched him that way, once. But it hadn't been the same, not at all. There had been much more meaning and revelation behind Alex's hand coming to rest atop his. The instant their skin brushed, her fingers curling in between his hesitantly—he'd been suddenly aware that maybe he wasn't the only one who had these indescribable, confusing feelings. Her hand, her eyes, they had fleetingly confirmed the hope he'd buried deep down. And then she had run away and he'd had to follow, had to know why she'd done that, needed to hear it from her—why she had touched his hand like that. It hadn't been his place to pursue that line of questions. It had been a huge mistake. And still, he remembered the feeling of her mouth against his, her body so soft in his arms...

It was easy now—not in the panic room, not with Alex who had been so warm and close—to tell himself he had been weak and foolish. To tell himself he should have been able to physically walk away, that he shouldn't have even followed her in the first place. But he remembered, clearly, how impossible that had been. His body, his mind, his every impulse and function had failed him and had pushed him forward into her arms, where he had given a kiss that he never should have even thought about, much less participated in. He cursed himself for not having the willpower or the strength to stop it from happening, even as, at the same time, he desired a thousand more moments like it with her.

All of the jumbled thoughts in his mind were overpowered by the memory of Alex's face when he had forcefully taken her memory. The sheer horror and fear when she had pleaded with him not to take it away haunted him. Haunted him. Tore at him inside. He had done that to her. No one else. Him—the one who had made her whole, restored her voice, was supposed to protect and guard her. He had taken something from her, intruded on and manipulated her mind. It wasn't his right, and he realized that, but what other choice did he have? Let her remember? He'd said too much, revealed too much. Done too much. Endangered her. He almost wished he could erase it all from his memory, because he remembered, in torturous detail, every second, every millisecond of what happened in the panic room. The way she'd looked at him, asked him, tripping over her words, if he felt things for her… how she'd embraced him, kissed him in a way that made him feel physically weak, touched him and made him feel alive in a way that he'd never felt before and then begged him please no, don't…

A cold breeze whistled across the surface of the frozen ocean he stood on, stinging the skin of his vessel, whipping his trench coat around his legs furiously. But his thoughts persisted despite the momentary distraction. How could he have done that? Any of that? A few months ago he never would have imagined himself capable of any of the recent things he'd done, said, felt. His selfish desire for answers and closeness had caused the entire mess and he hadn't known any other way to fix it except to take the memory from her entirely.

Even if she wouldn't remember it… he would always carry the moment with him and be left wondering what it all even meant: the consuming nature of his thoughts toward her, the way he wanted physical closeness, the anxiety that seemed to pit itself in his stomach when he didn't know where she was. He wondered, briefly, unintentionally: What if he hadn't taken the memory from her? What would have happened with them? She had asked if he had feelings for her. He had essentially said yes. And when she had said she felt the same—it had ignited something that still remained, smoldering deep within. The way she'd looked at him, full of desire and need and affection was comparable to nothing else he had ever experienced or seen on earth or in Heaven.

He almost physically shook himself at where these thoughts were going. These were dangerous musings. It was impossible. Not only were angel human relationships forbidden, but Lucifer had already shown Castiel that his worst fear was true. Alex would be used against him because of how much he cared for her. Any perspective he took, he saw himself as a danger to her. The best way to give her safety was to stay far away. He disliked the thought very much. He couldn't leave her completely. Not now. Probably not ever. But especially not right now, not when her brothers were being hounded by Heaven and Hell, not while Lucifer seemed to have his sights set on her. Not now.

He found himself remembering the first time he'd seen Alex. October, 2007. She was sitting on the ground, boots off, shaking bits of dead grass out of the insides of them—hair a mess, something or someone else's blood on her—shirt a little ripped, some scratches on her arms. Sam and Dean were nearby, packing weapons back into the Impala. They looked rough, too, but Castiel didn't remember the details of their appearance. He had been attentive to her, not them. Alex looked at her brothers with those large, watchful eyes, and Castiel saw her sadness as clearly as he could see her slouching shoulders, the arch of her long neck, the shiny silver whistle strung around that neck. Dean had called to her, and silently, she had gone to stand with her brothers, who fuss ed over her scratches. She looked small next to them, young and fragile. Castiel hadn't understood why he was ordered to protect her, but hadn't needed to. He saw her, and knew he was meant to be her guardian. It had felt right.

A handful of weeks later, after watching her pain and her silence, knowing he had the power to change it and wanting to, deeply—he simply had. There had been no other choice in his mind. But that time, it had been the right choice, not without consequences or hardship, but the right choice. He didn't question it, not then and not now. That had been before his vessel. The vessel, this human body, was the place where the questions began.
His vessel and the constant call of emotions that came with it complicated everything, made him unsure of himself and seemingly incapable of reasoning with any semblance of clarity. Everything was muddled and distorted, skewed by the curse of emotion. The longer he was here, walking the earth in the body of a man, the more intensely he felt. He wasn't sure that he wanted to feel it. Any of it. And yet he did. He seemed to have no choice in the matter; there seemed no other path for him than the one he was on.

Drawing a deep breath, Cas looked around the snowy world that surrounded him, reflecting on the past two days which he had spent trying to uncover how Lucifer had summoned Alex with a mere snap of his fingers. The Enochian warding symbols on Alex's ribs—placed by Castiel himself—should have prevented Lucifer from knowing her location. But so far, Cas had learned nothing. He didn't know why. And the thought that the devil could, at any moment, lay hands on Alex while Cas remained blind to her location—disturbed him on the deepest levels imaginable.

His search for God; fruitless. His search for answers about Lucifer; thus far unsuccessful. He was discouraged and alone; feeling the absence of Alex in every way; in need of answers and possessing none; wishing for an escape from the constant noise in his mind, but finding quiet nowhere. Not even here, in a frozen wasteland, away from everyone and everything.

---

Two Weeks Later

Ketchum, Oklahoma

Legend says a pure soul can destroy evil from the inside. Alex sat back from where she'd been hunched over Sam's laptop and she rubbed an eye with the heel of her palm. She'd been on the internet for way too long. A bunch of the more "mainstream" religions and mythologies had similar statements about a pure soul being able to destroy evil from within—that was the one recurring theme Alex was finding as she tried, kind of failing miserably, to find something, anything, to dispel or confirm what Crowley had told her. Whenever Sam and Dean were distracted or gone, she'd pull out the laptop and read everything she could on Lucifer—but she had yet to find a website that actually talked about literally killing him and/or how. She needed to get to some of Bobby's books, because the vague stuff she was finding on the web wasn't cutting it.

Word on the grapevine is that you're the one who'll kill Lucy.

Crowley's ominous words filled Alex's every waking moment. She didn't trust Crowley, or any demon for that matter, but what the hell was she supposed to make of the claim? She went back and forth between believing Crowley was just screwing around with her to wondering if he were being truthful. Where would such a rumor have even come from? And what kind of truth was there to it? It made no sense to Alex, who so far, had been ignored by demons and angels alike. Everyone was after Dean and Sam, and Alex had always been an afterthought (or forgotten completely). But maybe that was the whole point. Maybe they were distractions. But from what? Alex was driving herself crazy with questions and theories. She hadn't mentioned it to a soul, and didn't plan on it, in case Crowley was trying to get to her or mess with her family. She'd figure it out on her own and go from there. And besides—she had a feeling she hadn't seen the last of Crowley. Next time, she'd be ready for him.

Staring unseeingly at the laptop screen, which was currently switching to screen saver, Alex listened to the ringing silence of the motel room. She kind of wished, for a minute, that she hadn't wimped out about going along on the current hunt. If she'd gone along, she wouldn't be so restless and, well, bored. Sam and Dean had both been fine with her staying behind—too fine. But she also really hadn't wanted to go along, not this time. Checking into a mental ward—and even if it were to go undercover—nope. Not happening. Ever. She had a huge aversion to looney bins. Even driving by them skeeved her out.

So, she remained behind, alone.

It had been two weeks already since Carthage. Dean hadn't quite been himself since. Well, had any of them? They had really thought the Colt would work. They were all the way back at square one with no clue how to kill the devil—or if it were even possible. Cas had seemed to think it wasn't possible from the beginning. Maybe he had been right.

A twinge of dysphoria ran through her veins at the thought of him. Cas hadn't shown up since Carthage—after he disappeared abruptly, upset and riled. She remembered the mangled silver handcuffs he'd ripped off of her wrists, glinting up at her from the ground. It was strange, but that had disturbed her the most of everything that had happened that night. How clearly shaken and freaked out he'd been, as well as the reminder of how physically powerful he was. Sometimes, she forgot he was that strong and capable. And yet, as commanding as he was, his alarmed behavior followed by his disappearance and subsequent silence worried her. Where had he gone? Was he okay?

Alex knew he'd called Dean a couple times on the phone to check in, but that was it, nothing else, and it almost felt like he was avoiding her. She couldn't shake the feeling that something was wrong there, but she wasn't sure what. His absence was noticeable. Sometimes she looked up, expecting he'd be there. But he wasn't. Alex leaned her elbows onto the table, put her head in her hands, and scrubbed her palms across her face. She was so very tired, as usual. But more in her mind than her body. There was too much to carry. Ellen and Jo, dead, sacrificing their lives for a whole lot of nothing. Dean, withdrawing and holding Alex at arm's length, treating her like she was a child. Sam, hesitant and guilty and avoiding her. Cas, gone and silent and upset with her, she was pretty sure. Crowley's cryptic message, the idea that she might somehow play a role in this whole apocalypse thing. It was all so much. And she shouldered it alone. She took her face out of her hands, absently twisted Dad's wedding band around her index finger where it always was.

There was a soft sound in front of her, and she looked up, accidentally knocking a book off the edge of the table when she saw Cas standing there, a grim expression on his face. "I can't find out why Lucifer was able to summon you like that," he announced without any dalliance whatsoever. Surprised to see him, it took her a couple seconds to respond. "Uh, nice to see you too, Cas," she said as she shut the laptop discreetly, stood up, feeling a little flustered. Her heart rate had increased. Then, frowning, she wondered aloud, "wait—how'd you know where I was?"

He glanced at her, sidelong, seeming troubled, his face hard with a stern frown. "I called Sam and he told me," Cas replied, distracted, on edge. "That's beside the point. Lucifer should not have been able to do what he did—the warding sigil I put in place—I haven't been able to learn why… or how he was able to do that."

"It's okay, Cas," Alex said, looking at him, a little worried. "Just, uh, calm down," she told him, and she got another one of those hooded glances. He seemed shaken up, definitely not himself. His weird behavior was disconcerting.

He looked around the room intently. "Why are you here alone?" he asked.

Alex shrugged, a little ashamed of her self-perceived cowardice. "The job my brothers are doing isn't exactly my... cup of tea."

Cas looked at her, expression twisting up in confusion. "What do beverages have to do with it?"
A smile popped onto Alex's face at his question and she tried to hide it. He really had no clue how funny he was, which made it even funnier. She cleared her throat, trying to concentrate on answering his question. "They're, uh, hunting some kind of monster at a mental hospital here in town. Old hunting friend of Dad's is in there, Dean figured he owed the guy. But I, uh, don't do crazy houses." Cas's eyes narrowed just slightly as he looked at her half way. "A visit, I mean, yeah, okay. But being committed—not happening."

Cas, still distracted, made no response. He went to the motel room window and looked out, scowling. "You shouldn't be left alone right now," he said grimly. His bright blue eyes flickered over to hers briefly. "It's too dangerous."

Maybe he meant well, but the comment snapped something inside her. "Cas—I know you're my guardian angel or whatever, but I don't appreciate your implication." She stared at him hard. "I'm not helpless. I can defend myself and take care of myself."

He looked at her, eyebrows knit together, turned a little toward her. "Like you took care of yourself when Lucifer summoned you?"

Alex felt her eyebrows raise in surprise at his comment, and before she could stop herself, she was slinging an insult back. "Yeah and you were a big help stuck in your little fire circle, weren't you Castiel?" He was visibly hurt by her retort, and Alex regretted her word choice and tone immediately. Her gaze faltered away from him, and she felt herself fumbling for words, for some kind of apology. "Sorry. I'm... just frustrated right now."

And that was the truth. She was so, so frustrated. No matter what she did, she felt weaker every day than the last. She used to fight hard, fear nothing. But these days, she ran from everything, lived in fear of the future, in fear that everything she did was in vain. Dean was treating her like she was a fragile china doll, Cas insisted that everything was too dangerous for her, she chickened out of the latest hunt. She felt smothered and ineffective. She wanted to matter. But maybe Gabriel had been right, that she had no role, that she was only a victim. She looked at Cas silently.

Cas took a deep breath, came away from the window but stayed back, further than usual, looking at Alex hesitantly. "I know that you are not, as you say, helpless," he said somberly. His eyes fell away from hers. "But there are bigger enemies after you than before."

Alex looked at him bleakly, nodding ever so slightly, feeling defeated, sighing heavily. "I get it Cas," she said. "You're just looking out for me."

Again his eyes darted to hers. "Yes." His jaw clenched tightly. "It's not like before, when I knew where you were at all times. You're hidden from angels. From me." His eyes focused on some distant point to his right. Alex could almost see how agonized he was at this point. "But not from Lucifer..." he trailed off. Cas looked at her now, strangely.

Alex looked at him closely, worried again. She knew the whole Lucifer thing was bothering him, but there was something else. She could sense it. "What is it, Cas? Something else is wrong with you."

"I'm functioning fine," he replied darkly, not looking at her again.

"You sure?" Alex asked, stepping a little closer, trying to read him, see through him. The second she did that, his eyes snapped to her, his expression seemed to chill over. Alex froze—he looked like he wanted her to get away from him, and she didn't understand. "Did I... do something?" she asked softly, fearing the answer.
But Castiel, eyes now going back and forth over the floor in front of her feet, shook his head just once, his voice deep and disturbed. "No, of course not," he replied, almost mumbling. "I—I have to go."

And he vanished without warning, leaving Alex stung, mouth hanging slightly open as she stared at where he'd been. What the hell? Why was he acting like this? He'd been behaving strangely toward her ever since she'd tried to put a move on him the night before Carthage.

It had only been the touch of a hand and the intention of a kiss—but apparently that was enough to completely repulse him. That was the only explanation she could think of. Well, he had been acting a little oddly toward her before that, too, hadn't he? Alex felt such a deep sense of embarrassment and humiliation, thinking of herself and how idealistic and shortsighted she'd been. She had believed, for a while, like a damn lovesick highschooler, that Cas was interested in her. That the way he looked at her was because—she stopped the thought right there. This was ridiculous. She was ridiculous.

She sat down on one of the beds, feeling hollow and dumb. The motel room seemed emptier than it had before. She hated herself for the emotions she was feeling, and in a fit of rage she grabbed the lamp off the bedside table, ripping it clean out of the wall, cord and everything. She threw it at the opposite wall where it shattered. She buried her face in her palms, breathing hard to keep herself from crying.

Invisible to her, Castiel remained, watching Alex, his face a mask of torment.

A Week Later

"Wake up. Alex!" Dean's voice was really loud and right in her ear as she became aware that she was being shaken roughly. She tried shoving him away, but he just yanked her up by the shoulder—if that wasn't a rude awakening, she wasn't sure what was. Awake but barely, she glared at Dean, saw that Sam was awake, too, and looking equally unenthused.

"Dammit, Dean," Alex moaned. "This is the first time I've gotten to sleep in two days and you wake me up in the middle of the fucking night?"

Dean was ignoring her and jerking his jacket on. "Anna just came to me in a dream and said we got to meet her ASAP."

Alex stopped mid eye-rub, suddenly awake and suspicious. "Wait—whoa—Anna?"

"We shouldn't just drop everything and go, Dean," Sam put in tiredly, running a hand through his messy bed head hair. "Could be some kind of trap."

Dean seemed to think that suggestion was ridiculous. "A trap? Come on, Sam. This is Anna."

"Who we haven't seen or heard from in months, remember?" Alex reminded him and stood up, wishing she were still asleep. She was too tired to talk sense into her brother, but left with no other option. "Dean these are crazy times. I mean two days ago Sam swapped bodies with a teenager who was gonna hand him over to Lucifer—and we find out demons have a bounty out on your head… I'm just saying maybe we should be careful. We didn't even really know Anna."

Dean looked at his sister unhappily. "Speak for yourself," he said cryptically, getting a confused look in return.

"Alex is right, we need a second opinion on this," Sam said, pulling out his phone, the blue glow lighting his tired face as he began scrolling through his contacts. "I'm calling Cas."

Dean snatched the phone from Sam. "No, you're not," he said, ignoring Sam's bitchface and wagging the phone at him. "I don't need him raining on my parade."

Sam grabbed for his phone. "Give me—" he growled, "the phone!" Alex watched her apparently five-year-old brothers fighting over the phone. She didn't have time for this stupidity.

She sighed, resigning, bracing herself then looked at the ceiling. "Hey Cas, can you get your ass over here?" Alex asked out loud, drawing strange looks from Sam and Dean.

"Hello," Cas said, suddenly in the middle of the room. Even though she'd called him, Alex was a little surprised he'd come, honestly, a little taken aback at how fast he responded. She looked at him briefly, then when his eyes met hers, she looked away immediately.

"You can do that?" Sam asked Alex, kind of awed, then in quick succession, began to frown. "Why didn't I know this? And give me that." He swiped the phone back from his brother.

"Need to know basis," Dean grumbled, then turned on Cas. "Sorry, wrong number," he said sarcastically. "You can go."

"No—" Sam said a little forcefully, giving Dean a surprisingly assertive stare. "Dean—tell Cas what you told us."

Castiel waited, listening, his expression somber and focused.

There was a very agitated huff. "Fine," Dean said, and looked at Cas, went over to him. "Anna came to for a visit in la la land. Said she needs our help right away. That she's been in prison this whole time. Oh. And that you're the one who got her put in there."

Alex and Sam, who stood back a little further, looked at Cas in unison. The angel's eyes had narrowed just slightly as he looked at Dean. "That's true, yes..."

"You wanna explain why?" Dean demanded gruffly.

Castiel paused a moment, and he was hard to read. He seemed mildly abashed. "I thought it was the right thing to do, at the time. Now I realize that it was a mistake." He was frowning, thinking. "This news is troubling." He looked at Dean, the frown deepening. "No one escapes Heaven. No one. You will not go and meet her."

Eyebrows raising, Dean crossed his arms. "Oh, and you're gonna stop me?" he asked, looking like he was ready to fight.

Castiel responded by stepping closer. "If I must." Dean's expression showed surprise as Cas leveled him with an unflinching stare. "Dean, if she's here, if she's escaped Heaven, it's because she was sent." Cas paused. "She is not to be trusted."

"This is Anna we're talking about," Dean protested.

"Who we knew for a few days when she was human," Alex reminded him. "She's been upstairs an awful long time, Dean." Both Cas and Dean looked at her in unison, and she had to force herself to not look at Cas like she wanted to.

Dean didn't look like he liked the implication, but cut his gaze to Sam as if for a second opinion. Alex finally looked at Cas then, unable to stop herself. His guarded, intent gaze was directed at her.
She looked away. She’d felt fine until he appeared... now her insides were a jumble again.

"I think Cas is right," Sam was saying to Dean, and Castiel turned his attention back to Dean.

"Give me the address she gave you," Cas said. "I'll discover her intentions."

Dean looked at him, clearly pissed, wanting to trust Anna but standing alone in the minority. He huffed, outnumbered. "Yeah. Fine."

A woman entered a large, dark, and empty warehouse. Wind swept through the interior, and with it came the sound of whispering voices. "Hello?" the woman called, her brilliant red hair whipping around her face in the wind. "Who's there?" Over her head, light bulbs burst, showering the entire warehouse in sparks. She stopped walking.

"Hello, Anna," Castiel said, appearing behind her. His voice echoed in the large, dark space.

She turned around slowly, her dark eyes looking at him guardedly. "Well," she said. "If I didn't know any better... I'd say the Winchesters don't trust me."

"I don't trust you," Cas corrected her, looking at his sister angel carefully. "I wouldn't let them come." He began to circle her, giving her a wide berth, looking at her intently.

She kept turning to face him. "And why is that?" she asked.

"If you're out of prison, it's because they let you out," Cas said, glancing around the warehouse, watchful, expectant of some kind of trick or trap. "And they sent you here to do their dirty work."

"What makes you so sure of that?" Anna asked.

"Because I've experienced..." he trailed off, remembering. "Heaven's persuasion."

"You mean when you gave me to them," she said, and there was clear bitterness there.

Cas looked at her somberly, regretting what he had done. "That was a mistake." He said, and paused. "Anna, whatever they sent you here to do—"

"They didn't send me," Anna insisted almost angrily. "I escaped."

"No one escapes," Castiel replied testily—she was lying, she had to be—but Anna almost seemed amused at his comment.

"All these centuries, and you're underestimating me now?" She asked. "I escaped. I'm working on my own." She paused, mouth thinning a little. "Essentially."

"All right," Cas said, going along with her momentarily. "If you're not one of them, then what do you want?"

"I want to help." She sounded emphatic, but Castiel almost had to smile at the way she underestimated him.

"Then what are doing with that knife?" He asked, looking at her in superiority.

Her expression faded. She was caught. She grudgingly pulled out a knife—not an angel blade. "I'm not allowed to defend myself?" She asked. Another flimsy attempt on her part.
"Against whom?" Castiel asked. "That blade doesn't work against angels. It's not like this one." His angel blade was in his palm now, where she could see it and be aware of how prepared he was to fight her, if need be. Her eyes flickered from the blade to him, her eyebrows moved closer together. "Maybe you're not working for Heaven," Castiel said. "But there's something you're not telling me."

Anna's chin raised and she looked at him long, hard, and silent. Then finally, she spoke. "Sam Winchester has to die."

Castiel's eyes narrowed. He had suspected her of as much.

"I'm sorry, but we have no choice. Heaven is divided, Castiel," Anna said. "Some want the apocalypse. Others want to avoid it at all costs."

"And you want to avoid the apocalypse by killing Sam," Castiel surmised darkly.

"Yes," Anna said simply. "He's Lucifer's vessel."

"He's not the only one."

"What, that guy Nick?" Anna shook her head, as if that were a ridiculous thing to suggest. "He's burning away as we speak. No. There may be other vessels, but Sam is the only vessel that matters. You know what that means: If Lucifer can't take Sam, his whole plan short-circuits. No fight with Michael, no Croatoan virus." She looked at him unflinchingly. "I assume you've heard about the grim future ahead for everyone, Cas? For you?"

He looked at her sharply. "Bit and pieces."

Anna was frowning. "Maybe someone should show you the big picture. Because I've seen it all." She looked pensive, eyes falling away from his. "And it's not pretty." She looked at him again. "We kill Sam Winchester and none of it has to happen."

Cas raised his chin slightly. "Even if you could kill Sam, Satan would just bring him back to life."

"Not after I scatter his cells across the universe," Anna said grimly. Cas turned away, disturbed as Anna continued. "They'll never find him. Not all of him."

Castiel clenched his jaw in deep thought. She did have a point. And maybe half a year ago, he would have gone along with her plan without a second thought. But things had changed, and he couldn't even allow himself to consider killing Sam. He turned back to her. "We'll find another way," he said, attempting to forge a common ground with her.

"Oh, will we?" Anna asked, sounding darkly amused. "Last time I checked we weren't really even on the same side anymore, Castiel. You've changed."

He turned slowly to look at her again, seeing no reason to dodge her accusation. He knew she was right. "Yes, I have." It was strange though, because she'd encouraged him to change. Now she seemed filled with disappointment at the fact. But she seemed different, too.

Anna stepped a little closer, beseeching him. "What I'm suggesting is simple—clean—reasonable. Why are you so adamant about protecting Sam Winchester? It's in vain. It ends this way, or it ends with the apocalypse and Lucifer walking the earth and subsequently destroying it." Castiel stared at the ground to her left. Anna continued. "How's the Colt working out? Or the search for God? Don't you see? Nothing else is working. If you want to stop the devil, this is how."
He looked at her at that point. He hadn't given up on God, and he wasn't ready to concede that there were no options left. He wanted to believe there was a way, somehow. "I disagree."

She looked frustrated and angry. "Cas, I didn't want to do this. But you need to see exactly how bad it gets for the people you care about. I may have been in prison this whole time, but I've seen, Cas." She raised her eyebrows for just a second. "Everything you've been doing." Her eyes looked at him meaningfully. "Everything you will do. To Alex." At the mention of her, Castiel felt his defenses immediately rise. Anna seemed to see it, too. She almost looked like she pitied him. "You care about her very much, don't you?" Anna paused, not seeming to entirely understand. "Well, maybe seeing what happens to her if you refuse to kill Sam… maybe that will change your mind."

Cas frowned, not understanding what she was talking about—was she referring to what Dean had told him, how apparently, in the future, he somehow got Alex killed? Anna was stepping a little closer, raising her hand toward him, two fingers extended. "This might be a little intense," she said, and Castiel stepped back, tried to avoid the touch, but her fingers brushed his temple and it was too late.

In just a flash, he saw vibrant detailed scenes that flashed in front of him without any time for him to even react.

In the span of perhaps two seconds, these are the things that Castiel saw...

Cas saw himself and Alex, sitting with their backs against a wrecked car that was turned on its side. He wore the trench coat. She had a shotgun. Bullets whistled by, and Cas was staring at his hands, almost in horror. "No, I'm telling you, it's gone!" he shouted, and he sounded panicked. Alex, gripping her shotgun close, looked at him in disbelief.

"How can it just be gone?" she asked, and he shook his hand, unable to respond. Alex craned her neck the other way, attempting to get a view of their assailants. A bullet barely missed her head, and she sat back, fast.

"Well, I wish I brought another shotgun," she commented wryly, even as more gunfire popcorned through the air. Cas looked like he was about to be physically ill. "Hey," Alex said, demanding his attention, grabbing one of his shoulders. "Keep your head. Right? We're gonna get out of here."

He said nothing, but his alarm, panic, and dread was visible. Alex attempted to get him to look her in the eyes by saying his name. "Cas." When that didn't work, she put a hand on his neck, her thumb resting on his jawline, said his name again. He finally looked at her in the eye. Despite the war zone, the softest little helpless smile sprung onto Alex's face. "Looks like it's my turn to protect you."

The scene faded into a new one, where Cas, still in his trench coat, was pacing a motel room. "You're far too reckless," he was saying, angrily. "I lose my, I don't know, angel mojo today, and you risk your life like that? What would happen if you got injured?"

"Then I would be injured," Alex said, not hostile, but not pleasant either. "This is my life Cas—I'm not gonna sit back and sip margaritas while Satan is trying, and sort of succeeding, to destroy the world. I'm sorry you lost your healing power stuff, but I risked my life before you, and I'll risk my life now."

Cas looked at her almost sullenly. "Well I don't like it."

"You never have," Alex pointed out. She sounded a little annoyed, but after she said it, there was a grudging little smile pulling at her lips.
Quiet, standing in front of her, Cas was looking down at the ground, then at her. "I just don't think I could live if you died," he said softly, and her smile fell. She looked stunned and suddenly vulnerable. There was a long silence, and then he took her hand gently, looking down as his thumb stroked across the knuckles.

"...I'm not going anywhere," Alex said softly, trying to sound confident, and he gave her a look like he wanted to believe, but was too afraid to be able. He pulled her close into a tight hug, and her arms circled around him, inside the trench coat. His eyes were shut tightly. One of his hands gripped the back of her head. The scene faded away into darkness.

A new scene. Dean was pacing in front of a very beat-up truck, scanning the distance, agitated. Behind him there was a campsite, cabins and cars. It was dusk. Dean took a long swig from a bottle of Jack Daniel, then unhappy that he'd drained the last of the contents, threw it down to the ground where it shattered.

An old Toyota Landcruiser SUV pulled in just then, and Dean, murderous, zeroed in on it. Alex and Cas got out. Cas looked different—rugged and worn out. He was wearing different clothes: hunting boots, faded jeans, a wrinkled button up with a well-worn army-green cargo jacket. His hair was a little longer, raked forwards messily, and he had the beginnings of a beard. Alex looked tanner than before, a little older and more mature. She was healthier physically, not as thin as she'd been in the past. Her hair was messy and her shirt was lopsided. She was straightening it and glancing at Dean, who was bearing down on the two of them with a glare. Cas saw, and was already taking a defensive stance, standing in front of Alex purposefully.

"Why the hell are you two forty minutes later than everyone else?" he demanded.

"Got lost," Cas said casually, glancing at Dean with mild irritation, then grimaced, wrinkling his nose. "Dean—how much did you drink? You reek."

Dean shot Cas a death glare, his voice already bordering on a shout. "Listen, this is the damn end of the world and I don't have time for you two to be screwing around!"

"Relax Dean," Alex said, but it sounded more like a command than an attempt to soothe her brother.

Dean was outraged. "Oh, relax? Yeah, great! Lucifer released the freakin' Croatoan virus, he's out there trying to kill us, and this little group of a hundred people is depending on me to tell them what to do and how to survive. Yeah, it's a real relaxing environment!"

"Look Dean, we're all living in the same hell, okay?" Alex fired back angrily. "Why do you have to act like you're the only one having a hard time?"

"Oh cry me a river, yeah, you two are having such a damn hard time, aren't you?" Dean asked, looking between the two of them pointedly. Alex rolled her eyes at her brother, annoyed and pissed. He seemed to know something about them and was unhappy about it. Maybe it had something to do with their flushed skin and askew clothes.

Cas just looked at Dean, stepping a little closer, narrowing his eyes meaningfully. His voice was low when he spoke. "Back off, Dean."

Dean's head turned smoothly, his expression nasty. "You got some nerve, man," he slurred. "This is none of your damn business."

"Actually, it is his business," Alex said immediately, not even giving Cas a chance to speak. Dean looked back at her, glaring and Alex returned the glare. "Cas and I are together, Dean, okay? We have been for awhile now."

There was a silence. Dean looked at Cas, then at Alex, his jaw tight, nostrils flared. "And when were you planning to tell me this?"

"What, to get your permission?" Alex asked sarcastically, and Dean exploded.

"You don't think I deserve to know what's going on in my little sister's life?" He moved toward her suddenly, bearing down on her angrily, almost violently, and Cas blocked his way, stepping pointedly, holding out a hand and looking ready to deck Dean if need be.

"Dean—get back," he said. Dean stopped, a piercing glare aimed at the other man. "Maybe you would know what was going on in her life if you ever made an effort to be part of it, Dean," Cas said acidly, defensively. Dean's expression chilled further. "You haven't even talked to her any time in the last year except to yell at her or tell her where she messed up a mission! And besides that, last time I checked," Cas continued, voice brimming with hostility and cynicism, "she's the one in charge of making her own decisions, not you."

Dean suddenly got an odd smile on his face, then looked down, chuckling.

"What's so funny?" Cas asked suspiciously.

Dean looked back at him, his expression superior and hateful. "You," Dean said coolly. "You were a pretty sorry excuse for an angel, but you're an even more pitiful excuse for a man."

"Hey," Alex barked, coming forward and shooting daggers at Dean with her eyes. "Don't talk to him like that!" She looked at Dean in disgust. "You're a real asshole these days, you know that?"

"Maybe I am!" Dean shouted, once again wrathful. "But you two don't get to mess around like friggin' idiots when you're out on a mission again, you hear me? You come back when I say, no earlier, no later. There's a reason I'm in charge around here, and if you two want to try and go against me, I got no problem kicking you out!"

There was a short silence. "Listen to yourself, Dean," Alex said, her anger fading into disillusioned sadness. "Who are you? What happened to my brother?"

"What happened to your brother?" he repeated, face twisted in anger. He was unresponsive to her softer tone, his voice still bordering on a shout. "A whole lot of shit, that's what!" He looked at her resentfully. "And it doesn't help that you're being a lying bitch about everything."

At that comment, Cas glaring dangerously, once again stepping into Dean's line of sight, his patience growing thin, his anger becoming more visible. He shoved Dean away, hard. "Watch the way you speak to her."

Dean steadied himself, seeming to find the shove amusing. There was a deep chuckle in Dean's throat. "That's sweet Cas," he said darkly, "trying to stand up for your little whore."

The words were barely all the way out of his mouth before Cas sprung forward and punched him in the face, sent him stumbling backwards with a split lip. "Don't call her that!" Cas shouted, then in confused anger shook his head, staring at Dean, aghast. "Alex is your sister!" Cas shouted almost sounding like he was pleading. "What is wrong with you, Dean?"

Dean spat blood down onto the ground. "I call 'em like I see 'em, angel wings," he said cynically then wiped his mouth with the back of his sleeve, gave them a dirty look, as if he were considering
Then he shook his head, a dead-in-the-eyes smile on his face. "You're not even worth it, man." He turned and walked off into the night.

Cas turned to Alex, who looked deeply hurt and troubled, close to tears and shaken up by what had happened. She stared after her brother for a moment, arms hugged around herself. She looked at Cas, who had turned around to her, gently touched her arm, was now looking at her in concern. "I don't recognize him at all anymore, Cas," Alex said softly, wounded. She looked down, and Cas stroked the hair against the side of her head tenderly, then kissed her forehead lingeringly, comforting her. He then looked back at where Dean had gone, expression troubled.

"Come on," he said, putting his arm around her shoulder and focusing completely on her. "Let's go home."

The scene faded away into the interior of a cabin. It was bright inside, daytime. From the flowery trees visible through the window, it was clearly spring time. The cabin was decorated simply. Some yellow wildflowers sat in a vase on a small table. The table had two chairs. A painting of a sunset hung on one of the walls. There was a large, unmade bed, a little kitchenette, and a small couch. That's where Cas was sitting—one foot propped up and in a splint.

"I hate this," Cas said, forlorn.

Across from him, pulling a box out of the closet, Alex turned to look at him sympathetically. "I know." She wore a small shirt with tiny straps, and it bared some of her midriff. She came to sit beside him, the box on her lap.

"I'm useless," Cas continued. At that, Alex looked at him pointedly, wordlessly. He looked back at her, and she gave him a little look, a little 'don't go there' smile. He didn't seem to be able to stay unhappy, his face softening into a smile. He turned his attention to shifting himself, gingerly repositioning his foot. He hissed in pain.

Alex looked at him, wincing sympathetically. "I'm sorry. Broken bones suck." She shifted the box on her knees, tried to make light of the situation. "Even angels bleed sometimes, huh?"

Cas got quieter, a little somber. "I haven't been an angel for awhile now."

Alex looked at him sidelong, smiling crookedly, shrugging a little. "Well, you'll always be one to me." Cas sent her a sidelong look, and Alex looked down, suddenly flustered. "That, uh... sounded better in my head," she said, and looked at him again, grinning, laughing at herself. He wasn't laughing at her, and her embarrassment faded into a meaningful gaze. His eyes mirrored hers.

"So." Alex cleared her throat. "Uh, wanna help me look through this junk?" She asked, and put the box between them, brushing the sappy moment aside. "I haven't looked in here since I packed it all up a couple years ago." She pulled out a photo. It was her, Sam, and Dean, smiling, arms around each other. Her face immediately saddened. "Now I remember why." She looked at the picture somberly for a long, quiet moment, then looked at Cas, troubled, exhaling. "I don't think I can keep this."

Cas held out his hand, motioned for her to give it to him. "I'll keep it for you," Cas said. "If you get rid of it, you'll always regret it."

She looked at the photograph intently for a minute. "I should've gone after Sam while I still could have," she said softly to herself. Then she handed over the photograph to Cas, her expression a little blank. She went back to looking through the box, visibly pushing her thoughts aside, and Cas looked at her sidelong for a moment. He then helped her sort through the box.
He fished out a shiny silver object. "Well, hello!" he commented, turning it over in his hand.

Alex looked surprised. "My whistle?" she asked. "I forgot I even kept that."

He held it out to her, and she took it, looked at it in a mixture of fond reminiscence and sadness. She then looked at him openly, and there was such a depth, such a mutual understanding in the shared gaze. "You should have this," she said suddenly.

Cas looked surprised. "Me? No. Why?"

Alex moved the box onto the floor, scooted closer to Cas, pulled out the silver chain that was hidden beneath his shirt, undoing the clasp. "This whistle was pretty much a part of me for twenty-five years." Her eyes darted up to his. "You changed my whole life." She held his gaze, looked at him significantly. "Not just by giving me my voice."

He looked touched, but still protested even as she was putting the whistle onto the chain—from which a silver ring already hung. "I can't—" Cas started.

Alex stopped a minute, looked at him, eyebrows raised, a little playful, a little challenging. "Say no to me one more time, Castiel."

He seemed to give up on saying no, his eyes softening as a fond, crooked smile spread over his face. "Wouldn't dare."

"That's what I thought," she said teasingly, and fastened the clasp back, then paused, looking at the whistle with an odd expression, a soft almost-smile. "You know, it's kind of insane, but... I'm glad I was mute." She looked at Cas again, whose expression was a little perplexed. Alex's lopsided smile was paired with surprisingly shy eyes. "It meant I got to meet you." She tucked it all back under his shirt, and Cas caught her hand in his, held it a minute, and wordlessly, they looked into each other's eyes.

Cas's eyes seemed to darken, fill with intention. "Come here," he told her huskily, and Alex complied immediately. She climbed onto his lap, her legs on either side of him as her arms circled his neck, one of her hands against the back of his head, fingers in his hair. His hands came to rest on either side of her waist and he looked at her openly, adoringly—there was no other way to describe it. "You... are the most perfect woman alive," he said.

Visibly embarrassed, smiling, Alex pressed a kiss to his lips. A slow, simple kiss. He smiled against the kiss, eyes closed. She drew back a little, put a finger on his lips as his eyes opened again. She seemed to be trying to stop him from saying anything else. He appeared to be amused by that and spoke against her finger, playful. "Well, I would know," he said, shrugging in jest.

"Please just shut up," she said, grinning before she kissed him again, at first just to silence him. And then, after a couple seconds, the kiss deepened, became more passionate. His hands rested lightly on her waist, skimmed down to her hips, then gripped a little firmer, pulled her a little closer as her arms more fully circled him, her hands cupping the back of his head and a shoulder, too. They pulled apart, just slightly, and Alex rested her forehead against his. Eyes now closed, Cas smiled softly. Content. Alex's eyes went up and down, skimming the length of his face, then leaned in to kiss him again, made a soft sound that could only be described as sensual as Cas's hand began to move upward from her hip to her rib cage, moving upwards steadily.

It all faded away.

Cas was chopping firewood outside the cabin, around the back. Orange leaves dotted the trees surrounding the area—autumn. There was a solid thunk as Cas split a log and he stood back for a moment, wiped sweat away with the back of his sleeve. Alex appeared suddenly in the doorway of the cabin, her face anxious and body language tense. Cas saw her arrive and was about to smile at her, then took in her appearance and facial expression. "Cas—come inside," she said. "Fast." She disappeared back into the cabin, even as Cas was wordlessly dropping the axe and doing just as she said. He climbed the few steps two at a time and entered the cabin to find Alex standing in the middle of the cabin, arms folded, expression intensely wrong.

"What is it?" Cas asked, going to her, concerned. He grasped her arms gently, trying to get her to look at him. "Alex?"

She finally looked at him, expression close to horror. "Do you, uh, remember that last run the group did into the city? When you got mad at me for sneaking off to go to the drug store?"

"Yes, of course I remember—" Cas said, not understanding, sounding more than a little worried. "That was yesterday."

"Right, well—" Alex said, shaking her head, struggling. "I was getting a test." She seemed out of breath. "I thought I was just late." She looked at him in trepidation. "But… I'm, I'm not."

Cas looked lost, and even more worried. Alex swallowed, her voice lowering to a frightened whisper. She looked close to tears. "I uh, I." Her jaw worked oddly. "I'm pregnant, Cas." He blinked twice. Alex waited for him to say something, then seemed to think he didn't understand. "With a baby," she clarified.

He let go of her, took a step back, as if he'd had the breath knocked out of him. "I know what pregnant means," he said. He was staring at the floor, expression unreadable.

"What are we gonna do?" Alex asked, close to tears, her eyes downcast, blinking rapidly. Her voice was strained and frightened. "This is no place for a baby, for a child."

Cas looked at her, took in her distress again, and then caught her hands up in his, returning his full attention to her, trying to catch her gaze. "Our child," he said gently, chin bent down, eyes seeking hers. He sounded surprised and in awe and a little worried all at the same time. Alex's face softened as she met his gaze. "Our child," Cas said again, looking at her with eyes full of many different things—apprehension, uncertainty, but most of all, love and a growing intense emotion. "We made something, together… a new life." He sounded like the thought itself stirred him down to the soul.

Alex looked at him, a certain kind of stunned hopefulness softening her features. "I just… I thought maybe you wouldn't want this," she confessed.

Cas looked at her in soft bewilderment. "I want everything with you."

Alex looked at him intently, breathing hard suddenly, emotional. "You're sure?"

"Yes I'm sure," he said immediately, touching the side of her face sweetly.

Alex looked somewhat relieved, but only for a moment. She looked frightened again, and her voice dropped to a barely audible whisper. "Cas, I'm just so friggin' scared. I don't know how to do this."

Cas pulled her close, into his arms, soothing her. "We're in this together," he told her quietly. Alex had her head laid on his shoulder, eyes closed tight. Her arms were locked around him, seeking reassurance. One of his hands came there against the back of her scalp, cradling her head firmly and comfortably. He pressed a single kiss there on the top of her head and there was a smile on his lips and great, watery emotion in his eyes. He shut his eyes, seemed to breathe her in. For a minute they were still like that, then Alex pulled back a little, enough to look at him. She looked like she were thinking a million things, and Cas seemed to know it, too. "I'm gonna take care of us," he told her, and those simple words visibly relieved her. A brave smile was coming over her face despite her worry and he pulled her into another solid embrace. He was smiling and his eyes were filled with light and tears of joy. "We'll find a way. We always do."

The scene ended.

Alex was pacing back and forth on a cabin porch, her expression tense and worried. "Chuck it's been two days and we haven't heard from them," she said.

Chuck was watching her from the corner of his eye. "You know how those old CB radios are, Alex. Probably quit working. They'll be back. They always are."

Alex stopped pacing and leaned against the railing of the porch of her and Cas's cabin, one hand on her head as if she were tired or had a headache. Her other hand rested on her lower back. Chuck looked at her sidelong. "Are you sick or something?"

"No, why?" Alex asked slowly, mistrustfully.

"I just, I guess I can't believe you stayed behind on this mission. Seemed like a pretty big one." Alex said nothing, staring straight ahead of herself.

Chuck tried again. "It just seems kinda out of character for you to not go… you always go."

"Not this time, Chuck," Alex said cryptically. Chuck seemed perplexed and even suspicious, but let it go. At that moment, one of the younger guards ran past, shouting over his shoulder, "They're back!"

Alex craned her neck, trying to see down the twisting road. Dean's Jeep had just become visible, heading up the caravan. "Thank God," Alex breathed, so relieved. Chuck glanced at her. She was already taking off down the porch and toward the front of the camp where the cars would circle up. The other campers who had stayed behind were gathering, forming a small crowd as the cars pulled in. Dean swung out of his Jeep, and Cas jumped down off the back of the Jeep, slinging his gun back on its strap, scanning the crowd.

Alex pushed her way through everyone, making a beeline for him. She didn't even see Dean, passed right by him. Catching sight of her, Cas grinned, relieved, maybe as much as she was. He had a cut on his face, grime and dirt. Alex ran the last couple steps to him, threw her arms around his neck even as he wrapped his arms around her, lifting her up into a tight embrace. "I am never letting you go anywhere alone, ever again!" Alex told him, clinging to him tightly, legs wrapped around his strong waist. He pulled back to look up at her, his eyes wrinkled from his wide grin.

"What, miss me?" he wisecracked, and kissed her through his smile. Dean watched the reunion grimly, then stalked off in the opposite direction.

The scene faded.

Alex and Cas were standing, binoculars in hand, on a plateau that overlooked a small town. Cas's Landcruiser was parked next to them. "But this is the last time," Cas was saying. "This recon stuff, you know, pretty safe, but still." He lowered his binoculars. "Not safe enough. Forget the raids and Dean's crazy missions."

Alex was quiet a minute, and the breeze whipped her hair around her face for a couple seconds. "I agree."

Cas looked at her like he must have misheard. "You what?" He looked at her strangely. "You're not going to argue with me?"

Alex lowered her binoculars too and looked at him sheepishly then shook her head. "No."

Cas turned and faced her straight on, put a hand to her forehead. "Are you feeling all right?"

"A little sick, actually," she admitted. He lowered his hand, concerned, and she batted him away good-naturedly. "I'm fine, I'm fine." She sighed. "I just know, for now, my out-in-the-field-days are gonna have to come to a close. To stay safe. To keep... the baby safe." She said 'the baby' as if it were still a foreign concept to her. A daunting but exciting concept.

"I can stay behind with you," Cas offered, drawing a surprised look from Alex. "I don't have to go out on the missions, if it would make you feel better. You wouldn't have to worry about me."

"You'd do that for me?" Alex asked, touched.

"Of course," Cas replied, as if he didn't understand how she could think otherwise. "You're the most important thing to me. Out of everything."

Alex cocked her head to the side, a fond little smile on her lips. "You sure do know how to make a girl feel special," she said teasingly, grabbing him by the collar of his jacket, and he grinned at her, kissed her as she pulled him close. It was a deep, familiar kiss, and he held her as though he knew everything about her and cherished every single thing.

She curled into him after the kiss, and he wrapped his arms around her protectively, his chin resting on top of her head. "We're gonna do this, Alex," he said softly, reflective. "Have a life. A regular life in a crazy world. Our family." He said the word family in such a gentle, awed way.

Alex frowned over his shoulder, squinting into the distance, straightening. Something had caught her eye. "What was that?"

Cas looked back where she was looking. "What was what?"

"I thought I saw some movement up at the farmhouse," Alex said, setting her binoculars down on the hood of the SUV.

"An animal, maybe? There's never Croats out this far from the city," Cas said, but was pulling his pistol out anyway, checking the chamber. "I'll go check."

"Not alone," Alex said firmly, and he looked at her, clearly not wanting to have this argument. She was already drawing her pistol and checking it for ammo.

Cas looked like he was thinking about protesting, then let it go, told her, "just stay close."

Together, they approached the run-down farmhouse, sweeping the area with weapons ready. "There," Alex said, motioning her aimed pistol toward the window to the right of the main doorway.

There was a flash of movement, and Cas tensed, held out an arm. "Stay back," he muttered. Alex complied, but stayed on alert, her gun covering him, her eyes darting around, making sure they weren't being approached from behind or the side.
Cas slowly climbed the stairs up onto the large porch, his pistol held high. "I don't see—" he whispered... then froze. He muttered a curse word even as the front door burst open. Croatoans, at least seven of them, burst out, hungry for blood. "Get back, get back!" Cas was yelling as he emptied his ammo into them, stumbling backwards down the stairs. It happened in less than three seconds—one of the Croats jumped off the porch railing and straight onto Alex, knocking her to the ground, catching her completely off guard.

Cas didn't even see it happen, but he heard her scream and whirled to look at her, almost getting himself killed in the process. The last Croat grabbed onto him, tried to bite him—savagely, Cas pistol-whipped his attacker across the face and shot him point-blank, then immediately charged the couple of feet over to where Alex was. He grabbed the Croat off of her, throwing a sloppy punch and then shot the guy two times in the chest, barely able to hold the gun. The Croat fell over, dead, forgotten.

Alex was laying flat on the ground, blinking, stunned as Cas dropped to her level, seeing the bloody wound on her shoulder and visibly losing something mentally, Cas let out a soft, shocked sound. He shakily gathered her into his arms, supporting her, and she looked at him with glazed over eyes, confused. She was breathing heavily. It was a deep, vicious bite wound on her shoulder, and blood spilled out, down her arm, staining his clothes too as he pulled her close. Cas fumbled, pulling her up as he stood and carried her away, stumbling back toward their vehicle. Alex's head lolled back and she grimaced, groaned, sounding dazed.

"You're, you're okay, you're gonna be fine," Cas told her frantically, setting her down in a sitting position against the tire of the car, looking at her wound, confounded and alarmed and at a terrified loss. "Fine, just fine, let me see," he was continuing. Alex was looking at him in shock. Their eyes met, both pairs filled with dread. She shut her mouth, swallowed, closed her eyes tight.

"Cas—" she managed, then opened her eyes. They were wide and fearful. Knelt in front of her, Cas had a useless, shaking hand pressed hard down on her wound. "Cas, I'm gonna turn," she said in the softest voice.

He shook his head in vehement denial. "No, no you're not." He sounded desperate, angry almost. Alex gave him an unexpectedly brassy look, but it was tainted by uncoordinated wooziness. "Do you see this bite?"

He did, but his expression showed nothing but stubborn, fearful defiance. He almost didn't seem to hear what she'd said. "You're going to be fine," he insisted again in a rising, choked voice, not really looking at her, his words beginning to run together. "I'm going to get you out of here, and, and you're gonna be fine Alex, I'm gonna get you home, and you'll be—"

"Cas, stop!" Alex suddenly said, and grabbed his face, made him look at her. She seemed suddenly and absolutely terrified. She breathed hard a few times out of her nose, then her eyes fell downwards to her bleeding shoulder. She sounded hollow. "We both know I am not gonna be fine."

"No," Cas protested weakly, his voice breaking hopelessly. "Don't say that," he pleaded. Alex looked at him, filled with a sudden, quiet, dread-filled resolve. Cas saw it, and went still, looked down in cold dread. Alex held out her loaded pistol to him. He looked from it to her in disbelief, face gone slack. Her eyebrows moved closer together as her eyes pleaded silently with him.

He was shaking his head weakly, silently. Alex's voice hitched. "Please Cas, you have to..." she whispered, eyes filling with tears. She pushed the gun at him, into the palm of his hand, using her other hand to close his hand around it. They stayed like that a minute, Cas looking at her in lost, terrified dismay. He didn't move.

Alex groaned suddenly, screwing her eyes shut and gritting her teeth in pain, to which Cas looked even more terrified, grabbed her harder—and his eyes were shining with unshed, panicking tears. "Cas, please," Alex said, growing more urgent. He took the gun, wrapped his hand around it, but looked at her unmovingly, shaking his head again, adamant. A horrible sobbing sound escape out of his mouth. "If you don't, then I have to, and I can't," Alex said brokenly, barely able to speak in an even tone.

"I'm supposed to keep you safe," Cas said, looking at her in abject horror. "Not kill you!"

"There's no other choice," Alex said. "If I turn and then hurt you—" she stopped herself, eyes tearing up. "It's too late for me, Cas!" she said, crying now. Cas just stared at her, dismayed. "Please. Just do it!" Alex insisted, panicked, voice rising in fear and urgency.

Cas's face broke. "I can't, I can't!"

Alex grabbed the gun by the barrel with shaking hands, practically stabbing it into her stomach. "Cas, shoot me!" she screamed. "Shoot me!"

Their eyes locked and Cas sobbed out loud, his face the picture of misery and grief. "I'm so sorry," he whispered in a tight whisper. The gun cocked with a loud click and they clung to each other tenderly, weeping for what was about to happen. He touched his forehead to hers and whispered through choked tears I'm sorry I'm sorry I'm sorry over and over again and she shut her eyes, waiting, trusting him in this final moment, whispering that she loved him.

And then the sound of the gunshot cracked through the thin autumn air like thunder.

Alex and Cas stared at each other in complete shock and horror—like neither could believe he had actually pulled the trigger. And then Alex whimpered in intense pain, face crumpling, and Cas threw the gun aside, trembling, beside himself, pulling her into his lap, cradling her with great affection as blood pooled across her abdomen.

"I'm… I'm so sorry," Cas said, barely able to speak through tears. His face was twisted in defeat and horror and gleamed with tear tracks.

Alex blinked strangely, staring up at the sky. "It's... okay," she said softly, sounding far away. Her face then scrunched up in pain and she made a horrible sound. Cas gripped her tighter as she breathed hard through gritted teeth, stared at the sky again. "Cas… do you... d-do you think there's still a Heaven up there?" she asked, then looked at him with teary eyes. She suddenly looked so much younger and scared, unguarded and vulnerable. "Where we can be together again?"

"Yes, of course there's still a Heaven," Cas told her immediately through his tears. She looked disillusioned, like she didn't believe him. She groaned again, sobbed, thrashed in pain, curling into his arms pathetically.

Her breathing was becoming shallow and labored, but she looked up at him and suddenly there was a brave little smile through the pain. At the sight of it, Cas touched the side of her face in broken tenderness, hand tightening as his expression struggled not to break. She looked at him a moment, eyes thoroughly traveling his face. "I love you. So much," Alex whispered, eyes locked onto his, expression soft, anxious. She grew intense, "Promise me, Cas." She swallowed, winced a minute, pained. "Promise you won't blame yourself for this, okay? I—" she grimaced again. "I know how you are," she said through gritted teeth, but fought to maintain eye contact.
"Alex—" he managed waveringly, looking at the woman in his arms with such guilt and pain. He pressed a long, aching kiss to her forehead. Her eyes fluttered a little, and she looked up at him, her hand weakly coming to touch his face, and then going to the back of his neck, pulling him toward her for one last kiss, which he readily gave. It was gut-wrenchingly gentle, slow, fervent, and they both made soft sounds of grief at the action. She grabbed one of his hands when they pulled apart, looking afraid and in pain. He gently grasped her hand in return, running his thumb over the top of her hand gently, tracing familiar lines. His face was a battlefield of pain, denial, and grief, each fighting for dominance. As if sleepy, Alex blinked and her eyes got hazy. And then her eyes went dark and her body lost its life and went completely limp in his arms.

Cas looked like he'd stopped breathing, as if he were frozen. He stared at Alex motionlessly, stunned. He asked her name softly, and when no reply came, when it was clear to him that she had died, he lost it, face crumbling as he clutched her body to himself. He wept loudly, a completely lost man.

The scene faded.

"Yeah, Chuck, it's just—" Dean looked over his shoulder, pausing mid sentence, frowning at the sound of a car coming.

"Ah good, they're back," Chuck said, sounding relieved.

"Geez, and it's about damn time, too," Dean grumbled at the sight of Cas's Land Cruiser pulling up. Then, he frowned deeper, pausing. Only Cas was in the car. And then, as he stopped the car and got out, both Dean and Chuck went still. Cas, who looked horrible and pale, had blood all over him and the look on his face seemed to cue them in to the horrible bad news. He looked at them with a broken expression, shut his door, opened the back door, pulled something out. Dean seemed to stop breathing when he saw what Cas had pulled out of the back seat. Cas was carrying Alex, who was covered in blood and limp. Dean walked forward as if in a dream, for a moment in total shock.

"No," Dean said softly. His sister's skin color was unnaturally pale, bloodless, her lips pale and soft blue. She was clearly dead. Dean, who had stopped in his tracks, was suddenly heaving heavy, racing breaths, horrified and again he said, "no," more adamant that time, stepping back away from Cas in horrified denial.

"She—it was a Croatoan—" Cas said blankly, looking in Dean's general direction unseeingy. His fingers clenched into Alex's body like vices.

"You—you weren't supposed to let her get hurt," Dean said, shellshocked.

"I know," Cas said woodenly, looking down, glazed over.

"You were supposed to protect her," Dean said again, hollow. Then, suddenly, enraged. "You were supposed to protect her!" Cas looked at Dean completely devoid of emotion. He just stood there, holding Alex.

Dean went forward, reached out for his sister, barely holding himself together. "Give her to me," he said, grief breaking his voice pathetically.

Cas's eyes snapped to Dean's. "No." Cas looked down at Alex for the first time, and his expression distorted, his voice wavered. "I can't."

"Like hell you can't," Dean said, trembling.

Cas responded by falling to his knees and breaking down, clutching Alex to himself pitifully. "You can't take her from me!" he sobbed out brokenly, clinging to Alex's dead body, refusing to let go as he wept bitterly.

The scene faded.

Dean sat across from Alex's still body, which was laid in Chuck's cabin. She'd been changed into another shirt, a long sleeved one that hid her shoulder wound. She looked like she could have been sleeping, even though she was so pale. Dean gazed at her silently. "Do you remember that time you glued my shoes to the floor, kiddo?" He shook his head, a soft, sad little smile on his face. "I was so damn mad." He looked at her face carefully, memorizing every detail. "Couldn't stay mad too long though. My little sidekick." His smile faded, his voice hitched. Memories seemed to pass in front of his eyes and he broke down. "I miss you so damn much."

He put his face in his hand, tortured. "Why'd it all have to fall apart?" he asked, forlorn, frustrated, beyond sorrow. "Why'd you leave me? Why'd you fall for Cas? And why couldn't I just let it go?"

He shook his head in self-loathing, tears running down his face. "I pushed Sam away, was too proud to admit I did the same to you… I guess I thought because you were a few doors down we were still close." Dean bowed his head miserably, a broken man. "I'm so, so sorry Al."

There was a soft noise behind him, and Dean stood up, expression darkening, tears forgotten. "Cas."

Cas stood there in the doorway, looking even worse than he had before—disheveled, mentally deficient, grief-torn. Dean looked at him threateningly. "Get outta here, man."

"I loved her Dean," Cas said, his voice low and unsteady. "Well that doesn't matter now, does it?" Dean retorted bitterly. "She's dead. No thanks to you."

"Like hell you did!" Dean snapped, and advanced on Cas, visibly shaking. "Alex was the only damn thing left in this world that I cared about or loved, I didn't want to but I trusted you to keep her safe and this is what happens?!" Dean was irate, messed up, riled. "You let her get bitten then you shoot her in the stomach?!!" He shook his head, a muscle jumped in his cheek. His fists were clenched at his sides. "You're lucky I don't fucking kill you where you stand, Cas."

Cas just looked at him, then his eyes went downward. "Maybe you should."

Dean took that as an open invitation, slugging Cas across the face. Cas stumbled back, his face turned from the force of Dean's fist. But he made no move to retaliate, he just sadly looked back at Dean, who again punched him for all he was worth, not just once—he began to beat Cas into the ground, blow after blow, blind and enraged and ruthless. Cas did nothing—just took it.

Suddenly, two other men entered the cabin and broke them apart. "Whoa, stop, stop!" Chuck shouted as one of the camp guards held Dean back.

"What the hell!" Chuck demanded, beside himself. Cas was sitting slumped against the wall, his face bloody and bruising already. Chuck looked at Dean, completely aghast. "Dean, you're beating the man your sister loved… with her body still in the room? What is wrong with you?"

Dean jerked out of the guard's grip, looking at Chuck and then Cas guiltily, conflicted. Cas looked up, a little dazed. Chuck shook his head. "Listen. I know you both loved Alex very much. I know you're both hurting. But this has got to stop! I've watched you two fight over this woman for years now, and it has got to end!" He paused, embittered. "What would she say if she could see this?" He shook his head blankly. "You were friends once. Best friends."

Dean and Cas glanced at each other, then looked away. Chuck appealed one last time, looking at both of them pointedly, upset. "This is no one's fault."

Cas's head was bowed now. Dean looked at his sister's dead body, then at Chuck. "Yeah, maybe someday I'll believe that," he said tersely. "But not today." He stormed out.

The scene faded.

It was night now, in Cas's cabin, and no lights were on. There was a loud crash. Cas threw one of the table chairs at the wall, where the painting of a sunset hung. The chair broke as the painting fell off the wall. In a rage, Cas took another swig of green liquid out of the bottle in his hand, let out some kind of animalistic bellow and kicked over the kitchen table, then threw a plate that had been sitting on the counter, took another long drink from the bottle then threw it at the wall violently. He grabbed the painting and threw it out his cabin door, then he turned and knocked everything off the top of the dresser where it sat in the corner. He ripped the mirror off the wall and sent it crashing to the floor. A picture of him and Alex sat in a frame beside the bed, and he took it and threw it hard with another strange pained shouting sound, panting and crazed.

He yanked open the closet, where some shirts that were clearly Alex's hung. He went still. Stared at them, a long moment, his rage ebbing. Then he shut the closet door again, jaw tightening. He grabbed his handgun from where it was tucked into his belt, and with a dark expression, he marched out the back door, stumbling a little in the dark, catching in thickets of thorns but not even seeming to notice.

The moon was high and washed the landscape in pale silver, and he stopped there, at the tree line, held the pistol to the side of his head, put his finger on the trigger—and then nothing. There was a long moment where he stood there, obviously trying to make himself pull the trigger. But he seemed unable. He muttered a dark curse word and then a horrible sound of grief tore out of his mouth.

He let the gun fall to his side. Breathing heavily, jaw clenched, he flew into another fit of blind rage, and ran full force into the large tree trunk in front of him, bashing himself into it pathetically. He fell backwards, landing hard, making sounds like sobs, but not from physical pain. He stood up drunkenly, looked around for the gun, topsy-turvy.

"Cas?" came a voice behind him, and Cas turned, grabbed at the owner of the voice, slammed them violently up against the same tree he'd just slammed himself into. "It's me Cas, it's Chuck!"

Chuck said, hands raised in surrender, expression worried.

Cas let go, blinking weirdly, looking disconcerted and crazy. "You, uh, you okay?" Chuck asked, to which Cas exploded, grabbing Chuck with renewed vigor and misdirected rage.

"There's no Heaven, Chuck!" He shouted cynically, bitter, hateful emphasis on the word heaven. "She's gone forever. FOREVER! Nowhere! She's nowhere and there's nothing and it's my fault!" Cas threw Chuck down onto the ground and began pacing manically. "I shot the woman I love," Cas said, sounding defeated, then suddenly enraged again. "I murdered her!"

He stopped, putting a hand on his face, which was twisted up in pain. Chuck watched silently, keeping his mouth shut and not getting up from where he'd been thrown. Cas shook his head and crumpled to his knees, both hands on his face now, miserable sobs shaking his entire body. "Leave me alone," he choked out. "Just leave—me—alone. Let me die. I'm dead without her. I'm nothing. I lost the only thing worth living for."

The scene faded away into a new one.

Crouched, Cas laid a bundle of yellow wildflowers at the base of a wooden cross etched with the initials A.E.W. He looked somber and stoic, his eyes slightly hooded. "She's been gone six months now, Chuck," Cas said, addressing the man who stood behind him, watching silently with hands in his pockets. Cas seemed a little out of sorts. His hair was longer and shaggy, unkempt, there were dark circles under his eyes. His color was sallow. He stood up, looked toward Chuck. "Six months." His mouth was in a thin line. "I don't think I can take much more." Cas stated it almost emotionlessly.

Chuck looked at him carefully. "I thought we went over this the night of the funeral," he said. "When you tried to kill yourself."

There was a cynical attempt at a smile on Cas's face. "Yeah, well, I still think about doing it every day," he said nonchalantly. "I've tried a few more times." His expression faded into loathing. "But like the moron that I am... I can't seem to make myself do it. I can't do it right."

"Cas," Chuck said, and put a hand on Cas's shoulder.

Looking at Chuck's hand weirdly, Cas shrugged away from him and walked off a couple steps, then stopped. He sounded authentic again, briefly. "Living without her is the most painful—" he took a deep breath, eyes filled with heavy sadness. "She was the way I understood the world, Chuck." He paused, melancholic. "She taught me how to be human." He was completely still, and sounded earnest, lost, desperate. "I don't know how to love anyone but her. I don't even think I can. I don't want to." For a minute, he looked like himself. "I just wish I could go back in time. Change everything." He suddenly chuckled darkly, cynically, as if he were hearing himself. "Wow. Sometimes I hear the things I think and I'm like, how could someone be such an idiot? Why do I even bother? I'm not even alive anymore. I'm just stalling. Putting off the inevitable. For no damn reason."

"Don't talk like that, Cas," Chuck said. He'd walked after Cas and was standing in front of him now. "You're important."

Cas rolled his eyes at Chuck. "I'm important? To who? Who the hell would care if I disappeared tomorrow? Dean? He tolerates me. The women I BS all day long? Yeah, right. You? Don't make me laugh." Cas laughed derisively. "I'm not important. I only live to get wasted." He sobered a little, melancholic again. "I'm pathetic." His jaw clenched tight, his eyes went down, his voice cracked. "She would hate me if..." Cas swallowed, trailed off. He clenched the forgotten bottle in his hand, lifted it and took a swig. His eyes glittered with tears.

"Stay alive, Cas," Chuck said emphatically, watching his friend in concern. "You're still alive for a reason, I know you are. You matter."

Cas looked at him as if insulted. "You sound like a damn religious handout," he said darkly, and walked off angrily, leaving Chuck by himself.

The author sighed, then shrugged sadly. "You tried, Chuck," he muttered to himself, then looked back at Alex's grave for a long moment. "He really loved you, didn't he, kiddo?" He paused. "Maybe too much."

The scene faded.
There were a few cars gathered up, people loading weapons and getting ready for some kind of assault. Alex—Alex from 2009—was there with Cas, off to the side, behind a truck. Cas was looking at her strangely. "Kiss me," he whispered, and her expression dropped.

"W—what?" she asked, face blank.

"Please," he said, his voice just a broken whisper. "I just... I can go in there and face the devil, face death, the whole nine. If you kiss me." He licked his lips nervously. "One last time," he paused, thinking of something, and frowned, then smiled in the softest, saddest way. "Or... first, I guess. For you."

Alex's mouth hung open slightly. "I... uh..." she had quickly become flustered.

He hesitantly caught her hands in his. "A dying man's wish," he said softly.

"But... you don't know you're dying," she protested weakly.

A muscle in his cheek jerked, and his gaze faltered. "I have been for awhile now."

Alex looking up at him hesitantly, for a very long couple seconds, then nodded, expression a cross between fearful and nervous.

He seemed to have been holding himself back—he kissed her as soon as the go-ahead left her mouth. Gently at first, soft and glancing, then suddenly Alex seemed to take over, pulling him in desperately, and the kiss became something else entirely. Cas pressed into her, she bumped up against the side of the truck they were beside, she let out a soft little moan—he roughly grabbed her hips, lifting her up, her legs wrapped around his waist, the kiss deepened even more, their hands tangled in each other's hair and—then it ended completely when the sound of arriving cars cut them short. They broke apart, panting, staring at each other.

Without anything further, the scene faded.

An abandoned building, wrecked inside, run down: Cas laid in a pool of his own blood, several gunshot wounds in his chest and abdomen. He was gasping for air, dying, looking at a photograph in his hand, struggling. He seemed to lose his strength, and then the life went out of him, he breathed his last, went still.

The sound of dress shoes clicked, echoing, as a tall man entered the room. It looked like Sam. But it was Lucifer, dressed in a white tuxedo. He seemed almost sympathetic as he looked down at the dead body at his feet. "Ah, brother..." he commented softly. "How the mighty have fallen." His head tilted to the side just barely as his eyes traveled Cas's dead body and face. "A shame things had to end this way for you."

Lucifer crossed the room, over to a window, looking out. "You should have joined me while you had the chance, Castiel," he sighed, looking back at Cas's body briefly. He was cold, superior. "But no. You had to do it your way."

Lucifer returned his gaze to the window. "Better to reign in Hell than to serve in Heaven," he said to no one. He gazed out of the window, triumphant, his eyes chilling and never blinking. He took in a deep, pleased breath. "Hell on earth. Heaven just a memory." The smile deepened. "I win." With his finger, he drew a pitchfork in a splatter of blood on the glass of the window.

And it all faded out.

Everything Castiel had just seen had rushed his mind in the span of a couple seconds—he was still in the middle of taking a step backward when everything came back—the warehouse, Anna, reality. Completely stunned he stared at her, breathing heavily, reeling. His mind could barely process everything he'd just taken in and seen.

Anna looked at him intently. "You saw." She said. He could only look at her, wordless, horrified. She seemed satisfied, especially at his speechlessness, seeming to know he'd seen what she meant to show him. "So, now you see," she said, urgently. "Sam Winchester has to die, or all of that happens. The pain, the broken relationships. The world, practically destroyed. You, a miserable shell. Everyone you cared about dead and gone." She looked at him significantly. "Lucifer walking the earth, no one left to stop him." She raised her chin slightly. "We can stop all of that. Today."

When he said nothing, she lost some of her certainty, frowning at him. Castiel shook his head, regaining some composure, hiding his inner terror just barely. "The answer's still no, Anna."

Anna's face contorted in utter disbelief. She didn't seem to understand, then became almost angry. "You're actually willing to let all of that happen? To Dean? To Sam?" Anna stepped a little closer. "To her?" At that, Cas looked at Anna, who was shaking her head almost in disgust.

"What you showed me—it's not real," Cas said vehemently, in denial. "I don't believe it," Cas said, faltering. And he didn't. He couldn't.

"Why would I lie to you?" Anna asked angrily.

"You've already lied to me today, and you just want… to trick me into helping you." Cas accused, then turned a little, allowing the shadows to obscure his face from her. He was struggling, and badly. "None of what you showed me…" he said tremulously, "it's not possible." Was it?

"At this point in time, it's definite," Anna said intensely, defiant. "The only one lying here is you. To yourself. That future happens. Everything you saw happens, no matter what you do after today. This? What I'm proposing? This is the only way to change that. Don't you want to?" She went quiet, giving him a chance to speak, but he said nothing. She tried again, forceful. "Destiny doesn't have to be set in stone, Cas. We can change it. All we have to do is kill Sam. He dies so that they can live." Still, Cas said nothing, and Anna grew more ardent. "The Croatoan virus never has to even exist—you can save millions, Cas. Use your head! This is the right thing to do!" Anna stopped. Got quieter, her eyes full of meaning. "Do this one thing and the woman you love can live." Cas turned on her finally, dangerously, murderous almost. Anna looked at him, mystified. "Don't you want that?"

Cas looked at her unblinkingly, his voice low and dangerous. "Anna, you and I have been through much together." He stepped a little closer, his angel blade still in his hand, raising just slightly. "But you come near any of the Winchesters, I will kill you without hesitation."

Anna looked at the blade, then at him, disappointed, disenchanted, not understanding. She backed up one step, looking at him ruefully. "I don't think you'll ever regret anything as much as what you decided here today, Castiel." It sounded like a threat. She disappeared.

The second Anna vanished, Cas stumbled sideways, catching himself barely against a wall, holding himself up with a flat palm. He could barely breathe. It was as though the things Anna showed him had physically rendered him momentarily incapable of standing. His mind spun with the images he'd seen, the words he'd heard. It felt as though something had been ripped out of him, and he couldn't make sense of it, couldn't understand—was that real? Had all of that really happened? Was that really the future? His future, no, their future? All he could hear was the sound of an echoing gunshot, the strangled cries of Alex as she laid dying in his arms. Alex.
He looked up suddenly, a horrible thought crossing his mind—if Anna were gone, Sam was in danger, and possibly Alex and Dean, too. Without a second thought, Castiel left immediately, back to the motel room where the Winchesters waited.
Cas had disappeared to 'discover Anna's intentions' about ten minutes ago.

Sam sat stock still on one of the motel beds with elbows leaned onto his knees and hands clasped. He glanced at his twin, who had been sitting in the same spot since Cas vanished. She had a hand on her knee, the index finger tapping constantly. She stared at the floor, deeply pensive. He could tell she was chewing the inside of her cheek like she did when something was bothering her. He also knew she was exhausted—sleep deprived from the constant nightmares she'd been having lately. She hadn't said anything about it, but Sam had heard her waking up breathless and scared for the past few weeks. Since Carthage, he was pretty sure. He hadn't said anything because he knew how she was about this stuff. She'd tell them when she was ready—ask before then and get an arm ripped off.

Sam glanced at his brother, who was pacing in agitation, true to normal form. "Come on, how long does he need, anyway?" Dean demanded in a mutter, gesturing angrily with one of his hands.

As if on cue, Cas reappeared in the middle of the motel room, startling them all. Sam immediately noticed that he looked different than he had a few minutes prior—almost like he'd had the wind knocked out of him. The angel looked from Sam to Dean, grim, deadly almost. "I found Anna," he said lowly.

"And?" Dean asked impatient and urgent.

"And she wants to kill Sam," Cas replied harshly.

Sam shot to his feet. "What? Why?"

Cas looked at him dead in the eye, his expression foul. "She believes it will forestall the Apocalypse." He turned around and marched over to the motel table without any further explanation.

Alex stood up with an incredulous expression on her face. "By killing Sam?" She sounded like she hadn't heard right.

At the table, they could only see Cas's profile—he was pulling something out of his pocket—chalk? But when Alex asked that, he went still, his expression pinched slightly, a muscle jumping in his cheek. His eyes slid in her direction, but he didn't look right at her. "Yes," He refocused on what he'd been doing and began drawing something vigorously on the table. He sounded impatient, like he were explaining something obvious. "No Sam—no Lucifer. Destroy the vessel, destroy the devil. That's her mentality."

Dean, who had taken a minute to digest, was shaking his head his head. "Really? Anna?" He looked and sounded a little let down. "I don't believe it."

"It's true, Dean," Cas replied, sending a glancing dart of a scowl at Dean. He sounded on edge and Sam looked at him intently, thinking hard and realizing that Cas was deeply upset—maybe because Anna had a point. Maybe because Cas thought Anna was right. Sam swallowed, his heart beating fast.
"So she's gone all Glenn Close, huh? That's awesome." Dean said flippantly.

Cas looked at Dean with narrowed eyes, expression filled with malevolence. "And who, the hell, is Glenn Close?"

There was a shocked pause in the entire room at Cas's rude, angry question. Dean looked at Cas oddly. "Uh… she's no one, just this psycho bitch who likes to boil rabbits."

Unamused and perturbed, Cas gave Dean a dirty look and returned to drawing. His chalk strokes were sharp and jabbing—Sam looked closely and saw that Cas's hand was shaking. Damn, Anna must have meant business. Sam had never seen Cas so clearly shaken up. Afraid almost. Which kind of messed with Sam, made him afraid, made him wonder. He approached Cas cautiously, using a soft, appealing tone. He had to know. "The plan to kill me—would it actually stop him?"

"Whoa Sam, what?" Alex turned to look at Sam. He glanced at her, but ignored her shocked question and wide eyes, just looked at Cas again.

The angel had gone still again, listening hard as Sam asked again, rephrasing the question. "Cas, what do you think? Does Anna have a point?"

There was a heavy silence and Cas looked at Sam darkly, then glanced at Dean, who still hung back and was watching at the angel with grim apprehension. Cas looked away, seeming to be thinking. "No," he finally said, distracted, somber. "She's—Glenn Close." He resumed writing with the chalk. Sam wasn't actually convinced—but let it go for the moment. He could feel Alex looking at him, deeply disturbed. He glanced at her then at Dean who looked similarly troubled. Sam was stumped.

Sam cleared his throat, going over towards Cas. "What are you doing, anyway?" he asked, looking at the strange symbols Cas was marking onto the surface of the table.

"A ritual," Cas said blandly. "It will show me where Anna is so that we can go after her."

Dean frowned. "What, look for the super angel-powered chick that wants to gank Sam? Why poke the bear?"

Cas looked at Dean with an impatient, narrow-eyed glare, once again seeming to be off-kilter and short-tempered. "What bear?"

"He means why tempt fate," Alex explained.

Again, Cas seemed to tense up when she spoke to him. He didn't look at any of them. "We... poke the bear because Anna will keep trying. She won't give up until Sam is dead." He grabbed a bowl that had been sitting on the counter and slammed it down with more force than necessary onto the table. "Therefore, we kill her first," he said with dark resolve. He vanished without warning.

"What the—" Dean started, only to stop when Cas reappeared, a jar in hand.

Ignoring the Winchesters, the angel poured the contents of the jar, some kind of oil, into the bowl on the table. He began to recite something in Enochian. "Zod ah ma ra la—ee est la gi ro sa."

Red flame shot out of the bowl, and in unison Cas stumbled back as if in pain, bracing himself against the back of one of the chairs—he had screwed his eyes shut, was breathing heavily, wincing. Sam and Dean exchanged surprised looks, and Alex had taken a couple steps forward, clearly worried, then hesitating. "Cas, are you—"
"Fine," he said tersely, straightening, avoiding looking at anyone but Dean. "I've found her."

"Okay," Dean said. "So where is she?"

"Not where," Cas said, frowning deeply. "When. It's nineteen seventy-eight."

"She went back in time?" Alex asked.

Sam, beside her, was equally confused. "Why nineteen seventy-eight? I wasn't even born yet."

Cas looked at Sam grimly. "And you won't be if she kills your parents."

The twins stilled, understanding and then looking at each other apprehensively.

"Anna can't get to now you because of me," Cas said darkly. "So she's going after them."

"Take us back right now," Dean said.

Cas looked at him with little patience, cynicism almost. "And deliver you right to Anna?"

Dean didn't back down. "They're our parents, Cas, we're going."

Cas shut his eyes a second, seeming to be frustrated. "It's not that easy." He walked a few steps away.

"Why not?" Sam asked.

Cas turned, gave him a peevish glance. "Time travel was difficult even with the powers of heaven at my disposal."

"So, what, you're like a Delorean without enough plutonium?" Dean asked.

Cas looked at Dean unhappily. "I don't understand that reference."

Beside Sam, Alex made a soft little sound, like a muffled, covered up laugh. Sam glanced at her—she was pressing her mouth closed against a little amused smile, her eyes were on Cas. Sam turned his attention back to Cas, who was talking to Dean flatly. "But I'm telling you, taking this trip, with passengers no less—" the angel shook his head, looked somber. "It'll weaken me."

"I can stay here," Alex volunteered, to which Cas's eyes snapped up to her. She was pretty used to being left behind to be point person or the getaway car or lookout from the distance, so it wasn't outlandish in her mind at all to suggest.

"No," the three men said in unison.

Alex made a surprised, weirded out face and held her hands out looking at all of them in rapid succession, ending with Dean, whose 'no' had been the loudest. "Okay then." She now looked mildly embarrassed. "Geez, just trying to lighten the load."

Sam looked from her to Cas, was looking at his sister intensely, his expression unreadable—Cas seemed to feel Sam's gaze and glanced at him, then looked away, jaw working. "There might be more angels who are in on this plan of Anna's," Cas muttered, eyes darting back and forth over the floor in thought. "I don't want any of the three of you out of my sight."

"See, even more reason for us to go with you," Dean reasoned, then approached the angel insistently. "Cas, they're our mom and dad. If we can save them, and not just from Anna... I mean if we can set things right, we have to try."

"Set things right?" Alex repeated, eyes narrowed, looking at her brother suspiciously. "What do you mean?"

Dean sent her a pointed look, turned to look at her tersely. "Warn Mom about the nursery fire, Azazel—all of it. Stop the whole shit storm before it even starts." Dean said it like she should have already known what he meant and been on board, but Alex looked as surprised and unsure about that as Sam felt. In fact she almost looked upset as she stared at Cas.

Cas didn't notice her looking at him, he was staring at Dean intensely. He walked forward a little, expression stern. "You truly believe you can change the past, Dean?" he questioned cynically. His voice lowered, his chin pivoted downwards—he looked wary and intensely foreboding. "Even after last time?"

"Well it's at least worth a shot, man!" Dean said, growing exasperated.

Cas seemed equally frustrated in response, looked from Dean to Sam, glancing just barely at Alex, then looking down to his left. He shook his head grimly. "This is not a good idea," he said.

"Yeah well, good ideas aren't exactly our strong point," Dean said sarcastically. But he had the air of triumph to him in the slight smile and the way his chin was raised. Like he already knew Cas would do what he'd demanded.

Cas looked at him long and hard then gave in with a long, deep huff. "Fine," he muttered. "I'll be back with the required essentials." He vanished again.

"The required essentials," Dean mocked in a goofy, cartoony voice. His voice returned to normal. "Nerd."

Cas reappeared just as quickly as he'd disappeared—two large, ancient looking ceramic jars in hand. "We'll need some kind of bag," he said.

"Here," Sam grabbed his duffel and shook the contents out onto his bed, then handed it to Cas. Dean was grabbing his jacket, tossing Sam his. Alex grabbed hers from where it had been thrown over the side of a chair—looked like they weren't going to waste any time. Sam swallowed. This was all his fault.

"Holy oil," Cas explained as he put the two jars into the bag. He then pulled out an angel blade from inside his trench coat. He gave Sam a significant look as he shrugged on his jacket, pausing. "Do not lose this." He put it into the bag and zipped it shut. "Ready?" Cas asked Sam, handing him the bag.

Sam took the bag and swung it up onto his shoulder, attempting a smile, but it didn't quite work. "Not really."

Dean, Alex, and Sam gathered facing Cas, Alex between her two brothers, and Cas raised his hands, about to touch them and send them back—but Alex's voice suddenly stopped him short. "Wait, Cas—how bad exactly is this gonna set you back?" she asked, peering at him with her eyebrows knit together.

Cas didn't look at her when he spoke. "I'll be a little out of sorts when we arrive," he answered curtly. Sam glanced down at his twin, who appeared frustrated by Cas's shortness. Sam glanced back at Cas, who still refused to look at Alex. Sam frowned a little, his instincts telling him something, maybe some kind of fight or something, was going on between these two.
He didn't have time to wonder. Cas's fingers were coming toward his head—and then suddenly, the motel room was gone.

Sam almost fell over as the ground beneath his feet changed and then everything else, too—beside him Alex grabbed on and they steadied each other as Sam looked around, disoriented. They were standing in the middle of a busy street and a loud horn blared behind them alarmingly close—the three Winchesters whirled as a car screeched to a halt, almost hitting them. "Get out of the street!" the driver of the car shouted.

"Watch where you're going!" Alex shouted back, making a rude gesture in his general direction even as Sam pulled her toward the sidewalk.

"Guys!" Dean barked, and Sam stopped short as a second car almost ran them over, jerking to a stop, almost knocking Sam over when the bumper hit his leg. The driver looked at them like they were crazy, and Sam awkwardly shrugged, mouthed 'sorry!' and stumbled forward when Alex pushed him along, trying to get them out of the street.

The three of them made it to the sidewalk, disoriented. "Ah, shit," Alex panted, scanning the area with a hand to the side of her head. She looked worried and confused, and then she asked what Sam was wondering: "Where's Cas?"

"I don't know," he said breathlessly, seeing no sign of the guy. "Did we make it?"

"Unless they're bringing Pintos back into production," Dean said, pointing at one of the cars, "I, uh, I'd say yes."

"Oh my god!" Alex suddenly exclaimed, gone still staring in shock or maybe fear—her brothers both followed her gaze to see Castiel, collapsed against the side of a car a few feet away. He looked barely conscious at first glance.

"Cas!" Sam exclaimed, already hurrying over—he dropped into a crouch, grabbing onto Cas, who looked like he might fall over any second. "Hey, hey, hey!"

Dean and Alex were already on either side of Sam—Dean kind of bent over, and Alex had fallen to her knees and was grabbing Cas's arm, saying his name in a voice awash in worry. The angel, usually so aloof and composed, appeared woozy, in pain, disoriented. He was gazing at Sam's twin in a daze. Blood ran down out of his nose. "Take it easy, take it easy," Dean commanded gruffly, looked at him intently. "You all right?"

Looking anything but, Cas frowned in pain at nowhere in particular. "I'm fine," he said. "I'm—much better than I expected." Sam was surprised to hear that—this seemed pretty bad to be 'much better than expected.' He made to start helping Cas up, but without warning, Cas coughed violently, gagging up blood, and then went slack, his eyes rolling back in his head. He pitched sideways and would have fallen over completely if Sam and Alex hadn't mutually caught him by the shoulder.

"Cas… Cas!" Alex stared at him, eyes wide, but got no response. She looked at Sam, wide-eyed. "Did he—did he just pass out?" She looked at Dean, aghast. "Is that even possible?" She looked at Cas again, who had brilliant red blood dripping out of the side of his mouth. "Angels don't pass out! Do they?!

Sam put a hand in front of Cas's mouth, checking for breathing. It was there. "Well, he's breathing. Sort of."
Alex held the pads of her pointer and middle finger against Cas's neck for a couple seconds. "Pulse seems normal," she said, but she didn't sound too relieved. "A little out of sorts my ass." She muttered. She almost sounded pissed underneath all the worry.

Sam sat back slightly, unsure, looked at Dean, who had straightened up and was looking around in a disconcerted way. "What do we do?" Sam asked him.

"Hell if I know!" was the immediate response. Dean pinched the bridge of his nose. "I don't have time for this, man." He let go of his nose and huffed a frustrated breath, then turned and walked off a few steps. Annoyed, Sam muttered an 'I'll be back' to his sister and got up, following Dean. Cas remained unmoving where he'd lost consciousness with Alex holding him up and peering at him anxiously.

"Okay Dean, we need to figure this out, now," Sam said.

"I know, I know," Dean said, overwhelmed and unable to stop pacing. He grabbed his own chin, looking totally clueless, his eyes scanning the area kind of desperately. And then, his eyes stopped. Sam looked where Dean was looking—The Prairie Court Motel. Sam looked at Dean, not understanding. Dean however clapped his hands together once decisively. "Okay, here's what we do. We put Back to the Future over there up in a motel, safe and sound where he can sleep off this—whatever—while we go gank Anna."

"...Leave him alone?" Sam asked, a little surprised at Dean's idea.

"Well the other choice is just a little inconvenient, Sammy," Dean said a low, tense voice, starting to sound defensive and backed into a corner. "I don't got time to drag around a big unconscious dude, do you?"

Sam made a face. "No but... you're saying we leave our ticket out of here... behind?" Dean made a face of his own at Sam's question. "Cas likes to disappear on us when he's, you know, lucid. What if he wakes up and forgets we're here or—" Sam stopped. He could speculate forever and there just wasn't time. He refocused to his main point. "We can't leave him, Dean. It's a bad idea."

"And we can't take him with, either," Dean argued, getting more impatient by the second. "So what choice does that leave us?"

Sam gave a frustrated huff, glancing toward where Cas and Alex were—then paused, the perfect idea striking him. "Alex can stay with him!" He said a little animated, not sure why he hadn't thought of it already. "Make sure he doesn't wander off when he wakes up!" He paused, looking back at the angel, suddenly a little bleak as he considered. "If he wakes up."

"You have got to be kidding me," Dean said darkly, and Sam felt himself raise an eyebrow slightly. Was Dean seriously still on this whole keeping Cas and Alex apart thing?

"Dean," Sam said, deadpan. "Get over yourself." He got an evil eye from his brother, but just rolled his eyes. "You're making a big deal out of nothing—even if you thought Cas might try something—and that is a huge if—does he look like he's up to doing something like that anytime soon?"

Dean looked at Sam unhappily, then in Cas and Alex's direction. "I mean, just look at them, Sam!" Dean hissed, jabbing his hand out demonstratively. Sam looked—all he saw was Alex supporting a passed-out Cas while looking concerned.

"What?" he asked, looking back at Dean oddly. "All I see is Alex and her friend Cas who she's worried about. Who is also super unconscious at the moment." Dean responded by clamping his lips into a thin line. Sam just looked at him calmly. "I'm right about this Dean. And you're being a little bitch."

"Am not," Dean muttered, then cut his eyes sharply to Sam, narrowing them slightly. He seemed to have thought of something, folded his arms, suddenly giving off an air of superiority. "Anna's after you Sam—maybe I should leave you here with Cas, huh?"

Sam's expression fell in exasperation. Dean couldn't just let it go. Of course not. Sam huffed. "No, Anna's after Mom and Dad now, she doesn't even know I'm here. And, I mean, think about it. Alex will be safer here, right?" That last part got Dean's attention, just like Sam knew it would—they looked at each other significantly. If there was anything they would always agree on, it was that they wanted their little sister to be safe. Speaking of, she had noticed them exchanging words and had left Cas propped against the car, was walking over, looking at them with a terse expression.

"What are you two arguing about now?" she asked.

Dean spoke up before Sam could. "Sam here wants you to stay behind and babysit Cas while we go do all the fun stuff."

"We need to make sure he doesn't disappear on us while we go take care of Anna," Sam explained, quickly following up Dean's statement.

Alex's eyes flickered between the two of them for a long beat, her expression unreadable. "So... I'm automatically the one who stays behind while you guys run off and save Mom and Dad, face down a rogue angel who's after Sam, risk your asses and possibly get killed in the process?"

Dean looked at Sam, his expression suggesting Sam was done for. Sam pressed his mouth downward in a kind of shrug, briefly as he tried to appear nonchalant. "Uh, basically."

Alex glanced back at Cas, pausing, then looked back at them. She appeared to be upset. "You guys need me on this one."

"Yeah, we do—to make sure our time machine doesn't go AWHOL," Sam said, trying to appeal to her sensibility.

She folded her arms and looked at him challengingly. "Okay, well, why can't you stay? You're the one Anna's after, right?"

Sam pressed his lips into a thin line—this was his favorite thing, when it turned into a sibling rivalry contest. Dean looked at Sam, as if to say 'see? I was right.' Sam took in a long breath to keep his patience. "I can't stay because I am going," Sam insisted, looking at Dean pointedly, then Alex. She was incredibly annoyed with him. Sam huffed, tried again. "Okay, here's another idea: Dean stays with Cas."

"Youngest by one minute and forty-seven seconds, Sam!" Alex protested. "That doesn't even count!"

Sam muttered under his breath, "it does though."
Dean had his hand on the side of his head and chopped it down through the air, looking like he was approaching his wit's end. "Look you two morons, at this point, I don't care which of the two of you stays!" he thundered. "Time's wasting—Anna could've killed both Mom and Dad by now and have time left over to go catch tonight's episode of The Bob Newhart Show." He glanced from Alex to Sam, irked. "You two are getting on my last damn nerve."

"Feeling's mutual," Alex told him and got a glare from Dean in response. He looked over at Sam, who was currently very unhappy about the standoff.

"Okay, look," Dean muttered, "you two settle this the old fashioned way and we're done and moving on, end of story." He waited about one second then jerked both hands up at them. "Today, guys!"

Alex and Sam contemplated each other reluctantly. Sam raised his eyebrows at her challengingly, and she just made a 'not impressed' face back at him. Sam raised his fist, cradled in his palm, and she mirrored him, looking at him tersely.

They didn't need a countdown or go signal—in unison, they started. One, two, three times they hit their own palms, and then on the fourth count, Sam held his hand flat—paper—and Alex kept her hand in a fist—rock. Sam's face broke into a triumphant grin and he covered her fist in his hand.

"Paper beats rock!"

Alex made a frustrated sound. "Yeah, okay," she said, nodding grudgingly. "I can accept defeat." She let out a gusty sigh. "You a-holes really owe me one for this." Sam noticed that she didn't sound that mad though, just kind of apprehensive. Dean, however, seemed to be over the entire thing, antsy and ready to get going.

"Yeah, whatever, let's get you two checked in so we can get this show on the road," he said, already striding back toward Cas. Sam watched Alex, who was looking at Cas with a weird expression. He thought it was worry, which made sense. He knew she really cared about the guy—it was her guardian angel after all, why wouldn't she? Alex seemed to sense her twin's eyes on her, and looked back at him petulantly, which only entertained Sam.

"Hey, don't act like you hate it so much," he teased in a low tone, grinning as he nudged her. He got an 'I hate you' face from her in return.

The Prairie Court Motel

Alex ran the washcloth under hot tap water, not sure she believed what was happening right now. Sam and Dean were already gone—they had checked her in a couple minutes ago, thrown Cas down on the bed and then left in a huge hurry—but not before Dean had told her they would call by ten o'clock to check in or be back that night—and if not, to come looking. So here Alex was, in 1978, holed up in a quiet motel room with an injured angel... but that wasn't even the best part. As odds would have it, the only room available at the motel was the honeymoon suite.... and when they said honeymoon suite, they meant it.

The room was covered in cheesy red heart motifs and there were several crappy paintings of red roses displayed across the wood panel walls. There was a cheap bottle of complimentary champagne set on the dresser, no ice or anything though—beside it sat two slender toasting glasses with gold hearts etched on them. There was a heart shaped tub in the bathroom, a little sculpture of cupid aiming a bow and arrow on the bedside table, and a plaque hanging above the bed that said 'Love Conquers All.' In short, the room was ugly as shit. Finished wetting the cloth, Alex rung it out and exited the bathroom. She'd had seen some corny motel rooms in her day, but this one took... the cake.

However, she wasn't really so much focused on the room decor as she was the guy on the bed. Laid flat and unmoving, Cas looked just the same as when Dean and Sam had left—unresponsive. She paused a second, the sight of him like that halting her completely, scaring her all over again. Seeing him so messed up was really chilling. And somehow, the blanket he laid on (which, of course, was a tacky heart print) seemed put there to insult her or taunt her. He looked so handsome and like he could have been sleeping. Well, except for the horrifying streaks of blood across his lower face.

Alex shook herself and then gingerly sat on the edge of the bed, one leg folded under her as she leaned over him carefully, steadying herself with the light touch of her palm to his chest. Blood was drying underneath his nose at the edge of his mouth... and she felt almost sick. He hadn't been telling the truth about how bad off the time travel would leave him, the idiot. And now she was left not knowing if he'd recover—when he'd wake up—or if he'd be okay at all. Was this some kind of angel coma? Or the equivalent of hitting his head hard? How long would this last for? Would he be permanently damaged? And then, a more disturbing thought... was this him losing his 'angel mojo' like he'd talked about in 2014?

There was no way to tell, not yet, so she didn't need to get herself completely bent out of shape over it. She felt powerless to do anything except clean him up a little, but since that was the only option, that's what she did. With her palm still pressed against his chest, her free hand began to carefully dab the washcloth at the blood that ran down from his nose. Alex reflected momentarily about how she just wasn't sure about this. Part of her was really screaming in frustration at being 'left behind' as her brothers went and hopefully stopped Anna from killing Mom and Dad... but... on the other hand, she really couldn't feel too upset, because honestly, being here when Cas woke up, making sure he was okay—that felt important to her, too.

Still, Alex's mind went back to the other perspective—she could be out there, helping her brothers stop a crazy angel from murdering her parents, one of which she'd never even known at all. As soon as Dean had demanded Cas take them back to 1978, Alex had been struck by the frightening and intriguing thought of meeting her mom. But the weird thing was, she didn't know if she even wanted to—she had spent her whole life not knowing the woman, having no memories of her at all, only a couple of crappy photographs, some stories, and nice sounding hand-me-down memories from Dean, who did remember her. So the idea of actually meeting Mom and putting a real, living, breathing face to the name was gray area for Alex. In the deepest parts of her heart, Alex felt that it was easier to write Mom off as a woman in a grainy photo than see her as a real human being—not knowing Mom made it almost painless to exist without her. Just thinking that made Alex feel really crappy about herself. Mary Winchester would be ashamed to know her daughter was that shallow and heartless and afraid.

And then there was the thought of seeing Dad again. She wasn't sure if she could handle seeing him again, in any context. She remembered when he died. He'd told Dean and Sam goodbye, privately, separately. But hadn't said anything to her at all. Maybe he'd been waiting for the right opportunity that never came, maybe he just had died before he got the chance, or maybe he had been too afraid to talk to her. He had never talked to her much. He had never liked having one-sided conversations, which you tended to have with a mute person—and he'd never 'gotten' her like Sam and Dean had. He'd always looked at her with this kind of veiled, stand-offish look in his eyes. She remembered trying so hard to make him proud. She'd learned to shoot straighter, draw faster, load quicker than her brothers. She'd memorized sigils and wards and spells, more than Sam and Dean had. But he'd never done what she'd wanted him to do: just look at her with nothing but pride and joy. He'd acted proud of her some days, he'd sometimes laughed at the purposefully funny things she'd done or said (well, written). He'd patted her shoulder a few times in approval. But it had always felt like he were holding back. Secretly looking at her with intense disapproval and disappointment. And then, there were the nights he'd drink too much, get angry. And those nights were the ones that dominated her memories.

She didn't want to see Dad again, she realized. And she didn't know how to feel about that.

She thought about what Dean said about setting things right—he wanted to warn their parents about Azazel, stop the nursery fire, Mom dying, everything. What if he did, and what if it worked? It would change literally everything. Alex pictured herself living a life where she possessed a voice, had two parents who worked normal jobs. She pictured herself living in one house, going to one school. Having Christmases at home and always knowing where she'd be falling asleep come night time. Making cookies for bake sales and having a mom who would braid her hair and teach her how to talk to boys. Alex would be scared of guns and knives like most other girls, be squeamish at the sight of blood. She'd go to prom and get excited about turning sixteen and subscribe to shallow magazines about fashion and celebrities—she'd spend time complaining about minimum wage and how her MP3 player was a piece of crap—she'd have a dad who was proud of her, smiled at her with his eyes, talked with her. They would never even have a clue about the horrible, wrecked life they could have had instead. She imagined all of this and even though parts of it sounded completely amazing and perfect, it was so far removed from the life she now lived—it just set her at unease, felt wrong. Especially when she drew back a little and looked at Cas. If Dean changed the nursery, it would change this, too. It would mean she never met Castiel, right?

She'd finished wiping the blood away from under his nose and then moved onto the blood streaked at the edge of his mouth, slowly tracing the washcloth into the corner crease of his lips. She had to hold his face steady at this point with her other hand. Underneath her palm, his jawline felt rough from stubble. She realized the only sound in the quiet room was of his deep, steady breathing, and her eyes darted to his chest, which rose and fell rhythmically underneath her hand. She refocused. She'd cleaned Dean and Sam up a million times but this was totally different, and oddly enough, left her feeling insanely vulnerable. Maybe it was just being in such close physical proximity to him. Alex realized how she was looking at him now, really looking at him. His piercing gazes had always sent her eyes running away, but now, with him at a complete lack of consciousness… she could look as long as she wanted. Her eyes flickered around his face, first resting on his long, dark eyelashes, then the soft crease where his lips met each other, then the hollow of his cheekbone. She had ceased moving now. The scruff of his five o'clock shadow. The cleft of his chin, the graceful line of his jaw. The little dark curls of shaggy hair behind his ears. The weirdly beautiful vertical lines across his lips—lips that looked so kissable and tempting. The little, barely noticeable wrinkles along the ridge of his nose. The uneven line where his dark, messy hair met his forehead… the crazy rebel tuft of hair sticking up on the top of his head. She smoothed that down gently, haltingly, looking at his face again—then brushed his hair back from his forehead without thinking. An unnecessary action. But she had done it anyway. She looked at his lips again. She could hear another sound in the room now—herself, breathing a little harder than what was normal, because she was unintentionally remembering the kiss from 2014—she was filled with guilt and remorse—and yet, longing for more of the same.

Exasperated with herself, Alex made a couple last gentle swipes of the washcloth, trying not to look at him. His face was clean now, free of blood, and Alex sat back a minute, quiet, eyeing him from the corner of her eye. Now what? I'm a little rusty on angel first aid. She checked his pulse again, fingers to his neck—it was normal, and his skin was warm, smooth. She hesitated, pulling her hand away into her lap, watching him carefully for any change. But he didn't move at all, didn't make a sound. She had to make herself stand up.

Alex got up and tossed the bloody washcloth into the trash, then turned around, folded her arms, looked at Cas apprehensively, not sure what to do. She found herself staring at the plain black dress shoes on his feet. They weren't scuffed or dull at all, they looked brand new. How did he do that? She remembered the first time she'd seen him that she, Dean, and Bobby had shot him up pretty good, but the next time she'd seen him, he was in the exact same outfit—mysteriously sans bullet holes. Since then, she'd gathered that he seemed to be able to regenerate his clothes. That, or he had a magical heavenly closet somewhere with an endless supply of the same outfit. Hmm. And that… didn't seem likely. Regeneration it is. But if he had the power to alter his appearance like that, it struck her as a little odd that he chose to remain in the same, ordinary things. Something he'd told her, long ago, popped into her mind. I like this coat, he'd said. She smiled softly in response— he'd shown up in her dreams trying to be helpful and had only succeeded in pissing her off—so, of course, she'd picked a fight with him, trying to keep him at arms length. She'd been so unsure about him. She'd hated him in some moments, for goodness sake. She continued to watch Cas, sobering. Things had changed so much since then.

She sat down on the edge of the bed again, fixing where one of the lapels of his coat had turned inwards. She thought of how the trench coat—the cheap suit—the crappy ten dollar tie—the things he wore were so ordinary, so everyday, so unlike everything Castiel was: powerful, surprising, a lightning storm contained in a glass bottle. But, she reminded herself with a sudden note of somberness—that the clothing, the messy hair, the now-familiar face—that was Jimmy Novak, or at least it had been, once—the things she had come to identify as Cas were not really Cas at all, were they? She was struck with a pang of guilt, thinking of Jimmy, wondering what had happened to him, if he were still in there somewhere. Until a couple years ago, this guy had been an average Joe. And now he was like some kind of angelic iPhone case, if he was still in there at all…

Was Jimmy still in there, conscious and suffering, overwhelmed by the weight of a crushing angelic being that inhabited his every atom? It was difficult to look at Cas... Jimmy... whoever he was... and not have a lot of conflicted, confused thoughts about this very subject. And it was getting harder and harder to really even separate the two in her mind. She'd only seen Jimmy for like a day, and Cas for so much longer… but still, she was wondering something about herself: Was she attracted to the being Castiel was, or the physical appearance of Jimmy? It wasn't that simple, but... well, it didn't really matter, Alex reminded herself, as there was clearly nothing coming from it... it just would have been nice to have one less crazy unanswered question floating around in the insane asylum she called her brain.

She rubbed her forehead with the palm of her hand, pacing a little now. This whole situation was so screwed up. She had messed up so friggin' bad hadn't she? God, maybe it would be better if Cas just stayed knocked out this whole time, however long it took Dean and Sam to return. Because if he woke up and started treating her weird again, she wasn't sure if she could take it. It sucked to have Cas skirting her like she was the plague. Grimly, she thought of this one girl Courtney that Sam had been good friends with in seventh grade—best friends, really... until Courtney told him that she liked him and wanted to be his girlfriend. Sam, definitely not on the same wavelength, had been totally skeeved out and had started avoiding her at all costs because it was so awkward for him and he didn't want what she wanted at all. The friendship had fallen apart into nothing. In middle school, who cares, no big deal. But... wow. Alex was the Courtney in this situation, wasn't she? She felt embarrassed about the revelation. She would take back the hand touch thing in a heartbeat if she'd known it was going to ruin whatever they were before. She stopped pacing, looking sidelong at Cas's still form. Friends. They had been friends. And that should have been enough for her.

Miserable, Alex tried not to notice how Cas's clothes were too big. His white dress shirt, especially, kind of stuck out, bunched up. His trousers, however, laid flat against him, and she could see, vaguely, the taper and angle of his hips underneath. She swallowed, uncomfortable, needing to look anywhere but at Cas—still, her eyes wandered to his hands, which laid still beside him. Rough, large, warm, strong. Those hands had healed her, held her, wiped tears off of her face—those hands had snapped handcuffs onto her one day... then ripped handcuffs off of her the next. She thought of the irony of that. How when she first met Cas, he'd had zero problem leaving her cuffed in the basement at Bobby's. And then, roughly a year later, how he'd savagely torn another pair off, the most upset she'd ever seen him.

She shivered a little at the thought of Lucifer, remembering when he'd shoved her to get a rise out of Castiel. She was troubled, and it wasn't so much the assault as it was the way Cas had reacted. He'd looked positively murderous when the devil slammed her against the wall—Cas had drawn himself to his full height looking ready to destroy everything in his path, practically seething. And Lucifer had said, softly, far too close to Alex... "Look. How protective he is of you." As if he were pleased with the display, like it was something that fascinated him. He'd almost sounded triumphant—but why? Cas was her guardian angel, right? Wasn't he supposed to be protective? She actually had begun to think about this very idea a lot the past couple of weeks—that maybe that was the exact reason why she'd gotten so confused about Cas and his feelings toward her. She'd thought that the way he looked at her, his attentiveness and care were because of romantic feelings or emotions. She got it now—she'd made the mistake of looking at it from a human perspective, He had some kind of profound, deeply rooted bond to her because he was her guardian angel. She'd made the mistake of assuming things—that, paired with what had happened in 2014—she'd just been dumb. It was obvious that whatever she and future Castiel had in 2014 was because he was human.

Really, Alex... thinking an angel could fall in love with you.

She'd laugh at herself if it wasn't so frigging pathetic. She had seriously been reading too many romance novels. They were starting to melt her brain.

Alex stopped pacing and tried to get her head straight. She needed to stop mooning around like an angsty teenager and get to work preparing. If Anna showed up here, Alex wanted to be ready. It seemed highly unlikely, but it never hurt to be ready for a worst case scenario in her experience. She shrugged her jacket off and tossed it toward the heart-shaped coat knobs dotting the wall beside the door—the jacket totally missed but she didn't care. She had caught sight of herself in the mirror above the dresser. She looked so plain, so tired, so haggard to herself. She combed her fingers halfheartedly through the hair on the left side of her head, then realized it was a lost cause and looked away and back at Cas, pensive. Then, she drew her hunting knife out of the sheath on her belt and shoved the sleeve of her flannel shirt up a little bit. Holding her arm out in front of herself, she took a deep, reluctant breath—this was always the worst—then sliced into the skin there, suppressing a pained sound as blood flowed out of the cut. Satisfied with the blood flow, Alex re-sheathed her knife and went over to the bed again.

On the wall above the bedside table, Alex began to fingerpaint her blood, the strokes forming the angel warding sigil. She'd added this symbol into her mental catalogue of wards a long time ago, basically the first time she'd seen it. Funny how drawings and shapes combined just so could save your life, trap a demon, send a spirit into the void.

After a moment she finished with the sigil. Alex washed her hands and grabbed a dry washcloth from the bathroom and held it against her bleeding arm, then leaned against the bathroom doorway for a minute, waiting for the blood flow to stop, looking at Cas. He looked so peaceful. She wondered if he would dream, and if he did, what it would be. She smiled softly at the sudden thought that she was watching over her guardian angel. And then she promptly stopped herself. These were more of her ridiculous romance-novel influenced thoughts.

The sound of silence was ringing in her ears all over again and Alex let out a soft, frustrated breath of air. Mind turning to worry about Sam and Dean all over again. If they screwed this up, got themselves hurt or killed, she would murder them. Getting exasperated with herself and the silent room, the noisy barrage of thoughts, Alex looked around restlessly. She definitely couldn't just sit here and stare at Cas all day, and she couldn't stew in silence about Sam, Dean, Mom, Dad, life... she needed a distraction, stat. She tossed the washcloth away then went and switched the television on—it was ancient, the kind with wood panels on either side of the screen, and it had an antennae the size of a fish tank on top of it. Only one channel came in, and on it, some movie she'd never seen before. The picture quality was pretty horrible.

"I tell you this as an artist, I think you'll understand," a young Christopher Walken was saying to an even younger Diane Keaton—who was dressed really oddly, kind of butchy or hipster maybe. "Sometimes when I'm driving... on the road at night..." he said, "I see two headlights coming toward me. Fast. I have this sudden impulse to turn the wheel quickly, head-on into the oncoming car. I can anticipate the explosion. The sound of shattering glass. The... flames rising out of the flowing gasoline."

Oh geez. Well that was optimistic. Alex was not amused with her luck. This looked like a great movie to watch while she was already kind of depressed. But, at the very least, it was some background noise to distract her from everything else. She sat cross-legged on the far edge of the bed at a respectable distance from Cas. Close enough to keep an eye on him, make sure he was still breathing. She glanced at the cut on her arm, where the blood was beginning to clot, then absently rubbed an eye, thinking an IV drip of coffee would be nice right now because she was so frigging tired. She looked back at the TV screen unseeingly, staring. She didn't want to fall asleep—because every time she did, the nightmare, the one she'd had for weeks now, consumed her.

"Have not saints lips, and holy palmers too?"

Castiel heard a soft masculine voice speaking somewhere nearby. It was dark—his eyes were closed—what was happening? And then he remembered bringing the Winchesters back to 1978, then collapsing...

"Oh, then, dear saint, let lips do what hands do," the voice continued, as Cas, eyes still closed, realized how weak his vessel was. Hazily, he was recalling performing the locating spell to find Anna, then he remembered his conversation with her in the warehouse. His eyes snapped open, his pulse suddenly rocketing. He remembered everything. His eyes darted back and forth, staring widely at the dark, unfamiliar ceiling above. The things Anna had shown him about the future clambered loudly for attention, sent his entire vessel into a panicked and confused state. He heard the same male voice speaking still nearby, but didn't catch the words, his ears buzzing loudly.

Unsure where he was or what had happened—he seemed to be inside some kind of room now and on a bed—he looked to his left—and promptly froze. Within arms reach, Alex laid on her side, facing him, eyes closed, her form still. Her head was resting on her arm, her knees were drawn up toward her chest. If he hadn't seen her shoulder slowly moving down and then back up as she breathed, he had been a fraction of a second from believing she was dead—the memory of seeing her lifeless body covered in blood was still so fresh and pervasive in his mind that seeing her still there beside him had somehow convinced him, just for a moment, of the worst.

But she was alive—and asleep—beside him. Cas let out a breath he hadn't realized had been held, then was suddenly struck by the realization that they seemed to be alone—where were Sam and Dean? He looked around the room briefly, wincing against the pain and difficulty of raising his neck even four inches. He was immediately confused by the overwhelming barrage of strange, red decorations that covered the dim room. He could see that the television was on. It was kind of dim in the room—they were in a motel suite of some kind. He couldn't hold his head up any longer and gave up, letting it thunk back onto the pillow.

He looked back at Alex, the strangest and most overwhelming combination of emotions overcoming him. In the most literal sense, he felt he couldn't take these sensations and thoughts. They violently ricocheted around in his head, spilling over each other and multiplying and they were too much to bear or carry—Cas wanted to grab his head in his hands and silence it all, just make it stop. But his arms were too weak to move, and even if he could move them, there was a terrible suspicion inside that no physical action on his part could ever quell this chaos inside of him—the noise in his mind wouldn't stop or end. He seemed to have no choice but to lay there lost in despairing, horrified thoughts.

He could barely understand what Anna had shown him. He had seen it—taken it in—but couldn't comprehend it all. He'd seen a future where a fallen, human version of himself and this woman beside him had been together and very obviously in love—he understood little of the intricacies of being human, but he had known they were in love with certainty. He was once again feeling his breath shortening as he wondered how. Castiel had watched humans since the dawn of time but hadn't ever imagined himself being capable of taking part in being one. He hadn't ever thought he would be anything but a servant of God and Heaven. But in this supposedly certain future, he had fallen from grace and together with this human girl beside him forged a new life... shared a home... created a child... Castiel blinked rapidly, eyebrows knitted together. His heartbeat was fast and he could feel it in his throat. He heard the television still but the voices and music were muffled because he was so unfocused. He had created a child, with her. That thought was even more confusing and bewildering than the rest, and he couldn't confront it, not yet. It was much too much.

He watched Alex closely as she continued to sleep. He felt such fierce protectiveness and desperation rise in him at the same time, quickly followed by shame and fear about the future. He heard the sound of an echoing gunshot, saw her dying moments flash across his mind. Could that really be where the future would take them? He didn't want to believe it. He thought of everything else briefly—Dean's cold and heartless demeanor, Lucifer walking the earth in the flesh, the Croatoan virus all but destroying the world. But none of it seemed as awful as the knowledge that he could be responsible for Alex's death. Not only her death. But the death of the small, new life within her—again, the thought of the child overwhelmed him, and he sent the thought away. It wasn't difficult, because he was lost in so many other nightmarish thoughts. The thought that he could hurt Alex in any small way inspired endless horror and intense fear like he'd never felt before. He could never, never let that version of the future happen. All roads lead to the same destination. He'd said this to Dean once. Now Castiel didn't want to believe that, because if it were true... what Anna how shown him was inevitable. In that moment, Castiel swore to himself that he would find a way to make sure what he saw never happened. Even if he had to kill himself.

"Sin from thy lips? Oh trespass sweetly urged! Give me my sin again." The man on the television said, sounding deeply emotional and affected.

Cas glanced down with his eyes, just beside his right foot, where he could just see a couple on the screen kissing passionately. The sight of it made him think of the kiss he had witnessed between the Alex beside him now and the Castiel of the future. Quickly after the shock of witnessing such a passionate and sexual kiss, a dark, foreign feeling shimmered through him. He wasn't entirely sure what it was. Perhaps it was jealousy. Why had she done that? And moreover, why hadn't she told him about it? He felt lied to, as her strange behavior toward him when she'd gotten back from 2014 now made sense. He wanted to be angry that she hadn't told him about the kiss—but then, in quiet realization, he thought perhaps he had no right to think she owed him an explanation. Still, he couldn't brush aside the feelings of betrayal. And confusion. And, he realized in surprise—hurt.

Offhandedly he thought maybe that was why she had kissed him so readily in the panic room…
because she had done it before. He felt a sudden surge of loathing and hatred toward that angel-turned-man who had fallen apart, gotten Alex killed, then had the audacity to involve 2009 Alex and touch her like that. Castiel didn't recognize that man as himself. He was left feeling empty and bitter. But then his mind turned to the knowledge of how he had taken the memory of the panic room from her. Stilling, ashamed, he thought cynically that perhaps this is what the humans meant by 'irony.' She had hidden something from him—and he had taken something else from her. They were 'even,' weren't they? So why did it feel so awful?

He remembered seeing her and Dean right after he'd whisked them out of Zachariah's clutches. He'd immediately, instinctively picked up on the fact that something was wrong with Alex, but hadn't known what. He'd asked her about it. She had sidestepped. He'd asked again. She'd insisted she was fine, but the way she'd looked at him... he hadn't believed her. He remembered standing there beside a busy street, later that night alone, hands in his pockets. Wondering about what she'd seen in this dark future that had rattled her so thoroughly. Dean had promised to explain it and had, a few days later when Cas went to see Dean in the privacy of a dream. Dean hadn't told him how he had discovered Cas was the reason Alex died in the future. So many lies and half-truths. So now Cas was wondering what exactly had shaken Alex so deeply: The kiss? Did the future Castiel tell her about her death? Was she shaken up because of how hopeless and desolate the future of the world was? The sight of her brother Sam, possessed by Lucifer?

His anger faded into a deep sadness and frustration as he realized that if Alex had told him about the kiss, he wouldn't have known how to react, what to say or do. He wouldn't have understood, not then. She had probably known that. He pondered. Perhaps the kiss in 2014 was bothering her in the same way that he was bothered by what he had done in the panic room. He couldn't know—she carried so much sadness with her, and sometimes, he thought perhaps she was cracking under the weight of it all.

He looked at her thoroughly now, turning his head slightly toward her. She often looked so weary and burdened, but right now, her face was relaxed and peaceful, soft, free of worries if only temporarily. He had studied her face countless times before, but never tired of the discourse. During his existence he'd observed innumerable humans, but none of their faces drew him like hers did. He didn't even know why. How many other women possessed similar features? And yet, there was no one in existence now or ever who was as oddly captivating as Alex was to Castiel.

She was a fleeting being, fragile and transient. When he thought of her in comparison to his world of Heaven and eternity, she seemed so small and powerless. She should have been meaningless, but she wasn't. Not to him. He thought of it for a moment, he, a thousands of years old celestial being. Her, a fleeting, mortal blip on the timeline of eternity. But she seemed realer and grander to him than the Sistine Chapel or the Garden of Eden or Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata.

He loved the barely-noticeable freckles scattered across the bridge of her nose and the slightly mismatched shape of her eyebrows and the uneven arc of her hairline, the flyaway hairs that never seemed to be tamed... the sight of her eyelashes dark and fanning out against fair skin... he'd counted their number before. He was smiling softly now, unaware. His eyes ran from the point of her chin up the swoop of her angular jaw, then flicked over to the soft pink lips that were parted just slightly—and then he felt guilt crash over him like a wave breaks over a rock, and his smile faded. He remembered what it had been like to kiss those lips. And he longed to feel it again, the other-worldly quality of his mouth and hers, together.

Castiel couldn't look away from her. And when he realized he couldn't look away, he felt the sensation of panicked worry eating at him from inside. He needed to be distant from her, far away, because being close to her made him weak and vulnerable in the strangest of ways and in turn endangered her. He knew if he could stay far away, if he could let their relationship be resigned to a few interactions per year... he would keep her safe from that future where they were in love, broken, and doomed. But despite his convictions and his recent attempts to keep them apart, fate seemed to be determined to push them together. Like now. He literally couldn't move his vessel, it was so weakened. And she was right beside him, looking so small and sweet and he remembered how it had felt to hold her close against him, how she had rested her head against his shoulder there in Gabriel’s hell world. In quick succession, he remembered how he'd seen her lay her head on his shoulder in the future, right before they had approached that farmhouse... horror rippled through him again, as intense as before.

Alex shifted then in her sleep, moving her arm slightly—Cas froze at the sight of a streak of bright red blood there—and then he immediately reached out a weak, shaking hand and gently turned her wrist toward him, trying to see where the blood was coming from. He could see a cut, clearly self-inflicted there on her forearm, partially covered by her halfway rolled up flannel shirt sleeve. It looked like it wasn't bleeding anymore, but that didn't matter much to Cas—why had she cut herself to begin with? He looked around—then saw it. She'd drawn an angel-warding sigil there, beside the bed on the wall. He relaxed, just a little, but felt largely unhappy. She should have taken his blood to do that, not hers.

She stirred suddenly, frowned a little in her sleep, then made a soft sound, like in pain. Castiel went still, unsure what was happening. Again, she whimpered, and becoming concerned, Cas touched her arm, said her name. Her eyes shot open, wide and darting around, momentarily confused. Then she saw him and stopped moving. "Cas?" she seemed disoriented.

They looked at each other for three very long seconds, then Alex was sitting up, perturbed, looking around like she was dazed. "Did I fall asleep?" It seemed to be a rhetorical question, because she squinted at her watch, then went wide-eyed. "For... crap, three hours?!"

She grimaced and rubbed her forehead, looking distressed. Cas watched her from where he laid. "Were you dreaming just now?" he asked.

She turned her attention to him then frowned a little, eyes darting away. "Uh, yeah, I think." Cas waited for further explanation, his forehead wrinkling. But she shook her head, acting like it didn't matter. "It's nothing." She then looked at him pointedly, turned back toward him, tilted her head the side just slightly, eyebrows close together in concern. "Are you good?" she looked him up and down, assessing him. "What happened to you?"

It was shameful to be stuck laying flat on the bed, unable to move much, her so high above him. He felt foolish. "My vessel isn't as strong without Heaven's power behind it." He explained, not able to keep his face from showing his discomfort about that fact. He paused. "I... don't think I can even sit up at this point."

"Damn," Alex commented. She looked worried. "You'll be all right though?"

He wondered if she were worried about getting back to her year, or about him. "Eventually," he answered. She looked kind of unsure about his answer. "Where are Sam and Dean?" Cas asked, and she swung her legs around toward him, sitting cross legged.

She looked unhappy at his question, cracking her knuckles in distraction. "Gone after Anna."

"They left you here with me?" Cas asked, frowning slightly, not sure if he understood how Dean would allow that.

"Someone needed to keep an eye on you," she said shrugging lightly, giving him a very small smile.
Cas let out a heavy breath, grim, regretful. "I shouldn't have listened to Dean. I should have come alone," he muttered. "Traveling with passengers... it's weakened me. I'm all but useless." It was highly dangerous that they were here in 1978 and he couldn't protect them against Anna.

Alex gave him a look when he said that he was useless, like she was unhappy he would say such a thing. She didn't say anything about it though. Instead she asked him, "Do you want to sit up?"

He frowned deeply. "I can manage it myself." He lifted his neck, shifted his arms... and promptly realized he couldn't. It felt like the entire world were sitting on his chest. Also, everything hurt.

Seeming almost amused or maybe that was fondness in her expression, Alex rolled her eyes at him as she got up and rounded the bed then came to his side while giving him a soft little 'told you so' smile. "Okay, up we go," she said, hooking her arms under his. She used her body weight to drag him upwards along the bed while lifting him toward her—he was surprised at her strength. Grunting a little, she propped him there against the headboard—and there was a fraction of a second when she drew back but without completely retracting her arms from him where they looked each other in the eye and inexplicably remained still. Her hazel eyes caught the lamp light in the room and appearing to be almost amber in color at that moment—he was fascinated, intrigued... and then she pulled away completely, uncomfortable but trying to act as if she were at ease, trying to smile, looking more like she were grimacing. Cas realized that Sam made the same face sometimes. "There's no shame in, uh, asking for a little help now and then, Cas," she told him, attempting a light chuckle. He looked away. No shame? Then why did he feel nothing but?

He glanced at her sidelong. "You must be upset to be left behind."

She seemed surprised by his comment, thought about it for a beat then shrugged in good nature. "Nah, it's okay. I mean, hey. It was my turn to watch over you I guess." She smiled at him, but it was a hesitant, cautious smile. He understood that she was trying to be light and optimistic, but he was so wretched, unable to even sit up by himself—that her attempt only increased his misery. Alex seemed to react poorly to that, and sobered, looking away.

"My only love sprung from my only hate! Too early seen unknown, and known too late!" A young woman was lamenting on the television screen.

Alex huffed and got up abruptly, switching off the TV set, then turned back around with folded arms. Pensive, she cleared her throat, seeming to be unsettled. Finally, she looked at him squarely. "Cas... did I do something wrong?"

Her suddenly emotional tone confused him. "What do you mean?" he asked.

There was a pause. She shifted where she stood restlessly, her eyes dropping away from him. "I just—you've been acting kind of, I dunno, weird toward me since Carthage," she said. The blood in the veins of Castiel's vessel suddenly felt cold—did she somehow know what he had done? "And I just think," she continued, sounding lost, "did I do something to like upset you, or...?" she stopped there and looked at him fearfully, face and body tense as she waited for his reply.

Castiel just looked away and kept his voice and face neutral despite the internal racket of fear and guilt. "No, of course not." It wasn't a lie, but Castiel knew he was lying by avoiding the truth. "When humans want something really, really bad, we lie," Dean had told Cas not long ago. Cas didn't even desire to lie or hide things, especially from her... but he had trapped himself here where it was the only option that remained. He couldn't tell her the reason why he'd been more distant and avoidant was because of what happened in the panic room. She couldn't know about his mistake, his momentary lapse in control. Especially now, considering what he had seen in the future. And yet he could see that it left her thinking she'd done something to push him away—Castiel marveled sorrowfully at the mess he had created. He didn't even know how to fix it, or if that were even possible. He watched her as feelings of misery and loathing went pinging around inside of him.

Alex was chewing on the inside of her mouth—Castiel could tell from the way her cheek hollowed out on the side. "I was really drunk the night before Carthage, okay?" She said, and Cas was perplexed. That wasn't true—she hadn't been drunk, had she? Perhaps just slightly inebriated. "I, uh, don't really even remember most of what happened," she said, and Cas swallowed, felt his teeth grit together, felt his eyes drop down and away from her. "And whatever I might have said..." she continued awkwardly, looking at him as if waiting for him to understand. And suddenly he did. She thought when she had touched his hand… he closed his eyes briefly, and reopened them. Whatever I might have done..." she continued, highly uncomfortable.

He cut her off before she could continue, but he couldn't look at her. "There are no ill feelings, Alex. You did nothing wrong."

She looked at him closely. Did she believe him? Her face was scrunched oddly. "Are you sure?" she asked. "Because you just haven't been... you the past few times I've seen you and I just thought —"

"Of course I'm sure," he all but snapped, hating being stuck sitting on a bed. And he was afraid of what she was asking, of what she might discover if she kept pressing him for answers, he was despising himself for what he had done and the wound he'd inflicted on her without even realizing. She was startled at his tone and sharp look. Cas was startled too and his eyes went down, his voice softened. He tried to find an excuse, another lie. Anything to sweep away the chance of her finding out what he had done, what he had hidden away. "It's… Lucifer… and also my search for God… I can't find answers on either anywhere, and—I'm highly vexed." It wasn't a complete lie, but it still felt like one. Alex seemed to be thinking his answer over and grew sympathetic. Cas felt a wash of shamed, guilty relief.

"So, no luck with the whole God thing," she said and came to sit at the foot of the bed near his feet. The whole God thing. Cas shook his head and pressed his lips together, avoiding her eyes. "He's nowhere to be found."

"But you haven't given up." Neither a question nor a statement. She sounded intrigued.

"I can't give up," he said. There was too much at stake, there was too much at risk. And besides that, there was nothing else left to believe in. Everything else had failed Castiel. Heaven, his brothers and sisters, his own decisions and choices. "He's out there somewhere. I don't know why he's… hiding." His word choice of 'hiding' made him quiet for a moment. Why would his father hide when he was needed so desperately? It would make sense when he finally found God, he told himself. Perhaps it was a part of the design, a test of faith.

Alex looked down at the bedspread with a quietly disturbed expression. "Don't know how you can have so much faith in someone who is refusing to be found."

"Didn't you believe in your father?" Cas questioned. "Even when he went missing?"

Alex looked at him with a caught off guard expression. "Uh... no." She glanced off to the side. "I thought he'd finally just split, honestly." Her chin moved forward a little in an odd expression like reluctance, then her eyes came to look at him uncertainly. She thought a minute longer, not looking at him when she spoke. "My dad and I… he failed me in so, so many ways. How would I have faith in him? When he treated us, me so..." she stopped, swallowed, glanced his way. "I mean... you saw what he tried to do, right? Give me up?" Her words paused him completely.
He realized his mistake, realized that he had temporarily forgotten that pivotal moment that Gabriel had shown Alex: John Winchester talking to Bobby Singer about giving his daughter up into state care—disowning her. He remembered seeing the memory from where he'd been fighting to reach Alex, and at first, not understanding what the two men were arguing about. And when he had understood, he'dfelt a strange hollow horror. A father should protect his child, this was his solemn duty. And Alex had been more vulnerable than most children. Therefore her father should have absolutely protected her, never even considered letting her leave his sight, not even for a moment—Castiel felt something inside him darken as he thought of John Winchester trying to abandon the one who had been entrusted to him.

He looked at Alex now and spoke slowly, frowning, his voice affected by everything he was thinking about. "He never should have even considered... 'giving you up.'"

She looked at him from the edge of her eyes. "Why not?"

Those two words shocked him. "How can you ask that?" he asked in wounded disbelief.

"Because I get it," Alex said darkly. "I was just... a problem and in the way. He didn't want me."

Her voice wavered almost imperceptibly, leaving Cas feeling helpless, wondering why should would assume that or believe that.

"I don't understand," Cas said, looking at her intently—he could feel how wrinkled his forehead was.

Alex looked at him fleetingly, and her jaw working back and forth as she clenched it. She didn't say anything for a long moment. "He drank a lot. He said a lot. The kind of stuff you don't just forget." Her hand gripped bedspread tightly beside her leg, and he thought perhaps she didn't even know she was doing that. "That stuff you saw that Gabriel put me through?" she asked softly. "That wasn't half of it. Not even close." Her voice steadied and she raised her chin then drew a deep breath. "So no. I didn't believe in him when he disappeared... even though we'd kind of been getting closer at the time... I just thought he finally got tired of it all. Of Dean and me and our shit." She looked very small and sad sitting there at the end of the bed. Her shoulders sloped forward a little as she looked at her feet. "I lived my whole life never knowing when he'd be back. If he'd be back." Guilt and pain flashed across her features, and Cas didn't understand why. Alex shook her head, distressed, absenty rubbing the side of her forehead with her fingertips. "He was a good man. I know he was." There was a lot of deeply conflicted emotion in those words. "But I don't think I believed in him. Ever." She paused. "He never believed in me."

Cas was quiet and thinking, regretting what he'd asked her—it had clearly caused her emotional pain. He reflected morosely that he was her guardian and was supposed to keep her safe from harm. But no matter the path he took, it seemed he was cursed, only able to cause her torment and pain. And in the end, in the future... death? For a moment, he couldn't look at her. When he did, she was now peering at him in intent curiosity. "Have you ever even met God, Cas? Dean told me one time that Anna said only a couple angels have ever met him."

"That's true," Cas admitted, understanding the unspoken question, looking down at his hand to the right, waiting for her judgement. "I'm not one of them."

She looked at him in vague surprise. There was a short silence. "No offense but... how can you believe in a guy you've never even met?"

He glanced up at her from the corners of his eyes, reluctant. Her heartfelt question seemed far worse than a flippant insult—which was what he had expected. He let the silence hang for a moment. "It's getting more and more difficult," he admitted grudgingly.
She turned a little, shifting and facing him more now, a hand on her knee, all traces of her former distress replaced by inquisitive curiosity. "So, if you find God, do you think he would actually be up for stopping the whole Michael Lucifer slapping contest? I mean, isn't them facing off part of his grand plan?"

She phrased things strangely, he thought. Similarly to Dean. He felt himself frown as he thought over the question. He then answered truthfully. "I'm not sure. What I believe about that anymore."

He watched her reaction to his words—she blinked a couple times, looked down, her eyes going back and forth slowly. She was thinking, deeply. And so was he now. Trying to quiet the creeping doubt within that God would never be found. He'd searched the world for months now. He was running out of places to look. But God had to be there somewhere, he had to be. He watched Alex now and her eyes snapped back to his—they were an impossible color; every shade of a forest filtered by late afternoon sunlight. As always, they drew him in. "Cas, I need to ask you something and I need you to be honest with me," she said, and her concerned expression alerted him to the fact that what she was asking worried her. "Does Anna have a point?"

He took a moment to understand what she was referring to. "About killing Sam?" Cas paused heavily. "Perhaps."

She frowned, looking at him intently. "That's not what you said when Sam asked you that."

"I didn't want to acknowledge it as an option," Cas said, avoiding her questioning gaze. It was an uncomfortable subject. "I still don't."

She sat back a little, looked at him, her face softening. "When I first met you—you would have killed him without hesitation if you thought it would stop Lucifer."

He glanced at her and thought about how much had changed since then. "That's true," he acknowledged, not sure why it left him conflicted. Commands and orders had been his entire existence, he hadn't questioned the will of Heaven. And now, he did nothing but question it. He let out a long breath through his nose. He felt troubled down to the deepest part of his being. But when he looked up at her again, he forgot the pain for a moment.

A soft smile pulled at Alex's lips and the action softened her entire face. She looked at him in a way he didn't know how to describe and he noticed that the air in the room had grown still, that he could hear his vessel's heart beating in his ears. Cas wanted to know what she was thinking, what made her look at him like that. He didn't have to wonder long, because she spoke as she lowered her chin a little, her eyes falteringingly staying on him. "You've just—you've changed so much," she said, and unlike the way Anna had said it to him earlier—as an insult—Castiel recognized it as a deeply pleased admission, and somehow it caused him to feel pleased, too. Alex was still looking at him with those soft, open eyes, the look on her face giving him the impression that she had something important to say. When she spoke, she said something no one had ever said to him before. "You know what? I'm proud of you, Cas."

He felt a rush of something in his vessel, a visceral spike of instant and pleasant surprise—she was proud of him? He felt lighter somehow, but it quickly faded into confusion, because he was unsure of how she could feel that for him. "Why?"

"Because you've decided to be your own person, make your own choices." She sounded approving and pleased. Which only made him feel rotten inside, vile. If she only knew what choices he'd made—the things exercising free will had caused—she would more than likely not be speaking to him. She would be regarding him with a disdain he fully deserved.
Distracted by thoughts of the panic room, her begging him not to take her memory, he grew sullen and dark. "It was simpler just obeying orders," he said.

She seemed to empathize with him, unaware of his inner struggle. "It always is easier to just do what you're told—but it's not always better."

Castiel looked at her long and hard, wondering about the future Anna had shown him. Wondering if Alex would say this at all if she knew what he had done to her already—how they had kissed each other and admitted feelings they had to each other, how he had taken those memories from her completely. He thought about what the future could lead them to if he didn't stop it now. "How do you know?" he asked slowly, needing to know. "If you're making the right choices?"

She shrugged, not realizing the weight of his question or why he asked it. "A lot of times you don't," she said, then reconsidered. "Most times you don't." She looked at him intensely now. "But this one? Trying to save Sam... find another way to shut down Lucifer... it's the right choice."

"But how do you know it's the right choice?" he asked, thinking of Lucifer alive and well in 2014, of Alex dying in his arms, of Dean unrecognizable and merciless. His eyes flicked onto hers, and he was desperate to know how he could learn whether he were on the right path or not.

"I just do," she said, and the way she said it... he believed that she was certain. And it assured him in a very, very small way, but he was still left hollow and unsure how he could know for himself when a choice was right or not. He felt foolish, a thousands of years old angel of the Lord seeking advice from a twenty-six year old human being. Perhaps she thought him foolish, too, for not knowing how to do things like know right from wrong without someone telling him. But she didn't look like she thought that. Unlike her brother Dean, she never looked at him with deep-seated annoyance or displeasure—not anymore. She used to. He felt a ripple of fear inside as his stomach clenched. Perhaps a future where they were close and intimate wasn't as far off or as impossible as he had assumed. After all, it wasn't long ago at all that she had told him she hated him. But clearly, that had changed.

Disturbed, he stared at his right knee. "How can I know about other choices I have to make? How do I know if they're right?"

She let out a heavy breath, thinking, maybe trying to find a way to explain. Or maybe she didn't know the answer to his question at all. She then spoke, carefully. "You take the days as they come. Do your best to do the right thing," she paused. "And learn to be okay with not always knowing."

She had grown introspective, and was looking at a vague place in front of herself. "Because trust me." Her eyes flicked back to his. "A lot of times... you won't know."

A lot of times, you won't know. How true that was. "It sounds simple when you say it like that," he said, downcast.

"That's the funny thing about life though," she said, but she didn't sound amused or like she found it humorous. "Nothing's ever as simple as it sounds." Cas attempted to shift himself, and grimaced. Concerned, Alex watched him. "Are you in pain?"

"It's tolerable," he said. "If I don't move."

"I'm sorry. If I had known you'd be messed up this bad..." Alex trailed off, paused. "I would have insisted you guys leave me behind."

"I wouldn't have let you stay," Cas said, to which she looked at him, faintly challengingly. But she said nothing and glanced at her watch tensely. Cas looked at his feet sprawled in front of him unmoving on the bed. He was still unable to move and his vessel was exhausted of energy. He should have come alone, taken on Anna himself, not have listened to Dean about bringing them.
Another bad choice, he realized unhappily. He refocused on Alex, who had stood up and was over at the window, peering out. She seemed restless and concerned. "You're worried," Cas said.
"Yeah, what else is new?" Her arms were crossed now and she sighed, sounding resigned. "I've spent my whole life worrying about those two stupid jerks." She said 'stupid jerks' with an odd amount of affection and a sad little smile. Cas frowned, watching her with a confused expression.
"I... don't understand. You used an insulting term—but with a tone that indicates fondness."

Her crooked little smile got a little bigger as she looked at him from the corner of her eye. "Family, friends... they get to do that." She paused, then unexpectedly added, "You ass."

Castiel opened his mouth to ask why she had referred to him as a posterior, then stopped. She was looking at him with a playful expression, trying to press her lips into a straight line, but her smile was evident. Cas felt himself smiling a little, too. Family, friends got to do that. He was smiling more now, and she chuckled, eyes crinkled. He understood. She was implying he was her friend, or perhaps even family, that he was among a special group of people to her. And then, the thought of her dead body in his arms four years into the future flashed in front of his mind's eye, and his smile faltered completely.

There was a sudden knock on the door, and they both looked in unison as a voice called "Housekeeping!" and the door swung open. Panicking at the unexpected intrusion and unable to move, Cas watched helpless as Alex, already half way to the door, was drawing her knife behind her back, hiding it there, ready to attack—the knife still had her blood on it.

"Room's not empty," Alex said, stopping the door halfway with her foot, mostly blocking the newcomer's view into the room.

"Oh, sorry honey!" said the woman. Cas could just see the top of her head and part of her face from in the gap between the door and Alex's arm. "I thought this room was empty," the woman explained, and craning her neck, eyed Cas curiously, then grinned widely, looked at Alex and winked. "Damn, looks like you wore him out good!"

"Uh—yeah, thanks," Alex said, and turned, shut the door in the woman's face and locked it then resheathed the knife, looking a lot less amused than she had a minute ago.

Cas tried to decipher the woman's meaning, looked at Alex intently. "That woman. What did she mean you... 'wore me out good'?

Alex looked at him and from her expression, he was surprised she didn't ask 'are you serious?'
Instead, she pursed her lips and looked to her left. "Umm, well, this is the honeymoon suite," she said, eyes darting around, expression strange. Cas's frown deepened. He didn't understand what that meant, and Alex gave him a testy look, expelled a huff, tried to explain again. "She, uh, thought we were... that we had... I guess, you know." Cas waited. No—he didn't know. "Had sex, Cas," Alex said, exasperated, her ears and cheeks a little redder than they had been a moment before. He was silent and she folded her arms again, became sarcastic as her cheeks grew even redder. "You know what sex is, right?"

Cas gave her a hooded glance. He had existed for thousands and thousands of years—of course he knew what it was. And immediately after thinking that, he remembered the image he'd seen of Alex and himself in the future, her on his lap, her legs on either side of his legs, their arms wrapped around each other, hands on each other, no space between their bodies, his hand skimming upwards along the front of her body... it struck him as being intensely sexual, and gazing at her now, he felt a strange sense of embarrassment. His skin began to feel hot all over. Unintentionally, he wondered what might have happened next in that cut-short moment Anna had shown him... would they have kissed more and then... would they have...? He swallowed, intensely uncomfortable without any warning and unable to look even in Alex's direction because he was oddly humiliated as his mind went to a place he hadn't wanted it to. He tried not to think of it, not to imagine it, not to wonder about it. Sex. With her.

Sex was an activity which most human beings participated in—it was a means of reproduction and a source of physical pleasure, or so he'd gathered—but more than that he understood it to be an expression of emotional and physical love. He hadn't thought about it much before; he had never quite understood the more intimate details of the act, nor had he cared to. Not before. Now, he felt a growing curiosity about it, and discomfort at the realization that he felt that way.

In Heaven it was said that sex was something God had created for humans to express love, but Castiel had observed that idea wasn't always true. Many humans had sex with complete strangers—he almost had, thanks to Dean's insistence. Cas remembered that woman—Charity? That prostitute woman at the strip club. He had watched this loose woman, completely detached, as she had said strange things to him about what she planned to do to his body. She had pushed his coat off his shoulder, licked him on his neck. He remembered frowning, wondering why she was tasting him and if the act was supposed to be pleasurable or evocative. His vessel hadn't reacted at all to her, not positively. Not how it reacted to the woman standing across him in this room right now, he realized, and finally looked at Alex again, hoping she would never know the extent of his sinful thoughts. She seemed to feel his eyes and met his gaze guardedly. Just her eyes meeting his made his vessel react. He wanted so much to not be affected this way, to be so under the influence of her presence.

"Yeah, uh, awkward, right?" she commented dryly on his continued silence, then rubbed the back of her neck self-consciously, trying to smile but grimacing instead. "Hey, so, let's not mention that to Dean. Ever."

He heard her, but he was distracted by thoughts of the future, fears of what it would bring. Did he possess the ability to change it? He felt able to when he was away from her, but in moments like this where she was close and in his atmosphere, he wasn't so sure he could resist forever. He'd already proved to himself that he was weak enough to stumble—the panic room. And he'd seen a future where he'd obviously given in and paid the ultimate price. The loss of Alex, the girl he was sworn to protect. He looked at her out of the corner of his eye, seeking an answer he wasn't sure she could give him. "If you knew the future were certain... unchangeable... would you still try to stop it?" he asked. Her immediate response was to make an almost cynically amused face.

"Uh, yeah. I mean, look at my friggin' life right now. Lucifer, Michael...? Everyone says it's gonna happen, that it's fate, that it's already a done deal." She stopped, stared at the wall in front of her blankly. "Everyone except Dean and Sam."

Cas frowned. She'd neglected to mention herself. "What about you?" he asked.

She glanced at him again, grim. "I'll do whatever it takes to keep it from happening. You know that." Her jaw was tight, her voice was hollow. "I can't lose them." She looked afraid. He could see it in her tense shoulders, the rigid lines between where her eyebrows pushed together, her fingers nervously pressed flat against her legs as she stood still. He remembered seeing this same fear in her as long as he could remember. The fear that she would lose her brothers and have nothing. He considered telling her that even if they left, he would remain. But he felt it was a reassurance he couldn't offer her. There was a long silence, and Alex sank to the bed again as she breathed out heavily. She sat rigidly near his feet and stared into middle distance.

Cas watched her unchanging profile. He was helpless and weak and realizing that this was the reason he refused to give Sam over to Lucifer. Because it would offset a chain of events that would realize Alex's worst fears. And also, Sam was his friend—Dean was his friend. The three Winchesters were the first and only friends he'd had. He didn't want to see them used or manipulated. He didn't want to see his brothers Michael and Lucifer destroy each other and the world along with it. It gave him enough sorrow that his brothers were being made to kill each other, but the fact that it had to be her brothers in the balance… made it even worse for Cas.

He looked around the room now, frustrated, searching for an answer. All he saw were hearts and roses all over everything in the room. The sight of them irked him greatly and he felt a scowl on his face. "These heart shapes are inaccurate," he muttered, and surprisingly, Alex looked at him, a strangely amused expression on her face, the pensive look fading away. She seemed to think of something, stuck her pointer finger up then swung it down.

"That reminds me." She stood up and went to the dresser, grabbing a small square thing off of it. She pulled little cards out of the little box and sat down, this time not on the edge of the bed, but in the middle of it, only arm's length away from him. She sat cross-legged. "The greatest pastime ever invented: a deck of playing cards," she said, shuffling the cards expertly. They made pleasing little papery sounds. She glanced at him doubtfully, pausing. "Do you know how to play poker?"

Cas looked from the cards to her in all seriousness. "Gambling is sinful."

She stopped completely, looked at him oddly. "Well, so is murder and we do that all the time." He looked at her blankly. She gave him a look as she looked down at the cards. "I've seen you get smitey a time or two." She glanced back at him from underneath her eyelashes. "So cards can't be that bad, right?"

Cas was silent, unsure. Alex began dealing cards, gave him a little smile, and his unease faded. "We'll play Go Fish instead," she told him.

"So weird how this was in the honeymoon suite though," Alex said, and moved her game piece to a purple square, then cringed. "Stuck in the molasses swamp, as usual," she muttered and sighed.

Cas drew another card from the deck and looked to see what color he got. He looked so at ease and unlike the Cas she was used to—he was relaxed, eyes not squinted up, eyebrows not furrowed. He really seemed to be into the board game. They'd played Go Fish for a few rounds and Cas had complained (well, stated, but she called it complaining) about the lack of fish imagery in the game, said it with such serious concern. She'd laughed at the comment, then poked around the room and found, of all things, Candy Land in one of the drawers of the dresser—and the remains of some weed, too. Welcome to the seventies, she'd thought to herself.

Cas was now propped onto his side, his head resting in the palm of his hand—he seemed a little stronger than before, but not much—he moved his piece to a red square, just a few squares away from the 'home sweet home' square. "I'm winning," he said, and looked at her with an almost sly smile on his face.

Alex gave him an overly-dramatic challenging look from where she sat across from him. "Don't be too confident, buddy." She turned over her newest card and then smirked. It was a blue card, freeing her from the swamp and taking her forward, one square ahead of his. She smirked triumphantly at him and he drew another card, then looked at her, raised his eyebrows… and showed her the yellow card, moving his piece to the 'home sweet home' square.

And then he surprised her completely by making a face like she had a minute ago. "You shouldn't be so confident… buddy," he parroted her, and it sounded hilarious and kinda stilted coming out of his mouth. Alex dissolved into giggles (which didn't happen—ever). She could barely see because her eyes squinted up so much as the giggles turned to full on laughter—he looked so funny—propped there like that, his face in his hand like a little damn kid, looking so pleased that he'd won the dumb game. Her guardian angel, the Candy Land champ. It was in, one word: cute. She shook her head, still laughing.

She wiggled her eyebrows at him. "Care to go double or nothing?" she asked, then he looked slightly confused and she laughed again. "I mean, want to play again?"

Understanding flashed across his features, then enthusiasm. "Yes, again," he said, and moved their pieces back to the beginning as Alex grabbed up the color cards and shuffled them quickly. This was bizarre, to say the least—playing a kid's board game with her wounded angel, but it also felt so good because he wasn't holding her at arm's length, looking at her like the spawn of Satan. Maybe it was just for today or now, but they were okay again, and it made her feel good, safe, better about everything. Encouraged that they could be friends again.

Alex finished shuffling the cards and noticed that Cas was staring at her arm—at the cut on her arm where the blood was congealed. It wasn't super visible, just the end of it from beneath where her shirt sleeve was rolled up, but his smile had faded, and his eyes flicked up to hers. "You shouldn't have used your blood for the sigil," he said, suddenly perturbed.

Alex wasn't sure what he was getting at. "Why not?"

"You could have used mine," he said, and Alex made a face like she didn't understand how he could suggest that. Did he forget he had been bleeding and unconscious and had frightened the living daylights out of her because he'd been bleeding? And he thought she'd just merrily slice into him for some more blood? It was almost funny, except not really. "Uh, Cas, I wasn't gonna cut you open—no way."

He looked unruffled, in fact, a little pissed. "So you cut yourself instead."

Alex frowned, then got a little defensive. "It's just a little cut, Cas." It hurt like a bitch but she wasn't going to admit that. Instead she just raised her eyebrows, trying to sound confident and like she didn't really care. "Do you know how many times I've had to bleed doing what I do?"

His eyes met hers. "Too many." And her air of confidence faded just like that. Cas's protectiveness of her had sometimes made her feel angry, like he thought she was weak or stupid, but those two words carried so much empathy and sadness. Like he hated the fact that she hurt, not that he thought she were a delicate, wilted flower.

She looked away. When he said things like this to her… she couldn't help the way she felt. "Well, I did it to protect us," she said stiffly, and his somewhat stern expression faded.

Alex put the Candy Land cards down, staring at nothing blankly. "I think Lucifer is inside my head," she blurted suddenly. Castiel's expression went cold and Alex fumbled verbally. "Or, or something."

"What do you mean?" he asked intently, and he suddenly looked every bit the Cas that had stood at the edge of a circle of holy fire and stared the devil down.
Alex wasn't sure why she'd just blurted that out—she hadn't told anyone about it, had been too freaked out about it, hoped it would stop or go away... she folded up Candy Land, moved it and the cards to the side, anything to avoid looking at him—

"Tell me, Alex," he insisted, voice deeper than she remembered.

Alex finally looked at him. If she were going to tell anyone, it should be him. "I've been having this recurring dream," she said waveringly, trying not to sound as freaked out as it made her feel. "Since the night before we tried to kill him."

"What is the dream?" he asked, dangerous, intense, needing to know.

Alex wet her lips with her tongue, trying to figure out how to word it, because it was mostly feelings more than images. There really were no images actually, just the vague shadowy interior of the panic room. She frowned deeply. "It's... so strange. I'm in the panic room every time. At first I feel… weird. Like, out in the open? Like I've let a secret out or said something I wasn't supposed to. But then I feel good. Safe... really, really happy. But then it cuts short and there's this horrible fear and I want to run away, but something is like… pinning me down? That's the worst part. The feeling of being trapped." She stopped a minute, thinking about how awful the feeling was. "And then I wake up." She looked at Cas, whose expression seemed even colder, more fearful than before—like he feared the worst, and Alex's stomach turned in anxiety—if it scared him, how bad was it? But he said nothing. Alex waited, but he still said nothing. "That weird dream, plus the way he just, called me to him—could he be inside my mind?" No reply. "I mean, how could he be, right? But—maybe? Did he leave a mark, or...?"

Cas was shaking his head, his expression stony. "No, I don't—I don't think it's possible."

"But what if it is?" she asked, starting to sound as desperate and afraid as she felt. "I mean would you even know?"

He avoided looking at her, seeming to be thinking hard. His jaw was tense. "I'll find out. How Lucifer did what he did," he sounded grave and distracted. "But... I don't think that's him inside your mind."

"Well what else could it be?" Alex demanded, starting to fear the worst the more she talked about it out loud. "It started the night of Carthage," she reminded him. That, to her, was the biggest indicator. She looked at him: he was her last resort, her only way of really knowing. "Just, test me or something. For a mark or a devil tracking device, I don't know. Please Cas."

He seemed reluctant, but then after a couple seconds, raised his hand, placing it on her shoulder. He closed his eyes and his face twisted in deep concentration like thought, he remained like that for about ten seconds. Ten seconds in which Alex just stared at the knot of his tie, trying to regulate her breathing. Just stuck feeling his hand on her shoulder—large, warm, heavy. She had forgotten how his very touch was enough to undermine her. He finally opened his eyes, frowning, looked at her. "Nothing," he said. His hand moved just slightly down, to the curve of her shoulder instead of the top even as the frown softened, his expression becoming unreadable and intense. His eyes were bluer than any sky she'd ever seen. And then he took his hand away and said nothing. The loss of his touch was disappointing.

He looked like something was hurting him, maybe physically, and Alex moved her head to try and see him better. "You okay?" she asked, looking at him closely.

His eyes slid her direction, but remained downcast. "I'm fine," he replied wearily.
Alex, didn't think she believed him, but let it go, shook her head, at a loss, plagued by thoughts of Lucifer. If it wasn't some kind of mark inside, how? Any of it? "I just need to know why it's happening. If it means something," Alex said, plaintive. If Cas couldn't help her, could anyone?
She waited a couple seconds, then quietly sighed, deeply distressed. "I haven't even told Sam or Dean about it." She wasn't sure why she'd said that out loud, but it got his attention.

He once again met her gaze, deeply surprised. "Why not?"

Alex took a second, thinking about it, not totally sure. Then she shrugged shallowly. "They have enough problems of their own right now. If this isn't something… I don't wanna worry them."
There was a heavy pause. "But… if it is something…" she trailed off, not sure what she was going to say. She had propped an elbow on her knee and had her forehead in her hand now, tired. Drained.

Cas was pushing himself up a little into a sitting position, grimacing. He leaned against the headboard, arms at his sides, head turned to look at her. He looked serious. "I won't let Lucifer have you. Or Sam." He paused, looked down, suddenly disconcerted. "I suppose that's not very reassuring, looking at me right now."

Alex smiled to herself unexpectedly. Cas was so very ashamed of his current condition, and it showed—and maybe she should have felt really bad for him, but seeing him vulnerable and uncertain just drew her to him more. She almost felt protective of him in that moment. "No. It's… I believe you, Cas." She paused, looking at him through veiled eyes, realizing how much she owed him as she thought about everything. Not just Dean's life, but Sam's too. She felt a surge of realization that this angel in front of her—all he did was give to her and her family. How could they ever repay him, even a little? Maybe with a thank you. So, she did her best, even though she felt a little awkward verbalizing it.

"Hey, so, it meant a lot that you weren't willing to help Lucifer find Sam that night, you know. I—I didn't think you would continue to say no like you did." She hadn't. And when he had, with her life on the line… she'd been so proud of him. Scared shitless too, but proud.

In response to her praise, he seemed to grow even more despondent and maybe a little angry, too.
"It was an impossible situation to be put into," he said starkly. "I only got you out of Carthage with fifty-six seconds to spare."

Alex felt her eyebrows raise up a little. Had it really been that close to midnight, to when Lucifer said she'd drop dead if she wasn't out of town? She hadn't realized. That was a close call. "Well, we got out though, right?" she asked, attempting to be optimistic.

Cas didn't look at her. "Barely." He looked guilty and conflicted and Alex suddenly realized something, tilted her head to the side. This was the exact same kind of crap Dean put himself through constantly. She felt sad to see Cas doing the exact same thing.

"Don't blame yourself for things that didn't even happen," she told him gently.

His eyes snapped to hers. "Lucifer had you there." He looked almost angry again. "That happened." He was angry now. "He could have killed you, Alex, and I wouldn't have been able to do anything. I barely saved your life as it was." His jaw clenched, he looked away, his expression foul. "And look at me now. Helpless again."

Alex stared at him speechlessly as he got quiet stared off at the floor unseeingy. He looked so frustrated, and she knew the feeling, but still. Whenever he got angry like that, his eyes blazing with a quiet fire that promised retribution, she always mentally took a step back, remembered how powerful he was, how he could devastate his enemies with just a touch... all while he walked the earth in the body of a man. She was pretty sure Sam and Dean didn't quite see him as she did, they seemed to underestimate him or maybe they were just too distracted with the craziness of reality to think much about it. Alex paused. Sam and Dean.

She checked her watch and her stomach clenched. It was almost eleven at night. Crap. This was not good. Dean said he'd call by ten. She glanced at the phone beside the bed, her instincts buzzing with foreboding. "Something's wrong," she muttered, and turned, got up, suddenly incredibly antsy. If I don't call you by ten, if we don't come back, come looking. Dean's words to her earlier that day.

She turned to Cas, who had started frowning at her the second she'd said that something was wrong. She looked at him apprehensively, knowing what she had to do. He wasn't going to like it, and she was pretty sure he would have to stay put, which he'd like even less. He was sprawled there on the heart-covered comforter like a sad rag doll. "Cas—I've gotta go find them. They've been gone too long—are you able to move?"

He looked at her, shocked, then frowning even deeper than before. "You can't go alone."

She was already snatching her jacket up off the floor where it had fallen earlier, shrugging it on, giving him a 'no, duh' look. "That's why I asked if you could move," she said. "Can you?"

He struggled a minute, pushing himself up further into a sitting position—then collapsing back against the headboard weakly. The worst part was the little weak groan he let out.

"So, no," Alex said, grim, glancing around the room. She didn't want to leave him just sitting there, unable to move or defend himself—but she literally had to go find Sam and Dean. Cas watched her finish adjusting her jacket. He looked incredibly unhappy. She'd feel the same if she couldn't move or walk or do anything. Hell, she'd been there a few times actually, stuck and wounded and left behind.

"I won't be long," she told him. "I'll be back as soon as I find them." She turned to leave, but the sound of his voice stopped her in her tracks.

"Wait."

She turned around. He looked at her pensively. She walked over to him, watching as he reached inside of his trench coat, wincing, and withdrew something—a gleaming silver angel blade. "Take this," he said, and held it out to her.

She stared in shock, then shook her head. "I—I can't leave you without a weapon—" she protested. Cas held it out further. "Take it."

"Wait—I thought you gave Sam your blade," she said. He shook his head slightly. "I gave Sam Uriel's blade. This one... is mine." He held it out even further to her, handle first, the sharp end pointed at himself. And Alex was struck by how important this moment must be. He was letting her have the only thing that could kill him, the only thing that could defend him against other angels.

She looked from him to the blade. "Are you sure?" she asked. It felt like too much to accept.

"Take it," he repeated, holding her gaze. Alex looked from his eyes to the handle of the blade in his hand. She gave in, reached out, her hand closing over the handle, fingers brushing against the ends of his as she took it. The blade was surprisingly light and cool to the touch, almost seemed to hum with an energy against her skin. Just holding it was incredibly intimidating.
Her eyes flickered to his, doubtful.

His eyes were already looking into hers. "Anna is very fast," he said in quiet grimness. "Alex, be careful."

At that remark, she couldn't help but smirk a little as she slipped the blade into the inside pocket of her jacket. "Always am."

"No," he said grumpily, "you're not."

Maybe that shouldn't have made her smile, but it did a little. The smile faded fast though when she took in his clear dismay and fear. She felt her stomach clench a little bit as she thought about the danger and uncertainty of their situation. It was dizzying and overwhelming, really: Dean and Sam, missing, Cas down for the count, a powerful angel named Anna somewhere out there bent on killing her parents and/or Sam. In all the time that had passed already, she thought of how much could have already happened, terrible possibilities and scenarios played out in her mind's eye. She made herself stop, because if she let her mind go there, she'd panic. Days like this she had to think how impressive it was that she wasn't in a crazy house somewhere. Alex zipped her jacket and pulled her hair out of the collar, to the side. She couldn't waste any more time. So she put on a brave face and nodded once at Cas. "I'll be back," she said, and turned, went to the door.

She paused there, looked back as her hand came to rest on the doorknob. Cas was looking at her in intense discomfort. He didn't want her to go. It was written all over his face. And she realized that she really, really wished she didn't have to leave him there all alone, but what choice did she have? Sam and Dean might need help, might be dead for all she knew. Or, Dean might just not have been able to find a phone. Leaving Cas defenseless seemed risky, but not going and finding her brothers was risky too. For a second, Alex wondered if this were the right thing to do. Cas had asked her earlier about how to know when you were making the right choices. And this was one of those times when you just didn't know.

Conflicted, Alex took in a deep breath, turned. And then walked out the door.
The instant the door closed behind Alex, Cas suddenly had a rush of fear and resistance and had struggled again to sit up further, driven by the need to be able to function again and now. He foolishly hoped he would suddenly, miraculously be able to move and subsequently be able to go with her to make sure she was safe. But it was the same as before—the vessel pinged in pain all over, refusing to move. He let out the softest growl of frustration, barely able to contain the defeat he was feeling. He felt miserable and pathetic, completely inept, and Alex was out there alone. Completely alone.

In all his centuries he had never experienced such a sensation of utter failure. Nothing was working as it was supposed to, and it wasn't just limited to his vessel. He couldn't hear the celestial whispers that Dean referred to as 'angel radio.' Castiel now regretted listening to Dean and bringing the Winchesters back with him. He might have stood a chance at taking Anna on by himself. But he had foolishly listened to Dean and given in to his demands, thus endangering them all. There was a dark thought lurking at the edge of his mind that Anna might have already killed Sam and Dean both, and Cas had just let Alex go after them, perhaps to walk straight into a trap. The thought made him horrified at himself. He had placed them all in mortal jeopardy with his choice to listen to Dean's wishes. What had he done? He cursed himself internally.

Cas had wanted to command Alex not to go after them, not yet, and not alone—the danger was too great. He might have done so in the past. But now he knew Alex well enough to recognize when she had made up her mind. So he'd done the only thing left to do: sent with her a small part of himself, his blade. It was only a small hope of defending herself against Anna, but it was better than nothing.

Castiel thought again of her face as she took his blade with so much hesitation, then almost reverence, like she'd almost understood in a small way the significance of the gesture. Alex didn't know this—how could she, humans knew nothing of the sacred nature of the angel blade—but angels didn't give away their blades. Ever. They didn't loan them out. Each angel received only one, and only forfeited it upon death. Each blade was connected to its angel, and the angel to the blade. To give a blade away was considered an abomination. Castiel was sure that if his brothers and sisters in Heaven could see him now they would be shocked about how many rules he had broken in favor of helping the Winchesters. In favor of protecting Alex.

Cas struggled again, painstakingly pulling his legs over the edge of the bed. He felt such an acute sense of urgency. The reality of the risk to her life was pressing on him greater than before, and he needed to be where he could see her and know she wasn't in immediate danger. Refusing to accept his weakened state, he groaned in pain, pushing himself up with all of his strength, attempting to stand. He fell forward onto all fours, shaking from exertion.

2010

Dean stumbled, almost falling sideways—jolted by suddenly being sent forward in time, back to the future. He saw that he was in the motel room they'd been in before when they'd left for 1978… his mind was left to reel from what had just happened, but mostly, he had to know Sam was okay—because a minute ago he'd been dead, Anna had killed him and—"Dean," came a voice, and there was a big hand on his shoulder. Dean turned in dumbfounded shock to see Sam there, looking just as confused as Dean was. Overwhelmed with relief, Dean grabbed his brother and hugged him tight. Sam didn't really hug back, he seemed disoriented, and when Dean let go, Sam was looking around the motel room in a daze. "What happened?" Sam asked. "I was—we were in seventy-eight and—Anna—she stabbed me and... I remember..." His look of confusion transformed into realization. "Did I die?"

Dean looked away, disturbed. "Yeah, you did. Anna killed you."

"Explain." Sam demanded intensely, almost threateningly.

Dean thought it over—it was a jumble in his mind, too—the entire thing—and it was pissing him off. "Okay, so Anna stabs you... you fall over dead in front of me... then Michael shows up, ganks Anna, makes Uriel go poof—"

Sam looked like he'd misheard. "Michael?"

Dean glanced at Sam broodingly. "He was using Dad as his meatsuit. Great, right?"

Sam's look of sheer disbelief and shock summed up Dean's feelings on the whole deal. Smirking humorlessly, Dean began to pace back and forth in front of his brother. "Yeah, I know. He said all this BS about the bloodline, how Dad was a vessel and not the vessel, how free will is an illusion... I'm destined to say 'yes'... blah blah blah. Then he fixed you, sent us back." Dean paused, stopping mid-step, suddenly realizing something. His stomach dropped, his heart clenched. He suddenly couldn't breathe. "Shit. Crap!" He looked at Sam in horror, then around the empty motel room, whirling completely, frenzied in his search.

"What?" Sam asked.

Dean looked at his brother in breathless terror. "Alex isn't here, Sam! She's still in nineteen seventy-eight! With Cas!"

Cold realization flashed across Sam's face, then anger. "Dean!" Sam exclaimed. "How?! Michael zapped you back too fast for you to tell him, oh yeah, my sister's here too, could you give her a ride back?!"

Hackles raising at Sam's blaming tone, Dean grew confrontational. "Michael was in my head man, I blanked for a minute!"

"You mean you forgot about her!" Sam corrected accusingly, shaking his head in abject horror.

At that comment Dean went cold, feeling like he'd been caught. Instead of admitting that Sam was right, he considered punching Sam in the nose. "I told you we should've left Cas alone, taken Alex with us!" He raged.

Sam held up two hands defensively, raised his eyebrows at Dean. "So now this is my fault?"

Dean ignored his brother's question and turned around, trying to see straight. Had he made the biggest mistake of his life by leaving Alex with Cas? How the actual hell was he supposed to get her back here? She was thirty-two years into the past for God's sake! Behind him, Sam seemed to have calmed down a little bit. "Listen Dean," he reasoned tensely. "I'm sure when Cas wakes up, he'll bring her back."

Turning abruptly, hostile, Dean stared hard at his brother. "And what if he doesn't wake up, Sam, huh? What then?"
Sam lost bravado, clearly realizing Dean had a point.

"I knew I shouldn't have let her out of my sight, dammit—" Dean knocked a lamp off the dresser beside him, repeating, louder, "dammit!" and trying to think, just think what he could do now, if anything. He was literally at the end of his rope. In total desperation, not sure if it would go through or what, Dean stood there, glared at the ceiling. "Cas!" he shouted. "Cas! Can you hear me you bastard? You bring my sister back to me right now!" There was a long pause, and nothing happened. "Cas?" Dean repeated, but with less power, more fear. Nothing. Dean looked at Sam, who could barely meet his eyes. Quickly crumbling, fearing the worst, Dean sank to one of the beds. "Jesus Christ, Sam. What the hell are we supposed to do?"

---

1978

Exhausted, Alex opened the motel room door and froze—Cas was standing (just barely) and gripping the dresser with both hands, looking like he was about to fall over. He looked up and saw her, his face washing over from pained exertion to relief. Alex was shutting the door behind her, already halfway over to him. "Cas! What are you doing?"

He wobbled a little, gripping the dresser tighter. "I was... preparing to come after you," he said, sounding disconcerted.

"On what legs?" Alex asked, dumbfounded—he looked like he was going to fall any second and her hands kind of hovered out in front of her near him, just waiting for him to topple over.

In response to her question, he looked down, then back at her questioningly. "Uh... these legs."

Alex, drained both emotionally and physically, shook her head, grabbing his arm and pulling it over her shoulder. "Cas—come on. You need to sit back down—" she said. He seemed unable to control himself very well, leaning on her weightily, his feet shuffling oddly as she took her other arm and wrapped it securely around his back and waist, basically supporting him completely as she walked him over to the bed. She grunted from the effort—he was heavy. She left for one hour and he was trying to kill himself by trying to come after her... when he was clearly not even able to stand unassisted! Unbelievable. She didn't need him risking his ass for her like that and it pissed her off that he would try it.

Cas, a little dazed, was looking at her—she could tell because his voice was right in her ear. "You're much stronger than you look," he said, and sounded slightly surprised.

She just looked at him sideways, tone bordering on annoyed. "That's what I've been trying to tell you," she said as they reached the bed. She helped him sit as he'd been before, leaning against the headboard, upright. His legs were still off the edge of the bed, dangling limply, but Alex had gone kind of catatonic, staring at nothing in particular.

"What did you discover?" Cas asked, looking at her intently.

Alex looked at him again and her expression was foul. "A whole lot of nothing. The house was empty and dark, no one was there. They either went somewhere or..." she trailed off. Agitated and fearful, she yanked her jacket off, threw it toward a knob on the wall. It missed. She reacted by bowing her forehead into the palm of her right hand, shutting her eyes, heaving a frustrated, overwhelmed breath. Her eyes flew back open when she felt his hand close gently around her left wrist. Cas was looking up at her with an intense, questioning expression—concern. The anger and helplessness faded a little, replaced by something else: fear.
Alex swallowed, feeling more vulnerable and afraid than she had in awhile. She looked at his hand there, closed around her slender wrist. Then back into his eyes, despairing. "Where are they Cas?" she asked, desperate for an answer. There was a long pause and she sounded scared and small to herself when she spoke again. "Was I too late? Are they...?" she couldn't verbalize her fear that they were dead.

She just wanted so desperately for Cas to tell her no, it wasn't too late, they were alive, not to worry. But Cas's hand dropped away, his gaze went into the middle distance in front of him, his jaw flexed tensely. "I don't know."

His answer seemed to make her chest tighter than before, and she felt a surge of hopelessness overcome her. She stared down at his legs as they hung awkwardly over the side of the bed. Almost angrily she bent and grabbed them, half-pushed half-hauled them up until they were in front of him on the bed, then she wordlessly walked away from the bed a couple steps, agitated, caged, at the end of her rope. She needed answers, she needed to know what was going on, she needed her friggin' brothers to be okay, safe and sound—but she had jack squat to show for her search, no clue if they were alive or dead or what. She'd done it in record time too, Dean would have been proud of how fast she'd found John Winchester in the phone book, hot-wired a car, driven the fifteen minutes across town. She'd been ready for a fight, to face down an enemy... but had found nothing. And the whole time she'd been out there, she'd been worrying about what if she found Sam and Dean in dead piles on the ground—what if she got back to the motel and found that Anna had come and killed Cas, who had been left defenseless without his blade. Crap, the blade. She'd forgotten.

She turned back around. Cas was watching her and she could see that he was worried, and maybe a little affronted, too. She'd slung his legs down kind of aggressively without explanation, like she was mad at him. She wanted to explain to him—as usual—because that pleased little look he got when he understood was one of the best things she could think of—but she felt like if she opened her mouth, all the pent up emotions she was holding inside: fear, anger, self-doubt would spill out into the open. So, wordlessly, she went back to the bedside and took the angel blade from where she'd had it in a belt loop behind her. In her hand, the cool metal seemed to buzz with an incorporeal energy and strength. She held it out to him, thought about saying a thank you, but that didn't seem like enough. He took it silently, then he laid it beside him on the bed, didn't even look at it. She followed the blade with her eyes, perplexed, then looked at him.

"We'll find them," he said, and his words surprised her, caused her to go totally still. She looked at him, feeling bare under his gaze, wanting to believe him, but not sure if she could allow herself to. Guilt and regret washed over her.

"I should've gone with them," she managed brokenly, so miserable and torn. Suddenly feeling like she just couldn't stand up anymore, she sank down, sitting on the edge of the bed, next to his waist, her feet remaining flat on the floor. She felt like she was going to suffocate or implode. "I'm so tired of feeling this way," she managed to say as she stared at her knees. "Like any friggin' choice I make doesn't matter in the end." She tried to laugh at herself, but lacked the energy. She could only let out a weak breath of air. "I made this big speech to Dean and Sam after the whole Gabriel thing and... about how I wasn't going to be a bystander, but look. I am. I always am." There was a heavy pause, where Alex had to fight away tears. "And they might be dead now. They might be dead."

"We'll find them, Alex." Cas repeated.

Alex looked at him challengingly. "How?"
His gaze faltered away. He thought hard and he seemed unsure at first. "In the morning. We'll go look together."

Alex resisted the urge to roll her eyes. "You can barely even sit up," she pointed out, a little harsher than she meant to.

Hurt flashed across his eyes and Alex immediately regretted it. "I know," he replied, and again looked away, unhappy. "I'm sorry. I've failed you."

Alex felt a surge of indignant anger at his words. "You've failed me?" she repeated. How could he think that? After all the stuff he'd done for her family, all the sacrifices and hell even dying for them? She felt insulted somehow that he would say he was a failure, and her temper was short as it was. "You haven't failed me, Cas," she told him angrily. "Everything you've done for me and my brothers is the opposite of that." It was all nice stuff to say, but she said it so aggressively, almost bitterly, that it lost any grateful tone it might have had. And before she could stop herself, she sealed the deal with one final bitchy comment. "You haven't failed me, so just cram the pity party, okay?"

Cas looked at her with a strange, wounded expression, didn't say anything for a couple of long seconds. "You sound like Dean."

Those four words somehow seemed to jab her in the gut, brought on a guilt-trip. She sounded like Dean? Dean who talked down to Cas? Dean who rolled his eyes at Cas? Dean who didn't treat Cas with respect or trust? Alex was appalled at herself and suddenly grasping for a way to explain herself. "I didn't mean—" she shook her head, out of words. "I'm sorry… I just..." she just what? She couldn't find the words and looked down, remorseful.

"You're upset," he stated grimly, and she looked at him again. He was looking at his feet. "I understand."

She realized in genuine surprise that he was right—and how mature, how intuitive that seemed of him—but he looked so miserable, so personally offended, that it momentarily made Alex want to jump off the planet. She was a jerk. She gritted her teeth together. This is why conversations were so hard and why sometimes she just wanted to give up on them completely—she got so caught up in her emotions sometimes that she didn't stop to think about what she was saying or what it would do to the involved party. She tried to think of a way to explain herself to him.

"Yeah, I'm upset… not upset with you though," Alex tried falteringly, wishing she could take back the thoughtless comments. She could almost see the wheels of his mind turning with self-loathing and she tried to catch his gaze. "How could I be mad at you?" she asked. "I mean… after everything? And today you gave me your damn angel blade, Cas..." she didn't have to pretend—she literally was still floored by the gesture. More hesitant now, she looked away. "I kind of can't get over that."

"I couldn't go with you." He just clenched his jaw. "You needed it."

She studied him from the corner of her eye a minute longer. "It left you totally defenseless," she said, and he met her sidelong gaze with a hooded glance of his own.

His eyes flickered down, but then met hers again. "I wanted you to have it."

Her heart clenched with an unfamiliar warmth, as she felt like she heard all the things he didn't say just then. She had gotten the feeling that he valued her safety over his own in the past, but today, he'd proved that all over again. She felt largely undeserving and caught off guard, like, how the hell... did I end up with this guardian angel who would give his life for me? It was a huge, frightening thought and it made her feel a thousand things all at once. But the biggest one was a growing sense of trust and… she could barely keep his gaze now… love. Her heart twisted up, her pulse hammered. Her entire body seemed to go on high alert as she realized how much she felt for him, and not just fleeting little confused feelings or shallow attraction. No. Genuine, deep, unmoving things. That word she'd thought just a minute ago. Love. Her confusion levels skyrocketed. How long had she felt like this?

"What's wrong?" Castiel asked, frowning in unease, his head tilting to the side at her silence.

She realized her face had frozen in an odd expression as she'd gotten lost in thought. Covering, she quickly flashed a nervous grin. "I, uh… just… thinking how I have the best guardian angel ever," she told him sloppily—and it was a sentiment she did feel—but said in a light tone that didn't reveal exactly how deep that feeling went.

His eyes slid to hers again, sullen. "You're attempting to compliment me," he stated. "But I don't deserve it." Alex looked at him with perplexed concern. He heaved a heavy sigh, staring ahead of himself unseeingly, a deep frown etched across his handsome features. "I'm a poor example of an angel. Attempting to serve a God I can't find. Heaven has cast me down. I've made… bad choices. Bringing the three of you here being one of them." He still wouldn't look at her. "I'm not the best anything."

She didn't agree. Not at all. And without thinking she leaned forward, grabbed his forearm. His eyes snapped up to hers. "You're the best angel I've ever met," she insisted intensely, then lost a little confidence as his brilliant blue eyes bored into hers. She'd grabbed him without thinking—should she let go, if this was overstepping his boundaries? Would this upset him like when she'd touched his hand at Bobby's? He just looked at her silently, frowning vaguely. And she didn't move her hand. However, it was harder to breathe now. "I mean maybe I haven't met a lot of angels, but I mean… still." She paused, voice softening. "You're the best one." She looked at his hand on her arm. He was looking at her hand, too, and Alex realized how damn quiet the room was and how uncomfortable it had become. His gaze was so intense and soft all at once and she wanted to kiss him so badly. Instead she stood up, became overly animated and a little showy, trying to make it casual again, trying to act like nothing had happened. "I mean, there was Anna, nice at first, turns out she's insane. And Uriel, dick. Zachariah—God, what a douche. Raphael, he sucked big time. Gabriel, hate that guy. Lucifer… don't even get me started on what an asshole he is." She gave a short barking laugh, but it was forced.

Cas watched her silently, his normal confused-perplexed-squinty-eyed 'what are you talking about' face on. She smiled a little for real at that, shrugged her hands out in front of herself, the pressed her mouth into a shrug. "I'm just trying to say that you're doing something right, Cas, okay?" she asked, then held up a mock-threatening finger and told him: "Now, get down on yourself one more time and I swear to your dad..."

He blinked a couple times, the slightest hint of a smile on his lips, but his eyebrows were still knit together. Like he understood that she was making a joke, but he didn't quite get it, but it still amused him. It was probably the cutest expression Alex had ever seen. Her affable smile couldn't hold up as she took in his appearance, his face, everything about him, the memory of kissing him—well not him, but the future version of him. She felt a pang of loss for something she'd never had, and unable to handle it, she turned away and went to the other end of the room.

He's your guardian angel, your friend, and that's all. She repeated this in her head several times as she stood in front of the silent television, trying to believe herself. "What... are you doing?" Cas asked after a couple seconds, and Alex, not sure what she was doing, tried to act purposeful.
"I'm—" she looked down at the television, reached for the knob. "Uh, turning on the TV." The picture quality was horrible and she slammed the top of the TV with her fist… maybe a little harder than she needed to. The static cleared a little, and she saw Robin Williams on the screen. He was dressed in a ridiculous outfit—rainbow suspenders over a colorful shirt. Alex recognized it immediately. Mork and Mindy. She smiled a little bit as she remembered. "Huh. I used to watch this show as a kid."

She looked back at where Cas sat on the ridiculous bedspread, underneath the plaque that said 'Love Conquers All'. Her smile faded. This was the part where she grew up and stopped trying to make this whole Castiel thing into something it wasn't. Accepted that his devotion and care was otherworldly and learned to be okay with that, not always selfishly longing for more. She could do that. She would do that.

"Mindy! My whole emotional life is flashing before my eyes!" Mork exclaimed in animated distress on the television set, and Mindy comforted him with don't worry, it was just a bad dream. Alex went back to the bed, and Mork was telling Mindy how he didn't have bad dreams, as his alien race had cut off the ability for bad dreams when they had cut off their emotions. Cue the laugh track. Alex remembered this episode, actually.

Cas watched her as she sat beside him on the bed, leaning against the headboard, her shoulder just a foot away from his. She glanced at him. He looked away, watched the television for a moment. "Who is the man with the hair like Sam's?" Cas asked, referring to Mork.

Alex looked at him sidelong, resisting the urge to laugh out loud. "Hair like Sam's? Oh he'd love that. Uh, that's Mork. He's an alien from planet Ork. He came to earth in an egg-shaped space ship. That girl's his roommate Mindy. But everyone knew they were more than that."

Cas took it all in, listening intently then frowned. "There is no such planet, Ork."

Alex did a bad job of hiding her amused smile. "It's a fictional show, Cas," she said. "Ork is made up. Mork is an actor named Robin Williams." Cas almost looked suspicious and Alex tiredly chuckled, watching Cas out of the corner of her eye. Watching him was almost as entertaining as watching the show. He looked at the screen intently, as if he were staring at an impossible math equation.

"But showing emotions is a good thing, Mork," Mindy was saying kindly.

Mork looked shocked. "But Mindy—that's a no no, no no for a Nanu-Nanu!" Laugh track. "Mindy, I've made a decision and I don't think you're going to like it very much."

"What is it?" Mindy asked.

"Well, I've gotta stop this before the emotions take me completely over, so... I've got this little door in the back of my mind... I'm going to round up all of my emotions put them behind that door, lock it, and hide the key... in my foot."

There was laughter from the audience, even though Mindy looked disturbed. "Are you saying that you won't feel anything anymore?"

"Right on, strike up the bland," Mork said really fast and determined, and stood up, put his hands at the side of his head. "Goodbye Mindy! I'm closing off my emotions forever."

Mindy jumped up after him. "Wait a minute Mork, don't!"

Alex yawned, not able to stop herself—she was really tired. This reminded her of the nights she and...
Sam had spent wondering where Dean and Dad were. They'd always had each other and whatever local television shows had been on. He'd always try to get her to watch that Beauty and the Beast show but it was so cheesy and stupid and Alex would beg to watch The A-Team or Miami Vice instead. She blinked sleepily, getting drowsy.

"Well you haven't convinced me that I need them," Mork was saying, "so on behalf of my emotions, I'd just like to say... goodbye, sayonara, ciao, ta-ta, catch you later Mama... and shalom! It's been nice feeling you."

"Wait a minute Mork, no, don't!"

Mork's face had become emotionless, his voice had become monotone. "It is too late. The door is locked. My emotions are shut off forever."

"Then so's the Mork who I like so well," Mindy lamented.

"Don't worry, we can go on having a non-emotional equivalent of fun," Mork droned. "There are certain advantages. Watch." He smashed himself in the hand with a little stone statue and Mindy cried out, asked if it hurt. "You bet," Mork said without any feeling. "Ow. It's killing me."

"So what's the advantage of that?!" Mindy asked.

"I can hurt myself all day without bothering other people," was the stoic reply.

Mindy looked confused, then hurt. "Mork, can that door in your head ever be re-opened?"

"Yes, but I can't do it, because what's behind there is far too dangerous."

Mindy became angry. "You know something, you are really DUMB."

"Nice try, but insults to a man with no emotions is like hay fever to a man with no nose."

Mindy got upset, said Mork ruined her birthday, then accused him of being cold, then got quiet... sat down... said it was like part of Mork had died. And she began to cry.

"If you think you can get to me by crying, you're wrong." He said, but then said her name, "Mindy," gently, worried. Then snapped to attention, his voice returning to monotone, however, it was more urgent than before. "Fall back, systems to May Day, control tear ducts, think baseball, baseball!"

He was monotone again and sat down beside Mindy, who was still crying.

Castiel turned to Alex to ask a question—and stilled. She'd fallen asleep, head curled into the hard wood headboard of the bed, lolling uncomfortably in the space between it and her shoulder. Her mouth was open just slightly, some of her hair was in her face. She was fast asleep.

"Ah, once again, I am in control," Castiel heard Mork say emotionlessly. "I can deal with you as any other person." There was a long pause and Mork's monotone voice softened. "A person with invitingly soft skin. Rosebud lips. And sweet little eyes that leak cute little drops that roll gently down your cheeks..."
Her head stopped when her cheek hit his shoulder and Cas didn't move at all, because if he did, he might disrupt her rest. She shifted a little beside him and he felt a rush of protectiveness. The television was now just a hum in the background. He didn't look at it, not at all. He could smell the scent of motel shampoo on Alex's hair, feel the pattern of her breathing against himself. He didn't move a muscle for a very long time, even though his fingers itched to touch the skin of her face.

He could see her left hand, resting, draped across her thigh, and his eyes drifted across her scarred knuckles. Above them, a smooth white scar, maybe two inches long, arced across the top of her hand. He wasn't sure what these scars were from, only that they were evidence of the life she'd lived, the pains she'd endured. He knew that on the inside of her hand a dark scar slashed across the center from a wound inflicted in Gabriel's hell world. Each physical scar she carried was a reminder to Castiel of how fragile this human girl was. She was a strong soul, but contained within a vessel doomed to mortality. And he knew that her physical scars did not compare to the numbers of inner scars and burdens she'd collected over the years.

Perhaps he could do nothing to remove any scars that she had already received. But after he recovered from this temporary weakness, he was resolved to save her from the future that awaited and to keep her safe from the future in which he was the one who caused her death. Whatever he had to do, he'd do it to make sure Alex lived.

She shifted against him again, making a soft sound and Castiel felt his vessel flush all over with warmth. Perhaps he should have been more reluctant to be close like this to her. But he didn't feel that way. He... he liked it. Cas remained unmoving the entire night, watching over her, at peace despite everything else, because he knew she was safe and with him.

Drowsy and comfortable, Alex snuggled into the warmth beside her, sighing a soft, sleepy sound, feeling like she could stay in this half-awake state forever, feeling rested for the first time in forever, if a little sore from the weird position she'd picked to sleep in. She realized, listlessly, that she didn't have the nightmare last night. Hmm, that was nice. Maybe it was finally over. The shape she was cuddled into suddenly moved a little bit and her eyes shot open as she realized, remembering—she had been sitting beside Cas in bed watching TV and... then what?—she was staring straight at a button on the familiar beige trench coat. Panicked, she jerked upwards and found herself looking up into Castiel's face, which was just above hers. Oh my god. She had been sleeping... on him, basically on his lap! Quickly turning red with mortified heat, Alex just stayed frozen, hoping if she did, maybe she'd wake up and this would just be some kind of freaky dream.

"Good morning, Alex," he said, and she had the brief thought, I quit life. He was looking at her softly. She pushed away, embarrassed for numerous reasons, the most immediate being—had she snored? Drooled? Dean and Sam gave her crap sometimes about drooling.

"G-good morning," she mumbled, mortified, her eyes going all over the place, a dead giveaway of how damn awkward she felt.

"Did you sleep well?" he asked. And she knew it was just him being weirdly polite and courteous like he always was, but seriously, are you kidding me? Alex wanted to fling herself into a distant galaxy. She needed to disappear. She didn't answer his question, just slid off the bed, all business. There were bigger things to worry about right now.

"We need to go find my brothers," she said, and grabbed her jacket off the floor, shrugging it on. She turned around to see Cas standing up and she stopped straightening the jacket, hurried over to him, already knowing where this was going.

"I can stand," he said, looking immensely excited (for Cas, anyway). He then attempted to take a step and wobbled dangerously. Alex only just caught him as she reached him, bracing him with both hands. He'd grabbed onto her tightly, either arm.

"Okay, okay, take it easy," Alex told him, teeth gritted as she pushed him back up. "Don't get ahead of yourself."

He was stable again and they just stood like that for a couple more awkward seconds—Cas holding onto her as if for dear life and her hands flat against his strong chest. He seemed out of breath and Alex didn't know if this could get any more awkward for her. He was so... ugh. It was driving her crazy and she wanted to blush furiously at the thought of sleeping on him all night. "So. How about we go now," she suggested artlessly, wanting to leave pronto. Not only was she anxious to find her brothers, but she wanted to escape this embarrassing moment too.

"Yes. But..." Cas was looking down at his feet. "I think I need help walking."

"You think?" Alex asked sarcastically, moving to his side and pulling one of his arms around her shoulder.

Cas got a little proud smiles on his face. "That was sarcasm," he observed, and he sounded like a little kid who had gotten excited about spelling 'cat' right.

Alex couldn't help but crack an exasperated grin as she looked down, wrapped her other arm around his waist like before. "Yes, very good young grasshopper."

He paused, and sounded confused again. "I'm not an insect."

Alex had left the stolen car she'd used—a powder-blue Dodge Polara station wagon—behind the motel. She and Cas took about five minutes to walk the whole way, and he was highly ashamed of himself and his slow shuffle—she could tell. She put him into the passenger seat where he collapsed and had to pull his legs in using his arms pathetically. Alex said nothing, feeling for him. She'd been pretty messed up in her day too and knew how much it sucked to be held back by injuries.

She hot wired the car again (Cas watched with great interest) and they drove the fifteen minutes to the Winchester home. The entire way there, Alex was silent, thinking hard about Sam, Dean, Mom, Dad. Hoping to find them there, but not too hopeful in case it was the same as last night. But when they pulled up, she saw a new car in the driveway. The Impala. Her heart leapt in her chest and she parked her stolen car on the side of the street, suddenly breathless and shaking. Wherever they'd been gone to... they were back. Alex got out of the car, glancing constantly at the house for any sign of movement. She reached the passenger side, where Cas had pushed his door open and managed to get his feet on the ground. He braced himself to pull himself out of the car using the doorframe.

"Whoa, Grandpa," Alex said, thinking better of the entire thing and holding her hands in a stop motion. "You better stay in the car and be lookout." Cas paused and gave her quite the disgruntled stare. "Look at yourself, you can barely move!" Alex pointed out.

The angel was sullen, but not ready to comply. "I'm coming with you," Cas said, grunting as he found his full height. "Like it or not." And he started off without her, as if to prove a point. Alex was left to stare at him in slight surprise, close his door and mutter something about 'stubborn son of a bitch' as she went to catch up to him. She stayed close just in case his legs gave out or something. He was able to walk a lot better than even fifteen minutes ago, she noticed. That was good. Her attention turned to the matter at hand: she stared at the house across from her, heart racing in anticipation as they closed the distance. She had no idea what they would find.
The house was boxy, very sixties in its architectural style. It had a very small yard and a stoop of a porch. When they got to the door she stared it down, breathing heavily. She suddenly felt intimidated and afraid.

"What is it?" Cas asked her, noticing.

Alex steeled herself, eyes still on the door. "Nothing."

She took a deep breath then knocked three times and they waited for about fifteen seconds. The door opened and a beautiful young blonde woman stood there. Alex went still. Mom. Alex recognized her immediately from the photos—she was younger of course. And beautiful, so much more beautiful than the photographs showed. Alex stared at her, completely enchanted and dumbfounded. She forgot what she was doing.

"...Yes?" Mary asked, looking between them expectantly with a slight hint of apprehension. Alex swallowed. Mom was beautiful. Perfect. Young and pretty and so alive. "Can I... help you?" Mary asked, eyebrows furrowing at Alex's total silence.

"Oh—uh, hello," Alex said, and suddenly realized she had no clue what the hell to say or do—this was her mom. She hadn't even thought of making up a cover story, and internally began to curse herself for being so out of it. Mary was wearing a floral print apron... like she was baking. Alex glanced around behind Mom, saw nothing out of sorts. Mary was beginning to get weirded out, Alex could tell, and Cas was just staring at Alex, waiting for her to say something.

Alex busted out her best on-the-spot lie, trying to think of a way to get them in the house where she could see more and ask questions. "We," Alex said, gesturing between herself and Cas, speaking in an uncharacteristically perky voice, "uh, we are your new neighbors. Just moved in down the street. Thought we'd come over and... say hello!" Alex listened to how ridiculous she sounded. Surely to God no one would buy that crock of crap... but Mary's face broke into a pleasant smile.

"Oh, how nice!" Mary said, and stepped to the side, gestured for them to come in. Alex gave Cas a look from the side of her eyes, and hoped he got her meaning, which was 'don't say anything.' "Please, come in," Mary was saying, and then looked back into the house. "John, company!"

Alex paused, her stomach twisting at the mention of Dad and the knowledge that she was about to see him again. Mary had shut the door behind them and gestured toward the living room couch. "Please, sit down," she said graciously, and then seemed to notice Cas, who was moving very slowly and stiffly, walking on his own, but not well. Alex was staying at his side, hovering almost, making sure he made it to the couch.

Mary looked concerned. "Is... he all right?"

Cas sat down heavily. "Oh, uh yeah, he's... he's got ankle... arthritis... problems," Alex lied stutteringly as she sat beside Cas. The second she finished saying that, she realized how stupid that sounded, because Cas also looked physically ill. The arthritis claim wasn't enough. "And uh he's getting over a stomach bug," she said, feigning a nonchalant attitude. "It really weakened him you know?" she asked. Good God Dean would kill her if he could hear these ridiculous lies pouring out of her mouth. Dean—Sam.

Remembering herself, Alex leaned forward to ask Mary, who'd sat down across from her, about her brothers, to ask if she'd seen them—and then a familiar voice to her right startled her into silence. "Mary, what's going on?"

Alex froze at the sight of Dad approaching them from the hallway. He looked so much younger and lighter, not even like the man she remembered. But she still stiffened, sat up straight, the smile gone off her face.

"John, our new neighbors—" Mary stopped, trailing off, probably realizing she didn't know their names.

"Alex," Alex supplied, then nodded her head toward Cas. "And Cas."

"I'm Mary," Mom said. "And this is John." She tilted her head to the side thoughtfully. "Alex. Is that short for something?" Mary asked in polite interest. It kind of sounded like she didn't like the name Alex from the way she said it.

This was so damn ironic. "Alexandra," Alex said, watching Dad's every move hawkishly as he came around to sit beside his wife.

"Oh, how pretty," Mary said, smiling again.

Beside her, John took a seat, put an arm around Mary, smiled pleasantly at them. "And Cas—that must be short for Casanova," John joked, but only Mary gave him a smile at the comment. Alex was working her hands oddly in her lap, trying to smile, but she couldn't even fake one. Cas's face was like stone. John frowned and looked at his wife, obviously feeling awkward, trying to make conversation. "Isn't there an Alexandra in your family, Mary?"

"Yes, my great grandmother," Mary said, also a little awkward. The clock ticked loudly in the silence.

This was going just fabulously. Alex cleared her throat and took in a deep breath. Being perky was exhausting. "You know, speaking of family, I was, er, I'm looking for my brothers. Sam and Dean?
They said they were stopping by here yesterday but I haven't seen them since."

"No, sorry—" John said, shaking his head, then stopped, his eyes narrowing as he frowned. "Why would they have stopped by here?"

Good friggin' question. Alex stuck her tongue out enough to wet her lips nervously. "Because—uh__"

"Because they were trying to stop an angel from the future from killing you," Cas said, breaking his silence. John and Mary looked at him like he had two heads, then at Alex for an explanation.

She made a 'oh gosh, this happens all the time' face. "Don't mind Cas. Uh, he's a little loopy from the um, allergy medicine."

Mary looked at her with narrowed eyes. Alex could see growing mistrust behind the careful smile.
"I thought you said he had a stomach bug."

Shit on a stick, she had forgotten that. "Oh, yeah, yeah, I did," Alex said, pretending to be totally confident and at ease, but inwardly scrambling, inwardly freaking out. She laughed a nervous little laugh, jerked her thumb toward a very unamused Cas. "He's got pretty bad allergies, to uh, everything..." Alex couldn't stop the bad lies from coming, a total mess under her parents confused gazes. "Grass you know and, and um also trees... bushes... it just all messes him up."

Crap. Crap! This could not be going any worse—Alex had never heard worse lies in her whole freaking life. Mary, however, seemed to be giving them the benefit of the doubt, standing up and giving them a smile. "Let me put on some tea."
Alex watched her mother leave. Mary could definitely tell something was up. Alex was inwardly cussing herself out for doing such a crap job of this. Dad was leaning forward over a knee, looking between them with a polite, if somewhat forced smile. "So, which house did you move into? I... don't remember one being for sale."

Of course not. "It's just a couple houses down," Alex answered vaguely, shrinking back a little under his gaze. He seemed to notice that he frowned slightly, then turned to Cas, apparently not interested in her anymore.

Dad was looking at Cas with a certain note of suspicion. "You got a job, young man?" Alex frowned at that comment—Dad had to be like twenty-five right now, and Cas looked like at least thirty-five... why did Dad call him that?

Cas looked at John without any expression whatsoever. "Yes, I am an anesthesiologist!" Alex put in fast, and gave Cas a meaningful look, to which he only frowned, clearly not understanding. Alex wanted to stand up and shout 'why?!'—she was definitely not sure if this could get any more ridiculous and the universe owed her an answer as to why this was going so horribly. But she just kept a smile plastered across her face, hoping for the best.

"So, you didn't notice two guys around yesterday?" she asked, trying to keep her face and tone pleasant. "One freakishly tall one with a lot of hair? The other one kind of smart mouthy and overbearing?"

John looked at her oddly, and shook his head. "No, can't say I saw them." He was still looking at Cas, still focused on the previous subject which Alex was trying to sidestep. "An anesthesiologist, huh? That's pretty impressive." He looked at Alex kind of appraisingly, then back at Cas again. "Now, this may be a little improper of me to say, but—Cas?—you look a little too old for this young lady here."

Alex's mouth dropped open and she looked at Cas, who was staring at John bleakly. Is that why he'd called him young man a minute ago—because he thought the opposite? Also: "He's not my boyfriend," Alex said, then immediately remembered she'd said they were the neighbors, so what else would they be if not significant others? Crap.

Dad looked at her with a darkening expression. "Oh?"

"No," Alex said, shrinking inside, trying to think of something to save face. "He's my—my..." she couldn't think of anything.

Cas was speaking again. "I'm her guard—"

"My gardener!" Alex said, giving Cas an exasperated look and not even bothering to hide it.

John looked at them as if he wasn't sure if they were joking or not. "Your gardener?"

Mary reappeared just then, a cup of tea in hand. She held it out to Cas with a smile. "Have some. Hot tea makes everything better."

"I'm not sure that's true," Castiel said with narrowed eyes. Alex nudged him with her knee, and he looked at her, got a weird look from the side of her eyes. He looked back at Mary, expression still a little perplexed. He took the tea. "But thank you."

Mary sat back down after telling Cas again to 'drink up' and Alex tried to think of something normal to say or comment on. "Your home is lovely," she said, but honestly she hadn't noticed one damn thing about it. "Just the right size to start a family," she continued with false cheer.

Mary seemed to automatically beam at that comment, looked at John adoringly, who smiled at her, put his hand on hers. Alex's heart tugged a little, her facade wobbled. My God, they were in love. John was chuckling. "I can't wait to have a house full of boys."

Alex felt her smile fade a little at that comment. "John," Mary laughed, pushing him lightly, playfully.

"What?" he grinned. "I wouldn't know what to do with a girl."

"That's apparent," Cas muttered darkly. John heard that and frowned, and Mary too.

In fact, Mary stood up, smiled tightly now. "Alex, before you two go… can I get you to help me with something in the kitchen?"

"I'm... not good in the kitchen…” Alex protested.

Mary insisted. "It'll take two seconds, sweetie, now come on."

Okay, so they were about to be kicked out. And with no answers, either! Where the hell were Sam and Dean? Alex stood up, and John did too in unison, his hulking six-foot-two frame dwarfing Alex and Mary both. "I've gotta grab my jacket and head to work," John said apologetically, and walked toward Alex, held out his hand—and Alex flinched away by instinct. He frowned at her reaction, seemed taken aback. "Just… wanted to shake your hand, neighbor," John said, eyeing her cautiously, uncertainly.

Alex, recovered, feigned casual pleasantness again, reached out, shook his hand. "Right. Nice to meet you, John."

"You too, Alex." He seemed kind of guarded toward her now. Alex felt bad about it, too. This wasn't the Dad she'd known. Not at all.

John moved over to the couch and held his hand out to Cas, who still sat on the couch, holding his tea cup sullenly in both hands. He didn't make a single move. In fact he was looking at John with something close to loathing. John gave up, looking confused, and he walked back down the hallway. Mary clearly got the same awkward vibes everyone else was getting, but gave Cas a polite little smile anyway. "Drink your tea," she said, again, to Cas, then led Alex toward the kitchen.

Mom was super nice, making tea for the sick guy, insisting he drink it a couple times over—they walked into the kitchen and suddenly Alex was flying sideways into the wall. Mom slammed her there, holding her there with one hand—the other hand held a really huge hunting knife at Alex's throat. "Who are you?" Mary demanded. Surprised, Alex stared at her mom, more impressed with her than anything else. Maybe she should be alarmed that someone was threatening her life, but all she could think was that Dean hadn't been lying… Mom was badass! "I said who are you?" Mary repeated in a low hiss. "You've got hunter written all over you," she shoved Alex a little harder, demandingly. "Are you here to hurt my husband? What do you want?"

"I'm looking for my brothers like I said," Alex said honestly, and got another shove in reply.

"Stop with the lies and tell me who you are," Mary demanded.

Okay then.

In the space of one single second, Alex grabbed the handle of Mom's knife with one hand, slid her other arm between their bodies in unison even as she savagely bent the knife out of Mom's grip easily, she used her arm as leverage and whirled Mom around, slammed her against the wall—and suddenly they were just as they had been before, but now Alex was the one in control, the one holding the knife. Mary looked surprised more than anything else. Alex turned the knife away, raised her eyebrows meaningfully, showing her mom she wasn't an enemy.

"...Who are you?" Mary asked again, but quietly this time.

Alex drew in a deep breath. Hell, she had no other clue what to do, so she told the truth. "I'm Alex. Winchester." She stepped back, letting mom go. "Your... your daughter."

Mary's expression went from 'did I hear you right to 'are you fucking kidding me' to 'wait...' in the span of three seconds. She opened her mouth to say something, but then stopped, looking at Alex carefully, scrutinizing her completely. For a brief second, Alex had this insane hope that Mom was going to look at her and see who she was, recognize her somehow... but that didn't happen. Mom's expression changed, went cold. "You're crazy," she said, and grabbed Alex roughly by her jacket—then her eyes rolled back in her head and she fell over unconscious.

"What the hell Cas?!" Alex exclaimed in horror—Cas had stepped in, touched two fingers to Mary's head, rendering the woman into an unconscious heap. "What did you do?"

"Michael," Cas said, breathing heavily, standing oddly. "He was here."

"Where?" Alex asked, suddenly stock still.

"In John."

Alex looked at him like he'd gone stark raving mad. "What?"

"I'm not sure how or why, but Michael used John—your father as a vessel."

"Her father?" Came a new voice. "The hell are you talking about?" John was there behind them, in the doorway, wearing a jacket and a freaked out expression—and then he saw Mary on the floor and fear flashed across his features, he took a step back, looked at Alex, then Cas in fear. "What did you do to my wife?"

"She'll be fine, John," Cas said flatly, uncaringly, then looked at Alex. "She put a dangerous amount of sedatives in the tea. Of course, they won't affect me. I don't think."

Alex gaped at Cas, then looked at Mom. Wow, that was double impressive. Sneaky.

"Who are you people?" John demanded.

Castiel drew himself up a little bit. "I'm an angel of the Lord."

John's expression darkened—an expression Alex recognized. "Buddy, drugs are bad," he said, and Alex suddenly saw, tried to warn Cas with a shout—she recognized when her dad was about to snap—John charged the couple feet between himself and Cas, slammed the angel up against the wall. Alex went up and tried grabbing John's shoulder to yank him off Cas, but John shoved her away, hard, and she fell down backwards. "What did you do to her?" John screamed at Cas, shaking him roughly. "Tell me, now!"

Cas just stared down at John his expression chilling, calm. "Do not presume to tell me what to do, John Winchester," he said lowly, and brought his two fingers to John's temple. "Now, forget."
John crumpled to the floor. Alex, shakily getting up from where she’d been shoved, looked at Cas in a mixture of disbelief and confusion. "Forget? Forget? You just erased their memories?"

He ignored her question, stumbled over to her. "Why didn't you tell me that your father mistreated you?" he demanded, and Alex took a step back, bumping up against the kitchen counter.

"What?" she asked, barely a whisper.

"You're scared of him," Cas said, almost angrily. "You were afraid when he tried to shake your hand."

"No I wasn't," Alex protested—possibly too passionately.

Cas just stepped closer, his expression so intense. "Did he strike you in anger?"

Alex went cold. "How dare you ask me that," she said, and it was supposed to be anger that she asked it with, but instead, her voice shook with total and utter fear.

Cas's frown changed from anger to deep sadness. Like he saw right through her, and knew the answer was yes. He looked so deeply affected by it that Alex couldn't keep looking at him. She swallowed painfully and spoke with a sharp, hard tone. "It wasn't... it wasn't a lot, okay? It was only when he drank a lot. And only when I deserved it," she said more angrily, then brushed past him brusquely, trying to shove her emotions down deep where they couldn't surface, because they hurt too much and she had thought she was done with this crap a long time ago.

Behind her, Cas hadn't turned around. They faced opposite directions. "How could a child deserve such a thing?" he asked quietly. He truly didn't understand. As he looked down at John Winchester's unconscious form, his fist curled tightly at his side in unadulterated anger. Ever since stepping into this house and seeing the man walk into the room, Castiel had been fighting fury and anger toward him. Because he'd known this man had undervalued his daughter, had failed to protect her and considered giving her away—but this new revelation he discovered just moments ago—that John Winchester had physically hurt or intimidated his daughter to whatever extent great or small—made Castiel feel like his blood was boiling beneath his skin, made him want to obliterate this man.

Alex turned around and looked at Cas, saw his fist, saw his angry stare aimed at her dad. He seemed entirely focused on John, breathing heavily, eyes heavy lidded and face like stone. "Cas." She said, but he didn't look away from her dad. She went over to him, grabbed his arm. "Cas! This guy right here—he's not the guy who pushed me around as a kid." He looked at her, his venomous expression fading. Alex's heart almost stopped when she realized his face right then—it was the exact same expression Dean had always had when Dad had gone off the rails and shoved her or yelled at her or, yes, a few times, struck her. Alex looked away, ashamed.

Cas's fist loosened, then relaxed completely, and he looked morose once more. Alex shook her head, let go of Cas's arm. This was a mess, a total mess. She put her hands on either side of her, palms facing in, frustrated. "Okay, just—just forget all this—" she said, chopping her hands forward, "Where the hell are Sam and Dean?"

He looked at her for a long, tense moment. "I won't forget this," he said, responding grimly to the first part of what she'd said. "But I'll respect your wishes if you don't want to speak of it again." He looked unhappy about it, but seemed to drop it, squinting around the kitchen, his eyes appearing to take in things that she couldn't see. "They're not here anymore," he said. "I'm fairly certain."

"How?" Alex asked.
"John and Mary's minds were tampered with recently, and Michael's presence... I can sense it... he must have sent them back."

"Their minds were tampered with recently? Wasn't that you just now?" she asked cynically.

He glanced at her. "No. Well, yes. But their memories were altered recently, before I even touched them."

Alex shook her head, unhappy. "Did you really have to do that?" It bothered her. And she hadn't wanted that moment with her mom to end... even if Mom had been about to kick her ass.

"I wanted to keep the timeline uncomplicated," Cas said simply, to which Alex gave him a look that said 'really?'

She didn't believe that for a second. "After all the crap about fate being unchangeable?" she asked angrily.

"There are certain rules which must be observed when dealing with time travel---" Cas was saying, but Alex, at the end of her rope, unintentionally channeled her oldest brother by cutting him off and shouting "bullshit!"

Cas's expression flickered as if in surprise, then became tightly drawn and Alex stood there breathing heavily for a couple seconds, then shut her eyes tight to keep it together. "I need a drink," she muttered before opening her eyes up again.

Cas looked surprisingly guilty, staring down at John and Mary. "I could... undo it..." he said, and his eyes falteringly came back to hers, waiting for her to tell him what to do. Alex looked at him in a mixture of unhappiness at him but also at herself. She was pissed that he'd done that, but... it didn't really matter if Mary and John Winchester remembered this weirdo couple in their house in 1978, did it? And when she thought it over objectively, Cas had said all that stuff about being an angel and then Mom had figured out something was up and attacked her in the kitchen—Dad walked in on it all... Alex's indignant anger was fading rapidly. Instead, she just felt sad, looking down at her pretty blonde mom on the floor. Then her dad, before he had even been her dad. This was beyond screwed up.

Cas squinted, put a hand to his head, and Alex glanced at him, then went to him—was he about to start spewing blood again? Then she realized he was listening to something, not in pain. "It's Dean. He's calling to me from 2010." He looked at her. "We should go."

Alex felt her eyebrows raise in trepidation, she looked at him apprehensively. "Cas, you can barely stand up now, how are you supposed to be able to make another trip?"

"It will be easier with just you," he said.

"Just as long as you're sure you'll be all right," she said, and looked at him carefully. He looked distinctly regretful, then met her eyes somberly.

"I'm not sure of anything anymore," he said, and if the mood had been lighter, Alex might have joked about him being emo. But he meant it, and she could tell. And it kind of worried her, honestly, all this talk recently about his 'bad choices' and uncertainty about making decisions, his insistence that he was useless and a failure. Something was going on with him. He paused, looked at her parents still forms on the kitchen floor. "I can still change it back."

Alex looked at them too. Memorized Mom's face. Looked around the kitchen at the gingham decor, the pretty blue teapot and matching cups neatly lined up on a shelf, the cross stitch that had a mother duck with ducklings stitched onto it hanging on an otherwise empty wall. Little pieces of Mary Winchester, little glimpses into her mind and heart. Alex let out a soft breath. "No. It doesn't matter. I remember." She faced him and took in a deep breath, nodded once. "I'm ready to go now."

He'd touched their foreheads when he brought them to 1978. But with just Alex, he just nodded somberly, reached out, and grasped her shoulder instead.

"Jesus Christ, Sam," Dean was saying, sounding like he'd reached the end of his rope. "What the hell are we supposed to do?"

Alex and Cas were in the motel room where this crazy thing had all started, and Dean was sitting on a bed, faced away, Sam beside him, turned away too. In front of Alex, Cas pitched forward and she staggered as he pretty much fell forward onto her. "Guys, help me!" she gasped, and both brothers whirled at the sound of her voice.

Sam, closer, got to her first, grabbing Cas's woozy form easily, getting him under one arm. "Hey. Hey, hey! Whoa, I gotcha!"

Dean caught him under the other arm a fraction of a second later, and looked at Alex with complete and utter relief on his face. "You crazy kids," he said, "You made it!"

Cas looked almost drunk, staring at something that wasn't there. "I'm—uhhh," he mumbled, and his eyes rolled back as his head fell backwards limply.

"Not again," Alex muttered, and then pointed at one of the beds, chagrined. Her brothers hauled him over to the bed and flopped him down, then turned to look at her. She looked from Cas's unconscious form to them. "Hi," she said tiredly, and smiled at them, relieved, exhausted emotionally, so glad it was over.

Sam came over and hugged her tightly and she protested a little, "Mffmfff, Sam!" her face smushed up against his massive chest.

"We, uh, got a little worried," he explained, letting her go.

"A little?" she asked fondly, rubbing her jaw like he'd hurt her in the hug.

Dean was still beside Cas, looking down at him intently, checking his pulse and breathing. "Seems okay," he said. Alex came over to the other side of the bed. "How long was he out the first time?" he asked, seeming concerned about Cas.

"About three hour, maybe four hours," Alex said, watching Cas, remembering cleaning him up, remembering Candy Land, remembering sleeping next to him...

"So what'd you guys do when he woke up?" Dean asked, and even though he tried to sound casual, Alex heard the hidden, suspicious question.

She looked at him, completely deadpan. "We had lots and lots of sex." Dean's face went completely shocked.

Sam laughed out loud at that and Alex's serious expression gave way to a pleased with herself smile. Dean, of course, was giving Sam the evil eye, then made a face at Alex. "Ha ha," he rolled his eyes. "Very funny." He looked like he'd never heard anything stupider.

Alex looked at Dean challengingly. "What the hell do you think I did?" she asked. "I went and looked for you when you didn't show. Couldn't find you. Met Mom and Dad though." She shook her head a little. "Good times."

Sam seemed interested in that. "Did they remember us visiting?"

"No," Alex said. "They don't remember any of it. Cas took their memories when we left, too. Don't know how, he's so friggin' low on battery power." They all looked at the still form of Cas on the bed.

"I could use a drink now," Dean said. "Beers all around?"

"Beer's not gonna cut it," Alex muttered in a harrowed tone.

"Bring out the hunter's helper," Sam agreed and Dean rolled his eyes, but complied. He got out some plastic cups and a bottle of whiskey.

"What happened? With Anna?" Alex asked. Dean poured three generous drinks. She watched Cas quietly as he explained.

"Well, Anna's dead—Michael ganked her, didn't seem to like her plan to kill Sammy. Michael used Dad as a meatsuit." Dean chuckled darkly, handed a cup to Sam. "More on that later. My brain's fried. But the short and sweet version is that Mom's fine, Dad's fine, Sam's fine. And we didn't change a damn thing." He handed Alex her cup, looked at her, then Sam, then Cas. "Well… I guess this is it," Dean said.

"This is what?" Sam asked.

"Team Free Will. One ex-blood junkie, one dropout with six bucks to his name, one punkass kid sister, and Mr. Comatose over there. It's awesome."

"You're not funny," Alex commented, downing a huge burning gulp of whiskey. It helped her feel better immediately.

Dean shrugged. "I'm not laughing."

"What are you talking about, anyway? Team Free Will?" Sam asked.

"They all say we'll say yes," Dean said. "And it's getting pretty damn annoying."

"Annoying?" Alex questioned, looking at him sidelong. "What if they're right?"

Dean took another drink. "They're not."

There was a pause. "They might be," Alex said. She didn't like it, but she wasn't going to avoid it, either.

Dean looked at her, expression hovering between a glare and a grimace. "Don't say that, Al."

Alex shrugged and set her cup down on the dresser beside her. "I'm just saying. You've tried to change the past twice now. And neither time worked. Why's the future gonna be any different?"

"Geez, Miss Optimistic," Dean said. "Because I've decided. Maybe we can't change the past, but the future ain't written yet."

"Do you really think you can say no forever?" Alex asked. "Run from fate or destiny, whatever, forever?"
"Fate?" Dean repeated, like it was a bad word. "Please. Don't tell me you believe in that BS."

Sam, who'd been quiet this whole time, sipping his drink, finally spoke up. "Michael got Dad to say yes."

"That was different," Dean said immediately. "Anna was about to kill Mom."

Sam looked at Dean intently. "And if you could save Mom... what would you say?" He hesitated a long time, then looked at Alex. "If you could save... Alex, Dean... what would you say?"

"What do you mean?" Alex asked, her frown matching Dean's.

Sam shrugged, set his drink down too, looking at his twin with a great deal of apprehensiveness. "Sooner or later they're gonna try to use you against us. I mean, they already have a little," Sam said, referring loosely to the whole Lucifer thing. Alex looked down, feeling much worse again.

Dean took a deep breath, staring at his now-empty cup. "Why do you think I've been such a pain in the ass lately? I know that. I'm just waiting for someone to swoop in and take her from us. And I can never decide if she's safer with us or without and I can't friggin' take much more."

Sam frowned, looking at the bed behind Alex and Dean. "Whoa—where'd Cas go?"

They all looked at the bed—empty. "Friggin' angels, man," Dean said, aggravated. He went over to pour himself more whiskey as Alex looked around with a slack jaw.

"My life blows," Dean said, and raised his once-again full cup. "Here's to that."

Alex ignored him, staring at the bed for a couple seconds, then decisively grabbing up her duffel bag. She grabbed her phone out of the side pocket where she'd shoved it last, threw a "be right back" over her shoulder. She hurried outside the motel room, stood near the chipped metal railing there and scrolled through her contacts. Found who she was looking for and hit call. It rang twice.

"Hello, Alex," Cas answered.

"Why do you always leave like that?" she demanded without ceremony.

There was a pause. "Like what?"

"Without a single word or a goodbye," She said, sounding a little madder than she meant to sound. She tried to calm herself, took a deep breath. "You were passed out on the bed and then you just disappeared—I mean... are you okay?"

"Yes," his deep voice replied. "Perfectly fine."

"Perfectly fine?" she repeated. "Like last time 'perfectly fine'?"

There was another pause. "You shouldn't worry about me."

She paused, made a face, then smiled helplessly, watching the traffic passing out on the highway in front of the motel. "Yeah well. Too late for that."

"I see," he replied, and Alex felt herself growing introspective at dangerous levels. She felt like she needed to tell him something substantial, something meaningful.

"Cas—" she couldn't think of how to say all she was feeling and thinking. So she settled on, "I hope you feel better soon."
"Thank you, Alex." There was a long pause. "Should... we end the call now?"

Alex shook her head, smiling to herself. As usual, she found his social awkwardness completely perfect. "Sounds good."

She didn't hang up though. He had gone quiet again, then asked: "Is this the part where we hang up?"

She held back a laugh, just barely. "Uh, yes," Alex said. Another long pause.

"Now?" Cas asked. Alex was laughing now despite her best efforts—these funny Cas moments were always so out of left field, and she wasn't good at not being one hundred perfect amused by them. "Yes, now," she said, grinning. "Bye." She closed her phone. And the realized someone was standing behind her. She turned.

"Finally called that guy from the bar, huh?" Dean asked, giving her a toothy grin. Shit, how long had he been there, and wait—what guy from what bar? Oh wait. Yeah, some guy had given her his number last week. She didn't even remember what he looked like. She ignored Dean's question and rolled her eyes, hoping he wouldn't ask again. He took a swig of the beer he was now holding and came to stand beside her, leaning over the railing. He looked at her long and hard.

"You okay?" he asked.

"Why wouldn't I be?" she asked, guarded.

"You saw Dad. Met Mom. Trippy, right?"

"That's a good word for it I guess," Alex said and thought about it a minute. She smiled really faintly, remembering fondly. "Mom was… so beautiful. And kind of a total badass."

"Right?" Dean asked. He sounded so proud.

"I think maybe she might have been able to kick my ass on a good day," Alex said, grinning crookedly. "Wish I'd known her. Even just a little while." She looked at Dean with a more tense expression, her smile gone now. "You're lucky."

He made a soft little airy sound. "Not lucky enough." Dean paused, darkening, and Alex knew he was thinking about how Mom had died, wondering if he could have stopped it.

She picked at one of her nails in distraction. "Dad was… different."

"Yeah, uh. He was." They were silent for a really long moment. Dean seemed to sense Alex's internal thoughts.

"You'll drive yourself crazy if you think about it too much," he told her.

"Think about what?"

"What would've changed," he said. "If the fire never happened."

Alex didn't have to wonder. "Everything would have changed. Everything."

She oddly found herself remembering a very random moment from childhood—God, how old had she been… maybe seven or eight? She'd been small for her age then. Dad had been teaching them to shoot shotguns.
"Hold it tight into your shoulder or the kick can break your bone," Dad said, pulling the butt of the gun into Alex's shoulder tightly, yanking her arm up so that the heavy-to-her shotgun was straighter.

Dean, watching from the sidelines, looked uncertain. "Dad, I don't think she's—"

John gave his son a dangerous, silencing look. "Dean, we've been over this. Your sister needs to be able to shoot this damn thing if she's alone and unprotected, you hear me?" He turned back to Alex, who was struggling to hold the shotgun up. "Now line up the sights and fire and," he made a frustrated, impatient sound as she struggled, "for Christsakes, hold the damn thing into your shoulder like I told you."

She tried to do what he said, to stop pissing him off, to just do something right. The shotgun had been so heavy to her, and she had barely been able to lift it, let alone solidly aim it or anything. She'd squeezed the trigger and the gun went off. And she'd tried so hard to not cry from the immediate pain when the butt of the gun slammed into her little shoulder, but she hadn't been able to stop herself. Dad had looked down at her, seeming to be annoyed, disgusted that she was acting like that. "Stop that Alex. Don't cry about it. It hurts a little now but this will save your life someday, you hear me? This will save your life." He seemed to relent a little at the sight of her distress and patted her roughly on the head. He'd crouched down to her level. She remembered how strongly he smelled of alcohol. "Sorry, Alex. Maybe you're not ready for this, huh?" he stood up as if to walk off and a switch had flipped inside Alex.

Defiant, determined, she'd glared, cocked the shotgun (a feat in and of itself) and reassumed the aiming stance, already wincing. She'd fired another shot, and the pain had been even worse the second time. John—Dad—looked proud of her then. She did it a third time, barely able to hold back tears of pain. And finally she'd gotten a, "that's my girl." And then Sam said something and called Dad over. Dad walked away. And Dean, watching silently, saw Alex break down crying silently, cradling her shoulder alone.

The bruise and the pain had lasted for weeks.

"You okay? Alex?" Dean's voice startled Alex out of the memory.

"Uh, yeah. Just thinking," she said. He nodded. He seemed to get it. For all the times Dean was an asshole to her, they really did have an understanding when it came to certain things. And Dad was one of them. Alex cleared her throat, turning her head toward him. "You know, for a little while there, I thought you guys were dead back in seventy-eight. When I couldn't find you."

Dean looked at her, expression heavy, sad. He heard what she hadn't said. "I won't leave you, Alex, not forever. You know that."

Alex shook her head, cynical eyes going down into middle space. "I don't believe you," she said, being bluntly honest. "Everyone always leaves."

Dean took another swig of his beer. "Well, not me."

Alex shot him a threatening look. "Better not." She tilted her head to the side, thinking of something, and straightened up a little bit, poked him with her index finger. "Hey, also. You owe me a damn apology."

Instead of getting pissy or defensive or asking 'what the hell for' like she thought he would—Dean nodded and stared out in front of him. "For what Gabriel showed you. Yeah, I know. And I am sorry." There was a long pause. "I didn't mean it, I was just… trying to get Dad to take me with him.” He sighed regretfully, and he sounded like he was talking to himself now. "The things I did to try and get on that man's good side." He let the thought go, turned back to her. "You're my kid sister and I'd do anything for you. You know that."

"Well, you should have apologized a lot sooner, jerk," Alex said, half-serious, half-joking.

Dean heaved a heavy sigh, getting uncomfortable. "I know. I just… these chick flick moments, man," he complained.

"Shut up," Alex teased, grinning at him, bumping his shoulder with hers. "You love them."

Dean's face changed and looked at her with maybe the most emotionally open expression she'd ever seen on his face before. He shook his head. "I love you."

Alex froze and looked at him in shock, not sure if she'd heard right. "You what? Are you… are you dying or something?" she asked. She wasn't really joking, either.

He looked a little crestfallen at her question. "Can't a big brother… tell a little sister… you know, that he loves her?"

Alex looked around for the hidden cameras. "Yeah... but you never say it, or I mean, not that often at least."

Dean set his beer down on the railing and leaned his hands both on it heavily. "I just don't wanna lose you. Or Sam."

"You won't," she said, confused by his quick apology, his expression of affection, and this cryptic statement about losing her and Sam. He turned his head and looked at her, then he reached for her, pulled her into a tight hug. Hugs from Dean usually comforted her. But this one just made her feel like something was really wrong.

That Night

In the dim light of the bedside table, the only one awake, Alex smoothed Dad's journal open, opening it to the first few pages; to the entries she'd always read the most. After seeing Dad earlier today… she felt like she needed to revisit these pages. The entries in the beginning were the most personal... they got more and more about supernatural stuff and less and less about Dad's thoughts as the journal progressed…. but in the beginning, it was just Dad, his thoughts, his worries, a glimpse into who he'd been before the hunt had overtaken him. Alex used to read and re-read some of these entries, because some parts of them had made her feel closer to Dad. She'd been able to tell from these that he'd really loved her once, that he hadn't always looked at her and seen her as an obligation.

December 4, 1983

Last night I was sitting in the kid's room, in the dark, and I heard these noises… Mike said it was the wind, and okay, maybe it was, but it sounded almost like whispering, like someone was whispering a name, under their breath, again and again… like something is out there in the dark, watching us… I stayed up all night, just watching them, protecting them. From what, I don't know. Am I protecting them? Am I hurting them? I haven't let them out of my sight since the fire. Dean still hardly talks. I try to make small talk, or ask him if he wants to throw the baseball around. Anything to make him feel like a normal kid again. He never budges from my side – or from his brother and sister. Every morning when I wake up, Dean is inside their crib, one arm wrapped around each of the twins. Like he's trying to protect them from whatever is out there in the night.
Sammy cries a lot, wanting his Mom. And Alex still doesn't make a sound. Sometimes her face scrunches up like she's crying, but no sounds come out. It scares the hell out of me and I don't know what to do. One twin can't stop crying, the other is just—silent. It breaks my heart to think that soon they won't remember Mary at all. I can't let her memory die.

December 11, 1983
Sammy has finally started sleeping through the night, and now that Dean shares a bed with him and his sister, he's out like a light as well. I'm not sure about Alex... before the fire, she always wanted to be rocked to sleep and I loved that time. She'd lay her little head on my shoulder and I'd rub her back. She would make these sweet little sleepy sounds in my ear. Now, she doesn't sleep unless she's sandwiched between her brothers. I sometimes try rocking her to sleep and she cries silently, won't hold still. It breaks my heart. I keep hoping things will return to normal, but they don't.

Alex paused sadly. That line in there about the sweet sleepy sounds. It always grabbed right at her heart. She'd always felt the love and tenderness of a father from him when she read that. That he loved to rock her to sleep as a baby and hear the sounds she'd made. The idea of him holding her close, her head resting on his shoulder in trust and attachment. Alex had all but memorized this entry when she was younger, because approval and affection were so few and far between from Dad. In fact, by the time she was old enough to read and write, he'd be all but emotionally dead to her. He'd kept her at arm's length pretty much until Sam left for Stanford. And then it had been far, far too late.

December 25, 1983
Didn't sleep again last night. Woke up in a cold sweat and realized it was Christmas. Where's Mary? That was my thought all night, and it stayed in my mind all day. Christmas without my wife seems unreal. Our celebration was clumsy... a crooked two foot tall plastic tree, a bunch of junk food stuffed in the stockings, and a pile of sports equipment for the boys... football, basketball, soccer. I didn't really know what to get for Alex, girl stuff was Mary's forte, and I got so depressed in the aisle of girl toys that I couldn't buy a thing.

I think about my reality. Mary will never see Dean hit a home run. She'll never see Alex learn to walk, or hear Sammy say his first words. She won't take Dean to his first day at school, or stay up all night with me worrying the first night he takes the car out. It's not right that she's not here, and that's all I could think about today—that and I really don't think I know how to parent alone. I'm so angry I can barely see straight – I just want my wife back.

The police have officially declared our case closed. What a Christmas present, huh?

Alex's eyes hovered over this line: I got so depressed in the aisle of girl toys that I couldn't buy a thing. Alex remembered the first time she read this journal entry and saw that line, she'd felt so guilty for being a girl; for being something that reminded her dad of his dead wife. After reading that, Alex had gotten upset (understatement, really) and brutally ripped all the arms and legs off her Barbie dolls, gotten the scissors out to cut her hair off. Dean had found her and calmed her down, stopped her from cutting off her hair. Held her tight while she cried in silence. Alex shook her head now, realizing how ironic it was, how Dean had done all the stuff a father should do for her throughout the years. He'd gotten on her case about her abysmal grades (she hadn't cared about school), he'd gotten pissed at her when she mooned around in teenage despair. He'd protected her and Sammy from dad's drunken rages. Her throat hitched as Alex thought maybe the reason she and Dean had always been so close was because they knew their Dad's anger better than Sammy did. They had always turned to each other for help making it through.

Alex turned the page and hesitated. She didn't like to read this entry, but she always did anyway, unable not to. She didn't even know why Dad had kept it in there, honestly. There were a lot of torn out pages, but this one had stayed.

February 8, 1984

Today I don't know what happened. I was trying to piece together some things I'd found from local newspapers. Stuff about bizarre murders. I was thinking maybe they were somehow related to Mary's death, because the reports said the people had died in really strange ways—their insides had completely liquified. Well, I was trying to do all this and Sammy was fussing, Alex was getting into everything (she's toddling all over the place these days) and Dean was trying to get me to help him with this Lego thing he was building. He kept trying to get me to come over, and at one point he grabbed at my arm and asked Daddy please. I don't know what came over me, but all the anger and maybe some of the alcohol too, it just set me off. I snapped at him and shoved him away, harder than I should have, and he fell backwards into little Alex, who had been walking behind him. She hit her face hard on the edge of the coffee table. She made no sound, she never does, but she was crying, her eyebrow was gashed open and bleeding. I scooped her up and yelled at Dean, about what he had done to his sister. Sammy started screaming real loud when I did that. And Dean shrank away from me.

I'm left wondering what the hell this is doing to me. If I can do this at all. Sometimes I think I should just let it go and focus on the kids.

But this is something I have to do. I have to make sure Mary's death is avenged, if it's the last thing I do. Nothing else matters as much as that.

Alex re-read the last lines, the ones that made her heart clench. Nothing else matters as much as that. She believed those words completely. Her life, her brothers' lives were evidence of that. She shut her eyes, set the journal down onto her knees.

"He was a good man. I know he was."

Alex had said this to Cas the other day. She considered for a moment her words and the meaning, the desperation and heaviness behind them. John Winchester was a good man. Or at least, she believed that he had been, once. But over the years, he forfeited his heart in favor of a mission he could never accomplish. John Winchester had lost sight of what remained, blinded by the lure of retaliation and vengeance. Nothing—no one—had mattered to him as much as the thought of killing whatever had killed Mom. And everyone around him had paid the price of his obsession. Alex's heart broke anew every time she thought of the man her father had become. She had seen with her own eyes, just today, that he wasn't always that way. Azazel had changed all of their lives, forever. Wrecked the family almost completely.

And maybe Dad got what he wanted in the end—Azazel, dead—but at what cost? Dad was dead and gone. Killing Azazel didn't bring Mom back. It didn't fix any of the problems the Winchester family had been subjected to. Yes, Alex and her brothers had survived, but just barely, and to do what? To be on their own, left to deal with the devastating emotional aftermath. All they had left was each other, and even that was falling apart.

She thought of who John Winchester had been, and who he had turned into. A man who had left his children with a cursed existence. He was a good man. I know he was. And he had been. He had been. The darkness, the warfare, it had taken who he was. Alex opened her eyes again, bowed her head, reflecting sadly that this must be what happened when a good man went to war.

At that thought, she looked over at Dean, asleep, above the covers as always. Her eyes flickered to Sam's hulking outline on the other bed beyond. They were good men. The best. And they were at a war like no other.
She would give anything to save them. But somewhere, deep inside, she had a dark, creeping fear that nothing could save them. Nothing at all.
"The heart wants what it wants."
- Emily Dickinson

Three Days Later
Plainville, Kansas
Valentine's Day

Agent Wailer—a.k.a. Alex Winchester—shrugged off her suit jacket and laid it over the chair on top of Sam and Dean's. She wore her typical FBI getup—black dress shoes (not heels—she refused) and a pale blue button-up tucked neatly into navy slacks. She'd made an effort on the hair—pulled it half back and fussed over it, made it look sort of decent for once. She glanced up at Agents Marley and Cliff—Dean and Sam. They were rolling up their sleeves because this particular examination was about to get a little messy. Alex reflected humorously that this was so typical that they would spend Valentine's Day this way.

Usually when they ran their FBI sham, they divided and conquered—Dean always headed it up, took one of the twins with him while the other one checked into other leads or just sat it out. After all, three agents in one place was unnecessary most times and tended to raise eyebrows. But none of the Winchesters had wanted to miss out on this particular case. It was weird... even for them. A couple had literally eaten each other to death—leaving very little for the coroner to let them examine, but, still. The same night that this apparently ravenous couple had eaten it (Dean's pun, not Alex's), another couple had shot and killed each other in a double suicide. It wasn't clear if the deaths were related or not. Something supernatural was definitely involved, at least on account of the couple who ate each other.

Saint James Medical Center's coroner, a rotund and jovial old guy, had done what most people did: taken one look at their FBI badges and given the Winchesters free run of the place—just instructed that they be sure and put the body parts back where they'd found them—which was the refrigerator. Dean snapped on some latex gloves then tossed a pair to each of his siblings. Alex caught hers, yanked them on, then grabbed one of the disposable blue aprons that Sam and Dean were already wearing, putting it on as she watched Sam bring over several clear containers of bloody human remains.

He set them down onto the stainless steel examination table in the middle of the room while Alex looked through drawers for tongs. "Geez, there's not much left of these people..." Dean commented as he looked over the containers and took a seat at the head of the table. He pulled one of the bins to himself.

Alex sat down across from Sam and set down a handful of tongs then opened the container in front of her—some entrails. Eugh. Nice. She was suddenly rethinking her eagerness to come along to the morgue on this one. She poked through the guts unenthusiastically with tongs and offhandedly wondered where Cas was even as she was disturbingly drawing comparisons between how similar these guts looked to canned spaghetti. She paused, not seeing what was in front of her. It had been three days since they'd physically seen him. She had texted him yesterday, not able to hold herself back anymore, needing to just know that he was still alive, basically. Are you okay? She'd asked. He'd replied about a minute later: yes. And that had been that. She had almost texted him back about ten times after that, but had stopped herself each time. Nothing she thought of to write made sense. And she still kind of got the feeling he was avoiding her, or... something. She didn't get it.
Before, she'd never really been too concerned when he disappeared. It was just his mode of operation, appearing unexpectedly, leaving without notice—but now, after seeing him so banged up and weakened, it was hard not to worry about him, not call him and demand to get a status update on his well-being. This was new: she hadn't really worried about him before... he was a freaking angel for crying out loud—but the past few days worrying about him was pretty much all she'd done. Well, she'd also replayed the time in the honeymoon suite over in her head a million times. She thought about how she'd shared things with Cas that she didn't really share with anyone else. She thought about how she'd fallen asleep on him—and subsequently slept the best she had in months (and thought she might not mind doing that again...). But most of all she thought about how she'd forgotten, briefly, about the emergency surrounding them, the whole Anna set on murdering her parents thing—in some small, still moments there with Cas, an odd peacefulness had existed between them. Alex hadn't meant for it to happen but she'd felt close to him, safe. And now, there was a noticeable, underlying pang in his absence.

She knew what it was like to miss people—but she missed him in a way she had never missed anyone else. She stabbed at the entrails in front of her bleakly. This sucked.

Dean mumbled something to himself beside Alex and she glanced at him, any good mood she'd had fading a little. Her oldest brother had been pissing her off royally the past couple days. His confrontation with Michael in Dad's body had clearly shaken him up—that much was clear to her because he'd been a little shorter tempered and meaner than usual—and he'd been drinking more than what was normal too. Dean drank a lot period point blank, so... that was just great. He'd been full on trashed last night and raging about how the music on the radio these days was shit—he'd broken the motel clock by throwing it at the wall, then slurried about how Sam needed to get a damn haircut, and then he'd promptly passed out on the floor. Alex thought it might have been funny another time. But not right now. Dean was constantly losing his temper over little things... he'd shouted at Sam the other day when he'd taken too long to decide what he wanted in the drive-thru, then snapped at Alex when she'd accidentally let some lettuce covered in mayonnaise fall out of her sandwich and onto the back seat of the Impala. She could tell he felt bad about it afterwards, but he never apologized. Just got quiet and stony-faced. Acted like nothing happened, like nothing was wrong.

"Earth to Alex," Sam said, looking at her from across the table. "You okay?"

Refocusing, remembering what she was doing, Alex nodded. "Yeah, just a little tired," she said, which was true enough. The nightmares were still plaguing her and she was tired. Sam looked at her a minute longer before returning to his examination of a heart. Dean, at the head of the table, was listlessly eyeballing another heart.

"Hey." Dean pushed the container toward Sam, really serious. "Be my Valentine?"

He got an eye roll and a 'really?' face from Sam, to which Dean gave a cheesy, fake grin.

"Give me that," Alex muttered, and pushed the container of entrails at Dean.

He took one look at it and cracked another grin. "Spaghetti, anybody?"

"Dean." Sam stopped what he was doing and gave their brother an impatient, annoyed expression. Dean just chuckled at his own joke and stirred through the entrails with the silver clamps, not really being helpful. Alex rolled her eyes and picked up the heart from the container she'd just taken from Dean. Squish. The smell of human blood—metallic and cloying—was strong, Sam, who had returned to scrutinizing the heart in front of him paused, seeming to notice something.

"Hey—guys—there's like a weird little mark on this one," he said, frowning and pulling the on-Alex was holding the heart in a gloved hand, squinting at a tiny little white mark she'd just noticed just above where the right ventricle was. What the—? "Yeah, actually—" she replied, intrigued, swiveling the magnifying glass toward herself and peering intently through it. Sure enough, there was a tiny little mark, like a brand there in the bright red tissue. It looked like a fancy letter E or maybe a 3, and it seemed familiar, but she couldn't place it. She held the heart out to Sam, who could compare the marks. "What do you think?"

Sam took it and squinted at it through the magnifying glass, then sat back, surprised. "Yeah." Sam frowned in deep thought, trying to figure it out. "These hearts both have identical marks." He glanced at Dean, then Alex, silent and thinking.

"Okay, why?" Dean asked, voicing what they all were wondering.

Sam ignored Dean, looked at Alex for a second opinion. "All right—am I crazy, or do these marks look Enochian?"

At that question, Alex grabbed the heart back from Sam. She scrutinized the little symbol again, remembering now where she'd seen something similar to it. "Huh. There's a symbol kind of like this one in the angel banishing sigil. Not identical but..." she trailed off and looked over the heart at Sam, who looked like he had a similar realization, that he was remembering too.

"Yeah," he said intently, sounding like they were onto something. He glanced up at Dean. "I definitely think it's Enochian."

"What like angel scratches?" Dean asked. He'd gotten up and was looking over Sam's shoulder.

He got a bratty look from his sister. "No, the other Enochian," she said sarcastically.

Dean gave her a 'you suck' face and stood up, fishing for his phone. "See if I share my candy stash with you ever again," he told her threateningly, putting the phone up to his ear.

Sam watched Dean walk off a couple steps then looked at Alex. He leaned closer to her, wincing playfully for effect. "He thinks there's still some left," he whispered.

Alex pulled an overly dramatic face. "We're so dead," she whispered back, and he cracked a grin at that point—and then they both dissolved into smothered laughter over the table full of bloody human remains.

"Cas, it's Dean," they heard their brother boom into the phone. "Yeah, room thirty-one C, basement level... Saint James Medical Center."

"I'm there now," came a familiar deep voice, and at the sound of it, Alex stood up and turned around, almost knocking over her chair.

Cas was standing in front of Dean. They were facing each other, phones still to their ears. "Yeah... I get that," Dean said.

There was a long pause, and Cas narrowed his eyes. "I'm... gonna hang up now," he said.

"Right," Dean said, and in unison, the two of the lowered their phones. Dean turned around, shaking his head, heading back to the examination table.
Cas pocketed his phone and turned his attention to the other Winchesters, approaching behind Dean. He looked fine—walking normally and appearing alert and well, back to his old self. Alex felt a little better to see it and hung back near the column at the opposite end of the table. "Hello Sam," Cas said first, and then his eyes slid slowly to Alex. "...hello Alex." He paused, taking in her appearance and his head tilted to the side just slightly. "You look nice."

The brothers both looked weirdly at Cas, who hadn't looked away from Alex. She looked a little surprised at his compliment. His arms hung at his sides and he had this open, matter-of-fact expression on his face, and the slightest hint of a smile at the corners of his mouth. Dean looked between them and cleared his throat, his features twisted into an unhappy expression. "Hey, Romeo—cut the chit chat and take a look at these hearts."

"Hearts?" Castiel turned his attention to Dean and walked around the edge of the table next to Dean, who was indicating the table full of human remains.

"Yeah, so, we got a couple who ate each other to death," Dean said. "And this is all that's left."

"Ate each other?" Cas repeated as if he hadn't heard right, a deep frown furrowing his brow. Dean shrugged. "Bon appetite."

Sam pushed the container toward Cas. "They both have these marks on their hearts. Looks Enochian to me. What do you think?"

Castiel picked up the heart in his bare hand, looked at the organ carefully. Alex watched him closely, noting when his expression changed from studious to apprehensive. "You're right, Sam. These are angelic marks." He sounded disturbed and glanced vaguely in Alex's direction. "I imagine you'll find similar marks on the other couples' hearts as well."

"So, what are they?" Sam asked. "I mean, what do they mean?"

"It's... a mark of union," Castiel said, and he sounded even more disturbed than before. "This man and woman were intended... to mate." He put the heart down, his hand now bloody, and, preoccupied, he shook it, wiping it against the edge of the container.

"To date?" Alex asked, thinking she had misheard.

Cas stopped wiping his hand against the container and looked at her kind of hesitantly. In the dim light of the morgue, his eyes looked so dark and full of something that made her go still, made her feel funny. "No... to mate."

Dean and Sam were exchanging a weirded-out look. "Okay, by who?" Dean asked.

Cas was rubbing his fingers together, looking at the blood left there distractedly. "Well, your people call them 'Cupid,'" he said. Alex, grabbing a paper towel from a small shelf underneath the table, frowned at him in surprise.

"Cupid? Heart and arrows Cupid?" she held out the paper towel, indicated his hand.

He looked at her fully—there was a pause—then he took the item and began to wipe his hand. "Thank you," he said. "And no, not really. There are no... arrows." He glanced at her again. "What human myth has mistaken for 'Cupid' is actually a lower order of angel." He glanced at Dean now, who looked more and more doubtful by the second. "Technically it's a cherub, third-class."

"Cherub?" Dean repeated dubiously.
"Yeah, they're all over the world," Cas said matter-of-factly. "There are dozens of them." Alex heard what he'd said, but paused, noticing he'd said 'yeah.' That was new, wasn't it? She watched him out of the corner of her eye, realizing that every time she saw him, he surprised her with the little things he was picking up, learning, implementing.

While Alex was noticing this, Dean's mind was clearly somewhere else. "Cupid? You mean the little flying fat kid in diapers?"

Cas stopped cleaning off his hand and looked at Dean with one of those squinty, I-don't-understand frowns. "They're not incontinent." Dean's face was priceless at Castiel's reply—he apparently had no response for that one. Alex either. She was watching with her arms folded, trying not to look too amused. Cas was looking at her again, frowning deeply and apparently thinking hard. She smashed her lips together, tried to look serious.

"Okay, anyway. So, what you're saying—" Sam started.

Cas looked away from Alex and cut him off, suddenly very intense, moving forward, adamant. "What I'm saying is a Cupid has gone rogue and we have to stop him—before he kills again."

The sudden burst of assertiveness startled them all. Sam looked at Cas for a couple beats, unsure of how to respond. Then in a little higher pitched voice than normal, he said, "naturally," making a weird face and nodding at the table.

Cas seemed to recognize that Sam didn't believe him and he turned to Dean, who was nodding patronizingly, narrowing his eyes and pretending to be sympathetic. "Of course we do."

Cas regarded Dean almost sadly, understanding that Dean was being facetious, and then turned to Alex slowly, reluctantly, as if expecting her to insult him, too. Alex wasn't looking at him—she was too busy giving her brothers her best bitchface at their responses. "I don't see the issue."

Dean made a sound that indicated he thought it was preposterous. "Come on, Alex, Cupid? Really?" He gave a cynical little laugh and head nod, conceding. "Well. Guess it makes sense for the romance novel addict to believe in Cupid."

The room fell completely silent at the very needless jab. Sam looked at Dean, eyebrows raised in surprise—Cas was looking at Dean too, eyes narrowed. Dean looked between Sam and Cas and put his hands up. "What?!"

Pissed off, Alex stepped a little closer to her oldest brother, brushing shoulders with Cas in the process. "You're being an asshole," she told Dean point blank. He looked like he'd never heard anything stupider. Alex held his gaze, getting madder when she thought about it. "Has Cas ever steered us wrong before? Why are you being such a jerk to him?" Dean made a face, and officially fed up with him, Alex rolled her eyes, huffed in disgust and turned around, walking a couple steps back the way she'd come. Cas watched her for a few beats, then forcefully refocused, looking between Sam and Dean. "These, uh, these couples, these people—as long as this Cupid is out there—they're in danger. We have to act quickly."

"Right. Of course. So," Dean said, still not convinced. He had his arms crossed. "How do you track down a Cupid, anyway, huh? How do we find this dude?"

Cas was thinking, looking at the floor and frowning, then he looked up again. "I suggest we find a place that is rife with romance."

Clearly not understanding, Dean looked at Cas impassively. "Speak English."
Castiel's frown deepened. "I am speaking English."

Standing at the back of the room next to another stiff on an examination table—one of the people who'd committed suicide—Alex looked up. "Like somewhere a bunch of couples in love would be?"

Cas met her questioning gaze steadily. "Yes, exactly."

"That restaurant around the corner," Sam suggested, looking at Dean and then Cas. "It is Valentine's Day after all. A lot of couples will be out for a date."

Cas seemed to hear Sam a couple seconds after he'd finished speaking—the angel looked away from Alex, a little disconcerted as Sam waited for a reply expectantly. "Uh, yes, excellent idea," Cas said, glancing at Dean and then Alex, who hadn't stopped looking at him once. "I suggest… he trailed off, eyes locked on Alex.

"Suggest what, Cas?" Dean asked impatiently, glaring at Cas and then Alex. Cas seemed to remember everyone else in the room and looked at Dean again. He seemed a little out-of-sorts. "I, uh, suggest we go there immediately."

"To stop Cupid from going Rambo." Dean summarized doubtfully, sounding less than enthused and still looking at Castiel closely, scrutinizing him. Cas seemed confused by the reference, but then seemed to decide that he agreed with whatever Dean was implying. "If that means that we prevent Cupid from further decimating the romantically coupled occupants of this town then… yes."

"Uh huh," Dean said and seemed to give up, threw his hands up then let them go where they smacked him on either leg. "Cupid. Okay! What the hell. Sign me up for crazy." He pulled off his flimsy lab apron and started slamming the container tops back onto the boxes of stuff they'd been examining.

Alex exchanged a look with Sam—what the hell was Dean's problem? Sam shrugged lightly, and she thought maybe he was thinking, 'well, that's Dean for you.' Annoyed but also reminded that yes, that was Dean for you, Alex resigned herself to deal with the bullshit. Sam stood up, took off his apron and gloves, starting to stack the containers up.

Still beside the suicide victim, Alex took off the uncomfortable plastic gloves she wore, tossing them into the waste bin. Cas went over to her, stopping right in front of her and she paused, hands on the apron string on either side of her neck. Cas said nothing, just stood there as she waited expectantly for him to say something. He didn't say anything, he just looked at her. She grew uncertain. He still he didn't say anything. She heard Dean slamming containers back into the cooler, but couldn't look away from Cas. She was actually getting sort of uncomfortable, fidgety under his gaze. Her tongue darted out nervously to wet her lips. Her stomach felt weird. Her head felt foggy. She had to work really hard to get words out. "So you, uh, you feeling better?" she asked.

There was a long pause. He almost looked like he was feeling... dreamy? It was officially starting to weird Alex out. "Yes," he said. "I am."

"Um, good." She thought she should take off her apron now but she couldn't really seem to move. His eyes were such an intense blue and held her there, and suddenly she was noticing every detail of how cute, no—handsome—he was, how captivating and kissable—whoa. Her inner monologue stopped at that point, asking... what? Did you just seriously just think that? She tried to push past the thoughts but her brain could only focus on his eyes, which were looking into hers so completely, then scanning her face, then glancing over her hair.

He seemed intrigued. "Usually your hair is down..." he said, eyes now flickering back and forth between both of hers.

She reached up and touched the side of her head, trying to remember what it looked like. He liked her hair? She smiled at him shyly, touching the end of her hair below her shoulder. This pleasant, silly haze was taking over her mind. Almost like she was high or something.

"Let's move out, weirdos," Dean said, oblivious to what was going on behind him—he was shrugging on his suit jacket, already headed out the door without a backward glance. Sam was following, his suit jacket already on. He paused by the door.

Alex looked toward the doorway, away from Cas, and suddenly, all the ooey-gooey feelings were gone and she was left wondering what had come over her—maybe she shouldn't have eaten all that stolen candy, huh? Sugar rush. Yeah, that explained it. She chanced a quick peek at Cas, who looked similarly perplexed, staring at the floor with his eyebrows moving together. Weird. Her head felt a bit strange now.

"Today, guys," Dean called—Sam waited at the door for them, but Dean was halfway down the hall already. Alex hurried, yanking off the apron and grabbing her jacket. Sam let go of the door and followed in Dean's footsteps—Alex shrugged her jacket on, pulled her hair out of the collar as she headed for the door—Cas stood there and held it open for her, watching her walk through—and she was very aware that she was staring at him the whole time too, gawking almost. She almost tripped over her own feet.

Getting mortified with her behavior and seeming lack of control, Alex focused on the shiny marble floor under her feet. Beside her, Cas matched her stride as they walked down the dim hallway. She watched his shoes with great interest, noticing how big his feet were compared to hers. And then she suddenly felt him catch her by the arm, stopping her from walking—she looked up, confused, and saw she'd almost walked smack into a column. She looked at Cas, embarrassed—and also noticing how much she liked the way his hand grasped her arm. From up ahead, Sam came back into view, from around a corner he'd already rounded. "Guys," Sam said, impatiently, then paused, giving them a weird look. "What are you doing?"

Cas let go of her arm, and they exchanged a mutually worried look. So he felt it too. What was happening? "We're, uh, coming," Alex said, trying to act like everything was peachy, grinning at Sam with her best effort. But from the way her face felt, she realized she probably looked more like a frightened chimpanzee baring its teeth than anything else. Sam gave her an even weirder look and waited for them to get to him, then walked with them the rest of the way—Dean was waiting impatiently at the exit, and then led the way outside. The Impala was parked there along the curb, but Sam pointed east and led the way. "The restaurant's this way," Sam was saying. "Just like maybe two blocks, I think."

Silently, the group of four made their way up the sidewalk and past the medical center, Dean and Sam in front. There were some shops lining the street here—a bakery and a little gift shop, a drug store, then a florist. There were red roses and hearts all over the storefront and a huge display that said "Happy Valentine's Day" in swirly script. Cas looked at it curiously as they passed by, taking it all in.

On the sidewalk ahead, there was a bouquet of red roses laying discarded on the sidewalk, as if they'd been dropped in a hurry. Cas stopped in his tracks when he reached them. He stared down at them. Alex stopped too, turning slightly to look at Cas, then Sam and Dean did too. Cas then did a very curious thing. He bent down, picked one single red rose up, and looked at it for a long moment. Then he looked up from it and to Alex, held it out to her. She looked at the flower and then him, confused. "...what are you doing?" she asked. Her brothers seemed to be wondering the same thing—Sam had a slightly amused, if perplexed look on his face, while Dean looked like he was thinking 'you have got to be shitting me.'

When Alex asked what he was doing, Castiel's expression fell just a little bit and he looked at the rose then back at her. He looked like he thought maybe he'd made a mistake. "Isn't it customary?" he asked.

Alex's eyebrows were raised then going together as her eyes narrowed. She wasn't sure if she were right or not, but as he stood there holding the flower out to her, with his bad posture and slightly confused expression... she couldn't see any other explanation. And she felt the ooey-gooey feelings coming back again as she noticed how far apart they were and how much she disliked that, how some of his hair stuck out on the side of his head and how wonderful that was. "Cas... are you asking me..." she paused, beginning to smile now, the kind of smile you smile when you just can't believe something, "are you asking me to be your Valentine?"

As if the thought hadn't occurred to him, he frowned, eyes squinted up, and he stared hard at the flower. "I... don't know." Cas looked up at her waiting gaze and he blinked a couple times, clearly not sure if he'd done the right thing or not. "Apparently... yes."

Alex felt herself smiling shyly again. Her hands were clasped together in front of herself—his frown was fading into a softer expression and she just wanted so badly to throw her arms around his neck where he could twirl her around like in the movies—

"Hey," Dean cut into her inner thoughts gruffly, "I thought there was a killer Cupid on the loose—you kids gonna stand there and flirt all day?"

Alex and Cas looked at Dean, and similarly, the weird thoughts Alex didn't quite recognize in herself ceased. Officially getting a little worried, she glanced at Cas, who looked similarly confused. But he was still holding the flower and looked so damn cute and oh God the little tuft of hair sticking out—

"Come on already," Dean barked over his shoulder, already walking away. Cas looked like he was about to drop the rose, but Alex reached over and took the flower from him. He looked at her, surprised. She grinned at him slyly, sidelong, and tucked the rose into her jacket. He hid a smile and looked down at the ground as they followed Sam and Dean. Alex noticed that they fell into step together. He had his hands in his pockets.

Sam stopped a minute later in front of a restaurant. "Pagrino's," Sam read the sign out loud, then pointed at the little sidewalk sign that was out. "Bring in your Valentine for ten percent off dinner."

"Excellent," Cas said matter-of-factly, raising his chin slightly, looking pleased. "We can receive a discount."

Dean gave a huge huff of air, disgusted but silent, and went into the restaurant. They followed him. It was dim inside, as swanky as a restaurant with booths could get. Pink roses in vases dotted the tables. Tables which were filled with couples. Cheesy hearts hung from the ceiling, tea light candles dotted every surface the restaurant had.

The hostess greeted them with a smile, looked over the four of them. "Table for two couples? Right this way."

Dean looked at Sam, who chuckled—the waitress had apparently assumed Dean and Sam, who were standing in front, were a couple. "After you, dear," Sam said, motioning with a hand for his brother to go first. Dean rolled his eyes and started after the hostess.

Cas apparently thought this was a thing, because he parroted Sam with Alex—extended a hand, indicating she go first. "After you, dear."

Alex did just that, doing her best not to bust up laughing. She went ahead and went first, smiling to herself, thinking of the rose inside her jacket and thinking of Cas, his face, his voice, his hands... what the—? She had a brief moment of wondering, again, what the hell was going on. This was more than a sugar rush. She felt giddy and strange, like she had no reign over her own reactions or thoughts, or like they were muddled, not completely her own. She blinked a couple times, as if trying to clear blurry vision.

Dean was waiting at the half-booth the hostess had taken them to and was indicating Alex sit next to him. She did, in a daze, and Dean sat down in the chair beside her. Cas was getting into the booth side of the table, sitting opposite of Alex. She avoided looking at him, purposefully, as the weird stuff seemed to get weirder when she looked at him. A couple minutes passed, where Alex stared at her menu, not reading it, peeking at Cas from over the top of it occasionally, feeling her stomach flip flop, then looking away hastily. Each time she peeked up, he was staring right back at her, eyes dark and full.

Dean, watchful and suspicious appeared to be two seconds away from demanding an explanation. Alex tried harder not to look at anything but her menu. Their waitress arrived after a couple minutes of this awkwardness, smiling widely at Dean. "What can I get you folks?"

Temporarily distracted from watching Cas, Dean handed off his menu. "Cheeseburger, fries, Corona."

"And for your lady friend?" the waitress asked, smiling at Alex.

"Same thing," Alex replied, not really paying attention.

Dean was holding up a correcting finger at the waitress, kind of amused, if a little weirded out. "Uh, not a couple, lady." Alex barely heard him. Cas was looking around the restaurant, head turned to the side—the little shaggy curls behind his ears—they were distracting. In fact, the more she thought about it, the sight of those little dark swoops behind his completely perfect ear literally seemed to devastate her soul, she felt like if she couldn't reach out and just touch them, she might die. Her heart rate was increasing and her adrenaline was growing. She felt her hand, on her knee, clench. With great effort, she tore her eyes away, freaked out. Stare at the table. Just don't look at him.

But she couldn't help it. Alex chanced another quick glance at him—and at the very same instance, saw him doing the same. They both looked away quickly.

"For you?" the waitress asked Sam.

"Chef salad with vinaigrette and water, please," Mr. Health Conscious replied. Alex smirked to herself, momentarily forgetting her distress. Sam hadn't been so health conscious a few hours ago when he was snatching a Reece's cup from her and shoveling it into his mouth.

The waitress, still addressing Sam, turned to look at Cas. "And for your boyfriend?"

Alex had to glance up at that one—Sam looked entirely unamused. Cas, realizing the waitress was talking about him, glanced up. He'd been staring hard at the little pink rose on the table. "Nothing, thank you."

"All right, shouldn't be long guys. I'll be back with drinks in a sec." The waitress left.

Cas cleared his throat, looking around at the Valentine's decor. God, even his frown was perfect, he looked so grumpy and sweet and she just really wanted to—Alex stopped herself mid-thought, forced herself to look down into her lap. What the hell!

"Valentine's Day is a curious human tradition," Cas was saying, staring at one of the little hearts hanging above their booth. "Claudius the second cancelled all marriages and engagements in Rome to try to recruit more soldiers to join his war, but Saint Valentine continued to perform marriages for young lovers in secret." He looked at Sam at this point, then Dean. "When his actions were discovered, he was sentenced to be beaten to death with clubs and to have his head cut off."

All three Winchesters looked at Cas—Sam trying to decide whether to be amused or horrified, Dean impressed and definitely amused, Alex kind of warily, breathing a little heavily.

"Wow Cas," Dean said, chuckling. "That's super romantic."

The waitress reappeared with drinks shortly and said she'd be back soon with their order. Alex cracked every single joint in her fingers slowly, feeling more and more anxious.

"I wonder if the couples in here know about the origins of what they're celebrating," Cas said across the table.

"Don't look at him."

"Maybe you should tell them," Dean wisecracked, taking a swig of his beer.

"Do you really think so?" Cas asked intently, and Alex could hear from his voice that his expression was probably cute and concerned and thoughtful and she really wanted to look at him but no don't do it. She glanced at Dean who looked like he couldn't believe his luck at Cas's naivety. She literally had to lock her neck in place to keep from looking at Cas.

"He's pulling your leg," Sam said.

There was a pause, then a disconcerted, "No he's not. I would feel it."

"He means that Dean is joking," Alex explained, looking at him without even being able to stop herself. Mistake number one, because Cas looked back at her. And their eyes locked. And her heart fluttered, actually fluttered in her chest. She saw him swallow, almost nervously—when had he looked like that before? Oh my god, it had been when he was at the strip club. But this time he didn't look scared as much as he almost looked predatory. It was her turn to swallow.

"Here you go, guys," the waitress said, setting down their food and startling Alex out of—whatever was happening in her mind.

"That was fast," Sam commented in surprise.

"Extra staff tonight, it's Valentine's," the waitress explained, the smiled at Sam. "Enjoy, lovebirds!"

"None of us are together," Dean muttered, not very amused about it anymore, but reaching for the ketchup bottle he let it go. He glanced at Cas, who was snapping out of the stare he'd been sharing with Alex. Dean missed seeing it by a millisecond. "So, what, you just happen to know Cupid likes the cosmos at this place?" Dean asked, focusing on slathering his burger in ketchup.

Cas watched him. "Uh—this place is a nexus of human reproduction. It's exactly the kind of—" he swallowed, glanced at Alex, looked down, "—of garden the Cupid will come to—to pollinate." He had his jaw set firmly, then tugged at his collar a little, like it was too tight. Alex watched him do that, taking in every detail of that hand and the way it moved—

Dean sat back and stared at his burger, suddenly looking very uninterested. Across from him, Sam paused, a forkful of salad hovering in the air. "Wait a minute. You're not hungry?"

"No," Dean said, then got defensive. "What? I'm not hungry." Alex and Sam both looked at him like he was nuts and he rolled his eyes. "Take a picture," he said, "it'll last longer."

"None of us possess a camera," Cas said, not getting the slang at all. Alex looked down at her lap, hiding a smile.

Sam, ever the helpful one, turned to the angel. "Sure you do Cas, your phone has one," he said.

Cas paused. Alex peeked up from underneath her lashes—he was looking at Sam suspiciously. "You're... teasing me."

Sam set down his fork, good natured smile on his face, and held out his hand as he made a 'gimme' signal. "No, here, lemme see it."

Cas drew his phone out of his pocket slowly and handed it over to Sam. The phone looked so small in Cas's huge hand, Alex thought morosely. Longingly.

"Look, you push this button," Sam said, showing Cas, "the camera thing pops up… then push this button..." the phone made a cheesy camera sound. "Voila."

Cas seemed thoroughly impressed, taking the phone back and staring at it in wonder. "I'm—this is very ingenious." He looked up at them, as if he couldn't believe it, coming close to a grin. And that sight was way, way, way too much for Alex.

"God in heaven, someone kill me now!" she screamed internally, sitting there gripping the table with both hands, feeling like she was going to pass out.

Cas, fascinated with the phone, held out the phone, took a photo of the rose in the vase, looked at the screen, smiled to himself. Then looked at Alex, who wasn't ready and probably looked kind of shocked, deer in headlights—but the fake camera sound went off and Cas smiled at the screen where the definitely-horrible picture was now displayed—he then glanced back up at her—she swallowed, wanting to disappear. Cas seemed to feel Dean's pissy stare and held his phone out again, snapped one of him—that would be a good one, the glare clearly saying 'I hate you' was a memory to cherish. Cas then snapped one of Sam, who was mid-bite of salad and saying "hey!" a second after the picture was taken. "I wasn't ready," Sam said through a mouthful of lettuce. Cas, however, looked at his phone, pleased. "Now I have a photo of each of you," he said proudly. "Uh no, Alex lamented internally, wanting to sob a thousand tears forever and ever. And directly after that thought, she immediately frowned, baffled at herself. A thousand tears forever? Seriously? What the actual fuck was happening to her brain?!

"Lemme blow your mind again," Dean said, completely amused at Cas's lack of technical savvy. Alex, perturbed, looked sidelong at Dean, was wishing she could tell her big brother what was happening to her because she needed help, and NOW, but was pretty sure he'd blow a gasket. Unaware of her dilemma, Dean was addressing Cas with exaggerated slowness. "You can text pictures, too."

Instead of looking thrilled, Cas looked suddenly a little downcast. "I prefer not to text," Cas said, looking down at the phone kind of peevishly now, all the previous affection he'd had for it now sullied. "The buttons are so small and the fingers are so big. Every time I make a mistake I have to write a whole new message."

He got three weird looks. Sam pointed at a key on the phone. "See this? It's a backspace button." He looked at Cas, smiling helplessly. "It erases mistakes."

Cas looked at it, frowning, then sat back in the booth. There was a long pause, and when he spoke, he sounded annoyed. "All this time that was there."

Why did he have to be so damn cute. So, so, so cute…? She felt depressed, staring at him sadly. He finally looked away from his phone and put it in his pocket.

Dean was guzzling his beer, looking around the restaurant in a cursory way while Sam stabbed another forkful of salad up. Alex was left to stare at Cas and feel her heart rate increase, her ability to breathe lessen. He felt her gaze and looked up at her from his lap, expression dark and intense, his chin lowered, his eyes darkening and devouring her almost, and Alex felt like everything else just went away, it was just them and the things she wanted to do with him—and then he seemed to shake himself, get a little freaked out, the dark desire in his eyes lessening in place of confusion and fear. He looked at her burger, almost sounding panicked. "I want that," he said, and reached for it.

Spell broken, Alex watched him in confusion. "Uh, sure?" she said, and he took a huge bite, chewed viciously, staring at Alex the whole time.

For a minute, she felt like herself again and watched him, completely mystified. Something was really weird about all this. No, not even weird, wrong. She was suddenly watching the way his jaw worked as he chewed, her head listlessly tilting to the side—how did he look so good even while chewing food like a moron? God, he was so damn hot that all she wanted to do was throw the table aside and then—she snapped back to attention, catching herself again. Cas had stopped mid-chew, looked to his left. "He's here," Cas said through a mouthful of food, suddenly alert.

They all looked at where he was looking—all they saw were couples. "Where?" Sam asked. "I don't see anything."

"There," Cas indicated a couple that was making out.

"You mean the same-side-of-the-booth couple over there?" Dean asked.

Cas set down his burger and announced: "Meet me in the back." Then he disappeared.

"Why can't he just walk like a normal person?" Dean complained, throwing down his napkin and getting up. Alex scooted out of the booth in a trancelike state, wondering if she were the only one feeling strange. She felt scared of herself and paranoid.

Dean lead the way back toward the kitchen, ignoring the questioning looks from the staff as they entered.

Alex leaned close to Sam as they followed Dean. "You feeling okay?" she asked him in a hushed, worried tone.

"Yeah why?" Sam asked, glancing down at her with a slight frown.

Alex shrugged, worried her lower lip with her teeth. "I dunno, I think something must have been in that candy. I feel kind of… uh, weird." Sam shrugged too, like he had nothing to offer or add. That wasn't comforting.
They found Cas in the dingy back store room with his back to them. His hand was outstretched unmovingly into thin air. "Cas, where is he?" Sam asked striding into the room and looking around in confusion. Just behind him, Dean and Alex came to a stop.

"I have him tethered," Cas muttered, then began to speak Enochian in deep, velvet tones. "Zo da ka ma mah rana. Manifest yourself."

There was a long silence in which Sam, Dean, and Alex all looked around the room expectantly. Dean's patience gave out and he walked toward Cas slightly. "So where is he?" he asked, his tone suggesting that Cas had led them on a wild goose chase.

"Here I am!" Came a new voice, and Alex jumped—beside her, Dean had been grabbed by a giant, naked, fat guy, who was bear-hugging him from behind and giggling madly, shaking Dean like a rag-doll. The shock alone of the sight made Alex freeze for a second.

"Help!" Dean wheezed, and Alex, not knowing what else to do, whipped out her hunting knife. Cas was suddenly beside her, holding his arm out in front of her. "There's no need for the knife."

"Are you sure?" she asked, turning her head to look at him in supreme doubt. He looked back at her, and again, the second their eyes met, they were both rendered useless, just staring at each other.

Alex felt her freaked-out expression fade. He was really the most handsome, gorgeous creature in all of heaven or earth, she thought to herself, then without warning the naked guy barreled into Cas, saying, "Hello, you!"

Alex jumped back in surprise as Cas was manhandled in an enthusiastic hug. "What the hell is happening?!" she demanded of no one in particular.

"This is Cupid?" Dean asked in marked disbelief.

"Yes," Cas managed to reply in a strained voice—it was a very tight hug.

Cupid looked back their way, set Cas down, setting his sights on Sam. "And look at you, huh?" Cupid exclaimed, striding happily toward Sam, who looked terrified. Alex cowered behind Dean, hoping to be overlooked by the very naked and flabby Cupid.

"No," Sam said, seeing what was about to happen and, turned fast on his heel to leave, but suddenly Cupid was in front of him and grabbing poor Sam into a very enthusiastic hug. This is the point in time where Alex began to slowly shrink back toward Dean, who she figured she could hide behind.

"Yes! Yes, yes, yes!" Cupid responded in growing enthusiasm.

Dean turned to Cas, not sure what to do and panicked. "Is this a fight?" he demanded. "Are we in a fight?"

Cas came forward to where Alex and Dean stood, shook his head slightly, eyes fixed on Cupid. "This is... their handshake."

"Handshake?" Cupid was hugging Sam with way too much affection, nuzzling his head into Sam's neck, eyes closed in what looked like bliss. "Well I don't like it!" Dean announced.

Cas seemed to concede, glancing at Dean for just a second. "No one likes it."
"Why does he have to be naked?" Alex asked despondently, watching Cupid shake Sam around and cuddle him. The sounds of grossed-out protest that Sam was making... were really pitiable. The whole scene was like reality television... horrible to look at, but you just couldn't look away.

As if he knew she was thinking about him, Cupid suddenly opened his eyes, looked right at her, grinned. "And Alex..." he said, like he was seeing an old friend he'd missed very much.

He let go of Sam (who looked traumatized) darted forward toward her, but in between Cas and Dean, Alex held her knife up fast, the glinting tip aimed right at Cupid's chest. "No, okay? No."

Cas had stepped up a little, in front of her, his shoulder and arm blocking half of her body from Cupid's approach. With the multiple deterrents, Cupid stopped and sighed, made a sad face, then decided to be coy. "Playing hard to get, huh? I guess I'll let it slide for now. But I'll get a hug from you yet, cutie!"

Alex shrank a little closer to Cas, not taking her eyes off Cupid for a second. She'd never thought a hug could be scary before.

Cupid heaved a deep, happy, self-satisfied sigh. "All right, so—what can I do for you?" he asked happily.

"Why are you doing this?" Castiel asked, no nonsense.

"Doing what?" Cupid asked, wrinkling his nose playfully, a wide, open-mouthed smile on his face.

"Your targets—the ones you've marked—they're slaughtering each other."

Cupid's face fell immediately when Cas told him that. "What?" He almost completely shocked, then sad. "They are?"

"Listen, birthday suit, we know, okay?" Dean accused harshly. "Don't play dumb—we know you been flittin' around, popping people with your poison arrow, making them murder each other!"

"What we don't know is why." Cas said, much calmer than Dean. In between and behind Dean and Cas, Alex watched Cupid worrying his lip with his finger. He looked positively heartbroken.

"You think that I—" Cupid started, and his chin quivered. "That I would—" he wrung his hands over his belly. "Well, uh... I don't know what to say." His voice broke, he put a hand on his face, and began to cry, walked around Dean—Alex edged herself back and around Cas, who was turning to watch Cupid—who had gone to the back of the room and was giving them a great view of his saggy ass as he bent forward and cried softly.

Sam finally approached Cas, Dean, and Alex, and the four of them watched in disbelief as Cupid's shoulders shook. Alex put away her knife finally. "Great. We made Cupid—giant, crying naked fat man—cry," she said dryly.

Behind her, Sam hesitated. "Should... should somebody maybe... go talk to him?" he asked.

"Yeah, that's a good idea," Dean said, and clapped a surprised Alex on the shoulder. "This seems like your area Alex," he said, and nodded toward Cupid.

She gave him an 'are you serious' look. "What? Cuz I'm a girl? What if he hugs me?" Dean shrugged, as if to say, 'who cares'. Alex huffed, looked at Cupid's back hesitantly. "Fine. I'll try," she muttered.
Wincing, she approached him slowly, gingerly. Cas trailed her slightly, taking a couple steps forward, watchful.

"Hey, uh—champ." Alex said to Cupid. He was still crying and faced away,. "Uh… we didn't mean to upset you… uh…"

Suddenly Cupid turned around, shaking with tears, grabbed her and pulled her close, even as she made a surprised sound. Behind her, all three men had jumped in surprise. "Oh god. Please stop," Alex protested, squeezing her eyes shut and trying not to feel things. He was hugging her so tightly.

"Uh, gross," Sam muttered, while Dean and Cas were taking action.

Dean was pushing, kind of in vain (angel strength and all) on Cupid's shoulder—"Hey, get your junk off of her, man!"

Cas successfully pushed Cupid and Alex apart with his hands, one on either's shoulder, telling him almost threateningly, "that's enough, Cupid."

Cupid looked a little befuddled, but then just looked at them appealingly. "Look guys, I would never—ever—kill anyone! I love life. I love love. Love is more than a word to me, you know. I love love. I love it! And if that's wrong, I don't want to be right!" He looked at Alex, who was once again kind of behind Cas, peering out from behind his shoulder.

Cupid seemed to be waiting for her to agree with him. Dean shrugged at her, and Alex looked back at Cupid, not having a clue what he was talking about. "Yeah... uh, love is... so *great..." she said, and Cupid grinned now, put his hands on his hips—*ughhh—*Alex looked away.

"I knew you'd agree with me, Alex!" Cupid announced jovially.

"Yeah. Uh," Alex looked back at him, kind of squinting, trying not to see all of him. "Just, um, tell us what you know, okay?"

"I was just on my appointed rounds!" Cupid explained with great emotion and worry. "Whatever my targets do after that—that's nothing to do with me. I—I was following my orders." He seemed to get an idea then, looked at Cas, enthusiastic again, optimistic. "Brother! Please brother. Read my mind. Read my mind, you'll see."

Cas pivoted his chin down, stared into Cupid's eyes deeply for a minute, and Dean cocked an eyebrow at Alex, as he were asking 'you seeing this?'—then Cas looked at Dean, resigned. "He's telling the truth."

Relieved, Cupid sighed dramatically, crossed his eyes for a second. "Jiminy Christmas. Thank you!"

"Wait, wait, you said—you said you were just following orders?" Dean asked.

"Mm-hmm!" Cupid nodded up and down rapidly.

"Whose orders?" Dean demanded. He was approaching Cupid now, and Cas moved back a bit, Alex stepping back with him in tandem.

"*Whose?" Cupid laughed merrily at Dean's question, his eyes crinkling up in mirth. "Heaven, silly. Heaven."

Clearly getting pissed, Dean spread his hands. "And why does heaven care if Harry meets Sally?!"
"Oh, well mostly they don't," Cupid responded, suddenly calm and reasonable in the face of Dean's rage. "You know, certain bloodlines, certain destinies." Manic, he grinned at the Winchester siblings, ending with Alex, pointing a vague finger at her, then waving it toward Sam, too. "Oh, like yours!"

"What?" Alex and Sam asked in unison, then exchanged a brief glance. In front and beside of Alex, Cas questioningly tilted his head to the side and she glanced up at him, yet again noticing those damn curls behind his ears—she couldn't look away, lost in thoughts of reaching out and touching him...

"Yeah, the union of John and Mary Winchester," Cupid was saying. "Very big deal upstairs, top priority arrangement. Mmm-hmm."

Alex snapped out of it, frowning to herself.

"Are you saying that you fixed up our parents?" Dean was asking in a deadly tone.

"Well, not me, but..." Cupid grinned again, "Yeah! Well, and it wasn't easy, either. Ooh, they couldn't stand each other at first!" Alex looked at Sam, whose expression was unreadable as Cupid continued. "But when we were done with them—perfect couple!" Cupid chuckled deeply and his belly jiggled.

"Perfect?" Dean repeated, incredulous, like he were daring Cupid to be serious.

"Perfect!" Cupid repeated happily.

"They're dead!" Dean all but shouted.

Cupid's smile faltered into sympathy. "I'm sorry, but... the orders were very clear. You and your brother and sister needed to be born." The manic grin was back. "Your parents were just... meant to be!" He laughed again, put his hands in the air in front of himself, began to sing and wave his hands back and forth, off in his own little world. "A match made in heaven—heaven!"

Dean looked like he was about to lose his mind, stepping closer to Cupid threateningly. "Okay listen douchebag!" he thundered at maximum volume, and Cupid froze in shock. "Stop the damn singing and tell me right now—" Dean jabbed a finger back at Alex, who was watching her brother with uncertainty and then disbelief. "Does she have one of your angel tattoos on her heart?" Dean demanded in a rage.

Cupid, confused and clearly a little afraid, cowered back slightly. "My what?"

Alex, mouth hanging open and thinking she knew what Dean was getting at, glanced up at Cas, who was looking back at her, inscrutable, but... my god. She almost thought, from the look on his face, that he was thinking the same thing... did the two of them have the marks? But why would Cas be thinking that too, because he hadn't seen 2014 like she had and—my god, his stubble, it was so beautiful and rough looking, she wondered what it would feel like to rub with the palm of her hand—shit, shit, she tore her eyes away from him, shaking almost.

Dean was in Cupid's face now. "Your angel mark things have a habit of getting the people I love killed," he roared, "so you better fucking tell me right now—" he grabbed Cupid by both shoulders.

Sam protested, "Dean, whoa!" and darted forward, pulled his angry brother back. Cas had an arm out to stop Alex from intervening, but she wasn't moving at all. It was safer here with him.

Cupid shrugged cautiously, his previous fear replaced with a huge, stupid grin. "Like it or not Dean, some things are just meant to be!” he said vaguely, and Dean's expression smoldered in hatred. "It's a whole new world!” Cupid exclaimed. He began to sing again. "A whole new wooworld, a new fantastic point of vi—"

Dean yanked himself out of Sam's grip, hauled back and punched Cupid… and then promptly whirled, bent over, holding his fist, his face distorted in pain. "Son of a bitch," he managed, strained.

Sam threw his hands up in exasperation. "Seriously, Dean?"

Dean responded by groaning and looking back at where Cupid had been standing—but he was gone. "Where is he? Where'd he go?!" Dean demanded through the pain he was clearly feeling.

Cas, annoyed, looked at Dean plainly. "I believe you upset him."

"Upset him?!" Dean retorted, walking off a few steps, shaking out his fist.

Sam, trying to control his anger, followed, dead serious. "Dean. Enough!" He told him intensely.

Dean stared back angrily. "What?!"

"You just punched a Cupid!" Sam accused.

Dean's immediate, fiery response was, "I punched a dick!"

Alex, finally leaving her hiding place, tried a gentler approach. "Calm down Dean," she said, to which he just put his hands on his hips and pursed his lips, stared at the ceiling angrily.

Sam looked at his twin for support, who shrugged helplessly. Sam looked so done—he had clearly had it and wasn't going to put up with it any longer. He was barely holding in his anger, Alex could tell from the way he moved and talked with his hands. "Um... so are we gonna talk about what's been up with you lately, or not?" Sam demanded of his brother.

Dean stared back for a beat, then his glare returned at full force. "Or not." And without anything further, Dean brushed past Sam, didn't look at Alex, just stalked out of the room, leaving his siblings to stare after him in something between disappointment and dejection.

A tense five seconds of silence passed. "I mean, that was out of line, right?" Sam asked Alex in frustration, turning to her with a conflicted expression.

"Yeah," she agreed, shrugged and shaking her head, feeling disheartened by the entire thing. Dean flying off the handle, freaking out over the heart-mark. God, though, she wondered. Did she, maybe? She glanced at Cas, who was frowning intensely at Sam. Did he? Were they meant to be together, is that why they'd been together in 2014?

"What do you mean, Sam?" Cas asked. "About… what's been… 'up' with Dean lately?"

Sam shrugged, exasperated. "He's been weird lately. I dunno."

"If by weird you mean 'jerk' then yeah I agree. But it's just his personality." Alex said cynically. She didn't really mean it, but it sadly felt kind of good to insult him after the past few days.

Distracted and on edge, Sam shook his head. "No, it's not. There's something bothering him."

"Everything is bothering him," Alex retorted.
Sam gave her a look like he knew that, but hadn't wanted to say it. He sighed heavily, resigned. "Lemme go find him."

Sam left, heading the direction that Dean had gone. This was ridiculous, Alex thought to herself. Dean punching Cupid, interrogating him about Mom and Dad and herself and then trying to lay him out. Alex turned to Cas, realizing that they were alone—and she suddenly was afraid of what she might do in this crazed mindset of hers—but just then Cupid reappeared in front of them, looking around with a wide-eyed, cartoonish expression. Without even thinking, Alex clutched at Cas's arm so tightly that she slammed flush into his side. She immediately noticed how solid and warm he felt beside her and she never wanted to leave his side or—dammit! Alex gritted her teeth together. She wanted to smash herself in the foot with an anvil—anything to stop thinking these crazy, distracting thoughts!

"Is the mean man gone?" Cupid asked anxiously. Who, Dean?

"Yes," Cas said, understanding. "The mean man is gone."

"He hurt me," Cupid said sadly. Then shrugged, his expression changing quickly to upbeat once again. "He tried to hurt me." He waved his hand in dismissal. "But it's okay. I'm fine!" he laughed openly, and Cas looked down at Alex then.

She knew she shouldn't, but she looked back, and there they froze for a second, then Cas blinked hard, looked away, rattled, looked at Cupid in confusion. "Is there... uh, is there a reason you've returned?" he asked Cupid.

Cupid just folded his arms across his hairy chest, gave a long and happy gusty sigh and smiled at them. "Oh. I just wanted to admire you a little longer." He began humming Whole New World again, and Alex stared at him, utterly lost. Cupid clapped his hands together and rubbed them gleefully. "Yes sir, this is a good one! Possibly the best one ever!" he exclaimed. And then disappeared as suddenly as he'd appeared.

Alex stared blankly at the spot where he'd been. "What...?" she asked, and looked at Cas for an explanation. Then noticed that his jacket had gotten a little messed up—probably when Cupid picked him up to hug him. "Your coat's a little crooked," she said, and grasped the lapels, straightened the coat. And then didn't let go. She could feel his eyes boring down onto her and she was suddenly very, very aware of how close he was and how badly she wanted to yank him to her and kiss him until there was no tomorrow—she looked up into his eyes and saw his expression was dark and full of intent. His hands came up to grasp her around the wrists, his expression wobbled, brief confusion flashing across his eyes. Then it was gone and he was looking at her like he wanted her, his hands slid down from her wrists, skimming the length of her forearm and then his hands came to rest on either side of her hips, melting her like butter—his face was slowly tilting down toward her—

"Uhh, guys?"

They froze. Sam was at the door, looking really, really confused. Cas and Alex looked at him blankly, still completely frozen. "Uh, pretty sure Dean ditched us." Sam squinted at them, came forward a couple steps. Cas and Alex separated at this point, looking at their feet and the ground in general. Alex hugged herself, Cas's arms hung useless at his sides. "Is... something going on?" Sam asked, confused and suspicious and also trying to hold back a smile too it looked like.

"Nope," Alex said, forcing herself to look up at him. She had a wan smile plastered across her face and Sam didn't look like he believed her—at all—but he nodded (eyes still narrowed in suspicion) and then looked at Cas, who was looking back at Sam with a priceless expression: wide, innocent, eyes, his mouth in a line, forehead all wrinkled up from how high his eyebrows were raised.

Sam cleared his throat, gave them both one more 'yeah right' glance and then dropped it, mercifully. He cleared his throat. "Listen, Cas—you mind zapping us over the the Palm Motel? Room twenty-six?"

No sooner than had he finished asking the question than they were standing in the motel room. Sam looked impressed or startled. "...I guess that's a yes." He thought of something, frowned. "Should have gotten my salad to go," he said sadly. Cas disappeared, and the twins looked at the spot where he'd been standing, mystified. Sam took off his suit jacket, sighed tiredly, then looked at Alex the way he did when he knew something was up. "Okay, so what was—" he started, but then Cas suddenly reappeared with two familiar plates—Sam's half eaten salad, and Alex's burger (one a huge Cas-sized bite missing).

"Your salad, to go," Cas announced.

Sam again looked impressed, then took the plate, shrugging, nodding, in a little bit of a better mood. "Uh, thanks, Cas."

Cas held out the remaining plate toward Alex who was avoiding his gaze. She felt like herself again, and deeply disturbed. "Not too hungry," she said, sat on the edge of one of the beds, troubled. Cas looked personally affronted that she didn't want the burger. "But you didn't eat anything," he stated. He set the plate down, looked at her piercingly. She stared at his feet. "What can I get you? What would you like?" he asked. She glanced up at him. He was being so weird. Well, he was always weird, but this was weirder than usual. What would she like?

You, she almost said, and went wide-eyed, staring down at her lap. Shit, get a grip Alex! "I'd like… a um, a, uh, cupcakes," she said down into her lap, saying the second thing that came to mind. Cas was suddenly gone again. "No, I wasn't serious," Alex protested into thin air, then let out an exasperated breath.

"He's a spastic little guy, huh?" Sam commented, eyeing Alex closely.

She said nothing, just chewed the inside of her mouth, thinking hard, ready to change the subject. "Okay, Sam, if Cupid's not the culprit for those weird murders... something else is, right?" she asked. He clearly saw what she was trying to do and looked at her like 'really?' but she just continued. "The question is, what? I've never heard of a bump in the night that uses angel marks to target victims. I don't remember anything like this case happening ever before."

"Me either," Sam replied automatically, set his plate aside. "So about earlier—" he tried again, but was interrupted by Cas appearing again. He was holding a box marked Magnolia Bakery—best cupcakes in the US.

"I got cupcakes," he said simply, looked at the box. "The best cupcakes in the US." Alex and Sam both looked at him speechlessly. Alex stood up slowly, taking in the sight of him standing there in front of her, so close and within reach. He looked so damn ridiculous and perfect there in that ill-fitting trench coat holding that box of sweets and she was tempted to grab him, whirl him around, slam him down on the bed, have her way with—

The door to the motel room opened and Alex swallowed, blinked. She was literally starting to sweat. This was not good. She almost felt like she might act on these urges, they got more intense every time, more consuming. More insatiable. It was Dean coming in, and he started when he saw them all. He must have forgotten that the angel could zap them anywhere faster than Dean could drive. His expression went from troubled to guarded in one second flat.
"Thanks for the ride, Dean," Sam said to him.

Dean tossed his suit jacket onto a coat hangar on the wall. "Shut up." He stopped, sights set on Cas. He took one look at the cupcake box and Dean pointed at him roughly, looking murderous. "You. Me. Outside—now."

Cas complied, still holding the box, and Dean held up a hand, looked at him hard. "Leave the damn cupcakes, Cas!"

The angel set down the box on the kitchenette counter, then followed Dean back out the door. Alex and Sam, who had watched the exchange in shocked silence stared, then Alex stood up, not sure if she should let this happen—Cas glanced back at her uncertainly, and Dean, already looking at Alex, gave her one of the most commanding glares he ever had. "Stay here, Alexandra," he growled, "don't even think about following us." Alex felt her mouth drop open, shocked into stillness.

"Alexandra?" she repeated in abject disbelief as the door slammed behind the two men. He hadn't called her that since… since Dad died and he'd flown into a fit of rage and trashed the Impala. Sam looked similarly shocked. The twins looked at each other. What was happening?

Alex got up and went into the bathroom, avoiding Sam's questioning gaze and reality altogether. What was happening to her? She looked in the mirror, seeing a scared-shitless face staring back.

Outside the motel room, Cas and Dean stood in the flickering light of the dying overhead light. It was dark out now.

"All right look Cas," Dean started bluntly, not bothering to be polite or watch his tone. "I've tried to bite my tongue but I can't anymore—all that googley eyed crap in the restaurant and will you be my valentine shit—what the hell was that, huh?"

Cas looked unsure, speechless even, and Dean stepped a little closer, lowered his voice. "I don't know what your weird deal is with my sister, Cas, but it needs to stop, and pronto, you hear me!?"

Dean was getting out of breath, he was so livid. He walked a couple steps off from Cas, trying to calm down. "Listen," he ranted, whirling around and jabbed his pointer finger down for emphasis, "I may not have much in this hell-hole world but I got Sam and I got Alex and I'll be damned if I let either of them sign their own death warrant!"

"Dean, I—" Cas tried, but Dean cut him off, coming back toward him angrily, his index finger waving angrily.

"I saw the future, Cas, the future where Alex is dead and Sam is Satan's muppet, so don't think you can just explain away this shit!"

Cas tried to speak again, but Dean refused to give way. However, he was starting to sound less angry, more desperate. "Cas, man, Alex's death warrant is you! So you tell me what I'm supposed to do when I see the way she looks at you—when you do nothing but stare at her all day long!"

"Enough, Dean," Cas said grimly, looking down to his right.

"Enough?" Dean repeated incredulously.

"Yes, enough," Cas said, and looked at the other man squarely in the eye. "You're... mistaken." He let those words hang for a beat, then took a couple steps away from the motel, down off the sidewalk and into the parking lot. He stared up at the sky solemnly. "Dean I've... I've seen this future to which you're referencing." He looked away from the sky, eyes going down and to the side, in Dean's direction. "I've seen everything."

Behind him, Dean was momentarily shocked into silence. "Everything?"

"Yes," Cas confirmed heavily. His eyes flickered over the sky above him once again as he looked up. "I know that in it, Alex dies because of me. And Dean, I promise you—I will not allow it to happen. Any of it." He turned back around to face Dean, who was stepping off the sidewalk, joining Cas on the pavement, his expression terse.

"I apologize Dean," Cas said wearily. "I don't mean it—the things you accuse me of—the way you perceive my relationship to her. I'm her protector. There is a special, profound bond between angels and the ones they protect." He paused, then looked at Dean openly. "I feel the same bond for you."

Dean made a face and recoiled just slightly, looking Cas up and down. Unexpectedly, a little humor returned to his voice and demeanor. "Well I don't know how I feel about that, Cas."

"If to a lesser degree," Cas clarified quickly, realizing Dean's implication. "After all, I was never assigned as your guardian. Simply your rescuer."

Dean shook himself, because Cas sounded convincing and sad and worried and Dean didn't want to be suckered. He remembered 2014 too clearly. "Yeah that's all great Cas," he said, voice returning to a gruff, assertive tone, "but explain to me how you and Alex end up together— together—" he emphasized meaningfully, "four years into the future from now."

Cas's stoic expression flickered. "I'm—I'm unsure." He had looked away from Dean. "It doesn't happen unless I'm human." He drew in a breath and refocused, looked at Dean again. "Dean, I'm an angel. She's a human. We're not compatible. Please, understand this." Cas's expression was inscrutable. "Think about it, Dean. I don't feel things the way you feel them. I'm not human. I'm incapable of… that."

"Of what?" Dean asked, not following.

Cas looked irritated that he had to spell it out. "Human romance. Love." His eyes faltered away. He sounded bleak. "Whatever you want to call it."

"...But when you lose your angel juice it's a different story," Dean stated darkly, a question without being a question, and Cas said nothing, just looked down.

"This is why it's more important than ever, Dean, that we find a way to stop Lucifer. To prevent that future from happening." He shook his head slowly, deliberately, and to Dean, the angel looked his age momentarily—thousands of years old and so weary. "I don't want Sam to be taken by Lucifer," he said. Paused, staring unblinkingly at the ground. "I don't want Alex to die." His voice had softened, but then he set his jaw firmly, looked at Dean unflinchingly, his voice lowering again. "I'll do whatever it takes to prevent these things."

There was a fierce and rigid resolve in Cas's voice and demeanor and Dean let out a deep, disturbed breath, trying to figure out how to react. This situation, his assumptions, Alex and this angel—every time Dean thought maybe he was going nuts and making stuff up, something else happened that supported that creeping fear that Castiel and Alex were hurtling toward each other. Dean was distracted as hell in his own thoughts and world right now, but he had caught some weird moments between Cas and Alex today, and he wanted to believe Cas, that it was just some kind of weirdo guardian angel protector crap—Cas was an awkward dude to begin with but—the way this guy looked at his sister. He just wasn't sure. Maybe it was that deep down, he didn't like anyone but himself and Sammy to be protective of her. He kind of felt like no one else had the right. Not after all Dean had been through to keep her safe throughout the years. Alex was his responsibility, and more than that, one of the only things left Dean loved in the world. Cas just wanted to swoop in and take her from him, and he didn't like that.

He eyed Cas carefully. Maybe it wasn't romantic for Cas, but Alex—that was a different story. Dean knew it on instinct that she was majorly into Cas, had some kind of fantasy crush on him and Cas didn't make it any harder for her with his weird gazes and comments and—dammit, this wasn't good. This whole thing just bothered him at his deepest levels. However, for the moment, he decided, grudgingly, to play peace keeper. "Yeah, good," he said absently. "Fine. We'll touch base with you tomorrow."

Cas looked confused, took a stuttering step forward. "I should stay and watch over you."

Wow, he thought he was being subtle, didn't he?

"Over me, Cas?" Dean asked conspiratorially. He felt a surge of protectiveness, possessiveness, righteous anger. "I'm her protector, Cas. Me." He stepped back, not dropping Cas's gaze. "Always have been. Always will be," he said solemnly, almost feeling like he was laying claim to Alex in that moment. And she wasn't a piece of property like that, but Dean knew the only person in the world he trusted to keep her safe was himself. No one else. Cas looked awash in confusion now, of course. He always looked confused, the damn super-powered moron. "Conversation's over, Cas."

Dean regarded Cas a second longer, sarcastic now, defensive. "I'll let you know when you're needed."

And he turned, leaving Cas standing there. When Dean got to the door and glanced back, Castiel was gone.

---

Dean reentered the motel room to find Sam standing by the shut bathroom door, arms folded—he looked very unhappy.

"Oh, so you ran him off, too?" Sam asked, noticing Cas's absence.

Dean just gave him an impatient look, sidestepped. "What are you talking about?"

Equally impatient, Sam pinched the bridge of his nose, then let it go, expelling a heavy breath, gestured to the closed bathroom door. "You upset her."

Dean made a face. "I upset her? Was I the only one that saw the weird ass shit between them today?"

Oh definitely not—but Dean did not need to know what Sam had seen. Sam would figure that whole Cas and Alex looking like they were about to kiss thing later. Right now, he needed to get Dean to explain himself, to calm down. "Dean—" Sam started, then paused, restarted. "Okay, look, that's beside the point. You gotta level with me, man. What is with you lately?"

Dean shot his brother a dangerous glare. "I told you before—screw off."

Sam got a little madder but stood his ground, approached Dean, controlling himself. He wasn't going to back down on this one, wasn't going to let his older brother push him around and set him off. "No, Dean, I want to talk about this."

Dean, disgusted and cagey yanked his jacket down from where he'd hung it just a couple minutes ago. "Forget this, I'm going out."
"You just got back!" Sam protested. He didn't get a response—Dean slammed the door in Sam's face.

Sam spread his arms out in helpless frustration, ran a hand through his hair, circled back toward the shut bathroom door. Great, just great. Both of his siblings were refusing to talk to him and had him going crazy.

First there was Dean, acting like nothing was wrong when clearly something really was, and now Alex… something was wrong with her, too, and maybe had been for awhile, now that Sam considered. Maybe since Dean had died, since Sam had left her alone with Bobby. He felt a twinge of guilt. If Alex falling apart was in any way his fault… after all the crap he'd put her through… Sam leaned against the wall, hung his head, scrubbed his forehead with the palm of his hand. She didn't deserve any of this—the constant hardship she was dragged through, the uncertainty of what tomorrow would bring. The Michael Lucifer thing hanging over her head. She must be freaked, he realized. At the thought of being left alone in the world if the angels got their way with himself and Dean.

Sam had gone out into the world and had friends and acquaintances, but Dean and Alex—all they'd ever had was each other. If he and Dean died or disappeared, who would she have? It was a sad jumbled little world they lived in. Not many people would understand what the Winchesters went through, the things they fought, the dark things they carried.

Out of the blue, Sam found himself remembering something from childhood—the series of crayon drawings Alex had made of these animal characters from her imagination. There had been three animals, and each of them represented one of the siblings—there was Bear, who was Sam, Lion, who was Dean, and Mouse, who was Alex. Bear and Lion had been huge animals with fierce claws and superhero capes. Alex had drawn Mouse, tiny, cute, furry little Mouse with a machine gun and or a machete in the illustrations. She'd written/drawn all these zany little adventures for the three of them. Sam's heart swelled unexpectedly at the memory. For all the crap in their childhood, there were some good memories, too, mostly to do with her and Dean. And dammit, he loved them both a lot. Maybe he wasn't good at it, but he loved them as best he could.

He looked toward the bathroom, into the wall at his side. She was in there, probably sitting on the floor and staring into space. He knew she wanted to be left alone, but he really felt like she needed someone to talk to. Yeah, he was pretty frigging curious about what he'd seen back at the restaurant—that embrace between Cas and his sister—but he could wait on finding that out, he just wanted to make sure she was okay.

It was weird though, catching them like that, and had definitely surprised him. Maybe Dean, who Sam had thought was being a little nutso before—maybe Dean was right about them. He pictured them together, as a couple, thought about it hard. And maybe he was a sucker or something, but the thought of an angel and a human finding happiness together didn't seem as bad as Dean seemed to think.

He stopped, deciding that he shouldn't be thinking about this too hard—he might have misinterpreted what he'd seen, after all. All he knew for sure was that his sister was upset and he didn't want her to be. Sam raised his hand, knocked lightly on the door. "Hey, Mouse?" he paused, listening. He hadn't called her that in forever… definitely not for a couple years at least. Would she even remember?

"Yeah?" she asked after a minute.

He couldn't tell, from her voice, what she was thinking. He paused, then settled on, "I'll be out here if you need me."
There was a long pause. Then a quiet reply that made him smile softly. "Okay, Bear." She did remember.

---

The Next Day

Castiel sat in Big Frank's Burger Hut, eating yet another burger. It was around dinner time and he had been here all day, alone in a booth and surrounded by a growing amount of shiny silver wrappers. He dimly reflected on how strange this was. He had eaten perhaps forty of them in the past few hours, and had no plans of stopping. They were the only thing that seemed to help. He swallowed slowly. It was interesting. The combination of ingredients seemed to meld perfectly—warm melty cheese, cool strips of shredded lettuce, the savory meat patty, the tang of some kind of sauce, the acid of some onion, the dryness and softness of the bun. The slight crunch of the sesame seeds on top. It was quite enjoyable. He found that he liked how the differing textures and tastes came together and ceased to be separate as he chewed each bite, the teeth rendering the solid food into a different substance altogether.

Yesterday, at the restaurant with the Winchesters, he'd begun to feel hungry, filled with an overwhelming desire to consume. And the food sitting in front of Alex had been a good distraction from that desire. Out of something he thought was desperation, he had grabbed that burger—needing to do something physically and not sure what, and then had realized the burger tasted good, which made his other thoughts simmer instead of rage at the forefront of his mind.

His other thoughts. Her.

He took another bite, trying to concentrate on the taste of beef instead of anything to do with her. The constant flow of burgers seemed to be the only thing that worked, distracting him from the overwhelming thoughts of Alex—being apart seemed to help, too, which troubled him immensely. Last night, he'd made himself vanish, but had stayed close to Alex to watch over her until he realized he couldn't. That the foreign desire grew worse the longer he watched over her (she'd just been sitting on the floor in the dingy bathroom, stone faced), the more anxious he'd grown until he'd known he had to leave her presence.

There was some great danger over this town, he could feel it, sense it—and the great irony was that he needed to stay away from Alex, leaving her defenseless all because his vessel and his mind were working against him somehow. It must have something to do with what was happening here because... he had almost kissed her yesterday, not a single thought of 'no' or 'don't' entering his mind until Sam had appeared. This was troubling, perplexing, and he was uncertain. Greatly uncertain.

Cas paused, a burger in front of his mouth, but he stared over the top of it unseeingly, picturing Alex, wondering where she was and what she looked like, if she was thinking about him too... then he caught himself and quickly took another huge bite of burger, trying to focus on it instead. There was a heightened sense of alarm in the back of his mind as he wondered how much longer he could stay away from her and sit here and eat burgers, because he needed to be near her and protect her—what had she been doing all day, was she safe? Was Dean protecting her? Was Sam?

He thought of what Dean had told him last night. 'I'm her protector, Cas. Me.' And he felt a surge of helplessness. Right now, this was true. And Cas didn't want it to be. He was supposed to be her protector eternal. He wondered about Dean's frantic question to Cupid about if Alex had the mark on her heart, the symbol of union. Everything Cas had told Dean last night about his devotion to protecting Alex, his incompatibility—he wanted to believe it himself. Only, he knew he was walking a fine line between truth and lies.
Cas glanced over, hearing someone approaching—he saw a familiar pair of black boots walking up to his table. And… bare legs? He looked up, following the path of bare legs to knees, then he saw the pattern of flowers—then the familiar tousled brown hair and the pretty face and bright, shy indescribable eyes. "Hi Cas!" she said, grinning widely at him, looking entirely delighted to see him. "I was across the street shopping and I saw you!" She sounded very upbeat, more than usual. Not completely herself.

"Alex," he said, standing up quickly. Several wrappers that had been on him fluttered to the floor like leaves off a tree. He’d noticed immediately what she was wearing, because it was different than anything he’d ever seen her in before. She was wearing her cargo jacket over a dress—floral print with a high waist and just-above-the-knee length… Cas was staring at where her legs ended and the dress began. He was suddenly intensely worried and couldn't look at her, but he also needed to look at her, take in every detail, consume the sight of her if that's all he could have—the desire to do so was overwhelming, but he clenched his fists at his sides, stared at a linoleum tile on the ground, fighting hard against his rambling longings. "I need more burgers," he mumbled, sliding back into the booth and grabbing the last one on the tray.

She seemed to notice the wrappers for the first time. "Did you... eat all these?" she asked, looking at the wrappers scattered around his booth with a strange expression. She slid into the booth across from him and he almost smashed the burger completely in his hands. He glanced at her—accidentally—and couldn't tear his eyes away. "Since when did you eat, Cas? And so... damn... much?" she sounded like herself again and was still looking at the wrappers, maybe trying to count them. He noticed the freckles he loved scattered across her face, the wild hair, the way her eyes darted across the wrappers. He was entranced. He was sure that he could look at her for all eternity times a thousand. She looked up at him, waiting for an answer. He returned the gaze, intensely desiring to be closer to her and forgetting her question completely. She seemed to be drawn into his unblinking gaze, then she visibly made herself look away, turning her head down and to the side, fast. "Something weird is happening," she said, sounding a little scared, looking disconcerted. "When I look at you, I get... I get stuck."

Similarly, Cas had looked away, his heart racing. She was right. What was happening to him—and why couldn't he control himself? It seemed to be easier when they didn't look each other in the eye—but why? It didn't matter. "We... we just shouldn't look at each other," Cas said, uneasy. He stared at the burger in his hands. In fact maybe he should leave right now, because he just wanted to toss the table aside and—

"Yeah, yeah, I think you're right," she said, but sounded disturbed. She got quiet for a minute. When she spoke again, she sounded worried. "How long do we have to… not look at each other? Is this permanent?"

Cas set his burger down, hands both resting loosely on the tabletop. He stared at the tray. "I don't know."

There were a few seconds of tense silence.

And then she slid her right hand across the table, towards his left hand. She stopped just short of touching him, and he risked a glance up at her—she looked deep in concentration, looking at their hands about to touch, like she was trying to hold herself back. He was responding in kind to the gesture before he could even have a second thought—he slid his hand out further, grasped hers gently. Her eyes flicked up to his, scared, unsure. "Cas..." she said, a question, a plea, a statement all at once. He couldn't look away from those eyes—his grip tightened on her hand—she drew him like magnet to magnet, and he was helpless, never wanting to be parted from her side, wanting to lessen the space between them, wanting to—
He flinched, shaking himself out of the trance, pulling his hand back, breathing hard in surprise. Alex looked similarly shaken up and put her elbow on the table, her head down and a hand over her eyes, so all she could see was the tabletop below her. She let out a frustrated sigh and cleared her throat. "So the burgers, Cas? Why."

Cas looked down at the sea of silver wrappers on the table. "Yes, it's strange. I—it's the vessel. It seems to be starving." He paused. "Jimmy—he—likes these. Liked these."

"Jimmy?" she asked. She sounded surprised. And possibly a little sad.

He felt the way she sounded as he thought of the man whose body he'd taken. "Since Raphael… killed me… and I was brought back. I've heard nothing from Jimmy. I thought—I thought maybe he was gone."

"But I thought you said…" she paused, and it took all of Cas's willpower not to look at her, to see what beautiful expression might be on her face, what subtle movements her eyebrows and mouth might be making. "I thought you said that everything he was still remained, just was like, overshadowed by you?"

"Yes, I remember telling you that," Cas said, distracted by his thoughts of her and of Jimmy and of what he thought of it all. He picked at a foil wrapper, trying to unwrinkle some of the wrinkles in the metallic material. "I'm not sure. I used to hear him sometimes." He let out a deep breath, reflecting. "I don't anymore."

She was quiet a long moment. "You sound sad."

Cas looked up at her at that point, unsure how those words from her mouth could affect him so deeply, make him feel—there was a very loud gurgling sound nearby and they both looked over at the soda fountain—where a slightly overweight woman was drinking soda straight out of the fountain, clawing at the nozzle with her hands wildly. She looked like she was drowning herself in it almost, it was puddling around her feet and she was choking on it as she shoved her face further into the stream of fizzy liquid. Alex jumped up and darted over, pulling the woman away by the shoulders, saying "Hey! Hey! Stop!"

The woman struggled for the soda fountain, trying to get back to it, yanking her arms forward and saying, "No! I need it, I need it!"

She broke Alex's grip and rushed back to what she'd been doing. Cas was right behind Alex—he'd followed her immediately, protectively, but he didn't know what to do—Alex apparently did though because she grabbed the woman again, hard, whirled her around with a grunt and punched her in the face, hard—the woman went cross-eyed and fell over sideways, unconscious. Alex winced, shaking her fist out. "Son of a bitch," she muttered.

Concerned, Cas turned her toward him even as he stepped around to face her and took her wounded hand in both of his. "Why did you do that?" he asked, looking at her hand, then at the woman on the floor, who was laying face-up in a puddle of soda.

Alex shrugged, kind of distracted and disturbed. "Saved her life, didn't it? Seemed like a good idea at the time..."

In his hands, her hand suddenly curled its fingers around the outer edge of his palm. They looked into each other's eyes at the exact same moment and Cas wanted so badly to kiss her, to shove her into the nearest wall and break her, have her, possess every part of her—
Alex yanked her hand back, regaining clarity, and when she did that, his returned momentarily, too, and he took a step back, horrified at these thoughts of breaking her, fearing that he was losing his mind. Alex looked around the restaurant, upset. "Cas, look around—something is happening to the people in this town—to us."

She looked down at her shoes, avoiding looking at him. "I saw some people in the dress shop trying to kill each other over the bargain rack and there was this one guy I saw who was jamming like handfuls of cigarettes into his mouth on the side of the street. Now this—"

She was cut off by the sound of loud shouting to their left. The cashier was screaming into her phone behind the counter, crying, bawling really. "Why, Jared?! You promised me! You don't love me! You promised you'd love me forever! Am I really that worthless?!" The girl began banging her head into the corner of the wall repeatedly, violently, hard enough that blood began to come out of her forehead where a wound rapidly was being made—and then Cas was suddenly standing behind the girl—he'd moved through space and wind swept through the restaurant—he touched her shoulder and she went slack, fainting. He looked questioningly at Alex, who had gone still, in shock at it all.

"Good, Cas, good," she said tensely, and looked around the restaurant with growing anxiety. "What is going on in this town?"

"We should leave," Cas said, suddenly right beside her again. She jumped slightly. "This place seems unsafe."

"Holy crap!" Alex exclaimed, laying eyes on a couple two booths away—they'd thrown their food onto the floor and were climbing all over each other and were literally ripping off each other's clothes. She stared a second longer than took quick action. "We gotta go," Alex said—Cas had her by the sleeve of the jacket and was already half-pulling, half-guiding her out of the restaurant. Out on the street, it was chilly and overcast. "Cas, what is happening?" Alex asked. Cas had his hand on her back lightly, protectively as they walked. He was looking around constantly, searching for any sign of danger.

"Could a witch be behind all this?" Alex asked, glancing up at him.

She slowed down, and he did too. "No, this is too much for a witch—perhaps it's—" he trailed off, looking at her. They had stopped walking and they were beside a long, blank brick wall. He looked at her up and down, forgetting what he'd been saying or doing. "You should wear dresses more often," he said, and leaned toward her, his hands grabbing her waist, and—

Her phone rang, and startled, they stopped. Cas looked at what he was doing and pulled away, flustered. He hadn't even thought, he'd just acted. He wasn't sure if he should stay with her or leave, because he didn't seem to have control anymore.

Unnerved, Alex pulled the phone out of her jacket pocket and answered, walking a couple steps off. Her cheeks were red. "Sam, hey." She paused. "What? A demon? Why?" Cas watched her closely, not letting her get even two steps away. He needed to be near her. "Yeah, okay." She ended the call and put her phone back into her pocket. "Sam said he ran into some demon guy with a briefcase and he thinks it has something to do with what's happening here in town."

Cas reached for her to transport them. "We should go there immediately."

"Don't touch me!" she exclaimed, shying away from his hand, not looking at him. "It's... just, uh, I can't, just, um, just don't." She sounded shaky. "Let's just walk. I wanna walk, okay?"
She turned around and began walking again. And that's when Cas saw the two demons in male vessels round a corner up ahead—he saw their true, abominable faces. His stomach seemed to rocket upwards in alarm, and he was, without hesitation, drawing his angel blade and shooting forward, putting himself between Alex and the demons, shouting at her "stay back!" even as he viciously stabbed the first one in the chest. The demon let loose a blood curdling scream as his skeleton flickered and he died.

The other demon had turned and was running away—indicating they had not expected this fight, so what were they doing here—Cas didn't have time to consider this, he was yanking his blade back out of the first demon's chest and he flipped the blade smoothly in his hand so that he gripped the sharp end—he drew back and sent it torpedoing through the air where it plunged into the second demon, who screamed and fell forward, dead.

Instantly, Cas looked back at Alex, who was coming to him, grabbing his arm. "Are you all right?" she asked, concerned. He looked at her, vaguely out of breath—he tore his gaze away before the dangerous thoughts could begin.

"Demons," he said, and looked around, wary, vigilant.

"Why—?" Alex asked, her features wrinkling up in confusion.

"I don't know," he said. His voice deepened. "But we're not walking any more."

He grabbed her, and they disappeared off the street.

---

About an Hour Later

"This town is not suffering from some love-gone-wrong effect," he'd explained about an hour ago. "It's suffering from hunger. Starvation, to be exact—specifically... famine."

Cas's words rang in her mind, inspired the following mantra: It's not you, it's Famine. It's not you, it's Famine. The freaking horsemen of the Apocalypse Famine. In the backseat of the Impala, Alex was stone-faced, clenching her hands into fists repeatedly in an attempt to do something, anything, to distract herself. It was getting worse with every passing moment, she felt crazy.

Yesterday had been bad enough, this afternoon (the impulse shopping? Twirling in front of the mirror and wondering what Cas would think of her dress?!) had been worse, now this. She could barely think.

After getting attacked by the two demons, Cas had spirited them back to the motel room where Sam had just gotten back to with a mysterious briefcase. Dean had been waiting there for them, and they opened the briefcase—which had contained a human soul. Cas had then seemed to have an 'ah-ha' moment, saying that the town was under Famine's curse, that Famine wanted the souls of these people and was killing them using gluttony, desire, starvation. It's not you, it's Famine.

In the backseat of the Impala, Alex was growing beyond restless. It had been bad enough when Cas had whisked her back to the motel. Like a caged animal, she'd paced the back of the motel room, barely able to hear what Sam, Dean, and Cas were discussing. Her thoughts were screaming at her, begging her to just let her look at Cas, just look at him, but when she did, she lost any semblance of brainpower in favor of increasingly frenzied, sexual thoughts. She'd catch herself and for a minute she'd be horrified at how out-of-control she felt, how possessed by the crazy hunger for the angel in the trench coat.
She felt like she wasn't sure what was going on anymore, she was so, so, so preoccupied with Castiel and every passing minute she was less and less capable of hanging onto her sanity. She was barely able to concentrate let alone form a coherent thought.

The Impala was pulling to a stop in front of a Biggerson's restaurant. "Demons," Dean said up front, looking at the men in suits out in front of the building. "Just like we thought." He paused, irritated. "Cas, you gonna stop stuffing your face with burgers for a minute? You remember the plan?"

Cas stopped, turned to Dean. He'd been eating burgers constantly the past hour, more and more frustratedly... if it were possible to eat a food out of frustration. Alex tried to remember the plan, tried to think it through, anything but thoughts of him. The plan was to... Castiel—no, to, cut off Famine's ring and break this spell and—God the curls behind his ears—shit—no, the plan—she tried, she really did, not to stare at Cas's profile from where she sat. He was staring into space, jaw clenched tightly, a burger hovering in front of his face, but his mouth was closed. God, his mouth—her hands were literally trembling now, she had to fight with herself to keep them still. Her thoughts went from coherent to complete mush, yammering in her mind and howling at her to touch him, just touch him, you need him so much and just—touch him, Alex, take him!

Panicking, not remembering about the demons or the plan or anything, she shoved the door of the backseat open, tripped over her own feet, breathing heavily, not even noticing where she was going, just had—to—get—a—way—now or she was seriously going to rip the car apart to get to Cas.

She was aware that she was in a dark parking lot and stumbling in no general direction—then she saw that a man in a suit was bearing down on her, his eyes black as night. She reached back to where her knife always rested in the belt loop of her jeans and—oh shit, she was wearing a dress, where was her knife?! Before she had a chance to react any further, the demon went flying backwards into the side of the building, sending brick and rubble flying. Confused, Alex whirled and saw Cas striding toward her, his hand outstretched—had he just done that to the demon?

Cas didn't stop when he reached her, he grabbed Alex roughly by both arms of her jacket, and took them away from there—she felt the slight head rush of moving through space. They were no longer in the parking lot, they were instead somewhere dim and cold. Shivering, for a moment clear-headed, Alex looked around. "Where are we?"

It looked like a walk-in freezer—about five feet by five—and Cas, similarly confused, still holding her by the arms of her jacket, looked around, horrified almost. "Wrong place—the restaurant—I meant to take us away from here—it's... Famine... he's close, I can't seem to focus—I—" He started with surprise as Alex grabbed him by his lapels, trying to pull him to her. "What are you doing?" he asked, panicked, putting a hand against either of her shoulders, holding her back from himself.

"I'm losing my mind," she said, similarly panicked, sounding less and less sure. "I need—" she said, her voice cracking as she visibly strained, trying to stop herself from saying it, but she couldn't, she was breathing hard like she'd been running for an hour, "you," she managed, the word full of emotion... and as soon as she'd said it, her expression grew dark, full of desirous abandon. "Now," she said, voice lower and demanding. Cas felt his entire body flush over as if in a pleasant fever at those words, the way she said them, the look in her eyes—and he was suddenly fighting harder than he ever had before.

The past hour had been difficult enough, but he'd been able to muddle through with the food as a distraction, but now there was nothing to distract him from her, nothing to stand in the way and she was trying to pull him to her—no, no.
He couldn't let this happen, not here, not now, not under the spell of Famine, she was vulnerable and he couldn't protect her from the things he wanted to do to her—not much longer—he was literally shaking from the effort as he held himself back from her, kept her at arms length. He was breathing hard now, terrified. "I have to take us out of here—" he said, but he wasn't moving and he wasn't taking them away, he was just realizing it was already much too late. She stared at him, breathless, struggling to get to him, making it so very impossible for him to resist... her eyes, her mouth, everything about her sealed his fate completely. She looked so perfect and she was so close and he needed to touch her, kiss her, be with her—it was over, he realized dimly, his own thoughts fading away into the chaos of furious desire. He couldn't fight it.

"I'm sorry," he only just managed to say, the last clear-headed thought he could muster as he gave in to the powerful torrent of desire. The hands that had been holding her back now pulled her to crash against him as he claimed her waiting mouth with his—she made some kind of relieved, wanton sound, her arms already wrapping around his neck and she grabbed a fistful of his hair, hard, pressing her body against his desperately, making soft little sounds that set him over the edge, turned him into a desperate man. He pushed her against the cold metal shelf behind her, so fast and hard that some bottles fell down and shattered around their feet. In response, she pressed her hands into his chest and shoved him backwards aggressively—he slammed into the opposite shelf, knocking several boxes off and he stared at her in complete awe for the couple seconds that she broke the kiss. She gripped his coat tight in both of her hands, yanked him to her, kissing him savagely, a strangled moan escaping from her mouth and into his. Another surge of heat flushed Cas, driving him to the point of insanity.

In a trance, out of control, Cas crushed her against him possessively, his strong arms wrapped around her, one of his hands finding its way up between the jacket and the dress, to the warm, bare skin of her back and suddenly, he wanted more and needed the jacket gone—he fumbled, pulling at it as they stumbled back to the other shelf, mouths refusing to part—he vaguely felt her pushing at his jacket and coat, making a groan like she was frustrated.

Her jacket came off finally and he threw it aside haphazardly, one hand now on her bare back and he made a frustrated sound. His other hand cupped the top of her shoulder, then grazed down the front of her, trailing down over her and then grasping her hip, thumb digging hard in against the bone there as he pulled her to himself. Alex gasped—literally gasped—but it was a sound wrought with some kind of primal pleasure he'd never heard her make and Cas felt something in him break and he groaned throatily, barely able to contain himself—he needed more, this wasn't enough, and he grabbed frantically at the side of her thigh through her dress. He was desperate for something, but he wasn't sure what.

She was still pushing at his coat and jacket and he let her go for a second, yanked them off clumsily for her, straining himself—he didn't want to stop kissing her for even a second as he practically ripped off the pieces of clothing—the second they were off of him, she caught his tie in her hand and pulled him back to her, making a frantic, relieved sound—she seized the front of his shirt in both hands and ripped it open brutally, the buttons breaking off and skittering around on the metal floor, leaving his chest and torso bare. She pressed her palm flat against his chest then trailed it down, down, down, ghosting her fingertips along his rapidly rising and falling ribcage, then his hipbone, then the place where his belted slacks started. He quivered, breaking the kiss, his eyes squeezed shut, mouth hung open right above hers, and then he let loose a higher-pitched, helpless sound as her hand trailed further down, brushed him over his pants, making waves of pleasure and need surge over him. He seemed to snap, grabbing her by the back of the neck, kissing her harder, bruisingly, his other hand crushing her to him at the small of her back.

Frenzied, he whirled her around, slammed her into the front door of the freezer, a solid metal wall and she gasped again—Cas grabbed her roughly underneath each leg, right behind each knee, lifting her up—she was hungrily searching for his mouth again, grabbing each side of his face in both hands as she wrapped her legs around him and he lifted her up—his hands stayed there for a minute, in the hollows behind her knees… and then they slid up torturously, skimming the bare backs of her legs and then running over the curve of her hips and upwards to grasp either side of her waist.

Cas was dimly aware, somewhere far away, that these things were coming to him at an alarmingly natural and terrifyingly fast pace—including what he did next, without even thinking. He rocked his hips into hers—and the pressure and friction between their bodies rendered him useless, took him soaring high and feeling like he could just let go, reach the limit of the sky itself and tumble down, fall forever—the second he ground his hips toward hers, a choked, primal sound escaped Alex, they broke the kiss and she grabbed a fistful of his shirt, hanging on to him for dear life, her expression dazed, her eyes heavy-lidded, her breath coming in shallow little gasps—and Cas was mesmerized by her like this. He had no choice but to grind into her again, pulling at her furiously, needing her closer, needing more of this pressure and sensation, more of her. Writhing against him, her body and the sensation of it against him caused him to let out a low sound in the deepest part of his throat, almost like he was in pain, but he wasn't—not at all and he felt frustration overtaking him—it wasn't enough—

That thought stirred him out of the mania and he realized, stronger this time, that this was really happening, he couldn't control himself; he wasn't sure what would happen if he didn't stop this—with every ounce of willpower he possessed, he pulled back, just for a second, trying to escape, trying to save them. "I can't—I can't hold back—much longer—" Cas managed desperately, strained, not even sure how to put it into words. He wanted to crush her underneath himself, demolish her completely, possess her in every way, destroy her. "I'll hurt you—" Cas said, despairing, because he couldn't pull away anymore, he was barely holding himself back as it was. In his arms Alex suddenly looked different, like she'd come out of a trance or woken up. "What—" she said, looking at him, confused, a little disconcerted—but her confusion faded, she didn't say anything else, she saw him and touched the side of his face slowly, gentle, her thumb brushing against the side of his lower lip. Her eyes searched his, searching for something… something that she seemed to see, and holding his gaze fervently until their lips met, she leaned in, kissed him simply. His stomach seemed to flip inside out at the gentle touch and for the briefest moment, Cas knew that was Alex kissing him like that, not Alex under Famine's influence. It was her, and it was him, and his whole body reacted, responded—he touched the side of her face too, with the utmost care, lost in her presence and touch. And then he felt the pervasive thoughts taking over again, his hands tightened on her, and he was trying so hard to pull away from her, save her from what his thoughts wanted to do to her. But Alex whimpered, feeling him attempt to pull away. "Don't stop Cas—" she made a pathetic sound, "Uhh, please," she begged, grabbing a fistful of his shirt, refusing to let him go. He was stronger than her, physically. But in that moment, she was his weakness, and he was no stronger than her. His willpower was forgotten at her touch, her plea. He couldn't help himself. He let go, gave in, forgot his worries and fears, his desire intensifying a hundredfold, he had to have her, now. His hold on her had weakened for a few seconds, but with renewed vigor, he slammed himself into her, instinct took over, blinding him. He wasn't sure how but they crashed through the solid metal refrigerator door, completely breaking the door off its hinges—but neither was paying attention, busy barreling into the kitchen where, out of control, Cas crashed them into a countertop, kissing Alex wildly, noisily.

Pots and pans clattered to the ground loudly even as Cas turned and threw Alex up into one of the empty corners, denting the plaster wall a little bit in the process, but neither seemed to notice, Cas was grabbing her animalistically, one hand on her ass and another up against her back, fingers dug hard into her skin and she had her head back, noisily almost sobbing when he pressed himself against her again. She had her legs wrapped around him tightly, was fumbling with his shirt, no maybe his pants, breathing loud in his ear, then pulling back, finding his mouth again, biting down hard on his lower lip, enough to draw blood. Agonized with unsatisfied desire, Cas growled against her lips, a sound that started out low, then changed into a higher pitched gasping sound as they moved against each other raggedly. Cas pushed at her dress, and Alex felt two of his fingers curl around the band of her underwear and brush against the skin beneath it—she whimpered, distressed at the fire of his touch—that combined with the feeling of him against her there, right there even through their clothes was almost too much for her. A tortured sobbing sound escaped Alex’s mouth and she grabbed onto his shoulders with both hands suddenly, hard, losing her mind—

There was a loud clattering noise somewhere behind them. Startled, Cas and Alex froze as a familiar and shocked voice uttered, "holy SHIT."
It's Complicated

"I love you as certain dark things are to be loved... in secret, between the shadow and the soul."
- Neruda

Brothers weren't supposed to see their sisters in this kind of situation.

He'd rushed through the door into the restaurant kitchen, hearing a lot of loud noises like there was some kind of fight or struggle happening—but the second he'd entered the kitchen he'd realized he'd had it so wrong. In the space of a second, he took it all in: Cas pinning Alex up against the wall—her bare legs tightly wrapped around him, her dress shoved up to the top of her legs—one of Cas's hands was there at the base of her hip bone inside the dress—his trench coat and jacket were both missing, his white dress shirt was bunched down around his shoulders halfway off—they were kissing each other with wild and passionate abandon, and the way they were moving against each other, the sounds they were making, especially his sister… were sounds that had him thinking that mother of god he'd walked in on them having sex. Stopping blindly and abruptly mid-step, he'd clumsily knocked into the counter, sending a pot clattering to the floor.

"Holy SHIT," Sam uttered in something like horror, frozen and staring, unable to look away. Alex and Cas stopped making out and froze, looking over at him in dazed surprise... then in slight confusion, as if they were coming out of a haze.

Sam stared, aghast: Cas had a bloody lip, there was a huge gash on Alex's arm and some smaller scrapes and cuts and crazy red marks like where she'd been grabbed repeatedly, their hair was disheveled, their clothes were a mess—they looked like they'd been in a fight. As their eyes cleared they seemed to see him and take in their surroundings, then they looked from Sam to each other, surprised, breathing hard, horror flashing across their faces as if they hadn't completely known what they were doing. They untangled, Cas pulled away, stumbling back even as Alex Shakily leaned back into the corner—and there was a flash of semi-relief when Sam realized they hadn't been having sex—Cas's pants weren't open or down—but oh god Cas had clearly been ready… Sam looked away, traumatized. Clearly embarrassed, Cas stood off a few steps from Alex—the angel was looking at her hesitantly and in shock, and then down at himself, seeming to be clueless and surprised at himself. Alex was avoiding looking at either of Cas or Sam… and she was really, really out of breath with an expression of utter mortification.

"What—what's—" Sam stuttered out, at a loss. Was this Famine? Had Famine done this? Because… wait. Sam looked between them in disbelief. "I… I broke Famine's spell like five minutes ago, guys."

At that, Alex looked up at him, temporarily seeming to forget her embarrassment in favor of severe confusion. "Five minutes ago?" She seemed to think that was impossible. "I was in the Impala five minutes ago," she protested. "You weren't even here five minutes ago."

Sam looked back at his sister, not sure what she was talking about. He'd been at Biggerson's for like ten minutes, saved Dean from Famine and his henchmen demons… broken the spell, then been told by a frantic Dean that Cas and Alex were missing and you check in here, I'll look outside... and literally ten seconds after Dean went outside, Sam heard the sound of pots and pans falling and what he'd thought was the sound of Alex crying out in pain… and then he'd walked in on them.

From where Cas stood a few steps off, he spoke up slowly, looking at the ground. "I think that I…" accidentally… moved us forward in time by a few minutes." He paused, embarrassed. "I was very…" he swallowed, looking down uncertainly, "uh, distracted."

"Jesus Christ," Sam muttered, even more mortified than before, bringing his hand up to cover the lower half of his face. He didn't need Cas to explain any further—he definitely got the implication. This was way, way too much for Sam to process—and when he glanced at Alex, he saw her cheeks were bright red and she looked absolutely beside herself with awkward, burning embarrassment. Sam gathered himself with a deep breath, putting his hands on his hips and trying to breathe normally.

His sister straightened up as if to walk forward but faltered, made a sound of surprise and pain. Her arm shot out to catch herself against the wall and she leaned heavily against it, wincing, teeth gritted together. Sam and Cas moved toward her at the same time in concern, but Alex took one look at Sam approaching and she shrank away in what was clearly fear. Stopping short, Sam wondered why—then his heart clenched as he realized and remembered. He wiped at his mouth with the back of his hand, and away came the bright red demon blood. Ashamed, understanding, Sam held his hands up in a gesture of yielding. "I'm not gonna do anyth—I'm fine," he assured her. Last time he'd been high on this stuff, he'd hurt her.

Alex had allowed Cas near to her and the angel was now holding her up gingerly—she wouldn't look at him though—Cas was looking at Sam in dark suspicion. "No, you're not fine," Cas said darkly. "You've had demon blood." The way the angel stood with Alex holding her close was fiercely protective; almost possessive and Sam was stilled by the sight of it—then there was a twinge of anger and protectiveness on his end.

"I said I'm fine," Sam repeated, a little hostile when he spoke this time. He made for his sister again, because she looked like she was in agony and she wouldn't look at Cas at all and what if, what if Cas had done that to her and she hadn't wanted it? Angel or not, Sam would kill him where he stood if the guy had in any way harmed his sister—he felt up to the task, too, demon blood humming through his veins and making him feel sharper than normal, stronger than normal, buzzing with power.

"Stay back, Sam," Cas said threateningly, his voice carrying great command. Sam did stop but not because of Cas. From behind Cas's shoulder, Alex was looking at Sam with big, scared eyes. Eyes that remembered what he'd done to her the last time he'd been high on this stuff. Sam felt a wave of shame overcome him and then sadness that she didn't want him near her. His bravado faded a little and he grew pensive. He had tried to resist it; the desire to drink demon blood. But he hadn't been able to, not at all. It had been over before it had begun. Maybe that's what had happened here, between these two, Sam reflected uncertainly. They'd been unable to resist, thanks to Famine.

Alex made another sound of pain, and it was easy to tell she was restraining herself—that she was hurting a lot more than she was letting on. "What's wrong with her, Cas?" Sam asked, overcome with worry, his focus shifting.

"It was me," Cas said, sounding disgusted and sickened and terrified. "I did this."

Alex looked away, groaned and shut her eyes tightly, hissing in pain. Sam felt sick but had no choice but to remain standing there, removed from the situation. Cas turned back to Alex, horrified concern returning to his face again. He was cautiously holding her by her arms, giving the impression that he had no idea what to do but felt entirely responsible. "I'm… I'm so sorry Alex," Cas stumbled verbally, sounding frightened and shellshocked—something Sam had never heard in the angel's voice before. Cas withdrew his left hand from where it grasped her arm, looking at her bright red blood that came away on his fingers. The sight of that seemed to make Castiel sink deeper into despair. He looked at Alex again, shaking his head blankly, at a complete loss. His voice almost broke as he sought her gaze and she purposefully avoided meeting it. "I didn't… I didn't mean to do this to you," he managed in an unsteady voice.

In Cas's hesitant, careful grip, Alex swallowed, overwhelmed by the pain and by Cas's pleading, gentle statement. She couldn't really focus at the moment. The pain was bad—really bad. She'd felt it distantly when the kiss had ended, when they had untangled from each other, but it had suddenly hit her full force—pangs and aches in her back, her arms, her legs—from where Cas had slammed her around and grabbed her hard, thrown her against things without restraint. Her shoulder actually hurt the worst maybe, and she breathed out unevenly, realizing it was dislocated. She glanced at Cas, so embarrassed. The pain had felt like pleasure under the spell, but now it was just pain—crippling, almost unbearable. On the side of her arm she was aware of a searing sensation—she moved her arm out a little, looked down at it—there was a huge, bloody gash there—had that happened when they'd crashed through the freezer door? There were a couple other places on her arms that felt scraped or cut, and she could tell that she'd have bruises all over come morning.

She winced, gritted her teeth together, groaning in pain. She could feel how concerned and ashamed and unsure Cas was, which only made it worse for her… because a minute ago the way he'd been moving against her had rendered her into putty, had her literally seconds away from… from… she swallowed and shut her eyes, realizing how close she'd been to an orgasm. Jesus Christ. She hadn't been able to control herself at all and just remembering the way their panting breaths and guttural moans had sounded… Alex wished she could disappear right now. As if the pain everywhere wasn't bad enough, her ears felt like they were burning off, and her stomach wanted to be sick out of humiliation. In the heat of the moment it had felt so right and she hadn't wanted anything more than she wanted him—and now she couldn't look at him at all; too afraid that she would see judgement or condescension or worst of all, disgust. Had Cas really wanted her? Or was it just Famine's spell? Cas had suddenly seemed really fond of burgers, too, and he'd never given those a second look before...

The sound of a door slamming somewhere nearby, probably the main entrance, startled them all. "Sammy! Sam!" Dean's muffled voice thundered from another room.

Alex's pulse rocketed in alarm and beside her, even Cas seemed to realize this was bad. Reacting at the same time as them, Sam's expression chilled over then just as quickly became urgent. "Cas. Clothes—now," he said and turned, going quickly out of the doorway and into the main part of the restaurant to intercept Dean. Cas disappeared—literally—from Alex's side and she felt her stomach drop in shock—he just left? How the hell could he just—

She didn't get to finish the thought. Cas reappeared in front of her, looking normal again—everything back to normal, like he'd regenerated or something. His bloody lip was gone, his hair wasn't a wreck, the buttons on his shirt were back, his tie was there (crooked, of course), his jacket and coat were back in place. It looked like nothing had happened at all, it was like he'd erased what happened completely. He stood in front of her wordlessly, holding her jacket out to her with a hesitant gaze. She took the jacket blankly. Their eyes met. It was the gaze of two people who had no idea how to face what had just happened between them. He looked so concerned and lost. But all Alex wanted to know was… had that been him? Was that him who had wanted her like that? Because she knew during what had happened between them her mind had not been her own, not entirely—but at her deepest level, beyond the madness of Famine's spell… she had wanted him. Still did.

She looked away, unable to maintain eye contact. She couldn't tell from looking at him what was going on inside his mind anyway. She was so, so confused. To the point of agony.
She reflected in dazed apprehension that perhaps whatever had just happened with them—the highly intimate moment… the first time she'd ever been touched in that way at all… it had been caused by a spell. There was a very good chance that this would drive some kind of wedge between them and ruin whatever flimsy friendship they'd had before. She worried that the moment they'd been sucked into would mean she would lose more of Cas than she had, which wasn't even enough to begin with. The idea of this devastated her completely, causing her throat to seize up in the sudden threat of tears. The physical pain—the utter passion and wild abandon of the moment they had shared—the standstill now and the not knowing how this would affect them—she couldn't help it: her expression broke and crumpled into a hurt expression.

Cas felt ruined completely seeing her like that. He had done this. He had caused this. He had hurt her physically. In fact, if Sam hadn't intervened, Castiel felt certain that he would have killed her under Famine's spell. This chilled him to the core. The other couples had killed each other, but he was an angel, a hundred times more powerful and stronger than Alex and he would have killed her if they had continued—it was in fact a miracle that he hadn't hurt her worse. This knowledge caused him some of the deepest distress he'd ever known.

And even though part of him wanted to disappear from her, hide in shame—free her of the abominable sight of him—there was a stronger need in himself to help her somehow, and he was acting before he'd even thought it through. He touched the side of her shoulder, not sure why, and then briefly reflected that perhaps she would scorn his touch, after… after everything that had just happened. After what he had done to her. But at the touch of his hand Alex looked up at him, startled and gone still. She didn't reject him or pull away, she just looked at him openly, and Castiel thought of how she was so painfully beautiful to him, even like this. Her eyes looked like they might be shining with tears. Tears he'd put there. Castiel felt physical pain ripple in his vessel. And his hand, of its own accord, went from her shoulder to the side of her face, the touch somewhere between tenderness and despair. How had he done this to her? How could he have lost control like that? Briefly… just briefly… the things Anna had shown him in the future flashed before his mind's eye.

Then they heard a loud commotion—the sound of Dean coming in and Sam talking loudly—and Cas pulled back abruptly, rapidly distancing himself by a few feet and leaving Alex agonized. There was an ache of pain in him at the sight of her standing alone, an ache in a place that wasn't physical. This distance from her was too much, but he had no other choice.

Dean stormed in loudly, closely followed by a worried Sam. He just missed seeing Cas touching Alex. "Jesus Christ, where were you two?" he demanded irritably, then he looked around at the destroyed kitchen—the pots and pans everywhere, the freezer door ripped off its hinges. He then leveled Cas with a demanding, sharp gaze. "Where the hell did you poof off to? You were outside the restaurant and then you just Batman-ed away without a word?!" Dean sounded enraged.

"I… tried to take her someplace safe," Cas attempted shakily. He wasn't lying, but to Alex, he sounded guilty. Before he could slip up and make Dean suspicious, Alex found her voice, covering clumsily with the best story she could come up with.

"We, we ended up behind the restaurant… got attacked by more demons out there," Alex lied, scared out of her skin for Dean to look at her. Which he finally did.

He took in her messy appearance and the cuts and the big gash on her arm. She held her breath without realizing. And for just a moment she reflected that she shouldn't be this terrified of her own brother.

But when he saw the way she looked like she'd been beat up, Dean's rage had disappeared instantly and was replaced with shock—he went to her, took her gently by the shoulders—she winced—he didn't even touch her that hard, but the skin was tender. It would be bruised badly later. Dean saw her wince and looked her over in genuine concern. "You're hurt," he said, and Alex looked at him kind of in surprise. Besides the talk they'd had after she got back from 1978, this was the first time he'd sounded genuinely caring toward her in weeks.

Dean touched the side of her head, scrutinizing her in worry, then he turned to Cas, expression darkening. "Jesus, Cas, did you just let them beat on her while you stood back?" he asked. Cas was silent, guilty, and looked down in response. Holy shit… this was just horrible, Alex thought, barely able to keep her composure. But she had no choice.

"Relax, Dean, I'll be fine," she said, trying to get Cas out of the line of fire, not sure he could stand up under it. Dean turned his attention back to her, shook his head in dissatisfaction, but let it go for the time being and heaved a deep sigh. He set his sights on Sam who was standing off and watching. Sam still had the demon blood on his face. Dean slowly went to the other side of the kitchen, closer to his brother. Distracted and tense, Dean picked up a cast iron skillet from the counter that Sam stood next to. Hefting it up Dean smiled down at it humorlessly, twirled it a little in his hand. Everyone else looked at the skillet, unsure why Dean was suddenly interested in cookware. Then in a sudden burst of movement, Dean used it like a baseball bat and full-force hit Sam in the back of the head with it. Sam's six-foot-four frame went rag doll and he crumpled down onto the floor, unconscious.

"Dean what the hell?!" Alex demanded in a shock-high voice. Beside her, a little closer now, Cas was looking at Dean in uncertainty and misunderstanding.

Dean slammed the pot down on the counter angrily, wrathful. "He's hopped up on demon blood, Al!" He pursed his lips and his expression was dark. "After last time... I don't feel like taking chances," he growled, staring down at Sam in a mixture of disgust, horror, and sadness. After last time. Alex looked from Dean to Sam, troubled, feeling like she was totally out of the loop. She wasn't entirely sure what had happened while she and Cas… uh… but could tell whatever it was had shaken her oldest brother up badly. Dean was stooping and grunting, yanking Sam's unconscious form up and then supporting him by slipping an arm around Sam's waist and yanking his brother's arm over his shoulder. Sam's massive head lolled forward limply.

"Cas, take us to Bobby's, now," Dean commanded intensely. "I need to get him on lockdown stat."

There was hesitation on Cas's part, a slight, fumbling glance in Alex's direction… and then they were gone from that place.

"Alright, ready?" Dean was bracing Alex's shoulder with his hands and she had this look of grudging dread on her face. She squeezed her eyes closed, nodded yes, bracing herself for the oncoming pain. "One... two... three!" Dean counted, and on three he forcibly slammed her shoulder back into place with a loud crunch. She made a horrible, pained yell and then let out a deep, tense breath, her cheeks puffing up as the pain radiated.

Cas stood a few steps back, watching her in distress, uselessly holding the box of medical supplies Dean had shoved at him a minute ago.

Brutal. Across the centuries, Castiel had come to associate this word with wars and violence... the Khmer Rouge killing fields, the first World War, the Massacre of the Innocents in the first century. The unrestrained violence, the mercilessness, the disregard for the preciousness of human life—the dark tangle of violence, anger, and betrayal that resulted in death and destruction—that was brutal. He'd understood the word at a certain level, associated it with physical acts and periods in history.
But Castiel reflected that this felt brutal to him: To helplessly stand by and see Dean fixing up Alex's wounds. Wounds that he had inflicted. In a frenzy of passion—a passion he hadn't known himself capable of—he'd lost control almost, he'd been moments away from ending her life without being able to stop himself. It hurt him inside and gave him so many dark, tormented thoughts. He had done this. It was unforgivable. She was avoiding his gaze, and had been, since... since the spell had been broken.

Once Sam, still unconscious, had been handcuffed and put into the panic room, Dean had immediately set to work looking over Alex's injuries more thoroughly. He'd decided she needed stitches on her arm.

"Hand me that, Cas," Dean commanded, giving the angel a side eye.

Cas complied, handing over the supplies indicated to Dean but with no great certainty. Alex sat on an old chair that had been there in the basement and Dean had pulled up a big storage box to sit on. He rummaged through a crate of supplies and got out an alcohol pad then took Alex's arm in his hand and swiped the disinfectant across the gash there. She breathed in sharply, let out a sound of repressed pain. "Stings bad," she mumbled, strained. Dean was getting out a needle and a spool of shiny black surgical thread. Cas watched with increasing discomfort. Many angels cared little about humans in physical pain as the soul was what counted and lasted—bodily harm was transitory. But for Castiel, the thought of Alex in pain, especially pain dealt by his hand... it was abhorrent to him.

"Shouldn't you take her to a medical professional?" he asked, trying to stifle the clear tones of anxiety in his voice.

He received a sharp glance from Dean in return. "Cas, after thirty years of patching my kid siblings up, I think I got a simple stitch up."

Alex glanced up at Cas and their eyes met for a brief, torturous second.

He tried not to remember her there against him, in his arms, so close and physically arousing. He felt a mixture of shame and confusion wash over him as he looked away from her. Shame because in his deepest thoughts he had liked what they were doing—he had wanted it—not with anyone else, but with her. And he didn't completely understand what that meant or why. In fact, he almost never understood the why behind his actions and it was becoming more and more frustrating. In the past he didn't need to understand his actions as he hadn't been responsible for them. He just did what was commanded. There had been a comfort there in not having to decide wrong from right. Yes, he had felt the increasing pull of doubt, the increasing desire to do what he thought in his own mind to be right... but now he was on the opposite end of the spectrum, wildly piloting himself through life and situations with nothing to steer him but his thoughts, convictions, and feelings... all of which were constantly clashing, circling each other, fighting each other for dominance, warring within him, leaving him uncertain of himself.

"Ready?" Dean asked his sister.

Cas's attention refocused into the scene before him... like it or not.

Alex grabbed the whiskey bottle Dean had brought her and took a very long pull of the dark liquid then set it back with a hiss, regarding Dean with what looked like dread and tenacity alike. "Do your worst," she said, a humorous comment said without any humor. Cas watched, unable to look away, worried.

Dean took in a deep breath and muttered something like "here goes nothing." Holding her with one hand by the elbow, he carefully stuck the needle in at the bottom of the wound and made the first stitch. Alex's whole body tensed perceptibly and she let out a pained little sound that she attempted to stifle. Dean paused and looked at his sister in a disquieted way. "Sometime today, Dean, Jesus," she managed in between clenched teeth as she stared up at the ceiling, every muscle in her body rigid and screaming.

"Yes ma'am," he muttered, refocusing and continuing his work, stitching the open wound back together as quickly as he could. Each stitch seemed to pain Alex worse. She sat very still, eyes screwed closed, lips pressed together hard and going inwards. She was breathing hard through her nose and her face became more and more scrunched in pain—she squeezed her hands and clenched her free one onto the chair, then hit her fist against her own leg a couple times in some kind of effort to redirect her brain. Cas had to look away finally, turn and shut his eyes. But he could still hear the tight, strained way she breathed and her fidgeting. Languishing in self-loathing, he again cursed himself for doing this to her.

A minute later, it ended. "Done," Dean said, tying off the thread and cutting off the excess, handing his sister a clean rag. Alex let out a deeply relieved breath and took the rag to hold it against the wound to stop the bleeding.

"Thanks," she said soft and low, and her voice was still tight with discomfort. Dean gave her a wan little smile and patted her on her other arm where there were no injuries and he started to put away the supplies he'd been using.

They both started when they heard the sound of Sam banging against the side of the panic room where they'd cuffed him. "Guys? Guys!"

Everyone went still and quiet and looked toward where the sound had come from.

"Hey! I'm in here, help me! Help me!" Sam sounded alarmed and in anguish. Dean set down the box of medical stuff and stood up, went to the door of the panic room, slid open the slat just a little to peer in. Sam saw it. His cuffs rattled loudly. "Dean! Dean! You gotta get me out of here!"

Dean looked like he was thinking about saying something, then heaved a heavy breath, shut the viewport, his expression grave.

Watching silently, Cas and Alex remained where they were as Dean came back, grabbed the whiskey bottle, and leaned against the wall across from Alex. He was stone-faced as he took a swig.

"Lemme outta here, please! Help!" Sam's shouts intensified.

Dean closed his eyes even as Alex put an elbow on her knee and her face in a hand. To Castiel, they were suddenly and irrevocably the picture of defeat. Sam continued to shout and as Cas watched Alex and Dean become morose, glut, deflated… Castiel felt the same way himself, touched with empathy. But he knew that Sam wasn't himself right now, that this was something that was temporary, not permanent. He wondered if he should try to remind them of that, take a chance and try to help again. So, he did. "That's not him in there," he said quietly. "Not really."

There was a pause where Alex peeked up at him solemnly and Dean let out a soft breath. "Yeah," Dean agreed heavily. Sam was groaning now, maybe weeping even. The sound was muffled a little by the walls. Alex's face was tight with a pain that wasn't physical as she listened to the sounds.
Her gaze dropped to the floor. Dean was making a similar face to hers.

"Sam just has to get it out of his system," Castiel continued, attempting to comfort them somehow.
"Then he'll be—" fine? Cas glanced at Alex, who looked doubtful and worried. And Cas realized he didn't know if Sam would be fine. With the angels looming over their heads, the threat of Lucifer… the future he'd seen… Cas trailed off, silent.

And Dean, suddenly tenser than before, straightened himself, expression unreadable. "Listen, I just, uh… I just need to get some air."

Alex watched Dean go, her eyes flickered toward Castiel and then away, her hands clasped and pressed between her knees now, her expression tense and troubled. She looked conflicted, and the sight of the marks and the blood smeared along her arm made such intense guilt wash over Cas again. Sam's shouts echoed again, muffled and frenzied.

Cas looked at Alex slowly, barely able to bring himself to even look at her. The reality of what he'd done to her kept sinking in as he looked upon her. She was so small in the grand scheme, so young and vulnerable and he should have been able to stop himself from all of it. But especially from hurting her. He wondered if she had truly desired to wrap herself around him like that and kiss him with fire, passion, organic primal fury. In the moment it had felt real. It had felt like if he didn't move forward, crush her to himself, that he would die from desperation. In fact, he almost still felt that way. That if he couldn't hold her, protect her, touch her… he would die.

Disgusted with himself, Castiel looked away now. He had only been in a human vessel for two years but the troubles it came with, the burden of emotions and thoughts that seemed interwoven with feelings (feelings that were devoid of logic)… it all confounded him completely. He couldn't fathom how Alex could contain the noise in her mind if it were anything like his or how she shouldered the burden of it and survived year after year, giving the impression that she was handling it, coping. He felt somehow weaker than her in that respect. Yes, he had seen centuries come and go, kingdoms rise and fall. But this human in front of him had felt, had been betrayed, abused, forgotten, misused, overlooked, hurt, dragged through the metaphorical fire… all of this for her entire life thus far.

In moments like this, Castiel felt that perhaps he might fall apart. So he wondered, briefly, how she held herself together like she did… and how they would move past what had happened between them. His darkest fear was that the future he'd seen in 2014 would come true. That this was another step in that direction. Toward her dying at his hand. Nothing seemed more unthinkable. Still, the fleeting image of them together, content, living a normal life… it stayed with him and it warmed him even as it frightened him past the point of no return.

Silent and still, Alex looked up at him finally, her eyes veiled and afraid and hurt, a little guarded. In the background, Sam's screams continued.

"Are you... alright?" Cas finally asked her, filled with dread. The question made her look down and away, he noticed her breathing quickened and her mouth moved oddly. She stood up unevenly, trying to hide the way she was struggling.

"It's whatever," she replied in a dismissive mumble. He heard anger and sadness alike in that strange, foreign statement. It's whatever? Her words almost hurt him somehow.

She hugged herself, a hand on each opposite arm, facing halfway away from him where he could only see her profile. His eyes swept over to where her stitched up wound would be. She held the now-bloody rag there still. He coveted for his ability to heal. But somehow he felt that even if he could take away the physical pain, she would still be hurt, she would still be avoiding his gaze like that. He didn't know what to do. How could they have been so close a few moments ago and now… this? He could see that she was watching him out of the corner of her eye. They were only a few feet away from each other, but it could have been miles—that's how stark and alone Cas felt.
He felt confusing loss, because for a few snatched and hazy moments, he had felt the opposite of alone. There in her arms he'd been in her atmosphere and it had been a place where he felt so many new things, a new definition for the word 'close'—and it hadn't been just physical, this closeness. It had transcended that. It had set his heart beating faster, his convictions rooting deeper, his feelings soaring higher. It had felt right, even though he knew, logically, it had been wrong. ...Hadn't it?

"Alex! Dean! Someone help me!" Sam screamed, and Alex tensed, looking up, conflicted.

Cas glanced in the direction where she looked, then back at her. "He'll probably be like this for a few days," Cas told her gently, cautiously. He was unsure how she would react to him now.

Alex finally looked at him and didn't look away. But she was apprehensive and guarded. "Cas… what… what was happening?" her voice was barely above a whisper. "What were we doing?"

His stomach jerked at her blunt question and his gaze faltered away. He knew that she wasn't asking what they were doing, but what it had meant, because… he wanted to know, too, so intensely. He needed to know if she had wanted it, too, if below the current of the spell, that she had wanted that from him. He remembered that moment of clarity where he had fought back, broken away—and she had looked at him and seen him. Alex's question hung in the air. 'What were we doing?' He didn't have the answer, or maybe he did he just didn't know how to articulate it.

"We were…" he began, uncertain, not possessing any clear idea of how to answer. And then the fear deeper than any ocean on earth overtook him when he again thought of the future Anna had shown him—he felt that if he admitted to her his deepest desires and affections, he risked everything—he risked her. And his mind screamed at him in quick succession, you have to tell her! and then she can't know! In agony, Castiel realized he was trapped. He had no other choice but to hide more of himself and his true convictions from her in order to save her from the future; he no other choice but to continue the lie he had started. The lie he had invented by taking away her memory of him kissing her in the panic room.

He steeled himself for what he was about to tell her. "It was… Famine's effect on us—" he said. He wouldn't look at her as he lied. It was too appalling—he didn't know if he could see her when he said what he said next. "It was—the vessel."

Alex sounded like she'd had the wind knocked out of her. "...W-what?"

"It was the vessel," Castiel repeated, jaw clenching tightly.

There was a long silence. "I… I don't believe you," Alex finally replied, but she sounded very uncertain of herself.

Castiel forced himself to look at her, and her expression made him want to die, but he couldn't let it sway him. He continued in the abominable lie, believing this was what was best, what would save her. "Jimmy… he um—he liked brunettes."

Alex's expression became almost angry at that remark and she came closer to him, eyes narrowed like she was suspicious. "Amelia—his wife?—was blonde."

Cas fumbled, feeling caught. He'd forgotten that. Alex's anger had transitioned into some kind of desperate hurt. "You can't tell me—" she wavered, "that all of that was just—that all of that wasn't you." She was almost begging him now for the truth, letting herself be vulnerable. "None of it?"

Cas met her gaze. His conscience screamed at him that this was wrong. But he didn't know any other way to protect her. "I'm sorry," he replied stiffly, loathing himself. "It wasn't."
Alex stared at him, blinked, took a couple deep, fast breaths… then exploded. "That is such bullshit, Castiel!" she pretty much shouted, then her expression crumpled and she turned away, walked to the opposite wall and leaned there heavily, a palm against the wall. Her body seemed to have trouble breathing, her shoulders were trembling.

She'd bowed her head and let her palm become an angry fist against the wall. Castiel watched her in a mixture of sadness, shock, and hurt. He should leave. He should walk away. He should let her be angry at him and become bitter, because that would distance them. That would save her. But the sight of her alone and hurting was too much for him to bear and he regretted what he'd said. His misery increased tenfold—nothing he did and no choice he made seemed right. He went closer to her, stood just behind her, uncertain. And then put a hand gently, so gently, onto her back, onto her right shoulder blade.

Alex's head came up, but she stared straight ahead and she didn't make to look at him or turn around. She seemed to have gone cold. Her voice was calm, low, quiet. "Don't touch me." He didn't understand but he did as she said and took his hand away, feeling stung inwardly somehow. She turned her head slightly toward him, but wouldn't look at him, not even sidelong. "Just leave me alone, Castiel," she said evenly, voice low and measured, blank. She called him by his full name. She usually called him Cas.

Confused, Castiel didn't move yet. Usually her anger made her volatile—but she was quiet and placid, a still shining lake instead of a stormy ocean. This disturbed him more than anything else. She wasn't reacting like he'd thought she would. Castiel felt overcome with despair and frustration and regret. He couldn't heal her, he couldn't comfort her—he couldn't fix this even though he so desperately needed to do all three. He tried again, his hand hovering just above her back. He wanted to touch her so badly, reassure her in some small way, tell her that at least that he didn't despise her. "Alex…"

"I said leave!" she snapped, voice trembling, turning away from him pointedly.

Castiel took his hand away, his entire vessel feeling so disappointed and wounded. He stepped back and disappeared, giving her what she wanted and fading away into the melancholy of shame.

Sam's shouts had dissolved into pitiful moans and Alex shut her eyes tight, dug deep for composure. There was no way she could stay in here and listen to his cries for help and not do anything. She turned around in a robotic fashion and listen to his cries for help and not do anything. She turned around in a robotic fashion and made her way out of the basement, trying to escape everything: her feelings, her brother's distress, reality in general. She walked up the stairs slowly, unseeingly. Each step she took was heavier than the last. Her heart felt like it was a twisted mess of pain. It overshadowed any physical pain she felt. In fact, she wanted to feel more physical pain than what she was feeling right now so that it would overpower her emotional duress. She let the rag drop away from her arm wound, not caring anymore.

"Hey kiddo, you okay?" Bobby asked her. He was near the top of the stairs in his wheelchair. Alex had forgotten he would even be there but… she couldn't find anything in herself to respond to him at all, just shook her head a little and walked right past him. She felt like the second she opened her mouth, she'd lose it. She was in pain of the heart, body and mind and no one, nothing was more important than just getting the hell out of here right now. In a haze of painful limps, Alex went outside and into the darkness of night, struggling her way to the end of Bobby's road, trying to hold herself together, trying to shove the painful feelings down and away. For now, the stabbing sensations in her thighs were distracting from those feelings. Until she thought of why her legs hurt so bad where Cas had grabbed her with his super-human strength hands. God. Overhead, thunder rumbled.
She reached the end of Bobby's road. This is where the old rusted Singer Auto Salvage sign arced over the dirt road, and on either side of it there were junked cars. Alex leaned heavily against one of the old vehicles, both palms on the hood above the wheel well. She couldn't stop the thoughts from coming.

His words and what they meant to her echoed through her mind. 'I'm sorry. It wasn't,' he'd said. She'd heard: it wasn't me who wanted you that way. It wasn't me who practically ravished you in furious passion. It wasn't me who looked at you with eyes full of desire and need. It wasn't me who touched you like you've never been touched before. It wasn't me who almost pushed you over the brink. It wasn't me. It wasn't me, it was all this body I inhabit. How could you even think that it was me?

She shouldn't be surprised, is what she kept telling herself. He was a friggin' angel, a creature from a totally different realm… he'd existed for thousands of years—who was she? Some little blip on the radar. One single grain of sand on the beach. How could this being want to be with her like she wanted to be with him? She felt cursed, because only she would get loopy under the spell of an apocalyptic horseman and make out with her guardian angel and then, and then make the mistake of thinking he wanted it too. But dammit! How couldn't he have?!

She remembered the conviction and passion he'd kissed her with, the desire he'd clearly felt for her… she wanted to stomp her foot down and cry out in frustration because her instincts were screaming at her that it was not fantasy, she wasn't crazy and there had to be something to this!— because Castiel had told her, and recently too, that the vessel and Jimmy were dwarfed by who he was, that Jimmy was gone pretty much. So how the hell could that be true that the vessel wanted her, not him?

If it had been a person other than herself, would Cas still have acted? Still done all of that? Because she remembered that moment of clarity where the ragingly lustful feelings had ebbed away and he had pulled back, and she had seen him, seen such soulful things in his gaze… things in his eyes that were never there at any other time… and she had kissed him then, and he had returned the kiss without hesitation—God and out of all of it, everything that had happened in that restaurant kitchen, that shook her the deepest and hurt her the most. It had been real. It had been them. Why would Castiel lie to her about this? Why was this happening to her, at all? She was in love with an angel who couldn't, wouldn't, or didn't love her back. Maybe some combination of all three. But she so badly wanted him to. So badly.

Angry at herself for her feelings and sadness, Alex flew into a fit of rage, whirling around unevenly, fists clenched at her sides as she looked at the sky wrathfully, eyes glistening. "Castiel, you fucking coward!" She screamed. Her voice broke at this point. "Liar!"

She sat down on the hood of the old car miserably and put her face into both of her hands. What kind of hopeless lovesick child was she, anyway? It was the worst kind of pain to want someone who didn't, apparently, want you back. She had bigger things to worry about, the fucking planet was falling apart—but Castiel was something she couldn't stay away from in her mind. She thought of the first time he healed her, his gentle touch and the awe she'd felt for him. She thought of the second time he'd healed her, directly going against what Uriel had said, doing it with Uriel in the same friggin' room, doing it anyway and looking at her like he did. Maybe that was when it happened—her, falling in love with him, or starting to—she didn't know, she just knew that it had happened and now she didn't know how to fall out of love with him. At the current moment she wanted to be anyone else except Alex Winchester, anyone else but the person feeling these things —

The sound of feet shifting on gravel nearby snapped her out of her thoughts. She jumped up and was shocked to see Cas standing in front of her, his expression miserable and a little reluctant. The very sight of him reduced her to nothing, and she thought that just a few minutes ago, she'd had him in a way she'd never had anyone else...

He was looking at her with heavy eyes. Her misery increased when she realized how badly she wanted to rush into his arms, to be held there in safety. This thought only further infuriated her with him—how could he be the one to devastate her internally and at the same time be the one she wanted comfort from? In an attempt to protect herself from further pain, she became outwardly hostile. "I thought I told you to screw off," she said angrily, crossing her arms and looking away sullenly.

He ignored that, stepped a little closer. "I've upset you," he said. He sounded soft, gentle, concerned which should have only increased her rage, but instead, it broke her down. Dammit she had been determined not to let him do this to her again, but she just couldn't hold it all inside… the anger, the sorrow, the rejected desperation. Her shoulders sagged, her crossed arms loosened. "No shit," she said, and even though she wanted to shout at him, she could barely manage to speak. "You—you kissed me like that, touched me like that and then said it wasn't you." She blinked against watery stinging eyes. Disgusted with herself, she raised a hand to angrily dash away a tear off her face.

He saw the tears and his expression wavered. "Alex, I—"

She shook her head, trying so hard to hold it together. "God, Cas! How do you think that makes me feel?" She asked accusingly. Did he really not know? His expression was mournful. How could this man have been so tangled up with her in pure passion, make her feel so amazing and part of something grand and beautiful… then say it wasn't even him? She told him how shitty it made her feel before she could stop herself. "It makes me feel stupid and worthless and cheap."

Castiel became almost angry when she said that, and came even closer, his trench coat brushing up against her knee. "You are none of those things," he said intently and held her gaze, looking at the young woman in front of him, who was suffering at his hand, yet again. He was so torn and so unhappy with himself. Perhaps this was his curse, that anyone who he cared for so deeply would only be hurt by him. And even though he knew the future was grim for them, for her, he couldn't keep on with the charade, with this choice. He just couldn't. It wasn't right, and he needed to tell her the truth. He grasped her gently there at the elbow and prepared to make his confession, even though the heart of his vessel hammered, his stomach turned, and he felt an unhinged sense of fear that telling her this would offset events he couldn't control, would make her hate him, would repulse her from him completely. But with Alex standing there in front of him looking heartbroken and in pain, he knew he had to do this. So he did.

Hesitating, Cas began. "I lied to you, Alex. It wasn't Jimmy who…" he stopped here, looked down, trying to summon the courage. There was no turning back. His voice softened. "It wasn't Jimmy who... desired you that way," he admitted guiltily. Alex went completely still. Castiel's eyes slid up to hers and his veins coursed with anxious tension. "It was me."

Her jaw slowly slackened and she looked like she couldn't believe what he'd said. He knew from her expression that she wanted to hear more. "I… wanted…" he cast around for a way to say it, then helplessly settled on, "you."

She continued to stare at him and began to shake her head in stuttering confusion, her voice dazed and not fully convinced. "Why did you lie?"

Cas withdrew from her slightly, ashamed and unsure how she could not be livid with him yet. "I thought—I'm not entirely sure what I thought." It was an honest answer, because Cas was questioning his motivations and logic very closely now—they seemed unsound and also ineffective. "Perhaps that I was keeping you safe," he said and swallowed. This truly was the point of no return. He looked down. "From myself."

"Safe from you?" she asked, sounding like that was a foreign concept.

Castiel felt another pang of regret. He had explained this to her, the forbidden nature of romantic angel and human relationships, the danger therein. Only, she didn't remember it. He had taken that from her. "It's... hard to explain," he explained in a very tense voice.

Her expression grew a little less soft. "Try."

It was halfway between a plea and a command, and Castiel found himself suddenly faced with another choice: lie more to cover it up, leave and avoid the truth... or be honest and end the deception now. He didn't allow himself enough time to choose the coward's way out. "Anna showed me the future," he said. "Before we went back to nineteen seventy-eight. I saw the Croatoan virus, Lucifer using Sam, Dean... burnt and broken." Alex didn't look very disconcerted. Dean had told Cas about that and she was aware of those things... so those things weren't news to her. But what he said next, she hadn't known. "And... I saw us," Cas said, barely able to look at her. "What you and I became." There was a short silence of bated breath—Alex's eyebrows raised up. "I saw you die," he told her, and the pain at the memory of the image seeped into his voice and face. "In great detail. And it happened because of me."

Alex frowned, at a small loss. "But... but Dean... he changed it, didn't he? When he brought Sam back in, found the Colt. He says he changed that future."

Cas let out a heavy, troubled breath. "No. I don't think he has, Alex," he paused. "I have to change it. I can't let Lucifer take Sam or..." he trailed off, then looked at her sorrowfully, "any of it."

"Any of it?" She had a hurt and confused face. "I don't understand..." she looked at him in despair. Just like the last time he'd told her that they couldn't do this. Wrecked inside, Castiel realized what he had to do. He didn't want to. He was afraid of what she would think of him, but he had made up his mind and he looked at her sadly, reached for her.

"What are you doing?" she asked apprehensively, looking at his two fingers coming to the side of her forehead. She didn't move away or attempt to dodge his touch though.

Cas paused, looked at her directly in the eye. "I took something from you," he said gravely. "I'm giving it back."

"Wha—" Alex started, but his fingers touched her skin, and suddenly, she remembered it like she'd never forgotten at all.

_The night before Carthage. Reaching out, touching Cas's hand. Him looking at her openly, fully, longingly. Sam interrupting them. Alex freaking out and fleeing to the panic room._

_Cas coming after her, asking why she'd done that, why she'd touched his hand. She'd lied, said she didn't know—afraid of being rejected. But he'd pressed. He hadn't let it go. He had seemed desperate for an answer and he'd refused to leave her until she answered him. And the alcohol, the idea that her life might end the next day had given her some kind of bravery and she remembered asking him, fumblingly, if he had feelings for her._

_His answer? "The truth is... I think about you much more than I should."_
Hearing that had stunned her, had elated her, had scared her all at the same time. "Me too," she'd said, unable to believe the moment.

But then it had all faded away when he said "we can't." And she heard him explain that angels and humans weren't allowed to be together, that it was forbidden and volatile... she'd heard it but hadn't understood how it was fair or right because she wanted a chance, just a chance to be with him because how she felt wasn't going to go away.

And he'd turned to leave, but she hadn't let him, she'd seen a sliver of hope and had clung to it, but he'd become strained, then had tried to intimidate her, to frighten her away. He'd grabbed her close, trying to scare her. But there in his arms, feeling his heart hammering through his coat and against her chest, she'd been nothing except intrigued—she'd seen it—literally seen the shift in his eyes from determination to fear and then to desire and conflict. She could see him fighting himself, but he lost. He'd kissed her then. His first kiss, a kiss she hadn't fully known how to give, but quickly learned. His mouth had been so sweet and earnest at first before the kiss deepened into something more fervent and searching. And maybe it become too much for him, because he'd pulled back, shaken up.

She remembered that when he pulled away he had been panicked, been shocked, telling her he shouldn't have done that, that it had been a mistake. And she'd been crushed. Crushed. And then when he'd realized he hurt her—his expression had changed, for a long moment he'd just looked at her and then he seemed to decide something. He'd reached for her, she'd asked what he was doing. "Making this right," was the answer, and she'd known suddenly. That he was going to take this memory from her. "Cas, no!" she'd exclaimed.

"I have to," he'd said, agonized as she struggled against him, and he'd looked at her, sadly. "I am much stronger than you, Alex."

But Alex had struggled still. Please don't take this one beautiful thing from me, her heart had cried out, even as out loud she had begged him, "please, no, Cas, don't do this!"

He'd looked into her eyes, and she'd known he meant it when he said, "I'm sorry."

But he took it from her anyway.

The memory rushed into her mind in just a couple seconds and Alex blinked a few times, stunned, then looked at Cas, completely overcome at the revelation. He looked grim and resigned, ready to receive her wrath. But all she could do was drop her eyes away, stare blankly at the space in front of her unseeing, trying to figure out how she felt about this. He'd kissed her and the way he had done so had revealed more than words could ever say—that he felt for her like he felt for no one else, that he held things in his heart for her that were substantial and tender. No wonder he'd taken the memory away. He couldn't lie to cover it up, the unspoken things she now knew that he kept from her. Her eyes flicked up again to his. She knew now. She knew, and her heart swelled because this changed everything.

At her speechlessness, Cas was puzzled and apprehensive. "Aren't you... angry with me?" he asked, seeming somewhere between disbelief and almost disappointment.

"Well yeah but..." she replied automatically, then trailed off. Alex looked at him and saw a man—an angel—who felt like everything rested on him, and more than that, her entire life and well-being. And maybe that's what Heaven said a guardian angel had to shoulder, but in her opinion, Heaven was full of a bunch of jackasses and they needed to re-write the rule book. Especially when it caused Cas so much pain, so much confusion. But he wasn't even her guardian angel because of Heaven's orders anymore. No. He'd clearly chosen long ago to be her protector of his own free will, despite what Heaven said either way. And that was why she wasn't so much angry as she was just torn.

She got it, she did—that he took the memory for a variety of reasons, that he believed he was doing the right thing. He thought them being together was the reason why she died in the future. He'd told her they couldn't be together and it had wounded her and he hadn't wanted her to have to deal with more pain. It was obvious that he was afraid of it, of the thought of them being together. So was she, honestly.

So, no, she wasn't angry even though from anyone else doing the same thing she would have been livid. She was... honestly? Relieved. Because she had been right about him and she wasn't crazy and now the dreams about the panic room made sense and hell yeah Castiel needed the ass-kicking of his life for pulling that shit but right now...? Right now she was just reeling from learning the truth: that this angel cared for her more than he was willing to admit. He had also clearly said they couldn't be together though. Herein lay the difficult feelings and the great sadness. She gently grasped his upper arms, sought his gaze as he waited for her to reply.

"Cas I—yes I was hurt. It... it hit me hard." She paused. "But... I mean, we could have made that decision together." She shook her head, mournful, unable to believe what she was saying. "To walk away from whatever this is between us." Her eyes fell away from him. "If that's what has to happen."

His eyes flicked up to hers and they were anguished. "What's between us is cursed." His statement was like a ton of bricks. "All I ever do... is hurt you. I damage you. I kill you in the end."

At that comment about him literally killing her, Alex looked at him a oddly. "Aren't you being a little overly dramatic?"

"No. I saw it, Alex." Cas was deadly serious, and withdrew from her, troubled. "You were infected with the virus with me right there beside you. I didn't save you from being bitten and... and I... you begged me to... with a gun... before you could turn..." he looked to his left, expression sickened. "And I did it. With the gun." He paused heavily. "And there was... a... we had..." he trailed off, shook his head, decided against saying whatever he'd been about to say. He looked back at her intensely. "I won't allow this to happen. It's my task to protect you. Preserve your life, not destroy it."

Even though he looked terrified, like he'd seen some horrifying crap—even though he was telling her about her brutal death in the future where he was forced to shoot her to death—it seemed so far away, so unthinkable that Alex couldn't quite identify with Castiel's horrified concern. "You told Dean once that all roads led to the same destination," she pointed out hesitantly. "And every time we've tried to change the future before... it's never worked." It was dismal of her, but realistic. Dean hadn't been able to stop Azazel from killing Mom. They hadn't been able to stop Lucifer from rising. What else had fate sealed in as unavoidable?

Cas looked even more intent, even more convicted. "I have to try. I won't risk your life."

What life? She didn't expect to live long anyway, she never had—and honestly if she had to live the rest of her life without Cas, she would rather die young and take the time they had to be together. Lame? Maybe, but the way she felt? Yes. Alex struggled to find words, her mind a tornado, the walls of her emotions weakening, threatening to break down. Everything they'd shared so far... everything between them... it was too important and too valuable to just drop and walk away from. This angel had practically been her first real friend outside of her brothers. He was the one who had given her a voice and life and a part of himself. He'd been her first kiss, the first and only person who had ever touched her intimately, the first person who had ever truly made her believe she was beautiful. The only person to inspire such heartfelt longings beyond the physical. The one who had died for her once and would die for her again. Who else in the entire world could ever, ever compare, even a little bit?

She had no idea what kind of relationship they would have or how it would work, none of that but... the thought that they couldn't was unfair and overwhelming, everything opposite of what she wanted. "So you're saying..." she trailed off. Gathered herself, wishing that she would say this and he would reprove her, say she'd misunderstood. "That we can't."

Their eyes met.

"Yes." he said. "That's what I'm saying." His reply sounded quietly devastated.

No—everything inside of her begged no, because she didn't want to just give up. She couldn't. She felt her pulse speeding up, her entire body buzzing with nerves. "But Cas—" she moved toward him. He wasn't far. "I don't wanna walk away from this," she admitted, her emotions in overdrive.
And then she asked the question that left her completely vulnerable to getting hurt again. Because she had to know, once and for all. "Do... do you?"

Her question seemed to stir something inside of him, something he visibly fought. Something that made his jaw tighten and his mouth move briefly and his forehead tense up. He looked at war within himself, and for a minute, Alex thought he was going to turn from her and walk away.
Please, please don't, she thought to herself. Then his expression softened. He seemed to give up or give in, push aside himself for a moment.

"No," he said brokenly, conflicted. He reached out and touched her gently underneath her jaw, his thumb resting over the middle of her chin—his eyes dark and holding so many unspoken things, but most of all, a tenderness and affection. The skin underneath his hand came alive with surprise and thrill alike. Her heart jumped inside her chest and he shook his head just slightly, seemingly helpless as he gave his final answer: "I don't."

His hand swept back, tracing her jaw, resting against the side of her neck as he closed the distance between them, pressing his lips to hers softly, fervently, surprising her and relieving her and making her dizzy with every amazing feeling in existence. Alex melted into him, feeling Cas's hand now gently cradling the side of her head, her pain was temporarily forgotten. His mouth was hesitant and shy almost, but searching and earnest, and together they found a deeper, slower kiss than they had ever shared before—a kiss that was unsure and desperate, open and undisguised. Maybe they both knew they shouldn't, but neither could help it. Maybe it was a mistake, they probably shouldn't have, but there was no turning back. Even without a spell, they couldn't find it within themselves to resist each other.

It was a kiss that said I don't know what's going to happen next. But I need you all the same. The kiss was deepening even more and becoming more mutually passionate, more and more heavy. It didn't need to make sense. Alex wanted him—needed him—desperately, and that was fact. One of his arms was around her waist and tightened just slightly—he was being delicate with her, obviously still torn up about the way he'd physically harmed her just a little awhile ago, doing the same thing... kissing. Except this was different. They weren't gale force driven to destruction and harm, they were just two people who desperately wanted each other and needed this, couldn't handle the reality that they shouldn't be together. He was making her feel so warm all over and ready for something she thought only he could give. He was eliciting a feeling of pure bliss as he kissed her and in response she whimpered softly, wishing she knew how to be brave enough to deepen this moment even more...

"My my," came a low, velvet voice. "Am I interrupting something?"

Alex and Cas pulled apart fast, startled at the sudden intrusion, because they hadn't heard anyone walk up. In front of them, smiling slyly—"Crowley," Castiel said lowly, eyes narrowing. He immediately stepped in front of Alex, putting himself between the demon and herself.

Crowley chuckled, giving the impression of casual pleasantry. "Castiel, I presume… we haven't yet had the pleasure." Crowley glanced at Alex, then back at Cas, seeming pleased. "And dear me, if the rumors about the two of you aren't true."

Rumors? What rumors? Castiel maintained a hostile expression and didn't ask. "What are you doing here?" he demanded.

Crowley shrugged, took a couple steps to his left, shot Cas a coy glance. "Just popped in for a quick visit with littlest Winchester."

Bristling, Cas didn't take his eyes off of Crowley for a minute. "What could you possibly want with her?"

Crowley had stopped and he stood with his hands in his pockets, an overly concerned look on his face as he peered at Alex where she stood behind Cas. "Dear me, Alexandra love, you're not looking too well—guardian angel fall down on the job today?" his expression changed and he looked pleased with himself again, held a finger out in thought. "Oh, that's right... he's the one who did that to you." He made a tsk sound and wagged his finger once. "Domestic violence, such a shame."

Cas's expression fell completely in shock.

"Get lost, Crowley," Alex said.

Crowley just smiled at her. "But you and I have things to discuss, remember?"

Cas looked back at Alex questioningly, then at Crowley. His expression was dark again, murderous. "What things, Crowley?"

Crowley's maddening smile remained, he wiggled his eyebrows once, clearly enjoying the power play. "That's for me to know, mate."

Castiel strode across the remaining three feet between them and grabbed Crowley roughly, threateningly, by the front of his suit jacket. "You won't touch her."

"What, only you get to do that?" Crowley asked, eyes glinting, completely apathetic to Castiel's show of aggression. His voice lowered a little bit. "Tell me, Castiel… did you like it? Batting her around like that? If I didn't know any better I'd say the girl picked a boyfriend a little too much like Daddy dearest."

That comment touched a raw nerve Cas hadn't even known existed and in a sudden fit of rage and anger, Cas moved to slam Crowley to the ground—but the demon vanished out of his grasp, reappearing beside Castiel a few feet off and out of reach. "Ah-ah-ah!" Crowley chided, nonplussed. He straightened his jacket. "Just had this dry cleaned. No horseplay for me right now, thanks."
Castiel now held his angel blade in his hand and looked at Crowley dangerously, pointedly. Crowley's eyes slid to the blade, his eyebrows raised—he looked at Cas then his eyes slid to Alex, who was standing beside a junked car, leaning heavily onto it with one hand. "Funny, that." Crowley looked at Cas with a fascinated, superior little smile on his face. "Haven't you heard gambling's a sin, choir boy? I'm surprised you're willing to bet her life."

"What do you mean?" Cas asked darkly.

"Just look at yourself, angel wings—I'm not the one here who's a danger to her." Crowley's smile twitched just a little. "That would be you. Falling right into step to dance the same old song..." he trailed off meaningfully, seeming to suppose they would know what he meant.

At their confused looks, Crowley sighed, rolled his eyes. "You know the one—goes a little something like Lucifer coming over to Sam Winchester's for a stay, never leaving? Dean going off the deep end? Cas here a real boy? Alex the tragic victim of gun violence?" More shocked silence and Crowley grew impatient, snarky. "Yes yes, I've seen the future, too, the whole bloody thing—" he paused, pretended to be introspective. "I laughed, I cried, I learned about myself." He smiled, eyes crinkling pleasantly, only it wasn't pleasant.

At the lack of reaction he got from Alex and Cas, he seemed to tire of the act, momentarily. "Look—I don't want it to happen, either, for different reasons though. My kind needs to survive. Couldn't give a rip if you two live or die, but... still. Irony's not lost on me." He gave them sly looks again. "After all, I saw the show you two were putting on just a couple tics back. Riveting stuff." He chuckled.

Cas didn't respond to anything Crowley had just said, just darkened again. "Leave. Now." His jaw tightened. "Or I lay you to waste."

Crowley almost smiled seductively at Castiel at that point. "Mm. I like it when you get all assertive." He looked at Alex, then back at Cas. His expression was challenging, self-assured, amused. And the demon disappeared.

Cas looked around intently, for any sign of Crowley as he went back to Alex, who was still leaning onto the car, looking unsettled. "What did he mean, he had things to discuss with you?" Cas asked, deeply concerned.

Alex looked at him in the eye and without even thinking, lied. "I don't know." Now she was the one keeping secrets.

He didn't catch her in the lie, he was still looking around them, appraising the immediate area, his blade still in hand. "I don't like this. How did he know where you were?"

Bobby's address wasn't exactly a secret, and the outside wasn't warded... but Cas was right. It was disconcerting. He looked at her finally, and it was hard to really face everything they had been through together today. He seemed to have similar thoughts, because his expression changed slightly, became more doubtful and introspective. His jaw was tense. "As much as I don't want to admit it... Crowley is right. I—I'm gambling with your life." He paused heavily. "Every time I... give in to my feelings... it's just endangering you."

"But—" she began to protest, thinking she could reason with him, change his mind.

"No, Alex," he said with dark, resigned finality, a voice lacking the emotional depth it had held a minute ago. It was unsettling how quickly he'd changed from emotive to emotionless. "We can't. We won't."
He touched her on the shoulder, and they were suddenly inside Bobby's house where it was dark and quiet except for the sound of Sam's muffled shouts downstairs. Startled by the sudden change, Alex blinked rapidly, looked around to orient herself, not sure why he'd done that.

"Stay inside, where the demon warding is," Cas told her brusquely, avoiding her gaze. And he disappeared without another word, without any warning whatsoever.

Startled, Alex waited a couple seconds—he hadn't just left like that... had he? "Cas? Cas!" Alex stood there a second, waiting for him to reappear. "Come back!"

He didn't.

---

Two Days Later

Outside, drunk as hell and pissed at the world, Alex laid on the hood of the Impala, staring up at the night sky. Everything was spinning and she felt sick. She sat up, wished Dean would come out here and get onto her, cuss her out, fight with her. Anything to distract her from the hopeless bullshit she was dealing with internally. Cas had disappeared and wasn't answering any of her calls—after Crowley had shown up, it had just been over apparently because she hadn't heard from him since. This frustrating circumstance was the inspiration for her current drunken state. The pain of longing for him, of actually having had these moments of closeness with him—and then nothing. Nothing. No explanation and no resolution. Just more uncertainty and heartbreak. And tears. There had been a mortifying amount of tears.

She cried so much more now than she used to and felt so much more than she used to. And it was Castiel's fault. Dean, when he'd caught her crying recently, had thought her tears were because of Sam.

Sam was in the middle of crazy demon blood withdrawals... Dean was mostly avoiding her, being totally standoffish and depressed... life sucked overall at the moment.

Alex slid off the Impala hood and into an uneven standing position, picking up the discarded whiskey bottle from where she’d dropped it on the gravel in the salvage yard. She tried to get a couple last drops out—but it was empty. Infuriated, she threw it with a loud shout, as far as she could... which wasn't far because she was wobbly and uncoordinated. Miserable, she began making angry mumbling noises like a child might—she couldn't even throw things right!

"Little old for temper tantrums though, aren't we?"

Alex whirled, stumbled, and then made a face. "Ohh, just great. Just who I wanted to friggin' see!"

"Miss me, darling?" Crowley asked her, swaggering over to her casually. She hated this dude so much right now, well, always, but right now especially. He was getting cocky too, showing up in the salvage yard now?

"No," she said, and jerkily stumbled to him, trying to be threatening. "I didn't miss you... now get your skanky demon ass outta my face before I—"

He winced a little. "Before you what, dear? Regurgitate your stomach matter onto me?" He lightly touched her on the fronts of her shoulders with the tips of his fingers and pushed away delicately. "Think I'll pass."

She tried to think of something cutting or mean to say, but her mind felt so garbled. "You suck," she settled on slurringly, then realized how stupid that comeback was. Crowley let it go, even though he made an unimpressed 'really?' face.

"Anyhoo," Crowley commented dryly. "Thought anymore about what I told you, love?"

Alex looked at him with a blank expression. About her having something to do with killing Lucifer? Yes, she hadn't stopped thinking about it since he'd told her—and in fact, Cupid had mentioned casually that she needed to be born as well as Sam and Dean. Did that mean something? Well, if it did, she wasn't about to tell this jackass any of that. She gave a much too enthusiastic: "No."

The corner of his mouth tugged upwards just slightly, knowingly. "It's permeated your every waking thought, hasn't it." His voice was dark velvet. "Well, I've found some interesting factoids since our first little chat." He fixed her with a coy gaze. "Ever heard the one about a pure soul being able to destroy evil from the inside?"

Alex tried not to look surprised that he'd found that, the same thing she'd found recurring through so many religions and myths. "Uh, no."

"Right. Well. Lucy's evil, yeah? And guess who's the pure soul who can apparently destroy him?"

Alex stared at him hard, waiting for him to say, then when he kept just looking at her, she felt her mouth hang open stupidly. He meant her? "Are you kidding me." Alex squinted at him, not even incredulous. She was at the point of laughter. "Buddy. I am not a pure soul." She laughed bitterly, shook her head, sighed in over-amusement.

Crowley seemed to have expected as much, shook his head faintly. "Humans. You have higher standards than the rest of us. See, a pure soul doesn't mean what you think. It has nothing to do with hail Mary's or piety, not really." He grinned now, started counting on his fingers. "A pure soul is three things. One, it's human." He pointed at her. "Check. Two, it must be whole, not diced up to bits or somesuch. Check. Three... and this one's my favorite... the soul must belong to a virgin."

Alex's face fell. "Check." Crowley's smile was positively devilish. "Although you came kind of close a couple days ago to being kicked out of that club, aye?"

Alex glared at him vengefully, wishing she had the demon knife with her. "How the fuck do you hell monkeys always know all this shit about my life?"

Crowley just smiled slyly. " Wouldn't you like to know?"

"Yes you asshole, that's why I asked."

"Heavens you're a saucy drunk," Crowley commented mildly, then waved a hand in dismissal. "You're missing the point. You've got a pure soul. You're a Winchester. It's painfully obvious that there's something to this."

Alex tried to poke him in the chest with her index finger, but missed and got the top of his shoulder instead. "You know, I have a damn good mind to tell my brothers you've been stalking me, Crowley." She chuckled, a slurred sound. "You won't like them when they're pissed, and trust me, I tell them you've been coming around and oh-ho there's hell to pay for you my friend."

Crowley raised his eyebrows challengingly. "What? Moosey Sam gonna get me? He's not even on two legs. And Dean. Ah, Dean." Crowley clasped his hands behind his back, took a few steps to his right. "Now Alexandra, I know you won't tell them a thing. We both know that." He looked at her conspiratorially. "You tell them there's a possibility that you're involved in this whole end-of-the-world shindig... and they never let you out of the house again." He chuckled. "Ironic, isn't it?"
They tell you that you're their equal, that you're a great hunter... but at the end of the day, actions speak louder than words." He shot her an appraising glance. "Haven't you ever wondered why they're so protective of you? Why angel boy is so protective of you? It's 'cause they perceive you as incapable and weak, love. They don't think you should make your own decisions. Well. I do." He feigned an epiphany. "*Well well—*a demon being the only feminist in the group! How's that for irony?"

Alex looked at him mistrustfully, fighting the desire to actually listen to him or agree with him. "You just want me to kill Satan for you so you can keep the demon party going," she said, then made a 'pfft' sound and rolled her eyes. "Well joke's on you, jackass. I'm not part of it. Your rumors are wrong, so go find someone else to piss off."

Crowley, however, just gave her a deeply unnerving look, stepped closer. "Now, now. I wouldn't be so sure of that if I were you."

"Whatever, Crowley," Alex said. "Now fuck off." She glanced him up and down, finally coming up with a good insult. "By the way, your suit is tacky as hell. Looks cheap."

"This is Armani," Crowley said, affronted. Alex smirked at his reaction, and he seemed to realize himself, and was suddenly all pleasant, cool smiles again, passively aggressively tearing her down. "No worries, pet. I understand. Upset about the boyfriend, aren't you? He never calls, never visits, never tells you how he feels anymore..." he sighed with mock sadness, then he smiled again. "Sad day when the only one on your side is a demon in a tacky suit, aye?"

She opened her mouth to cuss him out again, but he disappeared, leaving a shaken, pissed, and abysmally wasted Alex behind. She would drunkenly mull these things over for the next few minutes, try to stumble into the house but pass out on the stairs. She would then be found by Dean who would sadly pick her up, haul her inside, and reflect, yet again, on the unending times he'd failed his brother and sister alike, and how close to just being done with everything he was.

Because nothing was changing, nothing was getting better. Everything was going to hell, and every day was just another damn failure on his part.
"He went down, down, down... and the devil called him by name."
- Tom Waits

Four Years Ago

"Dean, it's me," John Winchester protested, sounding sincere, confused, and betrayed. He stood completely still while staring at his son, who was currently holding him at gunpoint.

"I know my dad better than anyone," Dean growled back, the colt steady and unwavering in his grip, his expression a fierce glare. "And you ain't him."

"The hell's gotten into you?" John asked in disbelief.

"I could ask you the same thing," Dean said menacingly, not backing down and not fooled for a second. "Stay back."

Sam returned at that very moment—he'd been checking the protective salt lines he'd made in the abandoned old shack they'd holed up in. Sam's face was bruised and bloody, one eye was swollen up from the fight he'd had with a demon earlier that day. He saw his father and brother and stopped short, frozen. "Dean! What the hell's going on?!!"

Behind Sam, Alex emerged from further back in the house, and her expression dropped, matching Sam's almost instantaneously. She looked similar to Sam—the same demon who had beat Sam to a pulp had flung her into the side of a car and the entire left side of her face was a mess, her lip was cracked and bloody, her dark green jacket was ripped. Her silver whistle glinted up from where it laid against her shirt. At the sight of her in the same room with Dad who wasn't Dad, Dean edged closer to his siblings, keeping the gun trained steadily on their father.

"Your brother's lost his mind," John told Sam darkly.

Dean immediately shook his head. "He's not Dad," he insisted, fighting fear and panic.

"What?" Sam asked, as if his brother had suggested the unthinkable.

"I think he's possessed," Dean said, his voice beginning to waver in distress and disbelief and how could he have been so stupid? "I think he's been possessed since we rescued him."

"Don't listen to him, Sammy," John said, relatively calm and commanding despite the tense situation.

Sam hesitated, unsure now, suspicious. "Dean, how do you know?" he asked his older brother. Almost hiding behind her twin's larger form, Alex was looking at their father in disbelief and mistrust, trying to see what Dean saw too.

"He's... he's different," Dean managed, barely able to think straight.

"We don't have time for this," John said urgently, sounding every bit like their father, making it hard to figure out if Dean was telling the truth or not. "Sam, Alex, you wanna kill this demon, you've gotta trust me."
Sam looked at Dean, then their dad, and there was a long moment of silence. Alex's fingers tightened on Sam's arm, she moved toward Dean just slightly—her way of siding with her brother—and John saw it. "Sam," John appealed in a soft and pleading tone of voice none of them had ever heard him use.

Sam looked again at Dean, who was fighting to keep his composure, fighting not to break down. And that seemed to convince him. "No," he told his dad, or whoever it was. "No."

"Fine," John said, barely whispering, looking defeated and disappointed in his children, who were all standing in a huddle near each other. "The three of you are so sure, go ahead." He almost looked as if he were fighting tears now. "Kill me." He looked between the three of them for a moment longer, then bowed his head, waited as Dean held the gun steady…but Dean didn't pull the trigger—the colt would kill the demon and Dad, too—and frozen, he just stood there, the gun trained on Dad uselessly. Alex looked at Dean in abject horror and confusion and Sam stood stock still, holding his breath. They were all hoping Dean was wrong. Hoping it was Dad in front of them, not a demon.

But Dean was right.

"I thought so," John said, but his voice had gotten ominously deeper, there was a little smile on his lips—and he looked back up and his eyes were yellow. Their worst fears were realized—it was the yellow-eyed demon. And before any of them could react, they went flying separate ways, thrown up against three different walls to remain pinned there helplessly. The colt clattered to the floor out of Dean's grip, and John—the demon—bent and casually picked it up. "What a pain in the ass this thing's been," he muttered.

Struggling against the demonic hold that pinned him to the wall, Sam stared at the yellow-eyed demon hatefully, recognizing the demon as the one who had killed their mother and ruined all of their lives. "It's you, isn't it?" Sam's expression was quiet, deadly. The demon just smiled. "We've been looking for you for a long time," Sam said through clenched teeth.

"Well, you found me," the demon said, almost amused.

"But the holy water…" Sam said, confused and thinking back to when they'd tested him just to be safe.

"You think something like that works on something like me?" the demon asked with a coy smile.

Growing angrier, Sam tried to fight the invisible hold, tried to break free, only to be pushed harder into the wall. A frustrated sound escaped from his throat and he leveled the demon with a death glare. "I am gonna kill you!" he roared.

The demon didn't bat an eye. "Oh—that'd be a neat trick. In fact—" he put the colt down on the old wooden table in the middle of the room, baiting Sam. "Here. Make the gun float to you there, psychic boy."

Sam looked at the gun but nothing happened and the demon chuckled lowly, turning his sights onto Alex, who was pinned at the furthest end of the room. She saw him looking at her and went still from her attempts to break lose, watching his approach with a razor-like expression as her breathing increased rapidly. He only smiled, an eyebrow lifting almost imperceptibly. "What, don't you have some angry things to say to me, too?" he asked, then paused. "Oh—" he pretended to think of something, then that sly, triumphant smile returned. "That's right. Can't talk, can you?" He stepped closer to her, took a dark lock of hair off her shoulder, looked at it with some kind of fascination there in between his fingers. He made a thoughtful hmm sound and Alex struggled, her breathing grew frantic and strained as she fought harder, trying to get free.

"Leave her alone," Dean said, voice wavering helplessly. He was ignored.

"Daddy's darkest secret." The demon said, looking Alex in the eyes. "He doesn't like to tell anyone about you. His freak, mute kid." He touched the side of her hair, petted her almost, trailed his hand to her neck, ran his thumb across the delicate skin there. She tried to shrink away, face twisted in revulsion. "But I don't think you're that bad," he said, smirking almost. She looked like she'd never heard anything more despicable.

"Hey get the hell away from her!" Dean barked, loudly this time and the demon turned, looked at him over his shoulder.

"Or what? You gonna kill me, too?" the demon mocked, looking over at Sam challengingly. Straining against the hold even more than before, Sam looked murderous. The demon let go of Alex.

"Well, this is fun," the demon said, walking over to the window beside Dean. "I could've killed you a hundred times today, but this..." he sighed and chuckled a bit, pleased with himself. "This is worth the wait." Dean struggled, still pinned to the wall, and the demon looked over at him, smiling just slightly. "Your dad—he's in here with me. Trapped inside his own meat suit. He says 'hi' by the way. He's gonna tear you apart. He's gonna taste the iron in your blood."

"Let him go, or I swear to God—" Dean managed in a trembling voice.

"What? What're you and God gonna do?" The demon asked darkly. "You see, as far as I'm concerned, this is justice." He came over to stand in front of Dean, close now. "You know that little exorcism of yours? That was my daughter Meg." He paused. "The one you killed today in the alley? That was my boy Tom. You understand."

"You gotta be kidding me." Dean shook his head, struggling to maintain his composure, trying to think of a way to break free and save his siblings, and save his dad.

"What? You're the only one that can have a family?" The demon asked cynically. "You destroyed my children. How would you feel if I killed your family?" He paused and slowly, so slowly, a dark smile spread across John's lips. "Oh... that's right. I forgot. I did." The smile was gone. "And you know, maybe I'm not done yet either." He looked in Alex's direction, then Sam's, who was glaring at him viciously.

"You tell me why," Sam demanded acidly. "Why you did it."

"You mean why did I kill Mommy and pretty, little Jess?" The demon almost smirked at that question, turning and facing Dean again. "You know, he never told you this, but Sam was going to ask Jess to marry him. Been shopping for rings and everything. Well, I couldn't have that."

"In the way of what?" Sam asked suspiciously.

The demon backed up a little, almost swaggering. "My plans for you, Sammy. You..." his eyes slid over to Alex, "and all the children like you."

Sam looked over at his twin in dismay, breathless, then looked back at the demon in confusion and horror, disbelief. "She's not part of this," Sam said emphatically, shaking his head.
"Oh, but she is, Sammy," the demon smiled darkly. "And somehow, I think you already knew that." Sam's face fell, scrunching with even more confusion—or was that dread?

"The hell you talking about?" Dean demanded angrily.

"It's really none of your concern, Dean," the demon said, sounding short on patience.

"Like hell it isn't, asshole."

Rounding on Dean and coming closer again, the demon leaned closer intimidatingly. "You know, you fight and you fight for this family, but the truth is they don't need you. Not like you need them. Sam—he's clearly John's favorite. Even when they fight, it's more concern than he's ever shown you."

Dean's jaw clenched tight even as the demon turned and looked at Alex. "Wait." the demon was whispering, feigning thoughtful surprise. "Wait." His chilling smile was back. "How could I forget?" he pretended to be apologetic. "I take it back Dean. She needs you, in fact, sometimes you think it's too much. Sometimes the burden of caring for her threatens to send you over the edge. Mostly because you know you can't keep her safe. Not forever." He was going to Alex again, his voice was dropping lower into more ominous tones. "Not from things like me."

"You did that to her, didn't you, you sadistic son of a bitch?" Dean demanded, trying to get the demon to come back to him and engage with him instead. Anything to get the yellow-eyed demon away from his sister. "You made her mute that night in the nursery."

The demon just chuckled, ignored Dean, addressed Alex. "Do you ever get tired of Dean being your mouthpiece? Cuz he doesn't always get it right, does he, Alexandra?" He touched her lips thoughtfully with his fingers and she stared defiantly into his eyes, with fear and hatred and rage alike. The demon was smiling mockingly even as Alex internally gathering the courage to do what she did next—which was viciously shoot her head forward as she opened her mouth wide, biting down as hard as she physically could onto his two fingers touching her lips. He screamed in pain and surprise as blood burst out—she let go and the demon recoiled briefly even as Alex spat into his face forcefully, blood and saliva alike.

The demon's face was utterly terrifying as he grabbed her roughly by the chin and made her look at him. She glared daggers, breathing hard as residual blood from biting him ran down her chin. "You little fucking bitch," the demon growled acidly, almost snarling he back-handed her across the face.

"Hey!" Dean thundered, enraged and desperate to break free—Sam was straining even harder, turning red with, bellowing with effort.

Wincing, Alex's head was turned to the side as her vision doubled and flickered. The demon smirked, looking at the brother's reactions, apparently pleased. "This is going to be so much better than I thought," he commented, and looked at Dean, his smile deepening. "Watch this trick."

What the hell? Dean wondered, but then Alex's head went back, her mouth open in a silent scream—she began to bleed heavily from her chest.

"Alex! No!" Sam shouted.

"Stop!" Dean pleaded, desperate and fighting the hold over him in complete vain.

"Oh, I'm just getting started," the demon said lowly and left Alex to writhe in pain as he walked over to Dean, who suddenly shouted in agony, eyes screwed shut against the sudden violent onset of pain everywhere.

"Dean!" Sam shouted, even as Dean continued to spasm. He felt warm, wet stuff pouring out of his chest—blood. The pain was so intense, so unbearable—and Alex was still bleeding, still convulsing and he couldn't get to her, couldn't do a damn thing—God no, this couldn't be how it ended...

"Dad!" Dean whimpered, panting, "Dad, don't you let it kill us!"

Sam was shouting, trying as hard as he could to get free. Dean felt himself going weak, woozy, the world was becoming dark, there was blood in his mouth, the taste of it revolting—Alex was looking at him through her pain, silently begging him to help her, or maybe that was her wishing she could get free and help him. Dean could barely move now, it took everything he had to function at all, but with his last strength he looked up at his father and begged, prayed, hoped against hope that somewhere deep down his dad would hear him.

"Dad, please," Dean whispered… and then the world went completely dark and silent as he passed out completely.

The Impala sped down the road in the dead of night, three badly wounded passengers inside as Sam pushed the pedal down all the way, trying to coax as much speed as possible out of the car. He glanced back in the rearview mirror, seeing Dean and Alex slumped against each other, covered in their own blood—his brother was barely there, Alex had passed out completely. Even at the edge of consciousness, Dean was attempting to hold his little sister up.

"She's not part of this!" Sam had protested.

"Oh, but she is, Sammy," the demon had replied softly, shaking Sam down to his core. "And somehow, I think you already knew that."

Sam's eyes flickered over his twin and he was filled with sickened worry. Dean had asked him what the demon meant as they had gotten into the car—asked why the demon said that about Sam 'knowing' Alex was part of the special children—Sam had lied to Dean's face, said he had no idea… when really, he did. He did think he knew what the demon was talking about—and it was something terrible, dark, something that Sam never wanted to think about or confront. Something he would take with him to his grave. Beside him in the front seat, Dad groaned in pain. Anxiety jumping up about ten points, Sam glanced at him guiltily.

Right after Dean had passed out, Dad had snapped out of it somehow, regained control over the demon's possession—Sam had gotten the colt, Dad had begged him, commanded him to shoot him through the heart to kill the demon once and for all. But Sam hadn't been able, he'd frozen—Alex had stumbled over, barely conscious, and Sam thought for a second she was going to try and take the gun from him, shoot Dad and the demon herself—but then the black smoke had poured out of Dad's mouth and it had been too late. Now Sam could feel his father's anger, his disappointment, his judgement.

Beside Sam, Dad hissed in pain again. "Look, just hold on, alright," Sam said anxiously. "The hospital's only ten minutes away."

Instead of a nod and gratitude, Dad looked at him accusingly. "I'm surprised at you, Sammy. Why didn't you kill it? I thought we saw eye-to-eye on this? Killing this demon comes first—before me, before everything."
Sam's insides were sick. He glanced in the rearview again at his siblings, jaw tight, his entire body tense. "No, sir," he replied firmly despite his nerves. He shook his head. "Not before everything. Look, we've still got the Colt. We still have the one bullet left. We just have to start over, alright?" Sam was trying hard to backpedal, appease his father just a little bit. "I mean, we already found the demon—" Sam was cut off by what happened next.

In the span of two seconds, there was a bright flash of light, the sensation of brutal impact, the realization that they had been hit by something—and then, nothing.

It had been several days since the accident. Well. It hadn't even been an accident: a black-eyed demon had done it, possessed a semi-truck driver and then smashed the several-ton truck headlong into the side of the Impala, trying, and almost succeeding, to kill them all. It was really a miracle that they had survived, period. Times like this, John could have almost believed what Mary had: that angels were watching over them. Well, maybe not him specifically, but his children? Maybe. If angels were real, they would want no business with the likes of him. A man who had ended up here, who had done this to his children, who had focused on one thing—and that one thing hadn't been them.

John was in the basement of the hospital, crouched down and tracing out a devil's trap—the white chalk line stood out starkly against the dark gray concrete floor. He had drawn so many of these that he did it automatically, unthinkingly, even with one of his arms in a sling and useless.

He thought he'd been doing the right thing by raising his kids to know how to kill, how to fight, how to hunt. He thought it would keep them safe, but now he saw that everything he'd ever done had quite possibly pushed them into danger and trapped them there forever. There was no way out of the life of a hunter except to die. It was with the grandest sense of irony that he realized in his attempts to avenge his wife's murder he'd instead sentenced his children to death. But the alternative would have been running forever. And who could do that?

Grimly John reflected that he felt to blame for all of this and helpless to stop anything at the same time. His oldest son was in a coma upstairs and it didn't look like he would pull through. His daughter was laid up with a broken arm, head trauma and internal bruising among other things. She was refusing to communicate with Sam, upset about Dean—upset about everything. John hadn't gone to see her in her hospital room, not when she was awake, anyway. He couldn't face her right now.

He looked down at his two now-bandaged up fingers that had been bitten. He remembered hitting Alex across the face when he was possessed and screaming internally stop that, don't touch her!—but then the demon had slyly replied what? You've done this before. Why can't I? And John had struggled to regain control, because such righteous self hatred and anger had coursed through his veins—the demon was right. There had been times, too many times, when he had flown off the handle and hurt his daughter. He had hit her a few times during his life and shoved her many more, called her things he shouldn't have—it had been because of the stress, the alcohol, the fatigue—he blamed these things for the times he had smacked his kids around, but deep down below the surface excuses he knew he had done those things. Not the substances, not the circumstances.

But John had changed, or he thought he had—he'd been careful, he'd tried damn hard to control himself—he hadn't laid a hand on Alex in nearly two years now. And that was a shit thing to be proud of. Possessed or not, it was so awful that he'd done it again. The look on her face when his hand had struck her. He had forgotten how much that looked wrecked him, how utterly wretched it rendered him. Every time he looked at her, he felt his every failure deep down in his bones.

At least one of his children was unharmed for the most part. Sam was fine, or at least of the four of them, the least damaged. But even if he was physically okay, John knew that Sam despised him for everything, hated him for what had happened, blamed him for this whole mess. And Sam's hatred for John could only be topped by his own self loathing, his own self hatred. He deserved Sam's scorn. Every bit of it. Completely sober for the first time in a long time, John realized as he finished the chalk outline of the devil's trap that he didn't understand why Dean was so loyal to him.

He finished the devil's trap and took out his knife, began to mutter the incantation, preparing himself mentally for what he was about to do. This was risky and maybe stupid, but he saw no other options. He sliced his palm open until blood flowed—lit a match, finished the incantation, dropped the match into the bowl where the flames leapt high, burned bright, then died out. He stood up, looked around, waiting—then a hand grasped his shoulder, turned him roughly. "You conjuring me, John," the man said—and his eyes flashed yellow—John leveled the colt at him. "I'm surprised." A smile came over the demon's face, and two black-eyed demons, a nurse and an orderly, appeared behind him. "I took you for a lot of things," the demon said, almost intrigued and a little amused. "But suicidally reckless... wasn't one of them."

"I could always shoot you," John pointed out. And damn, did he want to. It took everything he had not to pull the trigger and end this abomination right now, finish the job once and for all. But Dean's life hung in the balance.

"You could always miss," the demon replied, and he chuckled darkly. "And you've only got one try, don't cha?" His eyebrows furrowed just slightly. "Did you really think you could trap me?"

There was a long pause. "I don't want to trap you," John said, and he lowered the colt, lowered his defenses, revealed his game plan. "I want to make a deal."

The demon seemed genuinely surprised. "A deal, John? With me?" His eyes narrowed just slightly. He began to slowly pace the circle of chalk where John stood. "It's very unseemly, making deals with devils. How do I know this isn't just another trick?"

"It's no trick," John said evenly, truthfully. "I will give you the colt and the bullet, but you've got to help Dean. You've got to bring him back." He watched the demon closely. His voice softened, giving away his emotions. "And... my daughter. Give her back what I know you took from her. You do that for me, the gun and the bullet are yours."

"Why, John, you're a sentimentalist," the demon said, smiling widely, mockingly. "If only your kids knew how much their daddy loved them."

"It's a good trade," John said, keeping his voice low and calm, keeping his emotions out of it. "You care a hell of a lot more about this gun than you do Dean or Alex."

The demon smiled at that, stopped walking, looked at John pointedly. "Funny, I might have said the same to you just a few days ago." His smile faded. "And don't be so sure about that. Dean killed some people who were very special to me. But still, you're right, he isn't much of a threat," the demon conceded, arrogant. "And neither is your other son. Or your very quiet daughter."

"You son of a bitch," John muttered, barely restraining his anger that boiled beneath the surface.

"Guilty as charged," the demon said, smiling wickedly. He stepped a little closer, looked at John thoroughly. "You know the truth, right? About Sammy, the other children?"

"Yeah," John admitted balefully, his stomach turning because he wished he didn't know. He felt sick. "I've known for a while."
"Then you know that little Alex was supposed to be one of my special children, too," the demon said, made a regretful little sighing sound as he backed up, turned away a little. John felt every muscle in his body tense as the demon shook his head slightly. "Shame. We had plans for her. I had plans for her." He looked back at John in a way that chilled him to his bones. "Who knows. Maybe they'll still work out, I don't know…" John wanted to lunge at the demon, tear him apart with his bare hands.

The demon smirked slightly, turning back to face John fully. "But neither of them know, John, do they? That you know more, much more than you let on. That you've been playing dumb… avoiding facing the facts. Stringing them along all these years, hoping you can change fate…"

John was losing patience and fast. He needed answers or he would lose his temper and use the damn gun. "Can you fix Dean? Can you give Alex her voice back? Yes or no."

There was a cocky little smile. "You need to sweeten the pot a little if you want me to help you out, John."

"What more could you want from me?" John demanded angrily. "I don't have anything else."

"Of course you do," the demon replied, and the look on his face filled John with uneasy dread. He suddenly flashed a grin. "I'll take the girl."

"What?"

The demon looked at John darkly, his former good humor gone in the place of deadly seriousness. "Dean lives. Alex gets her voice back… but she comes with me, no questions asked on your part." The smile was back, the lightness too. "It's just you and your boys like you always wanted."

"The hell would you want with her?" John asked in horror at the suggestion. The demon didn't say, just fixed John with a blood-curdling little smile. John shook his head in abject denial, in barely contained rage. "No—there has to be something else you want."

The demon's eyebrows raised slightly and he paused. "All right. Your life for Dean's. He lives. You die. Alex gets nothing." There was a smug smile on the demon's face, as if he thought he knew which one John would choose.

John didn't even have to consider. He stepped a little closer to the demon assertively. "I want to see Dean fixed before you take me. That's the deal."

The demon was silent, blank, surprised. John grew intense. "Don't look so surprised," John said bluntly. "You really think I would let you have my daughter?" He stepped even closer, threateningly, his words blazing with anger. He may have been a terrible father in many ways, but he'd be damned before he sold out his own flesh and blood to these creatures from hell. "Never. You will never have her in any way, you sick son of a bitch—not you, not any other hell reject, not even the goddamn devil himself. Not if I have anything to do with it." He stared at the demon unflinchingly, resolute. "Now are we gonna do this deal or not?"

"I can't explain it," John could hear the doctor say to Dean on the other side of the wall. "The edema's vanished. The internal contusions are healed. Your vitals are good. You must have some kind of angel watching over you."

"Thanks, doc," he heard Dean reply, and the doctor left, walked past John, who stood outside against the wall, out of their line of sight. It was early morning. The demon had come through on the end of his deal—Dean was alive and well. John heard his boys talking in hushed tones, as he blankly watched the doctor walk down the hall. The single thought echoed in his mind: today he died.

He thought about telling them, he wanted to tell them, but he just couldn't. Not outright. Swept up in end-of-the-line emotions, regrets, longings, John almost thought of just going now without a word to any of them, surrendering to the demon what he'd promised, just letting it end like this. He wasn't sure how he could bear to look at his children and know it was for the last time.

He turned to walk away, but hesitated, listening to Dean's deep rumbling voice and Sam's soothing tenor tones and changed his mind, unable to walk away—but not just for sentimental reasons. Dean had to know.

John took a deep breath and made himself known, stepped into the doorway, knocked on the doorframe, looking at his sons and feeling so much all at once. Dean and Sam looked up at him, vaguely surprised. "How you feeling, dude?" John asked Dean, smiling at him softly.

"Fine, I guess," Dean said, a small smile there at the sight of his dad. "I'm alive, at least."

"That's what matters," John said, returning the smile, the sight of Dean alive and well touching the deepest part of him, overwhelming him with so many thoughts and feelings. He was looking at his son and seeing him when he had been small, bright-eyed, eager, happy and not yet scarred by the world. John cleared his throat, looked around the room glancingly. "Where's—where's your sister?"

Sam, still upset after the argument they'd had yesterday about the demon, was looking at John without a smile. "Asleep in her room. She still isn't feeling too good." Sam replied, sounding distinctly blaming toward John. He paused and looked at his father suspiciously. "Where were you last night?"

John looked at his youngest son silently. If only he knew. "I had some things to take care of," John told him ambiguously, wishing that this once they wouldn't argue and fight.

Sam's eyes narrowed. "Well, that's specific," he said, tone bordering on sarcastic.

"Come on, Sam," Dean said, sounding fed up.

Sam didn't even look at Dean, just kept his eyes on John. "Did you go after the demon?"

John looked down briefly, shook his head. "No."

"You know, why don't I believe you right now?" Sam asked accusingly, and John finally came fully into the room, looking at his two sons, wishing he could tell them. He was remembering when Sam was young and happy, had trusted him, had run into his arms laughing when he'd gotten home—those days were so long gone that John could barely remember them, almost wondered if he were imagining them completely.

"Can we not fight?" he asked Sam softly. Sam looked utterly bewildered and stunned at the quiet question—John shook his head sadly, almost unable to keep his emotions at bay. "You know, half the time we're fighting, I don't know what we're fighting about. We're just butting heads." John swallowed, tried to keep that faltering smile on his face because if he didn't keep smiling, he'd fall apart. "Sammy, I, I've made some mistakes." God, he had made millions. "But I've always done the best I could," John said. The statement felt like a complete lie—he almost took it back. Almost. "I know my best was terrible. But it was all I had to give. I just don't want to fight anymore, okay?"

Sam looked beside himself, peering into his father's face with quickly-increasing worry. "Dad... are you all right?" he asked apprehensively.

John just kept smiling, kept lying. "Yeah. Yeah, I'm just a little tired." He paused, suppressing his pain, holding himself together just a little longer, trying not to think about what he knew about Sam, the dark secrets he held inside. "Hey, son, would you, uh, would you mind getting me a cup of caffeine?"

Sam hesitated. "Yeah. Yeah, sure..." he looked at John several more times but left, still frowning in confusion. John watched him go sadly, eyes lingering on Sam's retreating lanky form.

Dean's voice brought him back to the hospital room. "What is it?" he asked softly, and John tore his gaze away from his younger son to look at his older one. Dean looked so worried and burdened as he stared up at him from where he was propped in the hospital bed.

John was overcome with regret and he shook his head, still seeing Dean when he was younger, only a little boy. "You know, when you were a kid... I'd come home from a hunt, and after what I'd seen, I'd be... I'd be wrecked. And you, you'd come up to me and you—you'd put your hand on my shoulder and you'd look me in the eye and you'd..." John struggled against tears as he remembered, "you'd say 'It's okay, Dad.'" He paused, and couldn't stop himself. He was losing control of his emotions, and his tears were audible in his shaking voice. "Dean, I'm sorry."

Dean stared at his dad in quiet shock. "What?"

John tried to smile through the tears, but the smile was faltering. This apology was years and years overdue. "You shouldn't have had to say that to me, I should have been saying that to you. You know, I put—I put too much on your shoulders, I made you grow up too fast. You took care of Sammy, you took care of Alex, you took care of me. I should've been the one who took care of everyone. I wasn't." John paused somberly, almost talking out loud now, not even to Dean. "I messed you kids up good. I wish..." he trailed off, shook his head. The things he wished... they outnumbered the stars in the sky right now and naming any of them was pointless. Wishing didn't change anything, and maybe his life was a joke but at least he was leaving behind three young people who might do it better than he had.

He looked at Dean, welling up with the sudden onset of pride, because he realized so fully and completely right now that his son was a man worth being proud of. John didn't think he had much to do with the man Dean had grown into, but he was still proud and he had to let him know all the same. "Dean... you were all the man I never was. I just want you to know that I am so proud of you."

Dean, who had been taking it all in silently, looked at John incredulously. "This really you talking?"

"Yeah, it's really me," John confirmed, and came closer to his son, who looked almost fearful at this point.

Dean seemed totally taken aback, even cautious. "W-why you saying this stuff, Dad?"

John looked at Dean through blurry, tear-filled eyes. "I want you to watch out for your brother and sister, okay?"

"Yeah, Dad, you know I will," Dean said, voice shaking. "You're scaring me."

"Don't be scared, Dean. Just listen." John leaned closer, growing serious, quiet, his voice low whisper. "You have to save Sammy. From himself, from what that demon did to him. And if you can't save him—Dean, you'll have to kill him." Dean drew back, eyes wide in shock. John wasn't done. He grew even more sickened than before. "And Dean, your sister… keep her safe. From Sam."

"From Sam?" Dean protested, more and more disturbed and terrified by the second.

John looked at Dean sadly, wishing he had more time. Because yet again, he was leaving too much on Dean's shoulders. "Just trust me, son."

Dean stared, aghast. "Dad—I don't—" he almost pleaded, eyes wide, begging John for a reason, an explanation. "What are you talking about? What did the demon say to you?"

John looked at his oldest, knowing he couldn't explain it, not in the time he had left. So he lied again, put on a reassuring smile. "We'll talk about this later, son. Get your rest. I'll see you in a little while." And John retreated, not giving his son a chance to reply.

Dean watched his dad leave in shellshocked silence and John smiled through the pain at his boy one last time, then turned and walked away, closing his eyes and standing in the middle of the hospital hallway. Momentarily, he opened his eyes and they immediately went to his left, where Alex's door was open. He hesitated, his chest clenching. And slowly, he approached.

John lingered in the open doorway, looking at his daughter. She was on her side and sleeping deeply, her dark and messy hair a cloud around her head, her knees pulled up toward her chest, her hands underneath the side of her face. She'd always slept like that, difference was until she'd been six, she'd been snuggled up like that into Dean's side—Dean slept on his back, an arm under his head—and Sam would always be on the other side of Alex, his back to her back, his arms crossed and mouth open widely. They'd slept like that until John insisted they stop the 'little kid shit' and start sleeping separate. He'd still caught them like that a few times afterward, and it had infuriated him. Why? Why had that stuff left him so enraged? Maybe because his kids were better parents and family to each other than he ever was. Maybe it's because he was worried that depending on each other would make them weak. Maybe it's because for years everything had made him angry and crazy. Everything.

John came into the room slowly, hesitantly, looking down at his daughter, the little girl he'd spent a lifetime trying to convince himself that he was protecting. But seeing her laying there, bruised and battered and messed up as hell he couldn't help but think he should have let her go awhile ago. Not only to keep her safe from this life of demons and hell creatures… but to keep her safe from himself.

Their relationship had been so strained and nonexistent these last few years—maybe always, actually. Over the years Alex had become an expert at avoiding John and he'd been okay with that, because he knew in his heart of hearts that he wasn't good for her, that he had no clue how to parent her. So he hadn't really tried at all. After all, it had been too late. But now, in the sunset of his life, he wished he'd tried. Just a little.

He should have done so much more for her, but he'd always left her as an afterthought, uncertain how to relate to her, uncertain how to approach her at all. He'd been angry at her for being different and abnormal. But now he was just angry with himself for the selfish, cowardly shit he'd subjected her to. He thought of when she'd been younger, a little stick of a girl with eyes too big for her head. The taller she'd gotten and the older she'd grown, the more distance had been between himself and his daughter. Now, oceans might as well have separated them. And this was entirely his doing.
He was at her bedside now and didn't know what to do. He thought of waking her up to say goodbye—but he didn't. He just watched her for a minute, then carefully, gently smoothed the hair on her head and felt the heavy sadness settle over his heart. "Baby I'm so sorry," he whispered brokenly, and just looked at her, looked at his hand on her head. He realized he hadn't touched her affectionately like this in—well—he couldn't remember. He withdrew his hand from her. Here at the end of his life, he felt his failures so much more clearly than before.

John felt a deep sense of anguish overwhelm him inside and he turned, sat there gingerly beside her, just barely resting his weight on the hospital bed. He leaned over his knees, clasping his hands together, silent and looking down for a long moment. He looked upwards, searching the ceiling and despairing, his voice just a whisper. "I… I haven't asked you for anything in a long time. But just… can you make sure she's safe?" John hesitated. "Please. I know I don't deserve anything good from you. But… she does." His voice cracked. "Please." Silence, nothing. He wasn't sure if he'd expected a reply or not, but he felt disillusioned and for a long moment, silence rang in his ears. Was this really it? At the end of your life, maybe you always expect it will be different. More grand, more like the closing of a chapter, like a grand finale—not a question mark, not a comma.

John took in a deep breath and stood slowly to his full height, knowing what came next. He walked slowly to the door and turned back around, looked at his daughter, his little girl, one last time. And awash in regrets he could do nothing about, John Winchester steeled himself, drew a deep breath, and walked down the hall, a soldier until the end, accepting his fate with a raised chin, a steady gaze, and the knowledge that he had made the right choice. He had saved his son's life. He had kept his daughter safe from the clutches of the yellow-eyed demon.

Not even five minutes later, Dean would yank Alex out of bed and rush her into Dad's room where he was crashing, unresponsive. John Winchester would be pronounced dead at 10:41am.

__Present Day__

Alex spit and rinsed, the zing of minty toothpaste much better than the previous taste of vomit. _Never again_ she told herself miserably. She'd been saying this to herself a lot lately. Her head was pounding, her ears felt muffled, her stomach was a frigging nightmare, her head felt garbled and woozy, her entire body hurt. Much to Sam's frustration, she and Dean had gotten wasted last night, again. But she'd drank so much more than usual, trying to keep up with her oldest brother—and she was now realizing exactly how _stupid_ she'd been to think she could out-drink Dean like that. God—this was the hangover from hell.

Alex rubbed her face with the palm of her hand. Tired. Hurting. Heartbroken.

The past month was a blur to her. They'd spent about a week at Bobby's detoxing Sam and avoiding each other—then they'd left for Minneapolis to take care of a vengeful spirit and it had been a cut and dry job, nothing out of the ordinary. Nothing except the mood in their family. There had been a lot of silence between all three siblings, a lot more tension than in awhile, a lot of unspoken frustrations and suspicions. But they'd done what they did best… ignored it, said nothing about it. Carried on like life were normal, like the apocalypse wasn't hanging over their heads, like the devil wasn't hounding Sam, like heaven wasn't after Dean.

After wrapping up on that job last week, they'd caught wind of weird stuff happening back in Sioux Falls and returned to find that the dead were rising—including Bobby's late wife Karen. At first the people who had come back to life had seemed okay, or at least not violent, not inhuman—but then one by one they began to turn, to kill, to dissolve into monsters. Alex stared at herself in the mirror, grieved. Bobby had wanted his wife to be okay and stay alive _so badly_. He didn't deserve to be alone and unhappy like that. He didn't deserve for one second to have to see his wife again and then kill her again. Maybe all hunters were cursed to be alone, to see the ones they loved die, leave, fade out.

Going still, Alex felt herself rapidly becoming emotional as she began to think about him. She clenched the edges of the sink now, hard. Castiel was pretty much the biggest reason she'd been drinking so damn much the past month. She'd been trying to sidestep her confused and hurt feelings, trying to drown them out in a steady tide of beer and whiskey—but her thoughts were proving impossible to escape or forget, and the more she tried to run away from them, the more it hurt, the more the feelings burrowed into her, refusing to be moved.

Cas wouldn't answer her anymore, not at all. Alex had called to him almost every day of that first week but he'd been silent, hadn't appeared at all, not even for a second. She hadn't even tried calling him at all this entire week, bitter, finally accepting that he wouldn't come. The last time any of them had seen or heard from him was at Bobby's, the night that… that they had come so close to killing each other or screwing each other, she wasn't sure which. The night that he'd confessed things to her and she to him, and for a moment she'd thought even though he had told her they couldn't, that they would anyway. Because even though he'd said that, even though he'd told her in so many words that being together couldn't happen—he'd gone against his words, kissing her so tenderly and soulfully, leaving Alex absolutely convicted that there was no walking away, not from this… but then he had done just that, without any warning, and she'd been devastated, stunned. To have been warm in his arms one moment, then alone and cold the next.

At first, she'd called to him frantically, worried… but as the days passed the worry had turned to anger, disillusionment—now she was left feeling heartsick and alone, abandoned, with the reminders of him remaining on her body. She looked at the back side of her arm in the mirror, at the soft pink raised line where Dean had stitched her closed. A souvenir of the night when Castiel had cut her deep, in more ways than one. The bruises he'd left all over her body had faded, but the wounds he'd left on her heart remained, raw and open, painful.

Alex's eyes flickered over herself in the mirror and she could so clearly see the deep sadness that she felt inside. It was etched all over her face, hidden in the slump of her shoulders and in the edges of her mouth which hadn't turned up in a smile in days and days. She wondered in a saddened daze how this had happened, how she had let herself fall so completely, how she had become so weak and helpless. She realized had no control left, no say in the matter, no way out of being what she was: in love with Castiel. She wanted to physically break something out of anguished frustration. Maybe Alex would have in the past, but this version of herself had no fire left. And instead, she just hung her head and leaned onto the sink, squeezed her eyes shut, focused on breathing in and out. Shaky, agonized breaths.

She had never wanted something like this, ever. She'd always been focused on surviving and living up to expectations, fighting and following after Dean and Dad… it had been her only choice and she'd accepted it. But now she found herself desperately longing for something for the first time in her life—him. It seemed stupid but all she wanted was Castiel beside her and with her, because with him she felt safe and right, part of something and those were two things she wasn't used to feeling. Maybe he was trying to protect her by putting distance between them… but she couldn't bear it—not after she knew what it was like to be in his arms and held like she was treasured. Not after she'd looked at him and seen her own feelings reflected back in his eyes.

And when she wondered if she would ever even see him again, her heart physically ached.

Get—yourself—together. She forced herself to look in the mirror again, forced herself to stop, now. She straightened up, looked herself over tersely but then grew listless, lost her determination in favor of faltering self-doubt. She barely recognized herself. She used to be different than this, more unaffected and less distracted. In the mirror, she saw a crumbling version of herself staring back. She felt inches away from a breakdown, from utterly shattering and she looked away, tried to ignore reality. She readjusted the unfamiliar weight of the new pistol that was in the holster at her hip. It was a semi-automatic nickel-plated Colt 1911, one like Dean carried—he'd went out and bought her one without warning last week and shoved it at her, told her that carrying the hunting knife wasn't enough. She smiled softly, cynically, because when she thought about the things they'd been up against lately—what good would a gun do? The friggin' horsemen of the apocalypse and Lucifer in the flesh were after them. Her little smile fell. Maybe it was just a matter of time for all of them.

She could now hear low male voices vaguely in the other room through her messed up ears—the TV. Sam must be up she guessed. There was a flash of humiliation when she thought of her twin who had seen her in such an intimate and awkward position with Cas… as if that hadn't been bad enough, Sam had insisted on taking her aside and asking about it a bunch of times, acting concerned and worried—but Alex, mortified as hell that he'd seen that, had dodged him every time. Sam didn't know how deep the wound was he was poking at, he was just worried about her, but Alex refused, further frustrating Sam. It was just that every time she looked at him, she saw his shocked and horrified expression when he'd found herself and Cas under Famine's spell. And then in quick succession, she'd remember more—Cas's mouth on hers, his warm bare skin under her hands, them breathing each other in frantically, her body rendered useless and in the throes of utter bliss underneath the weight of his body against hers… they’d been in a place together that was warm and alive and real. And so being ripped from it and left in this cold, blank state of nothing, of alone—it wasn't fair, she didn't understand, and it was not even frustrating anymore, it was infuriating.

Alex heard the familiar sound of a shotgun cocking out in the main room and looked toward the closed bathroom door now, annoyed. Sam must be cleaning out his shotgun again—why did he have to clean it so obsessively, anyway? He was always getting the burnt-smelling shell dust all over her stuff. Alex wanted to punch something because everything, everything was making her mad right now. The sound of the men talking heatedly on TV grew louder and Alex suddenly stopped, her anger fading away as she realized that wait. That wasn't the TV. That was someone in their room!

She realized too late that what she'd been hearing wasn't what she thought at all. Not a TV. Not Sam cleaning a gun. The unmistakable sound of two shotgun blasts punched through the silence and Dean was shouting, someone was barking "stay down!" and something was very wrong. Alex wasn't thinking, just reacting, and fast, adrenaline rocketing through her veins at breakneck speeds as she snatched her pistol out of the holster, charged out of the bathroom, gun held high in both hands—two men in dark clothing with masks shoved up over their heads stood over Dean, their shotguns aimed at him—Sam laid motionless and bloody on one of the beds—the men noticed Alex the second she came out and the one closer to her was whirling, his gun swinging around toward her and Dean was jumping off the other bed, lunging toward the guys shouting something and Alex was firing at the guy in front of her before she could even fully register anything, before she could even fully take everything in.

The room exploded into a chaos of gunshots and shotgun rounds and Alex felt something hit her in the stomach hard enough to make her stumble backwards—she watched the guy closer to her fall over dead, his shotgun that had been aimed straight at her clattering to the floor—she looked down at herself, mystified… her stomach was warm and sticky? And suddenly pain, unbelievable pain hit her and she stumbled backwards, the air gone from her lungs, her pistol falling out of her grip. She hit the wall behind her and slid down, legs going out from under her brokenly. The world seemed to tilt and shift around her oddly and she looked up—remembering Dean had been there.
and where was he now?

She looked to her side with great effort, hearing the sound of her own labored breathing loudly in her own ears. Shock hit her like lightning when she saw that Dean was draped across the bed, staring up at the ceiling lifelessly, covered in blood.

"D-Dean!" she choked out, but he didn't move, didn't respond. On the other bed, she could see Sam's massive feet hanging off the end, not moving. "Sam?" she begged. No response and the thought they're dead shook her to the core and made the world close in on her, like her entire body was going to be sick, like everything was spinning out of control, like she couldn't move at all—and then the sound of booted feet in front of her. Alex looked up, panting painfully. She stared into the barrel of a shotgun—holding the weapon was a grim man. Behind him, the other guy she'd shot and killed was laying there.

Alex squinted up at her attacker, recognizing him. "W-Walt?"

He just stared down at her murderously. "You shouldn't have shot Roy, Alex," he told her lowly, lip curling upwards in a snarl. She heard the cocking of a shotgun and flinched. Click-click.

His finger slid toward the trigger. Alex closed her eyes, making a pathetic crying sound. And she didn't even think it would work but out of desperation and in pain and not knowing what else to do, she begged softly, brokenly. "Please, Cas…"

---

Five Minutes Ago
Glendalough, Ireland

The Irish people called this glacial valley a 'thin place,' believing it to be a holy ground, a spiritual refuge where pilgrims could seek to be closer to God. They said that here the veil was less, the divide was smaller—that one could reach out and touch God, be still and listen and hear his voice. Pilgrims came from all over the world to this place. One such pilgrim stood at the shores of the upper lake, looking over the tranquil waters silently.

Castiel observed the great verdant mountains surrounding the rippling lake, the billowing gray clouds above in the sky. He felt the cool dampness of the air, heard the lush rustling of the trees moving in the breeze. It was beautiful, it was serene, it was holy—but he didn't feel God here. He'd been looking for so long. There was almost nowhere left to look. A great, unexpected gale of wind came across the lake, whipped Cas's trench coat around him.

He wondered where God could be. Perhaps he was hiding, walking among humanity in a disguise. Maybe he was that child laughing and throwing pieces of bread into the water for the ducks. Perhaps he was the grizzled old man sitting on the bench leaning on his cane. But the biggest and most disturbing question was why would God hide? Why should God be so impossible to find? Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest. The word of the Lord. Castiel was beginning to feel as though he had been led astray… because how could a person find God if an angel couldn't?

Cas's mind turned to Alex as it usually did, and he wondered where she was. She hadn't called to him in days. He felt guilty, because she'd called to him multiple times after what happened with Famine—and he'd gone to her immediately each time. But he'd remained invisible, not allowing her to see him. She had never known he was there at all. And each time she called to him, he'd arrived silently and he'd seen her face crumble when she believed he hadn't come—he saw her grow sadder and angrier each time. But he would rather her be sad and angry than dead at his hands. So he remained silent, made sure she was safe.
It was difficult to keep himself away from her like this, but he knew it was the right thing. He'd decided it now and he wasn't going to fail again. He'd had a moment of utter weakness when she had told him that she didn't want to walk away and did he? He just hadn't been able to bring himself to lie or sidestep. He'd only been able to tell her no, then close the distance between them with a kiss. A kiss that haunted his mind still. All of his moments spent with her haunted him, but that kiss—being so close to her, feeling as though she trusted him with everything that she had—it stayed with him and he felt certain that he would carry it with him forever.

A small bird flew overhead and Cas looked up and watched it: the powerful beating of the wings and graceful dip and swoop of the bird's body in midair. Truly a testament to God's artistry and power, something as seemingly simple as a bird. God was there, somewhere, and Castiel knew with perseverance and faithfulness, he would find him and discover—Castiel stilled suddenly, hearing Alex calling to him—but this time was different—something was wrong, and he knew it right away.

He went to where she was immediately, and even before the scenery of Ireland faded completely, he smelled the unmistakable acidic tang of human blood. And he was in a dim motel room, mid-morning. In the space of a fraction of a second, Castiel took the sight before him in with a quickly rising sense of absolute horror—Alex was crumpled and slack against a motel wall in front of him, her legs were bent under her strangely, she was covered in blood, her eyes were closed tightly, her face was a mask of pain—and a man Castiel didn't recognize stood over her, wielding a shotgun, the end of it just inches from her face.

Startled by Castiel's sudden appearance, the man with the gun reacted fast and whirled, the shotgun arcing up through the air to aim at Cas—but realizing what was happening and fueled by a typhoon of soul-scorching fury, Castiel was erupting into a blazing assault—he stopped the barrel of the shotgun midair with both hands, tearing the barrel in half ruthlessly even as the guy pulled the trigger—buckshot fired out in a violent explosion, ripping through the air uselessly. Cas grabbed the man ferociously and whirled him around, brutally slamming him into the dresser that was against the wall. Wood splintered and the dresser broke in half completely from the force with which Cas had smashed the man into it—Cas ripped his blade from where it was hidden inside his trench coat, not even hesitating for a second, he brought the flashing blade down on the man who had dared to hurt Alex, ending him.

The man's eyes went wide as the blade plunged through his chest, and under Castiel's murderous gaze, the man gasped out a last breath and died with no grand fanfare. He slumped over and fell to the ground, where Cas stared down at him, breathing hard, his heart hammering faster than normal, his entire vessel feeling shaky and uneven. The room was silent once more. Cas looked to his side, where he saw Sam and Dean each laying on a bed—both shot dead.

In alarm Cas turned, laying eyes on Alex again, fearing what he would see—she was looking up at him and she looked terrified, her face twisted up in pain—she was struggling to breathe and Cas rushed over, dropped to his knees in front of her, shaking physically, horrified, his hands hovering over her arms as he looked at her and saw how bad it was. "No," he managed just barely, seeing that she'd been shot in the stomach, that she'd lost so much blood. It was pooling around her and the wall behind her was splattered with it, too. She grabbed onto the sleeve of his trench coat weakly and their eyes met and he saw how afraid she was and it was just like the scene he'd witnessed in their future.

Panic swept over Cas as he realized that she was dying and quickly, too—and he was powerless to do anything—he couldn't heal anymore—but Cas laid his hand over her stomach anyway, dizzyingly sickened when his palm became wet with her warm blood, when she made a pained, sobbing sound—a sound that wrecked Castiel completely. He began silently pleading with God, promised he would do anything in return, anything, if his father would allow him this one miracle, please! Cas stared at his hand in increasing dismay when nothing happened, and every desperate hope he'd held onto was dashed on the rocks, every bit of faith he'd placed in his father fell away from him like leaves fall from a tree in autumn.

Alex trembled violently underneath his hand, weakly putting her hand over his, her fingers shakily curling around his—Castiel stared at their bloody hands, shocked and dazed—at the sight of her smaller hand clinging to his larger one his chest spasmed painfully. He tightened his hand around hers, looked up at her, despairing. "It's too late," she choked out and he looked at her in abject denial, shook his head, gripped the side of her head not even knowing why, his fingers tangling in hair.

"No it can't be," he protested, almost unable to speak, his despair was so great.

Her warm hazel eyes were afraid, were searching his even as her chest rose and fell raggedly. "Cas, I—" she faltered weakly, then trailed off, blinked twice as if her lids were heavy, and her breathing hitched, she seemed to lose her focus completely—and Cas gripped her tighter, as if he could hold her back, keep her there with him—but she went still, her eyes sliding closed, her head lolling to the side, the breath gone from her lungs, the life gone from her body. And Cas was shellshocked, not breathing, staring at her, unable to even process what had just happened in the span of perhaps two minutes.

"No," he protested out loud, feeling as if everything inside of him were shattered and destroyed.
His hand moved down from the side of her head to cradle her face—his thumb brushed against the still-warm skin of her cheek and he felt so much sorrow well up inside of him that he felt he might break. This wasn't happening—she wasn't supposed to die like this! Beside himself in grief and shock and anger and helpless dismay, Castiel looked upwards, not knowing what else to do, his voice barely a whisper. "Take—take me instead," he said, then when nothing happened, his voice raised to an enraged shout. "Take me instead!"

The silence was deafening and his anger propelled him to his feet where he stumbled back a few steps, shaky. "Where are you?!" he shouted at the ceiling. Nothing happened and Cas lowered his gaze, breathless, confounded, not knowing what to do, not at all. He looked at Alex's body, curled against the wall brokenly and he looked upwards again, his chest tight in pain. "I—I need your help," he begged desolately. "Please."

Castiel waited, desperate for an answer, for anything. But nothing happened. God was silent.

Silence. There was utter silence. Then the sound of a heartbeat in her ears. Her own heartbeat?

She became aware that there was darkness all around her, the kind of darkness that no light can cut through—the kind of darkness that presses in on all sides, cloyingly. There was some kind of ground underneath her feet, but the air was dank and motionless, breathing was difficult—she realized there was an overwhelming sense of fright in the pit of her stomach, of no, please, no.
Why was she scared? Where was she before this? Alex wondered am I dreaming?

She turned a little, trying to look around, but couldn't see anything past the pitch black depths around her. She turned again, growing more and more distressed—and then in the distance, just barely, her eyes perceived a faint light. She began to stutteringly edge closer to it through the darkness and almost wanted to drop to all fours and crawl because that seemed safer, but she stayed upright, kept moving closer slowly, muscles tensed and mind on overdrive.

She got closer and closer to the source of light, and could begin to make out a definite structure. It was an old phone booth—she saw the top of a solid stripe of blue, the white word PHONE flickering a little. It looked old and weather-worn—the soft fluorescent light from the booth dissipated out into the dark, softly lighting just a little bit of ground—pavement—but on all the other sides of the booth, the light didn't hit anything—it was just solid darkness in every direction. She stood there in front of the phone booth, staring up at it oddly, unsure what was happening or where she was.

Without warning the shrill sound of the phone ringing cut through the utter silence, the black receiver rattled loudly on the hook, and Alex flinched backwards, startled. She looked around, maybe halfway expecting someone to appear and answer the call. Nothing happened. No one appeared. The phone continued to ring and Alex hesitantly inched closer, hand outstretched. She waited a few seconds, unsure. Then grasped the receiver and held it to her ear. She heard crackling on the other end and frowned. Then nearly dropped the phone when she heard a voice behind her.

"Alex," the deep voice said and she turned around, heart in her throat because she knew that voice only... it couldn't be, could it? But he stood there not four feet away, looking just like she remembered. She stared at him, the phone clutched in her hand so hard that her knuckles turned white.

She searched his face and remained frozen in complete disbelief.

"...Dad?"
"The stars, the moon... they have all been blown out."
- Florence and the Machine

Mama, put my guns in the ground I can't shoot them anymore...

The sound of thunder rumbling woke Dean up and he was immediately confused. It was night outside and he was sitting in the Impala—alone. Good ole Bob Dylan played on the radio.

That long black cloud is comin' down; I feel like I'm knockin' on heaven's door...

He glanced around and saw no sign of anyone—where was he? Dean switched off the radio, totally disconcerted—he couldn't remember why he was there or where there even was or where he'd been before he came to. He got out of the car and realized what the hell? He'd parked in the middle of the damn road! Okay, this was officially starting to weird him the fuck out...

The trunk of the Impala closed suddenly and Dean jumped and turned at the sound, frowning in slight alarm as his heart rate jumped up a few notches. The frown faded into a surprised expression when he saw Sam standing there holding a huge crate of fireworks. Only, it wasn't not Sam now; it was Sam when he was twelve or thirteen. He had the shaggy sandy hair—the small face that hadn't filed out yet—and the lanky awkwardness that comes with the early teenage years. "...Sammy?" Dean asked in slow confusion. And yet, there was a strange familiarity about this that Dean couldn't figure out or place.

"Come on, let's go!" Sam called, oblivious to Dean's puzzled confusion. His little brother was excited, grinning widely and already taking off into the field that was beside the road the car was parked in. Dean stared after him for a fraction of a second before he felt something grab him. He looked down into the young, freckly face of Alex. She was the same age as Sam—hair in two messy ponytails on either side of her head. She was wearing that old green bomber jacket of Sam's—wow, he'd almost forgotten about that thing. It was oversized on her. She used to wear it all the time.

She was holding his arm with both her hands while grinning up at him—the kind of grin she saved for when the three of them were up to mischief, to no good, to adventure. Her teeth were still too big for her face, and her freckles really stood out on her nose and cheeks. She pulled on him excitedly, tugging him after Sam—apparently she couldn't wait to get to where they were headed. "Weird dream," Dean commented to himself, but he went along with it, letting Alex drag him to where Sam waited. Dean smiled a little to himself as he let himself relax into this memory and/or dream. His brother and sister seemed happy. And that was kind of nice.

Sam plopped the crate on the ground in the middle of an empty field. He pulled out a couple of fireworks—Alex was grabbing two herself. "Got your lighter?" Sam asked Dean, and Dean hesitated—he had that odd sense of déjà vu again. What the hell else was there to do though? He decided to go along with Sam's question and he checked his pockets. In the deep front pocket, a familiar shape he'd all but forgotten. He pulled out his old Zippo lighter. "Whoa, I haven't seen this in years—" he said, surprised, turning it over fondly in the palm of his hand. It was even more beautiful than he remembered. An iconic piece of his history he hadn't thought of in forever.
Alex swooped in and snatched it, leaving Dean to chuckle. "Whoa, little pyromaniac," he said even as Sam was grinning and holding out a fistful of fireworks toward his twin, telling her "fire 'em up!"

The twins looked so excited as they lit the fireworks—they were the kind you held while sparks shot out the top. Dean smiled softly, watched his siblings grin in unison, their eyes going wide in sheer zealous delight when the firework fuses caught fire. Sam and Alex ran over to Dean with the lit fireworks, Sam gave him one—they held them up high, at arms length, watching the fuses burn up, anticipating the moment when the fireworks would shoot off, when the magic would happen. All of their fireworks went off in almost-perfect unison, firing brilliant red streaks of light up into the sky, showering the dark expanse in flecks of sparks—the trees nearby glowed faint red and pink against the light—an ordinary landscape made surreal. Dean glanced down at his siblings—Sam and Alex's eyes reflected the light, their smiles were wide and carefree, and that didn't happen very often and Dean felt himself smiling, too, suddenly realizing why the scene felt so familiar to him. "Hey… I remember this!" he said, smile getting broader as he looked up into the fountain of fireworks again. "It's Fourth of July, nineteen ninety-six!"

The fireworks died out, leaving the night dark once more and Dean looked down at Sam, who was looking up at Dean so happily. "Dad would never let us do anything like this," Sam said. "Thanks, Dean. This is great." He hugged Dean tightly around the waist—and Dean was kind of startled at the sudden burst of affection but he hugged Sam back after a second. His heart was really full, and he hoped Sam wouldn't look at him, wouldn't see how affected he was. Alex didn't notice either of her brothers. She was busy lighting all of the rest of fireworks a few feet off, and Sam saw her momentarily, let out an excited whoop, pulled away from Dean—"fire in the hole!" he exclaimed in terrified delight, running to his twin and screaming in delight. He took her by the arm and pulled her away to a safe distance there with Dean. You could tell Alex would have been laughing loudly if she had the ability.

The fireworks begin to explode all at once and the night was no longer dark. There was a beautiful chorus of wild sparks and rainbow colors and zinging explosions against the dark velvet sky above their heads and Dean and Sam were suddenly laughing out loud and Alex—well—her head was throw back, mouth open in a huge silent laugh as her eyes crinkled up. Sam ran out and whirled around under the sparks while whooping, overjoyed at something as simple and carefree as this moment.

Alex hugged Dean around the waist, grinning toothily up at him, then she looked back up at the sky, her small head resting there against his chest trustingly. The fireworks continued to snap and pop, ribbons of light raining down over the three of them. Dean slowly put his arm around his sister, his hand squeezing her kid-sized shoulder—she was there and was safe with him, and he was comforted by knowing that. Sam caught Dean's eye from where sparks fell around him like confetti and he was smiling so big—the brothers nodded at each other after a second, and Dean's heart swelled too big for his chest. Because these two—this boy, this girl—they were and always would be his absolute world when all is said and done. This is everything. This is it. Seeing those smiles stretched across their faces, seeing unrestrained joy dance in their eyes, seeing them doing something normal and wild and childlike… it was everything he ever wanted for them, it was too much for him to take, he felt his eyes filling up. He suddenly remembered what he thought in this exact moment, Fourth of July, 1996, fourteen years ago: This is what happiness is.

There was an especially loud explosion, then another—and it was suddenly not a pleasant sound anymore, it had a different quality to it. Was that gunfire? And Dean was suddenly ripped from the good feelings and was brutally assaulted by a stark series of flashing memories: the motel room, Roy and Walt and their shotguns, Sam shot in the chest laying lifeless on the bed, Alex rushing into the room and Roy turning to shoot her, Dean frantically lunging for Roy, trying to save her, a huge punch of pain exploding in his own chest, then... nothing. Dean was startled at the barrage of recollections. Just as quick as it happened he was back in the field but it was pitch black now—Sam, Alex, the fireworks were gone and it was silent, still. It was also raining now lightly and felt colder than it did before—there was something distinctly ominous about it. The rain didn't get him wet—he couldn't feel it at all. Where there had been absolute joy and happiness a handful of seconds ago, there was horror, anxiety, and dread.

Dean was breathing a little harder, freaked out. "Sam?" He asked softly. He paused, hearing no reply. "Al?"

\textit{Nothing}. Dean saw that the Impala was still there, and he went back to it. He looked inside, then all around, trying to lay eyes on his siblings. This was a really weird, really vivid dream. It \textit{was} a dream, right? Just then inside the car, the radio came on, very scratchy and filled with static.

"Dean!" Said a low, familiar voice. Dean frowned, leaned into the driver's side window.

"...Cas?" he asked incredulously. The radio crackled again, and that time there was no mistaking whose voice that was, even though it sounded weird, like the voice was being filtered through a tin can.

"Yes, it's me," Cas replied, and he sounded distinctly urgent.

Dean got back into the car, sat in the driver's side seat. Suddenly this all seemed to make sense. "You gotta stop poking around in my dreams," he told the angel, then almost laughed, a little relieved that this \textit{was} a dream after all. "I need some me time, man."

"Listen to me very closely," Cas's voice said intensely. "This \textit{isn't} a dream that you're in."

Dean's smile faded and he got a little worried by the angel's tone. "Then... what is it?" Then he thought of those memories of the motel room, Sam covered in blood, Alex about to be shot... and his heart hitched slightly. He looked around the dark, nondescript landscape surrounding the Impala and it was with a sudden, huge amount of dread that he asked his next question. "Where... where exactly am I?"

"Heaven," Cas replied immediately, shortly, like he wanted to discuss something else.

Dean however was blinking in surprise. "You're joking!" he said, but then he quickly followed it up with, "you \textit{are} joking, right?"

"No Dean, I'm not joking," Cas's perturbed voice crackled through the radio.

"\textit{Heaven}?" Dean asked, looking around at his surroundings again, definitely \textit{not} getting pearly gates from what he was seeing. Plus, what the hell would \textit{he} be doing in Heaven? This had to be a mistake. He was stumped. "Okay, well if that's true... how did I get here? And wait, \textit{wait}—" he was frowning intensely, realizing something. "Does this mean I'm \textit{dead}?"

"Yes you are and please, just \textit{listen}," Cas said, impatiently, his voice hard and urgent. The radio static buzzed and then cracked. "This spell, this connection, it's difficult to maintain."

Dean thought about Sam, dead and full of buckshot and laying on the bed next to him in the motel room. His stomach seized up in fear because that could only mean one thing... "Where's Sam, Cas?"

"He's there in Heaven too, ahead of you on the—"
Another terrible thought occurred to Dean, and he was suddenly leaning forward, cutting the angel off completely. "Cas—Alex! Is she—? Did she—" he couldn't bring himself to ask the question, he only remembered his sister whipping around the corner out of the bathroom, being stupid and heroic and thoughtless and Roy whirling, his shotgun raised high... but there was a chance that maybe she shot him first, right? There was a chance that she got the jump on both those assholes and survived, she was a good shot, hung over or not, right?

There was a very long pause and for a second, Dean worried that the call or whatever had been cut off and he banged on the dash a couple times with his fist, thinking the radio was broken. "Cas, you there?"

"Yes, I'm here," Cas says, and he sounded less focused than he did before. The radio crackled, almost making Cas's next words sound shaky or wavering. "She's—she's dead too, Dean."

Dean sat back in his seat, aghast, not able to speak for a few seconds, too stunned at the idea to even comprehend it. "I-isn't she supposed to have some angel protection deal?" There was long pause, no reply at all and Dean was getting mad now because he realized Cas was purposefully not answering. "Cas!"

"I'm here, Dean," Cas replied in a low, even tone.

Dean pursed his lips in irritation, let out an irritated breath through his nose. "Okay, right, Alex is dead too, good job Cas—so where the hell is she? I see a whole lotta nothing and no one out here."

The radio crackled loudly. "I... I can't locate her," Cas said, and the way the angel sounded worried and uncertain set Dean at even greater unease. "She's drifting, Dean, I've—I've never seen anything like it."

"What the hell do you mean, she's drifting?" Dean asked, his stomach tightening in alarm.

"The souls and your bodies... they leave a connection here on earth to where they are in Heaven, and with this spell I can see where you are, where Sam is but—I can't pin her down and it's—I'm not—she's in Heaven, I think but..." he sounded really unsure now, almost like he was talking to himself. "She shouldn't be drifting, no one does that—"

"Well what the hell does it mean, Cas?" Dean demanded, getting more and more anxious and worked up by the second.

"I'm not sure, just..." Cas paused, then sounded really urgent again, hurried. "I'm running out of time, Dean. What do you see?"

"What do you mean 'what do I see'?" Dean asked, getting more agitated, more alarmed. He didn't like to be rushed. Thunder rumbled again, distantly.

"Some people see a tunnel or a river," Cas stated, then asked again: "What do you see?"

"N-nothing!" Dean said, freaked out, not seeing a tunnel, or a river—nothing besides his damn car and the road outside. "My dash," he told Cas. "I'm in my car. I'm on... I dunno, some road."

There was a second of silence, and Cas's voice was weaker, sounding farther away than before and distorted oddly. "Follow the road, Dean—you'll find Sam and—" the radio died out completely and Dean waited a second.

"I'll find Sam and what? Cas?" he fiddled with the radio controls but all that did was turn music back on. "Dammit." Dean muttered—it wasn't Cas he heard coming through the speakers anymore, it was Guns N' Roses.

Take me down to the paradise city where the grass is green and the girls are pretty... oh won't you please take me home?

The song felt foreboding to him somehow. Dean looked around again and didn't see much else to do but what Cas said. "Okay," he said to himself reluctantly, thinking about Sam and Alex and oh yeah the fact that they were both dead. He let out a shaky breath and nodded a little, wishing he had more to go on than what Cas told him, wishing he knew how the hell he was gonna get himself and his siblings out of this mess. "Follow the road..." he muttered, then shrugged to himself, shook his head. First step: find Sam and Alex. After that he'd figure the rest out. Dean cranked the Impala and started down the dark highway. The moon was huge, glowing strangely, and the sky was purple-toned, odd. The stars seemed unsteady, spinning in slow, concentric circles overhead.

Maybe it was all supposed to be beautiful, but to Dean, it felt threatening.

There was no way for him to know what was happening back on earth right now, but as he sped down Heaven's highway, Castiel was back on earth picking up Alex's body, laying her down so gently on the third bed in the room—moving her hair away from her face, looking down at her in turmoil, his hand lingering there at the side of her face. "Where are you?" he asked her softly, so puzzled and anxious. He looked at her a moment longer and sadness like never before pressed down over him like absolute gravity. "Where did you go?"

"Alex," he said, and she turned around and nearly had a stroke right then and there because it was her dad standing there!

Alex looked at him in stunned-to-stillness disbelief because she hadn't seen his face in four years but it was him and he was exactly how she remembered—tall, solidly built; he had a scruffy beard touched with the beginnings of gray. Same messy dark head of hair. Same tired eyes. She blinked a few times, shellshocked. "...Dad?"

He smiled kind of hesitantly at her with his mouth, but his eyes... they were really emotional, really full, not holding back like his lips were. She'd never seen him look at her like that before and she felt a deep suspicious fear immediately. "Hi baby," he said softly, like speaking was difficult for him, like he was fighting back tears. What the hell was this? Some kind of sick joke?

Alex looked at the phone in her hand—realized she was wearing that old green jacket of Sam's that used to be too big for her—what the hell, she lost this thing years ago, didn't she? She looked around into the gaping, swallowing darkness everywhere, then back at Dad, totally dazed and confused. She noticed now that he looked sort of wrong in his coloring, kind of pale or desaturated slightly. He was emanating an unnatural soft light, too—underneath his feet she could see pavement in a faint circle where light hit it. "Am I dreaming?" she asked, trying to think hard about where she was before this, but she couldn't remember a thing. "What is this?"

He didn't seem to hear her question, he was just looking at her with this slightly awed, taken aback expression. He took a minute to answer, clearly processing something. "Your... your voice," he said, sounding stunned. "It's... really beautiful." Alex felt slapped by the words and recoiled physically, wanting to slam the phone on the hook and flee the area—who was this impostor standing in front of her? "I heard you got your voice back, but—" he began, and she moved to leave because this couldn't be right and she couldn't do this—but he stepped forward then stopped short like he was held back by something invisible, like he couldn't come any closer. He held up a 'stop' hand, panicking suddenly. "Don't—don't hang up the phone! I can't call back."
"...Can't call back?" she asked, getting more and more freaked by the second. She pressed herself back up against the phone booth, keeping her distance and leveling him with suspicious, pained eyes. "You're dead!"

He went still, looked at her and grew completely solemn, like he was about to break bad news to her. "Yes. I am dead. So are you."

Alex made a face at that suggestion. "Uh... what?" She could have almost laughed at the suggestion. "No... I'm dreaming."

"You're not dreaming, baby." He looked incredibly sad. "You know how I know? I made a deal to be able to talk to you whenever you... whenever you died."

What? In front of her, Dad literally flickered, like a dying light, and Alex went slack jawed. Wait. Wait.

She suddenly saw the motel room and she was remembering the sound of Sam being shot, getting shot herself, praying to Cas—and literally as soon as the words were out of her mouth, his arrival. He'd brutally decimated her murderer and he'd come to her, dropped to his knees and held her and oh god, Cas, the look on his face, his hand against the shotgun wound, the helplessness and terror written onto the features of his face. And she'd struggled to tell him because she'd felt her life fading out completely, she'd known she was dying—she had been trying to tell him because he should know, even if he couldn't feel the same way, that someone, somewhere loved him, and that someone was her—but then she had faded out, she'd slipped away. She'd died. Alex looked at Dad, eyes wide—he was waiting for her to reply and she clenched her jaw, shook her head 'no,' upset and reeling, trembling suddenly, close to tears and feeling physically ill. "All right, look, I don't know who you are or what you want—but I'm outta here."

"Alex—please—don't—" Dad begged, and the way he said it froze her on the spot. "It's me," he said earnestly, urgently. "I can prove it."

She didn't like this at all, but for some crazy reason, she decided not to walk away... not yet. But every muscle was prepared to bolt if he came any closer. She fixed him with a terse expression and she steeled herself. "Prove it how?"

Dad looked uncharacteristically uncomfortable, almost like the John Winchester she'd met in 1978—a little unsure, a little nervous. It was so strange and disconcerting. "It was uh, nineteen ninety-two..." he started, frowning in thought, thinking hard. "You'd just turned nine and I'd... forgotten your and Sam's birthday." He paused. "Again." Alex was stunned at his use of the word 'again' and how he said it, because Dad never admitted or acknowledged his mistakes or shortcomings at all, at least not to her. But maybe she always wished he had and hearing him admit that, even in a roundabout way, set her chest clenching and pulse pounding wildly. "We went to that state fair, remember?" he asked, his dark eyes searching hers for a sign of recognition. Alex did remember but she didn't confirm or deny, just stayed stony and silent, deeply upset but refusing to show it. "And I was on my phone pretty much the whole time, I kind of let you kids do your own thing..." he sounded unhappy, but continued. "Sam and Dean went on some ride that you weren't tall enough for... you were always kinda small for your age..."

Alex remembered the night he was talking about as he spoke, remembered watching those two tall brothers of hers going onto the Tilt-A-Whirl. She'd been one inch too short to ride and Dad had been on his phone, not really present—talking to some hunter friend about some job. She'd watched Sam and Dean jealously for a second, then she'd spied the bottle toss and realized that she had a moment alone with Dad. She'd gotten the idea that maybe she could impress him and had suddenly been desperate to do just that.
Dad was continuing. "So you and me, we went to the bottle toss—well, you kind of dragged me. I wasn't really paying attention, remember?" He looked at her appealingly. "But then you got your turn and..." he his eyes fell low, remembering. There was a soft little smile. A proud little smile. "The guy manning the booth said he'd never seen a kid destroy the shelf like that—you hit every single bottle, went down the line like you were a damn soldier at a shooting range and... I watched that, I saw it and... you looked up at me when you finished and I told you good job and I was proud of you, remember?" He looked like he felt bittersweet. "I don't know if I've ever seen you so happy. Just cuz I told you I was proud." Alex was failing to hold herself together, her mouth wouldn't hold still, her throat seized up in pain, her eyes stung. And Dad's smile was cracking, falling, into something more like shame. "It was one of the only times I told you that," he said.

She swallowed painfully, and her eyes glittered with tears when she looked to the side, avoiding his gaze. "It's the only time I remember," she said, feeling wounded all over again. She'd always remembered that fondly... tagging along after her two brothers, riding ride after ride after ride, getting sticky fingers from cotton candy. It had been one of those days where she'd felt real, like a kid or a person, not just a shadow. Mostly it was because she'd had that moment with Dad when he had looked down at her and she'd felt like he saw her, really saw her. His mouth had curved to the side in a smile, all for her.

"Wow kiddo, look at you—I'm impressed!" he'd said, and those words might as well have been fairy dust like in Peter Pan—she'd felt like she could fly into the next galaxy, and then, and then... he'd ruffled her hair and put his hand on her shoulder, he'd looked at her fondly, the usual wall that was between them hadn't been there. "That was a damn good job. I'm proud of you, Alex." Her little heart had wanted to burst in happiness when he told her that, and she knew he didn't like hugs but she'd hugged him anyway tight around the waist, her eyes closed, grinning widely. He'd hesitated, then put his arms around her awkwardly. And that was Alex Winchester's best memory of her dad. And now, to her, it seemed pathetic that she would cling to it all these years... but she had.

She tried to get a hold over herself and leveled him with a mistrustful glare because him knowing that memory didn't mean much, and she wasn't born yesterday, and she still didn't really believe that was Dad. "Any half-cocked demon could know that about him, about me," she said frigidly. "It doesn't prove anything." She thought a second, then got an idea. She narrowed her eyes at him calculatingly, wondering if he'd pass the test. "What date did Mom die?"

Dad answered immediately, not even having to think about it. "November second, nineteen eighty-three." That wasn't the real question, that wasn't the real test—this next question was. Alex raised her chin just a fraction, challengingly. "And what date was Dean born?"

Dad's certainty flickered. He didn't look so sure. "Uh... January. Fourth."

Alex smiled cynically. He didn't look so sure. "Uh... January. Fourth."

"Never was good with dates," he said lamely, and he looked stricken, completely guilty. Then a little cynical as he smiled wanly. "It really is me." He didn't sound like he was begging her to believe him anymore. Now he sounded like he was disappointed in himself, but he shook it off, turned his attention back to her.

"I was trying to process all of this. She was dead, talking to Dad, and she just didn't know what to think or feel, and she just really wished Cas or Dean or Sam were here because she was scared as hell and the darkness felt like it was drowning her. Dad was looking at her thoroughly, concerned.
Not angry, not disappointed, not annoyed, not bitter. And it was all she had ever hoped for but it felt wrong and unfamiliar and she couldn't take it. She pushed her feelings about him down. "Where—where are you, Dad?" she asked, trying to regain control over the moment, trying to put together the pieces of this puzzle, figure out what's going on. "Where are you... calling... me from?" He flickered again.

"I'm okay," he said in that firm, don't-ask-me-more way he had. His smile was back and tinged with sadness. "That's all you need to know."

Alex wanted a straight answer but let it go—that was Dad after all, and she knew when to back off—she glanced around herself, into the pitch black expanse around them. She felt small, lost, bordering on hopeless and she was scared. She tried not to sound that way. "Okay... where am I?"

John shook his head slowly, glanced around, seeming to see things, his dark eyes darting back and forth. "I'm not sure. All I see is a run down parking lot."

"What?" Alex asked, and she looked around again—but she couldn't see anything except the phone booth and her dad—she could barely even see her own feet, they were almost lost in the darkness. Confused, Alex looked at her dad and she was getting more and more alarmed at the weird situation. If she was dead... this couldn't be Heaven, could it? Cas told her that souls generated their own heavens, and this was definitely not heavenly to her. Which only left one other option, didn't it? Funny, she always thought Hell would be a lot hotter and oranger. Like in the movies. Like the inside of a volcano times a thousand. But this darkness actually did seem worse than any fiery inferno could ever be—it seemed to seep into her soul itself. She was quiet now, looking at Dad falteringly. "Am I... am I in Hell?"

"No, no, I don't think so." Dad said, shaking her head and looking at her with his eyebrows knit together—Alex looked at him suspiciously now... because he had only looked at her like that—worried to his core—a couple times in her life, one of them when she accidentally got shot when they'd been hunting. Even though she was pretty sure that was Dad in front of her, seeing him like that was so unfamiliar and upsetting. She wished for Dean so badly right then, because he would know what to do—he always did.

Dad took in a long, slow breath, hesitating and she waited, entire body tense—she wasn't sure why, but she dreaded what he was going to say because of that indescribable look on his face. So when he finally said, "Alex... I'm so sorry," and the words were so heavy with a heartbroken earnestness. In response, she felt even more afraid. Cautious, she looked at him while filled with hope and dread all at the same time. "For—for what?"

"Everything," he said, and his eyes faltered, he looked down, seeming pained. Alex couldn't believe her ears. "For ignoring you. For hurting you." His jaw was tight, working oddly. "I failed you completely and I know that now. I, I knew it then, too." He shook his head morosely, looked off to the side, emotional. He sounded so, so tired. "I should have asked you how school was going and helped you with homework and spent time with you that wasn't... I don't know, gun drills. I should have been involved in your life. In all you kid's lives."

Alex felt like everything he just said was true and what she'd always wanted to hear but at the same time it was too little and hit her like an insult, like too small of an apology for too big a wound. It made her cynical and angry. "Sounds nice, but isn't it a little too late for all that?" she asked bitterly.
Dad's expression wavered. "It is. I know that." His dark eyes held a faint hope, a deep pain. "But I hope... someday... you can forgive me."

"Forgive you?" she repeated, and shook her head, looking away, struggling to control all this sudden anger. How dare he. Every time he overlooked her, shoved her, made her feel small and stupid rang through her memories and she let the phone go and it swung down, clanging against the post of the phone booth loudly as her pointer finger jabbed at him with accusation. "You would walk into the room and, and most little kids see their dad and get excited and happy, but you would come in and there I was on red alert every time, making sure I didn't mess up and make you mad, trying to figure out if Dad was trashed or not, if I needed to avoid you that day, if you were in a shitty mood or not...!" Alex glared at him and felt none of the mind-numbing fear that she used to as a kid. Instead she only felt disgust and anger and sadness underneath it all. "You know, I lived in fear of you for so many years. It shouldn't have been like that."

He looked utterly ashamed but Alex wasn't done, in fact, she was beginning to feel adrenaline surge as she stood up to her father for what was really the first time in her life. "You think you should have helped me with homework? How about making sure I could survive in the real world? How about making sure your kids had options other than the hellhole life you picked for yourself? Do you even know what Dean has been through since you've been gone? What Sam's had to deal with?"

"I wish I could take it back," he said and she scoffed at his hypocrisy.

"'Wishing never got anyone anything,'" she said, and she knew he'd recognize that phrase. Dad looked up at her sadly. She was quoting himself back to him and he realized it. He still didn't get angry though. He just looked devastated and Alex softened a little. Just a little. "You spent my whole life chasing after ghosts. After someone who was gone. But us? We were there. We needed you."

"I know," he said faintly. "I know."

"No you don't know!" Alex almost shouted, blinking rapidly through tear-filled eyes. She felt herself shaking—these are things she had imagined saying to her dad for years. "If you knew, you would have changed it! You wouldn't have done what you did! You—you were a terrible father!" Alex said, and her voice was breaking with tears, her voice was raising a little in desperation. "So why the hell do I still love you?" she asked in a wretched voice, "When you hated me so much?"

He looked horrified. "I didn't hate you—Alex no, I hated myself," John said brokenly, and now he had the audacity to look tearful and he tried to move forward to her, but he couldn't seem to, and he shut his eyes regretfully, his head bowing down.

Alex looked at her dad. Those words she'd just said should have felt good, should have made her feel retribution and victory, but instead she felt even worse than before. She tried to cover it up with cynicism. "Guess this isn't what you had in mind when you arranged for that last phone call to good old Alex, huh?" she asked, a bitter smile on her lips. Her smile faltered, she looked at him sadly. "What'd it cost you, anyway?"

"It's not important," John replied, and he sounded resigned, sad, heavy. He sniffed gruffly, cleared his throat. "Your brothers taking good care of you? Keeping you safe?"

"I'm dead," Alex said somewhat spitefully, avoiding looking at him so she doesn't have to feel guilty about how sad he looked. "So... you figure that one out."

He didn't give up. He sounded gentle, appealing. "You, you got a boyfriend back home? A husband?"

Alex's mouth dropped open slightly and she stared at him in flustered surprise, because the second he asked that, she was picturing Cas, suddenly wondering where he was, if she would see him again, if he was all right. Missing him intensely, wishing he were there with her. Dad saw her expression, nodded slightly, and took it as a yes.

"He better be one hell of a guy," he said softly.

Alex opened her mouth to deny it, to tell him she had no boyfriend, husband, partner, lover, whatever—but instead, she paused, kind of surprised herself when she nodded and said softly, "Yeah. He is."

Dad looked somewhere between happy and sad to hear this, like he couldn't believe she was old enough for him to ask her about these things. "He treats you right?" Dad asked falteringly. "Looks out for you?"

Alex thought of Castiel, the angel who watched humanity from afar for thousands of years, who restored her voice, who showed up and awakened something in her that she hadn't even known existed. She thought about the sound of his voice, the sight of his face, the feel of his touch, the things he'd done for her, what she knew he would do for her: anything. She thought of his gentle, kind, awkward nature that was so endearing, his surprising innocence and naivety, and then the starkly contrasting fierceness and warrior-like prowess that rested beneath that uncertain, out-of-place exterior.

Dad's question hung in the air. "Yeah," she said, thinking hard, staring into middle distance. "Yeah. He treats me right. He looks out for me. He..." she trailed off in surprise. The words she wanted to say: I love him. She was overwhelmed and near tears again, but for a different reason because she thought of the way their relationship had become something neither of them could walk away from, she thought about all he had done for her, about the way he looked at her, the way he kissed her. And in her mind the following things flashed before her: Cas entrusting his angel blade to her and leaving himself defenseless—giving her the memory of the panic room back when he could have left her never remembering it at all—how fiercely protective he was of her, even more than either of her brothers—all of it added up to one thing, and she couldn't disbelieve it anymore. She wouldn't. He loved her too. He had to.

Dad looked slightly puzzled at her long silence and Alex erased her expression. "It's... complicated," she told him, then managed to chuckle just barely as she looked down. "Really complicated." That wasn't even half of it. She grew somber. "And if I can't get undead... well... I guess it won't matter anyway."

Dad seemed to take her point. "How did you die, Alex?"

"Shot," she said wanly, not proud of it. "By Walt Fletcher. Friggin' idiot." Her mouth twisted in displeasure and even humiliation. He was a clown and he'd gotten one over on her—majorly. "Stupid way to die," she muttered, then grew more reflective and serious. "I always thought I'd die saving someone's life. Not... in a fucking motel room." She swallowed painfully, thinking how it was ironic—she watched Dad die, Sam die, Dean die. All of their deaths had obliterated her heart. But Dad... he'd left on purpose and without saying goodbye to her. That, and he'd stayed dead unlike her brothers.

When she had found out months after his passing that he'd known he was going to die, she'd been devastated. She still was. She wished it didn't hurt her so much, and she wanted to lash out, to insult him or cut him verbally, but when she opened her mouth, her voice cracked, caught, and she was suddenly crying again, face crumpled, and she wasn't insulting him, she was appealing to him despairingly. "Dad I wish you'd said goodbye to me," she managed. "B-before you died."

He was clearly heartbroken. "We get to say goodbye now, baby." Even he knew that wasn't enough, it was clear from his voice.

"But why didn't you then?" she asked in anguish.

There were tears in his eyes now too and his mouth was pressed into a line. He shook his head blankly, looking like he wasn't too sure of the answer. "I felt like there was nothing I could have said… that anything I could have said would have just made it worse."

Alex's eyes were blurred with tears. She was mourning the relationship she never had with her father, because she could see now, briefly, what it might look like. What he might have been like, what she might have been like, if things were different. But things weren't different—the reality was that all that remained between them was wreckage. He looked at her regretfully. "I didn't know it would mean that much to you," he said. It was Alex's turn to shut her eyes in morose pain. Dad continued. "I thought it would be better for you if I just walked out… didn't try and fix something I couldn't fix." Alex's heart sank in absolute grief.

There was a pause, and when Dad spoke again, it was reminiscent, tempered with a deep fondness. "I… I remember the day you and Sammy were born…" he said softly. Alex opened her eyes, barely able to. He'd never talked about this before. "I held you for the first time, you were so tiny… and you looked right up at me. I know babies can't see at that age but—I swear—you looked right at me and… I felt like I never loved anyone as much as I loved you right then." His voice cracked, his smile was struggling through guilt and misery. "I just wish I could have held onto that, instead of letting your mom's death consume me like it did." He went silent, looked off into long distance. "Things would have been very different. For all of us." He looked back at her, miserable but resolute, his shining eyes capturing her gaze completely. "I know I've always had a hell of a way of showing it but… Alex, I love you. I do."

Alex's face crumpled, her heart and head were overwhelmed completely by what he just told her. "Dad," she sobbed out, and there were tears running down her cheeks, she wished he really were there with her, that he wasn't just a flickering representation of himself. She wasn't sure when she had wrapped her arms around herself, but there she was—standing there crying in front of her dad who looked so close but wasn't there at all.

He seemed to hear something beside him and suddenly seemed rushed, sidetracked. "I don't have much time left… Sam—is he... how is he?"

Alex was mystified, but heard the urgency in his voice. "Well, he's dead," Alex said, wiping her cheeks, swallowing her tears, trying to get herself together. "But—but before that, he was fine I guess."

Her dad looked at her significantly. "You and I both know that's not the truth."

Alex frowned just slightly. "You mean the demon blood?"

Dad shook his head. "There's more wrong with Sam than that, Alex."

She paused, her stomach twisting. "What, Sam being Lucifer's vessel? We already know about that."

He shook his head, growing more and more hurried. "No—that's part of it, but—" he looked up suddenly and fear flashed across his face. "They found me—"

"Who?" she asked apprehensively, looking up where he was looking but not seeing anything. "Who found you?"

He looked back at her and some invisible, violent wind was rustling his hair and clothes. His voice grew urgent, he was shouting now, and Alex was afraid. "Tell Dean it's not over, the danger isn't gone, that Lucifer planned to use you and Sam t—"

Suddenly his image flickered out completely, leaving a huge black nothing in front of Alex. She didn't even have a chance to register that—the phone booth faded out too, and she was suddenly in total, complete darkness, left with the sound of her own panicking heartbeat, her own heavy breathing. She stumbled backward, fell over onto her back—the phone booth had been there, but now there was nothing at all.

And then there was a blinding flash of light from somewhere up above and Alex's eyes were unable to take it—she threw an arm over her eyes, the harsh light faded somewhat and she winced and squinted over to her side, propping herself up onto an elbow. Her eyes were completely overwhelmed. It was all too bright and blurry and out of focus like there was a film over her eyes—she could now make out an overcast and unnaturally green sky above an abandoned shopping center parking lot. There were a few dinged up old shopping carts scattering the cracked old pavement—she saw the Impala parked over at the edge of the concrete ocean, heard Fortunate Son playing faintly on the car speakers—there was a striking familiarity to all of this and wait, was this…? That time she Dean and Sam had ditched school and raced shopping carts around for hours when they were supposed to be on some dumbass field trip? But where were Dean and Sam? She felt like they should be there. And they weren't.

At that moment the parking lot kind of spun and wobbled dizzyingly, then she realized it looked fake on closer examination, like an unfinished painting. In fact, parts of the scene seemed to drift off into the air now—parts of the parking lot peeled up like old paint curling up in summer heat, one of the shopping carts drifted apart completely and turned to dust, the Impala was melting into the ground, turning into a strange black puddle, and the music slowed down, skipped, became low and unrecognizable, messed up and sinister—the pavement wasn't pavement anymore, it was some unrecognizable flat gray material—and it was still all blurry and hazy and hard to see and if she wasn't freaking out before, Alex definitely was now.

Alex heard the sound of clicking footfalls approaching and looked up, disoriented and confused, somewhat expecting to see her dad, but it wasn't John Winchester. Unlike everything else, she could see the newcomer perfectly as if in HD, and her eyes went wide. "Well, hello young lady!" Zachariah said, smiling down at her with creepy cheerfulness. "Fancy meeting you here!"

Panic rushed her and she shot to her feet in record time, turning to run the opposite direction, only to bump right into him—he moved through space, anticipating her move—he held her hard by both arms, his grip painful and vice-like. He was still smiling pleasantly. "Now, where the hell are those pain-in-the-ass brothers of yours?"

Castiel sat there in the utter silence next to her dead body. Her blood was on his trench coat. He'd faced himself away, sitting on the edge of the bed where he'd put her. Now he stared at the wall across from himself. He knew that if he looked away from the wall, he'd see her out of the corner of his eye, and at the sight of her the helpless panic and horror would return, the fear would take him over. So he stared and waited, every muscle tensed to the point of painfulness. He'd done what he could—he'd taken the bodies of the murderers away and left them somewhere in the middle of the smoky mountain wilderness. They would probably never be found, not by people anyway. The animals and the elements would take them first, destroying what remained.

It had been an hour since it all happened—since he'd come here and seen her die in front of his eyes. He still couldn't really understand that she was really dead and gone. It felt unreal, too horrible to be the truth. He sat in the silence, wrestling with not knowing what had happened to her soul or where she was. Castiel had laid her down onto the third, empty bed after he'd realized God wasn't going to answer him. He'd looked around the room, seen his dead friends covered in their own blood, and subsequently felt overwhelmed by guilt. He could have prevented all of it. He felt like all the gravity in the universe was all in one place there above him, crushing him down completely as he stood back and stared at Alex's slight frame alone there, crumpled against the blood-spattered wall—he couldn't leave her there. It hadn't been right. So he'd picked her body up and the moment he'd done so, he'd seen himself in 2014 doing the same—but the difference was, what Anna had shown him had been all visual. When he'd picked her up today, he'd felt the complete lifelessness of her dead weight there in his arms and it had devastated him all over again. Now, he could barely look at her, because with each passing moment, he felt the absence of her more and more deeply. With each second that ticked by, Alex felt further and further away, more and more impossible to reach.

The spell he'd worked, he'd done it five times already, trying it again and again because he didn't understand—he could feel Dean and Sam's souls because of the ritual, he could tell where they were and could communicate with them through the veil passably; their souls were steady and slow, bright lights in the darkness, but hers—hers was like a distant dying light that his eye could never catch, and it alarmed him—he had never seen any soul do that. He couldn't pinpoint her, he couldn't reach her at all. Why was she drifting? Why was she lost? And most importantly, could she be brought back at all?

Castiel knew that Sam and Dean were important to Heaven, that when angels found them, they would be sent back to their bodies without hesitation or question—but Alex—his chest twisted up in pain.

He never told her this, perhaps because of pride. But when Heaven cast him out, he had been cut off from things other than his angelic abilities. He was no longer Alex's Heaven-elect guardian. However—no other new guardian had appeared. Castiel would have known if another angel watched over her... and there had been none. Perhaps that was his fault as well, because he'd put the angel wards on her ribs—perhaps she received no guardian because Heaven couldn't find her. For some time he'd had the audacity to believe that his father was still entrusting him to protect Alex even though the order of angels had turned him away. Now he faced the reality of the fact: either Heaven was purposefully ignoring the order to protect her... or the order had been abolished completely. He didn't know which it was, only that he had been here, walking the same earth as her—and he had failed to keep her alive. And now she didn't matter to Heaven and if Castiel couldn't reach her and bring her back, who could? Beside him, within arms reach, she laid growing stiff and cold. He knew that with every passing minute, the chance that Sam and Dean would be found increased. He shut his eyes now, listening to himself breathing. How alone he felt—how completely and utterly alone.

He wanted desperately to return to Heaven, to find her himself, and to bring her back—but he was literally locked out with no way in. He could hear the celestial whispers, he could see into Heaven with various rituals and spells, but he couldn't actually go there and it was maddening. How strange, how lonely, to be a being who walked the earth between the realms, not quite human enough to be a man, not quite Heavenly enough to be an angel. He belonged to nothing and to no one but this family of broken people. To nothing and no one but her. He looked at her now and his stomach clenched, his body trembled. How could she be so close and at the same time so impossible to reach? He smoothed her hair again, searching her face while sickened inside, lost.
The television made a strange garbled sound, startling him in the piercing silence. "Cas!" came a familiar voice.

Castiel rose and went to the set quickly, sudden hope surging in him. "I can hear you," Cas said, and peered hard into the television. He could faintly see Dean and then Sam too in a distorted, static-filled picture and he looked harder, hoping to see Alex too, but he saw no one else, only an empty living room and the two Winchester boys.

Dean seemed agitated, his face filling the screen as he leaned close. "Cas! I found Sam but, but I can't find Alex—you gotta tell me where she is, man!"

Castiel felt himself tense in anxiety, and the sick feeling increased, the hopefulness dissipated when he realized she wasn't there, that they hadn't found her. His emotions translated themselves into anger, and he scowled at the screen, powerless and wishing Dean understood that. "I can't tell you where she is, Dean—I can't see her like I can see you—"

"Well find her!" Dean cut him off urgently, and in the background, Sam looked troubled.

"I'm trying," Cas told them, attempting to hold back on his anger and frustration. He didn't want them to know how worried he was, because if they panicked, they might not be able to find her in time.

Sam came a little closer, leaned down, his face closer to the screen. Several bars of static ran down across the image. "Hey Cas, there was this weird beam of light just now and—"

"Stay away from it," Cas told him immediately, urgently, leaning closer to the screen, speaking fast, because he wasn't sure how long this connection would remain. "That was Zachariah. He's searching for you—you can't say yes to Michael and Lucifer if you're dead, so Zachariah needs to return you to your bodies."

Sam frowned, glanced at Dean, puzzled. "What's so bad about that?"

Castiel's jaw clenched tightly at Sam's thoughtless question, and he wasn't able to remain as calm as he'd meant to. He spoke louder than he meant to, harsher too. "What's so bad if Zachariah finds you before you locate your sister—" he looked away from the screen, mouth in a hard line as he paused, "is that she stays dead."

Shock filtered across the brothers' faces. "Explain." Dean commanded with a deadly glare.

Cas didn't want to—he considered lying, but realized it was too late, that he'd let it all slip out already, and perhaps the truth would motivate them better than anything else, anyway. Still, speaking it out loud was difficult for him. It meant he had to confront it. "There's... there's no reason for Zachariah to send Alex back. None."

"What? Why?" Dean asked, looking stunned completely, all of his anger washed away momentarily, and in its place, fear.

Castiel couldn't look at the screen when he explained. "She's not important to Heaven, Dean—she's not a vessel or a—"

"But you said she had a guardian angel thing!" Sam protested, and Cas looked up at the screen again to see Alex's twin looking so disillusioned and let down that Castiel had to look away again, stricken with a guilt he could not even begin to fathom.

He explained in a dazed kind of tone. "Yes, I thought so—but Heaven assigned no new protector, I would have known... I don't know why, but either Heaven is ignoring the guardianship order or... or it no longer stands at all." Sam and Dean looked entirely shocked, as if their worst fears had been realized. Castiel's gaze faltered once again. "And as we all know... I... I failed to keep her safe."

"Yeah no shit, Cas," Dean snapped, and he yanked himself back from the screen, scrubbed his face with the palm of his hand as if he were trying to gather himself. He walked completely out of frame and then there was a loud crashing sound, like Dean had thrown something. Sam glanced at his brother in awkward embarrassment.

Cas struggled to remain calm himself and addressed Sam, who so far was keeping his wits about him. "In fact, Sam—if Zachariah finds you, finds Alex, he may use her as leverage. To motivate Dean into saying yes to Michael."

Offscreen, he heard Dean curse loudly. Sam shut his eyes for a brief second, a muscle jerking in his cheek and he pinched the bridge of his nose, then seemed to make a visible effort to remain calm, focused, looking back at the screen tersely. "Okay Cas, just—how do we get her back to the land of the living?" His question was a good one, but Cas was silent, wordless. He didn't know.

Wait. Castiel grew urgent, realizing he had an idea, and this was probably the very best chance they had. "You need to find an angel. His name is Joshua."

"Who the hell is Joshua?" Dean asked, his angry face once again taking up half the screen.

"He can help us, I think," Castiel told him urgently. The screen jerked, fizzled. "The rumor is he talks to God."

"And what does that have to do with anything?" Dean demanded, his tone accusing as if Cas was foolish to suggest they do such a thing.

Castiel grew even more frustrated, barely able to contain his helpless anger—this was their only option, their only chance, and Dean wanted to question him about it, as usual, wanted to do things his way, wanted to waste precious time arguing when they needed to be trying to get Alex out of Heaven while they could, save her while they could! Cas glared at the man's image on the screen and spoke brusquely, not bothering to conceal his anger. "You think maybe—just maybe—we should find out what the hell God has been saying? That maybe someone who talks to God might know more than we do? Maybe an angel that close to God could help us?"

Dean looked inconvenienced, or maybe put-out. "Geez. Touchy."

Taking a deep breath, Cas searched for resolve and patience, but found very little. "Please," he said tensely. "I just need you to follow the road, to find your sister, and then take her and yourselves to Joshua. Quickly."

"But how do we find her, Cas?" Sam asked intently. "Can't you come help us?"

"I would already be there if I could be," Castiel told him, feeling defeated. "I'm unable to return... they've cast me out." Castiel glanced to his side, where Alex's body was, and with growing urgency, he looked back at Sam. "Just keep looking, and hurry. She's there, somewhere in Heaven." He again felt her soul flickering, half there. Castiel truthfully couldn't be certain she was there in Heaven at all. And he told them as such ruefully. "I think."

"...You think?" Dean repeated, his voice rising rapidly. "Heaven seems kinda big, Cas! How the fuck are we supposed to find her with Zach on our asses and all of Heaven looking for us?!!"
"Dean," Sam said, and his brother let out a heavy, deeply frustrated breath through his nose, glanced at Sam, then back at the screen, waiting for Cas to reply.

Castiel could see how alarmed Dean was, and identified with him—looked at him intensely. "Follow the road. I think she's near it, somewhere."

"What road?" Sam asked, leaning in closer. Another burst of static distorted the picture for a couple seconds.

"The Axis Mundi," Cas said, speaking swiftly. "It's a path that runs through Heaven—different people see it as different things. For you, it's two lane asphalt. The road will lead you to the Garden, which is where you'll find Joshua. And Joshua—he can take us to God or tell us where to find him, he can send Alex back." The television began to fade out, Cas felt the connection weakening, breaking. Becoming urgent with alarm, Cas gripped it tightly on either side. "Hurry, Dean!"

The television set died out completely.

Cas drew back just slightly to look at the silent TV, the sudden absence of any sound shocking to his senses. Would Sam and Dean be able to find her? Would Joshua be able to help at all? Were the rumors that he spoke to God even true? What if Zachariah found the brothers before they found Alex? Castiel stood up, his heart hammering unpleasantly, his limbs feeling light and unsteady. He felt such a strong need to be be there, in Heaven, tearing it apart to find her and rescue her, bring her back to where she belonged. But he was cursed to stay here, doing nothing, completely ineffective.

He looked at Alex and his feelings of helplessness bubbled up into sheer, unadulterated anger, into panicked and blind rage. He could have prevented this. He shouldn't have left her, even for a second. He'd been so selfish to avoid her because of his feelings, his inability to manage them. And now look what had happened—he'd been so intent on changing the future he'd seen in 2014 that he had left her unguarded and she'd died anyway, and sooner.

This was his fault!

Momentarily out of control, he turned and angrily grabbed the wooden chair sitting right there and sent it flying into the partition beside Sam's bed. The chair and partition were both destroyed and Cas stared at the damage done, breathing heavily for no reason, remembering when he'd seen himself wreck the cabin in 2014. The cabin he and Alex had shared. He'd seen that version of himself do that and hadn't recognized himself, but now—now he was stilled, knowing why that version of Castiel had done that. Understanding completely, and wondering how the horrors of that future could even happen if she stayed dead now. What was this? Some curse that hounded Castiel and Alex? That any version of the future would end with Alex dying while he either caused it or stood by and let it happen? He looked down at himself and saw her bloodstains on his trench coat. His throat seized up.

And at that very moment, he thought he could hear her, feel her, like she was calling to him. He looked around, alarmed—but then there was nothing. Had he imagined it? He waited, stock still, listening hard and frozen. But there was still nothing. His mind was overcome with despair. And too lost, too confused, too lonely to bear any of it, Castiel sank again down to sit beside Alex. There he buried his face in his hands, feeling to much for anyone to bear.

Cas? Are you there? Where are you? I need you...
Alex was in the darkness again. Complete, utter darkness—right where Zachariah had left her hours ago. Or at least it felt like hours. She was on the ground, not sure if she was dead or alive. She could feel what felt like dew-wet grass underneath her hands, brushing up against her clothes. It was soaking her knees. But that was about the only sensation she could cling onto. The darkness swallowed her. There was so much nothing in this place, and she felt like she couldn't breathe, like if she wasn't careful, her mind would slip out, float away, leave her blank and empty and hollow. Was her body still even in existence? Only her wet knees and shaky breath rattling inside of her convinced her that she was. She wondered why Cas hadn't come for her. Maybe he couldn't. Hopelessness, loneliness, and despair overcame her again, wave after wave crashing over her, each one beating her down more and more.

After Zachariah caught her, he'd demanded to know where Sam and Dean were—she'd insisted she didn't know (and then told him to kiss her ass, she wouldn't tell him where they were even if she did know). Zachariah had looked at her in thorough annoyance then told her it didn't matter if she wouldn't tell him, he was going to find them, it was just a matter of time. He dragged her along with him through a couple of heavens—the first one was Sam's: she watched Sam get his acceptance letter to Stanford and punch the air in excitement, grin at the letter, re-read it a bunch of times, do a dorky little dance. Then Zachariah had pulled her out of there into another heaven, one of Dean's: where a twelve-year-old Dean had attempted to bake the twins a birthday cake at Bobby's and it had been half burnt and lopsided—a somewhat pitiful little cake with melting icing and a barely legible "Happy Birthday Twins" on it—Dean had run out of room to write with the icing and the word Birthday was split into two lines, the word twins started off huge, but the 's' on the end was small, going off the edge of the cake completely. Zachariah had taken her out of there before she could see Dean present his little creation to herself and Sam. She remembered loving that clumsy, heartfelt cake.

He'd spirited her to another heaven, still holding onto her with his iron grip—he'd taken her to a memory she had from her twenty-first birthday—and Alex had realized this must be one of her heavens, because she remembered it well and it was one of her favorite memories. Dean had insisted on taking her to a bar because she was finally the age to drink legally, but she hadn't wanted to go—it's not like they had ever honored that law about drinking, anyway. She'd been drinking since she was thirteen or fourteen—that and with Sam not there, away at Stanford and not even having called them that day… birthdays were painful, a reminder of what was missing, what was broken. And Dad, of course, was nowhere to be found, off on some job. So Dean had gone and bought a bunch of liquor then driven the two of them to a park in the middle of the night and cranked up the music really loud.

This was the heaven Zachariah took her to, and it was strange because she couldn't actually see herself in the memory, only Dean—coaxing an invisible her out of the Impala, insisting she get drunk with him, telling her 'just because your big sister Samantha is all kinds of douche doesn't mean you should pout around,' and he then dragged the invisible her out onto the grass when 38 Special came on… I'm so caught up in you! Little girl! Dean lip-synced along ridiculously, whirling an invisible dancing partner around as he made dramatic faces and danced embarrassingly bad on purpose, pivoting his hips around like a girl would, pursing his lips in goofy concentration. And I never did suspect a thing! So caught up in you, little girl, that I never wanna get myself free! Dean stood back and did air-guitar solos, clearly aware of how stupid and funny he was being, looking pleased with himself, then grinning at the space in front of him widely, genuinely. That space was where she'd been standing and laughing at him. Off to the side and watching the scene play out, Alex remembered how happy she had felt at that moment, because she'd very aware of how lucky she was to have someone like Dean who cared, who loved her like that. Who went out of his way to pull her out of the dumps. Who had stayed with her when everyone else had gone away. Dean then hugged the air in front of him and Alex looked at Zachariah accusingly. That was a private moment and him seeing it hadn't felt right.

Zachariah had stood back, looking at the scene with condescension, like it left a bad taste in his mouth. "Don't look at me in that tone of voice," he'd told her sassily. She looked at the angel who had given her throat cancer, had taken Sam's lungs, had given Dean stomach cancer. She would have given anything to have access to a murder weapon at that second.

"You're not funny, asshole," she'd told him flatly, and he had looked at her squarely, narrowing his eyes in distaste, looking like someone who was ready to give a lecture.

"You know, that mentally incapacitated idiot in the trench coat should never have given you your voice back." Alex looked at Zachariah in shock at the unexpected insult. He shrugged, facetious and wincing sympathetically. "You're very unappealing to begin with, add in the bad attitude and all the stupid comments… not doing it for me, Alex." He chuckled. She opened her mouth to speak... and nothing came out. Zachariah grinned at her. "Lucky for me, I'm like a remote control... and you always have a mute button, Pipsqueak." He laughed and sighed gustily, enjoying the panic in her eyes. "What does he see in you? The things he gave up to do that for you. Heaven knows why. Well. Heaven doesn't know why, but, it's just a saying, you see." He suddenly looked to his left like he could hear something. "Ah ha. Gotcha." And without another word, he'd disappeared, and then so had everything in front of her.

It was like if an angel weren't with her, she couldn't see or hear Heaven at all. The second Zachariah disappeared she was plunged into sudden total silence and total darkness that pressed in like dirt in a grave. She stayed face-first on the ground, breathing hard, trying not to panic, clinging onto the sensation of wet grass, worried about Sam and Dean, not sure how much time has passed or if she could stay sane much longer. She tried to stay calm, focused on not trying to make a sound, because if she was reminded that she couldn't, she might break down completely. She belly-crawled forward a little more, feeling with her hands for something besides grass. The darkness was so pervasive. Fear made her veins cold. Pretend you're asleep. Your eyes are closed. That's all. She thought of Cas, remembering when he hugged her in Gabriel's hell world. She tried to remember how that felt, to focus on remembering how it felt to be held so safely and securely. She tried to call up fond memories of Sam, Dean. Sunlight, breeze, 80s rock on the radio. She crawled forward more.

And suddenly without warning, she was yanked from that place nauseatingly, abruptly standing beside Zachariah and blinking against the brightness while almost falling over from the unexpected change. Sam and Dean were in front of her, being held back by two guys in suits. Their faces registered total shock at her appearance, and she was sure hers looked the same. Alex saw a third angel, a woman, who hung further back. They were in a house that was lit by an unpleasant, unnatural green light. There were brick walls where windows should have been. What the...?— Alex was totally disoriented and confused, everything was too bright and close and Zachariah clapped her on the back roughly, startling her further. "Ah look! The youngest, least attractive Winchester!" Alex looked at him in a daze, feeling stuck in place. "We were just visiting with Mommy," Zachariah told her in a highly patronizing tone.

"Alex!" Sam said.

Dean was struggling against the guy holding him. "You all right? What'd this asshole do to you?"

"Oh, she's fine..." Zachariah answered for her. "A little mute at the moment but... hey, we all have our off days, right?"

Dean looked shocked, then entirely enraged. "You son of a bitch!" he roared, and Zachariah chuckled mildly. "You fix her right now!"
"Or what, Dean?" Zachariah asked, amused. Dean breathlessly, angrily stared him down as Sam gazed in shocked horror at his silent, stone faced twin.

Zachariah feigned intensely thoughtful concern. "Ya know boys, funny story. Alex here? Seems she has no heaven." He paused, clearly enjoying the brothers' dismay and confusion. "I mean, I saw one of them and it was melting, coming apart… and the other ones, they just disappear completely if she's alone... now what do you suppose that means? Huh!" He smiled, like he knew exactly what it meant, and Alex looked at him in terror. Why wouldn't she have a heaven? Is that why Heaven went dark when an angel wasn't around?

"What the hell you mean, she's got no heaven?" Dean demanded all while looking as terrified as Alex felt.

"Just what I said, numbnuts. Little sister here is defective, Dean." He grabbed Alex roughly, who had a surge of fire burst up. She kicked him in the leg… then made a face of pain. She'd forgotten for a minute. Friggin' angels! It was like kicking a solid metal structure. "Am I supposed to say ouch?" Zachariah asked mockingly then chuckled, pulling Alex to him and stroking a hand down her bare arm, his touch distinctly sensual. She struggled a little, turning her face away, revolted and also jarred—when had her jacket disappeared? How had Zachariah done that?

"Didn't like it when I did this to Mom, did you?" Zach asked Dean, smiling a wicked little smile. "How about to little sister?"

Alex gritted her teeth together, realizing what he was trying to do—Zachariah was such a stupid douchebag but he was smart and it was working by making her brothers angry—Sam looked away with clenched fists unable to watch while Dean struggled madly, looking like a caged bull, looking ready to murder Zachariah—but Alex was just royally pissed off. She imagined the various ways she would stab Zachariah if she had an angel blade.

"Leave her alone," Dean threatened in a deadly tone.

"Make me!" Zachariah said, grinning idiotically, and he waved over the female angel. Her brown hair was clipped up neatly behind her head. She was pretty and looked early forties, wearing a business suit like all the other angels. She took a hold of Alex—she was strong as hell—Alex gave her a death glare, unable to break away, but trying anyway.

"You're going to do what I say, boys." Zachariah said and went over to Dean, casually…and then slammed his fist in Dean's stomach. Dean folded over with a pained groan. In unison, Sam and Alex fought desperately against the angels holding them, trying uselessly to help their brother. "I've cleared my schedule, Dean. I have all eternity, and, oh yeah, I have the power to say if Alex here lives or stays dead." Zachariah looked at the angel holding Dean. "Get him up."

The angel lifted Dean up again and Zachariah punched Dean again. Sam struggled with renewed efforts against the angel holding him, and Zachariah's front of indifferent amusement began to fade into something bordering on anger. He held up an accusing finger up at Dean, whose face was twisted in pain. "Let me tell you something. I was on the fast track once. Employee of the month, every month, forever. I would walk these halls and people would avert their eyes!" The house rumbled and shook, affected by his rage. "I HAD RESPECT!" Zachariah raged, then paused, smiling facetiously. "And then they assigned me you. Now look at me." He chuckled, his air of amusement back again. "I can't close the deal on a couple of flannel-wearing maggots and their useless sister? Everybody's laughing at me… and they're right to do it. So! Say yes, don't say yes; I'm still going to take it out of your asses. It's personal now, boys, and the last person in the history of creation you want as your enemy is me. And I'll tell you why. Lucifer may be strong, but I'm… petty. I'm going to be the angel on your shoulder for the rest of eternity. I'm gonna make you "howl." Zachariah was suddenly pleasant again, turning to the angel holding Alex. "Naomi, if you please."

The woman angel grabbed Alex's wrist and twisted it, bending her arm back at an odd angle, and Alex winced in pain as the pressure mounted—she'd be groaning, no, wait, ah, screaming now if she were able, but no sound came out. Zachariah held up a hand, as if to say 'wait' and the angel Naomi stopped, holding Alex there to reel in absurd pain as Dean and Sam watched helplessly. Zachariah walked over to Dean, looking down his nose at him. "Dean, we may be in Heaven, but I can put that kid sister of yours through Hell, got it? I say the word, her arm is broken. It'll hurt, bad. But it'll be nothing, it'll be a blessed relief compared to all the other things I'll break in her."

Dean's expression was murderous, and he opened his mouth to reply but didn't get to. Zachariah socked him in the gut again, harder than before, and Dean made a horrible sound and doubled over.

"Excuse me. Sir?"

Everyone turned at the sound of a new voice—a slight, older black man stood there, clasping his hands in front of himself plaintively. Zachariah seemed surprised, then annoyed. "Joshua?" he asked in disbelief, then became irritated. "I'm in a meeting." He gestured toward where Dean was leaned forward in pain, held by an angel, where Alex was still just inches from having her arm broken.

"I'm sorry," the newcomer said politely. He had a pleasant, rasping voice. "I need to speak to those two boys."

"Excuse me?" Zachariah asked in total shock, and took a couple steps closer.

Joshua remained where he was, unruffled. "It's a bad time, I know, but I'm afraid I have to insist."

Zachariah hesitated then chuckled darkly. "You don't get to insist jack-squat."

A gentle smile from the newcomer. "No, you're right. But... the boss does." Joshua stared at Zachariah unnervingly. "His orders."

The Winchesters all looked at each other now—was he talking about God?

"You're lying..." Zachariah said, but sounded uncertain.

A humble shrug. "I wouldn't lie about this. Look, fire me if you want. Sooner or later, he's going to come back home and you know how he is with that whole... wrath thing."

Zachariah was silent, then reluctant, a little embarrassed sounding. "Fine, but you don't need this one, do you?" He gestured to Alex placatingly. "I mean, come on—she's not a piece in the game."

"Sorry. You aren't to touch a hair on her head." Joshua seemed to grow a little taller, his expression grew less pleasant. "Now... restore what you've taken from her. And leave."

Zachariah looked at Dean and Sam, then Alex—his expression extremely foul. He finally looked back at Joshua, who stood his ground, his expression almost threatening now. And then with the fluttering sound of wings, Zachariah and his three angel goons disappeared. There was a second of surprise when this happened, and then Dean was moving across the distance between himself and Alex, grabbing her up into a huge, almost painful hug, and she could feel him shaking. She shut her eyes, holding on tightly, and for the first time since being there in Heaven, she felt okay. And suddenly she was gasping little relieved sounds—her voice wasn't gone anymore—and the relieved sounds started to sound more tearful. "Hey, hey!" Dean said, his arms tightening, a hand on the back of her head protectively. "I gotcha, you're okay." He let out a long, relieved sounding breath, and he suddenly sounded emotional, softer. His voice broke a little. "You're okay." Alex's eyes were shut tightly, she had her face buried in the front of his jacket shoulder.

Sam was there too now, he had a hand on Alex's back, he was looking at her in concern—last time she saw him, he was laying dead and bloody in a motel room and Alex abruptly withdrew from Dean and crashed into her twin, hugging him hard, so, so relieved. He returned the hug gently. "You okay?" he asked her quietly, drawing back, searching for her gaze.

She nodded and wiped off her cheeks, focusing on calming down. "Y-yeah," she faltered, trying to calm herself down. "Yeah, I am now."

The three of them all looked at each other, then they remembered the other person in the room. Joshua watched with a soft smile patiently, and when they finally looked at him, he turned his eyes to Alex. He approached her slowly, his clasped hands separating, one of them coming toward her. "It's time for you to go back, dear."

She looked at her brothers questioningly. "But..." she protested. However, she never got to finish the sentence. Suddenly she felt herself rushing through time and space, torpedoing back toward the surface, back to life.

Castiel sat on the bed looking at Alex's body with grieving eyes. He had lost track of how long it had been now. Hours at the least. He hadn't heard from Dean or Sam. No one. He was losing hope—whatever little amount of it had remained.

At this point he was beginning to wonder if it were over—if Alex Winchester would stay gone forever. It was a terrible thought, and as he gazed at her face, he thought that she was so beautiful to him, even in death. It hurt to lay eyes on her somehow. He looked down to where her hand rested beside herself so close to his. That hand had punched him, had pushed him away from her, had taken his mistrustfully right before he had defied Heaven for her—that hand had taught him pinky promises, that hand had touched his face and pulled him close. That hand was now lifeless and alone. Mourningly, Cas covered that hand in his own. The skin was cold. He shut his eyes in anguish, his fingers curling around her hand, the tips of his fingers reaching the inside of her wrist. And then he stopped, frowned, opened his eyes. Was that... was that a faint pulse?

Daring to hope, he looked at her face, confused—and then her eyes suddenly snapped open, she gasped loudly, she rocketed upwards—she was frantic, shaken, eyes darting all over the place, like she couldn't see or couldn't focus. Even though he was totally shocked, Castiel managed to anchor and stop her, holding her arms firmly and then she seemed to see him and then her expression broke completely. "Cas!"

She fell into him, embracing him tightly, burying her face in his neck, her arms around his shoulders, she was crying and shaking, and Castiel was shaking too, his arms already around her. He closed his eyes, holding her there in his arms tightly—he was finding it hard to breathe, so overcome with this monsoon of relief and complete surprise—he bowed his head down, burying his nose and mouth in her hair. He held a hand against the back of her head, not daring to let go, and without knowing exactly why, he achingly pressed a kiss there against her hair, and then another. He felt jarred and anchored all at the same time; all he knew was that his Alex was alive, precious, and here with him. He felt one of her hands gripping the back of his neck tightly, he heard her taking trembling, calming breaths, he felt her shifting, looking up at him and he drew back just slightly—looked into her warm hazel eyes once again—and part of him that had been ripped away was restored.
And then her eyes slid away from his, over his shoulder—and her expression went cold when she saw where Sam and Dead laid still and dead. She was trembling again, and looked down at herself, saw the blood, the holes in her tank top where the shotgun's buckshot had ripped through. The blood, mostly dried, all over her. She was shaking again, looking alarmed. "W-why aren't they alive, Cas?" she looked at her hands in slowly-dawning horror, one of which was covered in dried rust-red blood. "Why d-did Joshua send me back and not them?"

"I'm not sure—" he replied, finding his voice.

She didn't seem to hear him, she seemed to be going into shock, looking down at her stomach, at the blood stains. She stood up shakily and Castiel stood with her immediately, but she was already walking off toward the bathroom, stumbling oddly, not seeming to have total grasp over herself. "I can't—it needs to get off of me—"

Cas, following closely, alarmed and concerned as she blundered into the bathroom—he wasn't sure what she was doing. There was a large shower there, the walk-in kind with a sliding glass door. It was already open and she careened into the shower fully dressed, fumbling with the shower dials in a state of extreme duress. She held her hands under the stream of water, seemingly unable to wait for the blood to wash off. The blood gave way to bright pink skin underneath as the water pelted her. Castiel hovered right outside of the shower door uncertainly as clothes and all, Alex turned away from him, leaning against the shower wall with her palms pressed flat against it—she was completely soaked now and her hands came to either side of her head. "This can't be happening."

Castiel felt as though he should go to her, but he remained outside the shower. "Alex—they'll be sent back. They're vessels."

She shook her head, finally looking back at him. "But what if…" she seemed to lose some physical strength and she suddenly pitched to the side, stumbling—and Cas darted forward, catching her before she could fall forward. Her hands grabbed his forearms tightly. The warm water streamed over him now, too, soaking his trench coat, his head, his hair. He needed to know what had happened to her to shake her up so badly—instinctively, he felt like there was something more to why she was so frightened and rattled... he knew that she'd been drifting, and there was a sudden, awful suspicion that something had happened to her up there.

Filled with unmeasurable concern, he looked into her eyes pleadingly. "What happened to you?" he asked, rife with worry.

She squeezed her eyes closed and put her face there into the front of his shoulder. "I don't... everything, Cas! Why can't I..." she drew a trembling breath. "Why can't I just hold it together anymore?" She pulled back, looking at nothing in particular with an ill and dazed over expression. "I-I used to be stronger than this, goddamit!" Her expression crumpled into misery, she shook her head. "I can't do this anymore!" she managed raggedly. He believed her—and it killed him somehow. Water pooled at their feet in the bottom of the shower, faint red from the blood washing off of her.

"Do what?" he asked, his anxiety paining him at this point.

"Anything, everything," she sputtered. "I've tried," she choked out, "I've tried, but I can't."

He took her face in both his hands, demanding her gaze and she stopped, met his gaze, out of breath, despairing. "You can," he said, and her expression softened, she stared at him, then her hands came and grasped his wrists, she looked down, focusing on breathing.

And even though Castiel felt so much horror, had so many questions, he remained still, composed, trying not to think of how desperate he was to comfort her—or maybe it was himself—with a kiss. He wasn't strong enough to move away, wasn't weak enough to drift closer. Not until she leaned in and rested her forehead to his wearily and sniffed softly. His hands still held her face, and one of his thumbs brushed across her cheek whisper-soft. Her eyelashes dripped—were those tears, or was it water? And she trembled, her thumbs touching the bare skin of his hands, stroking downwards once, a touch that seemed tender and intimate to Castiel. And his breath was caught in his throat, he was thinking of how he could never, ever see her like that again—dead and gone and lost forever—that he felt he would do anything, anything to keep her alive. And not because of a decree of Heaven, not because of an order. This need to keep her safe was no longer anything except his own conviction. A conviction that ran deeper than any ocean on earth, reached higher than the sky itself.

He looked at her then, slowly, hesitating. Realizing. Realizing how ever since he saw her first, everything had been building toward this moment. The moment when he came to truly understand how much she meant to him and how much that scared him. He realized she had wedged herself deep in his—heart? No. He had no soul or heart, did he? All he knew was that she had imprinted herself upon his mind and spirit, she had ruined him for anyone or anything else, she had changed his mind about everything. There was truly no going back. She had become what was most important to him—this beautiful human mystery of half-smiles and dark, haunting eyes—she was what was most important. Maybe he'd believed it was wrong, once, but now? Today? He knew this connection between them was real and lasting, undeniable and strong, wasn't wrong, couldn't be wrong. It was solid ground under his feet.

And right now she was so close and he felt so much for her and she was afraid, wrecked, sad, and he needed her, needed to know she was really back, really alive, really there with him. This urgent feeling transcended all that he understood. And he had the distinct impression that she, too, needed him in the same way, that she was waiting for him. And he felt like he couldn't hold back any longer, couldn't keep her waiting a second longer. He hesitated, inched closer, and then pushing the small, ever-weakening inner protests aside, pressing his lips to Alex's urgently, lingeringly. Relief and warmth flooded him, he felt her hands mirror his—one on each side of his face as she returned the kiss. She relaxed against him, and he against her, a million worries and fears banished at the touch of their lips to each other's. Achingly, they parted just slightly, just for a second, then came together again in unison, Castiel's hands sliding down, his arms now circling her, his hands pressed into her back and pulling her to him securely as he left another tender, slow, simple kiss against her lips. The warm water showered over them, steam curled and rose around them. They drew back just slightly and for a moment everything felt right, for a moment, they just were… and then Alex's expression changed she suddenly looked frightened again. "I'm, I'm sorry," she said, sounding like she was beginning to panic again. Her hands now gripped his shoulders tightly. "I'm sorry," she said again, and he didn't understand, he frowned. She swallowed hard. "I just don't want you to leave."

He felt he could literally break from her desperate tone, from what she implied, because he realized what she meant. Every time they had been close like this… he'd left her right after. But how could he, especially right now? "I won't," he told her with no shortage of grief at himself. He held the side of her face now, his thumb against her cheek again. "I won't," he repeated. Compelled and saddened alike, he pressed a kiss to her forehead. Their eyes closed at the same time, Alex's expression becoming deeply affected, as if she might cry—Cas's eyes closed tightly, brows knit close together in earnestness as he held the kiss there to the wet skin of her forehead. Her arms were now lightly resting on either side of his waist, her hands clinging to his soaked trench coat. Castiel held her tightly, breathing her in almost, the reality of having lost her sweeping over him all over again, causing his chest to spasm in pain. "I won't leave you again," he promised her, his mouth still there, close to her forehead. "Not without saying goodbye."
He looked down at her then, and she was looking up at him in torn hope, slight disbelief. And as he looked at her, he felt keen awareness that whatever their connection, their bond had been before... it had just become even deeper with the promise he'd made. Should that have panicked him? Perhaps he had lost his mind, but right now, it didn't. He just was so thankful that she was alive that other thoughts and worries paled in comparison to his relief. And then the euphoria faded—she seemed to falter in his arms, her expression grew strange. "I don't feel..." she said, and her legs went out from under her—Cas's arms, already around her, easily held her up and kept her from falling.

She appeared to be dazed again and Cas looked at her anxiously. "Are you all right?"

She clung to him weakly, eyes darting back and forth, looking down and nowhere in particular. She shook her head, grimacing. "No I—I think I need help," she said, and sounded sullen, unhappy about it. Hearing her ask for help set Castiel at unease—he could tell her body was giving out and it terrified him. What was wrong with her? What had happened?

He pushed the emotions and fears away, focusing instead on doing what he could. He didn't know what had befallen her in Heaven and might not for awhile, not until she was calm and okay. He picked her slight frame up easily and saw that she was a little embarrassed—this was the same girl who always insisted on doing things on her own, who was insulted when her brothers treated her like she was weaker. So now, having to depend on him, that would bother her. He said nothing and just carried her back into the main room—her eyes remained downcast, except to flicker up to his face a couple times. Her arms loosely circled his shoulders, he could feel her breathing in and out steadily. He'd picked her up like this earlier, but she'd been dead—the thought disturbed him all over again.

Carefully, he set her down on the vacant bed—she was dripping wet—they both were—and Cas stood back, narrowed his eyes in thought. "Towels," he said, then turned around, went back into the bathroom and found some—but before he picked them up, he looked down at himself. Without moving or even blinking, he manipulated the atoms surrounding him, banishing the water molecules that had settled into the fabric of his clothing, darkened the strands of his hair, beaded on the surface of his skin. He was dry instantly. He had considered doing the same for Alex, but instinctively, he felt that she wouldn't want that. Any reminders of Heaven or angels might be detrimental to her right now. He wondered again what had happened to her there. He needed to know. He was worried, and deeply. Heaven wasn't the same place it had always been.

He returned to her with towels and she looked at him with distracted and upset eyes. She'd been staring over at Sam and Dean's bodies, her expression tense and afraid, sad. Castiel set the towels in a stack beside her and took one from the top. She reached for the towel but Cas wrapped it around her shoulders for her. She blinked rapidly, seeming taken aback, like she hadn't expected that. Castiel brought the far ends of the towel together in front of her, circling it around her like a cloak. Inside this circle, she took hold of the towel, her hands just opposite of his. Their eyes met briefly. Her hair was dark and dripping, he could see the soaked strap of her tank top where the towel hadn't quite covered.

He thought hard, thinking through the sequence of events he associated with human cleansing rituals, recalling what came next. "You need dry clothes," Cas said.

"My bag is—" she started, but he had already seen it, recognized it, and took it up from where it sat on the floor a couple feet, she looked at him in surprise.

He set it beside her on the bed and unzipped it slowly, began looking for a suitable article of clothing, then stopped. "Is this... inappropriate?" he asked, suddenly realizing he wasn't sure if going through her clothing was acceptable or not.

She was hiding a smile at him and looking at him with soft, open eyes. "So inappropriate," she said quietly, but that little smile and the amusement twinkling in her eyes told him she was joking. He felt himself smiling back at her softly, relieved that she was beginning to calm down. She was beginning to look like herself again.

He found a tank top—she wore those all the time. He found a pair of jeans. He pulled both items out slowly, examined each article thoughtfully, then laid it out. Alex watched him with interest, first looking at his face watching his eyes and subtle eyebrow movements, then looking at the way his hands held her clothing. She grimaced slightly then, looking up at him in faint disorientation, seeming to become aware of pain. "Cas… my whole body feels like… like it's weighed down, like my muscles don't work anymore." She sounded tired. "Is this…. I dunno, normal?"

Pausing, troubled, Cas looked at her. "I'm not sure," he told her honestly, thinking about it. "I don't know many people who've returned from death." He found a pale blue button up shirt with long sleeves and laid it on top of the jeans and the tank top he had selected.

Alex looked down, letting out a soft little huff of air. "Yeah, guess dying and coming back isn't normal to begin with, is it. But... Sam and Dean have both done it before." She drew in a deep breath, let it out, sounding strained and apprehensive even though she was now attempting to be more conversational. "Maybe it was just my turn."

She looked toward her brothers again, then Cas stepped sideways into her line of sight, gently demanding her gaze. "You're going to be fine, Alex. I promise."

She looked like she wasn't sure about that. "I can barely even lift my arms right now. It's getting worse. I feel so tired." Her eyes went to the clothes he'd laid out beside her, then down at herself. She looked exhausted, like the idea of changing her clothes seemed impossible. But she let the towel go and grabbed the bottom of her tank top, pulling at it weakly for a couple seconds before giving up, her expression twisting into a grimace. She looked upset. "Cas, I literally can't." She looked at him pathetically. "My arms are Jello."

Cas narrowed his eyes, scanning the reserves of his mind and memories. But he found no knowledge of this 'Jello' she mentioned. He narrowed his eyes even more. "What's... Jello?"

Her troubled expression softened. "It's wiggly stuff that you eat." Cas tilted his head to the side slightly. That sounded unappealing. Alex shrugged, not looking at him anymore. "I can barely even make a fist." She was moving her fingers in and out, watching them with a deepening frown. "How long was I... uh, dead?"

"Hours," Cas answered. Although somehow it had felt like eons to him.

Alex seemed surprised. "It felt so much longer... like a day. Maybe two." She sounded so deeply disturbed and once again, Castiel felt concern ripple through him.

She sighed heavily, not noticing his distress. She was looking at the clean, dry clothes beside herself longingly, and Cas hesitated, then offered. "I can help you." Her eyes flicked up to him and he suddenly felt shy almost. "Get changed," he added for clarification. She looked down at the soaked buckshot riddled, bloodstained tank top she was wearing and she was quiet for a long minute, her eyes sliding over toward where Sam and Dean's bodies laid.

She looked back at Cas finally and he could tell she was apprehensive. "Okay."
His tongue darted out to wet his lips—a physical reaction he had never had before. He was a little surprised at himself, then he refocused. He grasped the bottom edge of her tank top with both hands then looked at her in the eye, waiting for her to change her mind—but she just waited and returned his gaze. Castiel swallowed, then began to take her shirt off. His fingers grazed the bare skin of her waist, then her side where her ribcage was as he carefully peeled the shirt off of her. He kept his gaze respectfully averted when she raised her arms weakly and he pulled the shirt over her head, leaving her completely bare from the waist up. He noticed how she breathed a little harder than necessary. He was very methodical and careful, dropping the destroyed tank top onto the floor, then taking the clean, dry one and holding it out in front of himself, his gaze downward and avoiding inappropriateness.

Alex watched Cas, not really sure how this was happening or what was wrong with her, just sort of going with it—she weakly put her hands through the arm holes, feeling totally exposed and vulnerable. But Cas wasn't looking at her, he was staring hard at the floor, somewhere near her left foot. She was more than a little in awe of his calm, his poise, his complete helpfulness. The shirt was on now, Cas was tugging it down over her still-damp torso, and then she was modest again. There was a lump in Alex's throat, and she wasn't sure why it was there. But looking at him right now, she loved him so much.

He was looking down at her wet jeans, frowning slightly. She followed his gaze, and realized what he was thinking. How was this going to work? She imagined it for a moment, Cas helping her out of the jeans, his fingers brushing against her bare thighs as he tugged them off, maybe his eyes flickering up to hers intensely... Jesus Christ Alex! She looked away, awkward, embarrassed at herself. "Can you just… angel magic me?" she asked, and he glanced up at her. His bright blue eyes froze her. For a second, they were both silent, maybe having forgotten everything completely. His eyebrows were raised, his forehead wrinkled up, his expression somewhere between concern, care, and studiousness.

"Yes, of course," he replied, his voice softer than before. He hesitated, then touched her lightly on the top of her thigh and Alex almost melted—he probably didn't know what kind of things a touch right there would do to her—it wasn't even scandalous, it was just knowing that was him, touching her... but then the sensation of her jeans suddenly being completely dry distracted her and surprised, she looked down at them.

"Wow." She smiled softly. "You're kind of handy to have around." Understatement. But he was smiling back, a little crookedly, a little sadly. Again she was given to pause when she looked into his eyes. And then he picked up the button up shirt and helped her into that, guiding her arms through. She noticed he was putting it on her inside out but said nothing, just glanced at his backwards tie, smiling faintly to herself with a heart that felt full and safe.

He finished, drew back, nodding slightly, and Alex was physically weak, tired, exhausted but feeling overcome by her emotions and feelings for this angel of hers—what if he hadn't been here when she'd come back? Her voice cracked a little. "Thanks, Cas." Without even meaning to, she turned her head again, looked at where Sam and Dean laid. The fear that they would never return struck her again like lightning. Where were they?

"We can go somewhere else—" Cas suggested, looking at her uneasily. He had backed up a little and was looking at her with intent uncertainly.

Alex shook her head and raised her chin. "No," she said, resolving herself. "I need to be here when… when they come back."

Which they will, she reminded herself, choosing to believe that Castiel was right. But she couldn't just keep looking over and seeing that—her big brothers dead, Dean staring up into nothing, Sam riddled in bullets. Both of them soaked in their own blood. It was one of the most horrible sights she'd ever seen, and every time she looked over and saw it again, she wanted to be physically ill.

With what little strength her muscles possessed, she she slid down into a sitting position onto the floor beside the bed, where she couldn't see the bodies of her brothers. Castiel sat down beside her without any hesitation at all, and she glanced at him sidelong, mildly surprised again. He sat with his feet flat on the floor, knees bent up—just like she'd taught him in what seemed a lifetime ago. God, he's changed so much since then. Or maybe I have. Or maybe both of us have. The space between their shoulders was too much, but Alex remained still, thinking hard. She wanted so badly to tell him everything about what happened in Heaven, to ask why it had been like that, to just be held by him forever. The shower… the kisses… maybe those should have confused her. But she understood now, and it was startling but also so entirely obvious and unavoidable. He loved her, she loved him. The end. All these things stood in the way, all these dark things hung over their heads, all these unknowns hung in the balance, but none of it could change what they felt. So, where did they go from here? Question of the century.

She glanced at him again, remembering how much she had missed his these past couple weeks, how angry and confused and hurt she'd been when he hadn't come when she called. It seemed so out of character of him to just ignore her calls and she felt like there had to be more to it. "I... I called you a bunch of times, the past couple of weeks," she ventured, and he was immediately clearly uncomfortable. Alex pressed her lips together, looking at him for a long minute, not understanding. "Why didn't you come?"

Cas's expression flickered in pain. "I thought... I thought I could protect you. I thought I could change things."

He sounded so guilty, so burdened and weary. "Cas..." she said softly, not sure how to reassure him.

The angel in the trenchcoat shook his head slightly, looking ahead of himself with a hard expression. "I could have saved you from what happened here today if I hadn't been trying so hard to stay away..." he looked at her now, and his expression almost scared her, it was so intense, so emotional. "I almost lost you."

She faltered under his gaze and shook her head, remembering Heaven, and there was a deeply unpleasant and frightened feeling in the pit of her stomach. "I was lost," she said softly, almost to herself. "It was all dark, and empty, up there... falling apart." It was too frightening to think about even if it were apparently over... for now. "Cas, I didn't have a Heaven," she told him in barely a whisper. "The only time I could see anything was if I was with someone else." Cas was clearly blindsided by this information. Alex felt small and scared. "Does that... does that mean I'm supposed to end up in Hell? Or when I die... I'm just alone in the dark forever?"

Cas's frown was stern and hard. "All souls have heavens, even the ones that go below. It has to be a mistake."

Alex shook her head. It wasn't a mistake. It had happened, it had been real and so, so unnerving, so terrifying. "Zachariah said I was 'defective'," Alex said, her voice waveriing now as she remembered what he had done to her, what he'd taken, how scared shitless it had left her.

"Zachariah found you?" Cas asked, looking deeply alarmed.

Alex shut her eyes for a minute, memories of that turning her stomach again. "Yeah. What did he mean, Cas?"

The angel was just staring ahead of himself in blank horror, shaking his head. "You're not defective. You… can't be." He sounded at a loss. Alex realized he had no idea why it would have been like that up there for her, and it left her even more frightened. Castiel always knew this kind of stuff. If he didn't know—who would?

Alex thought of her brothers—the one who had been to Hell had a heaven! And Sam, too—the boy with the demon blood, the one who was the devil's own vessel. So why did that leave her with a heaven that had been coming apart at the seams… and disappeared entirely if she wasn't in the presence of an angel? Did it have something to do with what Crowley had been telling her? Maybe if she was the one who killed or destroyed Lucifer, it meant her soul just was destroyed and voided completely. Was that really where she would end up, forever? For eternity? Alone, in the dark, listening to the sound of her own heartbeat all while losing her mind? She felt panic rising inside, she felt herself getting freaked out.

Cas was looking at her again, saw it. And she felt his hand on her shoulder, the shoulder closer to him. He seemed to be frightened too but was pushing it aside, trying to comfort her, trying to steady her, and Alex needed him so badly. She held back her frightened tears. "Cas, I know that… I know that we can't," she managed, barely able to keep her voice even. "But right now I just need… need you… to help me."

He looked positively brokenhearted, convicted. "How?" he asked, simply waiting for her to tell him, but Alex shook her head, not able to put it into words. She weakly curled herself into his side and he seemed to realize—he moved himself closer and put an arm around her, a little awkwardly at first. Her cheek pressed up against the front of his shoulder and she held onto the lapel of his coat. She felt his face turn toward her, his chin just brushing her forehead. Her eyes fell closed and she just breathed. He was warm and solid, comforting. She could feel him breathing, too. She felt his chin lower, and she knew he was looking down at her now. She could picture the worried expression on his face. Her eyes opened, but she didn't move. Not yet.

"I saw my dad. In Heaven."

He went completely still at her sudden confession. "What?" His deep voice reverberated through her, they were so close.

Alex shook her head just slightly, and the fabric of the trench coat rubbed her cheek. "I don't know how, Cas, but it was him."

There was a long pause. "You're sure?"

She almost smiled now, suddenly feeling reminiscent. "Do you remember that time you came into my dream? The one at the amusement park? When you told me that… that you were the one who gave me my voice?"

"Of course." His voice was softer. Was that her imagination, or did he sound reminiscent, too?

She thought about that time when Castiel had barged into her memory dream. "You told me you wondered what it might be like to have dreams," she said, her words full of quiet fondness. His chin moved against her forehead again, and she knew, instinctively, that he was surprised that she remembered that. "Anyway," she said, "That… that dream was the one really good memory I have with my dad. That's how he proved it to me. Well. That and he didn't know Dean's birthday."

A short silence. "What did your father want?" Cas asked.

Alex could hear the concern and worry in his voice. He didn't, after all, have the best impression of Dad. "To say goodbye," Alex said softly, growing reflective, deep things welling up in her heart. She breathed in deeply and shut her eyes for a minute. She felt Cas's arm around her tighten a little.

"You didn't tell me that before," Castiel said quietly after a moment, sounding reflective himself. "About what that dream was."

She felt him looking at her and she was quiet for a long minute, then she drew back and her eyes lifted up to his. "I didn't trust you then," she said softly.

He looked back at her, seeming to be deeply affected by her words, and Alex was utterly wrecked by his closeness, his deep, soulful gaze. Even though she felt so weak, she reached up, her finger tips brushing against the collar of the trench coat, then the side of his neck. Her thumb rested against the scruffy edge of his jaw. I didn't love you then. His eyes searched hers, and he gently reached up, fingers curling around her hand in a way that could only be described as tender. His thumb swept across her knuckles, his other arm tightened around her, holding her there securely. "Tell me what happened," he said.

And safe there beside him, in his arms where she felt like she could belong forever, Alex nodded. She was ready to now. She took a deep breath, started at the beginning, remembering.

"So. I died." she paused. How often did people get to say that? "And when I came to… on the other side, I was in complete darkness, couldn't remember anything about where I'd been before that. Then I could see this faint light in the distance…"

Chapter End Notes

Classic rock songs were peppered throughout this chapter and maybe you're wondering what they were or wanting to listen to them… they are listed below in order of appearance! And they are all pretty excellent if I say so myself.

Knockin' On Heaven's Door by Bob Dylan

Paradise City by Guns N' Roses

Fortunate Son by Creedence Clearwater Revival

Caught up in You by 38 Special
"The children of Cain are gathered, to plunder and burn and slay: God was with man in Eden, but where is God today?"
- Charles Hamilton Musgrove

Heaven

One second Alex was there, the next she was gone—and Dean looked at Joshua in worried, suspicious confusion... then the house in which they'd been standing was suddenly gone too. Replacing it was a verdant garden—a conservatory of some kind. Overhead a tall glass ceiling dome let in sunlight that softly lit exotic plants, trees, and flowers crowding a small stone pathway. The air was warm and humid, smelling of earth and ozone. Joshua stood at the bottom of some stone steps in front of the brothers, and the Winchesters glanced at each other cautiously. Dean felt especially rattled because a few seconds ago he was holding the sister he feared he'd lost... and now she was gone again.

"This... is Heaven's Garden?" Sam asked, sounding a little underwhelmed as he went down the stairs slowly, looking around in what might have been disappointment. Dean followed him warily.

Joshua had some pruning shears and was offhandedly clipping the gardenia bush he stood next to. "You see what you want to here," the angel explained mildly, interested in his work. "For some it's God's throne room; for others it's Eden. You two, I believe it's the Cleveland Botanical Gardens. You came here on a field trip."

Sam's expression lifted. "Yeah... I remember," he said, tone becoming more fond and reminiscent.

Dean however was of a one-track mind and found his voice again. "Yeah, good times," he interjected sarcastically while looking at Joshua mistrustfully. "Where'd you send our sister?"

"Back to her body, of course," Joshua said in his soft, rasping voice. He fixed Dean with a knowing gaze, pausing his task for a moment to smile faintly. "Don't worry Dean. She's alive and well."

"And probably freaked out as hell," Dean muttered. Alex had never died before unlike himself and Sam—she who would be sitting in the motel room with his and Sam's bodies at this moment right? Jesus Christ, he hoped she was okay... it was bad enough with everything else that had happened to her that day but Zach taking her voice—that was over the line, that was too much, and Dean was worried as hell about her at that moment. He could just picture her not knowing why she had been sent back alone, maybe not knowing where he and Sam were at all or if they'd ever be back. God, what if she has no memory of Heaven? What if—

"I wouldn't worry," Joshua said, interrupting Dean's concerned thoughts. He returned to pruning the bush in a slow, steady manner. "She's not alone."

Dean frowned, his thoughts halted and he didn't understand, but Sam looked like he thought he knew what Joshua meant. "Cas?" Alex's twin asked.

Joshua smiled as he trimmed a couple dead leaves away from the gardenia. "Who else? He is her guardian angel."

Dean made a face, disgusted. Suddenly all these flowers and trees and sounds of birds were pissing him off. "Yeah he's real great at keeping her safe, isn't he?"
"You sound unhappy about something," Joshua said, and the glib commentary was just about enough for Dean's temper. He chuckled dryly to keep from punching something.

"Pal, unhappy is putting it lightly. And y'know, while we're talking about things that piss me off… you got any idea why the hell Alex doesn't have a heaven?"

Joshua looked up from pruning, his eyebrows rose just slightly, he looked faintly sympathetic. "Yes, actually. I know exactly why. But unfortunately... it's not information I'm privy to say."

There was a rush of righteous, indignant anger at that comment and Dean's blood pressure hit the roof, his protective hackles raised. "You friggin' kidding me? You better tell me right now or I am gonna take your little gardening scissors and stick them right up—"

"Dean." Sam interjected loudly, giving his brother a look that asked 'are you nuts?' Unwillingly Dean clamped his mouth shut. Sam was right. Probably shouldn't piss off the angel who could send them back to earth.

Joshua's expression was still calm and he turned, giving the boys his full attention, setting his pruning shears down. He clasped his hands in front of him thoughtfully. "Have faith, Dean. God makes all things work together for the good of those who love him and are called according to his purposes."

"Well that ain't me!" Dean retorted angrily.

Sam grabbed Dean's shoulder hard, looking at his brother sharply. "Dean—can you just shut up for two seconds?" And shaking his head, exasperated and barely hiding the fact, Sam attempted civility while Dean stewed. "Joshua—you talk to God, right?" he asked.

"Well mostly he talks to me," Joshua corrected pleasantly.

The Winchesters shared a significant look. "Well, we need to speak to him," Sam told him. "It's important."

"Where is he?" Dean asked.

Joshua answered in an oddly elusive tone. "On earth."

That was quite the bombshell. "Doing what?" Dean asked—that didn't sound so good.

Joshua's indifferent answer further frustrated and confused Dean: "I don't know."

Dean shook his head. This was rich, this was great. Ever the patient one, Sam was staying cool and prompting Joshua again. "Okay, well, do you know where on earth?"

"No, sorry. We don't exactly speak face-to-face."

Dean looked at his brother, wondering if this seemed as fishy to Sam as it did to him. Not even the angels knew where this God dude was? This couldn't be right. Something wasn't adding up. "I... I don't get it," Dean said, thinking out loud. "God's not talking to nobody so..."

"So why is he talking to me." Joshua finished his sentence for him and Dean waited expectantly. This better be good. "Well. I sometimes think it's because I can sympathize—gardener to gardener—and, between us, I think he gets lonely."

Lonely? The hell kind of answer was that? "Well, my heart's just breaking for him," Dean said sarcastically, his barely contained anger boiling beneath the surface again.

"Well, uh, can you just get him a message for us?" Sam asked, glancing at Dean disapprovingly.

"Actually, he has a message for you," Joshua said, and the brothers were both surprised, listening, waiting. Then were mutually shocked by what Joshua said next. "Back off."

"What?" Dean asked.

"He knows already," Joshua said simply. "Everything you want to tell him."

"But…" Dean started.

"He knows what the angels are doing," Joshua said, cutting him off. "He knows that the apocalypse has begun. He just… doesn't think it's his problem."

Words that left both boys ears ringing. "...Not his problem?" Dean repeated. This had to be some kind of joke.

But Joshua was continuing and his tone was growing more intense and assertive than he had been so far. "God saved you already. He put you on that plane. He brought back Castiel. He saved your sister from the future that was supposed to befall her." Dean went still, not sure what Joshua was talking about with that one, but the angel didn't pause. "He granted you salvation in Heaven…" he turned to face Sam directly, "and after everything you've done, too. It's more than he's intervened in a long time. He's finished. Magic amulet or not… you won't be able to find him."

"But he can stop it," Dean protested, not understanding, not getting this. What was wrong with these people? "He can stop all of it!" He was at a loss, shaking his head. "So he sends Cas to rescue me from Hell because 'God has work for me' and now it's… what, too bad, catchya later, good luck with the apocalypse?"

Joshua didn't blink. "Pretty much."

Every swear world in the book went through Dean's mind. "No. No fucking way." Dean protested vehemently, feeling tricked, feeling betrayed, because this was his last option, this was supposed to be the answer to all the problems he'd been facing. "You can't be serious…!"

"I am," Joshua stated, blunt and blasé.

Dean's teeth ground together in frustrated, incredulous anger as his fists clenched up. "Unbelievable. So he's just gonna let whatever happen and do jack squat about it? The hell kind of God is he, anyway?"

Joshua shrugged almost imperceptibly. "Why does he allow evil in the first place? You could drive yourself nuts asking questions like that."

This was an absurd waste of time. "Fucking coward," Dean muttered, shaking his head in repugnance while staring at the ground, his nostrils flared and jaw clamped tight. "Can't even tell me in person that all the crap he's put me through was for nothing, that I'm on my own, that it was all some huge lie? Some game for him?"

"I know how important this was to you, Dean," Joshua said, and he looked truly empathetic, shaking his head shallowly. "I'm sorry."

"What, saving the world? Stopping the apocalypse? You're damn right it was important to me!
Why isn't it important to him?!" Dean raged, but Joshua said nothing. Sam hung back silently and Dean scoffed. "You're sorry. Yeah, thanks, that helps so much," he snapped cynically, then his mouth bore down into a thin, hard line. Suddenly he felt hopeless and emotional, beaten down and weary—all the things he'd been trying to avoid feeling. "Forget it," he said, and attempted to save face, attempted to appear at ease and uncaring. "Just another deadbeat dad with a bunch of excuses, right? I'm used to that. I'll muddle through."

"Except… you don't know if you can, this time." Joshua said, and Dean faltered, his defenses rising up. "You can't kill the devil... you're losing faith, in yourself, your brother... you feel your sister slipping out of your grasp… and now this?" Sam looked at Dean, surprised, maybe realizing just how desperate and depressed Dean really was—everything Dean had been trying to keep a secret. Dean avoided looking at Sam. "God was your last hope," Joshua stated, and paused, grew deeply sympathetic. "I just… I wish I could tell you something different."

"Yeah I bet you do," Dean muttered, but he was too burdened and worn out to put any fire into the words. "Just stay the hell outta my head, man. It's all the same damn story with all you winged freaks. Well lemme tell you, wishing never got anyone anything. So unless you got something helpful to tell me… we're done here."

Sam glanced at Dean but didn't reprimand him this time, instead refocused on Joshua. "H-how do we know you're telling the truth about all this?" he asked.

Joshua seemed mildly affronted. "You think that I would lie?"

"It's just that… you're not exactly the first angel we've met," Sam said, cringing apologetically. "And… sorry, I just always thought God would care about the world he created, the people he made. It... it doesn't add up."

"I'm sorry you feel that way… but I'm not lying. In fact, I'm rooting for you boys! I wish I could do more to help you, I do. But..." Joshua indicated the gardens surrounding them. "I just trim the hedges."

Sam was growing exasperated and his eyebrows knit together, he wetted his lips. "Come on man, if not for us, then for our sister—help us," he implored earnestly, grasping at straws now. "She's not even part of this."

Joshua looked at Sam directly, eyes narrowing almost imperceptibly. "I wouldn't be so sure about that if I were you." The Winchesters were both stunned into silence at the vague comment and Joshua shook his head slightly. "I'm sorry. I'm really quite incapable of helping you any further. And it's time for you to go home again. I'm afraid this time, won't be like the last. This time, God wants you…" he lifted a hand up... "to remember."

There was a whooshing sound and a bright light blinded them. Dean felt himself throttling forward, he felt like he was underwater and his lungs were bursting, and then he was shooting upwards, gasping for air, alive again.

---

Earth

Alex was where she'd been for the past thirty or so minutes—curled into Castiel's side as they sat on the floor at the end of the bed. Her head rested in the space between his shoulder and neck, and the side of his head tilted down toward hers, seemingly of its own accord—he didn't remember doing it consciously. Alex had told him everything—seeing her father and the phone booth, the darkness of Heaven when she was left alone, Zachariah's appearance and what he'd done, said—the heavens he'd taken her to—being left in the dark for what felt to her like a day—Zachariah's confrontation with Dean and Sam—his attempt to use Alex against her brothers. And then Joshua's appearance. Cas was struggling to process all of it—but one part especially.

"And then," Alex continued, as Castiel stared at the area in front of himself with a deep frown, "Joshua sent me back. You know the rest from there."

She became quiet and Cas mulled it all over. She'd told him everything calmly, factually, if a little distracted sounding. He knew she was wondering what he was, and that she was much more afraid than she sounded. "I don't understand..." Cas said slowly. "Why you wouldn't have a heaven." It was one of the more terrifying and disturbing things he had ever been told and he was completely baffled—however, the way her soul had been drifting and impossible to track down... now it made sense, but it was the kind of sense that only sent more terror racing through his mind.

Beside Cas, he felt Alex breathing in and out and for a moment, he shut his eyes, just focusing on that. In the darkness caused by his closed eyes, memories came to mind; he remembered seeing her as she lay dying in the future, memories came to mind; he remembered seeing her as she lay dying in the future, remembered her asking if there were a Heaven at all. Cas... do you... do you think there's still a Heaven up there? she'd looked at him with tearful eyes that could break a heart into pieces. He'd seen himself tell her that yes, of course there was. And then later he'd grabbed Chuck in a rage, shouting at him that there was no Heaven anymore, that Alex was gone forever. Distress coursed through Castiel's veins. What was he supposed to do? What was he supposed to do? Cas's eyes opened.

The only hope that remained was that Dean and Sam would return after speaking with Joshua and have some answer, have some word from God. Perhaps the reason God hadn't answered Castiel personally was because he'd done the wrong thing to defy Heaven. Perhaps God would speak to Dean, who was, after all, the righteous man. Cas clung to this final thread of hope despairingly and had to forcefully quiet his mind.

Alex shifted slightly against him and Castiel looked down towards her, feeling a fierce determination overtake him. "I'm going to find out why," he told her grimly. And he was. If it was the last thing he did, he would find out why she had no heaven awaiting her when she died.

"How can you find that out?" Alex asked. She sounded kind of hopeful and apprehensive at the same time, and she felt tense beside him.

She was scared, he realized... he felt his protective instincts surge forth. He didn't want her to be afraid. "I'm not sure," he answered honestly. "But I will." The arm that he had around her tightened, his other arm came across their bodies so that he now held her securely in the circle of his arms.

He'd learned some time ago that it made her feel better when he put his arms around her... and reflected briefly that it made him feel a little better, too. After a couple seconds she relaxed into him, burrowing into his side a little more—and knowing she wanted to be close to him sent indescribable feelings rushing through him. Her hand and arm had been resting across his stomach, but now slid around him, pulling him closer than before. He felt her smallish hand against his side, underneath where his arm rested, and he breathed out slowly. Memorizing the way all of this felt. This moment was stolen and fleeting... and the future it would lead to was dark. But perhaps, he reflected, it was too late altogether. He couldn't seem to tear himself away from her, in any circumstance. He needed to be close to her as much as he needed to be far away—but he was losing the fight. It wasn't a battle he wanted to win, after all. Being here with her felt righter than anything else.

Neither of them said anything for a long moment. He could feel how very small and fragile she was in the grand scheme of the planet, the universe, the galaxy. How breakable, how mortal. And he began to think of the stark reality, the truth of the matter: Dean would die someday. Sam would die someday. Alex would die someday. But Castiel? Castiel would stretch into eternity endlessly. Alone as he always had been. That thought made him feel very terrible indeed. He couldn't imagine going back to that existence again. Not after all of this.

But he would have to, wouldn't he? The fact remained: this was the way things were. She was human. He was not. And she would end, like all humans did. He thought, for the first time, that even if he succeeded in seeing her through this lifetime, she would die anyway. Of cancer? Of a heart attack? Of old age? Such deep sadness overcame him at this thought. And if she wasn't in a heaven, if she was drifting and in the dark and if he could never find or see her again... his chest tightened. He didn't want that. Ever. It was unthinkable and perverse. He imagined the universe missing one bright spot of light. This human. Why did she matter like this to him? He had seen billions of humans but none of them had ever mattered like she did... why did the thought of her no longer existing leave him feeling empty, panicked, and afraid? He wanted to live in a way where he would never be parted from her. And this thought, this realization, stilled him. It seemed that fate was determined to push himself and Alex together, only to rip them apart brutally again, only to use their union as the cause of her demise. What was he supposed to do?

His strained, stressed mind turned to another unsolved mystery. What had John Winchester been trying to tell Alex about Azazel? The danger isn't past. What did it mean? Castiel knew nothing about this, had no idea what John could have meant—he could only conclude that John was either mistaken or that Azazel had concealed part of his plan much better than Heaven and Hell had guessed. Castiel's thoughts bothered him, deeply. All he could think, over and over, was what am I supposed to do?

No answer came. No revelation. He was completely confounded. Turning his head toward Alex, Cas did the only thing he really could in the moment, which was to assess her wellbeing. She seemed more relaxed than she had been when she first came back, she was calm now. This was one small mercy in the face of a monsoon, but it soothed him. She had barely been able to move her arms thirty minutes ago, but now she held onto him tightly—he thought she was definitely recovering from her temporary state of weakness and was successfully regaining her strength. But he asked, anyway, to be sure. "Do you feel any better than before?"

"Well, I couldn't run a marathon, but yeah," she said. "I think standing up might be in the cards again." Her humorous tone became softer. "But... I don't want to. Not yet."

He felt another rush of something strong in his veins when she told him that. He understood the sentiment. Her hand moved to his chest, palm flat there—he remembered when she'd done something similar... they'd been in the freezer... but this time she wasn't being sensual, she was pressing herself up, pulling back enough to look him in the eye. But he couldn't help but recall, through that touch, what had happened between them before... he swallowed, suddenly a little disconcerted, wondering how she kept doing that to him... affecting him so completely, mind and body alike. As she drew back enough for him to see her face again, he was struck again by how beautiful she was. She was looking at him intently, questioningly. "What did Zachariah mean, Cas? When he said you gave up things to... to give me my voice?"

Cas looked at her hesitatingly. He'd assumed she would ask this when she told him what Zachariah had said, a few minutes ago... and he thought about the answer. He wasn't sure that telling her would be beneficial... in fact, he wasn't sure if she could take the truth of what he'd surrendered to restore her voice. If he told her what had happened, she would be horrified, she wouldn't understand. Her features showed concerned disquiet when he said nothing. "Why don't you want to tell me, Cas?" she asked slowly, and now she looked almost afraid. "What did you do?"
Cas looked down. Her hand that had been wrapped around him was now resting loosely on his knee and he was oddly compelled to cover that hand with his own. The skin was warm, he could feel her pulse underneath his fingertips. His eyes flicked to hers, and he held her gaze for a couple long beats. "Nothing I wouldn't do again," he answered her. Her face changed and the worry was replaced with some kind of caught off guard expression.

And then there was a loud gasp on the other side of the room—Sam shot up in bed, and then Dean, too. Alex jumped, looking at them in shock, and Cas froze, unsure what to do. Sam was panting loudly, regaining his breath, and Dean too—the difference was, Sam didn't seem to be seeing anything at all—he was flailing a little, off balance and reeling—but Dean was staring right at Alex and Cas, his expression rigid. His eyes met Cas's and his expression darkened… but he said nothing, tore his glare away, and focused on Sam. Swinging his legs over the side of the bed, Dean grabbed Sam by both arms and steadied him, seeming to be much better off than his brother was.

Even as Dean steadied Sam, Cas and Alex separated—Cas stood, helping Alex stand too, gently holding her hand in one of his, her arm in the other. Dean glanced their way, saw it, and his grip tightened on Sam. Guilty, Cas looked down.

"Whoa," Sam commented breathlessly, oblivious, staring unseeingly into Dean's chest. "That was… intense." He looked up at his brother, expression becoming concerned. "You alright?"

Dean's jaw tightened and he let go of Sam, glancing their sister's way. "Define alright." He stood up, then seemed to realize he wasn't at full capacity—swaying just slightly he stopped and frowned—then took a halting step toward Alex and Cas. Dean stared at Alex hard, glanced at Cas, then looked at his sister again. "You okay?" He asked her gruffly.

She seemed a little reluctant to speak with her brother, who was now looking at her thoroughly, taking in her damp hair, the way she was holding onto Castiel's arm for support. Alex met her brother's gaze falteringly. She sounded different than a minute ago when it had just been herself and Cas. "I'm fine, Dean."

Her brother's eyes narrowed. He didn't seem to accept her answer. "She seems to have had a rougher time than the two of you," Castiel observed.

Dean gave him a hard look. "Yeah, maybe that's because she didn't have a reservation upstairs—you wanna explain that Cas?"

Sam was silently watching this all unfold with an earnest, concerned expression. Cas looked over at Sam, and then Dean, frowning, knocked off balance. "Joshua didn't tell you why?" he asked, feeling strange, like his stomach was sinking in sick confirmation of what he'd already suspected…but hadn't wanted to believe.

"Oh he knew," Dean retorted angrily, "but he just wasn't saying." Dean finally looked at Alex again, whose scared expression seemed to settle him slightly and he relented, looking back at Cas a little less angrily now. A little more despairing instead. "So you don't know, either?"

Alex sat down on the edge of the bed at this point, frowning at the floor, seeming to feel disillusioned. Cas looked at her in concern, then saw that Dean was watching him watch her. Dean's eyes were intent and sharp. Accusing almost. Cas felt caught and attempted to wipe his face of any expression. He approached Dean, attempting to appear calm and neutral. "No, Dean, I don't know. If I knew, I would have told you a long time ago." For just a moment, Dean's expression turned to open and pleading. Like he had no other possible idea of what to do or say. And Castiel shook his head, feeling the same way. The men looked at each other silently, then Cas turned away, moving toward the smashed wall partition, trying to think, trying to reason.
Dean and Sam both noticed the smashed partition at the same time and looked at each other frowning, then in unison looked at their sister for an explanation. She was staring at her lap unseeingly. Didn't notice her brothers at all. "Everyone… has a heaven," Castiel said softly, still facing away. He sounded disturbed to his core.

At this point Sam stood up and crossed the room to go to his sister, putting a comforting arm around her as he sat down beside her. He watched her, his forehead wrinkled up in worry. She didn't look at him.

"Everyone has a heaven," Dean repeated. "So why the hell wouldn't Alex have one?" He was clearly trying to remain calm but just barely managing. "I mean, you gotta have some idea, right Cas?"

Castiel turned around, harrowed. He looked at Alex for a couple of long seconds, his expression tense. Then he met Dean's expectant stare sadly. "Dean—I don't."

The two men stared at each other again for another long moment, Cas's eyes sad and empty because he was out of answers. Dean looked the same but was angry about it. After realizing Cas wasn't going to say anything else, Dean made a sarcastic face. "Great. This is just the best day ever," he snapped, shaking his head and looking off to the side at nothing in particular. Castiel's expression screwed up in confusion. How could he say that, even in jest or cynicism? Dean was now pacing in agitation, rubbing his hand across the lower portion of his face, appearing to be sorting his thoughts. Sam and Alex were watching their brother with guarded expressions, and to Castiel, in that moment, the twins looked very alike. "Well, all of that great news aside—" Dean finally said, looking at Cas accusingly again. "Your friend God? He doesn't give a rat's ass."

"...What?" Cas asked, his face squinting oddly because he was unsure what Dean was saying to him. And what did a rodent's posterior have to do with it?

Dean threw his arms out angrily, at his wit's end. "You heard me, Cas! God doesn't care, doesn't wanna help, doesn't think this whole mess is his problem. So where do we go from here, huh?!" His anger wavered into desperation at the very last few words he spoke.

Alex was watching her brother shrewdly, just as upset at the news as he was, and then she looked at Cas—their eyes met for a brief moment and Cas shook his head, his frown deepening. He looked back at Dean, who was now watching him hawkishly. "Joshua told you this?" Cas asked slowly, trying to make sense of what he'd just been told. It couldn't be true. It couldn't.

"Yeah, Cas," Sam interjected softly. He seemed sympathetic. Maybe defeated. "He said God won't help us." He looked at Cas sadly, who turned to gaze at Dean blankly. Dean's grim stare silently confirmed Sam's statement, and Cas felt as if he'd been physically struck, as if the breath had been knocked out of his lungs.

Silently choking it down, Cas felt himself shaking his head—this certainly wasn't right. With his arms hanging limply at his sides, he stared down at Dean's shoes unseeingly. "That can't be true..." he managed to say, even as he was thinking of how God hadn't answered his begging pleas earlier that same day. How God had been impossible to find all this time. It could be true. In fact, somewhere deep down maybe he'd already known or believed this. But he didn't want it to be the truth. He turned around and put his back to them. "Maybe... maybe Joshua was lying," Castiel said, and he wished one of them would agree with him. Give him a small shred of hope to cling to.

But he heard Sam breathe out heavily. "I don't think he was, Cas. I'm sorry."

Cas turned slightly to see Sam, who looked deeply compassionate. "But that makes no sense,"
Alex protested, still there beside her twin and looking at him, completely shattered and baffled.

Sam just shook his head faintly, looking at his sister sadly. "I know. But that's what Joshua told us."

Alex met Cas's waiting gaze and he had to turn around, unable to bear the way she looked at him—not when paired with everything else on his shoulders right now. He had failed the Winchesters, for one, because he'd told them this was the answer, that this would save them all. And the father he had always believed in, served, existed for—didn't care. Wouldn't help them. Castiel felt defeated, crushed, and looked upwards, one final despairing thought left in him. "You son of a bitch," he said, and waited to be struck down. Nothing. His pained betrayal worsened. "I believed in…" he trailed off, not even sure why he was doing this. There was no sign, no reply, nothing at all. God had left a long time ago, hadn't he? You fool. And Castiel realized he was truly alone in this, truly on his own.

After trying to steel himself, Cas turned around again, ashamed to face all of them. Alex had stood up and was looking at him in deep concern that he didn't deserve, and he looked away, dug in his pocket, drawing out the amulet he'd borrowed from Dean. "I don't need this anymore," he said heavily, overwhelmed with sorrow and even anger. "It's worthless." He tossed the amulet and Dean caught it. Cas stared at the necklace in Dean's hand. "I'm finished. It's over."

Dean looked at Cas with genuine empathy, suddenly feeling a surprisingly kindred connection with the angel—absent father who you believed in with everything you had… only to be let down and disappointed time after time? Believing in something that turned out to be a lie, a trick? Yeah. He got that. Cas had put all his faith and effort into what turned out to be a dead end—and the depression, the broken sorrow Dean heard in the angel's voice echoed what Dean lived with every day of his damn life. Dean almost thought of saying something to Cas, of trying to lift his spirits somehow, of attempting to comfort him in some small way—but then Cas looked at Alex again and the suspicious hackles raised again as Dean watched—the angel was weary and sorrowful as he looked at Alex—he seeming to be waiting for her to do something. Dean watched in mounting confusion as he watched what looked like a freaking silent conversation take place between the two. Then Alex truly shocked Dean when she nodded just slightly, her eyes full of emotion and empathy. "It's okay, Cas." Wait. Was she giving him permission to leave? And just like that Cas turned, walking a few steps away. Dean's mouth was now hanging open slightly. What the actual hell?

"Cas. Wait," Sam implored, standing up too.

Cas turned slightly, speaking to no one in specific. Sounding depressed as hell. "I'm going to find out why Alex has no heaven."

And then without any further anything—Cas was gone.

Sam seemed frustrated: he threw his hands up slightly then ran a hand through his hair while huffing. Alex was the opposite. She stared at the space Cas had occupied, her expression strange. Dean stared down at the amulet in his hand, the reality of his life sinking in. God wasn't gonna help. So where the hell was there left to turn? Everything was going wrong for him right now, everything! Dean thought of when he'd first come back and seen Cas holding his sister like that—arms wrapped around her, not enough space between them, Alex's head nestled into his shoulder—and that jealous, protective, possessive, scared shitless feeling came over Dean again. What the hell was Alex thinking? Didn't she know she was playing with fire and would be consumed by it? Destroyed by it? And didn't she know that he couldn't let that happen? That he wouldn't stand by and let her sign her life away because she had some weird crush on her guardian angel? Dean's grip tightly on the amulet in his hand, so tight that the little barbs on it dug into his skin.

This amulet had been given to him by Sam when they were kids. Dean had always worn it. It had been one of his most prized possessions. But now he felt like that was a trick, too. Why had all of Sam's heavens... his happy memories... been times spent away from family? Dean felt disillusioned, like maybe he was the only one who really loved his family—that Sam and Alex were just humoring him, pitying him. He thought of what fake-Mom had said in Heaven to him... it wasn't really her, he told himself. It was some trick Zachariah conjured up. He knew it then, and he knew it now. Still, her words cruelly replayed in his mind.

"Everybody leaves you, Dean. You noticed? Mommy. Daddy. Even Sam. Next is Alex.! Mark my words, sweetie. Everyone you ever thought you could count on... is going to go away. You ever ask yourself why? Maybe it's not them. Maybe it's you."

Maybe it was him. Next is Alex. And Dean knew exactly what—who—she'd leave him for. The angel in the trench coat. The barbs on the amulet dug in even more to his skin and Dean wanted to throw it at a wall. "We'll find another way," Sam said, approaching him and sounding determined but harrowed. "We can still stop all this, Dean."

Dean bit back a thousand sarcastic retorts and just focused on the amulet. "Yeah? How."

Sam stalled, then tried valiantly to instill hope. "I don't know, but we'll find it. You and me and Alex—we'll find it. We always do."

"Yeah, sure," Dean muttered and turned then threw his amulet into the trash can before looking at Sam pointedly. Sam was staring at the trash can, hurt by what his brother had just done. Dean ignored it. "Did you ever stop to think, Sam, that maybe, just maybe, we won't always be able to figure this shit out? That someday we're gonna meet our match?" Dean was hopeless. "Come on. This is pointless. We are in way over our heads. Today proved that."

"It's not pointless," Sam protested, and Dean just felt more and more anger churn in his stomach.

Dean turned from his brother, bitter. "And yeah, while we're on the subject of being in way over our heads..." he fixed Alex with a pointed look. "You wanna tell me what the hell is going on with you two?" it was a gruff and impatient question, Dean raised his eyebrows and gave her a look that said 'I'm waiting' while Alex looked at her brother in disbelief. Everyone in the room knew what Dean was asking about.

"Dean—" Sam protested, not giving Alex a chance to answer.

Dean rounded on his brother angrily. "No Sam! This has gone on long enough—and I need a damn explanation!"

Sam did that thing he did where he attempted to smile even though he was clearly mad as hell. "Come on man, she just died and came back to life—you think you can give her a minute?" Sam was no longer smiling. Instead he looked disgusted.

"Do I look like I got a friggin' minute, Sammy?" Dean demanded wrathfully, getting in Sam's face. "Do I look like I got all the time in the world? Don't you see how jacked up this is? Some thousands-of-years-old guy is taking advantage of your sister and you got no problem with it? I mean talk about pedophile!"

Sam's eyebrows shot up high. Alex looked disgusted. "Have you lost your mind?" she asked angrily.
Dean whirled and invaded her space brutishly. "Well you sure as hell have lost yours!" he snapped. The two of them glared at each other hard.

Sam grabbed Dean by the shoulder, forcefully turning him, kind of putting himself between his two siblings. "Dean, just lay off a little!" Sam said sharply, "I mean you're being absolutely—"

Dean yanked himself out of Sam's grasp. "Absolutely what, Sam? Responsible? Sane?" Dean was on a tirade at this point. "Why don't either of you see all the levels of wrong here? He's walking around in a borrowed meatsuit that's married by the way—and if he ditches out of it again, what then, huh?" Dean was shouting. "He's not even human!" Dean gestured wildly in his sister's direction. "Alex has a crush on this angel because he's the only guy who's ever shown her the time of day—but it's dangerous and gets her killed and I'm not letting it happen!"

Alex moved forward, grabbing Dean hard by the front of his jacket, startling both of the brothers. "You need to shut your damn mouth right now," she told him in a trembling, anger-filled voice. She shoved him away brutally and he looked surprised as she stared at him balefully, mistrustfully—clearly wounded. "I mean, what is this…? Be-a-heartless-asshole day?" she asked, trying to cover with sarcasm. Right behind her, Sam stayed put, looking at Dean with deep disappointment.

"You don't even know half of what happened to me today," Alex continued accusingly, "and then you come in here acting like you own me and my life and you're the only one who gets to be there for me?" She shook her head, rolled her eyes in clear irritation, seeming to realize something. "This is ridiculous. I don't owe you any fucking explanation," she said stonily. And Dean was shocked. Who was this girl? They had never had secrets the two of them. She'd always confided in him, and he in her. What was happening? But instead of appealing to her, he just reverted to his normal M.O.—which unfortunately was douche supreme.

"Like hell you don't," he retorted. "I keep you safe. Me. That's my job, that's the one thing I haven't screwed up yet." He relented, thought about it. "And I guess I fell down on that today, huh." He wasn't trying to throw a pity party, but he realized it sounded that way once he said it.

Annoyed with him, Alex seemed done with the exchange. "Forget it. We're all fine."

"Fine?" Dean asked peevishly, flying off the handle again, unable to deal with everything inside his mind. "Your two brothers are Heaven and Hell's most wanted and God won't help and that's fine?"

"Jesus Christ Dean!" She suddenly exploded. "Do you have to bring that up?!"

"Well excuse me for living in reality—" he started.

She held up a hand, calling for silence, looking tense and incapable. "No. I just—I can't. I can't think about that right now," she said harshly.

"Well too bad Princess, because looks like it's the main event and you got front row seats," Dean retorted angrily, and immediately got one of the most righteous bitchfaces from Sam, ever.

"Dean!" Sam exclaimed, and his voice was shaking now, too. "She's scared! Come on."

Dean blinked and stopped, realizing Sam was one hundred percent right, and felt regret and self-loathing wash over him. He realized his mistake. As usual, his temper had gotten the better of him and he let out a deeply ashamed breath, suddenly unable to look at his sister. "I'm sorry," he said, clenched his jaw tight, managed to look her in the eye, just for a second. "I'm sorry."

Alex wasn't appearing very receptive. "Sure you are," she said darkly.
Dean got mad again. "I am!" he insisted, frustrated to maximum capacity at himself, the world, his family—everything. "Geez. Guess I can't do anything right," he said sarcastically, "unlike Castiel." The way Alex rolled her eyes only inspired another outburst. Dean's expression soured. "Oh come on, Al. I'm not an idiot. I see the way you look at him," he accused. "The way he looks at you!"

"Just stop it, Dean!" she shouted and she glared at him angrily, so upset that her shoulders were heaving. "I am so tired of you treating me like this," Alex muttered, and in a show of aggression reminiscent of her younger years, she pushed him away with both hands—Dean felt almost murderous at this point.

"Treating you like what, like I care about whether you live or die?!” he shouted, bouncing back from where she'd shoved him, bearing down on her wrathfully—only to be stopped by Sam, who grabbed his shoulder, gave him a 'cool off, Dean' look. Dean again yanked himself out of his brother's grasp, then looked at both of his siblings in total disbelief, feeling completely alone and misunderstood and ganged up on. "All I've ever done is look out for this family…” he said, shaking his head hollowly. "And this is the thanks I get?" he scoffed and let out a disgusted breath. "Yeah cool. I'll catch you two later then." He grabbed a clean shirt and stalked out, slamming the motel room door behind him, fuming.

And then he heard footsteps behind him. "Dean!" He whirled, keeping his face hard. It was Alex. "Where are you going?" she demanded, and for a second, Dean thought about letting it go. The rage, the jealousy, all of it. Because he couldn't stand to fight with her.

But bitter, angry, hurt, he just kept his face hard and pushed her away with finality by turning around, continuing on his way. "To get a damn drink," he threw over his shoulder. "If you need a shoulder to cry on, why don't you call your little angel boyfriend instead?"

There was a long silence—Dean didn't look back. But he heard the tears in her voice. "You're such an asshole!" she shouted at his back. He set his mouth in a hard line, kept walking, didn't look back. If he did, she might see how much he hated himself, too.

Back in the hotel room, Sam was changing shirts quickly, tossing away the bloody bullet-riddled one and pulling on a black one, about to follow after Alex and Dean—and then she came back in and Sam froze, he looked at her in surprise, his features etched in earnestness and concern. Where had Dean gone? She was really upset, but trying not to show it—looking down and away, hardening her face. "Hey, are you—"

"Don't Sam," she interrupted tersely, shaking her head as she plopped down onto her bed, the only bed in the room that wasn't covered in blood. She faced away from him, her shoulders slouched in exhaustion. She sounded like she was barely keeping it together. "I can't. Please just… just leave me alone." She curled up on the bed on her side, looking very small and alone, and Sam decided not to do what she'd said. He went around to the other side of the bed where he could see her face, and crouched there beside the bed. His face was now level with hers, but she was staring at the sleeve of her shirt kind of blankly, not returning his gaze.

"Look," Sam appealed gently. "I know you need some space but… if you need me… I'll be here."

His twin's eyes—eyes that were the exact same color as his—flicked up to him. She looked kind of like she was despairing. "Why haven't you told Dean?" she asked him falteringly. "About… about what you saw?"

Sam's eyebrows went up a little. "Do you really have to ask?" They were talking about Dean, weren't they? The same guy who had just flipped his shit over seeing Cas hugging Alex. How would he have reacted if he'd seen them, Jesus, dry humping each other's brains out? Sam looked at his conflicted sister, more serious than before. "I think we both know he can't hear about that," Sam said. "Ever."

Alex's features crumpled. "Why is he like that? Why does he have to... to be that way?"

She sounded about as lost and let down as Sam felt. Dean just wasn't himself lately, he was really losing it in some ways, wasn't he? Sam shrugged, trying not to give in to despair. "That's... just Dean," he said helplessly and looked at his little sister sadly. She looked really torn up, and he instinctually felt it was because she didn't know what was going on anymore. For the past few weeks she'd been withdrawn, tense. Maybe it was because of Cas. Sam wondered, and his eyes rested on hers again. He was worried about a lot of things right now, one of the biggest things being her wellbeing. "Look—I don't really know what's going with you two—" he began, "but it's obvious to me that Cas cares about you. A lot." He paused tensely. "Just... be careful, okay?"

She met his gaze hesitantly and he swore she looked like she wanted to tell him something, but she remained silent then looked away again. Sam frowned lightly, then made himself smile. "Your shirt's inside out, you know."

One corner of her mouth lifted up in a fond little smile. "Yeah," she said softly, her eyes flickering over the sleeve of her shirt where the inseam showed. "I know." Sam looked at the sleeve, trying to see what she was seeing. But it was just a shirt.

Alex's little smile faded and she became troubled again, drawing in a deep breath as her eyes went somewhere far away. Sam wished she wouldn't carry her burdens alone. He put one of his massive hands on the side of her head comfortingly. Her hair was damp—had she been in the shower? Sam wanted to ask her, pretty intensely, about Cas, and exactly how close he was to her, what their relationship was—but he didn't think this was the right time. And it wasn't his business. He just knew that his sister looked depressed and grief stricken.

He didn't feel very sure of himself at all anymore, but for her sake he tried to sound like he was confident. "We're gonna get through this," Sam told her. "All of it. We'll figure it out."

She looked at him once again, but this time, she looked like she was filled with the same dread he was feeling, the same hopelessness he couldn't shake off. "We might not this time, Sammy," she said quietly, and she seemed close to terrified tears. "We might not."

Sam couldn't find a reply. He knew she was right.

A couple blocks away at the same moment, Dean was sitting in silence in a mostly-empty bar... realizing he didn't even want anything. Comfortably Numb was playing on the crappy bar sound system. How fucking fitting. The sound of pool table balls cracking as they hit against each other reminded Dean of Heaven all over again.

There was literally nowhere left to turn and Dean felt like he was drowning, held underwater, losing his hold over life without a way to break to the surface. What the hell was he supposed to do? Dean propped his elbow up onto the bar counter and put his face in his hand wearily. Listened to Pink Floyd singing exactly what he was feeling.

"I can't explain, you would not understand. This is not how I am... I have become comfortably numb."

Fergus Roderick McLeod—that had been his original name before paying up on his soul deal and going to Hell, before becoming a demon, before taking the name Crowley. It had been a pitiful
